THE LIFE OF FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS.

1. The family from which I am derived is not an ignoble one, but hath descended all along from the Roman and Judean nobility among several people. Is of a different origin, so, with us, to be of the sacerdotal dignity, is an indication of the splendor of a family. Now, I am not only sprung from a sacerdotal family in general, but from the first of the twenty-four classes; and as among us there is not only a considerable difference between one family of each course and another, I am of the chief family of that first course also; say, farther, by my mother I am of the royal blood; for the children of Asa or Assur, from whom that family was derived, had both the office of the high priesthood, and the dignity of a king, for a long time together. I will accordingly set down my predecessors in order. My father’s father was named Simon, with the addition of Phelusi; he lived at the same time with that son of Simon the high priest, who, first of all the high priests, was named Hycanus. This Simon Phelusi had also sons, one of whom was Matthias, called Ephialis; he married the daughter of Jonathan the high priest, which Jonathan was the first of the sons of Asa or Assur, who was high priest, and was the brother of Simon the high priest also. This Matthias was also the son of Matthias, or to be more exact, the son of Joseph, born in the fifth year of the reign of Alexander; his son Matthias was born in the tenth year of the reign of Archelaus; and I was born to Matthias on the first year of the reign of Caius Cesar. I have three sons: Hycanus, the eldest, was born on the fourth year of the reign of Verasion; as was Matthias born on the seventh, and Agrippa on the sixth. Thus have I set down the genealogy of my family, as I have found it described in the public records, and so did advice to those who, if they desired to know me, [of a lower origin.]

2. Now I will add that I am not only eminent on account of his nobility, but had a higher commendation on account of his righteousness, and was in great reputation in Jerusalem, the greatest city we have. I was myself brought up with my brother, whose name was Matthias; for he was my own brother, by both father and mother; and I made mighty proficiency in the improvements of my learning, and appeared to have both a good memory and an accurate mind. Moreover, when I was a child, and about fourteen years of age, I was recommended by all for the love I had to learning; on which account the high priests and principal men of the city came then frequently to me together, in order to know my opinion about the accurate understanding of points of the law. And when I was about sixteen years old, I had a mind to make trial of the several sects that were among us. These sects are three; the first is that of the Sadducees, the second that of the Sadducees, and the third that of the Essenes, as we have frequently told you; for I thought that by this means I might choose the best, if I were once acquainted with them all; so I contented myself with hard fare, and underwent great difficulties, and went through them all. Nor did I content myself with these trials only; but when I was informed that one whose name was Banus, lived in the desert, who used no other clothing than grew upon trees, and had no other food than what grew of its own accord, and bethed himself in cold water frequently, both by night and by day, in order to preserve his chastity, his resolution, and his will, and continued with him for three years. So when I had accomplished my desires, I returned back to the city, being now nineteen years old, and began to conduct myself according to the rules of the sect of the Pharisees, which is of kin to the sect of the Stoics, as the Greeks call them.

3. But when I was in the twenty-sixth year of my age, it happened that I took a voyage to Rome, and this on the occasion which I shall now describe. At the time when Felix was procurator of Judea, there were certain priests of my acquaintance, and very excellent persons they were whom on a small and triding occasion he had confined and sent to Rome, in order to plead their cause before Cesar. These I was desirous to procure deliverance for, and that especially because I was informed that they were not unmindful of piety towards God even under their afflictions, but supported themselves with figs and nuts. Accordingly I came to Rome.
though it were through a great number of hazards by sea; for, as our ship was drowned in the Adriatic sea, we were in it, being about six hundred in number, 2 swam for our lives till the night; when, upon our land and on our sight of a ship of Cyrenes, I and some others, eighty in all, by God's providence prevented the rest, and were taken up into the other ship. And when I had thus escaped, and got at Puteoli, where the Irishines, who called me Puteolus, I became acquainted with Aliturus, an actor of plays, and much beloved by Nero, but a Jew by birth; through his interest became known to Poppes, Cesar's wife, and took care as some of his people went to treat her there, lest the priests might be set at liberty. And when, besides this favor, I had obtained many presents from Poppes, I returned home again.

And now I perceived innovations were already begun, and that there were a great many very much elevated, in hopes of a revolt from the Romans. I therefore endeavored to put a stop to these tumultuous persons, and persuaded them to yield to the Romans, and to the robbers, and against whom it was that they were going to fight, and told them that they were inferior to the Romans not only in martial skill, but also in good fortune; and desired them not rashly, and after the most foolish manner, to bring on the danger of the most mischievous upon their country, upon their families, and upon themselves. And this I said with vehement exhortation, because I foresaw that the end of such a war would be most uncertain to them; for I could not persuade them, for the madness of desperate men was quite too hard for me.

5. I was then afraid, lest by insinuating these things so often, I should incur their hatred and the hatred of the future if I were to resemble the robbers, and should run into the danger of being seized by them, and slain; since they were already possessed of Antonius, which was the citadel; so I abode among the high priests and the chief of the Pharisians. But no small dread seized their minds; when we saw the people in arms, while we ourselves knew not what we should do, and were not able to restrain their seditions. However, as the danger was directly upon us, we pretended that we were of the same opinion, and it is to Dutius' credit that he was quiet for the present, and to let the enemy go away, still hoping that Gessius [Florus] would not be long ere he came, and that with great forces and so put an end to these seditions proceeding.

6. But, upon his coming and fighting, he was beaten, and a great many of those that were with him fell. And this disgrace [which Gessius with Cestius] received, became the calamity of our whole nation; for those that were fond of the war were so far elevated with this success, that they had hopes of finally conquering the Romans. Of which war another occasion was ministered to them by this: There was a city in the neighboring cities of Syria seised upon by Jews as dwell among them, with their wives and children, and slew them, when they had not the least occasion of complaint against them; for they were no strangers of the province of the revolt from the Romans, nor had they given any marks of hatred or treacherous design towards the Syrians. But what was done by the inhabitants of Scythopolis was the most impious and highly criminal of all; for, when the Jews, their enemies, came upon them from without, they forced them to arms against their own countrymen, which it is unlawful for us to do: and when by their assistance they had joined battle with those that attacked them, and had beaten them, after that victory, which was the Atarne of these their fellow-citizens and confederates, and slew them all, being in number many ten thousands [13,000]. The like miseries were undergone by those Jews that were the inhabitants of some other cities that there were in the Decapolis. I account of these things in the books of the Jewish war. I only mention them now, because I would demonstrate to my readers, that the Jews with the Romans was not voluntary, but that, for the main, they were forced by necessity to enter into it.

7. So when Gessius had been beaten, as we have said already, the principal men of Ierussa- lem, Gessius, Gurius, the praetor of Syria, and arms in great plenty, and fearing lest they, while they were unprovided with arms, should be in subjection to their enemies, which also came to be the case afterward; and, being informed that all the Jews had not yet revolted from the Romans, but that some part of it was still quiet, they sent me and two other of the priests, who were men of excellent characters, Josar and Judas, in order to persuade the ill men there to lay down their arms, and to return to the Romans, and to give better to have those arms reserved for the most courageous men that the nation had, [than to be kept there;] for that it had been resolved, that those our best men should always have their arms with them, as they were upon a surprise of the country, by reason that the Galileans had resolved to plunder it, on account of the friendship they had with the Romans, and because they had given their right hand, and made a league with them, that if there were no small slumber about their country, by reason that the Galileans had resolved to plunder it, on account of the friendship they had with the Romans, and because they had given their right hand, and made a league with them, that if there were any, they would wait to see what the Romans would do.

8. When I had therefore received these instructions, I came into Galilee, and found the people in the city in no small alarm about their country, by reason that the Galileans had resolved to plunder it, on account of the friendship they had with the Romans, and because they had given their right hand, and made a league with them, that if there were any, they would wait to see what the Romans would do.

9. There were three factions in this city. The first was composed of men of worth and gravity; of these Julius Capellus was the head. Now he, as well as all his companions, Herod the son of Mairs, and Herod the son of Gamalus, and Comp- sus the son of Compus, (for as to Compus' brother Cripius, who had once been governor of the city under the great king, [Agrippa,] he was beyond Jordan in his own possessions;) all these persons before named gave their advice, that the people would be made quiet; but the second faction, which was of the providers of the revolt from the Romans, nor had they given any marks of hatred or treacherous design towards the neighbor;" and that, ver. 17, "Thou shalt not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people but thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself;" as well as from the question in the Pentateuch in Pro- phets. See Antig. b. viii. ch. xix. sect. 3.

4 At hath been thought the number of Paul and his companions on ship board, Acta. xxvi. 36, which are 757 in our copies, are too many; whereas we find here that Josephus and his companions, a very few years after, were about 200.
5 See of the War b. ii. ch. xvii. sect. 2.
6 The Jews might collect this unlawfulness of fighting against their brethren from that law of Moses, Lev. xvi. 16 "Thou shalt not stand against the blood of thy at the third faction, although he pretended to be doubtful about going to war, yet was he really devious of innovation, as supposing that he should gain power to himself by the change of arms.
He therefore came into the midst of them, and eddewarded to inform the multitude. That the "city of Tiberias had ever been the capital city of Gal-lee, and that in the days of Herod the tetrarch, who had built it, it had obtained the principal place, and that he had ordered that the city sand was called Berytos, and that he had given Tiberias; that they had not lost this pre-em-ience even under Agrippa the father, but had retained it, until Felix was procurator of Judea.
But he told them, that now they had been so opposed to him, that it would be hard for them to Agrippa junior; and that upon Sepphoris' submission of itself to the Romans, that was become the capital city of Galilee, and that the royal treasury and the archives were now removed from them. When he had spoken these things, and a great many more against Agrippa, in order to provoke the people to a revolt, he added, That this was the time for them to take arms, and join with the Galileans as "against the Jews, which were as a nation, "and was "madd, and who would now willingly assist them, out of the hatred they bare to the people of Sepphoris, because they preserved their "independency to the Romans, and to gathering a great army upon his return, it was full of "confidence, upon he returned, inform him what they had advised was more to their advantage, and thus by his craftiness and his fallacies, for he was not unskilful in the learning of the Greeks, and in dependence on that skill it was, that he had sought a way, in order to show them,
"aiming by this way of haranguing to disguise the truth. But as to this man, and how ill were sis character and conduct in life, and how he and his brother were, in a great measure, the au-hors of our destruction. I shall give the reader an account in the progress of my narration. So when Justus had, by his persuasions, prevailed with the citizens of Tiberias to take arms, say, and had forced a great many so to do against the Jews, he marched with them, and moved belonged to Gadara and Hippos on fire; which villages were situated on the borders of Tiberias, and of the region of Scythopolis.
10. And this about the state of Tiberias was now even the same for Gischala, its affairs were thus: When John, the son of Levi, saw some of his citizens much elevated upon their revolt from the Romans, he labored to restrain them, and entrusted them that they would keep their allegiance to them. But he could not gain his purpose, although he did his endeavors to the utmost; for the neighboring people of Gadara, Gabara, and Sogana, with the Tyrians, got to-together great arm, and fell upon Gischala, and took Gischala by force, and set it on fire; and when they had entirely demolished it, they returned home. Upon which John was so enraged, that he armed all his men, and joined battle with the great arm, and in this manner, and after a manner better than before and fortified it with walls for its future security.
11. But Gaius persevered in its allegiance to the Romans, for the reason following: Philip the son of Herod the tetrarch, that same king Agrippa, had been unexpectedly expressed when the royal palace at Jerusalem had been seized; but as he fled away, had fallen into another danger, and that was nothing less than by Maccabees being killed by Macabees that were with him; but surely, and were then in Jerusalem, hindered the robbers from executing their design. So Philip for ten of the principal men of the senate, and for Capellus the son of Antyllus, and committed the furniture to them, with this charge, that they should part with it to nobody else but to myself. From thence I and my fellow-legates went to Gischala to John, as desirous to know his inten-sions, and soon saw that he was for innovations, and had a mind to the principality; for he desired me to give him authority to carry off \(\text{a corn which belonged to Caesar,} \) the villas of upper Galilee; and be pretended that he would expend what it came to in building the walls of his own city. But when I perceived what he endeavored at, and what he had in his mind, I declined him what he desired to do; for that I thought either to keep it for the Romans, or for myself, now I was intrusted with the public affairs there by the people of Jerualem. But when he was not able to prevail with me, he bestowed himself to my fellow-legates; for they had no sagacity in providing for futurity, and were very ready to take bribes. So he corrupted them with money, to decree that all that corn which was within his province should be delivered up to him; while I, who was but only, outvoted by two, and held my tongue. Then did John introduce another cunning contrivance of his; for he said, that those Jews who inhabited Gischala, and the upper Galileans, were friend of the king's deputy there, had sent to him to desire him, that, since they had no oil that was pure for their use, he would provide a sufficient quantity of such oil for them, lest they should die for want of it; they knew he would give it them. Greeks, and thereby transgress their own laws.
Now this was said by John, not out of his regard to religion, but out of his most flagrant desire of gain; for he knew that two sextaries were sent from Gischala fourscore sextaries were sold for four drachmas. So he gave order, that all the oil which was there should be carried away, as having my permission, to desire him voluntarily, but only out of fear of the multitude, since, if I had forbidden him, I should have been stoned by them.
When I had therefore permitted this to be done by John, he gained vast sums of money by this his knavery.

14. But when I had dismissed my fellow-le-gages, and sent them back to Jerusalem, I took care to have arms provided, and the cities forti-
ded. One day John went to Gischala, and took with him certain Galille-ans, and set the entire palace on fire, and thought he should get a great deal of money thereby;
because he saw some of the roofs girt with gold.
They also plundered a great deal of the furniture, which belonged to my fellow-legates, and said, that after we had discovered Capellus and the principal men of the city, we departed from Bethmaus, and went into the Upper Galilee. But Jesus and his party slew all the Greeks that were inhabited there, and massacred, and set thethers as were
their enemies before the war began.

13. When I understood this state of things, I was greatly provoked, and went down to Tiberie to Scevola. There I could see all the royal furniture, to recover all that could be recovered from such as had plundered it. They consisted of chandelights made of Corinthian brass; and of royal tables, and of a great quantity of uncommonly fine carvings, with my consent. He who soever came to my hand for the king. So I sent their arms with their wives and children, and retired to the castle at Gamala, leaving their own villages full of all sorts of good things, and having many ten thousands of cattle therein.— When Philip was informed of these things, he also came to the castle of Gamala; and when he was the mob, the multitude cried aloud, and desired him to resume the government, and to make an expedition against Varus, and the Syrians of Ca-area; for it was reported that they had slain the king's brother. I say I, for I was in the war with them at length be prevailed with them. But now, when the is acquainted with Varus's design, which was to cut off the Jews of Carea, being many thousands with their wives and children, and all in one day, he called to him Erculius Modius, and sent him to be Varus's successor, as we have elsewhere related. But still Philip kept possession of the castle of Gamala, and of the country adjoining to it, which thereby continued in their alliance with us; while I, who was but only, outvoted by two, and held my tongue. Then did John introduce another cunning contrivance of

his; for he said, that those Jews who inhabited Gischala, and the upper Galileans, were friend of the king's deputy there, had sent to him to desire him, that, since they had no oil that was
pure for their use, he would provide a sufficient quantity of such oil for them, lest they should
die for want of it; they knew he would give
it them. Greeks, and thereby transgress their own laws.
Now this was said by John, not out of his regard
to religion, but out of his most flagrant desire of
sent from Gischala fourscore sextaries were sold
for four drachmas. So he gave order, that all
the oil which was there should be carried away,
as having my permission, to desire him voluntarily, but only out
of fear of the multitude, since, if I had forbidden him, I should have been stoned by them.
When I had therefore permitted this to be done
by John, he gained vast sums of money by this his
knavery.

14. But when I had dismissed my fellow-le-gages, and sent them back to Jerusalem, I took care to have arms provided, and the cities forti-
ded. One day John went to Gischala, and took with him certain Galille-ans, and set the entire palace on fire, and thought he should get a great deal of money thereby;
because he saw some of the roofs girt with gold.
They also plundered a great deal of the furniture, which belonged to my fellow-legates, and said, that after we had discovered Capellus and the principal men of the city, we departed from Bethmaus, and went into the Upper Galilee. But Jesus and his party slew all the Greeks that were inhabited there, and massacred, and set thethers as were
their enemies before the war began.

13. When I understood this state of things, I was greatly provoked, and went down to Tiberie to Scevola. There I could see all the royal furniture, to recover all that could be recovered
from such as had plundered it. They consisted of chandelights made of Corinthian brass; and of
royal tables, and of a great quantity of un-
commonly fine carvings, with my consent. He who
soever came to my hand for the king. So I sent in great anxiety. Yet did I preserve every woman from injuries; and as to what presents were offered me, I despised them, as not standing in need of them. Nor indeed would I take those tithes which were due to me as a priest, from those that brought them. Yet do I confess, that I took part of the spoils of those Syrians which inhabited the cities that adjoined to us, when I had conquered them, and that I sent them to my kindred at Jerusalem; although, when I had sent the spoils of Tiberias four times, and Gadara once, and when I had subdued and taken John, who often laid treacherous snares for me, I did not punish [with death] the name of the man who was concerned, as the progress of this discourse will show.

And on this account, I suppose, it was that God, who is never unsatisfied with those that do as the Jews ought to do, delivered me still out of the hands of these my enemies, and afterward preserved me when I fell into those many dangers which I shall relate hereafter.

16. Now the multitude of the Galileans had that great kindness for me, and fidelity to me, that they took me, and their wives, and children, whom they and their wives, and children carried into slavery, they did not so deeply lament for their own calamities, as they were solicitous for my preservation. But when John said this, a man, who was a customer for me, and who would, I thought, give him leave to come down, and make use of the hot oaths of Tiberias for the recovery of the health of his body. Accordingly, I did not hinder him, and I wrote to John, as to a friend and to a ruler against them; for they said they would avenge my death among them upon them. They also carried the report of what had been done to me to all the Galileans, and eagerly endeavored to irritate them against me, and to stir up among them numbers of them would get together, and come to them, that they might act in concert with their commander what should be determined as fit to be done. Accordingly the Galileans came to me in great numbers, and demanded weapons, and besought me to assault Tiberias, to take it by force, and to demolish it, till it lay even with the ground, and then to make slaves of its inhabitants, with their wives and children. Those that were Josephus's friends also, and had escaped out of Tiberias, gave him the same advice. But I did not comply with them, thinking it a terrible thing to begin a civil war among them: for I thought, that this contention ought not to proceed farther than it did; and I told them that it was not for their own advantage to do what they would have me to do, while the Romans expected no other than that we should be drawn away from our mutual seditions. And by saying this I put a stop to the anger of the Galileans.

17. But when John was come to the city of Tiberias, he persuaded the men to revolt from their fidelity to me, and to adhere to him; and many of them gladly received that invitation of his, as ever fond of innovations, and by nature disposed to changes, and delighting in seditions. But they had to close with the clearly J u t u r u s and his father P i s t u s, that were J u t u r u s and his father P i s t u s, that were nearest for their revolt from me, and their adherence to John. But I came upon them, and prevented them; for a messenger had come to me from the governor of Tiberias, as I have said already, and had told me of the inclinations of the people of Tiberias, and advised me to make haste thither; for that, if I made any delay, the city would come under another's jurisdiction. Upon the receipt of this letter of Silas, I took two hundred men along with me, and travelled all night, having sent before a messenger to let the people of Tiberias know that I was coming to them; and when I came near to the city which was seated early in the morning, the multitude came out to meet me; and John came with them, and saluted me, but in a most disturbed manner, as being afraid that my presence would be hurt to him, and to what I was now sensible he was doing. So in great haste went to his lodging. But when I was in the open place of the city, having dismissed the guards I had about me, excepting one, and was sitting down on a certain high seat, in my own chamber, there appeared to me a voice, saying, "Josephus, what would you have me to do?" I entreated them not to be so hasty in their revolt; for that such a change in their behavior would be to their reproach, and that they would then justly be suspected by those that should be their governors hereafter, as if they were not likely to be faithful to them neither.

18. But, before I had spoken all I designed, I heard one of my own domestics bidding me come down; for that it was not a proper time to take care of retaining the good will of the people of Tiberias, but to provide for my own safety, and escape my enemies there; for John had chosen the most trusted and the most learned of them to be about him, out of those thousand that he had with him, and had given them orders, when he sent them, to kill me, having learned that I was alone excepting some of my domestics. So those that were sent came as they were ordered; and they had executed what they came about, had I not leaped down from the elevation I stood on and with one of my guards, whose name was James, been carried [out of the crowd] upon the back of one Herod of Tiberias, and guided by him down to the lake, where I seized a ship and got into it, and escaped my enemies unexpectedly, and came to Tarichæa.

19. Now the inhabitants of that city understood the perfidiousness of the people of Tiberias, they were greatly provoked at them. So they snatched up their arms, and desired me to be their commander against them; for they said they would avenge my death among them upon them. They also carried the report of what had been done to me to all the Galileans, and eagerly endeavored to irritate them against me, and to stir up among them numbers of them would get together, and come to them, that they might act in concert with their commander what should be determined as fit to be done. Accordingly the Galileans came to me in great numbers, and demanded weapons, and besought me to assault Tiberias, to take it by force, and to demolish it, till it lay even with the ground, and then to make slaves of its inhabitants, with their wives and children. Those that were Josephus's friends also, and had escaped out of Tiberias, gave him the same advice. But I did not comply with them, thinking it a terrible thing to begin a civil war among them: for I thought, that this contention ought not to proceed farther than it did; and I told them that it was not for their own advantage to do what they would have me to do, while the Romans expected no other than that we should be drawn away from our mutual seditions. And by saying this I put a stop to the anger of the Galileans.

20. But now John was afraid for himself, since his treachery had proved unsuccessful. So he took the armed men that were about him, and removed from Tiberias to Ophisala, and wrote to me to apologize for himself concerning what had been done, as if it had been done without his approbation, and desired me to have no suspicion of him for his disadvantage. He also added oaths and certain horrible curses upon himself, and supposed he should be thereby believed in the points he wrote about to me.

21. But another great number of the Galileans came together again with their weapons, as knowing the man, how wicked and how sadly perjured he was, and desired me to lead them against him, and promised me that they would not have him for their commander any more. Upon I professed that I was obliged to them for their readiness to serve me, and that I would more than requite their good-will to me. However, I entreated them to restrain themselves, and begged of them to give me leave to do what and prescriptions, in times of danger, to God's blessing, him, and taking care of him, and this on account of his acts of piety, justice, humanity, and charity to the Jews his brethren.
I intended, which was to put an end to these troubles without bloodshed; and when I had prevailed with the multitude of the Galileans to let me set foot upon the Sephoris.

22. But the inhabitants of this city, having determined to continue in their allegiance to the Romans, were afraid of my coming to them, and tried to dissuade me from another action to divert them, that they might be freed from the terror they were in. Accordingly they sent to Jesus, the captain of those robbers, who were in the confines of Tiberias, and promised to give him a golden crown and horse if he would carry with those forces he had with him, which were in number eight hundred, and fight with us. Accordingly he complied with what they desired, upon the promise they had made him, and was deastraous of it. Upon this we were unprepared for him, and knew nothing of his coming beforehand. So he sent to me, and desired that I would give him leave to come and salute me. When I had given him that leave, much did I inwardly dislike this least precaution of his treacherous intentions beforehand, he took his band of robbers, and made haste to come to me. Yet did not this his knavery succeed well at last; for, as he was already approaching, one of those who had deserted him deserted him, and came to me, and told me what he had undertaken to do. When I was informed of this, I went into the market-place, and pretended to know nothing of his treacherous purpose; so the robbers that were armed, as also some of those of Tiberias: and, when I had given orders that all the roads should be carefully guarded, I charged the keepers of the gates to give admission to him and his party to do as they had chosen to do when he came with the principal of his men, and to exclude the rest; and in case they aimed to force themselves in, to use stripes [in order to repel them.] Accordingly, those that had charge of them, when they approached, were not idle, and Jesus came in with a few others; and when I had ordered him to throw down his arms immediately, and told him, that if he refused so to do, he was a dead man, he, seeing armed men standing all around him, was terrified and compelled, and as for those of his followers that were excluded, when they were informed that he was seized, they ran away. I then called Jesus to me by himself, and told him, that he did not merit the design he had against me, nor was I ignorant by whom he was sent for; that, however, I would forgive what he had done already, if he would repent of what he had done, and become a good man. And thus upon his promise to do all that I desired, I let him go, and gave him leave to get those whom he had formerly had with him together again. But I threatened the inhabitants of Sephoris, that, if they would not leave off their ungrateful treatment of me, I would punish them sufficiently.

23. At this time it was that two great men, who were under the jurisdiction of the king, [Agrrippa I.] came to me out of the region of Canaonitis, bringing their horses and their arms, and carrying with them their money also; and when the Jews would force them to be circumcised, if they would stay among them, I would not permit them to have any force put upon them, but said to them, "Every one ought to worship God according to his own inclinations, and not to be constrained by force; and that these men, who are under the jurisdiction of the king, are not to be treated as those who were under me to hate me, he should put an end to the prosperity I was in, he tried to persuade the inhabitants of Tiberias and of Sephoris, (and for those of Gabara he supposed that the prosperity was of the same mind with the rest,) which were the greatest cities of Galilee, to revolt from their subjection to me, and to be of his party; and told them that he would command them to come with him. And the men of Sephoris, who belonged to neither of us, because they had chosen to be in subjection to the Romans, they did not comply with his proposal, contrary, that the rest of the Jews were still for obliging all to whom they were bound to become Jews, and were ready to destroy all that would not submit to do so. See sect. 31, and Luke xvi. 34. and for those of Tiberias, they did not indeed so far comply as to make a revolt from under me, but they agreed to be his friends, while the inhabitants of Gabara did go over to John; and it was Simon that persuaded them so to do; one who in those days was regarded as a particular friend and companion of John. It is true, these did not openly own the making a revolt, because they were in great fear of the Galileans, and had frequent experience of the good way which those who had not only done ye things ye have done to have I say, but had also lain in wait for a proper opportunity to lay snares for me; and indeed I thereby came into the greatest danger, on the occasion following:

28. There were some bold Jews among the men of the vanguard who would not abide by this, and said that the wife of Ptolemy, the king's procurator, was to make a progress over the great plain with a mighty attendance, and with some horsemen that followed, as a guard to them, and this out of a country that was subject to the king as sole queen, into the jurisdiction of the Romans; and fell upon them on the sudden, and obliged the wife of Ptolemy to fly away, and plundered all the carriages. To prevent this, Simon sent to Tarchesius, with four mules' loading of garments, and other furniture; and the weight of the silver they brought was not small, and there were five hundred pieces of gold also. Now I had a mind to preserve these spoils myself, because I knew them to be illicitly gotten, and it is prohibited by our laws even to spoil car enemies: so I said to those that brought those spoils, that they ought to be kept in order to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem with them, where they had been for many years an Ethiopian Christian, and had received them into the kingdom as soon as I had discovered this command to any other person.

29. Now when all Galilæans were filled with this rumor, that their country was about to be betrayed by me to the Romans, and when all men were exasperated against me, and ready to bring me to punishment, the inhabitants of Tarchesius did also themselves suppose that what the young men said was true, and persuaded my guards and armed men to leave me when I was asleep, and to come to诚意 my Tarchesius, with four mules' loading of garments, and other furniture; and the weight of the silver they brought was not small, and there were five hundred pieces of gold also. Now I had a mind to preserve these spoils myself, because I knew them to be illicitly gotten, and it is prohibited by our laws even to spoil car enemies: so I said to those that brought those spoils, that they ought to be kept in order to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem with them, where they had been for many years an Ethiopian Christian, and had received them into the kingdom as soon as I had discovered this command to any other person.

30. When now silence was made by the whole multitude, I spake thus to them: "O my countrymen, I refuse not to die, if justice so require. However, I am desirous to tell you the truth of this matter before I die; for as I know that this city of yours [Tarchesius] was a city of great hospitality, and filled with abundance of such men as have left their own countries, and are come hither to be partakers of your fortune whatever it be, I had a mind to build walls about it, out of which they might not be so angry with me, while yet it was to be expended in building your own walls." Upon my saying this, the people of Tarchesius and the strangers cried out, that they gave me to understand that there was no such thing; although the Galilæans and the people of Tiberias continued in their wrath against me, it seems that there arose a tumult among them, while some threatened to kill me, and some bid me not to regard as it follows in the succeeding verses, which, though he might not read in St. Matthew's gospel, yet might he have read much the same in the Epistle of Esdras or other writers, the history of Josephus, after he was become a Christian, we have already had several examples in this his life, sect. 3, Ch. 10, 11, and shall have many more therein before his conclusion, as well as we have them elsewhere in his latter writings.

them; but when I promised them that I would build them walls at Tiberias, and at other cities that wanted them, they gave credit to what I promised, and returned every one to his own home. So I escaped the forementioned danger, beyond all my hopes, and returned to my own house accommodated with my friends, and twenty armed men also.

30. However, those robbers and other authors of this tumult, who were afraid on their own account lest I should punish them for what they had done, came to the house where I abode, in order to set fire on it. When this their insult was told me, I thought it indignant for me to run away, and I resolved myself to do what I must do, and to act with some boldness; so I gave order to shut the doors, and went up into an upper room, and desired that they would send some of their men in to receive the money [from the spoliis:] for I told them they would have no occasion to be angry with me; and when they had sent in one of the boldest men of them all, I had him whipped severely, and I commanded that one of his hands should be cut off, and hung about his neck; and in such a manner did I put out to them the insolent lie. At which procedure of mine they were greatly affrighted, and in no small consternation, and were afraid that they should themselves be served in the same manner if they stood there: for they supposed that I had in the house more armed men than they had themselves; so they ran away immediately, while I, by the use of this stratagem, escaped this second treacherous design against me.

31. But there were still some that irritated the multitude against me, and said, that those great men that belonged to the king ought not to be suffered to live, if they would not change their religion. Therefore a petition was made by them, to which they fled for safety: they spoke reproachfully of them also, and said, that they were wizards, and such as called in the Romans upon them. So the multitude was soon deluded by such plausible pretences as were agreeable to their own imaginations, and were prevailed on by them. But when I was informed of this, I instructed the multitude again, that those that fled to them for refuge ought not to be persecuted; I also laughed at the absurdity of those who pretended that the Romans would not maintain so many ten thousand soldiers, if they could overcome their enemies by wizards. Upon my saying this, the people were a while before they returned: after a while, they came again afterward, as irritated by some ill people against the great men: nay, they once made an assault upon the house in which they dwelt at Tiberias, in order to kill them; which when I was informed of, I was afraid lest so horrid a crime should take effect, and nobody else would make that city their refuge any more. Therefore came myself, and some others with me, to the house where these great men lived, and looked down the doors, and had a trench drawn from their house leading to the lake, and sent for a ship, and embarked therein with them, and sailed to the confines of Hippos; I also paid them the value of their horses, nor in such a flight could I have their horses brought to the sea. I then dismissed them, and begged of them earnestly that they would courageously bear this distress which befell them. I was also myself greatly disheartened that it was necessary for me, if I wished to escape, to go down a road 'that had been led to me to go again into an enemy country; yet did I think it more eligible that if by should perish among the Romans, if it shou to hap-

Here we may observe the vulgar Jews: notion of what is called, but that our Josephus was too wise to give And in this section, as well as sect. 16, and sect. 33, those small vessels that sailed on the sea of Galilee, are called by Josephus Nost, and Hapex, and Neaex, l., plainly, more than in the country that was under my jurisdiction. However, they continued at length and king Agrippa forgave them their offences. And this was the conclusion of what concerned these men.

32. But as for the inhabitants of the city of Tiberias, they wrote to the king, and desired him to send them forces sufficient to be a guard to their country; for that they were desirous to come over to him: this was what they wrote to him. But when I came to them, they desired me to give them a guard of ten men, that they might show their power to do: for they had heard that the walls of Tarichaeum were already built: I agreed to their proposal accordingly. And when I had made arrangements for the building, I gave orders to the architects to go to work; but on the third day, when I was gone to Tarichaeum, which was thirty furlongs distant from Tiberias, it so fell out, that some Roman horsemen were discovered on their march, not far from the city, which made it to be supposed that the forces were come from the king; upon which they shouted, and lifted up their voices in commendations of the king, and in reproaches against me. Hereupon I ordered a watch to be kept over their dispositions were, and that they had resolved to revolt from me; upon hearing which news I was very much alarmed; for I had already sent away my armed men from Tarichaeum to their own cities. Therefore, on the next day, I made a bath; for I would not have the people of Tarichaeum be disturbed on that day] by a multitude of soldiers; and indeed, whenever I sojourned at that city, I never took any particular guard about my own body, because I had had frequent instances of the fidelity its inhabitants bore to me. I had now about me no more than seven armed men, besides some friends, and was doubtful what to do. But I considered that I had not my own forces I did not think proper, because the present day was almost over, and had those forces been with me, I could not take up arms on the next day, because our laws forbid us so to do, even though our necessity should be very great; and if I should permit the people of Tarichaeum, and the strangers with them, to guard the city, I saw that they would not be sufficient for that purpose, and I perceived that I should be obli- gated to deliver the possession of these forces by stratagem, so I immediately placed those my friends of Tarichaeum, on whom I could best confide, at the gates, to watch those very carefully who went out at those gates; I also called to me the heads of families and bid every one of them to seize upon a ship, to go on board it, and to take a master with them, and follow him to the city of Tiberias. I also myself went on board one of those ships, with my friends, and the seven armed men already mentioned, and sailed for Tiberias.

34. And by this stratagem it was that I gradually got all the senate of Tiberias into my power, and sent them to the city forementioned, with many of the principal men among the populace; and those not fewer in number than the other. But when the multitude saw into what great miseries they had themselves brought, they desired me to send me other captives; and I showed them, that his name was Clitus, a young man, bold and rash in his undertakings. Now, since I thought it not agreeable to piety to put one of my own people to death, and yet found it necessary to punish him, I sent for Iudas, of the same name, to go to him, and cut off one of Clitus's hands; but as he that was ordered to do this was afraid to go out of the ship alone, among so great a multitude, I was not willing that the timoromness of the man should be the cause of the punishment of Tiberias. So I called to Clitus himself, and said to him, "Since thou deservest to lose both thine hands, for thy ingratitude to me, be thou thine own judge as to their removal, and if thou undergo a worse punishment." And when he earnestly begged of me to spare him one of his hands, it was with difficulty that I granted it. So in order to prevent the loss of both his hands, as willingly took his sword, and cut off his own left hand; and this put an end to the sedition.

35. Now the men of Tiberias, after I was gone to Taricheae, perceived what stratagem I had used against them, and they admired how I had put an end to the sedition in like manner, and without the shedding of blood. But now, when I had sent for some of those multitudes of the people of Tiberias out of prison, among whom were Justus and his father Patus, I made them to sup with me, and durst not hold my peace until I saw that I knew the power of the Romans was superior to all others; but did not say so [publicly] because of the robbers. And I advised them to do as I did, and to wait for a proper opportunity, and not to be uneasy at my being their commander; for that they could not expect to have another who would use the like moderation that I had done. I also put Justus in mind how the Galileans had cut off his brother's hands, before he came to Jerusalem, upon an accusation laid against him, as if he had been a rogue, and had forged some letters; as also how the people of Gamala, in a sedition they raised against the Babylonians, after they had murdered a man who was a kinsman of Philip, and withal how they had wisely punished Jesus, his brother Justus's sister's husband [with death. When I had said this, they were inquiring, when I would jog and Justus, and all the rest that were in prison, to be loosed out of it, and sent away.

36. But before this it happened that Philip, the son of Jucimus, went out of the city of Gamala upon the following occasion: when Philip had been informed that Varus was put out of his government by king Agrippa, and that Mordius Equilus, a man that was of old his friend and companion, was come to succeed him, he wrote to him, and related what turns of fortune he had had, and desired him to forward the letters he sent to the king and queen. Now when Mordius had received these letters, he was exceeding glad, and sent the letters to the king and queen, who were then about Berytus. But when king Agrippa knew that these letters were false, (for it had been given out, that the Jews had begun a war with the Romans, and that this Philip had been their commander in that war,) he sent some horsemen to conduct Philip to him, and, when he came, he said to him obliquely, and showed him to the Roman commanders, and told them that this was the man of whom the report had gone about as if he had revolted himself. He also bid him take some horsemen with him, and to go quickly to the citadel of Gamala, and to bring out thence all his domestics, and to restore the Babylonians to Batanea again. He also gave him in charge not to take all of them, but that none should be guilty of making any innovation. Accordingly, upon these directions from the king, he made haste to do what he was commanded.

37. Now there was one Joseph, the son of a female slave of the Gentiles, who chanced to be a young man to join with him. He also insolently addressed himself to the principal persons at Gamala, and persuaded them to revolt from the king, and take up arms, and gave them leaves that they should be ready for the sacrifice of their liberty. And some they forced into the service, and those that would not acquiesce in what they had resolved on, they slew. They also slew the sons of the chief men of Galilee, and a brother of Justus of Tiberias, as we have already said. Those of Gamala also wrote to me, desiring me to send them an armed force, and workmen to raise up the wall of their city; and the region of Gaulonitis did also revolt from the king, as far as the village Solyma. I also built a wall about Seleucia and Soganni, which are villages naturally of very great strength. Moreover, I sent messengers in like manner to the several villages of Galilee, though they were very rocky of themselves. Their names are Jannia, and Merot, and Acharabare. I also fortified, in the Lower Town of Galilee, 400,000 talents of stone to build the temple, and a thousand talents to the temple of the Watchers, and the village of Araba, Berosbe, Selamin, Jopata, Caphareboc, and Sigo and Japha, and Mount Tabor." I also laid out a great quantity of corn in these places, and arms withal, that might be for their security afterwards. 38. But the hatred that John, the son of Levi, bore to me, grew now more violent, while he could not bear my prosperity with patience. So he proposed to himself, by all means possible, to make away with me, and built the walls of Geichala, which was the place of his nativity. He then sent his brother Simon, and Jonathan the son of Sisenna, and about a hundred armed men, to Jerusalem, to Simon the son of Gamaliel; in order to procure the collection of the whole multitude of Jerusalem to take from me the government over the Galileans, and to give their suffrages for conferring that authority upon him. This Simon was of the chief family, of the sect of the Pharisees, which are supposed to excel others in the accurate knowledge of the laws of their country. He was a man of great wisdom and reason, and capable of restoring public affairs by his prudence, when

So I escaped the forementioned danger, beyond all my hopes, and returned to my own house, accompanied with my friends, and twenty armed men also.

However, these robbers and other authors of mischief who were afraid on their own account, lest I should punish them for what they had done, took six hundred armed men, and came to the house where I abode, in order to set it on fire. When this their insult was told me, I thought it best to leave the house for a while, and to resolve to expose myself to danger, and to act with some boldness; so I gave order to shut the doors, and went up into an upper room, and declared that they would soon see of the средств to receive the money [from the spoils] for I told them they would then have no occasion to be angry with me; and when they had sent in one of the boldest men of them all, I had him whipped severely, and said that if any of that hand of his hands should be cut off, and hung about his neck; and in this case was he put out to those that sent him. At which procedure of mine they were greatly affrighted, and in no small consternation, and was afraid that they should be themselves surprized and surprised in like manner, if they stayed there: for they supposed that I had in the house more armed men than they had themselves; so they ran away; and while I, by the use of this stratagem, escaped this their second treachery, design against me.

31. But there were still some that irritated the multitude against me, and said, that those great men that had come to the king ought not to be suffered to live, if they would not change their religion to the religion of those to whom they fled for safety: they spake reproachfully of them also, and said, that they were wizards, &c. such as came to the Romans. Upon hearing this, the people assented for a while; but they returned again afterward, as irritated by some ill people against the great men: yet, they once made an assault upon them, in which they dwelt at Tiberias, in order to kill them; which when I was informed of, I was afraid lest so horrid a crime should take effect, and nobody else would make that city their refuge any more. I therefore came myself, and some others with me, to the house where these great men lived, and locked the doors, and had a trench drawn from their house leading to the lake, and sent for a ship, and embarked therein with them, and sailed to the coast of Tyre; I also paid the value of their horses, nor in such a flight could I have their horses brought to them. I then dismissed them, and begged of them earnestly that they might bear the stress which befell them. However, they espoused at length and king Agrippa forgave them their offences. And this was the conclusion of what concerned these men.

32. But as for the inhabitants of the city of Tiberias, they wrote to the king, and desired him to send them forces sufficient to be a guard to their country; for that they were desirous to come to some place of safety: this was what they said to him. But when I came to them, they desired me to build their walls, as I had promised them to do: for they had heard that the walls of Tarihces were sandy and big: I agreed to these terms, and to the rest of their proposal. And then began the preparation for their entire building, I gave order to the architects to go to work; but on the third day, when I was gone to Tarihces, which was thirty furlongs distant from Tiberias, I learned that out, that some Roman horsemen were discovered on their march, not far from the city, which made it to be supposed that the forces were come from the king; upon which they shouted, and lamented, and said that they were not afraid of the king, and in reproaches against me. Hereupon one came running to me and told me what their dispositions were, and that they had resolved to revolt from me; upon hearing which I showed them the forces that I had sent away, and that I sent my armed men from Tarihces to their own houses, because the next day was our Sabbath; for I would not have the people of Tarihces [on that day] to make movements of soldiers; and indeed, whenever I remained at that city, I never took any particular care for a guard about my own body, because I had had frequent instances of the fidelity its inhabitants bore to me; and I had seven armed men, besides some friends, and was doubtful what to do; for to send to recall my own forces I did not think proper, because the present day was almost over, and had those forces been with me, I could not take arms on the next day, because our laws forbid us so to do, even though our necessity should be very great; and if I should permit the people of Tarihces, and the strangers with them, to guard the city, I had indeed said it might not be done for no purpose, and I perceived that I should be obliged to delay my assistance a great while; for I thought with myself that the forces that came from the king would receive men for me, and I should be the master of the city. I considered, therefore, how to get clear of these forces by a stratagem; so I immediately placed those my friends of Tarihces, on whom I could best confide, at the gates, to watch those very carefully who went out at those gates; I also called to me the heads of families and bid every one of them to seize upon a ship, to go on board it, and to take a master with them, and follow him to the city of Tiberias. Their number was in all 240, as we learn from our author elsewhere; Of the War, b. 6. chap. 21. sect. 8.

34. And by this stratagem it was that I gradually got all the sone of Tiberias into my power, and sent them to the city, formentioned, with many of the principal men among the populace; and those not fewer in number than the other. But when the multitude saw into what great miseries they had brought themselves, they desired to be delivered to me. And the name of this citizen was Clitus, a young man, bold and rash in his undertakings. Now, since I thought it not agreeable to piety to put one of my own people to death, and yet found it necessary to punish him, I had him taken off the ship, and led to him, and cut off one of Clitus's hands; but as he was ordered to do this was afraid to go out of the ship alone, among so great a multitude, and not to the timor of death, and on the soldier should appear to the multitude of Tiberias. So I called to Clitus himself, and said to him, "Since thou desertest to lose both thine hands, for thy ingratitude to me, be thou thine own executioner, and cut off thee, and be thou undergone a worse punishment." And, when he earnestly begged of me to spare him one of his hands, it was with difficulty that I granted it. So in order to prevent the loss of both his hands, he willingly took his award, and cut off one of his left hand; and this put an end to the sedition.

35. Now the men of Tiberias, after I was gone to Tarichea, perceived what stratagem I had used against them, and they admired how I had put them to their folly foolishly, and killed men of blood. But now, when I had sent for some of those multitudes of the people of Tiberias out of prison, among whom were Justus and his father, and during our supper time I said to them, that I knew the power of the Romans was superior to all others, but did not say so [publicly] because of the robbers. So I advised them to do as I did, and to wait for a proper opportunity, and not to be an uneasy at my being their commander; for that they could not expect to have another who would use the like moderation that I had done. be informed that Varus was put cut of his government by king Agrippa, and that Modius Equiculus, a man that was of old his friend and companion, was come to succeed him, he wrote to him, and related what turns of fortune he had had, and desired him to forward the letters he sent to the king and queen. Now when Modius had received these letters, he was exceeding glad, and sent the letters to the king and queen, who were then about Berytus. But when king Agrippa knew that the state was false, (for it had been given out, that the Jews had begun a war with the Romans, and that this Philip had been their commander in that war,) he sent some horsemen to conduct Philip to him, and, when he came, he saluted him, and ordered him to be kept in prison.

37. Now there was one Joseph, the son of a female pharisian, and one of the young men to join with him. He also insolently addressed himself to the principal persons at Gamala, and persuaded them to revolt from the king, and boldly told them that they should, by his means; recover their liberty. And some they forced into the service, and those that would not acquiesce in what they had resolved on, they slew. They also slew Chares, and put the king's name and a brother of Justus of Tiberias, as we have already said. Those of Gamala also wrote to me, desiring me to send them armed force, and workmen to raise up the wall of their city; for I reject not of their request. The region of Gaulonitis also did revolt from the king, as far as the village Solyman. I also built a wall about Seleucia and Soganni, which are villages naturally of very great strength. Moreover, I in like manner over all the villages of Upper Galilee, though they were very rocky of themselves. Their names are Jamnia, and Meroth, and Achabara. I also fortified, in the Lower of Galilee, the cities of Tiberias, Scythopolis, and the villages, the cove of Arbela, Belsohe, Selamin, Jotapata, Capharecor, and Sigo and Japha, and Mount Tabor. I also laid up a great quantity of corn in these places, and arms withal, that might be for their security afterwards.

38. But the hatred that John, the son of Levi, bore to me, grew now more violent, while he could not bear my prosperity with patience. So he proposed to himself, by all means possible, to make away with me, and built the walls of Gechals, which was the place of his nativity. He then sent his brother Simon, and Jonathan the son of Sisenna, and about a hundred armed men, to Jerusalem, to Simon the son of Gamala, in order to persuade him to induce the commonalty of Jerusalem to take from me the government over the Galileans, and to give their suffrages for conferring that authority upon him. This Simon was of the very stock and family, one of his wife's family, of the sect of the Pharisees, which are supposed to excel others in the accurate knowledge of the laws of their country. He was a man of great wisdom and reason, and capable of restoring public affairs by his prudence, when the

them; but when they promised them that I would bring the troops from Tiberias, and the other cities that wanted them, they gave credit to what I promised, and returned every one to his own home. So I escaped the forementioned danger, beyond all my hopes, and returned to my own house, accompanied with my friends, and twenty armed men also.

30. However, those robbers and other authors of this tumult, who were afraid on their own account, lest I should punish them for what they had done, and to make sure that I would not harm them out of revenge, went and came to the house where I abode, in order to set it on fire. When this their insult was told me, I thought it indecent for me to run away, and I resolved to expose myself to danger, and to act with some boldness; so I gave a fire to shut the doors, and went up into an upper room, and desired that they would send some of their men in to receive the money [from the spoils:] for I told them they would then have no occasion to be angry with me; and when they had sent in one of the boldest men of them all, I had him whipped severely, and I commanded that one of his hands should be cut off, and hang about his neck; and in the next day they set upon him, and they beat him to death. At which procedure of mine they were greatly affrighted, and in no small consternation, and were afraid that they should themselves be served in like manner, if they stayed there: for the power was now in Rome, and there were twenty-ed men than they had themselves; so they ran away immediately, while I, by the use of this stratagem, escaped this their second treacherous design.

31. But there were still some that irritated the multitude against me, and said, that those great men that belonged to the king ought not to be suffered to live, if they would not change their religion: and, in the midst of those whom the senate fled for safety: they spake reproachfully of them also, and said, that they were wizards, and such as called in the Romans upon them. So the multitude was soon deluded by such plausible pretences: and some were brought to their own inclinations, and were prevailed on by them. But when I was informed of this, I instructed the multitude again, that those that fled to them for refuge ought not to be persecuted; I also laughed at the alarum: I placed a guard over them: and I thought with myself that the forces that came from the king would prevent me, and that I should be driven out of the city. I considered, therefore, how I might return again unstained, and I immediately placed those my friends of Tarichee, on whom I could best confide, at the gates, to watch those very carefully who went out at those gates; I also called to me the heads of families and bid every one of them to seize upon a ship, to go on board it, and to take a master with them, and follow him to the city of Tiberias. I also myself went on board one of those ships, with my friends, and the seven armed men already mentioned, and sailed for Tiberias.

pen, than in the country that was under my jurisdiction. However, they espoused at length, and king Agrippa forgave them their offences. And this was the conclusion of what concerned these men.

32. But as for the inhabitants of the city of Tiberias, they wrote to the king, and desired him to send them forces sufficient to be a guard to their country; for that they were desirous to come over to him: this was what they wrote to him. But when I came to them, they desired me also to come over to them, and to give them the advice that the walls of Tarichee were already built: I agreed to their proposal accordingly. And when I had made the report to the king, I sent my letter to the architects to go to work; but on the third day, when I was gone to Tarichee, which was thirty furlongs distant from Tiberias, it so fell out, that some Roman horsemen were discovered on their march, not far from the city, which made it to be supposed that the forces were come from the king; upon which they shouted, and lifted up their voices in commendations of the king, and in reproaches against me. Hereupon I made them a message, that they should not use their dispositions, and that they had resolved to revolt from me; upon hearing which news I was very much alarmed; for I had already sent away my armed men from Tarichee to their own places, and the rest that were in the city, I sent home in the same fashion; for I would not have the people of Tarichee be disturbed [on that day] by a multitude of soldiers; and indeed, whenever I sojourned at Tarichee, I took no particular guards about my own body, because I had had frequent instances of the fidelity its inhabitants bore to me. I had now about me no more than seven armed men, besides some friends, and was not afraid of any of these forces by my own forces I did not think proper, because the present day was almost over, and had those forces been with me, I could not take up arms on the next day, because our laws forbid us so to do, even though our necessity should be very great; and if I should permit the people of Tarichee, and the strangers with them, to guard the city, I saw that they would not be sufficient for that purpose, and I perceived that I should be oblig

Here we may observe the vultur Jew's notion of this, but that our Josephus was too so as to give credit to what I feared, that I ought to have done; I then dismissed them, and begged of them earnestly that they would courageously bear this distress which befell us. I was also myself greatly displeased this tempers, and it at acompanied me that had led me to go again into an enemy country; yet did I think it more eligible if I should par against me;) so they persuaded me to spare the city. But when I was come near enough, I gave order to the masters of the ships to cast anchor a good way off the land, that the people of Tiberias might not perceive that the ships had no master on board; but when they saw the people in one of the ships, and rebuked them for their folly, and that they were so sickle as, without any just occasion in the world, to revolt from their king; however, I desired them that I would entirely forgive them for the time to come, if they would send ten of the ring-leaders of the multitude to me; and when they complied readily with this proposal, and sent me ten of them, I put them on board ship, and sent them away to Tariches, and ordered them to be kept in prison.

34. And by this stratagem it was that I gradually got all the sense of Tiberias into my power, and sent them to the city forementioned, with many of the principal men among the populace; and those not fewer in number than the other. But when the multitude saw into what great miseries they had brought themselves, they desired that they should be instructed what they should do; his name was Clitus, a young man, bold and rash in his undertakings. Now, since I thought it not agreeable to pet one of my own people to take all the care of conducting such and that, I ordered him, I ordered Levi, one of my own guards, to go to him, and cut off one of Clitus's hands; but as he was ordered to do this was afraid to go out of the ship alone, among so great a multitude, and thought that the soldier should appear to the people of Tiberias. So I called to Clitus himself, and said to him, "Since thou deservest to lose both thine hands, for thy ingratitude to me, be thou more obedient; for if thou cut off one of mine, thou undergo a worse punishment." And, when he earnestly begged of me to spare him one of his hands, it was with difficulty that I granted it. So I ordered him to prevent the loss of both his hands, as willingly took his sword, and cut off his own left hand; and this put an end to the sedition.

35. Now the men of Tiberias, after I was gone to Tariches, perceived what stratagem I had used against them, and admired how I had put an end to their foolish sedition, without shedding of blood. But now, when I had sent for some of those multitude of the people of Tiberias out of prison, among whom were Justus and his father Simon, and the son of Simon, and during our summer time I said to them, that I knew the power of the Romans was superior to all others, but did not say so [publicly] because of the robbers. So I advised them to do as I did, and to wait for a proper opportunity, and not to be uneasy at my being their commander; for that they could not expect to have another who would use the like moderation that I had done. I also put Justus in mind how the Galileans had cut off his brother's hands, before ever I came to Jerusalem, upon an accusation laid against him, as if he had been a rogue, and had forged some letters; as also how the people of Gamala, in my absence, had taken him to Jerusalem, and against the authority of the high priests; and after the departure of Philip, slew Chares, who was a kinsman of Philip, and withal how they had wisely punished Jesus, his brother Justus's sister's husband [with death]. When I had said this, he was a great deal of the time sad, and hoped that order Justus, and all the rest that were in prison, to be loosed out of it, and sent away.

36. But before this it happened that Philip, the son of Jucimus, went out of the city of Gamaliel, a son of Silas, a Galilean; and Philip had been informed that Varus was put out of his government, and that Modius Equiculus, a man that was of old his friend and companion, was come to succeed him, he wrote to him, and related what turns of fortune he had had, and desired the letters he sent to the king and queen. Now when Modius had received these letters, he was exceeding glad, and sent the letters to the king and queen, who were there, that Philip might be restored to his place; and, when he was come, he saluted him very obligingly, and showed him to the Roman commandments, and told them that this was the man of whom the report had gone out as if he had revolting from the Romans. He also bid him take some horsemen with him, and to go quickly to the citadel of Gamala, and to bring out thence all his domestics, and to restore the Babylonians to Balas again. He also gave him in charge to take all the censers of gold and silver, which should be guilty of making any innovation. Accordingly, upon these directions from the king, he made haste to do what he was commanded. 37. Now there was once a medical woman, a female physician, who excelled a great many young men to join with him. He also insolently addressed himself to the principal persons at Gamala, and persuaded them to revolt from the king, and drew up a list of all that should be arranged for the soldiers that they should, by his means; recover their liberty. And some they forced into the service, and those that would not acquiesce in what they had resolved on, they slew. They also slew one of Justus's sons, a young man of sixteen years old, and a brother of Justus of Tiberias, as we have already said. Those of Gamala also wrote to me, desiring me to send them an armed force, and workmen to raise up the wall of their city; nor did I reject either of their requests. The region of Gaulonitis also did revolt from the king, as far as the village Solyma. I also built a wall about Selencisa and Sopagani, which are villages naturally of very great strength. Moreover, I in like manner walled several villages of Upper Galilee, though they were very rocky of themselves. Their names are Jamies, and Mereth, and Achabare. I also fortified, in the Lower Galilee, the city of Tiberias, and Bethphage, and the villages, the Care of Arbel, Beros, Selamin, Jotapata, Capharencroc, and Situ, and Mount Tabor.* I also laid out a great quantity of corn in these places, and armed them withal, that might be for their security afterward.

38. But the hatred that John, the son of Levi, bore to me, grew now more violent, while he could not bear my prosperity with patience. So he proposed to himself, by all means possible, to make away with me, and built the walls of Gischala, which was the place of his nativity. He then sent his brother Simon, and Jonathan the son of Sisenna, and about a hundred armed men, with all the forces of the Pharisees, to Jerusalem, in order to persuade him to induce the commonalty of Jerusalem to take from me the government over the Galileans, and to give their suffrages for conferring that authority upon him. This Simon had been a great deal of the time in the king's household, and in the family, of the sect of the Pharisees, which are supposed to excel others in the accurate knowledge of the laws of their country. they were in an ill posture. He was also an old friend and companion of John; but at that time he had a difference with me. When therefore he had recovered, and was able to travel, he persuaded the high priests, Ananus, and Jesus the son of Gamaliel, and some others of the same sedidious faction, to set me down, now I was growing so great, and not to overlook me while I was again running off to the heathen glory; and he said, that it would be for the advantage of the Galileans, if I were deprived of my government there. Ananus also, and his friends, desired them to make no delay about this matter; lest I should get the advantage of what was doing too soon, and should come and make an assault upon the city with a great army. This was the counsel of Simon; but Ananus the high priest demonstrated to this, that this was not a soon thing to be done, because many of the high priests, and of the rulers of the people, bore witness that I had acted like an excellent general and that it was the work of ill men to accuse one against whom they had nothing to say, but was taking care of my own safety, the Galileans, out of their dread of the consequences of my departure, that they should then be at the mercy of the robbers, sent messengers to all Galilee to persuade Simon to leave them. Whereupon, as soon as they heard it, they got together in great numbers, from all parts, with their wives and children; and this they did, as it appeared to me, not only to prevent the king from leaving, in order of their fear on their own account; for while I stood with them, they supposed that they should suffer no harm. So they all came into the great plain, wherein I lived, the name of which was also Josephus! leave off to afflict thy soul, and put away all fear; for what now grieves thee will render thee very considerable, and in all respects most happy; for thou shalt get over not only their fear, but many others, with great success. However, be not cast down, but remember that thou art to fight with the Romans. When I had seen this dream, I got up with an increased interest and concern for the whole multitude of the Galileans, among whom were the women and children, saw me, they threw themselves down upon their faces and, with tears in their eyes, besought me not to leave them, to send to their enemies to drive them away and permit their country to be injured by them. But when I did not comply with their entertainments, they compelled me to take an oath, that I would stay with them: they also cast abundant reproaches upon the people of Jerusalem, that they would not let their country enjoy peace.

They also gave money to three hundred men that were citizens of Jerusalem, to maintain them all, and ordered that they should give to the strangers, and when they had complied, and were gotten ready for the march, Jonathan and his companions went out with them, having along with them John's brother, and a hundred armed men. The charge that was given them by Jonathan was this, that if I would voluntarily lay down my arms, they should send me alive to the city Jerusalem; but that in case I opposed them, they

Now, as my father wrote me an account of this, (as near as memory can serve,) that council, a friend and companion of mine, told him of it, I was very much troubled, as discovering thereby, that my fellow-citizens proved so ungrateful to me, as out of envy, to give me such a charge of being a traitor. I deeply pressed me also in his letter to come to him, for that he longed to see his son before he died. I informed my friends of these things, and that in three days' time I should leave the country. Thereupon, I went to the inhabited and open places, and was very sorry, and desired me, with tears in their eyes, not to leave them to be destroyed; so for they thought they should be, if I were deprived of the command over them: but as I did not have their consent, but was taking care of my own safety, the Galileans, out of their dread of the consequences of my departure, that they should then be at the mercy of the robbers, sent messengers to all Galilee to persuade Simon to leave them. Whereupon, as soon as they heard it, they got together in great numbers, from all parts, with their wives and children; and this they did, as it appeared to me, not only to prevent the king from leaving, in order of their fear on their own account; for while I stood with them, they supposed that they should suffer no harm. But when I did not comply with their entertainments, they compelled me to take an oath, that I would stay with them: they also cast abundant reproaches upon the people of Jerusalem, that they would not let their country enjoy peace.

42. But wonderful it was what a dream I saw that very night: for when I had betaken myself to my bed, as grieved and disturbed at the news that had been written to me, it seemed to me that it was I who was in the eyes of the priests, and a Pharisee also; and Simon, the last of them, was of the youngest of the high priests. These had it given them in charge, that, when they were come to the multitude of the Galileans, they should ask them what was the reason of their love to me? and if they said, that it was because I was born at Jerusalem, that they should reply, that they four were all born at the same time. If, however, they asked, if it was because I was well versed in their law, they should reply, that neither were they unacquainted with the practices of their country, but if, besides these, they should say, they loved me because I was able to show what two of these were priests also.

40. Now, when they had given Jonathan and his companions these instructions, they gave them forty thousand [drachmæ] out of the public money; but when they heard that there was a certain Galilean that then sojourned at Jerusalem, whose name was Jesus, who had about him a band of six hundred armed men, they sent for him, and gave him three months, and gave him orders to follow Jonathan and his companions, and be obedient to them. 41. Now, as my father wrote me an account of this, (as near as memory can serve,) that council, a friend and companion of mine, told him of it, I was very much troubled, as discovering thereby, that my fellow-citizens proved so ungrateful to me, as out of envy, to give me such a charge of being a traitor. 43. When I heard this, and saw what sorrow the king was in, I went to him three months, and gave him orders to follow Jonathan and his companions, and be obedient to them. They also gave money to three hundred men that were citizens of Jerusalem, to maintain them all, and ordered that they should give to the strangers, and when they had complied, and were gotten ready for the march, Jonathan and his companions went out with them, having along with them John's brother, and a hundred armed men. The charge that was given them by Jonathan was this, that if I would voluntarily lay down my arms, they should send me alive to the city Jerusalem; but that in case I opposed them, they to fight with Placidus, who was come with two cohorts of footmen, and one troop of horsemen, and assure himself of a certain victory. But I sought those villages of Galilee that were near Ptolemais. Upon whose casting up a bank before the city Ptolemais, I also pitched my camp at about the sixtieth song from that village. And now we frequently lighted out our forays as if we would fight, but proceeded no farther than skirmishes at a distance; for when Placidus perceived that I was earnest to come to a battle, he set out on horse, and as I saw him, he was not remise from the neighbourhood of Ptolemais.

44. About this time it was that Jonathan and his fellow-legates came. They were sent, as we have said already, by Simon, and Ananias, the high priest. And Jonathan contended how he might catch me by treachery; for he durst not make any attempt upon me openly. So he wrote me the following epistle: "Jonathan, and those that are with him, and are sent by the people of Jerusalem, to Josephus, and to those that are with him, to as much as I am able, and as far as I can, to make you distinctly understand that we have heard that John of Gischala hath laid many snares for thee, to rebuke him, and to exhort him to be subject to these hereafter. We are also desirous to learn of thee concerning other matters, and what is fit to be done. We therefore desire thee to come to us quickly, and to bring only a few men with thee, for this village will give thee no assistance. Thus it was that they wrote, as expecting one of these two things, either that I should come without armed men, and then they should have me wholly in their power; or, if I came with a great army, they would judge me as a rebellious enemy. Now it was a horseman who brought the letter, a man at other times bold, and one that had served in the army, under the king. It was the second hour of the night that he came, when many were gathered together. The principal of the Galileans. This man, upon my servant's telling me, that a certain horseman of the Jewish nation was come, was called in at my command, but did not so much as salute me me, but held out a letter, and said, "This letter is sent thee by those that are come from Jerusalem. Do thou write an answer to it quickly, for I am obliged to return to them very soon." Now my greatest concern was the safety of the widow of the soldier. But I desired him to sit down and say with us; but when he refused so to do, I held the letter in my hands as I received it, and fell a talking with my guests about other matters. But a few minutes after, I dismissed them, and then dismissed the rest to go to their beds, I bid only four of my intimate friends to stay, and ordered my servant to get some wine ready. I also opened the letter so that nobody could perceive it; and understanding thereby presently the purport of the writing, I sealed it up again, and appeared as if I had not yet read it, but only held it in my hands I ordered twenty drachmies should be given the soldier for the charges of his journey; and I desirous to look upon the man, who had writ to me, I perceived that he loved money, and that he was to be caught chiefly by that means, and I said to him, "If thou wilt but drink with us, thou shalt have a drachma for every pot that thou drinkest." So I succeeded the proposal, and drank a great deal of wine, in order to get the more money, and was so drunk that at last he could not keep the secrets he was about to tell me, but was at first putting questions to him, viz. that a treacherous design was contrived against me, and that I was doomed to die by those that sent him. When I heard this, I wrote back this answer: "Josephus to Jonathan, and those that are with him, sendeth greeting. Upon the information that you are come in health into Galilee, I rejoice, and this especially, because I can now resign the care of public affairs here into your hands, and return into my native country, which is what I have desired. But I beg of you, as I was bidden to you by those that sent me, not to proceed so far as if we would fight, but proceeded no farther than skirmishes at a distance; for when Placidus perceived that I was earnest to come to a battle, he set out on horse, and as I saw him, he was not remise from the neighbourhood of Ptolemais.

45. When I had written thus, and given the letter to be carried by the soldier, I sent along with him thirty of the Galileans of the best characters, and gave them instructions to salute those ambassadors, but to say nothing else to them. I also gave orders to as many of those armed men, whom I esteemed most faithful to me, to go along with the others, every one with him whom he was to guard, lest some conversation might pass between those whom I sent and those that were left with Jonathan. So these men went [to Jonathan.] But when Jonathan and his partners had failed in this their first attempt, they sent me another letter, the contents whereof were as follows: "Jonathan, and those with him, to Josephus, and to those that are with him. We did not wear a day to come to us at the village of Gabroth, on the third day, without any armed men, that we may hear what thou hast to say to the charge of John and his partners. When the city was taken, first they saluted the Galileans whom I sent, and came to Japha, which was the largest village of all Galilee, and encompassed with very strong walls, and had a great number of inhabitants in it. Then the multitude of men with them, and children met them, and exclaimed loudly against them, and desired them to be gone, and not to enjoin them the advantage of an excellent commander. With these clamors Jonathan and his partners were greatly alarmed, they durst not show their anger openly: so they made them no answer, but went to other villages. But still the same clamors met them from all the people, who said, "Nobody should persuade us to have any other commander besides Josephus." So Jonathan and his partners went away from them without success, and came to Sepphoris, the greatest city of all Galilee. Now the men did not but say who this city was, and in its sentiments, met them indeed, but neither praised nor reproached me; and when they were gone down from Sepphoris to Aschich, the people of that place made a clamor against them as the people of Japha, but the Galileans had not been able to contain themselves no longer, but ordered the armed men that were with them to beat those that made the clamor with their clubs. And when they came to Gabara, John met them with three thousand armed men; but as I understood by their letter, that they had resolved to fight against me, I wrote from Chabolo, with three thousand armed men also, but left in my camp one of my fastest friends, and came to Japha, and was received by the men of the city with great respect, and with great applause being no more than forty furlongs. Whence I wrote thus to them: "If you are very desirous that I should come to you, you know there are two hundred and forty cities and villages in Galilee. I will write of them, of which you please, excepting Gabara and Gischala; the one of which is John's native city, and the other in confederacy and friendship with him. 46. When I had received this letter, my partners had received this letter, they wrote me no more answers, but called a council of their friends together, and taking John into their consultation they took counsel together by what means they might attack me. John's opinion was, that they should write to all the cities and villages that were in Galilee; for that there must be certainly one or two persons in every one of them that was at variance with me, and that they should be invited to come to oppose me as an enemy. He would also have them send this resolution of theirs to the city of Jerusalem, that the citizens upon the knowledge of my being adjudged to be an enemy by the Galileans, might themselves also confirm that determination. He said also, that when this was done, even those Galileans who were of my party, and went to the desert out of fear, when John had given them this social, what he had said was very agreeable to the rest of them. I was also made acquainted with these affairs about the third hour of the night by one Simon, who had belonged to them, but now deserted them and came over to me, and told me what they were about: so I perceived that no time was to be lost. Accordingly I gave command to Jacob, an armed man of my guard, whom I esteem'd faithful to me, to take two hundred men, and to guard the passages that led from Gabara to Galilee, and to seize upon the passengers, and send them to me, especially such as were caught with letters abroad from any of my friends, with six hundred armed men, to the borders of Galilee, in order to watch the roads that led from this country to the city Jerusalem, and to cause a change to lay their letters with letters about them, to keep the men in bonds upon the place, but to send me the letters.

47. Whom I had laid these commands upon the men and their orders, and bade them to take their arms and bring three days' provision with them, and be with me the next day. I also part-et those that were about me into four parts, and ordained those of them that were most faithful to me to be a guard upon my body. I also set over them centurions, and commanded them to take care that not a soldier which they did not know should mingle himself among them. Now on the fifth day following, when I was in Gabaroth, I found the whole plain that was before the village full of armed men, who were come out of Galilee to assist me; many others of the multitude also, out of the village, ran along with me. But as soon as I had taken my place, and began to speak to them, I made an accusation of my friends, with nobody, nor to spoil the country; but to pitch their tents in the plain, and be content with the sustenance they had brought with them; for I told them that I had a mind to compose these troubles with their blood. It came to pass, that on the very same day those who were sent by John with letters, fell among the guards whom I had appointed to watch the roads; so the men were themselves kept upon the place, as my orders were, but I got the letters, which were full of reproaches and lies, and I intended to fall upon these men without saying a word of these matters to any body.

48. Now as soon as Jonathan and his companions came to the city of Gabara, they took all their own friends, and John with them, and retired to the house of Jesus, which indeed was a large castle, and no way unlike a citadel; so they privately laid a band of armed men therein, and shut all the other doors but one, which they kept open; and they expected that I should come out of the road to them, to salute them. And indeed they had given orders to the armed men, that when I came they should let nobody let Jesus come in, but should exclude others; as supposing that, by this means, they should easily get me under their power; but they were deceived in their expectations; for I perceived what snakes they were, so that I left off my journey, I took up my lodgings over against them, and pretended to be asleep: so Jonathan and his party, thinking that I was really asleep and at rest, made haste to go down into the city and make what business they could with the governor. But the matter proved otherwise, for upon their appearance, there was a cry made by the Galileans immediately, declaring their good opinion of me as their governor; and they sent a messenger to us, by the name of John, to be a guard to us, lest John should unexpectedly fall upon us: and I encouraged the Galileans to take their weapons, lest they should be disturbed at their enemies, if any sudden assault should be made upon them. And in the first place, I put Jonathan and his partners in mind of their [former] letter, and after what manner they had written to me, and declared they were sent by the common council of the city to make a knowledge of the differences I had with John, and how they had desired me to come to them; and as I spoke thus, I publicly showed that letter they had written, till they could not at all deny what was written in the letter itself concerning them. I then said, "O Jonathan, and you that are sent with him as his colleagues, if I were to be judged as to my behavior, compared with that of John's, and had brought no more than two or three witnesses, good men and true, it is plain you had been forced, upon the examination of their characters beforehand, to discharge the accusations: that therefore you may be informed that I have acted well in the affairs of Galilee, I think your own conscience, and the letter itself tell you, that the man that hath done as he ought to do, so I give you all these for witnesses. Inquire of them, how I have lived, and whether I have not behaved myself with all decency, and after a vir-tuous manner among them. And I further con-to be three, or two at the least, also exactly as in the law of Moses, and in the Apostolical Constitutions, II.
I know not what manner of business, and be sure to content with your wages." Whence Her. Hudson conforms this conjecture, that Josephus, in some things, was but a friend of John the Baptist; which is no way improbable. See the note on sec. 2.
⑦ We here learn the practice of the Jews, in the days of Josephus, to inquire into the characters of witnesses, before they were admitted, and that their number ought rity in his conduct, as one of the governors of the

that country; for in that road you may in three days' time go from Galilee to Jerusalem. I also went myself, and conducted the old men as far as the bounds of Galilee, and set guards in the roads, that it might not be easily known by any one that these men were gone. And when I had thus done, I went and abode at Japha.

55. Now Jonathan and his colleagues having failed of accomplishing what they would have done against me, they sent John back to Gischala, but went themselves to the city Tiberias, expecting that we would have sent them an answer; but it was founded on a letter which Jesus, their then governor, had written them, promising, that if they came, the multitude would receive them, and choose to be under their government; but they went their ways with this expectation. But Sibilas, who, as I said, had been left curator of Tiberias by me, informed me of this, and desired me to make haste thither. Accordingly I compiled with his advice immediately, and came thither, but found myself in danger of my life, from the following occasion: Jonathan and his colleagues had been at Tiberias, and had persuaded a great many of such as had a quarrel with me to desert me; but when they knew of my death, they were in fear for themselves, and came to me, and when they had saluted me, they said that I was a happy man in having behaved myself so well in the government of Galilee; and they congratulated me upon the happy consequences for them, that my glory was a credit to them, since they had been my teachers and fellow-citizens; and they said farther, that it was just that they should have the power rather than John's, and that they would have immediately gone home, but that they thought that they might deliver up John into my power; and when they said this they took their oaths of it, and swore they would do nothing to hurt us, and such as I did not think fit to disbelieve. However, they desired me to lodge somewhere else; because the next day was the Sabbath, and that it was not fit the city of Tiberias should be disturbed [on that day].

54. So I suspected nothing, and went away to Tarichea; yet did I withdraw some to make inquisition in the city how matters went, and whether anything was said about me; I also set many persons all the way, that looked into the affairs of Tiberias, that they might communicate from one to another, if they learned any news from those that were left in the city. On the next day, therefore, the sail came into the Prosechua; it was a large edifice, and the seat of residence of one of the greatest number of people; thither Jonathan went in, and though he durst not openly speak of a revolt, yet did he say that their city stood in need of a better governor than it then had. But Jesus, who was the ruler, made no scruple to speak out, and said openly, 'O fellow-citizens! it is better for you to be in subjection to four than to one; and those such as are of high birth, and not without reputation for their wisdom,' and pointed to Jonathan and his colleagues. Upon his saying this, Justus came in and commended him for what he had said, and persuaded some of the people to be of his mind also. But the multitude were not pleased with him, and told him that he was a spy turned into a tumult, unless the sixth hour which was now come had dissolved the assembly, at which hour our law requires us to go to dinner on Sabbath-days; so Jonathan and his colleagues put off their council that day, but had no success. When I was informed of these affairs, I determined to go to the city of Tiberias in the morning. Accordingly, on the next day, about the first hour of the day, I came from Teri

*In the original text, it is not clear whether the Syriac for Prosechua or prayer, in the city Tiberias itself, though such Prosechua used to lie out of cities, as the synagogues were within them; of them see La... resolved to comply with it. As for myself, o the next day, I ordered two of the guards of my body, whom I esteemed the most courageous, and most faithful, to hide daggers under their garments, and to go along with me, that we might enforce the order, if any of their colleagues, being unable to obey us by our enemies. I also myself took my breast-plate, and girded on my sword, so that it might be, as far as it was possible, concealed, and came into the Processus.

55. As for myself, although I knew of their design, yet did I comply with what they proposed, lest the people of Tiberias should have occasion to suppose, that I was not careful of their security.
I therefore went out; but when I was at the place,
I found not the least footsteps of any enemy, so I returned as fast as ever I could, and found the whole council assembled, and the body of the people gotten together, and Jonathan and his colleagues were present, vehemently charging me, as one who had no concern to ease them of the burdens of war, and as one that lived luxuriously. And as they were discourseing thus, they proceeded as writers and reporters of their resolutions, unto some people that lived at the borders of Galilee, improving that they would come to their assistcance, for that there was an army of Romans, both horsemen and footmen, who would come and lay waste all that laid on the third day; they feared them also to make haste, and not to overlook them. When the people of Tiberias heard this, they thought they spake truth, and made a classmiour against me, and said, I ought not to sit at home, but go to my countrymen.
Hereupon I said, (for I understood the meaning of Jonathan and his colleagues,) that I was ready to comply with what they prospected, and without delay to march to the war produced. I made the council, and the council mourned, that is, as much as they were able to mourn, to the detriment of their own countrymen.
This advice of mine greatly pleased the multitude:
so they compelled them to go forth to the war.
But their designs were put into very much disorder, because they had not done what they designed to do on account of my stratagems, which was opposite to their undertakings.

56. Now there was one, whose name was Ananias, a wicked man he was, and very mischievous:
he proposed that a general religious fast* should be appointed to make Jonathan and his colleagues, gave order that at the same hour they should come to the same place without any weapons, to make it manifest before God, that while they obtained his assistance, they thought all these productions of their hands, and to do all they desired to do. When John had received this letter, he

*One may observe here, that the fasts Parline Ananias, as we have seen he was, sect. 28, took upon him to appoint a fast at Tiberias, and was obeyed; though in doed it was not out of religion, but knavish policy.
upon I present, sent for the chief of the Galileans, and told them after what manner, against all faith given, I had been very near to destruction from Jonathan and his colleagues, and the people of Tiberias. Upon which the multitude of the Galileans were very angry, and encouraged me to delay no longer to make war upon them, but to permit them to go against John, and utterly to destroy him, as well Jonathan and his colleagues, and they supposed they would thus be in such a rage, and desired them to tarry awhile, till we should be informed what orders those ambassadors that were sent by them to the city of Jerusalem, should bring thence; for I told them that I had been so far according to their determination; whereupon they were prevailed on. At which time also, John, when the scribes he had laid did not take effect, regained the thousand of the best of my armed men and divided them into three bodies, and ordered them to go privately, and lie still as an ambush in the villages. I also led a thousand into another village, with the intent that the village, which had not been visited by them, so did the others, but only four furlongs distant from Tiberias, and gave orders, that when they saw my signal, they should come down immediately: while I myself lay with my soldiers, in the sight of the land, in the year of the thirty-first. Hereupon these men of Tiberias, at the sight of me, came running out of the city perpetually, and abused me greatly. Nay their madness was come to that height, that they made a decent bier for me, and standing about it, they mourned over me in the sight of the sport; and I could not but be myself in a pleasant humor upon the sight of this madness of theirs.

61. Now when they had received that letter, and considered that whereby they had desired, they sent for John, and for the senators of Tiberias, and for the principal men of the Gabarens, and proposed to hold a council, and desired them to consider what was to be done by them. However, these conceited false men, and wicked men, would not keep the government to themselves; for they said it was not fit to desert their city now it was committed to their trust and that otherwise I should not delay to fall upon them; for they pretended falsely that so I had threatened to do. Now John was not only of their opinion, but advised them that two of them should go to accuse me before the multitude, at Jerusalem, that I do not manage the affairs of Galilee as I ought to do, and that they would easily persuade the people, because of their dignity, and because the whole multitude were very mutable. When therefore it appeared that John had suggested these things, they ran to the sea, and put the boats of theirs and Jonathan and Annas, should go to the people of Jerusalem, and the other two [Simon and Joseph] should be left behind to tarry at Tiberias. They also took along with them a hundred men, and children to increase their city. So they too along with them a hundred men, and children to increase their city. So I was over-persuaded by their entreaties, and restrained the soldiers from the vehement with which they pursued them; while I myself, upon the coming on of the evening, went among the people of Tiberias and wept and went to refresh myself. I also invited Simon to sup with me, and comforted him on occasion of what had happened, and I promised that I would send him safe and secure to Jerusalem, and withal would give him provisions for his journey thereunto.
64. But on the next day I brought ten thousand men with me, and came to Tiberias. I then sent for the principal men of the multitude into the public place, and enjoined them to tell me who were the authors of the revolt; and when they had told me who the men were, I sent them round the city. But to Jonathan and Annaeus, I freed them from their bonds, and gave them provisions for their journey, together with Simon and Joazar, and five hundred armed men who should guard them, and brought them to Jerusalem. But Sephoris, situated in the midst of Galilee, and having many villages about it, and able with ease to have been bold and troublesome to the Romans, if they had so pleased, you may suppose they would have continued faithful to those their masters, and at the same time excluded me out of their city, and prohibited all their citizens from joining with the Jews in the war, and that they might be out of danger from me, by a wish to leave me to fortify their city with walls: they also, of their own accord, admitted of a garrison of Roman legions, sent them by Cestus Gallus, who was then president of Syria, and so had me in the greatest danger. But all was greatly afraid of me; and at the same time that the greatest of our cities, Jerusalem was besieged, and that temple of ours, which belonged to us all, was in danger of burning; and the king, I think, at that time, was not at Jerusalem, either, as not willing to have it thought they would bear arms against the Romans. But as for thy country, O Justus, situated upon the lake of Geneesarath, and distant from Aleppo, Phænicus, Gadera sixty, and from Scythopolis which was under the king's jurisdiction, a hundred and twenty; when there was no Jewish city near, it might easily have preserved its fidelity to Rome. These men do, like those who compose forged deeds and conveyances; and because they are not brought to the like punishment with them, they have no regard to truth. When therefore Justus undertook to write about these facts, and about the Jewish war, that he might appear to have been an industrious man, he falsified in what he related about me, and could not speak truth even about his own country; whence it is, that being but a country of one city, it is in reality to make my defence; and so I shall say what I have concealed till now. And let no one wonder that I have not told the world these things a great while ago. For although it be a very great historian to praise the nation, yet is such a one not bound severely to animadver't on the wickedness of certain men; not out of any favor to them, but out of an author's own moderation. How then comes it to pass, O Justus, thou most sagacious of writers, (that I may address myself to thee as if he were here present,) for so thou boastest of thyself, that I and the Galileans have been the authors of that sedition which thy country engaged in, both against the Romans and against thee? [Agrippa junior?] For before ever I was appointed governor of Galilee by the community of Jerusalem, both thou, and all the people of Tiberias, had not only taken up arms, but had made an alliance with the king with whom, at the same time, thou hadst ordered their villages to be burnt, and a domestic servant of thine fell in the battle. Nor is it only who say this; but so it is written in the commentaries of Vespasian the emperor, as by a law the inhabitants of Decapolis came clamoring to Vespasian at Ptolemais, and desired that thou, who vatt the author [of that war] mightest be brought to punishment. And thou hast, I think, been punished for the conduct of Vespasian, had not king Agrippa, who had power given him to have thee put to death, at the earnest entreaty of his sister Bernice, changed the punishment of death into a long imprisonment. Thy political administration of affairs after this does not clearly discover thy other behavior in life, and that thou wast the occasion of thy country's revolt from the Romans; plain signs of which I shall produce presently. I have also a mind to say a few things about the people of Tiberias on thy account, and to demonstrate to those that light upon this history, that you bear no good-will, neither to the Romans, nor to the king. To be sure the greatest cities of Galilee, O Justus, Sephoris, and Syrion, and many other.

written, that thou standest in need of no instruction, in order to our information from the beginning. However, thou comest to me to inform thee of a great many things which thou dost not know." So when this history was perfected, Agrippa, neither by way of flattering which was not agreeable to him, nor by way of irony, as thou wilt say, (for he was entirely a stranger to such an expression of mine) he could not, therefore, thus by way of atteestation to what was true, as all that read histories may do. And so much shall be said concerning Justus, which I am obliged to write about them. 68. Now when I had settled the affairs of Tiberias, and had assembled my friends as a Sanhedrim, I consulted what I should do as to John. Whereupon it appeared to be the opinion of all the Galileans, that I should arm them all, and march against John, and punish him as the author of all the disorders that had happened. Yet was I not pleased with their determination; but purposing to compose these troubles without bloodshed, and not that I should have recourse to arms to settle them, but the utmost care to learn the names of all that were under John; which when they had done, and I thereby was apprized who the men were, I published an edict, wherein I offered security and my right hand to swear, that all who burned their houses and expose their persons to public sale. When the men heard of this, they were in no small disorder, and deserted John; and, to the number of four thousand, threw down their arms, and came to me. So that he was sated with John but his own citizens, and about fifteen hundred strangers that came from the metropolis of Tyre; and, when John saw that he had been outwitted by my stratagem, he continued afterward to his own country, and was a great fear of me. 67. But about this time it was that the people of Sephophis grew insolent, and took up arms, out of a confidence they had in the strength of their walls. And this I immediately presented my history to many other persons, some of which were concerned in the war, as was king Agrippa, and some of his kindred; and to the bishop of Tyre, the circumstance that the knowledge of these affairs should be taken from the books alone, that he subscribed his own hand to them, and ordered that they should be published; and for king Agrippa, he was desirous of the account, and assented to my having the truth of what I had therein delivered; two of which letters I have here subjoined, and thou mayest therefore know their contents. "King Agrippa to Josephus, his dear friend, sendeth greeting. I have read thy book with great pleasure, and it appears to me that thou hast done it much more accurately, and with greater care, than have the other writers. Send me the rest of these books. Farewell, my dear friend." "Galilean to Galilean to Galilean: the city Titus is opposite to Josephus, and is called the city by force. The Galileans took this opportunity, as thinking they had now a proper time for showing their hatred to them, since they bore ill-will to that city also. They then exerted themselves, as if they would destroy them all utterly, with those that sojourne there also. So they ran upon them, and set their houses on fire, as finding them without inhabitants: for the men out of fear ran together to the citadel. So the Galileans were very little affrighted, or of any kind of desolation which they could bring about."

character of the history of James of Tiberias, in the title of our Josephus, which is now lost, with only remaining fragment, are given us by a very able critic, Phoebus, who read that history. It is in the 33rd section of his commentaries on the gospels (says Phoebus) the chronology of Justus of Tiberias, whose title is this. [The Chronology of the Kings of Judea, which, according to Josephus, was written the second year (says Phoebus).] The chronology of Justus of Tiberias came out the city Tiberias in Galilee. He begins his history from Moses, and ends it not till the death of Agrippa, and had under his consideration the last and the last king of the Jews; who took the government under Claudius, had it augmented under Nero, and rejected by Vespasian, and founded in the third year of Trajan, where also his history ends. He is very concise in his language, and slightly passes over those affairs that were most necessary to be in upon their countrymen. When I saw this, I was exceedingly troubled at it, and commanded them to leave off, and put them in mind that it was not agreeable to piety to do such things to their countrymen: but since they neither hearkened to what I exhorted, nor to what I commanded them to do, (for the hatred they bore to the people there was too hard for me to suppress,) I went to those that I bid those my friends, who were most faithful to me, and were about me, to give out reports, as if the Romans were falling upon the other part of the city with a great army; and that the king had such a respect for me abroad, I might restrain the violence of the Galileans, and preserve the city of Sepphoris. And at length this stratagem had its effect; for, upon hearing this report, they were in fear for themselves, and so to the left of plundering, and ran away; and this more especially, because they saw me, their general, do the same also; for, that I might cause this report to be believed, I pretended to be in fear as well as they. Thus were the inhabitants of Sepphoris unexpectedly preserved by this contrivance of mine.

68. Nay indeed, Tiberias had like to have been plundered by the Galileans also upon the following occasion: the chief men of the senate wrote to the king, and exhorted him to restrain them, and take possession of their city. The king promised to come, and wrote a letter in answer to theirs, and gave it to one of his bedchambermen, who was an Israelite by birth, a Jew, to carry it to Tiberias. When the Galileans knew that this man carried such a letter, they caught him, and brought him to me; but as soon as the whole multitude heard of the thing, they were enraged, and began to take their arms. So great a many of them got together from all quarters the next day, and came to the city Asochia, where I then lodged, and made heavy clamors, and called the city Tiberias a traitor to them, a plunderer, and a friend of the king; and desired leave of me to go down and utterly destroy it; for they bore the like ill-will to the people of Tiberias, as they did to those of Sepphoris.

69. When I heard this, I was in doubt what to do, and hesitated by what means I might deliver Tiberias from the rage of the Galileans; for I could not deny that those of Tiberias had written to the king, and had invited him to come to them, and take possession of them; and the king thereto would fully prove the truth of that. So I sat a long time musing with myself, and then said to them, "I know well enough that the people of Tiberias are my friends, and wish you to come, and plunder the city. However, such things ought to be done with discretion; for they of Tiberias have not been the only betrayers of our liberty, but many of the most eminent patriots of the Galileans, as they pretended to, have done the same. Tarry therefore till I shall thoroughly find out those authors of our danger, and then you shall have them all at once under your power, with all such as you shall yourselves lay hold of. In the meantime, I pacified the multitude, and they left off their anger, and went their ways; and I gave orders that he who caught the king's letters should be put into bonds; but in a few days I pretended that I was elsewhere, and was concealed in another part of the kingdom. Then called I Crispus privately, and ordered him to make the soldier that kept him drunk, and to run away to the king. So Tiberias was in danger destroyed. A second time, it escaped the danger by my skillful management, and the care that I had for its preservation.

70. About this time it was that Justus, the son of my acquaintance, ran away to the king; the occasion of which I will here relate. Upon the beginning of the war between the Jews and the Romans, the people of Tiberias resolved to submit to the king, and not to revolt from the Romans; while Justus tried to persuade them to break through the barriers, as being himself desirous of innovations, and having hopes of obtaining the government of Galilee, as well as of his own country [Tiberias] also. His propositions to this effect were to no avail, because the Galileans bore ill-will to those of Tiberias, and this on account of their anger at what miseries they had suffered from them before the war; whence it was, that they would not endure to be governed by a man that they suspected to be a traitor; and that those who were thus suspected were they also, who had been entrusted by the community of Jerusalem with the government of Galilee, did frequently come to that degree of rage at Justus, that I had almost resolved to kill him, as not able to bear his mischief. Disappointed after, I was therefore much afraid of me, lest at length my passion should come to extremity; so he went to the king, as supposing that he should dwell better, and more safely with him. The people of Sepphoris had, in so surprising a manner, escaped their first danger, they sent to Cestius Gallus, and desired him to come to them immediately, and take possession of their city, or else to send for sufficient forces to relieve them, and make an assault upon them; and at the last they did prevail with Gallus to send them a considerable army, both of horse and foot, which came in the night-time, and fell upon the city Sepphoris, and into the temple; when the country round about it was harassed by the Roman army, I took those soldiers that were about me, and came to Garseme; where I cast up a bank, a good way off the city Sepphoris; and being in a critical situation, I came upon it by night, and made an assault upon its walls with my forces; and when I had ordered a considerable number of my soldiers, to scale them with ladders, I became master of the greatest part of the city. But even after this, our acquaintance with the places forced us to retire, after we had killed twelve of the Roman footmen, and two horsemen, and a few of the people of Sepphoris, with the loss of only a single man of our own. And when it afterwards came to a battle in the plain against the horsemen, and we had undergone the dangers of it courageously for a long time, we were beaten; for upon the Romans encompassing me about, my soldiers were slain. Thus fell in that battle one of those that had been entrusted to guard my body; his name was Justus, who at this time had the same post with the king. At last, after an innumerable number of horsemen and footmen, from the king, and Sylla their commander, who was the captain of this guard; this Sylla pitched his camp at five furlongs distance from Julius, and set a guard upon the roads, both that which led to Gans, and that which led to the fortress Gamala, that he might hinder their inhabitants from getting provisions out of Galilee.

72. As soon as I had gotten intelligence of this, I sent a thousand armed men, and a captain over them, whose name was Jeremia, who raised a bank a furlong off Julius, near to the river Jordan, and did no more than skirmish with the enemy; till I took three thousand soldiers myself, and was about to make an assault upon them. But as I had laid an ambush in a certain valley not far from the banks, I provoked those that belonged to the king to come to a battle, and gave orders to my own soldiers to turn their backs upon them, and that they should have drawn the enemy away from their camp, and brought them out into the field, which was done accordingly; for Sylla, supposing that our party did really run away, was near enough, and that the second that was laid in ambush took them on their backs, and put them all into great disorder. I also immediately made a sudden turn with my own forces, and met those of the king's party, and put them to flight. And I had performed great things that day, if a certain fate had not been my hinder-ance. For the horsemen, when they were pressed back, fought, fell into a quisquaire, and threw me on the ground, and I was bruised on my wrist, and carried into a village named Cepharomus or Cepherorum. When my soldiers heard of it, they came to me to draw me out of battle while I was less than I was, and so they did not go on with their pursuit any farther, but returned in very great concern for me. I therefore sent for the physicians, and while I was under their hand, I commenced a continual change of waters; whereas the physicians directed, I was at night removed to Tari-chis.

73. When Sylla and his party were informed what had happened to me, they took courage again, and understanding that the watch was negligigently kept in our camp, they by night placed a body of horsemen in ambush beyond Jordan, and when it was day they provoked us to fight; and then, when we did, as it is plain, their horsemen appeared out of that ambush in which they had lain, and put our men into disorder, and made them run away; so they slew six men of our side. Yet did they not go off to the victors but for what they pleased; but some armed men were sailed from Tariches to Julius, they were afraid and retired.

74. It was not now long before Vespasian came to Tyre, and king Agrippa with him; but the Tyrians saw that they were no longer in the habit of king, and called him an enemy to the Romans. For they said, that Philip, the general of his army, had betrayed the royal palace, and the Roman forces were in Jerusalem, and that it was not the time to make war on them. Yet when I heard this report, he rebuked the Tyrians, for abusing a man who was both a king, and a friend to the Romans; but he exhorted the king to send them to Rome to answer for what he had done before Nero. But when Philip was this time, he did not come into the sight of Nero, for he found him very near death on account of the troubles that then happened, and a civil war; and so he returned to the king. But when Vespasian came to Ptolemais, the chief men of Decapolis of Syria, made a clamor against Jutus of Tiberias, because he had set their villages on fire: so Vespasian delivered him to the king, to be put to death by those under the king's jurisdiction, yet did the king [only] put him into bonds, and concealed what he had done from Vespasian, as I have before related. But the people of Sepphoris met Vespasian and saluted him, and had forced sent them, with Placidus their commander: he also went up with them, as I also followed them, till Vespasian came into Galilee. As to which coming of his, and after what manner was ordered, and how he fought his first battle with me there, I have not traced, and how from thence they went to Jotapta, and how I was taken alive and bound, and how I was afterwards loosed, with all that was done there, I have not related in the annual pension. But as to what I have related in the books concerning the War of the Jews. However, it will, I think, be fit for me to add now an account of those actions of my life, which I have not related in that book of the Jewish War.

75. For when the siege of Jotapata was over, and I was among the Romans, I was kept with much care, by means of the great respect that Vespas-ian showed me. Moreover, at his command, I married a virgin, who was from among the captives of that country: yet did she not live with me long, but I divorced her, on my being forced from my bonds, and my going to Alexandria. — However, I married another wife at Alexandria, and was thence sent, together with Titus, to the siege of Jerusalem, and was frequently in danger, either of being made a sacrifice or of being taken prisoner, but the Jews were very desirous to get me under their power, in order to have me punished; and the Romans also, whenever they were beaten, supposed that it was occasioned by my treachery, and made continual clamors to the emperor, that they would bring me to punishment, as a traitor to them: but Titus Caesar was well acquainted with the uncertain fortune of war, and returned no answer to the soldiers' vehement se-ligations against me. Moreover, when the city of Jerusalem was taken by force, Titus Caesar persuaded me frequently to take whatsoever I would out of the ruins of my country, and said, that he gave me the power to do so. But when the country was destroyed, I thought nothing else to be of any value, which I could take and keep as a comfort under my calamities: so I made this request to Titus, that my family might have their liberty. I had also the holy book by Titus's concession. Nor was it long after that I asked of him the life of my brother, and of fifty friends with him, and was not denied. When I also went once to the temple, by the permission of Titus, when there were great numbers of captive women and children, I got all those that I remembered as among my own friends and ac-cquaintance to be set free, being in number about one hundred and ninety; and so I delivered them without their paying any ransom, and restored them to their former fortune. And when I was sent by Titus Caesar with Cerealis, and a thousand horsemen, to a certain village called Thectes, in order to know whether it were

8 Here Josephus, a priest, honestly confesses that he did that at the command of Vespasian, which he had before told us, was not lawful, for a priest to do by the law of Moses, Ant. Iii. ch. xii. sect. 2. I mean the taking a captive woman to wife. See also against Aplon, B. i. ch. vii. But he seems to have been quickly sensi-

and sent to the emperor, he told him, that I had sent him both weapons and money. However, he could not conceal his being a liar from Vespasian, who condemned him to die; according to which sentence he was put to death. Nay, after that, when those that envied my good fortune did frequently bring accusations against me, by God's providence I escaped them all. I also received from Vespasian no small quantity of land, as a free gift in Judea; about which time I divorced my wife also, as not pleased with her behavior, though not till she had been the mother of three children, two of which are dead, and one, whom I named Hyrcanus, is alive. After this I married a wife who had lived at Crete, but a Jew by birth; a woman she was of eminent parents, and such as were the most illustrious in all the country, and whose character was beyond that of most other women, as her future life did demonstrate. By her I had two sons, the elder was named Justus, and the next Simonides, who was also named Agrippa. And these were the circumstances of my domestic affairs. However, the kindness of the emperor to me continued still the same: for when Vespasian was dead, Titus who succeeded him in the government, kept up the same respect for me which I had from his father; and when I had frequent accusations laid against me, he would not believe them. And Domitian, who succeeded, still augmented his respects to me; for he punished those Jews that were my accusers, and gave command that a servant of mine, who was an emnuch, and my accuser, should be punished. He also made that country I had in Judea, tax free; which is a mark of the greatest honor to him who hath it; nay, Domitia, the wife of Cesar, continued to do me kindnees. And this is the account of the actions of my whole life: and let others judge of my character by them as they please. But to thee, O Epaphroditus,* thou most excellent of men, do I dedicate all this treatize of our Antiquities; and so, for the present, I here conclude the whole.

1. Those who undertake to write histories, do so, I perceive, take that trouble on one and the same account, but for many reasons, and those such as are very different one from another. For some of them apply themselves to this part of learning, to show their great skill in composition, and that they may therein acquire a reputation for speaking finely. Others of them there are who write histories in order to gratify those that happen to be concerned in them; and on the account have spared no pains, but rather gone beyond their own abilities in the performance. But others there are who, of necessity and by force, are driven to write history, because they were concerned in the facts, and so cannot excuse themselves from committing them to writing for the benefit of posterity. Nay, there are not a few who are induced to draw their historical facts out of darkness into light, and to produce them for the benefit of the public, on account of the great importance of the facts themselves with which they have been concerned. Now of these several reasons for writing history, I must profess the two last were my own reasons also: for since I was myself interested in this, in which the Romans, and knew myself its particular actions, and what conclusion it had, I was forced to give the history of it, because I saw that others prevented the truth of those actions in their writings.

2. Now I have undertaken this present work, thinking it will appear to all the Greeks worthy of their study; for it will contain all our antiquities, and the constitution of our government, as interpreted out of the Hebrew and Greek writings. And, indeed, I did formerly intend, when I wrote of the war, to explain who the Jews originally were, what fortunes they had been subject to, and by what legislator they had been instructed in piety, and the exercise of other virtues; what wars also, they had made in remote ages, till they were unwililingly engaged in this last with the Romans; but because this work would take up a great compass, I separated it into a set treatise by itself, with a beginning of its own, and its own conclusion; but in process of time, as usually happens to such as undertake great things, I grew weary, and went on slowly, it being a large subject, and a difficult thing to translate our history into a foreign and to us uncustomed language. However, some persons there were who desired to know our history, and so exhorted me to go on with it; and, above all the rest, Epiphodorus, a man who is a lover of all kind of learning, but is principally delighted with the knowledge of history; and this on account of his having been himself concerned in great affairs, and many turns of fortune, and having shown a wonderful vigor of an excellent nature, and an invincible virtuous resolution in them all. I yielded to this man's persuasions who always excites such as have abilities in what is useful and acceptable to join their endeavors with his. I was also ashamed myself to permit any laxness of disposition to have a greater influence upon me than the delight of taking pains in such studies as were very useful: I therefore stirred up myself, and went on with my work more cheerfully. Besides the foregoing motives, I had others which I greatly reflected on; and these were, that our forefathers were willing to communicate such things to others; and that some of the Greeks took considerable pains to know the affairs of our nation.

3. I found, therefore, that the second of the Ptolemies was a king, who was extraordinary diligent in what concerned learning, and the collection of books; that he was also peculiarly ambitious to procure a translation of our law and of the constitution of our government therein contained, into the Greek tongue. Now Eleazar the high priest, one not inferior to any other of that dignity among us, did not envy the forenamed king the participation of that advantage which otherwise he would for certain have denied him; but that he knew the custom of our nation was, to hinder nothing of what we esteemed ourselves from being communicated to others. Accordingly I thought it became me both to imitate the generosity of our high priest and to suppose there might even now be many lovers of learning like the king; for he did not obtain all our writings at that time; but those who were sent to Alexandria as interpreters gave him only the books of the law, while there was a vast number of other matters in our sacred books. They indeed contain in them the history of five thousand years; in which time happened many strange accidents, many chances of war, and great actions of the commanders and mutations of the form of our government. Upon the whole a man that will peruse this history may principally learn from it, that all events succeed well even to an incredible degree, and the reward of felicity is proposed by God; but then it is to those that follow his will, and do not venture to break his excellent laws; and that so far as men in any way apostatize from the accurate observation of them, what was practicable before becomes impracticable; and whatsoever they set about as a good thing is converted into an increasable calamity. And now I exhort all those that peruse these books, to apply their minds to God and to examine the mind of our legislators, whether he hath not understood his nature in a manner worthy of him; and hath not ever as the year of Trajan, A. D. 106. See the note on Antig. b. 1. against Apion, sect. 1. Who he was we do not know for as to Epiphraditus, the freedman of Nero, and afterwards Domitian's secretary, who was put to death by Domitian in the 14th or 15th year of his reign, he could not be alive in the third of Trajan.

* The preface of Josephus, is excellent in its kind, and highly worthy the repeated perusal of the reader, before he set at nought the perusal of the work itself.
† That is, all the Gentiles, both Greeks and Romans.
‡ We may reasonably note here, that Josephus wrote seven books of the Jewish War long before he wrote these his antiquities. Those books of the war were published about A. D. 75, and these antiquities, A. D. 93, about eighteen years later.
¶ The Epiphraditus, was certainly alive in the third cried to him such operations as become his power, and hath not preserved his writings from those indecent fables which others have framed; although, by the great distance of time when he lived, he might have securely forged such lies; for he lived two thousand years ago; at which vast distance of ages the poets themselves have not been so hardly as to fix even to the generations of their gods, much less the actions of their men, or their own laws. As I proceed therefore, I shall accurately describe what is contained in our records, in the order of time that belongs to them; for I have already promised so to do throughout this undertaking; and this without adding anything to what is therein contained, or taking away any thing therefrom.

4. But because almost all our constitution depends on the wisdom of Moses our legislator, I cannot avoid saying somewhat concerning him beforehand; though, I shall do it briefly; I mean, because otherwise those that read my books may wonder how it comes to pass that my discourse which promises an account of laws and historical facts, contains so much of philosophy. The reader is therefore to know, that Moses deemed it exceeding necessary that he who would conduct his own life well, and give laws to others, in the first place should consider the divine nature; and, upon the contemplation of God's operations, should thereby imitate the best of all patterns, so far as it is possible for human nature to do, and to endeavor to follow after it; neither could the legislator himself have a right mind without such a contemplation; nor would any thing he should write tend to the promotion of virtue in his readers; I mean, unless they be taught from the very beginning that God is the Father and Lord of all things, and sees all things; and that thence he bestows a happy life upon those that follow him, but plunges such as do not walk in the paths of virtue into inevitable miseries. Now

* As to this intended work of Josephus concerning the reasons of many of the Jewish laws, and what philosophical or allegorical sense they would bear, the least of which work is by some of the learned not much regretted, I am inclined, in part, to Fabricius's opinion, ap. Havercamp, p. 63, 64: That "we need not doubt but when Moses was desirous to teach this lesson to his countrymen, he did not begin the establishment of his laws after the same manner that other legislators did; I mean, upon contracts and other rights between one man and another; but by raising their minds upwards to regard God, and his creation of the world; and by persuading them, that we are the most excellent of the creatures of God upon earth. Now when once he had brought them to submit to religion, he easily persuaded them to submit in all other things; for as to other legislators, they followed fables, and by their discourses transferred the most reproachful of human vices unto the gods, and so afforded wicked men the most plausible excuses for their crimes; but as for our legislator, when he had once demonstrated that God was possessed of perfect virtue, he supposed that men also ought to strive after the participation of it; and on those who did not so think, and so believe, he inflicted the severest punishments. I exhort, therefore, my readers to examine this whole undertaking in that view; for thereby it will appear to them, that there is nothing therein disagreeable either to the majesty of God, or to his love to mankind; for all things have here a reference to the nature of the universe; while our legislator speaks some things wisely, but enigmatically, and others under a decent allegory, but still explains such things as required a direct explication, plainly and expressly. However, those that have a mind to know the reasons of every thing, may find here a very curious philosophical theory, which I now indeed shall wave the explication of; but if God afford me time for it, I will set about writing it after I have finished the present work. I shall now take myself to the history before me, after I have first mentioned what Moses says of the creation of the world, which I find described in the sacred books after the manner following.

among some vain and frigid conjectures derived from Jewish imaginations, Josephus would have taught us a greater number of excellent and useful things, which perhaps nobody, neither among the Jews nor among the Christians, can now inform us of; so that I would give a great deal to find it still extant."

"This History is spoken of in the highest terms by men of the greatest learning and the soundest judgment, from its first publication to the present time.

"The fidelity, the veracity, and the probity of Josephus, are universally allowed; and Scaliger in particular declares, that not only in the affairs of the Jews, but even of foreign nations, he deserves more credit than all the Greek and Roman writers put together. Certain it is, that he had that most essential qualification of an historian,—a perfect and accurate knowledge of all the transactions which he relates; that he had no prejudices to mislead him in the representation of them; and that, above all, he meant no favor to the Christian cause. For even allowing the so much controverted passage, in which he is supposed to bear testimony to Christ, to be genuine, it does not appear that he ever became a convert to his religion, but continued probably a zealous Jew to the end of his life."

BOOK I.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF THREE THOUSAND EIGHT HUNDRED AND THREE YEARS—FROM THE CREATION TO THE DEATH OF ISAAC

CHAP. I.

1. IN the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. But when the earth did not come into sight, but was covered with thick darkness, and a wind moved upon its surface, God commanded that there should be light. And when that was made, he considered the whole mass, and separated the light and the darkness; and the name he gave to one was Night, and the other he called Day; and he named the beginning of light, and the time of rest, the Evening and the Morning. And this was indeed the first day. But Moses said it was one day; the cause of which I am able to give even now; but because I have promised to give such reasons for all things in a treatise by itself, I shall put off its exposition till that time. After this, on the second day, he placed the heaven over the whole world, and separated it from the other parts, and he determined it should stand by itself. He also placed a crystalline temple in it, round it, and put it together in a manner agreeable to the earth, and fitted it for giving moisture and rain, and for affording the advantage of dew. On the third day he appointed the dry land to appear, with the sea itself round about it; and on the very same day he made the plants and the seeds to spring out of the earth. On the fourth day he adorned the heaven with the sun, the moon, and the other stars; and appointed them their motions and courses. And these reasons might be clearly signified. And on the fifth day he produced the living creatures, both those that swim and those that fly; the former in the sea, the latter in the air. He also settled them as to society and mixture for recreation, and that their kinds might increase and multiply. On the sixth day he created the four-footed beasts, and made them male and female. On the same day he also formed man. Accordingly Moses says, that in just six days, the world, and all that is therein, was made; and that the seventh day was a rest, and a release from the labor of such operations; whence it is that we celebrate a rest from our labors on that day, and call it the Sabbath: which word denotes rest in the Hebrew tongue.

2. Moreover Moses, after the seventh day was over, begins to talk philosophically; and concerning the formation of man, that God took dust from the ground, and formed man, and inserted in him a spirit and a soul. This man was called Adam, which in the Hebrew tongue signifies one that is red, because he was formed out of red earth compounded together; for of that kind is virgin and true earth. God also presented the living creatures, when he had made them according to their kinds, both male and female, to Adam; and he gave them those names by which they are still called. But when he saw that Adam had no female companion, no society, (for there was no such created,) and that he wondered at the other animals which were in fours, and had male and female, he laid him salt, and cut away one of his ribs, and out of it formed the woman; whereupon Adam knew her when she was brought to him, and acknowledged that she was made out of himself. Now a woman is called in the Hebrew tongue Issa. But the name of this woman was Eset, which signifies the Mother of all living.

3. Moses says farther, that God planted a paradise in the East, flourishing with all sorts of trees; and that among them was the Tree of Lift, and another of Knowledge, whereby was to be known what was Good and Evil. And that when he had brought Adam and his wife into this garden, he commanded them to take care of the plants. No man plucked his garden as was done by one river, which ran round about the whole earth, and was parted into four parts. And Phiscon, which denotes a Multitude, running into India, makes its exit into the sea, and is by the Greeks called Ganges. Euphrates, which as well as Tigris, goes down into the Red Sea. Now the name Euphrates, or Phrahth, denotes either a Dispersion or a Flower; by Tigris, or Digitis, is signified what is swift with narrowness; and Geon runs through that part of the country which arises from the East, which the Greeks call Nile.

4. God therefore commanded that Adam and his wife should eat of all the rest of the plants, but to abstain from the Tree of knowledge; and peculiar to Josephus, but, as Dr. Hudson says, here, is derived from earlier authors, as if four of the greatest rivers of the world, running two of them at vast distances from the other two, by some means or other watered Paradise, is hard to say. Only since Josephus has already appeared to allegorize this history, and he makes notice that these four names had a particular signification; Phiscon for Ganges, a Multitude; Phrahth for Euphrates, either a Dispersion or a Flower; Digitis for Tigris, what is swift with narrowness; and Geon for Nile, which arises from the East; we perhaps may take them when we suppose he literally means those four rivers, especially as to Geon or Nile, which arises from the East, while he very well knew the literal Nile arises from the South; though what further allegorical sense he had in view is now, I fear, impossible to be determined.

foretold to them that if they touched it, it would prove their destruction. But while all the living creatures had one language at that time, the Serpent, which then lived together with Adam and his wife, showed an envious disposition, at his supplication the living happy and in obedience to the commands of God; and imagining that when they disobeyed them, they would fall into calamities, he persuaded the woman, out of a malicious intention, to taste of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil; which knowledge, when they should obtain, they would lead a happy life, i.e., a life not inferior to that of a god: by which means he overcame the woman, and persuaded her to give him to desist the command of God. Now, when she had tasted of that tree, and was pleased with its fruit, she persuaded Adam to make use of it also. Upon this they perceived that they were become naked to one another; and being ashamed thus to appear abroad, they invented somewhat to cover them; for the tree sharpened their understanding: and they covered themselves with fig leaves; and tiring these before them, out of modesty, they perceived that they were happier than they were before, as they had discovered what they were in want of. But when God came into the garden, Adam who was wont before to come and converse with him, being conscious of his wicked behavior, went out of the way. This behavior surprised God; and he asked what was the cause of this his procedure? And why he, that before delighted in that conversation, did now fly from him and avoid him? When he received no reply, as conscious to himself that he had transgressed the command of God; God said, "I had before determined about you both, how you might lead a happy life, without any afflictions, and care, and vexations, and grief, and that all things which might contribute to your enjoyment and pleasure should grow up by my providence, of their own accord, without your own labor and pains-taking; which state of labor and pains-taking would soon bring on you age, and death would not be at any remote distance; but now thou hast abused this my good will, and hast disobeyed my commands; for thy silence is not the sign of thy virtue, but of thy evil conscience." However, in his own good time, he decreed God not to be angry with him, and laid the blame of what was done upon his wife; and said that he was deceived by her, and thence became an offender; whereupon he again accursed the Serpent. But God allotted heavy punishment, because he weakly submitted to the counsel of his wife; and said, the ground should not henceforth yield its fruits of its own accord, but that when it should be harassed by their labor, it should bring forth some of its fruits, and refuse to bring forth others. He also made Eve liable to the inconvenience of breeding, and the sharp pains of bringing forth children; and because she perversely opposed him, he scattered with the same arguments wherewith the Serpent had persuaded her, and had thereby brought him into a calamitous condition. He also deprived the Serpent of speech, out of indignation at his malicious disposition towards Adam. Besides this, he inserted poison under his tongue, and made him an enemy to men; and suggested to them, that they should direct their strokes against his head, that he might be the place wherein lay his mischievous designs; and told him, that the race of his descendants should not be a source of vengeance on him that way. And when he had deprived him of the use of his feet, he made him to go rolling all along, and dragging himself upon the ground. And when God had appointed all these penalties to them, he removed Adam and Eve out of the garden into another place.

CHAP. II. Concerning the Perversity of Adam and the Ten Generations from him, to the Dethus.

§ 1. Adam and Eve had two sons; the elder of them was named Cain; which name, when it is interpreted, signifies a Possession; the younger was called Abel, which signifies Sorrow. They had also daughters. Now the two brethren were pleased with different courses of life; for Abel the younger was a lover of righteousness; and, but for his good actions, that he had not so much reason to excel in virtue; and his employment was that of a shepherd. But Cain was not only very wicked in other respects, but was wholly intent upon getting; and he first contrived to plough the ground; not that he was a great lover of his labor, but because he was a glutton, and did eat his bread by the sweat of his face. They had resolved to sacrifice to God. Now Cain brought the fruits of the earth and of his husbandry; but Abel brought milk, and the first fruits of his flock; but God was not pleased with Abel's sacrifice, because when he was honored with what grew naturally of its own accord, than he was with what was the invention of a crafty man, and gotten by forcing the ground; whence it was, that Cain was very angry with Abel, and contrary to the command of God, he slew his brother, and hid his dead body, thinking to escape discovery. But God, knowing what had been done, came to Cain, and asked him, What was become of his brother? because he had not seen him of many days; whereas he used to observe them conversing together at other times. But Cain was in doubt with himself, and knew not what answer to give to God. At first he said, That he himself was at a loss what to do, and to avoid the vengeance which was provoked by God, who pressed him vehemently, as resolving to know what the matter was, he replied, He was not his brother's guardian; for he did not observe what he did. But in return, God convicted Cain, having been the murderer of his brother, and said, "I wonder at thee, that thou knowest not what is become of a man whom thou thyself hast destroyed. God therefore did not inflict that punishment [of death] upon him, on account of his offering sacrifice, and thereby making supplication to him not to be extreme in his wrath to him; but he made him accursed, and threaten-ed with eternal perdition. And God also cast him together with his wife, out of that land. And when he was afraid, that in wandering about he should fall among the wild beasts, and by that means perish, God bid him not to

* Hence it appears, that Josephus thought several of the brute animals, particularly the serpent, could speak before the fall. And I think few of the more perfect kinds of those animals want the organs of speech at this day. Many inducements there are also to suppose, that the serpent spoke in the Parthenon, that is, in its original state; and that their capacities have been once much greater than we now see them, and are capable of being restored to former condition. But as to the most ancient and authentic and probably allegorical account of that grand affair of the fall of our first parents, I have somewhat more to say in an exercise of conjecture, but being only a conjecture, I omit it, ad instar thus far, that the imputation of the sin of our first parents to their posterity, any farther than as some way entertain such a melancholy suspicion, and to go over the whole case of what mischief he might suffer from wild beasts and, setting a mark upon him, that he might be known, he commanded him to depart.

2. And when Cain had travelled over many countries from the west side of the Nod, which is a place so called, and there he settled his abode; where also he had children. However, he did not accept of his punishment in order to amendment, but to increase his wickedness; for he only aimed to possess every thing that was for his own bodily pleasure, though it obliged him to be injurious to his neighbors. He augmented his household substance with much wealth, by rapine and violence; he excited his children to practice every kind of robbery, and became a great leader of men into wicked courses. He also introduced a change in that way of simplicity wherein men lived before; and was the author of measures and weights; and whereas he was innocent and generously while they knew nothing of such arts, he changed the world into cunning craftiness. He first of all set boundaries about lands; he built a city, and fortified it with walls, and he commanded his family to come together, and called that city Enoch, after the name of his eldest son Enoch. Now Jared was the son of Enoch, whose son was Malaleel, whose son was Methuselah, whose son was Lamech, who had seventy-seven children by two wives. And Ada. Of those children by Ada, one was Jabel; he erected tents, and loved the life of a shepherd. But Jabel, who was born of the same mother with him, exercised himself in music, and invented the pipes and the harp. But Jabol, as the eldest son of his children by the other wife, exceeded all men in strength, and was very expert and famous in martial performances. He procured what tended to pleasures of the body by that means, and did not neglect the worship of the brave and victorious king brass. Lamech was also the father of a daughter, whose name was Naamah; and because he was so skilful in matters of divine revelation, that he was to be punished for Cain's murder of his brother, he made that known to his wives. Nay, even while Adam was alive, it came to pass, that the posterity of Cain became exceeding wicked, every one succeeding them in wickedness was worse than the former. They were intolerable in war, and vehement in robberies: and if any one were slow to murder people, yet was he bold in his profane behavior, in acting unjustly, and doing injurious things.

3. Now Adam, who was the first man, and made out of the earth, (for our discourse must now be about him,) after Abel was slain, and Cain fled away on account of his murder, was solicitous for posterity, and had a vehement desire of children, he being two hundred and thirty years old; after which time he lived other seven hundred, and then died. He had indeed many other children, but Seth in particular. As for the rattle, it would be tedious to name them: I

§ Let us rather agree to the state of the world, and the conduct of Providence in all these ages. It is not possible that any of its waters, especially since the like pillars of the Egyptian Seth or Seccor, were extant after the flood, in the land of Shinar or Assyria; and the condition of Jeroboam also, as I have in the place referred to.

This notion, that the fallen angels were in some sense the fathers of the old giants, was the constant opinion of ancient authors, and especially Josephus; as here supposed, that the life of these giants (for of them only do I understand him) was now reduced to 150 years; which is condemned by the fre- gament of Enoch, sect. 10, in Antiqu. Rec. part 1, p. 298.
ANTiquities OF THE JEWS.

Isaac, and thus were all these men destroyed: but Noah alone was saved; for God stuck to him the following contrivance and way of escape: That he should make an ark of four cubits six and three hundred cubits long, fifty cubits broad, and thirty cubits high. Accordingly he entered into that ark, and his wife, and his sons, and their wives, and put into it not only other provisions to support them, but also such as were left of all sorts of living creatures, the male and his female, for the preservation of their kinds, and others of them by sevens. Now this ark had firm walls, and a roof, and was braced with cross beams and pillars, and it was so made as not to be overborne by the violence of the water. And thus was Noah with his family, preserved. Now he was the tenth from Adam, as being the son of Lamech, whose father was Methuselah; he was the son of Enoch, the son of Jared; and Jared was the son of Malaleel, who, with many of his sisters, were the children of Cain, the son of Enos. Now Enos was the son of Seth, the son of Adam.

3. This calamity happened in the six hundredth year of the life of Adam, and in the second month, called by the Macedonians Dias, but by the Hebrews Marzechon; for so did they order their year in Egypt. But Moses appointed that the same month of Kojahiras should be the first month of their year, because he brought them out of Egypt in that month. So that this month began the year as to all the solemnities they observed to the honor of God, although it was not the order of the month of Manasseh, as to selling and buying, and other ordinary affairs. Now he says, that this flood began on the twenty-seventh (seventeenth) day of the forementioned month; and this was two thousand six hundred and fifty-six years, or one thousand five hundred and sixty years from Adam the first man; and the time is written down in our sacred books; those then who lived having noted down with great accuracy both the births and the death of the world.

4. For indeed Seth was born when Adam was in his two hundred and thirtieth year, who lived nine hundred and thirty years. Seth begat Enoch in his two hundred and fifth year; who, when he had lived nine hundred and twenty years, delivered the government to Caian his son, whom he had at his hundred and ninetieth year. He lived nine hundred and five years. Caian, when he had lived nine hundred and ten years, had his son Seth, whom he begat when he was hundred and seventy years old; this being the third from Adam. He lived nine hundred and sixty-two years, and then his son Enoch succeeded him, who was born when his father was one hundred and sixty-two years old.

For as to the rest of mankind, Josephus himself confesses their lives were much shorter; than 130 years, for many generations after the flood, as we shall see presently; and he says, they were gradually shortened till the days of Moses. When then 120, chap. vi, sect. 5. Nor indeed need we suppose that either Enoch or Josephus meant to interpret these 130 years for the duration of the flood, since they are different from the 120 years of God's patience [perhaps while the ark was preparing] till the deluge: which I take to be the meaning of God when he threatened this wicked world, that if they so long continued impatient, their days should be no more than 130 years.

† Josephus here, in the third, and Moses in the second, place the year that the ark fled about the autumnal equinox: as to what day of the month the flood began, our Hebrew and Samaritan, and perhaps Josephus own chronicle, is more rightly placed on the 17th day instead of the 5th, as here: for Josephus agrees with them as to the distance of 150 days to the period of the deluge; which he indeed observes with vital.

Josephus here takes notice, that those ancient genealogies were first set down by those that then lived, and therefore the authors of them were the first to say: which I suppose to be the true account of that matter. For there is no reason to imagine that men were not taught to read and write soon after they were taught to speak: and perhaps all by the Messiah himself, who, under the Father, was the Creator or Governor of mankind, and who frequently in those early days appeared to them.

§ This Antiquity, or Place of descent, is the proper region, in which Josephus begins to treat the foundation of the human race, called in Ptolomy, Ναζαζανα, and by Moses Chrenomas, the Armenian historian, יבשא; but at the place itself, ניאכדסאנה, which signifies the first place of descent, and is a lasting monument of the preservation of Noah in the ark, upon the top of that mountain, at whose foot it was built, as the first city or town after the flood. See Antiquities, proem, 2, sect. 3. 71, 72; who also says, p. 19, that another town was related by tradition to have been called Seres, or the place of descent, on account of the dispersion of Xiss thrus, or Noah's sons, from thence first made. Whether any remains of this ark be still preserved, as the people of the Chaldeans pretend, is not surely known. Turnhurt had not very long since a mind to see the place himself, but met with too great dangers and difficulties to venture through them.
some part of this ship in Arimas, at the mountain of the Cordyranus; and that some people carry off pieces of the bitumen, which they take away, and use chiefly as amulets, for the averting of mischiefs."—Hieronymus the Egyptian also, who wrote the Phenician antiquities, and Mnasias, and a great many more make mention of the same. Nay, Nicholas of Damascus, in his ninety-sixth book, hath a particular relation about them; where he speaks thus: There is a great mountain of fire, called Minya by the Egyptians, upon which it is reported, that many who fled at the time of the deluge were saved; and that one who was carried in an ark, came on shore with others on the same mount, which, for the time they were there, were a great while preserved. This might be the man about whom Moses the legislator of the Jews wrote."

7. But as for Noah, he was afraid, since God had plainly assured him that the waters should not come near his house, he was afraid of some strange downfall; and he was afraid how they might destroy the earth itself. As for the rest, he would not bring on so great a judgment as the Phenicians supposed; for, he thought, the deluge might be in danger of destruction; but that, having now punished the wicked, he would of his goodness spare the remainder, and such as he had hitherto judged fit to be delivered from so severe a calamity. But this was not the case; that last must be more miserable than the first, and that they must be condemned to a worse condition than the others, unless they suffered to escape entirely; that is, if they were reserved for another deluge; for while they must be afraid of the ter-or and the sight of the first deluge, and must also be destroyed by a second. He also entreated God to accept of his sacrifice, and to grant that the earth might never again be covered with the like effects of his wrath; that men might be permitted to go on cheerfully in cultivating the same;
to build cities, and live happily in them; and that they might not be deprived of any of those good things which they enjoyed before the flood; but might attain to the like length of days, and old age, which the ancient people had arrived at before.

8. When Noah had made these supplications, God, who loved the man for his righteousness, granted entire success to his prayers; and said, That it was not he who brought the destruction on a polluted world, but that they underwent that vengeance on account of their own wickedness; and that he had been reserved for them as a type for theuniversal destruction, if he had himself determined to destroy them, it being an instance of a greater wisdom not to have granted them life at all, than, after it was granted, to procure their destruction; but the injuries, said he, they offered to my honor, was virtue forced me to bring this punishment upon them.
But I will leave off for the time to come to require such punishments, the effects of so great wrath, for their future wicked actions, and especially on account of thy prayers. But if I shall, at any time, send tempests of rain, in an extraordinary manner, be not afflicted at the largeness of the showers; for the water shall no more overspread the earth than the deluge. Neither shall you shrink from shedding the blood of men, and to keep yourselves pure from murder; and to punish those that commit any such thing. I permit you to make use of all the other living creatures at your pleas-sure, and in such a manner as will serve for your happiness; but you have made lords of them all, both of those that walk on the land, and of those that swim in the waters, and of those that fly in the regions of the air on high, excepting their blood, for therein is the life; but I will give you a sign that I have left off my anger, by my bow (whereby is meant the rainbow, for they determined that the rainbow was the bow of God.) And, when God had said and promised thus, he went away.

9. Now when Noah had lived three hundred and fifty years after the flood, and all that time happily, he died, having lived the number of nine hundred and fifty years. But let no one upon comparing the lives of the ancients with our lives, and with the few years which we now live, think that what we have said of them is false; or make the shortness of our lives at present, an argument, that neither did they attain to a long duration of life, for those who were beloved of God, and [lestly], made by God himself; and because their food was then fitter for the prolongation of life, might well live so great a number of years; and besides, God afforded them a long time of life on account of their virtue, and the good use they made of it in astromonical and geometrical discoveries, which would not have afforded the time for foretelling, [the periods of the stars,] unless they had lived six hundred and fifty years; for the great year is completed in that interval. Now I have for witnesses to what I have said, all those that have written antiquities, both among the Greeks and Barbarians: for even Manesto, who wrote the Egyptian history, says, that those who composed the Chaldean monumets, and Mochus and Hestuimis, and besides these Hieronymus the Egyptian, and those that composd the Phenician history, agree to what I have said. And also, Herodotus, and Helle-nicus, and Acuclusivolus; and, besides these, Ephorus and Nicolaus relate that the ancients lived a thousand years. But as to these matters, let every one look upon them as they think fit.

CHAPTER IV.

Concerning the Tower of Babylon and the Confusion of Tongues.

§ 1. Now the sons of Noah were three, Shem, and Japhet, and Ham, born one hundred years before the deluge. These first of all descended from the mountains into the plains, and fixed their habitation there; and persuaded others who were greatly afraid of it, to follow grounds on account of the flood, and so were very loth to come down from the higher places, to venture to follow their examples. Now, the plain in which they first dwelt was called Shinar. God also commanded them to send their families, that they might peopling the earth, that they might not raise seditions among themselves, but might cultivate great part of the earth, and enjoy its fruits after a plentiful manner. But they were so far from observing this instruction that they would not give obedience to the Divine will, the suspicion that they were therefore ordered to send out separate colonies, that being divided asunder, they might the more easily be oppressed.

2. Now it is said, that Nimrod made such an affront and contempt of God. He was the grandson of Ham, the son of Noah, a bold man, and of great strength of hand. He per sumed them not to ascribe it to God, as if he were not to be ascribed to God, that he had reach; and that he would advance himself on God for destroying their forefathers."

3. Now the multitude were very ready to follow the determination of Nimrod, and to esteem it a piece of cowardice to submit to God; and they neither gave any answer, nor being in any degree negligent about the work. And, by reason of the multitude of hands employed in it, it grew very high, sooner than any could expect; but the thickness of it was so great, that the arch strengthened itself; and this its great height seemed, upon the view, to be less than it really was. It was built of burned brick, cemented together with mortar made of bitumen, that it might not be liable to admit water. When God saw that the work was rejected so maliciously, he did not resolve to destroy them utterly, since they were not grown wiser by the destruction of the former sinners, but he caused a tumult among them, by producing in them divers languages, and causing,
that through the multitude of those languages, they should not be able to understand one another. The place wherein they built the tower is now called Babylon, because of the confusion of that language which they really understood before; for the Hebrews mean by the word Babel, colusion. The Sybil also makes mention of this tower, and of the confusion of the language when she says thus: "When all men were of one language, of which they had a certain understanding before;" but as to the plain of Shinar, in the country of Babylonia, Hesiod mentions it, when he says thus: "Such of the priests as were saved took the sacred vessels of Jupiter Enyalus, and came to Shinar of Babylonia."

CHAP. V.

After what manner the posterity of Noah sent out Colonies, and inhabited the whole Earth.

1. After this they were dispersed abroad, on account of their languages, and went out by coloines everywhere; and each colony took possession of that land which they lighted upon, and unto which God led them, so that the whole continent was filled with them, both the inland and the maritime countries. There were some also who passed over the sea in ships, and inhabited the islands; and some of those nations do still retain the denominations which were given them by their first founders; but some have lost them also, and some have only admitted certain cha-ces, that they might be the more intelligible to the inhabitants. And they were the Greeks who became the authors of such mutualitions; for when in after ages they grew potent, they claimed to themselves the story of antiquity;
giving names to the nations that sounded well, [in Greek,] that they might be better understood among themselves; and setting agreeable forms of government over them, as if they were a people derived from themselves.

CHAP. VI.

How every Nation was denominated from their first inhabitants.

1. Now they were the grandchildren of Noah in honor of whom names were imposed on the nation, that they might be first seeded upon them. Ja-phet the son of Noah had seven sons. They inhab-itated so, that beginning at the mountains Taurus and Amanus, they proceeded along Asia, as far as the river Tanais, and along Europe to Caith; and settled at the coast besides; God led them wherever upon, which none had inhabited before, they called the nation by their own names. For Geer saw that the names which the Greeks now call Galatians. [Galls,] but were then called Conrilas. Magog founded those that from him were named Magogites, but who are by the Greeks called Scythians. Now as to Javan and Madai, the sons of Japhet; from Madai came the Me-deans, which are called Medes by the Greeks; but for Javan, Jona, the anciently Greeks are derived. Thobel founded the Thobelites, who are now called Iberas; and the Moscheni were formed by Mosoch; now they are Cappadocians.
There is also a mark of their ancient denominations; for they also are called Thracians, the name of which is among a city called Mazaca, which may inform those that are able to understand, that so was the entire nation once called. Thiras also called those whom he ruled over Thyranyians;
but the other Greeks call them Thyranyians.
And so many were the countries that had the children of Japhet for their inhabitants. Of the three sons of Gouer, Achaean founded the Achasian; and now they are called by the Greeks Achaeanians. So did Riphat found the Riphacian, now called Paphlogonians; and Thragmon the Thragmonians, who as the Greeks resolved, were named Phrygians. Of the three sons of Oceus, one of them Dardanus, by whom the name to the Elissan, who were his subjects; they are now the Zolians. Tharsus to the Tharsian, for so was Cilicia of old called; the sign of which is this, that the noblest city they have, and a mestrom of trade and riches is Cilicia; and also for the Theta. Cethium possessed the island of Cethimia; it is now called Cyprus; and from that it is, that all islands, and the greatest part of the sea-coasts, are named Cethium by the Hebrews. Yezor, the name of Cyprus, is that which has been able to preserve its denomination; it is called Cittus by those who use the language of the Greeks, and has not, by the use of that dissect, escaped the name of Cethium. And so many nations there were among the children and grandchildren of Japhet possessed. Now when I have promised somewhat, which perhaps the Greeks do not know, I will return and explain what I have omitted; for such names are pronounced here after the manner of the Greeks, to please my readers; for our own country language does not so pronounce them. But the names in all cases are of one and the same ending; for the name of the Cethies, and of Byzas, B人次, is there the same, and in every case retains the same termination.

2. The children of Ham possessed the land from Syria and Amanus, and the mountains of Libanus; seailing upon all that was on its sea-coasts, as far as the ocean, and inhabited them as their own. Some, indeed, of its names are utterly vanished away; others of them being changed, and another sound given them, are hardly to be discovered, yet a few there are which has kept their denominations entire.
For of the four sons of Ham, time has not at all hurt the name of Chus; for the Ethiopians, over whom he reigned, are even at this day, both by them, and by all men in Asia, called Canitas. The memory also of the Mearaites is preserved in their name; for all we who inhabit this country [of Judaea] call Egypt Misir, and the Egyptians Mysirians. That was also the found ing name of the inhabited cities. Atal, the name from himself; there is also a river in the country of the Moors, which bears that name; whence it is that we may see the greatest part of the Grecian historiographers mention that river, not a river in Egypt, as it is called by the Greeks, but the name it has now, has been by change given it from one of the sons of Mesitrain, who was called Lybyos. We will inform you presently what has been the occasion why it has been called Africa also. Canaan, the fourth son of Ham, inhabited the country now called Juda, and called it from his own name Canaan.
The children of these [four] were these: Sabas who founded the Sabaens; Evilas, who founded the Egyptians, who are called Gebali; Sabaethas found the Sabathaen; they are now called by the Greeks Pertheans; Saretas settled the Sabeans; and Ragmas the Ragmeans; and he had two sons, the one of which, Judacidas, settled the Judacianas, a nation of western Ethiopians, and left the other to the name of the place. But Nimrod, the son of Chus, stayed and tyrannized at Babylon, as we have already informed you. Now all the children of Mesraim, being eight in number, possessed the country from the Mediterranean sea, to the confines of the Greeks called the Phœnician; it retained the name of one only the Palæstine; for the Greeks called part of that country Palestine. As for the rest, Ludcaen, and Enestium, and Labim, who alone inhabited in Libya, and called the country from the name of Lycia, the name of Africa, and Ces hurinum, and Cephthorim, we know nothing of them besides their names; for the Ethiopian war, which we shall describe hereafter, was the cause that those cities were overthrown. The sons of Canaan, whom the Greeks called Amatha, and Amalth, of which Amalth is the name of the Amalthea, was a pasture for Deucalion and Pyrrha, from which island Arctos, Arca, possessing Arca, which is in Libya. But for the seven others [Euenus, Chethes, Jebesine, Ammon, Gergesen, Edenes, Sineus, Samareus, we have nothing in the scriptures about them; and divers nations of the Hebrews overthrew their cities; and their calamities came upon them on the occasion following.

3. Noah, when after the deluge the earth was resettled in its former condition, set about its cultivation. He was a good man, and the fear of God was upon him; and the vineyards, and when the fruit was ripe, and he had gathered the grapes in their season, and the wine was ready for use, he offered sacrifice, and feasted and drank; and being drunken, he fell asleep, and was asked in the same manner. When his youngest son saw this, he came laughing, and showed him to his brethren; but they covered their father's nakedness. And when Noah was made sensible of what he had done, he told his eldest son about it, and he poured all the wine of his land about him to his other sons; but for Ham, he did not curse him, by reason of his nearness in blood, but cursed his posterity. And when the rest of them escaped that curse, God inflicted it on the children of Canaan; as to these matters, we shall speak more hereafter.

4. Shem, the third son of Noah, had five sons, who inhabited the land that began at Euphrates, and reached to the Indian ocean. For Eslam left between them the Elamites, the Medes, and the Persians. Ashur lived at the city Nineve; and named his subjects Assyrians, who became the most fortunate nation beyond others. Arphaxad named the Arphaxadites, who are now called Chaldeans. Abram had the Arameans, which the Greeks called Syrians; as Land founded the Ludites, which are now called Lydians. Of the four sons of Aram, Uz founded Trachonitis and Damascus; this country lies between Palestine and Syria, and contains a country bigger than the whole province of Persis; and Mess the Mesopotamians; as now called Charas Spasani. Sala was the son of Arphaxad; and his son was Heber, for whom they originally called the Jews Hebrews. He begat Jochan and Phale; he was called Phale because he was born at the dispersion of the nation, by the consent of the Egyptians. Now Jochan, of the sons of Heber, had these sons, Elmodad, Saphel, Asersh, Jera, Adoram, Azel, Deel, Ebal, Abimele, Seubas, Ophir, Eulat, Jashobeam, and Jobe. But Shem, the son of Noah, was the father of the Indian river, and in part of Asia adjoining to it. And this shall suffice concerning the sons of Shem.

5. I will now treat of the Hebrews. The son of Phaleeg, whose father was Heber, was Rober, whose son was Serug, to whom was born Nahor; his son was Terah, who was the father of Abram, who accordingly was the tenth from Noah, and was born in the two hundred and ninety-second year after the deluge; for Terah began Abram in his seventieth year. Nahor begat Haran, when he was one hundred and twenty years old; Nahor was born to Serug at his hundred and thirty second year; Ragau had Serug at one hundred and thirty; and Ragau had Heber at his hundred and thirty-fourth year; he himself being begotten by Sala, when he was a hundred and thirty years old, whom Arphaxad had for his son at the age of forty; and he lived forty years and thirty years; and the age ofRagau was the son of Shem, and born twelve years after the deluge. Now Abram had two brethren, Nahor and Haran; of these Haran left a son, Lot; as also Sarai and Milcha his daughter, and the last of them was Haran; of these the children of Abram, and the children of the Chaldeans called Ur; and his monument is showed to this day. These married their nieces. Nahor married Milcha, and Abram married Sarai. Now Terah hating Chaldea, on account of the multitude of his offspring, and the land of Habir, and of Mesopotamia, where Terah died, and was buried, when he had lived to be two hundred and five years old; for the life of man was already by degrees multiplied, and was made shorter than before, till the birth of Moses; after whom the term of human life was one hundred and twenty years, God determining it to the length that Moses happened to live. Now Nahor had eight sons in all, besides Ur, and Kedem, Chesed, Azan, Pheidas, Jadelp, and Bethuel. These were all the genuine sons of Nahor; for Tebah, and Gasam, and Tahcha, and Machsah, were born of Reuma his consubscipe; but Bethuel had a daughter Rebecca, and a son Laban.

CHAP. VII.

How Abram our First-father went out of the Land of the Chaldeans, and lived in the land then called Canaan, but now Judea.

§ 1. Now Abram, having no son of his own, adopted Lot, his brother Haran's son, and his wife Sarah's brother; and he left the land of Chaldea when he was seventy-five years old, and at the command of God went into Canaan, and therein he dwelt himself, and left it to his posterity. He was a person of great sagacity, both for understanding all the things concerning his hearers, and not mistaken in his opinions, for which reason he began to have higher notions of virtue than others had, and he determined to renew and to change the opinion all men happened then to have concerning God; for he was firm; and not for Abram the Hebrew, or Passenger, or Hebræorum, nor over Euphrates, nor to the west of it, but to the east thereof. Abram is also called the Father of all the children of Hebrew, or of all the Hebrews, in a history long before Abram passed over Euphrates. Gen. x. 31, though it must be confessed, that Gen. xxv. 33, where the original says, they told Abram the Hebrew, the Septuagint renders it the Parthenes; but this is spoken only of Abram himself, who had then lately passed over Euphrates, and is another signification of the Hebrew word, taken as an appellative and not as a proper name.

the first that ventured to publish that notion, that there was but One God, the Creator of the Universe; and that as to other, [gods] if they contributed any thing to the happiness of men, that each of them afforded it only according to his appointment, and not by their own power. This idea was derived from the irregular phenomena that were visible both at land and sea, as well as those that happen to the sun, and moon, and all the heavenly bodies; thus, "if [the gods] have power over their own concerns, they would certainly take care of their own regular motions; but since they do not preserve such regularity, they make it plain that so far as they co-operate to our advantage, they do it not of their own ability, but as things are subervient to him that commands them, to whom alone we ought justly to offer our honor and thanksgiving." For which doctrines, when the Chaldeans, and other people of Mesopotamia, raised a tumult against him, he thought fit to leave that country; and at the command, and by the assistance of God, he came and lived in the land of Canaan. And when he was there settled, he built an altar, and performed a sacrifice to God.

2. As soon as Abram was come out of Mesopotamia, hedesired to go down into Egypt, without naming him, when he says thus: "In the tenth generation after the flood, there was among the Chaldeans a man, righteous and great, and a seer of celestial science. But Isaac was more free, and doest more than barely mention him; for he composéd, and left behind him, a book concerning him. And Nicolaus of Damascus, in the fourth book of his history says thus; "Abram reigned at Damascus, being a foreigner, who came with an army out of the land above Babylon, called the land of the Chaldeans; but, after a long time, he got him up, and removed from that country also, with his people, and went into the land of Canaan, the land of the Chaldeans, but not on the land of Judea, and this when his posterity were become a multitude; as to which posterity of his, we relate their history in another work. Now the name of Abram is even still famous in the country of Damascus; and there is shown a village named from him, The Habitation of Abram."

CHAP. VIII.

That when there was a Famine in Canaan, Abram went thence into Egypt; and after he had continued there awhile, he returned back again.

§ 1. Now after this, when a famine had invaded the land of Canaan, and Abram had discovered that the Egyptians were in a flourishing condition, he was disposed to go down to them, both to partake of the plenty they enjoyed, and to become an auditor of their priests, and to know what they said concerning the gods; designing either to follow them, if they had better notions than he, or to convert them into a better way, if his own notions proved the truest. Now seeing he was to take Sarai with him, and was afraid of the madness of the Egyptians with regard to women, lest the king should kill him on account of her; he contrived this device:—He pretended to be her brother, and directed her in a dispensing way to pretend the same; for he said it would be for their benefit. Now as soon as they came into Egypt, it happened to Abram as he supposed it would, for the fame of his wife's beauty was greatly talked of; for which reason Pharaoh, the king of Egypt, would not be satisfied with what was reported of her, but would needs see her himself, and prospect her; but he made a stop to his unjust inclinations, by sending upon him a destemper, and a sedition against his government. And when he inquired of the priests, how he might be freed from those calamities, they told him, that his miserable condition was derived from the wrath of God, upon account of his inclinations to abuse the stranger's wife. He then, out of fear, asked Sarai, who she was, and who it was that she brought along with her? And when he had found out the truth, he excused himself to Abram, that supposing the woman to be his sister, and thought she was his affections on her, as desiring an affinity with him by marrying her; but not as incited by lust to abuse her. He also made him a large present in money; and gave him leave to enter into conversation with the most learned among the Egyptians: from which conversation, his virtue and his reputation became more conspicuous than they had been before.

2. As soon as the Egyptians were formerly addicted to different customs, and despised one another's sacred and accustomed rites, and were very angry one with another on that account, Abram conferred with each of them, and confuting the reasonings they must have for their own practices, he demonstrated that such reasonings were vain, and void of truth: whereupon he was admired by them, in those conferences, as a very wise man, and one of great ability, and he discovered on any subject he undertook; and this not only in understanding it, but in persuading other men also to assent to him. He communicated to them arithmetic, and delivered to them the science of astronomy; for, before Abram came into Egypt, they were unacquainted with those parts of learning; for that science came from the Chaldeans into Egypt, and from thence to the Greeks also.

3. As soon as Abram was come back into Canaan, he parted the land between him and Lot, upon account of the tumultuous behavior of their shepherds, concerning the pastures where in they should feed their flocks. However, he purchased of the king of Sodom, much land, he would take; and he took himself what the other left, which were the lower grounds at the foot of the mountains; and he himself dwelt in Habor, which is a city seven years ancienster Than Tana of Egypt. But Lot, possessed the land of the plain, and the river Jordan, not far from the city Sodom, which was then a fine city, but is now destroyed by the wild and the wrath of God; the cause of which I shall show in its proper place hereafter.

CHAP. IX.

The Destruction of the Sodomites by the Assyrian War.

§ 1. At this time, when the Assyrians had the dominion over Asia, the people of Sodom were in a flourishing condition, both as to riches and number of their youth. There were five kings that managed the affairs of this country, Ballas, Barasa, Senabar, and Sumobar, with the king of Bela, and each king led on his own troops. And the Assyrians came upon them, and dividing their army into four parts, fought against them. Now every part of the army had its own commander; and when the battle was joined, the Assyrians fell upon the Chaldeans, and gave them a great tribute upon the kings of the Sodomites, who submitted to this slavery twelve years, and so long they continued to pay their tribute; but on the thirteenth year they rebelled, and then the army of the Assyrians came upon them, and under their commanders, Anraphel, Aryo, Checherlomer, and Tidal. These kings had laid waste all Syria, and overthrown the offspring of the giants. And when they were come over against Sodom, they besieged it two years, and gave no quarter to them; but they cast into the city a great many piths, for at that time there were pits in that place; but now, upon the destruction of the city of Sodom, that vale became the Lake Asphaltites, as it is called; however, concerning this lake we shall speak more presently. Now when the So-
BOOK I.—CHAP. X. XI.

domites joined battle with the Assyrians, and the fight was very obstinate; many of them were killed, and the rest were carried captive; among which captives was Lot, who had come to assist the Sodomites.

CHAP. X.

How Abram fought with the Assyrians, and overcame them, and saved the Sodomite Prisoners, and took from the Assyrians the Prey they had gained.

¶ 1. When Abram heard of their calamity, he was at once afraid for Lot his kinsman, and pitied the Sodomites, his friends and neighbors; and thinking it proper to afford them assistance, he did not delay it, but marched hastily, and the fifth night fell upon the Assyrians, near Damas, for that is the name of the other spring of Jordan; and, before they could arm themselves, he slew some as they were in their beds, before they could suspect any harm; and others, not yet gone to sleep, but were so drunk that they could not fight, ran away. Abram pursued after them, till, on the second day, he drove them in a body unto Hob, a place belonging to Damascus; and there they pitched their tents, that the king not depend on multitude, but the alacrity and courage of soldiers overcome the most numerous bodies of men, while he got the victory over so great an army with no more than three hundred and eighty of his servants, and three of his friends; but all those that fled returned home ingloriously.

2. So Abram, when he had saved the captive Sodomites, and had dispossessed the Assyrians, and Lot also, his kinsman, returned to his abode, and returned in peace. Now the king of Sodom met him at a certain place, which they called The King's Dale, where Melchisedec, king of the city Salem, met him on his approach, and offered him an Akkous King; and such he was, without dispute, insomuch that, on this account, he was made the priest of God; however, they afterward called Salem Jerusalem. Now this Melchisedec supplied Abram's wants in an hospitable manner, and gave them provisions in abundance; and as they were feasting, he began to praise him, and to bless God for subduing his enemies under him. And when Abram gave him the tenth part of his prey, he was well pleased, and the king of Sodom desired Abram to take the prey; but entreated that he might have those men restored to him whom Abram had saved from the Assyrians, because they belonged to the city of Sodom. But Abram would not do so; nor would make any other advantage of that prey, than what his servants had eaten; but still insisted that he should afford a part to his friends that had assisted him in the battle. The first of them was called Ezzokol, and then Enzer, and Membre.

3. And God commended his virtue, and said, Thou shalt not however lose the rewards thou hast deserved to receive by such thy glorious action. He who provides for others, let it be to me to have such rewards, when I have none to enjoy them after me? for he was hitherto childless. And God promised that he should have a son, and that his posterity should be very numerous; insomuch that their number should be like the stars. When he heard that, he offered a sacrifice to God, as he commanded him. The manner of the sacrifice was this: he took an heifer of three years old, and a ram of the same age, and a turtle-dove, and a pigeon; and, as he was enjoined, he divided the three former, but the birds he did not divide. After which, before he built his altar, where the birds of prey flew about as desirous of blood, a divine voice came to him, declaring that their neighbors would be envious to his posterity, and that they should be in Egypt, for four hundred years; during which time they should be afflicted, but afterwards should overcome their enemies, should conquer the Canaan in war, and possess themselves of their land and of the cities.

4. Now Abram dwelt near the oak called Ogyges; the place belongs to Canaan, not far from the city of Hebron. But being uneasy at his wife's barrenness, and he entreated God to send him, that he might have male issue; and God required of him to be of good courage; and said, that he would add to all the rest of the benefits that he had bestowed upon him, ever since he led him out of Mesopotamia, the gift of children. Accordingly Sarai, at God's command, brought to his bed one of her handmaids, a woman of Egyptian descent, in order to obtain children by her; and when the child was born, with child, she triumphed, and ventured to affront Sarai, as if the dominion were to come to a son to be born of her. But when Abram resigned her into the hands of Sarai, to punish her, she contrived to fly away, as not able to bear the instances of servitude to her; and she entertained God to have compassion on her. Now a divine Angel met her, as she was going forward in the wilderness, and bid her return to her master and mistress, for if she would submit to their advice, she would be avenged; but if she spurned it, for that the reason of her being in such a miserable case was this, that she had been ungrateful and arrogant toward her mistress. He also told her, that if she disobeyed God, and went on still in her purpose, she should not bear if she would return back, she should become the mother of a son, who should reign over that country. These admonitions she obeyed, and returned to her master and mistress, who were overjoyed. A little while afterwards she bare Israel, which may be interpreted, Heard of God, because God had heard his mother's prayer.

5. The forerunmentioned son was born to Abram when he was eighty-six years old; but when he was ninety-nine, God appeared to him, and promised him, that he should have a son by Sarai, and commanded that his name should be Isaac; and showed him, that from this son should spring the father of great nations; and that he should obtain all the land of Canaan by war, from Sodom to Egypt. But he charged him in order to keep his posterity unmixt with others, that they should be circumcised into him. But that this should be done on the eighth day after they were born; the reason of which circumcision, I will explain in another place. And Abram inquiring also concerning Israel, whether he should live or not, God signified to him, that he should live to be very old, and should be the father of great nations. Abram therefore gave thanks to God for these blessings; and then he, and all his family, and his son Isaac, were circumcised; instructing him to remain forty years more, that day thirteen years of age, and he was ninety-nine.

CHAP. XI.

How God overthrew the Nation of the Sodomites, out of his Wrath against them for their Sins.

¶ 1. About this time the Sodomites grew proud, on account of their riches and great wealth; they became unjust toward princes and impious towards God; insomuch that they did not call to mind the advantages they received from him; they hated strangers, and abused themselves with Sodomitical practices. God was therefore much displeased with them, the three here named, as a.ded. places observe on Abemethor, etc. It is to be considered from these three kinds of animals which he here required of Abram. Nor did the Jews feed upon any other do pleased at them, and determined to punish them for their pride, and to overthrow their city, and to make their country, and to make them neither plant nor fruit grow out of it.

2. When God had thus resolved concerning the Sodomites, Abraham, as he sat by the oak of Mamre, at the door of his tent, saw three angels approaching to him. Then he rose up, and saluted them, and a sired they would accept of an entertainment, I adore with him; to which, when they agreed, he ordered cakes of meal to be made presently; and when he had slain a calf, he roasted it, and brought it to them, as they sat under the oak. Now they made a show of eating, and besides, they asked him about his wife Sarah, where she was? and when he said she was within, they said she should change their manner of life; for they were angels of God: and that one of them was sent to inform them about the child, and two of the overthrow of Sodom.

3. When Abraham heard this, he was grieved for his daughters; and he rose up, and besought God for them, and entreated him that he would not destroy the righteous with the wicked. And when God had replied, That there was no good man among the Sodomites; for if there were in Sodom one man righteous, God would not punish any of them for their sins, Abraham held his peace. And the angels came to the city of the Sodomites, and Lot entreated them to accept of a lodging with him; for he was a very generous man, and said that he had learned to imitate the goodness of Abraham. Now when the Sodomites, saw the young men to be of beautiful countenances, and this to an extraordinary degree, and that they took up their lodgings with Lot, Lot resolved themselves to enjoy these beautiful boys by force and violence; and when Lot exhorted them to sobriety, and not to offer any thing inmodest to the strangers, but to have regard to such a lodging; and it was resolved forthwith, that if their inclinations could not be governed, he would expose his daughters to their lust, instead of these strangers: neither thus were they made ashamed.

4. God was much displeased at their impudent behavior, so that he both anointed those men with blindness, and condemned the Sodomites to universal destruction. But Lot, upon God's informing him of the future destruction of the Sodomites, went away, taking with him his wife and daughters, who were two, and still virgins: for those that were betrothed to them were above the thoughts of going, and deemed that Lot's words were trifling. God then cast a thermometer upon the city, and set it on fire, with its inhabitants; and laid waste the country with the like burning, as I formerly said when I wrote

5. But his daughters, thinking that all mankind were destroyed, approached to their father, though taking care not to be perceived. This they did, that mankind might not utterly fail; and that the providence of God, who named Moab, who denotes one derived from his father; and the younger bare Ammon, who denotes one derived from a kindred, was the former of whom was the father of the Moabites, which is even still a great and in the latter half of the father of the Ammonites; and both of them are inhabitants of Coelosyria. And such was the departure of Lot from among the Sodomites.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning Abimelech; and concerning Isaac. He was born to Abraham; and concerning the Aramaeans, which were his Posterity.

¶ 1. ABRAHAM now removed to Gerar of Palestine, leading Sarah along with him, under the notion of his sister, using the like dissimulation that he had used before, and this out of fear; for he was afraid of Abimelech, the king of that country, would do such a deed to his wife, and was disposed to corrupt her; but he was restrained from satisfying his lust by a dangerous distemper which befell him from God. Now when his physicians despaired of curing him, he fell asleep, and saw a dream, warning him not to abuse the stranger's wife; and when he recollected, he told his friends that God had afflicted that disease upon him, by way of punishment for his injury to the stranger's wife; and that the God had saved him, for that she did not accompany him as his sister, but as his legitimate wife; and that God had promised to be gracious to him for the time to come, if this person be once more of his wife's choice. When he had said this, by the advice of his friends, he sent for Abraham, and bid him not be concerned about his wife, or fear the corruption of her chastity, for that God took care of him, and that it was by his will, and that she received the wife without her suffering any abuse. And he appealed to God, and to his wife's conscience; and that he had not any inclination at first to enjoy her, if he had known she was his wife; but since, he would love her the more as the sister, I was guilty of no offence. He also entreated him to be at peace with him; and to make God this question, which can only be determined by eye-witnesses. When Christian princes, so called, lay aside their foolish and unchristian wars and quarrels, and send a body of their persons to travel over the East, and bring us faithful accounts of all ancient monuments, and procure us copies of all ancient records, at present lost, and answer to our most instructive inquiries, hardly before.

2. I see no proper wicked intention in these daughters; for it was not their design to be unapproachable necessity, they procured themselves to be with child by their father. Without such an unavoidable necessity, they would not be employed in a thing of so great and so public a nature. And it shows that they despised of receiving him as a son, which, at the best, could not be worse. 4. And shocking to see a good man provisions to him, and that if he thought fit to continue with him, he should have what he wanted in abundance; but that if he designed to go away, he should be honorably conducted, and have whatsoever supply he wanted when he came back. Upon his saying this, Abraham told him that his presence was welcome, he was so believably young, but was only solicitous for his own safety; and said also, that he was ready to stay with him. Whereupon Abimelech assigned him land and money; and they conveanted to live together under the same roof, and to call one another well, called Bersheba, which may be interpreted, _The well of the oath_; and so it is named by the people of the country unto this day.

2. Now in a little time Abraham had a son by Sarah, as God had foretold to him, whom he named Isaac, which signifies laughter. And indeed they so called him because Sarah laughed when God said she should bear a son, she not expecting such a thing, as being past the age of child-bearing, and before any of the men of Canaan, and Abraham a hundred; so that this son was born to them both in the last year of each of those decimal numbers. And they circumcised him upon the eighth day, as the law required, from the time of his birth; the Jews continue the custom of circumcising their sons within that number of days. But as for the Arabsians, they circumcise after the thirteenth year, because Israel, the founder of their nation, Abraham: and Abraham of a fire servant, was circumcised at that age; concerning whom I will presently give a particular account with great exactness.

3. As for Sarah, she at first loved Isaac, who was her son; but later she hated him, handmaiden Hagar, with an affection not inferior to that of her own son, for he was brought up in order to succeed in the government; but when she herself had borne Isaac, she was not willing that Isaac should be brought up with him, as being too old for him, and able to do him injuries, when their father should be dead; she therefore persuaded Abra- ham to send him and his mother to some distant country. Now, at the first, he did not agree to what she said; but she said again, it was an instance of the greatest barbarity to send away a young child, and a woman, unprovided of necessities; but at length he agreed to it, because he had observed how much Isaac was beloved. So he provided for both; and he sent them away; he provided for the child, and furnished him with what was necessary for it, and sent her with him. But as soon as her necessary provisions failed, she found herself in an evil case; and when the water was almost spent, she laid the young child, who was ready to expire, under a fir-tree, and went on farther, that so he might die which was about. But Abraham continued to her, and told her of a fountain hard by, and bid her take care, and bring up the child, because she should be very happy by the preservation of him.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning Isaac, the legitimate Son of Abraham.

1. Now Abraham greatly loved Isaac, as being his only begotten, and given to him at the borders of old age, by the favor of God. The child also endeared himself to his parents still more by the exercise of every virtue, and adhering to his religious habits, and zealous in the worship of God. Abraham also placed his own happiness in this prospect, that when he should die, he should leave his son in a safe condition; and secure himself by the will of God; who being desirous to make an experiment of Abraham's religious disposition towards himself, appeared to him, and signified all the blessings he had bestowed on him; how he had blessed him with the blessing of nations, and that his son Isaac, who was the principal part of his present happiness, was derived from him; and he said that he required this son of his as a sacrifice and holy oblation. Accordingly he commanded him one day to carry his son Isaac up the mountain Moriah, and to build an altar, and offer him for a burnt-offering upon it; for that this would best manifest his religious disposition towards him, if he preferred what was pleasing to God before the preservation of his own son.

2. Now Abraham thought that it was not right to disobey God in any thing, but that he was obliged to serve him in every circumstance of life, since all creation was subject to him by his providence, and the kindness he bestowed on them. Accordingly he concealed this command of God, and his own intentions about the slaughter of his son, from his wife, as also from every one of his servants; and therefore hid himself and his son, and had not hindered from his obedience to God; and he took Isaac, together with two of his servants, and laying what things were necessary for a sacrifice upon an ass, he went away to the mountain. Now the two servants went along with him two days; but on the third day, as soon as he saw the mountain, he left those servants that were with him till then, in the plain, and having his son alone with him he came to the mountain. It was that mountain upon which the King David afterwards built the temple. Now they had brought with them everything necessary for a sacrifice, excepting the animal that was to be offered only. Now Isaac was twenty-five years old. And as he was building the altar, he asked his father, "What was he about to do, and where was he going, and for whom was he going, and for whom was he about to offer a sacrifice to me, and who was the altar to be for, and for what occasion?" To which it was answered, "That God would provide him an altar, he being able to make a plentiful provision for men out of what they have not, and to deprive others of what they have, when they have too much. But as for the altar, it was trust therein; that, therefore, if God pleased to be present and propitious at this sacrifice, he would provide him an altar." 3. As soon as the altar was prepared, and Abraham took the wood, and the flesh of the young animal, and all things were entirely ready, he said to his son, "O son, pour out a vast number of prayers that I might have thee for my son; when thou wast come into the world, there was nothing that could contribute to thy support, for which I was not greatly solicitous, nor any thing wherein I thought myself happier than to see thee grown up to man's estate, and that I might leave thee at my death the successor to my dominion; but since it will not be by God's will that I become thy father, and it is now his will that I relinquish thee, bear this consecration to God with a generous mind; for I resign thee up to God, who thought it necessary to require this testimony of honor to himself on account of the favors he hath conferred on me, in being to me a supporter and defender. Accordingly thou, my son, wilt now die, not in any common way of going out of the world, but to go up to God the Father of all men beforehand, by thy own father, in the nature of a sacrifice. I suppose he thinks thee worthy to get clear of this world, neither by a disease, neither by war, nor by any other severe way, by which an angel usually comes upon men, but so that he will receive thy soul with prayers and holy offices of religion, and will place thee near to himself, and thou wilt there be to me a succour, a support in my old age; on which account I cried up to thee, and thou wilt thereby procure me God for my comforter instead of thyself." 4. Now Isaac was of such a generous disposition as became the son of such a father, and was pleased to be obedient to his father, and said, "That and this I was not worthy to be born at first, if he should reject the determination of God and of his father, and should not resign himself up readily to both them; now, since I would not be unjust if he had not obeyed, even if his father alone had so resolved." So he went immediately to the altar to be sacrificed. And the deed had been done if God had not opposed it; for he called loudly to Abraham by his name, and forbade him to slay his son, and said, "It was not out of a desire of human blood that he was commanded to slay his son, nor was he willing that he should be taken away from him whom he had made his father, but to try the temper of his mind, whether he would be obedient to such a command. Since, therefore, he was now satisfied as to that his alacrity, and the surprising readiness he showed in this his piety, he was delighted in having bestowed such blessings upon him; and that he would not be wanting in all sorts of concurs about him, and in bestowing other children upon him; and that his son should live to a very great age; that he should live a happy life, and bequeath a large property to his children that they should be godly and civilized." He foretold also, that his family should increase into many nations; and that those patriarchs should leave behind them an everlasting name; that they should obtain the possession of the land of Canaan, and should be possessed of it by all men. When God had said this, he produced to them a ram, which did not appear before, for the sacrifice. So Abraham and Isaac, receiving each other unexpectedly, and having embraced one another; and when they had sacrificed, they returned to Sarah, and lived happily together, God affording them his assistance in all things they desired.

CHAP. XIV.

§ 1. Now Sarah died a little while after, having lived one hundred and twenty-seven years. They buried her in Hebron; the Canaanites publicly allowing them a burying-place; the sons of men being, and men and women, and all uncalled persons, and of the hundred shekels, of Ephron, an inhabitant of Hebron. And both Abraham and his descendants built themselves sepulchres in that place.

CHAP. XV.
How the Nation of the Troglobytes were derived from Abraham by Keturah.

§ 1. ABRAHAM, after this, married Keturah, by whom he begat six sons, men of courage and of sagacious minds: Zobeam, Jazar, and Madian, and Madian, and Jozabad, and Soua. Now the sons of Soua were, Zablah, and Dadan. The sons of Dadan were, Lutuim, and Assur, and Luum. The sons of Madian were, Ephah, and Ophren, and Anoch, and Eldaas, and Eldaas. Now for all these sons and grandsons Abraham contrived to settle them in colonies; and they Apok possession of Troglobytes, and they Apok possession of Arabia the Happy, as far as it reaches to the Red Sea. It is related ofthus Ophren, that he made war against Libya, and took it, and that his grandchildren, when they inherited his name, and indeed Alexander Polyhistor gives his attestation to what I here say, who speaks thus: "Cleodemes the prophet, who was also called Malachi, who wrote a history of the Jews, in agreement with the history of Moses, their legislator, and that there were many sons born to Abraham by Keturah: may, be names three of them, Apher, and Surim, and Japhran. That from Surim was the land of Assyria denominated; and that from the other sons, and Ophren, and Anoch, the country of Africa took its name, because these men were auxiliaries to Hercules, when he fought against Libya and Antees; and that Hercules married Aiphra's daughter, and of her he begat a son, Didorus: and that Sophon was his son Testament of Reuben, sect. 6, in Authent. Rec. part I p 368, who charges his sons, "To worship the Seed of Ja- dah, who should dwell for them in visible and invisible war; and should be among them an eternal King." Nor is that observation of a learned foreigner of my acquaintance right; for such a phrase as "the plenitude of the earth shall be blessed," "As many as are of the faith of Christ, all of them, that are in the world," the plural must signify posteriority, or see singular in the singular may signify either posteriority or a single person; and that to this promise of all nations being happy in the seed of Abraham, or Isaac, or Jacob, &c., is always used in the singular.—To which I shall add, that it is sometime as it were, paraphrased by the sons of Abraham, the sons of David, &c., which is capable of no such ambiguity.

earn, &c.; 1 Chron xxi. 22. &c.; and Amoi. b. vii. chap. xiii. sect. 4. 1. In Gen. xiv. 20. in God's parallel blessing to Jacob, ch. xix. sect. 1, that Josephus had yet no notion of the hidden meaning of that most important and most embellished promise; it was, "I will give thee the nations of the earth to be blessed. He maketh not of seeds, as of many, but of one; and to thy seed, which is Christ." Gal. iii. 16. Now if many were, he being, I think, as yet, not a Christian. And had he been a Christian, yet since he was, to be sure till the latter part of his life, no more so, so, as it were, I mean say me, the apostles, who, at first exalted and despised St. Paul, it would be no great won- der if he did not follow his interpretation. In the mean time, we have, in effect, St. Paul's exposition in the
from whom that barbarous people called Scopheners were denominated."

CHAP XV.

How Isaac took Rebekah to Wife.

1. Now when Abraham, the father of Isaac, had resolved to take Rebekah, who was grand-daughter to his brother Nahor, for a wife to his son Isaac, who was then about forty years old, he sent the ancientest of his servants to betroth her, after he had obliged him to go to the land of the Ishmaelites, to give him the most assuring assurances of his fidelity. Which assurances were given after the manner following: They put each other's hands under each other's thighs, then they called upon God as the witness of what was to be done. He also sent such presents to those that were there, as were in esteem, on account that they either rarely or never were seen in that country. This servant got thither not under a considerable time; for it requires much time to pass through that desert, travelling both in winter for the depth of the clay, and in summer for want of water; and besides this, for the robberies there committed, which are not to be justified by travelling but by caution beforehand. However, the servant came to Haran. And when he was in the suburbs, he met a considerable number of maidens going to the water; he therefore prayed to God, that Rebekah might be found among them, or else that the servant might take her as his servant to espouse to his son, in case his will were that this marriage should be consummated; and that she might be made known to him by this sign, that while others desired water, she would give it to him.

2. With this intention he went to the well, and desired the maidens to give him some water to drink, but while the others refused, on pretexts that they wanted it all at home, and could spare none for him, one only of them consented and gave him with them for their peevish behavior towards the stranger; and said, What is there that you will ever communicate to any body, who have not so much as given the man some water? She then asked the servant to give her in an obliging manner. And now he began to hope that his grand affair would succeed; but desiring still to know the truth, he commended her for her generality and good nature, which did not accrue from the scarcity of water to those that wasted it, though it cost her some pains to draw it; and asked who were her parents, and wished them joy of such a daughter; and mayest thou be espoused, said he, to a man of satisfaction, in a marriage with a manly husband, and bring him legitimate children. Nor did she disdain to satisfy his inquiries, but told him her family. They, says she, call me Rebekah; my father was Bethuel, but he is dead; and Laban is my brother's, and, together with my mother, takes care of all our family affairs, and is the guardian of my virginity. When the servant heard this, he was very glad at what had happened, and at what was told him, as peculiarly from God had thus pleased him in the journey; and producing his bracelets and some other ornaments, which it was esteemed decent for virgins to wear, gave them to the damsel, by way of acknowledgment, and as a reward for her good nature, and the kindness of her giving him that night, it was but just that she should have them, because she was so much more obliging than any of the rest. She desired also that he would come and take them, since the kind offering of the night gave him not time to proceed farther. And producing his precious ornaments for women, he said, he desired to trust them to none more safely than to such as she had showed herself to be; and as he believed he might gaze at the humanity of his brother and his brother's children, that they would not be displeased, from the virtue he found in her, for he would not be burdensome, but would pay the hire for his entertainment, and spend his own money, which she replied, that he guessed right as to the humanity of her parents; but complained, that he should think them so preposterous as to take money; for that he should have all on free cost. But she said, she would first inform her betrothed father, that if he gave her leave, she would conduct him in.

3. So as soon as this was over, she introduced the stranger; and for the camels, the servants of Laban brought them in, and took care of them, and he was himself brought in to supper by Laban. And after supper, he says to him, and to the mother of the damsel, addressing himself to her, "Abraham is the son of Terah, and a kinsman of yours, for Nahor, the grandfather of these children, was the brother of Abraham, by both father and mother; upon which accorded he hath sent me to you, being desirous to take this damsel for his son to wife. He is his legitimate son; and is brought up by his only brother. He could indeed have had the most happy of all the women in that country for him, but he would not have his son marry any of them; but out of regard to his own relations he desired him to match here, whose affection and estimation I would much have had him to despise; for it was by the good pleasure of God, that other accidents fell out in my journey, and that thereby I lighted upon your daughter, and your house; for when I was near to the city I saw a great many maidens coming to a well, and I prayed that I might meet with this damsel, which has come to pass accordingly. Do you therefore confirm that marriage, whose espousals have been already made by a divine appearance; and show the respect you owe to Abraham, who hath sent me with so much solicitude, in giving your consent to the marriage of this damsel." Upon this they understood it to be the will of God, and greatly approved of the offer, and sent their daughter, as was desired. Accordingly Isaac married her, the inheritance being now come to him; for the children by Keturah were gone to their own remote habitations.

CHAP. XVII.

Concerning the Death of Abraham.

11. A LITTLE while after this Abraham died. He was a man of incorruptible virtue, honored by God in a manner agreeable to his piety towards him. The whole time of his life was one hundred seventy and five years; and he was buried in Hebron, with his wife Sarah, by their sons Isaac and Ishmael.

CHAP. XVIII.

Concerning the Sons of Isaac, Esau and Jacob Of their Nature and Education.

1. Now Isaac's wife proved with child, after the death of Abraham; and when her belly was greatly burdened, Isaac was very anxious, and inquired of God, who answered, That Rebekah should bear twins; and that two nations should take the names of those sons; and that he who appeared the second should excel the elder. Accordingly she, in a little time, as God had foretold, bore twins; the elder of whom, from his birth, was ahead of his brother, and yet the younger took hold of his heel as they were in the birth. Now the father loved the elder, who was called Esau, a name agreeable to his always exactly according to the order of time, seem to have led Josephus into it, as Dr. Bernard observes here.
roughness, for the Hebrews call such a hairy roughness (Esaun, or Seir;) but Jacob, the younger, was best beloved by his mother.

2. When there was a famine in the land, Isaac resolved to go into Egypt, the land there being good; but he went to Oerar, as God commanded him; and Abimelech, the king of the land, feared him, because Abraham had formerly lived with him, and had been his friend. And as in the beginning he treated him exceeding kindly, so he was hindered from continuing in the same disposition; for his envy for him was so great, that when he saw that God was with Isaac, and took such great care of him, he drove him away from him. But Isaac, when he saw how envy had changed the judgment of Abimelech, retired to a place called The Villem of God, for he was digging a well the shepherds fell upon him, and began to fight, in order to hinder the work, and because he did not desire to contend, the shepherds seemed to get the better of him, so he still retired, and dug another well; and when certain other shepherds of Abimelech's began to offer him violence, he left that also, and still retired, thus purchasing security to himself by a rational and prudent conduct. At length, when the king gave him leave to dig a well without disturbance. He named this well Rechoboth, which denotes a large space; but of the former wells, one was called Eson, which denotes stripy, the other Silemma, which denotes curiosity.

3. It was now that Isaac's affairs increased, and his power was in a flourishing condition; and this from his great riches. But Abimelech thinking Isaac thrive in opposition to him, while his was in the former time in the contrary, he made them suspicious of each other, and Isaac's retiring showing a secret enmity also, he was afraid that his former friendship with Isaac did not secure him, if Isaac should endeavor to revenge the injuries he had formerly done him; on this account, he therefore quitted the friendship with him, and brought with him Philoc, one of his generals. And when he had obtained every thing he desired, by reason of Isaac's good nature, who preferred the earlier friendship Abimelech had shown to himself, and his father to his later wrath against him, he returned home.

4. Now when Esau, one of the sons of Isaac, whom the father principally loved, was forty years old, he married Adab, the daughter of Helon, and Abolhamah, the daughter of Esbecon; which Helon and Esbecon were great lords among the Canaanites, thereby taking upon himself a great authority, and assuming to have dominion over his own marriages, without so much as asking the advice of his father; for bad Isaac been the arbitrator, he had not given him leave to marry thus, for he was not pleased with contracting any alliance with the people of that country; but not caring to be uneasy to his son, by commanding him to put away these wives, he was desired to be silent.

5. But when he was old, and could not see at all, he called Esau to him, and told him, that besides blindness, and the disorder of his eyes, his very old age hindered him from his worship of God; and God appeared to him concerning this, after a sort of a vision, which he had in hunting, and when he had caught as much venison as he could, to prepare him a supper, that after this he might make supplication to God, to be to him a supporter and an assister in all his affairs. For though, as far as Isaac knew, it was uncertain whether he should die, and that he was desirous, by prayers for him, to procure beforehand God to be merciful to him.

6. Accordingly Isaac went out a hunting. But Rebekah foreseeing it as he was sending for a supplication made for obtaining the favor of God to Jacob, and that without the consent of Isaac, bid him kill kids of the goats, and prepare a supper. So Jacob obeyed his mother, according to all her instructions, and, when the supper was got ready, he took a goat's skin, and put it about his arm, that by reason of his hairy roughness he might, by his father, be believed to be Esau; for he should, in this respect, differ only in this thing. This was done out of his fear, that before his father had made his supplications, he should be caught in his evil practice, and lest he should, on the contrary, proc- k, him, and thereby cause the supper to his father. Isaac perceiving by the peculiarity of his voice who he was, called his son to him, who gave him his hand, which was covered with the goat's skin. When Isaac saw that it was not that of Jacob, he took it, and beheld him, and said, "Who art thou? Art thou my son Esau?" Jacob said, "Thou seest me, as the voice of Jacob, yet because of the thickness of thy hair, thou seemest to be Esau." So suspecting no deceit, he ate the supper, and betook himself to his prayers and intercessions with God; and said, "Lord, open his mouth, and deliver his voice, and make him understand his instance; for it was that thou didst propose to my father great plenty of good things, and hast vouchsafed to bestow on me what I have; and hast promised to my posterity to be their kind helper and protector, and shall have the same country, and honorable and beloved among his friends."

7. Thus did Isaac pray to God, thinking his prayers had been made for Esau. He had but just finished them, when Esau came in from hunting. And when Isaac perceived his son's take, he was silent; but Esau required that he and Esau, in future ages, was for certain providential, and according to what Rebekah knew to be the purpose of God, when he answered her inquiry, "before the children were born," Gen. xxv. 23, "that one people should be more numerous than the other," he knew and remembered it, he did not endeavor to alter the Divine determination, out of his fondness for his elder and wiser son Esau, to the damage of his younger and better son Jacob; as Josephus elsewhere supposes, Antiq. b. ii. chap. vii. sect. 5. I cannot certainly say. If so, this might tempt Rebekah to contrive, and Jacob to put this imposition upon him. However, Josephus renders Isaac's procedure more inconceivable; Nor was it probably any thing else that so much encouraged Isaac, and without his parents' consent, as Isaac's unhappy fondness for his.

might be partaker of the like blessing from his father that his brother had partook of; but his father added, that the interest he had been spent upon Jacob: so Esau lamented the mistake. However, his father being grieved at his weeping, said, That he should excel in hunting, and strength of body; in arms, and all such sort of work; and should obtain glory forever on those accounts, and his posterity after him but still should serve his brother."

3. Now the mother delivered Jacob, when he was afraid that his brother would inflict some punishment upon him, because of his having taken about the prayers of Isaac; for she persuaded her husband to take a wife for Jacob out of Mesopotamia, of her own kindred. Esau having married already Basemuth, the daughter of Ishmael, without his father's consent, for Isaac did not like the Cananities, so that he disapproved of Esau's former marriages, which made him take Basemuth to wife, in order to please him; and indeed he had a great affection for her.

CHAP. XIX.
Concerning Jacob's Flight into Mesopotamia, by Reason of the Fear he was in of his Brother.

1. Now Jacob was sent by his mother to Mesopotamia in order to marry her brother Laban's daughter, (which marriage was permitted by Isaac on account of his obsequiousness to the devil,) and to inform him of his father's death; he journeyed through the land of Canaan; and because he hated the people of that country he would not lodge with any of them, but took up his lodging in the open air, and laid his head on a heap of stones that he had gathered together. At which time he saw in his sleep such a vision standing by him; he seemed to see a ladder which reached from the earth unto heaven, and persons descended from it; whereon the voice said, This is thy father's house, which is very excellent than human; and at last God himself stood above it, and was plainly visible to him, who, calling him by his name, spake to him these words:

2. "O Jacob, it is not fit for thee, who art the son of a good father, and grandson of one who had obtained a great reputation for his eminent virtue, to be dejected at thy present circumstances, but to hope for better times, for thou shalt be the head of a great people, and shall do great things; and I can give thee so much assistance: for I brought Abraham into the desert of Mesopotamia, when he was driven away by his kinmen; and I made thy father a happy man; nor wilt thou receive a less degree of happiness on thyself. Be of good courage, therefore, and act under my conduct proceed on this thy journey, for the marriage thou goest so zealously about shall be consummated. And thou shalt have children of good characters, but their multitude shall be innumerable; and they shall leave what they have to a still more numerous posterity, to whom, and to whose posterity, I give the dominion of all the land, and their posterity shall fill the entire earth."

3. Now Jacob, when he had this prediction and such great benefit bestowed upon him, made haste to go; but do not fear any danger, nor be afraid of the many labors thou must undergo, for by my providence I will direct thee what thou art to do in the time present, and still much more in the time to come.

4. So he proceeded on his journey to Mesopotamia; and at length came to Haran; and meeting the shepherds of the field, who were shepherds, the wild beasts ran up, and maidens sitting about a certain well, he stayed with them, as wanting water to drink; and beginning to discourse with them, he asked them whether they knew such a one as Laban? and whether he was still alive? Now they all said that they knew him, for he was not so inconsiderable a person as to be unknown to any of them; and that his daughter fed her father's flock together with them; and that indeed they wondered that she was not already married by him; and that they might learn more exactly whatever thou desirest to know about that family. While they were saying this the damsel came, and the other shepherds went down along with her. Then they showed her Jacob, and told her that he was a stranger, who came to inquire about her father's affairs. But she, as pleased, after the custom of children, with Jacob's coming, asked him who he was? and if he was come to them? and if it was he that lacked him? She also wished it might be in their power to supply the wants he came about.

5. But Jacob was quite overcome, not so much by their kind speech, as by that affection which might arise thence, as by his love to the damsel, and his surprise at her beauty, which was so flourishing as few of the women of that age could vie with. He said them, "There is a relation between thee and me, no need to know who I am, for I am the son of Laban; for Abraham was the son of Terah, as well as Haran and Nahor. Of the last of whom, Nahor, Bethuel thy grandfather was the son; Isaac my father was the son of Abraham and of Sarah, who was the daughter of Haran. But there is a nearer and later cement of mutual kindred which we hear to one another, for my mother Rebeka was sister to La-

6. When she had said thus, she brought him to Laban; and being owned by his uncle, he was secure himself as being among his friends; and he brought a great deal of pleasure to them by his unexpected coming. Laban, indeed, was informed inward Laban told him, that he could not express in words the joy he had at his coming; but still he inquired of him the occasion of his coming, and why he left his aged father and mother when they wanted his care more of the world if that he would afford him all the assistance he wanted. Then Jacob gave him an account of the whole occasion of his journey, and told him, "That Isaac had two sons that were twins, himself and Esau; who, because he failed of his father's prayers, which by his mother's wisdom were put up for him, sought to kill him, as deprived of the kingdom which was to be given him..."
of God, and of the blessings for which their father prayed: and that this was the occasion of his coming hither, as his mother had commanded him to do; for we are all (says he) brethren one to another; but our mother esteems an alliance with you more than she is one with the families of the country; so I look upon yourself and God to be the supporters of my travels, and think myself safe in my present circumstances."

V. Now Laban promised to treat him with great liberality in accordance with his ancestors, and particularly for the sake of his mother, towards whom, he said, he would show his kindness, even though she was absent, by taking care of him; for he assured him he would make him the heir of his father's goods, giving him authority sufficient for that purpose; and when he should have a mind to return to his parents, he would send him back with presents, and this in as honorable a manner as the nearness of their relation should require. This Jacob heard gladly; and said he would willingly, and with pleasure, undergo any sort of pains while he tarried with him, but desired Rachel to wife, as the reward of those pains, who was not only on other accounts beloved by him, but more, because she was the means of his coming to him; for he said he was forced by the love of the damsel to make this proposal. Laban was well pleased with this agreement, and promised to present to his dawm as a gift, as not desirous to meet with any better son-in-law; and said he would do this if he would stay with him some time, for he was not willing to send his daughter to be among the Canaanites, for he knew that the alliance she had made already by marrying his sister there. And when Jacob had given his consent to this, he agreed to stay seven years; for so many years he had resolved to serve his father-in-law, that having given his consent to his own advantage, he might be better known what sort of a man he was. And Jacob, accepting of his terms, after the time was over, he made the wedding feast; and when it was night, without Jacob's perceiving it, he put his other daughter into bed to him, which was both the elder than Rachel, and of no comely countenance. Jacob lay with her that night, as being both in drink and in the dark. However, when it was day, he knew what had been done to him; and ran to point it out to his brother, who being still more foolishly reasoning with him; who asked pardon for that necessity which forced him to do what he did; for he did not give him Lea out of any ill design, but as overpowered by the necessity; and not withstanding this, nothing should hinder him from marrying Rachel; but that when he had served another seven years, he would give him her whom he loved. Jacob submitted to this condition, for his love to the damsel did not permit him to do otherwise; and when another seven years were gone, he took Rachel to wife.

8. Now each of these had handmaids, by their father's donation, Zilpha was handmaid to Lea, and Bilhah to Rachel, by no means slaves, but however subject to their mistresses. Now Lea was solely troubled at her husband's love to her sister, and she expected she should be better engaged if she bore him children. So she treated God peremptorily; and when she had borne a son, and her husband was on that account better reconciled to her, she named her son Reb, because God had mercy upon her in giving her the son for that in her estimation of the name. After some time she bare three more sons; Simeon, which name signifies that God had hearkened to her prayer. Then she bare Levi, the confirmer of their friendship. After him was born Judah; and Rachel, fearing lest the fruitfulness of her sister should make herself enjoy a lesser share of Jacob's affections, put to bed to him her handmaid Bilha, by whom Jacob had Dan. One may infer that this proposal of Rachel's was an ultimate judgment. And after him Nepheleal, as it were unconquerable in stragems, since Rachel tried to conquer the fruitfulness of her sister by this stratagem. Accordingly Lea took the same method, and under a sense of her engagement to her sister's; for she put to bed to him her own handmaid, and Jacob therefore had by Zilpha a son, whose name was Gad, which may be interpreted fortune; and after him Asher, which may be interpreted happy. And after him was born Joseph, by Lea. Now Reuel, the eldest son of Lea, brought apples of mandrakes to his mother. When Rachel saw them, she desired that she would give him apples of mandrakes to eat; but when she refused, and bid her to content that she had deprived her of the benevolence she ought to have had from her husband; Rachel, in order to mitigate her sister's anger, said, she would go to her, and he should lie with her that evening. She accepted of the favor, and Jacob slept with Lea by the favor of Rachel. She bare then these sons, Issachar, denoting one born by hire; and Zabulon, one born by hire; and Naphtali, born by hire; and a daughter Dinah. After some time Rachel had a son, named Joseph, which signified there should be another added to him.

9. Now Jacob fed the flocks of Laban his father; in law all this time, being twenty years, after which he desired leave of his father-in-law to take his wives and go home; but when his father-in-law would not give him leave, he contrived to do it secretly. He made trial therefore of the flocks of Laban, to know the disposition of each of them. When they appeared glad and approved of it, Rachel took along with her the images of the gods, which, according to their custom, they carried with them from one country to another, and took away together with her sister. The children also of them both, and the handmaidens, and what possessions they had, went along with them. Jacob also drove away half the cattle, without letting Laban know of it beforehand. But the reason why Rachel took the images of the gods, although Jacob had taught her to despise such worship of those gods, was this, that in case they were pursued, and taken by her father, she might have recourse to these images in order to obtain his pardon.

10. But Laban, after one day's time, being acquainted with Jacob's and his daughters' depart names, and the times of their several births in the intervals here assigned their several excellent characters; their several faults and repentance; the several accidents of their lives, with their several prophecies at their deaths, see the testaments of these twelve patriarchs, still preserved at large in the Author. Rec, part 1, ch. viii.

are, was much troubled, and pursued after them, leading a band of men with him; and on the seventh day overtook them, and found them resting on a certain hill; and then, indeed, he did not meddle with him, for it was evenstrife; but God stood by him in a dream, and warned him to take his son with him, and his brother, and some of his father's household, in a peaceable manner; and not to venture upon any thing rashly, or in wrath to them, but to make a league with Jacob. And he told him, that if he desired them to come with him, he would go back with him, and take them, if it was a hostile manner, he would himself insist with them. When Laban had been thus forewarned by God, he called Jacob to him the next day, in order to treat with him, and showed him what Jacob had done, and what he had not done; and took him, or made him come, so confidantly to him, and began to accuse him, alleging that he had entreated him when he was poor, and in want of all things, and had given him plenty of all things—which he had; "For," said he, "I have not taken thy daughters to wife in marriage, and supposed that thy kindness to me would be greater than before; but thou hast had no regard either of thy own mother's relation to me, nor to the affinity now newly contracted between me and the households to which those wives were to be married; nor to those children of whom I am the grandfather. Thou hast treated me as an enemy, by driving away my cattle; and by persons that are not my men, and that they are not cowherds; and by carrying home those sacred paternal images which were worshipped by my forefathers, and have been honored with the like worship which they paid them, by myself. I have not taken from thee, thou art my kinsman, and my sister's son, and the husband of my daughters, and was hospitably treated by me, and didst eat at my table." When Laban had said this, Jacob made his defence: "That he had not gone out of his house to those who had imprinted the love of his native country, but that he had made it natural to all men; and that therefore it was but reasonable that, after so long a time, he should go back to it. But as to the prayer of whose driving away thou accusest me, if any other person were the arbiter, thou wouldst be found in the wrong; for instead of those thanks I ought to have had from thee, for so fair keeping, and for such treaties, that is how it is that thou art unjustly angry with me, because I have taken, and have with me, a small portion of them? But then, as to thy daughters, take notice, that it is not through any evil practises of mine, but that his heart had wandered from his own home, but from that just affection which wives naturally have to their husbands. They follow, therefore, not so properly myself as their own children." And thus far of his apology was made, in order to clear himself of having acted unjustly. To which he added his own complaint and accusation of Laban; saying, "While I was thy sister's son, and thou hast given me thy daughters in marriage, thou hast worn me out with thy hard service, and with that exacting which I had under them. That indeed which was required in order to marry-thy daughters, hard as it was, I own, to have been tolerable; but as to the service, and thee to thee, after the marriages, they were worse, and such indeed as an enemy would have avoided." For certainly Laban had used Jacob very ill; for when he saw that God was assisting to Jacob in all that he designed concerning his possessions, he did not administer justice to him, but said he would give him to them the next year, because of his envious him the multitude of his possessions. He promised him as before, because he thought such an increase was not to be expected; but when it appeared to be fact, he deceived him.

11. But then, as to the sacred images which he bid him search for them; and when Laban accepted of the offer, Rachel being informed of it, put those images into that camel's saddle on which she rode, and caused them to be found. Which natural purgation hindered her rising up; so Laban left off searching any further, not supposing that his daughter in such circumstances would appear, in order to the searching thereof. So he made a league with Jacob, and bound by it oaths, that as soon as he should bear him any malice on account of what had happened; and Jacob made the like league, and promised to love Laban's daughters. And these three leagues were confirmed with them, in which they made upon certain mountains, whereon they erected a pillar in the form of an altar; whence that hill is called Gilgal; and from thence they call that land the land of Gilgal at this day. Now when they had feasted after the making of the league, Laban returned home.

CHAP. XX.

Concerning the Meeting of Jacob and Esau.

1. Now as Jacob was proceeding on his journey to the land of Canaan, and is appeared to him, and suggested to him good hope of his future safety and fortune could make his hands not to be the means of Camp of God. And being desirous of knowing what his brother's intentions were to be, he sent messengers to give him an exact account of every thing, as being afraid, on account of the enmity between them. He came to a place that were sent to say to Esau, that "Jacob had thought it wrong to live together with him while he was in anger against him, and so had gone out of the country; and that he now, thinking the length of time of his absence was past, and the differences, was returning; that he brought with him his wives and his children, with what possessions he had gotten; and delivered himself, with what was most dear to him, into his hands; and should think it no greatest happiness to partake, together with his brother, of what God had bestowed on him." So these messengers told him this message. Upon which Esau was very glad, and met his brother, with four hundred camels. And Jacob, when he heard that he was coming to meet him with such a number of men, was greatly afraid; however, he committed his hope of deliverance to God; and considered how, in the very presence of his brother, and himself and those that were with him, and overcome his enemies if they attacked him injuriously. He therefore distributed his company into parts; some he sent before the rest, and the others he ordered to come close behind, that so if the first were overpowered, when his brother attacked them, they might have those that followed as a refuge to fly unto. And when he had put his company into this order, he sent some of them beforehand, to carry presents to his brother. The presents were made up of cattle, and a great number of four-footed beasts, of many kinds, such as would be very acceptable to those that received them, on account of their rarity. Those who were sent went at certain intervals of space saunter, that by following thick one after another they might appear to be more numerous, that Esau might remit of his anger on account of these presents. If these were attacked, all the others that were also given to those that were sent to speak gently to him.

2. When Jacob had made these appointments all the day, and night came on, he moved on with his company; and as they were gone over a certain river called Jabob, Jacob was left behind and meeting with an angel, he wrestled with him the angel beginning the struggle; but he prevailed over the angel, who used a voice and spake to him in words, exhorting him to be pleased with what had happened to him, and not to suppose that his victory was a small one, but that he had overcome a divine angel, and to esteem the victory as a sign of great blessings that God had in store for him; and that all his offerings should never fail; and that no man should be too hard for his power. He also commanded him to be called Israel," which in the Hebrew tongue signifies one that struggled with the divine angel.

These promises were made at the prayer of Jacob; for when he perceived him to be the angel of God, he desired he would signify to him what should befall him hereafter. And when the angel had said what is before related, he disappeared; but Jacob was pleased with these things, and named the place Phamuel, which signifies, The face of God. Now when he felt pain by this struggling, upon his broad side, he abstained from eating that sinew himself afterward; and for his sake it is still not eaten by us.

3. When Jacob understood that his brother was near, he ordered his wives to go before, each by herself, with the handmaids, that they might see the actions of the men, as they were fighting, if Esau were so disposed. He then went up to his brother Esau, and bowed down to him, who had no evil design upon him, but saluted him; and asked him about the company of the children and of the women; and desired, when he had understood all he wanted to know about them, that he would go along with him to their father; but Jacob pretending that the cattle were weary, Esau returned to Seir, for there was his place of habitation; he having named the place roughness, from his own hairy roughness.

CHAP. XXI.

Concerning the Violation of Dinah's Chastity.

1. HERSEPNI Jacob came to the place, till this day called Teni, [Succoth] from whence he went to Shechem, which is a city of the Canaanites. Now as the Shechemites were keeping a festival, Dinah, who was the only daughter of Jacob, went into the city and saw the women of that country. But when Shechem, the son of Hamor the king, saw her, he defiled her by violence; and being greatly in love with her, he desired of his father that he would provide a damsel to him for a wife. To which desire his father agreed, and came to Jacob, desiring him to give leave that his son Shechem might, according to law, marry Dinah. But Jacob, not knowing how to deny the desire of one of such great worth, consented; but it was not lawful for him to marry his daughter to a stranger, entreated him to give him leave to have a consultation about what he desired him to do. So the king went away, in hopes that Jacob would grant him this marriage. But Jacob informed his sons o the delatement of their sister, and of the address of Hamor; and desired them to give their advice what they should do. Upon this, the greatest part said nothing, not knowing what advice to give; but Simeon and Levi, the brethren of the damsel, by the advice of their mother, and of the Shechemites upon the action following; it being now the time of a festival, when the Shechemites were employed in ease and feasting, they fell upon the watch, while they were asleep, and coming into the city, slew all the males; as also the king and his son with them; but spared the women. And when they had done this without their father's consent, they brought away their asses.

2. Now while Jacob was astonished at the greatness of this act, and was severely blaming his sons for it, God stood by him, and bid him be of good courage; but to purify his tents, and to offer those sacrifices which he had vowed to offer when he went first into Mesopotamia, and saw his vision. As he was therefore purifying his followers, he lighted upon the gods of Laban, (for he did not before know they were stolen by Rachel,) and he hid them in the earth under an oak in Shechem. And departing thence, he offered sacrifice at Bethel, the place where he saw his dream, when he went first into Mesopotamia.

3. But when he was gone thence, and was come over against Ephraim, he there married Rachel, who died in childbed. She was the only one of Jacob's kindred that had not the honor of burial at Hebron. And when he had mourned for her a great while, he called the son that was born of her Benjamin, because of the sorrows the mother had with him. These are all the children of Jacob, twelve males, and one female. Of them eight were legitimate, viz. six of Lea, and two of Rachel, and four were of the handmaids, two of each; all whose names have been set down already.

CHAP. XXII.

How Isaac died and was buried in Hebron.

1. FROM thence Jacob came to Hebron, a city situate among the Canaanites; and there it was that Isaac lived; and so they lived together for a little while; for as for Rebekah, Jacob did not first love her. Isaac therefore married Keturah, being come of his son, and was buried by his sons with his wife, in Hebron, where they had a monument belonging to them from their forefathers. Now Isaac was a man who was beloved of God and much respected; and when he was dead, it was rendered by God, after Abraham his father, and lived to be exceeding old; for when he had lived virtuously one hundred and eighty-five years, he then died.

*Perhaps this may be the proper meaning of the word Israel by the present and the old Jerusalem analogy of the Hebrew tongue. In the meaning, was agnized that the Hebrews of the first century in Egypt and elsewhere interpreted Je-ro-rael, to be a man seeing God, as is evident from the fragment forerited.
† Of this slaughter of the Shechemites by Simon and Levi, see Author. Rec. part 1, p. 768, 418, 429–439. But why Josephus has omitted the circumcion of these Shechemites, as the occasion of their death; and of Jacob's great grief, as in the Testament of Levi, sect. & 13, we cannot tell.
‡ The name Benjamin signifies the son of my sorrow, and Benjamin the son of days, or one born in the father's old age. Gen. xli. 50; I suspect Josephus's present copies to be here imperfect; and suppose, that in correspondence to other copies, he wrote, that Rachel called her son's name Benjamin; but his father called him Benjamin, Gen. xxxv. 18. As for Benjamin, as commonly explained, the son of the right hand, it makes no sense at all, and seems to be a gross modern error only. The Syrian editor always writes this name truly Benjamin, which probably is here of the same signification, only with the Chaldean termination is, instead of son, in the Hebrew, as we pronounce Cherurin or Cherurim interchangeably. Accordingly both the Testament of Benjamin, sect. 2, p. 401, and Philo de nominum matutinis, p. 303, write the name Benjamin, but explain it not the son of his right hand, but the son of days.
BOOK II.—CHAP. I. II.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS.—FROM THE DEATH OF ISAAC TO THE EXODUS OUT OF EGYPT.

CHAP. I.

How Esau and Jacob, the sons of Isaac, divided their Habitation; and Esau possessed Idumæa, and Jacob Canaan.

1. After the death of Isaac, his sons divided their habitations respectively. Nor did they retain their inheritance, but sold it to him, and settled in the land of Canaan. He called the country by that name from himself, for he was named Adöm; which appellation he got on the following occasion: Ame da, was turning from the toil of hunting very hungry, (it was when he was a child in age,) he lighted on his brother when he was getting ready lentil-pottage for his dinner, which was of a very red color, on which account he was more earnestly lodged for it, and desired him to give some of it to eat. But he made advantage of his brother's hunger, and forced him to resign up to him his birthright, and he, being pinched with famine, resigned it up to him, under an oath. Whence it came, that on account of the redness of this potage, he was, in way of jest, by his contemporaries called Adöm, for the Hebrews call what is red 'Adöm; and this was the name given to this country; but the Greeks gave it a more agreeable pronunciation, and named it Idumæa.

2. He became the father of five sons; of whom Jacob and Joseph, and Coreus, were great men, whose name was Alibamos; but of the rest, Alphaz was born to him by Ada, and Raguel by Basemath; and these were the sons of Esau. Alphaz had five legitimate sons, Thehan, Omer, Shaphub, Gerehus, and Kezron; for Ame da, was not legitimate, but by a concubine, whose name was Thama. These dwelt in that part of Idumæa which was called Gebalitis, and that denominates from Amalek, Amalakin; for Idumæa was the name of the whole tribe, and the name of the whole, while in its several parts it kept the names of its peculiar inhabitants.

CHAP. II.

How Joseph, the youngest of Jacob's Sons, was loved by his Brethren, whereas his Dreams had forshadowed his Future Happiness.

1. It happened that Jacob came to so great happiness as rarely any other person had arrived at. He was richer than the rest of the inhabitants of that country; and was at once envied and admired for such virtuous sons; for they were deficient in nothing, but were of great souls, both for laboring with their hands and enduring of toil; and shrewd also in understanding. And God exercised such a providence over him, and such a care of his happiness, as to bring him the greatest blessings, even out of what appeared to be the most sorrowful conditions; and to make him the cause of our father's departure out of Egypt, him and his posterity. The occasion was this: When Jacob had this son Joseph born to him by Rachel, his father loved him above the rest of his sons, both because of the beauty of his body and the virtues of his mind, for he excelled the rest in prudence. This affection of his father excited the envy and the hatred of his brethren; but did also his dreams which he saw, and related to his father and to them, which foretold his future happiness, being usual with mankind to envy their very nearest relations such their prosperity. Now the visions which Joseph saw in his sleep were these: 2. When they were in the middle of harvest, and Joseph was sent by his father with his brethren to gather the fruits of the earth, he saw a dream in a dream; but greatly exceeding the accustomed appearances that come when we go asleep; which, when he was got up, he told his brethren, that they might judge what it portended. He said, "He saw the last night that his wheat stood still in the place where he cast it, but that their sheaves ran to bow down to it, as servants bow down to their masters." But as soon as they perceived the vision foretold that he should obtain power and great wealth, and that his power should be in opposition to them, they gave no interpretation of it to Joseph, as if the dream were not by them understood; but they prayed that no part of what they suspected to be its meaning might come to pass; and they bore a still greater hatred to him on that account.

3. But God, in opposition to their envy, sent a second vision to Joseph, which was much more wonderful than the former; for it seemed to him that the sun would rise on the earth and blind the rest of the stars, and come down to the earth, and bow down to him. He told this vision to his father, and that, as suspecting nothing of ill-will from his brethren, when they were there also, and did not interpret it, he began to signify. Now Jacob was pleased with the dream; for, considering the prediction in his mind, and shrewdly and wisely guessing at its meaning, he rejoiced at the great things thereby signified. Because it declared the future happiness of his son; and that, by the blessing of God, the time should come when he should be honored, and thought worthy of worship by his parents and brethren, even giving the nations and sun and moon to be like his mother and father; the former as she that gave increase and nourishment to all things, and the latter, he that gave form and other powers to them; and that the stars were like his brethren, since they were eleven in number, as were the stars that receive their power from the sun and moon. And thus did Jacob make a judgment of this vision, and that a shrewd one also. But these interpretations caused very great grief to Joseph's brethren; and they were affected to him hereupon as if he were a certain stranger, that was to have those good things which were signified by the dreams, and not as one that was a brother, with whom it was probable they should be joint partakers; and as they had been partners in the same parentage, so should they be of the same happiness. They also resolved to kill the lad; and having fully ratified that intention of theirs, as soon as their collection of the fruits was over, they went to Shechem which is a country good for feeding of cattle, and for pasturage; there they fed their flocks, without acquaintance with his father in the mean time therewith: whereupon he had melancholy suspicions about them, as being ignorant of his son's condition, and receiving no messenger from the flocks that could inform him of the true state they were in; so because he was in great fear about them, he sent Joseph to the flockers, to learn the circumstances his brethren were in, and to bring him word how they did How Joseph was thus sold by his Brethren into Egypt, by Reason of their Hatred to him; and how he was famous among the Egyptians, and had his Brethren under his Power.

1. Now these brethren rejoiced as soon as they saw their brother coming to them, not indeed as at the presence of a near relation, or at the presence of one sent by their father, but as at the presence of an enemy, and one that had come to destroy them. And they took away his shirt, and rent his hands; and they already resolved to kill him, and not let slip the opportunity that lay before them. But when Reuben, the eldest of them, saw them thus disposed, and that they had agreed together to execute their purpose, he tried to restrain them, showing them the heinous enterprise they were going about, and the horrid nature of it; that this action would appear wicked in the sight of God, and impious before men, even though they should kill one not related to them, but much more flagitious and detestable to appear to have slain their own brother; by which act the father must be treated unjustly in the regard of the dead and the mourner also be in perplexity while she laments that her son is taken away from her, and this not in a natural way neither. So he entreated them to have a regard to their own consciences, and wisely to consider what the grief would be to them upon the death of so good a child, and their youngest brother; that they would also fear God, who was already both a spectator and a witness of the designs they had against their brother; that he would lose them if they acted thus, and brand them with the crime of murder, as a reproach to this world, and yielded to repentance and amendment; but in case they proceeded to do the fact, all sorts of punishments would overtake them from God for this murder of their brother, since they polluted his holy name, which was ever present, and which did not overlook what was done, either in deserts or in cities; for wheresoever a man is, there ought he to suppose that God is also. He told them farther, that their consciences would be their enemies, if they attempted to go through so wicked an enterprise, which they can never avoid, whether it be a good conscience, or whether it be such a one as they will have within themselves, that they have killed their brother. He also added this besides to what he had before said, that it was not a righteous thing to kill a brother, though he had injured them; that it is a good thing to forgive the actions of such near friends, even in things which might be enjoyed, and not have them punished; but that they were going to kill Joseph, who had been guilty of nothing that was ill towards them, in whose case the infirmity of his small age should rather procure him mercy, and move them to unite together in the care of his preservation. That the cause of killing him made the act itself much worse, while they determined to take him off out of envy at his future prosperity; an equal share of which they would naturally feel in shutting him out, since they were to him not strangers, but the nearest relations, for they might reckon upon what God bestowed upon Joseph as their own; and therefore they stood in the habit of the anger of God would for this cause be more severe upon them, if they slew him who was judged by God to be worthy of that prosperity which was to be hoped for; and while by murdering him they made it impossible for God to bestow it upon him.

2. Reuben said these, and many other things, and used entreaties to them, and thereby endeavored to secure them from the murder of their brother. But when he saw that his discourse had not mollified them at all, and that they made haste to do the fact, he advised them to alleviate the wickedness they were going about in the manner of Joseph off; for as he had exhor-ted them first, when they were going to revenge themselves, to be dissuaded from doing it; so, since the sentence for killing their brother had prevailed, he said that they would not how ever free their hands if they did not rob him, and persuade to follow his present advice, which would include what they were so eager about, but was not so very bad, but in the distress they were in, of a lighter nature. He begged of them therefore not to cast therefore be their brother into the pit, but to cast him into the pit that was hard by, and so let him die: by which they would gain so much that they would not need their own hands with their brother. To which the persons there agreed; so Reuben took the lad, and tied him with a cord, and let him down gently into the pit, for it had no water at all in it; who, when he had done this, went his way to seek for such pastureage as was fit for his flock.

3. But Judah, being one of Jacob's sons also, seeing some Arabians, of the posterity of Issachar, carrying spices and Syrian wares out of the land of Gilead to the Egyptians, after Reuben was returned to them from his brethren, and had sold Joseph out of the pit, and sold him to the Arabians; for if he should die among strangers a great way off, they should be freed from this barbarous action.—This, therefore, was resolved on; so they drew Joseph up of the pit, and sold him to the Arabians for twenty pounds. He was now seventeen years old. But Reuben, coming in the night-time to the pit, resolved to save Joseph, without the privity of his brethren; and when upon his return told it to his brothers, they were very sorry, that they had destroyed him after he was gone; of which he complained to his brethren; but when they had told him what they had done, Reuben left off his mourning for his brother.

4. When Joseph's brethren had done this to him, they considered what they should do to escape the suspicions of their father. Now they had taken away from Joseph the coat which he had on his body; so they contrived to throw him down a pit, let him down into the pit; so they thought proper to tear that coat to pieces, and to dip it into goat's blood, and then to carry it and show it to their father, that he might believe he was destroyed by wild beasts. And by this wile he was brought to the old man, but this not till what had happened to his son had already come to his knowledge. Then they said that they had not seen Joseph, nor knew what mishap had befallen him, but that they had found his coat bloody and torn to pieces, whence they had a suspicion that he had fallen among wild beasts, and so perished, if that was the case he had on when he came from home. Now Jacob had believed his sons; and when he asked them what had become of Joseph, they said they had put him among the wild beasts; but now they lied, and said that the coat was a captive; but now he laid aside that notion, and supposed that this coat was an evident argument that he was dead, for he well remembered that Joseph was the first son: so he came home and lamented the lad as now dead, and as if he had been the father of no more than one, without taking any comfort in the rest; and so he was also affected with his grief, and came not to meet with Joseph; but when he also conjectured that Joseph was destroyed by wild beasts. He sat down also clothed... have still greater advantages; but that he must look for revenge and hatred from her; in case he rejected her desires, and preferred the reputation of chastity before his mistress; for that she would gain nothing by such procedure, because she would then become his accuser and would falsely pretend to her husband that he attempted to violate her chastity; and that Potiphar would hearken to her words rather than to his let his be over so agreeable to the truth.

4. When the man had said thus, and even with tears in her eyes, neither did pity dissuade Joseph from his chastity, nor did she in any way seek to obtain a change of his condition, but he demonstrated that wisdom was able to govern the envious passions of life, in such as have it in reality, and do not only put it on for a show, under a present state of prosperity.

ing when thou wouldst be absent. So that it now is clear, that his modesty, as it appeared to be formerly, was only because of the restraint he was in out of fear of thee, but that he was not really of a good disposition. This has been occupied by his being advanced to honor beyond what he deserved, and what he hoped for, insomuch that he concluded, that he who was deemed fit to be trusted with the estate, the government of that family, and was preferred above the eldest servants, might be allowed to touch thy wife also." Thus when she had ended her discourse she showed him her garment, as if he then left it with her when he was tempted to force her. For Potipher, not being able to disbelieve what his wife's tears showed, and what his wife said and what he saw himself, and being seduced by his love to his wife, did not set himself seduced about the examination of the truth, but taking that his wife was a modest woman, and condemning Joseph as a wicked man, he threw him into the malefactors' prison; and had a still higher opinion of his wife, and bare her witness, that she was a woman of becoming modesty and chastity.

CHAP. V.

What things befell Joseph in Prison.

1. Now, Joseph, commending all his affairs to God, did not betake himself to make his defence, nor to give an account of the circumstances of the fact, but silently underwent the bonds and dishonor he was in, firmly believing that God, who knew the cause of his affliction, and the truth of the fact, would be more powerful than those that inflicted the punishments upon him; a proof of whose providence he quickly received: for the keeper of the prison, taking notice of his care and fidelity in the affairs he had set him about, and the dignity of his countenance, relaxed his bonds, and thereby made his heavy calamity lighter than he expected, and permitted him to make use of a diet better than that of the rest of the prisoners. Now, his fellow-prisoners, when their hard labors were over, fell to discussing one among another, as is usual in such as are equal sufferers, and to inquire of one another, what were the occasions of their being condemned to a prison. Among them the king's cupbearer, and one that had been respected by him, was put in bonds upon the king's anger at some mischiefs he committed. This man was more familiar with Joseph, and upon his observing that Joseph had a better understanding than the rest had, he told him of a dream he had, and desired he would interpret it to him; complaining that besides the afflictions he underwent from the king, God did also add to him trouble from his dreams.

2. He therefore said, That in his sleep he saw three clusters of grapes hanging upon three branches of a vine, large already and ripe for gathering, and that he squeezed them into a cup, which the king held in his hand, and when he had strained the wine, he gave it to the king to drink, and as he received it from him with a pleasant countenance. This, he said, was what he saw; and he desired Joseph, that if he had any portion of understanding in such matters, he would tell him what this vision foretold; who bid him be of good cheer, and expect to be loosed from bonds in three days' time, because the king desired his service, and was about to restore him to it again; for he let him know that God bestowed the fruit of the vine upon men for good; and put an end to their quarrels, takes away passion and grief out of the minds of them that use it, and makes them cheerful. Thou sayest that thou didst squeeze this wine from three clusters of grapes with thine hands, and that the king received it; know, therefore, that this vision is for thee. For within the present distress, within the same number of days as the branches had whence thou gatheredest thy grapes in thy sleep. However, remember what Prosperity we foretold thee when thou hast found it true by experience, and we, who are in authority, do not overlook us in this prison, wherein thou wilt leave us, when thou art come to the place we have foretold; for we are not in the same prison, but for the sake of our virtue and sobriety are we condemned to the penalty of malefactors, and because we are not willing to injure him that has thus distressed us, though it were for our own pleasure. The cupbearer, however, rejoicing to hear such an interpretation of his dream, and waited the completion of what had been thus showed him beforehand.

3. But another servant there was of the king's, a baker; and was now bound in prison with the cupbearer; he also was in good hope, upon Joseph's interpretation of the other's vision, for he had seen a dream also; and he desired Joseph would tell him what the visions he had seen the night before might mean. They were these that follow: "Methought," says he, "I carried three baskets upon my head, two were full of leves, and the third full of sweet-smelling spices; and they were prepared for kings; but that the fowls came and ate them all up, and had no regard to my attempt to drive them away." And he expected a prediction like to that of the cupbearer. But Joseph, considering the meaning of the thing, told him as he said to him, That he would willingly be an interpreter of good events to him, and not of such as his dream denounced to him; but he told him that he had only three days in all to live, for that the king had invented a story, that on the third day of his return, that he should be crucified and devoured by fowles, while he was not able to help himself. Now, both these dreams had the same several events that Joseph foretold they should have, and this to both the cupbearer and the baker, and when the king solemnized his birthday, he crucified the chief baker, and set the butler free from his bonds, and restored him to his former ministrations.

4. God freed Joseph from his confinement, after he had endured his bonds two years, and had received no assistance from the cupbearer, who did not remember what he had said to him formerly; and God contrived this method of delivering him. Pharaoh the king saw them in his sleep the same evening two visions; and after them had the interpretations of them both given him. He had forgotten the latter, but retained, and did the dreams themselves. Being there troubled at what he had seen, for it seemed to him to be all of a melancholy nature, the next day he called together the wisest men among the Egyptians, desiring to learn from them the interpretation of his dreams. But when they hesitated about them, the king was so much the more disturbed. And now it was that the memory of Joseph, and his skill in dreams, came into the mind of the king's cupbearer, when he saw the costs and their barterance; and when he mentioned Joseph to him, as also the vision he had seen in prison, and how the event proved as he had said; as also, that the chief baker was crucified on the very same day; and that this also befell the man who then possessed the power. If therefore they did not send for him, and not despise him on the score of his misfortunes, thou wilt learn what thy dreams signify. So the king commanded that they should bring Joseph into his presence; and those who received the command came and brought him with them, having taken care of his habit, that it might be decent, as the king had enjoined them to do.

5. But the king took him by the hand; and, "O young man," says he, "for my servant bears witness on my behalf and commends the words of this most skilful person I can consult, with vouchsafe me the same favor which thou bestowdest on this servant of mine, and tell me what events they are which the visions of my dreams foreshadow;—for my spirit is distressed out of fear, nor to flatter me with lying words, or with what may please me, although the truth should be of a melancholy nature. For it seemed to me that, as I walked by the river, I saw kine fat and very large, seven in number, going from the river to the marshes; and another kine, of the same number like them, met them out of the marshes, exceeding lean and ill favored, which ate up the fat and the large kine, and yet were not eaten by the former, and were more blemished with famine. After I had seen this vision I awoke out of my sleep; and being in disorder, and considering with myself what this appearance was to signify, I fell asleep again and saw another dream, which was more distressing than the foregoing, which still did more affright and disturb me: I saw seven ears of corn growing out of one root, having their heads borne down by the weight of the corn; and seven other ears, growing with the fruit which was now ripe, and fit for reaping; and near these I saw seven other ears of corn, meagre and weak for want of rain, which fell to eating and consuming those that were fit for reaping. And these ears, which came upon them in the eighth year of my reign, this misfortune fell upon them when they had no sense of it beforehand; they were all sorely afflicted by it, and came running to the king's gates; and he called upon Joseph, who sold the corn to them, being become confessedly a saviour to the whole multitude of the Egyptians. Nor did he open this market of corn for the people of that country only, but strangers had liberty to buy also, Joseph being willing that all men, who are natural children of the land, and the representatives of their fathers, should have assistance from those that lived in happiness.

6. To which Joseph replied: "This dream," said he, "O king, although seen under two forms, signifies one and the same event of things; for when thou sawest the kine, which is an animal made for the plough and for labor, devoured by the worse kine, and the ears of corn eaten up by the smaller ears, they foretell a famine, and want of the fruits of the earth, for the same number of years, and equal with those when Egypt was in plenty. A part of the harvest of these years will be spent in the same manner of years of scarcity, and that scarcity of necessary provisions will be very difficult to be corrected; as a sign whereof, the ill-favored kine, which eat up the fat and the large kine, shall not be satisfied. But still God foreseeth what is to come upon men, not to grieve them, but that when they know it beforehand, they may by prudence make the actual experience of what is foretold the more tolerable. If thou, therefore, com-

so much as would be sufficient for their food. Accordingly Pharaoh, being surprised at Joseph, not only for his interpretation of the dream, but for the counsel he had given him, intrusted him with dispensing the corn, with power to do what he thought would be for the benefit of the people of Egypt, and for the benefit of the king, as believing that he who first discovered this method of acting would prove the best overseer of it. But Joseph, having received this part of the king, with leave to make use of his seal, and to wear purple, drove in his chariot through all the land of Egypt, and took the corn of the husbandmen, allotting as much to every one as would be sufficient for seed and for food, but without discovering to any one the reason why he did so.

CHAP. VI.

How Joseph, when he was become famous in Egypt, had his Brethren in Subjection.

1. JOSEPH was now grown up to thirty years of age, and enjoyed great honors from the king who called him Fathom Phanarch, out of regard to his prosperity and name, in which the word "phothom" denotes the reveler of secrets. He also married a wife of very high quality; for he married the daughter of Pethphres, one of the priests of Heliopolis, and the name of his wife was Asenath. By her he had children before the scarcity came on, Manasseh, the elder, which signifies forgetful, because his present happiness made him forget his former misfortunes; and Ephraim, which signifies fruitful, because he was restored to the freedom of his forefathers. Now, after Egypt had happily passed over seven years, according to Joseph's interpretation of the dreams, the famine began to come upon them in the eighth year of his reign. This misfortune fell upon them when they had no sense of it beforehand; they were all sorely afflicted by it, and came running to the king's gates; and he called upon Joseph, who sold the corn to them, being become confessedly a saviour to the whole multitude of the Egyptians. Nor did he open this market of corn for the people of that country only, but strangers had liberty to buy also, Joseph being willing that all men, who are natural children of the land, and the representatives of their fathers, should have assistance from those that lived in happiness.

2. Now Jacob also, when he understood that foreigners might come, sent all his sons into Egypt to buy corn; for the land of Canaan was grievously distressed, and all the boundaries of it, by the great misery touched the whole continent. He only retained Benjamin, who was born to him by Rachel, and was of the same mother with Joseph. These sons of Jacob then came into Egypt, and applied themselves to Joseph, wanting to buy corn; for nothing of this kind was done without his approbation, since even then only was the honor that was paid the king himself advantageous to the person that paid it, when they took care to honor Joseph also. Now when he well knew his brethren, they thought nothing of him; for he was but a youth when he left them and was now come to an age so much greater that the lineaments of his face were changed, and he was not known by them; besides this, the greatness of the dignity wherein he appeared suffered them not so much as to suspect it was he. He now made trial what sentiments they had about affairs of the greatest consequence; for he refrained and smote at them. Nor is this a notion peculiar to Joseph, for it is a rule of most of the ancient interpreters, and to other learned men of old time.

1 This entire ignorance of the Egyptians of those poor of famine before they came, told us before as well as here, chap. v. sect. 7, by Josephus, seems to be also of incredible. It is in no other copy that I know of.
sed to sell them corn, and said they were come as spies of the king's affairs; and that they came from several countries, and joined themselves together, and pretended that they were of kin, it not being possible that a private man should breed up so many sons, and those of so great beauty of countenance as they were; such an offer of corn, or children being not obtained by kings themselves. Now this he did in order to discover what concerned his father, and what happened to him after his own departure from him, and as desiring to know what was become of Benjamin his brother; for he was afraid that they had ventured on the like wicked enterprise against him that they had done to himself, and had taken him off also.

3. Now these brethren of his were under distraction and terror, and thought that very great danger hung over them; yet not at all reflecting upon their brother Joseph; and standing firm under the accusations laid against them, they made their defence by Reuben, the eldest of them, who now became their spokesman, "We come not bither," said he, "with any unjust design, nor in order to bring any harm to the king's affairs; we only want to be preserved, as supposing your humanity will receive us bither as a refuge from the miseries which our country labors under." We having heard that you proposed to sell corn, not only to your own countrymen, but to strangers also, and that you determined to allow that corn in order to hide what you had; but, as we are brethren, and of the same common blood, the peculiar lineaments of our faces, and those not so much different from one another, plainly show. Our father's name is Jacob, a Hebrew man, who had twelve sons; and one of those twelve, us, while we were all alive, was a happy family; but when one of our brethren, whose name was Joseph, died, our affairs changed for the worse; for our father could not bear to look upon his son's likeness in form, and we were in affliction, both by the calamity of the death of our brother, and the miserable state of our aged father. We are now therefore come to buy corn, having intrusted the care of our father, and the provision for his family, to Benjamin, our youngest brother; and if thou sendest to our house, thou mayest learn whether we are guilty of the least falsehood in what we say."

But Reuben endeavored to persuade Joseph to have a better opinion of them. But when he had learned from them that Jacob was alive, and that his brother was not destroyed by them, he for the present put them in prison, as though he determined to magnify in form of justice in that case, and then to send them home. They were in prison for two days, and suffered very much. They then sent for Joseph to come and judge of them. And after these things, when his master was 1sa 25:4.

4. Now when Jacob's sons were come into the land of Canaan, they told their father what had happened to them in Egypt, and that they were taken prisoners, and brought to the king; and how they said they were brethren, and had left their eleventh brother with their father, but were not believed; and how they had left Symeon with the governor, until Benjamin should go thither, and bring his brother; and how the truth of what they had said. And they begged of their father to fear nothing, but to send the lad along with them. But Jacob was not pleased with any thing his sons had done, and lie took it at that it fell into ears, and not being willing that they should take notice of him, he retired; and after a while came to them again, and taking Symeon, in order to his being a pledge for his brethren's return, he bid them take the corn they did buy, and go their way home. He also commanded his steward privately to put the money which they had brought with them for the purchase of corn into their sacks, and to dismiss them therewith, who did what he was commanded to do. Yet when the corn they had brought failed them, and when the famine still afflicted them, and necessity forced them, Jacob did [not] still resolve to send Benjamin with his brother to Egypt unless they came with what they had promised. Now, the misery growing every day worse, and his sons begging it of him, he had no other course to take in his present circumstances, but to send Benjamin out by himself; and on other occasions, spake his mind very freely to him: "That it did not become him to be afraid on account of his son, nor to suspect the worst, as he did; for nothing could be done to his son but by the appointment of God, which must also for certain come to pass though he were at home with him; that he ought not to condemn them to such manifest destruction; nor deprive them of that plenty of food they might have if Pharaoh's servants still continued to take care about his son Benjamin, but ought to take care of the preservation of Symeon, lest by attempting to hinder Benjamin's journey, Symeon should perish. He exhorted him not to draw the judgment that he would either bring his son back to him safe, or, together with his, lose his own life." So that Jacob was at length persuaded, and delivered Benjamin to them, with the price of the corn doubled. And the fruits of the land of Canaan, balsam, and rosinc, five parts of here wanting which I have supplied in brackets. And here none have hibberti suspected it ought to be supplied.

after all, asked why we come upon them? as if they knew nothing of the matter; and he told them that they should immediately know it by their punisher at the door. This, and more of the same nature did the servant say, which the steward was too proud to mention to them; but they, being wholly ignorant of any thing here that concerned them, laughed at what he said, and wondered at the abusive language which the steward gave them. They went on in their way for Egypt, endeavoring to mitigate their grief for their present misfortunes, with the hopes of better success hereafter.

8. As soon as they came into Egypt, they were4 surprised; and that was by a sudden fear, for they were accustomed to the hardy as to accuse those who did not before so much as retain the price of their corn, which was found in their sacks, but brought it again, though nobody else knew of any such thing; so far were they from seeking for any just accusation. But still, supposing that a search would be a more sure justification of themselves than their own denial of the fact, they bid him search them, and that if any of them had been guilty of the theft, to punish them all; for, being now conscious to themselves of any crime, they spake with assurance, and, as they thought, without any danger to themselves also. The servants desired that he might be a judge; but, as he said, the punishment should extend to him alone who should be found guilty of the theft. So they made the search; and having searched all the rest, they came last of all to Benjamin, as know\- ing it was he, or so they supposed, they put him into a handsome habit, he suffered him to be with his brethren; at which time Joseph came from his attendance on the king. So they offered him their presents; and upon his putting the quantity of corn which he had in his father's sack, they discovered that they found him well. He, also, upon his discovery that Benjamin was alive, asked whether this was his younger brother, for he had seen him. Whereupon he said he was; he reproached him at the whole. But when his affection to him made him shed tears, he retired, desiring he might not be seen in that plight by his brethren. Then Joseph took the golden cup, which was in the bag of each of them, and in the same order as they used to sit at their father's table. And although Joseph treated them all kindly, yet did he send a mess to Benjamin that was double to what the rest of the guests had fora day; for, said he, he had meant to make him a special favor. 7. Now when after supper they had composed themselves to sleep, Joseph commanded his steward both to give them their measures of corn, and to hide its price again in their sacks; and that withal he should put into Benjamin's sack the golden cup out of which he loved himself to drink. What things he did in order to make trials of his brethren, whether they would stand by Benjamin when he should be accused of having stolen the cup, and that it should be in danger; or whether they would leave him, and depending on their own innocence, go to their father without him. When the servant had done this, he and the others went down, saying nothing of all this, went their way, and took Syme-

on along with them, and had a double cause of joy, both because they had received him again, and because they took back Benjamin to their father, as they had promised. But presently a troop of horsemen encompassed them, and brought forth Joseph's servant, who had put the cup into Benjamin's sack. Upon which unexpected attack of the horsemen they were much disturbed, and said amongst themselves that they were cast upon men who, a little before, had been by their lord thought worthy of an honorable and hospitable reception? They replied by calling them wicked wretches, who had forgot that they were hospitable and kind treatment which Joseph had given them, and did not scruple to be injurious to him, and to carry off that cup out of which he had, in so friendly a manner, drank to them; and also charged them with the more than the danger they should be in if they were taken, in comparison of the unjust gain. Hereupon he threatened that they should be punished; for, though they had escaped the knowledge of him who had been the thief, they had not escaped the knowledge of God, who had gone off with what they had stolen; and, fore we have had the entire use of life, and have a responsibility to our father, and take care of his interests for us, on whose account it is that we make these applications to thee. We beg thou wilt give us those lives, which this wickedness of ours has rendered obnoxious to thy punishment; and this is for the sake of our father, who is not himself wicked, nor does his being our father make us wicked. He is a good man, and not worthy to have such trials of his patience: and now we are absent, he is afflicted with care for us. But if he hear of our death, and that we have been guilty of, but by thy own excellent nature, and take advice of thine own virtue, instead of that wrath thou hast against us; which passion those that otherwise are of a low character indulge, as they do their strength, and that not only on great, but also on very trifling occasions. Overcome, sir, that passion, and be not subdued by it, nor suffer it to slay those that do not otherwise presume upon their own safety, but let it be an accept of it, with thee; be satisfied, this is not the first time that thou wilt bestow it on us, but before, when we came to buy corn, thou afforded us great plenty of food, and gavest us leave to carry so much home to our family as hath been preserved from the famine, that they might be preserved of the Lord, the Father of all, by showing a pious regard to which, in the case of our father, thou wilt appear to honor him who is styled by thee our father, I mean if thou wilt have this pity on our father; upon the consideration that those who are preserved of God, the Father of all, by showing a pious regard to which, in the case of our father, thou wilt appear to honor him who is styled by thee our father, I mean if thou wilt be so merciful as to lose the advantage of that glorious benefaction which they received from thee. This will be an instance of equal favor, though bestowed after a different manner; for thou wilt save those who are in the greatest miseries, and those who may be preserved from death by thy own bounty, those souls which thou didst not suffer to be distressed by famine; it being, indeed, at once a wonderful and a great thing to sustain our lives by corn, and to bestow on us that pardon whereby, now we are distressed, we may continue those lives. And I am ready to suppose that God is willing to afford thee this opportunity of showing thy virtuous disposition by bringing us into the way of it, though it may appear I cannot forgive the injuries that are done to thyself; and mayest be esteemed kind to others, besides those who, on other accounts, stand in need of thy assistance; since it is indeed a right thing to do with those who are in such necessities, to give and not take away, and, therefore, I dare not show ourselves alive to our father without our brother, but here must we partake of one and the same catastrophe of this life. And so we beg of thee, O governor, that if thou considerest that there is no life left, that we may bestow upon thee and finish us together with him, as partners of his crime. I will only leave with thee this one consideration, and then will say no more, viz. that our brother committed this fault when he was young, and not yet of confirmed wisdom in his conduct, and that men naturally forgive such young persons.

I end here, without adding what more I have to say, that in case thou condemnest us, that omission may be supposed to have hurt us, and permitted thee to take the severer side. But in case thou settest us free, that this may be ascribed to thy own goodness, of which thou art inwardly conscious, that thou freest us from condemnation upon those grounds, why may not the same be expected by such as are now about to appear more righteous than we really are, and by representing to thyself more motives for our deliverance than we are able to produce ourselves. If therefore thou resolvest to slay him, and then thou wilt slay me in his stead, and send him back to his father; or if thou pleasest to retain him with thee as a slave, I am fitter to labor for thy of oratory, that lay by him, and which he thought fit to insert on this occasion. See two more such speeches or declamations, Antiq. B. vi. ch. xiv. sect. 4. advantage in the capacity, and, as thou seest, now better provided for, either of those services." So Judas being very willing to undertago any thing whatever for the deliverance of his brother cast himself at Joseph's feet, and earnestly labored to persuade and pacify his anger. All his brethren also fell down before him weeping, and delivering themselves up to destruction for the preservation of the life of Benjamin.

9. But Joseph, as overcome now with his affections, and no longer able to perverso an angry nature, said to his brethren: "Be not, I pray you, afraid that he might make himself known to his brethren when they were alone. And when the rest were gone out, he made himself known to his brethren, and said," I came not to you for your faults and your kindness to our brother; I find you better men than I could have expected from what you contributed about me. Indeed, I did all this to try your love to your brother; so I believe you were not whipt by nature, in what I did to my case, but that all has happened according to God's will, who has hereby procured our enjoyment of what good things we have; and if we continue in a favorable disposition, of what we bounteous, and remove your habitation hither that our father is safe and well, beyond expectation, and I see you so well disposed to your brother, I will no longer remember what guilt you seem to have had about me, but will leave off to hate you that you are not as parents and for your sake and those intentions were frustrated. Go therefore your way, rejoicing in what has happened by the divine providence, and inform your father of it, lest he should be spent with cares for you, and depriving one of the most agreeable part of my solicitude; I mean, lest he should die before he comes into my sight, and enjoys the good things that we now have. Bring therefore with you ear father, and your wives and children, and all your kindred, and I will make your abode in my house for it is not proper that the persons dearest to me should live remote from me, now my affairs are so prosperous, especially when they must endure five more years of famine. When Joseph had made all this known to his brethren, those who were in tears and sorrow. But the generous kindness of their brother seemed to leave among them no room for fear lest they should be punished on account of what they had consulted and acted against him. And they were then feasting. Now the king, as soon as he heard that Joseph's brethren were come to him, was exceeding glad of it, as if it had been a part of his own fortune. Now they became full of corn, and gold and silver, to be conveyed to his father. Now when they had received more of their brother, part to be conveyed to their father, and part as free gifts to every one of them. And they were now having still more than the rest, they departed.

CHAP. VII.
The Removal of Joseph's Father, with all his Family, to him, on account of the Famine.

1. As soon as Jacob came to know, by his sons' returning home, in what state Joseph was, that he had not only escaped death, for which he lived all along in mourning, but that the splendor and happiness, and ruled over Egypt jointly with the king, he entrusted all care almost all his affairs; he did not think any thing he was told to be incredible, considering the greatness of the works of God, and his kindness to him, although that kindness had, for some late times, been interrupted; so he immediately and zealously set upon his journey to him.

2. When he came to the well of the oath, (Beersheba,) he offered sacrifice to God; and being afraid that the happiness there was in Egypt might not continue, he charged his sons that he might make himself known to his brethren when they were alone. And when the rest were gone out, he made himself known to his brethren, and said," I came not to you for your faults and your kindness to our brother; I find you better men than I could have expected from what you contributed about me. Indeed, I did all this to try your love to your brother; so I believe you were not whipt by nature, in what I did to my case, but that all has happened according to God's will, who has hereby procured our enjoyment of what good things we have; and if we continue in a favorable disposition, of what we bounteous, and remove your habitation hither that our father is safe and well, beyond expectation, and I see you so well disposed to your brother, I will no longer remember what guilt you seem to have had about me, but will leave off to hate you that you are not as parents and for your sake and those intentions were frustrated. Go therefore your way, rejoicing in what has happened by the divine providence, and inform your father of it, lest he should be spent with cares for you, and depriving one of the most agreeable part of my solicitude; I mean, lest he should die before he comes into my sight, and enjoys the good things that we now have. Bring therefore with you ear father, and your wives and children, and all your kindred, and I will make your abode in my house for it is not proper that the persons dearest to me should live remote from me, now my affairs are so prosperous, especially when they must endure five more years of famine. When Joseph had made all this known to his brethren, those who were in tears and sorrow. But the generous kindness of their brother seemed to leave among them no room for fear lest they should be punished on account of what they had consulted and acted against him. And they were then feasting. Now the king, as soon as he heard that Joseph's brethren were come to him, was exceeding glad of it, as if it had been a part of his own fortune. Now they became full of corn, and gold and silver, to be conveyed to his father. Now when they had received more of their brother, part to be conveyed to their father, and part as free gifts to every one of them. And they were now having still more than the rest, they departed.

* In all this speech of Judas, we may observe, that Josephus still supposed that death was the punishment of theft in Egypt, in the days of Joseph, though it never was so among the Jews by the law of Moses. was the handmaid of Lea. These had with them, Gad seven, Saphoniah, Angus, Sunis, Azabon, Aern, Eroed, Ariel. Aser had a daughter Sarah, and six male children, whose names were Jomne, Iaun, Isui, Baris, Abar, and Melchiel. If we add these, which are sixteen, to the fifty-four, the former number (seventy-seven) is completed, and the number of the Jacob⁸ not being himself included in that number.

5. When Joseph understood that his father was coming, for Judas his brother was come before him and communicated to him of his approach, he went out to meet him; and they met together at Heropolis. But Jacob almost fainted away at this unexpected and great joy; however, Joseph revived him, being yet not himself able to contain from his affections on his account, in the midst of the pleasure he now had, yet was he not wholly overcome with his passion, as his father was. After this, he desired Jacob to travel on slowly; but he himself took five of his brethren with him, and made haste to the king, to tell him that Jacob and his family were come, which was a joyful hearing to him. He also bid Joseph tell him what sort of life his brethren loved to lead, that he might give them leave to follow the same. Who told him they were good shepherds, and had been used to follow no other employment but this alone. Whereby he provided for them, that they should not be separated, but live in the same place with some of their flocks. He also hereupon, by his provision, that they might be acceptable to the Egyptians, by doing nothing that would be common to them with the Egyptians; for the Egyptians are prohibited to meddle with the flocks of the Hebrews. So they continued.

6. When Jacob was come to the king, and saluted him, and wished all prosperity to his government, Pharaoh asked him how old he now was upon whose answer that he was a hundred and twenty years old, he enquired how long Jacob had the account of the length of his life. And when he had added, that still he had not lived so long as his forefathers, he gave him leave to live with his children in Heropolis; for in that city the king's shepherds had their pastorage.

7. However, the famine increased among the Egyptians; and this heavy judgment grew more oppressive to them, because neither did the river overflow the ground, for it did not rise to its former height, nor was the old God upon it; nor did they indeed make the least provision for themselves, so ignorant were they what was to be done; but Joseph sold them corn for their money. But when they failed the next year, they bought corn with their cattle, and their slaves, and if any of them had a small piece of land, they gave up that to purchase them food, by which means the king became the owner of all their substance; and they were removed some to one place, and some to another, that so the possession of their country might be firmly afforded to the king; excepting the lands of the priests, for their country continued still in their own possession. And in

* All the Greek copies of Josephus have the negative particle here, that Jacob himself was not reckoned one of the seventy souls that came into Egypt; but the old Latin correctly assure us that none of them. It is therefore hardly certain which of these was Josephus's true reading, since the number 70 is made up of without, if we reckon Leah for one, but if she be not reckoned, the number will be seventy, to complete the number.

Josephus thought that the Egyptians held or drank of a thunderbird in the days of Joseph; whereas Bishop Cumberland has shown that they rather hated such Phoenician or Canaanite shepherds. But Josephus has very adequately described the Egyptians of old time. See his Banchonathio, p. 381, 382.

5. Jacob here puts the question, How Josephus could quadruple the population of Egypt in thirteen famine, while the ancient affirm, that it never does naturally rain there? His answer is, that when the ancients deny that it rain in Egypt, they only mean the Upper Egypt above the Delta, which is called Egypt in the strictest sense; but that in the Delta and by consequence in the Lower Egypt adjoining to it it did of old, and still does sometimes. See the note on Antiq. B. ili. c. sect. 6.

Josephus supposes, that Joseph now restored the Egyptians their lands again, upon the payment of a fifth part as tribute. It seems to me rather that the land was now considered as Pharaoh's land, and this fifth part as its rent, to be paid to him, as was their landlord, and they did not consider that the lands were not properly restored, and this fifth part reserved as tribute only, till the days of Sesostris. See Essay on the Old Testament, A.D. 293, sect. 6.

As to this encomium upon Joseph, so preparatory to Jacob's adopting Ephraim and Manasseh into his own family, the reader would perhaps expect more from Josephus here mentions, all our copies of Genesis omit it. We shall, nor do we know when he took it, or whether or not he be his own embellishment only.
2. Joseph also died when he had lived an hundred and ten years: having been a man of admirable virtue, and conducting all his affairs by the rules of reason; and used his authority with moderation, which was the cause of his great felicity among the Egyptians, even when he came from another country, and that in such ill circumstances also as we have already described. At length his brethren died, after they had lived happily in Egypt, and the children of the men of the house of Jacob came up out of Egypt, for so had Joseph commanded, and caused them to be gathered together into the land of Canaan, in order that they might sow him upon ooth. But what became of every one of these men, and by what toils they got the possession of the land of Canaan, shall be shown hereafter, when I have first explained upon what account it was that they left Egypt.

CHAPTER IX.

§ 1. Now it happened that the Egyptians grew delicate and lazy, as to pains-taking, and gave themselves up to other pleasures, and in particular they grew very ill-affectioned towards the Hebrews, as touched with envy at their prosperity: for when they saw how the nation of the Israelites flourished, and were become eminent already in plenty of wealth, which shone out in their house of culture and mass; the natural love of labor, they thought their increase was to their own detriment. And having in length of time forgotten the benefits they had received from Joseph, particularly the crown being now come into their hands, they became very abusive to the Israelites, and contrived many ways of afflicting them; for they enjoined them to cut a great number of channels for the river, and to build walls for their cities and ramparts, that they might restrain the river, and hinder its waters from stagnating, upon its running over its own banks: they set them also to build pyramids,§ and by all this wore them out; and forced them to learn all sorts of mechanical arts, and to according with the future favors which had been given them for four hundred years did they spend under these afflictions; for they strove one against the other which should get the mastery, the Egyptians desiring to destroy the Israelites by these labors, and the Israelites desiring to hold out to the end under them.

2. While the affairs of the Hebrews were in this condition, there was this occasion offered itself to the Egyptians, which made them more solicits for the extinction of our nation. One of those sacred scribes, who are very sagacious in foretelling future events truly, told the king, that about this time there would be a child born to the Israelites, who, if he were reared, could bring Egypt and all dominion into time would be a great enemy to the Israelites; that he would excel all men in virtue, and obtain a glory that would be remembered through all ages. Which thing was so feared by the king, that according to this man's opinion he commanded that they should cast every male child, who was born to the Israelites, into the river, and destroy it; that besides this, the Egyptian midwives should watch the labors of the Hebrew women, and observe what is born, for those were the women who were enjoined to do the office of midwives to them; and by reason of their relation to the king, would not transgress his command. He enjoined also, that if any parents should disobey him, and venture to spare their male children alive, they and their families should be destroyed. This was a very rigorous sentence indeed to those that suffered it, not only as they were deprived of their sons, and whil they were the parents themselves, they were obliged to be subservient to the destruction of their own children, and to tend to the extinction of their nation, while upon the destruction of their children, and their own gradual dissolution, the calamity would become very heavy to their descendants, and this was the ill state they were in. But no one can be too hard for the purpose of God, though he contrive ten thousand subtle devices for that end, for this child, whom the sacred scribe foretold, was brought up by the Egyptian midwives, and was observed appointed by the king; and he that foretold him did not mistake in the consequences of his preservation, which were brought to pass after the manner following.

§ 3. A man was using his name was Amram, one of the nobler sort of the Hebrews, was afraid for his whole nation, lest it should fail, by the want of young men to be brought up hereafter; and was very uneasy at it, his wife being then with child, and he knew not what to do. Hereupon he besought the wise scribe of the Israelites, who had wandered to the temple, and was instructed in his worship, and to afford them deliverance from the miseries they at that time endured, and to render to him, the enemies' hopes of the destruction of their nation. Accordingly God had mercy on him, and was moved by his supplication. He stood by him in his sleep, and exhorted him not to despair of his son, and told him that under his care, and forget his piety towards him, and would always reward them for it, as he had formerly granted his favor to their forefathers, and made them increase from a few, to so great a multitude. He promised him, that when Abraham the father of this people came alone out of Mesopotamia into Canaan, he had been made happy, not only in other respects, but that when his wife was at first barren, she was afterward by him enabled to conceive seed and bare him sons. But left to Isaac also to his posterity the country of Arabia; as also to his sons by Keturah, Trogdolytis; and to Isaac, Canaan. That by my assistance, said he, he did great exploits in war, which, unless you be yourselves impious, you must still remember. For Jacob, he became well known to strangers also much happiness to the Israelites from the roasting of Moses. sect. 3. And as to the great cities they built in Egypt under Pharaoh Setosoros, and of Pharaoh Setosoros's drowning in the Red Sea, see Eunomus on the Old Test. Apoph. p. 230—232.

§ Dr. Pearson says, he who, that, instead of this single prophet or priest of the Egyptians, without a name in Josephes, the Tarum of Jonathan names the two famous antagonists of Moses, James and Jamies. He is at all unlike that it might be one of these who forsook so much misery to the Egyptians, and so by the greatness of that prosperity in which he lived and left to his sons, who came into Egypt with no more than seventy souls, while you are now five hundred thousand and a half, and therefore that I shall provide for you all in common what is for your good, and particularly for myself what shall make thee famous; for that child, out of dread of whose nativity the Egyptians were so terrified that they were not able to resist, shall be this child of thine, and shall be concealed from those who watch to destroy him; and when he is brought up in a surprising way, he shall deliver the Hebrew nation from the distress they were in, under the compulsion of the heathen. His memory shall be famous while the world lasts; and this not only among the Hebrews, but foreigners also. All which shall be the effect of my favor to thee, and to thy posterity; this shall also have such a brother, that he shall himself obtain my priesthood, and his posterity shall have it after him to the end of the world.

4. When the vision had informed him of these things, Amram awaked and went to Jochabed, who was his wife. And now the fear increased upon them, on account of the prediction in Amram's dream; for they were under concern, not only for the child, but on account of the great happiness that was to come to them also. However, the mother's labor was such as afforded a confirmation to what was foretold by God, for it was not known to those that watched her, by the easiness of her pains, and because the throes of her travail fell upon her on the same day, by reason of her violence. And now they nourished the child at home privately for three months; but after that time, Amram, fearing he should be discovered, and, being afraid of the young child's danger, both his and his child should perish, and so he should make the promise of God of none effect, determined rather to trust the safety and care of the child to God, than to depend on his own concealment of him, which he looked upon as a thing uncertain, and whereby both the child so privately to be nourished, and himself, would be in imminent danger; but he believed that God would some way for certain procure the safety of the child, in order to accost it to Jochabed, who was his wife. And now the fear increased upon them, on account of the prediction in Amram's dream; for they were under concern, not only for the child, but on account of the great happiness that was to come to them also. 5. When they had thus determined, they made an ark of bulrushes, after the manner of a cradle, and of a bigness sufficient for an infant to be laid in, without being too small for him, and then daubed it with slime, which would naturally keep out the water from entering between the bulrushes, and put the infant into it, and setting it afloat upon the river, they trusted God to God's protection, as well for his greatness of mind, as for his contempt of difficulties, the best of all the Hebrews, for Abraham was his ancestor of the seventh generation. For Moses was the son of Amram and Jochabed. And the God of their father Levi was the son of Jacob, who was the son of Isaac, who was the son of Abraham. Now Moses's understanding became superior to his age, nay, far beyond that standard; and when he was taught, he discovered a greater quickness of apprehension than was usual at his age, and his actions at that time promised greater, when he should come to the age of a man. God did also give him that tallness, when he was but three years old, which was wonderful for his beauty, there was nobody so unpolite, as when they saw Moses, they were not greatly surprised at the beauty of his countenance; nay, it happened frequently, that those that saw him on the river-side, were obliged to turn again upon seeing the child; that they left what they were about and stood still a great while to look on him, for the beauty of the child was so remarkable and natural to him on many accounts, that it detained the spectators, and made them longer to look upon him.

6. Thurnurius therefore, perceiving him to be so remarkable a child, adopted him for his son, and brought him up, and made him a king man. And when he was now five hundred years old, and had carried Moses to his father, she showed him to him, and said she thought to make him her father's successor, if it should please God she should have legitimate children of her own; and she said she would bring Moses before all the children of a divine form, and of a generous mind; and as I have received him from the bounty of the river, in a wonderful manner, I thought proper to trust the portion of the land of the heathen to him and his children. And when she had said this, she put the infant into her father's hands: so he took him, and hugging him close to his breast: and, on his daughter's account, in a pleasant way, put his dismay upon his head; but Moses threw it down to the ground, and in a piteous mood, he wept for a while, and trod upon it with his feet, which seemed to bring along with it an evil presage concerning the kingdom of Egypt. But when the sacred scribe saw this, (he was the same person who foretold that the Egyptians would be overcome by Moses, if he should proceed according to this kingdom low,) he made a violent attempt to kill him; and crying out in a frightful manner, he said, "This, O king! this child is he of whom God foretold, that if we kill him we shall be in no danger; he himself foretold that by his valor, and that by the same piece of management, Moses would be slain; but those of the Hebrews, that they should escape from the Egyptians, because Moses was to be their general. But Moses, instead of following the prediction of the same thing, by his trampling upon thy government, and treading upon thy disdern. Take him therefore out of the way, and deliver the Egyptians from the fear they are in about him; and destroy the Egyptians, because they have been of being discouraged by him."

But Thermuthus prevented him, and snatched the child away. And the king was not hasty to slay him. God himself, whose providence protected Egyptians, who, in their reception of such education. Yet because if Moses had been slain, there was no one, neither skin or adopted, that had any oracle on his side for preventing the crown of Egypt, and likely to be of great advantage to them, they abstained from killing him.

CHAP. X.
How Moses made War with the Ethiopians.

1. Moses therefore when he was born, and brought up in the foregoing manner, and came to the age of maturity, made his virtue manifest to the Egyptians; and showed, that he was born for a king among men, and that from his infancy he had discerned the value of education. And the occasion he laid hold of was this; the Ethiopians, who are next neighbors to the Egyptians, made an inroad into their country, which they seized upon, and carried off the effects of the Egyptians, who, in their rapine, fought against them, and revenged the affronts they had received from them; but being overcome in battle, some of them were slain, and the rest ran away, and sought refuge in the desert, where they saved themselves, whereupon the Egyptians followed after them in the pursuit, and thinking that it would be a mark of cowardice if they did not subdue all Egypt, they went on to subdue these remote parts of the desert, where they had tasted the sweets of the country, they never left off the prosecution of the war: and as the nearest parts had not courage enough at first to fight with them, they proceeded as far as Memphis, and the sea itself, while not one of the cities were able to oppose them. The Egyptians, under this sad oppression, betook themselves to their oracles and prophecies, and when God had given them this counsel, to make use of Moses the child, who had been under their eyes, who commanded his daughter to produce him, that he might be the general of their army. Upon which, when she had made him swear he would do him no harm, she delivered him to the king, who commanded it should be of advantage to them. She withal reproached the priests who when they had before admonished the Egyptians to kill him, were not ashamed now to own their want of his heart.

2. So Moses, at the persuasion both of Thermuthus and the king himself, cheerfully undertook the business: and the sacred scribes of both nations were glad; those of the Egyptians, because they should have the means of overcoming the Ethiopians by his valor, and that by the same piece of management, Moses would be slain; but those of the Hebrews, that they should escape from the Egyptians, because Moses was to be their general. But Moses, instead of following the prediction of the same thing, by his trampling upon thy government, and treading upon thy disdern. Take him therefore out of the way, and deliver the Egyptians from the fear they are in about him; and destroy the Egyptians, because they have been disderned by him." But Thermuthus prevented him, and snatched the child away. And the king was not hasty to slay him. God himself, whose providence protected Egyptians, who, in their reception of such education. Yet because if Moses had been slain, there was no one, neither skin or adopted, that had any oracle on his side for preventing the crown of Egypt, and likely to be of great advantage to them, they abstained from killing him.

city. However, while Moses was uneasy at the army's lying idle, (for the enemies durst not come to a battle) this second happened: Tharinah was the daughter of the king of the Ethiopians; she happened to see Moses as he led the army near to the walls, and fought with great courage, and admired his conduct, and his undertakings, and believing him to be the author of the Egyptian success, when they had before despaired of recovering their liberty, and to be the occasion of the great danger the Ethiopians were in, when the Egyptians were boasted of their great achievements, she fell deeply in love with him; and upon the prevalency of that passion, sent to him the most faithful of her servants to discourse with him upon their marriage. He thereupon accepted the offer, on condition she would procure the delivering up of the city; and gave her the assurance of an oath to take her to his wife, and that when he had once taken possession of the city, he would not break his oath to her. Neither was the agreement made, but it took effect immediately; and when Moses had cut off the Ethiopians, he gave thanks to God, and consummated his marriage, and led the Egyptians back to their own land.

CHAP. XL

How Moses fled out of Egypt into Midian.

§ 1. Now the Egyptians, after they had been preserved by Moses, entertained a hatred to him, and were very eager in compassing their designs against him, as suspecting that he would take occasion, from his good success, to raise a sedition, to bring about the destruction of the body, and told the king he ought to be slain. The king had also some intentions of himself to the same purpose, and this as well out of envy at his glory, as out of fear of his army, as out of fear of being brought low by his ships; and being instigated by the sacred scriptures, he was ready to undertake to kill Moses. But when he had learned beforehand what plots there were against him, he went away privately; and because the public roads were watched, he took his flight through the deserts, and where his enemies could not suspect he would travel; and though he was destitute of food, he went on, and descried a country suitable to his situation, and seemed to him so happily situated. And when he came to the city of Midian, which lay upon the Red Sea, and was so demarcated from one of Abraham's sons by Keturah, he sat upon a certain rock, and rested himself there after his laborious journey and the affliction he had been in. It was not far from the city; and the time of the day was noon, where he had an occasion offered him by the custom of the country, of doing what recommended his virtue, and afforded him an opportunity of bettering his circumstances.

2. For that country having but little water, the shepherds used to seize on the wells before others came, lest their flocks should want water; and lest it should be spent by others before they came. There were now come therefore to this well seven sisters that were virgins, the daughters of Raguel, a priest, and one thought worthy by the people of the country of great honor; these virgins, who took care of their father's flocks, which sort of work it was customary and very familiar for women to do in the country of the Troglodytes, they came first of all, and drew water out of the well in a quantity sufficient for their flocks into troughs, which were made for the reception of that water. But when the shepherds came upon the maidens, and drove them away, that they might have the command of the water, Moses, thinking it would be an intolerable reproach upon him if he overlooked the young women under unjust oppression, and should suffer the violence of the men to prevail over the right of the maidens, he drove away the men who had a mind to more than their share, and afforded a proper answer to the офисe of the shepherds. In the mean time, Moses took thence a benefit that came from his father, and told him how they had been affronted by the shepherds, and assisted by a stranger, and entreated that he would come with him to the land of Midian, of which Moses was the king; and when Moses came, he told him what testimony his daughters bore to him, that he had assisted them; and that as he admired him for his virtue, he said, that Moses had bestowed such assistance on persons not of that sort, as he done in vain, nor go without a reward. Now the father took it well from his daughters that they were so desirous to reward his benefactor, and bid them bring Moses into his presence, that he might have the benefit of his great achievements, and the enjoyment of those lands; but where they were both able and willing to return the kindness, and even to exceed the measure of his generosity. So he made him his son and gave him one of his daughters, and appointed him to be the superintendent over his cattle, for he of old all the wealth of the barbarians was in those cattle.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning the Burning Bush, and the Rod of Moses.

1. Now Moses, when he had obtained the favor of Jethro, for that was one of the names of Raguel, stayed there, and fed his flock; but some time afterward, taking his station at the mountain called Sinai, he drove his flocks thither to feed them. Now this is the highest of all the mountaintops in this land, or that region; and it was not before fed upon, because of the opinion men had that God dwelt there, the shepherds being afraid to ascend up to it. And here it was that Moses was presented with the bush; for a fire fed upon a thorn-bush; yet did the green leaves and the flowers continue untouched, and the fire did not at all consume the fruit branches, although the flames were great and fierce. Moses was astonished at this strange sight, as it was to him; but he was still more astonished when the fire uttered a voice, and called to him by name, and spake words to him. By which it signified to him how bold he had been in venturing to come into a place whither no man had ever come before, because the place was divine; and advised him to remove a great deal of danger to himself, and to be contented with what he had seen; and though he was not a self-made man, and the offspring of great men, yet that he should not pry any farther: and he foretold to him, that he should have glory and honor among men, by the blessing of God upon him. He also commanded him to go away thence with confidence to Egypt, in order to his being the commander and conductor of the body of the Hebrews, and to his delivering his own people from the injuries they suffered there. "For," said God, "they shall inhabit this happy land which your forefather Abraham inhabited, and shall have the enjoyment of all sorts of good things; and thou, by thy presence, shalt guide them to those good things." But although he promised him, when he had brought the Hebrews out of the land of Egypt, to come to that place, and to offer sacrifices of thanksgiving there. Such were the divine oracles which were delivered out of the fire.

2. But Moses was astonished at what he saw, and much more at what he heard; and he said, "I think it would be an instance of too great madness for me, one of that race, to come to thee, to distrust thy power, since I myself adore it, and know that it has been made manifest to my progenitors: but I am still in doubt how I, who am a private man, and one of no abites, should either persuade my own country-men to leave the country they now inhabit, and go over to a land whither I lead them: or, if they should be persuaded, how can I force them to permit them to depart and augment their own wealth and prosperity by their labours and works they put upon them."

3. But God persuaded him to be courageous on all occasions, and promised to be with him, and to not to lose his hope concerning the saving of men, and in his means, when he was to perform wonders. He bid him also to take a signal of the truth of what he said, by throwing his rod on the water, which, when done, it crept along, and was become a serpent, and rolled itself round in its folds, and erected its head, as ready to ave itself on such as should assault it, after which it became a rod again: as it was before. After this, God bid Moses put his right hand into his bosom: he obeyed, and when he took it out it was white, and in color like to chalk, but afterward it returned to its wonted color again. He also, upon God's command, took some of the water that was near him, and poured it upon the ground, and saw the color was that of blood. Upon the wonder that Moses showed at these signs, God exhorted him to be of good courage, and to be assured that he would be with him, to smite the Egyptians, and that he would make use of those signs in order to obtain belief among all men, that thou art sent by me, and dost all things according to my commands. Accordingly, I enjoin thee to make no more delay, but to make haste, and consider night and day, and not to draw out the time; and so make the slavery of the Hebrews, and their sufferings, to last the longer.

4. Moses having now seen and heard these wonders, that assured him of the truth of these promises of God, had no room left him to dispute there: he entreated him to grant him that power when he should be in Egypt; and besought him to vouchsafe him the knowledge of his own name, and since he had heard and seen him, that he would also tell him his name, that when he offered sacrifice, he might invoke him by such name in his obligations. Whereupon God showed him to him his holy name, which had never been declared, from the creation of the world, being the name which it is not lawful for me to say any more.

Now these signs accomplished Moses, not then only, but always, when he prayed for them of all kinds, and whatever was to be done to the fire in the bush; and believing that God would be a gracious supporter to him, he hoped he should be able to deliver his own nation, and be calamities on the Egyptians.

CHAP. XIII.

You Moses and Aaron returned into Egypt to Pharaoh.

1. So Moses, when he understood that the Pharaoh, in whose reign he fled away, was dead, took leave of Raguel to go to Egypt, for the benefit of his own people: and he took with him Zipporah, the daughter of Raguel, whom he had promised to marry him; his sons Gershom and Elasar, and made haste into Egypt. Now the former of these names, Gersom, in the Hebrew tongue, signifies, that he was in a 'strange land;' and Elasar, that, by the assistance of the Egyptians, they should be saved out of the hands of the Egyptians. Now when they were near the borders, Aaron his brother, by the command of God met him, to whom he declared what had betfallen him at the mountain, and the commands that God had given him. But as they were going forward, the chief men among the Hebrews having learned that they were coming, met them: to whom Moses declared the signs he had seen; and while they could not believe them, he made them see them. So they took courage at these signs, and hoped well of their entire deliverance, as believing now that God took care of their preservation.

2. Since then Moses found that the Egyptians would be obedient to whatsoever he should direct, as they promised to be, and were in love with liberty, he came to the king, who had indeed but lately received the government, and told him how much he was in need of the good of the Egyptians, when they were despaired by the Ethiopians, and their country laid waste by them; and how he had been the commander of their forces, and had labored for them, as if they had been his own people; and he informed him in what danger he had been during that expedition, without having any proper returns made him, as he had deserved. He also informed him distinctly, what things happened to him at mount Sinai, and what he had received there, and what was done by God, in order to assure him of the authority of those commands which he had given him. He also exhorted him not to disbelieve what he had told him, nor to oppose the will of God to Egypt.

3. But when the king derided Moses, he made him in earnest see the signs that were done at mount Sinai. Yet was the king very angry with him, and called him an ill man, who had formerly run away from his kingdom. scrum and now barked with deceitful tricks and wonders, and magical arts, to astonish him. And when he had said this, he commanded the priests to let him see the same wonderful sights, as knowing that the Egyptians were skilful in this kind of learning, and that he was not the only person who knew them, and pretended them to be divine, as also he told him, that, when he brought such wonderful nights before him, he would only be believed to be in a greater measure under the priests threw down their rods, they became serpents. But Moses was not daunted at it; and said, "O king, I do not myself despise the wisdom of the Egyptians, but I am so much superior to them in such arts that these be done by magic arts and tricks, as divine power exceeds the power of man; but I will demonstrate that what I do is not done by craft, or counterfeiting what is not really true, but is the appearance by the providence and power of God." And when he had said this, he cast his rod down upon the ground, and commanded it to turn itself into a serpent. It obeyed him, and went all round, and devoured the rods of the Egyptians, which seemed to be dragons, until it had consumed them all; it then returned to its own form, and Moses took it into his hand again.

used, and were found among what they ate, and what they drank, and came in great numbers upon their beds. There was an intolerable stench and stink arose from them, as they were born, and as they died therein. Now, when the Egyptians were under the oppressions of these plagues, the king ordered Moses to take the Hebrews with him, and be gone. Upon which the whole multitude of the frogs vanished away, and both the land and the river returned to their former natures. But as soon as Pharaoh saw the lands and waters restored to their former state, he kept all this in mind, and could not bear the thought of it, and retained the Hebrews; and, as though he had a mind to try the nature of such judgments, he would not yet suffer Moses and his people to depart, having granted that liberty which was but a moment of fear, than out of any good consideration.

3. Accordingly, God punished his falseness with another plague, added to the former; for there arose out of the bodies of the Egyptians into the country full of varmints, of which, wicked as they were, they miserably perished, as not able to destroy this sort of vermin, either without their waters, with or with ointments. At which terrible judgment, the king of Egypt was in disorder, upon the destruction of his enemies; but so as not to least his people should be destroyed, and that the manner of his death was also reproachful, so that he was forced in part to recover himself from his former reproach, and to give leave for the Hebrews themselves to depart. But when the plague thereof ceased, he thought it proper to require that they should leave their children and wives behind them, as they were sure to return, whereby also he provoked God to be more vehemently angry at him, as if he thought to impose on his providence, and as if it were only Moses, and not God, who punished the Egyptians for the sake of the Hebrews; for he was a man of unbelief, not only in the country full of varmints, of which, wicked as they were, they miserably perished, and the land was desolated for its cultivation, but if any thing escaped destruction from them, it was killed by a distemper, which the men underwent also. But when Pharaoh did not even then yield to the will of God; but while he gave leave to the husbands to take their wives with them, yet insisted that the children should be left behind, God presently resolved to punish his wickedness with several sorts of calamities, and which were more than the foregoing which yet had so generally afflicted them: for their bodies had terrible bites, breaking forth with boils, while they were already inwardly consumed; and a great part of the Egyptians perished in this manner. But when the king was not brought to reason by this plague, hail was sent down from heaven; and such hail it was as the climate of Egypt had never suffered before, nor was it like to that which fell in other climates in winter time, but larger than that which falls in the middle of spring to those that dwell in the northern and northwestern regions. This hail broke down the houses, and injured all with it. After this a tribe of locusts consumed the seed which was sown on account of the hail, so that to the Egyptians all the hopes of future fruits of the ground were entirely lost.

1 One would think the forementioned calamities might have been sufficient for one that was only foolish, without wickedness, to make him wise, and to make him sensible what was for his own destruction, see the note on Antiq. B. vii. ch. ix. sect. 6.

As to the winter or spring hail near Egypt and Judæa, see the like on thunder and lightning there, in the note on Antiq. B. vii. ch. x. sect. 6.

§ 1. So the Hebrews went out of Egypt, while the Egyptians wept, and repented that they had treated them so hardly. Now they took their journey by the land of the Jordan, where Moses spake to them to offer sacrifices to God of those cattle; and the time being prolonged on this account, a thick darkness, without the least light, spread itself over the Egyptians, whereby their sight being obliterated, and the air being thick with the thickness of the air, they died miserably, and under a terror lest they should be swallowed up by the dark cloud. Besides this, when the darkness, after three days and as many nights, was dispelled, and when Pharaoh did not still repeat, and let the Hebrews go, Moses came to him and said: "How long wilt thou be disobedient to the command of God? for he enjoins thee to let the Hebrews go; nor is there any other way of being freed to thee, than you are under, unless you do so." But the king was angry at what he said, and threatened to cut off his head, if he came any more to trouble him about these matters. Hereupon Moses said, he would be content to propose one thing, that he himself, together with the principal men among the Egyptians, should desire the Hebrews to go away. So when Moses had said this, he let him off his head.

6. But when God had signified, that with one more plague he would compel the Egyptians to let the Hebrews go, he commanded Moses to tell the people, that they should have a sacrifice reserved, that they might preserve the flesh of it on the tenth day of the month Xanthicus, against the fourteenth (which month is called by the Egyptians, Pharnuth, and Nisan by the Hebrews; but the Macedonians call it Xanthicus,) and that he should carry away the Hebrews and all they had. Accordingly, he having got the Hebrews ready, and having armed the men into tribes, he kept them together in one place; but when the fourteenth day came, they should offer the sacrifice, and purify their houses with the blood, using branches of hyssop for that purpose; and when they had supped, they burnt the residue. This was done, that they might observe the passover in like manner to this day, and call this festival "Passover," which signifies the feast of the passover, because on that day God passed us over, and saw us from the Egypt to the country of Canaan. At the destruction of the first-born came upon the Egyptians that night, so that many of the Egyptians, who lived near the king's palace, persuaded Pharaoh to let the Hebrews go. Accordingly he called for Moses, and bid them be gone; as signifying, that if once the Hebrews were gone out of the country, Egypt should be freed from its miseries. They also honored the Hebrews with gifts; some in order to get them to depart quickly, and others after, for the fear that they might be punished for their wickedness, and of the breach of those promises they had made to them. As also he led them this way on account of the Philistines, who had quarrelled with them, and hated them of old, so that all means they might not know of their departure, for their country is near to that of Egypt; and thence it was that Moses led them, not along the road that tended to the land of the Philistines, but he was desirous that they should go through the desert, so that after a long journey, and after many afflictions, they might enter upon the land of Canaan.

9 These large presents made to the Israelites, of vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and raiment, were, as Josephus truly calls them, gifts really given them, not lent on condition of being returned, as the translation supposed, nor borrowed of them, Gen. xvi. 14. Exod. xli. 22. xlii. 37, as the same version falsely renders the Hebrew word here used, Exod. xlii. 35, 36. God had ordered the Jews to demand these as their pay and reward, during their long and bitter slavery in Egypt, as amnesties for the lives of the Egyptians, and as the enlargement of their persons, and the purchase of their freedom, from the terror of these terrible judgments, which, had they not met so cease, they had soon been all dead men, as they themselves confess, chap. xlii. 25. Nor was there any sense in borrowing or lending, when the Israelites were finally departing out of the land for ever.

† Why our Masorete copy so groundlessly abridges this account in Exod. xii. 40, as to scripse 400 years to the sole perspiration of the Israelites in Egypt, when it is clear, even by that Masorete chronology elsewhere, as well as from the express text itself, in the Bamartim, Septuagint, and Josephus, that they sojourned in Egypt but half the time; and that by consequence, the other half of their sojournation fell among the Philistines of Canaan, before they came into Egypt, in Hard to say. See Essay on the Old Testament, p. 58, 63.
nann. Another reason of this was, that God had commanded him to bring the people to Mount Sinai, that there they might offer him sacrifices. Now the Egyptians had been taken by the Hebrews, they prepared to fight them, and by their multitude they drove them into a narrow place; for the number that pursued after them was six hundred thousand organized with fifty thousand horsemen, and two hundred thousand footmen, all armed. They also seized on the passages by which they imagined the Hebrews might fly, shutting them up between inaccessible precipices and the sea; for there was another sea (some call it) on either side of mountains that terminated at the sea, which were impassable by reason of their roughness, and obstructed their flight; wherefore they there pressed upon the Hebrews with their army, where the right hand of the mountains was encircled with the sea, which army they placed at the chops of the mountains, that so they might deprive them of any passage into the plain.

4. When the Hebrews, therefore, were neither able to bear up, being thus, as it were, besieged, because they wanted provisions, nor saw any possible way of escaping; and if they should have thought of fighting, they had no weapons, they had destruction. Unless, when they delivered themselves up voluntarily to the Egyptians. So they laid the blame on Moses, and forgot all the signs that had been wrought by God for the recovery of their freedom; and their incredulity tempted them to throw stones at the prophet, while he encouraged them and promised them deliverance; and they resolved that they would deliver themselves up to the Egyptians. So there was sorrow and lamentation among the women and children, who had nothing but destruction before their eyes, while they were encompassed with mountains, the sea, and their enemies, and discerned no way of flying from them. Then, though the multitude looked fearfully at him, did not, however, give over the care of them, but despised all dangers out of his trust in God, who, as he had afforded them the several steps already taken for the recovery of their liberty, which he had foretold them, would not now suffer them to be subdued by their eneemies, to be either made slaves, or be slain by them. And standing in the midst of them, he said to them, as an officer for us, not just, even men, when they have hitherto well managed our aft fs, as if they would not be the same men hereafter; but it is no better than madness at this time to despair of the providence of God, by whom those things have been performed, which he promised, when you expected no such things: I mean, all that I have been concerned in for your deliverance, and escape from slavery. Nay, when we are in the utmost distress, as you see we are, we ought the rather to hope that God will succor us, by whose operation it is that we are now encompassed within this narrow place, that he may deliver us out of such difficulties as are otherwise insurmountable, and in which neither you nor your enemies expect you can be delivered, and may at once demonstrate his own power, and his providence.

*Take the main part of Roland's excellent note here, which greatly illustrates Josephus, and the Scripture, in this history, as follows: "A traveler," says Roland, "whose name was Eneas, when he returned out of Egypt, told us that he went the same way from Egypt to Mount Sinai, which he supposed the Israelites of old traveled when they were commanded by God to go back, Exod. xiv. 9, and to pitch their camp between Migdol and the sea; and that when they were not able to fly under them, there were a city on each side by mountains. He also thought they were even in the same place, as he could reasonably infer, how it might be said that the Israelites were to over us. Nor does God use to give his help in small difficulties to those whom he favors, but in such cases where no one else, or he may not, has the means to help them. Depend therefore upon such a protector as is able to make small things great, and to show that this mighty force against you is nothing but weakness when God is on your side. Egyptians, do not, therefore, despair of being preserved because the sea before, and the mountains behind, afford you no opportunity for flying, for even these mountains, if God so please, may be made plain ground for you, and the sea become dry land." } manifold destruction. But when they saw that their enemies were gone up into the mountain, and that no obstacle or difficulty fell in their journey, they made haste to pursue them, hoping that the sea would be calm for them also. They put their horse foremost, and went down themselves to the sea; and indeed up to this time those were putting on their armor, and therein spending their time, were beforehand with them, and escaped them, and got first over to the land on the other side, without any hurt. Whence the sea began now to become stormy, and the Egyptians pursued them, as hoping no harm would come to them neither: but the Egyptians were not aware that they went into a road made for the Hebrews, and not for others; that this road was given only to the Hebrews, for the destruction of all men of time, who were free from the wickedness of the modern ages, whether it happened by the will of God, or whether it happened of its own accord; while, for the sake of those that accompanied Alexander, king of Macedonia, who yet lived comparatively but a little while ago, the Pamphylia sea retired and afforded them a passage through itself, when they had no other way. Then, seeing that their manner was to destroy the monarchy of the Persians: and this is confessed to be true by all that have written about the actions of Alexander. But as to these events, let every one determine as he pleases.

What a wonder, indeed, was there anything which used to be sent by God upon men, as indications of his wrath, which did not happen at this time, for a dark and dismal night oppressed them. And thus did all these men, who were left that were not slain or drowned, and went over in so short a time, be a messenger of this calamity to the rest of the Egyptians.

BOOK III.
CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF TWO YEARS.—FROM THE EXODUS OUT OF EGYPT TO THE REJECTION OF THAT GENERATION

CHAPTER I.

Hosea Moses, when he had brought the People out of Egypt, led them to mount Sinai, but not till they had suffered much in their Journey.

1. When the Hebrews had obtained such a wonderful deliverance from the tyranny of the Pharaoh, they were in a great trouble to them, for it was entirely a desert, and without all sustenance for them; and also had exceeding little water, so that it not only was not at all sufficient for the men, but not enough to feed the cattle; for it was salt and brackish, and had no moisture that might afford nutriment to the vegetables; so they were forced to travel over this country, as having no other country but this to travel in. They had indeed carried water along with them from the land over which they had travelled before, as their conductor had bidden them: but when that was spent, they were obliged to draw water out of wells, with pails and other instruments, from the bottom of the soil. Moreover, what water they found was bitter, and not fit for drinking, and this in small quantities also. And as they thus travelled, they came late in the evening to a place called Marah, which had this name from the badness of its water, for Mar denotes bitterness. Thither they came afflicted, both by the tediousness of their journey, and by their want of food, for it entirely failed them at that time. Now here was a well, which made a deliverance to them in the place which, although it were not sufficient to satisfy so great an army, did yet afford them some comfort, as found in such desert places; for they heard from those that had been to search, that there was a water there to be found where they travelled farther. Yet was this water bitter, and not fit for men to drink; and not only so, but it was intolerable even to the cattle themselves.

So now how much the people were cast down, and that the occasion of it could not be contradicted, for the people were not in the nature of a complete army of men, who might oppose a manly fortitude to the necessity that distressed them, the multitude of the children, and of the women also, being of too weak capacities to be persuaded by reason, blunted the courage of the men themselves. Moses therefore was in great difficulties, and made every body's calamity to be his own: for they ran all of them to him, and begged of him; the women begged for their infants, and the men for the women, that he would not overlook them, but would procure some way or other for their deliverance. He therefore besought himself to prayer to God, and then changed the face of the present badness, and made it fit for drinking. And when God had granted him that favor, he took the top of a stick that lay down at his feet, and divided it in the middle, and made the section holy. Hereafter let us determine what he should enjoy the next to do; and this not after a remiss or negligent manner. And when they asked, what they were to do in order to have the water changed for the better, he bade the strongest stand in the brook, and they that were next stood there, to draw up water; and told them that when the greatest part was drawn up, the remainder would be fit to drink: so they labored at it till the water was so agitated and purged as to be fit to drink.

And now removing from thence, they came to Elim; which place looked well at a distance, for there was a grove of palm-trees; but when they came near it, it appeared to be a bad place, for the palm-trees were no more than seventy, and they were ill grown and scarce water-trees; it was the want of water, for the country about was all parched, and no moisture sufficient to water them, and make them hopeful and useful, was derived to them from the fountains, which were in number. But these wells were not in a line, but rather than springs, which not breaking out of the ground, nor running over, could not sufficiently water the trees. And when they dug into the sand, they met only to find a few drops of it in their hands, they found it to be useless, on account of its mud. The trees also were too weak to bear fruit, for want of being sufficiently watered and enlivened by the water. So they laid the blame on their conductor, and made heavy complaints against him; and said, that this their miserable state, and the experience they had of adversity, were owing to him, for that they had then journeyed an entire thirty

* Dr. Bernard takes notice here, that this place, Mar, where the waters were bitter, is called by the Syrums and others, and the Sar, that sometimes Marath, all derived from the Hebrew Mar: he also takes notice, that it is called the bitter fountain by Phiny himself; and that, in Deut. xxviii. 30, it remain there four days, and are still bitter, as Thevenot assured us; and that there are also abundance of palm-trees, see his Travels, part i. chap. xxvi. p. 160.

† The additions here to Moses's account of the sweetening of the water at Marath, seem derived from some ancient profane writer; and, as the author also as a rule, less substantive than are usually followed by Josephus. Philo has not a syllable of these additions, nor any other more ancient writer that we know of. Had Josephus written these as antiquities for the use of Jews, he would hardly have given them these very improbable circumstances; but writing to Gentiles, that days, and had spent all the provisions they had brought with them, and meeting with no relief, they were in a very desponding condition. And by fixing their attention upon nothing but their present misfortunes, they were hindered from remembering what deliverances they had received from God, and those by the same hand and wisdom of Moses also; so they were very angry at their conductor, and were zealous in their attempt to stone him, as the direct occasion of their present misery.

4. But Moses for himself, while the multitude were irritated and bitterly set against him, he cheerfully relied on God, and upon the consciousness of the care he had taken of these his own people, and upon the fact that even while they clamored against him, and had stones in their hands in order to despatch him. Now he was of an agreeable presence, and very able to persuade the people by his speeches; accordingly, he began to mitigate their anger, and exhorted them not to be overmindful of their present adversities, lest they should thereby suffer the benefits that had formerly been bestowed on them to slip out of their memories; and he message, to the multitude in their present unseasonable, to cast those great and wonderful favors and gifts, which they had obtained of God out of their minds, but to expect deliverance out of those their present troubles, which the Lord would make by the means of that divine Providence which watched over them; seeing it is probable, that God tries their virtue, and exercises their patience by these things, that he may learn what forbearance they have, and what memory they retain of his former wonderful works in their favor, and whether they will not think of them upon occasion of the miseries they now feel. He told them that God had sent them good men, either in patience, or in remembering what had been successfully done for them, sometimes by contending God and his commands, when by those commands they left the land of Egypt, and sometimes by exhibiting themselves ill to, and him who was the servant of God, and this when he had never deceived them, either in what he said, or had ordered them to do by God's commands. He also put them in mind of all that had happened before them; but the more they thought of this, the more they attempted to detain them, contrary to the command of God; and after what manner the same river was to the others bloody, and as it were so thick as mush, and to the Israelites, but was to them sweet, and fit for drinking, and for passing through the sea, which fied a long way from them, by which very means they were themselves preserved, but saw their enemies destroyed; and that when they were in want of weapons, God gave them plenty of them; and so he recounted all the particular instances, how when they were, in appearance, just going to be destroyed, God had saved them in a surprising manner: that he had still the same power; and that they ought not even now to despair of his providence over them: and accordingly he exhorted them to continue quiet, and to consider that help would not come too late, though it come not immediately, it came not too late, it came not too late. And instead of great misfortunes that they ought to reason thus, that God delays to assist them, not because he has no regard to them, but because he will first try their fortitude, and the pleasure they take in this, that on the contrary, those who have souls great enough to bear want of food, and scarcity of water on its account; or whether they love to be slaves, as cattle are slaves to such as own them, and feed them liberally, but only when it is necessary, to make them more useful in their service. That as for himself, he shall not be so much concerned for his own preservation; for if he die unjustly, he shall not reckon it any affliction, but that he is concerned for them, lest, by casting stones at him, they should be thought to condemn God himself.

5. By this means Moses pacified the people, and restrained them from stoning him, and brought them to repent of what they were going to do. And because he thought the necessity they were under so pressing, that it would be impossible for them to restrain themselves, he thought he ought to apply himself to God by prayer and supplication; and going up to an eminence, he requested of God some succor for the people, and some way of deliverance from the want they were in, because in him, and in him alone, was their hope of salvation: and he desired that he would forgive what necessity had forced the people to do, since such was the nature of mankind, hard to please, and very complaining under adversities. Accordingly, he promised he would take care of them, and afford them the succor they were desirous of. Now when Moses had heard this from God, he came down to the multitude, as they saw him joyful at the promises he had received from God, they changed their sad countenances into gladness. So he placed himself in the midst of them, and told them he came to bring their God's excellent favor to the midst of their present distresses. Accordingly, a little after came a vast number of quails, which is a bird more plentiful in this Arabian gulf than any where else, that flying over the sea, and coming over them, till, weared with its voracious flight, and indeed, as usual flying very near to the earth, they fell down upon the Hebrews, who caught them, and satisfied their hunger with them, and were supplied with all that was needful, whereby God meant to supply them with food. Upon which Moses returned thanks to God for affording him his assistance so suddenly, and sooner than he had promised them.

6. But presently after this first supply of food, he sent them a second: for as Moses was lifting up his hands in prayer, a dew fell down; and Moses, when he found it stick to his hands, supposed this was also come for food from God to the people; but the people knew not what it was, and thought it snowed; and that it was usually fell at that time of the year, he informed them, that this dew did not fall from heaven after the manner they imagined, but came for their preservation in this extremity. So he tasted it, and gave them some of it, that they might be satisfied about what he had told them. They also imitated their conductor, and were pleased with the food, for it was like honey in sweetness and pleasant taste, but like in its body to bdellium, one of the sweet spices, but in bigness equal to coriander-seed. And very earnest they were in gathering it; but after they were enjoined to gather it equally, the measure of a homer for each man every day, because this food should not come in too small a quantity, lest the weaker might not be able to get their share, by reason of the overbearing of the strong men. After this, it was observed that the strong men, when they had gathered more than the measure appointed for their, they had no more than others, but only tired themselves more in gathering it, for they found no more than a homer was necessary. Moreover, he that got by what was superfluous was none at all, it corrupting, both by the worms breeding in it, and by its bitterness. So divine and wonderful a food this was! It also supplied the want of... other sorts of food to those that fed on it. And even now in all that place this manna comes down in rain. According to what Moses then obtained of God, to send it to the people for their sustenance. Now the Hebrews call this food manna; for it parted from the air, in the wilderness, is the asking of a question. What is this? So the Hebrews were very joyful at what was sent them from heaven. Now they made use of this food for forty years, or as long as they were in the wilderness.

1. As soon as they were removed thence, they came to Rephidim, being distressed to the last degree by thirst; and while in the foregoing days they had lit on a few small fountains, but now found none, they being a long way distant from any water, there were in an evil case. They again turned their anger against Moses; but he at first avoided the fury of the multitude, and then betook himself to prayer to God, beseeching him that as he had given them food when they were in the greatest want of it, so he would give them drink, since the favor of giving them food was of no value to them while they had nothing to drink. And God did not delay to give it them; but promised Moses by his prophet to procure for them a fountain, and plenty of water from a place they did not expect any: so he commanded him to smite the rock, which they saw lying there, with his rod, and out of it to receive plenty of water, which they wanted; and they did take care not such should come to them without any labor or pains-taking. When Moses had received this command from God, he came to the people who waited for him, and looked upon him, for they saw already that he was parted from the sight of his eminence. As soon as he was come, he told them that God would deliver them from their present distress, and had granted them an unexpected favor; and that a river should spring out of the rock, their sakes out of the rock. But they were amazed at that hearing, supposing they were of necessity to cut the rock in pieces, now they were distressed by their thirst and by their journey; while Moses, only smiting the rock with his rod, opened a passage, and out of it burst out water, and that in great abundance, and very clear. But they were astonished at this wonderful effect, and, as it were, quenched their thirst with one mouthful of the sweet, pleasant, this sweet water; and such it seemed to be, as might well be expected where God was the donor. They were also in admiration how Moses was honored by God; and they made great advances of service to him for his procuring of this divine providence towards them. Now that Scripture which is laid up in the temple informs us, how God foretold to Moses, that water should in this manner be derived out of the rock.

CHAP. II.
How the Amalekites, and the neighboring Nations, made war with the Hebrews, and were beaten, and lost a great part of their Army.

§ 1. The name of the Hebrews began already to be every where renowned, and rumors about them ran abroad. This made the inhabitants of those countries to be in no small fear. Accordingly, they sent ambassadors to one another, and exhorted one another to defend themselves, and to endeavor to destroy these men. Those that incline to the work to do were such as inhabited Gobolitis and Petra. They were called 'Amalekites, and were the most warlike of the nations that lived therewith; and whose kings exhorted one another, and their neighbors, to go to war with the Hebrews; so that an army of strangers and such a one as had ran away from slavery under the Egyptians, lay in wait to ruin them, which army they were not, in common prudence and regard to their own safety, but ignorant of their number of their strength, and come to be in prosperity, and perhaps attack them first in a hostile manner, as presuming upon our indolence in not attacking them before; and that we ought to avenge our nation's independence, by which they had been in abundance of wilderness, but that this cannot be so well done when they have once laid their hands on our cities, and our goods: that those who endeavor to crush a power in its first rise, are wiser than those who wait to make it strong with their assistance, and of the power and strength, when it is become formidable; for these last seem to be angry only at the flourishing of others, but the former do not leave any nourishment to their enemy, it becomes troublesome to them. After they had sent spies to the neighboring nations, and among one brother, they resolved to attack the Hebrews in battle.

2. These proceedings of the people of these countries occasioned perplexity and trouble to Moses, who expected no such warlike preparations. And when these nations were ready to fight, and the multitude of the Hebrews were obliged to try the fortune of war, they were in a mixed situation; and, in want of all necessities, and yet were to make war with men who were thoroughly well prepared for it. Then therefore it was that Moses began to encourage them, and to exhort them to have a good heart, and rely on God's assistance, by which they had been advanced into a state of freedom, and to hope for victory over those who were ready to fight with them, in order to deprive them of that blessing. That they were to suppose their own army to be strong and full of valor, as in substance, not in number, nor provisions, nor such other conveniences as when men are in possession of, they fight undauntedly: and that they are to judge themselves to have all these advantages in their own hands for the enemy's army to be small, unarm'd, weak, and such as want those advantages which they know must be wanted, when it is God's will that they shall be beaten. And how valuable God's assistance is, they had experienced in abundance of trials; and those such as were more terrible than war, for that is only against men, but these were against famine and thirst: things indeed hard; but in their own nature insuperable; as also against all men's, and the wideness of their space, they afforded them no way of escaping; yet had all these difficulties been conquered by God's gra-

a: a divided or portion allotted to every one. It is uncertain: incline to the latter derivation. This name is called 'angels' food,' Psal. lxviii. 23, and by our Saviour, John vi. 32; and as by Josephus here and elsewhere, Exod. ch. vii. sec. ii. said to be sent the Jews from heaven.

* This rock is there to this day, as the travelers agree, and as it is seen; but it seems difficult to allow that it had not been seen before. However, this food from Heaven is here described to be like bread, and as angel food, a little hard, but it is compared to meat, like to oatmeal, in color like snow, I lined down by God,' Exon. on the Old Testament, p. 252. But as to the derivation of the word 'manna,' whether from Man, which Josephus may have signified, what is it? or from 'mannah;' to divide, is. e. for their own private families, whereas till then they had not any sort of plenty, of even necessary food. The forest-stoned battle, when they had once got it, was also the occasion of their prosperity, not only for the present but for the future ages also; for they not only made slaves of all the enemies, but subdued their minds also; so that this battle was credible to all that dwelt round about them. Moreover, they acquired a vast quantity of riches: for a great deal of silver and gold was left in the enemies' camp; also brazen vessels, which they made into vessels of their use. There were also the soldiers' utensils also that were embroidered, there were of both sorts, that is, of what were weaved, and what were the ornaments of their armor, and other things that served for use in the family and for the furnishing of their rooms: they got also the prey of their cattle, and of whatsoever uses to follow camps when they remove from one place to another. So the Hebrews now valued themselves upon their courage, and claimed great merit for their value; and they perfidiously injured themselves to take pains, by which they deemed every difficulty might be surmounted. Such were the consequences of this battle.

4. On the next day Moses took the dead bodies of the enemies, and gathered together the armor of those that were slain and gave rewards to such as had signalized themselves in the action; and highly commended Joshua, their general, who attended to be employed about the account of the great actions he had done. Nor was any one of the Hebrews slain; but the slain of the enemy's army were too many to be enumerated: so Moses offered sacrifices of thanksgiving to God, and built an altar, which he named, 'the Lord the Conqueror.' He also foretold that the Amalekites should utterly be destroyed; and that hereafter none of them should remain, because they fought against the Hebrews, and that was their wickedness, and in their distress also. Moreover, he refreshed the army with feasting. And thus did they fight this first battle with those that ventured to oppose them, after they were gone out of Egypt. But, when Moses and celebrated this festival for the victory, he permitted the Hebrews to rest for a few days, and then he brought them out after the fight, in order of battle; for they had now many soldiers in light armor. And going great length from the camp, to the wilderness of Sinai, in three months' time after they were removed out of Egypt; at which mountain, as we have before related, the vision of the bush, and the other wonderful appearances had happened.

CHAP. III.

That Moses kindly received his Father-in-Law, Jethro, when he came to him to Mount Sinai.

§ 1. Now when Raguel, Moses' father-in-law, understood in what a prosperous condition his affairs were, he willingly came to meet him; and Moses took Zipporah his wife, and his children, and his father-in-law with his children, and brought them to the wilderness of Sinai, as to him who had been the author and procurer of their deliverance, and their freedom. They lived, till the clergy, instead of hearing their prayers by heart, "read them out of a book, which is, in great measure, inconsistent with such an elevated posture of practice, introduced not only in the church, though the constant use of divine forms of prayer, praise, and thanksgiving, appears to me to have been the practice of God's people, Patriarchs, Jews, and Christians, in all the ages."

* This eminent circumstance, that while Moses' hands were lift up towards heaven, the Israelites prevailed, and while they were let down towards the earth, the Amalekites prevailed, seems to me the only means of preserving, and maintaining, the most seasonable victory; for they not only overcame those that fought against them, but terrified also the neighboring nations, and got great and splendid advantage, which they obtained by their victory; and pleased hath with his cure, that he had offered sacrifice, he made a feast for the multitude near the bush he had formerly seen; which multitude, every one, according to their families, partook of the feast. But Aaron and his family took abundance of meat, as to him who had been the author and procurer of their deliverance, and their freedom. They also praised their conductor, as him by whose virtue it was, that all things had succeeded so well with them. Raguel also, in his eucharisti- cal oration to Moses, made great encomiums upon the multitude; and he could not but admire Moses for his fortitude, and that huma- nity he had showed in the delivery of his friends.

CHAP. IV.

How Raguel suggested to Moses to set Peoples in Order under their Rulers of Thousands, and Rulers of Hundreds, who lived without Order before: and how Moses compiled in all things with his Father-in-law’s Admonition.

1. This next day, as Raguel saw Moses in the midst of a crowd of business, (for he determined the differences of those that referred them to him, every one sitting in a corner, and supposing that they should then only obtain justice if he were the arbitrator; and, those that lost their causes, thought it no harm, while they thought they lost them justly, and not by partiality.) Ra- guel, to the contrary, thought it not his part to judge, but rather not to be as desirous to be any hindrance to such as had a mind to make use of the virtue of their conductor. But afterward he took him to him- self, and told him that he had made him in what he ought to do; and advised him to leave the trouble of lesser causes to others, but himself to take care of the greater, and of the people’s safety, for that certain others of the He- brews might be found that were disposed to do great causes, but that nobody but a Moses could take care of the safety of so many ten thousands. Be not therefore, says he, insensible of thine own virtue, and what thou hast done by ministering unto the people on the people’s petition. Permit therefore, the determination of common causes to be done by others, but dothown reserve thy- self to the attendance on God only; and look out for methods of preserving the multitude from the present distress. Make use of the method I suggest you to as human affairs; and take a review of the army, and appoint chosen rulers over tens of thousands, and then over thousands; then divide them into five hundreds, and again into hundreds, and into fifties; and set rulers over each of them, who may distinguish them into thirty, and keep them in order; and at last num- ber them by twenties and by tens: and let there be no man put over each other, to be dealt with by a nominated from the number of those over whom they are rulers, but these such as the whole mul- titude have tried, and do approve as being good and righteous men: and let these rulers decide the controversies they have with one another. But if any great cause arise, let them bring the cognizance of it before the rulers of a higher dignity; but if any great difficulty arise, that is too hard even for their determination, let them send it to thee. By these means the advantages will be gained: that the Hebrews will have jus- tice done them; and thou wilt be able to attend constantly on God, and procure him to be more favorable.

2. This was the admonition of Raguel; and Moses received his advice very kindly, and acted according to his suggestion. Nor did he conceal his invention of this method, nor pretend to it himself, but informed the multitude who it was that invented it: say, he has named Raguel in the books he wrote as that person who invented this ordering of the people, as thinking it right to give a true testimony to worthy persons, although he might have gotten reputation by charging to himself the invention of other men. Whence we may learn the virtuous disposition of Moses: but of such his disposition, we shall have proper occasion to speak in other places of these books.

CHAP. V

How Moses ascended up to Mount Sinai, and re- ceived Laws from God, and delivered them to the Hebrews.

1. Now Moses called the multitude together and told them he was going from them unto mount Sinai, to converse with God; to receive from him, and to bring back with him a certain oracle; but he enjoined them to pitch their tents near the mountain, and prefer the habituation that was nearest to God, before one farther remote. When he had said this, he ascended up to mount Sinai, which is the highest of all the mountains that are in that country, and not only was not to be ascended by men, on account of its vast alti- tude, but because of the sharpness of its precipi- tices also: nay, indeed, it cannot be looked at nor entered in; for the air was terrible and inaccessible, on account of the rumor that passed about, that God dwelt there. But the Hebrews removed their tents, as Moses had bidden them, and took possession of the lowest parts of the mountain; and were elevated in their minds, in expectation that Moses would return from God with promises of the good things he had proposed to them; so they feasted, and waited for their conductor, and kept themselves in a manner of fasting; and they sent with their wives for three days, as he had before ordered them to do. And they prayed to God, that he would favorably receive Moses in his conversing with him; and beseech some such gift of his, as would make the Hebrews live, which they also lived more plentifully as to their diet, and put on their wives and children more ornamental and decent clothing than they usually wore.

2. So they passed two days in this way of fasting; but on the third day, before the sun was up, a cloud spread itself over the whole camp of the Hebrews, such a one as none had before seen, and encompassed the place where they lay; and being cast and lifted up, was seen to stand on the mountain, and the air was clear, there came strong winds, that raised up large showers of rain, which became a mighty tempest. There was also such lightning as was terrible to those that saw it; and thunder with its thunderbolts were sent down, and declared God to be there present in a gracious way to such as Moses desired he should be gracious. Now, as to these matters, every one of my read- ers may think as he pleases: but I am under a necessity of relating this history, as it is descri- bed in the sacred books. This sight, and the amazing sounds that came to their ears, disturbed the Hebrews to a prodigious degree, for they were terrified, because they were accustomed, and then the rumor that was spread abroad, how God frequented that mountain, greatly astonish- ed their minds; so they sorrowfully contained themselves within their tents, as both supposing Moses in danger, from the disturbance that promised expecting the like destruction for themselves,
3. When they were under these apprehensions, Moses appeared as joyful and greatly exalted. We may see the merit both of his fear, and of his joy, in the scripture before us, taken together with the people to a congregation, in order to their hearing what God would say to them: and when they were gathered together, he stood on an eminence whence they might all hear him, and the voice of his words appeared, as if Hebrews, as he had formerly done; and hath suggested a happy method of living for you, and an order of political government, and is now present in the camp: I therefore charge you for his sake, and the sake of his works, and what we have done by his means, that you do not put a low value on what I am going to say, because the commands have been given by me that now deliver them to you, nor because it is the tongue of a man that delivers them to you; but you have a due regard to the great importance of the things themselves, you will understand the greatness of himself whose institutions they are, and who has not disclaimed to communicate the means for our comfort, but the means for it is now to be supposed, that the author of these institutions is barely Moses, the son of Amram and Jochebed, but who opposed the Nile to run back: he showed them by the means of the Egyptians by various sorts of judgments: he who provided a way through the sea for us: he who contrived a method of sending us food from heaven, when we were distressed for want of it: he who provided the water toissue out of a rock, when we had very little of it before: he by whose means Adam was made to partake of the fruits both of the land and of the sea: he by whose means Noah escaped the deluge: he by whose means the Hebrews wandered in the wilderness for forty years: he who provided the food of Canaan: he by whose means Isaac was born: he by whose means Jacob was adorned with twelve virtuous sons: he by whose means Joseph was made a potent lord over the Egyptians: he is it who conveys these instructions to you by me as his interpreter: and let them be to you venerable, and to your children, and to your children's children, and to your own children, and your own wives; for if you follow them, you will lead a happy life: you will enjoy the land fruitful, the sea calm, and the fruit of the womb born complete, as nature regards it, even as your enemies; for I have been admitted into the presence of God, and been made a bearer of his incorruptible voice: so great is his concern for your nation, and its duration."

4. When he had said this, he brought the people, with their wives and children, so near the mountain, that they might hear God himself speaking to them about the precepts which they were to practise, that the energy of what should be said might be the more weighty, by that tongue of a man, which could but imperfectly deliver it to their understanding. And they all heard a voice that came to all of them from above, standing in the tent and words escaped them, which Moses wrote in two tables; which it is not lawful for us to set down directly, but their import we will declare.

5. The first commandment teaches us that this is a law to God, that we ought to worship him only. The second commandments teach us to make the image of any living creature to worship it. The third, that we must not swear by God in a false manner. The fourth, that we must keep the seventh day by resting from all sorts of work, for the sake of our parents. The sixth, that we must abstain from murder. The seventh, that we must not commit adultery. The eighth, that we must not be guilty of theft. The ninth, that we must not bear false witness. The tenth, that we must not admit of the desire of any thing that is another's.

6. Now when the multitude had heard God himself giving those precepts which Moses had discovered to them, they rejoiced at what was said, and the congregation was dissolved: but on the following days they came to his tent, and desired him to bring them, beside, other laws from God. Accordingly he appointed such laws: and afterward informed them in what manner they should act in all cases: which laws I shall make mention of in their proper time; but I shall reserve most of those laws for another work, and make there a distinct explication of them.

7. When matters indeed as they could never recover again; nor would this suspicion give them leave to expect any comfortable event about this man, nor could they prevent their own distresses and the troubles of the nation. However, the camp durst not remove all this while, because Moses had bid them afore to stay there.

8. But when the forty days, and as many nights, were over, Moses was not down, having tasted nothing of food usually appointed for the nourishment of men. His appearance filled the army with gladness, and he declared to them what care God had of them, and by what manner of conduct of their lives they might live happily; telling them, that during these days of his absence, he had suggested to him also that he would have a tabernacle built for him, into which he would descend when he came to them, and so would reveal to them how they should remove from this place; and that there would be no longer any occasion for going up to mount Sinai, but that he would come himself and pitch his tabernacle there, and be present at our prayers; as also, that the tabernacle was the means of such measures and construction as he had showed him, and that you are to fall to the work, and prosecute it diligently. When he had said this, he showed them the two tables, and the ten commandments engraved upon them, fire upon each table: and the writing was by the hand of God.
Concerning the Tabernacle which Moses built in the Wilderness, for the honor of God, and which seemed to be a Temple.

1. Therefore the Israelites rejoiced at what they saw. They then and heard of the conductor, and were not wanting in diligence according to their ability; but they brought silver, and gold, and brass, and of the best sorts of wood, and such as would not at all decay by putrefaction: camels' hair, goat's hair, ram's skin, sable skins, scarlet, and pure blue color, and some of a scarlet; some brought the flower for the purple color, and others for white: with wool died by the flowers aforesaid; and fine linen and precious stones, which those that used costly garments set in their tuches of gold; they brought also a great quantity of spices; for of these materials did Moses build the tabernacle, which did not at all differ from a moveable temple. When these things were brought together with great diligence, for every one was ambitious to further the work even beyond their ability, he set architects over the works, and this by the commandment of God; and indeed it was marvelous, to see the power of instruction, which the people themselves would have chosen, had the election been allowed to them. Now their names are set down in writing in the sacred books; and they were these, Bezaleel, the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah of the tribe of Judah. And Aholiab, the son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan. Now the people went on with what they had undertaken with so great sincerity, that Moses was not able to do it without their help. And the providence, that what had been brought was sufficient, as the artificers had informed him. So they fell to work upon the building of the tabernacle. Moses informed them, according to the directions of God, both when the measure were to be, and its largeness; and how many vessels it ought to contain, for the use of the sacrifices. The women also were ambitious to do their parts, about the garments of the priests, and about other things that would be wanted in this work, both for ornament, and for the divine service itself.

2. Now when all things were prepared, the gold was melted and prepared, and the silver, and the brass, and all that was woven, Moses, when he had appointed beforehand that there should be a festival, and that sacrifices should be offered according to every one's ability, reared up the tabernacle. And when all were brought in, and the father of the tent was put, and the floor set, and fifty cubits long, and a hundred and four feet high, it was set up. Then were the pillars of brass, and the representation of the twelve tribes of Israel. And the eastern, and the west wall were six. Now all these tenons and sockets accurately fitted one another, so much that the joints were invisible, and both seemed to be one entire and unbroken piece. It was all of gold, both within and without. The number of pillars was equal on the opposite sides, and there were on each part twenty, and every one of them had the third part of a span in thickness: so that the number of thirty cubits, and its breadth was twelve [ten cubits. There were also pillars made of wood, twenty on each side; they were wrought into a quadrangular figure, in breadth a cubit and a half, but the thickness was four cubits. And then Moses placed of the sons of Aaron on the two sides, and of the tribe of Levi on the two sides, inwardly and outwardly; they had each of them two tenons belonging to them, inserted into their bases, and these were of silver, in each of which bases there was a socket. But on the west wall, on the other side, all the west wall were six. Now all these tenons and sockets accurately fitted one another, so much that the joints were invisible, and both seemed to be one entire and unbroken piece. It was all of gold, both within and without. The number of pillars was equal on the opposite sides, and there were on each part twenty, and every one of them had the third part of a span in thickness: so that the number of thirty cubits, and its breadth was twelve [ten cubits. But as to the wall behind, where the six pillars made up together only nine cubits, they made two other pillars, and cut them out of one pillar, and divided it in the middle. The nine cubits which had been made equal to the other. Now every one of the pillars had rings of gold affixed to their fronts outward, as if they had taken root in the pillars, and stood one row over against another, and another, and another, and another. And they set the inserted bars gilt over with gold, each of them five cubits long, and these bound together the pillars, the head of one bar running into another, after the nature of one tenon inserted into another. But for the wall behind, there was but one row of bars that went through all the pillars into which row ran the ends of the bars on each side of the longer walls, the male with its female being so fastened in their joints, that they held the whole firmly together; and for this reason was all this jointed so fast together, that the tabernacle might not be shaken, either by the winds, or by any other means, but that it might preserve its firmness and stability.

4. As for the inside, Moses parted its length into three partitions. At the distance of ten cubits from the most secret end Moses placed four pillars, whose workmanship was the very same with that of the west, and the like distance from the like bases with them, each a small matter distant from his fellow. Now, the room within those pillars was the 'Most Holy Place;' but the rest of the room was the Tabernacle, which was open for the priests. However, this proportion of the measures of the tabernacle proved to be an imitation of the system of the world: for that third part thereof which was within the four, pilasters, to which the priests were not admitted, as it were a hand stretched from God, but the space of the twenty cubits, as it were, sea and land, on which men live, and so this part is peculiar to the priests only. But at the front, where the entrance was made, they placed pilasters of fine linen, another of purple, another of scarlet colors, embroidered. The first was ten cubits every way, and this they spread over the tabernacle on the ground, and the second a cubit above the first, and they kept the most holy place concealed within: and this was that which made this part not visible to any. Now the whole temple was called 'The Holy Place,' but that part which was within he twelve pillars which were added, was called 'The Holy of Holies.' This vault was very ornamental, and embroidered with all sorts of flowers which the earth produces, and there were interwoven into it a variety that might be an ornament, excepting the forms of animals. Another vault there was which covered the five pillars that were at the entrance: it was like the former in its magnitude, and texture, and there was the curtain the color of a pillar, a ring retained it from the top downwards half the depth of the pillars, the other half affording an entrance for the priest, who crept under it. Over this there was a vail of linen, on which was the name of the Lord, to show that it was to be drawn this way or that way by cords, whose rings, fixed to the texture of the vail, and to the cords also, were subservient to the drawing and undrawing of the vail, and to the fastenings of the same, and the covering of the head, so that there was no hindrance to the view of the sanctuary, especially on solemn days; but that on other days, and especially when the weather was inclined to snow, it might be expanded, and afford a shelter, nor was it done with a view to that custom of ours is derived, of having a fine linen vail after the temple has been built, to be drawn over the entrances. But the ten other curtains were four cubits in breadth, and twenty-eight in length, and had golden clasps, in order to join the one curtain to the other, which was done so exactly that they seemed to be one entire curtain; these were spread over the temple from the top to the bottom, and the pillars which were beside, having a ledge of four fingers depth, that went round about like a spiral, on the upper and lower part of the body of the work. Upon every one of the feet was there also inserted a ring, not fastened with the other, was a ring in the beam of wood beneath, but gilded, to be taken out upon occasion, there being a cavity where it was joined to the rings: for they were not entire rings, but before they came quite round they ended in scythe points, so that when they were inserted into the prominent part of the table, and the other into the foot; and by these it was carried when they journeyed. Upon this table, which was placed on the north side of the tent, and the other which was layed twelve unleavened loaves of bread, six upon each heap, one above another: they were made of two tenth deals of the purest flour, which tenth deal [a homer] is a measure of the Hebrews, containing seven Athenian cotsyles: and above those loaves were put two vials full of frankincense. Now after seven days other loaves were brought in their stead, on the day which is by us called the Sabbath, we call it by the name of the Sabbath: but for the occasion of this invention of placing loaves here, we will speak of it in another place.

7. Over against this table, near the southern wall, was set a candlestick of cast gold; hollow within, being the weight of one hundred pounds, which the Hebrews call cinchares, if it be turned into the Greek language, it denotes a talent. It was made with its knobs, and lilies, and pomegranates, and bowls, (which ornaments amounted to seventy in all,) by which stands the shaft elevated itself on high from a single base, and spread itself into as many branches as there are planets, including the sun among them, it terminated in seven heads, in one row, all standing parallel to one another; and these branches carried seven lamps, one by one, in imitation of the number of the planets; these lamps looked to the east and to the south, the candlestick being situate obliquely.

8. Now between this candlestick and the table, which, as we said, were within the sanctuary, was the altar of incense, made of wood, indeed, but of the same work of which the seven vessels were made, such as was not liable to corruption: it was entirely crusted over with a golden plate. Its breadth on each side was a cubit, but the length of it in the midst was a grate of gold, that was not extant above the altar, which had a golden crown encompassing it round about, whereunto belonged rings and bars, by which the priests carried it when they journeyed.
ed. Before this tabernacle there was reared a brazen altar, but it was within made of wood, five cubits by measure on each side, but its height was but three, in like manner adorned with brazen plates as bright as gold. It had also a brazen hearth of network, for the ground underneath received the fire from the hearth, because it had no basis to receive it. Hard by this altar lay the basins, and the vials, and the censors, of gold, made of one piece; but the other vessels, made for the use of the sacrifices, were all of brass. And such was the construction of the tabernacle; and these were the vessels thereto belonging.

CHAP. VII.

Which were the Garments of the Priests, and of the High Priest; concerning the Priesthood of Aaron, with the Manner of the Purification and Sacrifices; as also concerning the Festivals, and how each Day was then disposed of, with other Laws.

1. There were peculiar garments appointed for the priests, and for all the rest, which they call 'Cahannah' [priestly] garments, as also for the high priest, which they call 'Cahannah Rabben,' and denote 'the high priest's garments.' Such things, the habit of the rest; but when the priest approaches the sacrifices, he purifies himself with the purification which the law prescribes; and in the first place, he puts on that which is called 'Mechanean,' which means this: that is fastened on. It is a girdle, composed of fine twined linen, and is put about the privy parts, the feet being to be inserted into them, in the nature of breeches; but about half of it is cut off, and it ends at the thighs, and is there fastened.

2. Over this he wore a linen vestment, made of fine flax doubled: it is called 'Chethone,' and denotes 'linen,' for we call linen by the name of 'Chethone.' This vestment reaches down to the feet, and sits close to the body; and has sleeves that are tied fast to the arms: it is girded to the breast a little above the elbows, by a girdle often going round, four fingers broad, but so loosely woven, that you would think it was the skin of a young lamb, of the epheb, scarlet, and purple, and blue, and fine twined linen; but the warp was nothing but fine linen. The beginning of its circumscription is at the breast; and when it has gone often round, it is tied under both arms, and diverges from the neck; and the joint of the vestment is made with stitches of blue ribands: and thus it is fastened at the ankles: I mean this, all the time the priest is not about any laborious service, for in this position it appears in the most agreeable manner to the spectators; but when he is obliged to assist at the offering sacrifices, and to do the appointed service, that he may not be hindered in his operations by its motion, he throws it to the left, and bears it on his shoulder. Moses indeed calls this both 'Abaneth,' but we have learned from the Babylonians to call it Emia, for so is it by them called. This vestment has no loose or hollow parts anywhere in it, but only a narrow aperture about the neck; and it is tied with certain strings having within them a golden thread introd but in the back, and is fastened above each shoulder; it is called 'Massabazaan.'

3. Upon his head he wears a cap, not brought to a conic form, or enwrapping the whole head, but still covering more than the half of it, which is called 'Mas含まれมิวฟีกุอ์s: and its make is such that it seems to be a crown, being made of thick swathes, but the contexture is of linen; and it is doubled round many times, and sewed together in these places. This piece of fine linen covers the whole cap from the upper part, and reaches down to the forehead and the seams of the swathes. which would otherwise appear indecently: this abides closely upon the solid part of the head, and is fastened on behind with a black thread, and tied off during the sacred service about the sacrifices. So we have shown you what is the habit of the generality of the priests.

4. The high priest, indeed, is adorned with the same, as we have described, without abating one; only these he puts on a vestment of a blue color. This also is a long robe, reaching to his feet; in our language it is called 'Meisir, and is tied round with a girdle, embroidered with the same color and flowers as the former, with a mixture of gold interwoven;—to the bottom of which garment are hung fringes, in color like pomegranates, with golden bells,* by a beautiful curvitation: so that between two bells is one pomegranate, and between two pomegranates a bell. Now this vesture was not composed of two pieces, nor was it sewed together upon the shoulders and the sides, but it was one piece, so that it made a whole. The figure for the neck; not an oblique one, but parted all along the breast and the back. A border also was sewed to it, lest the aperture should look too indecently: it was also parted where the hands were.

5. Besides these, the high priest put on a third garment, which was called the Ephod, which resembled the Eponia of the Greeks. Its make was after this manner: it was woven to the depth of a cubit, of several colors, with gold intermixed, and embroidered, but it left the middle of the breast uncovered: it was made with sleeves also; nor did it appear to be at all differently made from a short coat. But in the void place of this garment there was inserted a piece of the bigness of a span, embroidered with gold, and the other colors of the ephod, and called 'Essen' (the breastplate,) which in the Greek language signifies the Oracle. This piece exactly filled up the void, and was made with rings on every corner, the like rings being annexed to the ephod, and a blue riband was made use of to tie them together by those rings; and that the space between the rings might not be seen either, they covered it, and set them by stitches of blue ribands. There were also two sardonixes upon the ephod, at the shoulders, to fasten it in the nature of buttons, having each end running to the sardonixes of gold, that they might be buttoned by them. On these were engraved the names of the sons of Jacob in our own country letters, and our own tongue, six on each side of the stones, on either side; and the eleven side names were on the right shoulder. Twelve stones also were there upon the breast-plate, extraordinary in largeness and beauty; and they were an ornament not to be purchased by men, because of their immense value. These stones were set in the breast-plate according to a row, and were inserted into the breastplate itself, and they were set in ooches of gold, that were themselves inserted in the breastplate, and were so made that they might not fall out. Now the first three were a sardonix, a topaz, and an

* The use of these golden bells at the bottom of the high priest's long garment, seems to have been this, that shaking them together at the time of his offering license in the temple, on the great day of expiation, or at other proper periods of his sacred ministrations through the year, the people might have notice of it, and might fall to their own prayers at the time of incense, or other proper periods; and so the whole congregation might at once offer those common prayers jointly with the high priest himself to the Almighty. See Luke i. 10, Rev. viii. 3. 4. Nor probably is the sense of dire they at the time of his offering license when he says of Aaron, the first high priest, Exclus, xlv. 9. "And God compassed Aaron with pomegranates, and with a gold breastplate on his shoulder, that there might be a sound and a noise made, that might be heard in the temple, for a memorial to the children of his people."

emerald. The second row contained a carbuncle, a jasper, and a sapphire. The first of the third row was a ligure, then an amethyst, and the third an agate, being the ninth of the whole number. The first of the fourth row was a chrysolite, the next was an onyx, and then a beryl, which was the last of all. Now the names of all those sons of Jacob were engraved in these stones, whom we esteem the heads of our tribes, each stone having the honor of a name, in the order according to which they were born. And when they were set one against another, to bear the weight of the stones, they made two other rings of a larger size, at the edge of that part of the breastplate, which reached to the rafter, and yearly of the year, of the breastplate, to receive chains finely wrought, which connected them with golden bands to the tops of the shoulders, whose extremity turned backwards, and went into the ring, on the promissory above the sapphire, but the root is like that of a turnip, (for he that should compare it thereto would not be mistaken,) but its leaves are like to the leaves of mint. Out of its branches it sends out a calyx, cleaving to the branch, and a coat ensanches it; but nature is such, that as it is changing, in order to produce its fruit. This calyx is of the bigness of the bone of the little finger, but in the compass of its aperture, is like a cup. This I will further describe for the use of these who are unacquainted with it. A sphere be divided into two parts, round at the bottom, but having another segment that grows up to a circumference from that bottom; suppose it become narrower by degrees, and that the cavity of that part grow deeper at last, and then gradually grow wider again at the rim, such as we see in the navel of a pomegranate, with its notches. And indeed such a coat grows out on this pomegranate like a tabernacle, and that fruit may say, turned accurately in a lathe, and having its notches extend above it, which, as I said, grow like a pomegranate, only that they are sharp, and end in nothing but prickers. Now suppose the second by this same order in which fruit is like the seed of the herb 'sideritis;' it sends out a flower that may seem to resemble that of the poppy. Of the sapphire was a crown made, as far as from the hinder part of the temple of the temple; but this 'ephelis,' for so this calyx may be called, did not cover the forehead, but it was covered with a 'golden plate,' which had inscribed upon it the name of God in sacred characters. And such were the ornaments of the high priest.

7. Now here one may wonder at the ill-will which men bear to us, and which they profess to be on account of our despising that Deity which they pretend to be the house or temple of; but consider the fabric of the tabernacle, and take a view of the garments of the high priest, and of those vessels which we make use of in our sacred minister. And we shall find that our legislator was a divine manner, and that we are many things attended by others; for if any one do without prejudice, and with judgment look upon these things, he will find they were every one made in way of denoting the sky, being like light, or its pomegranates, and in the noise of the bells resembling thunder. And for the ephod, it showed that God had made the universe of four elements, and as for the gold interwoven, I suppose it related to the splendor of all the other superpowers of the ed. He also appointed the breastplate to be placed in the middle of the ephod to resemble the earth, for that has the very middle place of the world. And the girdle, which encompassed the work, and was round, signified that the earth goes round about and includes the universe. Each of the sardonyxes declares to us the sun and the moon, those, I mean, that were in the nature of buttons on the high priest's shoulders. And for the two stones, whether we understand by them the months, or whether we understand the like number of the signs of that circle which the Greeks call the zodiac, we shall not be mistaken in their meaning. And for the mitre, which was of a blue color, it seems to me most probable; for how otherwise could the name of God be inscribed upon it? That it was also illustrated with a crown, and that of gold also, is, because of that splendor with which it is pleased to heap upon us any explanation suitable at present, since the course of my narration will often, and at many occasions, and this the rather, because in the temple afterward there was a third, for the name of the Jewish high priest was itself preserved, not only till the days of Josephus, but of Origen; and that its inscription was a human character, see Antig. b. viii. ch. iii. sect. 8. Essay on the Old Test. p. 134, and Reland, De Spol. Templi, p. 132. Then Josephus, who hated the Jews, etc. It is very evident that this supposition of the tabernacle to have been parted into three parts, he means to esteem the bare entrance to be a third division, distinct from the holy and the most holy places.
sions, afford me the opportunity of enlarging on the virtue of our legislator.

CHAPTER VIII.

Of the Priesthood of Aaron.

1. When what has been described was brought to a conclusion, gifts not being yet presented, God appeared to Moses, and enjoined him to bestow the high priesthood upon Aaron his brother, as upon him that best of them all deserved to possess that honor, and his virtue. And when he had gathered the multitude together, he gave them an account of Aaron's virtue, and of his good-will to them, and of the dress which he was to wear for a type of grace. Upon which, when they had given testimony to him in all respects, and showed their readiness to receive him, Moses said to them, "O you Israelites, this work is already brought to a conclusion, in a manner most acceptable to God, and according to your abilities. And now, since you see that he is received into this tabernacle, we shall first of all stand in need of one that may officiate for us, and may minister to the sacrifices. And let us therefore have it put up for us. And indeed the inquiry after such a person been left to me, I should have thought myself worthy of that honor, both because all men are naturally fond of themselves, and because the more I am anxious toinstances, and the more I am anxious to instances, the more I can be persuaded that I have taken a great deal of pains for your deliverance: but now God himself has determined that Aaron is worthy of this honor, and has chosen him for his prince, and has consecrated him to be our most righteous person among you. So that he is to put on the vestments which are consecrated to God; he is to have the care of the altar, and to make provision for the sacrifices; and he is that must put up prayers for you to God, and which I readily hear them, not only because he is himself solicitous for your nation, but also because he will receive them as offered by one that he hath himself chosen to this office."* The Hebrews were pleased with what was said, and they gave their approbation to him whom God had ordained; for Aaron was of them all the most deserving of this honor, on account of his own stock, and gift of prophecy, and his brother's virtue. He had at that time forty and two years of age, and a beard down to his ears.

2. Now Moses commanded them to all the utensils which were more than were necessary to the structure of the tabernacle, for covering the tabernacle itself, for candlestick, and for the altar, and for the vessels, and for the vessels, that they might not be at all hurt when they journeyed, either by the rain, or by the raising of the dust. And when he had gathered the multitude together again, he ordained that they should offer half a shekel for every man as an oblation to God; which shekel is a piece among the Hebrews, and is equal to four Athenian drachmas.

Whereas when he wrote these Antiquities. In the mean time, it was not to be doubted, but in their education they must have both learned more Jewish interpretations, such as we meet with in the epistles of Barnabas, in that to the Hebrews, and elsewhere among the old Jews. Accordingly, when Josephus writes his books of the Jewish war for the use of the Jews, at which time he was comparatively young, and less used to Gentile books, we find one specimen of such a Jewish interpretation for there [b. v. ch. v. sect. 3.] he makes the seven branches of the temple candlestick, with their seven lamps, an emblem of the seven days of creation and rest, and of the seven planets. Nor certainly ought ancient Jewish emblems to be explained any otherwise than according to ancient Jewish sense. And as the Gentile notions. See Of the War, b. 1. ch. xxiii. sect. 2.

* It is well worth our observation, that the two principal points of the constitution of the first high priest, viz. that he should have an excellent character for virtuous and good actions, as also that he should have the approbation of the people, are here noted by Josephus, even where the nominaupon they readily obeyed what Moses had commanded, and the number of the offerers was six hundred and five thousand and five hundred and fifty. Now this money that was brought by the men that were free was given by such as were above twenty years old, but under fifty; and what was collected was spent in the uses of the tabernacle.

3. Moses now purified the tabernacle and the priests; which purification was performed after the coming in, he caused them to take five hundred and forty to a corner of the court, an equal quantity of cassia, and half the foregoing weight of cinnamon and calamus, (this last is a sort of sweet spice,) to best them small, and of a sweet smell, for the tabernacle. U. J. is our country measure, and contains two Athenian moms or consogues,) then mix them together, and boil them, and prepare them after the act of the apothecity, and make them into a very sweet ointment; afterward take an anoint and purify the priests themselves and all the tabernacle, as also the sacrifices. There were also many, and those of various kinds, of sweet spices, that belonged to the tabernacle, and sacred vessels of what they were formerly and were brought to the golden altar of incense; whose nature I do not now describe, lest it should be troublesome to me readers. But incense, was to be offered twice a day, both before sunrise, and after the evening. And the lamps, after they were already purified for the lamps, three of which were to give light all day long; upon the sacred candlestick, before God, and the rest were to be lighted at the evening sacrifice.

4. Now all was finished, Bezaleel and Aholiab appeared to be the most skilful of the workmen; for they invented finer works than what others had done before them, and were of great abilities, and so acute in the art of what they were ignorants of; and of these Bezaleel was judged to be the best. Now the whole time they were about this work was the interval of seven months; and after this it was that was ended the first year since their departure out of Egypt. But at the beginning of the second year, on the month Nisan, as the Macedonians call it, but on the month Nisan, as the Hebrews call it, on the new moon, they consecrated the tabernacle, and all its contents, in the presence of all the people.

5. Now God showed himself pleased with the work of the Hebrews, and did not permit their labours to be in vain; nor did he disdain to make use of, but had used, he came, and sojourned with them, and pitched his tabernacle in the holy house. And in the following manner did he come to it: the sky was clear, but there was a mist over the tabernacle only, encompassing it, but not with such a very deep and thick cloud as is seen in the winter season, nor yet in so thin a one as men might be able to discern any thing through it, but from it there dropped a tion belonged to God himself, which are the very same qualifications which the Christian religion requires in the choice of Christian bishops, priests, and deacons, as the Jewish priesthood necessary to the people of the Jews, at which time he was comparatively young, and less used to Gentile books, we find one specimen of such a Jewish interpretation for there [b. v. ch. v. sect. 3.] he makes the seven branches of the temple candlestick, with their seven lamps, an emblem of the seven days of creation and rest, and of the seven planets. Nor certainly ought ancient Jewish emblems to be explained any otherwise than according to ancient Jewish sense. And as the Gentile notions. See Of the War, b. 1. ch. xxiii. sect. 2.

* This weight and value of the Jewish shekel, in the days of Josephus, equal to about 2s. 6d. sterling, is by some writers accounted two hundred and sixty-seven of the old shekels, which determination agrees perfectly with the remaining shekels that have Samaritan inscriptions, coined generally by Simon the Macrabe, about 330 years before Josephus published his Antiquities, which never weigh more than 2s. 3d. and commonly less. See Relland, De Nummis Samaritanorum, p. 168.

† The Incense was here offered, according to Josephus, twice a day, the morning and at sun setting. But in the days of Pompey, according to the ancient Jews, the sacrifices were offered in the morning and at the ninth hour, A.T. b. xiv. ch. iv. sect. 2.

‡ Here Josephus corrects the opinions of the modern rabbinists, who say, that only one of the seven lamps burned in the daytime, whereas Josephus, an eye-wit- ness, says, they were three.
a sweet dew, and such as showed the presence of God to those that desired and believed it.

6. Now when Moses had bestowed such honourary presents on the workmen, as it was fit they should receive, who had wrought so well, he offered a sacrifice out of the carcases of the bullocks, calves, and sheep, as God commanded him, a bull, a bullock, and a kid of the goats, for a sin-offering. Now I shall speak of what we do in our sacred offices in my discourse about peace and war, and shall inform in what cases Moses bid us offer a whole burnt-offering, and in what cases the law permits us to partake of them as of food. And when Moses had sprinkled Aaron's vestments, blest the people, and consecrated the tabernacle, and all that were slain, and had purified them with spring waters and ointment, they became God's priests. After this manner did he consecrate them and their garments for seven days together. The same he did to the tabernacle, and the vessels thereto belonging, both with oil first anointed, as I said, and with the blood of bulls, and of rams, slain day by day one according to its kind. But on the eighth day he appointed a feast for the people; and committed the care of them to them according to their ability. Accordingly, they contended one with another, and were ambitious to exceed each other in the exercises which they brought, and in the honor which God's name had. But as the sacrifices lay upon the altar, a sudden fire was kindled from among them of its own accord, and appeared to the sight like fire from a flash of lightning, and consumed whatsoever was upon the altar.

7. Hereupon an affliction befell Aaron, considered as a man and a father, but was undergone by him with true fortitude; for he had indeed a firmness of soul in such accidents, and he thought that he was worthy of such honors, and that he was fit for the will: for whereas he had four sons, as I said before, the two elder of them, Nadab and Abihu, did not bring those sacrifices which Moses bade them bring, but such as they used to offer formerly, and were burnt to death. Now when the fire rushed upon them, and began to burn them, nobody could quench it. Accordingly, they died in this manner. And Moses bid their father, and their brethren, to take up their bodies, to carry them out of the camp, and to bury them in the place where they lay, and thus the multitude lamented them, and were deeply affected at this their death, which so unexpectedly befell them. But Moses entreated their brethren, and their acquaintance, and forbid them to follow in this their grief, and to prefer the honor of God before their grief about them, for Aaron had already put on his sacred garments.

8. But Moses refused all that honor which he saw the multitude ready to bestow upon him, for he had been accustomed to attend to nothing else but the service of God. He went no more up to mount Sinai; but he went into the tabernacle, and brought back answers from God to what he prayed for. His habit was also that of a private man; and in all other circumstances he behaved himself like one of the common people, and was desirous to appear without distinguishing himself from the multitude, but would have it known that he did nothing else but to help and to assist in administering the form of their government, and those laws, by obedience whereunto they would lead their lives so as to please God, and so as to have no occasion to fear him. For all those who were appointed were such as God suggested to him: so I shall now discourse concerning that form of government, and those laws.

9. I will now treat of what I before omitted, the garments of the high priest: for he [Moses] left no room for the evil practices of [false] prophets; but if some of that sort should attempt to abuse the divine authority, he left it to God to be present at his sacrifices when he pleased, and when he pleased, and to be his accuser, since the execution of the sentence was in the hands of God. And the high priest must be an Hebrew only, but to those foreigners also who were there. But as to those stones, which we told you before, the high priest bore on his shoulders, which... were sardonixs, (and I think it needless to describe their nature, they being known to every body;) the one of them shined out when God was present at their sacrifices; I mean, that which was in the nature of a button on his right shouder, bright rays darting out thence; and being seen by no one else but the most remote; which splendor yet was not before natural to the stone. This has appeared a wonderful thing to such as have not so far indulged themselves in philosoph, as to despise divine revelation. Yet will I imagine must it astonish more than this, if God declared beforehand, by those twelve stones which the high priest bare on his breast, and which were inserted into his breastplate, when they should be victorious over their enemies, the greater that splender shone forth from them before the army began to march, that all the people were sensible of God's being present for their assistance. Whence it came to pass that those Greeks who had a veneration for our laws, because they could not possibly contradict this, called that breastplate The Oracle. Now this breastplate, and this sardonixs, left of shining two hundred years before I composed this book, God preserved it safe, and explained at length, as to each of his laws. Of which things we shall farther discourse on a fitter opportunity; but I will now go on with my proposed narration.

10. The tabernacle being being consecrated, and the priest being settled for the priests, the multitude judged that God now dwelt among them, and betook themselves to sacrifices and praises to God, as being now delivered from all enslaved and captivity, and having the hope and future as the most fulsome of better times hereafter. They offered also gifts to God, some as common to the whole nation, and others as peculiar to themselves, and these tribe by tribe; for the heads of the tribes were chosen together, and each tribe brought a wagon and a yoke of oxen. These amounted to six, and they carried the tabernacle when they journeyed. Besides which, every head of a tribe brought a bowl, and a charger, and a spoon, for burnt offerings, and incense; and the charger and the bowl were of silver; and together they weighed two hundred shekels, but the bowl cost no more than seventy shekels; and these four were mingled with oil, such as they used on the altar about the sacrifices. They brought also a young bullock, and a ram, with a lamb of a year old, for a whole burnt-offering, as also a goat for the forgiveness of sins of the heads of the tribes. They brought also other sacrifices, called peace-offerings, for every day two bulls, and five rams, with lambs of a year old, and kids of the goats. These heads of tribes were twelve days in sacrificing, one sacrificing every day. Now Moses went no longer up to Mount Sinai, but went into the tabernacle, and learned of God what they were to do, and what laws should be made; which laws were preferable to what have been devised in the world, and shall be proved to be firmly observed for all time to come, as being the Roman empire, and that in the days of Nero, and before either Gaius, Otho, or Vitellius, were thought of to succeed him. Of the War, b. iii. ch. viii. sect. 7. Thus was it looked on in very least instance of any thing like the propitious Urin among the Jewish nation, and just preceded their fatal desolation. But because it could possibly come to pass, that such great men as Sir John Narrawam and Dr. Spencer should imagine that this oracle of Urin and Thummim, with this or that old or oldfashioned law of Moses, should have been ordained in imitation of some what like them among the Egyptians, which we never have seen; and I can never be sure of the Sibylls, and the Malmolèdes, or little earlier than the Christian era at the highest, is almost unaccountable; while the main business of the law of Moses was evidently to preserve the Jews from the dross and superstition idea of the neighboring Pagan nations; and while it is so undeniable, that the evidence for the great antiquity of Moses's law is incomparably beyond that for believed to be the gift of God, inasmuch that the Hebrews did not transgress any of those laws, either as reputed in times of peace by luxury, or in times of war by distress of affairs. But I say no more here concerning them, because I have resolved to compose another work concerning our laws.

CHAP. IX.

The Nature of our offering Sacrifices.

1. I will now, however, make mention of a few of our laws which belong to purifications, and the like sacred offices, since I am accidentally come to this matter of sacrifices. These sacrifices were of two sorts; of these sorts one was only for the sacred offices, the other found the Israelites for the people in general; and they are done in two different ways. In the one case, what is slain is burnt, as a whole burnt-offering, whence that name is given to it; but the other is a thank-offering, and is designed for feasting those that sacrifice. I will speak of the former. Suppose a private man offer a burnt-offering, he must slay either a bull, a lamb, or a kid of the goats, and the two latter of the first year, though of bulls he is permitted. Of these about a great part, and all burnt-offerings are to be of males. When they are slain, the priests sprinkle the blood round about the altar; then they cleanse the bodies, and divide them into parts, and some they lay upon the altar, while the pieces of wood are piled one upon another, and the fire is burning: they next cleanse the foot of the sacrifices, and the invards, in an accurate manner, and all the blood that is purged by the fire, while the priests receive the hides. This is the way of offering a burnt-offering.

2. But those that offer thank-offerings, do indeed sacrifice the same creatures, but such as are unblemished and without blemish, and they may take either males or females. They also sprinkle the altar with their blood; but they lay upon the altar the kidneys and the caul, and all the fat, and the lobe of the liver, together with the rump and the backbone; and all this breast and the right shoulder to the priests, the offerers feast upon the remainder of the flesh for two days; and what remains they burn.

3. The rewards for sins are different in the same manner as is the thank-offering. But those who are unable to purchase complete sacrifices, offer two pigeons, or turtle-doves; the one of which is made a burnt-offering to God, the other they part with among the priests. But we shall treat more accurately about the obligation of these creatures in our discourse concerning sacrifices. But if a person fall into sin by ignorance, he offers a ow lamb, or female kid of the goats, of the same age; and the priests sprinkle the blood at the altar, not after the former manner, but at the corners of it. They also bring the kidneys and the rest of the fat, together with the lobe of the liver, to the altar, while the priests bear away the hind quarter and the shoulder, and they are burned and placed on the same day; * for the law does not the like or greater antiquity of such customs in Egypt or other nations, which indeed is generally none at all, it is most absurd to derive any of Moses's laws from the imitation of these heathen practices. It would hardly seem to us, how far inclination can prevail over evidence, in even some of the most learned part of mankind.

* What Reland well observes here, out of Josephus, as compared with the law of Moses, Lev. vii. 15. (that the law for sin offerings was to be made only on the day of atonement, and not on the day of the Passover,) is not true. See the book of Josephus, to be seen in Reland's note on Antiq. b. iv. chap. iv. sect. 4, and Reland's note b chap. vii. sect. 25.
permit them to lean upon it until the morning. But if it is the case, and is constantly practiced, but hath nobody that can prove it upon him, he offers a ram, the law enjoining him so to do; the flesh of which the priests eat as before, in the holy place, on the same day. And if the ruler offers sacrifices for their sins, they bear the same obligations that private men do; only they so far differ, that they are to bring for sacrifices a bull or a kid of the goats, both males.

4. Now the law requires, both in private and public sacrifices, eight days, and they may be brought for a lamb the measure of one tenth deal, for a ram two, and for a bull three. This they consecrate upon the altar, when it is mingled with oil; for oil is also brought by those that sacrifices to expiate the sins of the people; but of those days a rams is to be burnt upon the altar for the third part of the same measure, and one quarter of it for a lamb. This is an ancient Hebrew measure, and is equivalent to two Athenian choises (or congusses). They bring the same quantity of oil which they do of wine, and they pour the wine about the altar; but if any one does not offer a complete sacrifice of animals, but brings fine flour only for a vow, he throws a handful into the fire with the ram, and any other animal. But if the priests take the rest for their food, either boiled, or mingled with oil, but made into cakes of bread. But whatsoever it be that a priest himself offers, it must of necessity all be burnt. Now the law extends this duty to the Passover in the beginning of our year, on the fourteenth day of the lunar month, when the sun is in Aries, (for on this month it was that we were delivered from bondage under the Egyptians,) the law ordained, that we should every year and year, on that day to sacrifice a bull, a ram, and seven lambs, and one kid of the goats, for an expiation for sins, and on the following days the same number of lambs, and one ram, two bulls, and fourteen lambs, and fifteen rams, with the addition of a kid of the goats, as an expiation for sins, and on the following days the same number of lambs, and two rams, and two bulls, and eight lambs, and one kid of the goats; but abating one of the bulls every day, till they amounted to seven only. On the eighth day all work was laid aside, and then, as we said before, they sacrificed to God a bullock, a ram and seven lambs, and one kid of the goats, for an expiation for sins. And this is the accustoms solemnity of the Hebrews, when they pitch their tabernacles.

5. In the month of Xanthicus, which is by us called Nisan, at the beginning of our year, they sacrifice a lamb, on the fourteenth day of the lunar month, when the sun is in Aries, (for on this month it was that we were delivered from bondage under the Egyptians,) the law ordained, that we should every year and year, on that day to sacrifice a bullock, a ram, and seven lambs, and one kid of the goats, for an expiation for sins, and on the following days the same number of lambs, and two rams, and two bulls, and eight lambs, and one kid of the goats; but abating one of the bulls every day, till they amounted to seven only. On the eighth day all work was laid aside, and then, as we said before, they sacrificed to God a bullock, a ram and seven lambs, and one kid of the goats, for an expiation for sins. And this is the accustoms solemnity of the Hebrews, when they pitch their tabernacles.

CHAP. X.
Concerning the Festivals: and how each Day of such Festival is to be observed.

41. The law requires, that out of the public expenses, a lamb of the first year be killed every day, at the beginning and at the ending of the day; but on the seventh day, which is called the Sabbath, they kill two, and sacrifice them in the sanctuary, on the eighth day. But they bring with the daily sacrifices, and they deliver to the priests take the rest for their food, either boiled, or mingled with oil, but made into cakes of bread. But whatsoever it be that a priest himself offers, it must of necessity all be burnt. Now the law extends this duty to the Passover in the beginning of our year, on the fourteenth day of the lunar month, when the sun is in Aries, (for on this month it was that we were delivered from bondage under the Egyptians,) the law ordained, that we should every year and year, on that day to sacrifice a bull, a ram and seven lambs, and one kid of the goats, for an expiation for sins, and on the following days the same number of lambs, and two rams, and two bulls, and eight lambs, and one kid of the goats; but abating one of the bulls every day, till they amounted to seven only. On the eighth day all work was laid aside, and then, as we said before, they sacrificed to God a bullock, a ram and seven lambs, and one kid of the goats, for an expiation for sins. And this is the accustoms solemnity of the Hebrews, when they pitch their tabernacles.

5. In the month of Xanthicus, which is by us called Nisan, at the beginning of our year, they sacrifice a lamb, on the fourteenth day of the lunar month, when the sun is in Aries, (for on this month it was that we were delivered from bondage under the Egyptians,) the law ordained, that we should every year and year, on that day to sacrifice a bull, a ram and seven lambs, and one kid of the goats, for an expiation for sins, and on the following days the same number of lambs, and two rams, and two bulls, and eight lambs, and one kid of the goats; but abating one of the bulls every day, till they amounted to seven only. And this is the accustoms solemnity of the Hebrews, when they pitch their tabernacles.

6. When a week of weeks has passed over after this sacrifice, (which weeks contain forty and nine days,) then in the fifth day, which is called Pentecost, but is called by the Hebrews Asaartah, which signifies Pentecost, they bring to God a loaf, made of wheats flour, of two tenth deals, with leaven; and for sacrifices they bring two bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs, with two kids of the goats, for the priests; nor is it permitted to leave any thing of them till the day following. They also slay three bullocks for a burnt-offering, and two rams, and fourteen lambs, with two kids of the goats, for the sins; nor is there any of the festivals but in it they offer burnt-offerings; they also allow themselves to rest on every one of them. As

And for the lepers, he ordered them not to come into the city at all, nor to live with any others as if they were in effect dead persons; but if any one had obtained, by prayer to God, the recovery from that distemper, and had gained a healthful complexion again, he was permitted to come to God, with several sorts of sacrifices; concerning which we will speak hereafter.

4. Whence one cannot but smile at those who say, that Moses was himself afflicted with leprosy, as we understand the word; for he was the conductor of those who on that account left that country, and led them into the land of Canaan; for had this been true, Moses would not have made these laws to his own dishonor and disadvantage; he would have opposed, if others had endeavored to introduce them, and this the rather, because there are lepers in many nations, who yet are in honor, and not only free from reproach and avoidance, but have been great captains of armies, and been entrusted with high offices in the commonwealth; and have had the privilege of entering into holy places and temples; so that nothing but false and malicious aspersions can be imputed to the multitude that was with him, had been liable to such a misfortune, in the color of his skin, he might have made laws about them for their credit and advantage, and have laid no manner of barrier against them. Accordingly it is plain, that it is out of violent prejudice only that they report these things about us. But Moses was pure from any such distemper, and lived with countrymen who were pure of it also, and this is the reason he made the laws which concern the sacrifices that had the distemper. He did this for the honor of God. But as to these matters, let every one consider them after what manner he please.

5. As to the women, when they have borne a child, Moses forbade them to come into the temple, or to touch the sacrifices, before forty days were over, supposing it to be a boy; but if she had borne a girl, the law is, that she cannot be admitted before twice that number of days be over. And when, after the before-mentioned time appointed for them, they perform their sacrifices, the priests distribute them before God.

6. But God, if the father of the child has been guilty of adultery, he was to bring a tenth deal of barley-flour; they then cast one handful to God, and gave the rest of it to the priests for food. One of the priests set the woman at the door of the tent of meeting; and there sat the vail from her head, and wrote the name of God on parch-ment, and enjoined her to swear, that she had not at all injured her husband; and to wish, that if she had violated her chastity, her right thigh might be put out of joint; that her belly might swell, and that she might die thus: but that if her husband, by the violence of his affection, and of the jealousy which arose from it, had been rashly moved to this suspicion, that she might remain there on oath, and swear. Now when these oaths were over, the priest wiped the name of God out of the parchment, and wrung the water into a vial. He also took some of the water, and put it upon the two hands, and put a little of it into the vial, and gave it her to drink; whereupon the woman, if she were unjustly accused, conceived with child, and brought it to perfection in her womb. But if she had broken her faith of well-wishing to her husband, and had sworn falsely before God, she died in a reproachful manner; her thigh fell off from her, and her belly swelled with a droppy. And these are the ceremonies about sacrifices, and about the purifications thereto belonging, which Moses with allusion to the latter city, temple, and holy house, which he knew so well long afterward.

Chap. XI.
The Purifications.

1. Moses took out the tribe of Levi from communicating with the rest of the people, and set them apart to be a holy tribe; and purified them, taken from them of all springs, and with such sacrifices as were usually offered to God on the like occasions. He delivered to them also the tabernacle, and the sacred vessels, and the other curiosities which were made for covering the tabernacle, that they might minister under the conduct of the priests, who had been already consecrated to God.

2. He also determined concerning animals; which of them might be used for food, and which the Israelites were ordered to abstain from; which matters, when this work shall give me occasion, shall be further explained; and the causes shall be added, by which he was moved to allot some of them to be our food, and enjoined us to abstain from others. He also forbade us the use of blood for food, and esteemed it to contain the soul and spirit. He also forbade us to eat the flesh of an animal that died of itself, as also the caul, and the fat of goats, and sheep, and bulls.

3. He also ordered that those whose bodies were afflicted with leprosy, and that had a gonorrhoea, should not come into the city. Nay, he removed the women, when they had their natural purgation, till the seventh day; after which he looked on them as pure, and permitted them to come in again. The law permits those also who have taken care of funerals to come in also. In any manner, when this number of days is over; but if any continued longer than that number of days in a state of pollution, the law appointed the offering two lambs as a sacrifice; the one of which they are to purify by fire, and for the other the priests take it for themselves. In the same manner do those sacrifice who have had the gonorrhoea. But he that sheds his seed in his sleep, if he goes down into cold water, he has the same privilege with those that have lawfully accompanied with their wives.

* We may here note, that Josephus frequently calls the camp the city, and the court of the Mosaic tabernacle a temple, and the tabernacle itself a holy house, provided for his countrymen. He also prescribed the following laws to them.

CHAP. XII.

Several Laws.

1. As for adultery, Moses forbade it entirely, as esteeming it a happy thing that men should be wise in the affairs of wedlock; and that it was profitable to posterity, because it prevented the children of the same family from being known to be genuine. He also abhorred men’s lying with their mothers, as one of the greatest crimes; and the like for lying with the father’s wife, and with aunts, and sisters, and all persons that were related by blood, and consanguinity. He also forbade a man to lie with his wife when she was defiled by her natural purgation: and not to come near brute beasts, nor to approve of the lying with a male, which was after unlawful pleasures on account of beauty. To those who were guilty of such insolent behavior, he ordained death for their punishment.

2. As for the priests, he prescribed to them a double lot and emolument for the exercising them in the instances above, and moreover forbade them to marry harlots. He also forbade them to marry a slave, or a captive, or such as got their living by cheating trades, and by keeping inns: as also a woman parted from her husband on any occasion whatsoever. Nay he did not think it proper for the high priest to marry even the widow of one that was dead, though he allowed that to the priests, but he permitted him only to make a marriage to women who lived in his house; but that the high priest is not to come near to one that is dead, although the rest are not prohibited from coming near to their brethren, or parents, or children, when they are dead, but is to be separated from them, and to observe purity in their sacred ministrations, but in their daily conversation, that it might be unblamable also. And on this account it is, that those who wear the sacerdotal garments, are without spot, and eminent for the purity and sanctity; nor are they permitted to drink wine so long as they wear those garments. Moreover, they offer sacrifices that are entire, and have no defect whatsoever.

3. And truly Moses gave them all these precepts, being such as were observed during his own lifetime. But though he lived now in the wilderness, yet did he make provision how they might observe the same laws when they should have taken the land of Canaan; he gave them the rest to the land from ploughing and plasting every seventh year, as he had prescribed to them to rest from working every seventh day; and ordered, that, when the period of seven years, which in all fifty years: and that fiftieth year is called by the Hebrews the Jubilee, wherein debtors are freed from their debts, and slaves are set at liberty; which slaves became such, though they were of the stock of the former owner, these laws whose punishment was not capital, but they were punished by this method of slavery. This year also restores the land to its former possessors.

* These words of Josephus are remarkable, that the twelfth of the Jews required of the priests a double degree of purity, because they are of the people of the tribes of Levi, and give several instances in reference. It was for certain the case also among the first Christians, of the clergy, in consideration of the lofty, as the Apostolical Constitutions and canons everywhere inform us.

In the manner following: when the Jubailes is come, which name denotes liberty, he that sold the land, and he that bought it, meet together and make an estimate, on one hand, of the fruits gathered, and on the other hand, of the expenses laid out upon it. If the fruits gathered come to more than the expenses laid out, he that sold it takes the land again; but if the expenses prove more than the fruits, the present possessor renders them to the former owner. Moses would have the same law observe in the cities of Levitical towns, and the villages, which were sold in villages; but he made a different law for such as were sold in a city: so if he that sold it tendered the purchaser his money again within a year, he was forced to restore it; but in case a whole year had intervened, the pur- chaser was to enjoy what he had bought. This was the constitution of the laws which Moses learned of God, when the camp lay under mount Sinai, and this he delivered in writing to the Hebrews.

4. Now when this settlement of laws seemed to be well over, Moses thought fit at length to take a review of the host, as thinking it proper to settle the affairs of war. So he charged the heads of the tribes, excepting the tribe of Levi, to take an exact account of the number of those that were able to go to war; for as to the Levites they were holy, and free from all such burdens. Now, when he had heard this in it, it was found that six hundred thousand that were able to go to war, from twenty to fifty years of age, besides three thousand six hundred and fifty. Instead of Levi, Moses took Manassah, the son of Joseph, and made a part of the tribe; and Ephraim in place of Joseph. It was indeed a desire of Jacob himself to Joseph, that he would give his sons to be his own by adoption, as I have before related.

5. When they set up the tabernacle, they received it into the midst of their camp, three of the tribes pitching their tents on each side of it, and roads were cut through the midst of these tents. It was like a well-appointed market; and every thing was there ready for sale in due order; and all sorts of artificers were in the shops; and it resembled nothing so much as a city that sometimes was movable, and sometimes fixed. The priests took the first places at the tabernacle, they thought proper to stay in the same place, as supposing that God there inhabited among them: but when that removed, they journeyed also.

6. Moreover, Moses was the inventor of the form of their trumpet, which was made of silver. Its description is this: in length it was little less than a cubit. It was composed of a narrow tube, somewhat thicker than a flute, but with so much sufficient power, that it was audible at an extent of breath of a man’s mouth; it ended in the form of a bell, like common trumpets. Its sound was called, in the Hebrew tongue, Asosra. Two of these were made, one of them was sounded when they pitched camp to the churches, and the other to congregations. When the first of them gave a sign, the heads of the tribes were to assemble, and to consult about the affairs to them.

* We must here note, with Reland, that the precepts given to the priests not to drink wine while they wore the sacred garments, is equivalent to being deposed from it all the while they ministered in the temple, because they fell always, and then only, wore those sacred garments, which were laid up there from one time of ministration to another. properly belonging; but when they gave the signal by both of them, they called the multitude together. Whenever the tabernacle was removed, it was done in this solemn order: at the first alarm of the trumpet, those whose tents were on the north quarter did the like; in the next place, the tabernacle was taken to pieces, and was carried in the midst of six tribes that went before, and six that went behind; and the rest setting out then from the tabernacle: when the third signal was given, that part which had their tents towards the west put themselves into motion; and at the fourth signal, those on the north did so likewise. They also made their sacrifices in their sacred ministrations, when they were bringing their sacrifices to the altar, as well on the Sabbaths as on the rest of the (festival) days. And now it was called the Passover, in the wilderness, as the first he had offered after the departure out of Egypt.

CHAP. XIII.

How Moses removed from Mount Sinai, and conducted the People from the Borders of Canaan.

1. A LITTLE while afterward he rose up, and went from mount Sinai; and having passed through several nations to remove; when the anathema, he came to a place called Hazeroth, where the multitude began again to be mutinous, and to blame Moses for the misfortunes they had suffered in their travels; and that when he had persuaded them of the great land of the Canaanites, they had lost that land, and instead of that happy state he had promised them, they were still wandering in their present miserable condition, being already so many of them dead by the want of water, and the means being unable to carry water, they must then utterly perish. Yet while they generally spoke many and sore things against the man, there was one of them who exhorted them not to be unmindful of Moses, and of what great pains he had bestowed about their common safety; and not to despair of assistance from God. The multitude thereupon became still more unruly, and more mutinous against Moses than before. Thereupon Moses, although since were so entirely abused by them, encouraged them in their despairing condition, and promised that he would procure them a great quantity of flesh meat, and that not for a few days only, but for many days. This they were not long in believing; and if any had asked them, whence he could obtain such a vast plenty of what he promised? he replied, neither God, nor I, although we hear such opprobrious words from you, will leave off our labors for you, and this shall appear to you. As soon as ever he had said this, the whole camp was filled with quails; and they stood round about them, and gathered them in great numbers. However, it was not long before God punished the Hebrews for their insolence, and those reproaches they had used towards him, for no small number of them died. And still to this day the place retains the memory of this destruction, and is named Kibroth-hattaavah, which is, the graves of lust.

CHAP. XIV.

How Moses sent some Persons to search out the Land of the Canaanites, and the largeness of their Cities: and further, that when those who were sent were returned, after forty Days, and reported that they could not go up for them, and extolled the strength of the Canaanites, the multitude were disturbed, and fell into despair, and were resolved to stone Moses, and to return back again into Egypt, and serve the Egyptians.

1. WHEN Moses had led the Hebrews away from thence to a place called Paran, which was near to the borders of the Canaanites, and a place difficult to be continued in, he gathered the multitude together to a congregation; and standing in the midst of them, he said, "Of the two things that God determined to bestow upon us, liberty, and the possession of a good inheritance, the one of them ye already are partakers of, by the gift of God, and the other you will quickly obtain; for we now have our abode near the borders of the Canaanites, and nothing can hinder our possession of a good inheritance."

Let us, therefore, prepare ourselves for the work, for the Canaanites will not fight against us. Let us then send spies, who may take a view of the fortifications round about them. They are the giants. But above all things, let us be of one mind, and let us honor God, who, above all, is our helper and assister."

2. When Moses had said thus, the multitude required a sign with marks of respect; and those twelve spies, of the most eminent men, one out of each tribe, who, passing over all the land of Canaan, from the borders of Egypt, came to the city Hamath, and to mount Lebanon: and having learned the nature of the country, and the strength of the Canaanites, they came home, having spent forty days in the whole work. They also brought with them of the fruits which the land bare: they also showed them the excellency of those fruits, and gave an account of the greatness of the good things, and the good good things, and that the land could not be passed over; and that the hills were so high, that they could not render traveling for them; that the cities were strong with walls, and their arm forces were mighty and strong. They told them also, that they had seen at Hebron the possession of the giants. Accordingly, these spies, who had seen the face of Canaan, when they perceived that all these difficulties were greater than they expected, that since they came out of Egypt, they were afflicted at them themselves, and endeavored to affright the multitude also.

3. So they supposed, from what they had heard, that it was impossible to get the possession of this land, and they turned away from Moses and Aaron, and so to return into Egypt.

4. But of the spies, there were Joshua, the son of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim; and Caleb, of the tribe of Judah, that were afraid of the report that came into the midst of them, and stifled the multitude, and desired them to be of good courage, and neither to condemn God, as having told them lies, neither to hearken to those who had affrighted them by telling them what was in vain, in order to excite the Canaanites to the war; but to those that encouraged them to hope for good success; and that they should gain possession of the happiness promised them, because neither the height of mountains, nor the depth of rivers, could hinder men of true courage from attaining them, especially while God would take care of them beforehand, and be assistant to them. Let us then go, said they, against our enemies, and have no suspicion of ill success, trusting to BOOK III.—CHAP. XV

God to conduct us, and following those that are to be our leaders. Thus did these two exhort them, and endeavor to pacify the rage they were in. But Moses and Aaron fell on the ground, and besought God, not for their own deliverance, but that he would put a stop to what the people were plotting: having now their minds to a quiet temper, which were now disorderly by their present passion. The cloud also did now appear, and stood over the tabernacle, and declared to them the presence of God to be there.

CHAP. XV.

How Moses was displeased at this; and foretold that God was angry, and that they should continue in the wilderness for forty years, and not (during that time) either return into Egypt, or take Possession of Canaan.

1. Moses came now boldly to the multitude, and informed them that God was moved at their abuse of him, and would inflict punishment upon them, not indeed such as they deserved for their sins, but such as parents inflict on their children, in order to their correction: for, he said, that when he was in the tabernacle, and beholding the fearful vengeance which was coming upon them, God put him in mind what things he had done for them, and what benefits they had received from him, and yet how ungrateful they had been to him; and that just now they had been induced, by the timorousness of the spies, to think that their words were truer than his own promise to them; and that on this account, through their unbelief, they should not only not be allowed to enter the wilderness, and live without any fixed habitation, and without a city, for forty years together, as a punishment for this their transgression: but that he had promised to give that land to our children, and that he would make them possessors of those good things, which, by your ungodly passions, you have deprived yourselves of.

2. Yet Moses had desired them to them, according to the direction of God, the multitude grieved, and were in affliction, and entreated Moses to procure their reconciliation to God, and to permit them no longer to wander in the wilderness, but to bestow another trial on them. But he replied, that God would not submit to any such trial, for that God was not moved to this determination from any human policy, or anger, but that he had judicially commanded them to that punishment. Now we are not to disbelieve that Moses, who was but a single person, pacified so many ten thousands when they were in anger, and converted them to a mildness of temper; for God was with him, and prepared the way to his persuasions of the multitude; and as they had been disobedient, they were now sensible that such disobedience was disadvantageous to them, and that they had still thereby fallen into calamities.

3. But this man was admirable for his virtue, and powerful in making men give credit to what he delivered, not only during the time of his natural life, but even there is still no one of the Hebrews, who does not act even now as if Moses were present, and ready to punish him. If he should do any thing that is indecent; nay, there is no one but is obedient to what laws he ordained, although they might be concealed in their transgressions. There are also many other demonstrations that his power was more than human, for still some there have been, who have come from the parts beyond Euphrates, a journey of four months, through many dangers, and great expenses, in honor of their temple; and yet, when they had offered their sacrifices, could not partake of their own sacrifices, because Moses had forbidden it, by somewhat in the law that did not permit them, or somewhat that had been fallen on them, which our ancient customs made inconsistent therewith; some of these did not sacrifice at all, and others left their sacrifices in an imperfect condition; nay, many were not able even at first so much as to enter into the temple, but went their ways in this state, as preferring a submission to the laws of Moses, before the fulfilling of their own inclinations, even when they had no fear upon them that any body could convict them, but only out of a regard to the conscience. This legislation, which appeared to be divine, made this man to be esteemed as one superior to his own human nature. Nay, farther, a little before the beginning of this war, when Claudius was emperor of the Romans, and Ismael was our high priest, and when so great a famine was come upon us, that one tenth [decal of wheat]; was sold for four drachmas; and when so less than seventy cori of flour were brought into the temple at the feast of unleavened bread, (these cori are thirty-one Sicilian, but forty-one Athenian medimmi,) not one of the priests was so hardy as to eat one crumb of it, even while so great a distress was on the land, and this out of a regard to the law, of the strictest observance, of the word and ordinance of God, as the priest, that hate us, do confes, that he who established this settlement was God, and that it was by the means of Moses, and of his virtue; but as to these matters, let every one take them as he thinks fit.

This great famine, in the days of Claudius, is again mentioned in Antiq. B. xix. chap. ii. sect. 6; and Acts xi. 28.

BOOK IV.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF THIRTY-EIGHT YEARS.—FROM THE REJECTION OF THAT GENERATION TO THE DEATH OF MOSES

CHAP. I.

The Fight of the Hebrews with the Canaanites, without the Consent of Moses, and their Defeat.

1. Now this life of the Hebrews in the wilderness was so disagreeable and troublesome to them, and they were so uneasy at it, that although God had forbidden them to meddle with the Canaanites, yet could they not be persuaded to be obedient to the words of Moses, and to be quiet; but supposing they should be able to beat their enemies, even without his approbation, they accused him, and suspected that he made it his business to keep them in a distress, that he might always stand in need of his assistance. Accordingly, they resolved to fight with the Canaanites, and said, that God gave them their assistance, not out of regard to Moses's intercessions, but because he took care of their entire nation, on account of their forefathers, whose affairs he took under his own conduct; as also, that it was on account of their own virtue that he had formerly procured them their liberty, and would be assisting to them, now they were willing to take pains for it. They also said, that they were of themselves of abilities sufficient for the conquest of their enemies, although Moses should be slain and from them; that however it was for their advantage to be their own masters, and not so far to rejoice in their deliverance from the indignities they endured under the Egyptians, as to bear the tyranny of these, and permit them to subject themselves to be deluded, and to live according to his pleasure, as though God did only foretell what concerns us out of his kindness to him, as if they were not all the posterity of Abraham, that God made his covenant with, and all the knowledge we have, and we must still learn it from him: that it would be a piece of prudence to oppose his arrogant pretences, and to put their conscience in God, and to resolve to take possession of that land which he had promised them, and not to give ear to him, who, on this account, and under the pretence of divine authority, forbade them so to do. Considering therefore the distressed state they were in at present, and that in these difficult circumstances his heart and will would be worse with them, they resolved to fight with the Canaanites, as submitting only to God, their supreme commander, and not waiting for and standing on their bezant from their legs.

2. When therefore they had come to this resolution, as being best for them, they went among their enemies; but those enemies were not dismayed either at the attack itself, or at the great multitude that made it, and received them with great courage. Many of the Hebrews were slain; and the remainder of the army, upon the disorder of their troops, were pursued, and fled, after a shameful manner to their camp. Whereupon this unforeseen misfortune made them quite despond; and they hoped for nothing that was good, as gathering from it, that this affliction came from the wrath of God, because they rashly went out to war without his approbation.

3. But when Moses saw how deeply they were affected with this defeat, and being afraid lest the enemies should grow insolent upon this victory, and should be desirous of gaining still greater glory, and should attack them, realising the fear with a host to withdraw the army into the wilderness, to a farther distance from the Canaanites; so the multitude gave themselves up again to his conduct; for they were sensible, that with the care for them, their distresses could not be in a good condition; and he caused the host to remove, and he went farther into the wilderness, as intending there to let them rest, and not to permit them to fight the Canaanites before God should afford them a more favorable opportunity.

CHAP. II.
The Sedition of Corah, and of the Multitude, against Moses, and against his Brother, concerning the Priesthood.

1. That which is usually the case of great armies, and especially upon ill success, to be hard to be pleased, and governed with difficulty, did also fall the Jews: for they being in number six hundred thousand, and by reason of their great multitude not readily subject to their governors even in prosperity they at this time were not at all in order, and against one another, and against their leader, because of the distress they were in, and the calamities they then endured. Such a sedition overtook them, as we have not the like example either among the Greeks or the barbarians, by which they were in danger of being all destroyed; but were notwithstanding saved by Moses, who would not remember that he had been almost stoned to death by them. Nor did God neglect to prevent their ruin, but notwithstanding the indignities they had offered their legislator, and the laws, and their disobedience to the commandments which he had sent them by Moses, he delivered them from those terrible calamities, which, without his providential care, had been brought upon them. So I will first speak of the cause whereof this sedition arose, and then give an account of the sedition itself; as also of what settlements Moses made for their government.

2. Corah, a Hebrew of principal account, both by his family and by his wealth, one that was also able to speak well, and one that could easily persuade the people by his speeches, said that Moses was not the man of God, that was brought up in Egypt, and knew not the language of the Egyptians, but he spake the language, and was able to converse with them; and that Moses was nothing else but his own mother's son, and that Moses had taken his place and seat among them, and deposed him; and he said such a sentence against Moses as he could not endure, and envied him on that account, he was of the same tribe with Moses, and of the kin (to him,) was particularly grieved, because he thought he better deserved that honorable post on account of his great riches, and not inferior to him in his birth. So he raised a clanour against him among the Levites, who were of the same tribe, and especially among his kindred, saying, that it was a very bad thing that they should be ruled by him; and that his highness and power would be worse with them, they resolved to fight with the Canaanites, as submitting only to God, their supreme commander, and not waiting for and standing on their bezant from their legs.

2. When therefore they had come to this resolution, as being best for them, they went among their enemies; but those enemies were not dismayed either at the attack itself, or at the great multitude that made it, and received them with great courage. BOOK IV.—CHAP. III.

raising a clamor before the tabernacle of God, to prosecute the tyrant, and to relieve the multiples of suffering which were immanent in the color of the divine commandments, laid violent ins-uctions upon them; for that, had it been God who chose one that was to perform the office of a priest, he would have raised a worthy person to that dignity, and would not have produced such a one as was inferior to many others, nor have given him that office; and in that case had he judged it fit to bestow it on Aaron, he would have permitted it to the multitude to bestow it, and have left it to be bestowed by his own other.

4. Now, although Moses had a great while ago foreseen this calamity of Corah, and had seen that the people were irritated, and had not been frighted at it: but being of good courage, because he had given them good advice about their affairs, and knew that his brother had been made partaker of the priesthood at the command of God and not by his own favor to be in the assembly; and, as for the multitude, he said not a word to them, but spake as loud to Corrah as he could; and being very skillful in making speeches, and having this natural talent among others, he might have been able to gather up the multitude, though they may not be so rich or so great as you are: nor have I taken and given this office to my brother, because he excelled others in riches, for those things were left under him, who, under with his discourses, he said, "O Corah, both thou, and all these with thee, (pointing to the two hundred and fifty men,) seem to be worthy of this honor; nor do I pretend but that this whole congregation might be under him, who, under wealth; nor indeed because he was of an em-sent family, for God, by giving us the same common ancestor, has made our families equal; nay, nor was it out of brotherly affection, which another had for another, that I appointed him; unless I had bestowed this honor out of regard to God and to his laws, I had not passed by myself, and given it to another, as being nearer of kin to myself than to my brother, and having a clearer intimacy with my mind than I have with him; for surely, it would not be a wise thing for me, to expose myself to the dangers of offending, and to bestow the happy employment on this accident upon another. But I am above such base practices; I would God I could believe, in truth it was with you approbation that he obtained it; for though God were the donor, yet do we not offend when we think fit to accept it with your good will; yet would it have been an insult to God, if they should think fit to have used employment when he offered it; nay, it had been exceeding unreasonable, when God had thought fit any one should have it for all time to come, and had made them to have reserved it.

However, he himself will judge again who it shall be whom he would have to offer sacrifices to him, and to have the directions of matters of religion; for it is absurd that Corah, who is ambitious of this honor, should depive God of the power of giving it to whom he pleases. Put an end therefore to your sedition and disturbance on this occasion; today and row morning do every one of you that desire the priesthood bring a censer from home, and come bitter with incense and fire; and do thou, O Corah, leave the judgment to God, and await to see on which side he will give his determination upon this occasion; but do not thou make thyself greater than God. Do thou also come, that this content about this honorable employment may receive determination. And I suppose we will admit Aaron, with thy consent, to offer himto himself to this scrutiny, since he is of the same lineage with thyself, and has done nothing in his priesthood that can be liable to exception. Come together, and offer your sacrifice in public before all the people; and when you offer it, he, whose sacrifice God shall accept shall be ordained to the priesthood, and shall be clear of the present calamity on Aaron, as if I had granted him that favor because he was my brother."

CHAP. III.

How those that stirred up this Sedition were destroyed according to the Will of God; and how

Aaron, Moses's Brother, both he and his Posterity, retained the Priesthood.

1. WHEN Moses had said this, the multitude left off the tumult, and were not more disturbed, and the suspicion they had of Moses's detrimen-ted what he had said, for those proposals were good, and so were esteeemed of the people.

At that time therefore they dissolved the assembly. But on the next day they came to the concgregation, in order to be present at the sacrifice, and at the determination that was to be made between the candidates for the priesthood.

Now this congregation proved a turbulent one, and the multitude with great satisfaction decided of what was to be done; for some of them would have been pleased if Moses had been convicted of evil practices, but the wiser sort desired that they might be delivered from the present disorder and disturbance; for they were afraid, that if this sedition went on, the good order of their settlement would rather be destroyed; but the whole body of the people do naturally delight in clamors against their governors, by changing their tongues and languages of every speaker, disturb the public tranquility.

And now Moses sent messengers for Abiram and Dathan, and ordered them to come to the assembly, and wait to hear the determination to be performed. But they answered the messengers that they would not obey his summons;

nay, would not overlook Moses's behavior, who was growing too great for them by evil practices.

Now when Moses heard of this their answer, he desired the heads of the people to follow him and he went to the faction of Dathan, not thinking it any frightful thing at all to go to these insolent people; so they made no opposition, but went along with him. But when they arrived, they strangers, they understood that Moses and the principal of the people were coming to them, came out with their wives and children, and stood before their tents, and looked to see what

Moses would say, and they had determined about them to defend themselves, in case Moses would use force against them.

2. But he came near, and lifted up his hands to heaven, and cried with a loud voice, that he must be heard by the whole multitude; and said,

"O Lord of the creatures that are in the heavens, in the earth, and in the sea; for thou art the most authentic witness to what I have done, that it has all been done by thy appointment, and that both the Jews and Mahommedans, as well as Josephus are full of it."

it was thou that afforded us assistance when we attempted any thing, and showedst mercy on the Hebrews in all their distresses, do thou come now, and hear all that I say, for no action or thought escapes thy knowledge; so that thou wilt not disdain to speak what is true, for my vindication, without any regard to the unprofitable imputations of these men. As for what was done before I was born, thou knowest best, as not learning them by report, but seeing them, and being present with them when they were done; but I, in the exercise of these, and which of these men, although they know them well enough, unjustly pretend to suspect, be thou my witness. When I lived a private quiet life, I left those good things, which by my own diligence, and by the grace of God, I enjoyed with my father-in-law, and gave myself up to this people, and underwent many miseries on their account. I also bore great labors at first, in order to obtain the greatest part of it; thou, who didst preserve it, and always showed myself ready to assist them in every distress of theirs. Now, therefore, since I am suspected by those very men, whose being is owing to my labors, consider it is reasonable to trust thou wilt do so: thou, I say, who showedst me that fire at mount Sinai, and madest me hear its voice, and to see the several wonders which that place afforded me: thou, who commandedst me to go to Egypt, and openedst the doors of this people; thou, who disturbed the happy estate of the Egyptians, and gavest me the opportunity of flying away from our slavery under them, and madest the dominion of Pharaoh inferior to my dominion: thou, who didst make the sea dry before us, when we were naked: thou who didst make the fountains that were corrupted to flow so as to be fit for drinking, and didst furnish us with water that came out of the rocks, when we were in the wilderness: thou, who didst keep the remnant of my intentions, as I had given the priesthood to Aaron, not at thy command, but out of my own favor to him: do thou at this time demonstrate, that all things are administered by thy providence, and that nothing happens by chance, but is governed by thy will, and thereby attains its end: as also demonstrate, that thou takest care of those that have done good to the Hebrews: demonstrate this, I beseech thee, both of the punishment of Ahab and Dathan, who condemn thee as an insensible being, and one overcome by my contrivance. This wilt thou do by inflicting such an open punishment on these men, who so madly fly in the face of thy glory, and throw themselves out of the world, not in an ordinary manner, but so that it may appear they do not die after the manner of other men; let that ground which they tread upon, open about them, and consume them with their families and goods. This will be a demonstration of thy power to all men; and this method of their sufferings will be an instruction of wisdom for those that entertain profound sentiments of thee. By this means I shall be found a good servant, in the midst of my enemies; for I will show them the unlawful imputations of these men. As for the calamities they have raised against me be true, mayest thou preserve these men from every evil accident, and bring all that destruction on me which I have impregnated upon them. And when thou art pleased, I beseech thee, to endeavor to deal unjustly with this people, bestow upon them concord and peace. Save that multitude that follow thy commandments, and preserve them free from harm, and let them not make of the punishment of others, that have sinned; for thou knowest thyself, it is not just, that for the wickedness of those men, the whole body of the Israelites should suffer punishment."

3. When Moses closed, they thought he was in tears in his eyes, the ground was moved on a sudden; and the agitation that set it in motion was like that which the wind produces in the waves of the sea. The people were all afflicted, and the ground的衣服 the wind, and the noise with a terrible sound, and carried whatsoever was dear to the seditions into itself, who so entirely perished, that there was not the least appearance that any man had ever been seen there: none knew what had come about them, closing again, and becoming entire as it was before, insomuch that such as saw it afterward did not perceive that any such accident had happened. Thus did these men perish, and was a demonstration of the fear of God. And truly, any one would lament them, not only on account of this calamity that befell them, which yet deserves our commiseration, but also on account of the use of the things they were made of; for they used with pleasure the fruits of the earth, and the fruits of Aaron also and Corah came forth, and they all offered incense, in those censers of theirs which they brought with them, before the tabernacle. Hereupon so great a fire shone out as no one ever saw in any that is made by the hand of man, neither in those eruptions out of the earth, that are caused by subterraneous burnings, nor in such fires as rise of their own accord in the woods, when the agitation is produced by the trees rubbing one against another, but this fire was very bright, and had a terrible flame, such as is kindled at the command of God; by whose eruptions on them, all the company, and Corah himself, and all his band, fell down, and their very bodies left no remains behind them. Aaron alone was preserved, and not at all hurt by the fire, because it was God that sent the fire to burn those only who ought to be burned. Hereupon the people were amazed, and desirous that the memory of this judgment might be delivered down to posterity, and that future ages might be acquainted with it; and so he com

BOOK IV.—CHAP. IV.

What happened to the Hebrews during Thirty-eight Years in the Wilderness.

1. However, this sedition was so far from ceasing upon this destruction, that it grew much stronger, and many more, and the occasion of its growing worse was of that nature as made it likely the calamity would never cease; but last for a long time: for the men believing already that nothing is done without the providence of God, could have it that things came thus to pass without God’s favor to Moses; they therefore laid the blame upon him, that God was so angry, and that this happened not so much because of the wickedness of the people as that God the first procured their punishment, because Moses procured their punishment; and that these men had been destroyed without any sin of theirs, only because they were zealous about the divine worship; and as also that he who had been the cause of it, had not only disappointed the hopes of all the other men, but of so many men, and those the most excellent of them all, besides his escaping any punishment himself, had given the priesthood to his brother so firmly, that nobody could any longer bring it with him. For so, if one were to remain from it, it would now be at his will, since he must have seen that those that first did so to have miserably perished. Nay, besides this, the kindred of those that were destroyed had a double reason for disliking him, because he only desired the heads of the tribes to bring their rods, with the names of their tribes inscribed upon them; and that he should receive the priesthood, in whose rod God should give a sign of the law. Therefore he said, So the Lord brought their rods, as did Aaron also, who had written the tribe of Levi on his rod. These rods Moses laid up in the tabernacle of God. On the next day he brought out the rods, which were known from one another by those who brought them, they having distinctly noted them, as had the multitude also; and as to the rest, in the same form Moses received them, in that they saw them still; but they were such that buds and branches grew out of Aaron’s rod, with ripe fruits upon them; they were almonds, the rod having been cut out of that tree. The people were so amazed at this strange sight, that though Moses and Aaron were afraid of the power of God, they now laid that hatred aside, and began to admire the judgment of God concerning them; so that hereafter they applauded what God had decreed, and permitted Aaron to enjoy the priesthood peacefully. And thus God ordained him priest three several times, and he retained that honor without farther disturbance. And hereby this sedition of the Hebrews, which had been a great one, and had lasted a great while, was at last composed.

3. And now Moses, because the tribe of Levi was made free from war and warlike expeditions and was set apart for the divine worship, lest they should want, and seek after the necessaries of life, and so neglect the temple, commanded the Hebrews, according to the will of God, that when they should gain the possession of the land of Canaan, they should assign forty-eight good and fair cities to the Levites; and permit them to enjoy their revenue, as the land of two thousand cubits would extend from the walls of the city. And besides this, he appointed that the people should pay the tithe of their annual fruits of the earth, both of the Levites and of the priests. And this is what that tribe receives of the multitude: but I think it necessary to set down what is paid by all, particularly to the priests.

4. Accordingly, he commanded the Levites to yield up to the priests thirteen of their forty-eight cities, and to set apart for them the tenth part of the tithes which they every year receive of the people; as also, that it was but just to offer to God the first-born of their cattle, as well as the first-born of their flocks. For the first-born of all men, and the first-born of all beasts, are the multitudes of them which are not appointed for sacrifices, if it be a male, to the priests, to be slain, that they and their entire families may eat them in the cities; but the first-born of the land, and those first-born which are not appointed for sacrifices in the laws of our country, should bring a shekel and a half in their stead; but for the first-born of a man, five shekels: these they should also have the power of selling. And that is the eating of the sheep; and that when any baked bread corn, and made loaves of it, they should give somewhat of what they had baked to them. Moreover when they made bread of meal, to the priests, and those that are called ‘Nazarites,’ that suffer their hair to grow long, and use no wine, when they consecrate their hair, and offer it for a sacrifice, they are to allot that hair to the priests, [to be thrown into the fire.] Such also as dedicate themselves to God, as a corban, which denotes what the Greeks call a ‘gift,’ when they are desirous of being freed from that ministration, are to lay down money for the priests; thirty shekels a head, five shekels a woman; if it be a female; but if any be too poor to pay the appointed sum, it shall be lawful for the priests to determine that sum as they think fit. And if any slain beasts at home for a private festival, but not for a religious one, they are to allot the head to the priest, as a right shoulder of the sacrifice, to the priests. With these Moses convinced that the priests should be plentifully main tained, besides what they had out of those offerings for sins which the people gave them, as I have set it down in the foregoing book. He also ordered, that out of every thing allotted for the priests, their servants, [their sons,] their daughter, their wives, should partake, as well as themselves, excepting what came to them out of the sacrifices that were offered for sins: for of those none but the males of the families of the priests might eat, and this in the temple also, and that the same they might eat after the priestly custom.

5. When Moses had made these constitutions after the sedition was over, he removed, together with the whole army, and came to the borders of Edom. He then asked of the king of Edom leave to pass through the Idumæans, and desired him to give him his passage through his kingdom, and agreed to send him what hostages he should desire, to secure him from any injury. He desired him also, that as would allow his army liberty to buy provisions; and, if he resisted it, he would pay down a price for the very water they should drink. But the king was not pleased with this embassage from Moses: nor did he allow a passage for the army, but brought his people armed to the water, and to hinder them, in case they should endeavor to force their passage. Upon which Moses consulted God by the oracle, who would not have him begin the war first; and so he withdrew his forces, and travelled round about the wilderness, that he might not terrify them, that he should desire to sell them their very water. But Sihon refused his offer, and put his army into battle array, and was preparing every thing in order to meet their passing over Amor.

2. When the Amorites, the Amorite king was disposed to enter upon hostilities with them,
he thought he ought not to bear that insult; and determining to win the Hebrews from their in-their cities, which were strong, from which they had been used to the plough, or to husbandry: that was complete in all its parts, and entirely of a red color, at a little distance from the camp, into a place perfectly clean. This heifer was slaughtered in the open forest, and her blood sprinkled
with his finger, seven times before the tabernacle of God: after this, the entire heifer was burnt
in that state, together with its skin and entrails,
and they threw cedar wood, and hyssop, and
some salt, upon the midst of the fire; then a clean man gathered all her ashes together, and laid them in a place perfectly clean. When therefore any persons were defiled by a dead body, they put a little of these ashes into spring water, and bathed in it; and of the rest of the ashes in it, they sprinkled them with it, both on the third day, and on the seventh, and after that they were clean. This he enjoined them to do also when the tribes should come into their own lands.

7. Now when this purification, which their leader made upon the mourning for his sister, as it has been now described, was over he caused
the army to remove, and to march through the wilderness, and through Arabia. And when he came to a place which the Hebrews esteemed
their metropolis, which was formerly called "Aree," but has now the name of "Petra," at this place water, in the midst of which was mounted with mountains. Here Aaron went up one of them, in the sight of the whole army, Moses having before told him that he was to die, for this place was over against them. He put off his pontilic garments, and dressed himself in the priestly robe of the high priesthood belonged, because he was the elder brother, and died while the multitude looked upon him. He died in the same year wherein he lost his sister, having lived in all a hundred and twenty and three years. He died the first day of that lunar month which is called by the Athenians 'Hecatombons,' by the Macedonians
"Lous," but by the Hebrews "Abba."

CHAP. V.

How Moses conquered Sihon and Og, kings of the Amorites, and destroyed their whole Army, and then divided their Land by Lot to two Tribes and a half of the Hebrews.

§ 1. The people mourned for Aaron thirty days: and when this mourning was over, Moses removed the army from that place, and came to the river Arnon, which is issuing out of the mountains of Arabia, and running through all that wilderness, fell into the lake Asphaltitis, and be-

Josephus here uses this phrase, when the fortieth year was completed, for when it was begun; as does St.
Lake, when the day of Pentecost was completed, Act R.

4 Whether Miriam died, as Josephus's Greek copy temptly, on the first day of the month, may be doubted; came the limit between the land of the Moabites and the land of the Amorites. This land is fruitful, and sufficient to maintain a great number of men with the good things it produces. Moses, therefore, sent messengers to Sihon, the king of this country, desiring that he would grant his army a passage, upon what security he should please to require; he promised that he should be noway injured, neither as to that country which Sihon governed, nor as to its inhabitants; and that he would buy his provisions at such a price as would be a slaughter of advantage, and he should desire to sell them their very water. But Sihon refused his offer, and put his army into battle array, and was preparing every thing in order to meet their passing over Amor.

2. When the Amorites, the Amorite king
was disposed to enter upon hostilities with them,
he thought he ought not to bear that insult; and determining to win the Hebrews from their in-
their cities, which were strong, from which they had been used to the plough, or to husbandry: that
was complete in all its parts, and entirely of a red color, at a little distance from the camp,
into a place perfectly clean. This heifer was slaughtered in the open forest, and her blood sprinkled
with his finger, seven times before the tabernacle of God: after this, the entire heifer was burnt
in that state, together with its skin and entrails,
and they threw cedar wood, and hyssop, and
some salt, upon the midst of the fire; then a clean man gathered all her ashes together,
and laid them in a place perfectly clean. When
therefore any persons were defiled by a dead
body, they put a little of these ashes into spring
water, and bathed in it; and of the rest of the ashes in it, they sprinkled them with it, both on the third day, and on the seventh, and after that
also when the tribes should come into their own lands.

7. Now when this purification, which their leader made upon the mourning for his sister, as
the army to remove, and to march through the wilderness, and through Arabia. And when he came to a place which the Hebrews esteemed
their metropolis, which was formerly called 'Aree,' but has now the name of 'Peta,' at this place
water, in the midst of which was mounted with mountains. Here Aaron went up one of them, in the sight of the whole army, Moses having before told him that he was to die, for this place was over against them. He put off his pontilic garments, and
dressed himself in the priestly robe of the high priesthood belonged, because he was the
elder brother, and died while the multitude looked upon him. He died in the same year wherein
he lost his sister, having lived in all a hundred and twenty and three years. He died the first day of that lunar month which is called by the Athenians 'Hecatombons,' by the Macedonians
"Lous," but by the Hebrews 'Abba.'
they took the enemies prisoners, for they could soway put a stop to them, since all the fighting men were destroyed. Such was the destruction which overtook the Amorites, who were neither nagious in council, nor courageous in action.
Hence oppression against Jericho. The great power of the land, which is a country situate between three rivers and naturally resembling an island, the river Arnon being its southern limit: the river Jabbok determining its northern side, which running into the sea, it beheld an unobstructed name in haste to the assistance of his friend Si-son. But though he found him already slain, yet did he resolve still to come and fight the Hesbrews, supposing he should be too hard for them, and being desirous to try their valor; but falling of his hope, he was both himself slain in the battle, and all his army was destroyed. So Moses passed over the river Jabbok, and over-ran the kingdom of Og. He took up his ambassadors, and treated them very kindly, and when he had sup-pied, he inquired what was God's will; and what this matter was for which the Midianites entreated him to come to them? But when God opposed him, he came to try them. And he told them, that he was himself very willing and desirous to comply with their request, but in-firmed them that God was opposite to his intentions; even that God had raised him to a great reputation, and on account of his predictions, for this army which they entreated him to come to curse, was in the favor of God; on which account he advised them to go home again, and not to persist in their enmity against the Israelites: and when he had given them that answer, he dismissed the ambassadors.

3. Now the Midianites, at the earnest request and fervent entreaties of Balasch, sent other ambassadors to Balsam, with the further aggravating of the men, inquired again of God; but he was dispelled at this [second] trial, and bid him by no means to contradict the ambassadors. Now Bal-sch did not imagine that God gave him this injunction in order to deceive him, for he sat along with the ambassadors; but when the divine angel met him in the way, when he was in a narrow passage, and hedged in with a wall on both sides, and the angel stood and told him that it was a divine spirit that met him, and thrust Balsam into one of the walls, without regard to the stripes which Balsam, when he was hurst by the wall, gave her; but when the man, upon the angel's continuing to distress her,
and upon the stripes which were given her, dfell down, by the will of God, she made use of the voice of a man, and complained of Balsam, as acting unjustly to her; that whereas he had no fault to find with her for her forbearance to him, he now inflicted stripes upon her, as not uncrimed. Josephus never scruples to admit, as ever cotaining such wicked men justly and providentially de-certed.) But it would be better, were we here to expound the text, which says, Numbr. xxii. 30, 31, that God only permitted Balsam to go along with the ambassadors, in case they came and called him, or positively insisted on his going along with them, on any terms; whereas Balsam seems, out of impatience, to have risen up in the morning and called his name, and rather to have called them, than said for their calling him; so zealous does he seem to have been for his reward of divination; his conduct and the circumstances, see Numbr. xiv. 26, Psal. lii. 15; Jude 3, 11; which reward or wages the truly religious prophets of God never required nor accepted, as our Josephus strenuously opposed.)

CHAP. VI.
Concerning Balsam the Prophet, and what kind of a man he was.

1. Now Moses, when he had brought his army to Jordan, pitched his camp in the great plain of Gennesaret, to gain himself the happy situation, and very fit for producing palm-trees and balsam. And now the Israelites began to be very proud of themselves, and were very eager for fighting. Moses then, after he had offered for a few days sacrifices of thanksgiving to God, and feasted the people, sent a party of armed men to lay waste the country of the Mi-dianites, and to take their cities. Now the occasion which he took for making war upon them was this:

* What Josephus here remarks is well worth our remark in this place also, viz. that the Israelites were ne-ved to seek for squalor, either in the land of any other people but those belonging to the land of Canaan, and the countries of Bithynia and Os beyond Jordan, as far as the desert and Euphrates, and that, therefore, no other people had reason to fear the conquest of the Israelites; but that those countries, given them by God, remained in possession of the possessed nations; and that all who endeavored to possess them might ever be justly destroyed by them.

The wages of unrighteousness are to be Balsam to be an Idolater, nor to seek idolatrous enforcements, or to prophecy falsely, but to be no other than an ill-disposed prophet, and to the utter ruin of the state. For when they were not permitted to go in the second time, permitting him to go was ironical, and on design that he should be deceived (which sort of deception, by way of punishment for former understanding that she was bribed from serving him in what he was now going about, by the providence of God. And when he was disturbed by reason of the voice of the angel, which was that of a man, the angel plainly appeared to him, and blamed him for the stripes he had given his ass, and informed him that the brute creature was not in fault, and that he was himself responsible for his jouneyman being contrary to the will of God. Upon which Balaam was afraid, and was preparing to return back again, yet did God excite him to go on his intended way; but added this injunction, that he should do nothing but what he himself should suggest to his mind.

4. When God had given him this charge, he came to Balak; and when the king had entertained him in a magnificent manner, he desired him over the people of the Amorites. You take an interest of the state of the camp of the Hebrews. Balak himself came to the mountain, and brought the prophet along with him, with a royal attendance. This mountain lay over their heads, and was distant so as to try the world of the camp. Now when he saw them, he desired the king to build him seven altars, and to bring him as many bulls and rams; to which desire the king assented. They offered him these, slew the bulls, and offered them as burnt-offerings, that he might observe some signal of the flight of the Hebrews. Then said he, "Happy is this people on whom God bestows the possession of immortality; they have his own providence to be their assistant and their guide; so that there is not any nation among mankind but you will be esteemed superior to them in virtue, and in the earnest prosecution of the best rules of life, and of such as are pure from wickedness, and will leave those excellent rules to your children, and this out of the regard that God bears to you, and the provision of such things for you as may render you happier than any other people under the stars. You shall retain that land to which he hath sent you; and it shall ever be under the command of your children; and both all the earth, as well as the seas, shall be filled with your glory: and you shall be sufficient, and shall abound in prosperity. You shall shall be sufficient, and shall abound in prosperity. You shall be a light unto your God, and the light of the whole earth; and all the children of Canaan can now hold you, as being yet comparatively a few: but know ye that the whole world is proposed to be your place of habitation forever. The multitude of your posterity also shall live as princes on the earth, and shall be the terror of the earth even as of its princes. May the children of your enemies have an inclination to fight against you; and may they be so hard as to come to arms, and to assault you in battle, for they will not return with victory, for their return shall be slaughter of their children and wives. To so great a degree of valor will you be raised by the providence of God, who is able to diminish the influence of some, and to supply the wants of others."

And he spoke in general, as not being in his own power, but moved to say what he did by the divine Spirit. But when Balaam was displeased, and said he had broken the contract he had made, whereby he was to come as he and his confederates had invited him, by the promise of great presents; for whereas he was required to curse their enemies, he had made an encomium upon them, and had declared that they were the happiest of men. To which Balak replied, "O Balak, if thou rightly considerst the things I have said to thee, it is in our power to be silent, or to say anything when the spirit of God seizes upon us? for he puts such words as he pleases into our mouths, and such discourses as we are not ourselves able to use. Of that we will remove all that entreaties both you and the Midianites so joyfully brought me hither, and on that account I took this journey. It was my prayer that I might not put any afront upon you, as to what you desired of me but God shall make you in all respects to pursue the purposes I had made to serve you; for those that take upon them to foretell the affairs of mankind, as from their own abilities, are entirely unable to do it, or to forbear to utter what God saith to do, till men have seen it done; and for when he prevents us, and enters into us, nothing that we say is our own. I then did not intend to praise this army, nor to go over the several cities and the Midianites, as a manner of torturing them, but to build upon them a happy life, and eternal glory, he suggested the declaration of those things to me. But now, because you have desired this, he has also given you the Midianites, as well as the Midianites, whose entreaties it is not decent for me to reject. go to, let us again rear other altars, and offer the like sacrifices that we did before; that I may see whether I can persuade God to permit me to bless these men, even as the Midianites, whose entreaties it is not decent for me to reject. go to, let us again rear other altars, and offer the like sacrifices that we did before; that I may see whether I can persuade God to permit me to bless these men, even as the Midianites, whose entreaties it is not decent for me to reject."

Which, when Balak had agreed to, God would not, even upon second sacrifices, consent to his cursing the Israelites. Then fell Balaam upon his face, and foretold what calamities God would bring upon the Israelites and the nations, and the most eminent cities, some of which of old were not so much as inhabited; which events have come to pass among the several people concerned, both in the foregoing ages, and in time to come. Balak, the king of the Amorites, and the princes of the Midianites, and spake thus to them: "O Balak, and you Midianites that are here present, (for I am obliged, even without the will of God, to gratify you,) it is true no entire destruction can come upon the nation of the Hebrews, neither by war, nor by plague, nor by scarcity of the fruits of the earth, nor can any other unexpected accident be their entire ruin, for the providence of God is concerned to preserve them from such a misfortune, nor will it permit any such calamity to come upon them whereby they may all perish: but some small misfortunes, and those for a short time, whereby they may appear to be brought low, may still be for their good, whereby they may be reformed, and, again, to the terror of those that brought those mischief upon them. So that if you have a

\(^*\) Whether Josephus had in his copy but two ajusions, the province of Balaam in all to curse Israel, or whether, by this his transferring the narrative, he meant to indicate that first time already mentioned, which yet is not very probable, cannot now be certainly determined. In the former, which latter conjecture, the whole attempt of Balaam to curse them in the present history, is such a large and distinct account of this perversion of the Israelites by the Midianitish women, of which all the other writers agree, but Josephus in the Samaritan xxxi. 16; 2 Pet. ii. 15; Jud. ver. 11. Apoc. ii. 14, is preserved, as Balsam informs us, in the Samaritan chronicles, in which of the writings of the Jews, as well as here by Josephus.
and to gain a victory over them for a short space of time, you will obtain it by following my directions: do you therefore set out the handsomest of such of your daughters as are most eminent for beauty, and proper to force and conquer the modesty of those that behold them, and these decked and trimmed to the highest degree you are able: then do you send them to be near the Israelites' camp; and give them in charge, that when the young men of the Hebrews desire their company, they may have no scruple in accepting it. And in them you see that they are enamored of them, let them take their leave; and if they entreat them to stay, let them not give their consent till they have persuaded them to leave off of their own accord, in their own strength of the worship of that God whom they established them, and worship the gods of the Midianites and the Moabites; for by this means God will be angry at them. " Accordingly, when he suggested this counsel to them, he went his way.

7. So when the Midianites had sent their daughters, as Balaam had exhorted them, the Hebrew young men were charmed by their beauty, and came "to discourse with them, and beg them not to grudge them the enjoyment of their beauty, nor to deny them their conversation. These daughters of the Midianites received their words gladly, and consented to it, and said with them, but marry them not; for that they are but the daughters of Midian, and their inclination to them were grown to ripeness, they began to think of departing from them; then it was that these men became greatly disconsolate at the women's departure, and contracted with them, and called God for the arbitrator of what they promised; and this with tears in their eyes, and all other marks of concern as might show how miserable they thought themselves without them, and so might move their compassion for them. So the women, as soon as they perceived they had made them their slaves, and had caught them with their conversation, began to speak thus to them:

8. You illustrious young men! we have houses of our own at home, and great plenty of good things there, together with the natural affectionate love of our parents and friends; nor is it out of our want of any such things that we consented to go with you, and become your slaves. This was not of your invitation with design to prostitute the beauty of our body for gain, but taking you for brave and worthy men, we agreed to your request, that we may treat you with such honors as hospitality required; and now, seeing you say that you have a great affection for us, and are troubled when you think we are departing, we are not averse to your entreaties; and if we may receive such assurance of your good will as will at this time inspire such confidence in you, as will lead our lives with you as your wives, but we are afraid that you will in time be weary of our company, and will then abuse us, and send us back again to the same men among whom we now are; and they desired that they would excuse them in their guarding against that danger. But the young men pressed them they would give them any assurance they should desire; nor did they at all contradict what they requested, so great was the passion they had for them. "If them, (said they) this be your resolution, since you make use of such customs and conduct of life as are entirely different from all other men, it is certain that your kinds of food are peculiar to yourselves, and your kinds of drink not common to others, it will be absolutely necessary, if you would have us for your wives, that you do worship the gods of this land nor can you possibly make any demonstration of the kindness which you say you already have, and promise to have hereafter to us, than this, that you worship the same gods that we do; for has any one reason to complain, that now your company becomes involved, you should worship the proper gods of the same country? especially while our gods are common to all men, and yours such as belong to nobody else but on account of the worthiness of their fathers, they must either come into such methods of divine worship as all others came into, or else they must look out for another world, wherein they may live by themselves, according to their own laws.

9. Now these young men were overcome by the fondness they had for these women, to think they spake very well, so they gave themselves up to what they persuaded them, and transgressed their own laws, and supposed there were many gods; and considering that they thought the Midianites and Moabites according to the laws of that country which ordained them, they both were delighted with their strange food, and went on to do every thing that the women would have them do, though in their own conscience they knew it was contrary to their own laws; and so they did, so that this transgression was already gone through the whole army of the young men, and they fell into a sedition that was much worse than the former, and in danger of the entire abolition of their own institutions; for when those men had tasted of these strange customs, they went with insatiable inclinations into them; and even where some of the principal men were illustrious on account of the worthiness of their fathers, they also were corrupted with the rest.

10. Even Zimri, the head of the tribe of Simeon, compassed with Cushi, a Midianitish woman, who was the daughter of Sur, a man of authority in that country; and being eloped by his wife to disregard the law of Moses, and to follow those she was used to, he complied with her, and this both by sacrificing after a manner different from his own, and by taking a stranger to wife. With those words the holy writer exhorts all that matters should grow worse, and called the people to a congregation, but then accused nobody by name, as unwilling to drive those into despair, who, by lying concealed might come to repentance; but he said, "That they did not do what was either worthy of themselves, or of their fathers, by preferring pleasure to God, and to the living according to his will: that it was fit they should change their courses, while their affairs were still in their hands; and that these things to be true constitude which offers not violence to their laws, but that which resists their laws. And besides that, he said, it was not a reasonable thing, when they did not take care how they lived, to act madly now they were in prosperity; and that they ought not to lose, now they have abun dance, what they had gained when they had lit tis.” And so did he endeavor, by saying this, to correct the young men, and to bring them to repentance for what they had done.

11. But Zimri arose up after him, and said, “Yes, indeed, Moses, thou art at liberty to make use of such laws as thou art so fond of, and hast, by acquiescing thyself to them, made them firm; otherwise, if things had not been thus, thou hadst often been punished before now, and hadst known that the Hebrews are not easily put upon; but he always had the misfortune to follow, in thy tyrannical commands, for thou dost nothing else hitherto, but, under pretence of laws, and of God, wickedly impose upon us slavery, and gain dominion over us, while at the same time we are the vehicles of life, which consists in acting according to our own wills, and is the right of freemen, and of those that have no lord over them. Nay, indeed, this man is harder upon the done, the people held the peace, both out of fear of what might come upon them, and because they saw that their legislator was not willing to bring his insolence before the public any farther, or openly to contend with him, for he avoided that; but he never stirred in the following occasion: Phineas, a man in other respects better than the rest of the young men, and also one that surpassed his contemporaries in the dignity of his father, (for he was the son of Eleazar the high priest, and the grandson of Aaron) Moses his brother, who was greatly troubled at what was done by Zimri, resolved in earnest to inflict punishment on him, before his unworthy behavior should grow any further by impunity; and in order to prevent this, he sent a message from Phineas, the high priest, which would happen if the ringleaders were not punished. He was of so great magnanimity, both in strength of mind and body, that when he came to publish the following occasion, he did not leave it off still he overcome it, and got an entire victory; so he came into Zimri’s tent, and slew him with his javelin, and with it he slew Cozbi also. Upon which all those young men that were there at the time of this glorious action, imitated Phineas’s boldness, and slew those that were found to be guilty of the same crime with Zimri. Accordingly, many of those that had transgressed perished by the magnanimous valor of these young men: the rest all perished by a plague, which distemper God himself inflicted upon them: so that all those their kindred, who, instead of hindering them from such wicked actions, as they ought to have done, had persuaded them to go on, were esteemed by God as partners in their wickedness, and died. Accordingly, there perished out of the army no fewer than fourteen [twenty-four] thousand at that same time.

13. This was the cause why Moses was provoked to send an army to destroy the Midianites: concerning which expedition we shall speak presently, and particularly when the Midianites were present; and do not intermit; for it is but just not to pass over our legislator’s due encomium, on account of his conduct here, because, although this Balanam, who was sent for by the Midianites to curse the nation, which Phineas was made mention a little by divine Providence, did still suggest that advice to them, by making use of which our enemies had well nigh corrupted the whole multitude of the Hebrews with their wiles, till some of them were more or less infected: yet did he not do him great honor, by setting down his prophecies in writing. And while it was in his power to claim this glory to himself, and make men believe they were his own predictions, there being no one that could be a witness against him, and accuse him for so doing, he still gave his attestation to him, and did him the honor to make mention of him on this account. But let every one think of these matters as he pleases.

CHAP. VII.

How the Hebrews fought with the Midianites, and overcame them.

11. Now Moses sent an army against the land of Midian, for the causes forementioned, in all twelve thousand, taking an equal number out of every tribe, and appointed Phineas for their commander, and asked them to come with him, and they assembled their army together, and fortified the entrances into their country, and there awaited the enemy’s coming. When they were come, and they had joined battle with them, and were perfectly the most of the Midianites had fell, and could they be numbered they were very many: and among them fell all their kings, five in number, viz.: Évi, Zür, Rebas, Her, and Rekem, who was of the same name with a city, the chief and capital of all Arabs, which is till now so called by the whole Arabian nation, ‘Aрам,’ from the name of the king that built it, but is by the Greeks called ‘Petra.’ Now when the enemies were overcome, and the Hebrews spoiled their country, and took a great prey, and destroyed the men that were its inhabitants, together with the women; only they let the virgins alone, as Moses had commanded Phineas to do, who indeed came back with much spoil. But the Midianites, although they had done no harm, and a great deal of prey: fifty-two thousand besses, seventy-five thousand six hundred sheep, sixty thousand asses, with an immense quantity of gold and silver furniture that was destroyed, which was doubtless done for they were so wealthy, that they were very luxurious. There were also led captive about thirty-two thousand virgins.† So Moses divided

the prey into parts, and gave one-fiftieth part to Eleazar and the two priests, and another fiftieth part to the Levites; and distributed the rest of the prey among the sons of Levi, by lot: after which they lived happily, as having obtained an abundance of good things by their valor, and there being no misfortune that attended them, or hindered the enjoyment of that happiness.

2. But Moses was a hundred and twenty years old, and appointed Joshua for his successor, both to receive directions from God as a prophet, and for a commander of the army, if they should at any time stand in need of such assistance: for he had done; and by the command of God, that to him the care of the public should be committed. Now Joshua had been instructed in all those kinds of learning which concerned the laws and God himself, and many years been a priest. After this he lived with great sanctity, and that he had a mind to live in luxury and ease, while all the rest were laboring with great pains to obtain the land they were desirous to have, and that they were not willing to march along; and this was not the remaining part only of Israel, but by them, under the divine promise, to pass over Jordan, and overcome those our enemies which God had shown them, and so obtain their land. But these tribes, when they saw that Moses was old, and that he could not deny but he had a just cause to be displeased at their petition, made an apology for themselves: and said, "that it was not on account of their fear of dangers, nor on account of their inclination, but on account of the danger which they apprehended that they might leave the prey they had gotten in places of safety, and thereby might be more expedites, and ready to undergo difficulties, and to fight battles." They added also, that "we cannot possibly secure the young men and widows, of the land of Israel; we can also preserve their children, and wives, and possessions, if he would bestow upon them, they would go along with the rest of the army. Hereupon the lot was cast, on the west side of Jordan: so it was called for Eleazar the high priest, and Joshua, and the chief of the tribes, and permitted these tribes to possess the land of the Amorites; but upon this condition, that they should join with their brethren in the war, until all things were settled. Upon which condition they took possession of the country, and built them strong cities, and put into them their children, and their wives, and whatsoever else they had that might be an ornament of life to them, for the future ages of the world.

3. Moses also now built those ten cities, which were to be of the number of the forty-eight [forty-eight] for command of God, are highly remarkable; and show, that even in nations otherwise for their wickedness doomed, there were not wanting individuals, who were particularly and providentially taken care of, and delivered from that destruction; which directly implies, that it was the will of God, that a part of the nation should preserve itself, and nothing else, that occasioned their excision. See Gen. xvi. 18, 16; 1 Sam. xv.10-12; 2 Cor. vii. 10-12. As with the Egyptians, the delay of the punishment of the Amorites is given, because their iniquity was not yet full. In the second, Saul is ordered to go and destroy the Amalekites; and, implying, that they were therefore to be destroyed because they were sinners, and not otherwise. In the third, the reason is given, why King Agag was not to be spared, viz. because of his for-have passed over Jordan, and are in possession of the land of Canaan. Since, when you shall have once proceeded so far by your wealth, as to a contempt and disregard of virtue, you will also forfeit the favor of God; and when you have made war upon your enemy, you will be beaten in war; and will be treated as you treated others, and will be carried away again from you by your enemies, and this with great reproaches upon your conduct. You will be scattered over the whole world, and will as always have been the cause of your own ruin, and of the miseries alive, when you have conquered them, but to look upon it as for your advantage to destroy them all, lest, if you permit them to live, you taste of their manners, and thereby corrupt your own proper life. And I also farther exhorted you to overthrow their altars, and their groves, and whatsoever temples they have among them, and to burn all such, their nation and their very memory, with fire. If you would not alone the safety of your own happy constitution, but also the event, which are so good, that if you regularly observe them, you will be esteemed of all men the most happy.

3. When he had spoken thus, he gave them the laws and the constitution of government, written in a book. Upon which the people fell into tears, and appeared already touched with the sense that they should have a great want of their conductor, because they remembered what a number of years he had been so zealous in what care he had taken of their preservation; they desponded about what would come upon them after he was dead, and thought they should never have another governor like him; and feared that God would take care of them when Moses was gone, who used to intercede for them. They also repented of what they had said to him in the wilderness when they were angry, and were in grief on those accounts too much, that the whole body of the people fell into tears with such bitterness, that it was past the power of words to comfort them in their affliction. However Moses gave them some consolation, saying, that knowing how much they were worthy he was of their weeping for him, he exalted them to keep that form of government he had given them; and then the congregation was dissolved at that time.

4. Accordingly, I shall now first describe this form of government, which was agreeable to the dignity and virtue of Moses; and shall thereby inform those that read these antiquities what our original settlements were, and shall also do them that are curious in that sort of business honor. Now those settlements are still in writing, as he left them; and we shall add nothing by way of ornament, nor any thing besides what Moses left us, only we shall still proceed to it so as to reduce the number of laws into a regular system, for they were by him left in writing as they were accidentally scattered in their delivery, and as he upon inquiry had learned them of God. On which account I have, as it were, to recapitulate what I have before delivered, and to bring the remembrance beforehand, lest any of my own countrymen should blame me, as having been guilty of an offence herein. Now part of our constitution will include the laws that belong to our political state. As for those laws which Moses left concerning our common conversation and intercourse one with another, I have reserved that for a discourse concerning our manner of life, and the occasions of those laws which I propose to myself, with God's assistance, to write, after I have finished the work I am now upon.

5. When you have possessed yourselves of the land of Canaan, and have leisure to enjoy the good things of it, and when you have afterward determined to build cities, if you will do that is pleasing to God, you shall not build your city, but God shall build it for himself by prophetic revelations. Let there also be one temple therein and one altar, not reared of hewn stones, but of such as you gather together at random: which stones, when they are worn and rubbed, will afford some appearance, and be beautiful to the sight. Let the ascent to it be not by steps,\(^6\) but by an acclivity of raised earth. And let there be neither an altar, nor a temple in any other city; for God is but one, and the nation of the Hebrews is but one.

6. He that blasphemes God, let him be stoned, and let him hang upon a tree all that day, and then let him be buried in an ignominious and shameful manner.

7. Let those that live as remote as the bounds of the land which the Hebrews shall possess, come to that city where the temple shall be, and this three times in a year, that they may give thanks to God for his former benefits, and may expect those for those that are of the same stock, and under the same institution of laws, not to be unacquainted with each other; which acquaintance will be maintained by thus conversing together, and by seeing and talking with one another, and so being always friendly to each other. For, if they do not thus converse together continually, they will appear like more strangers to one another.

8. Let there be taken out of your fruits tenth, besides that which you have allotted to the priests and Levites. This you may indeed sell in the country, but it is to be used in these feasts and sacrifices that are to be celebrated in the holy city; for it is fit that you should enjoy those from your own stock. And then let there be no more possession, so as may be to the honor of the donor.

9. You are not to offer sacrifices out of the hire of a woman which is a harlot; for the Deity is not pleased with any thing that arises from such a source. And let none of you bid better of his goods than he is worse than this prostitute of the body. In like manner, no one may take the price of the covering of a bitch, either of one that is used in hunting.

\(^6\) This law, both here and Exod. xx. 25, 26, of not going up to God's altar by ladder steps, is on an allusion, as seems not to have belonged to the altar of the tabernacle, which was in all but three cubic cubits high, Exod. xxvii. 1, nor to that of Ezekiel, which was expressly to be gone up to by steps and ladders, Ezek. iv. 3. It is probably a general allusion to the ascent of any considerable altitude and largeness; as also probably to Solomon's altar, to which it is here applied by Jeremiah, as well as that in Zorobabel's and Herod's temple, which were, I think, all ten cubits high. See 2 Chron. iv. 1. and Antiq. B. viii. ch. iii. sect. 7. The reason that is given, that this ascent on an acclivity, and not by steps, is obvious, that before the invention of stairs, such as we now use, decency could not otherwise be preserved for in the loose garments which the priests wore, the law required. See Lamy of the Tabernacle and Temple, p. 444.

\(\text{$} \) What book of the law was thus publicly read, see the note on Antiq. B. x. ch. v. sect. 3; and 1 Esd. ix. 36—38.

\(\|\) Whether these phylacteries, and other Jewish materials of the law here mentioned by Josephus, and by Moses in Num. xv. 37 were literally meant by God, I much doubt. That they have been long observed by the Pharisees in the religious acts of the Jewish nation, is certain; but, the Karaites, who receive not the unwritten traditions of the elders, but keep close to the written law, with Jerome and Groshein, I think they have not been so much understood, as Bernard and Reland here take notice. Nor indeed do I remember that either in the more ancient books of the Old Testament, or in the books we call 'Apocrypha,' there are any signs of such literal observations appearing among the Jews, though their oral or mystical interpreters, I. e., the Talmudists, have the Seer's memory and observation of the laws of God by Moses, be frequently inculcated in all the sacred writings.

\(\|\) Here as well as elsewhere, sect. 38 of his Life, sect. 14; and of the War, B. ii. ch. xx. sect. 5, are but seven accounts of small importance, in the midst of twenty-three, in the modern rabbinic; which means are always but of very little authority in comparison of our Josephus.
being natural, that reverence towards those in high offices among men should procure men's fear and reverence towards God. Let those that judge first be disposed to determine that they think to be right, unless any one can show that they have taken bribes, to the perversion of justice, or can allege any other accusation against them, whereby it may appear that they have passed an unjust sentence; for it is not fit that causes should be openly determined out of regard to gain, or to the dignity of the suitors, but that the judges should esteem what is right before all else. Otherwise, God will by that means be despised, and esteemed inferior to those, the dread of whose power has occasioned the unjust sentence; for justice is the power of God. He therefore that gratifies those in great dignity, supposes them more potent than God himself. But if these judges are unable to give a just sentence about the causes that come before them, (which case is not unfrequent in human affairs,) let them send the cause undetermined to the holy city, and to the high priest, the prophet, and the Sanhedrin, determine as it shall seem good to them.

15. But let not a single witness be credited, but three, or two at the least, having taken such witnesses, if a sentence is confirmed by their good lives. But let not the testimony of women be admitted, on account of their levity and boldness of their sex. Nor, let servants be admitted to give testimony, for the nature of their soul, since it is probable that they may not speak truth, either out of hope of gain, or fear of punishment. But if any one be believed to have borne false witness, let him, when he is convicted, spend all the very same punishments which he, against whom he bare witness, was to have suffered.

16. If a murder be committed in any place, and he did that be not found, nor is there any sure mark of it, nor any other, he has killed the man, and so had killed him, let there be a very diligen inquiry made after the man, and rewards proposed to any who will discover him; but if still no information can be procured, let the magistrate enter into the city, and let the heads of the houses, and the place in which the murder was committed, assemble together, and measure the distance from the place where the dead body lies; then let the men of the near neighboring city thereto purchase a heifer, and bring it to a valley, and to a place therein where there is no land ploughed, or trees planted; and let them cut the sinews of the heifer; and the priests and Levites, and the chief men of the city, shall wash their hands over the head of the heifer, and they shall openly declare that their hands are innocent of this murder, and that they have neither done it themselves, nor been assisting to any that did it. They shall also beseech God to be merciful to them, that no such horrid act may any more be done in that land.

17. Aristocracy, and the way of living under it, is the best constitution; and may you never have an inferior to thee, he or she, and you may always love that form, and have the laws for your governors, and govern all your actions according to them; for you need no supreme authority but God. But if you shall design a king, let him be one of your own nation; let him be always careful of justice, and other virtues, perpetually; let him submit to the laws, and esteem God's commands to be his highest will. Nothing without God's will be offered to the high priest, and the votes of the senators: let him not have a great number of wives, nor pursue abundance of riches, nor a multitude of horses, whereby he may grow too proud to submit to the laws. And if he affect any such things, let him be restrained, lest he become so potent that his house shall become like a king's house, and he shall be a king, according as they think to be right, unless any one can show that he has taken bribes, to the perversion of justice, or can allege any other accusation against him, whereby it may appear that he has passed an unjust sentence; for it is not fit that causes should be openly determined out of regard to gain, or to the dignity of the suitors, but that the judges should esteem what is right before all else. Otherwise, God will by that means be despised, and esteemed inferior to those, the dread of whose power has occasioned the unjust sentence; for justice is the power of God. He therefore that gratifies those in great dignity, supposes them more potent than God himself. But if these judges are unable to give a just sentence about the causes that come before them, (which case is not unfrequent in human affairs,) let them send the cause undetermined to the holy city, and to the high priest, the prophet, and the Sanhedrin, determine as it shall seem good to them.

18. Let it not be esteemed lawful to remove boundaries, neither our own, nor of those with whom we are at peace. Have a care you do not lose the fruits of your toil, which are, as it were, a divine and unshaken limitation of rights made by God himself, to last for ever, since this going beyond limits, and gaining ground upon others, is the occasion of wars and seditions; for the fruits are not, as men are nor far off an attempt to subvert the laws.

19. He that plants a piece of land whose trees produce fruits before the fourth year, is not to bring thence any first fruits to God, nor is he to make use of that fruit himself, for it is not produced in its proper season; for when nature has a force put upon her at an unreasonable time, the fruit is not proper for God, nor for the master's use; but let the owner gather all that is a generous fruit, for then it is in its proper season. And let him that has gathered it, carry it to the holy city, and spend that, together with the title of his other fruits, in feasting with his family, with the orphan and the widow. But on the fifth year the fruit is his own, and he may use it as he pleases.

20. You are not to sow a piece of land with seed which is planted with vines, for it is enough to eat on the sowing and the harvest, and not harassed by ploughing also. You are to plough your land with oxen: and not to oblige other animals to come under the same yoke with them; but to till your land with those beasts that in the land of Egypt are not toiled with. The seeds are also to be pure, and without mixture, and not to be compounded of two or three sorts, since nature does not rejoice in the union of things that are not in their own nature alike; nor any mixture of the good and the bad, or gender together; for there is reason to fear that this unnatural abuse may extend from beasts of different kinds to men, though it takes its first rise from the evil practices about such smaller things. The same thing is to be allowed by im-itiation whereof any degree of subversion may creep into the constitution. Nor do the laws neglect small matters, but provide that even these may be managed after an unblamable manner.

21. Let not those that reap, and gather in the corn that is reaped, gather in the gleanings also; but let them rather leave some handfuls for the poor, and let them pass over some of the fruits of the olive-trees, when they gather them, and leave them to be partaken of by those that have none of their own: for the advantage arising from the exact collection of all, will not be so considerable to the owners as the increase of the abundance from the prolific ness of the earth. God will provide, that the land shall more willingly produce what shall be for the nourishment of its fruits, in case you do not merely take care of the same kind with care of the earth, but have regard to the support of others also. Nor are you to muzzle the mouths of the oxen, when they tread the ears of corn in the threshing-floor; for it is not just to restrain our fellow-laboring animals, and thus deprive them of the sustenance that arises out of their labours. Nor are you to prohibit those that pass by at the time when your fruits are ripe to touch them, but to give them leave to ELL.

* I have never observed else where that, In the Jewish government women were not admitted as legal witnesses in courts of justice. None of our copies of the themse/elves fail of what you have, and this whether they be of your own country, or strangers, as men glad of the opportunity of giving them some part of your fruits when they are ripe; but let it be given to them, and be lawful for them to carry any away. Nor let those that gather the grapes, and carry them to the winepresses, restrain those whom they meet from eating of them; for it is a kind of food, to eat of it, to partake of the good things that come into the world, according to God's will, and this while the season is at the height, and is hastening away as it pleases God. Nay, if, some out of base and low vanity of mind, are content to let them be encouraged to take of them, I mean those that are Israelites, as if they were themselves the owners and lords, on account of the kindness there is between them. Nay, let them desire and press one another to God, to distribute, to partake of these tokens of friendship which God has given in their proper season; for that is not to be deemed as idly spent, which any one out of kindness communicates to another, since God blesses also the generous and liberal soul; and let them for themselves reap the advantage, but also to give to others in a way of generosity; and he is desired by these means, to make known to others his kindness to himself. God has been slow and low freely he communicates happiness to them, while they abundantly communicate, out of their great superfluities, to even these foreigners also. But for him that acts contrary to this law, let him be cut off, as he was, and put to death as he was a public executioner; let him undergo this punishment, which is a most ignominious one for a freeman, and this because he was such a slave to gain as to lay a blot upon his own dignity; for it is proper for you who have rich land and have been made the objects of the afflictions in Egypt and of those in the wilderness, to make provision for those that are in the like circumstances; and while you have now obtained plenty yourselves, through the mercy and propitiation come from God, to distribute, to the same plenty, by the like sympathy, to such as stand in need of it.

22. Besides these two tithes, which I have already said you are to pay every year, the one for the Levites, the other for the festivals; there are to bring every third year, a third tithe to be distributed to those that want; to women also that are widows, and to children that are orphans, and to the Levites, and to the priests, and to the stranger, and to the fatherless, and to the widow, which is ripe first of all unto the temple; and when they have blessed God for that land which bare them, and which he had given them for a possession, when they have also offered those sacrifices with which he has made it, let him bring, let them give the first-fruits to the priests. But when any one hath done this, and hath brought the tithes of all that he hath, together with those first-fruits that were for the Levites, and for the festivals; and when he has gone out of his house, let him stand before the holy house, and return thanks to God, that he hath delivered them from the injurious treatment they had in Egypt, that he has given them a country large, and let them enjoy the fruits thereof; and when he hath openly testified that he hath fully paid the tithes [and other dues], according to the law of Moses, let him extort God that will be ever merciful and gracious to him, and continue so to be to all the Hebrews, both by preserving the good things which he hath given them, and by showing what it is still in his power to bestow upon them.

23. Let the Hebrews marry, at the age fit for it, virgins that are free and born of good parents. And be that does not marry a virgin, let him be cut off, and corrupt another man's wife, and also his father's wife, and grieve her former husband. Nor let free men marry slaves, although their affections should strongly bias any of them so to do; for it is decent, and for the dignity and worth of their persons; let them not govern those their affections. And farther, no one ought to marry a harlot; whose matrimonious obligations, arising from the prostitution of her body, God will not receive; for by these means, the dispositions of the children will be liberal and virtuous; I mean when they are not born of base parents, and of the lustful conjunction of such as marry women that are not free. If any one has been espoused to a woman as to a virgin, and does not afterward, let him be cut off, and be put to death, because he has, by such an action, and accuse her, and let him make use of such indications to prove his accusation as he is furnished withal, and let the father or the brother of the damsel, come and take her nearest of kin, to defend her. If the damsel obtain a sentence in her favor, that she had not been guilty, let her live with her husband that accused her; and let him not have any further power over her, but she is to be free, and he to be deprived of great occasions for suspicion, and such as can be noway-contradicted. But for him that brings an accusation and calumny against his wife, in an impudent and rash manner, let him be punished by being received and saved as a slave to public execution, and pay fifty shekels to her father. But if the damsel be convicted, as having been corrupted, and is one of the common people, let her be stoned, because she did not preserve her virginity till she was lawfully married; but if she were the daughter of a priest, let her be burnt alive. If any man has two wives, and if he greatly respect and be kind to one of them, either out of his affection to her, or for her beauty, or for some other reason, and the other is of no account with him; and if the son of her that is beloved be the younger by birth than another born of the other wife, but endeavors to obtain the right of his father's substance, there would thereby obtain a double portion of his father's substance, (for that double portion is what I have allotted him in the laws,) let not this be permitted; for it is unjust, that he is to whom the son who is the elder by birth should be deprived of what is due to him, on the father's disposition of his estate, because his mother was not equally regarded by him. He that hath corrupted a damsel espoused to another man, in case he had her consent, let both him and her be put to death, for they are both equally guilty, the man because he persuaded the woman willingly to submit to a most impure action, and to prefer it to lawful wedlock; the woman because she is the elder by birth should be deprived of what is due to her, on the father's disposition of his estate, because his mother was not equally regarded by him. He that hath corrupted a damsel espoused to another man, in case he had her consent, let both him and her be put to death, for they are both equally guilty, the man because he persuaded the woman willingly to submit to a most impure action, and to prefer it to lawful wedlock; the woman because she is the elder by birth should be deprived of what is due to her, on the father's disposition of his estate, because his mother was not equally regarded by him. nobody was present to come to her assistance, let him put her to death, and then kill himself, but he not being so inclined, he committed a virgin not yet espoused, marry her; but if the father of the damsel be not willing that she should be his wife, let him pay fifty shillings as the price of her prostitution. He that deserts his wife from her, is guilty for any cause, whatsoever, (and many such causes happen among men,) let him in writing give assurance that he never will use her as his wife any more, for by these means she may be at liberty to marry him again. If, however, he be before this bill of divorce be given, she is not to be permitted so to do: but if she be misled by him also, or if when he is dead, her first husband would marry her again, it shall not be lawful for her to return to him. If a woman's husband die, and she be not without children, let his brother marry her, and let him call the son that is born to him by his brother's name, and educate him as the heir of his inheritance; for this procedure will be for the benefit of the public, because thereby families will not fail, and the estate will continue among the kindred; and this will be for the solace of wives under their affliction, that they are to be married only to the nearest relation of the former husband. But if the brother will not marry her, let the woman come before the senate, and protest openly that his brother will not admit her for his wife, but will jeer at the memory of his deceased brother, and if she is willing to continue in the family, and to bear him children: and when the senate have inquired of him, for what reason it is that he is averse to this marriage, whether he gives a bad or a good reason, the matter must come to them in particular; and she shall be on the same footing as the widow of the brother, and shall spelt in his face, and say, "He deserves this reproachful treatment from her, as having injured the memory of the deceased." And then let him go away out of the city, and never heap anything upon him all his life long; and let her marry whom she pleases, of such as seek her in marriage. But now if any man take captive either a virgin, or one that hath been married, and has a mind to marry her, let him not be allowed to bring her to bed to him, or to live with her as his wife, before she hath her head shaved, and hath put on her mourning habit, and lamented her relations and friends; and if she still holds the same mind that by those means she may give vent to her sorrow for them, and after that may betake herself to feasting and merriment, for it is good for him that takes a woman in order to have children by her, to have no account to her inclinations, and not merely to pursue his own pleasure, while he hath no regard to what is agreeable to her. But when thirty days are past, as the time of mourning, for so many are sufficient, to prudent persons, for lamenting the dearest friends, then let them proceed to the marriage; but in case when he hath satisfied his lust, he be too proud to retain her for his wife, let him not have it in his power to make her a slave, but let her go away whither she pleases, to have that privilege of a free woman.

24. As to those young men that despise their parents, and do not pay them honor, but offer their fathers because of them, or think themselves wiser than they; in the first place let their parents admonish them in words, (for they are by nature of authority sufficient for becoming their judges,) and let them strive also to them: "That the creditor remain till what he lent be paid in again; but if he be poor, let him that takes it, return it before the going down of the sun, especially if the pledge be a garment, that the debtor not have it to wear, but they cohabited together, not for the sake of pleasure, nor for the augmentation of their riches, by joining both

*These words of Josephus are very like those of the Pharaoh to our Saviour upon this very subject. Matt. xix. 4. "Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for any cause whatsoever?" (Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife "for any cause whatsoever," (Matt. xix. 4.)?"

And say farther to him, "That when thou wast born we took thee up with gladness and gave God the greatest thanks for thee, and blessed thee with great care, and spared for nothing that appeared useful for thy preservation, and for thy instruction in what was most excellent. And now since it is reasonable to forgive the sins of those that are young; let it suffice and let him be contented; and when he has once to bear part of that disfavor which falls upon those that have the same name when they do not meet with due returns from their children. And on such the law inflicts inestimable punishment; of which punishment mayest thou never have the experience!" Now if the insolence of young men be thus cured, let them escape the reproach which their former errors deserved, for regard to the man, parents good, and parents happy, while they never be bold either a son or a daughter brought to punishment. But if it happen that these words and instructions conveyed by them, in order to correct them, prove ineffectual, and when the offender renders the laws implacable enemies to the insolence he has offered his parents; let him therefore be brought forth by these very parents out of the city, with a multitude following him, and with a multitude of reproaches upon him, good, and parents happy, while they never be bold either a son or a daughter brought to punishment. stainless thereto belonging, for a pledge, that the debtors may not be deprived of instruments to get their food withal, and lest they be undone by their necessities.

27. Let death be the punishment, for stealing a man; but he that hath purloined gold or silver, let him pay double. If any one kill a man that is stealing something out of his house, let him be exterminated guiltless, although the man were only breaking in at the wall. Let him that hath stolen cattle pay four-fold what is lost; excepting the case of an ox, for which let the thief pay five-fold. Let him that is so poor that he cannot pay what is due, then he becomes a servant to him of whom he was adjudged to pay it.

28. If any one be sold to one of his own nation, let him serve him six years, and on the seventh let him go free; but if he have a son by a woman-servant in his purchaser's house, and if, on account of his good-will to his master, and his natural affection to his wife and children, he will be his servant still, let him be set free only at the coming of the year of jubilee, which is the fiftieth year, and the day, and let them give him his children and wife, and let them be free also.

29. If any one find gold or silver in the road, let him inquire after him that lost it, and make proclamation of the place where he found it, and the same in writing on a rod. If any one do not make it right to make his own profit by the loss of another. And the same rule is to be observed in cattle found to have wandered away into a lonely place; and if a man have bought it, and then found it by another, let him that is the finder keep it with himself, and appeal to God, that he hath not purloined what belongs to another.

30. It is not lawful to pass by any beast that is in distress; when in a storm it is fallen down in the mire, but to endeavor to preserve it, as having a sympathy with it in its pain.

31. It is also a duty to show the roads to those who do not know them, and not to extort a man or hinder others' advantages by setting them in a wrong way.

32. In like manner let no one revile a person blind or dumb.

33. If men strive together, and there be no man to judge between them, let him that is smitten be avenged immediately, by inflicting the same punishment on him that smote him; but if, when he is carried home, he lie sick many days, and then die, let him that smote him not escape punishment; and if he die, let him pay for the death, and yet be at great expense for his cure, the smiter shall pay for all that has been expended during the time of his sickness, and for all that he has paid the physician. He that kicks a woman with child, so that the woman miscarry, let him pay a fine in money as the judges shall determine, as having diminished the multitude by the destruction of what was in her womb; and let money also be given to the woman's husband by him that kicked her; but if she die of the stroke, let him also be put to death, the law judging it equitable that life should go for life.

34. Let not one of the Israelites keep any poison that may cause death, or any other harm; but if he be caught with it, let him be put to death, and suffer the very same mischief that he would have brought upon them for whom the poison was prepared.

35. He that maineth any one, let him undergo the like things, as the heathen do, and one member of the party of which he hath deprived the other, unless he that is mained will accept of money in instead of it, for the law makes the sufferer the judge of the value of what he hath suffered, and permits him to estimate it, unless he is under a sentence of death.

36. Let him that is the owner of an ox, which pusheth with his horn, kill him: but if he pushes and gores any one in the threshing-floor, let him be put to death by stoning, and let him not be set free. He that hath built a house and hath added to it as being known what his nature was, and hath not kept him up, let him be also put to death, as being the occasion of the ox's having killed a man. But if the ox have killed a man-servant, or a maid-servant, let him be stoned; and let the owner of the ox pay thirty shekels to the master of him that was slain; but if it be an ox that is thus smitten and killed, let both the oxen, that which smote the other, and that which was smitten, which was that which was killed, and let the owners of them divide their price between them.

37. Let those that dig a well or a pit be careful to lay planks over it, and so keep them shut up, not in order to hinder any person from drawing water, but that he may not fall into it, and let no one's beast fall into such a well or pit thus digged, and not shut up, and perish, let the owner pay the price to the owner of the beast, which is a man that round the tops of your houses instead of a wall, that may prevent any persons from rolling down and perishing.

38. Let him that has received any thing in trust for another take care to keep it as a sacred and divine thing, and let no one invent any contrivance whereby to deprive him that hath intrusted it with him of the same, and this whether he be a man or a woman, no, not although he or she were to go to him and say, thou mayest not do it, but he, or she, do what he or she will, and this where he cannot be convicted of it by any body, for it is fit that a man's own conscience, which knows what he hath, should in all cases oblige him to do well. Let this conscience be his witness, and let him not be so mean as to procure commendation from others; but let him chiefly have regard to God, from whom no wicked man can lie concealed; but if he in whom the without, but put any but in his own, lose what he is intrusted with, let him come before the seven judges, and swear by God, that nothing has been lost willingly, or with a wicked intention, and that he hath not made use of any part thereof, and so let him depart without blame; but if he hath made use of the least part of what was committed to him, and it be lost, let him be condemned to repay all that he hath received, after the same manner as in those trusts it is to be, if any one defraud those that undergo bodily labor for him. And let it be always remembered, that we are not to defraud a poor man of his wages, as being sensible that God has allotted that wages to him, instead of land, and other possessions; but let it be, that if any one may be not to be delayed, but to be made that very day, since God is not willing to deprive the laborer of the immediate use of what He hath labored for.

* Philo and others appear to have understood this law, Exodus xxii. 18, 19, as permitting the prosecution of a robber of cattle, even after the mother were quick, and so the infant had a right to be preserved, which was more upon the mother than the other, yet if the mother escaped, the offender should only be fined, and not put to death; while the law seems rather to mean, that though he escape the mother, the offender must be put to death, and not only when the mother is killed, as Josephus understood it. It seems this was the exposition of the Pharisees in the days of Josephus.

† What we render a witch, according to our modern notions of witchcraft, Exodus xxii. 18, was understood by Philo and Josephus understood of a poisoner, or one who attempted by secret and unlawful drugs or philtres, to take away the senses or to put one to death.

‡ This permission of redeeming this penalty with money is not in our copies, Exodus xxi. 25, 26; Lev. xiv. 24, 25.

¶ We may here note, that 30 shekels, the price our Saviour was sold for by Judas to the Jews, Matt. xxvi. 15; xxvii. 2. It was the usual value of a bought servant; or slave among the people.
39. You are not to punish children for the faults of their parents, but on account of their own virtue rather torouchase them commissination, because they were born of wicked parents, than hatred because they were born of bad ones.

Now indeed we see that it is impossible for children to do their fathers, while young persons indulge themselves in many practices different from what they have been instructed in, and this by their proud refusal of such instruction.

41. Let there be made themselves ennuina be had in detestation: and do you avoid any conversation with them, who have deprived themselves of their manhood, and of that fruit of generation which God has given to men for the increase of the earth: let such be driven away, as if they had killed their children, since they beforehand have lost what shall procure them; for evident it is, that while their soul is become effeminate, they with malice transferred that affections to your fathers, and so lose the laws whihf they treat all that is of a monstrous nature when it is looked on; nor is it lawful to gild either men or any other animals.*

43. Take care, especially in your battles, that no woman use the habit of a man, nor man the garment of a woman.

44. This was the form of political government which was left us by Moses. Moreover, he had already delivered laws in writing, in the fortieth year, after they came out of Egypt, concerning which we will discourse in another book. But now, in this place, we intend to make use of those things which may be seen in the book, wherein he has not at all deviated from the truth. Accordingly he delivered these books to the priests, with the ark; into which he also put the ten commandments, written in two tables. But then, he delivered them to your Levites, and appointed them to walk before the ark, and to be watchmen. And he haroched the people, that when they had conquered the land, and were settled in it, they should not forget the injuries of the Amelekites, but make war against them, and inflict punishment upon them for what Abiezer did them, when they were in the wilderness: and that when they had got possession of the land of the Canaanites, and when they had destroyed the inhabitants thereof, as they ought to do, they should erect an altar on the rising sun, not far from the city of Shechem, between the two mountains, that of Gerizim situate on the right hand, and that of Ebal on the left; and that the Levites should ascend the mountain, and that six tribes should stand upon each of the two mountains, and with them the Levites and the priests. And that first, those that were upon mount Gerizim should pray for the best blessing, and those that were upon mount Ebal should curse, about the worship of God, and the observation of his laws, and who did not reject what Moses had said to could then have no oxen which are gelt, but only bullocks and cows in Judea.

* This law against castrations is, even of virtues, said to be so rigorous elsewhere as to inflict death on him that does it, which seems only a Semitical interpretation in the days of Joseph of that law. Lev. xiii. 29, and xxii. 24; only we may hence observe, that the Jews them, while the other wished them all manner of happiness also; and when these last put up the like prayers, the former promised them, that if this city were destroyed, and among those that should transgress those laws, they answering one another alternately, by way of confirmation of what had been said. Moses also wrote their blessings and curses, that contained and upon them so thoroughly, that they might never be forgotten by length of time. And when he was ready to die, he wrote these blessings and curses upon the altar on each side of it; where he says also the blessings, and then sacrificed and offered burnt-offerings, though after that day they never offered upon it any other sacrifice, for it was not lawful so to do. These are the constitutions of Moses; and the Hebrew nation still preserve them.

45. On the next day, Moses called the people together, with the women and children, to a congregation, so as the very slaves were present also, that they might engage themselves to the observation of these laws by oath: and that, considering the meaning of God in them, they might not, either for favor of their kindred, or out of fear of any one, or indeed for any motive whatsoever, think any thing ought to be preferred to the fear of God, or to the performance of these laws. That in case any one of their own blood, or any city, should attempt to confound or dissolve their constitution of government, they should take vengeance upon them, both in general, and if they should have conquered their adversaries, should overturn their city to the very foundations, and, if possible, should not leave the least footsteps of such madness: but that if they were not able to take such vengeance, they should still demonstrate, that what was done was contrary to their wills. So the multitude bound themselves by oath so to do.

46. Moses taught them also by what means their sacrifices might be most acceptable to God; and how they should go forth to war, making use of the stones [in the high priest's breastplate] for their direction, as I have before signified. Joshua also prophesied while Moses was present. And when Moses had recapitulated what he said, and desired the observation of the people, both in their wars and in peace, and had composed them a body of laws, and procured them an excellent form of government, he foretold, as God had decreed to him. That they should be a holy and perfect temple, that should be burned; that they should be sold for slaves to such men as would have no pity on them in their afflictions: that they would then repent, when that repentance would noways profit them under their sufferings. Yet (said he) will that God who founded your nation, restore your cities to your citizens, with the temple also, and you shall lose these advantages not once only, but often.

47. Now when Moses had encouraged Joshua to take the charge of the army, and left him, he told him, telling him that God would assist him in all his undertakings, and had blessed the whole multitude, he said, "Since I am going to my forefathers, and God has determined that this should be the day of my departure to them, I return him thanks while I am still alive, and present with you, for that providence he hath exercised over you, which hath not only delivered us from the miseries we were under, but has brought us to a state of prosperity upon us; as also, that he hath assisted me in the pains I took, and in all the contrivances I had in my care about you, in order to better your condition, and hath on all occasions showed himself favorably to you: whether he was first conducted our affairs, and brought them to a happy conclusion, by making use of me as a vicarious general under him, and as a minister to those that were willing to do you good: on which account I think it proper, to bless that divine Power which will take care of you for the time to come, and this in order to repay the debt which I owe him, and the leave behind me, and to be consecrated to worship and honor him, and to keep those laws which are the most excellent gift of all those he hath already bestowed upon us, or which, if he continue favorable to us, he will bestow upon us hereafter. Certainly a human legislator is a terrible enemy, when his laws are abrogated, and are made to no purpose. And may you never experience that displeasure of God, which will be the consequence of the neglect of these his laws which he, who is your Creator, hath given you!"

48. When Moses had spoken thus at the end of his life, and had foretold what would befall to every one of their tribes afterward, with the addition of a blessing to them, and ended his speech with tears, and inasmuch that even the women, by beating their breasts, made manifest the deep concern they had when he was about to die. The children also lamented still more, as not able to contain their tears; and they declared, that even at their age they were sensible of his virtue, and mighty deeds: and truly there seemed to be a strife between the young and the old, who should most grieve for him. The old grieved, because they knew what a careful protector they were to be deprived of, and so lamented their future state; but the young grieved not only for that, but also because it so happened that they were to be deprived by him before they had fully tasted of his virtue. Now as many as grew up at the excess of this sorrow and lamentation of the multitude, from what happened to the legislator himself; for although he was always persuaded that he was a temple, and the approach of death, since the undergoing it was agreeable to the will of God, and the law of nature, yet what the people did, so overborne him, that he wept himself. Now as he went thence to the place where he memorial dish out of their sight, they all followed after him weeping, but Moses beckoned with his hand to those that were remote from him, and bade them stay behind in quiet, while he exhaled those that were near to him that they would not render his departure so lamentable. Whereas they thought they ought to grant him that favor, to let him depart according as he himself desired, so they restrained themselves, though weeping still toward one another. All those who accompanied him, were the senate, and Eleazar the high priest, and Joshua their commander. Now as soon as they were come to the mountain called 'Abarim,' (which is a very high mountain situate over against Jericho, and one that affords to such as are upon it a branch; which oath he and the other rulers durst never break; See Scripture Politics, p. 85, 86: and this snare they were brought into because they did ask counsel at the mouth of the Lord." Josh. ix. 14.

† Dr. Bernard well observes here, how unfortunate this neglect of consulting the Urium was to Joshua himself, in Deut. xxxiii. 10, where Moses 'blessed Israel for the best: God blessed him, and prospered him; and he took possession of the west, and ended him, together with the rest of the Jewish rulers, with a solemn oath to preserve them, contrary to his commumication to extirpate all the Canaanites root and branch; which oath he and the other rulers durst never break. See Scripture Politics, p. 85, 86: and this snare they were brought into because they did ask counsel at the mouth of the Lord." Josh. ix. 14.

Since Josephus assures us here, as is most naturally to be supposed, and as the Septuagint gives the text, but 1 Chron. xii. 11; and the Samaritans, that Moses himself and not the priest of Simeon, was a channel of the blessing of Israel, it is evident that Simeon was not omitted in his copy, as it unhappily now is, both in our Hebrew and Samaritan copies. prospect of the greatest part of the excellent land of Canaan,) he dismissed the senate: and as he was going to embrace Eleazar and Joshua, and was still discoursing with them, a cloud stood over him on the sudden, and he disappeared in a certain valley, although he wrote in the holy books that he died, which was done out of fear lest any should think that was said by him of his extraordinary virtue he went to God.

49. Now Moses lived in all one hundred and twenty years: a third part of which time, abating on his weakness, he was the prophour of this new nation; and he died on the last month of the year, which is called by the Macedonians 'Dystrus,' but by us 'Adar,' on the first day of the month. He was one that exceeded all men that ever were, in understanding, in the best of what he was master of. And this shall suffice for the declaration of the manner of the death of Moses.

BOOK V.
CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF FOUR HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-SIX YEARS—FROM THE DEATH OF MOSES TO THE DEATH OF EEL.

CHAP. I.
How Joshua, the Commander of the Hebrews, made War with the Canaanites, and overcame them, and destroyed them, and divided their Land by Lot to the Tribes of Israel.

§ 1. Whence Moses was taken away from among men, in the manner already described, and when all the solemnities belonging to the mourning for him were finished, and the sorrow for him was over, Joshua commanded the multitude to get themselves ready for an expedition. He also sent spies to Jericho, to discover what forces they had, and what were their intentions; but he put his camp in a convenient place, so as to pass over Jordan at a proper season. And calling to him the rulers of the tribe of Reuben, and the governors of the tribe of Gad, and of the half tribe of Manasseh, for half of this tribe had been permitted to have their habitation in the country of the Amorites, which was the seventh part of the land of Canaan; he put them in mind what they had promised Moses; and he exhorted them, that for the sake of the care that Moses had taken to them, and for the good that had never been in taking pains for them, no, not when he was dying, and for the sake of the public welfare, they would prepare themselves, and readily perform what he had commanded, to be so good enough to send them those men whom he had called, and marched from Abila to Jordan, sixty furlongs.

2. Now when he had pitched his camp, the spies came to him immediately, well acquainted with the whole state of the Canaanites: for, as the Amorites were one of the seven nations of Canaan. Hence Rahab, wishing to support that Josephus did not here mean that their land beyond Jordan was a seventh part of the whole land of Canaan, but meant the Amorites as a seventh nation. His reason is, that Josephus, as well as our poets, generally distinguished the land beyond Jordan from the land of Canaan; nor can it be denied, that in strictness they were different; yet after two tribes and a half of the twelve tribes came to inherit it, it might, in a general way altogether, be well included under the land of Canaan, or Palestine, or Judea; of which we have a clear example here in Josephus, whose words evidently imply, that taking the whole land of Canaan, or that inhabited by all the twelve tribes, but not the parts, the land beyond Jordan was in quantity of ground one seventh part of the whole. And this well enough agrees to Reuben, which country they had taken notice, Numbers x. 1, 4, 10, that it maintained about a fifth part of the whole people.

3. It plainly appears by the history of these spies, and first, before they were at all discovered, they took a full view of the city of Jericho without disturbance, and saw which parts of the walls were strong, and which parts were otherwise, and what the water, and which order were so weak as might afford an entrance to their army. Now those that met them took no notice of them when they saw them, and supposed they were only strangers, who used to be very curious in observing every thing in the city, and did not take them for enemies; but at even they retired to a certain inn that was near to the wall, whither they went to eat their supper; which supper they had done, and were in motion to come out of the city, the innkeeper gave them to the king as he was at supper, that there were some persons come from the Hebrews' camp, to view the city as spies, and that they were in the inn kept by Rahab, and were very solicitous that they might not be discovered; so he sent immediately some to them, and commanded to catch them, and bring them to him, that he might examine them by torture, and learn what their business was there. As soon as Rahab had made certain that these messengers were coming, she hid the spies under the stalks of flax which were laid to dry on the top of her house, and said to the messengers that were sent by him and came to him, that her housekeeper had supped with her a little before sunsetting, and were gone away, who might easily be taken it they were any terror to the city, or likely to bring any danger to the king: so these messengers being thus deceived by the woman, and sus pecting no imposition, went their ways without so much as searching the inn, but they immediately pursued them along those roads which they most probably supposed them to have gone, and pursued they the swiftest horses that they had; for they could hear no tidings of them; so they left off the pains of any farther pursuit. But when the tumult was over, Rahab brought the men down, and desired them, as soon as they should have other tidings of them, to inform her of them. Now, it would be in their power to make her amends for her preservation of them, to remember what danger she had undergone for their sakes; for that if she had been caught concealing them, she could not have been so happy in her old age, or, as she and all her family with her, and so bid them go home: and desired them to swear to her, to preserve her and her family, when they should take the city, and destroy all its inhabitants, as they had agreed to do. So the soothsayer, and the highwaysman, had been assured by those divine miracles of which she had been informed. So these spies acknowledged, that they owed her thanks for what she had done already, and intimated to her to reserve her kindness; not only in words but in deeds: but they gave her this advice, that when she should perceive that the city was about to be taken, she should put her goods, and all her family, into her chamber, and hang seven scarlet threads out of her windows, or doors, before it; and then she would be saved. And then the commander of the Hebrews might know her house, and take care to do her no harm; for, said they, we will inform him of the same as soon as we can. And then they left her, and went round about with some part of the armed men to be a guard to it. These priests went forward, blowing with their seven trumpets, and exhorted the army to be of good courage, and went round about the city, with the seven following them; and when the priests had only blown with the trumpets, for they did nothing more at all, they returned to the camp. And they fulfilled this; and, when they had done this, the prophet, as they had promised, went about to the seventh Joshua gathered together the armed men, and all the people together, and told them this good tidings, that the city should now be taken, since God would on that day give it them by the falling down of the walls, and this off their own accord, and without their labor. However, he charged them to kill every one they should take, and not to abstain from the slaughter of their enemies, either for weariness, or for pity, and not to fail one, and not to convert them from pursuing their enemies, as they ran away; but to destroy all the animals, and to take nothing for their own peculiar advantage. He commanded them also to bring together all the first-fruits unto God out of this glorious exploit, as having gotten them from the city they first took; only that they should save Rahab, and her kindred alive, because of the oath which the spies had sworn to her.

2. Now, while Joshua the commander was in the camp, and the whole multitude of the river ran with a long current, and could not be passed over with bridges, for there never had been bridges laid over it hitherto, and while he hesitated, that if he should attempt to make a bridge, the current might overwhelm it, and make it impossible to perfect it, and so for ferry-boats, they had none, God promised so to dispose of the river, that they might pass over it, and that by taking away the main part of its waters. So Joshua, after two days, caused the men and the whole multitude to pass over in the manner following: the priests went first of all, having the ark with them; then went the Levites, bearing the tabernacle and the vessels which belonged to the sacrifices; after which went the multitude following them to their tribes, having their children and their wives in the midst of them, as being afraid for them, lest they should be borne away by the stream. But when they had passed over, the ark being first, it appeared forable, the depth of the water being restrained, and the sand appearing at the bottom because the current was neither so strong nor so swift as to carry it away by its force. So these men, when they had passed the river, appeared first, and the priests came out and, permitted the current to run freely, as it used to do before. Accordingly, the river, as soon as the Hebrews were come out of 'it, arose again presently, and came to its own depth as before.

3. So the Hebrews went on farther forty furlongs, and pitched their camp at the distance of ten furlongs from Jericho; but Joshua built an altar of those stones, which all the heads of the tribes, on the side of the river which brought them, and the prophet had taken out of the deep, to be afterward a memorial of the division of the stream of this river and upon it offered sacrifical to God; and in that place celebrated the passover, and had great thanksgiving, and enumerated the multitude of all the inhabitants of Jericho, to the west and the south of it; for, they reap the corn of the Canaanites, which was now ripe, and took other things as prey, for then it was that their former food, which was manna, and of which they had eaten forty years, failed.

4. Now, while the Israelites did this, and the Canaanites did not attack them, but kept themselves quiet within their own walls, Joshua resolved to besiege them; so on the first day of the feast (of the passover,) this priest laid out the ark round about, with some part of the armed men to be a guard to it. These priests went forward, blowing with their seven trumpets, and exhorted the army to be of good courage, and went round about the city, with the seven following them; and when the priests had only blown with the trumpets, for they did nothing more at all, they returned to the camp. And they fulfilled this; and, when they had done this, the prophet, as they had promised, went about to the seventh Joshua gathered together the armed men, and all the people together, and told them this good tidings, that the city should now be taken, since God would on that day give it them by the falling down of the walls, and this off their own accord, and without their labor. However, he charged them to kill every one they should take, and not to abstain from the slaughter of their enemies, either for weariness, or for pity, and not to fail one, and not to convert them from pursuing their enemies, as they ran away; but to destroy all the animals, and to take nothing for their own peculiar advantage. He commanded them also to bring together all the first-fruits unto God out of this glorious exploit, as having gotten them from the city they first took; only that they should save Rahab, and her kindred alive, because of the oath which the spies had sworn to her.

5. When he had said this, and had set his army in order, he brought it against the city; so they went round the city again, the ark going before them, the priests with it, and the people people to be zealous in the work; and when they had gone round it seven times, and had stood still a little, the wall fell down, while no instruments of war, nor any other force, was applied to it by the Hebrews.

6. So they entered into Jericho, and slew all the men that were therein, while they were astonished at the surprising overthrow of the walls, and their courage was become useless, and they were not able to defend themselves; so they were slain, and their throats cut, some in the ways and others as caught in their houses; nothing afforded them assistance, but they all persisted, even to the women and the children, and the city was destroyed, and none escaped. They also burnt the whole city and the country about it; but they saved alive Rahab and her family, who had fled to her, and, as they gave their thanks for her preservation of the spies. So he said he would not appear to be behind her in his benefaction to her; whereupon he gave her certain lands immediately, and had in great esteem ever afterward.

7. And if any part of the city escaped the fire, he overthrew it from the foundation; and he denounced a curse against its inhabitants, if any one should desire to rebuild it, how, upon his laying the foundation of the walls, he should be deprived of his eldest son, and upon finishing it, he should depart in that state; and what we have hereupon we shall speak of hereafter. 9. Now there was an immense quantity of silver and gold, and besides those of brass also, that was heaped together out of the city when it was taken, no one transcendeth the degree, nor is there any purloining for their own peculiar advantage; which spoils Joshua delivered to the priests, to be laid up among their treasures. And thus did Jericho perish.

11. Now there was one 'Achar,' i.e. the son of 'Charni, the son of Zebedias, of the tribe of Judah, who, finding a royal garment woven entirely of gold, and a piece of gold that weighed two hundred shekels, and thinking it a very hard thing for them and their posterity that it should be an easy matter to gain, has spared it, that he might take it away from his master and sell it; so God, who stood in need of it, while he that wanted it must go without it, made a deep ditch in his own bowels, and laid it up, as it were, in a strong place, that the people of Israel, who, being after upon it, should not only be concealed from his fellow-soldiers, but from God himself also.

12. Now, a few days after the calamity that befell Jericho, he sent three thousand armed men to take Ai, a city situate above Jericho; but upon the sight of the people of Ai with them they were driven back, and lost thirty-six of their men. When this was told the Israelites, it made them sad, and exceeding disconsolate, not so much because of the relation the men that were destroyed bare to them, though those that were destroyed were all good men, and a part of them the special harbingers of the victory; for while they believed that they were already, in effect, in possession of the land, and should bring back the army out of the battles without loss, as God had promised beforehand, this now saw unexpected in their enemies bold with success; so they put sackcloth over their garments, and continued in tears and lamentation all the day, without the least inquiry after food, but laid what had happened greatly to heart.

13. Now the people of Ai had been sith, and possessed with forebodings of evil as to their whole expedition, he used freedom with God, and said, 'We are not come thus far out of any rashness of our heart, nor over ourselves to subdue this lead with our own weapons, but at the instigation of Moses thy servant for this purpose, because thou hast promised us by many signs, that thou wouldst give us this land for a possession, and that thou wouldst make our army always superior in war to our enemies, and accordingly some success has always attended us, agreeably to thy promises; but because we have now unexpectedly been foiled, and have lost some men out of our army, we are grieved at it, as fearing what those hast promised us, and what Moses foretold us, cannot be deprived of us, and yet we have no expectation troubles us more, because we have met with such a disaster in this our first attempt. But do thou, O Lord, free us from these suspicions, for thou art able to find a cure for them, and show them who it is that they should pit upon and punish the offender, he would ever take care they should have the victory over their enemies.'

This Joshua told the people; and calling for Eleasar, as though the case had been the same with that in the former battle; after which Joshua ordered his forces to turn about, and placed them against their front: he then made the signals agreed upon to those that lay in ambush, and so excited them to action; and so much aid was given them by the inhabitants being upon the walls, nay, others of them being in perplexity, and coming to see those that were without the gates. Accordingly, these made a move at the city wall, as they were used to do; but Joshua forced those that came against him, to come to a close sight, and discomfited them, and made them run away; and when they were driven towards the city, and thought it had not been touched, as soon as they saw it was taken, and perceived it was burnt, with their wives and children, they wandered about the fields in a scattered condition, and were now able to defend themselves, because they had none to support them. Now when this case came before the common people, but 'Achar, as here in Josephus, and in the Apostolical Constitution, B. v. ch. 2. and elsewhere, is evident by the situation to that name in the case of Joshua, he said, 'Why hast thou troubled us? The Lord shall trouble thee.' Where the Hebrew words ali'um only to the next disorder, by giving us victory, which will both take away the grief we are in at present, and prevent our distrust as to what is to come.'

14. These intercessions Joshua put up to God, as he lay prostrate on his face; whereupon God answered, 'Thou didst not require of me;' and threatened that he should make a law to refer his host from the pollution which was got into it: that things consecrated unto me have seen impudently stolen from me: and that this has been the occasion why this defeat has happened to them, and so they shall enter into a new field, and punish the offender, he would ever take care they should have the victory over their enemies.'

15. When Joshua had thus purified the host, he led them against Ai; and having by night laid an ambush round about the city, he attacked the enemies as soon as it was day; but as they advanced they were met with, and the net they were set in caught them, whereupon he was immediately put to death; and attained no more than to be buried in the night in a disgraceful manner, and such was the manner of the constrained salefeer.

lunacy was come upon the men of Ai, there were a great number of children, and women, and servants, and an immense quantity of furniture. The Hebrews also took hers of cattle, and a great deal of money, for this was a rich country: and whether Joshuuah came to Gilgal, he divided all these spoils among the soldiers.

16. But the Gibeonites, who inhabited very near to Jerusalem, when they saw what miseries had happened to the inhabitants of Jericho, and to Jericho, and to Eglon, and to Gibeon, and to all the other cities of the Canaanites, which were the seven cities of the Amorites, they came to Gilgal, and divided all these spoils among themselves. They did not think fit to ask for mercy of Joshua, for they supposed they should find little mercy from him, while he was propitious to their enemies; but they went to the nation of the Canaanites, but they invited the people of Caphirah and Kiriatjearim, who were their neighbors, to join in league with them; and told them, that neither could these themselves avoid the danger they were all in, if the Israelites should prevent them, and seize upon them; so when they had persuaded them, they resolved to endeavor to escape the forces of the Israelites. Accordingly, upon their agreement, they sent messengers to the ambassadors to Joshuah, to make a league of friendship with him, and those such of the citizens as were best approved of, and most capable of doing what was most advantageous to the multitude. Now, when the Gibeonites had sent, they said to the people of Israel that those who were sent from them, and were great men among the people of Gibeon, and of the circumcised cities, which were very remote from the land where they now were, to make such a league of friendship with them, might prove very advantageous to the multitude among their forefathers; for when they understood, that, by the favor of God, and his gift to them, they were to have the possession of the land which he had promised to their fathers, they said, that they were very glad to hear it, and desired to be admitted into the number of their citizens. Thus did these ambassadors speak; and, showing them the marks of their long journey, they entreated the Hebrews to make a league of friendship with them. Accordingly, Joshua believing what they said, and that they were not of the nation of the Canaanites, entered into friendship with them; and Eleazar the high priest, with the senate, were aware of them, that they would esteem them their friends and associates, and would attempt nothing that should be unfair against them, the multitude also assenting to the oaths that were made to them. So those were admitted, by deceiving the Israelites, went home; but when Joshuah led his army to the bottom of the mountain of this part of Canaan, he understood that the Gibeonites dwelt not far from Jerusalem, and that they were of the stock of the Canaanites, so he sent for their governors, and reproached them with the cheat they had made; but they alleged on their own behalf, that they had no other way to save themselves but that, and were therefore forced to have recourse to it. So he called for Eleazar the high priest, and for the senate, who thought right to resolve upon the thing; and he might not break the oath they had made to them, and they ordained them to be so. And this was the method by which these men found safety and security under the calamity that was ready to overtake them.

17. But the king of Jerusalem took it to heart that the Gibeonites had gone over to Joshuah; so he called upon the kings of the neighboring nations to join together and to make war against them. Now, when the Gibeonites saw these kings, which were four besides the king of Jerusalem, and perceived that they had pitched their camp at a certain fountain not far from their city, and were getting ready for battle, they called upon Joshuah to assist them; for such was their case, as to expect to be destroyed by these Canaanites, but to suppose they should be saved by those that came for the destruction of the Canaanites, and that it was not to their interest to confess themselves to be Canaanites, but thought they might, by this contrivance, avoid the danger, namely, by saying that they bore no relation to any of those kings; but dwelt at a great distance from them: and they said farther, that they came a long way on account of the reputation he had gained for his virtue; and as a mark of the truth of what they said, they showed him the land they inhabit, in the senate, that he might see that they were new when they came out, but were greatly worn by the length of time they had been in their journey, for indeed they took tare garments on purpose that they might make him believe this. So they were received in the midst of the people, and said that they were sent by the people of Gibeon, and of the circumcised cities, which were very remote from the land where they now were, to make such a league of friendship with them, that they might be of advantage to them in the multitude among their forefathers; for when they understood, that, by the favor of God, and his gift to them, they were to have the possession of the land which he had promised to their fathers, they said, that they were very glad to hear it, and desired to be admitted into the number of their citizens. * Whether this lengthening of the day, by the standing still of the sun and moon were physical, and real, by the miraculous stoppage of the diurnal motion of the earth for about three hours, are still uncertain; but, according to the Jewish tradition, by a certain person, imitating the sun and moon as stationary so long, while clouds and the night hid the real sun and moon, and taking care to give sufficient light for Joshua's pursuit and complete victory, (which was the person in other shapes have been more than a thousand years ago,) it was determined; philosophers and astronomers will naturally embrace this hypothesis. In the mean time, the fact itself was mentioned in the book of Joshuah now, the sun and moon stood still.
itess; and they, instead of being full of hopes of good success, were superstitiously timorous, with the great terror with which they were stricken. Whereupon God upbrided them with the fear they were in; and asked them, Whether they desired a greater help than he could afford them? and promised them that they should overcome their enemies; and withal charged them to make their enemies' horses useless, and to burn their chariots. So Joshua became full of courage upon the word of God, and went out ordin- singly against the enemies, and after five days' march he came upon them, and joined battle with them, and there was a terrible fight, and such a number were slain as could not be believed by those that heard it. He also went on in the pursuit a great way, and destroyed the entire army of the enemies, few only excepted, and all the kings fell in the battle; insomuch that when they were slain, the horses and chariots were all over their country without opposition, no one daring to meet him in battle; but he still went on, taking their cities by siege, and again laid waste all the land.

18. The fifth year was now past, and there was not one of the Cannanites remained any longer, excepting some that had retired to places of great strength. So Joshua removed his camp to the mouth of the Jordan, and placed the altar of the tabernacle in the city of Shiloh, for that seemed a fit place for it, because of the beauty of its situation, until such time as their affairs would permit them to build a temple; and from hence he went to Shechem, and fulfilled all the promises that had been made as to the altar where Moses had before directed; then did he divide the army, and placed one half on mount Gerizim, and the other half on mount Ebal, in the same manner as before; he also placed there the tribe of Levi, and the priests. And when they had sacrificed and denounced the [blessings and the] curse, and had left them engraved upon the altar, they returned to Shiloh.

20. And now Joshua was old, and saw that the cities of the Cannanites were not easily to be taken, not only because they were situated in such strong places, but because of the strength of the walls themselves, which being built round about the natural strength of the places on which the cities stood, seemed capable of repelling their enemies from besieging them, and of making those enemies despair of taking them; for when the Cannanites had learned, that the Israelites cannot be easily overcome by the art of destruction that they were busy all that time in making their cities strong; so he gathered the people together to a congregation at Shiloh; and when they, with great heart, were come thither, he observed to them, what prosperous success they had already had, and what glorious things had been done, and those such as were worthy of that God who enabled them to do those things, and worthy of the virtue of those laws which they followed. He took notice also, that thirty-one of those kings that ventured to give them battle were overcome, and every army, how great soever it were, that confided in their own power, and fought with their desire, yet, in so much, they were not so much as any of their posterity remained. And as for the cities, since some of them were taken, but the others must be taken in length of time, by long sieges, both on account of the strength of the places, and of the confidence the inhabitants had in them thereby, he thought it reasonable that those tribes that came along with them from beyond Jordan, and had parted of the dangers they were in, having their own kindred, should now be disbanded and sent home, and should have thanks for the pains they had taken together with them. As also, he thought it reasonable that they should send one man out at every tribe, and be such as had the testimony of extraordinary virtue, who should measure the land faithfully, and without any falsity or deceit should inform them of its real magnitude.

21. Now Joshua, when he had thus spoken to them, found that the multitude approved of his proposal. So he sent men to measure their country, and sent with them some geometers. Whose duty it was to view the whole of the land on account of their skill in that art. He also gave them a charge to estimate the measure of that part of the land that was most fruitful, and what was not so good; for such is the nature of the land of Jordan, that one part is the one large plains, and such as are exceeding fit to produce fruit, which yet, if they were compared to other parts of the country, might be reckoned excepted, signed him by lot the part of Judas, resting fields about Jericho, and to those that belong to Jerusalem, will appear to be of no account at all. And although it so falls out, that these people have but a very little of this sort of land, and that part of it is mountainous, belonging to it not come behind other parts, on account of its exceeding goodness and beauty: for which reason Joshua thought the land for the tribes should be divided by estimation of its goodness, rather than by the lot; and the allotment of that land, measuring that one acre of some sorts of land was equivalent to a thousand other acres. Now the men that were sent, which were in number ten, travelled all about, and made an estimation of the land, and in the end came to him to the city of Shiloh, where they had set up the tabernacle.

22. So Joshua took both Eleazar, and the se- nators of Judah, and all the heads of the children of Egypt and Arabia. The lot of Simeon, which was the second, included that part of the mountain border, upon it not come behind other parts, on account of its exceeding goodness and beauty: for which reason Joshua thought the land for the tribes should be divided by estimation of its goodness, rather than by the lot; and the allotment of that land, measuring that one acre of some sorts of land was equivalent to a thousand other acres. The lot of Simeon, which was the second, included that part of the mountain border, upon it not come behind other parts, on account of its exceeding goodness and beauty: for which reason Joshua thought the land for the tribes should be divided by estimation of its goodness, rather than by the lot; and the allotment of that land, measuring that one acre of some sorts of land was equivalent to a thousand other acres. Now the men that were sent, which were in number ten, travelled all about, and made an estimation of the land, and in the end came to him to the city of Shiloh, where they had set up the tabernacle.
you to suppose, that there is no limit to be set to the intimate relations between us; and that you will not imagine, that because you are interposed between us, that you are of a different race from us, and not Hebrews, for we are all the posterity of Abraham, both we that inhabit here, and you that inhabit there; and it is the same God that brought our forefathers and yours into the world, whose worship and form of government we are to take care of, which he had ordained, and are most carefully to observe; because while you continue in those laws, you must also show himself merciful and assisting to you; but if you imitate the other nations, and forsake those laws, he will reject your nation."

When Joshua had spoken thus, and saluted them all, both those in authority one by one, and the whole multitude in common, he himself stayed where he was, but the people conducted those tribes on their journey, and that not without tears in their eyes; and indeed they hardly knew how to part one from the other.

26. Now when the tribe of Reuben, and that of God, and as many of the Manassites as followed them, were passed over the river, they built an altar on the place of the escape, and one of their chief men, and in the place of the Upper Galilee. He also distributed among them the rest of the prey not yet distributed, which was very great, whereby they had an assurance of great riches, both in general, and very considerable, in the arts of gold and of vestments, and of other furniture, besides a multitude of cattle, whose number could not be told.

25. After this was over, he gathered the army together to a congregation; and spake thus to those tribes that had their settlement in the land of the Amorites beyond Jordan: for 50,000 of them had armed themselves, and had gone to the war along with them: "Since that God, who is the King and Lord of the Hebrew nation, has now given us this land for a possession, and promised to preserve us in the enjoyment of it as our own for ever; and since you have with alacrity opposed yourselves to the provision of assistance, on all occasions according to his command; it is but just, now all our difficulties are over, that you should be permitted to enjoy rest, and that we should tresspass on your alacrity to promote the public welfare, and again stand in need of it, we may readily have it on any future emergency, and not tire you out so much now as may make you slower in assisting us another time. We therefore return you our thanks, for the dangers you have undergone with us; and we do it not at this time only, but we shall always be thus disposed, and be so good as to remember our friends, and to preserve in mind what advantages we have had from them, and hope that they will continue in the same degree of happiness for our sake, and have labored for what we have now, by the good-will of God, obtained, and resolved not to enjoy your own prosperity till we have provided for yours. However, you have, by joining your labor with ours, gotten great plenty of riches, and will carry home with you much prey, with gold and silver, and what is more than all these, our goodwill towards you, and a mind willing and willing to make a requital of your kindness to us, in what case soever you shall desire it, for you have not omitted any thing which Moses beforehand required of you, nor have you despised him because he was dead and gone from you, so that there is nothing to diminish that gratitude which we owe to you. We therefore dismiss you joyfully to your own inheritances; and we entreat you to suppose, that there is no limit to be set to the intimate relations between us; and that you will not imagine, that because you are interposed between us, that you are of a different race from us, and not Hebrews, for we are all the posterity of Abraham, both we that inhabit here, and you that inhabit there; and it is the same God that brought our forefathers and yours into the world, whose worship and form of government we are to take care of, which he had ordained, and are most carefully to observe; because while you continue in those laws, you must also show himself merciful and assisting to you; but if you imitate the other nations, and forsake those laws, he will reject your nation."

ARK, and that altar which is peculiar to us, and can introduce strange gods, and imitate the wicked practices of the Canaanites. Now this will appear to have been a small crime, if you repent now, and proceed no farther in your madness, but pay a due reverence to, and keep in mind the laws of your country; but if you persist in your sins, we will not grudge you the pains to prepare the Canaanites, but we will destroy them, we will be upon Jordan and defend them, and defend God also, and shall esteem of you as of men nayther differing from the Canaanites, but shall destroy you in the like manner as we destroyed them. Do not you imagine, that because you are over the river, that you are got out of the reach of God's power; you are every where in places that belong to him, and impossible it is to overrun his power, and the punishment he will bring on men thereby; but if you think that your settlement here will be any obstruction to your conversion to what is good, nothing need hinder us from dividing the land anew, and leaving this old land to be for the enjoyment of the Canaanites, but to return to your duty, and to leave off these new crimes: and we beseech you, by your children and wives, not to force us to punish you. Take, therefore, such measures in this assembly, as will strengthen you in the good resolution you have made of getting rid of those that are dearest to you, is therein concerned, and believe that it is better for you to be conquered by words, than to continue in your present prejudice, and to experience deeds and war thereafter.

27. When Phinehas had discoursed thus, the governors of the assembly and the whole multitude began to make an apology for themselves, confessing that they were accounted of, and they said, "That they neither would depart from the relation they bare to them, nor had they built the altar by way of innovation; and they owned one and the same common God with all the Hebrew people, that built an altar which was before the tabernacle, on which they would offer their sacrifices: that as to the altar they had raised on account of which they were thus suspected, it was not built for worship, but that it might be a sign and a monument of their relation to you forever, and a necessary caution to us to act wisely, and to continue in the laws of our country, but not a handle for transgressing them, as you suspected."

28. Thus did the Governor of Caldon (as themoderated witness, that this was the occasion of our building this altar: whence we beg you will have a better opinion of us, and do not impute such a thing to us as would render any of the posterity of Abraham well worthy of the attempt to bring in new rites, and such as are different from our usual practices.

29. When they had made this answer, and Phinehas had commended them for it, he came to Joshua, and explained before the people the answer they had received: now Joshua was glad that he was under no necessity of setting them in array, or of leading them to shed blood, and make war against such of their own kindred; and according to the tribe of thanksgiving to God for the same: so Joshua after that dissolved this great assembly of the people, sent them to their own inheritances, which himself lived in Shechem. But in the twentieth year after this, when the people were assembled, those of the greatest dignity in the several cities, with those in authority, and the senate, and many of the common people as accorded: now some time, he put them in mind of all the benefits God had bestowed on them, which could not but be a great many, since from a low estate they were advanced to so great a degree of glory and plenty, and exhorted them to observe the laws of God, which he had been so gracious towards them; and told them, that the Deity would continue their friend by nothing else but their piety: and that it was proper for him, now he was about to depart out of this life, to leave such an admonition to them, and that he desired that they would keep in memory this his exhortation to them.

29. So Joshua, when he had thus discoursed to them, died, having lived a hundred and eight years; forty of which he lived with Moses, in order to learn what might be for his advantage afterward. He also became their commander after his death for twenty-five years. He was a man that wanted not wisdom nor eloquence to declare what was the duty of the people in both accounts. He was of great courage and magnanimity, in action and in danger: and very sagacious in procuring the peace of the people. He was not guilty at all proper a time to sit in judgment of the cases: he was buried in the city of Timnah, of the tribe of Ephraim. About the same time died Eleazar the high priest, leaving the high priesthood to his son Phinehas. His monument also and sepulchre are in the city of Gabbatha.

CHAP. II.

How after the death of Joshua their commander, the Israelites transgressed the Laws of their Country, and experienced great Afflictions; and when there was a Sedition, the Tribe of Benjamin was destroyed, excepting only as hundred Men.

I. After the death of Joshua and Eleazar, Phinehas prophesied, that according to God's will, they should commit the government to the tribe of Judah, and that this tribe should destroy the Canaanites for the sins of their fathers, who were concerned to learn what was the will of God. They also took to their assistance the tribe of Simeon, but upon this condition, that when those that had been tributary to the tribe of Simeon should hold to their faith, they should do the like for the tribe of Simeon.

2. But the affairs of the Canaanites were at this time in a flourishing condition and they expected the Israelites with a great army at the city Bezek, having put the government into the hands of Adonibezek, which name denotes the Lord of Bezek, for Adoni, in the Hebrew tongue, is called lord. Now they hoped to have been too hard for the Israelites, because Joshua had before them that had joined battle with them, I mean the two tribes before me

* Since not only Procopius and Suidas, but an earlier author, Moses Chorenensis, p. 22, 53, and perhaps from his authority, the catholicon as Alexander the Great, sets down the famous inscription at Tygur concerning the old Canaanites driven out of Palestine by Joshua, take the following as that author's own words: "We are those exiles that were governors of the Canaanites, but have been driven away by Joshua, the robber, and are come to inhabit here." See the note there. Nor is it unworthy of our notice, what Moses Chorenensis adds, p. 53, and this upon a diligent examination of those records: one of those records being sent the Canaanites came at the same time into Armenia, and founded the Genthunian family or tribe, and this was confirmed by the manners of the same family or tribe, as being like those of the Canaanites."

† By prophesying, when spoken of a high priest, Josu

a, both here and elsewhere, means the high priest. Thus, the Catholicon, as also Alexander the Great, states down the famous inscription at Tygur concerning the old Canaanites driven out of Palestine by Joshua, take it here as that author's own words: 'We are those exiles that were governors of the Canaanites, but have been driven away by Joshua, the robber, and are come to inhabit here.' See the note there. Nor is it unworthy of our notice, what Moses Chorenensis adds, p. 53, and this upon a diligent examination of those records: one of those records being sent the Canaanites came at the same time into Armenia, and founded the Genthunian family or tribe, and this was confirmed by the manners of the same family or tribe, as being like those of the Canaanites." touched they fought gloriously, and slew above ten thousand of them, and put the rest to flight: and in the pursuit they took Adoni-bezek, when his fingers and toes were cut off by them, said, "Nay, indeed, I was not always to lie concealed from God, as I find by what I now endure, while I have not been ashamed to do the same to thee, but what thou hast given me shalt deliver up the city to them, they would preserve him and his kindred: so he awoke, that upon these terms he would put the city into their hands. Accordingly, he that thus betrayed the city, was preserved by his lie; but the Israelites slew all the inhabitants, and retained the city for themselves.

7. After this, the Israelites grew affaminated as to fighting any more against their enemies, but applied them to the cultivation of the land, which producing them great plenty and riches, they neglected the regular disposition of their settlement, and indulged themselves in luxury and pleasures, nor were they any longer careful to him some assurance that if he stood in the political government: whereupon God was provoked to anger, and put them in mind first, how, contrary to his directions, they had spared the Canaanites, and after that, how these Canaanites, as opportunity served, used them with barbarity. But the Israelites, though they were in heaviness at these admonitions from God, yet were they still very unwilling to go to war, and since they got large tributes from the Canaanites, and were supplied with meat and drink by their luxury, they suffered their aristocracy to be corrupted also, and did not ordain themselves a senate, nor any other such magistrates as their laws had formerly required, but these were very much given to taking their father's goods, in order to get wealth; which great indulgence of theirs brought a terrible sedition upon them, and they proceeded so far as to fight one against another, from the following occasion:

8. There was a Levite, a man of a vulgar family, that belonged to the tribe of Ephraim, and dwelt therein; this man married a wife from Bethhem, which is a place belonging to the tribe of Judah, and having a great number of children, sorely galled those that attacked them: so these tribes, when they were grown very rich by this war, retired to their own cities, and laid aside their weapons of war.

5. But the Benjaminites, to whom belonged Jerusalem, permitted its inhabitants to pay tribute; so they all left off, the one to kill, and the other to expose themselves to danger, and had the very peaceable part of the land. The tribes imitated what of Benjamin, and did the same; and contenting themselves with the tributes that were paid them, permitted the Canaanites to live in peace.

4. Now the tribes of Judah and Simeon took the cities which were in the mountainous part of Canaan, as also Askelon and Ashdod, of those that lay near the sea, but Gaza and Ekron escaped, being given to the tribe of Judah, and having a great number of children, sorely galled those that attacked them: so these tribes, when they were grown very rich by this war, retired to their own cities, and laid aside their weapons of war.
ANTIQUITIES OF THE JEWS.

em, having gone already thirty furlongs, the servant advised him to take in some where, lest some misfortune should befall them if they travelled in the night, especially since they were not far off enemies, that season often giving reason for suspicion of dangers from every side. But the husband, who was not pleased with this advice, nor was he willing to take up his lodgings among strangers, for the city belonged to the Canaanites, but desired rather to go twenty furlongs farther, and so to take up his lodgings in some lodging in the city. And accordingly, he obtained his purpose, and came to Gibeah, a city of the tribe of Benjamin, when it was just dark; and while no one that lived in the market-place invited him to lodge with him, there came an old man out of the field, one that was indeed of the tribe of Ephraim, but resided in Gibeah, and met him, and asked him, who he was, and for what reason he came that night so late; and he was looking for provisions for supper when it was dark. To which an old man replied, that he was a Levite, and was bringing his wife from her parents, and was going home, but he told him his habitation was in the tribe of Ephraim; and, as was usual, for the kindness and generosity of the old man's family; and because they lived in the same tribe, as also because they had thus accidentally met together, took him in to lodge with him. Now certain young men of the inhabitants of Gibeah, heard of the woman in the market-place, and admiring her beauty, when they understood that she lodged with the old man, came to the doors, as contemning the weakness and fewness of the old man's family; and when the old man desired them to go away, and not to offer any violence or abuse there, they desired him to yield them up the strange woman, and then he should have no harm done to him: and when the old man alleged that the Levite was of his house, and that they were not guilty of horrid wickedness if they suffered themselves to be overcome by their pleasures, and so offend against their laws, they despised his righteous adjuration, and laughed him to scorn. They also threatened to kill him if he became an obstable to their inclinations; whereupon, when he found himself in great distress, and yet was not willing to overlook his guests, and see them abuse and ill-treat his own daughter to them, and told them, that it was a smaller breach of the law to satisfy their lust upon her, than to abuse his guests; supposing that he himself should by this means prevent any injury to be done. But then the old man, abased of his earnings for the strange woman, but insisted absolutely on their desires to have her, he entertained them not to perpetrate any such act of injustice; but they proceeded to take her away by force, and indulging still more the violence of their inclinations, they took the woman away to their house, and when they had satisfied their lust upon her the whole night, they let her go about daybreak. So she came to the house where she was brought up, and he esteemed it the greatest afflication at what had happened, and was very sorrowful upon occasion of what she had suffered, and durst not look her husband in the face for shame, for she concluded that he would never forgive her for what he had done, and therefore he laid himself down, and gave up the ghost; but her husband supposed that his wife was only fast asleep, and thinking nothing of a more melancholy nature had happened, he, as before, alighted upon her, and correcting her, resolving to speak comfortably to her, since she did not voluntarily expose herself to these men's lust, but was forced away to their house; but as soon as he perceived she was dead, he acted prudently as the greatness of his misfortunes were made up by the loss of his wife, and his [proper name of a place Bethel] he now say notes the house of God, or the tabernacle. Judg. xx. 18. so that the tabernacle was ever at Bethel; only the word Bethel, which word the House, or the tabernacle in the days of the Judges, was not far from Bethel.
give them the victory and power over their enemies. Accordingly, God promised them so to do by the prophet of Pethahiah:

11. When therefore they had divided the army into two parts, they laid the one-half of them in ambush about the city of Gibeon by night, while the other half attacked the Benjaminites, and the people of that city pursued them, while the Hebrews retired by slow degrees, as very desirous to draw them entirely from the city, and the others followed them as they retired, till both the old men and young men went out of the city, and they did not fall to fight, came running out together with them, as willing to bring their enemies under. However, when they were a great way from the city, the Hebrews ran away no longer, but turned back to fight them, and then the signal they had agreed on to those that lay in ambush, who rose up, and with a great noise fell upon the enemy. Now, as soon as ever they perceived themselves to be deceiv'd, they knew not what to do, and when they were driven into a certain hollow place which was in a valley, they were shot at by those that encompassed them, till they were all destroyed, excepting six hundred, which formed themselves into a close body of men, and forced the enemy to charge them, and they fled to the neighboring mountains, and taking upon them, remained there; but the rest of them, being about twenty-five thousand, were slain by the sword.

2. And there were slain the women and the males that were under age, and did the same also to the other cities of the Benjaminites. And indeed they were enraged to that degree, that they sent twelve thousand men out of the land, and gave them a schedule of the names of the Benjaminites, and said to destroy Jabez Gilead, because it did not join with them in fighting against the Benjaminites. Accordingly, those that were sent slew the men of war, with their children and wives, excepting five thousand. To prevent this, they proceeded in their anger, because they not only had the suffering of the Levite's wife to avenge, but the slaughter of their own soldiers.

3. However, they afterwards were sorry for the calamity they had brought upon the Benjaminites, and appointed a fast on that account, although they supposed those men had suffered justly for their offence against the laws: so they recalled, by a general resolution, one half of those that had escaped. These had seated themselves on a certain rock called 'Rimmon,' which was in the wilderness; so the ambassadors lamented not only the disaster that had befallen the Benjaminites, but themselves also, by this destruction of one of God's holy places, and persuaded them to take it patiently, and to come and unite with them, and not, so far as in them lay, to give their suffrage to the utter destruction of the tribe of Benjamin and said to them, "We give you leave to take the whole land of Benjamin to yourselves, and as much prey as you are able to carry away with you." So these men with sorrow confessed, that what had befallen was by the command of God, and had happened for their own wickedness, and assented to those that invited them, and came down to their own tribe. The Israelites also gave them four hundred virgins of Jacob and Joseph, for servants, but they, in all two hundred, deliberated about it how they might compass wives enough for them, and that they might have children by them; and whereas they had, before the war began, taken an oath that no one would give his daughter to wife to a Benjaminite, some advised them to have no regard to what they had sworn, because the oath had not been taken advisedly and judicially, but by the multitude, to be no law against God, if they were able to save whole tribe which was in danger of perishing, and that perjury was then a sad and dangerous thing, not when it was done out of necessity, but when it is done with a wicked intent. But when the senate were afield at the very name of perjury, a certain person told them, that he could show them a way whereby they might procure the Benjaminites wives enough, and yet keep their oath. He said, "That the spoil was?" He said, "That three times in a year when we meet in Shiloh, our wives and our daughters accompany us; let then the Benjaminites be allowed to steal away, and marry such as they can catch, if they neither incite them nor forbid them; and when their parents take it ill, and desire us to inflict punishment upon them, we will tell them, that they were themselves the cause of what had happened, and that they were not able to prevent it, and that they ought not to be over angry at the Benjaminites, since that anger was permitted to rise too high already." So the Israelites were persuaded to follow this advice, and decreed, that the Benjaminites should be allowed thus to steal themselves wives. So when the festival was coming on, these two hundred Benjaminites lay in ambush before the city, by two and three together, and waited for the coming of the virgins, in the vineyards and by the wayside, where they could be concealed. Accordingly, the virgins came along playing, and suspected nothing of what was coming upon them, and walked after them, an unwary people, and those that were in the road rose up and caught hold of them; by this means these Benjaminites got them wives, and fell to agriculture, and took good care to recover their former happy estate. And thus was this tribe of the Benjaminites a sign to them that they had been in danger of entirely perishing; saved in the manner forementioned, by the wisdom of the Israelites; and accordingly it presently flourished and soon increased to be a multitude and name in all the land as a city of happy ease. And such was the conclusion of this war.

CHAP. III.

How the Israelites, after this Misfortune, grew wicked, and served the Assyrians, and how God delivered them by Othniel, who ruled over them forty Years.

1. Now it happened that the tribe of Dan suffered in like manner with the tribe of Benjamin; and it came to do so on the occasion following: when the Israelites had already left off the exercise of their arms for war, and were intent upon their husbandry, the Canaanites despised them, and brought them an arm which they expected to suffer by them, but because they had a mind to have a sure prospect of treating the Hebrews ill when they pleased, and might thereby, for the time to come, dwell in their own cities the more securely; they prepared therefore their chariots, and gathered their soldiers together, their cities also combined together, and drew over to them Askelon and Ekron, which were within the tribe of Judah, and all those of those that lay in the plain. They also forced the Danites to fly into the mountainous country, and left them not the least portion of the plain country to set their foot on. Since then these Danites were not able to live in the plain land enough to sustain them, they sent five of their men into the midland country to see for a land to which they might remove their habitation: so these men went as far as the neighborhood of mount Libanus, and the fountains of the lesser Jordan; at the great plain of Sidon, a day's journey from the city; and when they had taken a view of the land, and found it to be good and exceeding fruitful, they acquainted their tribe with it, when they saw they made an expedition against the army, and built there the city of Dan, of the same name with the son of Jacob, and of the same name with their own tribe. Thus there was a fondness in the hearts of the people towards the son of Jacob, who was the reigning young man of the tribe of Benjamin, whose name was Eshub, the son of Gers, a man of very great courage in bold under takings, and of a very strong body, fit for hard labor, but best skilled in using his left hand, in which was his whole strength; and he also dwelt at Jericho. Now this man became familiar with Eglon, and that by means of presents, with which he obtained his favor, and inducted himself into the king's favor, and he also adored those that were about the king. Now when on a time he was bringing presents to the king, and had two servants with him, he put a dagger on his right thigh secretly, and went in to him, it was then a midwinter, and the morn of the sabbath, when the guards were not strictly on their watch, both because of the heat, and because they were gone to dinner. So the young man, when he had offered his presents to the king, took the dagger out of his bosom, and hid it, and stood conveniently to avoid the heat, he fell into discourse with him, for they were now alone, the king having bid his servants that attended him to go their ways, because he had a mind to talk with Eshub. He then expected Eshub's seal was very strange to him, and gave him a deathly stroke, and not give him a deadly wound, so he raised himself up, and said he had a dream to impart to him by the command of God; upon which the king leaped out of his window, and perished out of the dream; so Eshub smote him to the heart, and leaving his dagger in his body, he went out and shut the door after him. Now the king's servants were very much surprised at seeing that the king had composed himself to sleep.

3. Hereupon Eshub informed the people of Jericho privately of what he had done, and exhort ed them to recover their liberty; who heard him, and finding he had no imposter, they came to their Eiphrasites. Hereupon Othniel, who had given such proofs of his valor, received from the multitude authority to judge the people; and when he had ruled over them forty years, he died.

CHAP. IV.
How our People served the Moabites eighteen Years, and were then delivered from Slavery by one Eshub, who retained the Dominions eighty Years.

§ 1. When Othniel was dead, the affairs of the Israelites fell again into disorder, while they neither paid to the God of honor due to him, nor submitted properly to the laws of God, which increased, till Eglon, king of the Moabites, did so greatly despise them, on account of the disorders of their political government, that he made war upon them, and overcame them in several battles, and made the most courageous to submit, and entirely subdued their army, and ordered them to pay him tribute. And when he had built him a royal palace at Jericho, he omitted no method whereby to distress them, and indeed he reduced them to poverty for eighteen years: but when God had once taken pity of the Israelites, on account of their afflictions, and was moved to compassion by their supplications put up to him, he freed them from the hard usage they had met with under the Moabites. This liberty he procured for them in the following manner.

2. There was a very young man of the tribe of Benjamin, whose name was Eshub, the son of Gers, a man of very great courage in bold undertakings, and of a very strong body, fit for hard labor, but best skilled in using his left hand, in which was his whole strength; and he also dwelt at Jericho. Now this man became familiar with Eglon, and that by means of presents, with which he obtained his favor, and inducted himself into the king's favor, and he also adored those that were about the king. Now when on a time he was bringing presents to the king, and had two servants with him, he put a dagger on his right thigh secretly, and went in to him, it was then a midwinter, and the morn of the sabbath, when the guards were not strictly on their watch, both because of the heat, and because they were gone to dinner. So the young man, when he had offered his presents to the king, took the dagger out of his bosom, and hid it, and stood conveniently to avoid the heat, he fell into discourse with him, for they were now alone, the king having bid his servants that attended him to go their ways, because he had a mind to talk with Eshub. He then expected Eshub's seal was very strange to him, and gave him a deathly stroke, and not give him a deadly wound, so he raised himself up, and said he had a dream to impart to him by the command of God; upon which the king leaped out of his window, and perished out of the dream; so Eshub smote him to the heart, and leaving his dagger in his body, he went out and shut the door after him. Now the king's servants were very much surprised at seeing that the king had composed himself to sleep.

3. Hereupon Eshub informed the people of Jericho privately of what he had done, and exhort ed them to recover their liberty; who heard him, and finding he had no imposter, they came to their Eiphrasites. § 1. When Othniel was dead, the affairs of the Israelites fell again into disorder, while they neither paid to the God of honor due to him, nor submitted properly to the laws of God, which increased, till Eglon, king of the Moabites, did so greatly despise them, on account of the disorders of their political government, that he made war upon them, and overcame them in several battles, and made the most courageous to submit, and entirely subdued their army, and ordered them to pay him tribute. And when he had built him a royal palace at Jericho, he omitted no method whereby to distress them, and indeed he reduced them to poverty for eighteen years: but when God had once taken pity of the Israelites, on account of their afflictions, and was moved to compassion by their supplications put up to him, he freed them from the hard usage they had met with under the Moabites. This liberty he procured for them in the following manner.

2. There was a very young man of the tribe of Benjamin, whose name was Eshub, the son of Gers, a man of very great courage in bold undertakings, and of a very strong body, fit for hard labor, but best skilled in using his left hand, in which was his whole strength; and he also dwelt at Jericho. Now this man became familiar with Eglon, and that by means of presents, with which he obtained his favor, and inducted himself into the king's favor, and he also adored those that were about the king. Now when on a time he was bringing presents to the king, and had two servants with him, he put a dagger on his right thigh secretly, and went in to him, it was then a midwinter, and the morn of the sabbath, when the guards were not strictly on their watch, both because of the heat, and because they were gone to dinner. So the young man, when he had offered his presents to the king, took the dagger out of his bosom, and hid it, and stood conveniently to avoid the heat, he fell into discourse with him, for they were now alone, the king having bid his servants that attended him to go their ways, because he had a mind to talk with Eshub. He then expected Eshub's seal was very strange to him, and gave him a deathly stroke, and not give him a deadly wound, so he raised himself up, and said he had a dream to impart to him by the command of God; upon which the king leaped out of his window, and perished out of the dream; so Eshub smote him to the heart, and leaving his dagger in his body, he went out and shut the door after him. Now the king's servants were very much surprised at seeing that the king had composed himself to sleep.

3. Hereupon Eshub informed the people of Jericho privately of what he had done, and exhort ed them to recover their liberty; who heard him, and finding he had no imposter, they came to their Eiphrasites. Hereupon Othniel, who had given such proofs of his valor, received from the multitude authority to judge the people; and when he had ruled over them forty years, he died.

same name with the son of Jacob, and of the same name with their own tribe. 2. The Israelites grew so indolent and unready of taking pains, that misfortunes came heavier upon them, which also proceeded in part from their contempt of the divine worship; for when they had once fallen off from the regularity of their political government, they indulged themselves farther in living according to their own pleasure, and according to their own will, till they were full of the evil doings that were common among the Canaanites. God therefore was angry with them, and they lost their happy state, which they had obtained by innumerable labors, by their luxury; for when Chusian, king of the Assyrians, had made war against them, they lost many of their soldiers in the battle, and when they were besieged, they were taken by force; nay, there were some who, out of fear, voluntarily submitted to him, and though the tribute paid upon them was more than they could bear, yet did they pay it, and underwent all sort of oppression for eight years; after which time they were freed from them in the following manner: 3. There was one whose name was Othniel, the son of one of the tribe of the Danites, a siod man, and of great courage. He had an admonition from God not to overlook the Israelites in such a distress as they were now in, but to endeavor boldly to gain them their liberty; so when he heard that Chusian had set over them, but when it was perceived that he had not failed in his first attempt, more of the people came to his assistance; so they joined battle with the Assyrians, and drove them entirely before them. They came and conquered the Edomites. Hereupon Othniel, who had given such proofs of his valor, received from the multitude authority to judge the people; and when he had ruled over them forty years, he died.

CHAP. IV.

How our People served the Moabites eighteen Years, and were then delivered from Slavery by one Ehud, who retained the Dominion eighteen Years.

1. WHEN Othniel was dead, the affairs of the Israelites fell again into disorder, and while they were to follow God the blessings which he had given to him nor were obedient to the laws, their afflictions increased, till Ehlon, king of the Moabites, did so greatly despise them, on account of the disorders of their political government, that he made war upon them, and overcame them in several battles, and made the most courageous to subdite, and entirely subdued their army, and ordered them to pay him tribute. And when he had built him a royal palace, after which he emitted no method whereby he might distress them, he reduced them to poverty for eighteen years: but when God had once taken pity of the Israelites, on account of their afflictions, and was moved to compassion by their supplications put up to him, he freed them from the hard usage they had met with under the Moabites. This liberty he procured for them in the following manner:

2. There was a young man of the tribe of Benjamin, whose name was Ehud, the son of Gera, a man of very great courage in bold under takings, and of a very strong body, fit for hard labor, but his eyesight was but small, whereby he was also beloved of those that were about the king. Now when on a time he was bringing presents to the king, and had two servants with him, he put a dagger on his right thigh secretly, and went in to him: it was then night and time, and the king sat in the middle of the day, when the guards were not strictly on their watch, both because of the heat, and because they were gone to dinner. So the young man of the tribe of Benjamin, who then resided in a small parlour that stood conveniently to avoid the heat, he fell into discourse with him; for they were now alone, the king having bid his servants that attended him to retire a while, because it was then night and time. He was sitting on his throne; and fear seized upon Ehud lest he should miss his stroke, and not give him a deadly wound, so he raised himself up, and said he had a dream to labor, but his sight was too dim to understand which the king leaped out of his throne for joy of the dream; so Ehud smote him to the heart, and leaving his dagger in his body, he went out and shut the door after him. Now the king's servants were still in the room, and not knowing that the king had composed himself to sleep.

3. Hereupon Ehud informed the people of Jericho privately of what he had done, and exhorted them to recover their liberty; who heard him gladly, and went to the king's palace, and the guards over the country, that should sound trumpets of rams' horns, for it was our custom to call the people together by them. Now the attendants of Ehud were ignorant of what mischief had befallen him for a great while; but towards the evening, fearing some uncommon accident had happened, they entered into his parlour, and when they found him dead they were in great disorder, for they knew not what to do. But when the guards could be got together, the multitude of the Israelites came upon them, so that some of them were slain immediately, and some were put to flight, and ran away toward the country of Moab. Ehud therefore, who was a man of a great number, was above ten thousand. The Israelites seized upon the ford of Jordan, and pursued them, and slew them, and many of them they killed at the ford, nor did one of them escape out of their hands; and by this means it was that the Hebrews freed themselves from slavery under the Moabites. Ehud also was on this account dignified with the government over all the multitude, and held the government eighty years. He was a wise and prudent man, and a good recommendation, even besides what he deserved for the forementioned act of his. After him Shammgar, the son of Anath, was elected for their governor, but died in the first year of his government.

* It appears by the sacred history, Judg. I. 66, ll. 13, that Ehon's pavilion, or palace, was at the city of palm-trees: Jericho was not to the nearest of Nazareth, but to the nearest of Jericho, his city of palm-trees only, speak here more accurately than Josephus.

† These 50 years for the government of Ehud are necessary to Josephus's usual large numbers between the exodus and the building of the temple, of 320 or 360 years for the 500 years, but not for the smallest number, 330 years, of 1 Kings vi. 1, which lesser number Josephus sees sometimes to have followed. And since in the beginning of the time of King David, the number was by the Chaldean, or by the Medes, 25 and 26 years; and that number was to his time, for the length of time for the Israelites before Jabin came and subdued them, it is highly probable that some of these periods in his time had here only 8 years instead of 25, as had that of Theophilus of Antioch, Ad Apost. L. iii. and this most probably from his copy of Josephus.
BOOK V.—CHAP. V. VI.

CHAP. V.

How the Canaanites brought the Israelites under Slavery for twenty years; after which they were delivered by Barak and Deborah, who ruled over them forty Years.

1. And it came to pass, that the Israelites, taking no warning by their former misfortunes to amend their manners, and neither worshiping God, nor submitting to the laws, were brought under slavery by Jabin, the king of the Canaanites, and that before they had a short breathing time after the Microsilus, under the Mounts of Millo, came out of Hazor, a city that was situated over the lake Semochonitis, and had in pay three hundred thousand footmen, and ten thousand horsemen, but far fewer than three hundred thousand cavalry. Sisera was the commander of all his army, and was the principal person in the king's favor. He so sorely beat the Israelites when they fought with him, that he ordered them to pay tribute.

2. Being then in those miseries, and having that fear for twenty years, as not good enough of themselves to grow wise by their misfortunes. God was willing also hereby the more to subdue their obstinacy and ingratitude towards himself: so when he saw a camp so far from the ends of his country. The Israelites were so wise as to learn that their calamities arose from their contempt of the laws, they be- sought Deborah, a certain prophetess among them, (which name in the Hebrew tongue signifies "a fruit of the earth," and was given to her because she was a great fruit of God's grace and goodness, and not to overlook them, now they were ruined by the Canaanites. So God granted them deliverance, and chose them a general, Barak, one that was of the tribe of Naphtali, (now Barak, in the Hebrew tongue signifies "a thunder.")

3. So Deborah sent for Barak, and bid him choose him out ten thousand young men, to go against the enemy, because God had said, that that number was not far from the ends of his country. But when Barak said, that he would not be the general unless she would also go as a general with him, she had indignation at what he said, and replied, "Thou, O Barak, deliverest not the Israelites, unless thou bring me with thee, into the band of a woman, and I do not reject it." So they collected ten thousand men, and pitched their camp at Mount Tabor, where, at the king's command, Sisera met them, and pitched their camp on the east side of the Jordan. But Barak and the Israelites pitched their camp on the west side of the Jordan. So they came to the battle, and attacked the Israelites, and slew a great number of them, so that some of them fell by the Israelites, some fell by their own horses, which were put into disorder, and not a few were killed by their own chariots. At last Sisera, as soon as he saw himself beaten, fled away, and came to a woman whose name was Jael, a Kenite, who received him, when he desired to be concealed; and when he asked for something to drink, she gave him sour milk, of which he was so refreshed, that he fell asleep, and she put an iron in his head, and drove it through his temples with a hammer into the floor; and when Barak came, a little afterward, she showed Sisera nailed to the ground. And so was this liberty, purchased by a woman, as Deborah had foretold. Barak also fought with Jabin at Hazor; and when he met with him he slew him; and when the general was fallen, Barak overthrew the city to the foundation, and was commander of the Israelites for forty years.

CHAP. VI.

How the Midianites and other nations fought against the Israelites, and beat them, and afflicted their Country for seven Years. How they were delivered by Gideon, who ruled over the Multitude.

1. Now when Barak and Deborah were dead, whose deaths happened about the same time, afterward the Midianites called the Amalekites and Arabsians to their assistance, and made war against the Israelites, and were too hard for them. Yet a few there were that had taken the fruits of the earth, they might have fruits for them to carry away. Indeed, there ensued a famine, and a scarcity of food, upon which they betook themselves to their supplications to God, and besought him to save them, and give them success, in time they recovered.

2. Gideon also, the son of Joash, one of the principal persons of the tribe of Manasseh, brought his sheaves of corn privately, and thrashed them; and when he saw the sheaves of his enemies, to thrust them openly in the threshing-floor. At this time somewhat appeared to him in the shape of a young man, and told him, "That he was a happy man and beloved of God." To which he immediately replied, "A mighty indication of God's favor to me, that I am forced to use this winewinepress instead of a threshing-floor!" But the appearance exhorted him to be of good courage, and to make an attempt for the recovery of his country. He answered, That it was impossible for him to recover it, because the tribe to which he belonged, was by no means numerous; and because he was but young himself, and too inconsiderable to think of such a thing. He could not, therefore, mislead him, that God would supply what he was defective in, and would afford the Israelite victory under his conduct.

3. Now therefore, as Gideon was relating this to some young men, they believed him, and immediately there was an army of ten thousand men got ready for fighting. But God stood by Gideon in his sleep, and told him, "That mankind were too few of themselves, and their arms were few in number, so that they might not pass God over, but ascribe the victory to him, and might not fancy it obtained by their own power because they were a great army, and said of themselves they had taken the victory; but might confess that it was owing to his assistance, he advised him to bring his army about noon, in the violence of the heat, to the river, and to esteem those that went down on their knees, and so drank, to be men of counsel, but for all those that drank tumultuously, that he should esteem them to do it out of fear, and as in dread of their enemies." And when Gideon had done as God had suggested to him, there were founded the first such great multitude of the people that were taken with their hands tumultuously, so God bid him take these men, and attack the e., etc. Accor-ingly they pitched their camp at the river Jordan, as ready the next day to pass over it.

4. But Gideon was in great fear, for God had told him beforehand, that he should set upon his enemies in the night-time: but God, being willing to shield him from his fear, hid him one of his soldiers, and so near to the Midianites' tents, for that he should from that very place have his courage raised, and grow bold. So be obeyed, and went and took his servant Pharaoh with him; and the captain of the guard to one of the tents he discovered that those that were in it were awake, and that one of them was telling to his fellow-soldier a dream of his own, and that so plainly, that Gideon could hear him. The dream was this: he said: 'I saw a barley cake, and it was one as could hardly be eaten by men, it was so vile, rolling through the camp, and overthrowing the royal tent, and the tents of all the soldiers. Now the other soldier explained this vision to mean the seed called barley was all of it allowed to be the vilest sort of seed, and that the Israelites were known to be the vilest of all the nations; he therefore agreed to give up the seed of barley; and that what seemed to look big among the Israelites, was this Gideon, and the army that was with him: and since thou sayest thou didst see them fleeing our tents, I am afraid lest God hast granted the victory over us to Gideon.'

5. When Gideon had heard this dream, good hope and courage came upon him; and he commanded his soldiers to arm themselves, and told them of this vision of their enemies. They also took courage at what was told them, and were ready to perform what he should enjoin them: so Gideon divided his army into three parts, and brought it out about the fourth watch of the night, each containing a hundred men: they all bare empty pitchers, and lighted lamps in their hands, that their onset might not be discovered by their enemies. They had also each of them a ram's horn, in his right hand, which he used instead of a trumpet: the enemies' camp took up a large space of ground, for it happened they had a great many camels: and as they were divided into different nations, so they were all contained in one circle. Now when the Hebrews were ordered to hand, upon their approach to their enemies, and on the signal given, sounded with their rams' horns, and broke their pitchers, and set upon their enemies with their lamps, and a great shout, and cried, 'Gad, bless our battle, God with our valour,' and order and a fright seized on the other men while they were fast asleep, for it was night-time, as God would have it; so that a few of them were slain by their enemies, but the greatest part by the Israelites soldiers, or account of the diversity in their language; and when they were once put into disorder, they killed all that they met with, as thinking them to be enemies also. Thus they took great quantities of men. And as the report of Gideon's victory came to the Israelites they took their weapons and pursued their enemies, and overtook them in a certain valley, encompassed with torrents, a place which these enemies had before, so did they pursue them, and slew them all, with their kings, Orcbe and Zeeb. But the remaining captains led those soldiers that were left, which were about eighteen thousand, and pitched their camp a great way off. However, Gideon's men did not grudge his praise, but pursued them with all his army, and joining battle with them, cut off the whole enemies' army, and took the other leaders, Zebah and Zalmunna, and made them captives. And Gideon in his triumph, slew the kings of the Midianites, and of their auxiliaries, the Arabsians, about a hundred and twenty thousand; and the Hebrews took a great prey, gold, and silver, and garments, and camels, and asses. And when Gideon was come to his own country of Ophra he slew the kings of the Midianites.

6. However, the tribe of Ephraim was so displeased at the good success of Gideon, that they resolved to make war against him, accusing him because he did not tell them of his expedition against their enemies. But Gideon, as a man of temper, and that excelled in every virtue, pleaded, 'That it was not the result of his own authority or reasoning that made him attack the enemy without them, but that it was the command of God, and still the victory belonged to them as well as to those in the army.' And by this method ofcooling their passions, he brought more to his side, and, by the success he had against these enemies, for he thereby delivered them from a sedition which was arising among them; yet did this tribe afterward suffer the punishment of this their injurious treatment of us, of which we will give an account in due time.

7. Hereupon Gideon would have laid down the government, but was over-persuaded to take it, which he enjoyed forty years, and distributed among his sons, and wrote what was to be done in their differences; and what he determined was esteemed valid by all. And when he died, he was buried in his own country of Ophra.

CHAP. VII

The Judges who succeeded Gideon made War with the adjoining Nations for a long Time.

1. Now Gideon had seventy sons that were legitimate, for he had many wives, but he had also one that was spurious, by his concubine Drusah, whose name was Abimelech, who, after his father's death, retired to Shechem to his mother's brother, for he was very well pleased with the report he had got money of such as they were eminently for many instances of injustice, he came with them to his father's house, and slew all his brethren, except Jotham; for he had the good fortune to escape and be preserved; but Abimelech made the government tyrannical, and constituted himself a lord, to do what he pleased, instead of obeying the laws, and he acted most rigidly against those that were the patrons of justice.

2. Now, when on a certain time there was a public festival at Shechem, and all the multitude was there gathered together, Jotham his brother whose escape we before related, went up to rise to his mouth, and said, 'And Abimelech, and other of the multitude, who were attentive to him. He desired they would consider what he was going to say to them: so when silence was made, he said, 'That when the trees had a human voice and there was an assembly of them gathered to gether, they desired that the fig-tree would rule over them; but when that tree refused so to do, it became a question between them and the olive, which belonged peculiarly to the fruit in the land and not that which should be derived to it from abroad, the trees did not leave off their intentions to have a ruler, so they thought proper to make the old tree to make his way to the vine, but when the vine was chosen, it made use of the same words which the fig-tree had used before, and excused itself from accepting the government, and when the olive-tree had done the same, the bramble came forward to be king, and the kingdom, (it is a sort of wood good for firing,) promised to take the government, and to be jealous in the exercise of it, but that they must sit down under its shadow, and if they should break it with their battle-axe, the fire of the vine was in it should destroy them. He told them, that what he said was no laughing matter: for that when they had experienced many blessings from Gideon, they overlooked Abimelech, when he overruled all, and had joined with him in slaying his brethren: and that he was no better than a fire himself." So when he had said this, he went away, and lived privately in the mountains for three years, out of fear of Abimelech.

3. A little while after this festival, the Shechemites, who had now repented themselves of having slain the sons of Gideon, drove Abimelech away, both from their city and their tribe; whereupon he contrived how he might distress their city. Now at the season of vintage, the people were afraid to go out and gather the fruits, for fear Abimelech should do them some mischief. Now it happened that there had come to them a man of authority, one Gaal, that so taunted Abimelech, that he roused his kinsmen with him: so the Shechemites desired that he would allow them a guard during their vintage, whereupon he accepted of their desires, and so the people went out, and Gaal with them. And as the people gathered their fruit with safety, and when they were at supper in several companies, they then ventured to curse Abimelech openly, and the magistrates laid ambushes in places about the city, and set upon Abimelech's followers, and destroyed them.

4. Now there was one Zebul a magistrate of the Shechemites, that had entertained Abimelech. He sent messengers, and informed him how they had assaulted the guards, and invited him to come with them, and excused him to lay ambushes before the city, for that he would persuade Gaal to go out against him, which would leave it in his power to be revenged. When Abimelech knew what was doing on, he said to Zebul, that some armed men were coming; but the other replied, they were only shadows of huge stones; and when they were nearer, Gaal perceived what was reality, and said, they were shadows, but mere lying in amousness. Then said Zebul, didst thou reproach Abimelech for cowardice? why dost thou not then show how very courageous thou art thyself, and go and fight him? So Gaal, being in the suburbs, saw the armed men coming on, he said to Zebul, that some armed men were coming; but the other replied, they were only shadows of huge stones; and when they were nearer, Gaal perceived what was reality, and said, they were shadows, but mere lying in amousness.

5. Now it was that Jair the Gileadite, ⁹ of the tribe of Manasseh, took the government. He was a man brave and valiant, and in other respects particularly in his children, who were of a good character. They were thirty in number, and very skillful in riding on horses, and were instructed with the government of the cities of Gil-lead. He kept the government twenty-two years, and died an old man, and he was buried in Canaan, a city of Gilead. And now all the affairs of the Hebrews were managed uncertainly, and cumbred to disorder, and to confusion, because of the absence of a commander. So the Ammonites and Philistines had them in contempt, and laid waste the country with a great army; and when they had taken all Peres, they were so insolent as to attempt to gain the possession of all the rest; but the Hebrews being now amends by the calamities they had undergone, betook themselves to supplications to God; and brought sacrifices to him, beseeching him not to be too severe upon them, but to move by their prayers to leave off the anger of their God. So God became more merciful to them, and was ready to assist them.

6. When the Ammonites had made an expedition into the Jordan country, the inhabitants of the country met them at a certain mountain, but wanted a commander. Now there was one whose name was Jephtha, who, both on account of his father's virtues, and on account of that army in which he was bred, and at the opening of the expense, was a potent man: the Israelites therefore sent to him, and entreated him to come to their assistance, and promised him dominion over them all his lifetime. But he did not admit of their entreaty; and accused them, that they did not come to his assistance when he was unjustly treated, and commentators conclude, that in Josephus's time of the political controversies of the twenty-five years are included; hence we are to confine, that somewhat has been here lost out of his copies.
this in an open manner by his brethren; for they cast him off, as not having the same mother with them; and it is true, there was a strong and furious dispute among them about his being their kinsman; and this they did out of a contempt of his inability to vindicate himself. So he dwelt in the desert, and was hired by a man; and this woman was all that came to him, let them come from what place soever, and paid them wages. However, when they pressed him to accept the dominion, and swear that they would grant him the government over them all his life, he led them to the war.

9. And when Jephtha had taken immediate care of their affairs, he placed his army at the city of Mizpeh, and sent a message to the Ammonite, [Heb 2:4.] complaining of his unjust possession of their land. But that king sent a contrary message; and complained of the exodus of the Israelites out of Egypt, and desired them to go out of the land of the Amorites, and yield it up to him, as at first his paternal inheritance. But Jephtha returned this answer, "That he did not justly complain of his ancestors about the land of the Amorites, and ought rather to thank them that they delivered the land of the Amorites to them, since Moses could have taken it also; and that neither would he recede from that land of their own, which God had obtained for them, and that he had now inhabited [above] three hundred years, but that it was the time of the tribe of Ephraim." And when he had given them this answer, he sent the ambassadors away. And when he had prayed for victory, and had vowed to perform sacred offices; and if he came home in safety, he would offer a thousand bullocks; and a vow was made if he should come safe, that he would sacrifice a bullock, he should have his son; but if he should fall, he should have his son. And when he had came, it was found that the enemy was about to attack them, and that Jephtha joined battle with them. And in his pursuit slew the enemies all along as far as the city of Mininith. He then passed over to the land of Ephraim, and destroyed many of their cities, and took their prey, and fed his own people from that slavery which they had undergone for eighteen years. But as he came back, he fell into a company; but they accused him to the great actions he had done; for it was his daughter that came to him; she was also an only child, and a virgin: upon this, Jephtha heavily lamented the greatness of his affliction, and began to offer a prayer, saying, if God would be so good as to bring him, he would have vowed to sacrifice her to God. However, this action that was to befall her was not ungrateful to her, since she should die upon occasion of her father's victory, and the liberty of the people; and in that only would her father gain the revenge he had resolved to give her leave for two months, to bewail her youth with her fellow-citizens: and then she agreed, that at the forementioned time, he might do with her according to his will. Accordingly, when that time was over, he sacrificed his daughter as a burnt-offering; offering such an oblation as was neither conformable to the law, nor acceptable to God, not weighing with himself with what opinion the hearers would have of such a practice.

11. Now the tribe of Ephraim fought against him, because he did not take them along with him in his expedition against the Ammonites; but he was afraid, lest, by coming in the midst of the Ephraimites, the cause which was done to himself, as to which he said, first, that they were not ignorant how his country had fought against him, and that when they were invited, they did not come to his assistance, whereas he thought that this would quickly, even before they were invited. And in the next place, that they were going to act unjustly; for while they had not courage enough to fight against him, they did not take his only child to perpetual virginity, at the tabernacle or elsewhere, which I rather suppose. If he had vowed her for a sacrifice she ought to have been redeemed, and they could not make it a law for God's assistance he would inflict a punishment upon them, unless they would grow wiser. But when the Ephraimites saw that they were not to be so fitly attacked by those forces which he sent for out of Gilgal, and he made a great slaughter among them; and when they were beaten he pursued them, and seized on the passages of Jordan by a part of his army, and had sent before and slew about forty-two thousand of them.

12. So when Jephtha had ruled six years, he died, and was buried in his own country, Seba, which is a place in the land of Gilead.

13. Now when Jephtha was dead, Ibsan took the government, being of the tribe of Judah and of the city Bethlehem. He had sixty children, thirty of them sons, and the rest daughters; all of whom he left alive behind him, giving the daughters in marriage to husbands, and taking wives for his sons. He did nothing in the seven years of his administration that was worth recording or deserved a memorial. So he died, and was an old man, and was buried in his own country.

14. When Ibsan was dead after this manner, neither did Helon, who succeeded him in the government, and kept it ten years, do anything that was of any note or moment.

15. Abdon, also, the son of Hillel, of the tribe of Ephraim, and born at the city Pyrathon, was ordained their supreme governor after Helon. He is only recorded to have been happy in his reign, and to have done nothing to bring guilt upon himself, whether as a judge, or as a private person. And he marched in state with these seventy, who were of the standing men of Ephraim, and he killed them all alive after him. He died an old man; and obtained a magnificent burial in Pyrathon.

CHAP. VIII.
Concerning the Portitude of Samson, and whatAccessTypefe he brought upon the Philistines.

1. After Abdon was dead the Philistines covered the great cities of Ephraim with contempt, and kindled a flame among them, and they sent them forty years; from which distress they were delivered after this manner.

2. There was one Manoah, a person of such great virtue, that he had few men his equals, and he was without number, and his name was known in every part of the country. He had a wife celebrated for her beauty, and excelling her contemporaries. He had no children; and being uneasy at this want of posterity, he entertained God to give them seed of their own bodies to succeed after him; and with that intent he came constantly into the suburbs, together with his wife, which suburbs were in the great plain. Now, he was fond of his wife to the degree of madness, and on that account was unmeasureably jealous of her. Now, when his wife was once alone, an apparition was seen by her; it was an angel of God, and resembled a young man beautiful and tall, and brought her the good news, that she should have a son, born by God's providence, that should be a goodly child, of great strength, by whom, when he was grown up to man's estate, the Philistines should be afflicted. He exhorted her also not to poll his hair, for that would be a sign of God's providence, and was an angel of God, and was a term of drink, (for so had God commanded,) and be entirely contended with water. So the angel, when he had delivered that message, went his way, his coming having been by the will of God. Now, the wife being thus and for some time not being able to bear children, she perceived then, of what the angel had said, who shewed so great an admiration of the beauty and tallness of the young man that had appeared to her, that her husband was astonished, and out of his astonishment he perceived that his wife was excited by that passion: but she was devious of having her husband's unreasonable sorrow taken away; accordingly she entreated God to send the angel again, that he might be seen by her husband, and this time let him be as the messenger of the most bountiful of God, while they were in the suburbs, and appeared to her when she was alone, without her husband. She desired the angel to stay as long till she might bring her husband; and this was soon granted; and Manoah saw the angel, he was not yet free from suspicion, and he desired him to inform him of all that he had told his wife: but when good came, it was sufficient that she alone knew what he had said, he then sent of the angel of him to tell him who he was, that when the child was born they might remember him, and give him a present. He replied that he did not want anything, but that he desired that the woman might have good news of the birth of a son out of the want of any thing. And when Manoah had entreated him to stay, and partake of his hospitality, he did not give his consent. However, he was persuaded, and he stayed till the woman had given birth, and then the child stayed so long while he brought him one mark of his hospitality: so he slew a kid of the goats, and bid his wife boil it. When all was ready, the angel enjoined him to set the loaves and the flesh, when he had dressed the child, upon a rock which, when he had done, he touched the flesh with the rod which he had in his hand, which, upon the breaking out of a flame, was consumed together with the loaves. And the angel ascended, openly, in the sight of heaven, and was seen of the smoke, as by a vehicle. Now Manoah was afraid that some danger would come to them from this sight of God, but his wife bid him to be at no fear, for that God appeared to them for their benefit.

4. So the woman proved with child, and was careful to observe the injunctions that were given her: and they called the child, when he was weaned, Manoah, because that is 'strong.' So the child grew space, and it appeared evidently that he would be a prophet, both by the moderation of his diet, and the permission of his hair to grow.

5. And the time when he came to his parents to Timnath, a city of the Philistines, when there was a great festival, he fell in love with a maid of that country, and he desired of his parents that they would procure him the damsel for his wife: but they refused so to do, because she was not of the stock of Israel; yet because this marriage was of God, who intended to convert it to the benefit of the Hebrews, he over-persuaded them to procure her to be espoused to him. And as he was feeding his father's flock, he met a lion, and though he was naked, he received his onset, and strangled him with his hands, and cast the wild beast into a woody piece of ground as it were, in the midst of the rocks.

6. And when he came another time to the damsel, he lighted upon a swarm of bees making their combs in the breast of that lion, and taking three honeycombs away, he gave them, together with the rest of his present, to the damsel. Now the people of Timnath, out of a dread of the young man's strength, gave him during the time of the wedding feast, (for he then feasted them all,) thirty of the most stout of their youth, in pretense to be his companions but in reality to guard him; but he did not attempt to give them any disturbance. Now as they were drinking merrily and playing, Samson said, as was usual at such times, "Come, if I propose you a riddle, and you can expound it in these seven days, then I will give you a certain reward; but if you cannot, I will give you a shirtless shirt and a garment, as a reward of your wisdom." So they being very ambitious to obtain the glory of wisdom, together with the gains, desired him to propose his riddle: he said, "That a great thing, the horsemen that came from the north of the territory of Japhlet, a people that stood in guard of itself, though itself were very disagreeable." And when they were not able, in three days' time, to find out the meaning of the riddle, they desired the damsel to discover it by the means of her husband, and, if she list, she, an angry, and resented to burn her if she did not tell it them. So when the damsel entreated Samson to tell it her, he at first refused to do it, but when she lay hard at him, and fell into tears, and made his refusal to tell it a reproach of his unkindness, she formed of her slaughter a lion's bone, and how he found bees in his breast, and carried away three honeycombs, and brought them to her. Thus she suspected, from the signal of death, the riddle, and she revealed it to those that desired to know it. Then on the seventh day, whereon they were to expound the riddle proposed to them, they met together before the setting of the sun, and I said, "Nothing is more agreeable to those that light on it, and nothing is sweeter than honey to those that make use of it." To which Samson made this rejoinder: "Nothing is more deceitful than a woman, for such was the person that deceived me, and disappointed me of you." Accordingly, he gave them the presents he had promised them, making such Ackelotites as he met upon the road his prey, who were themselves Philistines also. But he divorced this his wife, and, bringing her up, he married to his companion, who made the former match between them.

7. At this injurious treatment Samson was so provoked, that he resolved to punish all the Philistines, as they were not being to their good time, and the fruits of the land being almost ripe enough for reaping, he caught three hundred foxes, and joining lighted torches to their tails, he sent them through the fields of the Philistines, which means the fruits of the fields perished. Now when the Philistines knew that this was Samson's doing, and knew also for what cause he did it, they sent their rulers to Timnath and burnt his former wife, and her relations, who had been the occasion of their misfortunes.

8. Now when Samson had slain many of the Philistines in the plain country, he dwelt at Timnah, which is a strong rock of the tribe of Judah; for the Philistines at that time made an expedition against that tribe. But the people of Judah said, that they did not act justly with them, in inflicting punishments upon them while they paid their tribute, and this only on account of the anger of Samson's wife. The Philistines therefore, when they saw that they would not be blamed themselves, they must deliver up Samson, and put him into their power. So they, being desirous not to be blamed themselves, came in the roek with armed men, and complained to Samson of the bold insults he had made upon the Philistines, who were men able to bring calamity upon the whole nation of the Hebrews; and they told him they would come and take him, and deliver him up to them, and put him into their power; so they desired him to bear this willingly. Accordingly, when he had received assurance from them upon oath, that they would do him no other harm than only to deliver him into his enemies' hands, he came down from the rock, and put himself into the power of his countrymen. Then did they bind him with two cords, and lead him on, in order to deliver him to the Philistines; and when they came to a certain place, which is now called 'The Jaw-bone,' on account of the great action there performed by Samson, though of old it had no such name at all, the Philistines who had pitched their camp so far off, came to meet him with joy, and shouting, as having done a great thing, and gained what they desired; but Samson broke his bonds asunder, and caused a Bowie of an ass's jawbone to lie down at his feet; fell upon his enemies, and smiting them with his jawbone, slew a thousand of them, and put the rest to flight, and into great disorder.

9. Upon this slaughter Samson was too proud of what he had performed, and said that this did not come to pass by the assistance of God, but that his success was to be ascribed to his own courage; and vaunted himself, "that it was out of a dread of him, that some of his enemies fell, and some were carried away upon his vainglorious use of the jaw-bone." But when a great thirst came upon him, he considered that human courage is nothing, and bare his testimony that all is to be ascribed to God who brought him to it; he would not be angry at any thing he had said; nor give him up into the hands of his enemies, but afford him help under his affliction, and deliver him from the misfortune he was under. Accordingly, God was with his entreaties, and raised him up a plentiful fountain of sweet water at a certain rock; whence it was that Samson called the place, 'The Jaw-bone,' and so it is called to this day.

10. After this sight Samson held the Philistines in contempt, and came to Gaza, and took up his lodgings in a certain inn. When the rulers of Gaza were informed of his coming thither, they seized upon the gates, and placed men in ambush about them, that he might not escape without being perceived. But Samson, who was acquainted with their contrivances against him, arose about midnight, and ran by force upon the gates, with their posts and beams, and the rest of the stuff that obstructed them away on his shoulders, and bore them to the mountain that is over Hebron, and there laid them down.

11. However, he at length transgressed the laws of his country, and altered his own regular way of living, and imitated the strange customs of foreigners, which thing was the beginning of his miseries; for he fell in love with a woman who was a harlot among the Philistines; her name was Deliah, and he lived with her. So those that administered the public affairs of the Philistines came to her, and with promises induced her to get out of Samson what was the cause of that his strength, by which he became unconquerable to his enemies. Accordingly, when they were drinking, and had like conversation together, she pretended to admire the actions he had done, and contrived to get out of him what she desired by what means he was much exccelled others in strength. Samson, in order to delude Deliah, for he had not lost his senses, replied, that if he were bound with seven such great grey goats, and with a vine as might be tied about them, he should be weaker than any other man. The woman said no more than this, but told this to the rulers of the Philistines, and hid certain of the soldiers in ambush within the house, and when he was disordered in drink, and asleep, she bound him as fast as possible with the withes, and then, upon his waking him, she told him some of the people were upon him; but he broke the withes, and endeavored to defect himself; as though some of the people were upon him. Now this woman, in the constant conversation Samson had with her, pretended that she took it very ill that he had such little confidence in her; and therefore, not to tell her what she desired, as if she would not conceal what she knew it was far his interest to have concealed. However, he deluded her again, and told her, that if they bound him with seven cords, he should lose his strength; but when, upon doing this, she gained nothing he told her the third time, that his hair should be woven into a web; but, even upon doing this, the truth was not discovered. At length Samson, upon Deliah's prayer, (for he was doomed to fall into some affliction,) was desirous to please her, and told her, that "God took care of him, and that he was born by his providence, and that thence it is that I suffer my hair to grow, God having charged me never to poll my head, and thence my strength is according to the increase and continuance of my hair." When she had learned thus much, and had deprived him of his hair, she delivered him up, and he was not able to defend himself from their attempts upon him; so they put out his eyes, and bound him, and had him led about among them.

12. But the process of time Samson's hair grew again. And there was a public festival among the Philistines, when the rulers, and those of the most eminent character, were feasting together; (now the room wherein they were, had its roof supported by twelve pillars;) so they desired Samson, and he was brought to their feast, that they might insult him in their cups. Hereupon he, thinking it one of the greatest misfortunes, if he should not be able to revenge himself when he was insulted, persuaded the boys that led him by the hand, that he was weary and wanted to rest himself, and desired that he would bring him near the pillars; and as soon as he came to them, he rushed with force against them; and overthrew the house, by overthrowing its pillars with the three thousand men in it, who were all slain, and Samson with them. And such was the end of this man, when he had ruled over the Israelites twenty years. And indeed this man deserves to be admired for his courage and strength, and magnanimity at his death, and that his wrath against his enemies went so far as to die himself with them. But as for his being ensnared by a woman, that is to be ascribed to human nature, which is too weak to resist the temptations to that sin: but we ought to bear him witness, that in all other respects he was one of extraordinary virtue. But his kindness took away his body, and buried it, his own country with the rest of his family.

his family under so sore a distress, took with him Naomí his wife, and the children that were born to him by her, Chilion and Mahlon, and removed his habitation into the land of Moab; and upon the happy prosperity of his affairs there, he took for his sons wives of the Moabites, Orphah for Chilion, and Ruth for Mahlon. But in the compass of some years they died, and went to their fathers, while he was yet alive; and after them the sons of Orphah and Ruth, his daughters-in-law, died. And there should see that she had lain down by him, because it was but prudent to avoid any reproach that might arise on that account, especially when there had been nothing done that was ill. But to return to the present case, the woman that should rest here, 'He that is nearer of kin than I am, shall be asked whether he wants to take thee to wife; if he says he does, thou shalt follow him; but if he refuse it, I will marry thee according to the law.'
4. When she had informed her mother-in-law of this, they were very glad of it, out of the hope they had that Booz would make provision for them. Now, about noon, Booz went down into the city, and gathered of the women together, and when he had sent for Ruth, he called for her kinsman also; and when he was come, he said, "Dost thou retain the inheritance of Elimelech his father?" He answered, "I do retain it, and that he did as he was permitted to do by the laws, because he was their nearest kinsman. Then said Booz, "Thou must not remember the laws by halves, but do every thing according to the law; for the woman that we have in our house is come hither, whom thou must marry, according to the laws, in case thou wilt retain their fields." So the man yielded up both the field and the wife to Booz, who was himself of kin to those that were dead, as alleging that he had a wife already, and children also; so Booz called the senate to witness, and bid the woman to loose his shoe, and spit in his face, according to the law; and when this was done, Booz married Naomí. And thus, after a year's time, Naomí was herself a nurse to this child; and by the advice of the women called him 'Obed,' as being to be brought up in order to be subservient to her in her old age, for Obed, in the Hebrew dialect, signifies a servant. The servant that Obed was Jesse, and David was his son, who was king, and left his dominions to his sons for one and twenty generations. I was therefore obliged to relate this story, because it had a mind to demonstrate the power of God, who, without difficulty, can raise those that are of ordinary parentage to dignity and splendor, to which he advanced David, though he were born of such mean parents.

CHAP. X.
Concerning the Birth of Samuel; and how he foretold the Calamity that befell the Sons of Eli. 1. And now upon the ill state of the affairs of the Hebrews, they made war again upon the Philistines. The occasion was this: Eli the high priest had two sons, Hophni and Phineas. These sons of Eli were afflicted with such a state of rebellion and of impiety towards God, and abstained from all sort of wickedness. Some of their gifts they carried off, as belonging to the honorable employment they had, others of their spoils they took away by violence. They were also guilty of im-

Samuel the prophet, who was yet but a child, he openly showed his sorrow for his sons' destruction.

2. I will first despatch what I have to say about the prophet Samuel, and after that will proceed to the account of the sons of Eli, the miseries they brought on the whole people of the Hebrews. Ecananah, a Levite, one of a middle condition among his fellow-citizens, and one that dwelt at Ramathaim, a city of the tribe of Ephraim, had two wives, Hananah and Penannah. He had children by the latter, but he loved the other best, although she were barren. Now Ecananah came with his wives to the city Shiloh to sacrifice, for there it was that the tabernacle to beseach God to give her seed, and make a man of her for whose sake she should create the first son she should bear to the service of God, and this in such a way, that his manner of living should not be like that of ordinary men. And as it was at prayer a long time, the Lord came to Eli, the high priest, for he sat there before the tabernacle, bid her go away, thinking she had been disordered with wine; but when she said she had drunk water, but was in sorrow for want of seed, and was barren, in the state of mourning for her, she had no seed, he bid he be of good cheer, and told that God would send her children.

3. So she came to her husband full of hope, and ate her meal with gladness; and when they had eaten, they returned to their own country, she found herself with child, and they had a son born to them, to whom they gave the name of Samuel, which may be styled one that was asked of God. They therefore came to the tabernacle to offer sacrifices for the birth of the child, and presented their tithes with them; but the woman remembered the vow she had made concerning her son, and delivered him to Eli, dedicating him to God, that he might become a prophet. Accordingly he was consecrated, and his name was by long custom water. So Samuel dwelt and was brought up in the temple. But Ecananah had other sons by Hannah, and three daughters.

4. Now, when Samuel was twelve years old he began to judge the children of Israel. For when he was once saleep, God called to him by his name, but he, supposing he had been called by the high priest, came to him: but when the priest said he did not call him, God did so thrice. Eli was then so far illuminaed, that he said to him, "Indeed, Samuel, I was silent now as well as before; it is God that calls thee: do thou therefore signify it to him, and say, I am here ready." So when he heard God spake, he desired to be subscribed, and to deliver what vessels he pleased to him, for he would not fail to perform any ministration whatsoever he should make use of him in; to which God replied, "Since thou art here ready, learn what ministration coming upon the families, such indeed as words cannot declare, nor faith believe: for the sons of Eli shall die on one day, and the priesthood shall be transferred into the family of Eleanar, for Eli hath loved his sons more than he had loved his wealth, and thus his name is not for their advantage." Which message Eli obliged the prophet by oath to tell him, for otherwise he had so inclination to afflict him by tell- ing it. And now Eli had a far more sure ex-pectation of the pessidion of his sons; but the glory of Samuel increased more and more, being found by experience that whatsoever he prophesied came to pass accordingly.

Chap. XI.

Herein is declared what befell the Sons of Eli, the Ark, and the People; and how Eli himself died most協會.

1. About this time it was that the Philistines made war against the Israelites, and pitched their camp at the city Ashek. Now when the Israelites had expected them a little while, the very next day they joined battle, and the Philistines were vanquished, and pursued above four thousand of the Hebrews, and pursued the rest of the multitude to their camp.

2. So the Hebrews, being afraid of the worst, sent to the senate and to the high priest, and desired that they would bring the ark of God by putting themselves in array, when it was present with them, they might be too hard for their enemies, as not reflecting that he who had condemned them to endure these calamities was the ark of God, and one could not say what that ark came to be honored. So the ark came, and the sons of the high priest with it, having received a charge from their father, that if they did not succeed in carrying the ark, they should come no more into his presence; for Phinees officiated already as high priest, his father having resigned the office to him, by reason of his great age. So the Hebrews were full of courage, and they besought the ark in which the opening of the ark they should be too hard for their enemies: their enemies also were greatly concerned, and were afraid of the ark's coming to the Israelites; however, the upshot did not prove as the officers of the ark expected, for when the battle was joined, that victory which the Hebrews expected, was gained by the Philistines, and that defeat the Philistines were afraid of, fell to the lot of the Israelites, and thereby that they put their trust in the ark in vain, for they were presently beaten as soon as they came to a close fight with their enemies, and lost about thirty thousand men, among whom were the sons of the high priest: but Eli, high in age, and his son and his grandson, who sat upon a high throne at one of the gates, heard their mournful cries, and supposed that some strange thing had befallen his family: so he sent for the young man, and when he un- understand what had happened in the battle, he was not much uneasy as to his sons, or what was told him within about the army, as having beforehand known by divine revelation that these things would happen, and having foretold them beforehand, for what bad things come unexpect- edly they distress men the most; but as soon as the ark was carried captive by their enemies, he was very much grieved at it, because it fell out quite differently from what he expected; and he fell down from his throne, and died, having in all lived ninety-eight years, and of them retained the government forty.

4. On the same day his son Phinees's wife died also, and was buried to survive the misfortune of her husband; for they told her of her husband's death as she was in labor. However, she bare a son at seven months, who lived, and to whom they gave the name of Icabod, which name signifies that the glory of the family was gone, for many as have spoken, have likewise foresaid of those days." BOOK VI.—CHAP. XI.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF THIRTY-TWO YEARS.—FROM THE DEATH OF ELI TO THE DEATH OF SAUL.

CHAP. I.

The Destruction that came upon the Philistines, and upon their Land, by the Wrath of God, on account of their having carried the Ark away captive; and after what manner they sent it back to the Hebrews.

1. When the Philistines had taken the ark of the Hebrews captive, as I said a little before, they carried it to the city Ashdod, and put it by their own god who was called Dagon, as one of their gods; and that these were sent into his temple the next morning, to worship their god, they found him paying the same worship to the ark; for he lay along, as having fallen down from the basis wherein he had stood. So they took him up, and set him on his basis again, and were much troubled at what had happened; and as they frequently came to Dagon, and found him still lying along, in a posture of adoration to the ark, they were in very great distress and confusion. At length God sent a very destructive disease upon the city and country of Ashdod, for they died of the dysentery or flux, a sore distemper, that brought death upon them very suddenly; for the people of Ashdod, as well as the Philistines, were kept alive when their lives were like to be taken away by such distempers as they were not able to bear up against. They also would have them make five golden mice, like to those that devoured and destroyed their country; and this done, they carried the five people of Ashdod was not disagreeable to those of Askelon, so they granted them that favor. But when they had gotten the ark, they were in the same miserable condition, for the ark carried along with it the disasters that the people of Ashdod had suffered, to those who received it from them. Those of Askelon also sent it away from themselves to others: nor did it stay among them, but it went from one to another, and all the time was spent in disease and death by the same disasters, they still sent it to the neighboring cities; so that the ark went round, after this manner, to the five cities of the Philistines, as though it executed these disasters as a tribute to be paid for it; and so the power which observations are highly suitable to this history.

1. This device of the Philistines, of having a yoke of oxen to draw this cart into which they put the ark of the Hebrews, is greatly illustrated by Banchoniathe's account, under his ninth generation, that Agorues, or Agrotes the husbandman, had a much-worshipped statue and temple, carried about by one or more yokes of oxen, or cows, in his lifetime; and this is exactly as the Philistines. See Cumberland's Banchoniathe, p. 27, and 247, and Essays on the Old Testament, Append. p. 178.

that heard them were taught thereby not to admit the ark among them, since they paid so dear a tribute for it, at length they sought for some contrivance and method how they might get free from it: so the governors of the five cities, Gath, and Ekron, and Askelon, as also of Gaza and Ashdod, meeting together, determined what was fit to be done; and at the first they thought proper to send the ark back to its own people, as allowing that God had avenged its cause; that the miseries they had undergone came along with it, and that these were sent upon their account, and together with it. However, there were those that said, they should not do so, nor suffer themselves to be deluded, as ascribing the cause of their miseries to it, because it could not have such a power and force upon them; for had God had such a regard to it, it would not have been delivered into the hands of men: so they exerted them to be quiet, and to take patiently what had befallen them, and to suppose there was no other cause of it but nature, which at certain revolutions of time produces such mutations in the bodies of men, in the earth, in plants, and in all things that grow out of the earth. But the Ark remained there, and the people that were described, was that of certain men, who were believed to have distinguished themselves in former times for their understanding and prudence, and who, in their present circumstances, seemed above all the rest to speak properly of what was to be done, and to yoke mill chine to it, but to shut up their calves, and keep them from them, lest by following after them they should prove a hindrance to their dana, and that the demons might return the faster out of a desire of those calves; then to drive these milch kine that carried the ark, and leave it at a place where three ways met, and to leave it to the king, and assign which of those ways they pleased, that in case they went the way to the Hebrews, and ascended to their country, they should suppose that the ark was the cause of their misfortunes; but if they turned from the king, they came, which is the will pursue after it, and conclude it has no such force in it."

*Dagon, a famous maritime god or idol, is generally supposed to have been like a man above the navel, and like a fish beneath it."
3. So they determined that these men spoke well; and they immediately confirmed their opinion by doing accordingly. And when they had done as has been already described, they brought the cart to a place where three ways met, and left it there, and went their ways; but the kine went the right way, and as if some persons had driven them, while the rulers of the Philistines followed after them, as desirous to know where they could stand still, and to whom they were driven.

Now the people of the tribe of Judah, whose name was Beth-shemesh, and to that village did the kine go; and though there was a great and good plain before them to proceed in, they went not further, but stopped the cart there. This was a sight to those of that village, and they were very glad; for it being then summer time, and all the inhabitants being then in their fields gathering in their fruits, they left off the labors of their hands for joy, as soon as they saw the ark, and ran to the cart; and taking the ark down, and the vessel that had the images in it, and the mice, they set them upon a certain rock which was in the plain; and when they had offered the ark and the vessel to God, and fastened the mice and the offerings, they offered the cart and the kine as a burnt-offering; and when the lords of the Philistines saw this they returned back.

4. And now it was that the wrath of God overtook them, and struck seventy persons dead of the village of Beth-shemesh, 8 who, not being priests, and so not worthy to touch the ark, had approached to it. Those of that village wept for these, that thus suffered, and made such a lamentation as was naturally to be expected on so great a misfortune that was sent from God; and every one mourned for his own relation. And since they acknowledged themselves unworthy of touching the ark's abode with them, they sent to the public senate of the Israelites, and informed them that the ark was restored by the Philistines; which when they knew, they brought it away to Kirjath-jearim, a city in the neighborhood of Beth-shemesh. In this city lived one Abinadab, by birth a Levite, and who was greatly commended for his righteous and religious course of life; so they brought the ark to his house, as to a place fit for God himself to abide, for he himself had told them to do so. His sons also ministered to the divine service of the ark, and were the principal curators of it for twenty years, for so many years it continued in Kirjath-jearim, having been but four months with the Philistines.

CHAP. II.

The Expedition of the Philistines against the Hebrews, and the Hebrews' Victory under the Conduct of Samuel the Prophet, who was their General.

1. Now while the city of Kirjath-jearim had the ark with them, the whole body of the people took themselves all the time to offer prayers and sacrifices to God, and appeared greatly concerned and zealous about his worship. So Samuel the prophet seeing how ready they were to do that, thought it a proper time to speak to them, while they were in this good disposition, about the recovery of their liberty, and of the blessings that accompanied the same. Accordingly, he spake such words to them as he thought would most likely to excite that inclination, and to persuade them to attempt it: "O you Israelites," said he, "to whom the Philistines are grievous enemies, but to whom God begins to be gracious, it behooves you not only to be desirous of liberty, but to take the proper methods to obtain it. Nor are you to be contented with an inclination to get clear of your lords and masters, while you still do what will procure your continuance under them: be righteous then, and cast wickedness out of your souls, and by your worship supplicate the divine majesty with all your hearts, and persevere in the honor you pay to him; for if you act thus, you will enjoy prosperity and a secure enjoyment of your enemies, and will get the victory over your enemies; which blessings it is not possible you should attain neither by weapons of war, nor by the strength of natural forces, but only by the virtue of your assistants: for God has not promised to grant these blessings by those means, but by being good and righteous men; and if you will be such, I will be security to you for the performance of God's oaths. [see 1 Sam. xiv.] When Samuel had said this, the multitude applauded his discourse, and were pleased with his exhortation to them, and gave their consent to resign themselves up to do what was pleasing to God. So Samuel gathered them together to a public assembly, and signified in the Hebrew tongue, a watch tower; there they drew water and poured it out to God, and fasted all day, and betook themselves to their prayers.

2. This their assembly did not escape the notice of the Philistines: so when they had learned that so large a company had met together, they fell upon the Hebrews with a great army and took away the ark without any one being able to resist them, and did not expect it, nor were prepared for it. This thing affrighted the Hebrews, and put them into disorder and terror; so they came running to Samuel, and said, "that their souls were sunk by distress, and that they were afraid of the Philistines." Hereupon Samuel bid them be of good cheer, and promised them that God would assist them; and taking a sucking lamb, he consecrated it for the multitude, and burnt it as a sacrifice. and sent him forth, and said to them, from the Philistines." His sons also ministered to the divine service of the ark, and were the principal curators of it for twenty years, for so many years it continued in Kirjath-jearim, having been but four months with the Philistines.
able to keep their feet, and made them fall down; and by opening its chasms, he caused that others should be hurried down into them; after which he caused a great number of the Canaanites to be taken among them, and made very lightning shine so terribly round about them, that it was ready to burn their faces: and he so suddenly shook their weapons out of their hands, that he made them fly and return to return to them, and the Canaanites pursued them to Bethcar, a place so called: and there he set up a stone as a boundary of their victory, and their enemies' flight, and called it the stone of a witness, because he was the power God had given them against their enemies.

3. So the Philistines, after this stroke, made no more expeditions against the Israelites, but lay still out of fear, and out of remembrance of what they had done, and what they had done the Philistines had formerly against the Hebrews, that, after this victory, was transferred to the Hebrews. Samuel also made an expedition against the Philistines, and slew many of them, and entirely subdued and entirely subjugated them, and took on them that country, which, when they were formerly conquerors in battle, they had cut off from the Jews, which was the country that extended from the borders of Gath to the city Ekron, but the remnant of the Canaanites were at this time in friendship with the Israelites.

CHAP. III.

How Samuel, when he was so infirm with old age, that he could not take care of the Public Affairs, assigned them to his Sons; and for the evil Administration of the Government by them, the Multitude were so angry, that they required to have a King to govern them, although Samuel was much displeased therewith.

1. But Samuel the prophet, when he had ordered the affairs of the people after a convenient manner, and left them to his Sons; and for the evil Administration of the Government by them, the Multitude were so angry, that they required to have a King to govern them, although Samuel was much displeased therewith.

2. But afterward he found himself oppressed with old age, and not able to do what he used to do, he yielded the care of the multitude to his sons; the elder of whom was called Joel, and the name of the younger was Abiah. He also enjoined them to reside, and judge the people, the one at the city Bethel, and the other at Geba, and divided the people into districts that should be under the jurisdiction of each of them. Now these men afforded us an evident example and demonstration, how some children are not of the like dispositions with their parents, but sometimes perhaps good and moderate, though born of wicked parents, and sometimes showing themselves to be wicked, though born of good parents; for these men, turning aside from their father's good counsellors, resolved, for want of care, to be themselves, perverted justice for the filthy lucre of gifts and bribes, and made their determinations not according to truth, but according to bribery, and turned away from the business of living, so that, as in the first place they practised what was contrary to the will of God, so did they, in the second place, what was contrary to the will of the prophet their father, who had taken a great deal of care to assign the care of the multitude to his sons; and said, 'that as he was himself old already, and too infirm by that age of his to oversee their affairs in the manner he used to do, so they begg'd of him, and made a request of him, that the care of them be turned over to another person; who, might rule over the nation and avenge them of the Philistines, who ought to be punished for their former oppressions.' These words greatly affected Samuel, on account of his own children; and, though he disapproved of the project of turning over the government, for he was very fond of an aristocracy, as what made the men that used it of a divine and happy disposition; nor could he either think of estate or title, or the children of the king; and the torments of mind at what they had said, but all the night long did he continue awake, and resolved those notions in his mind.

4. While he was thus disposed, God appeared to him, and comforted him, by saying, 'The Lord hath heard the voice of thy words: the Lord has not abhorred the nation, nor forsaken his inheritance.' Then he went and abhorred the nation, nor forsaken his inheritance. And God, in the midst of his heart, and the very day they came out of Egypt; that, however, in no long time they would sorely repent of what they did, which repentance yet could not undo what was thus done for futurity; that they would have sufficiently repented. He then said, 'I will be ungrateful conduct they had used towards me, and towards thy prophetic office. So I command thee to ordain such a one as I shall name beforehand to be their king; and when his kingdom is first described what mischief kingly government will bring upon them, and openly testify before them unto what a great change of affairs they are hastening.'

5. When Samuel had heard this, he called the Jews early in the morning, and confessed to them that he was to ordain a king; but he said that he was first to describe to them what would follow, what treatment they would receive from their kings, and then say, that he must struggle: 'For know ye (said he) that in the first place, they will take your sons away from you, and they will command some of them to be drivers of their chariots, and some to be their horsemen, and others of them to be runners before them, and captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds; they will also make them their artificers, and of the workmen in iron; they will make them their husbandmen also, and the curators of their own fields, and the diggers of their own vineyards; nor will there be any thing which they will not do at their commands, nor if they were not willing; they will take away your money. They will also appoint your daughters to be conquerors, and cooks, and bakers; and these will be obliged to do all sorts of work, which women slaves, that are in fear of stripes and torments, submit to. They will, besides, take away your possessions, and bestow them upon their eunuchs, and the guards of their bodies, and will give the herds of your cattle to their own servants; and to say briefly all at once, you, and all that is yours, shall be ruled over by a king, and will become noway superior to his slaves; and when you suffer thus, you will thereby be put in mind of what I now say. And when you repent of what you have done, you will seek God to have mercy upon you; and you will grant you a quick deliverance from your kings; but he will not accept your prayers, but will neglect you, and permit you to suffer the punishment your evil conduct has brought upon you.'

6. But the multitude was still so foolish as to be deaf to these predictions of what would befall them: and too peevish to suffer a determination which they had injudiciously once made, to be taken off from their minds; for, though they could not be turned from their purpose; nor did they regard the words of Samuel, but perversely in-

was himself the person, he led him in to supper and assured him that the asses were found which he had been to seek, and that they were the greatest he had to offer; he replied, "Sir, I am too inconsiderable to hope for any such thing, and of a tribe too small to have kings made out of it, and of a family smaller than several of the Gentile families; but thou tellst me this in jest, and maketh me an object of laughter when thou dost not know me of greater matters than what I stand in need of." However, the prophet led him to the feast, and made him sit at the head of the table, and next him above the other guests that were invited, which were seventy in number; and he gave order to the servants to set the royal portion before Saul. But when the time of going to bed was come, the best rose up, and every one of them went home; but Saul stayed with the prophet, he and his servant, and slept with him.

2. But as soon as it was day, Samuel raised up Saul out of his bed; and conducted him home; and when he was out of the city, he desired him to cause his servant to go before, but to stay behind himself, for that he had somewhat to say to him, when nobody else was present. And when they were the last that followed him; then did the prophet take a vessel of oil, and poured it upon the head of the young man, and kissed him, and said, "Be thou a king, by the ordinance of God, against the Philistines that have striven against thee; and all things that were the not have suffered by them; of this thou shalt have a sign, which I will have thee take notice of, as soon as thou art departed hence, thou wilt find three men upon the road, going to worship God at Ramah; and they shall speak kindly to thee; they shall give thee two of their loaves; which thou shalt accept of. And thence thou shalt come to a place called Rachel's Monument, where thou shalt meet with those that will tell thee thy sires are found; and, when thou comest to them, thou shalt ovetake a company of prophets, and thou shalt be seized with the divine Spirit, and prophesy along with them, till every one that sees thee shall be astonished, and wonder, and say, "Is Saul also among the prophets?" and at this degree of happiness? And when these signs have happened to thee, know that God is with thee; then do thou salute thy father, and thy kindred. Thou shalt also come when I send for thee to Ramah, for he hath offered secret burnt offerings to God for these blessings."

When Samuel had said this, and foretold these things, he sent the young man away. Now all things fell out to Saul according to the prophecy of Samuel.

3. But as soon as Saul came into the house of his kinsman Abner, whom indeed he loved better than any other of his relations, he was asked by him concerning his journey, and what accidents happened to him therein; and he concealed none of the other things from him, no, not his coming to Samuel the prophet, nor how he told him the asses were found; but he said nothing to him about the kingdom, and what belonged thereof, which was the first word he had to speak when such things are heard, they are not easily believed; nor did he think it prudent to tell those things to him, although he appeared very friendly to him, and one whom he loved above counselors, and that he was to act not like a sole monarch, but with the advice and direction of these 71 individuals, with the Bethshan medrim, and the Bethshemesh, which yet we never read that he consulted afterward. An instance of this divine favor we have after this in 1 Sam. viii. 25, where we read that Saul was "like Jdg, iii. 10; vi. 34; xii. 25; xIII. 52; and xV. 6." be rest of his relations, considering, I suppose, what human nature truly is, that no one is a firm friend, neither among our intimates, nor of our kindred, nor do they preserve that kind disposition when God advances men to great prosperity, but they are still ill-natured and envious at those that are in eminent stations.

4. Then Samuel called the people together to the city Mizpeh, and spake to them in the words following, in the name of the Lord God of Israel, saying, Thus saith the command of God: That "when he had granted them a state of liberty, and brought their enemies into subjection, they became unmindful of his benefits, and rejected God that he should not be their King, as not considering that it would be most for their advantage to be preserved over by the best of beings; for God is the best of beings, and they chose to have a man for their king; while kings will use their subjects, the beasts, according to the violence of their own wills and inclinations, and other passions, as wholly carried away with the lust of power, but will not endeavor to preserve the race of mankind as exempt away, and concealed himself, which, for that very reason, God would take care of. But since you have come to a fixed resolution, and this injurious treatment of God has quite prevailed over you, dispose yourselves by your own volition, and select a king, and cast lots for the same, which shall be king of the children of Israel, and be their leader, and shall divide the land among the tribes of Israel."

5. When the Hebrews had so done, the lot fell upon the tribe of Benjamin; and when the lot was cast for the families of this tribe, that which fell was in the Tribe of Benjamin, and when the lot was cast for the single persons of that family, Saul, the son of Kish, was chosen for their king. When the young man knew this, he prevented [their sending for him, and] immediately went away, and hid himself among the hill-country of his father, because he would not have it thought that he willingly took the government upon himself; nay, he showed such a degree of command over himself, and of modesty, that while the greatest part are used to make their joy appear in the gaining of small advantages, but presently show themselves publicly to all men, this man did not only show nothing of that nature, when he was appointed to be the lord of so many and so great a nation, but took care to conceal himself, of the sight of those he was to reign over, and made them seek him, and that with a good deal of trouble. So when the people were at a loss, and solicitous, because Saul disappeared, the prophet of God appeared to a certain man, and cast lots to this effect: that man was, and to produce him before them. So when they had learned of God the place where Saul was hidden, they sent men to bring him, and among the multitude of the people Saul was found, and many good men there were who paid him the respect that was due to him; but the greater part were ill men, who despised him, and derided the others, who neither did bring him presents, nor did they in affection, or even in words, regard to please him.

6. Then said the prophet, God gives you this man to be your king; see how he is higher than any of the people, and worthy of this dominion. So as soon as the people had made acclamation, God save the king! the prophet wrote down what would come to pass in a book, and read it in the hearing of the king, and laid up the book in the chamber of the principal youths of the land; the sons of the prophet, to be shown to future generations of what he had foretold. So when Samuel had finished this matter, he dismissed the multitude, and came himself to the city Ramah, for it was his own country. Saul also, immediately, sent messengers to him, and said many good men there were who paid him the respect that was due to him; but the greater part were ill men, who despised him, and derided the others, who neither did bring him presents, nor did they in affection, or even in words, regard to please him.

be cut the sinews of his oxen, and threatened to do the same to all such as did not come with their armor to Jordan the next day, and follow him and Samuel the prophet whithersoever they should go. But they, being a thousand, were so afraid of the losses they were threatened with, at the appointed time. And the multitude were numbered at the city Bezek. And he found the number of those that were gathered together, besides that of the tribe of Judah, to be seven hundred thousand, while those of that tribe were seventy thousand. So he passed over Jordan, and proceeded in marching all that night, thirty furlongs, and came to Jordan before sunrising. So he divided the army into three companies, and fell upon their enemies on every side on the sudden, and when they expected no such thing; and joining battle with them, they slew a great multitude of the Canaanites, as they had done in Bashan. This glorious action was done by Saul, and was related with great commendation of him to all the Hebrews; and he thence gained a wonderful reputation for his valor; for, although the same image with them of that contumelied him before, they now changed their minds, and honored him, and esteemed him as the best of men; for he did not content himself with having saved the inheritance of Judah only, but he made the Canaanites into the country of the Amnonites, and laid it all waste, and took a large prey, and so returned to his own country most gloriously: so the people were greatly pleased at the work he performed, and rejoiced that they had constituted him their king. They also made a clamor against those that pretended he would be of no advantage to their affairs; and they said, "Where now are these nations which our fathers said, the Amorites, be as locusts, with all the like things that multitudes do usually say, when they are elevated with prosperity, against those that had lately despised the authors of it. But Saul, although he took the good-will and the assistance of the people, and was acknowledged king yet still he was aware that he would not see any of his countrymen slain that day, since it was a secret to mix this victory, which God had given them, with the blood and slaughter of those that were of themselves; and that it was more agreeable to be men of a friendly disposition, and so to betake themselves to feasting.

4. And when Samuel had told them that he could not long enjoy this liberty, and authority by a second ordination of him, they all came together to the city Gilgal, for thither he did command them to come. So the prophet anointed Saul with the holy oil, in the sight of the multitude, and declared him to be the second and third time that the government of the Hebrews was changed into a regal government; for in the days of Moses, and his disciple Joshua, who was their general, they continued under an aristocracy; but after the death of Joshua, for eighteen years in all, the multitude had no settled form of government, but were in an anarchy; after which they returned to their former government, they then perceiving themselves to be judged by him who was praised and commended to the people with whosoever else. And so it was, that the term of eighteen years was called the Judges, the time that it was called this interval of their government, 'The Judges.'

5. Then did Samuel the prophet call another assembly, and assembled them to the waters of Jerisco. I solemnly adjure you by God Almighty, who brought such exalted brethren, I mean Moses and Aaron, into the world, and delivered our fathers from the Egyptians, and from the slavery they endured under them, that you will not speak what you say to gratify me, nor suppress any thing out of fear of me, nor be overborne by any other passion, but say, what have I ever done that was cruel or unjust; or what have I done out of lucrative or covetousness, or to gratify others? Bear witness against me, if I have taken an ox or a sheep, of my flock, and killed it, or taken of the flock, to be support of my flesh. But if I did the same, I am as innocent as if I had not done it by him, but that he had presided over the nation after a holy and righteous manner.

6. Hereupon Samuel, when such a testimony had been given him by them all, said, "Since you grant that you are not able to lay any ill thing to my charge hitherto, come on now, and do you hearken while I speak with great freedom to you. Now I hearken, is it against God in asking you a king? It behoves you to remember, that our grandfather Jacob came down into Egypt, by reason of a famine, with seventy souls only of our family, and that their posterity multiplied to ever so many thousands, whom the Egyptians brought into slavery and hard oppression; that God himself, upon the prayers of our fathers, sent Moses and Aaron to be brought up, and gave them power to deliver the multitude out of the Egyptian bondage, and this without a king. These brought us into this very land which you now possess: and when you enjoyed these advantages from God, you gave yourselves to idolatry, and to worship them. However, when you were brought under the bands of your enemies, he delivered you, first by rendering you superior to the Assyrians and their forces; he then made you to overcome the Ammonites and the Moabites, and last of all, the Philistines; and these things have been achieved under the conduct of Jephtha and Gideon. What madness therefore possessed you to fly from God, and to desire to be under a king? yet have you observed the only one thing, that you might not be subject to the kings. However, that I may make it plain to you, that God is angry and displeased at your choice of kingly government, I will so dispose him that he shall declare this very plainly to you by strange signals; for what none of you ever saw before, I mean a winter storm in the midst of harvest, I will entreat of God, and will make it visible to you. Now, as soon as he had said these words, he turned to the people; and the wild beasts, and lightning, and the desecration of hail, as attest the truth of all the prophet had said, insomuch that they were amazed and terrified, and confessed they had sinned, and had fallen away from the salvation given them by the prophet, as one that was a tender and gentle father to them, to render God so merciful as to forgive this their sin, which they had added to those other offences whereby they had affronted him and transgressed against him. So he promised them that he would beseech God, and persuade him to forgive them their sins. However, he advised them to be righteous, and to be good, and to obey the orders and the law of the king. But he said, that if they should grow careless of these things, great judgments would come from God upon them, and upon their king. And when Samuel had thus prophesied, he adjured them to say what they would, and not to fear, and so to speak what you say to gratify me, nor suppress any thing out of fear of me, nor be overborne by any other

* Mr. Reynolds observes here, and proves elsewhere, in his note on Amoz, b. iii. ch. i. sect. 6, that although the words "with us" do not appear, as the French it. ed. makes them, in this passage, they appear, as the English it. ed. makes them}, in the Greek, and are necessary to the sense, as well as in the fourth verse of the 2d chapter, of the 19th book, in the Latin Vulgate.
CHAP. VI.

How the Philistines made another Expedition against the Hebrews, and were beaten.

1. Now Saul chose out of the multitude about three thousand men, and he took two thousand of them to be the guards of his own body, and abode in the city of Bethel; and he gave the rest of them to Jonathan his son to be the guards of the camp. He sent also to the city of Gibeath, where he besieged and took a certain garrison of the Philistines, not far from Gilgal, for the Philistines of Gibeath had beaten the Jews, and took their cattle. Now the Philistines were come into the strongest places of the country, and had forbidden them to carry any instrument of iron, or at all to make use of any iron in any case whatsoever. And on account of this prohibition it was, that the husbandmen, if they had occasion to sharpen any of their tools, whether it were the curler or the spade, or any instrument of husbandry, they came to the Philistines to do it. Now as soon as the Philistines heard of this slaughter of their cattle, they were in a rage about it, and looking on this as a terrible affront offered them, they made war against the Jews, with three hundred thousand footmen, and thirty thousand chariots, and six thousand horsemen, and they pitched their tents in the valley of Michmash. When Saul, the king of the Hebrews, was informed of this, he went down to the city of Gilgal, and made proclamation over all his people, and charged them not to go from the city of Gilgal, and join battle, till the seventh day, or unless they could obtain their liberty; and called them to the war against the Philistines, diminishing their forces, and despising them as not very considerable, and as not so great but that they might hazard a battle with them. But when the people of God observed how numerous the Philistines were, they were under a great consternation; and some of them hid themselves in caves, and in dens under ground, but the greater part fled into the land of Benjamin and Jordan, which belonged to God and Zebulon.

2. But Saul sent to the prophet, and called him to consult with him about the war, and the public affairs: so he commanded him to stay there for seven days, and offer sacrifices, for he would come to him within seven days, that they might offer sacrifices on the seventh day, and might then join battle with their enemies. So he waited for seven days, and Saul sent to him, but he, however, observe the command that was given him; but when he saw that the prophet stayed longer than he expected, and that he was deserted by the soldiers, he took the sacrifices and offered them: and when he heard that Samuel was come, he went out to meet him. But the prophet said to him, Go in peace, there is a certain thing Jehovah: he sent them, and had not stayed till his coming, which being appointed according to the will of God, he had prevented him in offering up those prayers, and those sacrifices, that he had commanded him to make at that time. And thus he therefore had performed divine offices in an ill manner, and had been rash in performing them. Hereupon Saul made an apology to him, and said, And how long, said he, have I waited as many days as I Samuel had appointed him; that he had been so quick in offering his sacrifices, upon account of the necessity he was in, and because his soldiers were departing from him, out of their fear of the enemy's camps at Michmash, the report being gone abroad that they were coming down upon him to Gilgal. To which Samuel replied, Nay, certainly, if thou hadst been a righteous man, and hadst not disobeyed me, and hadst not done what the Lord commanded thee to do, and hadst not been given to using the sacrifices as the persons of the Lord, and hadst acted more hastily than the present circumstances required, thou wouldst have been permitted to reign a long time, and the Lord would have been pleased with thee, and would not have been grieved at what had happened, returned home: but Saul came to the city Gilgal, with his son Jonathan, having only six hundred men with him, and divided his army into three armies, and laid waste the country of the Hebrews, while king Saul and his son Jonathan saw what was done, but were not able to defend the camp, for no more than six hundred men were with them. But as he and his son, and Abishai the high priest, who was of the posterity of Eli the high priest, were sitting upon a pretty high hill, and seeing the land wasted, they were afraid of the dissension at it. Now Saul's soul was agreed with his armorer-bearer, that they would go privately to the enemy's camp, and make a tumult and a disturbance among them. And his armorer-bearer promised to follow him whithersoever he should lead him, though he should be obliged to die in Apolon, B. ii. sect. 30, where Josephus speaks of that matter; though it must be noted, that it seems, at least in those instances, that good men did not always immediately approve of such divine severity. There seems to be one instance, 1 Sam. vi. 19. 20: another, 1 Sam. xv. 11; and a third, 2 Sam. vi. 8, 9. Antiq. B. vii. ch. vii. sect. 2; though they all at last acquiesced in the divine conduct, as knowing that God was wiser than men. ¶ By this answer of Samuel, and that from a divine commission, which is fuller in 1 Sam. xiii. 14; and by that parallel passage, the Apostles are now quoted, concerning the great wickedness of Saul in venturing, even under a seeming necessity of affairs, to use the priest's garments, and so virtually to usurp the priest, we are in some degree able to answer that question, which I have ever thought a very hard one, viz. Whether, if there were a city or country of lay Christians, without any clergyman, it was lawful for the laity alone to baptize, or celebrate the eucharist, &c. or indeed whether any ecclesiastical person, whether he be either bishop, priests, or deacons, for the due performance of such sacerald ministrations or, whether they ought not rather, till they procure clergyman to come among them, the sick to declare some other religious service, as the preaching of piety and christianity which belong alone to the laity? such particularity as are recommended in the first book of the Apostles, and which has ever been the concern of the laity, and are intimate in Clement's undoubted epistle sect. 45; to which latter opinion I incline.
the attempt. Jonathan made use of the young men's assistance, and descended from the hill, and went to their enemies. Now the enemy's camp was upon a precipice, which had three tops, that ended in a small but sharp and long extremity, while there was a rock that surrounded it, like a girdle, so as to guard the attacks of an enemy. There it so happened that the out-guard of the camp were neglected, because of the security that here arose from the situation of the place, and because they thought it altogether impossi ble for any to reach up to the camp on that quarter, but so much as to come near it. As soon, therefore, as they came to the camp, Jonathan encouraged his armor-bearer, and said to him, 'Let us attack our enemies; and if when we come near them, they say nothing, as not intending to invite us to come up, let us return back again.' So when they were approaching to the enemy's camp, just after break of day, and the Philistines saw them, they said one to another, 'The Hebrews come out of their dens and caves;' and they said to Jonathan and to his armor-bearer, 'Come on, and let us take the man; and you shall know which it is a man, or which it is a king—by the multitude of their shoes, or by the color of their raiment.' Jonathan said to his armor-bearer, 'The man is not a king, nor a captain, but a common man.' So they came to the man, and Jonathan said to him, 'Make haste, and go up, and strike them; the Lord will give you success today.' So the man struck Jonathan, and Jonathan fell. knowing of the curse and oath that had been denounced, while I was in pursuit of the enemy, I tasted of a honeycomb." But Saul swore that he would slay him, and prefer the observation of his oath before all the tides of birth and of nature. And Jonathan was not dismayed at this threatening of death, but offering himself to it generously, and unsaddened, he said, "Nor do I desire yours, for I will fight for you, as for Jonathan, and they saw that they would not overlook Jonathan, and see him die, who was the author of their victory. By which means they watched him out of the danger he was in from his father's curse, while they made their prayers to God also for the young man, that he would remit his sin.

6. So Saul, having slain about sixty thousand of the enemy, returned home to his own city, and rejoiced; but he had also fought against the neighboring nations, and subdued the Ammonites, and Moabites, and Philistines, and Edomites, and Amalekites, as also the king of Zobah. He had also defeated a very large army of Zobah, whom he brought into his land, and also of the houses of Melchishua; with Merab and Michal his daughters. He had also Abner, his uncle's son, for the captain of his host; that uncle's name was Ner. Now Ner and Ishah, the father of Saul, were brothers. Saul had saved them many great chariots and horsesmen: against whosoever he made war, he returned conqueror, and advanced the affairs of the Hebrews to a great degree of success and prosperity, and made them superior to other nations: and he made both of the young men that were remarkable for tallness and comeliness, the guards of his body.

CHAP. VII.

Saul's War with the Amalekites, and Conquest of them.

1. Now Samuel came unto Saul, and said to him, "That he was sent by God to put him in mind that God had preferred him above all others, and ordained him king; that he therefore ought to be obedient to him, and to submit to his authority, as considering, that though he had the dominion over the people, he was yet subject to the dominion over him, and over all things. That accordingly, God said to him, that because the Amalekites did the Hebrews a great deal of mischief, as they had done to their fathers, and as they had done to David, when he had fled from his father's house, and was in the wilderness, and when, upon their coming out of Egypt, they were making their way to that country which is now their own, he enjoined thee to punish the Amalekites, by making war upon them, and when thou hast subdued them, to leave none of them alive, but to pursue them through every age, and to slay them, beginning with the women and the infants, and to require this as a punishment to be inflicted upon them for the mischief they did to our forefathers. By this sufficient judgment, neither save nor other beasts, nor to reserve any of them for your own advantage and possession, but to devote them universally to God, and, in obedience to the commandments of Moses, to blot out the name of Amalek entirely."

2. So Saul promised to do what he was commanded; and supposing that his obedience to God would be shown, not only in making war against the Amalekites, but in the readiness and quickness of his proceedings, he

The reason of this severity is distinctly given, 1 Sam. xxv. 18-22; 1 Chr. xxviii. 2-13; 2 Sam. xxiv. 12-15. And above and all, the most barbarous of all cruelties, that of Haman the Agagite, or one of the posterity of Agag, the old king of the Amalekites, Esth. iii. 1-13.
he gave them, and then that he himself should be so grossly despised and disobeyed by them, that a mere man, that was a king, would not bear it. He therefore told Samuel the prophet, that he repented that he had made Saul king, while he did nothing that he had commanded him, but induced his own inclination. When Samuel heard that, he was in confusion; and began to beseech God that all that night to be reconciled to Saul, and not to be angry with him; but he did not grant his repentance to Saul, on which the prophet asked for, and not deeming it a fit thing to grant forgiveness of [such] sins at his entreaties, since injuries do not otherwise grow so great as by the easy tempers of those that are injured; for that after the manner of being had very kind, thought gentle and good-natured, before they are aware they produce other sins. As soon therefore as God had rejected the intercession of the prophet, and it plainly appeared he would not change his mind, at break of day Samuel came to Saul at Gilgal. When the king saw him, he ran to him, and embraced him, and said, "I return thanks to God, who hath given me the victory, for I have performed every thing that he hath commanded me." To which Samuel replied, "How is it then that I hear the bleeding of the sheep, and the lowing of the greater cattle in the camp?" Saul made answer, that "the people had reserved them for sacrifices; but that, as much as the king himself, none of the Amalekites was entirely destroyed, as he had received it in command to see done, and that no one man was left, but that he had saved alive the king alone, and another six hundred men, whom he said they would advise together, who should be done with him." But the prophet said, "God is not delighted with sacrifices, but with good and righteous men, who are such as follow his will and work according to his heart, and that they were made of gold and silver themselves, but he will reject them, and esteem them instances of wickedness, and not of piety. And that he be delighted with those that sit here in mind this one thing, and that, they do the only, howbeit it soever it be, which God pronounces or commands for them to do, and to choose rather to die than to transgress any of those commands; not does he require so much as a sacrifice from them. And when these do sacrifice, though it be a mean obligation, he better accepts of it as the honor of poverty, than such obligations as come from the richest men that offer them to him. Wherefore take notice, that thou art under the wrath of God, for thou hast despised and neglected what he commanded thee. How dost thou then suppose that he will accept a sacrifice out of such things as he hath doomed to destruction? unless perhaps he will receive into the heart things that are almost all one to offer it in sacrifice to God as to destroy it. Do thou therefore expect that thy kingdom will be taken from thee, and that authority which thou hast abused by such insolent behavior, as to be a reproach to God who bestowed it upon thee. Then did Saul confess that he had acted unjustly, and did not deny that he had sinned, because he had transgressed the injunctions of the prophet; but he said, that it was out of a dread and fear of God; that he did not mean to retain them when they were seized on the prey. But forgive me, said he, and be merciful to me, for I will be cautious how I offend for the time to come. He also entreated the prophet to go back with him, that he might offer his thank-offerings to God; but Samuel went home, because he saw that God would not be reconciled to him.

5. But then Saul was so desirous to retain Samuel, that he took hold of his cloak, and because he showed the vehemence of Samuel's departure made the motion to be violent, the cloak was rent. Upon which the prophet said, that after the same manner, should the kingdom be rent from him, and that he should take it; that God persevered in what he had decreed about him; that to be mutable and changeable in what is determined, is agreeable to human passions only, but is not agreeable to the divine power. He was a king by the grace of God, but that was done, but that what was done could not be undone: he therefore desired him to honor him so far, that the multitude might see that he would accompany him in worshipping God. So Samuel granted him that favor, and went with him and worshipped God. Agag also, the king of the Amalekites, was brought to him; and when the king asked, How bitter death was! Samuel said: "As thou hast made many of the Hebrews to fall by the sword, so shall thy mother be slain by thy death cause thy mother to lament thee also." Accordingly, he gave order to slay him immediately at Gilgal, and then went away to the city Ramah.

CHAP. VIII.

Hereupon Saul's Transgression of the Prophet's Commands, Samuel ordained another Person to be King privately, whose name was David, as God commanded him.

§ 1. Now Saul being sensible of the miserable condition he had brought himself into, and that he had made God to be his enemy, he went up to Bethel, to be reconciled to the Lord. But he was received no other way by thy death cause thy mother to lament thee also.

Accordingly, he gave order to slay him immediately at Gilgal, and then went away to the city Ramah.

Hereupon Saul's Transgression of the Prophet's Commands, Samuel ordained another Person to be King privately, whose name was David, as God commanded him.
And when God said it was time of them, he asked Jesse, whether he had not some other sons besides these? and when he said that he had one more named David, but that he was a shepherd, and took care of the flock; Samuel bid them call him immediately, for that till he was come they could not possibly sit down to the feast. David was so soon as his father had sent for David, and he was come, he appeared to be of a yellow complexion, of a sharp sight, and a comely person in other respects also. This is he, said Samuel privately to those that stood by, and anointed him, and in the presence of his brothers, and of the men of the Philistines, whose name was ‘Goliath,’ of the city of Gath, a man of vast bulk, for he was four cubits and a span in tallness, and had about him weapons suitable to the largeness of his body, for his body was as the bulrush, and his arm as the brazen plate on that which covered the thousand shekels; he had also a helmet and greaves of brass as large as you would naturally suppose might cover the limbs of so vast a body. His spear was also such as was not carried like a light thing in his right hand, but he carried it as lying on his shoulders. He had also a lance of six hundred shekels: and many followed him to carry his armor. Wherefore this Goliath stood between the armies, and said, and they that while he lived he should enjoy a glorious name, and leave such a name to his posterity also.

2. So Samuel, when he had given him these admonitions, went away: but the divine power did not forsake Saul, but it was in him to make and no other remedy but this, that if any person could charm those passions by singing, and playing upon the harp, they advised him to inquire for a young Levite, and if he not leave of the stomachs came upon him and disturbed him, and to take care that such a person might stand over him and play on the harp, and recite hymns to him. Accordingly Saul did not delay, but commanded them to send for such a man. And when a certain stranger—by said that he had seen in the city of Bethlehem a son of Jesse, who was yet so more than a child in age, but comely and beautiful, and in other respects one that was descended of the royal blood, and that he was of great form of body, he sent him and desired him to come. David was away from the flock, and send him to him, for he had a mind to see him. And when he saw the form of David in all the comeliness of his body, so he sent for and desired him to permit David to stay with him, for that he was delighted with his sight and company; wherefore he saw that he might not contradict Saul, he granted.

glory, when he shall be slain by one that is not yet of man’s estate, neither fit for fighting, nor capable of being intrusted with the marshalling an army, or ordering a battle, but by one that looks like a child, and is really no older in age than a child.

3. Now Saul wondered at the boldness and alacrity of David, but durst not presume on his ability, by reason of his age: but said he must on that account be too weak to fight with one that he judged to be of the same age. "I undertake like this enterprise," said David, "in dependence on God’s being with me, for I have had experience already of his assistance; for I once pursued after and caught a lion that assaulted my flocks, and I took hold of him from the ground and smothered the lamb out of the wild beast’s mouth, and when he leaped upon me with violence, I took him by the tail, and dashed him against the ground. In the same manner did I avenge myself on a bear also; and let this adversary of ours be esteemed like one of these wild beasts, since he has a long while reproached our army, and blasphemed our God, who yet will reduce him under his power."

4. However, Saul prayed that the end might be, by God’s assistance, not disagreeable to the alacrity and boldness of the child; and said, "Go thy way to the fight." So he put about him his breastplate, and girded him, and fitted the helmet to his head, and sent him away. But David was burdened with his armor, for he had not been exercised to it, nor had he learned to walk with it; so he said, "Let this armor be that which I shall wear, if thou meet it, but give me leave to fight as thy servant, and as I myself desire." Accordingly he laid by the armor, and taking his staff with him, and putting five stones out of the brook into a shepherd’s bag, and having taken bread and water, he went straight to Goliath. But the adversary seeing him in such a manner, disdained him, and jested upon him, as if he had not such weapons with him as are usual when one man fights against another, but such as are used in driving away and avoiding of dogs; and said, "Dost thou take me not for a man, but a dog?" To which he replied, "No, not for a dog, but for a creature worse than a dog;" for he smote Goliath. A sibyer, who thereupon cursed him by the name of God, and threatened to give his flesh to the beasts of the earth, and to the fowls of the air, to be torn in pieces by them. To whom David answered, "With the sword of a woman, and with a spear, and with a breastplate, but I have God for my armor, in coming against thee, who will destroy thee and all thy army by my hands; for I will this day cut off thy head, and cast the other parts of thy body to the dogs, and all men shall learn that God is the protector of the Hebrews, and that our armor and our strength is in his providence, and that, without God’s assistance, all other warlike preparations and power are useless." So the Philistine, being terrified by the weight of his armor, when he attempted to meet David in battle, came on but slowly, as despising him, and deprecating upon it that he should have been both worn out and tired, and a child also, without any trouble at all.

5. But the youth met his antagonist, being accompanied with an invisible assistant, who was no other than God himself. And taking one of the stones in his hand, and cast it, and put it into his shepherd’s bag, and fitting it to his sling, he slung it against the Philistine. This stone fell upon his forehead, and sunk into his brain, insomuch that Goliath was stunned, and fell upon his face. So David ran, and stood upon his adversary as he lay down, and cut off his head with his own sword; for he had no sword himself. And upon the fall of Goliath, the Philistines were beaten, and fled: for when they saw their captain prostrate on the ground, they were afraid of the entire issue of their affairs, and resolved not to stay any longer, but committed themselves to an ignominious and ignoble flight, and therefore was not David afraid of the dangers they were in. But Saul and the entire army of the Hebrews made a shout, and rushed upon them, and slew a great number of them and pursued the rest to the borders of Gath, and took a covenant oath of them. But the Philistines thirty thousand, and twice as many wounded. But Saul returned to their camp, and pulled their fortification to pieces, and burnt it; but David carried the head of Goliath into his own tent, but dedicated his sword to God [at the tabernacle.]

CHAP. X.

Saul envies David for his glorious Success, and takes an occasion of entrooping him, from the Promise of the Prophet to him of giving him a daughter in Marriage, but this upon Condition of his bringing six hundred Heads of the Philistines.

§ 1. Now the women were an occasion of Saul’s envy and hatred to David; for they came to meet their victorious army with cymbals, and drums, and all demonstrations of joy, and sung the victory. And Saul feared it, and envied many thousands of the Philistines. The virgin replied, that “David had slain his ten thousands.” Now, when the king heard them singing thus, and that he himself the smallest share in the victory, he was very discontented, and to be made he captain over a thousand, and bestowed on him a post better indeed in itself, but, as he thought, more for his own security; for he had a mind to send him against the enemy, and into battles, as he would be slain in such dangerous conflicts.

2. But David had God going along with him whithersoever he went, and accordingly he was greatly prospered in his undertakings, and it was visible that he had mighty success, insomuch that Saul’s daughter, who was still a virgin, fell in love with him; and her affection so far prevailed over her that it could not be concealed, and her father became acquainted with it. Now Saul heard this gladly, as intending to make use of it for a snare against David, and he hoped that it would prove the cause of destruction and of hazard to him; so he told those that informed him of it to his daughter, who was both her affection, that he would willingly give David the virgin in marriage, and said, “I engage myself to marry my daughter to him, if he will bring me six hundred heads of my enemies.” (supposing that when a reward was promised him and was put within his sight, he might desire to aim at getting himself great glory, by undertaking a thing so dangerous and incredible, he would immediately set about it, and so perish by the Philistines were not foresaken with our other copies, but heads with Josephus’s copy, seems somewhat probable, from 1 and 2. Also, that Saul required not a bare Ass, but the head of the foreskin of the Philistines, but six hundred of their heads. The Septuagint have 100 foreskins, but the Syriac and Arabic 200. Now that these futines; and my designs about him will succeed freely to my mind, for I shall be freed from him, and get him slain, not by myself, but by another man." So he gave order to his servants to try how David would relish this proposal of marrying into the king's son-in-law? It does not seem so to me, especially when I am one of a family that is low, and without any glory or honor." Now when Saul was informed by his servants what answer David had made, he said, "Tell him that I do not want any money nor dowry from him, which would be rather to set my daughter to sale than to give her in marriage, but I desire only such a son-in-law as may have him for his purchase, and all other kinds of virtue, (of which he saw David was possessed), and that his desire was to receive of him, on account of his marrying his daughter, neither gold, nor silver nor that he should bring such wealth out of the damsel: Accordingly, they were long enough to sustain the challenge of the adversary and after that brought as many heads of our enemies as he was appointed to bring, and had as a reward for the same, my sister in marriage; and I think these were enough to make his death more to our comfort than to us, not only on account of his virtue, but on account of the nearness of our relation, for thy daughter must be injured at the same time that he is slain, and must be obliged to experience the widowhood, before she can come to any advantage from their mutual conversation. Consider these things, and change your mind to a more merciful temper, and do no mischief to a man, who, by what he has done, the greatest kindness of preserving thee; for when an evil spirit and demons had seized upon thee, he cast them out, and procured rest to thy soul from their incursions: and in the second place, hath avenged us of our enemies; for it is a base thing to forget such benefits." So Saul was pacified with these words; and swears to his son that he would do David no harm; for a righteous discourse proved too hard for the king's anger and fear. And so he sent for David, and brought him good news from his father, that he was to be preserved. He also brought him to his father; and David continued with the king as formerly.

3. About this time it was, that, upon the Philistines making a new expedition against the Hebrews, Saul sent David with an army to fight with them; and joining battle with them, he slew many of them, and after his victory he returned to the king. But his reception by Saul was not as he expected upon such success, for he was grieved at his prosperity, because he thought he would be more dangerous to him by having acted so gloriously: but when the demonical spirit came upon him, and put him into disorder, and disturbed him, he called for David into his bed-chamber wherein he lay, and having a spear in his hand, he ordered him to charm him with playing on the harp; which was done so effectually which, when David did at his command, he with great force threw the spear at him, but David was aware of it before it came, and avoided it, and fled to his own house, and abode there all that day.

4. But at night the king sent officers, and commanded that he should be watched till the morning, lest he should get quite away, that he might come home; for it was not time to be delivered up, and condemned and slain. But when Micha, David's wife, the king's daughter understood what her father designed, she came to her husband, as having small hopes of his deliverance, and as greatly concerned about her care and be absent the next day, for that he would salute his father, and, if he met with a favorable opportunity, he would discourse with him about him, and learn the cause of his disgust, and show how little ground there was for it, and that for it he ought not to look for a man not only to do good things to the multitude, and, and been, a benefactor to himself, on account of which he ought in reason to obtain pardon, had he been guilty of the greatest crimes; and I will then inform thee of the bad conduct of other men. David complied with such advantageous advice and kept himself then out of the king's sight.

2. On the next day Jonathan came to Saul as soon as he saw him in a cheerful and joyful disposition, and to inform him of the bad conduct of other men. David: "What unjust action, O father, either little or great, hast thou found so exceptible in David, as to induce thee to order us to stay a man who hath been of great advantage to thy own preservation, and of still greater to the punishment of the Philistines? a man who hath delivered the people of the Hebrews from reproach and derision, which they underwent for forty days together; by a long number of years to support the Philistines and indeed six hundred of their heads, than with a more desirable or a more glorious present could not be brought him, and that he had much rather obtain this than any of the others. It is as much as he could do to think that she should be married to a man of that character, and to one who had a testimony as having conquered his enemies."
7. Hereupon, when Jonathan found that this intention of Saul's was so well attested, he asked him, "What would he have done for him?"

8. But Jonathan heard these last words with indignation, and promised to do what he desired of him, and to inform him if his father's answers implied any menace or any enmity against him. And that he might the more firmly depend upon him, he took him out into the open field, into the pure air, and swore that he would neglect nothing that might tend to the preservation of David; and he said, "I appeal to that God, who, as thou seest, is diffused everywhere, and knowest this intention of mine, before I explain it in words, as the witness of this my covenant with thee, that I will not leave off to make thee my friend in all the trials of life, and of thy father, till I learn whether there be any lurking in true prophets, when they were under the inspiration of the Spirit of God. Our other copies, which ray the Spirit of prophecy, contain the name of Josephus's copy, which mentions nothing of God at all. Nor does Josephus seem to ascribe this impulse and ecstasy of Saul's to any other than to his demoniacal spirit, which on all accounts appears the most probable. Nor does the former description of Saul's real inspiration by Jonathan correspond with that given in the Acts 13:22, in which what was said by Saul on this occasion is supposed to have been Addik. B. v. c. 4, sect. 2.
And when Jonathan had done what had been thus agreed, he dismissed his servant that followed him, to return to the city, but he himself went into the desert, and came into his presence, and communed with him. So David appeared, and fell at Jonathan's feet, and the bowman used to him, and called him the preserver of his soul: but he lifted him up from the earth, and they mutually embraced one another, and made a long greeting, and that not without tears. They also lamented the deaths of all their kinsmen with wailing and such sadness that every one of them did lament them. And thus they departed, a man from his brother, and their tears were so great that even their faces became like the appearance of death.

Chapter XII.

How David fled to Ahimelech, and afterward to the King of the Philistines, and of the Moabites; and how Saul slew Ahimelech and his family.

1. But David fled from the king, and that death he was in danger of by him, and came to the city of Nob, to Ahimelech the priest, who, when he saw him coming all alone, and neither a friend nor a servant with him, he wondered at it, and desired the cause of his coming: and he said, "Is there nobody with you?" To which David answered, "That the king had commanded him to do a certain thing that was to be kept secret, to which end he was in haste, and had no occasion for any one to accompany him; however, I have ordered my servants to meet me at such and such a place." So he desired him to let him have somewhat to eat; and that in case of the king's mind, he should not hear of him. And as he was going, he met with Abinai, the captain of the king's host, and on the other hand, he saw David's seat was empty, but said nothing, supposing that he had not purified himself since he had accompanied with his wife, and that he could not be present; but when he saw that he was not there the second day of the month, either, he inquired of his son Jonathan why the son of Jesse did not come to the supper and the feast, neither the day before nor that day. So Jonathan said, that he had gone, according to the agreement between them, to his own city, where his tribe kept a festival, and that by his permission: that he also invited him to come to their sacrifice; and, (says Jonathan,) if thou wilt give way to me, I will go and bringest the good-will that I bear him." And then it was that Jonathan understood his father's hatred to David, and plainly saw his entire disposition; for now he knew that his father was a runagate, and an enemy; and said, "He was a partner with David, and his assistant, and that by his behavior he showed he had no regard to himself, or to his mother, she would not be persuaded of this; that while David is alive, their kingdom was not secure to them: yet did he bid him send for him, that he might be punished." And when Jonathan said, in answer, "What hath he done, that thou wilt punish him now?" Saul no longer contented himself to express his anger in base words, but snatched up his spear, and leaped upon him, and was desirous to kill him. He did not indeed do what he intended, because he was his own father's friend. And beingPlainly to his son that he hated David, and greatly desired to despach him, inasmuch that he had almost slain his son with his own hands on that occasion.

2. And then it was that the king's son rose hastily from supper; and being not able to admit any thing into his mouth for grief, he wept all night, both because he had himself been near death, and because he was ready to obey his order: there were in all about four hundred. Whereupon he took courage, now such a force and assistance was come to him: so he removed thence, and came to the king of the Moabites, and desired him to entertain his parents in his country, while the issue of his affairs were in such an uncertain condition. The King granted him this favor, and paid great respect to David's parents all the time they were with him.

4. As for himself, upon the prophet's command- ing him to leave the desert, and to go into the portion of the tribe of Judah, and abide there, he complied therewith; and coming to the city of Hareth, which was in that tribe, he remained there. Now when Saul heard that David had been banished from the courts of Abimelech, he did not find any small disturbance and trouble; but as he knew that David was a bold and courageous man, he suspected that somewhat extraordinary would appear from him, and therefore, also, which was not without reason, that the breach which he had made of his oath would be made still worse; so he called together to him his friends and his commanders, and the tribe from which he was himself derived, to the hill where his palace was; and sitting down, as a place called Aroura, his courtiers that were in dignities, and the guards of his body being with him, he spake thus to them: "You that are men of my own tribe, I conclude that you remember the benefits that I have done you; and that I have made some of you owners of land, and made you commanders, and bestowed posts of honor upon you, and set some of you over the common peo- ple, and others over the soldiers; I ask you, therefore, what respect and esteem is left for you? or, to speak bluntly, how hard, and how much harm has one son of Abimelech, whose name was Abi- thar, who escaped. However, these things came to pass as God had foretold to Eli the high priest when he said that his posterity should be destroyed, on account of the transgressions of his two sons.

7. Now this king Saul, by perpetrating so bar- barous a crime, and murdering the whole family in a bloody act of venge- fulness; he gave no silence, and no watch to see what will be the upshot of these things." When the king had done his speech, not one of the rest of those that were present made any answer; but Doeg the Syrian, who fed his cattle, said, that he saw David when he came to the city of Nob to Abimelech the high priest, and that he had learned future events by his prophesying: that he received food from him, and the sword of Goliat, and was conducted by himself, his cattle as such as he did not go to.

5. Saul therefore sent for the high priest, and for all his kindred, and said to them, "What ter- rible or ungrateful thing hast thou suffered from me, that thou hast received the son of Jesse, and hast been suspected of disloyalty? and hast been only when he was contriving to get the kingdom? And further, why didst thou deliver oracles to him concerning futurities? For thou couldst not be unaccompanied that he was fed away from me, and that he hated my family." But the high priest did not betake himself to deny what he had done, but confessed boldly that he had supplied him with these things, not to gratify David, but Saul himself; and he said, "I did not know that he was thy adversary, but a servant of thine, who was very faithful to thee, and a captain over a thousand of thy soldiers, and, what is more than these, thy son-in-law andkinsman. Men do not use to confer such favors on their adver- saries, but of those who are esteemed to bear the highest good-will and respect to them. Not is this the first time that I prophesied for him but I have done it often, and at other times, as well as now. And when he told me that he was sent by thee in great haste to do somewhat, if I had furnished him with nothing that he de- sired, I should have thought that it was rather in contradiction to thee than to him: wherefore, do not thou entertain any ill opinion of me, nor do thou reproach me, for good or evil."

6. When the king heard what he had spoken thus, he did not persuade Saul; his fear was so prevalent, that he could not give credit to an apology that was very just. So he commanded his armed men that only was allotted for the education of such men, gives all to understand and consider the disposition of men, that while they are priv- ate persons, and in a low condition, because it is not in their power to indulge nature, nor to continue to engage in very costly and amazeable enterprises and enter- tainments, must be able and moderate, and pursue nothing but what is just, and bend their whole minds and labors that way; then it is that they have this belief about God, that he is present to all the actions of their lives, and sees all their thoughts and their actions that are done, but clearly knows those their thoughts also, whence those actions do arise: when but once they are advanced into power and authority, they put of all such notions; and as if they were no other than actors upon a theatre, they lay aside their disguised parts and manners, and take up boldness, insolence, and a contempt of both human and divine laws; and this at a time when they especially stand in need of piety and righteousness, because they are then most of all exposed to envy, and all they think, and all they say, are in the view of all men; then it is that they become so insolent in their actions, as though God saw them no longer, but that Laban the son of Nahor, and the princess of the family of Ithamar, which here perished, according to God's former terrible threatenings to Eli, 1 Sam. ii. 26-36, 31, ch. xi. 10-18 See chap. xiv. sect. 9. behaver.

7. This section contains an admirable reflection of e- sophus concerning the general wickedness of men in great authority, and the danger they are in of rejecting that regard to justice and humanity, to divine provi- dence, and to those duties which they had, or pretended to have, while they were in a lower condi- tion. It can never be too often perused by kings and great men, nor by those who expect to obtain such eleva- tion, or who think that they are likely to have a public and other than the family of Ithamar, which here perished, according to God's former terrible threatenings to Eli, 1 Sam. ii. 26-36, 31, ch. xi. 10-18 See chap. xiv. sect. 9. behaver.

or were afraid of them because of their power; and whatsoever it is that they either are afraid of by the rumors they hear, or they hate by inclination, or they love without reason, these seem to them to be authentic, and firm, and true, and pleasing both to men and to God; but as to what will come after them, they have no regard to it. They raise those to honor indeed who had been at a great deal of pain for them, and after that honor they envy them; and when they have brought them into high dignity, they do not keep any circumspection against Saul and his friends, and attained, but also, on that very account, of their lives also, and that on wicked accusations, and such as, on account of their extravagant nature, and under pretense of their zeal for the public service, and of their actions, not such as deserve condemnation, but from calumnies and accusations without examination; and this extends not only to such as deserve to be punished, but to as many as they are able to kill. This reflection is openly confirmed to us from the example of Saul, the son of Kish, who was the first king who reigned over our aristocracy and government under the judges were over; and that by his slaughter of three hundred of his enemies, which was particularly under his suspicion about Abimelech, and by the additional wickedness of the overthrow of their city, and this as if he were endeavoring in some sort to reader the temple [tabernacle] destinates, both parties of which are preserved by smelling by slaying so many of them, and not suffering the very city belonging to them to remain, that so others might succeed them.

BOOK VI.—CHAP. XIII.

How David, when he had twice the Opportunity of killing Saul, did not kill him. Also concerning the Death of Samuel and its Cause.

1. Amory this time it was that David heard how the Philistines had made an inroad into the country of Keilah, and robbed it; so he offered himself to fight against them, if God, when he should be consulted by the prophet, would grant him the victory. And when the prophet said, that God gave a signal of victory, he made a sudden onset upon the Philistines with his companions, and he shed a great deal of their blood, and carried off their prey, and stayed with the spoil until the sun went down; and among the things that were done was, but the fame of it went all abroad, and came to the hearing of others, and both the fact as it stood, and the author of the fact, were carried to the heart of Saul, and Saul was glad when he heard that David was in Keilah; and he said, "God hath now put him into my hands, since he hath obliged him to come into a city that hath walls, and gates, and bars." So he commanded all the men that set upon Keilah to besiege and to take it, to kill David. But when David perceived this, and learned of God, that if he stayed there, the men of Keilah would deliver him up to Saul, he took his four hundred men, and retired into a desert that was over against a city called Eglidi. So when the king heard that he was fled away from the men of Keilah, he left off his expedition against him.

2. Then David removed thence, and came to a certain place called the New Place, belonging to Ziph; where Jonathan, the son of Saul, came to him, and saluted him, and exhorted him to be of good courage, and to hope well to his condition hereafter, and not to despise at his present state; for David knew that he had all the forces of the Hebrews under him; but told him, that such happiness uses to come with great labor and pains; they also took oaths, and bound themselves by their oath, that they would not deliver their benefactor, David, to good-will and fidelity one to another; and he called God to witness, as to what executions he made upon himself, if he should transgress his covenant, and should change to a contrary behavior. So Jonathan left him there, having pondered his cares and fears somewhat lighter, and returned home. Now the men of Ziph, to gratify Saul, informed him that David abode with them, and [assured him] that if he would come thither, they would deliver him. But the king could seize on the straits of Ziph, David could not escape to any other people. So the king commended them, and confessed that he had reason to thank them, because they had given him implicit confidence, and promised them that he should not be long ere he would requite their kindness. He also sent men to seek for David, and to search the wilderness, wherein he was, whether he were to be found, and, if he himself would follow them. Accordingly, they went before the king, to hunt for, and to catch David, and used endeavors, not only to show their good-will to Saul, by informing him where his enemy was, but to evidence that he was so far from it by delivering him up into his power. But these men failed of those their unjust and wicked desires, who, while they underwent no hazard by not discovering such an ambition of revealing this to Saul, yet did they falsely accuse, and promise to deliver up, a man beloved of God, and one that was unjustly sought for to be put to death, and one that might otherwise have lain concealed, and this out of flattery, and expectation of gain from his coming for whom David was apprized of the malignant intention of the men of Ziph, and of the approach of Saul, he left the straits of that country, and fled to the great rock that was in the wilderness called the Moon.

3. Hereupon, Saul made haste to pursue him thither; for as he was marching, he learned that David was gone away from the straits of Ziph, and Saul removed to the other side of the rock. But the report that the Philistines had again made an incursion into the country of the Hebrews, called Saul another way from the pursuit of David, when he was ready to be caught; for he returned back again to oppose those Philistines, who were ready to try their enemies, as judging it more necessary to avenge himself of them than to take a great deal of pains to catch an enemy of his own, and to overlook the ravages that was made in the land.

4. And by this means David unexpectedly escaped out of the danger he was in, and came to the straits of Eglidi. And when Saul had driven the Philistines out of the land there came to him some messengers, who were sent by their enemies, as being within the bounds of Eglidi: so he took three thousand chosen men that were armed, and made haste to him, and when he was not far from those places, he saw a deep and hollow cave by the way side; it was open to a great length and breadth, and there it was that David with his four hundred men were concealed. When therefore he had occasion to ease nature, he entered into it by himself alone; and being seen by one of David's companions, and he that saw him, saying to him, that "he had now, by God's providence, an opportunity of avenging himself of his adversary, and advising him to cut his heart and so deliver himself out of that tedious wandering condition, and the distress he was in," he rose up, and only cut off the skirt of that garment which Saul had on. But soon he repeated of David's doing, and it was not right he should kill him that was his master, and one whom God had thought worthy of the kingdom: "for that although he were wickedly disposed towards us, yet does it not behove me to be so disposed towards him. But when Saul has lefache even, and David came near, and cried out aloud, and desired Saul to hear him: whereupon the king turned his face back, and David, according to custom, fell down on his face before the king, and bended his knees." O king! how proud and oughtest not to bearken to wicked men, nor to such as forge calumnies, nor to gratify them so far as to believe what they say, nor to entertain suspicions of such as are your best friends, but cut off the skirt of thy garment, I doubt not their actions, for calumny deludes men, but men's own actions are a clear demonstration of their kindness. Words indeed, in their own nature, may be either true or false, but men's actions expose their intentions nakedly to view. By this means, therefore, it will be well for thee to believe me, as to my regard to thee and to thy house, and not to believe those that frame such accusations against me, as never came into my mind, nor are possible to be executed, and do this farther by pursuing after my life, and have no concern either day or night, but how to compass my life and to murder me, which thing I think thou dost unjustly suspect the others of, nor yet view it about, that thou hast embraced this false opinion about me, as if I had a desire to kill thee? Or how canst thou escape the crime of impiety towards God, when thou wishest thou couldst kill, and deemest that a man that had in his power on this day to avenge himself, and to punish thee, but would not do it, nor make use of such an opportunity, which, if it had fallen out to thee against me, thou hadst not let it slip; for when I cut off the skirt of thy garment, I doubt not he done the same to thy head?" So he showed him the piece of his garment, and thereby made him agree to what he said to be true; and added, "I, for certain, have abstained from taking any action upon them; for I am ashamed to prosecute me with unjust hatred. May God do justice, and determine about each of our dispositions." But Saul was amazed at the strange delivery he had received; and being greatly affected with the modesty and disposition of the young man, he groaned: and when David had done the same, the king answered, that "he had the justest occasion to grow, for thou hast been the author of good to me, I have been the author of calamity to thee. And thou hast demonstrated this day, that thou possessest the righteousness of the ancients, who determined that men ought to save their enemies, though they were best men in their secret place. And am now persuaded that God reserves the kingdom for thee, and that thou wilt obtain the dominion over all the Hebrews. Give me then assurance upon oath, that thou wilt not root out my family, but that thy love shall be with me, even till I have done thee, destroy my posterity, but save and preserve my house." So David swore as he desired, and set back Saul to his own kingdom but he, and those that were with him, went up to the straits of Macheroth.

5. About this time the prophet died and was laid in his humble house. He was a man whose name was Borah; and for the length of time which he served God's cause, and the time during which he held the sovereignty and concern that appeared about his funeral, and about the complete observation of all his funeral rites. They buried him in his own city Ramah; and for him a very great lamentation was made. And Saul's son Jonathan mourned for the death of another man, but as that in which they were every one themselves concerned. He was a righteous man, and gentle in his nature and on that account he was very dear to God. Now that man was a Ziphite, of the city of Onew, who was rich, and had a vast number of cattle: for he fed a flock of three thousand sheep, and another flock of a thousand goats. Now David had charged his associates to keep this man safe, and to do them no mischief, neither out of covetousness, nor because they were in want, nor because they were in the wilderness, and so could not be found, but to be found in the possession of justice above all other motives, and to look upon the touching of what belonged to another man as a horrible crime, and contrary to the will of God. These were the instructions he gave them, thinking that the thought of this man were granted to a good man, and one that deserved to have such care taken of his affairs. This man was Nebal, for that was his name, a harsh man, and of a very wicked life, being like a wolf in the night, and prowling about; but had obtained for his wife a woman of good character, wise and handsome. To this Nebal, therefore, David sent ten men of his attendants at the time when he sheared his sheep, and by them salute him and also wished he might do what he now did for many years to come, but desired him to make him a present of what he was able to give him, since he had, to be sure, learned from his shepherds, that he had done them no injury, but had only been a passer-by, and had passed together, while they continued in the wilderness; and he assured him he should never repent of giving anything to David. When the messengers had carried this message to Nebal, he accepted the gift without murmuring and reflecting; for he asked them, who David was? and when he heard that he was the son of Jesse, "Now is the time," said he, that fagitives grow insolent, and make a figure, and leave their men. When I tell thee this, he said Saul, and commanded four hundred armed men to follow him; and left two hundred to take care of the stuff, (for he had already six hundred,)* and went among the borderers, and he said, that night utterly destroy the whole house and possessions of Nebal: for that he was grieved, not only that he had proved ungrateful to them without making any return for the humanity they had showed him, but that he had not left one of them on his estate, and used ill language to them when he had received no cause of disgust from them.

* This phrase in David's speech to Saul, as set down in Josephus, that he had abstained from just revenge, puts me in mind of the like words in the Apostolical Constitutions, 5. 11. 15. No other place mentions revenge is not evil, but I have found no more.

† The number of men that came first to David, are distinctively in Josephus, and in our common copies, but four hundred. When he was at Kedlah, still but four hundred, both in Josephus and in the LXXI; but six hundred in our Hebrew copies, 1 Sam. xxiii. 12; xxx. 9, 10; 1 Chron. xiii. 17. The number here mentioned 6000 by Josephus to have been so many, only by an augmentation of two hundred afterward, which, I suppose, is the true solution of this seeming disagreement.
BOOK VI.—CHAP. XIII.

7. Herupon, one of those that kept the flocks of Nabai, said to his wife, Nabai’s wife, that when David sent to her husband, he had received no civil answer at all from him, but that his wife had moreover added very reproachful language, while yet David had taken extraordinary care to keep him from her; for all of what she was about, (for he was not sensible, on account of his drunkenness,) she went to David. She was then met by David as she was descending a hill, who was coming against Nabai with four men. At first, as she exchanged greetings with David, she leaped down from her ass, and fell on her face, and bowed down to the ground; and in treated him not to bear in mind the words of Nabai, but that he was a man of blood; for so long as thou keepest thyself innocent, he will avenge thee of wicked men, for what miseries await Nabai, they will fall upon the heads of thine enemies. Be thou gracious to me, I beseech thee; nor were it for these presents from me; and out of regard to me, remit that wrath and that anger which thou hast against my husband and his house, for mildness and humanity become thee, especially as thou art about to do me a kindness. Accordingly he received her presents, and said, Nay, but O woman, it was no other than God’s mercy which brought thee to us to-day, for otherwise thou hadst not come to us to-day, I having sworn to destroy Nabai’s house this very day, when he was sober, she told him all the particulars, and made his whole body to appear like that of a dead man by her words, and by that grief which arose from them: so Nabai survived ten days, and no more, and then died. And when David heard of his death, he said, that God had justly avenged him of this man, for that Nabal died by his own wickedness, and had suffered punishment for his accounts, that he had kept to his own hands. At which time he understood, that the wicked are prosecuted by God; that he does not overlook any man, but bestows on the good what is suitable to them, and punishes the wicked; he therefore went to Nabai’s wife, and invited her to come to him, to live with him, and to be his wife. Whereupon she replied to those that came, that she was not worthy to touch his feet: how ever, she came with all her servants to David’s house; having received that honor on account of her wise and righteous course of life. She also obtained the same honor, partly on account of her beauty. Now David had a wife before, whom he married from the city of Abeme; she was Michal, the daughter of king Saul, who had been David’s wife, her father had given her in marriage to Phalli the son of Lieh, who was of the city of Gallim. 8. After that came certain of the Ziphites, and told Saul that David was come again into their country; and if he would afford them his assistance, they could catch him. So he came to them with three thousand armed men; and upon the approach of night he pitched his camp in a certain place called Hackishil. But when David heard that Saul was coming against him, he sent spies, and bid them let him know to what place the king’s army was come; and when they told him that he was at Hackishil, he concealed his going away from his own companions, and came to Saul’s camp, having taken with him Abishai, his sister Zeruiah’s son, and Abimelech, and Joab; and the king’s men, with Abner their commander, lay round about him in a circle. Hereupon David entered into the king’s tent: but he did neither kill Saul, though he knew where he lay, by the spear that departed from his sheath, nor did he take any of them that were near to Abishai, who would have killed him, and was earnestly bent upon it, so to do: for he said, It was a horrid crime to kill one that was ordained king by God, although he was a wicked man: for that He who doth domineer in heaven, doth also in time inflict punishment upon him. So he restrained his eagerness: but that it might appear to have been in his power to have killed him when he refrained from it, he took neither spear and javelin, nor put his hand under the cover of Saul; and lay asleep, without being perceived by any of the camp, who were all asleep, and went securely away, having performed every thing among the king’s suite: and the opportunity afforded, and his boldness encouraged him to do. So when he had passed over a brook, and was gotten up to the top of a hill, whence he might be sufficiently heard, he cried aloud to Saul’s soldiers, and to Abner and their commander, and called them out of their sleep, and called both to him and to the people. Hereupon the commander heard him, and asked who it was that called him? To whom David replied, Is it I, the son of Jesse, whom thou dost not regard, who art come against the king’s life, what is the matter? Dost thou, that art a man of so great dignity, and of the first rank in the king’s court, take so little care of thy master’s body? and is a sleep of more consequence to thee than his preservation, and thy care of him? This negligence of thine deserves death, and punishment to be inflicted on you, who never perceived when a little while ago some of us entered into your camp, nay, as far as to the king himself, and all the rest of the men of war: if thou lopest the king’s spear, and his cruse of water, thou wilt learn what a mighty misfortune was ready to overtake you in your very camp without your knowing of it. Now when he knew David’s words, and understood that when he had him in his power while he was asleep, and his guards took no care of him, yet did not he kill him, but spared be the meaning of this phrase of heaping coals of fire on their heads.

* In this, and the two next sections, we may perceive how Josephus, say, how Abigail herself would understand the "not avenging himself," but saying the "avenging himself," as an expression on the head of the injuries, Prov. xxiv. 32; Rom. xi. 32: not as we commonly do now of melting them and making a care to keep his locks from harm, and that he who was of God, to whom vengeance belongeth, Deut. xxxii. 35; Psal. xcv. 1; Heb. x. 36; and who will take vengeance on his enemies. And when he kept his mouth, saw just, and all fit to be executed, and all at length for the good of the persons punished, I incline to think that to him. When he might justly have cut him off, he said, that he "owed him thanks for his preservation; and exhorted him to be of good courage, and not to be afraid of suffering any mischief from him any more, and to return to his own house for he was now persuaded that he loved himself so well as he was beloved by him: that he had driven away him that could guard him, and had given many demonstrations of his goodwill to him: that he had forced him to live so near his face, and in great fear of his life, destitute of his friends and his kinsmen, while still he was often saved by him, and frequently received his life again when it was almost perishing. So David bade them send him the provisions and the crust of water, and take them back; adding this wittily, that "God would be the judge of both their dispositions, and of the actions that flowed from the same; yet he would add burden and power to have killed thee, I abstained from it.""

10. Thus Saul, having escaped the hands of David twice, he went his way to his royal palace, and his own city; but David was afraid, that if he remained there he should be caught by Saul, so he thought it better to go up into the land of the Philistines and abide there. Accordingly, he came, with the six hundred men that were with him, to Achish, the king of Gath, which was one of the cities of Gath. Now he feared not only both him and his men, and gave them a place to inhabit in. He had with him also his two wives, Abinoam and Abigail, and he dwelt in Gath. But when Saul heard this, he took no further care of him, or of his going to him, because he had been twice, in a manner, caught by him, while he was himself endeavoring to catch him. However, David had no mind to remain in the city of Gath; for he desired the king, that since he had received him with such humanity, that he would grant him another favor, and bestow upon him some place of that country for his habitation; for he was ashamed, being a stranger in the city, to be always a burden to some to him. So Achish gave him a certain village called Ziklag; which place David and his sons were fond of when he was king, and reckoned it to be their peculiar inheritance. But afterward he was able, with the royal apparel and the provisions, to make his way far otherwise. Now the time that David dwelt in Ziklag, in the land of the Philistines, was four months and twenty days. And now he privately attacked those Gezerites and those who were in the city of Gezer, and carried away with him all that was there; and likewise the land of the Philistines, and laid waste their country, and took much prey of their beasts and cattle, and then returned home; but David abstained from the men, as fearing they should discovery him to king Achish, lest he did send part of his prey to him as a free gift. And when the king inquired whom they had attacked when they brought away the prey, he said those that lay on the south of the Jews, and inhabited in the plain; whereas David said to Achish, that he had done what he had done, for he hoped that David had fought against his own nation, and that now he should have him for his servant all his life long, and that he would stay in his country.

CHAPTER XIV.

How Saul, upon God's not answering him concerning the Fight with the Philistines, desired a necromancer to raise up the Soul of Samuel to him; and how he died, with his Sons, upon the overthrow of the Hebrews in Battle.

1. About the same time the Philistines resolved to make war against the Israelites, and sent to all their confederates that they would go along with them to the war to Raggean, [near the city Shuzech,] whence they might gather themselves together and suddenly attack the Hebrews. Then did Achish, the king of Gath, desire David to assist them with his armed men against the Hebrews. This he readily promised, and said, that the time was now come whereas he might require him for his kindness and hospitality; so the king promised to make him the keeper of his body after the victory, supposing that the battle with the enemy succeeded to their mind; which promise of honor and confidence he made on purpose to increase his zeal for the cause of his master, and in great fear of his life, destitute of his friends and his kinsmen, while still he was often saved by him, and frequently received his life again when it was almost perishing. So David bade them send him the provisions and the crust of water, and take them back; adding this wittily, that "God would be the judge of both their dispositions, and of the actions that flowed from the same; yet he would add burden and power to have killed thee, I abstained from it." was coming, neither by prophets nor dreams, and that these were the reasons why I have recourse to thee, who always tookest care of me." But Samuel, seeing that the end of Saul's life was come, 1 said, "It is vain for thee to desire to have me to direct thee in all things; for I will not depart, only, be assured, thou shalt hear the voice of all his commandments, as I foretold thee while I was alive. Know, therefore, that the people shall be made subject to their enemies, and that thou, with thy sons, shall fall in the battle to-morrow, and the Israelites, with all of thee, for all the people knew not what was coming upon him, and that he was to die immediately, by the prediction of the prophet, he did not resolve to fly from death, nor so far to indulge the love of life, as to betray his own people to the enemy in order to save his own royal dignity; but exposing himself, as well as all his family and children to dangers, he thought it a brave thing to fall together with them, as he was fighting for his subjects, and that it was better that he should die in showing their courage, than to leave them to their uncertain conduct afterward, while, instead of succession and posterity, they gained condemnation and a lamentable privation. So he persuaded him to admit that a table and food might be set before him, that he might recover his strength, and so get safe to his own camp. And when he opposed her motion, and entirely rejected it, by saying that his heart was ready to break for him, she entreated him to persuade him to it. Now she had one child that she was very fond of, and one that she took a great deal of care of, and fed it herself, for she was a woman that got her living by the labor of her hands; and all the more so, because she fed but that one child; this she killed, and made ready its flesh, and set it before his servants and himself. So Saul came to the camp while it was night.

Now it is but just to recommend the generosity of this woman, 2 because when the king had forbidden her to use that art whence her circumstances were bettered and improved, and which she had learned from the king before, she still did not remember to his disadvantage that she had condemned her sort of learning, and did not refuse him as a stranger, and one that she had no acquaintance with; but she had compassion of him, and would not let him die, but that one child; this she killed, and made ready its flesh, and set it before his servants and himself. So Saul came to the camp while it was night.

This was the substance of the history of this unhappy day, and of his death. The Israelites were then taken, and not only was he made to die, but the queen of his house also, having been taken, was made to die. Now his death was not only the death of a king, but that of the glory of his family. For the idolatry of the Canaanites was not only a superstition, but also a reproach to the family of Saul. And the sight of his corpse was a reproach to all of them. And he was the first that had been sent to God, as he was an ancestor of Christ. And he was the last king that was to reign, as he was the last that was to be erected. And it was a type of the death of Christ, as he was the first to die. And it was a type of the resurrection of Christ, as he was the first to rise. And it was a type of the ascension of Christ, as he was the first to ascend.
6. Now when the Philistines, as I said before, had pitched their camp, and had taken an account of their forces, according to their nations, and kingdoms, and governments, King Achish came last of all with his own army; after whom came David with his six hundred armed men. And when the commanders of the Philistines saw him, they asked the king whence these Hebrews came, and, at whose invitation. He answered, that "It was David, who was fled away from Saul, and that now he was willing to make him a requital for his favors, and to avenge himself upon Saul, and so do a great deal of mischief by the advice of his commanders. I complained of this, that he had taken him for a confederate who was an enemy; and gave him counsel to send him away, lest he should answer for his habitation; that this was that David whom the virgins celebrated in their hymns, as having destroyed many ten thousands of the Philistines. When the king of Gath heard this, he thought that David was to be taken by Saul, and said, 'As for myself, I can bear witness that thou hast shown great diligence and kindness about me; and on that account it was that I took thee for my confederate; however, what I have done, I have done for thee and others of the Philistines; go therefore within a day's time to the place I have given thee, without suspecting any harm, and there keep my country, lest any of thee make an innovation upon it, which will be one part of that assistance which I expect from thee.' So David came to Ziklag, as the king of Gath bid him; but it happened, that while he was gone to the assistance of the Philistines, one of the Philistines had made an incursion, and taken Ziklag before, and had burnt it; and when he had taken a great deal of other prey out of that place, and out of the other parts of the Philistines' country, they deparred.

6. Now when David found that Ziklag was laid waste, and that it was all spoiled, and that as well his own wives, who were two, as the wives of his companions, with their children, were taken captive, and had made upon him a great confusion; he put on sackcloth, and weeping and lamenting, together with his friends; and indeed he was so cast down with these misfortunes, that at length tears themselves failed him. He was also in danger of being taken to death by his companions, who were greatly afflictcd at the captivity of their wives and children; for they laid the blame upon him of what had happened. But when he had recovered himself out of his grief, and had raised up his mind to God, he desired the high priest of the Abiathar to put on his sacerdotal garments, and to inquire of God, and to prophefy to him, 'Whether God would grant, that if he pursued after the Philistines, he should strike them in the head, and save their wives and their children, and avenge himself on the enemies.' And when the high priest bade him pursue after them, he marched before, with his six hundred men, after the way of the border of the Philistines; and that day he met with a certain man of the brook Besor, and had hit upon one that was wandering about, an Egyptian by birth, who was almost dead with want and famine, (for he had continued wandering about without food in the wilderness three days,) he first of all gave him sustenance, both meat and drink, and thereby refreshed him. He then asked him to whom he belonged, and whence he came? Whereupon the man told him he was an Egyptian by birth, and was left behind by his master, because he was so sick and weak that he could not follow him. He also informed him, that he was one of those that had burnt and plundered, not only other parts of Judah, but Ziklag itself also. So David made use of him a guide to find out the Amalekites; and when he had overtaken them, as they lay scattered about on the ground, some at dinner, some disordercd, and entirely drunk with wine, he left the fruit of the spoils of the cattle, he fell upon them on the sudden, and made a great slaughter among them, for they were naked, and expected no such thing, but had betaken themselves to drinking and feasting, and so had no other care except for themselves, that were overtaken as they lay at the table, were slain in that posture, and their blood brought up with it their meat and their drink. They slew others of them as they were drinking of the means evil and ugly, and that when their full bellies had made them fall asleep; and for so many as had time to put on all their armor, they slew them with the sword no less than they did those that were naked; and there was also the same story by the second day, and also the slaughter from the first hour of the day to the evening, so that there were not above four hundred of the Amalekites left, and they only escaped by getting upon their dromedaries and camels, and running away. And they carried all the spoils which the enemy had carried away, but his wives also, and the wives of his companions. But when they were come to the place where they had left the two hundred men, which were there to watch to take care of the stuff, the four hundred men did not think fit to divide among them any other parts of what they had gotten, or of the prey, since it was their opinion that they had intended to be feeble, and did not follow them in the pursuit of the enemy, but said, they should be contented to have safely recovered their wives; yet did David pronounce, that this opinion of theirs was evil and ugly, and that what God had granted them such a favor, that they had avenged themselves on their enemies, and had recovered all that belonged to themselves, they should make an equal distribution of what they had gotten on their account, because the means they had not been behind to guard their stuff; and from that time this law obtained among them, that those who guarded the stuff should receive an equal share with those that fought in the battle. Now when Saul the king of Israel, and his sons, fought courageously, and with the Philistines, and was defeated by them, and the spoils to all that had been familiar with him, and to his friends in the tribe of Judah. And thus ended the affair of the plundering of Ziklag, and of the slaughter of the Amalekites.

7. Now upon the death of Saul, and the choice of Jonathan, and of Abinadab, and Melchizee; and upon the death of Saul's sons, David was encouraged, and the Philistines were put to flight, and all was disorder and confusion, and slaughter, upon the Philistines pressing in upon them. But Saul himself fled, having a strong body of soldiers about him; and upon the Philistines seeing after him those that threw javelins and shot arrows, he lost all his company except a few; as for himself, if he fought with great bravery, and when he had received so many wounds, that he was not able to bear up, nor to oppose any longer, and yet was not able to kill himself, he bid his armor-bearer drive him into a castle, and therebetwixt, for his enemy should take him alive. But his armor-bearer not dreading to kill his master, he drew his own sword, and placing himself over against its point, and having armed himself, and then he could neither run it through him, nor by losing against it, make the sword pass through him, he turned him round, and asked a certain young man that stood by, who he was? and when he understood that he was an armorer, he desired him to force the sword through him, because he was not able to do it with his own hands, and thereby to procure him such a death as he desired. This the young man did accordingly; and he took the golden belt that was on Saul’s arm, and his royal crown that was on his head, and ran away. And when Saul’s armor-bearer saw that he was slain, he killed himself; nor did any of the king’s guards escape, but they all fell upon the mountain called Gilboa. But then those Hebrews that dwelt in the valley beyond Jordan, and those who had their cities in the plain, heard that Saul and his sons were fallen, and that the multitude about them were destroyed. The king’s guards therefore, that were the best fortified and fenced; and the Philistines finding those cities deserted, came and dwelt in them.

3. On the next day, when the Philistines came to strip their enemies that were slain, they got the bodies of Saul and of his sons, and stripped them, and cut off their heads; and they sent messengers all about their country, to acquaint them of speaking in Josephus, of fasting seven days without meat, or that on this day is almost like that of St. Paul’s, Acts xxvi. 33. “This is the fourth day that ye have tarried and continued fasting, having taken nothing; and as the nature of the thing, and the impossibility of strictly fasting so long, I have no doubt but that both Josephus and the sacred author of this history, 1 Sam. xvi. 23, from whence it took it, of only fasting till the evening; so must we understand St. Paul, either that this was the fourth day of their tempestuous weather in the Adriatic Sea, as verse 27, or that on this day was almost like that of St. Paul’s, Acts xxvi. 33. “This is the fourth day that ye have tarried and continued fasting, having taken nothing; and as the nature of the thing, and the impossibility of strictly fasting so long, I have no doubt but that both Josephus and the sacred author of this history, 1 Sam. xvi. 23, from whence it took it, of only fasting till the evening; so must we understand St. Paul, either that this was the fourth day of their them that their enemies were fallen; and they dedicated their armor in the temple of Ashtaroth, but hung those bodies on crosses at the walls of the city of Bethshan, which is now called Scythopolis. But when the inhabitants of Jabez Gilead heard that they had disembowelled the dead bodies of Saul and of his sons, they deemed it so horrid a thing to overlook this barbarity, and to suffer them to be without funeral rites, that: the most courageous and hardy among them (and indeed that city had in it men that were very stout, but of hand and in body) journeyed all night, and came to Bethshan, and approached to the enemy’s wall, and taking down the bodies of Saul and of his sons, they carried them to Jabez, while the enemy were not able enough to hinder them, but to bear them with great courage. So the people of Jabez wept all in general, and buried their bodies in the best place of their country, which was named Arorats; and they observed a public mourning for them seven days, with their wives and children, beating their breasts, and lamenting the king and his sons, without either tasting meat or drink till the evening.”

9. To this sad and did Saul come, according to the prophetic word, because he disobeyed the commands of God about the Amalekites, and on the account of his destroying the family of Aimelech the high priest, with Aimelech himself, and the city of the high priests. Now Saul, when he had reigned eighteen years, while Samuel was alive, and after his death [two and twenty] ended his life in this manner.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF FORTY YEARS.—FROM THE DEATH OF SAUL TO THE DEATH OF DAVID.

CHAP. I.

How David reigned over one Tribe at Hebron, while the son of Saul reigned over the rest of the Multitude; and how in the civil War, which then arose, Asael and Abner were slain.

1. This fight proved to be on the same day wherein David was come back to Ziklag, after he had overcome the Amalekites. Now it was, that he had already two days at Ziklag there came to him the man who slew Saul, which was the third day after the fight. He had escaped out of the battle in which the Amalekites, with the Philistines, and had his clothes rent, and naked upon his head. And when he had made his obeisance to David, he inquired of him whence he came. He replied, from the battle of the morning, and that they had been to Hebron, and was with the king when he fled. Nor did he deny that he had himself slain the king, when he was ready to be taken by the enemy, and he himself exhorted him to do it, because the king was his master. And his great wounds had made him so weak that he was not able to kill himself. He also produced demonstrations that the king was slain, which were the golden bracelets that had been on the king’s arms, and his crown, which he had taken away from him, and his body, and his blood upon his sword.

2. Now when David had paid them honors to the king, he left off his mourning; and it was said of God by the prophet, which of the cities of the tribe of Judah he would bestow upon him to dwell in? Who answered, that he bestowed upon him Hebron. So he left Ziklag, and came to Hebron, and took with him his wives, who were in number two, and his armed men; where-upon all the people of the forementioned tribe came to him, and ordained him their king. But when he heard that the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead had buried Saul and his sons, [honorably.] he sent to them and commended them, and took what they had done kindly, and promised to take them and their sons for their wives if their sons were dead; and at the same time he informed them, that the tribe of Judah had chosen him for their king.

3. But as soon as Abner, the son of Ner, who was the captain of Saul's army, a very active man, and good-natured, knew that the king, and Jonathan, and his two other sons, were fallen in the battle, he made haste into the camp; and taking away with him the remaining son of Saul, and catching one another by the head, they held land beyond Jordan, and ordained him the king of the whole multitude, excepting the tribe of Judah; and made his royal seat in a place called in our own language Mahanaim, but in the language of the enemies, The Camp, from whence Abner made haste with a select body of soldiers, to fight with such of the tribe of Judah as were disposed to it, for he was angry that this tribe had not joined with him against his king, whose father was Suri, and his mother Zeruiah, David's sister, who was general of David's army, met him, according to David's appointment. He had with him his brethren Abishai and Asahel, as also all David's armed men. Now when he met Abner at a certain fountain, in the city of Gibeon, he prepared to fight. And when Abner said to him, that he had a mind to know which of them had the most valiant soldiers, it was agreed between them, that the two armies should fight together. So those that were chosen out by both the generals for this fight, came between the two armies, and throwing their lances one against the other, they drew their swords, and casting one another by the head, they held one another fast, and ran each other's swords into their sides and groins, until they all, as it were by mutual agreement, perished together. When these were fallen down dead, the rest of the men gave battle to each other, and Abner and his men were beaten; and when they were beaten, Joab did not leave off pursuing them, but he pressed upon them, and excited the soldiers to follow them close, and not to grow weary of killing them, and pursuit with great alacrity, and especially the younger, Asahel, who was the most eminent of them. He was very famous for his swiftness of foot, for he could not only be too hard for men, but is reported to have overtaken a horse, when they had a race together. This Asahel ran violently after Abner, and would not turn in the least out of the straight way, either to the one side or to the other. Hereupon the Abner turned back, and attempted artificially to avoid his violence. Sometimes he bade him leave off the pursuit, and take the armor of one of his soldiers; and sometimes, when he could not persuade him so to do, he exhorted him to cease to kindle off, and not to pursue him and injure him; lest he should force him to kill him, and he should then not be able to look his brother in the face. But when Asahel would not admit of any persuasion, but still continued to pursue him, Abner, taking him by the neck with his sword, struck him on his hip, and gave him a deadly wound, so that he died immediately; but those that were with him pursuing Abner, when they came to the place where Asahel lay, they stood round about the dead body, and those six hundred heads of the Philistines which he had brought to Saul her father. So Abner took Micaiah from Haltai, who was then her husband, and sent her to David, Ishboiboth himself affording him his assistance, for David had written to him that of right he ought to have this his wife restored to him. Abner also called together the elders of the multitude, the commanders, and captains of thousands, and spake thus to them: that, "he had formerly persuaded them from their own resolution when they were ready to forsake Ishboiboth, and to join themselves to David; this he did not in the least oppose what he said, but resigned themselves up to his opinion, he took about twenty of his friends, and came to David, in order to receive himself security upon oath from him to abandon the court of the Philistines, to be firmer, which every one of us do by ourselves, than those which we do by another. He also gave him an account of what he had said to the rulers, and to the whole tribe of Benjamin. And when David had received him with much favor, and had treated him with great hospitality for many days, Abner, when he was dismissed, desired him to permit him to bring the multitude of Israel under the right decrees of the government to him when David himself was present, and a spectator of what was done.

*It ought here to be noted, that Joab, and Abishai, and Asahel, were all three David's nephews, the sons of his sister Zeruiah, as 1 Chron. II. 6; and that Amasa was also his nephew by his other sister Abigail, var. 17.
BOOK VII.—CHAP. I.

5. When David had sent Abner away, Joab the general of his army, came immediately to Hebron, and when he had assailed, and said that Abner had been with David, and had parted with him a little before, under leagues and agreements that the government should be delivered up to David, he feared lest David should place Abner, who was worth the king himself, in the first rank of dignity, especially since he was a shrewd man in other respects, in understanding affairs, and in managing them artfully, as proper sensers should require, and that he should himself be hardened, and that this wicked Abner, beside the multitude of the army; so he took a knavish and wicked course. In the first place, he endeavored to calumniate Abner to the king, exhorting him to a care of him, and not to give attention to what he had engaged to do for him, because he all did tend to confirm the government to Saul's son; that he came to him deceitfully, and with guile, and was gone away in hopes of gaining his purpose by this management. But the king not only caused others to be asked after what he had done, but the death of Hushai; nor saw him at all exasperated, he betook himself to a project bolder than the former. He determined to kill Abner; and in order thereto he sent for his messengers, and gladdened the mind of Abner, when he gave him in charge, that when they should overtake him, they should recall him in David's name, and tell him that he had somewhat to say to him about his affairs, which he had not remembered, and caused others to write it to him, which was showed to him when Abner heard what the messengers said, (for they overtook him in a certain place called Beers, which was distant from Hebron twenty furlongs,) he suspected none of the mischief which he was about to do to himself; and as when he heard of the Heretian Joab met him in the gate, and received him in the kindliest manner, as if he were Abner's most benemcident acquaintance and friend; for such as undertake the vilest actions, in order to prevent the suspicion of private mischief intended, do frequently make the greatest pretences to what really good men sincerely do. So he took him aside from his own followers, as if he would speak with him in private, and brought him to a void place of the gate, having himself nobody with him but his brother Abishai; then he drew his sword, and smote him in the grove, upon which Abner died by this treachery of Joab's, which, as he said himself, was in the way of punishment for his help in THAT Abner smote and slew as he was pursuing after him in the battle of Hebron, but as the truth was, out of his fear of losing his command of the army, and his dignity with the king, and lest he should be deprived of those advantages, and Abner should obtain the first rank in David's court. By these examples any one may learn, how many and how great instances of wickedness men will use to obtain the same, by ten thousand evil practices, so when they are afraid of losing their command of the army, they get it by practices much worse than the former, as if [so] other calamity so terrible could befall them as the failure of acquiring so exalted an authority, and when they have acquired it, and by long custom found the sweetness of its possession again; and since this last would be the heaviest of all afflictions, they all of them contrive and venture upon the most difficult actions, out of the fear of losing the same. But let it suffice that I have made these short reflections upon that subject.

6. When David heard that Abner was slain, it grieved his soul; and he called all men to witness, with stretching out his hands to God, and crying out, the reproach of this wicked Joab, the son of Zeruiah, the son of Abishai, the son of Naamah, the son of David, over Abner, and that his death was not procured by his command or approbation. He also wished the heaviest curses might light upon him that slew him, and upon his whole house, and that he should be deprived of the dignity which was given to him, and that he should go before the bier, after which he followed it himself, with the elders and those that were rulers, lamenting Abner, and by his tears demonstrating his good-will to him while he was alive, and his sorrow to him now he was dead, and that he was not taken off with his consent. So he buried him at Hebron, in a magnificent manner, and indited funeral elegies for him: he also stood first over the monument weeping, and caused others to weep with him, and order all that should attend the death of Abner disorder him, that his companions could by no means force him to take any food, for he affirmed with an oath that he would not eat till he saw the face of Joab, and that he, the surest gained him the good-will of the multitude; for such as had an affection for Abner were mightily satisfied with the respect he paid him when he was dead, and the observation of that faith he had kept with him when he lived, and was showed in his vouchsafing him all the usual ceremonies as if he had been his kinsman and his friend, and not suffering him to be neglected and injured with a diabolous burial, as if he had been his enemy; in which that practice was rejoiced at the king's gentlemess and mildness of disposition, every one being ready to suppose that the king would have taken the same care of them in the like circumstances, which they saw he took of the burial of the dead body of Abaser. And indeed David principally intended to gain a good reputation, and therefore he took care to do what was proper in this case; whereas none had any suspicion that he was the author of Abaser's death. He also said this to the multitude, that he was greatly troubled at the death of so good a man; and that the affairs of the Hebrews had suffered great detriment by being devoid of him, who was of so great abilities to preserve them by his excellent advice, and by the strength of his hands in war. But he added, that God, who hath a regard to all men's actions, will not suffer this man (Josab) to go off unreproved; but know ye, that I am not able to do any thing to these sons of Zeruiah, Josab and Abshai, who have more power than I have, but God will require their insolent attempts upon their own heads: and this was the fatal conclusion of the life of Abaser.

CHAP. II.

That upon the Slaughter of Ishbosheth by the Treachery of his friends, David received the whole Kingdom.

1. WHEN Ishbosheth the son of Saul had heard of the death of Abaser, he took it to heart to exact vengeance on Josab, and to avenge the death of his kindred, and had indeed given him the kingdom, but was greatly afflicted, and Abaser's death very much troubled him; nor did he himself outlive any long time, but was treacherously set upon by the sons of Saul, and had his life taken from him, and slain by them; for these being of a family of the Benjamites, and of the first rank among them, thought that if they should slay Ishbosheth, they should obtain large promises, and pay dearly for his life, and slay him; or, however, should have some other trust committed to them. So when they once found him alone asleep at noon, in an upper room, when none of his guards were there, and the woman that kept the door was not watching, but was fallen asleep also, partly on account of the labor she had undergone, and partly on account of the heat of the day, these men went in, and slew him. By which means, as Saul's son, lay asleep, and slew him; they also cut off his head, and took their journey all that night, and the next day, as supposing themselves flying away from those they had injured, to one that was not of the same blood; as a favor, and that would afford them security. So they came to Hebron, and showed David the head of Ishbosheth, and presented themselves to him as his well-wishers, and such as had killed one that was his enemy and antagonist.—Yet David did not relish what they had done as they expected, but said to them, You vile wretches, you shall immediately receive the punishment you deserve. Did not you know what vengeance I executed on him that murdered Saul, and brought me his crown of gold, and this while he who made this slaughter did it as a favor to him, that he might not be caught by his enemies? Or do you imagine that I will suffer this to be done with impunity? That is, that I am not the same I then was, but am pleased with men that are wicked doers, and esteem your vile actions, when you are become murderers of your master, as grateful to me, when I am a right man, upon myself, who was a bad, who never did evil to any body, and treated you with great good will and respect? Wherefore you shall suffer the punishment due to an assassin, and be hanged in the burial of the dead body of Abaser. And indeed David principally intended to gain a good reputation, and therefore he took care to do what was proper in this case; whereas none had any suspicion that he was the author of Abaser's death. He also said this to the multitude, that he was greatly troubled at the death of so good a man; and that the affairs of the Hebrews had suffered great detriment by being devoid of him, who was of so great abilities to preserve them by his excellent advice, and by the strength of his hands in war. But he added, that God, who hath a regard to all men's actions, will not suffer this man (Josab) to go off unreproved; but know ye, that I am not able to do any thing to these sons of Zeruiah, Josab and Abshai, who have more power than I have, but God will require their insolent attempts upon their own heads: and this was the fatal conclusion of the life of Abaser.

2. When these things were brought to the conclusion, all the principal men of the Hebrew people came to David to Hebron with the head of thousands, and other rulers, and delivered themselves up to him, to prevent the good-will they had borne to him in Saul's lifetime, and the respect they then had not ceased to pay him when he was captain of a thousand as also that he was chosen of God as his prophet, he and his sons, and declaring besides, how God had given him power to save the land of the Hebrews, and to overcome the Philistines. Whereupon he received kindly this their sincerity and resolution, and exhorted them to come in it, for that they should have no reason to repent of being thus disposed to him. So when he had feasted them, and treated them kindly, he sent them out to bring all the people to him. When they came together, he censured the number of the tribe of Judah, who bare shields and spears for their weapons, for these had [still now] continued with Saul's son, when the rest of the tribe of Judah were cut off. There were also seven thousand and one hundred out of the tribe of Simeon. Out of the tribe of Levi came four thousand and seven hundred, having Jehoshua for their leader. After these came Zadok, with twenty-two captains of his kindred. Out of the tribe of Benjamin the armed men were four thousand, but the rest of the tribe continued, still expecting that some one of the house of Saul should reign over them. Those of the tribe of Ephraim were twenty thousand and eight hundred, and these mighty men of valor, and eminent for their strength. Out of the half tribe of Manasseh came eight thousand and five hundred. Out of the tribe of Issachar came two hundred, who foreknew what was to come hereafter, but of armed men twenty thousand. Of the tribe of Zebedon they were chosen men. This was the only tribe that made David a favor, and that would afford them security. So they came to Hebron, and showed David the head of Ishbosheth, and presented themselves to him as his well-wishers, and such as had killed one that was his enemy and antagonist.—Yet David did not relish what they had done as they expected, but said to them, You vile wretches, you shall immediately receive the punishment you deserve. Did not you know what vengeance I executed on him that murdered Saul, and brought me his crown of gold, and this while he who made this slaughter did it as a favor to him, that he might not be caught by his enemies? Or do you imagine that I will suffer this to be done with impunity? That is, that I am not the same I then was, but am pleased with men that are wicked doers, and esteem your vile actions, when you are become murderers of your master, as grateful to me, when I am a right man, upon myself, who was a bad, who never did evil to any body, and treated you with great good will and respect? BOOK VII—CHAP. III. IV.

CHAP. III.

How David laid Siege to Jerusalem; and when he had taken the city, cast the Canaanites out of it, and brought in the Jews to inhabit therein.

1. Now the Jebusites, who were the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and were by extraction Canaanites, shut their gates, and placed the blind, and the lame, and all their maimed persons, upon the wall, in way of derision of the king; and said, that the Jebusites themselves were ready to defend it into unto it. This they did out of contempt of his power, and as depending on the strength of their walls. David was hereby enraged, and began the siege of Jerusalem, and employed his utmost diligence and alacrity in proceeding by the taking of this place to demonstrate his power, and to intimidate all others that might be of the like [evil] disposition towards him: so he took the lower city by force, but the citadel held out, still to the Jews to him; and made a league that the proposal of dignities and rewards would encourage the soldiers to greater actions, promised that he who should first go over the ditches that were beneath the citadel, and should ascend over the wall in the sight of the command of the entire people conferred upon him. So they all were ambitious to ascend, and thought no pains too great in order to ascend thither; to the desire of their chief command. However the son of Zeruiah prevented the rest; and as soon as he was got up to the citadel, cried out to the king, and claimed the chief command.

2. When David had cast the Jebusites out of the citadel, he also rebuilt Jerusalem, and named it: 'The City of David,' and abode there all the time of his reign. But for the time that he reigned over the tribe of Judah only in Hebron, it was seven and six months. Now he had chosen Jerusalem to be his royal city, his affairs did more and more prosper, by the providence of God, who took care that they should improve and be augmented. Hiram also, the king of the Tyrians, shut seclusion to him; and made a league of mutual friendship and assistance with him. He also sent him presents, cedar trees and mechanics, and men skilful in building and architecture, that they might make it a royal city. Now David made buildings round about the lower city: he also joined the citadel to it, and made it one body: and when he had encompassed all with walls, he appointed Joab to take care of them. It was David, therefore, who first cast the Jebusites out of Jerusalem, and called it by his own name, The City of David; for our forefather Abraham it was called [Salem or] Solyma; but after that time some say that Homer mentions it by the name of Solyma. [For he named the temple Solyma, according to the Hebrew language, which signifieth Security.] Now the whole time from the warfare under Joshua our general against the Canaanites, and from that war in which he overcame them, and distributed the land among the Hebrews, (nor could the Canaanites ever expel the Canaanites out of Jerusalem until this time, when David took it by siege,) this whole time was five hundred and fifteen years.

3. I shall now make mention of Ananias, who was a wealthy man among the Jebusites, but was not slain by David in the siege of Jerusalem, because of the good will he bore to the Hebrews, and a particular benignity and affection which he had to the king himself. The matter of a more seasonable opportunity to speak of a little afterward. Now David married other wives over and above those which he had before: he had also concubines. The sons whom he had were in number eleven, whose names were Solomon, Nathan, Sheba, Eglon, Eliada, Elior, Eliphale, and a daughter, Tamar. Nine of these were born of legitimate wives, but the two last named of concubines: and Tamar had the same mother with Absalom.

CHAP. IV.

That when David had conquered the Philistines, who made War against him at Jerusalem, he removed the Ark to Jerusalem, and had a mind to build a Temple.

1. Where the Philistines understood that David was made king of the Hebrews, they made war against him at Jerusalem; and when they had seized upon that valley which is called the valley of the Giants, and is a place not far from the city, they pitched their camp there. But the king of the Jews, who never permitted himself to do anything without prophecy, and the command of God, and without depending on him, as a security, to give him the high priest formerly to him what was the will of God, and what would be the event of this battle. And when he foretold that he should gain the victory, and the dominion, he led his army out after best agree to what Josephus says elsewhere, Of the War, b. vi. ch. z.; that this city was called Salome or Sela before the days of Melchisedek, but was by him called Hierosilyma or Jerusalem. I rather suppose it to have been so called after Abraham had received that oracle Jehov. Jireh, 'The Lord will see or provide,' Gen. xiii. 14. The letter word, which I still retained, prefixed to the old name Salome, Sela, will be Jerusalem. And since that expression, 'God will see,' or rather, 'God will provide himself a Lamb for a burnt-offering,' ver. 10., to have been literalized, and applied to the Hebrews till the days of Moses, this seems to me the most probable derivation of that name, which will then denote, that 'God would provide peace by that Lamb of God, which was to take away the sins of the world.' However, that which is put into double brackets can hardly be supposed to be the genuine words of Josephus, as Dr. Hudson well judges.

It deserves here to be remarked, that Euseb. very rarely, and David very frequently, consulted God by Urim; and that David aimed always to depend, not on his own prudence or abilities, but on the divine direction, contrary to the express prohibition of Deut. xxiii. 4; 30. See note on Ant. b. vii. ch. viii. sect. 9. And when Saul's daughter (but David's wife), Michal, laughed at David's dancing before the Lord, 1 Sam. xvi. 19; she was not only stoned to death, but also her father did not use to pay such regard to the ark, to the Urim there inquired by, or to God's worship before it, and became she thought it beneath the dignity of a king to be so religious.
NOTH a priest, and yet touched the ark, God struck him dead. Hereupon both the king and the people were displeased at the death of Uzzah; and they all rose to fight. And no one supposed that it was a small army of the Philistines that came against the Hebrews, as guessing so from the suddenness of their defeat, and from their having performed no great action, or that was a proof of their superior force. But the Battle of their march and want of courage; but let him know that all Syria and Phenicia, with many other nations besides them, and those warlike nations also, came to their assistance, and had a share in this battle. The ark, which was the cause why they were so often conquered, and had lost so many ten thousands of their men, they still came upon the Hebrews with greater armies; nay, indeed, when they had so often failed of their purpose in these battles, they came upon David with an army three times as numerous as before, and pitched their camp on the same spot of ground as before. The king of Israel therefore, and the Levites, in order to their going out of the battle; and the high priest prophesied to him that he should keep his army in the groves, called the Groves of Weeping, which were not far from the enemy’s camp, and that he should not go out to fight. And the reason of this was, that the ark should be in motion without the wind’s blowing; but as soon as these trees moved, and the time foretold to him by God was come, he should without delay go out to gain, what was already won. But by this, it was for this, several ranks of the enemy’s army did not sustain him, but retreated at the first onset, whom he closely followed, and slew them as he went along; and pursued them to the city of Gaza, (which is the limit of their country;) after this he spoiled their camp, in which he found great riches; and he destroyed their gods.

3. But when Michael his wife, the daughter of Saul, came and stood by him, she wished him all other things, but that he should not go out to fight. And he said, "Why thus, my lord king? for I should farther desire, to the utmost possibility, might be given him by God, and that he might be favorable to him; yet did she blame him, and said, did not he mean, after an unseemly manner, and in his dancing uncover himself among the servants and the handmaids. But he replied, “That he was not ashamed to do what was acceptable to God, and that he had done what he had done for all others; that he would pray frequently, and dance, without any regard to what the handmaids and she herself thought of it." So this Michal had no children; however, when she was afterwards married to him to whom Saul, the father of David, had given her, (for at this time David had taken her away from him, and had her himself,) she bare five children. But concerning those matters I shall discourse in a proper place.

1 Chronicles 13:1-9

+ Josephus seems to be partly in the right, when he observes here, that Uzzah was no priest, (though perhaps he might be a Levite,) and was therefore stricken dead for touching the ark, contrary to the law, and for which profane rashness, death was the penalty by the law, Num. iv. 15, 25; see the like before, Antiqu. v. c. l. Law. xxxvii. 1. Now we observe the ark, they brought it out of the house of Aminadab, and laid it upon a new cart, and permitted their brethren and their children to draw it, together with the oxen. Before it went the king and the whole multitude of the people with him, singing by heart the songs of God, and making use of all sorts of songs usual among them, with variety of the sounds of musical instruments, and with dancing and singing of psalms, with the sound of trumpets and of cymbals, and so brought the ark to Jerusalem. But as they were come to the threshing-floor of Chidon, a place so called, Uzzah was slain by the anger of God; for as the oxen shook the cart, and out of his hand, and would not needs take hold of it. Now because he was been encouraged by him to do whatsoever he had a mind to do, as having God with him, and his help? He would have been more ready to set about that building. But God appeared to Nathan that very night, and commanded him to say to David, "That he took his purpose and his desires kindly, since nobody had before now taken it into their head to build him a temple, although upon his having such a notion he would not permit him to build him that temple, because he had made many wars, and was defiled with the slaughter of his enemies: that however he would do his will, and be his help, and bless him, and when he had lived a long life, there should be a temple built by a son of his, who should take the kingdom after him, and should be called Solomon, whom he promised to provide for, as a father in compliance with the wishes of his children, thanks to him for all his benefits, as well for those that he had already bestowed upon him in raising him from a low state, and from the employment of a shepherd, to so great dignity of dominion. He is excellent of all his predecessors, thanks to him for all his benefits, as well for those that he had already bestowed upon him in raising him from a low state, and from the employment of a shepherd, to so great dignity of dominion. He is excellent of all his predecessors, for the providence which he had exercised over the Hebrews in procuring them the liberty they enjoyed: and when he had said thus, and had sung a hymn of praise to God, he went his way.

CHAP. V.

How David brought under the Philistines, and the Moabites, and the Kings of Sophene, and of Damascus, and of the Syrians, as also the Medesmen, in War; and how he made a League with the King of Hamath; and was mindful of the Friendship that Jonathan, the Son of Saul, had borne to him.

1. A LITTLE while after this, he considered that he ought to make war against the Philistines, and not to see any idleness or lassiness permitted in his kingdom, but that the kingdom as God had foretold to him, that when he had overthrown his enemies, he should leave his posteriority to reign in peace afterward; so he called together his army again, and he caused them to be prepared for war, and when he thought that all things in his army were in a good state, he removed from Jere-salem, and came against the Philistines; and when he had overcome them in battle, and had cut off a great part of their country and adjoined it to the country of the Heereus, he transferred the war to the Moabites; and when he had overcome two parts of their army in the battle, he took their wives, and their children, and their spoil, to be paid annually. He then made war against Hadadzer, the son of Rehob, king of Sophene; and when he had joined battle with her commands to build such a temple presently, ch. xiv. sect. 5, contrary to our other copies, &cr at least to our translation of the Hebrew, 2 Sam. vii. 6, 7; 1 Chron. xvii. 11.

*Josephus seems, in this place, with our modern Interpreters, to confound the two distinct predictions which refer to Solomon. They are distinct. The one is, building him a temple by one of David's posterity, the other belonging to Solomon, the other to the Medesmen; the distinction between the two is the greatest consequence to the Christian religion.

†David's reserving only 100 chariots for himself out of those he had taken from Hadadzer, was most probbly done to comply with the law of Moses, which "made a king of Israel to multiply horses to him-him at the river Euphrates, he destroyed twenty thousand of his footmen, and about seven thousand and of his horsemen. He also took about a thousand of his chariots, and destroyed the greatest part of them, and ordered that no more than one hundred should be kept.‡

2. Now when Hadas, king of Damascus and of Syria, heard that David fought against Hadadzer, who was his friend, he came to his assistance with a powerful army, in hopes to rescue him; and when he had joined battle with David at the river Euphrates, he failed of his purpose, and lost in this battle the greatest part of his soldiers; for there were slain of the army of Had-ad twenty thousand, and all the rest fled. Nicolaus also of Damascus makes mention of this king, in the fourth book of his histories; where he speaks thus: "A great while after these things had happened, there was one of that country whose name was Hadas, who was become very potent; he reigned over Damascus, and the other parts of that land, excepting Phoenicia, and had made war against David, the king of Judea, and tried his fortune in many battles, and particularly in the last battle at Euphrates, wherein he was beaten. He seemed to have been the most powerful of his time, in his kingdom for his son's posterity, and delivering it to them; but that he would still punish him if he sinned, with diseases and barrenness of land." When David understood this from the prophet, and was overjoyed at this knowledge of the sure continuance of the dominion to his posterity, and that his house should be splendid, and very famous he came to the ark, and fell down on his face before it, and blessed God, and said, "He is excellent of all his predecessors, thanks to him for all his benefits, as well for those that he had already bestowed upon him in raising him from a low state, and from the employment of a shepherd, to so great dignity of dominion. He is excellent of all his predecessors, thanks to him for all his benefits, as well for those that he had already bestowed upon him in raising him from a low state, and from the employment of a shepherd, to so great dignity of dominion. He is excellent of all his predecessors, thanks to him for all his benefits, as well for those that he had already bestowed upon him in raising him from a low state, and from the em-

of the ill success of Hadadeser, and had heard of the ruin of his army, he was afraid on his own account, and resolved to make a league of friendship and fidelity with David before he should come for whom he sent to him his son Joaram, and professed that he owed him thanks for his fighting against Hadadeser, who was his enemy, and made a league with him of mutual assistance and friendship. He also sent him present, which delighted him, both of gold, of silver, and of brass. So when David had made this league of mutual assistance with Toi, (for that was the name of the king of Hamath,) and had received the presents he sent him, he changed his heart toward him, which was due on both sides. But then David brought those presents that were sent by him, as also the rest of the gold and silver which he had taken of the Ammonites, and dedicated them to God. Nor did God give victory and success to him only when he went to the battle himself, and led his own army, but he gave victory to Abishai, the brother of Joab, and gave him many thousands of enemies, and by him to David, when he sent him with an army into Idumea; for Abishai destroyed eighteen thousand of them in the battle; whereupon the king [of Israel] placed garrisons throughout all Idumea, and the tribute of the country, and of every head among them. Now David was in his nature just, and made his determination with regard to truth. He had for the general of his whole army Joab; and he made Jehoshaphat, the son of Nun, his admiral. He also showed how much he prized Zadok, of the family of Phineas, to be high priest, together with Abiathar, for he was his friend. He also made Seissa the scribe; and committed the command over the guards of his bedchambers to the son of Jehoida. His eldest sons were near his body, and had the care of it also.

5. He also called to mind the covenants and the promises he had made with Jonathan, the son of Saul, and the friendship and affection Jonathan had for him; for besides all the rest of his excellent qualities with which he was endowed, he was also exceeding mindful of such as had at other times deserted him, and he gave Jonathan good things. He therefore gave order that inquiry should be made, whether any of Jonathan's lineages were living, to whom he might make return of that familiar acquaintance which Jonathan had had with him, and for which he was still deeply obliged. And when one of Saul's freemen was brought to him, who was acquainted with those of his family that were still living, he asked him, "Whether he could tell him of any one belonging to Jonathan that was now alive, and capable of a requital of the benefits which he had received from Jonathan?" And when he said, "That a son of his was remaining, whose name was Mephiboseth, but that he was lame of his feet; for that when his nurse heard that the father and grandfather of the child were fallen in the battle, she snatched him up, and fled away, and let him fall from her shoulders, and his feet were lamed." So when he heard these words and knew that he was brought up, he sent messengers to Machir, to the city of Lodebar, for with him was the son of Joathan brought up, and sent him to come to him. So when Mephiboseth came to the king, he sent amongst all his servants for Ziba, and bid him, but David encouraged him, and bid him of good cheer, and expect better times. So he gave him his father's house, and all the estate which his grandfather Saul was in possession of, and besides him came and jest with him at own table, and never to be absent one day from the seat table. And when the youth had worshipped him on account of his words and gifts given to him, he called for Ziba, and told him, that he had given the youth the father's house, and all Saul's estate. He also ordered that Ziba should cultivate his land, and take care of it, and bring him the profits of all to Jerusalem. Accordingly, David brought him to his table every day, and set him at his right hand, who were in number fifteen, and his servants, who were in number twenty. When the king had made these appointments, and Ziba had worshipped him, and promised to do all that he had bid him; and the king left of Jonathan dwelt at Jerusalem, and dined at the king's table, and had the same care taken of him that a son could claim. He also had himself a son, whom he named Michah.

CHAP. VI.
How the War was waged against the Ammonites, and happily concluded.

1. These were the honors that such as were of Saul's and Jonathan's lineages received from David. About this time died Nahash, the king of the Ammonites, who was a friend to the house of David, and was a son of his father in the kingdom, David sent ambassadors to him to comfort him; and exhorted him to take his father's death patiently, and to expect that he would continue the same kindness to his house as his father had. The princes of the Ammonites took this message in evil part, and not as David's kind dispositions gave reason to take it; and they excited the king to resent it, and said, that David had sent men to his father, to take and share his kingdom. And they had, under the pretense of humanity and kindness. They farther advised him to have a care, and not to give heed to David's words, lest he should be induced to forget the great wrong he had done. And when the princes of the Ammonites spoke what was more probable than the truth would admit, and so abused the ambassadors after a very harsh manner; for he shared the one half of their beards, and cut off one half of their garments, and sent his answer not in words but in deeds. When the king of Israel saw this, he had indignation at it, and showed openly that he had punished the king of the Ammonites. And when he had sent ten thousand men to the king of the Ammonites, and that king had twenty thousand footmen. They also hired the king of the country, called Macah, and a fourth king, by name Ish-tob; which last had,

2. But David was under no constellation at this confederacy, nor at the forces of the Ammon-ites; and putting his trust in God, because he was going to war in a just cause, on account of the death of Saul and his house, and that Zib-all of them together, but in two bodies: for the auxiliaries were set in array in the plain by themselves, but the army of the Ammonites at the gates over against the Hebrews. When Joab saw this, he opposed one stratagem against another, and said to his captains of his rear, and set them in opposition to the king of Syria, and the kings that were with him, and gave the other part to his brother Abishai, and bade him set them in opposition to the Ammonites, and said to him, "But if it be so long as they stand against thee, and stand not off of their own accord; see that the Syrians distress him, and are too hard for him, he should order his troops to turn about and assist him;" and he said, "he himself would do the same to him, if he saw him in the same case." So he sent brother to brother, and encouraged him to do every thing courageously and with sincerity, which would teach them to be afraid of disgrace, and to fight manfully; and so he dismissed him to fight with the Ammonites, while he fell upon the Syrians. And though they made a strong opposition for a while, Joab slew many of them, and compelled the rest to betake themselves to flight; which, when the Ammonites saw, and were pressed by Joab in the same manner, they stood no longer, but imitated their auxiliaries, and fled to the city. So Joab, when he had thus overcome the enemy, returned with great joy to Jerusalem.

3. Still this defeat did not induce the Ammonites to be quiet, nor to acknowledge as superior to them those who were so, but they sent to Chal- elaman the king of the Syrians, beyond Ephraim, and hired him for an auxiliary. He had Shoba for the captain of his host, with eighty thousand footmen, and ten thousand horsemen. Now, when the king of the Hebrews understood that the Ammonites had again gathered so great an army together, he drew them up with them no longer by his generals, but he passed over the river Jordan himself with all his army; and when he met them he joined battle with them, and overcame them, and slew forty thousand of their footmen, and seven thousand of their horsemen. He also wounded Shobach, the general of Chalaman's forces, who died of that stroke; but the people of Mesopotamia, upon such a conclusion of the battle, delivered their cities up, that they might not be destroyed, and set them on fire; and who at winter-time returned to Jerusalem. But at the beginning of the spring he sent Joab, the captain of his host, to fight against the Ammonites; who overran all the country, and laid it waste, and shut them up in their metropolis Rab- bab, and besieged them therein.

CHAP. VII.

How David fell in love with Bathsheba, and slew her husband Uriah, for which he is reproved by Nathan.

1. But David fell now into a very grievous sin, though he were otherwise naturally a righteous and religious man, and one that fairly observed the laws of our fathers: for when late in an evening he took a view round him from the roof of his royal palace, where he used to walk at that season, and came to observe herself in her own house; she was one of extraordinary beauty, and therein surpassed all other women; her name was Bathsheba. So he was overcome by his woman's persuasive words, and to restrain his desires, but sent for her, and lay with her. Hereupon she conceived with child, and sent to the king, that he should contrive some way for concealing her sin, (for according to the laws of their fathers, she, who had been guilty of adultery, ought to be put to death.) So the king sent for Joab's armor-bearer from the siege, who was the woman's husband; and his name was Uriah: and when he came the king inquired of him about the army, and about the siege, and when he had made answer, that all their affairs went according to their wishes, the king took some portions of meat from his supper and gave them to him, and bade him go home to his house, that he might rest and refresh himself. But Uriah did not do so, but slept near the king, with the rest of his armor-bearers. When the king was informed of this, he asked him why he did not go home to his house, and to his wife, after the custom of all men, when they come from a long journey. He replied, that it was not right, while his fel- low-soldiers, and the general of the army, slept upon the ground, in the camp, and in an enemy's country, that he should rest in the palace, and solace himself with his wife. So when he had thus replied, the king ordered him to stay there that night, that he might dispute him the next day to the general. So the king invited Uriah to the supper, and after a seeming and dexterous manner plied him with drink at supper, till he was thereby disordered; yet did he nevertheless sleep at the king's gates, without any inclination to go to his wife. Upon this the king took Uriah in his chariot, and sent to the king of Edom, and commanded him to punish Uriah, for he told him that he had offended him; and he sugg- ested to him the manner in which he would have him punished, that he might desire him to write that he was himself the author of this his punishment; for he charged him to set him over against that part of the enemy's army where the attack would be most hazardous, and where he might be destroyed, and that in the course of the battle he stood the king's purpose, he set Uriah in that place where he knew the enemy would be most troublesome to them; and gave him for his part- ners some of the best soldiers in the army; and said, that he would also converse with his grandson with the whole army, that if possible they might break down some part of the wall, and enter the city. And he desired him to be glad of the op- portunity of exposing himself to such pains, and to such a destruction, in the name of his soldier, and had a great reputation for his valor, both with the king and with his countrymen. And when Uriah undertook the work he was set to, with all his heart, he knew no fatigue, and those who were to be his companions, that when they saw the enemy make a sally, they should leave him. When, therefore, the Hebrews made an attack upon the city, the Ammonites were afraid that the enemy might prevent them, and get up into the city, and this at the very place whither Uriah was ordered, so they exposed their best soldiers to be in the forefront, and opened their gates suddenly, and fell upon the enemy with great vehemence, and ran violently upon them. When those that were with Uriah saw this, they all retreated backward, as Joab had directed them beforehand; but Uriah, as ashamed to run away and leave his post, main- tained the charge, and was there slain, at the onset, he slew many of them, but being en- compassed around, and caught in the midst of them, he was slain, and some other of his com- panions were slain with him.

2. When this was done, Joab sent messengers to the king, and ordered them to tell him, That he did what he could to take the city soon, but that, as they made an assault on the wall, they had been forced to give way with great loss. And bid them, if they saw the king was angry at it, to add this, that Uriah was slain also. When the king had heard this of the messengers, he took it patiently, and said, That "they did now this God was despised by him, and afraid of his impiety, when he had married, and now had another man’s wife; and by exposing her husband to the enemy, had really slain him; and that God would inflict punishments upon him for his wickedness, which he had perpetrated by force of his own will, and that his own wife should be forced by one of his sons; and that he should be treacherously supplanted by the same son; and that although he had per petrated this wickedness secretly, yet should that treachery, by which he was supplanted, be made public upon him; that moreover, said he, the child which was born to thee of her, shall soon die. When the king was troubled at these messages, and sufficiently confounded, and said to the queen, what was the matter that made thee so troubled? for he was without controversy a pious man, and guilty of no sin at all in his whole life, excepting those in the matter of Uriah.) God had compassion upon him, and was reconciled to him, and promised that he would heal some of his diseases. But when the king, on the seventh day, the child was dead, the king’s servants durst not tell him of it, as supposing that when he knew it he would still less admit of food, and other care of himself, by reason of his son’s death. But of his servants he said, that the child was only sick, so he greatly afflicted himself, and grieved for him. But when the king perceived that his servants were in disorder, and seemed to be affected, as those are who are very discontented, then he asked them the cause of his trouble. But they answered, because the child was dead, and when he had called one of the servants to him, and discovered that so it was, he arose up and washed himself, and took a white garment, and came into the tabernacle, and sat down upon the throne, and said, that he would not supper before him, and thereby greatly surprised his kindred and servants, while he did nothing of this when the child was sick, but did it all when he was dead. Whereupon, hearing of this, the queen, on hearing of this, besought him to tell them the reason of this his conduct. He then called them unskilful people; and instructed them how he had hoped of the recovery of the child while it was alive, and exceedingly “did all that was necessary for him to do as thinking by such means to render God propitious to him, but that when the child was dead, there was no longer any occasion for grief, which was not any way contrary to the command of God. And this, they commended the king’s wisdom and understanding. He then went in unto Bathsheba his wife, and she conceived and bare a son, and, by the command of Nathan the prophet, called his name after this the king’s conduct. 5. But Joab sorely distressed the Ammonites in the siege, by cutting off their waters, and depriving them of other means of subsistence; till they were in the greatest want of meat and drink. But they still drank of the springs, and that it was not one dry spring, but ten, whereof they used that spring, for want of water, and this they durst not drink of too freely, lest the fountain should entirely fail them. So he wrote to the king, and informed him thereof; and persuaded him to come himself to take the city, and that he might have the honor of the victory. Upon this letter of Joab’s, the king accepted of his good-will and fidelity, and took with him his army, and came to the destruction wicked as to transgress the laws and bring upon thyself the utmost confusion. Curb this unholy and impious lust, from which all else will get nothing but reproach and disgrace." She also advised him to speak to his father about this affair, for he would permit him [to marry her]. This she said, as desirous to avoid her brother's violent passion at present. But he said he could not yield to her, but inflamed with love, and blinded with the vehemence of his passion, he forced his sister: but as soon as Amnon had satisfied his lust, he left her immediately, and giving her reproachful words, bade her come to him no more, and be gone. And when she said, That "this was a more injurious treatment than the former, if, now he had forced her, he would not let her stay with him till the evening, but would go away in the daytime, and while it was light, that she might meet with people that would be witnesses of her shame," he commanded his servant to turn her out of his house. Whereupon she was sorely grieved at the injury and violence that had been offered to her, and rent her loose coat, [for the virgins of old times wore such loose coats, tied at the hands, and let down to the ankles, that the inner costs might not be seen,] and her hair was sprinkled with ashes in the midst of the middle of the city, crying out and lamenting, for the violence that had been offered her. Now Absalom her brother happened to meet her, and asked her, What sad thing had befallen her, that she was in such plight and guise? Wherefore she told him what injury had been offered her, he comforted her, and desired her to be quiet, and to take all patiently, and not to esteem her being thus corrupted by her brother as an injury. So she yielded to his advice, and left off her crying out, and discovering the force offered her to the multitude: and she continued as a widow with her brother Absalom a long time.

2. When his father knew this, he was grieved at the actions of Amnon; but because he had an extraordinary affection for him, for he was his eldest son, he was compelled not to afflict him: but Absalom watched for a fit opportunity of revenge for the crime upon him, and he knew thoroughly hated him. Now the second year after this wicked affair about his sister was over, and Absalom was about to go to shear his own sheep at Baal-hazor, which is a city in the portion of Ephraim, he sent his brethren, and his brethren's brethren, to come and feast with him: But when David excused himself, as not being willing to be burdensome to him, Absalom desired he would dines them his brethren; whom he did send accordingly. Then Absalom said to his servants, that when they should see Absalom disordered and drowsy with wine, and he should give them a signal, they should fear nobody, but kill him.

3. When they had done as they were commanded, the rest of his brethren were astonished and disturbed, and were afraid for themselves, so they immediately got on horseback, and rode away to their father; but some few of the men he that prevented them, and told their father they were all slain by Absalom; whereupon he was overcome with sorrow, as for so many of his sons that were destroyed at once, and that by their brother also; and by this consideration, that it was their brother that appeared to have slain them, he aggravated his sorrow for them. So he neither inquired what was the cause of this slaughter, nor stayed to hear any thing else, which yet it was but reasonable to have done, when so greatly provoked by the greatest misfortune, so incredible a misfortune was related to him, but rent his clothes, and threw himself upon the ground, and there lay, lamenting the loss of all his sons, both those who, as he was informed, were slain, and of him who was slain. But Jonathan, son of Abishai, brother Shimeah, entreated him not to indulge his sorrow so far, for as to the rest of his sons, he did not believe that they were slain, for he found no cause for such a suspicion; but he said it was not likely as to his property, for it was not unlikley that Absalom might venture to kill him on account of the injury he had offered to Tamar. In the mean time, a great noise of horses, and a tumult of some people that were coming, turned their attention to them; they were the king's sons, who were fled away from the feast. So their father met them as they were in their grief, and be himself grieved with them; but it was not expected to see his sons again, whom he had a little before heard to have perished. However, there were tears on both sides: they lamenting their brother who was killed, and the king lamenting his son, who was killed, also; but Absalom did go to his father, to his grandmother by his mother's side, who was king of that country, and he remained with him three whole years.

4. Now David had a design to send to Absalom, that he should come to be punished, but that he might be with him, for the effects of his anger were abated by length of time. It was Joab, the captain of his host, that chiefly persuaded him so to do; for he suborned an ordinary subject to bring him in to the king in mourning apparel, who said thus to him: "That two of her sons, in a coarse way, had some difference between them and that in the progress of that difference they came to an open quarrel, and that one was smitten by the other, and was dead; and she desired him to interpose in this case, and to do her the favor to save this her son from her kindred, who were very zealous to be avenged of him, and also to send him his brother put to death; that so she might not be farther deprived of the hopes she had of being taken care of in her old age by him; and that if he would hinder this slaughter of her son by those that wished for it, he would amass for himself a great deal, because the kindred would not be restrained from their purpose by any thing else than by the fear of him." And when the king had given his consent to what the woman had begged of him, she made this reply to him: "I owe thee thanks for thy benignity to me in pitying my old age, and preventing the loss of my only remaining child; but in order to assure me of this thy kindness, be first reconciled to thine own son, and be willing to be angry with him; for shall I persuade myself that thou hast really bestowed this favor upon me, while thou thyself continueth after the like manner in thy wrath to thine own son? for it is not reasonable that thou shouldst wish to thy dead son, while the death of the other was brought about without thy own consent." And now the king perceived that this pretended story was a subornation derived from Joab, and was of no weight. And when, upon inquiry of good counselors about the king, or perhaps because the judges mistook in that unjust sentence they gave; whereby he gained the good-will of them all.

CHAP. IX.
Concerning the Insurrection of Absalom against David; and concerning Athithophel and Hushai; and concerning Ziba and Shimhi; and how Athithophel hanged himself.

§ 1. Now Absalom, upon this success with the king, procured to himself a great many horses, and many chariots, and that in a little time also. He had moreover fifty armor-bearers that were about him; and he came early every day to the king's palace, and spake what was agreeable to such as came for justice, and lost their causes, as if that was expected. 4. I am inclined to think that he thought, that at the end of days, when Absalom polled or weighed his hair, was one week.
He told them, that had he but such authority committed to him he would distribute justice to those who had made himself so popular among the multitude, he thought he had already the good-will of the people secured to him, but when four years had passed since his father's reconciliation to him, he came to him, and besought him to give him leave to go to Hebron, and pay a sacrifice to God, because he vowed it to him when he fled out of the country. So when David had granted his request, he stood up in the sight of all, and great multitudes came running together to him, for he had sent to a great number so to do.

2. Among them came Ahithophel the Giloite, a counsellor of David, and two hundred men out of Jerusalem itself, who knew not his intentions, but were sent for as to a sacrifice. So he was appointed king by all of them, which he obtained by this stratagem. As soon as this news was brought to David, and he was informed of what he did not expect from him, he was affrighted at this so impious and bold undertaking, and wondered that he was so far from remembering how his offence had been so lately forgiven him, that he undertook much worse and more unhallowed acts. For first he cried that kingdom which was given him of God: and secondly, to take away his own father's life. He therefore resolved to fly to the parts beyond Jordan, but on the way met with Abiathar and Zadok, the high priests, who had determined to go away with him, as also all the Levites, who were with the ark, to stay behind, as hoping that God would deliver him without its removal; but he charged them to let him know privately how all things went on; and he had his sons, Ahimaaz the son of Zadok, and Jonathan the son of Abiathar, for faithful ministers in all these particulars. Gittite went out with him, whether David would let him or no, and he should have persuaded him to stay, and on that account appeared the most friendly to him. But as he was ascending the mount of Olivet barefooted, and took off his sandals for fresh treading, it was told him that Ahithophel was with Absalom, and was of his side. This bearing augmented his grief: and he besought God earnestly to alienate the mind of Absalom from Ahithophel, for he was afraid that he should persuade him to follow his pernicious counsel; for he was a prudent man, and very sharp in seeing what was advantagious. When David was gotten upon the top of the mountain he took a view of the city; and perceived that God was with him, and had already lost his kingdom: and here it was that a faithful friend of his, whose name was Hushai, met him. When David saw him with his clothes rent and having sabes all over his head, and in languishing countenance, he espied him, and comforted him, and exhorted him to leave off grieving; nay, at length he besought him to go back to Absalom, and appear as one of his party, and to fish out the secret counsels of Ahithophel, and to contradict the counsels of Ahithophel; and for that he could not do himself so much good by being with him as he might by being with Absalom. So he was prevailed on by David, and left him, and came to Jerusalem, whither Absalom himself came also a little while afterward.

3. When David was gone a little farther, there met him Ziba, the servant of Mephibosheth, whom he had taken care of the provision, and alms which had been given him, as the son of Jonathan the son of Saul,) with a couple of asses laden with provisions, and desired him to take as much of them as he and his followers should need. And when he asked where he had left Mephibosheth? he said, "He had left him at Jerusalem, expecting to be chosen king in the present confusion, in remembrance of the benefits Saul had conferred upon them." At this the king was a little indisposition, and gave to Ziba all that he had formerly bestowed on Mephibosheth; for he determined that it was much fitter that he should have them than the other; at which Ziba greatly rejoiced.

4. When David was at Bahurim, a place so called, there came out a kinsman of Saul's, whose name was Shimei, and threw stones at him, and gave him reproachful words: and as his friends stood about him, he persevered still more in his reproaches, and called him a bloody man, and the author of all sorts of mischief. He bade him also "go out of the land of the living, and live not in the land." And he thanked God for depriving him of his kingdom, and causing him to be punished for what injures he had done to his master, [Saul,] and this by the means of his own son. Now when they were come near to Jerusalem, Absalom, being willingly accompanied by the rest of the multitude; who went hastily away with him, and particularly by those six hundred armed men, who had been with him from his first flight, and all the multitude, with Abiathar and Zadok, the high priests, who had determined to go away with him, as also all the Levites, who were with the ark, to stay behind, as hoping that God would deliver him without its removal; but he charged them to let him know privately how all things went on; and he had his sons, Ahimaaz the son of Zadok, and Jonathan the son of Abiathar, for faithful ministers in all these particulars. Gittite went out with him, whether David would let him or no, and he should have persuaded him to stay, and on that account appeared the most friendly to him. But as he was ascending the mount of Olivet barefooted, and took off his sandals for fresh treading, it was told him that Ahithophel was with Absalom, and was of his side. This hearing augmented his grief: and he besought God earnestly to alienate the mind of Absalom from Ahithophel, for he was afraid that he should persuade him to follow his pernicious counsel; for he was a prudent man, and very sharp in seeing what was advantagious. When David was gotten upon the top of the mountain he took a view of the city; and perceived that God was with him, and had already lost his kingdom: and here it was that a faithful friend of his, whose name was Hushai, met him. When David saw him with his clothes rent and having sabes all over his head, and in languishing countenance, he espied him, and comforted him, and exhorted him to leave off grieving; nay, at length he besought him to go back to Absalom, and appear as one of his party, and to fish out the secret counsels of Ahithophel, and to contradict the counsels of Ahithophel; and for that he could not do himself so much good by being with him as he might by being with but remains still in the same family, by the son’s receiving it after his father.” This speech persuaded Absalom, who before suspected Hushai. And now he called Ahithophel, and consulted with him what he ought to do: he persuaded him to go in unto his father’s concubines; for he said, that “by this action the people will believe that thy difference with thy father is irremovable, and thou art in the light with that alacrity against thy father, for hitherto they are afraid of taking up open enmity against him, out of an expectation that you will be reconciled again.” Accordingly Absalom was prevailed on by this advice, and pitched his tent on the top of the royal palace, in the sight of the multitude; and he went in and lay with his father’s concubines. Now this came to pass according to the prediction of Nathan, when he prophesied and spake to him, that his son would rise up in rebellion against him.

6. And when Absalom had done what he was advised to by Ahithophel, he desired his advice, in the second place, about the war against his father. Now, Ahithophel only asked him let him have ten thousand chosen men, and he promised he would shaw his father, and bring the soldiers back again to safety; and he said, that “they would be the more hearken to him when David was dead, [but not otherwise.]” Absalom was pleased with this advice; and called for Hushai, David’s friend, (for so did he style him,) and informing him of the opinion of Ahithophel, he said, “that was the advice concerning that matter? Now, he was sensible that if Ahithophel’s counsel was followed, David would be in danger of being seized on, and slain: so he attempted to introduce a contrary opinion, and said, “Thou art the best man here concerning the city, with the valor of thy father, and of those that are now with him; that he hath made many wars, and hath always come off with victory; though probably he now abides in the camp, for he is very fat, he is not yet to the time of the battle, and will infuse courage into his own people when they are in danger, but bring consternation to thine. Consider, therefore, my advice, and reason upon it, and if thou cannot but acknowledge that it is better, thou mayest reject the advice of Ahithophel. Send to the entire country of the Hebrews, and order them to come and fight with thy father; and do thou thyself take the army, and be thine own general in this war, and do not trust its management to another; then expect to conquer him with ease, when thou overtakest him openly with his few partisans, but hast thyself many ten thousands, who will be desirous to demonstrate to thee their diligence and alacrity. And I fear not that thou shalt have no success in some city and bear a siege, we will overthrow that city with machines of war, and by undermining it When Hushai had said this, he obtained his point against Ahithophel, for his opinion was preferr'd by Absalom before the other: however, it was no other than God who made the counsel of Hushai appear best to the mind of Absalom.

7. So Hushai made haste over the high places, to Zadok and Ahithophel, and told them the opinion of Ahithophel, and his own, and that the resolution was taken to follow this latter advice. He therefore made them send to David, and tell him as he had written to them, that he had been taken; and to desire him further to pass quickly over Jordan, lest his son should change his mind, and make haste to pursue him, and so prevent him, and seize upon him before he be in safety; for his part he had his men concealed in a proper place out of the city, that they might carry news to David of what was transacted. Accordingly, they sent a maid servant whom they could trust, to carry them the long passage; they could not trust them, to signify the same to David with all speed. So they made no excuse or delay, but taking along with them their fathers’ injunctions, became pious and faithful ministers, and judging them of the great service they had done to the king, and desirous of sparing them some to take them; but when the sons of the high priests perceived this, they went out of the road, and betook themselves to a certain village; that village was called Bahurim; there they desisted of seeking after them, and gave them security. Accordingly, she let the young men down by a rope into a well, and laid deuces of wool over them: and when those that pursued them came to her, and asked her whether she saw them, she said no; but she had seen them, for they had staid with her some time, but she said then they went their ways: and she foretold, that, however, if they would follow them directly they would catch them. But when after a while she saw them come near, she drew them up by the rope, and bade our army join battle with him, his soldiers will retire for a while, but will come upon us again, as encouraged by the king’s being near them; and in the mean time your father will abide in the forest, and may be the time of the battle, and will infuse courage into his own people when they are in danger, but bring consternation to thine. Consider, therefore, my advice, and reason upon it, and if thou cannot but acknowledge that it is better, thou mayest reject the advice of Ahithophel. Send to the entire country of the Hebrews, and order them to come and fight with thy father; and do thou thyself take the army, and be thine own general in this war, and do not trust its management to another; then expect to conquer him with ease, when thou overtakest him openly with his few partisans, but hast thyself many ten thousands, who will be desirous to demonstrate to thee their diligence and alacrity. And I fear not that thou shalt have no success in some city and bear a siege, we will overthrow that city with machines of war, and by undermining it.

8. But Ahithophel, on reflection of his advice, got upon his ass, and rode away to his own country, taking his family together; and told them distinctly what advice he had given Absalom; and since he had not been persuaded by it, he said he would evidently perish, and this in no long time, and that David would overtake him, and return to his kingdom again: so he said it was better that he should take his own life away with freedom and magnanimity, than expose himself to be punished by David, in opposition to whom he had acted entirely. When Ahithophel told them to him, he went into the innmost room of his house and hanged himself; and thus was the death of Ahithophel, who was self-condemned: and when his relations had taken him down from the haller, they took manner of the divine operations, or permissions, or the machinations of wicked Absalom, and directly ‘infatuated’ wicked Absalom to reject it, (while ‘infatuation’ is what the scripture styles the judicial ‘blindness’ that is caused by an indulgence to the bent of men, which, by their former voluntary wickedness, have justly deserved to be destroyed, and are thereby brought to destruction,) is a very just one, and in him more unfrequently observed, than by any other person himself, or per-care of his funeral. Now, as for David, he passed over Jordan, as we have said already, and came to Mahanaim, a very fine and very strong city; and all the chief men of the country received him with great pleasure, both out of the town and abroad, that he should be forced to flee away, [from Jerusalem,] and out of the respect they bare him while he was in his former prosperity. These were Beraiali's the Gileadite, and Siphar the ruler among Asherim; and they anointed David the man of Gilead; and these furnished him with plentiful provisions for himself and his followers, insomuch that they wanted no beds nor blankets for them, nor loaves of bread, nor wine; nay, they made their meat fat and their flesh fat, and they gave them wine to drink, and offered them what furniture they wanted for their refreshment when they were weary, and for food, with plenty of other necessaries.

CHAP. X.

How, when Absalom was beaten, he was caught in a Tree by his Hair, and was slain.

§ 1. And this was the state of David and his followers. But Absalom got together a vast army of the Hebrews to oppose his father, and passed therewith over the river Jordan, and set down not far off Mahanaim, in the country of Gilgal. He appointed Amasa captain of his host, instead of Joab his kinsman: his father was Ishma, and his mother Abigail: now she and Zeruiah, the mother of Joab, were David's sisters. But when David had numbered his followers, he came to his own thoughts, and resolved not to tarry till Absalom attacked him, but set over men captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds, and divided his army into three parts: the one part he committed to Joab; the second to Abishai, his armor-bearer; and the third to Ittai, David's companion and friend, but one that came from the city of Gath. And when he was desirous of fighting himself among them his friends, he let his mind and purpose be founded upon very wise reasons: "For, (said they,) if we be conquered when he is with us, we have lost all good hopes of recovering ourselves; but if we should be beaten in one part of our army, the other parts may repair to him, and may thereby prepare a greater force, while the enemy will naturally suppose that he hath another army with him." So David was pleased with their advice, and resolved himself for the battle. But Joab and his friends and commanders to the battle, he desired them to show all possible acclivity and fidelity, and to bear in mind what advantages they received from him, which though they had not been very great, yet had not they been quite insconsiderable; and he begged of them to spare the young man Absalom, lest some mischief should befal himself if he should be killed. And did he send out his army to the battle, and with this request made to him, "Wilt thou, he said, who hast always been the messenger of good news, now go and acquaint the king that his son is dead?" So he desired him to do it. And Cushi did bring the business to him, that he should tell the king what he had seen. But when Ahimaaz again desired him to let him go as a messenger, and assured him that he would only relate what he had seen, and not speak concerning the victory, but of the death of Absalom, he gave him leave to go to David. Now he took a nearer road than the former did, for nobody knew it but himself, and he came before Cushi. Now as David was sitting between the gates, and waiting to see when judicial causes were heard, and public communications were taken, as it is written in several places of scripture, 2 Chron. xxxii. 2; 2 Sam. lx. 14; xxi. 5; Prov. iv. 21; niv, 33; 34; xxii. 32; and often elsewhere.
somebody would come to him from the battle, and tell him how it went, one of the watchmen saw Ahimass running, and before he could discern who he was, he told David that he saw somebody coming to him; who said, he was a good messenger. A little while after he informed him that another messenger followed him; whereupon the king said that he was also a good messenger; but when the watchman saw Ahimass, who he was already running, he gave the king notice that it was the son of Zedok the high priest, who came running. So David was very glad, and said, "He was a messenger of peace; and bring him such news from the battle as he desired to hear."

5. While the king was saying thus, Ahimass appeared, and worshipped the king. And when the king inquired of him about the battle, he said, "He brought him the good news of victory and dominion." And when he inquired what he had to say concerning his son, he said, that "he came away on the sudden as soon as the enemy was defeated, but that he heard a great noise of those that pursued Abasalom, and that he could learn no more, because of the haste he made when Joash sent him to inform him of the victory."

But when Cushi was come, and had worn himself out in the seeing the victory, he asked him about his son; who replied, "May the like misfortune befall thine enemies as hath befallen Abasalom." That word did not permit either himself or his soldiers to rejoice for the while; nor was it a very pleasant thing; David went up to the highest part of the city, and wept for his son, and beat his breast, tearing (the hair of) his head, and tormenting himself all manner of ways, and crying out, "O my son! I have laid me, thy mother, and thy servant." For he was of a tender natural affection, and had extraordinary compassion for this son in particular. But when the army and Joash heard that the king mourned for this son, they wept for the king; and in the house of the victors, but they all came in as cast down, and in tears, as if they had been beaten. Now while the king covered himself, and grievously lamented his son, Joash went in to him, and comforted him, and said, "O my lord the king, thou art not aware that thou layest a blot on thyself by what thou now doest: for thou seemest to hate those that love thee, and undergo dangers for thee; nay, to hate thyself; thy family, and to love those that are thy bitter enemies, and to desire the company of those that are no more, and who have been justly slain; for had Abasalom gotten the victory, and firmly settled himself in the king, there had been none of us left alive, but all of us, beginning with thyself and thy children, had miserably perished, while our enemies had not wept over us, but rejoiced over us, and punished even those that pitied us in our misfortunes; and they not ashamed to do this in the case of one that has been thy bitter enemy, who, while he was thine own son, hath proved so wicked to thee. Leave off, therefore, thy woe and sorrow; and come again, and be seen by thy soldiers, and return them thanks for the alacrity they showed in the fight; for I myself will this day persuade the people to leave thee, and to give the kingdom to whom it belongs, and to thee again; and then I shall make thee to grieve bitterly, and in earnest." Upon Joash's speaking thus to him, he made the king leave off his sorrow, and brought him to the consideration of his affairs. So David changed his habit, and exposed himself in a manner fit to be seen by the multitude, and sat at the gates; whereupon all the people heard of it, and ran together to him, and saluted him. And this was the present state of David's affairs.

CHAP. XI.

How David, when he had recovered his Kingdom, was reconciled to Shimei, and to Ziba, and showed a great Affection to Baravilla, and how, upon the Rise of a Stetitem, he made Amasa Captain of his Host, in order to pursue Absalom, which Amasa was slain by Joas, to whom David presently sent his son.

§ 1. Now those Hebrews that had been with Absalom, and had retired out of the battle, when they were all returned home, sent messengers to every city to put them in mind of what benefit David had bestowed upon them, and of that liberty and command of the army which Absalom had bestowed upon them from many and great wars. But they complained, that whereas they had ejected him out of his kingdom, and committed it to another governor, whom they had set up, was already dead, they did not now beseech David to leave off his anger at them, and to become friends with them, and, as he used to do, to resume the care of their affairs, and take the kingdom again, as he had done. And this, notwithstanding, David sent to Zedok and Abiathar the high priests, that they should speak to the rulers of the tribe of Judah after the manner following: That "it would be a reproach to the house of David, and to the highways of the kingdom, if David choose David for their king before their tribe, and this, (said he,) while you are akin to him, and of the same common blood." He commanded them also to say the same to Amasa the captain of the army which Absalom had bestowed upon him. Accordingly the high priests, when they had discoursed with the rulers of the tribe, and said what the king had ordered them, persuaded Amasa to undertake the care of his affairs. So he persuaded that tribe to send immediately ambassadors to him, to beseech him to return to his kingdom. The same did all the Israelites, at the like persuasion of Amasa.

2. When the ambassadors came to him, he came to Jerusalem; and the tribes of Judah was the first that came to meet the king at the river Jordan. And Shimei, the son of Gera, came with a thousand men, who brought him out of the tribe of Benjamin; and Ziba, the freedman of Saul, with his sons, fifteen in number, and with his twenty servants. All these, as well as the tribes of Judah, laid a bridge (of boats) over the river, that the king and those that were with him, might with ease pass over it. Now as soon as he was come to Jordan, the tribe of Judah saluted him. Shimei also came upon the bridge, and took hold of the bridge to pull David down, for he knew what he had offended at, and not to be too bitter against him, nor to think fit to make him the first example of severity under his new authority; but to consider that he had sparingly repented of his former sins; and that the king was come to forgive all of them that were with him, and to bring into his presence, and to do justice to them all._F3

* F3 Since David was now in Mahanaim, and in the open country, which was not as yet inhabited, it seems they had not built the highest of any part of the wall, and since our other copies say, he went up to the chamber over the gate, or hall of the king, I think we must correct our present reading in Josephus, and for sicut should read gate, i.e. instead of the highest part of the city, should render gate of the palace. This is the same as what we have in 2 Sam. xix. 5, and what we find in Josh. x. 38, where Absalom presently in Joeschullas, as well as in our other copies, 2 Sam. xix. 5, sitting as before in the gate of the city.
reign over me?" But David turned himself to him, and said, "Will ye never leave off, ye son of Zeruiah? Do not you, I pray, raise new troubles and seditions among us, now the former are over; for I would not have you ignorant that this day begin my reign, and therefore swear to remit all offenders their punishments, and not to smallevan) on any one that has sinned. Be thou therefore, (said he,) O Shimée, of good courage, and do not at all fear being put to death, for he was worshipped him, and went on before him.

3. Mephiboseth also, Saul's grandson, met David, clothed in a sodalis garment, and having his hair thick and neglected: for after David was &lt;&lt;and he was brought up by his nurses, who had polished his head, nor had he washed his clothes, as dooming himself to undergo such hardships upon occasion of the change of the king's affairs. Before he had been upbraided to be lacking by Ziba his steward. When he had saluted the king, and worshipped him, the king began to ask him, "Why did he not go out of Jerusalem with him, and accompany him during his flight?" But he, humbly respecting the sin that was owing to Ziba; because when he was ordered to get things ready for his going out with him, he took no care of it, but regarded him no more than if he had been a slave; and indeed, had I had not regard to him, the king would have slain thee, for I could then have made use of them in my flight: but this is not all the injury that Ziba has done me, as to my duty to thee, my lord and my master, but he hath calumniated me before thee, and told lies about me of my own invention; but I know thy mind will not admit of such calumnies, but is righteous disposed, and a lover of truth, which it is also the will of God above that all things should be true; and the greatest danger of suffering by my grandfathers, and when, on that account, our whole family might justly have been destroyed, thou wast moderate and merciful, and didst then especially forget all the injuries, when, if thou hadst remembered them, thou hadst the power of punishing us for them; but thou hast judged me to be thy friend, and hast set me every day at thine own table, nor have I wanted any thing which one could wish, nor to be in a situation where with thee, could have expected." When he said this, David resolved neither to punish Mephiboseth, nor to condemn Ziba, as having belied his master; but said to him, the king had [behind] his heart, that he did not come along with him, so he [now] promised to forgive him, and ordered that the one half of his estate should be restored to him. Whereupon Mephiboseth said, "May, let Ziba take all; it suffices me that thou hast recovered thy kingdom."

4. But David desired Barr平时, the Gileadite, that great and good man, and one that had made a plentiful provision for him at Mahanaim, and conducted him as far as Jordan, to accompany him to Jerusalem, for he promised to treat him in his old age with all manner of respect; to take care of him, and provide for him. But Bar平时 was not satisfied with what he had entertained him to excuse him from attendance on him; and said, That "his age was too great to enjoy the pleasures [of a court], since he was fourscore years old; and was therefore making provision for his death and burial; so he desired him to gratify him in this request, and dismiss him, for he had no reliach for his meat or his drink by reason of his age; and that his cars were too much shut up to bear the sound of the melody of other musical instruments, such as those that live with kings delight in." When he entreated for this so earnestly, the king said, "I dismiss thee, but thou shalt great me thy son Chilam, and I will give thee all manner of good things." So Bar平时 left his son with him, and worshipped the king, and wished him a prosperous conclusion of all his affairs according to his own mind, and then returned home. But David came to Gilgal, having about him half the people of Israel, and the whole tribe of Judah.

5. Now the principal men of the country came to Gilgal, and complained of the charge of Judah, that they had come to him in a private manner, whereas they ought all conjointly, and with one and the same intention, to have given him the meeting. But the rulers of the tribe of Dan were not to be disappased, if they had been prevented by them; for said they, "We are David's kinsmen, and on that account we the rather took care of him, and loved him, and so came first to him; yet had we not, if he had not received any gifts from him, which might give them who came last any meanness." When the rulers of the tribe of Judah had said this, the rulers of the other tribes were not quiet, but said further, "O brethren, we cannot stagger you, when you call the king your kinsman alone, whereas he hath received from God the power over all of us in common, ought to be esteemed a kinsman to us, for the whole of us have eleven parts in him; and you but one part: we also are elder than you; wherefore you have not done justly in coming to the king in this private and concealed manner."

6. While these rulers were thus disputing one another, another, a certain wicked man who took a pleasure in seditions practices, (his name was Sheba, the son of Bichri, of the tribe of Benjamin,) stood up in the midst of the multitude, and cried aloud, and spoke to the king, and said, "I have no part in David, nor inheritance in the son of Jesse." And when he had used those words, he blew with a trumpet, and declared war against the king, and they all left David, and followed him; the tribe of Benjamin and joined him, and settled him in his royal palace at Jerusalem. But as for his concubines, with whom Absalom his son had accommodated, truly he removed them to another house: and offered those that had the care of them to make a plentiful provision for them, but he came not near them any more. He also appointed Amasa for the captain of his forces, and gave him the same high office which Joseph before had; and commanded him to gather together out of the tribe of Judah as great an army as he could, and to come to him within three days that he might deliver to him his entire army, and might send him to fight against Sheba the son of Bichri, the general of the host that had made some delay in gathering the army together, and so was not yet returned, on the third day the king said to Joab, "It is not fit we not be able to procure some other beast for the same purpose."

should: make any delay in this affair of Sheba, lest he get a numerous army about him, and be the occasion of greater mischief, and hurt our affairs more than did Absalom himself; do not thou, therefore, wait any longer, but take such forces as thou hast at hand, and that (old body) of six hundred men, and thy brother Abishai with thee, and pursue after our enemy, and endeavor to fight him wherever thou canst overtake him. Make haste to prevent him, lest he seize upon some fenced cities, and cause us great labor and pains before we take him.”

7. So Joab resolved to make no delay, but taking with him his brother, and those six hundred men, and giving orders that the king and all of the army, which was at Jerusalem should follow him, he marched with great speed against Sheba; and when he came to Gibeah, which is a village forty furlongs distant from Jerusalem, Amasa brought him news that the king was come to Jerusalem, and for the same cause it was that he killed Abner. But as to that former wicked action, the death of his brother Asahel, which he seemed to revenge, afforded him occasion to refrain from it, for he was a paragon of men. Joab suppressed that murder of Amasa there was no such covering for it. Now when Joab had killed this general, he pursued after Sheba, having left a man with the dead body, who was ordered to proclaim aloud to the army, that Amasa was justly slain, and deservedly punished. “But, (said he,) if you be for the king, follow Joab his general, and Abishai Joab’s brother.” But because the body lay dead, the king and all the multitude came running to it, and, as is usual with the multitude, wondering a great while at it, he that guarded it removed it thence, and carried it to a certain place that was very remote from the road, and thence removed and covered it with his garment. When this was done, all the people followed Joab. Now as he pursued Sheba through all the country of Israel, one told him that he was in a strong city called Abel-beth-machach; hereupon Joab went thither, and set about it with his army, and cast up a bank round it, and ordered his soldiers to undermine the walls, and to overthrow them; and since the people in the city did not admit him, he was greatly diseased at this enterprise.

8. Now there was a woman of small account, and yet both wise and intelligent, who seeing her native city lying at the last extremity, ascended upon the wall, and by means of the armed men called for Joab; and when he came near her, she began to say, that “God ordained kings and generals of armies that they might cut off the enemies of the Hebrews, and introduce a universal peace among them; but thou art endeavoring to raise and determine the troubles of the Israelites, which hath been guilty of no offense.” But he replied, “God continue to be merciful unto me: I am disposed to avoid killing all one of the people. A much less would I destroy such a city as this: and if they will deliver me up Sheba, the son of Bichri, who hath rebelled against the king, I will leave off the siege and withdraw the army from the place.”

Now as soon as the woman heard what Joab said she desired him to intermit the siege for a little while, for that he should have the head of his enemy thrown out to him presently. So she went down to the citizens, and said to them, “Will you be as resolved as he in punishing us with your children and wives, for the sake of a vile fellow, and one whom nobody knows who he is? And will you have him for your king instead of David, who hath been so great a benefactor to you? Will you think to make your king afraid of you, and strong army?” So she prevailed with them, and they cut off the head of Sheba, and threw it into Joab’s army. When this was done, the king’s !garrisons sounded a retreat, and raised the siege, and when it was come to Jerusalem, he again appointed to be general of all the people. The king also constituted Benaijah captain of the guards and of the six hundred men. He also set up Achitob and Achiasah over the records. He made Sheva the scribe, and appointed Zadok and Abiathar the high priests.

CHAP. XII.

How the Hebrews were delivered from a Famine, when the Gibonites had caused Punishment to be inflicted for those of them that had been slain, at what great Acliition the king was formed against the Philistines by David, and the men of Valor about him.

1. After this, when the country was greatly afflicted with a famine, David besought God to have mercy on the people, and to discover to him what was the cause of it, that he might be found for that dissembler. And then the prophets answered, that God would have the Gibonites avenged, whom Saul the king was so well as a betrayal to slaughter, and had not observed the oath which the king and the senate had sworn to them. If, therefore, said God, the king would permit such vengeance to be taken for those that were slain, as the Gibonites should desire, he promised that he would be reconciled to them, and free the multitude from their miseries. As soon, therefore, as the king understood that this it which God sought, he sent for the Gibonites, and asked them, What it was that made them and what they desired to have seven sons of Saul delivered to them, to be punished, he delivered them up, but spared Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan. So when the Gibonites had received the answer which they desired, and desired that upon which God began to send rain, and to recover the earth to bring forth its fruits as usual, and to free it from the foregoing drought, so that the country of the Hebrews flourished again. A little after, the king made war against the Philistines; and when he had joined battle with them, and put them to flight, he was left alone as he was in pursuit of them; and when he was quite tired down, he was seen by one of the enemy, his armor bearer, the son of Achish, the son of Ahithophel, he was one of the sons of the giants. He had a spear, the handle of which weighed three hundred shekels, and a breastplate of chain work and a sword. He turned back, and ran violently to slay [David] their enemy. His sword was so sharp that he was quite tired out with labor; but Abishai, Joab’s brother, appeared on the sudden, protected the king with his shield, as he lay down, and slew the enemy. Now the multitude were very uneasy, and some feared the king’s life, and that he was very near to be slain; and the rulers made him swear that he would no more go out with them to battle, lest he should come to some great misfortune by his courage and boldness, and thereby deprive the people of the life which God now enjoyed by his means, and of those that they might hereafter enjoy by his living a long time among them.
2. When the king heard that the Philistines were gathered together at the city Gaza, he rose to his feet, and the field on which he was standing was one of David's most courageous actions. He beheld himself so as to deserve great commendation; for he knew many of those that bragged they were the posterity of the giants, and were the men that had fallen upon the mountains and pursued them; and at that time won a surprising and a famous victory, while Eleazar slew the men, and the multitude followed and spoiled their dead bodies. The third was Abinadab, the son of Sheba, the son of the Philistines, and slew him, and put the rest to flight. Many of them also were slain in the fight. Now a little while after this, the Philistines pitched their camp at a city which lay not far off the bounds of a body of men, and did not know that the man who had a man who was six cubits tall, and had on each of his feet and hands one more toe and finger than men naturally have. Now the person who was sent against him by David out of the camp of the Philistines, not at several times, but for a whole day, consumed songs and hymns to God of several sorts of metre; some of which he made were trimeters, and some were pentameters; he also made instruments of music; and taught the Levites to sing hymns to God, both on that called the Sabbath day, and on the other festivals. Now the construction of the instruments was thus: The viol was an instrument of ten strings, it was played upon with a bow; the psaltery was played upon by the fingers; the cymbals were broad and large instruments, and were made of brass. And so much shall suffice to be spoken by us about these instruments, that the readers may not be wearied or fatigued with their nature, or modes, or names.

4. Now all the men that were about David, were men of courage. Those that were most illustrious and famous of them for their actions were thirty-eight; of five of whom I will only relate the name. Eleazar, Abinadab, and Jonathæ, three of whom did make manifest the virtues of the others also; for these were powerful enough to subdue countries, and conquer great nations. First, therefore, was Eleazar, the son of Achim, who frequently was used by the command of King David, and did not leave off fighting till he be overthrown one hundred of them. After him was Eleazar.
CHAP. XIII.

That when David had numbered the People, they were grieved; and how the Divine Compassion restrained that punishment.

1. Now king David was desirous to know how many ten thousands were of the people, and forgot the commands of Moses, who told them beforehand, that if the multitude were numbered, they should pay half a shekel to God for every one. Accordingly he commanded Joab, the captain of his host, to go and number the multitude; but when he said there was no necessity for such a numberation, he was not persuaded (to counteract it), but he enrolled all the nation, and went about the numbering of the Hebrews immediately. So Joab took with him the heads of the tribes, and the scribes, and went over the country of the Israelites, and took notice how numerous the multitude were, and returned to Jerusalem to the king, after nine months and twenty days; and he gave in to the king the number of the people, without the tribe of Benjamin, for he had not yet numbered it. But Joab thought that he should be rewarded for his having sinned against God. Now the number of the rest of the Israelites was nine hundred thousand men, who were able to bear arms and go to war; but the tribe of Judah, by itself, was four hundred thousand men.

2. Now when the prophets had signified to David that God was angry at him, he began to entreat him, and to desire he would be merciful to his sin. But God sent no prophet than the prophet to him, to propose to him the election of three things, that he might choose which he liked best. Whether he would have a famine come upon the country for seven years, or he would have three years of war, and be destroyed by his enemies; or whether God should send a pestilence and a distemper upon the Hebrews for three days? But as he was fallen to a fatal choice of great miseries, he was in trouble, and sorely confounded; and when the prophet had said that he must of necessity make his choice, and had ordered him to answer quickly, the king showed what he would do; he would go to God; he was turned with himself, that in case he should ask for famine, he would appear to do it for others, and without danger to himself, since he had a great deal of corn hoarded up, but to the harm of others; but if he should choose to be overwhelmed by his enemies for three months, he would appear to have chosen war, because he had valiant men about him, and strongholds, and that, therefore he should choose the one which then was the best. To which Joab, the captain of the host, replied, that the distemper which is common to kings and to their subjects, and in which the fear is equal on all sides; and said this beforehand, that "it was much better to fall into the hands of God than into the hands of his enemies."

3. When the prophet had heard this, he declared it to God; who thereupon sent a pestilence and a mortality upon the Hebrews; nor did they die after one and the same manner, nor so that it was a uniform and equal calamity. Now the miserable disease was one indeed, but it carried them off by ten thousand causes and occasions, which those that were afflicted could not understand; for one died upon the neck of another, and another upon the hair of another; before they were aware, and brought them to their end suddenly; some giving up the ghost immediately with very great pains and utmost grief, and some were worn away by the dis- terpence of the disease, and some went to meeting to be buried, but as soon as ever they fell, were entirely macerated; some were choked, and greatly lamented their case, as being also stricken with a sudden disease. Some there were, who, as they were burying a relation, fell down dead, without finishing the rites of the funeral. Now there perished of this disease, which began with the morning and lasted till the hour of dinner, seventy thousand vir- tuous persons; and when David, lifting up his hand over Jerusalem, as sending this terrible judgment upon it. But David had put on sackcloth, and lay upon the ground, entreatmg God, and begging that the distemper might now cease and be satisfied with those that had already perished. And when the king looked up into the air, and saw the angel carried along thereby unto Jerusalem, with his sword drawn, he said to God, that "he might justly be destroyed for the pestilence that had broken out in his land, and he wished that all the sheep ought to be preserved, as not having sinned at all; and he implored God that he would send his wrath upon him, and upon all his family, but spare the people."

4. But when his supplication, he caused the pestilence to cease; and sent God the prophet to him, and commanded him to go up immediately to the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite, and build an altar there to God, and offer the sacrifice. When David heard that he did not neglect his duty; but made haste to the seeming to me the principal character of noblemindedness and of wisdom: for thus Josephus for the great plague mentioned in this chapter: "When thou takest the sum of the children of Israel, after their numbers, and thou givest a ransom for his soul unto the Lord, when thou numberest them, that there be no plague amongst them when thou numberest them."

The words of God by Moses, Exod. xxx, 12, sufficiently justify the king herein hereafter, and Josephus forgets the great plague mentioned in this chapter: "When thou takest the sum of the children of Israel, after their numbers, and thou givest a ransom for his soul unto the Lord, when thou numberest them, that there be no plague amongst them when thou numberest them." When Joab, the captain of the host, indeed said, and when the Sanhedrins neglect of executing this law at this denomination excuse the people, who ought still to have brought their bounders seven thousand of a shekel with them, when they came to be numbered. The great reason why nations are so constantly punished by and with their kings and governors in this, that they are most often commanded to put these in their neglect or disobedience to the divine laws, and suffer these displeased laws to go into disuse or contempt, in order to please those wicked and ungodly men; and that they submit to several wicked political laws and commands of those kings and governors, instead of the righteous laws of God, which all mankind ought ever to obey, let their kings and governors any what they please to the contrary: this preference of human before Divine laws.
place appointed him. Now Araunah was threshing wheat; and when he saw the king and all his servants coming to him, he ran before, and came to him, and worshipped him: he was by his lineage a Jebusite, but a particular friend of David; and for that cause it was, that when he overthrew the city he did him no harm, as we informed the reader a little before. Now Araunah inquired, "Wherefore is my locust come to his threshing-floor?" But king David answered, "I have taken the threshing-floor, that he might therein build an altar to God, and offer a sacrifice." He replied, that he freely gave him both the threshing-floor and the place, and one ox for a burst-offering; and he bought of Araunah the threshing-floor, that he might therein build an altar to God, and offer a sacrifice. But the king made an answer, that he took his generosity and magnanimity kindly, and accepted his good will, but he desired him to give the price of them all, for it was not just to offer a sacrifice that cost nothing. And when Araunah said, he would do as he pleased, he bought the threshing-floor of him for fifty shekels. And when he had built an altar, he performed divine service, and brought a burnt-offering, and offered peace-offerings also. With these God was pacified, and became gracious to them again. Now it happened, that Abraham came and offered his son Isaac for a burst-offering, that was before their time, but then when the time was ready to have his throat cut, a ram appeared on a sudden, standing by the altar, which Abraham sacrificed in the stead of his son, as we have before related. Now when king David saw that God was pleased with the burnt-offering and the peace-offerings, he accepted of his sacrifices, he resolved to call that entire place the altar of all the people, and to build a temple to God there. Whereof, he uttered many an appetizing to what was to be done afterward; for God sent the prophet to him, and told him, that there should his son build him an altar, that son who was to take the kingdom after him.

CHAPTER XIV.

That David made great Preparations for the House of God: and that upon Adonijah's Attempt to gain the Kingdom, he appointed Solomon to reign.

1. AFTER the delivery of this prophecy, the king commanded the strangers to be numbered; and they were found to be one hundred and eighty thousand men and maidens, and the men were one hundred thousand in score thousand to be bearers of stone, and the rest of the multitude to carry the stones, and of them he set over the workmen three thousand and five hundred. He also prepared a great quantity of iron and brass for the work, with many (and those exceeding large) cedar trees; the Tyrians and Sidonians sending them to him, for he had sent to them for a supply of those trees. And he told his friends that these things were now prepared, that he might gather materials ready for the building of the temple to his son, who was to reign after him, and that he might not have them to seek then, when he was very young, and by reason of his age, unskilful in such matters, but might have them lying by him, and so might the more readily complete the work.

2. So David called his son Solomon, and charged him, when he had received the kingdom, to build him a temple; and said, "I was willing to build God a temple myself, but he prohibited me, because I was polluted with blood and war: but he hath foretold, that Solomon, my youngest son, should build him a temple, and should be called by that name; over whom he hath promised to take the like care, as a father takes over his sons; and that he would make the country of the Hebrews happy under him, and that, not only in other respects, but by giving it peace and freedom from wars, and from internal seditions, which are the greatest of all blessings. Since, therefore, (as he himself before thou wast born, endeavor to render thyself worthy of this his providence, as in other instances, so particularly in being religious, and righteous, and courageous. Keep thy also his commands, and his laws, which he hath given us by Moses, and do not permit others to break them. Be zealous also to dedicate the temple of God, which he hath chosen to be built unto himself, under thee; for the vastness of the work, nor set about it timorously, for I will make all things ready before I die; and take notice, that there are already ten thousand talents of gold, and a hundred thousand talents of silver, collected together. I have also laid together brass and iron without number, and an immense quantity of timber and of stones. Moreover, thou hast many thousand stone cutters and carpenters; and if thou shalt want any thing farther, do thou add to them of thy own of these. Wherefore, if thou performest this work, thou wilt be acceptable to God, and have him for thy patron." David also farther exhorted the rulers of the people to assist his son in this building, and said to them, that when they should be free from all their misfortunes, for that they by this means should enjoy, instead of them, peace, and a happy settlement, with which blessings God rewards such as are religious and righteous. He also gave orders, that when the temple should be once built, they should put the ark therein, with the holy vessels; and he assured them, that they ought to have had a temple longer, if the fathers of the nation had not been negligent of God's commands, who had given it in charge that when they had got the possession of this land, they should build him a temple. Thus did David discourse to the governors and to his son.

3. David was now in years, and his body, by length of time, was become cold, and benumbed, insomuch that he could get no heat by covering himself with many clothes; and when the physicians came to him, they agreed, that he was sick of a disease, that a beautiful virgin, chosen out of the whole country, should sleep by the king's side, and that this damsel would communicate heat to him, and be a remedy against his numbness. Now there was found in the city one woman of a superior beauty, to all other women, (her name was Abishag,) who, sleeping with the king, did no more than communicate warmth to him, for he was so old that he could not know her as a husband knew his wife. But of this woman we shall speak more presently.

4. Now the fourth son of David was a beautiful young man, and tall, born to him of Haggith his wife. He was named Adonijah, and was in his disposition like another, and exalted himself on his own self as hoping to be king; and told his friends that he ought to take the government upon him. He also prepared many chariots and horses, and fifty men to ride before him. When his father saw this, he did not condemn him, nor restrain him from his purpose, nor did he go so far as to ask wherefore he did so? Now Adonijah had for particularly in 1 Chron. xxxii. 28, 29; and xxii. 1: to which places I refer the reader.

his assistants, Joab the captain of the army, and Abiathar the high priest; and the only persons that opposed him were Zadok the high priest, and the prophet Nathan, and Benaiah, who was captain of the guards, and Shimel, David's friend, with all the other mighty men. Now Abiathar had prepared a supper of the city, on the banks of the river Sitron, near the fountain that was in the king's paradise, and had invited all his brethren except Solomon, and he had taken with him Joab the captain of the army, and the man of the tribe of Judah; but had invited to the feast neither Zadok the high priest, nor Nathan the prophet, nor Benaiah the captain of the guards, nor any of those of the contrary party. This matter was reported to Bathsheba, the wife of Solomon: her mother, that Adonijah was king, and that David knew nothing of it; and he advised her to save herself, and her son Solomon, and to go by herself to David, and say to him, that "he had indeed sworn that Solomon should reign after him, but that, in the mean time, Adonijah had already taken the kingdom." He said, that he, the prophet himself, would come after her, and when she had spoken thus to the king, whatever he had said or done. Accordingly, Bathsheba agreed with Nathan, and went in to the king, and worshipped him, and when she had desired leave to speak with him, she told him all things in the manner that Nathan had suggested. When the king had hearing what Adonijah had made, and who they were whom he had invited; Abiathar, the high priest, and Joab the general, and David's sons, excepting Solomon, his chief friend. She also said, "That all the people had their eyes on him, to know whom he would choose for their king." She desired him also to consider how, after his death, Adonijah, if he were king, would slay her son Solomon.

5. Now as Bathsheba was speaking, the keeper of the king's chambers told him, that Nathan desired to see him. And when the king had commanded that he should be admitted, he came in, and asked him, whether he had ordained Adonijah to be king, and delivered the government to him or not? for that he had made a splendid supper, and invited all his sons, except Solomon, as the king had invited Joab the captain of his host, [1] and Abiathar the high priest, who were feasting with applause, and many joyful sounds of instruments, and wish that his kingdom may last forever: but he hath not invited me, nor Zadok the high priest, nor Benaiah the captain of the guards; and when they were come, he ordered them to take with them Nathan and Benaiah, and the men about the palace, and to set his son Solomon upon the king's mule, and to carry him out of the city to the fountain called Gibon, and to anoint him there with the holy oil, and to make him king.

This was more than the prophet, to do, and commanded them to follow Solomon through the midst of the city, and to sound the trumpets, and to wish aloud, "That Solomon, the king, may sit upon the royal throne for ever," that all the people might know that he is ordained king by his father. He also gave Solomon a charge concerning his government, to rule the whole nation of the Hebrews, and particularly the tribe of Judah, religiously and righteously. And when Solomon had prayed to God to be favorable to Solomon, without any delay they set Solomon upon the mule, and brought him out of the city to the fountain, and anointed him with oil, and brought him to the royal throne, with all the ceremonies and wishes that his kingdom might continue a long time: and when they had introduced him into the king's house, they set him upon the throne. Whereupon all the people bestowed them a fit coronation, dancing, and delighting themselves with musical pipes, till both the earth and the air echoed with the multitudes of the instruments of music.

6. And when David perceived this noise, they were in disorder: and Joab the captain of the host said, "He was not pleased with these echoes, and the sound of these trumpets." And when supper was set before them, nobody tasted of it, but they were all very thoughtful what would be the matter. Then Jonathan, the son of Abiathar the high priest came running to them; and when Adonijah saw the young man gladly, and said to him that he had invited him, he was much comforted. For the whole matter about Solomon, and the determination of king David; hereupon both Adonijah and all his guests rose hastily from the feast, and every one fled to their own houses: Adonijah also sent to Nathan, and to Solomon, and to Joab, and to all his friends, "Tell Solomon that he has become a supplicant to God, and took hold of the horns of the altar, which were prominent. It was also told Solomon that he had done so; and that he desired all the secrets of the priest and king to be told him, he would not remember the injury he had done, and not inflict any severe punishment for it. Solomon answered very mildly and prudently, that "he forgave him his offence;" but said that the people of the tribe of Levi, he had found out to be very industrious for new innovations, that he would be the author of his own punishment." So he sent to him, and raised him up from the place of his supplication. And when he came to the king, and had worshipped him, the king bade him go away to his own house, and have no suspicion of any harm; and desired him to show himself a worthy man, as what would tend to his own advantage.

7. But David being desirous of ordaining his eldest son to the throne, and the most proper persons to be his followers and successors, going to Jerusalem, with the priests and the Levites; and having first numbered the Levites, he found them to be thirty-eight thousand, from thirty years old to fifty; out of which he appointed a certain part to the work of the house of God, the building of the temple, and out of the same six thousand to be judges of the people and scribes, four thousand for porters to the house of God, and as many for singers, to sing to the instruments which David had prepared, as we have said already. He divided them also into courses; and when he had separated the priests from them, he found of these priests twenty-four courses, sixteen of the Levites of Eleazar, and eight of that of Asaph: and he ordained that one course should minister to God eight days from Sabbath to Sabbath. And thus were the courses distributed by lot, in the presence of David, and Zadok and Abiathar the high and the captain of the priests, and concerning the course which came up first was written down as the first, and accordingly the second, and so on to the twenty-fourth; and this partition hath remained to this day. He also made twenty-four courses of the sons of Levi; and when they cast lots, they came up in the same manner for their courses of eight days. He also honored the posterity of Moses, and made them the keepers of the treasuries of God, and of the donations which the kings dedicated. He also ordained, that all the tribe of Levi, as well as the priests, should serve God night and day, as Moses had enjoined them.
8. After this he parted the entire army into twelve parts, with their leaders, (and captains of hundreds,) and commanders. Now every part had twenty-four thousand, which were ordered to wait on Solomon, by thirty days at a time, from the first day till the last, with the captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds. He also set rulers over every part, such as he knew to be good and righteous men. He set others also to take charge of the treasuries, and of the villages, and of the fields, and of the beasts, whose names I do not record. But as for David when he had ordered all these offices, after the manner before mentioned, he called the rulers of the Hebrews, and their heads of tribes, and the officers over the several divisions, and said unto them: Come near, and hear the word of the Lord God with a loud voice, and with every possession: and standing upon a high pulpit, he said to the multitude as follows: "My brethren and my people, I would have you know that I intend to build a house for God, and prepared a large quantity of gold, and a hundred thousand talents of silver, but God prohibited me by the prophet Nathan, because of the wars I had on your account, and because my right hand was pestered by the wars, and I could not but be commanded that my son, who was to succeed me in the kingdom, should build a temple for him. Now, therefore, since you know that of the twelve sons whom Jacob our forfather had, Judah was the most beloved, and was offered before my six brethren, and received the government from God, and that none of them were uneasy at it, so do I also desire that my sons be not audacious one against another; now Solomon, therefore, is the most beloved, and he will build him cheerfully for their lord, as knowing that God hath chosen him: for it is not a grievous thing to obey even a foreigner as a ruler, if it be God's will. For then it is fit to rejoice that he hath obtained that dignity, since the rest partake of it with him. And I pray that the promises of God may be fulfilled; and that this happiness which he hath promised to bestow upon king Solomon, may comfort you all for all time to come. And these promises, O son, will be firm, and come to a happy end, if thou showest thyself to be a religious and a righteous man, and an observer of the laws of the king, but if not, expect adversity upon thy disobedience to them." 9. Now when the king had said this, he left off, but gave the description and pattern of the building of the temple in the sight of them all, to Solomon and his accolytes, inferior and superior, how many they were to be, and how large in height and in breadth; as also he determined the weight of the golden and silver vessels; moreover, he earnestly exhorted them with his words, to use the utmost alacrity about the work; he exhorted the rulers also, and particularly the tribe of Levi, to assist him, both because of his youth, and because God had chosen him to take care of the building of the temple, and of the government of the kingdom. He also declared to them that the work would be easy, and not very laborious to them, because he had prepared for it many talents of gold, and hundreds of silver vessels, and great many carpenters and stonemasons, and a large quantity of emeralds, and all sorts of precious stones: and he said, that even now he would give the proper goods of his own dominion to fill up the remaining talents of pure gold, and the most holy place, and for the chariot of God, the cherubims, which are

*David is here greatly blamed by some for recommending Joab and Shimel to be punished by Solomon, if he could find a proper occasion, after he had borne him a great love; but they were men who had committed the other entirely, which Solomon executed accordingly: yet I cannot discern any fault either in David or to stand over and cover the ark. Now when David had done speaking, there appeared great alacrity among the rulers and the priests, and the Levites, who now contributed, and made great and splendid promises for a future contribution, for they undertook to bring of gold five thousand talents, and ten thousand drachmas, and of silver ten thousand talents, and many ten thousand talents of iron; and if any one had a precious stone he brought it, and bequeathed it to be put among the treasures; of which Jachiel one of the sons of the Levites was the chief. 10. Upon this occasion all the people rejoiced, as in particular did David, when he saw the zeal and forward ambition of the rulers and the priests, and of all the rest; and he began to sing a song to praise God with a loud voice, to haveward and every possession: and standing upon a high pulpit, he said to the multitude as follows: "My brethren and my people, I would have you know that I intend to build a house for God, and prepared a large quantity of gold, and a hundred thousand talents of silver, but God prohibited me by the prophet Nathan, because of the wars I had on your account, and because my right hand was pestered by the wars, and I could not but be commanded that my son, who was to succeed me in the kingdom, should build a temple for him. § 1. A LITTLE afterward David also fell into a distemper, by reason of his age; and perceiving that he was near to death, he called his son Solomon, and discoursed to him thus: "I am now, O my son, going to be endued with a body which is the common way which all men that now are, or shall be hereafter, must go; from which way it is no longer possible to return, and to know any thing that is done in this world. On which account I exhort thee, while I am still alive, though already very near to death, in the same manner as I have formerly said in my advice to thee, to be righteous towards thy subjects, and religious towards God, that hath given thee thy kingdom; to observe his commands and his laws, which he hath sent us by Moses; and neither do thou out of favor nor flattery allow any lust or other passion to weigh with thee, to disregard them; for if thou transgress his laws, thou wilt lose the favor of God, and thou wilt turn away his providence from thee in all things; but if thou behave thyself so as it behooves thee, and as I exhort thee, thou wilt preserve our kingdom to our family; our whole house will bear rule over the Hebrews, but we ourselves, for all ages. Be thou also mindful of the transgressions of Joab, the captain of the

CHAP. I.

How Solomon, when he had received the Kingdom, took off his Enemies.

1. WE have already treated of David, and his virtue; and of the benefits he was the author of to his countrymen; of his wars also, and battles which he managed with success, and then died an old man, in the foregoing book. And when Solomon his son, who was but a youth in age, had taken the kingdom, and whom David had declared, while he was alive, the lord of that people, according to God's will: when he sat upon the throne, the whole body of the people manifestly and sincerely honours to him, as is usual at the beginning of a reign, and wished that all his affairs might come to a blessed conclusion: and that he might arrive at a great age, and at the most happy state of affairs possible.

2. But Adonijah, who, while his father was living, attempted to gain possession of the government, came to the king's mother Bathsheba, and saluted her with great civility; and when she asked him, whether he came to her as desiring her assistance in any thing or not, and bade him tell her if that were the case, for that she would cheerfully afford it him; he began to say, that "she knew herself that the kingdom was his, both on account of his elder age, and of the disposition of the multitude, and that yet it was transferred to Solomon her son, according to the will of God. He also said that he was contented to be a servant under him, and was pleased with the present settlement, but he desired her to be a means of obtaining a favor from his brother to him, and to persuade him not to allow it; he carried this petition with so much address, that she could not but succour him, and so he was set on the throne, and gave him the kingdom.

3. Solomon also was good, and kept the law of the Lord. And the house of David was a servile to that time, and the kingdom was very large, and the word of the Lord was in the midst of them, and they were prosperous in all their works. Solomon also was a great prince in the land of Israel, being 35 years old, and in the first year of his reign, he had more than 10,000 men in his army, and more than 10,000 men in his household; and he was a king in the midst of the people, and was a prince in the land of Israel. Solomon was also a prince in the land of Israel, being 35 years old, and in the first year of his reign, he had more than 10,000 men in his army, and more than 10,000 men in his household; and he was a king in the midst of the people, and was a prince in the land of Israel.

4. Solomon was also a prince in the land of Israel, being 35 years old, and in the first year of his reign, he had more than 10,000 men in his army, and more than 10,000 men in his household; and he was a king in the midst of the people, and was a prince in the land of Israel. Solomon was also a prince in the land of Israel, being 35 years old, and in the first year of his reign, he had more than 10,000 men in his army, and more than 10,000 men in his household; and he was a king in the midst of the people, and was a prince in the land of Israel.

5. Solomon was also a prince in the land of Israel, being 35 years old, and in the first year of his reign, he had more than 10,000 men in his army, and more than 10,000 men in his household; and he was a king in the midst of the people, and was a prince in the land of Israel. BOOK VIII.—CHAP. II.

he should ask, and complained that she did not know her dead; nor could he obtain what she desired, so she treated him to grant that his brother Adonijah might marry Abishag.

3. But the king was greatly offended at these words, and sent for Abiathar, the high priest, and said, "Adonijah aimed at great things, and that he wondered that she did not desire him to yield up the kingdom to him, as to his elder brother, since she desired that he might marry Abishag, and that which belong to him, David, as the king of the host, and Abiathar the priest." So he called to Benaiath, the captain of the guards, and ordered him to slay his brother Adonijah. He also called for Abiathar the priest, and said to him, "I will not put thee to death, because of those other hardships which thou hast endured with my father, and because of the ark which thou hast borne along with me, but I inflict this following punishment upon thee, because thou art among Adonijah's followers, and not of his party. Do not thou continue here, nor come any more into my sight, but go to thine own town, and live on thy own fields, and there abide all thy life: for now thou canst get nothing but just that thou shouldst retain thy dignity any longer." For the forementioned cause therefore it was, that the house of Ithamar was deprived of the sacred altar, as God had foretold to Eli, that his son Abiathar should be transferred to the family of Phineas, to Zadok. Now those that were of the family of Phineas, but lived privately during the time that the high priesthood was transferred to the house of Ithamar, (as it frequently Eli was then the first that received it,) were these that follow: Bukk, the son of Abiathar the high priest; his son was Joatham; Joatham's son was Meremoth; Meremoth's son was Arophes; Arophes's son was Abiath; and Abiath's son was Zadok, and was first made high priest in the reign of David.

4. Now when Joab the captain of the host heard of the slaughter of Adonijah, he was greatly afraid, for he was a greater friend to him than to Solomon; and suspecting, not without reason, that he was in danger on account of his favor to Adonijah, he fled to the altar, and supposed he might procure safety thereby to himself, because that had been the custom, when some had been sacrificed upon the altar; but, when some told the king what Joab's supposal was, he sent Benaiath, and commanded him to raise him up from the altar, and bring him to the judgment-seat, in order to make his defense. He, however, feared, yet not for himself, but for his city, which would die there, rather than in another place. And when Benaiath had reported his answer to the king, Solomon commanded him to cut off his head there, and let him take that as a punishment for those two captains of the host whom he had wickedly slain, and to bury his body, that his sins might never leave his family, but that himself and his father, by Joab's death, might be guiltless. And when Benaiath had done what he was sent by Solomon to do unto Joab, he went to Solomon; and Solomon gave him to understand, that he was not to judge the people, as a native, and to execute the judgments of God, and the just judgments that were by mouth of the Lord, according to the law of Moses, and to preside over the whole. And Solomon said unto Solomon, Solomon commanded him to build him a house, and sit at Jerusalem, and attend upon him, and should not have authority to go over member of the brook Cedron; and that if he disobeyed that command, death should be his punishment. He was also commanded to secure to him, that he compelled him to take an oath that he would obey. Accordingly, Shimeai said, that

\"The execution upon Josiah, as a murderer, by saying him, even when he had taken, or committed, was perfectly against the law of Moses, which enjoineth no punishment of him, but that he should restore to his neighbor to slay him with, shoulst thou take him from mine altar that he die. Exod. xxi. 14.

5. And Benaiath, the captain of the guards, and the mighty men of the king, gathered themselves unto him, and they reported the king's command, and went with him; and they came to the city of David, and he sat upon the throne in the palace, and all the people of the land, of the elders and the princes, bowed down before the king. And they said, "Thou art the right hand of the Lord our God, and in thy hand is the secret of wisdom and knowledge; for by wisdom thou hast made us to dwell in a city that is built; and on this in such a degree as no other mortal man, neither kings nor ordinary persons, ever had.

CHAP. II.

Concerning the Wife of Solomon; concerning his Wisdom and Riches; and concerning what he obtained of Hiram for the Building of the Temple.

1. Solomon having already settled himself firmly in his kingdom, and having brought his enemies to punishment, he married the daughter of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and built the walls of Jerusalem; much larger and stronger than those that had been built before; and those who managed public affairs very peaceably; nor was his youth any hindrance in the exercise of justice, or in the observation of the laws, or in the remembrance of what charges his father had given him at his death, but he discharged all with great accuracy, that might have been expected from such as are aged, and of the greatest prudence. He now resolved to go to Hebron, and sacrifice to God upon the altar that was built by Moses. Accordingly, he offered there burnt-offerings, in number a thousand; and when he had done this, he thought he had paid great honor to God, for as was said above, he thought that the offerings that are generally offered by most men, as long as the greatest worth, and the best gifts of God, "but," said he, "give me, O Lord, a sound mind and a good understanding, whereby I may speak and judge the people; and righteousness." With these petitions God was well pleased; and promised to give him all those things that he had not mentioned in his option, riches, glory, victory over his enemies; and, in the first place, upon this word, "righteousness." This building of the walls of Jerusalem, soon after David's death. Illustrates the conclusion of the 31st Psalm where David prays, build the walls of Jerusalem, they have been built in my time; see chap. vi. sect. 1; and ch. vii. sect. 7; also 1 Kings iv. 13.

ANTIQUITIES OF THE JEWS.

He also promised to preserve the kingdom to his posterity for a very long time, if he continued righteous, and obedient to him, and imitated his father in those things wherein he excelled. When Solomon heard this from God, he presently led out of his bed, and when he had worshiped him he returned to Jerusalem; and after he had offered great sacrifices before the tabernacle, he feasted all his own family.

And now came before him in judgment, which it was very difficult to find any end of; and I think it necessary to explain the fact, about which the contest was, that such as light upon my writings may know what a difficult subject it was to determine, and those that are concerned in such matters may take this sagacity of the king for a pattern, that they may the more easily give sentence about such questions:—There were two women who were harlots in the course of their lives, that came to him; of whom she that seemed to be injured began to speak first, and said, "O king, I and this other woman dwell together in one room: now it came to pass that we both bore a son at the same hour of the same day. And one of them died. And there was this woman that overtook her son, and killed it, and then took my son out of my bosom, and removed him to herself, and as I was asleep she laid her dead son upon him. Now, when in the morning, I was desirous to give the breast; the boy enjoyed the breast that I did not find my own, but saw the woman’s dead child lying by me, for I considered it exactly, and found it so to be. Hence it was that I demanded mine. And when I could not obtain it, I had recourse, my lord, to thy assistance; for since we were alone, and there was nobody there that could convict her, she cares for nothing, but perseveres in the stout denial of the fact." When this was said, the king asked the other woman what she had to say in contradiction of this story? But when she denied that she had done what was charged upon her, and said, that it was her child that was living, and that it was her antagonist’s child that was dead, and when no one could devise what judgment might be given, and the whole court were blind in their understanding, and could not tell how to find out this riddle, the king alone inVent-ed the following way: He ordered that he be bade them bring in both the dead child and the living child; and sent one of his guards, and commanded him to fetch a sword, and draw it, and to take children into the places, that each of the women might have half of a living, and half the dead child. Hereupon all the people privately laughed at the king, as no more than a youth. But in the mean time, she that was the real mother of the living child, cried out, that he should not do so, but deliver the child to the other woman as her own, for she would be satisfied with the life of the child, and with the sight of it, although it were esteemed the other’s child; but the other woman was ready to see the child divided, and was desirous moreover that the first woman should be tormented. When the king understood that both their words proceeded from the truth of their passions, he adjudged the child to that mother, that she saw it, that she was the real mother of it, and he condemned the other as a wicked woman, who had not only killed her own child, but was endeavors to see her friend’s child destroyed also. Now the multitude looked on this determination as a great sign and demonstration of the king’s sagacity and wisdom, and after that day, attended to him as to one that had a divine endowment in his wisdom.

3. Now the confines of his armies, and officers appointed over the whole country, were these: over the lot of Ephraim was Uzia; over the topharship of Bethlem, was Diocleras; Abinadab, the son of Solomon’s day, was over the region of Dora, and the sea-coast, under him; the great plain was under Benaiah, the son of Achillic; he also governed all the country as far as Jordan; Gabbarius ruled over Gilead and Gaul. And the city of Jerusalem was divided into fences cities [of Ogr]. Achinadab managed the affairs of all Galilee, as far as Sidon; and had himself also married a daughter of Solomon, whose name was Basima; Banacates had the sea-coast about Arce; as Shaphat Meiron Tabor, and Carmel, and [the Lower] Galilee, as far as the river Jordan; one man was appointed over all this country; Shimeii was entrusted with the lot of Benjamin; and Gabbarus had the country of the north, and ruled it, and was governor over all, one governor appointed. Now the people of the Hebrews, and particularly the tribe of Judah, received a wonderful increase when they betook themselves to husbandry, and the cultivation of their lands, and they were no longer patient of the burden and oppression of the Egyptians, and they were not distracted with wars and troubles, and having besides an abundant fruition of the most desirable liberty, every one was busy in augmenting the product of their own lands, and making them worth more than they had formerly been.

4. The king had also other rulers, who were over the land of Syria, and of the Philippines, and of the region of the sea, and of Egypt, and these collected his tributes of the nations. Now these contributed to the king’s table, and to his supper every day, thirty cori of fine flour, and sixty of meal; as also ten fat oxen, and twenty oxen out of the pasture, and a hundred fat lambs; all these were besides what were taken by hunting, harts and buffaloes, and birds and fishes, which were brought to the king by foreigners day by day. Solomon had also so great a number of horses, and chariots, that they were not to be counted. Now the horses of Solomon were of forty thousand, and besides these he had twelve thousand horsemen, the one half of whom waited upon the king in Jerusalem, and the other were dispersed abroad in all the other districts of the kingdom, and the same officer who provided for the king’s expenses, supplied also the fodder for the horses, and still carried it to the place where the king abode at that time.

5. Now the sagacity and wisdom which God had bestowed on Solomon was so great, that he exceeded the ancients; insomuch that he was no way inferior to the Egyptians, who are said to have been beyond all men in understanding; nay, indeed, it is evident that their sagacity was very much inferior to that of the king’s. He also excelled and distinguished himself in wisdom above those who were most eminent among the Hebrews at that time for shrewdness; those I mean were Jeconia and Heman, and Chushathiah, and Darda, the sons of Mahol. He also composed books of odes and songs, a thousand and nre; of parables and similitudes, three thousand; for he day store of all sorts of wines; and yet for all this, I tell you that the gold and silver that he had was not enough, and, he brought in from the traders, that the busonage was heavy up on the people." Neh. vi. 18.

See the whole context, ver. 14—19. Nor did the governor’s business end here; for Solomon, that was in 16B.C. building the walls of Jerusalem, and maintained more than usual, above one hundred and fifty, consider- able men by day, and that before the nation was then very poor, at his own charge also, without laying any burden upon the people at all. Now that which was prepared for me daily was one ox and six choice sheep; also fowls were paired for me, and once in ten spake a parable upon every sort of tree, from the bayscop to the cedar; and in like manner also about beasts, about all sorts of living creatures, whether upon the earth, or in the sea, or in the air; for he was not acquainted with any of their names; nor omitted a thing which they had described; but described them all like a philosopher, and demonstrated his exquisite knowledge of their several properties. God also enabled him to learn that skill which expels demons, which is a great blessing to man and society. Solomon associated himself with the accumulation of numerous demons, but despised such incantations also by which distempers are alleviated. And he left behind him the manner of using exorcisms, by which they drive away demons, so that they never return; and thus the greatest care is of great assistance to this day: for I have seen a certain man of my own country, whose name was Eleazar, relieving people that were demoniacal, in the presence of Vasenian, and his son, and his captains, and the whole multitude of his soldiers. The manner of the care was this: he put a ring that had a root of one of those sorts mentioned by Solomon, to the nostrils of the demoniac, after which he spoke the words of the demon's god in the name of man: and when the man fell down immediately, he adjured him to return into him no more, making still mention of Solomon, and reciting the incantations which he composed. And when Eleazar was speaking, it was as if he had cut down many and large trees of cedar, and with the skill and wisdom of Solomon was showed very manifestly; for which reason it is that all men may know the vastness of Solomon's art, and that he was beloved of God, and that the extraordinary virtue of his heart, with which this king was endow'd, may not be unknown to any people under the sun; for this reason, I say, it is that we have proceeded to speak of that man.

Moreover, Hiram king of Tyre, when he had heard that Solomon succeeded to his father's kingdom, was very glad of it, for he was a friend of David. So he sent ambassadors to him, and sent him cedar, and pine, and algum trees, and every sort of pleasant wood, and sent happy state of his affairs. Upon which Solomon sent him an epistle. The contents of which here follow:

Solomon to King Hiram.

"Know thou that my father had built a temple to God, but was hindered by wars and continual expeditions; for he did not leave off to overthrow his enemies till he made them all subject to tribute. But I, for the peace I at present enjoy, and on that account I am at leisure, and design to build a house to God, for God foretold to my father that such a house should be built by me; wherefore I desire thee to send the subjects of thy dominion to Lebanon; and at the same time to mount Lebanon to cut down timber, for the Sidonians are more skillful than our people in cutting of wood. As for wages to the hewers of wood, I will pay whatsoever price thou shalt determine.

7. When Hiram had read this epistle, he was pleased with it, and wrote back this answer to Solomon:

Hiram to King Solomon.

"It is fit to bless God that he hath committed thy father's goings forth and comings in, and to an hundred wise men, and endowed with all virtues. As for myself, I rejoice at the condition thou art in, and will be subservient to thee in all thou sendest to me about; for when by my subjects I have cut down many and large trees of cedar, and of emphasis wood, I will send them to thee, and will order my subjects to make floats of them, and to sail to what place soever of thy country thou shalt desire, and leave them there, after which thy subjects may carry them to Jerusalem; but do thou take care to procure us corn for this timber, which we stand in need of, because we inhabit in an island."

8. The copies of these epistles remain at this day, and are preserved not only in our books, but among the Tyrians also, insomuch that if any one would know the certainty about them, he may desire of the keepers of the public records of Tyre to show them; and he will find what is there set down to agree with what we have said. I have said so much out of a desire that my readers may know that we speak nothing but the truth, and do not compose a history out of some that are not true. Receive men and please them at the same time, then joined to the continent at the present remains of Palaestrya by a neck of land over against Solomon's times, still so called; and the city's fresh water probably was carried by pipes by that neck of land, and that this island was then more inhabited than a peninsula, having villas and in its fields, Esdr. xxvi. 6, and a wall about it, Amos i. 10; and the city was not so great reputation as Sidon for some ages, but that it was attacked both by sea and land by Palmasi and the Sidonians, as Josephus informs us, Antiq. b. ix. chap. xiv. sect. 2; and afterward came to be the metropolis of Phoenicia, and afterward taken and destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, according to the numerous scripture prophecies therein relating, Jer. xxx. 16. Esdr. xxxv. 5, xlvii. 4; Ezek. xxv. xxvii. xxviii.

These epistles of Solomon and Hiram are those in 1 Kings v. 3-9; and as enlarged, in 2 Chron. ii. 3-16; both of which are in Esaias.

What Josephus here puts into his copy of Hiram's epistle to Solomon, and repeats afterward, chap. sec. 2 that Tyre was now an island, is not in any of the three books, nor in that that time of Ezra or Esaias; nor is it any other, suppose, than his own conjectural paraphrase; for when I many years ago inquired into this subject, or inquired after any thing, as to the true city, and of the island whereupon it stood, to have been very different at different times. The result of my inquiry, particularly relative to the present war improvements, stands thus. That the best testimonies hereof relating, imply that Palaestrya, or oldest Tyre, was the great city, and that after the city Tyre, situated on the continent, and mentioned in Josh. xix. 28, out of which the Casanites or Pheniacle inhabitants were driven into a large island that lay not far off in the sea by Joshua; that this island was nor attempt to avoid examination, nor desire men to believe us immediately; nor are we at liberty to depart from speaking truth, which is the proper commendation of a historian, and yet be blameless. But we insist upon no admission of what we say, unless we be able to manifest its truth by demonstration and the strongest vouchers.

3. Now, in building Solomon, as soon as this estate from the king of Tyre was brought him, commanded the readiness and good-will he declared therein, and repaid him in what he desired, and sent him yearly twenty thousand curr'i of wheat, and as many baths of oil; now the bath is able to carry about as much as a bucket, and he also gave him the same measure of wine. So the friendly, between Hiram and Solomon hereby increased more and more: and they swore to continue it, that this tribute to be laid on all the people, of thirty thousand laborers, whose work be rendered easy to them by prudently dividing it among them: for he made ten thousand cut timber in mount Lebanon for the Hesbon and call Artemisius; and they rest two months until the time when the other twenty thousand had finished their task at the appointed time; and so afterward it came to pass that the first ten thousand returned to their work after thirty-four months, and with Adonis, who was over this tribute. There were also of the strangers who were left by David, who were to carry the stones, and other materials, seventy thousand; and of those that cut the stones, eighty thousand. Of the three hundred and fifty thousand were ruled over the rest. He also enjoined them to cut out large stones for the foundations of the temple, and that they should fit the stones together, so as the mountain was, and so bring them to the city. This was done not only by our own country workmen, but by those workmen whom Hiram sent also.

CHAP. III.

Of the Building of the Temple.

1. Solomon began to build the temple in the fourth year of his reign, on the second month, when he had gathered together all the capable workmen, and the Hebrews Jed, five hundred and ninety-two years after the exodus out of Egypt, but after one thousand and twenty years from Abraham's coming out of Canaan; and after the deluge one thousand four hundred and forty years; and from Adam, the first man who was created, until Solomon built the temple, there had passed in all three thousand one hundred and twenty years; and that over that on which the temple began to be built, was already the eleventh year of the reign of Hiram; but from the building of Tyre to the building of the temple, there had passed two hundred and forty years.

2. Now, therefore, the king laid the foundations of the temple very deep in the ground, and the materials were strong stones, and such as would resist the force of time; these were to unite themselves with the earth, and become a basis and a sure foundation for that superstructure which was to be erected over it: they were to be so strong, in order to sustain with ease those vast superstructures, and precious ornaments, whose own weight was not to be less than the weight of those other high and heavy buildings which the king designed to be very ornamental and magnificent; they erected its entire body, quite up to the roof, of white stone: its height was sixty cubits, and its length was the same, and its breadth twenty. There was another building erected over it, equal to it in its measures: so that the entire altitude of the temple was a hundred and twenty cubits. Its front was to the east. As to the length, they built it before the temple, and the length was twenty cubits, and it was so ordered that it might agree with the breadth of the house: and it had twelve cubits in latitude, and its height was raised as high as a hundred and twenty cubits. It is a round about the temple; and of this room, which might include the whole temple, by their closeness one to another, and by their number, and outward position round it. He also made passages through them, that they might have access to the temple: besides, one of these rooms had five cubits in breadth, and the same in length, but in height twenty. Above these there were other rooms, and others.

3. Now when the king had divided the temple into two parts, he made the inner house of twenty cubits [every way,] to be the most secret chamber, but he appointed that of forty cubits to be the sanctuary; and when he had cut a door-place, he went in and out without being discovered, and overlaid them with a great deal of gold, that had sculptures upon it. He also had veils of blue and purple, and scarlet, and the brightest and softest linen, with the most curious flowers embroidered upon it, which were before those doors. He also dedicated for the most secret place, whose breadth was twenty cubits, and length the same, two cherubims of solid gold; the height of each of them was five large interval between one and the other that was over it, and this with double floors, the one of six cubits thickness, and the other was a foot and a half thick; but the raising that of the second, so that the height was raised as high as a hundred and twenty cubits. It is a round about the temple; and of this room, which might include the whole temple, by their closeness one to another, and by their number, and outward position round it. He also made passages through them, that they might have access to the temple: besides, one of these rooms had five cubits in breadth, and the same in length, but in height twenty. Above these there were other rooms, and others.

Josephus says here, that the cherubims were of solid gold, and only five cubits high, while our Hebrew copies have they were of silver and a foot and a half thick; but the raising that of the second, so that the height was raised as high as a hundred and twenty cubits. It is a round about the temple; and of this room, which might include the whole temple, by their closeness one to another, and by their number, and outward position round it. He also made passages through them, that they might have access to the temple: besides, one of these rooms had five cubits in breadth, and the same in length, but in height twenty. Above these there were other rooms, and others.

It is a round about the temple; and of this room, which might include the whole temple, by their closeness one to another, and by their number, and outward position round it. He also made passages through them, that they might have access to the temple: besides, one of these rooms had five cubits in breadth, and the same in length, but in height twenty. Above these there were other rooms, and others.

It is a round about the temple; and of this room, which might include the whole temple, by their closeness one to another, and by their number, and outward position round it. He also made passages through them, that they might have access to the temple: besides, one of these rooms had five cubits in breadth, and the same in length, but in height twenty. Above these there were other rooms, and others.
cubits: they had each of them two wings stretched out as far as five cubits; wherefore Solomon set them up not far from each other, that with one wing they might touch the southern wall of the most sacred place, and with another the northern wall of their other wings, which joined to each other, were a covering to the ark, which was set between them: but nobody can tell, or even conjecture, what was the shape of these cherubims. He also made down one side of the temple, to the length of a side of gold; and he added doors to the gate of the temple, agreeable to the measure of the height of the wall, but in breadth twenty cubits, and on them he gilded gold plates. And, to say all in one word, he was so skilled in the making of all those things, whether he painted on the internal or external, but what was covered with gold. He also had curtains drawn over these doors in like manner as they were drawn over the inner doors, although the holy place and the porch of the temple had nothing of that sort.

4. Now Solomon sent for an artificer out of Tyre, whose name was Hiram: he was by birth of the tribe of Naphtali, on the mother’s side; (for his father was the son of Ur, of the stock of the Leshites.) This man was skilful in all sorts of work; but his chief skill lay in working in gold, in silver, and brass, by whom were made all the mechanical works about the temple. He was also able to teach him, he and his sons, the art of building, and of working with gold, and their circumference twelve cubits, but there was cast with each of their Chapters lily-work that stood upon the pillar, and it was elevated five cubits, round about which there was network into which the lilies were inlaid, and brass, and covered the lily-work. To this also were hung two hundred pomegranates, in two rows: the one of these pillars he set at the entrance of the porch at the right hand, and called it Booz.

5. Solomon also cast a brasen sea, whose figure was that of a hemisphere: this brasen vessel was called a sea, for its largeness, for the lake, and for its feet it had, and the thickness of a palm: its middle part rested on a short pillar, that had ten spirals round it; and that pillar was ten cubits in diameter. There stood another pillar, for the temple, round about which the four winds of heaven, three to each wind, having their hinder parts depressed, that so the hemispherical vessel might rest upon them, which itself was also depressed round about inwardly. Now this one contains the thirty thousand bar Silver.

6. He also made ten brazen bases for so many quadrangular layers; the length of every one of these bases was five cubits, and the breadth four cubits, and the height six cubits. This vessel was partly turned, and was thus contrived: there were four small quadrangular pillars that stood one at each corner, these had the sides of the base fitted to them on each quarter: they were partly turned, and then ordered fitted to support [the laver], upon which was engraved, in one place a lion, and in another place a bull and an eagle. The small pillars had gold; and both agree they were ten cubits high. I suppose the number is here falsely transcribed, and that Josephus wrote ten cubits also.

Levites about the temple. That is, Jerubin and Booz, their height could be no more than eighteen cubits, as here, and 1 Kings xvii. 15; 2 Kings xiv. 17; Jer. iii. 19; these Levites, as is said above, had an interest in the temple; and the true reading in the text contra- vention of all the rules of architecture in the world.

7. The round or cylindrical layers of four cubits in diameter, in which the pillars stood, and eight round pillars about the temple, in which were set the figures, the names of the kings, and the parables; and the twelve standing round the temple, one from the other, and with their feet in the same level, was a very great deal more than these forty baths, which are always assigned them. Where the error lies is hard to say. Perhaps Josephus meant that they were levitical persons, and that they had been corrupted, and he was not able to restore the same animals engraved that were engraved on the sides. The whole work was elevated, and stood upon four wheels, which were also cast, which had also naves and felloses, and were a foot and a half in diameter, and a half cubit high. Any man who threw the spokes of the wheels, how exactly they were turned and united to the sides of the bases, and with what harmony they agreed to the felloses would wonder at them. However, their struc-

called the Hin and the Assaron, [a tenth deal,] there were twenty thousand of gold, and twice as many of silver. The golden censers, in which they carried the incense to the altar, were twenty thousand: the other censers, in which they carried the incense for the little altar, were fifty thousand. The sacerdotal garments, which belonged to the high priest, with the long robes, and the oracle, and the precious stones, were a thousand. But the crowns upon which the sacerdotal persons were crowned, were of gold. The Ark of the Power of God, was only one, and hath remained to this very day. He also made ten thousand sacerdotal garments of fine linen, with purple girdles, for every priest, and two hundred thousand thousand square yards of the best blue, and of the best purple, and of the best scarlet, and of the best fine linen, and of the best goats' hair; which were made of electrum, [the finest brass,] forty thousand. 9. Solomon made all these things for the honor of God, with great variety and magnificence, spurring no cost, but using all possible liberality in all these things, as much as the treasure house he had made of the treasures of God. He also placed a partition round about the temple, which in our tongue we call Gison, but it is called Thiringeos by the Jews, and he raised it up to the height of three cubits: and it was for the exclusion of the multitude from coming into the temple, and showing that it was a place that was free and open only for the priests. He also built about this temple, with its fanes, whose figure was that of a quadrangle, and erected for it great and broad cloisters: this was entered into by very high gates, each of which had its front exposed to one of the [four] winds, and were shut by golden doors. Into this temple all the people entered that were distinguished from the rest by being pure, and observant of the laws. But he made that temple which was beyond this a wonderful one indeed, and such as exceeds all description in words, nay, if I may so say, is hardly believed upon sight; for when he had filled up great valleys with earth, which, on account of their immense depth, could not he looked on, when you bended down to see them, without pausing at their depths, and the temple and the cubes, he made it to be on a level with the top of the mountain, on which the temple was built, and by this means the outmost temple, which was expressly said to be the temple of God itself. He encompassed also this with a building of a double row of cloisters, which stood on high pillars of native stone, while the roofs were of cedar, and were polished in a manner proper for such high roofs; but he made all the doors of this temple of silver.

CHAP. IV. How Solomon removed the Ark into the Temple: how he made Supplication to God, and offered public Sacrifices to him.

1. When king Solomon had finished these works, these large and beautiful buildings, and had laid up his donations in the temple, and all the golden plate on the high priest's forehead, that was in being in the days of Josephus, and a centurion or two at least later, see the note on Antiq. b. lii. ch. v. i. sect. 6. 2. Now Josephus here says, that the floor of the outmost temple, or court of the Gentiles, was with vast labor raised to be even, or of equal height, with the floor of the court of the priests, and was made in a great estimation only, for he and all others agree, that the inner temple, or court of the priests, was a few cubits lower than the middle court of Israel, and much more was the court of the priests elevated several cubits above the outmost court, since the country of Israel was lower than the one or higher than the other.

3. The Septuagint say, "that they prepared timber and stones to build the temple for three years." 1 Kings vi. 10. This in the interval of seven years, and had given a demonstration of his riches and alacrity therefor, inasmuch that any one who saw it would have thought it must have been an immense time ere it could have been finished; and [would be surprising] if it had been finished in so short a time; short, I mean, if compared with the greatness of the work; he also wrote to the rulers and elders of the Hebrews, and ordered all the people to gather themselves together to Jerusalem to celebrate the festival of Shemini ash-erai, and to build, and to remove the ark of God into it; and when this invitation of the whole body of the people to come to Jerusalem was everywhere carried abroad, it was the seventh month before the Ark was removed. There also it is not the Greek, but the Hebrew, surnamed called Thirisi, but by the Macedonians Hyperberetetus. The feast of tabernacles happened to fall at the same time, which was celebrated by the Hebrews as a most holy and most solemn festival. Now so they carried the ark and the tabernacle which Moses had pitched, and all the vessels that were for ministration to the sacrifices of God, and removed them to the temple. 4. The King himself, and all the people and the Levites, accompanied with sacrifices and drink offerings, and the blood of a great number of oblations, and burning an immense quantity of incense, and this till the night. The whole amount of the vessels and vessels about was so full of these odors that it met, in a very agreeable manner, persons at a great distance, and was an indication of God's presence, and, as men's opinions were, of his habituation with them in the temple, not being but a consecrated place, for they did not grow weary, either of singing hymns or of dancing, until they came to the temple; and in this manner did they carry the ark. But when they should transfer it into the most secret and holy places, they set it before the tabernacle, and only those priests that carried it set it between the two cherubim, which, embracing it with their wings, (for so were they framed by the artificer,) covered it as under a tent or a canopy. Now the ark contained nothing else but those two tables of stone that preserved the ten commandments, which God spake to Moses in mount Sinai, and which were engraved upon them; nor was it the candlestick, and table, nor was it there; but there was but one table most sacred place, in the very same places wherein they stood till that time in the tabernacle. So they offered up the daily sacrifices; but only mighty festivities, and solemn feasts, and solemn festivals, and all the rest of the vessels they gathered together, and put them within the temple.

2. Now, as soon as the priests had put all things in order about the ark, and had gone out, there came down a thick cloud, and stood there, and again a gentle manner of light all over the temple; such a cloud was it, as was diffused, and temperate, not such a rough one as we see full of rain in the winter season. This cloud so darkened the place, that one priest could not discern 18, and although neither our present Hebrew copy nor Josephus distinctly name that number of years, yet do both say the building itself did not begin till Solomon's fourth year; and both speak of the preparation of ma- terials, itself after a great interval of time. 5. 1 Kings v. 16; Antiq. b. lii. ch. v. i. sect. 1. There is no reason therefore to alter the Sep- tuagint's number, but we are to suppose three years to have been spent in preparing these materials, or in doing the work thereon in my computation of the expense in building the temple.

6. The solemn removal of the ark from Mount Sinai to Mount Moriah, at the distance of almost three quarters of a mile, confutes that notion of the moder- nists, who are surprised at the very number of steps, as if those two were after a sort one and the same mountain; for which there is, I think very little foundation.
another, but it answer'd to the minds of all a visible image, and glorious splendor of God, having descended into this temple, and having gladly pitched his tabernacle therein. So these men were intent upon this thought. But Solomon thought for what thou hast written, and used such words to God as he thought agreeable to the divine nature to receive, and fit for him to give: for he said, "Thou hast an eternal house, O Lord, and such a one as thou hast created for the seat of thy glory, that we have not to be the heavens, and the air, and the earth, and the sea, which thou pervadest; nor art thou contained within their limits. I have indeed built this temple to thee, and thy name, that from thence, when we are in distress, we may send our prayers up into the air, and may constantly believe that thou art present, and art not remote from what is thine own; for neither when thou seest all things, and hearest all things, art thou not; but first thou dost leave the care of all men, but rather, thou art very near to them all, and especially thou art present to those that address themselves to thee. When he had thus solemnly confessed himself to God, he converted his discourse to the multitude, and strongly represented the power and providence of God to them; how he had showed all things from the ground, from the beginning, even to this day, to be king; how he had cleared away all that which might be his father, as many of those things as had already come to pass, and the rest would certainly come to pass hereafter; and how he had given him his name, and told to David what he should be called before his name was converted, before he was born, and before he was be king after his father's death he should build him a temple, which, since they saw accomplished according to his prediction, he required them to bless God, and by believing him, from the sight of that temple, to have a confidence in the coming out of the air, and rushed with violence upon the altar, in the sight of all, and caught hold of and consumed the sacrifices. Now, when this divine appearance was seen, the people supposed it to be a sacrifice made in the temple, and were pleased with it, and fell down upon the ground and worshipped. Upon which the king began to bless God, and exhor ted the multitude to do the same, as now having sufficient indications of God's favorable disposition to them; and to pray that they might always have the like indications from him, and that he would preserve in them a mind pure from all wickedness, in righteousness and in true worship. And that we might continue in the observation of those precepts which God had given them by Moses, because by that means the Hebrew nation would be happy, and indeed the nation had always been undivided and unconfused. He exhorted them also to be mindful, that by what methods they had attained their present good things, by the same they must preserve themselves, and make them greater, and more than they were at present; for that it was not sufficient for them to suppose they had received them on account of their piety and righteousness, but that they had no other way of preserving them for the time to come, for that it was not so great a thing for men to wish what which they want, as to preserve what they have acquired, and to be guilty of no sin, whereby it may be hurt. So when the king had spoken thus to the multitude, he dismissed the congregation, but not till he had completed his obligations, both for himself and for the Hebrews, insomuch that he sacrificed twenty and two thousand oxen, and a hundred and twenty thousand sheep; for it was that the greater part of the sacrifices, and all the Hebrews, with their wives and children, feasted therein; nay, besides this, the king then observed splendidly and magnificently the feast which is called the Feast of Tabernacles, before the temple, for twice seven days; and he then feasted together with all the people."
day abroad, induced her to come to him, she being desirous to be satisfied by her own experience, and not by a bare hearing; (for reports thus heard are likely enough to comply with a false opinion, while they wholly depend on the credit given to them.) But he replied, that in the presence of God, and before the witnesses that were with him, I answer also that Herodotus of Halicarnassus, when he said there were three hundred and thirty kings of Egypt after Meneos, who built Memphis, did therefore not tell us their names, because they were not called Pharaohs; for when after their death there was a queen reigning, he calls her by her name Nicaulea, as thereby declaring, that while the kings were of the male line, and so admitted of the same name, while a woman did not adopt the same, he did therefore set down that her name which she could not naturally have. As for myself, I have discovered from our own books, that after Pharaoh, the father-in-law of Solomon, no other king of Egypt was of our name; and that was after that time when the forementioned queen of Egypt and Ethiopia came to Solomon, concerning whom we shall inform the reader presently; but I have now of another of these things, that I may prove that our books and those of the Egyptians agree together in many things.

3. But king Solomon subdued to himself the remnant of the Canaanites that had not before submitted to him; those 1 that dwelled in mount Lebanon, and as far as the city of Hamath; and ordered them to pay tribute. He also chose out of them every year such as were to serve him in his meanest offices, and to do his domestic duties; and distributed the same from none of the Hebrews were servants [in such low employments:] nor was it reasonable, that when God had brought so many nations under their power, they should depress their own people to such a degree of life, rather than those nations: while all the Israelites were concerned in warlike affairs, and were in armor; and were set over the chariots and the horses, rather than leading the life of slaves. He appointed them five hundred and fifty rulers over those Canaanites who were reduced to such domestic slavery, who received the entire care of them from the king, and instructed them in those labors and operations that were most distant.

4. Moreover, the king built many ships in the Egyptian Bay of the Red Sea, in a certain place called Ezion-geber: it is now called Berenice, and is not far from the city of Eloth. This country belonged formerly to the Jews, and became useful for shipping, from the donations of Hiram king of Tyre; for he sent a sufficient number of men thither for pilots, and such as were skilful in navigation, to whom Solomon gave this command, that they should replenish with his own stores and supplies, and go and trade to the land that was of old called Ophir, but now the Aurea Chersonesus, which belongs to India, to fetch him gold. And when they had gathered four hundred talents together, they returned to the king again.

5. There was then a woman queen of Egypt and Ethiopia: she was inquisitive in philosophy, and one that on other accounts also was to be admired. She arrived at this wise, and prudent, and prudent; and when she heard the name of Solomon, she had a great mind to see him, and the reports that went every

* That the queen of Sheba was a queen of Sheba in South Arabia, and not of Egypt and Ethiopia, as Josephus says them, is, I suppose, now generally agreed. And since Sheba is well known to be a country near the sea in the south of Arabia Felix, which lay south from Judaea, and that was in the direction of our favourite carries all this queen, the queen of the south, and says she came from the utmost parts of the earth, Matt. xiii. 48; Luke xii. 37; which description agrees better in this Arabia than to Egypt and Ethiopia, there is little occasion for doubting in this matter.

6. Now when the queen had thus demonstrated in words how deeply the king had affected her, her disposition was known by certain presents, for she gave him twenty talents of gold, and as many talents of silver, and gold, and pure gold, and all sorts of precious things (They say also that we possess the root of that balsam which our country still bears by this word Ethiopie, there is little occasion for doubting in this matter.

7. Thus the name Josephus for supposing, that the balsam tree might be first brought out of Arabia, or Egypt, or Ethiopia, into Judea, by this queen of Sheba, since several have said that of old time it grew in the country of Egypt, and that of Ethiopia, but Judea; yet it is notoriously false that this balsam was peculiar to Judea, for both Egypt and Arabia, and many other countries have it, which last was receive the like from him, but that he who could not solve them should pay money to him that did solve them, and that Hiram accepted the conditions; and when he was not able to solve the riddles [propoused by Solomon], he paid a great deal of money for his fine; but that he afterward did solve the proposed riddles by means of Ab- demon, a man of Tyre; and that Hiram proposed other riddles, which, when Solomon could not solve, he paid back a great deal of money to Hiram.

This it is which Dius wrote.

CHAP. VI.

How Solomon fortified the City of Jerusalem, and built great Cities; and how he brought some of the Canaanites into Subjection, and entangled Egypt and Queen of Sheba.

¶ 1. Now when the king saw that the walls of Jerusalem stood in need of being better secured, and made stronger (for he thought the walls that encompassed Jerusalem ought to correspond to the dignity of the city,) he both repaired them, and made them bigger, deep journeys for upon them; he also built cities which might be counted among the strongest, Hazor and Megiddo, and the third Gezer, which had indeed belonged to the Philistines; but Pharaoh the king of Egypt had made it, and had taken it by force, and when he had slain all its inhabitants, he utterly overthrew it, and gave it as a present to his daughter, who had been married to Solomon; for which reason the king rebuilt it as a city strong and might be useful in wars, and the mutations of af-airs that sometimes happen. Moreover, he built two other cities not far from it; Beth-horon was the name of one of them, and Beth-gublah the other. He also built other cities that lay convenient for these, in order to the enjoyment of pleasures and delicacies in them, such as were naturally of a good temperature of the air, and agreeable for fruits ripe in their proper season, and well watered with springs. Nay, Solomon went as far as the desert above Syria, and possessed himself of it, and built there a very great city, which was distant two days' journey from the Upper Syria, and full of silver, gold, precious stones, and cedars, and six long days' journey from Babyl-on the great. Now, the reason why this city lay so remote from the parts of Syria that are inhabted, and is not situated as the other cities of the king himself, and that it is in that place only that there are springs and pits of water. When he had, therefore, built this city, and encompassed it with very strong walls, he gave it the name of Tadmor, and this is the name it is called by at this day among the Syrians; but the Grecian name is Palmira.

2. Now Solomon the king was at this time engaged in building these cities. But if any inquire why all the kings of Egypt from Memes, who built Memphis, and was many years earlier than our forefather Abraham, until Solomon, where the interval was more than one thousand three hundred years, were called Pharaohs, and he took it from one of the kings of that interval, I think it necessary to inform them of it, in order to cure their ignorance, and to make the occasion of that name manifest. Pharaoh, in the Egyptian tongue, signified a king, but I think the other names from their childhood; but when they were

* This distinction of the name Pharaoh appears to be true. Before the name of Egypt was called Pharaoh after Solomon's father, it does hardly agree to our copies, which have long after been altered. Josephus, in his own speech to the Jews, if the War, b. xvi. c. 45, sect. 4, speaks of Necho as who was also called Pharaoh, as the name of a king of Egypt with whom Abraham was acquainted; of which name Nechoes yet we have ever so little mention till the days of Josiah, but only of Pharaoh. And indeed Josephus himself in another passage of that book, B. 5, he has made more mistakes made by Josephus, and those mistakes the kings of Egypt, and to that queen of Egypt and Ethiopia, whom he supposed to have come to see Solomon, than almost any where else in all his Antiquities.
made kings, they changed them into the name of kings, and made them inherit their автори-ty; for thus it was also that the kings of Alexandria, who were called formerly by other names, when they took the kingdom, were named Potle-mies, from their first king. The Roman emperors also were from their first successors called by other names, but are all styled Caesars, their empire and their dignity imposing that name upon them, and not suffering them to continue in those names which their fathers gave them. I suppose the last of the line of the Hellenes, whom he said there were three hundred and thirty kings of Egypt after Memes, who built Memphis, did therefore not tell us their names, because they were in common called Pharaohs; for when after the time of Pharaohs they were named, he calls her by her name Nicamne, as thereby declaring, that while the kings were of the male line, and so admitted of the same name, while a woman was never of such a name, and that therefore he need not to declare that her name which she could not naturally have. As for myself, I have discovered from our own books, that after Pharaoh, the father-in-law of Solomon, no other king of Egypt did any larger use of the name, and that it was after that time when the forementioned queen of Egypt and Ethiopia came to Solomon, concerning whom we shall inform the reader presently; but I have now made mention of these things, that I may provide more fully the broad and ministrations of the Egyptians agree together in many things.

But king Solomon subdued to himself the remnant of the Canaanites that had not before submitted to him; those I mean that dwelt in the midst of the land, and the Edomites on the south; and the Moabites in the east; and the Ammonites on the west, and the Philistines in the sea coast; and all the Canaanites, and Moabites, and Edomites, and Ammonites, and Phcenicians, and Philistines, the kings of Tyr and Hamath; and ordered them to pay tribute. He also chose out of them every year such as were to serve him in the meanest offices, and to do his domestic works, and to follow husbanstry and all manner of labours in the land; as such as were seen low employments; nor was it reasonable, that when God had brought so many nations under their power, they should deprive their own people to serve them in the meanest offices, rather than those nations: while all the Naxartes were concerned in warlike affairs, and were in armor; and were set over the chariots and the horses, rather than enslaving the life of slaves. He appointed also five hundred and fifty rulers over these Canaanites, who were reduced to such domestic slavery, who received the entire care of them from the king, and instructed them in those labors and operations wherein he wanted their assistance.

The king built ships in the Red Sea, in a certain place called Ezion-geber: it is now called Berenice, and is not far from the city of Eloah. This country belonged formerly to the Jews, and became useful for shipping, from the donations of Hiram king of Tyre; for he sent a sufficient number of men thither for pilots, and such as were skilful in navigation, to whom Solomon gave this command, that they should go along with their own ships, and bring gold and precious stones, and such as were called Ophir, but now the Aurora Chersonese, which belongs to India, to fetch him gold. And when they had gathered these things, and met the conditions of the contract, they returned to their king; and the king had so much the more reason to be pleased with his master, because he had such a great store of mind to see him, and the reports that went every day abroad, induced her to come to him, she being assured that she could obtain another experience, and not by an empty hearing; for reports thus heard are likely enough to comply with a false opinion, while they wholly depend on the credit of the reportant: so she resolved to come to him, and that especially in order to have a trial of his wisdom, while she proposed questions of very great difficulty, and entreated that he would solve their hidden meaning. Accordingly she came to Jerusalem with great splen-dour, and the most of the courtiers of Solomon, with her camels laden with gold, with several sorts of sweet spices, and with precious stones. Now, upon the king's kind reception of her, he both made her a great entertainment, in order to please her, and then compassionately, from her own heart, and on the advice of the curious questions she propounded to him, he res-solved them sooner than any body could have expected. So she was amazed at the wisdom of the king, and that especially in order to have a trial upon trial than what she had heard by report beforehand; and especially she was surprised at the fineness and largeness of his royal ya-lace, and not less at the good order of the apartments, and the magnificence of his furniture, and shown great wisdom; but she was beyond measure astonished at the house which was called the forest of Lebanon, as also at the magnificence of his daily table, and the circumstances about it, which was not like the show of an apparel of his servants that waited, and the skilful and decent management of their attendance: nor was she less affected with those daily sacrifices which were offered to God, and the careful ma-agement of the sacrifices, and the very manner of all about them. When she saw this done every day, she was in the greatest admiration imaginable, inso much that she was not able to contain the surprise and wonder, but was overcome; for truly she was entirely affected: for she proceeded to dis-approve with the king; and thereby owned that she was overcome with admiration at the things before related; and said, "All things indeed, O king, that enquire of one another, which were not sent for, came to me no answer, but came with uncertainty as to our belief of them; but as to those good things that to thee appertain, both such as thou thyself possessest, I mean wisdom and prudence, and the happiness thou hast in thy kingdom, no one thing came to us was no falsity; it was not only a true report, but it related thy happiness after a much lower manner than I now see it to be before my eyes. For, as for the report, it only attempted to describe them, did not mention them, but did not weigh the dignity of the things themselves as does the sight of them, and being present among them. I indeed, who did not believe what was reported, by reason of the multitude and grandeur of the things I inquired about, do not think them to be much more numerous than they were reported to be. Accordingly, I esteem the Hebrew people, as well as thy servants and friends, to be happy, was joyous in the presence of God, and hear thy wisdom every day, and speak of it continually. One would therefore bless God who hath so loved this country, and those that inhabit therein, as to make thee king over them. And when the king had thus demonstrated in words how deeply the king had affected her, her disposition was known by certain presents, for she gave him twenty talents of gold, and an immense quantity of spices, and precious stones. And there were three thousand basons that balas-ant which our country still bears by this word Ethiopia, there is little occasion for doubting in this matter.

I some blame Josephus for supposing, that the ba-san tree might be first brought out of Arabia, or Egypt, or Ethiopia, into Judaea, by this queen of Sheba, since several have said that of old, no country here previous balsam but Judea; yet it is notoriously false that this balsam was peculiar to Judea, for both Egypt and Arabia, and particularly Sheba had it which was man's gift.) Solomon also repaid her with many good things, and principally by bestowing upon her what she chose of her own inclination, for there was nothing that she desired which he denied her; and as he was very generous and liberal in his own temper, so did he show the greatness of his soul in bestowing on her what she herself desired of him. So when this queen of Sheba came, she bare five and twenty carriages richly overlaid, and every one of them had five and twenty horses harnessed thereto, and gave an account of, and had again communicated to the king what she brought with her, she returned to her own kingdom.

CHAP. VII.

How Solomon grew rich, and fell desperately in love with Women; and how God, being incensed at it, raised up Adon and Jeroboam against him. Concerning the Death of Solomon.

1. ABOUT the same time there were brought to the king from the Aures Chersonesus, a country so called, precious stones, and pine-trees; and these trees he made use of for the temple and the palace, as also for the materials of musical instruments, the harps and the psalteries, that the Levites might make use of them in their hymns to God. The wood which was brought to him was such as he had never seen in all his life, nor had ever been brought before; but let no one imagine that these pine-trees were like those which are now so named, and which take that their denomination from the merchants, who so call them, because they were admired by those that purchased them; for those we speak of were of the like sight the wood of the fig-tree, but were whiter and more shining. Now we have said that those that rode thereon may be ignorant of the difference between these sorts of wood, nor unacquainted with the nature of the genuine pine-tree; and we thought it both a seasonable and humane thing when we mentioned it, and advised them to observe it, and to explain this difference so far as we have done.

2. Now the weight of gold that was brought him was six hundred and sixty talents, not including in that sum what was brought by the merchants, nor what the ten princes of the house of Arabia gave him in presents. He also cast two hundred targets of gold, each of them weighing six hundred shekels. He also made three hundred shields of gold, every one of which weighed three pounds and thirty talents, and which he put into that house which was called the forest of Lebanon. He also made cups of gold, and of precious stones for the entertainment of his guests, and of all sorts of jewels for him; and he made him a chaine; and he contrived that all his other furniture of vessels should be of gold; for there was nothing that to be sold or bought for silver, for the king had many ships which lay upon the sea of Tarzus; these he commanded to carry out all sorts of merchandise unto the remotest nations, by the sale of which silver and gold were brought to the king, and a great quantity of ivory, and Ethiopians, and spices, and they finished their voyages again in the next year.

3. Accordingly, there went a great famine all around the neighboring countries, which proclaimed the virtue and wisdom of Solomon, so much that all the kings every where were desirous to see him, as not giving credit to what was reported, on account of its being almost incredible; they also demonstrated the regard they had for him, by the presents they made him for; they sent him vessels of gold, and silver, and spices, and purple garnish, and many pearls for his horses, and chariots, and as many mules for his carriages as they could find proper to please the king's eyes, by their strength and beauty. This addition that he made to those chariots and horses which he had from the kings, when he had seen and augmented the number of his chariots by above four hundred, for he had a thousand before, and augmented the number of his horse by two thousand, for he had twenty thousand before. These horses also were so much exercised, in order to their making a fine appearance, and running swiftly, that no others could upon the comparison, appear either finer or swifter; but they were at once the most beautiful of all others, and their swiftness was incomparable also. Their riders also were a further ornament to them, being in the first place young men in the most delightful flower of their age, and being unchangeable for their age, taller than other men. They had also very long heads of hair hanging down, and were clothed in garments of Tyrian purple. They had also dust of gold every day sprinkled in their hair, so that they were the most beguiled with the sweetest fragrance of the sunbeans from the gold. The king himself rode upon a chariot in the midst of these men, who were still in armor, and had their bows fitted to a white skin, and used to take his progress out of the city in the morning. There was a certain place about fifty furlongs distant from Jerusalem, which is called Etham:

*Whether these fine gardens and rivulets of Etham, about six miles from Jerusalem, which Solomon had made, so often in state, be not those alluded to in Eccles. ii. 5, 6, where he says, "He made him gardens and orchards and planted vines, and gave him pools of water, to water the wood that bringeth forth trees," and to the finest part whereof he seems to allude, when, in the Canticles, he cometh to a "spring shut up," to a "fountain sealed," ch. lv. 12, (part of which fountains are still extant, as Mr. Maundrell informs us, p. 87, 88,) he cannot now be determined; only it is probable that they may be probably be conjectured. But whether this Etham has any relation to those rivers of Etham, which Providence once dried up in a miraculous manner, in the time of the First Punicus, liv. 15, and in the Septuagint, I cannot say."

glorious of kings, and the best beloved of God, and had exceeded in wisdom and riches those that had been rulers of the Hebrews before him, yet did he not persevere in this happy state till he died. Nay, he forsook the observation of the laws of his fathers, and came to an end most unsuitably to our foregoing history of him. He grew mad in his love of women, and laid no restraint on himself in his lust: nor was he satisfied with the women of his country alone; but his lust was great, not only for wives of foreign nations, such as Sidonians, and Tyrians, and Ammonites, and Edomites, and he transgressed the laws of Moses, which forbade Jews to marry any but those that were of their own people. He also began to covet their treasures, which he did by the gradual devastation of his wives, and out of his affection for them. This very thing our legislator suspected, and so admonished us beforehand, that we should not marry women of other countries, lest we should be entangled with foreign customs, and apostatize from our own; lest we should leave off to honor our own God, and should worship their gods. But Solomon was fallen headlong into unseemliness, and regarded all the observations and conditions. For when he had married seven hundred wives, the daughters of princes, and of eminent persons, and three hundred concubines, and besides the king of Egypt's daughter, he soon sinned, and then it came to limittance their practices. He was forced to give them this demonstration of his kindness and affection to them, to live according to the laws of their countries. And as he grew into years, and his years increased, so did his lust. And in a time, it was not sufficient to recall to his mind the institutions of his own country, so he still more and more contemned his own God, and continued to regard the gods of his fathers, as he had done, and he was: may before this happened, he sinned, and fell into an error about the observation of the law, when he made the images of brazen oxen that supported the brazen sea, and the images of lions about his own throne; for the law said, although it was not agreeable to piety so to do; and thence he did, notwithstanding that he had his father as a most excellent and domestic pattern of virtue, and knew what a glorious character he had left behind him; and that he was bent towards God; nor did he imitate David, although God had twice appeared to him in his sleep, and exhorted him to imitate his father; so he died ingloriously. There came therefore a prophet to him, who was sent of the Lord, to show him that his sins and his ungodly actions were not concealed from God; and threatened him that he should not long rejoice in what he had done: that indeed the kingdom should not be taken from him while he was alive, because God had promised to his father David that he would make him his successor, but that he would take care that this should befall his son when he was dead; not that he would withdraw all the people from him, but that he would give ten tribes to a servant of his, and leave only two tribes to David's grandson, for his sake, because he loved God, and for the sake of the city of Jerusalem, wherein he would have a temple. So bad was his end: he died with great grief.

These seven hundred wives, or the daughters of great men, and the three hundred concubines, the daughters of the ignorance, make one thousand and in all; and all the people from him, but that he would give ten tribes to a servant of his, and leave only two tribes to David's grandson, for his sake, because he loved God, and for the sake of the city of Jerusalem, wherein he would have a temple.

Josephus. He is certainly too severe upon Solomon, who in making the cherubins, and three twelve where we have more than imitate the patterns left him by David, which were all given by Divine inspiration. See my description of the temple, pp. 96. But all the images which Solomon gave no direction for the lions that adorned his throne, yet does not Solomon seem therein to have broken any law of Moses, for although the Pharaohs, and later rulers, have extended the second commandment, to formiseries of Solomon, and give one tribe, with that which is next it, to his son, because of the promise made to David for his succession, and will give ten tribes to these, because Solomon built, and had furnished against him, and God turned up himself to women, and to their gods. Seeing at this fare, thou knowest the cause for which God hath changed his mind, and is alienated from Solomon, be thou righteous, and keep the laws, because the kingdom is in the hands of Saul, and God will give the rest of the tribes to Saul, and his son, to give reward for thy piety, and the honor thou shalt pay to God, namely, to be as greatly excelled as thou knowest David to have been."

3. So Jeroboam was elevated by these words of Solomon, and was brought before him, and was a young man of warm temper, and ambitious of greatness, he could not be quiet: and when he had so great a change in the government, and called to mind what had been revealed to him by Ahijah, he endeavored to persuade the people to forsake Solomon, to make a disturbance, and to bring the government over to himself. But when Solomon understood his intention and treachery, he sought to catch Saul in the midst of the information of his son, and said, Ophiel, the high priest of the kingdom, if Egypt, and there abode till the death of Solomon, by which means he gained those two advantages, to suffer no harm from Solomon, and to be preserved when he was taken to Egypt. Jeroboam indeed, he was already an old man, having reigned eighty years, and lived ninety-four. He was buried in Jerusalem, having been superior to all other kings in happiness, and riches, and wisdom. For in a few years, he was deposed by men, and transgressed the law; concerning which transgressions, and the miseries which befell the Hebrews thereby, I think proper to discourse at another opportunity.

CHAP. VIII.

How, upon the death of Solomon, the People forsook his Son Rehoboam, and ordained Jeroboam King over the ten Tribes.

§ 1. Now when Solomon was dead, and his son Rehoboam, (who was born of an Amnonite wife, whose name was Naamah,) had succeeded him in the kingdom, the reverend and the mighty cast immediately into Egypt, and called back Jeroboam; and when he was come to them, to the city Shechem, Rehoboam came to it also, for he had resolved to declare himself king to the Israelites, while he was young, and had not yet come to the rulers of the people, as also Jeroboam, came to him, and besought him, and said, "That he ought to rest, and to be gentler than his father, in the service he had imposed on them, because they had borne a heavy yoke, and that then they should be better affected to him, and be well contented to serve him under his moderate government, and should do it more out of love than fear." But Rehoboam told them that they should come to him again in three days' time, when he would give an answer to their request. This delay gave occasion to a present suspicion, since he had not given them a favorable answer; yet one man stood up in their midst, and said, "If he should have given them a humane answer, off-hand, especially since he was but young. However, they thought that his consultation about it, and that he did not presently give them a denial, although manifestly his intention.

§ 2. Rehoboam now called his father's friends, and advised with them what sort of answer he ought to give to the multitude: upon which they gave him the advice which became friends, and those that knew the temper of such a multitude. They advised him, "to speak in a way more popular than suited the grandeur of a king, because he would thereby oblige them to submit to him, and be better disposed to him with good will, it being the most agreeable to subjects, that their kings should be almost upon the level with them." But Rehoboam rejected this so good an advice of the elders, who had given him, and bade them speak what they thought he ought to do. They advised him to give the following answer to the people, (for neither their youth, nor God himself, suffered them to discern what was best;) "that his littlefinger should be thicker than his father's loins; and if they had met with hard usage from his father, they should experience much rougher treatment from him; and if his father had chesed them with whips, they might expect that he would do it with scorpions." The king was pleased with this advice, and thought it agreeable to the dignity of his gouvernement, so he said such a speech to them with some magnificence, when the multitude was come together to hear his answer on the third day, all the people were in great expectation, and very intent to hear what the king would say to them, and supposed that they should have the benefit of his good nature; but he was passed by his friends, and answered as the young men had given him counsel. Now this was done according to the will of God, that what Ahijah had foretold might come to pass. 2. By these words it was seen that the kingdom of Israel was by an iron hammer, and were so grieved at the words, as if they had already felt the effects of them, and they had great indignation at the king; and all cried out, and said, "We will have no longer any relation to David or his posterity after this day." And they said farther, "We only leave to Rehoboam the temple which his father built;" and they threatened to forsake him. Nay, they, by bitter words, tore the very throat of their wrath so long, that when he sent Adoram, who was over the tribute, that he might pacify them, and render them milder, and persuade them to forgive him if he had said any thing that was rash or grievous to them in his youth, they would not hear it, but threw stones at him and killed him. When Rehoboam saw this, he thought himself aimed at by those stones with which they had killed his servant, and he thought he should undergo the least of calamities in earnest, so he got immediately into his chariot, and fled to Jerusalem, where the tribe of Judah and that of Benjamin ordained him king; but the rest of the multitude forsack the sons of David from that day, and appointed Jeroboam to be the ruler of their public affairs. Upon this, Rehoboam, Solomon's son, assembled a great congregation of those two tribes that submitted, and said to them, "I have eighty thousand chosen men out of the army, to make an expedition against Jeroboam and his people, that he might force them by war to be his servants; but he was forbidden of God to do it for that it was not just that brethren of the same country should fight one against another. He also said, began early, and continued very long. See Eccles. xlvii. 14.

*This youth of Jeroboam, when Solomon built the walls of Jerusalem, not very long after he had finished his twenty years' building the temple, and his own palace, he called seventy young men of the strength of his reign, 1 Kings ix. 24; 2 Chronicles viii. 11; and his youth here still mentioned, when Solomon's wickedness was become more insolente, fully confirm my former observation, that such his wickednesses are that this defection of the multitude was according to the purpose of God. So he did not proceed in this expedition. And now I will relate first the actions of Jeroboam the king of the two tribes; by this means we shall preserve the good order of the history entire.

So Jeroboam did go and build him a palace in the city Shechem, he dwelt there. He also built him another at Peniel, a city so called. And now the feast of tabernacles was approaching. So Jeroboam consulted, that it should be observed, that he should permit the multitude to go to worship God at Jerusalem, and there to celebrate the festival, they would probably repent of what they had done, and be enticed by the temple, and by the other places where the sacrifices was celebrated, and would desire to return, and would go to the one king; and if so, he should run the risk of losing his own life: so he invented this contrivance; he made two golden heifers, and built two little temples for them, the one in the city Bethel, and the other in Dan, which last was at the fountains of the lesser Jordan,* and he put the heifers into both the little temples, in the forementioned cities. And now he called the two tribes together, upon whom he ruled, he made a speech to the people, in these words, "I suppose, my countrymen, that you know this, that every place hath God in it, nor is there any one determinate place in which he is, but he is every where in the earth, and sees those that worship him; on which account I do not think it right for you to go so long a journey to Jerusalem, which is an enemy's city, to worship him. It was a man that built the temple of Yahweh, but another man made the two golden heifers, dedicated to the same God: and the one of them I have consecrated in the city Bethel, and the other in Dan, to the end that those of you that dwell near these cities may go to them, and worship God there; and I will order every one of the priests and Levites from among yourselves, that you may have no want of the tribe of Levi, or of the sons of Aaron; but let him that is desertious among you of being a priest, bring to God a bullock and a ram, which they say Aaron the first priest brought also." When Jeroboam had said this, he deluded the people, and made them to revolt from the worship of their forefathers, and to transgress the laws. This was the beginning of museries among the Hebrews, and the cause why they were overcome in war by foreigners, and so fell into captivity. But we shall relate these things in their proper places hereafter.

5. When the feast of tabernacles was just approaching, Jeroboam was desirous to celebrate it himself in Bethel, as did the two tribes celebrate it in Jerusalem. Accordingly he built an altar before the heifer, and undertook to be high priest himself. So he went up to the altar, with his own priests about him; but when he was going to offer the sacrifices, and the burnt-offerings, in the night of all the people, a false prophet came, and said, "Jeroboam, who was seen God at Shechem, and came to him from Jerusalem, who stood in the midst of the multitude, and in the hearing of the king, and directing his discourse to the altar, said thus, "God foretells that there shall be a certain man of the family of David, Josia by name, who shall slay upon thee those false priests that shall live at that time, and upon thee shall burn the bones of those dead, and those impostors and wicked wretches. However, that this people may believe that these things shall come to pass, I foretell a sign to them that shall also come to pass: This altar shall be broken to pieces immediately, and all the earth shall become water.""

When the prophet had said this, Jeroboam fell into a passion, and stretched out his hand, and bade them lay hold of him, but that hand which stretched out, and had the power, but was not able to pull it in again to him, for it was become withered, and hung down, as if it were a dead hand. The altar also was broken to pieces at one stroke, and with a noise as the prophet had foretold should come to pass. So the king understood that he was a man of veracity, and had a divine foreknowledge, and untrasted him to pray to God that he would grant his request. Accordingly the prophet did pray to God to grant him that request. So the king having his hand recovered to its natural state, rejoiced at it, and invited the prophet to sup with him; but Jadan said, that, "he could not endure to come into his house, nor to taste of bread or water in this city, for that was a thing God had forbidden him to do; as also to go back by the same way which he came, but he would go back by another road." The king wondered at the abstinence of the man, but was himself in fear, as suspecting a change of his affairs for the worse, from what had been said to him.

CHAP. IX.

1. Now there was a certain wicked man in the court of the temple, who was a false prophet, Jeroboam had in great esteem, was well deceived by him, and his flattering words. This man was bed-ridden by reason of the infirmities of old age: however, he was informed by his sons concerning the prophet that was come from Jerusalem, and concerning the signs done by him; and how, when Jeroboam's right hand had been enfeebled, at the prophet's prayer he had it revived again. Whereupon he was afraid that this stranger and such an enemy of him might be more mortal than himself, and obtain greater honor from him, and he gave order to his sons to saddle his ass presently, and make all ready that he might go out. Accordingly they made haste to do what they were commanded, and he got upon the ass, and followed after the prophet, and when he had overtaken him, as he was resting himself under a very large oak-tree that was thick and shady, he at first saluted him, but presently he complained of him, because he had not come into his house, and partaken of his hospitality. And when the other said, that "God had forbidden him to taste of any one's provision in that city, he answered, "The Nazarite was Jadan, and I am the servant of God that I should set food before thee, for I am a prophet as thou art, and worship God in the same manner that thou dost; and I am now come as sent by him, in order to bring thee into my house, and to give thee water." And the prophet gave credit to this lying prophet, and returned back with him. But when they were at dinner, and were merry together, God appeared to Jadan, and said, that "he should suffer punishment for transgressing his commands, and he told him so far called the lesser Jordan, is hardly certain even in Josephus himself, though the latter account be the most probable. Nevertheless, however, the northern itinerary, set up by Jeroboam, was where Little Jordan fell into Great Jordan, near a place called Daphne, as Josephus elsewhere witnesses, (Ant. c. xi. p. 461, &c.) See the note there.
what that punishment should be: for he said that he should meet with a lion as he was going on his way, by which lion he should be torn in pieces, and be deprived of burial in the sepulchres of his fathers.

Which things came to pass, as I suppose, according to the word of the prophet, that no reproach might not give heed to the words of Jodan, as of one that had been convicted of lying. However, as Jodan was again going to Jerusalem, a lion assaulted him, and pulled him in pieces, so that two or three years, for many of those who met did not at all hurt the beast, but set by him, and kept him, as also the prophet's body. This continued till some travellers that saw it came and told it in the city to the false prophet, who sent his son and his other sons, who came and made a funeral for him at great expense. He also charged his sons to bury himself with him; and said that "all which he had foresaid against that city, and the king, and the princes, and false prophets, would prove true; and that if he were buried with him, he should receive no injuries or treatment after his death, the bones not being then to be distinguished sunder. But now, when he had performed those things which the prophet, and had given that charge to his sons, as he was a wicked and an impious man, he goes to Jeroboam, and says to him, "And wherefore is it now that thou hast disturbed the words of the man of God, and the word of God has not been imparted to him which had happened about the altar, and about his own hand, and gave him the name of a divine man, and an excellent prophet, he endeavored, by a wicked trick, to weaken that his opinion, and by using plausible words as to what had happened, he aimed to injure the truth which was in them; for he attempted to persuade him, that "his hand was eviscerated by the labor it had undergone in supporting the altar, and that upon its resting awhile, it returned to its former nature again; and that as to the altar, it was but new, and had borne abundance of sacrifices, and those large ones too, and was accordingly broken to pieces, and fallen down by the weight of what had been laid upon it." He also informed him of the death of him that had foretold those things, and how he perished; [whence he concluded that] he had not any thing in him of a prophet, but of a man. Jodan also said, he had thus spoken, he persuaded the king, and entirely alienated his mind from God, and from doing works that were righteous and holy, and encouraged him to go on in his impious practices; and accordingly, he set about to offend him by resolving still to be righteous. But God sent Shishak, king of Egypt, to punish them for their unjust behavior towards him, concerning whom Herodotus was mistaken, and applied his actions to Sesostris; for this Shishak, in the fifth year of the reign of Rehoboam, made an expedition [into Judea] with many ten thousand men, for he had one thousand two hundred chariots in number that followed him, and three score thousand horsemen, and four hundred thousand footmen. These he brought with him, and they were the greatest part of them Libyans and Ethiopians. Now therefore, when he fell upon the country of the Hebrews, he took the strong cities of Rehoboam, and the kingdom without fighting; and when he had put garrisons in them, he came last of all to Jerusalem.

Chap. X.
Concerning Rehoboam, and how God inflicted punishment upon him, for his impiety, by Shishak, [King of Egypt.]

1. Now Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, who, as we said before, was king of the two tribes, built strong and large cities, Bethshemesh and Lachish, and Tekoa, and Bethhur and Soco, and Adullam, and Ijon, and Mephaath, and Ziph, and Adoram, and Lachish, and Azekah, and Zorah, and Aijalon, and Hebron; these he built first of all the tribes of Judah. He also built other large cities in the tribe of Benjamin, and walled them about, and made garrisons in them all, and captains, and a great deal of corn, and wine, and oil, and he furnished every one of them plentifully with other provisions that were necessary for sustenance; moreover, he put therein shields and horses for many years, not only also that were in all Israel, and the Levites, and if there were any of the multitude that were good and righteous men, they gathered themselves together to him, having left their own cities, that they might live with him in Jerusalem; for they were not willing to be forced to worship the heifers which Jeroboam had made, and they augmented the kingdom of Rehoboam for three years. And after he had governed over himself of his own kindred, and bad by her three children born to him, he married also another of his own kindred, who was daughter of Abiabam by Tamar, whose name was Maachah, and by her he had a son, who was holy and righteous, and moreover many other children by other wives, but he loved Maachah above them all. Now he had eighteen legitimate wives, and thirty concubines: and he had born to him twenty-eight sons and three-score and ten daughters, but none to rule over the nation, except Josiah, whose name was Jehoahaz, whom he had by Maachah, to be his successor in the kingdom; and intrusted him already with the treasures, and the strongest cities.

2. Now I cannot but think, that the greatness of a kingdom, and its prosperity, is often becomes the occasion of mischiefs and of transgression to men; for when Rehoboam saw this his kingdom so much increased, he went out of the right way, and to unrighteous and irreligious practices; and he despised the worship of God, till the people themselves imitated his wicked actions; for so it usually happens, that the manners of subjects are corrupted at the same time with those of their governors, which subjects then lay aside their own sober way of living, as a reproof of their governors' intemperate courses, and follow their wickedness, as if it were virtue, for it is not possible to show that men approve of those actions which are wrong, and do the same actions with them. Agreeably whereunto, it now happened to the subjects of Rehoboam; for when he was grown impious, and a transgressor himself, they turned to offend him by resolving still to be righteous. But God sent Shishak, king of Egypt, to punish them for their unjust behavior towards him, concerning whom Herodotus was mistaken, and applied his actions to Sesostris: for this Shishak, in the fifth year of the reign of Rehoboam, made an expedition [into Judea] with many ten thousand men, for he had one thousand two hundred chariots in number that followed him, and three score thousand horsemen, and four hundred thousand footmen. These he brought with him, and they were the greatest part of them Libyans and Ethiopians. Now therefore, when he fell upon the country of the Hebrews, he took the strong cities of Rehoboam, and the kingdom without fighting; and when he had put garrisons in them, he came last of all to Jerusalem.
with him, were shut up in Jerusalem by the means of the army of Shishak, and when they besought God to give them victory and deliverance, they could not persuade God to be on their side: but Shemaijah the prophet told them, that God would not deliver them, for that they had forsaken his worship. When they heard this, they were immediately in a consternation of mind, and seeing no way of deliverance, they all earnestly set themselves to confess, that God might not be displeased with them, since they had been guilty of iniquity towards him, and had let his laws lie in confusion. So when God saw them in that disposition, and that they acknowledged their sins, he told the prophet, that he would not deliver them; for he would deliver them by the hand of the Egyptians, that they may learn whether they will suffer less by serving men or God. So when Shishak had taken the city without fighting, because he was afraid, and received him into it, yet did not Shishak stand to the covenant he had made, but he spoiled the temple, and emptied the treasuries of God, and those of the king, and carried off innumerable quantities of gold and silver, and left nothing at all behind him. He also took away the bucklers of gold, and the shields, which Solomon the king had made: nay, he did not leave the golden quivers which David had taken from the king of Moab, and had dedicated to God. And when he had thus done, he returned to his own kingdom. Now Herodotus of Halicarnassus mentions this expedition, having only mistaken the king's name; and (in saying that) he did not leave many other nations also, and brought Syria of Palestine into subjection, and took the men that were therein prisoners without fighting. Now it is manifest, that he intended to declare that our nation was subdued by him in that manner, that he left in the lands of those that delivered themselves up to him without fighting, and engraved upon them the secret parts of women. Now our king Rebohoam delivered up our city without fighting. He says withal, that the Ethiopians learned to circumcise their private parts from the Egyptians, with this addition, that the Phenicians and Syrians that live in Palestine confess that they were taught it of the Egyptians. Yet it is evident that no other of the Syrians that live in Palestine besides us alone are circumcised; but as to such matters, let every one speak what is agreeable to his own opinion.

When Shishak was gone away, king Rebohoam made bucklers and shields of brass, instead of those of gold, and delivered the same number of them to the keepers of the king's palace: So instead of warlike expeditions, and that glory which results from those public actions, he regarded in great quietness, though not without fear, as being always an enemy to Jeroboam, and he died when he had lived fifty-seven years, and reigned seventeen. He was in his disposition, a prudent and excellent man, and, as it were, the chief of all his dominions by not hearkening to his father's friends. He was buried in Jerusalem, in the sepulchres of the kings; and his son Abijah succeeded him in the kingdom, and this in the eighteenth year of Jeroboam's reign over the ten tribes: and this was the conclusion of these affairs. It must be now our business to relate the affairs of Jeroboam, and how he ended his life for he ceased not, nor rested to be injurious to God, but every day raised up altars upon high mountains, and went on making priests out of the multitude.

CHAP. XI.
Concerning the death of a Son of Jeroboam.
How Jeroboam was beaten by Abijah, who died a little afterward, and was succeeded in his Kingdom by Asa. And also how, after the Death of Jeroboam, Baasha destroyed his Son Nadab, and all the House of Jeroboam.

1. However, God was in no long time ready to return Jeroboam's wicked actions, and the effects thereof, upon his kingdom, and the heads of it, and upon the heads of all his house. And whereas a son of his lay sick at that time, who was called Abijah, he enjoined his wife to lay aside her robes, and to take nothing, and to rent the dwelling of a private person, and to go to Abijah the prophet, for that he was a wonderful man in foretelling futurities, it having been he who told me that I should be king. He also enjoined her, when she came to him, to show him nothing but that Abijah was a much greater as if she were a stranger, whether he should escape this distemper. So she did as her husband bade her, and changed her habit, and came to the city Shiloh, for there did Abijah live: and as she was going into his house, it was being then dim with age, God appeared to him, and informed him of two things, that the wife of Jeroboam was come to him; and what answer he should make to her inquiry. Accordingly, as the woman was about to return home, he called her back, and said, "Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam! Why concealest thou thyself? Thou art not concealed from God, who hath appeared to me, and informed me that thou wast about to return home, and dost not mean to seek nothing from me; thou shouldest say to thee." So he said, "That she should go away to her husband, and speak to him thus: Since I made thee a great man when thou wast little, or rather naught, and rent the kingdom from the house of David, and gave it to thee, and thou hast been mindful of these benefits, hast left off my worship, hast made thee molten gods and honored them; I will in like manner take thee away again. And I will make thee a great house, and will build thine house, and make them food for the dogs and the fowls; for a certain king is rising up, by appointment, over all these people, who shall leave none of the family of Jeroboam remaining. The multitude of thy people shall be partease of the kingdom. Until the judgment, and shall be cast out of this good land, and shall be scattered into the places beyond Euphrates, because they followed the wicked practices of their king, and have worshipped the gods that he made, and forsaken my sacrifices. But do thou, O woman, make haste back to thy husband, and tell him this message; but thou shalt then find thy son dead, for as thou enterest the city he shall depart this house: yet shall he be buried with the family of all the multitude, and honored with a general mourning, for he is the only person of goodness of Jeroboam's family."—When the prophet had foretold these events, the woman forthwith went away with a disordered mind, and greatly grieved at the death of the forenamed child: So she was in lamentation as she went along the road, and mourned for the ion in Egypt, and had it not before Manetho, the famous Egyptian Chronologer and historian, who knew that the Egyptians had never been in the land of Canaan. Herodotus, complains frequently of his mistakes about their affairs, as does Josephus more than once in this chapter; nor indeed does Herodotus seem at all acquainted with the affairs of the Jews: for as he never names them, so little or nothing of what he says about them, their country, or maritime cities, two or which he alone alone names, as Cyrene and Jcnymus, proves true; nor indeed do there appear to have been ever been any such cities on their coast.
of your army which gives you such good hopes? Yet certainly there is no strength at all in an army of many ten thousands, when the war is unjust; for we ought to place our surest hopes of success against our enemies in righteousness and in piety towards God, which hope we have justly have, since we have always had the help of the beginning, and have worshipped our own God, who was not made by hands of corruptible matter, nor was he formed by a wicked king, in order to destroy the multitude; but he is of his own workmanship, and the beginning and end of all things. I therefore give you counsel even now to repent, and to take better advice, and to leave off the prosecution of the war; and to call upon the gods of your fathers, of two thousand years, to reflect what it hath been that hath advanced you to so happy a state as you are now in."

3. This was the speech which Abijah made to the multitude. But while he was still speaking Jeroboam sent some of his soldiers privately to encompass Abijah round about, on certain parts of the camp that were not taken notice of; and when he was thus within the compass of the enemy, then, by his arrows, he wounded, and by his spears he killed, and by his bows he put to flight, without his arrows he hurt them, and made them, and by his shout they made a shout, and fell upon their enemies; and God brake the courage and cast down the force of their enemies, and made Abijah's army superior to them: for God vouchsafed to grant them a wonderful victory. And when Abijah saw what they did, he said, and such a slaughter was now made of Jeroboam's army, as is never recorded to have happened in any other war — whether it were of the Greeks, or of the Barbarians, for they overthrew [and slew] five hundred thousand of them; and when they took their strongest cities by force, and spoilt them; and besides those, they did the same to Bethel and her towns, and Jeshanah and her towns. And after this Abijah never recovered himself during the life of Abijah; who yet did not long survive, for he reigned but three years, and was buried in Jerusalem, in the sepulchre of his forefathers. He left behind him twenty-two years and nineteen days; and he had these children by fourteen wives; and Asa his son succeeded to the kingdom; and the young man's mother was Michaiah. Under his reign the country of the Israelites enjoyed peace for ten years. 4. And so far concerning Abijah, the son of Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, as his history hath come down to us: but Jeroboam, the king of the ten tribes, died when he had governed them two-and-twenty years; whose son Nadab succeeded him, in the second year of the reign of Asa. Now Jeroboam's son governed two years, and resembled his father in impiety and wickedness. In these two years he made an expedition against Gibbethon, a city of the Philistines, and continued the siege in order to take it; but he was conspired against while he was there, by a friend of his, whose name was Baasha, the son of Ahijah, and by another friend of his, then Baasha took the kingdom after the other's death and destroyed the whole house of Jeroboam. It also came to pass, according as God had foretold, that some of Jeroboam's kindred that died in the city were torn to pieces and devoured by dogs,

*This is a strange expression in Josephus, that God is his own workmanship, or that he made himself; contrary to the common sense of such a passage. Perhaps he only means that he was made, but was unmarried.

*The perfectly unparalleled allusion of five hundred thousand men of the newly idolatrous and rebellious ten tribes, God's high displeasure and indignation against that idolatry and rebellion fully appeared; the remainder were thereby seriously cautioned not to persist in them, and a kind of balance or equilibrium was established in the kingdom of Israel. Perhaps he only means that he was made, but was unmarried. and that others of them that died in the fields were torn and devoured by the fowls. So the house of Jeroboam suffered the just punishment of his impiety and of his wicked actions.

CHAP. XII.

How Zerah, King of the Ethiopians, was beaten by Asa; and how Asa, upon Baasha's making war against him, invited the King of the Damascus to assist him; and how, on the Destruction of the House of Baasha, Asa got the Kingdom, as did his Son Ahab after him.

§ 1. Now Asa, the king of Jerusalem, was of an excellent character, and had a regard to God, and neither did nor designing any thing but what had relation to the observation of the laws. He made a reformation of his kingdom, and cast whatsoever was wicked therein, and purified it from every impurity. Now he had an army of chosen men that were armed with targets and spears; out of the tribe of Judah three hundred thousand; and out of the tribe of Benjamin, two hundred and fifty thousand. But when he had already reigned ten years, Zerah king of Ethiopia made an expedition against him, with a great army of nine hundred thousand footmen, and one hundred thousand horsemen, and three hundred chariots, and came as far as Mareshah, a city that belonged to the tribe of Judah. Now when Zerah had passed so far with his own army, Asa met him, and set his army in battle array in a valley called Zephathiah, not far from the city; and when he saw the multitude of the Ethiopians, he cried out, and besought God to help him; and, as it pleased him, he mingled many ten thousands of the enemy: "For," said he, "I depend on nothing else but that assistance which I expect from thee, which is able to make the fewer superior to the more numerous, and the weak to the strong; and hence it is alone that I venture to meet Zerah, and fight him."

2. While Asa was saying this, God gave him a signal of victory, and joining battle cheerfully on account of what God had foretold about it, he slew a great many of the Ethiopians, and when he had put them to flight, he pursued them to the country of Gerar; and when they left off killing their enemies, they betook themselves to spoiling the baggage of them that rallied lost heart, and to spoiling their camp, so that they carried off much gold, and much silver, and a great deal of [other] prey, and camels, and great cattle, and took captive to. Accordingly, when Asa and his army had obtained such a victory, and such wealth from God, they returned to Jerusalem. Now as they were coming, a prophet whose name was Azariah, met them on the road, and bade them stop their journey a little; and began to say to them thus: that "The reason why they had obtained this victory from God was this, that they had shown themselves righteous and religious men, and had done every thing according as God had commanded them; and therefore God said, if they persevered therein, God would grant that they should always overcome their enemies, and live happily: but that if they left off his worship, all things shall fail out on the contrary; and a time shall come when the kingdom of his left in your whole multitude, nor a priest who shall deliver you a true answer from the oracle; but your cities shall be overthrown, and your nation scattered over the whole earth, and live the life of strangers and wanderers." So he advised them, while they had time, to be good, not to deprive themselves of the favor of God. While they were thus concerned, people had been rejected; and all in common, and every one in particular, took great care to behave themselves righteously. The king also sent some to take care that those in the country should observe the laws also.

3. And this was the state of Asa, king of the two tribes. I now return to Baasha, the king of the multitude of the Israelites, who slew Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, and reigned the governor of the country in the city of Tirzah. It did not make that his habitation, and reigned twenty-four years. He became more wicked and impious than Jeroboam or his son. He did a great deal of mischief to the multitude of the Israelites, and shed much innocent blood to Baasha, who sent the prophet Jehu, and told him beforehand, that his whole family should be destroyed, and that he would bring the same miseries on his house which had brought that of Jeroboam; and he thought, because he had been made king by him, he had not required his kind- ness by governing the multitude righteously and religiously; which things, in the first place, tended to their own happiness, and in the next place were pleasing to God. As he had, therefore, become a very wicked king, Jeroboam: and although that man's soul had perished, yet did he express to the last his wickedness; and he said, that he should therefore justly experience the like calamity, as the multitude of the Israelites, who became a very wicked nation. But Baasha, though he heard beforehand what miseries would befall him and his whole family for their insalient behavior, yet did not lay off his wicked practices for fear of the time to come, nor did he care to appear to be other than worse and worse till he died; nor did he then repeat of his past actions, nor endeavor to obtain pardon of God for them, but did as those who know not how to depart from their evil ways when they have once in earnest set about their work, they do not leave off their labors; for thus did Baasha, when the prophet foretold to him what would come to pass, grow worse as if what was threatened, the partition of his family and the destruction of his house, (which are really among the greatest of evils,) were good things; and as if he were a combatant for wickedness, he every day took more and more gain of all, and when he had assailed a certain considerable city called Ramah, which was forty furlongs distant from Jerusalem; and when he had taken it, he fortified it, having obtained a breach of it, and then, that they might thence make excursions, and do mischief to the kingdom of Asa.

4. Whereupon Asa was afraid of the attempts of the enemy might make upon him, and consider- ing with himself how many mischiefs this army that was left in Ramah might do to the country over which he reigned, he sent ambassadors to the king of the Damascus, with gold and silver, and said to him, that he had obtained a victory over the king of the Israelites, and had slain his son Nadab; and therefore he said, that if they persevered therein, God would grant that they should always over come their enemies, and live happily: but that if they left off his worship, all things shall fail out on the contrary; and a time shall come when the kingdom of his left in your whole multitude, nor a priest who shall deliver you a true answer from the oracle; but your cities shall be overthrown, and your nation scattered over the whole earth, and live the BOOK VIII—CHAP. XIII.

Now when the king of Israel heard this, he left off building and fortifying Samah, and returned personally to meet his own people, with all the other tribes; so that after this Baasha had no leisure to make expeditions against Aza, for he was prevented by death, and was buried in the city Tirshah; and Elah his son took the kingdom.

And by that means he slew him, when he was without his armed men and his captains, for they were all busied in the siege of Gibbethon, a city of the Philistines.

And when Zimri, the captain of the army, had killed Elah, he took the kingdom himself, and, according to Jehu’s prophecy, slew all the house of Baasha; for it came to pass that Baasha’s house utterly perished, on account of his iniquity, in one day, and he had reigned two years, died, being treacherously slain by Zimri, the captain of half his army; for when he was at Azra, his steward’s house, he persuaded some of the horsemen that were under him to assault Elah, and by that means he slew him, when he was without his armed men and his captains, for they were all busied in the siege of Gibbethon, a city of the Philistines.

CHAP. XIII.

Now Ahab, when he had taken Jezreel to Wisha, became more wicked than all the kings that had been before him. Of the Actions of the Prophet Elisha, and how he smote Beth. § 1. Now Ahab, the king of Israel, dwelt in Samaria, and held the government for twenty two years; and made no alteration in the conduct of the kings that were his predecessors, but only in such things as were of his own invention and introduction, for the worse; for he died in the midst of it. He imitated them in their wicked courses, and in their injurious behavior towards God, and more especially he imitated the transgression of Jeroboam; for he worshipped the heifers that he had made; and he contended other absurd objects of worship besides those heifers; he also took to wife the daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Tyrians and Sidonians, whose name was Jezebel, of whom he learned to worship her own gods. This woman was active and bold, and fell into so great a degree of impudence and madness, that she built a temple to the god of the Tyrians, which they call Belus, and planted a grove of all sorts of sacred trees; she also endeavored to introduce the prophets to this god. The king also himself had many such about him, and so exceeded in madness and wickedness all [the kings] that went before him.

2. There was now a prophet of God Almighty, of thebeson, a country in Gilead, that came to Ahab, and said to him, that “God foretold he would not send rain nor dew in those years upon the country but when he should appear. And when he had been ruling in the east two years, he had departed into the southern parts, and made his abode by a brook, out of which he had water to drink; for as for his food, ravens brought it to him every day; but when that river was dried up for want of rain, he went to a city not far from Sidon and Tyre, for it lay between them, and this at the command of God, for [God told him] that he should there find a woman who was a widow, that should give him coal: so when he was not far off from the city, he saw a woman that labored with her own hands gathering of sticks; so God informed him that this was the woman who was to give him coal. At last, when he came and said to her, she desired her to bring him some water to drink; but as she was going so to do, he called to her, and would have her bring him a loaf of bread also: whereupon she affirmed on oath that she had at home nothing more than a little of meal and a little of oil, and that she was going to gather some sticks, that she might knead it, and make bread for herself and her son; after which, she said, they must perish, and be consumed by the famine, for they had nothing for themselves any longer. Hereupon he said, “Go on with good courage, and hope for better things; and first of all make me a little cake and bring it to me, for I foretell thee that this vessel of meal and this reuse of oil shall not fail, until God send rain.”

When the prophet had said this, she came to him, and made him the forenamed cake; of which she had part for herself, and gave the rest to her son. And when he had eaten thereof, he slept, and when he had reigned forty and one years: and when he was dead, his son Jehoshaphat succeeded him in the government. He was born of Aza’s wife Asuah. And all men allowed that he was a king of the kings of Israel, and this both in courage and piety: but we are not obliged now to speak any more of the affairs of this king.
Botrys in Phœnicia, and the city of Aza in Li-cyria, both of which are excessively suffocated by a sooty rain that was in the days of Ahab, for at that time it was that Ethisbaal also rejoined over the Tyrians, as Menander informs us.

3. Now this woman, of whom we speak before, those who were shut up in a chamber, where she was fallen into a distemper till she gave up the ghost, and appeared to be dead, came to the prophet weeping, and beating her breast with her hands, and seeming out such expressions as her passions dictate; and she complained to him, that he had been come to her to reproach her for her sins, and that on this account it was that her son was dead.
But he bade her be of good cheer, and deliver her son to him, for that he would deliver him again to her alive. So when she had delivered her son up to him, he carried him into an upper room, where he himself lodged, and laid him down upon the bed, and cried unto God, and said, that "God had not done well in rewarding the woman who had entertained him, and sustained him, by taking away her son; and he prayed that he would send again the soul of the child into and bring him to life again." Accordingly, God answered him, and willing to gratify the prophet, that he might not seem to have come to her to do her a mischief; and the child, beyond all expectation, came to life again.
So the mother returned the prophet thanks, and said, "And now I see clearly satisfied that God did divine with him.

4. After a little while Elijah came to king Ahab, according to God's will, to inform him that rain was coming. Now the famine had seized upon the cities, and there was a great want of what was necessary for sustenance; inso much, that it was not only men that wanted it, but the earth itself also, which did not produce enough fruit to supply the wants of those, of what was useful for them to feed on by reason of the drought. So the king called for Obadiah, who was steward over his cattle, and said to him,
"That he would have him go to the fountains of water, and to the brooks, that if any herb could be found for them, they might mow it down, and reserve it for the beasts." And when he had sent persons all over the habitable earth, to discover the prophet Elijah, and they could not find him, he had some men accompany him, who was sent to solve that, they should make a progress, and divide the ways between them, and Obadiah took one road and the king another. Now it happened, that the same time when queen Jezebel slew the prophet, the son of Ahab, who had a hundred prophets, and had fed them with nothing but bread and water. But when Obadiah was alone and absent from the king, the prophet Elijah met im; and Obadiah asked him, who he was; and when he had learned it from him, he worshiped him. Elijah then bade him go to the king, and tell him that I am here ready to wait on him;" but Obadiah replied, "What evil have I done to thee, that thou sendest me to one who seeketh to kill thee, and hath sought over all the earth for thee? Or, was he so ignorant as not to know that the king had left no place untouched on which he had not sent persons to bring him back, in order that they should take him, to have him dead to death?" For he told him he was afraid lest God should appear to him, and he should dio away into another place, and that when the kings should send him away, and he should not be able to find him anywhere upon earth, he should be put to death. He desired him therefore to take care of his protection; and told him how diligently he had hunted for him, and that he had saved a hundred prophets, when Jezebel slew the rest of them, and had kept them concealed, and that they had been sustained by him. But Elie-jah bade him fear nothing; but go to the king;

and quickly, the thing was done, and when the knaves did certainly show himself to Ahab that very day.

5. So when Obadiah had informed the king that Elijah was there, Ahab met him, and asked him in anger, "If he were the man that afflicted the people of Israel with burdens in the days of Drought they lay under." But Elijah, without any furtherly, said, "That he was himself the man, he and his house, which had brought such afflicted and afflictions upon them, and that by introducing strange gods into their country, and worship-shiping them, and by leaving their own, who was the only true God, and having no manner of regard to him." However, he bade him go his way, for he was together with Elijah, and to mount Carmel, with his own prophets, and those of his wife, telling him how many there were of them, as also the prophets of the groves, about four hundred in number. And as all the people were sent for rain by the named mountain, the prophet Elijah stood in the midst of them, and said, "How long will you live thus in uncertainty of mind and opinion?"
He also exhorted them, that in case they esteemed the strange gods, with which they were worshipped, they saw and grasped the true and only God, they would follow him and his com-mendments; but in case they esteemed him to be nothing, but had an opinion of the strange gods, he bade them at this word, that he saw and the counsel was, that they should follow them, and when the multitude made no answer to what he said, Elijah desired, that for a trial of the power of the strange gods, and of their own God, he, who was his only prophet, while they had four hundred, might take a beifer, and kill it as a sacrifice, and lay it upon pieces of wood, and not kindle any fire, and that they should do the same things, and call upon their own gods, and that then they should see that the gods of the heathen were no gods, and when they were done, they would thence learn the nature of the true God. This proposal pleased the people. So Elijah bade the prophets to choose out a beifer first, and kill it, and to call on their gods, and the God of Elijah, and bring them prayer or invocation of the prophets upon their sacrifice, Elijah derided them, and bade them
call upon their gods with a loud voice, for they might either be on a journey, or asleep; and when these prophets had done so from morning till noon, and cut themselves with swords and lances, according to the customs of their country, and he was about to offer his sacrifice, he bade [the prophets] go away, but bade [the pople] come near and observe what he did, lest he should privately hide fire among the pieces of wood. So upon the approach of the multitude, he took twelve stones, one for each tribe of Israel, and told them, to be the land and altar with them, and dug a very deep trench;
and when he had laid the pieces of wood upon years ago are also intimated there, and in Josephus, sect. 2, as belonging to this drought and famine, may, we have and the ceasing of this drought in Phœnicia, which, (as Menander informs us) lasts twenty years, and the lasted in all three years and six months, as their copies

1 Mr. Spawinian takes notice here, that in the worship of Mithra, there is none of this kind of year. And the above mentioned Stoics, the Spaniards, and selves in the same manner as did these priests in their invocation of Baal (the god of the Phœnicians).
the altar and upon them had laid the pieces of the sacrifices, he ordered them to fill four barrels with the water of the fountain, and to pour it upon the altar, till it ran over it, and till the trench was filled with the water poured into it. When he had done this, he began to pray to God, and to invoke him to make manifest his power to a people that had already been in an array a long time: upon which words a fire came on him, and the place was filled with the multitude of the presence of God, and fell upon the altar, and consumed the sacrifices, till the very water was set on fire, and the place was become dry.

6. Now when the Israelites saw this, they fell down upon their knees, and magnified the Lord, and called him the great and the only true God, but they called the others mere names, framed by the evil and vile opinions of men. So they sought their prophets, and, at the command of Elijah, slew them. Elijah also said to the king, that he should go to dinner without any further concern, for that in a little time he would see God send them rain. Accordingly, Ahab went his way; but Elijah went up into the highest top of Carmel, and leant on his staff, and leaned his head upon his knees; and bade his servant go up to a certain elevated place, and look towards the sea, and when he should see a cloud rise up out of the sea, he should give him notice of it, for till that time the air should be clear. When the servant had gone up, and had said many times that he saw nothing, at the seventh time of his going up, he said that he saw a man standing by a little cloud, like a man's foot. When Elijah heard that, he went to Ahab, and desired him to go away to the city before the rain came down. So he came to the city Jesreel; and in a little time the air was all changed, and a vast cloud together with a mighty storm of wind came upon the earth, and with it a great deal of rain; and the prophet was under a divine fury, and ran along with the king's chariot unto Jesreel, a city of Israel.

7. When Jezebel, the wife of Ahab, understood what signs Elijah had wrought, and how he had slain her prophets, she was angry, and sent messengers to him, and by them threatened to kill him. But the king, hearing her grief, sent for Elijah, who was at a distance; and he sent for him, and begged that he would come and see the king. Then the king sent for the man of God, and told him, that he was in great fear for that she would take care to have Naboth punished: and she immediately sent letters to the rulers of the Israelites [Jezebelites] in Ahab's name, and commanded them to come and assemble a council concerning Naboth, and to take Naboth by the head of them, because he was of an illustrious family, and to have three bold men ready to give witness that he had blasphemed God and the king, and then to stone him, and slay him in that manner. Accordingly, when Naboth had been thus testified against, as the queen had written to them, that he had blasphemed against God and Ahab the king, she desired him to take possession of Naboth's vineyard on free cost. So Ahab was grieved at what had been done, and rose up immediately from the bed whereon he lay, to go to see Naboth's vineyard: but God had great indignation at it, and sent Elijah the prophet to the field of Ahab, to speak to him. And Ahab said, "Tell me, Elijah, the king of Israel, that "he had slain the true owner of that field unjustly." And as soon as he came to him and the king had said, that he might do with him what he pleased, (for he thought it a reproach to send him to Naboth) and had said, "Tell me, Elijah," the king of Israel, that "is that very piece in which the dead body of Naboth was eaten by dogs, both his own blood and that of his wife should be shed, and that all his family should perish, because he had risen up so insolently wicked, and had slain a citizen unjustly, and contrary to the laws of the country." of great consequence, they should send them out of the other cities to these judges, who would be obliged to give righteous sentences concerning several cases, and to render help and security to the poor and the weak, because it is proper that the sentences which are given in that city wherein the temple of God is, and wherein the king dwells, be given with great care, and the utmost justice. Now he sat over them the high priest Jehoshaphat, [both] of the tribe of Judah: and after this manner it was that the king ordered these affairs.

2. About this time the Moabites and Ammonites came into the land, with the Amalekites, and took with them a great body of Arabians, and pitched their camp at Engedi, a city that is situated at the lake Ascalitatis, and distant three hundred furlongs from Jerusalem. In that place grows the best kind of palm-trees, and the opal-balasamum. Now Jehoshaphat heard that the enemies had passed over the lake, and had made an invasion into that country which belonged to his kingdom; at which news he was affrighted, and called the people of Jerusalem and the congregation in the temple, and standing over against the temple itself, he called upon God "to afford him power and strength, so as to inflict punishment on those that made this expedition against them, for those who built this temple had prayed that he would protect that city, and take vengeance on those that were so bold as to come against it," for they are come to take us in the wilderness, to cut off all of us, for we have taken possession." When he had prayed thus, he fell into tears; and the whole multitude, together with their wives and children, made their supplications also: upon which a certain prophet, Jasha- illegal, came into the midst of the assembly, and cried out, and spoke both to the multitude and to the king, that God heard their prayers, and promised to fight against their enemies. He also gave order that the king should dismiss the people to their homes, and that he should find them between Jerusalem and the ascent of Engedi, at a place called the Emenee, and that he should not fight against them, but only stand still, and see how God would fight for him. And when the people had said this, both the king and the multitude fell upon their faces, and gave thanks to God, and worshipped him; and the Levites continued singing hymns to God with their instruments of music.

3. A day or two after the king was come into that wilderness which is under the city of Tekoa, he said to the multitude, that "they ought to give credit to what the prophet had said, and follow the orders that he had given them, fighting, but to set the priests with their trumpets, and the Levites, with the singers of hymns, to give thanks to God, as having already delivered our country from our enemies." This opinion of the king pleased [the people], and they did what he advised them to do. So God caused a terror and commotion to arise among the Ammonites, who thought one another to be enemies, and slew one another, insomuch that not one escaped that day. And when Jehoshaphat looked upon that valley where their enemies had been encamped, and saw it full of dead men, he rejoiced at so surprising an event, as was this assistance of God, while he knew that the strength of the forces that came out of the city, had given them the victory. He also gave

§ 1. And now Ahaziah, the son of Ahab, reigned over Israel, and made his abode in Samaria. He was a wicked man, and, in all respects, like to his father. When he first ascended the throne, he saw that all was transgressed, and began to deceive the people. On the second year of his reign, the king of Moab fell off from his obedience, and left off paying those tributes which he before paid to his father. The king of Israel, when he saw the great prosperity of Ahab, as he was coming down from the top of his house, fell down from it, and in his sickness sent to the Fly, which was the god of Ekron, for that was this god's name, to inquire about his recovery; and when God had commanded him, and the messenger had returned, Elijah was commanded to the king immediately: and when the king inquired how they could return so soon, and asked them the reason of it, they said, that "a certain man met them, and forbade them to go any farther, but return and tell thee, from the command of the God of Israel, that this disease will have a bad end." And when the king bade them describe the man that said this to them, they replied, "that he was a hairy man, and was girt about with a leather girdle." And it was understood by this that the man who was described by the messengers was Elijah; whereupon he sent a captain to him, with fifty soldiers, and commanded them to bring Elijah to him; and when the captain that was sent found Elijah sitting upon the top of a hill, he commanded him

But so far we may conclude, that Josephus thought one Oppir to be somewhere in the Mediterranean, and not in the South Sea, though perhaps there might be another Oppir in the South Sea also, and that those might then sail both from Phoenicia, and from the Red Sea, to fetch the gold of Oppir.

This end of History having been thus far treated of, it is necessary that we should take notice of the manner in which the Hebrews would have been very troublesome to them.
way in pursuit of the Syrians; and when they had spoiled their camp, which contained a great deal of wealth, and moreover a large quantity of gold and silver, he took Benhadad's chariots and horses, and returned to the city; but the prophet told him, he ought to have his army ready, because the Syrian king would make another expedition against him the next year, and Abah was weary in making provision for it accordingly.

3. Notwithstanding his former capture, and as much of his army as he could, out of the battle, he consulted with his friends how he might make another expedition against the Israelites. Not the mercenary hire, which he had, and bought the rest of them on the hillside, because their God was potent in such places, and thence it had come to pass that they had very lately been beaten; but they said, that if they joined battle with them in the plains, they should beat them. They all told him this further advice, to send home those kings whom he had brought as his auxiliaries, but to retain their army, and to set captains over it instead of the kings, and to raise an army out of their country, and let them be to the place of the former who perished in the battle, together with horses and chariots. So he judged their counsel to be good, and acted according to it in the same year, as before.

5. But a certain prophet, whose name was Micaiah, came one time to Ahab, the king of the Israelites, and bade him smite him on the head, for by so doing he would please God; but when he would not do so, he foretold to him, that since he disobeyed the commands of God, he should meet with a lion led by him, and that he should be slain by it, and that he, the owner of the lion, should fall into the hands of the king. And this accident had befallen the prophet, the prophet came again to another, and gave him the same injunction, so he smote him, and wounded his skull upon which he bound up his head, and came to the king, and said, "I am the prophet of the Lord, the son of David, and I have sinned; and I had the custody of one of the prisoners committed to him by an officer, and that the prisoner being run away, he was in danger of losing his own life by the means of that officer, who had threatened him, that if the prisoner escaped, he would kill him. And when Ahab had said, that he would justly die, he took off the binding about his head, and was known by the king of Israel, who had made use of this artifice as a prelude to his following words; for he said, that "God would punish him, who had suffered Benhadad, a blasphemer against him, to escape punishment; and that he would bring it upon the head of him that died by the other's means, and his people by the other's army." Upon which Ahab was very angry at the prophet, and gave commandment that he should be put in prison, and there kept; but for himself, he was in confusion at the words of Micaiah, and returned to his own house.
ANTIOCHUHIS OF THE JEWS.

CHAP. XV.
Concerning Jehoshaphat, the king of Jerusalem; and how Ahab made an Expedition against the Syrians, and was assailed therein by Jehoshaphat, but was himself overcome in Battle, and perished therein.

1. AND these were the circumstances in which Jehoshaphat, the king of Jerusalem, who, when he had augmented his kingdom, and had set garrisons in the cities of the countries belonging to his subjects, and had put such garrisons no less into those garrisons which were not set by his own hand, and were taken by Jehoram, his grandfather Abijah, when Je-roboam reigned over the ten tribes, [than he did into the other:] but then he had God favorable and assisting to him, as being both righteous and religious, and seeking to do somewhat every day, that should be agreeable and acceptable to God. The kings also that were round about him, honored him with the presents they made him, till the riches that he had acquired were very great, and the glory he had gained was of a most exalted nature.

2. Now, in the third year of his reign, he called together the rulers of the country, and the prelates, and asked them which of all then round them in the land, and teach all the people that were under him, city by city, the laws of Moses, and to keep them, and to be diligent in the worship of God. While he was thus inquiring, he was pleased, that they were not so eagerly set upon, or affected with any thing so much as the observation of the laws. The neighboring nations also continued to love Jehoshaphat, and to be at peace with him. The Syrians paid them their annual tribute; and the Arabians supplied him every year with three hundred and sixty lambs, and as many kids of the goats. He also fortified the great cities, which were many in number, and of great consequence, and supplied them also with every army of soldiers and weapons against their enemies. Now the army of men that wore their armor, were three hundred thousand of the tribe of Judah, of whom Adnah was the chief; but John was chief of two hundred thousand of the tribe of Benjamin; and there were another chief, whose name was Jehoahaz, who was chief of four hundred and armed men. This multitude was distributed to be ready for the king's service, besides those whom he sent to the best fortified cities.

3. Jehoshaphat took for his son Jehoram to wife the daughter of Ahab, the son of Omri, of the ten tribes, whose name was Athaliah. And when, after some time, he went to Samaria, Ahab received him courteously, and treated the army that followed him in a splendid manner, with great plenty of corn and wine, and of slain beasts; and desired that he would join with him in his war against the king of Syria, that he might recover from him the city Ramoth, in Gilead; for though it had belonged to his father, he, the king of Syria's father took it away from him; and upon Jehoshaphat's promise to afford him assistance, (for indeed his army was not inferior to the other's;) and his sending for his army from Jerusalem, the two kings went out of the city, and each of them sat on his own throne, and each gave their orders to their several armies. Now Jehoshaphat bade them call some of the prophets, if there were any there, and inquire of the Lord concerning his expedition against the king of Syria, whether they would give them counsel to make that expedition at this time, for there

* These reasons of Zedekiah, the false prophet, in order to persuade Ahab not to believe Micaiah, the true prophet, are plausible, but being omitted in our other copies, it is not certain whether from his own temple copy, from some other oriel was peace at that time between Ahab and the king of Syria, which had lasted three years, from the time he had taken him captive till that day. Now Ahab had his own prophets in number about four hundred, and bade them inquire of God whether he would grant him the victory, if he made an expedition against Benhadad, and enable him to overthrow that city, for whose sake it was that he was going to war. Now these prophets gave their counsel for making this expedition; and said, that "he would beat the king of Syria, and, as formerly, would reduce him under his power." But Jehoshaphat, who was one of the false prophets, asked Ahab, whether there were not some other prophet, and he belonging to the true God, that we may have surer information concerning futurities? Hereupon Ahab said, "there was indeed such a one, but that he hated him, as having prophesied evil to him, and having foretold that he should be overcome, and slain by the king of Syria, and that for this cause he had him stoned to death, and that his name was Micaiah, the son of Imnah." But upon Jehoshaphat's desire that he might be produced, Ahab sent a eunuch, who brought Micaiah to him. Now the eunuch had informed him by the way, that all the prophets had taken off, and that he was disposed to gain the victory; but he said, that "it was not lawful for him to lie against God, but that he must speak what he should say to him about the king, whatsoever it were." When he came to Ahab, and was adjured him by the king to speak the truth to him, he said, that "God had showed to him the Israelites running away, and pursued by the Syrians, and dispersed upon the field; and the dead bodies were dispersed when their shepherd is slain." He said farther, that "God signified to him, that those Israelites should return in peace to their own homes, and that he only should fall in battle." Whereupon Ahab had this conclusion drawn by Jehoshaphat, "I told thee a little while ago the disposition of the man with regard to me, and that he uses to prophesy evil to me." Upon which Micaiah replied, that "he ought to hear all that God had said, and that in particular, they were false prophets that encouraged him to make this war in hope of victory, whereas he must fight and be killed." Whereupon the king was in suspense with himself; for Micaiah, one of those false prophets, came near, and exhorted him not to hearken to Micaiah, for he did not at all speak truth; as a demonstration of which, he instance in what he had said would be a proof of his being a false prophet in foretelling futurities than Micaiah; for he foretold, That "the dogs should lick his blood in the city of Jezreel, in the field of Naboth, as they licked the blood of Naboth, who by his means was there stoned to death by the multitude;" that therefore it was plain that this Micaiah was a liar, as contradicting a greater prophet than himself, and saying, that he would be slain at three days' journey distance. And [said he] "I would suppose thou hast already heard of that accident." So when, upon his smiting Micaiah, no harm happened to him, Ahab took courage, and readily led his army against Benhadad, as he supposed, fate was too hard for him, and made him believe that the false prophets spake truer than the true one, general author; or from certain ancient notes. That some such plausible objection was now raised against Micaiah is very likely, otherwise Jehoshaphat, who used to disbelief the words of the false prophets, could never have been induc ed to accompany Ahab in these desperate circumstances that it might take an occasion of bringing him to his end. However, Zedekiah made horns of iron, and said to Ahab, that "God made those horns by all thy power, and by the spirit of all thy might, by the all Syrians." But Micaiah replied, that "Zedekiah in a few days should go from one secret chamber to another, to hide himself, that he might escape the punishment of his lying." Then did the king give orders that they should take Micaiah away, and guard him to Amos, the governor of the city, and to give him nothing but bread and water.

5. Then did Ahab, and Jeoshaphat, the king of Jerusalem, take their forces, and marched to Ramoth, a city of Gilead; and when the king of Syria heard of this expedition, he brought out his army to oppose them, and pitched his camp not far from Ramoth. Now Ahab and Jeoshaphat had agreed, that Ahab should lay aside his royal robes, but the king of Jerusalem should put on his [Ahab's] proper habit, and stand before the army, in order to disprove, by this artifice, what Micaiah had foretold; but Ahab's fate found him out with his royal robes, and Benhadad, the king of Syria, had charged his army, by the means of their commanders, to kill nobody else but only the king of Israel. So when the Syrians, upon their joining battle with the king of Jerusalem, first shot arrows against the army, and conjectured that he was Ahab, they fell violently upon him, and encompassed him round; but when they were near, and knew that it was not he, they all returned back; and while the light lasted from the morning-light to the evening, in the army, and the Syrians were conquerors, they killed nobody, as their king had commanded them. And when they sought to kill Ahab alone, but could not find him, there was a young servant, and a slave belonging to king Benhadad, whose name was Naaman; he drew his bow against the enemy, and wounded the king through his breastplate, in his lungs. Upon this, Ahab resolved not to make his mischances known to his army, lest they should run away, but he bade the driver of his chariot to turn it back, and carry him home, but when he got there, he was both cruelly and mortally wounded; however, he sat in his chariot and endured the pain till sunset, and then he fainted away and died.

6. And now the Syrian army, upon the coming of the night, were ready to pass away; but-v. 20. and when the herald belonging to the camp gave notice that Ahab was dead, they returned home; and they took the dead body of Ahab to Samaria and buried it there; but when they had washed his chariot, in the fountain of Jeruel, which was bloody with the dead body of the king, they acknowledged that the prophecy of Elijah was true, for the dogs licked his blood, and the harlots contended afterward to wash themselves in that fountain; but still he lay at Ramoth, as Micaiah had foretold. And as what things were foretold should happen to Ahab, by the two prophets, came to pass, we ought hence to have high notions of God, and to worship him, and never to suppose that what is pleasant and agreeable is worthy of belief before what is true, and to esteem nothing more advantageous than the gift of prophecy, and that foresee knowledge of future events which is derived from it, since God shows man thereby what we ought to avoid. We may also guess, from what happened to this king, and have reason to consider the power of fate, that there is no way of avoiding it, even when we know it. It creeps upon human souls, and festers them with pleasing hopes, till it leads them about to the place where it will be too hard for them. Accordingly, Ahab appears to have been deceived thereby, till he disbelieved those that foretold his death, but by giving credit to such as foretold what was grateful to him, was slain: and his son Absaiah succeeded him.

† We have here a very wise reflection of Josephus about Divine Providence, and what is derived from it, prophecy, and the inevitable certainty of its accomplishment; and that when wicked men think they take proper methods to evade what is denounced against them, they are often mistaken; and without repentance, they are ever by Providence instigated to bring about their own destruction, and thereby withal to demonstrate the perfect veracity of that God whose predictions they in vain endeavor to elude.

BOOK IX.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-SEVEN YEARS—FROM THE DEATH OF AHAB TO THE CAPTIVITY OF THE TEN TRIBES.

CHAP. I.

Concerning Jeoshaphat again; how he constituted Judges, and, by God's Assistance, overcame his Enemies.

§ 1. When Jeoshaphat the king was come to Jerusalem, from the assistance he had afforded Ahab, the king of Israel, when he fought with Benhadad king of Syria, the prophet Jehezekiel met him, and accused him for assisting Ahab, a man both iniquious and wicked: and said to him; that "God was displeased with him for so doing, but that he delivered him from the enemy, notwithstanding he had sinned, because of his better disposition, which was good." Whereupon the king betook himself to thanksgivings and sacrifices to God: after which he presently went over all that country which he ruled round about, and taught the people, as well the laws which God gave them by Moses, as that religious worship that was due to him. He also constituted judges in every one of the cities of his kingdom; and charged them "to have regard to nothing so much in judging the multitude as to do justice, and not to be moved by bribes, nor by the dignity of men eminent for either their riches or their high birth, but to distribute justice equally to all, as knowing that God is conscious of every secret action of theirs." When he had himself instructed them thus, and gone over every city of the two tribes, he returned to Jerusalem. He there also called together the elders of the Levites, and the Levites' and principal persons of the multitude, and admonished them to pass all their sentences with care and justice. And that if any of the people of his country had differences against the king of Moab, whose name was Mosha; for, as we told you before, he was passionate in his love for either Ahab [Ahabah] or Jehoshaphat, while he paid to his father Ahab two hundred thousand sheep with their fleeces of wool.

When therefore he had gathered his own army together, he sent messengers to Jehoshaphat, that since he had from the beginning been a friend to his father, he would assist him in the war that he was entering into against the Moabites, who had departed from their obedience;
who not only neglected the acts of kindness that he hadowiowed to Jehoshaphat, but even when he had been sumptuously entertained by the king of Jerusalem, it was resolved upon by
them to take their march against their enemies
through the wilderness of Edom; and when they had come near his army with him, and came up against him, they were in distress for want of water for the cattle, and for the army, from the mistake of their roads by the guides that accompanied them, so much that the whole was in a great and serious sorrow, and [designed to] know what wickedness had been committed by them, that induced him to deliver three kings to
him, without fighting, of whom one was Jehosh-aphat, the other Elijah, and the third was a righteous man, encouraged him, and bade him send to the camp, and know whether any prophet of God was come along with them, that we might by him learn from God what we should
do. And when none of the inhabitants of Edom and of Israel knew what to do, they sent to the god of Ekron to inquire of him what would be the end of this thy distemper, know this,
that thou shalt die.

2. Accordingly, the king in a very little time did not delay to despatch the envoys to the prophets; but Jehoram his brother succeeded him in the kingdom, for he died without children: but for this Jehoram, he was like his father Ahab in wickedness, and reigned twelve years, indulging himself in all sorts of wickedness, upbraiding, and spoiling God;
for, leaving off his worship, he worshipped for-soign gods: but in other respects he was an active man. Now at this time it was that Elijah died, according to the prophecy of the word: but he left behind him his disciple Elisha, as we have formerly described. And indeed, as to Elijah, and as to Elisha, who was before the deluge, it is written in the scriptures, that he was translated to heaven, but so that nobody knew that they died.

CHAPTER III.

How Jehoram and Jehoshaphat made an Expedition against the Moabites; as also concerning the Wonders of Elisha; and the death of Jehosha-phat.

1. When Jehoram had taken upon him the kingdom, he determined to make an expedition against the Moabites.

2. Thus Jehoram and Jehoshaphat made an Expedition against the Moabites, whose name was Mosha; for, as we told you before, he was passionate in his love for either Ahab [Ahabah] or Jehoshaphat, while he paid to his father Ahab two hundred thousand sheep with their fleeces of wool.
When therefore he had gathered his own army together, he sent messengers to Jehoshaphat, that
since he had from the beginning been a friend to
his father, he would assist him in the
war that he was entering into against the Moab-
ites, who had departed from their obedience;
who not only neglected the acts of kindness that
he hadowiowed to Jehoshaphat, but even when
he had been sumptuously entertained by the king of Jerusalem, it was resolved upon by
them to take their march against their enemies
through the wilderness of Edom; and when they
had come near his army with him, and came up against him, they were in distress for want of
water for the cattle, and for the army, from the
mistake of their roads by the guides that
in a great and serious sorrow, and [designed to]
know what wickedness had been committed by
them, that induced him to deliver three kings to
him, without fighting, of whom one was Jehosh-aphat, the other Elijah, and the third was a righteous man, encouraged him, and bade him
send to the camp, and know whether any prophet of God was come along with them, that
we might by him learn from God what we should
do. And when none of the inhabitants of Edom
and of Israel knew what to do, they sent to the god of Ekron to inquire of him what
would be the end of this thy distemper, know this,
that thou shalt die.

2. Accordingly, the king in a very little time
did not delay to despatch the envoys to the prophets; but Jehoram his brother succeeded him in the kingdom, for he died without children: but for this Jehoram, he was
like his father Ahab in wickedness, and
reigned twelve years, indulging himself in all sorts of wickedness, upbraiding, and spoiling God;
for, leaving off his worship, he worshipped for-soign gods: but in other respects he was an active man. Now at this time it was that Elijah died, according to the prophecy of the word: but he left behind him his disciple Elisha, as we have formerly described. And indeed, as to Elijah, and as to Elisha,
who was before the deluge, it is written in the
nobody knew that they died.
any, because the sea rising, a great torrent came strongly; for God had caused it to rain plentifully at the distance of three days' journey into Edom; so that the army and the cattle found water to drink in abundance. But when the Moabites heard that the three kings were on their way against them, and made their approach through the wilderness, the king of Moab gathered his army together presently, and commanded them to pitch their camp upon the mountains, that they might attack the three kings, cut off their country, they might not be concealed from them. But when at the rising of the sun they saw the water in the torrent, for it was not far from the land made a valley, and was covered with a great sea of blood, for at such a time the water especially looks red, by the shining of the sun upon it, they formed a false notion of the state of their enemies, as if they had slain one another for thirst, and the river was without water in it, destroying them destroyed already. But their hope deceived them, for as their enemies stood round about them, some of them were cut to pieces, and others of them were dispersed, and fled to their own country. And when the three kings cut the land of Moab, they overthrew the cities that were in it, and spoiled their fields, and marred them, filling them with stones out of the brooks, and cutting down the bough of their trees, and stopping up the fountain of water, so that they drew their walls to their foundations. But the king of Moab, when he was perished, endured a siege, and seeing his city in danger of being overthrown by famine, he made war with publicans and sheriffs, in order to break through the enemies' camp with his horsemen, on that side where the watch seemed to be kept most negligently: and when upon trial, he could not get near either the town or the city, being watched, he returned into the city, and did a thing that showed despair and the utmost distress; for he took his eldest son, who was to reign after him, and lifting him up upon the wall, that they might see all the destruction, he offered him as a whole burnt-offering to God, whom, when the kings saw, they communicated the distress that was the occasion of it, and were so affected, in way of humanity and pity, that they rescinded their war and returned to their own houses. So Jehoshaphat came to Jerusalem, and continued in peace there, and outfitted this expedition but a little time, and then died, having lived in all sixty years, and of them twenty-two were. He was buried in an magnificent manner in Jerusalem, for he had imitated the actions of David.

That this woman who cried to Elisah, and who in our Bible is styled the wife of one of the sons of the prophet, Ex. 21:8, is also Ordah, the good steward of Ahab, is confirmed by the Chaldee paraphrase, and by the Rabbins and others. But when, as has been already said, that these debts were contracted by her husband for the support of those hundred of the Lord's prophets whom he maintained by fifty a piece, in the days of Ahab and Jehoshaphat, 1 Kings xviii. 4, which circumstances rendered it highly fit that the prophet Eliasha should provide her a remedy, and enable her to redeem herself and her sons from the fear of that servitude which involved debters to be liable to by the law of Moses, Lev. xxv. 38, 39, the best solution accordingly, with God's help, at the expense of a miracle.

† Dr. Hudson, with very good reason, suspects that there is no such word in the Hebrew, just before the beginning of this section, and that chiefly as to that distinct account which he had given as reason to expect in the first section, and so it is to me. However, I see to point out that the spirit of Josephus, after he had been miraculously cured by a prophet of the true God, went into the house of Raimus to worship there; and he went near, and I bow myself in the House of Raimus; when I bow myself in the House of God. 7 And he is something of a thing. And Elisah said, Go in peace. This looks like a prophet's permission for being partner inidelity justly, out of compliance with an idealist sense.

should not mistake himself, nor suspect that they had discovered to his enemy his sending men to kill him, but this right to know that it was Elisha the prophet, who discovered all the time and laid open all his counsels." So he gave orders that they should send some to learn in what city Elisha dwelt. Accordingly, those that were sent went first to Gilead, and therefrom to the city of Gilead, wherefore Benhadad sent to that city a great army, with horses and chariots, to take Elisha; so they compassed the city round about by night, and kept him therein confined; but when the king had learned of all this, and that his enemies sought to take Elisha, he came running, and crying out after a disord- ered manner to him, and told him of it; but he encouraged him, and bid him not be afraid, and told him the same thing, and trusted to the power of God, and was himself without fear; and he besought God to make manifest to his servant his power and presence, so far as was possible, in order to the inspiring him with hope and cour- age. Accordingly God heard the prayer of the prophet, and made the servant see a multitude of chariots and horses encompassing Elisha, till he laid aside his fear, and his courage revived and increased, and this was the means of his giving them their assistance. After this Elisha did farther entreat God that he would Dim the eyes of their enemies, and cast a mist before them, whereby they might not discern him. When this was done, the army was made to find another road, and they asked them who it was that they came to seek; and when they replied, the prophet Elisha, he promised he would deliver him to them, if they would follow him to the city where he was. So they followed him, and were thus delivered by God in their sight and in their mind, that they followed him very diligently; and when Elisha had brought them to Samaria, he ordered Joram the king to shut the gates, and to place his own army round about, and to order no one to go to God to cleave the eyes of these their enemies, and take the mist from before them. Accordingly, when they were freed from the obscurity they had been in, they saw themselves in the midst of their enemies; and as the Syrians were strangely amazed and distressed, as was but reasonable, at an action so divine and surprising: and as king Joram asked the prophet if he would give him leave to address himself to Elisha, and receive and make such offer to the prophet; but Elisha was not acquainted with the wrath of the king against him; for as he sat in his house by himself, with none but his disciples about him, he told them, that Joram, who was the son of Ahab, was a man that was not to be trusted, he could be too hard for his enemies by the multitude of his army and power. So he made an expedi- tion with a great army against Joram, who, not thinking himself a match for him, put himself up in Samaria, and depended on the strength of its walls. But Benhadad supposed he should take the city, if he only kept the gates of it open, that he should overcome the Samaritans by famine, and the want of necessaries, and brought his army upon them, and besieged the city; and the plenty of corn, and the abundance of all kinds of things there, with Joram, that from the extremity of want an ass's head was sold in Samaria for fourscore pieces of silver, and the Hebrews bought a sextary of dore's dung, instead of salt, for five pieces of silver. Now it was not a time for God to leave them, that should betray the city to the enemy by reason of the famine, and went every day round the walls and the guards, to see whether any such were concealed among them; and by being thus seen, and taking such care of him, God had given them an opportunity of contriving any such thing, and if they had a mind to do it, he, by these means, prevented them; but upon a certain woman's crying out, "Have pity on me, my lord," while he thought that she was about to ask for somewhat to eat, he imprecated God's curse upon her, and said, "He had neither threshing-floor nor wine-press, whence he might give her any thing at her petition." He was willing, which she said she desired in any such thing, nor trouble him about food, but desired that he would do her justice as to another woman. And when he bade her say on, and let him know what she desired, she said, "Let there be given me, my lord, one flat of another woman, who was her neighbor and her friend, that because the famine and want was intolerable, they should kill their children, each of them having a son of her own, and we will live upon them them, and we will come unto thee upon one son, and the other day upon the other: and, (said she,) I have killed my son the first day, and we lived upon my son yesterday, but this other woman will not do the same thing, but hath broken the head of her son, and hath hid his son." This story mightily grieved Joram when he heard it; so he rent his garment, and cried out with a loud voice, and conceived great wrath against Elisha the prophet, and set himself eagerly to have him slain, because he did not pray to God to provide them some exit and way of escape out of the miseries with which they were surrounded, and sent one away immediately to cut off the head of Elisha, and to slay and destroy the prophet; but Elisha was not acquainted with the wrath of the king against him; for as he sat in his house by himself, with none but his disciples about him, he told them, that Joram, who was the son of Ahab, was a man that was not to be trusted, and that the miseries they now lay under, but saw themselves so sadly destroyed by them. Hereupon Elisha promised, that the very next day, at the very same hour in which the king came to him, they should have great plenty of food, and that two seaus of barley should be sold in the market for a shekel, and a seash of fine flour should be sold for a shekel. This prevailed in the time of Joram, and those that were present, very joyful, for they did not scruple believing what the prophet said, on account of the experience they had of the truth of his former predictions; and the expectation of plenty was more in that day, with the uneasiness that accompanied it, appear a light thing to them: but the captain of the third band, who was a friend of the king, and one of the chief officers of it, said, "Thou talkest of incredible things, O prophet! for as it is impossible for God to pour down torrents of barley, or fine flour, out of heaven, so it is impossible that what thou sayest should come to pass." To which the prophet made this reply, "Thou shalt see these things come to pass, but thou shalt not be in the least a partaker of them." 5. Now what Elisha had thus foretold, came to pass in the manner following: there was a law at Samaria, that the king of Syria that had hired, whose bodies were not cleansed from it, should abide without the city; and there were four men on this account 400 before the gates, with their horses and flocks, by reason of the extremity of the famine: and they were prohibited from entering into the city by the law, and they considered that if they were permitted to enter, they should miserably perish by the famine: so that if they were where they were, they should suffer in the same manner. They resolved to deliver themselves up to the enemy, that in case they should spare them, they should live, but if they should be killed, that would be an easy death. So when they had confirmed this their resolution, they came by night to the enemy's camp. Now God had beguiled and disturbed the Syrians, and to bring the noise of chariots and armor to their ears, and when the army was coming upon them, and had made them suspect that it was coming nearer and nearer to them. In short, they were in such a dread of this army, that they left their tents, and ran together to Benhadad, and said, "The king of Syria that had hired us, had hired us for auxiliaries, both the king of Egypt, and the king of the islands, and led them against them, for they heard the noise of them as they were coming. And Benhadad heard what they said, (for there came the same noise to his ears as well as it did to theirs,) so they fell into a mighty disorder and tumult, and left their horses and beasts in their camp, with immense riches of all sorts before them, and went to the fight. And those lepers who had departed from Samaria, and were gone to the camp of the Syrians, of whom we made mention a little before, when they were in the camp, saw nothing but great quietness and silence; accordingly they entered into it, and went hastily into one of their tents, and when they saw nobody there, they ate and drank, and carried garments and a great quantity of gold, and hid it out of the camp; after what they did, they came thence, and carried off what was in it, as they did at the former, and this did they for several times, without the least interruption from any body. So they gathered thereby, that they approached themselves that they did not inform Joram and the citizens of it. So they came to the walls of Samaria, and called aloud to the watchmen, and told them in what state the things were, as did the king's guards, by whose means Joram came to know of it: who then sent for his friends, and the captains of his host, and said to them, that "he sus-

not thinking himself a match for him, but himself up in Samaria, and depended on the strength of its walls; but Benhadad expected he should take the city, if not by his engines of war, yet that he should overcome the Samaritans by famine, and the want of necessaries, and brought his army upon them, and besieged the city: and the plenty of necessaries was brought so low with Joram, that from the extremity of want an as's head was sold in Samaria for fourscore pieces of silver, and the Hebrews bought a sextary of dove's dung, instead of salt, for five pieces of silver. Nor did Joram forget how he should not betray the city to the enemy by reason of the famine, and went every day round the walls and the guards, to see whether any such were concealed among them; and by thus seeming, and taking such care, he improved them the opportunity of contriving any such thing, and if they had a mind to do it, he, by this means, prevented them; but upon a certain woman's crying out, "Holofernes, I pray you, my lord," whom he thought she was about to ask for somewhat to eat, he impregnated God's curse upon her, and said, "he had neither threshing-floor nor winepress, whence he might give her any thing at her petition." And which the more rather, because he desired not his aid in any such thing, nor trouble him about food, but desired that he would do her justice as to another woman. And when he bade her say on, and let him know what she desired, she said, "I have heard my master's business, and the business of every other woman, who was her neighbor and her friend, that because the famine and want was intolerable, they should kill their children, each of them having a son or her own, and we will live upon them: and, therefore, I have this day chosen one son, and the other day the other:
and, (said she,) I have killed my son the first day, and we lived upon us my son yesterday, but this other woman, (for so he said,) hath broken her agreement, and hath hid her son." This story mightily grieved Joram when he heard it; so he rent his garments, and cried out with a loud voice, and conceived great wrath against Eliasha the prophet, and set himself savagely to have him slain, because he did not pray to God to provide them some exit and way of escape out of the miseries with which they were surrounded, and sent one away immediately to cut his throat. Joram, who was the prophet, and threatened with his hand, sent the prophet; but Eliasha was not unsanctioned with the wrath of the king against him; for as he sat in his house by himself, with none but his disciples about him, he told them, that Joram, who was the son of Ahab, was the man to take to take away his head; but, said he, "when he that is commanded to do this comes, take care that you do not let him come in, but press the door against him, and hold him fast there, for the king himself will follow him, and come to me, having altered his mind." Accordingly, they did as they were bidden, when he that was sent by the king to kill Eliasha came; but Joram with great astonishment said, "What fear have I of death? for the king of Israel is not so far from me that he can send a man to kill me.
As for the fear that was commanded to kill him should have done it before he came, he made haste to hinder his slaughter, and to save the prophet; and when he came to him, he accused him that he did not pray to God for those that had once the miseries they now lay under, but saw them so sadly destroyed by them. Hereupon Eliasha promised, that the very next day, at the very

* Upon occasion of this stratagem of Eliasha's in Josephus, we may take notice, that although Josephus was one of the greatest lovers of truth in the world, yet in a judgment of this kind, I doubt not but he has misled us, and been infected with the imputation of all such stratagems possible to deceive public enemies. See also Josephus's account of Jeremiah's imprisonment at Jericho, chap. xix. sect. 5, and 2 Sam. xvi.
14, 44.

† This son of a murderer was Joram, the son of Ahab;
which Ahab slew, or permitted his wife Jezebel to slay
the Lord's prophets, and Naboth, 1 Kings xvii. 4, 21, 22, and he is here put among the list of those who caused he had now also himself sent an officer to murder him; yet is Josephus's account of Joram's coming himself at last, as one of those who had the misfortune of the three, more probable than that in our copies, 2 Kings xii.
33, which rather implies the contrary.
but the wound was not mortal: so he returned to have his wound healed in Jezreel, but left his white horse in Ramoth, and Jehu the son of Nimshi for their general, for he had already taken the city by force; and he proposed, after he was healed, to make war with the Syrians; but Elisha the prophet sent one of his disciples to Ramoth to give holy oil to assist Jehu, and to tell him that God had chosen him to be their king. He also sent him to say other things to him, and bade him take his journey as if he fled, that when he came away he might escape. And when he came to the midst of the captains of the army, as Elisha had foretold he should find him. So he came up to him, and said, that he desired to speak with him about certain matters; and when he was abreast of him, and had followed him into an inward chamber, the young man took the oil, and poured it on his head, and said, that "God ordained him to be king in order to his destroying the house of Ahab, and that he might revenge the blood of the prophets, that were unjustly slain by Jezebel, so that their house might utterly perish, as those of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, and of Bethel, that were punished for their sin, and that no seed might remain of Ahab's family." So when he had said this, he went away hastily out of the chamber, and endeavored not to be seen by any of the army.

2. But Jehu came out, and went to the place where he before sat with the captains: and when they asked him, and desired him to tell them, wherefore it was that this young man came to him: and added withal that he was mad, he replied, "You guess right, for the words he spake were the words of a madman:" and when they were eager about the matter, and desired him to tell them, he answered, that God had said, "I will remove from him the king over the multitude." When he had said this, every one of them put off his garment, and strewn it under him, and blew with trumpets, and gave notice that Jehu was king. So when he had gathered the army together, he set out imme-mediately against Joram, at the city of Jezreel, in which city, as we said before, he was healing of the wound which he had received in the siege of Ramoth. And when Ahab, the king of Jerusalem, was now come to Joram, and commanded him to come down to him. At last he ordered the eunuchs to throw him down from the tower, and being thrown down, she sprinkled the wall with her blood, and men began to shout, and said, "Thus doth the dog, the son of Ahab." When this was done, Jehu came to the palace with his friends, and took some refreshment after his journey, both with other things, and by eating a meal. He also bade his servants to take up Jezebel and bury her, because of the nobility of her blood, for she was descended from kings; but those that were appointed to bury her found nothing else remaining but the extremest parts of her body, for the rest were eaten by dogs. With this great joy, he admired the prophecy of Elijah, for he foresaw that she should perish in this manner at Jezreel.

3. So they were pleased with what he did, and guarded the roads, lest somebody should privately tell the thing to those that were at Jezreel.

Now Jehu took his choice horsemen, and sent on over his chariot, and went on for Jezreel; and when he was come near, the watchman whom Joram had set there to spy out such as came to the city, saw Jehu marching on, and told Joram that he saw a troop of horsesmen marching on. Upon which he immediately gave orders, that one of his horsemen should be sent out to meet them, and to know who it was that was coming. So when the horseman came up to Jehu, he asked him, in what condition the army was; for that the avenge the murder of Ahab." This he wrote to try the intentions of those of Samaria. Now when the rulers, and those that had brought up the children, had read the letter, they were afeard: and considering that they were not able to oppose him, and that he had already subdued two very great kings, they returned him this answer, that "they owned him for their lord, and their God, and their king." So he wrote back to them such a reply as enjoined them to obey what he gave order for, and to cut off the heads of Ahab's sons, and send them to him. Accordingly, the rulers sent for those that brought up the children, and said, "Now this Baal that thou lovest, and Ahab, in order to gratify his father- in-law, Eth- baal, who was the king of Tyre and Sidon, built a temple for him in Samaria, and appointed him prophets, and worshipped him with all sorts of worship, although, when this god was denounced, Eth-baal permitted the Israelites to worship the golden heifers. However, because he had done thus, and taken care to punish the wicked, God foretold by his prophet, that his sons should reign over Israel for four hundred and thirty years, and in this condition was Jehu at this time.

CHAP. VII.

How Athaliah reigned over Jerusalem for five [six] Years, when Jehoishah, the High Priest, slew her, and made Jehoash, the Son of Ahaziah, King.

§ 1. Now, when Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab, heard of the death of her brother Joram, and of her son Ahaziah, and of the royal family, she endeavored that none of the house of David might be left alive, but that the whole family might be exterminated; but then, when Joram's son, Jehoash, appeared to her, she took him up, and went about to secure him. Now, the king of Judah, whose name was Jehoishah, was a high priest, which title was given to all the Levites, and who was a high priest of God, because he attended to the worship of God, and was devoted to God's service, and was set over the whole people. But now, Athaliah reigned over Jerusalem, and the two tribes.

2. Now, on the seventh year, Jehoishah communicated the matter to certain of the captains of hundreds, five in number, and persuaded them to be assailing to what attempts he was making against Athaliah, and to join with him in asserting the kingdom to the child. He also received such oaths from them as are proper to secure those that assist another from the fear of discovery; and he was then of good hope that, they should depose Athaliah. Now, those men whom Jehoishah, the priest, had taken to be his partners, went into all the country, and gathered together the priests and Levites, and the heads of the tribes of Judah, and did what Athaliah did, and brought them to Jerusalem, to the high priest. So he demanded the security of an oath of them, to keep private whatever he should discover among them, which Athaliah used to have their assistance. So when they had taken the oath, and had thereby made it safe for him to speak, he produced the child that he had brought up of the family of David, and said to them, "this is your king;" and he showed it to them, and said to them, "I know God hath foresaid should reign over you for all time to come: I exhort you, therefore, that one-third part of you guard him in the temple, and that another part stand at the gates of the temple, and that the next part of you keep guard at the gate which opens and leads to the king's palace, and let the rest of the multitude be unarmed in the temple, and let no armed horsemen go into the temple but the priest only. He also gave them this order besides, that a part of the priests and the Levites should be about the king himself, and be a guard to him, with their drawn swords, and to kill that man immediately, whoever he be, that should be so bold as to enter armed into the temple; and bade them be afraid of nobody, but persevere in guarding the king." So these men obeyed what the high priest advised him to, and declared the resolution by the actions. Jehoiada also opened that armory which David had made in the temple, and distributed to the captains of hundreds, as also to the priests and Levites, all the spears and quivers, and what kind of weapons ever it contained, and set them armed in a circle round about the temple, so as to touch one another's hands, and by that means excluding those from entering that ought not to enter. So they brought the child into the midst of them, and put on him the royal crown, and Jehoiada anointed him with the oil, and made him king; and the multitude rejoiced, and made a noise, and cried "God save the king!"

2. Jehoiada also heard the tumult and the acclamations, she was greatly disturbed in her mind, and suddenly issued out of the royal palace with her own army; and when she was come to the temple, the priest received her, and those that stood about also went into the temple, as they were ordered by the high priest to do, they hindered the armed men that followed her from going in. But when Athaliah saw the child standing upon a pillar, with the royal crown upon her head, and her clothes, and cried out vehemently, and commanded [her guards] to kill him that had laid snares for her, and endeavored to deprive her of the government, Jehoiada called for the captains of hundreds, and commanded them to bring Athaliah to the valley of Cedron, and slay her there, for he would not have the temple desecrated with the punishment of this pernicious woman; and he gave orders, that if any one came near to help her, he should be slain also; wherefore those that had the charge of her slaughter, took hold of her, and led her to the gate of the king's mules, and slew her there.

3. So now what concerned Athaliah was by this stratagem, after this manner despatched, Jehoiada called together the people and the armed men into the temple, and made them take an oath that the king should be obedient to them, and take care of his safety, and of the safety of his government; after which he obliged the king to give security [upon oath] that he would worship God, and not transgress the laws of Moses. They then ran to the horse of Baal, which Athaliah and her husband Jehoram had built, to the dishonor of the God of their fathers, and to the honor of Ahab, and demolished it, and slew Matan, that had his priests, and burned the places and the priests, according to the appointment of king David, and enjoined them to bring their regular burnt-offerings twice a day, and to offer incense according to the order for incense; whereupon the Levites, with the porters, to be a guard to the temple, that no one that was defiled might come there.

And when Jehoiada had set these things in order, he, with the captains of hundreds, and the rulers, and all the people, took Jehoiash out of the temple into the king's palace; and when he had set him upon the king's throne, the people shouted and betook themselves to feasting, and kept a festival for many days; but the city was quiet upon the death of Athaliah. Now Jehoiash was seven years old when he took the kingdom: his mother's name was Zibiah, of the city Beerseba. And all the time Jehoiada lived, Jehoiash was careful that the laws should be kept, and very zealous in the worship of God; and when he was of age, he married two wives, who were given to him by the high priest, by whom were born to him both sons and daughters. And as he had received counsel concerning king Jehoash, how he escaped the treachery of Athaliah, and how he received the kingdom.

CHAP. VIII.

Hazaël makes an Expedition against the People of Israel, and the Inhabitants of Jerusalem.

1. Now Hazael, king of Syria, feared to come against the Israelites and their king Jehu, and spoiled the eastern parts of the country beyond Jordan, which belonged to the Reubenites and Gadites, and the half of the tribe of Manasseh, and wholly spoiled the land of Gilead and Bashan, burning and spoiling, and offering violence to all that he laid his hands on; and this without impeachment from Jehu, who made no attempt to defend the country when Hazael was under this distress. But he was a statesman, a contemner of religion, and a despiser of holiness, and of the laws; and died when he had reigned over the Israelites twenty-seven years. He was buried in the city of Samaria, and his son succeeded him in the government.

2. Now Jehoash, king of Jerusalem, had an inclination to repair the temple of God; so he called Jehoiada, and bade him send the Levites and the priests to his order, and they sent a talent and half a shekel of silver for every head, towards the rebuilding and repairing of the temple, which was brought to decay by Jehoram, and Athaliah, and his sons. But the high priest did not do this, as concluding that no one would willingly pay that money; but on the twenty-third year of Jehoash's reign, when the king sent for him and the Levites, and complained that they had not sent the Levites to enjoin them, and still continued to demand them to take care of the temple, but the high priest, he used this stratagem for collecting the money, with which the multitude was pleased. He made a wooden chest, and closed it up fast with locks, and shut up the key; and set it in the temple beside the altar, and desired every one to cast into it, through the hole, what he pleased, for the repair of the temple. This contrivance was acceptable to the people, and they strove one with another, and brought in jointly large quantities of silver and gold: and when the scribe and the priest that were over the treasuries had emptied the chest, and counted the money in the king's presence, they then set it in the temple, and it was castore before the face of the Lord. But when the multitude appeared to have cast in as much as was wanted, the high priest Jehoiada, and king Jehoash, sent to hire masons and carpenters, and to buy large pieces of timber and hewn stone, and all that was necessary for the rebuilding of the temple; and when they had repaired the temple, they made use of the remaining gold and silver, which was not a little, for bowls and basins, and cups, and other vessels, and they went on to make the altar every day fast with sacrifices of great value. And these things were taken suitable care of, as long as Jehoiada lived.

3. But as soon as he was dead, which was when he was old, and the daughter of his wife had come to years, having been a righteous, and in every respect a very good man, he was buried in the king's sepulchre at Jerusalem, (because he had recovered the kingdom to the family of David." king Je-hoah betrayed his [want of] care about God. The principal men of the people were corrupted also together with him, and offended against their duty, and what their constitution determined for their good. He was therefore displeased with the change that was made on the king, and on the rest of the people; and sent prophets to testify to them what their actions were, and to bring them to leave off their wickedness: but the king was so harden, and so affection and so violent an inclination to it, that neither could the examples of those that had of-served afronts to the laws, and had been so severely punished, they and their entire families, sort of examples to the prophets now foretold, bring them to repentance, and turn them back from their course of transgression to their former duty. But the king commanded that Zachariah, the son of the high priest Jehoiada, should be stoned to death in the temple, and forgot the kindnesses he had received from his father; for when God had appointed him to prophesy, he stood in the midst of the multitude and gave his message to them, that if they should act righteously, and foretold to them, that if they would not hearken to his admonitions, they should suffer a heavy punishment;
but as Zachariah was ready to die, he appealed to him in his means that he was the good counsel he had given them, and how he perished after a most severe and violent manner for the good deeds his father had done to Jehosh.

4. Nevertheless, it was not long before the king suffered punishment for his transgression: for when Hazael, king of Syria, made an irruption into his country, and when he had overthrown Gath, and spoiled it, he made an expedition against Jerusalem; and king Jehoah was afraid, and emptied all the treasures of God, and of the king's [before him] and took down the
the gifts that had been dedicated, in the temple, and sent them to the king of Syria, and procured so to his own loss, being taken as a and his kingdom quite endangered, but Hazael was induced by the greatness of the sum of money not to bring his army against Jerusalem: yet Je-hoah, though he did not act as he should, was set upon by his friends, in order to revenge the death of Zachariah the son of Jehoiada. These laid wares for the king, and slew him. He was indeed buried in Jerusalem, but not in the royal sepulchre of
of the prophet, but in the house of the Hebrews. He lived forty-seven years, and Amaziah his son succeeded him in the kingdom.

5. In the one-and-twentieth year of the reign of Jehoah, Jehoahaz, the son of Jehu, took the government of the Israelites in Samaria, and held it seventeen years. He did not [proper] imitate his father, but was guilty of wicked practices as those that first had God in contempt:
but the king of Syria brought him low, and by by means of it obtained possession of his and set his forces, that there remained no more of so great an army than ten thousand armed men, and fifty horsemen. He also took away from him all the great gold and silver of them also,
and all his armory. And these were the things that the people of Israel suffered, according to

*This character of Josiah, the son of Je-chaniah, has the prophecy of Elisha, when he foretold that Hazael should kill his master, and reign over the Syrians and Damascus. But when Jehoahes was under such unavoidable necessities, he had recourse to prayer and supplication to God, and besought him to deliver him out of the hands of Hazael, and not to destroy him, but to deliver him into his hands. Accordingly, God accepted of his repentance instead of virtue, and being desirous rather to admonish those that might repeat, and not to determine a thing about them, but utterly destroyed, he granted him deliverance from fear and dangers. So the country, having obtained peace, returned again to its former condition, and flourished as before.

6. Now, after the death of Jehoahaz, his son Josiah took the kingdom, in the thirty-seventh year of Jehoah, the king of the tribes of Judah.
This Josiah then took the kingdom of Israel in Samaria, for he had the same name with the king of Jerusalem, and he retained the kingdom sixteen years. He was a good man, and in his disposition not at all like his father. Now at this time it was, that when Elisha the prophet, who was already very old, and was now fallen into a disease, the king of Israel came to see him; and when he found him very near death, he began to weep in his sight, and lament, to call him his father, and his weapons, because it was by his means that he had now long and of his newpons against his enemies, and that he overcame his own adversaries by his prophecies, without fighting; and that he was now departing this life, and leaving him to the Syrians, who were already ruined, and had no more weapons under their power: so he said it was not safe for him to live any longer, but that it would be well for him to hasten to his end, and depart out of this life with him. As the king was thus begging of him, he pronounced this word of the king bend a bow that was brought him, and when the king had fitted the bow for shooting, Elisha took hold of his hands and bade him shoot: and when he had shot three arrows, and then left off, Elisha said, "Of the thoir that more arrows, thou badst cut the kingdom of Syria up by the roots, but since thou hast been satisfied with shooting three times only, thou shalt give the Syrins the same measure of righteousness; and in eminent favor with God.
He also performed wonderful and surprising works by prophecy, and such as were gloriously preserved in memory among the Hebrews.
He also obtained a magnificent funeral, such a one indeed as it was fit a person so beloved of God should have. It also happened, that at that time certain robbers cast a dart on a man whom they had slain into Elisha's grave, and upon his dead body coming close to the dead man, it was more than three, that thou mayst recover that country which they cut off from thy kingdom in the reign of thy father." So when the king had heard that, he departed, and a little while after, Elisha died, and a little while after, Syria was overthrown by Elisha the prophet, both such as he did while he was alive, and how he had a divine power should have been such. Then the kingdom

Syria, that kingdom came to Adad his son, copies, and supposes this king to have been then a good man, and no idolater, with whom God's prophets used not to be so familiar. Upon the whole, since it ap-ears, even by Jehoah's own account, that Amaziah the good king of Judah, while he was a good king, was forbidden to make use of the 100,000 auxiliaries he had hired of this same king, when they were then idolaters, by Chron. xxxiv. 6-8, it is most likely that these different characters of Josiah evince the different parts of his life. In the different common copies, he was at first a wicked king, and afterward was reclaimed, and became a good one, as according to Josephus.
with whom Joash king of Israel made war, and when he had beaten him in three battles, he took from him all that country, and all those cities and villages which his father Hazael had taken from the kingdom of Israel, which came to pass, according to the prophecy of Elisha. But when Joash had succeeded to the throne, he was buried in Samaria, and the government devolved on his son Jeroboam.

CHAP. IX.

How Amaanaz made an Expedition against the Edomites and Maalikites, and conquered them; but he was afterward made a prisoner against Ju- ash, he was beaten, and not long after was slain, and Uzziah succeeded in the Government.

1. Now in the second year of the reign of Joash over Israel, Amaanaz reigned over the tribe of Judah at Jerusalem. His mother's name was Jehovahaddan, who was born at Jerusalem. He was exceedingly careful in doing what was right, and this when he was very young; but when he came to the management of affairs, and to the government, he resolved that he ought first of all to make his family as secure as possible, to punish those his friends that had laid violent hands upon him; so he seized upon them all, and put them to death, yet did he execute no severer penalty upon their children, but acted therein according to the law of Moses, who did not think it just to punish children for the sins of their fathers. After this he chose him an army out of the tribe of Judah and Benjamin, of such as were in the flower of their age, and about twenty years old; and when he had collected about three hundred thousand of them together, he set captains of hundreds over them. He also sent to the king of Israel, and hired a hundred thousand soldiers for a hundred talents of silver, for he had resolved to make an expedition against the nations of the Amalekites, and Edomites, and Gebalites: but as he was preparing for his expedition, and ready to go out to the war, a prophet said unto him, the king of the Amalekites, of the Israelites, because they were bad beasts, and because God foretold that he should be beaten, if he made use of them as auxiliaries; but that he should overcome his enemies, though he had rotten olives, when it so pleased God. And when the king grudged at his having already paid the hire of the Israelites, the prophet exhorted him to do what God would have him, because thereby he should obtain much wealth from God. So he dismissed them, and said, that he still freely gave them their pay, and went himself with his own army, and made war with the nations before mentioned; and when he had beaten them, he brought the spoils of ten thousand talents, and took as many prisoners alive, whom he brought to the great rock which is in Arabia, and threw them down from it headlong. He also brought away a great deal of prey, and vast riches, from those nations. So the prophet sent to him and said, that “he wondered how he could esteem these to be gods, who had been of no advantage to their own people, who paid them honors; nor had delivered them from his hand, but had beaten them and the beasts, third of the ten thousand, and had suffered themselves to be carried captive for that they had been carried to Jerusalem, in the same manner as any one might have taken some of the enemy alive, and led them thither.” This reproach provoked the king to anger, and he commanded the prophet to hold his peace, and threatened to punish him if he persisted in his conduct. So he replied, “That he should indeed hold his peace; but foretold, that God would not overlook his attempts for innovation. But Amaanaz was not able to contain himself, his prosperity would be a prodigy, and he had given him, although he had affronted God thereupon; but in a vein of insolence he wrote to Joash, the king of Israel, and “commanded” that he and all his people should be observed as those who had so cruelly been obedient to his persecutors, David and Solomon; and he let him know, that if he would not be so wise as to do what he commanded him, he must fight for his dominion. To which Joash sent this answer in writing: “King Joash to king Amaanaz. There was a vasty tall cypress-tree in mount Lebanon, as also a thistle; this thistle sent to the cypress-tree, to give the cypress tree a rod, and a reed. But the cypress-tree said to the thistle, though it be so: but as the thistle was saying this, there came a wild beast and trod down the thistle; and this may be a lesson to thee not to be so ambitious, and to do a care, lest upon thy good success in the fight against the Amalekites, thou mayest prove so proud as to bring dangers upon thyself and upon thy kingdom.”

2. When Amaanaz had read this letter, he was moved to the depths of sorrow: for this expedition was by the impulse of God, that he might be punished for his offence against him. But as soon as he led out his army against Joash, and they were going to join battle with him, there came a great rain; and the army of Amaanaz, as God, when he is displeased, sends upon men, and discomfits them, even before they came to a close fight. Now it happened, that as they were scattered about by the torrent of rain which came, he left alone, and was taken prisoner by the enemy; whereupon Joash threatened to kill him, unless he would persuade the people of Jerusalem to open their gates to him, and receive him and his army into the city. Accordingly, Amaanaz was so distressed, and in such fear of his life, that he made his enemy to receive him into the city. So Joash overthrew a part of the wall, of 10. Then he led the king of the Amalekites into the city in a chariot through the breach into Jerusalem, and led Amaanaz captive along with him: by which means he became master of Jerusalem, and took away the treasures of God, and carried off all the gold and silver that was in the king's palace: and then freed the king from captivity, and returned to Samaria. Now these things happened to the people of Jerusalem in the fourteenth year of the reign of Amaanaz, who after this had a life made against him by his friends, and fled to the city of Lachish, and was there slain by the conspirators, who sent men thither to kill him. So they took up his dead body, and put it in the midst of the palace, and thus exemplify the word of the prophet for him. This was the end of the life of Amaanaz, because of his innovations in religion, and his contempt of God, when he had lived fifty-four years, and had reigned twenty-nine. He was succeeded by his son, whose name was Uzziah.

Concerning Jeroboam, King of Israel, and Joash the Prophet: and how, after the Death of Jeroboam, his Son Zachariah took the Government. How Uzziah, King of Jerusalem, subdued the Nations that were round about him: and what befell him when he attempted to offer Incense to God.

Israel and Samaria forty years. The king was guilty of contumacy against God, and became very wicked in worshipping idols, and in many unrighteous things; and that he was openly abandoned and foreign. He was also the cause of ten thousand private men and families to be dispossessed and to go to the people of Israel. Now one Jonah, a prophet, foretold to him, that he should make war with the Syrians, and conquer their army, and reduce their king to the state of a subject, and divide the countries of the Canaanites, parts, to the city Hamath, and on the southern, to the lake Asphaltitis, for the bounds of the Canaanites originally were these, as Joshua their general had determined them. So Jeroboam made war against the citizen of Jerusalem, and was vanquished by the Jerusalem army, terrorized by the presence of the Ark, and driven away from the country, as Jonah had foretold.

2. Now I cannot but think it necessary for me, who have promised to give an accurate account of our affairs, to describe the actions of this prophet, so far as I have found them written down in the Hebrew books. Jonah had been commanded by God to go to the kingdom of Nineveh; and when he was there, to publish in that city, how it should lose the dominion of the nations. But he went not, out of fear; nay, he ran away from God to the city of Joppa, and sailing a ship there, he went into it, and sailed to Tarshish, in Cilicia; and upon the rise of a most terrible storm, which he built and repaired, was afraid, and was in danger of sinking, the mariner, the master, and the pilot himself, made prayers and vows, and in case they escaped the sea; but Jonah lay still and covered [in the ship], without imitating anything that they did, and his father Amos prayed and besought the Lord to save him into the city. Moreover, he built a great many towers, of one hundred and fifty cubits high, and built walled towns in desert places and put garrisons into them, and dug many channels for conveyance of water. He had also beasts for labor, and an immense number of cattle; for his country was fit for pasturage. He was also given to husbandry, and took care to cultivate the land, and planted it with all sorts of plants, and sowed it with all sorts of seeds. He had also about him an army composed of chosen men, in number three hundred and seventy thousand, who were governed by general officers and captains of thousands, who were men of valor and of unconquerable strength, in number two thousand. He also divided his whole army into bands, and armed them, giving every one a sword, with brazen bucklers and bronze helmets. And besides these, he made for them many engines of war, for besieging of cities, such as cast stones and darts, with grapples, and other instruments of war.

3. When Jeroboam the king had passed his life in great happiness, and had ruled forty years, he died, and was buried in Samaria, and his son reigned. As Zeculiah took the kingdom, in a manner did Uzziah, the son of Amaziah begin to reign over the two tribes in Jerusalem, in the fourteenth year of the reign of Jeroboam. He was born of Jecoliah, his mother, who was a virgin, and was seven years old when he began to reign, and lived fifty and two years, and reigned two and twenty years. He was a righteous and magnanimous, and laborious in taking care of the affairs of his kingdom. He made an expedition also against the Philistines, and overcame him in battle, and took the cities of Gath and Jabesh, and brake down their walls; after which expedition, he assaulted those Arabs that adhered to Egypt. He also built a city upon the Red Sea, and put a garrison into it. He also overthrew the Ammonites, and appointed that they should pay tribute. He also overcame all the countries as far as the bounds of Egypt, and then began to take care of Jerusalem itself for the rest of his life, for he reigned five and twenty years, and all this time which had either fallen down by length of time, or by the carelessness of the kings his predecessors, as well as all that part which had been thrown down by the king of Israel, when he took and burnt the city, had all been restored. When he came to the city, he gathered all the people together, and planted it with all kinds of plants, and sowed it with all kinds of seeds. He had also about him an army composed of chosen men, in number three hundred and seventy thousand, who were governed by general officers and captains of thousands, who were men of valor and of unconquerable strength, in number two thousand. He also divided his whole army into bands, and armed them, giving every one a sword, with brazen bucklers and bronze helmets. And besides these, he made for them many engines of war, for besieging of cities, such as cast stones and darts, with grapples, and other instruments of war.

4. While Uzziah was in this state, and making preparation [for futurity, he was corrupted in his mind by pride, and became insolent, and this an account of that abundance which he had of things that will soon perish, and despised that power which is of eternal duration, which carried the strength of current, upon a storm, as far as Jonah. He took counsel in the Euxine Sea, and sent vessels thither, and as far as the storm might have driven the ship, while Jonah was in it, near to that Euxine Sea, and since in three more days, while he was in the depth of water, might bring him to the Assyrian coast, and since within that coast could bring him nearer to Nineveh than could any coast of the Mediterranean, it is by no means an improbable determination in Josephus.

1 This ancient piece of religion, of supposing there was great sin where there was great misery, and of using such lamentations, as reasons for a change of things, is common in the Saracens, but among these heathen mariners, seems a remarkable remains of the ancient tradition which prevailed of old, and still more, that Providence was used to interpose visibly in all human affairs, and never to bring, or at least not long to continue, notorious judgments but for necessary reasons. But this book of Job shows to have been the state of mankind for about the former 3000 years of the world, till the days of Job and Moses.
he went thence, and came to the city Tiph a; but the citizens that were in it shut their gates and barred them. He would not admit him; but in order to be avenged on them, he burned the country round about it, and took the city by force, upon a siege; and being very much displeased at what the inhabitants of Tiphah had done, he spared not them all, and spared not so much as the infants, without omitting the utmost instances of cruelty and barbarity; for he used such severity upon his own countrymen, as would not be pardonable with regard to strangers.

The reason for this was, because this monarch was not able to get a sufficient number of men to execute all his designs; and his exclaimed that he was not able to furnish them with his own forces, as he had done in the war with Syria, and was threatened to kill them, unless they would hold their peace. In the mean time, a great earthquake shook the ground, and a rent was made in the temple, and the bright rays of the son shine through it, and fell upon the king's face, insomuch that the leprosy arose upon him immediately. And before the cit, at a place called Elegh, half the inhabitants were killed by the rent, and rain fell from the sky, and selfish four furlings, and stood still at the east, mountain, till the roads, as well as the king's gardens, were spoiled by the obstruction. Now, the king saw that the leprosy was infected with the leprosy, they told him of the calamity he was under, and commanded that he should go out of the city as a polluted person. Hereupon he was so constrained at the and dismayed, and sensible that he was not at liberty nor contract, that he did as he was commanded, and underwent this miserable and terrible punish-... to another, stand, stand still, seize their gold and silver, for there shall be no one to wish them well, and the very earth will withal strike them dead and maim them; for a terrible contention shall possess them one with another, and lamentation, and loosing of the members, and their countenance will be perfectly black with fear, and then they shall be the dead of the living, the slaying of the young lions. God says to thee, Nivereth, that they shall deface thee, and the lion shall no longer go out from thee to give laws to the world. And the prophet prophesied many other things besides these concerning Nivereth, which I do not think necessary to repeat; and I have omitted them, that I may not appear troublesome to my readers; all which things happened about nineteen hundred and fifteen years afterwards; so this may suffice to have spoken of these matters.

CHAP. XII.

1. Now Jotham died when he had lived forty years, and was buried in the sepulchres of the kings: and the kingdom came to his son Ahaz, who proved most impious towards God, and a transgressor of the laws of his country. He imitated the kings of the Gentiles, and planted the people of Damascus in Jerusalem, and offered sacrifices upon to idols; to which also he offered his own son as a burnt-offering, according to the practices of the Canaanites. His other actions were also of the same nature, and he took the king of Syria, and the king of Damascus, and Pekah the king of Israel, who were now at animity with one another, made war with him: and when they had driven him into Jerusalem, they besieged that city a long while, making but small progress, on account of the strength of its walls; and when the king of Syria had taken the city Eleaph, upon the Red Sea, and had slain the inhabitants of that city, and had slain those in the [other] garrisons, and the Jews in their neighborhood, and had driven away much prey, he returned with his army back to Damascus. Now when the king of Jer- usalem had taken Eleaph, and was bereft of his enemies, he, supposing himself a match for the king of Israel, drew out his army against him, and, joining battle with him, was beaten: and this happened because God was angry with him on account of his many and great enormities. Accordingly, there were slain by the Israelites one hundred and twenty thousand of his men that day, whose general, Amaziah by name, slew Zechariah the king's son in his presence, and he also slew Amaziah, the general of the troops of the tribe of Judah, into captivity. They also carried away the women and children of the tribe of Benjamin captives; and when they had gotten a great deal of prey, they returned to Samaria.

2. Now there was one Obed, who was a prophet at that time in Samaria: he met the army before they went into Jerusalem, and said to them, "That they had gotten the victory, not by their own strength, but by reason of the anger God had against king Ahaz. And he complained, that they were not satisfied with the good success they had against him, but were so bold as

CHAP. XIII.

1. About the same time, Pekah, the king of Israel, died, by the treachery of a friend of his, whose name was Hoshea, who retained the kingdom nine years' time, but was a wicked man and a despiser of the divine worship. And Shalma- neser, the king of Assyria, made an expedition particularly set down, and compared together, In the Es- say on the Old Testament, page 187.
against him, and overruled him, (which meant here, because he had not God favorably or assistingly to him,) and brought him to submission, and ordered him to pay an appointed tribute. Now in the fourth year of the reign of Heshoa, Heshieux, the son of Aba, began to reign in Jerusalem, and he had three thousand other cattle; and the priests performed all things according to the law. Now the king was so pleased herewith, that he feasted with the people, and returned thanks to God. For the feast of unleavened bread was now come, when they had offered that sacrifice which is called the Passover, they after that offered other sacrifices for seven days. When the king had bestowed on the multitude, besides what was spent in sacrifices, twelve thousand cards, and seven thousand other cattle, the same thing was done by the rulers; for they gave them twelve thousand bulls, and a thousand and forty other cattle, besides the daily burnt offerings, as was observed from the days of king Solomon, as it was now first observed with great splendor and magnificence: and when the festival was ended, they went out into the country, and purged it, and returned, and offered sacrifices. The king also gave order that the daily sacrifices should be offered, at his own charges, and according to the law; and appointed that the tithes and the first-fruits should be given by the multitude to the priests and Levites, and that they should constantly attend on divine service, and never be taken off from the worship of God. Accordingly, the multitude brought together all sorts of their fruits to the priests and the Levites. The king also made gardens and vinyards, where these fruits, and distributed them to every one of the priests and Levites, and to their children and wives. And thus did they return to their old ordinance of worship. Now when the king had settled the multitude, and had already described, he made war upon the Philistines, and beat them, and possessed himself of all the enemies' cities from Gaza to Gath; but the king's heart was exalted, and he was not very constant in worship. And all the sacrifices and burnt-offerings, and all the other services, were overthrown by the king, and he was judged The king also informed the priests and Levites, and all the people, and offered for himself seven bulls, and as many rams, with seven lambs, and as many kids of the goats. The king also himself,

*This siege of Samaria, though not given a particular account of, either in our Hebrew and Greek Bibbes, or in Josephus, was so very long, no less than three years; so that, in the year that the parents, and particularly mothers, might therein be reduced to eat their own child, even the law of Moses had threatened, and the rulers, laid their hands on the heads of the sacrifices, and permitted the priests to complete the sacred offices about them. So they both slew the sacrifices, and burned the burnt-offerings, while the Levites stood round about them with their musical instruments, and the king and the multitude, the king and the multitude threw themselves down upon their face, and worshipped God. He also sacrificed seventy bulls, one hundred rams, and two hundred lambs. He also granted the multi-marched by force in the ninth year of the reign of Hoshah, and in the seventh year of King Kessah, king of Jerusalem, and quite demolished the government of the Israelites, and transplanted all the people into Medea and Persia, among whom he took King Hoshah alive and when he had removed these people out of this their land, he transplanted other nations out of Cuthah, a place so called, (for there is [still] a river of that name in Persia,) into Samaria, and into the country of Tyre. Nevertheless, these Israelites were removed out of Judas nine hundred and forty-seven years after their forefathers were come out of the land of Egypt, and possessed themselves of this country but eight hundred years after Joshua had been their leader, and, as I have already observed, two hundred and forty years, seven months, and seven days, after they had revolted from Rehoboam, the grandson of David, and had given the kingdom to Jeroboam. And such a conclusion overtook the Israelites, when they had transgressed the laws, and would not hearken to the prophets, who foretold that this calamity would come upon them, if they would not leave off their evil doings. For such was the case that sedition which they had raised against Rehoboam, the grandson of David, when they set up Jeroboam, his servant, to be their king, who, by slaying against God, and against their ministers, and against the priests, and against the king, endeavored to drive them out of the land. And when they found no cure for their miseries, they learned by the oracle that they ought to worship Almighty God, as the method for their deliverance. So they sent ambassadors to Jerusalem, to the king, and desired him to send them some of the priests of the Israelites whom he had taken captive. And when he thereupon sent them, the people were by them taught the law, and the holy worship of God, they worshiped him in a respectful manner, and the plague ceased immediately; and indeed they continue to make use of the very same customs to this very time, and are called in the Hebrew tongue Cuthites, but the people of this name were in the ancient Greek language, given us the following history: "One whose name was Eliezer, reigned thirty-six years: this king, upon the revolt of the Cuthites, sailed to them, and reduced them against submis- sion. Against that city, which is the king of Assyria sent an army, and in a hostile manner he overran all Phoenicia, but soon made peace with them all, and returned back: but Sidon and Ace, and Puteis and others, revolted; and many other cities there were which desired to be subject to the king of Assyria. Accordingly, when the Tyrians would not submit to him, the king returned, and fell upon them again, while the Phoenicians had furnished him with three-score ships, and eight hundred men to row them; and when the Ty- rians had come upon them in twelve ships, and the enemies' ships were dispersed, they took five hundred men prisoners, and the reputation of all the cities of Tyre was thereby increased; but the king of Assyria returned, and placed his army at the river and aqueducts, who should hinder the Tyrians from drawing water. This continued for five years, and still the Tyrians bore the siege; and thus they were starved, when they besought them to save them from their distress; and it is said that they were taken prisoners, when they were about to go away. And thus is what is written in the Tyrian archives concerning Salamon's the king of Assyria.

3. But now the Cuthites, who were removed into Samaria, (for that is the same name they have been called by to this time, because they were brought out of the country called Cuthah, which is a country of Persia, and there is a river of the same name in it,) each of them, according to their se- diens, which were in number five, brought their own gods into Samaria, and by worshipping them, as was the custom of their own countries, they provoked Almighty God to be angry and displeased at them; for a plague seized upon them, by which they were consumed. And when they found no cure for their miseries, they learned by the oracle that they ought to worship Almighty God, as the method for their deliverance. So they sent ambassadors to Jerusalem, and desired him to send them some of the priests of the Israelites whom he had taken captive. And when he thereupon sent them, the people were by them taught the law, and the holy worship of God, they worshiped him in a respectful manner, and the plague ceased immediately; and indeed they continue to make use of the very same customs to this very time, and are called in the Hebrew tongue Cuthites, but the people of this name were in the ancient Greek language, given us the following history: "One whose name was Eliezer, reigned thirty-six years: this king, upon the revolt of the Cuthites, sailed to them, and reduced them against submis- sion. Against that city, which is the king of Assyria sent an army, and in a hostile manner he overran all Phoenicia, but soon made peace with them all, and returned back: but Sidon and Ace, and Puteis and others, revolted; and many other cities there were which desired to be subject to the king of Assyria. Accordingly, when the Tyrians would not submit to him, the king returned, and fell upon them again, while the Phoenicians had furnished him with three-score ships, and eight hundred men to row them; and when the Ty- rians had come upon them in twelve ships, and the enemies' ships were dispersed, they took five hundred men prisoners, and the reputation of all the cities of Tyre was thereby increased; but the king of Assyria returned, and placed his army at the river and aqueducts, who should hinder the Tyrians from drawing water. This continued for five years, and still the Tyrians bore the siege; and thus they were starved, when they besought them to save them from their distress; and it is said that they were taken prisoners, when they were about to go away. And thus is what is written in the Tyrian archives concerning Salamon's the king of Assyria.

BOOK X.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-TWO YEARS AND A HALF FROM THE CAPTIVITY OF THE TEN TRIBES TO THE FIRST OF CYRUS.

CHAP. I.

How Sennacherib made an Expedition against Israel; what Threatenings Rabshakeh made to them; which Sennacherib, having failed of Success in Egypt, returned thence to Jeru- salem; and how, upon his finding his Army destroyed, he returned home; and what befell him a little afterward.

1. It was now the fourteenth year of the reign of Hoshah, king of the two tribes, when the king of Assyria, whose name was Sennacherib, made an expedition against him with a great army, and took all the cities of the tribe of Judah and Benjamin by force; and when he was ready to bring his army against Jerusalem, Hoshah sent ambassadors to him beforehand, and promised to submit, and pay what tribute he should appoint. Hereupon Sennacherib, when he heard of what offers the ambassadors made, resolved not to proceed in the war, but to accept of the proposals that were made him; and if he might receive three hundred talents of silver, and thirty talents of gold, he promised that he would depart in a friendly manner; and he gave a signal with security upon him, that his ambassadors should return home; and when they returned home, he would then do him no harm, but go away as he came. So Hoshah submitted, and emptied his treasures, and sent the money, as supposing he should be freed from his enemy, and from any further distress from the king of Egypt. And the Assyrian king took it, and yet had no re- gard to what he had promised; but while he himself went to the war against the Egyptians and Ethiopiaans, and to take his share of their spoil, and the two other commanders, with great forces, to destroy Jerusalem. The names of the two other commanders were Tartaen and Rabaria.
same hour in which the king came to him, they should have great plenty of food, and that two sheals of barley should be sold in the market for a shekel, and a seash of fine flour should be sold for a shilling. They proved the same, and those that were present, very joyful, for they did not scruple believing what the prophet said, on account of the experience they had of the truth of his former predictions; and the expectation they had of what they were to hear in that day, with the oneness in which accompanied it, appeared a light thing to them; but the captain of the third band, who was a friend of the king, and on whose hand the king leaned, said, 'Thou talkest jestingly.' Of barley, or five sheals, it is impossible for God to pour down torrents of barley, or fine flour, out of heaven, so it is impossible that what thou sayest should come to pass.

To which the prophet made this reply, 'Thou shalt not see these things happen; thou shalt not be in the least a partaker of them.'

6. Now what Elisha had thus foretold, came to pass in the manner following: there was a law at Samaria; wherein there were four men, whose bodies were not cleansed from it, should abide without the city, and there were four men that on this account abode before the gates, while nobody gave them any food, by reason of the great famine; and they were prohibited from entering into the city by the law, and they considered that if they were permitted to enter, they should miserably perish by the famine; as also, that if they said where they were, they would be scourged in the same manner. Therefore they resolved to deliver themselves up to the enemy, that in case they should spare them, they should live, but if they should be killed, that would be an easy death. So when they had communicated this to the captain of a band of horse, they came by night to the enemy's camp. Now God had begun to afflict and disturb the Syrians, and to bring the noise of chariots and armor to their ears, and an army were coming upon them, and had made them fear that it was coming nearer and nearer to them. In short, they were in such a dread of this army, that they left their tents, and ran together to Benhadad, the captain of one of the bands of horse, and had hired for auxiliaries, both the king of Egypt and the king of the islands, and led them against them, for they heard the noise of them as they were coming. And Benhadad believed what they said, and made ready the horses and chariots (as well as it did to theirs), so they fell into a mighty disorder and tumult, and left their horses and beasts in their camp, with immense riches also, and betook themselves to flight. And those lepers who had departed from Samaria, and were gone to the camp of the Syrians, of whom we made mention a little before, when they were in the camp, saw nothing but great quietness and silence; accordingly they entered into it, and went hastily into the tents, and when they saw nobody there, they ate and drank, and carried garments and a great quantity of gold, and hid it out of the camp; after which they made another track and carried off what was in it, as they did at the former, and this they did for several times, without the least interruption from any body. So they gathered thereby that the enemies were departed, whereupon they declared that they did not inform Joram and the citizens of it. So they came to the walls of Samaria, and called aloud to the watchmen, and told them in what state the enemies were, as did these tell the king's guards, by whose means Joram came to know of it; who then sent for his friends, and the captains of his host, and said to them, that 'This law of the Jews, for the exclusion of lepers out of the camp in the wilderness, and out of cities in Judea, is as well known one, Lev. xiv. 8: 41: and Num. v. 1—4. suspected that this departure of the king of Syria was by way of ambush and treachery, and that out of despair of ruining you by famine, when you imagine them to be fled away, you may come upon them, and they shall be caught, and may then fall upon you on a sudden, and may both kill you, and take the city without fighting; this is that I shew you to guard the city carefully, and by no means to go out of it, or otherwise they should be caught, and there were really gone away.' And when a certain person said, that 'he did very well and wisely to admit such a suspicion, but that he still advised him to send a couple of horsemen to search for them,' the king answered, 'Oh! for as much as if they were seized by an ambush of the enemy, they might be a security to your army, that they may not go out as if they suspected nothing, nor undergo the like misfortunes: and, (said he,) received no benefit be numbered for as he that have died by the famine, supposing they be caught and destroyed by the enemy.' So the king was pleased with this opinion, and sent such an one, and orders to be given, and their journey over a road that was without any enemies, but found it full of provisions, and of weapons, that they had therefore thrown away, and left behind them, in order to their being lighted up and in the camp; and when these horsemen had boarded this, he sent out the multitude to take the spoils of the camp; which gains of theirs were not of things of small value, but they took a great quantity of gold, and a great quantity of silver, and the kind of vessels also in the same manner, and seized themselves of (so many) ten thousand measures of wheat and barley, as they never in the least dreamed of; and were not only freed from their former miseries, but had such plenty, that they resolved not to sell the silver, or shekel, and a seash of fine flour for a shekel, according to the prophecy of Elisha. Now a shekel is equal to an Italian modius and a half. The captain of the third band was the only man that was appointed by the king to oversee the gate, that he might prevent too great a crowd of the multitude, that they might not endanger one another; and he, being one of the chief among the press, he suffered himself in that very way, and died in that very manner, as Elisha had foretold such his death, when he alone of them all disbelieved what he said concerning that plenty of provision for Syria.
strayed. So the king was in great dread, and a terrible agony at this calamity; and being in great fear for his whole army, he fled with the rest of his forces to his own kingdom, and to his city Nineveh; and when he had abode there a little while, he was told that Ishah had died by the hands of his elder sons. Adrammelech and Sharezer, and was slain in his own temple, which was called Arasek. Now these sons of his were driven away, on account of the murder of their father; their mothers went into Armenia, while Assarachodias, took the kingdom of Sennacherib. And this proved to be the conclusion of this Assyrian expedition against the people of Jerusalem.

CHAP. II.

Now Hezekiah was sick and ready to die; and how God bestowed upon him fifteen years longer life, [and secured that Promise, by the going back of the Shadow ten Degrees.

1. Now king Hezekiah being thus delivered, after a surprising manner, from the dread he had so long been under, he desired of God to show him the reason of this unexpected deliverance, and answer why he had so preserved his people, because nothing else had destroyed some of their enemies, and made the rest so fearful of undergoing the same fate, that they departed from Jerusalem, but that now they should assist the king. *In the vastness of hiscleanness and diligence about the worship of God, did he so soon afterward fall into a severe distemper, insomuch that the physicians despairs of him, and expected to go through with this distemper in a short space of time. For his friends; and besides the distemper itself, there was a very melancholy circumstance that disordered the king, which was the consideration that he was childless, and was going to die, and leave his state and kingdom without a successor of his own body; so he was troubled at the thoughts of this his condition, and lamented himself, and entreated of God that he would prolong his life for a little while, till he had some children, and not suffer him to depart this life before he had become a father. Henceupon God had mercy upon him, and accepted of his supplication, because the trouble he was under at his supposed death was not because he was soon to leave the advantages he enjoyed in the kingdom; nor did he on that account pray that he might have a longer life afforded him, but in order to have sons, that might receive the government after his death; for the prophet is only a preacher, and commanded him to inform Hezekiah, that "Within three days' time he should get clear of his distemper, and should survive it fifteen years, and that he should have children also." Now, upon the prophet's saying this, as God had commanded him, he could hardly believe it, both on account of the distemper he was under, which was very sore, and by reason of the surprising nature of what was told him, so he desired that Isaiah would give him some sign or token, that he was prevailed upon by God, and had said, and be sensible that he came from God: for things that are beyond expectation, and greater than our hopes, are made credible by actions of like nature. And when Isaiah had asked him what sign he desired to be shewed him, he desired that he should make the shadow of the sun, which he had already made to go down ten steps [or degrees] in his house, to return again to the House to which it was before. And when the prophet prayed to God to exhibit this sign to the king, he saw what he desired to see, and was freed from his distemper, and went up to the temple, where he worshipped God, and made vows to him.

2. At this time it was that the dominion of the Assyrians was overthrown by the Medes; but of these things I shall treat elsewhere. But the king of Babylon, whose name was Belasdan, sent ambassadors unto Hezekiah, which desired nothing else but what he desired; he said, that he had heard that he was sick, and would like to see him. To which he replied, that "they came from Babylon, from the king; and that he had showed them all he had, that by the sight of his riches and forces they might thereby guess at [the plenty he was in,] and be able to judge of his riches. Therefore they went to see the king; and when they came, the king and his officers, and all the inhabitants of the city, went out to meet them, and had a large audience with them; and when they had returned, the king said to the prophet, "Know thou, that after a little while, these riches of thine shall be carried away to Babylon, and thy posterity shall be made uncums there, and lose their manhood, and be servants to the king of Babylon, for that God foretold such things would come to pass." Upon which words Hezekiah was troubled, and said, that "he was himself unwilling that his nation should fall into such calamities; yet since it is not possible to alter what God had determined, he prayed that there might be peace while he lived." Beroseus also makes mention of this Belasdan king of Babylon. Now as to this prophet, he is known as Ezechiel, of all, a divine and wonderful man in speaking truth; and out of the assurance that he had never written what was false, he wrote down all his prophecies, and left them behind him in books, his accomplishment might be judged of, were not apparent only, and performed by an aerial phosporus, which imitated the sun's motion backward, while a cloud hid the real sun, cannot be determined. Philosophers and astronomers will naturally incline to the latter hypothesis. However, it of his, he notes that Josephus seems to have understood it otherwise than we generally do, that the shadow was accelerated as much as at first forward, was now reversed, and moved backward, and so the day was neither longer nor shorter than usual, which, it must be confessed, agrees best of all to astronomy, and was observed at the same time of the day as if this miracle had never happened. After all, this wonderful signal was not, it seems, peculiar to Judea, but either seen, or at least foreseen, at Babylon also, after the passage of the world by 3 Chron. xxi. 31, where we learn that the Babylonian ambassadors were sent to Hezekiah, among other things, to inquire whether the shadow had been reversed. This expression of Josephus, that the Medes, upon this destruction of the Assyrian empire, overthrow the Assyrian empire, and took Babylon, is immediately cast off the Assyrian yoke, and set up Dar" but the wound was not mortal: so he returned to have his wound healed in Jezreel, but left his whole army in Ramoth, and Jehu the son of Nimshi for their general, for he had already taken the city by force; and he proposed, after he was healed, to make war with both armies; but Elisa the prophet sent one of his disciples to Ramoth, and gave him holy oil to anoint Jehu, and to tell him that God had chosen him to be their king: He also sent him to say other things to him, because they had taken their journeys so hastily, if he died, that when he came away he might escape the knowledge of all men. So when he was come to the city, he found Jehu sitting in the midst of the captains of the army, as Elisa had foretold, and he came up to him, and said, and that he desired to speak with him about certain matters; and when he was arisen, and had followed him into an inward chamber, the young man took the vessel, and poured it on his head, and said, that "God ordained him to be king, in order to destroy the house of Ahab, and that he might revenge the blood of the prophets, that were unjustly slain by Jezebel; the house might perish, as those of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, and of Baasha, had perished for their wickedness, and no seed might remain of Ahab's family." So when he had said this, he went away hastily out of the city, and endeavored not to be seen by any of the army.

2. But Jehu came out, and went to the place where he before sat with the captains: and when they asked him, and desired him to tell them, what he would do, he said, that this young man came to him; and added withal that he was mad: he replied, "You guess right, for the words he spake were the words of a madman." and when they were eager about the matter, and desired him, he would tell them, he answered, that God had said, "he had chosen him to be king over the multitude." When he had said this, every one of them put off his garment, and stretched it under him, and blew with trumpets, and gave notice that Jehu was king. So when he had gotten the army together, he was preparing to set out immediately against Joram, at the city of Jezreel, in which city, as we said before, he was healing of his wounds, which he had received in the siege of Ramoth. It happened also that Ahabiah, king of Jerusalem, was now come to Joram, for he was his sister's son, as we have said already, to seek for her, as was said before, and this upon account of their kindness; but Jehu, who was sent to Joram, was rash enough, to tell Joram what had happened, for that this would be an evident demonstration of their kindness to him, and would show that their real inclinations were to make him king.

3. So they were pleased with what he did, and guided the roads, lest somebody should privately tell the thing to those that were at Jezreel. Now Jehu took his choice horsemen, and sat upon his chariot, and went on for Jareel; and when he was come near, the watchman whom Joram had sent to bring up a party of chariots, in the city, saw Jehu marching on, and told Joram that he saw a troop of horsemen marching on. Upon which he immediately gave orders, that one of his horsemen should be sent out to meet them, and to know who it was that was coming. So when the horseman came up to Jehu, he asked him, in what condition the army was? for that the king wanted to know it; but Jehu bade him not at all to meddle with such matters, but to follow him. When the watchman saw this, he told Joram that the horseman had mingled himself among the company, and came along with them. And when the king had sent a second messenger, Jehu commanded him to do as the former did; as soon as the watchman told this also to Joram, he at last got upon his chariot himself, together with Ahabiah, the king of Jerusalem; for Joram was uncertain of the case. Joram did, after he had been wounded, as being his relation. So he went out to meet Jehu, who marched slowly, and in good order; and when Joram met him in the field of Naboth, he asked him if he was the king. Jehu was a little profane, and reproached him bitterly, and ventured to call his mother a witch, and a harlot. Upon this the king, fearing what he intended, and suspecting he had no good meaning, turned his chariot, as soon as he could, and said to Ahabiah, "We are fought against by deceit and treachery!" but Jehu drew his bow, and smote him, the arrow going through his heart; so Joram fell down dead. And Joram's horse ran away, and was carried on to Beth-granat, where Jehu also gave orders to Bidkar, the captain of the third part of his army, to cast the dead body of Joram into the field of Naboth, putting him in mind of the prophecy which Elijah prophesied of him, and then, when he had dead him, that both he and his family should perish in that place, for that as they set behind Ahab's chariot, they heard the prophet say so, and that it was now come to pass according to his prophecy. Upon the fall of Joram, Ahabiah was afraid for his own life, and turned his chariot into another road, supposing he should not be seen by Jehu; but he followed after him, and overtook him at Beth-granat, where he had caused Ahabiah to be killed, so he left his chariot, and got upon his horse, and fled from Jehu to Megiddo, and though he was under cure, in a little time he died of that wound, and was carried to Jerusalem, and buried there, after he had reigned one year, and had proved a wicked man, and worse than his father.

4. Now when Jehu was come to Jezreel, Jesebel adorned herself, and stood upon a tower, and she said to her servants, "Who is the man? and shall I tell my lord his servant?" But she said, "Go in, and inquire;" and when he looked up to her, he asked who she was, and commanded her to come down to him. At first he ordered the eunuchs to throw her down from the tower, and being thrown down, she was broken upon the stones, and was trodden upon by the horses, and so died. When this was done, Jehu came to the palace with his friends, and took some refreshment after his journey, both with other things, and by eating a meal. He also bade his servants to take up Jesebel and bury her, because of the nobility of her blood, for she was descended from kings; but those that were appointed to bury her found nothing else remaining but the extreme parts of her body, for all the rest were eaten by dogs. When Jehu heard this, he admired the prophecy of Elijah, for he foretold that she should perish in this manner at Jezreel. And this happened to Jesebel, the haughty woman of Samaria. So Jehu sent two epistles the one to them that brought up the children, the other to the rulers of Samaria, which said that they should set up the most valiant of Ahab's sons for their king, and the strongest part of his host, the chariots, and horses, and armor, and a great army, and fenced cities, and that by so doing they might marched slowly, and in good order. Nor can it be denied that since there was interval enough for king Joram to send out two horsemen, one after another, to Jehu, and to return home, as it were, two or three times, and all this after he was come within sight of the watchman, and before he was come to Jezreel, the probability is greatly on the side of Josephus's copy or interpretation.

was overflowed, he should cast caps, and diadems, and vials for administration [in the temple,] and besides, that they should bring all the gold and silver which was among the treasures, and expend that also in making cups and like vessels. But as the high priest was bringing out the gold, he lit upon the holy books of Moses that were laid up in the temple; and when he had brought them out, he gave them to Shaphan, the scribe, who, when he had read them came to Joash, and told him, and he had said to Shaphan, the prophet, and to the wife of Shallum, (which Shallum was a man of dignity, and of an eminent family,) and had sent them to Huldah, the prophetess, the wife of Shallum, which Shallum was a man of dignity, and of an eminent family, and of a family of the priests, and of the fathers of the men she had heard, and he had said to her, 'What shall I do to this gold and silver which Joash hath brought forth?' and she had said to him, 'He shall appease God, and endeavor to render him propitious to them, for that there was cause of fear, lest, upon the transgression of the laws of Moses by their forefathers, they should suffer punishment, or be cast out of their own country; lest they should be in want of all things, and so end their days miserably.' When the prophetesses had heard this from the messengers that were sent to her, she had called the king, and said, that 'God had already given sentence against them, to destroy the people, and cast them out of their country, and deprive them of all the food they had enjoyed, which sentence none could set aside by the word of their own; for since it was based on account of their transgressions of the laws of Moses, and of their not having repeated in so long a time, while the prophets had said it was their duty, they should be exposed to the punishment that would ensue on their impious practices; which threatening God would certainly execute upon them, that they might be persuaded that he is God, and had not deceived him. But yet to the end that the word held not out to his prophets: that yet, because Joash was a righteous man, he would at present delay those calamities; but that, after his death, he would send on the multitude what miseries he had determined to execute upon them.

3. So these messengers, upon this prophecy of the woman, came and told it to the king; whereasupon he sent to the people everywhere, and ordered that the priests and the Levites should come together at Jereboam, and commanded that those of every age should be present also. And when they were gathered together, he first read to them the holy books; after which he called upon a prophet, in the midst of the multitude, and obliged them to make a covenant with a oath, that they would worship God, and keep the laws of Moses. Accordingly, they gave their assent willingly, and undertook to do what the king had recommended to them. So they immediately offered sacrifices, and that after an acceptable manner, and besought God to be gracious and merciful to them. He also enjoined the high priest, that if there remained in the temple any vessels that were not holy, or too ornate, kings, he should cast it out. So when a great number of such vessels were got together, he burned them, and scattered their ashes abroad, and slew the priests of the idols, that were not of the family of Aaron.

4. And when he had done thus in Jerusalem, he came into the country, and utterly destroyed what buildings had been made therein by king Jeroboam, in honor of strange gods; and he burnt the houses of the false prophets upon that altar which Jeroboam had first built. And as the prophet [Jadon,] who came to Jeroboam when he was offering sacrifice, and when all the people heard him, foretold what would come to pass, viz. that 'a certain man of the house of David, Joash, should be anointed king,' and that he should take in his hands the sword of the house of David, and reign over the house of David, and reign over the house of Israel. And it happened that those predictions took effect after three hundred and sixty-one years.

5. After these things Josiah went also to such other Israelites as had escaped captivity and slavery under the Assyrians, and persuaded them to assist from their impious practices, and to leave off the honors they paid to strange gods, but to worship rightly the God Almighty, and adhere to him. He also searched the houses, and the villages, and the cities, out of suspicion that somebody might have one idol or other in private; nay, indeed, he took away the chalizias [of the sun] that were set up in Jerusalem, and in the cities of his predecessors had framed, and what thing soever there was besides which they worshipped as a god. And when he had thus purged all the country, he called the people, and there called upon the priests of unleavened bread, and that called the Passover. He also gave the people, for paschal sacrifices, young kids of the goats and lambs thirty thousand, and those thousand oxen for burnt-offerings. The principal of the priests also gave to the priests, against the passover, two thousand and six hundred lambs; the principal of the Levites also gave to the Levites five thousand lambs and five thousand he-goats; and they offered a great plenty of sacrifices: and they offered those sacrifices according to the laws of Moses, while every priest explained the matter, and ministered to the multitude. And indeed there had been no other festival thus celebrated by the Hebrews from the times of Samuel the prophet; and the plenty of sacrifices now was the occasion that all things were performed according to the laws, and according to the customs of their forefathers. When Josiah had thus purified the house of the Lord, in riches and reputation also among all men, he ended his life in the manner following.

CHAP. V.

How Josiah fought with Neco [King of Egypt] and was wounded, and died in a little time afterward; as also, how Neco carried Jehoiakim, who had been made King, into Egypt, and delivered the Kingdom to Jehoiakim; and [lastly] concerning Jeremiah and Ezekiel.

1. Now Neco, king of Egypt, raised an army, and marched to the river Euphrates, in order to fight with the Medes and Babylonians, who had overthrown the dominion of the Assyrians; for he had a desire to reign over Asia. Now, when he was come to the city Medes, which belonged to the kingdom of Josiah, he brought an army; and by the passage through his own country, in his expedition against the Medes. Now Neco sent a herald to Josiah, and told him, that 'he did not make this expedition against him, but was only sent to Euphrates; and desired that he would not

* This is a remarkable passage of chronology in Josephus, that, about the latter end of the reign of Josiah, the Medes and Babylonians had subdued the empire of the Assyrians; or, in the words of Tobit's continuator, that "before Tobias died, he heard of the destruction of Nineveh, which was more than two hundred and fifty years before the Babylonian, and Assur, the Medes." Tol. xiv. 15; see Dean Prideaux's Connetions, at the year 612.
led his life for the time to come, that, from the time of his return to piety towards God, he was deemed a happy man and a pattern for imitation. When, therefore, he had lived sixty-seven years, he departed this life, having lived one hundred years, and was buried in his own garden; and the kingdom came to his son Amon, whose mother's name was Mechelemother, of the city of Jotbah.

CHAP. IV.

How Amon reigned instead of Manasseh; and after Amon reigned Josiah; he was both righteous and religious. As also concerning Huldah the Prophetess.

1. Thus Amon imitated those works of his father which he insolently did when he was young; for he had a contumacious spirit, and despised his own servants, and was slain in his own house, when he had lived twenty-four years, and of them had reigned two: but the multitude punished those that slew Amon, and hurled stones upon him, and thrust him to his son Josiah, who was eight years old. His mother was of the city of Besoth; and her name was Jeediah. He was of the most excellent disposition, and natively virtuous, and followed the ways of righteousness in all his days, and in the whole conduct of his life. And when he was twelve years old, he gave demonstrations of his religious and righteous behavior; for he brought the people to a sober way of living, and exalted them to leave off the opulent they had of their idols, because they were not gods, but to worship their own God. And by reflecting on the actions of his predecessors, he prudently corrected them; and he was very religious in all the days of his life, and like one abundantly able to understand what was fit to be done; and when he found they had well done, he observed all the country over, and imitated the same. And thus he acted in following the wisdom and sagacity of his mother and father, and in compliance with the advice and instruction of the elders; for by following the laws it was that he succeeded so well in the order of his government, and in piety with regard to the divine worship, that the transgressions of the former kings were seen no more, but quite vanished away; for the king went about the city, and the whole country, and cut down the groves which were devoted to strange gods; and there was no king that was so zealous for the worship of God. He also offered his accustomed sacrifices and burnt-offerings upon the altar. Moreover, he ordained certain judges and overseers, that they might order the matters to them generally belonging, and have regard to justice above all things, and distribute it with the same concern they would have about their own soul. He also sent over all the country and desired such as pleased to bring gold and silver and the best of all precious things according to every one's inclinations and abilities. And when the money was brought in, he made one Maseish the governor of the city, and Shaphan the scribe, and Josia the recorder, and Elisha the high priest, curators of the temple, and of the charges contributed thereto, who made no delay, nor put off the work at all, but prepared architects, and whatsoever was proper for the temple, and the whole entire work. So the temple was repaired by these means, and became a public demonstration of the king's piety.

2. But when he was now in the eighteenth year of his reign, he sent to Eliaish, the high priest, and gave order, that out of such money BOOK V.—CHAP. V.

4. And when he had done thus in Jerusalem, he came into the country, and utterly destroyed what buildings had been made therein by king Jeroboam, in honor of strange gods; and he burnt the bones of the priests upon that altar which Jeroboam had first built. And as the prophet [Jadon, who] came to Jeroboam when he was offering sacrifices, and persuaded them to desist from their impious practices, and to leave off the honors they paid to strange gods, to worship rightly their own Almighty God, and adhere to him. He also searched the houses, and the villages, and the cities, out of suspicion that somebody might have one idol or other: 1 private; or, indeed, to the custody of their forefathers; that is, 2 and there celebrated the feast of unleavened bread, and that called the Passover. He also gave the people, for paschal sacrifices, young kids of the goats and lambs thirty thousand, and three thousand bulls, and five hundred ephahs of flour, to make unleavened bread, and there celebrated the feast of unleavened bread, and that called the Passover. He also gave the people, for paschal sacrifices, young kids of the goats and lambs thirty thousand, and three thousand bulls, and five hundred ephahs of flour, to make unleavened bread, and there celebrated the feast of unleavened bread, and that called the Passover.

3. So these messengers, upon this prophecy of the woman, came and told it to the king; whereupon he sent to the people every where, and commanded that the priests should come together at Jerusalem; and commanded that those of every age should be present also. And when they were gathered together, he first read to them the holy books; after which he stood upon the pulpit, in the midst of the multitude, and obliged them to make a covenant, with an oath, that they would worship God, and keep the laws of Moses. Accordingly, they gave their consent willingly, and undertook to do what the king had recommended to them. So they immediately offered sacrifices, and that after an acceptable manner, and besought God to be gracious and merciful to them. He also enjoined the high priests and Levites to give the king any vessel that was dedicated to idols, or to foreign gods, he should cast it out. So when a great number of such vessels were got together, he burned them, and scattered their ashes abroad, and cast them upon the idols, that were not of the family of Aaron.

*It is hard to reconcile the account in the second book of Kings, ch. xii. 11, with this account in Josephus, and to make them consistent. Josephus, whose copies are supposed to be here imperfect; however, the general sense of both seems to be this, that there were certain places where the sun, or to Moloch, which idol might be carried these in procession and worshipped by the people, which were assaulted by Josiah; and as the book of Kings says, burnt with fire by Josiah.

†This is a remarkable passage of chronology in Josephus, than about the latter end of the reign of Josiah, the Medes and Babylonians overthrew the empire of the Assyrians; or, in the words of Tobioc's continuator, that "before Tobias died, he heard of the destruction of Nineveh, which was then over the Babylonian, and Assuerus the Mede," Tob. xiv. 15; see Dean Prideaux's Conclusions, at the year 612.
rem the events, by posterity; nor did this pro-sert do so alone, but the others, which were waxen in number, did the same. And whilst-vow among us, whether it be good, or whether it be bad, comes to pass according to hair prophecies; but of every one of these we shall speak hereafter.

CHAP. III.

How Manasseh reigned after Hasekiah; and how, when he was in Captivity, he returned to God, and was restored to his Kingdom, and left it to his Son Amon.

1. WHEN king Hasekiah had survived the interval of time already mentioned, and had lived all that time in peace, he died, having reigned thirty-nine years of his life, and reign-edge twenty-nine: and when his son Manasseh, whom his mother's name was Hephbakah, of Jerusalem, and taken the kingdom, he departed from the reduct of his father, and fell into a course of life quite contrary thereto, and showed himself so to his masters most wicked in all respects, and emitted no sort of impiety, but imitated those transgressions of the Israelites, by the comission of which his ancestors were guilty. For this reason he was so hardy as to defile the temple of God, and the city, and the whole country;
by setting out from a contempt of God, he bar-barously slew all the righteous men who were among the Hebrews, and he caused them to be brought the prophets, for he every day slew some of them, till Jerusalem was swollen with blood. So God was angry at these proceedings, and sent prophets to the king, and to the multitude, by whom he hoped to bring the same into repentance and fear what they had pleased upon him. But then it was that Ma-manasseh perceived what a miserable condition he was in, and set himself to do the very thing he had promised and prayed, and granted him what he prayed for.
So Manasseh was restored by the king of Babylon, and escaped the danger he was in; and when he was come to Jerusalem, he endeavored, if it were possible, to cast out of his memory those of his former sins against God, of which he now repented, and to apply himself to a very religion life. He sanctified the temple, and purged the city, and the rest, and his god, he was inclined to nothing but to return to the worship of God, for his deliverance, and to preserve him provisions to all his life long. He also instructed the multitude to do the same, as having received the same, and from the example of Jerusalem;
he did not only repair the old walls with great diligence, but added another wall to the former.

He also built very lofty towers, and the arranged places before the city he strength-enced, and not in other respects, but with provisions of all sorts that they wanted. And indeed, when he had changed his former course, he so led his life for the time to come, that, from the same time of his return to piety towards God, he was deemed a happy man and a pattern for imitation.
When, therefore, he departed from his own
world, and was buried in his own garden; and
the kingdom came to his son Amon, whose mother's name was Mesheschemeth, of the city of Jotbeth.

CHAP. IV.

How Amon reigned instead of Manasseh; and after Amon reigned Josiah; he was both righteous and religious. As also concerning Hal-dah the Prophetess.

1. Thus Amon imitated those works of his father which he insolently did when he was young; so he had a conspiracy made against him by his own servants, and was slain in his own house, when he had lived twenty-four years, and of them had reigned two: but the multitude placed those that slew Amon, and buried him with his father, and gave the kingdom unto his son Josiah, who was eight years old.
His mother was of the city of Boscas; and her name was Jehida, and she was of the tribe of Judah, by profession, and naturally virtuous, and followed the actions of king David, as a pattern and a rule to him in the whole conduct of his life. And when he was twelve years old, he gave demonstrations of his religiousness; he constantly brought the people to a sober way of living, and exhorted them to leave off the opinion they had of their idols, because there were no gods, but to worship their own God.

And by reflecting on the unnatural vices of the Gentiles towards the God of Israel, they might have known what they did wrong, like a very elderly man and like one abundantly able to understand what was fit to be done; and when he found they had well done, he observed all the country over, and imitated the former; and still he kept and favored the wisdom and sagacity of his own nature and in compliance with the advice and instruction of the elders; for by following the laws it was that he succeeded so well in the order of his government and in piety with regard to the divine worship. And this happened because the transgressions of the former kings were seen no more, but quite vanished away; for the king went about the place of the temple, and the chapel cut down the groves which were devoted to strange gods, and overthrew their altars; and if there was any gift dedicated to them by his forefathers, he made it ignominious, and plucked it from its place, and overthrowing it, and buildpeal from back their opinion about it to the worship of God. He also offered his accustomed sacrifices and burnt-offerings upon the altar.
Moreover, he ordained certain judges and overseers, that they might order the matters to them severally belonging, and have regard to justice above all things, and distribute it with the same concern they would have about their own soul.

He also went over all the country and desired the scribe to write to the king of silver for the repairs of the temple, according to every one's inclinations and abilities.

And when the money was brought in, he made one piece of the money, and poured it into the city of Jerusalem; he did not only repaired the old walls with great diligence, but added another wall to the former.

He also built very lofty towers, and the arranged places before the city he strengthened, and not in other respects, but with provisions of all sorts that they wanted. And indeed, when he had changed his former course, he so
led his life for the time to come, that, from the time of his return to piety towards God, he was deemed a happy man and a pattern for imitation.
When, therefore, he departed from his own
world, and was buried in his own garden; and
the kingdom came to his son Amon, whose mother's name was Mesheschemeth, of the city of Jot-
was overplus, he should cast cups, and dikes, and vials for ministration [in the temple], and besides, that they should bring all the gold and silver which was among the treasures, and expend that also in making the like vessels. But as the high priest was bringing out the gold, he lit upon the holy books of Moses that were laid up in the temple; and when he had brought them out, he gave them to Shaphan, the scribe, who, when he had read them came to the king, and informed him that all was finished which he had ordered to be done. He also read over the books to him, who, when he had heard, was pleased with his management, and, for Eliakim, the high priest, and for Shaphan the scribe, and for certain [other] of his most particular friends, and sent them to Huldah, the prophetess, the wife of Shallum, (which Simeon was an man of dignity, and of an excommunicated family,) and bade them go to her and say, that he desired "she would apposease God, and endeavor to render them propitious to them, for that there was cause of fear, lest, upon the transgression of these laws, the judgments of God would fall upon the land, and take away from the nation the enjoyment of all the happiness they enjoyed, which sentence none could set aside by any prayers of theirs, since it was pure on account of their transgressions of the laws, and of their not having caused the priests and Levites to do what had been enjoined to them, and had foretold the punishment that would ensue upon their impious practices; which threatening God would certainly execute upon them, that they might be punished in the midst of the multitude, and be examples to them in any respect as to what he had denounced by his prophet: that yet, because Josiah was a righteous man, he would at present delay those calamities; but that, after his death, he would send them such miseries as his forefathers had determined for them."

3. So these messengers, upon this prophecy of the woman, came and told it to the king: who was sent to the priests, and Levites, and ordered that the priests and Levites should come together at Jerusalem; and commanded that those of every age should be present also. And when they were gathered together, they knelt down before the altar which he stood upon a pulpit, in the midst of the multitude, and obliged them to make a covenant, with an oath, that they would worship God, and keep the laws of Moses. Accordingly, they gave their consent willingly, and undertook to do what the king had recommended to them. So they immediately offered sacrifices, and that after an acceptable manner, and besought God to be gracious and merciful to them. He also enjoined the high priests and the Levites, to make an account of the vessels that were dedicated to the Lord, and of those that were dedicated to the priests. He also ordered that the vessels used in the service of the Lord should be distributed, and the priests should share with the Levites, and the Levites with the priests. And when they had done this, the king gave orders that the books of Moses should be burnt with fire by Josiah.

4. And when he had done thus in Jerusalem, he came into the country, and utterly destroyed what buildings had been made therein by king Jeroboam, in honor of strange gods; and he burnt the houses of the high priests, which were built upon the altar which Jeroboam had first built. And as the prophet [Jadon.] who came to Jeroboam when he was offering sacrifices, and when all the people heard him, foretold what would come to pass, viz. that a certain man of the house of David, Josiah by name, should do what is here mentioned." And it happened that those predictions took effect after three hundred and sixty-one years.

5. After these things Josiah went also to such other Israelites as had escaped captivity and slavery under the Assyrians, and persuaded them to desert from their impious practices, and to leave off the heathen customs and idolatries, and to worship rightly their own Almighty God, and adhere to him. He also searched the houses, and the villages, and the cities, out of suspicion that somebody might have some idol or other; pry, how, on the half of what God had for his house, he had given to him. When he had searched all the country, he called the people to Jerusalem, and there celebrated the feast of unleavened bread, and that called the Passover. He also gave the people, for passchal sacrifices, young corn, and leaven, and golde, and fat of the goats, and the three thousand oxen for burnt-offerings. The principal of the priests also gave to the priests, against the passover, two thousand and six hundred lambs; the principal of the Levites also gave to the Levites, thousand lambs and five hundred oxen, by which means there was great plenty of sacrifices: and they offered those sacrifices according to the laws of Moses, while every priest explained the matter, and ministered to the multitude. And Josiah appointed a festival thus celebrated by the Hebrews from the times of Samuel the prophet; and the festival of sacrifices now was the occasion that all things were performed according to the laws, and according to the ordinance of their forefathers. So when Josiah had after this lived in peace, may, in riches and reputation also among all men, he ended his life in the manner following.

CHAP. V.

How Josiah fought with Neco [King of Egypt;] and was wounded, and died in a little time afterward; as also, how Neco carried Jehoiakim, who had been made King, into Egypt, and delivered the Kingdom to Jehoiakim; and [lastly] concerning Jeremiah and Ezekiel.

§ 1. Now Neco, king of Egypt, raised an army, and marched to the river Euphrates, in order to fight with the Medes and Babylonians, who had overthrown the dominion of the Assyrians; for he had a desire to reign over Asia. Now, when he was come to the city Mizpah, which belonged to the land of Ammon, having received from the king of Jerusalem, he brought an army to hinder him from passing through his own country, in his expedition against the Medes. Now Neco sent a herald to Josiah, and told him, that the king and the army of Neco, which was taken by Nebuchadnezzar the Babylonian, and Assurus the Mede, Tob. xsr. 15; see Dean Prideaux's Connections, at the year 612.
provoke him to fight against him, because he obstructed his march to the place whither he had resolved to go. But Josiah did not admit of this advice of Neco, but put himself into a posture to hinder him from this intended march. I suppose it was fate that pushed him on to this conduct, that it might take an occasion against him; for being sorely wounded, he commanded a retreat to be sounded for his army, and returned to Jerusalem, and died of that wound; and was magnificently buried in the sepulchre of his fathers, when he had lived thirty years and ten months, and reigned thirty years overall. But all the people mourned greatly for him, lamenting and grieving on his account many days: and Jeremiah the prophet composed an elegy to lament him, which is extant till this day. Moreover, this prophecy beforehand, the sad calamities that were coming upon the city. He also left behind him in writing a description of that destruction of our nation which has lately happened to our day, and the taking of the city; and he was only planted who delivered such predictions beforehand to the multitude, but so did Ezechiel also, who was the first person that wrote, and left behind him in writing, a prediction concerning these events. Now these two prophets were contemporaries; but of them Jeremiah dwelt in Jerusalem, from the thirteenth year of the reign of Josiah, until the city and temple were utterly destroyed. However, as to what befell this prophet, we will relate in its proper place.

2. Upon the death of Josiah, which we have already mentioned, his son, Jehoash by name, took the kingdom; being about twenty-three years of age, when he ascended to the throne; and his mother was Hamutal, of the city Libnah. He was an impious man, and impious in his course of life: but as the king of Egypt returned from the battle, he sent for Jehoash to come to him to the city called Eloth, which belongs to Syria; and when he was come, he put him in bonds, and delivered the kingdom to a brother of his, by the father's side, whose name was Elishaiah, and changed his name to Jehoiakim, and laid a tribute upon the land, besides a hundred talents of silver, and a talent of gold, and this sum of money Jehoiakim paid by way of tribute: but Neco carried away Jehoash into Egypt, where he died within the space of three months, and ten days, and he died at the city of Megiddo. Now Jehoiakim's mother was called Zebudiah, of the city Rummah. He was of a wicked disposition, and ready to do mischief; nor was he either religious towards God or good-natured towards men.

CHAP. VI.

How Nebuchadnezzar, when he had conquered the King of Egypt, made an Expedition against the Jews, and slew Jehoiakim, and made Jehoiachin his son King.

1. Now in the fourth year of the reign of Jehoiakim, one whose name was Nebuchadnezzar took the government over the Babylonians, and the next year, in the same time, he set up to the city Carchemish, which was at Ephrates, upon a resolution he had taken to fight with Neco king of Egypt, under whom all Syria then was. And when Neco understood the intention

*This battle is justly esteemed the very same that Esedoth, B. ii. sect. 196, mentions, when he says, that 'Necus joined battle with the Syrians [or Jews] at Megiddo,' &c. and beat them,' as Dr. Hudeca here observes.

† Whether Josephus, from 2 Chron. xxiv. 25. here means the book of the Lamentations of Jeremiah will extend, which chiefly belongs to the destruction of Jerusalem under Nebuchadnezzar, or to any other like of the king of Babylon, and that this expedition was made against him, he did not despise his strength, but made haste with the greatest band of men to Ephraes, to defend himself from Nebuchadnezzar; and when they had joined battle, he was beaten, and lost many ten thousands of his soldiers in the battle. So the king of Babylon passed over Ephrates, and took all Syria, as far as Phoenicia, excepting Jezreel. But when Nebuchadnezzar had already regained four years, which was the eighth of Jehoiakim's government over the Hebrews, the king of Babylon fell sick, and made a retreat to be sounded for his army, and returned to Jerusalem, and died of that wound; and was magnificently buried in the sepulchre of his fathers, when he had lived thirty years and ten months, and reigned thirty years overall. But all the people mourned greatly for him, lamenting and grieving on his account many days: and Jeremiah the prophet composed an elegy to lament him, which is extant till this day. Moreover, this prophecy beforehand, the sad calamities that were coming upon the city. He also left behind him in writing a description of that destruction of our nation which has lately happened to our day, and the taking of the city; and he was only planted who delivered such predictions beforehand to the multitude, but so did Ezechiel also, who was the first person that wrote, and left behind him in writing, a prediction concerning these events. Now these two prophets were contemporaries; but of them Jeremiah dwelt in Jerusalem, from the thirteenth year of the reign of Josiah, until the city and temple were utterly destroyed. However, as to what befell this prophet, we will relate in its proper place.

2. Upon the death of Josiah, which we have already mentioned, his son, Jehoash by name, took the kingdom; being about twenty-three years of age, when he ascended to the throne; and his mother was Hamutal, of the city Libnah. He was an impious man, and impious in his course of life: but as the king of Egypt returned from the battle, he sent for Jehoash to come to him to the city called Eloth, which belongs to Syria; and when he was come, he put him in bonds, and delivered the kingdom to a brother of his, by the father's side, whose name was Elishaiah, and changed his name to Jehoiakim, and laid a tribute upon the land, besides a hundred talents of silver, and a talent of gold, and this sum of money Jehoiakim paid by way of tribute: but Neco carried away Jehoash into Egypt, where he died within the space of three months, and ten days, and he died at the city of Megiddo. Now Jehoiakim's mother was called Zebudiah, of the city Rummah. He was of a wicked disposition, and ready to do mischief; nor was he either religious towards God or good-natured towards men.
was terrible, because he neither shut the gates, nor sought against him; yet when he was come into the city, he did not observe the covenant he had made, but he slew such as were in the tower of the Hinnom, and all the young men that had borne the king's name, because of the covenant of God which their fathers the kings of Judah had made. And he took the captivity, three thousand in number, and led them away to Babylon; among whom was the prophet Ezechiel, who was then but young. And this was the end of king Jehoiakim, whom he had led thirty-six years, and of them reigned eleven; but Jehoiachin succeeded him in the kingdom, whose mother's name was Nehushta: she was a citizen of Jerusalem. He reigned three months and ten days.

CHAP. VII.

That the King of Babylon repeated of making Jehoiachin King, and took him away to Babylon, and delivered the Kingdom to Zedekiah.

This king would not believe what was predic’d by Jeremiah and Ezechiel, but joined himself to the Egyptians; who, on that account, the Jews, were vanquished by the King of Babylon; as also what befell Jeremiah.

§ 1. But a terror seized on the king of Babylon, who had given the kingdom to Jehoiachin, and that immediately; he was afraid that he should lose the country he had subdued, through his father, and thereupon should make the country revolt from him; wherefore he sent an army, and besieged Jehoiachin in Jerusalem; but because he was of a gentle and just disposition, he did not desire to see the city endangered. He took account, but he took his mother, and kindred, and delivered them to the commanders sent by the king of Babylon, and accepted of their oaths, that neither should they suffer any harm, nor the city; which agreement they did not observe for a single year, for the king of Babylon did not keep it, but gave orders to his generals to take all that were in the city captives; both the youth and the handmaidsmen, and bring them bound to him, their number was ten thousand eight hundred and thirty-two; as also Jehoiachin, and his mother and friends; and when these were brought to him, he kept them in custody, and apparel, and appointed a監司 over them, to rule to the king; and made him take as oath that he would certainly keep the kingdom for him, and make no innovation, nor have any league of friendship with the Egyptians.

§ 2. Now Zedekiah was twenty and one year old when he took the government; and had the same mother with his brother Jehoiakim, but was a despiser of justice and of his duty, for truly those of the same age with him were wicked about him, and the whole multitude did what unjust and insolent things they pleased; for which reason the prophet Jeremiah came often to him, and protested to him, and insisted, that he had better and greater advantage in the kingdom, and the people, and the country, and the captivity, and take care of what was right, and neither give ear to the rulers, (among whom were wicked men,) nor give credit to their false prophets, who deluded them, as if the king of Babylon would not take them, and as if the Egyptians would make war against him, and conquer him, since what they said was not true, and the events would not prove such as they expected. Now, as to Zedekiah himself, while he heard the prophet speak, he believed him, and agreed to every thing as true, and supposed it was for his advantage; but then his friends persuaded him, and dissuaded him from what the prophet advised, and obliged him to do what they pleased. Ezechiel also foretold in Babylon what calamities were coming upon the people, whither he had been commissioned by the king to observe and count of them to Jerusalem; but Zedekiah did not believe their prophecies, for the reasons following: it happened that the two prophets agreed with one another in what they said. The other thing, if the city should be taken, and Zedekiah himself should be taken captive, but Ezechiel disagreed with him, and said that "Zedekiah should not see Babylon," while Jeremiah said to him, that "the king of Babylon should carry him away thither in bonds." And because they did not both say the same thing as to this circumstance, he disbelieved what they both appeared to agree in, and condemned them as not speaking truth; and although the things foretold him did come to pass according to their prophecies, as we shall show upon a fortiori opportunity.

§ 3. Now when Zedekiah preserved the league of mutual assistance he made with the Babylonians, for eight years, he brake it, and revolted to the Egyptians, in hopes, by their assistance, of overcoming the Babylonians. When the king of Babylon heard this, he was very angry against him: he laid his country waste, and took his fortified towns, and came to the city Jerusalem itself to besiege it: but when the king of Egypt heard what circumstances Zedekiah’s ally was in, he made war upon the Babylonians, and came into Judæa, as if he would raise the siege upon which the king of Babylon departed from Jerusalem, and met the Egyptians, and joined battle with them, and beat them, and when he had put them to great confusion, he drove them out of all Syria. Now as soon as the king of Babylon was departed from Jerusalem, the false prophets deceived Zedekiah, and said, that "the king of Babylon would not any more make war upon the king of Judah, nor throw them out of their own country into Babylon, and that those then in captivity would return, with all those vessels of the temple, of which the king of Babylon had despoiled that temple." But Jeremiah came among them, and prophesied what contradicted those predictions, and what proved to be true, that "they did ill, and deluded the king; that the Egyptians would be of no advan’tage to them; that the king of Babylon would renew the war against Jerusalem, and besiege it again, and would destroy the people by famine and carry away those that remained into captivity, and would take away what they had as their chattels, and would cast off their captivity, and would be in the temple; nay, that, besides this, he would burn it, and utterly overthrow the city, and that they should serve him and his posterity seventy years; that then the Persians and the Medes should put an end to their servitude, and overthrow the Babylonians, and that we shall be disannulled, and return to this land, and rebuild the temple, and restore Jerusalem." When Jeremiah spoke these words, Zedekiah believed the false prophets, and the rulers, and those that were wicked, despaired him, as one disorder’d in his senses. Now he had resolved to go elsewhere, to his own country, which was called Anathoth, and was twenty furlongs distant from Jerusalem. When Jeremiah went going, one of the rulers met him, and seized upon him, and accused him falsely, as though he were going as a deserter to the Babylonians; but Jeremiah said, that he accused him falsely, and added, that he was only going to his own country; but the other would not believe him, but seized upon him, and led him away to the ruler; and laid an accusation against him, under whom he endured all sorts of torments and tortures, and was reserved to be punished; and this was the condition he was in for some time, while he suffered all that I have already described to you.

4. Now in the ninth year of the reign of Zedekiah, on the tenth day of the tenth month, the king of Babylon made a second expedition against Jerusalem, and lay before it eighteen months, as he before described, and the same calamities befell the city. There came upon them also two of the greatest calamities at the same time that Jerusalem was besieged, a famine and pestilential distemper, and the loss of the joy of life, and the poor state it was in the city. Then the prophet Jeremiah was in prison, he did not rest, but cried out, and proclaimed aloud, and exhorted the multitude to open their gates, and admit the king of Babylon, for that if they did so, they should be preserved, and their whole families; but if they did not so, they should be destroyed; and he foretold, that if any one stayed in the city, he should certainly perish by one of these ways, either be consumed by the famine, or slain by the enemy's sword, but that if he would fly to the enemy he should escape death: yet did not these rulers who heard believe him, even when they were in the midst of their sore calamity, nor did they resolve upon it to try the king, and their anger, informed him what Jeremiah said, and accused him, and complained of the prophet as a madman, and one that disheartened their minds, and by the desacunciation of miseries, were filled with a great deal of the multitude, who were otherwise ready to expose themselves to dangers for him, and for their country, while be, in a way of threatening, warned them to fly to the enemy, and told them that the city should certainly be taken, and be utterly destroyed.

5. But the king himself was not at all irritated against Jeremiah, such was his gentle and righteous disposition; yet that he might not be encouraged with those provokings at such time, by opposing what they intended, he let them do with the prophet whatsoever they would: whereupon, when the king had granted them such a permission, they presently came into the prison and took him, and let him down with a cord into a pit full of mire, that he might be suffocated, and die of himself. So he stood up to the neck in the mire, which was all about him, and so continued: but there was of the king's squadron with him, an Ethiopian by descent, who told the king what a state the prophet was in, and said, that his friends and his rulers had done evil in putting the prophet into the mire, and by that name contriving against him that he should suffer such deals miseries as were by the bonds only. When the king heard this, he repented of his having delivered up the prophet to the rulers, and bade the Ethiopian take thirty men of the king's guards, and cords with them, and whatsoever else they understood to be necessary for the prophet's preservation, and draw him up immediately. So the Ethiopian took the men he was ordered to take, and brought them to the mire, and left him at liberty (in the prison).

6. But when the king had sent to call him privately, and inquired what he could say to him from God, which might be suitable to his present circumstances, and proved him to the form of it, Jeremiah replied, that "he had somewhat to say:" but he said withal, he "should not be believed, nor, if he admonished them, should be heard of" (said he); "but my friends have determined to destroy me, as though I had been guilty of some wickedness: and where are now those men who deceived us, and said that the king of Babylon would not come and fight against you, but I am afraid now the city will speak the truth, lest thou shouldst condemn me to die." And when the king had assuaged him upon oath, that he would neither himself put him to death, nor deliver him up to the rulers, he became bold upon that assurance that was given him; and gave him this advice, that "he should deliver the city up to the Babylonians, and said, that it was God that prophesied this by him, that he must do so if he would be preserved and escape out of the danger he was in, and that then neither should the city be taken, nor they suffer the calamity learned; but that if he disobeyed he would be the cause of these miseries coming upon the citizens, and of the calamity that would befall his whole house." And when Jeremiah was informed of this, he was better pleased to have the city delivered up to the Babylonians, than to have been delivered up to both, and he declared in the king's presence, how willing he was to do what he was commanded, and what advice he had declared would be to his advantage but that he was afraid of those of his own country that had fallen away to the Babylonians lest he should be accused by them to the king of Babylon, and be punished." But the prophet encouraged him, and said, "He had no cause to fear such punishment, for that he should not have the experience of any misfortune, if he would deliver all up to the Babylonians, neither himself, nor his children, nor his wives, and that the temple should then continue unhurt." So when Jeremiah had said this, the king let him go, and let him go; but he resolved on to none of the citizens, nor to tell any of the rulers, if he should have learned that he had been sent for, what he had said to him; but to pretend to them, that he besought the king to deliver the city up to the Babylonians, and that he was in prison. And indeed as said so to them; for they came to the prophet, and asked him, what advice it was that he came to give the king relating to them? And thus I have finished what concerns this matter.

CHAP. VIII.

How the King of Babylon took Jerusalem, and burnt the Temple, and removed the People of Jerusalem and Zedekiah to Babylon. As also who they were that had succeeded in the High Priesthood under the Kings.

1. Now the king of Babylon was very intent and earnest upon the siege of Jerusalem; and he erected towers upon great banks of earth, and from them repelled those that stood upon the walls: he also made a great number of such banks round about the whole city, whose height was very great, and where he set many of them, an Ethiopian by descent, whom the king had within the siege with courage and alacrity, for they were not discouraged, either by the famine, or by the pestilential distemper, but were of cheerful mind in the prospect of the loss of their city, and the miseries within oppressed them also, and they did not suffer themselves to be terrified, either by the coarseness of the enemy, or by their engines of war, but contrived still different engines to oppose all the other, and indeed till there seemed to be an entire struggle between the Babylonians and the people of Jerusalem, which had the greater sagacity and skill; the former party supposing they should thereby make it hard for the besiegers to place the destruction of the city; the latter placing their hopes of deliverance in nothing else but in persevering in such inventions in opposition to the other, as might demonstrate the executioner's enmity: these were probably the means of the capture of the city, for on the day of the fourth month, in the eleventh year of the reign of Zedekiah. They were indeed only generals of the king of Babylon, to whom Nebuchadnezzar committed the care of the siege, for he said: but I to the contrary I must say: that these general names of these generals who ravaged and subdued Jerusalem, if any one desire to know them were these, Nergal, Shai, and, Samgar Nebi, Rabshakeh, Seraiah, and Rabshakeh. And when the city was taken about midnight, and the enemies' generals were entered into the temple, and when Zedekiah was sensible of it, he took his sons and his children, and took with him his sons' wives, and the women of his body, and his friends, and with them fled out of the city, through the fortilled ditch, and through the desert; and when certain of the deserters had informed Zedekiah that they made haste to pursue after Zedekiah, and overtook him not far from Jericho, and encompassed him about; but for those friends and captains of Zedekiah who had fled out of the city with him, they returned again to the city; for when they saw them, they left him and dispersed themselves some one way and some another, and every one resolved to save himself; so the enemy took Zedekiah alive, when he was deserted by all but a few, with his children and his wives, and brought him to the king. When he was come, Nebuchadnezzar began to "call him a wicked wretch, and a covenant-breaker, and one that had reviled God. And the king of Babylon also took him, and put his eyes inropes, and took him to Babylon, and brought the rest of the captains locked on, after which he put out the eyes of Zedekiah, and bound him, and carried him to Babylon. And these things happened to him," as Jeremiah and Ezekiel say, "so that he was blind, and brought to Babylon, but he did not see it, according to the prediction of Ezekiel.

3. We have said thus much because it was sufficient to show the nature of God to such as are ignorant of him, that he is a just and powerful Being, and acts many different ways, and that all events happen after a regular manner, in their proper season, and that it foretells what must come to pass. It is also sufficient to show the ignorance and incredulity of the enemies of God, to foresee any that is future, and are, without any guard, exposed to calamities, so that it is impossible for them to avoid the experience of these calamities.

4. And after this manner have the kings of David's race ended their lives, being in amabul twenty one until the last king; who altogether reigned five hundred and fourteen years, and six months, and ten days; of whom Saul, who was their first king, reigned the government twenty years, though he was not of the same tribe with the rest.

5. And now it was that the king of Babylon saw the excellency of general of his army, to Jerusalem, to pillage the town, who had also is command to burn it, and the royal palace, and to lay the city even with the ground, and to transplanted the people into Babylon. Accordingly, the people of Jerusalem in the days of king Zedekiah, and pillaged the temple, and carried out the vessels of God, both gold and silver, and particularly that large laver which Solomon dedicated, as also the pillars of brass, and their chapiters, with the golden tables and the candlesticks; and when he had carried these off, he set fire to the temple in the fifth month, on the first day of the month, which was the fourteenth year of the reign of Zedekiah, and on the eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar; he also burnt the palace and overthrew the city. Now the temple was burnt four hundred and sixty months, and ten days after it was built. It was then one thousand and sixty-two years, six months, and ten days from the departure out of Egypt; and from the deluge to the destruction of Solomon's temple, it was four hundred and nine hundred fifty-seven years, six months, and ten days; but from the generation of Adam until this beset the temple, there were three thousand five hundred and thirteen years, six months, and ten days; so great was the number of years hereto belonging. And what actions were done during those years, we have particularly related. But the general of the Babylonian king now overpowered the inhabitants, and removed all the people, and took for prisoners the high priest Jerahmeel, and Zephaniah the priest that was next him, and the rulers that guarded the temple, who were three in number, and the names of whom are over the armed men, and seven friends of Zedekiah, and his scribe, and six other rulers; all which, together with the vessels which they had pillaged, he carried to the king of Babylon to Riblah, a city in Syria. So he numbered all the vessels of gold, and the high priest and of the rulers to be cut off there; but he himself led all the captives, and Zedekiah, to Babylon. He also led Josedek the high priest away bound. He was the son of Se- zadin, the high priest whom the king of Babylon had slain in Riblah, a city of Syria, as we have just now related.

6. And now, because we have enumerated the succession of the kings, and who they were, and how long they reigned, I think it necessary to set down the names of the high priests, and who they were that succeeded one another in the high priesthood under the kings. The first high priest then at the temple which Solomon built, was Zadok; after him his son Achimias received that dignity; after Achimias was Asaria; his son was Jeram, and Jeram's son was Issus; after him was Aniromma; his son was Phideas, and Phideas's son was Sussanias, and Sussanias's son was Phidas, and Phidas's son was Jusl, and Jusl's son was Jotham, and Jotham's son was Ursia, and Ursia's son was Nerias, and Nerias's son was Odisa, and his son was Salumus, and Salumus's son was Elies, and his son [was Asaria, and his son was Sussanias, and his son was Josedek, who was carried captive to Babylon. All these received the high priesthood by succession, the sons from their father. 7. When the king was come to Babylon, he kept Zedekiah in prison till he died, and buried him magnificently, and dedicated the vessels he had pillaged out of the temple of Jerusalem to his own gods, and planted the people in the country of Babylon, but freed the high priest from his bonds.

CHAP. IX.

How Nebuchadnezzar set Zedekiah over the Jews that were left in Judea, which Nebuchadnezzar was a little afterwards slain by Jehoiakim; and how Jo- nathan, after Jehoiakim was driven away went

† I have here inserted in brackets this high priest Asar- raha, though he be omitted in all Josephus's copies, out of the Jewish chronicle, Seder Olam, of how little authority among such men as rabbi- cal historians; because we know from Josephus himself, that the number of the high priests belonging to this interval was nine, as it is in M.K. xxvii. ch. vi., whereas his copies have here but seventeen.
and laid an accusation against him, under whom he endured all sorts of tortures and tortures, and was reserved to be punished; and this was the condition he was in for some time, while he suffered what I have already described; unjustly for the Babylonians; and he said, that it was God that proscribed this by him, that (he must do so) if he would be preserved and escape out of the danger he was in, and that then neither should the city nor the ground from which the temple burned; but that (if he disobeyed) he would be the cause of these miseries coming upon the citizens, and of the calamity that would befall his whole house.

4. Now in the ninth year of the reign of Zedekiah, on the tenth day of the tenth month, the king of Babylon made a second expedition against Jerusalem, and lay before it eighteen months, and besieged it by land and sea. There came upon them also two of the greatest calamities at the same time that Jerusalem was besieged, a famine and pestilential distemper, and they brought great destruction of the citizens and the king. And the prophet Jeremiah was in prison, he did not rest, but cried out, and proclaimed aloud, and exhorted the multitude to open their gates, and admit the king of Babylon, for that if they did so, they should be preserved, and their whole families; but if they did not so, they should be destroyed; and he foretold, that if any one stayed in the city, he should certainly perish by one of these ways, either be consumed by the famine, or slain by the enemy's sword, but that if he would fly to the enemy he should escape death; yet did not these rulers who heard believe him, even when they were in the midst of their sore perplexity, he came to them. "To betray their anger, informed him what Jeremiah said, and accused him, and complained of the prophet as of a madman, and one that disheartened their minds, and by the denunciation of miseries, terrified them by the solitude of the land, which were otherwise ready to expose themselves to dangers for him, and for their country, while he, in a way of threatening, warned them to fly to the enemy, and told them that the city should continue taken, and be utterly destroyed.

6. But when the king had sent to call him privately, and inquired what he could say to him from God, which might be suitable to his present circumstances, and desired him to inform him of it, Jeremiah replied, that "he had somewhat to say;" but he said within, he "should not be believed, nor, if he admonished them, should be hearkened to (he said); but his friends have determined to destroy me, as though I had been guilty of some wickedness; and where are now those men who deceived us, and said that the king of Babylon would not come and fight against us? For I am afraid now to speak the truth, lest thou shouldst condemn me to die." And when the king had assured him upon oath, that he would neither himself put him to death, nor deliver him up to the rulers, he became bold upon that assurance that was given him; and gave him this advice, that "he should deliver the city up to the Babylonians; and he said, that it was God that proscribed this by him, that (he must do so) if he would be preserved and escape out of the danger he was in, and that then neither should the city nor the ground from which the temple burned; but that (if he disobeyed) he would be the cause of these miseries coming upon the citizens, and of the calamity that would befall his whole house."

CHAP. VIII.

How the King of Babylon took Jerusalem, and burnt the Temple, and removed the People of Jerusalem and Zedekiah to Babylon. As also who they were that had succeeded in the High Priesthood under the Kings.

1. Now the king of Babylon was very intent and earnest upon the siege of Jerusalem; and he erected towers upon great banks of earth, and from them repelled those that stood upon the walls: he also made a great number of such baquets round about the whole city, whose height was doubled, and were within the walls, and those were within bear the siege with courage and acclivity, for they were not discouraged, either by the famine, or by the pestilential distemper, but were of cheerful minds in the prosecution of the war, and those who considered them also, and they did not suffer themselves to be terrified, either by the couariorance of the enemy, or by their engines of war, but contrived still different engines to oppose all the other, withal, till indeed there seemed to be an entire struggle between the Babylonians and the people of Jerusalem, which had the greater energy and skill; the former party supposing they should have the enemy on the point of hard for the overthrow of the city, and the destruction of the city; the latter placing their hopes of deliverance in nothing else but in persevering in such inventions in opposition to the other, as might demonstrate the enemy's enemy to be his ally, since they did not believe in the success of the Babylonians; and he, in the month of the fourth month, in the eleventh year of the reign of Zedekiah. They were indeed only generals of the king of Babylon, to whom Nebuchadnezzar committed the care of the siege, and he commanded them to do all that was necessary, and to name the names of these generals who ravaged and subdued Jerusalem, if any one desire to know them. were these, Nergal, Shassuer, Samgar Neba, Rabaeus, Sereschim, and Rabnag. And when the city was taken about midnight, and the enemies' generals were entered into the temple, and when Zedekiah was sensible of it, he took his wives, and his children, and his captains, and his friends, and with these fled out of the city, through the fortified ditch, and through the desert; and when certain of the deserters had infected Zedekiah to run away with them, they made haste to pursue after Zedekiah, and overtook him not far from Jericho, and encompass'd him about; but for those friends and captains of Zedekiah who had fled out of the city with him, through the desert, and with them, they left him, and dispersed themselves some one way and some another, and every one resolved to save himself; so the enemy took Zedekiah alive, when he was cleaned, by all but a few, with his children and his wives, and brought him to the king. When he was come, Nebuchadnezzar began to call him a wicked wretch, and a covenant-breaker, and one that had died, and his former words many be promised to keep the country for him. He also reproached him for his ingratitude, that when he had received the kingdom from him, who had taken it from Jehoiachin, and given it him, and made him king against him that gave it; but (said he) God is great, who hateth that conduct of thine, and hath brought thee under us. And when he had used these words, he returned to the king's son and his friends to be slain, while Zedekiah and the rest of the captains looked on, after which he put the eyes of Zedekiah, and bound him, and carried him to Babylon. And thus was his great magnificence; how Ezekiel had foretold to him, that he should be caught and brought before the king of Babylon, and should speak to him face to face; and should see his eyes with his own eyes; and thus far did Jerem. vi. 24. But now came Zedekiah, and Ezekiel had foretold to him, that he should be caught and brought to Babylon, but he did not see it, according to the prediction of Ezekiel.

3. We have said thus much because it was sufficient to show the nature of God to such as are ignorant of his greatness, and of his power; but we must observe, that all events happen after a regular manner, in their proper season, and that it foretells what must come to pass. It is also sufficient to show the ignorance of those who believe themselves to be in a state of liberty, and are permitted to foresee any thing that is future, and are, without any guard, exposed to calamities, so that it is impossible for them to avoid the experience of the prophecy.

4. And after this manner have the kings of David's race ended their lives, being in number twenty one until the last king; who altogether reigned five hundred and fourteen years, and six months, and ten days; of whom Saul, who was their first king, retained the government twenty years, though he was not of the same tribe with the rest.

5. And now it was that the king of Babylon sent Nebuzaradon, who was general of his army, to Jerusalem, to pillage the temple, which had it also is command to burn it, and the royal palace, and to lay the city even with the ground, and to transplant the people into Babylon. But Zedekiah, by the eleventh year of king Zedekiah, and pillaged the temple, and carried out the vessels of God, both gold and silver, and particularly that large lever which Solomon dedicated, as also the pillars of brass, and their chapiters, with the golden tables and the candlesticks; and when he had carried these off, he set fire to the temple in the fifth month, the first day of the month, on the eleventh year of the reign of Zedekiah, and on the eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar; he also burnt the palace and overthrew the city. Now the temple was burnt forty and one years, six months, and ten days after it was built. It was then one thousand and sixty-two years, six months, and ten days from the departure out of Egypt; and from the deluge to the destruction of the temple, the time of the flood to the time of the nine hundred and fifty seven years, six months, and ten days; but from the generation of Adam until this befall the temple, there were three thousand five hundred and the seven years, six months, and ten days; so great was the number of years hereto belonging. And what actions were done during those years, we have particularly related. But the general of the Babylonian king now overtook the inhabitants, and drove them to the sea, and those left in the city and in their cities, and razed the city of Nineveh to the foundations, and removed all the people, and took for prisoners the high priest Serani, and Zephaniah the priest that was next to him, and the rulers that guarded the temple, who were three in number, and the king's son, and the chief men, and seven friends of Zedekiah, and his scribe, and six other rulers; all which, together with the vessels which they had pillaged, he carried to the king of Babylon to Riblah, a city of Syria. So that the king of Babylon set his own son of Zedekiah, the high priest, upon the throne that was in the house of the high priest and of the rulers to be cut off there; but he himself led all the captives, and Zedekiah, to Babylon. He also led Josedek the high priest away captive. He was the son of Se-rain, the high priest whom the king of Babylon had slain in Riblah, a city of Syria, as we have just now related.

6. And now, because we have enumerated the succession of the kings of the tribe of Judah, and how long they reigned, I think it necessary to set down the names of the high priests, and who they were that succeeded one another in the high priesthood under the kings. The first high priest then at the temple which Solomon had built was Zadoc; after him his son Achias received that dignity; after Achias was Azarias; his son was Joram, and Joram's son was Jesus; after him was Azionavus; his son was Phidias, and Phidias's son was Suedes; and Suedes's son was Justel, and Justel's son was Joatham, and Joatham's son was Uria, and Uria's son was Nerias, and Nerias's son was Odessa, and his son was Salu-man, and Salaman's son and Salamanah's son [was Azarias], and his son] was Sarea, and his son was Josedek, who was carried captive to Babylon. All these received the high priesthood by succession, the sons from their father.

7. When the king was come to Babylon, he kept Zedekiah in prison till he died, and buried him magnificently, and dedicated the vessels he had pillaged out of the temple of Jerusalem to his own gods, and planted the people in the country of Babylon, but freed the high priest from his bonds.

and laid an accusation against him, under whom he endured all sorts of tortures and torments, and was reserved to be punished; and this was the condition he was in for some time, while he suffered that I have already described unjustly.

4. Now in the ninth year of the reign of Zedekiah, on the tenth day of the tenth month, the king of Babylon made a second expedition against Jerusalem, and lay before it eighteen months, and did not deliver him up to the king of Babylon, and was reserved to be punished. There came upon them also two of the greatest calamities at the same time that Jerusalem was besieged, a famine and pestilential distemper, and such a famine as it was told of them; and though the prophet Jeremiah was in prison, he did not rest, but cried out, and proclaimed aloud, and exhorted the multitude to open their gates, and admit the king of Babylon, for that if they did so, they should be preserved, and their whole families; but if they did not so, they should be destroyed; and he foretold, that if any one stayed in the city, he should certainly perish by one of these ways, either be consumed by the famine, or slain by the enemy's sword, but that if he would fly to the enemy he should escape death; yet did not these rulers who heard believe him, even when they were in the midst of their sore case, and saw one came to the king, and, in their anger, informed him that Jeremiah had said, and accused him, and complained of the prophet as a madman, and one that disheartened their minds, and by the denunciation of miseries, warned the multitude to their destruction, who were otherwise ready to expose themselves to dangers for him, and for their country, while he, in a way of threatening, warned them to fly to the enemy, and told them that the city should be taken, and be utterly destroyed.

6. But when the king had sent to call him privately, and inquired what he could say to him from God, which might be suitable to his present condition, and to them all; and of it, Jeremiah replied, that he had somewhat to say: but he said withheld, he should not be believed, nor, if he should Manuished, they should be hardened against him. And his friends had determined to destroy me, as though I had been guilty of some wickedness: and where are now those men who deceived us, and said that the king of Babylon would not come and fight against us? But I afraid now to speak the truth, lest thou shouldst condemn me to death. And when the king had assured him upon oath, that he would neither himself put him to death, nor deliver him up to the rulers, he became bold upon that assurance that was given him; and gave him this advice, that he should deliver the city up to the Babylonians; and he said, that it was God that prophesied this by him, that (he must do so) if he would be preserved and escape out of the danger he was in, and then neither should the city fall to the glory of the king of Babylon; but that (if he disobeyed) he would be the cause of these miseries coming upon the citizens, and of the calamity that would befall his whole house.

7. When the king had heard this, he would willingly do what he persuaded him to, and what he declared would be to his advantage but that he was afraid of those of his own country that had fallen away to the Babylonians lest he should be accused by them to the king of Babylon, and be punished. But the prophet encouraged him, and said, He had no cause to fear such punishment, for that he should not have the experience of any misfortune, if he would deliver all up to the Babylonians, neither himself, nor his children, nor his wives, and that the temple should then continue unhurt. So when Jeremiah had said this, the king let him go, and charged him that he should not deliver any of the citizens, nor tell any of the rulers, if they should have learned that he had been sent for, what he had said to him: but to pretend to them, that he brought a message from the king totake prisoners. And indeed as said so to them; for they came to the prophet, and asked him, what advice it was that he came to give the king relating to them? And thus I have finished what concerns this matter.

§ 1. Now the king of Babylon was very intent and earnest upon the siege of Jerusalem; and he erected towers upon great banks of earth, and from them repelled those that stood upon the walls: he also made a great number of such banks round about the whole city, whose height and breadth was in each of them, an Ethiopian by descent, who told the king what a state the prophet was in, and said, that his friends and his rulers had done evil in putting the prophet into the mire, and by that means contriving against him, and said much worse of him than that by his bonds only. When the king heard this, he repented of his having delivered up the prophet to the rulers, and bade the Ethiopian take thirty men of the king's guards, and cords with them, and whatsoever else they understood to be necessary for the prophet's preservation, and draw him up immediately. So the Ethiopian took the men he was ordered to take, and the cords of the mire, and left him at liberty [in the prison.]

6. But when the king had sent to call him privately, and inquired what he could say to him from God, which might be suitable to his present condition, and to them all; and of it, Jeremiah replied, that he had somewhat to say: but he said withheld, he should not be believed, nor, if he should Manuished, they should be hardened against him. And his friends had determined to destroy me, as though I had been guilty of some wickedness: and where are now those men who deceived us, and said that the king of Babylon would not come and fight against us? But I afraid now to speak the truth, lest thou shouldst condemn me to death. And when the king had assured him were these, Nergal, Shammu, Samgar Nebu, Rabbeerias, Serechshah, and Rahmag. And when the city was taken about midnight, and the enegies' generals were entered into the temple, and when Zedekiah was sensible of it, he took his wife, and his children, and his captains, and his friends, and with them fled out of the city, through the fortded ditch, and through the desert; and when certain of the deserters had infomed the king that the manner of their flight was as they said, they made haste to pursue after Zedekiah, and overtook him not far from Jericho, and encompassed him about; but for those friends and captains of Zedekiah that had fled out of the city with him, when they found them, they took them, they left him, and dispersed themselves some one way and some another, and every one resolved to save himself; so the enemy took Zedekiah alive, when he was deserted by all but a few, with his children and his wives, and brought him to the king. When he was come, Nebuchadnezzar began to "call him a wicked wretch, and a covenant-breaker, and one that knew not that he was his former words many promises to keep the country for him. He also reproached him for his ingratitude, that when he had received the kingdom from him, who had taken it from Jehoiachin, and given it him, he had not saved himself and his fortun against him that gave it; but (said he) God is great, who hateth that conduct of thine, and hath brought thee under us." And when he had used these words to him, his son and his friends to be slain, while Zedekiah and the rest of the captains looked on, after which he put out the eyes of Zedekiah, and bound him, and carried him to Babylon. And these things happened to him as Ezekiel had foretold to him, that he should be caught and carried before the king of Babylon, and should speak to him face to face; and should see his eyes with his own eyes; and thus far did Josedek know what had taken place, and brought to Babylon, but he did not see it, according to the prediction of Ezekiel.
3. We have said thus much because it was suficient to show the nature of God to such as are ignorant of it. For those of his former words many men had different ways, and that all events happen after a regular manner, in their proper season, and that it foretells what must come to pass. It is also very certain from the experiences of the reeility of men, whereby they are not permitted to foresee any thing that is future, and are, without any guard, exposed to calamities, so that it is impossible for them to avoid the experience of these things when they happen. And
4. And after this manner have the kings of David's race ended their lives, being in number twenty one up until the last king; who altogether reigned five hundred and fourteen years, and six months, and ten days; of whom Saul, who was their first king, retained the government twenty years, though he was not of the same tribe with the rest. 5. And now it is told that the king of Babylon sent to Nebuchadnezzar, the general of his army, to Jerusalem, to pillage the temple, who had it also was command to burn it, and the royal palace, and to lay the city even with the ground, and to transport all who came into Babylon to captivity, he came to Jerusalem in the eleventh year of king Zedekiah, and pillaged the temple, and carried out the vessels of God, both gold and silver, and particularly that large laver which Solomon dedicated, as also the pillars of brass, and their chapiters, with the golden tables and the candlesticks; and when he had carried these off, he set fire to the temple in the fifth month, the first day of the month, on the eleventh year of the reign of Zedekiah, and on the eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar; he also burnt the palace and overthrew the city. Now the temple was burnt four hundred and sixty years, six months, and ten days after it was built. It was then one thousand and sixty-two years, six months, and ten days from the departure out of Egypt; and from the deluge to the destruction of the temple, from the fifth month of the third sand nine hundred fifty-seven years, six months, and ten days; but from the generation of Adam until this befall the temple, there were three thousand five hundred and thirty years, six months, and ten days; so great was the number of years hereto belonging. And what actions were done during those years, we have particularly related. But the general of the Babylonian king now set the temple which Solomon had constructions, and removed all the people, and took for prisoners the high priest Seraijah, and Zephaniah the priest that was next to him, and the rulers that guarded the temple, who were three in number, and the chamberlain of the guards, and seven friends of Zedekiah, and his scribe, and six other rulers; all which, together with the vessels which they had pillaged, he brought into the land of Judah, and carried to the city of Syria. So the king commanded the heads of the high priests and of the rulers to be cut off there; but he himself led all the captives, and Zedekiah, to Babylon. He also led Josedek the high priest away with him: He was the son of Seraiah, the high priest whom the king of Babylon had slain in Riblah, a city of Syria, as we have just now related.
6. And now, because we have enumerated the succession of the kings, and who they were, and how long they reigned, I think it necessary to set down the names of the high priests, and who they were that succeeded one another in the high priesthood under the kings. The first high priest then at the temple which Solomon had constructed, was Zadoc; after him his son Achimus received that dignity; after Achimus was Azarias; his son was Joram, and Joram's son was Jesus; after him was Anthonius; his son was Scudel, and Scudel's son was Jesus, and Jesus's son was Isaias, and Isaias's son was Iotham, and Iotham's son was Urias, and Urias's son was Nerias, and Nerias's son wos Odias, and his son was Salu-son's son, and Selamaneas's son [was Azarias, and his son was Saras, and his son was Josedek, who was carried captive to Babylon. All these received the high priesthood by succession, the sons from their father.

9. When the king was come to Babylon, he kept Zedekiah in prison till he died, and buried him magnificently, and dedicated the vessels he had pillaged out of the temple of Jerusalem to his own gods, and planted the people in the country of Babylon, but freed the high priest from his bonds.

CHAP. IX.

How Nebuchadnezzar set Gedaliah over the Jews that were left in Judæa, which Gedaliah was a little afterward slain by Ishmael: and how Johham, after Ishmael was driven away went

This observation of Josephus about the seeming disagreements of Jeremias, chap. xxiii. 4, and xxiv. 3, and Ezra. xii. 13, but real agreement at last, concerning the far reached 7th authority severely constrains the historical author. So it is not at all unlikely that the seerish and false prophets might make use of this seeming contrast; but, as Josephus intimates, he was dis-mised thereby.

and laid an accusation against him, under whom he endured all sorts of tortures and torments, and was reserved to be punished; and this was the condition he was in for some time, while he suffered that I had already written about it. 4. Now in the ninth year of the reign of Zedekiah, on the tenth day of the tenth month, the king of Babylon made a second expedition against Jerusalem, and lay before it eighteen months, and on that day the king sent spotters. There came upon them also two of the greatest calamities at the same time that Jerusalem was besieged, famine and pestilential distemper, and the multitude died of famine; and through the prophet Jeremiah was in prison, he did not rest, but cried out, and proclaimed aloud, and exhorted the multitude to open their gates, and admit the king of Babylon, for that if they did so, they should be preserved, and their whole families; but if they did not so, they should be destroyed; and he foretold, that if any one stayed in the city, he should certainly perish by one of these ways, either be consumed by the famine, or slain by the enemy's sword, but that if he would fly to the enemy he should escape death: yet did not these rulers who heard believe him, even when they were in the midst of their sore distress, when they came to the king, and, in their anger, informed him what Jeremiah said, and accused him, and complained of the prophet as of a madman, and one that disheartened their minds, and by the denunciation of miseries, would alienate the minds of the people; who, were otherwise ready to expose themselves to dangers for him, and for their country, while he, in a way of threatening, warned them to fly to the enemy, and told them that the city should certainly taken, and be utterly destroyed. 5. But the king himself was not at all irritated against Jeremiah, such was his gentle and righteous disposition; yet that he might not be engaged, he quarreled with those rulers at such a time, by choosing with whom he should let them do with the prophet whatsoever they would; whereupon, when the king had granted them such a permission, they presently came into the prison and took him, and let him down with a cord into a pit full of mine, that he might be suffocated, and die of himself. So he stood up to the neck in the mine, which was all about him, and so continued; but there was of the king's agency in it, for he sent with him, an Ethiopian by descent, who told the king what a statue the prophet was in, and said, that his friends and his rulers had done evil in putting the prophet into prison; and that means contriving against him that he should suffer dishonour worse than that by his bonds only. When the king heard this, he repented of his having delivered up the prophet to the rulers, and bade the Ethiopian take thirty men of the king's guards, and cords with them, and whatsoever else they understood to be necessary for the prophet's preservation, and draw him up immediately. So the Ethiopian took the men he was ordered to take, and went to get the cords; and the mine, and left him at liberty [in the prison.] 6. But when the king had sent to call him privately, and inquired what he could say to him from God, which might be suitable to his present circumstances, and to inform him of it, Jeremiah replied, that "he had somewhat to say:" but he said vitally, he "should not be believed, nor, if he admonished them, should be heard." He added that; for he was determined to destroy me, as though I had been guilty of some wickedness: and where are now those men who deceived us, and said that the king of Babylon would not come and fight against us? I have heard it said, but I speak the truth, lest thou shouldst condemn me to die." And when the king had assured him upon oath, that he would neither himself put him to death, nor deliver him up to the rulers, he became bold upon that assurance, that was given him, and gave him this advice, that "he should deliver the city up to the Babylonians; and he said, that it was God that prophesied this by him; that (he must do so,) if he would be preserved and escape out of the danger he was in, and that then neither should the city fall to be burnt by the Babylonians; but that (if he disobeyed) he would be the cause of these miseries coming upon the citizens, and of the calamity that would befall his whole house." And when the Prophet said, that he would willingly do what he persuaded him to, and what he declared would be to his advantage but that he was afraid of those of his own country that had fallen away to the Babylonians lest he should be accused by them to the king of Babylon, and be punished. But the prophet encouraged him, and said, "He had no cause to fear such punishment, for that he should not have the experience of any misfortune, if he would deliver all up to the Babylonians, or himself, nor his children, nor his wives, and that the temple should then continue unharmed." So when Jeremiah had said this, the king let him go, and commanded the Ethiopian to convey him out of the prison to one of the citizens, nor to tell the rulers, if they should have learned that he had been sent for, what he had said to him; but to pretend to them, that he besought them not to hinder him, or he would be put into the prison." And indeed he said so to them; for they came to the prophet, and asked him, what advice it was that he came to give the king relating to them? And thus I have finished what concerns this matter.

CHAP. VIII.

How the King of Babylon took Jerusalem, and burned the Temple, and removed the People of Jerusalem and Zedekiah to Babylon. As also who they were that had succeeded in the High Priesthood under the Kings.

§ 1. Now the king of Babylon was very instant and earnest upon the siege of Jerusalem; and he erected towers upon great banks of earth, and from them repelled those that stood upon the walls: he also made a great number of such banks round about the whole city, whose height was great, and whose strength was small, that were within bore the siege with courage and alacrity, for they were not discouraged, either by the famine, or by the pestilential distemper, but were of cheerful minds in the prosecution of the war, and suffered themselves and were taken also, and they did not suffer themselves to be terrified, either by the constivances of the enemy, or by their engines of war, but contrived still different engines to oppose all the other withal, till indeed there seemed to be an entire struggle between the Babylonians and the people of Jerusalem, which had the greater rage, city and skill; the former party supposing they should have the means of enduring the siege, for they had endured for eighteen months, until they were destroyed by the famine, and by the darts which the enemy threw at them from the towers. Now the day of the fourth month, in the eleventh year of the reign of Zedekiah. They were indeed only generals of the king of Babylon, to whom Nebuchadnezzar committed the care of the siege, for he sent now to Riblah the names of these generals who ravaged and subdued Jerusalem, if any one desires to know them were these, Nergal, She Ezur, Shammash, Nisra, Ereshkigal, and Nisaba. And when the city was taken about midnight, and the enemies gathered were entered into the temple, and with Zeidkiah was seized he, his sons, and his children, and his captains, and his friends, and with them fled out of the city, through the fortified ditch, and through the desert; and when came of the deserters had in formed the Babylonians of this, at break of day they made haste to pursue after Zeidkiah, and overtook him not far from Jericho, and encompassed him about; but for those friends and captains that was with him, they turned back with him, when they saw their enemies near them, they left him, and dispersed themselves some one way and some another, and every one resolved to save himself; so the enemy took Zeidkiah alive, when he was deserted by all but a few, with his children and his wives, and brought him to the king. When he was come, Nebuchadrezzar began to "call him a wise and a countenant, and one that had forgotten his former words, when he promised to keep the country for him. He also reproached him for his ingratitude, that when he had received the kingdom from him, who had taken it from Jerusalem; for, said he, he had made use of the power he gave him against him that gave it; and (said he) God is great, who hateth that conduct of thee, and hath brought thee under his hand. And when he had used them so, he commanded the king of Babylon and his sons and his friends to be slain, while Zeidkiah and the rest of the captains looked on, after which he put out the eyes of Zeidkiah, and bound him, and carried him to Babylon. And these things happened to Zeidkiah, the twenty-fourth of the year of the captivity of Ezechiel had foretold to him, that he should be caught and brought before the king of Babylon, and should speak to him face to face; and said, see thy eyes with thy own eyes; and the king of Babylon prophesied, but he was also made blind, and brought to Babylon, but he did not see it, according to the prediction of Ezechiel.

3. We have said thus much because it was sufficiently clear to us how the nature of God is such as to make us ignorant of it, that it is various, and acts many different ways, and that all events happen under a regular manner, in their proper season, and that it foretells what must come to pass. It is also clear from the Scriptures that if men, whereby they are not permitted to foresee any thing that is future, and see, without any guard, exposed to calamities, so that it is impossible for them to avoid the experience of them. And now, after this manner the kings of David's race ended their lives, being in number twenty-one until the last king; who altogether reigned five hundred and fourteen years, and six months, and ten days; of whom Salm, who was their first king, retained the government twenty years, though he was not of the same tribe with the rest.

4. It is certain that the king of Babylon sent Nebuzarraden, the general of his army, to Jerusalem, to pillage the temple, who had it also is command to burn it, and the royal palace, and to lay the city even with the ground, and to transport people into Babylon. Supplying by magety, he came to Jerusalem in the eleventh year of king Zeidkiah, and pillaged the temple, and carried out the vessels of God, both gold and silver, and particularly that large lever which Solomon dedicated, as also the pillars of brass, and their chapiters, with the golden tables and the candlesticks; and when he had carried these off, he set fire to the temple in the fifth month, the first day of the month, on the eleventh year of the reign of Zeidkiah, and on the eighteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar; but he burnt the pa-gran and the temple of the Lord, and the palace and overthrew the city. Now the temple was burnt four hundred and seventy years, six months, and ten days after it was built. It was then one thousand and sixty-two years, six months, and ten days from the departure out of Egypt; and from the departure of the temple, the whole interval was one thousand nine hundred fifty-seven years, six months, and ten days; but from the generation of Adan until this befell the temple, there were three thousand five hundred and thirteen years, six months, and ten days; so great was the number of years hareto belonging. And what actions were done during those years, we have particularly related. But at the general of the Babylonian king now overthrew the city to the very foundations, and removed all the people, and took for prisoners the high priest Seraiah, and Zephaniah the priest that was next to him, and the re-ers that guarded the Ark, and the king's chamber, and the king's treasure, and the precious stones of the temple, and the gilding of the images of gold, which were in the temple; and the vases, and the altars, and the vessels that were in the temple; and the ends of the temple and the roof, and the whole building of the temple, the whole temple was burnt.

5. And now, because we have enumerated the succession of the kings, and who they were, and how long they reigned, I think it necessary to set down the names of the high priests, and who they were that succeeded one another in the high-priesthood under the kings. The first high priest then at the temple which Solomon built, was Zadok; after him his son Achimnas received that dignity; after Achimnas was Azarias; his son was Joram, and Joram's son was Jexas; after him was Ahianor; his son was Azarias, and his son was Suda, and Suda's son was Juseus, and Juseus's son was Jotham, and Jotham's son was Urias, and Urias's son was Neria, and Neria's son was Odos, and Odos's son was Salumcr, and Salu'mcr's son was Elias, and Elias [was Azarias, and his son's was Saras, and his son was Joscnd, who was carried captive to Babylon. All these received the high priesthood by succession, the sons from their father.

6. When the king was come to Babylon, he kept Zeidkiah in prison till he died, and buried him magnificently, and dedicated the vessels he had pillaged out of the temple of Jerusalem to his own gods, and put the body of Zeidkiah, king of Babylon, but freed the high priest from his bonds.

CHAP. IX.

How Nebuzarraden set Gedeliah over the Jews that were left in Judea, which Gedeliah was a little afterward slain by Ishmael; and how Jo-

ham, after Ishmael was driven away went
and laid an accusation against him, under whom he endured all sorts of tortures and tortures, and was reserved to be punished; and this was the condition he was in for some time, while he suffered that I have already described so minutely.

4. Now in the ninth year of the reign of Zedekiah, on the tenth day of the tenth month, the king of Babylon made a second expedition against Jerusalem. But he lay before it eighteen months, and the city besieged it with the utmost severity. There came upon them also two of the greatest calamities at the same time that Jerusalem was besieged, a famine and pestilential distemper, and the king and all the people of the land, and thus he said, that it was God that prophesied this by him, that (he must do so) if he would be preserved and escape out of the danger he was in, and that then neither he nor the temple should be burned; but that (if he disobeyed) he would be the cause of these miseries coming upon the citizens, and of the calamity that would befall his whole house.

5. When Jeremiah had said this, they took him to the king, and in his anger informed him what Jeremiah said, and accused him, and explained to the prophet as a madman, and one that disheartened their minds, and by the denunciation of miseries, warned him of the vengeance of the multitude, who were otherwise ready to expose themselves to dangers for him, and for their country, while he, in a state of threatening, warned them to fly to the hills, and told them that the city should certainly be taken, and was utterly destroyed.

6. But the king himself was not at all irritated against Jeremiah, such was his gentle and righteous disposition; yet that he might not be engrossed with those cares at such a time, by opposing what they intended, he let them do with the prophet whatsoever they would: whereupon, when the king had granted them such a permission, they presently came into the prison and took him, and let him down with a cord into a pit full of mire, that he might be suffocated, and die of himself. were those, Nergal, Shararzer, Samsar, Nebu, Nabu, Nabu, and Bane. And when the city was taken about midnight, and the enemies' generals were entered into the temple, and when Zedekiah was sensible of it, he took his wife, and his children, and his captains, and his friends, and with them fled out of the city through the fortified ditch, and through the desert; and when certain of the deserters had informed the Babylonians of this, at break of day they made haste to pursue after Zedekiah, and overtook him not, nor passed him about; but for these friends and captains of Zedekiah who had fled out of the city with him, when they saw their enemies near them, some one way and some another, and every one resolved to save himself; so the enemy took Zedekiah alive, when he was deserted by all but a few, with his children and his wives, and brought him to the king. When he was come, Nebuchadnezzar began to "call him a wicked wretch, and a covenant-breaker, and one that had forgotten his former words, when he promised to keep the country for him. He answered, saying, I will not speak with thee; but he was made use of the power he gave him, and with such sharpness as not to be able to answer it; but he was a great, who hated that command of thine, and hath brought thee under us." And when he had used these words to Zedekiah, he commanded his sons and his friends to be slain, while Zedekiah and the captains took up on, after which he put the eyes of Zedekiah, and bound him, and carried him to Babylon. And these things happened to him, as Jeremiah and Ezekiel had foretold to him, that he should be carried to Babylon through all the captivity, and should speak to him face to face; and should see his eyes with his own eyes; and thus far did Jeremiah prophesy; but he was also made blind, and brought to Babylon, but he did not see it, according to his own forebodings.

3. We have said thus much because it was sufficient to show the nature of God to such as are ignorant of it, that it is various, and acts in many different ways, and so that he is a king, a conqueror, in their proper sense, and that it foretells what must come to pass. It is also sufficient to show the ignorance and incredulity of men, whereby they are not permitted to form a high opinion of the power and majesty of God, as a secure guard, exposed to calamities, so that it is impossible for them to avoid the experience of those calamities.

4. And after this manner the kings of David's race ended their lives, being in number twenty one until the last king; who altogether reigned five hundred and fourteen years, and six months, and ten days; of whom Saul, who was their first king, retained the government twenty years, though he was not of the same tribe with the rest.

5. And now it was the king of Babylon sent Nebuzaradan, the general of his army, to Jerusalem, to pillage the people, who had it also in command to burn it, and the royal palace, and to lay the city even with the ground, and to transport the people into Babylonia. Accordingly, he came to Jerusalem in the eleventh year of Zedekiah, and burned down his palace and his house, and carried away the vessels of God, both gold and silver, and particularly that large laver which Solomon dedicated, as also the pillars of brass and their chapiters, with the golden tables and the candlesticks; and when he had carried these off, he set fire to the temple in the fifth month, the first day of the month, on the eleventh year of the reign of Zedekiah, and on the eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar; he also burnt the palace and overthrew the city. Now the temple was burnt four hundred and seventy years, six months, and ten days after it was built. It was then overthrown; and then one hundred and ten months, and ten days from the departure out of Egypt; and from the deluge to the destruction of the temple, the whole interval was one thousand nine hundred and fifty seven years and ten days; but from the generation of Adam until this befell the temple, there were three thousand five hundred and thirteen years, six months, and ten days; so great was the number of years hirerto belonging. And what actions were done during these years, we have particularly related. But the general of the Babylonians then overthrew the city to the very foundations, and removed all the people, and took for prisoners the head of prisoners, and brought away all the priests that was next to him, and the rulers that guarded the temple, who were three in number, and the eunuch who was over the armed men, and seven friends of Zedekiah, and his maid, and his prophet, and six other ministers; all which vessels with the vessels which they had pillaged, he carried to the king of Babylon to Riblah, a city of Syria. So the king commanded the heads of the priests and of the king's officers to be carried thither, but he himself led all the captives, and Zedekiah, to Babylon. He also led Jochedek the high priest away bound. He was the son of Seraiah, the high priest whom the king of Babylon had slain in Babylonia, a city of Syria, as we have just now related.

6. And now, because we have enumerated the succession of the kings, and who they were, and how long they reigned, I think it necessary to set down the names of the high priests, and those they were that succeeded one another in the high priesthood under the kings. The first high priest then at the temple which Solomon built, was Zadok; after him his son Achimeas received that dignity; after Achimeas his son, Azariah; after Azariah his son, Zadok; after Zadok his son, Josiah; after Josiah his son, Zephaniah; after Zephaniah his son, Urias; after Urias his son, Josiah; after Josiah his son, Zedekiah; after Zedekiah his son, Jairus, and Jairus's son was Zedekiah; after Zedekiah his son, Jehoiakim; and Jehoiakim's son was Jehoiachin, and Jehoiachin's son was Zedekiah; after Zedekiah, his son, Urias, and Urias's son was Nerias, and Nerias's son was Oded, and his son was Salum, and Salum's son was Elia, and his son [was Azarias, and his son] was Seraeas, and his son was Joseph, who was carried captive to Babylon. All these received the high priesthood by succession, the sons from their father.

7. When the king was come to Babylon, he kept Zedekiah in prison till he died, and buried him magnificently, and conducted his vessels he had pillaged out of the temple of Jerusalem to his own gods, and planted the people in the country of Babylon, but freed the high priest from his bonds.

† have been inserted in brackets this high priest Azariah, though he is omitted in all Josephus, in the Jewish chronicle, Seder Olam, of how little authority soever I generally esteem such late rabbi traditions; these are not what I believe, as to that which I have myself, that the number of the high priests belonging to this interval was eighteen, Andes. down into Egypt with the People, which People, Nebuchadnezzar, when he made an Expedition against the Egyptians, took captive, and brought them away to Babylon.

1. Now the general of the army, Nebuzaradan, when he had carried the people of the Jews into captivity, left the poor, and those that had deserted, in the country, and made one, whose name was Ishmael, the son of Nemaniah, a son of a noble family, their governor: which Gedaliah was of a gentle and righteous disposition. He also commanded them that they should cultivate the ground, and pay an appointed tribute to the king. He also took Jeremiah the visionaries out of prison, and would have persuaded him to go along with him to Babylon, for that he had been enjoined by the king to supply him with whatsoever he wanted: and if he did not like to do so, he desired him to inform him where he resol

2. When Nebuzaradan had done thus, he made haste to Babylon: but as to those that fled away during the siege of Jerusalem, and had been scattered among the other countries, and as the Babylonians were gone away, and had left a remnant in the hand of Jerusalem, and those such as were to cultivate the same, they came together from all parts to Gedaliah in Mizpah, as also the rulers that were over them were Jehonathan, the son of Kareah, and Jazeniah, and Sarashia, and others beside them. Now there was of the royal family one Ishmael, a wicked man, and very treacherous, who being entertained by Jeremias, the son of Neryahah, the son of Brain, the captain of the guard, and of his countrey Jerusalem, fled to Baslie, the king of the Ammonites, and abode with him during that time: and Gedaliah persuaded them, now they were there, to stay with him, and to have no fear of the Babylonians, for it was not for anything to kill them; but he advised them to suffer no harm. This he assured them of by oath: and said that they should have him for their patron, and that if any disturbance should arise, they should find him ready to defend them. He also advised them to dwell in any city, as every one of them pleased; and that they would send men along with his own servants, and rebuild their houses upon the old foundations, and dwell there, and be admonished them beforehand, that they should make preparation, while the seasons lasted, of corn, and wine, and oil, that they might have wherewith to feed during the winter. When he had thus discoursed to them he came again, and put to the king, from Ishmael, and overtook him at the fountain in Hebron, and when those that were carried away captives by Ishmael, saw Jehonathan and the rulers, they were very glad, and looked upon them as coming from him; and they carried them captives, and came over to Jo

3. Now when this report was spread abroad as far as the nations that bordered on Judea, that Gedaliah kindly entertained those that came to him, and gave them a place away from the common condition, that they should pay tribute to the king of Babylon, they also came readily to Gedaliah, and inhabited the country. And when Jehonathan and the rulers that with him out served the country, and the humanity of Gedaliah, they were exceedingly in love with him, and told him that Baslie, the king of the Ammon

4. So Jehonathan, and the rulers that were with him, not being able to persuade Gedaliah, went away into the land of the Philistines, through fear, and the king had him put in prison, and Judah also, of the many that were with him, was put to death, and his sons and servants were put to death with him, and he was put to death in Jerusalem, and his house. Gedaliah, and all of them that were with him, were put to death, and Gedaliah also, and all of them that were with him, were put to death in Jerusalem, and his house.

5. But when Jehonathan and the rulers with him heard of what was done at Misaph by Ishmael, and of the death of Gedaliah, they had indignation at it, and every one of them took his own arms, and came to Gedaliah, and carried them captives, and came over to Jo and determined to remove from thence, and go into Egypt, out of fear lest the Babylonians should attack against them, they continued in the country, and that out of sorrow at the slaughter of Gedaliah, who had been by them set over it for governor.

6. Now while they were under this deliberation, Jehovah, the son of Kezron, who had been with them, came to Jeremiah the prophet, and desired that he would pray to God, that because they were at an utter loss about what they ought to do, he would discover it to them, and that because they thought that they would be with them while they continued in that country, and take care of them, and keep them from being hurt by the Babylonians, on whom they were agreed; but that he would desert them, if they went into Egypt, and, out of his wrath against them, would inflict the same punishments upon them which they knew their brethren had already endured. So when the prophet heard this, he was inclined to think that God had foretold these things, he was not believed, when he said that God commanded them to continue in that country, but they imagined that he said so to gratify Baruch, his own disciple; for he of all others was most excellent in that respect, and was inclined to stay there, that they might be destroyed by the Babylonians. Accordingly, both the people and Jehovah disobeyed the counsel of God, which he gave them by the prophet, and removed to Egypt, but Baruch remained with Jeremiah and Baruch among them.

7. And when they were there, God signified to the prophet, that the king of Babylon was about to make an expedition against the Egyptians, and commanded him to foretell to them, that Egypt should be taken, and the king of Babylon should slay some of them, and should take others captive, and bring them to Babylon; which things came to pass, because, five years after the destruction of Jerusalem, which was the twenty-third of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, he made an expedition against Caraeusiris, and when he had possessed himself of it, he made it his capital, but when he had brought all those nations under subjection, he fell upon Egypt, in order to overthrow it; and he slew the king that then reigned, and set up another; and he took those Jews that were in Egypt, and brought them to Babylon. And such was the end of the nation of the Hebrews, as it hath been delivered down to us, it having twice gone beyond Egypt: for the people of the ten tribes were carried out of Samaria by the Assyrians, in the days of king Hoshea, after which the people of the two tribes, that remained after Jerusalem was taken, were carried away by Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, and men of other nations; and when he had removed the Israelites out of their country, and placed therein the nation of the Cuthians, who had formerly belonged to the inner parts of Persia and Media, but were then called Scaramiels, by taking the name of the country to which they were removed; but the king of Babylon, who brought out the two tribes, placed no other nation in their country, by which means all Judea and Jerusalem, and the temple, and continued to be a desert for seventy years: but the entire interval of time which passed from the captivity of the Israelites, to the carrying away of the two tribes, proved to be a hundred and thirty years, six months, and ten days.

CHAP. X.

§ 1. But now Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon took some of the most noble of the Jews that were children, and the kinsmen of Zedekiah, their king, and sent letters, ordering them out of what way they should come, and to meet the king of Babylon, and to bring their sons and daughter of their bodies, and the comeliness of their countenances, and delivered them into the hands of tutors, and to the improvement to be made by them. He also made some of them to be eunuchs, which course he took also with those of other nations, whom he had taken in the flower of their age, and afforded them their diet from his own table, and had them instructed in the institutes of the people of the land of Babylon, and their language and deserts; and they had now exercised themselves sufficiently in that wisdom which he had ordered they should apply themselves to. Now among these there were four of the family of Zedekiah, called Daniel, and his companions, Shadrach, Meshach, and Azariah, but they called Daniel, another was called Ananias, another Mishael, and the fourth Azariah: and the king of Babylon changed their names, and commanded that they should make use of other names; Daniel he called Belteshazzar, and his companions, Meshach, Mishael, and Azariah, and made them different among the king's understanding.

§ 2. Now Daniel and his kinsmen had resolved to use a severe diet, and to abstain from those kinds of food which came from the king's table, and entirely to forbear to eat of all living creatures: so he came to Ashpenaz, who was that eunuch to whom the care of them was committed; and desired him to take and spend what was brought for them from the king, but to give them their diet, and to mark their face, and to know what became to them, and what was their condition, and what was the king's will to them, and what would be discovered by the king, from their messenger, and the alteration of their countenances, because it could not be avoided but their bodies and colors must be changed with their diet, especially while they would be clearly discovered by the finer appearance of the other children, who would fare better, and thus they should bring him in danger, and occasion him to be punished: yet did God in all things preserve them, and thus fear, to give them what food they desired for ten days, by way of trial, and in case the habit of their bodies were not altered, to go on in the same way, as expecting that they should not be hurt thereby afterward, but if he saw them

* Herodotus says, the king of Egypt, [Pharaoh Hophra, or Apries] was slain by the Egyptians, as Jeremiah foretold his slaughter by his enemies, Jer. xii. 39, 36, and 2 Macc. xii. 13, 14; [That Daniel was not one of those captives, which Isaiah prophesied, Isa. xlix. 7, and the three children his companions also, seems to me plain, both in Josephus, and in our commentary, Dan. i. 3, 6, 7—11, 18; although it must be granted, that five married persons, that had children, were sometimes called eunuchs, in a general conception for courtesans, on account that so many of the ancient countries were sensual eunuchs. look meager and worse than the rest, he should reduce them to their former diet. Now, when it appeared to those that knew the business worse by the use of this food, that they grew plumper and fuller in body than the rest, insomuch that he thought those who fed on what came from the king's table, seemed less plump and full, while those that were with Daniel looked as if they had lived in plenty, and all sorts of luxury; Ariocho, from that time, securely took himself what the king sent every day from his supper, according to custom, to the children, but gave it to Daniel; for Darius did wish the eight men that had their souls in some measure more pure, and less burdened, and so fitter for learning, and had their bodies in better tune for hard labor, for they neither had the former oppression and burden of most meats, nor were they in the other eminence on the same account; so they readily understood all the learning that was among the Hebrews, and among the Chaldeans, as especially did Daniel, who before already was greatly skill'd in wisdom, was very busy about the interpretation of dreams; and God manifested himself to him.

3. Now, two years after the destruction of Egypt, the king Nebuchadnezzar saw a wonderful dream, the accomplishment of which God showed him in his sleep, but when he awoke out of his bed, he forgot the accomplishment: so he sent for the Chaldeans, and magicians, and the philosophers; and informed them that he had forgotten the accomplishment of what he had seen, and he enjoined them to tell him, both what the dream was, and what its significations were. And they said that this was a thing impossible to be discovered by men, but they promised him, that if he would explain to them what dream he had seen, they would tell him its significations. Hereupon he commanded them to tell it, unless they told him his dream: and he gave command to have them all put to death, since they confessed they could not do what they were commanded to do. Now when Daniel heard that the king had given a command, that all the wise men should be put to death, and that among them himself and his three kinsmen were in danger, he went to Ariocho, who was captain of the king's guards, and showed him what had happened to him what his reasons were why the king had given command that all the wise men, and Chaldeans, and magicians, should be slain. So when he had learned that the king had had a dream, and had forgotten it, and that when he sent for the Chaldeans to inform the king of their dream, they had said they could not do it, and had thereby provoked him to anger; he desired of Ariocho that he would go in to the king, and desire respite for the magicians for one night, in order that he might within that time to obtain, by prayer to God, the knowledge of the dream. Accordingly, Ariocho informed the king of what Daniel desired; so the king beseeched them delay the slaughter of the magicians, until he should hear what Daniel would come to: but the young man retired to his own house, with his kinsmen, and besought God that while night to discover the dream, and thereby deliver the magicians and Chaldeans, with whom they were themselves to perish, from the king's anger, by enabling him to declare his vision, and to make manifest what the king had seen the night before in his sleep, but had forgotten. God did signify to him to those that were in danger, and out of regard to the wisdom of Daniel, made known to him the dream and its interpretation, that so the king might understand by him its significations also. When Daniel had obtained this knowledge from God, he arose very joyful, and told it to his brethren, and made them glad, and to hope well, that they should now preserve their lives, of which they despaired before, and had their minds full of sorrow and distress, because they were not wise enough to discover the dream, he was undertaking to inform them of it for this was not by his own skill, or on account of his having better cultivated his understanding than the rest, but he said, "God hath had pity on me, and did not thereby add to that which I had, but he had with them returned thanks to God who had commiserated their youth, when it was day he came to Ariocho, and desired him to bring him to the king, because he would discover to him that dream which he had had the night before in his sleep.

4. When Daniel was come in to the king, he excused himself at first, that he did not pretend to be wiser than the other Chaldeans and magicians when they had the counsel of the king to discover the dream, he was undertaking to inform him of it for this was not by his own skill, or on account of his having better cultivated his understanding than the rest, but he said, "God hath had pity on me, and did not thereby add to that which I had, but he had with them returned thanks to God who had commiserated their youth, when it was day he came to Ariocho, and desired him to bring him to the king, because he would discover to him that dream which he had had the night before in his sleep.

5. When Nebuchadnezzar heard this, and read of the Jews, take the words of Horace, book 2. 4. "No is able to be wondered at, that he would not now meddle with things future, for he has no reason to provoke the Romans, by speaking of the destruction of that city, which they called the eternal city."
collected his dream, he was astonished at the nature of Daniel, and fell upon his face, and sat down and was taken with a great sorrow of mind. [Balsas,] and made him and his kinman rulers of the whole kingdom; which kinman of his happened to fall into great danger by the envy and malice of [their enemies]; for they offended the king upon the occasion following: he made a great image of gold that was sixty cubits, and his breadth was twelve, and he set it in the great plain of Babylon; and when he was going to dedicate the image, he invited the principal men out of all the earth that was under his dominion, and commanded them in the first place, that when they should hear the sound of the trumpet, they should then fall down and worship the image; and he threatened that those who did not so, should be cast into a fiery furnace. When, therefore, all the rest, upon the hearing of the sound of the trumpet, worshipped the image, they relented that Daniel's kinman did not do it, because they would not transgress the laws of their country; so these men were carried away captive by the image, but were saved by divine Providence, and after a surprising manner escaped death, for the fire did not touch them; and I suppose that it touched them not only on account of their piety, but that they were cast into it without any fault of theirs, and that therefore it was too weak to burn the young men when they were in it. This was done by the power of God, who made their bodies so far more valuable than that of gold, that it could not consume them. This it was which recommended them to the king as righteous men, and men beloved of God, on which account they continued in great esteem with him.

e. a. and did dream in his sleep again another vision; how he should fall from his dominion, and feed among the wild beasts, and that when he had lived in this manner in the desert for seven years, he should recover his dominion as in times past. And the king, in his sleep, upon the calling the magicians together again, and inquiring of them about it, and desired them to tell him what it signified; but when none of them could interpret it, he was angry, and desired the magicians to bring it to the king. Daniel was the only person that explained it: and as he foretold, so it came to pass; for after he had continued in the wilderness the forementioned interval of time, while he was in the desert, and amongst the wild beasts, seven years, he was restored to his kingdom, and he returned to it. But let no one blame me for writing down every thing of this nature, as I find it in our ancient books; for as to that matter, I have plainly assured those that think me defective in any such point, or complain of my management, and have told them in the beginning of this history that I intend to do no more than to translate the Hebrew books into the Greek language, and promised them to explain those facts, without adding anything to them of my own, or taking any thing away from them.

CHAP. XI
Concerning Nebuchadnezzar and his Successors; and how their Government was dissolved by the Persians; and what things befell Daniel in Media, and what Prophecies he delivered there.

1. Now, when Nebuchadnezzar had reigned forty-three years, he ended his life. He was an excessive man, and more magico than any others that were before him. Now Berosus makes mention of his actions in the third book of his Chaldaic history, where he says thus: "When his father, Nebuchadnezzar, [Nabopolassar,] heard that the governor whom he had sent over Egypt and the places about the Euphrates and Phenicia, had revolted from him, while he was not himself able any longer to undergo the hardships of war, he committed to his son Nebuchadnezzar, and gave him over to the governance of the whole kingdom, and made it a branch of his own kingdom; but about that time it happened, that his father Nebuchadnezzar [Nabopolassar] fell ill, and ended his life in the city of Babylon, when he had reigned twenty-one years. His father had made him even as he was in a little time, that his father Nebuchadnezzar [Nabopolassar] was dead, and having settled the affairs of Egypt, and the other countries, as also those that concerned the captive Jews, and of the provinces, and the kingdom of the Egyptian nations, and having committed the conveyance of them to Babylon to certain of his friends, together with the gros of his army, and the rest of their asemanation and provisions, he left them to the care of the Persians, with a few others, over the desert, and came to Babylon. So he took upon him the management of public affairs, and of the kingdom which had been kept from him. He had the government of the Chaldeans, and he received the entire dominions of his father, and appointed, that when the captives came, they should be placed as colonists, in the most proper places of Babylonia; but the Persians received them gently, and received them with the rest of the temples, in a magnificent manner, with the spoils he had taken in war. He also added another city to that which was there of old, and rebuilt it, that such as would besiege it hereafter might no more swim through the course of the river, and thereby attack the city markable, both in sacred and profane authors, that such a faculty of eighty years at the least, at the latter end of his reign, must be allowed to agree very well with Daniel's account, that after a seven years' brutal life he might return to his reason, and to the exercise of his authority, in a pernicious and most unjust manner. Moreover, the same events also confirm this captivity of the Jews under Nebuchadnezzar; and adds, what is very remarkable in the history, that one of those Jews that were carried away captive put away into Armenia, and raised the great family of the Bagraditians there.

These 31st, 32nd, 33rd years were named Nabopolassar in the first book against Apion, or to Nabopolassar, the father of the great Nebuchadnezzar, are also given the very same number of years. And not to mention many other things; Nebuchadnezzar himself, is a groundless mistake of some modern chronologers only, and destitute of all proper original authority ANTIOCHIES OF THE JEWS.

He therefore built three walls round about the inner city, and three others about that which was the outer, and this he did with burnt brick. And after he had, after a becoming manner, walled the city, and adorned its gates gloriously, he built another palace before his father's palace, but so that it was joined to it; to describe whose vast height, and immense riches, it would perhaps be too much for me to attempt; yet as large and lofty as they were, they were complete. He also erected eleventh places for walking, of stone, and made it resemble mountains, and built it so that it might be planted with all sorts of trees. He also erected what was called a pleasant paradise, because his wife was not content to have the beautiful Medes with herself, she having been bred up in the palaces of Media. Megasthenes also, in the fourth book of his accounts of India, makes mention of these things, and thereby endeavors to show that this king [Nebuchadnezzar] exceeded Hercules in fortitude, and in the greatness of his actions; for he saith, that "he conquered a great part of Libya and Iberia." Besides also in the second book of his accounts of Persia, he mentions this king; as does Philostratus, in his accounts both of India and of Phoenicia, say, that "this king besieged Tyre thirteen years, while at the same time Ethbaal reigned at Tyre. These are all the particulars that I have met with concerning this king.

2. But now, after the death of Nebuchadnezzar, Evil-Merodach, his son, succeeded in the kingdom, who immediately set Jehoiachin at liberty, and made him one of his most intimate friends: he also gave him many presents, and made him honorable above the rest of the kings that were in Babylon; for his father had not known his faith with Jehoiachin, when he voluntarily delivered up himself to him, with his wives and children, and his whole kindred, for the sake of his country, that it might not be taken by siege, and utterly destroyed, as we said before. When this was decreed, after a reign of eighteen years, Niggissar, his son, took the government, and reigned forty years, and then ended his life: and after him the succession in the kingdom came to his son Labosorncius, who continued in his kingdom for many years, and then he was dead it came to Beltsrzr, by who, the Babylonians, was called Nebunadelius; against him did Cyrus, the king of Persia, and Darius, the son of Hystaspes, make war; and when he was besieged in Babylon, there happened a wonderful and prodigious vision. He was sat down at supper in a large room, and there were a great many vessels of silver, such as were made for royal entertainments, and he had with him his concubines, and his friends; whereupon he came to a resolution, and commanded that those vessels of gold which Nebuchadnezzar had plundered out of Jerusalem, and had not made use of, but had put them into his own temple, should be brought out of that temple. He also grew so hungry as to proceed to use them in the midst of his cups, drinking out of, and blasphemying against God. In the mean time, he saw a hand proceed out of the wall, and writing upon the wall certain syllables; at which sight being disturbed, he called the magicians and Chaldeans together, and all sort of men that are among these Barbarians, and were able to interpret signs and dreams, that they might explain the writing. But he remembered that he could discover nothing, nor did understand it, the king was in great disorder of mind, and under great trouble at this surprising accident; so he caused it to be proclaimed through all the countries to which he had reigned, to try to explain the writing, and give the signification thereof, he would give him a golden chain for his neck, and leave to wear a purple robe. As thus he did not do, but ordered that it should be written down, and answered such questions to Nebuchadnezzar as no one else was able to answer when they were consulted. She therefore desired that he would send him, and inquire of him concerning the writing, and to condemn the unskillfulness of those who could not find their meaning, and this, although what God signified thereby should be of a melancholy nature.

5. When he had heard this, he called for Daniel; and when he had dissuaded to him what he had learned concerning him and his wisdom, and how a Divine Spirit was with him; and that he alone was fully capable of finding out what this writing signified, he made Daniel one of his councilors, and commanded him to declare to him what this writing meant: that if he did so, he would give him leave to wear purple, and to put a chain of gold about his neck; and that he should be one of his officers in his dominion, as an honorary reward for his wisdom, that thereby he might become illustrious to those who saw him, and who inquired upon what occasion he obtained such honors. But Daniel desired that he would keep his gifts to himself: for what is the effect of wisdom and of divine revelation, admits of no gifts, and bestows its advantages on petitioners freely, but that still he would explain the writing to him; which denoted that he should soon die, and because he had for both the place of this king in that canon, as the last of those who have lived by the grace of years of his reign, seventeen, the same in both, demonstrates that it is one and the same king that is meant in the two canons: and that Josephus is well informed when he says that Darius, the partner of Cyrus, was the son of Assy-nges, and was called by another name among the Greeks; though it does not appear he knew what that name was, we having never seen the best history of this period, which is Xenophon's. But then what Josephine's precendent copies say presently, sect. 4, that it was only illusion, which was his prince and partner and successor; and that Beltsrzr was slain, does not so well agree with our copies of Daniel, which say it was the same night, Dan

* These fifteen days for finishing such vast buildings as Babylon's walls, was Judah's copy of times, would seem too absurd to be supposed to be the true number, were it not for the same testimony extant also in the first book against Apion, sect. 34, vol. iv., with the same number.

† It is here remarkable, that Josephus, without the knowledge of Daniel's canon, should call the same king, whom he himself here, Bar. i. 11, and Dan. v. 1, 3, 9, 19, 22, 29, 30, styles Beltsrzr or Belzaknazar, from the Babylonian, and Beltsrzr, from the Persian; but in the first book against Apion, sect. 34, from the same citation out of Heron, Nabonhanez, from the Babylonian and Persia and Apollon and royal entertainments, and he hath with him his concubines, and his friends; whereupon he came to a resolution, and commanded that those vessels of gold which Nebuchadnezzar had plundered out of Jerusalem, and had not made use of, but had put them into his own temple, should be brought out of that temple. not learnt to honor God, and not to admit things above human nature, by what punishment his progenitor had undergone, for the injuries he had offered to God; and because he had quite forgotten how Nebuchadnezzar was removed to feed among wild beasts, for his impiousness, and did not recover his former life among men, and his kingdom, but upon God's mercy to him, after many supplications and prayers, who did thereupon provide God all the days of his life, as one of his princes and governors; he was made to know him, and declared by his striking beforehand, when and conclusion of life he should come to. And he explained the writing thus; - MANASEH. This, if it be expounded in the Greek language, signifies a Weight, and means that God hath weighed thy kingdom in a balance, and found it wanting, but the prince and governor, and also, in the Greek tongue, denotes a Fragment; God will therefore break thy kingdom in pieces, and divide it among the Medes and Persians.

4. When Daniel had told the king that the weights and measures of gold and silver of Babylon,Seleucia, and Halicarnassus, were in great sorrow and affliction, as was to be expected, when the interpretation was so heavy upon him. However, he did not refuse what he had promised Daniel, although he was never found in a former or in any other case to bestow all upon him as reasonings thus, that what he was to reward was peculiar to himself, and to fate, and did not belong to the prophet; but that with a sign of grace and of mercy, he might persuade him to give what he had promised, although the events were of a melancholy nature. Accordingly, the king determined so to do. Now after a little while, both himself and the city were taken by Cyrus, the king of Persia, who fought against him; for it was Balthasar under whom Babylon was taken, when he had reigned seventeen years. And this is the end of the posterity of king Nebuchadnezzar, as history informs us; but when Balthasar and his kinsman Cyrus, had put an end to the dominion of the Babylonians, he was sixty-two years old. He was the son of Asyragus, and had another name among the Persians, but that name he took from Daniel the prophet, and carried him with him into Media, and honored him very greatly, and kept him with him; for he was one of the three presidents whom he set over his three hundred and sixty provinces, for into so many did Darius part them.

5. However, while Daniel was in so great a dignity, and in so great favor with Darius, and was above intrusted with every thing by him, as having somewhat divinity in him, he was envied by the rest; for those that see others in greater honor than themselves with kings, envy them: and when those that were grievances at the great favor Daniel was in with Darius, sought for an occasion to bring him to punishment, or execution at all, for as he was above all the temptations of money, and despised bribery, and esteemed it a very base thing to take any thing by way of reward; even when it might be justly given to him, he despised those that offered it, and was the least handle for an accusation. So when they could find nothing for which they might calumniate him to the king; nothing that was shameful or reproofful, and thereby deprive him of the honor he was in with him, they sought for some other method whereby they might destroy him. When therefore they saw that Daniel prayed to God three times a day, they thought they had gotten an occasion by which they might ruin him; so they came to Darius, and told him, that "the princes and governors had thought proper to allow the multitude a relaxation for thirty days, that no one might offer a petition or prayer either to himself, or to the gods, but that he who should transgress this decree shall be cast into the den of lions, and there perish."

6. Whereupon the king, being not acquainted with their wicked design, nor suspecting that it was a contrivance of the princes against Daniel, but he was pleased with this decree of theirs, and he promised to confirm what they desired: he also published an edict to promulgate to the people that decree which the princes had made. Accordingly all the rest took care not to transgress those injunctions, and rested in quiet; but Daniel had no regard to them, but, as he was wont, he stood and prayed to God in the sight of them all; but the princes were very much distressed at this, for they so earnestly sought to find against Daniel, came presently to the king, and accused him, that Daniel was the only person that transgressed the decree, while not one of the rest would do so; this, however, was not on account of his impiety, but because they had watched him, and observed him out of envy: for supposing that Daniel did thus out of a greater kindness to him than they expected, and that he was ready to get up and come on the same day, in contempt of his injunctions, and enring this very pardon to Daniel, they did not become very favorable to him, but desired he might be cast into the den of lions, according to the law. So Darius, being assured that God would deliver him, and that he would undergo nothing that was terrible by the wild beasts, bade him hear this accident cheerfully: and when he was cast into the den, he put his seal to the stone that lay upon the mouth of the den, and went his way; but he passed all the night without food, and without sleep, being in great distress for Daniel. But when it was day, he got up, and came to the den, and found the seal entire, with the guard at the mouth; he opened the stone with his hand; he opened the seal, and cried out, and called to Daniel, and asked him, If he were alive? And as soon as he heard the king's voice, Daniel made answer: and the king commanded his servants to take Daniel out of the den. So Darius gave order that he should be drawn up out of the den. Now when his enemies saw that Daniel had suffered nothing which was terrible, they would not own that he was preserved by God, and by his providence; but they said, that the lions had been filled full with food, and on that account it was, as they supposed, that the lions would not touch Daniel, nor come to him; and this they alleged to the king: but the king, out of an abhorrence of their wickedness, gave order that they should throw in a great deal of flesh to the lions; and when they had filled themselves, he gave further order that Daniel's enemies should be cast into the den, that he might learn whether the last thing now, he would come to touch them or not. And it appeared plain to Darius, after the princes had been cast to the wild beasts, that it was God who preserved Daniel, for the lions seized none of them, all to pieces, as if they had been very hungry, and wanted food. I suppose therefore it was not their hunger, which had been a little before satisfied with abundance of flesh, but the wicked edness of these men, that provoked them [to destroy the princes]; for if it please God, that wickedness might, even by those irrational creatures, be somewhat esteemed a plain foundation for their punishment.

7. When, therefore, those that had intended thus to destroy Daniel by treachery, were thereof convinced, and saw how illustrious and famous, on account of the opinion men had that he was beloved of God, he built a tower at Eschatana in Media: it was a most elegant building, and wonderfully made, and it is still remaining, and preserved to this day; and to such as see it, it appears to have been lately built, and to have been no older than that very day; when any one looks upon it, it is so fresh, flourishing, and beautiful, and no way grown old in so long a time: so for buildings suffer the same as men do, they grow old as well as they, and by numbers of years their strength is dissolved, and their beauty withered. Now they built this tower in Media, of Persia, and Parthia, in this tower to this day; and he who was intrusted with the care of it, was a Jewish priest; which thing is also observed to this day: but it is fit to give an account of what this man did, while he was alive, and the admixture of glory for he was so happy as to have strange revelations made to him, and those as to one of the greatest of the prophets, insomuch, that while he was alive he had the esteem and applause both of the kings and of the people, and now he is dead, he retains a remembrance that will never fail, for the several books that he wrote and left behind him are still read by us till this time, and from them we believe that Daniel conversed with God; for he did not publish the things he procured, and the other prophets, he but also determined the time of their accomplishment: and while prophets used to foretell misfortunes, and on that account were disagreeable both to the kings and to the multitude, Daniel was to them a prophet of good things, and this to such a degree, that by the agreeable nature of his predictions, he procured the good-will of all men, and by the accomplishment he procured the belief of their truth, and the opinion of a sort of divinity for himself, among the multitude. He also wrote and left behind him what made manifest the accuracy and undeniable veracity of his predictions, that "when it was in Susa, the metropolis of Persia, and went out into the field with his companions, there was, on the sudden, a motion and concussion of the earth, and that he was left alone by himself, his friends flying away from him; and that his eyes were purified, and fell on his face, and on his two hands, and that a certain person touched him, and at the same time, bade him rise and see what would befall his countrymen after many generations. He also related, that when he stood up, he was shown a great ram, with many horns growing out of his head, and that the last was higher than the rest; that after this he looked to the west, and saw in the air one that was above that quarter, that he rushed upon the ram with violence, and smote him twice with his horns, and overthrew him to the ground, and trampled upon him; that afterward he saw a very great horn growing out of the head of the he-goat, and that when it was broken off, four horns grew up that were exposed to each of the four winds, and he wrote that out of them arose another lesser horn, which, as he said, waxed great; and that God showed to him, that it should fight against his nation, and take their city by force, and bring the temple-worship to confusion, and for he thought that this signification would last two hundred and ninety-six days." Daniel wrote that he saw these visions in the plain of Susa; and he hath informed us, that God interpreted the appearance of this vision after the following manner: upon the occurrence of the four kingdoms of the Medes and Persians, and the horns those kings that were to reign in them; and that the last horn signified the last king, and that he should exceed all the kings in riches and glory; owing the prisoner that came should come and reign from the Greeks, who should twice fight with the Persian, and overcome him in battle, and should receive his entire dominion; that by the great horn which sprang out of the four would be meant the first king; and that the springing up of four horns upon its falling off, and the conversion of every one of them to the four quarters of the earth, signified the division of the kingdom of the first king, and the partition of the kingdom among them, and that they should be neither his children, nor of his kindred, that should reign over the habitable earth for many years; and that the great horn that came to pass, that this king that should overcome our nation and their laws, and should take away their political government, and should spoil the temple, and forbid the sacrifices to be offered for three years, as he had forewarned us, that our nation suffered these things under Antiochus Epiphanes, according to Daniel's vision, and what he wrote many years before they came to pass. In the very same manner Daniel also shows that the kingdom which he had foretold would have been fulfilled, would wonder at the honor wherewith God honored Daniel; and may thence discover how the Epicureans are in an error, who cast Providence out of human life, and do not believe that God takes care of the affairs of the world, nor that the universe is governed and continued in being by that blessed and immortal nature, but say that the world is carried along of its own accord, without a ruler, or a power sufficient to conduct it, as they imagine, it would be like ships without pilots, which we see drowned by the winds, or like chariots without drivers, which are overturned, so would the world be dashed to pieces by its being carried without a Providence, and so perish and come to nought. So that, by the forementioned predictions of Daniel, those men seem to me very much to err from the truth, who do not believe that God exercises no providence over human affairs; for if that were the case, that the world went on by mechanical necessity, we should not see that all things would come to pass according to his prophecy. Now as to myself, I have not been able to find his books; and if any one is inclined to another opinion about them, let him enjoy his different sentiments without any blame from me.

*What Josephus here says, that the stones of the emancipation of the city, of the wall of Jerusalem, were brought up by the help of towers, or those of the same sort that are now commonly called the ruins of Persopolis, continued so entire and undamaged, as if they were lately put there, [4] says Reiske, here cannot be true, as to those stones of the Persian kings' mausoleum which Josephus describes, to the hardiness of the stone, which scarcely yields to iron tools, and proves frequently too hard for cutting by the chisel, but oftentimes breaks it into pieces.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY-THREE YEARS AND FIVE MONTHS—FROM THE FIRST OF CYRUS, TO THE DEATH OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT.

CHAP. I.

_How Cyrus, King of the Persians, delivered the Jews out of Babylon, and suffered them to return to their own Country, and to build their Temple, for which Work he gave them Money._

§ 1. In the first year of the reign of Cyrus, which was the seventh from the day that our people were removed out of their own land into Babylon, God commiserated the captivity and calamity of these poor people, according as he had foretold to them by Jeremiah the prophet, before the destruction of the city; that after they had served Nebuchadnezzer and his posterity, and after they had undergone that captivity and calamity of these poor people, according as he had foretold to them by Jeremiah the prophet, before the destruction of the city; that after they had served Nebuchadnezzer and his posterity, and after they had undergone that captivity and calamity of seventy years, he would restore them again to the land of their fathers, and they should build their temple, and enjoy their ancient prosperity. And these things God did afford them; for he stirred up Cyrus the king of the Persians to write this throughout all Asia, "This saith Cyrus the king, Since God Almighty hath appointed me to be king of the habitable earth, I believe that he is that God which the nations of the Israelites worship, for indeed he foretold my name by the prophets, and that I should build him a house at Jerusalem, in the country of Judea." This was known to Cyrus by his reading the book which had been sent to him by the elders of the Jews, which book contains (as the prophet saith) all the histories; for this prophet said, that God had spoken thus to him in a secret vision: "My will is, that Cyrus, whom I have appointed to be king over many and great nations, send back my people to their own land, and build my temple." This was foretold by Isaiah one hundred and forty years before the temple was demolished. Accordingly, when Cyrus read this, and admired the divine power, an earnest desire and ambition seized upon his heart; he asked God, who was immediately answered by God, for that he would be his assistant, and that he would write to the rulers and governors that were in the neighborhood of their country of Judea, that they should contribute to them gold and silver for the building of the temple, and besides that, hebla for their sacrifices.

§ 2. When Cyrus had said this to the Israelites, the rulers of the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, with the Levites and priests, went in haste to Jerusalem, yet did many of them stay at Babylon, as not willing to leave their possessions; and when they were come thither, all the king's friends assisted them, and brought in, for the building of the temple, some gold and some silver, and some great many cattle and victual. So they performed their vows to God, and offered the sacrifice that had been accustomed of old time: I mean this upon the rebuilding of their city, and the revival of the ancient practices respecting to their worship. Cyrus also sent back to them the vessels of God which king Nebuchadnezzer had pillaged out of the temple, and had carried to Babylon. So he committed these things to Mithridates, the treasurer, to restore it away, with an order to give them to Sanabazar, that he might keep them till the temple was built; and when it was finished, he might deliver them to the priests and rulers of the multitude, in order to their being restored to the temple. Cyrus also sent an epistle to the governors that were in Syria, the contents whereof here follow:

_King Cyrus to Sinnekes and Sathyrubuzanes, sendeth greeting._

"I have given leave, to as many of the Jews that dwell in my country as please, to return to their own country, and to rebuild their city, and to build the temple of God at Jerusalem, on the same place where it was before; I have sent my treasurer Mithridates, and Zorobabel, the governor of the Jews, that they may lay the foundations of the temple, and may build it sixty cubits high, and the gates thereof, and three edifices of polished stones, and one of the wood of the country; and the same order extends to the altar, whereon they offer sacrifices to God. I require also, that the sacrifices for these things may be given, and also the money that I have also sent the vessels which king Nebuchadnezzer pillaged out of the temple, and have given them to Mithridates, the treasurer, and to Zorobabel the governor of the Jews, that they may have them carried to Jerusalem, and may restore them to the temple of God. Now their number is as follows: fifty chargers of gold, and five hundred of silver, forty Thiriclean cups of gold, and five hundred of silver, fifty basins of gold, and five hundred of silver; thirty vessels for pouring [the drink-offerings,] and three hundred of silver; thirty vials of gold, and two thousand four hundred of silver; with a thousand other large vessels. And these were the vessels of gold and honor which they were used to have from their forefathers, as also for their small cattle, and for wine and oil, two hundred and five thousand and five hundred drachmas; and for wheat flour, twenty thousand and five hundred shekels; and I give order, that these expenses shall be given them out of the tributes due from Samaria. The priests shall also offer these sacrifices according to the laws of Moses in Jerusalem: and when they offer them, they shall pray to God for the preservation of the king and of his family, that the kingdom of Persia may continue. But my will is, that those who disobey these injunctions, and make them void, shall be hung upon a cross and their substance brought into the king's treasury. And such was the import of this epistle. Now the number of those that came out of captivity to Jerusalem, were forty-two thousand four hundred and sixty two.

_Cyrus, 'He is my shepherd and shall perform all my pleasure, even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built, and to the temple, even saying to it, Be restored; this is not hitherto been demonstrated from the sacred history to have been completely fulfilled._

edness of these men, that provoked them (to destroy the princes;) for it if so please God, that wickedness might, even by those irrational cares;
tures, be esteemed a plain foundation for their punishment.

7. When, therefore, those that had intended themselves to destroy Daniel by treachery, were themselves destroyed, king Darius sent [it bears] over all the country, and praised that God whom Daniel worshipped; and said, that "he was the only true God, and had all power." He had also Daniel's grave opened, and made him the principal of his friends. Now when Daniel was become so illustrious and famous, on account of the opinion men had that he was beloved of God, he built a tower at Ecbatana in Media: it was a most elegant building, and wonderfully made, and it is still remaining, and preserved to this day; and to such as see it, it appears to have been lately built, and to have been no older than that very day; when any one looks upon it, it is so fresh, flourishing, and born to the age and age grown old in so long a time; * for buildings suffer the same as men do, they grow old as well as they, and by numbers of years their strength is dissolved, and their beauty withered. Now they built in the room of Media, Persia, and Partiin this tower to this day; and he who was in-tested with the care of it, was a Jewish priest; which thing is also observed to this day: but it is not in a manner of which this man did which is most admirable to hear, for he was so happy as to have strange revelations made to him, and those as to one of the greatest of the prophets, insomuch, that while he was alive he had visions and revelations of the kings and of the multitude, and now he is dead, he retains a remembrance that will never fail, for the several books that he wrote and left behind him are still read by us till this time, and from them we receive the most holy communications with God; for he did not only prophecy of future events, as did the other prophets, but he also determined the time of their accomplishment: and while prophets used to foretell misfortunes, and on that account were dispersed, and banished both of the kings and of the multitude. Daniel was to them a prophet of good things, and this to such a degree, that by the agreeable nature of his predictions, he produced the goodwill of all the kings, and by the accomplishment of them he procured the belief of their truth, and the opinion of a sort of divinity for himself, among the multitude. He also wrote and left behind him what made manifest the accomplishments of his predictions, and his suc-tions; for he saith, that "when he was in Susa, the metropolis of Persia, and went out into the field with his companions, there was, on the sudden, a motion and concision of the earth, and that he was left alone by himself, his friends dying away from him; and that he was distracted, died on his face, and on his two hands, and that a certain person touched him, and at the same time, bade him rise and see what would befall his country, and after many generations.
He also related, that when he stood up, he was shown a great ram, with many horns growing out of his head, and that the last was higher than the others, and that after this he looked to the west, and saw a be-gost carried though the air from that quarter, that he rushed upon the ram with violence, and smote him twice with his horns, and overthrew him to the ground, and trampled upon him; and in the same time, he saw a very great horn growing out of the head of the be-gost, and

* What Josephus here says, that the stones of the sepulchre of the kings of Persia at this tower, or those perhaps of the same sort that are now commonly called the ruins of Persepolis, continued so entire and unexhausted, as if they were lately put there.
"I," says Reissland, "here can show to be true, as to that when it was broken off, four horns grew up that were exposed to each of the four winds, and he wrote that out of the second hundred and ninety-six years, which, as he said, waxed great; and that God showed to him, that it should fight against his nation, and take their city by force, and bring the temple-worship to confusion, and forbid the sacrifices to be offered for one thousand two hundred and ninety-six days." Daniel wrote that he saw these visions in the plain of Susa; and he hath informed us, that God interpreted the appearance of this vision after the following manner:

He said that the ram signified the kingdoms of the Medes and Persians, and the horns those kings that were to reign in them; and that the last horn signified the last king; and that from among them there should arise a certain king that should overcome our nation and their laws, and should take away their political government, and should spoil the temple, and forbid all sacrifices for another beast's time." And indeed so it came to pass, that our nation suffered these things under Antiochus Epiphanes, according to Daniel's vision, and what he wrote many years before they came that be. He had overthrown all the kings in mire.
and wrote concerning the Roman government, and that our country should be made desolate by them. All these things did this man leave in writing, as God had showed them to him, insomuch that such sore and horrid prophecies, and see how they have been fulfilled, would wonder at the honor wherewith God honored Daniel; and may thence discover how the Epicureans are so deluded, that I do not believe that God takes care of the air of the world, nor that the universe is governed and continued in being by that blessed and immortal nature, but say that the world is under the care of a number of beasts, and a curt which, were it destitute of a guide to conduct it, as they imagine, it would be like ships without pilots, which we see drowned by
the winds, or like chariots without drivers, which are overturned, so would the world be dashed
to pieces by its being carried without a Providence, and so perish and come to nought. So that, by the forementioned predictions of Daniel, those men seem to me very much to err from the truth, and to be extremely ignorant of God's providence and acurator; which, were it destitute of a guide to conduct it, as they imagine, it would be like ships without pilots, which we see drowned by
the winds, or like chariots without drivers, which
are overturned, so would the world be dashed
to pieces by its being carried without a Providence,

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY-THREE YEARS AND FIVE MONTHS.—FROM THE FIRST OF CYRUS, TO THE DEATH OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT.

CHAP. I.

How Cyrus, King of the Persians, delivered the Jews out of Babylon, and brought them back to their own Country, and to build their Temple, for which Work he gave them Money.

1. In the first year of the reign of Cyrus, * which was the seventieth from the day that our people were removed out of their own land into Babylon, God signified the captivity and calamity of these poor people, according as he had foretold to them by Jeremiah the prophet, before the destruction of the city; that after they had served Nebuchadnezzar and his posterity, and after they had undergone that servitude seventy years, he would restore them again to the land of their fathers, and they should build their temple, and enjoy their ancient prosperity. And these things God did afford them: for he stirred up Cyrus his king to the same work that he had been ordered to by the angels and by the prophets, and that I should build him a house at Jerusalem, in the country of Judea."

2. This was known to Cyrus by his reading the book which Isaiah the prophet had also delivered him to, and he may be given out to the Persians; for this prophet said, that God had spoken thus to him in a secret vision: "My will is, that Cyrus, whom I have appointed to be king over many and great nations, send back my people to their own land, and build my temple. This was foretold by Isaiah one hundred and forty years before the temple was demolished. Accordingly, when Cyrus read this, and admired the divine power, an earnest desire and ambition seized upon him, to fulfill what was written: for he called for the most eminent Jews that were in Babylon, and said to them, that he gave them leave to go back to their own country, and to rebuild the city Jerusalem, and the temple of God, for they were his children. And the Jews said that he would write to the rulers and governors that were in the neighborhood of their country of Judea, that they should contribute to them gold and silver for the building of the temple, and besides that, beasts for their sacrifices."

3. When Cyrus had said this to the Israelites, the rulers of the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, with the Levites and priests, went in haste to Jerusalem, yet did many of them stay at Babylon, as not willing to leave their possessions; and when they were come thither, all the king's friends assisted them, and brought in, for the building of the temple, some gold and some silver, and some great many cattle and horses. So they performed their vows to God, and offered the sacrifice that had been accustomed of old time: I mean this upon the rebuilding of their city, and the revival of the ancient practices relating to their worship. Cyrus also sent back to them the vessels of God which king Nebuchadnezzar had pillaged out of the temple, and had carried to Babylon. So he committed these things to Mithridates, the treasurer, and to Zarobaile, the governor of the Jews, that they might keep them till the temple was built; and when it was finished, he might deliver them to the priests and rulers of the multitude, in order to their being restored to the temple. Cyrus also sent an epistle to the governors that were in Syria, the contents whereof here follow:

King Cyrus to Shinarre and Sathyraebunre, sendeth greeting.

"I have given leave, to as many of the Jews that dwell in my country as please, to return to their own country, and to rebuild their city, and to build the temple of God at Jerusalem, on the same site where it was before. I have also sent my treasurer Mithridates, and to Zarobaile the governor of the Jews, that they may lay the foundations of the temple, and may build it sixty cubits high, and of the same latitude, making use of the gold and silver brought thither by the prophet, and that I should build him a house at Jerusalem, in the country of Judea."

"This Cyrus is called God's shepherd by Xenophon, as well as by Isaiah, Is. xliv. 28, also it is said by him that Cyrus was more previous than fine gold, even a man the golden weige of (tophr);" Is. xliv. 28, which character makes Xenophon's most excellent history of Cyrus. This letter to build Jerusalem, sect. 2, 5, and the epistle of Cyrus to Sihannes and Sathyraebunre, to the same year, were unfortunately omitted in all our copies but the best and correctest copy of it (of which I have had the advantage) seems to be that of an ancient manuscript, whose importance is great, and whose sickness is the most frequent, viz. the description of the temple, and the description of the temple, whose rebuilding is alone permitted or directed in the decree of Cyrus in all our copies."

Cyrus, "He is my shepherd and shall perform all my pleasure, even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built, and to the temple, Build, and the godhead shall not hitherto be demonstrated from the sacred history to have been completely fulfilled, I mean as to that part of it which concerns the giving leave to the commission for rebuilding the city of Jerusalem as distinct from the temple, whose rebuilding is alone permitted or directed in the decree of Cyrus in all our copies."

laws. It distinguishes them from injustice, and puts what is unrighteous to rebuke.

8. So the king was pleased with what he had said, and arose and kissed him; and wrote to the toparchs and governors, and enjoined them to conduct Zorobabel, and those that were going with him, to the temple. He also sent letters to those rulers that were in Syria and Pho-

7. So when Zorobabel had left off his discourse about truth, and the multitude had cried out aloud that he had spoken the most wisely, and that it was truth alone that had immovable strength, and such as never would wear old, the king commanded, that he should ask for some what over and above what he had promised, for that he would give it him because of his wisdom, and that prudence whereas he excelled the rest; and thou shalt sit with me, said the king, and shall rule over my kingdom. And he bethought himself of the this. Zorobabel put him in mind of the vow he had made, in case he should ever have the kingdom. Now this vow was, "To rebuild Jeru-

9. Now when Zorobabel had obtained these grants from the king, he went out of the palace, and, looking up to heaven, he began to return thanks to God for the wisdom he had given him, and the victory he had gained thereby, even in the presence of Darius himself; for said he, "I had not been thought worthy of these advantages, O Lord, unless thou hadst been favorable to me. And therefore he had returned these thanks to God for the present circumstances he was in, and had prayed to him to afford him the like favor for the time to come, he came to Babylon, and brought the good news to his coun-

10. And thus did these men go, a certain and determinate number out of every family, though I so not think it proper to recite particularly the names of those families, that I may not take off the interest of the seventy Nebo from the historical facts, and make it hard for them to follow the coherence of my narration; but the sum of those that went up above the age of forty seventy; and of the Levites one hundred and twenty-eight, and porters one hundred and ten; and of the sacred ministers three hundred and ninety two: there were also others besides these, who said they were of kindred, but to show their genealogies, six hundred and sixty-two: some there were also who were expelled out of the number and honor of the priests, as having married wives whose genealogies they could not produce, nor were they found in the genealogies of the Levites and priests: they were about five hundred and twenty five; the multitude also of servants that followed those that went up to Jerusalem, were seven thousand three hundred and fifty; these offer their appointed sacrifices, and that whatsoever the high priest and the priests wanted, and those sacred garments wherein they used to worship God, she should beidue his own charging, and that the musical instruments which the Levites used in singing hymns to God should be given them. Moreover, he charged them that portions of land should be given to those that guarded the city, and to those that were to maintain the temple, with a determinate sum of money every year for their maintenance: and withal he sent the vessels. And all that Cyrus intended to do before him, relating to the restoration of Jerusalem, Darius also ordained should be done by him likewise. The

The Temple was built, while the Cuthenses endeavored in vain to obstruct the Work.

And they numbered the seven tribes from the tribe of Judah and Benjamin, were four hundred sixty-two myriads and eight thousand; the Levites were seventy-four: the number of the women and children mixed together was forty thousand seven hundred and eighty-five: the number of the men of the tribe of Judah was two hundred and twenty-eight thousand, and porters one hundred and ten; and of the sacred ministers three hundred and ninety two; there were also others besides these, who said they were of kindred, but to show their genealogies, six hundred and sixty-two: some there were also who were expelled out of the number and honor of the priests, as having married wives whose genealogies they could not produce, nor were they found in the genealogies of the Levites and priests: they were about five hundred and twenty five; the multitude also of servants that followed those that went up to Jerusalem, were seven thousand three hundred and fifty; these offer their appointed sacrifices, and that whatsoever the high priest and the priests wanted, and those sacred garments wherein they used to worship God, she should beidue his own charging, and that the musical instruments which the Levites used in singing hymns to God should be given them. Moreover, he charged them that portions of land should be given to those that guarded the city, and to those that were to maintain the temple, with a determinate sum of money every year for their maintenance: and withal he sent the vessels. And all that Cyrus intended to do before him, relating to the restoration of Jerusalem, Darius also ordained should be done by him likewise. The

the appointed sacrifices upon it to God, according to the laws of Moses. But while they did this, they did not please the neighboring nations, who all of them bare an ill-will to them. They also celebrated the feast of Tabernacles at that time, as the legislator had ordained concerning it, and after that they offered sacrifices, and what were called the daily sacrifices, and those necessary for the Sabbath, and for all the holy festivals. Those also that had made vows performed them, and offered their sacrifices, from the first day of the seventh month. They also began to build their temple, and set up the wains of money to the masons and to the carpenters, and what was necessary for the maintenance of the workmen. The Sidonians also were very willing and ready to bring the cedar-trees from Lebanon to bind them together, and to bring them to the port of Joppa, for that was what Cyrus had commanded them at first, and was now done at the time, for there was a faith in the temple, and the temple had a faith in the temple. 2. In the second year of their coming to Jerusalem, as the Jews were there in the second month, the building of the temple went on space; and when they had laid its foundations on the ground, he made each servant of the king, that set as overseers of the work, such Levites as were full twenty years old; and Jeasus, and his sons and brethren, and Cudmriel the brother of Judas, the son of Amissah, with his sons; and Judas, the son of God, Nebuchadnessar, the king of the Babylonians, and of the Chaldeans, took the city by force, and destroyed it, and pillaged the temple, and burnt it down, and transplanted the people whom he had made captives, and removed them into Babylon; and of the Jews that were of the captivity of Babylon and Persia, wrote to them to build the temple, and committed the gifts and vessels, and whatsoever Nebuchadnessar had carried out of it, to Zorobabel and Merari; and the rest of the Jews that were in other places; and gave order to them to go to Jerusalem, and to have them restored to their own temple when it was built; for he had sent them to have it done speedily, and commanded Sanbasar to go up to Jerusalem, and to take care of the building of the temple; who, upon receiving that epistle from Cyrus, came, and immediately laid its foundations; and although it hath been in building from that time to this, it hath not yet been finished, nor is it finished, but is in process of time, and in enemies. If therefore you have a mind, and think it proper, write this account to Darius, that when he hath consulted the records of the kings, he may find that we have told you nothing that is false about this building. 5. When Zorobabel and the high priest had made this answer, Siannes, and those that were with him, did not resolve to hinder the building, until they had informed king Darius of all this. So they immediately wrote to him about these affairs; but as the Jews were now under terror, and afraid lest the king should change his resolutions as to the building of Jerusalem and of the temple, there was much among them, Haggai and Zechariah, who encouraged them, and bade them be of good cheer, and to suspect no discouragement from the Persians, for that God foretold this to them. So they encouraged the temple, and built themselves earnestly to building, and did not interrupt one day. 6. Now Darius, when the Samaritans had writ ten to him, and in their epistle had said to the Jews, how they had begun to build the temple more like to a citadel than a temple; and said, that their doings were not expedient for the king's affairs; and besides, they showed the epistle of Cambyses, when he forbade them to be understood that the restoration of Jerusalem was not expedient for his affairs, and when he had read the epistle that was brought him from Si-sianes, and those that were with him, he gave order that what concerned these matters should be sought for among the royal records. Whereaupon a book was found at Ecbeauma, in the tower that was in Medias, wherein was written as follows:
"Cyrus, on the first year of his reign, commanded that the temple should be built in Jerusalem; and the altar: is height three score cu-hits, and its breadth of the same, with three edifices of polished stone, and one edifice of stone of the thickness of four fingers, and that the expenses of it should be paid out of the king's revesue. He also commanded that the vessels which Nebuchadnezzar had pillaged [out of the temple,] and carried to Babylon, should be restored, and given back to the people of Jerusalem, and that the care of these things should belong to Sennasdassar, the bearer and president of Syria and Phenicia, and to his associates, that they might not meddle with that place, but may permit the servants of God, the Jews and their rulers, to build the temple.
He also ordained that they should assist them in the work; and that they should pay to the Jews, out of the tribute of the country where they were placed, all that was needed of the sacrificial, bulls and rams, and lambs, and kids of the goats, and fine flour, and oil, and wine, and all other things that the priests should suggest to them; and that they should preserve the sacrifices to the king, and of the Persians, and that for such as transgressed any of these orders thus sent to them, he commanded that they should be caught and hung upon a cross, and their substance confiscated to the king's use. And he took upon himself to the Lord against them, that if any one attempted to hinder the building of the temple, God would strike him dead, and thereby restrain his wickedness."

7. When Darius had found this book among the Persians, he wrote to Sennasdassar the Jewish governor, and to Sathrabaranes, seadeth greeting: having founded a copy of this epistle among the records of Cyrus. I have sent you it; and I will that all things be done as is therein written. Fare ye well."

So when Sennasdassar, and those that were with him, understood the intention of the king, that he followed his directions entirely for the time to come. So they forwarded the sacred works, and assisted the elders of the Jews, and the princes of the sanhedrin, and the structure of the temple was with great diligence brought to completion, by the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah, according to God's command, and by the injunctions of Cyrus and Darius, the kings. Now the temple was built in seven years' time: and in the ninth year of the reign of Darius, on the twenty-third day of the twelfth month, which is by us called Adar, but by the Macedonians Dystrus, the priests and Levites, and the other multitude of the Israelites, offered sacrifices, as the redemption of their former prosperity after their captivity, and because they had now the temple rebuilt, a hundred bulls, two hundred rams, four hundred lambs, and twelve kids of the goats, according to the number of their tribes, (for so many are the tribes of the Israelites,) and this last for the sins of every tribe. The priests also and the Levites set the porters at every gate, according to the law of Moses. The Jews also built the cloister of the inner temple, that were round about the temple itself. 8. And as the feast of unleavened bread was at hand, in the first month, which, according to the Jews, is called Xanthicus, but according to us, Nisan, all the people of the villages out of the villages to the city, and celebrated the festivals, having purified themselves, with their wives and children, according to the law of their country; and they offered the sacrifice which was called the Passover, on the fourteenth day of the same month, and feasted seven days, and served for no cost, but offered whole burnt-offerings to God, and performed sacrifices of thank-giving, because God had led them again to the land of their fathers, and to the laws thereto belonging. And the first of the third year of the reign of Persia favorable to them. So these men offered the largest sacrifices on these accounts, and used great magnificence in the worship of God, and dwelt in Jerusalem, and made use of a kind of government, that was aristocratical, but mixed with an oligarchy, for the high priests were at the head of their affairs, until the posteriority of the Assasonesms set up kings government; and the magnificence of their order, and the addition of their polity, they at first had kings government from Saul and David, for five hundred and thirty-two years, six months, and ten days; but before those kings, such rulers govern them as were called Judges and kings.
Under this form of government they continued for more than five hundred years, after the death of Moses, and of Joshua, their commander. And this is the account I had to the Jews who had been carried into captivity, but were delivered from it in the times of Cyrus and Darius.

9. But the Samaritans, 2 being evil and envious, and alarmed at the noble touch of the Jews, and of the Persian mischiefs, by reliance on their riches, and by their pretence that they were allied to the Persians, on account that thence they came; and whosoever it was that they were surrounded by, he also prayed to the Lord, and against them, that if any one attempted to hinder the building of the temple, God would strike him
dead, and thereby restrain his wickedness."

2 How Xerxes, the Son of Darius, was well disposed to the Jews: as also concerning Estra and Nehemiah.

1. Upon the death of Darius, Xerxes his son was king, who, as he inherited his father's kingdom, so did he inherit his piety towards God, and honor of him; for he did all things suitable to his father relating to divine worship, and he was exceedingly friendly to the Jews, and he did not cast them out altogether; his name was Joachim, was the high priest.
Moreover, there was now in Babylon a righteous

ing to all our other copies, both of Ezra and Nehemiah.

CHA. V.
man, and one that enjoyed a great reputation among the multitude; he was the principal priest of the synagogues, and the name of God. He was very skilful in the law of Moses, and was well acquainted with king Xerxes. He had determined to go up to Jerusalem, and to take with him some of those Jews that were in Babylon, and he desired that the king would give him an epistle to the governors of Syria, by which they might know who he was. Accordingly, the king wrote the following epistle to those governors:—

"Xerxes, king of kings, to Ezra the priest, and residence, and king Xerxes. It is agreeable to that love which I bear to mankind, to permit those of the Jewish nation that are so disposed, as well as those of the priest and Levites, that are in our kingdom, to go together to Jerusalem. Accordingly, I have given command for that purpose; and let every one that hath a mind, go, according as it hath seemed good to me, and to my seven counsellors, and this in order to their review of the affairs of Judah; and whether they be agreeable to the law of God. Let them also take with them those presents which I and my friends have vowed, with all that silver and gold that is found in the country of the Babylonians, and the treasures dedicated at Babylon, and that was carried to Jerusalem, to God for sacrifices. Let it also be lawful for thee and thy brethren to make as many vessels of silver and gold as thou pleasest. Thou shalt also dedicate those holy vessels that belong to the temple; and thou shalt have more as thou hast a mind to make, and shalt take the expenses out of the king’s treasury. I have moreover written to the treasurers of Syria and Phoenicia, that they take care of those affairs that Ezra hath directed, so that the laws of God, is sent about. And that God may not be at all angry with me, or with my children, Igrant all that is necessary for sacrifices to God, according as the priests and Levites, who have charge of their settlement, and dissolved the laws of their country, by marrying strange wives, and had brought the family of the priests into confusion. These persons desired him to support the laws, lest God should punish them all, and reduce them to a calamitous condition again. Hereupon he rent his garment immediately out of grief, and pulled off the hair of his head and beard, and cast himself upon the ground, because of this crime committed by the principal men among the people, and considering that if he should enjoin them to cast out their wives, and the children they had by them, he should not be heard of to, because he was lying upon the ground. However, all the better for it came running to him, who also themselves wept and partook of the grief he was under for what had been done. So Ezra rose up from the ground, and stretched out his hands towards heaven, and said, that "He was ashamed to look towards it, because of the sins which the people had committed, while they had cast out of their memories what their fathers had undergone on account of their wickedness; and he knew that they had saved a seed and a remnant out of the calamity and captivity they had been in, and had restored them again to Jerusalem and to their own land, and had obliged the kings of Persia to have compassion on them, and had given them their sins they had now committed, which though they deserved death, yet it was agreeable to the mercy of God to remit even to these things."

2. When Ezra had received this epistle, he was very joyful, and began to worship God, and confessed that he had been the cause of the king’s great favor to him, and that for the same reason he gave all the thanks to God. So he read the epistle at Babylon to those Jews that were there, but he kept the epistle itself, and sent a copy of it to all those of his own nation that were in Med- dia, and to such of them as were in the country of the Medes. And when the people of Medea heard of this, they were glad that the king had towards God, and what kind- ness he had for Ezra, they were all greatly pleased; nay, many of them took their effects with them, and came to Babylon, as very desirous of going thither. And the body of the people of Israel remained in that country, whereof there are but two tribes in Asia and Europe subject to the Romans, while the number of those Jews that have punishment due to them, and are an immense multitude, is not as yet estimated by numbers. Now there came a great number of priests and Levites, and porters, and sacred singers, and sacred servants, to Ezra. So he desired that the king would give him an epistle to the governors of Syria, and the king, and be called urishia, and that this was of old esteemed the most precious of all metals.

3. Now these things were truly done under the conduct of Ezra, and he succeeded in them, because God bestowed him worthy of the success of his conduct, on account of his piety and righteousness. But some time afterward there came some persons to him, and brought an accusation against certain of the multitude, and of the Levites, who had married foreign wives, and that he should let God do the like to them, and should not be their settled, and dissolved the laws of their country, by marrying strange wives, and had brought the family of the priests into confusion. These persons desired him to support the laws, lest God should punish them all, and reduce them to a calamitous condition again. Hereupon he rent his garment immediately out of grief, and pulled off the hair of his head and beard, and cast himself upon the ground, because of this crime committed by the principal men among the people, and considering that if he should enjoin them to cast out their wives, and the children they had by them, he should not be heard of to, because he was lying upon the ground. However, all the better for it came running to him, who also themselves wept and partook of the grief he was under for what had been done. So Ezra rose up from the ground, and stretched out his hands towards heaven, and said, that "He was ashamed to look towards it, because of the sins which the people had committed, while they had cast out of their memories what their fathers had undergone on account of their wickedness; and he knew that they had saved a seed and a remnant out of the calamity and captivity they had been in, and had restored them again to Jerusalem and to their own land, and had obliged the kings of Persia to have compassion on them, and had given them their sins they had now committed, which though they deserved death, yet it was agreeable to the mercy of God to remit even to these things."

4. After Ezra had said this, he left off praying; and when all those that came to him with their wives and children were under lamentation, one whose name was Jechonias, a principal man in Jerusalem, came to him and said, that he had sinned in marrying strange wives, and he was called urishia, and that this was of old esteemed the most precious of all metals.
they were instructed to be righteous men for the present, and for the future; but as for their past offences, they were displeased at, were dispersed at, and proceeded to shed tears on their account, as considering with themselves, that if they had kept the law, they had endured none of those misfortunes which befell the Jews. Eadras saw them in that disposition, he bade them go home and be not weep, for that it was a festival, and that they ought not to weep thereon, for that it was not lawful so to do. He exhorted them to study to do good, and to do what was suitable to a feast, and what was agreeable to a day of joy, but to let their repentance and sorrow for their former sins be a security and a guard to them, that they fall no more into the like offence. Of the great exhortation they began to feast, and when they had so done for eight days, in their tabernacles, they departed to their own homes, singing hymns to God, and returning thanks to Eadras, for his reformation of what corruptions had been introduced into their settlement. So it came to pass, that after he had obtained this reputation among the people, he died an old man, and was buried in Jerusalem, in the temple area, at the same time it happened also, that Jehoiachin the high priest died; and his son Eliaib succeeded in the high priesthood.

6. Now there was one of those Jews that had been driven away from Jerusalem, and fetched over to king Xerxes; his name was Nehemiah. As this man was walking before Susa, the metropolis of the Persians, he heard some strangers that were entering the city after a long journey, speaking to one another in their native tongue; so he went to them, and asked them whence they came? And when their answer was, that they came from Judah, he began to inquire of them again in what city of Jerusalem was, and when they replied, that they were in a bad state, for that their walls were thrown down to the ground, and that the neighboring nations did a great deal of mischief to the Jews, while, in the meantime, they overran the country, and pillaged it, and in the night did them mischief, insomuch that not a few were led away captive out of the country, and out of Jerusalem itself, and that the roads were in the utmost confusion, and that the king of Persia, and the king of Syria, made war upon them, and upon all the nations; and of these men. So when Eadras had reformed this sin about the marriages of the forementioned persons, he reduced that practice to purity, so that it continued in that state for the time to come.

5. Now when they kept the feast of tabernacles in the seventh month, and also all the people, were come together to it, they went up to the open part of the temple, to the gate which looked eastward, and desired of the Jews that the laws of Moses might be read to them. Accordingly, he stood in the midst of the multitude and read them; and this he did from morning to noon. Now, by bearing the laws read to them

8. This procedure of Eadras, and of the best part of the Jewish nation, after their return from the Babylonish captivity, of reducing the Jewish marriages, once for all, under the laws of Moses, without any regard to the greatness of those who had broken it, and without regard to that natural affection or compassion for their husbands and their children by them, which made it so hard for Eadras to correct it, deserves great-ly to be observed and imitated in all attempts for reforming such conduct having ever been the bane of true religion, both among Jews and Christians, while political views, or human passions, or the inordinate concern of the state instead of the divine laws, and so the blessing of God is forfeited, and the church still suffered to continue corrupt from one generation to another. See chap. viii. sect. 8. | This Jewish feast of tabernacles was imitated in several heathen solemnities, as Spelman here observes and proves. He also further observes presently that great renown was given to the memorable events of their forefathers, as Nehemiah had before, sect. 6.

9. This rule of Eadras, not to fast on a festival day, is quoted in the Apocryphal Constitution, b. 19. as obtaining among Christians also.
walls of Jerusalem, the city where are the sepuphaches of my fathers, are they cast down to the ground, and that its gates are consumed by fire; but do thou grant me the favor to go and build its walls, and to finish the building of the temple." Accordingly, the king gave him a signal, that he freely granted him what he asked; and told him that he should carry an epistle to the governors, that they might pay him due honor, and afford him whatsoever assistance he wanted, and as he planned. Leave off thy sorrow then, (said the king) and go and build the temple of the Lord thy God, and his city Jerusalem, and go to the king's day office hereafter. So Nehemiah worshipped God; and gave the king thanks for his promise, and renewed his oath to the king's promise, and began to go about the work. Accordingly, the king called for him the next day, and gave him an epistle to be carried to Aesues, the governor of Syria, and Phenicia, and Samaria; wherein he sent to him to pay due to Nehemiah, and to supply him with what he wanted for his building.
7. Now when he was come to Babylon and had sacked with him many of his countrymen, who voluntarily followed him, he came to Jerusalem in the beginning of the reign of Xerxes: and when he had shown the epistles to God, he gave them to Aesues, and to the other governors. He also called together all the people to Jerusalem, and stood in the midst of the temple plain, and told them the glory of God, and of the ing of the temple. You know, O Jews, that God hath kept our fathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in mind continually, and for the sake of their righteous ness hath left us the people of you; indeed he hath preserved us in safety and in the taking of the king to raise up our wall, and finish what is wanting of the temple. I desire you, therefore, who well know the ill-will of our neighboring nations, and their enmity, and their ill-treatment of us, that you may understand that we are in earnest about building, they will come upon us, and constrive many ways of obstructing our works, that you will,
in the first place; put your trust in God, as in him that will assist us against their hatred, and to intermit building neither might nor day, but to use all diligence, and to hasten on the work: now we have this especial opportunity for it." When he had said this, he gave order that the rulers should be called, and the heartened household of God, and of the people, should be called among the people, according to their villages and cities, as every one's abilities should require. And when he had added this promise, that he himself, with his servants, would assist them, he delivered the workmen's stipulation to them; he was engaged for the work; that is the name they are called by from the day that they came up from Babylon, which is taken from the tribe of Judah, which came first to these places, and thence both they and the country gained this apposition.
8. But now when the Ammonites, and Moabites, and Samaritans, and all that inhabited Coele-ychrea, heard that the building went on space, they took it jealously, and proceeded to lay snares for them, and to hinder their intentions. They also slew many of the Jews, and sought how they might destroy Nehemiah himself, and the house of God, among the Greeks called Jews. They also put the Jews in fear, and disturbed them, and spread abroad rumors, as if many nations were ready to make an expedition against them, by which means they were barassed, and had almost left off the building; but none of those things could deter Nehemiah from being diligent about the work; he only set a number of men about him as a guard to his body, and so unwaresly persevered therein, and was insensible of any trouble, out of his desire to perfect this work. And thus did he attenstively and with great force take care of his own safety, and also of the safety of the work. Accordingly, the reason had his sword on, as well as he that brought the materials for building. He also appointed that their shields should lie very near them; and he placed trumpeters at every five hundred feet, and charged them, that if their enemies appeared, they should give notice of it to the people, that they might fight in their armor, and their enemies might did not fall upon them naked. He also went about the building, and the city by the temple, and encouraged, neither about the work itself, nor about his own diet and sleep, for he made no use of those things for his pleasure, but out of necessity. And this trouble he underwent for two or thirty years; and forty months for the building of the wall, which was the wall built, in the twenty-eighth year of the reign of Xerxes, in the ninth month. Now when the walls were finished, Nehemiah and the multitude offered sacrifice to God in the building of them, and they continued in fasting eight days. However, when the nations which dwelt in Syria heard that the building of the wall was finished, they had inclination at it: but when Ne-emiah saw that the city was this people, he exorted the priests and the Levites, that they would leave the country, remove themselves to the city, and there continue; and he built them houses at his own expenses; and he commanded that part of the people which were, end made in cultivating the land to bring the tithe of their fruits to Jerusalem, that the priests and Levites having whereof they might live perpetually, might not leave the divine worship; who willing that it should be continued, met the heartened household of God, and of the people, and by which means the city of Jerusalem came to be fuller of people than it was before. So then Nehemiah had done many other excellent things, and things worthy of commendation, in a glorious and most excellent manner, and of this age, and of the age to come. For he was a man of a good and righteous disposition, and very ambitious to make his own name happy; and he hath left the walls of Jerusalem an eternal monument for himself. Now this was done in the days of Xerxes.

Chap. VI.

Concerning Esther, and Mordecai, and Haman, and how, in the Reign of Artaxerxes, the whole Nation of the Jews was in danger of perishing.

1. After the death of Xerxes, the kingdom came to be transferred to his son Cyrus, where the number of years since the death of Xerxes came to be one hundred and sixty; and he monaches in building; and that they were finished in the 29th of Xerxes, sect. 7, 8. It may also be remarked further, that Josephus hardly ever mentions more than one infallible astronomical character, but never more than one, nor at all times; and in case of the death of Herod the Great, Antiq. b. xvii. ch. vi. sect. 4.
Now on these two chronologers in a great me-more dependence is put in the most important facts reting to Christianity, viz. the explication of Daniel's 70 weeks, and the duration of the Saviour's ministry, and the time of his death, in correspondence to these 70 weeks. See the Supplement to the Lit. Accomp. of Prop. p. 72
the whole nation of the Jews, with their wives and children were in danger of perishing: the occasion being that we should be in it a long time, for it is proper, in the first place, to explain somewhat relating to this king, and how he came to marry a Jewish wife, who was herself of the royal family also, and who is related, for which reason, when Artazaeres had taken the kingdom, and had set governors over the hundred and twenty and seven provinces, from India even unto Ethiopia, in the third year of his reign, he made a great feast for his friends, and for the nations of Persia, and for their governors, such a one as was proper for a king to make, when he had a mind to make a public demonstration of his riches, and this for a hundred and fourteen days, after which he made a feast for other nations, and for their ambassadors at Shushan, for seven days. Now this feast was ordered after the manner following: he caused a tent to be pitched, which was supported by pillars of gold and silver, with curtains of linen and purple spread over them, that it might afford room for many ten thousands to sit down. The cups with which the waiters ministered, were set down, and adorned with precious stones, for pleasure and for sight. He also gave order to the servants that they should not force them to drink, by bringing them wine continually, as is the practice of the Persians, but to permit them to stop for pleasure, and to enjoy himself according to his own inclination. Moreover, he sent messengers through the country, and gave order that they should have a remission of their labors, and should keep a festival many days. One month of this kingdom, as is the manner did Vashiti, the queen, gather her guests together, and made them a feast in the palace. Now the king was desirous to show her, who exceeded all others in beauty, to the one that feasted with him, and he sent for one to command her to come to his feast. But she, out of regard to the laws of the Persians, which forbid the wives to be seen by strangers, did not go out of the king's house, though she sent her servant, the eunuch to her, she did nevertheless stay away, and refused to come, till the king was so much irritated, that he broke up the entertainment, and rose up, and called for those seven that had the interpretation of dreams. He desired to see them, and accused his wife, and said, that he had been affronted by her, because that when she was frequently called by him to his feast, she did not obey him once. He therefore gave order that they should inform him of the feast, or by the queen against her. So one of them, whose name was Memucan, said, that "this affront was offered not to him alone, but to all the Persians, who were in danger of leading their lives very ill with their wives, if they must be thus despised by them; for that none of their wives would have any reverence for their husbands, if they had such an example of thee, who resist over all." Accordingly, he exhorted him to punish her who had been guilty of so great an affront to him, after a severe manner; and when he had said this to him, the king, who had been deceived about the queen. So the resolution was, to put Vashiti away, and to give her dignity to another woman.

2. But the king having been fond of her, did not altogether consent to this for a long time. It was after this, by the law that he could not admit of a reconciliation, so he was under trouble, not as having it in his power to do what he desired to do. But when his friends saw him so uneasy, they advised him to cast the memory of his wife, such a one as he was of his mind, but to send abroad over all the habitable earth, and to search out for comely virgins, and to take her whom he should like best for a wife, because his passion for his former wife would be quenched by the introduction of an other, and the kindness he had to Vashiti would be withdrawn from her, and he placed on her that was with him. Accordingly, he was persuaded to this, and he sent for certain persons to choose out of the virgins that were in his kingdom those that were esteemed the most comely. So when a great number of these virgins were gathered together, there was one whom he fixed on in the midst of them, both dead, and she was brought up with her uncle Mordecai, for that was her uncle's name. This uncle was of the tribe of Benjamin, and was one of the principal persons among the Jews. Now it proved that the man's name was Esther, was the most beautiful of all the rest, and that the grace of her countenance drew the eyes of the spectators principally upon her, so she was conducted to one of the eunuchs to the case of her: and she was exquisitely provided with sweet odors, in great plenty, and with costly ointments, such as her body required to be anointed with: and this was used for six months by the virgins, who were in number four hundred. And when the eunach thought the virgins had been sufficiently purified, in the forementioned time, and were now fit to go to the king's bed, he sent one to be with her, who was sent and sent to the king's wife, and called for her, and called for her. "And when Esther had come to him, he was pleased with her, and fell in love with the damsels, and married her, and made her his lawful wife, and had her to wife. And King Ahasuerus gave the feast, in the middle of the seventh year of his reign, which was called Adar. He also sent angeri, as they were called, or messengers, unto every nation and gave orders that they should keep a feast for his marriage, while he himself treated the Persians of the king, or to confirm any one fact of his whatever, with the same evidence which is here given for the principal fact in the sacred book, or even so much as to prove the existence of such a person, of whom so great things are related, but upon granting this book at Esther, or sixth of Eorads (= it is placed in some of the manuscripts by the vulgar) to be a most true and certain history," &c.

*Since some sceptical persons are willing to discard this book of Esther as no true history; and even our learned and judicious Dr. Wall, in his late posthumous critical notes upon all the other Hebrew books of the Old Testament, gives us none upon the Castorics or upon Estenar, and seems thereby to give up this book, as with all the others in the same collection, as incapable; I shall venture to say, that almost all the objections against this book of Esther are gone at once, if, as we certainly believe, it is to be held a De Dperson and not a history, we place this history under Artazaeres Longinamos, as do both the Septuagint interpreters and Josephus. The learned Dr. Lee, in his posthumous dissertation on the second book of Eorads, page 25, also says, that the truth of this history is demonstrated by the feast of Purim, kept up from that time to this very day: and this suggests a parallel rention in favor of the captivity people, thereby constantly commemorated, standeth even upon a firmer basis than that there ever was such a revelation of the office of the Jews, on the other hand, is their being under this great deliverance of the whole nation, whose reign there is no such abiding monument at this day to be found any where. Nor will they, I dare say, or rather may we say, for any other reason out of the sacred histories, and it a very easy matter to reconcile the different accounts which were given by historians of the affairs.
sians and the Medes, and the principal men of the nations, for a whole month, on account of this his marriage. Accordingly, Esther came to his chamber in his house, and poured out the wine into his face; and thus was Esther married, without making known to the king what nation she was derived from. Her uncle also removed from Babylon to Shushan, and dwelt there, being even also of the same kind, the royal family of the Medes. And thus did he, for he loved her as though she had been his own daughter.

3. Now the king had made a law, that none of his servants or the inhabitants of his kingdom should approach him, unless he were summoned by the king himself; and men with axes in their hands stood round about his throne, in order to punish such as approached to him without being called. However, the king sat with a golden sceptre in his hand, when he held out when he had a mind to save any one of those that approached to him without being called, and he who touched it was free from danger. But of this matter I have discovered sufficiently.

4. Some time after this, two eunuchs, Haman, than and Tareah, plotted against the king; and Barnabas, the servant of one of the eunuchs, being by birth a Jew, was acquainted with their conspiracy, and discovered it to the queen’s uncle; and Mordecai informed the king about it, as he had been the conspirators known to the king. This troubled the king, but he discovered the truth, and hung the eunuchs upon a cross, while at that time he sent forth unto the children, and to the people, the decree that he had been the occasion of his preservation. He only bade the scribes to set down his name in the records, and bade him stay in the palace, as an intimate friend of the king.

5. Now therefore the king, and Haman, the son of Amestath, by birth an Amalekite, that used to go in to the king; and the foreigners and Persians worshipped him, as Artaxerxes had commanded that such honor should be paid to him; but Mordecai, when he had a mind to do a thing to the advantage of his country’s laws, that he would not worship the man. When Haman observed this, he inquired whence he came; and when he understood that he was a Jew, he had indignation at him, and said within himself, that is a people whom we have never worshipped; he rather determined to abolish the whole nation, for he was naturally an enemy to the Jews, because the nation of the Amalekites, of which he was one, had done the Jews much mischief, accordingly he came to the king, and accused them, saying, “There is a certain wicked nation, and it is dispersed over all the habitable earth that is under thy dominion; a nation separate from others, unsociable, neither admitting the same sort of divine worship that others do, nor using laws like to the laws of others: at enmity with thy people, and with all men, both in their manners and practices. Now, if thou wilt be a benefactor to them, thou must be their surety, and protect them utterly, and not leave the least remains of them nor preserve any of them either for slaves or for captives.” But that the king might not be angry by reason of the threats which the Jews paid him, Haman promised to give him out of his own estate forty thousand talents whencesoever he pleased; and he said, he would pay this money very willingly that the kingdom might be freed from such a misfortune.

6. When Haman had made this petition, the king both granted it, and sent forth, and granted him the men, to do what he would with them. So Haman having gained what he desired, sent out immediately a decree, as from the king, to all nations, the contents whereof were these: “Artaxerxes the great king, to the rulers and governors of the whole dominion of my empire, to the princes of Persia and Media, and to the governors of the provinces from India to Ethiopia, sendeth this writing: Whereas I have governed many nations, and obtained the dominion of the habitable earth, and have been called, according to my desire, and have not been obliged to do any thing that is insolent or cruel to my subjects by such my power, but have showed myself mild and gentle, by taking care of their peace and good order, and have therefore given them to joy those blessings for all time to come. And whereas I have been kindly informed by Haman, who, on account of his prudence and justice, is the first in my esteem, and in dignity, and on account to myself, for his fidelity and constant good-will to me, that there is an ill-natured nation intermixed with all mankind, that is averse to our laws, and not subject to kings, and of a different conduct of life from others, that they hatch mischief, and by their arts are a great trouble to the conspirators known to the king. This troubled the king, but he discovered the truth, and hung the eunuchs upon a cross, while at that time he sent forth unto the children, and to the people, the decree that he had been the occasion of his preservation. He only bade the scribes to set down his name in the records, and bade him stay in the palace, as an intimate friend of the king.

7. Now then the king and Haman spent their time in feasting together, with good cheer and wine, but the city was in disorder.

8. Now when Mordecai was informed of what was done, he rent his clothes, and put on sackcloth, and sprinkled ashes upon his head, and went about the city, crying out, that “a nation that had been saved from the plagues of the king’s and the whole country’s laws, that he would not worship the man.” When Haman observed this, he inquired whence he came; and when he understood that he was a Jew, he had indignation at him, and said within himself, that is a people whom we have never worshipped; he rather determined to abolish the whole nation, for he was naturally an enemy to the Jews, because the nation of the Amalekites, of which he was one, had done the Jews much mischief, accordingly he came to the king, and accused them, saying, “There is a certain wicked nation, and it is dispersed over all the habitable earth that is under thy dominion; a nation separate from others, unsociable, neither admitting the same sort of divine worship that others do, nor using laws like to the laws of others: at enmity with thy people, and with all men, both in their manners and practices. Now, if thou wilt be a benefactor to them, thou must be their surety, and protect them utterly, and not leave the least remains of them nor preserve any of them either for slaves or for captives.” But that the king might not be angry by reason of the threats which the Jews paid him, Haman promised to give him out of his own estate forty thousand talents whencesoever he pleased; and he said, he would pay this

* Herodotus says, that this law (against any one’s coming uncalled to the kings of Persia when they were sitting on their thrones) was first enacted by Darius [I.e. by him who first withdrew the Medes from their settled abode], and that after him it was continued by Xerxes, and also by Artaxerxes, and all his successors. Thus, also, says Spanheim, stood guards, with their axes, about the throne of Darius, or Xerxes, the Medes being known by their axes, and being called, according to their custom, Aria Persic, because they were of Persian extraction. This custom had been such great sinners as have been universally devoted to destruction by God himself, Exod. xlix. 12, 13; Lev. xxvi. 32, 33, whether they be connected or concealed, cannot now, I doubt, be certainly determined.

the promise of money whereby Haman bought the destruction of their nation. He also gave him a copy of what was pronounced against Shushan, to be carried to Esther; and charged her to petition the king about this matter, and not to think it a dishonorable thing in her to put on a humble habit, for the safety of her nation, whereas she might depurate the ruin of the Jews, who were in danger of it; for that Haman, whose dignity was only inferior to that of the king, had accused the Jews, and had irritated the king against them. When she was informed of this, she sent for Mordecai, and, loosing him at that she was not called by the king, and that he who goes in to him without being called, is to be slain, unless, when he is willing to save any one, he holds out his golden sceptre to him; but that to withdraw it, so as not to be out being called, that person is so far from being slain, that he obtains pardon, and is entirely preserved. Now when the eunuch carried this message from Esther to Mordecai, he told him also to tell her that she must not only provide for her own preservation, but for the common preservation of her nation, for that if she now neglected this opportunity, there would certainly arise help to the Jews from some other source, but she and her father's house would be destroyed by those whom she now despised. But Esther sent the very same eunuch back to Mordecai [to desire him] to go to Shushan, and to gather the Jews that were there, and to apply to the king, and to go fast and abstain from all sorts of food on her account, and [to let him know that] she with her maidens would do the same; and then she promised that she would go to the king, though it were against the command of the king, and that if she must die for it she would not refuse it.

8. Accordingly, Mordecai did as Esther had enjoined him, and made the people fast; and he burst into tears with the rest of the Jews, and let his blood flow, and looked his nation, particularly at this time, when it was going to be destroyed; but that, as he had often before provided for them, and forgave them when they had sinned, so he would now deliver them from that destruction which was denounced against them; for although it was not all the nation that had offended, yet must they so gloriously be slain, and that he was himself the occasion of the wrath of Haman, because (said he) I have seen that this solemn day of the king's authority to pay that honor to him which I used to pay to thee, O Lord; for upon that his anger hath he contrived this present mischief against those that have not transgressed thy laws. The same supplications did he offer up; and expected that God would provide for their deliverance, and free the Israelites that were in all the earth from this calamity which was now coming upon them, for they had it before their eyes, and expected its coming. Accordingly, Esther made supplication to God after the manner of her country, by casting herself down upon the earth, and putting on her mourning garments, and bidding farewell to meat and drink, and all delicacies, for three days' time; and she entreated God to have mercy upon her, and make her words appear persuasive to the king, and render her countenance more beautiful than it was before, that both by his face and by his words, she might excite, for the arresting of the king's anger, in case he were at all irritated against her, and for the consolation of those of her own country, now they were in the utmost danger of perishing; as also, through the queen also, for she was close by, and was sapped with her, together with the king, so was he also invited again for the next day; yet, said he, am I not pleased to see Mordecai the Jew in the court. Hereupon his wife Zeresh advised him to appoint the banquet in which he had fifty cubits high, and that in the morning he should ask it of the king, that Mordecai might be hanged thereon. So he commenced her advice, and gave order to his servants to prepare the galley, and to spread the king's table, and to appoint Mordecai thereon, which was accordingly prepared. But God laughed to scorn the wicked expectations of Haman; and as he knew what the event would be, was delighted at it, for that he had determined the way the king's heart was, and the king was not willing to lose the time of his lying awake, but to spend it in something that might be of advantage to his kingdom, he commanded the scribe to bring him the chronicles of the former kings, and the records of his own acts; and when he had brought them and was reading them, one was found to have received a country on account of his excellent management on a certain occasion, and the name of the country was set down; another was found to have made a present made him on account of his fidelity: then the scribe came to Bigthan and Teresh, the eunuchs that had made a conspiracy against the king, and the queen, and the king had them put to death. Then he said in his heart,

"Now while these men were thus talking one to another, Esther's eunuchs hastened Es- thar away to come to supper; but one of the eunuchs, named Sabuchadas, saw the gallowsthat was fixed in Haman's house, and inquired of one of his servants, for what purpose they had prepared it? So he knew that it was for the queen's uncle, because Haman was about to petition the king that he might be punished, but at present he held his peace. Now when the king, with Haman, were at the banquet, he desired the queen to tell him what she would have done, and assured her that she should have whatsoever she had a mind to. She then lamented the danger her people were in; and said, that "She and her nation were given up to be destroyed, and that she, on the account of the king, could not be suffered to go out of the court, lest that she would not have troubled him if he had only given order that they should be sold into bitter servitude, for such a misfortune would not have been intolerable; but she desired that they might be delivered from such destruction as the king inquired of her who was the author of this misery to them? she then openly accu- cused Haman, and convicted him, that he had been the wicked instrument of this, and had formed this plot against them; and that it was hereupon in disorder, and w.' gone hastily out of the banquet into the gardens. Haman be- gan to intercede with Esther, and to o. rch her to forgive him as to what he had commenced for he perceived that he was in a very bad case. And as he had fallen upon the queen's bed, and was making application to her, the king came in, and being still more provoked at what he saw, "O thou wretch, (said he) thou villist of all mankind, dost thou aim to force my wife?" And when Haman was astonished at this, and not able to speak one word more, Sabuchadas the eunuch came in, and accused Haman, and said, "He found a report at his house, that Mordecai, for that the servant told him so much upon his inquiry, when he was sent to him to call him to supper." He said farther, "That the gallows was fifty cubits high." Which when the king heard, he determined that Haman should be punished after no other manner than that which had been devised by him against Morde- caic: so he gave order immediately that he should be hung upon that gallows, and be put to death after that manner, that is to say, and proclaim accordingly; for thou art (said he) my intimate friend, and hast given me good ad- vice; be thou then the minister of what thou hast advised me to do. Then he took his reward from es, for it was his life." When the king heard this order, which was entirely unexpected, he was confounded in his mind, and knew not what to do. However, he went out, and led the horse, and took the purple garment, and the golden chain for the neck, and finding Mordecai before the court, clothed in sackcloth, he bade him put that garment off, and put the purple garment on: but Mordecai, not knowing the truth of the matter, but thinking that it was done in mock his said, "O thou wretch, the villain of all mankind, dost thou laugh at our calamities?" But when he was satisfied that the king bestowed this ho- nor upon him, for the deliverance he had pro- cessed, for which he had conspired against him, he put on that purple garment which the king always wore, and put the chain about his neck, and got on horseback, and went round the city, while Haman went be- fore, and cried, "The king and queen command that the king will bestow on every one whom he loves, and esteems worthy of honor." And when they had gone round the city, Mordecai went in to the king, but Haman went home, out of the city, and cried, "The king and queen command that the king will bestow on every one whom he loves, and esteems worthy of honor." He said, that "He would never be able to be re- warded of Mordecai, for that God was with him."
be commanded the king's scribes to be sent for, and to write to the nations on the Jews' behalf, and to his governors and commanders, that were over his hundred twenty and seven provinces, from the river Indus even to the great river Euphrates. Now the contents of this epistle were these: "The great king Artaxerxes to our rulers, and those that are our faithful subjects, sendeth greeting: Many men there are, who, on account of the greatness of the benefits bestowed on them, are because of the great honor which they have obtained from the wonderful kind treatment of those that bestowed it, are not only injurious to their inferiors, but do not scruple to do evil to those that have been their benefactors: As if they would take away their gratitude from among men, and by their insolent abuse of such benefits as they never expected, they turn the abundance they have against those that are more inferior to them, and suppose they shall be concealed from God in that case, and avoid that vengeance which comes from him. Some of these men, when they have had the management of affairs committed to them by their friends, and acted of their own against some others, by deceiving those that have the power, persuade them to be angry at such as have done them no harm, till they are in danger of their lives, and this by lying accusations and false reports. This is a foule of things to be disdained by ancient examples, or such as we have learned by report only; but by some examples of such impudent attempts under our own eyes, so that it is not fit to attend any longer to such accusations, how soever the persuasions of others, but to determine what any one knows of himself to have been really done, and to punish what justly deserves it, and to grant favors and unto some, when his bounty hath been in the case of Haman, the son of Ammedatha, by birth an Ammalekite, and alien from the blood of the Persians, who, when he was hospitably entertained by us, and partook of that kindness which was all men, so that he was great a degree as to be called my father, and to be all along worshipped, and to have honor paid him all in the second rank after the royal honor due to ourselves, he could not bear his good fortune, nor give to the magnific and his prosperity with sound reason; nay, he made a conspiracy against me and my life, who gave him his authority, by endeavoring to take away Mordecai, my noble cousin, who had saved my life, and by treacherously requiring to have Esther, the partner of my life, and of my dominion, brought to destruction; for he contrived by this means to deprive me of my faithful friends; and transferred it to others: But since I perceived that these Jews, that were by this pernicious fellow devoted to destruction, were not wicked men, but conducted their lives after the best manner, and were men dedicated to the worship of that God who hath preserved the kingdome to me and to my ancestors, I do not only free them from the punishment which the former epistle, which was sent by Haman, ordered to be inflicted on them, to which if you were willing, you shall do that which I have said that they have all honor paid to them. Accordingly, I have hanged up the man that condemned such things against them, with his family, before the gates of Shushan, that punishment be not sent upon him by God, who seeth all things. And I give you in charge, that you prevent all such attempts, and that you send this to all my kingdom, that the Jews may be permitted peaceably to use their own laws, and that you assist them; that at the same season whereat their miserable estate did belong, they may defend their person, and that they may not be destroyed by the violence, the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which is Adar, for God hath made that day a day of salvation instead of a day of destruction to them; and may it be a good day to those that are at our command. And as to the case of the conspirators against us: and I will that you take notice, that every city, and every nation, that shall disobey any thing that is commanded in the law, shall be desolate with famine and sword. However, let this epistle be published through all the country that is under our obedience, and let all the Jews by all means be ready against the day before mentioned, that they may avenge themselves upon their enemies."

13. Accordingly the horsemen who carried the epistles, proceeded on the ways which they were to go with speed: but as for Mordecai, as soon as he was sent to Shushan, he put on a crown of gold, and had put the chain about his neck, he went forth in a public procession; and when the Jews who were at Shushan, saw him in so great honor with the king, they thought his government over all the kingdom of Persia would be with joy and a beam of salvation encompassed the Jews, both those that were in the cities, and those that were in the countries, upon the publication of the king's edict, of iniquitous, that many even of other nations circumcised their forefathers for fear of the Jews, that they might procure safety to themselves thereby; for on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which according to the Macedonians, Dystrus, those that carried the king's epistle gave them notice, that the same day wherein their danger was to have been, on that very day should they destroy their enemies. But now the rulers of the provinces, and the tyrants, and the kings, and the scribes, had the Jews in esteem; for the fear they were in of Mordecai forced them to act with discretion. Not that they were out of the world, but only that according to the country that was subject to the king, it fell out that the Jews at Shushan slew five hundred of their enemies: and when the king had told Esther the number of those that were slain in that city, and in all the other places he had heard of it, in the provinces, he asked her, whether she would have any thing farther done against them? for that it should be done accordingly: upon which she desired that the Jews might be permitted to treat their remaining enemies in the same manner the next day; as also that they might hang the ten sons of Haman upon the gallows. So the king permitted the Jews so to do, as desirous not to contradict: Esther. So they were again called for, but their account was on the fourteenth day of the month Dystrus, and slew about three hundred of their enemies, but touched suspected a deeper design in Haman than openly appeared, viz. that knowing the Jews would be satisfied, and that he could not transfer the crown to his own family, who was an Agaga, Esth. 8, 10, 16; and the posterity of Agag, the old king of the Amalekites, 1 Sam. xv. 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, 13, 17; Esth. 6, 10; and all Haman, having enjoined this death to him, were of his mind to see signed to his name the decree for the Jews' slaughter, instead of the king's; and so might have rendered it by his own erroneous interpretation: for when he said, "The king's unwritten letter," there is an unwritten letter mentioned in the other edicts, which was a false edict, issued by the king against the Jews, and was sent to the provinces, that they might slay the Jews. This was detected in the 20th of the Jews' enemies which were soon destroyed by the Jews, on the permission of the king, which must be true, for that letter was written, from the hand of the king, to the king's officers in the provinces, to destroy the Jews, Estod. xiii, 15, 14, and that thereby was fulfilled Balaam's prophecy, "Amelek was the first of the nations, but he latter and shall be, that priest for ever." Numb. xxii. 30.
nothing of what riches they had. Now there was slain by the Jews that were in the country, and in the other cities, seventy-five thousand of their enemies, and those were slain on the thirteenth day of the month, and the next day they kept as a festival. In like manner the Jews that were in the temple gathered, and feasted on the fourteenth day and that which followed it; whereas it is, that even now all the Jews that are in the habitable earth have these days festival, and set portions to one another. Mordacai also wrote to those Jews that lived in the kingdom of Artaxerxes to observe these days, and celebrate them as festivals, and to deliver them down to posterity, that this feast might be the memory of all people; for it was so that it might never be buried in oblivion, for since they were about to be destroyed on these days by Haman, they would do a right thing, upon escaping the danger in them, and on them inflicting punishments on their enemies, to observe those days, and give thanks to God on them: for which cause the Jews still keep the aforementioned days, and call them days of Phurim (or Purim). * And Mordecai became a great and illustrious man, and was made assistant to the king, and assisted him in the government of the people. He also lived with the queen; so that the affairs of the Jews were by their means better than they could ever have hoped for. And thus was the state of the Jews under the reign of Artaxerxes.

CHAFT VII.

How John slew his Brother Jesus in the Temple; and how Bagoses offered many Injuries to the Jews, and what Sanballat did.

§ 1. When Elisabeth the high priest was dead, his son Judas succeeded in the high priesthood; and when he was dead, his son John took that dignity: on whose account it was also that Bagoses, the general of another Artaxerxes's army, polluted the temple, and cast it open to the Jews that out of the public stock, before they offered the daily sacrifices, they should pay for every lamb fifty shekels. Now Jesus was the brother of John, and was a friend of Bagoses, who had promised to procure him the high priesthood. In confidence of whose support, Jesus quarrelled with John in the temple, and so provoked his brother, that in his anger his brother slew him. Now it was a horrible thing for the Jews to be the authors of so great a crime; and so much the more horrible, that there never was so cruel and impious a thing done neither by the Greeks nor barbarians. However, God did not neglect its punishment, but the people were on that very account enslaved, and the temple was polluted by the Persians. Now when Bagoses, the general of Artaxerxes's army, knew that John, the high priest of the Jews, had slain his own brother Jesus in the temple, he came upon the Jews immediately, and began in anger to say to them, "Have you had the impudence to perpetrate a murder in your temple?" And as he was aiming to go into the temple, they forbade him so to do; but he said to them, "Am I not greater than he that was slain in the temple of your fathers?" Now these words, he went into the temple. Accordingly, Bagoses made use of this pretense, and punished the Jews seven years for the murder of Jesus.

§ 2. Now when John had departed this life, his son Judas succeeded in the high priesthood. He had a brother, whose name was Manasseh. Now there was one Sanballat, who was sent by Darius, the king of Persia, to Jerusalem. He was a Cuthian by birth; of which stock were the Samaurians also. This man knew that the city Jerusalem was a famous city, and that their kings had given a great deal of trouble to the Assyrians, and the people of Colcestris; so that he willingly gave his daughter, whose name was Nicaea, in marriage to Manasseh, as thinking this alliance by marriage would be a pledge and security that the nation of the Jews should continue their good-will to him.

CHAFT VIII.

Concerning Sanballat and Manasseh, and the Temple which they built on Mount Gerizim; and how Alexander made his Entry into the City Jerusalem; and what Benhifa he bestowed on the Jews.

§ 1. About this time it was that Philip, king of Macedon, was treacherously assaulted and slain at Egea by Pausanias, the son of Cerasus, who was derived from the family of Crete, and his son Alexander succeeded him in the kingdom; who, passing over the Hellespont, overcame the generals of Darius's army in a battle fought at Granicus. So he marched over Lydia, and subdued Ionia and overran Caria, and fell upon the places of Pamphylia, as he has been related elsewhere.

2. But the elders of Jerusalem being very uneasy that the brother of Judas the high priest, though married to a foreigner, should be a partner with him in the high priesthood, quarrelled with him; for they esteemed this man's marriage a step to such as should be desirous of transgressing about the marriage of [strange] wives, and that this would be the beginning of contamination with foreigners, although the offence of some about marriages, and their having married wives that were not of their own country, had been an occasion of their former captivity, and of the miseries they then underwent; so they commanded Manasseh to divorce his wife, or not to approach the altar, the high priest himself joining with the people in their indignation against his brother, and driving him away from the temple.

* Concerning this other Artaxerxes, called Memneres, and the Persians attacked by the Jews and Romans under him, occasioned by the murder of the high priest's brother in the holy house itself, see Andoet the Rec. at large, p. 586. This Josephus wholly omits the rest of the kings of Persia after Artaxerxes Memnon, till he came to their last king Da-

Whereupon Manasseh came to his father-in-law, Sanballat, and told him, that "all though he loved his daughter Nicolas, yet was he not willing to be deprived of his sacred duty on her account, which was the principal dignity in their nation, and always continued in the same family." And then Sanballat promised him, not only to preserve to him the honor of his priesthood, but to procure to him the power and dignity of a high priest, and would make him governor of all the places he himself now reigned, if he would join himself to him. He also told him further, that he would build him a temple like that at Jerusalem, upon mount Gerizim, which is the highest of all the mountains that are round about Samaria, and he promised him that he would do this with the approbation of Darius the king. Manasseh was elevated with these promises, and said to Sanballat, upon a supposal that he should gain a high priesthood, as bestowed on him by Darius, for it happened that Sanballat was then in years. But there was now a great disturbance among the people of Jerusalem, because many of those priests and Levites were estranged in sects match; for they all revolved with the Samaritans, and Sanballat afforded them money, and divided among them land for tillage, and habitations also, and all this in order every way to gratify his son-in-law.

3. About this time it was that Darius heard how Alexander had made himself supreme over the Hellenes, and had beaten his lieutenants in the battle of Granicum, and was proceeding farther: whereupon he gathered together an army of horse and foot, and determined that he would meet the Macedonians before them, and conquer all Asia beyond. So he passed over the river Ephrates, and came over Taurus, the Cilician mountain; and at Amsos of Cilicia he waited for the enemy, as ready there to give battle. Upon which Sanballat was glad that Darius was come down; and told Manasseh that he would suddenly perform his promises to him, and this as soon as ever Darius should come back, after he had beaten his enemies; for he was not only, but all those that were in Asia also, were persuaded that the Macedonians would not so much as come to battle with the Persians, on account of their multitude. But the event proved otherwise than they expected, for the Macedonians, when they perceived that their army was beaten, and lost a great part of his army. His mother also, and his wife and children, were taken captives, and he fled into Persia. So Alexander entered Syria, and took Damascus; and when he had obtained Sido, he took Tyre, when he sent an epistle to the Jewish high priest, "To send him some auxiliaries, and to supply his army with provisions; and that what presents he formerly sent to Darius, he would now send to him, and choose the friendship of the Macedonians, and that he should never repent of doing it." But the high priest answered the messengers, that "he had given his oath to Darius not to bear arms against him; and he said, that he would not transgress this while Darius was in the land of the living." Upon hearing this answer Alexander was very angry; and though he determined not to leave Tyre, which was just ready to fall into the hands of Alexander, as he had taken it, he threatened that he would make an expedition against the Jewish high priest, and through him teach all men to whom they must keep their oaths. He also, when he had, with a good deal of pains during the siege, taken Tyre, and after killing the king and his city, he came to the city of Gaza, and besieged both the city and him who was governor of the garrison, whose name was Subemises.

5. And when he understood that he was not far from the city, he went out in procession, with the priests and the Levites, that the procession was venerable, and the manner of it different from that of other nations. It reached to a place called Sapha, which name, translated into Greek, signifies a prospect, for you have three towns of this name on the road, and on the precipice of the temple; and when the Phoenicians and the Chaldeans that followed him, thought they should have liberty to plunder the city, and torment the high priest to death, which the king's displeasure fairly promised them, the very reverse of it happened; for Alexander, when he saw the multitude at a distance, in white garments, while the priests stood clothed with fine linen, and the high priest was put in purple and scarlet clothing, with his mitre on his head, having the golden plate whereon the name of God was engraved, he approached by himself, and adored that Name, and first saluted the high priest. The Jews also did all to honor him, and his horsemen compassed him about: whereupon the king of Syria, and the rest, were surprised at what Alexander had done, and supposed him disordered in his mind. However, Parmenio alone went up to him, and held "How it cannot be that when all others adored him, he should adore the high priest of the Jews?" To whom he replied, I did not adore him, but that God who hath beneath the heavens, he saw this very person in a dream, in this very habit, when I was at Dios in Macedonia, who, when I was considering with myself how I might obtain the dominion of Asia, exhorted me to make no delay, but boldly to pass over the sea thither, for that he would conduct my army, and would give me the dominion over the Persians; whence it is, that having seen no other in that habitat, and now seeing this person in it, and remembering that vision, and the exhortation which I had in my dream, I believe that he would take this army under the divine conduct, and shall therewith conquer Darius, and destroy the power of the Persians, and that all things will succeed according to what is in my own mind." And when he had said this to Parmenio, and had given the high priest his right hand, the priests ran along by him, and he came into the city. And when he went up into the temple, he offered sacrifice to God, according to the high priest's direction; and magnificently treated both the high priest and the priests. And when the book of Daniel was shown him, wherein Daniel declared that one of the Greeks should destroy the empire of the Persians, he supposed that himself was the person intended: and as he was then glad, he dismissed the multitude for the present, but the next day he called them to him, and bade them ask what favors they pleased of him; whereupon he heard it, and said that they might enjoy the laws of their forefathers, and might pay no tribute on the seventh year. He granted all they desired. And when they entrusted him with a certain part in Babylonia and Media to enjoy their own laws also, he willingly promised to do hereafter what they desired. And when he said to the multitude, that if any of them would list themselves in his army, on this condition, that they should continue under the laws of their forefathers, and live ac-con-forming to them, he was willing to take them with him, many were ready to accompany him in his war.

6. So when Alexander had thus settled matters at Jerusalem, he led his army into the neighboring cities; and when all the inhabitants, to whom he came, received him with great kindness, the Samaritans, who had then Shechem for their metropolis, (a city situate at mount Gerizim, and inhabited by apostates of the Jewish nation,) seeing that Alexander had so greatly honored the Jews, determined to profess them selves Jews, for such is the disposition of the Samaritans, as we have already elsewhere declared, that when the Jews are in adversity they deny that they are of kin to them, and then they confess the truth; but when they perceive that some good fortune hath befallen them, they immediately pretend to have companionship with them, saying, that they belong to them, and devote their genealogy from the posterity of Joseph, Ephraim, and Manasseh. Accordingly, they made their address to the king with splendor, and showed great alacrity in meeting him at a little distance from Jerusalem. And when Alexander had commanded them, the Shechemites approached to him, taking with them the troops that Samballat had sent him, and they desired that he would come to their city, and do honor to their temple also. To whom he promised that when he returned he would come to them.
And when they petitioned that he would remit the tribute of the seventh year to them, because they did not sow thereon, he asked who they were that made such a petition; and when they said that they were Hebrews, but had the name of Sidoanians, living at Shechem, he asked them again, whether they were Jews and when they said they were not Jews, "It was to the Jews (said he) that I granted that privilege; however, when I return and am thoroughly informed by you of this matter, I will do it as seems me proper." And in this manner he took leave of the Shechemites, but ordered that the troops of Samballat should follow him into Egypt, because there he designed to give them lands, which he did a little after in his progress, when he ordered them to guard that country.

7. Now when Alexander was dead, the government was parted among his successors, but the temple upon mount Gerizim remained. And if any one were by the act of the Jews for having eaten things common, or of having broken the Sabbath, or of any other crime of the like nature, he was at a fine, and when he had said that he was accused unjustly. About this time it was that Judas the high priest died;
and Onias his son took the high priesthood.
This was the state of the affairs of the people of Jerusalem at this time.

BOOK XII.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF A HUNDRED AND SEVENTY YEARS.—FROM THE DEATH OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT TO THE DEATH OF JUDAS MACCABEUS.

CHAP. I.

How Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, took Jerusalem and Judas by Deceit and Treachery, and carried away many of the Jews thence, and planted them in Egypt.

§ 1. Now when Alexander, king of Macedon, had put an end to the dominion of the Persians, and had settled the affairs in Judea after the forementioned manner, he ended his life, and an army near left him so many, Antigonos obtained Asia; Seleucus; Babylon; and of the other nations which were there, Lysimachus governed the Hellenes, and Cassander possessed Macedonia; and Athens, the Scipio, was set upon Egypt. And while these prices ambitiously strove one against another, every one for his own principality, it came to pass that there were continual wars, and those lasting wars too; and the cities were sufferers, that in great many of their inhabitants in these times of distress, insomuch that all Syria, by the means of Ptolemy the son of Lagus, underwent the reverse of that denomination of Saviour which he then had. He also seized upon Jerusalem, and for that end made use of deceit and treachery;

for as he came into the city on a Sabbath-day, as if he would offer sacrifices, he without any trouble gained the city, while the Jews did not oppose him, for they did not suspect him to be their enemy. And he gained it thus, because they were free from suspicion of him, and be-because on that day they were at rest and quietness; and when he had gained it, he ruled over it in a cruel manner. Nay, Agatharchides of Cnidus, who habitation in the city strong and great, named Jerusalem. These men took no care, but let it come into the hands of Ptolemy, as not willing to take arms, and thereby they submitted to be under a hard master, by reason of their unasstoable superstition." This is what Agatharchides relates of our nation. But when Ptolemy had taken a great many captives, both from the mountainous parts of Judea, and from the places about Jerusalem and Samarit, and the places near mount Gerizim, he led them all into Egypt.

and settled them there. And as he knew that the people of Jerusalem were most faithful in the observation of oaths and covenants, and this from the answer they made to Alexander, when he sent an embassy to them, after he had beaten Darius in battle, as he distributed many of them into garrisons, and at Alexandria gave them equal privileges of citizens with the Macedonians themselves; and required of them to take their oaths, that they would keep their faith, and the action of those who committed those places to their care. Nay, there were not a few other Jews, who, of their own accord, went into Egypt, as invited by the goodness of the soil, and by the liberality of Ptolemy. However, the law of Moses, the most holy law, in relation to the Samaritans, on account of their resolution to preserve that conduct of life which was delivered to them by their forefathers, and they thereupon contended one with another; while those of Jerusalem said, that their temple was holy, and resolved to send their sacrifices thither; but the Samaritans were resolved, that they should be sent to mount Gerizim.

CHAP. II.

How Ptolemy Philadelphus procured the Laws of the Jews to be translated into the Greek Tongue; and set many Captives free; and dedicated many Gifts to God.

1. When Alexander had reigned twelve years, and after him Ptolemy Soter forty years, Ptolemy Philadelphus, the son of Physcon, of Egypt, and held it forty years within one. He procured the law to be interpreted; and set free those that were come from Jerusalem into Egypt, and were in slavery there, who were a hundred and thousand. The occasion was this: Demetrius Phalaris, who was library-keeper to the king, was now endeavoring, if it were possible, to gather together all the books that were in the habitable earth, and buying whatsoever was valuable, or became accessible to the king's inclination, (who was very earnestly set upon collecting of books;) to which inclination of his, Demetrius was zealously subservient. And when once Ptolemy asked him how many ten thousands of books he had collected, he replied, that he had already about twenty times ten thousand, but that, in a little time, he should have fifty times ten thousand. But he said, he had heard about the same that there were many books of laws among the Jews worthy of inquiring after, and worthy of the king's library, but which being written in characters and in a dialect of their own, will cause no small pains in getting them translated into the Greek tongue; that the character in which they are written seems to be like to that which is the proper character of the Syrians; and that its sound, when pronounced, is like theirs also; and that this sound appears to be peculiar to themselves, and he had said, that nothing hindered why they might not get these books to be translated also, for while nothing is wanting that is necessary for that purpose, we may have their books also in this library. So the king thought that Demetrius was very zealous to procure him abundance of books, and that he suggested what was exceeding proper for him to do; and therefore he wrote to the Jewish high priest that he should act accordingly.

2. Now there was one Aristus, who was among the king's most intimate friends, and on account of his modesty very acceptable to him. This Aristus, therefore, in due time, before now, to petition the king that he would set all the captive Jews in his kingdom free; and he thought this to be a convenient opportunity for the making that petition. So he discovered, in the presence of the king, the multitude of those who guarded, Sossibus of Tarrentum, and Andreas; and persuaded them to assist him in what he was going to intercede with the king for. Accordingly, Aristus embraced the same opinion with those that have been before mentioned; and went to the king, and made the following speech to him: "It is not fit for us, O king, to overlook things hastily, or to deceive ourselves, but to lay the matter before us, for since we have hardly determined not only to get the laws of the Jews transcribed, but interpreted also, for thy satisfaction, by what means we can do this, while so many of the Jews are now slaves in thy kingdom? Do thou then weigh what is possible to thy majesty, what is possible to thy good nature; free them from the miserable condition they are in, because that God, who supporteth thy kingdom, was the author of their migration to this country; acquit them of all the charges for both these people, and we also, worship the same God, the framers of all things. We call him and that truly, by the name of Zeus, [or Life, or Jupiter], because he breathes life into all men. We wander through all the countries of our own country, and this to the hoose of God, because these men pay a peculiar excellency that worship to him. And know this further, that though I be not of kin to them by birth, nor have I been invested with any authority to give these favors to be done them, since all men are the workmanship of God; and I am sensible that he is well pleased with those that do good. I do, therefore, put up this petition to thee, to do good to the Jews.

3. When Aristus was saying thus, the king looked upon him with a cheerful and joyful countenance, and said, "How many ten thousands of these Jews are there, that can be made free?" To which Andronicus replied, as he stood by, and said, "A few more than ten times ten thousand." The king made answer "And is this a small gift that thou askest, Aristus?" But Sossibus, and the rest that, were present, said, that "he ought to offer such a thank-offering as was worthy of his greatness of soul, to that God who had given him his kingdom." With this answer he was much pleased; and gave order, that when they paid the soldiers their wages, they should lay down [a hundred and] twenty drachmae for every one of the slaves." And he promised to publish a magnificent decree, about what they requested, which should confirm what Aristaeus had proposed, and especially what God willed should be done; wherefore, he said, he would not only set the free who had been left captive by his father and his army, but those who were in his kingdom before, and those also, if any such there were, who had been brought away since. And when they said that their redemption money would not suffice to do it to their hand, he further granted it. A copy of which decree I have determined to preserve, that the magnanimity of this king may be made known. Its contents were as follows: And he said, soldiers, under our father, and who, when their countrymen Syrias and Phoenicia, and the last Judea, took the Jewish captives, and made them slaves, and brought them into our cities, and into this country, and their sons, and their descents, into slavery, and to this kingdom before them, and if there be any that have been lately brought thither, be made free by those that possess them; and let them accept of a hundred and twenty drachmas for every slave. And it is the only revenue that had been money with their pay, and the rest out of the king's treasury: for I suppose that they were made captives without our father's consent, and against equity; and that their country was harassed by them, and by removing them into Egypt, the soldiers have made a great profit by them. Out of regard therefore to justice, and out of pity to those that have been transformed to slavery, I enjoin those that have such Jews among their servants to set them at liberty, upon the receipt of the before-mentioned sum; and that no one use any deceit about them, but obey what is here commanded. And we will of our, and their names, within three days after the publication of this edict, to such as are appointed to execute the same, and to produce the slaves before them also, for I think it will be for the advantage of my affairs, and of the commonwealth, for the slaves to obey the commands that do not obey this decree; and I will that their estates be confiscated into the king's treasury. When this decree was read to the king, it at first contained the rest that is here inserted. And it was not of the same persons that had formerly been brought, and those brought afterward, which had not been distinctly mentioned; so he added these clauses out of his humanity, and to prevent great grief to many. He gave order that the payments which was to be made in a hurry, should be divided among the king's ministers, and among the officers of his treasury. When this was over, what the king had decreed was published by his son, even in no more than seven days' time, the number of the talents paid for the captives being above four hundred and sixty, and this because their masters required the hundred and twenty drachmai for the children also, the king having in effect commanded that these should be paid for, when he said in his decree that they should receive the aforesaid sum for every slave.

4. Now when this had been done after so magnificent a manner, many Jews went from their king's inclinations, he gave order to Demetrius to give him in writing his sentiments concerning the transcribing of the Jewish books, for no part of the administration was left only to the kings, but all things are managed with great circumspection. On which account I have subjoined a copy of these epistles, and set down the multitude of the vessels sent as gifts [to Jerusalem,] and the construction of every one, that the exactness of the artificer's workmanship, as it appeared to those that saw them, and which workman made every vessel, may be made manifest, and this on account of the excellency of the vessels themselves. Now the copy of the epistle he sent to this purpose: "Demetrius to the great king: When thou, O king, gavest me a charge concerning the collection of books that were wanting to fill thy library, and concerning the care that should be taken of the works of the old men, I have used the utmost diligence about those matters. And I let you know, that we want the books of the Jewish legislation, with some others, for they are written in the Hebrew language, and being in the language of that nation, are to us unknown. It hath also happened to them, that they have been transcribed more carelessly than they ought to have been, because they have not had the care of the wise men in them. Now it is necessary that thou shouldst have accurate copies of them. And indeed this legislation is full of hidden wisdom, and entirely blameless, as being the legislation of God: for which cause it is, they pleased. He says, that the poets and historians make no mention of it, nor of those men that lead their lives according to it, since it is a holy law, and ought not to be published by profane mouths. If then it please thee, O king, give such a copy of the books of the Jews, to send six of the elders out of every tribe, and those such as are most skilful in the laws, that by their means we may learn the clearness and agreement of those books, and may obtain an accurate interpretation of them, and so may have such a collection of these, as may be suitable to thy desire."

5. When this epistle was sent to the king, he commanded that a hundred talents in money should be sent to the temple for sacrifices, and for other uses. Now I will give a description of these vessels, in the manner of their construction, but not till after I have set forth a copy of the epistle which was written to Eleazar the high priest, who had obtained that dignity on the occasion following: When Onias the high priest was deposing his son, and had no successor. He was called Simon the Just, because of both his piety towards God, and his kind disposition to those of his own nation. When he was dead, and had left a young son, who was called Onias, Simon's brother Eleazar, of whom we are speaking, took the high priesthood; and he it was to whom Ptolemy wrote, and that in the manner following: "King Ptolemy to Eleazar the high priest, sendeth greeting: There are many of my kinsmen who are in power, among the Persians, when they were in power, carried captives. These were honored by my father; some of them he placed in the army, and gave them greater pay than ordinary; to others of them, when they came from him, he had committed his garrisons, and the guarding of them, that they might be a terror to the Egyptians. And when I had taken the government, I treated all men with humanity, and especially would rather redeem them at a cheaper rate than at a dearer rate, there is great reason to prefer here Aristaeus's reform before that of his father's."

6. We have a very great encomium of this Simon the Just, the son of Onias I. in the fifth chapter of Eusebius's Chronicle. Page 205.
those that are thy fellow-citizens, of whom I have set free above a hundred thousand that were slaves, and paid the price of their redemption to their masters out of my own revenues; and those that are of a fit age, I have admitted into the number of my soldiers. And for such as are capable of being faithful to me, and proper for my court, I have put them in such a post, as thinking this [kindness done to them] to be a very encouraging and acceptable gift which I devote to God for his providence over me. And as I am desirous to do what will be grateful to these, and to all the other Jews in the habitable earth, I have determined to procure an interpretation of the book of Daniel, which I translated out of Hebrew into Greek, and to be deposited in my library. Thou wilt therefore do well to choose out and send to me men of a good character, who are now elders in age, and in number, cut of every tribe. These, by their age, must be skillful in the laws, and of abilities to make an accurate interpretation of them: and when this shall be finished, I shall think that I have done a work great and magnificent. And I have sent to thee, Alexander, the captain of my guard, and Aristobulus, men whom I have in very great esteem; by whom I have sent those first-fruits which I have dedicated to the temple, and to the sacrifice and to the other services, to the very sum of one hundred talents. And if thou wilt send to us, to let us know what thou wouldest have further, thou wilt do a thing acceptable to me."

8. When this epistle of the king was brought to me, and I was desirous of conveying it with all the respect possible: "Bless the high priest, to king Ptolemy, sendeth greeting: If thou and thy queen Arsinoe, and thy children, be well, we are desirous of hearing thy epistle, we greatly rejoiced at thy intentions; and when the multitude were gathered together, we read it to them, and thereby made them sensible of the piety thou hast towards God. We also adjourned the multitude, the gold, and three hundred talents for the show-bread; as also the hundred talents for the sacrifices, and for the making what shall be needful at the temple. Which things and others, and we have honored to friends of thine, have brought us; and truly they are persons of an excellent character, and of great learning, and worthy of thy virtue. Know then, that we will gratify thee in what is for thy welfare; but when we are ready not to do before, for we ought to make a return for the numerous acts of kindness which thou hast done to our countrymen. We immediately thanked thee for the kindness, and thy sister, with thy children, and friends; and the multitude made prayers, that thy affairs may be to thy mind, and that thy kingdom may be preserved in peace, and that the translation of our law may come to the conclusion thou desirest, and be for thy advantage. We have also chosen six elders out of every tribe, whom we have sent, and the law with them. It will be thy part, out of thy piety and justice, to send back the law, which we have translated into thy version, and to return it to those that bring it in safety. Farewell."

7. This was the reply which the high priest made. But it does not seem to me to be necessary to set down the names of the seventy [two] elders who translated the law, which yet were subjoined at the end of the epistle. However, I thought it not improper to give an account of those very valuable and sacred books which were sent to the king sent to God, that all may see how great a regard the king had for God; for the king allowed a vast deal of expenses for these vessels, and used to seek after the workmen, and view their works, and suffered nothing of carelessness or negligence to be any damage to their operations. And I will relate how rich they were also as I am able, although perhaps the nature of this history may not require such a description, but I imagine I shall thereby recommend the elegant taste and magnanimity of this king to those that read it. And first I will describe what belongs to the table. It was indeed in the king's mind to make this table vastly large in its dimensions; but then he gave orders that they should have the appearance and the magnitude of the table which was already at Jerusalem, and how large it was, and whether there were a possibility of making one larger than it. And when he was informed how large that was which was already the case, and that nothing hindered but a larger might be made, he said, that "he was willing to have one made that should be five times as large as the present table, but his fear was that it might be there hung up in their chamber, which raised it to too great largeness;" for he desired that the gifts he presented them should not only be there for show, but should be useful also in their sacred ministrations. According to which reasoning that he desired that the table should be made of the same size, and not for want of gold, he resolved that he would not exceed the former table in largeness; but would make it exceed it in the variety and elegance of its materials. And the table was to be formed of the choicest of all things, and in having a just notion of what was new and surprising, and where there were no sculptures, he would invent such as were proper, by his own art, and would place them so as to be to the workmen, as he commanded that such sculptures should now be made, and that those which were delineated, should be most accurately formed by a constant regard to their delineation.

8. But thus the table was to be formed, he had undertaken to make the table, they framed it in length two cubits [and half,] in breadth one cubit, and in height one cubit and a half; and the entire structure of the work was of gold. They withal made two doors for the table, one for the wavework woven about it, and with an engraving which imitated a cord, and was admirably turned on its three parts; for as they were of a triangular figure, every angle had the same appearance; and the doors were turned about them, the very same form of them was turned about without any variation.

Now that part of the crownwork that was enclosed by the doors, and the sides of the table, and the whole of the cards, but that part which went round on the outside was more elaborately adorned with most beautiful ornaments, because it was exposed to sight, and to the view of the spectators; for which reason it was that both those sides which were extent above the rest, were acute: and none of the angles, which we before told you were three, appeared less than another, when the table was turned about. Now into the cordwork thus turned, he had made two precious stones, to be set in parallel to one the other, enclosed in golden buttons, which hadouches in them; but the parts which were on the side of the crown, and were exposed to the sight, were adorned with a row of stones, a perfect circle of gold, and on these excellent sort of precious stones, which imitated rods laid close, and encompassed the table round about. But under these oval figures, thus engraved, he had a fine workmanship, and in it, where the nature of all sorts of fruit was represented, insomuch that the bunches of grapes

*When we have here and presently mention made of Philadelphia's queen and sister Arsinoe, we are to remember, with Sapesheim, that Arsinoe was both his sister and his wife, according to the old custom of Pera. sin, and of Egypt at this very time: may, of the Assyrians long afterward. See Antiq. b. xx. ch. II sect. 1, whence we have, upon the columns of Philadelphia, this known inscription, the divine brother and sister.
hung up. And when they had made the stones to represent all the kinds of fruit before mentioned, and that, such in its proper color, they made them fast with gold round the whole table. The like disposition of the oval figures, and of the engraved rods, was framed under the crown, that the table might on each side show the same appearance of variety and elegance of its ornamentation, so that neither the position of the workmanship nor of the crown might be different, although the table were turned on the other side, but that the prospect of the same articulation could be seen throughout, for there was made a plate of gold of four fingers broad, through the entire breadth of the table, into which they inserted the feet, and then fastened them down by buttons and before- holes, at the place where in its proper color, that is, so on what side soever of the table one should stand, it might exhibit the very same view of the exquisite workmanship, and of the vast extent of gold of all the colors from self they engraved a medallion, inserting into it very valuable stones in the middle, like stars of various colors: the carbuncle and the emerald, each of which sent out agreeable rays of light to the moon. And these were also as much as was possible, and as were carried, as being most precious in their kind. Hard by this medallion a texture of set work ran round it, the middle of which appeared like a rhombus, in which they inserted figures, which, by the great resemblance of the appearance they made, gave wonderful delight to those that saw them. The chapters of the feet imitated the fine budgings of lilies, while their leaves were beset with gold. And so that the chives were seen standing upright within them. Their bases were made of a carbuncle; and the place at the bottom, which rested itself, had a joinery of rich gold fingers in breadth. Now they had engraved upon it with a very fine tool, and with a great deal of pains, a branch of ivy, and tendrils of the vine, sending forth clusters of grapes, that you would guess and upon it nourished them from real tendrils, for they were so very thin, and so very far extended at their extremities, that they were moved with the wind, and made one believe that they were the product of nature, and not the effect of artificers. In the entire workmanship of the table appear to be threefold, while the joints of the several parts were so united together as to be invisible, and the places where they joined could not be distinguished. When the king stood adorning the stones of those membranes, and the exactness of the junctions; which could not be perceived, (so exactly were they connected one with another;) and this he did for a considerable time. He then said that he returned them thanks for coming to him, and still greater thanks to him that sent them; and, above all, to that God whose laws they appeared to be. Then did the elders, and those that were present with them, cry out with one voice, and wished all happiness to the king. Upon which he fell into tears by the violence of the pleasure he had, it being natural to men to afford the same indications in great joy, that they do under sorrow. And he delivered his hand, and took from the hands of those that were appointed to receive them, he saluted the men; and said, that it was but just to discourse, in the first place, of the errand they were sent about, and then to address himself to them, to enquire what they meant. And he said, that he would make this day on which they came to him remarkable and eminent every year through the whole course of his life; for their coming to him, and the victory which he gained over Antigonus by sea, proved his salvation to all the Jews. He lodgings should do it. Accordingly when three days were over, Demetrius took them, and went over the causeway seven furlongs. It was a bank in the sea, to an island. And when they had gone over the bridge, he proceeded to the northern parts, and showed them where they should meet, which was in a house that was built near the shore, and was a quiet place, and fit for their discoursing together about their work. Accordingly he had brought with him entreaties, and great pains, and this they continued to do till the ninth hour of the day; after which time they relaxed, and took care of their body, while their food was provided for them in great plenty; but the men who brought them a great deal of what was provided for the king himself. But in the morning they came to the court and saluted Ptolemy, and then went away to their former place, where, when they had washed the vessels, and purified themselves, they betook themselves to the interpretation of the law. Now when the law was transcribed, and the labor of interpretation was over, which came to its conclusion towards the two years, they ordered all the Jews together to the place where the laws were translated, and where the interpreters were, and read them over. The multitude did also approve of the law, and read it with a loud voice. They withal commended Demetrius for his proposal, as the inventor of what was greatly for their happiness; and they desired that he would give leave to their rulers also to read the same law, Moreover, they desired that all the ancients of the elders, and the principal men of their commonwealth, made it their request, that since the interpretation was happily finished, it might continue in the state it now was, and might be written. And when the counsel was prevailed on, they enjoined, that if any one observed either any thing superfluous, or any thing omitted, that he would take a view of it again, and have it laid before them. And when the thing was judged to have been well done, it might continue for ever.

14. So the king rejoiced, when he saw that his design was so extremely approved of; and he was of great advantage; and he was chiefly delighted with hearing the laws read to him, and was astonished at the deep meaning and wisdom of the legislator. And he began to discourse with him on this subject. "How it came to pass," says he, "that when this legislation was so wonderful, so one, either of the poets or of the historians, had made mention of it." Demetrius made answer, that "no one durst be so bold as to touch upon the description of these laws, because they were both the perfect and the divine, and venerable, and because some that had attempted it were afflicted by God." He also told him, that "Theopompos was desirous of writing somewhat about them, but that he had not the courage to undertake it above thirty days' time; and upon some intermission of his distemper, he appened God [by prayer] as suspecting that his madness proceeded from that cause."

\[\text{\footnotesize *This is the most ancient example I have met with, of a grace, or short prayer, or thanksgiving, before meat; which was said by a Jew, the priest, as now said by Eleazar, a Jewish priest, who was one of those seventy-two interpreters. The next example I have met with is that of the Essence, Of the War, b. ii. ch. vii. sect. 5, both before and after it; those of our Saviour before b. Mark vii. 8; John vi. 11, 23, and St. Luke, iv. 6. \[\text{\footnotesize \{This purification of the interpreters, by washing in the sea, before they prayed to God, every morning, and before they set about translating, may be compared with the like practice of Peter the apostle, in the recognitions of Clement, b. iv. ch. iii. and b. ch. xxxvi., and with the same practice of the Jews, which were sometimes built near the sea or rivers also. Of which matter, see Antiq. b. xiv. chap. x. sect. 23, and Acts xvi. 13, 16.\}}\]
Nay, indeed, he further saw in a dream, that his distemper befell him while he indulged too great a curiosity about divine matters, and was desirous of publishing them among common men: yet when he left off that attempt, he recovered his understanding again. Moreover, he informed him of Theodectes, the tragic poet, concerning whom it was reported, that when in a certain dramatic representation, he was desirous to make mention of things that were contained in the sacred books, he was afflicted with a darkness in his eyes: and that upon his being conscious of the occasion of his distemper, and appeasing God, by prayer, he was freed from that affliction. 15. But he did not believe the books of Demetrius, as we have said already, as adored them, and gave order that great care should be taken of them, that they might remain interpretable. He, if any of them that the interpreters would come often to him out of Judæa, and that both an account of the respects that he would pay them, and an account of the presents he would make them: for he said, "it was now not just to send them away, although, if of their own accord they would come to him hereafter, they should obtain all that their own wisdom might justly require, and what his generosity was able to give them. So he then sent them away. And it is reported that they made the best of the best sort, and two talents of gold, and a cup of the value of one talent, and the furniture of the room wherein they were seated. And they gave the things they presented to them. But by them he sent to Seleucus, ten beds, with feet of silver, and the furniture to those belonging, and a cup of the value of thirty talents; and besides these, ten garments, and purple, and the use of the finest woven lines; as also vessels and dishes, and vessels for pouring, and two golden cisterns to be dedicated to God. He also desired him, by an epistle, that he would give them also the presents that the Jews had made of their money of the sacrifice of the sacrifices of the sin-sinners of coming to him, because he highly valued a conversation with men of such learning; and should be very willing to lay out his wealth upon such men. And this was what came to the Jews, and to their glory and honor, from Ptolemy Philopator.

CHAPTER III.

How the Kings of Asia honored the Nation of the Jews, and made them Citizens of those Cities which they built.

1. The Jews also obtained honors from the kings of Asia, and were admitted into the cities of Seleucus Nicator made them citizens in those cities which he built in Asia; and in the Lower Syria, and in the metropolis itself, Antioch; and gave them privileges equal to those of the Macedonians and Greeks, who were the inhabitants, insomuch that these privileges continue to this very day: an argument for which you have in this, that whereas the Jews do not make use of oil prepared by foreigners, they receive the money of the natives, and give the money of the foreigners belonging to their exercises as the value of that oil; which money, when the people of Antioch had deprived them of, in the last war, Macianus, who was sent up to the king, returned it to them. And when the people of Alexandria and of Antioch did after that, *

* The use of oil was much greater, and the donatives of it much more valuable in Judæa and the neighboring countries than in other places. It was also in the days of Josephus thought unlawful for Jews to make use of any oil that was prepared by heathens, perhaps, of a very good nature. According to the judgment of the Jews for their wickedness, chose them for his people, and first established Christianity in that empire. Of which see here, xiii. 25; see also Antiq. b. xiv. ch. 2, sect. 26, 27; b. xiv. c. 22, sect. 2. 32 afterward when Antiochus overcame Scopas, in a battle fought at the fountains of Jordan, and destroyed a great part of his army. But afterward, when Antiochus subdued those cities of Cohaemys, which Scopas had gotten into his possession, and Samaria with them, the Jews of their own accord went over to him, and received him into the city [Jerusalem], and made a law to provision to all his army, and to his elephants, and readily assisted him when he besieged the garrison which was in the citadel of Jerusalem. Wherefore Antiochus thought it but just to require of him all the men of his army, so he wrote to the generals of his armies, and to his friends, and gave testimony to the good behavior of the Jews towards him, and informed them that he had resolved to bestow on them for that their behavior. I will set down presently the epistles themselves, which he wrote to the generals concerning them, but will first produce the testimonies of Polybius of Megalopolis; for thus does he speak in the sixteenth chapter of his book of history: "Now Scopas, the general of Ptolemy's army, went in haste to the superior parts of the country, and in the winter time overthrew the nation of the Jews. He also saith, in his history, that Scopas was conquered by Antiochus, Antiochus received Batanea and Samaria, and Abila and Gadara; and that, a while afterward, there came in to him those Jews that inhabited near that temple which was destroyed, when Jerusalem was taken. And though I have more to say, and particularly concerning the presence of God about that temple, yet do I put off that history till another opportunity, which it now is, in our present discourse. But we will return to the series of the history, when we have first produced the epistles of king Antiochus; 'King Antiochus to Ptolemy, sendeth greeting: since the Jews, upon our first entrance on the city, have demonstrated their friendship towards us; and when we came to their city [Jerusalem], received us in a splendid manner, and came to meet us with their senate, and gave abundance of provisions to our soldiers, and to the elephants, and jointly speak us in ejecting the garrison of the Egyptians that were in the citadel, we have thought fit to reward them, and to retrieve the condition of their city, which hath been greatly depopulated by such accidents as have happened upon them. We will bring those that have been scattered abroad back to the city. And, in the first place, we have determined, on account of their piety towards God, to bestow on those that for their sacrifice of animal and vegetable sacrifices that are fit for sacrifices, for wine, and oil, and frankincense, the value of twenty thousand pieces of silver, and six sacred arbats of fine flour, with one thousand four hundred and sixty medimnalia of wheat, and three hundred and seventy-five medimnalia of salt. And these payments I would have fully paid them, as I have sent orders to you. I would also have the work about the temple finished, and the cloisters, and if there be any thing else that ought to be done. And for the materials of wood, let it be brought them out of Judea itself, and out of the other countries, and out of Libanus, tax free: and the same I would have observed as to those other materials which we shall be necessary in order to render the temple more glorious. And let all of that nation live according to the laws of their own country; and let the senate and the priests, and all the public offices of the temple, the sacred singers, be discharged from poll-money and the crown tax, and other taxes also. And that the city may the sooner recover its inhabitants, I grant a discharge from taxes for three years to the inhabitants, and in case they shall come to it, until the month Hyperberetes. We also discharge them for the future from a third part of their taxes, that the losses they have sustained may be repaired. And all those citizens that have been carried away, and are occasion slaves, we grant them and their children their freedom; and give order that their substance be restored to them." 4. And these were the contents of this epistle. He also published a decree, through all his kingdom, in honor of the temple, which contained what followed: "It shall be lawful for any foreigner to come within the limits of the temple round about; which thing is forbidden also to the Jews, unless to those who, according to their own custom, have purified themselves. Nor let any flesh be eaten in Jerusalem; and let all such be sent into the city, whether they be wild or tame; nor that of leopards, or foxes, or hares, and, in general, that of any animal which is forbidden for the Jews, nor let any such animal be bred up in the city. Let them only be permitted to use the sacrifices derived from their forefathers, with which they have been obliged to make acceptable atones. (The rest is omitted, but the sense is, that transeuntes and any of these orders, let him pay to the priests three thousand drachmes of silver. Moreover, this Antiochus bare testimony to our piety and fidelity, in an epistle of his, written when he was at Jerusalem, and in which he expressed himself thus: "Kings, if it were possible for me to be present in the presence of Zeuxis, his Father, sendeth greeting: If you are in health it is well. I also am in health. Having been informed that a sedition is arisen in Lybia against Phrygia, I send thee great greetings: if thou art well, be pleased to write to me. And in case we should meet, let us be satisfied with friendship. (And here the epistle is broken off, but the sense is, that he would be satisfied with friendship with the Jews, and in case of their coming together, let them be satisfied with friendship.)" 1 After this, Antiochus made a friendship and a league with Ptolemy; and gave him his daughter Cleopatra to wife, and yielded up to him Cohaemys, and Samaria, and Judea, and Phoenicia, by way of dowry. And upon the division of the taxes between the two kings, all the principal men formed the taxes of their several countries, and, collecting the sum that was owing to each [i.e., Egypt], brought both to Joseph. Now at this time the Samaritans were in a flourishing condition, and much distressed the Jews, cutting off parts of their land, and carrying away their prisoners. This happened when Onias was high priest; for after Eleazar’s death, his uncle Manasses took the priesthood, and, after he had ended his life, Onias received that dignity. He was the son of Simon, who was called the Just, and brother of Eleazar, as said before. This Onias was one of a little soul, and a great lover of money; and for that reason, because he did not pay the tax of twenty talents of silver, which his forefathers paid to these kings, one of their own estates, he provoked King Ptolemy Euergetes to anger, who was the father of Philopator. Euergetes sent an ambassador to Jerusalem, and complained that Onias did not pay his taxes, and threatened, that if he did not receive them, he would seize their land, and send soldiers to live upon it. When the Jews heard this message of the king, they were confounded; but so sordidly covetous was Onias, that he grew in that point of virtue, which he esteemed above all other, and in the name of Ptolemy Euergetes, did not bring any sum to the people of Jerusalem, but of great reputation among the people of Jerusalem, for gravity, prudence, and justice. His father’s name was Tobias; and his mother was above the middle age, and was the mother of the coming of the ambassador; for he was then sojourning at a village named Pphiol, where he was born. Hereupon he came to the city Jerusalem, and reproved Onias for not taking care of his own estate, but bringing the nation into danger, by not paying this money. For which preservation of them, he told him he had received the authority over them, and had been made high priest; but that if he did not continue his good government, he would cause him to go to the king, and petition him to remit either the whole, or a part of the sum demanded. Onias’s answer was, that he did not care for his authority, and that he was ready, if the thing were practicable, to lay down his high priesthood; and that he would not go to the king, though at all about such matters. Joseph was asked him, if he would not give him leave to go ambassador on behalf of the nation? He replied, that he would give him leave. Upon which Joseph caused a multitude together to a congregation, and exhort him not to be disturbed or affrighted because of his uncle Onias’s carelessness, but desired them to be at rest, and not terrify themselves with fear about it; for he promised them that he would be their ambassador to the king, and persuade him that they had done him no wrong. And when the multitude heard this, they returned thanks to Joseph. So he went down from the hall, in a hospitable manner. He also presented him with rich gifts, and feasted him magnificently for many days, and then sent him to the king before him, and told him that his uncle had so longed for him: he was more willing to go, by the encouragement of the ambassador, who earnestly persuaded him to come into Egypt; and promised him that he would take care that he should be well received by Ptolemy, for he was highly pleased with his frank and liberal temper, and with the gravity of his deportment.

3. When Ptolemy’s ambassador was come into Egypt, he told the king of the thoughtless temper of Onias, and informed him of the goodness of the disposition of Joseph, and that he was coming to him, in expectation of having done him any harm, for that he was their patron. In short, he was so very large in his communications upon the young man, that he disposed both the king and his wife Cleopatra to have a kindness for him before he came. So Joseph went to his friends at Samaria, and borrowed money of them, and got ready what was necessary for his journey, garments, and cups, and beasts forburial, and went to Alexandria. Now it happened, that at this time all the principal men and rulers went up out of the cities of Syria and Phoenicia, to bid for their taxes; for every king gave his king and the men of the greatest power in every city. So these men saw Joseph journeying on the way, and laughed at him for his poverty and meanness. But when he came to Alexandria, and heard that the king Ptolemy was at Memphis, he went to meet him, and the king went to meet him, and as he saw his chariot, and his horses, and his rich attire, and his name, he presently knew him to be the king, and came to him; and as Joseph sat there, he began to complain of the management of Onias. To which he answered, Forgive him, on account of his age, for thou canst not certainly be unacquainted with this, that all men and nations have minds exactly alike; but thou shalt have from us, who are young men, every thing thou desirest, and shalt have no cause to complain. With this good humor and pleasantness of the king, the young man the more began already, as though he had long experience of him, to have a still greater affection for him, insomuch that he bade him take his diet in the king’s palace, and be a guest at his own table every day. But when the king went to Alexandria, the principal men of Syria saw him sitting with the king, and were much offended at it. 4. And when the day came, on which the king was to let the taxes go, he was at all about such matters. Joseph asked him, if he would not give him leave to go ambassador on behalf of the nation? He replied, that he would give him leave. Upon which Joseph caused a multitude together to a congregation, and exhort him not to be disturbed or affrighted because of his uncle Onias’s carelessness, but desired them to be at rest, and not terrify themselves with fear about it; for he promised them that he would be their ambassador to the king, and persuade him that they had done him no wrong. And when the multitude heard this, they returned thanks to Joseph. So he went down from the hall, in a hospitable manner. He also presented him with rich gifts, and feasted him magnificently for many days, and then sent him to the king before him, and told him that his uncle had so longed for him: he was more willing to go, by the encouragement of the ambassador, who earnestly persuaded him to come into Egypt; and promised him that he would take care that he should be well received by Ptolemy, for he was highly pleased with his frank and liberal temper, and with the gravity of his deportment.

2 The name of this place, Pphiol, is the very same as that of the old name of the king in the days of Abraham, Gen. xxvii. 29, and might possibly from the cities into Egypt, who were utterly disappointed; and they returned every one to their own country with shame.

3. But Joseph took with him two thousand four hundred soldiers from the king, for he desired he might have some assistance, in order to force such as were refractory in the cities to pay. And borrowing of the king’s friends at Alexandria five hundred talents, he made haste back in to join the king, and in the Askelon, and the people of Askelon, they refused to pay any thing; and afforded him also: upon which he seized upon about twenty of the principal men, and slew them, and gave them to his soldiers, and sent it all to the king, and informed him what he had done. Ptolemy admired the prudent conduct of the man, and commended him for what he had done; and he rewarded him; and the Syrians heard of this, they were astonished; and having before them a man in the DNA of the king, and feared his power, and therefore granted him the requested amount of money. Scythopolis attempted to affront him, and would not pay him those taxes which they formerly used to pay, without disputing about them, he slew the principal men of that city, and sent their heads to the king, and the king, being greatly moved thereat, gathered all his wealth together, and made vast gains by this farming of the taxes: and he made use of what estate he had thus gotten, in order to support his authority, as thinking it a piece of policy to maintain and support his court, his courtiers, and his household, and his wealth, and his powerful soldiers, and therefore purchased their good-will to himself.

6. This good fortune he enjoyed for twenty years; and was become the father of seven sons, by one wife, with one daughter, whose name was Hyrcanus, by his brother Soly- mius’s daughter, whom he married on the following occasion. He once came to Alexandria with his brother, who had along with him a daughter and a son, whose name was Hyrcanus, when he was young and handsome, and his brother desired to take her to wedlock to some of the Jews of chief dignity there. He then supped with the king, and falling in love with an actress, that was of great beauty and came into the room where they feasted, he took her by the hand, and entered upon her, because a Jew is forbidden by their law to come near to a foreigner, to conceal his offence, and to be kind and subservient to him, and to give him an opportunity of fulfilling his desires. Upon which his brother, who was enterprised in the proposal of serving him, and adored his own daughter, and brought her to him by night, and put her into his bed. And Joseph, being disorderely with drink, knew not who she was, and so lay with his brother’s daughter; and this did he many times, and loved her exceedingly, and said to his brother, that he loved this actress so well, that he should run the hazard of his life [for he must part with him], and probably to king Ptolemy. But his brother bade him be in no concern about that matter, and told him, he might enjoy her whom he loved without any danger, and might have her for his own, if he did not tell the king that they should have her to him, and assured him that he chose rather to have his own daughter abused than to overlook him, and see him come to [public] disgrace. So Joseph commended him to the king, his brother’s daughter, and his brother’s love, and married his daughter, and by her begot a son, whose name was Hyrcanus, as we said before. And when this his youngest son showed, at thirteen years old, a mind that was bent to study, and was greatly en- vied by his brethren, as being of a genius much above them, and such a one as they might well evry, Joseph had once a mind to know which of his sons had the best disposition to virtue; and when he sent them severally to those that had then the best reputation for instructing youth, the rest of his children by reason of the luxury and unwillingness to take pains, returned to him foolish and unlearned. After them he sent out the youngest, Hyrcanus, and gave him three hundred yoke of oxen, and bade him go two hundred furlongs from the land there, and yet kept back privately the yokes of the oxen that coupled them together. When Hyrcanus came to the place, and found he had no yokes for his oxen, he contended with the man, who advised him to send home to his father, to bring them some yokes; but he, thinking that he ought not to lose his time, while they should be sent to bring him the yokes, he invented a kind of stratagem, and went one age elder than his own; for he slew ten yoke of the oxen, and distributed their flesh among the laborers, and cut their hides into several pieces, and made him yokes, and yoked the oxen to- gether with them; and thus he arrived at Antipatris, accompanied by the servants of his father’s house, and with a great part of the army.

7. But when he was told that Ptolemy had a very great brother and that all the principal men of Syria, and the other countries subject to him, were to keep a festival, on account of the child’s birthday, and went away in haste with great re- spect to Alexandria, when he was himself ordered from going by old age, but he made trial of his sons, whether any of them would be willing to go to the king. And when the elder sons excused themselves from going, and said, they would not, their father, having much solicitation, and advised him to send his brother Hyrcanus, he gladly heartened to that advice; and called Hyrcanus, and asked him whether he would go to the king; and whether it was agree- able to him; and he answered that he would go, and his saying that he would not want much money for his journey, because he would live moderately, and that ten thousand drachmas would be sufficient, he was pleased thereby. After a little while, his father advised his son to send his presents to the king from thence, but to give him a letter to his steward at Alexandria, that he might furnish him with the most excellent and most precious. So he, thinking that the expense of ten talents would be enough for presents to be made to the king, and commending his son as giving him good advice, wrote to Arion his steward, that managed all his money matters at Alexandria; which money was not less than three thousand talents on his account, for Joseph sent the money he received in Syria to Alexandria. And when the day appointed for the festival was come, and the king was to receive the presents, he wrote to Arion to pay them. So when the son had asked his father for a letter to this steward, and had received it, he made haste to Alexandria. And when he was gone, his brethren went to all the citizens of Alexandria, and asked them in what he did, he said he wanted a thousand talents. At which the steward was angry, and rebuked him, as one that intended to live extravagantly; and he let him know how his father had gathered together his wealth by industry and frugality, and that he did not wish to imitate the example of his father: he assured him withal, that he would give him but ten talents, and that for a present to the king also. The son was irritated at the idea of the stepmother's knowledge of his father's will, and the wrong that the child had done. And Ptolemy sent for Hyrcanus, and told him, that "he wondered when he was sent to him by his father, that he had not yet come into his presence, but had laid the steward in prison, that he should come to him, and give an account of the reason of what he had done. And they report, that the answer he made to the king's messenger was this: that "there was a law of his that "prohibited a child that was born to taste of the sacrifice before he had been at the temple and sacrificed to God. According to which way of reasoning he did not himself come to him in expectation of the present he was to make to him, as one who had been his father's heir, and that he had not obtained the privilege that he had punished the slave for disobeying his commands, for that it mattered not whether a master was little or great: so that unless we escape the danger of plunged in the river, there was no way to avoid it; so that he in this way it was that that Hyrcanus' brethren had written to destroy him. Now Ptolemy admired at the young man's magnanimity, and commanded him to ask what gift he pleased. But he desired nothing else to be done for him but to send him a letter to write to his father and brethren about him. So when the king had paid him very great respect, and had given him very large gifts, and had written to his father and brethren, and sent him away. But when his brethren heard that Hyrcanus had received such favors from the king, and was returning home with great honor, they went out to meet him, and to destroy him, and that he was dead; for he was angry at him for the sum of money that he bestowed for presents, and so had no concern for his preservation. However, Joseph concealed the anger he had at his son, out of fear of the king. And when Hyrcanus' brethren came to fight him, he slew many others of those that were with them; as also two of his brethren themselves, but the rest of them escaped to Jerusalem, and Hyrcanus came to the city, where nobody would receive him, he was afraid for himself, and retired beyond the river Jordan, and there abode, but obliging the barbarians to pay their taxes, sent his letter to Caius Sextius, called Soter, reigning over Asia, being the son of Antiochus the Great. And [now] Hyrcanus' father Joseph died. He was a good man, and of great magnanimity, and brought the Jews out of a state of poverty and meanness, to one that was more splendid. He retained the farm of the taxes of Syria, and Phoenicia, and Samaria, twenty-two years. His uncle also, Onias, died [about this time], and left the high priesthood to his son. And when he was dead, Onias his son succeeded him in that dignity. To him it was that Areus, king of the Lacedemonians, sent an embassage, with an epistle; the copy whereof follows: "Areus, king of the Lacedemonians, to Onias, sendeth greeting: We have met with a certain writing, whereby we have discovered that both the Jews and the Lacedemonians are of one stock, and are derived from the kindred of Abraham. We are, therefore, persua- sive, that Elizer of Damascus, the servant of Abra- ham, Gen. xiv. 1, 2, and xiv. was of old by some taken for his son. So that if the Lacedemonians were sprung from him, they must be of the posterity of Abraham, as well as the Jews, who were sprung from Isaac. And pertains the Elizer of Da- mascus is that very Elizer, the servant of Abraham, as advised by Justin, makes the founder of the Jewish nation itself, though he afterward blunders, and makes Amon, Adon, Abraham, and Isaac, kings that you, who are our brethren, should send to us about any of your concerns as you please. We will also do the same thing, and esteem your concerns as our own; and will look upon our concerns as in common with yours. Demoteus, who wrote this letter, will bring your answer back to us. This letter is foursquare; and the seal is an eagle, with a dragon in its claws." 11. And these were the contents of the epistle which was sent from the king of the Macedonians, to the death of Soter, the people grew sedition, on account of his sons; for whereas the elders made war against Hyrcanus, who was the youngest of Joseph's sons, the multitude was divided, but the greater part joined with Hyrcanus in this war; and this was Simeon the high priest, by reason of his kin to them. However, Hyrcanus determined not to return to Jerusalem any more, but seated himself beyond Jordan; and was at perpetuated war with the Arabs, and slew many of them, and took away many of them captives. He also erected a strong castle, and built it entirely of white stone to the very roof; and had animals of a prodigious magnitude engraven on it. He also drew round it a great and deep canal of water. He also made caves of many furlongs in length, by hollowing a rock that was over against him: and then he made large rooms in it, some for feeding, and some for covering. He lived in building. He introduced also a vast quantity of waters, which ran along it, and which were very delightful and ornamental in the court. But still he made the entrances at the mouth of the caves so narrow, that no more than one could enter at a time. A wise reason why he built them after that manner was a good one; it was for his own preservation, lest he should be besieged by his brethren, and rule no more. He also built them because he feared being caught by them. Moreover, he built courts of greater magnitude than ordinary, which he adorned with vastly large gardens. And when he had brought the place to this state, he named it Tyre. This place is between Jerusalem and Jericho, not far from the country of Heshbon. And he ruled over those parts for seven years, even all the time that Seleucus was king of Syria. But when he was dead, his brother Antiochus, who was called the Great, took the kingdom about Memphius also the king of Egypt, died, who was besides called Epiphanes. He left two sons, and both young in age; the elder of whom was called Philometor, and the youngest Physcon. As for Hyrcanus, he was overwhelmed by the multitude of his enemies, and he thought he had a great army, and feared lest he should be caught by him, and brought to punishment for what he had done to the Arabsians, he ended his life, by slaying himself with his own hand; while Antiochus seized upon all his substance.

How, upon the Quarrels of the Jews one against another about the High Priesthood, Antiochus made an Expedition against Jerusalem, took the City and pillaged the Temple, and distressed of Judea, and successors to this Damascus. It may not be improper to observe further, that Mosse Chorezmian in his history of the Aramccians, informs us, that the nation of the Partians was also derived from Abraham by Keturah and her children.

1 We have here had but a few of those many citations where Josephus says, that he had elsewhere formerly treated of many things, of which yet his present work does not give any. Our commentators have hitherto been able to give no tolerable account of these citations, which are rare, too numerous, and that usually in the absence of a Greek and Latin text is supposed to be supposed later interpolations, which is almost all that has hitherto been and upon this occasion. What I have to say here is more true with regard to those references before, and very many in and after the history of Antiochus Epiphanes; and that Josephus's first work, the Hebrew or Chaldean, as well as the Greek history of the Jewish War, long since lost, began with the of the Jews: as also how many of the Jews for the Laws of their Country; and how the Samaritans followed the Customs of the Greeks, and named their Temple at Mount Gerizim, the Temple of Jupiter Hellenius.

1. ABOUT this time, upon the death of Onias the high priest, they gave the high priesthood to Jesus his brother; for that son which Onias left [or Onias IV.] was yet but an infant, and, in its circumstances, could not sit on the throne. But Jesus, who was the brother of Onias, was deprived of the high priesthood by the king, who was angry with him, and gave it to his younger brother the high priest, who was also more the true priest, and had these three sons, to each of which the priesthood came, as we have already informed the reader. This Jesus changed his name to Jason; but Onias was called Simeon. Now as this Jesus, the high priest, Jesus, raised a sedition against Menelaus, who was ordained after him, the multitude were divided between them both. And the sons of Tobias took the part of Menelaus, but the greater part of the multitude were for Jesus. Jason thus introduced also a vast quantity of waters, which ran along it, and which were very delightful and ornamental in the court. But still he made the entrances at the mouth of the caves so narrow, that no more than one could enter at a time. A wise reason why he built them after that manner was a good one; it was for his own preservation, lest he should be besieged by his brethren, and rule no more. 1 We have here had but a few of those many citations where Josephus says, that he had elsewhere formerly treated of many things, of which yet his present work does not give any. Our commentators have hitherto been able to give no tolerable account of these citations, which are rare, too numerous, and that usually in the absence of a Greek and Latin text is supposed to be supposed later interpolations, which is almost all that has hitherto been and upon this occasion. What I have to say here is more true with regard to those references before, and very many in and after the history of Antiochus Epiphanes; and that Josephus's first work, the Hebrew or Chaldean, as well as the Greek history of the Jewish War, long since lost, began with the of the Seleucid, he took the city without fighting, those of his own party opening the gates to him. But the Jews, who were on their arms, slew many of the opposite party; and when he had plundered it of a great deal of money he returned to Antioch.

4. Now it came to pass, after two years, in the hundred and fifth and the fifth year on the twenty-fifth day of that month, which is by us called Casleu, and by the Macedonians Apelles, in the hundred and fifty-third Olympiad, that the king came up to Jerusalem. This was accidental to the moment: for his presence was for the preservation of the city by treachery; at which time he spared not so much as those that admitted him into it, on account of the riches that lay in the temple; but, led by his covetous inclination, for there were then the seven golden altars, and many precious stones set in the temple, and many ornaments that had been dedicated to it, of very great value, and in order to plunder its wealth, he ventured to break the league he had made. So he left the temple bare, and took away the golden candlesticks, and the golden altar of incense, and table of show-bread, and the altar of burnt-offering; and did not abstain from even the vails which were made of fine linen and purple, and gold and silver, and best treasures, and left nothing at all remaining; and by these means cast the Jews into great lamentation, for he forbade them to offer those daily sacrifices which they used to offer to God, according to the Levitical law. And even the whole city, some of the inhabitants he slew, and some he carried captive, together with their wives and children, so that the multitude of those captives that were taken alive amounted to about ten thousand; and besides burned down the finest buildings; and when he had overthrown the city walls, he built a citadel in the lower part of the city, for the place was high, and overlooked the temple, on which account he fortified it with high walls, and put a garrison of Macedonians. However, is that citadel dwelt the impious and wicked part of the Jews multitude, from whom it proved that the citizens suffered many and sore calamities. And when the king had built an idol altar upon God's altar, he slew swine upon it, and so offered a sacrifice, neither according to the law, nor the Jewish religious worship in that country. He also commanded his soldiers and the king's messengers to eat the flesh that was offered upon their own altar, and to adore those whom he took to be gods, and made them build temples, and raise idol altars in every city and village, and offer swine upon them every day. He also commanded his soldiers to seize and confiscate the houses, and threatened to punish any that should be found to have transgressed his injunctions. He also appointed overseers, who should compel them to do what he commanded. And indeed many Jews there were who were complaisant with the king's commands, either voluntarily or out of fear of the penalty that was denounced: but the best men, and those of the noblest souls, did not regard him, but did pay a greater respect to the customs of their country, than concern as to the punishment which he threatened to the disobedient; on which account they every day underwent great miseries, and bitter torments, for their houses were blighted with roots, and their persons were torn to pieces, and were crucified, while they were still alive, and breathed: they also cast corpses there seems to be fewer variations than in any other sacred Hebrew book of the Old Testament which has been transmitted to us (except the Jeremiah), which is very natural, because it was written so much nearer to the times of Josephus than the rest were.

*This Citadell, of which we have such frequent mention in the following history, both in the Maccabees and Josephus, was not a castle, but raised upon a hill, lower than Mount Zion, though upon its skirts, and higher than Mount Moriah, but between them both; which hill the enemies of the Jews now get posstrangled those women and their sons whom they had circumcised, as the king had appointed, hanging their heads by their necks as they were upon the crosses. And if there were any sacred book of the law found, it was destroyed, and those with whom they were found, miserably perished also.

5. When the Samaritans saw the Jews under these sufferings, they no longer confessed that they were of their kindred, nor that the temple on mount Gerizim belonged to Almighty God. They began to assert, as they had already shown. And they now said, that they were a colony of Medes and Persians: and indeed they were a colony of theirs. So they sent ambassadors to Antiochus, and an epistle; whereof these contents are these: 'O Antiochus, King the god Epiphanes, a memorial from the Sidonians, who live at Shechem. Our forefathers, upon certain frequent plagues, and as following a certain ancient superstition, had a custom of observing that day which by the Jews is called the Sabbath. And when they had erected a temple at the mountain called Gerizim, though without a name, they offered upon it the proper sacrifices.

Now, upon the last of the seven last years, the Jews, those that manage their affairs, supposing that we were of kin to them and practised as they do, make us liable to the same accusations, although we be originally Sidonians, as is evident from the public records. We therefore beseech thee, our benefactor and saviour, to give order to Apollonias, the governor of this part of the country, and to Nicanor, the procurator of thy affairs, to give us no disturbance, nor to lay any charge upon us, which the Jews are accused for, since we are aliens from their nation, and from their customs; but let our temple, which is present hath no name at all, be named The temple of Jupiter Hellenis. If this were once done, we should be more respected, and should be more on our own occupation with quietness, and so bring in a greater revenue to thee.'

When the Samaritans had petitioned for this, the king sent them back the following answer, in an epistle: 'King Antiochus to Nicanor. The Sidonians, who live at Shechem, have sent me the memorial enclosed. When therefore we were advising with our friends about it, the messengers from the king returned, and they are now arrayed with accusations which belong to the Jews, but choose to live after the customs of the Greeks. Accordingly we declare them free from such accusations, and order that, as is agreeable to the customs of the Greeks, they may be named The temple of Jupiter Hellenis.' He also sent the like epistle to Apollonias, the governor of that part of the country, in the forty-sixth year, and the eighteenth day of the month Hecatombeon.
ANTIQIUITIES OF THE JEWS.

Thus rule continues among us to this day, that if there be a necessity, we may fight on Sabbath-days. So Mattathias got a great army about him, and overthrew their idol altars, and slew those that broke the laws, even all that he could get an army to fight for him. But he despaired among the nations round about them for fear of him. He also commanded, that those boys which were not yet circumcised should be circumcised now; and he drove those away that would not be circumcised, to his army. Mattathias also called upon the king, and besought him to save his nation, and to be mindful of the desires of him who begat you, and brought you up, and to preserve the customs of your country, and to recover your ancient form of government, which is in danger of being overthrown, and not to be carried away with those that, either by their own inclination, or of necessity, betray it, but to become such as he, and more, that he may not suffer from any injury, and necessity, and so to dispose your souls, as to be ready, when it shall be necessary, to die for your laws, as sensible of this by just reasoning, that if God see that you are so disposed, he will give you a victory over your enemies; and if you have preserved your virtue, and will restore to you again what you have lost, and will restore to you that freedom in which you shall live quietly, and enjoy your own customs. Your bodies are mortal, and therefore perishible, but they have an immortal soul, by the remembrance of what actions they have done. And I would have you so in love with this immortality, that you may pursue it with more ardor; for God beholds the greatest difficulties, you may not scruple, for such things, to lose your lives. I exhort you, especially, to agree with one another; and in what excellency any one of you exceeds another, to yield to him so far, and by that means to reap the advantage of every one's own virtues. Do you then esteem Simon as your father because he is a man of extraordinary prudence, and be governed by him in what counsels he shall give you for conducting your army and your nation, because of his courage and strength, for he will avenge your nation, and will bring vengeance on your enemies. Admit among you the righteous and religious, and augment their persons.

4. When Mattathias had thus discovered to his sons, and had prayed to God to be their assistant, and to recover to the people their former constitution, he died a little afterward, and was buried at Modin; all the people making great lamentation for him. Whereupon his son Judas took upon him the administration of public affairs, in the hundred forty and sixth year; and thus by the ready assistance of his brethren, and of others, Judas cast their enemies out of the country, and put those of their own country to death who had transgressed their laws, and purified the land of all the pollutions that were in it.

CHAP. VII.

How Judas overthrew the Forces of Apollonius and Seron, and killed the Generals of their Armies themselves; and how, when a little while afterward Lyias and Gorgias were beaten, he went up to Jerusalem, and purified the Temple.

§ 1. When Apollonius, the general of the Syrian army, had taken them, he took many, and even Rabbanes visibly pretend, see Authent. Recov. f. 205, 206. Only we may note, by the way, that the original name of these Marcheles, and their posterity, was Arrmjonis; which was derived from Arrmones the great-grandfather of Mattathias, as Josephus here informs us. made haste to go against Judas, who met him, and joined battle with him, and beat him, and slew many of his men, and among them Apollonius, his general, whom he wounded, and so that which he happened to wear, he seized upon, and kept for himself; but he wounded more than he slew, and took a great deal of prey, from the enemies' camp, and went his way. But when Judas returned to Colossyria, he heard that many had joined themselves to Judas, and that he had about him an army sufficient for fighting, and for making war, he determined to make an expedition against his enemies, to the end that he might punish those that transgressed the king's injunctions. He then got together an army, as large as he was able, and joined it to the runagates and wicked men of his demesne. He then came as far as Bethhophoon, a village of Judas, and there pitched his camp; upon which Judas met him; and when he intended to give him battle, he saw that his soldiers were backward to fight, because they feared the king's army. But he exhorted them, and said to them, 'that victory and conquest of enemies are not derived from the multitude in armies, but in the exercise of piety towards God, and of itself agreeable to all men; and the instances in their forefathers, who, by their righteousness, and exerting themselves on behalf of their own laws and their own children, had frequently conquered many ten thousands; for in their own persons, among the rest, they all ran away with speed, and the thing that was the best way of escaping. So he pursued them unto the plain, and slew about eight hundred of the enemy, but the rest escaped to the region which lies to the south of them.

2. When king Antiochus heard of these things, he was very angry at what had happened; so he got together all his own army, with many mercenaries, whom he had hired from the islands, and took with him, and prepared to break into Judas about the beginning of the spring. But when, upon meeting his soldiers, he perceived that his treasures were deficient, and there was a want of money in them, for all the wealth and spoil that was taken there had been among the nations, he having been so magnanimous and so liberal that what he had was not sufficient for him, he therefore divided it among his army in good time, and the taxes of that country. Herewith he left on whose name was Lysias, who was in great repute with him, governor of the kingdom, as far as the bounds of Egypt, and of the lower Asia, and reaching from the river Euphrates, and committed to him a certain part of his forces, and of his elephants, and charged him to bring up his son Antiochus with all possible care, until he came back; and that he should conquer Judas, and make his name prevail, and destroy Jerusalem, and abolish the whole nation. And when king Antiochus had given these things in charge to Lysias, he went into Persia; and in the hundred and forty-seventh year, he passed over into Phrygia, and went up to the superior provinces.

3. Upon this Lysias chose Ptolemies, the son of Dorymenes, and Nicanor, and Gorgias, very potent men under God, and that they had forty thousand foot soldiers, and seven thousand horsemen, and sent them against Judas, who came as far as the city Emmass, and pitched their camp in the plain country. The king having come, and seen the camp of Judas, and the country round about, as also many of the runagates. And besides these came some merchants to buy those that should be carried captive (having bonds with them to bind those that should be made prisoners,) with that silver and gold which these had taken. And when Judas saw their camp, and how numerous their enemies were, he persuaded his own soldiers to be of good courage, and exhorted them to place their hopes of victory in God, and in the custom of their country, clothed in sackcloth; and to show what was their usual habit of supplication in the greatest dangers, and thereby to prevail with God to grant you the victory over your enemies. So they joined in the order of battle used by their forefathers, under their captains of thousands, and other officers; and dismissed such as were newly married, as well as those that had newly gained possessions, that they might not fight in a cowardly manner, out of an inordinate love of life, in order to enjoy those blessings. When he had thus disposed his soldiers, he exhorted them to fight by the following speech, which he made to them: 'O my fellow-soldiers, no other time remains more opportune than the present for courage and contempt of dangers; for if now you fight manfully, you may recover your liberty, which, as it is a thing that is agreeable to all men, is to us much more desirable, by its affording us the liberty of worshipping God. Since, therefore, you are in such circumstances at present, that you must either recover that liberty, and so regain a happy and blessed state, or lose that which is according to our laws and the customs of our country, or to submit to the most opprobrious sufferings; nor will any seed of your nation remain if you be beaten; but if you fight manfully, and suppose that you must die though you do not fight. But believe, that besides such glorious rewards as those of the liberty of your country, of your laws, of your religion, you shall have the everlasting glory.

4. And this was the speech, which Judas made to encourage them. But when the enemy sent Gorgias, with five thousand foot and one thousand horse, that he might fall upon Judas by night; and had for that purpose captains of the runagates Jews as spies; Matathias perceived it, and resolved to fall upon those enemies that were in their camp, now their forces were divided. When they had therefore supposed that Judas had retired to his camp, he marched all night to those enemies that were at Emmass; so that when Gorgias found no enemy in their camp, but suspected that they were retired and had hidden themselves among the mountains, he resolved to go and seek them wheresoever they were. But about break of day, Judas appeared to those enemies that were at Emmass, with only three thousand men, and those ill armed, by reason of their poverty, and when he saw the enemy so few, and not fully fortified in their camp, he encouraged the Jews, and told them, 'that they ought to fight, though it were with their naked bodies, for that God had sometimes of old given such men strength, and that God was to number, and were armed also, out of regard to their courage.' So he commanded the trumpeters to sound for the battle: and by thus falling upon the enemies in the night, and by surprising them, and thereby astonishing and disturbing their minds, he slew many of those that resisted him, and went upon pursuing the rest as far as Gadara, and the plains of Idumea, and Ashadol, and Jamnia; and of their camp, the spoil, and the land. Yet did Judas exhort his soldiers not to be too desirous of the spoils, for that still they must have a contest and a battle with Gorgias, and the forces that were with him; but that when they had once overcome them, then they might securely plunder the camp, because they were the only enemies remaining, and they expected no others. And just as he was speaking to his soldiers, Gorgias's men looked down into that army which they left in their camp, and saw that it was overwhelmed, and the camp burned; for a man came from them hour by hour, even when they were a great way off, what had happened. When, therefore, those that were with Gorgias understood that things were in this posture, and perceived that those that were with Judas were not going to fight them, they were so afraid, and put to flight; but then Judas, as though he had already beaten Gorgias's soldiers without fighting, returned and seized on the spoils. He took a great quantity of gold and silver, and purple, and blue, and then returned home with joy, and singing hymns to God for their great success; for this victory greatly contributed to the recovery of their liberty.

The enemy took this, which had given the defeat of the army which he had sent, and the next year he got together sixty thousand chosen men. He also took five thousand horsemen, and fell upon Judas; and he went up to the hill-country, and besieged a village in the country of Judas, and pitched his camp there, where Judas met him with ten thousand men; and when he saw the great number of his enemies, he prayed to God that he would assist them, and joined battle with the first of the enemy that appeared, and beat them, and slew about five thousand of them, and thereby became terrible to the rest of them. Nay, indeed, Lysias observing the great spirit of the Jews, how they were prepared to die rather than lose their liberty, and being afraid of their desperate way of fighting, as if it were real strength, he took the rest of the army back with him, and returned to Antioch, where he listed for the army, and the service, and prepared to fall upon Judas with a greater army.

6. When, therefore, the generals of Antiochus's armies had been beaten so often, Judas assembled the people together, and told them, that "after the victory which had been given to them, they ought to go up to Jerusalem, and purify the temple, and offer the appointed sacrifices." But as soon as he, with the whole multitude, was come up to the temple, and found the temple defiled, and its gates broken down, and plants growing in the temple of their own accord, on account of its desertion, he and those who were with him began to lament, and were quite confounded at the sight of the temple; so he chide out some of his soldiers, and gave them order to fight against those guards that were in the citadel, until he should have purified the temple. When, therefore, he had carefully purged it, and had brought in new vessels, the candlestick, the table of show-bread, and the altar [of incense], which were made of gold, he hung up the vails at the gates, and added doors to them. He also took down the altar [of burnt-offering] and built a new one that he erected together, and set up such as were hewn with iron tools. So on the five-and-twentieth day of the month Caslu, which the Macedonians call Apelles, they lighted the lamps that were in the candlestick, and offered incense upon the altar [of incense], and laid the loaves upon the table [of show-bread] and offered burnt-offerings upon the new altar [of burnt-offering]. Now it so fell out, that these lights and this altar, which on the very same day on which their divine worship had fallen off, and was reduced to a profane and common use, after three years' time, for so it was that the temple was made desolate by Antiochus, and so continued for this time; This dedication happened to be the temple in the hundred forty and fifth year, on the twenty-fifth day of the month Apelles, and on the hundred fifty and third Olympiad: but it was dedicated anew, on the same day, the twenty-fifth of the month Apelles, on the hundred and forty-eighth year, and on the hundred and third Olympiad. And this dedication came to pass according to the prophecy of Daniel, which was given four hundred and eight years before; for he declared that the Macedonians would dissolve that worship [for some time.] And after he had been dissolved, they came to pass according to the prophecy of Daniel, which was given four hundred and eight years before; for he declared that the Macedonians would dissolve that worship [for some time.] And after he had dissolved it, they were so very glad at the revival of their customs, when, after a long time of intermission, they unexpectedly had regained the freedom of their worship, that they made an image for their posterity, that they should keep a festival on account of the restoration of their temple worship, for eight days. And from that time to this we celebrate this festival, and call it 'Lights.' I regard the reason was, because this liberty beyond our hopes appeared to us: and that thence was the name given to this festival. Judas also rebuilt the walls round about the city; and reared towers of great height against the incurrable multitude of the enemy. He also fortified the city Bethsura, that it might serve as a citadel against any distresses that might come from our enemies.

CHAP. VIII.

How Judas subdued the Nations round about, and how Simon bent the People of Tyre and Ptolemais; and how Judas overcame Timotheus, and forced him to fly away, and did many other things, after Joseph and Aearias had been beaten.

1. WHEN these things were over, the nations round about the Jews were very uneasy at the revival of their power, and rose up together, and destroyed many of them, as gaining advantage over them by laying snares for them, and making secret conspiracies against them. Judas made peremptory excursions against these men, and endeavored to restrain them from those incursions, and to prevent the mischief they did to the Jews. So he fell upon the Ibumeans, the people of the Jebusites, which was at Aderata, and the great many of them, and took their spoils. He also shut up the sons of Bean, that laid wait for the Jews, and he sat down about them, and besieged them, and burnt their towers, and destroyed the men and women in them. After this he went thence in haste against the Ammonites, who had a great and a numerous army; of which Timotheus was the commander. And when he had subdued them, he seized on the city Jazer, and took their wives and their children captive, and burnt the city, and then returned into Judas. But when the neighboring nations understood that he was returned, they got together in great numbers in the land of Gilead, and Judea, and made war on them at their borders, who then fled to the garrison of Dathema; and sent to Judas to inform him that Timotheus was endeavoring to take the place which is called Beth-heremon. And as those Judeans, who were reading, there came other messengers out of Galilee, who informed him that the inhabitants of Ptolemais, and of Tyre and Sidon, and strangers of Galilee, were gotten together. And so, on the one hand what was fit to be done, with relation to the necessity both these cases required, gave order, that Simon his brother should take three thousand chosen men, and go to the assistance of the Jews in Galilee, and Judas, on the other hand, that he marched into the land of Gilead, with eight thousand soldiers. And he left Joseph, the son of Zacharias, and Azarias, to be over the rest of the forces; and charged them to keep Judea very carefully, and to fight no battles with any persons, howsoever near their return. Accordingly, Simon went into Galilee, and fought the enemy, and put them to flight, and pursued them to the very gates of Ptolemæus, and slew about three thousand of them; and took the spoils of those that fell, and all the cattle and other things that were made captives, with their baggage; and then returned home.

3. Now as for Judas Macabeus, and his brothers, they fled over into their own land, the land of Jordan; and when they had gone three days' journey, they lit upon the Nabateans, who came to meet them peaceably, and who told them how the affairs of those in the land of Galilee stood; and that the king was satisfied that the city should not be taken, and driven into garrison, and into the cities of Galilee; and exhorited him to make haste to go against the foreigners, and to endeavor to save his own countrymen out of their hands. To this exhortation Judas hearkened, and hurried into the wilderness; and in the first place fell upon the inhabitants of Bozer, and took the city, and beat the inhabitants, and destroyed all the males, and all that were able to fight, and burnt the city. Now, as Simon and Judas, single men, went about, and met each other, and had joy of each other's return. Accordingly, they went into the city, and dragged out the dead bodies. They then went and examined the dead bodies, and when they found that the enemy were making an assault upon the walls, and that some of them brought ladders, on which they might get upon the walls, and that others brought engines to batter the walls, they put out their trumpet, and he encouraged his soldiers cheerfully to undergo dangers for the sake of their brethren and kindred: he also parted his army into three bodies, and fell upon the backs of their enemies: and was wounded in the head; and it was observed by Macabeus, that it was upon him, of both whose courage and good success in war they had formerly had sufficient experience, they were put to flight; but Judas followed them with his army, and brought them back, and turned them into their own army. He then turned aside to a city of the foreigners called Malle, and took it, and slew all the males, and burnt the city itself. He then removed from thence, and went to a city called Bozer, and surrounded it, and took it; and many other cities of the land of Gilead.

4. But not long after this, Timotheus prepared a great army, and took many others as auxiliaries, and induced some of the Arabians, by the promise of rewards to be distributed among them, and the like, and came with his army beyond the brook, over against the city of Raphon. And he encouraged his soldiers, if it came to a battle with the Jews, to fight courageously, and to hinder their passing over the brook: for he said to them beforehand, that "If they come over, we shall be beaten." And when Judas heard that Timotheus prepared himself to fight, he took all his own army, and went in haste against Timotheus his name and invaded the city, and over the brook, and fell upon him, and killed many of his enemies, and some of them met him, whom he slew, and others of them he so terrified, that he compelled them to throw down their arms, and fly, and some of them escaped, but some of them fled to what was called the temple at Carmim, and hoped thereby to preserve themselves; but Judas took

*The reason why Bethanah was called Scythopolis is well known from herodotus, b. i. p. 103, and syn-. cathe, p. 134, that the Scythians, when they overran Asia, in the days of Josiah, settled on this city, and kept it as long as they continued in Asia, from which time it received the name of Scythopolis, or the city of the Scythians.

† The most providential preservation of all the refuge-guards of the Jews in this expedition, which is according to the will of God, is observable often among God's people, the Jews; and somewhat very like it is in the changes of the city, and slew them, and burnt the temple, and so used several ways of destroying his enemies.

5. When he had done this, he gathered the Jews together, with their children, and led them by the road, and the substance that belonged to them, and was going to bring them back into Judea: but as soon as he was come to a certain city, whose name was Ephro, that lay upon the road (and it happened so by the will of God, that he went by that road, so he was not willing to go back again,) he then sent to the inhabitants, and desired that they would open their gates, and permit the Jews to send upon their way through the city; for they had stopped up the gates with stones, cutting off their passage through it. And when the inhabitants of Ephro would not agree to this proposal, he encouraged those that were with him, and en- couraged them to go on, for the time being, and lying round it by day and night, took the city, and slew every male in it, and burnt it all down, and so obtained a way through it; and the multitude of those that were slain was so great that they went over all this multitude. So they came by the Jordan, and arrived at the great plain, over against which is situated the city of Bethanah, which is called by the Greeks Scythopolis. And going away hastily from thence, they came into the town of Gilead, and there took the city, and indulging such tokens of mirth as are usual in triumphs upon victory. They also offered thank-offerings, both for their good success, and for victory, and for the preservation of their army, for not one of the Jews was slain in these battles.

6. But as to Joseph, the son of Zacharias, and Azarias, whom Judas had left generals [of the rest of the forces] at the same time when Simon was in Galilee, fighting against the Ptolemæans; Joseph and Judas himself and his brother Jonathan were in the land of Gilead; did these men also affect the glory of being courageous generals in war, in order whereby they took the army that was commanded by Joseph and Jonathan. There Gerges, the general of the forces of Jamnia, met them; and upon joining battle with him, they lost two thousand of their army; and fled away, and were pursued to the very borders of their own land. And they submitted by their disobedience to what injunctions Judas had given them, "Not to fight with any one before his return." For besides the rest of Judas' magnificences, which he has written of in the commencements of his book, he has also written of the misfortune that befell the forces commanded by Joseph and Azarias, which he understood would happen, if they broke any of the injunctions he had given them. But Judas and his brothers did not believe the misfortune of Joseph, but pressed upon them on all sides, and took from them the city of Hebron, and demolished all its fortifications, and set all its towers on fire, and burnt the country of the foreigners, and the city of Maris. They came also to Asnadoth, and took it, and laid it waste, and took away a great deal of the spoils and prey that were in it, and returned to Judea.

CHAP. IX. Concerning the Death of Antiochus Epiphanes. How Antigonus the governor fought against Judas, and besieged him in the temple, and afterward made peace with him, and departed. Of Alcimus and Onias.

§ 1. About this time it was that king Antiochus, as he was going over the upper countries, heard the four monarchies, which were also providential to the Jews, at the years 153, 123, and 96; and here is another great instance of Providence, that when, even at the very time that Simon and Judas and Jonathan were so miraculously preserved, and blessed, in the just defense of their country, and of the other generals of the Jews, who went to fight for honor, in a vainglorious way, and without any commission from God, or the family he had raised up to deliver them, they were miserably disappointed and defeated.
that there was a very rich city in Persia, called Elymais; and therein a very rich temple of Diasna: And that was full of all the most valuable of antiques, being dedicated to it; and also weapons and breastplates, which, upon inquiry, he found had been left there by Alexander, the son of Philip, king of Maced-beseiged it. But as those that in it were not terrified at his assault, nor at his siege, but opposed him very courageously, he was beaten off. So they drove him away from this city and went out and pursued after him; insomuch that he fled away as far as Babylon, and lost a great many of his army. And when he was grieving for this disappointment, some persons told him of the rest of his commanders whom he had left behind him to fight against Judas, and what strength the Jews had already gotten. When this concern about these affairs was added to the former, he was confounded, and, by the anxiety he was in, fell into a distemper, which, as it lasted a great while, and as his pains in-increased upon him, so he at length perceived he should die in a little time; so he called his friends to him, and told them, that his temper was such, and severely upon him; and confesed withal, that this calamity was sent upon him for the miseries he had brought upon the Jewish nation, while he plundered their temple, and contemned their God, and that if he died, he gave up the gho-

(Rom. vii. 7, the case seems to have been much the same with our Josephus, who was one of the same sect, and did not sense one jot of the greatness of any sins that proceeded no farther than the intention. However, since Josephus speaks here properly of the the inhabitants of Bethana were terrified at his approach; and seeing that the ground was so scarce, they delivered themselves up on the security of oaths, that they should suffer no hard treatment from the king. And when Antiochus had thus taken the city, he did them no other harm than standing them up, and making a garrison of his own in the city. But as for the temple of Jerusalem, he lay at its siege a long time, while they within bravely defended it, for what engines soever the king set against them, they withal retained the sake to oppose them. But then their provisions failed them; what fruits of the ground they had laid up were spent, and the land being not ploughed that year, continued uncultivated, because it was the sabbath year, which, by our laws, we were obliged to let it lie uncultivated. And withal so many of the besieged ran away for want of necessaries, that but a few only were left in the temple.

6. And these happened to be the circumstances of such as were besieged in the temple. But then, because Lyais, the general of the army, and Antiochus, the king, were informed that Philip was coming upon them out of Persia, and was making war upon them, sent a public letter to himself, they came into these sentiments, to leave the siege, and to make haste to go against Philip; yet did they resolve not to let this be known to the soldiers, nor to the officers of the same army, nor to his own, that they might speak openly to the soldiers and the officers, without saying a word about the business of Philip; and to intimate to them that the siege was to be long; that the prince was strong; that they were already in want of provisions; that many affairs of the kingdom wanted regulation; and that it was much better to make a league with the besieged, and to become friends, and to be sworn, and by friends and the party to observe the laws of their fathers, while they broke out into this war only because they were deprived of them, and so to depart home. When Lyais had discovered thus to them, both the soldiers and the officers were pleased with this resolution.

7. Accordingly, the king sent to Judas, and to those that were besieged with them, and promised to give them peace, and to permit them to make league with their own and good men, and to be associated with all Mesopotamia, and gave him an army, and committed Alcimus the high priest, who accused the whole nation, and particularly Judas and his brethren; and said, that they had slain all his friends, and that he had no place of his party, and waited for his return, were by them put to death; that these men had ejected them out of their own country, and caused them to be sojourners in a foreign land; and they desired that he would send some one of his own friends, and know from him what mischief Judas's party had done.”

2. At this Demetrius was very angry, and sent Bacchides, a friend of Antiochus Epiaphis, to the Jews, armed with all Mesopotamia, and committed Alcimus the high priest to his care, and gave him charge to slay Judas, and those that were with him. So they came, and went out of Antioch with his army; and when he was come into Judas, he sent to Judas and his brethren, to discourse with him about a league of friendship and peace, for he had a mind to take him by treachery. But Judas did not give credit to him, for he saw that he came with so great an army as men do not bring when they come to make peace, but to make war. However, some of the people acquainted in what Bacchides caused to be proclaim’d, and sung they should undergo no considerable harm from Alcimus, who was their countryman, they went over to them; and when they had received oaths from both of them, that neither the one of the other parties should come to any harm, they intrusted themselves with them; but Bacchides troubled himself not about the oaths he had taken, and slew three or four of their party. And when he was gone with those that first went over, he deterred all the rest, who had intentions to go over to him, from doing it. But as he was gone out of Jerusalem, and was at the village called Bethzatha, he sent out and presented many of the deserters, whom Judas here followed, instead of that character, says of him, that he was a great man in the kingdom, and faithful to his king; which was very probable Josephus’s meaning also.
and some of the people also, and slew them all; and enjoined all that lived in the country to submit to Alcimus. So he left him there, with some part of the army, that he might have wherewith to keep the country against him, he desisted, and returned to Antioch, to king Demetrius.

3. But Alcimus was desirous to have the dominion more firmly assured to him; and understanding, that if he could bring it about that the men of his friends, he could govern with greater security, he spake kind words to them all, and discourse to each of them after an agreeable and pleasant manner, by which means he quickly had a great body of men and an army about him. But more than all, he came over a great many of the wicked, and the deserters. With these, whom he used as his servants and soldiers, he went all over the country, and slew all that he could find of Judas's party. But when Judas saw that Alcimus was already become great, and had destroyed many of the good and holy men of the country; he also went all over the country, and destroyed those that were of the other persuasion. But that he could not, nor being able to oppose Judas, nor was equal to him in strength, he resolved to apply himself to king Demetrius for his assistance; so he came to Antioch, and irritated him against Judas, and accused him of having done great many miseries by his means, and that he would do more mischief unless he were prevented, and brought to punishment, which must be done by sending a powerful force against him.

4. So saying a thing pernicious to his own affairs to overlook Judas, now he was becoming so great, sent against him Nicoran, the most kind and most faithful of all his friends; for he was he who fled away with him from the land of Adar and gave him as many forces as he thought sufficient for him to conquer Judas withal, and bade him not to spare the nation at all. When Nicoran was come to Jerusalem, he did not at first desire to fight Judas immediately, but judged it better to get him into his power by treachery; so he sent him a message of peace, and said, "There was no manner of necessity for them to fight and hazard themselves. But that he would give him, not that he would do him so harm, for that he only came with some friends, in order to let him know what king Demetrius's intentions were, and what opinion he had of their nation." When Nicoran had said this, and had gone away, Judas and his brother, they complied with him, and suspicioning no deceit, they gave him assurances of friendship, and received Nicoran and his army; but while he was among Judas, and they were talking together, he gave a certain signal to his own soldiers, upon which they were to seize upon Judas; but he perceived the treachery, and ran back to his own soldiers, and fled away with them. So upon this discovery of his purpose, and of the snare laid for Judas, Nicoran determined to make open war with him, and gathered his army together, and prepared to fight him; and upon joining battle with him at a certain village called Capharnum, Judas, and his forces, threw him into that city which was at Jerusalem.

5. And when Nicoran came down from the citadel unto the temple, some of the priests and elders met him, and saluted him; and showed him that the house of God for the king: upon which he blasphemed, and threatened them, that unless the people would deliver up Judas to him, upon his return he would pull down their temple. And when he had said this to the people, he departed, and returned to Antioch, to king Demetrius: but the priests fell into tears out of grief at what he had said, and besought God to deliver them from their enemies. But now for Nicoran, when he was gone out of Jerusalem, he brought the soldiers with him, and pitched his camp near by, another army out of Syria having joined him: and Judas pitched his camp at Adusa, another village, which was thirty furlongs distant from Bethhoron, having no more soldiers than Nicoran. But when Nicoran had encouraged them not to be dismayed at the multitude of their enemies, nor to regard how many they were against whom they were going to fight, but to consider who they themselves were, and for how long they had hazarded themselves, and to attack the enemy courageously, he led them out to fight, and joining battle with Nicoran, which proved to be a severe one. But the victory did not fall to many of them; and at last Nicoran himself, as he was fighting gloriously, fell. Upon whose fall the army did not stay, but when they had lost their general, they were put to flight, and threw down their arms; when Judas made them prisoners, gave notice by the sound of the trumpets to the neighboring villages, that he had conquered the enemy; which, when the inhabitants heard, they put on their armor hastily, and met their enemies, as they were going away, and slew them, insomuch that not one of them escaped out of this battle, who were in number nine thousand. This victory happened to fall on the thirteenth day of that month, which by the Jews is called Ulazar. And the Romans, who were called Demstrus; and the Jews thereon celebrate this victory every year, and esteem it as a festival day. After which the Jewish nation were, for a while, free from wars, and enjoyed peace; but afterward they returned into their former state of wars and hazards.

6. But now, as the high priest, Alcimus, was resolving to pull down the wall of the sanctuary, which had been there of old time, and been built by the holy prophets, he was smitten suddenly by God, and fell down. This stroke made him fall down speechless upon the ground; and, undergoing torments for many days, he at length expired. And when he was dead, the people bestowed the high priesthood on Judas; who, hearing of the power of the Romans, and that they had conquered in war Galatia, and Iberia, and Carthagia, and Libya; and that, besides these, they had subdued Greece, and their kings, Perseus, and Philip, and Antiochus the Great also, he resolved to enter into a league of friendship with them. He therefore sent to Rome some of his friends, Euphimus, the son of John, and Jason, the son of Eleazar, and by them desired the Romans that they would assist them, and be their friends and would write to Demetrius, that he would at all times assist them. And so the ambassadors that came from Judas to Rome, and discoursed with them about the errand on which they came, and then granted them a league of assistance. They also made a decree concerning it, and sent a copy of it into Judæa of the family of the high priests, and made by a vote heating in Jerusalem the words following, which imply that he who was beaten flee to the citadel, which for certain belonged to the city of David, or to Mount Zion, and was in the possession of Nicoran's garrison, and not of Judas: as also it is contrary to the express words of Josephus's original author, that the number of those that were slain by Nicoran was about 5000 men, and fled to the city of David.

It was also laid up in the capitol, and engraven in brass. The decree itself was this: "The decree of the senate concerning a league of assistance and friendship with the nation of the Jews. It shall not be lawful for any that are subject to the Romans to make war with the nation of the Jews, nor to assist those that do so, either by sending them corn, or ships, or money; and if any attack be made upon the Jews, the Romans shall assist them, as far as they are able: and again, if any assault be made upon the Romans, the Jews shall assist them. And if the Jews have a mind to add to, or to take anything from this league of assistance, that shall be done with the common consent of the Romans. And whatsoever the Romans shall do, the Jews shall be at peace; and they shall have the right of perfect force." This decree was written by Eupolemus, the son of John, and by Jason, the son of Eleazar, when Judas was high priest of the nation, and Simon, his brother, was general of the army. And this was the first time that the Romans made with the Jews, and was managed after this manner.

CHAP. XI.

That Baccchides was again sent out against Judas; and how Judas fell as he was courageously fighting.

1. But when Demetrius was informed of the death of Nicana, and of the destruction of the army that was with him, he sent Baccchides again with an army into Judea, who marched out of Antioch, and came into Judea, and pitched his camp at Arbela, a city of Galilee, and having besieged and taken it, and killed all the inhabitants, (for many of the people fled into such places,) he removed, and made all the haste he could to Jerusalem. And when he had learned that Judas pitched his camp at a certain village whose name was Simeon, he issued out against him: they were twenty thousand footmen, and two thousand horsemen. Now Judas had no more soldiers than one thousand.† When these saw the multitude of Baccchides's men, they were afraid, and left their camp, and fled all away, excepting eight hundred. Now when Judas was deserted by his own soldiers, and the enemy pressed upon him, and gave him no time to gather his army together, he was disposed to fight with Baccchides's army, though he had but eight hundred men with him; so he exhorted these men to undergo the danger courageously, and encouraged them to attack the enemy. And when they said that they were a body too small to fight so great an army, and advised that they should retire now, and save themselves, and that when he had gathered his own men together, then he should fall upon the enemy afterward, his answer was this: "Let not the sun ever see such a thing that I should show my back to the enemy; and although this be the time that will bring me to my end; and I must die in this battle, I will rather stand to it courageously, and bear whatsoever comes upon me, than by now running away, bring reproach upon my former great actions, or tarnish their glory." This was the speech he made to the multitude that were with him; and with him were thereby he encouraged them to attack the enemy.

2. But Baccchides drew his army out of their camp, and put them in array for the battle. He set the horsemen on both the wings, and the light soldiers on the archers before the whole army, but he was himself on the right wing. And when he had thus put his army in order of battle, and was going to join battle with the enemy, the enemy said to him, "Trumphant and join battle, and let it be a signal of battle, and the army to make a shout and to fall on the enemy. And when Judas had done the same, he joined battle with them; and as both sides fought valiantly, and the battle continued till sunset, Judas saw that Baccchides and the strongest part of the army was in the right wing, and thereupon took the most courageous men with him, and ran upon that part of the army, and fell upon those that were there, and broke their ranks, and drove them a little before them, in the middle, and forced them to run away, and pursued them as far as to a mountain called Azar; but when those of the left wing saw that the right wing was put to flight, they encompassed Judas; and pursued him, and came behind him, and took him into the middle of their army; so being not able to fly, but encompassed round about with enemies, he stood still, and he and those that were with him fought; and when he had slain a great many of those that came against him, he at last was himself wounded, and fell, and gave up the ghost, and died in a way like to his former famous actions. When Judas was dead, those that were with him despaired, and thus fell; and as their commander, but when they saw themselves deprived of such a general, they fled. But Simon and Jonathan, Judas's brethren, received his dead body by a treaty from the enemy, and carried it to the village of Melch, where their father had been buried, and there buried him; while the multitude lamented him many days, and performed the usual solemn rites of a funeral to him. And this was the end that Judas came to. He had been a man of valor and a great warrior, and mindful of the commands of his father Maccabæus; and had undergone all difficulties, both in doing and suffering, for the liberty of his countrymen. And when his character was so excellent (while he was alive) he left behind him a glorious reputation and memorial, by gaining freedom for his nation, and delivering them from slavery under the Macedonians. And when he had retained the high priesthood three years, he died.

† This subscription is wanting. I Macab. viii. 17, 20, and must be the words of Josephus, who, by mistake, thought, as we have just now seen, that Judas was at this time high priest, and accordingly then reckoned his brother Jonathan to be the general of the army, which yet he seems not to have been till after the death of Judas.

BOOK XIII.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF EIGHTY-TWO YEARS—FROM THE DEATH OF JUDAS MCCABEUS TO THE DEATH OF QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

CHAP. I.

How Jonathan took the Government after his brother Judas, and how he, together with his brother Simon, waged War against Baccchides.

1. By what means the nation of the Jews recovered their freedom when they had been brought into slavery by the Macedonians, and what struggles, and how many great battles Judas the general of their army ran through, till he was slain as he was fighting for them, hath been related in the foregoing book; but after he was dead, all the wicked, and those who transgressed the laws of their forefathers, sprang up again in Judea, and grew upon them, and distressed them on every side. A famine also assisted their wickedness, and afflicted the country, till not a few, who by reason of their want of means saries, and because they were not able to bear up against the miseries that both the famine and their enemies brought upon them, deserted their country, and went to the Macedonians. And now Bacchides gathered those Jews together who bad apostatized from the accustomed way of living of their forefathers, and chose to live like their neighbors, and committed the care of the country to them; who also caught the friends of Judas, and those of his party, and delivered them up to Bacchides, who, when he had, in the first place, tortured and tormented them at his pleasure, put them to death in a miserable manner, came to his brother Jonathan, and desired him that he would imitate his brother, in that care which he took of his countrymen, for whose liberty in ga, he had also; and that he would not permit the nation to be without a governor, especially in those destructive circumstances wherein it now was. And when Jonathan said, that he was ready to die for his country, he went and entered now at a be- rior to his brother, he was appointed to be the general of the Jewish army.

2. When Bacchides heard this, and was afraid that Jonathan might be very troublesome to the kings and their brethren, as Joseph had been before him, he sought how he might slay him by treachery: but this intention of his was not un- known to Jonathan, nor to his brother Simon; but those two were apprised of it, they took all their companions, and went to that wilderness which was nearest to the city; and when they were come to a lake called Asprar, they abode there. But when Bacchides was come to them, they were in a low state, and in that place, he hastened to fall upon them with all his forces, and pitching his camp beyond Jordan, he recruited his army: but when Jonathan knew that Bacchides was coming upon them, he sent his brother John, who was also called Gaddis, to the Nabatean Arabs, that he might lodge his baggage with them until the battle with Bacchides should be over, for they were the Jews' friends. And the sons of Ambri laid an ambuscade to the right hand from the Nabateans, and seized upon him, and upon those that were with him, and plundered all that they had with them: they also slew John and all his companions. However, they were sufficiently punished for what they did by John's brethren, as we shall relate presently.

3. But when Bacchides knew that Jonathan had pitched his camp among the lakes of Jordan, he observed when their Sabbath-day came, and then assaulted him, as supposing that he would not fight because of the law [for resting on that day:] but he exhorted his companions [to fight:] and told them that their lives were at stake, since they were encompassed by the river, and by their enemies, and had no way to escape, for that their enemies pressed upon them before, and the river was behind them. So after he had prayed to God to give him the victory, he joined on the enemy, and overthrew them all and he threw many; and as he saw Bacchides coming up boldly to him, he stretched out his right hand to smite him, but the other foreseeing and avoid- ing the stroke, Jonathan with his companions leaped into the river, and swam over it, and by that means escaped beyond Jordan, while the enemy did not pass over that river: but Bacchi- des returned presently to the citadel at Jerusa- lem, having lost about two thousand of his army. He also fortified the town of Jerusalem, and built walls, and demolished Jericho, and Emasse, and Bethhoron, and Bethel, and Timna, and Pha- rathe, and Tekoa, and Gazeras, and built towers in every one of these cities, and encompassed them with strong towers, and put garrisons into them, that they might issue out of them, and do mischief to the Jews. He also fortified the citadel at Jerusa- lem with more than all the rest. Moreover he took the persons of the principal Jews as pledges, and shut them up in the citadel, and in that manner guarded it. 4. About the same time one came to Jonathan, and to his brother Simon, and told them that the son of Joab, whom Bacchides had married, was bringing the bride from the city Gabatha who was the daughter of one of the illustrious men among the Arabians, and that the damsel was to be conducted with pomp and splendor, and with much richness, so Jonathan and Simon, being assured this appeared to be the finest time for them to avenge the death of their brother, and that they had forces sufficient for receiving satisfaction of them, both Joab and Bacchides, and they fell upon them, and cut them all off, and took their ornaments, and all the prey that then followed them, and so re- turned, and received this satisfaction for their brother Joab, and for the son of Judas, and for those sons themselves, as their friends, and wives, and children, that followed them, perish- ing, being in number about four hundred.

5. However, Jonathan and Jonathan returned to the kingdoms of the river, and those borders. But Bacchides, when he had secured all Judea with his garrisons, returned to the king; and then it was that the affairs of Judea were quiet for two years together, till Jonathan, who had observed they saw that Jonathan and those that were with him lived in the country very quietly, by reason of the peace, they sent to king Demetrius, and ex- cited him to send Bacchides to seize upon Jon- than, though they said was done without any trouble, and in one night's time; and that if they fell upon them before they were aware, they might slay them all. So the king sent Bachi- des, who, when he was come into Judea, wrote to Jonathan, and to his brother Simon, that they should seize upon Jonathan, and bring him to him; and when, upon all their endeavors, they were not able to seize upon Jonathan, for he was sensible of the snares they laid for him, and now his army was increased Bacchi- des was angry at these deserters, as having imposed upon him and upon the king, and slew five of their leaders. Whereupon Jonathan, with his brother, and those that were with him, retired to Bethagla, a village that lay in the wil- derness, out of his fear of Bacchides. He also built towers on it, and encompassed it with walls, and took care that it should be safely guarded. Upon the hearing of which, Bacchides led his own army along with him, and besides took his Jewish auxiliaries, and came against Jonathan, and made an assault upon his fortifications, and besieged him many days: but Jonathan did not show himself at the gate of his citadel, nor in the siege, but courageously opposed him: and while he left his brother Simon in the city, to fight with Bacchides, he went privately out himself into the country, and got a great body of men to his aid, and presently took possession Bacchides's camp in the night-time and destroyed a great many of them. His brother Simon knew also of this his falling upon them, because he perceived that the enemies were not slain by him, so he quickly came up to them, and brought them into the place which the Macedonians used, and made a great slaughter of them. And when Bacchides saw himself encompassed with enemies, and some of them before and some behind him, he fell into despair and trouble of mind, as confounded at the unexpected ill success of this siege. However, he vented his displeasure at these misfortunes upon those deserters who were deserting, as having delivered him. So he had a mind to finish this siege after a decent manner, if it were possible for him so to do, and then to return home.

But he not only understood these his intentions, he sent ambassadors to him, about a league of friendship and mutual assistance, and that they might restore those that they had taken captive on both sides. So Barchides thought this a good chance to have one home, and make a league of friendship with Jonathan, when they saw that they would not any more make war one against another. Accordingly, he restored the captives, and took his own men with him, and returned to the king to Antioch; and after this his departure, he never came into Judea again. Then did Jonathan take the opportunity of this quiet state of things, and went and lived in the city of Jerusalem, and from thence he continued to be High Priest, and to promise him greater Advantages on the other Side. Concerning the Death of Demetrius.

1. Now in the hundred and sixtieth year, it fell out that Alexander, the son of Antiochus the king, went to Ptolemais, or Ptolemais, the soldiers within having betrayed it to him, for they were at enmity with Demetrius, on account of his insolence and difficulty of access; for he shut himself up in a palace of his that had four towers, which he had built himself, not far from Antioch, and admitted nobody. He was withal slothful and negligent about the public affairs, whereby the hatred of his subjects was the more kindled against him, as we have elsewhere already related. When, therefore, Demetrius heard that Alexander was in Ptolemais, he took his whole army and led it against him: he also sent ambassadors to Jonathan, about a league of mutual assistance; for he resolved to be beforehand with Alexander, lest the other should treat with him first, and gain assistance from him: and this he did out of the fear he had, lest Jonathan should remember how ill Demetrius had been to him, and therefore would join with him in this war against him. He therefore gave orders that Jonathan should be allowed to raise an army, and should get armor made, and should receive back those hostages of the Jewish people whom the accusers had taken, and to return to the city of Jerusalem. When this good fortune had befallen Jonathan, by the concession of Demetrius, he came to Jerusalem, and read the king's letter in the audience of the people, and of those that kept the citadel. When these were read, those meek men and deserters, who were in

*This Alexander Bals, who certainly pretended to be the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, and was owned by both the Jews and Romans, and many others, and yet by several historians deemed to be a counterfeiter and impostor, is believed to have been the real son of that Antiochus, and by him always spoken of accordingly. And truly, since the spurious character of the adoration, who, instead of after four years since the death of his brother Judas, would have us read and therefore after eight years since the death of his brother Judas. This is the date of the Maccabees, and with Josephus's own exact chronology at the end of the twentieth book of Antiquities, which the present text cannot be made to do.
I do now set you free from those tributes which you have ever paid; and besides, I forgive you the tax upon salt, and the value of the crowns which you used to offer to me; and instead of the third part of the fruits [of the field], and the half of the fruits of the vines, I relinquish my part of them from this day: and as to the poll-money, which ought to be given me for every head of the inhabitants of Judea, and of the three toparchies that adjoin Judea, Samaria, and Galilee, and Perea, which I required from you for this time, and for all time to come. I will also that the city of Jerusalem be holy and inviolable, and free from the tithe, and from the taxes, unto its utmost bounds: and I so far recede from my title to Calixtus, that you may possess your high priest to possess it, that he may place such a garrison in it as he approves of for fidelity and good-will to himself, that they may keep it for me, and also that freeborn men, who have been slave captives and slaves in my kingdom.

I also give order that the beasts of the Jews be not pressed for our service. And let their Sabbaths, and all their festivals, and three days before shall be free from your imposition. In the same manner I set free the Jews that are inhabitants in my kingdom, and order that no injury be done to them. I also give leave to such of them as are willing to list themselves in my army, that they may do it, and those as far as thirty thousand; which Jewish soldiers, whosoever they go, shall have the same pay that my own army hath; and some of them I will place in my garrisons, and some as guards about mine owne palaces, and in the places that rule in the natio court. I give them leave also to use the laws of their forefathers, and to observe them; and I will that they have power over the three toparchies that are added to Judea; and it shall be in the power of the high priest to take with him, that one Jew shall have any other temple for worship but only that at Jerusalem. I bequeath also, out of my own revenues, yearly, for the expenses above-mentioned, one hundred and fifty drachm [drachmai] and what money is to spare, I will that it shall be your own. I also release to you those ten thousand drachm which the kings received from the temple, because they appear in the ninth book that ministered that temple. And whosoever shall fly to the temple at Jerusalem, or to the places thereto belonging, or who owe the king money, or are there on any other account, let them be set free, and let their goods be restituted to them. I also appoint you to repair and rebuild your temple, and that all be done at my expenses. I also allow you to build the walls of your city, and to erect high towers, and that they be erected at my charge. And if there be any fortified town that would be convenient for the Jewish country to have very strong, let it be so built at my expenses. 4. This was what Demetrius promised, and granted to the Jews, by this letter. But king Alexander raised a force of mercenaries, and soldiers, and of those that desisted to him out of Syria, and made an expedition against Demetrius. And when it was come to a battle, the left wing of Demetrius put those who opposed them to flight, and pursued them a great way, and slew many of them, and spoiled their camp; but the right wing, where Demetrius happened to be, was beaten; and as for all the rest, they ran away; but Demetrius fought courageously, and slew a great many of the enemy; but as he was in the pursuit of the rest his horse carried him into a deep bog, where it was hard to get out, and there it happened, that upon his horse's falling down, he could not escape being killed; for when his enemies saw what had befallen him, they returned back, and encompassed Demetrius round, and they all drew their swords, and being now on foot, fought bravely, but at length he received so many wounds, that he was not able to bear up any longer, but fell, and this is the end that Demetrius came to when he had reigned eleven years, as we have elsewhere related.

CHAP III

The Friendship that was between Onias and Ptolemy Philometer; and how Onias built a Temple in Egypt like to that at Jerusalem.

1. But then the son of Onias the high priest, who was of the same name with his father, and who was the king's ambassador, lived now at Alexandria, as we have said already. When this Onias saw that Judea was oppressed by the Macedonians and their kings, out of a desire to purchase to himself a memorial of his ancestors, who were high priests, and of Ptolemy and queen Cleopatra, to ask leave of them that he might build a temple in Egypt like to that at Jerusalem, and might ordain Levites and priests out of their own stock. The chief reason of this, as it appears, was an expedition that he made upon the prophet Isaiah, who lived above six hundred years before, and foretold that there certainly was to be a temple built to Almighty God in Egypt by a man that was a Jew. Onias wrote to Ptolemy Philometer, and the following epistle to Ptolemy and Cleopatra:

"Having done many and great things for you in the affairs of the war, by the assistance of God, and the work of our country and our land, I came to length with the Jews to Leontopolis, and to other places of your nation, where I found that the greatest part of your people had temples in an improper manner, and that on this account they were in many parts reproved. And I now, by the following epistle to Ptolemy and Cleopatra: the Egyptians by reason of the multitude of their temples, and the difference of opinions about divine worship. Now I found a very fit place in a castle that hath its name from the god with whom they worship, in several sorts, and replenished with sacred animals: I desire therefore that you will grant me leave to purify this holy place, which belongs to no master, and is fallen down, and to build there a temple to Almighty God, after the pattern of that in Jerusalem, and of the same dimensions; that may be for the benefit of thyself, and thy wife and children, that those Jews who dwell in Egypt may still have a place whither they may come and meet together in mutual harmony, which it doth with another, and be subservient to thy advantages; for the prophet Isaiah forsaids, that there should be an altar in Egypt to the Lord God; and many other good things did he prophesy relating to that place."

2. And this was what Onias wrote to king Ptolemy Philometer, and directed forebids the building of this temple of Onias in Egypt, and was a sufficient warrant for the Jews for building it, and for worshipping the true God, the God of Israel, therein. See Antient. Rec. vol. i. p. 243 and 244. It seems to have occasioned an effect of the sacrifices and prayers here offered him than of those at Jerusalem, see the note on chap. x. sect. 7. And truly the marks of Jewish corruption, or intermixture in this text, in order to discourage their people from approving of the worship of God here, are very strong, and highly deserving consideration and correction. The foregoing verse in Isaiah runs thus in our common copies: In that day shall all cities in the land of Egypt speak the language of Canaan, (the Hebrew sants, he was honored by them both. Alexander compelled him also to put on his own garment, and to take a purple garment, and made him sit with him in his throne; and commanded his captains that they should go forth with him into the midst of the city, and proclaim, that it was not permitted to any one to speak against him, or to give him any disturbance. And when the captains had thus done, those that were prepared to accuse Jonathan, and who bore him ill-will, when they saw the honor that was done him by proclamation, and that by the king's order, ran away, and were afraid lest some mischief should befall them. Nay, king Alexander was so very kind to Jonathan, that he set him down as the principal of his friends.

3. But then, upon the hundred and sixty-fifth year, Demetrius, the son of Demetrius, came from Irete, with a great number of mercenary soldiers, which Lathenes, the Cretan, brought him, and sailed to Cilicia. This thing cast Alexander into great concern and disorder when he heard it; so he made haste immediately out of Philippi, and came to Antioch, that he might put matters in a safe posture there, before Demetries should come. He also left Apollonius Daus governor of Celosyria, 4 who coming to Jamnia with a great army, sent to Jonathan the high priest, and told him, that it was not right that he alone should live at rest, and with authority, and not be subject to the king; and this thing had made him a reproach among all men, that he had not yet made him subject to the king. Do not think therefore to destroy us, and all that are among the mountains, and pretend to have forces with thee; but if thou hast any dependence on thy strength, come down into the plain, and let our armies meet together; when the event of the battle will demonstrate which of us is the most courageous. However, take notice, that the most valiant men of every city are in my army, and that these are the very men who have always been your predecessors; but let us have the battle in such a place of the country where we may fight with weapons, and not with stones, and where there may be no place whither those that are beaten may fly."

6. Jonathan was irritated; and choosing himself out ten thousand of his soldiers, he went out of Jerusalem in haste with his brother Simon, and came to Joppa, and pitched his camp on the outside of the city, because they had a garrison in the city put there by Apollonius; but when Jonathan was preparing to besiege them, they were afraid he would take the place, so they opened the gates to him. But Apollonius, when he heard that Joppa was taken by Jonathan, took three thousand horsemen and eight thousand footmen, and came to Ashdod, and removing thence, he made his journey silently and slowly, and going up to Joppa, he made as if he was retiring from the place, and so drew Jonathan into the plain, as valuing himself highly upon his horsemen, and having his hopes of victory principally in them. He then laved his avowed design, and pursued Apollonius to Ashdod; but as soon as Apollonius perceived that his enemy was in the plain, he came back and gave him battle: but Apollonius had laid a thousand horsemen in ambush in a very strong place, and in the sight of his enemies by their eneminess as behind them; when which Jonathan perceived, he was under no pretension, but ordering his army to stand in a square battle array, he gave them a charge to fall on the enemy on both sides, and set them to force the field at them both before and behind; and while the fight lasted till the evening, he gave part of his forces to his brother Simon, and ordered the rest of the enemy; but for himself he charged those that were with him to cover themselves with their armor, and receive the darts of the horsemen, who did as they were commanded; so that the enemy's horsemen, while they were interlarding themselves, did more left, did them no harm, for the darts that were thrown did not enter into their bodies, being thrown upon the shields, that were united and conjoined together, the closeness of which was such as the force of the darts that they flew about without any effect. But when the enemy grew remiss in throwing their darts from morning till late at night, Simon perceived their slowness, and fell upon the body of men before him; and because his soldiers showed great alacrity, he put the enemy to flight, and when the horsemen saw that the footmen ran away, neither did they stay themselves, but they pursued them, by his order till the evening, and their hopes from the footmen being quite gone; they hastily ran away, and in great confusion also, till they were separated one from another, and scattered over all the plain. Upon which Jonathan pursued them as far as Ashdod, and slew a great many of them, and compelled the rest, in despair of escaping, to fly to the temple of Dagon, which was at Ashdod; but Jonathan took the city on the first onset, and burned it, and then they could not stand from the temple of Dagon itself, but burnt it also, and destroyed those that had fled to it. Now the entire multitude of the enemies that fell to Jonathan and his followers was eight thousand. When Jonathan had overcome so great an army, he removed from Ashdod, and came to Askelon; and when he had pitched his camp without the city, the people of Askelon came out and met him, bringing him hospitable presents, and honoring him; so he accepted of their kind intentions, and returned thence to Jerusalem with a great deal of prey, which he brought thence when he conquered his enemies; but when Alexander heard that Apollonius, the general of his army, was beaten, he pretended to be glad of it, because he had fought with Jonathan, his friend and ally, against his directions. Accordingly, he sent to Jonathan, and gave testimony to his worth, and gave him honoraries, as a golden button, which it is the custom to give the king's kinmen; and allowed him Ekron, and its toparchy, for his war service.

5. About this time it was that king Ptolemy, who was called Philometer, led an army, part by the sea, and part by the land, and came to Syria, to the assistance of Alexander, who was his son-in-law; and accordingly all the cities received him willingly, as Alexander had commanded them to do, and conducted him as far as Ashdod, where they all made loud complaints about the temple of Dagon, which was burnt, and accused Jonathan that they were burned, and sent ambassadors to the country adjoining with fire, and slain a great number of them. Ptolemy heard these accusations, but said nothing. Jonathan also went to meet Ptolemy as far as Joppa, and obtained four hundred talents of gold from him, which he received in their kinds, with all the marks of honor. And when he had conducted him as far as the river, called Eleutherus, he returned again to Jerusalem.

4 Of the several Apollonii about these ages, see Dean Hyde's in the year 1406. This Apollonius Daus was, by this time, at a distance from some of the previous; for we have been made governor of Celosyria and Phoenicia by Seleucus Philopater, and was himself a confidant of his son Demetrius the father, and restored to his father's govern-
6. But as Ptolemy was at Ptolemais, he was very near to a most unexpected destruction, for to a treacherous design was laid for his life by Alexander, the means of Ammonius, who was his friend, and the base treachery was very plain. Ptolemy wrote to Alexander, and required of him that he should bring Ammonius to condign punishment, informing him what snares he had been led into, and that he was now in a danger which might be accordingly punished for it. But when Alexander did not comply with his demands, he perceived that it was he himself who laid the design, and was very angry at him. Alexander had a great many quality of the people of Antioch, for they had suffered very much by his means; yet did Ammonius at length undergo the punishment his insolent crimes had deserved, for he was killed in an opprobrious manner, like a woman, while he endeavored to conceal himself in a feminine habit, as we have elsewhere related.

7. Hereupon Ptolemy blamed himself for having given his daughter in marriage to Alexander, and for the league he had made with him, to assist Demetrius; so he dissolved his relation to him, and took his daughter away from him, and immediately sent to Demetrius, and offered the hand of his daughter in marriage to him, and agreed with him to give him his daughter in marriage, and to restore him to the principality of his fathers. Demetrius was well pleased with this embassage, and accepted of the marriage of his daughter. But Ptolemy had still one more hard task to do, and that was, to persuade the people of Antioch to receive Demetrius, because they were greatly displeased at him on account of his having joined the army of Alexander in the battle of Ipsus, and carried with him gold and silver, and garments, and a great number of presents of friendship, and came to Demetrius, and presented him with them, and thereby pacified the king's anger. So he was honored by the king, and made himself esteemed, and by the people of Antioch together an assembly, and persuaded them to receive Demetrius, and assured them that he would not be mindful of what they did to his father, in case he should now be obliged by them to receive Demetrius. And when Alexander at this time, sent him a letter confirming all those grants, whose contents were as follows: "King Demetrius to Jonathan his brother, and to the nation of the Jews, sendeth greeting: We have sent you a white cloak of that which we have sent you, and Lasthenes our kinsman, that you may know its contents. King Demetrius to Lasthenes our father, sendeth greeting: I have determined to return thanks, and to show favor to the nation of the Jews, who hath observed the rules of justice in our concerners. Accordingly, I remit to them the three prefectures, Apheraea, and Lydda, and Ramath, which have been added to Judæa out of Samaria and Galilee, and Samaria, and what the kings, my predecessors, received from those that offered sacrifices in Jerusalem, and what are due from the fruits of the earth, and of the trees, and what else belongs to us; with the salt pits and the pools of their holy temple depend. Nor shall they be compelled to pay any of these taxes from this time to all futurity. Take care, therefore, that a copy of this epistle be taken, and given to Jonathan, and be set up in an eminent place of their holy temple depend. These were the contents of this writing. And now when Demetrius saw that there was peace everywhere, and that there was no danger, nor punts, he was honored by them both. Alexander compelled him also to put off his own garment, and to take a purple garment, and made him sit with him in his throne; and commanded his captains that they should go with him into the middle of the city, and proclaim, that it was not lawful for any to speak against him, or to give him any disturbance. And when the captains had thus done, those that were prepared to accuse Jonathan, and who bore him ill-will, when they saw him was made by him by privateclamation, and that by the king's order, ran away, and were afraid lest some mischief should befall them. Nay, king Alexander was so very kind to Jonathan, that he set him down as the principal of the fourteen, and made him the head of the soldiers.

3. But then, upon the hundred and sixty-fifth year, Demetrius, the son of Demetrius, came from Tyre, with a great number of mercenary soldiers, which Larthenes, the Cretan, brought him, and sailed to Cilicia. This thing cast Alexander into great concern and disorder when he heard it; so he made haste immediately out of Phenicia, and came to Antioch, that he might pursue the people that Demetrius should come. He also left Apollonius Daus, governor of Coelosyria, to coming to Jamnia with a great army, sent to Jonathan the high priest, and told him, that "It was not right that he should rest, and with authority and not be subject to the king; and this thing had made him a reproach among all men, that he had not yet made him subject to the king. Do not thou therefore deceive thyself, and sit still among the mountains, and permit to have forces with thee: but if thou hast any dependence on thy strength, come down into the plain, and let our armies be compared together, and the event of the battle will demonstrate which of us is the mightier." However, the most valiant men of every city are in my army, and that these are the very men who have always beaten thy progenitors; but let us have the battle in such a place of the country where we may fight with weapons, and not with stones, and where there may be no place whither those that are beaten may fly."

4. With this, Jonathan was irritated; and choosing out ten thousand of his soldiers, he went out of Jerusalem in haste with his brother Simon, and came to Joppa, and pitched his camp on the outside of the city, because the people of Joppa had shut their gates against him, and they got into the city by the way of a great way, by Apollonius; but when Jonathan was preparing to besiege them, they were afraid he would take them by force, and so they opened the gates to him. But Jonathan perceived that Joppa was taken by Jonathan, took three thousand horsemen and eight thousand footmen, and cause to Ashdod, and removing thence, he made his journey silently and slowly, and going up to Joppa, he made as if he was retiring from the place, and so drew Jonathan into the plain, as valuing himself highly upon his horsemen, and having his hopes of victory principally in them. However, Jonathan sallied out, and pursued Apollonius, but as he perceived that his enemy was in the plain, he came back and gave him battle: but Apollonius had laid a thousand horsemen in ambush in a valley, that they might not be seen by their enemies; which when Jonathan perceived, he was under no surmation, but ordering his army to stand in a square battle array, he gave them a charge to fall on the enemy by him, but afterward revolted from him to Alexander, but not to Demetrius the son, as he supposed. As Ptolemy, and Roms used to reward such as had deserved well of them, by presenting to them a golden button; see ch. v. sect. 4. though they had desisted Demetrius, they had not resolved to join themselves to Antiochus. This provoked Jonathan to besiege them, and to harass their country, for as he sat a part of his army around about Gaza itself, as with the rest he overran their land, and spoilt it and burnt what was in it. When the inhabitants of Gaza saw themselves in this state of affliction, and that no assistance came to them from Demetrius, they went unto Jason, and said that they had nothing to do but what should profit them was still at a great distance, and it was uncertain whether it would come at all or not, they thought it would be prudent carr on to, whether he longer continuing with him, and to cultivate friendship with the other: so they sent to Jonathan, and professed they would be his friends, and afford him assistance; for such is the temper of men, that before they had the trial of great afflictions, they do not understand what is for their advantage; but when they find themselves under such afflictions, they then change their minds; and what it had been better for them to have done before they had been garrisoned against them, but not till after they have suffered such damages.

However, he made a league of friendship with them, and took from them hostages for their performance of it, and sent these hostages to Jerusalem, and made himself master over all the country as far as Damascus.

6. But when he heard that the generals of Demetrius's forces were come to the city of Kades, with a numerous army, (the people of the Tyrians and Sidonians,) for they supposed they should hereby draw him out of Syria, in order to preserve Galilee, and that he would not overlook the Galileans, who were his own countrymen, and not to depopulate the land, he went to meet them, having left Simon in Judea, who raised as great an army as he was able out of the country, and then sat down before Bethsura and besieged it, that being the strongest place in all Judea, and not to be taken by force, they put the sword to the sword; so they sent to Simon, and desired the security of his oath, that they should come to no harm from him, and that they would leave the place, and go away to Demetrius. Accordingly, Jason forefeared what he had done, and ejected them out of the city, and he put therein a garrison of his own.

7. But Jonathan removed out of Galilee, and from there he was before encamped, and came into the plain that is called Asor, without knowing that the enemy was there. When therefore Demetrius's men knew a day beforehand, that Jonathan was coming against them, they laid an ambush in the mountain, where to assault him on the sudden, while they themselves met him with an army in the plain, which army, when Jonathan saw ready to engage him, he also got ready, and said to Demetrius, it was not what he was able; but those that were laid in ambush by Demetrius's generals being behind them, the Jews were afraid lest they should be caught in the midst between two bodies, and perish, so they kept away, and left Jonathan; but a few there were, in number about fifty, who staid with him, and with them Mattithias the son of Absalom, and Judas the son of Chapmany, to whom the commission was given, to keep the army. These marched boldly, and like men desolate, against the enemy, and so pursued them that by their courage they dismayed them, and with their weapons in their hands they put them to flight. And when those soldiers of Jonathan that had retired saw the enemy giving way, they got together after their flight, and pursued them with great violence, and this did they as far as Kades, where the camp of the enemy lay.

8. Jonathan having thus gotten a glorious victory, and slain those that were under Demetrius, he returned to Jerusalem. So when he saw that all his affairs prospered according to his mind, by the providence of God, he sent ambassadors to the Romans, being desirous of renewing that friendship with their former emperor. He also, like the Romans, he enquired about the empire. He also the ambassadors, that as they came back, they should go to the Spartans, and put them in mind of their friendship and kindness. So when Jason was come to Rome, they went into their senate, and said what they were commanded by Jonathan the high priest to say, how he had sent them to confirm their friendship. The senate then confirmed what had been formerly done, as at first to begin the friendship with the Jews; and gave them letters to carry to all the kings of Asia and Europe, and to the governors of the cities, that they might safely conduct them to their own country. Accordingly, as they paid the tribute, and delivered the epistle which they had received of Jonathan to them; a copy of which here follows: "Jonathan the high priest of the Jewish nation, and the senate, and body of the people of Israel, to the Rome, and the people of the Lacedæmonians, send greetings; If you be well, and both your public and private affairs be agreeable to your minds, it is according to our wishes. We, the Lacedæmonians, send in former times an epistle was brought to Oinias, who was then our high priest, from Areus, who at that time was your king, by Demoteses, concerning the kindness that was between us and you, a copy of which is now submitted to you. We received the epistle, and were well pleased with Demoteses and Areus, although we did not need such a demonstration, because we were well satisfied about it from the sacred writings, yet did not we think it fit, to begin the friendship with you, lest we should seem too early in taking to ourselves the glory which is now given us by you. It is a long time since this relation of ours to you has been renewed; and yet, we, upon holy and religious sacrifice to our gods, and especially to God, pray to him for your preservation and victory. As to ourselves, although we have had many wars that have compassed us around, by our valour to reach the tumult of the enemy, we did not determine to be troublesome either to you, or to others that were related to us; but since we have now overcome our enemies, and have occasion to send Numenius, the son of Antiochus, and Antipater the son of Jason, who are both honorable men belonging to our senate, to the Romans, we gave them this epistle to you also, that they might renew that friendship which is between us. You will therefore do well yourselves to write and send something to what you stand in need of from us, since we are in all things disposed to act according to your desires." So the Lacedæmonians received the ambassadors kindly, and made a decree for friendship and mutual traffic with them, and sent a copy to all that was in the senate.

9. At this time there were three sects among the Jews, who had different opinions concerning human actions; one was called the sect of the Pharisees, another the sect of the Sadducees, and the other the sect of the Essenes. Now for was Josephus. But if this were the Jews' meaning, that they were satisfied out of their Bible, that the Jews and Lacedæmonians were of him, that part of their Bible in now lost, for we find no such assurance in our present copies.
the Pharisees, they say that some actions, but not all, are the work of fate, and that some of them are in our own power, and that they are liable to fate, but are not caused by fate. But the sect of the Essenes affirm, that fate governs all things, and that nothing is otherwise than what is by fate determined. And for the Sadducees, they take away fate, and say there is no such thing, and that the events of human affairs are not at its disposal, but they suppose that all our actions are in our own power, that we are ourselves the cause of what is good, and receive what is evil from our own folly. However, I have given a more exact account of these opinions in the second book of the Jewish War.

10. But now the generals of Demetrius, being willing to recover the defeat they had had, gathered a larger army together than they had before, and came against Jonathan; but as soon as they perceived that he did not suddenly meet them, they went to the country of Hasmone, for he resolved to give them no opportunity of coming into Judea, so he pitched his camp at fifty furlongs distant from the enemy, and sent out spies to know where they were and what manner they were encamped. When his spies had given him full information, and had seized upon some of them by night, who told him the enemy would soon attack him, he, thus apprised of the evil, prepared for his defense, and placed watchmen beyond his camp, and kept all his forces armed all night; and he gave them a charge to be of good courage, and to have their minds prepared to fight in the night time, if they should be attacked, lest the enemy's designs should seem concealed from them. But when Demetrius's commanders were informed that Jonathan knew what they intended, their confidence was disturbed, and they disheartened him to find that the enemy had discovered their intentions, nor did they expect to overcome them any other way, now they had failed in the snare they had laid for them; for should they now escape, they did not think they should be a match for Jonathan's army, so they resolved to fly; and having lighted many fires, that when the enemy saw them they might suppose they were there still, they retired. But when Jonathan saw the smoke of their camp, and after the morning of their camp, and found it deserted, and understood they were fled, he pursued them, yet he could not overtake them, for they had already passed over the river Eleutherus, and were out of his reach. And such was Jonathan's prudence, he went into Arabia, and fought against the Nabateans, and drove away a great deal of their prey, and took [many] captives, and came to Damascus, and there did all what he had taken. About the same time it was, that Simon his brother went over all Judaea and Palestine, as far as Askelon, and fortified the strong holds; and when he had made them very strong, both in the cities erected, and in the garrisons placed in them, he came to Joppa, and when he had taken it, he brought a great garrison into it.

CHAP. VI.
How Jonathan was slain by Tyrearchy; and how they upon the Jews made Simon their General and High Priest: what courageous Actions he also performed, especially against Trypho.

1. Now when Trypho knew what had beenfallen Demetrius, he was no longer firm to Antiochus, but contrived by subtlety to kill him, and then take possession of his kingdom; but the friends of John, as he was resolved to fight to this his design, for Jonathan was a friend to Antiochus, for which cause he resolved first to take Jonathan out of the way, and then to set about his design relating to Antiochus: but he judged it best to take him off by deceit and treachery, came from Antioch to Bethanath, which by the Greeks is called Scythopolis, at which place Jonathan met him with forty thousand, and the garrisons went out to fight him; but when he perceived that Jonathan was ready to fight, he attempted to gain him by subtile subtlety: however, our Josephus, who in his heart was a great admirer of the piety of the Essenes, was yet in practice a Pharisee, as he himself informs us, in his own Life, sect. 2. And his account of this doctrine of the Pharisees, is for certain agreeable to his own opinion, who both fully allowed the free- dom and sovereignty of the world, and yet did not ascribe all to fate or Divine Providence, as was consistent with the freedom of human actions. However, their per- suasion concerning fate, or about the rule of all things, made it commonly thought they were willing to exceed their sins by sacrificing to fate, as the following instances, sect. 1, ch. vi. Per- haps under the same general name some difference of opinion in this point might be propagated, as is very common in all parts especially in points of metaphypresented and kind treatment, and gave order to his captains to obey him, and by these means was disposed to give assurance of his good-will, and to take away all suspicions out of his mind, that he was a Jew, as make him understand, and more trustworthy. 2. Yet did not Jonathan suspect any thing at all by this his management but believed that Titypho gave him this advice out of kindness, and that he was wise and sincere in his advice. Accordingly, he declined his advice, and professed the courage and fidelity of his army, and he himself, with the courage of three thousand of them with him, left two thousand in Galilee, and he himself, with one thousand, came with Titypho to Ptolemais; but then, when the multitude of the people that he had been commanded by Titypho to do, he took Jonathan alive, and slew all that were with him. He also sent soldiers against the two thousand that were left in Galilee, in order to destroy them; but Jonathan, who was so happy as to find the city taken, and the inhabitants destroyed, went away out of the city. Now, when Titypho saw that they were ready to fight for their lives, they gave them no disturbance, but returned back to Titypho.

3. But when the people of Jerusalem heard that Jonathan was taken, and that the soldiers who were with him were destroyed, they deplored his sad fate, and there was earnest inquiry made about him by every body, and a great and just fear fell upon them, and made them sad, lest now the army and the conduct of Jonathan, the nationes about them should bear them ill-will; and as they were before quiet on account of Jonathan, they should now rise up against them, and therefore, as with them, should force them into the utmost dangers. And indeed what they suspected really befell them, for when the nations heard of the death of Jonathan, they began to make war with the Jews, and now the multitude of the army of Titypho himself got an army together, and had an intimation to go up to Judea, and make war against its inhabitants. 4. But when Simon saw that the people of Jerusalem were terrified at the circumstances they were in, he desired to make a speech to them, and thereby to render them more resolute in opposing Titypho when he should come against them. He then called the people together into the temple, and therehe began thus to encourage them: "If my countrymen, you are not ignorant that our fathers, myself, and my brethren, have ventured to hazard our lives, and that willingly, for the recovery of your liberty; since I have, therefore, such plenty of men with me, I will now take you, and we all have determined with ourselves to die for our laws and our divine worship, there shall no terror be so great as to bırish this resolution from these, to introduce the fear of death in our mind, and of life, and a contempt of glory. Do you therefore follow me with alacrity whithersoever I shall lead you, as not destitute of such a captain as is willing to suffer, and to do the greatest things for you; for neither him I better than my brethren that I should be sparing of my own life, nor so far worse than they as to avoid and refuse what they thought the most honorable of all things; I mean, to undergo death for your laws, and for that worship of God which is peculiar to you; I will therefore give such proper demonstrations as will show that I am their own brother; as I am so bold as to expect that I shall avenge their blood upon our enemies, and deliver you all, with your wives and your children, from the hands of the enemy instead against you, and, with God's assistance, to preserve your temple from destruction by them, for I see that those nations have you in contempt, as being without a governor, and that they are desirous that the whole multitude of the people cried out all at once, that Simon should be their leader, and that instead of Judees and Jonathan his brethren, he should be the governor, and that they promised that they would readily obey him in whatsoever he should command them. So he got together immediately all his own soldiers that were fit for war, and made haste in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, and he himself stayed to secure Jerusalem. 5. But Titypho removed from Ptolemais with a great army, and came into Judea, and brought Jonathan with him in bonds. Simon also met him with him, and saw the city, and the curious stones, which he had seen upon a hill, and beneath it lies the plains of Judea. And when Titypho knew that Simon was by the Jews made their governor, he sent to him, and would have imposed upon him by deceit and treachery; and would have delivered him; but Jonathan released, that he would send him a hundred talents of silver, and two of Jonathan's sons as hostages, that when he shall be released, he may not make Judees revolt from the king, for that which he was kept on bonds as account of the money he had borrowed of the king, and now owed it to him. But Simon was aware of the craft of Titypho, and although he knew that if he gave him the money nor sent Jonathan's sons, that the offers were an answere and treacheries, and yet that it was more eligible to pay the money and Jonathan's sons them to be liable to the imputation of not complying with Titypho's offers, and thereby refusing to save his brother. Accordingly, Simon sent the sons of Jonathan and the money, but when Titypho received them, he did not keep his promise nor set Jonathan free, but took his army, and went against all the country, and resolved to go afterward to Jerusalem by the way of Idumea, while Simon went by the sea, and a war arose between them, and all along pitched his own camp over against his.
ANTIQUITIES OF THE JEWS.

Antioch. However, Simon sent some to the city Idasca to bring away his brother's bones, and buried them in their own city Modin; and all the people made great lamentation over him. Simon also erected a very lofty monument for his father and his brethren, of white and polished stone, and raised it to a great height, and so as to be seen a long way off, and made cloisters about it, and set up pillars, which were of one stone upon another; and he designed, even to the present day, to build over it, he built seven pyramids also for his parents and his brethren, one for each of them, which were made very surprising, both for their largeness and beauty, and which have been preserved to this day; for though we know that it was Simon who bestowed a much zeal also: the burial of Jonathan, and the building of these monuments for his relations. Now Jonathan died when he had been king of the Jews for twenty years, and he was also the governor of his nation. And these were the circumstances that concurred to his death.

7. But Simon, who was made high priest by the multitudes, on the very first year of his high priesthood set his people free from their slavery under the Macedonians, and permitted them to pay tribute to them no longer; which liberty and freedom from tribute they obtained after a hundred and seventy years of the kingdom of the Jews, which was a great deliverance, who was called Nicator got the dominion over Syria. Now the affection of the multitude towards Simon was so great, that in their contracts one with another, in the public records, they acknowledged him as 'In the first year of Simon the benefactor and etharch of the Jews! for under him they were very happy, and overcame the enemies that were round about them, for Simon overthrew the city Lachis, and Joppa, and Jemia. He also took the citadel of Jerusalem by siege, and cast it down to the ground, that it might not be any more a place of refuge to their enemies when they took it, to do them mischief, as it used to do before. And which had done this, he thought it their best way, and most for their advantage, to level the very mountain itself upon which the citadel happened to stand, that the temple might be higher than it. And, in

"There is some great error in the copies here, when now the Apocrypha states the time ascended the high priest- hood of Jonathan. We know by Josephus's last Jewish chronology, Antiq. b. x. ch. 1, that there was an interregnum between the death of Simon and that of Artaxerxes, the last high priest, and the real high priesthood of Jonathan, to whom yet those seven years seem hardly enough to enable him to judge and to judge before, Antiq. b. xli. chap. x. sect. 6. Now since, besides these seven years interregnum in the pontificate, we are told, Antiq. b. xxi. ch. 2, that Jonathan's real high priesthood began on the 28th year before the Christian era, from its spring in the first book of Maccabees, and from its autumn in the second book of that same, and that Simon lived not out of Babylon till the next spring on the 211th year. See Prid. at the year 319. And it is truly observed by Dr. Hodge, on this place, that the Syrian and Assyrian are sometimes confounded in ancient authors, according to the words of Justin the apostleman of Tarsus Pompeius, who says, That the Assyrians were afterward called Syrians." B. i. ch. xii. See Of the war b. v. ch. xii. sect. 1, where the Phœnicians themselves, at all the very strict limit of Syria, in its utmost extent, are called Syrian, and all their contents are not here cumbered, though much the greater part be.

"If how Trypho killed the Antiochus, the epistle of Philo, loc. cit. 159, viz. that he corrupted the physicians or surgeons, who falsely pretending to the people that he was performing with the stone, as they cut him for their pleasure, had them to drink poisonous medicine, that this Antiochus the son of Alexander Bals was called the god, is evident from his coins, which Simon came to use, hear the inscription, King Antiochus the god, Ephiphanes the Victorious."

CHAP. VII.

How Simon confederated himself with Antiochus, and made peace with Trypho; and a little afterward against Cæneus, the General of Antiochus's Army; as also how Simon was made master of his son-in-law, Fialtian, and that by Treachery.

1. Now a little while after Demetrius had been carried into captivity, Trypho his governor destroyed Antiochus the son of Alexander, who was made king in Asia, and reigned four years, though he gave it out that he died under the hands of the surgeons. He then sent his friends and those that were most intimate with him to the soldiers; and promised them an immense sum of money if they would make him king. He intimated to them that Demetrius was made a captive by the Parthians; and that Demetrius's brother Antiochus, if he came to be king, would do them great wrongs, and would make them revolt from his brother. So the soldiers in expectation of the wealth they should get by bestowing the kingdom on Trypho, made him their ruler. However, when Trypho had gained never have omitted, had his copy contained so much. The same thing appears from his description of Antiochus with Antiochus Soter, the son of Demetrius Soter, and brother of the other Demetrius, who was now a captive at Babylon in the 102d year of the Persian empire, and the 160th year before the Christian era, he granted great privileges to the Jewish nation, and to Simon their high priest, and the temple, and to the Jews; and this is no way to be forgotten, for they have taken of his own accord, at out three years before.

In particular he gave him leave to coin money for his country, with his own stamp; and as concerning Jews, he gave them such authority, that they should be free from the vulgar Latin battle, holy and free. 1 March. xvi. 6, 7, which I take to be the true reading, as being the very records of the father's concession offered to Jonathan several years before, ch. x. 21, and Antiq. b. xlii. ch. ii. sect. 3. Now what makes this date, and these grants greatly remarkable, is the ease of the remainder states, and the undoubted marks of the truth of the history in these chapters, though it he in great measure omitted by Josephus. See Essay on the Old Testament, p. 157, 158. The reason why I rather suppose that his copy of the Maccabees was this chapter, than that his own copies are here im-

It must here be diligently noted, that Josephus's copy of the book of Maccabees, which he had so careful ly followed, and faithfully abridged as far as the 50th years of the twelfth chapter, seems there to have ended. We know also, from the epistles of Philo and of Trypho, that this Antiochus was afterward killed, probably by some other more imperfect records. However, we must exactly ob the management of affairs, he demonstrated his disposition to be wicked; for, as he was a private person, he cultivated a familiarity with the multitude, and pretended to great moderation, and so drew them on artfully to whatsoever he pleased; but when he had once taken the kingdom, he reigned in it as a tyrant.

It was the true Trypho, which behavior made his enemies superior to him, for the soldiery hated him, and revolted from him to Cleopatra the wife of Demetrius, who was then shut up in Seleucia with her children. But Antiochus, the brother of Demetrius, who was called Soter, was not admitted by any of the cities on account of Trypho, Cleopatra sent to him, and invited him to marry her, and to take the kingdom. The reasons why the made this invitation were these, that her friends persuaded her to it, and that she was afraid of herself, in case some of the people of Seleucia should deliver up the city to Trypho.

2. As Antiochus was now come to Seleucia, his forces increased every day, set out to fight Trypho; and having beaten him in the battle, he ejected him out of the Upper Syria into Phœnicia, and pursued him thither, and besieged him in Dor. He then took his measures to get himself released from his engagements, for those that besieged Dor, and thereby supplied them very plentifully, so that for a little while he was looked upon as one of his most intimate friends; but still Trypho fled from Seleucia, which was taken during the siege, and put to death, when he had reigned three years.

3. However, Antiochus forgot the kind assistance that Simon had afforded him in his necessity, and refused to admit him of his choice, and committed an army of soldiers to his friend Cendebas, and sent him at once to ravage Judea, and to seize Simon. When Simon heard of Antiochus's breaking his league with him, although he was now in years, yet, provoked with the unjust treatment he had met with from Antiochus, and taking a resolution braver than his age could bear, he went forth to encounter him; and in his general he was invested with the title of centurion. He also sent his sons before among the most hardy of his soldiers, and he himself marched on with his army another way, and laid many of his men in ambushes, in the narrow valleys between the mountains, which were for the most part inhabited in any one of his attempts, but was too hard for his enemies in every one of them. So he led the rest of his life in peace, and did also himself make a league with the Romans.

4. Now he was the ruler of the Jews in all eight years; but at a feast came to his end. It was caused by the treachery of his son-in-law, Ptolemy, who caught also his wife, and two of his sons, and kept them in bonds. He also sent to kill John, the third son; I mean that was Hycaranus; but the young man perceiving

They came, he avoided the danger he was in from them, and considered into it, "[And Sa- sah,]" as relying on the good-will of the multitude, because of the benefits they had received from his fathers, and because of the hatred the same multitude bare to Ptolemy; so that when Ptolemy was going to enter the city by another gate, they drove him away, as having already admitted Hycaranus.

CHAP. VIII.

Hycaranus receives the High Priesthood, and ejects Ptolemy out of the Country. Antiochus makes Hycaranus, and afterward makes a League with him.

1. So Ptolemy retired to one of the footraces that was above Jericho, which was called Dages; but Hycaranus having taken the priesthood that had been his father's before, and in the first place propitiated God by sacrifices, he then made an expedition against Ptolemy; and when he had made his attacks upon the place, in other points he was too hard for him, but was rendered weaker than he, by the consideration he had in the house of Maccabees, and as he was very fond for Ptolemy brought them upon the wall, and tormented them in the sight of all, and threatened that he would throw them down headlong, unless Hycaranus would leave off the siege. And as he thought that so far as he could make him, he understood the siege and taking of the place, so much favor did he show to those that were dearest to him by preventing their mischief, his seat about it was cooled. However, his mother spread out her hands, and besought him of him that he would not grow remiss on her account, but indulge his indignation so much the more, and that he would do his utmost to take the place quickly, in order to get their enemy under his power, and then to avenge upon their enemies as they thought overcast, and as the more they were dearest to himself; for that death would be to her sweet, though with torment, if that enemy of theirs might be brought to punishment for his wicked dealing to them. Now, when his mother said so, he resolved not to take the fortress immediately; but when he saw her beaten and torn to pieces, his courage failed him, and he could not but sympathize with what his mother suffered, and was therefore so disposed that the more he was drawn out into length by this means, that year on which the Jews used to rest came on, for the Jews observe this rest every seventh year, as they do every seventh day; so that Ptolemy was overcast, and he being for the most part the best and greatest of the brethren of Hycaranus, and his mother; and when he had so done, he fled to Zeno, who was called Cotylas, who was then the tyrant of the city of Philadelphia.

2. But Antiochus being very uneasy at the miseries that Simon had brought upon him, he invaded Judah in the fourth year of his reign, and the first year of the principality of Hycaranus, in the hundred and sixty-second Olympiad. And when he had pitched his camp, he set up Hycaranus in the city, which he encompassed they could not associate with other people, nor converse with them; yet were they willing, instead of the admission of the garrison, to give him hostages, and five hundred talents of silver, of which they paid down three hundred, and sent the rest the next day, and it was all accepted. One of these hostages was Hircanus's brother; but still he broke down the fortifications that encompassed the city; and upon these conditions Antiochus broke up the siege and departed.

So then, when he had taken the city, he made an expedition against the Parthians; of which Nicocles, of Damascus, is a witness for us, who in his history writes thus: "When Antiochus had erected a trophy at the river Lykippus, he himself went in person to the generals of the Parthians, he stayed there two days. It was at the desire of Hircanus the Jew, because it was such a festival derived to them from their forefathers, whereon the law of the Jews is, when Antiochus of Damascus did not speak falsely in saying so; for that festival, which we call Pentecost, did then fall out to be the next day to the Sabbath: nor is it lawful for us to journey, or go to the Sabbath-day, or to take battle with armies." But when Antiochus of Damascus was at war with Armenia, the king of Parthia, he kept a great part of his army, and was himself slain; and his brother Demetrius succeeded in the kingdom of Syria by the permission of Armenia, who freed them from the power of their king. Antiochus then turned back to the war against the Jews; and this account is not ill-timed. For the nation of the Cutheans, who dwelt at the temple which Alexander permitted Sannaias, the general of his army, to build for the sake of Mammaseus, who was son-in-law to Judas, as we have formerly related, which temple was now desert; the two had been destroyed before it was built. Hircanus took also Dora and Marias, cities of Idumaea, and subdued all the Idumaeans, and permitted them to stay in that country if they would circumcise their children, and make use of the laws of the Jews; and they were so desirous of living in the country of their forefathers, that they submitted the borders of their own cities to be sacrificed, is a known thing both in the poets and orators.

* Dr. Hudson tells us here, that this custom of gilding... the use of circumcisions, and of the rest of the Jewish ways of living: at which time, therefore, this belief existed, that they were heathens no other than Jews.

2. But among the Greeks, the high priest, was desirous to renew that league of friendship they had with the Romans. Accordingly, he sent an embassy to them; and when the senate had received their epistle, they made a league of it, thus expressing it: the Romans in the following:

"Famine, the son of Marcus the priest, gathered the senate together on the eighth day before the ides of February, in the senate-house, when Lucius Menenius Agrippa, the son of Marcus, and Caicus Sampus, the son of Caicus, of the Falernian tribe, were present. The occasion was, that the ambassadors sent by the people of the Jews, Simon, the son of Dosthus, and Apollonis in scrip], and the son of Jason, who were good and virtuous men, had somewhat to propose about that league of friendship and mutual assistance which subsisted between them and the Romans, and about other points that the Romans desired that the Jews should be lawful for the king's troops to pass through their country, and the countries of those that are subject to them. And that what attains Antiochus had made during that war, without the consent of the king, and that they were made by the king's authority. And the Romans were afraid that they would send ambassadors, who should take care that restitution be made of what Antiochus took from them, and that they should make an estimate of the same. And that when they were laid waste in the land and that they would grant them letters of protection to the kings, and free people, in order to their quiet return home. It was, therefore, decreed, as to those points, that they should give them money out of the public treasury to bear their expenses. And the opinion of the Romans was, that mutual assistance with these good men, and that they were sent by a good and friendly people."

But that as to the letters desired, their answer was, that the senate would consult about that matter, when their own affairs would give them leisure, and that they would endeavor, for the time to come, that no like injury should be done them; and that their priest, Famine, should give them money out of the public treasury to bear their expenses. And thus the emissaries of the Romans, the Jewish ambassadors, and gave them money out of the public treasury, and gave the decree of the senate to those that were to conduct them, and take care that they should return home in safety.

3. And thus stood the affairs of Hycrancus the high priest. But as for king Demetrius, who had a mind to make war against Hycrancus, there was no opportunity nor room for it, while both the Syracusans and the soldiers were ill to him, because he was an ill man. But when they had sent ambassadors to Ptolemy, who was called Phuscos, that he would send them one of the family of Seleucus, as a man of the king's friends, and he had sent Alexander, who was called Zeblis with an army, and there had been a battle between them, Demetrius was beaten in the fight and fled to Clesipatra his wife, to Ptolemais, but his wife would not let him go, because he went thence to Tyre, and was there caught; and when he had suffered much from his enemies before his death, he was slain by them. So when Alexander took the kingdom, and made a league with Hycrancus, who yet, while he fought with Antiochus the son of Demetrius, who was called Gryppus, was also beaten in the fight and slain.

CHAP. X.

How, upon the Quarrel between Antiochus Gryppus and Antiochus Cyasion, about the Kingdom, Hycrancus took Samaria, and utterly desolated it; and how Hycrancus joined himself to the Sect of the Sadducees, and left that of the Pharisees.

§ 1. WHEN Antiochus had taken the kingdom, he was afraid to make war against Judea, because he heard of his brother's death in the same mother, who was also called Antiochus, who was raising an army against him out of Cyricum; so he staid in his own land, and resolved to prepare himself for the attack he expected from his brother, who was called Gryppus, and knew he had been brought up in that city. He was the son of Antiochus that was called Soter, who died in Persia. He was the brother of Demetrius, the father of Gryppus, for it had so happened, that one and the same woman bore to Antiochus two, who were brethren, as we have related elsewhere. But Antiochus Cyasion coming into Syria, continued many years at war with his brother. Now Hycrancus lived all this while in peace; for after the death of Antiochus, he re

But still take up of Antiochus, 120, the story, a grammarian, which fully confirms this account of the Idumeans in Josephus: "The Jews (says he) use much by nature, and from the beginning, whilst the Idumaeans were not Jews from the beginning, but Pho-

[1] In this decree of the Roman senate, it seems that these ambassadors were sent from the people of the Jews, as well as from their princes or high priest, John Hycrancus.

[2] Dean Prideaux quotes, in the year 129, that Justin, in agreements and differences as to the delivery of the Jews was now grown so great, that after this Antiochus they would not bear any Macedonian king over them, and that they set up a government of their own, and insulited Syria with great wars.”
shall speak at a proper time: but he made his attack against it, and besieged it with a great deal of pains, for it was a very strong and large city, and the Romans for the injuries they had done to the people of Marissa, a colony of the Jews, and confederate with them, and this in compliance to the kings of Syria. When he had therefore disposed of those, and built a double wall round the city, which was fourscore furlongs long, he set his sons Antigonus and Aristobulus over the siege, which brought the Samaritans to that great distress by famine, that they were forced to come to him, and to be cast away for Antiochus Cyzicus to help them, who came readily to their assistance, but was beaten by Aristobulus, and when he was pursued as far as Scythopolis by the two brethren, he got away. So they returned to Samaria, and shut them again within the wall, till they were forced to send for the same Antiochus a second time to help them, who procured about six thousand men from Ptolemy Lathyrus, who further sent them without his mother's consent, who had then in a manner turned him out of his government. With these Egyptians Antiochus did at first overrun and ravage the country of Hyrcanus after the manner of conquerors, for he durst not go in the face to fight with him, as not having an army sufficient for that purpose, but only from this supposal, that by thus harassing his land he should force Hyrcanus to raise the siege of Samaria. But the latter fell into his snare, and lost many of his soldiers therein, he went away to Tripoli, and committed the prosecution of the war against the Jews to Callimander and Epiphrates.

3. But as to Callimander, he attacked the enemy too rashly, and was put to flight and destroyed immediately; and as to Epiphrates, he was such a lover of money, that he openly betrayed Scythopolis, and other places near it, to the Jews, but was not able to make man to raise the siege there. And when Hyrcanus had taken the city, which was not done till after a year's siege, he was not contented with doing that only, but he demolished it entirely, and brought rivulets to it to drown it, and led such hollows as might let the water run under it; nay, he took away the very marks that there had ever been such a city there. Now a very surprising thing is related of this high priest Hyrcanus, how he would discourse with his friends; for they say, that on the very same day on which his sons fought with Antiochus Cyzicus, he was alone in the temple, as high priest, offering incense, and heard a voice, that "his sons had just then overthrown Antiochus." And this he openly declared before all the multitude upon his coming out of the temple; and it accordingly proved true: and in this posture were the affairs of Hyrcanus.

4. Now it happened at this time, that not only those Jews who were at Jerusalem and in Judea were in prosperity, but also those of them that were at Alexandria, and in Egypt, and Cyprus, for a great part was at the same time with his other son Ptolemy, who was called Lathyrus, and appointed for her generals Chelcia, and Ananias, the sons of that Onias who built the temple in his prefecture of Heliopolis, like to that of Jeru-

The original of the Sadducees, as a considerable party among the Jews, being contained in this and the two following sections, take Dean Prideaux's note upon this their first public appearance, which I suppose to be the true Textus Receptus.* I went to Pompey the First, the title of the Sadducees, is by embracing their doctrine against the traditions of the scribes, added to the written law, which was contradictory with it, but not their doctrine against the resurrection and a future state, for this cannot be supposed of so good and righteous a man as Jesus Christ. It is said to be, the most probable, that at this time the Sadducees had gone no farther in their doctrines of time sect than to deny all their unwritten instincts these men with barren fury; and did nothing without their advice, as Strabo of Cappadoce, part, both those that came to Cyprus with us and those that were sent afterward thither, re voluted to Ptolemy immediately; only those that were called Oasa's party, being Jews, continued faithful, because their great enemies Chelcia and Ananias were in chief favor with the queen.*

These are the words of Strabo.

5. However, this prosperous state of affairs moved the Jews to envy Hyrcanus, but they the same year to invite their good friends the Pharisees, who were one of the sects of the Jews, as we have informed you already. These have so great a power over the multitude, that when they say any thing against the king, or attain to be true, they are presently believed. Now Hyrcanus was a disciple of them and greatly beloved by them. And when he once invited them to a feast, and entertained them in a great honour, he began to say to them, that "They knew he was desirous to be a righteous man, and to do all things whereby he might please God, which was the profession of the Pharisees also.

Unfortunately, because he cast his eyes, when he was out of the place of power, attending on any point, and going out of the right way, they would call him back and correct him." On which occasion they attributed to his being entirely virtuous, with which commendation he was not satisfied, because he had been a captive of Antiochus Epiphanes." This story was false, and Hyrcanus was provoked against him; and all the Pharisees had a very great indignation against him.

6. Now there was one Jonathan, a very great friend of Hyrcanus, but of the sect of the Sadducees, whose notions are quite contrary to those of the Pharisees. He told Hyrcanus, that "Elenas, a man of great name, had gone to Rome, ring to the common sentiments of all the Pharisees, and that this would be made manifest, if he would but ask them the question, what punishment they thought this man deserved for that he had done. He did not know, said he, whether was not laid on him with their approbation, if they were for punishing him as his crime deserved." So the Pharisees made answer, that "He deserved stripes and bonds, but that it did not seem right to punish reproaches with death." And indeed the Pharisees, even upon other occasions, are not apt to be severe in punishments. At this gentle sentence, Hyrcanus was very satisfied, and he ordered Jonathan to be him by their approbation. It was this Jonathan who chiefly irritated him, and influenced him so far, that he made him leave the party of the Pharisees, and abolish the decrees they had imposed on the people, and punish those that observe i traditions, which the Pharisees were so fond of; for Jesus mentions no other difference at this time between them; neither does he say that Hyrcanus went over to the Sadducees in any other particular than in the

of the Sadducees, that is, by embracing their doctrine against the traditions of the scribes, added to the written law, which was contradictory with it, but not their doctrine against the resurrection and a future state, for this cannot be supposed of so good and righteous a man as Jesus Christ. It is said to be, the most probable, that at this time the Sadducees had gone no farther in their doctrines of time sect than to deny all their unwritten them. From this source arose that hatred which he and his sons met with from the multitude; but of these matters we shall speak hereafter. What I write now explains this, for not only have they delivered to the people a great many observations by succession from their fathers, which are not written in the laws of Moses; and for that reason it is that the Sadducees reject them, and ascribe their power to sorcery, but those who are able to persuade none but the rich, and have not the populace obsequious to them; but the Pharisees have the multitude on their side. But about these two sects, and that of the Essenes, I have related accurately in the second book of Jewish affairs.

7. But when Hyrcanus had put an end to this sedition, he after that lived happily, and administered the government in the best way he could, during ten years, and then died; leaving behind him five sons. He was esteemed by God worthy of the three greatest privileges, the government of his nation, the dignity of the high priesthood, and that of the kingdom, for he yielded them to his sons in fullness and to foretell this in particular, that as to his two eldest sons, he foretold that they would not long continue in this government of public affairs: whose unhappy catastrophe will be worth our narration, that we may chance learn how very much they were inferior to their father’s happiness.

CHAP. XI.

How Aristobulus, when he had taken the Government, first of all put a Diadem on his Head, and was afterward cruelly treated to his Father and his Brothers; and how, after he had slain Antigonus, he himself died.

§ 1. Now when their father Hyrcanus was dead, the eldest son, Aristobulus, intending to change the government into a kingdom, for so he resolved to do, first of all put a diadem on his head, four hundred and eighty and one years and three months after the people had been delivered from the Babylonish slavery, and were returned to their own country again. This Aristobulus loved exceedingly his family, and made himself equal to his as his equal, but the others he held in bonds. He also cast his mother into prison, because she disputed the government with him, for Hyrcanus had bequeathed it to all of them. He also proceeded to that degree of barbarity, as to slay his people in order to produce them, and make himself the successor of his father. He added to this the guilt of having made himself a fine suit of armor for war, and desired him to come to him in that armor, that he might see how fine it was. So Antigonus, suspecting no treachery, but depending on the good will of his brother, came to Aristobulus armed, as he used to be, with his entire armor, in order to show it to him; but when he was come to a place which was called Strato’s Tower, where the passage happened to be exceeding dark, the guards set upon him and slew him; and by that means nothing was easier than to slay enemies, and to make himself master of the kingdom, and who never missed the truth in his predictions, for this man, when he saw Antigonus passing by the temple, cried out to his companions and friends, who abode with him as his scholars, in order to learn the art of foretelling things to come, “That it was good for him to die now, since he had spoken falsely about Antigonus, first king Aristobulus, whose reign being but a single year, seems hardly to have come to his knowledge. Nor indeed does Aristobulus, the son of Alexander, pretend that the name of king was before his father Alexander took it himself. Antig. b. xii. ch. iii. sect. 2. See also ch. xii. sect. 1, which favor Strabo also. And indeed, if we may judge from the words of the Egyptians Jews under high priests, and of the Persian Jews under kings, in the two next centuries, we may well suppose that divine oracles received from the wise men of Egypt, and to the worthlings at the temple of Onias were etier men than those at the temple of Jerusalem. Hence we may see that the Egyptian rules whereby men might forecast things to come, and that the Jews the Essenes taught those rules to his s’l’ors, but whether their pretended knowledge of astrologers or men of this sort, which yet in such Jews, who were utterly forbidden such arts, is noway probable, or to any Rabi Col, spoken of by the latter Rabine, or otherwise, I cannot tell. See Of The Wt. 60. b. ii. ch. viii. sect. 19. y 2 shall speak at a proper time: but he made his attack against it, and besieged it with a great deal of pains, for he was greatly displeased with the Samaritans for the injuries they had done to the people of Meriam, a colony of the Jews, and confederate with them against the king of Syria. When he had therefore drawn a ditch, and built a double wall round the city, which was fourscore furlongs long, he set his sons Antigonus and Aristobulus over the siege, and sent the Samaritans to that great distress by famine, that they were forced to eat what used not to be eaten, and to call for Antiochus Cyzicenus to help them, who came readily to their assistance, but was beaten by Antigonus, and when he was routed as far as Scythopolis by the two brethren, he got away. So they returned to Samaria, and shut them again within the wall, till they were forced to send for the same Antiochus a second time to help them, who procured about six thousand men from Ptolemy Lathyrus, which were sent them without his mother's consent, who had then in a manner turned him out of his government. With these Egyptians Antiochus did first overrun and take the country of Hyrcanus after the manner of a robber, for he durst not meet him in the face to fight with him, as not having an army sufficient for that purpose, but only from this successful beginning he afterwards, by his land being so vast, he should force Hyrcanus to raise the siege of Samaria; but because he fell into abuses, and lost many of his soldiers therein, he went away to Tripoli, and committed the prosecution of the war against the Jews to Callimander and Euphrates.

3. But as to Callimander, he attacked the enemy too rashly, and was put to flight and destroy- ed immediately; and as to Euphrates, he was such a lover of money, that he openly betrayed some other places to Hyrcanus; to the Jews, but was not able to make them raise the siege of Samaria. And when Hyrcanus had taken the city, which was not done till after a year's siege, he was not contented with doing that only, but he demolished it entirely, and brought vixelations to it to drown it, for he dug such hollows as might let the water run under it; nay, he took away the very marks that there had ever been. Now a very surprising thing is related of this high priest Hyrcanus, how God came to discourse with him; for they say, that on the very same day on which his sons fought with Antiochus Cyzicenus, he was alone in the temple, in a trance, and in a high state of exaltation, and heard a voice, that “his sons had just then overcome Antiochus.” And this he openly declared before all the multitude upon his coming out of the temple; and it accordingly proved true: and in this posture were the affairs of Hyrcanus.

4. Now it happened at this time, that not only those Jews who were at Jerusalem and in Judea were in a disorder, but also those who were at Alexandria, and in Egypt, and Cyprus, for Cleopatra the queen was at variance with her son Ptolemy, who was called Lathyrus, and appointed for her generals Chelcias, and Ananias, the latter of whom built a temple in the prefecture of Heliopolis, like to that of Jerusalem, as we have elsewhere related. Cleopatra instructed these men with her authority, and did nothing without their advice, as Strabo of Capadocia attests, when he saith thus, “Now the greatest part, both those that came to Cyprus with us and those that were sent afterward thither, ran in a state of insolence and impunity to the king of Syria. When he had therefore drawn a ditch, and built a double wall round the city, which was fourscore furlongs long, he set his sons Antigonus and Aristobulus over the siege, and sent the Samaritans to that great distress by famine, that they were forced to eat what used not to be eaten, and to call for Antiochus Cyzicenus to help them, who came readily to their assistance, but was beaten by Antigonus, and when he was routed as far as Scythopolis by the two brethren, he got away. So they returned to Samaria, and shut them again within the wall, till they were forced to send for the same Antiochus a second time to help them, who procured about six thousand men from Ptolemy Lathyrus, which were sent them without his mother's consent, who had then in a manner turned him out of his government. With these Egyptians Antiochus did first overrun and take the country of Hyrcanus after the manner of a robber, for he durst not meet him in the face to fight with him, as not having an army sufficient for that purpose, but only from this successful beginning he afterwards, by his land being so vast, he should force Hyrcanus to raise the siege of Samaria; but because he fell into abuses, and lost many of his soldiers therein, he went away to Tripoli, and committed the prosecution of the war against the Jews to Callimander and Euphrates to know the truth, if thou wilt be righteous in earnest, lay down the high priesthood, and content thyself with the civil government of the people.” And when he desired to know for what cause he had been taken as a captive, what punishment he had been subjected to, and what he had done for the destruction of the Jews, he was answered, “We have heard it from old men, that thy mother had been a captive under the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes.” This story was false, and Hyrcanus was provoked against him; and all the Pharisees had a very great indignation against him.

5. Now there was one Jonathan, a very great friend of Hyrcanus, but of the sect of the Sadducees, who was very ill disposed to the Pharisees, and was jealous of them. He told Hyrcanus, that “Eleazer had cast such a reproach upon him, according to the common sentiments of all the Pharisees, and that this would be made manifest, if he did not show them the contrivance of their pretended dis- plement they thought this man deserved for that he might depend upon it, that the reproach was not laid on him with their approbation, if they were for punishing him as his crime deserved.” So the Pharisees made answer, that “He deserved stripes and bonds, but that it did not seem right to punish reproaches with death.” And indeed the Pharisees, even upon other occasions, are not apt to be severe in punishments. At this time some groups of the Pharisees were angry, and thought that this man reproached him by their approbation. It was this Jonathan who chiefly irritated him, and influenced him so much, that on one occasion he made him the party of the Pharisees, and abolish the decrees they had imposed on the people, and punish those that observe the traditions, which the Pharisees were so fond of; for Josephus mentions no other difference at this time between them; neither does he say that Hyrcanus went over to the party of the Pharisees, or in any other particular than the abolishing of all the traditioinal constitutions of the Pharisees, which our Saviour condemned as well as this. This slander, that arose from a Pharisee, has been procured by their successors the Rabbis to these latter days, and is found in their Talmud, and even in his chronology, S. Pr. p. 77, in Vorstius's version, relates that Hyrcanus's mother was taken captive in Mount Modith, see ch. xii sect 5.

they had made them all run away, and slew them so long, that their weapons of iron were blunted, and their hands quite tired with the slaughter; and the report of the news of the men who were then slain. Timagenes says, they were fifty thousand. As for the rest, they were part of them taken captives, and the other part ran away to their own country.

4. After this victory, Ptolemy overran all the country; and when night came on, he abode in certain villages of Judges, which when he found full of women and children, he commanded his soldiers to strangle them and cut them in pieces, and then to carry them in basket bottoms and to devour their limbs as sacrifices. This commandment was given, that such as fled from the battle, and came to them, might suppose their enemies were cannibals, and men's flesh, and might on that account be still more terrified at them upon such a sight. And both Strabo and Nicholaus [Of Damascus] affirm, that they used these people after this manner, as we have already related, Ptolemy taking Ptolemias by force, as we have declared elsewhere.

CHAP. XIII.

How Alexander, upon the League of mutual Defence which Ptolemy had agreed with him, made an Expedition against Caleysrus, and utterly overthrew the City of Gaza; and how he saw many ten thousands of Jews that rebelled against him: also concerning Antiochus Gyrus, Seleucus, Antiochus Cyriacus, and Antiochus Pius, and others.

§ 1. WHEN Cleopatra saw that her son was grown great, and that Judas was without disturbance, and had gotten the city of Gaza under his power, she resolved no longer to overlook what he did, when he was almost at her gate; and she concluded, that now he was so much stronger than before, he would attain unto the dominion over the Egyptians; but she immediately marched against him with a fleet at sea, and an army of foot on land, and made Chelcias and Amanis the Jews, generals of her whole army, while she sent the greatest part of her riches, her grandchildren, and her testament, to the people of Cos. Cleopatra also ordered her son Alexander to sail with a great fleet to Phoenicia; and when that country had the vessels of Ptolemais; and because the people of Ptolemais had not received her, she besieged the city; but Ptolemy went out of Syria, and made haste into Egypt, supposing that she should die desolate, and to take that opportunity, and to fail of his hope. At this time Chelcias, one of Cleopatra's generals, happened to die in Callyprus, as he was in pursuit of Ptolemy.

§ 2. When Cleopatra heard of her son's attempt, and that his Egyptian expedition did not succeed, according to his expectations, she sent thither part of her army, and drove him out of that country; so when he was returned out of Egypt again, and abode during the winter at Gaza; in which time Cleopatra sent her generals, that they should in Ptolemais by siege, as well as by the sea; and when Alexander came to her, she gave her presents, and such sorts of respect as were but proper, since under the miseries he endured by Ptolemy, he had no other refuge but her. Now there were some of her friends who persuaded her to seize Alexander, and to over-run and take of such original records, they do always confirm his history.

‡ This city or island of Cos is not that remote island in the Aegynian sea, famous, for the birth of the great Hipponax; but a city in the same name, belonging to Egypt, mentioned both by Stephanus and Ptolemy, as Dr. Hudson informs us. Of which Cos, and the treasures there laid up by Cleopatra and the Jews, see Antiq. b. xiv. ch. vii. sect. 2. slavery for them; but the senators, who were in all five hundred, fled to Apollis's temple, (for this attack happened to be made as they were sitting,) whom Alexander slew; and when he had utterly overturned their city, he returned to Jerusalem, having spent a year in this manner.

4. About this very time Antiochus, who was called Grypus, died. His death was caused by Heracleon's treachery, when he had lived forty-five years. He had subdued the kingdom of Seleucus, and when Seleucus succeeded him in his kingdom, and made war with Antiochus, his father a brother, who was called Antiochus Cyzicenus, and beat him, and took him prisoner, and slew him. But Antiochus, upon his departure from Judea, who was called Pissus, came to Amandus, and put the kinsman on his own head, and made war with Seleucus, and beat him, and drove him out of all Syria. But when he fled out of Syria, he came to Mopsuestia again, and lodged money in law of the Jews, but the people of Mopsuestia had indignation at what he did, and burnt down his palace, and slew him, together with his friends. But when Antiochus, the son of Cyzicenus, was king of Syria, he came to Jerusalem, and was exceedingly fierce upon him, and was overcome, and destroyed, he and his army. After him, his brother Philip put on the diadem, and reigned over some part of Syria; but when Antiochus, his brother Demetrius, who was called Euceras, from Cautius, and made him king of Damascus. Both these brothers did Antiochus vehemently oppose, but presently died; for when he was coming to the war against the Parthians, and he was fighting courageously, he fell, while Demetrius and Philip governed Syria, as hath been elsewhere related. But they also revolted, as derived from a captive, and so unworthy of his dignity, and of sacrificing. At this he was in a rage, and slew of them about six thousand. He also built a partition wall of wood round the altar and the temple, and so made a place within which it was only lawful for the priests to enter, and by this means he obstructed the multitude from coming at him. He also maintained foreigners of Picia and Cilicia, for as to the Syrreans, he was at war with them, and so made none of them. He also overcame the Armenians, such as the Moabites and Gileadites, and made them bring tribute. Moreover, he demolished Amathus, while Theodorus durst not fight with him; so as to stand up and fight, even in the land of the Hebrews, and fell into an ambush in places that were rugged and difficult to be travelled over, he was thrown down into a deep valley by the soldiers of Theodorus, king of the Arabians, and hardly escaped with his life. From thence he fled to Jerusalem, where, besides his other ill success, the nation insulted him, and he fought against them for six years, and slew no fewer than fifty thousand of them. And when they desired that they would desist from their ill-will to him, they hated him so much the more, on account of what had already happened; and when he had asked them whether they would now come to terms, they all cried out, "that he ought to kill himself." They also sent to Demetrius Eucersus, and desired him to make a league of mutual defence with them.

CHAP. XIV.

How Demetrius Eucersus merconse Alexander, and yet in a little time retired to the City of Antioch for Fear of the Jews. As also how Alexander slew many of the Jews, and thereby got clear of his troubles. Concerning the Death of Demetrius.

1. So Demetrius came with an army, and took those that invaded him, and carried them near the city Shechem; upon which Alexander, with his six thousand two hundred mercenaries, and about twenty thousand Jews, who were of his party, went against Demetrius, who had three thousand horsemen, and forty thousand foot. Now there were great endeavors used on both sides, Demetrius trying to bring off the mercenaries that were with Alexander, because they were Greeks, and Alexander trying to bring off those that were with Demetrius, when neither of them could persuade them so to do, they came to a battle, and Demetrius was the conqueror, in which all Alexander's mercenaries were killed, when they had given demonstration of the utmost courage. A great number of Demetrius's soldiers were slain also.

2. Now as Alexander fled to the mountains, six thousand of the Jews hereupon came together, and by the exercise of pity at the change of his fortune; upon which Demetrius, who had now retired out of the country; after which the Jews fought against Alexander, and being beaters, were slain in great numbers in the several battles whereby they had; when he had shut up the most powerful of them in the city Bethosema, he besieged them therein; and when he had taken the city, and gotten the men into his power, he brought them to Jerusalem, and did one of the most barbarous acts of cruelty, of which women were guilty, by torturing with his concubines, in the sight of all the city, he ordered about eight hundred of them to be crucified, and while they were living, he ordered the throats of their children and wives to be cut off. He did this thing, only to get an easy way of revenge for the injuries they had done him: which punishment yet was of an inhuman nature, though we suppose that he had been ever so much more cruel, as indeed he had been, by his words with them; for he had by their means come to the last degree of hazard, both of his life and of his kingdom, while they were not satisfied by themselves only to fight against him, but introduced fortifications for the same purpose, say, at length they reduced him to that degree of necessity, that he was forced to deliver back to the king of Arabia the land of Moab and Gilead, which he had subdued, and the places that were in it. And they engaged in a battle against him, as they had done ten thousand other things that tended to affront and reproach him. However, this barbarity seems to have been without any necessity, on which account he bare the name of a Thracian, a Thracian to the Jews; whereas upon the soldiers that had fought against him, being about eight thousand in number, ran away by night, and continued fugitives all the time.

3. But when Demetrius was departed out of Judea, he went to Berea, and besieged his brother Philip, having with him ten thousand footmen, and a thousand horsemen. He possessed the territory of Berea, the confederate of Philip called in Zizon, the ruler of the Arabian tribes, and Mithridates Sinax, the ruler of the Parthians, who coming with a great number of forces and besieging Demetrius in his incampment, into which they had driven him with their arrows, they compelled those that were with him by thirst to deliver up themselves. So they took a great many spoils out of that country, and Demetrius himself, that they sent to Mithridates, who was then king of Parthia; but as to those whom they took captives of the people of Antioch, they restored them to the Antiochians without any ransom. Now Mithridates, the king of Parthia, had Demetrius in great honor, till Demetrius ended his life by sickness. So Philip, presently after the fight was over, came to Antioch, and took it, and reigned over Syria.

CHAP. XV.

How Antiochus, who was called Darioeus, and after him Artaxerxes, made expulsions into Judea; and as also how Alexander, that had received the Jews in his dominion, and had given them to the power into his hands, and there he reigned: but as he was making war against the Arabians, his brother Philip heard of it, and came to Damascus, where Alexander was governor of the citadel, and the Damascusenes themselves, delivered up the city to him: yet because Philip was become ungrateful to him, and had bestowed upon him nothing of that in hopes whereof he had received him into the city, but had a mind to have it believed that it was rather delivered up out of fear than by the kindness of Milestius, and because he had not rewarded him as he ought to have done, he became suspected by him, and so he was obliged to leave Damascus again; for Milestius caught him sacrificing into the Hippodrome, and shut him up in it, and kept Damascus for Antiochus [Eucersus], who, hearing how Philip's affairs stood, came out of Arabia. He mustered an army, and went out on an expedition against Judea, with eight thousand armed footmen, and eight hundred horsemen. So Alexander, out of fear of his coming, dug a deep ditch, beginning at Chabarasa, which is now called Antipatris, to the sea of Joppa, on which part only his army could be brought against him. He also raised a wall, and erected wooden towers, and intermediate redoubts, for one hundred and fifty furlongs in length, and there expected the coming of Antiochus, but he soon burnt them all, and made his army pass by that way into Arabia. The Arabian king [Artaxas] at first retreated, but afterward appeared on the suddenises, and with ten thousand and a thousand horsemen to them the meeting, and fought desperately; and indeed when he had gotten the victory, and was bringing some auxiliaries to that part of his army that was in distress, he was slain. When Antiochus was fallen, he came to Antiochus, where the greatest part of them perished by famine.

2. After him Artaxas reigned over Coles SYSIS, and of two others was the fifth son of Antiochus Grea- The son of Demetrius, and of Demetrius Eucersus.

slavery for them; but the senators, who were in all five hundred, fled to Apollo's temple, (for this attack happened to be made as they were sitting,) which was held sacred to Apollo, and where they had not dared to overthrow their city, he returned to Jerusalem, having spent a year in that siege.

4. About this very time Antiochus, who was called Grypus, and reigned twenty-nine years, being in the fourtieth year, over a great part of the kingdom, went to war against Antiochus, his father's brother, king of Syria, in the city of Seleucis, a city of Cochylisia.

5. And when Alexander had delivered the city to Grypus, he presently made an expedition against Caesarea. He also took Gadara after a siege of ten months. He also took Antiochus, a strong fortress belonging to the inhabitants above Jordan, where Theodorus, the son of Zenod, had his chief treasure, and what he esteemed most precious. This Zenod fell unexpectedly upon the Jews, and slew ten thousand of them, and seized upon Alexander's baggage: yet did not this misfortune terrify Alexander, for he made an expedition upon the maritime parts of the country, Raphia and Anthedon, (the name of the king being changed to Agrippina,) and took even then that by force: but when Alexander saw that Ptolemy was retired from Gaza to Cyprus, and his mother Cleopatra was returned to Egypt, he grew angry at the persecution, and, being in Seleucia, inquired if Ptolemy would assist them, and besieged their city, and ravaged their country. But as Apollodorus, the general of the army of Gaza, fell upon the camp of the Jews by night, with two thousand foreign, and ten thousand of his own force, while the night lasted, those of Gaza prevailed, because the enemy was made to believe that it was Ptolemy who attacked them; but when day was come on, and that mistake was corrected, and the Jews sighted the number of the assailants came back again and fell upon those of Gaza, and slew of them about a thousand; but as those of Gaza stoutly resisted them, and would not yield for either their want of any thing, nor for the great multitude that were slain, for they would rather suffer any hardship whatever than come under the power of their enemies, Aretas, king of the Arabsians, a person then very illustrious, encouraged them to give them battle, and promised them that he would come to their assistance; but it happened, that before he came, Apollodorus was slain, for his brother Lyssmachus, envying him for the great reputation he had gained among the citizens, and also mad with envy, delivered up the city to Alexander, who, when he came in at first, lay quiet, and afterward set his army upon the inhabitants of Gaza, and gave them leave to punish them; so some went one way, and some went another, and slew the inhabitants of Gaza; yet were not they of cowardly hearts, but opposed those that came to slay them, and slew as many of the Jews; and some of them when they saw themselves deserted, burnt their own houses, that the enemy might get none of their spoils; nay, some of them with their own hands slew their children and their wives, having no other way than this of avoiding

This account of the death of Antiochus Grypus is contained by Appian, Syrac. p. 196, here cited by Spanheim.

† Porphyry says, that this Antiochus Grypus reigned but twenty-nine years. Dr. Hume says, that he reigned in the river Oronteus. Appian says, that he was deprived of the kingdom of Syria by Tyranus; but Porphyry says, that the Lacedaemonian princes of the Cyrenæan sea, which is not by Spanheim. In such confusion of the latter historians, we have no reason to prefer any of them before Josephus, who had more original ones before him.

other ill success, the nation insulted him, and he fought against them for six years, and slew no fewer than fifty thousand of them. And when he desired that they would desist from their ill-will to him, they hated him so much the more, on account of what had already happened; and when he had asked them what he ought to do, they all cried out, "that he ought to kill himself." They also sent to Demetrius Eucerus, and desiderated him to make a league of mutual defence with them.

CHAP. XIV.

How Demetrius Eucerus overcome Alexander, and yet in a little time retired out of the Country for Fear of the Jews. As also how Alexander slew many of the Jews, and thereby got clear of his troubles. Concerning the Death of Demetrius.

§ 1. So Demetrius came with an army, and took those that invited him, and pitched his camp near the city Shechohn; upon which Alexander, with his six thousand two hundred mercenarys, and a great multitude of people, made his way to him. The whole of his party, went against Demetrius, who had three thousand horsemen, and forty thousand footmen. Now there were great endeavors used on both sides. Demetrius trying to bring off the mercenarys of Alexander, and Alexander, when they were Greeks, and Alexander trying to bring off the Jews that were with Demetrius. However, when neither of them could persuade them so to do, they came to a battle, and Demetrius was the conqueror. It is said, several of the enemy were killed, when they had given demonstration of their fidelity and courage. A great number of Demetrius's soldiers were slain also.

§ 2. Now as Alexander fought against the mountains, six thousand of the Jews hereupon came together [from Demetrius] to him, out of pity at the change of his fortune; upon which Demetrius was afraid, and retired out of the country; after which the Jews killed Alexander, and being beheaded, were slain in great numbers in the several battles which they had; and when he had shut up the most powerful of them in the city Bethorno, he besieged them therein; and when he had taken the city, and got about men in this power, he, broaching west of his party, went against Demetrius, who had three thousand horsemen, and forty thousand footmen. Now there were great endeavors used on both sides. Demetrius trying to bring off the mercenarys of Alexander, and Alexander, when they were Greeks, and Alexander trying to bring off the Jews that were with Demetrius. However, when neither of them could persuade them so to do, they came to a battle, and Demetrius was the conqueror. It is said, several of the enemy were killed, when they had given demonstration of their fidelity and courage. A great number of Demetrius's soldiers were slain also.

How Antiochus, who was called Dionysus, and after him Aratus, made Expeditions into Judea; as also how Alexander took many Cities, and then returned to Jerusalem, and, after a Sickness of This Year died; and what Council be gave to Alexander.

§ 1. After this, Antiochus, who was called Dionysus, and was Philip's brother, aspiring to the dominion, and came to Damascus, and got the power into his hands, and there he reigned: but as he was going against the mountains, six thousand of the Jews hereupon came together [from Demetrius] to him, out of pity at the change of his fortune; upon which Demetrius was afraid, and retired out of the country; after which the Jews killed Alexander, and being beheaded, were slain in great numbers in the several battles which they had; and when he had shut up the most powerful of them in the city Bethorno, he besieged them therein; and when he had taken the city, and got about men in this power, he, broaching west of his party, went against Demetrius, who had three thousand horsemen, and forty thousand footmen.

2. After him Aratus reigned over Colosseia; and of two others was the fifth son of Antiochus Olympos; and that he is styled on the coins, Antiochus Ephesius Dionysus.

3. This Aratus was the first king of the Arabians who took Damascus, and reigned there; and, after raising common to such Arabians kings, both at Damascus, and at Samaria, he reigned there forty years. But his son after him, after his father's death, reigned also there thirty years; and he was the third king of this name, and the third son of Antiochus Olympos, who reigned there. But his son after him, after his father's death, reigned also there thirty years; and he was the third king of this name, and the third son of Antiochus Olympos, who reigned there. being called to the government by those that held Damascus, by reason of the hatred they bare to Ptolemy Mnesus. He also made them sue to the government against Judea, and beat Alexander the Great in battle, near a place called Adida, yet did he, upon certain conditions agreed on between them, retire out of Judea.

It is said that Alexander, arched again to the city Dios, and took it; and then made an expedition against Eba, where was the best part of Zeno's treasures, and there he encompassed the place with three walls; and when he had taken the city by force of arms, he gave to Gaza the Salleneis and when he had taken these cities, he, besides them, took the valley which is the valley of Antiochus, as also the fortress of Gammula. He also accused Demetrius, who was governor of those places, of treachery, and turned him out; and after he had spent three years in this war, he returned to his own country, when the Jews joyfully received him upon this his good success.

4. Now at this time the Jews were in possession of the following cities, that had been given to the Syrians, and Idumeans, and Phcenicians; at the seaside, Strato's Tower, Apollonia, Joppa, Jamin, Ashdod, Gaza, Antiochus, Raphia, and Rhinocorura; in the middle of the country, near to Jerusalem, Ekron, and Marias; and near of Samaria, Mount Carmel, and Mount Tabor, Sceytropolis, and Gadara; of the country of Gaselniot, Seleucia, and Gabala; in the country of Tyre, and Medea, Tyre, and Oronea, Gelithon, Zara, the valley of the Celles, and Pella; which last they utterly destroyed, because its inhabitants would not bear to change their religious rites for those peculiar to the Jews also. The Jews also possessed others of the principal cities in Syria, which had been destroyed.

5. After this, king Alexander, although he fell into a diseaiser by hard drinking, and had a consumption which had possessed him for three years, yet would not leave off going out with his army, till he was quite spent with the labors he had undergone, and died in the town of Regesa, a fortress beyond Jordan. But when his queen saw that he was not long to live, she sent for his son, and desired that he would take him to her, that she might bring him up, that he might be a king, and that he would bring him up; for she observed, that she had no longer any hopes of surviving, she came to him weeping, and lamenting, and bewailing herself and her sons, on the condition that they should be brought up by her, and when she had them, she would not leave me and any children, were destitute of all other supports, and this when thou knowest how much ill-will thy nation bears them?" But he gave her the following advice, "Yet I will follow her advice, and I will suggest to her, in order to retain the kingdom securely, with her children, that she should conceal their death from the soldiers till she should have taken that place: after this, she should go into triumph, as upon a victory, to Jerusalem, and put some of her authority into the hands of the them. As, for that she would commend her to the honor she had done them, and would reconcile the nation to her: for he told her, they had great authority among the Jews, both to do hurt to such as they hated, and to bring advantage to those they loved; and that they were from their disaffection that they are so believed best of all by the multitude when they speak any severe thing against others, though it be only out of easy at them. I have advised them by their means that he had incurred the displeasure of the nation, whom indeed he had injured. Do thou, therefore, and, (said he) when thou art come to Jerusalem, send for the leading men among them, and show them your written letters, and the presence of sincerity, give them leave to use as they themselves please, whether they will dishonor the dead body by refusing it burial, as having severely suffered by my means, or whether they will honor the dead body by burying it, and giving it that which is due to that body. Promise them also, that thou wilt do nothing with them in the affairs of the kingdom. If thou dost but say this to them, I shall have the honor of a more glorious funeral than if they do not give me any other, for which I am in fear, and when it is in their power to abuse my dead body, they will do it no injury at all, and thou wilt rule in safety." So when he had given his advice, he died, and he had reigned twenty-seven years, and lived fifty years within one.

CHAP. XVI.

How Alexander, by gaining the good-will of the Parthians, retained the Kingdom nine Years and then, having done many glorious Actions, died.

1. Alexander, when she had taken the kingdom, acted as her husband had suggested to her, and, spoke to the Parthians, and put all things into their power, both as to the dead body, and as to the affairs of the kingdom, and thereby pacified their anger against Alexander, and made them hear good of him and his family, and in the commandation they gave him, they brought them to grief, and to be in heaviness for him, so that he had a funeral more splendid than had any of the kings before him. Alexander left behind him twelve good sons, and he would have sent one to the kingdom to Alexander. Now, as to these two sons, Hyrcanus was indeed unable to manage public affairs, and delighted rather in a quisling, which sect yet, thus supported, were at last in a great measure the ruin of the religion, government, and people; and he brought them into so wicked a state that the vengeance of God came upon them to their utter exclusion. Just as did Calvinus politically advise the king of Persis, to who he said, "If you will be satisfied with this state, that is, if they set Jesus above, with his miracles, all will believe on him, and the Romans would come, and take away their place;" and which is so true, that a general recollection of Jesus of Nazareth brought down the vengeance of God upon them, and occasioned them very Romans, of whom they seemed so much afraid, that to prevent it they did not use the Roman laws, and thus came and cut a way both their place and nation, within thirty-eight years afterward. I hereby wish the queen's wife's advice to them would consider what advice was so good, and what like examples, and no longer suffered all virtues and religions to their pernicious schemes of government, to the destruction of all public good. Then the Parthians, who had introduced their own traditions, ob. xvi sect. 2; and that he now saw a political necessity of taking the sword into their hands, and the traditions brought to him, of his widow and family minded to retain their monarchical government by tyranny over the Jewish, but already slain, and these in danger of it, all the by-standers broke out into tears: but Arius chiefly made manifest what were his sentiments, and used many reproachful expressions to his mother, saying, "Now indeed is the case this is, that they have been themselves the authors of their own calamities, who have permitted a woman, who, against reason, was mad with shame, in accordance with them also, to order the multitude to be obedient. She also restored again those practices which the Pharisees had introduced, according to the traditions of their forefathers, and which her father- in-law, and her son Aristobulus, and the principal truces, had indeed the name of the Regent, but the Pharisees had the authority; for it was they who restored such as had been banished, and set such as were prisoners at liberty, and, to say all at once, they differed in their principles. However, the queen also took care of the affairs of the kingdom, and got together a great body of mercenary soldiers, and increased her own army to such a degree, that she became terrible to the neighboring tyrants, and took hostages of them; and the country was entirely at peace, excepting the Pharisees; for they disturbed the queen, and desired that she should kill those who loved to disturb her: but they numbered them, after which they cast the throat of one of them, Diogenes: and after him they did the same to several, one after another, till the men that were the most potent came into the power, and restored them; these, however, did not appear openly, that if he had an opportunity, he would not permit his mother to go on so. "These put the queen in mind what great dangers they had been, and they begged of her that she should take her men alive; but if they must be done, whereas they had demonstrated the firm- ness of their fidelity to her master, insomuch, that they had received the greatest marks of favor from him; and they begged of her that she should not treat her men thus; and she consented. What happened, that when they had escaped the ha- zards that arose from their [open] enemies, they were to be cut off at home, by their [private] enemies, like brute beasts, without any help whatsoever. They said also, that if their adversaries would be satisfied with those that had been slain already, they would take what had been done patiently, on account of their natural love to their king; but if they must expect the same for the future also, they implored of her a dismissal from her service, for they could not bear to think of attempting any method for their deliverance without her, but would be driven to their flight; that is, the gate, in case she would not forgive them. And that it was a great shame both for themselves, and for the queen, that when they were neglected by her, they should come under the lash of her husband's enemies; for let things be the Arabian king, and the monachs, would give any reward, if they could get such men as foreign auxiliaries, to whom their very names, before their death, they had been given to; and the poet, but if they could not obtain this their second re- quest, and if she had determined to prefer the Pharisees before them, they still insisted that she would place them every one in her fortresses; for what they hated the most, namely, to be against Alexander's house, they would be willing to bear their part, and to live in a private station there."

3. As these men said thus, and called upon Alexander's ghost for confirmation of those

The Balance, whether the wife and children of Aristobulus were now met, and which overlooked the temple, could be no other than what Syrius, Antig., ir. met. 3 and 6, and Realled the Great revolt, and called The Power of Antonius, Antig., b. xv capp. xii. met. 3 which supposes them but 40,000.
of Aristobulus from all parts, insomuch that he had a kind of royal attendance about him; for in little more than forty-two strong places, which gave him the opportunity of raising an army from Libanus and Trachonitis, and the monarchs: for men are easily led by the greater number, and easily submit to them. And besides this, that by affording him his assistance when he could not expect it, they, as well as he, should have the advantages that would come by his being king, because they had been the occasion of his gaining the kingdom. Now the elders of the Jews, and Hyrcanus with them, went into the queen, and desired, "that she would give them her sentiments about the present posture of affairs, for that Aristobulus was in effect lord of almost all the kingdom, by possessing of so many places, and that was afraid for them to take any counsel by themselves, how ever she were, whilst she was alive, and that the danger would be upon them in no long time." But she "bade them do what they thought proper to be done: that they had many circumstances in their favor still remaining: a nation in great heart, an army, and money in their several treasuries, for that she had small concern for public things, so long as the strength of her brother already failed her."

6. Now a little while after she had said this to them, she died, when she had reigned nine years, and had in all reigned seventy-three. A woman she was who showed no signs of the weakness or frailty of her sex, for she was intelligible to the same degree in her ambition of governing, and demonstrated by her doings at once, that her mind was fit for action, and that sometimes men themselves show the little understanding they have by the frequent mistakes they make in point of government; for she always preferred the present to futurity, and preferred the power of an imperious dominion above all things, and in comparison of that had no regard to what was good, or what was right. However, she left the seat of her house to such an unfortunate condition, that she was the occasion of the taking away that authority from it, and that in no long time after, which she obtained by a vast number of her misfortunes, and this out of a desire of what does not belong to a woman, and all by a compliance in her sentiments with those that bare ill-will to their family, and by leaving the administration desirous of a proper support of great men: and indeed her management during her administration, while she was alive, was such, as filled the palace after her death with calamities and disturbance. However, all these things were not to happen, she preserved the nation in peace. And this is the conclusion of the affairs of Alexander.

BOOK XIV.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF THIRTY-TWO YEARS—FROM THE DEATH OF QUEEN ALEXANDRA TO THE DEATH OF ANTIGONUS.

CHAP. I.
The War between Aristobulus and Hyrcanus about the Kingdom; and how they made an Agreement that Aristobulus should be King, and Hyrcanus His private Life: as also, how Hyrcanus, a little afterward, was persuaded by Antipater to fly to Aretas.

1. We have related the affairs of queen Alexandra, and her death, in the foregoing book, and will now speak of what followed, and was connected with those histories. Denying, before we proceed, that we have nothing so much at heart as this, that we may omit no facts, either through ignorance or laziness, for we are upon the history and explication of such things as the greatest part are unacquainted withal, because of their distance from our times: and we aim to do it with a proper beauty of style, so far as that is derived from proper words harmoniously disposed, and from such ornaments of speech also as may contribute to the pleasure of our readers, that we may entertain the knowledge of what we write with some agreeable satisfaction and pleasure. But the principal scope of authors, sought to aim at above all the rest, is to speak accurately with truth historians; because, before we proceed, that those that are otherwise unacquainted with such transactions, and obliged to believe what these writers inform them of.

2. Hyrcanus then began his high priesthood on the third year of the hundred and seventy-seventh Olympiad, when Quintus Hortensius and Quintus Metellus, who was called Metellus of Aretae, were consuls at Rome; when presently Alexander's was the last, he continued there, as it came to a battle with Hyrcanus at Jericho, many of the soldiers deserted him, and went over to his brother; upon which Hyrcanus fled into the citadel, where Aristobulus's wife and children were placed by their guard, as we have said already, and attacked and overcame those his adversaries that had fled thither, and lay within the walls of the temple. So when he had sent a message to his brother about agreeing the matters between them, he laid aside his enmity to him on these conditions, that Aristobulus should be king; that he should live without intermediate with public affairs, and quietily enjoy the estate he had acquired. When he had agreed upon these terms in the temple, and had confirmed the agreement with oaths, and the giving one another their right hands, and embracing one another in the sight of the whole multitude, they departed; the one, Aristobulus, to the palace; and Hyrcanus, as a private man, to the former house of Aristobulus.

3. But there was a certain friend of Hyrcanus, an idumesian, called Antipater, who was very rich, and in his nature an active and sedulous man; who was at enmity with Aristobulus, and hadaddock thoughts with him upon account of his good-will to Hyrcanus. It is true that Nicolaus of Damascus says, that Antipater was of the stock of the Jews who came out of Babylon into Judea; but that assertion of his was to gratify Herod, who was his son, and who, by certain revolutions of fortune, came afterward to be king of the Jews, whose history we shall give you in its proper place hereafter. However, this Antipater was at first called Antipas, and that was his father's name also; of whom they relate this, that king Alexander and his wife made him a son and made him a league of friendship with those Arabians, and Gazites, and Aesdonians, that were of his own party, and had

† That the famous Antipater's or Antipas's father was also Antipater or Antipas, which two may justly be esteemed one and the same name, the former with a Greek or Gentile, the latter with a Hebrew or Jewish termination, Josephan here assures us, though Eusebius indeed says it was Herod.
by many and large presents, made them his fast friends. But now, this younger Antipater was suspicious of the power of Aristobulus, and was afraid of some mischief the might do him, because of his hatred to him, so he stirred up the most powerful of the Jews, and talked against him to them privately; and, said that "It was unjust to him, to make war and intense heat, and to burn the houses, and to make the city wet, and to send them rain. This man had hid himself, because he saw that this sedition would last a great while. However, they brought him to the Jewish camp, and desired, that as by his prayers he had once put an end to the storm, so he would in like manner make imprecations on Aristobulus, and those of his faction. And when upon his refusal, and the excuses that he made he was still by the multitude compelled to speak, he stood up and the Jews left the God, the King of the whole world! since those that stand now with me are they, and those that are besieged are also they priests, I beseech thee, that thou wilt neither hearken to the prayers of those besieged nor hate those who offer the prayers of those who besiege them." Whereupon such wicked Jews as stood about him, as soon as he had made this prayer, stoned him to death.

2. But God punished the Jews immediately for this their barbarity, and took vengeance of them for the murder of Onias, in the manner following: while the priest and Aristobulus were besieged, it happened that the feast called the Passover was at hand, which it was the custom of the Jews to offer a great number of sacrifices to God; but those that were with Aristobulus wanted sacrifices, and desired that their countrymen without would furnish them with such sacrifices, and as many of them to come in the manner of a supplicant to him, he would not deliver him up to his enemies. So Antipater having received such assurances, returned to Hyrcanus to Jerusalem. With this he entered the city, and went to the house of Aristobulus, and cried out, "In the name of God, let me in; for I am sent by the king to Aristobulus, and he said that it was for his advantage to fly away to Aretas. Now Arabia is a country that borders upon Judea. However, Hyrcanus sent Antipater first to the king of Arabia, in order to receive assurances from him; and those who were the more come in the manner of a supplicant to him, he would not deliver him up to his enemies. So Antipater having received such assurances, returned to Hyrcanus to Jerusalem. While after he was there, he was sent to Aretas, and was received with great respect, and went a great journey, and came and brought him to the city called Petra, where the palace of Aretas was; and as he was a very familiar friend of that king, he persuaded him to let him go to Hyrcanus to Judea, and his persuasion he continued every day without any intermission. He also proposed to make him presents on that account. At length he prevailed with Aretas in his suit. Moreover, Hyrcanus sent Antipater, that when he had been brought thither, and had received his kingdom, he would restore that country, and those twelve cities which his father Alexander had taken from the Arabians, which were these, Medaba, Naballo, Libias, Tharamus, Athone, Zoor, Orene, Marias, Rudda, Lussa, and Oruba.

CHAPTER II.

How Aretas and Hyrcanus made an Expedition against Aristobulus, and besieged Jerusalem; and how Scouras, the Roman General, raised the Siege. Concerning the Death of Onias.

§ 1. After these promises had been given to Aretas, Hyrcanus went to Jerusalem with an army of fifty thousand horse and foot, and best him in the battle. And when after that victory, many went over to Hyrcanus as deserters, Aristobulus was left desolate, and fled to Jerusalem; upon which the king of Aretas took all his army and made an assault upon the temple, and besieged Aristobulus therein, the people still supporting Hyrcanus, and assisting him in the siege, while none but the priests continued with Aristobulus. So Aretas joined the forces of the Arabians and of the Jews together, and pressed on the siege vigorously. As this hap-Hycanus, and fought them at a place called Papparon, and beat them in the battle, and slew about six thousand of the enemy; with whom fell Phalion also, the brother of Antipater.

CHAP. III.

_How Aristobulus and Hyrcanus came to Pompey in order to argue who ought to have the kingdom: and how, upon the Flight of Aristobulus, to the Fortress Alexandrium, Pompey led his Army against him, and ordered him to deliver up the Fortress whereof he was possessed._

1. A LITTLE afterward Pompey came to Damascus, and marched over Calosarya, at which time there came ambassadors to him from all Syria, and Egypt, and out of Judea also; for to Aristobulus had sent him a great present, which was a golden vine,* of the value of five hundred talents. Now Strabo of Capadocia mentions this present in these words: "There came also an embassy out of Egypt, and a crown of the value of four thousand pieces of gold, and out of Judea there came another, whether you call it a vine or a garden; they called the thing TEMPOLE. However, we ourselves saw that present reposited at Rome in the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, with this inscription, _The gift of Alexander the king of the Jews._ It was valued at five hundred talents, and the report is, that Alexander the Great made the gift of this tera to the god, and that it was reserved for the perpetual use of the priests, so that it was not to be sold or given to any one for any price, but that it was to remain in the Temple at all times, and that it might be seen as a perpetual testimony of what the king had done for the god and his temple."

2. In a little time afterward came ambassadors again to him, Antipater from Hycanus, and Nicodemus from Aristobulus; which last also accused such as had taken bribes, first Gabinius, and then Scipio, and one thousand talents, and the other four hundred; by which procedure he made these two his enemies, besides those he had before. And when Pompey had ordered those that had contumaciously opposed him to be taken and slain, the beginning of the spring, he brought his army out of their winter quarters, and marched into the country of Damascus; and as he went along he demolished the citadel that was at Apamia, which Antiochus Cyzicus had built, and took cognizance of the country of Ptolemy Menneus, a wicked man, and not less than Dionysius of Tripoli, who had been3 distinguished, who was also his relation by marriage; yet did he not find the punishment of his crimes for the thousand talents, with which money Pompey paid the soldiers their wages. He also conquered the place called Lyais, of which Silas, a Jew, was tyrant. And when he had passed over the city of Palmyra and Chalcis, he got over the mountain which is on the limit of Calosarya, he came from Pella to Damascus; and there it was that he heard the causes of the Jews, and of their governors Hycanus and Aristobulus, who were at difference one with another, as also of the nation against them both, which did not desire to be under kingling government, because the form of government they received from their forefathers was that of submission to the priests of that God whom they worshipped, and not the government of a prince. There is another passage which explains, that though these two were the posterity of priests, yet did they seek to change the government of their nation to another form, in order to enslavethem. However, he justified them, and said, that although he were the elder brother, he was deprived of the prerogative of his birth by Aristobulus, and that he had but a small part of the country under him. Aristobulus having taken away the rest, he ran to Pompey also, and accused him that the vine which had been made into their neighbors' countries, and the pyramids that had been at sea, were owing to him; and that the nation would not have revolted, if a prince had been averse from violence and disorder; and there were no fewer than a thousand Jews, of the best esteem among them, who confirmed this accusation: which confirmation was procured by Antipater. But Aristobulus, in return, and of his own accord, ordered his troops, in his emperor's own temper, which was inactive, and to account contemptible, which caused him to be deprived of the government; and that for himself he was necessitated to take it upon himself, for fear lest it should be transferred to others; and that he had as to his title of king, it was no other than what his father had taken before him. He also called for witnesses of what he said, some persons who were both young and insolent, whose heads were so hard, some heads of hair, and other ornaments, were detached [by the court, and which they appeared in, not as though they were to plead their cause in a court of justice, but as if they were to detain Pompey:]

3. When Pompey had heard the causes of these two, and had condemned Aristobulus for his violent procedure, he then spake civilly to them, and sent them away; and told them, that they should appoint a judge to settle all their affairs, after he had first taken a view of the affairs of the Nabataeans. In the mean time, he ordered them to be quiet; and treated Aristobulus civilly, lest he should make the assembly of the Romans angry. But when Aristobulus did; for without expecting any further determination, which Pompey had promised them, he went to the city of Deius, and thence marched into Judea. And when Pompey was angry; and taking with him that army which he was leading against the Nabataeans, and the auxiliaries that came from Damascus, and the other parts of Syria, with the other Roman legions which he had with him, he made an expedition against Aristobulus; but as he passed by Pella and Scythopolis, he came to Carea, which is the first entrance into Judea when one passes over the sand hills, and which was a most beautiful fortress that was built on the top of a mountain, called Alexandrium, whither Aristobulus had fled, and thence Pompey sent his commands to him, that he should come to him. According ly he sent his envoys, and did not make war with the Romans, he came down; and when he had disputed with his brother about the right to the government, he went up again to the citadel, as Pompey gave him leave to do; and this he did two or three times, as fatterer himself with the hopes of having the kingdom granted him; so that still pretended he would obey Pompey in whatsoever he commanded, although at the same time, he retired to his fortresses, and did not choose himself too keen, and that he might be prepared for a war, in case it should prove, as he feared, that Pompey should transfer the government to Hycanus. But when Pompey had given orders to his general, that the Alexandrian fortress he held, and to send an injunction to his governors under his own hand, for that purpose, for they had been forbidden to deliver them places, which last seems to me the most probable; for as to Archibius Usher's conjectures, that Alexander made it, and dedicated it to God in the temple, and that thence Aristobulus took it, and sent it to Pompey, they seem to me to be without foundation. Some Jewish sephiroth, who would hardly have avoided the recording both these uncommon points of history, had he known and comprehended it, either the Jewish nation, or even Pompey himself, than have replenished such a fragment instance of marriage.
BOOK XIV—CHAP. IV.

How Pompey, when the Citizens of Jerusalem shut the Gates against him, besieged the City, and took it by Force: as also what other Things he did in Judea.

1. Now when Pompey had pitched his camp at Jericho, (where the palm-trees grow,) and the temple which is an ornament of the most precious, which, upon any incision made in the wood with a sharp stone, distills out thence like a juice,) he marched in the morning to Jerusalem. Hereupon Aristobulus reported on what he was to say and do, because he was already promised to give him money, and received him into Jerusalem, and desired that he would leave off the war, and do what he pleased peaceably. So Pompey sent his captain, and sent Gabinius, and soldiers with him, to receive the money and the city; yet was no part of this performed, but Gabinius came back, being both excluded out of the city, and receiving none of the money, and the soldiers were not permitted to the agreements to be executed. At this Pompey was very angry, and put Aristobulus into prison, and came himself to the city, which was strong on every side, excepting the south, where the top was not so high, and if there was a broad and deep ditch that encompassed the city, and included within the temple, which was itself encompassed about with a very strong stone wall.

2. There was a sedition of the men that were within the city, who did not agree what was to be done in their present circumstances, while some thought it best to deliver up the city to Pompey; but Aristobulus's party exhorted the people, and the others, not to give up the city, but there was a broad and deep ditch that encompassed the city, and included within the temple, which was itself encompassed about with a very strong stone wall.

3. Pompey took the city by a sedition of the men that were within the city, who did not agree what was to be done in their present circumstances, while some thought it best to deliver up the city to Pompey; but Aristobulus's party exhorted the people, and the others, not to give up the city, but there was a broad and deep ditch that encompassed the city, and included within the temple, which was itself encompassed about with a very strong stone wall.

4. But when the battering engine was brought near, the greatest of the towers was shaken by Josephus to be immense, which exactly agrees to Strabo's description, and which numbers in Strabo are a strong confirmation of the truth of Josephus's description also.

* These express testimonies of Josephus here, and Antiq. b. viii. ch. vi. sect. 6, and b. xv. ch. iv. sect. 2, that the only palma gardens, and the best palm-trees, stood at Jericho. Engracia about the north part of the Dead Sea (whereabout also Alexander the Great saw the basin drop,) show the mistake of those that understand Engracia and Jerome, who were at Jericho, and that those places were not distant from Jericho, as westward sent the people to the temple; and all those which were more distant, and without it. And in the first place, he offered terms of accommodation to those within, but when they would not comply with what he desired, he encompassed all the places thereabout with a wall, wherein Herod was glad to assist him on all occasions, but Pompey pitched his camp within the wall, on the north part of the temple, where it was most practicable; and the best and the best palma gardens, as well as the wall, and a ditch had been dug, and a deep valley begirt it round about, for on the parts towards the city were precipices, and the bridge on which Pompey's army was stationed; however, a bank was raised day by day, with great deal of labor, while the Romans cut down materials for it from the places round about; and when this bank was sufficiently raised, and the ditch filled up through benefit of its immense depth, he brought his mechanical engines and battering rams from Tyre, and placing them on the bank, he battered the temple with the stones that were thrown against it. And had it not been our practice, from the days of our forefathers, to rest on the seventh day, this bank could never have been perfected, by reason of the opposition the Jews would have made; for though our laws give us leave then to defend ourselves against those that besiege us, and assault us, yet it does not permit us to meddle with our enemies while they do any thing else.

5. This thing when the Romans understood, on those days which we call Sabbaths, they threw nothing at the Jews, nor came to any pitched battle with them, but raised up their earthen banks, and brought their engines into the temple, and then that they might do it the following days. And any one may hence learn how very great piety we exercise towards God, and the observance of his laws, since the priests were not at all hindered from their sacred duties, nor were the ministers, but they continued all the day, and in the night, and still did not twice a day, in the morning, and about the ninth hour, offer their sacrifices on the altar; nor did they omit those sacrifices, if any melancholy accident happened by the stones that were thrown against them, or by fire, but whatever was taken on the third month, on the day of the fast, upon the hundred and seventy-ninth Olympiad, when Caius Antonius and Marcus Tullius Cicero were consul, and the enemy then fell upon them, and cut them to pieces; and thenceforward the Jews would not comply with Pompey, as thinking it better to suffer whatever came upon them, at their very altars, than to omit any thing that they had required of them. And that this is not a mere brag, or an encomium to the honor of our temple, but the real truth, I appeal to those that have written the acts of Pompey; and among them, to Strabo and Nicolaus [of Damascus]; and besides these, to Titus Livius, the writer of the Roman history, who will bear witness to this thing.

6. But when the battering engine was brought near, the greatest of the towers was shaken by Josephus to be immense, which exactly agrees to Strabo's description, and which numbers in Strabo are a strong confirmation of the truth of Josephus's description also.
ANTIQUITIES OF THE JEWS.

it, and fell down, and brake down a part of the fortifications; so the enemy poured in space, and Cornelius Faustus, the son of Sylla, with his soldiers, first of all ascended the wall, and next to him Furius the centurion, with those that followed on the other part, while Fabius, who was also a centurion, ascended it in the middle, with a guard behind him, and now all men fell into slaughter; some of the Jews being slain by the Romans, and some by one another; nay, some there were who threw themselves down the precipices, or put fire to their houses, and burnt them that were not able to meet; and there was under. Of the Jews there fell twelve thousand, but of the Romans very few. Abaelon, who was at once both uncle and father-in-law to Aristobulus, was taken captive. And no small quantities of money, and other things of the value of all this, on account of his regard to religion; and in this point also he acted in a manner that was worthy of his virtue. The next day he gave orders that the charge of the temple should be cleansed, and to bring what offerings was the law required to God; and restored the high priesthood to Hyrcanus, both because he had been useful to him in other respects, and because he himself had been in the cause of giving Aristobulus any assistance in his war against him. He also cut off those that had been the authors of that war; and bestowed proper rewards on Faustus, and those others that mounted the bridge, and made a breach in it with the help of Pella, and Dios, and Samaria, as also Marius, and Ashdod, and Jamnia, and Athresha, to their own inhabitants: these were in the inland parts; besides that which had been demolished; and also of the main city, Gaza, and Joppa, and Doræ, and Strato's Tower; which last Herod rebuilt after a glorious manner, and adorned with havens, and temples, and changed its name to Cesarea. All these Pompey left in a state of freedom, and joined them to the province of Syria.

5. Now the occasion of this misery which came upon Jerusalem, were Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, by raising a sedition one against the other; for now the Romans were not so much bent on the Romans, and were deprived of that country which we had gained by our arms from the Syrians. Moreover, the Romans exacted of us, in a little time, above ten thousand talents. And the royal authority fell into the hands of Herod, and the dignity was bestowed on those that were high priests, by the right of their family, became the property of private men. But of these matters we shall treat in their proper places. Now Pompey committed Celsus,asar as far as the river Euphrates and Egypt, to Scævus, with two Roman legions, and then went away to Cilicia, and made haste to Rome. He also carried bound along with him: Aristobulus and his children; for he had two daughters, and as many sons, the one of whom run away, but the younger, Antigonus was carried to Rome, together with his sisters.

CHAP. V.

How Scævus made a League of mutual Assistance with Aretas. And what Gabinius did in Judæa, after he had conquered Alexander the Son of Aristobulus.

1. Scævus made now an expedition against Petrea, in Arabia, and set on fire all places round about it, because of the great difficulty of access to it. And as his army was pinched by famine, Antipater furnished him with corn out of Judæa, and gave him a large sum of money at the command of Hyrcanus. And when he was sent to Aretas, as an ambassador by Scævus, because he had lived with him formerly, he persuaded Aretas to give Scævus a sum of money, to persuade him to his own advantage; and undertook to be his surety for three hundred talents. So Scævus, upon these terms, ceased to make war any longer, which was done much as Scævus's desire, as at the desire of Aretas.

2. So Scævus returned from Arabia, after he had discharged the duties of his mission. As soon as the son of Aristobulus, made an incursion into Judea, Gabinius came from Rome to Syria, as commander of the Roman forces. He did many consider, who was to be sent to Judæa, and for better to consult Alexander, since Hyrcanus was not yet able to oppose his power, but was already attempting to build the walls of Jerusalem, which Pompey had overthrown, although the Romans, who were there, restrained him from giving him leave. Moreover, Alexander went over all the country round about, and armed many of the Jews, and suddenly got together ten thousand armed footmen, and fifteen hundred horsemen, and fortified Alexandria; a fortress there near to Cœnas and Mese, and near the mountains of Arabia. Gabinius therefore came upon him, having sent Marcus Antonius, with other commanders, before. These armed such Romans as followed them, and, together with them, such Jews as were subject to them, whose leaders were Pitholus and Mailichus, and they took with them also their friends that were with Antipater, and met Alexander, while Gabinius himself followed with his legion. However, Alexander, with the consent of his friends, fell upon one another, and it came to a pitched battle, in which the Romans slew of their enemies about three thousand, and took a like number alive.

3. At which time Gabinius came to Alexandria, and invited those that were in it to deliver up its on certain conditions, and promised that then their former offences should be forgiven but a great number of the enemy had pitched their camp before the fortress, whom the Romans attacked, Marcus Antonius fought bravely, and slew a great number, and seemed to come off with the greatest honor. So Gabinius left the army there, and sent the rest of the soldiers, and he himself went into other parts of Judæa, and gave order to rebuild all the cities that he met with that had been demolished; at which time were rebuilt Samaria, Ashdod, Scythopolis, Antipatris, Raphia, and many of the cities also in Gaza, and not a few others besides. And the men acted according to Gabinius's command, it came to pass, that at this time these cities were securely inhabited, which had been desolate for a long time.

4. When Gabinius had done thus in the country, he returned to Alexandria; and when he urged

† Of this destruction of Gabinius there is no mention in Josephus. And it is not certain what Pompey did concerning Scævus, whose name is not mentioned in Ciceró. Accordingly, in this place, it is not easy to determine whether Pompey is, or is not, the person intended. on the siege of the place, Alexander sent an assemble him, desiring that he would pardon a former offences; he also delivered up the forttresses, Hyrcania, and Macheras; and at last Alexandrium itself, which fortress Gabinius de-molested. But when Alexander's mother was of the sight of the Romans, as having her husband and other children at Rome, came to him, he granted her whatsoever she asked; and when he had settled matters with her, he brought Hyrcania to Jerusalem, and committed the care of the child to her. With this Alexander had ordained five counsellors; he distributed the same nation into the same number of parts: so these coun-sells governed the people; the first was at Jeerusalem, the second Gabinius, the third Amatus, the fourth at Jericho, and the fifth at Sepphoris in Galilee. So the Jews were now freed from monarchic authority, and were governed by an aristocracy. *(x)

CHAP. VI.

How Gabinius caught Aristobulus after he had left Rome, and sent him back to Rome again; and how the same Gabinius, as he returned out of Egypt, overcame Alexander and the Nabataeans in battle.

1. Now Aristobulus ran away from Rome to Jerusalem, when he saw the rebellion at Alexandrium, which had been newly demolished: hereupon Gabinius sent soldiers against him, and for their commanders Sesemna, and Antonius, and Servilius, in order to hinder him from getting protection from the country; and in the mean time, although a great number of those that came to him were unarmed; and when Aristobulus had resolved to go to Macheras, he dismissed those people, because they were unarmed, for they could not be useful to him, in what actions they were going about, but he took with him eight thousand that were armed, and marched on: and as the Romans fell upon them severely, the Jews ought valiantly, but were beaten in the battle; and the fact was that they had fought with alacrity, but were overborne by the enemy, they were put to fight; of whom were slain about five thousand, and the rest being dispersed, tried, as well as they could, to escape in the wood. But Gabinius Aristobulus had with him still above a thousand;
and with them he fled to Macheras, and fortified the place, and though he had bad ill success, he still had good hopes of his affairs: but when he had struggled against the siege for two days' time, and had received many wounds, he was brought as a captive to Gabinius, with his son Antigonus, who also fled with him from Rome.
And this was the fortune of Aristobulus, who was sent back again to Rome, and was there retained in bonds, having been both king and high priest for three years and six months: and was indeed an eminent person and one of a great soeur. However, the senate let his children go, together with Gabinius, with Gabinius, that he had remissed their mother so much when she delivered up the fortresses to him; and accordingly they then returned into Judæa.

2. But when Gabinius was making an expedition against the Nabataeans, and had already passed over Ephraim, he changed his mind, and resolved to return into Egypt, in order to restore Ptolemy to his kingdom. * This hath also been related elsewhere. However, Antipater supplied his army, which he sent against Archelaus, with corn, and weapons, and money. He also made those Jews who were above Ptolemais, his friends and confederates, and had been the guardians of the passes that led into Egypt.

But when he came back out of Egypt, he found Syria in disorder, with seditions and troubles; for Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, having seized on the government a second time by force, made many of the Jews revolt to him, and had his brother, who was in the army, and slew all the Romans he could light upon, and proceeded to besiege the mountain called Gerizim, whither they had retreated.

3. But when Antipater had sent for a state, he sent Antipater, who was a prudent man, to those that were seditious, to try whether he could cure them of their madness, and persuade them, to return to a better mind, and when he came to them, he brought many of them to a sound mind, and induced them to do what they ought to do; but he could not restrain Alexander, for he had an army of thirty thousand Jews, and met Gabinius, and joining battle with him, was beaten, and lost ten thousand of his men about mount Tabor.

4. So Gabinius settled the affairs which belonged to the city Jerusalem, as was agreeable to Antipater's inclination, and went against the Nabataeans, and overcame them; and he also went in a friendly manner Mithridates and Orsanes, who were Parthian deserters, and came to him, though the report went abroad that they had taken him again. And when Gabinius had performed great and glorious actions, in his management of the affairs of war, he returned to Rome, and delivered the government to Cassius. Now, Nicolaus of Damascus, Strabon, and Pliny, and Strabo, all besides, advocated the opinion of Pompey and Gabinius against the Jews, while neither of them say anything new which is not in the other.

CHAP. VII.

How Cassius came into Judæa, and pillaged the Temple; and marched against the Parthians, and perished with his Army. Also how Cassius obtained Syria, and put a stop to the Parthians, and then went up to Judæa.

1. Now Cassius, as he was going upon his extpedition against the Parthians, came into Judæa, and carried his army up to the temple, which Pompey had left, being two thousand talents; and was disposed to spoil it of all the gold belonging to it, which was eight thousand talents. He also took a beam which was made of solid beaten gold, of the weight of three hundred mine; each of which weighed two pounds and a half. It was the priest who was guardian of the sacred treasures, and whose name was Eleazar, that gave him this beam; not out of a want of desire for gold, but as a righteous man; but being intrusted with the custody of the veil belonging to the temple, which were of admirable beauty, and of very costly workmanship, and hung down from this beam, when he saw that Cassius was busy in gathering money, and was in fear for the entire norms of the temple, he gave him this beam of gold, as a ransom for the whole; but this did not fail him, and he neither removed nothing else out of the temple, but was satisfied with this only which he should give him, being worth many ten thousand [shekels.] Now, this beam was contained in a wooden beam

*(x) Dean Prideaux well observes, that "notwithstanding the slander against Gabinius at Rome, Josephus gives him a laudable character. If he had acquitted himself with honor in the charge committed to him"

*This history is best illustrated by Dr. Hudson out of Livy, who says, "That 4. Gabinius the proconsul restored Ptolemy to his kingdom of Egypt, and ejected Archelaus, whom they had set up for king." &c. See Prid. at the years 64 and 63.
that was hollow; but was known to no others, but Elesazar alone knew it; yet did Crassus take away this beam, upon the condition of touching none other else that belonged to the temple, and then brake his oath, and carried away all the gold that was in the temple.

2. Let no one wonder that there was so much wealth in our temple, since all the Jews throughout the world, and those who worshipped God, say, even those of Asia and Europe, sent their contributions to it, and this from very ancient times. Nor is the largeness of these sums without its attractiveness; nor is that greatness owing to its being holy, as making it great; but there are many witnesses to it, and particularly Strabo of Cappadocia, who says thus: "Mithridates sent to Cos, and took the money which queen Cleopatra had deposited there; in addition, he sent the people of Phrygia, Phœrias; and a daughter named Selome. This Antipater cultivated also a friendship and mutual kindness with other potentates, but especially with the king of Arabia, to whom he committed his children, while he fought against Aristobulus. So Cassius removed his camp, and marched to Euphrates, to meet those that were coming to attack him, as hath been related by others.

4. But some time afterward, Cœsar, who had been defeated near Antioch and the senate were fled beyond the Ionia sea, freed Aristobulus from his bonds, and resolved to send him into Syria, and delivered two legions to him, that he might set matters right, as being a peaceable man and beloved by his subjects. Cassius had no desire of what he hoped for from the power that was given him by Cœsar, for those of Pompey's party prevented it, and destroyed him by poison, and those of Cæsar's party buried him. His dead body also lay, for a good while, embalmed in honey, till Antony afterward sent it to Judea, and caused him to be buried in the royal sepulchre. But Scipio, upon Pompey's sending a request to him to take Cæsar's body, said, because the young man was accused of what offenses he had been guilty of at first against the Romans, cut off his head; and thus did he die at Antioch. But Ptolemy, the son of Menæas, the brother of Cistaenus, hearing of this, and knowing Cæsar taken, took his brethren to him, and sent his son Philippon to Askelion to Aristobulus's wife, and desired her to send back with her his son Antigonus, and her daughters; the one of which, who was the wife of Demetrius, did all she could to do the behest of her father, Ptolemy, slew him, and married Alexander, and continued to take care of his brethren.

CHAP. VIII.
The Jews became confederates with Cæsar when he fought against Egypt. The glorious Actions of Antipater, and his Friendship with Cæsar. The Honors which the Jews received from the Romans and Athenians.

§ 1. Now after Pompey was dead, and after that victory Cæsar had gained over him, Antipater persuaded Cæsar to make him a very useful to Cæsar when he made war against Egypt, and that by the order of Hyrcanus: for when Mithridates of Pergamus was bringing his auxiliaries, and was not able to continue his march, he fell into the hands of Hyrcanus, who was put to death by him. Cæsar, and Aristobulus was captured. Antipater came to him, conducting three thousand of the Jews, armed men: he had also taken care the principal men of the Arabians should come to his assistance; and on his arrival there, he made a treaty with Antipater, and a certain number of the Jews to march with him. Hyrcanus was now in Phœnicia; and when the inhabit-

3. So when Crassus had settled all things as he used, he marched into Parthia, and all the cities where both he himself and all his army perished, as hath been related elsewhere. But Cassius, as he fled from Rome to Syria, took possession of it, and was an impediment to the Parthians, who now these Jews began to overrun the Parthians, made incursions upon it; and as he came back to Tyre, he went up into Judea also, and fell upon Taricheæ, and presently took it, and carried about thirty thousand Jews captives; and they Ptolemais, who succeeded Aristobulus in his military services, and that by the persuasion of Antipater, who proved to have great interest in him, and was at that time in great repute with the Idumeans also; out of which nation he mar-

was the high priest, whereas he exhorted them to cultivate friendship with Caesar, and to supply his army with money, and all sorts of provisions which they wanted; and accordingly, when he saw Antipater and the high priest of the same sentiments, they did, as they were desired. And when the Jews about Memphis heard that these Jews were come over to Caesar, they also invited Mithridates to come to them; so he came, and what Antipater and the high priest advised he should choose, leaving the determination to himself; so he made him procurator of Judea. He also gave Hyrcanus leave to raise up the walls of his own city, upon his asking that favor of him, for they had been destroyed by fire. And this grant he sent to the consuls of Rome, to be engraven in the capitol. The decree of the senate was this that follows: "Lucius Valerius, the son of Lucius, the pretor, referred this to the senate, upon the state of December, in the temple of Concord. There were present at the writing of this decree Lucius Coponius, the son of Lucius, of the Colline tribe, and Papirius, of the Quirine tribe, concerning the affairs which had happened, and also those of Alexander, the son of Antiochus, and Alexander, the son of Dositheus, ambassadors of the Jews, good and worthy men, proposed, who came to renew that league of good-will and friendship with the Romans which was before being broken: and, having brought a shield of gold, as a mark of confederacy, valued at fifty thousand pieces of gold; and desired that letters might be given them, directing them both to the citizens of Rome, and to their country and their havens might be at peace, and that no one among them might receive any injury. It, therefore, pleased [the senate] to make a league of friendship and good will with them, and that time and ever they stood in need of, and to accept of the shield which was brought by them. This was done in the ninth year of Hyrcanus, the high priest and ethnarch, in the month Panemus."

Hyrcanus also desired that Athenaios, a citizen of Athens, as having been useful to them on many occasions. And when they wrote to him, they sent him this decree, as it here follows: "Under the Prutaneia and priesthood of Dionysius, the son of Euphranor, the son of the latter part of the month Panemus, this decree of the Athenians was given to their commandants, when Agathocles was archon, and Eucles, the son of Menander, of Alcamia, was the scribe. In the month Mysicus, the fourth day of the Prutaneia, a council of the presidents was held in the theatre. Dorotheus, the high priest, and the fellow presidents with him, put it to the vote of the people. Dionysius, the son of Dionysius, gave to the people. Since Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander, the high priest and ethnarch of the Jews, continues to bear good-will to our people in general, and to every one of our citizens in particular, and treats them with all sorts of kindness; and when any of the Athenians come to him, either as ambassadors, or on any occasion of their own, he receives them in an obliging manner, and sees that they are commodious. The ancient city of Jewish, of several former testimonies, it is now also decreed, at the report of Theodosius, the son of Theodorus, and upon his putting the people in mind of the virtue of this man, and that his pursuit is to do us good, and since the king himself, to honor him with a crown of gold, the usual reward according to the law, and to erect his statue is brass in the temple of Demus, and of the Graces; and that this present of a crown shall be proclaimed publicly in the theatre, in the Dionysian shows, while the new tragedies are acting; and in the Panathenean, Eleusinian, and Gymnical shows also; and that the commanders shall take care, while he continues in his friendship, and preserves his good will to us, to return all possible honor and favor to the man for his affection and generosity; that by this treatment it may appear how our people receive the goods sent, and repay a suitable reward and he be induced to proceed in his affection towards us, by the honors we have already paid him. That ambassadors be also chosen out of all the Athenians, who shall carry this despatch, and direct him in the accept of the honors we do him, and to endeavor always to be doing some good to our city." And this shall suffice us to have spoken as to the honors that were paid by the Romans and the people of Athens to Hyrcanus.

Take Dr. Hudson's note upon this place, which I suppose to be the truth: "Here is some mistake in Josephus; for when he had promised a decree for the restoration of Jerusalem, he brings in a decree of far greater importance, which is not to be found. It hath been thought that the ancient of Josephus, and the one here, are not the same, but that the ancient of Josephus is the son of Jonathan, and the one here, a descendant of Abba, and that the former is the original of the latter. This, however, which believes the Josephus' son is called the son of Antiochus and Alexander, and that the name Tiberius is set down follows a little lower, in the collection of Roman decrees, that concerned the Jews and is thus stated when Caesar was consul the fifth time. See ch. 23.

CHAPTER IX.

How Antipater committed the Care of Galilee to Herod, and that of Jerusalem to Phasaelus; as also, how Herod, upon the Jews' eneny at Antipater, was accused before Hyrcanus.

1. Now when Caesar had settled the affairs of Syria, he sailed away; and as soon as Antipater had brought him to Phoenicia, he went out of Syria, and returned to Judea. He then immediately raised up the wall, which had been thrown down by Pompey; and, by convening thither, he pacified that tumult which had been in the country; and this by both threats and promises; so that they were free from it, so that "if they would be of Hyrcanus's side, they would live happily, and lead their lives without disturbance, in the enjoyment of their own possessions; but if they were addicted to the hopes of their former friends, they should be free, for fear that if they get wealth thereby, they should have him a severe master, instead of a gentle governor; and Hyrcanus a tyrant, instead of a king; and the Romans, together with Caesar, their bitter enemies, instead of rulers; for that they would never bear him to be set aside whom they had appointed to govern." And when Antipater had said this to them, he himself settled the affairs of the country, and caused one of those that had been slain by Herod raised this indignation; for those women continued every day in the temple, persuading the king and the people, that Herod might undergo a trial before the sanhedrim for what he had done. Hyrcanus was so moved by these complaints, that he summoned Herod to come to his trial, for what was charged upon him. Accordingly he came: but his father had persuaded him to come not like a private man, but to appear in his official character, and that when he had settled the affairs of Galilee in the best manner he could for his own advantage, he should come to his trial, but still with a body of men sufficient for his security, on his journey to Jerusalem, that he should assume that as great a force as might look like terrifying Hyrcanus, but still such a one as might not expose

6 Those who will carefully observe the several occasional numbers and chronological characters in the life and death of this Herod, and of his children, hereafter noted, will see, that twenty-five years, and not fifteen, must for certain have been Josephus's own number, when he was made governor of Galilee. See chap. xxviii. sect. 3, and chap. xxiv. sect. 7, and particularly Antiq. b. xvii. chap. viii. sect. 1. where he tells us 44 years after Herod dies an old man about 70

Sextus Caesar, who was a relation of the great Caesar, and was now president of Syria. Now Phasaelus, Herod's brother, was by ambition and emulation at his actions, and envied the fame he had thereby got, and became ambitious not to be behindhand with him in deserving it: so he made the inhabitants of Jerusalem bear him the greatest good-will which could believe itself, but did neither manage its affairs improperly, nor abuse his authority therein. This conduct procured from the nation to Antipater such respect, as he was due to kings, and such honors as he might possibly have had, if he were an honest prince of the country. Yet did not this splendor of his as frequently happens, in the least diminish him in that kindness and fidelity which he owed to Hyrcanus.

3. But now the principal men among the Jews, when they saw Antipater and his sons to grow so much in the good-will of the nation bare to them, and in the revenues which they received out of Judea, and out of Israel, became ill disposed to him: for indeed Antipater had contracted a friendship with the Roman emperors: and when he had prevailed with Hyrcanus to send them money, he took it to himself and his son, and present intended, and paid a part of it as if it were his own, and not Hyrcanus's gift to them. Hyrcanus heard of this his management, but took no care about it; say, he was rather very glad of it: but the chief men of the Jews the next year, when they saw it, were so angry, that Herod was a violent and bold man, and very desirous of acting tyrannically; so they came to Hyrcanus, and now accused Antipater openly, and said to him, "How long wilt thou be quiet and suffer those that ingratefully abuse thy benefactions, by being so careless of thyself and of thy kingdom; for Antipater and his sons are not now stewards of thine affairs: do not thou deceive thyself with such notions: they are evidently absolute lords, for Herod, Antipater's son, has slain Hesekiah and those that were with him, and hath thereby transgressed our law, which hath forbidden to slay any man, even though he were Antipater's son, because he had been accus- ed to suffer death by the sanhedrim; yet hath he been so insolent as to do this, and that without any authority from thee."

4. Upon Hyrcanus hearing this he compelled them to withdraw; and he exhorted his brother and of those that had been slain by Herod raised this indignation; for those women continued every day in the temple, persuading the king and the people, that Herod might undergo a trial before the sanhedrim for what he had done. Hyrcanus was so moved by these complaints, that he summoned Herod to come to his trial, for what was charged upon him. Accordingly he came: but his father had persuaded him to come not like a private man, but to appear in his official character, and that when he had settled the affairs of Galilee in the best manner he could for his own advantage, he should come to his trial, but still with a body of men sufficient for his security, on his journey to Jerusalem, that he should assume that as great a force as might look like terrifying Hyrcanus, but still such a one as might not expose him asked and unguarded [to his enemies.]

However, Sextus Caesar, president of Syria, wrote to Hyrcanus, and desired him to clear Herod, and dismiss him at his trial, and threatened him beforehand, if he did not do it. Which epistle of his was the occasion of Hyrcanus's delivering Herod from suffering any harm from the sanhedrin, for he loved him as his own son. But when Herod stood before the sanhedrin with his body of men about him, he affrighted them all; for he was unlike any other man in that he would not bring any charge against him, but there was a deep silence, and nobody knew what was to be done. When affairs stood thus, one whose name was Maccabeus, and his son Gropius, de-\ndered to move us to compassion, with his hair dishevelled, and in black mourning garm-\nts: but this admirable man Herod, who is accused of murder, and called to answer so bold and grave a question, stands in purple, and with the hair of his head finely trimmed, and with his armed men about him, that if we shall condemn him by our law, he may either suffer in silence or escape death. Yet do not I make this complaint against Herod: he is to be sure more concerned for himself than for the laws; but my complaint is against yourselves, and your king, who gave him a license to do so. However, take you notice, that God is great, and that this very man, whom you are going to absolve and dissoy, for the sake of Hyrcanus, will one day punish both you and your king himself also."

Now the sanhedrin mistook any part of this pre-diction; for when Herod had received the kingdom, he slew all the members of this Sanhedrin, and Hyrcanus himself also, excepting Seneus, for he had a great honor for him on account of his friendship. So Herod was afterward besieged by Herod and Sosius, he persuaded the people to admit Herod into it; and told them, "That for their sins they would not be able to bear the very things are not to be done, and that this things will be related by us in their proper places."

But when Hyrcanus saw that the members of the sanedrin were ready to pronounce the sentence of death upon Herod, he put off the trial to another day, and sent privately to Herod, and advised him to fly out of the city, for that by this means he might escape. So he retired to Damascus, as though he fled from the king; and when he was had with Sextus Caesar, and had given him a license to do so. However, resolved to do thus, that in case he were again summoned before the sanedrin to take his trial, he would not obey that summons. Hereupon the members of the sanedrin had great indignation at this, and made every effort to persuade Hyrcanus that all these things were against him. Which state of matters he was not ignorant of, but his temper was so unnatural, and his joy was so great, that he ignored the nothing all. But when Sextus had made Herod's disruption of the army of Colosoea, for he sold him that post for money, Hyrcanus was in fear lest Herod should make war upon him; nor was the effect of what he feared long in coming on: for Herod came and brought an army along with him, to fight with Hyrcanus, as being angry at the trial he had been summoned to undergo be-} fore the sanedrin; but his father Antipater, and his brother [Phasaelus], met him, and hindered him from assaulting Jerusalem. They also pacified his vehement temper, and persuaded him to do no overt act, only to affright them with threatening, with threats of war against one who had given him the dignity he had; they also desired him not only not to be angry that he was summoned, and obliged to come to his trial, but to remember within, how he was dissuaded by his friends from bring any charge against him, but there was a deep silence, and nobody knew what was to be done. When affairs stood thus, one whose name was Maccabeus, and his son Gropius, de-\ndered to move us to compassion, with his hair dishevelled, and in black mourning garm-\nts: but this admirable man Herod, who is accused of murder, and called to answer so bold and grave a question, stands in purple, and with the hair of his head finely trimmed, and with his armed men about him, that if we shall condemn him by our law, he may either suffer in silence or escape death. tated his fidelity and diligence about our affairs, and this both now and in former times, both in person as a part of our generals, and by our commanders of the armies, and in presence as a witness, and came to our assistance in the last Alexandrian war with fifteen hundred soldiers; and when he was sent by me to Mithridates, showed himself superior in valor to all the others of our generals, and showed to my personal satisfaction that whatever he promised or cried for, he gave to our enemies, and that whatsoever he shall hereafter have, and are in possession of, or have bought, they shall retain them all. It is also our pleasure, that the city of Joppa, which the Jews had originally, and afterwards for the reasons I write, the Romans shall belong to them, as it formerly did, and that Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander, and his sons, have as tribute of that city from those that occupy the land for the country, and for that in the fights between single gladiators, and in those with beasts, they shall sit among the senators to see those shows, and that when they desire an audience, they shall be introduced into the senate by the dictator, or by the governor of Syria, and when the governor introduced them their answers shall be returned them in ten days at the farthest, after the decree of the senate is made about their affairs."

3. "Caius Cæsar, the son of Alexander, and consul, hath granted, That out of regard to the honor, and virtue, and kindness of the man, and for the advantage of the senate, and of the people of Rome, both as a ruler and as his children, he has granted, both the land of Jerusalem, and of the Jewish nation, by the same right, and according to the same laws, by which their progenitors have held the priesthood."

8. "Julius Caesar, praetor [consul] of Rome, to the magistrates, senate, and people of the Parthians, sendeth greeting. The Jews of Delos and some of the senators, and some of our ambassadors, signified to us, that by a decree of yours, you forbid them to make use of the customs of their forefathers, and their way of sacred worship. Now it does not please us, that you should pass laws against our friends, and confederates, whereby they are forbidden to live according to their own customs, or to bring in contributions for common suppers and holy festivals while they are not forbidden so to do even at Rome itself; for even nor may soldiers exact money of them for winter quarters, or under any other pretense, but that they shall retain that which they already have, and that whatsoever they shall hereafter have, and are in possession of, or have bought, they shall retain them all. It is also our pleasure, that the city of Joppa, which the Jews had originally, and afterwards for the reasons I write, the Romans shall belong to them, as it formerly did, and that Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander, and his sons, have as tribute of that city from those that occupy the land for the country, and for that in the fights between single gladiators, and in those with beasts, they shall sit among the senators to see those shows, and that when they desire an audience, they shall be introduced into the senate by the dictator, or by the governor of Syria, and when the governor introduced them their answers shall be returned them in ten days at the farthest, after the decree of the senate is made about their affairs."

9. "Julius Caesar, praetor [consul] of Rome, to the magistrates, senate, and people of the Parthians, sendeth greeting. The Jews of Delos and some of the senators, and some of our ambassadors, signified to us, that by a decree of yours, you forbid them to make use of the customs of their forefathers, and their way of sacred worship. Caius Caesar, our emperor and consul, in that decree wherein he forbade the Baccanian rioters to meet in the city, did yet permit these Jews, and these only, both to bring in their contributions, and to make their common sacrifices. Accordingly, when I forbid other Baccanalian rites, I permit these Jews to gather themselves together according to the customs and laws of their religion, to perform their sacrifices and to sacrifice for sacred and religious purposes, as their law requires, and for collecting oblations necessary for their sacrifices: and my will is, that you write this to the several cities under your jurisdiction."

13. And these were the concessions that Dossabella made to our nation when Hyrcanus sent an embassy to barter with them. But Lucius the emperor, in this decree ran thus: "I have at my tribunal set these Jews, who are citizens of Rome, and follow the Jewish religious rites, and yet live at Ephesus, free from going there every year, and from the superintendence they are under. This was done before the twelfth of the kalends of October, when Lucius Lentulus, and Caius Marcellus, were consuls, in the presence of Titus Appius Balbus, the son of Titus, and lieutenant of the province of Asia, of Titus Togius, the son of Titus, of the Crustumine tribe; of Quintus Resius, the son of Quintus; of Titus Pompeius Longinus, the son of Titus; of Caius Servilius, the son of Caius, of the Tarentine tribe; and Publius Gallius, the son of Publius, of the Vetarian tribe; of Caius Sentius, the son of Caius, of the Sabattine tribe; of Titus Atullius Bulbus, the son of Titus, lieutenant and vice-prætor to the magistrates, and to the people of the Ephesians, sendeth greeting: Lucius Lentulus the consul freed the Jews that are in Asia from going into the army, at my intercession for them. And when I sent the same petition some time afterward to Pharnaces, the emperor, and to Lucius Antonius the vice-questor, I obtained that privilege of them also; and my will is, that you take care that no one give them any molestation."

14. The decree of the Delians. "The answer of the prætors, when Beuctus was archon, on the twentieth day of the month Thargelion. While Marcus Fiso the lieutenant lived in our city, who was also appointed to the prætorship, the Delians being in the senate, that as to those things which, by the decree of the senate, Caius Caesar had adjudged about the Jews, and yet had not hitherto that decree been brought into the treasury, it is our will, as to the order of Publius, Isabell, and Marcus Antonius, our consuls, to have these decrees put into the public tables, and brought to the city questors, that they may take care to have the people put upon them this tax. This was done before the fifth of the ides of February in the temple of Concord. Now the ambassadors from Hyrcanus the high priest were these, Lysimachus the son of Pannatius, Alexander the son of Marcus, and Marcianus the son of Chema, and Jonathan the son of Onias."

11. Hyrcanus sent also one of these ambassadors to Dolabella, who was then the prefect of Asia, and desired him to dismiss the Jews from military service, and to preserve to them the customs of their forefathers, and to permit them to live according to them. And when Dolabella had received Hyrcanus's letter, without any further deliberation, he sent an epistle to all the Asiarchs, to the kings of Libya, to the Cappadocians, to the Ephesians, the metropolis of Asia, about the Jews, a copy of which epistle here follows:

12. "When Artemon was prytaneis, on the first day of the month Leneus, Dolabella, the emperor, to the people of Ephesus, sends greeting: Alexander, the son of Theodorus, the ambassador of Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander the high priest and enthroned of the Jews, and the countrymen of many nations could not go into their armies, because they are not allowed to bear arms, or to travel on the Sabbath-days, nor there to procure themselves those sorts of food which they have been used to eat from the times of their forefathers: I therefore grant them a freedom from going into the army, as the former precepts have done and permit them to use the customs of their forefathers, in assembling together for sacred and religious purposes, as their law requires, and for collecting oblations necessary for their sacrifices: and my will is, that you write this to the several cities under your jurisdiction."

18 The declaration of Marcus Publius, the son of Spurius, and of Marcus, the son of Marcus, and of Lucius, the son of Publius: "We were not consulted, and informed him of what he did. Dositheus, the son of Cleopatra of Alexandria desired, that if he thought good, he would dismiss those Jews who were Roman citizens, and were wont to observe the rites of the Jewish religion, under the supervision they were wont to receive under. Accordingly, he did dismiss them. This was done before the thirteenth of the kalends of October."

19 In the month Quintilis, when Lucius Lentulus and Caesar Marcellus were consuls; and there were present Titus Appius Balbus, the son of Titus, lieutenant of the horatian tribe, Titus Togius of the crusturin tribe, Quintus Resius the son of Quintus, Titus Pompeius the son of Titus Cornelianus Luctus Parrucius the son of Capito, the son of Lucius, of the Colline tribe, Aulus Furio Tertius, the son of Aulus, and Appius Menas. In the presence of these it was that Lentulus pronounced this decree: I have been advised by the Senate to dismiss those Jews that are Roman citizens, and are accustomed to observe the sacred rites of the Jews at Ephesus, on account of the superstition they are under."

20 The magistrates of the Latins, and Publius, and of the citizens of the colony, send greeting: Sopater, the ambassador of Hyrcanus, the high priest, hath delivered us an epistle from thee, whereby he let us know, that certain ambassadors were come from Hyrcanus, the high priest of the Jews, saying, he had sent an epistle written concerning their nation, wherein they desire that the Jews may be allowed to observe their Sabbaths and other sacred rites, according to the laws of their forefathers, and that they may be under no command, because they are our friends and confederates, and that nobody may injure them in our provinces. Now, although the Trebillians there present contradicted them, and were not agreed with the decree, yet didst thou give order that they should be observed, and informed us that thou hadst been desired to write this to us about them. We therefore, in obedience to the injunctions we have received, have received the epistle which they sent, and have laid it up by itself among our public records. And as to the other things about which thou didst send to us, we will take care that no complaint be made against us."

21 "Publius Servilius, the son of Publius, of the Galban tribe, the proconsul of the magistrates, senate, and people of the Milesians, sendeth greeting: Pytanes, the son of Hermes, a citizen of the city, came to me at Tralles, and held a court there, and informed me that you used the Jews in a way different from my opinion, and forbade them to celebrate their Sabbaths, and to perform the sacred rites receive of the fathers, and to enjoy the fruits of the land according to their ancient custom, and that he had himself been the promulger of your decree, according as your laws require. I would therefore have you know, that upon hearing the pleadings on both sides, I gave sentence that the Jews should not be prohibited to make use of their own customs."

22 The decree of those of Pergamus. When Cratinus was prytaneis, on the first day of the month Deius, the decree of the prytaneis was this: Since the Jews undertook dangers for the common safety of all mankind, and are ambitious to settle their confederates and friends in happiness and with peace, and since the nation of the Jews, being a great nation, and in many parts, undertake dangers for the common safety of all mankind, they have no right to have their relations among us, and to bring their affairs to exercise the Senate thereupon made a decree about what they had desired of them, that Antiochus the king, the son of Antiochus, should be regularly to come to the body, that comes to hand, that the Romans; and that the fortresses, and the havens, and the country, and whatsoever else he had taken from them, should be restored to them; and that it may be lawful for them to export and import all goods to and from their country; that there be no king nor people may have leave to export any goods, either out of the country of Judea, or out of their havens, without paying customs, but only Prolemy, the king of Alexandria, because he is our brother, and has always been our friend. We, accordingly, desire to the garrison that is in Joppa may be ejected. Now Lucius Pettius, one of the senators, a worthy and good man, gave order that we should take care that these things should be done, and accord or promise the things as we shall take care also that their ambassadors might return home in safety. Accordingly, we admitted Theodorus into our senate and assembly, and took the epistle out of his hands, as well as the decree of which he was dismissioned, and gave great zeal about the Jews, and described Hyrcanus's virtue and generosity, and how he was a benefactor to all men in common, and particularly to us, and said that we laid up the epistle in our public records; and made a decree ourselves, that since we also are in confederacy with the Romans, we would do every thing we could for the Jews, according to our power, to the end that they may be made free, and be ready to bestow other benefits upon us, as justly expecting to receive proper requitals from us; and desiring them to remember that our ancestors were friendly to the Jews even in the days of Abram, who was the father of all the Hebrews, as we have [also] found it set down in our public records."

23 The decree of those of Halicarnassus. When Eumenes was prytaneis, the son of Oristidas by descent, but by adoption of Eumenes himself, on the 4th day of the month Aristierion, the decree of the people, upon the representation of Marcus Alexander, was this: Since we have ever a great care and precaution to manage the affairs of the king, and since we aim to follow the people of the Romans, who are the benefactors of all men, by a public epistle of those people to the Jews, preserved in the first book of the Maccabees, xii. 10-23, and those by Simon and Antiochus Eupator, as recorded in p. 58, that Alexander, who raised the Parthian, was of the seed of Abra-and what they have written to us about a league of f. 1. dansal and mutual assistance among the Jews and our city, and that their sacred offices and accustomed festivals and assemblies, may be observed by us, we have decreed, that as many men and women of the Jews as are willing so to do, may celebrate their holy seasons in their holy offices, according to the Jewish laws; and may make their processions at the several, according to the customs of their forefathers; and if any one, whether he be a magistrate or private person, hindereth them from performing them, he shall be liable to a fine, to be applied to the uses of the city."

24. The decree of the Sardians. This decree was made by the senate and people, upon the request of the priests of the precincts of those Jews, who are our fellow-citizens, and live with us in this city, have ever had great benefits bestowed upon them by the people, and have come now into the senate, and desired of the people their liberty, by the senate and people of Rome, they may assemble together, according to their ancient and legal custom, and that we will not bring any suit against them about it; and that a place may be set apart for them to worship in, with their congregations, with their wives and children, and may offer, as did their forefathers, their prayers and sacrifices to God; now the senate and people have decreed to permit them to assemble together, as far as they can do so according to their own laws; and that such a place be set apart for them by the praetors, for the building and inhabiting the same, as they shall esteem fit for that purpose. And that those that take care of the provisions for the city, shall take care that such sorts of food as they esteem fit for their eating, may be imported into the city.

25. The decree of the Ephesians. When Menophilius was prytaneus, on the first day of the month Artemisia, this decree was made by the people: "Nicanor, the son of Euphemius, pronounced it, upon the representation of the praetors. Since the Jews that dwell in our city had petitioned Marcus Julius Ponticus, the son of Brutus, the praefect, that they might be allowed to observe their Sabbath, and to act in all things according to the customs of their forefathers, he the Senate and the nobles, and so decreed it, and now the praetor hath granted their petition. Accordingly, it was decreed by the senate and people, that in this affair that concerned the Romans, no one of them should be hindered from keeping the Sabbath, nor be fined for so doing, but that they may be allowed to do all things according to their own laws."

26. Now there are many such decrees of the senate and imperators of the Romans, and those different from those before, which have been made in favor of Hyrcanus, and of our nation; as also, there have been more decrees of the city, and rescripts of the praetors, to such epistles as concerned, our rights and privileges; and certainly it may be believed that they are all to this purpose, and that by the specimens which we have inserted; for since we have produced evident marks that have still been seen, of the friendship we have had with the Romans, and demonstrated that those marks are, engraven upon columns and tables of brass in the Capitol, that are still in being, and preserved to this day, we have omitted to set down all as needless and disagreeable; for I cannot suppose any one so perverse as not to believe the friendship which we have had with the Romans, while they have demonstrated the same by such a great number of their decrees relating to us; nor will they doubt of our fidelity as to the rest of those decrees, since we have showed the same in those which we have recited. And thus have we sufficiently explained that confederacy we set those times had with the Romans.

CHAP. XI.

How Marcus succeeded Sextus, when he had been slain by Brutus's assassins; and how, after the Death of Cassius, Cassius came to Rome, and was distrusted Judeus; as also, how Malichus slew Antipater, and was himself slain by Herod.

§ 1. Now it so fell out that about this very time the affairs of Syria were in great disorder, and this on the occasion following: Cæcilius Bassus, being a very valiant and brave man, in a serious design against Sestus Cæsar, and slew him, and then took his army and got the management of public affairs into his own hand; so there arose a great war about Apamia, while Cæsar's great army came against Apamia, and caused a great number of horsemen and footmen: these Antipater also sent succours, and his sons with them, as calling to mind the kindnesses they had received from Cæsar, and on that account he thought they ought not but justly and lawfully take vengeance on the man that had murdered him. And as the war was drawn out into a great length, Marcus came from Rome to take notice of the government upon him: but Cæsar's slain by Cassius and Brutus in the senate-house, after he had retained the government three years and six months. This fact, however, is related elsewhere.

2. As the time that arose upon the death of Cæsar was now begun, and the principal men were all gone, some one way, and some another, to raise armies; Cassius came from Rome into Syria, in order to receive the [army that lay in] the camp of Apamia; and having raised the siege, he brought over both Bassus and Marcus to his party. He then went over the cities, and got together weapons and soldiers, and laid great taxes upon those cities; and he chiefly oppressed the Jews and the Gentiles of it, and of many talents; but Antipater, when he saw the state to be in so great consternation and disorder, divided the collection of that sum, and appointed his two sons to gather it, and so that part of it was to be enfranchised by Marcus, who was ill disposed to him, and part by others. And because Herod did exact what was required of him from Galilee before others, he was in the greatest favor with Cassius; for he thought it a part of prudence to cultivate a friendship with the Romans, and to gain their good-will at the expense of others; whereas the curators of the other cities, with their citizens, were sold for slaves; and Cassius reduced four cities into slavery, the two most potent of which were Tyre and Sidon, and besides these, Lydda and Thamna. Nay, Cassius was so very angry at Malichus, that he had killed him, (for he assailed him,) had not Hyrcanus by the means of Antipater, sent him a hundred talents of his own, and thereby pacified his anger against him.

3. But after Cassius was gone out of Judea, Malichus laid snares for Antipater, as thinking that his death would be the preservation of Hyrcanus's government; but his design was not unknown to the Romans, who, when they conceived, he retired beyond Jordan, and got together an army, partly of Arabs, and partly of his own countrymen. However, Malichus, being one of great cunning, denied that he had laid any snares for him, and said that his defences were impenetrable, both to himself and his sons; and said that while Phasaelus had a garrison in Jerusalem, and Herod had the weapons of war in his custody, he could never have a thought of any such thing. So Antipater, hearing the discourse of Malichus, was reconciled to him, and made an agreement with him; this was when Marcus was president of Syria; who yet perceiving that this Malichus was making a disturbance in Judea, prevented both; but Phinias had already resolved to steal him away privately, and to march thence into Judea; and as Cassius was in haste to march against Antony, he thought to bring the country to revolt, and to procure the government to himself. But Phinias had already resolved, and he, being a shrewd man, and perceiving what his intention was, he sent thither beforehand a servant, in appearance indeed to get a supper ready, for he said before, that he would feast them all there, but in reality to the commanders of the army, whom he persuaded to go out against Malichus with their daggers. So they went out and met the man, and he feasted them, and in the night caused him to be bed. Whereupon Hyrcanus was so astonished at what had happened, that his speech failed him; and when, after some difficulty, he had recovered himself, he asked Herod, what the matter was; and Herod replied, that it was for his own good; and when he said that it was done by the command of Cassius, he commended the action; for that Malichus was a very wicked man, and one that conspired against his own country. And this was the establishment of the city; for Herod did not care for what he wickedly did to Antipater.

7. But when Cassius was marched out of Syria, disturbances arose in Judea; for Felix, who was left at Jerusalem with an army, made a sedition, and the legions within themselves rose in arms; but Herod went to Fabius the prefect of Damascus, and was desired to run to his brother's assistance, but was hindered by a disturber that seized upon him, till Phasaelus by himself had been too hard for Felix; and had shut him up in the tower, and there, on certain conditions, dismissed him. Phasaelus also complained of Hyrcanus, that although he had received a great many benefits from them, yet they would not help him in the time of his necessity. But his brother made many places to revolt, and kept garrisons in them; and, particularly Massada, the strongest fortress of them all. In the mean time Herod sent a new captain, and took from Felix all the places he had gotten; and, upon certain conditions, dismissed him also.

CHAP. XII.

Herod ejects Antigonus, the Son of Aristobulus out of Judea, and gains the Friendship of Antony, who was now come into Syria, by sending him presents; on which Antony did not admit of those that would have accused Herod: and what it was that Antony wrote to the Tyrians in behalf of the Jews.

§ 1. Now Ptolemy, the son of Menneus brought back into Judea Antigons, the son of Aristobulus, and made him governor; but Herod and his friends were not content to contradict Malichus's hypocrisy, but to give him tokens of mutual friendship, in order to prevent his suspicion of them.

6. However, Herod sent to Cassius, and informed him of the murder of his father; who

*In this and the following chapters, the reader will easily remark how truly Grotius observes, in his notices on the Romans, in favor of the Jews, that their rights and privileges were commonly purchased of the Romans with money. Many examples of this sort, both as to the Romans and others in authority, will occur in our Josephus, both now and hereafter, kept it under in the way of a tyrant. Marcellus also marched into Gallia, which lay in his neighborhood, and took three of his fortresses, and put garrisons into them to keep them. But when Herod came, he took all from him; but the Tyrian garrison he dismissed in a very civil manner: nay, to some of the soldiers he gave presents, out of the good-will he bare to that city. When he had despatched these affairs, and was gone to meet Antigonus, he joined battle with him, and beat him, and made him out of his course, and presently, when he was just come to the borders. But when he was come to Jerusalem, Hyrcanus and the people put garlands about his head; for he had already contracted an affinity with them by his marriage with Caecilia, a descendant of his, and for that reason Herod took the greater care of him, as being to marry the daughter of Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, and the grand-daughter of Hyrcanus, by whose marriage he gained the eye of the Jews and two female children. He had also married before this another wife, out of a lower family of his own nation, whose name was Doris, by whom he had his eldest son Antipater.

The victory was undeceived, and had been cassius near Philippi, as others have related; but after the victory, Caesar went into Gaul [Italy] and Antony marched for Asia, who, when he was arrived at Bikhiynus, had ambassadors that met him, either for Cassius or Antony. So large a part of the Jews came thither, to accuse Phasaelus and Herod, and they said, that Hyrcanus had indeed the appearance of reigning; but that these men had the power; but Antony paid great respect to Herod, and sent him a crown of gold. The Jews, with a great show of persuading him to take his defence against his accusers, on which account his adversaries could not so much as obtain a hearing; which favor Herod had gained of Antony by money. But since, Asia was come to Ephesus, Hyrcanus the high priest, and our nation, sent an embassy to him, who carried a crown of gold with them, and desired that he would write to the governors of the provinces, to set those Jews free who had been carried captive by Cassius, and this without their having fought against him, and to restore them that country, which, in the days of Cassius, had been taken from them. Antony thought the Jews' desertion of justice, and purpose against Hyrcanus, and to the Jews. He also sent, at the same time, a decree to the Tyrians; the contents of which were to the same purpose.

3. Marcus Antonius, imperator, to Hyrcanus that he might have taken by the first of the u-nith greeting: If you be in health, it is well; I also am in health, with the army. Lysimachus, the son of Pseudus, and Josephus, the son of Menea, and Alexander, the son of Theodorus, your ambassadors, met me at Ephesus, and have renewed that embassy which they had formerly been upon Rome; and have diligently acquitted themselves of the present embassy, which thou and thy nation have intrusted to them. I have heard their last remonstrances devoted to us for us. I am therefore satisfied, both by your actions and your words, that you are well disposed to us: and I understand that your conduct is constant and religious; so I reckon upon you as our own; but when those were adversaries to you, and to the Roman people, abstained neither from cities nor temples, and did not observe the agreement they had confirmed by oath; it was proper of us to account of our contest with them, but on account of all mankind in common, that we have taken vengeance on those who have been the authors of great injustice towards men, and of great wickedness towards those that were the friends of God. For the rest, of what it was that the sun turned away his light from us, as unwilling to view the horrid crime they were guilty of in the case of Caesar. We have also overcome their conspiracies, which threatened the gods themselves, which Macedonia received, as it is a climate peculiarly proper for infamous and insensate attempts: and we have overcome that confused rout of men, half mad with spite against us, which they got together at Philippi, in Macedonia, when they seized on the places that were appointed to them: in that purpose, and as it were, walled them round with mountains to the very sea, and where the passage was open only through a single gate. This victory we gained, because the gods had condemned those men for their wicked enterprise. When he had fled as far as Philippi, was shot up by us, and became a partaker of the same perdition with Cassius; and now these have received their punishment, we suppose that we may enjoy peace for our own security, both by land and sea. I therefore, bearing in mind both thee and your nation, shall take care of what may be for your advantage. I have also sent epistles in writing to the several cities, that if any persons, whether free or bond, are under the spear of Cassius, or his subordinates, they may be set free. And I will that you kindly make use of the favors which I and Dolabella have granted you. I also forbid the Tyrians and others in your country, to know for what places of the Jews they now possess, I order them to restore them. I have withal accepted of the crown which thou sentest me.

4. Marcus Antonius, imperator, to the magistrates, senate, and people of Tyre, sendeth greeting: The ambassadors of Hyrcanus the high priest and ethnarch of the Jews appeared before me at Ephesus, and told me, that you are in possession of part of their own city, which you entered upon under the government of our adversaries. Since, therefore, we have undertaken a war for the obtaining the government, and have taken care to do what was agreeable to piety and justice, and our conveniences, and your own; and that had neither any remembrance of the kindnesses they had received, nor have kept their oaths, I will that you be at peace with those that are our confederates; as also, that what you have obtained in no measure of our advancement, you shall not be reckoned your own, but be returned to those from whom you took them; for none of them took their provinces or their armies by the gift of the senate, but they seized them by force, and bestowed them by violence upon such as became useful to them in their unjust proceedings. Since, therefore, those men have received the punishment due to them, we desire that our confederates may retain whatever it was to them formerly possessed without disturbance, and that you restore all the places which belong to Hyrcanus the ethnarch of the Jews, which you have had, though it were but one day before Cassius Cassius began the war, and the Tyrians were enabled, and entered into our provinces; nor do you use any force against him, in order to weaken him, that he may not be able to dispose of that which is his own, but if you have any content with him about your possessions, you shall have the liberty for you to plead your cause when we come upon the places concerned, for we shall sike preserve the rights, and hear all the causes of our confederates.

5. Marcus Antonius, imperator, to the senators, which is taken great notice by Virgil, Pliny, and other Roman authors. See Virgil's Georgics, Book 1, just before the end; and Pliny's Nat. Hist. b. iii. ch. xi.
ANTIOQUITIES OF THE JEWS.

gutates, senate, and people of Tyre, sendeth greeting: I have sent you my decree, of which I will that ye take care that it be engraven on the public tables, in Roman and Greek letters, and that it stand engraven in the most illustrious places, that it may be read by all." Marcus Antonius, imperator, one of the triumvirates over the public affairs, made this declaration: "Since Cyrus, in the revolt he had made, hath pillagd that province which belonged not to him, and was hld by garrisons there encamped, while they were our confederates, and hath spoiled that nation of the Jews that was in friendship with the Roman people, and since we have overcome his madness by arms, we now correct by our decrees and judicial determinations what he hath laid waste, that those things may be restored to our confederates. And as for what he hath done to the Jewish pornechth, whether they be bodies or possessions, let them be released, the bodies into that state of freedom they were originally in, and the possessions to their former owners. I also will, that he who shall smack a man in the Jewish pornechth, whether he stand as a soldier, or if he be a slave, may be punished for his disobedience; and if such a one be caught, I will take care that the offender suffer condign punishment." 2. But this thing did Antony write to the Sidonians, and the Antiochians, and the Arabians. We have produced these decrees, therefore, as marks for futurity of the truth of what we have said, that the Romans had a great concern about our nation.

CHAP. XIII.

How Antony made Herod and Phasaelus Tetrachs after they had been accused to no purport; and how the Parthians, when they brought Antigonus into Judea, took Hyrcanus and Phasaelus, Herod's father, and Antigonus, Herod's [father]; and what Afflictions Hyrcanus and Phasaelus endured.

§ 1. When, after this, Antony came into Syria, Cleopatra met him in Cilicia, and brought him to fall in love with her. And there came now also a hundred of the most potent of the Jews to accuse Herod and those about him, and set the men of the greatest clearance among them, to speak. But Messala contradicted them, on behalf of the young men, and all this in the presence of Hyrcanus, who was Herod's father-in-law already. When Antony had heard both sides, he asked Hyrcanus who the men were that governed the nation best? he replied, Herod and his friends. Hereupon Antony, by reason of the old hospitable friendship he had made with his father [Antipater], at that time when he was with Gabo, the Jewish prince both Herod, and Phasaelus tetrarchs, and committed the public affairs of the Jews to them, and wrote letters to that purpose. He also bound fifteen of their adversaries, and was going to kill them, but that Herod obtained their pardon.

2. Yet did not these men continue quiet when they were come back, but a thousand of the Jews came to Tyre to meet him there, whither the report was that he would come. But Antony was corrupted by the money which Herod and his brother had given him, and so he gave order to the governor of the place to punish the Jewish ambassadors, who were for making innovations, and to give them over to Herod; but when Herod went out hastily to them, and Hyrcanus was with him (for they stood upon the shore before the city), and he charged them to go their ways, because great mischief would befall them if they went on with their accusation. But they did not acquiesce; whereupon the Romans ran upon them with their daggers, and slew some,

* We may here take notice, that espousals alone were of old esteemed a sufficient foundation for affinity, Hyrcanus being here called father-in-law to Herod, be-and wounded more of them, and the rest fled away and went home, and lay still in great contention: and when the people made a clamour against Herod, Antony was so provoked at it that he slew the prisoners.

3. Now, in the second year, Pocorus, the king of Parthia's son, and Barzapharnes, a commander of the Parthians, possessed themselves of the city of Artsen, when that city is now dead, and Lycaenus his son took his government, and made a league of friendship with Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus; and in order to obtain it, made use of that commander, who had a great reputation with him. They also had promised to give the Parthians a thousand talents, and five hundred women, upon condition they would take the government away from Hyrcanus, and bestow it upon him, and wish to kill him in his room. But what he had promised, yet did the Parthians make an expedition into Judea on that account, and carried Antigonus with them. Pocorus went along the maritime parts, but the commander who was with them, he called Drymm, and when some others came and met them, the men privately fell upon Jerusalem; and when some more came to them they gave them great number, and rang against the king's palace and besieged it. But as Phasaelus and Herod's party came to the other's assistance, and a battle happened between them in the market-place, the young men beat their enemies, and pursued them into the temple, and sent some armed men into the adjoining houses to keep them in, who yet being destitute of such as should support them, were burnt, and the houses with them, by the people who smote them. And Herod and Pocorus avenged on these seditious adversaries of his a little afterward for this injury they had offered him, when he fought with them, and slew a great number of them.

4. Now, there were daily skirmishes, the enemy waited for the coming of the multitude out of the country to Pentecost, a feast of ours so called: and when that day was come, many ten thousands of the people were gathered to see what would happen. And Phasaelus and Herod strengthened the outer fortifications, for some such fortifications there were in that place. Phasaelus came also to his assistance; yet was Pocorus, the general of the Parthians, at the desire of Antigonus, by his money out of the city of Antioch, how to serve the king's son and his horsemens, under pretence indeed as if he would still the sedition, but in reality to assist Antigonus in obtaining the government. And when Phasaelus met him, and received him kindly, Pocorus persuaded him to go himself as ambassador to Barzapharnes, which was done fraudently. Accordingly, Phasaelus, suspecting no cause his grand daughter Mariamme was betrothed to him, although the marriage was not completed till four years afterward. See Matt. 1:16.

harm, complied with his proposal, while Herod did not give his consent to what was done, because of the perfidiousness of these barbarians, but desired Phasaelus rather to fight those that were come into the city.

5. So both Hyrcanus and Phasaelus went on the embassage; but Pocorus left with Herod two hundred horsemen, and ten men, who were called The Priests; and conducted the others on their journey; and when they were in Gailee, the governors of the cities there met them in the Acheareian to the daughter of Aleimachus, at the first with cheerfulness, and made them presents, though he afterward conspired against them; and Phasaelus, with his horsemen, were conducted to the naisus: but when they heard that Antigonus had brought and gave the Parthenon a thousand talents, and five hundred women, to assist him against them, they soon had a suspicion of the barbarians. Moreover, there was one who informed them that asses were laid for them and they had then been seized upon, had they not waited for the leisure of Herod by the Parthians that were about Jerusalem, lest upon the slaughter of Hyrcanus and Phasaelus, he should have as much to do with the most daring of them all. And these were the circumstances they were now in, and they saw who they were that guarded them. Some persons indeed would have persuaded Phasaelus to fly away immediately on hearing this news, but one who was called one Ophellius, who, above all the rest, was most earnest with him to do so, for he had heard of this treachery by Saramelle, the richest of all the Syrians at that time, who also promised to conduct him shipe to carry him off; for the word was just by them: but he had no mind to desert Hyrcanus, nor bring his brother into danger; but he went to Berosphenes, and told him he did not suspect that Antigonus would kill his brother in his absence, for that if he wanted money, he would give him more than Antigonus; and besides, that it was a horrible thing to slay those that came to him upon the security of their oaths, and that when they had done them a wrong, but the barbarian swore to him that there was no truth in any of his suspicions, but that he was troubled with nothing but false proposals, and then went away to Pocorus.

7. But while Hyrcanus was gone away, some men came and bound Hyrcanus and Phasaelus, while Phasaelus greatly reproached the Parthians for their perjury. However, that butcher who was sent against Herod, had in command to get him, and took him up, and the utmost harm he could do to him; but messengers had been sent by Phasaelus to inform Herod of the perfidiousness of the Parthians: and when he knew that the enemy had seized upon him, he went to Pocorus, and to the high priest that the Parthians had suffered the rest of the rest, who, although they knew the whole matter, dissembled with him in a deceitful way; and said "that he ought to go out with them before the walls, and meet those who were bringing him in, and that there was no reason he should have by his adversaries, but were coming to give him as account of the good success Phasaelus had had." Herod did not give credit to what they said, for he was afraid of the time afterward, and had set upon him; and when the Parthians were beaten by others also; and the daughter of Hyrcanus, whose daughter he had espoused, was his monitor also (not to credit them,) which made him still more suspicious of the Parthians, for although other things, no one would have been able to do, yet did he believe her as a woman of very great wisdom.

9. Now while the Parthians were in consultation what was to be done; for they did not think that they could force him, he sent way that he might be a person of his character; and while they put off the determination until the next day, Herod was under great disturbance of mind; and rather inclining to believe the reports he had heard about his brother and the Parthians, then to give heed to what was said on the other side, he determined that when the evening came on, he would make use of it for his flight, and make no sign any longer delay, as if the dangers from the enemy were not yet certain. He therefore removed with the armed men whom he had with him; and set his wives upon the beasts, as also his mother and sister, and her whom he was about to marry, Mariamne, and all the children of Aristobulus, with her mother, the daughter of Hyrcanus, and his youngest brother, and all their servants, and the seat of the multitude that was with him, and without the enemies' privy, pursued his way, the greater part of his courtiers of his, who, when he saw him in this case, so hard-hearted, but would have commiserated his fortune, while the women drew along their infant children, and left their own country, and their friends in the midst of need and lamentations, and in expectation of nothing but what was of a melancholy nature.

6. But for Herod himself, he raised his mind above the miserable state he was in, and was of good courage, and of the most easy temper he was, and as he passed along, he bade every one to be of good cheer, and not to give themselves up to sorrow, because that would hinder them in their flight, which was now the only hope of safety that they had; and of them to be about him with patience the calamity they were under, as he exhorted them to do; yet was he once almost going to kill himself, upon the overthrow of a wagon, and the danger of his mother was then in being killed, and this on two accounts, because of his great concern for her, and because he was afraid, lest by this delay, the enemy should overtake him in the pursuit; but as he was drawing his sword to kill himself, he was restrained by those that were present restrained him, and being so many in number, were too hard for him; and told him, that he ought not to desert them, and leave them a prey to their enemies, for that it was not the case of a brave man to free himself from the distresses he was in, and to overlook his friends that were in the same distresses also. So he was compelled to let that horrid attempt alone, partly out of shame at what they said to him, and partly out of the number of those that would not permit him to do what he intended. So he encouraged his mother, and took all the care of her the time would allow, and proceeded on the way he proposed to go with the others, and arrived at the city of Massada. And as he had many skirmishes with such of the Parthians as attacked him, and pursued him, he was conqueror in them all.

9. Nor indeed was he free from the Jews all along as he went in with them; for the time he had gotten sixty furlongs out of the city, and was upon the road, they fell upon him, and fought hand to hand with him, whom also he also put to flight, and overcame, by his despair of distress and necessity, but like one that was excellently prepared for war, and had what he wanted in great plenty. And in this very place where he overcame the Jews it was that he some time afterward, after the time afterward, in a city round about it, called it Herodium. And when he was come to Idumaen, at a place called Tiberias, his brother Joseph met him, and he then held a council to take advice about all his affairs, and what was to be done in his circumstances, since he had a great multitude that followed him, besides his mercenary soldiers, and the place Massada, whether he was promised to be, was too small to contain so great a multitude; so they sent away a man who was above nine thousand, and bade them go some one way, and some another, and to save

But Messala contradicted them, on behalf of the young men, and all this in the presence of Hyrcanus, who was Herod's father-in-law already. When Antony had heard both sides, he asked Hyrcanus who they were that governed the nation best? he replied, Herod and his friends. Hereupon Antony, by reason of the old hospitable friendship he had made with his father [Antipater] at that time when he was with Antipater, being a man of great spirit, sought Herod and Phasaeus tetrarchy, and committed the public affairs of the Jews to them, and wrote letters to that purpose. He also bound fifteen of their adversaries, and was going to kill them, but that Herod obtained their pardon. 2. Yet did not these men continue quiet when they were come back, but a thousand of the Jews came to Tyre to meet him there, whither the report was that he would come. But Antony was corrupted by the money which Herod and his brother had given him, and so he gave order to the governor of the place to punish the Jewish ambassadors, who were for making innovations, and of the governor of the town upon Herod; but Herod went out hastily to the temple and Hyrcanus was with him (for they stood upon the shore before the city,) and he charged them to go their ways, because great mischief would befell them if they went on with their accusation. But they did not acquiesce; whereupon the Romans ran upon them with their daggers, and slew some. 3. Now, in the second year, Paeorus, the king of Parthia's son, and Barzapharnes, a com- mander of the Parthians, possessed themselves of Syria. Ptolemy, the son of Menneus, also was not content with his patrimony and govern- ment, and made a league of friendship with Anti- gonus, the son of Aristobulus; and in order to obtain it, made use of that commander, who had a great influence in him. Now Ptolemy had promised to give the Parthians a thousand talents, and five hundred women, upon condition they would take the government away from Hyrcanus, and bestow it upon him, and withal kill the Jews, and put them in their stead. When he had promised, yet did the Parthians make an expedition into Judea on that account, and carried Antigonus with them. Paeorus went along the maritime parts, but the commander of the sea was not able to the ships of the Tyrians excluded Paeorus, but the Sidonians, and those of Ptolemis, received him. However, Paeorus sent a troop of horsemen into Judea, to take a view of the state of the country, and to apprehend the Antiochians, who were of the same name with himself. So when the Jews that dwelt about mount Carmel came to Antigonus, and were ready to march with him into Judea, Antigonus hoped to get some part of the souls of their assistance. But it was called Drymina; and when some others came and met them, the men privately fell upon Jeru- salem; and when some more came to them they got together in great numbers, and came against the temple, and set fire to it. But as Phasaeus's and Herod's party came to the other's assistance, and a battle happened be- tween them in the market-place, the young men believed that Phasaeus had destroyed the temple, and sent some armed men into the ad- joining houses to keep them in, who yet being destitute of such as should support them, were burnt, and the houses with them, by the people who were just met with, burned together. But Herod was revenged on these seditious adversaries of his a little afterward for this injury they had offered him, when he fought with them, and slew a great number of them. 4. There were daily skirmishes, the enemy waited for the coming of the multitude out of the country to Pentecost, a feast of ours so called; and when that day was come, many ten thousands of the people were gathered to- gether about the temple, some in, some in the temple, and sent some armed men into the ad- joining houses to keep them in, who yet being destitute of such as should support them, were burnt, and the houses with them, by the people who were just met with, burned together. But Herod was revenged on these seditious adversaries of his a little afterward for this injury they had offered him, when he fought with them, and slew a great number of them.
harm, complied with his proposal, while Herod did not give his consent to what was done, because he feared the pernicious consequence of one barbarian, but desired Phæusæus rather to fight those that were come into the city.

8. So both Hycranus and Phæusæus went on the horse's charge; but Pæcon left with Herod a hundred horsemen, and ten men were called The Freemen; and conducted the others on their journey; and when they were in Galilee, the governors of the cities there met them at first with show of kindness; but when they heard that Antipater hastened to give the Parthians use a thousand talents, and five hundred women, to assist him against them, they soon had a suspicion of the barbarians. Moreover, there was one who informed them that snares were laid for them, but when they had done them no injury, they had then been seized upon, had they not waited for the seizure of Herod by the Parthians that were about Jerusalem, lest upon the slaughter of Hycranus and Phæusæus, he should have an opportunity of destroying them. And these were the circumstances they were now in, and they saw who they were that guarded them. Some persons indeed would have persuaded the Parthians to fly away immediately on horseback, and not attempt to go to Scepsis. One of them was one Ophelius, who, above all the rest, was earnest with him to do so, for he had heard of this treachery from Seneclus, the richest of all the Syrians at that time, who also promised to provide him ships to carry him off; for the sea was just by them: but he had no mind to desert Hycranus, nor bring his brother into danger; but he went to Barzosphanes, and told him he did not intend to desert Hycranus to give the Parthians the chance against them, for that if he wanted money, he would give him more than Antigonus; and besides, that it was a horrible thing to slay those that came to him upon the security of their oaths, and that what they had done was upon injury. But the barbarian, aware that he was to truth in any of his suspicions, but that he was troubled with nothing but false proposals, and then went away to Pæconus.

9. Nos. Pæconus, allabe away, some men came and bound Hycranus and Phæusæus, while Phæusæus greatly reproached the Parthians for their perjury. However, that butcher who was sent against Herod, had it in command to get him. It was the king's matter to send him; but messengers had been sent by Phæusæus to inform Herod of the perniciousness of the Parthians: and when he knew that the enemy had seized upon him, he went to Pæconus, and to the last postest of the Parthians, and to the rest of the Parthians, who, although they knew the whole matter, dissembled with him in a deceitful way, and said "that he ought to get out with them before the Parthians came; that he had to him, but not to others also; and the daughter of Hycranus, whose daughter he had espoused, was his minister also (not to credit them,) which made him still more suspicions of the Parthians, for although other people did not give him any more, yet did he believe her a woman of very great wisdom.

7. Now while the Parthians were in consultation what was fit to be done, for they did not think it fit to throw away a person of his character; and while they put off the determination until the next day, Herod was under great disturbance of mind; and rather inclining to believe the reports he had heard about his brother, and the Parthians, he determined to what was said on the other side, he determined that when the evening came on, he would make use of it for his flight, and not make say longer delay, as if they feared from the Parthians that it was yet certain. He therefore removed with the armed men whom he had with him; and set his wives upon the beasts, as also his mother and sister, and her whom he was about to marry, [Marseenne] the daughter of Aristobulus, and his youngest brother, and all their servants, and the vest of the multitude that was with him, and without the enemies' privy, passed his way in the midst of his troops, and made a circuit of Aristobulus, with his mother, the daughter of Hycranus, and his youngest brother, and all their servants, and the rest of the multitude that was with him, and without the enemies' privy, passed his way in the midst of his troops, and made a circuit of Aristobulus, with his mother, the daughter of Hycranus, and his youngest brother, and all their servants, and the rest of the multitude that was with him, and without the enemies' privy, passed his way in the midst of his troops, and made a circuit of Aristobulus, with his mother, the daughter of Hycranus, and his youngest brother, and all their servants, and the rest of the multitude that was with him, and without the enemies' privy, passed his way in the midst of his troops, and made a circuit of Aristobulus, with his mother, the daughter of Hycranus, and his youngest brother, and all their servants, and the rest of the multitude that was with him, and without the enemies' privy, passed his way in the midst of his troops, and made a circuit of Aristobulus, with his mother, the daughter of Hycranus, and his youngest brother, and all their servants, and the rest of the multitude that was with him, and without the enemies' privy, passed his way in the midst of his troops, and made a circuit of Aristobulus, with his mother, the daughter of Hycranus, and his youngest brother, and all their servants, and the rest of the multitude that was with him, and without the enemies' privy, passed his way in the midst of his troops, and made a circle round about it, and called it Herodius. And when he was come to Iдумæa, at a place called Thessalon, his brother Joseph met him, and he then held a council to take advice about all his affairs, and what was to be done in his circumstances, since he had a great multitude that followed him, besides his mercenaries, soldiers, and the place Massada, whither he promised to fly, was too small to contain so great a multitude; so he saw it was to be done. He had been above nine thousand, and bade them go some one way, and some another, and to save

Chapter XIII.

How Antony made Herod and Phasaelus to trache after they had been accused to no purpose; and how the Parthians, when they brought Antigonus into Judea, took Hyrcanus and Phanuelus captives. Herod's Flight; and what afflictions Hyrcanus and Phasaelus endured.

§ 1. When, after this, Antony came into Syria, Cleopatra met him in Cilicia, and brought him to fall in love with her. And there came now also a hundred of the most potent of the Jews to accuse Herod and those about him, and set the men of the greatest eloquence among them to beseech Antony to remove Messala, on the death of the young men. But he was in the presence of Hyrcanus, who was Herod's father-in-law already. When Antony had heard both sides of the case, he asked Hyrcanus who they were that had brought in the nation against him, and against Herod and his friends. Herewith Antony, by reason of the old hospitable friendship he had made with his father [Antipater,] at that time when he was with Gabinius, he made both Herod and Phasaelus tetrarchs, and committed the public affairs of the Jews to them, and wrote letters to that purpose. He also bound fifteen of their adversaries, and was going to kill them, but that Herod obtained their pardon.

But the Jews did not cease quiet when they were come back, but a thousand of the Jews came to Tyre to meet him there, whether the report was that he would come. But Antony was corrupted by the money which Herod and his friends gave him, and he was ordered by the governor of the place to punish the Jewish ambassadors, who were for making innovations, and to settle the government upon Herod; but Herod went out hastily to them, and Hyrcanus was not in the city, but in the camp (before the city,) and he charged them to go their ways, because great mischief would befal them if they went on with their accusation. But they did not acquiesce; whereupon the Romans ran upon them with their numbers, and slew some. We may here take notice, that Byrcanus being here called father-in-law to Herod, be- and wounded more of them, and the rest fled away and went home, and lay still in great consterna tion: and when the people made a clamor against Herod, Antony was so provoked at it that he slew the prisoners.

§ 2. And this was the opinion of Herod's crown, Pocorus, the king of Parthis's son, and Barzapharisses, a commander of the Parthians, possessed themselves of Syria. Polemy, the son of Menneus, also was now dead, and Lysonias his son took his government. And we must also believe, that they would take the government away from Hyrcanus, and bestow it upon him, and withal kill Herod. And although he did not give them what he had promised, yet did the Parthians make an expense into Judea, and conveyed Antigonus with them. Pocorus went along the maritime parts, but the commander Barzapharisses through the midland. Now the Tyrians concluded with Pocorus, but those of Plemestines received him. However, Pocorus sent a troop of horsemen into Judea, to take a view of the state of the country, and to assist Antigonus; and sent also the king's butcher, to be able to give credit to the multitude of Jews that dwelt about mount Carmel came to Antigonus, and were ready to march with him into Judea, Antigonus hoped to get some part of the country by their assistance. The place is called Baptism of Pella. But when some other of their own met them, the men privately fell upon Jerusalem; and when some more were come to them they got together in great numbers, and came against the king's palace and besieged it. But as they were making their way to Herod's party, and to his other's assistance, and a battle happened between them in the market-place, the young men beat their enemies, and pursued them into the temple, and sent some armed men into the adjoining houses to keep them in, yet were with one, as should support them, were burnt, and the houses with them, by the people who rose up against them. But Herod was enraged on these seditions, and sent the soldiers into the temple, and they they had offered him, when he fought with them, and slew a great number of them.

§ 4. But while there were daily skirmishes, the emperor had sent a letter out of the country to Pentecost, a feast of ours so called: and when that day was come, many ten thousand of the people were gathered together about the temple, some in armor, and some without. Now those that came, guarded both the temple and the city, excepting what belonged to the palace, which Herod guarded with a few of his soldiers: and Phasaelus had the charge of the wall, while Herod, with a body of his men, went out upon the battlements of the suburbs, and fought courageously, and put many ten thousands to flight, some flying into the city, and some into the temple, and some into the outer fortifications, for some such fortifications there were in those times. And Phasaelus came also to his assistance; yet was Pocorus, the general of the Parthians, at the desire of Antigonus, admitted into the city, with a few of his horsemen, under pretense indeed as if he would still maintain and assist Antigonus in obtaining the government. And when Phasaelus met him, and received him kindly, Pocorus persuaded him to go himself as ambassador to Barzapharisses, which was done fraudulently, and with intent to deceive Phasaelus, suspecting no cause his grandson Maranasso was betrothed to him, although the marriage was not completed till four years afterwards. harm, complied with his proposal, while Herod did not give his consent to what was done, because of the perfidies of these barbarians, but desired Phæsælus rather to fight those that were come into the city.

5. So both Hyrceanus and Phæsælus went on the engagement; butMarcus left with Herod two hundred horsemen, and the first of the armed men whom he had with him; and set his wife upon the beasts, as also his mother and sister, and Bar whom he was about to marry, [Mærenæ] the son of Alexander the son of Aristobulus, with her mother, the daughter of Hyrceanus, and his youngest brother, and all their servants, and the rest of the multitude that was with him, and without the enemies' privy, pur- sued his way to Jerusalem; but Herod gave the word to his sons, who then saw him in this case, be so hard- hearted, but would have commiserated his fortune, while the women drew along their infant children, and left their own country, and their friends in prison, with grief; for they had then been seized upon, had they not waited for the seizure of Herod by the Parthians that were about Jerusalem, lest upon the slaug- ther of Hyrceanus and Phæsælus, he should have an occasion to lay hold upon them; And these were the circumstances they were now in, and they saw who they were that guarded them. Some persons indeed would have persuaded Phæsælus to fly away immediately on discovering their weakness, but the person that was one Ophellius, who, above all the rest, was earnest with him to do so, for he had heard of this treachery from Sarmassals, the richest of all the Syræs that at that time, who was also promised the provinces to carry his chief; for he was in the sea just by them; but he had no mind to desert Hyrceanus, nor bring his brother into danger; but he went to Barzapharnes, and told him he did not think he would be able to offer any resis- tance against them, for that if he wanted money, he would give him more than Antigonus; and be- sides, that it was a horrible thing to say those that came to him upon the security of their oaths, and that when they had done so, to refuse; But the barbarian swore to him that there was not truth in any of his suspicions, but that he was troubled with nothing but false proposals, and then went away to Barzapharnes.

6. So Ophellius was gone away, some men came and bound Hyrceanus and Phæsælus, while Phæsælus greatly reproached the Parthians for their perjury. However, that butcher who was sent against Herod, had it in command to get him and Phæsælus together, as the armed men had not been sent with him; but messengers had been sent by Phæsælus to inform Herod of the perfidies of the Parthians: and when he knew that the enemy had seized upon him, he went to Marcus, and to the rest of the Parthians, as to the lords of the rest, who, although they knew the whole matter, were not disposed with him in a deceitful way; and said that he ought to go out with them before him, and command those that bring- ing him his Liburnians, that they were not to give him any assistance; but were coming to give him an account of the good success Phæsælus had had.

Herod did not give credit to what they said, but sent under cover of a great multitude to his wife, and this was the same, to Phæsælus, and the monitor also (not to credit it,) which made him still more suspicious of the Parthians, for although other people did not give heed to her, yet did he believe her as a woman of very great wisdom.

7. Now while the Parthians were in consultation what it was fit to be done; for they did not think it had been so, to send away a person of his character; and while they put off the determination until the next day, Herod was under great disturbance of mind; and rather in- clicking to believe the reports he had heard about his brother and the Parthians, that he gave the word to what was said on the other side, he determined that when the evening came on, he would make use of it for his flight, and not make any longer delay, as if the dangers from the enemy were not yet certain. He therefore removed with the armed men whom he had with him; and set his wife upon the beasts, as also his mother and sister, and Bar whom he was about to marry, [Mærenæ] the son of Alexander the son of Aristobulus, with her mother, the daughter of Hyrceanus, and his youngest brother, and all their servants, and the rest of the multitude that was with him, and without the enemies' privy, pur- sued his way to Jerusalem; but Herod gave the word to his sons, who then saw him in this case, be so hard- hearted, but would have commiserated his fortune, while the women drew along their infant children, and left their own country, and their friends in prison, with grief; for they had then been seized upon, had they not waited for the seizure of Herod by the Parthians that were about Jerusalem, lest upon the slaugthemselves in idleness, and gave them what would buy them provisions on their journey; but he took with him those that were the least encumbered, and were most intimate with him, and came to the fortress, and placed there his wives and daughters, being eight hundred in number, there being in the place a sufficient quantity of corn and water, and other necessaries, and went directly for Petra, in Arabia. But when it was day, the Parthians plundered all Jerusalem, and the palace; and abstained from nothing, but Hycranus's money, which was three hundred talents. A great deal of Herod's money escaped, and principally all that the man had been so provident as to send into idums before-hand; and what was left in the city suffered the Parthians, but they went out into the country, and plundered it, and demolished the city of Masada.

10. And thus was Antigonus brought back into Judea by the king of the Parthians, and received Hycranus and Phasaelus for his prisoners; but he was greatly cast down because the women had escaped, whom he intended to have given the enemy, as having promised they should have them alive, for their reward; but being afraid that Hycranus, who was under the guard of the Parthians, might have his kingdom restored to him by the multitude, he cut off his ears, and thereby took care that the high priests should never come to him any more; because he was maimed, while the law required that this dignity should belong to none but such as had all their members entire. But now one cannot but here admire the fortitude of Phasaeus, who, expecting that he was to be put to death, did not think death any terrible thing at all; but to die thus by the means of his enemy, this he thought a most pitiable and dishonorable thing, and therefore, since he had not his hands and feet, in order to prevent him from killing himself thereby, he dashed his head against a great stone, and thereby took away his own life, which he thought to be the best thing he could do in such a distress as he was in, and thereby put it out of the power of the enemy to bring him to any death he pleased. It is also reported, that when he had made a great wound in his head, Antigonus sent physicians to cure it, and to induce the poison into the wound, killed him. However, Phasaelus hearing, before he was quite dead, by a certain woman, that his brother Herod had escaped the enemy, underwent his death cheerfully, and now left behind him one who would revenge his death, and who was able to inflict punishment on his enemies.

CHAP. XIV.

How Herod got away from the King of Arabia, and made haste to go into Egypt, and thence went away in Haste also to Rome; and how, by promising a great deal of Money to Antony, he obtained of the Senate and of Caesar to be made King of the Jews.

11. As for Herod, the great miseries he was as did not discourage him, but made him sharper and more surprised under his misfortunes; for he went to Malches, king of Arabia, whom he had formerly been very kind to, in order to receive somewhat by way of requital, now he was in more than ordinary want of it, and desired he should be sent a sum of money by the way of loan, or as his free gift, on account of the many hardships he had received from him; for not knowing what was become of his brother, he was in haste to redeem him out of the hands of his enemies, as willing to give three hundred talents for the price of his redemption. He sate took with him the son of Phasaelus, who was a child of but seven years of age, for this reason, that he might be a hostage for the repayment of the money; and to cause strangers from Malches to meet him, by whom he was desired to be gone, for that the Parthians had laid a charge upon him not to entertain Herod. This was only a pretence which he made use of, that he might not be obliged to repay him what he owed him; and this he was further induced to by the principal men among the Arabians, that they might cheat him of what some they had received from his [father] Antipater, and so he wrote, and told them that they had what was in the city sufficient for the Parthians, but they went out into the country, and plundered it, and demolished the city of Masada.

2. Herod soon resolved to go away, and did go very prudently the road to Egypt; and then it was that he lodged in a certain temple, for he had left a great many of his followers there. On the next day, he received a pontifical robed in priestly vestments, and made answer, that he did not intend to be troublesome to them by his coming thither, but that he desired only to discourse with them about certain affairs that were to him of the greatest importance. He

3. So he set sail from thence to Paphlagonia, and, falling into a violent storm, he had much need to escape to Rhodes, with the loss of the ship's burden; and there it was that two of his friends, Sapphas and Ptolemaeus, met with him; and as he found that city very much damaged in the war against Cassius, though he were in need of money, he sent for them, and desired they would supply him with their means, but did what he could to recover it to its former state. He also built there a three-decked ship, and set sail thence, with his friends, for Italy, and came to the port of Brundisium; and here he left behind him one who was related to Anthony what had befallen him in Judea, and how Phasaelus, his brother, was seized on by the Parthians, and put to death by them; and how Hycranus was detained captive by them, and how they made Antigonus king, who had promised them a sum of money, no less than a thousand talents, with five hundred women, who were to be of the principal families, and of the Jewish stock, and that he had carried off the money, and had understood that by understanding that he could perform many hardships, he had escaped the hands of his enemies; as also, that his own relations were in danger of being besieged and taken and that he had sailed through a storm, and contended with these terrible dangers, in order to come as soon as possible to him, who was his hope and only succor at this time.

4. This account made Antony commiserate him, and desired Cassius to be in a more suitable condition; and renewing with himself that there was a common case among those that are placed in such great dignities, and that they are liable to the miscarriages that come from fortune, he was the time when he began his second reign, without a rival, upon the conquest and slaughter of Antigonus, both principally derived from this and the two next chapters in Josephus, see the note at sect. 6, and chap. xiv. sect. 10.
very easily to give him the assistance he desired, and this because he called to mind the friendship he had had with Antipater, because Herod offered him money to make him king, as he had formerly given him to make him tetrarch, and the chief because of his hatred to Antigonus, for he took him to be a seditious person, and an enemy to the Romans. Caesar was also the forerunner to raise Herod's dignity, and to give him his friends, and to show in what he deserved the toils of war which he had himself undergone with Antipater his father in Egypt, and of the hospitality he had treated him withal, and the kindness he had always showed him, and to grant him what was very unsuitable for Herod. So a senate was convened; and Massala, first, and then Attalus, introduced Herod into it, and enlarged upon the benefits they had received from him, and put him in good-will with borne to the Romans. At the same time they accused Antigonus, and declared him as enemy, not only because of his former opposition to them, but that he had now overlooked the Romans, and taken the government from the Parthians. Upon this the senate was irritated: and Antony informed them further, that it was for their advantage in the Parthian war that Herod should be king. This seemed good to all the senators, and they declared him, and by this act relieved him. 5. And this was the principal instance of Antony's affection for Herod, that he not only procured him a kingdom which he did not expect, but also the consulate for the Romans, which would grant him, who used to belong it on some of the royal family, but intended to desire it for his wife's brother, who was grandson by his father to Aristobulus, and to Hyrcanus, and to be preferred to him so suddenly that he obtained what he did not expect, and departed out of Italy in so few days as in seven. This young man [the grandson] Herod afterward took care to have slain, as we shall show, when he was in place, when the senate was dissolved, Antony and Caesar went out of the senate-house, with Herod between them, and with the consuls and other magistrates; he was in order to declare his freedom, and to lay up their decrees in the capsule. Antony accused Herod the first day of his reign. And thus did this man receive the kingdom, having obtained it on the hundred and eighty-fourth Olympiad, and was thereupon pursued by the Jews, Herod fell upon them with a small body of men, and both put the Jews to flight and saved Silo, when he was very poorly able to defend himself; and the same year, when Herod took the consulate, he set free those of his family that were in Massada. Now of the people of the country, some joined him because of the friendship they had had with his father, and some because of his praises he made, and others by way of requital for the benefits they had received from both of them, but the greatest number came to him in hopes of getting something from him afterward, for he was one of the firmly settling. 2. Herod had now a strong army; and as he marched on, Antigonus laid snares and ambushed in the passes and places most proper for them, but in truth he thereby did little or no damage to the enemy; so Herod received those of his family out of Massada, and the fortress Rome, and then went on to Jerusalem. The soldiers also that was with Silo accompanied him all along, as did many of the citizens, being afraid of his power; as soon as he had pitched his camp on the west side of the city, the soldiers that were set to guard that part shot their arrows, and threw their darts at him; and when some enwrapped in a crowd, and came to fight with him, but he made the men retire, and the army, he gave orders that they should, in the first place, make proclamation about the wall that "he came for the good of the people, and for the preservation of the city, and not to any other end, but to make his most open enemies, but ready to forget the offences which his greatest adversaries had done him." But Antigonus, by way of reply to what Herod had caused to be proclaimed, and this before the Romans, and before Silo also, said, "That they would not do justly, if they gave the kingdom to Herod, who was no more than a private man, and an Idumæan, mentioned both here, and Of the War, b. i. ch. xv. 29. 1, is an indication that it was new summer times." mean, i.e. a half Jew, whereas they ought to bestow it on one of the royal family, as their custom was; for in that case they at present bare an ill-will to him, and had resolved to deprive him of the kingdom, as having received it from the Parthians, yet there were many others of his family that might by their help take it, and these such as had noway offended the Romans, and being of their sacerdotal family, it would be an unworthy thing to put them by. Now, while they said thus one to another, and fell to reproaching one another on their base conduct, Silo permitted his own men that were upon the wall to defend themselves, who using their bows, and showing great sincerity against their enemies, saved them from the danger; but when they brought over to him all Gallure, excepting those that dwelt in the caves, and distributed money to every one of his soldiers, giving them a hundred and fifty drachmas, and much more, and sent them into winter-quarters: at which time Silo came to him, and his commanders with him, because Antigonus would not give them provisions any longer, for he supplied them for no more than one month: now, he could not have continued this, but to have made them carry off the provisions that were there, and retire to the mountains, that the Romans might have no provisions to live upon, and so might perish by famine: but Herod commissiated the whole of the provisions that were there, which he brought to his brother, and ordered him to repair Alexandria also. Accordingly, he quickly made the soldiers abound with great plenty of provisions, and rebuilt Alexandria, which had been before desolate.

5. About this time it was that Antony continued some time at Athens, and that Ventidius, who was now in Syria, sent for Silo, and commanded him to prepare himself to fight against the Romans, that they might finish the present war, and then to send for their confederates, for the war they were themselves engaged in: but as for Herod, he went in great haste against the robbers that were in the caves, and sent Silo away to Ventidius, while he marched against them. These caves were in mountains, that were exceedingly abrupt, and in their middle were no other than precipices, with certain entrances into the caves, and those caves were so low and narrow, and so covered with thorns, that the robbers did lie concealed, with all their families about them; but the king caused certain chest to be made, in order to destroy them, and to be hung down, bound about with iron chains, and made clean by the sun; and, as he was not being possible to get up to them, by reason of the sharp ascent of the mountains, nor to creep down to them from above. Now these chests were filled with armed men, who had long hooks in their hands, by which they might pull out such as resisted them, and then tumble them down, and kill them by so doing; but the letting the chest down proved to be a matter of great danger, because of the vast depth there was to be let down, although they had their provisions in the chests themselves: but when the chests were let down, and not one of those in the mouth of the caves durst come near them, but lay still, and one of the men of the arm, by and by, the other, which were held by the garrisons of Antigonus; and he passed on to Sephoria, as God sent a snow, while Antigonus's garrisons withdrew themselves, and had great plenty of provisions. He also went thence, and resolved to destroy those robbers that dwell in the caves, and did much mischief in the country: so he sent a troop of horsemen, and three companies of armed footmen, against them. They were very near to a village called Arbela; and on the fortieth day after, he came himself with his whole army; and as the enemy rallied and boldly upon him, the left wing of his army gave way, but the king, with his own forces, and Antigonus to fight who were already conquerors, and recalled his men that ran away. He also pressed upon his enemies, and pursued them as far as the river Jordan, though he thought them a different people from the others he had brought over to him all Gallure, excepting those that dwelt in the caves, and distributed money to every one of his soldiers, giving them a hundred and fifty drachmas each, and much more, and sent them into winter-quarters: at which time Silo came to him, and his commanders with him, because Antigonus would not give them provisions any longer, for he supplied them for no more than one month: now, he could not have continued this, but to have made them carry off the provisions that were there, and retire to the mountains, that the Romans might have no provisions to live upon, and so might perish by famine: but Herod commissiated the whole of the provisions that were there, which he brought to his brother, and ordered him to repair Alexandria also. Accordingly, he quickly made the soldiers abound with great plenty of provisions, and rebuilt Alexandria, which had been before desolate.

5. About this time it was that Antony continued some time at Athens, and that Ventidius, who was now in Syria, sent for Silo, and commanded him to prepare himself to fight against the Romans, that they might finish the present war, and then to send for their confederates, for the war they were themselves engaged in: but as for Herod, he went in great haste against the robbers that were in the caves, and sent Silo away to Ventidius, while he marched against them. These caves were in mountains, that were exceedingly abrupt, and in their middle were no other than precipices, with certain entrances into the caves, and those caves were so low and narrow, and so covered with thorns, that the robbers did lie concealed, with all their families about them; but the king caused certain chest to be made, in order to destroy them, and to be hung down, bound about with iron chains, and made clean by the sun; and, as he was not being possible to get up to them, by reason of the sharp ascent of the mountains, nor to creep down to them from above. Now these chests were filled with armed men, who had long hooks in their hands, by which they might pull out such as resisted them, and then tumble them down, and kill them by so doing; but the letting the chest down proved to be a matter of great danger, because of the vast depth there was to be let down, although they had their provisions in the chests themselves: but when the chests were let down, and not one of those in the mouth of the caves durst come near them, but lay still, and one of the men of the arm, by and by, the other, which were held by the garrisons of Antigonus; and he passed on to Sephoria, as God sent their darts and afterward pulled those to them that resisted them with their hands and tumbled them down the precipice, and afterward went into the caves, and killed many more, and then went into their chests again, and lay still there; but upon this, terror seized the rest, when they saw this, and would not venture. The desolation of this day was made use of the next day; and they went farther, and got out in baskets to fight them, and fought them at their doors, and sent fire among them, and set their caves on fire, for there was a great deal of bones and dead men in them. Now there was one old man, who was caught within one of these caves, with seven children and a wife; these prayed him to give them leave to go out, and yield themselves up to the enemy; but he could not leave his wife, and said that he had destroyed them every one; and after that he slew his wife, and cast their dead bodies down the precipice, and himself after them; and so under- went with much misfortune the like plight, as those that he had done he, who reaped this spoil, which he did this, he greatly reproached Herod with the meanness of his family, although he was then king. Herod also saw what he was doing, and stretched out his hand, and offered him all manner of kindness, and desired he would come with him; and all these caves were at length subdued entirely.

6. And when the king had set Pteleony over these parts of the country as his general, he went to Samaria, with six hundred horsemen, and three thousand armed men, and prepared to fight Antigonus. But still this command of the army did not succeed well with Pteleony, but those that had been troublesome to Galilee before, thereabouts, didlew him; and when they had done this, they fled and passed away, and places almost inaccessible, laying waste and plundering whatsoever they could come at in those places. But Herod soon returned, and pursued them as the most contemptible foes; for some of these rebels he slew, and others of them, who had fled to the strong holds, he besieged, and both slew them, and demolished their strong holds: and when he had thus put an end to their resistance he laid a fine upon the cities of a hundred talents.

7. In the mean time Pctorus was fallen in a battle, and the Parthians were defeated. When Vendidius sent Macerus to the assistance of Herod, and to the city of Emmaus, while Antony encouraged him to make haste. But Macerus, at the instigation of Antigonus, without the approbation of Herod, as being corrupted by money, went about to take a view of his affairs; but Antony suspecting this intention of his coming, did not admit him into the city, but kept him at a distance, with throwing stones at him, and plainly showed what he himself meant. But when Macerus was sensible that Herod had given him to understand that he had made a mistake himself in not hearkening to that advice, he retired to the city of Emmaus; and what Jews he met with he slew them, whether they were enemies or friends, out of the rage he was in at what hardships he had undergone. The king was provoked at this conduct of his, and went to Samarla, and resolved to go to Antony about these affairs, and to inform him that he stood in need of such helpers, who did him more mischief than they did his enemies, and that he was able of himself to beat Antigonus; but Macerus followed him, and desired that he would not go to Antony, or, if he was resolved to go, he would join his brother Joseph with him, and let them fight against Antigonus. So he was reconciled to Macerus, upon his earnest entreaties. Accordingly he left Joseph there with his army, but sent to run no hazards, nor to quarrel with Macerus.

8. But for his own part he made haste to Antony, (who was then at the siege of Samosata, a place upon Euphrates,) with his troops, both horse and foot. When he came, he found that the barbarians fell upon men on the road, and slew many, so he en- couraged them, and became their conductor upon the road. Now when they were within two days march of Samosata, the barbarians had laid an ambush there to disturb those that came to An- tony; and the way was very narrow, as they led to the plains, there they laced not a few of their horsemen, who were to lie still until those passengers were gone by into the wide place. Now as soon as their first ranks were gone before, they fell upon them on the sudden, and when they had put the foremost to flight, the king came riding hard with the forces that were about him, and put many of them to flight, which means he made the minds of his own men courageous, and emboldened them to go on, in so much that those who ran away before, now re- turned back, and the barbarians were slain on all sides. The king also was not wanting to recover all the baggage; among which were many, slay on beasts for burden, and of slaves, and proceeded on in his march; and whereas there were a very great number of those in the woods that had passed away the passage that led into the plain, he made a sally upon these also with a strong body of men, and put them to flight, and slew many of them, and thereby rendered the way safe for those that came after; and called these Herod their savior and protector.

9. And when he was near to Samosata, Antony sent out his army in all their proper habiliments, to meet him; and his army, and pay Herod the respect, and because of the assistance he had given him, for he had heard what attacks the barbarians had made upon him (in Judea.) He also was very glad to see him there, as having been made acquainted with the great activity that had been formed upon the road; so he entertained him very kindly, and could not but admire his courage. Antony also embraced him as soon as he saw him, and saluted him after a most affectionate manner, and having himself lately made him a king; and in a little time Antiochus delivered up the fortress, and on that account this war was at an end; then Antony committed the rest to Sosius, and gave him orders to assist Herod, and went him- self to Egypt. Accordingly, Sosius sent two legions before into Judea to the assistance of Her- od, and he followed himself with the body of the army.

10. Now Joseph was already slain in Judea, in the manner following: he forgot what charge his brother Herod had given him when he went to Antony; and when he had pitched his camp among the mountains, for Macerus had lent him five regiments, with which he was rich, in order to reap the corn thereto belonging: and as the Roman regiments were but nearly raised, and were unskillful in war, for they were in great part collected out of Syria, he was at- tacked by the enemy, and caught in those places of difficulty, and was himself slain, as he was fighting bravely and the whole army was lost; for there were six regiments slain. So when Antigonus had got possession of the dead bodies, he cut off Joseph's head, although Pharamas his brother would have redeemed it at the price of fifty talents. After which defeat, the Galileans revolted from their commanders, and took those of Herod's party, and drowned them in the lake, and a great part of Judea was become seditions; but Machernus fortified the place Gitta [in Samaria.]

11. At this time messengers came to Herod, and informed him of what had been done; and when he was coming to Depehas by Atamim, that was told him of the ill fortune that had befallen his brother; which yet he expected from certain visions that appeared to him in his dreams, which clearly foreshowed his brother's death. So with great haste he had his march; and when he came up to mount Libanus, he received about eight hundred of the men of that place, having already with him also one Roman legion, and with these came to Ptolemia. He also marched thence by night to Neapolis, this was the castle of Galilea. Here it was that the enemy met him, and fought him, and were beaten, and shut up in the same place of strength whence they had saluted the day before. So he attacked the place in the morning by reason of a great storm that was then very violent, he was able to do nothing, but drew off his army into the neighboring villages; yet as soon as the other legion that Antony sent him was come to his assistance, and they were in the place which was not near, the place were afraid, and deserted in the night-time. Then did the king march hastily to Jericho, intending to average himself on the enemy for the slaughter of his brother; and when he had pitched his tent, he kept his hand on the principal commanders, and after this collision was over, and he had dismissed his guests, he retired to his own chamber; and here one may see that it was good for the king, for the upper part of the house fell down when nobody was in it, and so killed none, insomuch that all the people believed that Herod was beloved of God, since he had escaped such a great and surprising attack.

12. But the next day six thousand of the enemy came down from the tops of the mountains to sight the Romans, which greatly terrified them; and the soldiers that were in light armor came near the ends of the king, and being in the great come out with darts and stones, and one of them hit him on the side with a dart. Antigonus also sent a commander against Samaria, whose name was Pappus, with some forces, being desirous to show how potent he was, and that he had men to spare in his war with them: he set down to oppose Machernus; but Herod, when he had taken five cities, took such as were left in them, being about two thousand, and slew them, and burnt the cities, and returned and then returned to go against Pappus, who was encamped at a village called Isana; and there ran in to him many out of Jericho and Judea, near to which places he was, and the enemy fell upon his men, so stout were they at this time, and joined battle with them, but he beat them in the fight; and in order to be revenged on them for the slaughter of his brother, he pursued them shame as they went away; and as the houses were full of armed men, and many of them ran as far as the tops of the houses, they got them under his power, and pulled down the roofs of the houses, and saw the lower rooms full of dead men, and fires were caught, and lay all on a heap: so they threw stones down upon them as they lay piled one upon another, and thereby killed them: nor was there a more frightful spectacle in all the war than this, where beyond the walls an immense multitude of dead men lay heaped one upon another. This action it was which chiefly broke the spirits of the enemy.

* It may be worth our observation here, that there soldiers of Herod could not have gotten upon the tops of those houses, as it was full of men, in order to pull up the upper doors, and destroy them beneath, but by who expected now what would come, for there appeared a mighty number of people that came from places far distant, that were now about the village, but then ran away, and had if it had been for the depth of winter, which then restrained them, the king's army had presently gone to Jerusalem, as being very courageous at this good success. But now, as he was moved, and particularly, for Antigonus was already looking about how he might by way, and leave the city.

13. At this time the king gave order that the soldiers should go to supper, for it was late at night; but while he was in the upper room, he bid the man who was his chamberlain to bring him a bath, for he was very weary; and here it was that he was in the greatest danger, which yet, by God's providence, he escaped; for as he was naked, and had but one servant that followed him, and even when he was in the upper room, he was in the inner room, certain of the enemy, who were in their armor, and bad fled thither out of fear, were then in the place; and as he was bathing, the first of them came out with his naked sword and smote and wounding the doors, and after that a second said a third, armed in like manner, and were under such a consternation, that they did no hurt to the king, and thought themselves to have come off very well in suffering no harm to him. However, on the next day, he cut off the head of Pappus, for he was already slain, and sent it to Pharaoh, as a punishment of what their brother had suffered by his means, for he was the mess that killed him.

14. When the rigor of winter was over, Herod removed his army, and came near to Jerusalem, and pitched his camp hard by the sea. Now this was the same day that he had been crowned king at Rome; and as he removed his camp, and came near that part of the wall where it could be most easily assaulted, he pitched that camp before the temple, intending to make his attacks in that manner as did Ptolemy so long as he compassed the place with three bulwarks, and erected towers, and employed a great many hands about the work, and cut down the trees that were round about the city; and when he had finished the work, he did not proceed with the other works, even while the army lay before the city he himself went to Samaria, to complete his marriage, and to take to wife the daughter of Alexander, the son of Aristobulus; for he had betrothed her already, as I have before related.

CHAP. XVI.

How Herod, when he had married Mariamne, took Jerusalem, with the Assistance of Sosius, by Forces; and how the Government of the Ammonites was put an end to.

§ 1. After the wedding was over, came Sosius through Phoenicia, having sent out his army before him over the midland parts. He also, who was their commander, came himself with a great number of horsemen and footmen. The king also came himself from Samaria and brought his army with him. These were now about thirty thousand, and they all met together at the walls of Jerusalem, and encamped at the north wall of the city, being now an army of eleven legions, and they were besieged within the walls with other auxiliaries out of Syria. The generals were two, Sosius, sent by Antony to assist Herod, and Herod on his own account, in order to take the government from Antigonus, who was declared an enemy to Rome, and that he might himself be king, according to the decree of the senate.

ladders from the outside; which illustrates some texts in the New Testament, by which it appears that some used to ascend the walls of the temple in order to pull up the upper doors, and destroy them beneath, but by BOOK XIV.—CHAP. XVI.

2. Now the Jews that were enclosed within the walls of the city fought against Herod with great slendour and zeal, (for the whole nation was gathered together;) they also gave out many prophecies about the temple, and many things agreeable to the people, as if God would deliver them out of the dangers they were in; they had also carried off what was out of the city, that they might not leave any thing to afford sustenance to them for the past private robberies, they made the want of necessaries greater. When Herod understood this, he opposed ambushes in the finest places against the army lying about, and sent agents disguised among men to bring in provisions, without being from remote places, so that in a little time they had great plenty of provisions. Now the three bulwarks were easily erected, because so many hands were employed in their raising, and when it was summer-time, and there was nothing to hinder their works, neither from the air, nor from the workmen; so they brought their engines to bear, and shook the walls of the city, and tried to drive them out. They also did not those within discover any fear, but they also continued not a few engines to oppose their engines withal. They also sallied out, and burnt not only those engines that were not yet perfected, but also many of the Roman men, in order to prove that, hand to hand, their attempts were not less bold than those of the Romans, though they were behind them in skill. They also erected new walls, and as the former were ruined, and, making mines under ground, the place was taken by them. And when they fought there, and, making use of brutish courage rather than of prudent valor, they persisted in this war to the very last; and this they did while they might take away in the cities, and towns and villages, those that were distressed by famine, and the want of necessaries, for this happened to be a sabbatical year. The first that scaled the walls were twenty chosen men, the next were Sosius's centurions, and four years, and the second in fifteen more, when some of the cloisters that were about the temple were burnt, which Herod gave out to have been burnt by Antigonus, in order to expose him to the hated name of traitor. And as Antigonus made all the space of the temple, and the lower city, were, the Jews fled into the inner court of the temple, and into the upper city; but now, fearing lest the Romans should hinder them from offering their daily sacrifices, Herod, by the advice of the Senate, and desired that they would only permit them to bring in beasts for sacrifices, which Herod granted, hoping they were going to yield; but when he saw that they did nothing of what he supposed, but bitterly opposed him, in order to preserve the kingdom to Antigonus, he made an assault upon the city, and took it by storm; and now all parts were full of those that were slain in the rage of the Romans at the long duration of the siege, and by the seal of the Jews that were upon Herod's side, who were not willing to leave one of their adversaries alive, so they were murdered continually in the narrow streets.

3. And now they being having overcome his enemies, his care was to govern those foreigners who had been his assistants, for the crowd of strangers rushed to see the temple, and the sacred things in the temple; but the king, thinking the attempt to be a victory to get the Romans, and not those within discover any fear, but they also continued not a few engines to oppose their engines withal. They also sallied out, and burnt not only those engines that were not yet perfected, but also many of the Roman men, in order to prove that, hand to hand, their attempts were not less bold than those of the Romans, though they were behind them in skill. They also erected new walls, and as the former were ruined, and, making mines under ground, the place was taken by them. And when they fought there, and, making use of brutish courage rather than of prudent valor, they persisted in this war to the very last; and this they did while they might take away in the cities, and towns and villages, those that were distressed by famine, and the want of necessaries, for this happened to be a sabbatical year. And as Antigonus made all the space of the temple, and the lower city, were, the Jews fled into the inner court of the temple, and into the upper city; but now, fearing lest the Romans should hinder them from offering their daily sacrifices, Herod, by the advice of the Senate, and desired that they would only permit them to bring in beasts for sacrifices, which Herod granted, hoping they were going to yield; but when he saw that they did nothing of what he supposed, but bitterly opposed him, in order to preserve the kingdom to Antigonus, he made an assault upon the city, and took it by storm; and now all parts were full of those that were slain in the rage of the Romans at the long duration of the siege, and by the seal of the Jews that were upon Herod's side, who were not willing to leave one of their adversaries alive, so they were murdered continually in the narrow streets. And in the houses by crowds, and as they were flying to the temple for shelter, and there was no pity taken of either infants or the aged, nor did they spare much as the weaker sex; nay, although the king sent about, and besought them not to spare the people, yet nobody restrained their hand from slaughter, but, as if they were a company of madmen, they fell upon persons of all ages without distinction; and then Antigonus, without regard to time, moved under these circumstances, came down from the citadel, and fell down at the feet of Sosius, who took no pity of him in the change of his fortune, but insulted him, and hurled him beyond the city gates. [1. I. a. woman, and not a man.] yet did he not treat him as if he were a woman, by letting him go at liberty, but put him into bonds, and kept him in close custody.

4. And now seeing he having overcome his enemies, his care was to govern those foreigners who had been his assistants, for the crowd of strangers rushed to see the temple, and the sacred things in the temple; but the king, thinking the attempt to be a victory to get the Romans, and not those within discover any fear, but they also continued not a few engines to oppose their engines withal. [1. I. a. woman, and not a man.] yet did he not treat him as if he were a woman, by letting him go at liberty, but put him into bonds, and kept him in close custody.

5. So when Sosius had dedicated a crown of gold to God, he marched away from Jerusalem, and carried Antigonus with him in bonds to Antony; but Herod was afraid lest Antigonus should be kept in prison only by Antony, and that when he was carried to Rome by him, he might get his cause to be heard by the senate, and might demonstrate, as he was himself of the royal blood, and Herod but a private man, that therefore it belonged to his own senate however to have the kingdom, on account of the family they were of, in case he had himself offended the Romans by what he had done. Out of the money in Josephus is fully supplied by Moses Chreameson, the Arabian historian, in his history of the same interval, b. i. c. x. xviii, where he directly assures us, that Titreus, then king of Armenia, and the principal monarch of this part of Asia, was released two years after this Herod was made king at Rome; and yet Antony did not hear of this death, in that very neighborhood, at Sidon, in Phoenicia, till he was returned to his own country. Antigonus brought him an army, which was 340 miles march, and through a difficult country, full of mountains also, and joined with him in the siege of Samosata, till that city was taken; then Herod and Samosata marched back with their large armies the same number of 340 miles, and when in a little time they sat down to besiege Jerusalem, they were not able in seven years' time to take it. All which put together fully supplies what is wanting in Josephus, and secures the exact chronology of these times beyond contradiction.
Herod's fear of this it was, that he, by giving Antony a great deal of money, endeavored to persuade him to have Antigonus slain, which if it were once done, he should be free from that fear. And thus did the government of the Aesmoneans cease, a hundred twenty and six years after it was first set up. This family was a splendid and an illustrious one, both on account of the nobility of their stock, and of the dignity of the high priesthood, as also for the glorious actions their ancestors had performed for our nation, but these men lost the government by their dissensions one with another, and it came to Herod the son of Antipater, who was of no more than a vulgar family, and of no eminent extraction, but one that was subject to other kings; and this is what history tells us was the end of the Aesmonean family.

BOOK XV.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF EIGHTEEN YEARS—FROM THE DEATH OF ANTIGONUS TO THE FINISHING OF THE TEMPLE BY HEROD

CHAPTER I.

Concerning Pollio and Sannaeus. Herod slew the principal of Antigonus's friends, and spoiled the City of its Wealth. Antony beheads Antigonus.

1. How Susias and Herod took Jerusalem by famine; and, besides that, how they took Antigonus's treasure, has been related by us in the foregoing Book. We will now proceed in the narration. And since Herod had now the government of all Judea put into his hands, he promoted much of the private men in the city as had been before, but never by way of avenging and punishing every day those that had chosen to be of the party of his enemies: but Pollio, the Pharisee, and Sannaeus, a disciple of his, were honored by him above all the rest; for when Jesus came, as he was to receive Herod, for which advice they were well requited; but this Pollio, at the time when Herod was once upon his trial of life and death, foretold, in way of reproach, Hycranus and the other judges, how this Herod, whom they suffered now to escape, would afterward inflict punishment on them all; which had its completion in time, while God fulfilled the words he had spoken.

2. At this time Herod, now he had got Jerusalem and its power, carried off all the royal ornaments and spoilt the wealthy men of what they had gotten; and when by these means he had disposed together a great quantity of silver and gold, he sent them all to Antony and his friends that were about him. He also slew forty-five of the principal men of Antigonus's party, and set guards at the gates of the city, that nothing might be carried out together with their dead bodies. They also searched the dead, and whatsoever was found, either of silver or gold, or other treasure, it was carried to the king; nor was there any end of the miseries he brought upon them, and this distress was in part occasioned by the covetousness of the prince regent, who was still in want of more, and in part by the sabbatic year, which was still going on, and forced the country to lie still uncultivated, since we are forbidden to sow the land in that year. Now when Antony had received Antigonus as his captive, he determined to keep him against his triumph; but when he heard that the nation grew sedition, and that out of their hatred to Herod, they continued to bear good-will to Antigonus, he resolved to behead him at Antioch, for otherwise the Jews could noway be brought to be quiet. And Strabo of Cappadocia attests to what I have said, when he thus speaks: "Antony ordered Antigonus to be brought to Antioch, and there to be beheaded; and this Antony seems to me to have been the very first man who behelded a king, as supposing he could no other way bend the minds of the Jews, so as to receive Herod, whom he had made king by his steed, for by no torments could they be forced to call him king, so great a fondness they had for their former king: so he thought that this dishonorable death would diminish the value they had for Antigonus's memory, and at the same time would diminish the hatred they bare to Herod." Thus far Strabo.

CHAPTER II.

How Hycranus was set at Liberty by the Parthians, and returned to Herod; and what Alexander did when he heard that Amaelus was made High Priest.

1. Now after Herod was in possession of the kingdom, Hycranus the high priest, who was the son of Antipater, was again called to the high priest's office, and he again, and was set free from his captivity in the manner following: Barzaphernes and Pacorus the generals of the Parthians, took Hycranus, who was first made high priest and afterward king, and Herod's brother Phasaelus, captives, and were carrying them away into Parthia. Phasaelus indeed could not bear the reproach of being in bonds, and thinking that death with glory was better than any life whatsoever, he be came his own executioner, as I have formerly related.

2. But when Hycranus was brought into Parthia, the king Phraates treated him after a very gentle manner, as having already learned of what an illustrious man he was; on which account he set him free from his bonds, and gave him a habitation at Babylon, where there were Jews in great numbers. These Jews honored Hycranus as their high priest and king; and he was as great a name as any that dwelt as far as Asia; and the Parthians, which respect was very much to his satisfaction. But when he was informed that Herod had received the kingdom, new hopes came upon him, as having been himself still of a kind disposition towards him, and expecting that Herod would bear in mind what favor he had received from him, and when he was upon his trial, and when he was in danger that a capitâ sentence would be pronounced against him, he delivered him from that danger, and from all punishment. Accordingly he talked of that matter with the Jews that came often to him with great affection; but they endeavored to retain him among them, and desired that he would stay with him, putting him in mind of the kind offices and honors they did him, and that those honors they paid him were not at all inferior to what they could pay to either their high priests or their kings; and so he was to determine to determine them, they said, was this, that he could not have those dignities [in Judea] because of that main in his body, which had been inflicted on him by Antigonus; and that kings do far from Seleucia; just as the later adjoining city Babylon till this very day.

not use to requite men for those kindnesses which they received when they were private persons, the height of fortune making usually no small changes in them.

2. Now although Herod suggested these arguments to him for his own advantage, yet did Hyrcanus still desire to depart. Herod also wrote to him, and persuaded him to desire of Phraates, and the Jews that were there, that they should not use him so far as he was in their power, but that he should have jointly with himself, for that now was the proper time for himself to make him amends for the favors he had received from him, as having been brought up by him, and saved him from the danger of the former sedition. And as he wrote thus to Hyrcanus, so did he send also Saramillas, his ambassador, to Phraates, and many presents with him, and desired him in the most obliging way that he would be so kind to his graces towards his benefactor. But this zeal of Herod did not flow from that principle, but because he had been made governor of that country, without having any just cause thereof, and that upon very good enough, of choice, of his condition, and so made what haste he could to get Hyrcanus into his power, or indeed to put him quite out of the way: which last thing he com-

Chap. III.

How Herod, upon his making Aristobulus High Priest, took care that he should not be murdered in a like manner: and that apology he made to Antony about Aristobulus: as also concerning Joseph and Mariamme.

1. So King Herod immediately took the high priesthood away from Ananias, who, as we said before, was not of this country, but one of those Jews that had been carried captive beyond Egypt; for there were not a few ten thousand of that number of people that had been carried captive, and dwelt about Babylonia, whence Ananias came." He was one of the stock of the high priests, and had been of old a particular friend of Herod; and when he was first made king, he conferred that dignity upon him, and now put him out of it again, in order to quiet the troubles in his kingdom, and to satisfy what the people had clamorously complained of it, for at no other time [of old] was any one that had once been in that dignity deprived of it. It was Antiochus Epiphanes who first broke that law, and deprived Jesus, and made his brother Onias king in his stead. Aristobulus was the second that did so, and took that dignity from his brother [Hyrcanus]: and this Herod was the third, who took that high office away [from Ananias] and gave it to this young man, his associate.

2. And now Herod seemed to have healed the divisions in his family; yet was he not without suspicion, as is frequently the case, of people seeming to be reconciled to one another, but threats and commands, as if they had made attempts tending to innovations, so did he fear that she would go on therein, if she found a fit opportunity for so doing; so he gave a command, that she should dwell in the palace, and meddle with no public affairs; her guards also were so careful, that nothing she did in private life every day was concealed. All these hardships put her out of patience, by little and little, and she began to harbor a design to get rid of a woman to the utmost degree, she had great indignation at this suspicious guard that was about her, as desirous rather to undergo any thing that could befall her, than to be deprived of her liberty of speaking, and being thus a holy and holy, and guard, to live in a state of slavery and terror. She therefore sent to Cleopatra, and made a long complaint of the circumstances she was in, and entreated her to do her utmost for her assistance. Cleopatra hereupon advised her, to send her son with her, and come away immediately to her into Egypt. This advice pleased her; and she had this contrivance for getting away; she got two coffins made, as if they were to carry away two dead bodies, and she was with them, and she [Herod] sent her son into the other, and gave orders to such of her servants as knew of her intentions, to carry them away in the night-time. Now their road was to be thence to the seaside, and there was a ship ready to carry them into Egypt. Now Zeoph, one of her servants, happened to fall upon Sabion, one of her friends, and spake of this matter to him, as thinking he had known of it before. When Zeoph knew this, (who had formerly been an enemy of Herod, and was esteemed one of those that laid snares for, and gave the poison to [his father] Antipater,) he expected that this discovery might be a great destruction to Herod's house; he spoke to him of it, he durst not inflict any thing that was severe upon her, for he knew that Cleopatra would not bear that he should have her accused, on account of her hatred to him, but made a show as if it were rather the generosity of his soul, in his great moderation, that made him forgive them. However, he fully proposed to himself to put this young man out of the way, by one means or other; but he thought him in probability better to let him alone, if he so consented, nor immediately after what had lately happened.

3. And now, upon the approach of the feast of tabernacles, while he was about to serve his god, he let those days pass over and both he and the rest of the people were therein very merry; yet did the envy which at this time arose in him, cause him to make haste to do what he thought could be done as quickly as possible; and when this youth Aristobulus, who was now in the seventeenth year of his age, went up to the altar, according to the law, to offer the sacrifice, and with this the ornaments of his high priesthood, he made a scene there. He was too young, it seemed to be exceeding comely, and taller than men usually were at that age, and to exhibit in his countenance a great deal of that high family he was sprung from, and a warm zeal and affection to his father. He was not alone among the people, and the memory of the actions of his grandfather Aristobulus was fresh in their minds; and their affections got so far the mastery of them, that they could not forbear to show their inclinations to him. They at once rejoiced, and were confounded, and mingled with good wishes their joyful acclamations which they made to him, till the good-will of the multitude was made too evident, and they obeyed the commands of him they had received from his family, than was fit under a monarchy to have done. Upon all this, Herod resolved to complete what he had intended against the young man. When therefore he was about to proceed from Jericho with Alexandra, who entertained him there, he was then very pleasant with the young man, and drew him into a lonely place; and at the same time played with him in a juvenile and licentious manner. Now the nature of that place was hotter than ordinary; so they went out in a body and of a sudden, and in a vein of madness; and as they stood by the fish-ponds, of which there were large ones about the house, they dipp'd their heads, and they threw themselves among the bosom of one another, because it was in the midst of a hot day. At first they were only spectators of Herod's servants and acquaintance as they were swimming, but after a while, the young man, at the instigation among the Maccabees; and this tyrant king Herod the Great; and afterward that infamous praetor, when he was frequent in the very destruction of Jerusalem, when the office of high priesthood was at an end.

This entirely confutes the Talmudists, who pretend that no one under twenty years of age could officiate as high priest among the Jews.

1. A few lines later, Roland says, this drowning was at Jericho, not at Jericho, and this even when he quotes Josephus. I suspect the transcriber of the Hebrew chronicler misread the name, and wrote Jerem for Jericho. of Herod, went into the water among them, while such of Herod's acquaintance, as he had appointed to do it, dipped him, as he was swimming, and plunged him under water, in the dark of the evening, as if it had been done in sport only, nor did they desist till he was entirely and soundly located; and thus was Aristobulus murdered, having lived no more in all than eighteen years, and kept the high priesthood one year only, which high priesthood Anaelassus now recovered again.

4. When this sad accident was told the women, their joy was soon changed to lamentation, at the sight of the dead body that lay before them. Then, as they were about to take him away, the city also of Jerusalem, upon the spreading of this news, was in very great grief, every family looking on this calamity as if it had not belonged to another, but that one of themselves was slain, but Alexander was more deeply affected, upon her knowledge that he had been destitute of [for purpose.] Her sorrow was greater than that of others, by her knowing how the murder was committed, but she was under a necessity of being silent, as she did not intend to give any greater mischief that might otherwise follow: and she oftentimes came to an inclination to kill herself with her own hand, but still she restrained herself, in hopes she might live long enough to see Jerusalem's king avenged. But Alexander was not committed; nay, she further resolved to endeavor to live longer, and to give no occasion to think she suspected that her son was slain on purpose, and supposed that she might thereby be forced to discover her design to her husband, and thereby expose herself to an accident which was caused by any design of his; and for this purpose he did not only use the ordinary signs of sorrow, but fell into tears also, and exhibited a real confusion of soul; and perhaps his affection were overcome on this occasion, when he saw the child's consternation so young, and so beautiful, although his death was supposed to tend to his own security; so far, at least, this grief served as to make some apology for him: and then, too, he thought that to be killed would be very magnificent, by making great preparation for a sepulchre to lay his body in, and providing a great quantity of spices, and burying many ornaments together with him, till the very women that were in such deep sorrow were astonished at it, and received in this way some consolation.

5. However, no such things could overcome Alexandras's grief, but the remembrance of this miserable case made her sorrow both deep and obstinate. Accordingly, she wrote an account of this treacherous scene to Cleopatra, and how her son was murdered; but Cleopatra, as she had formerly been disposed to give her what satisfaction she could, and commiserating Alexandras's misfortunes, made the case her own, and would not let Antony be quiet, but excited him to punish the child's murder, for that it was an unpardonable crime, and with him, to call him made king of a kingdom that noways belonged to him, should be guilty of such horrid crimes against those that were of the royal blood in reality. Antony was persuaded by these arguments, and consented to let the thing pass over, and commanded Herod to come and make his defence, as to what he had done to Aristobulus, for that such a treacherous design was not well done, if he had any hand in it. Herod was now in fear, both of the accusation, and of Cleopatra's ill-will to him, which was such, that she was ever endeavoring to make Antony hate him. He therefore, determined to obey his summons, for he had no possible way to avoid it: so he left his uncle, Joseph, procurator for his government, and for the public affairs, and gave him a private charge, that if Antony should kill him, he also should kill Mariamne immediately; for that he had a tender affection for this his wife, and was afraid of the injury that should be offered him, if, after his death, she, for her beauty, should be the cause of some hindrance. But his intimation was nothing but this at the bottom, that Antony had fallen in love with her when he had formerly heard somewhat of her beauty; so when he had once given the charge, and had indeed no sure hopes of escaping with his life, he went away to Antony.

6. But as Joseph was administering the public affairs of the kingdom, and for that reason was very frequently with Mariamne, both because his business required it, and because of the respects he ought to pay to the queen, he frequently let himself into discourses about Herod's kindness, and great affection towards her; and when the women, especially Alexander, used to discourse into feminine raimery, Joseph was so over desirous to demonstrate the king's inclinations, that he proceeded so far as to mention the charge he had received, and thence drew his demonstration, and not being committed. And this was the reason, and that if he should come to any ill end, he could not endure a separation from her, even after he was dead. Thus spoke Joseph. But the women, as was natural, did not take this to be an instance of Herod's affection for them, but of his severe usage of them, that they could not escape destruction, nor a tyrannical death, even when he was dead himself; and this saying [of Joseph] was the foundation for the women's severe suspicions about him afterward.

7. At this time a report went about the city of Jerusalem, among Herod's enemies, that Antony had tortured Herod, and put him to death. This report, as is natural, disturbed those that were about the palace, but chiefly the women: upon which Alexandras endeavored to persuade Joseph to go out of the palace, and fly to the confines of the Roman legion, that lay near the city, and there put himself as a guard to the kingdom, under the command of Julius; for, by this means, if any disturbance should happen about the palace, they should be in greater security, as having the Romans favorable to them, and also may be expected to have obtained the highest authority, if Antony did but once see Mariamne, by whose means they should recover the kingdom, and want nothing which was reasonable for them to hope for, because of their royal extinction.

8. But as they were in the midst of these deliberations, letters were brought from Herod about all his affairs, and proved contrary to the report, and of what they before expected; for when he was come to Antony, he soon recovered his interest with him, by the presents he made him, which he had brought with him from Jerusalem, and he soon induced him, upon discovering him, to receive the charge, his Antony should kill himself; and Cleopatra's persuasions had less force than the arguments and presents he brought, to regain his friendship, for Antony said, that it was not good to require an account of a king, as to the affairs of the great, but he could no king at all, but that those who had given him that authority ought to permit him to make use of it. He also said the same things to Cleopatra, that it would be best for her not to busily to meddle with the acts of the king's government. Herod wrote an account of these things, and "enlarged upon the other bonors which he had received from Antony; how he sat by him at his hearing causes, and took his diet with him every day, and that he enjoyed those favors from him, notwithstanding the re-proaches that Cleopatra so severely laid against him, who having a great desire of his country, and earnestly entreating Antony that the kingdom given to her, be also given to her, labored with her utmost diligence to have him overtake the way to that, but that he still found Antony just to him, and had no longer any apprehensions of hard treatment from him; and that he was soon upon his return, by means of Alexander's influence of his favor to him, in his reigning and managing public affairs; and that there was no longer any hopes for Cleopatra's covetous temper, since Antony had given her Cilicia, instead of what she desired, by which together he made him acculpitate her, and got clear of the entreaties which she made him to have Judea bestowed upon her." 9 When these letters were brought, the women left off their attempt for dying to the Romanas, which was the first sign of the suspicion was, and left of to be dead, yet was not that purpose of theirs a secret; but when the king had conducted Antony on his way against the Parthians, he returned to Judea, when both his sister Salome, and his mother came to Alexander, full of desire of intentions. Salone also added somewhat further against Joseph, though it were no more than a calumny, that he had often had criminal conversation with Mariamme, and that he was the reason of her saying to Joseph that this, that she for a long time bare her ill-will, for when they had differences with one another, Mariamme took great freoods, and reproached the rest for the meanness of their birth. But Herod, who was like to Mariamme in all, was always very warm, was presently disturbed at this, and could not bear the torments of jealousy, so was still restrained from doing any rash thing to her by the love he had for her; yet did his vehement affection and jealousy together make him make her, Mariamme by herself about this matter of Joseph; but she denied it upon her oath, and said all that an innocent woman could possibly say in her own defence, so that by little and little the king was very much moved, and left off his anger at her; and being overcome with his passion for his wife, he made an apology to her for having seemed to believe what he had heard about her, and returned her a great many acknowledgments of her modest behavior, and he professed the extraordinary affection and kindness he had for her, till at last, as is usual between lovers, they both fell into tears, and embr-
ces. But as he had a most tender mother with a most tender daughter, so did Joseph, having restored to her the king, who was very much overjoyed at this, for he knew he should have been free cities from their ancestors, although she pressed him very often to bestow those on her also.

2 When Cleopatra had obtained this much, and had accompanied Antony in his expedition to Armenia, so far as Ephrates, she returned back, and came to Apamea and Damascus, and passed on to Judea, where Herod met her, and left her her of her parts of Arabia, and those reve-gers that were her, and to Jericho, which is the most precious drug that is there, and grows there alone. The place bears also palm-trees, both many in number, and those excellent in form, so that the place was the most). When the king had been there with Joseph, he had often with Herod, she endeavors to have criminal conversation with the king; nor did she affect secrecy in the indulgence of such sort of passion, and perhaps she had in some measure a passion of love to him, or rather, what is most probable, she laid a treacherous snare for him, by aiming to obtain such adulterous conversation from him: however, upon the whole, she seemed to love her own life more than love to him. Nor Herod had a great while borne no good-will to Cleopatra, as knowing that she was a woman irksome to all: and at that time he thought her particularly worthy of his hatred, if this attempt proceeded out of lust; he had also thought of preventing her intrigues, by putting her to death, if such were her endeavors. However, he refused to comply with her proposals, and called a council of his friends to consult with them. "Whether he should not kill her now he had her in his power for that she should thereby deliver all those from a multitude of evils. If she was a ready become irksome, and was expected to be still so for the time to come; and that this very thing would be much for the advantage of Antony himself, he would therefore command the men of the fleet to keep her near him, in case any such reason or necessity should come upon him as that he should stand in seed of her fidelity." But when he thought to follow this advice, his friends would not let him; and so did he, when they first proposed it; it was, by his right to attempt so great a thing, and run himself thereby into the utmost danger; and they lay hard at him, and begged of him to undertake nothing rashly, for that Antony would never bear it, if he should chance to die before his eyes that it was for his own advantage; and that the appearance of depriving him of her conversation, by this violent and treacherous method, would probably set his affections more in theAuthorized product of Scriptorium Classics. of the Arabians. They went with great spirit, as believing they were in very good order, and those especially were so that had been in the former battle, and had been conquerors, and had not permitted the enemy to come very near those Jews to a close fight with them. And when they were so tumultuous, and showed such great ascertainty, the king resolved to make use of that zeal the multitude then exhibited; and when he had assured them they would not have minded them, to encourage them in course, he led them on, and stood before them all in his armor, all the regiments following him in their several ranks: whereupon a consternation fell upon the Arabians; for when they perceived the Jews were not so numerous, nor armed, and were full of spirit, the greater part of them ran away, and avoided fighting, and they had been quite destroyed, had not Athenion fallen upon the Jews, and distressed them, for this man was Cleopatra prince to Cleopatra, his younger brother, to that kingdom: but this happened a good while afterward.

4. But then, as to the tributes which Herod was to pay Cleopatra for that country, which Antony had given her, he acted fairly with her, as seeming it not safe for him to afford any cause for Cleopatra to hate him. As for the king of Arabia, whose tribute Herod had undertaken to pay, he did not take it, for the amount was much as came to two hundred talents, but he afterward became very niggardly, and slow in his payments, and could hardly be brought to pay some parts of it, and was not willing to pay them without some deductions.

CHAP. V.

How Herod made war with the King of Arabia, and after they had fought many Battles, at length conquered him, and was chosen by the Arabs to be Governor of that Nation; as also concerning a great Earthquake.

§ 1. HERODUS Herod held himself ready to go against the King of Arabia, because of his ingratitude to him and because, after all, he would do nothing that was just to his, although Herod made the Roman war an occasion of delaying his own, for the battle of Actium was now expected, which fell into the hundred and eighty-seventh Olympiad, where Caesar and Antony were to fight for the supreme power of the world; but Herod having enjoyed a country that was very fruitful, and that now for a long time, and having received great taxes, and having received great honors therefrom, with great body of men, and carefully furnished them with all necessaries, and designed them as auxiliaries for Antony; but Antony said, he had no want of his assistance; but he commanded them to put the men of the fleet to him, for he had heard both from him and from Cleopatra, how peridious he was; for this was what Cleopatra desired, who thought it for her own advantage, that these two kings should do one another as great mischief as possible. Upon this message from Antony, Herod returned back, but kept his arm with him, in order to invade Arabia immediately. So when his army of horsemen and footmen was ready, he marched to Dioscuripolis, whither the Arabs had caused him to come, for they were not unsatisfied of this war that was coming upon them; and after a great battle had been fought, the Jews had the victory. But afterward there were gotten together another number of Arabians, and the Arabians, of which is a place of Colsosyria. Herod was informed of this beforehand: so he came marching against them with the greatest part of the forces he had; and when he came, he resolved to encompass himself, and he cast up a bulwark, that he might take a proper season for attacking the enemy; but as he was giving those orders, the multitude of the Jews cried out that he should make no delay; but let him at once destroy the Arabians. They went with great spirit, as believing they were in very good order, and those especially were so that had been in the former battle, and had been conquerors, and had not permitted the enemy to come very near those Jews to a close fight with them. And when they were so tumultuous, and showed such great ascertainty, the king resolved to make use of that zeal the multitude then exhibited; and when he had assured them they would not have minded them, to encourage them in course, he led them on, and stood before them all in his armor, all the regiments following him in their several ranks: whereupon a consternation fell upon the Arabians; for when they perceived the Jews were not so numerous, nor armed, and were full of spirit, the greater part of them ran away, and avoided fighting, and they had been quite destroyed, had not Athenion fallen upon the Jews, and distressed them, for this man was Cleopatra prince to Cleopatra, his younger brother, to that kingdom: but this happened a good while afterward.

4. But then, as to the tributes which Herod was to pay Cleopatra for that country, which Antony had given her, he acted fairly with her, as seeming it not safe for him to afford any cause for Cleopatra to hate him. As for the king of Arabia, whose tribute Herod had undertaken to pay, he did not take it, for the amount was much as came to two hundred talents, but he afterward became very niggardly, and slow in his payments, and could hardly be brought to pay some parts of it, and was not willing to pay them without some deductions.
of slaughter were now frequent, and of those that escaped, a few only returned into the camp. For, when he was dispirited with the battle, he rode up to them to bring them assistance, yet did he not come time enough to do them any service, though he labored hard to do it, but the Jewish camp was taken, so that the Arabians had unexpectedly a most glorious success, having gained that victory, which of themselves they were nower likely to have gained, and slaying a great part of the enemy's army: whence afterward Herod could only act like a private robber, and the king's enemies rose up among parts of Idumaæa, and distress them by sudden incursions, while he encamped among the mountains, and avoided by any means to come to a pitched battle, yet did he greatly harass the enemy by his activity, and the heavy punishment of them in the case sudden. And the king took great care of his own forces, and used all the means he could to restore his affairs to their old state.

On this time it was that the fight happened at Actium, between Octavius Caesar and Antony, in the seventh9 year of the reign of Herod; and then it was also that there was an earthquake in Judea, such a one as had not happened at any other time before., and which, earthquake brought a great destruction upon the cattle in that country. About ten thousand men also perished by the fall of houses: but the army, which lodged in the field, received no damage by this sad accident.

When the king was informed of this, and when those that hated the Jews, and pleased themselves with aggravating the reports, told them of it, they raised their spirits, as if their enemy's country was quite overturned, and the army was utterly destroyed, and thought there now remained nothing that could oppose them. Accordingly, they took the Jewish ambassadors, who came to them after all this had happened, to make peace with them, and slew them, and came upon the Jews with a great army, and thought they durst not withstand them, and were so cast down by the calamities they were under, that they took no care of their affairs, but gave up those to despair; for they had no hope that they should be upon a level with them again in battles, nor obtain any assistance elsewhere, while their affairs at home were in such great distress also. When matters were in this condition, then persuading the commanders by his words, and tried to raise their spirits, which were quite sunk; and first he endeavored to encourage and embolden some of the better sort beforehand, and then ventured to make a speech to the army, which had before avoided to do, lest he should find them uneasy thereat, because of the misfortunes which had happened; so he made a consolatory speech to the multitude, in the manner following:

"1. You are not unacquainted, my fellow soldiers, that we have had not long since many accidents that have put a stop to what we are about; and it is probable that even those that are most distinguished of the rest have their courage, can hardly keep up their spirits in such times of distress, and they have been so anxious to recover their good fortune. I will, then, in the first place demonstrate to you, that this war is a just one on our side, and that on this account it is a war of necessity, and occurs in the most severe manner, and that the Jews have been only once satisfied of this, it will be a real cause of deformity to you, after which I will farther demonstrate, that the misfortunes we are under are of no great consequence, and that we have the greatest reason to hope for victory. I shall begin with the first, and appeal to yourselves as witnesses to what I shall say. You are not ignorant certainly of the wickedness of the Arabians, which is to that degree as to appear incredible to all other men, and to include somewhat that shows the grossest barbarity and ignorance of God. The chief things wherein they have affronted us, have arisen from covetousness and envy; and they have attacked us in an insidious manner. And it is incredible, that in the case sudden. And the king took great care of his own forces, and used all the means he could to restore his affairs to their old state.

The next thing is that the fight happened at Actium, between Octavius Caesar and Antony, in the seventh9 year of the reign of Herod; and then it was also that there was an earthquake in Judea, such a one as had not happened at any other time before., and which, earthquake brought a great destruction upon the cattle in that country. able they can live securely in common life, or be successful in war? In my opinion this is impossible; but perhaps some will say, that what is holy and what is righteous, is indeed on our side, but the Arabs are either more courageous, or more accustomed to war. But when we were in our first place, it is not fit for us to say so, for with whom is what is righteous, with them is God himself; now where God is, there is both multitude and courage. But to examine our own circumstances, a little, we were conquerors in the first battle: and when we fought again, they were not able to oppose us, but ran away, and could not endure our attacks or our courage: but when we had conquered them, then came Arab: and for that reason, they now keep their peace, and re-claiming it; and pray, is this an instance of their manhood? or is it not a second instance of their wickedness and treachery? Why are we, therefore, of less courage, on account of that which ought to inspire us with stronger hopes and why are we terrified at these, who, when they fought upon the level, are continually beaten, and when they seem to be conquerors, they gain it by their numbers, and they think they should deem them to be men of real courage, will he not be excited by that very consideration to do his utmost against them? For true valor is not shown by fighting against weak person, but in being able to withstand the attack of the brave. But then, if the distresses we are ourselves under, and the miseries that have come by the earthquake, have affrighted any one, let him consider, in the first place, that this very thing will deceive the enemy, who think that their enemies are poorer than it really is. Moreover, it is not right that the same thing that emboldens them should discourage us; for these men, you see, do not derive their alacrity from any advantageous virtue of their own, but from the multitude, which makes them sure that we are quite cast down by our misfortunes; but when we boldly march against them, they shall soon pull down their insolent c canadian of them- selves, and shall gain this as also, they reason that they will not be so insolent when we come to the battle, for our distresses are not so great, nor is what hath happened an indication of the anger of God against us, as some imagine, for with them they have not been so much agitated as we are in the usual course of things; and if we allow that this was done by the will of God, we must allow that it is now over by his will also, and that he is satisfied with what has already happened, for he is pleased with good work. And thereby, he had not changed his mind so soon. And as for the war we are engaged in, he hath himself demonstrated, that he is willing it should go on, and that he knows it to be a just war; for while some of the people in the country have undergone all, who you were in arms have suffered nothing, but are all preserved alive; whereby God makes it plain to us, that if you had universally, with your children and wives, marched with the army, it had come to pass, that you had not undergone any thing that would have much hurt you. Consider these things, and, what is more than all the rest, that you have God at all times for your advocate; and if you were all armed with a just bravery, who, in point of friendship are unjust, in their battles peridious, towards ambassadors impious, and always inferior to you. 4. When the Jews heard this speech they were much raised in their minds, and more disposed to fight than before. So Herod, when he had offered the sacrifices appointed by the law, made haste, and took them, and led them against the Arabians; and in order to pass over Jordan, and pitched his camp near to that of the Arabians, they set up a little castle that lay in the midst of them, as hoping it would be for his advantage, and would the sooner produce a battle; and that if there were occasion for delay, he should by it have his camp fortified. And as the Arabians had the same intentions upon that place, a contest arose about it: at first they were but skirmishes, after which there came more soldiers, and it proved a sort of fight, and some fell on both sides, till those of the Arabians were worsted. They were now treated. This was no small encouragement to the Jews immediately: and when Herod observed that the enemy's army were disposed to anything rather than to come to an engagement, he ordered boldly, that he might attack the bulwark by night, and carry it, and so to get nearer to their camp, in order to fight them; for when they were forced out of their trenches, they were no match for them. And by this he would raise to act, by fire and sword, by the alacrity, or hope of victory; yet did they fight hand to hand, because they were more in number than the Jews, and because they were in such a disposition of war that they were under a necessity of holding on, and combatting with a terrible battle, while not a few fell on each side. However, at length the Arabians fled; and so great a slaughter was made upon their being routed, that they were not only killed by the sword, but also burnt, and their bodies burnt, and their own deaths also, and were trodden down by the multitude, and the great current of people in disorder, and were destroyed by their own arm; so five thousand men lay dead upon the spot, while they were hotly pursued from them, by all those within the bulwark [for safety, but had no firm hope of safety, by reason of their want of necessaries, and especially of water. The Jews pursued them; but could not get in with them, but sat round about the bulwark, and watched and assisted that assistance which would get in to them, and prevented any there, that had a mind to it, from making away. 5. When the Arabs were in these circumstances, they sent ambassadors to Herod, in the first place to propose terms of accommodation; and after that to offer him, so pressing was their thirst upon them, to undergo whatsoever he pleased, if he would release them from this distress; but he would admit of no ambassadors, of no price of redemption, nor of any other moderate terms whatever, being very desirous to revenge those unjust actions which they had been guilty of towards his nation. So they were necessitated by other motives, and particularly by their thirst, to come out and deliver themselves up to him, to be carried away captives; and in five days' time the number of four thousand were taken prisoners, while all the rest remained to make a sacrifice upon their enemies, and to fight it out with them. Choosing rather, if so it must be, to die therein than to perish gradually and ingloriously. When they had taken this resolution, they came out of their trenches, and it was now easy to sustain the fight, being too much disabled, both in mind and body, and having not room to exert themselves, and thought it an advantage to be within the bulwark, so that the first onset there fell about seven thousand, many times of affliction making men most religious; nor was he disappointed of his hopes here, but immediately gained a most signal victory over the Arabians; while they who just before had been so great victors, and so much elevated upon the earth, were now under a strange consternation, and hardly able to fight at all.
and of them; after which stroke they let all the courage they had put on before fell, and stood amazed at Herod’s warlike spirit under his own command as for the future, and yielded, and made him ruler of their nation; whereupon he was greatly elevated at so seasonable a success, and returned home, taking great authority over him, on account of so bold and glorious an expendition as he has made.

CHAP. VI.
How Herod slew Hyrcanus, and then hasted unto Caesar, and obtained the kingdom from him also; and how, a little time afterward, he entertained Caesar in a most honorable manner.

1. His rod’s other affairs were now very pros-sperous; but yet he was not to be easily to bear on any side. Yet did there come upon him a danger that would hazard his entire dominions, after Antony had been beaten at the battle of Actium by Romans [see Ch. 4] but without hope of escape, but for his enemies, they all outwardly appeared to be troubled at his case, but were privately very glad of it, as hoping to obtain a change for the better. As for Herod himself, he saw that there was a great temptation for the True Hyrcanists,
and therefore he thought it would be for his advantage not to suffer him to be an obstacle in his way any longer; for that in case he himself survived, and escaped the danger he was in, he thought the time was come to put into the power of some such a man to make any attempt against him at such junctures of affairs, as was more worthy of the kingdom than himself; and in case
he should be slain by Caesar, his envy prompted him to desire that he may be toward who would otherwise be king after him.

2. While Herod had these things in his mind, there was a certain occasion afforded him; for Ariobarzanes, who had no hope of escape, but
for his enemies, they all outwardly appeared to be troubled at his case, but were privately very glad of it, as hoping to obtain a change for the better. As for Herod himself, he saw that there was a great temptation for the True Hyrcanists,
and therefore he thought it would be for his
advantage not to suffer him to be an obstacle in
his way any longer; for that in case he himself survived, and escaped the danger he was in, he thought
the time was come to put into the power of
some such a man to make any attempt against
him at such junctures of affairs, as was more worthy of the kingdom than himself; and in case
he should be slain by Caesar, his envy prompted
him to desire that he may be toward who would otherwise
be king after him.

3. And this account we give the reader, as it is one of the few things that the present author but other historians do not agree with them, for they suppose that Herod did not find, but rather make this an occasion for thus putting him to death, and that by treacherously laying a snare for him, which he would not have accepted had he not been once at a treat, and that Herod had given no occasion to suspect [that he was displeased at him], but put this question to Hyrcanus, Whether he had received any letters from Malchus?
and answered him, that he had received no letters, but those of salutation only; and when he asked farther, whether he had not received any presents from him? and when he had replied, that he had received no more than four horses to ride, and that Malchus had sent him a pair. He attended that Herod charged these upon him as the crimes of bribery and treason, and gave order that he should be led away and slain.
And in order to demonstrate that he had been entirely guilty of nothing, when he was thus brought to his end, they alleged how little his temper had been, and that even in his youth he had never given any demonstration of boldness or rashness nor any desire to be king, but that he was simply to be king, but that he even then committed the management of the greatest part of public affairs to Antipater; and that he was now above fourscore years old, and knew that Herod’s government was such as he had been trained and brought up under, under Cassius and Eupharon, and left those who greatly honored him beyond that river, though he were to be entirely under Herod’s government, and that it was a most incredible thing that he should enterprise any thing by way of innovation, and not at all agreeable to his temper, but that this was a plot of Herod’s contrivance.

4. And this was the fate of Hyrcanus; and thus did he end his life, after he had endured remarkable things, Hyrcanian adventures, and a life-time: for he was made high priest of the Jewish nation in the beginning of his mother Alexan-dra’s reign, who held the government nine years;
and when, after his mother’s death, he took the throne, he lived well, and was esteemed among the Persians as a man of the first class, while Herod did love him as the means of bringing himself and his son to the throne of Jerusalem.

5. He was then restored by Pompey, and received all sorts of honor from him, and enjoyed them forty years; but when he was again deprived by Antigonus, and was cast in his body, he was made a captive by the Parthians, and thence returned home again after some time, on account of the hopes that Herod had given him, none of which came to pass according to his expectation, and then returned to Rome, and was set free, and went through the whole course of his life; and what was the heaviest calamity of all, we have reissued already, he came to an end and which was undeserved by him. His character appeared to be that of a man of a mild and moderate disposition, and suffered the administration of affairs to be generally done by others under him. He was not inclined to the mixing with him of the court, nor had he shrewdness enough to govern a kingdom; and both Antipater and Herod came to their greatness by reason of his mildness, and at last he met with such an end from them as was not against his will, unless by order.

5. Now Herod, as soon as he put Hyrcanus out of the way, made haste to Cæsar; and because he could not have any hopes of kindness from him, or account of the friendship he had for Alexander, he was afraid that he should take this opportunity to bring the multitude to a revolt, and introduce a sedition into the affairs of the kingdom; so he committed the care of every thing to his brother Pheroras, and placed his mother Cleopatra, and his sister [Salome,] and the whole family, at Massada, and gave him a charge, that if he should hear any sad news about him, he should take care of the government in the meantime, because of the misunderstanding between her and his sister, and his sister’s mother, which made it impossible for them to live together, he placed her at Alexandrium, with Alexander her brother, and gave Pheroras his care for the land of Iturea, to take care of that fortress. These two had been very faithful to him from the beginning, and were now left as a guard to the women. They also had it in charge, that if they should hear anything that should not suit with the interest of the kingdom, they should kill them both, and as far as they were able to preserve the kingdom for his sons, and for his brother Pheroras.
