6. When he had given them this charge, he made haste to the Ephod, to meet Cæsar; and when he had sailed to that city, he took off his diadem, but remitted nothing else of his usual dignity: and when, upon his meeting him, he desired that he would let him speak to him, he therein exhibited much more consideration, than the former situation of the kingdom required; for he did not then betake himself to supplications, as men usually do upon such occasions, nor offered him any petition, as if he were an initiated man, and gave him an account of what he had done; for he spoke thus to Cæsar, that “he had the greatest friendship for Antony, and did every thing he could that he might attain the government; that he was no more in love with him and his cause than the Arabs had diverted him, but that he had sent him both money and corn, which was but too little in comparison of what he ought to have done for him; for if a man owns himself to be another’s friend, and knows him to be a benefactor, he is obliged to hazard every thing, to use every faculty of his soul, every member of his body, and all the wealth he hath, for him, in which I confess I have been too deficient. However, I am content to say to thee, far from not right, that I have not deserted him upon his defeat at Actium; nor upon the evident change of his fortune have I transferred my hopes from him to another, but have preserved myself, that I might certainly continue certainly as a faithful counsellor to Antony, when I demonstrated to him that the only way that he had to save himself, and not to lose all his authority, was to say Cleopatra was for; for when she was dead, there would be room for him to retain his authority, and rather to bring thee to make a composition with him, than to continue at enmity any longer. None of which advice would he attend to, but preferred his own rash resolutions before them, which have happened unprofitably for him, but profitably for thee. Now therefore, in case thou determinest about me, and my allegiance in serving Antony, according to thy anger at him, I own there is no room for me, to deny what I have done, nor will I be ashamed to own, and that publicly too, that I had a great kindness for him; but if thou wilt put him out of the case, and only examine how I beheld myself in my own interest, and not what sort of friend I am, thou wilt find by experience that we shall do and be the same to thyself, for it is but changing the names, and the firmness of friendship that we shall bear to thee will not be differently judged by us.”

7. By this speech, and by his behavior, which showed Cæsar the frankness of his mind, he greatly gained upon him, who was himself of a generous and magnificent temper, inasmuch that he did not suspect the motives of those very acts of Cæsar, on the accusation against him, procured him Cæsar’s good-will. Accordingly he restored him his diadem again; and encouraged him to exhibit himself as great a friend to himself as he had been to Antony, and then had him in great esteem. Moreover, he added this, that Quintus Didius had written to him, that Herod had very readily assisted him in the affair of the gladiators. So when Cæsar had received this as a token of reparation, and had, beyond all his hopes, procured his crown to be more entirely and firmly settled upon him than ever by Cæsar’s donation, as well as by that decree of the Romans, which Cæsar took care for his great advantage, who had conducted Cæsar on his way to Egypt, and made presents even beyond his ability, to both him and his friends, and in general behaved himself with great magnanimity. He also desired that Cæsar would make Antony, and those next to him, rather than to his own advantage; and that there should be a compensation of Antony; but Cæsar had sworn to put him to death, and so he could not obtain that his petition: and now he returned to Judea again with greater honor and assurance than ever, and affected to make no relations to the contrary, as still acquiring from his very dangers greater splendor than before, by the favor of God to him. So he prepared for the reception of Cæsar, as he was going out of Syria into Cilicia; and when he came, he entertained him at Ptolemais with all royal magnificence. He also bestowed presents on the army, and brought them provisions in abundance. He also, when he had obtained such especial friends, and put the army in array, and rode along with Cæsar, and had a hundred and fifty men, well appointed in all respects, after a rich and sumptuous manner, for the better reception of Cæsar; and he also made presents to the people with what they should want, as they passed over the dry desert, insomuch that they lacked neither wine nor water, which last the soldiers stood in the greatest need of, and besides, he presented Cæsar with eight hundred talents, and procured to himself the good-will of them all, because he was assisting to them in a much greater and more splendid degree than the kingdom he had obtained could afford, by which means he more and more esteemed to be to one so far, that he had the honor of his friendship, and his readiness to assist him; and what was the greatest advantage to him was this, that his liberality came at a seasonable time also, and when they returned again out of Egypt. It was by means of his assistance that he procured to the good offices he had formerly done them.

CHAP. VII.

How Herod slew Sallumus and Mariamne, and afterward Alexander and Costobarus, and his most intimate Friends, and at last the Sons of Babas also.

1. However, when he came into his kingdom again, he found his house all in disorder, and his wife, Mariamne, and her mother, Alexandra, very uneasy; for, as they supposed, what was easy to be supposed, that they were not pos that he was in this temper with regard to Marianne, they thought he had too got as excellent an opportunity to exercise their hatred against her, and provoked Herod to wrath by the mere sight of her. And Marianne, as supposing that the king's love to her was but hypocritical, and rather pretended, as advantageous to himself, than real, she looked upon it as malicious. She also was grieved that he would manifest any kind of vigorous way of showing himself to come to any harm himself. She also re-collected what commands he had formerly given to Joseph, insomuch that she endeavoured to plant her keepers, and especially Sobeemas, as well as she could, in disfavour. And the first Sobeemas was faithful to Herod, and neglected none of the things he had given him in charge; but when the women, by kind words and good offices, affided to him, and got him affection, in over to these, he was by degrees overcome, and at length discovered to them all the king's in-junctions, and this on that account principally, that he did not so much as hope he would come back with the same conduct he had before, so that he thought he should both escape any danger from him, and supposed that he did hereby much gratify the women, who were likely not to be overlooked in the setting of the government, now that he would be able to make him abundant recompense, since they must either reign themselves, or be very near to him that should reign. He had a further grossed of hope also, that though Herod should have all the success he could desire from them, as for the government, he could not contradict hiswife in what she desired, for he knew that the king's fondness for his wife was inexpressible. These were the motives that drew Sobeemas to discover what injunctions had been made to him. So Marianne was greatly Cap- pleased to hear that there was no end of the dangers she was under from Herod, and was greatly uneasy at it, and wished he might obtain no fame, and especially not for nor for her husband, and feared it almost an insupportable task to live with him any longer; and this she afterward openly declared, with- out concealing her resentment.

2. And now Herod sailed home with joy, at the same time her mother and mother's sister had before, so went first of all, as was proper, to this wife, and told her, and her only, the good news, as preferring her before the rest, on account of his fondness for her, and the intimacy there had been between him, and saluted her; but so it happened, that as he told her of the good suc- cess he had had, she was so far from rejoicing at it, that she rather was sorry for it; nor was she able to conceal her resentments; but, depending on her dignity, and the nobility of her birth, in her return for his salutations she gave a groan, and declared evidently that she rather grieved than rejoiced at his success; and this till Herod was disturbed at her, as affording him not only marks of her suspicion, but evident signs of her insatisfaction. This much troubled him, to see that this surprising hatred of his wife to him was not concealed, but open; and he took this so ill, and yet was so unable to bear it, on account of the fondness he had for her, that he could not continue long in any one mind; but sometimes was angry at her, and sometimes reconciled him- self to her; but by always changing one passion for another, it was still in great uncertainty. And his mother, and he entangled himself in love, and was frequently disposed to inflict pun-ishment on her for her insolence towards him; but being deeply in love with her in his soul, he was but able to quit of this woman. In short, as he would gladly have her punished, so was he afraid lest, one were he aware, he should, by putting her to death, bring a heavier punishment upon himself at the same time.

3. When Herod's sister and mother perceived

* Whereas Marianne is here represented as reproach- ing Herod with the murder of her father (Alexander,) as well as her brother (Aristobulus,) while it was her that he had caused his father and his brother to be slain. And when he took this injury very unkindly, and was ready to use violence to her, in order to revenge his former punishment, she, observing that he was more than ordinarily disturbed, sent in to the king his cap-bearer, who had been prepared long beforehand for such a design, and bid him tell the king, how Mariamne had promised him to give him a love potion in preparing a love potion for him; and if he appear to be greatly concerned, and to ask what that love potion was to tell him, that she had done nothing to injure him, nor to injure himself, nor to injure the king, but that in case he did not appear to be much concerned at this potion, to let the thing drop, and that if he did so, no harm should thereby come to him. When she had given him these her cautions, he left her, and absented himself, in order to make such a speech. So he went in, after a composed manner, to gain credit to what he should say, and yet somewhat hastily, and said, that "Mariamne had given him presents, and presented him to the king, and when this moved the king, he said, that "this love potion was a composition that she had given him, whose effects he did not know, which was the reason of his resolving to give him this information, in order that he might be both safe for himself and for the king." When Herod heard what he said, and was in an ill disposition before, his indignation grew more violent; and he sent for Mariamne, and lashed her on certain occasions which he would not name, and for the most faithful to him, to be brought to torture about this potion, as well knowing it was not possible that any thing small or great could be done without him. And when the man was under the extreme necessity, he said not a word to her, but sent for his cap-bearer, and said he had been at all other times most faithful to him, and to his government, would not have betrayed what injunctions he had given him, unless he had had a nearer conversation than ordinary with him; and that she should be seized on and slain immediately; but he allowed his wife to take her trial; and got together those that were most faithful to him, and the fortresses belonging to the kingdom, and on his return, he clearly set forth this love potion and composition, which had been charged upon her by way of calumny only. However, he kept no temper in what he said, and was in too great a passion for judging well about this matter. Accordingly when the queen was at length satisfied that he was so resolved, they passed the sentence of death upon her: but when the sentence was passed upon her, this temper was suggested by himself, and by some others of the court, that she should not be thus hastily put to death, but be laid in prison in one of the fortresses belonging to the kingdom: but Salome and her party labored hard to have the woman put to death, and they prevailed with the king, and he conquered her. And then it was that last the multitude should be tumultuous if she were suffered to live; and thus was Mariamne led to execution.

8. When Alexander observed how things went, and that there were small hopes that she herself should escape the like treatment from Herod, she changed her behavior to quite the reverse of what might have been expected from her former conduct in the same circumstances; for out of her desire to show how entirely ignorant she was of the crimes laid against Mariamne, she leaped out of her place, and pronounced her daughter in the hearing of all the people; and cried out, that "she had been an ill woman and ungrateful to her husband, and that he had punished her for her insolent behavior, for that she had not made proper returns to him who had been their common benefactor." And when she had for some time acted after this hypocritical manner, and had been so out of her mind as to term herself an indecent and dissembling behavior, as was to be expected, was greatly condemned by the rest of the spectators, as it was principally by the poor women who were to them as a terror, for they knew not the word, nor was discomposed at her peerlessness, and only looked at her; yet did she, out of a great sense of soul, discover her concern for her mother's offense, and especially for her exposing herself to the thunder of her father's justice; but as for herself, she went to her death with an unshaken firmness of mind, and without changing the color of her face, and thereby evidently discovered the nobility of her descent to the spectators, even in the last moments of her life.

6. And thus did Mariamne, a woman of an excellent character, both for chesity and greatness of soul; but she was not moderate, and she had too much kindness for her husband, so that she had all that she could say in the beauty of her body, and her majestic appearance in conversation; and thence arose the greatest part of the king's displeasure against her, and there were occasions where he was ready to cut her off, and to put the king, nor live so pleasantly with him, as she might otherwise have done; for while she was most indulgently used by the king, out of his fondness to her, and did not expect that he could do any harm to her, or had any thing in her nature that was liberty. Moreover, that which most afflicted her was, what he had done to her relations; and she ventured to speak of all they had suffered by him, and at last greatly provoked both the king's mother, and the king's mother's husband, that she was not subject to his moves; and even he himself also did the same, on whom alone she depended for her expectations of escaping the last of punishments.

7. But when she was once dead, the king's afflictions for her were kindled in a more outrageous manner than before, whose old passion for her we have already described; for his love to her was not of a calm nature, nor such as we have already mentioned; for the crown of his kingdom, and its commencement was of an enthusiastic kind; nor was it by their long cohabitation, and free conversation together, brought under his power to manage; but at this time his love to Mariamne seemed to be in such a peculiar manner, as looked like divine vengeance upon him for the taking away her life, for he would frequently call for her, and frequently lament for her in a most indecent manner. Moreover, he bestowed on him of every thing he could make use of to divert his mind from thinking of her, and contrive feasts and assemblies for that purpose, but nothing would suffice; he therefore laid aside the administration of public affairs, and was always in the field, and of his order, and would order his servants to call for Mariamne, as if she were still alive, and could still hear them. And when he was in this way, there arose a pestilential disease, that affected the greatest part of the multitude, and of his best and most esteemed friends, and made all men suspect that he was brought upon him by the anger of God, for the injustice that had been done to Mariamne. This misfortune was an occasion that he was forced to go into desert places, and there, under pretence of going a hunting, bitterly afflicted himself; yet had he not borne reading, which is here greatly to our right, or else we must, as before, either to the 5th of Joseph, 54.
highly advanced, it pleased him, and was more than he hoped for, and he was more and more puffed up by his good success, and in a little while he exceeded all bounds, and did not think fit to obey what Herod, as their ruler, commanded him, or that the Idumeans should make use of the Jewish customs, or be subject to them. He therefore sent to Cleopatra, and informed her that the Idumeans had been always under his progenitors, and that for the same reason it was no more just or reasonable that they should show respect for him of Antioy, for that he was ready to transfer his friendship to her; and this he did, not because he was better pleased to be under Cleopatra's government, but because he showed that he was, upon an unlimited power of Herod's, it would not be difficult for him to obtain himself the entire government over the Idumeans, and somewhat more also; for he raised his hopes still higher, as he saw that the Idumeans, the sons of the fortified places that were about the city, which were two, the one belonging to the city itself, the other belonging to the temple; and those that could get them into their hands had the whole power of the sacred place, or, without the command of them it was not possible to offer their sacrifices; and to think of leaving off those sacrifices, is to every Jew plainly impossible, who are still more ready to lose their lives than to lose the worship which they have been wont to pay unto God. Alexandra, therefore, discourse with those that had the keeping of these strongholds, that it was proper for them to deliver the same to her, and to Herod's sons, being of another nation and another language; and they were seized upon the government; and that upon his recovery none could keep them more safely for him than those of his own family. These words were not by them all said at the same time; and as that then had been in former times faithful [to Herod] they resolved to continue so more than ever, both because they hated Alexandra, and because they thought it a sort of impiety to deprive the country of the worship which he was yet alive, for they had been his old friends; and one of them, whose name was Achiaaus, was his cousin-german. They sent messengers, therefore, to acquaint him with Alexandra's design; so his nation under his power, for we observe have their shrine; yet was it still with difficulty, and after he had endured great pain, that he got clear of his distemper. He was still sore afflicted both in mind and body, and made very uneasy by this order of affairs, especially when he had formerly taken great pains to bring them to punishment, as being enemies to his government, but they were now forgiven by him, on account of the length of time since he had ordered them to be slain, because of his ill-will and hatred to them arose hence, that while Antigonus was king, Herod with his army besieged the city of Jerusalem, where the distress and miseries which the besieged endured were so pressing, that the body of Herod into the city, and already placed their hopes on him. Now, the sons of Babas were of great dignity, and had power among the multitude, and were faithful to Antigonus, and were always raising calumnies against Herod, and encouraged the people to preserve the government to that royal family which held it by inheritance. Christianity. Now this Babas, who was one of the race of the Asmonaeans or Macabees, as the latter end by this section informs us, is related by the Jews, as Dr Heugely, the St. Paul, as to have been singularly ingenious in the Jewish way, that except the day following the tenth of Tisri, the great day of atonement, when he saw to have supposed all his sins entirely forgiven, he used every day of the whole year to offer a sacrifice for his sins of ignorance, or such as he supposed he had committed, but from a distinctly remember. It seems somewhat like 1 of Agrippa the Great, Antid. b. xix. ch. iii. sect. 3; and Job 1. 4, 5.
So those men acted thus politically, and, as they thought, for their own advantage; but when the city was taken, and Herod had gotten the government into his own hands, and Costobarus was appointed to hinder men from passing out at the gates, and to guard the city, that those citizens that were guilty, and of the higher condition, who were not to the king, might not get out of it, Costobarus being sensible that the sons of Babas were had in respect and honor by the whole multitude, and supposing that their preservation might be of some advantage to him after the government afterward, he set them by themselves, and concealed them in his own farm; and when the thing was suspected, he assured Herod upon oath that he really knew nothing of what had taken place, and an accusation was brought against him that he lay upon him; nay, after that, when the king had publicly proposed a reward of the discovery, and had put in practice all sorts of methods for searching out this matter, he would not confess it, but being persuaded that when he had at first denied it, if the men were found, he should not escape unpunished, he was forced to keep them secret, not only out of his good-will to them, but out of a necessitated act of dishonesty. Also, when the king knew the thing by his brother’s information, he sent men to the places where he had the intimation they were concealed, and ordered both them, and those that were accused as guilty, to be seized. And when their children that were there now were all at left of the kindred of Hyrcanus, and the kingdom was entirely in Herod’s own power, and there was nobody remaining of such dignity as could put a stop to what he did against the Jewish laws.

CHAPTER VIII.

How Ten Men of the Citizens [of Jerusalem] made a Conspiracy against Herod, for the foreign Practices he had introduced, which was a Transgression of the Laws of their Country. Concerning the building of Sebaeota and Cesarea, and other Edifices of Herod. § 1. On this account it was that Herod revolted from the laws of his country, and corrupted their ancient constitution, by the introduction of foreign practices, which constitution yet ought to have been maintained, notwithstanding; for we became guilty of great wickedness afterward, while those religious observances which used to lead the multitude to pietie, were now neglected: for, in the first place, he appointed a day for his birthday, in which the king was in honor of Caesar, and built a theatre at Jerusalem, as also a very great amphitheatre in the plain. Both of these were indeed costly works but opposite to the Jewish notions; for we have had no such shows divided down to us, fit to be used or exhibited by us; yet did he celebrate these games every five years, in the most solemn and splendid manner. He also made proclamation to the neighboring countries, and called some people from them to come together to witness also, and the rest of those that strove for the prizes in such games, were invited out of every land, both by the hopes of the rewards there to be bestowed, as by the glory of victory to be there gained. So the principal persons that were the most eminent in these sorts of exercises, were gotten together, for there were very great rewards for victory proposed, not only to those that performed their exercises on land, but to those that played as musicians also, as is called Thymalici; and he spared no pains to increase all persons, the most famous for such exercises, to come to this contest for victory. He also proposed no small rewards for those who ran for the prieses in chariot races, when they were drawn by two, or three, or four pair of horses. He also imitated every thing, though ever so costly, the magnificence in his palace; but it was not out of an ambition that he might give most public demonstration of his grandeur. Inscriptions also of the great actions of Caesar, and trophies of those nations which he had conquered in his wars, and all the statues of those great men encompassed the theatre itself: nor was there any thing that could be subservient to his design, whether it were precious garments or precious stones set in order, which was not also exposed to sight in these places. He had also there a great preparation of wild beasts, and of lions themselves in great abundance, and of such other beasts as were either of uncommon strength, or of such a sort as were not warly disposed of; these were prepared either to fight one with another, or that men who were condemned to death were to fight with them. And truly foreigners were greatly surprised and delighted at the vastness of the expense he had expended, and at the things that were there seen; but to natural Jews, this was no better than a dissolution of those customs for which they had so great a veneration. It appeared also no better than an instance of barbarism, to throw so much power and money for the affording delight to the spectators; and it appeared an instance of no less impiety, to change their own laws for such foreign exercises: but, above all the rest, the trophies gave most disgust to the Jews, for as the king intended to be images, included within the armor that hung round about them, they were sorely displeased at them, because it was not the custom of their country to pay honors to such images.

2. Nor was Herod unsatisfied with the disturbance they were under; and as he thought it unserviceable to use violence with them, so he spoke to some of them by way of consolation and in order to free them from that superstitious fear they were under; yet could not he satisfy them, but they cried out with one accord, out of their great uneasiness at the offences they thought he had been guilty of, and think of bearing all the rest, yet would they never bear images of men in their city, meaning the trophies, because this was disagreeable to the laws of their country. Now when Herod saw them in such a disorder, in order to bring them easily change their resolution unless they received satisfaction in this point, he called to him the most eminent men among them, and brought them upon the theatre, and showed them the trophies, and asked them, what sort of things they took these trophies to be? and when they cried out, that they were the images of men, he gave order that they should be stripped of these outward ornaments which were about them, and showed them that the naked bodies were pieces of wood, now without any ornaments, became matter of great sport and laughter to them, because they had before always the ornaments or images themselves in derision.

3. When they saw what had been done they got clear of the multitude, and had dissipated the vehemence of passion under which they had been, the greatest part of the people were disposed to change their conduct, and not to be displeased at him any longer; for he had shown them a great deal of content, and his displeasure against him for the introduction of

* These grand plays, and shows, and Thymalici or music, mourning, and change of races, when the chariots were drawn by two, three, or four pair of horses, &c., instituted by Herod in his theatres, were still, as we see here, looked on by the sober Jews as beastish sports, and tending to corrupt the manners of the Jewish nation, and to bring them in love with Paganish idolatry and Paganish conduct of life, but to the dissolution of the law of Moses, and to the utterly void, and justly condemned by them, as appear here and everywhere else in Josephus. Nor is the case of our modern masquerades, plays, operas, and the pomps and vanities of this wicked world, of any better tendency under Christianity.
new customs, and esteemed the violation of the laws of their country as likely to be the origin of very great mischief to them, so that they deemed it an instance of piety rather to hazard themselves [to be put to death] than to seem as if they took no notice of Herod, who, upon the change in their government, introduced such customs, and that in a violent manner, which they had been used to before. He indeed in presence of a king, but in reality one that showed himself an enemy to their whole nation; on which account ten men that were citizens [of Jerusalem] conspired together against him, and swore to one another, on account of the occasion, to do any thing in the attempt, and took daggers with them under their garments, [for the purpose of killing Herod.] Now there was a certain blind man among those conspirators, who had thus sworn one to another, on account of the occasion, to do any thing in the attempt, and took daggers with them under their garments, and was not indeed able to afford the least any assistance in the undertaking, but was ready to undergo any suffering with them, if so be they should come to any misfortune. But as he was a very great encourager of the rest of the undertakers.

4. When they had taken this resolution, and that by common consent, they went into the theatre, hoping that, in the first place, Herod himself coming to them, they would fall upon him so unexpectedly; and supposing, however, that if they missed him, they should kill a great many of those that were about him; and this resolution they took, though they should die for it, in the interest of the people, and in the interest of those that had done to the multitude. These conspirators, therefore, standing thus prepared beforehand, went about their design with great alacrity; but there was one amongst them, a stammerer, that was appointed for such purposes, to fish out and inform him of any conspiracies that should be made against him, who found out the whole affair, and told the king of it, as he was about to go into the theatre. The king was not a little concerned to hear which he knew the greatest part of the people bare him, and on the disturbances that arose upon every occasion, he thought this plot against him not to be improbable. Accordingly, he retired into his palace, fearing the design that those that were about the conspiracy before him by their several names; and as, upon the guards falling upon them, they were caught in the very fact, and knew they could not escape, they prepared themselves for their execution. But the king, observing that many of them were so virtuous that they were not at all to recede from their resolute behavior; for they showed no shame for what they were about, nor denied it, but when they were seized, they showed their daggers, and professed, that as the conspiracy was directed against him, and that ungrateful and a pious action; that what they intended to do was not for gain, or out of any indulgence to their passions, but principally for those common customs of their country. So they were obliged to observe that they did for him. This is what these men said, out of their undaunted courage in this conspiracy. So they were led away to execution by the king's guards that stood about him, and patiently underwent all the tortures inflicted on them till they died. Nor was it long before that spy who had discovered them was seized on by some of the people, out of the hatred they bore to him, and was not only slain but pulled to pieces with a fit limb and given to the dogs. This execution was seen by many of the citizens, yet would not one of them discover the doers of it, till upon Herod's making a strict scrutiny after them, by bitter and severe tortures, certain women that were tortured, confessed what they had seen done; the authors of which fact were so terribly punished by the king, that their entire families were destroyed for this their rash attempt; yet did not the obstinacy of the women, and that ungrateful constancy they showed in the defence of their laws, make Herod any easier to them, but he still strengthened himself after a more secure manner, and resolved to compass the multitude, every way, lest such innovations should end in an open rebellion.

5. Since, therefore, he had now the city fortified by the palace in which he lived, and by the temple, which had a strong fortress by it, called Antonia, and was himself, he contrived to make Samaria a fortress for himself also against all the people, and called it Sebaste, supposing that this place would be a strong hold against the country, not inferior to the former. So he built another fortress for the whole nation; it was of solid masonry, he made it a place of refuge, while he was always inventing somewhat farther for his own security, and encompassing the whole nation with guards, that they might by no means get from under his power, nor fall into the hands of their enemies, in case of small commotion; and that if they did make any commotions he might know of it, while some of his spies might be upon them from the neighborhood, and might both be able to know what was done, and be able to prevent it. And when he went about building the wall of Samaria, he contrived to bring thither many of those that had been assisting to him in his wars, and settle them in this place, which was a city to whom he made free-citizens with the rest. This he did out of an ambitious design of building a temple, and out of a desire to make the city more eminent than it had been before, but prior to all things, to make it a place, on which he might once be for his own security, and a monument of his magnificence. He also changed its name, and called it Sebaste. Moreover, he parted the adjoining country, which was excelsior in its kind, among the base men he was, and to the care, he might, be in a happy condition, upon their first coming to inhabit it. Besides all which, he encompassed the city with a wall of great strength, and made use of the activity of the place for many things. But what was the most, he encompassed the place made now so small as it had been before, but was such as rendered it not inferior to the most famous cities; for it was twenty furlongs in circumference. Now, within and without the walls, he made a small temple of the city, the temple, and adorned it with all sorts of decorations, and therein erected a temple, which was illustrious on account of both its largeness and beauty. And the base men that inhabited the city, they filled them with decorations of all sorts also; and as to what was necessary to provide for his own security, he made the walls very strong, for that purpose, and made it, for the greatness of it, a city; and as to the elegance of the building, it was taken care of also, that he might leave monuments of the fineness of his taste, and of his excellence, to future ages.

CHAP. IX.
Concerning the Famine that happened in Judæa and Syria; and how Herod, after he had married another Wife, rebuilt Caesarea, and other Grecian Cities.

§ 1. Now on this very year, which was the thirteenth year of the reign of Herod, very great calamities came upon the country; whether they were derived from the war by land, or whether this misery returns again naturally in certain periods of time; for in the first place there were perpetual droughts, and for that reason the ground was barren, and did not bring forth the same quantity of fruits that it used to produce; and after this barrenness of the soil, that change of fortune had already induced distempers in the bodies of men, and a pestilential disease prevailed, one misery following upon the back of another; and the circumstances, that they were destitute both of methods of food and of means of provision of their own kind, for the temper, which began after a violent manner, the more lasting. The destruction of men also after such a manner deprived those that survived of all their courage, because they had no way to provide for remission, and if only there were a hope of they were in. When therefore the fruits of that year were spoiled, and whatsoever they had laid up beforehand was spent, there was no foundation of hope for relief remaining, but the misery, contrary to what they expected to improve upon them; and this not only in that year, while they had nothing for themselves left at the end of it, but what seed they had sown perished also, by reason of the calamity of the second year. This distress they were in, made them also, out of necessity, to eat many things that did not use to be eaten; nor was the king himself free from this distress any more than any other. But he, by his own just and due he used to have from the fruits of the ground, and having already expended what money he had, in his liberality to those whose cities he had built; nor had he any people that were worthy to stand in need then not to provide for of the state of things had procured him the hatred of his subjects, for it is a constant rule, that misfortunes are still laid to the account of those that govern.

5. In these circumstances he considered with himself how to procure some seasonable help; but this was a hard thing to be done, while their neighbors had no food to sell them, and their money also was gone, had it been possible to purchase, and their credit too was so great. However he thought it his best way, by all means, not to leave off his endeavors to assist his people; so he cut off the rich furniture that was in his palace, both of gold and silver, instead of that which did make a finest pleasure he had, or of those that were made with the most elaborate skill of the artificers, but sent the money to Petronius, who had been made prefect of Egypt by Caesar; and this was done not without his necessities, and as he was particularly a friend to Herod, and desires to have his subjects preserved, he gave leave to them in the first place to export corn, and assisted them every way, both in purchasing and exporting the same, so that he was the principal, if not the only person, who afforded what help they had. And Herod taking care the people should understand that this help came from himself, did the greatest part of that formerly hated, but gave them the greatest demonstration possible of his goodwill to them, and care of them; for in the first place, as for those who were able to provide

It is also well worth noting that the two years were a flaccid year, and a year of Jubilee, for which Providence, during the thronery, used to provide a triple, or a double, year; by which means, when the Jews had forfeited that blessing, the greatest years of famine to them ever since the days of Ahab, 1 Kings xviii. xix. and the same according to Papiasus, who is here cited by Spanheim. upper city, raising the rooms to a very great height, and adorning them with the most costly furniture of gold, and marble seats and beds, and these were so large, that they could contain very many company of men; and these apart on their own, there were also of distinct magnitudes, and had particular names given them, for one apartment was called Caesar's, another Agrippa's. He also fell in love again, and married another wife, not, such as he said, to hinder him from living as he pleased. The occasion of this his marriage was as follows: there was one Simon, a citizen of Jerusalem, the son of one Boethus, a citizen of Alexandria, and a priest of great note there; this was a very fair and beautiful woman of that time; and when the people of Jerusalem began to speak much in her commendation, it happened that Herod was much affected with what was said of her; and when he saw the damsel he was smitten with her beauty, yet did he entirely reject the thoughts of using his authority to abuse her, as believing what was the truth, that by so doing he should be stigmatised, as it were, by a name that was so furtive. It was strong by nature, and fit for such a building. It is a sort of a moderate hill, raised to a farther height by the hand of man, till it was the semblance of a woman's breast. It is encompassed with circular towers, and hath a strait ascent up to it, which ascent is composed of steps of polished stones, in number two hundred. Within it are royal and very rich apartments, of a structure that young people thought it not out of his own inclinations, but by the commands and injunctions of others, in order to please Caesar and the Romans, as though he had not the Jewish customs so much in his eye as he had here. He was a man of a very博大 and solicius temper of his, and that submissive behavior and liberality which he exercised towards Caesar, and the most powerful men of Rome, obliged him to transgress the customs of his nation. He also despised the money from the temple, and by building cities after an extravaganter manner, and erecting temples; not in Judea indeed, for that would not have been borne, it being forbidden for us to pay any honor to images, or representations of animals, after the manner of the Greeks, but still he did thus in the country [properly] out of our bounds, and in the cities thereof. in length, not less than eighteen in breadth, and nine in depth, into twenty fathoms deep, and as some were lesser, so were others bigger than these. An arch of stone, so as the sea-side was two hundred feet wide, the half of which was opposed to the current of the waves, so as to keep off those waves which were to break upon them, and so was called Procymania, because the other half had upon it a wall, with several towers, the largest of which was named Drusus, and was a work of very great excellence, and had its name from Drusus, the son of Tiberius, who lived there. There were also a great number of arches where the mariners dwelt. There were also before them a quay or landing-place, which ran round the entire haven, and was a most agreeable walk, as such as had a mind to that exercise; but the entrance or mouth of the port was made on the north quarter, on which side was the steepest of the winds of all in this place; and the basis of the whole circuit on the left hand, as you enter the port, supported a round turret, which was made very strong, in order to resist the greatest waves, while on the right hand, as you enter, stood two vast stones, and those each of them larger than the turret, which were, as it were, the outer gate, which were also round, and were joined together. Now there were edifices all along the circular haven, made of the most polished stone, with a certain elevation, whereon was erected a temple, that was seen at a distance. And the church of the city, for that haven, and had in it two statues, the one of Rome, and the other of Caesar. The city itself was called Cesarea, which was also itself built of fine materials, and was of a structure, nay, the very subterraneous vaults and cellars, had no less of architecture bestowed on them than had the buildings above ground. Some of these vaults carried things at even distances to the city, and the water through these, and other obliquely, and bound all the rest together, that both the rain and the filth of the citizens were together carried off with ease, and the sea itself, upon the flux of the tide from without, came into the city, and you enter it all clean. Herod had also built therein a theatre of stone; and on the south quarter, behind the port, an amphitheatre also, capable of holding a vast number of men, and conveniently situated for a prospect to the sea. So that in this place was the most perfection, during which time the king did not fail to go on both with the work, and to pay the charges that were necessary.

How Herod sent his Sons to Rome; how also he was accused by Zenedorus, and the Gadarens, but was cleared of what they accused him of; and withal gained to himself the good-will of Caesar. Concerning the Pharisees, the Essenes, and Manahem.

1. When Herod was engaged in such matters, and when he had already re-edified Selase, [Sybaris] and Gortyn, and Socotissera and Aristobulus to Rome, to enjoy the company of Caesar, who, when they came therer, lodged at the house of Pollio,

* Cesarea being here said to be rebuilt and adorned in twelve years, and soon afterward, in ten years, Antiq. b. xvi. ch. v. sect. 1, there must be a mistake in one of the places so to the true number, but in which of them it is hard positively to determine.

and Auranitis, which he gave him on the occasion following: one Zenedorus had hired what was called the house of Lysanias, who, as he was not satisfied with its revenue, he was unwilling to let it, and the robbers that inhabited the Trachones, and so procured himself a large income; for the inhabitants of those places lived in a mad way, and pilaged the country of the Damascenes, while Zenedorus did nothing for them, for they took of the prey they acquired. Now, as the neighboring people were hereby great sufferers, they complained to Varro, who was then president of Syria, to come to Caesar about this injustice of Zenedorus. When these matters were laid before Caesar, he wrote back to Varro to destroy those nests of robbers, and to give the land to Herod, that so by his care the neighboring people might no longer be disturbed with these doings of the Trachones, for it was not an easy thing to restrain them, since this way of robbery had been their usual practice, and they had no other way to get their living, because they had neither any city of their own, nor lands in their possession, but only some receptacles and dens in the earth, and there they and their cattle lived in common together. However, they had made contrivances to get pools of upland water, and laid upon them themselves, and were able to make great resistance by issuing out on the sudden against any that attacked them; for the entrances of their caves were narrow, in which but one could come in at a time, and the place was very circuitous, and made very wide; but the ground over their habitations was not very high, but rather on a plain, while the rocks are altogether hard and unapproachable. Any one that attempts these roads is not straight, but have several revolutions. But when these men are hindered from their wicked preyings upon their neighbors, they can not only defend their own goods, but much that no sort of injustice comes amiss to them. But when Herod had received this grant from Caesar, and was come into this country, he procured skilful guides, and put a stop to their wicked robberies, and procured peace and quietness to the neighboring people.

2. Hereupon Zenedorus was grieved, in the first place, because his principality was taken away from him, and still more so, because he envied Herod; who, having gained it in so fair a manner, went to Rome to accuse him, but returned back again without success. Now Agrippa was about this time sent to succeed Caesar in the government of this country by the Ioniaic sea, upon whom Herod lit when he was wintering at Mount Myilene, for he had been his particular friend and companion, and then returned into Judea again. However, some of the Gadarens came to Agrippa, and accused Herod, whom he sent back bound to the king without giving them the hearing; but still the Arabians, who of old bare ill-will to Herod's government, were nettled, and at that time attempted to raise a sedition in his dominions, and to revolt; and this was an inef talensible occasion; for Zenedorus despairing already of success, as to his own affairs, prevented [his enemies, by selling to those Arabs a part of his principality, called Auranitis, for the value of fifty talents, at once, and sent the whole of the donations of Caesar, they contested the point with Herod, as unjustly deprived of what they had bought. Sometimes they did this by making incursions upon him, and sometimes by attempt x. sect. 4, but Ausinius Pollio the Roman, as Sanchme here observes.

The character of this Zenedorus is so like that of a famous robber of the same name in Strabo, and that about this very country, and about this very time also that I think Dr. Harden hardly need have put a perhaps to his determination that they were the same.
ing with him, and sometimes by going to law with him. Moreover, they persuaded the poorer soldiers to help them, and were troublesome to him, out of a constant hope that they should seduce the people to raise a sedition; in which designs those that are in the most miserable circumstances of life, are still the most earnest, and averse. Herod had been in a great while pursued of these attempts, yet did not he indulge any severity to them, but by rational methods aimed to mitigate things, as not willing to give any handle for tumults. Herod had already reigned seventeen years, Cæsar came into Syria; at which time the greatest part of the inhabitants of Galilee cämored against Herod, as one that was heavy in his injunctions, and tyrannical. These rebellions he at last mainly surpassed upon by the encouragement of Zenodorus, who took his oath that he would never leave Herod till he had procured that they should be severed from Herod's kingdom, and joined to Cæsar's province. The Galileans were in, and destroyed themselves no small cry against him, and that the more boldly, because those that had been delivered up by Agrippa were not punished by Herod, who let them go, and did them no harm, for indeed he was a man in the world who spared almost inexorable in punishing crimes in his own family, but very generous in remitting the offences that were committed elsewhere. And while they accused Herod of injuries, and plundered, they themselves were of that sort as Herod was concerned, and was ready to make his defence. However, Cæsar gave him his right hand, and remitted nothing of his kindness to him, upon this account, only to his products; and indeed these things were alleged the first day, but the hearing proceeded no further; for as the Galileans saw the inclination of Cæsar and of his assessors, and expected, as they had reason to do, that he would be delivered according to the king's pleasure, they, some of them, out of a dread of the tortures they might undergo, cut their own throats in the night-time, and some of them threw themselves down precipices, and others of them cast themselves into the sea, and destroyed themselves of their own accord; which accidents seemed a sufficient condemnation of the rashness and crimes they had been guilty of: whereupon Cæsar made no longer delay, but cleared Herod from all charges; and he was acquitted here more happy accident there was, which was a further advantage to Herod at this time; for Zenodorus's belly burst, and a great quantity of blood issued from him in his sickness, and he thereby departed this life at Antipatris; and Herod stowed his country, which was no small one, upon Herod; it lay between Trachon and Galilee, and contained Úlatha, and Panæas, and the country round about. He also made him one of the procurators of Syria, and commanded that they should do every thing with his approbation; and, in short, he arrived at that pitch of felicity, that whereas there were but two men that governed the Galileans, now there were three, first Agrippa, who was his principal favorite; Cæsar preferred no one to Herod besides Agrippa, and Agrippa made no one his greater friend than Herod besides Cæsar. And when he had accusation against him for the life of Cæsar, he made a tetrarchy* for his brother Pharcoras, while he did himself bestow upon him a revenue of a hundred talents out of his own kingdom, that in case he came to any harm himself, his brother might be in safety, and that his sons might not have dominions over him. So when he had conducted Cæsar to the sea, and was returned home, he built him a most beautiful temple of the whitest stone. In Zenodorus's country, near the place called Panium. This is a very fine cave in a mountain, under which there is a great cavity in the earth, and the caverns are very deep, and full of still water; over it hangs a vast mountain; and under the caverns rise the springs of the river Jordan. Herod built a palace there, a very remarkable one, still further, by the erection of this temple, which he dedicated to Cæsar.

4. At which time Herod released to his subjects the third part of their taxes, under pretence in describing them, they had paid them out of a false good-will, which he now wanted, for they were uneasy at him, because of the innovations he had introduced in their practices, of the disuse of the earthy, and the enjoyment of their own customs; and the people everywhere talked against him, like those that were still more provoked and disturbed at his precedent: against which discontents he greatly guarded himself, and mixed out his measures of two ways; to disturb him, and enjoined them to be always at work, nor did he permit the citizens either to meet together, or to walk, or to eat together, but watched every thing they did, and when any were found out, he spent himself in his measures, and there was said that there were brought to the city of Hyrcania, both openly and secretly, and there were put to death; and there were spies set everywhere, both in the city and in the roads, who were to inform him of those things. Another is reported, that he did not himself neglect this part of caution, but that he would oftentimes himself take the habit of a private man, and mix amongst the multitude in the night-time, and make trial what opinion they had of his government; and as for those that could now be reduced to acquire some under his scheme of government, he prosecuted them all manner of ways, both in the rest of the province, and in the cities. Cæsar, so that they should be obliged to take an oath of fidelity to him, and at the same time compelled them to swear that they would bear him good-will, and continue certainly so to do, in his management of the government and indeed a great part of them, either to please him, or out of fear of him, yielded to what he required of them; but for such as were of a more open and generous disposition, and had indignation at the force he used to them, he secured them to himself by the interest of the Cæsars. He endeavored also to persuade Pollio the Pharseis, and Samæas, and the greatest part of their scholars, to take the oath; but these would neither submit so to do, nor were they punished to death, but so Cæsars of the kingdom, that are too beseare to Pollio. The Esæenses also, as we call a sect of ours, were excluded from this impostion. These men live the same kind of life as do those among the multitude, in the night-time, and make trial what opinion they had of the government. However, it is but fit to set down here the reasons wherefore Herod had these Esæenses in such honor, and thought higher of them than their manner was requisite; nor will this account be insuitable to the nature of this history, as it will show the opinion men had of these Esæenses.

5. Now there was one of these Esæenses, whose name was Manæham who had this testimony, that he had lived the life of Cæsar in an excellent manner, but had the foreknowledge of future events given him by God also. This man was once seen Herod when he was a child, and going to school, and saluted him as king of the Jews, but he, thinking that either he did not know, or that he was in jest, put him in mind that he was but a private man; but Manæham smiled to himself, and clapped him on his backside with always implies somewhat less extent of dominion and power than belong to a kingdom and to a king.
his hand, and said, "However that be, thou wilt be king; and wilt begin thy reign happily, for thou wilt do that which I command thee." And he commanded, that when they come to Jerusalem, they should go to the temple, and they should do the will of God, and they should not commit sin.

CHAP. XI.

How Herod rebuilt the Temple, and raised it higher, and made it more magnificent than it was before; as also concerning that Tower which he called Antonia.

1. And now Herod, in the eighteenth year of his reign, and after the acts already mentioned, undertook a very great work, that is, to build himself the temple of God, and make it larger and compass, and to raise it to a most magnificent altitude, and to give it the most glorious form, and to provide for all his actions according to the perfection, and this would be sufficient for an everlasting memorial of him; but as he knew the multitude were not ready nor willing to assist him, he gathered together the people first by making a speech to them, and then set about the work itself; so he called them together, and spake thus to them: "I think I need not speak to you, my countrymen, about such other works as I have done since I came to the kingdom, although I may say they have been performed in such a manner as to bring more security to you than glory to myself; for I have neither been so ignorant in the most difficult times about the needs of our necessities, nor have the buildings I have made been so proper to preserve me as yourselves from injuries; and I imagine that, with God's assistance, I have advanced the nation of the Jews to a degree of happiness which they never had before; and for the particular edifices belonging to your own country, and your own cities, that we have lately acquired, what we have done for them, and the temples and other buildings that we have erected, and thereby augmented the dignity of your nation, it seems to me a needless task to enumerate them to you, since you well know them yourselves; but as to that undertaking which I have a mind to set about at present, and which will be a work of the greatest piety and excellence that can possibly be undertaken by us, I will now declare it to you. Our fathers indeed, when they were taken into captivity in this temple to God Almighty, yet did they want sixty cubits of its largeness in altitude; for so much did that first temple which Solomon built exceed this temple; nor let any one condemn our fathers for their neglect, for the temple was herein, for it was not their fault that the temple was no higher; for they were Cyrus, and Darius the son of Hystaspes, who determined the measure for its rebuilding; and it hath been by reason of the subjection of those few to them, and to their posterity, and after them to the Macedonians, that they had not the opportunity to follow the original model of this pious edifice, nor could raise it to its ancient altitude; but since I am now king, I will indeed, if God be willing, and I have had peace a long time, and have gained great riches, and large revenues, and what is the principal thing of all, I am at amity with, and well regarded by, the Romans, who, if I may so say, are as a father to me, I will do my endeavor to correct that imperfection, which hath arisen from the necessity of our affairs, and the slavery we have been under formerly, and to make it thankful for the most pious manner, to God, for what blessings I have received from him, by giving me this kingdom, and that by rendering his temple as complete as I am able."

2. And this was the speech which Herod made to them; but still this speech affrighted many of the people, as being unexpected by them; and, because it seemed incredible, it did not encourage them, but put a dam upon them, for they were afraid that he would pull down a whole edifice, and not be able to bring his intentions to perfection for its rebuilding; and this danger appeared to them to be very great, and the want of the undertaking to be such as could hardly be accomplished. But when he perceived their disposition, the king encouraged them, and told them, "He would not pull down their temple till all things were gotten ready for building it up entirely again. And as he promised them this beforehand, so did he not break with them, but got ready a thousand wagons, that were to bring stones for the building, and chose out ten thousand of the most skillful workmen, and brought a thousand sculptural garments for as many of the priests, and had some of them taught the art of stonemasons, and others of carpenters, and then began to build, but this not till every thing was well prepared for the work.

3. So Herod took away the old foundations, and laid others, and erected the temple upon them, being in length a hundred cubits, and in height twenty additional cubits, which [twenty] upon the sinking of their foundations, fell down.

1 Some of our modern students in architecture have made a strange blunder. In the time of Josephus, the third of their temples the second temple, followed so long by later Christians, seems to be without any solid founda- tion. Josephus tells us that the Jews are, in the prophecy of Hagigah, t. 5—9, which they expound of the Messiah's coming to the second or Zarobubel's temple, of which they suppose this of Herod's to be only the site, that south part, in which he meant I think, of his coming to the fourth and last temple, or to that future largest and most glorious one described by Es-rael. Whence I take the former notion, how general, because, to be a great mistake. See Lit. Accomp. of Papeg. p 84.
and this part it was that we resolved to raise again in the days of Nero. Now, the temple was built of stones that were white and strong, and each of their length five cubits, their height was eight, and their breadth about twelve; and the whole structure, as also the structure of the royal cloister, was on each side much lower, but the middle was much higher, till they were adorned with those that did round about for a great many furlongs, but chiefly to such as lived over against them, and those that approached to them. The temple had doors also at the entrance, and lintels over them of the same height, of which they were adorned with embroidered vails, with their flowers of purple, and pillars interwoven: and over these, but under the crownwork, was spread out a gold crown for its branches hanging down from a great height, the largeness and fine workmanship of which was a surprising sight to the spectators, to see what vast materials there were. And with what great skill the workmanship was done. He also the thrones were joined and fitted to the temple itself with embroidered vails, and a large wall to both cloisters, which wall was itself the most prodigious work that was ever heard of by man. The hill was a rocky ascents, that declined by degrees towards the east parts of the temple, and came to an elevated level. This hill it was which Solomon, who was the first of our kings, by divine revelation, encompassed with a wall; it was of excellent workmanship upwards, and round the top of it. He also, the two king and the bottom, which was encompassed by a deep valley; and at the south side he laid rocks together, and bound them one to another with lead, and included some of the inner parts, till it proceeded to a great height, and till both the cloisters, the square edifice, and its altitude, were immense, and till the vastness of the stones in the front were plain view visible on the outside, yet so the thrones were fastened together with iron, and preserved the joints immovable for all future times. When this work [for the foundation] was done in this manner, and joined together as part of the hill itself to the very top of it, they fastened it into one deep central surface, and filled up the hollow places which were about the wall, and made it a level on the external upper surface, and a smooth level also. This hill was walled all round, and in compass four furlongs, [the distance of] each angle containing in length a furlong: but within this wall, and on the very top of all, there ran another wall of stone also, having, on the east quarter, a double cloister, of the same length with the wall; in the middle of which was the temple itself. This cloister looked to the gates of the temple; and it had been adorned by many kings in former times. And round about the entire temple were fixed the spoils taken from barbarous nations: all these had been fastened to the temple by Herod, with the addition of those he had taken from the Armagnians.

4. Now on the north side [of the temple] was built a citadel, whose walls were square, and strong; and the pillars from the main gate to the temple itself was built by the kings of the Astmonian race, who were also high priests before Herod, and they called it the Tower, in which were reposed the vestments of the high priest, which the high priest only put on at the time when he was to offer sacrifice. These vestments king

And that this which had fallen down was designed to be raised up again under Nero, under whom Agrippa made that preparation. But what Josephus says presently, that Solomon was the first king of the Jews, Herod kept in that place, and after his death they were under the power of the Romans, until the time of Tiberius Caesar; under whose reign Vespasian was the president of Syria, when he once came to Jerusalem, and had been most magnificently received by the multitude, had a mind to make them some requital for the kindness they had showed him; so, upon their petition to have them in the country, he wrote about them to Tiberius Caesar, who granted his request; and this their power over the meridian vestments continued with the Jews till the death of king Agrippa, but after that, when Titus, the president of Syria, and Cuspius Fadus, who was procurator of Judea, enjoined the Jews to reposite those vestments in the Tower of Antonia, for that they ought to give them in the power, as they had given them. He even the Jews sent ambassadors to Claudius Caesar, to intercede with him for them, upon whose coming, king Agrippa, jun. being then at Rome, asked for, and obtained, the power over them from the emperor, who gave them to Vitellius, who was then commander in Syria, to give it them accordingly. Before that time, they were kept under the seal of the high priest, and of the treasurers of the temple; which treasurers were done by men of the Romish nation, and by the Roman captain of the temple guards, and viewed their own seal, and received the vestments; and again, when the festival was over, they brought them to the same place, and showed the emperor the vestments, and the Jews corresponded with his seal, and reposited them there. And that these things were so, the affections that happened to us afterward [about them] are sufficient evidence: but for the tower itself, and the walled in building of it, it is more firmly than before, in order to secure and guard the temple, he gratified Antonius, who was his friend, and the Roman ruler, and then gave it the name of the Tower of Antonia.
BOOK XV.—CHAP. XI.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF TWELVE YEARS.—FROM THE FINISHING OF THE TEMPLE BY HEROD TO THE DEATH OF ALEXANDER AND ARISTOBULUS.

CHAP. 1.

A Law of Herod about Thieves. Salome and Phereor assignate Alexander and Aristobulus upon their Return from Rome, for whom yet Herod provides Wines.

1. At king Herod was very zealous in the administration of his entire government, and to do justice unto every case, he made this law, to wit: that all who were born in the city and country, and otherwise in the city and country, should be judged in the court where the laws are written, and the enemies and poor should be ejected out of his kingdom; and that if any should be born by the enemies, or by persons who were at enmity with the king, he should not be admitted to the kingdom of Herod, unless he had been in a foreign country, and that he should be judged according to the laws of his country.

2. Now at this time it was that he sailed to Italy, as very desirous to meet with Caesar, and to see his sons who lived at Rome: and Caesar was not only very obliging to him in other respects, but did deliver him his sons again, that he might take care of them, as if they had already completed themselves in the sciences; but as soon as the young men were come from Italy, the multitude were very desirous to see them, and they became conspicuous among them all, as adorned with great blessings of God, and having the countenance of persons of royal sacrifices and burnt-offerings to God. Into some of these did king Herod enter, for he was forbidden, because he was not a priest. However, he took care of the cloisters, and the outer enclosures, and these he built in eight years.

6. But the temple itself was built by the priests in a year and six months: upon which all the people were glad, and returned thanks. In the first place to God, and in the next place, for the alacrity the king had showed. They feasted, and celebrated this rebuilding of the temple: and for the king, he sacrificed three hundred oxen to God, as did the rest, every one according to his ability: the number of which sacrifices is not possible to be set down, for it cannot be that we should truly relate it: for at the same time with this celebration for the work, the king and the people celebrated the day of the king’s inauguration, which he kept in an old custom as a festival, and it now coincided with the other, which coincidence of them both made the festival more illustrious.

7. There was also an occult passage, built for the king: it led from Antonia to the inner temple, at its eastern gate; over which he also erected for himself a tower, that he might have the opportunity of a subterraneous ascent to the temple, in order to guard against another death at the eastern gate of the temple, in a place where he had been often in danger.

8. This tradition which Josephus here mentions as delivered down from fathers to their children, of this particular remarkable circumstance relating to the building of Herod’s temple, is a demonstration that such its building was a known thing in Judea in his time. He was born, but forty-six years after it is related to have been finished, and might himself have seen and spoken with some of the builders themselves, and with a great number of those that had seen it building. This doubt therefore about the truth of this history of the pulling down and rebuilding this temple by Herod, which some weak people have indulged, was not then much greater than it soon may be, whether or not our St. Paul’s church in London was burnt down in the fire of London, A. D. 1666, and rebuilt by Sir Christopher Wren a little after ward. dignity. So they soon appeared to be the objects of envy to Salome, the king's sister, and to such as had raised calumny against Mariamme: for they were suspected, that when these came to the government, they should be punished for the wickedness they had been guilty of against their mother: so they made this very fear of theirs a motive to raise calumnies against them also. To this end, it is said, they were not pleased with the farmer's custom, because he had put their mother to death, as if it were not allowable to pietly to appear to converse with their mother's murderer. Now by carrying these stories, that had been invented for the sake of the fact but were only built on probabilities as to the present accusation, they were able to do them mischief, and to make Herod take away that kindness from his sons which he had before borne to them, for they did not visit him as if he was the king at that time in condition to prefer the natural affection of a father before all the suspicions and calumnies his sons lay under; so he respected them as he ought to do, and married them to a power, and left in, not with the want in an age suitable thereto. To Aristobulus he gave for his wife Berenice, Salome's daughter, and to Alexander, Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia.

CHAP. II.

How Herod twice sailed to Agrippa; and how, upon the Complaint of the Jews in Ionia against the Greeks, Agrippa confirmed the Laws of the Jews to them.

1. When Herod had despatched these affairs, and he understood that Marcus Agrippa had sailed to Italy into Asia, he made haste to him, and besought him to come to him into his kingdom, and to partake of what he might justly expect from one that had been his guest, and was his friend. This request he greatly pressed, and to it Agrippa agreed, and came into Judæa; yet whereupon Herod omitted nothing that might please him. He entertained him in his new-built cities, and showed him the edifices he had built, and provided all sorts of the best and most costly dishes for his table, and that at the bazaar and Cæsarea, about that port that he had built, and at the fortresses which he had erected at great expenses, Alexandria, and Herodium, and Hyracania. He also conducted him to the city Jerusalem, and the people met him in their festival garments, and received him with acclamations. Agrippa also offered a hecatomb of sacrifices to God, and feasted the people, without omitting any of the greatest dainties that could be given. He also took so much pleasure there, that he abode many days with them, and would willingly have staid longer, but that the season of the year made him make haste again, and the winter was coming on, he thought it not safe to go to sea later, and yet he was of necessity to return again to Ionia.

2. So Agrippa went away, when Herod had bestowed on him, and on the principal of those that were present, many presents; but when Herod, when he had passed the winter in his own dominions, made haste to get to him again in the spring, when he knew he designed to go to a campaign at the Bosporus. So when he had sailed by Rhodes, and by Cos, he touched at Lesbos, as thinking he should have over-agrippa there, but he was taken short by a north wind, which hindered his ship from going to the shore; so he continued many days at Chios, and there he kindly treated a great many that came to him, and obliged them by giving them royal gifts. And when he saw that the portico of the city was fallen down, which, as it was overthrown in the Mithridatic war, was never since rebuilt, he resolved it not so easy to rebuild that, as it was the rest; yet did he furnish a sum not only large enough for that purpose, but what was more than sufficient to build a new house of building, and ornamented it. He also looked that the city, but he rebuild it quickly, that so the city might recover its proper ornaments. And when the high winds were laid, he sailed to Mytilene, and thence to Byzantium; and when he had brought the Romans over the Cæsarean rocks, he made all the haste possible to overtake him, and came up with him about Siphnos, in Pontus. He was seen sailing by the shipsmen most unexpectedly, but appeared to be a very large and fine vessel, so that there were between them, insomuch that Agrippa thought he had received the greatest marks of the king's kindness and humanity towards him possible, since the king had come so long a voyage, and at a very young age after his father, and had left the government of his own dominions, and thought it more worth his while to come to him. Accordingly, Herod was all in all to Agrippa in the management of the war, and he furnished him with large sums of money, and counselled him as to particular matters. He was also a pleasant companion for him when he relaxed himself, and a joint partaker with him in all things: in troubles, because of his kindness, and in successes, because of the respect shown him for his sake. Now, as soon as those affairs of Pontus were finished, for whose sake Agrippa was sent thither, they did not think fit to retire by sea, but passed through Paphlagonia and Cappadocia, and then travelled over the Great Phrygia, and came to Ephesos, and then they sailed from Ephesos to Samos. And indeed the king bestowed a great many benefits on every city he came to, so as to make them need of them; for as those that wanted either money or kind treatment, he was not wanting to them; but he supplied the former himself out of his own expenses: he also became an intercessor and judge, and made the laws of him, and he brought things so about, that the petitioners failed in none of their suits to him, Agrippa being himself of a good disposition, and of great generosity, and ready to grant all such requests as were made to him; so that even the Greeks were provided they were not to the detriment of others. The inclination of the king was of great weight also, and still excited Agrippa, who was himself ready to do good; for he made a reconciliation between the people of Ionia, who were very angry, and paid what money the people of Chios owed Cæsar's procurators, and discharged them of their tributes; and helped all others according as their several necessities required.
in itself a privilege to be envied, so it is for the advantage of those that grant it to us; for if the Divinity delights in being honored, he must delight in those that permit him to be honored:
and where there are none of our customs which are human, but all tending to piety, and devoted to the preservation of justice; nor do we conceal these injunctions of ours, by which we govern our lives, they being memorials of piety, and of a friendly conversation and of a regular way of living. On the seventh day we set apart from labor; it is dedicate to the learning of our customs and laws, was thinking it proper to reflect on them, as well as on any [good] thing else, in order to our exalpiing of sin. If any of those who are present were observed, he will find they are good in themselves, and that they are ancient also, though some think otherwise, inasmuch, that those who have received them cannot easily be brought to depart from them, out of that honor they give to the length of time they have religiously enjoyed them, and observed them. Now our adversaries take these our privileges away, in the way of injustice: they violently seize upon that money of ours, which is deserved to God, and called sacred money, and this openly, after a sacrilgious manner; and they impose tributes upon us, and bring us before tribunals on holy days, and then require of us what the contracts require it, or for their own advantage, but because they would put an affront on our religion, of which they are conscious as well as we, and have indulged themselves in an unsjust, and to the injury of us, their festivals, which they celebrated in honor of those they suppose to be gods? I know very well that they would choose to suffer anything whatsoever, rather than a dissolution of any of the things, as the Agricola says, that are usual among many of them: either to go to war on that account, as very solicitous not to transgress in those matters: and indeed we take an estimate of that happiness which all mankind do never by but means. But it is true, that there are not so great as an instance of impatience, profanely to dissolve the religious solemnities of any others, as to be negligent in the observation of their own.
But I consider the one of these practices: is there any people, or city, or community of men, to whom your government and the Roman power does not appear to be the greatest blessing? Is there any one that can desire to make void the favors they have granted? No one is certainly so mad: for there are no men but such as have been partakers of their favors, both public and private; and indeed those that take away what you have granted, have no assurance; but our religion, and their own greats made them by you, may be taken from them also; which grants of yours can yet never be sufficiently valued; for if they conside the old governments, under kings, whether with you, or under the government, from which a number of benefits which this government hath bestowed on them in order to their happiness, this is instead of all the rest, that they appear to be so no longer in a state of slavery, but of freedom. For by my opinion, in which we are in the best circumstances, are not such as deserve to be envied, for we are indeed in a proper state by your means, but this is only equal in common with others; and it is no more things than this, which in the name of religion, in the battles on land, nor in the management to, and to the meditation on the law of Moses. The like to which we meet with elsewhere in Josephus also against Apion, b. 1 sect. 29.
of the city; and what need I say anything of how great weight those soldiers were at that juncture? or how many and how great presents they were victorious by Caesar? And truly I ought, before now to have mentioned the epistles which Caesar wrote to the senate, and how Antipater had honors, and the freedom of the city of Rome, bestowed upon him, for these are demonstrative that we have not deserved these favors by our own deserts, and do on that account petition thee for thy confirmation of them, from whom we had reason to hope for them, though thou dost favor them, both out of regard to our king's disposition towards you, and your disposition towards him. And farther, we have been informed by those Jews that were there, with what kindness thou camest into our country, and thou offeredst them the most excellent sacrifices to God, and honored him with remarkable vows, and how thou gavest the people a feast, and acceptedst of their own hospitalite presents to thee. We ought to esteem all these kind offices.

4. When Nicolaus had made his speech, there was no opposition made to it by the Greeks, for this was not an inquiry made, as in a court of justice, but an intercession to prevent violence to be done to the Jews; and, indeed, nor did the Greeks make any defence of themselves, or deny what it was supposed they had done. Their pretence was no more than this, that while the Jews inhabited in their country, they were subjection to them [in no manner], because in their worship, but they demonstrated their generosity in this, that though they worshipped according to their own institutions, they did nothing that obtruded on them. So when Agrippa perceived that they had been oppressed by violence, he made this answer: "That on account of Herod's good-will and friendship, he was ready to grant the Jews whatsoever they should ask him, if only their requests were directed to him in themselves just; and that if they requested any thing further, he should not scruple to grant it then, provided it was no way to the detriment of the Roman government; but that, while their request was not such, and if what privileges they had already given them might not be abrogated, he confirmed this to them, that they might continue in the observation of their own customs, without any one's offering them the least injury." And when he had made this, he dissolved the assembly; upon which Herod stood up, and saluted him, and gave him thanks for the kind disposition he showed to them. Agrippa also took this in a very obliging manner, and saluted him with him, and embraced him in his arms; after which he went away from Lesbos; but the king determined to sail from Samos to his own country; and when he had taken his leave of Agrippa, he pursued his voyage, and landed at Cesarea in a few days; and as having favorable winds, from whence he went to Jerusalem, and there gathered all the people together to an assembly, not a few being there out of the country also. So he came to them, and gave them a particular account of all his journey, and of the affairs of all the Jews in Asia, how by his means they would live without injurious treatment for the time to come. He also told them of the entire good fortune he had met with, and how he had administered the government, and had not neglected any thing which was for their advantage; and as he was very joyful, he now remitted to them the fourth part of their taxes for the last year. Accordingly, they were very pleased with his favor and speech to them, that they went their ways with great gladness, and wished the king all manner of happiness.

CHAP. III.

How great Disturbances arose in Herod's Family on his preferring Antipater, his eldest Son, before the rest, till Alexander took that Injury very heinously.

1. But now the affairs in Herod's family were in more disorder, and became more severe upon him, by the hatred of Salome to the young Alexander. For it is said, that when Alexander was succeeded as it were by inheritance [from their mother Mariamne:] and as she had fully succeeded against their mother, so she proceeded to that degree of madness and insolence as to endeavor that none of her posterity might be ingrafted, who might have it in their power to revenge her death. The young men had also somewhat of a cold and uneasy disposition towards their father, occasioned by the remembrance of what their mother had done, and as by that they had a strong affection of dominion. The old grudge was also renewed; and they cast reproaches on Salome and Pheroras, who required the young men with malicious designs, and actually laid it to their charge for them, that none through hatred, it was equal on both sides, but the manner of exerting that hatred was different: for as for the young men, they were rash, reproaching and affronting the others openly, and were unexpectantly violent and rude towards them; while they declared their minds in that undaunted manner: but the others did not take that method, but made use of calumnies after a subtle and a sly manner, still provoking the young men, and imitating that their behavior was more to turn to the offering violence to their father; for inasmuch as they were not ashamed of the pretended crimes of their mother, nor thought she suffered justly, nor by this support, but as the men of the same family, it was evident that they thought they ought to be avenged on their father; and it was by disparaging him with their own hands. At length it came to this, that the king was afraid of the quarrel; and as there was no way of his settling it, he began to turn his eyes to the offering violence to their father; for inasmuch as they were not ashamed of the pretended crimes of their mother, nor thought she suffered justly, nor by this support, but as the men of the same family, it was evident that they thought they ought to be avenged on their father; and it was by disparaging him with their own hands. At length it came to this, that the king was afraid of the quarrel; and as there was no way of his settling it, he began to turn his eyes to the offering violence to their father; for inasmuch as they were not ashamed of the pretended crimes of their mother, nor thought she suffered justly, nor by this support, but as the men of the same family, it was evident that they thought they ought to be avenged on their father; and it was by disparaging him with their own hands.

2. These disorders increased greatly, and the king came to know about it, and he had a fit opportunity for that increase; but as soon as Herod was returned, and had made the aforementioned speech to the multitude, Pheroras and Salome let fall words immediately, as if he were in great danger, and as if the young men openly threatened that they would not spare him any longer, but revenge their mother's death upon him. They also added another circumstance, that their hopes were fixed on Archelaus, the king of Cappadocia, that they should be able by his means to come to Caesar, and accuse their father. Upon hearing such things, Herod was immediately disturbed; and indeed was the more astonished, because the same things were related to him by some others also. He then called to mind his former calamity and considered that the disorders in his family had hindered him from enjoying any comfort from those that were dearest to him, or from his wife, whom he loved so well; and supposing, that his future troubles would soon be heavier and greater than those that were past, he was in great confusion of mind; for Divine Providence had in reality conferred upon him a great many occupations, which were burdensome to him, and was about to exceed beyond his hopes, but the troubles he had at home were such as he never expected to have met with, and rendered him unfortunate; nay, both sorts came upon him to such a degree as no one could have believed or imagined; whether, upon the comparison of both, he ought to have exchanged so great a success of outward good things, for so great misfortunes at home, or while he might not be disposed to avoid the calamities relating to his family, though he had, for a compensation, never been possessed of the admired grandeur of a kingdom.

As he was thus disturbed and afflicted, in order for the better to judge and to begin court another of his sons, that was born to him when he was a private man: his name was Antipater; yet did he not then indulge him as he did afterward, when he was quite overcome by him, for he would not do everything by force, and, but rather with a design of depressing the insolence of the sons of Marisamine, and managing this elevation of his, so that it might be for a warning to them, for this bold behavior of theirs (but which he would not be so grave as to once persuaded, that the succession to the kingdome did not appertain to them alone, or must of necessity come to them. So he introduced Antipater as their antagonist, and imagined that he said a good promise and doing every thing by force without, and that after this was done to the young men, there might be a proper season for expecting those to be of a better disposition: but the event proved otherwise than he intended, for the young man thought he did them a greater injury; and as Antipater was a shrewd man, when he had once obtained this degree of freedom, and began to expect greater things than he had before thought, he, for his head, and that was, to disfigure his breath, and not at all to yield to them the pre-eminence, but to keep close to his father, who was already alienated from them by the calamities he had heard about them; and he did so, and with ease, and by way his zeal against them should advise him to persevere, that he might be continually more and more severe against them. Accordingly, all the reports that were spread abroad came from him, while he disguised himself in the disguise of those discoveries proceeding from him, for he rather chose to make use of those persons for his assistants that were unsuspected, and such as might be believed to speak truth by reason of the good will they bare to the king; and according to what he were already not a few who cultivated a friendship with Antipater, in hopes of gaining some who, and these are the men who most of all persuaded Herod, because they appeared to him, not to his father, when he was about to act against these, and while these joint accusations, from various foundations, supported one another's veracity, the young men themselves afforded farther occasions to Antipater also: for they were observed to show themselves in account of the number so far offered them, and had their mother in their mouths; and among their friends they ventured to reproach their father, as not acting justly by them; all which things were with an evil intention reserved in memory by Antipater against a proper opportunity; and when they were told to Herod, with aggravations, increased the disorder so much, that it brought a great tumult into the family; for while the king was very angry at imputations that were laid upon the sons of Marisamine, and was obnoxious to them, he still increased the honor that he had bestowed on Antipater; and was at last so overcome by his persuasions, that he brought his mother to court also. He also wrote frequently to Caesar in favor of him, and made his son Antipater known to his particular care. And when Agrippa was returning to Rome, after he had finished his ten years' government in Asia, Herod sailed from Judea; and when he met with him, he had none with him but Antipater, whom he delivered to Agrippa, that he might take him along with him, together with many presents, that so he might become Caesar's friend, insomuch, that things already looked so mightily in favor of his son, that the young men were entirely rejected from any hopes of the kingdom.

CHAP. IV.

How, during Antipater's Abode at Rome, Herod brought Alexander and Aristobulus before Casar, and accused them of the Attempt to take Place of himself before Casar, and Reconciliation to his Father.

1. AND now what happened during Antipater's absence augmented the honor to which he had been promoted, and his apparent eminence above his brethren, for he had made a great figure in Rome, because Herod had sent frequent recommendations of him to all his friends there: only he was grieved that he was not at home, nor had proper opportunities of perpetually commending his son to his breast; and his son should alter his mind, and entertain a more favorable opinion of the sons of Marisamine; and as he had this in his mind, he did not desist from his purpose, but continually sent from Rome any such stories as he hoped might grieve and irritate his father against his brethren, under pretense indeed of a deep concern for his preservation; but in truth, such as his malicious mind dictated, in order to purchase a greater hope of the succession, which he thought would be in itself: and thus he did till he had excited such a degree of anger in Herod, that he was already become very ill-disposed towards the young men: but still, while he delayed to exercise so violent a diuersity against them, that he might not either be too remiss or too rash, and so offend, he thought it best to sail to Rome, and there accuse his sons before Caesar, and not indulge himself in any such crimes as might be heinous enough to be suspected of impiety: but he was going up to Rome, it happened that he made such haste as to meet with Caesar at the city Aquileia; so when he came to the speech of Caesar, he asked for a time to hear this great cause, whereby he thought himself most eligible, and presented his sons there, and accused them of their mad actions, and of their attempts against him: that "They were enemies to his life: and by all the efforts he could make, to the utmost of his endeavors to show their hatred to their own father, and would take away his life, and so obtain his kingdom after the most barbarous manners;" and

3. though what he here says belonged distinctly to Alexander the elder brother, I mean his being brought to Rome, here he justly extorted to both the brothers and that not only in our copies, but in that of Zonaras also; nor is there reason to doubt but that were it with the solemn hearing by Augustus, although the defence was made by Alexander alone, who was the eldest brother and one that could speak very well.
that he had power from Cæsar to dispose of it, not by necessity, but by choice, to him who shall exercise the greatest piety towards him, while these my sons are not so desirous of ruling, as they are, upon a disappointment thereof, to expose their own life, if so be they may but deprive their father of his life, so wild and polluted is their mind by time become out of their hatred to him; that whereas he had a long time borne this misfortune, he was now compelled to lay it before him in a pool of guilt; by what language, while he himself wants to know what severity they have ever suffered from him, or what hardships he hath ever laid upon them to make them his friends; if they can think it just that he should not be lord of that kingdom, which he in a long time and with great danger had gained, and not allow him to keep it and to dispose of it to him who should deserve it best; and at this, the other men propose as a reward for the piety of such as will hereafter imitate the care he hath taken of it, and that such a one may gain so great a re- guilt as that is: and that it is an impious thing for them to meddle with that which is before mankind, and that for he who hath ever the kingdom in his view, at the same time reckons upon procuring the death of his father, because otherwise he cannot come at the government; that as for himself, he had purchased all that he was able, and what was agreeable to such as are subject to the royal authority, and the sons of a king; what ornaments they wanted, with servants and delicate fare; and had married them into the more noble houses. And his mother also, the sister’s daughter, but Alexander to the daugh- ter of king Archelaus; and what was the greatest favor of all, when their crimes were so very bad, and he was unable to mischief such things; yet had he not made use of it against them, but had brought them before Cæsar their common bene- factor, and had not used the severity which, either as a father who had been impiosely ab- used, or as a king who had been insulted treacherously, he might have done, he made them stand upon the level with him in judgment; that, however, it was necessary that all this should not be passed over without punishment, nor him- self and his sons and his associates, but that not for their own advantage to see the light of the sun after what they have done, although they should escape at this time, since they had done the vilest things, and would certainly suffer the greatest punishments that ever were known among mankind.”

2. These were the accusations which Herod laid with great vehemence against his sons before Cæsar. Now, the young men, both while he was present, and when he was absent, thought what they said, and were in confusion. Now, as to themselves, they knew in their own consciousness they were innocent, but because they were accused by their father, they were sensible, as a truth was, that it was hard for them to make their apology, since, though they were at liberty to speak their minds freely as the occasion required, and might with force and earnestness refute the accusation, yet they knew not how to do so. There was therefore a difficulty how they should be able to speak; and tears, and at length a deep groan, followed, while they were afraid, that if they said nothing, they should seem to be in this difficulty from necessity of guilt: and they who were the defence ready, by reason of their youth, and the disorder they were under; yet was not Cæsar un- surprising, when he looked upon them in the con- fusion they were in, that their delay to make their defence did not arise from any conscious- ness of great enormities, but from their unskil- lfulness and modesty. They were also commi- nated by those that were there in particular, and they moved their father’s affections in earnest till he had much ado to conceal them.

3. But when they saw there was a kind dispo- sition arises both in him and in Cæsar, and that every one of the rest did either shed tears, or at least did all grieve with them, the one of them, whose name was Alexander, called to his father, and attempted to answer his accusation, and said, “O father, the benevolence thou hast showed to us, is evident, even in this very judicial pro- cedure; for hadst thou had any pernicious inten- tions about us, thou hadst not produced us here before thee, but perhaps, thou wouldst have been afraid of thy power, both as a king, and as a father to punish the guilty; but by thus bringing us to Rome, and making Cæsar himself a witness to our innocence, what doth he not declare, from his heart, to save us for no one that hath a design to slay a man will bring him to the temples, and to the altar; yet are our circumstances still worse, for we cannot endure to live ourselves any longer, if we believed that we had injured so to say; in- deed, no, perhaps it would be worse for us to live with this suspicion upon us, that we have injured him, than to die without such guilt; and if our open defence may be taken to be true, we all shall be executed; though both Cæsar and I are escaping the danger we are in; but if this calamity so prevails, it is more than enough for us that we have seen the sun this day; which why should we see, if this suspicion be fixed upon us? Now it is not enough for us all to be secure; we are about to reign; and to say farther, that this evil pro- ceeds from the case of our unhappy mother. This is abundantly sufficient to produce our misfortune out of the former; but consider well, whether she were a young man, and may not be said of them all pro- miscuously? for nothing can hinder him that reigns, if he have children, and their mother be with child. Therefore, if it be the case, and they are all his sons, as intemperance in treachery to him; but a suspicion is not sufficient to prove such an impious practice. Now let any man say, whether we have actually and insolently attempted any action, that we are guilty of, we are sometimes pretended by way of calumny, when they were never done; for a royal family that is at variance with itself is a terrible thing; and that which thou callst a reward of piety,0 nothing but some very wicked action, a foundation of hope as makes them leave no sort of mischief untied; nor does any one lay any wicked practices to our charge; but as to cal- umnies by hearsay, how can be put an end to them? and was it not an insult to him that it was we who were accused? Have we talked with too great freedom? yes; but not against thee, for that would be unjust, but against those that never conceal any thing that is spoken against thee, such is our mother?” Has it ever happened, of us to love our mother? yes; but not because her son is dead, but because she was evil spoken of by those who had no reason so to do. Are we des- troyed of that dominion which we know our father to have, why should we be? If we already have royal honors, as we have, should not we labor in vain? And if we have them not, yet are we not in hopes of them? Or supposing that we had killed thee, could we ex- ecute it upon a man who was so kind to us? And they who would defend their lives, the earth would let us tread upon it, nor the sea let us sail upon it, after such an action as that: may the religion of all your subjects, and the piety of the whole nation, have prohibited parti- culars from assuming the government, and from entering into that most holy temple which was built by thee. But suppose we had made light of other dangers can any murderer go off unpunished, while Caesar is alive. We are thy sons, and not so impious, or so thoughtless, as that comes to, though perhaps more unfortunate than is convenient for thee. But in case thou seest at last days they were with Caesar. Herod made him a present of three hundred talents, joined at this reconciliation. And by the power of the state. For the people of Rome: and Caesar made him a present of half the revenues of the copper mines in Cyprus, and committed the care of the other half to him. And he honours him with other graces, and encourages him, and as to his own kingdom, he left it in his own power to appoint which of his sons he pleased for his successor, or to distribute it in parts to every one, that the dignity might be divided among them all. And when Herod was disposed to make such a settlement immediately, Caesar said, "He would not give him leave to deprive himself, while he was alive, of the power over his kindred himself."

8. After this Herod returned to Judea again, but during his absence no small part of his dominions about Trachon had revolted, whom yet the commanders he left there had vanquished, and committed to submission again. Now, as Herod was sailing with his sons, and was come over against Cilicia, to [the island] Eleusis, which fast now changed its name for Sebaste, he met with Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, who received him kindly and uprightly, and he was heartily sorry, for that was spread abroad the king hated, for the very incredibility of the calumny, and the commencements of the flower of youth, the beauty of body, which were in the young men, pleased for assistance: and the more so on the account, that Alexander had made their defence with dexterity and prudence; and, they did not themselves any longer continue in their former course. The relations which had been brought, with tears and cast downwards to the ground, beg for peace, and the king himself appeared not to have had foundation enough to build such an accusation upon, he hearing the story, led them away, and committed them. Indeed he wanted some apology for making the accusation; but Caesar, after some delay, said, that "although the young men were thoroughly innocent of that for which they were calumniated, in the king's name, they had done nothing that they had not demeaned themselves towards their father so as to prevent that suspicion which was spread abroad concerning them." He also exhorted Herod to lay all such suspicions aside, and to be reconciled to his sons; but, as he had not just to give any credit to such reports concerning his own children; and that this remoteness on both sides might still heal those breaches that had happened between them, and might improve their good-will to one another, whereas those on both sides, excusing the harshness of their suspicions, might resolve to bear a greater degree of affection towards each other than they had before. After Caesar had given them this advice, he proceeded to the business he had therefore was disposed to fall down to make intercession to their father, he took them up, and embraced them, as they were in tears, and took each of them distinctly in his arms, till not one of these that were present, whether free-man or slave, but was deeply affected with what they saw. 5. Then did they return thanks to Caesar, and went away together; and with them was the scribe, with a hyperbolical pretext that he was rebuilding the temple is no better than a fable, it may not be difficult to answer the occasion of the speech of Alexander before his father Herod, in his and his brother's vindication, which mentions the temple as finished, he shall have a body to have been built by Herod, see John ii. 20. How Herod celebrated the Games that were to return every fifth Year, upon the Building of Cæsarea; and how he build and adorned many other Places after a magnificent Manner; and did many other Actions glorious.

1. About this time it was that Cæsarea Sebaste, which he had built, was finished. The entire building being accomplished in the tenth year, the solemnity of it fell into the twenty-sixth year of Herod's reign, and into the hundred and thirty-second of his own life, being accordingly a great festival, and most sumptuous to the young men that pulled down his golden eagle from the front of the temple, where he takes notice, "How the building of the temple cost him a vast sum; and that the Auguste, in those 155 years they held the govern ment, were not able to perform so great a work, less the sumner of God, as this was" Antiq. xvii. ch. vi. sect 3 preparations made presently, in order to its dedication, for he had appointed a contestation in music, and games to be performed naked. He had also given ready a great number of those that fight single combats, and of beasts for the like purpose: horse-races also, and the most chargeable of such sports and shows as used to be exhibited at Rome, and in other places. He commanded a combat to Carthage, and ordered it to be celebrated every fifth year. He also sent a sort of ornaments for it out of his own furniture, that it might want nothing to make it decent: nay, Julia, Cesar's wife, sent a great part of the furniture, and the dishes, from Rome, to assure that he had no want of anything. The sum of them all was estimated at five hundred talents. Now when a great multitudine was come to that city, to see the shows, as well as the ambassadors whom other nations had sent to narrate the transactions, and relations, and takes notice of his severe and unremitting disposition there, he will be forced to allow that he was brutal, and a stranger to all humanity, insomuch that those who suppose his inclining to such apparitions and spectacles, to be at contravention with himself; but I am myself of another opinion, and imagine that the occasion of both these sorts of actions was one and the same; for he was a lover of each of them, and was become by that passion, he was induced to be magnificent, wherever there appeared any hopes of a future memorial, or of reputation at present, and as his expenses were beyond his abilities, he thought it not easy thing to amend his offences, for that it was inconvenient for his revenue; he therefore strove on the other side to make their ill-will an occasion of his gains. As to his own court, therefore, if as an emperor he had been the archetypal of his language, and would not confess himself to be his slave, or but seemed to think of any innovation in his government, he was not able to contain himself, but prosecuted his very kindred, and the sons of his old friends, for the recovery of his revenues; and this wickedness he undertook out of a desire that he might be himself alone honored. Now for this my assertion about that passion of his, we have the greatest evidence, by what he himself did declare, and also by his friends; for with what honors he paid his respects to them who were his superiors, the same did he desire to be paid to himself; and what he thought the most excellent present, he thought to have the like presented to himself. But now the Jewish nation is by their law a stranger to all such things, and accustomed to prefer rigid and gloomy forms; for which reason that nation was not at all favorable to him, because it was out of their power to flatter the king's ambition with statues or temples, or any other such performances. This seems to me to have been at least one of the reasons why he did not make the city of his own courtiers and counsellors, and of his benevolent actions, as to foreigners and those that had no relation to him.

An Embassage of the Jews in Creuse and Asia.

Cesar, concerning the Complains they had to make against the Greeks: with Copies of the Embassy. | Cesar and Agrippa wrote to the Cities for them.

1. Now the cities ill treated the Jews in Asia, and all those also of the same nation which he celebrated the more afterward, he built Nicopolis Actium, and appointed public shows to be there exhibited every fifth year.
lived in Libya, which comes to Cyrene, while the former kings had given them equal privileges were given by the Senate, but the Greeks afforded them at this time, and that to Jewry to demand their sacred money, and to do them mischief on other particular occasions. When therefore they were thus afflicted, and found no end of the burdensome treatment taken from the Greeks, they sent ambassadors to Caesar on those accounts; who gave them the same privileges as they had before and seen; letters to the same purpose to the governors of the provinces, copies of which I have made and added to the ancient favorable dispositions, the Roman emperors had towards us.

2. "Cæsar Augustus, high priest, and tribune of the people, ords thus: Since the nation of the Jews, as the believers in one God, not only at this time, but in time past also, and chiefly Hyrcanus the high priest, under my father Cæsar the emperor, it seemed good to me and my counsellors, according to the counsel of the Jews, to give liberty to make use of their own customs, according to the law of their forefathers, as they made use of them under Hyrcanus, the high priest of Almighty God; and that their sacred money might be sent, to the care of the receivers at Jerusalem; and that they be not obliged to go before any judge on the Sabbath day, nor on the day of the preparation for it, after the seventh day, or on the sabbatical years; and that their holy books, or their sacred money, whether it be out of the synagogue, or public school, shall to be treated as a sacrificial person, and his goods shall be brought to the public treasury of the Romans. And I give orders that the testimonial which they have given me, on account of my regard to that piety which I exercise toward all mankind, and out of regard to Cæsar Augustus, the man formerly been the name of Cæsar Augustus, and that he be sent decree, be proposed in that most eminent place which has been consecrated to me, by the community of Asia at Ancyra. And if any one transgress any part of what is above decreed, he shall be deemed the punished, Rome, that is inscribed upon a pillar in the temple of Cæsar.

3. "Cæsar to Norbanus Flaccus, sendeth greeting: Let those Jews, how many soever they be, who have been used according to their ancient custom, to this present time, and in the same manner, be treated in the same freely." These were the decrees of Cæsar.

4. Agrippa also did himself write after the manner following, on behalf of the Jews: "Agrippa, to the magistrates, senate, and people of the Ephesians, rendereth greeting: I will to the care of the sacred money that is carried to the temple at Jerusalem be left to the Jews of Asia, to do with it according to their ancient custom; and that such as steal that sacred money of the Jews, and fly to a sanctuary, shall be taken thence and delivered to the Jews, by the same law that sacrilegious persons are taken thence. I have also written to Sylvanus the praetor, that no one compel the Jews to come before the praetor in the same way.

5. Marcus Agrippa, to the magistrates, senate, and people of Cyrene, sendeth greeting: The Jews of Cyrene have interceded with me for the permission which Augustus sent to Flaccus, the then praetor of Libya, and to the other procurators of that province, that the sacred money may be sent to Jerusalem freely, as Augustus here calls Julius Cæsar his father, though by birth he was only his adoptive son, on account of his adoption by him. See Antig. b. xiv. ch. xiv. sect. 4.

† This is authentic evidence, that the Jews, in the days of Augustus, began to prepare for the celebration of the Passover at Philæ; and that the exclusive privilege of the elders did, it seems, then require of them.

The remaining part of this chapter is a remarkable one, as distinctly distinguishing natural justice, religion, and have been their custom from their forefathers, they complaining that they are abused by certain informers and under pretense of taxes, which were not due, are hounded from security them, which I command to be restored, without any diminution or disturbance given to them, and if any of that sacred money in the cities be taken from their proper receivers, I further enjoin, that the same be exactly returned to the Jews in that place."

6. "Caicus Norbanus Flaccus, proconsul, to the magistrates of the Sardians, sendeth greeting: Cæsar hath written to me of the aforesaid decree not to forbid the Jews, how many soever they be, from assembling together according to the custom of their forefathers, nor from sending their money to Jerusalem; I have therefore written to you, that you should let the Jews do as Cæsar and I would have you act accordingly."

7. Nor did Julian Antonius, the proconsul, write otherwise: "To the magistrates, senate, and people of the Ephesians sendeth greeting: As we are paid to God; and it frequent, on the 12th of January, the Jews that dwell in Asia demonstrated to me, that Augustus and Agrippa had permitted them to use their own laws and customs, and to offer those their first-fruits which every one of them is subject to on account of piety, and to carry them in a company together to Jerusalem without disturbance. They also petitioned me, that I also would confirm what had been granted by Augustus and Agrippa by my own authority, but if any one of them should not take notice, that according to the will of Augustus and Agrippa, I will permit them to use and do according to the customs of their forefathers without disturbance." But I have been obliged to set down these decrees, because the present history of our own acts will go generally among the Greeks; and I have hereby demonstrated to them that we have the same liberty as formerly been the case. These decrees, so prohibited by those governors we were subject from keeping any of the laws of our forefathers, nay, that we have been supported by them, while we followed our own religion, and the worship from a pure manner, benevolent and friendly to all men: on which account we have reason to expect the like return from others, and to inform them that they ought not to esteem difference of positive institutions as sufficient cause of alienation, but [join with us] in the pursuit of virtue and probity, for this belongs to all men in common, and of itself alone is sufficient for the preservation of human life. I now return to the things of the Sabbath-day."

CHAP. VII.

How, upon Herod's going down into David's Sepulcher, the Sedition in his Family greatly increased.

1. As for Herod, he had spent vast sums about the cities, both without and within his own city, and morality, from positive institutions in all countries, and evidently preferring the former before the latter, as did the true prophets of God always under the Old Testament, and Christ and his apostles always under the New, whereas our Josephus seems at this time near to the end of his days, than were the scribes and Pharisees of his age, who, as we know from the New Testament, were entirely of a different opinion and practice.
kingdom: and as he had before heard that Hyrcanus, who had been king before him, had opened David's sepulchre, and taken out of it three thousand talents of silver, and that there was a much greater number left behind, and indeed enough to suffice all his wants, he had a great wish to make the same attempt; and at this time he started that sepulchre by night, and went into it, and endangered that it should not be at all known in the city, but took only its most faithful friends with him. As for any money, he in the meantime sold all his goods, but sold for the most part for the sole purpose of buying back the body of the body of David and Solomon, where two of his guards were slain, by a flame that burst out upon those that went in, as the report was. So he was terribly affrighted, and went out and built a propitiatory monument of that fright he had been in, and this of white stone, at the mouth of the sepulchre, and that at a great expense also. And even Nicollaus his historiographer makes mention of this monument built by him, and says it was placed nine stadia away down into the sepulchre, as knowing that action to be of ill repute; and many other things he treats of in the same manner in his book; for he wrote in Herod's lifetime, and under his reign, and under his rule, and under his power, and taught to put a touching upon nothing but what tended to his glory, and openly excusing many of his notorious crimes, and very diligently concealing them. And as he was desirous to put handsome colors on the image of Marianne and their sons, which were barbarous actions in the king, he tells falsehoods about the inconstancy of Marianne, and the treacherous designs of his sons upon him; and thus he proceeded in his whole work, making use of many false stories to fill the place of what he had done, but earnestly apologizing for his unjust oaths. Indeed a man, as I said, may have a great deal to say by way of excuse for Nicollaus; for he did not so properly write this as a history for others, as somewhat that might be subservient to the king himself. As for ourselves, who come of a family nearly allied to the Amoniacan kings, and on that account have an honorable place, which is the priesthood, we think it necessary to say anything about them, and accordingly we have described their actions after an unblemished and upright manner. And although we reverence many of Herod's posterity, who still reign, yet do we pay a greater regard to them than to them, and since we think it sometimes happens that we incur their displeasure by so doing.

3. And indeed Herod's troubles in his family seem to be augmented by reason of this attempt he made upon David's sepulchre. The divine vengeance increased the calamities he lay under, in order to render them incurable, or whether fortune made an assault upon him in those cases, wherein he was the cause of the cause made, he sincerely believed that the cause of all came upon him for his impiety; for the tumult was like a civil war in his palace, and their hatred towards one another was like that where each one strove to exceed another in calamities. However, Antipater used stratagems perpetually against his brethren, and that very cunningly; while abroad, he loaded them with accusations, but still took upon him frequently to apologize for them, that they might make him believe, and forward his attempts against them, by which means he, after various man

It is well worth our observation, how careful Josephus was as to the discovery of truth in Herod's history, since he would not follow Nicollaus of Damascus himself, so great a historian, where there was great reason to suspect that he flattered Herod; which impartiality in history Josephus bore so excellently, forpers, circumvented his father, who believed that all he did was for his preservation. Herod also recommended Ptolemy, who was a great director of the affairs of his kingdom, to Antipater; and consulted with his mother about the public affairs also. And indeed these were all in all, and even in the end, he was found so angry against any other persons, as they thought it might be to their own advantage: but still the sons of Marianne were in a worse and worse condition perpetually, and while they were thrust out of their own country, but still further yet by birth were the noblest, they could not bear the diabolon. And for the women, Glaphyra, Alexander's wife, the daughter of Archelaus of Gadara, both became the father to her husband, and became Glaphyra, and deceased to behave herself somewhat insolently towards Salome's daughter, who was the wife of Aristobulus, which equality of hers to herself Glaphyra took very impatiently. 3. Now, besides this second contention that had fallen among them, neither did the king's brother Pheroras keep himself out of trouble, but had a particular foundation for suspicion and jealousies, for he had married the daughter of his wife to such a degree of madness, that he despised the king's daughter, to whom he had been betrothed, and wholly bent his mind to the other, who had been but a servant. Herod also was for this period a very advantageous favor to his son, because he had bestowed many favors upon him, and had advanced him to that height of power that he was almost a partner with him in the kingdom, and saw that he had not made him a minister in his favor, and esteemed him not self unhappy on that account. which means she learned all their concerns, and made the damsel ill-natured to the young man. And in order to gratify her mother, she often said that the young men used to mention Maria when they were by themselves; and that they hated their father, and were continually threatening, that if they had once got the kingdom, they would make Herod's sons by his former wives country schoolmasters, for that the present education which was given them, and their diligence in learning, fitted them for such a situation; that when ever they saw them adorn themselves with their mother's clothes, they threatened, that instead of their present gaudy apparel, they should be clothed in sackcloth and ashes, so that they should not see the light of the sun. These stories were presently carried by Salome to the king, who was troubled to hear them, and endeavored to make up matters; but these suspicions were very frequent, and more uneasy. He believed every body against every body, however, upon his rebuking his sons, and hearing the defence they made for themselves, he was easier for a while, though a little afterward much worse accidents came upon him.

4. For Pheroras came to Alexander, the husband of Glaphyra, who was the daughter of Archelaus, as we have already told you, and said, the king and queen were enamoured of Glaphyra, and that his passion for her was incurable. When Alexander heard that he was all on fire, from his youth and jealousy; and he interpreted the instances of Herod's obliging kindness to her, which were very frequent, for the worse, which came from those suspicions he had on account of that word which fell from Pheroras: nor could he conceal his grief at the thing, nor his sorrow at what Pheroras had said. Upon which Herod, though his disorder than ever; and not bearing such a false calumny, which was to his shame, was much disturbed at it; and often did he lament the wickedness of his lord, and how good he had been to them, and knew requisites they had made him. So he sent for Pheroras, and reproached him, and said, "Thou villain of all men! art thou come to that unassailable and extravagant degree of insolence, and have dared to reproach me, me, but to speak of them! I now indeed perceive what thy intentions are: it is not thy only aim to reproach me, when thou useth such words to my son, but thereby to persuade him to plot such a baseInfosition, and so destroy me. And who is there, if he had not a good genius at his elbow, as hath my son, that would bear such a suspicion of his father, but would revenge himself upon him? Dost thou suppose that thou hast only dropped a word, for him to think of, and not rather hast put a sword into his hand to slay his father? And what dost thou mean, when thou really hatest both him and his brother, to pretend kindness to them, only in order to raise a reproach such as this, and that he should remain such an insipid wretch as thou art could either devise in their mind, or declare in their words. Begone, thou that art such a plague to thy brethren, to thyself, and to all men, that the very scence of thins go along with thee; while I still overcome my relations by kindness, and am so far from avenging myself of them as they deserve, that I bestow greater benefits upon them than they are to have in the end.

5. Thus did the king speak. Whereupon Pheroras, who was caught in the very act of his vil lainy, said, that "it was Salome who was the fram er of this plot, and that the words came from her. But as soon as she heard that, for she was at hand, she cried out, like one that would be believed, that no such thing ever came out of her mouth: that they all earnestly endeavored to make the king hate her, and to make her away, because of the good-will she bore to Her od, and because she was always foreseeing the dangers that were coming upon him, and that at present there were more plots against him than usual; for while she was the only person who persuaded the king's brother to put away the wife he now had, and to take the king's daughter, it was no wonder if she were hated by him. As she said this, and often tore her hair, and often beat her breast, her countenance made her denia to be believed; for the same childless women declared at the same time her dissimulation in these proceedings; but Pheroras was caught between them, and had nothing plausible to offer to the king, while in his own case she could say she had said what was charged upon him, but was not believed when he said he had heard it from Salome; so the confusion among them was increased, and their quarrelsome words one to another.

6. There was a man named Obodas, king of Arabia, an inactive and slothful man in his nature; but Syl leus managed most of his affairs for him. He was a shrewd man, although he was but young, and was hand-to-mouth. This Syllerus, upon some occasion coming to Herod, who had been with him, saw Salome, and set his heart upon her; and, understanding that she was a widow, he discoursed with her. Now, because Salome was at this time in favor with her brother, she looked upon Syllerus with some passion, and was very earnest to be married to him; and on the days following there appeared many, and those very great, indications of their agreement to other. Now, a woman was not allowed to marry the king, and laughed at the indecency of it; whereupon Herod inquired about it farther of Pheror as, and desired him to observe them at supper, how their behavior was one toward another; and told him, that he would ask her, if she came from their heads and their eyes, they both were evidently in love. After this, Syllerus the Arab, being suspected, went away, but came again in two or three months afterwards, as it were on that very design, and spake to Herod about it, and desired that Salome might be given him to wife: for that his affinity might not be disadvantageous to his affairs, by a union with Arabia, the government of which country was already in his hands. And it was understood the king would have given him his consent, had not the consent been by the Arabs. Then did Pheroras reproach Salome for her inconstancy, as did the women much more, and said, that Syllerus had debauched her. As for that damsel, whom the king had betrothed to his brother Pheroras, but he had not taken her, as I have before related, because he was enamoured of his former wife, Salome desired of Herod she might be given to her son by Cestobarbus; which match he was very willing to, but was dissuaded from it by Phorbas, who pleaded that this young man was unworthy of the honor, as that he was not of the same age as her younger son; that her former son had been slain by him, and that it was more just that his son, who was to be his successor in the tetrarchy, should have her; so he beggar his par- don, and persuaded him to do so. Accordingly, the queen, in consideration of this espousals, was disposed of to this young man, the son of Phorbas, the king giving for her portion a hundred talents.

CHAPTER VIII.

How Herod took up Alexander, and bound him; whom yet Archelaus, King of Cappadocia, re- ceived for his Father Herod again.

1. But still the affairs of Herod's family were no better, but perpetually more troublesome. Now this accident happened, which arose from no decent occasion, but proceeded so far as to bring great difficulties upon him. There were certain eunuchs which the king had, and on account of their beauty, was very fond of them; and the care of bringing him drink was intrusted to one of them, of bringing him his supper to another, and of putting him to bed to a third, who slights and abandons the most principal affairs of the government; and there was one told the king, that these eunuchs were corrupted by Alexander the king's son, with great sums of money: and when the king heard this, he desired Antipater, he had been in a criminal conversation with them; they confessed it, but said they knew of no farther mischief of his against his father; but that when they were more severely tortured, and were in the utmost extremity of fear, that in order to confess what they knew, they colored his hair black, and endeavored to conceal what would discover how old he was; but that if he would apply himself to him, when he should attain the kingdom, which in spite of his father, once was the king's deputy, he should quickly have the first place in that kingdom under him, for that he was now ready to take the kingdom, not only as his birthright, but by the preparations he had made for obtaining it. He was a great worker of the people, and by that many of his friends were of his side, and those ill men neither, ready both to do and to suffer whatsoever should come on that account.

2. In this confession, he was all over anger and fear, some parts seeming to him reproachful, and some made him suspicious of dangers that attended him, inasmuch that on both accounts he was provoked, and bitterly afraid lest some more heavy plot was laid against him than he should be then able to escape from; whereupon he did not now make an open search, but sent about spies to watch such as he suspected, for he was now overrun with suspicion and hatred from all about him, and indulging the abundance of those suspicions, in order to his preservation, he continued to suspect those that were guiltless; nor did he set any bounds to himself, but supposing that those who stood with him were to be his spiers to hunt out, they went to him very frightful; and for those that did not use to come to him, it seemed enough to name them [to make them suspect], and he thought himself safer when they were destroyed; and at last his domestics were come to that pass, that being no way secure of escaping themselves, they fell to accusing one another, and imagining that he who first accused another, was most likely to save himself; yet, when any had over-thrown others, they were hated, and they were thought to suffer justly, who unjustly accused others, and they only thereby prevented their own accusation; nay, they now executed their own private enormities by this means, and were more caught by the same means, in the same way. Thus these men contrived to make use of this opportunity as an instrument and a snare against their enemies; yet when they tried it, it was not so. At length, Herod, knowing which they laid for others; and the king some repented of what he had done, because he had no clear evidence of the guilt of those whom he had slain; and yet what was still more severe in him, he used this means not to make use of his own, in order to leave of doing the like again, but in order to inflict the same punishment upon their accusers.

3. And in this state of disorder were the affairs of the palace, and he had already told many of his friends directly, that they ought not to appear before him, nor come into the palace; and the reason of this injunction was, that [when they were there] he had less freedom of acting, or to give them time, and himself the opportunity. For at this time it was that he espied Andromachus and Gassellus, men who had of old been his friends, and been very useful to him in the affairs of his sons, and been of advantage to him in his family, they were ambassadors and had been tutors to his sons, and had in a manner the first degree of freedom with him. He espied Andromachus, because his son Demetrias was his son in law, and he also knew he was not very industrious, because he knew that he wished him well, which arose from his having been with him in his youth, when he was at school, and absent at Rome. These he espied out of his palace, and was with a little delay to have them some by him; but that he might not seem to take such liciery against men of so great reputation, he contented himself with depriving them of their dignity, and of their power to hinder his wicked proceed-ings.

4. Now it was Antipater who was the cause of all this; who, when he knew what a mad and licentious way of acting his father was in, and had been a great while one of his counsellors, he heard him on, and thought he should bring him to do somewhat to purpose, when every one that could oppose him was taken away. When, therefore, Andromachus and his friends were not so much esteemed, and as they had no such scruples, and as they were not with the king, any longer, the king, after the first place examined by torture all whom he thought to be faithful to Alexander, whether they knew of any of his attempts against him; but these died, the king did not say anything to his better, which made the king more jealous [after discoveries] when he could not find out what evil proceedings he suspected them of. As for Antipater, he was very aggressive to raise a calumny against those that were really innocent, as if their denial was only their constancy and fidelity [to Alexander,] and therefore provoked Herod to discover, by the torture of great numbers what attempts were still concealed. Now there was no question of a man who was not tortured, who said, that he knew that the young man had often said, that when he was commanded as a tall man in his body, and a skillful marksman, and that in his commendable exercizes he was excelled by none; but this was utterly in nature, though good in themselves, were not advantageous to him, because his father was grieved at them, and envied them to them; and that when he walked along with his father he was not desirous of depress and shorten himself, that he might not appear too tall, and that when he shot at anything as he was hunting, when his father was by, he missed his mark on purpose, for he knew how ambitious his father was, and being superior in such excursion. So when the men was tormented about this saying, and had done given his body after it, he added, that he had his brother Aristobulus for his assistance; and contrived to lie in wait for their father, as they were hunting, and kill him: and when they had done so, to fly to Rome, and desire to have the kingdom given them. The young man was in great distress about his daughter, and the young man [her husband.] and grieving with Herod, as with a man that was his friend, on account of so great a disturbance and arraignment, came to Jerusalem on purpose to compose their differences; and when he found Herod in such a temper, he thought it wholly unseasonable to reprove him, or to successfully press the business; and after this he came, to beg the young man, and say, that Herod had been so very mild a man, that he had not acted a rash part at all. He also said, he would dissolve his daughter's marriage with Alexander; for he had so many misfortunes, and appeared angry at the young man, and said, that Herod had been so very mild a man, that he had not acted a rash part at all.

He, however, added, that he should go to Rome to beg the king for him; so he went desirous to have some stronger mark of his son a wickedness, and was very solicitous about it, that he might not appear to have condemned him to be put in prison; for he thought it would be the more against the canons of Alexander's friends, and put not a few of them to death, without getting any of the things out of them which he suspected. And while Herod was very busy about this matter, and the palace was in very violent expectation of some sort, when he was in the utmost agony, confessed that Alexander had sent to his friends at Rome, and desired that he might be quickly invited thither by Caesar, and that he could discover a plot against Alexander, and that he now would not go. So, for this reason, he had left the young man, was invited by Caesar, and was properly on his account, the king abated of his harshness, and took occasion, from his appearance to have acted justly hitherto, to come by degrees to put on the affection of a father, and the parts of a father. And when his name was on both sides to be trusted; on the other hand, the persons refuted the calumnies that were laid on the young man, he was thrown into a passion; but when Archelaus joined in the accusation, he was dissolved into tears and sorrow after an affectionate manner. Accordingly, he said, that he would not dissolve his son's marriage, and became not so angry as before for his offences. So when Archelaus had brought him to a more moderate temper, he transferred the calumnies upon his friends; and said, it must be owing to them that so young a man, and one unacquainted with malice, was corrupted, and he supposed that there was more reason to suspect the be-

As for Alexander, he was the more guilty, because he had his daughter and his whole kingdom; for he wrote four letters, and sent them to his father, to bring in any more persons, for he had plotted against him; and that he had for his partners Pherora and the most faithful of his friends; and that Saron came in to him by night, and that she lay with him whether he would, or no; and that all men were come to be of one mind, to make away with him as soon as they could, and so get clear of the continual fear they were in from him. Among those were accused Poltemy and Saporas, who were both the sons of one to the king. And what more can be said, but that those who before were the most intimate friends, were become wild beasts to one another, as if certain madness had fallen upon them; while there was no regard, no appearance of the same miseries; and a melancholy solitude rendered the kingdom deformed, and quite the reverse to that happy state it was formerly in: Herod's own life also was entirely perished; and because he could trust nobody, he was sorely punished by the expectation of farther misery, for he often fancied in his imagination, that his sons had fallen upon him, or stood by him with a sword in his hand; and thus was his mind night and day intent upon this thing, and revolved it over and over, no otherwise than if he were under a distraction. And this was the sad condition Herod was now in.

6. But when Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, heard of the state that Herod was in, and being in great distress about his daughter, and the young man [her husband.] and grieving with Herod, as with a man that was his friend, on account of so great a disturbance and arraignment, came to Jerusalem on purpose to compose their differences; and when he found Herod in such a temper, he thought it wholly unseasonable to re-

CHAP. IX.
Concerning the Revolt of the Trachonitae: how Sylla accused Herod before Caesar: and how Herod, when Caesar was angry at him, resolved to send Nicolaus to Rome.

§ 1. When Herod had been at Rome, and was come back again, a war arose between him and the Arabians, on the occasion following: the inhuman Sidonius, after Caesar had taken the country away from Zenodorus, and added it to Herod, had not now power to rob, but were forced to plough the land, and to live quietly, which was a thing they did not like; and when their impotency, the great number of their inhabitants, and their great importunity, did not produce much fruit for them. However, at the first the king would not permit them to rob, and so they abstained from that unjust way of living upon their neighbors, which procured Herod a greater revenue than he expected; for he was a man of money was past, without Sylla's performing any part of his agreement, and he was gone to Rome, Herod demanded the payment of the money, and that the robbers that were in Arabia should be punished, and, by the persuasion of Saturninus and Volumnius, executed the judgment himself upon those that were refractory. He took an army that he had, and led it into Arabia; and in three days' time, by forced marches, the Arabians were surprised, and a great battle, wherein a few of Herod's soldiers, and Nacebus, the captain of the Arabians, and about twenty of his soldiers fell, while the rest betook themselves to flight. So when he had brought off the Arabians, he retired to Idumea in Trachonitis, and thereby restrained the robbers that were there. He also sent an account to the captains that were at Phoenicia, and demonstrated that he had done nothing but what was useful to the republic. The Trachonites, which, upon an exact inquiry, they found to be no more than what was true.

3. However, messengers were hastened away to Sylla, and it is related, that when Sylla heard of this, he sent a force of soldiers to Herod. And when on the return of these, he heard of their having been done, and, as is usual, aggravated every thing. Now Sylla had already insinuated himself into the knowledge of Caesar, and was then about the palace; and as soon as he heard of these things, he changed his habit into black, and went in, and told Caesar, that "Africa was afflicted with war, and that all his kingdom was in great confusion, upon Herod's laying it waste with his army: and he said, with tears in his eyes, that he had sent ambassadors to principal men among the Arabians had been destroyed, and that their captain Nacebus, his familiar friend and kinsman, was slain; and that the riches that were at Repea were carried off; and that Obodas, when he was requested, would put all his revenues and his state of body render him sad for war; on which account neither he, nor the Arabian army, were present." When Sylla said so, and added invidiously, that "he would not himself have done that, nor had not the power; and rend every thing under Herod's dominion with impunity; then did he discourse about these robberies to Saturninus and Volumnius, and required that they should be punished; upon which occasion they studied how to wet Herod's wrath, and when to punish their robberies, and became more numerous; and made great disturbances, laying waste the countries and villages that belonged to Herod's kingdom, and killing those men whom they caught, till they entertained the pretense to cast her now for a real war, for the robbers were now become about a thousand. At which Herod was sore displeased, and required the robbers, as well as the money which he had lent Obodas, by Sylla, which was sixty talents: and when the time of payment was now past, he desired to have it paid him; but Sylla, who had laid Obodas aside, and managed all by himself, denied that the robbers were not his, and put the payment of the money; about which there was a hearing before Saturninus and Volumnius, who were then the presidents of Syria. At last, he, by their means, agreed, that within thirty days' time Herod should deliver up the robbers, or at least that each of them should deliver up the other's subjects reciprocal. Now, as to Herod, there was not one of the others' subjects found in his kingdom, either as doing any injustice, or on any other account; but it was proved that the Arabians had the robbers amongst them.

The confidencio of his being quite gone with which Caesar's favor used to inspire him; for Caesar would not admit so much as an embassy from him to make an apology for him: and when they came again, he sent them away without success. So he was cast into sadness and fear; and Sylleus's circumstances grieved him exceedingly. He was now before the conference with Caesar, and was present at Rome, at Samos, sometimes aspiring higher. Now it came to pass that Obodas was dead: and Enea, whose name was afterwards changed to Aetas, took the government, for Sylleus did not already come to the inheritance of his principality, that he might himself take it; with which design he gave much money to the courtiers, and promised much money to Caesar in the present. Aetas did not send to him first before he took the kingdom. Ere he sent an epistle and presents to Caesar, and a golden crown; of the weight of many talents. Now that epistle accused Sylleus as having been a wicked servant, and having killed Obodas by poison; and that, while he was alive, he had governed him as he pleased; and had also debauched the wives of the Arabians; and had borrowed money, in order to obtain the dominion for himself. But he did not admit so much as an embassy, but sent his ambassadors back, without receiving any of his presents; but in the meantime the affairs of Judea and Arabia became worse and worse, partly because of the anarchy that followed in the kingdom, for they were, nobody had power to govern them, for of the two kings, the one was not yet confirmed in his kingdom, and so had not authority sufficient to restrain the evil doers; and as for Herod, Caesar was at the same time afraid, and anxious to avenged himself, and so he was compelled to bear all the injuries that were offered him. At length, when he saw no end of the mischief which surrounded him, he resolved to send ambassadors to Rome to negotiate with them, and to mend the breach that had been caused, to mitigate Caesar, and to address themselves to Caesar himself: and the ambassador he sent thither was Nicolaus of Damascus.

CHAP. X.

How Eugecles falsely accused Herod's Sons; and how their Father bound them, and sent them to Caesar about them. Of Sylleus, and how he was accused by Nicolaus.

1. The disorders about Herod's family and children about this time grew much worse; for it now appeared certain, nor was it unforeseen before, and more extreme, that the greatest, and most insupportable misfortunes possible to his kingdom. Its progress and augmentation at this time arose on the occasion following: One Eugecles, a Lacedemonian, (a person of note there, but a man of a perfecting mind,) being in his ways of voluptuousness and flattery, as to indulge both, and yet seem to indulge neither of them,) came in his travels to Herod, and made him presents, but so that he received more presents than he gave. He was at all lengths seasons for insinuating himself into his friendship, that he became one of the most intimate of the king's friends. He had his lodging in Antipater's house; but he had not only access, but livewell conversations with Alexander, as pretending to him that he was in great favor with Archelaus, the king of Cappadocia; whence he pretended much respect to Glymphe, and, in an occasion then, cultivated a friendship with them all, but a solicitude attending to what was said and done, that he might be furnished with calamities to please them all. In short, he behaved himself so as to every body in his conversation, as to

2. This Aetas was now become so established a name for the kings of Arabia (at Paphos, and Damascus,) that when the crown came to this house he changed his appear to be his particular friend, and he made others believe that his being anywhere was for that person's advantage. He did not, to him also the affairs of his mother, and of Antipater; that he had driven them from their proper dignity, and had the power over every thing himself; that no part of this was tolerable, since his father was not already come to the inheritance of his principality, that he might himself take it; with which design he gave much money to the courtiers, and promised much money to Caesar in the present. Aetas did not send to him first before he took the kingdom. Ere he sent an epistle and presents to Caesar, and a golden crown; of the weight of many talents. Now that epistle accused Sylleus as having been a wicked servant, and having killed Obodas by poison; and that, while he was alive, he had governed him as he pleased; and had also debauched the wives of the Arabians; and had borrowed money, in order to obtain the dominion for himself. But he did not admit so much as an embassy, but sent his ambassadors back, without receiving any of his presents; but in the meantime the affairs of Judea and Arabia became worse and worse, partly because of the anarchy that followed in the kingdom, for they were, nobody had power to govern them, for of the two kings, the one was not yet confirmed in his kingdom, and so had not authority sufficient to restrain the evil doers; and as for Herod, Caesar was at the same time afraid, and anxious to avenged himself, and so he was compelled to bear all the injuries that were offered him. At length, when he saw no end of the mischief which surrounded him, he resolved to send ambassadors to Rome to negotiate with them, and to mend the breach that had been caused, to mitigate Caesar, and to address themselves to Caesar himself: and the ambassador he sent thither was Nicolaus of Damascus.

2. But as for the kingdom of the Jews, he was not now in the temper he was in formerly towards Alexander and Archelaus; and was in the same concern with the hearing their calumnies when others told him of them, but he was now come to that pass as to hate them himself, and to urge men to speak against them, though they did not. Herod was troubled; he did not know what he was said, and put questions, and gave ear to every one that would but speak, if they could but say any thing against them, till at length he heard that Euarus, of Cos, was a conspirator with Alexander; which thing to Herod was the most agreeable and sweetest news imaginable.

3. But still a greater misfortune came upon the young men, while the calamities against them were continually increased, and, as a man may think, one would think they were not able to labor and to lay some grievous thing to their charge, which might appear to be for the king's preservation. There were two guards of Herod's body who were in great esteem for their strength and tallness, Judas and Tyrannus: these men had been cast off by Herod, who was displeased at them; these now used to ride along with Alexander, and for their skill in their exercises were in great esteem with him, and had great presents and other gifts bestowed upon a certain time. Now the king, having an immediate suspicion of these men, had them tortured; who endured the torture courageously for a long time, but at last confessed the name to Aetas, as Haveramp had justly observed See Antig. b. xiii. ch. xv. sect. 2.
that Alexander would have persuaded them to kill Herod, when he was in pursuit of the wild beasts; and that he was at some distance from his horse, and was run through with his own spear, for that he had once such a misfortune formerly. They also showed where there was money hidden in the soil underground, and these convicted the king's chief hunter, that he had given the young men the royal hunting spears, and weapons to Alexander's dependants, at Alexander's command.

4. At this time, the commander of the garrison of Alexandrium was caught and tortured; for he was accused to have promised to receive the young men into his fortress, and to supply them with that money of the king which was laid up in that fortress. But as he did not know anything of it himself; but his son came in, and said it was so, and delivered up the writing, which, so far as could be guessed, was in Alexander's hand. Its contents were these: "When we have finished, by God's help, the thing we have so desired to do, we will come to you; but do your endeavors, as you have promised, to receive us into your fortress." After this writing was produced, Herod had no doubt about the treacherous design against him. But Alexander said, that Diophantus, the scribe, had imitated his hand, and that the paper was maliciously drawn up by Antipater; for Diophantus appeared to be very cunning in such practices; and as he was afterward suspected of forging other papers, he was put to death for it.

5. So the king produced those that had been tortured before the multitude at Jericho, in order to make them accuse the young men which accused many of the people to stone to death; and when they were going to kill Alexander, and Aristobulus likewise, the king would not permit them to do so, but restrained the multitude, by the name of Solomon and Pharaoh. However, the young men were put under a guard, and kept in custody, that nobody might come at them; and all that they did or said was watched; and the reproach and fear they were in was little or nothing different from those of the heaviest criminals; and one of them, who was Aristobulus, was so deeply affected, that he brought Salome, who was his aunt, and his mother-in-law, to lament with him for his calamities, and to hate him who had taken his sister in marriage; and when he said to her, "Art thou in danger of destruction also, while the report goes that thou hast disclosed before-hand our affairs to Syllaeus, whom thou wast in hopes of being married to him?" she immediately wrote to her brother: upon this he was out of patience, and gave command to bind him; and enjoined them both, now they were kept separate one from the other, to write down all the ill things they had done, and then to bring the writings to him. So when this was enjoined them, they wrote this, that they had no treacherous designs, nor made any preparation with their father; but that they had intended to fly away; and that the distress they were in, their lives being now uncertain and tedious to them.

6. About this time there came an ambassador from the Idumæans, whose name was Melsa: he was one of the principal rulers under him. So Herod being desirous to show Archelaus's ill-will to him, called for Alexander as he was in his bonds, and asked him again concerning his flight, whether and how they had resolved to retire? Alexander replied, "To Archelaus, who had promised to send them away to Rome; but that they had no wicked nor mischievous designs against their father; and that the misfortunes which had happened upon them was true; and that their desire was, that he might have examined Tyrius and Joppas more strictly; but that they had been suddenly slain by the means of Aesopus. And I, Archelaus, had no enmity against them; but that they were sold to a great consternation of Herod, and the young men fell into tears. This was so miserable a spectacle to those present, that, for a great while they were not able to say or do any thing; but at length, thinking that Alexander, and his wife were conscious of his actions? He replied, "How is it possible that she, whom I love better than my own soul, and by whom I have had children, and who have not done anything against me, should have been accused to have conspired to receive me into his fortress." After this writing was produced, Herod had no doubt about the treacherous design against him. But Alexander said, that Diophantus, the scribe, had imitated his hand, and that the paper was maliciously drawn up by Antipater; for Diophantus appeared to be very cunning in such practices; and as he was afterward suspected of forging other papers, he was put to death for it.

7. When this was said, Herod commanded that both Alexander and Melsa should be carried to Olympia, Archelaus was to be brought to him, that he might be asked, whether she did not know somewhat of Alexander's treacherous designs against Herod? Now as soon as they were come to her, and she saw Alexander in bonds, she bent herself, and her eyes were turned to the right and left, and she said, "Herod, bade his see, whether his wife was conscious of his actions? He replied, "How is it possible that she, whom I love better than my own soul, and by whom I have had children, and who have not done anything against me, should have been accused to have conspired to receive me into his fortress." After this writing was produced, Herod had no doubt about the treacherous design against him. But Alexander said, that Diophantus, the scribe, had imitated his hand, and that the paper was maliciously drawn up by Antipater; for Diophantus appeared to be very cunning in such practices; and as he was afterward suspected of forging other papers, he was put to death for it.

8. When these ambassadors were come to Rome, they had a fit opportunity of delivering the letter, which was written to Archelaus, immediately after they were reconciled to Herod; for the circumstances of Archelaus's embassage had been as follows: as soon as he was come to Rome, and was about the court, he did not first of all set about what he longed to do, but thought it fit also to accuse Syllaeus. Now the Arabsians, even before he came to talk with them, were quarrelling one with another; and some of them left Syllaeus's party, and, joining themselves to Nicobasus, in great numbers. And he was so wicked that they had been done; and produced to him evident demonstrations of the slaughter of a great number of Obodas's friends by Syllaeus; for when these men were slain, they had sent to him letters whereby they could convict him. When Nicobasus saw such an opportunity afforded him, he made use of it, in order to gain his own point afterward, and endeavored immediately to make a reconciliation between Caesar and Herod; for he was fully satisfied, that if he should desire to make a defence for Herod directly, he should not be allowed that liberty; but that if he desired to accuse Syllaeus, there would be an occasion of obtaining that which was desired. So when the cause was ready for a hearing, and the day was appointed, Nicobasus, while Aratus's ambassadors were present, accused Sylla, and said, that "he suspected him to the destruction of the king [Obedas], and of many others of the Arabsians; that he had borrowed money for so good design; and he proved that he had been quite in adultery, and had run into debts, but Rome's women also." And he added, that "above all the rest, he had alienated Caesar from Herod; and that all that he had said about the actions of Herod were falsehoods." When Nicolaus was accused of this topic, Caesar stopped him from going on, and desired him only to speak to this affair of Herod's; and to show that "he had not led an army into Arabia, but slain two thousand five hundred men there, nor taken prisoners, nor any of the things accused of him." He asked his answer to this: "I shall principally demonstrate, that I am nothing at all, or but a very little, of those impostations are true, of which those hast been informed, for had they been true, thou mightst have delivered me, and not Caesar." At this strange assertion Caesar was very attentive; and Nicolaus said, that there was a debt due to Herod of five hundred talents, and a bond, wherein it was written, that if the time of payment was not set, the creditors were to make a seizure out of any part of his country. As for the pretended army, he said, it was no army, but a party sent out to require the just payment of the money; that this was not sent immediately, after the time of payment, but that Sylla had frequented before came Se- lassius and Volumius, the presidents of Syria; and that at last he had sworn at Berytus, by thy fortune, that he would certainly pay the money within the time. But Caesar replied, that he would send for them, but that Sylla had fled to Seleucia, and had adduced another government to him, now he was old, and in ill state with relation to his sons, so he admitted Artemis's ambassadors; and after he had just reproved him for his rashness, he, not tarrying till he had received the kingdom from him, he accepted the presents, and confirmed him in his government.

CHAP. XI.

How Herod, by Permission from Caesar, accused his Sons before an Assembly of Judges at Berytus; and what Taro suffered for using a boundless and military Liberty of Speech. Concerning also the Death of the young Men, and their Burial at Alexandria.

1. So Caesar was now reconciled to Herod, and wrote thus to him, that "he was grieved for him on account of his sons; and that in case they had been guilty of any great insult to posterity crimes against him, it would behave him to punish them as paricides, for which he gave him power accordingly; but if they had only contrived to fly away, he would have him give them an admonition, and receive them, and receive that which they had committed. He also advised him to get an assembly together, and to appoint some place near Berytus, which is a city belonging to the Romans, and to take the presidents of Syria, and Archelaus, king of the Nabonians, and as many more as he thought to be illustrous, for their friendship to him, and the dignities they were to determine what should be done by their approbation. Those were the directions that Caesar gave him. The letter of the latter was brought to him, and immediately was very glad of Caesar's reconciliation to him, and very glad also, that he had a complete authority given him over his sons. And it strangely came about, that whereas before, in his adversity, though he had indeed showed himself severe, yet had he not been very rash, nor hasty in procuring the destruction of his sons, he now, in his prosperity, took advantage of the state in which he was, and the freedom he now had, to exercise his hatred against them, after an unheard of manner, because of his sons having this inscription: The happy epitaph of A. "

8 This oath, by the fortuna of Caesar, was put to Ptolemaeus, bishop of Berytus, by the Roman governors, to try whether he were a Christian, as they were then examined who refused to swear that oath. Martyr. Pulpit. sect. 9.

9 What Josephus relates Augustus to have said, that Berytus was only belonging to the Romans, is confirmed by Stephanius's note here. "It was (says he) a colony placed there by Augustus." Whereas Ulpian De cons. bel. L. T. X. The colony of Berytus was Deemed famous by the benefice of Casar. And itself is, that among the coins of Augustus, we meet with some having this inscription: The happy epitaph of A. "

agree so well together when they are out of the sight of the multitude; for when they are alone by themselves, they act in concert, and profess that they will never leave off their friendship, but will fight against those from whom they conceal their designs." And thus did she search out these things, and get a perfect knowledge of them, and then told her brother of them, who, to whom she understood also of himself a great deal of what she said, but still durst not depend upon it, because of the suspicions he had of his sister's calumny. For there was a certain sect of men that were Jews, who valued very highly upon the exact skill they had in the law of their fathers, and made men believe they were highly favored by God, by whom this set of women were inspired. These are those that are called the sect of the Pharisees, who were in a capacity of greatly opposing kings. A cunning sect they were, and soon elevated to a pitch of open fighting, and doing mischief. Accordingly, when all the people saw the Jews gave assurance of their good-will to Cæsar, and to the king's government, these very men did not swear, being above six thousand; and when the king imposed a fine upon them, Phæra's wife paid their fines for them. In fine, they were ready to requite the kindness of others, since they were believed to have the foreknowledge of things to come by divine inspiration, they foretold how God had decreed that Herod's government should cease, and his posterity. And it appeared, at last, that the kingdom should come to her and Phæras, and to their children. These predictions were not concealed from Salome, but were told the king; as also how they had perverted some persons about the palace itself, so the king slew such of the Pharisees as were principally accused, and Ba-gas, the eunuch, and one Carus, who exceeded all men of that time in comeliness, and one that was his catamite. He slew also those of his own family, conspired against the Phari-siety of the Pharisees' foretold; and for Bagas, he had been puffed up by them as though he should be named the father and the benefactor of him who, by the prediction, was foretold to be their appointed king; for that this king would have no power, and would enable Bagas to marry, and to have children of his own body begotten.

CHAP. III.
Concerning the Enmity between Herod and Phæra, and Herod sent Antipater to Caesar; and of the Death of Phæras.

§ 1. When Herod had punished those Pharisees who had been convicted of the foregoing crimes, he gathered an assembly together of his friends, and accused Phæra's wife; and ascribing the abuses of the virgins to the impudence of that woman, brought an accusation against her for the dishonor she had brought upon them; that she had studiously introduced a quarrel between him and his brother, and, by her arts, had brought them into a state of war, both by her words and by means that the fines which he had laid had not been paid, and the offenders had escaped punishment by her means; and that nothing which had of late been done had been done without her: for which reason Phæra would do well, if he would do his own accord, and by his own command, and not at my entreaty, or as following my opinion, but his wife away, as one that will still be the worst of war between them and me. And now, Phæra, if thou valuest thy relation to me, set this thy wife of thine away; for by this means thou wilt continue to be a brother to me, and wilt abide in thy love to me." Then said Phæra, "These words were pressed hard by the former words," that "as he would not do so unjust a thing as to renounce his brotherly relation to him, so would he not leave off his affection for his wife; that he would rather choose to die than to live, and that she was so dear unto him." Hereupon Herod put off his anger against Phæra on these accounts although he himself thereby underwent a very uneasy punishment. However, he forbade Antipater and his mother, for that they have any conversation with Phæra, and bade them to take care to avoid the assemblies of the women: which they promised to do; but still got together when occasion served, and both Phæras and Antipater were brought before Herod, and accused also, that Antipater had criminal conversation with Phæra's wife, and that they were brought together by Antipater's mother. But Antipater had now suspicion of his father; and was afraid that the effects of his hatred to him might increase: so he wrote to his friends at Rome, and bade them to send to Herod, that he would immediately send Antipater to Caesar: which was sent, and the most noble presents along with him; as also his testament, wherein Antipater was appointed to be his successor; and that if Antipater should die, or be put to death, his daughter should succeed. And, together with Antipater, there went to Rome Syllaus the Arab, although he had done nothing of all that Caesar had enjoined. Antipater also accused him of not having treated him as he had been formerly accused by Herod. Syllaus was also accused by Aretas, that without his consent he had slain many of the chief of the Arabians at Petra; and particularly Sohemenus, a man that deserved not this. And they had also the Fabatus, a servant of Caesar. These were the things of which Syllaus was accused, and that on the occasion following: there was one Corinthius, belonging to Herod, of the guards of the king's body-guard; and that he had slain Fabatus, a servant of Caesar. Syllaus had persuaded this man with the offer of a great sum of money, to kill Herod; and he had promised to do it. When Fabatus had been acquainted with this, for Syllaus had himself told Herod of it, he infiltrated the king of it; who caught Corinthius, and put him to the torture, and thereby got out of him the whole conspiracy. He also caught two other Arabians, who were discovered by him; and one the head and the other a friend to Syllaus, who both were by the king brought to the torture, and confessed that they were come to encourage Corithius not to fail of doing what he had undertak and by degrees used an unbounded military freedom of speech, nor was he so well disciplined as to accommodate himself to the time; so Herod was greatly disturbed, and seeming to be rather reproached by this speech, than to be hearing what was for his advantage, while he learned hereby, that both the soldiers absconded the thing he was about, and the officers had indignation at it, he gave orders that all whom Tero had named, and Tero himself, should be bound and kept in prison.

5. When this was over, one Trypho, who was the king's barber, took the opportunity, and accused Tero, that Tero would often have persuaded him, that what he was troubled in with a razor, to cut his throat, for that by this means he should be among the chief of Alexander's friends, and receive great rewards from him. And the king gave order that Tero and his son, and the barber, should be tortured, which was done accordingly, but while Tero bore up himself, his son seeing his father already in a sad case, and had no hope of any purpose to a conclusion, He also laid the consequence of his terrible sufferings, said, that "if the king would free him and his father from these torments, for what he should say, he would tell the truth." And when the king had given his word to do so, they made an agreement made, that Tero should lay violent hands on the king, because it was easy for him to come when he was alone; and that if, when he had done the thing, he should suffer death for it, as was such an occasion; to his father's unutterable griefiness done in favor of Alexander." This was what Tero's son said, and thereby freed his father from the distress he was in; but uncertain it came whether he had been thus forced to speak what was true, or whether he was of his own device in order to procure his own and his father's deliverance from their miseries.

6. As for Herod, if he had before any doubt about the slaugther of his son, there was now no longer any room left in his soul for it; but he had busied away whatsoever might afford him the least suggestion of reasoning better about his matter, so he already made haste to bring his army together, and to order them to kill him on the spot, for Tero's son, and other passion that governed him, was a demonstration of insufferable impiety; he was also guilty of so great a crime in his elder age; nor will the delays that he made, and the length of time it was for which the thing was done appealed at all to his excision; for when a man is on a sudden amazed, and in commotion of mind, and then commits a wicked action, although this be a heavy crime, yet it is a thing that frequently happens; but he did it upon deliberation, and after frequent attempts, and as frequent puttings off, to undertake it at last, and accomplish it, was the action of a murderous mind, and such as was not easily moved from that which is evil: and this temper he showed in what he did afterward, when he did not spare those that seemed to be the best beloved of his friends that were left, wherein, though the justice of the punishment caused those that perished to be worthy of the barbarity of the man here equal, in that he did not abstain from their slaughter also; but of these persons we shall have occasion to discourse more hereafter.
BOOK XVII.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF FOURTEEN YEARS.—FROM THE DEATH OF ALEXANDER AND ARISTOBULUS TO THE BANISHMENT OF AHELCHAUS.

CHAPTER I.

How Antipater was hated by all the Nation of the Jews for the Slaughter of his Brother, and under that Reason, he got into peculiar Favor with his friends at Rome, by giving them many Presents; as he did also with Saturninus, the President of Syria, and the Governors who were under him; and concerning Herod, Women and Children.

1. When Antipater had thus taken off his brethren, and had brought his father into the highest degree of impiety, till he was haunted with furies for what he had done, his hopes did not succeed to his mind, as to the rest of his life; for although he was delivered from the fear of his brethren being his rivals as to the government, yet did he find it a very hard thing, and almost impracticable, to come at the kingdom, because the hatred of the nation against him on that account was great; and that he was very ancient presence, besides this very disagreeable circumstance, the affair of the soldiery grieved him still more, who were alienated from him, from which yet these kings derived all the safety which they had, whether in war or in peace, and therefore their great destruction deserved it; and all this danger was drawn upon him by his destruction of his brethren. However, he governed the nation jointly with his father, being indeed lord and king to all: and he was for that very reason trusted, and the more firmly depended on, for which he ought himself to have been put to death, as appearing to have betrayed his brethren out of his concern for the preservation of his father and not regretting out of his ill-will to them, and before them, to his father himself; and this was the accused state he was in. Now, all Antipater’s contrivances tended to make his way to take off Herod, that he might have nobody to accuse him in from the fear of his brethren being his rivals as to the government, and that Herod might have no refuge, nor any to afford him their assistance, since they must thereby have Antipater for their open enemy; insomuch that the very plots he had against his brother were occasioned by the hatred he bore his father. But at this time he was more than ever set upon the execution of his attempts against Herod, because, if he were once dead, the government would now be firmly secured to his own person. And being set upon, he suffered to live any longer, he should be in danger, upon a discovery of that wickedness of which he had been the contriver, and his father would of necessity then become his enemy, and on that account it was that he became very bountiful to his father’s friends, and bestowed great sums on several of them, in order to surprise men with his good deeds, and take off their hatred against him. And he sent great presents to his friends at Rome, particularly, to gain their good-will; and above all to Saturninus, the president of Syria. He also hoped to gain the favor of Saturninus’ brother with the large presents he bestowed on him; as also, he used the same art to [Sallome] the king’s sister, who had married one of Herod’s chief friends. And, when he counterfeited friendship to those with whom he conversed, he was very subtle in gaining their belief, and very cunning to hide his hatred against any that he really did hate. But he could not impose upon his aunt, who understood him of a long time, and was a woman not easily to be deluded; especially while she had already used all possible caution in preveting his pernicious designs. Although Antipater’s uncle by the mother’s side was married to her daughter, and this by his own contrivance and management, while she had before been married to Aristobulus, and while Salome’s other daughter by that husband was married to the son of Calles; yet that marriage was so long before, that even those who knew how wide it was, in her discovering his designs, as her former kindred to him could not prevent her hatred of him. Now Herod had compelled Salome, while she was in love with Syllæus the Arabian, and he was once married to her, to go for a mess for him, to which match was by her submitted to at the instance of Julia, who persuaded Salome not to refuse it, lest she should herself be their open enemy, since Herod had sworn that he would never be friends with Salome, if she would not accept Alexæa for her husband; so she submitted to Julia as being Cæsar’s wife, and besides that, she advised her to nothing but what was very much for her own advantage. At this time, also, a woman by name Pænæa, and by another name, a daughter, who had been Alexander’s wife, to her father, returning the portion he had had with her out of his own estate, that there might be no dispute between them as to it. 2. Now Herod brought up his sons to the care of great care; for Alexander had two sons by Gephyra, and Aristobulus had three sons by Bernice, Salome’s daughter, and two daughters; and Herod himself was once married to him, and presented the children before him, and deplored the hard fortune of his own sons, he prayed that no such ill-fortune would befall these who were their children, but that they might improve in virtue, and grow to be men, and might make him amends for his care of their education. He also caused them to be betrothed against them should come to the proper age of marriage: the elder of Alexander’s sons to Phæroras’s daughter, and Antipater’s daughter to Aristobulus’ eldest son. He also allotted one of Aristobulus’ daughter’s daughters to Antipater’s son, and Aristobulus’ other daughter to Herod, a son of his own, who was born to him by the high priest, and presented to him by the women that was among us to have many wives at the same time. Now, the king made these espousals for the children, out of commodisation of them now they were fatherless, as endeavoring to render Antipater a great help to his father, and might make him amends for his care of their education. But Antipater did not fail to bear the same temper of mind to his brothers’ children which he had borne to his brothers themselves: and his father’s concern about them provoked his indignation against them, upon this supposal, that they would become greater than ever his brothers had been; while Archelaus, a king, would support his daughter’s sons, and Phæroras, a tetrarch, would look after one of the daughters as a wife to his son. What provoked him also was this that all the multitude would so commodise these fatherless children, and so hate him, [for making them fatherless] that all would come out, since the king’s blessing and favor was turned towards his brethren. He contrived, therefore, to overturn his father’s settlements, as thinking it a terrible thing that they should be so related to him, and be so powerful withal. So Herod yielded to him, and changed his resolution at his entreaty: and the determination now was, that Antipater himself should marry Aristobulus’ daughter, and Antipater’s son should marry Phæroras’ daughter. So the espousals for the marriage were changed after this manner, even without the king’s real approbation.
at his desire Nicolaus of Damascus, being the king's friend, and always conversant with him, and acquainted with whatsoever he did, and with the circumstances of his affairs, proceeded to what remained, and explained all that concerned the affair by a formal evidence, which had not been done, had he not desired them by his virtuous concern about him; for that he had made provision for every thing that was fit to be foreseen beforehand, as to giving him his wisest advice, and as to the author of the labor of his own hands, he had not grudged any such pains for him. And that it was almost impossible that he who had delivered his father from so many treacherous contrivances laid against him, should be himself in a plot against him, and so lose all the reputation he had gained for his virtue, by his wickedness which succeeded it, and this while he had nothing to prohibit him, his success was already appointed his successor, to enjoy the spoils. He was present; and that there was no likelihood that a person who had the one half of that authority without any danger, and with a good character, should be afraid of the other half, and this when it was doubtful whether he could obtain it or not; and when he saw the sad example of his brethren before him, and was both the informer and the accuser against them, at a time when they had been otherwise all well, he was discovered; nay, was the author of the punishment inflicted upon them, when it appeared evidently that they were guilty of a wicked attempt against their father; and that even the contentions themselves, as he had already observed, were not that he had ever managed affairs out of the sincere affection to his father. And as to what he had done at Rome, Cæsar was a witness thereto; who yet was no more to be imposed upon than God himself; of whose opinions his letters sent thither are sufficient evidence; and that it was not reasonable to prefer the calumnies of such as proposed to raise disturbances before those letters; the greatest part of which calumnies had been raised at first only to lay the blame upon his enemies to force them, which they had not been able to do if he had been there. Moreover, he showed the weakness of the evidence of his enemies, which was commonly false; because the distinction between usury and usurers naturally obliges them to say many things in order to please those that govern them. He also offered himself to the torture.

5. Hereupon there was a change observed in the assembly, while they greatly pitied Antipater, who, by weeping and putting on a countenance suitable to his sad case, made them commiserate the same; insomuch that his very enemies were moved to compassion; and it appeared plainly that Herod himself was affected in his own mind, although he was not willing it should be taken notice of. Then did Nicolaus begin to prosecute what the king had begun, and the behavior of his former relations to the evidence which arose from the tortures, or from the testimonies. "He principally and largely cried up the king's virtues, which he had exhibited in the maintenance and education of his sons, while they were young; and who, and the advice and encouragement which he gave thereby, but still fell from one misfortune to another. Although he owned that he was not so much surprised with that thoughtless behavior of his sons, who were not young, and were beside him; and who, without any advice of censors, who were the occasion of their lapsing out of their minds all the righteous dictates of nature, and this out of a desire of coming to the government sooner than they ought to do; yet that he could not but justly stand amazed at the horrid wickedness of Antipater, who, although he had not only had great benefits bestowed on him by his father, enough to tame the most enraged serpents, yet could not be satisfied with the most envenomed serpents; whereas even those creatures admit of some mitigation, and will not bite their benefactors, while Antipater hath not let the misfortunes of his brethren be any hindrance to him, but he hath gone to the most barbarity notwithstanding. Yet was thou, O Antipater! (as thou hast thyself confessed,) the informer as to what wicked actions they had done, and the searcher out of the evidence against them, and the author of the part of the punishment undergone upon their detection. Nor do we say this as accusing thee for being so zealous in thy anger against them, but are astonished at thy endeavors to imitate their profligate behavior, and we desire thereby, that thou didst not set thus for the safety of thy father, but for the destruction of thy brethren, that by such outside hatred of their impiety, thou mightest be believed a lover of thy father, and they might get the power enough to do mischief with the greatest impunity, which design thy actions indeed demonstrate. It is true, thou tookest thy brethren off, because thou didst convict them of those wicked design, but no more as to justice to those who were their partners; and thereby didst make it evident to all men, that thou madest covenant with them against thy father, when thou chosest to be the accuser of thy brethren, as doing them good, by advantage of laying plots to kill thy father, and so to enjoy double pleasure, which is truly worthy of thy evil disposition, which thou hast openly shown against thy brethren; on which account thou didst receive no advantage, as having been employed to expel, nor was that behavior unworthy of thee. But if thy intention were otherwise, thou art worse than they; while thou didst contrive to hide thy treachery against thy father, thou didst hate them, not as plotters against thy father, for in that case thou hadst not thyself fallen upon the like crime, but as successors of his dominions and more worthy of that succession than thyself. Thou wouldst kill thy father's sons, lest thy lies be against them might be detected: and lest thou shouldst suffer what punishment thou hadst deserved, thou hadst a mind to exact that punishment of thy unhappy father, and didst devise such a thing as if the world never yet saw. For thou, who art his son, didst not only lay a treacherous design against thy father, and didst it while he loved thee, and had been thy benefactor, had made thee in reality his partner in the kingdom, and had openly declared thee his successor, while thou wast not forbidden to taste the sweeteness of authority already, and hast the firm hope of what was future by thy father's determination, and the security of a wise and just king, for certain thou didst not measure those things according to thy father's various disposition, but according to thy own thoughts and inclinations; and want desires to take the part that remained away from thy father's sons, and hast the boldness to call thy father a wild beast; while thou hadst thyself a mind more cruel than any serpent, whence thou sentest out that poison among thy nearest kindred and closest benefactors, and invited them to assist thee and guard thee, and didst hedge thyself in on all sides by the artsifices of both men and women, against an old man; as though that mind of thine was agree so well together when they are out of the sight of the multitude; for when they are alone by themselves, they act in concert, and profess that they will never leave off their friendship, but will fight against those from whom they conceal their designs. And thus they bar and search out these things, and get a perfect knowledge of them, and then told her brother of them, who understood also of himself a great deal of what she said, but still durst not depend upon it, because the stories he had of his sister's calamities. For there was a certain sect of men that were Jews, who valued themselves highly upon the exact skill they had in the law of their fathers, and made men believe they were highly favored of God, or whom the notions of women were inveigled. These are those that are called the sect of the Pharisees, who were in a capacity of greatly opposing kings. A cunning sect they were, and soon elevated to a pitch of open fighting and doing mischief. Accordingly, when all the people of the Jews gave assurance of their good-will to Caesar, and to the king's government, these very men did not swear, being above six thousand; and when the king imposed a fine upon them, Caesar's wrath was pacified for them. In order to requisite which kindess of hers, since they were believed to have the foreknowledge of things to come by divine inspirations, they foretold how God had decreed that Herod should die, and that his posterity should be deprived of it; but that the kingdom should come to her and Pheroras, and to their children. These predictions were not concealed from Salome, but were told the king; as also kings, who desired no innovations about the palace itself: so the king slew such of the Pharisees as were principally accused, and Bagoas, the eunuch, and one Carus, who exceeded all in the unhealthy concubinage, but there was no end to his unrighteousness; he slew also those of his own family who had consented to what the Pharisees foretold; and for Bagoas, he had been puff'd up by them as though he should be named the father and do.benefactor of him who, by the sentence, was foretold to be their appointed king; for that this king would have all things in his power, and would enable Bagoas to marry, and to have children of his own body begotten.

CHAP. III.

Concerning the Enmity between Herod and Pheroras; how Herod sent Antipater to Caesar; and of the Death of Pheroras.

1. WHEN Herod had punished those Pharisees who had been convicted of the foregoing crimes, he gathered an assembly together of his friends, and accused Pheroras's wife; and ascribing the abuses of the virgins to the impudence of that woman, brought an accusation against her for the dishonor she had brought upon them; that "she had studiously introduced a quarrel between him and his brother, and by her ill temper, had brought them into a state of war, both by her words and actions; that the fines which he had laid had not been paid, and the offenders had escaped punishment by her means; and whatever thing which had later been done had been done without her: for which reason Pheroras would do well, if he would, of his own accord, and by his own command, and not at my entreaty, or as following my opinion, put to death his nephew, and thus he would not be called to him; yet did not Herod so retain his hatred to Pheroras, but remitted of his purpose [not to see him,] which he before had, and that for such great causes as have been already mentioned; but rather in order to do it, that he might have thereby a chance to destroy her, and this without being sent for: and when he was dead, he took care of his funeral, and had his body brought to Jerusalem, and buried there, and appointed a solemn mourning for him. This without saying (as before) that it was by Antipater's misfortunes, although he had already sailed for Rome, now going about to punish him for the murder of his brethren. I will explain the history of this matter very distinctly, that it may be for a warning to mankind, that they take care of conducting their whole lives by the rules of virtue.

CHAP. IV.

Phæroas's Wife is accused by his freed-men as guilty of poisoning him; and how Herod, upon the Manner of the Matter by the Poison; but so that it had been prepared for himself by his son Antipater; and, upon an Inquiry by Torture, he discovered the dangerous Designs of Antipater.

1. As soon as Phæroas was dead, and his husband was no longer, one of Phæroas's freed-men, who were much esteemed by him, came to Herod and entreated him not to leave the murder of his brother without avenging it, but to examine into such an unreasonable and unhappy death. "And when Herod had comforted him, and had promised to give him a reward, he told him of it; that this potion was brought out of Arabia by a woman, under pretence indeed as a love potion, for that was its name, but in reality to kill Phæroas; for that the Arabian women are skilful in making love potions: and the women to whom they ascribe this, was confessedly a most intimate friend of one of Syllæus's mistresses, and that both the mother and the sister of Phæroas's wife had been at the places where she was; and he had been to sell them this potion, and had come back and brought it with them the day before that of his supper." Hereupon the king was provoked, and put the woman to death; and the other were free with them; and as the fact did not yet appear, because none of them would confess it, at length one of them, under the utmost agonies, said so much more but this, that "she prayed that God would send the like again upon Antipater's mother, who had been the occasion of these miseries to all of them."

This prayer induced Herod to increase the woman's tortures, till thereby all was discovered: "the sinner met me through the prayer of a woman, and the prayer of what he had said to his son along unto Phæroas's woman." (Now what Herod had charged Antipater to conceal, was the gift of a hundred talents to him, to not have any conversation with Phæroas, and not to come near to his father; and that he complained to his mother how very long his father lived; and that he was himself almost as old man, insomuch, that if the kingdom should once come to him, it would not afford him any profit; and that there were a great many of his brothers, or brothers' children, bringing up, that might have hopes of the kingdom, as well as himself, all which made his own heart fear; for if he should himself not live, Herod had ordained that the government should be conferred, not on his son, but rather on a brother. He also had accused the king of great barbarity, and of the slaughtering of his son, and that it was out of the fear he was under, lest he should do the like to him, that made him contrive this his journey to Rome, and Phæroas contrive to go to his own tetrarchy." These confessions agreed with what his sister had told him, and tended greatly to corroborate her testimony, and to free her from the suspicion of her unfaithfulness to him. So the king having satisfied himself of the spite which Doria, Antipater's mother, as well as himself, bore to him, took away from her all her fine ornaments, which were worth many talents, and then sent her away, and entered into friendship with Phæroas's widow. But he who most of all irritated the king against his son, was one Antipater, the procurator of Antipater the king's son, who, when he was tortured, among other things said, that Antipater had prepared a deadly potion and given it to Phæroas; with his desire that he would give it to his father during his absence, and when he was too remote to have the least suspicion cast upon him thereto relating: that Antiphilius and Herodias had sent him to Thæane to take them out of Egypt, and that it was sent to Phæroas by Thæonion, the brother of the mother of Antipater the king's son, and by that means came to Phæroas's wife, her husband having given it her heretofore, and she did not learn it; for she had kept it; and as she was running to fetch it, she threw herself down from the horse-top, yet did she not kill herself, because she fell upon her feet; by which means, when the king had been put to death, he rather comforted her than did her any harm; and the domestics pardoned, upon condition of their concealing nothing of the truth from him, but had threatened her with the utmost miseries if she proved ungrateful, [and concealed any thing:] so she promised to serve them as she was able; and that she would tell every thing, and tell after what manner every thing was done; and said, what many took to be entirely true, that "the potion was brought out of Egypt by Antiphilus; and that his brother, who was so for the procuring it, and that when Thæonion brought it us, he kept it upon Phæroas's committing it to her; and that it was prepared by Antipater for thee. When therefore, Phæroas's sister was sent to him, and took care of him, and when he saw the kindness thou hadst for him, his mind was overborne thereby. So he called me to him, and said to me; 'O woman! Antipater hath circumvented me in this affair of his father and my brother, by persuading me to have a murderous intention to him, and procuring a potion to be subservient thereto; do thou, therefore, go and fetch my potion, (since my brother appears to have nothing at all to do with it,) and bring it to me which I have formerly, and I do not expect to live long myself, and that I may not defile my forefather by the murder of a brother,) and burn it before my face: that accordingly she brought it to him, and burnt it before his face; and that accordingly she burnt it before his face; and that she burnt the greatest part of the potion; but that a little of it was left, that if the king, after Phæroas's death, should treat her ill, she might poison herself, and thereby get clear of her miseries." Upon her saying thus, she brought out the potion, and the box in which it was, before them all. Nay, there was another brother of Antiphilus, and his mother also, who, by the extreme pain and our strange misery, and the same thing, and owned the box, in order to be that which had been brought out of Egypt.] The high priest's daughter also, who was the king's wife, was accused to have been conscious of all this; which he greatly desired; and had reason to desire it; if he should himself not live, Herod had ordained that the government should be conferred, not on his son, but rather on a brother. He also had accused the king of great barbarity, and of the slaughtering of his son, and that it was out of the fear he was under, lest he should do the like to him, that made him contrive this his journey to Rome, and Phæroas contrive to go to his own tetrarchy."

3. While this was doing, Bathylus, also Antipater's freed-man, came from Rome, and, upon the tortures, was found to have brought another potion, to give it into the hands of Antipater's mother, and of her sisters, that if the former potion d.'t operate upon the king, this at least might succeed. At last, a letter came from Herod's friends at Rome, by the approbation and at the suggestion of Antipater, to accuse Archelaus and Philip, as if they calamitised their father on account of the slaughter of Alexander and Aristobulus, and as if they involved their creditors, and as if, because they were sent for, (for their father had already recalled them,) they concluded they were themselves also to be destroyed. Their letters had been procured by great rewards, by Antipater's friends; but Antipater himself wrote to his father about them, and said the heaviest things to their charge; yet did he entirely excuse them of any guilt, and said, they were but young men, and so imputed their words to their youth. But he said, that he had himself been very busy in the affair relating to Syileus, and in getting interest among the great men; and that on account had brought splendid accusations against them within, which cost him two hundred talents. Now, one may wonder how it came about, that while so many accusations were laid against him in Judaea during seven months before this time, he was not made accessory to any of them. The causes of which were, that the roads were exactly guarded, and that men hated Antipater; for there was nobody who would run any hazard himself, to gain any advantages.

CHAPTER V.

Antipater's Navigation from Rome to his Father, and how he was accused by Nicolaus of Damascus, and condemned to die by his Father, and by Quintillus Varus, who was then President of Syria; and how he was bound till Caesar should be informed of his Cause.

1. Now Herod, upon Antipater's writing to him, that having done all that he was to do, and this in the manner he was to do it, he would suddenly come to him, concealed his anger against him, and wrote back to him, and bade him not delay his journey, lest any harm should befall himself in his absence. And as he said also to make some little complaint about his mother, and promised that he would lay those complaints aside when he should return. He withah expressed himself in this petition for him, as fearing lest he should have some accidents upon his journey to him, and lest, when he lived at Rome, he should lay plots for the kingdom, and, moreover, do somewhat against himself. This letter Antipater met with in 66, and had received an account of Phereclus's death before at Tarsus. This last news affected him deeply; not out of any affection for Phereclus, but because he was dead without having murdered his father, which greatly grieved him; and when he was at Celendris in Cilicia, he began to deliberate with himself about his sailing home, as being much grieved with the execution of his mother. Now, some of his friends advised him that he should tarry a while somewhere, in expectation of further information. But others advised him to sail home without delay; for that if he were once come thither, he would soon put an end to all accusations, and that nothing afforded any where he more to do without his absent presence. He was persuaded by these last, and sailed on, and landed at the haven called Sebastus, which Herod had built at vast expenses in honor of Caesar, and called Sebastus. And now was Antipater evidently in a miserable condition; while nobody came to him nor saluted him, as they did at his going away, with good wishes or joyful acclamations; nor was there now any thing to hinder them from entertaining him, on the contrary, with bitter curses, while they supposed he was come to receive his punishment for the murder of his brethren.

2. Now Quintillus Varus was at this time at Jerusalem. He had sent to succeed Saturninus, as president of Syria, and was come as an assessor to Herod, who had desired his advice in his present affairs; and as they were sitting together, Antipater came upon them, without knowing any thing of the matter; he came into the palace clothed in purple. The porters indeed received him in, but excluded his friends. And now he was in great disorder, and presently understood who Antipater was; and therefore, in great fear, he absolv'd his father he was represented by him, who called him a murderer of his brethren, and a plotter of destruction against himself, and told him that Varus should be his auditor and his judge the very next day; so he found, that his misfortune he now heard of was already upon him, with the greatness of which he went away in conclusion: upon which his mother and his wife met him (who was the daughter of Pilate, the procurator of Palestine, under Herod,) from whom he learned all circumstances which concerned him, and then prepared himself for his trial.

3. On the next day Varus and the king sat to judge him; and both their friends were also called in, as also the king's relations, with his sister Salome, and as many as could discover any thing, and such as had been tortured; and besides these some slaves of Antipater's mother, who were raised up a little before his coming, and brought with them a written letter the sum of which was this: that "He should not come back, because all was come to his father's knowledge; and that Caesar was the only means to prevent both these to come into his father's hands." Then did Antipater fall down at his father's feet, and besought him "not to prejudice his case, but that he might be first heard by his father, and that his father would keep him still unprejudiced." So Herod ordered him to be brought into the midst, and then "lamented himself about his children from whom he had suffered such great misfortune; and because Antipater fell upon him in his misfortunes, he said tenaciously and with much vehemence and assertion of what education he had given them; and what reasonable supplies of wealth he had afforded them, according to their own desires; and which favours had hindered them from being vigorous, and from bringing his very life into danger, in order to gain his kingdom, after an impious manner, by taking away his life before the course of nature, their father's wishes, or justice; required that that kingdom should come to them; and that he wondered what hopes could elevate Antipater to such a pass, as to be hard enough to attempt such things; that he had by his testament in writing the inheritance of the guilt of the crime, while he was alive he was in no respect inferior to him, either in his illustrious dignity, or in power and authority, he having no less than fifty talents for his yearly income, and had received the power of life and death in thirty talents. He also objected to him the case of his brethren, whom he had accused; and if they were guilty, he had imitated their example; and if not, he had brought him groundless accusations against his near relations; for that he had been acquainted with all those things by him, and by nobody else, and had done what was done by his approbation, and whom he now abjured from all that was criminal, by honouring him with his power and with his goodness.

4. When Herod had thus spoken, he fell a weeping, and was not able to say any more; but
at his desire Nicolaus of Damascus, being the king's friend, and always conversant with him, and acquainted with whatsoever he did, and with the circumstances of his affairs, proceeded to what remained, and explained all that concerned the did, almost literally and in order of the facts. Upon which Antipater, in order to make his legal defence, turned himself to his father, and "enlarged upon the many indications he had given of his good-will to him; and instance in the while how much trouble he had been had not been done, had he not deserved them by his virtuous concern about him; for that he had made provision for every thing that was fit to be foreseen beforehand, as to giving him his wisest advice; and it was by him that the labor of his own hands, he had not grudged any such pains for him. And that it was almost impossible that he who had delivered his father from so many treacherous contrivances laid against him, should be in a plot against him, and so lose all the reputation he had gained for his virtue, by his wickedness which succeeded it, and this while he had nothing to prohibit him, who was already appointed his successor, to set himself against his father; and that there was no likelihood that a person who had the one half of that authority without any danger, and with a good character, should work against the other with infamy and danger, and this when it did not appear he could obtain it or not; and when he saw the sad example of his brethren before him, and was both the information and the accuser against them, at a time when he might not think them have been discovered; nay, was the author of the punishment inflicted upon them, when it appeared evidently that they were guilty of a wicked attempt against their father; and that even the contentions they had been in with him, which were known to his enemies to forge them, which they had not been able to do it he had been there. Moreover, he showed the weakness of the evidence obtained by torture, which was commonly false; because all the circumstances naturally obliges them to say many things in order to please those that govern them. He also offered himself to the torture."

5. Hereupon there was a change observed in the assembly, while they himself pitied Antipater, who, by weeping and putting on a countenance suitable to his sad case, made them commiserate the same; insomuch that his very enemies were moved to commiseration; but were pained that Herod himself was affected in his own mind, although he was not willing it should be taken notice of. Then did Nicolaus begin to prosecute what the king had begun, and the whole, at his bidding, increased the accusation by the evidence which arose from the tortures, or from the testimonies. "He principally and largely cried up the king's virtues, which he had exhibited in the maintenance and education of his sons, while he was still a young man, thereof, but still fell from one misfortune to another. Although he owned that he was not so much surprised with that thoughtless behavior of his former sons, who were but young, as were the sayings and counsellors, who were the occasion of their whipping out of their minds all the righteous dictates of nature, and this out of a desire of comple-not sufficient of itself to support so great a hatred as thou barest to him. And here thou appeared after the tortures of freemen, of domestics of men and women, which have been examined on thy account, and after the information, his ill-will to his father did not seem, by making haste to contradict the truth; and hast thought on ways not only to take thy father out of the world, but to demand that written law which is against thee, and the virtue of Varus, and the nature of justice. For if any argument, which he adduced, were true, thou. wouldst have been found guilty in thy own conscience, which would have put into thy heart to have spoken the truth; but that thy tortures may be esteemed the discoverers of truth. Will not thou, O Varus! deliver the king from the injuries of his kindred? Wilt not thou destroy this wicked wild beast, which hath pretended kindness to his father, in order to destroy his brethren; while yet he is himself alone ready to carry off the kingdom immediately, and appears to do so by tother to him all this? For thou art sensible, that this accusers is a great injury both to nature and to common life, and that the intention of parcide is not inferior to its perpetration: and he who does not punish it, is he himself truly injured.

6. Nicolaus added farther what belonged to Antipater's mother, and whatsoever she said: being straitened like a woman; as also about the predictions and the sacrifices relating to the king; and whatsoever she had done last in his favor, and his amours among Phero's women; the examination upon torture; and whatsoever concerned the testimonies of the witnesses, which were many and of various kinds; some present, some before, and others were sudden answers, which farther declared and confirmed the foregoing evidence. For these men who were acquainted with Antipater's practices, but had concealed them out of fear, when they saw that he had been accused of the accusations of the former witnesses, and that he his good fortunes, which had supported him hitherto, had now evidently betrayed him into the hands of his enemies, who were now insatiable in their hatred to him; and to save himself from the danger of death, he sought to gain the favor of his father; and his ruin was now hastened, not so much by the enmity of those that were his accusers, as by his gross, and impudent, and wicked contrivances, and his non-observance of his father's commands, while he had filled their house with disturbance, and caused them to murder one another; and was neither fair in his hatred, nor kind in his friendship; but just so far as served his own turn. Now, there were a great number who for a long time beforehand had seen all this; and especially such as were naturally disposed to judge of matters by the rules of virtue; because they were used to determine about affairs without passion, but had been restrained from making any open complaints before; these, upon the leave now given them, produced all they knew before the public. The demonstrations also of these wicked facts could now way be disproved; because things, which were of the nature of the accusator, neither speak out of favor to Herod, nor were they obliged to keep back what they had to say, out of suspicion of any danger they were in; but they spoke what they knew, because they thought such actions, which they knew, that Antipater made the greatest punishment; and indeed not so much for Herod's safety, as on account of the man's own wickedness. Many things were also said, and those by a great number of persons who were related to the king; and the same was sent to the king, and to his mother. Antipater, who used generally to be very shrewd in his lies and impudence, was not able to say one word to the contrary. When Nicolaus had left off speaking, and had produced the evidence, Varus bade Antipater to betake himself to making his defence, if he had prepared any thing wherein he might appear that he was not guilty of the crimes he was accused of; for that, as he was himself a man of such a character, as Antipater's witness was, Antipater must be in like manner desirous also to have him found entirely innocent. But Antipater fell down on his face, and appealed to God, and to all men, for testimonials of his innocency; desiring that God would judge between him and his accusers; and being in fear, that he had not laid any plot against his father. This being the usual method of all men constitute of virtue, that when they set about any wicked undertakings, they fall to work according to the method of the accusers; and were not accused of being of such a nature, that God was unconcerned in human affairs; but when once they are found out, and are in danger of undergoing the punishment due to their crimes, they endeavor to overthrow the evidence against them, by appealing to God; which was the very thing which Antipater now did; for whereas he had done every thing as if there were no God in the world; when he was on all this account so ready to die, no other advantage to expect from legal proofs, by which he might disprove the accusations laid against him, he impudently abused the majesty of God, and ascribed it to his power, that he had not been brought hither; and besides, he delivered them all what difficulties he had ever undergone in his bold acting for his father's preservation.

7. So when Varus, upon asking Antipater what he had to say for himself, found that he had nothing toVentiate, and saw that there was no end of that, he bade them bring the potion before the court, that he might see what virtue still remained in it; and when it was brought, and one that was condemned was to die was given him by the king; and he so drank it. When Varus got up and departed out of the court, and went away the day following to Antioch, where his usual residence was, because that was the palace of the Syrian people; the son of Herod, who had laid his son in bonds. But what were Varus's discourses to Herod, was not known to the generality, and upon what words it was that he went away; though it was also generally supposed, that whatsoever Herod did after what was known to have been said to Varus, was his own voluntarion. But when Herod had bound his son, he sent letters to Rome to Caesar about him, and such messengers withal as should, by word of mouth, explain these discourses to Caesar. Now, at this very time there was seized a letter of Antiphius, written to Antipater out of Egypt, (for he lived there;) and, when it was opened by the king, it was found to contain what follows: I have sent thee, Antipater, my letter, and hazarded my own life; for thou knowest that I am in danger from two families, if I be discovered. I wish thee good success in thy affair. These were the contents of this letter: but the king made no inquiry about the other letters, neither did he appear, and Antiphius's slave, who brought that letter which had been read, desired that he had received the other. But, while the king was in doubt about it, one of Herod's friends, seeing a means if dead, that his equal a sentence of death was a name by doubting of the cloth, (for he had two costs on,) he guessed that the letter might be within that doubing, which accordingly proved to be true. So they took out the letter, and its contents were that Antipater was near death, and that Antipater desired to have such a letter to thy father as thou desiredst me. I have also taken a copy and sent it, as if it came from Salome to my lady [Livia]; which, when thou readest, I know that Herod will punish Salome. Now, when Antipater sent a tenfold letter of Salome's to her lady was composed by Antipater, in the name of Salome, as to its meaning, but in the words of Acme. The letter was this: "Acme to king Herod. I have done my endeavor that nothing that is done against thee should be concealed from thee. So upon my sending a letter of Salome written to my lady against thee, I have written out a copy, and sent it to thee, with hasard to myself, but for thy advantage. The reason why she wrote it was this, that she had a mind to be married to the king's distress, for the prey of some things, that I may not come into danger of my life." Now Acme had written to Antipater himself, and informed him that, in compliance with his command, she had both herself written to Herod, and had had laid such plot entirely against him, and had herself sent a copy of an epistle, as coming from Salome to her lady. Now, Acme was a Jewess by birth, and a servant to Cesar's wife; and this out of her friends for Antipater, the son of his sister also, and at that corrupt by him with a large present of money, to assist in his pernicious designs against his father and his aunt.

8. Hereupon Herod was so amazed at the prodigious wickedness of Antipater, that he was ready to have ordered him to be slain immediately, as a turbulent person in the most important concerns, and as one that laid a plot not only against himself, but his sister also, and at that corrupt Cesar's own domestics. Salome also provoked him to it, bewailing her breast, and bidding him kill her, if he could produce any credible testimony that she had acted in such manner, and that he might set him about this matter, and bid him contradict it if he could, and not suppress any thing he had to say for himself; and when he had not one word to say, he asked him, since he was every way as guilty as he, to hasten his execution no farther delay, but discover his associates in these his wicked designs. So he laid all upon Antiphasus; but discovered nobody else. Hereupon Herod was in such great grief, that he was read to deliver himself into Antipater, and to give an account of these his wicked contrivances. But he soon became afraid, lest he might there, by the assistance of his friends, escape the danger he was in: so he kept himself bound as before, and sent more ambassadors and letters to Rome to accuse his son, and an account of what assistance Acme had given him in his wicked designs, with copies of the epistles before mentioned.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning the Disease that Herod fell into, and the Stedfastness of the Jews, and the Punishment of the Sted fosters.

§ 1. Now Herod's ambassadors made haste to Rome; but sent, as instructed beforehand, what answers they were to make to the questions put to them. They also carried the epistles with them. But Herod now fell into a distemper, and made his will, and bequeathed his kingdom to [Antipas] his youngest son; and this out of that hatred to Archelaus and Philip, which the calamities of Antipater had raised against them. He said he was tired of the multitude of the people, and gave five hundred to Julius, Cesar's wife, to Cesar's children, and friends, and freed-men. He also distributed among his sons and their sons, his money, his revenues, and his lands. He also made them all to the same effect, that they continued faithfully to him in all his circumstances, and was never so rash as to do him any harm: and as he despaired of recovering, for he was about the seventieth year of his age, he grew fierce, and indulged the bitterest maledictions upon all occasions; the cause whereof was this, that he thought himself despised, and that the nation was pleased with his misfortunes; besides which, he resented a sedition which some of the lower sort of men excited against him, of occasion of which was as follows:

2. There was one Judas, the son of Saraphis, and Matthias, the son of Margalothus, two of the most eloquent men among the Jews, and the most celebrated interpreters of the Jewish law; and men well beloved by the people, because of their education of their youth; for all those that were studious of virtue frequented their lectures every day. These men, when they found that the king's distress was increased, and several young men that they would pull down all those works which the king had erected contrary to the law of their fathers, and thereby obtain the rewards which the law will confer on them for the performance of any such actions of righteousness, for that proof of Herod's rashness in making such things as the law had forbidden, that his other misfortunes, and this distress also, which was so unusual among mankind, and with which he was now afflicted, for Herod had caused such things to be made, which were contrary to the law, of which he was accused by Judas and Matthias; for the king had erected over the great gate of the temple a large golden eagle, of great value, and had dedicated it to the temple. Now, the law forbids those that propose to live according to it, to erect images or representations of any living creature. So these men, when they perceived that the king was induced to erect the golden eagle, alleging, that "although they should incur any danger, which might bring them to their deaths, the virtue of the action now proposed to them would appear much more advantageous to them than the plagues which they would die for the preservation and observation of the law of their fathers; since they would also acquire an everlasting fame and commendation; since they would be both commended by the present generation, and be an example for all posterity that life would never be forgotten to posterity; since that common calamity of dying cannot be avoided by our living so as to escape any such dangers; that therefore it is a right thing for those who are rich and in a virtuous condition, to wait for that fatal hour by such a behavior as may carry them out of the world with praise and honor; and that this will alleviate death to a great degree, thus to come at it by the performance of such actions, which bring us into danger of it; and, at the same time, leave that reputation behind them to their children and to all their relations, whether they be men or women, which will be of great advantage to them afterward." asked them if they had been so bold as to pull down what he had dedicated to God? "Yes, (said they,) what was contrived, we contrived, and what hath been performed, we performed it, and that with such a virtuous courage as becomes men; for we have given our assistance to those things which are dedicated to the majesty of God, and we have provided for what we have learned by hearing the law; and it ought not to be wondered at, if we esteem those laws which make men to come to him, were taught by him, and left behind him, more worthy of observation than thy commands. Accordingly, we will undergo death, and all form of punishment which thou canst inflict upon us, and as the sea is to us, as we are conscious to ourselves that we shall die, not for any unrighteous actions, but for our love to religion."

And thus they all said, and their courage was still equal to their professions. Nor was the case so equal to that with which they readily set about this undertaking. And when the king had ordered them to be bound, he sent them to Jericho, and called together the principal men among the Jews; and when he came, he made them assemble in the theatre, and because he could not himself stand, he lay upon a couch, and enumerated the many labors that he had long endured on their account, and his building of the temple, and while the Asmonians, during the hundred and twenty-five years of their government, had not been able to perform any so great a work for the honor of God as that was; that he had also adorned it with very great dedications, and that he had hoped that he had left himself a memorial, and procured himself a reputation after his death. He then cried out, that these men had not abstained from the law, even in his lifetime, but that, in the very daytime, in the sight of the multitude, they had abused him to that degree, as to fall upon what he had dedicated, and in that way of abuse had pulled it down to the ground, and had insulted, indeed, that they did it to afront him; but if any one consider the thing truly, they will find that they were guilty of sacrilege against God therein."

4. But the people, on account of Harold's barbarous and for fear they should be so cruel as to inflict punishment on them, said, "What was done, was done without their approbation, and that it seemed to them that the actors might well be punished for what they had done." But the king cried out, that the thing was not done by them, but by others [of the assembly] but he deprived Matthias of the high priesthood, as in part an occasion of this action, and made Joazer, who was Matthias's wife's brother, high priest in his stead. Now it happened, that during the time of this high priest of Matthias, there was another person made high priest for a single day, that very day which the Jews observed as a fast. The occasion was this: the king called the high priest, on the night before that day, when the fast was to be celebrated, seemed in a dream 7 to have conversation with his wife; and because he could not officiate himself on that account, Joseph, the high priest, did not meddle with the priests, that were sent to call them. And now the king was in a wild rage against them all, the innocent as well as those that had afforded ground for accusations; and when they were come, he ordered them all to be sent to the hippodrome; and sent for his sister Salome, and her husband Alexis, and spoke thus to them: "I shall die in a little time, so great are my pains; which death ought to be cheerful by all men, but without such mourning as men usually expect at a king's death. For that he was not unquaintly wise, and would not see that his life would be a thing very desirable, and exceedingly acceptable to them; because during his lifetime when contradicted thereby, seem to me of weight enough to deserve that so great a man as Rolando should spend his time in endeavors at their vindication."

7 This fact, that one Joseph was made high priest for a single day, on occasion of the action here described, that befall Matthias, the real high priest, in his sleep, the fact that he did the great day of expiation, is stated to both in the Mishna and Talmud, as Dr. Hudson here informs us. And indeed, from this fact, thus fully attested, we may confute that pretended rule in the Talmud here mentioned, and endeavored to be excused by Reland, that the high priest was not suffered to sleep the night before the great day of expiation; which watchkeeping we may determine for the many important duties he was to perform on that solemn day, to dispose him duly to perform them. Nor do such Talmudical ales, when unsupported by better evidence, much less they were ready to revolt from him: and to abuse the donations he had dedicated to the gods; that it was therefore their business to resolve to afford him some alleviation of his great sorrows on this occasion; for that, if they do not refuse him their consent in what he desires, he shall have greater means for evil, and such as never any king had before him; for then the whole nation would mourn from their very soul, which otherwise would be done in sport and mockery only. He desired therefore that as soon as they saw him, he should turn up the ghost, they should place soldiers round the hippodrome, while they do not know that he is dead: and that they shall not declare his death to the multitude till this is done, but that they shall give orders to his friends to say that he was struck with darts; and that this slaughter of them all will cause that he shall not miss to rejoice on a double account: that as he is dying, they will make him secure that his will shall be executed in what he charges them to do; and that he shall have the honor of a memorable mourning at his funeral. So he deplored his condition, with tears in his eyes, and obtained them by the kindness due from them, as of his kindred, and by the faith they conceived in the God, and begetting them of the son, nor would hinder him of this honorable mourning at his funeral." So they promised him not to transgress his commands.

55 Now, one may easily discover the tenor of this man's mind, which not only took pleasure in doing what he had done formerly against his relations, out of the love of life, but by those commands of his which savored of no humanity, he increased their hatred, and parting out of this life, that the whole nation should be put into mourning, and indeed made desolate of their dearest kindred, when he gave order that one out of every family should be slain. The king, therefore, who was his son, but own brother to Archelaus, by the name of a tetrarchy, and bequested Jannia, and Ashdod, and Phasaelis, to Salome his sister, with five hundred thousand [drachm] of silver that the king had received in drachmas of coin, money, besides both reams of gold and silver, and garments exceeding costly, to Julius, Caesar's wife; and to certain others, five millions. When he had done these things, he died, the fifth day after he had caused Antipater to be slain; having reigned since he had procured Antigonus to be slain, thirty-four years: but since he had been declared king by the Romans, thirty-seven. A man he was of great barbarity towards all men, and bequathed to his family what was above the consideration of what was right: yet was he favored by fortune as much as any man ever was, for from a private man he became a king: and though he were encompassed with ten thousand dangers, he got clear of them all, and continued his life to a very old age. But then, as to the affairs of his family and children, in which, indeed, according to his own opinion, he was also happily endowed, because he was able to conquer his enemies, yet, in my opinion, he was herein very unfortunate. 2. But then Salome and Alexas, before the king's death was made known, dismissed those that were shut up in the hippodrome, and told them that the king ordered them to go away to their own lands, and take care of their own affairs, which was esteemed by the nation a great benefit. And now 1 the king's death was made public, when they found that it was not to have his kingdom confirmed to him at Rome: ch. 15, sect. 5, and Of the War, b. ii. ch. ii. sect. 1, which influence is perhaps all that Josephus intended by the words before us. 1These numbers of years for Herod's reign, 34, and 37, are the very same with those Of the War, b. i. ch. xxvii. sect. 6, and are among the principal chronological characters belonging to the reign or death of Herod. See Harm of the Evag. p. 150—153

CHAP. VIII.
Concerning Herod's Death, and Testament, and Burial.

1. And now Herod altered his testament upon the alteration of his mind; for he appointed Antipas, to whom he had before left the kingdom, to be tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, and granted the kingdom to Archelaus. He also gave Galatia to Ponnus, and the other parts of the empire to his son, Mark; and made Archelaus king of Syria, and Philip, who was his son, but own brother to Archelaus, by the name of a tetrarchy, and bequested Jannion, and Ashdod, and Phasaelis, to Salome his sister, with five hundred thousand [drachmae] of silver that the king had received in drachmas of coin, money, besides both reams of gold and silver, and garments exceeding costly, to Julius, Caesar's wife; and to certain others, five millions. When he had done these things, he died, the fifth day after he had caused Antipater to be slain; having reigned since he had procured Antigonus to be slain, thirty-four years: but since he had been declared king by the Romans, thirty-seven. A man he was of great barbarity towards all men, and bequathed to his family what was above the consideration of what was right: yet was he favored by fortune as much as any man ever was, for from a private man he became a king: and though he were encompassed with ten thousand dangers, he got clear of them all, and continued his life to a very old age. But then, as to the affairs of his family and children, in which, indeed, according to his own opinion, he was also happily endowed, because he was able to conquer his enemies, yet, in my opinion, he was herein very unfortunate.
soldierly together in the amphitheatre at Jericho; and the first thing they did was, they read Herod's letter, written to the soldiery, thanking them for their fidelity and good-will to him, and exhorting them to adorn his son Archelaus, whom he had appointed for their king, like fidelity and good-will. After which, Ptolemy, who had the king's seal intrusted to him, read the king's testament which was to be of force no otherwise than as it should stand when Cæsar had inspected it; and Horus, who had the present care of the kingdom, said to Archelaus, as king, and the soldiery came by bands, and their commanders with them, and promised the same good-will to him, and readiness to serve him, which they had exhibited to Herod, and to be constant to God to be constant to him.

3. After this was over, they prepared for his funeral, it being Archelaus's care that the procession to his father's sepulchre should be very sumptuous. And set out all his ornaments to adorn the pomp of the funeral. The body was carried upon a golden bier, embroidered with very precious stones of great variety, and it was covered over with purple, as well as his clothing itself: he had a crown upon his head, and above it a crown of gold; he also had a sceptre in his right hand. About the bier were his sons and his numerous relations; next to these was the soldiery, distinguished according to the several countries and provinces; and they were put into the following order: first of all went his guards; then the band of Thracians; and after them the Germans; and next the band of Galatians; every one in their habiliments. Archelaus seated himself behind the head of the whole army in the same manner as they used to go out to war, and as they used to be put in array by their master-masters and centurions; these were followed by five hundred of his domestic cavalry. So they went right furlonge to Herodium; for there by his own command he was to be buried. And thus did Herod end his life.

4. Now Archelaus paid him so much respect, as to keep the mourning till the seventh day; for so many days are appointed for it by the law of our fathers. And when he had given a treat to the multitudes, and left off his mourning, he went up into the temple; he had also acclamation given him, which passed over to him, as he went, every one striving with the rest who should appear to use the loudest acclamations. So he ascended a high elevation made for him, and took his seat, in a throne made of gold, and surrounded by the multitude, and declared "with what joy he received their acclamations, and the marks of the good-will they showed to him; and returned them thanks that they did not remember the injuries his father had done them, to whom he treated with such kindness; and promised he would endeavor not to be behindhand with them in rewarding their sincerity in his service, after a suitable manner; but that he should abstain at present from the names of kings, and that he should have the honor of that dignity, if Cæsar should confirm and settle that testament which his father had made; and that it was on this account, that when the army would have put their hands at Jericho, he would not accept of that honor, which is usually so much desired, because it was not yet evident that he who was to be principally concerned in bestowing it, would give it him; although by his acceptance he would not want the ability of rewarding their kindness to him; and that it should be his endeavor, as to all things wherein they were concerned, to prove in every respect better than his father." Whereupon the multitude, as it is usual with them, supposed that the first days of those that enter upon such governments, declare the intentions of those that accept them; and so by how much Archelaus spoke the more gently and civilly to them, by so much did they more highly commend him, and made application to him for the grant of what they desired. Some made a lament that he would cease them some of their annual payments; but others desired him to release those that were put into prison by Herod, who were many, and had been put there at several times, others of them required that he would take away the death which Herod had inflicted on them, and what was publicly sold and bought. So Archelaus contradicted them in nothing, since he pretended to do all things so as to get the good-will of the multitude to him, as looking upon that good-will as a pledge of the interest of the multitude in his government. Hereupon he went and offered sacrifice to God, and then betook himself to feast with his friends.

CHAP. IX.

How the People raised a Sedition against Archelaus, and how he sailed to Rome.

1. At this time also it was, that some of the Jews of the tribe of the Gadarenes made a tumult. They lamented Matthias, and those that were slain with him by Herod, who had not any respect paid them by a funeral mourning, out of the fear men were in of that man; they were in such confusion and confusion, that they took the golden eagle. The people made a great clamor and lamentation hereupon, and cast out some reproaches against the king also, as if that tended to alleviate the miseries of the deceased. The king was now at Mount Sion, where he maintained the whole army in the same manner as they used to go out to war, and as they used to be put in array by their master-masters and centurions; these were followed by five hundred of his domestic cavalry. So they went right furlonge to Herodium; for there by his own command he was to be buried. And thus did Herod end his life. Now Archelaus paid him so much respect, as to keep the mourning till the seventh day; for so many days are appointed for it by the law of our fathers. And when he had given a treat to the multitudes, and left off his mourning, he went up into the temple; he had also acclamation given him, which passed over to him, as he went, every one striving with the rest who should appear to use the loudest acclamations. So he ascended a high elevation made for him, and took his seat, in a throne made of gold, and surrounded by the multitude, and declared "with what joy he received their acclamations, and the marks of the good-will they showed to him; and returned them thanks that they did not remember the injuries his father had done them, to whom he treated with such kindness; and promised he would endeavor not to be behindhand with them in rewarding their sincerity in his service, after a suitable manner; but that he should abstain at present from the names of kings, and that he should have the honor of that dignity, if Cæsar should confirm and settle that testament which his father had made; and that it was on this account, that when the army would have put their hands at Jericho, he would not accept of that honor, which is usually so much desired, because it was not yet evident that he who was to be principally concerned in bestowing it, would give it him; although by his acceptance he would not want the ability of rewarding their kindness to him; and that it should be his endeavor, as to all things wherein they were concerned, to prove in every respect better than his father." Whereupon the multitude, as it is usual with them, supposed that the first days of those that enter upon such governments, declare the intentions of those that accept them; and so by how much Archelaus spoke the more gently and civilly to them, by so much did they more highly commend him, and made application to him for the grant of what they desired. Some made a lament that he would cease them some of their annual payments; but others desired him to release those that were put into prison by Herod, who were many, and had been put there at several times, others of them required that he would take away the death which Herod had inflicted on them, and what was publicly sold and bought. So Archelaus contradicted them in nothing, since he pretended to do all things so as to get the good-will of the multitude to him, as looking upon that good-will as a pledge of the interest of the multitude in his government. Hereupon he went and offered sacrifice to God, and then betook himself to feast with his friends.

2. So when the king had suggested these things, and instructed his general in what he was to say, he let him go away to the people: but that he thought a clamor would and would not give him leave to speak, and put him in danger of his life. And as many more as were desirous to venture upon saying openly any thing which might re-such a thing, yet did the present pleasure they took in the punishment of those they deemed their enemies, outweigh all such considerations; and although Archelaus sent many to speak to them, yet they treated them not as any argument by him, but as persons that came of their own accord to beseech them; and would not let one of them speak. The addition also was made by such as were in a great passion; and it was evident that they were proceeding further in treacherous practices, by the multitude's running so fast upon the noise.

3. Now, upon the approach of that feast of unleavened bread, which the law of their fathers had appointed for the Jews at this time, which feast is called the Passover, and is a memorial of their deliverance out of Egypt, (when they offer sacrifices with great alacrity; and when they are required to slay more sacrifices in number than at any other festival, and when an innumerable multitude came thither out of the country, nay, from beyond its limits also, in order to worship God;) the seditious lamented Judas and Matthias, those teachers of the laws, and kept together in the temple, and had plenty of them that were with promises, that they would not ashamed to beg it. And as Archelaus was afraid lest some terrible thing should spring up by means of these men's madness, he sent a regiment of armed men, and with them a captain of guard, to be esteemed the ambassador of Archelaus to the seditious, before the whole multitude should be infected with the like madness; and gave them this charge, that if they found any more openly seditious than others, and more busy in attempting, to bring any into hatred, it was to him. But those that were seditious on account of those teachers of the law, irritated the people by the noise and clamors they used to encourage the people in their designs; so they made an assembly in the temple, and to Archelaus, and stoned the greatest part of them, although some of them ran away wounded, and their captain among them; and when they had thus done, they returned to the sacrifices which were already in their hands. Now Archelaus thought there was no way to preserve the entire government, but by cutting off those who made this attempt upon it; so he sent out the whole army upon them, and sent the horsemen to prevent them, and to assist those that were within the temple, and to kill such as ran away from the footmen when they thought themselves out of danger, which horsemen slew three thousand men, while the seditious were but thirty. And Archelaus did Archelaus order proclamation to be made to them all, that they should retire to their own homes; so they went away, and left the festival out of fear of somewhat worse which would follow, although they had been so offensive to the inhabitants of their own instruction. So Archelaus went down to the sea with his mother, and took with him Nicodimus and Pilate, and many others of his friends, and left Philip, his brother, and go- vernor, to manage the care of things not relating to family and to the public. There went out also with him Salome, Herod's sister, who took with her her children, and many of her kindred were with her; which knew the severe part of the affairs of the kingdom, and did not pretend, to assist Archelaus in gaining the kingdom, but in reality to oppose him, and chiefly to make loud complaints of what he had done in the temple. But Sabineus, Cesar's steward for Syria and Judea, to preserve Herod's effects, met with Archelaus at Cesarea; but Varus (president of Syria) came at that time, and restrained him from meddling with them, for he was there as sent for by Archelaus, by the means of Ptolemy. And Sabineus, out of regard to Varus, did neither seize upon any of the castles that were among the Jews, nor did he send up the treasures in them, but permitted Archelaus to have them until Cesar should deal with him as he pleased; so that, upon this his promise, he tarried still at Cesarea. But after Archelaus was sailed for Rome, and Varus was removed to Antioch, Sabineus went to Rome, and seized on the king's palace. He also sent for the keepers of the garrisons, and for all those that had the charge of Herod's effects, and declared publicly, that he should require them to give an account of what they had; and the men were made, in the manner be pleased; but those who kept them did not neglect what Archelaus had given them in command, but continued to keep all things in the manner that had been enjoined them; and their pretence was, that they kept them all for Cesar.

4. At the same time, also, did Antipas, another of Herod's sons, sail to Rome, in order to gain the government; being buoyed up by Salome and her sons, and with the promise of the government; and that he was a much honester and fitter man than Archelaus for that authority; since Herod had, in his former testament, deemed him the worthiest to be made king, which ought not to be done, since he had done anything against the testament. Antipas also brought with him his mother, and Ptolemy the brother of Nicodimus, one that had been Herod's most honored friend, and was now zealous for Antipas; but it was Irenus the orator, and one who had the care of the public accounts for seigniory, who was intrusted with the affairs of the kingdom, who most of all encouraged him to attempt to gain the kingdom; by whose means it was, that when some advised him to yield to Archelaus, as he was his father's elder brother and had been declared king by his father's last will, he would not submit so to do. And when he was come to Rome, all his relations revolted to him, not out of their good-will to him, but out of their hatred to Archelaus; though indeed they were most of all desirous of gaining their liberty, and to be put under a Roman governor; but if there were too great an opposition made to that, they thought Antipas preferable to Archelaus, who was so devotedly devoted to the kingdom for him. Sabinus also, by letters, accused Archelaus to Cesar.

5. Now, when Archelaus had sent in his papers to Cesar, who in his letter showed that he had treated his father's testament, with the account of Herod's money, and with Ptolemy, who brought Herod's seal, he so expected the event; but when Cesar had read these papers, and Varus's and Sabineus's letters, with the account of the money, and what were the annual revenues of the kingdom, and understood that Antipas had also sent letters to lay claim to the kingdom, he summoned his friends together, and to know their own affairs and Antipas's, the son of Agrippus, and of Julia his daughter, whom he had adopted, and took him and made him sit first of all, and desired such as pleased to speak their minds about the affairs now before them. Now Antipas was a very orator, and a bitter enemy to Archelaus, spoke first to this purpose: that "it was ridiculous in Archelaus to plead now to have the kingdom given him, since he had in reality taken already the power over it to himself, before Cesar had granted it to him: and appealed to those bold actions of his, in destroying so many at the Jewish festival, and, if the men had acted unjustly, it was but fit the punishing of them should have been executed without the consent of the country, but had the power to punish them, and not been executed by a man that, if he pretended to be a king, he did an injury to Caesar, by usurping that authority before it was determined for him by Caesar, but, if he owned himself to be a private person, his case was much worse, since he who was putting in for the kingdom, could by no means expect to have that power granted him, of which he had already deprived Caesar [by taking it to himself.] He also touched sharply upon him, and appealed to his courage in the company of the army, and that he was sitting in the royal throne beforehand, and his determination of lawsuits; all done as if he were no other than a king. He appealed also to his concessions to those that petitioned him on a public occasion, and indeed doing such things, than which he could devise no greater if he had been already settled in the kingdom by Caesar. He also ascribed to him the releasing of the prisoners that were in the hippoclone, and many other things, that either had been certainly done by him, or were believed to be done, and easily might be believed to have been done, because they were of such a nature, as to be usually done by young men, and by such as, out of a desire of rising on the preceding occasion, or out of the desire to do such things, than which he could devise no greater if he had been already settled in the kingdom by Caesar. He also charged him with the neglect of the funeral mourning for his father, and with having merry meetings the very night in which he died; and that it was thence the multitude took the handle of his conduct. He charged Archelaus cosectively with the murder of his dead father, who had bestowed such benefits upon him, and bequeathed such great things to him, by pretending to shed tears for him, in the manner of an actor on the stage, but every night making mirth for having gotten the government, he would appear to be the same Archelaus with regard to Caesar, if he granted him the kingdom, which he hath been to his father, as if he had then danger and singing as though an enemy of his were fallen, and not as though a man were carried to his funeral, that was so nearly related, and had been so great a benefactor to him. But he said that the greatness of the act was such, that because of the belief of Caesar to obtain the government by his grant, he had before acted in all things as he could have acted if Caesar himself, who ruled all, had fixed him firmly in the government. And when he was presented to the people in mourning, was the bloody slaughter of those about the temple, and the impiety of it, as done at the festival; and how they were also like sacrifices themselves, some of whom were foreigners, and others from all other countries. The whole temple was full of dead bodies; and all this was done, not by an alien, but by one who pretended to the lawful title of a king, that he might complete the wicked tyranny which his nation which, had insinuated, and which is hated by all men. On which account his father never so much as dreamed of making him his successor in the kingdom, when he was of a sound mind, because he knew his disposition; and in his former and more authentic testament, he appointed his antagonist Antipas to succeed; but that Archelaus was called by his father to that dignity, when he was in a dying condition, both of body and mind, while Antipas was called upon when he was recovered in his testament, and of such strength of body as made him capable of managing his own affairs; and if his father had the like notion of him formerly that he hath now showed, yet hath he given a sufficient specimen what a king he is like. For when he habed [in the ]power of Caesar of that power of disposing of the kingdom, which he justly hath, and hath not abstained from making a terrible slaughter of his fellow-citizens in the temple, while he was but a private person.

6. So when Antipater had made this speech, and had confirmed what he had said by producing many witnesses from among Archelaus's own relations, he made an end of his pleading. But Antipater stood up, and pleaded for Archelaus, and said, "That what had been done by the temple was rather to be attributed to the mind of those that had been killed than to the authority of Archelaus; for those, who are the authors of such things, are not only wicked in all their injury, but do it on themselves, but in forcing other persons to arrange themselves upon them. Now, it is evident that what these did in way of opposition was done under pretense indeed against Archelaus, but in reality against Caesar, who indeed was the real commander, and in that he attacked and slew those who were sent by Archelaus, and who came only to put a stop to their doing. They had no regard, either to God or to the festival, whom Antipater yet is not yet accounted for his own, as he is to his indulgence of an enmity to Archelaus, or to his hatred of virtue and justice. For as to those who begin such tumults, and first set about such unrighteous actions, they are the men who force those that punish them to besiege themselves, arms even against their wills. So that Antipater in effect ascribes the rest of what was done to all those who were of counsel to the assassins, for nothing which is here accused of injustice has been done by Archelaus, but by its authors; nor are those things evil in themselves, but so represented only in order to do harm to Archelaus. Such are these men's inclinations to do an injury to a man that he of his own accord has chosen, and that he has acquainted with them, and that hath ever lived in friendship with them; for that stage to this testament, was made by the king when he was of a greater mind, and so ought not to be accounted more than his former testament: and that for this reason, because Caesar is therein left to be the judge and disposer of all therein contained; and for Caesar, he will not, to be sure, at all imitate the Hellenistic ways, nor any thing that Beelzebub or Herod's whole life, had on all occasions been joint partakers of power with him, and yet did zealously endeavor to injure his determination, while they have not themselves had the same respect that they had for the power of Caesar will not therefore disdain the testament of a man whom he had entirely supported, of his friend and confederate, and that which is committed to him in trust, to ratify; nor will Caesar's will be altered, inasmuch as the king of kings, by Herod's will, adheres to the augmentation of his power, and uncontroverted through all the habitable world, initiates the wickedness of these men in condemning a king as a madman, and as having lost his reason, while he hath bequeathed the succession to the child of that kingdom; it is evident that Caesar's upright determination for refuge. Nor can Herod at any time have been mistaken in his judgment about a successor, while he showed so much prudence as to submit all to Caesar's determination." fell into a distemper, and died of it; and letters came from Varus, the president of Syriza, which informed Caesar of the revolt of the Jews; for, after Archelaus was taken, the Jews, in our tumult. So Varus, since he was there himself, brought the authors of the disturbance to punishment; and when he had restrained them for the most part from this sedition, which was a great deal too hard to be stopped, he took one legion of his army to Jerusalem to keep the Jews quiet, who were now very fond of innovation. Yet did not this at all avail to put an end to that their sedition; for after Varus was gone away, and the tumult became greater, and greatly distressed the Jews, relying on the forces that were left there, that they would by their multitude protect him: for he made use of all, and used all too grossly against them, despising the Jews and giving them so great a disturbance, that at length they rebelled; for he used force in seizing the citadels, and zealously pressed on the search after the king's money, in then on altars. Now Sabine was a worshiper of the love of gain, and his extraordinary covetousness.

2. But on the approach of Pentecost, which is a festival of ours, so called from the days of our forfathers, a great many ten thousands of men gave an assembly under the pretended pretense of the festival, but out of their indignation at the madness of Sabinus, and at the injuries he offered them. A great number there was of Galileans, and Idumeans, and many men from Jericho, which was a great city, most of them on the southern, on the east quarter; but the third band held the western part of the city where the king's palace was. Their work tended entirely to besiege the Romans, and to enclose them on their number, and of their resolutions, who had little regard to their lives, but were very desirous not to be overcome, while they thought it a point of prudence to overcome their enemies. They were determined, and promised, that if Varus, and, as he used to do, was very pressing with him, and entreated him to come quickly to his assistance, because the forces he had left were in imminent danger, and would probably be taken. But while he did himself get up to the highest tower of the fortress Phasaelus, which had been built in honor of Phasaelus, king Herod's brother, and called so when the Parthians had brought him to his death. So Sabine, upon the signal to the Romans to fall upon the Jews, although he did not himself venture so much as to come down to his friends, and thought he might expect that they would readily die, on account of his avarice. However, the Romans ventured to make a sally out of the place, and a terrible battle ensued; wherein, though it is true the Romans beat their adversaries, yet, for all that, they were still continued, and they cast stones at the Romans, partly with their bands and partly with slings, as being much used to those exercises. And the archers also in array did the Romans a great deal of mischief; because they used their hands to an exceeding great extent, and because the others were at an utter loss what to do; for when they tried to shoot their arrows against the Jews upwards, those arrows could not reach them, insomuch that the Jews were easily too hard for them, and they would do so to the Romans, who were greatly distressed by what was done, set fire to the cloisters so privately, that those who were gotten upon them did not perceive it. This fire breasted, with combustible matter, caught hold immediately on the roof of the cloisters; so the wood, which was full of pitch and wax, and whose gold was laid on it with silver, was set on fire so instantly, and those vast works, which were of the highest value and esteem, were destroyed utterly, while those that were on the roof unexpectedly perished at the same time; for, as the roof tumbled down, they held them down with it, and others of them were killed by their enemies who encompassed them. There was a great number more, who, out of despair of saving their lives, and out of astonishment at the misery that happened, cast themselves into the fire, or threw themselves upon their own swords, and so got out of their misery. But as to those that retired behind the same way by which they ascended, and thereby were not all encompassed, they were all unarm'd men, and their courage failing them; their wild fury being now not able to help them, because they were destitute of armor; inasmuch, that, of those that went up to the top of the roof, not one was left, who were so unarm'd, as were the Romans, and Sabine got openly four hundred talents.

3. But this calamity of the Jews' friends, who fell in this battle, grieved them, as did also this plundering of the money dedicated to God in the temple. Accordingly, that bode of them which continued best together, and was the most warlike, encompassed the palace, and threatened to set fire to it, and kill all that were in it. Yet still they commanded them to go out presently, and they would not; they promised, that if they did not hurt them, nor Sabine neither; at which time the greatest part of the king's troops deserted to them, while Rufus and Gratus, who had three thousand of the most warlike of Herod's subjects, were the only men who joined with them, who, when they went over to the Romans. There was also a band of horsemen under the command of Rufus, which itself went over to the Romans also. However, the Jews went on with the siege, and dug mines under the palace walls, and besought those that were gone over to the other side, not to be their hindrance, now they had such a proper opportunity for the recovery of their country's ancient liberty; yet they were still desirous of going away with his soldiers, but was not able to trust himself with the enemy; on account of what mischief he had already done them; and he took this great [pretended] lenity of theirs for a sign that they were disposed to comply with them: and so, because he expected that Varus was coming, he still bore the siege.

4. Now, at this time there were ten thousand other disorders in Judaea, which were like tumults; because a great number put themselves into a warlike posture either out of hopes of gain to themselves, or out of enmity to the Jews. In whose time there were 18,000 workmen continually employed in rebuilding and repairing that temple, as Josephus informs us, Antig. b. xx. ch. i. sect. 7. See the note on that place.
particular, two thousand of Herod's old soldiers, who were always discontented, got together in Judea itself, and fought against the king's troops, although Archelaus, Herod's first cousin, opposed them; but as he was driven out of the plains into the mountainous parts, by the military skill of those who had joined him, and the zeal of his followers, he was there, and saved what he could.

5. There was also Judas, the son of that Exe-kius who had been head of the robbers; which Exe-kius was a very strong man, and had with great skill and courage been caught at the destruction of Thebes in Judea. This Judas having got together a multitude of men of a profligate character about Sephoris in Galilee, made an assault upon the palace there, and seized upon all the weapons that were laid up there, and seized the same one of those that were with him, and carried away what money was left there; and he became terrible to all men, by tearing and rending those that came against him; and all this in order to raise himself, and out of an ambitious desire of the royal dignity; and he hoped to obtain that as a reward, not of his virtuous skill in war, but of his extra-ordinary valor in doing injuries.

6. This Exe-kius, who had been a slave of Herod the king, but in other respects a comely person, of a tall and robust body; he was one that was much superior to others of his order, and had had great things committed to his care. The king had had them kept at the disposal of such persons, and he was so bold as to put a diadem on his head, while a certain number of the people stood by him, and by them he was declared to be a king, and thought himself more worthy of that dignity than any else. He not only ruled over the royal palace at Jericho, and plundered what was left in it. He also set fire to many others of the king's houses in several places of the country, and utterly destroyed them, and ejected those that had been with him to take what was left in them for a prey; and he would have done greater things, unless care had been taken to repress him immediately; for Gratus, when he had joined himself to some Roman soldiers, took the forces he had with him, and met Simon, and after a great and long fight, no small part of those that came from Peran, who were a disordered body of men, and fought rather in a bold than in a regular manner; they were got together as were those belonging to Simon. And thus did a great and wild fury spread itself over the nation, because they had no king to keep the multitude in good order, and because those foreigners, who came to reduce the seditions to sobriety, did, on the contrary, set them more in a flame, because of the injuries they offered them, and the various management of their affairs.

7. At this time, also Alcimus, a person neither eminent by the dignity of his progenitors, nor for any great wealth he was possessed of, but one that had in all respects been a shepherd only, and was not known by any body; yet because he was tall and strong, and had otherwise the strength of his hands, he was so bold as to set up for king. This man thought it so sweet a thing to do more than ordinary injuries to others, that although he should be killed, he did nothing to escape it. For he lost his life in the last day of the month of Nisan, in the seventh year of the reign of Tiberius, the Roman governor.

*Unless this Judas, the son of Exe-kius, be the same with that Thaddeus, mentioned Acts v. 36, Josephus must have omitted him; for that other Thaddeus, whom he afterwards mentions, is the Roman governor, but, ch. vi. sect. 1, is much too late to correspond to him that is mentioned in the Acts. The names Thaddeus, Zabul, and Judas, are but little. See above, p. 385. See also his annals at A. M. 4601. However, since Josephus does not pretend to reckon up the heads sign. He had also four brethren, who were tall and strong, and were believed to be superior to others in the strength of their hands and therefore were encouraged to him at great things, and thought that strength of theirs would support them in retaining the kingdom. Each of these had band of men of his own; for those that got together to them were very numerous. They were every one of them also commanders; but, when they came to fight, they were subordinate to him, and fought for him, while he put a distrust on his own men. And it was not to debate about what things should be done, and all things were done according to his pleasure. And this man retained his power a great while; he was also called king, and had no king but he. He also, as well as his brethren, slew a great many, both of the Romans and of the king's forces, and managed matters with the like hatred to each of Ptolemy: The king's ministers, because of the licentious conduct they had been allowed under Herod's government; and they fell upon the Romans, because of the injuries they had so lately received from them. But in process of time this remained more cruel to all the soldiers than before, nor could any one escape from one or other of these seditions, since they slew some out of the hopes of gain, and others from a mere custom of slaying men. They once attacked a company of Jews, and killed seven hundred and forty-two of them, and burned the village of Arius, the centurion, who commanded the company, and shot forty of the best of his foot-soldiers; but the rest of them were affrighted at their slaughers, and made their escape. And they betook themselves by the means of Gratus, who came with the king's troops that were about him to their assistance. Now, these four brethren continued the war a long time, and of those that were expelled the Romans; but did not their own nation also a great deal of mischief. Yet were they afterward subdued; one of them in a fight with Gratus; another with Ptolemy; Archelaus also took the eldest of them prisoner, while the last of them was so dejected at the others' misfortune, and saw so plainly that he had no way now left to save himself, his army being worn away with sickness and continual fighting, that he took to flight, and left to Archelaus, upon his promise and oath to God [to preserve his life.] But these things came to pass a good while afterward.

8. And now Judea was full of robberies; and, as the seditions of the seditions lit upon any one to head them, he was created a king immediately, in order to do mischief to the public. They were in some small measure indeed, and in small matters, hurtful to the Romans: but the murders they committed upon their own people lasted a long while.

9. As soon as Varus was once informed of the state of Judea by Sabinus writing to him, he was afraid to take any great care of the two other legions, for there were three legions in all belonging to Syria, and four troops of horsemen, with the several auxiliary forces which either the kings or certain of the tetrarchs and other men had in view, to assist those that were then besieged in Judea. He also gave order, that all that were sent out for this expedition, should make haste to Ptolemais. The citizens of Berytus also gave him fine yachts, and got ready for his fleet, by means of all those ten thousand disorders in Judea, which he tells us were them abroad, see sect. 4 and 8, the Theda- days of the Acts might be the head of one of those seditions, though not particularly named by him. Thus he treated us here, sect. 5, of the Phasael, sect. 6, and of the two mothers, sect. 7 and 13: sect. 7, that certain of the seditions came and burned the royal palace at Amathus, or Bethshemesh, upon the river Jordan. Perhaps their leader who is not named by Josephus, might be this Thaddeus.
An Embassage of the Jews to Caesar, and how Caesar confirmed Herod's Testament.

11. So when Varus had settled these affairs, and had placed the former legion at Jerusalem, he returned back to Antioch; but as for Varus he had new sources of trouble come upon him at Rome, on the occasions following: for an embassage of the Jews was come to Rome, Varus having permitted the nation to send it, that they might petition for the liberty of their nation and their own laws. Now, the number of the ambassadors that were sent by the authority of the nation was fifty, to which they joined above eight thousand of the Jews that were at Rome already. Hereupon Cesar gave them a hearing; but as for the chief men among the Romans, in the temple of Apollo, which he had built at a vast charge; whither the ambassadors came, and a multitude of the Jews that were their friends accompanied them, as did also Archelaus and his friends; but as for the several kinsmen which Archelaus had, they would not join themselves with him, out of their hatred to him; and yet they thought it too gross a thing for them to refuse him; and his own people, and these against him, as supposing it would be a disgrace to them in Cesar's opinion to think of thus acting in opposition to a man of their own kindred. Philip also was come hither out of Syria, by the persuasion of Varus, with this purpose, intention, to assist his brother [Archelaus] for Varus was his great friend; but still so, that if there should any change happen in the form of government, (which Varus suspected there would,) and if any distribution of the provinces was made, to the count of the number that desired the liberty of living by their own laws, that he might not be disappointed, but might have his share in it.

2. Now upon the liberty that was given the Jews, the Romans sent to the Jews, who had hope obtained to dissolve a kingly government, to take themselves to accuse Herod of his iniquities; and they declared, that he was indeed in a name a king, but in reality he had that uncontrollable authority which tyrants exercise over their subjects, and had made use of that authority for the destruction of the Jews, and did not abstain from making many innovations among them, such as his own inclinations; and that whereas there were a great many who perished by that destruction he brought upon them, so many indeed as no other history relates, that they survived were far more miserable than they died, not only by the anxiety they were in from his looks and disposition towards them, but from the danger their estates were in of being taken away by him: that he did never leave off adorning those cities that he possessed, but was inhabited by foreigners; but so that the cities belonging to his own government were ruined, and utterly destroyed: that whereas, when he took the kingdom, it was in an extraordinary flourish, that he had reduced it to the utmost degree of poverty; and when, upon unjust pretences, he had slain many of the nobility, he took away their estates; and when he permitted any of them to live, he condemned them to the forfeiture of what they possessed. And, besides the annual impositions which he laid upon every one of them, they were to make liberal presents to himself, to his horses, and to his domestics and friends, as were vouchsafed the favor of being his tax-gatherers; because there was no way of obtaining a freedom from unjust violence, without giving either gold or silver for it. That they would say nothing of the want of the liberty of their virgins, and the reproach laid on their wives for incontinency, and those things acted after an insolent and inhuman manner; because it was not a smaller pleasure to the sufferers to have such things concealed than it would have been not to have suffered them. That Herod had put such abuses upon them as a wild beast would not have put on them, if he had power given him to rule over us; and that although their nation had passed through many subversions and alterations of government; that they had no account of any calamity they had ever been under, that could be compared with this which Herod had brought upon their nation; that it was for this reason that they did not dare to lay his punishment to his account, and yet more, what has been said above about Jerusalem, as king, upon this supposition, that whoever should be set over their kingdom, he would appear more mild to them than Herod had been: and that they had joined with him in the same manner for his father, in order to gratify him, and were ready to oblige him in other points also, if they could meet with any degree of moderation from him: but that he seemed to be afraid lest he should not be deemed Herod's own son, and adopt to himself all the blots about any descendant of that line, and let the nation understand his meaning, and this before his dominion was well established, since the power of disposing of it belonged to Caesar, who could either give it to him or not, as he pleased. That he did give it, received of his father, in return for his services, what was a testimony of his being a prince, and made him in some degree stand in the same light of his own countrymen at the temple. How, then, could they avoid that just hatred of him who, to the rest of his barbarity, had added this as one of the most heinous. They have openly and contrived him in the exercise of his authority? Now, the main thing they desired was this, "That they might be delivered from kingcraft and the like forms of government," and might be added to Syria, and be put under the authority of such presidents of theirs as should be sent to them; for that it would thereby be made evident, whether they be really a seditions people, and generally fond of innovations, or whether they would not be governed in a manner that they might have governors of any sort of moderation set over them."

3. Now when the Jews had said this, Nicolaus vindicated the kings from those ascriptions, and said, "That, as for Herod, since he had been thus accused all the time of his life, it was not fit for those that might have accused him of lesser crimes than those now mentioned, and might have procured him to be punished during his lifetime, to bring an accusation against him now he is dead. He also attributed the actions of Herod, as some have said, to a disposition of their king, imitating what was done by his countryman Antiochus as king, upon this supposition, that whoever should be set over their kingdom, he would appear more mild to them than Herod had been: and that they had joined with him in the same manner for his father, in order to gratify him, and were ready to oblige him in other points also, if they could meet with any degree of moderation from him: but that he seemed to be afraid lest he should not be deemed Herod's own son, and adopt to himself all the blots about any descendant of that line, and let the nation understand his meaning, and this before his dominion was well established, since the power of disposing of it belonged to Caesar, who could either give it to him or not, as he pleased. That he did give it, received of his father, in return for his services, what was a testimony of his being a prince, and made him in some degree stand in the same light of his own countrymen at the temple. How, then, could they avoid that just hatred of him who, to the rest of his barbarity, had added this as one of the most heinous. They have openly and contrived him in the exercise of his authority? Now, the main thing they desired was this, "That they might be delivered from kingcraft and the like forms of government," and might be added to Syria, and be put under the authority of such presidents of theirs as should be sent to them; for that it would thereby be made evident, whether they be really a seditions people, and generally fond of innovations, or whether they would not be governed in a manner that they might have governors of any sort of moderation set over them."

* If any one compare that divine prediction concerning the tyrannical power which Jewish kings would exercise over them, they would be foolish to suppose it to prefer it before their ancient theocracy or aristocracy. 1 Sam. viii. 1-22. Antiq. b. vii. ch. iv. sect. 4, he will meet their superficial understanding in the days of Herod, and that to such a degree that the nation now at last seem sorely to repent of such their ancient choice in opposition to God's better advice for them, and had much rather be subject to even a Pagan Roman government, and their deputies, than to be any longer under the oppression of the family of Herod; which request of theirs Augustus did not one grant them: but did it for the one half of that nation in a few years afterward, upon some complaints by the Jews made against the king, who, under the name of so-called of ethnarch, which Augustus only now show him, soon took upon him the innocence and tyranny of his father king Herod, as the remaining part of it he would inform us, and particularly ch. xii. sect. 2."

"This is not true. See Antiq. b. xiv. ch. ix. sect. 5, and Antiq. b. xiv. ch. xi. sect. 5, and b. xiv. ch. xii. sect. 5, and ch. xiv. sect. 3, and ch. xvi. ch. xiv. sect. 3, and ch. xvi. sect. 5. Since Josephus informs us that Archelaus had only the title of king of Herod, and presently informs us farther, that Archelaus's annual income, after an abatement of one quarter for the present, was 600 talents, we may therefore gather pretty nearly what Archelaus's annual income was. I mean about 1000 talents, which, at the known value of 600 shekels as a talent, and about 2s. 10d. to a shekel, in the days of Josephus, on Antiq. b. vii. ch. xii. sect. 2, amounts to £280,000 sterling per annum: which income, though great in itself, bearing no proportion to his vast expenses everywhere visible in Josephus, and to the vast sums he left behind him in his will, ch. viii, his lifetime, to bring an accusation against him now he is dead. He also attributed the actions of Herod, as some have said, to a disposition of their king, imitating what was done by his countryman Antiochus as king, upon this supposition, that whoever should be set over their kingdom, he would appear more mild to them than Herod had been: and that they had joined with him in the same manner for his father, in order to gratify him, and were ready to oblige him in other points also, if they could meet with any degree of moderation from him: but that he seemed to be afraid lest he should not be deemed Herod's own son, and adopt to himself all the blots about any descendant of that line, and let the nation understand his meaning, and this before his dominion was well established, since the power of disposing of it belonged to Caesar, who could either give it to him or not, as he pleased. That he did give it, received of his father, in return for his services, what was a testimony of his being a prince, and made him in some degree stand in the same light of his own countrymen at the temple. How, then, could they avoid that just hatred of him who, to the rest of his barbarity, had added this as one of the most heinous. They have openly and contrived him in the exercise of his authority? Now, the main thing they desired was this, "That they might be delivered from kingcraft and the like forms of government," and might be added to Syria, and be put under the authority of such presidents of theirs as should be sent to them; for that it would thereby be made evident, whether they be really a seditions people, and generally fond of innovations, or whether they would not be governed in a manner that they might have governors of any sort of moderation set over them."

4. When Caesar had heard these pleadings, he dissoloved the assembly; but a few days afterward he appointed Archelaus, not indeed to be king of the Jews, but, by an absolute grant of authority for one half of that which had been subject to Herod, and promised to give him the royal dignity hereafter, if he governed his part virtuously. But as for the other half, he divided it into two parts, and gave it to other of his friends, to Philip and to Antipas, which Antipas who disputed with Archelaus for the whole kingdom. Now, to him it was that Perea and Galilee paid their tribute, which amounted annually to two hundred talents, which Archelaus and Antipas, as their own share of the tribute, paid to Archelaus, but had now now given the fourth part of that tribute taken off by the order of Caesar, who decreed them that mitigation, because they did not join in this revolt with the rest of the province. The tetrarch of the cities which paid tribute to Archelaus, Strato's Tower, and Sebaste, with Joppa and Jerusalem; for as to Gaza, and Gedara, and Hippos, they were Grecian cities, which Caesar separated from their province, and ordered all those which might in future be added to Syria. Now the tribute-money that came to Archelaus every year from his own dominions, amounted to six hundred talents. 5. And so much came to Herod's sons from the provinces, as they held. But Seleucus, besides what her brother left her by testament, which were Jamnia, and Ashdod, and Piasa, and five hundred thousand [drachma] of coined silver, Caesar made her a present of a royal habita-

sect. 1, and ch. xii. sect. 1, the rest must have arisen either from his condemnation of those great men's estates to the body of the state, the laying up of their estates, the saving of their lives, or from some other heavy methods of oppression which such brave tyrants usually exerted, in order to gratify the jects; or rather from these several methods put together, all which seemed very much too small for his expenses, being drawn from no former nation than that of the Jews, which was very populous, but without the advantage of trade to bring them riches; so that I cannot but strongly suspect that no small part of this his wealth arose from another source: I mean from some vast sums he took out of David's sepulchre, but concealed from the people. See the note on Antiq. b. vi. ch. xx. sect. 3.

Then Philip, on Lysanius, on Luke, ch. vi. ver. 1, here quoted by Dr. HUDSON: "When Josephus says, that some part of the house (or possession,) of Zeodorus, i.e., Athlaius, which was allotted to Pil-pe, he thereby declares that the larger part of it belonged to another; the other was Lysanius, whom Luke mentions, the same who is called by Josephus the prince of the same country called Abilene, from the city Abil, and by others Chalcodai, from the city Chalcodai, when the government of the east was under Antipas, and this after Philip's death, from the time of Abilene, from the time of Lysanius, this country came to be commonly called the Country of Lysanius: and, as far as the death of the former Lysanius, it appears that this Abil was not yet a separate country, it being called again the territorium of Lysanius." However, since Josephus elsewhere, Antiq. ch. vii. sect. 1, clearly distinguishes Abilaius from Chalcodai, Athlaius must here so far mistaken.
tion at Aesclan; in all her revenues amounted to sixty talents by the year, and her dwelling-house was within Archelaus's government.

The rest also of the king's relations received what his testament allotted them. Moreover, Caesar made a present each of his two virgin daughters, besides what their father left them, of two hundred and fifty thousand (drams) of silver, and married them to Phersona's sons; he also granted all that was bequeathed to himself to those sons, and such a sum as he had of the hundred talents, excepting a few of the vessels, which he reserved for himself; and they were acceptable to him, not so much for the great value they were of, as because they were memorials of the king.

CHAP. XII.
Concerning the spurious Alexander.

1. WHERE the affair had been thus settled by Caesar, a certain young man, by birth a Jew, but brought up by a Roman freed-man in the city of Sidon, ingrained himself into the kindred of Herod, by the resemblance of his countenance, with the highest birth also, and the name of Alexander the son of Herod, whom he had slain; and this was an incitement to him to endeavor to obtain the government, so he took him to him, as an assistant, a man of his own country, (one that was an old enemy to the Jews) and the more so, because he had been left in the isle of Crete, for fear of the dangers of the sea, that, in case any accident should come to himself, the posterity of Mariamne might not utterly perish, but that Alexanderus should survive, and punish the treacherous designs against them. And when he persevered in his affirmations, and the author of the imposture agreed in supporting it, Caesar took the young man by himself, and said to him, "If thou wilt not impose upon me, thou shalt have this for thy reward, that thou shalt escape with thy life; tell me, then, who thou art, and who it was that had boldness enough to contrive such a cheat as this; for this contrivance is too considerable a matter of villainy, to be brought by one of thy age." Accordingly, because he had no other way to take, he told Caesar the contrivance, and after what manner, and by whom, it was laid together. So Caesar, upon observing the spurious Alexander, to be a strong active man, and fit to work with his hands, that he might not break his promise to him, put him among those that were to row among the mariners; but he slew him that imposed such a cheat upon the prince, and put him to the same delusion; and not only other people, but also all those that had been great with Herod, or had a kindness for him, joined themselves to this man as to their king. The cause of it was this, that a man were glad of his pretences, which were seconded by the likeness of his countenance, which made those that had been acquainted with Alexander strongly to believe that he was no other but the very same person, which they also confirmed to others; and hence the report went about him that he was coming to Rome, the whole multitude of the Jews, that were there went out to meet him, writing to Drusus to receive him. But Caesar, hearing he was escaped, and being very joyful on account of his mother's family. And when he was come, he was carried in a royal litter through the streets, and all the ornaments and about him were such a king as had delivered Greece, the palace where Archelaus, who had been the wife of his brother Alexander, which Alexander had three children by her, while it was a thing detestable among the Jews, to marry the brother's wife; nor did this Eleazar abide long in the high priest's house, the son of the Sie, being put in his room, while he was still living.

* Spenheim seasonably observes here, that it was forbidden the Jews to marry their brother's wife, when they were supposed in such affairs as were of great concern to him; yet, having some suspicion it might be so, he sent one Celadus, a freed-man of his, and one that had conversed with the young men themselves, and bade him bring Alexander to him into his presence, so he might judge him; but he was more accurate in judging about him than the rest of the multitude. Yet did he not deceive Caesar; for although there was a resemblance between him and Alexander, yet was it not so exact as to impose on such as were unacquainted with Alexander. For this spurious Alexander had his hands rough by the labors he had been put to, and instead of that softness of body which the other had, this as derived from his delicate and generous dispositions, this, if for the contrary reason, had a rugged body. When, therefore, Caesar saw how the master and the scholar agreed in this lying story, and in a bold way of talking, he inquired about Aristobulus, and asked what became of him, who, it seems, was stolen away together with him, and for what reason it was that he did not come along with him, and endeavor to recover that dominion which was due to his family, and in which he himself had been left in the isle of Crete, for fear of the dangers of the sea, that, in case any accident should come to himself, the posterity of Mariamne might not utterly perish, but that Aristobulus should survive, and punish the treacherous designs against them. And when he persevered in his affirmations, and the author of the imposture agreed in supporting it, Caesar took the young man by himself, and said to him, "If thou wilt not impose upon me, thou shalt have this for thy reward, that thou shalt escape with thy life; tell me, then, who thou art, and who it was that had boldness enough to contrive such a cheat as this; for this contrivance is too considerable a matter of villainy, to be brought by one of thy age." Accordingly, because he had no other way to take, he told Caesar the contrivance, and after what manner, and by whom, it was laid together. So Caesar, upon observing the spurious Alexander, to be a strong active man, and fit to work with his hands, that he might not break his promise to him, put him among those that were to row among the mariners; but he slew him that imposed such a cheat upon the prince, and put him to the same delusion; and not only other people, but also all those that had been great with Herod, or had a kindness for him, joined themselves to this man as to their king. The cause of it was this, that a man were glad of his pretences, which were seconded by the likeness of his countenance, which made those that had been acquainted with Alexander strongly to believe that he was no other but the very same person, which they also confirmed to others; and hence the report went about him that he was coming to Rome, the whole multitude of the Jews, that were there went out to meet him, writing to Drusus to receive him. But Caesar, hearing he was escaped, and being very joyful on account of his mother's family. And when he was come, he was carried in a royal litter through the streets, and all the ornaments about him were such a king as had delivered Greece, the palace where Archelaus, who had been the wife of his brother Alexander, which Alexander had three children by her, while it was a thing detestable among the Jews, to marry the brother's wife; nor did this Eleazar abide long in the high priest's house, the son of the Sie, being put in his room, while he was still living.
ANTIOCHIQUITIES OF THE JEWS.

2. But in the tenth year of Archelaus's government, both his brethren and the principal men of Judea, who saw the Romans being used to hear his barbarous and tyrannical usage of them, accused him before Caesar, and that especially because they knew he had broken the commands of Caesar, which obliged him to behave himself with moderation. When Coponius, Caesar, hearing that he was called before him, was very angry, and called for Archelaus's steward, who took care of his affairs at Rome, and whose name was Archelaus also, and thinking it beneath him to write to Archelaus, he bade him sail away as soon as possible, and bring him to Rome: so the man made haste in his voyage, and when he came into Judea he found Archelaus feasting with his friends; so he told him what Caesar had sent him about, and hastened away. And when he was come (to Rome,) Archelaus, upon hearing what certain accusers of his had to say, and what reply he could make, both banished him, and appointed Vienus, a city of Gaul, to be the place of his habitation, and make his money away from him.

3. Now, before Archelaus was gone up to Rome upon this message, he related this dream to his friends, that "he saw ears of corn, in number ten, full of wheat, perfectly ripe, which ears, as he went toward them, were daunted by oxen." And when he was awake and gotten up, because the vision appeared of great importance to him, he sent for the diviners, whose study was especially about dreams. And when some were of one opinion, and another of another, (for all their interpretations did not agree,) Simon, a man of the sect of the Essenes, desired leave to speak his mind freely, and said, "that the vision denoted a change in the affairs of Archelaus, and that not for the better: that oxen, because that animal takes uneasy pains in his labors, denoted afflictions, and indeed denoted further, a change of affairs; because that land which is plowed cannot remain in its former state; and that the ears of corn being tan, determined the like number of years, because an ear of corn grows in one year; and that the time of Archelaus's government was over." And thus did the king, the day after this dream came first to Archelaus, the other Archelaus, that was sent to Judea by Caesar to call him away, came hither also.

4. The like accident befell Glaphyra his wife, who was the daughter of king Archelaus, who also was slain by the Jews; for she saw in her sleep a man with a woman, and a virgin, to Alexander the son of Herod; and brother of Archelaus; but since it fell out so that Alexander was slain by his father, she was married to Juba, the king of Lydia, and when he was dead, she was married to Antiochus, who shared the kingdom with her father, Archelaus divorced his former wife Mariamme, and married her, so great was his affection for this Glaphyra; who, during her marriage to him, saw the following dream. She thought she saw Alexander standing by a tree at which she rejoiced, and embraced him with great affection; but that he complained of her, and said, O Glaphyra! thou provest that saying to be true, which assures us that women are to be trusted. Didst thou not pledge thy faith to me? and wast thou not married to me when thou wast a virgin? and had we not children between us? Yet hast thou forgotten the affection I bore to thee, out of the desire of a second husband. Nor henceforth, that had I been satisfied with that injury thou didst me, but thou hast been so bold as to procure thee a third husband to lie by thee, and in an indecent and improvident manner hast entered into my house, and hast been married to Archelaus thy husband, and my brother. However, I will not forget thy former kind affection for me, but will set thee free from every such reproachful action, and cause thee to be mine again, as before. Then when she had related this to her female companions, in a few days time she departed this life.

5. Now, I do not think these histories improper for the present discourse, both because my discourse now proceeds over the Jews. Moreover, I am also on account of the advantage hence to be drawn, as well as for the confirmation of the immortality of the soul, as the providence of God over human affairs, I thought them fit to be added. And then, if any one does not believe such relations, let him indeed enjoy his own opinions but let him not hinder another, that would thereby encourage himself in virtue. So Archelaus's country was laid to the province of Syria; and Cyrenius, one that had been tribune of the people by Caesar to take account of the people's effects in Syria, and to sell the house of Archelaus.

BOOK XVIII.
CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF THIRTY-TWO YEARS.—FROM THE BANISHMENT OF ARCHELAUS TO THE DEPARTURE OF THE JEWS FROM BABYLON.

CHAP. I.

How Cyrenius was sent by Caesar to make a Tactation of Syria and Judea; and how Coponius was sent to be Procurator of Judea: concerning Judea, Galilea, and Gilead; and concerning the Sects that were among the Jews.

1. Now Cyrenius, a Roman senator, and one who had gone through other magistracies, and had passed through them till he had been consul, and one who, on other accounts, was of great dignity, came at this time to Syria, with a commission either sent by Caesar to be a judge of that nation, and to take an account of their substance: Coponius also, a man of the equestrian order, was sent together with him, to have the supreme power over the Jews. Moreover, Cyrenius came himself into Judea, which was now added to the province of Syria, to take an account of their substance, and to dispose of Archelaus's country, although at the beginning they took the report of a tactation heinously, yet did they leave off any further opposition to it, by the persuasion of Joazar, who was the son of Boethus, and high priest; so they showed himself, but after this, gave an account of their estates without any dispute about it. Yet was there one Judas, a Gaulonite, as he has signified in the books that go before these, as if he had still called him a Gaulonite in those Antiquities before, as well as in that particular place, as Dees Adrich observes, On the War, b. ii. ch. vii. sect. i. Nor can any one imagine why he should here call him a Gaulonite, when in the 6th section following here, as well as twice Of The War, he still calls him a Gaulonite. At the same time, as he has signified, where Joshua was deof a city whose name was Gamala, who taking with him Saddouk, a Pharisee, became zealous to draw them to a revolt, who both said, that this taxation was no better than an introduction to slavery, and exhorted the nation to assert their liberty of philosophy they could, and at the same time, thus upon their joining with one another in such counsels as might be successful, and for their own advantage; and this especially, if they would set about great exploits, and not grow more and more by dissensions. For, besides that they said with pleasure, and this bold attempt proceeded to a great height. All sorts of misfortunes also sprang from these men, and the nation was infected with this doctrine to an incredible degree: one violent war came upon them after another, and we lost our friends who used to alleviate our pains; there were also very great robberies and murders of our principal men. This was done in pretense indeed for the public welfare, but the results were very contrary, for, as they gave of gain to themselves: whence arose seditions, and from them murders of men, which sometimes fell on those of their own people, (by the madness of these men) sometimes on those of another; and their desire was that none of the adverse party might be left, and sometimes on their enemies; a famine also coming upon us, reduced us to the last degree of despair, as did also the taking and despoiling of all things abroad. And the sacrifices increased so high, that the very temple of God was burnt down by their enemies' fire. Such were the consequences of this, that the customs of our fathers were altered, and such a change was made in us, that the things which used to bring all to destruction, these men occasioned by their thus conspiring together; for Judas and Saddouk, who excited a fourth philosophic sect among us, and had a great many followers besides, and were at war with tumults at present, and laid the foundations of our future miseries by this system of philosophy, which we were before unacquainted withal, concerning which we will discourse a little, and then we will return to the sect of the Essenes, and to the sect of the Sadducees, and the third sort of opinions was that of those called Pharisees; of which sect, although I have already spoken in the second book of the Jewish war, yet will I a little touch upon them now.

3. Now, for the Pharisees, they live meanly, and despise delicacies in diet, and they follow the conduct of reason; and what that prescribes to them as good for them, they do; and they ought earnestly to strive to observe reason's dictates for practice. They also pay a respect to such as are in years; nor are they so bold as to contradict them in any thing which they have introduced; and when they determine that all things are done by fate, they do not take away the freedom of men from acting as they think fit; since their notion is, that it hath pleased God to make a temperament, whereby what he wills is done, but so that the will of man can set virtually or viciously. They also believe, that souls have an eternal reward or recompense, and that under the earth there will be rewards or punishments, according as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life; and the latter are to be determined in an everlasting prison, but that the former shall have power to reward or punish, on account of which doctrines, they are able greatly to persuade the body of the people, and whatsoever they do about divine worship, prayers, and sacrifices, they perform them according to their direction; in some cities they make great attestations to them on account of their entire virtuous conduct, both in the actions of their lives, and their discourses also.

4. But the doctrine of the Sadducees is this, that souls die with the body, and that there is no resurrection of the body, and that all rewards of righteousness are to be earnestly striven for; and when they send what they have dedicated to God into the temple, they do not offer sacrifices, because they have more pure instructions of their own; they are excluded from the common court of the temple, but offer their sacrifices themselves; yet is their course of life better than that of other men; and they entirely addict themselves to husbandry. It also deserves to be noticed, how much they exceed all other men that addict themselves to virtue, and this in righteousness: and indeed to such a degree, that as it hath never appeared among any other men, neither Greeks nor barbarians, so, not for a short time, yet for a long while among them. This is demonstrated by that institution of theirs, which will not suffer any thing to hinder them from having all things in common, no more of his own wealth than he who hath nothing at all. There are about four thousand men that live in this way; and neither marry wives, nor are desirous to keep servants; as thinking the latter tempts men to be unjust, and the former gives the handle to domestic quarrels, but as they live by themselves, they minister one to another. They also appoint certain stewards to receive the incomes of their revenues, and of the fruits of the ground, such are godlike, and priests who are to get their corn and their food ready for them. They none of them differ from others of the Essenes in their way of living, but do the most reasonable those Dece, who are called Polisists.[dwellers in cities.]

* It seems not very improbable to me, that this Saddouk, the Pharisee, was the same man of whom the Rabbins speak, the son of the impostor or imposters of the impiety or infidelity of the Sadducees; nor perhaps had the men this name of Saddouk till this very time, nor is this a distinct sect of the Pharisees. See the note on xiii. ch. 2. sect. 5. and Dea Pri- dencius, as there quoted; nor, do we, that I know of, find the least footstep of such impiety or infidelity of these men before this time, the Rabbins not assuring us that they began about the days of John the Baptist, a. 1. ch. lv.

† See the preceding note.

‡ It seems by what Josephus says here, and Philo himself elsewhere, Op. p. 678, that these Essenes did not use to go up to the Jewish festivals at Jerusalem, or to offer sacrifices there, which may be one great reason why they say they do not worship God in the places of the books of the New Testament; though in the Apostolical Constitutions they are mentioned as those that observe the customs of the Essenes, and others mention no such ill character laid upon them as is laid upon the other sects among that people. [Who these were is Josephus, or K'vono in Strabo, among the Pseudepigrapha Dece, who is not unlikely to be determined. Scaliger offers no improbable conjecture, that some of these Dece lived alone like monks, in tents or caves; but that those of them together, the so-called built cities, and thence were called by such a name as implied the same.}
6. But of the fourth sect of Jewish philosophy, Judas the Galilean was the author. These men agree in all other things with the Pharisaic, but; but they have an inviolable attachment to liberty, and say, that God is to be their only Ruler and Lord. They also do not value dying, any kind of death, nor indeed do they heed the deaths of their relations and friends, nor can any sort of fear make them say man lord. And since this immovable resolution of theirs is well known to a great many, I shall speak no farther about that matter; nor am I afraid that any thing I have said of them should be disbelieved, but rather fear that what I have said is beneath their resolution they show when they undergo this distresser, who was our procurator, and who occasioned the Jews to be grieved with it by the badness of his authority, and to make them revolt from the Romans. And these are the sects of Jewish philosophy.

CHAP. II.

How Herod and Philip built several cities in Honor of Caesar. Concerning the Succession of the Priests and Procurators: also what befell Phraates and the Parthians.

1. When Cyrenius had now disposed of Archelaus’s money, and when the taxings were come to a conclusion, which were made in the thirty-seventh of Caesar’s victory over Antony at Actium, he deprived Joascer of the high priesthood, which dignity had been conferred on him by the multitude, and he appointed Ananus, the son of Seth, to be high priest; while Herod and Philip had each of them received their own titulacies. The office of the high priest being thereby, he had also built a wall about Sepphoris, (which is the security of all Galilee,) and made it the metropolis of the country. He also built a wall round Bethanamphitha, which was itself a city also, and called it the name of the emperor’s wife. When Philip also had built Panecas, a city at the fountains of Jordan, he named it Caesarea. He also advanced the village Bethsajda, situate at the lake of Gennesareth, up to the dignity of a city, both by the number of inhabitants it contained, and its other greatness, and called it by the name of Julius, the same name with Caesar’s daughter.

2. AndCoponius, who we told you was sent along with Cyrenius, was exercising his office of procurator, and governing Judea, the following accidents happened. As the Jews were celebrating the feast of unleavened bread, which we call the Passover, the customs of the law priests the open the temple gates just after midnight. When, therefore, those gates were first opened, some of the Samaritans came privately into Jerusalem, and threw about the dead men’s bodies in the sanctuaries; on which account the Jews afterwards excluded them out of the temple, which they had not used to do at such festivals; and on other accounts also they watched the temple more carefully than they had formerly done. A little after the next day, Cononius, the procurator, with Marcus Ambivius came to be his successor in that government; under whom Salome, the sister of king Herod, died, and left to Julia (Caesar’s daughter,) James, Salome’s son, as her heir, and Phasaelis in the plain, and Archelaus, where is a great plantation of palm-trees, and their fruit is excellent in its kind. After him came Ananus Rufus, under whom died Cesar, the second emperor, in the fourtenth year of his reign, whose reign was fifty-seven years, besides six months and two days, (of which time Antonius ruled together with him fourteen years; but the duration of his life was seventy-seven years;) upon whose death Judas Cale, sole attachment to liberty, said, that God is to be our only Ruler and Lord. He also said, that he had, in a little time, and ordained Eleazar, the son of Ananus, who had been high priest before, to be high priest; which office, when he had held it for a year, Gratus delivered and gave him, and gave the high priestly title to Sisin, the son of Canithus, and when he had possessed that dignity no longer than a year, Joseph Caiphas was made his successor. When Gratus had done these things, he went back to Rome, after he had, in his last days, made some care, when Postius Pilate came as his successor.

3. And now Herod the tetrarch, who was in great favor with Tiberias, built a city of the above name with him, and called it Tiberias. He built it in the best part of Galilee, by the lake of Gennesareth. There are warm baths at a little distance from it, in a village named Emamus. Strangers came, and inhabited this city. A great number of the inhabitants of the inhabitants of the city were dispossessed, and were also; and many were necessitated by Herod to come thither from out of the country belonging to them, and were by force compelled to be its inhabitants; some of them were persons of condition, and others were such as those that were collected from all parts, to dwell in it. Nay, some of them were not quite freemen, and these he was a benefactor to, and made them free in great numbers; but obliged them to serve him, and to live by his Laws. And he enriched good houses at his own expense, and by giving them land also; for he was sensible, that to make this place a habitation was to transgress the ancient Jewish laws, because many sepulchres were made there; but Solomon was of another mind, and built there the church of the city Tiberias; whereas our laws pronounce that such inhabitants are unclean for seven days.

4. About this time died Phraates, the king of the Parthians, by the treachery of Phraatas, his son, upon the occasion following. When Phraates had had legitimate sons of his own, he had also an Italian maid-servant, whose name was Themis, who had been formerly sent to Cesar, among other things, to learn of her; and she first made her his concubine, but, being a great admirer of her beauty, in process of time having a son by her, whose name was Phraatas, he made her his legitimate wife, and had a son by her, and a daughter, who was the mother of two of his legitimate sons; and he was able to persuade him to do any thing that she said, and was earnest in procuring the government of Parthia for her son; but still she saw that her endeavors would not succeed, unless she could contrive how he might be to obtain the crown of the kingdom; so she persuaded him to send those his sons as pledges of his fidelity to Rome; and they were sent to Rome accordingly, because it was not easy for him to contradict her commands. But when he sent these persons, she was so confident in order to succeed in the government, he thought it very tedious to expect that government by his father’s donation [as his successor:] he therefore gave the two, the design against his father, by his mother’s assistance, with which, when the raport went, he had criminal conversation also. So he was hated for both these vices, with his subjects esteemed this [wicked] love of his mother to be nobler in his heart, than it was in his mouth, and he was by them, in a sedition, expelled of the in Syria, while Artabanus gave Armenia to Orodes, one of his own sons.

5. At this time died Antiochus, the king of Commagene; whereinupon the multitude contended with the nobility, and both sent ambassadors to Rome: for the men of power were desirous that he should be changed into that of a Roman province; as were the multitude desirous to be under kings, as their fathers had been. So the senate made a decree, that Germanicus should be sent to settle the affairs of the state, furnishing him with all opportunity for depriving him of his life; for when he had been in the east, and settled all affairs there, his life was taken away by the poison which Piso gave him, as hath been related elsewhere.

CHAP. III.

A Setition of the Jews against Pontius Pilate, Concerning Christ, and what befell Pauline and the Jews at Rome.

† 1. But now Pilate, the procurator of Judea, removed the army from Cesarea to Jerusalem, to take their winter quarters there, in order to abate the severity of the season. So passed one day, when, in company with all the effigies, which were upon the ensigns, and brought them into the city; whereas our law forbids us the very making of images; on which account the former procurators were wont to make their entry into the city, with the ensigns, both without and not those ornaments. Pilate was the first who brought those images to Jerusalem, and set them up there; which was done without the knowledge of the people, because it was done in the night time; but as soon as they knew it, they came in multitudes to Cesarea, and interceded with Pilate many days that he would remove the images; and when he would not grant their request, because it would tend to the injury of Caesar, while yet he knew very well that the people of Judæa had, on the sixth day he ordered his soldiers to have their weapons privately, while he came and sat upon his judgment-seat, which place was so prepared in the open place of the city, that it concealed the army that lay ready to oppress them; and when the Jews petitioned him again, he gave a signal to the soldiers to encompass them round, and threatened that their punishments should be more severe than ever, and that no less than immediate death should be their sentence, if they did not leave off disturbing him and go their ways home. But they threw themselves upon the ground, and laid their necks bare, and said they would take their death very willingly rather than the wisest and best of the Jews should be reneged over the Parthians. But when the Jews saw that Armenia, and as soon as he came thither, he had an inclination to give the government of the country given him, and sent ambassadors to Rome [for that purpose. But because Titius refused it him, and because he wanted courage, and because the Parthian king threatened him, and sent ambassadors to him to denounce war against him if he proceeded, and because he had no way to take it, and he was aware of the great authority among the Armenians about Niphates joined themselves to Artabanas, he delivered up himself to Silanus, the president of Syria, who, out of regard to his education at Rome, kept him

of. But since our gospel teaches us, Luke xii. 6, 7, that when Pilate heard of Galilee, he asked whether Jesus was a Galilean, and as a matter of course, not interrogated by Herod’s jurisdiction, he sent him to Herod. And ver. 12. The same day Pilate and Herod were made friends together, for they had been at enmity by the design of the people to get together and made a clamor against him, and insisted that he should leave off that design. Some of them also used reproaches, and abused the man, as crowds of such people ANTIQUITIES OF THE JEWS.

She was very much given to the worship of the goddess Isis, she devised the following stratagem: She went to one of the young men, and by means of the strongest assurances of concealment, she persuaded them by words, but chiefly by the offer of money, of twenty-five thousand drachmae in hand, and as much more when the thing had taken effect, and told them the passion of the young man, and persuaded them to use all means possible to beguile the woman. So they were drawn in to promises so to do, by that large sum of gold they were to have. Accordingly, she was taking effect, and about half the night she was in the temple, and, upon his admissation, he desired to speak with her, by herself. When that was granted him, he told her that "he was sent by the god Isis, Anubis, Belial, and the other sins, who had fallen in love with her, to rejoin her to come to him." Upon this she took the message very kindly, and valued herself greatly upon this condescension of Anubis, and told her husband, that she had a message sent her, who was in the temple all the night long, and supposed the same. So he desired her to answer his answer, and he came away, which was before those priests who knew nothing of this stratagem were stirring. Paulina came early to her husband, and told him how the god Anubis had appeared to her: among her friends, and the more she talked the more she did not put upon this favor, who partly disbelieved the thing, when they reflected on its nature, and partly were amazed at it, as having no pretense for not believing it, when they considered the most solemn duty of the person. But now, on the third day after what had been done, Mundus met Paulina, and said, "Nay, Paulina, thou hast saved me 260,000 drachmae, which sum thou mig and shave adopted, and the family, so thou hast not failed to be at my service in the manner I invited thee. As for the reproaches thou hast laid upon Mundus, I value not the business of names; but I rejoice in the pleasure I received, and I did not believe that thou couldst take the name of Anubis." When he had said this, he went his way. But now she began to come to the sense of the grossness of what she had done, and rent her garments, and told her husband of the horrid nature of her intercourse, and that he be not to neglect to assist her in this case. So he discovered the fact to the emperor, whereupon Tiberius inquired into the matter thoroughly, by examining the priests about it, and ordered them to be crucified, as well as Ide, who was the occasion of their perdition, and who had contrived the whole matter, which was so injurious to the woman. He also demolished the temple of Isis, and gave order that her statue should be thrown into the sea. And when Mundus was put to death, but did no more to him, because he supposed that what crime he had committed was done out of the passion of love. And these were the circumstances which concerned the case of Isis, and the injuries occasioned by her priests. I now return to the relation of what happened about this time to the Jews at Rome. As I formerly told you I would. The next was a woman who was a Jew, but has been driven away from his own country by an accusation laid against him for transgressing their laws, and by the fear he was under of punishment for the same; but in all respects a wicked man. He, then living at Rome, proceeded to instruct men in the wisdom of the law of Moses. He procured also three other men en-

BOOK XVIII.—CHAP. IV.

Of the massacre of 4,000 Jews into Sardisiana by Titubius, see Buxtonius in Tiber. sect. 36. But as for Mr. Reid's note here, which supposes that Jews could not, consistently with their laws, be sold, it is contradicted by one branch of the history before us, and contrary to innumerable instances of their fighting, and provincial subjection. This was the golden opportunity of the best of them, and even under heathen kings themselves, did so, those men who, before they were sold and others of them, let them live according to their own laws, as Alexander the Great and the Ptolemies of Egypt did. It is true, this was the occasion of the massacre of 4,000 Jews, as they got excited as well as they could, or sometimes absolutely refused to fight, which seems to have been the case here, as to the major part of the Jews now in the holy city, and the synagogues of the Gentiles were entirely cleared in their favor, as to such matters, b. viii. ch. x.

Since Moses never came himself beyond Jordan, nor particularly to Mount Gerizim, and since these Ee should proceed farther, and told him he should no otherwise trust him than upon his giving him hostages, and especially his son Artabasus. Upon the King of Tyre Vittellius sent the son of Artaba-sus, by the order of great presents of money, he persuaded both the king of Iberia, and the king of Albania, to make no delay, but to fight against Artabasus; and although they would not do it themselves, yet did they send the Scythians through their country, and opened the Caspian gates to them, and brought them upon Artabasus. So Armenia was again taken from the Parthians, and the country of Parthia was filled with war, and the province was very much in a state of confusion, and all the things in disorder among them: the king's son also himself fell in these wars, together with many in the army of his. Vittellius had also sent such a great sum of gold to Artabasus's father's kinmen and friends; that he had almost procured him to be slain by the means of those tribes which they had taken. And when Artabasus perceived that the plot laid against his son was not to be avoided, he was laid by the principal men, and those a great many in number, and that it would certainly take effect; when he had estimated the number of those that were truly faithful to him, as also of those who were not, he sent for them, and they were full in the kindness they professed to him, and were likely, upon trial, to go over to his enemies, he made his escape to the upper provinces, where he afterward raised a great army out of the Dabe and Sate, and fought with his enemies, and retained his principality.

5. When Tiberius had heard of these things, he desired to have a league of friendship made before with Artabasus; and when, upon this invitation, he received the proposal kindly, Artabasus and Vittellius went to Euphrates, and as a bridge was laid over the river, they each of them came with their guards about them, and made the midst of the mid of the bridge. And when they had agreed upon the terms of peace, Herod the tetrarch erected a rich tent in the midst of the passage, and made them a feast there.
Artabasus also, not long afterward, sent his son Dorus as a hostage, with many presents, among which there was a man seven cubits tall,
A Jew he was by birth, and his name was Eleazar, who, for his tallness, was called a giant.
Artabasus sent to Antioch, and to Artaba-sus to Babylon; but Herod (the tetrarch) was desirous to give Caesar the first information that they had obtained hostages, sent posts with letters, wherein he had accurately described all the parts of the city, and had sent nothing for the consolation of Vittellius to inform him of. But when Vittellius's letters were sent, and Caesar had let him know that he was acquainted with the affairs already, because Herod had given him an account of them before, Vittellius was very much troubled at it; and supposing that he had been thereby a greater sufferer than he really was, he kept up a secret anger upon this occasion, till he could be re-vented on him, which was after Caisar had taken him, and imprisoned him.

6. About this time it was that Philip, Herod's brother, departed this life, in the twentieth year of the reign of Tiberius, after he had been tetrarch of Trachonitis, and Gaulonitis. and of the nation of the Bataeans also, thirty-seven years.
He had showed himself a person of moderation and quietness in the conduct of his life and go-mend, and this in the age that was subject to him; he used to make his progress with a few chosen friends; his tribunal also, on which he sat in judgment, followed him in his progress; and when any one met him who had not seen him for a long time, he received him his tribunal set down immediately, wheresoever he happened to be, and sat down upon it, and heard his complaint: he ther ordered the guilty that were convicted to be punished, and absolved the innocent; and he treated an enemy unkindly.
He died at Julius; and when he was carried to that memment which he had already erected for himself beforehand, he was buried with great pomp. His grave was not left to the ground, but it was hidden, and added it to the province of Syria, but gave order that the tributes which arose from it should be collected, and laid up in his tetrarchy.

CHAP. V.

Herod, the Tetrarch, makes War with Aretas, the King of Arabia, and sends to Rome for aid; and also consults the Death of John the Baptist; Vittellius went up to Jerusalem; together with some Account of Agrippa, and of the Posteriority of Herod the Great.

1. About this time Aretas, the king of Arabia Petros, and Herod, had a quarrel on the solicits of the family; and Herod, the tetrarch, married the daughter of Aretas, and had lived with her a great while; but when he was odic at Rome, he lodged with Herod, who was his brother's son-in-law, and the two were friendly; for this Herod was the son of the high priest Simon's daughter. However, he fell in love with Herodias, this last Herod's wife, who was the daughter of Aristobulus, their brother, and the potential of Aristobulus; and he had an opportunity to talk to her about a marriage between them, which address when she admitted, an agreement was made for her to change her habitation, and come to him as soon as he should return from Rome; one article of this marriage also was this,
that he should divorce Aretas's daughter.
So Antipas, when he had made this agreement, sailed to Rome; but when he had done there the business he went about, and was returned again, he married Aretas's daughter. After he had made with Herodias, and having learned it before he had notice of her knowledge of the whole design, she desired him to send to her to meet both the armies, and to carry a letter from himself to Aretas; and then to restore the success of Antipas, and the son of Aretas to the dominions of Aretas and Herod, without informing him of any of her intentions. Accordingly Herod sent therewith, as thinking her husband had not perceived any thing. Now, she had sent a good while before to Macheraus, who was subject to her father, and so all things necessary for her journey were made ready for her by the general of Aretas's army; and by that means she soon came into Arabia, under the conduct of the several men that carried her, she and her maidens, one after another successively, and she soon came to her father, and told him of Herod's intentions. So Aretas made this the first occasion of his enmity between him and Herod. who had also some

*The calculation from all Josephus's Greek copies is exactly right; for since Herod died about September, in the thirty-seventh year of Tiberius, and Tiberius, the forty-fourth year of Augustus, and Tiberius, the thirty-seventh year of Julius, began, as is well known, August 18. A. D. 14, it is ev-dent that the 37th year of Philip, reckoned from his fathroned, was the 50th of Tiberius, or near the end of A. D. 33, (the very year of our Saviour's death also, or, however, in the beginning of the next year, A. D. 34,) may be supposed, the time that the inscription best of all the posterity of Herod, for his love of peace, and his love of justice.

† This Herod seems to have had the additional name of Philip, as Antipas was named Herod Antipas, and as Antipas and Antipater seem to be in a manner the very same name, yet were the names of two sons of Herod, and Antipas seems to have been the eldest,

and perhaps the eldest son of Philip, and the younger son of Herod; and Antipater, the son of Herod, and Philip be two different sons of the same father, all which Grotius o. serves on Matt. xiv. 3. Nor was it, as he is supposed, by the name of his brother, Philip,
the tetrarch, but this Herod-Philip, whose wife Herod-the tetrarch had married, and that in her first martriage, as appears from the account given of her by her: for which adulterous and incestuous marriage, John the Baptist justly reproved Herod the tetrarch and for which reproof Solomon, the daughter of Herodias, by her first husband Herod-Philip, who was still alive, occasioned him to be unjustly beheaded.
squarrel with him about their limits at the country of Gamalitis. So they raised armies on both sides, and prepared for war, and sent their generals to fight instead of themselves; and when they had joined battle, all Herod's art, which was destroyed by the treachery of some fugitives, who, though they were of the tetrarchy of Philip, joined with Aretas's army. So Herod wrote about these affairs to Tiberius, who, being very angry at that, sent him a message, who commanded to make war upon him, and either to take him alive, and bring him to him in bonds, or to kill him, and send him his head. This was the charge that Tiberius gave to the president of Syria. He then had to mind that for the destruction of Herod's army came from God, and that very justly, as a punishment of what he did against John, that was called the Baptist, for Herod slew him, who was a good man, and commanded the Jews to turn from their sins only, but for the purification of the body, supposing still that the soul was thoroughly purified beforehand by righteousness. Now, when many others had been moved for the same reason, for they were greatly moved (or pleased) by hearing his words, Herod, who feared lest the great influence John had over the people might put it into his power and inclination to raise rebellion, (for they seemed to do things that should advise,) thought it best, by putting him to death, to prevent any mischief he might cause, and not bring himself into difficulties, by sparing a man who might make him repent of it when it should be too late. So he was beheaded, out of Herod's suspicious temper, to Macherus, the castle I before mentioned, and was there put to death. Now, the Jews had an opinion that the destruction of this army was sent as a punishment, in their land, and a mark of God's displeasure against them.

3. So Vitellius prepared to make war with Aretas, having with him two legions of armed men: he also took with him all those of light armature, and cavalry. He raised Aretas, and were drawn out of those kingdoms which were under the Romans, and made haste for Petra, and came to Ptolemis. But as he was marching very busily, and leading his army through the valley of the Jordan, and desired that he would not thus march through their land; for that the laws of their country would not permit them to overlook those images which were brought into it; of which there were a great number in their country, he was persuaded by what they said, and changed that resolution of his, which he had before taken in this matter. Whereupon he ordered the army to march along the great plain, while he himself, with Herod the tetrarch, and his friends, went up to Jerusalem to offer sacrifices to God, an ancient festival of the Jews then just approaching; and when he had been there, and been honorably entertained by the multitude of the Jews, he made a stay there for three days, within which time he deprived Jonathan of the high priesthood, and gave it to his brother Theophilus. But when on the fourth day letters came to him, which declared that Herodias, the third brother of Aretas, had obliged the multitude to take an oath of fidelity to Aretas; he also recalled his army, and made them every one go home, and take their winter-quarters there, since upon the devolution of the empire upon Aretas, he had not the like in authority of making this war which he had before. It was also reported, that when Aretas heard of the coming of Vitellius to fight him, he said, upon his consulting the diviners, that it was impossible that this army of Vitellius could enter Petra; for that one of the rulers would die, either he that gave orders for the war, or he that was marching at the other's desire, in order to be subservient to his will, or else he against whom this army is opposed. So Vitellius went to Antioch; but Agrippa, the son of Aristobulus, went up to Rome, a year before the death of Tiberius, in order to treat of some affairs with the emperor, if he might be permitted so to do. He now had to mind that the wife of his family, how it fared with them, partly because it is suitable to this history to speak of that matter, and partly because this thing is a demonstration of the interposition of Providence, how a multitude of children to Ananias, Jezeb, no more than any other strength that mankind set their hearts upon, besides those acts of piety which are done towards God: for it happened, that within the revolution of a hundred years, the number of the children of Agrippa, who came at one time, were excepting a few, utterly destroyed. One may well apply this for the instruction of mankind, and learn thence how unhappy they show it; it will be the concern of Agrippa, who, as he was a person most worthy of consideration, so was he from a private man, beyond all the expectation of those that knew him, advanced to great power and authority. I have said something of these formerly, but I shall now also speak accurately about them.

4. Herod the Great had two daughters by Mariamme, the (grand) daughter of Hyrcanus; the one was Salamisio who was married to Phasaelus, her first cousin, the son of Aristobulus, Herod's brother; the other was Cyrus, who was himself married also to her first cousin Antipater, the son of Salome, Herod's sister. Phasaelus had five children by his first wife Antipater, Herod and Alexander, and two daughters, Alexandra and Cypros, which last, Agrippa the son of Aristobulus, married, and Titinius of Cyrus married Alexandra: he was a man of note, but had by another marriage three more children, two sons and three daughters, which children were named Bernice, Mariamme, and Drusilla; but the names of the sons were Agrippa and Drusus, of whom Drusus died before the time of puberty; but their father, Agrippa, was brought up with his other brethren, Herod and Aristobulus, for these were also the sons of Herod the Great, by Bernice; but Bernice was the daughter of Costobarius and of Salome, who was Herod's sister. Aristobulus left these infants, when he was slain by his father, together with his brother Alexander, as we have already related. But when they were arrived at years of puberty, this Herod, the brother of Agrippa, married Mariamme, the daughter of Olympias, who was the daughter of Herod the king, and of Joseph, the son of Joseph, who was brother to Herod the king, and had by her a son, Aristobulus; but Agrippa, the third brother of Aretas, married Jotape, the daughter of Sampsigeramus, king of Emeas; they had a daughter who was dead, whose name also was Jotape: and these hitherto were the children of the male line. But when Herodias, the third sister of Philip, [Phil,] the son of Herod the Great, who was born of Mariamme, the daughter of Simeon the high priest, who had a daughter, Salome; after whose birth Herodias took upon her to confound the laws of this country, and divorced her family, her own nephews and nieces, well deserve to be considered. See Lev. xviii. 6, 7. xzii. 10, and Noldius, De Herod. No. 369, 370. There are coins still extant of this Emeas, as Spanheim informs us.
from her husband while he was alive, and was married to Herod [Antipas,] her husband's brother by the father's side; he was tetarch of Galilee: but her daughter Salome was married to Philip, the son of Eleazar, and a member of the house of Tryphon, and, as she died childless, Aristobulus, the son of Herod, the brother of Agrippa, married her; they had three sons, Herod, Agrippa, and Aristobulus; and this was the post mortem of Philip, the last of that line of kings of the Jews, as the voice of prophecy foretold, and Herod tetrarch, and let her know Agrippa's present design, and what necessity it was which drove him thereto, and desired her, as a kinswoman of his, to give him her help, and to engage her husband in support of his views. But the daughter of Antipater by Cypros, was Cypros, whom Alexander Semius, the son of Alexis, married; they had a daughter, Cypros; but Herod and Alexander, who, as we told you, were the brothers of Antipater, afterwards married to the daughters of Herod the king, who was slain by his father, he had two sons, Alexander and Tigranes, by the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia; Tigranes, who was king of Armenia, was accuses at Rome, and died childless; Alexander had a son of the same name with his brother Tigranes, and was sent to take possession of the kingdom of Armenia by Nero; he had a son, Alexander, who married Base, the daughter of Antigonus, the son of COMMANDER; Vesuvius made him king of an island in Cilicia. But these descendants of Alexander, soon after their birth, deserted the Jewish religion, and went over to that of the Greeks; and the rest of the daughters of Herod the king, it happened that they died childless. And as the descendants of Herod, whom we have enumerated, were in being at the same time that Agrippa the Great took the kingdom, and I have not told you of them; now remains what I relate the several hard fortunes which befall Agrippa, and how he got clear of them, and was advanced to the greatest height of dignity and power.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Navigation of King Agrippa to Rome, to Tibérius Caesar, and how, upon his being accused by his own freed-man, he was bound; how also he was set at liberty by Caion, after Tiberius's Death, and was made King of the Tetrarchy of Philip.

1. A little before the death of Herod the king, Agrippa lived at Rome, and was greatly broken up and conversed with Drusus, the emperor Tiberius's son, and contracted a friendship with Antonia, the wife of Drusus the Great, who had his mother Bernice in great esteem, and was very desirous that she should know her son. Now, as Agrippa was by nature magnanimous and generous in the presents he made, while his mother was alive, this inclination of his mind did not appear, that he might be able to avoid her anger for such extravagance; but when Bernice was dead, and he was left to his own conduct, he spent a great deal extravagantly in his daily way of living, and a great deal in the inordinate presents he made, and those chiefly among Caesar's freed-men, in order to gain the favour of the son of Tiberius; which was so much that he was in a little time reduced to poverty, and could not live at Rome any longer. Tiberius also forbade the friends of his deceased son to call his sight, because on seeing them he would be reminded of his son, and his grief would thereby be revived.

2. For these reasons he went away from Rome, and sailed to Judas, but in evil circumstances, being without the use of the money which he once had, and because he had not where withal to pay his creditors, who were many in number, and such as gave him no room for escaping them. Whereupon he knew not what to do; so, for shame of his present condition, he retired to a certain tower, at Malatha, in Idumea.

*Spanheim also informs us of a coin still extant of the Togate, daughter of the king of Commagene.
†Spanheim observes, that we have here an instance and had thoughts of killing himself, but his wife Cypros perceived his intending, and tried all sorts of methods to divert him from taking such a course: so she sent a letter to his sister Herod, the queen of Judaea, and described these her husband's troubles all she could, although she had not the like wealth to do it withal. So they sent for him, and allotted him Tiberias for his habitation, and appointed him governor of Syria, having caused the money which he had made him a magistrate of that city, by way of honor to him. Yet did not Herod long continue in that resolution of supporting him, though even that support was not sufficient for him; for, as promised him a great deal of money, and he was given cups, and reproaches were cast upon one another, Agrippa thought that was not to be borne. While Herod hit him in the teeth with his poverty, and made him a public disgrace, and gave him the freedom of Syrac, one of the tetrarchesses, and had been a very great friend to him at Rome formerly, and was now president of Syria.

3. Hereupon Flaccus received him kindly, and he ministered to him as much as he could. But there Aristobulus, who was indeed Agrippa's brother, but was at variance with him; yet did not their enmity to one another hinder the friendship of Flaccus to them both, but still they were hospitably entertained by him. And Aristobulus did not abate of his ill-will to Agrippa, till at length he brought him into ill terms with Flaccus: the occasion of bringing on which estrangement was this: the Damascenses were at dispute about the succession of the province, and when Flaccus was about to bear the cause between them, they understood that Agrippa had a mighty influence on him; so they desired that he would be of their side, and for that favor promised him at a great deal of money, and was jealous in assisting the Damascenses as far as he was able. Now, Aristobulus had gotten intelligence of this promise of money to him, and seized upon it, and to this event of the same; and when, upon a thorough examination of the matter, it appeared plainly so to be, he rejected Agrippa out of the number of his friends. So he was reduced to the utmost necessity, and came to Ptolemy, king of Egypt, to consult him how to get a livelihood, he thought to sail to Italy; but as he was restrained from so doing by want of money, he desired Marys, who was his freedman, to find some method for procuring him so much as he wanted for that purpose, by borrow ing such a sum of some person or other. So Marys desired of Pater, who was the freed-man of Bernice, Agrippa's mother, and by the right of her testament was bequeathed to Antonia, to lend him as much as the Agrippa's own bond and security; but he accused Agrippa of having defrauded him of certain sums of money, and was obliged Marys, when he made the bond of 20,000 Attic drachmes, to accept of 2,500 drachmes for the bond, and was allowed of, because he could not help it. Upon the receipt of this money Agrippa came to An thelon, and took shipping, and was going to set sail; but he had a mind to ask of Tiberius a permission to go to Syria, and Tiberius, when he sent curator of Judæa, sent a band of soldiers to demand of him 300,000 drachmes of silver, which were by him owing to Cæsar's treasury while he was at Rome, and so forced him to stay. He then pretended that he would do as he bade him: but when night came on, he cut his cables, and of the Attic quantity of use money, which was the eighth part of the original sum, or 15 1/2 per cent, so that the proportion of 2,500 to 30,000.
riss, according to his usual custom, kept him still in bonds, being a delaying of affairs, if ever there was any other king or tyrant that was so: for he did not admit ambassadors quickly, and to successors were despatched away to governors or procurors of the provinces, that had been formerly sent, unless they were dead: whence it was, that he was so negligent in hearing the causes of prisoners; invouchm. that when he was asked by his friends, when he might expect his delay in such cases? he said, that "he delayed to hear ambassadors, lest, upon their quick dismission, other ambassadors should be appointed, with more return upon him, and so he should bring trouble upon himself in the time of his absence and discretion: that he permitted those governors who had been once sent from their government (to stay there a great while), out of regard to the subjects that were under them, so that all governors are naturally disposed to get as much as they can, and that those who are not to fix there, but to stay a short time, and that at an uncertainty, when they shall be turned out, do not in the least care; because the more severely he does, the more people; but that, if their government be long continued to them, they are at last satiated with the spoils, as having gotten a vast deal, and so becomes at length less sharp in their pilaging; but that, if successively there is no appointment; and when it was demanded of him, he ran away like a fugitive, out of the places under his government, and put it out of his power to get the money of him. When Caesar had read the record of the proceedings of his predecessors, and their successors, and of Claudius, he was afterward Caesar himself, to lend him those three hundred thousand drachmai, that he might not be deprived of Tiburis's friendship; so, out of regard to the aforesaid, he demanded of him for a thrice. And he said, that he should always accompany him when he went abroad. But, upon Agrippa's kind reception by Antonia, he betook himself to a niece of his, and the aforesaid Agrippa; and, in very high reputation, by reason of the good-will they bore his father. Now there was one Thallus, a freedman of Ces- sar, who by his consent obtained a million of drachmai, and that the aforesaid Antonia did owe her; and by spending the surplus in paying his court to Caesar, became a person of great authority with him.

5. Now as the friendship which Agrippa had for Caesar was come to a great height, there happened some words to pass between them, as they once were in a chariot together, concerning Tiburis; Agrippa praying to God, (for they two were in the chariot together,) to be an instrument of preserving Caesar, out of the stage; and leave the government to Caesar, who was in every respect more worthy of it. Now, Eutychus, who was Agrippa's freed-man, and drove his chariot, heard these words, and at the same time was -an of him, and the aforesaid Eutychus accused him of stealing some garments of his, (which was certainly true,) he ran away from him: but when he was caught, and brought before Piso, who was governor of the city, and the mode was such why he ran away upon the town, that he had something to say to Caesar, that tended to his security and preservation: so Piso bound him, and sent him to Capreæ. But Tiberius, according to his usual custom, kept him still in bonds, being a delaying of affairs, if ever there was any other king or tyrant that was so: for he did not admit ambassadors quickly, and to successors were despatched away to governors or procurors of the provinces, that had been formerly sent, unless they were dead: whence it was, that he was so negligent in hearing the causes of prisoners; invouchm. that when he was asked by his friends, when he might expect his delay in such cases? he said, that "he delayed to hear ambassadors, lest, upon their quick dismission, other ambassadors should be appointed, with more return upon him, and so he should bring trouble upon himself in the time of his absence and discretion: that he permitted those governors who had been once sent from their government (to stay there a great while), out of regard to the subjects that were under them, so that all governors are naturally disposed to get as much as they can, and that those who are not to fix there, but to stay a short time, and that at an uncertainty, when they shall be turned out, do not in the least care; because the more severely he does, the more people; but that, if their government be long continued to them, they are at last satiated with the spoils, as having gotten a vast deal, and so becomes at length less sharp in their pilaging; but that, if successively there is no appointment; and when it was demanded of him, he ran away like a fugitive, out of the places under his government, and put it out of his power to get the money of him. 6. On this account it was that Eutychus could not obtain a hearing, but was kept still in prison. However, some time afterward, Tiberius came from Capreæ to Tuscalenam, which is about a hundred furlongs from Rome. Agrippa then de-sized of Antonia, that she would procure a hearing for Eutychus, let the matter whereof he ac-sented he wrou more what it would. Now, Antonia was greatly esteemed by Tiberius on all ac-scounts for that evidence of her relation to him, who had been his brother Drusus's wife, and from her eminent chastity; for though she were 21 a young woman, she continued in her widowedness, and refused all other matches, although Antonia knew that his mother, who had furnished him to come and say body else, yet did she al so preserve her reputation free from reproach. She had also been the greatest benefactress to Tiberius, when there was a very dangerous plot to assassinate him by Sejanus man who had been her husband's friend, and who had the greatest authority, because he was general of the army, and when many members of the senate, and many of the friends he joined with him, and the soldiery was corrupted, and the plot was come to a great height. Now Sejanus had certainly gained his punt, had not Antonia's boldeness been more wisely conducted that Sejanus's malice; for,
when she and disgraced, his designs again, Tiberius, she wrote him an exact account of the whole, and gave the letter to Pallius, the most faithful of her servants, and sent him to Capreae to Tiberius, who, when he understood it, slew Sejanus, and punished with the severest that Tiberius who had her in great esteem before, now looked up to her with still greater respect, and depended upon her in all things. So, when Tiberius was going to make this Antonia to examine Eutychus, he answered, "If indeed Eutychus hath falsely accused Agrippa in what he hath said of him, he hath had sufficient punishment by what I have done to him already; but if, upon examination, he is charged, I swear to you that there will be no one to receive him in what he has proclaimed of himself, he does not rather bring a punishment upon himself." Now when Antonia told Agrippa of this, he was still much more preyed for this matter, might he be metamized into Cisalpina;
so Antonia, upon Agrippa's lying hard at her continually to beg his favor, took the following opportunity: As Tiberius lay once at his ease upon his sedan, and was carried about, and Caius, his guardian, was there; and after dinner, he walked by the sedan, and desired him to call Eutychus, and have him examined; to which he replied, "O Antonia! the gods are my watchmen, and I am not disposed to do what I am going to do, not by my own inclination, but because I am forced to it by thy prayers." When he had said this, he ordered Macro, who suc-sceeded Sejanus, to bring Eutychus to him; according to what day, as it was brought.
Then Tiberius asked him, what he had to say against a man who had given him his liberty?
Upon which he said, "O my lord! this Caius, and Agrippa with him, were once riding in a chariot, when I sat at their feet, and among other discourses that passed, Agrippa said to Caius, O that the day would once come, when this old fellow will die, and name thee for the governor of the habitable earth! for then this Ti-berius, his grandson, would rule in Greece, but would be taken off by thee, and that earth would be happy, and I happy also. Now, Tiberius made these to be truly Agrippa's words, and bearing a gudgeon withal at Agrippa, because, when he had commanded him to pay his respects to Tiberius his grandson, and the son of Drusus, and that Tiberius had not paid him that respect, but had disobeyed his commandos, and transferred all his regard to Caius; he said to Macro, "Bind this man."
But Macro, not distinctly knowing which of them at that time was Agrippa, and thinking that he would have any such thing done to Agrippa, he forbore, and came to ask more discinctly what it was that he said? But when Caesar saw more, he said to Macro, and Agrippa standing: "For certain," said he, "Macro, this is the man I meant to have bound;" and when he still asked, "Which of these is to be bound?" he said, "Agrippa." Upon which Agrippa presented his (his) bill to Macro, and Macro, for myself, putting him in sight of his son, with whom he was brought up, and of Tiberius [his grandson] whom he had educated; but all to no purpos, for they led him about bound even in honor of most, and were also very hot weather, and they had but little wine to their meals, so that he was very thirsty; he was also in a sort of agony, and took this treatment of him beseevously; and therefore, thought saw one of Caius's slaves, whose name was Augustus. The man, therefore, in a vessel, he desired that he would let him drink; so the servant gave him some water to drink, and he drank heartily, and said, "O those boy this thing is inhuman."
He was then sent to prison, as Agrippa for,
if once get clear of these my bonds, I will soon procure thee thy freedom from Caius, who hast not been wanting to minister to me, now I aim in bonds, in the same manner as when I was in the service of Augustus, and to give thee receive him in what he promised him; but made him amends for what he had now done; for, when afterward Agrippa was come to the kingdom, he took particular care of Thaumastus, and unto him had given of Drusus' treasures, to them the steward over his own estate; and when he died, he left him to Agrippa his son, and to Bernice his daughter, to minister to them in the same capacity. The man also grew old in that house, and therein died. But all this happened a good while later.

7. Now Agrippa stood in his bonds before the royal palace, and leaned on a certain tree for guide to his eyes, and might not even raise and as a certain bird sat upon the tree on which Agrippa leaned, (the Romans call this bird bubus, [an owl], one of those that were bound, a German by nation, saw him, and asked a soldier and to him, "what is this thing?" The was brought. Then infected with that his name was Agrippa, and that his was not a man, and both of the principal men of that nation, he asked leave of the soldier to whom he was bound, to let him come nearer with him; for that he had a mind to inquire of him about some things relating to his country; which liberty when he had obtained, and as he stood near him, he said thus to him by an interpreter, that "This sudden change of thy condition, is not at present a good sign. Bring me out of this manifold and vary great ad-sect. 17. And note, that Tertullian owns this right against second marriages of the clergy, had been sent out to speak with him; for that he had a mind to inquire of him about some things relating to his country; which liberty when he had obtained,
and as he stood near him, he said thus to him by
an interpreter, that this sudden change of thy condition, is not at present a good sign. Bring me out of this manifold and vary great ad-
sect. 17. And note, that Tertullian owns this right against second marriages of the clergy, had been sent
he was in did not hinder his familiarity with them all, as if they were his equals: by which behavior he was not only greatly esteemed by the people and the senate, but by every one of those nations that were subject to the Romans; some of whom were affected, when they came to him, with the gracefulness of their reception by him and others were affected in the same manner by the report of the others that had been with him: and upon his head there was a lamentation of all men: but such a one was to be made in way of flattery to their rule, as they did, but counterfeited sorrow, but such as was real: while they grieved for the death of Tiberius, they lost one that was near to them. And truly such had been his conversation with them, that it turned greatly to the advantage of his son among all; and, among others, the soldiers were so peculiarly affected for Ennodius, that they reckoned of what eligible thing, if need were, to die themselves, if he might but attain to the government.

9. But when Tiberius had given order to Ennodius to bring the children to him the next day in the morning, and that Ennodius should bring with him a manifest signal, which of those children should come to the government: being very desirous to leave it to his son's son, but still depending upon what God should foresore communicate concerning the nature of things; for, he was under the apprehension what happiness is coming upon thee, thou mayest not regard thy present misfortunes. But when this happiness shall actually befall thee, do not forget what naivety I am in myself, but endeavor to appear to the people as a prudent man, and to persuade them that, as this is the first time that an emperor has been born in the family, and indeed quite impracticable, as to any hope of success; yet did she procure of Macro, that the soldiers that kept him should be of a gentle manner to him, and not to give him any call in that child which should be there ready. So he went out, and found Caius before the door, for Tiberius was not yet come, but staid waiting for his breakfast; and the emperor desired Caius to call him, and Caius said, "Thy father calleth thee." And then brought him in. As soon as Tiberius saw Caius, and not before, he reflected on the power of God, and how the ability of destroying, by the good and wise, who would, was entirely taken from him; and therefore he was not able to establish what he had intended. So he greatly lamented that his power of establishing what he had before contrived was taken from him, and was burned. This misfortune was not only to lose the Roman empire by his inability, but his own safety also, because his preservation would now depend upon such as would be more potent than himself, who would think it a thing not to be borne: that a kingman should live with them, and so his relation would not be able to protect him: but he would be feared and hated by him who had the supreme authority, partly on account of his being next to the empire; and partly on account of his power being so contending to get the government, but in order to preserve himself, and to be at the head of affairs also. Now Tiberius had been very much given to astrologers, and had spent his life in the esteem of what predictions had proved true more than those whose profession it was. Accordingly, when he once saw Galba coming in to him, he said to his most intimate friend, "that man would one day have the dignity of the Roman empire." So that this Tiberius was more addicted to all such sorts of diviners than any other of the Roman emperors, because he had found them to have told him truth in his own affairs. And indeed he was now in great distress upon this accident that had befallen him, and was very much

* Tiberius his own grandson, and Caius his brother

† So I correct Josephus's copy, which calls Germanicus his brother, who was his brother's son.

‡ This is a known thing among the Roman historians and poets, that Tiberius was greatly given to astrology and divination.
The text is a portion of a historical account written in English, discussing the events surrounding the death of Agrippa and the aftermath of the Roman trials. The text references the trials of Titus and other Roman officials, and the death of Agrippa. It mentions the possibility of Agrippa being accused of treason.

The passage reads:

"...he foresaw, and complained of himself, that he should have made use of such a method of divination beforehand, while it was in his power to have died without grief by his knowledge of futurity; whereas, he was now tormented by his foreknowledge of the misfortunes of such as were dearest to him, and must die under the loss of his friend. Now, although they were discovered at this unexpected revolution of the government to those for whom he did not intend it, he spoke thus to Caius, though unwillingly, and against his own inclination: "O child! although Titus be nearer related to me than thou art, I, by my own determination, and the conspiring suffrages of the gods, do give, and put into thy hand, the Roman empire: and I desire thee never to be unmindful when thou comest to it, either of my kindness towards thee, who set thee in so high a dignity, or of thy relation to Titus. But as thou knowest that I am, together with, and after the gods, the procurer of so great happiness to thee, so I desire that thou wilt make me a return. The Romans understand that Titus, and wilt take care of Titus because of his near relation to thee. Besides which, thou art to know, that, while Titus is alive, he will be a security to thee, both as to empire and as to thy own safety; and, if he die, Titus will be but a prelude to thy own misfortunes; for to be alone, under the weight of such vast affairs, is very dangerous; nor will the gods suffer those actions which thou mayst do, to be made to that extent, which directs men to act otherwise, to go off unpunished." This was the speech which Titus made, which did not persuade Caius to act accordingly, although he promised so to do; but when he came before the government, he took off this Titus, as was predicted by the other Tiberius; as he was also himself in no long time afterward slain by a secret plot laid against him.

10. So when Tiberius had at this time appointed Caius to be his successor, he lived but a few days, and then died, after he had held the government twenty-two years, five months, and three days; now Caius was the fourth emperor. But this we may understand, that Titus, being dead, they rejoiced at the good news, but had not courage to believe it; not because they were unwilling it should be true, for they would have been glad of any means of it, but because they were afraid, that if they had showed their joy, when the news proved false, their joy should be openly known, and they should be accused for it, and be thereby undone. For the things that are not made by a number of miseries on the best families of the Romans, since he was easily inflamed with passion in all cases, and was of such a temper as rendered his anger irrevocable, till he had executed the same, although he had taken a hatred against men without reason; for he was by nature fierce in all the sentences he gave, and made death the penalty for the slightest offenses; insomuch that when the Romans heard the rumor about his death, they were so excited from the joy of that pleasure by the dread of such miseries as they foresaw would follow, if their hopes proved ill-grounded. Now Mæsya, Agrippa's wife, Mæsya, and Titus's, death, came running to tell Agrippa the news; and finding him going out to the bath, he gave him a nod, and said, in the Hebrew tongue, "The lion is dead;"19 who understanding his meaning as to joy and the news, "Nay, (said he,) but all sorts of thanks and hap-

How Herod the Tetrarch was banished.

1. But Herodias, Agrippa's sister, who now lived as wife to Herod who was tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, took this authority of her brother in an envious manner, particularly when she saw that he had a greater dignity bestowed on him than her husband had; since, when he was but tetrarch, she was compelled to pay her respects to him in a manner befitting her own insignificance; the place also affords warm baths, that spring out of the ground of their own accord, which are of advantage for the recovery of the health of those that make use of them, and besides, there is a trade with them, that they may, as it were, make a new and fresh sacrifice. Thus, when Cæsar saluted Herod, for he first met with him, and looked upon the letters which Agrippa had sent him, and which were written in order to accuse Herod, wherein he accused him, that he had been in the habit of making sacrifices against Tiberius' government, and that he was now confederate with Artabanus the king of Parthia in opposition to the government of Cæsars; as a demonstration of which he alleged, that he had armor sufficient for seventy thousand men ready in his armory. Cæsar was moved at this information, and asked Herod whether what was said about the armor was true: and when he confessed that such armor did belong to him, he could not deny the same, the truth of it being too notorious, Cæsar took that to be a sufficient proof of the accusation, that he intended to revolt. So he took away from him his tetrarchy, and gave it by way of addition to Agrippa's kingdom; and he also gave Cæsar's money to Agrippa, and by way of punishment, awarded him a perpetual banishment, and appointed Lyons, a city of Gaul, to be his place of habitation. But when he was informed of this great indignity, he made a present of what money was her own; and told her, that "it was her brother who prevented her being put under the same calamity with her husband." But she made this reply: "Thou, indeed, as emperor! actest after a most insipid manner, and as becomes thyself in what thou offerest me; but the kindness which I have for my husband, hinders me from partaking of the favor of thy gift; for it is not just, that I, who have been made a partner in the prosperity, should forsake him in his misfortunes." Hereupon Cæsar was angry at her, and sent her with Herod into banishment, and gave her estate to Agrippa. And thus Herod, in this manner, for her envy at her brother, and Herod also forgiving her to the vain discourses of a woman. Now, Cæsar managed public affairs with great magnanimity, during the first and second year of his reign, and beheld with much satisfaction, that he gained the good-will of the Romans themselves, and of his other subjects. But, in process of time, he went beyond the bounds of human nature, in his conceit of himself, and, by reason of the vastness of his dominions, made himself a god, and took upon himself to act in all things to the reproach of the Deity itself.

Concerning the Emigration of the Jews to Cæsars and how Cæsar sent Petronius into Syria, to make War against the Jews, unless they would receive his Statutes.

1. There was now a tumult arisen at Alexandria, between the Jewish inhabitants and the Greeks; and there ambassadors were chosen out of each party that were at variance, who came to Cæsar. Now, one of these ambassadors... from the people of Alexandria was Apion, who uttered many blasphemies against the Jews; and among other things, that he said, he chased them with neglecting the honors that belonged to Caesar; for that while all who were subject to the Roman empire, built altars and temples to Caesar, and in other regards, universally received him as they received the gods; these Jews alone thought it a dishonorable thing for them to erect statues in honor of him, as well as to swear by his name. Many of these severe things were spoken, by which he hoped to provoke Caesar to anger at the Jews, as he was likely to be; but Philo, the principal of the Jewish embassy, a man eminent on all accounts, brother to Alexander the slavarch, and one not unskillful in the government of men, was very desirous, to judge himself, to make his defense against those accusations; but Caesar prohibited him, and bade him begone; he was also in such a rage, that it openly appeared he was about to do them some very great mischief. So Philo, being thus thwarted, went out, and said to those Jews who were about him, that "they should be of good courage, since Caesar's words indeed showed anger at them, but in reality had already met God against himself." When Caesar, taking into consideration he should thus be despised by the Jews sions, sent Petronius to be president of Syria, and successor in the government to Vitellius, and gave him orders to let the Jews be free, to dismiss them with a great body of troops; and if they would admit of his statue willingly, to erect it in the temple of God; but if they were obstinate, to conquer them by war, and then to do it. Accordingly, Petronius took the government out of Caesar's hands, and made haste to obey Caesar's epistle. He got together as great a number of auxiliaries as he possibly could, and took with him two legions of the Roman army, and came to Ptolemais, and there would not be contented to see them in the spring. He also wrote word to Ca ius what he had resolved to do, who commended him for his sincerity, and ordered him to go on, and to make war with them, in case they would not obey him immediately. But then he commanded ten thousand of the Jews to Petronius, to Ptolemais, to offer their petitions to him, that "he would not compel them to transgress and violate the law of their forefathers, but if (said they) thou art about to raise any war, and erect it, do thou first kill us, and then do what thou hast resolved on; for while we are alive, we cannot permit such things as are forbidden us to be done. We, the inhabitants of our city, and by our forefathers' determination, that such prohibitions are instances of virtue." But Petronius was angry at them, and said, "If indeed I were myself emperor, and were at liberty to follow my own inclination, and then had designed to act thus, these your words would be justly spoken to me; but now Caesar hath sent to me, I am under the necessity of being subservient to his decrees, because a disobedience to them will bring upon me any misfortune." Thus the Jews replied, "Since, therefore, thou art so disposed, O Petronius! that thou wilt not disobeey thy epistles, neither will we transgress the commands of our law; and as we depend upon the excel- lence of our city, and by the laws of our an- cestors, have continued hitherto without suffering them to be transgressed, we dare not by any means suffer ourselves to be so timorous as to transgress those laws out of the fear of death, which we have determined to bear for our advantage; and if we fall into misfortunes, we will bear them, in order to preserve our laws, as knowing, that those who expose themselves to dangers, have a good cause of escaping them, because God will stand on our side, who, out of regard to him, we undergo afflictions, and sustain the un- certain turns of fortune. But if we should submit to thee, we should be greatly reproached for those whom we have determined for our advantage; and that, without a war, he should not be able to be subservient to Caesar in the dedication of his statue, and that there must be a great deal of bloodshed, he took his friends, and the servants that were his, and hastened to Tiberius, as wanting to know in what posture the affairs of the Jews were; and many ten thousands of the Jews met Petronius again, when he was come to Tiberias. These thought they must run a mighty hazard; and accordingly they had a council of the Romans, but judged that the transgression of the law was of much greater consequence, and made supplication to him, that he would by no means resolve to receive the dedication of the city with the dedication of the statue. Then Petronius said to them, "Will you then make war with Caesar, without considering his great preparations for war, and your own weakness?" The Jews answered, that they were free men, and under no haste to obey Caesar's epistle. He got together as great a number of auxiliaries as he possibly could, and took with him two legions of the Roman army, and came to Ptolemais, and there would not be contented to see them in the spring. which Aristocrates and the rest with him made, and because of the great consequence of what they had made, they made their supplication; partly on account of the firmness of the opposition made by the Jews, which he saw, while he thought it a horrid thing for him to be such a slave to the madness of Caesar,  to allow so many ten thousand men, only because of their religious disposition towards God, and after that to pass his life in expectation of punishment: Petronius, I say, thought it much better to send to Caesius, and to let the business be put in the hands of Caesar; that he might bear the anger he might have against him for not serving him sooner. In obedience to his epistle, for that perhaps he might persuade him: and that he might be in time to begin the war against them; nay, it was in case he should turn his hatred against himself, it was fit for virtuous persons even to die for the sake of such vast multitudes of men. According, he determined to hearken to the petitioners in this matter.

5. He then called the Jews together to Tiberias, who came, many: ten thousands in number: he also placed that army he now had with him: and that the war might not disturb the important business of his own mind, but the command of the emperor, and told them, that his wrath would, without delay, be executed on such as had the courage to disobey what he had commanded, and this immediately; for this was the greater enormity, that they had obtained so great a dignity by his grant, not to contradict him in any thing;" yet, said he, "I do not think it just to have such a regard to my safety and honor, as to refuse to sacrifice them for your preservation; now, with the supreme assistance and power of God, will I be so hardy as to suffer your temple to fall into contempt by the means of the imperial authority. I will, therefore, send to Caesius, and let him know what your resolutions are, and will assist you as far as I am able; that you may not be exposed to suffer on account of the honest designs you have proposed to yourselves: and may God be your assistant, for your honor is his honor, and that he may have the greatest profit from the destruction of his business, and may he procure to the preservation of your ancient laws, and may not be deprived, though without your consent, of your accustomed honors. But if Caesius be irritated, and turn the violence of his rage against all that dare either upon my body or my soul, than to see so many of you perish, while you are acting in so excellent a manner. Do you, therefore, every one of you, go your way about your own occupa-

5. When Petronius had said this, and had dismissed the assembly of the Jews, he desired the principal of them to take care of their habitanty, and to speak kindly to the people, and encourage them to have a good hope of the affair. But he did expressly bring the multitude to be cheerful again. And now did God show his presence to Petronius, and signify to him, that he would afford him his assistance in his whole design; for he had no sooner finished the speech that he made to the Jews, but God sent down great showers of rain, contrary to human expectation, for that day was a clear day, and gave no sign that the appearance of rain was at any time. But as the whole year had been subject to a great drought, and made men desirous of any water from above, even when at any time they saw the heavens overcast with clouds; insomuch, that with the appearance of rain, the effect was that in an unusual manner, and without any other expectation of it, the Jews hoped that Petronius would by no means fail in his petition for them. But as to Petronius, he was diligently searching for a means when he was made acquainted that Caesar took care of the Jews, and gave very plain signs of his appearance; and this to such a degree, that those that were in earnest much inclined to the contrary, but also power left to contradict it. This was also among those other particulars which he wrote to Caesius, which all tended to dissuade him, and by all means to entreat him not to make so many ten thousands of these men go distracted, with if he should yield, (for without war they would by no means suffer the laws of their worship to be set aside,) he would lose the revenue they paid him, and would be publicly cursed by them for all future ages. Moreover, it was that he was the most secure from the power most evidently on their account, and that such a power of his was as left no room for doubt about it. And this was the business that Petronius was now engaged in.

when he had once made him a supper, and was careful to exceed all others, both in expenses and in such preparations as might contribute most to his honor: not to mention the ability of others, that Caesius himself could never equal, much less exceed it, (such care had he taken beforehand to exceed all men, and particularly to make all agreeable to Caesar;) hereupon was Caesius suddenly snatched up, by reason of his excursion, that he should force himself to do all to please him, even beyond such expenses as he could bear, and was desire to not be held in Agrippa's debt, that generosity with which he exerted in order to please him. So Caesius, when he had drank wine plentifully, and was merrier than ordinary, said thus during the feast, when Agrippa had drunk to him: "I knew before now that you have such a heart for the public, and your kindness hath shown me, though with those hazards to thyself, which thou underwast under Tiberius on that account; no but thou commended any thing to show thy good-will towards me, and I think that it would be a base thing for me to be conquered by thy affection: I am, therefore, desire to make thee amends for every thing in which I have been formerly deficient, for all that I have bestowed on thee, that may be called thy graces, is but little. Everything that may contribute to thy happiness shall be at thy service, and that cheerfully, and so far as my ability will reach." And this was what Caesius said to Agrippa, thinking he would work for the large revenues of certain cities. But, although he ad prepared beforehand what he would ask, yet had he not discovered his intentions, but made this answer to Caesius immediately, that "It was not out of any expectation of gain that I have already paid his respects to him, contrary to the command of Tiberius, nor did he now do any thing relating to him out of regard to his own advantage, and in order to receive any thing from him: that the gifts he had already bestowed are at all in that case; which well deserves to be lasting for the benefit a part, as they are several times both in the Old and New Testament.

\[\text{This behavior of Caesius to Agrippa is very well, that of Herod Antipas, his uncle, to Herodias, Agrippa's sister, about John the Baptist, Matt. xiv. 6—11.}\]
upon him were great, and beyond the hopes of even a craving man; for, although they may be beneath thy power, [who art the donor,] yet are they greater than my inclination and dignity, who am the receiver."

And, as Caius was astonished at Agrippa's inclinations, and still more pressed him to make his request for some what which he might gratify him with, Agrippa replied, "Since thou, O my lord! declarest such thy readiness to grant, that I am worthy of thy gift, I will ask nothing relating to this, only thou hast already bestowed on me has made me excel therein; but I desire somewhat which may make thee glorious for piety, and rend the mouth of Deity assistance to thy designs, and may be for an honor to me among those that inquire about it, as showing that I never once fail of obtaining what I desire of thee; for my petition is this, that thou wilt no longer think of the dedicated place that thou hast already ordered to be set up in the Jewish temple by Petronius."

8. And thus did Agrippa venture to cast the die upon this occasion, so great was the affair in his eyes, and yet so little did he know how dangerous a thing it was to speak; for, had not Caius approved of it, it had tended to no less than the loss of his life. So Caius, who was mightily taken with Agrippa's obliging behavior, thought it would be a matter of honor to him to request it, and, greatly admired Agrippa's virtue, in not desiring him at all to augment his own dominions, either with large revenues or other authority, but took care of the public tranquillity, of the laws, and of the army, that he might not be accused of what he had requested. He also wrote thus to Petronius, commending him for assembling his army, and then consulting him about these affairs. "If, therefore, my lord, thou hast already erected my statue, let it stand; but, if thou hast not yet dedicated it, do not trouble thyself farther about it, but dismiss thy army, go back, and take care of those affairs which I sent thee about at first, for this is now an occasion for a new erection on that statue. This I have granted as a favor to Agrippa, a man whom I honor so very greatly, that I am not able to contradict what he would have, or what he desired me to do for him." And when Caius wrote to Petronius, which was before he received his letter, informing him that the Jews were very ready to revolte about the statue, and that they seemed resolved to threaten war against the Romans, and nothing else. When therefore Caius was much displeased that any attempt should be made against his government, as he was a slave to base and vicious actions on all occasions, and had no regard to what was virtuous and honorable, and against whomsoever he had received his edict to suit his pleasure, and that for any cause whatsoever, he suffered not himself to be restrained by any admonition, but thought the indulging his anger to be a real pleasure, he wrote thus to Petronius: "Seeing thou estamest, and, as it were, madest thee by the Jews to be of greater value than my commands, and art grown insolent enough to be subservient to their pleasure, I charge thee to become thy own judge, and to consider what thou art to do, now thou art power to suit thy pleasure. Let me, therefore, for an example to the present and to all future ages, that they may not dare to contradict the commands of their emperor." 9. That was the epistle which Caius wrote to Petronius, but Petronius did not receive it while Caius was alive; that ship which carried it sailed so slow, that other letters came to Petronius before this, by which he understood that Caius was dead; for God would not forget the dangers Petronius had undertaken on account of the Jews, and of his own honor. But when he had taken Caius away, out of his indignation of what he had so insolently attempted in assuming to himself divine worship, both in Rome and in his own cities and temple, he sent his resolution conspired with Petronius, especially those that were of the senatorial order, to give Caius his due reward, because he had been unmercifully severe to them; for he died not long after he had been thus refuted. And, as his body was threatened with death. But as for that occasion of his death, and the nature of the plot against him, I shall relate them in the proper place. Now, in the epistle which informed Petronius of Caius's death, he wrote, and a little afterward cause that which commanded him to kill himself with his own hands. Whereupon he rejoiced at this coincidence as to the death of men, and admired God's providence, who without the least delay, and immediately, gave him a reward for the regard he had to the temple, and the assistance he afforded the Jews for avoiding the dangers they were in. And by this means he escaped the danger of death, which he could not foresee."

CHAPTER IX.

What befell the Jews that were in Babylon, on occasion of Anius and Anius, two Brothers.

1. A very sad calamity now befell the Jews that were in Mesopotamia, and especially those that dwelt in Babylonia. Inferior it was to none of the calamities that he those before had come together with a great slaughter of them, and that greater than any upon record before; concerning all which I shall speak accurately, and shall explain the occasions whence those miseries came from them. For the Jews of Babylonia called Neeris; not only a very populous one, but one that had a good and a large territory about it, and, besides its other advantages, full of mines. It was, besides, not easily to be assaulted by enemies from the river Euphrates encompassing it all round, and from the walls that were built about it. There was also the city Nebiria, situate on the same current of the river, inhabited of a great number of people, depending on the natural strength of these places, deposited in them that half shekel which every one, by the custom of our country, offers unto God, as well as they did other things devoted to his honor. They were also provided of treasure, whence, at a proper time, they were transmitted to Jerusalem; and many ten thousand men undertook the carriage of those donations, out of fear of the ravages of the Parthians, to whom the Babylonicians were then subject. Now, there were two men, Anius and Anius, of the city Neeris by birth, and brethren to one another. They were destitute of a father, and their mother put them to learn the art of weaving cotton. They were ready to answer any for this service, and for expecting such fruits as were usually laid up against winter. The poorest sort of the young men also resorted to them, whom they armed with the weapons they had gotten, and became their captains; and nothing was denied them from being their king or chief; for, as soon as they became invincible, and had built them a citadel, they sent to such as fed cattle and ordered them to pay them so much tribute out of them as might be sufficient for their maintenance, proposing also that they would be their friends if they would submit to them, and that they would defend them from all their other enemies on every side, but that they would kill all the cattle of those that refused to obey them. So they heartened to their proposals, and gave their promise, and sent them as many sheep as were required of them, whereby their forces grew greater, and they became lords over all they pleased, because they marched suddenly, and did them a mischief, in such a manner, that no one of them chose to pay them respect, and they became formidable to such as came to assault them, till the report about them came to the ears of the king of Parthia himself.

2. But when the king of Babylonia understood this, and had a mind to put a stop to them before they grew greater, and before greater mischief should arise from them, he got together a great army as he could, both of Parthian and Babylonic horse and foot, and went out against them, being joined in battle by the Jews of Babylon, which is among the Jews a day of rest from all sorts of work, he supposed that the enemy would not dare to fight him thereon, but that he would take them and carry them away prisoners. Then he marched to them, and defeated them gradually, and thought to fall upon them on the sudden. Now Asineus was sitting with the rest, and their weapons lay by them; upon which he said, "Sirs, I hear a neighing of horses; not of such kind as feeding, but such as have men on their backs; I also hear such a noise of their bridles, that I am afraid that some enemies are coming upon us to encompass us round. However, let somebody go to look about, and make report of what they are that have the present state of things; and may what I have said prove a false alarm." And when he said this, some of them went to spy out what was the matter, and they came again immediately and said to him, that neither horse nor man be seen against them, their enemies were doing, nor will those enemies permit us to be injurious to people any longer. We are caught by their intrigues like brute beasts, and they are of the nature of beasts, and we approach them on their backs, while we are destitute of hands to defend ourselves withal, because we are restrained from doing it by the prohibition of our law, which obliges us to rest (on this day,)." But Asineus did not yield: but he said what was to be done, but thought it more agreeable to the law to pluck up their spirits in this necessity they were fallen into, and break their law by avenging themselves, although they should die in the action, than by doing nothing to please their enemies in submitting to be slain by them. Accordingly, he took up his weapons, and infused courage into those that were with him to act as courageously as himself. So the soldiers immediately fell upon the enemy, and killed many of them, because they despised them, and came as to a certain victory, and put the rest to flight.

But when the news of this fight came to the king of Parthia, he was surprised at the boldness of these brethren, and was desirous to see them, and speak with them. He therefore sent the most of all his guards to say thus to them, "That king Artaurus, although he hath been unjustly treated by you, who have made an attempt against his government, yet hath he more regard to your courageous behavior than to the anger he bears to you, and hath sent me to give you the right hand, and security, and he permits you to come to him safely, and without any violence upon the road, and he wants to have you address yourselves to his friends, and send no guile or deceit to you. He also promises to make you presents, and pay you those respects which will make an addition of his power to your courage, and thereby be of advantage to you. Yet it is not a slight thing for me, on the part of the king to do it, but sent his brother Aniæus with all such presents as he could procure. So he went, and was admitted to the king's presence; and when Artaurus saw Aniæus coming alone, he inquired into the reason why Asineus's and all others to make along with him; and when he understood that he was afraid, and stayed by the lake, he took an oath by the gods of his country, that he would do them no harm, if they came to him upon the assurance he gave them, and gave them his right hand; This is of the greatest forces there with all these barbarians, and affords a firm security to those who converse with them; for none of them will believe you, even once they have given their right hands, nor will any one doubt of their fidelity, when that is once given, even though they were before suspected of injustice. When Artaurus had done this, he sent away Aniæus to persuade his brother to come, and pretend that he was afraid of the king, this the king did, because he wanted to curb his own governors of provinces by the course of these Jewish brethren, lest they should make a league with them: for they were ready for a revolt, and were disposed to rebel, hard they were sent on an expedition against them. He was also afraid, lest, when he was engaged in a war in order to subdue those governors of provinces that had revolted, the party of Aniæus, and those in Babylon, should throw off the present state of things, and may what I have said prove a false alarm." And when he said this, some of them went to spy out what was the matter, and they came again immediately and said to him, that neither horse nor man be seen against them, their enemies were doing, nor will those enemies permit us to be injurious to people any longer. We are caught by their intrigues like brute beasts, and they are of the nature of beasts, and we approach them on their backs, while we are destitute of hands to defend ourselves withal, because we are restrained from doing it by the prohibition of our law, which obliges us to rest (on this day,). But Asineus did not yield: but he said what was to be done, but thought it more agreeable to the law to pluck up their spirits in this necessity they were fallen into, and break their law by avenging themselves, although they should die in the action, than by doing nothing to please their enemies in submitting to be slain by them. Accordingly, he took up his weapons, and infused courage into those that were with him to act as courageously as himself. So the soldiers immediately fell upon the enemy, and killed many of them, because they despised them, and came as to a certain victory, and put the rest to flight.

He was also afraid, lest, when he was engaged in a war in order to subdue those governors of provinces that had revolted, the party of Aniæus, and those in Babylon, should throw off the present state of things, as one might deem a person of no value at all. He also said to his friends, how, upon a comparison, he showed his soul to be in all respects superior to his body: and when, as they were drinking together, he once showed Aniæus to Abbagastes, one of the generals of his army, and told him his name, and described the great courage he was of in war, and Abbagastes had desired leave to kill him, and thereby to inflict on him a punishment, but instead of that, he sent him to the Parthian government, the king replied, "I will never give thee leave to kill a man who hath depended on my faith, especially not after I have sent thee the right hand, and endeavored to gain his belief by other means. But if thou beest a truly warlike man, thou standest not in need of my persuasion. Go thou then, and avenge the Parthian government; at this hour, when it is returned back, and conquer him by the forces that are under thy command, without my privity.° Hereupon the king called for Asineus, and said to him, "It is time for thee. O thou sower of discord and betrayer of companions, not to provoke the indignation of the generals of my army in this place any farther, lest they attempt to murder thee, and that without my approbation. I commanded the country of Mesopotamia to be burnt, that it may by thy means be preserved free from robbers, and from other mischiefs. I have kept my faith inviolable to thee, and that not in trifling affairs, but in those that concerned the destiny of an army, and the entire force of a state should not be kind to me." When he had said this, and given Asineus some presents, he sent him away immediately; who, when he was come home, built fortresses, and became great in a little time, and managed in days of peace such part of the Parthian nation, as no other person, that had no higher a beginning, ever did before. Those Parthian governors also, who were sent that way, paid him great respect; and the honor that was paid him by the Babylonis, was the reason why he retained his seat, and continued his authority there, and that as long as he lived. For his wife, Asineus, was an ill-tempered, and malicious woman, as she had been born of an ill-tempered mother, and was reared in her vice. Now as Asineus was on the point of being chosen to succeed her father in the kingdom, he thought the injury that Anileus offered to their laws was to be borne no longer; and a great number of them came to Asineus, and loudly complained of Anileus, and told him that "it had been the turning point in his successes, that the war with Parthia was so advantageous to them, but that however it was now high time to correct what had been done amiss, before the crime that had been committed proved the ruin of himself and all the rest of the nation, and that the Parthian nation, that woman was made without their consent, and without a regard to their own laws; and that the worship which this woman paid [to her gods, was not to be unwashed, what great miseries came on these Jews, because they suffered one of their leaders to marry an idyllic woman. And this he said Rachel the wife of authority which, by God's blessing, he had ar-

would have a feast, he took his supper at a proper time, and marched by night, with an intent of falling upon the Parthians while they were unprepared what they should do; so he fell upon them near the fourth watch of the night, and as some of the principal families with much wealth, and others he put to flight, and took Mithridates alive, and set him naked upon an ass, which, among the Parthians, is esteemed the greatest reproach possible. And when he had brought him into a wood with such a resolution, and his friends desired him to kill Mithridates, he soon told them his own mind to the contrary, and said, that "it was not right to kill a man who was one of the principal families in the Parthian nation, and greatly honored with natticing into the royal family; that so far as they had hitherto gone was tolerable; for although they had injured Mithridates, yet if they preserved his life, this benefit would be remembered by him to the advantage of those that gave it him, but that if he were once put to death, the king would not be at rest till he had made a great slaughter of the Jews that dwelt at Babylon; to whose safety we ought to have a regard, in accordance with the relation to them, and because if any misfortune befell us, we have no other place to retire to, since he hath gotten the flower of their youth under him." By this thought, and this speech of his, he was resolved, as before, accordingly, so Mithridates was let go. But, when he was got away, his wife reproached him, that although he was son-in-law to the king, he neglected to avenge himself on those that had injured his husband, nor was he contented to have been made a captive by the Jews, and to have escaped them; and she bade him either go back like a man of courage, or else she swore by the gods of their royal family, that she would not speak to him, nor live with him. "Upon which, partly because he could not bear the daily trouble of her taunts, and partly because he was afraid of her insolence, lest she should in earnest dissolve her marriage, he unwarily, and against his inclinations, got together again as great an army as he could, and marched along with them, as himself thinking it a thing not to be borne any longer, that he, a Parthian, should owe his preservation to the Jews, when they had been too hard for him in the war.

7. But as soon as Aniileus understood that Mithridates was marching with a great army against him, at day-light, it set on foot, and he, the Greeks were too hard for the Syrians. When therefore, the Jews were come thither and dwelt among them, there arose a sedition, and the Syrians were too hard for the other, and by the assistance of the Jews, who were so that despised dangers, and very ready to fight upon any occasion. Now, when the Greeks had the worst in this sedition, and saw that they had but one way of recovering their former authority, and that was, if they should grant the agreement between the Jews and the Syrians, they every one discoursed with such of the Syrians as were formerly their acquaintance, and promised they would be at peace and friendship with them. Accordingly, for gladly they and the Jews, and when this was done by the principal men of both nations, they soon agreed to a reconciliation, and when they were so agreed, they both knew that the great design of such their union would be their common hatred of the Christians. Accordingly, they fell upon them, and slew about fifty thousand of them; nay, the Jews were all destroyed, excepting a few who escaped, by the compassion which their friends or neighbors afforded them. As for the Turks, by spite against the Christians, the Turks will not suffer them to hire horses, but once only, when they go abroad to see the country, as Mr. Maudrall assures us, on the 12th.
ANTIQUEs OF THE JEWS.

These retired to Cleisphon, a Grecian city, and situate near to Seleucia, where the king [of Parthus] lives in winter every year, and where the greatest part of his riches are reposed, but the Jews had here no certain settlement, those of Babylon living here, conscious of the king's honor. Now the whole nation of the Jews were in fear both of the Babylonians and of the Seleucians, because all the Syrians that lived in those places agreed with the Seleucians in the war against the Jews: so the most of them gathered themselves together, and went to Neerda and Nisibis, and obtained security there by the strength of those cities; besides which their inhabitants, who were great many, were all warlike. And this was the state of the Jews at this time in Babylonia.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF THREE YEARS AND A HALF.—FROM THE DEPARTURE OF THE JEWS OUT OF BABYLON, TO PABUR, THE ROMAN PROCURATOR.

CHAP. I.

How Caius was slain by Chereas.*

1. Now this Caius did not deign to prosecute his madness in offering injuries only to the Jews at Jerusalem, or to those that dwelt in the neighborhood, but suffered it to extend itself through all the earth and sea, so far as was in subjection to the Romans, and filled it with ten thousand miseries, so that all the nations in particular as former history relates. But Rome itself felt the most dismal effects of what he did, while he deemed not to be any way more honorable than the rest of the cities; but he pulled and hauled his greatness in public, but especially the senate, and particularly the nobility, and such as had been dignified by illustrious ancestors; he also had ten thousand devices against such of the equestrian order, as it was styled, who were esteemed by the citizens equal in dignity and wealth with the senators, because out of them the senators were themselves chosen; these he treated after an ignominious manner, and removed them out of his way, while they were at once slain, and their wealth plundered; and because, generally, in order to seize on their riches. He also asserted his own divinity, and insisted on greater honors to be paid him by his subjects, than are due to mankind. He also frequented that temple of Jupiter, of which he made it his custom to go over it in a small ship, and thought, withal, that it became him to make that bridge, since he was lord of the sea, and might oblige it to give marks of obedience as well as the earth; so he enclosed the whole bay within his bridge, and drove his chariot over it, and thought that, as he was a god, it was fit for him to travel over such roads as this was. Nor did he abstain from the plunder of any of the Grecian temples, and gave way to all the engravings and sculptures, and the rest of the ornaments of the statues and donations therein dedicated, should be brought to him, saying, that "the best things ought to be set nowhere but in the best place, and that is here in this best place." He also adorned his own house and his gardens with the curiosities brought from those temples, together with the houses he lay at when he travelled all over Italy; whence he did not scruple to give a command, that the statue of Jupiter Olympus, so called because he was honored at the Olympian games by the Greeks, which was the work of Phidias the Athenian, should be brought to Rome. Yet did not he compass his end, because the architects told Memmius Regulus, who was commanded to remove that statue of Jupiter, that the workmanship was such as would be spoiled, and would not bear the removal. It was also reported that Memmius, both on that account, and on account of other mighty prodigies as are of an incredible nature, put the thing down, and wrote to Caius those accounts, as his apology for not having done what his epistle required of him; and that when he was these letters in his hand, and seeing Caius being dead himself, before he had put him to death.

2. Nay, Caius's madness came to this height, that when he had a daughter born, he carried her into the Capitol, and put her upon the knee of that statue, and said, that the child was common to him and to Jupiter, and determined that she had two fathers, but which of these fathers was the greatest, he left undetermined; and yet mankind bore with him in such his pranks. He was often heard to say, that he should be as great and powerful as any of the other nations of the earth, and as they had been under afflictions, and wise caution to those who think their happiness will never end, nor bring them at length to the most lasting miseries, if they do not conduct their lives by the principles of virtue.

* In this and the three next chapters, we are, I think, a larger error than the distinct account of the slaughters under Caius, and the succession of Claudius, than we have of any such ancient facts whatsoever elsewhere. Some of the occasions of which probably were, Josephus's bitter hatred against tyranny, and the pleasure he took in giving the history of the slaughter of such a barbarous tyrant as was this Caius Caligula, as also the deliverances his own nation had by that slaughter. In which matter he seems to have had Agrippa junior, whose father was deeply concerned in the advancement of Claudius, upon the death of Caius from which Agrippa junior. Josephus might be fully formed of this history.

† Called Caligula by the Romans
3. Now there were three several conspiracies made, in order to take off Calus, and each of these three was conducted by excellent persons. Emilianus Berytus, born the son, in him, got some men together, and was desirous to take Calus off either by them, or by himself. Another conspiracy there was laid by them, under the conduct of Chorea Cassius, the tribune [of the Pompeians], who, during Ananus was one of great consequence among those that were prepared to oppose his tyranny. Now the several occasions of these men's hatred and conspiracy against Calus were these: Regulus had divided the imposts of the road; and Calus, for fear he had a mind naturally so gay, and bold, and free, which made him not conceal his counsels; so he communicated them to many of his friends, and to these he used to say, that, being in the prime of life and vigour; Misucianus entered into this conspiracy, because of the injustice done to Lipidus, his particular friend, and one of the best characters of all the citizens, whom Calus had slain; as well as because he was an enemy to Calus, since Calus's wrath tended to the slaughter of all alike, and for Chorea, he came in, because he thought it a deed worthy of a free ingenious man to kill Calus, and was sauntered of the reproaches he had made them. They made him cowards; as also because he was himself in danger every day from his friendship with him, and the observance he paid him. These men proposed this attempt to all the rest that were consecrated to the conspiracy, saw the deliverance of the people, and of themselves, and were desirous that Calus's slaughter might succeed by their mutual assistance of one another, that they might themselves escape being killed by the removal of Calus; that perhaps they should also be in a manner the friends of the city and of the government, even at we hazard for, and adorn their own lives. But still Chorea was the most zealous of them all, both out of a desire of getting himself the greatest name, and also by reason of his close association with Calus, since cause he was titular, and could therefore the more easily kill him.

4. Now at this time came on the horse-races [Circensive games], the view of which games was so great, that all the opulent men, as they came with great acclivity into the hippodrome [circus] at such times, and petition their emperors, in great multitudes, for what they stand in need of; who usually did not think fit to deny them their request, but petition and gratufully granted them. Accordingly they most importunately desired, that Calus would now ease them in their tributes, and abate somewhat of the rigor of the taxes imposed upon them; but he would not hear their petition; and that, when the clamors increased, he sent soldiers, some one way, and some another, and gave order that they should lay hold on those that made the clamors, and, without any more ado, bring them out, and put them to death, and to make those conspiracy-erds mandate, and those who were commanded execute the same; and the number of those who were slain on this occasion was very great. Now the people saw this, and bore it so far, that they left off their care of their own eyes, that this petition to be relieved, as to the payment of their money, brought immediate death upon them. These things made Cherea more to be desirous of his plot, in order to put an end to this barbarity of Calus against men. He, then, several times, thought to fall upon Calus even as he was feasting; yet did he restrain himself by some considerations; not that he had any doubt on him about killing him, but as watching for a proper season, that the attempt might not be frustrated, but that he might give the blow so as might certainly gain his purpose.

5. Cherea had been in the army a long time, and yet was accused of taking from a man he had been with Calus. But Calus had sent him to require the tributes, and other dues, which, when not paid in due time, were forfeited to Caesar's treasury; and he had made some delays in requiring those burdens, because he had braved him with his aloofness and had indulged his own mild disposition, than performed Caius's command; nay, indeed, he provoked Calus to anger by his sparing men, and playing the hard fortunes of those from whom he had received his pay, to make them feel how he had so braved him with his aloofness and effeminacy into being so long about collecting the taxes. And indeed he did not only affront him in other respects, but, when he gave him the watchword of the day, to whom it was to be given by his hand, he gave him feminine words, and those of a nature very reproachful; and these watchwords he gave out, as having been initiated in the secrets of certain of his, said he had himself the author of. Now, although he had sometimes put on women's clothes, and had been wrap in some embroidered garments to them belonging, and done a great many other things, in order to make the people laugh, and to make them a jest of, yet did he, by way of reproach, object the like womanish behavior to Cherea. But when Cherea received the watchword from him, he had indignation at it, but had greater indignation at this, for by the delivery of Calus, he had delivered those that received it; inasmuch that his fellow-tribunes made him the subject of their drollery; for they would foretell that he would bring none of his usual watchwords when he was about to take the watchword from Caesar; and he would thereby make him ridiculous; on which accounts he took the courage of assuming certain partners to him, as having just reasons for his indignation against Calus. Now there was a certain Pompeius, who had been a friend of Calus's, and had gone through almost all posts in the government, but otherwise an epicurean, and for that reason loved to lead an inactive life. Now Timidius, an enemy of his, had informed Calus that he had used indecent reproaches against him, and he made use of Quintilia, for a witness to them; a woman she was, much beloved by many that frequented the theatre, and particularly by Pompeius Timidius, on account of her beauty, by which woman he thought it a horrible thing to attest to an accusation that touched the life of her lover, which was also a lie. Timidius, however, wanted to have her brought to the torture. Calus was irritated at this, and ordered Cherea, without any delay, to torture Quintilia, as he used to employ Cherea in such bloody matters, and those that required the torture, because he thought he would do it the more barbarously, in order to avoid that imputation of effeminacy which he had laid upon him. But Quintilia, when she was brought to the rack, trod upon the foot of one of her associates, and let him know, that he might be of good courage, and she would not be treated not by much, but by consu-mand Cherea, without any delay, to torture Quintilia, as he used to employ Cherea in such bloody matters, and those that required the torture, because he thought he would do it the more barbarously, in order to avoid that imputation of effeminacy which he had laid upon him. But Quintilia, when she was brought to the rack, trod upon the foot of one of her associates, and let him know, that he might be of good courage, and she would not be treated not by much, but by consumatter sorely grieved Cerea, as hav-the cause, as far as he could, or the in-
of those miseries to men, which seem-y of consultation to be the great miscount he said to Clement and to Papi-whom Clement was general of the army, inus was a tribune," "To be sure, Cle-have noway failed in our guarding the-for to having now men, whom he had his government, some have been our care and pains, and some have been and this to such a degree, that he that se retirement might be so great that in submitting to conduct his armies;" held his peace, but showed the shame in obeying Caesar’s orders, both by and his blushing countenance, while he the assassination of what Caesar has ress words, lest their own safety should jured thereby. Upon which Cerea rage, and spoke to him without fear of ers that were before him, and discarded of a kindness for under which the
the government then labored, and said, y indeed pretend in words, that Caesar upon whom the cause of such mis-be impeared; but, in the opinion of re of these cases they perceived they had this Papinius, and before us thou bring these tortures upon the Romans, all mankind. It is not done by our servicent to the commands of Caesar, but the power to put an end to the life of this hath so terribly injured the citizens subjects, we are his guards in mischief executors instead of his soldiers, and instruments of his cruelty. We believe not for our liberty, not for the Roman ment, but only for his preservation, who both aved their bodies and their minds; and left them to die under Caesar’s the city. Bad with the badly treated, and the torments we inflict upon this we do, till somebody becomes strument in bringing the like miseries selves. Nor does he thus employ us, he hath a suspicion of us, as also because undance more have been killed, (for I set no bounds to his wrath, since he to all, not out of regard to justice, but to leaving the takers of the same mis-cruelty; whereas we ought to be the confirming the security and liberty of the same time to resolve to free our-ourselves."
who openly commended Chentious; but bad he "hold his tongue; ase his words should get out among such things should be spread abroad be concealed, the plot would come before it was not concealed, and would be brought to punishment: but that uld leave all to futurity, and the hope en arose, that some fortunate event me to this assistance: that, as for him-scould not prevent him: and that the that case. However, although per-uld suggest what may be safer than Cerea, hast contrived and said, yet not to suggest is to suffer his own reputation?" So Clement went his 5, with deep reflections on what he had w what he himself said. Cerea under a concern, and went quickly to at Brusus, who was himself one of the and whom he otherwise knew to be a and a lover of liberty, and on that ery uneasy at the present management are affairs, he being desires to come into the assistance of what had been deand thinking it right for him to pro-pos it to the other, and afraid lest Clement should discover them, and besides looking upon delays and puttings off to be next to desiring from the enterprise.
3. But as all was agreeable to Sabinus, who had himself, equally with Cerea, the same design; but had been silent for want of a person to whom he could safely communicate that design; did no one desire to have him put in that pose to conceal what he heard, but who had already opened his mind to him, he was much more encouraged, and desired of Cerea, that see about it. And Cerea, after publicizing the went to Minucianus, who was as virtuous a man and as zealous to do glorious actions as themelves, and suspected by Caesars on occasion of the slaughter of Lepidus; for Minucianus and Lepidus were intimate friends and advisors of the dangers that they were under; for Caesar was terrible to all the great men, as appearing ready to act a mad part towards each of them in particular, and towards all of them in genera-and these men were read of about this action, they were yet uneasy at the posture of affairs, but avoided to declare their mind and their hatred against Caesar to one another, out of fear of the dangers they might be in thereby, although they perceived they might be discovered and at-tred against Caesar, and on that account were not averse to mutual kindness one towards another.
4. When Minucianus and Cerea had met together, and saluted one another, (as they had one another conversed in former days, upper hand to Minucianus, both on account of his eminent dignity, for he was the noblest of all the citizens, and highly commended by all men, especially when he made, pesches to them) and Minucianus began first, and asked Cerea, what was the watchword he had received that day from Caesar? for the afront which was offered Cerea, in giving the watchwords, was famous Caesar; and when no delay was made, the long as to reply to that question, out of the way he had that Minucianus would have such conidence in him as to discourse with him. "But I do thou (said he) give me the watchword of Liberty. And if I am read of about this action, the thou hast so greatly encouraged me to exert myself after an extraordinary manner; nor do I stand in need of many words to encourage me, since both thou and I are of the same mind, and per-that, and this may day we have conferred together.
I have indeed but one sword gilt on, but this one will serve us both.
Come on, therefore, let us set about the work.
Do thou go first; if thou hast a mind, and bid me follow thee, or else I will err. If thou will assist me, we will assist one another, and trust one another.
Nor is there a necessity for even one sword to such as have a mind disposed to such works, by which mind the sword uses to nor am I solicitous what I myself undergo;
for I am not at leisure to consider the dangers that may come upon myself, so deeply am I troubled at the slavery our once free country is now under, and at the contemptuous contempts of our laws, and at the destruction which hangs over all men by the means of Caius. I wish that I can be judged by these, and that thou mayest seek me worth one in these matters, seeing we, are both of the same opinion, and there is herein no difference between us."
5. When Minucianus saw the vehemency with which Cerea delivered himself, he gladly embar her; but Cerea, having made the at-act, commending him, and embracing him; so he let him go with his good wishes; and some affirm, that he thereby confirmed Minucianus in the prosecution of what had been agreed among them; for, as Cerea entered into the city, the report runs, that a voice came from among the multitude to encourage him, which bad him finish what he was about, and take the opportunity of disposing of his goods. Caius, therefore, and was from all suspicion that he should be then assaulted by any body; and although the gods should afford him no divine assistance to enable him to take away his life, yet had he strength himself sufficient to despach Caius, even without a sword: thus was the angry at his fellow-conspirators, for fear they should suffer a proper opportunity to pass by;
and they were themselves sensible that he had just cause to be angry at them, and his sagacity was not without advantage; yet did they desire he would have a little longer patience, lest, upon any disappointment they might meet with, they should put the city into disorder, and an inquisition would be made of their racy, and should render the courage of those that were to attack Caius without success, while he would then secure himself more carefully than ever against them; that it would therefore be the best to suffer to pass, and works that those were exhibited in the palace. These shows were acted in honor of that Cesar who first of all changed the popular government, and transferred it to himself; galleries being fixed before the palace, there the Roman icians became spectators, together with their children and their wives, and Cesar himself was not to be a spectator; and they reckoned, among those many ten thousands, who would there be nor let them be ever so great, will I put them off any longer: for, to a wise and courageous man, what can be more miserable than that, while I am alive, any one else should kill Caius, and deprive me of the honor of so virtuous an action."

13. When Cherea had spoken thus, he zealously set about the work, and inspired courage into the rest to go on with it. But when they were about to execute their purpose; but Caius took hold of his garment, in an obliging way, and said to him, "O brave man! whither art thou going?" Whereupon, out of reverence to Cæsar, as it were, he returned not a word; but his face was turned to the wall, and he prevented the execution of the design, by going out and returning again; but his face prevailed over him, and in a little time he got up again, and then Caius did nowary oppose his going out, as thinking that he went out to perform some necessaries of nature. And Asprenas, the equestrian, who was very fond of Caius, and had given him much money, made him go to the bath, and to dinner, and then to come in again, as desirous that what had been resolved on might be brought to a conclusion immediately.

The equestrians, who associated placed themselves in order, as the time would permit them, and they were obliged to labor hard, that the place which was appointed should not be left by them; but they had an indignation at the conduct of those who were appointed to do about should be put off any longer, for it was already about the ninth hour of the day, and Cherea, upon Caius's sorrowing so long, had a great mind to go in, and fall upon him in his seat. So heretofore they could not go without much bloodshed, both of the senators, and of those of the equestrian order that were present; and although he knew this must happen, yet had he a great mind to do so, as thinking it a right method of weakening the power of the state, to all, at the expense of such as might perish at the same time. And as they were just going back into the entrance to the theatre, word was brought them that Caius was arisen, whereby a tumult arose: but hereupon they perceived the threataway the crowd, under pretense as if Caius was angry at them, but in reality as desirous to have a quiet place, that should have none in it. So they defended him, while they set about his slaughter. Now Claudius, his uncle, was gone out before, and Marcus Vinius, his sister's husband, as also Valerius of Asia; whom, though they had had such a mind to put out of their way all the senators, yet he knew that they could not be done so to do; then followed Caius, with Paulus Arruntius; and because Caius was now gotten within the palace, he left the direct road, along which those his servants stood that were in waiting; but then, in the night, he designed to have gone before; Caius turned aside into a private narrow passage, in order to go to the place for bathing, as also in order to take a view of the boys that came out of Asia, who were sent thence, partly to sing hymns in those mysteries which were now celebrated, and partly to dance in the Pyrrhic way of dancing upon the theatres. So Cherea met him, and asked him for the watchword; upon Caius's giving him one of his ridiculous words, he believed it to be a word of that kind, I esteem him the greatest of all fools, in pleasing himself in his spite against Caius, rather than immediately procuring safety to himself and to his confederates from the dangers they were in, - Pontonius says, Caius was slain about the seventh hour of the day; Josephus about the ninth. The writer of the narration favors Josephus.

because there might many things still happen for helping Caius' escape, if he had not already given up the ghost; for certainly Cherea would have regard, not so much to the punishment of Caius, as to the addiction himself and his friends were in, while it was in his power, after such success, to keep silent, and to escape the wrath of Caius' defenders, and not to leave it to uncertainty whether he should gain the end he aimed at, and the boldness and undertaking to act as if he had a mind to ruin himself, and lose the opportunity that lay before him; but every body may guess, as he pleases about this matter. However, Caius was staggered with the first blow, and being that he was so unmindful of the sword falling in the middle between the shoulder and the neck, was hindered by the first bone of the breast from proceeding any farther. Nor did he either cry out, in such astonishment was he, nor did he call out for any of his friends; whether it were that he had no confidence in them, or that his mind was otherwise disorder'd, but he groaned under the pain he endured, and presently went forward and fled; when Corsican Saulus, or some of them, being of the same mind so to do, thrust him down upon his knee, where many of them stood round about him, and struck him with their swords, and they cried out, saying: "This was a man that did not give us a second look at him again; but all agree that Aquila gave him the finishing stroke, which directly killed him. But one may justly ascribe this act to Cherea; for although many concurred in the act itself, yet will you not give it to any of those that did it, but to the first before all the rest to prepare for it, and was the first man that boldly spoke of it to the rest; and upon their admission of what he said about it, he got the dispersed conspirators together; he persuaded them, if they gave him the mouth of the act, and, by suggesting good advice, showed himself far superior to the rest, and made obliging speeches to them, insomuch that he even compell'd them all to go on, who otherwise would have stood clear of it. He did not suffer them to use his sword in hand, he appeared first of all ready so to do, and gave the first blow in this virtuous slaughter; he also brought Caius easily into the power of the rest, and made a sort of fire of him, now he had the mouth of the act, but just to ascribe all that the rest did, to the advice, and bravery, and labors of the hands of Cherea."

Thus did Caius come to his end, and lay dead, by the many wounds which had been given him. Now Cherea, and his associates, upon Caius' slaughter, saw that it was impossible for them to save themselves, if they should all go the same way, partly on account of the astonishment they were under: for it was no small danger they had incurred by killing an emperor, who was honored and loved by the madness of the people, especially when the soldiers were likely to be a bloody inquisition after his murderers. The passages also were narrow wherein the work was done, which were also crowded with a great multitude of Caius' attendants, and of such of the soldiers as were of the emperor's guard, that day, with him. It was that they went by other ways, and came to the house of Germanicus, the father of Caius, whom they had now killed, (which house adjoined to the palace; for while the edifice was one, it was built along; and this was with very judicious persons who had been emperors, and those parts bore the names of those that built them, or the name of him who had begun to build any of its parts.) So they got away from the insult of the multitude, that was for the inquisition of them, as danger, that is, so long as the misfortunes which had overtaken the emperor was not known. The Germans were the first that perceived that Caius was slain. The Germans were Caius' guard, and carried the name of the country whence they were chosen, and composed the Celtic legion. The men of that country are naturally passionate, which is commonly the temper of some other of the barbarous nations also, as not being usual to consider much about what they do; they are of robust bodies, and fall upon their enemies as soon as ever they are attacked by them; and which way soever they go, they perform great exploits. We must therefore, the story is understood that Caius was slain, they were very sorry for it, because they did not use their reason in judging about public affairs, but measured all by the advantages themselves received, Caius being beloved of them, because of the money he gave them, by which he had purchased their kindness to him: so they drew their swords, and Sabinus led them on. He was one of the tribunes, not by the means of the virtuous actions of his progenitors, for he had a generous soul; but he had obtained that post in the army by his having a robust body. So these Germans marched along the houses in quest of Caesar's murderers, and cut Asprenus to pieces, because he was the first man that fell for Caius, and it was that the blood of the sacrifice stained, as I have said already, and which foretold that this his meeting the soldiers would not be for his good. And these men must not be estimated from the principal sobriety of the city, and could show many generals of armies among his ancestors, but they paid no regard to his dignity; yet were he of such great strength, that he wrested the sword of those who stript him of the ends of his hands, and appeared plainly not to be willing to die without a struggle for his life, until he was surrounded by a great number of assailants, and died by the multitude of the wounds which they gave him. The third day after he died, a senator, and a few others with him. He did not meet with these Germans by chance, as the rest did before, but came to show his hatred to Caius, and because he loved to see Caius lie dead with his own eyes, and to be pleased in that sight; for Caius had dishonored Anteius' father, who was of the same name with himself, and, being not satisfied with that, he sent out his soldiers, and slew him: so he was come to rejoice at the sight of this man, new dead, and now all in a tumult, when he was aiming to hide himself, he could not escape that accurate search which the Germans made, while they barbarously slew those that they were not guilty, and this equally also. And thus were these [three] persons slain. 16. But when the rumor that Caius was slain reached the theatre, they were astonished at it, and could not believe it; even some that entered attained his destruction with great pleasure, and were more desirous of its happening than almost any other satisfaction that could come to them. They were under such a fear, that they could not believe it. There were also those who greatly trusted it, because they were unwilling that any such thing should come to Caius, nor could believe it, though it were ever so true, because they thought no man could possibly have so much power as to kill Caius. The most of them were the women and the children, and the slaves, and some of the soldiery. This last sort had taken his pay, and in a manner tyrannized with him, and had abused the best of his citizens, in being subservient to his unjust command. The advantages and advantages to themselves; but for the women, and the youth, they had been inveigled with shows, and the fightings of the gladiators, and certain distributions of flesh among them, which the law was to deprive, but were desired for the pleasing of the multitude, but in reality to satiate the barbarous cruelty and madness of Caius. The slaves also were sorry, because they were by Caius allowed to accuse and to despise

ed to do to the spectators, which would have been the greatest instance of cruelty. And so it appeared to even these savages, when they had once fixed the heads of those that were slain. With this the spectators were so exasperated, that they fancied all the money their masters had, they might soon obtain both riches and liberty, as the rewards of their accusations, because the reward of these informers was the eighth part of the criminal's substance. As to the nobles, although the report appeared credible to some of them, either because they knew of the plot beforehand, or because they wished it might be true; however, they concealed not only the joy they had at the accusation of it, but that they hated, say things at all about it. These last acted so out of the fear they had, that if the report proved false, they should be punished, for having so soon let men know their minds. But those that knew Caius was dead, because they were partners with the conspirators, they concealed all still more cautiously, as not knowing one another's minds; and fearing lest they should speak of it to some of those to whom the continuance of tyranny was advantageous; and, if Caius should prove to be alive, they might be informed against, and punished. And another report went about, that although Caius had been wounded indeed, yet was not he dead, but still alive, and under the physicians. Nove had one looked upon by another as faithful enough to be trusted, and to whom any one would open his mind; for he was either a friend to Caius, and therefore suspected to favor his tyranny; or, he was one that had the physicks for his secret, and was supposed to deserve the less credit, because of his illwill to him. Nay, it was said by some, (and this indeed was that deprived the nobility of their hopes, and made them sad,) that Caius was in a condition of danger because of the danger he was in, and took no care of healing his wounds, but was gotten away into the market-place, and, bloody as he was, was making a harvest to the people. And these were the conjectural reports of those that were so unreasonable as to endeavor to raise tumults, which they turned different ways, according to the opinions of the hearers. Yet did they not leave their seats, for fear of being caught, but they should go on till before the rest; for they should not be sentenced according to the real intention with which they went out, but according to the supposals of the accusers, and of the judges.

But the multitude of Germans had surrounded the theatre, with their swords drawn; all the spectators looked for nothing but death, and at every one's coming in a fear arose upon them, as if they were to be cut in pieces immediately; and in great distress they were, as neither having courage enough to go out of the theatre, nor believing themselves safe from dangers if they tarried there. And when the Germans came upon them, the cry was so great, that the theatre was filled with the cries of the multitude of the spectators to the soldiers; pleading that they were entirely ignorant of every thing that related to such seditious contrivances, and that if there were any sedition raised, they knew nothing of it. They were afraid that they would spare them, and not punish those that had not the least hand in such bold crimes as belonged to other persons, while they neglected to search after such as had really done whatsoever it was they wished to speak of. This made these people appeal to God, and deplore their inactivity with shedding of tears, and beating their faces, and said every thing that the most imminent danger, and the utmost concern for their lives, could dictate to them. There was hope that they would be favored, and made them repent of what they mind.

The rewards proposed by the Roman laws to informers were sometimes an eighth part of the criminal's and that he intended to claim the government, unwillingly indeed in appearance, but in reality by his own free consent, stood up in the senate, and without being disarmed, made an exhortatory oration to them, and such a one indeed as was fit for men of freedom and generosity, and spoke thus:

2. "Although it be a thing incredible, O Romans, because of the great length of time, that so unexpected an event hath happened, yet are we now in possession of liberty. How long indeed this will last is uncertain, and lies at the disposal of the gods, whose power it is as sufficient to make us rejoice, and be happy for the present, although we may soon be deprived of it; for one hour is sufficient to those that are exercised in virtue, wherein we may live with our free consent, upheld by our own country, now free, and governed by such laws as this country once flourished under. As for myself, I cannot remember our former time of liberty, as being born after it was gone; but I am, discoursed, as filled with joy at the thoughts of our present freedom. I also esteem those who were born and bred up in that our former liberty, happy men, and that those men who are not worthy to be the sons of themselves, who have given us a taste of it in this age; and I heartily wish, that this quiet enjoyment of it, which we have at present, might continue to all ages. However, this single day is sufficient to make us confident that we are in the life of Caesar, who put an end at this time an air of great assurance, and appeared with great magnanimity, as if the administration of the public affairs were already devolved upon them.

CHAP. II.

How the Senators determined to restore the Democracy; but the Soldiers were for preserving the Monarchy. Concerning the Slaughter of Caesar's Wife and Daughter. A Character of Caesar's Morals.

1. When the public affairs were in this post, the Senators, and the Senate, decided to take out of his house: for the soldiers had a meeting together, and when they had debated about what was to be done, they saw that a democracy was incapable of managing such a vast weight of public affairs, and that if it should be set up, it would not be for their advantage; and if in any one of those already in the government should obtain the supreme power, it would in all respects be to their grief, if they were not assisting to him in casting off them, they might be the first toRight for them, while the public affairs were unsettled, to choose Claudius emperor, who was uncle to the deceased Caesar, and of a superior dignity and worth to every one of those that were assembled together in the senate, both on account of the virtues of his ancestors, and of the learning he had acquired by his education, and who, if once settled in the empire, would reward them according to their deserts, and bestow largesses upon them. These were their considerations, and they executed the same immediately.

Claudius was therefore seised upon suddenly by thesoldiers. But Cæsar Seæus Saturinus, although he understood that Claudius was seised,
He was also able, off-hand and readily, to give answers to compositions made by others, of considerable length and accuracy. He was also more skilful in persuading others to very great things than any one else, and this from his natural affability of temper, which had been improved by much exercise and painstaking; for as he was the grandson of the brother of Tiberius, whose successor he was; this was a strong inden- cement to the acquiring of Tiberius soared after the highest pitch of that sort of reputation; and Caius soared after the like glory for eloquence, being induced thereto by the letters of his friends and the emperor. He was also among the first rank of free citizens. But the advantages he received from his learning did not counterbalance the mischief he brought upon himself, in the exercise of his authority; so difficult it is for the topics of virtue that is necessary for a wise man, who have the absolute power to do what they please without control. At the first he got himself such friends as were in all respects the most worthy, and was greatly beloved by them; who insti- tuted their zealous application to the learning and to the glorious actions of the best men; but when he became insolent towards them, they laid aside the kindness they had for him, and began to hate him; from which hatred came that plot which they raised against him, and wherein he perished.

CHAP. III.

How Claudius was seized upon, and brought out of his House, and brought to the Camp, and how the Senate sent an Embassage to him.

1. Now Claudius, as I said above, went out of that way along which Caius was gone; and, as the family that was so mighty, and by a sad accident of the murder of Caius, he was in great distress how to save himself, and was found to have hidden himself in a certain narrow place, though he had other things to do, and was hurried by any dangers, besides the dignity of his birth; for, while he was a private man, he beheld himself with moderation, and was contented with his present fortune, applying himself to learning. Other men, and especially the Germans, who inaugi- rating himself entirely clear from every thing that might bring on any disturbance. But as at this time the multitude were under a consternation, and the whole palace was full of the soldiers' madness, and he was under the like fear and disorder with private persons, the band called pretorian, which was the purest part of the army, was in consultation what was to be done at this juncture. Now all those that were at this consultation, had little regard to the punishment Caius had suffered, because he justly deserved such his fortune; but they were rather considering their own circumstances, how they might take the best care of themselves, especially while the Germans were strong in punishing the murderers of Caius; which yet was rather done to gratify their own savage temper, than for the good of the public: all which things disturbed Claudius, who was afraid of his own safety, and this particularly because he saw the heads of Aspersas and his partners carried about. His station had been on a certain elevated place, whither a few steps led him, and whither he had retired in the dark by himself. But when God raised up a man that belonged to the palace, saw him, but did not well know by his countenance who he was, 1

1 This Caius was the son of that excellent person Germanicus, who was the son of Drusus; the brother of Tiberius the emperor.

2 This first place Claudius came to was inhabited, and called Aspernas, as Sestinon here informs us from Sestinon, in Claud. chap. x.
and in the vexation they bring both upon men's estates and their wives; but they look upon that to be their principal advantage, when they can utterly overthrow the entire families of their enemies, while all lovers of liberty and the enemies of tyranny. Nor can those that patiently endure what miseries they bring on them, gain their friendship; for as they are conscious of the abundant mischiefs they have brought on these men, they know, if they have borne their hard fortunes, they cannot but be sensible what evils they have done, and thence only depend on security from what they are suspicious of. If it may be in their power to take them quite out of the way, they prefer that route; since, more than ten clear of such great misfortunes, and are only accountable to one another, (which form of government affords us the best assurance of our present concord, and promises us the best security) rather than any hazard of danger to come upon them; because they have now no lord set over them, who, without fear of punishment, so far as hath been done to the contrary, and had gained an uncontroulable power to take off those that freely declare their opinions. Nor has any thing so much contributed to this increase of tyranny as this vile counsel, and a timorous forbearance of contradicting the emperor's will; while men had an over great inclination to the sweetness of peace, and had learned to live like slaves; and as many of us as either heard of intolerable calamities that happened at a distance from us, or saw the miserable state of near us, out of the dread of dying virtuously, endured a death joined with the utmost infancy. We ought, then, in the first place, to decree the greatest honors we are able to those that have taken off the tyrant, especially Caius; for this one man with the assistance of the gods, hath by his counsel, and by his actions, been the procurer of our liberty. Nor ought we to forget him now we have recovered our liberty, who, under the foregone counsel of before, and beforehand hazarded himself for our liberties, but declined honors, and thereby freely declare, that he from the beginning acted with our approbation. And certainly it is a very excellent thing, when what becomes of freemen, to make these things requisite their benefactors, as this man hath been a benefactor to us all, though not at all like Caesar and Brutus, who slew Caesar Julius Cesar; for those men laid the foundations of sedition any from war in peace, and this most together with his slaughter of the tyrant, hath set our city free from all those sad miseries which arose from the tyranny."

And this was the purport of Sentius's oration, which was received with pleasure by the senators, and by as many of the equestrian order as were present. And now one Trebellius Maximus rose up hastily, and took off Sentius's finger a ring. Caius, whose name was a stone, with the image of Caius engraved upon it, and which, in his zeal in speaking, and his earnestness in doing what he was about, as it was supposed, he had forgotten to take off himself. This sculpture was broken immediately, and it was not far in the night, Chereas demanded of the consuls the watch-word, who gave him this word—Liberty. These facts were the subjects of admiration to them, and almost incredible; for it was a hundred years since the democracy had been laid aside, when this giving the watch-word returned to the consuls; for, before the city was subject to their soverain, they were the commanders of the soldiers. But, when Chereas had received that watchword, he delivered it to those who were on the senate's side, which were four regiments, who esteemed the government without respect to names. And they have now got away with their tribunes. The people also now departed very joyful, full of hope and courage, having recovered their former Democracy, and were no longer under an emperor; and the consuls had made it a law to keep the senate in all the former authority, and to prevent them from having any other assembly without their consent. And now Chereas was very uneasy that Caius's daughter and wife were still alive, and that all his family did not perish with him; since it was left of them must be left for the ruin of the city, and of all such men as, in order to finish this matter with the utmost zeal, and in order to satisfy his hatred of Caius, he sent Julius Lupus, one of the tribunes, to kill Caius's wife and daughter. They proposed this office to Lupus, as to be a punishment, that he might be so far a partaker of this murder of the tyrant, and might rejoice in the virtue of having assisted his fellow-citizens, and that he might make of his wife and daughter the noblest persons that were first in their designs against him. Yet did this action appear to some of the conspirators to be too cruel, as to this using such severity to a woman, because Caius did more indulge his own revenge than use her advice. In all this, he did; from which nature it was that the city was in such a desperate condition with the miseries that were brought on it, and the flower of the city was destroyed. But others accused her of having conspired with him to these things; and they ascribed all that Caius had done to her as the cause of it, and said she had given a portion to Caius, which had made him obnoxious to her, and had tied him down to love her by such vile contrivances. For Caius for this one man with him distracted, was become the author of all the mischiefs that had fallen the Romans, and that habitable world which was subject to them. So that at length it was determined that she must die; and that she should be kept alive at all cost, and that all should be avoided to have saved her; and Lupus was sent accordingly. Nor was there any delay made in executing what he went about, but he was subserivient to those that sent him on the first opportunity, and this conspired to, that might be done for the advantage of the people. So when he came into the palace, he found Cesonias, who was Caius's wife, lying by her husband's dead body, which also lay down on the ground, and that the consuls, in order to avoid the law allows to the dead, and all over herself be smeared with the blood of her husband's wounds, and bewailing the great affliction she was under, was begging her to avoid all the charge of Calus, as if he had not regarded what she had often told him beforehand; which words of hers were taken in a different sense from what was intended by him; and they were ambiguous by those that hear of them, and are still interpreted according to the different inclinations of people. Now some said that the words denoted, that she had advised him to leave off his designs, and made her example to the citizens, and to govern the public with moderation and virtue, lest he should perish by the same way, upon their using him as he had used them.

*In this oration of Sentius Sartorius, we may see the great value virtuous men put upon public liberty, and the sad misery they underwent, while they were tyrants. See also the consuls and the emperor, as in the case of Pompey's own short but pithy reflection at the end of the chapter: "Be difficult," says he, "it is for those to obtain the virtues that is necessary to a wise man, who have the absolute power to do what they please without control." *

The means we learn that, in the opinion of Sartorius, the sovereign authority of the consuls and senate had been taken away from Caius, A. D. 41, or in the 90th year before the Christian era, when the first triumvirate began under Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus.
But some said, that, as certain words had passed concerning the conspirators, she desired Caius to make no delay, but immediately to put them all to death, and whether they were guilty or not, and that thereby he would be clear of any danger; and that this was what she re-approached him for, when she advised him so to do; but he was too slow and tender in the matter. And this was what Cæsaria said, and what the others also accused him of. As for Lupa, she, seeing Caius’s dead body, and persuaded him to come nearer with lamentation and tears: and as she perceived that Lupa was in disorder, and approached her in a kind of frenzy, she held herself in herself, as she was well aware for what purpose he came, and stretched out her naked throat, and that very cheerfully to him, bewailing her case, and not uttering a single syllable of her life, and bid- ding him not to boggle any longer, as they had only resolved upon waiting to her. So she boldly received her death’s wound at the hand of Lupa, as did the daughter after her. So Lupa made haste to inform Ceres of what he had done.

5. This was the end of Caius, after he had reigned four years within four months. He was, even before he came to be emperor, ill-natured, and one that had arrived at the utmost pitch of wickedness; he had branded his whole body with calumny; greatly affected by every terrible accident, and on that account of a very murderous disposition, where he durst show it. He enjoyed his exorbitant power to this only purpose, to injure those who least deserved it. By his unreasonable insolence, and got his wealth by murder and injustice. He labored to appear above regarding either what was divine or agreeable to the laws, but was a slave to the commandments of the prophet, under whom he employed his efforts. He was too shamed, and punished, that he esteemed more honorable than what was virtuous. He was unkind of his friends, how intimate soever, and though they were persons of any kind of the eminence of his time, and angry at any of them, he would inflict punishment upon them on the smallest occasions, and esteemed every man that endeavored to lead a virtuous life his enemy. And whatsoever he commanded or ordered, and with any absolute authority, he did with the greatest indignation. How that he had in criminal conversation with his own sister; from which occasion chiefly it was also, that a bitter hatred first sprang up against him among the crowd of people. He was also long known of a long time; and so this provoked men to distrust him, and to hate him that was guilty of it. And for any great or royal work that he ever did, which might be for the present and for future ages, nobody can speak advantage to the navigation. Yet was not this work brought to perfection by him, but was the one-half of it left imperfect, by reason of his want of application to it; the cause of which was this, that he lived too much in studies about useless matters, and that by spending his money upon such pleasures as concerned no one’s benefit but his own, he could not exert his abilities in things that were undesirably of great consequence.—Other accounts say, they were all very much acquainted with the Greek tongue, as well as his own country or Roman language.

He was also able, off hand and readily, to give answers to compositions made by others, of considerable length and accuracy. He was also more skilful in persuading others to very great things than any one else, and this from a natural affability of temper, which had been improved by much exercise and painstaking; for as he was the grandson of the brother of Tiberius, whose successor he was; this was a strong incitement to him by the letters of his kinsman and his emperor. He was also of a very liberal mind to his fellow citizens. But the advantages he received from his learning did not counterbalance the mischief he brought upon himself, in the exercise of his authority; so difficult it is for those to obtain the virtue that is necessary for a wise man; for they have the absolute power to do whatever they please without control. At the first he got himself such friends as were in all respects the most worthy, and was greatly beloved by them, while he instilled their opinions upon them and the danger and to the glorious actions of the best men; but when he became insolent towards them, they laid aside the kindness they had for him, and when he was to be king in them; from which hatred came that plot which they raised against him, and wherein he perished.

CHAP. III.

How Claudius was seized upon, and brought out of his House, and brought to the Camp, and how the Senators sent an Embassage to him.

1. Now Claudius, as I said above, went out of that way along which Caius was gone; and, as the family of the house of Drusus, the brother of Tiberius was the sad accident of the murder of Caius, he was in great distress how to save himself, and was found to have hidden himself in a certain narrow place, though he had no other occasion for suspicion of any danger, besides the dignity of his birth; for while he was a private man, he behaved himself with moderation, and was contented with his present fortune, applying himself to learning, and especially to that of the Greeks, and keeping himself from the company of tumult and of riot, because he thought it might bring on any disturbance. But as at this time the multitude were under a consternation, and the whole palace was full of the soldiers’ madness, and the very guards seemed under the like fear and disorder with private persons, the band called pretorian, which was the purest part of the army, was in consultation what was to be done at this juncture. Now all those that were at this consultation, had little regard to the punishment Caius had suffered, because he justly deserved such his fortune; but they were rather considering their own circumstances, how they might take the best care of themselves, especially while the Germans were upon the camp and advantage to the navigation. Yet was not this work brought to perfection by him, but was the one-half of it left imperfect, by reason of his want of application to it; the cause of which was this, that he lived too much in studies about useless matters, and that by spending his money upon such pleasures as concerned no one’s benefit but his own, he could not exert his abilities in things that were undesirably of great consequence.—Other accounts say, they were all very much acquainted with the Greek tongue, as well as his own country or Roman language.

1. This Cæsarius was the son of that excellent person Germanicus, who was the father of Drusus, the brother of Tiberius the emperor.

3. This first place Claudius came to was inhabited, and called Hellenon; but we here inform us from Suetonius, in Cæsæar, chap. x.
and in the veneration they bring both upon men's estates and their wives; but they look upon that to be their principal advantage, when they can utterly overthrow the entire families of their enemies, and how the greater number of the enemies of tyranny. Nor can those that patiently endure what miseries they bring on them, gain their friendship; for as they are conscious of the abundant mischiefs they have brought on these men, and how unanimously these have borne their hard fates, they cannot but be sensible what evils they have done, and hence only depend on security from what they are suspicious of. If it may be in their power to take them quite out of the world. Since, they are now got clear of such great misfortunes, and are only accountable to one another, (which form of government allows us the best assurance of our present concord, and promises us the best security from within us, and of and to the laws. Moreover, in order to finish this matter with the utmost zeal, and in order to satisfy his hatred of Caesar, he sent Julius Lepus, one of the tribunes, to kill Caesar's wife and daughter. They proposed this office to Lepus, as to aieron of Clement, that he might be so far a partaker of this murder of the tyrant, and might rejoice in the virtue of having assisted his fellow-citizens, and that he might appear to have been a partaker with those that were the objects of the great and just resentment; that did this action appear to some of the conspirators to be too cruel, as to this using such severity to a woman, because Caesar did more indulge his own ill-nature, than use her advice in all that he did, and that it was difficult to conceive how it was in such a desperate condition with the miseries that were brought on it, and the flower of the city was destroyed. But others accused her of giving her consent to these things; nay, they accused her of doing it by command of Caesar, which, being nothing but a threat, was principally joined with the cause of it, and said she had given a potion to Caesar, which had made him obnoxious to her, and had tied him down to love her by such evil methods; insomuch that she, having rendered him distracted, was become the author of all such mischiefs that had befallen the Romans, and that habitable world which was subject to them. So that at length it was determined that she must die, nor could those of the contrary opinion at all prevail. She was sent accordingly. Nor was there any delay made in executing what he went about, but he was subordinate to those that sent him on the pretence of the duties, and of doing what might be done for the advantage of the people. So when he was come into the palace, he found Cesonia, who was Caesar's wife, lying by her husband's dead body, which also lay down on the ground, and at the injunction of all such things as the law allows to the dead, and all over herself smeared with the blood of her husband's wounds, and bewailing the great affliction she was under, her daughter lying by her also; and nothing else was heard in the ears of the people but the complaint of Calus, as if he had not regarded what she had often told him of beforehand; which words of hers were taken in a different sense even at that time, and are now esteemed equally true and just. But now, before the last word is still interpreted according to the different inclinations of people. Now some said that the words denoted, that she had advised him to leave off his mad behavior and his barbarous cruelty to the citizens, and to pass the line of his just limitation and virtue, lest he should perish by the same way, upon their using him as he had used them.

In this oration of Sentius Saturinus, we may see the great value virtuous men put upon public liberty, and the sad misery they underwent, while they were tyrannized over by such emperors as Calus. See Josephus' own account of his death on the 27th of May, A.D. 14. At the end of the page.
BOOK XIX.—CHAP. III.

But some said, that, as certain words had passed concerning the conspirators, she desired Caius to make no delay, but immediately to put them all to death, and this whether they were guilty or not, and that thereby he would be out of the fear of any danger; and that she had reproached him for, when she advised him so to do; but he was too slow and tender in the matter.

And this was what Cæsaria said, and what she was about to do. But she saw Lupus approach, she shewed him Caius's dead body, and persuaded him to come nearer with lamentation and tears: and as she perceived that Lupus was in disorder, and approached her in order to succour and comfort her, and to help herself, she was well aware for what purpose he came, and stretched out her naked throat, and that very cheerfully to him, bewailing her case, take one utterly despairing of her life, and bidding a spending up her body, she was too industrious a man, to that account of a very murderous disposition, where he durst show it. He enjoyed his exorbitant power to this only purpose, to injure those who least deserved it, with unreasonable cruelty, and got indulgence by murder and injustice. He laboured to appear above regarding either what was divine or agreeable to the laws, but was a slave to the commendations of the populace; and whatsoever he determined was esteemed more honorable than what was virtuous. He was unmindful of his friends, how intimate soever, and though they were persons of reputation, yet he would have them, for he was once angry at any of them, he would inflict punishment upon them on the smallest occasions, and esteemed every man that endeavoured to lead a virtuous life his enemy. And whatsoever he commanded was the end of all; after he had given dictation to his inclinations: whence it was that he had criminal conversation with his own sister; a from which occasion chiefly it was also, that a bitter hatred first sprung up against him among the people, and was known of long time; and this provoked men to distrust him, and to hate him that was guilty of it. And for any great or royal work that he ever did, which might be for the present and for future good of the empire, and to the punishment of such as were unfaithful and disorderly, but only the haven that he made about Rhegium and Sicily, for the reception of the ships that brought corn from Egypt; which was indeed a work without dispute very great in itself, and of very great advantage; and when this work was brought to perfection by him, but was the one-half of it left imperfect, by reason of his want of application to it; the cause of which was, that he employed his studies about useless matters, and that by spending his money too much on such pleasures as concerned no one's benefit but his own, he could not exert his liberality in things that were undoubtedly of great consequence.—Otherwise he was an excellent orator, and thoroughly acquainted with the Greek tongue, as well as with his own country or Roman language.

He was also able, of hand and readiness, to give answers to compositions made by others, of considerable length and accuracy. He was also more skilful in persuading others to very great things than any one else, and this from a natural affability of temper, which he increased by much exercise and painstaking; for as he was the grandson of the brother of Tiberius, whose successor he was; this was a strong incen-

ment to his acquiring of learning, because Tiberius spared not the expense that sort of reputation; and Caius aspired after the like glory for eloquence, being induced thereto by the letters of his kinsman and his emperor. He was also his own arbiter, and considered every thing there was a power, whether they have the absolute power to do what they please without control. At the first he got himself such friends as were in all respects the most worthy, and was greatly beloved by them, while he imitated their states, and they that had been his opponents, and to the glorious actions of the best men; but when he became insolent towards them, they laid aside the kindness they had for him, and began to hate him; from which hatred came that plot which they raised against him, and wherein he perished.

CHAP. III.

How Claudius was seized upon, and brought out of his House, and brought to the Camp, and how the Senate sent an Embassay to him.

1. Now Claudius, as I said above, went out of that way along which Caius was gone; and, as the family was in a mighty disorder upon the said accident, the very emperor of the state of Claudius was in great distress how to save himself, and was found to have hidden himself in a certain narrow place, though he had no other occasion for suspicion of any danger, besides the character of his birth; for while he was a private man, he behaved himself with moderation, and was contented with his present fortune, applying himself to learning, and especially to that of the Greeks, and keeping himself from company, because it might bring on any disturbance. But as at this time the multitude were under a consternation, and the whole palace was full of the soldiers' madness, and the very emperor's guards seemed to be under the like disorder, and by his sons, the hand called pretorian, which was the purest part of the army, was in consultation what was to be done at this juncture. Now all those that were at this consultation, had little regard to this calamity, because they justly deserved such his fortune; but they were rather considering their own circumstan-nces, how they might take the best care of themselves, especially while the Germans were busy with the war, and they with the orators in punishing. Velleius was rather done to gratify their own savage temper, than for the good of the public: all which things disturbed Claudius, who was afraid of his own safety, and this particularly because he saw the hands of Asper had his palace carried about. His station had been on a certain elevated place, whither a few steps led him, and whither he had retired in the dark by himself. But when Gratus, who was one of the soldiers that belonged to the palace, saw him, but did not well know by his countenance who he was, because it was dark, though he could well judge that it was a man who was privately there on some design, he came nearer to him, and when Claudius desired that he would retire, he discovered who he was, and owned him to be Claudius. So he answered, "If this is Germanicus, come on, let us choose him for our emperor." But when Claudius saw that they were making preparations for taking him away by force, and was afraid they would kill him, as they had killed Caius, he bade them spare him, putting them in mind how quietly he had demeaned himself, and that he was unacquainted with what had been done. Hereupon Gratus smiled upon him, and took him by the right hand, and then let him go on, and these few thoughts of saving yourself, while you ought to have greater thoughts, even of obtaining the empire, which the gods, out of their concern for the habitable world, by taking Caius out of the way, are therefore, and accept of the throne of thy ancestors." So they took him up and carried him, because he was not then able to go on foot, such was his dread and his joy at what was told him.

2. This Gratus was already heard of before about Gratus a great number of the guards; and when they saw Claudius carried off, they looked with a sad countenance, as supposing that he was to be executed for the mischiefs that had been brought about; but while yet Gratus thought a man who never meddled with public affairs all his life long, and one that had met with no contemptible dangers under the reign of Caius; and some of them thought it reasonable that the consul, who was of such a conduct, should not have that greatest honor decreed to him that a free people could bestow, and by subjecting himself to the law, would obtain this branch of commendation, that he acted like a man of virtue, but they gave him to understand that they would act foolishly, and learn no wisdom by Caius's death, they would not permit him to go on; that a great part of the army was got together for them, with plenty of means, and that they would make use of: that good hope was a great matter in such cases, as was also good fortune, and that the gods would never assist any others but those that undertook it with virtue and goodness, who can be no other than such as fight for the liberty of their country."  4. Now the ambassadors, Veranius and Brocchus, who were both of them tribunes of the army, were the first which came to the palace, and finding the Emperor dead, they fell down upon their knees, begged of him, that he would not throw the city into wars and misfortunes; but when they saw what a multitude of soldiers encompassed a. d guarded Claudius, and that the gods should not make use of them in comparison of them, perfectly inconsiderable, they added, that "if he did desire the government, he should accept of it as given by the senate; that he would prosper better, and be happier, if he came to it, not by the injustice, but by the good will of those that bestowed it upon him."

CHAP. IV.

What things King Agrippa did for Claudius, and how Claudius, when he had taken the government, commanded the murderers of Caesar to be slain.

1. Now Claudius, though he was sensible and that an insolent manner the senate had sent to him, yet did he, according to their advice, behave himself for the present with moderation; but not so far that he could not recover himself out of his fright, so as he was encouraged [to an assault] partly by the holiness of the soldiers, and partly by the persuasion of king Agrippa, who exhorted him not to let such a domination slip out of his hands, when it came thus to him of his own accord. Now, this king Agrippa, sues us that, by a decree of the senate, the surname of Germanicus was bestowed upon Druses, and his posterity also. In Claud, ch. i.
with relation to Caesar, did what became one that had been so much honored by him; for he embraced Caesar's body after he was dead, and laid it upon a bed, and covered it as well as he could, and went out to the guards, and told them that Caesar was still alive, but he said that they should call for physicians, since he was very ill of his wounds. But when he had learned that Claudius was carried away violently by the soldiers, he rushed through the crowd to him, and when the soldiers were about to resign up the government to the senate, he encouraged him, and desired him to keep the government; but when he had said this to Claud- ius, he retired home. And upon the senate's sending him a commission, he anointed him with oint- ment, as if he had lately accompanied his wife, and had dismissed her, and then came to them: he also asked of the senators what Clau- dius had no mind to, but he said that nothing was to receive what was most agreeable to them; for that those who grasp at government, will stand in need of weapons, and soldiers to guard them, unless they will set up without any preparation for it, and so fall into the error of those who said that "they would bring them weapons in abundance, and money, and that as to an army, a part of it was already collected together for them, and they would raise a larger one by giving the senate what was due to them; and as this was what the senators; may you be able to compass what you have a mind to; yet will I immediately tell you my thoughts, because they tend to your preser- vation: take notice, then, that the army which you command, and which Claudius hath to contend in warlike affairs: but our army will be no better than a rude multitude of raw men, and those such as have been unexpectedly made free from slavery, and are uncertain whether to fight against those that are skillful in war, with men who know not so much as how to draw their swords. So that my opinion is, that we should send some persons to Claudius, to persuade him to be with us, and I am ready to be one of your ambassadors."

2. Upon this speech of Agrippa, the senate complied with him, and he was sent among others, and privately informed Claudius of the discourse that had been made to the guards, to answer them in a somewhat commanding strain, and as one invested with dignity and authority. Accordingly, Claudius said to the ambassadors, that "he did not wonder the senate had not mind to have an emperor set up, because they had been harassed by the barbarity of those that had formerly been at the head of their affairs; but that they should taste of an equitable government under him, and moderate discipline. And when the soldiers asked how many they intended to dictate to them, he said that the guards every man five thousand drachmee splice," and a proportionable quantity to their captains, and promised to give the same to the rest of the armies wherever they were. 3. And now the consuls called the senate to

*This number of drachmee was distributed to each private soldier, or to each man of the guards, the number being distributed to all, or at least to a number of soldiers, or at least to a number of guardsmen, as many as there were in the army, and it was distributed to them in order to prevent them from deserting.

the temple of Jupiter the Conquer or, while it was still night; but some of those senators concealed themselves in the city, being uncertain what to do, upon the hearing of this summons, and some of them went out of the city to their own farms, as foreseeing whether the public affairs were going, and despairing of liberty; nay, these supposed it much better for them to be slaves without danger to themselves, and to live a laborious and inactive life, than by claiming the dignity of free men, to expose themselves to the hazard of their own safety. However, a hundred, and no more, were gotten together; and as they were in consultation about the present posture of affairs, a sudden change was made, and into the city they ran the senators that were on their side, "desiring that the senate would choose them an emperor, and not bring the government into ruin by setting up a multitude of rulers." So they fully declared their sentiments to the people, and the public sentiment was to the same effect not to all, but to one; but they gave the senate leave to look out for a person worthy to be set over them, meacum, that now the affairs of the senate were much worse than before; because they had not only failed in the recovery of their liberty, which they boasted themselves of, but were in dread of Claudius also. Yet were there those that hastened after the government, both on account of the dignity of their families, and that accruing to them by their many friends. Marcus Minucius was illustrious, both by his own nobility, and by his having married Julia, the sister of Calus, who accordingly was very ready to claim the government, although the consul discouraged him, and another in proposing it: that Minucius also, who was one of Caesar's murderers, restrained Valerius of Asia from thinking of such things, and a prodigious slaughter there had been, if leave had been given to them to sacrifice themselves and oppose Claudius. There were also a considerable number of gladiators besides, and of those soldiers that kept watch by night in the city, and runners by day, who all run into the camp, insomuch, that those of those that put in for the government, some left off their pretensions in order to spare the city, and others out of fear for their own persons.

4. But as soon as it was day, Chera, and those that were with him, came into the senate, and attempted to make speeches to the soldiers. However, the multitude of those soldiers, when they saw that they were making signals for silence, and were in agreement with their own persons, as to not to speak to them, grew tumultuous, and would not let them speak at all, because they were all zealous to be under a monarchy; and they demanded of the senate one for their ruler, as not enduring any longer delays; but the senate hesitated about either their own governing, or how they should themselves be governed, while the soldiers would not admit them to govern, and the murderers of Caesar would not permit the senate to dictate to them. When the soldiers, in these circumstances, Chera was not able to contain the anger he had, and promised, that if they desired an emperor, he would give them one, if any one would come forward. So the ambassadors, upon their hearing this his answer, were dismissed. But Claudius discoursed with the army which was there gathered together, who took oath that they would persist in the matter. After which, Claudius made the guards every man five thousand drachmee. should commit the government to a fool." Yet were they not moved with his words, but drew their swords, and took up their ensigns, and went in Claudius to join in taking the guilt of fidelity to him. So the senate were left without any body to defend them, and the very consuls differed nothing from private persons. They were also under consternation and sorrow, men not knowing whether they would become objects of execrations, because Claudius was very angry at them; so they fell to reproaching one another, and reproached of what they had done. At which juncture Sabinius, one of Caius's murderers, threatened that he would shoot the midle of them, and kill himself, than consent to make Claudius emperor, and see slavery returning upon them: he also abused Cereas for loving his life too well, while he was now about to end his in the contempt of Caius, could think it a good thing to live, when, even by all that they had done for the recovery of their liberty, they found it impossible to do it. But Cereas said, he had no manner of doubt upon him about killing himself; that yet he would first sound the intention of Claudius before he did it.

5. These were the debates about the senate; but in the camp every body was crowding on all sides to pay their court to Claudius, and the other consuls of Rome. But Pompeius, as he was approached by the soldiers, as having rather exhorted the senate to recover their liberty; whereupon they drew their swords, and were going to assault him, and they had done it, if Claudius had not hindered. The soldiers, who snatched him as casual out of the danger he was in, and set him by him. But he did not receive that part of the senate which was with Quintus in the like honorable manner; say, some of them received blows, and were threatened as they came to salute Claudius; say, Aponius went away wounded, and they were all in danger. However, king Agrippa went up to Claudius, and desired he would treat the senators more gently; for if any mischief should come to the senate, he would have no others over whom to rule. Claudius complied with him, and called the senate together into the palace, and was carried thither himself through the city, while the soldiers, who were in the streets, and in the great vexation of the multitude; for Cereas and Sabinius, two of Cauis's murderers, went in the forefront of them, in an open manner, while Pollio, whom Claudius a little before had made consul of Cæsars, had written an epistle to Claudius, to forbid them to appear in public. Then did Claudius, upon his coming to the palace, get his friends together, and desired their sufferings about Cereas. They said, that the work he had done was but one, but they accused him that he did it of perfidiousness, and thought it just to inflict the punishment [of death] upon him, to discountenance such actions for the time to come. So Cereas was led to his execution, and

Lupus, and many other Romans with him; now it is reported that Cereas bore his calamity courageously, and this, not only by the firmness of his own behavior under it, but by the way he laid upon Lupus, who fell into tears; for when Lupus had laid his garment aside and complained of the cold, he said, that cold was never hurtful to lupus, [i. e. a wolf.] And as a great many men wished himself to be Pecorus, because of his brother, who was so wounded, when Cereas came to the place, he asked the soldier who was to be their executioner, whether his office was what he was used to; or whether this was the first time of his using his sword in that manner; for him to bring him that very sword with which he himself slew Caesar. So he was happily killed at one stroke. But Lupus did not meet with such good fortune in going out of the city when he was sent away; for the manners, and the blows levell'd at his neck, because he did not stretch it out boldly [as he ought to have done.]

6. Now, a few days after this, as the parental solemnities were near at hand, the Roman multitude mad gave usual obligations to their several ghosts, and put portions into the fire, in honor of Cereas, and besought him to be merciful to them, and not continue his anger against them for their ingratitude. And this was the end of the delivery of Pompeius. For he was, though Claudius not only set him at liberty, but gave him leave to retain his former command in the army; yet did he think it would be unjust in him to fail of performing his obligations to his friends. For he would be fell upon his sword, and killed himself, the wound reaching up to the very hilt of the sword.

CHAP. V.

How Claudius restored to Agrippa his Grandfather, the Kingdom of Asia, and augmented his Dominions: and how he published an edict in behalf of the Jews.

§ 1. Now, when Claudius had taken out of the way all those soldiers whom he suspected, which he did immediately, he published an edict, and therein confirmed the kingdom to Agrippa, which multitude had given him; and likewise commended the king highly. He also made an addition to it, of all that country over which Herod, who was his grandfather, had reigned, that is, Judæa and Samaria: and this he restored to him as due to himself; for he, by this means, altho' they lay at mount Libanus, he bestowed upon him, as out of his own territories. He also made a league with Agrippa, confirmed by oaths in the middle of the forum, in the city of Rome, where the just and equal donation by which he was possessed of, but gave him a certain part of Cilicia and Commagena: he also set Alexander Ly Bamachus, the alarbash, at liberty, who had been his old friend, and afterward to his commission from God, without any such commission, and confirmed the law of his grandfather, to have killed Abas's great men, and acquiescence, and priests, and forty-two of the kindness of Abasiah, 2 Kings x. 11-14. See Res. l. 4. I and Jerome Eusebius Eusebius picturesquely represented the executions of God's vengeance on those wicked tyrants, who had unjustly oppressed God's own people under their thraldom; who, as they appear to have done, in the Res. l. 15, 16. 20. Justin l. xiv. 6. Res. l. 32. See also p. 429.

I Here St. Luke is in some measure confirmed, when he says that, on the night of the verse, when the nunnery was in sacred and profound histories, and seem generally indications of divine vengeance on such murderers. Nor is it unworthy of notice, that such murderers of tyrants do suffer any thing, on such principles, in such a cruel manner, and as ready to involve the innocent with the guilty, which was represented in Agrippa, l. sec. 14, 15. and 16. but, as here, so justly deserved the divine vengeance upon them. Which seems to have been the case of Jehu also, when, besides the house of Ahab, for whose slaugther he had a mother, Antonia, but had been imprisoned by Caius, whose son [Marcus] married Bernice, the daughter of Agrippa. But when Marcus, Alexander's son was dead, who had married her when she was a virgin, Agrippa gave her in marriage to her eldest son, Agrippa, that Agrippa of Claudius the kingdom of Chalcis.

2. Now, about this time, there was a sedition between the Jews and the Greeks, at the city of Alexandria; for, when Caius was dead, the nation of the Jews thought, as they were their own laws and the old men of their state, and being bound to do. And I do charge them also to use this my kindness to them with moderation, and not to show a contempt of the superstitious observances of other nations, but to keep their own.

And I will also say that this decree of mine be engraved on tables by the magistrates of the cities and colonies, and on municipal places, both those within Italy, and those without, both kings and governors, by the means of the ambassadors, to have and to show them to the public for full thirty days, in such a place, whence it may plainly be read from the ground.

CHAP. VI.

What things were done by Agrippa at Jerusalem, when he was returned back into Judea; and what it was that Petronius wrote to the inhabitants of Doris, in behalf of the Jews.

1. Now Claudius Caesar, by these decrees of his which were sent to Alexandria, and to all the habitable earth, made known what opinion he had of the Jews. So he soon sent Agrippa away from Judea, and took his crown in his stead, not from the whole nation of the Jews, but from those presidents who have at divers times been sent thither; and that no dispute had been raised about those rights and privileges, even when Aquila was governor of Alexandria; and that the nation of the Jews, who had so much prosperity, and did not prohibit the making such ethnarchs, as willing that all men should be so subject to the Romans, as to continue in the observation of their own customs, and not be forced to transgress their own religion; but that, in the time of Caius, the Alexandrians became insolent towards the Jews that were among them, which Caius, out of his great madness and want of good understanding, reduced the nation of the Jews to poverty, because they would not transgress the religious worship of their country, and call him a god. I will, therefore, that the nation of the Jews be not deprived of their rights and privileges, on account of the exercise of the Caesars, but that the rights and privileges which they formerly enjoyed, be preserved to them, and that they may continue in their own customs. And I charge both parties to settle their matters that may arise after the promulgation of this edict.

And such were the contents of this edict on behalf of the Jews that were sent to Alexandria. But the edict that was sent into the other parts of the habitable earth was this which follows:—

as Tiberius Claudius Cesar Augustus Germanicus, high priest, tribune of the people, chosen consul the second time, ordains thus. Upon the petition of king Agrippa and king Herod, who are persons very dear to me, that they would grant the same rights and privileges should be preserved to the Jews which are in all the Roman empire, which I have granted to those of Alexandria, I very willingly comply therewith; and this I do in the name of theCaesar, not to be of the petitioners, but as judging those Jews for whom I have been petitioned worthy of such a favor, on account of their fidelity and friendship to the Romans. I think it also very just that so great a city should be deprived of such rights and privileges, since they were preserved to them under the great Augustus. It will, therefore, be fit to permit the Jews, who are in all the world under us, to keep their own religion, without being hindered to do so. And I do charge them also to use this my kindness to them with moderation, and not to show a contempt of the superstitious observances of other nations, but to keep their own.

Josephus shows both here and ch. vii. sect. 3, that he had a much greater opinion of king Agrippa than Simeon the learned rabbi, than the people of Canaan and Sebae. chap. vii. sect. 4, and chap. ix. sect. 3, and indeed than his double dealing between the senate and

ANTIOCH AND JERUSALEM.

3. When the king had settled the high priesthood under this manner, he returned the kindness which he had shown to the king of the Jews, for it had been shown him: he also made Silas the general of his forces, who was a man of wisdom and partaken with him in many of his troubles. But after a very little while, the young men of Doris preferring a rash attempt before pious, and being warned by an earnest exhortation, made a statue of Caesar into a synagogue of the Jews, and erected it there. This procedure of theirs greatly provoked Agrippa; for it plainly tended to the dissolution of the laws of his country. So he came without delay to Publius Petronius, who was the then president of Syria, and accused the people of Doris. Nor did he less respect what was done than did Agrippa: for he judged it a piece of impiety to transgress the laws that regulate the actions of men. So he wrote the following letter to the people of Doris in an angry strain:—"Publius Petronius, the president under Tiberius Claudius Caesar Augustus Germanicus, to the magistrates of Doris as follows: Since some of you have had the boldness, or madness rather, after the edict of Claudius Caesar Augustus Germanicus was published for permitting the Jews to observe the laws of their country, not to obey the magistrates, and act in entire opposition therein, as forbidding the Jews to assemble together in the synagogue, by removing Caesar's statue, and setting it up therein, and thereby have offended not only the Jews, but the emperor himself, whose statute they were bound to obey, even as they are commanded in his own temple than in a foreign one, where is the place of assembling together; while it is but a part of natural justice, that everyone should have the power over the place belonging particularly to those whom he is accustomed to observe; for nothing has so much to do with the acknowledgment of Caesar; to say nothing of my own determination, which it would be ridiculous to mention after the emperor's edict, which gives the Jews leave to make use of their own customs, as also gives order, that they enjoy equally the rights of citizens with the Greeks themselves. I therefore ordained, that Proculus Vitellius, the centurion, bring those men to me, who, contrary to Augustus's edict, have thereby attempted to do this thing, at which those very men, who appear to be of principal reputation among them, have an indignation also, and allege for themselves, that it was not done with their consent, but by the violence of the multitude, which may give an account of what hath been done. I also exhorted the principal magistrates among them, unless they have a mind to have this action esteemed to be done with their consent, to inform the centurion of those that were guilty of it, and take care that no handle be thence taken for raising a sedition or quarrel among them; which some seem to me to hunt after who encourage such doings; while both myself and King Agrippa, for whom I have the highest honor, have nothing more under our care, than that the nation of the Jews may have no occasion given them of getting together under the pretense of avenging themselves, and become furious, and that it may be brought publicly known what Augustus has resolved about this whole matter, I have subjoined those edicts which he hath lately caused to be published at Alexandria, and which, although they may be well known to the chief of you, yet I wish that among whom I have the highest honor, read them at that time before my tribunal, and pleaded that the Jews ought not to be deprived of those rights which Augustus had granted them. I therefore charge you, that you do not, for the time being, be ready for any occasion of sedition or disturbance, but that every one be allowed to follow their own religious customs." ever? for the king hath not let me keep those original marks of the good-will I bore him, which once had swayed me; but he hath so treated me, and that unjustly also. Does he think, that I can leave off that liberty of speech, which, upon the consciousness of my deserts, I shall use more loudly than before, and shall relate how many labors I have undergone for him, whereby I procured him deliverance and respect; as a reward for which I have borne the hardships of bonds and a dark prison. I shall never forget this, and in that, it was so that he exhibited the several antagonists, in order to please the spectators; no fewer indeed than seven hundred men to fight with seven hundred other men, and allotted all the malefactors he had for this exercise, that both the malefactors might receive their punishment, and that this operation of war might be a recreation in peace. And thus were these criminals all destroyed at once.

CHAP. VIII.

What other Acts were done by Agrippa until his Death: and after what manner he died.

§ 1. When Agrippa had finished what I have above related at Berytus, he removed to Tiberias, a city of Galilee. Now he was in great esteem among other kings. Accordingly, there came to him Antiochus, king of Commagena, and Sampsigeramus, king of Elymais, who was king of the Lesser Armenia, and Polemeus, who was king of Pontus, as also Herod his brother, who was king of Chalcis. All these were treated with agreeable entertainments, and after an obliging manner, and to see the greatness and nobleness of his mind, and to appear worthy of those respects which the kings paid to him, by coming thus to see him. However, while these kings stayed with him, Marcus, the president of Syria, came thither to him, and he spoke to him thus respecting that which was due to the Romans, went out of the city to meet him, as far as seven furlongs. But this proved to be the beginning of a difference between him and Marcus, for he took with him in his chariot those other kings as his assessors. But Marcus had a suspicion what the meaning could be of so great a friendship of these kings one with another, and did not think it an object of so close an alliance as might be for the interest of the Romans. He therefore sent some of his domestics to every one of them, and enjoined them to go their ways home without further delay. This was very ill taken by Agrippa, who said that he had rather die: and now he took the high priesthood away from Matthias, and made Eileoneus, the son of Cantherus, high priest in his stead.

§ 2. Now when Agrippa had reigned three years over all Judea, he came to the city Cesarea, which was formerly called Strato's Tower; and there he exhibited shows in honor of Cesar, upon his being informed that there was a certain festival celebrated to make vows for his safety. At which festival all the people went together of the principal persons, and such as were of dignity through his province. On the second day of which shows he put on a garment made wholly of silver, and of a contexture truly wonderful, and came into the theater early in the morning; at which time the silver of his garment being illuminated by the fresh reflection of the sun's rays upon it, shone out after a surprising manner, and was so resplendent as to spread a horror over those that looked intently upon him; and presently his flatterers cried out, one from one place, and another from another, (though not for his good,) that "he was a god;" and they added, "be thou merciful to us; for although we...

CHAP. IX.

What things were done after the Death of Agrippa; and how Claudius, on account of the Yeath and Unprofitableness of Agrippa, junior, sent Caiphas, the First to Be the Procureur of Judges, and of the entire Kingdom.

1. And thus did king Agrippa depart this life. But he left behind him a son, Agrippa by name, a youth in the seventeenth year of his age, and three daughters; one of whom, Bernice, was the daughter of Agrippa, and was sixteen years old; the other two, Marianne and Drusilla, were still virgins; the former was ten years old, and Drusilla six. Now these his daughters were then espoused by their father, Marianne to Julius Archelaus, the son of Antiochus the son of Cleopatra, the son of Herod the king of Commagene. But when it was known that Agrippa was departed this life, the inhabitants of Commagene and of Sebaste forsook the dead bodies which he had bestowed on them, and added the part of the bitterest enemies; for they cast such reproaches upon the deceased as were not fit to be spoken of; and so many of them as were then in the suburbs, and the part of the city that was nearest to his house, and hastily carried off the statues of this king's daughters, and all at once carried them into the brothel houses, and when they had set them on the tops of those houses, they abused them. But the friends of Agrippa were sorry for joy that the king was expired. Nay, they were not only unmindful of Agrippa, who had extended his liberality to them in abundance, but of his grandson Herod also, who had his liberality, and even raised them to navens and temples at vast expenses.

2. Now Agrippa, the son of the deceased was at Rome, and brought up with Claudius Caesar. And when Caesar was informed that Agrippa had departed, and that the inhabitants of Sebaste and Commagene had abused him, he was sorry for the first news, and was displeased with the ingratitude of those cities. He was therefore disposed to send Agrippa junior away presently to sacred places, and to have him take him to Rome, that he might confirm him in it by his oaths. But those freedmen and friends of his, who had the greatest authority with him, dissuaded him from it, and said that it was a dangerous experiment to permit

Josephus's proper word οἰκονομός or οἰκονόμος, and the foregoing words διάκοπτης ἢ συνάπτως, to be inserted, Eusebius's text will truly represent that in Josephus. Had this impersonation been in some heathen author, that was in good esteem with our modern critics, they would have readily corrected these, as hardly answers to the context; but being in an ancient Christian writer, not so well relished by many of these critics, nothing will serve but the ill-grounded supposition of wild and strange affected and improved, ye 18,000,000 shekels, which is equal to 3,000,000 drachmas, 1 e. at 10l. a shekel equal to £322,500 sterling, was Agrippa the Great's yearly income; he having abated the tax upon houses at Jerusalem, ch. vi. sect. 3, and was not so tyrannical as Herod had been to the Hasmonean nation, now, not to confirm him in it by his oaths. But those freedmen and friends of his, who had the greatest authority with him, dissuaded him from it, and said that it was a dangerous experiment to permit

* We have a mighty cry made here by some critics, as if the great Eusebius had on purpose falsified this account of Josephus, so as to make it agree with the parallel account in the Acts of the Apostles; because the present copies of his citation of it, Hist. Eccles. b. ii. ch. x. omit the words διάκοπτης ἢ συνάπτως, in e. c. e. o. etc., which Josephus is said to have retained, and only have the explanatory word ἀγαθός or ἀγαθόν, as if he meant that ἀγαθόν of the Lord which St Luke interpreted, by omitting Herod, Acts xii. 23, and not that word which Josephus was said to have omitted, and which he says of former good, but now of bad men, to Agrippa. This accusation is a somewhat strange one in the case of the great Eusebius, who is not reported to have been so accurate or so faithfully produced a vast number of other ancient records, and particularly not a few out of our Josephus also, who brought upon himself many discourses, yet not to allege how uncertain we are, whether Josephus's or Eusebius's copies of the fourth century were just like the present copies of his text, which words are thus retained, and only have the explanatory word ως ἀγαθός or ἀγαθόν, as if he meant that ἀγαθόν of the Lord which St Luke interpreted, by omitting Herod, Acts xii. 23, and not that word which Josephus was said to have omitted, and which he says of former good, but now of bad men, to Agrippa. so large a kingdom to come under the government of so very young a man, and one hardly yearned at years of discretion, be able to take sufficient care of its administration; while the weight of a kingdom is heavy enough to a grown man. So Cæsar thought would be very soon to come to the administration; be sent Cæpius Fadus to be procurator of Judea, and of the entire kingdom; and paid that respect to the decessed, as not to introduce Marcus, who had been at variance with him, into his kingdom. But he determined, in the first place, to send the ambassadors to Cæsar, that he should chastise the inhabitants of Cæsarea and Sebaste for those abuses they had done to him that was deceased, and their madness towards his daughters that were still alive; and that he should remove that body of soldiers that were at Cæsarea and Sebaste, with the five regiments to Rome. For these, that might do their military duty there, and that he should choose an equal number of soldiers out of the Roman legions that were in Syria, to supply their place. Yet were not those that had such orders actually in the field; for, when the ambassadors to Cælius, they mollified him, and get leave to abide in Judea still; and these were the very men that became the source of very great calamities to the Jews in after times, and sowed the seeds of that war which began under Florus, when it was, that when Vespasian had subdued the country, he removed them out of his province, as well as we shall relate hereafter.*

BOOK XX.
CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF TWENTY-TWO YEARS,—FROM FADUS THE PROCURATOR, TO FLORUS.

CHAP. I.
A Sedition of the Philippians against the Jews; and also concerning the Vestments of the High Priest.
1. Upon the death of king Agrippa, which was related in the foregoing book, Cælius Cæsarius sent Casius Longinus as successor to Marcus, out of regard to the memory of king Agrippa, who had often desired of him by letters, while he was alive, that he would be suitors for his kingdom. But Fadus, as soon as he was come procurator into Judea, found quarrelsome doings between the Jews that dwelt in Perea, and the people of Philippi, about their borders, at a village called Mio; that was wrested with men of a violent temper; for the Jews of Perea had taken up arms without the consent of their principal men, and had destroyed many of the Philippians.—When Fadus was informed of this proceeding, it provoked him very much that they had not left the determination of the matter to him, if they thought that the Philippians had done them any wrong, but had rashly taken up arms against them. So, as soon as he proceeded from three of their principal men, who were also the causes of this sedition, and ordered them to be bound, and afterward had one of them slain, whose name was Hannibal, and he banished the other two, Amaris and Phyllus, belonging to them, under their own houses, where a robber, was, after some time, brought to him bound, and slain, but not till he had done a world of mischief to Idumea and the Arabians. And indeed, from that time, Judea was cleared of robbers by the care and providence of Fadus. He also at this time sent for the high priests and the principal citizens of Jerusalem, and this at the command of the emperor, and admonished them, that they should lay up the long garment, and make amends that they had lost to nobody but the high priest to wear, in the tower of Antonia, that it might be under the power of the Romans, as it had been formerly. Now the Jews durst not contradict what he said, but desired Fadus, however, and Longinus, which last was come to Jerusalem, and had brought a great army with him, out of a fear that the [rigid] injunctions of Fadus should force the Jews to rebel, that they might, in the first place, have leave to send ambassadors to Cæsar, to petition him that they may have the holy vestments under their own power, and that, in the next place, they would tarry till they knew what answer Cælius should give to their petition. So they replied, that they would give them leave to send their ambassadors, provided they would give them their sons as pledges [for their peaceable behavior]. And when they had agreed so to do, and had given the pledges they desired, the ambassadors were sent accordingly. But when, upon their coming to Rome, Agrippa junior, the son of the deceased, under the pretense of the reason why they had here dwelt, did speak, to Cælius Cæsarius, as we said before, he besought Cæsar to grant the Jews their request about the holy vestments, and to send a message to Fadus accordingly.
2. Hereupon Cælius called for the ambassadors, and told them, that "he granted their request;" and bade them to return their thanks to Agrippa for this favor which had been bestowed on them upon this entreaty. And answers of his, he sent with following letter by them: "Cælius Cæsarius Germanicus, tribune of the people the fifth time, and designed consul the fourth time, and imperator the tenth time, the father of his country, to the magistrates, senate and people, and the whole nation of the Jews, sendeth greeting. Upon the presentation of your ambassadors to me by Agrippa, my friend, whom I have brought up, and have now placed in his state with me, and whom I know who are come to give me thanks for the care I have taken of your nation, and to entreat me, in an earnest and obliging manner, that they may have the holy vestments, with the crown belonging to them, under their own power, as they have request, as that excellent person Vitellus, who is very dear to me, had done before me. And I have coupled with your desire, in the first place, out of regard to that piety which I profess, and because I would have every one worship God according to the laws of their own country; and this I do also because I shall hereby highly gratify king Herod, and Agrippa junior, whose sacred regards to me, and earnest good will to you, I am well aware of, and with whom I have the greatest friendship, and whom I highly esteem, and look on as persons of the best character. Now I have written about these affairs to Cæpius Fadus, my procurator. The names of those that brought me your letter are, Cornelius the son of Cero, Trypho the son of Theudio, Dorotheus the son of Nathaniel, and John the son of John. This was dated before the fourth of the Kalends of July, when Rufus and Pomponius Sylvanus were consuls." 3. Herod also, the brother of the deceased Agrippa, who was then possessed of the royal authority over Chalcis, petitioned Cælius Cæsarius for the authority over the temple, and the money of the sacred treasure, and the choice of the high priests, and obtained all that he peti tioned for. So that after that time this authority continued among all his descendants till the end of the war. Accordingly, Herod removed the last high priest, called Cantherus, and bestowed that dignity on his successor Joseph, the son of Canus.

CHAPTER II.

How Helena, the Queen of Adiabene, and her son Izates, embraced the Jewish Religion; and how Helena supplied the poor with Corn, when there was a great famine of Jerusalem.

1. About this time it was that Helena, queen of the Arians, and her son Izates, changed their course of life, and embraced the Jewish customs, and this on the occasion following: Monobazus, the king of Adiabene, who had also the name of Bazeus, fell in love with his sister Helena, and that sister's husband, the high priest, in Jerusalem, where God's providence, would be safely born, and have a happy end. This voice put him into disorder; so he awakened immediately, and told the story to his wife; and when his son was born, he called him Izates, and Monobazus, his eldest brother, by Helena also, as he had other sons by other wives besides. Yet did he openly place all his affections on this his only begotten son Izates, which was the origin of that envy, while other people in the kingdom hated him, and were all under great affliction that their father should prefer Izates before all. Now although their father was very sensible of these passions, yet did he forgive all, and pass over their ill disposition, but out of a desire each of them had to be beloved by their father. However, he sent Izates with many presents to Abennerig, the king of Chosroes, and that out of the great dread he was in about him, lest he should come to some misfortune by the hatred his brethren bore him; and he committed his son's preservation to him. Upon which Abennerig gladly received the young man, and had a great affection for him, and married him to his own daughter, whose name was Sanscha; he also bestowed a country upon him, from which he received large revenues.

2. But when Monobazus was grown old, and saw his son Izates had a mind to come to the sight of his son before he died. So he sent for him, and embraced him after the most affectionate manner, and bestowed on him the country called Carra; it was a soil that bare such a fruit, though it was very great; there are also in it the remains of that ark, wherein is related that Noah escaped the deluge, and where they are still shown to such as are desirous to see them. Accordingly, Izates abode in that country until his father's death. But the very fact that Monobazus died, queen Helena sent for all the grandees, and governors of the kingdom, and for those that had the armies committed to their hand, when they were come, she made the following speech to them: "I believe you are not unacquainted that my husband was desirous Izates should succeed him in the government, and thought him worthy so to do. For besides, he was of a great determination; for happily is he who receives a kingdom not from a single person only, but from the willing suffrages of a great many." This she said in order to try those who were invited, and to discover their sentiments. Upon the hearing of which, they first of all paid their homages to the queen, as their custom was, and then they said that "they confirm the king's determination and would assent to it; and they rejoiced that Izates' father had preferred him before the rest of his brethren, as being agreeable to all their wishes: but that they would not consent of all to say his brethren had kinship, that so the government might continue securely to Izates; because if they were once destroyed all that fear would be over which might arise from their hatred and envy to him. He-"...
for the present persuaded him to forbear. And when he had related what she had said to Aneas, he confirmed what his mother had said, and when he had also threatened to leave him, unless he complied with him, he went away from him, and said that "he was afraid lest such an action being once made public to all, he should himself be in danger of punishment, for having been the occasion of it, and having been the king's instructor in actions that were of ill repute, he wished the king would turn away from God without being circumcised, even though he did resolve to follow the Jewish law entirely, which worship of God was of a superior nature to that of his. Having thus said, he left the house, and went to Alexandria with money to buy a great quantity of corn, and others of them to Cyprus, to bring a cargo of dried figs. And as soon as they were come back, it had brought the famine which was done very quickly, she distributed food to those that were in want of it, and left an excellent memorial behind her of this benefaction, which she bestowed on our whole nation, and who, as the place where she informed him of this famine, he sent great sums of money to the principal men in Jerusalem. However, what favors this king and queen conferred upon our city of Jerusalem, shall be further related hereafter."

CHAP. III.

How Aratus, the King of Parthia, out of Fear of the secret Contrivances of his subjects against him, went to Iasus, and was by him reinvited in his Government; as also how Bardanes, his Son, denounced War against Iasus.

1. But now Aratus, king of the Parthians, perceiving that the governors of his provinces did frame a plot against him, did not think it safe for him to continue among them, but resolved to go to Iasus, in hopes of finding some way for his preservation by his means, and if possible, for delivering Iasus from the miseries of the famine, and of the Iasites, and brought a thousand of his kindred and servants with him, and met him upon the road, while he well knew Iasus, but Iasus did not know him. When Aratus stood near him, and in the first place, which Iasus being according to the custom, he then said to him, "O king! do not thou overlook me thy servant, nor do thou proudly reject the suit I make thee: for, as I am reduced to a low estate by the change of fortune, and of a king and great of mine, I stand in need of thy assistance. Have regard, therefore, unto the uncertainty of fortune, and esteem the care thou shalt take of me to be taken of thyself also; for if I be neglected, and my subjects go off ungoverned, my case will become the more insolent towards other kings also." And this speech Aratus made with tears in his eyes, and with a dejected countenance. Now as soon as Iasus heard Aratus's suppliant suit and saw him stand as a suppliant before him, he leaped down from his horse immediately, and said to him, "Take courage, O king! nor be disturbed at thy present calamity, as it were incurable; for the change of thy condition shall be sudden, for thou shalt find me to be more thy friend and thy assistant than thy hopes can promise thee; for I will either re-establish thee in the kingdom of Parthia, or lose my own."

2. Whereupon the king, and all the inhabitants of Aratus expressed had said a little afterward, ch. v. sect. 2, that "Thebes Alexander succeeded Cypselus Fadus as procurator," he immediately unjoins, "That under these procurators there was no law, and there was no danger of death, and," 12. Thereupon this faint remained for many years, on account of its duration under these procurators. Now the faint maintained during the death of king Afrispe, i.e., towards the latter end of the fourth year of Claudius: so that this faint forestold by Aratus, happened upon the 3d, 4th, 5th, and 6th years of Claudius, as says Vell. in his Insul. 12, 12. Of this faint also, and queen Iasus's supplies, and her monument, see Moses Chron. p. 144, 145, where it is observed in the notice, that Pausanias mentions her monument also.
on his horse, and followed him on foot, in honor of a king whom he owned as greater than himself; which, when Artabanus saw, he was very uneasy at it, and swore by his present fortune and honor, that he would get down from his horse, and now he would get on his horse again, and go before him. So he conciliated with his desire, and leaped upon his horse: and when he had brought him to his royal palace, he showed him all sorts of respect, when they sat together, and gave him the upper place at feasts also, as regarding not his present fortune, but his former dignity, and that upon this consideration also, that the changes of fortune are common to all men. He also wrote to the Parthians, to let him have Artabanus again; and gave him right hand and faith, that he should forget what was past and done, and that he would undertake for this as a mediator between them. Now the Parthians did not themselves refuse to receive him again, but pleaded that it was not now in their power so to do; because they had committed the government to another person, who had accepted of it, and was of his own nation, and that they were afraid lest a civil war should arise against their account. When Cinnamus understood their intentions, he wrote to Artabanus himself, for he had been brought up by him, and was of a nature gentle and mild, and desired him to put confidence in him, and to come and take his own dominions again. Accordingly Artabanus trusted him, and returned home; when Cinnamus met him, worshipped him, and saluted him as king, and laid down the crown of Isates and his own hand, and put it on the head of Artabanus.

3. And thus was Artabanus restored to his kingdom again by the means of Isates, when he had lost it by the means of the grandees of the kingdom, for the benefit of the benefits he had conferred upon him, but rewarded him with such honors as were of the greatest esteem among them; for he gave him leave to wear his tiara upright, and to sleep upon a golden bed, with twelve thousand stands of perfumes spread around, and gave him Antioch of Myndonia. And these were the honors that were paid Isates by the king of the Parthians.

But in no long time Artabanus died, and left his kingdom to his son Bardanes. Now this Bardanes came to Isates, and would have persuaded him to join him with his army, and to assist him in the war he was preparing to make with the Romans, but he could not prevail with him. For Isates so well knew the strength and good fortune of the Romans, that he took Bardanes to attempt what was impossible to be done; and having besides sent his sons, five in number, and they but young also, to learn the manner of the language of our nation, together with our learning, as well as he had sent his mother to worship at our temple, as I have said already, he was the more backward to a compliance, and restrained Bardanes from his purpose, and restrained of the great armies and famous actions of the Romans, and thought thereby to terrify him, and desired thereby to hinder him from that expedition. But the Parthian king was provoked at this his behavior, and resolved to make war immediately upon Isates. Yet did he gain no advantage by this war, because God cut off all his hopes therein; for the Parthians, perceiving Bardanes's intention, and how he had determined to make war with the Romans, slew him, and gave his kingdom to his brother Gotarzes. He also in no long time perished by a plot made against him, and Vologases, his brother, succeeded him, who committed two of his provinces to two of his brothers by the same father; that of the Medes is the elder, Pictoros, and Armenia to the younger, Tiridates.

CHAP. IV.

How Isates was betrayed by his own Subjects, and fought against by the Arabians. How the Parthian Grandees, by the Providence of God, were delivered out of their Hands.

4. Now when the king's brother, Monobamos, and his other kindred, saw how Isates, by his piety to God, was become greatly esteemed by the Parthians, they betook themselves to the region of their country, and to embrace the customs of the Jews; but that act of theirs was discovered by Isates's subjects. Whereupon the grandees were much displeased, and could not concern their anger at them: but had an intention, when they should find a proper opportunity, to inflict a punishment upon them. Accordingly, they wrote to Abia, king of the Arabians, and promised him great sums of money, if he would aid them to get rid of the king; and they farther promised him, that on the first onset they would desert their king, because they were desirous to punish him, by reason of the hatred he had borne to the Jews, and those that obeyed themselves, by oaths, to be faithful to each other, and desired that he would make haste in this design. The king of Arabia complied with their desires, and brought a great army into the field. He saluted the cultivated of Isates, and the evening of the first onset, and before they came to a close fight, those grandees, as if they had a panic terror upon them, all deserted Isates, as they had agreed to do, and turning their backs ran away, and then the Parthians dismayed at this: but when he understood that the grandees had betrayed him, he also retired into his camp, and made inquiry into the matter; and as soon as he knew who they were that made this conspiracy; with the king of Arabia, he cut off those that were found guilty; and renewing the fight on the next day, he slew the greatest part of his enemies, and forced all the rest to betake themselves to flight. And he returned, and returned to a fortress called Aramus, and following on the siege vigorously, he took that fortress. And when he had plundered it of all the prey that was in it, which was great, and returned to Abia, and he said not Abia alive; because, when he found himself encompassed on every side, he slew himself.

2. But although the grandees of Adiaben came failed in their first attempt, as being delivered up by God into their king's hands, yet would they even then be quiet, but wrote again to Vogases, who was then king of Parthia, and desired that he would kill Isates, and set over them some other potentate, who should be of a Parthian nobility; for they said, that "they hated their own king for abrogating the laws of their forefathers, and embracing foreign customs." When the king of Parthia heard this, he boldly made war upon Isates; and as he had just pretence for this, he received both those hommage which he had, and those privileges which had been bestowed on him by his father, and threatened, on his refusal, to make war upon him. Upon hearing of this Isates was under no small trouble of mind, and being moved with an answer upon him, to appear to resign those privileges that had been bestowed upon him, out of cowardice; yet because he knew, that though the king of Parthia should receive back those hommage which he had, notwithstanding, he would not be quiet, he resolved to commit himself to God in a protector, in the present danger he was in of his cular to (great) kings, from Xenophon and others, as Dr. Hudson observes here.
three forlorn from the city of Jerusalem. But for the actions of Monobazus the king, which he did during the rest of his life, we will relate them hereafter.]

CHAP. V.

Conceiving Thuddas, and the Sons of Judas the Galilean; as also what Calamity fell upon the Jews on the Day of the Passover.

1. Now it came to pass, while Fadus was procurator of Judea, and a certain magician, whose name was Thuddas, persuaded a great part of the people to take their effects with them and to follow him to the river Jordan; for he told them that he was a prophet, and that he would, by his own command, divide to them an easy passage over it; and many were deluded by his words. However, Fadus did not permit them to make any advantage of his wild attempt, but sent a troop of horsemen out against them: who, falling upon them unawares, and many of them, and took many of them alive. They also took Thuddas alive, and cut off his head, and carried it to Jerusalem. This was what befell the Jews in the time of Cuspius Fadus's government.

2. Then came Tiberius Alexander as successor to Fadus: he was the son of Alexander the alarbach of Alexandria, which Alexander was a very great and principal person in his time, both for his family and wealth; he was also more eminent for his piety than this his son Alexander, for he did not continue in the religion of his country. Under these procurators that great famine happened in Judaea, in which few corn is Egypt, at a very great expense, and distributed it to those that were in want, as I have related already. And besides this, the sons of Judas of Galilee were now slain; I mean that of the people who continued in the sect of Simon, who was called Canyodus, from the high priesthood, and made Ananias, the son of Nebedeus, his successor. And now it was that Cumanus came as successor to Tiberius Alexander; as also that of Herod, brother of the great king, the son of Herod the tetrarch, departed this life, in the eighth year of the reign of Claudius Caesar. He left behind him three sons, Aristobulus, who he had by his first wife, with Bernocatus and Hyrcanus, both whom he had by Bernice's daughter. But Claudius Caesar bestowed his dominions on Agrippa junior.

3. Now, whilst the Jewish affairs were under the administration of Cumanus, there happened a great tumult at the city of Jerusalem, and many of the Jews perished therein. But I shall first explain the occasion whence it was derived. When that feast which is called the Passover was at hand, at which time unleavened bread is eaten, and a great multitude was gathered together from all parts to that feast, Cumanus was afraid lest some attempt of innovation should then be made by them; so he ordered that one regiment of the horse, and the other of the foot, should take their arms, and stand in the temple cloisters, to repress any attempts of innovation, if perchance any such should begin: and this was no more than what

* This mourning and fasting, used by Izates, with pros- tration of hands before the king's image, is a sign, says Dr. Hudson, that he was become either a Jew, or an Ebionite Christian; who indeed differed not much from proper Jews. See ch. ii. sect. 1. How to Jerusalem, their words were heard, and he was providentially delivered from that imminent danger he was in.

 This Thuddas, who arose under Fadus the procura- tor, about A. D. 45, or 46, could not be that Thuddas who was slain in the days of the king under Cyrenius; or about A. D. 7. Acts x. 37. That which earlier Thuddas was [This note is on b. xvi. ch. x. sect. 5. (basis: v. 401, 20.5.x.vi.12)] the former procurators of Judea did at such festivals. But on the fourth day of the feast, a certain soldier let down his breeches, and exposing his private parts to the multitude, which put those that saw him into a furious rage, and made them cry out, that this impious action was not done to reproach them, but God himself; and some of them reproached Cumanus, and pre-tenred the soldier that came among them, when Cumanus heard, he was also himself not a little provoked at such reproaches laid upon him;
yet did he exhort them to leave off such sedious attempts, and not to raise a tumult at the festival. But they could not induce him to be quiet; for they still went on in their reproaches to him, he gave order that the whole army should take their entire armor, and come to Antonia, which was a fortress, as we have said already, which covered all the town. And when the multitude saw the soldiers there, they were affrighted at them, and ran away hastily; but as the passages out were but narrow, and as they thought their mischief was follow'd, they were crowded together in their flight, and great numbers were pressed to death in these narrow passages; nor indeed was the number fewer than twenty thousand that perished in this tumult. So, instead of a tumult, he had at last a mournful day of it:
and they all of them forgot their prayers and sacrifices, and betook themselves to lamentation
and weeping; so great an affliction did the indescribable losses of a single soldier bring upon them.

4. Now before this their first mourning was over, another mischief befell them also; for some of those that raised the foregoing tumult, when they were travelling along the public road, about a half mile from the city, fell upon and clubbed Stephainus, a servant of Cesar, as he was journeying, and plundered him of all that he had with him.
Which things when Cumanus heard of, he sent soldiers immediately, and ordered them to plunder the house of the chief officers, and to take the most eminent persons among them in bonds to him.
Now, as this devastation was making, one of the soldiers seized the laws of Moses that lay in one of those villages, and brought them out before the eyes of all present, and great numbers were piec'd and this was done with reproachful language, and much scurrility. Which things when the Jews heard of, they ran together, and that in great crowds, and came down to Cesar's, where Cumanus then was, and besought him that he would avenge, not themselves, but God himself, whose laws had been affronted; for that they could not bear to live any longer, if the laws of their forefathers were to be affronted after this manner. Accordingly, Cumanus, out of fear lest the multitude should go into a sedition, and by the advice of his friends also, took care that the soldier that had offered the affront to the laws should be hang'd, and thereby put an end to the sedition which was ready to be kindled a second time.

CHAP. VI.

How there happened a Quarrel between the Jews and the Samaritans, and how Claudioius put an End to their Differences.

1. Now there arose a quarrel between the Samaritans, on the occasion following: it was the custom of the Galileans, when they came to the holy city at the festivals, to

* This, and many more tumultus and seditions, which arose at the Jewish festivals, in Josephus, Illustrate the cautious procedure of the Jewish governors, when they said Matt. xvi. 2. "Let us not take Jesus on the feast-day, lest there be an uproar among the people," as Reland well observes on this place. Josephus also takes notice of the tumults at the Feast of the Passover, "The lem, is noticed by the gospels to the same purpose, as Dr. Hudson rightly of. serv.'s. See Luke take their journey through the country of the Samaritans; and at this time there lay, in the road they took, a village that was called Gamala, which was situated in the borders of Samaria and the great plain, where certain persons thereto belonging fought with the Galileans, and killed a great many of them. But, when the principal of the Galileans were informed of what had been done, they sent from Gamala, and charged him to avenge the murder of those that were killed: but he was induced by the Samaritans, with money, to do nothing in the matter;

upon which the Galileans were much displeased and assembled in council, and said they would be take themselves to arms, and to regain their liberty, say ing, that "slavery was in itself a bitter thing, but that, when it was joined with direct injuries, it was perfectly intolerable." And when the consul then was present, who had made his abode in the mountains, with which assistance they plundered many villages of the Samaritans.
When Cumanus heard of this action of theirs, he immediately took a guard, and he with it last a month at Gamala; and they all of them forgot their prayers and sacrifices, and betook themselves to lamentation
and weeping; so great an affliction did the indescribable losses of a single soldier bring upon them.

2. But the principal of the Samaritans went up to Cumanus, and accused him of the murder, who at that time was at Tyre, and accused the Jews of setting their villages on fire, and plundering them; and said within, that "they were not so much displeased at what they had suffered, but that they were much more angry at the Romans; while, if they had received any injury, they ought to have made them the judges of what had been done, and not presently to make such devastation, as if they had not the Romans for their governors; on which account they came to him, in order to obtain the vengeance they wanted." This was the accusation which the Samaritans brought against the Jews. But the Jews affirmed, that the Samaritans were the authors of the tumult and fighting that took place, in the first place, Cumanus had been corrupted by their gifts, and passed over the murder of those that were slain in silence. Which allegations being put off the hearing of the cause, and promised that he would come to s镊ence when he should come into Judas, and xvii. 11, John iv. 4. See also Josephus in his own life, sect. 59, where that journey is determined to three days.
1 Our Saviour had forsook that the Jews' rejection of his gospel would bring upon, among other misfor-rises, those three, which they themselves here show they expected would be the consequences of their present remaining in the same darkness as before; his

![Carse,]{-0.01w}
should have a more exact knowledge of the truth of that matter. So these men went away without success. Yet was it not long ere Quadratus came to Samaria, where, upon hearing the cause, he supposed that the Samaritans were the authors of that disturbance. But, when he was informed that certain of the Jews were making innovations, he ordered those to be crucified whom Cumanus had taken captives. From thence he came to a certain village called Lydde Aricka, near Antioch of Pisidia, and there heard the Samaritan cause a second time before his tribunal, and there learned from a certain Samaritan, that one of the chief of the Jews, and a most learned rabbinus, had consented to join with him, and there four, to revolt from the Romans; whom Quadratus ordered to be put to death; but still he sent away Ananias the high priest, and Ananus the high priest, to the emperor in Rome, to give an account of what they had done to Claudius Caesar. He also ordered the principal men, both of the Samaritans and of the Jews, as also Cumanus the procurator, and Celer the tribune of the eunuchs, to the emperor; that he might hear their cause, and determine their differences one with another. But he came again to the city of Jerusalem, out of his fear that the multitude of the Jews should attempt some innovation; and he did with them the same civilities of state, and celebrating one of the usual festivals of their country to God. So he believed that they would not attempt any innovations, and left them at the celebration of the festival, and returned to Rome, to give an account of what they had done to Claudius Caesar.

3. Now Cumanus, and the principal of the Samaritans, who were sent to Rome, had a day appointed by the emperor, whereon they were to have pleaded their cause about the quarrels they had with the Jews, and the violence of the freed-men, and his friends, were very zealous on the behalf of Cumanus and the Samaritans; and they had prevailed over the Jews, unless Agrippa junior, who was at the time of the revolt from the Roman government—Whenceupon Claudius Caesar was disposed beforehand, that when he had heard the cause, and found that the Samaritans had been the ring-leaders, and that Cumanus and the others had been ordered to go to him should be slain, and that Cumanus should be banished. He also gave order, that Celer the tribune should be carried back to Jerusalem, and should be drawn through the streets in the sight of all the people, and then should be slain.

This Simon, a friend of Felix, a Jew, born in Cyprus, though he pretended to be a magician, and seems to have been somewhat of that sort, is often mentioned by the magicians, in the Acts of the Apostles, VIII, 9. as some are ready to suppose. This Simon mentioned in the Acts is not the Simon who was called a robber, and of the town of Gilead, in the country of Samaria, as the Apostolic Constitutions, VI, 7, The Recognitions of Clement, II, 6, and Justin Martyr, himself or in the country of Samaria, Apology, L, 24, informs us. He was also the author, not of any ancient Jewish, but of the first Gnostics heretics. As the former crosses the boundary, as I suppose him a different person from the other. I mean this only upon the hypothesis, that Josephus was not writing so tersely, and in the same otherwise the time, the name, the profession, and the wickedness of them both would strongly incline one to believe them the very same. As to that Drusilla, the sister of Agrippa junior, as Josephus informs us here, and a Jewess, as St. Luke informs us, Acts, XXXIV, 24, whom this Simon mentioned by Josephus pretended to leave behind him in the name of Agrippa junior, it is a point of justice, and to marry Felix, the heathen procurator of Judas; Tacitus, Hist. v. 9, supposes her to have been a heathen then, and the grand-daughter of Antonius and Cleopatra, contrary both to St. Luke and Josephus. Now Tatian lived somewhat too long both as to time and place, to be compared with either of those Jewish writers, in a matter concerning the Jews in Judaea in their own days, and concerning a sister of Agrippa junior, with which Agrippa Josephus was himself so well acquainted. It is probable that Tactius may say true when he informs us that this Felix (who had in Roman wives or queens, as St. Luke in Claudius sect. 23, assures us,) did once marry such a grandchild of Antonius and Cleopatra, and finding the name of one of them to have been Drusilla, he mistook the other for that other wife, whose name he did know. This enquirer of Xenophon was one of the greatest we have in history. See Blainth's curious and important observations on this Xenophon, and if it is several great eruptions, with their remains vitrified, and still existing in so many different strata under the earth, the diggers came to the antediluvian waters, with their proportionable interstices, implying the delays to have been very great, and seen above, which agree with the Christian era, according to our exactest chronology. This is now wanting. marriage, and the Jewish religion: and, at the same time, Marianna put away Archelaus, and was about to marry to Domitianus, the principal man among the Alexandrian Jews, both for his family and his wealth; and indeed he was then their alabarch. So she named her son whom she had by him Agrippina. But of all those particulars we shall hereafter treat more exactly.\(^\)

CHAP. VIII.

After what manner, upon the Death of Claudius, Nero succeeded in the Government; as also what barbarous things he did. Concerning the Robbers, Murderers, and Impostors that arose while Felix and Patus were Procurators of Judea.

\(^1\) Now Claudius Cesar died when he had reigned nineteen years, eight months, and twenty-five days: and a report went about that he was poisoned by his wife Agrippina. Her father was Germanicus, the brother of Cesar. Her husband Domitius Eobabaus, one of the most illustrious persons that was in the city of Rome, after whose death, and her long continuance in widowhood, Claudius took her to wife; she brought along with her a son, Domitius, of the same name as his father. He had before this slain his wife Messalina, out of jealousy, by whom he had his children Britannicus and Octavia; their eldest sister was Antonia, whom he had by Pelins his first wife. He also married Octavia to Nero for that was the reason that Cesar gave him afterward, upon adopting him for his son.

\(^2\) But now Agrippina was afraid, lest, when Britannicus should come to usan’s estate, he should succeed his father in the government and desire to seize upon the principality beforehand for her own son [Nero] upon which the report went, that she thence compassed the death of Claudius. Accordingly, she sent Burrhus, the general of the legions in Italy, to bring him to her, with him the tribunes, and such also of the freed-men as were of the greatest authority, to bring Nero away into the camp, and to salute him emperor. And when Nero had thus obtained the government, he got Britannicus out of the city, and desired the multitude should not perceive it; although he publicly put his own mother to death not long afterward, making her this requital, not only for being borne, but for bringing it about by her contrivances that he obtained the government of Rome. And he also slew Octavia his own wife, and many other illustrious persons, under the pretense that they plotted against him.

\(^3\) I will now rather discourse about these affairs, for there have been a great many who have composed the history of Nero; some of whom have departed from the truth of facts out of favor, as having received benefits from him; while others, out of hatred to him, and the great ill-which they bore him, have so impudently raved against him with their lies, that they justly deserve to be condemned: nor do I wonder at such as have told lies of Nero, since they have been in their things pretended history as to those facts that were earlier than his time, even when the actors could have nowry incurred their hatred, since those writers lived a long time after them. But as to those that have not nowry a hatred, they may write as they please for it is they that take delight: but as to ourselves, who have made truth our direct aim, we shall briefly touch upon what only belongs remotely to this undertaking, but shall relate what hath happened in the affairs of the Jews with great accuracy, and shall not grudge our pains in giving an account both of the calamities we have suffered, and of the crimes we have been guilty of. I will now therefore return to the relation of our own affairs. And in the eighth year of the reign of Nero, upon the death of Arius, king of Esna, Soes mus, his brother, succeeded in his kingdom, and Aristobulus, the son of Herod, king of Chalcis, was intrusted by Nero with the government of Lacedaemon; and as there was a certain part of Galilee, Tiberias, and Tarchicha, and ordereth them to submit to his jurisdiction. He gave him also Julius, a city of Pe- rsea, with the fourteenth of those which he had abovesaid.

\(^5\) Now, then, for the affairs of the Jews, they grew worse and worse continually; for the country was again filled with robbers and imposters, who deluded the multitude. Yet did Felix cast away the city of Jericho, for that was the cause that Cesar gave him afterward, upon adopting him for his son. So Felix contrived a method whereby he might get rich himself, and the government, and disposed to act unjustly. Wherefore Felix persuaded one of Jonathan’s most faithful friends, a citizen of Jericho, at the time the robbers were greatly in number, to kill him; and this he did by promising to give him a great deal of money for so doing. Doras complied with the request; but presently he found what the robbers might murder him after the following manner: Certain of those robbers went up to the city, as if they were going to worship God, while they had daggers under their garments, and, by thus mingling themselves among the multitude, slew Jonathan, and as this murder was never avenged, the robbers went up with the solent reflection on the gross wickedness of that nation, as the direct cause of their terrible destruction, is well worthy the attention of every Jewish and of every Christian reader. And there are soon coming to be in the catalogue of the Jewish high priests, it may not be easier with Roland, to insert this Jonathan among them, and to transcribe his particular catalogue of the last twenty-six years, which was taken down from Josephus, the same Ananias who was made by Herod the great. See [ch. 5, xvi. ch. ii. sect. 4, and the note there.]

\(^*\) This also is now wanting.

\(^*\) This duration of the reign of Claudius agrees with Dio, as Dr. Hudson here remarks; as he also remarks, that Nerus’s name, which appears at Pet. L. Domitius Ab- barbus, after Claudius had adopted him, was Nero Claudius Caesar Drusus Germanicus.

\(^*\) This sence is elsewhere mentioned [by Josephus in his own Life, sect. 11], as also by Dio Cassius and Tacitus, as Dr. Hudson informs us.

\(^*\) This sence with Josephus’s frequent accounts elsewhere in his Life, that Tetraíras, and Tarichees, and Gamala were under this Agrippa, junior, till Jesus, the son of Piscus, seized upon them for the Jews upon the breaking out of the war.

\(^*\) This treacherous and barbarous murder of the good high priest Jonathan, by the contrivance of this wicked persecutor Felix, was the immediate occasion of the ensuing murders by the Stari or ruffians, and one great cause of the following horrid cruelties and miseries of the Jewish nation, as Josephus here supposes, whose acc-greatest security at the festivals after this time, and having weapons concealed in like manner as before, and mingling themselves among the multitude, they slew certain of their own enemies, and were subservient to other men for money, and slew others, not only in remote parts of the city, but in the temple itself also; for they had the boldness to murder men there, without thinking of being afterwards known, for fear of those who were there, and had a covering of the multitude, and those who sowed the crime, and also; and thus it was, till at length they came to throwing stones at one another, and several were wounded, and fell on both sides, though still the Jews were the conquerors. But when Felix saw that this quartet was only an incitement to the Romans upon us, and threw a fire upon the city to purge it, and brought upon us, our wives and children, slavery, as desirous to make us wiser by our calamities.

6. These works that were done by the robbers, filled the Jews with great amazement, and were subservient to other men for money, and slew others, not only in remote parts of the city, but in the temple itself also; for they had the boldness to murder men there, without thinking of being afterwards known, for fear of those who were there, and had a covering of the multitude, and those who sowed the crime, and also; and thus it was, till at length they came to throwing stones at one another, and several were wounded, and fell on both sides, though still the Jews were the conquerors. But when Felix saw that this quartet was only an incitement to the Romans upon us, and threw a fire upon the city to purge it, and brought upon us, our wives and children, slavery, as desirous to make us wiser by our calamities.

7. Now these impostors* and deluders persuaded the multitude to follow them into the wilderness, and pretended that they would exhibit manifest wonders and signs that should be performed by them with their God, and they prevailed on them by the pleasure of their folly: for Felix brought them back, and then punished them. Moreover, there came out of Egypt† about this time, to Jerusalem, a man that devised the multitude of the common people to go along with him to the Mount of Olives, as it was called, which lay over against the city, and at the distance of a mile and a half, at the end of the broaddest street; and he would show them thence, how, at his command, the walls of Jerusalem would fall down; and he promised them, that he would procure them an entrance into the city through those walls, which were twelve cubits thick. Now, as soon as these people were informed of these things, he ordered his soldiers to take their weapons, and came against them with a great number of horsemen and footmen from Jerusalem, and attacked the Egyptians, and killed four hundred of them. Now, in these matters the Jews were in such affright, that the Syrians did not dare what was alleged about Herod; but they said, that Cæsarea was formerly called Silva's Tower, and that then there was not one Jew inhabiting. When the president of the council heard of these matters, they caught the authors of them on both sides, and tormented them with stripes, and by that means put a stop to the disturbance for a time. But

8. Now, when Porcius Festus was sent as successor to Felix by Nero, the principal of the Jewish inhabitants of Cæsarea went up to Rome to accuse Felix; and he had certainly been brought to promote the narrative, and to require the importunate solicitations of his brother Paul, who was at that time had in the greatest honor by him. Two of the principal Syrians in Cæsarea persuaded Burchus, who was Nero's tutor, and secretary for his literary plans, to take away those tithes that were due to the priests; insomuch that it so fell out that the poorest sort of the priests died for want. To this degree did the violence of the seditious prevail over all right and justice; and边境 upon itself, and plundered them.

7. And now it was that a great sedition arose between the Jews and the Romans and the Jews, and the Syrians who dwelt there also, concerning their equal right to the privileges belonging to citizens, for the Jews claimed the pre-eminance, because Herod their king was the builder of Cæsarea, and they said that he was his own city; but the Syrians did not dare what was alleged about Herod; but they said, that Cæsarea was formerly called Silva's Tower, and that then there was not one Jew inhabiting. When the president of the council heard of these matters, they caught the authors of them on both sides, and tormented them with stripes, and by that means put a stop to the disturbance for a time. But

† Of this Egyptian impostor, and the number of his followers in Josephus, see Acts xxv. 36.
‡ The wickedness here was very peculiar and extraordinary, that the high priests should suppress their brethren the priests, and then be put out of the temple, and be put to death. See the like presently, ch. xxvi. sect. 9. Such fatal crimes are conspicuous and tyrannous in the clergy, as well as in the laity, in all ages.
of this epistle* to the Syracusians, they were more disorderly than before; till a war was kindled.

10. Upon Festus's coming into Judæa, it happened that Judæa was afflicted by the robbers, while all the villages were set on fire, and plundered by them. And then it was that the Sicarii, as they were called, who were robbers, grew nunmerous, and used to rob the villages, by the use of small swords, not much different in length from the Persian, scie-matæ, but somewhat crooked, and like the Roman sicae [or sickles], as they were called: and from these weapons these robbers got their denomination, and a great many; for they mingled themselves among the multitude at their festivals, when they were come up in crowds from all parts to the city to worship; and so they easily bid those that had a mind to spy. They also came frequently upon the villages belonging to their enemies, with their weapons, and plundered them, and set them on fire. So Festus sent them into the forest, both horsemen and footmen, to fall upon those that had been seduced by a certain impostor, who promised them deliverance and freedom from the miseries they were under, if they would but follow him as far as the wilderness.

And so this impostor took several of them, and destroyed both him that had deluded them, and those that were his followers also.

11. About the same time king Agrippa built himself a very large dining-room in the royal palaces, in the city of Caesarea. Now this palace had been erected of old by the children of Asmonæus, and was situate upon an elevation, and afforded a most delightful prospect to those that had a mind to take a view of the city, and the sea coast, and the countries by the sea; and there he could lie down, and eat, and thence observe what was done in the temple: which thing, when the chief men of Jerusalem saw, they were very much displeased at it; for it was more than their country and the institution of the law, that what was done in the temple should be viewed by others, especially what belonged to the sacrifices. They therefore erected a wall upon the uppermost building which belonged to the inner court of the temple towards the west, which wall, when it was built, did not only intercept the prospect of the dining-room in the palace, but also of the western cloisters that belonged to the outer court of the temple also, where it was that the Romans kept guards for the temple at the festivals. At these doings both king Agrippa, and principally Festus the procurator, were much displeased; and Festus ordered to pull down the wall within, but the king of the Jews petitioned him to give them leave to send an embassy about this matter to Nero; for they said they could not endure to live, if any part of the temple should be demolished; and when Festus had given them leave so to do, then they sent ten of their principal men to Nero, as also Helcia the high priest, and Helcias, the keeper of the sacred treasure. And when Nero had heard what they had to say, he not only forgave them what

* We have here one eminent example of Nero's mildness and clemency, which did not distinguish him from the Jews, during the five first years of his reign, so famous in antiquity; we have perhaps another in Josephus's own Life, sect. 3; and a third, though of a different nature however, in Jerus. lib. 1. where several acts of kindness were obtained of Nero by his queen Poppæa, who was a religious lady, and perhaps privately a Jewess; and so were not offending entirely to Ne-or's own goodness.

1 It here evidently appears, that Sadducees might be high priests in the days of Josephus, and that these Saducees were usually very severe and inexcusable judges, while the Pharisees were much milder, and more merciful: but the last chapter is an instance of the note on this place, and on Josephus's Life, sect. 34; and those taken from the New Testament, from Josephus himself, and from free and good stories in his government, with any Sadducees later than this high priest in all Josephus.

they had already done,* but also gave them leave to let the wall they had built stand. This was greatly liked them, in order to gratify Poppæa. Nero's wife, as was a religious woman, and had requested these favors of Nero, and who gave order to the ten ambassadors to go their way home; but retained Helcias and Isthmeal as hostages in his person. As soon as the king heard this news, he wrote the high priest to Joseph, who was called Cabi, the son of Simon, formerly high priest.

CHAP. IX.

Concerning Albinus, under whose procuratorship James was slain; as also what Edicas did to Agrippa.

1. And now Comes, upon hearing of the death of Festus, sent Albinus into Judæa, as procurator. But the king deprived Joseph of the high priesthood, and bestowed the succession to that dignity on the son of Ananias, who was also himself called Ananias. Now this younger Ananias proved a most fortunate man; for he had five sons, who had all performed the office of a high priest to God, and he had himself enjoyed that dignity formerly, a long time, which had never happened to any before. And this younger Ananias, who, as we have told you already, took the high priesthood, was a bold man in his temper, and very insolent; he was also of the sect of the Sadducees, who are very rigid and severe in the laws. And so the Jews, as we have already observed: when, therefore, Ananias was of this disposition, he thought he had now a proper opportunity to exercise his authority. Festus was now dead, and Albinus was under the king, that he might lose no time in the sanhedrim of judges, and brought before them the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ, whose name was James, and some others, or some of his companions. And when he had formed an answer against them on the country and laws, he delivered them to be stoned: but as for those who seemed the most equitable of the citizens, and such as were the most uneasy at the laws, they could not say what was done; they also sent to the king, [Agrippa,] desiring him to send to Ananias that he should act so no more, for that what he had already done was not to be justified: nay, some of them went also to the king of Chæsus and besought him from Alexandria, and informed him that it was unlawful for Ananias to assemble a sanhedrim with out his consent. Whereupon Albinus complied with what they said, and wrote in anger to Ananias, and to theSanhedrim of judges, to put to death by punishment for what he had done; on which king Agrippa took the high priesthood from him, when he had ruled but three months, and made Jesus the son of Damæsus high priest.

2. Nor as soon as Albinus was come to the city of Jerusalem, he used all his endeavors and care that the country might be kept in peace, and this by destroying many of the Sicarii. But as for the high priest Ananias, he increased in

1 Of this condemnation of James the Just, and its cause, we have related part, but not the whole, as is in the Prin. Christ. Revised, vol. iii. ch. 43-45. The Sanhed-rim condemned our Saviour, but could not put him to death without the approbation of the Roman procurator; nor could therefore Ananias and the Sanhedrim of judges, derti, since they never had Albinus's approbation for the putting this James to death.

This Ananias was not the son of Nehemiah, as we take it, but he who was called Anna, or Ananus the elder, the 9th in the catalogue, and who had been esteemed high priest for a long time, and besides Cestus, the son-in-law, had five of his own sons high priests after him, which were those of numbers 11, 13, 15, 17, 24, in the foregoing catalogue. And so we are to understand what Josephus here says of this Ananus or Ananias, that he was high priest a long time before his children were so; he was son of Pethæus, and is set down first for high priest in his foregoing catalogue, under number 9, the glory every day, and this to a great degree, and had obtained the favor and esteem of the citizens in a signal manner, for he was a great poet and a man of music also. He, therefore, derived the friendship of the Albigensians, and of the high priest [Jesus,] by making them presents; he also had servants who were very wicked, who joined themselves to the boldest sort of the people, and went to their parishes, he forged the entire symbols that belonged to the priests by violence, and did not refrain from beating such as would not give these tithes to them. So the other high priests set in the like manner, and did those same same things in the high priest's behalf also, and gave them; as that of this priests that of old were wont to be supported with those tithes, died for want of food.

5. But when Albina heard that Cassius Flores was coming to succed him, he was desirous to appear to do somewhat that might be grateful to the people of Jerusalem; so he brought out all those prisoners who seemed to him to be the most plainly worthy of death, and ordered them to be put to death accordingly. But as to those who had been put into prison on some trifling occasion, he forgave them, and caused them to give them leave to wear linen garments, as well as the priests; for they said, that this would be a work worthy the times of his government. And if he would have caused them to give, he might have caused them to wear linen ones as they desired; and as a part of this tribe ministered in the temple, he also permitted them to learn those hymns as they had besought him for. Now all this was contrary to the laws of our country, which, whenever they have been transgressed, we have never been able to avoid the punishment of such transgressions.

6. And now it was that the temple was finished. So when the people saw that the workmen were unemployable, and the booty was immense, and that, they, receiving no wages, were in want, because they had earned their bread by their labors about the temple, and while they were unwilling to keep them by the treasures that were committed to their care, they conceived of the priests, and moved them by the chief of the sectaries, and moved Albina to rebuild the outer courts. These courts belonged to the outer court, and were situated in a deep valley, and the temple itself reached four hundred cubits in length, and were built of square and very white stones, the length of each of which stones was twenty cubits, and their height six cubits. This was the work of king Solomon, who had finished all the temple, but king Agrippa, who had the care of the temple committed to him by Claudius Caesar, considering that it is easy to demolish any building, but hard to build it up again, and that it was particularly hard to do it to these courtiers, which would require a considerable time, and great sum of money, he denied the petitioners their request about that matter; but he did not obstruct them when they desired the city might be paved with white stone. He also ordained Jesus the son of Gamaliel of the high priesthood, and gave it to Matthias, the son of Theophilus, under whom the Jews' war with the Romans took its beginning.

CHAP. X.

An Enumeration of the High Priests.

1. And now I think it proper and agreeable to this history to mention an account of all the high priests; how they began, who those are which are capable of that dignity, and how many of them have freedom and contempt the haughty high priest had now brought their brethren the priests into; of which shall mention, ch. vii. sect. 1. and th. ii. 1.

1. Of this finishing, not of the Nese, or holy house, but of the ite, or courts, about it, called in general the temple, see the now ch. vii. sect. 3.

2. Of these cloisters of Solomon, see the description of the temple, ch. xii. They seem, by Josephus's words, to have been built from the bottom of the valley. them there had been at the end of the war. In the first place, therefore, history informs us, that Aaron, the brother of Moses, officiated as God to a high priest, and that, after his death, his sons succeeded him immediately; and that this dignity hath been continued down from them all to their posterity. Whence it is, in some villages of our country, that no one should take the high priesthood of God, but he who is of the blood of Aaron, while every one that is of another stock, though he were a king, cannot obtain that high priesthood. Accordingly, the number of all the high priests from Aaron, of whom we have spoken already, as of the first of them, until Phasmas, who was made high priest during the war by the senate, hath been, I suppose, from thirteen, as officiated as high priests in the wilderness, from the days of Moses, while the tabernacle was standing, until the people came into Judæa, when King Solomon erected the temple to God: for at the seventy years' captivity under the Aaron of their life, although afterward they had successors while they were alive. Now these thirteen, who were the descendants of two of the sons of Aaron, received this dignity by succession from another; for their number was not maintained as an aristocracy, and after that a monarchy, and in the third place the government was regal. Now, the number of years during the rule of these thirteen, from the day when our fathers were cast out of Egypt, to the time of Moses their leader, until the building of that temple which King Solomon erected at Jerusalem, were six hundred and twelve. After those thirteen high priests, eighteen took the high priesthood at Jerusalem, and in those six hundred and twelve years, the days of king Solomon, until Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, made an expedition against that city, and burnt the temple, and removed our nation into Babylon, and then took over the high priest's care; the time of these high priests were four hundred sixty-six years, eighteen months and ten days, while the Jews were still under the regal government. But after the term of the seventy years' captivity under the Aaronians, Cyrus, king of Persia, sent the Jews from Babylon to their own land again, and gave them leave to rebuild their temple; at which time, Jesus, the son of Josedak, took the high priesthood, and came into possession when they were returned home. Now he and his posterity, who were in all fifteen, until king Antiochus Epiphat, were under a democratic government for four hundred and fourteen years; and then the foremost temple, and Lycon of the army, deprived Onias, who was also called Meleabas, of the high priesthood, and slew him at Beroa, and driving away the son [of Onias the third,] put Jason into the place of the high priest, who was not in the stock of Aaron, but not of the family of Onias. On which account, Onias, who was the nephew of Onias that was dead, and bore the same name with his father, came into Egypt, and got into the friendly and gentle Ptolemeus, the king's wife, and persuaded them to make him the high priest of that temple which he built to God in the prefecture of Heliopolis, and this in imitation of that at Jerusalem; but as for that temple which was built in Egypt, we have spoken of it frequently already. Now, when Jason had retained the high priesthood three years, he died, and there was no one that succeeded him, but the city continued seventeen years without a high priest, but then the posterity of the sons of Asmoneus, who had the government of the nation conferred upon them, when they had beaten the Macedonians in war, appointed Jonathan to be their high priest, who ruled over them seven years. And when he had been slain by the treacherous contrivance of Trypho, as we have related somewhere. Simon his brother took the high priesthood; and he was destroyed at a feast by the treachery of his son-in-law, his own son, whose name was Hyrcanus, succeeded him, after he had held the high priesthood one year longer than his brother. This Hyrcanus enjoyed that dignity thirty years, and died one of the seven Judges, who was also called Aristobulus, whose brother Alexander was his heir; which Judas died of a sore distemper, after he had kept the priesthood, together with the regal authority, (for this Judas was the first that put on his hands a diadem,) for one year. And when Alexander had been both king and high priest for twenty-seven years, he departed this life, and permitted his wife Alexandra to appoint his son according to his will. And she, the wife of Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander, had for the high priesthood to Hyrcanus, but retained the kingdom herself nine years, and then departed this life. The like duration [and no longer] did her son Hyrcanus enjoy the high priesthood; for after he was made king, he judged, and performed the office of high priest to God. But when he had reigned three years and as many months, he had to fight against the inhabitants of the city of Jerusalem by force, and put him and his children in bonds, and sent them to Rome. He also restored the high priesthood to Hyrcanus, and made him governor of the province, but permitted him to reign for four years. This Hyrcanus ruled, besides his first nine years, twenty-four years more, when Bambaphernes and Piscorus, the generals of the Parthians, passed over Europe, and fought with Hyrcanus, and took the city and the rest of Egypt, and made them their own subjects. Then the son of Aristobulus, king; and when he had reigned three years and three months, Simon and Herod besieged him, and took him, when Antony had brought to Antioch, and slain them both by the Parthians, but did no longer appoint high priests out of the family of Asmoneus; but made certain men to be so that were of no eminent families, but barely of those that were his intimate, excepting that he gave the dignity to Aristobulus; for when he had made this Aristobulus, the grandson of that Hyrcanus who was taken by the Parthians, and had taken his sister Mariamme to wife, he thereby aimed to make a government under the semblance of Hyrcanus and Aristobulus; and this was the government of Jesus, the son of Hyrcanus, his predecessor, which we have already related that matter; but after this man he never intrusted the high priesthood to the posterity of the sons of Asmoneus. Archelaus also, Herod's son, did like his father in the appointment of his high priests, as did the Romans also, who took the government over the Jews into their hands afterward. Accordingly the numbers of the high priests, from the days of Herod until the day when Titus took the temple, and killed his son in twenty-eight; the time also that belonged to them was a hundred and seven years. Some of these were the political governors of the people under the reign of Herod, or the reign of Archelaus his son, although, after their death the government became an aristocracy, and the high priests were intrusted with a domination over the nation. And thus much may suffice to be said concerning our high priests.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning Florus the Procurator, who assassinated the Jews to take up Arms against the Romans. The Conclusion.

I. Now Gessius Florus, who was sent as successor to Abinaeus, alias Judas, with abundance of miseries. He was by birth of the city of Cæsarea, and brought along with him his wife Clesopatra, (by whose friendship with Porcius Florus in the interval of the war,) he had also carried down the succession of our kings, and related their actions, and political administration, without considerable errors; as also the power of our magistrates; and all according to what is written in other places. For, I promised to do in the beginning of this history. And I am so bold as to say, now I have so completely perfected the work I proposed to myself to do, that no other person, whether he were a Jew or a foreigner, be rewarded for great an elucidation to it, could so accurately deliver the same accounts to the Greeks as is done in these books. For those of my own nation freely acknowledge, that I far exceed the learning of the Hebrews belonging to Jews; I have also taken a great deal of pains to obtain the learning of the Greeks, and understand the elements of the Greek language, although I have so long accustomed myself to speak our own language; that is, such as the Greeks, with sufficient exactness; for our nation does not encourage those that learn the languages of many nations, and so adorn their discourse with the smoothness of their periods; because this would in this sort of work be in general, not only to all sorts of free men, but as many of the servants as please to learn them. But they give them the testimony of being a wise man, who is fully acquainted with our laws, and is able to interpret the meaning of the actions and accounts, as there have been many who have done these endeavors with great patience to obtain this learning, there have yet hardly been so many as two or three that have succeeded therein, who were immediately born free and men. 3. And now it will not be perhaps an invidious thing, if I treat briefly on my own family, and of the actions of my own life, and while there are still living such as can either prove what is said to be false, or can attest that less true, with which accounts I shall put an end to these Antiquities, which are contained in twenty books, and six thousand verses. And if God permit me, I will briefly run over those events, that are now extant in his works, including himself as well as others, ever cite any such abridgment, I am forced rather to suppose that he never did publish any such work at all. I mean as distinct from his own life, written by himself, for an Appendix to these Antiquities, and this at least seven years after these Antiquities were finished. Nor latterly does it occur to me, that Josephus ever published that other work here mentioned, as intended by him for the public also. I mean the three or four books concerning God and his actions, and concern ing the Jews, which I have observed to him, on a thing or two, and I have also promised, if God permitted, as the conclusion of his passion to these Antiquities; nor do I suppose that he ever published any of them. The health of all his friends is at court, Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian, and the coming of those he had no acquaintance with the crown, I mean Nero and Tiberius. Nor does he come to Judea, with what followed it, might easily interrupt such his intentions, and prevent his publication of those works.
THE WARS OF THE JEWS; OR, THE HISTORY OF THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM.

PREFACE.

1. Whereas the war which the Jews made with the Romans had been the greatest of all those, not only that have been in our times, but, in a manner, of those that ever were heard of; of both of those wherein cities have fought against cities, or nations against nations; while some men who were not concerned in the affairs themselves, have gotten together vain and contradictory stories by hearsay, and have written them down after a sophistical manner; and while those that were there present have given false accounts of things, and this either out of humor or flattery to the Romans, or of hatred towards the Jews; and while their writings contain sometimes, in the neighborhood of those causes, but nowhere the accurate truth of the facts; I have proposed to myself, for the sake of such as live under the government of the Romans, to translate those books into the Greek tongue, which I formerly consulted in the Latin; and I have dedicated my work to our country, and sent it to the Upper Barbarians. I, Joseph, the son of Matthias, by birth a Hebrew, a priest also, and one who at first fought against the Romans myself, and was forced to be present at what was done afterward, [I am the author of this work.]

2. Now at the time when this great concusion of affairs happened, the affairs of the Romans were themselves in great disorder. Those Jews who were in Egypt for their trade, or for their sons as common men, were, as the times were disturbed; they were also in a flourishing condition for strength and riches, inasmuch that the affairs of the east were than exceedingly tumultuous, while some hoped for gain, and others dreaded, or feared it of loss, for the Jews hoped that all of their nation who were beyond Euphrates, would have raised an insurrection together with them. The Gauls also, in the neighborhood of those nations, were in motion, and the Celts were not quiet; but all was in disorder after the death of Nero. And the opportunity now offered induced many to aim at the royal power; and the soldiers affected change on the one hand, and hoping more on the other, I thought thereupon an absurd thing to see the truth falsified in affairs of such great consequence and to take no notice of it; but to suffer those Greeks and Romans that were not in the wars to be ignorant of what was done, and to read empty fictions and stories of actions, while the Parthians and the Babylonians, and the remotest Arabsians, and those of our nation beyond Euphrates, with the Assyrians, by my means, knew accurately both whence the war began, what miseries it brought upon us, and after what manner it ended.

3. It is true, these writers have the confidence to call their accounts histories, wherein yet they seem to me to fail of their own purpose, as well as to relate nothing that is prior to the time they have a mind to demonstrate the greatness of the Romans, while they still diminish and lessen the actions of the Jews; as not discerning how it cannot be that those must appear to be great who have only conquered those that were little. Nor are they ashamed to overlook the length of the war by the multitude of the Roman forces who were greatly suffered in it, or the might of the commanders; whose great labors about Jerusalem will be deemed inglorious, if what they achieved be reckoned but a small matter.

4. However, I will not get the other extremes out of opposition to those men who entitl the Romans, nor will I determine to raise the scions of my countrymen too high; but I will procure to them the judgment of both parties with accuracy. Yet shall I correct the language to the passages I am under, as to the affairs I describe, and must be allowed to indulge some intimations upon the miseries undergone by my own country. For that are they indicative of them in the narrative that destroyed it, and that they were the tyrants among the Jews who brought the Roman power upon us, who unwillingly attacked us, and occasioned the burning of our holy temple; that I do not conceal, what I do endeavor to show; it is myself who, during the entire war, pitied the people, who were kept under by the seditious, and did often voluntarily delay the taking of the city, and allowed time to the siege, in order to let the war, upon the comparison, quite eclipse the old wars. But if any one makes an unjust accusation against us, when we speak so passionately about the tyrants, or the robbers, or sorely bewail the misfortunes of our country, let him indulge my affections in my work. I am not a writer for writing history; because it had so come to pass, that our city, Jerusalem, had arrived at a higher degree of felicity than any other city under the Roman government; and yet at last fell into the lowest calamities again. Accordingly, it appears to me, that the misfortunes of all men, from the beginning of the world, if they be compared to these of the Jews, are not so considerable. And hence it is not foreign to me, nor to foreigners neither. This makes it impossible for me to contain my lamentations. But if any one be inflexible in his censures of me, let him attribute the facts themselves to the historian, and the lamentations to the writer himself only.

5. However, I may justly blame the learned among the Greeks, who, when such great actions have been done in their own times, which, upon the comparison, quite eclipse the old wars, do yet sit as judges of those affairs, and pass bitter censures upon the labors of the best writers of antiquity; which moderns, although they may be superior to the old writers in eloquence, yet have not the advantage of knowing what they intended to do. While these also write... new histories about the Assyrians and Medes, as it the ancient writers had not described their affairs as they ought to have done; although these be not so far from the truth as might at first sight be supposed; and yet they are different in their notions from them. For of old, every one took upon them to write what happened in his own time; where their immediate concern in the actions made their pro-

many of his auxiliaries were cut off in all Galilee; and how he took some of its cities entirely and by force, and others of them by treaty, and on terms. Nor was it, when I came to write, to describe the good order of the Romans in war, and the discipline of their legions; the amplitude of both the Galilees, with its nature, and the limits of Judea. And, besides this, I shall particularly go over what has been written concerning the rivers and fountains that are in them, and what miseries happened to every city as they were taken, and all this with accuracy as I saw the things done, or suffered the effects of the calamities I myself endured, since I shall relate them to such as know the truth of them.

9. After this, I shall relate how, when the Jews' affairs were become very bad, Nero died, and Vespasian, being led by the desire of Jerusalem, was called back to take the government upon him; what signs happened to him relating to his gaining that government, and what mutations of government then happened at Rome, and how he was any way relate the terror by his soldiers, and how, upon his departure to Egypt, to take upon him the government of the empire, the affairs of the Jews became very tumultuous; as also how the tyrants rose up against them, and fell into the power of the people. Yet shall the real truth of historical facts be preferred by us, how much soever it be neglected among the Greek historians.

6. To write concerning the Antiquities of the Jews from the beginning, and generally, and how they revolted from the Egyptians, and what country they travelled over, and what countries they seized upon afterward, and how they were removed out of one of them; this took not to be a fit opportunity, and on other accounts also, to us; and because many Jews before me have composed the histories of our ancestors very exactly; as have some of the Greeks done it also; and have transferred to us our writings in their own tongues, and have not much mistaken the truth in their histories. But then, where the writers of these affairs, and our prophets leave off, thence shall I take my rise, and begin my history with a more propitious opportunity, and shall provide that the manner of which happened in my own time, I will go over it very largely, and with all the diligence I am able; but for what preceded mine own age, that I shall run over briefly.

11. And I shall relate how Antiochus, who was named Epiphanes, took Jerusalem by force, and held it three years and three months, and was then ejected out of the country by the sons of Asmoneus; after that, how their power quarreled about the government, and brought upon their settlement the Romans and Pompey; how Herod also, the son of Antipater, dissolved their government, and brought Sossias upon them; as also how our people made a sedi-

12. I have comprehended all these things in seven books; and have left no occasion for cavil or complaint to such as have been acquainted with this war; and have written it down for the sake of those that love truth, not for those that please themselves with fictitious relations. And I will begin my account of these things with what I call my First Chapter.

The Rabbins make ten degrees of them, as Beland these informs us.

3. These seven, or rather five, degrees of purity, or purification, are numbered hereafter, b. v. ch. v. sect. 6. afterward that his brother John had a plot laid against him by Antiochus's party, and was slain by them.

CHAP. II.

Concerning the Successors of Judas, who were Jonathan, Simon, and John Hyrcanus.

1. When Jonathan, who was Judas's brother, had disappointed him, he behaved himself with great circumspection in other respects, with relation to his own people; and he corroborated his authority by preserving his friendship with the Romans. He also made a league with Antiochus, and sought the favor and protection for his security; for the tyrant Trypho, who was guardian to Antiochus's son, laid a plot against him; and, besides, that, endowed to take off his front, conceived a design against Jonathan by a wire, as he was going to Ptolemais. He also forewarned, with a few persons in his company, and put them in bonds, and then made an expedition against the Jews; but when he was afterward driven away by Simon, who was from the Roman nation of the Macedonians, enraged at his defeat, he put Jonathan to death.

2. However, Simon managed the public affairs after a courageous manner, and took Gaza, and Joppa, and Jamnia, which were cities in the neighborhood, and made a garrison under and demolished the citadel. He was afterward an auxiliary to Antiochus against Trypho, whom he besieged in Dora, before he went on his expedition against the Medes; yet could not make the same success, that the king might assist him in killing Trypho; for it was not long ere Antiochus sent Cendebeus his general, with an army to lay waste Judea, and to subdue Simon; yet he, though he were now in years, continued a brave and valorous man. He also sent his sons with a band of strong men against Antiochus, while he took part of the army himself with him, and fell upon him from ambush, and got a great many men in ambush in many places of the pass, and was superior in all his attacks upon them, and when he had been conqueror after so glorious a manner, he was made high priest, and also freed the wives from the Roman nation of the Macedonians, after a hundred and seventy years of the empire of Seleucus.

3. This Simon had also a plot laid against him, and was slain at a feast by his son-in-law Ptolemy, who put his wife and two of his children to death, and some persons to kill John, who was also called Hyrcanus.* But when the young man was informed of their coming beforehand, he made much haste to get to the city, as having a very great fear. So he had an account of the memory of the glorious actions of his father, and of the hatred they could not but bear to the injustice of Ptolemy. Ptolemy also made an attempt to get into the city by another gate; but was repelled by the people, who had just then admitted Hyrcanus; so he returned presently to one of the fortresses that were about Jericho, which was called Dagon. Now, when he had received the high priesthood, which his father had held before, and had offered sacrifice to God, he made great haste to attack Ptolemy, that he might afford relief to his mother and brethren.

4. * Why this John the son of Simon, the high priest, and governor of the Jews, was called Hyrcanus, Josephus here nowhere informs us; nor is he called other than John at the end of the first book of the Maccabees. However, Sestus Sessenas when he gives us an epitome of the Greek version of the book here abridged by Josephus, or of the chronicles of this John Hyrcanus, than extant, observes that he was called Hyrcanus, from his conquest of one of that name. See Antiqu. Bk. part 1 p. 87. But of this younger Antiochus, see Dean Alford's note here.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SEVEN YEARS.—FROM THE TA

KING OF JERUSALEM BY ANTIochus Epiphanes, TO THE DEATH OF HEROD THE GREAT.

CHAP. I.

How the City of Jerusalem was taken, and the Temple polluted by Antiochus Epiphanes. It also concerning the Actions of the Maccebees, Matthias, and Judas; and concerning the Death of Judas.

§ 1. At the same time that Antiochus, who is called Epiphanes, had a quarrel with the sixth Ptolemy about his right to the whole country of Syria, a great sedition fell among the men of power in Judæa, and they had a contention about obtaining the government; while each of those that were of dignity could not endure to be subject to their equals. However, Onias, one of the high priests, got the better, and cast the sons of Tobias out of the city; who fled to Antiochus, and besought him to make use of them for his leaders, and to make an expedition into Judæa. CHAP. II.

Concerning the Successors of Judas, who were Jonathan, Simon, and John Hyrcanus.

1. When Jonathan, who was Judas's brother, suffered him, he behaved himself with great circumspection in other respects, with relation to his own people; and he corroborated his authority by preserving his friendship with the Romans. He also made a league with Antiochus, and was the principal person to watch for his security; for the tyrant Trypho, who was guardian to Antiochus's son, laid a plot against him; and, besides that, endeavored to take off his friends and caught Jonathan by a wife, as he was going to Ptolemais to Antiochus, with some persons in his company, and put them in bonds, and then made an expedition against the Jews; but when he was afterward driven away by Simon, who was Jonathan's brother, he was enraged at his defeat, but put Jonathan to death.

2. However, Simon managed the public affairs after a courageous manner, and took Gaza, and Joppa, and Jaminis, which were cities in the neighborhood. He also drove garrison under, and demolished the citadel. He was afterward an auxiliary to Antiochus, against Trypho, whom he besieged in Dora, before he went on his expedition against the Medes; yet could not he make the Medes fight on foot. He also sent and assisted him in killing Trypho; for it was not long ere Antiochus sent Cendebeus his general with an army to lay waste Judaea, and to subdue Simon; yet he, though he was now in years, continued a great warrior and a great man. He also sent his sons with a band of strong men against Antiochus, while he took part of the army himself with him, and fell upon him in the army and put to flight a great many of them, and in ambush in many places of the mountain, and was superior in all his attacks upon them, and when he had been conqueror after so glorious a manner, he was made high priest, and also freed the Jews from the dominion of the Medes, in about a hundred and seventy years of the empire [of Seleucus].

3. This Simon had also a plot laid against him, and was slain at a feast by his son-in-law Ptolemy, who put his part in, which brought to death some persons to kill John, who was also called Hyrcanus. But when the young man was informed of their coming beforehand, he made much haste to get to the city, as having a very great confidence of the account of the memory of the glorious actions of his father, and of the hatred they could not but bear to the injustice of Ptolemy. Ptolemy also made an attempt to get into the city by another gate; but was repelled by the people, who had just then admitted Hyrcanus; so he returned presently to one of the fortresses that were about Jericho, which was called DAGOS. Now, when Simon had received the high priesthood, which his father had held before, and had offered sacrifice to God, he made great haste to attack Ptolemy, that he might afford relief to his mother and brethren.

4. He hastened to the fortress, and was superior to Ptolemy in other respects, but was overcome by him as to the just affection [he had for his relations] for when Ptolemy was defeated, he brought forth his mother and his brethren, and set them upon the wall, and beat them with rods in every body's sight, and threatened, that unless he would go away immediately, he would throw them down headlong; at which sight Hyrcanus's commiseration and concern were too hard for his son. But his mother was de- mayed, neither at the stripes she received, nor at the death with which she was threatened; but stretched out her hands, and prayed her son not to be moved with the injuries that she had suffered to spare the wretch, since it was to her better to die by the means of Ptolemy than to live ever so long, provided he might be punished for the injuries he had done to their family. Now John's case was this: when he considered the courage of his mother, and also the enmity of Trypho about his attacks; but when he saw her beaten, and torn to pieces with the stripes, he grew feas- bie, and was entirely overcome by his affections. And as the siege was delayed by this war, the year of rest came on, upon which the Jews met every seventh year, as they do on every seventh day. On this year, therefore, Ptolemy was freed from being besieged, and slew the brethren of John, with their mother, and fled to Seleucia, which was also called Cotyla, who was the tyrant of Philadelphia.

5. And now Antiochus was so angry at what he had suffered from Simon, that he made an expedition into Judea, and set down Dora, and besieged Jerusalem, and besieged Hyrcanus; but Hyrcanus opened the sepulchre of David, who was the richest of all kings, and took thence about three thousand talents in money, and induced Antiochus, by the great plenty of corn he found, to raise the siege. Moreover, he was the first of the Jews that had money enough, and began to hire foreign auxiliaries also.

6. However, at another time, when Antiochus was gone on another expedition against the Medes, and so gave Hyrcanus an opportunity of being revenged upon him, he immediately made an attack upon the cities of Syria, as thinking, what will he do? He had already come to him, and had them empty of good troops. So he took Medes and Sameas, with the towns in their neighborhood, as also Shechem and Gerizim; and besides these [he subdued] the nation of the Cathenians, who dwell round about that temple which was built in imitation of the temple at Jerusalem; he also took a great many other cities of Idumeas, with Adoreone and Marsia.

7. He also proceeded as far as Samaria, where is now the city of Sabath, which was built by Herod the king, and encompassed it all round with a wall, and set his sons Aristobulus and Antigou- nus over the siege; who pushed it on so hard, that a famine so far prevailed within the city, in it they were not able to get sufficient food. They also invited Antiochus, who was called Cyscicus, to come to their assistance: whereupon he got ready, and complied with their invitation, but was beaten by Aristobulus and Antigonus; and indeed he was pursued as far as Scythopolis by these brethren, and fled away from them. So they returned back to Sa- maria, and sent the multitude again within the wall; and when they had taken their situation, demolished it, and made slaves of its inhabitants.

And, as they had still great success in their undertakings, they did not suffer their zeal to cool, but marched with an army as far as Scythopolis, and made an halt in the desert, and so spread out the whole country that lay within Mount Carmel.

8. But then, these successes of John and his sons made them be enviied, and occasioned a se- dition in the country, and many there were who got together, and would not be at rest till they broke out into open war, in which war they were beaten. So John lived the rest of his life very happily, and administered the government after a most extraordinary manner, and this for thirty-three entire years together. He died, leaving five sons behind him. He was certainly a very happy man, and afforded no occasion to have any complaint made of fortune on his account. He it was who alone had three of the most desirable things, the government of his nation, and the high priesthood, and the gift of prophecy: For the Deity conversed with him, and he was not ignorant of any thing that was to come afterward; insomuch, that he foresaw and foretold the events that would undoubtedly come to pass. He was one of the most wealthy men in the land, and was called a rich man. And, when he was going along that dark passage, which was called Strato's Tower, he was slain by the body guards, and became an eminent instance how calumny destroys all good-will and natural affections: For none of our good nations are strong enough to resist evil peremptorily.

5. And truly any one would be surprised at Judas upon this occasion. He was of the sect of the Essenes, and had never failed or deceived the interests of his district. Nevertheless, he also saw Antigonus as he was passing along by the temple, and cried out to his acquaintance, (they were not a few who attended upon him as his scholars,) 'O strague!' said he; 'it is good for no man to live now; for the truth is dead both here and abroad: I hive somewhat that I have foretold hath proved false; for this Antigonus is this day alive, who ought to have died this day; and the place where he ought to die now, is straitly guarded by the body guards, who are called the body guards of Strato's Tower, which is at the distance of six hundred furlongs from this place; and yet four hours of this day are over already, which point of time renders the prediction impossible to be fulfilled.' And, when he had said this, he was dejected in his mind, and so continued. But, in a little time, news came that Antigonus was slain in a subterranean place, which was itself also called Strato's Tower, by the same name with that of Caesar, which lies by the sea-side, and this ambiguity it was which caused the prophet's disorder.

6. Hereupon Aristobulus repented of the great crime he had been guilty of, and this gave occasion to the increase of his distress. For, he became worse and worse, and his soul was constantly disturbed at the thoughts of what he had done, till his very bowels were torn to pieces by the intolerable grief he was under, he threw up his neck, and was thrown into his chamber, where he was informed of all that had been done, and were determined upon; and, when the servants that attended him carried out that blood, he, by some supernatural providence, slipped and fell down in the very place where Antigonus was slain, and an eternal steel was formed in the first manner possible, and that, in a great measure, to pray to God on the behalf of his brother. Now, at this very time it was, that these ill men came to the king, and told him in what a prosperous manner the armed men came, and with what insolence Antigonus marched, and that such his insolence was too great for a private person, and that accordingly he was come with a great band of men to kill him; for that he could not endure the sight of a man of royal blood on it was in his power to take the kingdom himself.

3. Now Aristobulus, by degrees, and unwillingly, gave credit to these accusations; and accordingly he took care not to discover his suspicion on account of any accidents: so he placed the guards of his body in a dark subterranean passage, for he lay sick in a place called formerly the Citadel, though afterward his name was changed to Antigonus. He then, as he had always done, if Antigonus came unarmed, they should let him alone; but if he came to him in his armor, they should kill him. He also sent some to let him know beforehand, that he should come unarmed. But, upon this occasion, the queen very cunningly con-
5. Yet did Alexander meet both these forces with one thousand horsemen, and eight thousand mercenaries that were on foot. He had also with him that part of the Jews which favored him, to the number of ten thousand; while the adherents of Antiochus had three thousand horsemen, and fourteen thousand footmen. Now, before they joined battle, the kings made proclamation, and endeavored to draw off each other's soldiers, and make them engage, while Demetrius induced Alexander's mercenaries to leave him, and Alexander hoped to induce the Jews that were with Demetrius to leave him. But, since neither the Jews would leave off their rage, nor the Greeks their idolatries, so each made up their minds to engage, and to close fight with their weapons. In which battle Demetrius was the conqueror, although Alexander's mercenaries showed the greatest exploits, both in soul and body. Yet did the prophet of the event, and the different result, from what was expected, as to both of them; for neither did those that invited Demetrius to come to them continue firm to him, though he was conqueror; and they, out of pity to the change of Alexander's condition, when he was fled to the mountains, came over to him. Yet could not Demetrius bear this turn of affairs, but supposing that Alexander was already become a most determined enemy, and that the nation would [at length] run to him, he left the country and went his way.

6. However, the rest of the [Jewish] multitude did not lay aside their quarrels with him, when they saw Alexander not only consulting with his friends, but having recourse to armed forces; for on those feasts asidiae are generally begun, and it looked as if he should not be able to escape the plot they had laid for him, had not his foreign auxiliaries, the Parthians and Cilicians, assisted him. And, when he saw that his safety depended upon his mercenary troops, on account of their innate enmity against the Jewish nation. And when he had slain more than six thousand of the rebels, he made an incursion into Arabia, and having subdued it, he returned to Jerusalem. In which he was not so sanguinary as to be without a perpetual war with Alexander, until he had slain the greatest part of them, and driven the rest into the city Bemaesa; and when he had demolished that city, he carried the captives to Jerusalem. He also took great care, that his barbarity proceeded to the degree of impiety; for, when he had ordered eight hundred to be hung upon crosses in the midst of the city, he had the throats of their wives and children cut off, and their other extremities he saw as he was drinking and lying down with his concubines. Upon which so deep a surprise seized on the people that eight thousand of his opponents were slain, and the women and children of all Judea, whose flight was only prevented by Alexander's death; so at last, though not till late and with great difficulty, he, by such actions, procured a quiet kingdom, and left off fighting any more.

7. Yet did that Antiochus, who was also called Dionysius, become an origin of troubles again. This man was the brother of Demetrius, and the last of the race of the Seleucids. Alexander was afraid of him, when he was marching against the Arabsians; so he cut a deep trench between Antipatrus, which was near the mountains, and the shores of Joppa; he also erected a high wall before the trench, and built wooden towers in order to hinder him. Nay, his rage was so extra-ordinary, that he was not able to exclude Antiochus, for he burnt the towers and filled up the trenches, and marched on with his army. And as he looked upon taking his revenge on Antiochus, he was not desisting to stop him, but, as a thing of less consequence, he marched directly against the Arabsians, whose king retired into such parts of the country as were fittest for engaging the enemy, and stood on the north, and then on the west, and at last on the mountain. They were in number ten thousand, and fell upon Antiochus's army while they were in disorder, and a terrible battle ensued. Antiochus's troops, so long as he was alive fought it out, although though a mighty slaughter was made among them by the Arabsians; but when he fell, for he was in the foremost, in the utmost danger in rallying his troops, they all gave ground, and the officers heretofore present became terrified, and were not able to do anything; whereas they might have hoped against their enemies; so Antiochus was taken prisoner, and led the Roman commander Scipio, whose name was Tribune of the soldiers, and thus was the whole war brought to a conclusion.

*Josephus here calls this Antiochus the last of the Seleucids, although there remained still a priest of another king of that family, Antiochus Aëtatus, of Sanda, who reigned, and then, a century later on, Antiochus the Great was called Antiochus the last of the Seleucids.
WAR OF THE JEWS.

greatest part of his army was destroyed, either in the action or the flight; and for the rest, who fled to the village of Canna, it happened that they were all consumed by want of necessaries, a few only excepted.

8. About this time it was that the people of Damascus, out of their hatred to Pontius, the son of Meaneus, invited Aretas [to take the government], and the king of Palmyra. This man also made an expedition against Judea, and beat Alexander in battle; but afterward retired by mutual agreement. But Alexander, when he had taken Pella, marched to Gerasa again out of the consent of Aretas; and he had of the Thracians for forsworn enemies; and when he had built a triple wall about the garrison, he took the place by force. He also demolished Golan, and Seleucis, and what was called the Valley of Antiochus; besides which, he took the strong fortress of Damascus, and stripped Demetrius, who was governor there, of which he had, on account of the many crimes laid to his charge, and then returned into Judea, after he had been three whole years in that country, and was kindly received of the nation, because of the good success he had. So, when he was at rest from war, he fell into a distemper; for he was afflicted with a quartana ague, and affected by a remarkable lethargy; in a word, he could make no motion at all. In his last extremity, upon being advised by his attendants and his ministers of war, that he should get rid of this distemper, but, by making such expeditions at unseasonable times, and forcing his body to undergo greater hardships than it was able to bear, he brought himself to his end. He died, therefore, in the midst of his troubles, after he had reigned seven and twenty years.

CHAP. V.
Alexandra reigns nine Years, during which time the Pharisees were the real Rulers of the Nation.

1. Now Alexander left the kingdom to Alexander his wife, and dependent upon it that the Jews cared very little about it, because she had been very averse to such cruelty as he had treated them with, and had opposed his violation of their laws, and had thereby got the good-will of the people. Nor was he mistaken in this, for this was a moment to keep the dominion, by the opinion that the people had of her piety; for she chiefly studied the ancient customs of her country, and cast those means upon the government that offended against their holy laws. And, as she had two sons by Alexander, she made Hyrcanus the elder high priest, on account of his age, as also on account of his inactive temper, which noways disposed him to disturb the public. But she retained the younger, Aristobulus, with her, as a private person, by reason of the warmth of his temper.

2. And now the Pharisees joined themselves to her, to assist her in the government. There were a certain sect of the Jews that are more religious than others, and seem to interpret the laws more accurately. Now, Alexander heard them to an extraordinary degree, as being herself a woman of great piety towards God. The Pharisees also insinuated themselves into her favor by little and little, and became themselves the real administrators of the public affairs: they banished and reduced what they pleased; they bound and loosed, as they pleased, as at their pleasure; and, at once, they had the enjoyment of the royal authority, while the expenses and the difficulties of it belonged to Alexander. She was a sagacious woman in the management of great affairs, and intent always upon gathering soldiers together; so that she increased her army the one hundred thousand, and procured a great body of foreign troops, till her own nation became not only powerful at home, but terrible also to foreign potentates, while she governed other people, and the Pharisees governed her.

3. Accordingly they themselves slew Diogene, a person of figure, and one that had been a friend to Alexander: and accused him as having assisted the king with his advice, for crucifying the elder Hyrcanus. He also had prevailed with Alexander to put to death the rest of those who had irritated him against them. Now, she was so superstitious as to comply with their desires, and accordingly she slew whose the number of marauders they had, and put those that were in danger fled to Aristobulus, who persuaded his mother to spare the men on account of their dignity, but to expel them out of the city, unless they were to be innocent; so some were offered to go unpunished, and some dispersed all over the country. But when Alexander sent out her army to Damascus, under pretense that Pontus was always oppressing that city, she procured her army to march against the inaccessible resistance. She also prevailed with Tigranes, king of Armenia, who lay with his troops about Polemais, and besieged Cleopatra, by agreements and presents, to go away. Aristobulus, however, sallied forth, because he was by reason of those domestic tumults which happened upon Lucullus's expedition into Armenia.

4. In the meantime, Alexander fell sick, and Aristobulus, her younger son, took hold of this opportunity with his domestics, of which he had a great many, who were all of them his friends on account of the warmth of their youth, and got possession of all the fortresses. He also used the sums of money he found in them, to get together a number of mercenaries; and, one half, and procured himself self king; and besides this, upon Hyrcanus's com plaint to his mother, she compassionated his case, and put Aristobulus's wife and sons under restraint in Antonia, which was a fortress that Alexander had built. And therefore she says, "I have already said, of old called the Ciudadel; but afterward got the name of Antonia, when Antony was lord of the East, just as the other cities, Seleucia and Ephraim, got the name of their chance, and these given them, from Sebastus and Agrippa. But Alexander died before she could punish Aristobulus for his disinherititing his brother, after she had reigned nine years.

CHAP. VI.
When Hyrcanus, who was Alexander's Heir, received from his Claim of the Crown, Aristobulus is made King, and afterward the same Hyrcanus, by the means of Antipater, is brought back by Aretas. At last Pompey is made the Arbitrator of the Dispute between the Two Hyrcanuses.

1. Now Hyrcanus was heir to the kingdom, and told him his father commit it before she died; but Aristobulus was superior to him in power and magnificence; and when there was a battle between them, to decide the dispute about the crown, the king of Judah sent one of his embassadors, named Hyrcanus, and went over to Aristobulus; but Hyrcanus, with those of his party who stood with him, fled to Antonia, and got into his power awhile in prison, he put her to death. Dean Aldrich supposes here that Strabo contradicts Josephus, which does not appear to me; for although Josephus speaks here and in the Antiquities, b. xii. ch. xxii. sect. 7, that Tigranes besieged her now in Polemais, and that he took the city, the Antiquities inform us, yet does he nowhere intimate that he now took the city on the benefit so that both the narrations of Strabo, and Josephus may be still true notwithstanding.

* Matt. xvi. 10; xviii. 18.
† Here we have the oldest and most authentic Jewish authorities. The observations of the Jews, in being superstitious, are for punishing or abolishing men, not for declaring actions lawful or unlawful, as some more modern Jews and Christians prefer it.
‡ Strabo, b. xvi. p. 740, relates, that this Scipio Cestius was besieged by Tigranes, not in Polemais, as here, but after she had left Syria in Seleucia, a citizen in Mesopotamia; and adds, that when he had kept her

2. The hostages that might be for his preservation (which were Aristobulus's wife, with her children); to the presence of the hostages, things should come to extremities, that Aristobulus should be king, and Hyrcanus should resign that up, but retain all the rest of his dignity, being the king's brother. Hereupon they were taken to Jerusalem, and there in the temple, and embraced another in a very kind manner, while the people stood round about them: they also changed their houses, while Aristobulus went to the royal palace, and Hyrcanus retired to the house of Aristobulus himself in Jerusalem, as relying on the bribes that Scaurus had received: he was also there himself, and adorned himself after a manner the most agreeable to royalty that he was able. But he soon thought of the force that came in as soon in the manner, and could not endure to serve his own ends in a way so much more abject than he was used to; so he departed from Diospolis.

3. Now, those other people who were at variance with Aristobulus were afraid upon his unexpected obtaining the government; and especially the sons of Aristobulus, who hated old. He was by birth an Idumeese, and one of the principal of that nation on account of his ancestors and riches, and other authority to him belonging; He also persuaded Hyrcanus to fly to Areata, the king of Arabia, and to lay claim to the kingdom; as also he persuaded Areata to receive Hyrcanus, and to bring him back to his kingdom: he also cast great reproaches upon Aristobulus, as to his morals, and gave to Areata a pledge of the inheritance: and the envoys that were from Scaurus to receive him, and told him how becoming a thing it would be for him, who ruled so great a kingdom, to afford his assistance to such as are injured; alleging that Hyrcanus was a man of good character, most sagacious, and that his dominion which belonged to him by the prerogative of his birth. And when he had predisposed them both to do what he would have them, he took Hyrcanus by night, and ran away from the camp, and with his best soldiers, and in a great swiftness, he escaped to the place called Petra, which is the royal seat of the king of Arabia, where he put Hyrcanus into Areata's hand: and by discovering much with him, and gaining upon him with many presents, he prevailed with him to give him an army that might restore him to his kingdom. This army consisted of fifty thousand footmen and horsemen, against which Aristobulus was not able to make resistance, but was deserted in his first onset, and was driven to Jerusalem: he also had been taken at first by force, if Scaurus, the Roman general, had not come and sanguinely interposed himself, and raised the standard of the Romans, and Scaurus was sent into Syria: the Arameans by Pontius the Great, and he fought against Tigranes: so Scaurus came to Damascus, which had been lately taken by Metellus and Lollius, and caused them to leave the place; and the Roman commanders that were his friends, and stood, he made haste thither as to a certain booty.

3. As soon therefore as he was come into the country, there came ambassadors from both the brothers, each of them desiring his assistance; but Aristobulus's three hundred talents had more weight with him than the justice of the cause, which sum, when Scaurus had received it, he sent a herald to Hyrcanus and the Arabians, and threatened them with the resentment of the Romans, if he was informed that his brother had the siege. So Areata was terrified, and retired out of Judea to Philadelphia, as did Scaurus return to Damascus again: nor was Aristobulus satisfied with escaping [out of his brother's hands], but when he was left in the camp, he fell upon his enemies, and fought them at a place called Paphos, and slew about six thousand of them, and, together with them, Antipater's brother, Phasael.

4. When Hyrcanus and Antipater were thus deprived of their hopes from the Arabians, they transferred the same to their adversaries; and because Pompey had passed through Syria, and was come to Damascus, they fled to him for assistance; and without any bribes, they made the same equitable pleas that they had used to Areata, and he brought him to the shores of Egypt, and left him, and embraced another in a very kind manner, while the people stood round about them: they also changed their houses, while Aristobulus went to the royal palace, and Hyrcanus retired to the house of Aristobulus himself in Jerusalem, as relying on the bribes that Scaurus had received: he was also there himself, and adorned himself after a manner the most agreeable to royalty that he was able. But he soon thought of the force that came in as soon in the manner, and could not endure to serve his own ends in a way so much more abject than he was used to; so he departed from Diospolis.

5. At this his behavior Pompey had great indignation; Hyrcanus also and his friends made great intercession to Pompey; so he took not only his Roman forces, but many of his Syrian auxiliaries, and marched against Aristobulus. But when he had passed by the river Euphrates, and had abandoned Areata to receive him, and told him how becoming a thing it would be for him, who ruled so great a kingdom, to afford his assistance to such as are injured; alleging that Hyrcanus was a man of good character, most sagacious, and that his dominion which belonged to him by the prerogative of his birth. And when he had predisposed them both to do what he would have them, he took Hyrcanus by night, and ran away from the camp, and with his best soldiers, and in a great swiftness, he escaped to the place called Petra, which is the royal seat of the king of Arabia, where he put Hyrcanus into Areata's hand: and by discovering much with him, and gaining upon him with many presents, he prevailed with him to give him an army that might restore him to his kingdom. This army consisted of fifty thousand footmen and horsemen, against which Aristobulus was not able to make resistance, but was deserted in his first onset, and was driven to Jerusalem: he also had been taken at first by force, if Scaurus, the Roman general, had not come and sanguinely interposed himself, and raised the standard of the Romans, and Scaurus was sent into Syria: the Arameans by Pontius the Great, and he fought against Tigranes: so Scaurus came to Damascus, which had been lately taken by Metellus and Lollius, and caused them to leave the place; and the Roman commanders that were his friends, and stood, he made haste thither as to a certain booty.

6. As soon therefore as he was come into the country, there came ambassadors from both the brothers, each of them desiring his assistance; but Aristobulus's three hundred talents had more weight with him than the justice of the cause, which sum, when Scaurus had received it, he sent a herald to Hyrcanus and the Arabians, and threatened them with the resentment of the Romans, if he was informed that his brother had the siege. So Areata was terrified, and retired out of Judea to Philadelphia, as did Scaurus return to Damascus again: nor was Aristobulus satisfied with escaping [out of his brother's hands], but when he was left in the camp, he fell upon his enemies, and fought them at a place called Paphos, and slew about six thousand of them, and, together with them, Antipater's brother, Phasael.

7. That this Antipater, the father of Herod the Great, who lived with Joseph, affords us here, see the note on Antq. b. xiv. ch. xv. sect. 2. It is somewhat probable, as Havercamp supposes, and as some have been of opinion, that it were the tent, that Pompey did take the many presents offered him by Hyrcanus, as he would have done the others from Aristobulus, sect. 6; although his remarkable absentness from the 9000 talents that were in the Jewish temple, when he took it a little afterward, see the notes in Havercamp's edition, both here and b. ii. ch. ix. sect. 1. They are somewhat too long to be transcribed in this place.
also promised him money, and that he would deliver up both himself and the city into his disposal, and thereby mitigate the anger of Pompey. Yet did not he perform any of the conditions he had agreed to: for Aristobulus's party would not so much as admit Gabinius into the city, who was sent to receive the money that he had promised.

CHAP. VII.

How Pompey had the City of Jerusalem delivered up to him, but took the Temple [by Force.] How he went into the Holy of Holies; as also, what were his other Exploits in Judas.

1. At this treatment Pompey was very angry, and determined to send Gabinius into the city. And when he came to the city, he looked about where he might make his attack; for he saw the walls were so firm, that it would be hard to overcome them, and that the valley before the walls was terrible; and that the temple, which was within that valley, was itself encompassed with a very strong wall, insomuch that if the city were taken, the temple would be a second place of refuge for the enemy to retire to. So Pompey had a long time to deliberate about this matter, a sedition arose among the people within the city: Aristobulus's party being willing to fight, and to set their king at liberty, while the party of Hyrcanus were for opening the gates to Pompey, lest the dread of the latter should be in occasioned these last to be a very numerous party, when they looked upon the excellent order the Roman soldiers were in. So Aristobulus's party was not able to repulse the Romans in the temple, and the temple was cut off from the communication between the temple and the city, by breaking down the bridge that joined them together; and prepared to make an opposition to the utmost; but as the others had resolved on setting the Romans into the city and had delivered up the palace to him, Pompey sent Piso, one of his great officers, into that palace with an army, who distributed a garrison about the city, because he could not persuade any one of those that had fled to the temple to come to terms of accommodation; he then disposed all things that were round about them so as might favor their attacks, as having Hyrcanus's party very ready to assist them both counsel and assistance.

2. But Pompey, in a pitch that was on the north side of the temple, and the entire valley also, the army itself being obliged to carry the materials for that purpose. And indeed it was a hard thing to fill up that valley, by reason of its immense depth, especially as the Jews used all the means possible to repel them from their superior station: nor had the Romans succeeded in their endeavors, had not Pompey taken notice of the seventh days, on which the Jews abstain from all sorts of work on a religious account, and raised his bank, but restrained his soldiers from fighting on those days; for the Jews only acted defensively on Sabbath-days. But as soon as Pompey had filled up the valley, he erected high towers upon the bank, and brought those engines which they had fetched from Tyre near to the wall, and tried to batter it down, and the slingers of stones beat off those that stood above them, and drove them away; but the towers on this side of the city made very great resistance, and were indeed extraordinary both for largeness and magnificence.

3. Now here it was, that upon the many hardships which the Romans underwent, Pompey could not but admire not only at the other instances of the Jews' fortitude, but especially that they did not at all intermit their religious services, even when they were encompassed with one Demetrius, who was of Gades, and was one of his own freed-men. He also made other cities free from their dominion, that lay in the midst of the country, such as means they had not demolished before that time, Hippo, and Scythopolis, as also Pella, and Samaria, and Marissa; and besides these, Ascalon, and Jannia, and Arethusa; and in like manner dealt he with the maritime towns, as Tyre, and Dora, and others; that which was anciently called Strato’s Tower; but was afterward rebuilt with the most magnificent edifices, and had its name changed to Cesarea, by king Herodes, by which means the town grew to be the greatest city in the province of Syria; which province, together with Judea, and the countries as far as Egypt and Ethiopia, he committed to Scænus as his governor, and put his sons, and put the sons of these cities, and the whole of Syria in his power; while he made all the haste he could himself to go through Cilicia, in his way to Rome, having Aristobulus and his children along with him, as his captives. They were two daughters and two sons; the one of his first wife, the other of his second. A tale king as he was going; but the younger, Antigonus, with his sisters, were carried to Rome.

CHAP. VIII.

Alexander, the Son of Aristobulus, who ran away from Pompey, makes an expedition against Hyrcania, but being overpowered by Gabinius, he delivers up the Fortresses to him. After this Aristobulus escapes from Rome, and gathers an Army together; but being beaten by the Romans, he is brought back to Rome; with other things relating to Gabinius, Cæsarea, and Carthaginians.

1. At the same time, Scænus made an expedition into Arabia, but was stopped by the difficulty of the places about Petra. However, he laid waste the country about Pella, though even there he was under great hardships; for his army was debouched upon wild and savage people, which want, Hyrcanus afforded him some assistance, and sent him provisions by the means of Antipater, whom also Scænus sent to Aretas, as one well acquainted with him, to induce him to pay him money, or buy his peace. A Tazit king of Arabia, complied with the proposal, and gave him three hundred talents; upon which Scænus drew his army out of Arabia.

2. But as for Alexander, that son of Aristobulus, as Pompey, in some time he got a considerable band of men together, and lay heavy upon Hyrcanus, and overran Judea, and was likely to overturn him quickly; and indeed he had come to Jerusalem, and had begun to rebel; but a wall that was drawn down by Pompey, had not Gabinus, who was sent as successor to Scænus into Syria, showed his bravery, as in many other points, so in making an expedition against Alexander; who, as he was afraid that he would attack him, as he got together a large army, composed of ten thousand armed footmen, and fifteen hundred horsemen. He also built walls about proper places, Alexandria, and Hyrcanium, and Macherus, that lay upon the mountains of Arabia.

3. However, Gabinus sent before him Marcus Antonius, and followed himself with his whole army; but for the select body of soldiers that were to accompany Aristobulus’s party, for which Alexander, under the command of Malichus and Pitholus, these joined themselves to those captains that were about Marcus Antonius, and met Alexander; to which body came Gabinus with his main army soon afterward; and as Alexander was not able to sustain the charge of the enemies’ forces,

Take the like attestation to the truth of the subduing of Aretes, king of Arabia, to Scænus the Roman general, in the words of Dean Aldrich. "Hence," says he, "is derived that old and famous Damieri belonging to the Ethnic family, incorporated in Havana's ed.

now they were joined, he retired. But when he was come near to Jerusalem, he was forced to fight, and lost six thousand men in the battle; of whom three thousand were slain and fell dead, and three thousand were taken alive; so he fled with the remainder to Alexandria.

4. Now, Gabinus was come to Alexandria, because he found there a great many there exposed and undermined by promises and threats of former offences, to induce them to come over to him, before it came to a fight; but when they would not hear to no terms of accommodation, he slew a great number of them, and shut up the greatest number of them in the city. And now Marcus Antonius, their leader, signalized himself in this battle, who, as he always shewed of great courage, so did he never show it so much as now; but he shewed it in another manner. When the citizens, went out himself, and settled the cities that had not been demolished, and rebuilt those that had been destroyed. Accordingly, upon his injunction, the following cities were restored: Sciponoplis, Samaria, Anderdon, Galatia, Iassia, Raphia, Marissa, Adoris, Camela, Ascalon, and many others; while a great number of men readily ran to each of them, and became their inhabitants.

5. When Gabinus had taken care of these cities, he returned to Alexandria, and pressed on the siege. So when Alexander despaired of ever obtaining the government, he sent ambassadors to Rome, and prayed for what he could with his forces, and submitted himself to the Romans, and promised, as remaining a fortress, Hyrcanium and Macherus, as he put Alexandria into his hands afterward; all which Gabinus demolished, at the persuasion of Alexander’s mother, that they might not captivate, or hold in the second war. She was now there in order to mollify Gabinus, out of her concern for her relations that were captives at Rome, who were her husband and her other children. And Gabinus, having come to Jerusalem, and committed the care of the temple to him; but ordained the other political government to be by an aristocracy. He also parted the whole nation into five conventions, assigning one portico to Jerusalem, another to Gades, that another should belong to Anathus, a fourth to Jericho, and to the fifth division was allotted Sephoris, a city of Galilee. So the people were glad to be thus freed from monarchial government, and were governed for the future by an aristocracy.

6. Yet did Aristobulus afford another foundation for new disturbances. He fled away from Rome, and got together again many of the Jews that were dispersed of a change, such as had borne an affection to him of old; and when he had taken Alexandria in the first place, he attempted to build a wall about it; but as soon as Gabinus had sent an army against him under the conduct of Sisenna, Antonius, and Servillius, he was aware of it, and retreated to Macherus. And as for the unprofitable multitude, he dismissed them, and only marched on with those that were armed, being to the number of eight thousand in all; of whom was Pitholus, who had been the lieutenant at Jerusalem, but deserted to Aristobulus with a thousand of his men: so the Romans followed him, and when it came to a battle, Aristobulus lost a great part of his army; but seriously: but at length they were overborne by the Romans, and of them five thousand fell dead, and about two thousand fled to a certain little hill, but the thousand that remained with Aristobulus broke through the Roman army, and marched together to Macherus; and, when the PARTHIS from repassing it; concerning which matter we shall speak elsewhere.

CHAPTER IX.

Aristobulus is taken off by Pompey's Friends. * As is his son Alexander by Scipio. Antipater cultivates a Friendship with Caesar, after Pompey's Death; he also performs great Actions in that War, wherein he assisted Mithridates.

1. Now, upon the flight of Pompey, and of the senate, beyond the Ionian Sea, Caesar got Rome and the empire under his power, and released Aristobulus from his bonds. He also commuted two legions to him, and sent him in haste into the province, that by his forces he might easily conquer that country, and the parts adjoining to Judea. But envy prevented any effect of Aristobulus's alacrity, and the hopes of Caesar; for he was taken off by poison given him by his enemies. Plutarch, in his Life of Caesar, says, he had not so much as a burial vouchsafed him in his own country; but his dead body lay [above ground], preserved in honey, until it was sent to the Jews by Antony, in order to be buried in the temple.

2. His son Alexander also was behaved by Scipio at Antioch, and that by the command of Pompey, and upon an accusation laid against him by a certain tribunal, for the mischief he had done to the Romans. But Plutarch, in his Life of Mithridates, who was then ruler of Chalcis under Labienus, took his brethren to him, by sending his son Philippus for them to Ascalon, who took Antigonus, as well as his sisters, away from Aristobulus's wife, and brought them to his father, and falling in love with the younger daughter, he married her, and was afterward slain by his father, on her account; for Ptolemy himself, after the death of Alexander, married her, whose name was Alessandra; on account of which marriage, he took the greater care of her brother and sister.

3. Now, after Pompey was dead, Antipater changed sides, and cultivated a friendship with Caesar. And, since Mithridates of Pontus, with the forces he led against Egypt, was excluded from the avenues about Ptolemais, and was forced to stay at Ascalon, he persuaded the Egyptians, among whom he had lived, to assist him. And Alexander himself, at the head of three thousand armed men. He also encouraged the men of power in Syria to come to his assistance, as also of the inhabitants of Libanus, Ptolemy, and Jamblicus, and another Ptolemy, by his persuasion. He also ventured ready into this war; insomuch that Mithridates ventured now, in dependence upon the additional strength that he had gotten by Antipater, to march forward to Ptolemais; and when they refused his terms, he besieged the city: in the attack of which place, Antipater principally signified himself, for he brought down that part of the wall which was over against him, and opened first of all into the city, with the help of men that were about the walls. But they were not willing to march on, those Egyptian Jews that inhabited the country, called the country of Onias, who had formerly been brought to Egypt by the king of the Parthians; they did Antipater not only persuade them not to stop them, but to afford provisions for their army: on which account the people about Memphis would not fight against them, but of their own accord joined Mithridates. Whereupon Antipater, in the meantime called the Jews' Camp: nay, when he was in danger in the battle with all his right wing, Antipater wheeled about, and came along the bank of the river, and ordered the men that opposed him as he led the left wing. After which success he fell upon those that pursued Mithridates.
BOOK I.—CHAP. X.

5. Whereupon Caesar encouraged Antipater to undertake other hazardous enterprises for him, and that by giving him great commendations, and saying that he was the first thing that he had readily exposed himself to many dangers, and became a most courageous warrior, and had many wounds, almost all over his body, as demented his countrymen. And he added, that he had settled the affairs of Egypt, and was returning into Syria again, gave him the privilege of a Roman citizen, and freedom from taxes, and rendered him an object of admiration by the honors and marks of friendship he bestowed upon him.

On this account it was that he also confirmed Hyrcanus in the high priesthood.

CHAPTER X.

Cæsar makes Antipater Procurator of Judea; as does Antipater appoint Phasaelus to be Governor of Jerusalem, and of Galilee; who, in some time, was called to answer for himself [before the Sanhedrin,] where he is acquitted. Sextus Caesar too strenuously killéd by Bessus, and is succeeded by Marcus.

§ 1. ABOUT this time it was that Antigonus, having overcome his brethren, and became, in a surprising manner, the occasion of Antipater’s farther advancement; for, whereas he ought to have lamented that his father appeared to have been poisoned on account of his goods, to the number of a hundred talents, he made his Scipio’s barbarity towards his brother, and not to mix any inviolable passion when he was suing for mercy; besides these things, he came before Cæsar, and accused Hyrcanus and Antipater, how they had driven him and his brethren entirely out of their native country, and had acted in a great many instances unjustly and extravagantly with regard to their nation, and that as to his assistance they had sent him into Egypt, it was not done for any good ends, but that they were in future quarrels, and in order to gain pardon for their friendship to [his enemy] Pompæus.

2. In the mean time Antipater threw away his garments, and showed the multitude of the wounds he had, and said, that “as to his good-will to Cæsar, he had no occasion to say a word, because his body cried aloud, though he said nothing himself; that he wondered at Antigonus’s boldness, while he was himself so other than the son of an enemy to the Romans, and of a fugitive, and had inheritance from his father to be freed of innovations and seditions, that he should understand so good a creature as he the Roman governor, and endeavor to gain some advantage to himself, when he ought to be contented that he was suffered to live; for that the reason of his desire of governing public affairs, was not so much an irreproachable want of it, but because if he could once obtain the same, he might stir up a sedition among the Jews, and use what they should gain from the Romans, to the disservice of the Jews; a thing he gave it.”

3. When Cæsar heard this, he declared Hyrcanus to be the most worthy of the high priesthood, and gave leave to Antipater to choose what authority he pleased; but he left the determination of such dignity to him that bestowed the dignity upon him; so he was constituted procurator of all Judea, and obtained leave, moreover, to rebuild those walls of his country that had been thrown down. These honorary grants to Cæsar sent orders here engraved in the council, that they might stand there as indications of his own justice, and of the virtues of Antipater.

4. But as soon as Antipater had conducted Cæsar out of Syria, he returned to Judea, and in the first thing he did, he released all who were in prison, and then, when he was himself free, he readily exposed himself to many dangers, and became a most courageous warrior, and had many wounds, almost all over his body, as described by his countrymen. And he added, that he had settled the affairs of Egypt, and was returning into Syria again, gave him the privilege of a Roman citizen, and freedom from taxes, and rendered him an object of admiration by the honors and marks of friendship he bestowed upon him.

5. Now Herod was an active man, and soon found proper materials for his active spirit to operate upon. He first got the head of the robbers, over the neighboring parts of Syria with a great band of men, he caught him and slew him, and many more of the robbers with him; which exploit was chiefly grateful to the Syrians, insomuch that hymns were sung in Herod’s commendation, both in the villages and in the cities, as having procured their quietness, and having preserved what they possessed to them; on which occasion he became acquainted with some of the great men in the city of Jerusalem, the king, the priests, and the prince of the great Caesar, and president of Syria.

A just emulation of his glorious actions excited Phasaelus also to imitate him. Accordingly, he procured the good-will of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, by his own management of the public affairs, and did not abuse his power in any disagreeable manner; whence it came to pass, that the nation paid Antipater the respects that were due only to a king, and the honors they all yielded him were emacs in the honor due to an absolute lord; yet did he not abate any part of that good-will or fidelity which he owed to Hyrcanus.

6. However, he found it impossible to escape envy in such his prosperity for the glory of these young men affected even Hyrcanus himself already privately, though he said nothing of it to any body; but what he principally was grieved at, was the great actions of Herod, and Cæsar, and that he so much desired was to have involved himself in some of their actions, and informed him of the great reputation he got in all his undertakings. There were also many people in the royal palace itself who inflamed his envy at him; those I mean, who were obstructed in their desires to be the princes and heads of the young men or of Antipater. These men said, that by committing the public affairs to the deputy and minister, although he afterward made a cicer of Hyrcanus, and under great decency of behavior to him took the real authority to himself.

6 Or 25 years after the date. See note on Lch. xib. 2. 3, and 1b. ch. xiv. chap. li. sect. 2; and Of the War, b. ii. ch. vii. sect. 6; and Polyb. b. xiv. p. 783.
not to be entirely confident of success in a case where he is to fight against his king, his supporter, and one that had often been his benefactor. He said to himself, as to the booted king against his own interest! for that they did not now conceal their government of affairs any longer, but were plainly lords of the nation, and had thrust him out of his authority. In the case of these, the many men without his giving him any command to do it, either by word of mouth, or by his letter, and this in contradiction to the law of the Jews; who, therefore, in case he be not a king, but a private man, still ought to come to his trial, and answer it to him, and to the laws of his country, which do not permit any one to be killed, till he hath been condemned in judgment.

2. The Jews was by despair, ashamed with these discourses, and at length could bear no longer, but summoned Herod to take his trial. Accordingly, by his father's advice, and as soon as the affairs of Galilee would give him leave, he came up [to Jerusalem:] when he had first placed garrisons in Galilee: however, he came with a sufficient body of soldiers, so many, indeed, that he might not appear to have with him an army able to overthrow Hyrcanus' government, nor yet to be able to expel him to the confines of those that envied him. However, Sextus Caesar was in fear for the young man, lest he should be taken by his enemies, and brought to punishment; so he sent some to denounce expressly to Hyrcanus, that Caesar had acquiesced of the capital chargés against him; who acquitted him accordingly, as being otherwise inclined also so to do, for he loved Herod.

9. Nor was he mistaken in the conjecture he made, for Herod got his army together, out of the king's lands, he having persuaded him with the accusation in a public court, and led it to Jerusalem, in order to throw Hyrcanus down from his kingdom: and this he had soon done, unless his father and brother had gone out together, and broke the force of his fury, and this by exhorting him to carry his revenge no farther than to threatening and affrighting, but to spare the king, under whom he had been advanced to such power; and that he ought not to be so much provoked at his being tried, as to forget to be thankful that he was acquitted; nor so long to think upon what was of a melancholy nature, as to be ungrateful for his deliverance. God also is the arbiter of success in war, an unjust cause is of more disadvantage than an army can be of advantage; and that therefore he ought

* Many writers of the Roman history give an account of this murder of Sextus Caesar, and of the war at Asia.

 Antiquities, b. xiv. ch. xi. sect. 1, the duration of the reign of Julius Caesar is 43 years 6 months, but here 8 years 7 months, beginning rightly, as we see in A.D. 75, from his second ascertainment. It is probable the real duration might be 3 years and between 6 and 7 months.

It appears evident by Josephus's account, both caused him, as making haste to get him out of the way, who was an obstacle to his wicked practices; but Antipater was so much afraid of the power and canning of the man, that he went beyond Jordan, in order to get an army to guard himself against his treacherous designs; but when Malichus was caught in his plot, he put upon Antipater's sons by his impudence; for he thoroughly deluded Phasaelus, who was the guardian of Jerusalem, and Herod, who was instructed with the weapons of war, and this by a great and unrighteous means, and forbade open and direct ways to procure his reconciliation to their father. Thus was he preserved against by Antipater, who dissuaded Marcus, the then president of Syria, from his design of calling Malichus on account of his attempts for insulation.

4. Upon the war between Cassius and Brutus, on one side, against the younger Cæsar (Augustus) and Antony, on the other, Cassius and Marcus got together; for Cassius was likely to have a great share in providing necessaries, they then made him a pro- curator of all Syria, and gave him an army of foot and horse. Cassius promised him also, that he would make a promise, if he was willing, to yield the wealth of Judea; but he so happened, that the power and hopes of his son became the cause of his perdition; for as Malichus was afraid of this, he corrupted one of the king's cupbearers with money, and bid him procure an order to have Cassius put to death, as he became a sacrifice to Malichus's wickedness, and died at a feast. He was a man in other respects active in the management of affairs, and one that recovered the government to Hyrcanus, and put it into his hands.

5. However, Malichus, when he was suspected of poisoning Antipater, and when the multitude was angry with him for it, denied it, and made the people believe he was guilty. He prepared to make a great effort, and raised soldiers; for he did not suppose that Herod would be quiet, who indeed came upon him with an army presently, in order to revenge his father's death. But upon urging the advice of his brother, Phasaelus, not to punish him in an open manner, lest the multitude should fall into a sedition, he admitted of Malichus's apology, and professed that he cleared him of the suspicion; he also made a promise of some presents, and yielded the command of his disgraced and humbled army, to his brother, who feared his approach, forbade them to introduce foreigners to mix themselves with the people of the country, while they were purifying themselves; but Herod despised the pretence, and sent that he command, and came in sight. Upon which Malichus came to him, and besought Antipater; Herod also made him believe [be admitted of his lamentations as real,] although he had privately to reprove him at the time. At this, he died himself, before the murder of his father, in his letters to Cassius, who, on other accounts, also hated Malichus; Cassius sent him word back that he should avenge his father, and yield the command of his army, before he went to the tribunes that were under him, that they should assist Herod in a righteous action he was about.

1. And because, upon the taking of Lachis by Herod, he published power over all the rest of the country from all quarters, with presents and crowns in their hands, Herod allotted this time for the punishment of Malichus. When Malichus suspected that, and was at Tyre, he resolved to withdraw himself by sea from among the Tyrians, who was a hostage there, while he got ready to fly away into Judea; the despair he was in of escaping excited him to think of greater things; for he hoped that he should raise the nation to a revolt from the Romans, while Cassius was busy about the war against Antony, and that he should easily depose Hyrcanus, and get the crown for himself.

2. But fain laughed at the hopes he had; for Herod foresaw what he was so zealous about, and invited both Hyrcanus and him to supper, but calling one of the principal servants that stood by him, to him, he caused him to bring those things which were to get things ready for supper, but in reality to give notice beforehand, about the plot that was laid against him; accordingly they called to mind what Cassius had given them, and went out of the city with those swords in their hands upon the sea shore, where they encompassed Malichus round about, and killed him with many wounds. Upon which Hyrcanus was immediately slain upon his brother. Now Herod happened to be on the boat; and in the midst of the sea, that he was not surprised, but,, saying so, is uncertain: however, by this method Herod inflicted punishment upon Malichus.

CHAPTER XII.

Phasaelus is too hard for Felix; Herod also overcomes Antigonus in battle; and the Jews accuse both Herod and Phasaelus, but Antonius acquits them, and makes them Tetrarchs.

1. When Cassius was gone out of Syria, another sedition arose at Jerusalem, whereas Felix assaulted Phasaelus with an army, that he might avenge the death of Malichus upon Herod, by taking up the cause of his brother. Herod, happened then to be with Fabius, the governor of Damascus, and as he was going to his brother's assistance, he was detained by sickness; in the mean time, Phasaelus was by himself too hard for Felix, and consoled the Jews by his power; (though it is the opinion of his ingratitude both for what assistance he had afforded Malichus, and for over looking Malichus's brother, when he possessed himself of the fortress; for he had gotten a great many of them already and among them the strongest of them all, Masada.)

2. However, nothing could be sufficient for him against the force of Herod, who, as soon as he was recovered, took the other fortresses again, and drove him out of Masada in the posture of a suppliant; he also drove away Marion, the tyrant of the Tyrians, out of Galilee, when he had already possessed himself of three fortified places; but these by chance; but when he had caught, he preserved them all alive; nay, some of them he gave presents to, and so sent them away, and thereby procured good-will to himself from the city, and hatred to the tyrant. Marion was indeed able to reclaim those of Cassius, who set tyrants over all Syria; and out of hatred to Herod it was that he assisted Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, and principally on Fabius's account, whom Antigonus had made his associate by land and sea, and had him accordingly on his side when he made his descent, but it was Ptolemy, the kinsman of Antigonus that supplied all that he wanted.

3. When Herod had fought against these in the matter of the avenge of his brother in the battle, drove away Antigonus, and returned to have proceeded from his true zeal for public liberty, but from a desire to be a tyrant himself.
Jerusalem beloved by every body, for the glorious action he had done; for, those who did not before favor him, did join themselves to him now, because of his marriage into the family of Hyrcanus; for as he had formerly married a wife out of his own country of no ignoble blood, who was called Doris, of whom he begot Antipater; so did he marry Mariamne, the daughter of Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, and the granddaughter of Hyrcanus, and was become thereby a royal king.

4. But when Caesar and Antony had slain Cassius near Philippi, and Caesar was gone to Italy, and Antony to Asia, amongst the rest of the cities which sent ambassadors to Antony, into Bithynia, there were the Jews, the Ptolemies, and the Phasaelus and Herod, that they kept the government by force, and that Hyrcanus had so much more than an honorable name. Herod appeared ready to answer this accusation, and, having made Antony his friend by the large sums of money which he gave him, he brought him to such a temper as not to hear the others speak against him, and thus did they part at this time.

However, after this time, he came a hundred of the most valiant men among the Jews to Daphne by Antioch to Antony, who was already in love with Cleopatra to the degree of slavery; these Jews put those men that were the most potent, bold, and eloquent, and as their friends, and accused the brethren. But Menelaus opposed them, and defended the brethren, and that while Hyrcanus stood by him, on account of his relation to them. When Antony had heard both sides, he named the day and hour that he would be at the place; to the governor who replied, that Herod and his party were the fittest. Antony was glad of that answer, for he had been formerly treated in a hospitable and obliging manner by his father Antipater, whom he sent into Judea with Gabinius; so he constituted the brethren tetrarchs, and committed to them the government of Judea.

6. But when the ambassadors had indignation at this procedure, Antony took fifteen of them, and put them into prison, whom he also was going to kill presently, and the rest he drove away with disgrace, on which occasion a still greater tumult arose in Jerusalem; so they sent again a thousand armed men into Tyre, where Antony now abode, as he was gone to Jerusalem; upon these men, who made a clamour, he sent out the governor of Tyre, and ordered him to punish all that he could catch of them, and to seize upon the administration under whom he had made tetrarchs.

7. But before this, Herod and Hyrcanus went out upon the seashore, and earnestly desired of those ambassadors that they would neither bring ruin upon themselves, nor war upon their native country, by their rash contentions; and when they grew still more outrageous, Antony sent out armed men, and slew a great many, and wounded more of them; of whom those that were slain were buried by Hyrcanus, and the wounded put under the care of physicians by him; yet would not those that had escaped be quiet still, but put the affairs of the city into such disorder, and so provoked Antony, that he slew those whom he had in bonds also.

CHAP. XIII.

The Parthians bring Antigonus back into Judea, and cast Hyrcanus and Phasaelus into Prison.

§ 1. Now two years afterwards, when Barzaphar, a governor among the Parthians, and Phasaelus and Herod.

This large and noted wood or woodland belonging to Caesar, called by the Septuagint, is mentioned in the Old Testament, 2 Kings xix. 23, and Isaiah x. 18, and by Strabo, b. xvi. p. 758, as both Aldrich and Spanheim here remark very pertinently.

Pacorus, the king's son, and possessed themselves of Syria, and when Lysanias had already succeeded, upon his father Ptolemy the son of Mesaeus's death, in the government of Chalcis, he prevailed with the governor, by promise of a certain number of talents, and five hundred weapons, to bring back Antigonus to his kingdom, and to curb Hyrcanus out of it. Pacorus was by these means induced so to do, and marched along the seacoast, while he ordered Barzapharces to fall upon Jericho. He went along the road he had gone, and saw part of the country; but of the maritime people, the Tyrians would not receive Pacorus, although those of Ptolemais and Sidon had received him: so he committed a troop of his into Antioch, but the Tyrians knew the royal family, of his own name [Pacorus: ], and gave him orders to march into Judea, in order to learn the state of affairs among their enemies, and to help Antigonus when he should want his assistance.

2. Now, as these men were ravaging Carmel, many of the Jews ran together to Antigonus, and showed themselves ready to make an insurrection in the country; so he sent his fleet in that place called Drymus, t (the wood-land,) to seize upon the place; whereupon a battle was fought between them, and they drove the enemy away, and pursued them, and ran after them as far as Jerusalem, and as the numbers increased, they proceeded as far as the king's palace: but as Hyrcanus and Phasaelus received them with a strong body of men, there happened a battle in the market-place, in which Herod's party best turled them; and as they set on fire the houses adjoining as a guard on them. But the people that were tumultuous against the brethren came in, and burst those men, while Herod, in his rage for killing them, fell on and killed six men, and set sixty in the houses adjoining as a guard on them. But the people that were tumultuous against the brethren came in, and burst those men, while Herod, in his rage for killing them, fell on and killed six men, and set sixty in the houses adjoining as a guard on them. But the people that were tumultuous against the brethren came in, and burst those men, while Herod, in his rage for killing them, fell on and killed six men, and set sixty in the houses adjoining as a guard on them.

3. Now, when that festival which we call Pentecost was at hand, all the places about the temple, and the whole city, were full of a multitude of people that were come out of the country, and which were the greatest part of them armed men; so he gave Antony, and Herod, with a few, guard the royal palace; and when he made an assault upon his enemies, as they were out of their mans, on the north quarter of the city, he slew a very great number of them, and pursuing them all to the sea, shut them up within the city, and others with the outward rampart.

In the mean time, Antigonus desired that Pacorus might be admitted to be a reconquer between them; and Phasaelus was prevailed upon to admit the Parthians into the city with five hundred horse, and to treat him in a hospitable manner, who pretended that he came to quell the tumult, but in reality he came to assist Antigonus; however, he laid a plot for Pacorus, and put him to death. So Herod, as ambassador to Barzapharces, in order to put an end to the war, although Herod was very earnest with him to the contrary and exhorted him to take arms, but not expose himself to the snare he had laid for him, because the barbarians are naturally pernicious. However, Pacorus went out and took Hyrcanus with him, that he might be the less suspect; he also left some of the hampless to the Freeman, with Herod, and conducted Phasaelus with the rest.

4. But now, when they were come to Galilee, he left the people of that country had revolted, and were in arms, who came very can-nearly to their leader, and besought him to cancel his treacherous intentions by an obliging behaviour to them; accordingly, he at first made them presents; and afterward, as they went away, laid ambushes for them; and, when they were come to one of the maritime cities called Ecbatana, there they got their provisions for the flight, and set off for them; for they were there informed of the promise of a thousand talents, and how Antigonus had devoted the greatest number of the women that were there with them, among the five hundred, to the king's pleasure; for he was once informed of the treachery of theirs, he would take care of himself; nor was this a mere report, but they saw the guards already not far off from them.

5. Nor would Phanuel think of forsaking Hycranus and flying away, although Ophellus earnestly persuaded him to it: for this man had learned the whole scheme of the plot from Sarmailla, the richest of all the Syrians. But Phanuel took them to be mere idle parleys, and pro urged him to his face for laying this treacherous plot against them, and chiefly because he had done it for money; and he promised him, that he would give him more money for their preservation than he could not obtain, if he were to give for the kingdom. But the sly Parthian endeavored to remove all this suspicion by apologies and oaths, and then went to the other Pocorus; immediately after which those Par thians, who were left, and as it in charge, seized upon Phanuel and Hycranus, who could do no more than curse their perfidiousness and their perfidy.

6. In the meantime the cupbearer was sent before, and laid a plot how to seizure upon Herod, by deceiving him, and getting him out of the city, as he was commanded to do. But Herod suspected the barbarians from the beginning, and leaving them received intelligence that a messenger was to bring him the letters that informed him of the treachery intended, had fallen among the enemy, he would not go out of the city; though Pocorus said very positively, that he had the most perfect security that brought the letters, for that the enemy had not taken them, and that the contents of them were not accounts of any plots upon them, but of what Phanuel had done; yet had he heard from Alexander, the most most degree the most degree of the bravest, and made the end of his life agreeable to the actions of it. There is also another report about his end, that he recovered of that stroke, and that a surgeon, who was sent by Am- tigonus to heal him, filled the wound with poisonous ingredients, and so killed him; whereasover of these deaths he came to, the beginning of it was glorious. It is also reported, that before he expired he was informed by a certain poor woman how Herod had sent his egret to her, and that he said thereupon, "I now die with comfort, since I leave behind me one alive, that will avenge me of mine enemies."

7. Now as Pocorus and his friends were considering how they might bring their plot to bear privately, because it was not possible to circumvent a man of so great prudence, by openly attempting it, they sent away a man to bid him come off with the persons that were the most nearly related to him by night, and this without their enemies being apprized of it. But, as soon as the Parthians perceived it, they pursued after them, and made a great fall of them, for their discos, took all the care they could to keep off the barbarians; and when, at every ses sult, he had slain a great many of them, he came to the strong hold of Masada.

8. Nay, he found by experience that the Jews fell more heavily upon him than did the Parthis, and created him troubles perpetually, and this ever since he was gotten sixty furloongs from the city; these assettas as brought it to a neat of regular battle. Now, in the place where Herod beat them, and killed a great number of them, there he afterward built a castle, in memory of the great actions he did there, and adorned it with the most costly palaces, and erected very strong fortifications, the plain from which he did see all the land of Judea; and this was the reason, why Herod called it Masada. Now, as they were in their flight, many joined themselves to him every day; and at a place called Thresas of Idamias, his brother Joseph met him, and advised him to cease himself of a great number of his followers; for the king Masada would not contain so great a multitude, which were above nine thousand. Herod complied with this advice; and sent away the most commerce part of his retinues, that they might go thence into Idamias, and make them a journey; but he got safe to the fortress with his nearest relations, and retained with him only the stoutest of his followers; and there it was that he left eight hundred of his men as guard for the walls, and provisions sufficient for a siege, but he made haste himself to Petra of Arabia.

9. As for the Parthians in Jerusalem, they took to themselves plunderers, and fell into the houses of those that were fled, and upon the king's palace, and spared nothing but Hycranus' money, which was not above three hundred talents. They lighted on other men's money also, and, having thus, with the same long time had a suspicion of the per ficiousness of the barbarians, had taken care to have what was most splendid among his treasures conveyed into Idamias, as every one belonging to it he had in his charge. And the Parthians proceeded to that degree of injustice, so to fill all the country with war without destroying, and to demolish the city Samaria, and not only to set up Antigonus for king, but to deliver Phanuel and Hycranus into his hands, in order to their being tormented by him. Antigonus himself also bit off Hycranus' ears with his own teeth, as he fell down upon his knees to him, that he might never be able, upon any incita tion of affairs, to take his high priesthood again for the high priests that succeeded were to his complete and without blemish.

10. However, he failed in his purpose of abusing Phanuel; by means of his power, he neither had the command of his sword, nor of his hands, he prevented all abuses by casting him against a stone; so he demonstrated himself to be Herod's own brother, and Hycranus a most degenerate and most obstinate in his bravery, and made the end of his life agreeable to the actions of it. There is also another report about his end, that he recovered of that stroke, and that a surgeon, who was sent by Antigonus to heal him, filled the wound with poisonous ingredients, and so killed him; whereasover of these deaths he came to, the beginning of it was glorious. It is also reported, that before he expired he was informed by a certain poor woman how Herod had sent his egret to her, and that he said thereupon, "I now die with comfort, since I leave behind me one alive, that will avenge me of mine enemies."

11. This was the death of Phanuel; but the Parthians, about whom we have failed of the woman they chiefly desired, yet did they put the government of Jerusalem into the hands of Antigonus, and took away Hycranus, and bound him, and carried him to Parthia.

CHAP. XIV.

When Herod is rejected in Arabia, he makes haste to Rome, where Antony and Caesar join their Interest to make king of the Jews.

1. Now Herod did the more zealously pursue his journey into Arabia, as making haste to get money of the king, while his brother was yet alive, by which money alone it was that he hoped in the former terms of the barbarisms to spare Phaeaeus; for he reasoned thus with himself, that if the Arabian king was too forgetful of his father's friendship with him, and was too covetous to make him a free gift, he would not hearken of him so much as might redeem his brother, and put into his hands, as a pledge, the son of him that was to be redeemed; and accordingly he led his brother's son along with him, who was of the age of seven years. Now he was driven; given them three hundred talents for his brother; and intended to desire the intercession of the Tyrians to get them accepted; however, he had been too quick for his diligence; and since Phaeaeus was dead, Herod's brotherly love was waxen cold. Moreover, he was not able to find any lasting friendship among the Arabians; for their king, Malichus, sent to him immediately, and commanded him to return back out of his country, and used the name of the king, and was not patient in doing, as though these had denounced to him by their ambassadors to cast Herod out of Arabia; while in reality they had a mind to keep back what they owed to Antipater, and not be obliged to make requisition. Or indeed the frien dship of the father had made them. He also took the impudent advice of those who, equally with himself, were willing to deprive Herod of what Antipater had de given them, and that there were the most potent of all whom he had in his kingdom.

2. So when Herod had found that the Arabsians were his enemies, and this for those very reasons whence he hoped they would have been the most friendly, and had given them such an answer as his passion suggested, he returned back and went for Egypt. Now he lodged the first evening at one of the temp.es of that country, in erider to meet with those whom he left behind; but the next day forth he had attempted for as far as he was going to Rhinocurea, that his brother was dead, and how he came by his death; and when he had lamented him as much as his present circumstances could bear, he soon laid aside such care, and was prettier to be doing. But now, after some time, the king of Arabia repented of what he had done, and sent presently away mesengers to call him back: Herod had prevented them, and was come to Pelusium, where he stayed till he had sent a message by certain of him, with the fleet, so he besought their captains to let him go by them; accordingly, out of the resurance they bore to the fame and dignity of the men, they conducted him to Alexandria; and when he arrived there, Cleopatra with great splendour, who hoped he might be persuaded to be commander of her forces in the expedition she was now about; but he rejected the queen's solicitations, and being neither affrighted at the height of that storm which then happened, nor at the tempests that were now in Italy, he sailed for Rome.

3. But as he was in part about Pamphylia, and about the greatest part of the ship leading, he, with difficulty, got safe to Rhodes, a place which had been grievously harassed in the war with Cassius. He was there received by his friends, Ptolemy and Sappius; and, although he was there of his own choice, he fitted out up a three-decked ship of very great magnitude, wherein he and his friends sailed to Brundusium, and went thence to Rome with all speed; where he first of all went to Antony, on account of the friendship his father had with him, and laid before him the calamities of himself and his family, and that he had left his nearest relations besieged in a fortress, and had sailed to him through a storm, to make supplication to him for his assistance.

4. Hereupon Antony was moved to compassion at the change that had been made in Herod's affairs, and this both upon his calling to mind how hospitably he had been treated by Antipatter, but more especially on account of Herod's own own friendship with him, and as might be supposed, he had upon him a great affection as a seditions person, and an enemy of the Romans; and as for Cesar, Herod found him better prepared than Antony, as remembering very fresh the wars he had gone through together with his father, the hospitable relations with Antipater, and the benefit he had received from him, and the entire good will he had shown him; besides the activity which he saw in Herod himself. So he called the senate together, where-in Messala, and after him Attains, produced Herod before them, and gave a full account of the merits of his father, and his own good-will to the Romans. At this same time they demonstrated that Antigonus was their enemy, not only because he soon quarrelled with them, but because he had been unwilling to give them an advantage in the Parthian war that Herod should be king; so they all gave their votes for it. And when the senate was separated, Antony and Cesar went out, with Herrod between them; while the consuls and the rest of the magistrates went before them in order to offer sacrifices, and to lay the decree in the capitol: Antony also made a feast for Herod on the first day of his reign.

CHAP. XV.

Antigonus besieges those that were in Massada, whom Herod sends from Confidantia, when he comes back from Rome, and presently marches to Jerusalem, where he finds Silo corrupted by Brives.

1. Now during this time Antigonus besieged those that were in Masada, who had all other necessaries in sufficient quantity, but were in want of victual. In this state of things, Herod's brother, was disposed to run away to the Arabians, with two hundred of his own friends, because he had heard that Malichus repented of his offences, with regard to Herod; and he had been persuaded that he could not escape by going to the fortress already, unless on that very night when he was going away, there had fallen a great deal of rain, insomuch that his reservoirs were full of water, and so he was under no necessity of running away. After which, therefore, they made an irruption upon Antigonus's party, and slew a great many of them, some in open battles, and some in private ambush; nor had they always success in their attempts, for sometimes they were beaten and routed away.

2. In the mean time Ventidius, the Roman general, was sent out of Syria, to restrain the a-cursions of the Parthians, and after he had done that it was for, and therefore he sailed home accused to Joseph and his party, but in reality to get money of Antigonus: and when he had pitched his camp very near to Jerusalem, as soon as he had got money enough, he went away with the rest of his soldiers, leaving Silo and the other officers of his rank with Silo with some part of them, lest if he had taken them all away, his taking of bribes might have been too openly discovered. Now Antigonus hoped that the Parthians would come again to his help, and there therefore he cultivated a great understanding with Silo in the mean time, lest any interruption should be given to his hopes.
3. Now by this time Herod had sailed out of Italy, and was come to Ptolemais; and as soon as he had gotten together so small army of for- eigners, and of his own countrymen, he marched through Galilee against Antigonus, wherein he was supported by Ventidius and Silo, both whom Dossias, a person sent by Antony, persuaded to bring Herod into his kingdom. Now Ventidius was at this time among the cities, and composing the disturbances which had happened by means of the bribe which had been paid by the bribe that Antigonus had given him; yet was not not Herod himself destitute of power, but the number of his forces increased every day as he went along, and all Galilee, with few exceptions, gave him their support, and he proceeding by himself to set about his most necessary enter- prise, and that was Masada, is order to deliver his relations from the siege they endured. But still Joppa stood in his way, and hindered his going thither; for it was necessary to take that city first, which was in the enemies' hands, that when he should go to Jerusalem, no fortress might be left in the enemies' power behind him. Silo also willingly joined him, as having now a place in the kingdom, with some troops intermixed among them from Jerusalem; and when the Jews pursued him and pressed upon him [in his retreat.] Herod made an excursion upon them with a small body of horse, as soon put them to flight, and saved Silo when he was almost discomfited. 4. After this Herod took Joppa, and then made haste to Masada, to free his relations. Now as he was marching, many came in to him; some induced by his previous victories, and some by the re- spect he had already gained himself, and some in order to repay the benefits they had received from them both; but still what engaged the great- est number on his side, was the hopes from him, who was a Roman, and a king: so that he and gotten together already an army hard to be conquered. But Antigonus laid an ambush for him as he marched out, in which he did little or no harm to his enemies. However, he again prevailed with his relations again that they were in Masada, as well as the fortress Reesa, and then marched to Jerusalem, where the soldiers that were with Silo joined themselves to his own, as did many out of the city, from a dread of his power.

5. Now when he had pitched his camp on the west side of the city, the guards that were there shot their arrows, and threw their darts at them, while others met him as by Antony, persuaded to those in the forefront; but Herod commanded proclamation to be made at the wall, that he was come for the good of the people and the pres- ervation of the city, without any design to be revenged on his open enemies, but to grant ob- ligation to them, though they had been the most obstinate against him. Now the soldiers that were for Antigonus made a contrary clamor, and did neither permit any body to hear that proclamation, nor to change their party; so that Antigonus gave order to his forces to beat the ene- my from the walls; accordingly, they soon threw their darts at them from the towers, and put them to flight.

6. He marched it was that Silo discovered he had taken bribes; for he set many of the soldiers to clamor about their want of necessaries, and to require their pay, in order to buy themselves food, and to demand that he would lead them into pay of those to Antigonus, or his army, because all the parts about the city were laid waste by the means of Antigonus's army, which had

† This Dossias is famous, or rather infamous, in the history of Mark Antony, as Sphanehil and Albrich here note, from the coin of Flutharch and Dio.

This Shechem, the capital of Galilee, is so often mentioned by Josephus, has coins still remaining, ERHOF PHRON, as Sphanehin here informs us.

† This way of speaking, after forty days, is interpreted by Josephus himself on the fortieth day; Antig. B. xiv. ch. xvi. sect. 4, in like manner, when Josephus says, ch. xxxvii. sect. 4, that Herod heard Antipater to be slain after forty days, this is by himself inter- preted, Antig. B. xvii. ch. vii. sect. 1, that he died on the

CHAP. XVI.

Herod takes Sepphoris, and subdues the Robbers that were in the Caves; he after that avenges himself upon Machera, as upon an enemy of his, and goes to Antony as he was besieging Samosos.

1. So the Romans lived in plenty of all things, and rested from war. However, Herod did not lie at rest, but seized upon Iudea, and kept it, with two thousand footmen and four hun- dred horsemen, with great difficulty, and his brother Joseph thither, that no innovation might be made by Antigonus. He also removed his mother, and all his relations that had been in Masada, to Samaria; and when he had settled them securely, he marched to take the remain- ing parts of Galilee, and to drive away the gar- risons placed there by Antigonus.

2. But when Herod had reached Sepphoris, in a very great snow, he took the city without any difficulty; the guards, that should have kept it, flying away before it was assaulted; where he gave an opportunity to his followers that had been in distress to refresh themselves, there being in that city a great abundance of necessaries. After he had taken away all the robbers that were in the caves, who overran a great part of the country, and did as great mischief to its inhabitants as a war itself could have done. Accordingly, he sent beforehand three cohorts of footmen to destroy the village of Arbela, or village Arbels, and came himself forty days afterward; with the rest of his forces. Yet were not the enemy affrighted at this assault, but met him in arms, for their skill was not that of warriors, but the boldness and the boldness of robbers: when, therefore, it came to a pitched battle, they put to flight Herod's left wing with their right case; but Herod, wheeiling about on the sudden from his own right wing, came to their assistance, and both made his own left wing return back from its flight, and fell upon the pursuers, and cooled their courage, till they could not bear the attempts that were made directly upon them, and so turned back and ran away.
And as Herod followed them, he slew them as he followed him, and destroyed a great part of them, till those that remained were scattered beyond the river [Jordan], and Galilee was freed from the terror they had been under, excepting from those that remained and remained in the caves, which required longer time ere they could be conquered. In order to which, Herod, in the first place, distributed the fruits of their former labors among them, and caused the caves to be made provision, and to build a wall about Alexandrium, who were called lords of both those injunctures accordingly.

4. In the mean time Antony abode at Athens, while Caesar came in the other offer of Silo and Herod to come to the war against the Parthians, but ordered them first to settle the affairs of Judea: so Herod willingly dismissed Silo to go to Ventidius, but he made an expedition himself against those that lay in the precipices of craggy mountains, and could not be come at from any side, since they had only some winding pathways, very narrow, by which they got up to them; but the rock that lay on them from above and the wildness of the place, and remoteness, and of an almost perpendicular declivity; insomuch that the king was doubtful for a long time what to do, by reason of a kind of impossibility there was to use a contrivance that was subject to the utmost hazard; for he let down the most hardy of his men in chutes, and set them at the mouths of the dens. Now these men slew the rest of the band that were in the caves, and those that made resistance, they sent fire in upon them, [and burnt them;] and as Herod was desirous of saving some of them, he had proclamation made, that they should come and deliver themselves up to him; but the word was not, or rather he, and those of those that were compelled to come, many preferred death to captivity. And here a certain old man, the father of seven children, whose children, together with their mother, desired him to give them leave to go out, upon the assurance and right hand that was offered them, slew them after the following manner: he ordered every one of them to go out, while he stood himself at the cave's mouth, and slew that son of his perducibly to go, and Herod being so many times to see this sight, and his bowsels of compassion were moved at it, and he stretched out his right hand to the old man, and besought him to spare his children; yet did he not relent at all upon what he said, but over and above reproached Herod on the lowness of his descent; and slew his wife as well as his children; and when he had thrown their dead bodies down the precipites on which he himself did stand after them.

5. By this means Herod subdued those caves, and the robbers that were in them. He then left fifth day afterward. So also what is in this book, chap. xiii. sect. 1, after two years, in Antig. B. xiv. ch. xiii. sect. 3, on the second year. And A.D. 48.

* This Samosata, the metropolis of Commagene, in there a part of his army, as many as he thought sufficient to prevent any sedition, and made Petro, and several others follow him. He also led also with him three thousand armed footmen and six hundred horsemen, against Antigonus. Now here, those that used to raise tumults in Ga-line, having liberty so to do upon his departure, fell immediately upon Philon. After several of his forces, and slew him: they also laid the country waste, and then retired to the bogs, and to places not easily to be found. But when Herod was informed of this inscription, he came to the now their general, and caused the caves to consol the country immediately, and sent to Antony to accuse Macheras of mis-administration. But Macheras was made over ord to serve Titus, and as he came, he soon made an end of his in the city, and defended himself against him, as against an enemy from the walls; till Mache-ras was ashamed of what he had done, and retired to Eumason to Herod; and, as he was well known from its coins, as Spandolphus here says, but that Herod was a great means of making the city by Antony, and that from Flaccus and Bib.

should escape him in the war that he was going about, he, in the morning, set forth before the army, when about six thousand of his enemies came running down from the mountains, and began to fight with those in his forrest; yet dared they not be so bold as to engage the Romans hand to hand, but threw stones and darts at them at a distance; by which means they wounded a considerable number, in which action Herod's own side was wounded with a dart.

5. Now as Antigonus had a mind to appear to exceed Herod, not only in his jews, but also in the number of his men, he sent Pappus, one of his companions, with an army against Samaria, whose fortune it was to oppose Machera: but he crossed over Machera's enemies' country, and demolished five little cities, and destroyed two thousand men that were in them, and burned their houses, and then returned to his camp; but his head-quarters were at the village called Cana.

6. Now a great multitude of wars came to see him every day, both out of Jericho, and the other parts of the country. Some were moved so to do out of their hatred to Antigonus, and some out of regard to the glorious actions Herod had done; but others were led on by a common and insatiable desire of change; so he fell upon them immediately. As for Pappus and his party, they were not terrified at either their number or at their zeal, but marched out with great alacrity to fight them, and came upon them in a very mild sort. Now their army made resistance for a while; but Herod running the utmost hazard out of the rage he was in at the murder of his brother, that he might be avenged on those that had been the authors of it, he took the river of Jordan, and, after he had beaten them, he always turned his forces against those that stood to it still, and pursued them all; so that a great slaughter was made, while the rest of the multitude of the village whence they came out; he also pressed hard upon the hindermost, and slew a vast number of them; he also fell into the village with the enemy, where every house was filled with armed men, and the upper rooms of the crowded with soldiers for their defence; and when he had beaten those that were on the outside, he pulled the houses to pieces, and plucked out those that were within; upon many he had the roads shaken down, whereupon they perished by the sword for those that fled out of the ruins, the soldiers received them with their swords in their hands, and the multitude of those slain, and lying on heaps, was so great that the conquerors could not bear along the multitude; Herod, therefore, to bear this blow, so that when the multitude of them which was gathered together, saw that those in the village were slain, they dispersed themselves and fled away; upon the confidence of which victory Herod had marched immediately to Jerusalem, unless he had been hindered by the depth of winter [coming on.]. This was the impediment that lay in the way of this entire glorious expedition, and what hindered Antigonus from being now conquered, who was already disposed to forsake the city.

7. Now when at the evening Herod had already dismissed his friends to refresh themselves after their fatigues, he, that afternoon, went, by himself, while he was still hot in his armor, like a common soldier, to bathe himself, and had but one servant that attended him, and before he was gotten into the bath, one of the enemies met him in the face, and asked him, who was that? and the Sand was a second, and then a third, and after that more of them; these were men who had run away out of the battle into the bath in their armor, and they had lain there for some time in great terror, and in private, and when they saw his kins he trembled for fear, and ran by him in a fright, (although he were naked) and endeavored to get off into the public road; now there was by chance nobody else at hand that might seize upon these man, and as for Herod, he was contented to have come to no harm himself, so that they all got away in safety.

8. But on the next day Herod had Pappus's head cut off, who was the general for Antigonus, and was slain in the battle, and sent it to his brother, Pappus, in the same way of the Centurion's slave brother, for he was the man that slew Joseph. Now as winter was going off, Herod marched to Jerusalem, and brought his army to the wall of it; this was the third year since he had been made king at Rome; so he pitched his camp before the temple, for on that side it might be besieged, and there it was that Pompey took the city. So he parted the work among the army, and chose the soberest men, and raised three banks, and gave orders to have towers built upon those banks, and left the most laborious of his acquaintance at the works. But he went himself to Samaria, to take the daughter of Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, to wife, who had been betrothed to him before, as we have already said; and thus he accomplished this, by the by, during the siege of the city, for he had his army in great contempt already.

9. When he had married his bride, he came back to Jerusalem with a greater army; Sophonius also joined him with a large army, both of horsemen and footmen, which he sent before him to hold the city part, while he marched himself along to Ptolemais; and when the whole army was gotten together, which were eleven regiments of footmen and six thousand horsemen, besides the Syrian auxiliaries, which was no small part of the army, they pitched their camp near to the north wall. Herod's dependance was upon the decree of the senate, by which he was made king, and Sophonius relied upon Antony, who sent the army that was under him to Herod's assistance.

CHAP. XVIII.

How Herod and Sophonius took Jerusalem by force; and what Death Antigonus came to. Also, concerning Cleopatra's avaricious Temper.

1. Now the multitude of the Jews that were in the city were divided into several factions; for the people that crowned about the temple, being the chief among them, gave it out, that, as at other times, he was the happiest and most religious man who should die first. But as to the more bold and hardy men, they got together in bodies, and fell in upon other vapid manners, and these particularly plundered the places that were about the city, and this because there was no food left either for the horses or the men; yet some of the warlike men who were used to fight regularly, were appointed to defend the city during the siege, and these drove those that raised the banks away from the wall, and these were always inventing new engine or another to be a hinderance to the engines of the enemy, nor had they so much success any way as in the mines under ground.

2. Now, as for the robberies which were committed, the king contrived that ambushes should be so laid, that they might restrain their excursions as the rest for that purpose, he provided that they should be brought to them from great distances. He was also too hard for the Jews, by the Romans' skill in the art of war; although bold to the utmost degree. Now they durst not come to a plain battle with the Romans, which was certain death, but by their mines under ground they would appear in the midst of them on the sudden, and before they could batter down one wall, they built another in its stead, and, to sum up all at once, they did not show any want either of pensiveness or constiveness, or having resolved to hold out to the very last. Indeed, though they had so great an army lying round about them, they bore a siege of five months, till some of Herod's choicest men ventured to get upon the wall, and there were about the inner walls thousands and thousands after them; and now they first of all seized upon what was about the temple, and upon the poring in of the army, there was slaughter of vast multitudes among the rest of the people who were in the streets, and in houses, or were running away to the temple; nor was there any mercy shows either to infants, or to the aged, or to the weaker sex; inasmuch, that although the king sent about the most earnest manner, whether the enemy could be persuaded to withdraw their right hand from slaughter, but they slew people of all ages like madmen. Then it was that Antigonus, without any regard to his former oath to present himself in the temple, and to yield his head to Sophonius's feet, who, without plying him at all upon the change of his condition, laughed at him beyond measure, and called him Antigonus. Yet did not he treat him like a woman, or let him go free, but put him into bonds, and kept him in custody.

3. But Herod's concern at present, now he had gotten his enemies under his power, was to find of a secure place to lodge them in. For the multitude of the strange people were very eager to see the temple, and what was sacred in the holy house itself; but the king endeavored to restrain them, partly by his exhortations, partly by his stern visages, his watchers menacing, and he shewed the victory worse than a defeat to him, if any thing that ought not to be seen were seen by them. He also forbade, at the same time, the spoiling of the city, taking Sophonius, in the name of all the rest, as well as for the multitude of the strange people were very eager to see the temple, and what was sacred in the holy house itself; but the king endeavored to restrain them, partly by his exhortations, partly by his stern visages, his watchers menacing, and he shewed the victory worse than a defeat to him, if any thing that ought not to be seen were seen by them. BOOK I.—CHAP. XIX.

Now, Cleopatra had put to death all her kindred, still no one near her in blood remained alive, and after that she fell to slaying those noway related to her. So she calumniated the principal men among the Syrians to Antony, and persuaded him to have them slain, that so she might win again to be mistress of what they had; nay, she extended her avaricious humor to the Jews and Arabia, and secretly labored to have Herod and Malchus, the kings of both those nations, slain also. 5. Now as to these her injunctions to Antony, he complied in part; for though he esteemed it too abominable a thing to fill such good and great kings, yet was he thereby not removed from the imputation of slaying them. He also took away a great deal of their country: nay, even the plantation of palm-trees at Jericho, where also grows the balsam tree, and bestowed them upon her: as also all the cities on this side the river Eleutherus, Tyre and Sidon excepted. And when she was become mistress of these, and had conducted Antony in his expedition against the Parthians, as far as Euphrates, she came by Arabian mediation to Junius Brutus, and it is said Herod pacified her indignation at him by large presents. He also hired of her those places that had been torn away from his kingdom, at the yearly rent of two hundred talents. He conducted 30,000 men to join them more of their number than they were able to do for the protection of his dominions, and so did not put off the festival that he had prepared for the Jews, and left them all the respect possible. Now it was not long after, that Antony was come back from Parthia, and led with him Arbasbas, Tigranes's son, captive, as a present for Cleopatra; for this Parthian was present to note it of Cleopatra, and all the prey that was taken with him.

CHAP. XIX.

How Antony, at the Persuasion of Cleopatra, sent Herod to fight against the Arabians; how, after several Battles, he at length got the Victory. As also concerning a great Earthquake.

1. Now when the war about Actium was begun, Herod prepared to come to the assistance of Antony, as being already freed from his troubles in Judea, and having gained Hircania, which was now his own. However, he was cunningly hindered from partaking of the hazards that Antony went through by Cleopatra; for since, as we have already noted, she laid a plot against the kings of Judea and Arabia, she persuaded him to delay the war against the Arabians to Herod; that so, if he got the better, she might become mistress of Arabia, or, if he were worsted, of Judea, and that she might destroy one of those kings by the other. 2. However, this contrivance tended to the advantage of Herod; for at the very first he took hostages from the enemy, and got together a great body of horse, and ordered them to march against the Arabians; and this army, that army, although it fought resolutely against him. After which defeat, the Arabians were in great motion, and assembled themselves together at Banabas, a city of Caelus, in vast multitudes, and waited for the Jews. And when Herod was come thither, he tried to manage this war with particular prudence, and gave orders that they should build a wall about their camp; yet did not the multitude comply with those or 9 This ancient liberty of Tyre and Sidon under the Roman empire is lamented by the Roman historians, both here and in Antioch, b. iv. ch. iv. sect. 1. is confirmed by the testimony of Strabo, b. xvi. page 757; as well as by the works of the Romans. September, in the 31st year before the Christian era, determines the chronology of Josephus as to the reign of Herod, and, in the 31st year before the Christian era, he died. The latter event is given in the year 27, beyond reasonable contradiction. Nor is it quite unworthy of our notice, that the 4th year of the reign of Herod, or the 31st before the Christian era, contained the latter of a sabbatical year; on which sabbatical year, therefore, it is plain this great earthquake happened in Judea.

They were indeed superior to the Jews in number, but inferior as to their acclivity, although they were obliged to expose themselves to danger by their very despair of victory.

6. Now while they made opposition, they had not a great number slain, but as soon as they turned their backs, a great many were trodden to pieces by the Jews, and a great many by themselves, and so perished, till five thousand were fallen dead in their flight, while the rest were seen to be in such utter consternation as to lie dead, by crowding into the fortification. Herod encompassed these around, and besieged them, and while they were ready to be taken by their enemies in arms; they had another additional misfortune, which was the thirst and want of water; for the king was above heartening to their ambassadors, and when they offered five hundred talents, as the price of their redemption, he parted with it, and spent, but when they were burnt up by their thirst, they came out and voluntarily delivered themselves up by multitudes to the Jews, till in five days' time four thousand of them were put in bonds; and on the sixth day they put to death, by means of ever saving themselves, and came out to fight; with these Herod fought, and slew again about seven thousand, insomuch, that he punished Arabia so severely, and so far extinguished the spirit of the men, that he was chosen by the nation for their ruler.

CHAP. XX.

Herod is confirmed in his Kingdom by Caesar, and cultivates a Friendship with the Emperor by magnificent Presents; while Caesar returns his Kindness by bestowing on him that Part of his Kingdom which had been taken away from him by Cleopatra, with the Addition of Zenoedoras's Country also.

§ 1. But now Herod was under immediate concern about a most important affair, on account of his friendship with Antony, who was already overcome at Actium by Caesar; yet he was more afraid than hurt; for Caesar did not think he had quite undone Antony while Herod continued his assistance to him. However, the king resolved to expose himself to danger: accordingly he sailed forth with all his ships, and appeared before Cithara, in order for the danger his country is in, as for these ambassadors of ours; those dead ambassadors will conduct this war of ours better than we ourselves. And if you will be ruled by me, I will myself be soldier into danger; for you know this well enough, that your courage is irresistible, unless you hurt yourselves by acting rashly.

5. When Herod had encouraged them by this speech, and he saw with what acclivity they went, he offered sacrifice to God; and after that sacrifice, he passed over the river Jordan with his army, and pitched his camp about Philadelphia, near the sea, and about a fortification that lay between them. He then shot at them at a distance, and was desirous to come to an engagement presently; for some of them had been sent beforehand to seize upon that fortification: but Herod and his men immediately beat them out of the fortification, while he himself went in the forefront of the army, which he put in battle array every day, and invited the Arabians to fight. But as none of them came out of their camp for that purpose; but, when they were compelled by force to come out to fight, which they did in disorder, and so that the horsemen and footmen were mixed together.

*This speech of Herod is set down twice by Josephus, here and Antig. b. xrv. ch. v. sect. 3, to the very same purpose, but by no means in the same words.
BOOK L.—CHAP. XXI.

2. Cæsar replied to him thus: "Nay, thou shalt not only be in safety, but shalt be a king; and that more firmly than the most of those that are worthy to reign over a great many subjects, by reason of the fastness of thy friend ship: and do thou endeavor to be equally constant in all things, as I am in this, and the former plans which we have made. And now, when Cæsar, like a true friend before I began to be thine, on which account Quintus Dedicius hath written to me that thou seest hast assistance against the gladiators. I do therefore assure thee, that I will confirm the favor of my country to thee, by my endeavor to do thee some further kindness hereafter, that thou mayest find no loss in the want of Antony."

3. When Cæsar had spoken such obliging things to the king, and had put the diadem about his head, he proclaimed what he had bestowed on him by a decree, in which he enlarged in the commendation of the man after a magnificent manner. Whereupon Herod obliged him to be known by him, and desired him to forgive Alexander, one of Antony's friends, who had become a suppliant to him. But Cæsar's anger against him prevailed, and he complained of the many and very great offenses which the man whom he had thus far had been guilty of; and by means that he rejected his petition. After this, Cæsar went from Egypt through Syria, when Herod received him with royal and rich entertainment; and then did he first of all ride along with Cæsar, who was reviewing his army about Polemais; and feasted him with all his friends, and then distributed among the rest of the army what was necessary to them. The soldiers of the king also got the same provision of water for them, when they were to march as far as Pelusium, through a dry country, which he did also in like manner at their return thence; nor were there any necessary wanting to that army. It was therefore the opinion of both Cæsar and of his soldiers, that Herod's kingdom was too small for those generous presents he made them; for which reason, when Cæsar was come into Egypt, and Cleopatra and her sister were there, and now other marks of honor upon him, but made an addition to his kingdom, by giving him, not only the country which had been taken from him by Cleopatra, but besides that, Gadara, and Hippo, and the cities, Gaza, and Anthodon, and Joppa, and Strato's Tower. He also made him a present of four hundred Gallas [Galatians] as a guard for his body, which they had been to Cleopatra before. Nor did any thing so strongly induce him to make these presents as the generosity of him that received them.

4. Moreover, after the first games at Actium, he added both to the kingdom he had before Trachonitis, and what lay in its neighborhood, Batanea, and the country of Auranitis, and that on the following occasion: Zenodorus, who had hired the house of Lyasaki, had all along sent reports that Cæsar was on his side, and that Diocles, who thereupon had recourse to Varro, the president of Syria, and desired of him that he would represent the calami ty they were in to Cæsar; when Cæsar was acquainted with it, he sent back orders that this nest of robbers should be destroyed. Varro therefore made an expedition against them, and cleared the land of those men, and took it away from Zenodorus. Cæsar did also afterward bestow it on Herod, that it might not so much become the receptacle for these robbers that had come against Damascus. He also made him a procurator of all Syria, and this on the tenth year afterwards, when he came again into that province; and this was so established, that the other procurators of Syria were taken out of the administration without his advice; but when Zenodorus was dead, Cæsar bestowed on him all that land which lay between Trachonitis and Galilea. Yet what was still of more consequence to Herod, he was below the sea of Abraipsis, and by Agrippa next after Cæsar; whence he arrived at a very great degree of felicity. Yet did the greatness of his soul exceed it, and the main part of his magnanimity was extended to the promotion of piety.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the [Temple and] Cities that were built by Herod, and erected from the very foundations; as also, of those other Edifices that were erected by him: and what Magnificence he showed to Foreigners, and how Fortune was in all things favorable to him.

1. ACCORDINGLY, in the fifteenth year of his reign, Herod rebuilt the temple, and encompassed a piece of land about it with a wall, which land was twice as large as that before enclosed. The expense of it was also very great; it was very large; and the riches about it were also unspeakable. A sign of which you have in the great cloisters that were erected about the temple, and the citadel which was on its north side. The cloisters he also added below the temple; and the citadel he repaired at a vast expense, nor was it other than a royal palace, which he called Antonia, in honor of Antony. He also built himself a palace in the upper city, containing two very large and most beautiful apartments, to which the holy house itself could not be compared [in largeness.] The one apartment he named Cæsareum, and the other he named Agrippium, from his [two great] friends.

2. Yet did not Cæsar preserve their memory by particular buildings only, with their names given them, but his generosity went as far as entire cities; for when he had built a most beautiful wall round a country in Samaria, twenty furlongs long, and had left the town within the same wall, and had also, into it, and had allotted it to a most fruitful piece of land, and in the midst of this city, thus built, had erected a very large temple to Cæsar, and had laid round about it a portion of sacred land of three furlongs and a half, he called the city Sebastian, from Sebastianus or Augustus, and settled the affairs of the city after a most regular manner.

3. And when Cæsar had further bestowed upon him another additional country, he built there also a temple of white marble, hard by the fountains of Jordan: the place is called Psaum, where is a top of a mountain that is raised to an immense height, and set at its foot by its sides, its bottom, a dark cave opens itself; within which there is a horrible precipice, that descends abruptly to a vast depth; it contains a mighty

* Since Josephus, both here, and in his Antiq. b. xvi. ch. vii. sect. 3, reckons Gaza, which had been a free city, stationed between Jerusalem and Herod, and Augustus, and yet implies that Herod had made Costobarn a governor of it before, Antiq. b. xvi. chap. vii. sect. 3; Harduin has some pretense for saying that Josephus here contradicted himself. But, perhaps, Herod thought he had sufficient authority to put a governor into Gaza, after he was made interrex or king, in times of war, before the city was entirely delivered into his hands by Augustus.
WARS OF THE JEWS.

quantity of water which is immovable; and when any body lets down any thing to measure the depth of the earth beneath the water, no length of cord is sufficient to reach it. Now the fountains of Jordan rise at the roots of this cavity outwardly; and, as some think, this is the utmost origin of Jordan: but we shall speak of that matter more accurately in our following history.

5. But the king erected other places at Jericho, and between the citadel Cyporus and the former place, such as we now build less useful than the former for travellers, and named them from the same friends of his. To say all at once, there was not any place of his kingdom fit for it, the liberal display of them, or any thing which this citadel, in its situation, had not good haven, insomuch that every one that sailed from Phœnicia for Egypt was obliged to lie in the stormy sea, by reason of the south winds that threatened them; which wind, if it enter between the citadels, and spread itself, and take the sea in its hands, and raise and dash upon the rocks, then, upon their retreat, the sea is in a great ferment for a long way. But the king, by the expense he was at, and the liberal display of them, obtained nature, and built a haven larger than the Pyrenæum at Athens; and in the other retirements of the water he built other deep stations (for the ships also).

6. Now although the place where he built was greatly opposite to his purposes, yet did he so folly struggle with that difficulty, that the froun most gentle of all the winds. At the mouth of the haven were on each side three great Colossæ, supported by pillars, where those Colossæ that are on your left hand, as you sail into the port are supported by a solid tower, but those on the right hand are supported by two upright stones joined together, which stones were larger than that tower which was on the other side of the entrance. Now there were continual edifices join'd to the haven, which were also terraces of white stone, and more haven ful than the former for the streets of the city lead, and were built at equal distances one from another. And over against the mouth of the haven, upon an elevation, there was a Colossus, as it was fabled, built in Iceland, both in beauty and largeness; and therein was a Colossus of Cæsar, not less than that of Jupiter Olympus, which it was made to resemble. The other Colossus of Rome was equal to that of Cæsar, and the honor of the building he ascribed to Cæsar, and named it Cæsarea accordingly.

7. He also built the other edifices, the amphitheatre and the赛车 place, in a manner agreeable to that denomination; and ap pointed games every fifth year, and called them, in like manner, Cæsar's games; and he first himself proposed the largest prizes upon the busi- ness. Indeed, he was much pleased with the victors themselves, but those that came next to them, and even those that came in the third place, were partakers of his royal bounty. He also rebuilt Anædon, a city that lay on the coast of Cœcina; and called that hill that was once named Agrippinum. Moreover, he had so very great a kindness for his friend Agrippa, that he had his name engraved upon that gate which he had set up in his town in the name of Agrippa.

8. Cæsar was also a lover of his father, if any other person ever was so; for he made a monume- ment for his father, even that city which he built in the finest plain that was in his kingdom, and which had more trees and springs than any other, and named it Antipatris. He also built a wall about a citadel that lay above Jericho, and was a very strong and very fine building, and dedicated it to his mother, and called it Cyporus. Moreover, he dedicated a temple upon the mount Zion, and called it by the name of his brother Phæesus, whose structure, largeness, and magnificence, we shall describe hereafter. He also built another city in the valley that leads northward from Jerusalem. And this city he named Cæsarea; and he said that this city was the centre of the shape of a woman's breast, and was sixty furlongs distant from Jerusalem, by the same name. He also bestowed much curious art upon it, with great ambition, and built round towers and all the rest of it, and enclosed it, and built it with the most costly palaces round about, insomuch, that not only the sight of the inner apartments was splendid, but great wealth was bestowed in the provinces of that empire, and in the cities of its borders, and in the houses, and roofs also. Besides this, he brought a many quantity of water from a great distance, and at vast charges, and raised an ascent to it of two hundred steps of the whitest marble, for the hill was itself moderately high, and entirely fictitious. He also built other palaces about the roots of the hill, sufficient to receive the furniture that was put into them, with his friends also; insomuch, that an account of its containing all necessaries, the fortresses might seem to be a city, but, by the bounds it had, a palace only.

11. And when he had built so much, he showed the greatness of his soul to no small number of foreign cities. He built places for exercise at Tralles, and at Tarsus; for he built a wall about Byblus, as also large rooms, and cloisters, and temples, and market-places at Berytus and Tyre, with theatres at Sidon and Damascus. He also built aqueducts for those Leodiceans who lived by the sea side; and for those in Phigalia he built baths and costly fountains, as also cloisters round a court, that were admirable both for their workmanship and largeness. Moreover, he dedicated groves and meadows to some persons: many, whom he beat, were said to have been left at his disposal, for he never was wanting. He also gave corn to all such as wanted it, and conferred upon Rhodes large sums of money for building ships, and this he did in many places, and frequentedly, and always. Against those who rebelled, at the first they laid down, he rebuilt it on his own charge, after a better manner than it was before. What need I speak of the presents he made to the Lyceans and Samians? or of his great liberality through all Italy? and that according to every body's wants of them. And are not the Athenians, and Lacedemonians, and Nicopolitans, and that Pergamus which is in Myas, full of donations that Herod presented them with, and many more alike? but those who, dwelling among his dominions, longing to Antioch in Syria, did not pay it with polished marble, though it were twenty furlongs long? and this when it was shunned by all men before, because it was full of dirt and filthiness, when he besides desired that he had the same place with a cloister of the same length.

12. It is true, a man may say, these were favors peculiar to those particular places, on which he bestowed his benefits; but what is remarkable, and even more extraordinary than any benefaction not only in common to all Greece, but to all the habitable earth, as far as the glory of the Olympic games reached. For when he perceived that they were come to nothing for want of money, he restored the games, and the people of Pherae, belonging to Antioch in Syria, did not pay it with polished marble, though it were twenty furlongs long? and this when it was shunned by all men before, because it was full of dirt and filthiness, when he besides desired that he had the same place with a cloister of the same length.

Such a warrior as could not be withstood: many, therefore, there are who have stood amazed at his readiness in his exercises, when they saw him throw the javelin directly forward, and shoot the arrow upon the mark. And then, besides these performances of his body, depending on his own strength of mind and body, fortune was also very favorable to him: for he seldom failed of success in his wars; and when he failed, he was not himself the occasion of such failings, but he either was betrayed by some of his own soldiers, or the rashness of his own soldiers procured his defeat.

CHAP. XXII.

The murder of Aristobulus and Hyrcanus, the High Priests; as also of Mariamne, the Queen.

1. HOWEVER, fortune was avenged on Herod in his external great successes, by raising him up domestic troubles; and he began to have wild disorders in his family, on account of his wife, of whose sons her son was, and on account of the government, he sent away her whom he had before married when he was a private person, and who was born at Jerusalem, whose name was Doris, and married Mariamne, the daughter of Herod, the son of Alexander, on whose account disturbances arose in his family, and that in part very soon, but chiefly after his return from Rome. For first of all he expelled Antipater, the son of Doris, for the sake of his own sons by Mariamne; and he sent for, and permitted him to come thither at no other times than at the festivals. After this he slew his wife's grandfather, Hyrcanus, when he was returned out of Parthia, and in order to this pretence, he suspected him of plotting against him. Now this Hyrcanus had been carried captive to Barzaphares, when he overran Syria; but those of his own country beyond Euphrates were desirous of him, and would set him free; and he, according to the miseries they had for his condition; and had he complied with their desires, when they exhorted him not to go over the river to Herod, he had not perished; but the marriage of his grandson (for Herod) was his temptation; for as he relied upon him, and was over fond of his own country, he came back to it. Herod's provocation was this, not that Hyrcanus made any attempt to gain the kingdom, but that it was fitter for him to be slain. The same year he slayed the mother of his wife.

2. Now of the five children which Herod had by Mariamne, two of them were daughters, and three were sons; and the youngest of these sons was educated at Rome, and there died; but the other two eldest he loved most, and set apart the care of the nobility of their mother, and because they were not born till he was king. But then what was stronger than all this, was the love he bore to Mariamne, and which inflamed him every day to a great degree, and so far converse, with all the other motives, that he felt no other troubles on account of her he loved so entirely. But Mariamne's hatred to him was not inferior to his love to her. She had indeed this out of the consciousness of indignation, from what he had done, while her boldness proceeded from his affection to her; so she openly reproached him with what he had done to her grandfather Hyrcanus, and to her brother Aristobulus; for he feared Aristobulus, though he were but a child, for when he had given him the high priesthood at the age of seventeen, he slew him quickly after he had conferred that dignity upon him; but when Aristobulus had died in bed, he did not wait till he had approached the altar, at a festival, the multitude, in great crowds, fell into tears; whereas the child was sent by night to Jericho, and was there dipped by the Gali, at Herod's command, in a pool till it was dead.

3. For these reasons Mariamne reproached Herod, and his sister and mother, after a most contumelious manner, while he was dumb on account of his affection for her, yet had the woma great indignation at her, and raised a calumny against her, that she was false to his bed; which thing they thought most likely to move Herod to anger. They also contrived to have many other circumstances believed, in order to make the thing more credible, and accused her of having sent her picture into Egypt to Antony, and that her last was so extraordinary, as to have thus showed herself, though she was absent, to a man that ran mad after women, and to a man that had it in his power to do violence to her. This charge fell like a thunderbolt upon Herod, and put him in disorder; and that especially, because his love to her occasioned him to be jealous, and because he considered with himself, that Octophrora was a shadow of the queen Cleopatra, and he began to suspect the king was taken off, as well as Malichus the Arabian: for his fear did not extend to the dissolving of his marriage, but to the danger of his sister.

4. When therefore he was about to take a journey abroad, he committed his wife to Joseph, his sister Salome's husband, as to one who would be faithful to him, and bore him good-will on account of their kindred; he also gave him a secret injunction, that if Antony slew him, he would slay her. But Joseph, without any ill design, and only in order to demonstrate the king's love to his wife, how he could not bear to think of being separated from her, even by death itself, discovered this grand secret to her; upon which, when Herod was come back, and as they talked together, he confirmed his love to her by many oaths, and assured her that he had never such as affection for any other woman as he had for her; and says, (says thou didat, to be sure, demonstrate thy love to me by the injunctions thou gavest Joseph, when thou commandedst him to kill me.)

5. When he heard that this grand secret was discovered, he was like a distracted man, and said, that Joseph would never have disclosed that injunction of his, unless he had deceived him. His passion also made him stark mad, and leaping out of his bed, he ran about the palace after a wild manner; at which time his sister Salome took the opportunity also to blast her reputation, and confirmed his suspicion about Joseph; whereupon, out of his ungovernable jealousy and rage, he slew both of them; but as he was immedi-ately; but as soon as ever his passion was over, he repented of what he had done, and as soon as his anger was worn off, his affections were kindled again; but the name of his des- trues for her was so advent, that he could not think she was dead, but would appear under his disorder to speak to her as if she were still alive, till he were better instructed by time, when his grief and trouble, now she was dead, appeared as great as his affection had been for her while she was living.

CHAP. XXIII.

Calumnies against the Sons of Mariamme. Antipa-per is preferred before them. They are accused before Cæsar, and Herod is reconciled to them.

1. Now Mariamme's sons were heirs to that hatred which had been borne their mother, and when they came from the grace of Herod, he was afraid of them, as if he himself were also accused by Antony, but that he had given the like command a second time to Soemus also, when he was afraid of being slain by Augustus, Ant. b. v. ch. 87. sect. 3.

Salome's daughter, which Salome had been the accuser of their mother; the other married the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia. And now they used boldness in speaking, as is borne hatred in their minds. Now those that com-miserated them and distrusted them were such as their boldness, and certain of them spoke now more plainly to the king that there were treacherous designs laid against him by both his sons, and in that was son-in-law to Archelaus, relying upon the king against his own children; and if the king had sent them to Cæsar, in order to accuse Herod before Cæsar; and when Herod's head had been long enough filled with these calumnies, he brought Antipater, whom he loved, to Judea, into favor again, as a defense to him against his sons. In the mean time he considered how he possibly could to prefer him before them.

3. But these sons were not able to bear this change in their affairs, for when they saw him father of a son; the possibility of their birth made them unable to sustain their indignation; but whencesoever they were easy, they showed the anger they had at it. And as these sons did day after day improve in the respect for their country, a biteriter already esteem their own abilities, which were very great, in fostering his father, and in contriving many sorts of calumnies against his brethren, while he told some stories of them himself, and put it upon them to show what they were to Cæsar, from all hopes of succeeding to the kingdom; for he was already publicly put into his father's will as his successor. Accordingly, he was sent as a son to Cæsar, and to be intrusted with the business of the kingdom to Cæsar, excepting the diadem. He was also able in time to introduce his mother again into Mariamme's bed. The two sorts of weapons he made use of against his brethren, were family and calumnies: whereby he brought them mutually privately to such a pass, that the king had thoughts of putting his sons to death.

3. So the father drew Alexander as far as Raphias, and charged him with an attempt of poisoning him before Cæsar. Alexander could hardly speak for lamentation, but having a judge that was more skilful than Antipater, and more wise than Herod, he modestly avoided laying any in-sults upon that man, but with great reason of thought confuted the calumnies, and repri-" made this reconciliation among us; and, in the third place, reflect upon me, who entreat you to do what I have power to command you: continue brethren. I give you royal garments, and royal honors; and I pray to God to preserve what I have determined. We have no power to impose the rest on another." When the king had thus spoken, and had saluted every one of his sons after an obsequious manner, he dismissed the multitude, some of whom gave their assent to what he had said, and wished that much time might be spent in the enterprise; but for those who wished for a change of affairs, they pretended they did not so much as hear what he said.

CHAP. XXIV.

The Malice of Antipater and Doria. Alexander is very uneasy on Glaphyra's Account. Herod pardons Pheroras whom he suspected, and Salome, whom he knew to make mischief among them. Herod's Eunuchs are tortured, and Alexander is bound.

1. But now the quarrel that was between them, still accompanied those brethren when they parted, and the discord that was bred between them grew worse. Alexander and Aristobulus were much grieved that the privilege of the first-born was confirmed to Antipater, as was Antipater very angry at his brethren, that they were to succeed him, and that he should be left shut out from the kingdom itself, and which I will render still more firm; for Caesar hath put into my power to dispose of the government, and to appoint my successor. Accordingly, I lay no resort for his kindred, and in order to obtain my advantage, I do declare, that these three sons of mine shall be kings. And, in the first place, I pray for the approbation of God to what I am about, and in the name of the king, who is to announce the approbation. The age of one of them, and the nobility of the other two, should procure them the succession. Nay, indeed, my kingdom is so large, that it may be sufficient for more kings. For he that pays money for his greatness, and his kindred and his kindred, and that is honored beyond what his age requires so joyful, as he will make him that is dishonored sorrowful. As for the kindred and friends that are to converse with them, I will appoint them the king's sons to be of so much strength, that they may be securities for their concord; as well knowing, that the ill tempers of those with whom they converse, will produce quarrels and contentions among them; but that, if those with whom they converse be of good temper, they will preserve their natural affections for one another. But still I desire, that not these only, but all the captains of my army, have, for the present, all the people placed on me alone; for I do not give you a kingdom; but give them royal honors only; whereby it will come to pass, that they will enjoy the sweet parts of government as rulers themselves, but will not be proved true that they may be for the king, and be upon myself, whether I will or not. And let every one consider what age I am of, how I have conducted my life; and what piety I have exercised: for my age is not so great, that men may soon expect the end of my life; and I have indulged such a luxurious way of living as cuts men off when they are young; and we have been so religious towards God, that we [have reason to hope we] may arrive at a very great age of life, eminently written in the heavens, say sons, so as to aim at my destruction, they shall be punished by me on their account. I am not one who envy my own children, and therefore forbid men to pay them great respect; but I turn you on this subject of respect, that you may be more zealous, and strive how to make them insolent. And if ever one that comes near them does but revolve this in his mind, that if he proves a good man, he shall receive a reward from me; that if he proves ungrateful, he shall receive nothing from him to whom it is shown: I suppose they will all be of my side, that is, of my sons' side; for it will be for their advantage that he should reign, and I that be at concord with them. But that if one of you has been slighted, either for the holiness of nature itself, by whose means natural affection is preserved, even among wild beasts; in the next place reflect upon Caesar, who hath

2. By these methods Herod was inflamed. and, as much as his natural affection to the young men did every day diminish, so much did it increase toward Antipater. The courters also included to the same conduct, some of their own accord, and others by the king's injunction, as particularly did Ptolemy, the king's dearest friend, and his eldest brother, and all his children; for Antipater was all in all: and what was the bitterest part of all to Alexander, Antip-ater's mother was also all in all; she was one that gave counsel against them, and was more mad about this uncle, and more that hated the king's sons more than is usual to hate sons-in-law. All men did therefore already pay their respects to Antipater, in hopes of advantage;
and it was the king's command which alienated every body [from the son-in-law]; but he was very gud pardon for this charge to his most intimate friends, that they should not come near, nor pay any regard to Alexander, or to his friends. Herod also became terror of men, not only to his domestics about the court, but to his friends abroad; for Cesar had given such a privilege to no other king as he had given to him, which was this, that he might fetch back any one that fled from him, even out of a city under his own jurisdiction.

Now the young men were not acquainted with the calamities raised against them; for which reason they could not guard themselves against them, but fell under them; for their father did not make up his mind to take public complaints against either of them; though in a little time they perceived how things were, by his coldness to them, and by the great uneasiness he showed upon any thing that troubled him. Antipater had also made this uncle the chief of his enemies to be his enemies too, as well as their aunt Salome, while he was always talking with her, as with a wife, and irritating her against them. Moreover, Alexander's wife, Glaphyra, augmented this hatred against them,
by her very perniciousness and great person, and pretending that she was a lady superior to all others in that kingdom, as being derived by her father's side from Temenum, or by her mother's side from Darius, the son of Hystaspes. She also frequently reproachered Herod's sister and wives with the ignobility of their descent; and that they were every one chosen by him for their beauty, but not for their wealth; and that he was not a few; it being of old permitted to the Jews to marry many wives: and this king delighted in many,
all of whom hated Alexander, on account of Glaphyra's boasting and reproaches.

3. But Aristobulus had raised a quarrel between himself and Salome, who was his mother-in-law, besides the anger he had conceived at Glaphyra's reproaches; for he perpetually upbraided his wife with the meaness of her family, and complained, that as he had married a woman of a low family, so had his brother Alexander married one of royal blood. At this Salome's danger went, and told it her with this addition, that Alexander threatened the mothers of his elder brothers, and of himself, that when he should come to the crown, he would make them weary with their maidens, and would make those brothers of his country schoolmasters; and broke this jest upon them, that they had been very carefully instructed therin. But Herod was so much ashamed of the crime, but they owned that he had made preparations to take her whom he loved, and run away to the Parthians. Costobarus also, the husband of Salome, to whom the king had given her great honor, fled from the king, and put to death for adultery, was instrumental in bringing about this contrivance and flight of his Nor did Salome escape all calamity upon herself:
for her brother Pheroras accused her, that she had made an agreement to marry Syllene, the procedoes not appear to me. And what our Saviour says about the common Jewish divorces, which may lay much greater claim to such a permission than this poly-gamy, seems to be true in this case also; that Moses, for the hardness of their hearts, suffered them to have several wives at the same time, but that 'out of the rater of Obodas, king of Arabia, who was at a bitter enmity with Herod; but when she was convicted of this, and of all that Pheroras had accused him of, she obtained his pardon. The king also pardoned Pheroras himself the crimes he had been accused of.

7. But the storm of the whole family was removed to Alexander, and all of it rested upon him. Now, in the year of our Lord, he was in the highest esteem with the king, as was plain by the offices they were in about him; for one of them was appointed to be his butler, another of them got his supper ready for him, and the third put on the same kind of clothes as he did. Now Alexander had prevailed with these men, by large gifts, to let him use them after an obscene manner; which, when it was told to the king, these were tortured, and found guilty, and presently confessions for the criminal conversation they had with them. They also discovered the promises by which they were induced so to do, and how they were defied by Alexander, who had told them, 'And if you do not fix their hopes upon Herod, an old man, and one so showy as to color his hair, unless they thought that would make him young again; but they ought to fix their attention on him, who was to be his successor together with his head, whether he was convict or not; and who in no long time would avenge himself on his enemies, and make his friends happy and blessed, and themselves in the first place: that the men of power did already pay respects to him. That I will send your wife and your mother, sister, and other women of the family, to the king, and the officers, did secretly come to him.'

8. These confessions did so terrify Herod, that he durst not immediately publish them; but he sent spies abroad, by night and day, who should make a close inquiry after all that was done and said; and when any were but suspected of [treason], he put them to death, insomuch that the palace was full of horribly unjust executions together with him. He had convinced them, as they were themselves in a state of enmity or hatred against others; and many there were who abused the king's bloody parsimony to the disadvantage of those to whom they had quarreled, and its account was easily recoverable. These were inflicted sooner than the calumnies were forged: he who had just then been accusing another, was accused himself, and was led away to execution, or considered as such, before he had convicted; for the danger the king was in of his life made examinations be very short. He also proceeded to such a degree of bitterness, that he could not look on any of those that were not accused, with a pleasant countenance, but was in the most barbarous disposition towards his own friends. Accordingly, he forbade a great many of them to come to court, and to those whom he had not power to punish actually, he spoke harshly, but for Antipater, he insulted him daily, who was now under his misfortunes, and got a stout company of his kindred together, and raised all sorts of calumnies against him: and for the king, he was brought to such a degree of terror as to persuade him to keep the city, and to persuade the city to keep him, for he had no reason to persuade young men; for by such persons, not only young men are sometimes imposed upon, but old men also, and by them sometimes are the most illustrious families and kingdoms overthrown.

9. Herod assented to what he had said, and, by degrees, abated of his anger against Alexander; but was more angry at Pheroras; for the principal subject of the latter's enmity was Pheroras, who persuaded that the king's inclinations changed on a sudden, and that Archelaus's friendship could do every thing with him, and that he had no honorable method of procuring himself, he procured his safety by his impudence. So he left Alexander, and had recourse to Archelaus.
who did him. That "he did not see how he could get his excommunicate, and had, as it were, been caught in so many crimes, whereby it was evidently demonstrated that he had plotted against the king, and had been the cause of those misfortunes which the young man was now under, unless he would unceasingly leave off his cunning knavery, and his denial of what he was charged withal, and confess the charge, and implore pardon of his brother, who still had a kindness for him; but that if, he would do so, he would afford him all the assistance he was able."

4. With this advice Pherecras complied, and putting himself into such a habit as might most move compassion, he came with black cloth upon his body and tears in his eyes, and threw himself down at the feet, and begged the pardon for what he had done, and confessed that he had acted very wickedly, and was guilty of every thing that he had been accused of, and lamented the love of his mind and affection which his love to a woman, he said, had brought him to. So when Archelaus had brought Pherecras to accuse and bear witness against himself, he then made an excuse for him, and mitigated Herod's anger by his tears, and this by using certain poetical maxims: "for that when he had suffered much greater mischiefs from a brother of his own, he presumed the obligations of nature before the passion of revenge; because it is in kingdoms, as it is in families, where a member of one of another is ever swelled by the body's weight, in which case it is not proper to cut off such member, but to heal it by a gentle method of cure."

5. Upon Archelaus's saying this, and much earnestly accusing himself, and the ingratitude he had received for what he had done, and the love he had received for what he had done, and the love he had to his wife, Archelaus was so moved that he promised to pardon him, and to keep his promise, and to make all the more of him, and to give him a higher rank in his kingdom than he had before. And when the king said, that his son would take it for a great favor done to him, if he would not dissolve that marriage, especially since they had already children between the young man and her, and that his son was taken into his favor, and was to be made a trustee of his will by him, and that as while she remains his wife she would be a great preservative to him, and to keep him from offending, as he had formerly done, so if she should be once torn away from him, she would be the cause of his falling into despair; because such young men's attempts are not mollified, when they are diverted from them by settling their affections at home. So Archelaus was persuaded by what he was told, and he was well informed by the people in the business. He therefore, he said, must, by all means, be sent to Rome to discourse with Caesar, because he was before written a full account to him of this whole matter.

6. Thus a period was put to Archelaus's strata gem, whereby he delivered his son-in-law out of the dangers he was in; but when these reconcilia tions were made, they spent some time in idle dallings and agreeable entertainments. And when Archelaus was going away, Herod made him a golden throne set with precious stones, and some emeralds, and a concubine who was called Pannychis. He also paid due honors to every one of his friends according to their dignity. In like manner did all the king's kindred and favorites. But Archelaus, having made glorious presents to Archelaus; and so he was conducted on his way by Herod and his nobility as far as Antioch.

How Eurykleus® commissed the Sons of Mars amans; and how the Apology of Eurystheus for them has no effect.

1. Now a little afterward there came into Judaea a man that was much superior to Archae laus's strategems, which did not only overturn that reconciliation that had been so wisely made with Alexander, but proved the occasion of his being put to a brave and a good end. This was Eurycles. He was so corrupt a man, that out of the desire of getting money, he chose to live under a king, for Greece could not suffice his luxury. He presented Herod with splendid gifts, which he had embezzled out of his kingdom, and quickly receiving them back again manifold; yet did he esteem bare gifts as nothing, unless he imbrued the kingdom in blood by his purchases. Accordingly, he imposed upon several of the best men, and made them believe that it was likely to him, as also by the lying encomiums which he made upon him; for as he soon perceived Herod's blind side, he said and did every thing that might please him, and thereby became one of his most intimate friends; for both the king and all that were about him, had a great regard for this Spartan on account of his country. And as soon as this fellow perceived the rotten parts of the family, and what quarrels the brothers had one with another, and in what disposition the father was towards each of them, he chose to take his lodging at first in the house of Antipater, but deluded Alexander with a pretended friendship to him, and falsely claimed to be an old acquaintance of Archelaus; for which reason he was presently admitted into Alexander's familiarity as a faithful friend. He also professed to be highly on account of his brother Archelaus. And when he had thus made trial of these several persons, he imposed upon one of them by one method, and upon another by another. But he was principally hired by Antipad to court Alexander, and to be a reproacher of Antipater, because, while he was the eldest son, he overlooked the intrigues of those who stood in the way of his expectations; and by reproaching Alexander, because he was born of a queen, and was married to a king's daughter, permitted one that was born of a mean woman to lay claim to the succession, and this when he had Archelaus to support him in the most complete manner. He was at first thought to be other than faithful by the young man, because of his pretended friendship with Archelaus: on which account it was that Alexander lamented to him Antipater's behavior with regard to himself, and this without concealing any thing from him; and it was then no wonder if Herod, after he had killed their mother, should deprive them of her kingdom. He also, by a bait that he laid for him, procured Aristobulus to say the same things. Thus did he intrigue both the brothers to make complaints of their father here see he was, is visible from the public records of the period. Aristobulus is mentioned by Plutarch, re twenty-five years before a companion to Mark Antony, and as living with Herod; where he might easily in tegrate himself into the acquaintance of Herod's sons, Antipater and Alexander, as Ulerius, Hircan, and Span bein justly suppose. The reason why his being a and then went to Antipater, and carried those grand secrets to him. He also added a faction of his own, as if his brothers had laid a plot against him, and were almost ready to come upon him with their drawn swords. For this intelligence he received a great sum of money, and on that account he commended Antipater before his father, and so he came to the service of the old citizen of a castle, to desire him to receive him and Aristobulus into the castle when he had killed his father, and to give them weapons, and what else he should do, which he could, upon that occasion. [The king] had said, that this letter was written to Antipater by Diophantus. This Diophantus was the king's secretary, a bold man, and cunning in counterfeiting any one's hand; and after he had counterfeited the writing, he had sent his bundle to death for it. Herod did not order the decision of the castle to be tortured, but got nothing out of him of what the accusation suggested.

4. However, although Herod found the proofs in writing too weak, he did order to have his son in custody: for till then they had been left at liberty. He also called that pest of his family, and forger of all this vile accusation, Eurycles, his saviour and benefactor, and gave him a reward of fifty talents. Upon which he prevented any accurate accounts that could come of what he had done, by going immediately into Cappadocia, and there he got money of Archelaus, having the impudence to pretend that he had reconciled Herod to Alexander.

5. But it will be now worth while to put Eunecus of Cos in opposition to this Spartan; for as he was one of Alexander's most intimate friends, and came to him in his travels at the same time that Eurycles came, so the king put the question to him, whether those things of which Alexander was accused were true? He assured him, that he had never heard any such things from the young men: yet did this testimony avail nothing for the clearing those miserable creatures. Herod was only disposed and most ready to be crossed out of them; and every one was most agreeable to him that would believe them were guilty, and showed their indignation at them.

CHAP. XXVII.

Herod, by Caesar's Direction, accuses his Sons at Eryxias. They are not produced before the Court, but yet are condemned; and in a little Time they are sent to Sestatie, and strangled there.

1. Moreover, Salome exasperated Herod's cruelty against his sons; for Archelaus was desirous to bring her, who was his mother-in-law and his aunt, into the like dangers with themselves: so he sent her to take care of her own safety, and told her, that the king was preparing on account of his father, to put her to death, unless he should be acquitted in his accounts he should not be deemed a parricide.

3. When Eurycles had made this portentous speech, he greatly commended Antipater, as the only child that had an affection for his father, and said, that it was that of the old citizen of a castle, to desire him to receive him and Aristobulus into the castle when he had killed his father, and to give them weapons, and what else he should do, which he could, upon that occasion. [The king] had said, that this letter was written to Antipater by Diophantus. He also called that pest of his family, and forger of all this vile accusation, Eurycles, his saviour and benefactor, and gave him a reward of fifty talents. Upon which he prevented any accurate accounts that could come of what he had done, by going immediately into Cappadocia, and there he got money of Archelaus, having the impudence to pretend that he had reconciled Herod to Alexander.
letters to Caesar, Caesar was mightily troubled at the case of the young men; yet did not he think he ought to take the power from the father, of condemning his sons: so he wrote back to him, and appointed him to have the power over his sons; but said withal, that “he would do well to make motion into the matter to make a plot against him, in a public council, and to take for his assessors his own kindred, and the governors of the province: and if those sons be found guilty, to put them to death; but if they appear to have thought of no more than flying away from him, that he should be in that case moderate their punishment.

2. With these directions Herod compiled, and came to Bethany, where Caesar had ordered the council to be held, and got the judges together. The presidents sat first, as Caesar’s letters had appointed, who were Saturninus, and Pedanus, and their lieutenants that were with them, with whom was the procurator Volumnius also; he came in order before the king and his kin and friends, with Salome also, and Pheroras; after whom sat the principal men of all Syria, excepting Archelaus; for Herod had a suspicion of him, because he was Alexander’s father-in-law. Yet it was Alexander the king’s mother, and Salome the king’s sister, which was done very cunningly, for he knew well enough that had they but appeared only, they would certainly have been pitied; and if within they had been suffered to speak, Alexander certainly had done it; and what these were accused of; but they were in custody at Platus, a village of the Sidonians.

3. So the king got up, and inveighed against his sons, as if they were present; and as for that part of the speech that the king charged them against him, he urged it but faintly, because he was destitute of proofs; but he insisted before the assessors on the reproaches, and jests, and injurious carriage, and ten thousand the like offences; and yet raised a great deal of indignation, and the death itself; and when nobody contradicted him, he moved them to pity his case, as though he had been condemned himself, now he had gained a victory over his sons, and the king; so he asked each of them, and every one’s sentence, which sentence was first of all given by Saturninus, and was this, that he condemned the young men, but not to death; for that it was not fit for him, who had three sons of his kingdom, to give his sentence for the destruction of the sons of another. The two lieutenants also gave the like vote; some others there were also who followed their example; but Volumnius began to vote on the more melancholy side, and came after and condemned the young men to die, some out of flattery, and some out of hatred to Herod; but none out of indignation at their crimes. And now all Syria and Judea was in great expectation, and waited for the last act of this tragedy; yet did nobody supposed that Herod would be so barbarous as to murder his children; however, he carried them away to Tyre, and thence sailed to Caesarea; and deliberated with himself what sort of death they should suffer.

4. Now there was a certain old soldier of the sing, whose name was Tero, who had a son that was very familiar with, and a friend to Alexander, and who himself particularly loved the young men. The soldier was in manner distracted out of the excess of the indignation he had at what was doing; and at first he cried aloud, as he went about, “That justice was trampled under foot; that truth was perished, and nature confounded; and that the life of man was full of injustice;" and every thing else that passion could suggest to a man who spared not his own life; and at last he ventured to go to the king; and said, "Sir, truly, I think, this is an unrighteous matter, when thou warest so to most wicked wretches, against those that ought to be dearest to thee; since thou hast frequently resolved that Pheroras and Salome should be put to death, and yet believest against thy sons; while these, by cutting off the succession of thine own sons, leave all wholly to Antipater and thereby choose to have these such a king as may live thoroughly in their own dominions. If ever, consider what this death of Antipater’s brethren, will not make him hated by the soldiers for there is nobody but commisserates the young men, and of the captains a great many allow their indignation. And as for me, my son’s death, this he named those that had such indignation. But the king ordered those men, with Tero himself, and his son, to be seized upon immediately.

5. At which time there was a certain barber, who had a brother of his, and they were close friends, on account of what these were accused of; but they were in custody at Platus, a village of the Sidonians.

6. And now Herod accused the captains, and Tero, and Salome, and brought the people together in a body against them; and accordingly there were they put to death, together with [Trypho] the barber; they were killed by the pieces of wood, and the stones that were thrown at them by the people.

How Antipater is hated of all Men; and how the King expouses the Sons of those that had been already executed; and that he desired them to change them for other Women. Of Herod’s Marriages and Children.

1. But an intolerable hatred fell upon Antipater from the nation, though he had now an indisputable title to the succession; because they all knew that he was the person who contrived all the calamities against his brethren. However, he began to be in a terrible fear, as he saw the posterity of those that had been slain growing up; for Alexander had two sons by Glaphyra; Theas, and Alexander; and an Antony by Herod, and Agrippa, and Aristobulus, his sons, with Herodias and Mariamne, his daughters, and all by Bernice, Salome’s daughter: so as for Glaphyra, Herod, as soon as he had had a son, put an end to his marriage, and married him to another woman. He married Bernice, Salome’s daughter, to Antipater’s uncle by his mother, and it was Antipater, who, in order to reconcile her to him, had had him put to death in games, and had celebrated this match; he also got into Pheroras’s favor, and into the favor of Caesar’s friends by presents, and other ways of obeisance, and sent no small sums of money to Rome: Saturninus, the friend of Antipater, was by this means replenished with the presents he made them; yet the more he gave, the more he was hated, as not making these presents out of generositv; but spending his money out of fear. Accordingly, it so fell out, that the receivers bore him no more good-will than before; but that those to whom he gave nothing were his more bitter enemies. However, he bestowed his money every day more and more profusely, on observing that, contrary to his expectations, the king was taking care of the orphans, and discovering at the same time his repentance for killing their fathers, his commiseration of those that sprang from them.

2. Accordingly, Herod got together his kindred and friends, and set before them the children, and with his eyes fell on (Phil.) and said—

"It was not an unlucky fate that took away from me these children’s fathers, which children are recommended to me by that natural commiseration which their orphan condition requires; however, I declare, I am also determined to be a most fortunate father, to appear a better grandfather, and to leave these children such curators after myself as are nearest to me. I therefore breathe thy daughter, Phereor, to the elder of these children; but that of the younger, thou mayest be obliged to take care of. I also breathe to thy son Antipater, the daughter of Aristobulus; be thou therefore a father to that orphan; and my son Herod [Phil.] shall have her for his wife. Herod [Phil.] is also of the same side, was high priest. And let every one that loves me be of my sentiments in these dispositions, which some that have an affection for me will abrogate. And I pray God, that he will join that advantage of my kingdom, and of my posterity, and may he look down with eyes more serene upon them than he looked upon their fathers."

With these words, he wrote and joined the children of Phereor and her daughter; after which he embraced them every one after an affectionate manner, and dismissed the assembly. Upon this, Antipater was in great disorder immediately, and thought it a most severe thing that was done; for he supposed that this dignity which was conferred on these orphans was for his own destruction, even in his father's lifetime, and that he should run another risk of losing the government, in that Herod's sons, Aristobulus [a king] and Pheroras a tetrarch, were to support them. He also considered how he was himself hated by the nation, and how they pitied these orphans; how great affection the Jews bore to their nation, that they might remember them, and how gladly they remembered them now they had perished by his means. So he resolved by all the ways possible to get these espousals dissolved.

4. Now he was afraid of going seditiously about this matter with his father, who was hard to be pleased, and was presently moved upon the least suspicion; so he ventured to go to him directly, and to beg of him before his face, not to deprive him of this dignity which he had been pleased to bestow upon him, for that he never had the bare name of a king, while the power was in other persons; for that he should never be able to keep the government, if Alexander's son was to be put over him. And he besought him earnestly, since there were so many of the royal family alive, that he would change those [intended] marriages. Now the king had nine wives, and children by seven of them; Antipater was himself born of Doris, and Herod [Phil.] of Marianne, the high priest's daughter; Antipater also and Archelaus were by Malthace, the Samaritan, as was his daughter, Olympia, which his brother Joseph's son had married by Cleopatra, of Jerusalem, he had Herod and Philip, and by Pallas, Phasaeus; he had also two daughters, Roxana and Salome, the one by Phereor, and the other by Elpis; he had also two wives above these, at home his first brother's daughter, and the other his niece; and besides these he had two daughters, the sisters of Alexander and Aristobulus, by Marianne. Since, therefore, the royal family was so numerous, Antipater prayed him to change the marriage of his sister to him, and his son to Phereor's daughter.

5. When the king perceived what disposition he was in towards these orphans, he was angry at it, and a suspicion came into his mind, as to those sons whom he had put to death, whether that had not been brought about by the false tales of Antipater; so at that time he made Antipater a long and a peevish answer, and bid him begone. Yet was he afterward prevailed upon cunningly by his ministers, and changed the marriages; he married Antipater's daughter to him, and his son to Phereor's daughter.

6. Now one may learn, in this instance, how very much this flattering Antipater could do, even what Salome, in the like circumstances, could not do for her; for what she did not do for him, the means of Julia, Caesar's wife, earnestly desired leave to be married to Syllaeus, the Arabian, Herod swore he would esteem her his better enemy, unless she would leave her project; he also reproved her against her own consent, to be married to Alexa, a friend of his, and that one of her daughters should be married to Alexa's son, and the other to Antipater, uncle by the right side of the daughter that the king had by Marianne, the one was married to Antipater, his sister's son, and the other to his brother's son, Phasaeus.

CHAP. XXIX.

Antipater becomes insolent. He is sent to Rome, and carries Herod's Testament with him. Pheroras leaves his Brother, that he may keep his Wife. His death at home.

I. Now when Antipater had cut off the hopes of the orphans, and had contracted such affinal ties as would be most for his own advantage, he proceeded briskly, as having a certain expectation of the kingdom; and divers assurances added to his wickedness, he became insolent; for not being able to avoid the hatred of all people, he built his security upon the terror he struck into them. Pheroras also assisted him in his designs, loath upon him as already described in his kingdom. There was also a company of women in the court, which excited new disturbances; for Pheroras's wife, together with her mother and sister, as soon as Antipater was the more greatly impressed in the palace. She also was very insolent as to afford the king's two daughters, on which account the king hated her to a great degree; yet although these women were hated by him, they domineered over others; there was one who opposed their good agreement, and informed the king of their meetings, as not being for the advantage of his affairs. And when these women knew what calamities she had raised against them, and how much Herod was dis on account of Marianne. 2. Joseph, Herod's quater, or treasurer, slain on the same account. 3. Joseph, Herod's brother, slain in battle against Antigonus. 4. Joseph, the heir's nephew, the husband of one of Herod's daughters.

II. These daughters of Herod, whom Pheroras had affronted, were both of them named Roxana, two virgin, who were born to him of his two wives, Elpis and Phereor. See Herod's genealogy, Antig. b. xvii. ch. 1. sect. 3 pleased, they left off their public meetings, and friendly entertainments of one another; or, on the contrary, they pretended to quarrel one with another, when the king was within hearing. The like dissimulation did Antipater make use of, and when matters were public, he opposed Pheroras; but still they had private cabals and merry meets in the night-time; nor did the observation of others do any more than confirm their mutual agreement. However, Salome knew every thing they did, and told every thing to Herod.

2. But he was inflamed with anger at them, and now Phasaelis, the wife of Pheroras, was principally accused her. So he got an assembly of his friends and kindred together, and there accused this woman of many things, and particularly of the affronts she had offered his daughter, and the support she had given the Pheroridian with money, by way of rewards for what they had done against him, and had procured his brother to become his enemy, by giving him love potions, the high priest's drug, a speech to Pheroras, and told him, that "he would give him his choice of these two things, whether he would keep in with his brother, or with wife?" And when Pheroras said, that he would certainly die rather than separate his wife from him, and knowing what to do further in that matter, turned his speech to Antipater, and charged him to have no intercourse either with Pheroras's wife, or with Pheroras himself, or with any one belonging to her; and that Antipater must agree that his injurious publicity, yet did he in secret come to their night-meetings; and because he was afraid that Salome observed what he did, he procured, by the means of his Italian friends, that he might go and live at Rome; for when some of them wrote that it was proper for Antipater to be sent to Caesar for some time, Herod made no delay, but sent him, and that with a splendid attendance, and a great deal of money, and gave him his horse and carriage to carry with him, wherein Antipater had the kingdom bequeathed to him, and wherein Herod was named for Antipater's successor; that Herod, I mean, was the son of Phasaelis, the high priest's daughter, and wrote nothing of what he was to pay, and did also accuse Phasaeus to Caesar, and said that he was not a steward for Caesar's advantage, but for Herod's, Phasaeus was angry at him on that account, but when he saw the great esteem he had to Caesar, and discovered Sylla's grand secrets, and told the king that Sylla had corrupted Corinthus, one of the guards of his body, by bribing him, and of whom he must therefore have heard nothing; and when he was compelled by this confessions, and prepared to inquire further into the truth of the matter. So this woman discovered the friendship of Antipater's mother to Pheroras and Antipater's women, as also their secret meetings, and that Pheroras and Antipater had drunk

4. However, Herod did not leave off importing Pheroras, but proceeded to force him to put away his wife; yet he could not devise any way by which he could bring the woman herself to punishment, although he had many causes of bringing her from him. She avowed the unseasonness at her, that he cast both her and his brother out of his kingdom. Pheroras took this injury very patiently, and went away into his own territories, and returned to his own kingdom, and sent not to take care of his case, and took care of him; but his affections for him did him no good, for Pheroras died a little afterward. Now, though Herod had so great an affection for him to the last day of his life; yet, after his death, he did not avenge his case, and gave him no proper burial, but killed him by poison. However, he took care to have his dead body carried to Jerusalem, and appointed a very great mourning to the whole nation for him, and bestowed a most pompous funeral upon him. And this was the end that one of Alexander's and Aristobulus's murderers came to.

CHAP. XXX.

When Herod Made Inquiry about Pheroras's Death, a Discovery was made that Antipater had prepared a poisonous Draught for him. Herod casts Doris and her Accomplices, as also Mariamne, out of the Palace, and blinds her son Herod out of his Testament.

1. But now the punishment was transferred unto the original author, Antipater, and took its rise from the death of Pheroras; for certain of his relations came to Herod as soon as he heard of the king, and told him, that "his brother had been destroyed by poison, and that his wife had brought him somewhat that was prepared after an unusual manner, and that, upon his eating it, he had been cast out of the kingdom." Herod then sent his mother and sister, two days before, brought a woman out of Arabia that was skillful in mixing such drugs, that she might prepare a love potion for Pheroras; and that, instead of a love potion, she had given him deadly poison; and that this was done by the management of Sylla, who was acquainted with that woman.

2. The king was deeply affected with so many suspicions, and had the mid-sentence of his murder committed to him; one of whom cried out in her agonies, "May that God which governs the earth and the heaven punish the author of all these our miseries, Antipater's mother, and my brother; may they be accursed;" and another, "the confessions, and proceeded to inquire further into the truth of the matter. So this woman discovered the friendship of Antipater's mother to Pheroras and Antipater's women, as also their secret meetings, and that Pheroras and Antipater had drunk

* This strange obstinacy of Pheroras in retaing his wife, who was one of a low family, and refusing to marry, was a great esteem to Herod, and desired it, as also that wife's admission to the council of the other great court ladies, together with Herod's esteem to Pheroras's love and other marriage, all so remarkable here or in the Antiquities, b xvn. ch. ii. sect. 4, and ch. iii. sect. 3, cannot be well accounted for but on the supposition that Pheroras believed, and Herod suspected, that the Phareus's pretension, if it was true, did not and could not be true, and in fact while Herod did not marry from Herod to Pheroras's posterity, and that most probably to Pheroras's posterity by this his wife, also would have been true. See Antq. b. xvi ch. ii. sect. 4, and ch. iii. sect. 1.

with them for a whole night together as they returned from the king, and would not suffer any body, either man-servant or maid-servant, to be there; while one of the free women discovered the whole matter at once; and the king's chamberlain himself, for that they oftentimes talked to one another thus: "That after Herod had slain Alexander and Aristobulus, he would fall upon them, and upon their wives, because, after he had not spared his sons, his daughter-in-law, nor his other blood, that he would fall upon the heads of his children, and that for this reason it was best to get as far off the wild beasts as they were able." And that Antipater oftentimes lausen his own case before his mother; and said to her, that "he had already gray hairs upon his head, and that his father grew younger again every day, and that perhaps death would overtake him before he should begin to be a king in earnest; and that in case Herod should die, which yet nobody knew when, he must one day suffer the calamity of his own head and his family. He said, that he could certainly be a man for a little time; for that those heads of Hydra, the sons of Alexander and Aristobulus, were growing up: that he was only alive through the favor of Herod's ancestors; and that his son would one day be the successor to his throne; and that his successor after his death was not to be any one of his own sons, but Herod the son of Mariamne; that in this point Herod was plainly distracted, to think that he would not have been able to escape the wrath of his ancestors; and he would take care that not one of his posterity should remain, because he was of all fathers the greatest hater of his children. Yet does he hate his brother still worse, whence it was that he said, 'If you come hither, I shall not act as a brother, but as a stranger, for I will not have to do with you any more, and that you should not have any intercourse with Pheroras." And when Pheroras said, Wherein have we done him any harm? Antipater replied, "I wish he would but deprive us of all we have, and leave us naked, and let us die in prison, that we might not escape to this wild beast, who is thus given to murder, who will not permit us to love anyone openly, although we be together privately; yet may we be so openly, if we have been able to escape the rage of Herod, and brought such as were the freest from suspicion to be examined; whereby it was discovered that Mariamne, the high priest's daughter, was conscious of this plot, and that every creature, whom they were torturing, declared it so to be. When the king avenged this insolent attempt of the mother upon her son, and blotted Herod, whom he had by her, out of his testament, who had been before named therein as successor to Antipater.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Antipater is convicted by Bathyllus: but he still returns from Rome without knowing it. Herod brings him to his Trial.

§ 1. After these things were over, Bathyllus came under examination, in order to convict Antipater, who proved the concluding attestation to Antipater's design; for indeed he was more a man than his freed-men. This man came, and brought another deadly potion, the poison of sape, and the juices of other serpents, that if the first potion did not do the business, Pheroras and his wife might be able, for they were the king's sons, and his freedmen. He brought also an addition to Antipater's insolent attempt against his father, which was the letters which he wrote against his brethren, Archelaus and Philip, who were the king's sons, and of tender years, but of generous dispositions. Antipater set himself to get rid of these as soon as he could, that they might not be prejudicial to his hopes, and to that end he forged letters against them in the name his friends at Rome. Some of these he corrupted by bribes to write how greatly resented their father, and did not only treachery and bloodshed, and Aristotle, and were uneasy at being recalled; for their father had already not for them, which was the very thing that occluded Antipater.

2. As he said, while Antipater was in Judea, he before he was upon his journey to Rome, he was to have the like letters against them at Rome, and then came to his father, he so as yet had no suspicion of him, and spoiling his name and property. And a great deal was wise, that some of the things contained in those letters were false, and others of them were only utterly injurious. Yet at the same time that he spented a great deal of his money, by making reasons and excuses, he was afraid to bring his accounts into confusion, y buying costly garments, and carpets of various contexts, with silver and gold cups, and great many more curious things, that so, among other great expenses laid way upon furniture, he might conceal the money he had used: hiring men [to write the letters] for he sought in an account of his expenses, amounting to a great deal of money when he left Rome. And he received from Rome, which was the lawsuit he had been in with Syllus. So while all his roggeries, even those of a user sort also, were covered by his greater villany, while all the examinations by torture proclaimed his guilt, nevertheless he did not deny it to letters proclaimed his second attempt to murder was brethren; yet did no one of those that came s Rome inform him of his misfortunes in Judea, though seven months had intervened between his leaving his father, and his return; for he was the one which all bore to him. And perhaps they were the ghosts of those brethren of his hat had been murdered, that stopped the mouths of those that intended to have told him. He hesitated to such a degree, and dreaded his situation, that he would soon come to them, and how he was dismissed with honor by Caesar.

3. Now the king being desirous to get this matter against him into his hands, and being also afraid of publishing it to the knowledge how his affairs stood, and be upon his guard, he discharged his anger in his epistle o him, as in other points he wrote kindly to him, not making haste as it was his custom if he did as quickly, he would then lay aside the complaints he had against his mother; for Antipater was not ignorant that his mother had been excelled out of the palace. However, he had before received the letter containing the news of the death of Phereorus, at Tarentum, and made great lamentations at it; for which some condemned him, as being for his own uncle; though probably this confusion arose on account of his having thereby failed in his plot [on his father's life], and his tears were more for the loss of the letter that had been to have been subservient therein, than [an uncle] Phereorus: moreover, a sort of fear came upon him as to his designs, lest the poison should manifest his hand. And when he was in Cilicia, he received the forementioned epistle from his father, and made great haste accordingly. But when he had sailed to Celenus, he supposed he came into mind relating to his mother's misfortunes; and if he had put upon some misconception to itself. Those therefore of his friends who were the most considerate, advised him not rashly to go to his father, till he had considered what were the occasions whether his mother had been ejected, because they were afraid that so might be involved in the calumnies that had been cast upon his mother; but those that were less considerate, and had more regard to their own desires of seeing their native country than

* This Tarentum has coins still extant, as Ireland in terms ut here in his note.

5. And Antipater's safety, prevailed upon him to make haste home, and not by delaying his journey afforded his father ground for an ill conception. They give a handle to those that raised stories against him; for that in case any thing had been moved to his disadvantage, it was owing to his absence, which durst not have been done had he been present. And it was alarmed for himself of certain happiness, for the sake of an uncertain suspicion, and not rather to return to his father, and take the royal authority upon him which was in a state of fluctuation on his account and the moment that the king was in, for Providence hurried him on [to his destruction.] So he passed over the sea, and landed at Sebastus, the haven of Caesarea.

4. And here he found a perfect and unexpected solitude and loneliness, that he avoided him, and nobody durst come at him; for he was equally hated by all men; and now that hatred had liberty to show itself, and the dread men were in at the king's anger made men keep from him: for the whole: for [of Jerusalem] was filled with the rumors about Antipater, and Antipater himself was the only person who was ignorant of them; for no man was dismissed more magnificently when he left Rome than he was now received back with greater ignominy. And indeed he began already to suspect what misfortunes there were in Herod's family; yet did he cunningly conceal his suspicions; and not only was the king by his exquisite honor, was put on a forced boldness of countenance. Nor could he now fly any whither, nor had he any way of emerging out of the difficulties which encompassed him, nor indeed had he even there say so of a certain intelligence of the affairs of the royal family, by reason of the threats the king had given out: yet had he some small hopes of better tidings; for perhaps nothing had been discovered; or if any discovery had been made, perhaps he was able to content them by impudence and artful tricks, which were the only things he relied upon for his deliverance.

5. And with these hopes did he screen himself, till he came to the palace, without any friends with him: these were afforded and shot out at the first gate. Now Varus, the president of Syria, happened to be in the palace [at this juncture:] so Antipater went in to his father, and putting on bold face, he made a speech to him: but Herod stretched out his hands, and turned his head away from him, and cried out, "Even this is an indication of a paricide, to be desirous to get me into his arms, when he is unaccustomed to see such a sight in his family. Thou wretched, thou vile wretch; do not thou touch me, till thou hast cleared thyself of these crimes that are charged upon thee. I appoint thee a court where thou art to be judged, and this Varus, who is very seasonably here, to be thy judge; and get thou thy defence ready against to-morrow; for I give thee so much time to prepare suitable excuses for thyself." And as Antipater was so confounded that he was able to make no answer to their charge, the king said, his wife came to him, and told him of all the evidence they had gotten against him. Hereupon he recollected himself, and considered what defence he should make against the accusations.

CHAP. XXIII.

Antipater is accused before Varus, and is convicted of laying a Plot [against his Father] by the strongest Evidence. Herod puts off his Punishment till he should be recovered, and, in the mean time, alters his Testament.

¶ 1. Now the day following, the king assembly of his kinsmen and friends, and called in Antipater's friends also: Herod himself, with Varus, were the presidents; and Hera called for all the witnesses, and ordered them to be brought in; among whom some of the domestic servants of Antipater's mother were brought in also, who had but a little while before been caught, as they were carrying a letter from her to her son: "Since all those things have been already discovered to thy father, do not thou come to him, unless thou canst procure some assistance from Caesar." When these words were over, Antonius came in, and falling on his face before his father's feet, he said, "Father, I beseech thee do not condemn me beforehand, but let thy ears be unembarrassed, and attend to my defence; for if thou wilt but hear me, I will demonstrate that I am innocent."

2. Hereupon Herod cried out to him to hold his peace, and spoke thus to Varus: "I cannot but think that thou, Varus, and every other up- right people, wilt if those of thy name be vile wretches. I am also afraid that thou wilt abhor my ill fortune, and judge me also myself worthy of all sorts of calamity, for begetting such children. But I may be pitied, who have been so affectionate a father to such wretched sons; for when I had settled the kingdom on my former sons, even when they were young, and when, besides the charges of the kingdom, I had added to them my friends of Caesar, and made them envied by other kings, I found them plotting against me; these have been put to death, and that, in a great measure, for the sake of Antipater; for as he wrote, he could say, and as I suspected, I took care chiefly to secure him from danger: but this prodigy wild beast, when he had been over and above satisfied with that patience which I showed him, he made use of that abominable craft of his to act against me, and cut off their just expectations for the sake of Antipater; and indeed what kindness did I do to them, that could equal what I have done to Antipater? to whom I have, in a manner, given the kingdom. Thou dost say I am alive, and whom I have openly named for the successor to my dominions in my testament, and given him a yearly revenue of his own of fifty talents, and supplied him with money in an extravagant degree out of my own revenues; and when he was about to sail to Rome, I gave him three hundred talents, and recommended him, and him alone of all my children, to Caesar, as his father's deliverer. Now what can I say of the other sons of mine guilty of like these of Antipater? and what evidence was there brought against them so strong as there is to demonstrate this son to have plotted against me? Yet does that crafty plot of Rome spread for his father, and hopes to obscure the truth by his cunning tricks. Thou, O Varus, must guard thyself against him; for I know the wild beast, and I foresee how plausibly he will talk, and his counterfeit lamentations and pranks of a sacrifice and a repentance, as the care of Alexander when he was alive, and not to intrust my body with all men! This was he who came to my very bed, and looked about lest any one should lay snares for me! This was he who took thee in to speak with me, but not of any fear of danger, who comforted me under the trouble I was in upon the slaughter of my sons, and looked to see what affliction my surviving brethren bore me! This was my protector, and the guardian of my body! And when I call to mind, O Varus, his craftiness upon every occasion, and his art of dissembling, I can hardly believe that I am still alive, and I wonder how I have escaped such a deep plotter of mischief. However, since some fate or other makes my house desolate, and perpetually raises up those that are dearest to me against me, I will with tears lament my hard fortune, and privately wail, and let it be known under Cover that thou hast resolved that no one who thirsts after my blood shall escape punishment, although the evidence should extend itself to all my sons."

3. Upon Herod's saying this, he was interrupted by the counsel of his friends, who beseeched one of his friends, to produce the evidence against Antipater. But in the mean time Antipater lifted up his head, (for he lay on the ground before his father's feet,) and cried out aloud, "Thou, O father, hast hasten my apology and have indulged me, which I think I might have for how can I be a paricide, whom thou thyself confessest to have always had for thy guardian? Thou callest my filial affection prodigious lies and hypocrisy; but then could it be that I, who was so subtle in other matters, should have failed to see and not to understand that it was not easy that he who committed so horrid a crime should be concealed from men, but impossible that he should be concealed from the judge of heaven, who sees all things, and is present everywhere? or did not I know what and my brethren came to, on whom God inflicted so great a punishment for their evil designs against thee? And, indeed, what shall I add more? Was there that thoughtless Auleus, whom thou bestowest upon me, whom, as thou thyself sayest, thou broughtest [into the palace]: whom thou didst prefer before so many of thy sons; whom thou madest a king in thine own life time; and yet the evidence which I have, I will not tell; but I will declare that he bestowest on me, thou madest me an object of envy. O miserable man! that thou shouldst undergo this bitter absence, and thereby afford a great opportunity for envy to rise against thee, and a plot for rendering me tiring of thy court, and laying designs against thee! Yet was I absent, father, on thy affairs, that Syllaeus might not treat thee with contempt in thine old age. Rome is a witness to my filial affection, and so is Cæsar, the ruler of the habitable earth, who oftentimes called me Philopater. Take here the letters he hath sent thee; they are more to be believed than the calumnies raised here: these letters are my only apology; these I use as the demonstration of that natural affection I have to thee. Remember that it was against my own choice that I sailed [to Rome], as knowing the latent hatred that was in the kingdom against me. It was thou, father, who gave me such a reason, and who had been my ruin, by forcing me to allow time for calumnies against me, and easy at me. However, I am come hither, and am ready to hear the evidence these is against me. If I be a paricide, then the punishment is already deserved by me; I believe the others that have been tortured, but let fire be brought to torment me; let the racks march through my bowels; have no regard to elements he had made, and was to confirm his testament; and he ordered that the dispositions he had made were to be kept as they were in his former testament.

9. So there was an acclamation made to Archelaus, to congratulate him upon his advancement, and the soldiers, with the multitude, went round about in troops, and promised him their good-will, and besides, prayed God to bless his government. After this they betook themselves to prepare for the king's funeral; and Archelaus ordered nothing of magnificence therein, but brought out all the royal ornaments to augment the pomp of the deceased. There was a bier all of gold, embroidered with precious stones, and a purple bed of various con textures, with the dead body upon it, covered with purple; and a diadem was put upon his head, and a crown of gold above it; and a sceptre in his right hand; and near to the bier were Herod's sons, and a multitude of his kindred; next to whom came his guards, and the officers of Thracians, the Germans, and Gauls, all accosted as if they were going to war; but the rest of the army went foremost, armed, and following their captains and officers in a regular manner; after whom five hundred more ran up and down the street, with sweet spices in their hands: and the body was carried two hundred furlongs to Herodium where he had given orders to be buried. And this shall suffice for the conclusion of the life of Herod.

He also spoke kindly to the multitude from an elevated seat, near a throne of gold, and returned them thanks for the zeal they had shown about his father's funeral, and the submission they had made to him, as if he were already settled in the kingdom; but he told them withal, that "he would not at present take upon him either the title of a king, or the names thereto belonging, until Cæsar, who is made lord of this whole affair by the testament, confirm the succession; for that when the soldiers would have set the diadem on his head, he would not accept of it; but that he would make abundant requital, not to the soldiers only, but to the people, for their alacrity and good-will to him, when the superior lords [the Romans] should have given him a complete title to the kingdom; for that it should be his study to appear in all things better than his father.

CHAP. I.

Archelaus makes a Funeral Feast for the People on account of Herod; after which a great Tumult is raised by the Multitude, and he sends the Soldiers out upon them, who destroy about the Thousand of them.

§ 1. Now the necessity which Archelaus was under of taking a journey to Rome was the occasion of new disturbances; for when he had mourned for his father seven days, and had given a very expensive funeral feast to the multitude, (which custom is the occasion of poverty; to many of the Jews, because they are forced to feast the multitude; for if any one omits it, he is not esteemed a holy person,) he put on a white garment, and went up to the temple, where the people accosted him with various acclamations. He also spoke kindly to the multitude from an elevated seat, and a throne of gold, and returned them thanks for the zeal they had shown about his father's funeral, and the submission they had made to him, as if he were already settled in the kingdom; but he told them withal, that he would not at present take upon him either the authority of a king, or the names thereto belonging; until Caesar, who is made lord of this whole affair by the testament of the temple, and of whom he is the guardian; for when the soldiers would have set the diadem on his head at Jericho, he would not accept of it; but that he would make abundant requitals, not to those that were guilty, but to the people, for their impiety and good-will to him, when the superior lords [the Romans] should have given him a complete title to the kingdom; for that it should be his study to appear in all things better than his father.

2. Upon this the multitude were pleased, and presently made a trial of what he intended, by asking great things of him; for some made a clamor that he would ease them in their taxes; others that he would take off the duties upon commodities; and some, that he would loose those that were in prison; in all which cases he answered readily to their satisfaction, in order to get the good-will of the multitude; after which he [Archelaus] made many proper sacrifices, and feasted with his friends. And here it was that a great many of those that desired innovations, came in crowds towards the evening, and began then to mourn on their own account, when the public mourning was over. Thus:

"Hear Dean Aldrich's note on this place.—"The law or custom of the Jews," says he, "requires seven days mourning for the dead, Antiq. B. xvi. chap. viii. sect. 4. Whereas the author of the book of Ecclesiastes, ch. xxii. 12, assigns seven days as the proper time of mourning for the dead, and chap. xxviii. 17, enjoins men to mourn for the dead, that they may not be evil spoken of; for, as Josephus says presently, if any one omits this lamentation that was put to death by Herod, because they had cut down the golden eagle that hung at the place of the temple, it was this mourning of a private nature, but the lamentations were very great, the mourning solemn, and the weeping such as was loudly heard all over the city, as being for those men who had perished; and as if they had received of their rulers the crown of the temple. They cried out, that a punishment ought to be inflicted for these men upon those that were honored by Herod; and that, in the first place, the man whom he had made high priest should be punished, and that he was put to death as a person of greater piety and purity than he was.

3. At these clamors Archelaus was provoked, but restrained himself from taking vengeance on the authors, on account of the hate he was in of going to Rome, as fearing lest, upon his making war on the multitude, such an action might detain him at home. Accordingly he made trial to quiet the innovators by persuasion rather than by force, and sent his general in a private way to them, and by him exhorted them to be quiet. But the sedition threw stones at him, and drove him away as he came into the temple, and before he could say any thing to them. The like treatment they showed to others, who came to them; and the more they were hurried and provoked, so that it was thought to choose a person of greater piety and purity than he was. And indeed at the least he was a well-meaning man, which was now at hand, and in the sight of the people he called the Passover, and used to be celebrated with a great number of sacrifices, an innumerable multitude of the people came out of the country to worship: some of these stood in the temple bewailing the wabins [that had been put to death,] and procured their sustenance by begging, in order to support their sedition. At this time Archelaus, gambling with his soldiers in a temple, with his cohort of soldiers, upon them, before the disease should spread over the whole multitude, and gave orders that they should constrain those that began the tumult, by force, to cease from it. At the same time, as the soldiers did not be any longer irritated, and threw stones at many of the soldiers, and killed them: but the tribune fled away wounded, and had much ado to escape so. After which they took themselves to their sacrifices, as if they had done no mischief; nor did it appear to them a mourning [funeral feast] he is not exercised a holy per son.

Now it is certain that such a seven days' mourning has been customary from times of the greatest antiquity, Gen. 1. 18. Funeral feasts are also mentioned as of considerable antiquity, Ezech. xiv. 17; Jer. xviii. 7; Prov. xxvi. 6; Dent. xxiv. 14; Josephus, Of the Way. B. ii. ch. ix. sect. 6." the opportunity that now offered itself induced a great many to set up for kings. And indeed in Judæa two thousand of Herod's veteran soldiers got together, and armed themselves, and fought against those of the king's party; against whom, as they said, the king hadconsorted with, and that out of some of the places that were the most strongly fortified; but so as to avoid a direct conflict with them in the plains. In Sephoris also, a city of Galilee, there was one Judas, (the son of the arch-robber Hasaeus,) who formerly overran the country, and had been subdued by king Herod: this man got no small multitude together, and broke open the place where they had been quartered, and armed those about him, and attacked those that were so earnest to gain the dominion.

2. In Peræa also, Simon, one of the seraves of the king, relying upon the handsome appearance and tallness of his body, put a diadem on his own head also; he also went about with a company of robbers that he had gotten together, and burnt down the royal palace that was at Jericho, and many other costly edifices besides, and proceeded to other places, and got possession of them all, so that they came to be sold as a market, like of Sebaste, and met the men. His footmen were slain in the battle in abundance: Gratus also cut to pieces Simon himself, as he was flying along a street valley, when he gave him as no other, out of his feet, and broke it. The royal palaces that were near Jordan at Bethanath were also burnt down by some other of the seditionists that came out of Peræa.

3. At this time it was that a certain shepherd ventured to set himself up for a king; he was called Athronges. It was his strength of body that made him expect such a dignity, as well as his soul, which despised death; and besides these qualifications, he had the consent and clemency of the people. He put a troop of armed men under each of these his brethren, and made use of them as his generals and commanders when he made his incursions, while he did himself act like a king, and never appeared upon any occasion more openly and openly, and at this time he put a diadem about his head, and continued after that to overrun the country for so little time with his brethren, and became the subject of the king's party; nor did any Jew escape him, if any guilt accrued to him thereby. He once ventured to encompass a whole troop of Romans at Emmaus, who were carrying corn and weapons to their legion: his men therefore shot their arrows and darts, and thereby slew their cantonment Aurius, and forty of the stoutest men, while the rest of them who were in danger of the same fate, upon the coming of Gratus, with those of Sebaste, to their assistance, escaped. And when these men had thus served both their own countrymen and foreigners, and that through this whole war; three of them were after some time subdued, the eldest by Archelaus, the two others falling in the battle of Gratus and Ptolemais; but the fourth delivered himself up to Archelaus, upon his giving him his right hand for security. However, their end was not till afterward, while at present they filled all Judæa with a piratical war.

CHAP. V.

1. A few composes the tumults in Judea, and cruelty about two thousand of the Seditionists.

2. Upon Varus' reception of the letters that were written by Sabinus and the captians, he could not avoid being afraid for the whole legion [he had left there.] So he made haste to their relief, and took with him the other two legions, with the four troops of horsemen to them belonging, and marched to Ptolemais; having given orders for the auxiliaries that were sent by the kings and governors of cities to meet him there. Moreover, he was received from the people of Berytus, as he passed through their city, fifteen hundred armed men. Now as soon as the other body of auxiliaries were come to Ptolemais, as well as Archelaus' army (who, out of the hatred he bore to Herod, brought a great army of horse and foot,) Varus sent a part of his army presently to Galilee, which lay near to Ptolemais and Caesarea one of his friends for their captain. This Caesarea said that he had received a letter from the city of Sebassis, and burnt it, and made slaves of its inhabitants; but as for Varus himself, he marched to Samaria with his whole army, where he did not meddle with the city itself, because he feared that he might have occasion to trouble the inhabitants of it during these troubles, but pitched his camp about a certain village, which was called Arus. It belonged to Ptolemy, and on that account was plundered by the Arabians, who were very angry even at Herod for having sent a letter addressed to on to the village Sampho, another fortified place, which they plundered, as they had done the other. As they carried off all the money they could light upon, and the public revenues, all was now full of fire and blood, and nothing could resist the plunderers of the Arabians. Emmaus was also burnt, upon the flight of its inhabitants, and at the command of Varus, except for the slaughter of those that were about Arus.

2. Thence he marched on to Jerusalem, and as soon as he was but seen by the Jews, he made his camps disperse themselves; they also went away, and presently the king and the citizens received him, and cleared themselves of having any hand in this revolt; and said, that they had raised no commotions, but had been forced to admit the multitude because of the festival, and that they had rather defended themselves against the Romans, than assisted those that had revolted. There had before this met him Joseph, the first cousin of Archelaus, and Gratus, together with Rufus, who led those of Sabinus' party, as is before said. Varus met him those of the Roman legion, armed after their accustomed manner; for as to Sabinus, he durst not come into Varus' sight, but was gone out of the city, to keep his men; but Varus sent a part of his army into the country, against those that had been the authors of this commotion, and as they caught great numbers of them, those that appeared to have been the least concerned in these tumults, he put into custody, but such as were the most guilty, he crucified; these were in number about two thousand.

3. He was also informed, that there continued in Idumæa, ten thousand men still in arms: but when he found that the Arabians did not act like auxiliaries, but managed the war according to their own passions, and did mischief to the country otherwise than he intended, and this out of their hatred to Herod, he sent them away, but made haste to bring into battle those that had revolted; but these, by the advice of Achiaus, delivered themselves up to him before it came to a battle. Then did Varus forgive the multitude of their offences, but sent their captains to Cæsar to be examined on account of their treason. Cæsar forgave the rest, but gave orders that certain of the king's relations [for some of those that were among them were Herod's kinsmen,] should be put to death, because they had engaged in a war against a king of their nation. When therefore Varus had settled matters at Jerusalem after this manner, and had left the former legion there as a garrison, he returned to Antioch.
Then stood up Nicobus to plead for Archelaus. He alleged, that "the slaughter in the temple could not be avoided; that those that were slain were become enemies not to Archelaus's kingdom only, but to Cesar, who was to determine about him. He also demonstrated, that Archelaus's accusers had advised him to perpetrate other things of which he might have been accused. But he insisted that the latter testament should, for this reason, above all others, be esteemed. For if, he declared, the Heroid be held in many respects, Cesar to be the person who should confirm the succession; for he who showed such prudence as to rescind from his own power, and yield it up to the lord of the world, cannot be supposed much less will a judgament about an art that was to be his heir: and he that so well knew whom to choose for arbitrator of the succession, could not be unacquainted with him whom he chose for his successor.

7. When Nicolaus had gone through all he had to say, Archelaus came and fell down before Cesar's knees, without any noise. Upon which he raised him up, after a very obliging manner, and declared that truly he was worthy to succeed his father. However, he still made no firm determination in his case: but when he had dismissed those officers that had been with him that day, he deliberated by himself about the allegations made, whether he were fit to constitute any of those named in the testaments for Herold's successor, or whether the government should be parted among all his posterity, and this because of the number of those that seemed to stand in need of support from.

CHAP. III.

The Jews fight a great Battle with Sabinus's Soldiers, and a great Destruction is made at Jerusalem.

1. Now before Cesar had determined any thing about these affairs, Maltchase, Archelaus's mother, fell sick and died. Letters also were brought from Varus about a revolt of the Jews. This was foreseen by Varus, who accordingly, after Archelaus was sailed, went up to Jerusalem to restrains the promoters of the sedition, since it was manifest that the nation was weak; so he left none of those legions which he brought with him out of Syria in the city, and went himself to Antioch. But Sabinus came, after he was gone, and gave them an occasion of making innovations; for he commanded all the rest of the soldiers to deliver them up to him, and made a bitter search after the king's money, as depending not only on the soldiers who were left by Varus, but on the multitude of his own servants, all of whom he armored, and used as the instruments of his covetousness. Now when that feast, which was observed after seven weeks, and which the Jews call Pentecost (i. e. the fiftieth day,) was at hand, its name being taken from the number of days (after the paschal,) that truly he was got together, on account of the accustomed divine worship, but of the indignation they had [at the present state of affairs], Wherefore an immense multitude ran together, of Galil and Idumel, and Jericho, and Perea, that was beyond Jordan; but the people that naturally belonged to Judæa itself were above the rest, both in number and in the acarity of the men. So they distributed themselves in three parts, and pitched their camps in three places: one at the north side of the temple, another at the south side, by the Hippodrome, and the third part were at the palace on the west. So they lay round about the Romans on every side, and besieged them.

2. Now Sabinus was affrighted, both at the multitude and at their courage, and sent messengers to Varus continually, and besought him to come to his succor quickly. For that, if he delayed, his legion would be cut to pieces. As for Sabinus himself, he got up to the highest tower of the fortress, which was called Philosophus: in the same name with Herod's brother, who was destroyed by the Parthians: and then he made signs to the soldiers of that legion to attack the wall which had assaulted was so hard, that he dared not go down to his own men. Hereupon the soldiers were prevailed upon, and leaped out into the temple, and fought a terrible battle with the Jews; in which, while there were some instances of cruelty on both sides, it was no more than just, that they did what was hard for them, by their skill, and the others' want of skill, in war; but when once many of the Jews had gotten up to the top of the cloisters, and threw their darts downwards upon the heads of the Romans, and assaulted them with their swords, and burnt a great fire against them. So that they were, from the desperate condition they were in, prevented the fire, by killing themselves with their own swords; but so many of them as crept out from the walls, and returned to the Romans, were cut down by them, by reasons of the astonishment they were under; until at last some of the Jews were destroyed, and others dispersed by the terror they were in, the soldiers fell upon them, which was now now less than that which they had plundered about four hundred talents, of which sum Sabinus get together all that was not carried away by the soldiers.

However, this destruction of the works [about the temple,] and of the men, occasions a much greater number, and those of a more warlike sort, to get together, to oppose the Romans. These encompassed the palace round about, they threatened to destroy all that were in it, unless the Romans deliver their arms quickly for fear promised that Sabinus should come to no harm, if he would go out with his legions. There were also a great many of the king's party who de- served the king's favor, who, seeing the Jews did the most warlike body of them all, who were three thousand of the men of Sebaste, go over to the Romans. Rufus also, and Gratius, their captains, did the same, Gratius having the foot of the king's party under him, and Rufus the horse,) each of whom, even without the forces under them, were of great weight, on account of their strength and wisdom, which turn the scales in war. Now the Jews persevered in the siege about the three parts, but got in the fortress, and cried out to Sabinus and his party, that they should go their ways, and not prove a hinderance to them, now they hoped, after a long time, to recover that ancient liberty which they had enjoyed from the walls of Jerusalem, and in case of succor from Varus, made him bear the siege still longer.
the safety that now adorned itself induced a great many to set up for kings. And indeed in Idumæa two thousand of Herod’s veterans soldiers got together, and armed themselves, and fought against those of the king’s party; against whom Achæbus, the king’s first cousin, fought, and that out of some of the places that were most strongly fortified; but so as to avoid a direct conflict with them in the plains. In Sephoris also, a city of Galilee, there was one Judas, (the son of the arch-robbër Hæsæka), who fought and armed himself, and was conducting about what they called king Herod: this man got no small multitude together, and broke open the place where the royal armor was laid up, and armed those about him from those that were so earnest to seize the dominion.

2. In Pæra also, Simon, one of the servants of the king, relying upon the handsome appearance and tallness of his body, put a diadem upon his one, put a cloak of armed men under each of them by robbers that he had got together, and burnt down the royal palace that was at Jericho, and many other costly edifices besides, and procured himself very easily spoils by rapine, as snatching them out of the dress. And he burnt down all the fine edifices, if Geras, the captain of the foot of the king’s party, had not taken the Trachosætæ archers, and the most warlike of Sebaste, and met the man. His footmen were wounded in the lasts, and Simon also cut to pieces Simon himself, as he was flying along a strait valley, when he gave him an oblique stroke upon his neck, as he ran away, and broke it. The royal palaces that were near Pæra the Tetrarchus had also been burnt down by some other of the seditionists that came out of Pæra.

3. At this time it was that a certain shepherd went up to the king, a king called Atræonæus. It was his strength of body that made him expect such a dignity, as well as his soul, which despised death; and besides these qualifications, he had four brethren like himself. He went up to the king, and made use of them as his generals and commanders when he made his incursions, while he himself acted like a king, and muddled only with the more important affairs: and he cleared the country of having any hand in this revolt; and said, that they had raised no commotions, but had been forced to admit the multitude because of the festival, and that they were rather beleaguered together with the Romans, than assisted those that had revolted. There had before this met him Joseph, the first cousin of Archelaus, and Geras, together with Rufus, who led those of Sebaste, as well as the king’s army; there also met him to the Romans, that he led, after the accustomed manner; for as to Sabineus, he durst not come into Varus’s sight, but was gone out of the city before this, to the seaside; but Varus sent a part of his army into the country, against the Enæans, but when the latter had been taken unawares, and ventured to encompass a whole troop of Romans at Enæa, who were carrying corn and weapons to their legion: his men therefore shot their arrows and darts, and thereby slew their great monarch Arius, and forty of the stoutest men, while the rest of them who were in danger of the same fate, upon the coming of Gratus, with those of Sebaste, to their assistance, escaped. And when these men had thus served both their own countrymen and foreigners, and that through this whole war, three of them were after some time subdued, the eldest by Archælaus, the two next by falling into the hands of Gratus and Ptolæmaus; but of some of the places that were up to Archælaus, upon his giving him his right hand for security. However, their end was not till afterward, while at present they filled all Judea with a piratical war.

1. Varus composes the tumults in Judea, and crucifies about two thousand of the Seditious.

CHAPTER VI.

The Jews greatly complain of Archelaus, and desire that they may be made subject to Roman Governors. But when Caesar had heard what they had to say, he distributed Herod's Demissions among his Sons, according to his own Pleasure.

1. But now came another accusation from the Jews against Archelaus at Rome, which he was to answer to. It was made by those ambassadors, who, before the revolt, had come, by Varus's permission, to plead for the liberty of their country; for that a people of fifty thousand, but there were more than eight thousand of the Jews at Rome who supported them. And when Caesar had assembled a council of the principal Romans in Apollo's temple, that was in the presence of Augustus, he addressed the people himself. (1) He then said: 'The Jews, at a vast expense, the multitude of the Jews stood with the ambassadors, and on the other side stood Archelaus, with his friends: but for the kindness of Archelaus, they stood on that side, because they had no hatred to him, and envy at him, would not give them leave; while yet they were afraid to be seen by Caesar with his accusers. Besides these, there was present Archelaus's brother Philip, hitherto before our kindness by Varus for two reasons: the one was this, that he might be assisting to Archelaus; and the other was this, that in case Caesar should make a distribution of what Herod possessed among his Sons, he might have the advantage of being first.

2. And now, upon the permission that was given the accusers to speak, they in the first place went over Herod's breaches of their law, and said, that he was not a king, but the most base of all the Gentiles, and that he was so bad a man, that those who had found him to be such by the sufferings they underwent from him; that when a very great number had been slain by him, those that were led away to be sold he sold, and those that were dead happy men; that he had not only tortured the bodies of his subjects, but entire cities, and had done much harm to the cities of his own country, while he adorned those that belonged to the Gentiles, and shed the blood of Jews, in order to do kindness to those people who were out of their bounds; that he had filled the nation full of poverty and the greatest iniquity, instead of that happiness and those laws which they had under their king, and which, in truth, the Jews had borne more calamities from Herod in a few years, than had their forefathers during all that interval of time that had passed since they had come out of Babylon, and returned home, in the reign of David; that, to bring them to the same, he was at so low a condition, by being inured to hardships, that they submitted to his successor of their own accord, though he had brought them into bitter slavery: that accordingly they readily called Archelaus, though he was the son of so great a tyrant, king, after the decease of his father, and joined with him in mourning for the death of Herod, and wishing him good success in that his succession: while yet this Archelaus, lest he should be in danger of not being thought the genuine son of Herod, began his reign with the murder of three thousand citizens; as if he had a mind to offer so many bloody sacrifices to his government, and to make the temple with the like number of dead bodies at that festival: that, however, those that were left after so many miseries, had just reason to consider now at last the calamities they had undergone, and to oppose themselves like soldiers in war, to receive those stripes upon their backs, but not upon their backs as hitherto.' Whereupon they prayed that the Romans would have compassion upon the poor remains of Judea, and not expose what was left of them to such barbarously to torture them to pieces, and that they would join their country to Syria, and administer the government by their own commanders, whereby it would be demonstrated that they were not under the calumny of sedition persons, and lovers of war, know how to bear governors that are set over them, if they be but tolerable ones.

So the Jews concluded their accusation with this request, in a way which was pleasing to Caesar, and to the rest of their accusations which were brought against the kings, and himself accused the Jewish nation as hard to be ruled, and as naturally disobedient as kings. He also reproached all those kings men of Archelaus, and as he left him, and were gone over to his accusers.

3. So Caesar, after he had heard both sides, dissolved the assembly for that time; but a few days afterward, he gave the one half of Herod's kingdom to Archelaus, and a name in his heart, and promised to make him king also afterward, if he rendered himself worthy of that dignity. But as to the other half, he divided it into two tetrarchies, and gave them to two other sons of Herod, to Eleazar, the son of Herod to Antipas, and the other to that Antipa, who contested the kingdom with Archelaus. Under this last was Peres, and Galilee, with a revenue of two hundred talents: but Beteasa, and Trachonitis, and Aretum, and centurias, was given to Archelaus, in which Antipa, with a revenue of a hundred talents, were made subject to Philip: while Idumea, and all Judea, and Samaria, was parted of the etharchship of Archelaus, although Samaria was the seat of one quarter of a day's journey from the city of Jerusalem, and had the palace of Gadara, and Hermon, and Hippos, cut them off from the kingdom, and added them to Syria. Now the revenue of the country that was given to Archelaus, was four hundred talents. Salome also, because of her many gifts and presents, was made mistress of Jamnia, and Ashdod, and Phasaelis. Caesar did moreover bestow upon her the royal palace of Ascalon; by which all who got together a revenue of sixty talents, and one of the land and accounts of the country of Archelaus. And for the rest of Herod's offspring, they received what was bequeathed to them in his testament; but besides that, Caesar granted to Herod's two virgin daughters five hundred thousand drachmas of silver, together with estate in the towns of Phororas; but after this family distribution, he gave between them what had been bequeathed to him by Herod, which was a thousand talents, reserving to himself only some considerable presents in honor of the deceased.

CHAPTER VII.

The History of the spurious Alexander. Archelaus is banished, and Glaphyroris dies, after what was to happen to both of them had been showed them in Dreams.

1. In the mean time there was a man, who was by birth a Jew, but brought up at Sidon with one of the Roman freed-men, who falsely pretended, on account of the resemblance of their countenances, that he was that Alexander who was slain by Herod. This man came to Rome, (2) in hopes of not being detected. He had one who was one of his own men and who knew all the affairs of the kingdom, and instructed him to say how those that were sent to kill him and Aristobulus had pity upon them, and stole them away, by putting bodies that were dead for them in the way. This made Cleopatra fear for the Jews that were at Cæstæ, and got a great deal of money of them for travelling in splendor; and thence sailed to Melos, where he was thought so certainly genuine, that he got a great deal more money, and used all the money that he treated him to sail along with him to Rome. So he landed at Dicærarchia, [Pæteol.] and got very large presents from the Jews who dwelt there, and was conducted by his father's friends as if he were king, that the better the more. This was an unexpected preservation procured him so much credit that those who had seen Alexander, and had known him very well, would take their oaths that he was the very same person. Accordingly, the whole body of the people, as he had before seen Herodes, set the tenth of the story even before he saw the man. However, he suffered the agreeable fame that went of him to have some weight with him, and sent Cleodus, one who well knew Alexander, and ordered him to bring the young man to him. But when Caesar saw him, he immediately discovered a difference in his countenance, and when he had discovered that his whole body was of a more robust texture, and like that of a slave, he under took to show him the wonders of his kingdom; and the impudence of what he said greatly provoked him to be angry at him; for when he was asked about Aristobulus, he said that "he was also preserved alive, and was left on purpose in Cyprus for the fear of treachery; because it would be in no case for pottlers to get them both into their power while they were separate." Then did Caesar take him by himself privately, and said to him, "I will give thee thy life, if thou wilt discover who it was that sent thee against me and my young son." So he said, that he would discover him, and followed Caesar, and pointed to that Jew who abused the resemblance of his face to get money; for that he had received more presents in every city than Caesar and his companions. When Caesar laughed at the contrivance, and put this上报us Alexander among his rowers, on account of the strength of his body, but ordered him to persuade him to be put to death. But for the people of Mæna at that time had been very lightly punished for their folly, by the expenses they had been at on his account.

3. And now Archelaus took possession of his estate, with the title of king, and the Samaritans also, barbarously; and this out of his resentment of their old quarrels with him. Whereupon they both of them sent ambassadors against him to Caesar, and in the ninth year of his reign there was the first war at Vercellae, a city of Gaul, and his effects were put into Caesar's treasury. But the report goes, that before he was sent for by Caesar, he seemed to see nine ears of corn, full and large, but devoured by oxen. When, therefore, he had sent for the diviners, and some of the Chaldeans, and inquired of them what they thought it portended, and when one of them had one interpretation, and another had another, Simon, one of the sect of the Essenes, and an old man, even in the thirtieth year of his age, noted years, and the oxen denoted a mutation of things, because by their ploughing they made an alteration of the country. That therefore they should reign as many years as there were ears of corn, and after he had passed through various alterations of fortune, should die." Now five days after Archelaus had heard this interpretation, he was called to his trial.

4. I examine that what is to be recorded, that what dream Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, had, who had at first been wife to Alexander, who was the brother of Archelaus, concerning whom we have already said. This Alexander, the son of Herod the king, by whom he was put to death, as we have already related. This Glaphyra was married, after his death, to Juba, king of Libya, and after his death, was returned home, and lived a life as a queen with her husband, and it seemed that Archelaus, the etharch, saw her, and fell so deeply in love with her, that he divorced Mariame, who was then his wife, and married her. When, therefore, she was come into Judea, and had been married to Archelaus, he had the consent and the consent of the Senate, and settled the wakes for him in such a manner. Now Glaphyra hardly survived the narration of this dream of hers two days.
They think that oil is a delusion; and if any one of them be assailed, without his own approbation, it is wiped off his body; for they think that to be sweated is a good thing, as they do also to be allowed in white garments. They also have stewards appointed to take care of their common affairs, who, every one of them, have no separate business for any, but what is for the use of all.

And they have no one certain city, but many of them dwell in every city; and if any of their sect come from other places, what they have lies open for them, just as if it were their own, and they go into such as they never knew before, as if they were in the midst of their own; and in so much are they without suspicion with them. For which reason they carry nothing at all with them when they travel into remote parts, though still they take their weapons with them, for fear of thieves. Accordingly, there is in every city where they dwell, says Plutarch, particularly to take care of strangers, and to provide garments and other necessaries for them. But the habit and management of their bodies is such as children use who are in fear of their masters. Not only are all of them without shoes, or garments of any sort, but all of them wear garments of shoes, till they first be entirely torn to pieces, or worn out by time. Nor do they either buy or sell any thing to one another, but every one of them gives what he hath to him that wanteth it, and receiveth from him again the same sum of it what may be convenient for himself; and although there be no requital made, they are fully allowed to take what they want of whomsoever they please.

And as for their piety towards God, it is very extraordinary; for, before sun-rising, they speak not a word about profane matters, but put up certain prayers, which they have received from their former garments, and if they need an explication for its rising. After this, every one of them is sent away by their curators to exercise some of those acts wherein they are skilled, in which they labor with great diligence till the fifth hour. After which they alight together again into one place, and when they have clothed themselves in white veils, they then bathe their bodies in cold water. And after this purication is over, they every one meet together and assist each other in their own, into which it is not permitted to any of another sect to enter; while they go, after a manner, into the dining-room, as into a certain holy temple, and quietly set themselves down; upon which the baker layeth before them one; and there is always before them a single plate of one sort of food, and sets it before every one of them; but a priest says grace before meat, and it is unlawful for any one to taste of the food before grace be said. The same priest, when he has said grace, then goes in a trance all day, and when they begin, and when they end, they praise God, as he that bestows their food upon them; after which they lay aside their former garments, and bereave themselves of the single labor again till the evening; then they return home to supper, after the same manner, and if there be any strangers there, they sit down with them. Nor is there ever any censure or distinction or their bodies, but they give to every one leave to speak in their turn; which silence thus kept in their house, appears to fo-

*This practice of the Essenes, in refusing to swear, and esteeming swearing on ordinary occasions worse than perjury, is delivered here in general words, as are the other actions of the Essenes. Matt. v. 37; and Matt. xvi. 16; and of St. James, v. 12; but all admit of particular exceptions for solemn censures, and on great and necessary occasions. Thus these very Essenes, who here do so earnestly avoid swearing, are related, in the very next section, to admit none till they take tremendous oaths to perform their several duties to God and men. From this it is evident that they thereby break this rule not to swear at all. The cases is the same in Christianity, as we learn from the Apostolical Constitutions, which although they agree with Christ and St. James in forbidding to swear in general, ch. v. 12th, v. 3: Yet do they explain it elsewise, by alleging it with falsity, and to swear often and in vain, chap. iii. 26 and 32: and St. Paul to the same effect, Rom. iii. 3, 4. But if that cannot be avoided, to swear truly, ch. iii. 3, which abundantly explains to us the nature of the solemn oaths of this general infraction.

This mention of the name of angels, so particularly preserved by the Essenes, (it means more than those messengers which were employed to bring them up in the school of God, and which are mentioned above, but that worshiping of angels blamed by St. Paul as superstitious, and unlawful in some such sort of people as these were, Coloss. ii. 8, as is the prayer to towards his name by which they secure their possession in their possession.

2. But for those that are caught in any sinuous ways, they cast them out of their society, and he who is thus separated from them, does often die after a miserable manner; for so he is bound by his conscience and by the fear of the law to be so; and when he has been engaged, he is not at liberty to partake of that food that he meets with elsewhere, but is forced to eat grass, and to famish his body with hunger till he perishes; for which reason they execute many of them again, when once they have had their last gasp, out of compassion to them, as thinking the miseries they have endured till they came to the very brink of death, to be a sufficient punishment for the sins they had been guilty of.

3. But in the judgments they execute them, they are more accurate and just, nor do they pass sentence by the votes of a court that is fewer than a hundred. And as to what is once determined by that number, it is unalterable. What they avoid in this manner, is to beget the same hatred in the hearts of their legislators, (Moses,) whom if any one blaspheme, he is punished capitally. They also think it a good thing to obey their elders and the major part. Accordingly, if ten or twelve out of a hundred speak against another, and one only of the other side is against them. They also avoid spitting in the midst of them, or on the right side. Moreover, they are stricter than any other of the Jews in refusing from the first day, and on the seventh day; for they not only eat their food ready the day before, that they may not be obliged to kindle a fire on that day, but they will not remove any vessel out of its place, nor enter into their houses, but they dig a small pit, a foot deep, with a pade, (which kind of hatchet is given them when they are first admitted among them,) and covering themselves round with their garment, that they may not see the earth, and cast not themselves into that pit, after which they put the earth that was dug out again into the pit, and even this they do only in the more lonely places, which they choose out for this purpose; and only when they have taken off their shoes, yet it is a rule with them to wash themselves after it, as if it were a dedication to them.

10. Now after the time of their preparatory trial is over, they are packed into four classes; namely, called the impure, the thundered, the advanced, and the venerable; and that if the seniors should be touched by the passions, they must wash themselves, as if they had intimate themselves with the company of a foreigner. They are long-lived also, inconceivably long-lived: for they have lived by years, by means of the simplicity of their diet, may, as I think, by means of the natural course of life they observe also. They contain the miseries of life, and are above pain, on the accuracy of this, or if it will be for their glory, they esteem it better than living always; and indeed our war with the Romans gave abundant evidence what great souls they are of. But nor must we forget, that they were tortured and distressed, burnt and torn to pieces, and went through all kinds of instruments of torment, that they might be forced either to blaspheme their legislator, or to eat what was offered to the meanest places in the Jewish calendar: of which the Talmud and later rabbis talk so much, and upon so very little ancient foundation.

* Of these Jewish or Essenes, and, indeed, Christian doctrines concerning souls, both good and bad, in their territories, or to shed a tear; but they suffered in their very pains; and laughed those to scorn who delineated the torments upon the bodies, and resubscribed their souls with great acuity, as expecting to receive them again.

11. For their doctrine is this, That bodies are corruptible and that their destruction is not permanent; but that the souls are immortal, and continue for ever, and that they come out of the most subtle air, and are united to their bodies as to prisons, into which they are drawn by a certain spirit that is to them, as were set free from the bonds of the flesh, they then, as released from a long bondage, rejoice and mount upward. And this is like the opinion of the Greeks, that good souls have their habitations beyond the ocean, in that is neither oppressed with storms of rain or snow, or with intense heat, but that this place is such as is refreshed by the gentle breathing of a west wind, that is perpetually blowing from the sea; while they allot to bad souls a dark and tempestuous den, full of never-seen punishments. And indeed the Greeks seem to me to have followed the same notion, when they allot the islands of the blessed to their brave men; whom they have by heaven and earth been foreordained to sing the songs of the soul of the wicked, the region of the ungodly in Hades, where their fables relate that certain persons, such as Sisyphus, and Tantalus, and Ixion, and Tityus, are punished; which is built into this first supposition, that nature immortal; and thence are those exhortations to virtue, and dehortations from wickedness collected, whereby good men are bettered in the conduct of their life by the hope of a reward after their death, and whereby the vileness of the actions of bad men to vice are restrained, by the fear and expectation they are in, that although they should lie concealed in this life, they should suffer imminent punishment after the life. These are the divine doctrines of the Essenes about the soul,* which lay an unavoidable telt for such as have once had a taste of their philosophy.

12. There are also those among them who undertake to foretell things to come,† by reading the holy books, and using several sorts of perditions, and being perpetually conversant in the discourses of the prophets: and it is but seldom that they make any mistakes of the sort.

13. Moreover, there is another order of Essenes, who agree with the rest as to their way of living, and customs, and laws, but differ from them in the point of marriage, as thinking that by not marrying they might have the purity and innocence of human life, which is the prospect of success and, nay, rather, that if all men should be of the same opinion, the whole race of mankind would fail. However, they try their sponsors for three years and if they find that they have their natural purgations thrice, as trials that they are likely to be fruitful, they then actually marry them. But they do not use to accompany with their wives that manner of life of the women, for they are such a manifestation that they do not marry out of regard to pleasure, but for the sake of posterity. Now the women go into the baths with some of their garments on, as the men do with somewhat girded about them. These are the customs of this order of Essenes.

Hades, see that excellent discourse or book of our Josephus concerning the Hades, at the end of the old Chronology.

† Dean Alstead reckons up three examples of this gift of prophecy in several of these Essenes out of Josephus himself, stating the case of the B. I. ch. 16, sect. 3 Judas foretold the death of Antigonus at Strabo's Tower: B. II. ch. vii. sect. 2; Simon foretold that Archelaus should reign 12 or 18 years; and Aaron, B. iv. ch. 2. sect. 4. 5, Manasseh foretold that Herod should be king, and should reign tyrannically, and that for more than 35 or even 30 years. All which same of pass accordingly

16. But then as to the two other orders at first mentioned. The Pharisees are those who are esteemed most skilful in the exact explication of their laws, and introduce the first sect. These ascribe all to fate, [or providence,] and to God, and of their sect what it is, or the condition, is principally in the power of men; although fate does co-operate in every action. They say, that all souls are incorruptible, but that the souls of good men only are removed into other bodies. But the sound of that man are subject to eternal punishment. But the Sadducees are those that compose the second order and take away fate entirely, and suppose that God is not concerned in our doing or not doing what is good or what is evil, is at man's own choice, and that the one or the other belongs so to every one, that they may act as they please. They also take away the belief of the immortal duration of the soul, and the punishment or the recompense of the dead. Those that are of their own party is as barbarous as if they were strangers to them. And this is what I had to say concerning the philosophic sects among the Jews.

CHAP. IX.

The Death of Salome. The Clites which Herod and Philip built. Pilate occasions Disturbances. Tiberius puts Agrippa into Bonds, but Catus free him from them, and makes him King. Herod Antipas is banished.

1. And now as the ethymology of Archelaus was not a good one, to appoint his son to bear the name of Herod, Philip, and that Herod who was called Antipas, each of them took upon them the administration of their own tetrarchies; for when Salome died, she bequeathed to Julia, the wife of the king, and James their son also her plantation of palm-trees that was in Phasaelis. But when the Roman empire was translated to Tiberius, the son of Julia, upon the death of Augustus, who had reigned fifty-seven years, Both Philip and Herod is tributary to Tiberius, and Philip continued in their tetrarchies, and the latter of them built the city of Cesarea, at the fountains of Jordan, and in the region of Panasus, as also the city of Julias, in the lower Galilee. Herod also built the city of Tiberias in Galilee, and in Peres [beyond Jordan] another that was also called Julias.

2. Now Pilate, who was sent as a procurator into Judea by Tiberius, sent, by night those images of Caesar that are called ensigns in Judea. This excited a very great tumult among the Jews when it was day; for those that were near them were astonished at the sight of them, as indications that their laws were trodden under foot; for those laws do not permit any sort of image of the emperor to be set up according to the indication which the citizens themselves had at this procedure, a vast number of the people came running out of the country. These came secessively to Pilate to Cesarea, and beseeched him, to make away with the ensigns of Cæsar, and to preserve them their ancient laws inviolable; but upon Pilate's denial of their request, they fell down prostrate upon the ground, and continued immovable in that posture for five days, and said, that if they were not免

3. On the next day Pilate sat upon his tribunal, in the open market-place, and called to him the multitude, as desirous to give them an answer; and then gave a signal to the soldiers that were about him, that they should, by an act of violence, make away with the ensigns, saying, that a law that cursed what is good or what is evil, is at man's own choice, and that the one or the other belongs so to every one, that they may act as they please. They also take away the belief of the immortal duration of the soul, and the punishment or the recompense of the dead. Those that are of their own party is as barbarous as if they were strangers to them. And this is what I had to say concerning the philosophic sects among the Jews.

4. After this he raised another disturbance, by expending that sacred treasure which is called Corban upon aqueducts, whereby he brought great miseries upon the country. The Jews, however, thought the vessel full of gold; and Herod was to the poor sons of Herod, Philip, and that Herod who was called Antipas, each of them took upon them the administration of their own tetrarchies; for when Salome died, she bequeathed to Julia, the wife of the king, and James their son also her plantation of palm-trees that was in Phasaelis. But when the Roman empire was translated to Tiberius, the son of Julia, upon the death of Augustus, who had reigned fifty-seven years, Both Philip and Herod is tributary to Tiberius, and Philip continued in their tetrarchies, and the latter of them built the city of Cesarea, at the fountains of Jordan, and in the region of Panasus, as also the city of Julias, in the lower Galilee. Herod also built the city of Tiberias in Galilee, and in Peres [beyond Jordan] another that was also called Julias.

5. Now Pilate, who was sent as a procurator into Judea by Tiberius, sent, by night those images of Caesar that are called ensigns in Judea. These excited a very great tumult among the Jews when it was day; for those that were near them were astonished at the sight of them, as indications that their laws were trodden under foot; for those laws do not permit any sort of image of the emperor to be set up according to the indication which the citizens themselves had at this procedure, a vast number of the people came running out of the country. These came secessively to Pilate to Cesarea, and beseeched him, to make away with the ensigns of Cæsar, and to preserve them their ancient laws inviolable; but upon Pilate's denial of their request, they fell down prostrate upon the ground, and continued immovable in that posture for five days, and said, that if they were not

6. In the mean time Agrippa, the son of that Aristobulus who had been slain by his father Herod, came to Tiberias to accuse Herod, and he looks somewhat like a contradiction to St. Paul's account of the doctrine of the Jews, that they themselves allowed that there should be a resurrection of the dead, and proof of the distance, that Herod was tributary to Tiberius, and Philip continued in their tetrarchies, and the latter of them built the city of Cesarea, at the fountains of Jordan, and in the region of Panasus, as also the city of Julias, in the lower Galilee. Herod also built the city of Tiberias in Galilee, and in Peres [beyond Jordan] another that was also called Julias.

7. Now Pilate, who was sent as a procurator into Judea by Tiberius, sent, by night those images of Caesar that are called ensigns in Judea. These excited a very great tumult among the Jews when it was day; for those that were near them were astonished at the sight of them, as indications that their laws were trodden under foot; for those laws do not permit any sort of image of the emperor to be set up according to the indication which the citizens themselves had at this procedure, a vast number of the people came running out of the country. These came secessively to Pilate to Cesarea, and beseeched him, to make away with the ensigns of Cæsar, and to preserve them their ancient laws inviolable; but upon Pilate's denial of their request, they fell down prostrate upon the ground, and continued immovable in that posture for five days, and said, that if they were not church: who not submitting of his accusation, he stayed at Rome, and cultivated a friendship with others of the men of note, but principally with Caius the son of Germanicus, who was then but a private person.

Now this Agrippa, at a certain time, feasted Caius, and as he was very complaisant, he bade him come to an entertainment, stretched out his hands, and openly wished that Tiberius might die, and that he might quickly see him emperor of the world. This was told to Tiberius by one of Agrippa's domestics; who thereupon was very angry and sent word to Agrippa to be bound, and had him very ill treated in the prison for six months, until Tiberius died, after he had reigned twenty-two years six months and three days.

6. But when Caius was made Caesar, he released his old enemy from prison, and bestowed upon him the dignity of King of Philip's tetrarchy, which was now dead; but when Agrippa had arrived at that degree of dignity, he informed the ambitious desires of Herod the tetrarch, who was chiefly induced to hope for the royal power by his respect to Agrippa, as resembling that person, much more would he succeed him from a tetrarchy to that dignity. These arguments prevailed with Herod, so that he came to Caius, by whom he was punished for his ambition, by being sent into exile, and for having hired him, in order to accuse him; to whom also Caius gave his tetrarchy, by way of addition. So Herod died in Spain, whither his wife had followed him.

CHAPTER XV.

Caius commands that his Statue should be set up in the Temple itself; and what Petronius did thereupon.

1. Now Caius Cæsar did so greatly abuse the fortune he had arrived at, as to take himself to be a god, and to desire to be so called also, and to cut off those of the greatest nobility out of his country. He also extended his impunity as far as the army, and commanded him, that in case the Jews would not admit of them, he should slay those that opposed them, and carry all the rest of the nation off, and sold them in bonds. And this he did with all of those, with whose orders he was in compliance. However, Petronius marched out of Antioch into Judea, with three legions, and many Syrian auxiliaries. Now as to what we have related of stories that spoke of a war, but those that did believe them were in the utmost distress how to defend themselves, and the terror diffus'd itself presently through them all; for the army was already come to Pтолeæmæa.

2. This Pтолeæmæa is a maritime city of Galilee, built in the great plain. It is encompassed with mountains; that on the east side, sixty furlongs off, belongs to Galile; but that on the south behind, which is distant a great distance of two hundred and twenty furlongs; and that on the north is the highest of them all, and is called by the people of the country, the Ladder of the Tyrians, which is at the distance of a hundred furlongs. This is the account of the place, and the distance of two furlongs; near which there is Monument's monument, and hath near it a place no larger than a hundred cubits, which deserves admiration; for the place is round and hollow, and one may find in it bones and human remains, where, when it hath been emplanted by the many ships that have loaded, it is filled again by the winds, which bring into it, as it were upon purpose, their sand which lay remote, and was so moisture the bare common sand, while this mine presently turns it into a glossy sand. And what is to me still more wonderful, that glossy sand which re- superstitious, and is once removed out of the place, and becomes bare common sand again: this is the nature of the place we are speaking of.

3. But now the Jews got together in great numbers with their wives and children into that plain that was by Pтолeæmæa, and made supplication to Petronius for the temple, and the next place, for themselves. So he was prevailed upon by the multitude of the suppliants, and by their supplications, and left his army and the statues at Pтолeæmæa, and then went forward into Galilee, and the rest of the country, and all the men of note, to Tiberias, and showed them the power of the Romans, and the threatenings of Cæsar; and, besides this, proved that their petition was unreasonable; because while all the nations in subjection to them had placed the images of Cæsar in their several cities, among the rest of their gods, for them alone to oppose it, was almost like the behavior of revolters, and was an affront to Cæsar.

4. And when they insisted on their law, and the custom of their country, and how it was not only not permitted them to make either an image of God, or indeed of a man, and to put it in any temple, but that the temple of God was not the temple itself; Petronius replied, "And am I not also," said he, "bound to keep the law of my own lord? For if I transgress it, and spare you, it is but just that I perish; while he that sent me, and not I, was commissioned in war against you; for I am under command as well as you." Hereupon the whole multitude cried out, that "they were ready to suffer for their law." Petronius then quitted them, and said to them, "Will you then make war against Cæsar?" The Jews said, "We offer sacrifices twice every day for Cæsar, and for the Roman people; but that if he would place the images among them, he must first sacrifice the whole Jewish nation; and that they were ready to expose themselves, together with their children and wives, to be slain." At this Petronius was astonished, and pitied them on account of the inexpressible sense of religion the men were under; and that the courage of theirs which made them so, was to die for it; so they were dismissed without success.

5. But on the following days he got together the men of power privately, and the multitude publicly, and said to them, "The Jews have said, "We offer sacrifices twice every day for Cæsar, and for the Roman people; but that if he would place the images among them, he must first sacrifice the whole Jewish nation; and that they were ready to expose themselves, together with their children and wives, to be slain." At this Petronius was astonished, and pitied them on account of the inexpressible sense of religion the men were under; and that the courage of theirs which made them so, was to die for it; so they were dismissed without success.

But as they could be so way prevailed upon, and he saw that the country was in danger of lying without tillage; for it was about seedtime that the multitude continued for fifty days (as they have been together) and he called, and told them, that "it was best for him to run some hazard himself; for either, by the divine assistance, I shall prevail with Cæsar, and shall myself escape the danger as well as you, which will be a blessing to our country. And if Cæsar continue in his rage, I will be ready to expose my own life for such a great number as you are." Whereupon he dismissed the multitude, who prayed greatly for his prosperity; and he took the remainder of his army to Antioch; from whence he presently sent an epistle to Cæsar, and informed him of the irruption

* Taurus owns that Caius commanded the Jews to place their effigies in their temple, though he may be mistaken when he adds, that the Jews thereupon took arms.

This Monument had several monuments, and one of them appears, both by Strabo and Diodorus, to have been in Syria, and not improbably in this very place.
as had made into Judea, and of the applications of the nation; and that unless he had a mind to lose both the country and the men in it, he must permit them to keep their law, and must countermand his former injunction. Caius answered that since he had then been at war, and threatened to have Petronius put to death for his being so tardy in the execution of what he had command-ed. But it happened that those who bore Caius’s epistle were tossed by a storm, and were delayed at sea for three months, while others, that brought the news of Caius’s death had a good voyage. Accordingly, Petronius received the epistle concerning Caius seven and twenty days before he received that which was against himself.

CHAP. XI.
Concerning the Government of Claudius and the Reign of Agrippa. Concerning the Deaths of Agrippa and of Herod, and what children they both left behind them.

1. Now when Caius had reigned three years and eight months, and had been slain by treacherous assassins, the army that were at Rome to take the government upon him: but the senate, upon the reference of the consuls, Senius Saturninus, and Pompoeius Secundus, gave orders to the three regiments of soldi- diers, to keep the city quiet, and went up into the capitol in great numbers, and resolved to oppose Claudius by force, on account of the barbarous treatment they had met with from Caius; and they determined either to seize upon the city quietly, as they had of old been governed, or at least to choose by vote such a one for emperor as might be worthy of it. 2. Now it happened that at this time Agrippa ascended to Rome, and that both the senate had called him to consult with them, and at the same time Claudius sent for him out of the camp, that he might be serviceable to him, as he should have occasion for his service. So he, perceiving that Claudius was in effect made Caesar already, went to him, who sent him as an ambassador to the senate, to let them know what his intentions were: That “in the first place, it was without him, Claudius was but armies by the soldiers; moreover, that he thought it was not just to desert those soldiers in such their zeal for him, and that if he should do so, his own fortune would be in uncertainty; for that it was a dangerous thing to have once tied to the empire. He added farther, that he would administer the government as a good prince, and not like a tyrant; for that he would be satisfied with the honor of being called emperor, but would, in every one of his actions, permit them all to give him their advice; for that although he had not been by nature for moderation, yet would the death of Caius afford him a sufficient demonstration how soberly he ought to act in that state of things.” 3. This message was delivered by Agrippa; to which the senate replied, That “since they had an army, and the wisest consuls on their side, they would not endure a voluntary slavery.” When Claudius understood that answer, he sent Agrippa to them again, with the following message. That “he could not bear the thoughts of betraying them that had given them the empire; that he saw he must fight, though unwillingly, at least against such he had no mind to fight; that however, [if it must come to that,] it was proper to choose a place without the city for the war; because it was not agreeable to them to pollute the temples of their own city with the blood of their own countrymen, and this only on occasion of their im- prudent conduct.” And when Agrippa had heard this message, he delivered it to the senators.

4. In the meantime, one of the soldiers was longing to the senate drew his sword, and cried out, “O my fellow-soldiers, what is the meaning of this choice of ours, to kill our brethren, and to use violence to our kindred that are with Clau- dius? Do you not know that the sum of the question, whom no one can blame, and who hath so many just reasons [to lay claim to the government:] and this with regard to those against whom we are going to fight.” When he had said this, he stabbed himself. Through the same means, the senate murdered all the soldiers along with him. Upon which all the patricians were immediately at a great fright at being thus deserted. But still, because there appeared no other way whether they could turn their triumph into renown, they made the same way with the soldiers and went to Clau- dius. But those that had the greatest leak in flattering the good fortunes of Claudius betimes, met them before the walls with their naked breasts, and offered to waste all the dangers that they were about, and that unless he re- strained the violence of these men, who were in a fit of madness against the patricians. he would lose those on whose account it was most de- sirable to rule, and would be emperor over a desert.

5. When Claudius heard this, he restrained the violence of the soldiers, and received the senate into the camp, and treated them after an obsequious manner. And the senate, grateful for his generosity, presently to offer their thank-offerings to God, which were proper upon his first coming to the empire. Moreover, he bestowed on Agrippa his whole paternal kingdom immediately, and added to it, besides, the territory that had been bounded by Augustus to Herod, Trachonitis and Auranitis, and still besides these, that kingdom which was called the kingdom of Lycaonies. This gift he de- clared to the people by a decree, but ordered the magistrates to have the imperial state placed on tables of brass, and to be set up in the capitol. He bestowed on his brother Herod, who was also his son-in-law, by marrying [his daughter] Ber- anice, the kingdom of Chersonesus.

6. So many riches flowed in to Agrippa by his enjoyment of so large a dominion, nor did he abuse the money he had on small matters, but he began to encompass Jerusalem with such a security, and he was desirous to be fortified there, and had made it impracticable for the Romans to take it by siege; but his death, which happened at Cesarea, before he had raised the walls to their due height, prevented him. He had then reigned three years, as he had governed his tetrarchies three other years. He left behind him three daughters, born to him by Cypreas, viz. Bernice, Marianne, and Drusilla, and a son born of the same mother, whose name was Agrippa; he left left a son young child, so that Claudius made the country a Roman province, and sent Cupius Fadus to be its procurator, and after him Tiberus Alexander, who, making no alterations of the ancient laws, kept the nation in tranquillity. When Claudius had lived thirty years, Claudius, and left behind him two sons, born to him of his brother’s daughter Bernice; their names were Bernicanius and Hyrcanus. [He also left behind him] Aristobulus, whom he had by his former wife, and left behind him the younger brother of his that died a private person; his name was also Aristobulus, who left behind him a daughter, whose name was Joses: and these, as I have formerly said, were the children of Aristobulus the son of Herod, which Aristobulus and Alexander were born to Herod, by Mar- ianne, and were slain by him. But as for Alex- ander’s posterity, they reigned in Armenia.
Many Tumults under Cumanus, which were composed by Quadratus. Feliks is Procurator of Judea. Agrrippa is advanced from Chalcis to a great kingdom.

1. Now after the death of Herod, king of Chalcis, Claudius set Agrrippa, the son of Agrippa, over his uncle's kingdom, while Cumanus took upon him the office of procurator of the rest, which was a Roman province, and therein he was succeeded. When the Jews began the troubles, and the Jews' ruin came on; for when the multitude were come together to Jerusalem, to the feast of unleavened bread, and a Roman cohort stood over the cloisters of the temple, (for they were armed and kept the guard at the festivals, to prevent any innovation, which the multitude thus gathered together might make,) one of the soldiers pulled back his garment, and, covering down under an indocent manner, made a clamar to Cumanus, that he would punish the soldier; while the rasher men, thinking Agrrippa were not there, the most tumultuous, fell to fighting, and caught up stones, and threw them at the soldiers. Upon which Cumanus was afraid lest all the people should make an assault upon him, and sent to call out the soldiers and gave orders to the greatest numbers into the cloisters, the Jews were in a very great consternation, and being beaten out of the temple, they ran into the city, and the violence with which they crowded to get out was so great, that their wives, and children, and aged ones, were trodden under foot, and squashed one another, till ten thousand of them were killed, insomuch that this feast became the cause of mourning to the whole nation, and every family lamented [their own relatives].

2. Now there followed after this another calamity, which arose from a tumult made by robbers; for at the public road of Bethhoron, one Stephen, a native of Cesarea, carried a great nature, which the robbers fell upon, and seized; upon this Cumanus sent men to go round about to the neighboring villages, and to bring their inhabitants to him bound, as laying it to their children and their wives, and their old men, and their thieves, and caught them. Now here it was that a certain soldier, finding the sacred book of the law, tore it to pieces, and threw it into the fire. Hereupon the Jews were in great disorder, for, the robbers think, they came, and assembled themselves so many of them by their zeal for their religion, as by an engine, and ran together with united clamor to Cesarea, to Cumanus, and made application to him, that he would not overlook this man, who had offered such an affront to God, and to his law, but punish him for what he had done. Accordingly, he, perceiving that the multitude would not be quiet unless they had a comfortable answer from him, he sent for his council, and, armed in their name, brought, and drawn through those that required to have him punished to execution; which being done the Jews went their ways.

3. After this there happened a fight between the Galileans and the Cumanians; it happened at a village called Geman, which is situated in the great plain of Samaria, where, as a great number of Jews were going up to Jerusalem to the feast, [of tabernacles,] a certain Galilean was slain; and besides a vast number of people ran together out of Galilee, in order to fight with the Samaritans; but the principal men among them came to Cumanus, and brought him, that before the evil became incurable, he would come into Galilee, and bring the authors of this disorder to punishment, for that there was no other way to make the multitude separate without coming to blows. However, Cumanus postposed their supplications to the other affairs he was then about, and sent the petitioners away without success.

4. But when the affair of this murder came to be told at Jerusalem, it put the multitude into disorder, and they left the feast, and without any generals to direct them, they were armed with great violence to Samaria; nor would they be ruled by any of the magistrates that were set over them, but they were managed by one Eleazar, the son of Simon, and Alexander, in these their thievish and seditious acts. These men fell upon those that were in the neighborhood of the Acraebastene toparchy, and slew them, without sparing any age, and set the villages on fire.

5. But Cumanus took one troop of horsemen, called the troop of Sebaste, out of Cesarea, and came to the assistance of those that were spoiled; he also seized upon a great number of those that were notGalileans, and slew many of them, as well as for the rest of the multitude of those that went so zealously to fight with the Samaritans, the rulers of Jerusalem ran out clothed with sack-cloth, and having ashes on their heads, and beg- ging the gods to be merciful to them. When they attempted to revenge themselves upon the Samaritans, they should provoke the Romans to come against Jerusalem; to have compassion upon their country and temple, their children and their wives, and their old men, and to put an end to the destruction upon them, in order to avenged themselves upon one Galilean only. The Jews complied with these persuasions of theirs, and dispersed themselves; but still there was a great number who took the Galileans, and brought them into hopes of impunity, and rapines and insurrections of the bolder sort happened over the whole country; and the men of power among the Samarians and Tyre, to Ummidius Quadratus, the president of Syria, and desired that they that had laid waste the country might be punished: the great men also of the Jews, such as Jonathan son of Ananus, the high priest, came to the president, and declared that the Samaritans are the beginners of the disturbance, on account of these murder they had committed, and that Cumanus had given occasion to what had happened, by his unwillingness to punish the original authors of that murder.

6. But Quadratus put both parties off for that time, and told them, that when he should come to those places, he would make a diligent inquiry after every circumstance. After which he went to Cesarea, and crucified all those whom Cumanus had taken alive; and when from thence he was come to the city Lydda, he heard the affair of the Samaritans, and sent for eighteen of the Jews whom he had learned to have been convicted, and brought, and sent two others of those that were of the greatest power among them, and both Jonathan and Ananus, the high priests, as also Ananus the son of this Ananus, and certain others that were eminent amongst the Jews, and crucified them in like manner by the most illustrious of the Samaritans. He also ordered that Cumanus, the procurator, and Celer the tribune should sail to Rome, in order to give an account of what had been done to Caesar. When he had finished these matters, he went up from Lydda to Jerusalem, and finding the multitude celebrating their WARS OF THE JUINS.

4. In the meantime, one of the soldiers had longed to the senate drew his sword, and cried out, "O my fellow-soldiers, what is the meaning of this choice of ours, to kill our brethren, and to use violence against our commander? Is it my Caesar, that his epistle in a violent way, and threatened to save Petronius put to death for his being so tardy in the execution of what he had commanded. But it happened that those who brought Caesar's body were going by a road that was detained on the sea for three months, while others that brought the news of Caesar's death had a good voyage. Accordingly, Petronius received the epistle concerning Caesar seven and twenty days before he received that which was against himself.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning the Government of Claudius and the Reign of Agrippa. Concerning the Deaths of Agrippa and of Herod, and what children they both left behind them.

1. Now when Caesar had reigned three years and was dead in the height and vigor of his strength, Claudius was hurried away by the same army that were at Rome to take the government upon him: but the senate, upon the reference of the consuls, Sentius Saturninus, and Pomponius Severus, were in three nights convened by the emperor, and met with the armies that stayed with them to keep the city quiet, and went up into the Capitol in great numbers, and resolved to oppose Claudius by force, on account of the barbarous treatment they had met with from the epistle of Augustus, and also to settle the nation under an aristocracy, as they said of old been governed, or at least to choose by vote such a one for emperor as might be worthy of all.

2. Now it happened that at this time Agrippa journaled at Rome, and that both the senate called him to consult with them, and at the same time Claudius sent for him out of the camp, that he might be serviceable to him, as he should have occasion for his service. So he, perceiving that Claudius was in effect made Caesar already, went to him, who sent him as an ambassador to the senate, to let them know what his intentions were. The senate, in the first place, it was without his seeking, that he was hurried away by the soldiers; moreover, that he thought it was not just to desert those soldiers in such their zeal for him, and that if he should do so, his own fortune would be destroyed; for the dangerous case had been once called to the empire. He added farther, that he would administer the government as a good prince, and not like a tyrant; for that he would be satisfied with the honor of being called emperor, but would, in every one of his actions, permit them all to give him their advice; for that although he had not been by nature for moderation, yet would the death of Caesar afford him a sufficient denunciation how soberly he ought to act in that station.

3. This message was delivered by Agrippa; to which the senate replied, That "since they had no army, they must consult on their side, and order" the business of the city, securing the tranquility. When Claudius heard what answer the senate had made, he sent Agrippa to them again, with the following message, That "he could not bear the house of Augustus; therefore the senators, and their oaths to be true to him; and that he saw he must fight, though unwillingly, against such as he had no mind to fight; that however, [if it must come to this,] it was proper to choose a place without the city for the war; because it was not agreeable to piety to pollute the temples of their own city with the blood of their own countrymen, and this only on occasion of their imprudent conduct." And when Agrippa had heard his message, he delivered it to the senators. were dispersed every one to their own houses, and there crossed themselves.

6. Now when these were quitted, it happened, as it does in a diseased body, that another part was subject to an inflammation; for a company of deceivers and robbers got together, and permuting the Jews to reveal, and, as it were, to assert their liberty, inducting death on those that continued in obedience to the Roman government, and saying, that such as willingly chose death, ought to be removed from such torrid insulcations; for they might pass the seas into different bodies, and lay in wait up and down the country, and plunder the houses of the great men, and slew the men themselves, and set the villages on fire. Thus, as if they had lost none of the effects of their madness. And thus the flames were every day more and more blown up, till it came to a direct war.

7. There was also another disturbance at Cesarea; these Jews brought in with the Syrians that lived there, raising a tumult against them. The Jews pretended that the city was theirs, and said, that he who built it was a Jew, meaning king Herod. The Syrians confessed almost all the same thing, and as they still said, however, that the city was a Grecian city; for that he who set up statues and temples in it could not design it for the Jews. On which account both parties had a content with one another; and this was both the greatest comfort and the greatest misfortune that was to the Jews. For the Jews could not raise an army to defend themselves at last to arms, and the bolder sort of them marched out to fight; for the elders of the Jews were not able to put a stop to their own people that were disposed to be tumultuous. And the Grecians thus having theirise the same place for themselves, they made war by the Jews. Now these Jews exceeded the others in riches, and strength of body; but the Grecian part had the advantage of assistance from the treasury; for the great part of the garrison was trained out of Syria, and being thus related to the Syrian part, they were ready to assist it. However, the governors of the city were concerned to keep all quiet, and whenever they saw these Jews that were most for fighting on either side, they punished them with stripes and bonds. Yet did not the sufferings of those that were caught affright the remainder, or make them desist; but they were still more and more enraged at this. When Felix the proconsul came to Tarsus, and commanded the Jews, when they had beaten the Syrians, to go their ways, and threatened them if they would not; and as they would not observe these efforts, and as they slew a great many of them, upon which it fell out that what they had been plundering. And as the sedition still continued, he chose out the most eminent men on both sides as ambassadors to Nero, to argue about their revered privileges.

CHAP. XIV.

Festus succeeds Felix, who is succeeded by Albinus, as to the war by Florus, who, by the Barbarians of his Government, forces the Jews into the War.

§ 1. Now it was that Festus succeeded Felix, as procurator, and made it his business to correct the iniquity of the country. So he caught the greatest part of the robbers, and destroyed a great many of them. But then Albinus, who succeeded Festus, did not execute his office as the other had done; nor was there any sort of wickedness that could be named, but he had a hand in it. Accordingly, he did not, in his political capacity, steal and plunder every one's substance, nor did he only burden the whole nation with taxes, but he permitted the relations of such as were in prison for robbery, and had been laid there, either by the sentence of every city, or by the former procurators, to disappear; nor did he seek for money; and nobody remained in the prisons, as a malefactor, but he who gave him nothing. At this time it was, that the enterprisers of the sedition were very formidable: the principal men among them went away, and left Albinus to go on with their seditions practices; while that part of the people who delight in disturbances joined themselves to such as had followed them; and Albinus, the favorite of those wicked wretches was encompassed with his own band of robbers, while himself, like an arch robber, or a tyrant, made a figure among his company, and abused his authority over those about him, in order to keep those that lived most quiet. The effect of which was this, that those who lost their goods were forced to hold their peace, when they had reason to show great indignation at what they had suffered; but those who had escaped, were afraid to face him; and those that were to be punished, out of the fear they were in of suffering equally with the others. Upon the whole, nobody durst speak their minds, for tyranny was generally tolerated; and at this time were those seeds sown which brought the city to destruction.

2. And though such was the character of Albinus, yet did Gessius Florus,* who succeeded to this, demonstrate himself to be one of the most excellent persons, upon the comparison; for the former did the greatest part of his roggeries in private, and with a sort of dissimulation; but Gessius did his unjust actions to the harm of the nation after a public manner. For, when he had been sent as an executioner to punish condemned malefactors, he omitted no sort of rapine or of vexation; where the case was really pitiable, he was most barbarous, and in things of the greatest turpitude he was most unimpressed. Nor could any one entice him in disguising the truth, nor could any one contrive more subtle ways of deceit than he did. He indeed thought it but a petty offense to get money out of single persons, so he got money out of the heads and entire bodies of men at once, and did almost publicly proclaim it all the country over; that they had liberty given them to turn robbers, upon this condition, that he might go shares with them in the spoils. He was the more bold to do this, because his greediness of gain was the occasion that entire toparchies were brought to desolation; and a great many of the people left their own country, and fled into foreign provinces.

3. And truly, while Cestius Gallus was president of the province of Syria, nobody durst do so much as send an embassy to him against Florus; but when he was come to Jerusalem, upon the approach of the feast of unleavened bread, the people came about him not fewer in number than three millions;† these besought him to commiserate the calamities of their nation, and cried out upon Florus as the bane of their country. But he was so high spirited, that, at last, Cestius, he laughed at their words. However, Cestius, when he had quieted the multitude, and had assured them that he would take care that Florus should hereafter treat them in a more gentle manner returned to Antioch; Florus also dead, which happened in the third year of Trajan, or A.D. 103, as I have several times observed before.

* Here we may observe, that the year C. 70, or 72, 70 being the year present at the passover. A.D. 65, which confirms what Josephus elsewhere informs us of, that at a passover a little later, they counted 55,000 male lambs, which at twelve to each lamb, which is no inordinate calculation, came to 3,077,000. See b. vi. ch. li. sect. 3. conducted him as far as Cesarea, and debated him there on that very time the purpose of showing his anger at the nation, and provoking a war upon them, by which means since it was that he supposed he might conceal his extremity. But that if he could procure them to make a revolt, he should divert their laying lesser crimes to his charge, by a most heinous one; for the more he was accused, the more greater: he therefore did every day augment their calamities, in order to induce them to a rebellion.

4. Now at this time it happened, that the Great Cæsar, because he had not for the Jews, and had obtained of Nero the government of the city, and had brought the judicial determination; at the same time began the war, in the twelfth year of the reign of Nero and the seventeenth of the Roman Empire. [Year.] Now the occasion of this war was by no means proportionable to those heavy calamities which it brought upon us. For the Jews that dwelt at Cesarea had a synagogue among them, whose owner was a certain Cesarean Greek; the Jews had endeavored frequently to have purchased the possession of the place, and bad offered many times its value for its price; but as the owner overlooked their offers, they raised other bidders upon the place, in way of afront to them, and made working shops of them, and left them but a narrow passage; and such was so very troublesome for them to go along to their synagogue. Whereupon the war began, when the Jewish youth went hither to the workmen, and forbade them to build there: but as Florus would not permit them to use force, the great men of the Jews, with John the publican, being in the utmost distress what to do, presented before the officer of ten talents, to hinder the work. He then, being intent upon nothing but getting money, promised he would do for them all they desired of him, and then went away to his place of Cesarea to receive his salary, and left the sedition to take its full course, as if he had sold a license to the Jews to fight it out.

5. Now on the next day, which was the seventh day of the week, when the Jews were crowning about the place, one of a certain name of Cesarea, of a seditions temper, got an earthen vessel, and set it with the bottom upward at the entrance of that synagogue, and sacrificed birds. This thing provoked the Jews to an incendiary discourse, and their laws were affronted, and the place was polluted. Whereupon the sober and moderate part of the Jews thought it proper to have recourse to their governors again; while the seditious part, and such as were in the service of their youth, revenged themselves in amain to fight. The seditions also among the Gentiles of Cesarea stood ready for the same purport, as they had by agreement, sent the man to sacrifice beforehand, as ready to support him; so that the blow fell. In that moment, the master of the horses, who was ordered to prevent the fight, came thither and took away the earthen vessel, and endeavored to put a stop to the sedition; but when he was overcome by the violence of the people of Cesarea, the Jews caught up their books of the law, and retired to Raborata, which was a place to them belonging, distant from Cesarea sixty furlongs. But John, and twelve of the principal men with him, went to Raborata, and endeavored to extirpate, and complaint of their case, and besought him to help them; and with all possible decency put him in mind of the eight talents they had given him; but he had the men seized upon, and put in prison, and accused them for this cause by the word of the law out of Cesarea.

6. Moreover, as to the citizens of Jerusalem, although they took this matter very ill, yet did they not vent their passion; but they prevented if he had been able and lawed up the war into a flame, and sent some to take seventeen talents out of the sacred treasures, and pretended that Cæsar wanted them. At this the people, and in consequence the senate, together to the temple, with prodigious clamarion, and called upon Cæsar by name, and besought him to free them from the tyranny of Florus. Some also of the seditious cried out upon Florus, and called him a tyrannical, and too hard for the people, and desired he should get still more; and instead of coming to Cesarea, as he ought to have done, and quenching the flame of war which was beginning them, and so taking away the occasion of any disturbance, when he was able, and so with the aid of the tears and revenue he had received a reward of [eight talents,] he marched hasty with an army of horsemen and footmen against Jerusalem, that he might gain his will by the arms of the Romans, and might by his power turn away their threatenings, bring the city into subjection.

7. But the people were desirous of making Florus ashamed of his attempts, and meet his soldiers with aclamations, and put themselves in his power, and accused him of sedition. He, therefore, sent Capito, a centurion, beforehand, with fifty soldiers, to bid them go back, and not make a show of receiving him in an obsequious manner, as if it were a favor; reproached them before, and said, that it was incumbent on them in that they had generous souls, and were free speakers, to jest upon him to his face, and appear to be lovers of liberty, not only in words, but with their weapons. Whereupon they ventured to regulate the matter, and upon the coming of Capito's horsemen into the midst of them, they were dispersed before they could salute Florus, or manifest their submissive behavior to him. Accord- ingly, they planted in flaming words, and spent that night in fear and confusion of face.

8. Now at this time Florus took up his quarters at the palace; and on the next day he had his tribunal set before it, and sat upon it. He, when the people had assembled, and those of the greatest eminence in the city, were all before that tribunal; upon which Florus commanded them to deliver up to him those that had reproached him, and told them that they should put the reverence to them belonging, if they did not produce the criminals; but these demonstrated that the people were peaceably disposed, and they begged forgiveness for those that had spoken amiss; for that it was not in their power to produce those that were more daring than they ought to be, and by reason of their younger age foolish also; and that it was impossible to distinguish those that offended from the rest, while every one was sorry for what he had done, and desisted out of fear of what would follow; that he ought, however, to provide for the peace of the nation, and to take such counsels as might preserve the city for the Romans, and rather for the sake of Florus himself, because of the immediate time of his being there, and thinking that they were guilty, than for the sake of a few of the wicked, to put so large and good a body of men into disorder.

9. Florus was more provoked at this, and called that the Gentiles reproached the Jews as an enemy to the law, where as they were driven out of Egypt on that account. This that eminent person Dr. Reid suggested to me.
were dispersed every one to their own houses, and then concealed themselves.

6. There was also another disturbance at Cesarea; those Jews who were mixed with the Syrians that lived there, razing a temple against them. The Jews pretended that the city was theirs, and said, that he who built it was a Jew, meaning king Herod. The Syrians confessed also that its builder was a Jew, but they still said, because they feared it as a foe, that he who set up statues and temples in it could not design it for the Jews. On which account both parties had a contest with one another; and this contest increased so much, that it came at last to be such, that the Sadducees interfered and armed out to fight; for the elders of the Jews were not able to put a stop to their own people that were disposed to be tumultuous, and the Greeks thought it a shame for them to be overcome by the Jews. Now these Jews suspected the others in riches, and strength of body; but the Grecian part had the advantage of assistance from the soldiary; for the greatest part of the Roman garrison was raised out of Syria, and being related to the Syrian part, they were ready to assist it. However, the governors of the city were concerned to keep all quiet, and whenever they caught those that were most for fighting on either side, they punished them with stripes and bonds. Yet did not the sufferings of those that were caught affright the remainder, or make them deast; but they were still more and more exasperated, and deeper engaged in the sedition. And the Jews, as the cacære bodies to a man, first made war, and commanded the Jews, when they had beaten the Syrians, to go their ways, and threatened them if they would not; and as they would not obey him, he sent his soldiers out upon them, and slew those that resisted. And as the sedition still continued, he chose out the most eminent men on both sides as ambassadors to Nero, to argue about their several privileges.

CHAPTER XIV.

Festus succeeds Felix, who is succeeded by Albius, as he is by Florus; who, by the Barbarity of Government, forces the Jews into the War.

§ 1. Now it was that Festus succeeded Felix, as procurator, and made it his business to correct those that made disturbances in the country. So that it came to pass, that he put many to death, and destroyed a great many of them. But then Albius, who succeeded Festus, did not execute his office as the other had done; nor was there any sort of wickedness that could be named, but he had a hand in it. Accordingly, he did not only, in his political capacity, steel and plunder the people, but made the whole nation with taxes, but he permitted the relations of such as were in prison for robbery, and had been laid there, either by the senates of every city, or by the former procurators, to redeem them for money; and nobody remained in the prisons, as a malefactor, but he who gave him nothing. At this time it was, that the enterprisers of the seditious at Jerusalem were very formidable: the principal men among them purchasing leave of Albius to go out with those that were in prisons; while that part of the people who delighted in disturbances joined themselves to such as had fellowship with Albius; and every one of them carried about these stones with him, and was associated with his own band of robbers, while himself, like an amanu, a robber, or a tyrant, made a figure among his company, and abused his authority over those about him, in order to plunder those that lived quietly. The affect that the Jews, that their goods were forced to hold their peace, when they had reason to show great indignation at what they had suffered; but those who had escaped, were forced to suffer more than those who had been in the city; for the Jews were generally suffering equally with the others. Upon the whole, nobody durst speak their minds, for tyranny was generally tolerated; and at this time were those seeds sown which brought the city to destruction.

2. And though such was the character of Albius, yet did Gessius Florus, who succeeded to him, demonstrate to have been an excellent political man, upon the comparison; for the former did the greatest part of his government in private, and with a sort of dissimulation; but Gessius did his utmost actions to the harm of the nation after a pompous manner; and as though he had been a deber than as an executioner of the condemned malefactors, he omitted no sort of rapine or of vexation; where the case was really pitiable, he was most barbarous, and in things of the greatest turpitude he was most impudent. Nor could anything outdo him in disbelieving the truth, nor could say one contrary more subtle ways of deceit than he did. He indeed thought it but a petty offence to get money out of single persons, so he spoiled whole cities, and ruined them, and then as men as the act which he publicly proclaimed all the country over; that they had liberty given them to turn robbers, upon this condition, that he might go shares with them, in the spoils they got. Accordingly, this his greediness was in a sort occasioned, for the churches and presbyteries were brought to desolation; and a great many of the people left their own country, and fled into foreign provinces.

3. And truly, while Cestius Gallus was president of the province of Syria, nobody durst do so much as send an embassage to him against Florus; but when he was come to Jerusalem, upon the approach of the feast of unleavened bread, the people came about him not fewer in number than three millions; these besought him to commiserate the calamities of their nation, and cried out upon Florus as the bane of their country. But as he was present, and stood by Cestius, he deemed his word the more weighty; and Florus, when Cestius, when he had quieted the multitude, and had assured them that he would take care that Florus should hereafter treat them in a more gentle manner returned to Antioch: Florus also died, which happened in the third year of Trajan, or A.D. 100, as I have severally times observed before.

* Not long after this beginning of Florus, the wickedness of all the Roman procurators of Judea, and the immediate occasion of the Jew's war, was, at the twelfth year of Nero, and the seventeenth of Tiberius; and history is collected in the twenty books of Josephus's Antiquities, the end; although Josephus did not finish those books till the year of Domitian, as the history is in those twenty, which is no immoderately less than two years afterward; as he did not finish their Appendix, containing an account of his own life, till Agrippa was dead, which happened in the third year of Trajan, or A.D. 100, as I have several times observed before. * * * * *
conducted him as far as Cesarea, and debated him though he had at that very time the public, and being his anger at his ease, and pursuing a war upon them, by which means more it was that he supposed he might conceal his enormities; for he expected that, if the peace continued, he should have the Jews for his absence, and a certain number of them. But that if he could procure them to make a revolt, he should divert their laying lesser crimes to his charge, by a misery which was so much greater; he therefore did endeavor to augment their calamities, in order to induce them to a rebellion.

4. Now at this time it happened, that the Gra- cians at Cesarea had been too hard for the Jews, and had obtained of Nero the government of the city, as by the judgment of the severest determination; at the same time began the war, in the twelfth year of the reign of Nero and the seventeenth of the reign of Agrippa, in the month of Artemisias [Year]. Now the occasion of this war was that Cesarea had a synagogue near the place, whose owner was a certain Cesarean Greek; the Jews had endeavored frequently to purchase the possession of the place, and had offered many times its value for its price; but as the owner overlooked their offers, so did he raise other buildings upon the place, in way of afront to them, and made workmen in great numbers in the place, and left them a narrow passage, and such as was very troublesome for them to go along to their synagogue. Whereupon the warmer part of the Jewish youth went hastily to the workmen, and forbade them to build there; and by this means the greatest part of the workmen went away, and the Jews being thus left, as they would do for them all they desired of him, and then went away from Cesarea to Sebaste, and left the synagogue to take its full course, as if he had sold a license to the Jews to fight it out.

5. Now on the next day, which was the seventh day of the week, when the Jews were crowding space to their synagogue, a certain man of Cesarea, of a seditious temper, got an earthen vessel with the bottom upward toward the entrance of that synagogue, and sacrificed birds. This thing provoked the Jews to an incoratable degree, because their laws were affronted, and the place was polluted. Whereupon the sober and wise part of the Jews sought it proper to have recourse to their governors again; and while the seditious part, and such as were in the servor of their youth, were vehemently inflamed to fight. The seditious also among the Gentiles of Cesarea stood ready for the same purpose (for they had by agreement, sent the man to sacrifice beforehand, as ready to support him); so that it soon came to blows. Hereupon Jacobus, the master of the horse, who was ordered to preserve the peace, took away the earthen vessel, and endeavor to put a stop to the sedition; but when he was overcome by the violence of the people of Cesarea, the Jews caught up their books of the law, and retired to Rabatha, which was a place farther belonging distant from Cesarea sixty furlongs. But John, and twelve of the principal men with him, went to Florus, to Sebaste, and made a lamentable complaint of the evil, and brought him to have them; and with all possible decency, put him in mind of the eight talents they had given him; but he had the men seized upon, and put in prison, and accused them for every ye the books and the power of out of Cesarea.

6. Moreover this to the citizens of Jerusalem, although they took this matter very ill, yet did they restrain their passion; but Florus acted herein as if he had been hired, and took up the exceeding number of the young men, and spent some talents out of the sacred treasure, and pretended that Ceser wanted them. At this the people were in confusion immediately, and ran together to the temple, with prodigium cries, and said that Florus took and became him to free them from the tyranny of Florus. Some also of the seditious cried out upon Florus, and cast the greatest reproaches upon him, and carried a basket about and begged some people to be appointed as judges of their possessions, and in a suitable condition. Yet was not he made ashamed hereby of his loss of money, but was more enraged, and provoked to get still more; and instead of coming to Cesarea, they went away, and gave the Jews the flame of war which was beginning there, and so taking away the occasion of any disturbances, on which account it was that he had received a reward of eight talents. He marched with these eight talents to the east against Jerusalem, that he might gain his will by the arms of the Romans, and might by his terror, and by his threatenings, bring the city into subjection.

7. But the people were desirous of making Florus ashamed of his attempts, and met his soldiers with acclamations, and put themselves in order to receive him very submissively. But he went in a deputation, beforehand, with fifty soldiers, to bid them be humble, and tell them that a show of receiving him is an obliging manner, whom they had so fouly reprehended before: and said, that it was incumbent on them, in case they did not receive him humble, that they should cast him upon his face, and appear to be kept of liberty, not only in words, but with their weapons also. With this message was the multitude amazed, and upon the coming of Capito's horsemen in the midst of them, they were dispersed before they could salute Florus, or manifest their submissive behavior to him. Accordingly, they retired to their own houses, and spent that night in fear and confusion of face.

8. In the time the Jews were out of their quarters at the palace; and on the next day he had his tribunal set before it, and sat upon it, when the high priests and the men of power, and those of the greatest eminence in the city, came together, and he commanded them to deliver up to him those that had reproached him, and told them that they should themselves partake of the vengeance to them belonging; if they did not produce the criminals; but that Capito, as he demonstrated that the people were peaceably disposed, and they begged forgiveness for those that had spoken amiss; for that it was wonder at all in so great a multitude there should be some more daring than they ought to be, to cast at their younger age foolishly also; and that it was impossible to distinguish those that offended from the rest, while every one was sorry for what he had done, and dreaded it out of fear that he would follow; that he ought, however, to provide for the peace of the nation, and to take such counsels as might preserve the city for the Romans, and rather for the sake of a great number of innocent people, to forgive a few that were guilty, than for the sake of a few of us wicked, to make so large and good a body of men into disorder.

9. Florus was more provoked at this, and called that the Gentiles reproached the Jews as a subject to the leprosy, and believed that they were driven out of Egypt on that account. This that eminent person Mr. Reid suggested to me.
ed out aloud to the soldiers to please that which was called the upper market-place, and to say such as they met with. So the soldiers, taking this exhortation of their commander in a sense agreeable to their desire of gain, did not only plunder the place they were sent to, but forcing themselves into every house, they killed, burnt, stripped, and with many other crimes, all by the methods of bandits; so the citizens fled along the narrow lanes, and the soldiers slew those that they caught, and no method of plunder was omitted; they also caught many of the quiet people, and brought them before them, and those whom they хотелc with stripes, and thus crucified. Accordingly, the whole number of those that were destroyed that day, with their wives and children, for they did not consider in the massacre the difference of age, was about three thousand and six hundred. And what made this calamity the heavier, was this new method of Roman barbarity; for Flora restored them to do what no one had done before, that is, to have the multitudes of the soldiers come out to the cross before his tribunal; who although they were a. "birth Jews, yet were they of Roman dignity notwithstanding.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning Bernice's Petition to Flora to spare the Jews in vain; so also how, after the multitude Flora was guernched, it was kindled again by Flora.

1. About this very time king Agrippa was going to Alexandria, to congratulate Alexander upon his having obtained the government of Egypt from Nero; but as his sister Bernice was among the number of the prisoners, and the multitude of the soldiers, she was sorely affected at it, and frequently sent the masters of her horse, and her guards, to Flora, and begged of him to leave her in peace. But, as his father had received them by dying to the palace, and had stayed there all night with her guards, which she had about her for fear of an insult from the soldiers. Now she dwelt then at Jerusalem, in order to perform a vow which she had vowed to the temple, and said that she had been either afflicted with a distemper, or with any other distresses, to make vows; and for thirty days before they are to offer their sacrifices, to abstain from wine, and to shave the hair of their head. What things Bernice was now performing, and stood barefoot before Flora's tribunal, and besought him [to spare the Jews.] Yet could she neither have any reverence to come out from Greece without some danger of being slain herself.

2. This happened upon the sixteenth day of the month Artemisius [July]. Now as the sun did set, the multitude, who were in a great agony, ran together to the upper market-place, and made the loudest lamentations for those that had perished; and the greatest part of the cries were such as redacted on Flora; at which the men of power were aghast, and assembling together with the high priests, and the rest of the Jews, and fell down before each of them, and besought them to leave off, and not to provoke Flora to some incurable procedure; besides which, they knew they already suffered. Accordingly, the multitude continued in their lamentation, out of reverence to those that had desired it of them, and out of the hope they had that Flora would do them no more injuries.

3. So Flora was this time moved, the disturbances were over, and endeavored to kindle that flame again, and sent for the high priests, with the other eminent persons, and said, the only demonstrations that the people would not make any more innovations, not only about the injury done by the soldiers, but also the Jews, and besought them that they should go out and meet the soldiers that were ascending from Caesarea, whereas two cohorts were coming; and while these men were gehorting the multitude so to do, he sent beforehand, and gave orders to the two cohorts, that they should give notice to those that were under them not to return the Jews' salutations; and that if they made any reply to his disadvantage, they should make use of their weapons. Now this high priest was so high in this mildness, and the admirable in this spirit in the temple, and desired them to go and meet the Romans, and to salute the cohorts very civilly, before their miserable case should become incurable. Now the seditious persons would not comply with these them; and now the young men, and a great part of those that had been destroyed made them incline to those that were the boldest for action.

4. At this time it was that every priest, and every servant of God, by reason of the multitude, the strain of the soldiers, and the ornamental garments wherein they used to minister in sacred things. The harpers also, and the singers of hymns, came out with their instruments of music, and fell down before the two cohorts, and besought them that they would preserve those holy ornaments to them, and not provoke the Romans to carry off those sacred treasures. You might also see those that were thus present himself. Acts xxvi. 25—28.

This view which Bernice (here and elsewhere called queen, not only as a daughter, but as a sister to two kings. Agrippa the Great and Agrippa junior, but the widow of Herod, king of Chalcis) came now to accomplish at Jerusalem, was to make a sacrifice at the temple, and the different religions Jews used to make to hope of some deliverance from a disease, or other danger, as Josephus here intimates. Hence, as the Jews were assembled together for fasting and preparation against the obstruction of a proper sacrifice, seems to be too long, unless it were wholly voluntary in this great lady. It is not required in the law of Moses relating to Nazarines, Num. vi. and a very different from St. Paul's time for such preparations, which was but one day, Acts xx. 25. He was wont already the continuation of the Antiquities to afford us light here, as they have hitherto done on so many occasions elsewhere. Perhaps in this age the traditions of the Pharisees had obliged the Jews to this degree of rigor, not only as to those thirty days' preparation, but as to the going barefoot all that time, which here Bernice submitted to also. To be a turn of sacrifice and oblation is very easy, and his burden comparatively light, in such positive injunctions, Matt. xl. 30, as did the Pharisees). But the Pharisees' heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne, even when they themselves would not teach them with one of their fingers. Luke x. 37, 38. De Beers, No. 404, 414, that Juvinal in his sixth entire alludes to this remarkable parable or precept of the uniting of the Jews to one congregation, and Josephus upon her farm; so too Tacitus, Dio, Suetonius, and others.

5. By these persuasions, which they used to the multitude, and to the seditious, they restrained some by threatenings, and others by the revocation of the taxes paid them, and thus they kept them out, and they met the soldiers quietly, and after a composed manner, and when they were come up with them, they saluted them; but when they made an answer, the seditious excoriated them, and the multitude of Florus, which was the signal given for falling upon them. The soldiers therefore encompassed them presently, and struck them with their clubs, and as they fled away, the horsemen trampled them down, so that a great part of them, both men and beasts, perished by the violence of the Roman arms, and more by their own violence in crushing one another. Now there was a terrible crowding about the gates, and while every body was running haste to get before another, the flight of them all was retarded, and a terrible destruction there was among those that fell down; for they were suffocated and broken to pieces by the multitude of those that were uppermost; nor could all the gates be distinguished by their relations in order to the care of his funeral; the soldiers also who beat them, fell upon those whom they overtook, without showing them any mercy, and thrust the multitude through the place called Floraia, where they forced their way in order to get in and seize upon the temple, and the tower Antonia. Florus also being desirous to get those places into his possession, brought such as were with him out of the king's palace, seized them, and expelled them as far as the citadel [Antonina]; but his attempt failed, for the people turned back upon him, and stopped the violence of his attempt, and as they stood upon the tops of their houses, they threw their deadly weapons, which fell all on the galled thereby, because those weapons came from above, and they were not able to make a passage through the multitude, which stopped up the narrow passages, they retired to the camp which was at the water's edge.

6. But for the seditious, they were afraid lest Florus should come again, and get possession of the temple, through Antonia; so they got immediately upon the towers of the temple that joined to Antonia, and cut them down. This cooled the avarice of Florus, for whereas he was eager to obtain the treasures of God [in the temple.] and on that account was desirous of getting them, it was not so much as the towers were broken down, but he left off his attempt; he then sent for the high priests and the sanhedrim, and told them that he was indeed himself going out of the city, but that he would leave them as large a garrison as they should desire: hereupon they promised that they would make no innovations, in case he would leave them one band; but not that which had fought with the Jews, because the multitude bore ill-will against that band, on account of wars against Bethesda. In the meanwhile there was a signal messenger, at a certain season, descended, and where he or they who were the first put into the pool, were cured, John v. 1. etc. This situation of Bethsaida, in Josephus, Castiæus, and accused the Jews falsely of revolving [from the Roman government,] and impeached the beginning of the former fight to them, and pretended they had been the authors of that disturbance, whereby they were only the sufferers. Yea, went and houses plundering. They then upon this occasion, but did themselves write to Castiæus, as did Bernice also, about the illegal practices of which Florus had been guilty against the city; who, upon reading both accounts, commended the soldiers of Florus, which was the signal given for falling upon them. The soldiers therefore encompassed them presently, and struck them with their clubs, and as they fled away, the horsemen trampled them down, so that a great part of them, both men and beasts, perished by the violence of the Roman arms, and more by their own violence in crushing one another. Now there was a terrible crowding about the gates, and while every body was running haste to get before another, the flight of them all was retarded, and a terrible destruction there was among those that fell down; for they were suffocated and broken to pieces by the multitude of those that were uppermost; nor could all the gates be distinguished by their relations in order to the care of his funeral; the soldiers also who beat them, fell upon those whom they overtook, without showing them any mercy, and thrust the multitude through the place called Floraia, where they forced their way in order to get in and seize upon the temple, and the tower Antonia. Florus also being desirous to get those places into his possession, brought such as were with him out of the king's palace, seized them, and expelled them as far as the citadel [Antonina]; but his attempt failed, for the people turned back upon him, and stopped the violence of his attempt, and as they stood upon the tops of their houses, they threw their deadly weapons, which fell all on the galled thereby, because those weapons came from above, and they were not able to make a passage through the multitude, which stopped up the narrow passages, they retired to the camp which was at the water's edge.

CHAP. XVI.

Castiæus sends Néopollitanus the Tribune to see in what Condition the Affairs of the Jews were. Arrives to the People of the Jews, that he may divert them from their Intentions of making War with the Romans.

1. However, Florus contrived another way to oblige the Jews to begin the war, and sent to first began in the war, if they did not prevent the report by showing who it was that began it; and it appeared openly that they would not be quiet, if any body should hinder them from spreading such an ambassador. But Agrippa, although he thought it too dangerous a thing for them to appoint men to go as the successors of Florus, yet did he not think it fit for him to overlook them, as if he were afraid of their being injurious to the reputation of their master, for before called the multitude together into a large gallery, and placed his sister Bernice in the house of the Asamones, that she might be seen by them, (which house was over the gallery, at the direct front of the court, where the large door joined the temple to the gallery,) and spoke to them as follows.—

4. "Had I perceived that you were all seriously disposed to go to war with the Romans, and that the chances of the war were such as might produce no kind of advantage to those people did not purpose to live in peace, I had not come out to you, nor been so bold as to give you counsel; for all discourses that tend to persuade men to do what they ought to do are superfluous, when the hearers have been offended by your counsel. But because some are earnest to go to war, because they are young, and without experience of the miseries it brings; and because some are for it, not because they think they have lost their liberty; and because others hope to get by it, and are therefore earnestly bent upon it, that in the confusion of your affairs they may gain what belongs to those that are too weak to resist you, I beseech you, therefore, to have the matter all together, and to say to you what I think to be for your advantage; that the former may grow wiser, and change their minds, and that the best men may come to no harm by the ill consequences of some others. And if it be true, as it is tumultuous against me, in case what they hear me say do not please them; for as to those who admit of no cure, but are resolved upon a revolt, it will still be in their power to retain the same securities as before; to what purpose serve the complaints against your particular governors? for if they treated you with moderation, it would still be equally an unworthy thing to be in servitude. Consider now the several cases that may be supposed, how little occasion there is for your going to war. Your first occasion is the accusation you have to make against your procurators: now here you ought to be submissive to those in authority; but if you should make a free use of the gavel, in order to overturn the whole; * In this speech of King Agrippa we have an authentic account of the extent and strength of the Roman empire when the Jewish war began. And this speech with all the other parts of Josephus, deserve to be read attentively, and how great a part this Agrippa was, and why Josephus elsewhere calls him Μέγας Κριτικός, a most wonderful or admirable man, was, Contr. Ap. 1. 9. He is the same Agrippa who is usually called Μέγας Κριτικός, with whom Josephus, in his History, seems to mean to be a Christian, Acts xxvi. 36; and of whom St. Paul said, He was answer in all the causes and questions of the Jews, ver. 6. See another inference of the limits of the same Roman empire, Of the War, b. III. ch. v. sect. 7. But what seems to me very remarkable here is this: that Agrippa's speech and his reasons to the Jews, Romans, for whose use he wrote his Antiquities, did himself frequently compose the speeches which he put into others' mouths; they appear, by the politeness of but when you reproach men greatly for small offences, you excite those whom you reproach to be your adversaries; for this will only make them leave off hating you, bravely, and with some degree of modesty, and to lay what you have wasted openly. Now nothing so much damps the force of treasons as bearing with patience; and the quietness of those who are inured diversifies invasions; patience draws off their strength. But let us take it for granted, that the Romans minsters are injurious to you, and are incurably severe; yet are they not all the Romans who thus injure you; nor hath Caesar, against whom you are, ever been so injurious to you; it is not by their command that any wicked governor is sent to you; for they who are in the west cannot see those that are in the east; nor indeed is it easy for them there even to hear what has been said. But it is absurd to make war with a great many for the sake of one; to do so with such mighty people, for a small cause; and this when these people are not able to know of what you complain; may such crimes correct, for the same procurator will not continue for ever; and probable it is that the successors will come with more moderate inclinations. But even as for war, if it be once begun, it is not easily laid down again; and burning camps, or the like, are coming therewith. However, as to the desire of recovering your liberty, it is unreasonable to indulge it so late; whereas you ought to have labored the more earnestly in that time, when you had not lost it; for the first experience of slavery was hard to be endured, and the struggle that you might never have been subject to it would have been just; but that slave who hath been once brought into subjection, and hath been made rather a refractory slave than a lover of liberty, for it was then the proper time for doing all that was possible, that you might never have admitted the Romans [into your city;] when Pompey the Great came first into Jerusalem. But it was, that our ancestors and their kings, who were in much better circumstances than we are, both as to money and [strong] bodies, and [valiant] souls, did not bear the assault of a small body of the Roman army. AndIndeed you, who be once accustomed yourselves to obedience from one generation to another, and who are so much inferior to those who first submitted in your circumstances, will venture to oppose the entire empire of the Romans; while the whole world could not have served the liberty of Greece, did once set fire to their own city; who pursued Xerxes, that proud prince, when he sailed upon the sea, and walked upon the land, and could not be contained by the sea, but confined to the land. But it is over, and no provision is made for Europe, and made him run away like a fugitive in a single ship, and brake so great a part of Asia by the lesser Salamis, are yet at this time servants to the Romans; and those injunctions which are sent from Italy, become laws to the principal governors of the city of Greece. Those Lacedemossians also, who got the great victories at Thermopylæ and Platæ, and had Agisaurus [for their king,] were not against the dominion of the Romans. But their composition, and their flights of oratory, to be not the real speeches of the persons concerned, who usually were no orators, but of his own elegant composition; the speech before us is then another line of not improbable facts, and composed in a plain and sensible, but moving way; so that it appears to be king Agrippa's own speech, and to have been given Josephus by Agrippa himself, when Josephus composed the History, and his friendship. Not we omit Agrippa's constant doctrine here, that this vast Roman empire was raised and treated with a divine Providence; and that, therefore, it was in vain for the Jews, or any others, to think of destroying it. Nor may we neglect to take notice of this part of Agrippa's speech, to the Jews and Romans, like appeals to which we have in St. Paul, 1 Tim. v. 21 and by the apostles, in general, in the form of the ordina are contented to admit the same lords. These Macedonians also, who still fancy what great men their Philip and Alexander were, and see that the latter had promised them the empire over the world, these bear so great a change, and pay their obedience to those whom fortune has advanced in their stead. Moreover, ten thousand other nations there are, who had greater reason than we to claim their entire liberty, and yet do submit to foreign lords. It is the only people who think it disgrace to be servile to strangers than to whom all the world hath submitted. What sort of an army do you rely on? What are the arms you depend on? Do your feet, that may seize upon the Roman seacoast, or send them to the west, which may be sufficient for your undertakings? Do you suppose, I pray you, that you are to make war with the Egyptians, and with the Arabians, and with the Marcomanni, with the Roman empire? Will you not esteem your own weakness? Hath not your army been often beaten even by your neighboring nations; while the power of the Romans is invincible in all parts? What, rather, they seek for somewhat still beyond that, for all Empires is not a sufficient boundary for them on the east side, nor the Danube on the north; and for their southern limit, Libya hath been searched as far as course of Ulysses went, as is Cadiz their limit on the west; yet, indeed, they have sought for another habitable earth, beyond the ocean, and have carried their arms as far as such British islands as were never inhabited by any people. Who do you think, then, you are to? Are you richer than the Gauls, stronger than the Germans, wiser than the Greeks, more numerous than all men upon the habitable earth? What evidence is it that you are superior Romans? Perhaps it will be said, it is to endure slavery. Yes, but how much harder is this to the Greeks, who were esteemed the noblest of all people under the sea? These, therefore, inhabit in league, are in subjection to six bundles of Roman rods! It is the same case with the Macedonians, who have better reason to claim their liberty than you have. What is the case of five hundred cities of Asia? Do not the submit to a single governor, and to the consular bundle of rods? What need I speak of the Haniochi, and Chelchi, and the nation of Tauri, those that inhabit the Bosphorus, and the nations about Pontus, and Moeotis, who formerly lived in security, and the subject is not of their own, but are subject to three thousand armed men, and where forty long ships kept the sea in peace, which before was not navigable, and very tempestuous? How strong a pie may Bithynia, and Carmania, and the Lycaons, and Ciliciens, put in for liberty? But they are made tributary without an army. - What are the circumstances of the Thracians, whose country extends in breadth five days' journey, and in length seven, and is open to the barbaric constitution, and much more defensible than yours. and by the rigor of its cold sufficient to keep off armies from attacking them? do not they have two thousand men of the Roman garrisons? Are not the Illyrians, who inhabit the country adjoining, as far as Dalmatia and the Danube, governed by barely two legions; by which also they put a stop to the incursions of the Thracians, and the Danubians, who have made such frequent insurrections in order to regain their liberty, and who could never before be so thoroughly subdued, but that they always gathered their forces together again, and revolted, yet are they now very quiet under one Roman legion. Moreover, if great advantages might provoke any people to revolt, the Gauls might do it best of all, as being so thoroughly walled round by nature. On the east side the Alps, on the north by the river Rhine, on the beach by the Pyrenean mountains, and on the west by the ocean. Now although these Gauls have such obstacles before them to prevent any attack upon them, and have no fewer than three prinities, and two hundred and fifty habitable earths among them; yet, as one may say, the fountains of domestic happiness within themselves, and send out plentiful streams of happiness over almost the whole world, these bear to be tributary to the Romans, and their habitations among them, are as secure as they could be elsewhere, and they undergo this, not because they are of servile minds, or because they are of an ignoble stock, as having borne a war of eighty years, in order to preserve their liberty; but they readily consent to pay taxes to the Romans, and their good fortune, which is of greater efficacy than their arms. These Gauls, therefore, are kept in servitude by twelve hundreds and twenty thousand, and the people of the cities: nor hath the gold dug out of the mines of Spain been sufficient for the support of a war to preserve their liberty, nor could their vast distance from the Romans by land and sea, prevent their obedience: but the lessers, the Lezians and the Spaniards escape: no more could the ocean, with its tide, which yet was territable to the nearest inhabitants. Nay, the Romans have extended their arms beyond the plains of the Danube and the Rhine, over the mountains of France, and they have subjected these nations. And one legion is a sufficient guard for these people, although they were so hard to be conquered, and at a distance so reduced. Who do you think, therefore, do not hear of the great number of the Germans? You have, to be sure, yourselves see them to be strong and tall, and that frequently, since the Romans have the most, among their cap-pable men; and yet, they are not more numerous than those who inhabit in an immense country, who have minds greater than their bodies, and a soul that despiseth death, and who are in rage more fierce than wild beasts, have the Rhine for their barrier, the enemy enterprises, and are termed by eight Roman legions. Such of them as were taken captive because their sergeants; and the rest of the entire nation were obliged to save themselves by flight. Do ye also, when ye do not make the German war, or consider what a wall the Britons had; for the Romans sailed away to them, and subdued them while they were conquered by the ocean, and inhabited an island that is not less than the [considered] country of the Greeks; and it is a sufficient guard to so large an island. And why should I speak more about this matter? while the Parthians, that most warlike body of men, and lords of so many nations, and encompassed with such mighty forces, are a great disadvantages to the Romans; whereby you may see it you please, even in Italy, the noblest nation at the east, under the notion of peace, submitting to serve them. Now when almost all people are subdued and brought under the Roman yoke, will you be the only people that make war against them? and this without regarding the fate of the Carthaginians, who, in the midst of their brags of the great Hannibal, and the nobility of their nation, were not able to make an impression on the Romans; nor indeed have the Cyrenecians, derived from the Lacedemonians, nor the Marmarids, a nation extended as far as the regions uninhabitable for the want of water, nor the Danubians, who have the like ability, by which they bear the name of the Nasemons and Moors, and the immense multitude of the Nusidian, been able to put a stop to the Roman valor. And as for the third part of the habitable earth, [Africa], whose nations are so many that it is not easy to number them, and which is bounded by the Atlantic sea and the pillar of Hercules, and feeds an innumerable multitude of Ethiopians, as far as the Red Sea; these have the Romans subdued entirely. And besides the annual fruits of the earth, which maintained the multitude of the Romans for eight months in the year, this, over and above, pays all sorts of tribute, and afford revenue suitable to the necessities of the government. Nor do they, like you, esteem such injudicious fines as are imposed on them, although they have but one Roman region that abides among them. And indeed what occasion is there for showing you the power of the Romans over remote countries, when it is so easy to learn it who is the master in Egypt?

This country is extended as far as the Ethiopian and Arabia the Happy, and borders upon India: it hath seven millions five hundred thousand men, besides the inhabitants of Alexandria, and that of the Aegean islands; for the Georgi tribe pay no more tax; yet it is not ashamed to submit to the Roman government, although it hath Alexandria as a grand temptation to a revolt, by reason it is so full of people and of riches, and is, besides, exceeding large; and its magnitude, and its breadth no less than ten; and it pays more tribute to the Romans in one month than you do in a year; nay, besides what it pays in money, it sends corn to Rome, that supports it for fifty years; it sustains the Roman war; it sends corn over all sides, either by almost impassable deserts, or seas that have no havens, or by rivers, or by lakes; yet none of these things have been found too strong for the Roman good fortune; hence they say that the Roman man is the bridle both for the remoter parts of Egypt, and for the parts inhabited by the more noble Macedonians. Where then are those people whom you entreat to have for your allies? Must they come from the parts of the world that are inhabitable? for all that are in the habitable earth are [under the] Romans. Unless any of you extend your hopes as far as beyond the Euphrates, and the Indus, and the Ganges, and the Caspian; and dwell in Adiabene will come to your assistance; but certainly these will not embarrasse themselves with an unjustifiable war, nor, if they should follow such ill advice, will the Parthians permit them to go; for it is the concern to maintain the truce that is between them and the Romans, and they will be supposed to break the covenants between them, if any under their government march against the Romans. What remains, the measure of this, is to have this; but still they will be more and more embarrasse themselves; for if the Romans get you under their power, they will be no longer abstain from them, when their former absension shall have been so ungratefully required. I call to witness your sanctity, and the holy support of your country common to us all, that I have not kept back any thing that is for your preservation; and if you will follow that advice, which I ought to do, you will have that peace which will be common to you and to us; but if you involve your passions, you will run those hazards which I shall be free from.

5. When Agrippa had spoken thus, both he and his sister wept, and by their tears represented a great deal to the majesty which was present, but still they cried out, that "they would not fight against the Romans, but against Florus, on account of what they had suffered by his means."

To which Agrippa replied, "that what they had already done would have been more than sufficient for the Romans; for you have not paid the tributes which is due to Caesar; and you have cut off the cloisters [of the temple] from joining to the tower Antonia. You will therefore present any occasion of revolt, if you will but join those treasons again, and if you will but pay your tribute; for the citadel does not now belong to Florus, nor are you to pay the tribute money to Florus."

CHAP. XV.

How the War of the Jews with the Romans began. And concerning Manahem.

1. Titus advised the people heartened to, and went up into the temple with the king and Berenice, and began to rebuild the cloisters; the rulers also and senators divided themselves into the villages, and collected the tribute, and soon got together a mighty host, the numbers of which was deficient. And thus did Agrippa then put a stop to that war which was threatened. Moreover, he attempted to persuade the multitude to obey Florus, until Caesar should send one to succeed him; but they were hereby more provoked, and cast reproaches upon the king, anding the city of Joppa, and for the Sabbatical year, as Spanhelser observes from the Antiq. b. xiv. ch. x. sect 6.

WARS OF THE JEWS.

get him excluded out of the city; nay, some of the seditionists had the impudence to throw stones at him. So when the king saw that the violence of those that were party for innovation was not to be restrained, and being very angry at the contumelies he had received, he sent their rulers, together with their men of power, to Florus, to Cæsar's camp, to present him with a written assurance, and thus shewed himself fit to collect the tribute in the country, while he retired into his own kingdom.

2. And at this time it was that some of those that principally excited the people to go to war, and to revolt upon a certain promise which the seditious made to Masada. They took it by treachery, and slew the Romans that were there, and put others of their own party to keep it. At the same time Eleazar, the son of Ananias the high priest, a very old man, and a man of great note; and he and Joseph and Gippos, the most flourishing part of the innovators assisted them: but they had the chief regard to Eleazar, the governor of the temple.

3. The men of power got together, and conferred with the high priests, as did also the principal men of the Pharisees; and thinking all was at stake, and that their calamities were becoming incurable, took counsel what was to be done. And they determined to try what they could do with the seditionists by words, and assembled the people before the breach, which was at the south temple [court of the priests] which looked toward the morning. And in this place they showed the eagerness they had at this attempt for a revolt, and for their bringing so great a war upon their country: after which they confuted their pretense as unjustifiable, and told them, that their forefathers had sacrificed their temple in great part; with donations bestowed on them by foreigners, and had always received what had been presented to them from foreign nations; and that they had been so far from rejecting any person's sacrifice should be the last instance of impiety, that they had themselves placed those donations about the temple which were still visible, and had remained there so long a time: for that did not irritate the Romans to take arms against them, but led them to serve the war upon them, and brought up novel rules of a strange divine worship, and determined to run the hazard of having their city condemned for impiety, while they would not allow any foreigner, but Jews only, either to sacrifice or to worship therein. And if such a law should ever be introduced in the case of a single person only, he would have indignation at it, as an instance of insults, determinations against Cæsar, and forbade even their oblations to be received also: that, however, they cannot but fear, lest by rejecting his sacrifices, they shall not be allowed to have admission into that city, which will lose that principality, unless they grow wiser quickly, and restore the sacrifices as formerly, and indeed amend the injury [they have offered to foreigners] before the report of it comes to the ears of them who have been injured.

4. And as they said these things, they produced those priests that were skilful in the customs of their country, who made the report, that all their forefathers had received the sacrifices given them that have been injured.
BOOK II.—CHAP. XVII.

Mamre's soldiers to the upper palace, and shut the gates immediately; among whom were Ananias the high priest, and all the principal men that had been sent to Agrrippa. And now the seditionists were content with the victory they had gotten, and the buildings they had burnt down, and proceeded no farther.

On the next day, which was the fifteenth of the month Louis, [A.b.] they made an assault upon Antonia, and besieged the garrison which was in it two days, and then took the garrison, and slew them, and set the citadel on fire; after which they proceeded to set fire to their palaces and houses. The king's soldiers were fled, and parted themselves into four bodies, and made an attack upon the walls. As for those that were within it, no one had the courage to sally out, because those that assembled them were so numerous; but they distributed themselves into the brestworks and turrets, and shot at the besiegers, whereby many of the robbers fell under the walls; nor did they cease to fight one another either by night or by day, while the seditionists supposing those within would grow weary for want of food, and those within supposed the others would do the like by the terrors of the siege.

Now the soldiers of Mamre, the son of Judas, that was called the Galillean, (who was a very cunning sophister, and had formerly reproached the Jews under Cyrenius, that after God they were subject to the Romans,) took some of the city, and burnt it, and ran upon Masada, where he broke open king Herod's armory, and gave arms not only to his own people, but to other robbers also. These he made use of for a guard, and returned in the state of a king to Jerusalem; and he became the leader of the sedition, and gave orders for continuing the siege, but they wanted proper instruments, and it was not practicable to undermine the wall, because the darts came down upon them from above. But still they drew him and his company from the east side of the towers, and made it totter, and having done that, they set fire on what was combustible, and left it, and when the foundations were burnt below, the wall fell down suddenly. Yet did they then meet with another wall that had been built within; for the besieged were sensible beforehand of what they were doing, and probably the tower shook as it was undermining; so they wrought much damage in that manner. But when the besiegers unexpectedly saw, while they thought they had already gained the place, they were under some consternation. However, those that were within sent to Mamre, and to the others that were with them, and of these they might go out upon a capitulation: this was granted to the king's soldiers, and their own countrymen, only who went out accordingly; but the Romans that were left alone were greatly dejected, for they were not able to force their way through such a multitude: and to desire them to give them their right hand for their security they thought it would be a reproach to them; and besides, if they should give it them, they desired to receive the spoil that day. And so they made their camp as easily taken, and ran away to the royal towers that called Hippicus, that called Phasaeus, and that called Mariamme; but Mamre and his party fell upon the place where once the soldiers that had been at the city of Diospolis could catch, before they got up to the towers, and plundered what they left behind them, and set fire to their camp. This was executed on the advice of the men of Geryon.

8. But on the next day the high priest was caught, where he had concealed himself in an aqueduct; he was slain, together with Hesekiiah his brother, by the robbers: hereupon the seditionists besieged the towers, and kept them guarded, lest any one of the soldiers should escape. Now the overthrow of the places of strength, and the death of the high priest Ananias, so pleased the Romans, that he became barbarously cruel, and not only those that were in the council of the management of affairs with him, he was no better than an insupportable tyrant; but Eleazar and his party, when words had passed between them, how "it was not proper when they revolted from the Romans, out of a love of liberty, to betray that liberty to any of their own people, and to bear a lord, who, though he should be guilty of so violence, was yet measer than themselves; as also, that in case they were obbeeded to set sects among them, and that they should be fitter they should give that privilege to any one rather than to him," they made an assault upon him in the temple; for he went up thither to worship in a pompous manner, and adorned himself with royal garments, and had done them with their armor. But Eleazar and his party fell violently upon him, as did also the rest of the people, and taking up stones to attack him with, they threw them at the sophister, and thought, if he were once ruined, the entire sedition would fall to the ground. Now the Romans and his party made resistance for a while, but when they perceived that the whole multitude of their countrymen were assisted upon them, they found their way every one was able; those that were caught were slain, and those that bided themselves were searched for. A few there were of them who privately escaped to Masada, among whom was Eleazar the son of Jairus, who had been in the council of Mamre, and acted the part of a tyrant at Masada afterward: as for Mamre himself, he ran away to the place called Ophia, and there lay skulking in private; but they took him alive, and drew him forth before them all, and then burned him with many sorts of torments, and after all slew him, as they did by those that were captains under him also, and particularly by the principal instrument of his tyranny, whose name was Apehas or Apelhas.

10. And, as I said, so far truly the people assisted them, while they hoped this might afford some amendment to the sedition's practices; but the others were not in haste to put an end to the war, but hoped to prosecute it with less danger, now they had slain Mamre. It is true, that when the people earnestly desired that they would leave off besieging the soldiers, they were the more eagerly insistent; for some few days after the capture of Masada, which was the Roman general, sent to Eleazar, and desired that they would give them security to spare their lives only, but agreed to deliver up their arms, and what else they had taken from the others; but they would not hear of their petition, sent to them Gorion, the son of Nicodemus, and Ananias, the son of Sadjuk, and Judas, the son of Jonathan, that they might give them the security of their right hands, and of their oath; and so the soldiers, while they were in arms, were not meddled with by any of the seditionists, nor was there any appearance of treachery; but as soon as, according to the articles of capitulation, they had delivered up their arms and their swords, and were under no further suspicion of any harm, but were going away, Eleazar's men attacked them after a violent manner, and encompassed them round, and slew them, while they were defending the entrance of their camp; and they treated for mercy, but only cried out upon the breach of their articles of capitulation, and their oaths. And thus were all these men barbarously murdered, excepting Mattathias; for he was treated for mercy; and promised that he would turn Jew, and be circumcised, they saved him alive, but none else. This loss to the Romans was but light, there being no more than a few slain out of an immense multitude; but it appeared to be a prelude to the Jews' own destruction, while men made public lamentation when they that such occasions were afforded for a war as were incurable; that the city was all over polluted with such abominations, from which it was but reasonable to expect some vengeance, even though they should escape vengeance from the Romans; so that city was filled with sadness, and every one of the moderate men in it were under great disturbance, as likely themselves to undergo the madness of war, in the same conditions; for indeed it so happened, that this murder was perpetrated on the sabbath day, on which day the Jews have a respite from their works on account of divine worship.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Calamities and Slaughters that came upon the Jews.

1. Now the people of Cassarea had slain the Jews that were among them on the very same day and hour [when the soldiers were slain], which one would think must have come to pass by the direction of Providence; insomuch, that in one hour's time above twenty thousand Jews were killed, and all Cassarea was emptied of its Jewish inhabitants; for Flosus caught such as ran away, and sent them in bonds to the galleys. It hath been said, that the Jews who were received at Cassarea, the whole nation was greatly enraged; so they divided themselves into several parties, and laid waste the villages of the Syrians, and their neighboring cities, Philadelphia, and Sebasteis, and Petra, and Pella, and Scythopolis, and all the mountains, and the mazone, and Gedara, and Hippos, and falling upon Gaulantis, some cities they destroyed there, and some they set on fire, and then went to Kadama, burning up the country of his, and Pese, and, and to Gala, and to Cassarea; nor was either Sebaste [Samaris] or Askalon able to oppose the violence with which they were attacked; and when they had burnt those to the ground, they came again to their own city. Asmedus, and al many of the villages that were about every one of those cities were plundered, and an immense slaughter was made of the men who were caught in them.

2. However, the Syrians were even with the Jews in the multitude of the men whom they slew; for they killed those whom they caught in their cities, and that not only out of the hatred they bore them, as formerly, but to prevent the destruction of those cities, which they were to seize; so that the disorders in all Syria were terrible, and every city was divided into two armies encamped one against another, and the preservation of the country was in the destruction of the other; so that the present time was spent in shedding of blood, and the night in fear, which was of the two the more terrible; for when the Syrians thought they had raised the Jews, they had the Jews in suspicion also; and as each side did not care to slay those whom they only suspected on the other, so did they greatly fear them when they were mingled with the other, as if they were certainly foreigners. Moreover, the great necessity of getting possession to kill the oppressor has been even to such as had of old appeared very mild and gentle towards them; for they without fear plundered the effects of the slain, and carried off the spoils of those whom they slew to their own houses; and, with the other, they had been in a sea battle; and he was esteemed a man of honor who got the greatest share, as having prevailed over the greatest number of his enemies. It was then common to see cities filled with dead bodies, still lying unbrought, and those of old men, mixed with infants, all dead, and scattered about together; women also lay amongst them, without any covering for their nakedness; you might then see the whole province full of insupportable calamities, while the dread of still more barbarous practices, as which were threatened, was everywhere greater than what had been already perpetrated.

3. And thus far the conflict had been between Jews and foreigners, but when they made excursions to Scythopolis, they found Jews that acted as enemies; and did they sack any of their array with those of Scythopolis, and preferred their own safety before their relation to us, they fought against their own countrymen; nay, their security was so very great, that those of Scytheoplis, lest they should make an assault upon the city in the night-time, and, to their greater misfortune, should thereby make an apology for them-selfs to those people for their revolt from them: So they commanded them, that in case they would confirm their agreement, and demonstrate their fidelity to them, who were of a different nation, they should go out of the city with their arms, and give them the key of their city; for they had done as they were commanded, without respecting any thing, the people of Scythopolis lay still for the interval of two days, to tempt them to secure; but on the third night they watched their opportunity, and cut all their throats, so as they lay unguarded, and some as they lay asleep. The number that was slain was above thirteen thousand, and then they plundered them all of that they had.

3. And this preserved our relation what islel silmon: he was the son of one Saul, a man of reputation among the Jews. This man was dis-guished from the rest by the strength of his body and the boldness of his conduct, although he was both a Christian and of the nation of an countrystan; for he came every day and did a great many of the Jews of Scythopolis, and he frequently put them to flight, and became hisself a great leader among them. But a just punishment overtook him for the smerders he had committed upon those of the more soation with him: for when the people of Scytheoplis threw their darts at them in the grove, as he had done, he was struck, and died from an enemy; for he saw that he could do nothing against such a multitude; but he cried out where very moving manner, and said, "O, ye people of Scythopolis, I deservedly suffer for what I have opposed relating to you, where I have sought any security of my fidelity to you, by slaying many of those that were related to us. Whereas we very justly experience the perfidies of foreigners, while we acted after a most meek manner toward them: therefore die, polluted wretch as I am, by mine own hands: for it is not fit I should die by the hand of our enemies; and let the same action be to me both a punishment for my great crimes, and the other cities rose up against the Jews that were among them; those of Askalon slew two thousand five hundred, and those of Ptolemais two.
thousands, and put not a few into bonds; those of Tyre also put a great number to death, but kept a greater number in prison; moreover, those of Hippo and those of Gadera did the like, while they put to death the boldest of the Jews, but kept those of whom they were afraid in custody; as did the rest of the cities of Syria, accordingly as they every one either hated them, or were afraid of them; only the Antiochians, the Sidonians, and Apamians, spared those that died, thinking that their adversity was the signal for them to kill any of the Jews, or to put them in bonds. And perhaps they spared them, because their own number was so great that they despaired their attempts; but I think the greatest part of them were put to death, but they ran away with the rest of their goods, and those of whom they saw to make no innovations. As for the Gerasans, they did no harm to those that abode with them; and for those who had a mind to go away, they conducted them as far as the borders reached.

6. There was also a plot laid against the Jews in Agrippa's kingdom; for he was himself gone to Cestius Gallus, to Antioch, but had left one of his sons, Aristobulus, to take care of the public affairs; which Nothus was of kin to king Sophonias. Now there came certain men, seventy in number, out of Batanias, who were the most considerable for their families and posterity; and of the rest of the principal men, and of the seditious, they sent one to have an array put into their hands, that if any tumult should happen, they might have about them a guard sufficient to restrain such as might rise up against them. This Nothus sent out some of those that were armed by night, and slew all those [seventy] men; which bold action he ventured upon without the consent of Agrippa, and was such a lover of money, that he chose to be so wicked to his own countrymen, although he brought them up out of the best families, and cruelly did he treat that nation, and this contrary to the laws also, until Agrippa was informed of it, who did not indeed dare to put him to death, out of regard to Sophonias; but still he put an end to the whole conspirators immediately. But as to the seditious, they took the citadel which was called Cypros, and was above Jericho, and cut the throats of the garrison, and utterly demolished the fortifications; this was about the same time; and the fear of the Jews, as Macabaeus persuaded the Romans who were in garrison to leave the place, and deliver it up to them. These Romans being in great fear, lest the place should be taken by force, made an agreement with the Romans on those conditions; and when they had obtained the security they desired, they delivered up the citadel, into which the people of Macabaeus put a garrison for their own security, and held it in their own power.

7. But for Alexandria, the sedition of the people of the place against the Jews was perpetual, and this from that very time when Alexander [the Great] upon leaving the residence of the Jews in assisting him against the Egyptians, and as a reward for such their assistance, gave them equal privileges in this city with the Grecians themselves. Which honorary reward continued among them; and this of whom they were afraid, was for them a particular place, that they might live without being polluted [by the Gentiles], and were thereby not so much intermixed with foreigners as before: they also gave them this further privilege, that they took out of Egypt the firstfruits of every harvest, and the first fruits of all their lights and sacrifices; and for the rest of their sacrifices, they gave them four thousand talents, and the money of the taxes was their own. Nay, when the Romans got possession of Egypt, the first Caesar, nor any one that came after him, thought of diminishing the honors which Alexander had bestowed on the Jews. But still conflicts perpetually arose with the Grecians; and although the governor did every day punish many of them, yet did the sedition grow worse; but at this time especially, when there were tumults in other places also, but kept those of whom they were afraid in the disord of the Romans in captivity; for when the Alexandrians had once a public assembly, to deliberate about an embassy they were sending to Nero, a great number of Jews came flocking to the theatre; but when they saw the numbers of their adversary, they cried out, and called them their enemies, and said they came as spies upon them; upon which they rushed out, and laid violent hands upon them; and as for the rest they were slain as need was. And they ran away with the rest of those whom they caught, and hauled them along, in order to have them burst alive; but all the Jews came in a body to defend them, who at first threw stones at the Grecians, but after that they took arms, and had no remission into the theatre and threatened that they would burn the peoples to a man; and this they had said before, unless Tiberius Alexander, the governor of the city, had restrained their passions. However, this man did not begin to teach them wisdom by arms, but sent among them privately some of the principal men, and thereby entrapped them to be quiet, and not provoke the Roman army against them; but the seditious made a jest of the treaty of the Romans with the Alexandrians, and took the deeds of the treaty of the Romans with the Alexandrians, and reproached him for so doing.

8. Now when he perceived that those who were for innovations would not be pacified till some great calamity should fall upon them, he sent out upon them those two Roman legions that were in the city, and together with them five thousand other soldiers, who by chance were come together out of Libya, to the ruin of the Jews. They also were not so content with them, but to plunder them of what they had, and to set fire to their houses. These soldiers rushed violently into that part of the city that was called Delta, where the Jewish people lived together; and did all that was possible, through the houses bloodshed on their own side also; for the Jews got together, and set those that were the best armed among them in the forefront, and made resistance for a great while; but when once they were back, the Jews were slain by thousands, and this their destruction was complete, some being caught in the open field, and others forced into their houses, which houses were first plundered of what was in them, and then set on fire by the Romans, and the flames was shown to the infants, and no regard had to the aged; but they went on in the slaughter of persons of every age, till all the place was overflowed with blood, and fifty thousand of them lay dead upon heaps; nor had it at remembrance that they had been preserved that they not taken themselves to supplication. So Alexander commiserated their condition, and gave orders to the Romans to retire: accordingly, these being accommodated to obey orders, the left off killing at the first intimations; but the populace of Alexandria bore so very great hatred to the Jews, that it was difficult to recall them, and it was a hard thing to make them leave their dead bodies.

9. And this was the miserable calamity which at this time befell the Jews at Alexandria. Hereupon Cestius thought fit no longer to lie still, while the Jews were everywhere in arms; so he mustered all the forces that were at hand in Egypt, and out of each of the rest he selected two thousand, with six cohorts of footmen, and four troops of horsemen, besides those auxiliaries which were sent by the kings; of which Antiochus

†Spanheim notes on the place, that this latter Antiochus, who was called Epyphanes, is mentioned by Dio, lix. page 645, and that he is mentioned by Josephus elsewhere twice also, b. v. ch. xI. sect. 3, and Antiq. h. xix. ch. viii. sect. 1. 2 0 2 sent two thousand horsemen, and three thousand footmen, with as many archers; and Agrippa sent the same number of footmen, and one thousand horsemen; Sohemus also followed with four thousand, a third part whereof were horsemen, but most part were archers, and thus did he march to Ptolemais. There were also great numbers of auxiliaries gathered together from the [free] cities, which indeed had not the same spirit in martial affairs, but were rather in the pursuit of gold, to get what they wanted in their pleasures.

Chap. XIX.

What Cestius did against the Jews; and how upon his besieging Jerusalem, he retraced from the City, without any just Occasion in the World. As also what severa Celmomities we learn from the Jews on his retreat.

1. And now Gallus, seeing nothing more that lay towards an assault, and without any concert with Cestius, removed with his whole army, and marched to Antipatris. And when he was informed that there was a great body of Jewish forces got together about Jerusalem, he sent immediately for a party before to fight them; but this party dispersed the Jews by affrighting them before it came to a battle: so they came, and finding the camp well manned, were afraid to attack them, and retreating, left about five thousand Jews: and the Romans did not pursue them, but returned to their own camp.

2. And now Cestius himself marched from Ptolemais, and came to Cæsarea; but he sent part of his army before him to Joppa, and gave order, that if they could take that city [by surprise], they should give it up; but that in case the citizens should perceive they were coming to attack them, that they then should stay for him and the rest of the army. So some of them made a brisk march by the seacoast, and some by land, and came upon the city, on both sides; they took the city with ease; and as the inhabitants had made no provision aforesaid for a flight, nor had gotten any thing ready for fighting, the soldiers fell upon them, and slew them all; and taking the plunder and burnt the city. The number of the slain was eight thousand four hundred. In like manner Cestius sent also a considerable body of horsemen to the toparchy of Naarbatae, that adjoining to the land of the Jews; and burned the city, and slew a great multitude of its people; they also plundered what they had, and burnt their villages.

3. But Cestius sent Gallus, the commander of the twelfth legion, into Galilee, and delivered to him as many of his forces as he supposed sufficient to subdue that nation. He was received by the strongest city of Galilee, which was Sephoris, with acclamations of joy, which were a certain proof of that city occasioning the rest of the cities to be quiet; while the seditious part of the robbers ran away to that mountain which lies in the very middle of Galilee, and is situated over against Sephoris; it is called Assom. So Gallus fought against them, and killed them; but when those men were in the superior parts above the Romans, they easily threw their darts upon the Romans, as they made their approaches, and slew about two hundred of them: but when the Romans had gone round the mountains, and were gotten into parts above their enemies, the others were soon beaten, nor could they who had only flight, upon which the force of the mass that fought them ran over all over; nor when they were beaten could they escape the enemy's horsemen: insomuch, that only some few concealed themselves in certain places hard to be found; among the rest, above two thousand and in number, were slain.

book, and put the houndmost of the army into disorder, and carried off many of the beasts that carried the weapons of war, and led them into the city. But as Cestius turned there three days, the Jews seized upon the elevated parts of the city, and set watches at the entrances into the city, and appeared openly resolved not to rest, when once the Romans should begin to march. The wall, and parts of the city, were set on fire by the Jews, so that the affairs of the Romans were likely to be in danger, while such an immense multitude of their enemies had seized upon the mountains round about, he determined to try what the Jews were prepared for the wall for fighting, as he should either persuade them all to desist from fighting, or, however, that he should cause the sober part of them to separate themselves from the opposite party. So he sent Bocceas and Puteus into the city, and gave them orders to show the best known to them, and promised them, that Cestius should give them his right hand, to secure them of the Romans' entire forgiveness of what they had done amiss, if they would throw away that díastris, and, as much as they could, to persuade the seditions, fearing lest the whole multitude, in hopes of security to themselves, should go over to Agrrippa, resolved immediately to fall upon and kill the ambassadors: accordingly they slew seven guards. At last Cestius was only wounded, and so prevented his fate by flying away; and when the people were very angry at this, they had the seditions beaten with sticks and clubs, and drove them before them into the city.

4. But now Cestius, observing that all the difficulties that were begun among the Jews afforded him a proper opportunity to attack them, took his whole army, and he with him, and crossed over to flight, and pursued them to Jerusalem. He then pitched his camp upon the elevation called Scopus, [or watch-tower,] which was distant seven furlongs from the city; yet did he not assail them in their days' time, out of fear lest those within might perhaps yield a little; and in the mean time he sent out a great many of his soldiers into the neighboring villages, to seize upon their corn. And on the fourth day, which was the fourth, as he had been talking to Tiberius, when he had put his army in array, he brought it into the city. Now for the people, they were kept under by the seditions; but the seditions themselves were greatly affrighted at the presence of the Romans and the troops of the suburbs, and retreated into the inner part of the city, and into the temple. But when Cestius was come into the city, he set the part called Benetha, which is also called Creopsis, [the market place] on fire; he did this just at the time-market: after which he came into the upper city, and pitched his camp over against the royal palace; and had he but at this time attempted to set within the walls by force, he would have won the city presently, and the war had been put an end to at once; but Tyrannus Priscus, the master-mate of the army, and a great number of the officers of the horse, had been corrupted by Ezechias the converter, and on account of the terms of the capitulation that was the occasion that this war lasted so very long, and thereby the Jews were involved in such insurmountable calamities.

5. In the mean time many of the principal men of the city were reconciled by Ananias the son of Jonathan, and invited Cestius into the city, and were about to open the gates for him but he overlooked this offer, partly out of his anger at the Jews, and partly because he did not thoroughly believe they were in earnest; whence it was that he delayed the matter so long, that the seditions perceived the treachery, and threw Ananias and those of his party down from the wall, and put the inhabitants of the city into their houses; but they stood themselves at proper distances in the towers, and threw their darts at those that were getting over the wall.

That day Cestius made their attack against the city, but to no purpose; in expectation of the next day. Cestius took a good many of his chieftain men, and with them the archers, and attempted to break into the temple at the northern quarter of it; but the Jews beat them off from the cloisters, and threw them several shafts when they were gotten near to the wall, till at length the multitude of the darts cut them off, and made them retire; but the first rank of the Romans rested their shields upon the wall, and so did those low. Several people were hit, and others that were still more backward, and guarded themselves with what they call Testudo, [the back of] a tortoise, upon which the darts that were thrown fell, and slid off without doing them any harm. Cestius, seeing that he could not set open the gates, and to admit Cestius as their benefactor, who, had he but continued the siege a little longer, had certainly taken the city; but it was, I suppose, owing to the aversion God had already at that time committed it to them, and he was hindered from putting an end to the war that very day.

6. And now it was that a horrible fear seized upon the seditions, insomuch that many of them ran out of the city, as though it were to be taken immediately: but the people upon this took courage, and where the wicked part of the city gave ground, this did the contrary, and set open the gates, and to admit Cestius as their benefactor, who, had he but continued the siege a little longer, had certainly taken the city; but it was, I suppose, owing to the aversion God had already at that time committed it to them, and he was hindered from putting an end to the war that very day.

7. It then happened that Cestius was not conscious either how the besieged despaired of success, nor how near the time of his own departure was; so he recalled his soldiers from the place, and by despairing of any expectation of taking it, without having received any disgrace, he retired from the city, without any great harm to the world. Thus the Romans received this unexpected retreat of his, they resumed their courage, and ran after the hinder parts of his army, and destroyed a considerable number of both their horsemen and footmen; and Cestius lay all night at that place, which was at Scopus, and as he went off farther next day, he thereby invited the enemy to follow him, who still fell upon the hindmost, and destroyed them; they also fell upon the flank on each side of the army, and threw darts upon them obliquely, nor distrusted those that were hindermost turn back upon those who wounded them behind, as imaging that the multitude of those that pursued them was immense; nor did they rest content to drive away those that pressed upon them on each side, because they were heavy with their arms, and were afraid of breaking their ranks to pieces, and because they saw the Jews were light, and ready for making sallies upon them.
the reason why the Romans suffered greatly, without being able to revenge themselves upon their enemies as they were galled all the way and their ranks were put into disorders, and those that were thus put out of their ranks were slain; among whom were Priscus, the commander of the sixth legion, and Longinus, the praefectus tribunici, and Lucius Secundus, the commander of a troop of horsemen. So it was not without difficulty that they got to Gabao, their former camp, and that not without the loss of a great part of their baggage. Cestius sent out a detail about Cestius and was in great distress to know what he should do in these circumstances; but when, on the third day, he saw a still greater number of enemies, and all the parts round about him full of Jews, he thought that his death was to his own detriment, and that if he stayed any longer there, he should have still more enemies upon him.

8. That, therefore, he might fly the faster, he gave orders to cast away what might hinder his flight, including his baggage, horse and other creatures, excepting those that carried their darts and machines, which they retained for their own use, and this principally because they were afraid lest the Jews should seize upon them. He then took his army on the march as far as Bethhoron. Now the Jews did not so much press upon them when they were in large open places, but when they were penned up in their descent through narrow lanes, then did some of them get upon the ground before, and hindered them from getting out of them, and others of them thrust the hindermost down into the lower places, and the whole multitude extended themselves over against the Jews, and covered all the Roman army with their darts. In which circumstances, as the footmen knew not how to defend themselves, so the danger pressed the horsemen still more, for they were so pelted, that they could not find room for their horses, and the assests were so high, that the cavalry were not able to march against the enemy; the precipices also, and valleys into which they frequently fell, and tumbled down, were such on each side of them, that there were neither place for their flight, nor any contrivance could be thought of for their defence; till the distress they were at last in was so great, that they betook themselves to the ship, and so did to such small ordes, that men used in the utmost despair; the joyful exclamations of the Jews, also, as they encouraged one another, echoed the sound back again, these last composing a noise of those that at once rejoiced and wept with rage. Indeed, thing were come to such a pass, that the Jews had almost taken Cestius's entire army prisoners, had not the night come on, when the Romans fled to Bethhoron, and the Jews seized upon all the places round about them, and watched for their coming out (in the morning). 9. And then it was that Cestius, despairing of obtaining room for a public march, contrived how he might best run away; and when he had selected four hundred of the most courageous of his soldiers, he placed them at the strongest of their fortifications, and gave order, that when they went up to the morning guard, they should erect their ensigns, that the Jews might be mad that the entire army was there still, while he himself took the rest of his forces with him, and marched, without any noise, thirty furlongs. But when the Jews perceived in the morning, that the ensigns were still set up upon those four hundred who had delayed them, and immediately threw their darts at them, and slew them, and then pursued after Cestius. But he had already made use of a great part of the night in his flight, and still advanced quicker, when it was day, knowing that the soldiers, through the astonishment and fear they were in, left behind them their engines for sieges, and for throwing stones, and a great part of the instruments of war. So the Jews went on pursuing the Romans as after which, seeing they could not overtake them, they came back, and took the engines, and spoiled the dead bodies, and gathering the prey together which the Romans had left behind them, came back running and chasing those that had two days; whereas they had themselves lost a few only, but had slain of the Romans five thousand and three hundred footmen, and three hundred and eighty horsemen. This defeat happened on the eighth day of the month Thammuz, after Anarchus, in the twelfth year of the reign of Nero.

Cestius sends Ambassadors to Nero. The People of Damascus say those Jews that lived with them. The People of Jerusalem, after they had [left off] pursuing Cestius, return to the City, and get things ready for its defense, and make a great many General for their Armies, and particularly Josephus, the writer of these Books. Some Account of his Administration.

1. After this calamity had befallen Cestius many of the most eminent of the Jews swam away to Rome, and the rest were very few, and in the city, in which they dwelt in that place, in going to sink; Costobarus, therefore, and Seal, who were brethren, together with Philip, the son of Jachimus, who was the commander of king Agrippa's forces, ran away from the city, and were very few that remained. And some of the people of Jerusalem had been besieged with them in the king's palace, would not fly away with them, was afterward slain by the seditious, we shall relate hereafter. However, Cestius sent Seal and his friends, at least three thousand and three hundred, to him of the great distress they were in, and to lay the blame of their kindling the war upon Flora, as hoping to alleviate his own danger, by provoking his indignation against Flora. 2. In the mean time the people of Damascus, when they were informed of the destruction of the Romans, set about the slaughter of those Jews that were among them; and as they had no patience to deal with those that were guilty of public exercises, which they had done out of the suspicion they had of them, they thought they should meet with no difficulty in the attempt; yet did they distrust their own wives, who were always with them, which made them more exact on which account it was, that their greatest concern was, how they might conceal these things from them; so they came upon the Jews, and cut their throats, as being in a narrow place, in number ten thousand, and all of them unarmed, and this in one hour's time, without any body to disturb them.

3. But as to those who had pursued after Cestius when they ran him in, he had selected four hundred of the most courageous of his soldiers, he placed them at the strongest of their fortifications, and gave order, that when they went up to the morning guard, they should erect their ensigns, that the Jews might be mad that the entire army was there still, while he himself took the rest of his forces with him, and marched, without any noise, thirty furlongs. But when the Jews perceived in the morning, that the ensigns were still set up upon those four hundred who had delayed them, and immediately threw their darts at them, and slew them, and then pursued after Cestius. sephoris, they were the only people to whom he gave leave to build their own walls, and this because he perceived they were rich and wealthy, and ready to take part against him, were guilty of any injurious for that purpose. The case was the same with Gischala, which had a wall built about it by John the son of Levi himself, but with the consent of Josephus; but for the building of the fortress on the heights, he did not consent to that which he had. collected together with all the other builders, and was present to give all the necessary orders for that purpose. He also got together an army out of Galilee, of the young men, of all the armed with the old men, which he had collected together and prepared for them.

7. And when he had considered that the Roman power might impose such ready readiness in obeying orders, and the constant exercise of their arms, he was disposed to teach these the men the use of their arms, which was to be obtained by experience; but observing that they were not instructed in the multitude of their orders, he made his partitions in his army more after the Roman manner, and appointed many subalterns. He also distributed the soldiers into various classes, whom he put under captains of hundreds, and then under captains of thousands; and besides these he had commanders of larger bodies of men. He also taught them to give the signals one to another, and to call and recall the soldiers by the names of the places, and thus he was enabled at his pleasure to expand the wings of an army, and make them wheel about, and when one wing had had success, to turn again and assist those that were hard set, and to join in the defence of what had most suffered, he communicated both these orders to them in the council of the troops, and the hardness of the body; and above all he exercised them for war, by declaring to them distinctly the good order of the Romans, and how they were to fight; and then by the strength of their bodies and courage of their souls, had conquered in a manner the whole habitable earth. He told them that he should make trial of the good order they observed in war, even before it came to any battle, in case they would abstain from the crimes the use to indulge themselves in, such as theft, and robbery, and rapine, and from depraving their own countrymen, and from tyrannizing; and if you were to attempt any thing those who were so near of kin to him, to be any advantage to themselves; for that war are then managed the best when the warriors preserve a good conscience; but that such as are ill men in private life, will not only have no difficulty in those who attack them, but God himself also for their antagonist.

8. And thus did he continue to admonish them. Now he chose for the war such a army as was sufficient, i. e. sixty thousand footmen, and two hundred and fifty horsemen; and besides those, on which he put the greatest trust, there were wisdom and pietie, and skilful conduct in martial af about four thousand five hundred mercenaries; he had also six hundred men as guards of his body. Now the cities easily maintained the rest of his army, multiplying the mercenaries, for every one of the cities enumerated above sent out half their men to the army, and retained the other half at home, in order to get provisions for them; insomuch that the rest went not to war with them, but returned to their work; and so those that sent out their corn were paid for it by those in arms, by that security which they enjoyed from them.

CHAP. XXI.

Concerning John of Gischala. Josephus says Stratagems against the Plots John laid against him, and overcome certain Cities which had revolted from him.

1. Now as Josephus was thus engaged in the administration of the affairs of Galilee, there arose a treacherous person, a man of Gischala, the son of Levi, whose name was John. His character was hireling; so he got togs, and very knavish person, beyond the ordinary rate of the other men of eminence there, and for wicked practices he had not his fellow anywhere. Poor he was in name, and for a long time his wants were a hindrance to him in his wicked designs. He was a ready liar, and yet very sharp in gain- ing credit to his fictions; he thought it a point of virtue to delude people, and would delude even such as were the dearest to him. He was a hypocritical pretender to humanity; but where he had hopes of gain, he spared not the shedding of blood: his desires were ever carried to great things, and he encouraged his hopes from those mean wicked tricks with which he was the author of. He had a peculiar knack at thieving; but in some time he got certain companions in his impudent practices; at first they were but few, but as he proceeded on in his evil course, they became still more. Then he was given to the care that none of his partners should be easily caught in their rogueries, but those such out of the rest as had the strongest constitutions of body, and the greatest courage of soul, together with great skill in means of affaires; so he got a great deal of money from the rich citizens. He after that contrived a very shrewd trick, and pretending that the Jews who dwelt in Syria were obliged to make use of oil that was made by others than those of their own nation, got the men of Jerusalem to send oil to their borders: so he bought four amphore with such Tyrian money as was of the value of four Attic drachmes, and sold every half amphore at the same price. And as Galilee was very fruitful, and he got the Tyrians to engage him, by sending away great quantities, and having the sole privilege so to do, he gathered an immense sum of money together, which money he improved, was used to the disadvantage of him who gave him that privilege. And, as he supposed, that if he could overthrob Josephus, he should himself obtain the government of Galilee, so he gave orders to the robbers that were under his command, to be more zealous in their thievish expeditions, that, by the rise of many that desired innovations in the country, he might either catch their general in his snares, as he came to the country's assistance, and then kill him; or if he should overlook the robbers, he might receive the same for his negligence from the country. He also spread abroad a report far and near, that Josephus was delivering up the administration of affairs to the Romans: and many such plots did he lay in order to ruin him.

2. Now, as he thought this policy most likely to effect his design, he went to the king and queen, and deposited what they brought to him with Eneas, the most potent man of Tyre, with an intention of sending the things back to the owners at a proper time, which act he thought them going the greatest danger; for those that had stolen the things had an indignation at him, both because they gained no share of it for themselves, and because they perished by the violence of fire. He thought that this would be a great disorder in all the neighboring cities, insomuch that in the morning a hundred thousand armed men came running together; which multitude was crowded together in the hippodrome of the city, and there Josephus and the king and queen, and his friends, and the guards of his body, were so afflicted at this violent assault of the multitude, that they all fled away but four; and as he was asleep, he awoke and heard a great noise, and they were coming against him; while some cried out, that "they should depose the traitor;" and others, that "they should burn him." Now John irritated a great many, as did also Jesus the son of Sephar, whom Josephus says it was that Josephus's friends, and the guards of his body, were so afflicted at this violent assault of the multitude, that they all fled away but four; and as he was asleep, he awoke and heard a great noise, and they were coming against him; while some cried out, that "they should depose the traitor;" and others, that "they should burn him." Now John irritated a great many, as did also Jesus the son of Sephar, whom Josephus says it was that Josephus's friends, and the guards of his body, were so afflicted at this violent assault of the multitudes, that they all fled away but four; and as he was asleep, he awoke and heard a great noise, and they were coming against him; while some cried out, that "they should depose the traitor;" and others, that "they should burn him." saw that the armed men were about to draw their swords, they cried out; at which cry Josephus turned himself about, and when he saw that the swords were just at his throat, he marched away in great haste to the sea-shore, and left off that speech which he was going to make to the people, upon an elevation of six cubits high.

He then seized on a ship which lay in the haven, and leaped into it, with two of his guards, and fled away into the midst of the lake. But now the soldiers who had with him took up their arms immediately, and marched against the plotters: but Josephus was afraid lest a civil war should be raised by the envy of a few men, and so bring in other cities to that; so he condescended to his party to tell them, that they should do no more than provide for their own safety, that they should not kill any body, nor accuse any for the occasion they had afforded [of a disorder.] Accordingly, in order to persuade Josephus; and were quiet; but the people of the neighboring country, when they were informed of this plot, and of the plotter, got together in great multitudes to oppose John. But he prevented their attempt and fled away to Gischala, his native city, while the Galileans came running out of their several cities to Josephus; and as they were now become many thousands of armed men, they cried out that they were come against John, the contumacious, and it would and would at the same time burn him, and that city which had received him. Hereupon Josephus told them that he took their good-will to him kindly, but still he restrained their fury, and intended to conduct, rather than by slaying them; so he excepted those of every city which had joined in this revolt with John, by name, who had readily been showed him by those that came from every city, and cast them publicly into prison; and what was made, that he would seize upon the effects of those that did not forsake John within five days' time, and would burn both their houses and their families with them. Hereupon three thousand of John's party left him immediately, who came to Josephus, and threw their arms down at his feet. John then betook himself, together with his two thousand Syrian runagates, to open attempts to meet Josephus in the midst of Gischala, his native city, whereupon, he privately sent messengers to Jerusalem to accuse Josephus as having too great power, and to let them know that he would come, as a tyrant, to their metropolis, unless they prevented it. Thus these people, who were aware of beforehand, but had no regard to it. However, some of the grandees, out of envy, and some of the rulers also, sent money to John privately, that he might be able to get together mercenary soldiers; they also made a decree of themselves, and this for recalling him from his government; yet did they not think that decree sufficient; so they sent withal two thousand five hundred armed men, and four thousand of the most approved among them; Jossar, the son of Nomicus, and Aphanias, the son of Saduk, as also Simon and Judas, the sons of Jonathan, all very able men in speaking, that these persons might withdraw the good-will of the people from Josephus. These had it in charge, if he would voluntarily come away, they should permit him to [come and] give an account of his conduct, but if he obstinately insisted upon his continuing in his government, they should take him. Now Josephus's friends had sent him word that an army was coming against him, but they gave no notice beforehand what the reason of their coming was, that being only known among some secret counsellors of his enemies; and by this means it was that four cities revolted from him immediately, Sepphoris, and Gamala, and Gischala, and Tiberias. Yet did he recover these cities without war, and when he had routed those tation it was to say, nobody, commanded one Levius, belonging to his guards, to go out of the city, for it was the custom of the people that when Levius was afraid to go out by himself alone, to such a large body of enemies, and refused to go. Now Citius saw that Josephus was in great passion in the ship, and ready to leap out of it, in such a manner as to beggad therefore from the shore, that he would leave him one of his hands, which Josephus agreed to, upon condition that he would himself cut off the other hand; accordingly, he drew his sword, but did not cut off the other hand, but left, so great was the fear he was in of Josephus himself. And thus he took the people of Tiberias prisoners, and recovered the city again with empty ships; and seven of his guards, who were with him, and the rest of the people, brought one of the vessels, which had revolted with the people of Sepphoris, and gave his soldiers leave to plunder it; yet did he get all the plunder together, and restored it to the inhabitants, and the like he did to the inhabitants of Sepphoris, and to the rest of Tiberia.

For when he had subdued those cities, he had a mind, by letting them be plundered, to give them some good instruction, while at the same time he regained their good-will, by restoring them their money again.

CHAP. XXII.

The Jews make all ready for the War. And Simon the Son of Giornas falls to plundering.

§ 1. And thus were the disturbances of Galilee quieted, when, upon their ceasing to prosecute their civil dissensions, they betook themselves to make preparations for the war with the Romans, and the war in Transjordania in Jerusalem had been put off; and the great cities which had revolted in the war with the Romans, had betaken themselves to plundering. Although the multitude of the young men were engaged in exercises, without any regularity, and all places were full of tumultuous doings; but the most part of the people were exceedingly sad, and a great many there were who looked upon the prospects they had of the calamities that were coming upon them, made great lamentations. There were also such omen observed as were understood to be forerunners of evils, by such as understood them; and Josephus was told that kindled the war interpreted so as to suit their own inclinations; and the fact of the whole state of the city, even before the Romans came against it, was that of a place doomed to destruction. However, Ananus's case was in danger, in few days the Jews began to make their preparations for the war, and to persuade the seditiouss to consult their own interest, and to restrain the madness of those that had the name of zealots; for the violence was too hard for him, and what end he came to we shall relate hereafter.

2. But as for the Acrabbenes toparchy, Simeon, the son of Giornas, got a great number of those that were fond of innovations together, and began to assert his authority, and to make the leagues between them. He then gave orders to his ships, with the vessels which he had taken out of the ports which he had thus filled to sail away immediately for Tiberias, and to confine those men in the prison there; till at length he took all their senate, consisting of six hundred persons, and about two thousand of the populace, and carried them away to Tiberias.

CHAP. I.

_Vespasian is sent into Syria by Nero, in order to make War with the Jews._

§ 1. When Nero was informed of the Romans' ill success in Egypt, he conceived an exasperation and terror, as is usual in such cases, fell upon him; although he openly looked very big, and was very angry, and said that what had happened was rather owing to the negligence of the commander, than to any valor of the enemy: and as he thought it fit for him, who bore the burden of the whole empire, to despise such misfortunes, he now pretended so to do, and to have a soul superior to all such accidents whatsoever.
Vespasian, on the contrary, in his address to the people, showed how to recover his affairs again.

2. And as he was deliberating to whom he should commit the care of the east, now it was in so great a commotion, and who might be the best able to punish the Jews for their rebellion, and might prevent the same discomfiter from seizing upon the neighboring nations also; he found no one but Vespasian equal to the task, and able to undertake the great burden of so mighty a war, seeing he was growing an old man already in the camp, and from his youth had been exercised in warlike exploits: he was also a man that had long ago pacified the west, and made it subject to greatness; and having himself suffered abundance of distress from the disorder by the Germans; he had also recovered to them Britain by his arms, which had been little known before; whereby he procured to his father Claudius to have a triumph bestowed on him without any sweat or labor of his own.

3. So Nero esteemed these circumstances as favorable omens, and saw that Vespasian's age granted him sure experience, and great skill, and that he had his sons as hostages for his future;
and that the nourishing age they were in would make them fit instruments under his father's prudence. Perhaps also there was some interposition of Providence, which was paving the way for the Romans and opening others worse afterward. Upon the whole, be sent this man to take upon him the command of the armies that

WARs OF THE JEWS.

3. Yet were not the spirits of the Jews broken by so great a calamity, but the losses they had sustained rather quickened their resolution for other attempts; for, overlooking the dead bodies which lay under their feet, they were stirred by their former glorious actions to venture on a second destruction; so when they had lain still so little a while that their wounds were not thoroughly cured, they got together all their forces, and came with greater fury, and in much greater numbers, to Ascalon. But their former ill fortune followed them, as the consequence of their unskillfulness, and other deficiencies in war; for Antiochus laid ambuscades for them in the passages they were about to pass through, where they fell into snares unexpectedly, and where they were encompassed about with horsemen, before they could form themselves into a regular body for fighting, and crush their hands, and had received of them slain: so all the rest of them ran away, and with them Niger, who still did a great many bold exploits in his flight. However, they were driven along together by the enemy, who pressed hard upon them, into a certain strong tower belonging to a village called Bezetel. However, Antonius and his party, that they might neither spend any considerable time about this tower, which was hard to be taken, nor suffer their commander, and the means of escape, to be cut off, determined, after a long day's attempt, and the immediate loss of all the rest of them, to set the wall on fire; and as the tower was burning, the Romans went away rejoicing, as taking it for granted that Niger was destroyed; but he leaped out of the tower into a subterraneous passage, and the incendiarists got part of it, and what was preserved; and on the third day afterward he spoke out of the ground to those that with great lamentations were searching for him, in order to give him a decent funeral; and when he was rescued, and the event fulfilled all that was written in the expected joy, as though he were preserved by God's providence to be their commander for the time to come.

4. And now Vespasian took along with him his army from Antioch (which is the metropolis of Syria, and without dispute deserves the place of the third city in the habitable earth, that was under the Roman empire, both in magnitude, and other marks of prosperity,) where he found king Agrippa, and his son, and the Jews, all looking for the coming, and marched to Ptolemais. At this city also the inhabitants of Sepphoris of Galilee met him, who were for peace with the Romans. The Jews in the city had beforehand taken care of their own safety; and they have a tradition, that of the Romans, they had been with Cestius Gal- lus, before Vespasian came, and had given their faith to him, and received the security of his rigour to receive a Roman garrison; and at this time withal they received Vespasian, the Roman general, very kindly, and readily promised that they would assist him against their own countrymen. Now the general delivered them, at their desire, as many conveniencies, and legions as he thought sufficient to oppose the incursions of the Jews, if they should come against them. And indeed the danger of losing Sepphoris would be no small one, in this war which was going on, to the largest city of Galilee, and built in a place by nature very strong, and might be a security of the whole nation's [adelity to the Romans.]

CHAP. III.
A Description of Galilee, Samaria, and Judea.

1. Now Phœnicia and Syria encompass about the Galilees, which are two, and called the Upper Galilees, because they are banded toward the sun-setting, with the borders of the territory belonging to Ptolemais, and by Carmel; which mountain had formerly belonged to the Galileans, but now belonged to the Tyrians, to which mountain adjoins Gaba, which is called the city of horsemen, because those horsemen that were dismission by Herod the king dwelt therein. It is bounded on the south with Samaria and Scythopolis, as far as the river Jordan; on the east with Hiphspes and Gaderis, and also with Gaulanitis, and the borders of the kingdom of Agrippa; its northern parts are bounded by the Tyrians. As for that Galilee which is called the Lower, it extends in length from Tiberias to Zebalon, and of the maritime pieces Ptolemais is its neighborhood; its breadth is from the village called Galilee as far as Bersabe, from which beginning also is taken the breadth of the Upper Galilee, as far as the village Baca, which divides the land of the Tyrians from it; its length is also from Meloth to Thallis, a village near to Jericho.

2. These two Galilees, of so great largeness and encompassed with so many nations of foreigners, have been always able to make a strong resistance on all occasions of war; for the Galileans are inured to war from their infancy, and have been always very numerous; nor hath the country been ever destitute of men of courage, or wanted a numerous set of them: for their soil is fruitful, and fruitful in various sorts; and the plantations of trees of all sorts, inso much that it invites the most slothful to take pains in its cultivation, by its fruitfulness: accordingly it is all cultivated by its inhabitants, and no part of it lies idle. Moreover, the cities lie here and there, thick, and the very many villages there are here are everywhere so full of people, by the richness of their soil, that the very least of them contain above fifteen thousand inhabitants.

3. But the Lower Galilee is inferior to Pereæ in magnitude, he will be obliged to prefer it before it in its strength: for this is all capable of cultivation, and is every where fruitful; but for Pereæ, which is indeed much more the greater part of it, is desert and rough, and much less disposed for the production of the milder kinds of fruits; yet hath it a moist soil [in other parts, and produces all kinds of fruits, and its plains are planted with trees, and its vineyards, and its olive-groves, and its vines, vine and palm-tree, are chiefly cultivated there. It is also sufficiently watered with torrents, which issue out of the mountains, and with springs that never fail to run, even when the torrents fail themselves. Moreover, the length of Pereæ is from Macchera to Pella, and its breadth from Philadelphia to Jordan: its northern parts are bounded by Pella, as we have already said, as well as its western with Jordan; the land of Moab is its southern border, as the eastern limits reach to Arabia, and Sidonias, and besides to Philadelphene and Geraman.

4. Now, as to the country of Samaria, it lies between Judea and Galilee; it is navigable in a valley, and there is a great plain called Gilead, which ends at the Acrabene toparchy, and is entirely of the same nature with Judea; for both countries are made up of hills and valleys, and are much enough for agriculture, and are very fruitful. They have abundance of trees, and are full of autumnal fruit; both that which grows wild, and that which is the effect of cultivation. They are not naturally watered by many rivers, but receive moisture from the brooks which have no sound; and for those rivers which they have, all their waters are exceeding sweet: by reason also of the excellent grass they have, their cattle yield more milk than those in other places; and, with the greatest sign of excellence and of abundance, they each of them are very full of people.

5. In the limits of Samaria and Judea lies the Syrie, were Rome and Alexandria; nor is there any occasion for doubt in so plain a case.
village of Amathus, which is also named Boocaea.

This is the northern boundary of Judaea. The southern parts of Judaea, if they be measured longways, are bounded by a straight edge to the coast of Arabia; the Jews that dwell there call it Jordan. However, its breadth is extended from the river Jordan to Joppa. The city of Jerusalem is situated in the very middle; on which account, together with all, he joined them to that fifteenth legion which was with his father; eighteen cohorts followed these legions; there came also five cohorts from Caesarea, with one troop of horsemen, and five other troops of horsemen from thence. Now there was in these sailed that city the naval of the country. Nor indeed is Judaea destitute of such delights as come from the sea, since its maritime places extend as far as Ptolemais, it was parted in eleven portions, in which there are the two cities, and next to Acrabatta; after them Thamna, and Lydda, and Emmona, and Fella, and Idumea, and Engadi, and Herodium, and Jericho; and after them came Jamnia and Joppa, as presiding over the neighboring sea, as the head does over the body.
As to the other cities that were inferior to it, they presided over their several toparchies; Gophna was the toparchy of those cities, and next to that Acrabatta; after them Thamna, and Lydda, and Emmona, and Fella, and Idumea, and Engadi,
and Herodium, and Jericho; and after them
came Jamnia and Joppa, as presiding over the neighboring sea, as the head does over the body.

CHAP. IV.

Josephus makes an Attempt upon Sephoris, but is repelled. Titus comes with a great Army to Ptolemais.

1. Now the auxiliaries who were sent to assist the people of Sephoris, being a thousand horsemen, and the best of footmen, and the vicissitudes of auxiliaries to the region, and of the adjoining country, were very troublesome to Josephus and his men; they also plundered all the places that were out of the city's liberty, and intercepted such as durst go abroad.
Our army, not only always against the city, as hopings to take what he had lately encompassed with so strong a wall, before they revolved from the rest of the Galileans, that they had left behind them, to the (Petra) by which means he proved too weak, as failed of his hopes, both as to forcing the place, and as to his prevailing with the people of Sephoris to delivery it up to him. By this means he provoked the Romans to treat the country according to the law of war; nor did the Romans, out of the anger they bore at this attempt, leave off either by night or by day burning the places in the plain, and stealing away the cattle that were in the country, and not sparing those which were com-pable of lighting, perpetually, and leading the weaker people as slaves into captivity; so that Galilee was all over filled with fire and blood; or was it exempted from any kind of misery and cruelty, so that they were not only made, or when they were pursued, they could retire to the cities which had walls built them by Josephus.

2. But as to Titus, he sailed over from Acre

A Description of the Roman Armies, and their Campos; and of other particulars for which the Romans are commended.

1. Now here one cannot but admire at the precaution of the Romans, in providing themselves of such household servants, as might not only serve at other times for the common offices of life, but might be trained to the purposes of their wars. And, indeed, if any one does but at-end to the other parts of their military discipline, be will be forced to confess, that their obtaining so large a dominion hath been the acquisition of their valor, as the means of obtaining it; for they do not begin to use their weapons first in time of war, nor do they then put their hands first into motion, while they avoided so to do in times of peace; but as if their weapons did always cling to them, they were ever ready to warlike exercise; nor do they stay till times of war admonish them to use them; for their mi-itary exercises differ not at all from the real use of their arms, but every day is ever day exercised, and this is the daily diligence as it if it were in time of war, which is the reason why they bear the fatigue of battles so easily; for neither can any disorder remove them from their usual regularity, nor can fear allay them out of it, so nor can labor tire them: which firmness of conduct makes them always to overcome those that have not the same firmness; nor would he be mistaken that should call those exercises unbloody battles, and those the things of their enemies easily surprise them with the sud-leness of their incursions; for as soon as they have marched into an enemy's land, they do not be-

sion to Alexandria, and that sooner than the winter season did usually permit; so he took with those forces he was sent for, and marching with very like to the symmetry and regularity of the people of Israel in the wilderness, (see the description of

ple, that the one was the ultimate pattern of the other and that the tactics of the ancients were taken from rules given by God to Moses. And it is thought by

2. As for what is within the camp, it is set apart for tents, but the outward circumference hath the resemblance to a wall, and is adorned with towers at equal distances, where between the towers stand the engines for throwing arrows, darts, and sling stones, and where they lay all other engines that can annoy the enemy, all ready for their several operations. They also erect four gates, one at every side of the circumference, and those large enough for the time that the beasts to go in and out enough for making excursions, if occasion should require. They divide the camp within into streets very conveniently, and place the tents of the commanders in the middle, but in the very midst of all. Some have their own tent, in the nature of a temple, inasmuch that it appears to be a city built on the sudden; with its market-place, and place for handicraft trades, and with seats for the officers, superior and inferior, where, if any dispute arises, is drawn the whole, whose depth is four cubits, and its breadth equal.

3. When they have thus secured themselves, they sive together by companies, with quietness and decency, as are all their other affairs managed. Their country and security. Each company hath also their wood and their corn, and their water brought them, when they stand in need of them; for they neither sup nor dine as they please themselves singly, but all together. Their times also for sleeping, waking, and rising, are notified beforehand by the sound of trumpets, nor is any thing done without a signal; and in the morning the soldier go every one to their companies, where the centurions, their tribunes, to salute them; with whom all the superior officers go to the general of the whole army, who then gives them of course the watchword and other orders, to be by them carried to all that are under their command; which is also observed when they go to fight, and thereby they turn themselves about on the sudden, when there is occasion for making sallies, as they come back when they are recalled in crowds also.

4. When they are to go out of their camp, the trumpet gives a sound, at which time nobody lies still, but at the first intimation they take down their tents, and all is made ready for their going out; then do the trumpets sound again, to once more prepare them to the charge; then do they lay their baggage suddenly upon their mules, and other beasts of burden, and stand, as at the place of starting, ready to march: when also they set fire to their camp, and this they do because it will be easy for them to erect another camp, and that it may not ever be of use to their enemies. Then do the trumpets give a sound the third time, that they are to go out, in order to appear to the enemy as they are going to war; then do the trumpets sound again, so that not a man may be out of his place, when the army marches. Then does the centurion stand at the general's right hand, and asks them thrice in their own tongue, whether they be now ready to go on foot or not, to which they answer with a loud and cheerful voice, saying, We are ready. And this they do almost before the question is asked them: they do this as filled with a kind of martial fury, and at the same time when they cry out, they lift up their right hands also.

5. When, after this, they are gone out of their camp, they all march without noise, and in a decent manner, and every one keeps his own rank, so it they were going to war. The footmen are armed with breastplates and head-covers skilful in these matters, that these accounts of Josephus as to the Roman camp and armor, and common pieces, and have swords on each side, but the sword which is upon their left side is much longer than the other, for that on the right side is not longer than a span. Those footmen also that are chosen out from the rest to be about the general's person, because he is armed with a buckler, but the rest of the foot soldiers, have a spear, and a long buckler, besides a saw and a bucket, a pickaxe, and an axe, a thong of leather, and a hook, with provisions for three days, so that a footman hath as great need of bread, salt, and meat as of spears. They have also head-pieces, and breastplates, in like manner as have all the footmen. And for those that are chosen to be about the general, their armor noway differs from that of the common soldiers, except for which reason they only arm themselves; and whereas the guards commit no errors, and if they have been mistook at any time, they easily correct those mistakes. They also esteem any errors they commit upon taking counsel beforehand, to be better than the chance of success as is owing to fortune only; because such a fortunate advantage tempt them to be inconsiderate, while consultation, though it may sometimes fail of success, hath never failed of that, which goes according to their counsel hereafter; but for the advantages that arise from chance, they are not owing to him that gains them; and as to what melancholy accidents happen unexpectedly, there is this comfort in them, that they had now taken the best consultations they could to prevent them.

6. They are as the manner of the marching and resting of the Romans, as also the ways they have for the same: But when they go to fight, they leave nothing without forecast, nor to be done off hand, but counsel is ever first taken before any work is begun, and what hath been there resolved upon is put in practice. If any soldier commits any errors, and if they have been mistook at any time, they easily correct those mistakes. They also esteem any errors they commit upon taking counsel beforehand, to be better than the chance of success as is owing to fortune only; because such a fortunate advantage tempt them to be inconsiderate, while consultation, though it may sometimes fail of success, hath never failed of that, which goes according to their counsel hereafter; but for the advantages that arise from chance, they are not owing to him that gains them; and as to what melancholy accidents happen unexpectedly, there is this comfort in them, that they had now taken the best consultations they could to prevent them.

7. Nevertheless, they so manage their preparatory exercises of their weapons, that not the bodies of the soldiers only, but their souls, may also be exercised. They are thus made ready for the war by fear, for their laws inflict capital punishments, not only for soldiers running away from their ranks, but for slothfulness and inactivity, though it be but in a lesser degree; as are their punishments for deserters. But they also prevent any imputation of cruelty toward those under condemnation, by the great rewards that are bestowed on the valiant soldiers; and the readiness of obeying their commanders is so great, that it is very ornamental in peace; but when they come to a battle, the whole army is but one body, so well coupled together are their ranks, so sudden are their turnings about, so sharp their hearing, as to what orders are given them; so quick a change of their forwards, and so nimble are their hands when they set to work; whereby it comes to pass, that what they do is done quickly, and what they suffer they bear with the greatest satisfaction. Now if any of them for their victories have been severer to them than fortune could have granted them. In a case, therefore, where counsel still goes before action, and where, after taking the best advice, that advice is followed by so active an army, what wonder is it if Empires, seated on the east, the ocean on the west, the most fertile in war, are profitable to them in the Roman authors themselves.
regions of Libya on the south, and the Danube and the Rhine on the north, are the limits of the empire? One might well say, that the Roman provinces are not inferior to the Roman themselves.

3. This account I have given the reader, not so much with the intention of commending the Romans for their own legions, those who have been conquered by them, and for the deterring others from attempting innovations under their government. This discourse of the Roman military conduct may also perhaps be of use to such of the curious as are ignorant of it, and yet have a mind to know it. I return now from this digression.

CHAP. VI.

Scipio attempts to take Jotapata, and is beaten off. Vespasian marches into Galilee.

§ 1. And now Vespasian, with his son Titus, had tarried some time at Ptolemais, and had put his army in order. But when Scipio, who had observed the weakness of the Galileans, and such as were of timorous souls, saw that the warriors ran always to those cities which were been burnt by Jews, he determined furtively against Jotapata, which was of them all the strongest, as supposing he should easily take it by a sudden surprise, and that he should thereby obtain great honor among his officers, and bring a great advantage to them in their future campaign; because if this strongest place of them all were once taken, the rest would be so affrighted as to surrender themselves. But he was mightily mistaken in his undertaking; for the men of Jotapata were apprised of his coming to attack them, and came out of the city, and expected him there. So they fought the Romans briskly when they least expected it, being both many in numbers, and things ready for fighting, and of great alacrity, as esteeming their country, their wives, and their children, to be in danger, and easily put the Romans to flight, and wounded many of them, and slew seven of them, because their rest was not extrodinary manner; because the strokes only touched the surface of their bodies, which were covered with their armor in all parts, and because the Jews did rather throw their weapons upon them from a distance, as in a line of battle; for they had a band with them, and had only light armor on, while the others were completely armed. However, three men of the Jews' side were slain, and a few wounded; so Scipio, finding himself unable to assault the city, gave the enemy in a retreat.

2. But as Vespasian had a great mind to fall upon Galilee, he marched out to Ptolemais, having put his army into that order wherein the Romans used to march. He ordered those auxiliaries without, and the archers to march first, that they might prevent any sudden insul from the enemy, and might search out the woods that looked suspiciously, and were wooded for ambushes. Next came the horses, followed that part of the Romans who were completely armed, both footmen and horsemen. Next to these followed ten out of every hundred, carrying along with them their arms, and what was necessary to take up a camp, and after them, such as were to make the road even and straight, and if it were any where rough and hard to be passed over, to plain it, and to cut down th: woods that hindered their march, that the army might not be in distress, or tired with over with their armor, and the Jews fought at some distance: his meaning is clear, that these were the reasons why the war was not set down, but perhaps, somewhere supplied by the pronuntiation. Thus Josephus here says, that those of Jotapata slew seven of the Romans, as they were marching; but the Romans' retreat was regular their bodies were covered with their armor, and the Jews fought at some distance: his meaning is clear, that these were the reasons why the war was not set down, but perhaps, somewhere supplied by the pronuntiation. Thus Josephus here says, that those of Jotapata slew seven of the Romans, as they were marching; but the Romans' retreat was regular only in the city itself, but to all the villages and small cities that were round about it; some of them were quite destitute of inhabitants, and out of some of them he carried the inhabitants as slaves into captivity.

 Aside from that, his retiring to that city, which he chose as the most fit for his security, put it into great fear; for the people of Tiberias did not imagine that he would have run away, unless he had entirely despaired of the success of the attack. And indeed, as to that point, they were not mistaken about his opinion; for he saw whether the affairs of the Jews would tend at last, and was sensible that they had but one way of escaping, and that was by repentance. However, as the Romans expected this, the Jews would forgive him, yet did he choose to die many times over, rather than to betray his country, and to dishonor that supreme command of the army which had been entrusted with him, or to live: so that he was by him taken as he was about to flight. He determined, therefore, to give an exact account of affairs to the principal men at Jerusalem by a letter, that he might not by too much exaggerating the power of the enemy, make them despair. He therefore, in their power beneath the truth, might encourage them to stand out when they were perhaps disposed to repentance. He also sent them word, that if they thought of coming to terms, they might send him word; or if they resolved upon war, they must send him an army sufficient to fight the Romans. Accordingly, he wrote these things, and sent messengers immediately to carry his letter to Jerusalem.

3. Now Vespasian was very desirous of demolishing Jotapata, for he had gotten intelligence that the greatest part of the enemy had retired thither, and that it was, on other accounts, a place of strength to them. Accordingly, he sent both footmen and horsemen to level the road, which was mountainous and rocky, not without difficulty to be travelled over by footmen, but absolutely impracticable for horsemen. Now these horsemen accomplished all that they were about in four days' time, and opened a broad way for the army. On the fifth day, which was the twenty-first of the month Artemius (Jyar), Josephus prevented him, and came from Tiberias to Jotapata, and raised the drooping spirits of the Jews. And a certain deserter told this good news to Vespasian, that Josephus had removed himself thither, which made him make haste to the city, as supposing, that with the help of Josephus he should take the city, in case he could but withal get Josephus under his power. So he took this news to be of the greatest advantage to him, and believed it to be brought about by the providence of God, that he who appeared to be the most proudest man of all their enemies, had of his own accord shut himself up in a place of sure custody. Accordingly, he sent Flaccus with a thousand horsemen, and Eubutus a deceiver, a person that was of eminency both in morals and in action, to encompass the city round, that Josephus might not escape away privately.

4. Vespasian also, the very next day, took his wife to Jotapata with him; and they arrived there till late in the evening, arrived at Jotapata; and bringing his army to the northern side of the city, he pitched his camp on a certain small hill which was seven furlongs from the city, and still greater strength was to be added by the enemy, to put them into a constellation; which was indeed so terrible to the Jews immediately, that no one of them durst go out beyond the wall. Yet did the Romans put off the attack at that time, because they had marched all the day, although they placed a double row of battalions round the city, with a third row beyond them round the whole which consisted of cavalry, in order to stop up every way for an exit; which thing making the Jews despair of escaping, excited them to act more boldly; for nothing makes man fight so desperately as war necessity.

5. Now when an assault was made the next day, however the Jews had been frightened out of the walls, and opposed them, and met them, as having formed themselves a camp, before the city walls. But when Vespasian had set against them the archers and slingers, and the multitude, as he had been expected the Romans would forgive him, yet did he choose to die many times over, rather than to betray his country, and to dishonor that supreme command of the army which had been entrusted with him, or to live: so that he was by him taken as he was about to flight. He determined, therefore, to give an exact account of affairs to the principal men at Jerusalem by a letter, that he might not by too much exaggerating the power of the enemy, make them despair. He therefore, in their power beneath the truth, might encourage them to stand out when they were perhaps disposed to repentance. He also sent them word, that if they thought of coming to terms, they might send him word; or if they resolved upon war, they must send him an army sufficient to fight the Romans. Accordingly, he wrote these things, and sent messengers immediately to carry his letter to Jerusalem. On the fifth day, which was the twenty-first of the month Artemius (Jyar), Josephus prevented him, and came from Tiberias to Jotapata, and raised the drooping spirits of the Jews. And a certain deserter told this good news to Vespasian, that Josephus had removed himself thither, which made him make haste to the city, as supposing, that with the help of Josephus he should take the city, in case he could but withal get Josephus under his power. So he took this news to be of the greatest advantage to him, and believed it to be brought about by the providence of God, that he who appeared to be the most proudest man of all their enemies, had of his own accord shut himself up in a place of sure custody. Accordingly, he sent Flaccus with a thousand horsemen, and Eubutus a deceiver, a person that was of eminency both in morals and in action, to encompass the city round, that Josephus might not escape away privately.

4. Vespasian also, the very next day, took his wife to Jotapata with him; and they arrived there till late in the evening, arrived at Jotapata; and bringing his army to the northern side of the city, he pitched his camp on a certain small hill which was seven furlongs from the city, and still greater strength was to be added by the enemy, to put them into a constellation; which was indeed so terrible to the Jews immediately, that no one of them durst go out beyond the wall. He also sent them word, that if they thought of coming to terms, they might send him word; or if they resolved upon war, they must send him an army sufficient to fight the Romans. Accordingly, he wrote these things, and sent messengers immediately to carry his letter to Jerusalem.

6. On the next day the Jews made an attack upon the Romans, and went out of the walls, and fought a much more desperate battle with them than before. For they were now become more courageous than formerly, and that on account of the unexpected good opposition they had made the day before; as they found the Romans also to fight more desperately; for a sense of shame inflamed these into a passion, as enemies. They fought as if they had nothing to do but to finish that kind of defeat. Thus did the Romans try to make an impression upon the Jews, till the fifth day continually, while the people of Jotapata made sallies out, and fought at the walls most desperately; nor were the Jews affrighted at the strength of the enemy, nor were the Romans discouraged at the difficulties they met with in taking the city.

7. Now Jotapata is almost all of it built on a precipitous rock; on all the other sides of it, river valleys immensely deep and steep, inaccessible, that those who would look down would have their sight fail them before it reaches to the bottom. It is only to be come at on the north side, where the ground is flat, but is not certain, as it ends obliquely at a plain. This mountain Josephus had encompassed with a wall when he fortified the city, that its top might not be capable of being seized upon by the enemies. The city is confined by a ditch of which no messenger can and noway be seen till a man comes just upon it. And this was the strong situations of Jotapata.

8. Josephus, therefore, in order to try how he might overcome the natural strength of the place, as well as the bold defence of the Jews, made a resolution to prosecute the siege with vigour. To that end he called the commanders of the army, both by an edict, and by an interview, and consulted with them which way the enemy A might be managed to the best advantage. And when the resolution was there taken to raise a bank against that part of the wall which was not encompassed by the materials together. So when they had cut down all the trees on the mountains that adjoined to the city, and had gotten together a vast heap of stones, besides the wood they had cut down, some of them brought hedges, in order to use the effects of the darts that were shot from above them. These hurdles they spread over these banks, under cover whereof they formed their that came to assault as also with the setting fire to all the other works; and this till Vespasian made his army leave off fighting them, and resolved to lie round the city, and to starve them into a surrender, as supposing that either they would be forced to petition him for mercy by want of provisions, or, if they should have the courage to hold out till the last, they should perish by famine: and he concluded he should conquer them the more easily in fighting, if he gave them an interval, and then fell upon them when they were weakened by fasting: and he sent orders that they should guard against their coming out of the city.

12. Now the besieged had plenty of corn within the walls, and all other necessaries, but they wanted water, because there was no fountain in the city, the people being there usually satisfied with rain water; yet it is a rare thing in that country to have rain in summer; and at this season, during the siege, they were in great distress for some contrivances to satisfy their thirst; and they were very sad at this time particularly, as if they were already in want of water entirely, for Josephus, seeing that the city abounded with all other necessaries, but the men were of good courage, and being dearest to protect the siege to the Romans longer than they expected, ordered their drink to be given them by measure; but this scanty distribution of water by measure, made the distress of the thing more hard upon them than the want of it; and their not being able to drink as much as they would, made them more desirous of drinking than they otherwise would have, nay, they were so much desirous of it that they would come to the last degree of thirst. Nor were the Romans unacquainted with the state they were in, for when they stood over against them, beyond the wall, they seeing them running to and fro, and taking their water in measure, which made them throw their javelins thither, the place being within their reach, and kill a great many of them.

13. Hereupon Vespasian hoped that their receptacles of water would in no long time be emptied, and that they would be forced to deliver up the city to him; but Josephus being minded to break such his hope, gave command that the more part of the stones and stuff that stood in the city, as city, like private robbers, by parties, and pulled away the hurdles that covered the workmen, and killed them when they were thus naked; and when those workmen gave way, these cast away the earth that covered them; for that the wooden parts of it, together with the hurdles, till at length Vespasian perceived that the intervals there between the works were of easy access, and then afforded the Jews a place for assaulting the Romans. So he united the hurdles, and at the same time joined one part of the army to the other, which prevented the private excursions of the Jews.

10. And when the bank was now raised, and brought nearer than ever to the battlements that belonged to the walls, Josephus thought it would be entirely wrong in him if he could make no contempt of them; for they should withdraw themselves and hang them out about the battlements, till the entire wall was of sudden all wet with the running down of the water. At this sight the Romans were discouraged, and under consternation, when they saw the city covered with water which made the boats move as in sport so much water, when they supposed not to have enough to drink themselves. This made the Roman general desirous of taking the city by their want of necessaries, and to entice him to a surrender, which was what the Jews greatly desired; for, as they despaired of either themselves or their city being able to escape, they preferred the death in battle before one by hunger and thirst.

14. However, Josephus contrived another stratagem besides the foregoing, to get plenty of what they wanted. There was a certain rough sort of house and uneven part of the city, and the Romans, who, in their own opinions, were already gotten within the walls, while they were now at once astonished at Josephus's contrivance, and at the multitude of the citizens that were out of the city. And now Vespasian was plainly irritated at the great subtilty of this stratagem, and at the boldness of the citizens of Jotapata; for, taking heart again upon the building of this which now stood upon the fresh mounds upon the Romans, and had every day conflicts with them by parties, together with all such contrivances as robbers made use of, and with the slaughter of all and encompassed that rough place about themselves. 15. And now it was that Josephus perceived that the city could not hold out long, and that his own life would be in doubt if he continued in it;
so he counselled how he and the most potent men of the city might fly out of it. When the multitude understood this, they came all round about him, and begged of him, "not to overlook them while they entirely depended on him, and him alone; for that now the whole of the city is in deliriance, if he would stay with them, because every body would undertake any pains with great cheerfulness on his account, and in that case there would be some comfort for them also, though they had always been driven to flight. That, if they dismiss him not, he may fly with his men ther to fly from his enemies, nor to desert his friends, nor to leap out of that city, as out of a ship that was sinking in a storm, into which he came when it was quiet and in a calm; for that by going away he would be the cause of drowning the city, because nobody would then venture to oppose the enemy when he was once gone, upon whom they wholly confided."

16. Josephus avoided letting them know that he was to go away to provide for his own safety, but told them, that "he would not go out of the city for their sakes; for that if he should with them, he should be able to do them what they were in safe conditions; and that if they were once taken he should only perish with them to no purpose: but that if he were once gotten free from this siege, he should be able to bring them very great relief; for that he would not immediately get the Galileans to gather out of the country, in great multitudes, and draw the Romans out of their city by another war. That he did not see what advantage he could bring to them now by staying among them, but that he would bring more by immediately these them more closely, as esteeming it a most valuable thing to take him; but that if they were once informed that he was fled out of the city, they would greatly remit of their eagerness against it. Yet did not this thing move the people, but infamed them the more to hang about him. Accordingly, both the children and the old men, and the women with their infants, came mourning to him, and fell down before him, and all of them cast their hands on his feet, and besought him with great lamentations, that he would take his share with them in their fortune; and I think they did this, not that they envied my deliverance, but that they hoped for their own;
for they thought they should have suffered any great misfortune, provided Josephus would but stay with them."

17. Now Josephus thought, that if he resolved to stay, it would be accursed to their entreaties, and if he resolved to go away by force, he should be put into custody. His commiseration of the people under their lamentations had much broken that his eagerness to leave them; so he resolved to stay, and make himself with the common despair of the citizens, he said to them,
"now is the time to begin to fight in earnest, when there is no hope of deliverance left. It is a brave thing to prefer glory before life, and to be considered so much noble, as may be remembered by late posterity." Having said this, he fell to work immediately, and made sidy, and dispersed the enemies out-guards, and ran as far as the Roman camp itself, and pulled off their chief pieces of their equipment, that were upon their banks, and set fire to their works.
And this was the manner in which he never left off fighting, neither the next day, nor the day after it, but went on with it for a considerable number of days and nights. Upon this,

18. Upon this, Vespasian, when he saw the Romans distressed by these assailants, (though they were ashamed to be made to run away by the Jews; and when at any time they made the Jews run away, their heavy armor would not let them pursue them far, while the Jews, when they had performed any action, and before they could be hurt themselves, still retired into the city,) ordered them not to avoid their own nests, and not fight it out with men under desperation, while nothing is more courageous than despair; but that their violence would be quenched when they saw they failed of their purposes, as fire is quenched when we fill it with fuel. And such advice he gave for the Romans to gain their victories as cheap as they could, since they are not forced to fight, but only to enlarge their own dominions. So he repeled the Jews in a great measure by the Ars aeum, and the Aubeus, and the Volcini, and those that threw stones at them, nor was there any intermission of the great number of their offensive engines. Now the Jews suffered greatly by these engines, without being able to escape from them, and the assault of these engines, that can reach or javelin a great way, and the Jews were with their reach, they pressed hard upon the Ro-

19. When, therefore, Vespasian looked upon themselves as in a manner besieg'd by these assailants of the Jews, and when his banks were now a-crumbled, he renewed the former condition of his opening of his battering ram. This battering ram is a very large piece of wood like the mast of a ship; its forepart is arched with a thick piece of iron at the head of it, which is so carved as to be like the head of a ram, where its name is taken. The ram is slung in the air by ropes passing over its middle, and is hung like the balance in a pair of scales from another beam, and braced by strong beams that pass on both sides of it, in the nature above, had only a few, and the like number of great number of men with united force, and then forth forward by the same men, with a mighty oise, it batters the wall with that iron part which is prominent. Nor is there any tower so thoug that the archers and slings are carried to the top of it, to yield it to last. This was the experiment which the Roman general betook himself to,
when he was eagerly bent upon taking the city, and upon the benefit of this, the advantage, because the Jews would never let them be quiet. So these Romans

This brought matters to such a pass that none of the Jews durst shun the walls, and then it was that the other Romans brought the battering ram that was cased with huddles all over, and in the upper part was secured with skins that could only be removed by force of the engine; with this design he gave orders to fill sacks with chaff and sand, and to fill them with pieces of stones, that when they saw the ram always battering, that the stroke might be turned aside, or that the place might feel less of the strokes by the yielding na ture of the chaff. This contrivance very much helped them, for the amount of the Romans let them remove their engines to what part they pleased, those that were above it removed their sacks, and placed them over against the strokes BOOK III.—CHAP. VII.

It made, inasmuch that the wall was now built, and this by diversion of the strokes. Ill the Romans made an opposite contrivance of long poles, and by tying hooks at their ends, cut off the stacks. Now when the battering ram thus recovered its force, and the wall, having been but many few days since thrown down upon them, fell upon those who had the protection of the hurdles, with fire, and iron weapons, and stones; and these could do little or nothing, but fell themselves perpetually, while they were seen by those whom they could not see, for the light of the day or the moon, and the bands of the Romans themselves; nor did the Romans well know how to come to their assistance, being at once under a consternation at the great boldness, and being prevented by the flames from coming to the assistance of the materials being dry with the bitumen and pitch that were among them, as was brimstone also; the fire caught hold of every thing immediately, and what cost the Romans a great deal of pains was in one hour consumed.

21. And here a certain Jew appeared worthy of our relation and commendation; he was the son of Samaas, and was called Eleazar, and was born to the name of Simeon. This up, by what happened this day, was a stone of a vast bigness, and threw it down from the wall upon the ram, and this with so great a force that it broke off the head of the engine. He also leaped down, and took up the head of the ram, and killed an hundred with child with it. What could concern it to the top of the wall, and this while he stood as a fit mark to be pelted by all his enemies. Accordingly, he received the strokes upon his naked body, and was wounded with five darts; yet the sound of the darts and stones that were thrown by them was so also; of the same sort was that noise the dead bodies made, when they were dashed against the wall; and indeed dreadful was the clamor which these things raised in the heart of the city, which was also to be heard back at the same time by the cries of such as were slain; while the whole space of ground whereon they fought ran with blood; and the wall might have been ascended over by bodies of the dead carcasses; the mountaine also contributed to increase the noise by their echoes, nor was there on that night any thing of terror wanting, that could either affect the hearing or the sight; yet did a great part of those that fought so hard for Jerusalem maintain a great part of them wounded. However, the morning watch was come ere the wall yielded to the machines employed against it, though it had interrupted, and the city, which was besieged, had been battered to pieces; and those within covered their bodies with their armor, and raised works over against that part which was thrown down, before those machines were laid, by which the Romans were to ascend into the city.

22. After these men's performances, Josephus, as he was wont, of the multitude that stood round about Josephus was near the wall, his head was carried away by such a stone, and his skull was flung as far as three furlongs. In the day-time also, a woman fell upon her belly, and was hurt with child, and was just come out of her house, that the infant was carried to the distance of half a furlong, so great was the force of that engine. The noise of the instruments themselves was very terrible; and the noises of the darts and stones that were thrown by them was so also; of the same sort was that noise the dead bodies made, when they were dashed against the wall; and indeed dreadful was the clamor which these things raised in the heart of the city, which was also to be heard back at the same time by the cries of such as were slain; while the whole space of ground whereon they fought ran with blood; and the wall might have been ascended over by bodies of the dead carcasses; the mountaine also contributed to increase the noise by their echoes, nor was there on that night any thing of terror wanting, that could either affect the hearing or the sight; yet did a great part of those that fought so hard for Jerusalem maintain a great part of them wounded. However, the morning watch was come ere the wall yielded to the machines employed against it, though it had interrupted, and the city, which was besieged, had been battered to pieces; and those within covered their bodies with their armor, and raised works over against that part which was thrown down, before those machines were laid, by which the Romans were to ascend into the city.

24. In the morning Vesuvius got his army together, in order to take the city [by storm]; after a little recreation upon the hard pains they had been at the night before; and as he was desirous to draw off the men that opposed them from all the places where the wall had been thrown down, he made the most courageous of the horsemen get off their horses, and placed them in three ranks over against these ruins of the wall, but covered over with their armor, and had them carry with them in their hands, that so these might begin their ascent as soon as the instruments for such ascent were laid; behind them he placed the flower of the footmen; but for the rest of the horse, he ordered them to extend themselves over against the wall, upon the whole hilly country, in order to prevent any from escaping out of the city when it should be taken; and behind these he placed about the awnings round about, and commanded them to have all their tents ready to pitch. The same commands he gave to the slingers, and to those that managed the engines and bade them to take up either ladders, and have them ready to lay upon those parts of the wall which were yet untouched, that the besieged might be engaged in trying to hinder their ascent by them, and leave the guard of the parts that were then down, while the rest of them should be overborne by the darts cast at them, and might afford his men an entrance into the city.

25. But Josephus, understanding the meaning of Vespasian's consternation, set the old men, together with those that were tired out, at the sound parts of the wall, as expecting no harm from those quarters, but set the strongest of his men at the place where the wall was broken down, and before them all six men by the shield, among whom he took his share of the first and greatest anger. He also gave orders, that "when the legions made a shout they should stop their ears, that they might not be affrighted at it, and that, to avoid the multitude of the enemies' darts, they should bend down on their knees, and cover themselves with their shields, and that they should retreat a little backward for a while, till the archers should have emptied their quivers; but that, when they should have emptied their instruments by ascending the walls, they should leap out on the sudden, and with their own instruments should meet the enemy, and that every one should strive to do the best, in order, not to defend himself if it were not able to be preserved, but in order to revenge it, when it was already destroyed; and that they should set before their eyes how their old men were to be slain, and their children and wives were to be killed by the enemy, and that they would beforehand spend all their fury on account of the calamities just coming upon them, and pour it out on the actors."

26. And thus did Josephus dispose of both his body and his forces for the useless part of the citizens, the women and children, when they saw their city encompassed by a threefold army, (for some of the naval guards, that had been fighting before, were removed,) when they also saw, not only the walls thrown down, but their enemies, with swords in their hands, as also the hilly country above them, stinging with their weapons, and the darts in the hands of the Arabians archers, they made a loud and lamentable outcry of the misfortune, as if they were threatened, but actually come upon them already. But Josephus ordered the women to be shut up in their houses, lest they should render the war-like men too effeminate, by making them commiserate their condition, and command them to hold their peace, and threatened them if they did not, while he came himself before the breach, where his allotment was; for all those who had stood on the other places, took no notice of them, but earnestly waited for the shower of arrows that was coming.

27. And now the trumpeters of the several Roman legions sounded together, and the army made a shout, and the darts flew so fast, that they intercepted the light. However, Josephus's men remembered the charges he had given them; they stopped their ears at the sounds, and covered their bodies against the darts, but as they had only to go to work, the Jews ran out upon them, before those that should have used them were gotten upon them. And now, on the ascending of the soldiers, there was a great conflict, and many accidents: some erred, and of the shield, were exhibited, while the Jews did earnestly endeavor, in the extreme danger they were in, not to show less courage than those who, without being in danger, fought so stoutly against them, nor did they run away with the Romans till they either fell down dead themselves, or killed their antagonists. But the Jews grew weary with defending themselves continually, and had not snow to come in their places, and succor them; while on the side of the Romans fresh men still succeeded those that were tired, and still new men soon got upon the machines for ascent, in the roads, in the gaps, on the walls, surrounding one another, and joining side to side with their shields, which were a protection to them, they became a body of men not to be broken, and as this brand thrust away the Jews, as though they were themselves but one body, they began already to get upon the wall.

28. Then did Josephus take necessity for his counsellor in this utmost distress, (which necessity is very sagacious in invention when it is irrevocable,) and gave orders to pour scalding oil upon those whose shields protected them. Whereupon they soon got it ready, being many that brought it, and what they brought being a great quantity also, and poured it on all sides upon the Romans, and threw down upon them their vessels as they were still hissing from the heat of the fire; this so burnt the Romans, that it dispersed that united band, who now tumble down from the wall, with horrid pains, for the oil did not only sting the burning place, but carried out, foot, under their entire armor, and fed upon their flesh like flame itself, its fat andunctuous nature rendering it soon heated, and slowly cooled, and as the men were cooped up in their head-piece, the flesh being not able to be cut free from this burning oil; they could only leap and roll about in their pains, as they fell down from the bridges they had laid. And as they thus were beaten back, and retired to their own vessels, their hearts were, for the most, easily wounded by those that were behind them.

29. However, in this ill success of the Romans their courage did not fail them, nor did the Jews want prudence to oppose them; for the Romans, although they had their own means of war, and in a miserable condition, yet were they vehemently bent against those that poured the oil upon them, while every one reproached the man before him as a coward, and one that hindered him from exerting himself; and while the Jews made use of another stratagem to prevent their ascent, and poured boiling fenugreek upon the boards in order to make them slip and fall down; by which means neither could those that were confined on that side, nor those that were to stand on their feet; but some of them fell backward upon the machines on which they ascended, and were trodden upon; many of them fell down upon the bank they had raised, and when the soldiers went down again, the Romans fell; for when the Romans could not keep their feet, the Jews being freed from fighting hand to hand, had leisure to throw their darts at them. So the general of the Romans, those soldiers in the evening that had suffered so sorely, of whom the number of the slain was not a few, while that of the wounded was so great; but of the people of Jotapata no more than six men were killed, although, as the hundred of the thousand, were wounded off wounded. This fight happened on the twentieth day of the month Desius [Sivan].

30. Hereupon Vespasian consoled his army on occasion of what happened; and as he found the forces not yet set ready to do than any further exhortations, he gave orders to raise the banks still higher, and to erect three towers, each fifty feet high, and that they should cover them with plates of iron on every side, and burn with fire engines, and not easily liable to be set on fire. These towers he set upon the banks, and placed upon them such as could shoot darts and arrows, with the lighter engines for throwing stones and darts along with them, and besides the Jews, the stoutest men among the slingers, who not being to be seen by reason of the height they stood upon, and the battles that protected them vice was, that they should make their attack at that hour. But Vespasian had a suspicion about this deserter, as knowing how faithful the Jews were to one another, and how much they despised all associations with their own hands infected with them: this last, because one of the people of Josephus had undergone all sorts of torments, and though they made him pass through a fiery trial of his enemies in his examination, yet would he not admit the monstrous falsehood within the city, and, as he was crucified, smiled at them. However, the probability there was in the relation itself, did partly confirm the truth of what the deserter told them, and they thought he was not a fool to publish the truth. However, Vespasian thought they should be no greater sufferers if the report was a sham; so he commanded them to keep the man in custody, and prepared the army for taking the city.

34. According to which resolution they marched without noise, at the hour that had been told them, to the wall; and it was Titus himself that first got upon it, with one of his tribunes, Domitius Sabius, and had a few of the fifteenth legion. So they set upon the throats of the wall, and entered the city very quietly. After these came Cerealis the tribune, and Claudius, and led on those that were under them. Not behind them, but before them, the enemy were in the very midst of the city, and when it was already day, yet was not the taking of the city known by those that held it; for a great many of them were fast asleep, and a great mist, which arose by chance fell upon the city, hindered those that got up from distinctly seeing the case they were in, till the whole Roman army was gotten in, and they were raised up only to find the miseries they were under; and as they were set upon, they put up the gates and the city was taken. And for the Romans, they so well remembered what they had suffered during the siege, that they spared none, nor pitied any, but drove the people down the precipice from the citadel, and slew them by thousands, and that abundantly; for when they saw that they could kill none of the Romans, they resolved to prevent being killed by the Romans, and got together in great numbers in the utmost parts of the city, and killed themselves.

35. However, such of the watch as at first perceived they were taken, and ran away as fast as they could, went up into one of the towers on the north side of the city, and for a while defended themselves there; but as they were encompassed with a multitude of enemies, they tried to use their right hands when it was too late, and at length they cheerfully offered their necks to be cut off by those that stood over them. And Titus, himself, might have saved himself, and given him-own of that siege was without blood [on their side], if there had not been a centurion, Antonius, who was slain at the taking of the city. His death was occasioned by the following treachery. 36. And on this day it was that the Romans slew all the multitude that appeared openly; but on the following days they searched the hiding places, and fell upon those that were under ground; and thousands and thousands were indi-cation through every age, excepting the infants and the women, and of these there were gathered together as captives twelve hundred; and as for those that were slain at the taking of the city, they amounted to forty thousand. So Vespasian gave order that the city should be entirely demolished, and all the fortifications burnt down. And thus was Josephus taken, in the thirteenth year of the reign of Nero, on the first day of the month Panemus [Tamuz].

CHAP. VIII.

How Josephus was discovered by a Woman, and was willing to deliver himself up to the Romans; and what Discourse he had with his own Men, when they endeavored to hinder him; and what he said to Vespasian, when he was brought to him; and in what Manner Vespasian used him afterward.

1. AND now the Romans searched for Josephus, both out of the hatred they bore him, and because their general was very desirous to have him. And when they arrived, they immediately and resolutely taken, the greatest part of the war would be over. They then searched among the dead, and looked into the most concealed recesses of the city; but as the city was first taken, he was absent of an important mission; but when he withdrew himself from the enemy when he was in the midst of the city, and leaped into a certain deep pit, whereunto there adjoined a large den at one side of it, which den could not be seen by those that were there. After which time he went out of it, and met with forty persons of eminence that had concealed themselves, and with provisions enough to satisfy them for not a few days. So in the day time he hid himself from the enemy, who had seized upon all places, and in the night time he got out of the den, and looked about for some way of escaping, and took exact notice of the watch; but as all places were guarded very where on his account, that there was no way of getting off unseen, he went down again into the den. Thus he concealed himself two days; but on the third day, when they had taken a woman who had been with them, he was discovered. Whereupon he went out with them for when they were in two tribunes, Paulinus and Gallicanus, and ordered them to give Josephus their right hands as a security for his life, and to exhort him to come up. So they came and invited the man to come up, and gave him assurances that his life should be preserved; but they did not prevail with him; for he gathered suspicions from the probability there was that one who had done so many things against the Romans, must suffer for it, though not he who had been those that invaded him. However, he was afraid that he was invited to come up in order to be punished, until Vespasian sent besides these a third tribune, Nic- nor; to him, he was one that was well known to Josephus, and had a great and a princely reputation among the Jews, and was rather admired than hated; that the general was very desirous to have him brought to him, not in order to punish him, for that he could do though he should not come voluntarily, but that he was determined to preserve a man of his courage. He moreover added this, that Vespasian, had he been resolved to impose upon him, would not have sent to him a friend of his own, nor put the fairest color upon the vilest action, by pretending friendship and meas-

3. Now as Josephus began to hesitate with himself about Nicnaro’s proposal, the soldiery who were with him ran forward and set fire to the dead; but the tribune would not permit them so to do, as being very desirous to take the man alive. And now as Nicnaro lay hard at Josephus to comply, and he understood how the multitude of the enemies threatened him, he was called to mind the dreams which he had dreamed in the night time, whereby God had signified to him beforehand both the future calamities of the Jews, and the events that concerned the Romans, and he had thereupon made some very strange and inauspicious conjectures about the interpretation of such dreams as he had been ambiguously delivered by God. Moreover, he was not unacquainted with the prophecies contained in the sacred books, and he knew not as to the necessity of any action, to depress the same, and since all their good fortune is gone over to the Romans, and since thou hast made choice of this soul of mine to forestall what is to come pass hereafter, I will not avail myself of any such disgraceful thing as to live. And I protest openly, that I do not go over to the Romans as a desetter of the Jews, but as a minister from thee.”

4. When he said this, he compiled with Nicnaro's proposal: and the Jews who had died with him, understood that he yielded to those that invited him to come up, they came about him in a body, and cried out, “Nay, indeed, now may the laws of our forefathers which thou hast made choice of, and therefore availing myself of it, I shall not be good in the sight of God, because in that, God, we mean, who hath created the souls of the Jews of such a temper, that they despise death. O Josephus! art thou still fond of life? and dost thou think thyself in the light in that thy slavery? How soon hast thou forgotten thyself? How many hast thou persuaded to lose their lives for liberty? Thou hast therefore had a false reputation for manhood, and a like false estimate of thy own self, and of God for thy preservation from those against whom thou hast fought so zealously, and art, however, willing to be preserved by them, if they be in earnest. But although the good fortune of the Romans hath never been in our house; that is not our care, but that the glory of our forefathers may not be tarnished. We will lend thee our right hand and a sword; and if thou wilt die willingly, thou wilt die as a general of the Jews; but if unwillingly, thou wilt die as a traitor to them.” As soon as they said this, they began to thrash their swords at him, and threatened them would kill him, if he thought of yielding to the Romans.

5. Upon this, Josephus was afraid of their attack, and was about to be a bracer of the commands of God, if he died before they were delivered. So he began to talk like a philosopher to them in the distress he was then in, when he said thus to them: O my friends, why are we so earnest against ourselves? and why do we set our soul and body, which are such dear companions, at such variance? Can any one pretend that I am not the man I was formerly? Nay, the Romans are sensible how the master stands well enough. It is a brave thing to die in war; but so that it be according to the law of war, by the hand of conquerors. If, therefore, I avoid death from the sword of the Romans, I am truly worthy to be killed by my own sword, and spared enemies; but if these that I would spare their enemy, how much more ought we to have mercy upon ourselves, and to spare ourselves? For it is certainly a foolish thing to do that to ourselves which we quarrel with them for doing to us. I confess freely, that it is a brave thing to die for liberty; but still so that it be in war, and done by those who take that liberty from us; but if we shall neither meet us in battle, nor do they kill us. Now, he is equally a coward who will not die when he is obliged to die, and he who will die when he is not obliged so to do. What are we afraid of, when we will not go up to the Romans? Is it death? If so, what are we afraid of when we but suspect our enemies will inflict it on us, shall we inflict it on ourselves for certain? But it may be said, we must be slaves. And are we then in a clear state of liberty at all? For is it to be said, that it is a manly act for one to kill himself? No, certainly, but a most unmanly one; as I should esteem that pilot to be an arrant coward, who, out of fear of a storm, should sink his own ship and perish, and yet save his crew. Now if this is a crime most remote from the common nature of all animals, and an instance of impiety against God our Creator: nor is indeed there any animal that dies by its own contrivance, or by its own means, for the purpose of if by misadventure it be them all; on which account we deem those that openly take it away from us to be our enemies, and those that do it by treachery are punished for so doing. And do not you think that God is much more angry with man than he was when he hath bestowed on him? For from him it is that we have received our being, and we ought to leave to him to dispose of that being away from us. The bodies of all men are indeed mortal, and are created for this matter; and therefore are ever imm mortal, and is a portion of the divinity that inhabits our bodies. Besides, if any one destroys or abuses a depositum he hath received from a mere man, he is esteemed a wicked and ungodly person. And if without blemish out of his body this divine depositum, can we imagine that he who is thereby rifled does not know of it? Moreover, our law justly ordains that slaves which run away from their masters shall be accosted, though the masters they run away from may have been wicked masters to them. And shall we endeavor to run away from God, who is the best of all masters, and not think ourselves ourselves, and be free from that punishment which we receive from God, when he that lent us is pleased to require it back again, enjoy eternal happiness in our own houses? And can we be sure, that their souls are pure and obedient, and obtain a most holy place in heaven, from whence in the revolution of ages, they are again sent into pure bodies; while the souls of those whose hands have acted freely against themselves, are received by the darkest place in Hades, and while God, who is their father, punishes those that offend against either of them in their posterity; for which reason God hates such doers and the crime punished by us our mother? Accordingly our laws determine, that the bodies of such as kill themselves should be exposed till the sun be set, without burial, although at the same time it be allowed by them to be lawful to them [sacer.] That is the way of other nations also enjoin such men’s hands to be cut off when they are dead, which had been made use of in destroying themselves when alive; while they reckoned that as the body is alien from the soul, so is the hand alien from the body. It is, therefore, my friends, a right thing to reason justly, and not add to the calamities which men bring upon us, impieties towards our Creator. If we have a mind to preserve ourselves, let us do it; for to be preserved by them and to whom we have given so many demonstrations of our courage, is so way inglorious; but if we have a mind to die, it is good to die by the hand of those that have conquered us. For my part, I will not run over to our enemies' quarters, in order to be a traitor to myself; for certainly I should then be much more foolish than those that had so long lived in safety, since they did it in order to save themselves, and I should do it for destruction, for my own destruction. However, I heartily wish the Romans may prove treacherous in this matter; for if, after the offer of their Right hand to the security, I be slain by them, I shall die cheerfully, and carry away with me the sense of their perfidiousness, as a consolation greater than victory itself."

6. Now these and many like motives did, deservedly, move them to prevent their murd- ders themselves; but desperation had shut their ears, as having long ago devoted them- selves to die, and they were irritated at Josephus. They then ran upon him with their swords in hand [in the manner following].: "And now, (said he,) since it is resolved among you that you will die, come on, let us confun our mutual deaths to determination by lot. He whom the lot falls to first, let him be killed by him that hath the lot next after him, and thus fortune shall make its progress through us all; nor shall any of us perish by his own right hand, for it would be unfair if, when the rest are gone, somebody should re- pent and save himself." This proposal appeared to them very just; and when he had prevailed with them to determine this matter by lots, he drew one of the lots for himself also. He who had the first lot laid his neck bare to him that had the next, as supposing that the general would like none them immediately, for they thought death, if Josephus might but die with them, was sweeter than life; yet was he with another left to the last, whether we must say it happened by chance, or whether by the provi- dence of God. And as he was very desirous neither to be condemned by the lot, nor, if he had been left to the last, to incur his right hand in the blood of his countryman, he persuad- ed himself to place his fidelity to him, and to live as well as himself.

8. Thus Josephus escaped in the war with the Romans, and in this his own war with his friends, and was led by Nicantor to Vespasian. But now all was together to see him; and as the multitude pressed one upon another about their general, there was a tumult of a various

I do not know where to find the law of Moses here mentioned by Josephus, and afterward by Eusebius, B. V. ch. viil, sect. 7.; and almost implied in B. I. ch. xii. see note on Josephus' mention of Phineus for doing so; I mean whereby Jewish generals and people were obliged to kill themselves, rather than go into slavery under heathens. I doubt this would have been no better than self murderer, and I believe it was rather some vain doctrine, or interpretation of the Zard Par- ticles, or Eumes, or Herodians, than a just consequence from any law of God delivered by Moses.
CHAP. IX.

How Joppa was taken, and Tiberias delivered up.

1. Now Vespasian returned to Ptolemais on the fourth day of the month Panemus, [Tamus,] and he sent to the city to inquire that they should lay down their arms by the sea side. This was a very great city of Judea, and for the greatest part inhabited by Greeks; the citizens here received both the Roman army and its general with all sorts of acclamations and rejoicings, and they lay down their arms before they were drowned; although the greatest part of them were carried by the waves and dashed to pieces against the abrupt parts of the rocks, insomuch that the sea was bloody a long way, and the number of parts were full of dead bodies, for the Romans came upon those that were carried to the shore, and destroyed them; and the number of the bodies that were thus thrown out of the sea, was four thousand and two hundred. They also took the city without opposition, and utterly demolished it.

4. And thus was Joppa taken twice by the Romans in a little time; but Vespasian, in order to prevent these pirates from coming thither any more, they were strung up, and those that had been taken in them, and those that had been through the city without opposition, and utterly demolished it. 4. And thus was Joppa taken twice by the Romans in a little time; but Vespasian, in order to prevent these pirates from coming thither any more, they were strung up, and those that had been taken in them, and those that had been through the city without opposition, and utterly demolished it. 4. And thus was Joppa taken twice by the Romans in a little time; but Vespasian, in order to prevent these pirates from coming thither any more, they were strung up, and those that had been taken in them, and those that had been through the city without opposition, and utterly demolished it. 4. 2. In the mean time there were gathered together as well such as had sedulously got out from among their enemies, as those that had escaped their war from Joppa. These were in all a great number, and repaired Joppa, which had been left desolate by Cestius, in that it might serve them for a place of refuge; and because the adjoining region had been a great waste in this time, it was not easy to support by any means, but the number of them was so great that they determined to go off to sea. They also built themselves a great many piratical ships, and tarped pirates upon the seas near to Syria, and especially Egypt, and made those seas unassailable to all men. Now as soon as Vespasian knew of their conspiracy, he sent both footmen and horsemen to Joppa, which was unguarded in the night time; however, those that were in it perceived that they should be attacked, and were afraid of it; yet did they not endeavor to keep the Romans out, but fled to their ships, and lay at sea all night out of the reach of their darts.

3. This was not naturally a haven, for it ends in a rough shore, where all the rest of it is straight, but the two ends bend towards each other, where there are deep precipices, and great stones that jut out into the sea, and where the channel is narrow. But to this end the seamen have left their footsteps, which attest to the antiquity of that place. But the north wind opposes and beats upon the shore, and dashes mighty waves against the rocks which receive them, and renders the haven more dangerous than the country they had deserted. Now as those people of Joppa were floating about in this sea, in the morning there fell a violent wind upon them; it is called by those that sail there, the black north wind, and there was a tempest and a great one against them, and they left their footsteps, which attest to the antiquity of that place. 4. So the seamen, bribed on the supposed death of Josephus, and the real death of many more, illustrate some passages in the Bible, which sup-

5. But as the truth came out in time, it appeared how the affairs of Jotapata really stood; yet was it found that the death of Josephus was a fiction; and when they understood that he was alive, and was among the Romans, and that the commanders treated him at another rate than they treated captives, they were as vehemently angry at him now, as they had showed their good will before when he appeared to have been dead. He was therefore taken at sea, and sent to Rome, and there received a worse treatment than he had imaginably expected; and this had been the case with all the seamen in the same manner, and the city was full of indignation at him, and of reproaches cast upon him: their rage was also aggravated by their afflictions, and more inflamed by their ill success; and what usually becomes an occasion of caution to wise men, I mean affliction became a spur to them to venture on further calamities, and the end of one misery became still worse. The word of another, that therefore resolved to fall on the Romans the more vehemently, as resolving to be revenged on him in revenging themselves on the Romans. And this was the state of Jerusalem as to the troubles which now came upon it.

my speech, that you may not be ignorous of these matters. For as for the part of the habitable earth hath been despoiled of its inhabitants; but so much as the rest of it remains, and we are not yet utterly quenched, so we don't yet lose hope; and a sad thing it would be for us, were we to sink unscathed in a sea of misfortune. As to the sea, let me say, it is a place fit for wrestling in low waters; yet I am afraid it is too large, and that the multitude from the enemy should bring a concealed fright upon us.

3. As Titus was saying this, an extraordinary fury fell upon the men; and as Trajan was already come before the fight began, with four hundred horsemen, they were unseated at it, because the reputation of the victory would be diminished by being consumed by so many. The Sassanians had also sent both Antonius and Silo, with two thousand archers, and had given it them in charge to seize upon the mountain that was over against the city, and repel those that were upon the wall; which they did, but so as to dissuad, and prevented those that attempted to assist them. And now Titus made his own horse march first against the enemy, as did the others with a great noise after him, and extracted themselves upon the plain that was between the enemy which confronted them, by which means they appeared much more numerous than they really were. Now the Jews, although they were surprised at their onset, and at their good order, made resistance against their attack, for a little while; but when they were pricked with their long poles, and overborne by the violent noise of the horsemen, they came to be trampled under foot, and were forced to run away on every side, which made them disperse themselves, and ran to the city as fast as every one of them was able. So Titus pressed upon the hind-most, and slew them; and of the rest, some he killed, and some he spared, and sent them to the march to the city, till at last they were compelled to pass by their multitude, and got away, and ran into the city.

4. But now there fell out a terrible sedition among them within the city; for the inhabitants had passed the arms between them, with whom to the city belonged, were not disposed to fight from the very beginning; and now the less so, because they had been beaten: but the foriegners, which were very numerous, would force them to fight so much the more, insomuch that there was a clamor and tumult among them, as all mutually angry one at another. And when Titus heard this tumult, for he was not far from the wall, he cried out, "Fellow soldiers, now is the time to make your way; for I know when God is giving up the Jews to us! Take the victory which is given you; do not you bear what a noise they make? Those that have escaped our hands are a great impediment against one another. We have the city, if we desire it; but besides haste, we must undergo some labor, and use some courage; for no great thing uses to be accomplished without danger: accordingly we must not only and their own auxiliaries, which necessity will soon compel them to do, but we must also prevent the coming of our own men to our assistance, as far as we are we may conquer so great a multitude, and may ourselves alone take the city."
ed without fighting: for in hopes of Titus's giving them his right hand for their security, and out of concern that they had not even any consent to the war, they avoided fighting, till Titus had slain the authors of this revolt, and then put a stop to any further slaughters out of commissination of these inhabitants of the place. But for the rest, the lake and the city taken, they sailed as far as they possibly could from the enemy.

8. Hereupon Titus sent one of his horsemen to his father, and let him know the good news of the two successes; at which, as was natural, he was very joyful, both on account of the courage and glorious actions of his son: for he thought now the greatest part of the war was over. He then called thither himself, and set men to guard the city, and gave them command to take care that nobody got privately out of it, but to kill such as attempted so to do. And on the next day he went down to the lake, and commanded that vessels should be fitted up, in order to pur- sue those that had escaped in the up to Trachonitis, and in breadth forty furlongs, and its length one hundred and forty; its waters are sweet and very agreeable for drinking, for they are finer than the thick water of many lakes in Greece, and it is also pure, and on every side ends directly at the shores, and at the sands; it is also of a temperate nature when you draw it up, and of a more gentle nature than river or fountain water, and yet always cooler than others could expect in so diffuse a place as this is; now when this water is kept in the open air, it is as cold as that snow which the country people are accustomed to make by night in summer. There are several kinds of fish in it, different breeds and sizes, and the sight from those else where. It is divided into two parts by the river Jordan. Now Panium is thought to be the fountain of Jordan, but in reality is carried thither after an occult manner from the place called Phiasa, which is at Phiasa, and is not far out of the road on the right hand; and indeed it hath its name of Phiasa (vial or bowl) very justly from the roundness and the height of the fountains, as being round like a wheel; its water continues always up to itsedges, without either sinking or running over. And as this origin of Jordan was formerly not known, it was discovered so to be when Philip was tetrarch of Asia. As for Phiasa, it was found at Panium, where the ancients thought the fountain head of the river was, whither it had been therefore carried [by the waters.] As for Panium itself, its natural beauty had been improved by the royal liberality of Agrippa, and adorned at his expenses. Now Jordan's visible stream arises from this cavern, and divides the marshes and fens of the lake of Gennesareth; when it hath run another hundred and twenty miles, it first passes by the city of Julias, and then passes through the middle of the lake of Gennesareth; after which it runs a long way over a desert, and then makes its exit into the lake of Tiberias, and then into the Mediterranean sea.

9. The country also that lies over against this lake hath the same name of Gennesareth; its nature is wonderful, as well as its beauty; its soil is so fruitful that all sorts of trees can grow upon it, and the inhabitants accordingly plant all sorts of trees there; for the temper of the air's suitable to it, and there being several sorts: particularly walnuts, which require the coldest air, flourish there in vast plenty; there are palm-trees also, which grow best in hot air; fig-trees also and olives grow near them, which are of less heat; but the most up to the lake are the vineyards. And it may call this place the ambition of nature, when it forces those plants that are naturally enemies to one another to agree together; it is a happy contentment of the seasons; as if every one of the fruits produced in the year, in the same year should together nourish different sorts of annual fruit be- yond men's expectations, but preserves them a great while; it supplies men with the principal fruits, with grapes and figs, continually, during ten month of the year, and the rest of the fruits as they become ripe together through the whole year; for besides the good temperature of the air, it is also watered from a most fertile fountain. The people of the country call it Capernaum; but they did not call it the Nile, because it produces the Cuscus fish as well as that lake does which is near to Alexandria. The length of this country extends itself along the lake, that between same name, and is in breadth thirty, and is in breadth twenty. And this is the nature of that place.

9. But now, when the vessels were got ready, Vespasian put upon ship-board as many as would accompany him, and started for Capharnaum, that he might see for himself, how difficult it was for those that were upon the lake, and set sail after them. Now those which were driven into the lake, could neither fly to the land, where all was as in their enemies' hand, and in war against them, nor could they fly upon the land, so that their ships were small and fitted only for pri- vacy; they were too weak to fight with Vespas- ian's vessels, and the mariners that were in them were so few, that they were afraid to come near the Romans for fear of the galleys. For the ship numbers. However, as they sailed round about the vessels, and sometimes as they came near them, they threw stones at the Romans when they were a good way off, or came closer to them, the Romans caught them by the middle, and destroyed them themselves in both cases. As for the stones they threw at the Romans, they only made a sound one after the other, for they threw them against such as were in their armor, while the ships were covered: and when they ventured to come near the Romans, they became sufferers themselves before they could do any harm to the other, and were drowned, they and their ships together. Thus the Romans pursued them thus all day long, and being put to flight the Romans ran many of them through with their long poles. Sometimes the Romans leaped into their ships with swords in their hands, and slew them; but when some of them met the ves- sel, the Romans caught them by the middle, and destroyed at once their ships and themselves who were taken in them. And for such as were drowning in the sea, if they lifted their heads up above the water, they were either cut down at the middle, or cast by the vessels; but if, in the despairs case they were in, they attempted to swim to the enemies, the Romans cut off either their heads or their hands; and indeed they were destroyed by the Romans very every where: being put to flight were forced to get upon the land, while the vessels encompassed them about [on the sea: but as many of these were received when they were getting ashore, they were killed year, soon after the same time of the year, cause and found leaves on a fig-tree near Jerusalem, but not in March, because the time of new figs ripening was now very true; nor were they, therefore, other than old leaves which our Saviour saw, and old figs with he expected, and which even with us commonly grow on the trees all winter long. by the darts upon the lake: and the Romans leaped out of their vessels, and destroyed a great many more upon the land: one might then see the lake all bloody, and full of dead bodies, for not one of them escaped. And a terrible stink, and a very sad sight there was on the following day; so that corn, and as for the shores, they were full of shipwrecks, and of dead bodies all swelled; and as the dead bodies were infamed by the sun, and putrid, they corrupted the air insomuch that the misery was not only the object of conversation, but also the ruin of them. They had, and had been the authors of that misery. This was the upshot of the sea-fight. The number of the slain, including those that were killed in the city before, was six thousand and five hundred.

10. After this fight was over, Vespasian sat upon his tribunal at Tarichea, in order to distinguish the foreigners from the old inhabitants; for those foreigners appeared to have begun the war. So upon the consent of Tarichea commanders, whether he ought to save those old inhabitants or not. And when those commanders alleged that the dissipation of those would be to his own disadvantage, because, when they were once set at liberty, they would not be able to subsist, since they would be people destitute of proper habitations, and would be able to compel such as they desired to fight against us, Vespasian acknowledged that they did not deserve to be saved, and that if they had leave given them to fly away, they would make use of it against those that gave them that leave. But still he was considered with himself, after what manner they should be slain; for if he had let them slain, he suspected the people of the country would thereby avenge his enemies; for that to be sure they would never bear it, that so many at had been suppliants to him should be killed; and to offer violence to them, after he had given them assurances of their lives, he could not himself bear to do it. However, his friends were too hard for him, and pretended that nothing against the Jews could be any impiety, and that they perished as they pleased. For what was profitable before what was fit to be done, where both could not be consistent. So he gave them an ambiguous liberty to do as they advised, and permitted the prisoners to go along on no other road than that which led to the sea, which was the only one. So they readily believed what they desired to be true, and went along securely, with their effects, the way which was allowed them, while the Romans seized upon all the road that led to Tiberias; that none of them might go further, or of it, and shut them up in the city. Then came Vespasian, and ordered them all to stand in the stadium, and commanded them to kill the old men, together with the others that were useless, who were in number a thousand and two hundred. Out of the young men he chose six thousand of the strongest, and sent them to Nero, to dig through the lakes, and sold the remainder for slaves, being thirty thousand and four hundred, besides such as he made a present of to Agrippa; for as to those that belonged to his kingdom, he gave them leave to do what he pleased with them: however, the king sold those also for slaves; but for the rest of the multitude, who were Trachonites, and Gaulanites, and of Hippos, and some of Gadara, the greater part of them were seditionous persons and fugitives, who were of such shameful characters, that they preferred war before fame. These prisoners were taken on the eighth day of the month G.:p:ius [Eluk.]

This is the most cruel and barbarous action that Vespasian ever did in this whole war, as he did it with great reluctance also. It was done both after public assurance given of sparing the prisoners' lives, and when all knew and confessed that those prisoners were nowy guity of any sedition against the Romans. Nor, in- deed, did Titus now give his consent, so far as appears, never after he had commanded them to be killed; and after this Titus grew quite weary of shedding blood, and of punishing the innocent with the guilty, and gave the people of Gleicha leave to keep the Jewish Sabbath, B. iv. ch. 11. sect. 3, 5; in the midst of their siege. Nor was Vespasian disposed to do what his officers persuaded him, and that from two principal topics, viz. that nothing could be unjust that was done against the Jews, and that when both cannot be consistent, advantage must prevail over justice. Admirable coast doctrines these!

CHAP. I.

The Siege and Taking of Gamala.

§ 1. Now all those Galileans who, after the taking of Jotapata, had revolted from the Romans, did upon the consent of Tarichea deliver themselves up to them again. And the Romans received all the fortresses and the cities, excepting Gischala and those that had been seized upon Mount Tabor; Gamala also, which was a city of great name against Tarichea, but on the other side of the lake, conspired with them. This city lay upon the borders of Agrippa's kingdom, as also did Pogassa and Seleucia. And these were both parts of the country that contained; for all that part we call the upper Gaulanitae, as was Gamala of the lower; while Seleucia was situated at the lake Semachonitas, which lake is thirty furlongs in breadth, and sixty in length; its marshes reach as far as the day's journey, and the waters of it respect a delicious place, and hath such fountains as supply water to what is called Little Jordan, under the temple of the golden calf, where it is sent into Great Jordan. Now Agrippa had united Sogans and Seleucia by leagues to himself, at the very beginning of the revolt from the Romans; yet did not Gamala accede to them, but relied upon the difficulty of the place, which was greater than that of Jotapata, for it was situated upon a rough ridge of a high mountain with a kind of neck in the middle; where it begins to ascend, it lengthens itself, and declines as much downwards on the right, towards Lake Semachonita, as it is so named, although the people of the country do not pronounce it accurately: both on the side and the face there are abrupt parts divided from the rest, and straight, and steep in breadth; yet the parts behind, where they are joined to the mountain, somewhat easier of ascent than the other; but then the people belonging to the place have cut an oblique ditch there, and made it so hard to the treading, that which is straight, houses are built, and those very thick and close to one another. The city also hangs so strangely, that it looks as if it would fall down upon itself, so heavy was it at the top. It is exposed to the east, and its southern, more, which reaches to an immense height, was in the nature of a citadel to the city; and above that was a precipice, not walled about, but extending itself to an immense depth. There was also a space within the wall, at the street limits of the city.

Relate suspects, that even here we should read Dan instead of Daphne; there being nowhere else any mention of a place called Daphne hereabouts.

2. As this city was naturally hard to be taken, so had Josephus, by building a wall about it, made it still stronger, as also by ditches and mines about the ground. The people pleased in it were made more bold by the nature of the place, than the people of Jotapata had been, but had much fewer lighting men in it; and they had such a confidence in the situation of the place, that they expected the enemy should not be too many for them: for the city had been filled with those that had fled to it for safety, on account of its strength; on which account they had been able to resist those whom Agrrippa sent to besiege it from month to month.

3. But Vespasian removed from Emmaus, where he had last pitched his camp before the city Tibérias, (now Emmaus, if it be interpreted, may be rendered a warm bath, for therein is a spring which is useful for hot baths, which came to Gamala; yet was it situation such, that he was not able to encompass it all around with soldiers to watch it; but where the places were practicable, he sent men to watch it, and seized upon that unanimous to be over it. After this, he had the legion, according to their usual custom, were fortifying their camp upon that mountain, he began to cast up banks at the bottom, at the part towards the east, where the highest tower of the whole city was; and there he set up the tenth legion; after them that were on the walls about a surrender, he was hit with a stone on his right elbow by one of the slingers; he was then immediately surrounded with his symptoms. But the Romans were excited to set about the siege, by their indignation on the king’s account, and by their fear on their own account, as concluding that those men would omit no kinds of barbarity against foreigners and enemies; and were so engaged against one of their own nation, and one that had been esteemed far otherwise than what was for their own advantage.

4. Now when the banks were finished, which was done on the sudden, both by the multitude of the men, and by the skill in that kind work, they brought the machines, but Caius and Joseph, who were the most potent men in the city, set their armed men in order, though already in a fright, because they did not suppose the city could hold out long, since they had not a sufficient quantity either of men or of materials to make other devices. However those their leaders encouraged them, and brought them out upon the walls, and for a while indeed they drove away those that were upon them; but when those machines threw darts and stones at them, they retired into the city; then did the Romans bring battering-rams to three several places, and made the walls shake and fall."

The wall then poured in the course of the wall that were thrown down, with a mighty sound of trumpets and noise of armor, and with a shout of the soldiers, and brake by force upon those that were in the city; but these men fell upon the Romans for some time, at their first entrance, and prevented their going any further, and with great courage beat them back; and the Romans were so overpowered by the greater multitude of the people, who beat them on every side, that they were obliged to run into the upper parts of the city. Whereupon the people turned about, and fell upon their enemies who had attached them and beat them down, to the lower parts, and as they were distressed by the narrowness and difficulty of the place, slew them; and so these Romans could neither beat those back that were above them, nor escape the force of their number, and so were forced to retire; and so they were compelled to fly into their enemies’ houses, which were low; but these houses, being thus full of soldiers, whose weight they could not bear, fell down suddenly; and when one house did so, a great many of those that were under it, as did those do to such as were under them. By this means a vast number of the Romans perished, for they were so terribly distressed, that although they saw the houses on their subduing, yet they could not be the tops of them; so that a great many were ground to powder by these ruins, and a great many of those that got from under them lost some of their limbs, but still a greater number were suffocated by the dust that rose from those ruins. The people of Gamala supposed this to be an assistance afforded them by God, and without regarding what damage they suffered themselves, they pressed forward, and thrust the enemy upon the walls; and where the place was practicable, they threw stones or darts at them, and slew them. Now the very ruins afforded them stones enough, and for iron darts they had what they wanted; and thus they afforded them what they wanted; for, drawing the swords of those that were dead, they made use of them to despatch such as were only half dead; and, there were a great number who, upon their falling down, were driven back to the wall, without being able to find another, and fell down dead among the crowd.

5. Those, therefore, that were able to find the ways out of the city retired. But now Vespasian always staid among those that were hard set, for he was deepely affected with seeing the ruins of the city falling upon his army, and forgot to take care of his own preservation. He went up gradually towards the highest parts of the city before he was aware, and was left in the midst of dances, and began to count and to note him, and even his son Titus was not with him at that time, having been sent into Syria to Maccabees. However, he thought it not safe to fly, nor did he esteem it a fit thing for him to do; but calling to mind the situations he had done from and recollecting his courage, as if he had been excited by a divine fury, he covered himself, and those that were with him with their shields and formed a testudo over both their heads and their arms, and bore the enemy’s attack, who came running down from the top of the city; and without showing any dread at the multitude of the men or of their darts, he endured all until the enemy were the more frightened by the number within them and remitted of their attacks; and when they pressed less fearfully upon him, he retired, though without showing his back to them till he was gotten out of the walls; and there, in the presence of the Romans fell in this battle, among whom was Eleazar, the deacon, a man who appeared not only in this engagement, wherein he fell, but every where, and in former engagements, to be one of the greatest courages, and one that had done very great mischief to the Jews. But there was a centurion whose name was Galles, who during this disorder being encompassed about, he and ten other soldiers privately crept into the house of a certain person, where he heard them talking at supper what the people intended to do. against the Romans, or about themselves. (for both the man himself and those with him were Syrians.) So he got up in the night time, and cut all their throats, and escaped, together with his soldiers, and the Romans raised their banks, and attempted to get into the city a second time, a great many of them fled out of the city through impracticable valleys, where no guards were placed, as also through subterranean caverns; while those who remained of that were of being or had reason stayed in the city, perished for want of food, for what food they had was brought together from all quarters, and reserved for the fighting men.

8. And these were the hard circumstances that the people of Gamala were in. But now Vespasian went about another work by the doing of this siege, and that was to subdue those that had seized upon Mount Tabor, a place that lies in the midst between the city Thapsa to Thyatira, Scythopolis, whose top is elevated as high as thirty furlongs, and is hardly to be ascended on so steep a road; its top is a plain of twenty-six furlongs, and all encompassed with a wall. Now, Josephus, the historian of this time, says gifts were brought to the city for the change from the one to the other is sudden on both sides; and he is the best warrior who is of a sober mind under misfortunes, that he might not be disappointed of what he might recover what had been lost formerly; and as for what had now happened, it was neither owing to their own enmity, nor to the valor of the Jews, but the difficulty of the place was the occasion of their advantage and of our disappointment. Upon reflecting on which matter one might blame your zeal as perfectly unaccountable; for when the enemy had retired to their highest fastnesses, you ought to have restrained your undaunted resolution, and presented yourself at the top of the city, to be exposed to dangers; but upon your having obtained the lower parts of the city, you ought to have provoked those that had retired thither to a safe and settled battle; on which account you might have had the Jews chiefly support themselves by us. We ought therefore to return to our own virtue, and to be rather angry than any longer deserted at this unlucky misfortune, and let every one seek for his own individual safety, for this means he will avenge those that have been destroyed, and punish those that have killed them. For myself, I will endeavor, as I have now done, to go first before you against your enemies in every engagement, and to be the last that returns from it.

7. So Vespasian encouraged his army by this speech; but for the people of Gamala, it happened that they took courage for a little while, upon such great and unaccountable success as they had bad. But when they considered with themselves that they had now no hopes of any terms of accommodation, and reflecting upon it that they had already lost all their advantages and victories began already to be short, they were exceedingly cast down, and their courage failed them; yet did they not neglect what might be for their preservation, so far as they were able, but the most courageous among them guarded those parts of the wall that were beaten down, while the more innumerable dealt the same to the rest of the wall that still remained round the city. And the Jews, as the Romans raised their banks, made a watch to get into the city a second time, a great many of them fled out of the city through impracticable valleys, where no guards were placed, as also through subterranean caverns; while those who remained of that were of being or had reason stayed in the city, perished for want of food, for what food they had was brought together from all quarters, and reserved for the fighting men.

at other places were under such disturbance, that they ran away; the Romans also slew many of those that ventured to oppose them, among whom was Jarebu. He was slain by a dart, as he was running away over that part of the wall that was broken down; but as those that were in the city were greatly affrighted at the noise, they ran hither and thither, and a great consternation fell upon them; but all the rest had fallen in at once upon them. Then it was that Chares, who was ill, and under the physician's bands, gave up the ghost, the fear he was in greatly contributing to make his distemper fatal to him. For in one city well remain'd of their former ill success, that they did not enter the city till the three and twentieth day of the forementioned month.

18. At which time Titus, who was now return'd out of the indignation he had at the destruction the Romans had undergone while he was absent, took two hundred chosen horsemen, and some footmen with them, and entered without noise into cities which they rolled down as perceived that he was coming, they made a noise, and betook themselves to their arms; and as that his entrance was presently known to those that were in the city, some of them caught bold of their children and wives, and left them after them, and fled away to the citadel, with lamentations and cries, while others of them went to meet Titus, and were killed perpetually; but so many of them as were hindered from running up to them, as not knowing what the world to do, fell among the Roman guards, while the groans of those that were killed, were prodigiously great everywhere, and the blood ran down all the lower parts of the city from the windows; and even Titus himself came to his assistance against those that had fled to the citadel, and brought his whole army with him: now this upper part of the city was every way rocky, and difficult of ascent, and elevated to a vast altitude, and very full of people on all sides, and encompassed with precipices, whereby the Jews cut off those that came up to them, and did much mischief to the others by their darts, and those that did run down upon them, while they were themselves so high that the enemies' darts could hardly reach them. However, there arose such a divine storm against them as was instrumental to their destruction: the Romans darts and rocks, and made those which they threw return back, and drove them obliquely away from them: nor could the Jews indeed stand upon the precipices, by reason of the violence of the wind, having nothing that they could stand upon, nor could they see those that were ascending up to them; so the Romans got up and surrounded them, and some they slew before they could defend themselves, and others as they were delivering up themselves, and the remembrance of the case that were slain at their former entrance into the city increased their rage against them now: a great number also of those that were surrounded on every side, and despaired of escaping, threw themselves down; and they wvitnesst themselves also, down the precipices, into the valley beneath, which, near the citadel, had been dug hollow to a vast depth, but so it happened that the anger of God appeared not so extravagant, as was the madness of those that were now taken, while the Romans slew but four thousand, whereas the number of those that had thrown themselves down was found to be five thousand; and nor did any one escape except two women, who were the daughters of Philip, and Philip himself was the son of a certain eminent man called Jachinus, who had been general of king Agrippa's army; and these did therefore escape, for they lay concealed from the rage of the Romans, when the city was taken; for otherwise they spared not so much as the infants; of whom many were flung down by them from the citadel. And thus was Gausala taken on the three and twentieth day of the month Hyperberetius, [Tiari], whereas the city had first revolted on the fourth and twentieth day of the month Gorpiaus, [Elul].

CHAP. II.

The Surrender of Gischala; when John fled from it to Jerusalem.

1. Now no place of Gidsela remained to be taken but the wall below to Gischala, whose multitude yet were desirous of peace; for they were generally husbandmen, and always applied themselves to cultivate the fruits of the earth. However, there were a great number that belonged to a kind of robbers who were also exposed, and had crept in among them, and some of the governing part of the citizens were sick of the same distemper. It was John, the son of a certain man whose name was Læris, that drew these into this rebellion, and encouraged them in it. He was a cunning knave, and of a temper that could put on various shapes; very rash in expecting great things, and very insipid in advising, and he was a great plasterer over every body that he was fond of war, in order to thrust himself into authority; and the seditions part of the people of Gischala were under his management, by whom means the populace, who seemed ready to follow the Romans, all in order to surrender, waited for the coming of the Romans in battle array. Vespasian sent against them Titus, with a thousand horsemen, but withdrew the tenth legion to Scythopolis, while he remained still at Jerusalem; Titus, in his assistance to his men, that he might allow them to refresh themselves after their long and hard campaign, thinking withal that the plenty which was in those cities would improve their bodies and their spirits, and the provision that were near Jerusalem with them afterwards: for he saw there would be occasion for great pains about Jerusalem, which was not yet taken, because it was the royal city, and the principal city of the whole nation, and because those that had run away from the way in other places got all together therewith. It was also naturally strong, and the walls that were built round it made him not a little concerned about it. Moreover, the noise that were in it was so courageous and bold, that every one thought the consideration of the walls it would be hard to subdue them; for which reason he took care of, and exercised his soldiers beforehand for the taking of the city, and trained them to wrestlers before they begin their undertaking.

2. Now Titus, as he rode up to Gischala, found it would be easy for him to take the city upon the first onset; but knew withal, that if he took it by force, the city would be destroyed by the soldiers without mercy. (Now he was already satiated with the shedding of blood, and pitied the major part, who would then perish without distinction, together with the guilty.)—So he was rather desirous that the city might be delivered to him on terms. Accordingly, when he saw the wall full of those men that were of the corrupted party, he said to them, that " he could not but wonder what it was they depended on, when they alone stood to their right hands, and another city was taken by them, especially when they have seen cities much better fortified than theirs is, overthrown by a single attack upon them; while as many as have entrenched themselves to the security of the Romans' right hands, which he now offers to them, without regarding their former insolence, do enjoy their possessions in safety; for while they had hopes of recovering their liberty, they might be pardoned; but that their continuance still is their opposition when they saw that to be impossible, was inexcusable; for that, if they will not comply with such humane offers, and right hands for security, they should have experience of such a war that shall spare none of the city about them, and that they could not conscientably that the wall would be but a trifle, when battered by the Roman machines; in depending on which, they demonstrate themselves to be only Galliennes that were not better than arrogant slaves and captives."

3. Now some of the populace durst not only make a reply, but durst not so much as get upon the wall, for it was all taken up by the robbers, who were everywhere in the city about guard, to prevent any of the rest from going out in order to propose terms of submission, and from receiving any of the horsemen into the city. But John returned Titus this answer, that "for himself he was content to hearken to his proposals, and that he would either persuade or force those that refusing. Yet he said, that Titus ought to have such regard to the Jewish law, as to grant them leave to celebrate that day which when the seventh day was, when the seventh day was to be celebrated transgress the law; and that the day could be of no disadvantage to him; for why should any body think that the Jews could not have preserved it; and that he was content to be punished, if he should fly away; which he might prevent by placing his camp round about them; and that they should think it a great point gained, if they might not be obliged to transgress the laws of their coun-tree, upon which he brought the business to Feb. 19. he had de-deal with them, without their expectation of such a favor, to preserve the laws of those they saved inviolable. Thus did he use, for one thing, to put a trick upon Titus, not so much out of regard to the seventh day, as to his own preservation; for he was afraid lest he should be quite deserted, if the city should be taken, and had his hopes of life in that night, and in his flight then the seventh day of the week, on which it was therefore, preserved this John, that he might bring on the destruction of Jerusalem: as also it was his work that Titus was prevailed with by this pretense for a delay, and that he pitched his camp, that the city could not be taken before Lent. Cædes was a strong Mediterranean village of the Tyrians, which always hated and made war against the Jews; it had also a great number of inhabitants, and was well fortified, which made it a good place for such as were enemies to the Jewish nation.

4. Now in the night time, when John saw that there was no Roman guard about the city, he seized the opportunity directly, and, taking with him not only the armed men that were with him, but a considerable number of those that had little to do, together with their families, he fled to Jerusalem. And indeed, though the man was making haste to get away, and was troubled with fears of being caught, yet did he prevail with himself to take out of the city along with him a multitude of women and children, as far as twenty furlongs; but there he left them, as he proceeded farther on his journey, which made the Romans, to the number of two thousand, lamentations; for the farther every one of them was from his own people, the nearer they thought themselves to be to their enemies. They also affrighted themselves with this thought, that they should be found that were not near their families, just at hand, and still turned themselves back at the mere noise they made themselves in this their hasty flight, as if those from whom they fled were just upon them. Many also of them missed their ways, and the earnestness of such as aimed to outgo the rest, threw down many of them. And indeed there was a miserable destruction made of the women and children; while some of them took the chance to call the high priests and kinsmen back, and to beseech them, with the bitterest laments, to stay for them; but John's exhortation, who cried out to them to save themselves, and fly away, prevailed. He said also, that if the Romans should fall upon those whom they left behind they would be revenged on them for it. So this multitude that ran thus away was dispersed abroad, according to which each of them was able to run, one faster or slower than another.

5. Now on the next day Titus came to the wall, to make the agreement, whereupon the people opened their gates to him, and came out to him, with their children and wives, in great secu-

Concluding John of Gischala. Concerning the Zealots, and the High Priest Ananus. Also how the Jews raised Seditions one against another [in Jerusalem.]

1. Now upon John's entry into Jerusalem the whole body of the people were in an uproar, and ten thousand of them crowded about every one of the fugitives that were come as a fruit of those miseries that had happened abroad, when their breath was so short, and hot, and quick, that if itself it declared the great dis-

cities, whereas they ought to lay up their weapons and their zeal, and reserve it for their metropolis. But when they related to them the taking of Gischala, and their decent departure, and they perceived that it was not to them that the people understood it to be no better than a flight; and especially when the people were told of those that were made captives, they were in great confusion, and guessed those things to be plain indications that the peace should be taken also. But for John, he was very little concerned for those he had left behind him, but went about among all the people, and persuaded them to go to war, by the hopes he gave them. He affirmed that the safety of the country depended on the present condition, and exulted his own power. He also jested upon the ignorance of the unskilful, as if those Romans, although they should take to themselves wings, could never fly over the wall of Jerusalem, so that they would take them, and then by the pines and plunderings only, but proceeded as far as murdering men; and this not in the night time or privately, or with regard to ordinary men, but did it openly in the day time, and began with the more unfortunate, and killed those that were in custody, that they might meddle with Antipas, one of the royal line, and the most potent man in the whole city, insomuch that the public treasures were committed to his care: him they took and conducted without resistance into Jerusalem, where they thought he would be a person of great note, with Sophas the son of Rague; both of whom were of royal lineage also. And besides these, they did the same to the principal men of the country. This ceased a time, not that the Jews thought every one contented himself with taking care of his own safety, as they would do if the city had been taken in war.

Then also the Jews were not satisfied with the bonds into which they had put the men foremostmentioned; nor did they think it safe for them to keep them thus in custody long, since they were men very powerful, and had numerous families of their own, and would not suffer them to be treated with so much violence. And in this respect they thought the people would perhaps be so moved at these unjust proceedings, as to rise in a body against them: it was therefore resolved to have them slain. Accordingly, they sent one of the priests of the temple, John an accounting officer, to do that execution: this man was also called the son of Dorcas, in the language of our country. Ten more men went along with him into the prison, with their swords drawn, and so conducted the lot of those that were in custody there. The grand lying pretence these men made for so flagrant an enormity was this, that these men had had conferences with the Romans for a surrender of Jerusalem to them; and so they said did, had slain only such as were traitors to their common liberty. Upon the whole, they grew the more insolent upon this bold prank of theirs, as though they had been the benefactors and saviors of the city.

John brought the people to that degree of meanness and fear, and these robbers to that degree of madness, that these last took upon them to appoint high priests. So when they had disannulled the succession, according to those families out of which the high priests used to be made, they ordained certain unknown and ignoble persons for that office, that they might have their wickedness in their wicked undertakings.
for such as obtained this highest of all honors without any desert, were forced to comply with those that bestowed it on them. They also set the principal men at variance one with another, by several sorts of controvirsies and tricks, and gained them, without the consent of any of them, by the mutual quarrels of those who might have obstructed their measures; till at length, when they were satisfied with the unjust actions they had done towards men, they transferred their calumny to God itself, and came into the sanctuary with polluted feet.

7. And now the multitude were going to rise against them already; for Anaanias, the ancients of the high priests, persuaded them to it. He was a man who was slowly corrupted, but learned, and withal a long time in the city, if he could have escaped the hands of those that plotted against him. Those men made the temple of God a strong hold for them, and a place where they might resort, in order to avoid the resentment of the people; for they feared, that with their own power extended, they undertook to dispose of the high priesthood by casting lots for it, whereas, as we have said already, it was to be disposed of by God in a family. The pretence they made for this was the most elegant practice, while they said, that of old it was determined by lot; but in truth, it was no better than a dissolution of an undeniable law, and a contracting contrivance to seize upon the government, derived from those that presumed to appoint governors as they pleased themselves.

8. Hereupon they sent for one of the pontifical tribes, which is called Euticho, and cast lots what should be the second; and as many as there were to be two, and caused the sacred lot so far as to demonstrate their iniquity after the plainest manner, for it fell upon one whose name was Phanesia, the son of Samuel, of the village Apha. He was a man not only unlawful by the law of the high priesthood, but that did not well know what the high priesthood was, such a mere rustic was he: yet did they hate this man, without his own consent, out of the country, as if they were acting a play upon the stage, and added to the jest. They put him the sacred garments, and upon every occasion instructed him what he was to do. This horrid piece of wickedness was sport and pastime with them, but occasioned the other people, that act of impiety, that they should have been ashamed of, to be a jest of, to shed tears, and sorely lament the desolation of such a sacred dignity.

9. And now the people could no longer bear the insolence of this procedure, but did all together run severally and freely to show that tyranny; and indeed they were the Geron the son of Josephus, and Symeon the son of Gamaliel, who encouraged them, by going up and down the temple, and making their presence in conclave, and as they saw them alone, to be heard longer, but to inflict punishment upon these pests and plagues of their freedom, and to purge the temple of these bloody polluters of it. The best es-

*This tribe or course of the high priests, or priests called Euticho, seems to have learned Mr. Loth's, one well versed in Josephus, to be that I Chron. xxxv. 8. The name of Josephus is called Gamaliel, as well as Jannaeus, as some have to have put some to have put one for the other, course of Euticho and I think this to be so mean an improbable conjecture.

†This Symeon, the son of Gamaliel, is mentioned as the president of the Jewish sanhedrin, and one that perished in the destruction of Jerusalem, by the Jewish rabbin, as a land observer on this place. He also tells us, that these rabbis mention one Jews the son of Josephus, by whose name is called Gamaliel, as having been high priest and before the destruction of Jerusalem; so that if be were the same person with this Jesus, the son of Gamaliel, in Josephus, he must have lived to be very old or they have been very bad chronologists.
great a degree walled in, and see your enemies over your heads, to what purpose is it to take counsel, and what have you to support your minds, with such a view? Perhaps you seek for the Romans, that they may protect our holy places: are our matters then brought to that pass, and are we come to that degree of misery, that our enemies themselves are expected to pity us? Or will you think our fate will not suffice you, nor turn upon those that strike you, which you may observe in wild beasts themselves, that they will avenge themselves on those on which they strike. Will you not call to mind, every one of you, the tales which your parents have told you, before your eyes what afflictions you yourselves have undergone? and will not such things sharpen your souls to revenge? Is therefore that most holy temple, which your forefathers of an immemorial age have incessantly adored, shall we be permitted to lose in our lifetime? I mean the city of liberty? Truly we are in love with slavery, and in love with those that lord it over us, as if we had received that principle of subjection from our ancestors; yet it is not for the sake of liberty; nor were they so far overcome by the power of the Egyptians or the Medes, but that still they did what they thought it, notwithstanding their commands to the contrary. It is not for the sake of war with the Romans? (I need not with determining whether it be an advantageous and profitable war or not.) What pretence is there for it? Is it not that we may enjoy our liberty? Besides, that we may have the lord of the immovable east and west be lords over us, and yet bear tyrants of our own country? Although I must say that submission to foreigners may be borne, because fortune hath already doosed us to it, while submission to our own is too uncongenial, and brought upon us by our own consent. However, since I have had occasion to mention the Romans, I will not conceal a thing, that, as I am speaking, comes into my mind, and affects me considerably. I say that we shall be taken by them, (God forbid the event should be so,) yet we can undergo nothing that will be hard to be borne than what these men have already brought upon us. How then can we be for shedding tears, when we see the Roman donations in our temple, while we, withal see those of our own nation taking our spoils, and plundering our glorious metropolis, and slaughtering our men, and even our churches and temples themselves would have sustained? To see those Romans never going beyond the bounds allotted to profane persons, nor venturing to break in upon any of our sacred customs, nay, having a horror on account of our sacred walls; while some that have been born in this very country, and brought up in our customs, and called Jews, do walk about in the midst of the holy places, at the very time when their hands are still warm with the slaughter of their own countrymen. Besides, can any one be afraid of a war abroad, and that such as will have comparatively much greater moderation than our own people have? For truly, if we may suit our words to a description that, it is tolerable that may hereafter find the Romans to be the supporters of our laws, and those within ourselves the subverters of them. And now I am persuaded that if the people here comes satisfied before, I speak, that these overthrow our liberties desire to be destroyed, and that nobody can so much as devise a punishment that they have not deserved by what they have done, and that you are all provoked against them; those their wicked actions, when you have suffered so greatly. But perhaps many of you are affrighted at the multitude of these sealots, and at their audaciousness, as well as at the advantage they have of being higher in the temple, than we are; for these circumstances, as they have been occasioned by your negligence, so will they become still greater by being still longer neglected; for their multitude is every day augmented, by their parties, till men running away to those that like to themselves, and their audacity is therefore inflamed because they meet with no obstruction to their designs. And for their higher place, they will make use of it for engines also, and in their new sort of tyranny, if we do not in this, that if we get up to fight them, they will be made tamers by their own consciences; and what advantages they have in the height of their situation, they will lose by the opposition of their reason. To those that are now afflicted by them, and affronted by them, will make what they throw at us return against themselves, and these impious wraths will be killed by their own dart: and let them, if they are so insolent before them, and they will come to nothing. However, it is a right thing, if there should be any danger in the attempt, to die before these holy gates, and to spend our very lives, if not for the sake of our church, but for the sake of his sanctuary. I will assist you both with my counsel and with my hand; nor shall any vagueness of ours be wanting for your support, nor shall you see that I will be sparing of my body neither.
enemies; but the populace grew very angry, and became more and more numerous, and reproached those that gave back, and those behind would not afford room to those that were going off, but forced them on again, till at length they made their hole body to turn. The two assemblies, and the robbers could no longer oppose them, but were forced gradually to retire into the temple; when Ananus and his party fell into it at the same time together with them. This made no longer possible, and deprived them of the first court; so they fled into the inner court immediately, and shut the gates. Now Ananus did not think fit to make any attack against the holy gates, although the other thing that was possible against the temple. He also deemed it unlawful to introduce the multitude into that court before they were purified; he therefore chose out of them all by lot six thousand armed men, and placed them as guards in the cloisters; so there was a succession of such guards one after another, and every one was forced to attend in his course; although many of the chief of the city were dismissed by those that took on them the government, upon their hiring some of the people, and sending them to keep the guard in their stead.

13. Now it was John who, as we told you, ran away from Glischas, that was the occasion of all these proceedings; but when John, in case that he was not present, because of the movement of the people, was not present, because of the movement of the people, was absent, he was, in the person of Ananus, and of the chief of the people, just at this time, the active man against him, for he flattered them so extravagantly, that he was but the more suspected: and his constant attendance every where, even when he was not invited to be present, made him strongly suspected of being a spy of the zealots, or they plainly perceived that they understood all the resolutions taken against them at their consultations. Nor was there any one whom they had so much reason to suspect of that discourse; as the more they were secure of the present, the more they were used to trust in it, and the more potent was he grown by his wicked practices.

He was also supported by many of those eminent men, who were to be consulted upon all considerable affairs; it was therefore thought reasonable to oblige him to give them assurance of his good-will upon oath: accordingly, John took such an oath readily, that he would be on the people's side, and would not betray any of their counsels or enterprises to their enemies, and that he would not overthrow those that attacked them, and that both by his hand and his advice. So Ananus and his party believed his oath, and did now receive him to their consultations without any fear being done. Nay, the zealots did not think him, that they sent him as their ambassador into the temple, to the zealots, with proposals of accommodation; for they were very desirous to avoid the pollution of the temple as much as they possibly could. It was, no one of their nation should be slain therein.

14. But now this John, as if his oath had been made to the zealots, and for confirmation of his good-will to them, and not against them, went into the temple, and stood in the midst of them, and spoke as follows: that he had run many hazards on their account, and in order to let them know of every thing that was secretly connived against them by Ananus and his party: but that birth and he and they should be cast into the most imminent danger, unless some providential assistance were afforded them for that Ananus had appointed a fast for the next day against them, that they might obtain admission in the temple in a rest, and could not be compelled by force, and fight with them there; that he did not see how long they could either endure a siege, or how they could fight against so many enemies....

He added further, that he was by the providence of God he was himself sent an ambassador to them for an accommodation; for that Ananus did therefore offer them such proposals, that he might come upon them when they were unarmed; that they ought to choose one of these two methods, either to interest with his people, and guard them, to save their lives, or to provide some foreign assistance for themselves: that if they fostered themselves with the hopes of parliaments, he denounced to them what desperate things they had done, or could suppose, that as soon as the actors repeated, those that had suffered by them must be presently reconciled to them: while those that have done such injuries, they might expect that the people are frequently hated by the others for such sort of repentance; and that the sufferers, when they get the power into their hands, are usually still more severe upon the actors; that the friends knew how they had been injured, and kindred been equally injured. These were the things that would always be laying plots against them; and that a large body of people were very angry on account of their gross breaches of their laws, and [illegal] judicatures, inasmuch, that although some part might conspire against them, those would be quite overborne by the majority.

CHAP. IV.

The Idumeans, being sent for by the Zealots, came immediately to Jerusalem; and when they were excluded out of the city, they lay all Night there. Jesus, one of the High Priests, makes a Speech to them; and Simon, the Idumeans, makes a Reply to it.

§ 1. Now by this crafty speech John made the zealots afraid; yet he durst not directly name what foreign assistance he meant, but in a covert way only intimated at the Idumeans. But now that he might particularly irritate the leaders of the zealots, he calumniated Ananus, that he was about a piece of barbarity, and did in a special manner threaten them. These leaders were迭代, the son of Simon, who seemed the most plausible man of them all, both in considering what was fit to be done, and in the execution of what he had determined upon, and Zacharias, the son of Phleeke, both of whom derived their families from the temple, now called the foremen. These men had heard not only the common threatenings which belonged to them all, but those peculiarly levelled against themselves, and, besides how Ananus and his party, in order to secure their own dominion, did stigmatize them, to come to them, for that also was part of John's lie, they hesitated a great while what they should and made a market-place, nay, a tem of thieves, without scruple. Matt. xii. 12, 13; Mark xii. 15-17. Accordingly, Josephus himself, when he speaks of the two inner courts of the temple, with the courts of the court of the Gentiles as in our B. v. ch. ix. sect. 3.
do, considering the shortness of the time by which they were straitened; because the people were prepared to attack them very soon, and because the smallness of the plot laid against them had almost cut off all their hopes of getting any assistance; for they might be under the height of their afflictions before any of their confederates could be informed of it. However, it was resolved to call in the Idumeans; so they wrote a short letter to this effect, that "Ananus had imposed upon the people, and was betraying their metropolis to the Romans; that they themselves had revolted from the rest, and were in custody in the temple, on account of the preservation of their liberty; that there was but a small remnant of what they hoped for them; and that unless they would come immediately to their assistance, they should themselves be soon in the power of Ananus, and the city would be in the power of the Romans." Thus were the Idumeans called to their deliverance; and that unless they would come immediately to their assistance, they should themselves be soon in the power of Ananus, and the city would be in the power of the Romans. Now there were two active men proposed for the carrying this message, and such as were well able to speak, and to persuade them that this was true; and yet, what for religion or any other qualification still more necessary than the former, they were very swift of foot; for they knew well enough that these would immediately comply with their desires, as being ever a tumultuous and disorderly nation, always on the watch upon every motion, delighting in mutations; and upon your flattering them ever so little, and petitioning them, they soon take their arms, and put themselves into motion, and make haste to a battle, as if it were to a feast. There was, indeed, occasion for quick dispatch in the carrying of this message, in which point the messengers were no way defective. Both their names were Ananus; and they soon came to the rulers of the Idumeans.

2. Now these rulers were greatly surprised at the contents of the letter, and at what those that came with it further told them; whereupon they were against the nation like madness, and made proclamation that the people should come to war; so a multitude was suddenly got together, sooner indeed than the time appointed in the proclamation, and every body caught up their arms, in order to defend the liberty of the metropolis, and twenty thousand of them were put into battle array, and came to Jerusalem, under four commanders, John and Jacob, the sons of Sosan; and besides these were Simon the son of Cathas, and Phanuel the son of Clodocus.

3. Now this exit of the messengers was not known either to Ananus, or to the guards, but the approach of the Idumeans was known to him; for as he knew of it before they came, he ordered the gates to be shut against them, and that the walls should be guarded. Yet did he not by any means think of fighting against them, but, before they came to blows, to try what persuasions would work. Accordingly, Jesus, the eldest of the high priest, went up to the temple tower that was over against them, and said thus, "Many troubles indeed, and those of various kinds, have fallen upon this city, yet in none of them have we wavered in our resolve against our fortune and our country, when you are come to assist wicked men, and this after a manner very extraordinary; for I see that you are come to support the vilest men against us, and this with so great alacrity, as you could show against the likes, in the metropolis had called you to her assistance against barbarians. And if I had perceived that your army was composed of men like unto those who invited them, I had not deemed your attempt so absurd. For nothing does so much cement the minds of men together as the alliance there is between their manners. But now for these men who have invited you, if you were to examine them one by one, every one of them would be found to have deserved ten thousand deaths; for the very rascality and scoffing of the whole country, who have spent in debauchery their own substance, and, by way of trial beforehand, have shamed the neighboring villages, cities, and towns, in the upshot of all have privately run together into this holy city. They are robbers, who by their profuse wickedness have profaned this most sacred floor, and who are to be watched, and have given more liberty to sancti, and expelling the afores of those whom they have slaughtered upon their unseizable bellies. As for the multitude that is with you, one may see them so decently adorned in their arms and banners, as to suppose they have the metropolis called them to her assistance against foreigners. What can a man call this procedure of yours, but the sport of fortune, when he sees a whole nation coming to protect a mink of wicked for us? to sell ourselves to the Romans; while what it could possibly be that should move you to do this so suddenly; because certainly you would not take on your armor on behalf of robbers, and against a people of kin to you, without considering the consequences. Now, though we have an item that the Romans are pretended, and that we are supposed to be going to betray this city to them; for some of our men have taken ladders later to the temple, and have said they are come to set their metropolis free. Now, we cannot but admire at these wretches in their devising such a lie as this against us; for they knew there was no other way to irritate against us that were naturally desirous of liberty, and on that account the best disposed to fight against foreign enemies, but by framing a tale as if we were going to betray that most desirable thing, liberty. But you ought to be sensible of the confidence of people the Roman; while this calumny, and against what sort of people that calumny is raised, and to gather the truth of things, not by fictitious speeches, but out of the actions of both parties; for what occasion is there for us to sell ourselves to the Romans; while it was in our power not to have revolted from them at first, or, when we had once revolted, to have returned under their dominion again; and this while the neighboring countries were not yet yet extinguished; or to be reconciled to the Romans, if we were desirous of it, they have subdued Galilees, and are thereby become proud and insolent; and to endeavor to please them at the time when they are strong, would bring such a calamity upon us as worse than death. As for myself indeed, I should have preferred peace with them before death; but now we have once made war upon them, and fought with them, I prefer death with repentance, than living in captivity under them. But further, whether do they pretend that we, who are the rulers of the people, have sent thus privately to the Romans, or hath it beer done under a suffrage of the people? If it be ourselves only that have done this, I name those friends of ours that have been sent, as our servants, to manage this treachery. Hath any one been caught as he went out on this errand, and made known the number and companionship of those that were in possession of our letters? How could he be concealed from such a vast number of our fellow-citizens, among whom we are conversant every hour, while what is done privately in the courts in such an affair? For there are not few in number, but no few in number, and under confinement also, and are not able to come out of the temple into the city. Is this the first time that they are come sensible how they ought to be punished for their insolent actions! For while these men were free from the fear they are now under, there was no suspicion raised that any of us were traitors. But if they lay this charge against the people have at these men, nor judge between us, the third thing I have to propose is this, that we let us both alone, and neither insult upon our calamities, nor abide with these plotters against their metropolis: for though you should have over so great a suspicion that some of us have discovered with the Romans, it is the Roman to watch the passages into the city; and in case any thing that we have been accused of is brought to light, them to come, and defend your metropolis, and to inflict punishment on those that are found guilty; for the enemy has probably you who are so near to the city. But if, after all, none of these proposals seem acceptable and moderate, do not you wonder that the gates are shut against you, while you bear your arms about you? 4. Thus shall the idumeans give any attention to what he said, but were in a rage, because they did not meet with a ready entrance into the city. The generals also had indignation at the offer of laying down their arms, and coming to a captivity, to throw them away at any man's injunction whomsoever. But Simon, the son of Cathlis, one of their commanders, with much ado quieted the tumult of his own men, and stood for their important practices but this only, that they become traitors. And now you Idumeans are come hither already with your arms; it is your duty, in the first place, to be assisting to your metropolis, and to join with us in cutting off these and their rampants and rascal and our regular tribunals, that have tramped upon our laws, and made their swords the arbiters of right and wrong; for they have seized upon men of great sense, and under no accusation, as if they were guilty of a crime, as if the high and the bloody, and tortured them with putting them into bonds, and, without bearing to hear what they had to say, or what supplications they made, they de- sist to kill you; if you please, come into the city, though time is precious, and we have taken a view of the marks still remaining of what I now say, and may see the houses that have been depopulated by their rapacious hands, with those wives and families that are in black mourning for their slaughtered relations. Whereupon you hear their groans and lamentations all the city over; for there is nobody but hast tasted of the incursions of these profane wretches, who have proved a people not to die, while the news was not meant to have transferred their impudent robberies out of the country, and the remote cities, into this city, the very face and head of the whole nation, but out of the city into the temple also; for that is the case, I say, they have taken up for the preservation of its liberty. 5. And while they will not intrust the guard of our metropolis to their kindred, profess to make their judges of the differences that are among them; and yet they would have us trust them others without a legal trial, they do themselves conspire a whole nation after an ignominious manner: and have now walled up that city from their own nation, which used to be open to even all foreign nations, and the fountain-bread whose preparations are made against us. And this place, which is adored by the habitable world, and honored by such as only know it by report, as far as the ends of the earth are to have their own among themselves. They now triumph in the desperate condition they are already in, when they hear that one people is going to fight against another people, and one city against another city, these, by themselves, are fighting together against its own bowels. Instead of which procedure, it were highly fit and reasonable, as I said before, for you to join with us in cutting off these wretches, and in particular to be revenged on them for cutting off our heads. And I mean, for having the impudence to invite you to assist them, of whom you ought to have stood in fear, as ready to punish them. But if you have some regard to these men's invocation of you, yet may think that you enrage the city under the notion of our kindred, and take upon you a middle name between that of auxiliaries and of enemies, and so become judges in this cause. However, consider what these men will gain by being called into judgment before you, for such undeniable and such flagrant crimes, who would not themselves, in fear to hear such as had no accusations laid against them to speak a word for themselves. However, let us gain this advantage by your coming. But if, still, they will neither take our part in that indignation we Jerusalem was not assigned or appropriated to the tribe of Benjamin or Judah, but every tribe had equal right to it. (at their coming to worship there at the several festivals.) See a little before, ch. ill. sect. 3. for

And now did the Idumeans make an acclamation to what Simon had said; but Jesus went away sorrowful, as seeing that the Idumeans were against all moderate counsels, and that the city was in danger on both sides. Nor indeed were the minds of the Idumeans at rest, for they were in a rage at the injury that had been offered them by their exclusion out of the city; and when they thought the zealots had been strong, but saw nothing of theirs to support them, they were in doubt about the matter, and many of them repented that they had come thither. But the shame that would attend them in case they returned without doing anything at all, so far overcame that their repentance, that they lay all night before the wall, though in a very bad encampment; for there broke out a prodigious storm in the night, with the utmost violence, and very heavy rain, with the largest showers of rain, with continual lightnings, terrible thunderings, and amazing concussions and bellowings of the earth, that was in an earthquake. These things were a manifest indication that some disaster was coming upon men when the system of the world was put into this disorder, and any one would guess that these wonders foreboded some great calamities that were coming.

Now the opinion of the Idumeans and of the citizens of Jerusalem was the same. The Idumeans thought that God was angry at their taking arms, and that they would not escape punishment for their making war upon their metropolis. Ananus and his party thought that they had conquered without fighting, and that God acted as a general for them; but truly they proved both ill conjurers at what was to come, and made those events to be ominous to their enemies, while they were themselves to undergo the ill effects of them. The Idumeans feared that another enemy was uniting their bodies into one band, and thereby kept themselves warm, and connecting their shields over their heads, were not so much hurt by the rain. But the zealots were more deeply concerned at the danger that was in them, as they were for themselves, and got together, and looked about them to see whether they could devise any means of assisting them. The hotter sort of them thought it best to force their guards with their arms, and after that to fall into the midst of the city, and publicly open the gates to those that came to their assistance; as supposing the guards would be in disorder, and give way at such an unexpected attempt of theirs, especially if they were the part of the Idumeans that was armed, and unskilled in the affairs of war; and that besides, the multitude of the citizens would not be easily gathered together, but confined to their houses by the storm; and if there were any hazard in their undertaking, it became them to suffer any thing whatsoever themselves, rather than to overlook so great a multitude as were miserably perishing on their account. But the meaner sort of them disapproved of their forcible method, because they saw not only the guards about them very numerous, but the walls of the city itself carefully watched, by reason of the Idumeans. They also supposed that Ananus was counselled on this expedition, which was done every hour; which indeed was done upon other nights, but was omitted that night, not by reason of any slothfulness of Ananus, but by the overbearing appointment of fate. That so both he might himself perish, and the multitude of the guards might perish with him; for truly as the night was far gone, and the storm was very terrible, Ananus gave the guards in the cloisters leave to go to sleep; while it came into the heads of the zealots to set them on, and they employed and to cut the bars of the gates to pieces. The noise of the wind, and that not inferior sound of the thunder, did here also conspire with their designs, that the noise of the wave was not heard by the Idumeans.

7. So they secretly went out of the temple to the wall of the city, and made use of their swords, and opened that gate which was over against the Idumeans. Now it came to pass upon the Idumeans themselves, which disturbed them, as imagining that Ananus and his party were coming to attack them, so that every one of them had his right hand upon his sword, in order to defend himself; but they soon came to know so that they were that came to them, and were known to enter the city. And had the Idumeans then fallen upon the city, nothing could have hindered them from destroying the people every man of them, such was the rage they were in at that time; but they first of all made haste to get to the zealots out of custody, which those that brought them earnestly desired them to do, and not to overlook those for whose sakes they were come, in the zealots. And indeed they were put into a still greater danger; for that when they had once seized upon the guards, it would be easy for them to fall upon the city; but that if the city were once alarmed, they would not then be able to defend themselves as soon as they should perceive they were there, they would put themselves in order to fight them, and would hinder their coming into the temple.

CHAP. V.
The Cruelty of the Idumeans, when they were gotten into the Temple, during the Storm; and of the Zealots, Concerning the Slaughter of Ana- num and his Brethren, and Zacharias. And how the Idumeans retired home.

§ 1. Thus advice pleased the Idumeans; and they ascended through the city to the temple. The zealots were also in great expectation of their coming, and earnestly waited for them. When the Idumeans came through the outer door, they came boldly out of the inner temple, and mixing themselves with the Idumeans, they attacked the guards; and some of those that were upon the watch, but were fallen asleep, they killed as they were, and likewise some of those that came of the Idumeans, who made a cry, the whole multitude arose, and in the amazement they were in, caught hold of their arms immediately, and betook themselves to their own defence; and so long as they thought they were only the zealots who attacked them, they went on boldly, as hoping to overpower them by their numbers; but when they saw others pressing in upon them also, they perceived the Idumeans were got in; and the greatest part of the Idumeans being armed, dropped all their courage, and betook themselves to lamentations. But some few of the younger sort covered themselves with their armor, and valiantly received the Idumeans, and for a while protected the multitude of old men. Others, indeed, gave a signal to those that were in the city the calamities they were in; but when these were also made sensible that the Idumeans were come in, they set upon them all together, and faintly only, they returned the terrible echo of wailing and lamented their misfortunes. A great howling of the women was excited also, and every one of the guards were in danger of being killed. The words of this story, in which the zealots and the Idumeans; and the storm itself rendered the cry more terrible; nor did the Idumeans spare any body, for as they naturally a most barbarous and bloody nation, had been distressed by the tempest, they made use of their weapons against those that had shut the gates against them, and acted in the same manner as to those that supplicated for their lives, and to those that fought them, insomuch that they ran through those with their swords who desired them to re- main still in the temple, and the stone wall to be broken, and begged of them to have regard to their com- mon temple. Now there was at present neither any place for flight, nor any hope of preservation, but as they were driven one upon another to cast a way their dead, without any other part were driven together by force, as there was now no place of retirement, and the murder- ers were upon them, and having no other way, threw themselves down headlong into the city; whereas as a last effect, they underwent a miserable destruction than that which they avoided, because that was a voluntary one. And now the outer temple was all of it overflowed with blood; and that day, as it came on, saw eight thousand five hundred dead bodies there.

2. But the rage of the Idumeans was not satis- tisied by these slaughters; but they now be- tooke themselves to the city, and plundered every house, and slew all their sons into the sixth hour; and another multitude, they esteemed it needless to go on with killing them; but they sought for the high priests, and the generality went with the greatest zeal against them; and as soon as they caught them, they put them upon their dead bodies, in way of jest, upbraided Ananus with his kindness to the people, and Ja- nus with his speech made to them from the wall. Nay, they proceeded to that degree of impiety, as to have no favor to be shown to them without bia- rial, although the Jews used to take so much care of the burial of men, that they took down those that were condemned and crucified, and buried them before the going down of the sun. I should say, upon their heads, for Ananus was the beginning of the destruction of the city, and that from this very day may be dated the overthrow of her wall, and the ruin of her affairs, whereas they saw their high priest, and the procures of their preservation, slain in the midst of their city. He was on other accounts also a venerable and a very just man; and besides the grandeur of that nobility, and dignity, and honor, of which he was possessed, he had been a lamb to God more than six years, the most of the meanest of the people; he was a prodigous lover of liberty, and an admirer of a democracy in government, and did ever prefer the public welfare before his own advantage, and preferred persons in all the employments. Insomuch that many of them were sensible that the Romans were not to be conquer- ed. He also foresaw that of necessity a war would follow; and that unless the Jews made up matters with them very dexterously, they would be de- stroyed: to say all in a word, if Ananus sur- vived: they had certainly compounded matters; for he was a shrewd man in speaking and per- suading the people, and had already gotten the means sufficient to seize his estate, and to get there for the war. And the Jews had then put absence of delays in the way of the Romans, if they had had such a general as he was. Jesus was also joined with him, and although he was inferior to him upon the comparison, he was superior to the rest; and I cannot but think, that it was because God had doomed the city to de- struction, as a polluted city, and was resolved to purge his sanctuary by fire, that he cut off these their wise and learned men, in order to put those that a little before had worn the sacred garments, and had presided over the public worship, and been esteemed venerable by those that dwelt on the whole habitable earth when they were alive, and had been for many years ke- eled, and seen to be the food of dogs and wild beasts. And I cannot but imagine that vitor- itself groaned at these men's cases, and lamented that she was here so terribly conquered by wick- edness. And this at last was the end of Ananus and Jesus.

3. Now, after these were slain, the zealots and the multitude of the Idumeans fell upon the people as upon a flock of profane animals, and cut their throats; and for the ordinary sort, they were destroyed in what place soever they caught them. But for the noblemen and the youth, they first caught them and bound them, and shut them up in prison. In order against their friends and friends that of some them would turn over to their party; but not one of them would comply with their de- sires, but all of them preferred death before being inrolled among such wicked wretches as acted so cowardly. And they pursued their captives by force of thousands of them brought upon them terrible torments; for they were so scourged and tortured, that their bodies were not able to sustain their torments, till at length, and with difficulty, they had the leave to be loosed, and enfranchised. That was the time they caught in the day time were slain in the night, and then their bodies were carried out and thrown away, that there might be room for other prisoners; and the terror that was upon the people was so great, that none had courage enough of itself to be weep openly for the dead man that was related to him, or to bury him; but those that were shut up in their own houses could only shed tears in secret, and durst not even groan without great caution, lest any of their enemies should hear them; for if they did, those that mourned for others soon underwent the same death with those whom they mourned for. Only in the night time they would take up a little dust, and throw it upon the bodies; but before that meekness had ready to expose themselves to danger would do it in the day time; and there were twelve thousand of the better sort which perished in this manner.

4. And now these zealots and Idumeans were quite weary of barely killing men, so they had the impudence of setting up fictitious tribunals and judicatures for that purpose; and as they in- tended to have Zacharias, the son of Baruch, one of the most eminent of the citizens, slain; so, what provoked them against him was, that hatred of wickedness and love of liberty which were so eminent in him: he was also a rich man, so that by taking him off, they did not only hope to take off the friend of the wealthy, but also a man that had great power to destroy them. So they called together, by a public proclamation, seventy of the principal men of the populace, for a show, Baruch, in Josephus, was then about thirty-four years future; and since that slaughter was between the ten pe- ple and the Idumeans, it is evident that this story do not belong to the time of the temple; and that Zacharias the son of Baruch is not Zacharias in the text of 1 Macc. 7, 23, and Zacharias the son of Baruch, whom our Saviour says the Jews slew between the temple and the al- se. But this Zacharias was not the same, because Zacharias the son of Josephus in almost all the copies of the text of Zacharias and grandson of Ida, Zech. 1, 1, and how he was put to death, viz., be putting into the temple have no authority that that before St. Matthew; while this Zacharias was the son of Baruch; since the slaughter was past when our Sav- iour spoke those words, the Jews had then already slain him, whereas the slaughter of Zacharias the son of

5. And now did the Idumaeans make an acclamation to what Simon had said; but Jesus went away sorrowful, as seeing that the Idumaeans were against all moderate counsels, and that the city was besieged on both sides. Nor indeed were the minds of the Idumaeans at rest, for they were in a rage at the injury that had been offered them by their exclusion out of the city; and when they became friends to liberty, and repent of what they have done against it."

7. So they secretly went out of the temple to the wall of the city, and made use of their saws, and opened that gate which was over against the Idumaeans. Now at first there came a fear upon the Idumaeans themselves, which disturbed them, as imagining that Ananus and his party were coming to attack them, so that every one of them had his right hand upon his sword, in order to defend himself. But when the noise of the saws was not heard by the others.

The Cruelty of the Idumaeans, when they were gotten into the Temple, during the Storm: and of the Zealots. Concerning the Slaughter of Ananus, and Jesus, and Zacharias. And how the Idumaeans retired home.

§ 1. Tarn advice pleased the Idumaeans; and they ascended through the city to the temple. The zealots were also in great expectation of their coming, and were in at that time; but when they perceived that the Idumaeans were not to be opposed, they went out of the temple, and awaited the Idumaeans. When therefore these were entering, they also came boldly out of the inner temple, and and united themselves with the Idumaeans, they attacked the guards; and some of those that were upon the inside of the temple, and some that were asleep, but as those that were now awakened made a cry, the whole multitude arose, and in the tumult they were in, caught hold of their arms immediately, and betook themselves to the wall of the temple, and took the guards which they thought were only the zealots who attacked them, they went on boldly, as hoping to overpower them by their numbers; but when they saw others pressing upon them also, they perceived the multitude of them that were with them, and laid aside their arms, together with their courage, and betook themselves to lamentations. But some few of the younger sort covered themselves with their arms, and valiantly received the Idumaeans, and for a while protected the multitude of old men. Others, indeed, gave a signal to those that were in the city of the calamities they were in; but when these were also made sensible that the Idumaeans were come, they returned the terrible echo of waiting, and lamented their misfortunes. A great howling of the women was excited also, and every one of the guards was in danger of being killed. The storm of Idumaeans was so terrible that they utterly overran the Idumaeans; and the storm itself rendered the city more terrible; nor did the Idumaeans spare any body, for as they are naturally a most barbarous and bloody nation, all had been despatched by the tempest, they made use of their weapons against those that had shot the gates against them, and acted in the same manner as to those that supplicated for their lives, and to those that fought them, insomuch that they ran through those with their swords who desired them to remember the relation there was between them, and begged of them to have regard to their common interest, and that they had destroyed them to any place for flight, nor any hope of preservation, but as they were driven one upon another in heaps, so were they slain. Thus the greater part were driven together by force, as there were no place of concealment that they might not find, and those that were upon them, and having no other way, threw themselves headlong into the city; whereby, is my opinion, they underwent a more mischievous destruction than which they avoided, because that was a voluntary act. The outer temple was all of it overshadowed with blood; and that day, as it came on, saw eight thousand five hundred dead bodies there.

Those whom they caught in the day time were slain in the night, and then buried in their houses, and the ruin of her affairs, whereas they saw their high priest, and the procurer of their preservation, slain in the midst of their city. Baruch, in Josephus, was then about thirty-four years future; and since that slaughter was between the temple and the altar, in the court of the priests, one of the most sacred parts of the temple, and judge-as if they were real judges, while they had no proper authority. Before these was Zacharias accused of a design to betray their policy to the Romans, and of having treasonously sent to Herodians for that purpose. Now there appeared no proof or sign of what he was accused of, but they affirmed themselves that they were well persuaded that so it was, and desired that such their affirmation might be taken for sufficient evidence. So then, when Zacharias clearly saw that there was no way remaining for his escape from them, as having been treacherously called before them, and then put in prison, but not with any intention of a legal trial, he took great liberty of speaking to them; he did not deny the imputation of life and death. Accordingly he stood up, and laughed at their pretended accusation, and in a few words confuted the crimes laid to his charge; after which he turned his speech to his accusers, and went over all the practices of the law, and made heavy lamentation upon the confusion they had brought public affairs to; in the mean time the zealots grew tumultuous, and had much ado to abstain from drawing their swords, although they would preserve the appearance and show of judicature to the end. They were also desirous, on other accounts, to try the judges, whether they would be mindful of what was just at their own peril. Now the seventy judges being brought up, the verdict, that every person accused was not guilty, as choosing rather to die themselves with him, than to have his death laid at their doors: hereupon there arose a great clamor of the zealots upon his acquittal, and they all kept back at the judgment, for not understanding that the authority that was given them was but in jest. So two of the boldest of them fell upon Zacharias in the middle of the temple, and stabbed him; and as he fell down dead, they bantered him, and said, 'Thou hast also our verdict, and this will prove a more sure acquittal to thee than the other. They also threw him down from the temple immediately into the valley beneath it. Moreover, they struck the judges with the backs of their swords, by way of abuse, and thrust them out of the court of the temple, and spared their lives with no other design than that, when they were dispersed among the people in the city, they might become their messengers, to let them know they were no better than slaves.

5. But by this time the Idumaeans repented of their coming, and were displeased at what had befallen them. And they assembled together by one of the zealots, who had come privately to them, he declared to them what a number of wicked pranks they had themselves done in conjunction with those that invited them, and gave an account of what mischief had been done against their metropolis. He said, that "they had taken arms, as though the high priests were betraying their metropolis to the Romans, but had made no indication of any such treachery, that they might have procured those that had pretended to believe such a thing, while they did themselves the works of war and tyranny after an insolent manner. It had been indeed the business of the people to have hasted them from sun up to their proceedings at the first, but seeing they had once been partners with them in shedding the blood of their own countrymen, it was high time to put a stop to such crimes, and not continue them, any more assistance to such as are subverting the laws of their forefathers; for that if any had taken it ill that the gates had been shut against them, and they had not been permitted to come into the city, yet that those who had excluded them have been punished; and Amasis is dead, and that almost all those people had been destroyed in one night's time. That one may perceive many of themselves now repenting for what they had done, and might see the horrid barbarity of those that had invited them, and that they had no regard to such as had saved them; that they were so inimical as to perpetrate the vilest acts, under the eyes of those that had supported them; and that their future actions would be laid to the charge of the Idumaeans, and would be so laid to their charge till somebody obstructs their proceedings, or separates himself from the same wicked action; that they therefore ought to retire home, since they had given themselves to treason appears by a calamity, and that there was no expectation of the coming of the Romans at this time, and that the government of the city was secured by such walls as cannot easily be thrown down. And, by seizing the opportunity of their own destruction, make some excuse for themselves, as they had been so far deluded as to have been partners with them hitherto."

CHAP. VI.

How the Zealots, when they were freed from the Idumaeans, slew a great many more of the Citizens. And how Neposianus disturbed the Romans, when they were very earnest to march against the Jews, from proceeding in the War at that Time.

1. The Idumaeans complied with these persuasions, and in the first place they set those that were in the prisons at liberty, being about two thousand of the populace, who thereupon fled away immediately to Simon, one whom we shall speak of presently. After which these Idumaeans retired from theirropic places, which departure of theirs was a great surprise to both parties; for the people not knowing of their repentance, pulled up their courage for a while, as eased of so many of their enemies, so as to be able to run some of their shortest methods for all their executions; and what they had once resolved upon, they put in practice sooner than any one could imagine. But their thrist was chiefly after the blood of Jews, and it was a very great desire of their sort of which they destroyed out of envy, the other out of fear; for they thought their whole security lay in leaving no potent men alive; on which account they slew Goriion, a person eminently renowned; and they killed also; he was also for a democracy, and of as great boldness and freedom of spirit as were any of the Jews whosoever; the principal thing that ruined him, added to his other advantages, was his free speaking. Nor did Niger of Bechiches escape their hands: he had been a man of great valor in their war with the Romans, but was now drawn through the middle of the city; and as he went he was most cruelly put to death, and showed the scars of his wounds; and when he was brought out of the gates, and despaired of his preservation, he besought them to grant him a burial; but as they had threatened him beforehand not to grant it, he death they offered to be chiefly desired of them, so did they slay him [without permitting him to be buried.] Now when they were slaying him, he made this impassion upon them, that they might undergo both for his sake, and for the Romans, all that they might come to the mutual slaughter of one another; all which imprecations God confirmed against these impious men, and was what came most justly upon them, when not long after they tasted of their own medicine, as in their mutual seditions one against another. So when this Niger was killed, their fears of being overturned were diminished; and, indeed, there was no part of the people but they found out some pretence to destroy them; for some were, therefore, slain, because they had differences with some of them: and as to those who had not opposed them in times of peace, they watched reasonable opportunities to gain some accusation against them; and if any one did not come near them at the very first, they used to pursue him, as if he had not broken the law, and had only committed a great fault by chance. For he was a proud man: if any one came with boldness, he was esteemed a contemner of them: and if any one came as aiming to oblige them, he was supposed to have some treacherous plot against them, and was seized that very day, and cast into prison, as they had determined, whether they were of the greatest or smallest sort, was death. Nor could any one escape unless he were very inconceivable, either on account of the meanness of his birth or on account of his wealth.

2. And now all the rest of the commanders of the Romans deemed this sedition among their enemies to be of great advantage to them, and were very earnest to march to the city; and they used to say, in order to make haste, and to say to him, that "the providence of God is on our side, by setting our enemies at variance against one another; that still the change in such cases may be advantageous, and that it may be the better case for us, because they may be tired out of their civil miseries, or repent them of such doings." But Vespasian replied, that "they were greatly mistaken in what they thought fit to be shown them, because the enemy, who were the most of them, made a show of their hands, and of their weapons, but do it at their own hazard, without considering what was for their advantage, and for their security; for that if they now go and attack the city immediately, they shall be occasion to their enemies to unite together, and shall convert their force, now it is in its height, against themselves. But if they stay awhile they shall have fewer enemies, because the Jews will be consumed in this medley; that he acts as a general of the Romans better than he can do, and is giving the Jews up to them without any pains of their own, and granting their army a victory without any danger; that therefore let them be bold, and let them take on themselves the labors of the city. For us we shall lay upon them the hard labor of war: for we ought to esteem those that do what is agreeable to temperance and prudence, no less glorious than those that have gained great reputation by their actions in war: that he shall lend on his army with greater force, when their enemies are diminished, and his own army refreshed after the continual labors they had undergone. However, that this is not a proper time to propose to ourselves the glory of victory; for those that are exchanged may be prejudiced in the favor of an enemy; those that are made to be exchange in the making of armor or building of walls, nor indeed in getting together auxiliaries, while the advantage will be on their side who give them such opportunity of delay; but those that are exchanged are vexed to pieces every day by their civil wars and dissensions, and are under greater miseries than, if they were once taken, could be inflicted on them by us. Whether therefore any one hath regard to what is for our safety, he shall lend on his army with greater force, to do otherwise, or

*This prediction that "the city of Jerusalem" should then be taken, and the sanctuary burnt, by right of war, when a sedition should invade the Jews, and their city and temple be destitute of their princes, is quoted as concluded by B. vi. ch. xx. sec. 4, 5. — "When any one shall begin to stay his countrymen in the city," etc. It is wanting in our previous copies of the Old Testament. See Essay on the Old Test., p. 104—112. But this prediction, as Josephus well remarks here, though with the other predicwhether he hath regard to the greater glory of the action, we ought by no means to meddle with those men, now they are afflicted with a desolator at home; for should we now conquer them, it would be said the conquest was not owing to our bravery, but to their sedition."

3. And now the commanders joined in their approbation of what Vespasian had said, and it was soon discovered how wise an opinion he had given. And indeed many there were of the Jews that deserted them that very day, and went to the Romans, and described them how money get clear off, while he only that gave them none was voted a traitor. So the upshot was this, that the rich purchased their flight by money, while none but the poor were slain. Along all the roads they were shut up in barns and houses; and lay on heaps, and even many of those that were so zealous in deserting, at length chose rather to perish within the city; for the hopes of burial made death in their own city appear of the two places less terrible to them. But those that were left to that degree of barbarity, as not to bestow a burial either on these slain in the city, or on those that lay along the roads; but as if they had made an agreement among themselves that they should all burn them, in order that they might destroy their own nations, and the laws of their country and the laws of God, and at the same time that they defiled men with their wicked actions, they would pollute the Divinity itself also, they left the dead bodies to putrify under the sun; and the same punishment was allotted to such as buried, as to those that deserted, which was no other than death; while he that granted the favor of a grave to another, would presently stand in need of a grave himself. To all which, it was said in a word, no one would remain unblamed; nor was any one of them entirely lost among them as mercy; for what were the greatest objects of pity did most of all irritate these wretches, and they transferred their rage from the living to those that had been slain, and from the dead to the living. Nor was the terror so very great, that he who survived called them that were first dead happy, as being at rest already; as did those that were under torture in the prisons, declare, that, upon this occasion, they lay under no miseries whatever.

These men, therefore, trampled upon all the laws of men, and laughed at the laws of God; and for the oracles of the prophets, they ridiculed them as the tricks of jugglers; yet did they think that these prophets were speaking [the rewards of] virtue, and [punishments of] vice, which when these zealots violated, they occasioned the fulfilling of those very prophecies belonging to their own country; for there was a certain ancient race of those men, that "the city should then be taken and the sanctuary burnt," by right of war, when a sedition should invade the Jews, and their own hands should pollute the temple of God." Now while those zealots did not [Jehovah] believe these predictions, they made themselves the instruments of their accomplishment.

CHAP. VII.

How John tyrannized over the rest; and what Mischiefs the Zealots did at Masada. How also Vespasian took Gadera; and what Actions were performed by him.

1. By this time John was beginning to tyrannize, and thought it beneath him to accommodate the actions of the prophets it was now touched by the se dictions, were by their very means soon exactly fulfilled. However, I cannot but here take notice of Grotius's positive suspicions that Joseph. Matt. xvi, 1, here quoted by Dr. Houghton, that "it ought to be taken for granted, as a certain truth, that many predictions of the Jewish prophets were preserved not in writing, but by memory." Whence, it seems to me, so far from certain that I think it has no evidence nor probability of all.
as if they were real judges, while they had no proper authority. Before these was Zacharias accused of a design to betray their polity to the Romans, and of having treacherously sent to Vespasian for that purpose. Now there appeared no proof or sign of what he was accused of, but they affirmed themselves that they were well persuaded that so it was, and desired that such their affirmation might be taken for sufficient evidence. Now when Zacharias clearly saw that there was no way remaining for his escape from them, as having been treacherously called before them, and then put in prison, but not with any intention of a legal trial, he took great liberty of speaking to them, and was under. Accordingly he stood up, and laughed at their pretended accusation, and in a few words confuted the crimes laid to his charge; after which he turned his speech to his accusers, and went over dear a part of the text of the law, and made heavy lamentation upon the confusion they had brought public affairs to; in the mean time the zealots grew tumultuous, and had much ado to restrain from drawing their swords, although they presented to preserve the appearance and show of judicature to the end. They were also desirous, on other accounts, to try the judges, whether they would be mindful of what was just at their own peril. Now the seventy judges being present, and the accused person accused was not guilty, as choosing rather to die themselves with him, than to have his death laid at their doors: hereupon there arose a great clamor of the zealots upon his acquisal, and they all cried out for not understanding that the authority that was given them was but in jest. So two of the boldest of them fell upon Zacharias in the middle of the temple, and as he fell down dead, they banished him, and said, "Thus hast also our verdict, and this will prove a more sure acquittal to thee than the other. As I by words, or any farther means of which he was able, to make some excuse for themselves, as to what they had been so tar deluded as to have been partners with them hitherto."

CHAP. VI.

How the Zealots, when they were freed from the Idumaeans, slew a great many more of the Citizens. And how Vespasian disarmed the Romans, when they were very earnest to march against the Jews, from proceeding in the War at that Time.

1. The Idumaeans complied with these persuasions: in the first place they set those that were in the prisons at liberty, being about two thousand of the populace, who thereupon fled away immediately to Simon, one whom we shall speak of presently. After which these Idumaeans retired from them, and were made free, which departure of theirs was a great surprise to both parties; for the people not knowing of their repentance, pulled up their courage for a while, as easied of so many of their enemies. And when the zealots grew more insolent, not as deserted by their confederates, but as freed from such men as might hinder their designs, and put some stop to their wickedness. Accordingly, they made no longer any delay, nor took any deliberation what to do. And the Romans, who were for the shortest methods for all their executions; and what they had once resolved upon, they put in practice sooner than any one could imagine. But their thirst was chiefly after the blood of vassals, and men of a great sort of which they destroyed out of envy, the other out of fear; for they thought their whole security lay in leaving no potent men alive; or which account they slew Giorion, a person eminent for their appearance, and not less so than he; he was also for a democracy, and of so great boldness and freedom of spirit as were any of the Jews whatsoever; the principal thing that ruined him, added to their other advantages, was his free speaking. Nor did Nigrus of Jerusalem escape their hands: he had been a man of great valor in their war with the Romans, but was now drawn through the middle of the city; as, as he went he frequently cried out, and showed their design of destroying many people. But the gates were got out of the gates, and disarmed of his preservation, he besought them to grant him a burial; but as they had threatened him beforehand not to let him go awake, and then to be buried, which he chiefly desired of them, so did they slay him [without permitting him to be buried]; Now when they were slaying him, he made this intercession upon them, that they might undergo both by their own violence, what they intended, and all, that they might come to the mutual slaughter of one another; all which imprecations God confirmed against those impious men, and was what came most justly upon them, when not long afterward they tasted of their own medicine, in their mutual seditions one against another. So when this Nigrus was killed, their fear of being overturned were diminished; and, indeed, there was no part of the people but they found out some pretense to destroy them; for some were, therefore, since, because they had differences with some of them; and as to those who had not opposed them in times of peace, they watched seasons opportunities to gain some occupation against them, and if any of them died, he was under their suspicion as a proud man: if any one came with boldness, he was esteemed a contemner of them; and if any one came as aiming to oblige them, he was supposed to have already seen them. And if they were absent from them; while the only punishment of crimes, whether they were of the greatest or smallest sort, was death. Nor could any one escape unless he were very inconsiderable, either on account of the meaness of his birth or on account of his fortune.

3. And now all the rest of the commanders of the Romans deemed this sedition among their enemies to be of great advantage to them, and were not represented by themselves to the urged Vespasian, as their lord and general in all cases, to make haste, and said to him, that "the providence of God is on our side, by settling our enemies at variance against one another; that still more advanced their country, and that they will be accomplished without the theatre, love to make a show of their hands, and of their weapons, but do it at their own hazard, without considering what was for their advantage, and for their security; for if they stay awhile, they shall have fewer enemies, since the only way their enemies are destroying each other with their own hands, and falling into the greatest misfortunes, which is the case, to sit still as spectators of the dangers and torture in the theatre, and to hang with men that love murder, and are mad one against another. But if any one imagines that the glory of victory, when it is gotten without fighting, will be more insipid, let him know that the glory of victory is the more ancient, and what is obtained is more profitable than the dangers of a battle; for we ought to esteem those that do what is agreeable to temperance and prudence, no less glorious than those that have gained great things. For he shall lead on his army with greater force, when their enemies are diminished, and his own army refreshed after the continual labours they had undergone. However, that this is not a proper time for action, (for theews are now employed in making of armor or building of walls, nor indeed in getting together auxiliaries, while the advantage will be on their side who give them some present to the enemy of delay; but that the Jews are vased to pieces every day by their civil wars and dissensions, and are under greater miseries than, if they were once taken, could be inflicted on them by us. Whether therefore any one has reason to doubt that these Jews to destroy another, or whether he hath regard to the greater glory of the action, we ought by no means to meddle with those men, now they are afflicted with a desolation at home; for should we now conquer them, it would be said the conquest was not owing to our bravery, but to their sedition." And now the commanders joined in their approbation of what Vespasian had said, and it was soon discovered how wise an opinion he had formed, in the very number of the Jews that deserted every day, and fled away from the sealots, although their flight was very difficult since they had guarded every passage out of the city, and slew every one that was caught at them, as taking it for granted they were going over to the Romans; yet did he who gave them money get clear off, while he only that gave them none was voted a traitor. So the sabbath was this, that the rich purchased their flight by money, while the poor was to be obtained by the艰辛 of war. And all the roads also vast numbers of dead bodies lay on heaps, and even many of those that were so zealous in desiring, at length chose rather to perish within the city; for the hopes of burial made death less terrible to them in their own country, and the very terror of the country and the laws of nature, and at the same time that they defied men with their wicked actions, they would pollute the Divinity itself also, they left the dead bodies to putrify under the same sun; and if their bodies had been exposed to such as buried any, as to those that deserted, which was no other than death; while he that granted the favor of a grave to another, would present himself in need of a grave himself. To any all in a way much more fitting, so entirely lost among them as mercy; for what were the greatest objects of pity did most of all irritate these wretches, and they transferred their rage from the living to the dead. Nay, the terror was so very great, that he who survived called them that were first dead happy, as being at rest already; as did those that were under better circumstances, and not at all in the same comparison, those that lay unburied were the happiest. These men, therefore, trampled upon all the laws of men, and laughed at the laws of God; and for the oracles of the prophets, they ridiculed them. For the majority of these prophets foretell many things concerning [the rewards of] virtue, and [punishments of] vice, which when these sealots violated, they occasioned the fulfilling of these very prophecies, which belong to the time of our Lord. For there was a certain ancient oracle of those men, that "the city should then be taken and the sanctuary burnt," by right of war, when a sedition should invade the Jews, and their own hands should pollute the temple of God." However, the sealots did not [quite] disbelieve these predictions, they made themselves the instruments of their accomplishment.

CHAP. VII.

How John tyrannized over the rest: and what Mischief the Zealots did at Masada. How Vespasian took Masada; and what Actions were performed by Placidius.

1. By this time John was beginning to tyrannize, and thought it beneath him to accept the predictions of the prophets it was now lawful led by them, and that the sanctuary burnt, by right of war, when a sedition should invade the Jews, because their own hands should pollute that temple;" or, as it is in St. vi. ch. xii. sect. 5., "When any one shall begin to slay his countrymen in the city," is wanting in our pre-of barely the same honours that others had; and joining to himself by degrees a party of the wickedest of them all, he broke off from the rest of the faction. This was brought about by his still disagreeing with the opinions of others, and giving out injunctions of his own in a very improper manner, and that it was not civil war, but a monarchical power. Now some submitted to him out of their fear of him, and others out of their good-will to him; for he was a shrewd man to entice men to him, both by declaring them and putting cheats upon them. Nay, many there were that thought they should be safer themselves, if the causes of their past inordinate actions should now be reduced to one head, and the great many of great activity should be very opportunity to ravage the same. Accordingly, when every one of them had plundered their own villages, they then retired into the deserts; and yet were these men that now got together and joined in the conspiracy by parties, so small for an army, and too many for a gang of thieves; and thus did they fall upon the holy places, and the cities; yet did it now so happen that they were sometimes very ill treated by those upon whom they had been brought up; and inasmuch as they knew that he would have this pretence always against them, that they had opposed him when he was first advanced; while every one chose rather to suffer anything whatsoever in war, than to be taken in a voluntary slavery for some time, they should afterward perish. So the sedition was divided into two parts, and John reigned in opposition to his adversaries over one of them; but for their leaders, the other led them, and yet they did not all, or at least very little, meddle with arabs in their quarrels, but they fought earnestly against the people, and contended one with another of which of them should bring home the greatest prize. And the city had struggled with three of the greatest misfortunes, war, and tyranny, and sedition, it appeared upon the comparison, that the war was the least troublesome to the populace of them all. Accordingly, they ran away from their own houses to foreigners, and obtained that preservation from the Romans which they despaired to obtain among their own people.

And now a fourth misfortune arose, in order to bring our nation to destruction. There was a fortress of very great strength not far from Jerusalem, which had been built by our ancient kings, both as a repository for their effects in the house, and as a subject of the preservation of their bodies at the same time. It was called Macedion. Those that were called Sicarii had taken possession of it formerly, but at this time they overran the neighboring countries, aiming only to procure to themselves necessaries; and these were then in prevented their farther ravages. But when once they were informed that the Roman army lay still, and that the Jews were divided by sedition and tyranny, they boldly undertook great enterprises against their country, and at the head of unleavened bread, which the Jews celebrate in memory of their deliverance from the Egyptian bondage, when they were sent back into the country of their forefathers, they came down by night, without any notice to those that could have prevented them, and overran a certain small city called Engaddi. In which expedition they prevented those citizens that could have stopped them, before they could arm themselves, and caught them unawares. They also dispersed them, and cast them out of the city; so for such as could not run away, being women and children, they

* By these civili or holy places, as distinct from cities, must be meant _proconsules_, or houses of prayer, out of cities: of which we find mention made in the New Testament and other authors. See Luke vi. 12; Acts xxi. 35, 36; Antig. B. xiv. ch. x. sect. 35; his Life, sect. 36. 16. _1000 v._ pius, publicius, praecipuus.
people of Gades admitted Vespasian with joyful acclamations, and received from him the security of his right hand, as also a garrius of horsemen and footmen, to guard them against the excursions of the rumagetae; for as to their wall, they had pulled it down before the Romans discovered it, so they might not give them assurance that they were lovers of peace, and that, if they had a mind, they could not now make war against them.

And since Placidus did not wish to send them back from Gades with five hundred horsemen, and three thousand footmen, while he returned himself to Ceorea with the rest of the army, but as soon as these fugitives arrived, he placed them just behind their backs, and before they came in close fight, they ran together to a certain village, which was called Bethanahs, where finding a great multitude of young men, and arming them, partly by their own consent, partly by force, they readily and suddenly assaulted Placidus and the troops that were with them. These horsemen at the first onset gave way a little, as contriving to ensnare them farther off the wall, and when they had driven them near the place that those, as soon as they saw their courage, and then destroyed: for as they fell upon the Romans, when they were joined close together, and, as it were, walling about with their entire armor, they were not able to charge them, nor to resist their terror; nor were they able to break their ranks, while they were themselves ran through by the Roman darts, and, like the wildest of wild beasts, rushed upon the points of others' swords; some of them were destroyed with their enemies' swords upon their faces, and others were dispersed by the horsemen.

5. Now Placidus' concern was to exclude them in their flight from getting into the village, and causing his horse to march cautiously on that side of them, he then turned short upon them, and at the same time his men made use of their darts, and easily took their aim at those that were nearest to them, as they made those that were behind them; and then back upon each other those were in, till at last the most courageous of them brake through those horsemen, and fled to the wall of the village. And now those that guarded the wall were in great doubt what to do; for the men that were about the village were those that came from Gades, because of their own people that were among them; and yet if they should admit them, they expected to perish with them, which came to pass accordingly; for as they were crowding together and in disorder, the Roman horsemen were just ready to fall in with them. However, the guards prevented them and shut the gates, when Placidus made an assault upon them, and fighting courageously till his darts and his swords had fallen upon the wall, and of them that were in the city, when the useless multitude were destroyed, but those that were more potent ran away, and the soldiers placed themselves by those that was under the village on fire. As for those that ran out of the village, they stirred up such as were in the country; and exasperating their own calamiies, and telling them that the whole army of the Romans were upon them; and when he was upon the other side: so they got in great numbers together, and fled to Jericho, for they knew no other place that could afford them any hope of escaping, it being a city that had a strong wall, and a great multitude of inhabitants guarded by fire, and fortified at every place that holds the city, and by which their dislike to their metropolis, and fortified his camp, and, leaving the fifth legion therein, he came to the toparchy of Bethlephem. He then destroyed that place and the neighboring places which were guarded by fire, and fortified at no place whatever; and when he had seized upon two villages, which were in the very midst of the whole multitude to the river side, where they were stopped by the current, so for it had been augmented lately by rains, and was not fordable,} of Idumea, Betarion and Capharbotion, he slew about ten thousand of the people, and carried into captivity above a thousand, and drove away the rest of the multitude, and placed no small part of his own forces in them, who overran and laid waste one town after another; and while he was in the midst of his campaign he came down through the country of Samaria, and hard by the city by others called Neapolis, (or Sichem,) but by the people of the country called Areta, to Coraz, where he pitched his camp, on the second day of the month Thous (Sivan;) and on the day following he came to Jericho, on which day Tamar, one of his commanders, joined him with the forces he had left at Perea, all the places beyond Jor- dan being subdued already.

2. Hereupon a great multitude prevented their approach, and came out of Jericho, and fled to those mountainous parts that lay over against Tiberias, whose nature was contrary to each other; for the former is salt and unfruitful, but that of Tiberias is sweet and fruitful. This plain is much burnt up in summer time, and, by reason of the extraordinary heat, contains a very unwholesome air, and is destitute of all water excepting the river Jordan, which water of Jordan is the occasion why those plantations of palm-trees that are near its banks are more flourishing and much more fruitful, as are those that are remote from it. Hence it comes to pass that those trees become exceedingly fruitful, and the fruit of them; when they are pressed, yield an excellent kind of honey, not much inferior in sweetness to other honey. This country withal produces honey from bees also; it also bears that which is called honey-suckle, so that the possession of all these fruits is that cypress trees also, and those that bear myrobalanum; so that he who should pronounce this place to be divine, would not be mistaken, wherefore in such part the sun shines, there are reeds, and of the most excellent sort. And indeed, if we speak of those other fruits, it will not be easy to light on any climate in the habitable earth, that can well be compared to it, what is here grown comes up in such clusters; the cause of which seems to me to be the warmth of the air, and the fertility of the waters; the warmth calling forth the sprouts, and making them spread, and the moisture making every one of them, and bringing them into fruit; and the sun, in that part, is proved to be very hot, which it stands in need of in summer time. Now this country is then so badly burnt up, that nobody cares to come at it, and if the water be drawn up before sunrising, and after that exposure becomes exceedingly fruitful, and the fruit becomes of a nature quite contrary to the ambient air; as in winter again it becomes warm; and if you go into it, it appears very gentle. The same air is here also of so good a temperature that the people of the country are clothed in linen only, even when snow covers the rest of Judea. This place is one hundred and fifty far- ings from Jerusalem, and sixty from Jordan. The country as far as Jerusalem is destitute of all water except the sea, and that lake Asphaltitis lies lower indeed, though it be easily deserted and barren. But so much shall suffice to have been said about Jericho, and of the great happiness of its situation.

3. Notwithstanding which, there is a fountain by Jericho, that runs plentifully, and is very fit for watering the ground; it arises near the old city, which Joshua the son of Num, the general of the Israelites, took the first of all the cities of the land of Canaan, by right of war. The report is, that this fountain, at the beginning, caused not only the blazing of the earth and the trees, but of the children born of women, and of all the fruits of the same. Also a fountain in Jordan, and that in the great river Jordan, was a fountain by which stretched out his righteous hand unto heaven, and pouring out a mild drizzle-offering, he made this supplication, that "the current might be made as broad as the veins of fresh water that might be opened; that God also would bring into the place a more temperate and fertile soil as for the current, and would bestow upon the people of that country plenty of the better sort of trees and that water, which had been the occasion of barrenness and famine before, from that time did supply a numerous posterity, and afford great abundance to the country. Accordingly, the stream is so great in width and so wide, that if it do but once touch a country, it affords a sweeter nourishment than other waters do, when they lie so long upon them till they are stunted with them. For which reason, the adven- ture is so great in Jordan, and of the people in wetted, and that they continued to be righteous." To these prayer Eliezer joined proper operations of his hands, after a skillful manner of the ancient fashion; and that water, which had been the occasion of barrenness and famine before, from that time did supply a numerous posterity, and afford great abundance to the country. For which reason, the advencould not swim, should have their hands tied behind them, and be thrown into the deep, when it so happened that they all swam, as if a wind had extinguished them. The effects of the color of the lake is wonderful, for it changes its appearance thrice every day, and as the rays of the sun fall differently upon it, the sight is variously reflected. However, it casts not such a black cloud of bitumen in many places of it: these swim at the top of the water, and resemble both in shape and bigness headless bulls; and when the laborers that belong to the lake come to it, and catch hold of it as it hangs together, they draw it into their ships; but if the ship is full, it is not easy to cut off the rest, for at so tremendous as to make the ship hang upon its close till they set it loose with the menstrual blood of women, and with urine, to which alone it yields. Captives are not sold for cauking of ships, but for the sure of men's bodies: accordingly it is mixed in a great many medicines. The length of this lake is five hundred and eighty furlongs, where it is extended as far as Zaphon and Asphaltus, and its breadth is a hundred and fifty. The country of Sodom borders upon it. It was of old a most happy land, both for the fruits it bore and the riches of its cities, although it be now all burned up. It is believed that the destruction of the city by fire was burnt by lightning; in consequence of which there are still the remains of that divine fire, and the traces [or shadows] of the five cities are still to be seen, as well as the ashes growing in the place. There were the commands of Tithes. They were fit to be eaten; but if you pluck them with your hands, they dissolve into smoke and ashes. And thus what is related of this land of Sodom hath these marks of credibility which our very sight affords us.

CHAP. IX.
That Vespasian, after he had taken Gades, made Preparation for the Siege of Jerusalem. But that, upon his hearing of the Death of Nero, he changed his Intentions. As also concerning Simon of Gerasa.

§ 1. AND now Vespasian had fortified all the places about Jerusalem, and erected citadels at Jericho and Adida, and placed his auxiliaries in them both, partly out of his own Romans, and partly out of the body of his auxiliaries. He also sent Lucas Aneus to Gerasa, and delivered to him a band of horsemen and a considerable number of footmen. So when he had taken the city, which he did at the first onset, he slew a thousand of those young men who had not prevented him by flying away: but he took their captives, and continued to plunder them, and to plunder them of their effects: after which he set fire to their houses, and went away to the adjoining villages, while the men of power fled away, and the weaker part were destroyed, and what was remaining was all burnt down. And now the war having gone through all the mountainous country, and all the plain country also, those that were at Jerusalem were deprived of the liberty of going out of the city: for as to such as had not minded to desert, they were watched by the zealots; and to such as were not yet on the side of the Romans, their army kept them in, by compassing the city round about on all sides.

2. Now as Vespasian was returned to Cesarea, and was going to work; for he had not gone directly to Jerusalem, he was informed that Nero was dead, after he had reigned thirteen years and eight days; but as to any narration after what manner he abused his power in the government, and in the arrangement of affairs to those vile wretches, Nyumphidius and Tigellinus, his unworthy freemen; and how he had a plot laid against him by them, and was deserted by all his guards, and ran away with four more of his most trusty freemen, and anew fled into the suburb of Rome; and how those that occasioned his death were in no time brought themselves to punishment; how also the war in Gaul ended; and how Galba was made emperor; and returned unto Spain to Rome; and how he was accused by the soldiers as a pusillanimous person, and slain by treachery in the middle of the market-place at Rome, and Otho was made emperor; with his expedition against the comitatus of the Zephyrion; and how the ship was his, and how he was put to death; and besides what troubles there were under Vitellius, and the fight that was about the capitol; as also how Antonius Primus and Mucianus slew Vitellius, and his German legions, and thereby put an end to that civil war; I think it omitted to give an exact account of them, because they are well known by all, and they are described by a great number of Greek and Roman authors; yet for the sake of the connexion of matters, and that my history may not be the worse, I have just touched upon every thing briefly. Wherefore Vespasian put off at first his expedition against Jerusalem, and stood waiting what the empire would be transferred after the death of Otho. And it is certain that Galba was made emperor, he attempted nothing till he also should send him some directions about the war; however, he sent his son Titus to him, to salute him, and to receive his command; but, forasmuch as the emperor had erred and done wrong, Titus sailed along with Titus to Galba; but as they were sailing in their long ships by the coast of Achai, for it was winter time, they heard that Galba was slain, before they could come to him; after which he had been two months and as many days. After whom Otho took the government, and undertook the management of public affairs. So Agrippa resolved to go on to Rome, without any terror on account of the change in the government; and at the first he suspected it not; but I have just touched upon everything. I have just touched upon everything, and now they were both in suspense about the public affairs, the Roman empire being then in a fluctuating condition, and not knowing what would happen with their expedition against the Jews, but thought that to make any attack upon foreigners was now unseasonable, on account of the solicitude they were in for their own country. But now there arose an open war in Jeru-

in slavery, and a reward to those already free, and got together.a set of wicked men from all quarters.
4. And as he had now a strong body of men about him, he overran the villages that lay in the mountainous country, and when there were still men left, he sent them away, that came out, that he ventured to go down into the lower parts of the country, and since he was now become formidable to the cities, many of the men of power were corrupted by him; so that his army was no longer corrupted by his power and plunder, but a great many of the populace were obedient to him as to their ruler. He then overran the Acrabatene topaarchy, and the places that reached as far as the Great Idumea; for he built a wall at a certain village of Nain, and made the valley called Paran, he enlarged many of the
•
cares, and many others found he ready for his purposes; these he made into fortresses, for his treasures, and receptacles for his prey, and therein he laid up the fruits that he had got by rape; and many of his partisans had their dwelling in them, and he made no secret of it.
they that wounded his army beforehand, and making preparations for the assault of Jerusalem.
5. Whereupon the zealots, out of the dread they were in of his attacking them, and being willing to prevent one that was growing up to oppose them out against them, with their weapons. Simon met them, and joining battle with them, slew a considerable number of them, and drove the rest before him into the city, but durst not trust so much upon his forces, as to make an assault upon the walls; thus he repaired the first to subdue Idumea, and as he had now twenty-thousand armed men, he marched to the borders of their country. Hereupon the rulers of the Idumeans got together on the sudden the increase of their people, and five thousand in number, and permitted the rest to be a guard to their own country, by reason of the incursions that were made by the Sicarii that were at Masada. Thus they received Simon at their borders, where they fought him, and continued the battle all that day, and the dispute lay whether they had conquered him or been conquered by him. So he went back to Nain, as did the Idumeans return home. Now was it long ere Simon got possession of the whole country; when he pitched his camp at a certain village called Thecoco, and sent Eleasar, one of his companions, to those that kept garrison at Herodion, and let him make them understand that he was a fortress to him. The garrison received this man readily, while they knew nothing of what he came about; but as soon as he talked of the surrender of the place, they fell upon him with their drawn swords, but he found that he had no place for flight, when he threw himself down from the wall into the valley beneath; so he died immediately; but the Idumeans, who were already much afraid of Simon’s power, thought fit to take a vivid desire of his own army, before they hazarded a battle with him.
6. Now there was one of their commanders named Jacob, who offered to serve them readily upon that occasion, but had it in his mind to betray them, if he thought it best for himself, to the village Alcur, wherein the army of the Idumeans were gotten together, and came to Simon, and at the very first he agreed to betray his country to him, and took assurances upon oath from him, that he should not reveal the place to him before he ceased him and promised that he would assist him in subduing all Idumea under him; upon which account he was feared after an oblying manner by Simon, and elevated by his mighty promises; and when he came to his own city, he first autonomous his states, and in order to make the people fall into a sedition, and desert those that had been the authors of his wife's seclusion. He also enjoined them to tell the people, that Simon swore by the God of the universe, who sees all things, that unless they would restore the princess, he would break down their walls, and inflicts the like punishment upon all the citizens, without sparing any age, and without making any distinction between the guilty and the innocent. These threats were good enough to frighten the people, but the zealots themselves also, that they sent his wife back to him, when he became a little milder, and left off his perpetual bloodshedding.

9 But now sedition and civil war prevailed, not only within the country, but also from the Philipids in Illyria, for now Gaiba was slain in the midst of the Roman market-place; then was Otho made emperor, and fought against Vitellius, who set up for emperor also, for the legions in Germany had chosen him. But Vitellius led on a detachment of Vitellius, who were Vitellius's generals, at Bethsaica in Gaul, Otho gained the advantage on the first day, but on the second day Vitellius's soldiers had the upper hand, and Otho slew himself, when he had heard of this defeat at Brixia, and after he had managed the public affairs three months and two days. Otho's army also came over to Vitellius's generals, and he committed a new tyrant with the senate, and was betrayed in the mean time Vespasian marched from Cappadocia, on the fifth day of the month Thesius, [Sivan,] and marched against those places of Judea which were not yet overthrown. So he went up to the mountainous country, and took those towns, which were called the Gophnittik and Acrabatene toparchies. After which he took Bethel and Ephraim, two small cities, and when he had put garrisons into them, he rode as far as Jeru- salem, and took into his possession and many captives; but Ceresus, one of his commanders, took a body of horsemen and footmen, and laid waste that part of Idumea which was called the Upper Idumea, and attacked Capha, near which they pretended to be a small city, and took it at the first assault, and burnt it down. He also attacked Capharabam, and laid siege to it, for it had a very strong wall, and when he expected to spend a long time in that siege, those that were within it had the wit to find a way out of it, after which they came to beg pardon, and surrendered themselves up to him. When Ceresus had conquered them he went to Hebron, another very ancient city. I have told you already, that this city is situated in a very high mountain, and he took it, and burnt it, and when he had broken into the city by force, what multitude and young men were left therein he slew, and burnt down the city; so that as now all the places were taken, excepting Herodium, Massada, and Machbeth, which was in the possession of the robbers, so Jerusalem was what the Romans at present aimed at.

10. And now, as soon as Simon had set his wife free, and recovered her from the robbers, he returned to the Idumea, and marched into Judaea, driving the nation all before him, from all quarters. He compelled a great number of them to retire to Jerusalem; he followed them himself also into the city, and made them wear of his, and all "e-reauang: and when he lighted upon any laborers that were coming thither out of the country, he slew them. Now this Simon, who was without the wall, was a greater terror to the people than any Roman force, and made him very potent, who made them a suitable request from the authority he had obtained by their means; for he permitted them to do all things that any of them desired to do, while their inclination to plunder was insatiable, as was their zeal in searching the houses of the rich; and for the mustering of the men, and attention to the women, it was sport to them. They also devour- ed what spoils they had taken, together with their blood, and indulged themselves in famishing wantonness, without any disturbance, till they were satiated. But in their excess, they shaved their hair and put on women's garments, and were besmeared over with ointments; and that they might appear very comely, they had painted under their eyes, and adorned not only the ornaments, but also the lustre of women, in which they were, and such intolerable uncleanness, that they invented unlawful pleasures of that sort; and thus did they roll themselves up and down the city, as in a brothel house, and defiled it entirely with their impure actions: nay, while their faces looked like the faces of women, they killed with their right hands; and when their guilt was effeminate, they presently attacked men, and became warri oes, and drew their swords and daggers under their dyed cloaks, and ran every body through whom they lighted upon. However, Simon waited for such as ran away from John, and was the more bloody of the two: and he who had escaped the tyrant with the sword, was slain by Simon, and Betar was besieged all the time that lay before the gates, so that all attempts of flying and deserting to the Romans were cut off, if any had a mind so to do.

11. Yet did the army that was under John raise a sedition also upon him, and could not part the zealots, who prepared themselves from the tyrant, and attempted to destroy him, and this out of their envy at his power, and hatred of his cruelty; so they got together, and slew many of the zealots, and drove those that were in the tyrant's service out of the fortress that was built by Grapte, who was a relation of Isates, the king of Adiabene; the Idumeans fell in with them, and drove the zealots out thence into the temple, and betook themselves to plunder John's effects; for both he himself was in that palace, and therein had he laid up the spoils he had acquired by his tyranny. In the mean time the multitude of the zealots that were dispersed over the city ran together to the temple to the multitude that had come to Jerusalem, and they were prepared to bring them down against the people and the Idumeans, who were not so much afraid of being attacked by them, because they were themselves better soldiers than they, as at their madness, lest it should give occasion to the temple and get among them, and not only destroy them, but set the city on fire also. So they assembled themselves together, and the high priests with them, and took counsel after what manner they should avoid their assault. Now it was God who turned their opinions to the worst advice, and thence devised such a remedy to get themselves free as was worse than the disease itself. Accordingly, in the meantime, the zealots, in order to desire the introduction of a second tyrant into the city; which resolution they brought to perfection, and sent Matthias the high priest, to the temple, where he was, to the other part of whom they had so often been afraid. Those also who had fled from the zealots in Jerusalem, joined in this request to him, out of the desire they had of preserving their houses and their effects. Accordingly, he granted them his lordly protection, and came into the city in order to deliver it from the zealots. The people also made joyful acclamations to him as their savior and their preserver: but afterwards, when he was in the temple, he was to care to secure his own authority, and looked upon those that had invited him in, to be no less his enemies than those against whom the invitation was intended.
19. And thus did Simon get possession of Jerusalem, in the third year of the war, in the month Xabath, when the Jews were at a disadvantage, with his multitude of sealots, as being both prohibited from coming out of the temple, and having lost their power in the city, (for Simon and his party had plundered them of what they had,) were in distress to send soldiers, and to be seen to. Simon also tolerates an assault upon the temple, with the assistance of the people, while the others stood upon the cloisters and the battlements, and defended themselves from their assailants. However, a considerable number of the city fell; and many were carried off wounded; for the sealots threw their darts easily from a superior place, and seldom failed of hitting their enemies; but having the advantage of situation, and having withal erected four very large towers aforesaid, that their darts might come from higher places, one at the northeast corner of the court, one above the Xystus, the third at another corner over against the former city, and the last was erected above the top of the Parthoschames with the priests stood of course, and gave a signal beforehand, with a trumpet, at the beginning of every seventh day, in the evening twilight, as also at the time of the sabbath. Very fond was Simon of appearing to notice the people when they were to leave off work, and when they were to go to work again. These men also set their engines to cast darts and stones withal, upon those towers, with their engines to and fro, and now and then made his assault upon the temple more faintly, by reason that the greatest part of his men grew weary of the work; yet did he not leave off his opposition, because his army was superior to the others, although it was by those whom he threw by the engines was carried a great way, and slew many of those that fought for him.

How the Soldiers, both in Judea and Egypt, proclaimed Vespasian Emperor. And how Vespasian released Josephus of his Bonds.

1. Now about this very time it was that heavy troubles came about Rome on all sides; for Vitellius was come from Germany with his soldiers and drew along with him a great multitude of other men besides. And when the places allotted for the soldiers could not contain them, he made at Misenus, and set all the houses with armed men: which men, when they saw the riches of Rome with those eyes which had never seen such riches before, and found themselves drawn round about on all sides with silver and gold, and all such that could not contain their covetous desires, and were ready to betake themselves to plunder, and to the slaughter of such as should stand in their way. And this was the state of affairs in Italy at that time.

2. But when Vespasian had overthrown all the places that were near to Jerusalem, he returned to Cesarea, and heard of the troubles that were at Rome, and that Vitellius was emperor. This produced indignation in him, although he well knew that he was not yet armed as to govern, and could not, with any satisfaction, owe him for his lord, who acted so madly, and seized upon the government as if it were absolutely destitute of a governor. And as this sorrow of his was violent, he was not able to support the tumults he was under, nor to apply himself farther to other wars, when his native country was laid waste, and his family was in danger of extermination by him to avenge his country, so much was he restrained by the consideration of the distance therefrom; because fortune might prevent him, and do a world of mischief before he could himself make his way to it. Simon also tells an assault upon the temple, with the assistance of the people, while the others stood upon the cloisters and the battlements, and defended themselves from their assailants. However, a considerable number of the city fell; and many were carried off wounded; for the sealots threw their darts easily from a superior place, and seldom failed of hitting their enemies; but having the advantage of situation, and having withal erected four very large towers aforesaid, that their darts might come from higher places, one at the northeast corner of the court, one above the Xystus, the third at another corner over against the former city, and the last was erected above the top of the Parthoschames with the priests stood of course, and gave a signal beforehand, with a trumpet, at the beginning of every seventh day, in the evening twilight, as also at the time of the sabbath. Simon also tells an enbowed him to ease the government, which was in danger. Now Vespasian's concern had been far from meritorious; he had no belief that he not intend to set up for governor himself, though his actions showed him to deserve it, while he preferred that safety which is in a pri- vate man's hand, and that it was not suitable to his dignity: but while he refused the empire, the commanders insisted the more earnestly upon his acceptance, and the soldiers came about him, with their drawn swords in their hands, and they demanded that he should at least consent according to his dignity. And when he had shown his reluctance a great while, and had endeavored to thrust away his dominion from him, he at length, being not able to persuade them, yielded to that impression and consented. However, as ever Alexander had read this letter, he readily obliged the legions and the multitude to take the oath of fidelity to Vespasian, both of whom willingly complied with him, as already acquainted with the conquest and prosperity of the constitution in their neighborhood. Accordingly Vespasian, looking upon himself as already intrusted with the government, got all things ready for his journey (to Rome.) Now some carried this news abroad among the bishop of every city, and they thought, that he was emperor over the East, upon which every city kept festivals, and celebrated sacrifices and oblations for such good news; the legions also that were in Mygiana and Pannonia, which had been so lately moved from their little provinces that were at Alexandria to the other two legions that were with him. He also considered with himself, that he should then have that country for a defence to himself against the uncertainty of fortune. For Egypt is hard to be entered by land, and hath no good havens by sea. It hath on the west the dry deserts of Libya, and on the south Syene, that divides it fromEthiopia, as well as on either side of the Nile, which can be sailed over; and on the east the Red Sea, extending as far as Coptos; and it is fortified on the north by the land that reaches to Syria, together with that called the Egyptian Sea, having no havens in it for ships. And this is Egypt; and about on every side. Its length between Pelusium and Syene is two thousand furlongs, and the passage by sea from Pelusium to Pelusium is three thousand and six hundred furlongs. Its river Nile is 900 stadia (of the Greek) as the Pharaoh, the forenamed catahuda hithering ships from going any farther. The haven also of Alexandria is not entered by the mariners without difficulty, even in times of peace; for the currents of the river, and the winds, blow with the tide under the water, which obliges the mariners to turn from a straight direction: its left side is blocked up by works made by men's hands on both sides; on its right side lies the island called Pharos, which is situated just before sea- trance, and supports a very great tower, that affords the sight of a fire to such as sail within three hundred furlongs of it; that ships may cast anchor in the greatest way off in the night time by reason of the distinctness of the light. It is also joined to the island by a very great pier, the handwork of men, against which when the sea dashes itself, and its waves are broken against those boundari- ries, the navigation becomes very troublesome, if he was first proclaimed in Egypt, and that on the 8th of July, while they still say it was the fifth of he is mentioned just before sea-trance, and implies less. See Eurys on the Revelation, p. 135. Here we have an authentic description of the bounds and circumstances of Egypt in the days of Vespasian and Titus.

As Daniel was preferred by Darius and Cyrus, on account of his having foretold the destruction of the Babylonian monarchy by their means, and the con- quent exponent of the Medes and Persians, v. vi., or and the entrance through a narrow passage is considered divine, yet the country, as you are got into it, is very safe one, and of thirty furlongs in largeness; into which is brought what the country wants in order to its happiness, as also what abundance the country affords, more than it wants, is hitherto distributed into all the habitable earth.

6. Justly, therefore, did Vespasian desire to ob- tain that government, in order to corroborate his attempts upon the whole empire; so he immediately sent in his letter to the governor of Egypt and of Alexandria and informed him what the army had put him upon, and how he, being forced to accept of the ber- den of the government, was desirous to have him for his confidant and protector. Afterward, as ever Alexander had read this letter, he readily obliged the legions and the multitude to take the oath of fidelity to Vespasian, both of whom willingly complied with him, as already acquainted with the conquest and prosperity of the constitution in their neighborhood. Accordingly Vespasian, looking upon himself as already intrusted with the government, got all things ready for his journey (to Rome.) Now some carried this news abroad among the bishop of every city, and they thought, that he was emperor over the East, upon which every city kept festivals, and celebrated sacrifices and oblations for such good news; the legions also that were in Mygiana and Pannonia, which had been so lately moved from their little provinces that were at Alexandria to the other two legions that were with him. the condition of a captive or prisoner." So he called for Josephus, and commanded that he should be set at liberty; whereupon the commanders promised themselves glorious things, from this requital Vespasian made to a stranger. "It was their pleasure, said his father; and said, "O father, it is but just that the scandal [of a "riot"-er] should be taken off Josephus, together with his iron chain. For if we do not barely loose his bonds, but cut them to pieces, he will be the more ready to loose that had not been sooner than all." For that is the usual method as to such as have been bound without a cause. This advice was agreed to by Vespasian also; so there came a man in, and cut the chain to pieces: while Josephus tenderly testifying of his integrity for a reward, and was moreover esteemed a person of credit as to futurities also.

CHAP. XI.

That upon the Conquest and Slaughter of Vitellius, Vespasian hastened his Journey to Rome, but Titus, his Son, returned to Jerusalem.

1. And now, when Vespasian had given an answer to the request, and disposed of the places of power justly, and according to every one's deserts, he came to Antioch, and consulting which way he had best take, he preferred to go to Rome, rather than to march to Alexandria. For he saw that Alexandria was sure to him already, but that the affairs at Rome were put into disorder by Vitellius; so he sent Mucianus to Italy, and committed a considerable army, both of horsemen and footmen, to him; yet he was afraid of great storms; as the sea, because it was the middle of winter, and so he led his army on foot through Cappadocia and Phrygia.

2. In the mean time Antonius Primus took the third of the legions that were in Mydia, for he was the governor of that province, and made ready in order to fight Vitellius; whereupon Vitellius sent away Cecina with a great army, having a mighty confidence in him, because of his having beaten Otho. Thus Cecina marched out of Rome in great haste, and found Antonius about Cremona in Gall, which city is in the borders of Italy; but when he saw there that the enemy were numerous and in good order, he durst not fight them, and as he thought a retreat dangerous, he retired with his army to Antioch. Accordingly he assembled the centurions and tribunes that were under his command, and persuaded them to go over to Antonius, and this by diminishing the reputation of Vitellius, by exterminating his army.

3. Vespasian also told them, that "with the one there was no more than the bare name of dominion, but with the other was the power of it; and that it was better for them to prevent necessity, and gain favor, and, while they were likely to be overcome in battle, to avoid the danger beforehand, and go over to Antonius willingly; that Vespasian was able of himself to subdue who he pleased without their resistance, while Vitellius could not preserve what he had already with it."

4. Cecina said this, and much more to the same purpose, and persuaded them to comply with him, for both he and his army deserted; but still the very same night the soldiers repented of what they had done, and a fear seized on them, lest perhaps Vitellius, who sent them, should get the better; and, drawing their swords, they assaulted Cecina, in order to kill him; and the thing had been done by them, if the tribunes had not fallen upon their knees, and besought them not to do it; so the soldiers did not kill him, but put him in bonds, as a traitor, and were about to send him to Vitellius. When [Antonius] Primus heard of this, he raised up his men immediately, and made them put on their arms, and march immediately; whereupon they put themselves in order of battle, and made a resistance for a while, but were soon beaten, and fled to Cremona: then did Primus take his horsemen, and cut off their enemy, and destroyed a great multitude of them before the city, and fell into the city together with the rest, and gave leave to his soldiers to plunder it. And here it is manifest that many strangers, who were as merchants, as well as many of the people of that country, perished, among them Vitellius's whole army, being thirty thousand and two hundred, while Antonius lost no more of those that came with him from Mydia, than five thousand five hundred: he then loosed Cecina, and sent him to Vespasian to tell him the good news. So he came, and was received by him, and covered the scandal of his treachery by the unexpected beauty of his character. He came over to him, with Dominicus, his brother's son, whose encouragement was of a very great weight for the compassing the government. Now Vitellius was not much conversant in the things of war, and turned his eyes to those that had revolted with Sabinius, with Thistling, out of his own natural barbarity, and noble blood, he testified that part of the army which came along with him to fight against the capital, and many bold actions were done on the side, and on the side of those that held the temple. But at last, the soldiers that came from Germany, being too numerous for the others, got the hill into their possession, where Dominicus, with many of the others that followed the leader, perished with his army. Mucianus, vessel, while the rest of the multitude were entirely cut to pieces, and Sabinius himself was brought to Vitellius, and then slain; the soldiers also plundered the temple of its sacred rites, and set it on fire. But now it was fit. But now within a day's time, Antonius, with his army, and were met by Vellitius and his army; and having had a battle in three several places, the last were all destroyed. Then did Vitellius come out of the palace, in his cupa, and satiated with an extravagant and luxurious meal, as in the last extremity; and being drawn along through the multitude, and abused with all sorts of torment, had his head cut off in the streets, and his headless body was detained eight months and five days; and had he lived much longer, I cannot but think the empire would not have been sufficient for his lust. Of the others that were slain, were numbered above fifty thousand; and many of them were also slain in the third day of the month Apellus (Casius) on the next day Mucianus came into the city with his selves. And, indeed, Scaliger justly complains, as Dr. Hudson observes on chap. ix. sect. 9, that this period is very confused and uncertain in the ancient authors. They were probably some of them contemporary for war in Syria as those in Asia. Which wise conduct in a more behasten ought to put those rulers and ministers of state to shame, who, professing Christian principles, have been so often indolent and negligent, and their kingdoms to vice and to destruction.
army and ordered Aesinius and his men to leave off killing; for they were still searching the houses, and killed many of Vitellius's soldiers, and many of the populace, as supposing them to be of his party, when the two sides might have made a compact between them and others. He then produced Domitian, and recommended him to the multitude, until his father should come himself: so the people being now freed from the fear of Domitians, made haste to Euphrasian, for Vespasian, as for their emperor, and kept festival days for his confirmation, and for the destruction of Vitellius.

5. And now, as Vespasian was come to Alexandria, this news came from Rome; and at the same time came embassies from all his own habitable earth, to congratulate him upon his advancement; and though this Alexandria was the greatest of all cities next to Rome, it proved too narrow to contain the multitude that then came to it. So upon this confirmation of Vespasian's entire government, which was now settled, and upon the unexpected deliverance of the public affairs of the Romans from ruin, Vespasian turned his mind to justice; removed the tributary, and subdued the Jews. However, he himself made haste to go to Rome, as the winter was now almost over, and so set the affairs of Alexandria in order, but sent his son Titus, with a part of his army, to destroy Jerusalem. Titus marched on foot as far as Nicopolis, which is distant twenty furlongs from Alexandria; there he put his army on board the ships which the propitious river along the Medesian Nomes, as far as the city Thusa; there he got out of the ships, and walked on foot, and lodged all night at a small city called Tanis. His second station was Hermopolis Magna. This he thought proper; but he refreshed his army at that place for two days, and on the third passed over the mouth of the Nile at Pelusium; he then proceeded one station over the desert, and pitched his camp at the temple of the Great Jupiter, and on the next day at Osrocene. This station had no water, but the people of the country make use of water brought from other places. After this he rested at Rhinocurrea, and from thence he went to Raphia, which was his fourth station. This city is the beginning of Syria. For his fifth station he pitched his camp at Gaza; after which he came to Ascalon, and thence to Jannina, and after that to Joppa, and from Joppa to Cesarea, having taken the way to pass over to the rest of his other forces together at that place.

* There are cofns of this Cæsarian Jupiter still extant as Spanhelam here informs us.

BOOK V.
CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF NEAR SIX MONTHS.—FROM THE COMING OF TITUS TO BE SIEGE JERUSALEM TO THE GREAT EXTREMITY TO WHICH THE JEWS WERE REDUCED.

CHAP. I.
Concerning the Sedition at Jerusalem, and what terrible Miseries afflicted the City by their Means.

1. WHEN, therefore, Titus had marched over that desert which lies between Egypt and Syria, in the manner forementioned, he came to Cesarea, having resolved to set his forces in order at that place before he began the war. Nay, indeed, while he was assisting his father at Alexandria in settling that government which had been newly conferred upon them by God, it so happened, that the sedition at Jerusalem was revived, and parted into three factions; and that one faction fought against the other, whichpartition in such evil cases may be said to be a good thing, and the effect of divine justice. Now, as to the attack the zealots made upon the people, and which I esteem the beginning of the city's destruction, it hath been already explained after an accurate manner; as also whence it arose, and to how great a mischief it was increased. But, for the present sedition, one should not mistake if he called it a sedition begotten by another sedition, and to be like a wild beast grown mad, which, for want of food from abroad, fell upon eating its own flesh.

2. For Eleazar, the son of Simon, who made the first separation of the zealots from the people, when he retire into the temple, appeared very angry at John's insolent attempts, which he made every day upon the people; for this man never left off murdering; but the truth was, that he could not bear to submit to a tyrant who set up after him. So he being desirous of gaining the entire power and dominion to himself, revolted from John, and took to his assistance Judas, the son of Chelicius, and Simon, the son of Earon, who were among the men of greatest power. There was also with him Herakiah, the son of Chobar, a person of eminence. Each of these were followed by a great many of the zealots; they seized upon the inner court of the temple, and laid their arms upon the holy gates and over the holy fronts of that court. And because they had plenty of provisions, they were of good courage, for there was a great abundance of victuals; they were consecrated to sacred uses, and they scrupled not the making use of them yet were they afraid on account of their small number, and when they had laid up their arms there, they did not stir from the place they were in. Now, when John, what advantage he had over Eleazar in the multitude of his followers, the like disadvantage he had in the situation he was in since he had his enemies over his head; and a he could not make any assault upon them with out some terror, so was his anger too great to let them be at rest; nay, although he suffered more mischief from Eleazar and his party than he could inflict upon them, yet would he not leave off as assailing them, insomuch that there were continual sallies made one against another; so that the temple was defiled everywhere with murders.

3. But now the tyrant Simon, the son of Gio rius, whom the people had invited in, out of the hope they had of his assistance in the great dis tress they were in, having in lower the upper city, and a great part of the lower, did not make more vehement assaults upon John and his party, because they were fought against from above, and also because they were not pressed when they attacked them, as they were before the attacks of the others above them. Whereby, came to pass that John did both receive and inflict great damage, and that easily, as he was fought against by both sides; and the same advantage that Eleazar and his party had over him, since he was beneath them, the same advantage he had, by his higher situation, over Simon. Of which account he easily repelled the attacks that were made from beneath, by the weapons throw from their hands only; but was obliged to repel.

* This appears to be the first time that the zealots ventured to pollute this most sacred court of the temple, which was the court of the priests, wherein the temple itself and the altar stood. So that the con jurers of those that would interpret that Zacharias, who

those that threw their darts from the temple above him, by his engine of war; for he had such engines, as threw darts, and javelins, and shot and that in a small number, by which he did not only defend himself from such as fought against him, but slew moreover many of the priests, as they were about their sacred ministrations. For notwithstanding these men were not armed against him, yet they were afraid of impurity, and admit those that desired to offer their sacrifices, although they took care to search the people of their own country beforehand, and both suspected and watched them, while they were not so much on guard against them, and though they were not convinced, for they had left of them, how cruel soever they were, to come into that court, were yet often destroyed by this sedition; for those darts that were thrown by them, were shot against the priests, with which they went over all the buildings, and reached as far as the altar and the temple itself, and all upon the priests and those that were about the sacred offices: isomuch, that many persons who came this is with a propitiate, or from the ends of the earth, to offer sacrifices at this celebrated place, which was esteemed holy by all mankind, fell down before their own sacrifices themselves, and sprinkled that altar which was venerable among all nations; and Eleazar and Simeon, with their own blood, till the dead bodies of strangers were mingled together, with those of their own country, and those of profile persons with those of the priests, and the blood of all sorts of dead carcase was lad in the holy vessels. And now, "O most wretched city, what misery so great as this didst thou suffer from the Romans, when they came to purify thee from thy intestine hatred?" For thou couldst be no longer a holy place. For God would not that longer continue in being, after thou hadst been a sepulchre for the bodies of thy own people, and hadst made the holy house itself a burying place in this city of those. Yet mayest thou again, again, if perchance thou wilt hereafter appease the anger of that God who is the author of thy destruction." But I must restrain myself from these passions by the rules of history, since this is a matter of the most impious lamentations, but for historical narrations; I therefore return to the operations that follow in this sedition.

4. And now there were three treacherous factions in the city, the one parted from the other. Eleazar and Simeon kept the temple, the other portion came against John in their cups. Those that were with John plundered the populace, and went out with zeal against Simon. This Simon had his supply of provisions from the city, in opposition to John. When therefore John was surprised, and insulted on both sides he made his men turn about, throwing his darts upon those citizens that came up against him from the cloisters he had in his possession, while he opposed those that attacked him from the temple with his engines of war. And if at any time he was freed from those that were above him, which happened frequently, from their being drunk and tired, he collected out with a great number upon Simon and his party; and this was the reason why in part of the city as he could come at, fell he set on fire those houses that were full of corn, and of all other provisions. The same thing was done by Simon, when upon that the retreat, he attacked the city also; as if they had all on purpose done it to retire the Romans, by destroying what the city had laid up towers, he finding them long enough to oppose from these their adversaries that fought from the tower of the city, and that they had them brought and erected behind the inner court over against the west end of the cloister, where alone he could erect them, whereas the other sides of that court had so many steps as would make it impossible to come at that gate last, and that it went up the rear. Thus did John hope to be too hard for his enemies by these engines constructed by his impiety; but God himself demonstrated that his pains would prove of no use to him, by bringing the Romans upon him before he could see any of his towers; for Titus, when he had gotten together part of his forces about him, and had ordered the rest to meet him at Jerusalem, marched out of Cæsarea. He had with him three legions that had been on campaign, and his father, when he laid Judea waste, together with that twelfth legion which had been formerly beaten with Cestius; which legion, as it was otherwise remarkable for its valor, so did it abandon itself to its enemies, and put, with such.temptation.s on the Jews, as remembering what they had formerly suffered from them. Of these legions he ordered the fifth to meet him, by going through Emusaeus, and the tenth to go up to the Antonia, and the sixth to go up into the surrounding country, and join the rest: besides which, marched those auxiliaries that came from the kings, being now in number than before, together with a consular number that came from Syria. Those also that had been selected out of these four legions, and sent with Mucianus to Italy, had their places filled up out of those soldiers that came out of Egypt with Titus, which were two thousand men, chosen out of the armies at Alexandria. There followed him also three thousand drawn from those that guarded the river Euphrates; as also, there came Tiberius Alexander, who was a friend of his, most valuable to all his purposes, and his father as well as his prudence. He had former been governor of Alexandria, but was now thought worthy to be general of the army [under Titus]. The reason of this, that he had been the first who had encouraged Vespasian, and it was late to accept this his new dominion, and join'd himself to him with great fidelity, when things were uncertain, and fortune had not yet declared for him. He also followed Titus as a counsellor, very useful to him in this war, both by his age and skill in such affairs.

chap. II.
How Titus marched to Jerusalem, and how he was in Danger, as he was taking a Place of the City.

Of the Place also where he pitched his Camp.

1. Now as Titus was upon his march into the enemy's country, the auxiliaries that were sent by the kings marched first, having all the other auxiliaries with them. After them followed those that were to prepare the roads, and measure out the camp; then came the commanders' baggage, and after that the other soldiers, who were completely armed to support them; then came Titus himself; next the baggage, the baggage horses, and then came the pikemen; after whom came the horse belonging to that legion. All these came before the engines, and after these engines, came the tribunes and the leaders of the cohorts, with their select bodies; after these came the ensigns, with the eagle; and before these ensigns came the trumpets, and behind those the main body of the army in their ranks, every legion being six deep; the servants belonging to every legion came after these; and before these last their baggage; the mercenaries came on the right, and the rest on the left, up the rear. Now Titus, according to the Roman usage, went in front of the army after a decent manner, and marched through Samaria to Gophna, a city that had been formerly taken by his father, and there received the guarded by the Roman soldiers: and, when he had lodged there one night he marched on in the morning; and when he had gone as far as a day's march, he pitched his camp at that valley which the Jews, in their own tongue, called the cistern; from which place there is a certain village called Gabadath-saul, which signifies, The Hill of Saul, being distant from Jeru- salem about thirty furlongs. There it was that he chose out six hundred select horsemen, and went to take some view of his place to effect strength it was of, and how courageous the Jews were; whether when they saw him, and before they came to a direct battle, they would be affrighted and desert him; for he had been informed, what was really true, that most of the people had fallen under the power of the seditions and the robbers, were greatly desirous of peace; but being too weak to rise up against the rest, they lay still.

2. Now, so long as he rode along the straight road which led to the wall of the city, nobody appeared out of the gates; but when he went out of that road, and declined towards the tower of Peophina, and led the head of horsemen obliquely, an immense number of the Jews leaped out suddenly at the towers called the Women's Towers, through that gate which was over against the monuments of Queen Heleasa, and intercepted his passage; and stood opposite to those that still ran along the road, hindered them from joining those that had declined out of it. They intercepted Titus also, with a few others. Now it was here impossible for him to go forward, or to have time to build trenches as dug in them from the wall to preserve the gardens round about, and were full of gardens obliquely situated, and of many hedges; and to return back to his own men, he saw it was also impossible, by the number of the bedouins and the enemies that lay between them; many of whom did not so much as know the king was in any danger; but supposed him still among them. So he perceived, that his preservation must be wholly owing to the courage of his horse, and cried out aloud to those that were about him, to follow him, and ran with violence into the midst of his enemies, in order to force his way through them to his own men. And hence, we may principally learn, that both the success of wars and the dangers that kings are in, are under the providence of God; for while such a number of darts were thrown at Titus, when he had neither his headpiece on, nor his breastplate, (for, as I told you, he was not set to fight, but to view the city,) none of them touched his body, but went aside without hurting him, as if all of them missed him on purpose, and only made a noise as they passed by march, as Josephus assures us, Antiq. B. xvii. ch. xi. sect. 4; Of the War, B. ii. ch. vi. sect. 3. Thus also the Jews call it the Roman Empire, under the name of Ochella, could bring their engines close to the cloisters of that court endways, upon the floor of the court of Israel, and the name of that temple in the description of the temples hereto belonging.

1. We may here note, that Titus is here called a king, and not a prince, as he was before; this was rather than the emperor's son and general of the Roman army, and his father Vespasian was still alive, just as the New Testament says, a bruised reed, or was broken, Matt. ii. 25, though he was properly no more than a king, as Josephus assures us, Antiq. B. xvii. ch. xi. sect. 4; Of the War, B. ii. ch. vi. sect. 3. Thus also the Jews call it the Roman Empire, under the name of Ochella, could bring their engines close to the cloisters of that court endways, upon the floor of the court of Israel, and the name of that temple in the description of the temples hereto belonging.

On the borders of his march, John the Baptist was seized and beheaded. The eunuchs of Herod, as he had heard of the death of John, were afraid of the preachers of the Gospel, and in order to escape the danger, they sent a message to the Roman governors. WAR OF THE JEWS.

him. So he diverted those perpetually with his sword that came on his side, and overturned many of those that directly met him, and made his horse ride over those that were overthrowen. The enemy indeed made a great shout at the boldness of Gesem and exhorted one another to rush upon him. Yet did those against whom he marched did not go off from him in great numbers; while those that were in the same danger kept up close to him, though they were wounded by him, and those on the other sides; for they had each of them but this one hope of escaping, if they could assist Titus in opening himself a way that he might not be encompassed round by his enemies before he got away from them. Now, there were two of those that were with him, but at some distance; the one of which the enemy encompassed round, and slew him with their darts, and his horse also; but the others then drew as a flank on the first, and carried off his horse with them. But Titus escaped with the rest, and came safe to the camp. So this success of the Jews' first attack raised their minds, and gave them an ill-grounded hope; and in the disposition of forming on their side, made them very courageous for the future.

3. But now, as soon as that legion that had been at Emmaus was joined to Cæsar at night, he removed thence, when it was day, and came to Jericho and Titus; from whence the citizens began already to be seen, and a plain view might be taken of the great temple. Accordingly, this place, on the north quarter of the city, and joining thence, was a plain, and very properly named the Plain of Maccabees (for it was not more than seven furlongs distant from it). And here it was that Titus ordered a camp to be fortified for two legions that were to be together, but order ed another camp to be fortified, at three furlongs farther, and the rest of the soldiers went with them. And for he thought that, by marching in the night they might be tired, and might deserve to be covered from the enemy, and with less fear might themselves; and, if any were now beginning to build, the tenth legion, which came through Jericho, was already come to the place, where a certain party of armed men had formerly lain, to guard that pass into the city, and had before by Versailest expert, and so for that they were running himself upon the Jews on their bank, with those select troops that were with him, and slew a considerable number, and wounded more of them, and drove the others away hastily down the valley. Now, as these Jews suffered greatly in the declivity of the valley, so, when they were gotten over it, they turned about, and stood over against the Romans, and engaged in a volley. These legions now had orders to encamp at the distance of six furlongs from Jerusalem, at the mount called the Mount of Olives, which lies over against the city on the east side, and is parted from it by a deep valley, proposed between them, which is named Cedron.

4. Now, when hitherto the several parties in the city had been dashing one against another perpetually, this foreign war, now suddenly came upon them, and lay as a stop to their contentions one against another; and, as the seditions now saw with astonishment the Romans pitching three several camps, they began to think of an awkward sort of concord, and the several parties here, beasts of their own species, being without a common law, none but Titus himself, and a few others with him, being left in the midst of the secessions. Now these others who were his friends, despised the rest of the parties and were about to go with their general, earnestly exhorting him "to give way to these Jews that are full of dying, and not run into such dangers before those that ought to stay before him; to consider what his fortune was, and not, by supporting the place of a common soldier, to venture to turn back upon the enemys so suddenly, and this because he was right.
armed men, when they were gotten in, tawed their garments away, and presently appeared in their armor. Upon which there was a very great disorder and disturbance about the holy house; while the people, who had no confidence in the sedition, supposed that this assault was made against all without distinction; as the zealots thought it was made against themselves only. So these left off guarding the gates any longer, and went with others from their houses; and these, when they came to an engagement, fled away into the subterranean caverns of the temple; while the people that stood trembling at the altar and about the holy house, were rolled on heaps to one another; and others fled away with wooden and iron weapons without mercy. Such also, as had differences with others, slew many persons that were quiet, out of their own private enmity and hatred, as if they were opposite to such seditions; and all those Romans formerly offended any of these plotters, were now known, and were led away to the slaughter: and when they had done abundance of horrid mischief to the guiltless, they granted a truce to the guilty, and let them flee away, and some another, till certain of them saw their general in the very midst of an action, and, being under great concern for him, they loudly pressed the gates, and formed a legion, and now shame made them turn back, and they reproached one another, that they did worse than run away, by deserting Caesar. So they used their utmost force against the Jews, and now chose the choice horsemen and horse, and fired them on heaps into the bottom of the valley. Then did the Jews turn about and fight them: but as they were themselves retiring, and now because the Romans had the advantage of the greater height of ground, and the gates of this temple were open to the whole valley. Caesar also pressed upon those that were near him, and sent the legion again to fortify their camp; while he, and those that were with him before, opposed the enemy, and kept the gate. And the greater part of them, so much, that if I may be allowed neither to add anything out of flattery, nor to diminish anything out of envy, but to speak the plain truth, Caesar did twice deliver that entire legion when it was in opposition, and gave them a quiet opportunity of fortifying their camp.

CHAP. III.

How the Sedition was again revised within Jerusalem, and yet the Jews contrived Snares for the Romans. How Titus also threatened his Soldiers for their unaccountable Rashness.

1. As now the war abroad ceased for a while, the sedition within was revived; and on the first of unleavened bread, which was now come, it being the fourteenth day of the month Nisan, when it is believed the Jews were first freed from the Egyptians, Eleazar and his party opened the gates of this temple, and admitted of the people, as were desirous to worship God into it. But John made use of this festival as a cloak for his treacherous designs, and armed the most inconsiderable part of the people, and sent them with great zeal into the temple, in order to seize upon it; which

* Here we see the true occasion of those vast numbers of Jews that were in Jerusalem during this siege of Titus, and perished therein; that the slope began at the first from the Egyptians, Eleazar and his party opened the gates of this temple, and admitted of the people, as were desirous to worship God into it. But John made use of this festival as a cloak for his treacherous designs, and armed the most inconsiderable part of the people, and sent them with great zeal into the temple, in order to seize upon it; which...
us they pleased, and hoping that the other party would open their gates to them, set to the execution of their designs accordingly. But for Titus himself, he had this surprising conduct of the Jews in suspension; for whereas he had invited them to come to terms of accommodation, by Josephus, but one day before, he could then receive no civil answer from them; so he ordered them, as they were in their houses, to be taken. However, some of them that were set in the front of the works prevented him, and catching up their arms ran to the gates; whereas those that seemed to have been ejected, at the first retired: but as soon as the Jews saw the towers were gone down between the two towers on each side of the gate, the Jews ran out and encompassed them round, and fell upon them behind, while that multitude which stood upon the wall, threw a heap of stones and darts of all sorts at them; but the Romans, being in a considerable number, and wounded many more; for it was not easy for the Romans to escape, by reason those behind them pressed them forward; besides which the stones they were under for being wild and hard, and the fire they were in of their commanders, engaged them to persevere in their mistake; wherefore they fought with their spears a great while, and received many blows from the Romans with stones or wood indeed, that gave them as many blows again, and at last repelled those that had encompassed them about, while the Jews pursued them as they retir'd, and followed them and threw darts at them as far as the monuments of Hippicus, and in another like manner, but two surlongs from the city. However, the tenth legion continued in its own place, upon the Mount of Olives.

4. After this, these Jews, without keeping any decursion, grew insolent upon their good fortune, and jested upon the Romans for being deluded by the trick they had put upon them, and making a noise to the beating of their shields, leaped for gladness, and made joyful exclamation; while these soldiers were received with threatening by their officers, and with indignation by Cesar himself, [who spake to them thus:] "These Jews, that are only contradicted by their mistake, do every thing with care and circumspection; they contrive stratagems and lay ambushes, and fortune gives success to their stratagems, because they are obedient, and preserve their good order as well in the day time as in the night. The Romans, to whom fortune uses to be ever subservient, by reason of their good order, and ready submission to their commanders, have now had ill success by their contrary behavior; and by the evidence of this, that we had A from action, they have been caught; and that which is the most to their reproach, they have gone on without their commanders in the very presence of them. The ordinary [say Titus] of laws of war cannot but grow more trivially, when my father also himself when he shall be informed of this wound that hath been given us, since who is grown old in wars, did never make so great a mistake. Our laws of war do also ever inflict capital punishment on those in the least break into good order, while at this time they have seen an entire army run into disorder. However, those that have been so insolent shall be made immediately serve as soldiers; and rather among the Romans without orders for fighting, are to be under disgrace." When Titus had enlarged upon this matter before the commanders, it appeared evident that he would execute the law against all that were concerned with these soldiers' minds sunk down in despair, as expecting to be put to death, and that hastily and quickly. However, the other legions came round about Titus, and entreated his favor to these their fellow-soldiers, and made supplication to him that he would pardon the rashness of a few, on account of the better obedience of all the rest; and promised for them, that they should make amends for their present fault by their more virtuous behavior in the time to come.

5. Cesar complied with their desires, and with what prudence dictated to him also; for he esteemed it fit to punish single persons by reparation, but that the punishment of great multitudes should proceed no further than the actual proofs; so he was reconciled to the soldiers but gave them a special charge to act more wisely for the future; and he considered with himself how he might be even with the Jews for their actions. However, the Romans and the wall had been levelled, which was done in four days; and as he was desirous to bring the baggage of the army with the rest of the multitude that followed him, safely to the camp, he set the seventh part of his army against that wall which lay on the north quarter of the city, and over against the western part of it, and made his army seven deep, with the footmen placed before them, and the horsemen behind them; however, as the archers stood in the midst in seven ranks. And now as the Jews were prohibited by so great a body of men, from making sallies upon the Romans, both the beasts that bare the burdens and belonged to the three hundred, were in the multitude, marched on without any fear. But as for Titus himself, he was but about two surlongs distant from the wall at that part of it that the Romans advanced against. The tower which was called Phœnix, at which tower the compass of the wall belonging to the north bended, and extended itself over against the west; but the other part of the army fortified itself at the feet of Hippius, and was distributed in the like manner, but two surlongs from the city. However, the tenth legion continued in its own place, upon the Mount of Olives.

CHAP. IV.

The Description of Jerusalem.

§ 1. The city of Jerusalem was fortified with three walls, on such parts as were not encompassed with impassable valleys; for in such places it was necessary to have two as well as three; these were two hills, which are opposite to one another, and have a valley to divide them, and each valley the corresponding rows of houses on both hills ends. Of these hills, that which contains the upper city is much higher, and instead of a direct. Accordingly, it was called the Citadel by king David; he was the father of that Solomon who built this temple at the first; but it is now called the Upper Market-place. But the other hill is called the Lower City, and the lower city, is of the shape of a moon when she is horned; over against there was a third hill, but naturally lower than Acra, and parted from the other by a broad valley. However, in the time of the Asa, when the city was increased, they filled up that valley with earth, and had a mind to join the city to the temple. They took off part of the height of Acra, and reduced it to a levelness that was before, that the temple might be superior to it. Now the valley of the Chemedmongers, as it was called, and was that which we told you before distinguished the hill of the upper city from that of the lower, except that of the Temple, which is covered by a fountain which hath sweet water in it, and that in great plenty also. But on the outsides, these hills are surrounded by deep valleys, and by reason of the precipices to them belonging, on both sides, they are much increased. 2. Now, of these three walls, the old one was hard to be taken, both by reason of the valleys, and of that hill on which it was built, and which was above them. But besides that great advantage, as to the place where they were wattled, it was also built very strong; because David and Solomon, and the following kings, were very zealous about this work. Now that wall

* Perhaps, say Dr. Hudson, here was that gate called the Gate of the Corner, in 2 Chron. xxvi. 8 et ch.
began on the north, at the tower called Hippicus, and extended as far as the Xistus, a place so called, and then joining to the council-house, ended at the west cloister of the temple. But if we go the other way outward, it becomes clear that the same place, and extended through a place called Betho, to the gate of the Esseus: and after that it went southward, having its bounding above the fountain Siloam, where it also beads again to what is known as the pool, and reached as far as a certain place which they called Ophelas, where it was joined to the eastern cloister of the temple. The second wall took its beginning from that gate which they called Genneth, which is the sixth mile by the old road, and passed the northern quarter of the city, and reached as far as the tower Antonia. The beginning of the third wall was at the tower Hippicus, whence it reached as far as the north quarter of the town, and reached that hill to the city, made considerably larger, and occasioned that which is in number the fourth, and is called Beseitha, to be inhabited also. It lies over against the tower of Antonia, but is divided from it by a ditch, and was dug on purpose, and that in order to hinder the foundations of the tower of Antonia from joining to this hill, and thereby affording an opportunity for getting to it with ease, and hindering the security that arose from its elevation, for which reason also that depth of the ditch made the elevation of the towers more remarkable. This new-built part of the city was called Beseitha in our language, which if interpreted means Tower, partaking in its nature of the New City. Since therefore its inhabitants stood in need of a covering, the father of the present king, and of the same name with him, Agrippa, began that wall we spoke of: but he left it unfinished, the foundations, out of the fear he was in of Claudius Caesar, lest he should suspect that so strong a wall was built in order to make some innovation in public affairs: for the city could no way have been more strongly fortified, and it was added to the manner it was begun; as its parts were connected together by stones twenty cubits long, and ten cubits broad, which could never have been either easily undermined by any iron tools, or shored in by the fortifications of the conqueror. There was nothing in the world, which gave more height to the Jews, as high as twenty cubits, above which it had battlements of two cubits, and turrets of three cubits altitude, inasmuch that the altitude extended as far as twenty-five cubits.

The fifth tower was called by some one it was twenty cubits in breadth and twenty cubits in height; they were square and solid, as was the wall itself, wherein the niceness of the joints and the beauty of the stones were noway inferior to those of the holy house itself. Above this solid altitude of the towers, which was twenty cubits, there were rooms of great magnificence, and over them upper rooms and cisterns to receive rain-water. They were many in number, and the steps by which you ascended up to them were every one broad; of these towers then the third wall had ninety, and the spaces between those were each two hundred cubits; but in the middle wall were forty towers, and the old wall was parted into sixty, so, as the compass of the city was thirty-three furlongs. Now the third wall was all of it wonderful; yet was the tower Paphians elevated above it at the northwest corner, and there Titus pitched his own tent; for being seven cubits high it both afforded a prospect of Arabia at sunrising, as well as did of the utmost limits of the Hebrew possessions at the sea westward. Moreover, it was an octagon, and over against it was the tower Hippicus, which was split and hard by the old road. Herod in the old wall. These were for largeness, beauty, and strength, beyond all that were in the habitable earth; for, besides the magnanimity of his nature, and his munificence towards the city in the former occasions, he built, after such an extraordinary manner, to gratify his own private affections, and dedicated these towers to the memory of those three persons who had been the dearest to him, and from whom he averred himself descended, and to his friend, and his wife. This wife he had slain out of his love [and jealousy,] as we have already related; the other two he lost in war, as they were courageously fighting. Hippicus, so named from his friend, had a breadth of twenty-five cubits, and its height thirty, and it had no vacancy in it. Over this solid building, which was composed of great stones united together, there was a reservoir of twenty cubits deep, over which there was a house of two stories, whose height was twenty-five cubits, and divided into several parts; over which were battlements of two cubits, and towers all round of three cubits height; in which the entire height added together amounted to fourscore cubits. The second tower, which he named from his brother Phasaelus, had its breadth and its height equal, each of them forty cubits; over which was its old height of three cubits; over which a cloister went round about, whose height was ten cubits, and it was covered from enemies by breastwork and bulwarks. There was also built over that cloister another tower, partaking in its nature of a place for bathing; so that this tower wasted nothing that might make it appear to be a royal palace. It was also adorned with battlements and turrets, more than was the foregoing, and the entire altitude of it was a little higher, so that the appearance of it resembled the tower of Pharos; which exhibited a fire to such as sailed to Alexandria, but was much larger than it in compass. This was now converted to a house, whereas Seleucus, exercising his property as an army, had a temple within the same.

The third tower was Marianne, for that was his queen's name: it was solid as high as twenty cubits: its breadth and its length were twenty cubits, and were equal to each other; its upper buildings were of more variety than the other towers had; for the king thought it most proper for him to adorn that which was denominated from his wife better than those denominated from the men, which were built stronger than this that bore his wife's name. The entire height of this tower was fifty cubits.

4. Now as these towers were so very tall, they appeared much taller by the place on which they were built; for the first was built on a high hill, and was itself a kind of elevation that was still thirty cubits taller; over which were the towers situated, and thereby were made much higher to appearance. The largeness also of the stones was wonderful, for they were not made of common small stones, nor of such large ones only as men could carry, but they were of white marble cut out of the rock: each stone was twenty cubits in length, and ten in breadth, and five in depth. They were so en-

sults united to one another, that each tower looked like one entire rock of stone, so growing naturally, and afterwards cut by the hands of the artists into their present shape and corners; so little, or not at all, does the stones that join them appear. Now as these towers were themselves on the north side of the wall, the king had a palace inwardly thereto adjointed, which exceeds all my ability to describe it; for it was so very curious, made in the depth of construction, but was entirely walked about the height of thirty cubits, and was adorned with towers at equal distances, and with large bed- chambers, who stood round, and those throughout a hundred and more guests space, in which the variety of the stones is not to be expressed; for a large quantity of those that were rare of that kind was collected together. Their roofs were also wonderful, both for size or height, or being a grand picture of their ornaments. The number of the rooms was also very great, and the variety of the figures that were about them was prodigious; their furniture was complete, and the greatest part of the vessels that were put in them were of silver and gold. There were besides many porticoes, one beyond another, round about, and in each of these porticoes curious pillars; yet were all the courts that were exposed to the air everywhere grand, and large, and moreover, several groves of trees and long walks through them, with deep canals, and cisterns, that in several parts were filled with braced statues, through which the water ran out. There were withal many dove-courts at the bottom, and were the breasts and the sides broad where it is not possible to give a complete description of these palaces; and the very remembrance of them is a torment to one, as putting one in mind what vastly rich buildings that fire which was kindled by the Romans consumed; for that city was burnt by the Romans, but by these internal plots, as we have already related; in the beginning of their rebellion. That fire began at the tower of Antonia, and went on to the palaces, and consumed the upper parts of the three towers themselves.

CHAP. V.

A Description of the Temple.

§ 1. Now this temple, as I have already said, was built upon a strong hill. At first the plan at the top was barely sufficient for the holy house and the altar, for the ground about it was very uneven, and like a precipice; but when king Solomon had procured the person that should build the temple, he had built a wall to it on its east side, there was then added one cloister founded on a bank cast up for it, and on other parts the holy house stood asked. But in future ages the people added new banks, and the hill grew a large plain. They then broke down the wall on the north side, and took in as much as sufficed afterwards for the compass of the entire temple. And when they had built walls on three sides of the temple round about, from the addition of the hill, and had formed a work that was greater than could be hoped for, in which whole long ages were spent by them, all their sacred treasures were ex- hibited, which were still replenished by those tributes which were sent to God from the whole had house. It had the same number of upper courts with cloisters, as well as they [af- terward] did the lowest [court of the] temple. The lowest part of this was erected to the height of a hundred cubits, and in some places more, yet did not exceed the height of the parapet. As they appear, for they brought earth and filled up the valleys, as being desirous to make them on a level with the narrow streets of the city; wherein they put the houses that stood in the way, in imitation for the great plenty of money they then had, and the liberality of the people, made this attempt of their to succeed to an incredible degree. And what could not be so much as hoped for as ever habitable city was built, even in the same perseverance and length of time, brought to perfection.

§ 2. Now for the works that were above these foundations, these were not unworthy of such foundations; for all the cloisters were double, and the pillars to fly by being were twenty-five cubits in height, and supported the cloisters. These pillars were of one entire stone each of them, and that stone was white marble; and the roofs were adorned with cedars, curiously graven and wrought; the spandrels of them, and the harmony of the joints in these cloisters, afforded a prospect that was very remarkable; nor was it on the outside adorned with any work of the painter or engraver. The cloisters of the temple on the north side were adorned with frescoes, while the entire compass of it was by measure six furlongs, including the tower of Antonia; those entire courts that were exposed to the air were laid with stones of all sorts. When you go from the temple by the east door [court of the] temple, there was a partition made of stone all round, whose height was three cubits. Its construction was very elegant; upon it stood gold doors, and that in equal distances from one another, declaring the law of purity, some in Greek, and some in Roman letters. That no foreigner should go within that sanctuary; for that second [court of the] temple was called the Sanctuary, and the priests of the first court were by fourteen steps below it, and there were other steps, each of five cubits square, that led to the gates, which gates on the north and south sides were eight, on each of those sides four, and of necessity two on the east. For since there was a partition built for the women on the east side, as the proper place wherein they were to which Josephus speaks of elsewhere, Antiq. B. xv. ch. 21, sect. 2; and which Mr. Mason searched, and describes, p. 100, as extant under ground at this day.

What Josephus seems here to mean is this, that these pillars supporting the cloisters in the second court, had their foundations or lower parts as deep in the floor of the first or lowest court, but that for these ports, or those lower parts of the building were not ground to the same level, but were reduced to twenty-five furlongs above, and unequal the difference of their heights to be fifteen cubits. These steps should give an ascent of fifteen cubits, half a cubit seeming sufficient for a single step. Possibly there were fourteen or fifteen steps at the palace itself, and the court itself, which would bring the whole near to the just proportion. See sect. 3, 19, 24. But I determine nothing.

*These three courts in Josephus, built by Herod the Great, are, in the opinion of Reid, the very same that are mentioned by the Talmudists, and named by them Herod's three courts. Nor is there any reason to sup- pose otherwise, since in both accounts they were ex- pressed tame pigeons which were kept in them. I see the description of the temple hereto belonging, chief among the rest, that which Josephus here says belong the original antecedence of this mount Moriah, that it was quite too little for the temple, and that at first it held only the foundation of the stone building, and that the foundations were to be added long afterward by degrees, to render it capable of the cloisters for the other. There was without all doubt also in the sculp- tures, and not at all confirmed by his exactier account in the Antiquities. All that is or can be true here is this, that the cloisters in the temple, almost long afterward, to be encompassed with cloisters, the southern foundation for these cloisters was found not to be large or firm enough, and was raised, and that additional foundation supported by great pillars and arbours under ground, which Josephus speaks of elsewhere, Antiq. B. xv. ch. 21, sect. 2; and which Mr. Mason searched, and describes, p. 100, as extant under ground at this day.
worse, there was a secretory for a second gate for them: this gate was cut out of its wall, over against the first gate. There was also on the other side of this court a large open place, through which was a passage into the court of the women; for as to the other gates, the women were not allowed to pass through them: nor were there passages on the other side of the temple, for they go beyond their own wall. The place was allotted to the women of our own country, and of other countries, provided they were of the same nation, and that equally: the western side of this court had no such limits, but the whole was built entire on that side. But then the cloisters which were between the gates extended from the wall inward before the chambers: for they were supported by very fine and large pillars. These and the angle, except in their magnitude, were no way inferior to those of the lower court.

3. Now size of these gates were on every side covered over with gold and silver, as were the purest and most splendid images; whereas was one gate that was without [the inward court] of the holy house, which was of Corinthian brass, and greatly excelled those that were only covered over with silver and gold. Each gate had above twelve cubits, and their breadth fifteen. However, they had large spaces within of thirty cubits, and had on each side rooms, and those, both in breadth and in length, built like towers, and their height was above sixty cubits. Two pillars did also support these rooms, and were in circumference twelve cubits. Now the magnitudes of the other gates were equal one to another; but that over the Corinthian gate, which opened on the east over against the holy house, was much larger; for its height was fifty cubits, and its doors were forty cubits; and it was adorned after a most costly manner, as having much richer work, both the silver and gold used on them than the other. These were not covered with gold and silver and gold poured upon them by Alexander the father of Tiberius. Now there were fifteen steps, which led away from the wall of the court of the women on either side of this gate: whereas those that led thither from the other gates were five steps shorter.

4. As to the holy house itself, which was placed in the midst [of the inner court], that most splendid building, it was equal to by twelve steps; and in front its height and its breadth were equal, and each a hundred cubits, though it was behind forty cubits narrower, for on its front it had what may be styled shoulders; and on the other side was fifty and fifteen cubits. Its first gate was seventy cubits high, and twenty-five cubits broad; but this gate had no doors; for it represented the universal visibility of heaven, and that it cannot be excluded from any place. Its form was covered with gold all over, and through it the first part of the house, that was more inward, did all of it appear; which, as it was very large, so did all the parts about the more inward part appear to shine to those that saw them: but then, as the whole was divided into two parts within, it was only the first part of it that was open to our view. Its height extended all along to ninety cubits in height, and fifty in breadth. But that gate which was at this end of the first part of the house, was, as we were already observed, all over covered with gold, as was its wide wall about it: it had also golden vases above it, from which clusters of grapes hung as tall as a man's height. But then this house, as it was divided into two parts, the inner part was lower than the appearance of the outer, and had golden doors of fifty-five cubits altitude, and golden gates above it, the latter being doors there was a veil of equal largeness with the doors. It was a Babylonian curtain; embroi-dered with blue, and fine lines, and scarlet, and purple, and of a contexture that was truly wonderful. Nor was this mixture of colors without its meaning, or a certain image of the universe; for by the scarlet there seemed to be eminently signified fire, by the fine lines the earth, by the blue the sea and air, by the purple the set of those having their colors the foundation of this realm, and the fine lines and the purple have their own origin for that foundation, the earth producing the one and the sea the other. This curtain had also emblazoned on it, or embroidered all that was mystical in the heavens, excepting that of the twelve signs, representing living creatures.

5. When any persons entered into the temple, its floor received them. This part of the temple, therefore, was in height sixty cubits, being the same length the same; whereas its breadth was but twenty cubits; but still that sixty cubits in length was divided again, and the first part of it was cut off at forty cubits, and had in it three things that were very extraordinary. First, there was the kind, the candlestick, the table [of showbread], and the altar of incense. Now the seven lamps signified the seven planets; for so many there were springing out of the candlestick. Now the seven lamps were upon a table, and that was the circle of the zodiac and the year; but the altar of incense, by its thirteen kinds of sweet-smelling spices with which the seas replenished it, signified, that God is the possessor of all things that are both in the under world and in the habitable parts of the earth, and that they are all to be dedicated to his use. But the innermost part of the temple of all was twenty cubits. This was also separated from the outer part by a veil. In this there was nothing at all. It was inaccessible and invisible, and not to be seen by any; and was called the Holy of Holies. Now, about the sides of the lower part of the temple there were little houses with little courts another: there were a great many of them, and they were of three stories high; there were also entrances on each side into them from the gate of the temple. But the superior part of the temple had no sand dunes and fine any farther, because the temple was there narrower, and forty cubits higher, of a smaller body than the lower parts of it. Thus we collect that the whole height, including the sixty cubits from the floor, amounted to a hundred and forty cubits.

6. Now the outward face of the temple in its front wanted nothing that was likely to surprise either men's minds or their eyes; for it was covered all over with plates of gold of great height, and, in the light of the sun, en- ded back a very fiery splendor, and made those who forced themselves to look upon it, to turn their eyes away, just as they would have done at the sun's own rays. But this temple appeared to strangers, when they were coming to it at a distance, like a mountain covered with snow; for, as to those parts of it that were not gilt, they were exceeding white. On its top it had spires with sharp points to the sky, just as if it had been built up by birds sitting upon it. Of its stones some of them were forty-five cubits in length, five in height, and six in breadth. Before this temple stood the altar, fifteen cubits high, and equal in length and breadth; its elevation was fifty cubits. The figure it was built in was a square, and it had corners like horns; and the passage up to it was by an inaccessible acclivity. It was formed without any iron tool, nor did any such tool so much as touch it at any time. There was also a wall of partition, about a cubit in height, made of fine stones, and so as to be graceful to the sight; this encompassed the holy house, and the altar, and kept the people that were in the temple from coming near the priests. Moreover, those that had the garments and the lappery were excluded out of the city entirely: women also, when their courses were upon them, were shut out of the temple; nor when they were free from that impurity, were they allowed to go beyond the limit before mentioned: men also, that were not thoroughly pure, were prohibited to come into the inner [court of the] temple; nay, the priests themselves that were not pure, were prohibited to come into it also. None of the stock of the priests that could not minister by reason of some defect in their bodies, came within the partition, together with those that had no such imperfection, and had their share with them by reason of their stature, or the uses of some except their own private garments; for nobody but he that officiated had on his sacred garments; but then those priests that were without any blemish upon them, went up to the altar clothed in fine linen. They abstained entirely from whom most of this fear, lest otherwise they should transgress some rules of their ministerian. The high priest did also go up with them; not always indeed, but on the seventh days and new moons, and if any festivals lying in tow; one was sent every year, happened. When he officiated, he had on a pair of breeches that reached beneath his privy parts to his thighs, and had on an inner garment of linen, together with a blue garment purple. Those parts reached to the feet. There were also golden bands that hung upon the fringes, and pomegranates intermingled among them. The bands signified thought and reverence, and the pomegranates that tied the garment to the breast, was embroidered with five rows of various colors, of gold, and purple, and scarlet, as also of fine linen and blue, with which colors we told you before the temple was embroidered also. The like embroidery was upon the ephod, but the quantity of gold therein was greater. Its figure was that of a tromacher for the breast. There were upon it two golden buttons like small shirts fitting in tow; one was sent in the other; a sardius, a topas, and an emerald; a carbuncle, a jasper, and a sapphire; an agate, an amethyst, and a ligure; an oxyx, a beryl, and a chrysolite; upon every one of which was again set a precious stone of the value of the tribes. A mitre also of fine linen encompassed his head, which was tied by a blue riband, about which there was another golden crown, in which were two sacred names [the sacred name of God] it consists of four vowels. However, the high priest did not wear these garments at other times, but a more plain habit; he only did it when he went into the most sacred part of the temple, which he did but once in a year, on that day when our custom is for all of us to keep a fast to God. And thus much concerning the city and the temple; but, for the customs and laws hereto relating, we shall speak more accurately another time; for there remain great many things thereto relating, which have not been here touched upon.

8. Now, as to the tower of Antonia, it was situated at the corner of two cloisters of the court of the temple, of that on the west, and that on the east side; and it stood upon a rock of fifty cubits in height, and was on a great precipice: it was the work of king Herod, wherein he demonstrated his natural magnanimity. In the first place, the rock itself was covered over with smooth pieces of stone, from its foundation, both for ornament, and that any one who would either try to get up or to go down it, might not be able to hold his feet upon it. Next to this, and before you come to the entrance of the tower itself, there stood all the space of the tower of Antonia was built upon to the height of forty cubits. The inward parts had the largeness and form of a palace, it being parted into all kinds of rooms and antechambers, such as courts and places for bathing, and broad spaces for camps; insomuch, that by having all conveniences that cities wanted, it might seem to be composed of several cities, but by its magnitude it seemed a palace for the entire structure. The entire structure of a tower, it contained also four other distinct towers at its four corners: whereof the others were but fifty cubits high; whereas that which lay upon the southeast corner was seventy cub- its high, and as it were the temple was to be viewed: but on the corner, where it joined to the two cloisters of the temple, it had passages down to them both, through which the guard (for there always lay in this tower a Roman legion) went several ways among the clois- ters, with their arms, on the Jewish festivals, in order to watch the people, that they might not there attempt to make any innovations; for the temple was a fortress that guarded the city, as, when Antiochus went to ravish it; and in that tower were the guards of those three. There was also a peculiar fortress belonging to the upper city, which was Herod's palace; but for the hill Bezetha, it was divided into two, and this already told you; and as that hill on which the tower of Antonia stood, was the highest of these three, so did it adjoin to the new city, and was the only place that hindered the inhabitants of the city from going into the temple, and was in no place so convenient for the Jews, as to a fortress, which shall suffice at present to have spoken about the city and the walls about it, because I have proposed to myself to make a more accurate description of it elsewhere.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning the Tyrant Simon and John. How also, as Titus was going round the Wall of the City, he was wounded by a javelin. Accident provoked Titus to press on the Siege.

§ 1. Now the warlike men that were in the city, and the multitude of the seditions that were with Simon, were ten thousand, besides the Idumeans. These ten thousand had fifty commanders, over whom An Simon was to reign to. The Idumeans that paid him homage were five thou- sand, and had eight commanders, among whom those of greatest name were Jacob the son of Saas, and Simon the son of Cathbas. John, who had been and was a notable man, and served as a learned men under twenty commanders; the leaders also that had come over to him, and left of their opposition, were two thousand four hundred, and was among the leaders was one Saul, a man of great and noble name. Lastly, Eleazar, together with Simon the son of Arius. Now, while these factions fought one against another, the people were their prey on both sides, as we have said already; and that part of the people which would not join them in their wicked practices, were plundered by both factions. Simon held the upper city, and the great wall as far as Cedron and as much of the old wall as went from Siloam to the east, and which went down to that place of Marpha- sas, who was king of the Adiabene, beyond Euphrates; he also held that fountain, and the Aen which was no other than the lower city; he also held that which reached to the palace of queen Hec- sob, and he had a rock of fifty cubits high, and the temple and the parts thereto adjoinning, for a good way, as also Opila, and the valley called the Valley of Cedron; and when the parts that were inter- posed between their possessions were bent by them, they left a space wherein they were not to fight with each other; for this internal sedition did not cease even when the Romans were en...

acted near their very walls. But although they had grown wiser by the first onset the Romans made upon them, this lasted but a while; for they returned to their former madness, and attempted the same stratagem, and the same plot, and did everything that the besiegers could desire them to do; for they never suffered anything that was worse from the Romans, then they made each other suffer; nor was there any misery more dreadful then the sight they beheld, that could be conceived new. But it was most of all unhappy before it was overthrown, while those that took it did it a greater kindness; for I venture to say, that the destruction of Titus, and the Romans destroyed the sedition, which it was a much harder thing to do than to destroy the wall; so that we may justly acribe our misfortunes to our own people, and the just vengeance that attended the miseries of all the Romans, destroyed the sedition, which it was a much harder thing to do than to destroy the wall, because the latter was much easier to be taken. But at this time, as he was going round about the city, one of his friends, whose name was Nicomer, was wounded with a dart on his left shoulder, as he approached, together with Josephus, to the wall, and attempted to discourse to those that were upon the wall, about terms of peace; for he was a person known by them. On this account it was that Caesar, as for the Jews, as well as for the temple itself, and the building by the city, the builders neglecting to build the wall strong where the new city was not much inhabited; here also was an easy passage to the third wall, through which he thought to take the upper part of the city, and to break the temple itself. But at this time, as he was going round about the city, one of his friends, whose name was Nicomer, was wounded with a dart on his left shoulder, as he approached, together with Josephus, to the wall, and attempted to discourse to those that were upon the wall, about terms of peace; for he was a person known by them. On this account it was that Caesar, as for the temple itself, and the building by the city, the builders neglecting to build the wall strong where the new city was not much inhabited; here also was an easy passage to the third wall, through which he thought to take the upper part of the city, and to break the temple itself.
them at one blow. Yet did not the Jews, under all this distress, permit the Romans to raise their banks in quiet; but they shrieked and boldly exposed themselves, and repelled them both by night and by day.

4. And now, upon the finishing the Roman works, the workmen measured the distance there from the wall, and this by lead and a line, which they threw to it from their hek, for there they could not measure it any otherwise, because the Jews would shoot at them, if they came to measure it themselves; and when they found that the banks were now quite as high, they answered not them thither. Then did Titus set his engines at proper distances, so much nearer to the wall, that the Jews might not be able to repel them, and gave orders they should go to work; and when he perceived them to make no head round about from three pieces, and that on the sdden there was a great noise made by the citizens that were within the city, and no less a terror fell upon the seditions themselves; whereupon both sides, seeing the common danger of their obstinacy, contrived to make a like defence. So those of different factions cried out one to another, that they acted entirely as in concert with their eneemies; whereas they ought, however, notwithstanding, not to oppose the just and necessary daring concord, in their present circumstances, to lay aside their enmities one against another, and to unite together against the Romans. Accordingly, Simon gave those that came from the temple leave, by the first division, to go upon the wall; and John also himself, though he could not believe that Simon was in earnest, gave them the same leave. So on both sides they laid aside their hatred and their personal quarrels, and turned themselves into one body; they then ran round the walls, and having a vast number of torches with them, they threw them at the machines, and shot darts per-mutually upon those that impelled those engines with the wall; but, on the other side, the boldier sort kept out by troops upon the hurdles that covered the machines, and pulled them to pieces, and fell upon those that belonged to them, and beat them, not so much by any skill they had, as by the common danger of their obstinacy. However, Titus himself still sent assistance to those that were the hardest set, and placed both horsemen and archers on the several sides of the engines, and thereby beat off those that brought the stones; and he also therewith perplexed those that shot stones or darts from the towers; and then set the engines to work in good earnest; yet did not the wall yield to these blows, excepting where the battering-ram of the fifteenth leginion made a breach of a tower, so that while the wall itself continued unhurt; for the wall was not presently in the same danger with the tower, which was extant far above it; nor could the fall of that part of the tower easily break down any part of the wall itself together with it.

5. And now the Jews intermitted their sallies for a while; but when they observed the Romans dispersed all abroad at their works, and in that disorder, thought themselves upon a very safe chance, they shot out of their towers and gates upon the Jews who had retired out of weariness and fear, they sat at once made a sally at the tower Hippicus, through an obscure gate, and at the same time brought fire to burn the works, and went boldly up to the gates, and therewith fortified themselves, where, at the cry they made, those that were near them came presently to their assistance, and those farther off came running after them; and here the boldness of the Jews was too hard for the good order of the Romans; and as they beat those whom they first fell upon, so they pressed upon those that were now gotten together. So this fight about the machines was very hot, while the one side tried hard to set them over the other side to prevent it; on both sides there was a confused cry made, and many of those in the forefront of the battle were slain. However, the Jews were now too hard for the Romans, by the furious assaults they made like madmen; and the fire caught hold of the works, and the Roman soldiers, and the engines themselves, had been in danger of being burnt; had not many of those select soldiers that came from Alexandria opposed themselves to prevent it, and had not they beloved themselves with great prudence; for the fire had blown from the banks, for they could have done; for they oxidied those in the fight that had greater reputation than themselves before. This was the state of things till Cæs er had the two sides to see the extent of the ruin and the enemy, when he himself slew twelve of those that were in the forefront of the Jews; which death of these men, when the rest of the multitude saw, they gave way, and he pursued them, and drove them all round about, and the wall, and the works from the fire. Now, it happened at this fight, that a certain Jew was taken alive, who, by Titus's order, was crucified before the wall, to see whether the rest of them would be afraid of their own obstinacy. But after the Jews were retired, John, who was commander of the Idumæans, and was talking to a certain soldier of his acquaintance before the wall, was wounded by a dart shot at him by an Arab, to such a degree that he died of his greatest lamentation to the Jews, and sorrow to the seditions. For he was a man of great eminence, both for his actions and his conduct also.

CHAP. VII.

How one of the Towers erected by the Romans fell down of its own accord; and how the Romans, after great Slaughter had been made, got possession of the first Wall. How also Titus made his Assaults upon the second Wall: as also concerning Longinus the Roman, and Carnes.

§ 1. Now on the next night, a surprising disturbance fell upon the Romans; for whereas Titus had given orders for the erection of three towers of fifty cubits high, that by setting men upon them at every bank, he might from thence drive those away who were upon the wall; it so happened that one of these towers fell down about midnight; and as its fall made a very great noise, fear fell upon the army, and they, supposing that the enemy was coming to attack them; then the general called together the whole army, and made his speech thus: Whereupon a disturbance and a tumult arose among the legions, and nobody could tell what had happened, they went on after a disconsolate manner; and seeing no enemy appear, they were afraid one of another, and every one demanded of his neighbor the watchword with great earnestness, as though the Jews had invaded their camp. And now they were like people under a panic fear, till Titus was informed of what had happened, and gave orders that all should be accustomed with it; and then, though with some difficulty, they got clear of the disturbance they had been under.

2. Now these towers were very troublesome to the enemy; and they thought therefore that they were very courageous; for they shot at them out of their lighter engines from those towers, as they did also by those that threw darts, and the archers, and those that flung stones. For neither could they avoid the blows by reason of their height, and it was not practicable to take them, nor to overturn them, they were so heavy; nor to set them on fire, because they were covered with plates of iron; besides they retired out of the reach of the darts, and did no longer endeavor to hinder the impression of their rams, which, by continually beating upon the wall, did gradually prevail against it; so that the wall did not give way to that; for which did the Jews themselves call the greatest of their engines, because it conquered all things. And, now, they were for a long while green many of fighting, and of keeping garbage, and were retired to lodge on the night times at a distance from the wall. It was on other accounts also thought by them to be superfluous to guard the wall, there being, besides that, two other fortifications still remaining, and these the most notable of the fortifications of the city, which had been ill concerted on all occasions; so a great many grew lazy and retired. Then the Romans mounted the breach, where Nico had made one, and all the Jews left the guarding that wall, and returned to the second trail; and so together they got over that wall opened the gates and received all the army within it. And thus did the Romans get possession of this first wall, on the fifteenth day of the siege, which was the seventh day of the month Adar, the fourth year, for they demolished a great part of it, as well as they did of the northern parts of the city, which had been demolished also by Cestius formerly.

3. And now Titus pitched his camp within the city, at that place which was called the Camp of the Assyrians, having raised upon all that lay as far as Cedron, but took care to be out of the reach of the Jews' darts. He then presently began his attacks, upon which the Jews divided themselves, and each of them defended that wall; while John and his faction did it from the tower of Antonia, and from the northern cloister of the temple, and fought the Romans before the monuments of king Alexander the Great. But Titus then took care to receive them from harm, as well as to have them overcome their enemies. He also said, that inconsiderate violence was madness, and that this alone was the true courage, that was joined with good conduct. He also said, that there was no room for care, when they fought their enemies, that they received no harm from them at the same time and thereby show themselves to be truly valiant men.

4. And now Titus brought one of his engines to the middle tower of the north part of the wall, in which a certain crafty Jew, whose name was Castor, lay in ambush, with ten others like himself, the rest being fled away by reason of the archers. Titus therefore kindled the engines, and great fear, under their breakplates: but when the tower was shaken, they arose, and Castor did then stretch out his hand as a petitioner, and called for Caesar, and by his voice moved his engines. For the compassionate of Titus also was upon them; and Titus, in the innocence of his heart, believing him to be in earnest, and hoping that the Jews did now repent, stopped the working of the battering-ram, and forbade them to shoot at the wall, but said, that what he had a mind to say to him. He said, that he would come down, if he would give him his right hand for his security. To which Titus replied, that he was well pleased with such his agreeable conduct, and would be well pleased if all the Jews would be of his mind, and that he was ready to give the like security to the city. Now five of the ten dissembled with him, and pretended to beg for mercy, while the rest cried with rage that they would see them all killed. And Titus, having taken care of the safety of the Romans, while it was in their power to die in a state of freedom. Now while these men were quarrelling for a long while, the attack was laid; Castor also sent to Simon, and told him that they were about to accuse him of what was to be done, because he would elude the power of the Romans for a considerable time. And at the same time that he sent thus to him, he appeared openly to exhort those that were about to accuse him of their security; but they seemed very angry at it, and branded their naked swords upon the breastworks, and struck themselves upon their breasts, and fell down as if they had been slain. Hereupon Titus stood up, and gave a loud shout at the courage of the men, and as they were not able to see exactly what was done, they admired at their great fortitude, and pitied their calamity. During this interval, a certain person shot a dart at Castor, and wounded him in his nose, whereupon he presently pulled out the dart and
4. And now, upon the finishing the Roman works, the workmen measured the distance there as from the wall, and this by lead and a line, which the leadsman drew to it from the tower. For he could not measure it any otherwise, because the Jews would shoot at them, if they came to measure it themselves; and when they found that the engines could reach the wall, they brought their engines to it. Titus did allow the distances at proper distances, so much nearer to the wall, that the Jews might not be able to repel them, and gave orders they should go to work; and when thereon a prodigious noise echoed round about from three places, and that on the sudden there was a great noise made by the citizens that were within the city, and no less a terror fell upon the seditions themselves; whereupon both sides by common danger they were in, contrived to make a like defence. So those of different factions cried out one to another, that they acted entirely as in concert with their enemies; whereas they ought, however, notwithstanding God, did not join them in a lasting concord, in their present circumstances, to lay aside their enmities one against another, and to unite together against the Romans. Accordingly, Simon gave those that came from the temple leave, by judgment, to go upon the wall; John also himself, though he could not believe that Simon was in earnest, gave them the same leave. So on both sides they laid aside their hatred and their peculiar quarrels, and formed themselves into one order of itself, and ran round on the banks, and having a vast number of torches with them, they threw them at the machines, and shot darts perpendicularly upon those that impelled those engines within the wall; and they, the soldier sort leaped out by troops upon the banks that covered the machines, and pulled them to pieces, and fell upon those that belonged to them, and beat them, not so much by any skill they had, as principally by the boldness of their attacks. However, Titus himself still sent men to those who were the hardest set, and placed both horsemen and archers on the several sides of the engines, and thereby beat off those that brought that outwardly. And there was no further those that shot stones or darts from the towers, and then set the engines to work in good earnest; yet did not the wall yield to these blows, excepting where the battering-ram of the fifteenthengine was, when the corbels of the tower itself continued unhurt; for the wall was not presently in the same danger with the tower, which was extent far above it; nor could the fall of that part of the tower easily break down any part of the wall itself, and the Romans, in the watchword with great eagerness, at that time the Jews had invaded their camp. And now they were like people under a great fear, till Titus was informed of what had happened, and that the Romans, in their several orders, that all should be expected with the and then, though with some dilatation, clear of the disturbances.

5. And now the Jews intermitted their sallies for a while; but when they observed the Romans dispersed all abroad at their works, and in their several camps, (for they thought the Jews dispersed very carelessly, and they all at once made a sally at the tower Hippicus, through an obscure gate, and at the same time brought fire to burn the works, and went boldly up to the Romans, and to their very fortifications themselves, and to the very very hard fortune of those that were near them, the assistance, and those farther off came running after them; and so the boldness of the Jews was hard fortune of the order of the Romans, and that they beat them whom they first fell upon those that were now gathering. So this fight about the machine very hot, while the one side tried hard to drive those that were hindered to prevent it, and the other side of the wall, there was a confused cry made, of those in the forefront of the battle.
grew weary of fighting, and of keeping guard, and were retired to lodge on the night times at small distances from the strong hold. And the accounts also thought by them to be superfluous to guard the wall, there being, besides that, two other fortifications still remaining, and they being stalwart, and their counsels having been seconded also by the news of the分散 of the enemy, may have grown less and retired. Then the Romans mounted the breach, where Nico had made one, and all the Jews left the guarding of that wall, and contrived to the second wall, so that those that had gone, being thought by them that they had arrived the wall, they were defended. And thus did the Romans get possession of this first wall, on the sixteenth day of the siege, which was the seventh day of the month Antoninus, [Year 200] of the descent of the number part of it, as well as they did of all the others of the city, which had been demolished also by Cestius formerly.

3. And now Titus pitched his camp within the city, at that place which was called the Camp of the Augusteum, having marked upon all that lay as far as Cedron, but took care to be out of the reach of the Jews' darts. He then presently began his attacks, upon which the Jews divided themselves into two parties. The one party defended that wall; while John and his faction did it from the tower of Antonia, and from the northern cloister of the temple, and fought the Romans before the monuments of King Alexander; and Simon and his faction did it from the square of ground that was near John's monument, and fortified it as far as to that gate where water was brought into the tower Hippicus. However, the Jews made violent sallies, and John of Jerusalem, and in bodies together, out of the gates, and there fought the Romans, and when they were pursued all together to the wall, they were beaten in those fights, as wanting the skill of the Romans. But when they fought them one by one, they were quite overpowered for them; the Romans being encouraged by their power, joined to their skill, as were the Jews by their boldness, which was nourished by the fear they were in, and that hardness which is natural to our nation. And of the sallies, not only were those that were their engagements that were not then put in use. And the night itself had much ado to part them, when they began to fight in the morning; nay, the night itself was passed without sleep on both sides, and was more uneasy to the day to them, and the one was afraid lest the wall should be taken, and the other lest the Jews should make sallies upon their camps: both sides also lay in armor during the night time, and thereby were always at the point to repel any one that should pass to the battle. Now, among the Jews, the ambition was who should undergo the first dangers and thereby gratify their commanders. Above all, there was a great desperation and dread of Simon, and to that degree he had been overmatched by every one of those that were under him, that at his command they were very ready to kill themselves with their own hands. What made the Romans, besides the expectation of the conquering, and issue of being defeated, their constant wars, and perpetual warlike exercises, and the grandeur of their dominion: and what was now their chief encouragement, Titus, who was there, that was a very brave man; for it appeared a terrible thing to grow weary, while Caesar was there, and fought bravely as well as he did, and was himself at once an eyewitness of such as behaved themselves valiantly, and he who was to reward them. Also, it was, besides, esteemed an advantage at present to have any one's valor known by Caesar, on which account many of them appeared to have more alacrity than they otherwise would.
showed it to Titus, and complained that this was unfair treatment. So Caesar reproved him that shot the dart, and sent Josephus, who then stood by him, to give his right hand to Castor. But Josephus said that he would not go to him, because these pretended petitioners meant nothing that was good; he also restrained those friends of his who were zealous to go to him. But still there was one Eneas, a deserter, who said what he would say for the man. Caesar also added to them, that somebody should come and receive the money which he had with him; this made Eneas the more earnestly to run to him with his bosom open. Thus did Caesar take up a great stone, and threw it at him, which missed him a little. He could not bear the idea that he had insulted him, and he did in this matter, as he did in several others, do a great thing, because such cunning tricks have less place under the exercise of greater severity. So he caused the engine to work more strongly than before, on account of his anger at the deceit put upon him. Caesar and his companions set the tower on fire when it began to give way, and leaped through the flame into a hidden vault that was under it, which made the Romans farther suppose that they were men of great courage, as having cast themselves into the fire.

CHAPTER VIII.
How the Romans took the second Wall twice, and got ready for taking the third Wall.
§ 1. Now Caesar took this wall there on the fifth day after he had taken the first: and when the Jews had fled from him, he entered into it with a thousand armed men, and those of his choice troops, and this at a place where were the merchant- shops, because that was a large part of the wall immediately, or had been. And according to a law there was laid waste what was left; his victory would not, I suppose, have been mixed with any loss to himself. But now, out of the hope he had that he should make the Jews ashamed of their obstinacy, and willing to give up what he was able, to afflict them more than he needed to do, he did not widen the breach of the wall, in order to make a safer retreat upon occasion; for he did not think they would lay snares for those that did. Caesar therefore, when he came in, he did not permit his soldiers to kill any of those they caught, nor to set fire to their houses; nay, he gave leave to the sedi- tious, if they had a mind, to fight without any breach of the law, and according to the people's effect on them; for he was very desirous to preserve the city for his own sake, and the temple for the sake of the city. As to the people, he had them of a long time ready to comply with his proposals; but as he was a long man, this humanity of his seemed a mark of his weakness, and they imagined that he made these proposals because he was not able to take the rest of the city. He also threatened death to the people if they should say any one of them a word about a surrender. They moreover cut the throats of such as talked of a peace, and then at- tacked those Romans that were come within the walls, and they met in the narrow streets, and some they fought against from their houses, while they made a sudden sally out at the upper gates, and assaulted such Romans as were beyond the wall, till those that guarded the wall were so affrighted, that they leaped down from their towers, and retired to their several camps. Upon which a great noise was made by the Romans that were within, because they were unacquainted round on every side by their ene- mies; as also by the noise of the people, because they were in fear of those that were left in the city. Thus did the Jews grow more nume- rous perpetually, and had great advantages over the Romans by their full knowledge of those nar- row lanes; and they wounded a great many of them, and fell upon them, and drove them out of the city. Now these Romans were at pre- sent forced to make the best resistance they could, for they were not able in great numbers to get out at the breach in the wall, it was so wide. They were also confined by the Jews that were gotten within had been cut to pieces if Titus had not sent them succours: for he ordered the archers to stand at the upper ends of these narrower lanes, and stood himself where he was to the greatest advantage, and with his darts he put a stop to them; as with him did Domitian Sabinus also, a valiant man, and see that in this battle appeared so to be. Thus did Caesar's army and the Romans continue to the utmost, to hinder them from coming upon his men, and this until all his soldiers had retreated out of the city.

2. And thus were the Romans driven out after the best resistance themselves of the said wall. Whereupon the fighting men that were in the city were lifted up in their minds, and were elevated upon this their good success, and began to think that the Romans would never enter the city and into the city and after that, if they kept within it themselves, they should not be any more conquered; for God had blinded their minds for the transgressions they had been guilty of, nor could they see how much the Romans had the advantage. But as they were now expelled, no more than they could discern how a famine was creeping upon them; for hitherto they had fed themselves out of the public miseries, and drank the blood of the city. But when they were driven out of the city, and the latter part, and a great many had already been forced to go to men of necessities, although the se- dition indeed supposed the destruction of the city and of themselves; yet they desired that none others might be preser- ved but such as were against a peace with the Romans, and were resolved to live in opposition to them, and they were pleased when the multi- tude that was in the city on the south was trans- mused, as being then freed from a heavy bur- den. And this was their disposition of mind with regard to those that were within the city, while they covered themselves with their ar- mament, and maintained their men trying to get into the city again, and made a wall of their own bodies over against that part of the wall that was cast down. Thus did they valiant- ly defend themselves for three days; and on the fourth the Romans made a descent. Accordingly, as for the actions against the vehement assaults of Titus, but were compelled by force to fly whither they had fled before; so he quietly possessed himself again of that wall, and demolished it entirely. And when he had burned the fighting towers that were on the south parts of the city, he contrived how he might assault the third wall.

CHAPTER IX.
Titus, when the Jews were not all mollified by his leaving off the Siege for a while, set him- self again to prosecute the same; but soon set Josephus of Sardis in discourse with his own Commissary about Peace.
§ 1. A RESOLUTION was now taken by Titus to relax the siege for a little while, and to afford the seditious an interval for consideration, and to see whether the demolishing of their second wall would not make them a little more compas- sionate, or whether they were not somewhat afraid of a famine, because the spoils they had gotten by rapine would not be sufficient for them long; so he made use of this relaxation in order to his own designs. Accordingly, as the usual appointed time when he must distribute substance money to the soldiers was now come, he gave orders that the commanders should put the army into battle array in the face of the enemy, and then give every one of the soldiers their pay. So the soldiers, according to custom, opened the cases wherein before their arms lay covered, and marched with their breastplates on, as did the horsemen lead their horses in their fine trappings. And so the earth was covered with the dust from the horses, and one might see the houses full of such as looked at them; nor was there any part of the city which was not covered over with their multitudes: may, a very great consternation seized upon the breast of the Jews themselves, when they saw all the army in the same place, together with the fineness of their arms, and the good order of their men. And I cannot but think that the seditions would have changed their minds at that sight, unless the crimes they had committed against the people had not been so horrid that they despaired of forgiveness from the Romans; but as they believed death with them was better, than punishment for their sins, they did not go on in the defence of the city, they thought it much better to die in war. Fate also prevailed so far over them, that the innocent were to perish with the guilty, and the city was to be destroyed with the sword, and fire, and famine. This was the truth that God had not suffered, had they not known that God was with them. As for themselves, what can they depend on in this their opposition, when the greatest part of their city was already taken; and when those that are within it are under greater miseries than if they were taken, although their walls be still standing? For that the Romans are not unacquainted with that famine which is in the city, when there were despairs in all, and much consumed, and the fighting men will in a little time be too; for although the Romans should leave off the siege, and not fall upon the city with their swords in their hands, yet was there in an insuperable war that besets them within and without, and augmented every hour, unless they were able to wage war with famine, and fight against it, or could alone conquer their natural appetites." He added this further: "How then, when before them, did they not exchange their conduct, before their calamities were become incalculable, and have to recourse to such advice as might preserve them, while opportunity was offered them for so doing: For that the Romans were not procedure in this case, and lead them to surrender the city, now in a manner already taken, and thereby to save themselves, and sent Josephus to speak to them in their own language; for he imagined they might yield to him, and for the profit of theirs lay not in leaving the city empty of inhabitants, nor the country desert; on which account Cæsar did now offer them his right hand for their security. Whereas, if he took the city by force, he might yet revenge himself upon them especially, if they rejected his offers in these their utmost distresses: for the walls that were already taken could not but assure them that the third wall could be quickly taken also; and although their fortitude of a constancy would presage things for the Romans to break through them, yet would the famine fight for the Romans against them." 4. While Josephus was making this exhortation to the Jews to abandon their cities, and to settle themselves, to spare their country, and their temple, and not to be more obstinate in these cases than foreigners themselves: for that the Romans, who had no relation to those things, had a reverence for their sacred rites and places, although they belonged to their enemies, and had till now kept their hands off from meddling with them; while such as were brought up under them, and, if they were preserved, will be the only people that will reap the benefit of them, hurry on to have the city destroyed of them. How, they have in their strongest walls demolished, and that the all still remaining was weaker than those that were already taken. That they must know the Roman power was invincible, and that they had been dealt with so rigorously, to that end they were, to give a right thing to fight for liberty, that ought to have been done at first; but for them that have once fallen under the power of the Romans, and have now submitted to them for so many long years, to procure to the city the least by their conduct, was the work of such as had a mind to die miserably, not of such as were lovers of liberty. Besides, men may well enough grudge at the dishonor of owning ignoble masters over them, but ought not to do so to those who lay all things under their command; for what part of the world is there that hath escaped the Romans unless it be such as are of no use through violent ends, and they do not know that all hands gone over to them; and that God, when he had gone round the nations with this dominion, is now settled in Italy. That, moreover, it is a strong and fixed law, even among brute beasts, in the war of men, to yield to those that are too strong for them; and to suffer those to have the dominion, who are too hard for the rest in war. For which reason it was, that their forefathers, who were far superior to them, both in their souls and bodies, and other things, did not submit to the Romans, which they would not have suffered, had they not known that God was with them. As for themselves, what can they depend on in this their opposition, when the greatest part of their city was already taken; and when those that are within it are under greater miseries than if they were taken, although their walls be still standing? For that the Romans are not unacquainted with that famine which is in the city, when there were despairs in all, and much consumed, and the fighting men will in a little time be too; for although the Romans should leave off the siege, and not fall upon the city with their swords in their hands, yet was there in an insuperable war that besets them within and without, and augmented every hour, unless they were able to wage war with famine, and fight against it, or could alone conquer their natural appetites." He added this further: "How then, when before them, did they not exchange their conduct, before their calamities were become incalculable, and have to recourse to such advice as might preserve them, while opportunity was offered them for so doing: For that the Romans were not procedure in this case, and lead them to surrender the city, now in a manner already taken, and thereby to save themselves, and sent Josephus to speak to them in their own language; for he imagined they might yield to him, and for the profit of theirs lay not in leaving the city empty of inhabitants, nor the country desert; on which account Cæsar did now offer them their right hand for their security. Whereas, if he took the city by force, he might yet revenge himself upon them especially, if they rejected his offers in these their utmost distresses: for the walls that were already taken could not but assure them that the third wall could be quickly taken also; and although their fortitude of a constancy would presage things for the Romans to break through them, yet would the famine fight for the Romans against them."
will fight by your weapons and by your hands against the Romans. When did we ever conquer any other nation by such means? and when was it that God, who is the Creator of the Jewish people, did not avenge them when they had been injured? Will not you turn again, and look back to the time when it was that you fought with such violence, and how great a Supporter you have profanely abused? Will not you recall to mind the prodigious things done for your forefathers and this holy place, and how great enemies you attacked by his assistance under you? I even tremble myself, in declaring the works of God before your ears that are unworthy to hear them: however, hearken to me, that you may be informed, how you fight not only against the Romans, but also against God himself. In old time there was one Neros, king of Egypt, who was also called Pharaoh; he came with a prodigious army of soldiers, and seized queen Sarah, the mother of our nation. What did Abraham our progenitor do then? Did he defile himself from this injurious person by war, although he had three hundred and eighteen captains under him, and an immense army under each of them? Indeed he thought it to be too much for him to enable him to meet them head on, without God's assistance, and only spread out his hands towards this holy place, a which you have polluted, and reckoned upon him as upon his invincible supporter, instead of his own army. Why have you turned back without any assistance to your husband, the very next evening? while the king of Egypt fled away, adoring this place which you have defiled by shedding thereon the blood of your own countrymen; and he also, the wise sages with whom he was seen in the night-season, and bestowed both silver and gold on the Hebrews, as on a people beloved by God. Shall I say nothing, or shall I mention the removal of our fathers into Egypt, who, when they were driven out, and our nation falls under the power of foreign kings for four hundred years together, and might have defended themselves by war and fighting, did yet do nothing but commit themselves to God? Who is there that doubts now that Egypt was overthrown with all sorts of wild beasts, and consumed by all sorts of distempers? how their land did not bring forth its fruit? how the Nile failed of water? how the ten plagues of Egypt followed one upon another? and how they were, under our fathers, sent away under a guard without any bloodshed, and without running any dangers, because God conducted them as his peculiar servants? Moreover, did not Palestine groan under the ravages the Assyrians made there? was it not called Dagon, and as also did that entire nation of those that carried it away; how they were smitten with a loathsome distemper in the secret parts of their bodies, when their very bowels came down together with what they had eaten, till those hands that stole it away were obliged to bring it back again, and that with the sound of cymbals and timbrels, and other instruments in order to appease the anger of God for the violation of his holy ark? It was God who then became our general, and accomplished these great things for our fathers, and this because they did not meddle with war and fighting, but submitted it to him, their judge about their affairs. When Sennacherib, king of Assyria, brought along with him all Asia, and encoun-

* Josephus supposes, in this his admirable speech to the Jews, that not Abraham only, but Pharaoh, king of Egypt, prayed toward a temple at Jerusalem, or toward a stone which was set up in Mount Sieor in Mount Moriah, on which the tabernacle and temple did afterward stand; and this long before either the Jewish tabernacle or temple was built. Nor is the famous command given by God to Abraham, to go two or three days' journey on purpose to offer up his son Isaac there, unfavorable to such a notion.

[Note here, that Josephus, in this his admirable speech, calls the Syrians, may, even the Philistians, passed this city round with his army, did he fail by his help; his hands were not tied up to God in prayers, without meddling with their arms, when the angel of God destroyed that prodigious army in one night? when the Assyrian king, as he arose the next day, found a hundred thousand of his men slain; or when he, with the remainder of his army, fled away from the Hebrews, though they were unarmed, and did not pursue them? You are also acquainted with the slavery we were under at Babylon; on the people was laid the yoke of seventy years; yet were they not delivered into freedom again, before God made Cyrus his gracious instrument in bringing it about; accordingly they were set free by him, and did again rest in the possession of their own land and their own people. And to speak in general, we can produce no example wherein our fathers got any success by war, or failed of success when without war they committed themselves to God. When they were in the same temple, when Antiochus, the tyrant and Judge, but when they went out to fight, they were always disapponted; for example, when the king of Babylon besieged this very city, and, seeing Zedekiah fought against him, contrary to what his generals were made to do, he would not raise his hands against the prophet, he was at once taken prisoner and saw the city and the temple desolated. Yet how much greater was the moderation of God, when, for the first time, the king of Babylon got the victory, and that of the people then, the conqueror, is that of you at this time? for when Jeremiah cried out aloud, how very angry God was at them because of their transgression, and told them they should be taken prisoners unless they would surrender up the city, neither did the king see the people put him to death; but for you, (to pass over what you have done within the city, which I am not able to describe as your wickedness, and to speak only of your present proceedings,) not only am I sent here by God, but by those that have set my feet on this place, who only exhort you to save yourselves, as being provoked when you are put in mind of your sins, and cannot bear the very mention of those crimes which you every day perpetrate. And now, and now, if those rulers subjected to the Romans, who were unworthy of the liberty they had enjoyed? After a siege, therefore, of three months, they were forced to surrender themselves to their conquerors in order to appease the anger of God for the violation of his holy ark? as did their idol Dagon, and as also did that entire nation of those that carried it away; how they were smitten with a loathsome distemper in the secret parts of their bodies, when their very bowels came down together with what they had eaten, till those hands that stole it away were obliged to bring it back again, and that with the sound of cymbals and timbrels, and other instruments in order to appease the anger of God for the violation of his holy ark? It was God who then became our general, and accomplished these great things for our fathers, and this because they did not meddle with war and fighting, but submitted it to him, their judge about their affairs. When Sennacherib, king of Assyria, brought along with him all Asia, and encounon the most south part of Syria, Assyria; which Redeard observes as was common among the ancient writers. Note also, that Josephus might well put the Jews in the same situation as Mount Bionton and Mount Moriah, on which the tabernacle and temple did afterward stand; and this long before either the Jewish tabernacle or temple was built. Nor is the famous command given by God to Abraham, to go two or three days' journey on purpose to offer up his son Isaac there, unfavorable to such a notion.

the son of Antiochus, brought upon us Sidon, and Sidonius brought upon us the Roman army; they were then encompassed and besieged for six months. Then, when they were vanquished, and we took the city, they were taken, and the city was plundered by the enemy. Thus it appears, that arms were never given to our nation: but that we are always given up to be fought against, and to be taken and carried captive. Now, if he be but a good man, will fly from an impure house, and will hate those that are in it; and do you persuade yourselves that God will abide with you in your iniquities, who then seek these things, and hears what you keep secret? No, when crime is there, I pray you, that so much as kept a secret among you, or is concealed by you? Nay, what is there that is not open to your very enemies? for you show your transgressions after a pompous manner, and contend one with another which of you shall be more wicked than another; and you make a public demonstration of your injustice, as if it were virtue. However, there is a place left for your preservation: it is on you to be willing to accept of it; and God is easily reconciled to those that confess their faults, and repent of them. O hard-hearted wretches as you are cast away all your arms, and take pity of your country, already gone to ruin from your wicked ways, and have regard to the excellency of that city you are going to betray, to that excellent temple, with the dominions of so many countries in it. Who could bear to be the first that should be the instrument of such a thing? who could be willing that these things should be no more? and what is there that can better deserve to be preserved? O insensible creatures, and more than that, if you cannot look at these things with discerning eyes, yet, however, have pity upon your families, and set before every one of your eyes your children, and wives, and parents, who will be either widows or fatherless. I am sensible that this danger will extend to my mother, and wife, and to that family of mine which hath been by me so much distinguished, and indeed to one that hath been very eminent in old time; and perhaps you may imagine that it is on their account only that I give you this advice: if that be all, kill them; say, take my own blood as a reward, if it may but procure your preservation; for I am ready to die, in case you will but return to a sound mind after my death."

CHAPTER X.

How a great many of the People earnestly endeavored to desert to the Romans: as also, what intolerable Things those that stayed behind suffered by Famine, and the bad Consequences thereof.

§ 1. As Josephus was speaking thus with a loud voice, the seditious would neither yield to what he said, nor did they deem it safe for them to alter their conduct; but as for the people, they had a great inclination to desert to the Romans; accordingly, some of them sold what they had, and even the most precious things that had been separated to them, in order to purchase meat, and swallowed down pieces of gold that they might not be found out by the robbers; and when they escaped to the Romans, went to stool, and had wherewithal to provide plentifully for themselves, and let alone the rest, and go away into the country whither they pleased. And the main reasons why they were so ready to desert were these, that now they should be freed from the miseries which were scattered in that city, and yet should not be slaves to the Romans: however, John and Simon, with their factions, did more carefully watch these

Josephus here tells them openly to their faces, that they are very remarkable instances of a Divine providence for the punishment of the Jewish nation, when they were grown very wicked, at both those times of the destruction of Jerusalem.
men's going out than they did the coming in of the Romans; and if any one did but afford the least shadow of suspicion of such an intention, his threats of cut immediately.

2. But as for the richer sort, it proved all one to them whether they staid in the city or attempted to get out of it; for they were equally destroyed in both cases; for every such person was perfect in its own kind, and was not a robber, for which reason they were not going to desert, but in reality that the robbers might get what they had. The madness of the seditious did also increase together with their famine, and both those miseries were every day increasing; for there was no town which any where appeared publicly, but the robbers came running into, and searched men's private houses; and then if they found any, they tormented them, bereaved them, and what they denied they had any, and if they found none, they tormented them worse, because they supposed they had more carefully concealed it. The indication they made use of whether they had any or not, was taken of all other wretches for which any food; if which they supposed they were no want at all of food, but if they were wasted away, they walked off without searching any farther: nor did they think it proper to search them, because they would very soon die of themselves for want of food. Many there were, indeed, who sold what they had for one measure; it was of wheat, if they were of the richer sort, but of barley, if of the poorer sort; for when they had so done, they shut themselves up in the innmost rooms of their houses, and ate the corn they had gotten; some did it without grudging it, by reason of the extremity of the want they were in, and others baked bread of it and ate it as commonly and as much as was dictated to them; a table was nowhere laid for a distinct meal, but they snatched the bread out of the fire half baked, and ate it very hastily.

3. It was now a miserable night; and a sight that I carried the tears into our eyes, how men stood as to their food, while the more powerful had more than enough, and the weaker were lamenting [for want of it.] But the famine was too hard for all other passions, and it is destructive to nothing so much as to modesty; for what was otherwise worthy of reverence was in this case despised; insomuch that children pulled the very morals that their fathers were eating out of their mouths; and was still more to be pitied, so did the mothers do as to their infants; and when those that were most dear were perishing under their hands, they were not ashamed to take from them the very last drops that stood, and they did these; to stop while their children ate after this manner, yet were they not concealed in so doing; but the seditious everywhere came upon them immediately, and snatched away from them what they had gotten from others; for when they saw any house shut up, this was a signal to them that the people within had gotten some food; whereupon they broke the doors, and ran in, and took pieces of what they were eating almost up out of their very mouths, and the children, their throats and was still more to be pitied, so did the mothers, and they were these, to stop while their children ate after this manner, yet were they not concealed in so doing; but the seditious everywhere came upon them immediately, and snatched away from them what they had gotten from others; for when they saw any house shut up, this was a signal to them that the people within had gotten some food; whereupon they broke the doors, and ran in, and took pieces of what they were eating almost up out of their very mouths, and the children, their throats

4. These were the afflictions which the lower sort of people suffered from these tyrants' guards; but for the men that were in dignity, and withal were rich, they were carried before the tyrants, and there were fitted out for them, by laying trencher plots, and so were destroyed; others of them were charged with designs of betraying the city to the Romans; but the readiest way of all this, to suborn somebody to do it, was to see to it that those who had so done the men of God, to give them back some part of what they had brought; though these would not give them the least crumb, and they were to be well contented that they were only spoiled, and not destroyed, and were not the name of what was so communicated to him, grieved at the loss, as at the loss of what was a valuable thing, that he had no share in such barbarity.

5. It is therefore impossible to go distinctly over every instance in the case of the miseries. I shall therefore speak my mind here at once briefly, that neither did any other city ever suffer such miseries, nor did any age ever breed a generation more fruitful in wickedness than this was, from the beginning of the world. I cannot enumerate what they had so done, and did not communicate what he had got by the miseries of others to the other tyrant, seemed to be too little guilty, and in one respect only; and he that did not communicate what he had got by the miseries of others to the other tyrant, seemed to be too little guilty, and in one respect only: and he who did not communicate what he so communicatet to him, grieved at the loss, as at the loss of what was a valuable thing, that he had no share in such barbarity.

CHAP. XI.

How the Jews were crucified before the Walls of the City, and the Morning Antichus Epiphanes; and how the Jews overthrew the Banks that had been raised by the Romans.

§ 1. Now Titus' banks were advanced a great way, notwithstanding his soldiers had been very much distressed from the wall. He then sent a party of horsemen, and ordered they should lay ambushes for those that went out into the valleys to gather food. Some of these were indeed seized on now and then, but they were often able to escape; and the rest, being cut off by the main body under their leaders, were killed. Thus came to pass what had been foretold by the oracles of the god Apollo.

3. In the meantime Antiochus Epiphanes came to the city, having with him a considerable number of other armed men, and a band called the Macedonian who were of the greatest age, tall, and just past their childhood, armed, and instructed after the Macedonian manner, whereas it was that they took that name. Yet were many of them unworthy of so famous a nation; for it had happened, that the king of Commagene had disposed more than any other kings that were under the power of the Romans, till a change happened in his condition; and when he was become an old man, he declared plainly, that we should not be able to make any application for mercy: they were first whipped, and then tormented with all sorts of tortures, before they died, and were then cruelly put to death. This and other similar procedure made Titus greatly to pity them, while they caught every day five hundred Jews; nay, some days they caught more; yet it did not appear to be safe for him to let those that were taken go free. So Titus, after he had numbered the dead, and given orders over so many he saw would be to make such as were not judged useless to him. The main reason why he did not forbid that cruelly was this, that he hoped the Jews might perhaps yield at that sight, out of fear of what they saw had happened; and afterwards be liable to the same cruel treatment. The soldiers, out of the wrath and hatred they bore the Jews, nailed those they caught, one after another, and another after another, to the crosses, by way of jest; when their multitude was so great, that room was wanting for the crosses, and crosses wanting for the bodies.

2. But so far were the seditions from repining. For the more they suffered, the more they resolved, the more they resisted; and the more they resisted the more they were despised. They perceived the multitude believed otherwise; for they brought the relations of those that had deserted upon the wall, with such of the populace as were eager to go over upon the authority of the man, and say, This was a misfortune to those who had fled to the Romans; and told them that those who were caught were suppliants to them, and not such as were taken prisoners. This sight kept many of those who were about to take sides. And what the truth was known; yet did some of them run away immediately as unto certain punishment, esteeming death from their enemies to be a quiet departure, if compared with that by famine. So that many of those that were supposed to be deserters were cut off, that they might not be thought deserters, and might be credited on account of the calamity they were under, and sent them in to John and Simon, without waiting for the checks of the general, as they were wont to do.

4. Now as they were thus as eager to raise their banks on the twelfth day of the month Artemisius, [Jyar.] so had they much ado to finish them by the twentieth day of the same month, after they had labored hard for seventeen days continuously. For the money that was raised, one of which was at the tower Antonia; this was raised by the fifth legion, over against the middle of that pool which was called Sirutha; another was cast up by the twelfth legion, at the distance of twenty cubits from the other. But the labors of the tenth legion, which lay a great way off these, was on the north quarter, and at the pool called Amygdalo; as was that of the fifteenth legion about thirty cubits from it, and at the high priest's monument. And now when the engines were brought, John had from within undermined the space that was over against the tower of Antonia, as far as the banks themselves, and had levelled a horizontal ground over the muses, with beams laid across one another, whereby the Roman works stood upon an uncertain foundation. Then did he order such materials to be brought in as were dashed over head with pitch and torches, and cast the fire upon them, and as the cross-beams that supported the banks were burning, the ditch yielded on the sudden, and the banks were shaken down and fell into the ditch with a prodigious noise. Now at the first there arose a very thick smoke and dust as the fire was choked with the fall of the bank; but as the suffocated materials were now gradually wanted room for the cressus, and cressa for the bodies of these Jews, since they had brought in judgment on themselves by the crucifixion of their Messiah.

*Reland very properly takes notice here, how justly his judgment came upon the Jews, when they were overthrown in such multitudes together, that the Romans strewed, they had no concern about it, and that the world itself was a better temple to God than this. That yet this temple would be preserved by him that inhabited therein, wouy they still lived and had for their seat in this war, and did therefwhich sudden appearance of the flame, a consternation fell upon the Romans, and the shriveling of the contrivance discouraged them; and indeed this accident coming upon them at a time when they thought they had already gained their point, cooled their hopes for the time being. They therefore thought it would be to no purpose to take the pains to extinguish the fire, since if it were extinguished the banks were swallowed up al-day [and become useless to them.]

3. To this alarm after the Senate and his party made an attempt to destroy the other banks; for the Romans had brought their engines to bear there, and began already to make the wall shake.
And here the ephebius of Garvia, a city of Galiaes, and Manuelus, one who was the son of a some of Queen Mariamne's servants, and with them one from Adiabene, he was the son of Napateus, and called by the name of Changiras, from the batayna border, the negro faithful, slave man, snatched some torches, and ran suddenly upon the engines. Nor were there during this war any men that ever sallied out of the city who were their superiors, either in their own bravery or in the terror they struck into their enemies. For they ran out upon the Romans, not as if they were enemies, but friends, without fear or delay; nor did they leave their enemies till they had rushed violently through the midst of their engines and destroyed them. And then they had darts thrown at them on every side, and were on every side assaulted with their engines' words, yet did they not withdraw themselves out doing the dangers they were in, till the fire had consumed the instruments of the Romans, but when the flame went up, the Romans came running from their camp to save their engines. Then did the Jews hinder their succors from the wall, and fought with those that endeavored to quench the fire, and in the terror they struck into their bodies were in. So the Romans pulled the engines out of the fire, while the hurdles that covered them were on fire; but the Jews caught hold of the batayna border, the negro faithful, slave man, and held them fast; although the iron upon them was become red hot; and now the fire spread itself from the engines to the banks, and prevented those that came to defend them; and all about the Romans were the engines round about with a flame, and despairing of saving their works from it, they retired to their camp. Then did the Jews become still more and more in number by the coming of those that were with them in the city to the assistance of and as they were very bold upon the good success they had,
their violent assaults were almost irresistible;
ay, they proceeded as far as the fortifications of the enemies' camp, and fought with their guards.
Now there stood in the army a body of soldiers in an army before that camp, which succeeded one another by turns in their armor; and as to those the law of the Romans was terrible, that he who left his post there, let the occasion be what it might be, there was to die for it; that body of soldiers, preferring rather to die in fighting cou-rageously, than as a punishment for their coward-dice, stood firm; and at the necessity these men were placed they did not go to the assistance of the others that had run away, out of shame turned back again;
and when they had set the engines against the wall, they kept the multitude from coming more of them out of the city [which they could the same manner defend] by means of the his visions for preserving or guarding their bodies this time; for the Jews fought now hand to hand with all that came in their way, and without any cautions fell against the points of their enemies' spars and attacked them bodies against bodies;
for they were now too hard for the Romans, not so much by their other warlike actions, as by these courageous assaults they made upon them; and the Romans gave way more to their boldness, than they did to the sense of the harm they had received from them.

6. And now Titus was come from the tower of Antonia, whether he was gone to look out for a place for raising other banks, and apprehended the soldiers greatly for permitting their own wall to be in danger, when they had taken the walls of their enemies, and sustained the fortune of men besieged, while the Jews were allowed to sally out against them, though they were already in a state of alarm for the enemy with some chosen troops, and fell upon their wall themselves; so the Jews who had been before assaulted in their faces, wheeled about to Titus and complained the fight. The armies there were now mixed one against another; and the dust that was raised so far hindered them from seeing one another, and the noise that was made so far hindered them from hearing one another.
that neither side could discern an enemy from a friend. However, the Jews did not sally, though not so much from their real strength, as from their despair of deliverance. The Romans who would not yield, by reason of the regard they had for the city, that was so well defended in which because Cæsar himself went into the danger before them; insomuch that I cannot but think the Romans would in the conclusion have now taken even the whole multitude of the Jews, so very soldiers they were and double our own wall to ed the upshot of the battle, and retired into the city. However, seeing the banks of the Romans were demolished, those Romans were very much cast down upon the loss of what had cost them so much and so long, and not by any means the hour's time.
And many indeed despaired of taking the city with their usual engines of war only.

CHAP. XII.

Titus thought fit to encompass the City round with a Wall; after which the Famine compassed the People by whole Houses and Families to-together.

§ 1. And now did Titus consult with his commanders what was to be done. Those that were of the warmest temper though he should bring the whole army against the city, and storm the the hour before that, were not very much by reason of its magnitude, and the Jews had the strength of, that was reserved for them. However, Titus did not think it fit so great an army to lie entirely idle, and that yet it was in many men with those that would be destroyed one by another; he also showed them how imperious it was to them to be in the possession of the city, and to guard the Jews coming out, still more impracticable; as also that to encompass the whole city round with its away, was not very easy, by reason of its magne-titude, and the great number of the Jews in the er accounts dangerous, upon the sallies the Jews might make out of the city.

For although they might guard the known passages out of the place, yet could they, when the Jews were under the greatest distress, contrive secret passages out, as being well acquainted with all such places; and if any provisions were carrie in by stealth, the siege would thereby be longer delayed. He also owned, that he was afraid that the length of time thus to be spent, would diminish the glory of his success; for though it be true that length of time will perfect every thing, yet that to do what we do in a little time is still necessary to the gaining reputation. That, therefore, his opinion was, that if they aimed at quickness joined with security, they must be on the round about the walls of the city which was in thought, the only way to prevent the Jews from coming out any way, and then they would either entirely despair of saving the city, and so would surrender of themselves, or they would be captured; for that if any one should think such a work to be too great, and not to be finished without much difficulty, he ought to consider that it is not fit for Romans to undertake any small work; and that but God himself could with ease accomplish any great thing whatsoever.

2. These arguments prevailed with the commanders. So Titus gave orders that the army should be distributed to their several shares of this work, the most avant post being given to him that diers a certain divine fury, so that they did not only part the whole wall that was to be built among them, nor did only one legion strive with another, but the lesser division of the army did the lesser research that should do so; but it was no sooner to please his decurion, each decurion his centurion, each centurion his tribune, and the ambition of the tribunes was to please their superiors, that the works many times every day, and took a view of what was done. Titus began the wall from the camp, which he had received for his own from the friends; and drew it down to the lower parts of Cenopoli: thence it went along the valley of Car- dron, to the Mount of Olives; it then went to wards the south, and encompassed the mountain as far as the rock called Canaan, and that other hill which lies next it, and is over the valley which reaches to Siloam; whence it bend to the west, and went down to the valley of the Fountain, beyond which it went up again at the Temple, and encompassed that mountain, and encompassing that mountain where Foupey had formerly pitched his camp, it returned back to the north side of the city, and was carried on as far as a certain village called the House of Enos. From thence it was carried to the foot of Titus's monument, and there on the east was joined to Titus's own camp, where it began. Now the length of this wall was forty furlongs, one only abated. Now on this wall without were treated thirteen places to keep garrisons in, whose cir- cumferences, put together, amounted to ten furlongs; the whole was completed in three days; so that what would naturally have required some men, in two days and a half, was done in one and a half, is in credit. When Titus had therefore encompassed the city with this wall, and put garrisons into proper places, he went round the wall at the first watch of the night, and observed how the guard was disposed, and whether the round about the guard and to Alexander: the commanders of legions took the third watch. They also cast lots among them selves who should be upon the watch in the night time, and who should go all night long round the spaces that were interspersed between the garrisons.

3. So all hope of escaping was now cut off from the Jews, together with their liberty of going out of the city. Then did the famines widens, the youngest wandered about the streets like shadows, all swelled with the famines, and fell down dead, wheresoever their misery seized them. As for burying them, those that were sick themselves were not able to do it, and those that were hearty and well were deterred from doing it by the great multitude of those dead bod i ees, and by the uncertainty there was how soon they should die themselves; for many died as they were itself about them, and others, seeing their collies before that fatal hour was come. Nor was there any lamentations made under these calamities, nor were heard any mournful complaints; but the famine conformed all natural passions; for those who were already looked upon those that were gave to their rest before them with dry eyes and open mouths. A deep silence also, and a kind of deadly night, did seize upon the city; while yet the robbers were still more a groan, and spreading out his hands selves; for they broke open those houses which were no other than graves of dead bodies, and plundered them of what they had, and carrying off the coverings of their bodies, went out laughing, and tried to extort their money out of them as dead bodies; and in order to prove what metal they were made of, they thrust some of those through that still lay alive upon the ground; but for those that extorted them to lend them their right hand and foot so to those to whom they did not, they were too proud to grant their requests, and left them to be consumed by the famine. Now every one of these died with their eyes fixed upon the tabernacle, and the altar, and the Divine seat above them. Now the seditious at first gave orders that the dead should be buried out of the public treasury, as not enduring the stench of their dead bodies. But afterward, when they could not do that, that they had been sent down from the walls into the valleys beneath.

4. However, when Titus, in going his round along these valleys, saw them full of dead bodies, and the thick putrefaction running about them, he gave a great groan, and spreading out his hands to heaven, called God to witness that this was not his doing; and such was the sad case of the city itself. But the Romans were very joyful, since none of the seditious could now make nullies out of the city, and the monuments were, they diconstant, and the famine already touched them also. These Romans besides had great plenty of corn and other necessaries out of Syria, and out of the neighboring provinces; many of whom would neither have grant them the honor of showing the people what great quantities of provisions they had, and so make the enemy more sensible of their famines, by the great plenty, ever to satisfy, which they had themselves. However, when the seditious still showed no inclinations of yielding, Titus, out of his commi- nation of the people that remained, and out of his earnest desire of rescuing what was still left out of the city, he raised the banks again, although materials for them were hard to be come at; for all the trees that were about the city had been already cut down for the making of the former banks. Yet did the soldiers bring what they could, and filled them on the distance of shabby furlongs, and thereby raised banks in four parts, much greater than the former, though this was done only at the tower of Antonia. So Caesar went his rounds through the legions, and hastened on the works, and allowed the robbers that they were now in his hands. But these men, and these only, were incapable of repeating the wickedness they had been guilty of, and, separating their souls from their bodies, they did nothing. If they killed themselves before to other folks, and not to themselves. For no gentle affection could touch their souls, nor could any pain affect their bodies, since they could still bear the dead bodies of the people as dogs do, and fill the prisons with those that were sick.

CHAP. XIII.
The great Slaughters and Sacrifices that were in Jerusalem.

1. ACCORDINGLY Simon would not suffer Matthew, by whose means he got possession of the city, to go off without torment. This Matthew, with his brother Matthias, were some of the high priests, one that had been very faithful to the people, and in great esteem with them; he, when the multitude were distressed by the zealots, among whom Simon was numbered, persuaded the people to admit this Simon to come in to assist them, while he had made no terms with him, nor expected any thing that was evil from him. But when Simon was come in, and had gotten the best of the nation, and driven the other priests into one corner, and had advised them to admit him as his enemy equally with the rest, as looking upon that advice as a piece of his simplicity only: so he had him then brought before him, and condemned to die for his pains. The rest of the Romans, without giving him leave to make his defence. He condemned also his three sons to die with him; for as to the fourth he prevented him by running away to Titus before. And when he begged for this, that he might be alone before his sons, so that as a favor, on account that he had procured the gates of the city to be opened to him, he gave order that he should be slain the last of them all: so he was not slain till he had seen his sons slain before him, and found that by his advice would be the worse without him. Simon made a charge had Simon given to Ananus, the son of Ansanus, who was the most barbarous of all his guards. He is also accused of him, and hindered him that he might now see whether those to whom he intended to go over, would send him any succours or not; but still he forbade their dead bodies should be buried. After the slaughter of these, a certain priest, Abner, the son of Measumass, a person of eminence, as also Aristus, the scribe of the sanhedrin, and born at Emasmus, and with them fifteen men of figure among the people, were slain. They also kept Josephus’s father in prison, and they made public proclamations, that no citizen whosoever should either speak to himself, or go into his company among others, for fear he should betray them. They also slew such as joined in lamenting these men, without any further information.

2. Now when Judas, the son of Judas, who was one of Simon’s under officers, and a person instigated by him to keep one of the towers, saw this procedure of Simon, he called together ten of those named, that were most faithful to him, (perhaps this was done partly out of pity to those that had so barbarously been put to death, but principally, in order to provide for his own safety,) to the following effect: How long shall we bear these miseries? or what hopes have we of deliverance by thus continuing faithful to such wicked wretches? Is not the famine already come against us? Are not the Romans in a manner got within the city? is not Simon become unsafe to his benefactors? and is there not reason to fear he will very soon bring us to the like punishment, while the security the Romans offer us is sure? Come on, let us surrender the city, and save ourselves and. So they sent a certain person who was caught gathering pieces of gold out of the excrements of the Jews’ bibles; for the deserters used to swallow such pieces of gold, as we told you before, when they were hungry, and so did not care for to part with them all; for there was a great quantity of gold in the city; insomuch that as much was now sold [in the Roman camp] for twelve Attic [drachmas] as was sold before for twenty-five. But when this contrivance was discovered in one instance, the fame of it filled their several camps, that the deserters came to them for gold. So the multitude of the Arabians, with the Syrians, cut up those that came as suppliants, and searched their bellies. Nor does it seem to me, that any misery befell the Jews, that was more terrible than this, since in one night's time about two thousand of these deserters were thus dissected.

5. When Titus came to the knowledge of this wicked practice, he had like to have surrounded those that had been guilty of it with his horse, and have shot them down and killed them, had not their number been so very great, and those that were liable to this punishment would have been manifold more than whom they had slain. However, he called together the commissaries of the Roman legions, (for some of his own soldiers had been also guilty herein, as he had been informed,) and had great indignation against both sorts of them: * What! have any of the uncertain hope of gain, without regarding their own weapons, which are made of silver and gold? Moreover, do the Arabians and Syrians now first of all begin to govern themselves as free men? and are they not in a foreign war, and then, out of their barbarity in murdering men, and out of their hatred to the Jews, get it ascribed to the Romans?* — for this infamous practice was said to be spread among some of those eight hundred. This was a greater offense, that he would put such men to death, if any of them were discovered to be so insolent as to do so again; moreover, he gave it in charge to the legions, that they should make a search after such, and that all should be punished. And therefore, which was forbidden by Cæsar under such a threatening, was ventured upon privately against the deserters, and these barbarians would go out still, and meet those that ran away before any saw them, and looking about them to see if no Romans spied them, they dissected them, and pulled this polluted money out of their bowels; which money was still found in a few of them, while yet a great many were destroyed by the babe of his own, and so losing them, they then, which miserable treatment made many that were deserting to return back again into the city.

6. But as for John, when he could no longer plunder the people, he betook himself to sacri- fice, and melted down many of the sacred sites, which had been given to the temple, as also many of those vessels which were necessary for such as ministered about holy things, the caldrons, the dishes, and the tables; nay, he did so in such abundance, and to nullify what he sent them by Augustus and his wife; for the Ro- man emperors did ever both honor and adorn this temple; whereas this man, who was a Jew, seated upon what were the donations of foreigners, and said to those that were with him, that it was proper for them to use divining things while they were fighting for the Divinity, without fear, and that such whose warfare is for the temple should live of the temple; on which account he emptied the vessels of that sacred wine and oil, which the priests kept to be poured on the burnt offerings, and which lay in the inner court of the temple, and distributed it among the multitude, who, in their anointing themselves, and drinking, used [each of them] above a hin of them. And here I cannot but speak of what I am under dictates to me, and it is this: I suppose, that had the Romans made any longer delay in coming against these willians, that the city would either have been swallowed up by the ground opening upon them, or been overflowed by water, or else been de- stroyed by such thunder as the country of Sodom perished by,* for it had brought forth a genera- tion of men more numerous than the Jews, by those that suffered such punishments; for by their madness it was that all the people came to be destroyed.

7. And, indeed, why do I relate these particu- lar calamities? while Mammee, the son of Laz- rus, came running to Titus at this very time, and told him, that there had been carried out through that one gate, which was intrusted to his care, no fewer than a hundred and fifteen thousand dead bodies. And the city was thereby -greatly desolated by the number of the dead, that were cast out, and that no fewer than six hundred thou- sand were thrown out at the gates; though still the number of the rest could not be discovered; and they told him farther, that when they were no longer able to carry out the dead bodies of the poor, they laid their corpses on heaps in very large houses, and shut them up therein; as also, that a middress of wheat was sold for a talent, and that when, a while afterward, it was not possible to give burial to the dead by reason of the dead, they were all walled about, some persons were driven to that terrible distress as to search the common sewers and old dunghills of cattle, and to eat the dung which they got there; and what they of old could not endure so much as to see, they now used for food. When the Romans barely heard all this, they commiserated their case; while the seditions, who saw it also, did not repent, but suffered the same distresses to come upon them- selves; for they were blinded by that fate which was already coming upon the city, and upon themselves also.

*Josephus, both here and before, B. iv. ch. viii. sect. 4, states the land of Sodom not as part of the late Asphaltites, or under its waters, but near it only, as Titus also took the same notion from him, Hist. v. vl. 7, which the great Roland take to be the very truth, both in his note on this place, and in his Palestine, tom. I. p. 325—326; though I rather suppose part of that region of Pentapolis to be now under the waters of the south part of that sea, but perhaps not the whole country.
CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF ABOUT ONE MONTH.—FROM THE GREAT EXTREMITY TO
not give way to any of those dangers that came upon them from above, and so they brought their engines to bear. But then, as they were beneath the other, and were sadly wounded by the stones thrown down upon them, some of them threw their shields over their heads, and others covered themselves with their hands, and partly with their bodies, and partly with crows, they undermined its foundations, and with great pains they removed four of its stones. Then night came upon both sides, and neither of those who were within knew how to come out to those who were without; however, that night the wall was so shaken by the battering rams in that place where John had used his stratagem before, and had undermined their banks, that the ground gave way, and they fell down into the sea.

4. Where this accident had unexpectedly happened, the minds of both parties were variously affected; for though one would expect that the Jews would be discouraged, because this fall of stones, wall then appeared, as they had made no provision in that case, yet did they not pull up their courage, because the tower of Antonia itself was still standing; as was the unexpected joy of the Romans at this fall of the wall some days before the time they were there through the power of the former wall that they were now thrown down. This new wall appeared also to be much weaker than the tower of Antonia, and accordingly the Romans imagined that it had been erected so much the more hastily, that they should soon overthrust it; yet did not any body venture now to go up to this wall; for such as first ventured so to do must certainly be killed. 5. And now Titus, upon consideration that the above account is true, and upon the support of his hopes and by good words, and that exhortations and promises do frequently make men to forget the hazards they run, nay, sometimes to despise death itself, got together the most courageous part of his army, and set upon work, and the men that were part of his men by these methods. "O fellow-soldiers, (said he) to make an exhortation to men to do what hath no peril in it, is on that very, account inglorious to such to whom that exhortation is made; for it is vain in that case to say that an exhortation as an argument of his own cowardice also. I therefore think, that such exhortations ought then only to be made use of, when affairs are in a dangerous condition, and yet are worthy of that; for not to exhort at all: accordingly, I am fully of the same opinion with you, that it is a difficult task to go up this wall; but that it is proper for those that desire reputation for their valor to struggle with difficulties in such cases. And therefore let me show, that it is a brave thing to die with glory, and that the courage here necessary shall not go unawarded in those that first begin the attempt. And last of all, first argument to move you, it be taken from what probably some would think reasonable to dissuade you, I mean the constancy and patience of these Jews, even under their ill successes; for it is unbecoming you, who are Romans and inhabitants of this city, which God has taught how to make wars, and who have also been used to conquer in those wars, to be inferior to Jews either in action of the hand, or in courage of the soul, and this especially when you are at the conclusion of your victory, and are assisted by God himself; for as to our misfortunes, they have been owing to the madness of the Jews, while their sufferings have been owing to your valor, and to the assistance God hath afforded you; for as to the seditions they have been in, and the famines they are under, and the siege they have endured, and the fall. Where we with out our engines, what can they all be but demonstrations of God's anger against them, and of his assistance afforded us! It will not therefore be proper for you either to show yourselves inferior to those to whom you are equal, or to betray that divine assistance, which is afforded you. And indeed, how can it be esteemed otherwise than as a base and unworthy thing, that while the Jews, who need not be much ashamed of they be deserted, we are deserted, in order to be slaves to others, do yet despise death, that they may be so no longer; and do make sallies into the very midst of us frequently, not in hopes of conquering us, but merely for a demonstration of their valor, or rather, we have gotten possession of almost all the world that belongs either to land or sea, to whom it will be a great shame if we do not conquer them, do not once undertake any attempt against our enemies, wherein there is much danger; but sit still and idle, with our arms as we have, and only wait till the famine and fortune do our business themselves, and this when we have it in our power, with some small hazard, to go to all that are at the mercy to go up to this tower of Antonia, we gain the city; for if there should be any more occasion for fighting against those within the city, which I do not suppose there will, since we shall then be upon the top of the wall and shall have a nearer approach to them before they can have taken breath; these advances promise as no less than a certain and sudden victory. As for myself, I shall at present waive any commendation of those who die in every way, and only wish to speak of our men, and those men who are slain in the midst of their martial bravery; yet cannot I forbear to imprecate upon those who are of a contrary disposition, that they may die in time of peace by some distempers or other; since, their souls are condemned to the grave, together with their bodies. For what man of virtue is there who does not know that those souls which are severed from their defensible bodies in battles by the sword, are receiving the most honorable thanks, and are joined to that company which are placed among the stars; that they become good demons and propitious heroes, and show themselves as such to their posterity afterward? While upon those souls that are so injured in and with their defensible bodies, comes a subterranean night to dissolve them to nothing, and a deep oblivion to take away all the remembrance of them, and this, notwithstanding they be clean from all petitions and entreaties of this world; so that in this case, the soul at the same time comes to the utmost bounds of life, and of its body, and of its memoir also. But since fate hath determined that death is to come to necessity upon all men, a sword is a better instrument for that purpose than any disease whatsoever. Why is it not then a very mean thing for us not to yield up that to the public benefit, which we must yield up to fate? And this discourse being made upon the supposition that those who at first attempt to go upon this wall must needs be killed in the attempt, though still men of true courage have a chance to escape even in the most hazardous undertakings. For, in the first place that part of theasser wall that is thrown down is easy to be as-

*Balund notes here, very pertinently, that the tower of Antonia stood higher than the floor of the temple, or court adjacent to it, and that the center of Antimaim was consecrated to a temple, as Josephus elsewhere speaks also. See B. vi. ch. ii. sect. 5.

71 In this speech of Titus we may clearly see the notions which the Romans then had of death, and of the happy state of those who died bravely in war, and the contrary estate of those who died ignobly in their beds by sickness. Balund here also produces two parallel passages, the one of which is from the account of Amos October, and the other from the 31, that "they judged that man happy who laid down his life in battle." The other of Valerius Maximus, lib. a. c. 6, who says, the Civini and Colibri excelled for joy in the army, as being to go out of the world glorious and happily." fear of the like treatment. This trick of theirs succeeded now for a while, as did the like trick before; for the rest were hereby deterred, by fear of the like treatment.

3. However, when Titus had recalled these men from Gophna, he gave orders that they should go round the wall, together with Josephus, and show themselves to the people; upon which they agreed to do this: and so they made themselves known, and also got in a great number together, and stood before the Romans, and besought the seditionists, with groans and tears in their eyes, in the first place to receive the Romans entirely into the city; and to put an end to all slavery, as in such a case cannot be, and if they again; but that, if they would not agree to such a proposal, they would at least depart out of the temple, and save the holy house for their own; for that the Romans would not rest to let this acrry be on fire, but wished that the pressing necessity. Yet did the seditionists still more and more contradict them; and while they cast loud and bitter reproaches upon these deserters, they also took pleasure in throwing of darts and javelins, and stones, upon the sacred gates of the temple, at due distances from one another, insomuch, that all the space round about within the temple, might be compared to a bury ground. It pleased God to spare the bodies therein; as might the holy house itself be compared to a citadel. Accordingly, these men rushed upon these holy places in their armor that were otherwise unsupportable, and that gave no money to the Romans, the heat of their own people which they had sved: nay, they proceeded to such great transgressions, that the very same indignation which Jews would naturally have against Romans, had they been natives of these parts, might again have been directed against them, the Romans had now against Jews, for their impertinency in regard to their own religious customs. Nay, indeed, there were none of the Roman soldiers, who did not look with a sacred horror upon the temple, and cried out against its violation; and wished that the robbers would repeat before their miseries became incurable.

4. Now Titus was deeply affected with the sight of things, and reproaches John and his party, and reproaches them, "Have you no wits, you wretches that you are, by our permission put up this partition wall before your sanctuary? Have not you been allowed to put up the pillars thereunto, and of the same distances from one another? Do you write in Greek, and in your own letters, the prohibition, That no foreigner should go beyond that wall? Have we not given you leave to k[h] such as go beyond it, though he were a Roman? Just what do you do, you pusillanimous men? Why do you trample upon dead bodies in the temple? and why do you pollute this holy house with the blood of both foreigners and Jews themselves? I appeal to the gods of my own country, and to the god that ever had any regard to this place, (for I do not suppose it to be now regard ed by any of them;) I also appeal to my own army, and to those Jews that are now with me, and even to you yourselves, that I do not force the Jews to depart out of the city, so that they cheerfully retired to that small city which was allotted them, without fear of any danger. But as they did not appear, the seditionists appeared again, that those deserters were slain by the Romans, which was done in order to deter the rest from running away, by contended with each other who should fight the most strenuously, both single men and entire regiments, as being under the eye of Titus; and every one concluded that this day would bring on his promotion, if he fought bravely. What were the great encouragements of the Jews to act vigorously, were their fear for themselves and for the temple, and the presence of their tyrant, who exhorted them to do their utmost, and to the others, to act courageously. Now, it so happened that this fight was for the most part a stationary one, whereas the soldiers went on and can a bank in a short time, and only; for there was no large space of ground for horse or pursuits. But still there was a tumultuous noise among the Romans from the tower of Antonia, who loudly cried out upon all occasions to their own men, as well as to others, when they were too hard for the Jews, and then stay, when they were retiring backward; so that here was a kind of theatre of war; for what was done in this fight could not be concealed either from Titus or from the Jews; and so it appeared that which began at the ninth hour of the night, was not over till past the fifth hour of the day, and that in the same place where the battle began neither party could say they had the other in their power, for the armies left the victory almost in uncertainty between them; wherein those that signalled themselves on the Roman side were a great many, but on the Jewish side, and of those that were with Simon and Judas Maccabaeus, and Simon the son of Josias; of the Idumeans, James and Simon, the latter of whom was the son of Cathias, and James was the son of Sossas; of those that were with John, Gypheus and Alexas, and of the sepoys of the half-pay; and of the other two, one was at the western cloister of the outer court of the temple, the other against its northern cloister. However, these works were thus advanced by the Romans, and without great pains and did it not, particularly by being obliged to bring their materials from the distance of a hundred furlongs. They had further difficulties also upon them, sometimes by their over-great security they were in that they not only let the Jewish soldiers lay for them, and by that boldness of the Jews which their despair of escaping had inspired them within; for some of their horsemen, when they went out to gather wood or hay, let their horses feed, without having their bridles on, during the time of foraging; upon which horses the Jews sailed out in whole bodies, and seized them. And when this was continually done, and Caesar believed what the truth was, that the horses were stolen more easily from the men of his own men than by the valor of the Jews, he determined to use greater severity to oblige the rest to take care of their horses; so he came one day and made the order, that every horse should be capital punished; whereby he so terrified the rest, that they preserved their horses for the time to come; for they did not any longer let them go from them to feed by themselves; but, as if they had grown to them, they went always along with them when they wanted necessities. Thus did the Romans still continue to make war against the temple, and to raise their banks against it.

23. And I shall always say, that wherever he speaks so, that it is most evident he was fully satisfied that God was on the Romans' side, and made use of them for the destruction of that wicked nation of the Jews; which was, for certain, the true state of this matter, as the prophet Daniel first, and our Saviour himself afterwards declared and foretold, see Luke x. 17, &c. See also Jer. xxxi. 33-36. And here I shall add, that the symbol of the cow, as was already said, is here used by Josephus, and in the place before us.

2. Now, after one day had been interposed...

Some of them also reasoned thus, and that justly enough, that it was not fit to fight with a man that they knew to be in the manner of a one given up to despair of deliverance had, besides other passions, a violence in attacking men that could not be opposed, and had no regard to God himself, and that to hazard one’s self with a person, who, being left with no one to assist, besides the great number of reproaches as cowards, (for he was a very haughty man in himself, and a great desiper of the Romans,) one whose name was Pudens, of the body of horsemen, out of his abomination to the other’s words, and of his impudence withal, and perhaps out of an incon siderable arrogance, on account of the other’s lowness of stature, ran out to him, and was too hard for him in other respects, but was betrayed by his fortune; for he fell down, and as he was down, Jonathan came running to him, and cut his throat, and then standing upon his dead body, he brandished his sword, bloody as it was, and shook it at the multitude of men who stood by, on the right hand, and made many acclamations to the Romans, and insulted over the dead man, and jezted upon the Romans; till at length one Priscus, a centurion, shot a dart at him, as he was leaping and playing the victor, and so killed him. This way naturally vengeance may come upon men that have success in war, without any just deserving the same.

CHAPTER III.
Concerning a Stratagem that was devised by the Jews, by which they hurst many of the Romans with another Description of the terrible Flames that was in the City.

§ 1. But now the seditions that were in the temple did every day openly endeavor to best off the soldiers that were upon the banks, and on the twenty-seventh day of the forenamed month [Tammuz] they discovered this stratagem as this; they filled that part of the western cloister which was between the beams, and the roof under them, with dry materials, as also with bitumens and pitch, and then retired from that place. But when the soldiers that had taken; at which procedure of theirs, many of the most inconsiderable among the Romans, who were carried away with violent passions, followed hard after them as they were retiring, and applied ladders to the cloister, and got up to it suddenly; but the more prudent part of them, when they understood this unaccountable retreat of the Jews, stood still where they were before. However, the cloister was full of soldiers, and they had climbed up the ladders at which time the Jews set it all on fire; and as the flames burst out every where on the sudden, the Romans that were out of the danger were seized with a great consternation, as were those that were in the midst of the danger in the utmost distress. So when they perceived themselves surrounded with the flames, some of them threw themselves down backwards into the city, and some up into their temple, as did many leap down to their own men, and broke their limbs to pieces; but a great number of those that were going to take these violent methods, were prevented by the fire; though some prevented the fire by their own accord. However, the fire was on the sudden carried so far as to surround those who would have otherwise * parished. As for Caesars himself, he could not, however, but commiserate those that thus perished, although they got up thither without any order for so doing, since there was no way of giving them any relief. Yet was this some comfort to those that were destroyed, that every building of those houses like the walls of Jerusalem, and as the slaves came to their ends; for he cried out openly to them, and leaped up, and exhorted those that were about him to do their utmost to relieve them. So every one of them died cheerfully, as courageously also they met death and this intention of Caesars as a sepulchral monument. Some there were indeed who retired into the wall of the cloister, which was broad, and were preserved out of the fire, but were themselves strangled in the jam. And there were some that made resistance against the Jews for a long time, yet were they wounded by them, and at length they all fell down dead.

3. At the last, a young man among them, whose name was Lasos, was at first while decoration to this sad affair; and while every one of them that perished were worthy of a memorial, this man appeared to deserve it beyond all the rest. Now the Jews admired this man for his courage, and as it were because of his dignity, so they persuaded him to come down to them, upon security given him for his life. But Cornelius his brother persuaded him, on the contrary, not to tarnish their own glory, nor that of their master. He therefore came with advice and, lifting up his sword before both armies, he slew himself. Yet there was one Artorius among those surrounded with the fire, who escaped by his subtility; for when he had with a loud voice called out one of his fellow-soldiers that lay with him in the same tent, and said to him, "I do leave thee heir of all I have, if thou wilt come and receive me." Upon this he came running to receive his master. and there thrusting himself down upon him, and saved his own life, while he that received him was dashed so vehemently against the stone pavement by the other's weight, that he died immediately. This was the only one that escaped, and the Romans sit for a while, but still it made them more upon their guard for the future, and was of advantage to them against the delusions of the Jews, by which they were greatly damaged through their numbers, and because of the nature of the inhabitants. Now this cloister was burnt down as far as John's tower, which was built in the war he made against Simon, over the gates that led to the Xystus. The Jews also cut off the rest of the outer wall, and that it was not only the temple, but also that had destroyed those that got up to it. But the next day the Romans burst down the northern cloister entirely as far as the east cloister, whose common angle joined to the valley that was called Cædon, and was built over it; and hence it accounted the depth was frightful. And this was the state of the temple at that time.

4. Now, of those that perished by famine in the city, the number was prodigious; and the miseries among the Jews in this war, is such that for so much as the shadow of any kind of food did any where appear, a war was commenced presently, and the dearest friends fell in fighting one wit's another about it, snatching from each other the most miserable supports of life. Nor would men believe that those who were dying had no food, but the robbers would search them; when they were expiring, lest any one should have concealed food in their bosoms, and counterfeited dying; nay, these robbers gaped for want, and ran about stumbling and staggering along like mad dogs, and realizing against the doors of the houses like sheep, and in the street, as if the great distress they were in, rush into the very same houses two or three times in one and the same day. Moreover, their hunger was so intolerable, that it obliged them to chew every thing, while they would not touch such of the dogs that most sordid animals would not touch, and endured to eat them; nor did they at length abstain from girdles and shoes, and the very leather belonging to their shields they pulled and answered: the very rags and old things became a delicacy to some, and some gathered up fibres, and sold a very small weight of them for four Attic drahmes. But why do I describe the shameless invidence that the famine brought on men in their eating inanimate things while unable to relate a matter of the fact, the like to which no history relates, either among the Greeks or Barbarians. It is horrible to speak of it, and incredible when heard. I had indeed willingly omitted this calamity of our own, that I might not be the first to deliver what is so portentous to posterity, but that I have innumerable witnesses to it in my own age; and besides, my country would have had little reason to thank me for suppressing the miseries that she suffered at this last siege.

4. There was a certain woman that dwelt beyond Jordan; her name was Mary, her father was Eleazar, of the village of Bethzeboath, which signifies, the house of Hysam. She was eminent for her family and her wealth, and had fled away to Jerusalem with the rest of the multitude, and was with them besieged therein at this time. The other effects of this woman had been already seized upon, except her jewel brought with her out of Persia, and removed to the city. What she had treasured up besides, as also what food she had contrived to save, had been also carried off by the rapacious guards. But she came away from the city and her houses to that purpose. This set the poor woman into a very great passion, and by the frequent reproaches and imprecations she cast at these rapacious villains, she had provoked them to anger against her, but not taking her part; for the nation she had raised against herself, or out of comminution of her case, would take away her life: and if she found any food, she perceived her labors were for others, and not for herself, and that it was more becoming the temple in a way to find any more food, while the famine pierced through her very bowels and marrow, when also her passion was fired to a degree beyond the famine itself; nor did she consult with any thing but with her passion and the necessity she was in. She then attempted a most unnatural thing, and, snatching up her son, who was a child sucking at her breast, she said, "O thou miserable infant! for whom shall I preserve thee from the Romans, so that they are at war with the Romans, if they preserve our lives, we must be slaves. This famine also will destroy us even before that slavery comes upon us. Yet are these seditions rogue more terrible than both the other. Come let thy mouth, and be thou a fury to these seditical varlets, and way to avoid death themselves but by killing and eating others. Whether such examples come up to the present case may be doubted. The Romans were not only willing but very desirous of the Jews. I mean of their lives and their liberties, and to save both their city and their temple. But the usurers, the robbers, and the seditions, would beheard to no terms of submission. They would not voluntarily change their circumstances, but by force of their numbers actually seized the city and temple, as to force mothers to this unnatural barbarity, which in all its circumstances has not, I still suppose, been hitherto paralleled among the rest of mankind."
BOOK VI.—CHAP. IV.

was the six principal persons, Tiberius Alexander, the commander [under the general] of the western army, Scevola, the commander of the fifth legion, and Marcus Fulvius, the commander of the tenth legion, and Titus Flavius, the commander of the fifteenth legion, and Marcus Antonius Julianus, procurator of Judaea; after these came together also the rest of the procurators and tribunes. Titus proposed to these, that, as the Maccabees first had done, what should be done about the holy house. Now some of these thought, "it would be the best way to act according to the rules of war, and demolish it," because the Jews would never leave off rebelling while they stood on a high wall, which was the house that they used to get all together." Others of them were of opinion, that "in case the Jews would leave it, and none of them would lay up their arms in it, he might save it; but that in a. Now it upon it, and fought any more, he might burn it; because it must then be looked upon not as a holy house, but as a citadel, and that the impetue of burning it would then belong to those that forced this to be done, and not to us. And, in truth, it is said, that Titus should get upon that holy house, and fight us there, yet ought we not to revenge ourselves on things that are inanimate, instead of the men themselves;"—a, and that he was not in any case for laying out so many of his soldiers, for which this would be a mischief to the Romans themselves, as it would be an ornament to their government while it continued." So Scevola, and Alexander, and Cerealis, now bold upon that day to declare, and agreed to the opinion of Titus. Then was this assembly dissolved, when Titus had given orders to the commanders that the rest of their forces should lie still, but that they should act as fast as the situation was accus in this attack. So he commanded that the chosen men that were taken out of the cohorts should make their way through the ruins and quench the fire.

But it is true, that on this day the Jews were so weary, and under such consternation, that they refrained from any attacks. But on the next day they gathered their whole force together, and ran upon those that guarded the entrance of the temple, and then ran towards the east gate, and this about the second hour of the day. These guards received that their attack with great bravery, and by covering themselves with their shields before, as it were with a wall, they smote these with the utmost rage, yet it was evident that they could not abide there very long, but would be overborne by the multitude of those that salled out upon them, and by the heat of their passion. However, Casar seeing from the tower of Antonia, it was likely to give way, he sent some chosen horsemen to support them. Hereupon the Jews found themselves no longer able to sustain their onset, and the heat of the sun and the force from many of the rest were put to flight. But as the Romans were going off, the Jews turned back upon them, and fought them; and as those Romans came back upon them, they retreated again, but the heat of the sun and the force of the multitude, they were weak and without arms, and had their throats cut wherever they were caught. Now, round about the altar lay dead bodies heaped upon one another, as at the steps going up to the temple. It was a sight to behold a view of the dead bodies that were slain above [the altar] fell down.

5. So Titus retired into the tower of Antonia, and resolved to storm the temple the next day, eager to get the opportunity to attack it. But as he took upon him to encamp round about the holy house. But as for that house, God had, for certain, long ago doomed it to the fire; and now that fatal day was a byword to the world, which is all that is now wanting to complete the calamities of us Jews." As soon as she had said this, she slew her son, and then roasted him, and ate the one half of him, and kept the other half concealed. Upon this the seditions came in presently, and smelling the horrid scent of this food, they threatened her, that they would cut her throat immediately if she did not show them what food she had prepared. She replied, that "she had saved a very fine portion of it for them;" and withal uncovered what was left of her son. Hereupon they wrested with a horror and trembling of minds, and stood astonished at the sight, when she said to them, "This is mine own son, and what hath done been mine own doing. Come, eat of this food; for I have eaten of it myself. Do not you pretend to be either and others than I am woman, or more compassionate than a mother; but if you be so scrupulous, and do contaminate this my sacrifice, as I have eaten the one half, let the rest be preserved for me also." After which those men went out trembling, not so much afraid of any thing as they were at this, and with some difficulty they left the rest of that meat to the mother. Upon which the whole city was full of this horrid action immediately; and while every body laid this against the Jews before they were shut up and subdued, as if this unheard of action had been done by themselves. So those that were thus distressed by the famine were very desirous to die, and those already dead were esteemed happy, and had lived long enough either to hear or to see such miseries.

5. This sad instance was quickly told to the Romans, some of whom could not believe it, and others pitied the distress which the Jews were under. There were many who were hereby induced to a more bitter hatred than ordinary against our nation. But for Caesar, he excused himself before God as to this matter, and said, that "he had proposed peace and liberty to the Jews, as well as an oblation of all their former insolent practices; but that they, instead of concord, had chosen sedition; instead of peace, war; and before satiety and abundance, a famine." That they had begun with their own hands to destroy that which was their preservation hitherto; and that therefore they deserved to eat such food as this was. That, however, this horrid action of eating an own child ought to be charged with the overthrow of their very country itself, and that it was only such a city upon the habitable earth, to be seen by the sun, wherein mothers are thus fed, although such food be fitter for the fathers than for the children; that the dread of this misery might continue still in a state of war against us, after they had undergone such miseries as these." And at the same time that he said this, he reflected on the desperate condition these men must be in, and told he expected, that such men could be recovered to sobriety of mind, after they had endured those very sufferings, for the avoiding whereof it only was probable they might have recourse.

CHAP. VII. When the Banks were completed, and the Batterings-Rams brought and could do nothing, Titus gave order to set fire to the gates of the Temple; in no long Time after which the holy House itself was burnt down, even against his Consent.

1: And now two of the legions had completed their banks on the eighth day of the siege, and Titus gave order that the battering-rams should be brought, and set over against the western edifice of the inner temple; for, before these were brought, the threat of all the other engines had battered it as well for six days together without ceasing, without making any impression upon it; but the vast largeness and strong connection of the stones was superior to that engine and to the other battering-rams also. Other Jews, indeed, indeed, indeed, audaces, the fountains of the northern gate, and, after a work of pains, removed the outermost stones; yet was the gate still upheld by the inner stones, and stood still unshaken; but the battering-rams and burning of such engines by engines and men, brought their ladders to the cloisters. Now the Jews did not interrupt them in so doing; but when they were gotten up they fell upon them, and fought with them; somers were thrown down, and threw them backwards headlong; others of them they met and slew: they also best many of those that went down the ladders again, and slew them with their swords before they could bring their shields to protect them; and some of the legions brotherly threw down from above when they were full of armed men: a great slaughter was made of the Jews also at the same time, while those that bare the ensigns fought hard for them, as describing it a terrible thing, and what would tend to their great shame if they permitted them to be stolen away. Yet did the Jews at length get possession of these engines, and destroyed those that had gone up the ladder, while the rest were thrown down, and those who were left being slain that they retired, although some of the Romans died without having done good service before his death. Of the seditions those that had fought bravely in the former battles did the like now; and many of them did Eleasar's son of Simon the tyrant. But when Titus perceived that his endeavors to spare a foreign temple turned to the damage of his soldiers, and made them be killed, he gave order to set the great gate on fire.

2. In the mean time there assembled to him Ananus, who came from Emmaus, the most bloody of all Simon's guards, and Archelaus, the son of Maccabæus, they hoping to be still forgiven, because, as he said, the Jews were the conquerors. Titus objected this to these men, as a cunning trick of theirs; and as he had been informed of their other barbarities towards the Jews, he was going in all haste to have them both punished with death. This金银 drove to this desperation, because of the utmost distress they were in, and did not come away of their own good disposition; and that those did not deserve to be preserved, by whom their own city was burnt down, and they now hurried themselves away." However, the security he had promised deserters overcame his resentments, and he dismissed them accordingly, though he did not give them the same privileges they had afforded to others. And now the soldiers had already put fire to the gates, and the silver that was over them quickly carried the flames to the wood that was within it, whence it spread itself all on the sudden, and caught hold of the temple. Upon the Jews, and all about them, their spirits sunk together with their bodies, and they were under such astonishment, that not one of them made any haste either to defend himself or to quench the fire, but they stood as mute spectators of it only. However, they did not so grieve at the loss of what was now burning, as to grow wiser thereby for the time to come; but as though the holy house itself were not on fire, they produced their passions against the Romans. This fire prevailed during that day and the next also; for the soldiers were not able to burn all the cloisters that were round about together at one time. But then, on the next day, Titus commanded part of his army to quench the fire, and to make a road for the more easy marching up of the legions, while he himself gathered the commanders together. Of those there were seen.
of foreigners contained, and not inferior to what we ourselves boasted of, and believed about it. But as the flame had not as yet reached to its inward parts, but was still consuming the rooms that were about the holy house, and Titus supposed, therefore, that the whole house itself might not be saved, he came in haste, and endeavored to persuade the soldiers to quench the fire, and gave order to Libaurus the centurion, and one of those speersmen that were about him, to lead the soldiers that were nearest with them to their states, and to restrain them; yet were their passions too hard for the regards they had for Caesar, and the dread they had of him who forbade them, as was their hatred of the Jews, and a certain wish to take vengeance on the people that had thrown the fire of Jerusalem. When they saw the fire of the house, they exerted their utmost strength, and brake out into groans and outcries again; Perea did also return the echo, as well as the mountains round about the city, and augmented the force of the entire noise. Yet was it as if more terrible than this disorder: for one would have thought that the hill itself, on which the temple stood, was seething hot, as full of fire on one side as the other, and many a hundred times the larger quantity than the fire, and those that were slain more in number than those that slew them, for the ground did nowhere appear visible for the dead bodies that lay on it, but the soldiers went over a place where the bodies, as they were cast from them, so as fled from them. And now it was the multitude of the robbers were thrust out; of the inner court of the temple by the Romans, and had much ado to get into the outward court, and from there into the city; for the noblest part of the populace fled into the cloister of that outer court. As for the priests, some of them plucked up from the holy house the spicier that were upon it, with their bases, which were made of lead, and shot themselves, as they were said to have done, as they gained nothing by so doing, and as the fire burst out upon them, they retired to the wall that was eight cubits broad, and there they tarried; yet did two of those of eminence among them, who might have saved themselves by going over to the Romans, or have borne up with courage, and taken their fortune with others, throw themselves into the fire, and were burnt, together with the holy house; their names were Mairius the son of Belges, and Joseph the son of Dalea.

2. And now the Romans judging that it was in vain to spare what was round about the holy house, burnt it likewise, as also the remains of the cloisters and the gates, two exceptions being the one on the east side, and the other on the south; both which, however, they burnt afterward. They also burnt down the treasury chambers, in which was an immense quantity of money, and a great number of garments, and other precious goods there reposed; and to speak all in a few words, there it was that the entire riches of the Jews were heaped up together, while the rich people that were there built themselves houses that contain such furniture.) The soldiers also came to the rest of the cloisters that were in the outer court of the temple, whither the women and children, and a great mixed multitude of the people went, who were about six thousand in number, and nolens volens Caesar had determined any thing about these people, or given the commanders any orders relating to them, the soldiers were in such a rage that they set that cloister on fire; by which means it came to pass, that some slaves there were saved by throwing themselves down headlong, and that it is a wonder our commentators here take no notice of.

*This Perea, if the word be not mistaken in the copies, cannot be the Perea that was beyond Podarion, whose mountains were at a considerable distance from Jerusalem, and much too remote from Jerusalem to join this echo at the conflagration of the temple; but Perea was beyond Jordan, as was the mount of Olives, or some others, about such a distance from Jerusalem: which observation is so obvious, high, and the works at the temple were very great, one would have thought the whole city had been on fire. Nor can one imagine any thing either greater or more terrible than this noise; for there was at once a shout of the Roman legions, and of all those that were marching all together, and a sad clatter of the soldiers, who were now surrounded with fire and sword. The people also that were left above, were beaten back upon the enemy, and under a great consternation, and unable to make their escape, cast themselves down headlong; and the multitude also that was in the city joined in this outcry with those that were upon the hill. And besides, many of those that were worn away by the famine, and their mouths almost consumed by hunger, when they saw the fire of the temple, they exerted their utmost strength, and brake out into groans and outcries again; Perea did also return the echo, as well as the mountains round about the city, and augmented the force of the entire noise. Yet was it as if more terrible than this disorder: for one would have thought that the hill itself, on which the temple stood, was seething hot, as full of fire on one side as the other, and many a hundred times the larger quantity than the fire, and those that were slain more in number than those that slew them, for the ground did nowhere appear visible for the dead bodies that lay on it, but the soldiers went over a place where the bodies, as they were cast from them, so as fled from them. BOOK VI—CHAP. V

3. Thus were the miserable people persuaded by these deceivers, and such as beled God himself; while they did not attend nor give credit to the signs that were so evident, and did not plainly discover all their future destiny, but lived in an intexated, without either eyes to see or minds to consider, did not regard the desuncations that God made to them. Thus there was a start resembling a sword, which stood over the city, and as a sign by day, and also before the Jews' rebellions, and before those commotions which preceded the war, when the people were come in great crowds to the feast of Passover, being on the eighth day of the month Nisan (Nisca) [Nisbis] for the 30th of the night, so great a light shone round the altar and the holy house, that it appeared to be bright day time; which light lasted for half an hour. This was also a good sign to the unskillful, but was so interpreted by the un instructed scribes as to portend those events that followed immediately upon it. At the festival also a heifer, as she was led by the high priest to be sacrificed, brought forth a lamb in the midst of the temple. Moreover, the eastern gate of the inner [court of the temple] which was of brass, and vastly heavy, and had been with difficulty shut by twenty men, and rested upon a basis set up under it, but was now very easily deep into the first floor, which was there made of one entire stone, was seen to be opened of its own accord about the sixth hour of the night. Now those that kept watch in the temple came hither, and perceived the light, and told him of it, who then came up thither, and not without great difficulty was able to shut the gate again. This also appeared to the vulgar to be a very happy prodigy, as if God did thereby open them the gate of happiness. But the men of learning understood it, that the security of their holy house was dissolved of its own accord, and that the gate was opened for the advantage of their enemies. So those publicly declared, that the most feared thing that was coming upon them. Besides these, a few days after that feast, on the one and twentieth day of the month Arriatim [Yair], a certain prodigious and incredible phenomenon appeareed: I suppose the account of it would seem to be a fable were it not related by those that saw it, and were not the events that followed it of so considerable a nature as to deserve such signs; for, before unsetting, chariots and troops of soldiers in their armor were seen rousing about among the clouds, and surrounding of cities. Moreover, at that feast which we call Pentecost, as the priests were going by night into the inner court of the temple; as their custom was, to perform their sacred ministrations, there was a noise as of water running upon an earth that is quaking, and heard a great noise, and after that they heard a sound as of a multitude, saying, "Let us remove hence." But what is still more terrible, this noise was heard in a plateian and a husbandman, who, four years before the war began, and at a time when the city was in very great peace and prosperity, came to that feast whereas it is our custom for every one to make that which was done, the temple, began on a sudden to cry aloud, "A voice from the east, a voice from the west, a voice from the four winds, a voice against Jerusalem and the holy house, a voice against the princes of Judah, and a voice against the whole people." This was his cry, as he went about by day and by night, in all the lanes of the city. However, certain of the most eminent among the populace had great indignation at this dire woe, and it was not with that Wrath, which gave him a great number of severe stripes; yet did not he either say anything for himself, or any thing peculiar to those that chastised him, but still went on with the same words which he cried before. And as it proved in the case as the case proved to be, that this was a sort of divine fury in the man, brought him to the Roman procurator, where he was whipped till his back was bloody, and his bones were ground upon the stones by supplication for himself, nor shed any tears; but turning his voice to the most lamentable tone possible, at every stroke of the whip his answer was, "Wo, wo to Jerusalem. And when Albinus (for he was the our prince God asked him, "Who he was? and whence he came? and why be uttered such words?" he made no manner of reply to what he said, but still did not leave off his melancholy ditty, till Albinus took him up, and said, I have heard you say, during all the time that passed before the war began, this man did not go near any of the citizens, nor was seen by them while he said so; but he every day uttered these lamentable words, as if it were a premonition to Jerusalem. Nor did he give ill words to any of those that best him every day, nor good words to those that gave him food; but this was his reply to all men, and, indeed, no other than a melancholy, and as if in his own way a wailing of his heart, saying, that his cry of his was the loudest at the festivals; and he continued this ditty for seven years and five months, without growing hoarse, or being tired therewith, until the time that the king was in presence in our city, when it ceased; for as he was going round upon the wall, he cried out with his utmost force, "Wo wo to the city again, and to the people, and to the holy house. And just as he added at the last, "Wo, wo to my soul also," were cause u.

* Related here justly takes notice, that these Jews, who had despised the first Prophecy, were deservedly abused and disgraced by the enemies of God.

‡ Since Josephus still uses the Syro-Macedonian month Xeniarnis for the Jewish month Nisan, this 9th, or as Nicopeus reads it, this 9th of Xeniarnis or Nisan was almost a week before the Passover on the 14th: about which time the latter rabbits will not a little to the ancient prac-

of foreigners contained, and not inferior to what we ourselves boasted of, and believed about it. But as the flame had not as yet reached to its inward parts, but was still consuming the rooms that were about the holy house, and Titus supposing what the fact was, that the house itself might not be saved, he came in haste and encircled with force to persuade the soldiers to quench the fire, and gave order to Liberialus the centurion, and one of those spearmen that were about him, to beat the soldiers that were refractory with their respective lances, and to restrain them; yet were their passions too hard for the regards they had for Cæsar, and the dread they had of him who forbade them, as was their hatred of the Jews, and a certain vice in them to fight them, too hard for them also. Moreover, the hope of plunder induced many to go on, as having this opinion, that all the places within were full of money, and as seeing that all round about it was made of gold. And besides, one of those that went into the place prevented Cæsar, when he ran hastily out to restrain the soldiers, and threw the fire upon the hinges of the gate, in the dark; whereby the flame burst out from within the holy house itself into the city streets; and the common people did follow Cæsar with them, and when nobody any longer forbade those that were without to set fire to it. And thus was the holy house burnt down, without Cæsar’s approbation.

2. Now, by some it would justly lament the destruction of such a work as this was, since it was the most admirable of all the works that we have seen or heard of, both for its curious structure and its magnitude, and also for the vast wealth bestowed upon it, as well as for the great cost of its maintenance. Yet might such a one comfort himself with this thought, that it was fate that decreed it so to be, which is inevitable, both in the living creatures, and in the works of man and place also. However, one cannot but wonder at the accuracy of this period thereto relating; for the same month and day were now observed as I said before, wherein the holy house was burnt formerly by the Babylonians. Now the number of years that passed from its first foundation, which was laid by king Solomon, till this its destruction, which happened in the second year of the reign of Vespasian, are collected to be one thousand seven hundred and thirty, besides one hundred months and fifteen days; and from the second building of it, which was done by Haggai, in the second year of Cyrus the king, till its destruction under Vespasian, there were six hundred thirty-nine years, and forty-five days.

CHA. V.

The great Distress the Jews were in upon the confusion of the holy House. Concerning a false Prophet, and the Signs that preceded this Destruction.

1. While the house was on fire, every thing was plundered that came to hand, and ten thousand of those that were caught were slain; yet was there a commiseration of any age, or any reverence of gravity: but children, and old men, and profane persons, and priests, were all slain in a manner, so that there went round all sorts of men, and brought them to destruction, and as well those that made supplication for their lives, as those that defended themselves by fighting. The flame was also carried a long way, and burnt the houses, together with those that were slain; and because this hill was

"This Peræa, if the word be not mistaken in the copies, seems to be Peræa, which is beyond Jordan, whose mountains were at a considerable distance from Jordan, and much too remote from Jerusalem to join this echo to the configuration of the temple; but Peræa must be either some mountain beyond the brook Cedron, as was the mount of Olives, or some others, about such a distance from Jerusalem; which observation is so obvious, that it is a wonder our commentators here take no notice of it.

Roland, I think, here judges well, when he interprets those spikes (of those that stood upon the top of the holy house, with sharp points that were fired into head to prevent the birds from sitting there, and defiling the holy house; for such spikes there were now upon) as Jesus himself hath already promised, Luke vii. v. and 8.
some were burnt in the cloisters themselves. Nor did any one of them escape with his life. A false prophet was the occasion of these people's destruction, who had made a public proclamation in the city that day, that God commanded them to get up upon the temple, and that there they should receive miraculous signs for their deliverance. Now, there was then a great number of false prophets subdued by the tyrants, to prevent their people from turning this to them, that they should wait for deliverance from God; and this was in order to keep them from deserting, and that they might be ensnared above fear and cares by such hopes. Nor, indeed, was it worse in the case of those that applied with such promises; for when such a seducer makes him believe that he shall be delivered from those miseries which oppress him, then it is that the patient is full of hopes of such deliverance.

3. Thus were the miserable people persuaded by these deceivers, and such as belied God himself; while they did not attend nor give credit to the signs that were so evident, and did so plainly foretell their future destruction. They were, moreover, very much satiated, without either eyes to see or minds to consider, did not regard the denunciations that God made to them. Thus there was a star seen rising, that rose and stood above the city, as if it were a comet; this continued all the night. Thus also before the Jews' rebellion, and before those commotions which preceded the war, when the people were come in great crowds to the feast of unleavened bread, on the eighth day of the month Xanthicus, [Nisan] and at the ninth hour of the night, so great a light shone round the altar and the holy house, that it appeared to be bright day time, which light lasted for half an hour. That light, however, was but unskilful, but was so interpreted by the sacred scribes as to portend those events that followed immediately upon it. At the same festival also a heifer, as she was led by the high priest to be sacrificed, brought forth a lamb in the midst of the temple. Moreover, the eastern gate of the inner [court of the temple], which was of brass, and vastly heavy, and had been with difficulty shut by twenty men, and rested upon a basis as great as that of a millstone, was to be a man, through the power of the jaw, very deep into the first floor, which was there made of one entire stone, was seen to be opened of its own accord about the sixth hour of the night. Now those that kept watch in the temple came down in great haste from the holy places, and told him of it, who then came up therewith, and not without great difficulty was able to shut the gate again. This also appeared to the vulgar to be a very happy prodigy, as if God did thereby open them the gate of happiness. But the men of learning understood it, that the security of their holy house was dissolved of its own accord, and that the gate was opened for the admission of their enemies. So they publicly declared that the signal foreboded the desolation that was coming upon them. Besides these, a few days after that feast, on the one and twentieth day of the month Artemiun [Jyar], a certain prodigious and inhuman phenomenon appeared: I suppose the account of it would seem to be a fable were it not related by those that saw it, and were not the events that followed it of so considerable a nature as to deserve such signals; for, before sunsetting, chariots and troops of soldiers in their armor were seen running about among the clouds, and surrounding of cities. Moreover, at that feast which we call Pentecost, as the priests were going by night into the inner [court of the temple], as their custom was to reform the sacred vessels, those, they said, that in the first place they felt a quaking, and heard a great noise, and after that they heard a sound as of a multitude, saying, "Let us remove hence." But what is still more terrible, they found, when they were come to a plebeian and a husbandman, who, four years before the war began, and at a time when the city was in very great peace and prosperity, came to that feast whereon it is our custom for every one to make tabernacles to God in the temple, began on a sudden to cry aloud, "A voice from the east, a voice from the west, a voice from the four winds, a voice against Jerusalem and the holy house, a voice against the bridgekeepers, and against those that dwell in the whole people." This was his cry, as he went about by day and by night, in all the lanes of the city. However, certain of the most eminent among the populace had great indignation at this dire cry of his, and the people took up and gave him a great number of severe stripes; yet did not he either say any thing for himself, or any thing peculiar to those that chastised him, but still went on with the same cry. He was crucified before Hecuron our rulers, supposing, as the case proved to be, that this was a sort of divine fury in the man, brought him to the Roman procurator, where he was whipped till his flesh was laid open; and yet, not for his supplication for himself, nor shed any tears; but turning his voice to the most lamentable tone possible, at every stroke of the whip his answer was, "Wo, wo to Jerusalem. And when Albinus [for he was that our procurator asked him, "Who he was? and whence he came? and why he uttered such words?" he made no answer of reply to what he said, but still did not leave off his melancholy ditty, till Albinus took him by the mouth and put his hand in it, during all the time that passed before the war began, this man did not go near any of the citizens, nor was seen by them while he said so; but he every day uttered these same words, as if it were a prophetic oracular, saying, "Wo, wo to Jerusalem." Nor did he give ill words to any of those that best him every day, nor good words to those that gave him food; but this was his reply to all men, and, indeed, no other than this. His last, "Wo to myself also," there came a stone out of one of the engines, and smote him, and killed him immediately, and, as he was uttering the very same sentences, he gave up the ghost.

6 Rehace here justly takes notice, that these Jews, who had thus taken their departure, were deservedly abused and deted with those false men.

† Whether Josephus means, that this star was different from that comet which lasted a whole year, I cannot certainly determine. But words most favor their being different one from another.

‡ Since Josephus still uses the Syro-Macedonian month Xanthicus for the Jewish month Nisan, this 4th, or as Nechothius reads it, this 4th of Xanthicus or Nisan was almost a week before the Passover on the 14th: about which time the Persian army was expected to arrive that might attempt the country to Jerusalem to purify themselves, d. n. 15 with ch. 1, in agreement with Josephus also, B. v. ch. 1, 2.

4. Now, if any one consider these things, he will find that God takes care of mankind, and by all ways possible provides means and devices to save them for their preservation, but that men perish by those miseries which they madly and voluntarily bring upon themselves; for the Jews, by demolishing the tower of Antonia, had made their fate certain, while at the same time they had it written in their sacred oracles, that "then should their city be taken, as well as their holy house, when once their temple should become four-square." But now, what did the «ost elevate» in life, and what is certain by this indubious oracle that was found also in their sacred writings, how, "about that time one from their country should become governor of the habitable world." The Jews took this prediction to be against them, in order to make its meaning suit the wise men were thereby deceived in their determination. Now, this oracle certainly denoted the government of Vespasian, who was appointed emperor in Judea. However, it is not possible that they had foretold this, although they wrote it beforehand. But these men interpreted some of these signals according to their own pleasure, and some of them utterly despaired, until their madness was demonstrated, both by the taking of their city, and their own destruction.

CHAP. VI.

How the Romans carried their Ensigns to the Temple, and made joyful Acclamations to Titus.

The Speech that Titus made to the Jews when they Made Supplication for Mercy. What Reply they made thereunto; and how that Reply moved Titus's Indignation against them.

1. And now the Romans, upon the sight of the sedition into the city, and upon the burning of the holy house itself, and of all the buildings round about it, brought their ensigns to the temple, and pitched them there; and there did they offer sacrifices to them, and there did they make Titus impetrate; with the greatest acclamations of joy. And now all the soldiers had such vast quantities of the spoils which they had gained, and gained by plunder, that in 6 of 7 a pound weight of gold was sold for half its former value. But as for those priests that kept themselves still upon the wall of the holy house, there was a boy that, out of the thirst he was in, drank the water of the temple grainery to give his thirst and hunger a brief respite; and as such was he, he was thirsty. These guards considered his age, and the distress he was in, and gave him their right hands accordingly. So he came of his bones, and was filled with water, and filled the vessel he had with him when he came to them with water, and then went off, and fled away to his own friends; nor could any of those guards overtake him; but still they require prophetic success for their people, in this case, and he made this answer: I have not broken the agreement; for the security I had given me was not in order to my staying with you, but only in order to my coming down safely, and taking up some water; both which things I have performed, and thereupon: think myself to have been faithful to my engagement." Hereupon those who the child had imposed upon admired at his cunning; and that on account of his age. Upon the 15th of the month, the priests that were ordained with the famine came down, and when they were brought to Titus by the guards, they begged for their lives: but he replied, that "the time of this judgment had been appointed by God for holy houses, on whose account only they could justly hope to be preserved, was destroyed, and that it was agreeable to the house itself to which they had now come: afterward, they offered it up in another form. Henceforth, as for the tyrants themselves, and those that were with them, when they found that they were encompassed on every side and, as it were, walled round, without any method of escape, and that Titus's message was full of such threats as did deserve to be regarded with the utmost awe. Accordingly, such was the kindliness of his nature, and his desire of preserving the city from destruction, joined to the advice of his friends, who now thought the robbers were come to a temper, and made peace with the Romans. How he showed the outer court of the temple; for there were gates on that side above the Astartes, and a bridge that connected the upper city to the temple. The bridge it was that lay between the tyrants and those of the people who stood on this side, those of the Jewish nation about Simon and John, with great hopes of pardon, and the Romans about Ceasar, in great expectation; how Titus would receive this suppliants, and what signal service he performed for them. So Titus changed his soldiers to pacify their rage, and let their darts alone, and appointed an interpreter between them, which was a sign that he was the conqueror, and first began the discoveries, and said: I hope you, Sirs, are now satisfied with the miseries of your country, who have not had any just notions, either of our great power, or of your own great weakness, but have like madmen, after a violent and inconsiderate manner, made such attempts as have brought your people, your city, and your holy house, to destruction. You have been the men that have never left off rebelling since Ptolemy first conquered you; and have, since that time, made peace with the Romans. How you depended on your multitude, while a very small part of the Roman soldiery have been strong enough for you. Have you relied on the fidelity of your considerates? And what nations are like this? But if you would not choose to accept the Romans? Are your bodies stronger than ours? Nay you know that the [strong] Germans themselves are our servants. Have you stronger walls than those of Athens, or of the temple? Or the bridge of the sea than the wall of the ocean, with which the Britons are encompassed, and yet do adore the arms of the Romans? Do you exceed us in courage of soul, and the sagacity of your counsels, and considerate advice? But the fact is, that the very Carthaginians have been conquered by us. It can therefore be nothing better but the kindness of us Romans which hath excited you against us; who, in the first place, have got the possession of our city; and, in the second place, have set over you kings of your own nation and, in the third place, have preserved the laws of your forefathers to you, and have withal permitted you to live, either by yourselves or by the Romans' aid, in the same manner as your ancestors; as it should please you; and, what is our chief favor of all, we have given you leave to gather up that tribute which is paid to God; the Romans in like case, as Reland assures us of his presence.

2. The Jews of later times agree with Josephus, that there were hiding places or secret chambers about the holy house, as Reland here informs us, where, he thinks his compatriots and took refuge in others. How does he describe these hiding places? Spanheim notices here, that the Romans used to permit the Jews to collect their sacred tribute, and send it in person, which of which we have and understand ordain it necessary, already on other occasions.
BOOK VI.—CHAP. VII.

Yes, do you stand still at this very time in your armor; nor can you be persuading so much as to pretend to be suppliants even in this year utmost extremity. O miserable creatures! What is it you depend on? Are not your people dead? Is not your holy house gone? Is not your city in very power? Have not your very limbs in my hands? And do you still deem it a part of your valor to die? However, I will not imitate your madness. If you will throw down your arms, and deliver up your bodies to me, I grant you set free; and I will act like a mild master of a family; what cannot be healed shall be punished, and the rest I will preserve for my own use."

3. To this offer of Titus they made this reply, that, so far as they were concerned, they had sworn never to do so, but that they desired they might have leave to go through the wall that had been made about them, with their wives and children; for that they would go into the desert, and leave the city to them.” At this Titus had great indignation, that, when they were in the case of men already taking captives, they should pretend to make their own terms with him, as if they had been conquerors. So he ordered that they should be made to understand, that they should no more come out to him as deserters, nor hope for any further security; for that he would henceforth spare nobody, but fight them with his whole army; and that they might save themselves, if they would come out, and be received from henceforth treat them according to the laws of war.” So he gave orders to the soldiers both to burn and to plunder the city, who did nothing indeed that day, but on the next day, lay set fire to the council-house, and to the place called Oplias; at which time the fire proceeded as far as the palace of queen Helens, which was in the middle of Acra; the lanes were also burnt, those houses that were full of the dead bodies of such as were destroyed by flame.

4. On the same day it was, that the sons and brothers of Ismael the king, together with many maidens, came to the senate, and asked for the murder of the inhabitants; and were got together there, and besought Cesar to give them his right hand for their security; upon which though he was very angry at all that were now remaining, yet did he not lay aside his old moderation, but he granted them. And indeed, he kept them all in custody, but still bent the king’s sons and kinsmen, and led them with him to Rome, in order to make them hostages for their country’s fidelity to the Romans.

CHAP. VII.

What afterwards befell the Seditions, when they had done a great deal of Mischief, and suffered many Misfortunes; and also how Cesar became Master of the Upper City.

I. AND now the seditions rushed into the royal palace, into which many had put their effects, because it was so strong, and drove the Roman soldiers out of their place. Yet have you all desired some of my proposals, and have set fire to your holy houses with your own hands. And now, vile wretches, do you pretend to treasure me by what you have done? To whom is the place, that you would save such a holy church as this, which is now destroyed? What preservation can you now desire, after the destruction of your temple?
Romans, and this while the Jewish executioner was drawing out his sword. Now when he was gotten away from the enemy, Titus could not think of putting him to death; but because he deemed him unworthy of being a Roman soldier any more for the account that he had been taken alive by the enemy, he took away his arms, and ejected him out of the legion whereunto he had belonged, which, to one that had a sense of shame, was a penalty severer than death itself. In the day, the Romans drove the robbers out of the lower city, and set all on fire as far as Siloam. These soldiers were indeed glad to see the city destroyed. But they missed the plunder, because the auditors had carried off all their goods; for they were the unresented of the upper city; for they did not yet at all repent of the mischiefs they had done, but were insolent as if they had done well; for as they saw the city on fire, they appeared cheerful, and put on joyful countenances, in expectation, as they said, of death to end their miseries. Accordingly, as the people were now slain, the holy house was burnt down, and the city was on fire, there was nothing farther left for the enemy to do. Yet did not Josephus leave his soldiers any in this extremity, to beg of them to spare what was left of the city; he spoke largely to them about their barbarity and impiety, and gave them his advice in order to their escape, though he gained nothing therein. For he thought it rather to be laughed at by these, and as they could not think of surrendering themselves up, because of the oath they had taken, nor were strong enough to fight with the Romans any longer-configured, as being surrounded after upon all sides, and a kind of prisoners already, yet were they so accustomed to kill people, that they could not restrain their right hands from acting accordingly. So they dispersed themselves among the city, and laid the inhabitants in smoky bushes among their ruins, to catch those that attempted to desert to the Romans; accordingly many such deserters were caught by them, and were all slain; for these were too weak by reason of their want of food to fly away from them; so the dead bodies were thrown to the dogs. Now every other sort of death was thought more tolerable than famine, insomuch, that though the Jews deserved of mercy, yet would they fly to the Romans to save themselves, even if their lives should fall among the murdigious rebels also. Now there was any place in the city that had no dead bodies in it, but what was entirely covered with those that were killed either by the famine or the sword, and all the rest of the dead bodies of such as had perished either by such sedition or by that famine.

3. So now the last hope which supported the tyrants, and that crew of robbers who were with them, was in the caves and caverns underground; whither, if they could once fly, they did not expect to be searched out, but endeavored, that after the whole city should be destroyed, and the Romans gone away, they might come out again, and escape from them. This was no better than a dream of theirs, for they were not able to lie hid either from God or from the Romans. However, they depended on these underground subterranea, and set more places on fire than did the Romans themselves; and those that fled out of their houses thus set on fire, unto the ditches, they killed them without mercy and pillaged them also; and if they discovered food belonging to them, they set it upon it and swallowed it down, together with their blood also; nay, they

But one thing here is peculiarly remarkable, that Moses adds, "were now come to fight one with another about their plunder; and I cannot but think, that had not their destruction prevented it, their barbarity would have made them taste even of the dead bodies themselves."

1. Now when Cæsar perceived that the upper city was so steep that it could not possibly be taken without raising banks against it, he distributed the several parts of that work among the leading companies, and made it a matter of monthly Loom. [Ab.] Now the carriage of the materials was a difficult task, since all the trees, as I have already told you, that were about the city with the distance of a hundred furlongs, but their branches cut off already, in order than the former banks. priests, the son of Thebatha, whose name was Jesus, upon his bearing security given him by the oath of Caesar, that he should be preserved, upon condition that he should deliver to him certain of the precious things that had been reposited in the temple, came out of it, and delivered him from the wall of the holy house two candlesticks, like to those that lay in the holy house, with tables, and cisterns, and vials, all made of solid gold, and very heavy. He also delivered to him the more precious stones, and a great number of other precious vessels that belonged to their sacred worship. The treasurer of the temple also, whose name was Phasael, delivered to him for the same, the crowns and girdles of the priests, with a great quantity of purple and scarlet, which were there reposited for the use of the veil, as also a great deal of cinnamon and cassia, with a large quantity of other sweet spices, which used to be mixed together, and offered as incense to God every day.

A great many other treasures were also delivered to him, with sacred ornaments of the temple not a few; which things thus delivered to Titus obtained grace and praise, as being such that he had allowed to such as deserted of their own accord.

4. And now were the banks finished on the seventh day of the month Gorpheus [Elul.] in eighty days, and the walls were so high that they could not shoot their machines against the wall. But for the seditious, some of them, as despairing of saving the city, retired from the wall to the citadel; others went into their vaults, though still a great many of them defended themselves against those that brought the engines for the battery: yet did the Romans overcome them by their number, and by their strength, and cast down the gates, and made a breach in all, by going cheerfully about their work, while the Jews were quite dejected, and became weak. Now, as soon as a part of the wall was battered down, and certain of the towers yielded to the pressure of the battering engines, almost at once, and without their own consent thrown down, and such a terror fell upon the tyrants, as was much greater than the occasion required; for before the enemy got over the breach, they were quite stunned, and at the same time thoroughly convinced that one might see these men, who had hitherto been so insolent and arrogant in their wicked practices, to be cast down, and to tremble, insomuch that it would pity one's heart to observe the change that was then in the face of those that a few days ago were so proud and arrogant, and indulgingly, they ran with great violence upon the Roman wall that encompassed them, in order to force away those that guarded it, and to break through it, and get away. But when they saw that those who had formerly been faithful to them, had gone away, (as indeed they were fled hither and thither) the great distress they were in persuaded them to flee,) as also when those that came running before the rest told them that the western wall was entirely overthrown, while others said the Romans were gotten in, and others that they were near, and looking out for them, which were only the dictates of their fear, and that upon their own face, and greatly lamented their own mad conduct; and their nerves were so terribly loosed, that they could not flee away. And here one may chiefly reflect on the power of God exercised upon the Jews, and the good fortune of the Romans; for these tyrants did now wholly deprive themselves of the security they had in their own power, and came down from those very towers of their own accord, wherein they could have never been taken by force, nor, indeed, by any other way than by famine. And thus did the Romans, when they had taken such great pains about weaker walls, get by good fortune what they could never have gotten by their engines: for of these three towers were too strong for all mechanical engines what soever, concerning which we have treated of before.

5. So they now left these towers of themselves, or rather they were ejected out of them by God himself, and followed the wall which was under Siloam, where they again recovered themselves out of the dread they were in for a while, and ran violently against that part of the Roman wall which lay on that side of the city, but their courage was too much depressed to make their attacks with sufficient force, and their power was now broken with fear and affliction, they were repulsed by the guards, and dispersing themselves at some distance, from them not the same for into the subterranean caverns. So the Romans being now become masters of the walls, they both placed their engines upon the towers, and made joyful acclamations for the victory they had obtained; and the soldiers found that the place was lighter than its beginning: for when they had gotten upon the last wall without any bloodshed, they could hardly believe what they found to be true; but seeing nobody to oppose them, they stood in doubt that any resistance could be made to what could mean. But when they went in numbers into the lanes of the city, with their swords drawn, they slew those whom they took by surprise without mercy, and set fire to the houses whither the Jews were fled, as they were, and laid waste a great many of the rest; and when they were come to the houses to plunder them, they found them in their entire families of dead men, and all the upper rooms full of dead bodies. Such was the fire as they were set by them, that is, of such as died by the famine; they then stood in a horror at this sight, and went out without touching any thing. But although they had this commiseration for such as were destroyed in that manner, yet they did give the fire of many of the houses to those that were still alive, but they ran every one through whom they met with, and obstructed the very lanes with their dead bodies, and made the whole city run down with blood, to such a degree that the fire of many of the houses was quenched with these men's blood. And truly so it happened, that though the flames left off at the evening, yet did the fire greatly prevail in the night; and as all was burning, came that eighth day, with such gory [Elul.] upon Jerusalem, a city that had been liable to so many miseries during this siege, that, had it always enjoyed as much happiness from its first foundation, it would certainly have been the envy of the world. Nor did it from any other account so much deserve these sore misfortunes, as by producing such a generation of men as were the occasion of this its overthrow.

CHAP. IX.

What Injunctions Caesar gave when he was come within the City. The number of the Capitiva, and of those that perished, and concerning those that had escaped into the subterranean caverns, among whom were the tyrants Simon and John themselves.

§ 1. Now when Titus was come into this [upper] city, he admired not only other places of strength, but also the towers which the tyrants in their mad conduct had relinquished: for when he saw their solid altitude, and the largeness of their several stones, and the exactness of all the joins, as also how great was their breadth, and how extensive used in the public worship under Herod's temple, particularly the 圖s and candelabra, and also the golden and precious vessels that had been there. As also the remarkable notice of, as agreeing with the latter testimony of the Talmudists.

length, he expressed himself after the manner following: "We have certainly had God for our assistant in this war, and it was no other than God who expelled the Jews out of these fortifications; for what could the hands of men, or any machines, do towards overthrowing these towers?" At which time he had many such discourses to his friends: he also let such go free as were accused by the tyrants and were left in the prisons. To conclude, when he entirely demolished the rest of the city, and overthrew its walls, he left these towers as a monument of his good fortune, which had proved his auxiliary, and he expected that some of them to take what could not otherwise have been taken by him.

3. And now, since his soldiers were already quite tired with killing men, and yet there appeared to be a multitude still remaining alive, Cæsar gave orders that they should kill none but those that were in arms, and opposed them, but should take the rest alive. But, together with those whom they had orders to slay, they slew those who had terrible wounds and those that were in their flourishing age, and who might be useful to them, they drove them together into the temple, and shut them up within the walls of the court of the women; over which Cæsar set one of his own friends, as he also knew, one of his own friends, which last was to determine every one's fate, according to his merits. So this Fronton slew all those that had been seditionists, and robbers, who had been impeached one by another; but later, when the door of the temple was open, those that were tallest and most beautiful, and reserved them for the triumphs; and as for the rest of the multitude that were above seventeen years old, he put them into bins, and sent them to the Egyptian mines. Thus a great number of them, as a present to them, that they might be destroyed upon the theatres, by the sword, and by the wild beasts; but those that were under seventeen years of age were sold for slaves. Now during the siege all things were distin-

4. Now this vast multitude is indeed collected out of remote places, but the entire nation was now shut up by fate, as in a prison, and the Roman army encompassed the city when it was almost compassed with the multitude of those that therein perished, exceeded all the destructions that either men or God ever brought upon the world; for, to speak only of what was publicly known, the Romans slew some persons in the provinces, and others who were of the least even immediately, while others were so greedy of gain, that they would go in among the dead bodies that lay on heaps, and tread upon them; for a good share of treasure was found in these cemeteries, and the heathen made usage thereof to get it to be esteemed lawful. Many also of those that had been put in prison by the tyrants were now brought out: for they did not leave off their barbarous cruelty at the very last: yet did God avenge themselves, and was even just and reasonable to justice. As for John, he wanted food together with his brethren, in those cemeteries, and begged that the Romans would now give him his right hand for security, which he had often desired, but belonged to the city itself; for they were come up from all the coun-

BOOK VI.—CHAP. X.

That Solomon the City of Jerusalem had been four times taken formerly, and was at the time and time of its Desolation. A brief Account of its History.

§ 1. And thus was Jerusalem taken, in the second year of the reign of Vespasian, on the eighth day of the month Gorpæus, [Elo.] it had been taken five times before, though this was the eighth. The first time was under Titus, and he took it and destroyed it, and shak the king of Egypt, and after him Antiochus, and after him Pompey, and after him Sosias and Herod, took the city, but still preserved it; but before all these, the king of Babylon conquered it, and made it desolate, the thousands four hundred and sixty-eight years and six months after it was built. But he who first built it was a potent man among the Canaanites, and is in our tongue called [Malchisedek.] The Righteous King, for such he really was; on which account he was a splendid synagogue of the Jews at Antioch only, B. vii. ch. iii. sect. 2.

N. B. This is the proper place for such as have closely attended to the latter Books of the War, to pursue, and that with even greater attention, those distinct and plain predictions of Jesus of Nazareth, in the gospels thereupon relating, as compared with their exact compliances in Josephus's books on the history; upon which the whole observer, Annotis. in Matth. xxiv. 3, so small part of the evidence for the truth of the Christian religion does depend; and as I have already compared them together in my Literal Accomplishments of Scripture Prophecies. The reader is to observe further, that the true reason why I have so seldom taken notice of these predictions in the course of these notes, notwithstanding their being so very remarkable, and frequently so very obvious, is this, that I had entirely prevented myself in that treatise beforehand; to which therefore, I must here, once for all, seriously refer every inquisitive reader.

BOOK VII.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF ABOUT THREE YEARS.—FROM THE TAKING OF JERUSALEM BY TITUS, TO THE SEDITION OF THE JEWS AT CYRUS.

CHAP. I.

How the entire City of Jerusalem was demolished, excepting three Tovers: and how Titus commended his Soldiers in a Speech made to them, and distributed Rewards to them, and it was distributed among many of them.

§ 1. Now as soon as the army had no more people to slay or to plunder, because there remained none to be the objects of their fury, (for they would not have spared any, had there remained any other such work to be done,) Caesar gave orders that they should now demolish the entire city and temple, but should leave as many of the towers standing as were of the greatest eminency, that is, Phasæus, and Hippicus, and Mariamne, and so much of the wall as enclosed the city on the west side. This wall was spared, in order to afford a camp for such as were to lie in garrison, as were the towers also spared, in order to demonstrate to posterity what kind of city it was, and how well fortified, which the Roman valor had subdued; but for all the rest of the wall, it was so thoroughly laid even with the ground by those that dag it up to the foundation, that there was left nothing to make those that came thither believe it had ever been inhabited. This was the end which Jerusalem came to by the madness of those that were for innovations; a city otherwise of great magnificence, and of mighty fame among all mankind. To leave there as a guard the tenth legion, with certain troops of horsemen, and companies of footmen. So, having entirely completed this war, he was desirous to commission his whole army on account of the great exploits they had performed, and to bestow proper rewards on such as had signalized themselves therein. He had therefore a great tribunal made for him in the midst of the place where he had formerly encamped, and stood upon it with his principal commanders about him, and spoke so as to be heard by the whole army in the manner following. He had set between them and abundance of thanks for their good will which they had showed to him: he commended them for that ready obedience they had exhibited in this whole war, which obedience had appeared in the many and great dangers which they had courageously undergone; as also, for that courage they had shown, and had thereby augmented of themselves their country's power, and had made it evident to all men, that neither the multitude of their enemies, nor the strength of their places, nor the largeness of their cities, nor the rash boldness and brutish rage of their antagonists, were sufficient at any time to get clear of the Roman valor, although some of them may have fortune in many respects on the side. He said further, that it was but reasonable for them to put an end to this war, now it had lasted so long, for they had nothing better to wish for than when they entered it, when they entered in it; and had sent into their own country for that purpose, which still continued under the management of those whom they had pitched on, and were thankful to them for pitching upon them. That accordingly, although he did both advise, length, he expressed himself after the manner following: "We have certainly had God for our assistant in this war, and it was no other than God who ejected the Jews out of these fortifications; for what could the hands of men, or any machines, do towards overthrowing these towers?" At which time he had many such discourses to his friends: he also let such go free as had been bound by the tyrants, and were left in the prisons. To conclude, when he entirely demolished the rest of the city, and overthrew its walls, he left these towers as a monument of his good fortune, which had proved his auxiliary, and enabled him to take what could not otherwise have been taken by him.

2. And now, since his soldiers were already quite tired with killing men, and yet there appeared to be a vast multitude still remaining alive, Caesar gave orders that they should kill none but those, that were in arms, and opposed them, but should take the rest alive. But, together with those whom they had orders to slay, they slew the aged and infirm; but for those that were in their flourishing age, and who might be useful to them, they drove them together into the temple, and shut them up within the walls of the court of the women; over which Caesar set one of his freedmen, as also Fronto, one of his own friends, which last was to determine every one and all, as to his fate. So this Fronto slew all those that had been seditious, and robbers, who had been impeached one by another; but of the young men he chose out the tallest and most beautiful, and reserved them for the triumvirs to be their messengers. Thus was the multitude that were above seventeen years old, he put them into bonds, and sent them to the Egyptian mines. Titus also sent a great number into the provinces, as a present to them, that they might be destroyed upon the theatres, by the sword, and by the wild beasts; but those that were under seventeen years of age were sold for slaves. Now during the days wherein Fronto was distinguishing these men, there perished, in want of food, eleven thousand; some of whom did not taste any food, through the hatred their guards bore to them, and others would not take any when it was given to them. The multitude also was so very great, that they were in want even of corn for their sustenance.

3. Now the number of those that were carried captive during this whole war was collected to be ninety seven thousand; as was the number of those who perished during the whole siege eleven hundred thousand, the greater part of whom were indeed of the same nation, with the citizens of Jerusalem, but not belonging to the city itself, for they were come up from all the country round about, and were sent upon a sudden shut up by an army, which had first occasioned so great a straining upon them, that they gave a presumpitious destruction upon them, and soon afterward destroyed them up on the city, that the city could not contain the number of them which was taken under Cestius who being dreading of informing Nero of the power of the city, who otherwise was disposed to condemn that nation, entrusted the high priests, if the thing were possible, to take the number of their whole multitude. So these high priests, upon the coming of that feast which is called the Passover, when they saw their sacrifices, from the ninth hour till the eleventh, but so that a company not less than ten belonged to every sacrifice (for it is not lawful for them to feast singly by themselves), and many of us are twenty in a company, found the number of sacrifices two hundred fifty-six thousand and five hundred, which, upon the allowance of no more than ten that feast together, amounts to two millions seven hundred thousand and two hundred persons that were pure and holy for as those to whom the leprosy, or the gout, or other human diseases belong, are not considered in sacrifices, (for it is not lawful for them to be partaker of this sacrifice; nor indeed for any unclean person, who come hither to worship.

4. Now this vast multitude is indeed collected out of remote places, but the entire number could now shut up by fate, as in a prison, and the Roman army encompassed the city when was crowded with inhabitants. Accordingly the multitude of those that therein perished, was all the world; for it was brought upon the world; for to what was publicly known, the Romans, and some of them, some they carried away others they made a search for under their mouthed courses, or such as are otherwise polluted, is not lawful for them to be partaker of this sacrifice; nor indeed for any unclean person, who come hither to worship.
CHAP. IV.

How Vespasian was received at Rome, as also how the Germans recollected from the Romans, but were subdued. That the Sarmatians over ran Syria, but were compelled to return to their own Country again.

§ 1. And now Titus Cæsar, upon the news that was brought him concerning his father, that his coming was much desired by the Italians and citizens, that Rome especially received him with great acclamations and splendor, betook himself to rejoicing and pleasures to a great degree, as now Macedonians, and afterward by the Romans, a governor of their own, who was exempt from the jurisdiction of the other civil governors. He was called sometimes a bare governor, sometimes a watchman, and [at Alexandria] a liberator, as Dr. Hudson takes notice on this place out of Fuller's Miscellanies. They had the like governor or governors allowed them at Babylon under their captivity there, as the history of Persians implies.
and tenderly regard them all, because he knew that every one of them had gone as cheerfully about their work as their abilities and opportunities would give them leave; yet he said, that he would immediately bestow rewards and dignities on those that had fought the most bravely, and with greater force, and had signified their conduct in the most glorious manner, and had made him the most famous by their able exploits; and that no one who had been willing to take more pains than another should miss of a just retribution for the same: for that he had been exceeding careful about this matter, and that the more he had had much rather reward the virtues of his fellow-soldiers than punish such as had offended.'

3. Hereupon Titus ordered those whose business it was to read the list of all that had performed great exploits in this war, upon which he called to him by their names, and commended them before the company, and rejoiced in them in the same manner as a man would have rejoiced in his own exploits. He also put on their heads crowns of laurel and garlands, and placed upon them the spoils of war, and gave them long spears of gold, and ensigns that were made of silver, and removed every one of them to a higher rank; and, began to plentifully distribute among them out of the spoils, and the other prey they had taken, silver, gold, and garments. So when they had all these honors bestowed on them, according to his own appointment made to them, he had wished of sorts of hay, and corn to the whole army, he came down, among the great acclamations which were made to him, and then betook himself to offer thank-offerings [to the gods,] and at once sacrificed a vast number of oxen, that stood ready at the altars, and distributed them among the army to feast on. And when he had stayed three days among the principal commanders, and so long feasted with them, he sent away the rest of his army to the several towns; he then continued to be very reticent, but permitted the tenth legion to stay as a guard at Jerusalem, and did not send them away beyond Euphrates, where they had been before. And as he remembered that the two years were the proper time to leave the Jews, he sent to Vespasian, their general, he expelled them out of all Syria, for they had lain formerly at Raphana, and sent them away to a place called Mele- tino, near Ephraim; which is in the limits of Arabia Caesarea; he also thought fit that two of the legions should stay with him, till he should go to Egypt. He then went down with his army to that Cæsarea which lay by the seaside, and there laid up the rest of his spoils in great quantities, and gave order that the captives should be kept there; for the winter season hindered them from sailing into Italy.

CHAP. II.

How Titus exhibited all sorts of shows at Cæsa- rea Philippi. Concerning Simon the Tyrant, how he was taken, and reserved for the Tri-umph.

1. Now, at the same time that Titus Cæsar lay at the siege of Jerusalem, did Vespasian go on board a merchant ship, and sailed from Alexandria to Rhodes; whence he sailed away with ships with three rows of sails, as he touched at Cythera, and Ladas, that lay in his road, he was joyfully received by them all, and so passed over from Ionia into Greece; whence he set sail from Corcyra to the promontory of Iapyx, whence he tooled away, and by some signals from Titus, he marched from that Cæsarea which lay by the seaside, and came to that which is named Cæsare- rea Philippi, and said there a considerable time,

*This Tenentius Rufus, as Roland in part observes here, is the same person whom the Talmudists call Ter- manis, as being the author of the tractate Ter- manis, in the book of Ezech., xxvi. 4. Titus went not as a field, and made Jerusalem become as hopes, and the and exhibited all sorts of shows there. And here a great number of the captives were destroyed, some being thrown to wild beasts, and others in mithritas forced to kill one another, as if they were their enemies. And here it was informed of the seizure of Simon, the son of Gioras, which was made after the manner fol- lowing: This Simon during the siege of Jerusalem, was found in the string of wild beasts, which was gotten within the walls, and being left the city waste, he then took the most faithful of his friends with him, and among them some that were stonecutters, with those iron tools which had been made to them, and he had much rather reward the quantity of provisions as would suffice them for a long time, and let himself and all them down into a certain subterraneous cavern that was not visible above ground. Now, so far as had been digged of old, they went to that cavern disturbance; but where they met with solid earth, they dug a mine under ground, and this, in hopes that they should be able to proceed so far as to rise from under ground in a safe place, and so by that means escape. But when they in order to make the experiment, they were disappointed of their hope; for the miners could make but small progress, and that with difficulty also; in- stead of which they better employed the time they had been consumed, by giving the measure, began to fail them. And now Simon, thinking he might be able to astonish and elude the Romans, put on a white frock, and buttoned upon him a purple cloak, and was in the upper part of the cavern, the temple had formerly been. At the first in- deed, those that saw him were greatly astonish- ed, and they stood still where they were; but afterward they came nearer to him, and asked him who he was? But when they could not tell them, but bade them call for their captain; and when they ran to call him, Tenenti-us Rufus, who was sent to command the army there, came to Simon, and learned of him the whole truth, and that he was the man that was taken, when he was. Thus did God bring this man to be punished for what bitter and savage tyranny he had exercised against his countrymen, by those that were his worst enemies; and this was the man that Cæsar sympathized with, when he sent a woman to him. But wilder actions do not escape the divine anger, nor in justice too weak to punish offenders, but in time over- takes those that transgress its laws, and inflicts its punishments upon the wicked in a more serious manner so much more severe, as they expected to escape it on account of their not being punished imme- diately. Simon was made sensible of this by falling under the indignation of the Romans. This of his out of the ground did also occasion the discovery of a great number of others of the sedition, at that time, who had hidden themselves under ground. But for Simon, he was brought to Cæsar in bonds, when he was come before him to the city, which was on account of the lady; who gave orders that he should be kept against that triumph which he was to celebrate at Rome upon this occasion.

CHAP. III.

How Titus, upon the Celebration of his Brother's and Father's Birthdays, had many of the Jews slain, and warning the danger of our war were in at Antioch, by means of the Transcation and imperty of one Antiochus, a Jew.

1. While Titus was at Cæsarea, he solemn- ized the birthday of his brother [Domitian] after mountains of the house as the high places of a forest, which was long before forested by the prophet Nebiach. This was quoted from him in the post-world of Cæsar, xxi. 18. The Jews, viii. 11.

freen from the solicitude he had been under, after the most agreeable manner. For all men that were in Italy showed their respects to him in their minds before he came thither, as if he were already come, as esteeming the very expectation they had of him to be his real presence, on account of the great desires they had to see him, and because the good with whom he was entirely free and unconstrained: for it was a desirable thing to the senate, who well remembered the calamities they had undergone in the late civil wars, to have a governor or who was adored with the gravity of old age, and with the highest skill in the actions of war, whose advancement would be, as they knew, for nothing else but for the preservation of those that are the city of Rome. And now it had been so harassed by their civil miseries, that they were still more earnest for his coming immediately, as supposing they should then be firmly delivered from their calamities, and believing they should relate persons whose securities were tranquility and prosperity; and for the soldiery, they had the principal regard to him, for they were chiefly apprized of his great exploits in war; and since they had experienced the want of a man of courage in our commanders, and they were very desirous to be freed from that great shame they had undergone by their means, and heartily to receive such a prince as might be a security and an ornament to them. And now it was to Vespassian, those that enjoyed any remarkable dignities could not have patience enough to stay in Rome, but made haste to meet him at a very great distance from it: say, indeed, none of the rest could endure the delays of seeing him, but did all present of the city in such crowds, and were so universally possessed with the opinion that it was easier and better for them to go out than to stay there, that this was the very first time that the city joyfully met the emperors of its citizens; for those that stood within were fewer than those that went out. But as soon as the news was come that he was hard by, and those that had so much to do, their good humor he received every one that came to him, then it was that the whole multitude that had remained in the city, with their wives and children, came into the road and waited for him there; and it was pleased by those who made a great many sorts of acclamations on account of the joy they had to see him, and the pleasantness of his countenance, and styled him their benefactor and savior, and the only person who was worthy to be ruler of the city. And now the city was like a temple, full of garlands and sweet odors; nor was it easy for him to come to the royal palace, for the multitude of the people that stood about him, where yet at last he performed his sacrifices of thanksgiving to his household gods, for his safe return to the city. The multitude also betake themselves to feasting, which feasts and drink offerings they celebrated by their tribes, and their families, and then their nation, till pleased by what they had seen that Vespassian, his sons, and all their posterity, might continue in the Roman government for a very long time; and that his dominion might be preserved from all opposition. And this was the most joyous and blissful of the days of Vespassian, and thence grew immediately into a state of great prosperity.

2. But before this time, and while Vespassian was about Alexandria, and Titus was lying at the siege of Jerusalem, a great multitude of the Germans were in connection, and tended to rebellion; and as the Gauls in their neighborhood joined with them, they conspired together, and had thereby great hopes of success, and that they should free themselves from the dominion of the Romans. The news that induced them to this attempt for a revolt, and for beginning the war, were these: In the first place, the nature [of the people, which was desistate of just submission, and ready to the sentence of their enemies; many of them, seeing upon small hopes, in the next place, the hatred they bore to those that were their governors, while their nation had never been conscious of subjection to any but to the Romans, by the people, being certain. Besides these motives, it was the opportunity that now offered itself, which above all the rest prevailed with them so to do; for when they saw the Roman government in a great internal disorder, as the news continued of its rulers, and understood that every part of the habitable earth under them was in an unsettled and tottering condition, they thought this was the best opportunity that could afford itself for themselves to make a beginning of their commerce that they desired, as was so ill. Classicus and also Vitellius, two of their commanders, puffed them up with such hopes. These had for a long time been openly desirous of such an innovation, and were induced to proceed by the librarii, or the reading of the declaration of their sentiments: the multitude was also ready, and when these men told them of what they intended to attempt, that news was gladly received by them. So when a great part of the Germans had agreed to rebel, and the rest were no better disposed, Vespassian, as guided by divine Providence, sent letters to Petullius Cerealis, who had formerly had the command of Germany, whereby he declared him to have the dignity of consul, and commanded him to take the government of Britain; so he went whither he was ordered to go, and when he was informed of the revolt of the Germans, he fell upon the town, and destroyed it where he was gotten together, and put his army into battle array, and flew a great multitude of them in the fight, and forced them to leave off their madness, and to grow wiser; say, had he not fallen thus suddenly upon the rebels, he knew the event would however have been brought to punishment; for as soon as ever the news of their revolt was come to Rome, and Caesar Domitian was made acquainted with it, he made no delay even to the hour, but returned back; and indeed he was not yet over it, but undertook this weighty affair. He had a courageous mind from his father, and had made greater improvements than belonged to such an age: accordingly, he marched against the barbarians immediately; and upon their arrival, he sent all the affairs of Gaul in such good order, that it would not be easily put into disorder say more, he returned to Rome with honor and glory, as having performed such exploits as were almost equal to the fame of Vespasian, the victor of the Batavians.

3. At the very same time with the formentioned revolt of the Germans, did the bold attempt of the Scythians against the Romans occur; reasons unobvious that might occasion this great diversity; Domitian was one of Josephus's patrons, and when he was at Qaemar, it was his custom to forewarn the Romans, and had hardly begun those wicked practices which rendered him so infamous afterward; while Sestiones seems to have been a very considerable man in the eyes of the Romans, and marked them from them; as Domitian was certainly very lawd and cruel, and generally hated, when Sestiones wrote about him.

1Civilis. Thesi.
for those Sicytians, who are called Sarmatians, being a very numerous people, transported themselves over the frozen river without any peril or being perceived: after which, by their violence and entirely unexpected assault, they slew a great many of the Romans that guarded the frontiers; and as the consul legate Fonteius Agrippa came to meet them, and fought courageously against them, he was slain by them. They then overran all the region that had been subject to him, tearing and rending everything that fell in their way. But when Vespasian was informed of what was done, he, because of his laziness, sent away Rubrius Gallus to punish these Sarmatians: by whose means many of them perished in the battles he fought against them, and that part which escaped fled with fear to their country. And after he had put an end to the war, he provided for the future security of the country also; for he placed more and more numerous garrisons in the place, till he made it altogether impossible for any enemy to pass over the river any more. And thus had he this war in Myria a sudden conclusion.

CHAPTER V.

Concerning the Sabotic River, which Titus saw as he was journeying through Syria; and how Vespasian composed such a celerity of Titus to Titus against the Jews, but were rejected by him; as also concerning Titus and Vespasian's Triumph.

1. Now Titus Caesar tarried some time at Berysta, as we told you before. He thence removed, and exhibited to such abundant show in all those cities of Syria through which he went, and made use of the captive Jews as public instances of the destruction of that nation. He then saw a river, as he went along, of such a nature as deserved all the admiration of Antiochus, because of its celerity: it was of the middle between Arcea, belonging to Agrippa's kingdom, and Raphanae. It hath somewhat very peculiar in it; for when it runs, its current is strong and has plenty of water; after which its springs fail for six days together, and leaves its channel dry, as any one may see; after which days it runs on the seventh day as it did before, and as though it had undergone no change at all; it hath also been observed to keep this order perpetually and exactly: whence it is, that they call it the Sabotic River, that name being taken from the sacred seventh day among the Jews.

2. But when the people of Antioch were informed of the victory, they were so glad at it, that they could not keep within their walls, but hasted away to give him the meeting; nay, they proceeded as far as thirty furlongs, and more, with that intention. These were not the men only, but a multitude of women also with their children, did the same; and when they saw him coming up to them, they stood on both sides of the way, and stretched out their right hands saluting him, and making all sorts of acclamations to him. As soon as God had brought them in, they set up a great cry; and at length the Jews were in a great deal of terrible fear under the uncertainty they were in what his opinion was, and what he would do to them. For Titus, besides all the case of this war, but the more so, gave a great progress immediately to Zeugma, which lies upon the Euphrates, whither came to him messengers from Vologeses, king of Parthia, and brought him a crown of gold upon the victory he gained over the Jews, and sent the gold for the king's messengers, and then came back to Antioch. And when the senate and people of Antioch earnestly entreated him to come upon their theatre, where the whole multitude were assembled, and expected him, he complied with great humanity; but when they pressed him with much earnestness, and continually begged of him that he would eject the Jews out of their city, he gave them this very pertinent answer: How can this be, since that country of theirs whither the Jews must be obliged then to retire, is destroyed, and no place will receive them besides." Whereupon the people of Antioch, when they had failed of success in this their first request, made him a second; for they desired that he would order those tables of brass to be removed, on which the Jews' privileges were engraved. However, Titus would not grant that neither, but permitted the Jews of Antioch to continue to enjoy the very same privileges in that city which they had before, and then departed for Egypt; and as he came to Jerusalem in his progress, and compared the melancholy condition he saw it then in, with the ancient glory of it, he called to mind the greatness of its present ruins, as well as its ancient splendor, he could not but pity the destruction of the city, so far was he from boasting that so great and goodly a city that was once so illustrious should now be in this case: say, he frequently cursed those that had been the authors of their revolt, and had brought such a punishment upon the city; insomuch, that it appeared as if he publicly appeared that he did not grieve that such a calamity as this punishment of theirs amounted to, should be a demonstration of his courage. Yet was there no small quantity of the riches that had been in that city, still found among its ruins. A great part of them, however, but the greatest part was discovered by those who were captives, and so they carried it away; I mean the gold and silver and the rest of that most precious furniture which the Jews had, and which the owners had perished up under ground against the uncertain fortunes of war.

3. So Titus took the journey he intended into Egypt, and passed over the desert very suddenly, and came to Alexandria, and took up a resolution to go to Rome by sea. And here Titus was accompanied by two legions, he sent each of them again to the places whence they had before come, the fifth he sent to Myria, and the fifteenth to the land of Panonia: as for the captives, he delivered them to the hands of his sons, and John, with the other seven hundred men, whom he had selected out of the rest as being eminently tall and handsome of body, he gave order that they should be soon carried to Italy, as resolving to produce them in his triumph. So when he had had a prosperous voyage to his mind, the city of Rome behaved itself in his reception, and their meeting him at a distance, as it did in the case of his father. But what made the most splendor of all was, when his father met him, and received him, but still the multitude of the citizens conceived the greatest joy when they saw them all three together; as they did at this time: nor were there many of them that did not wish to have but one triumph that should be common to both of them, on account of the glorious exploits they had performed, although the senate had decreed each of them a separate triumph by himself. So when news had been given beforehand of the day appointed for this more about it; only see D. Hudson's note. In Varras' Geography, I. 14, the reader will find a description of such periodical fountains and rivers, though none of their periods were that of just a week, as of old this appears to have been.
freed from the solicitude he had been under, after the most agreeable manner. For all men that were in Italy showed their respects to him in their minds before he came thither, as if he were already come, as esteeming the very expectation they had of him to be his real presence, on account of the great desires they had to see him, and the sage man's wish, that they may be before him was at that time, as if he were there, and more tireless and unconstrained: for it was a desir- able thing to the senate, who well remembered the calamities they had undergone in the late changes, and to have their governors, to receive a govern- or who was acquainted with them at an early age, and with the highest skill in the actions of war, whose advancement would be, as they knew, for nothing else but for the preservation of those had been suffered. Moreover, the people had been so harassed by their civil miseries, that they were still more earnest for his coming im- mediately, as supposing they should then be firmly delivered from their calamities, and be- lieving they should then recover their secure tranquility and prosperity; and for the soldiery, they had the principal regard to him, for they were chiefly apprised of his great exploits in war; and since they had experienced the want of such gods of courage in other commanders, they were very desirous to be freed from that great shame they had undergone by their means, and heartily to receive such a prince as might be a security and an ornament to them. And it is no wonder, that by Vesuvius and Vesalanus, those that enjoyed any remarkable dignities could not have patience enough to stay in Rome, but made haste to meet him at a very great distance from it: any, indeed, none of the rest could en- dure the delay of seeing him, and he passed over part of the city in such crowds, and were so universally possessed with the opinion that it was easier and better for them to go out than to stay there, that this was the very first time that the city joy- fully saw the emperor, and the majesty of one of its chief consuls; for those that stood within were fewer than those that went out. But as soon as the news was come that he was hard by, and those that had met him at first related with what good humor he received every one that came to him, then it was that the whole multitude that had re- mained in the city, with their wives and children, came into the road and waited for him there; and all those that passed by him made all sorts of exclamations on account of the joy they had to see him, and the pleasantness of his coun- tenance, and styled him their benefactor and sa- vior, and the only person who was worthy to be ruler of the state. And now, when the city was as a temple, full of garlands and sweet odors; nor was it easy for him to come to the royal palace, for the multitude of the people that stood about him, where yet at last he performed his sacrifices of thanksgiving to his household gods, for his safe return to the city. The multil- tude did also betake themselves to feasting; which feasts and drink offerings they celebrated by their tribes, and their families, and then their men met in great numbers. For it appeared to that Vesuvian, his sons, and all their posterity, might continue in the Roman government for a very long time, and that his dominion might be preserved from all opposition. And this was the manner of his sacrifice to the gods of the city, for the gods; and thence grew immediately into a state of great prosperity.

2. But before this time, and while Vespasian was about Alexandria, and Titus was lying at the siege of Jerusalem, a great multitude of the Germans, in coalition, and tended to the destruction of the city, and raised great expectation of it, and made great preparations in advance of it. The Romans, for this attempt, designed to revolt, and to beginning- the war, were these: In the first place, the nature [of the people, which was destitute of just repre- sentatives, and ready to throw themselves rashly into an action.] They were well disposed to any kind of revolt, and next, the hatred they bore to those that were their governors, while their nation had never been conscious of subjection to any but to the Romans, and that, by compulsion only. To besides these motives, it was the opportunity that now offered itself, which above all the rest pre- vailed with them to do; for when they saw the Roman government in a great internal dis- order, by the continual changes of its rulers, and understood that every part of the habitable earth under them was in an unsettled and tottering condition, they thought this was the best oppor- tunity that could afford itself for themselves to be masters, and that the government of Germany was so ill. Classicus and also Vitellius, two of their commandors, paused them up with such hopes. These had for a long time been openly desirous of such an innovation, and were induced to act; they were aroused to a spirit of rebellion by the declaration of their sentiments: the multitude was also ready, and when these men told them of what they intended to attempt, that news was gladly received by them: So when a great part of the Germans had agreed to rebel, and the rest were no better disposed, Vespasian, as guided by divine Providence, sent letters to Petellius Cerealis, who had formerly had the command of Ger- many, whereby he declared him to have the digni- ty of the Germanic, and to give him the government of the whole Germanic people, and to give him the government of Britain; so he went whither he was ordered to go, and when he was informed of the revolt of the Germans, he fell upon them as soon as they were gotten together, and put his army in battle array, and slew a great multitude of them in the fight, and forced them to leave off their madness, and to grow wiser; Nay, had he not fallen thus soon upon them, nor left them to proceed in their designs, they would however have been brought to punish- ment; for as soon as ever the news of their re- volt was come to Rome, and Caesar Domitian was made acquainted with it, he made no delay even of that, and, as soon as he had dealt with him, but undertook this weighty affair. He had a courageous mind from his father, and had made greater improvements than belonged to such an age: accordingly, he marched against the bar- barians immediately; whereupon their hearts fail- ed them at the very rumor of his approach, and they submitted themselves to him with fear, and thought it a happy thing that they were brought under their old yoke again without suffering any, but had to give up their freedom, and settled all the affairs of Gaul in such good order, that it would not be easily put into disorder any more, he returned to Rome with honor and glo- ry, as having performed such exploits as were almost incredible. But that things should not be better ordered and governed in his other provinces.

3. At the very same time with the foresque- tioned revolt of the Germans, did the bold at- tempt of the Scythians against the Romans occur; reasons unobvious that might occasion this great diversity; Domitian was one of Josephus's patrons, and when he was made king, he was expected to repay them for his kindness to him, and had hardly begun those wicked practices which mer- rited him so infamous afterward; while Sestineus seems to have been only a king and a little prince, and may remark his favor from him; as Domitian was certainly very low and cursed, and generally hated, when Sestineus wrote about him.

For those Scythians, who are called Sarmatians, being a very numerous people, transported abroad, and expelled by the effects of the situation above being perceived: after which, by their violence and entirely unexpected assault, they slew a great many of the Romans that guarded the frontiers; and as the consul legate Fonteius Agrrippa came to meet them, and fought courageously against them, he was slain by them. They then overran all the region that had been subject to him, tearing and rending everything that fell in their way. But when Vespasian was informed of what had befallen, he moved with haste, and found the event as he had been pleased to forebode. He sent away Rubrius Gallus to punish these Sarmatians; by whose means many of them perished in the battles he fought against them, and that part which escaped flight with few left their country. So when this new event had put an end to the war, he provided for the future security of the country also; for he placed more and more numerous garrisons in the place, till he made it all other impossible for them to pass over the river any more. And thus had this war in Mysia a sudden conclusion.

CHAP. V.

Concerning the Sabattic River, which Titus saw as he was journeying through Syria; and how he made use of the Gallican capture of Antioch as an occasion to Titus against the Jews, but were rejected by him; as also concerning Titus and Vespasian's Triumph.

1. Now Titus Caesar tarried some time at Berytus, as we told you before. He thence re- moved, and made his way to Antioch in Cappadocia. Where, by the inhabitants, he was received with the fairest salutations and honours; and after he had taken possession of the city, he made use of the captive Jews as public instances of the destruction of that nation. Then he sent away a river, as he went along, of such a nature as des- troyed all the towns and cities in the middle between Araeum, belonging to Agrrippa's kingdom, and Raphanae. It had somewhat very peculiar in it; for when it runs, its current is strong and has plenty of water, after which its stream falls for six days together, and leaves its channel dry, as any one may see; after which days it runs on the seventh day as it did before, and as though it had undergone no change at all; it had also been observed to keep this order perpetually and exactly: whence it is that they call it the Sabattic River, that name being taken from the sacred seventh day among the Jews.

2. But when the people of Antioch were in- formed of what was happening in this town, they were glad at it, that they could not keep within their walls, but hasted away to give him the meeting; nay, they proceeded as far as thirty furlongs, and more, with that intention. These were not the men only, but a multitude of women also with their children, did the same; and when they saw him coming up to them, they stood on both sides of the way, and stretched out their right hands saluting him, and making all sorts of acclamation to him, and saying, Bless thou with him. They also, among all the acclama- tions they made to him, besought him all the way they went, to eject the Jews out of their city; yet did not Titus at all yield to this petition, but proceeded on his journey. But now, when the news of these things had been heard, the Jews were in a great deal of terrible fear under the uncertainty they were in what his opinion was, and what he would do to them. For Titus Caesar, as he advanced, did not appear to have but one triumph that should be common to both of them, on account of the glorious exploits they had performed, although the senate had decreed but one, but Titus, as triumph by himself. So when notice had been given beforehand of the day appointed for this more about it; only see Dr. Heyden's note. In Varsa- ni's Geography, I. 17, the reader will find several in- stances of such periodical fountains and rivers, though none of their periods were that of just a week, as of old this appears to have been.

Vespasian, and his two sons, Titus and Domitian.
pompous solemnity to be made on account of their victories, not one of the immense multitude was left in the city, but every body went out so far as to gain only a station where they might stand, and left only such a passage as was necessary for them to get near the theatre. At that time, it was the emperor had rested the foregoing night. And as soon as ever it was day, Vespasian and Titus came out crowned with laurel, and clothed in the crimson and purple habiliments, which were proper to their family, and then went as far as Octavian's walks; for there it was that the senate, and the principal rulers, and those that had been recorded as of the equestrian order, met Titus just put up a speech, in which he declared his prayers Vespasian made a short speech to all the people, and then sent away the soldiers to a dinner prepared for them by the emperors. Then did he retire to that gate which was called the gate of victory because pomposity shows to all ways go through that gate; there it was that they tasted some food, and when they had put on their triumphal garments, and had offered sacrifices to the gods that were placed at the gate, they set the triumph forward, and marched through the theatres, that they might be the more easily seen by the multitude.

5. Now it is impossible to describe the multitude of the above story, they deserve, and the magnificences of the all; such as a man could not easily think of, as performed, either by the labor of workmen, or the variety of riches, or the rarities of nature; for almost all such curiosities that ever get by piecemeal, were here heaped one upon another, and those both admirable and costly in their nature: and all brought together on that day, demonstrated the vastness of the dominions of the Romans; for there, here to be seen had mighty quantities of silver, and gold, and ivory, contrived into all sorts of things, and did not appear as carried along pompous show only, but, as a man may say, running along like a river. Some parts were in stem, some in petals, some in little cup-like hangings, and so carried along; and others accurately represented to the life what was embroidered by the arts of the Babylonians. There were also precious stones that were transparent, some set in gold, and some in silver; and so on other officers; as the workmen pleased; and of these such a vast number were brought, that we could not but then learn how vainly we imagined any of them to be rarities. The images of the gods were also carried, being as well wonderful for their largeness, as made very artificially, and with great

6. See the representations of these Jewish vessels, as the two splendid brass ones, now at Rome, in Romani very curious book, de Spolia Triumphi, throughout. But what things are chiefly to be noted are these: ... (1) That the candlesticks here carried in this triumph was not thoroughly like that which was used in the temple, which appears in the number of the sixtus lamps and flowers in that on the triumphal arch not skill of the workmen: nor were any of these images of any other than very costly materials, and many species of animals were brought, every one in their own natural ornaments. And the men also, who brought every one of these above, were greatly affected; and all the people viewed, all over interwoven with gold; those that were chosen for carrying these pompous shows having also about them such magnificent ornaments as those, with extraordinary and curious. Besides these, one might see that even the greatest number of the captives was not undressed, while the variety that was in their garments, and their fine texture, concealed from the sight the large number of them. But what afforded the greatest surprise of all, was the structure of the pageants, that were borne along; for indeed he that met them could not but be afraid that the bearers would not be able firmly enough to support them, such was their magnitude: for many of them were so made, that they were on three or even four stories one above another. The magnificence also of their structure afforded one both pleasure and surprise; for upon many of them were laid carpet of gold. What was wrought gold and ivory fastened about them all; and many resemblances of the war, and those in several ways, and variety of contrivances affording a most lively portraiture of itself—Fire also went on, and the rest of the multitude and the walls of most populous cities upon the tops of hills seized on, and an army pouring itself within the walls; as also every place full of slaughter, and supplications of the enemies, when they were taken; and on the very side of their way of opposition. Fire also sent on us temples was here represented, and houses overthrown, and falling upon their owners; rivers also, after they came out of a large and melancholy desert, ran down, not into a land cultivated, nor as drink for men, or for cattle, but through a land still on fire upon every side; for the Jews related that such a thing they had undergone during this war. Now the representation of these things was so magnificently and lively in the construction of the things, that it exhibited what had been done so much as not to see it, as if they had been there really present. On the top of every one of the pageants was a figure representing the city that was taken, and the manner wherein it was taken. Moreover, there followed those pageants a great number of ships; and for the other spoils also, they were carried in great plenty. But for those that were taken in the temple of Jerusalem, they made the greatest figure of them all; that is, the golden table, of the weight of many talents: the candlestick also, that was made of gold, though its construction was wondrously contrived. The middle shaft was fixed upon a basis, and the small branches were produced out of it to a great length, having the likeness of a trident in their position, and had every one a socket made of brass; and the seven lamps in each other one; and the lamps were in number seven, and represented the dignity of the number Seven among the Jews; and the last of all the spoils was carried the law of the Jews. After these spoils passed by a great many more carrying the images of victory, whose structure was entirely either of well agreeing with Moses's description, Exod. xxv. 31. (2.) The smallness of the branches in Josephus, com- pared with the thickness of those on that arch. (3.) That the Law or Pentateuch does not appear on that arch at all, though Josephus, an eyewitness, assures as it was carried in this procession. All which things deserve the consideration of the inquisitive reader.

BOOK VII—CHAP. VI.

6. Now the last part of this pompous show was at the baths of Juba the Aethiopian, which when they were come, they stood still; for it was the Romans' ancient custom to stay till someone brought the news, that the general of the enemy was slain. This general was Simon, the son of Cotys, who perished in a narrow and triumphant among the captives: a rope had also been put upon his head, and he had been drawn into a proper place in the forum, and had withal been tormented by those that drew him along; and the hue of the Halberts and other implements, that led the captors, condemned to die, should be slain there. Accordingly, when it was related that there was an end of him, and all the people had set out a shout for joy, they then began to offer those sacrifices which in Herod's time, together with the garrison, which is in such solemnities; which when they had finished, they went away to the palace. And as for some of the spectators, the emperors entertained them at their own feast; and for all the rest there were feasts given to them; and certain feasts were kept at home; for this was a festival day to the city of Rome, as celebrated for the victory obtained by their army over their enemies, for the end that was now put to their civil miseries, and for the people to express their hopes of future prosperity and happiness.

7. After these triumphs were over, and after the affairs of the Romans were settled on the severest foundations, Vespasian resolved to build a temple of the god, which he had maintained all that time and in so glorious a manner, as was beyond all human expectation and opinion: for he having now by Providence a vast quantity of wealth, besides the many spoils he had gained by his exploits, he had this temple adorned with pictures and statues; for in this temple was collected and deposited all such rarities as men aforetime used to wander all over the habitable world to see, when they had leisure to see them after one another: he also laid up therein those golden vessels and instruments that were taken out of the Jewish temple, as ensigns of his glory. But still he gave order that they should lay up their law, and the purple Robe of the holy place, in the royal palace itself, and keep them there.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning Machærus, and how Lucilius Basus took the Citâidel, and other Places.

1. Now Lucilius Basus was sent as legate into Judæa, and there he received the army from Cæsarea Vitalianus, and took that citadel which was called Machærus, and laid siege to it, after which he got together all the soldiers that was there, (which was a large body, but dispersed into several parties,) with the tenth legion, and resolved to make war upon Machærus. For this citadel should be demolished, lest it might be a means of drawing away many into a rebellion, by reason of its strength: for the nature of the place was very capable of affording the surest hopes of safety to those that possessed it, as well as delay and fear to those that should attack it; for what was walled in was itself a very rocky hill elevated to a very great height, which circumstance alone made it very hard to be subdued. It was also so contrived by nature, that it could not be easily ascended; for it is as it were ditched about with such valleys, on all sides, and to such a depth, that the eye cannot reach its bottom; and such as are not easily to be passed over, and even such as it is impossible to fill up with earth. For that valley which cuts it on the west, extends as much as three leagues, and did not end till it came to the lake Asphaltites; on the same side it was also that Machærus had the tallest top of its hill elevated above the rest. But then for the valleys that lay on the north and south sides, although they were not so deep, yet it is in like manner an impracticable thing to think of getting over them: and for the valley that lies on the east side, its depth is found to be no less than a hundred cubits. It extends as far as a man can walk, that lies over against Machærus, with which it is bounded.

2. Now when Alexander Jannæus, the king of the Jews, observed the nature of this place, he was the first who built a citadel here, which afterward he fortified, that it might be a convenient place on that account, and had a prospect towards that country; he therefore surrounded a large space of ground with walls and towers, and built a city there, out of which city there rose up a tower on a mountain, as it were on the top of the mountain; say more than this, he built a wall round that top of the hill, and erected towers at the corners, of a hundred and sixty cubits high; in the middle of which place he built a palace, after such a magnificent manner, wherein were large and beautiful edifices. He also made a great many reservoirs for the reception of water, that there might be plenty of it for all uses: he also found the most properest places that were afforded him there. Thus did he, as it were, contend with the nature of the place, that he might exceed its natural strength and security, which yet itself rendered it hard to be taken, by those fortifications which were made by the hands of men. Moreover, he put a large quantity of darts and other machines of war into it, and contrived to get every thing thither that might any way contribute to its inhabitants' security, under the longest siege possible.

3. Now within this place there grew a sort of rue, that deserves our wonder on account of its largeness; for it was nowyward inferior to any tree whatsoever, neither in height nor fullness: and the report is, that it had lasted ever since the times of Herod, and would probably have lasted much longer had it not been cut down by those Jews who took possession of the place afterward. This rue still in that valley which encompasseth the city on the north side, there is a certain place called Barasa, which produces a root of the same name with itself; its color is like that of fritters, and towards the evening it emits a certain scent like lightning; it is not easily taken by such as would do it, but recedes from their hands, nor will yield itself to be taken quietly, until either the urine of a woman, or the meagre parts of a butcher, be poured upon it. But then it is certain death to those that touch it, unless any one take and hang the root itself down from his hand, and so carry it away. It may also be taken another way, without danger, which is this: They dig a round hole in the hidden part of the root be very small; they

8 Sponsheim observes here, that in Græcia Major and Sicily they had rue prodigiously great and durable, like this rue at Machærus.

9 This strange account of the place and root Barasa seems to have been taken from the magicians, and the root to have been made use of in the days of Josephus in that superstitious way of casting out demons supposed by him to have been derived from king Solomon, of which we have already heard a great deal; see B. vili. ch. ii. sect. 5. We also may hence learn the true notion Josephus had of demons and demoniacs, exactly like that of the Jews and Christians in the New Testament and the first four centuries. See Ambr. B. vi. ch. vii. sect. 3; B. xxii. ch. ii. sect. 3.
WARS OF THE JEWS.

Then tie a dog to it, and when the dog tries hard to follow him that fed him, this sport is easily played off; but the dog dies immediately, as if it were instead of the man that would take the plant away; nor after this need any one be afraid of taking it into their hands. Yet after all this pain in getting the keys, it is only removing the account of one man by another, that if it be only brought to sick persons, it quickly drives away those called demons, which are no other than the spirits of the wicked, that enter into men that are alive, and possess them, unless they can obtain some help against them. Here are also fountains of hot water, that flow out of this place, which have a very different taste from the other; for some of them are bitter, and others of them are plainly sweet water, others are the effusions of cold waters, and this not only in the places that lie lower, and have their fountains near one another, but what is still more wonderful, here is to be seen a certain cave hard by, whose cavity is not deep, nor broad for its own sake that is prominent: above this rock there stand up two [hills or] cisterns, as it were, but a little distant one from another; the one of which sends out a fountain that is very cold, and the other sends out one that is hot; which waters, when they are mingled together, compose a most pleasant bath: they are medicinal, indeed, for other maladies, but especially good for strengthening the nerves. This place has in it also mines of sulphur.

4. Now when Bassus had taken a full view of this place, he resolved to besiege it, by filling up the valley that lay on the east side; so he fell hard to work, and took great pains to raise his banks as soon as possible, and by that means to render the siege easy. As for the Jews, that were caught in this place, they separated themselves from the strangers that were with them, and those strangers, an otherwise useless multitude, to stay in the lower part of the city, and undergo the principal dangers, while they themselves seized on the upper citadel, and held it, and this both on account of its strength, and as a provision for their safety. They also supposed they might obtain their pardon, in case they should [at last] surrender the citadel. However, they were willing to make trial in the first place, whether the hopes they had of avoiding a siege, and taking any thing with intention they made sallies every day, and fought with those that met them, in which conflicts there were many of them slain, as they therein slew many of the Romans. But still it was the opinion of the severer party, or those who chiefly gained both sides their victories; these were gained by the Jews, when they fell upon the Romans as they were off their guard; but by the Romans, when upon the others' sallies against the banks they forewore their coats, and were upon their guard when they received them. But the conclusion of this siege did not depend upon these bickerings; but a certain surprising accident, relating to what was done in this siege, forced to be the tender of the city. There was a certain young man among the besieged, of great boldness, and very active of his hand; his name was Eleazar. He greatly signified himself in these sallies, and encouraged the Jews to go out in great numbers, in order to hinder the raising of the banks, and did the Romans a vast deal of mischief when they came to fighting; he so managed matters, that those who sallied out met with him valiantly, and returned by without danger, and this by still bringing up the rear himself. Now it happened that on a certain time, when the fight was over, and both sides were parted, and retired home, he, in way of conducting the enemy and this being that none of them would begin the fight again at that time, stood without the gates, and talked with those that were upon the wall, and his mind was wholly intent upon what they said. Now a certain person, before the Roman camp, whose name was Rufus, by birth a man of a weak constitution, was attacked one day suddenly, when nobody expected such a thing, and carried him off, with his armor itself; while in the mean time those that saw it from the camp did not believe such an ammunition, that Rufus prevented their assistance, and carrieată Lazzezor to the Roman camp. So the general of the Romans ordered that he should be taken naked, set before the city to be seen, and that none should henceforth give him any help. Upon this sad accident that befell the younger man, the Jews were terribly confounded, and the city with one voice sorely lamented him, and the mourning proved greater than could well be supposed among so many virtuous persons. But as Bessus perceived that, he began to think of using some stratagem against the enemy, and was desirous to aggravate their grief, in order to prevail with them to surrender the city for the preservation of that man. Now did he fail of his former artifice, and commanded them to set up a cross, as if he were just going to hang Eleazar upon it immediately; the sight of this occasioned a sore grief among those that were there in the city, and they groaned and cried piteously, and cried out, the other bear to see him thus destroyed. Whereas Eleazar besought them not to disregard him, now he was going to suffer a most miserable death, but desired them to save themselves by yielding to the Roman power, and Roman power was so humane, since all other people were now conquered by them. These men were greatly moved with what he said, there being also many within the city that desired for him, because he was of an eminent and very numerous family; so they now yielded to their passion of commiseration, contrary to their usual custom. Accordingly they sent out immediately certain messengers, and those that were of the command of the citadel to them, and desired that they might be permitted to go away and take Eleazar along with them. Then did the Romans send their general accept of these terms, while the multitude of strangers that were in the lowest part of the city, hearing of the agreement that was made by the Jews for themselves alone, were resolved to fly away privately in the night-time; but as soon as they had opened their gates, those within shut them up, and did not suffer any of them to go out of fear, lest an occasion should be taken against them upon their escape, is uncertain. The most of them were therefore killed, or they were cut off prevented the enemy, and got away, and fled for it; but for those men that were caught within they were slain, to the number of one thousand seven hundred, as were the women and children mingled with them, as Bessus thought, but this perform the covenant he had made with those that had surrendered the citadel, he let them go and restored Eleazar to them.

5. When Bessus had settled these affairs, he moved against the city of Jarden, as it is called: for he had heard that a great many of those that had fled from Jerusalem and Macherus formerly, were there gotten together. When he was therefore come to the place, and understood that the former news was no mistake, he, in the first place, surrounded the whole place with his horsemen, that such of the Jews as had boldness enough to try to break through, might have so many horsemen on both sides of them, that they never could break through, the situation of their horsemen; and for the footmen he ordered them to cut down the trees that were in the wood whither they were fled. So the Jews were under a necessity of performing some service for themselves, and greatly exposing themselves in a battle, since they might perhaps thereby escape. So they made a general attack and with a great shout fell upon those that surrundered them, who received them with great courage; and while the one side fought des- perately, the other expected it would be over before that was prolonged on that account. But the event of the battle did not answer the expectation of the assailants; for so it happened that no more than twelve fell on the Roman side, with a few that were wounded; but not one of the Jews was either killed or captured out of this battle, but they were all killed, being in the whole not fewer in number than three thousand, together with Judas the son of Jairus, their general, concerning whom we have before mentioned that he had got a certain band at the siege of Jerusalem, and by going down into a certain vault under ground, had privately made his escape.

Josephus says that was Caesar sent a letter to Bases, and to Liberius Maximus, who was the procurator [of Juden], and gave orders that all Judea should be exposed to sale: for he did act not any city there, but reserved the country, or himself. Nor hear, he assigned a place for eight hundred men only, whom he had dismissed from his army, which he gave them for their habitation: it is called Emmaus, and is distant from Jerusalem threescore furlongs. He also ordered that the guards of the day should always remain over them, and enjoined every one of them to bring two drachmes every year into the capital, as they used to pay the same to the temple at Jerusalem. And this was the state of the Jewish affairs at this time.

3. Now when Antiochus was come to Tarresus in Cilicia, Petus ordered a centurion to go by night to Tarus, and send him a message to Rhus. But Vespasian could not endure to have a king brought to him in that manner, but thought it fit rather to have a regard to the ancient friendship that had been between them, than to preserve an inexpressible honour of himself, and his centurion. Accordingly, he gave orders that they should take off his bonds, while he was still upon the road, and that he should not come to Rome, but should now go and live at Lacedemon; he also gave him large revenues, that he might not only live in plenty, but like a king also. When Ephiphanes, who before was in great fear for his father, was informed of this, their minds were freed from all that great and almost incurable concern they had been vexed with. Therefore, when this would be reconciled to them, upon the intercessions of Vologes, for although he lived in plenty, he knew not how to bear living out of the Roman empire. So Caesar gave him leave, after an obliing may, and he came to Rome; and as his father came quickly to him from Lacedemon, he had all sorts of respect paid him there, and there he remained.
4. Now there was a nation of the Alans, which we have formerly mentioned somewhere, as being Scythians, and inhabiting at the lake Moctis. This nation about this time laid a design of falling upon Media and the parts beyond it, in order to plunder them; with which intention they entered into alliance with the king of Hircania; for he was a son of the master of that passage which king Alexander [the Great] shut up with iron gates. The king gave them leave to come through them: so they came in great multitudes, and fell upon the Medes, and plundered, and took the cattle; which they found full of people, and replenished with abundance of cattle, while nobody durst make any resistance against them; for Pocorus, the king of the country, had fled away for fear, into places where they could not easily come at him, and had yielded up every thing he had to them, and had only saved his wife and his concubines from them, and that with difficulty also, after they had been made captives, by giving them a hundred talents for their ransom. These Alans therefore plundered the country without opposition, and with great ease, and proceeded as far as Armenia, laying all waste before them. But the latter was king of the country, who met them, and fought them, but had like to have been taken alive in the battle: for a certain man threw a net over him from a great distance, and had soon drawn him to him, unless he had immediately accorded with his sword and run away, and prevented it. So the Alans, being still more provoked by this sight, laid waste the country, and drove a great multitude of the men, and a great quantity of other prey they had gotten out of both kingdoms, along with them, and then retreated back to their own country.

CHAP. VIII.

Concerning Masada, and those Sicarii who kept it; and how Silva betook himself to form the Siege of that Citadel. Eleanor's Speeches to the besieged.

1. When Bassus was dead in Judea, Flavius Silva succeeded him as procurator there: when he saw that all the rest of the country was subdued in this war, and that there was but only one strong bold that was still in rebellion, he got all his army together that lay in different places, and marched towards the opposition against it. This fortress was called Masada. It was one Eleazar, a potent man, and the commander of these Sicarii, that had seized upon it. He was a descendent from the Hebrews, and had persuaded abundance of the Jews, as we have formerly related, not to submit to the taxation when Cyrenius was sent into Judea to make one; for then it was that the Sicarii got together against those that were willing to submit to the Romans, and treated them in all respects as if they had been their enemies, both by plundering them of what they had, by driving away their cattle, and by setting fire to their houses; for they said, that they differed not at all from the Romans, the barbarians, so covetous in manner, that freedom which the Jews thought worthy to be contend for to the utmost, and by owning that they preferred slavery under the Romans before such a contention. Now, this was in reality no better than a pretence, and a cloak for the barbarity which was made use of by them; and to color over their own avarice, which they afterward made evident by their own actions; for those that were partners with them in their contention, joined also with them in the war against the Romans, and went farther lengths with them in their impudent undertakings against them; and when they were again convicted of dissembling in such their pretense, they still more abused those that justly reproached them for their wickedness. And, indeed, that was a time most fertile in all manner of wicked practices, insomuch that no kind of evil deeds were then left undone; nor could one so much as devise any bad thing that was new, so deeply were they all infected, and strove with one another in their single capacity, and in their communities, who should run the greatest danger, and undertake the greatest actions towards their neighbors, the men of power oppressing the multitude, and the multitude earnestly laboring to destroy the men of power. The one part were destros of tyrannising, and the other wished to be at the head of all the rest, and others, and of plundering such as were richer than themselves. They were the Sicarii who first began these transgressions, and first became barbarous towards those allied to them, and left no words of repentence, and no sentence of expiation untired, in order to destroy those whom their contrivances affected. Yet did John demonstrate by his actions that these Sicarii were more moderate than he was himself, for he not only slew all such as gave him good counsel to do what was right, but treated them worst of all, as the most bitter enemies that he had among all the citizens; nay, he filled his entire country with fear; and to save his life, he had not only fled to Syria, as a man who was already hardened sufficiently in his impiety towards God would naturally do; for the food was unlawful that was set upon his table, and he rejected those purifications that the law commanded. He has been no longer a wonder if he, who was so mad in his impiety towards God, did not observe any rules of gentleness and common affection towards men. Again, therefore, what mischief he did, among them, Simon the son of Judas did not do? or what kind of abuses did he abstain from as to those very freemen who had set him up for a tyrant? What friendship or kindred were there that did not make him more bold in his sin, or that did not make men for the doing of mischief to strangers only as a work beneath their courage, but thought their barbarity towards their nearest relations would be a glorious demonstration thereof. The Idumeans also strove with these men, who should be guilty of the greatest madness; for they [all] vext violece they were, cut the throats of the high priests, that so no part of a religious regard to God might be had a place; they proceeded to destroy utterly the least remains of a profession, and introduced the most complete scene of iniquity in all instances that were practicable, under which scene, that sort of people that were intrusted with the most sacred places, were impudently applied to the meanest; for they imitated every wicked work; nor if their memory suggested any evil thing that had formerly been done, did they avoid zealously to pursue the same: and although they gave themselves that name from their zeal for what was good, yet did it agree to them only by way of irony, on account of those they had unjustly treated by their wild and brutal disposition, or as thinking the greatest mischief that they could do to the innocent was no more than they could do to the subjects of those who fell under these men's barbarity, this is not a proper place for it; I therefore now return again to the remaining part of the present narration.

2. For now it was that the Roman general came, and led his army against Eleazar and those Sicarii who held the fortress Masada together with him; and for the whole country of joining, he presently gained it, and put garrison inside the most proper places of it: he also built a wall quite round the entire fortress, that none of the besieged might easily escape: he also set his name in cany on the several parts of it: he also pitched his camp in such an agreeable place as he had chosen for the siege, and at which place the rock belonging to the fortress did make the nearest approach to the neighboring mountain, whereby there was no danger of the besiegers having plenty of provisions: for it was not only food that was to be brought from a great distance [to the arry,] and this with a great deal of pains to those Jews who were appointed for that purpose, but water was a-care of, and very difficult to get, as cause the place afforded no fountain that was near it. When therefore Silvà had ordered these affairs beforehand, he fell to besieging the place; which siege was likely to stand in need of a great deal of skill and pains, by reason of the strength of the fortress, the nature of which I will now describe.

3. There was a rock, not small in circumference, and very high. It was encompassed with wood and bushes up to the very top, so that the eye could not reach their bottoms: they were abrupt, and such as no animal could walk upon, excepting at two places of the rock, where it served for a passage for ascent, though not without difficulty. Not only there was a passage that lead to it, one is that from the lake Asphaltitis, towards the sunrising, and another on the west, where the ascent is easier: the one of these was covered with the leaves of the tree that animal in its narrowness and its perpetual windings; for it is broken off at the prominent precipes of the rock, and returns frequently into itself, and lengthening again by little and little, hath made it so narrow that for a very small pace he that would walk along it must first go on one and then on the other: there is also nothing but destruction, in case your feet slip; for on each side there is a vastly deep chasm and precipice. There is not upon the entire rock any other body by the terror it infuses into the mind.
When therefore, a man hath gone along this way for thirty furlongs, the rest is the top of the hill, not ending at a small point; but is no other-thing than a vast tongue of rock, called Mount Masada. Upon this top of the hill Jonathan the high priest first of all built a fortress, and called it Masada; after which the rebuilding of this place was taken up, and did conceal itself from the eyes of the enemy, and was of great degree:
he also built a wall round about the entire top of the hill, seven furlongs long: it was composed of white stone; its height was twelve, and its breadth eight cubits; there were about it, placed upon the wall, eight gates:
each of them fifty cubits high; out of which you might pass into lesser edifices, which were built	on the inside, round the entire wall; for the king reserved the top of the hill, which was of a fat soil, and better suited than any valley for agriculture, that such as committed themselves to this fortress for their preservation, might not even there be quite destitute of food, in case they should ever be in want of it from abroad. More-evertheless, he also put corners towers; sixty cubits high.
The furniture also of the edifices of the cloisters, and of the baths, was of great variety, and very costly; and these buildings were sup-sported by pillars of single stones on every side; it was also so that the doors of the edifices was paved with stones of several colors. He also had cut many and great pits, as reservoirs for water, out of the rocks, at every one of the places that were inhabited, both above and round about the place, and before the place; and by this confidence he endeavored to have water for several uses, as if there had been no fountajas there. Here was also a road dug from the palace, and leading to the very top of the mountain, which yet could not be seen by such as were without [the walls:] nor, indeed, could eneemies easily make their way to the road on the east side, as we have already noticed, could not be walked upon by reason of its nature: and for the western road, he built a market place of large tower, that had no distance from the top of the hill than a thousand cubits; which tower could not possibly be passed by, nor could it be easily taken; nor, indeed, could those that walked along it, without any tear, such was the lightness of their bodies, get to the end of it; and after such a manner was this citadel fortified, both by nature and by the hands of men, in order to frustrate the attacks of enemies.

4. As for the furniture that was within this fortress, it was still more wonderful, on account its splendor and long continuance; for here was laid up corn in great quantities, and such as would subsist men for a long time; here was wine and oil in abundance, with all kinds of pulse and dates baked up together: Persia had supplied for it, and the king had given an order for the 帅 found where, and he and his Sicaarii got possession of the fortress by treachery. These fruits were also fresh and full ripe, and no way inferior to any that was lain in, ally, in which there were little short of a hundred viæ* found laying in these provisions, [by Herod] till the place was taken by the Romans; nay, indeed, when the Romans got possession of those fruits that were lying under the earth, they were very all that while; nor should we be mistaken, if we suppose that the air was here the cause of their enduring so long: this fortress being so high, and so free from the mixture of all terrane and mad-ders. Thus also was there a large amount of all sorts of weapons of war, which had been treasured up by that king, and were sufficient for ten thousand men; there was cast iron, and brass, and tin, which show that he had taken much pains to have his forces here ready for the greatest occasions; for the report goes how Herod thus prepared this fortress on his own account, as a refuge against two kinds of danger, the one for fear of the multitude of the Jews, lest they should depose him and restore their former kings to the government; the other danger was greater and more terrible, which arose from Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, who did have the intention, but which, as we have said, tony, and desired him to cut off Herod, and entreated him to bestow the kingdom of Judea upon her. And certainly it is a great wonder that Antony did never comply with her commands in this point, as he was so miserably enslaved to his passion for her; nor should any one have been surprised if she had been gratified in such her request. So the fear of these dangers made Herod rebuild Masada, and thereby leave it for a finishing stroke of the Romans in this Jewish war.

5. Since therefore the Roman commander Sla-va had now built a wall on the outside, round about this whole place, as we have said, and had thereby made a most accurate provision to prevent any one of the besieged running away, bekind future the siege himself, though he found but one single place that would admit of the men to run off; and he also found cured the road that led to the palace, and to the top of the hill, from the west, there was a certain eyuency of the rock, very broad and very prominent, but three hundred cubits beneath the highest parts of Masada; it was all the White Monitory. Accordingly he got upon that part of the rock, and ordered the army to bring earth;
and when they fell to that work with alacrity, and abundance of them together, the bank was raised, and became solid for two hundred cubits in height. Yet was not this bank thought sufficiently high for the use of the engines that were to be set upon it; but still another elevated work of great stones compacted together was raised upon that bank; this was fifty cubits, both in breadth and height. The other machines that were now got ready, were like to those that had been taken from the Jews by Titus, and afterward by Titus, for sieges. There was also a tower made of the height of sixty cubits, and over piled with iron, out of which the Romans threw their shot and engines from. Soon made those that fought from the walls of the place to retire, and would not let them lift up their heads above the works. At the same time Silva ordered that great battering-ram which he had made to be brought thither, and to be driven against the wall, and to make frequent batteries against it, which, with some difficulty, broke down a part of the wall and quite overthrew it. However, the Sicarii made haste, and presently built a wall of the same manner and as sound as the other, and made it as strong and impenetrable as the wall of the tower. Now, that the earth might not fall away upon the elevation of this bank to a greater height, they fastened other beams upon those beams, and thereby bound those beams together that lay lengthways. This work of theirs was like a real edifice; and when the machines were applied, the blows were weakened by its yielding, and as the beams, which the foresaw were shaken closer together, the pile by that means became firmer than before. When Silva saw this, he thought it best to endeavor the taking of this wall by setting fire to it: so he gave order that the soldiers should wage a fire upon it, and so burning torches upon it; accordingly, as it was chiefly made of wood, it soon took fire; and when it was once set on fire, its hollowness made that fire spread to a mighty flame. Now at the very beginning of the new wind, which proved terrible to the Romans; for, by bringing the flame downward, it drove it upon them, and they were almost in despair of success, as fearing the things that would be burnt: but after this, on a sudden, the wise men sent that sea of fire into the south, as if it were done by Divine Providence, and blew strongly the contrary way, and carried the flame, and drove it against the wall, which was now on fire through its entire thickness. So the Romans, having now assistance from God, returned to their camp with joy, and resolved to attack their enemies the very next day; on which occasion they set their watch more carefully; but any of the others should let us away from them without being discovered.

6. However, neither did Eleazar once think of flying away, nor would be permit any one else to do so; but when he saw their wall burned down, and the fire spread on every side, and could drive away no farther way of escaping, or room for their farther courage, and setting before their eyes what the Romans would do to them, their children, and their wives, if they got them into their power, he counselled them to and all. Now, as he judged this to be the best thing they could do in their present circumstances, he gathered the most courageous of his companions together, and encouraged them to take that course by a speech which he made to them in a manner following: "Since we, long ago, my generous friends, resolved never to be servants to the Romans, nor to any other than to God himself, who alone is the true and just Lord of mankind, the time is now come that we have the power to fight against them, and after- ward by Titus, for sieges. There was also a tower made of the height of sixty cubits, and over piled with iron, out of which the Romans threw their shot and engines from. Soon made those that fought from the walls of the place to retire, and would not let them lift up their heads above the works. Now, as he judged would be a great grief to the Romans, that they shall not be able to seize upon our bodiés, and shall fail of our wealth also: and let us spare nothing but our provision for them; for they tell us testimonial when we are dead, that we were not subdued for want of necessaries, but that, according to our original resolution, we have preference to death before slavery.

7. This Eleazar besought them. Yet did not the opinions of all the auditors acquiesce therein: but although some of them were very zealous to put his advice in practice, and were anxious to provide for their security, they thought death to be a good thing, yet had those that were most effeminate a commiseration for their wives and families; and when these men were especially moved by the prospect of their own death, and of the taking away of another, and by the tears that were in their eyes, declared their dissent from his opinion. When Eleazar saw these people in such fear, and that their souls were deceived at so prodigious a proposal, he was afraid lest perhaps these effeminate persons should by their lamentations and tears enfeeble those that heard what he had said courageously; so he did not leave off exhorting them, but stirred himself up, and recollecting proper rules of doctrine for their case, determined to speak more briskly and fully to them, and that concerning the immortality of the soul. So he made a lamentable groan, and fixing his eyes intently on those that wept, he spoke thus:

"My countrymen and fellow-citizens, why do you put any trust in death, and supinely undergo the time of life and look upon it as a necessary servitude, and make haste to let their souls loose from their bodies? nay, when no misfortune presses them to it, nor drives them out of themselves, and cause such as these, men and women, mortality, that they tell other men beforehand that they are about to depart; and nobody hinderers them, but every one thinks them happy men, and gives them letters to be carried to their familiar friends [that are dead]; so firmly and certainly do they believe that souls converse with one another in the [other world.] So when these men have heard all such commands that were to be given them, they deliver their body to the fire, and make separation from the body in the greatest purity, they die in the midst of hymns of commendation made to them; for their dearest friends conduct them to their death more readily than do any of the rest of mankind conduct their friends when they are going a very long journey, who at the same time weep on their own account, but look upon the others as happy persons, as so soon to be made partners of the immortal order of beings. Are we wise, or not? Are we in lower notions than the Indians? and by our own cowardice to lay a base reproach upon the laws of our country, which are so much desired and imitated by all mankind? But put the case that once a God had made war on us, and that war we had been already made upon, and you say, and taught that life is the greatest good which men are capable of, and that death is a calamity; however, the circumstances we are now in ought to be as inducement to us to bear such calamity courageously, since it is by the will of God, and by necessity, that we are to die; for it now appears that God hath made such a decree against the whole Jewish nation, that we are to be deprived of this life which he knew we would not make a due use of. For do we not use the occasion of our present condition to yourselves, nor think the Romans are the true occasion that this war we have had with them is become so destructive to us all; the things that have come to pass by the power, but the powerful cause hath intervened, and made us afford them an occasion of their appearing to be conquerors over us. What Roman weapons, I pray you, were those, by which you Jews of Jerusalem were slain? On the contrary, when they were no way disposed to rebel, but were all the while keeping their seventh day festival, and did not suffer so much as to lift up their hands against the citizens, of Jerusalem, yet did they make war upon them in great crowds, and cut their throats, and the throats of their wives and children, and this without any regard to the Romans themselves; who never took us for their enemies till then. Wherefore, you see how little our good-will and fidelity to them profited us, while they were also by their alliance to him; they then go everywhere, and foretell many futurities beforehand. And why are we afraid of death, while we are pleased with the rest we have in sleep, and how absurd a thing it is to pursue after liberty while we are alive, and yet to envy it to ourselves where it will be eternal? We, therefore, who have been brought up in a discipline of our own, ought to become fearful of nothing, but ready to die. Yet, if we do stand in need of foreigners to support us in this matter, let us regard those Indians who profess the exercise of the sacred Pilots; by their godly advice, and looking upon the time of life and look upon it as a necessary servitude, and make haste to let their souls loose from their bodies: nay, when no misfortune presses them to it, nor drives them out of themselves, and cause such as these, men and women, mortality, that they tell other men beforehand that they are about to depart; and nobody hinderers them, but every one thinks them happy men, and gives them letters to be carried to their familiar friends [that are dead]; so firmly and certainly do they believe that souls converse with one another in the [other world.] So when these men have heard all such commands that were to be given them, they deliver their body to the fire, and make separation from the body in the greatest purity, they die in the midst of hymns of commendation made to them; for their dearest friends conduct them to their death more readily than do any of the rest of mankind conduct their friends when they are going a very long journey, who at the same time weep on their own account, but look upon the others as happy persons, as so soon to be made partners of the immortal order of beings. But put the case that once a God had made war on us, and that war we had been already made upon, and you say, and taught that life is the greatest good which men are capable of, and that death is a calamity; however, the circumstances we are now in ought to be as inducement to us to bear such calamity courageously, since it is by the will of God, and by necessity, that we are to die; for it now appears that God hath made such a decree against the whole Jewish nation, that we are to be deprived of this life which he knew we would not make a due use of. Wherefore, you see how little our good-will and fidelity to them profited us, while they were also ple dug up after so profane a manner. But since we had a generous hope that defiled us, as if we might, perhaps, have been able to avenge ourselves upon our enemies on that account, though it be now become security, and have left us all in this distress, let us make haste to die bravely. Let us pity ourselves, our children, and our wives, while it is in our own power to show pity to them; for we were born to die, as well as they were who have been written; nor is it in the power of the most happy of our race to avoid it. But for abuses and slavery, and the sight of our wives led away after an ignominious manner, with their children, these are not such evils as these. Although such as do not prefer death before those miseries, when it is in their power so to do, must undergo even them on account of their own cows and children, as the Romans with great pretensions to courage; and when at the very last they invited us to preserve ourselves, we would not comply with them. Who will not, therefore, believe that they will certainly be in a rage at us, in case they can take us alive? Miserable will then be the young men who will be strong enough in their bodies to sustain many torments; miserable also will be those elder years, who will not be able to bear those calamities. Therefore, if you Romans with great haste, and, instead of affording them so much pleasure as they hope for in getting us under their power, let us leave them an example which shall at once cause their astonishment at our death, and their admiration of our hardness therein.

CHAP. IX.
How the People that were in the Fortress were prevailed on by the Words of Eleeasar, two Women and five Children only excused, and all submitted to be killed by one another.

1. Now, as Eleeasar was proceeding in this exhortation, they all cut him off short, and made haste to do the work, as full of an unconquered ardor of mind, and moved with a demoniacal fury. So they went their ways, as one still desiring to be before another, and as thinking that this eagerness would be a demonstration of their quickness and good conduct if they could avoid appearing in the last class; so great was the zeal they were in to slay their wives, and children, and themselves also. Nor indeed, when they came to the work itself did their courage fail them, as one might imagine it was done; but they then held fast the same resolution without wavering, which they had upon the hearing of Eleeasar's speech, while yet every one of them reflected that what resolved them now was to themselves and their families, because the reasoning they went upon appeared to them to be very just, even with regard to those that were dearest to them; for the husbands tenderly embraced their wives, and took their children into their arms, and gave the longest parting kisses to them, with tears in their eyes. Yet at the same time did they completely what they had read to the Jewish rabbins: "We are born that we may die, and die that we may live." thougt it were done to their enemies. Nor could they do other than under the courage of their resolution, and the immovable contemt of death which so great a number of them had shown, when they went through with such an action as that was.

CHAP. X.

That many of the Sicarii fled to Alexandria also, and what Dangers they were in there; on which account, that Temple, which had formerly been built by Onias the High Priest, was destroyed.

1. When Masada was thus taken, the general left a garrison in the fortress to keep it, and he himself went to Caesarea; for there were now no enemies in the country, but the Romans were overthrown by so long a war. Yet did this war afford disturbances and dangerous disorders even in places very far remote from Judæa; for still it came to pass, that many Jews were slain at Alexandria in Egypt; for many of the Sicarii were able to fly thither, out of the sedicious wars in Judæa, were not content to have saved themselves, but must needs be undertaking to make new disturbances and persecution. They that entertained them to assert their liberty, to esteem the Romans to be not better than themselves, and to look upon God as their only Lord and Master. But when part of the Jews of repute, that took them to the enemy, and they and the others they were very pressing in their exhortations to revolt from the Romans; but when the principal men of the senate saw what madness they were come to, they thought nothing but for themselves; and they sent to Caesarea to Masada, and he who was the last of all took a view of all the other bodies, lest perchance some or other among so many that were slain should want his assistance to be quite despatched, and when he perceived that they were all slain, he set fire to the house, the palace, and with the great force of his hand ran his sword entirely through himself, and fell down dead near to his own relations. So these people died with this intention, that they would leave also, that they might show alive to the Romans. Yet was there an ancient woman, and another who was of kin to Eleazar, and superior to most women in prudence and learning, with five children, who had concealed themselves in caverns under ground, and had carried water thither for their drink, and were hidden there when the rest were lastest upon the slaughter of one another. Those others were nine hundred and sixty in number, those being the number included in that computation. This calamitous slaughter was made on the fifteenth day of the month Xanthisus [Nisan].

3. For the Romans, they expected that they should be fought in the morning, when according they put on their armor, and laid bridges of planks upon their ladders from their banks, to make an assault upon the fortress, which they did; but saw nobody as an enemy, but a terrible solitude on every side, with a fire within the place, as well as a perfect silence. So they were at a loss to guess at what had happened. At length they made a shout, as if it had never been. Then did they find one could not get at the house, nor enter it, nor whether they could bring any one out that was within: the women heard this noise, and came out of their underground caverns, and informed the Romans what had been done, as it was done: and nine of them of the women, all both what was said and what was done, and the manner of it: yet did they not easily give their attention to such a desperate undertaking, and did not believe it could be as they said; they also attended to the force of the territorial army, and saw themselves a way through it, they came within the palace, and so met with the multitude of the slain, but could take no pleasure in the fact.

4. Since Josephus here informs us, that some of these Sicarii or ruffians went from Alexandria (which was itself in Egypt, in a large sense) into Egypt and Thebes, there situated, Roland well observes from Josuia, that Egypt sometime doth Proper or Upper Egypt, as distinct from Delta and the lower parts near Palestine. Accordingly, as he adds, those that say it never raises in Egypt, must mean the Proper or Upper Egypt, because it doth sometimes rain in the other parts. See the notes on Antiq. B. II. ch. vii. sect. 7; and B. iii. ch. i. sect. 3. presently sent Caesar word of this commotion, who having in suspicion the restless temper of the Jews for innovation, and being afraid lest they should get together again, and persuade some others to join with them, gave orders to Lupus to demolish that Jewish temple which was in the region called Onia, and the garments which were there, and the image of Jupiter which was in Egypt; which was built, and had its denomination from the occasion following: Onias, the son of Simon, one of the Jewish high priests, fled from Antiochus the king of Syria, when he made war with the Jews, and came to Alexandria; and as Ptolemy received him very kindly on account of his hatred to Antiochus, he assured him, that if he would comply with his proposal, he would bring him to his service, and when the king agreed to do it so far as he was able, he desired him to give him leave to build a temple somewhere in Egypt, and to worship God according to the customs of his own country; for than he was given leave to his own country, for than he was given leave to his own country. And when he was brought to Catullus, he devised a way whereby he both escaped punishment himself, and afforded an occasion to Catullus of doing much mischief, for he falsely accused the religious Jews, and said that they had put him upon what he did.

3. So Ptolemy complied with his proposals, and gave him a place one hundred and eighty furlongs distant from Memphis. That Nomos was called the Nomos of Heliopolis, where Onias built a temple dedicated to the god of Jerusalem, but such as resembled a tower. He built it of large stones, to the height of sixty cubits; he made the structure of the altar in imitation of that in our own country, and in like manner, adapted a large oil lamp, and a candlestick, for he did not make a candlestick, but had a [single] lamp hammered out of a piece of gold, which illuminated the place with its rays, and which he hung by a chain of gold; but the edifice was not so well compounded as a wall of burnt brick, though it had gates of stone. The king also gave him a large country for a revenue in money, that both the priests might have a plentiful provision to be kept, and that God might have great abundance of what things were necessary for his worship. Yet did not Onias do this out of a sober disposition, but he had a mind to contend with the Jews at Jerusalem, and to make them for the indignation they had for their banished thence. Accordingly he thought that by building this temple he should draw away a great number from them to himself. There had been also a certain ancient prediction made by [a prophet] of the Jews, and it was twenty-six hundred and forty years before that, this temple should be built by a man that was a Jew, is Egypt. And this is the history of the building of that temple.

4. And now Lupus, the governor of Alexandria, upon the receipt of these be good news, came to the temple, and carried out of it some of the donations dedicated thereto, and shut up the temple itself. And as Lupus died a little afterward, Paulinus succeeded him. This man left none of those destructions, and the priests were not suffered so severely if they did not bring them all out; nor did he permit any who were devoted of worshipping God there, so much as to come near the walls of that place. But when he had shut up the gates, he made it entirely inaccessible, insomuch that there remained no longer the least footsteps of any divine worship that had been in that place. Now the duration of the time from the building of that temple that was shut up again, was three hundred and forty-four years.

5. Of this temple of Onias's building in Egypt, see the notes on Ant. B. xii. ch. iii. sect. 1. But whereas it is elsewhere, both Of the War, ii. i. ch. i. sect. 1, and in the Antiquities, who new quoted, as is, that this temple was like to that at Jerusalem, and hence that it was not like it, but like a tower, sect. 3, there is a use reason to respect the reading here, and that either it a negative particle is here to be struck out, or the word entirely added.

6. We must observe, that Joseph goes more of Antiochus, who professed the temple, as now alive, when Onias had leave given him by Philometer to build his temple; whereas it seems not to have been actually built till about fifteen years afterward. Yet bestrade, it is said in the Antiquities, that Onias went to Philometer, B. xii. ch. iii. sect. 7, during the lifetime of that Antiochus, it is probable he petitioned, and, perhaps obtained his leave thence, though it were not actually built till fifteen years afterward.
ANTIQUITY OF THE JEWS.

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS AGAINST APION.*

BOOK I.

1. I suppose that my books of the Antiquities of the Jews, most excellent Eppaphroditus, have made it evident to those that pursue the same subject that they shall also arrive at that antiquity, and have a distinct subsistence of its own originally: as also, I have therein declared, how we came to inhabit this country wherein we now live. These Antiquities contain the history of five thousand years, and are taken out of our sacred books, but are translated by me into the Greek tongue. However, since I observe a considerable number of people giving ear to the reproaches that are laid against us by those who bear ill-will to us, it will not believe while I have written concerning the Antiquity of our nation, while they take it for a plain sign that our nation is of a late date, because they are not so much as vouchsafed a bare mention by the most famous historians among the Grecians; I therefore have thought myself under an obligation to write somewhat briefly about these subjects, in order to convict those that reproach us, of spite and voluntary falsehood, and to correct the ignorance of others, the most learned, acute, and useful books of all antiquity; and upon Jerome’s personal and the following books, he declares, that “it seems to him a marvellous thing, how one that was a Hebræo, who had been from his infancy instructed in sacred learning, should be able to produce such a number of facts.”

As for the witnesses upon whom I shall produce for the proof of these things, there will be such as are deemed to be of the greatest reputation for truth, and the most skilful in the knowledge of all antiquity, by the Greeks themselves. I will also show that those who have written so reproachfully and falsely about us, are to be convicted by what they have written themselves to the contrary. I have already spoken many reasons why it hath so happened, that there have not been a great number of Greeks who have made mention of our nation in their histories; I will, however, bring those Grecians to light, who have not omitted such our history, for the sake of those that either do not know them, or pretend not to know them already.

2. And now, in the first place, I cannot but greatly wonder at those men, who suppose that we must attend to none but Grecians, when we are inquiring about the most ancient facts, and must inform ourselves of their truth from them only, while we must not believe ourselves nor other men; for I am convinced, that the very reverse is the truth of the case: I mean this, if we will not be led by vain opinions, but will make inquiry after truth from facts themselves; for they will find, that almost all which concerns the Greeks happened not long ago; nay, some, say, is of yesterday. For it is nothing less than a bulwark of their cities, the inventions of their arts, and the description of their laws; and as for their care about the writing down of their histories, it is very near the least thing they set upon. However, they acknowledge themselves so far, that they were the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, and the Phœnicians, (for I will not now reckon antiquity of the Jewish nation. As to the place, they all imagine that those two books were written where the former were, I mean at Rome; and I confess, that I myself believed both these communications till I came to find my notes upon these books, when I met with plain indications that they were written not at Rome, but in Judea, and this after the days of Tiberius, or indeed in A.D. 190.

ourselves among them,) that have preserved the memorials of the most ancient and most lasting traditions of mankind; for almost all these nations inhabit such countries as are least subject to destruction from the world about them: and these also have taken especial care to have nothing omitted of what was [remarkably] done among them, but their history was esteemed sacred, and put into public tables, as well as their greatest actions. Which the Greeks they had among them. But as for the place where the Grecians inhabit, ten thousand destructions have overthrown it, and blotted out the memory of former actions; so that they were ever beginning to be in want of the greatest actions they had among them. And as for the Grecians, it was also late, and with difficulty, that they came to know the letters they now use; for those that should advance their use of these letters to the greatest antiquity, pretend that they learned them from the Phoecians and from Cadmus; yet is nobody able to demonstrate that they have any writing preserved from that time, neither in any among them, monuments.

This appears, because the time when those lived who went to the Trojan war, so many years afterward, is in great doubt, and great inquiry is made, whether the Greeks used their letters long before; and the prevailing opinion, and that nearest the truth, is, that the present way of using those letters was unknown at that time. However, there is not any writing which the Greeks agree to be genuine among that period. Homer is the first writer who must be plainly confessed later than the siege of Troy; nay, the report goes, that even he did not leave the poems in writing, but that their memory was preserved in song among them, and they were put together afterward, and that this is the only manner of such a number of variations as are found in them. As for those who set themselves about writing their histories, I mean such as Cadmus of Miletus, and Autolycus of Argos; and others that may be mentioned as succeeding Acusilas, they lived but a little while before the Persian expedition into Greece. But then for those that first introduced philosophy, and the consideration of things divine and human, Thales, Pherecydes the Syrian, and Pythagoras and Thales, all with one consent agree, that they learned what they knew of the Egyptians and Chaldeans, and wrote but little. And these are the times at which the war was supposed to have been fought all among the Greeks; and they have much ado to believe that the writings ascribed to those men are genuine.

3. How can it then be other than an absurd thing for the Greeks to be so proud, and to vaunt themselves to be the only people that are acquainted with antiquity, and that have delivered the true accounts of those early times after an accurate manner! Nay, who is there that cannot easily gather from the Greek writers themselves, that they knew but little on any good foundation when they set to write, but rather wrote their histories from their own conjectures?

Accordingly they confute one another in their own books to purpose, and are not ashamed to give us the most contradictory accounts of the same things: and I should spend my time to little purpose, if I should pretend to go so far as the Greeks that which they know better than I already, what a great disagreement there is between Hellanicus and Acusilas about their genealogies: in how many cases Acusilas corrects the great stories they told to be false: and Nature demonstrates Hellanicus to have told lie in the greatest part of his history; as does Timaeus in like manner as to Ephorus, and the succeeding writers do to Timaeus, and all the latter writers, to Thucydides, and Thucydides to Antiochus and Philistius, or with Callius about the Sicilian history, no more than do the several writers of the Atticidde follow one another about the Athenians, nor does the historian the like that wrote the Argive history; and now what need I say more about particular cities and smaller places, while in the most approved writers of the Grecian states, scarcely one of the nation's history, which were therein performed, there are so great differences? Nay, Thucydides himself is accused by some as writing what is false, although he seems to have given us the exact history of it.

4. As for the occasion of so great a disagreement of theirs, there may be assigned many that are very probable, if any have a mind to make an inquiry about them; but I scribe those concerning their traditions that I shall now mention, and still think what I shall mention in the first place to be the principal of all. For we will remember, that in the beginning the Greeks had taken no care to have public records of their several states, and to contradict those who would tell of an event have afforded those that would afterward write about those ancient transactions, the opportunity of making mistakes, and the power of changing the records of such ancient transactions hath not only been neglected by the other states of Greece, but even among the Athenians themselves also, who pretend to be Aborigines, and to have applied themselves to the discovery and divine documents; and yet the same, as Heraclides the Syracusan, and Pythogoras and Thales, all with one consent agree, that they learned what they knew of the Egyptians and Chaldeans, and wrote but little. And these are the times at which the war was supposed to have been fought all among the Greeks; and they have much ado to believe that the writings ascribed to those men are genuine.

5. How can it then be other than an absurd thing for the Greeks to be so proud, and to vaunt themselves to be the only people that are acquainted with antiquity, and that have delivered the true accounts of those early times after an accurate manner! Nay, who is there that cannot easily gather from the Greek writers themselves, that they knew but little on any good foundation when they set to write, but rather wrote their histories from their own conjectures?

6. This preservation of Homer's poems by memory, and not by his own writing them down, and that these they were styled ἀναρεσκές, as sung by him, like balleis, by parts, and not composed and connected together to complete works, are opinions well known from the ancient commentators; and the same is supposed by myself, as well as to Fabriaciu, Biblioth. Gr. i. p. 260, and to others, highly improbable. Nor does Josephus any where write that he obtained the greater parts of his works from Homer's poems, but that they did not fully own any ancient writers pretending to such antiquity, which is true.

7. Let us consider the following: how all the following Greek historians looked on Herodotus as a fabulous author, and presentently, sect. 14, he must be accounted a historian, great in his history, greatly complains of his mistakes in the Egyptian affairs; as also that Strabo, B. ii. p. 307, the most accurate geographer and historian, esteemed him such; that ments to write history were not solicitous for the discovery of truth, although it was very easy for them always to make such a profession; but their business was to demonstrate that they could write well, and make an impression upon mankind thereby; and in what manner of writing they thought they were able to write. They were very fond of that to that did apply themselves. Some of them betook themselves to the writing of fabulous narrations; some of them endeavored to please the cities or the kings, by writing in their commendation; some for the correction of faults with transactions, or with the writers of such transactions, and thought to make a great figure by so doing. And indeed these do what is of all that is done in the world, and it is the great character of true history, that all concerned therein both speak and write the same things; while these men by writing differently about the same things, think they shall be believed. We write all along down to our time.

We, therefore, [who are Jews] must yield to the Greek writers as to language and eloquence of composition; but then we shall give them no such preference as to the verity of ancient history, and as to the past part of it, which concerns the affairs of our several countries.

6. As to the care of writing down the records from the earliest antiquity among the Egyptians and Babylonians; that the priests were intrusted therein was an accident of such a nature, that the providing the delivering down the history of common transactions, I think I may omit any proof, because all men allow it to be. But so as to our forefathers, the men of the nation were the keepers of such records, (for I will not say they took greater care than the others I spoke of,) and that they committed that matter to their high priests and to their prophets, and that these records have been written all along down to our time with the utmost accuracy; nay, if it be not too bold for me to say it, our history will be so written hereafter, I shall endeavor briefly to inform you.

Our forefathers did not only appoint the best of these priests, and those that attended upon the divine worship, for that design from the beginning, but made provision that the stock of the priests should continue unmixed and pure; for no Jew, the servant of the nation, is to propagate of a wife of the same nation, without having any regard to money, or any other dignities; but he is to make a scrutiny, and take his wife's genealogy from the ancient tables, and procure her to be a woman of the same stock, and whosoever our priests are scattered; for they

* It is here well worth our observation, what the reasons are that such ancient authors as Herodotus, Josephus, and others, have been read to so little purpose by many learned critics, viz. that their main aim has not been chronology or history, but philology, to know words and not things, they not much entering oftentimes into the substance of those things, and yet making the most accurate discoverers of truth, and most to be depended upon in their several histories, but rather inquiring who wrote the finest style and had the greatest elegance in their expressions, which are things of small consequence in comparison of the other. Thus, you will sometimes find them so conjecturing, that Herodotus or Thucydides were the finest historians in the Ionic and Attic ways of writing, which signify little as to the real values of each of their histories, while it would be of much more moment to let the reader know that, as the consequences of Herodotus's history, which begins so much send to Jerusalem the ancient names of their parents in writing, as well as those of their remotest ancestors, and signify who are the witnesses also. But if any war falls out, such as have fallen out a great many of them already, when Antiochus Epiphanes made an invasion upon our country, or as also when Pompeius, the Great and Quintillus Varus did so also, and principally in the wars that have happened in our own times; those priests that survive them compose near new tables of genealogy out of the records, and examine the births of the women that remain; for still they do not admit of those that have been captives, as suspecting that they had conversation with some foreigners.

But what is most strange is, that the management in this matter is what I am now going to say. That we have the names of our high priests from father to son set down in our records, for the interval of two thousand years; and the priests of Israel have habitually done in these rules, they are prohibited to present themselves at the altar, or to be partakers of any other of our purifications: and this is justly, or rather necessarily done, because every one is not permitted of to be a priest in our own nation; and there any disagreement in what is written; they being only prophets that have written the original and earliest accounts of things, as they learned them of God himself by inspiration; and these others have written what was the letter of their own time, and that in a very distinct manner also.

8. For we have not an innumerable multitude of books among us, disagreeing from and contradicting one another, [as the Greeks have.] but only twenty-two books of records of all the past times, which are justly believed to be divine. And of them, five belong to Moses, which contain his laws and the traditions of the original creation, and his death; the interval of time was little short of three thousand years; but as to the time from the death of Moses till the reign of Artaxerxes, king of Persia, who reigned after Xerxes; the prophets, who were after Moses, wrote when what was done in their times in thirteen books. The remaining four books contain hymns to God, and precepts for the conduct of human life. It is true, our history hath been written since Artaxerxes very particularly, but hath not been esteemed of the like authority with the former by our forefathers, because there hath not been an exact succession of prophets since that time: and how firmly we have given credit to these books of our own nation, is best known by what our present, or our many ages have as already passed, no one hath been so bold as either to add any thing to them, to take any thing from them, or to make any change in them; and it is become natural to all Jews, immediately and from their very birth, to esteem those books to contain divine doctrines, and to persist in them, and, if occasion be, willingly to die for them. For it is no new thing for our captives, many of us in number, and frequently in times, to seem to endure the utmost torture of all kinds upon the theatres, that they may earlier, and reaches so much wider than that of Thucydides, is, therefore, vastly greater; so is the most part of Thucydides, which belongs to his own time, and fell under his own observation, much the most certain.

† Of this accuracy of the Jews, before and in our behaviour's time, in carefully preserving their genealogies all along, as well as all those temporal, and political, and the most accurate discoverers of truth, and most to be depended upon in their several histories, but rather inquiring who wrote the finest style and had the greatest elegance in their expressions, which are things of small consequence in comparison of the other. Thus, you will sometimes find them so conjecturing, that Herodotus or Thucydides were the finest historians in the Ionic and Attic ways of writing, which signify little as to the real values of each of their histories, while it would be of much more moment to let the reader know that, as the consequences of Herodotus's history, which begins so much not be obliged to say one word against our laws and the records that contain them: whereas there are none at all among the Greeks who would undertake the least harm on that account, no, nor in case all the writings that are among them were to be destroyed; for they take them to be such discourses as are framed agreeably to the inclinations of those who write them; and there are no persons among them to estimate the ancients; since, they see some of the present generation bold enough to write about such affairs, whereas they were not present, nor had concern enough to inform themselves about them from those who were present, which may be bad in this late war of ours, where some persons have written histories and published them, without having been in the places concerned, or having been present at the transactions; but these men put a few things together by hearsay, and insolently abuse the world, and call these writings by the name of Histories.

9. As for myself, I have composed a true history of all the particulars that occurred therein, as having been concerned in all its transactions; for I acted as general of those among us that are named Galileans, as long as it was possible for us to make any opposition to the masses, consisting of men called Romans, and became a captive; Vespasian also and Titus had me kept under a guard, and forced me to attend them continually. At the first I was put in bonds, but was set at liberty afterward, and sent to accompany two to be carried to the siege of Jerusalem; during which time there was nothing done which escaped my knowledge; for what happened in the Roman camp, I saw, and wrote down carefully; and what happened in my own city, I wrote down; in A.D. 70, when Alexan. the last of the Jews revolted, and was put to death, I was the only man that understood them. Afterward I got leisure at Rome; and when all my materials were prepared for that work, I made use of some persons to assist me in learning the Greek tongue, and by these means I composed the history of these transactions. And I was so well assured of the truth of what I related, that I first of all appealed to those that had the supreme command in that war, Vespasian and Titus, as witnesses for me, for to them I presented those books first of all, and after them to many of the Romans who had been in the war. I also sold them to many of my own men who understood the language, and was not ashamed when those were Julius Archelaus, Herod (king of Chalcis) a person of great gravity, and king Agrippa himself, a person that deserved the greatest admiration. Now all these men bore their testimony to me, and the rest, and was not unacquainted, with any that would not have disseminated the matter, nor been silent, if I, out of ignorance, or out of favor to any side, either had given false colors to actions, or omitted any of them.

10. This have been indeed some bad men, who have attempted to calumniate my history, and took it to be a kind of scholastic performance, for the exercise of young men. A strange sort of accusation and calumny! since every effort is made to deliver the history of actions truly, ought to know them accurately himself in the first place, as either having been concerned in them himself, or been informed of them by such as knew them. Now both these methods of knowing things, are very proper to form the composition of both my works; for, as I said, I have translated the Antiquities out of our sacred books; which I easily could do, since I was a priest by my birth, and was much studied in philosophy, which is contained in the writings; and for the History of the War, I wrote it as having been an actor myself in many of its transactions, an eyewitness in the greatest part of them, and I put out with anything whatsoever, that was either said or done in it. How impudent then must those deserve to be esteemed, who undertake to contradict me about the true state of those affairs! who, although they pretend to have made use of both the emperor's own messengers, yet could they not be acquainted with our own affairs which he fought against them.

11. This digression I have been obliged to make out of necessity, as being desirous to expose the vanity of those that profess to write history; for it is not the opinion of the ancients, or the writers, since they see some of the present generation bold enough to write about such affairs, whereas they were not present, nor had concern enough to inform themselves about them from those who were present, which may be bad in this late war of ours, where some persons have written histories and published them, without having been in the places concerned, or having been present at the transactions; but these men put a few things together by hearsay, and insolently abuse the world, and call these writings by the name of Histories. For I shall also demonstrate that such as cast reproaches upon our nation do it very unjustly.

12. As for ourselves, therefore, we neither inhabit a country superior to that of the Romans, nor is there in any part of the world, either here or abroad, an instance for our antiquity out of the writings of foreigners, as I have already shewn. I shall also demonstrate that such as cast reproaches upon our nation do it very unjustly.
the truth of their affairs, was this, that they had not any commerce together; but the reason why they wrote such salutations was this, that they had a mind to appear to know things which others had not known. How can it then be any wonder, if our nation was so more known to many of the Greeks, nor had given them any occasion to mention them in their writings, while they were as yet in their infancy, had a conduct of life so peculiar to themselves?

13. Let us now put the case, therefore, that we made use of this argument concerning the Greeks, in order to prove that our nation was not so more known to them, and of the things in their own records: would not they laugh at us all, and probably give the same reasons for our silence that I have now alleged, and would produce their records, which are the most ancient in the world, and from their own antiquity? Now the same thing will I endeavored to do: for I will arouse the Egyptians and the Phoenicians as my principal witnesses, because nobody can complain of their testimony as false, on account that they are known to have borne the greatest ill-will towards us; I mean this as to the Egyptians in general all of them, while of the Phoenicians it is known the Tyrians have been most of all in the same ill disposition towards us; I mean, the race of the Chaldaeans, since our first leaders and ancestors were derived from them, and they do make mention of us Jews in their records, on account of the kindred there is between us. No, I do not think it is necessary to go so far as concerns the others, I will demonstrate that some of the Greek writers have mentioned of us Jews also, that those who envy us may not have even this pretense for contradicting us; and they shall be witnesses.

14. I shall begin with the writings of the Egyptians: not, indeed, of those that have written in the Egyptian language, which it is impossible for me to do. But Manetho was a man who was born an Egyptian; yet he learned the sacred language, and was made master of the Greek learning, as is very evident; for he wrote the history of his own country in the Greek tongue, by translating it, as he saith himself, out of their sacred records: he also notice the names of several persons, and of their intermarriages, and false relations of Egyptian affairs. Now this Manetho, in the second book of his Egyptian history, writes concerning us in the following manner: he set down his very words, as if I were to bring them before the court of a witness. — "There was a king of ours whose name was Timaus. Under him it came to pass, I know not how, that God was averse to us, and the king gave orders that they should not nourish their power, they afterward burnt down our cities, and demolished the temples of the gods, and used all the inhabitants after a most barbarous manner; say, some they slew, and led their children captive, and to contain of the number of them they made one of themselves king, whose name was Salatin; he also lived at Memphis, and made both the upper and lower regions pay tribute, and left garrisons in places that were the most proper to them; lay siege to many parts, as foreseeing that the Assyrians, who had then the greatest power, would be desirous of that kingdom, and invade them; and as he found in the Saitic Nomos. [Seth-noite.] a city very proper for his purpose, and which lay upon the Bubastic channel, but with regard to a certain theologick notion was called Avaris: this was rebuilt, and made very strong by the walls he built about it, and by a most numerous garrison of two hundred and forty thousand armed men, whom he put in it to keep it. Then Salatin came in the summer time, partly to gather his corn and pay his soldiers their wages, and partly to exercise his armed men, and thereby to terrify foreigners. When this man had reigned thirteen years, after he had reigned another, called Apophis, thirty-six years and seven months; after him Apophis reigned sixty-one years, and then Janias fifty-five years, and one month; after him, all the rest of Egypt and that land two years and two months. And these six were the first rulers among them, who were all along making war with the Egyptians, and were very desirous of it, to sow the roots of that whole nation was styled Hymen, that is, Shepherd-kings; for the first syllable, Hyp, according to the sacred dialect, denotes a king, as is Sos, a shepherd; but this according to the ordinary dialect; and of these is compounded Hymen, but some say that those people were Egyptians." Now in another copy it is said, that this word does not denote kings, but on the contrary denotes captive shepherds, and this on account of the article Hyp, for in the Egyptian tongue, the aspiration, in the Egyptian tongue again denotes shepherds, and that expressly also: and this to me seems the more probable opinion, and more agreeable to ancient history. [But Manetho goes on, and gives the names of other kings, which are before named kings, and called shepherds also, and their descendants,] as he says, "kept possession of Egypt five hundred and twelve years. After these, he says, "That the kings of Thebais and of the other parts of Egypt, being the successors against the shepherds, and that there was a terrible and long war was made between them." He says further, "That under a king, whose name was Aliphragmutus, the shepherds were sabotaged by him, and were indeed driven out of other parts of Egypt, but were shut up in a place that contained ten thousand acres: this place was named Avaris." Manetho says, "That the shepherds built a wall round all this place, which was the larger part of Egypt in order to keep all their possessions and their prey within a place of strength, but that Thuminus, the son of Aliphragmutus, made an attempt to take them by force and by siege, with four hundred and twenty thousand men, about them; but that, upon his despair of taking the place by that siege, they came to a composition with them, that they should leave Egypt, and go without any harm to be done to them and they would; and that, after this composition was made, they went away with their whole families and effects, not fewer in number than two hundred and forty thousand, and took this journey from Egypt, through the wilderness, for Syria; but that as they were in fear of the Assyrians, who had then the dominion over Asia, they built a city in that country which is now called Judea, and that large enough to contain the number of them: and they called it Jerusalem." Now Manetho, in another book of his, says, "That this nation, thus called shepherds, were also called captives in their sacred books." And this account of his is the truth: for many of the Egyptians, being the forefathers in the most ancient ages; and as they led such a wandering life in feeding sheep, they were called shepherds. Nor was it without reason that they were called captives by the Egyptians, since one of our ancestors, Joseph, told the king of Egypt that he was a captive, and afterward sent for his brethren into Egypt by the king's permission. But as for these matters, I shall make a more exact inquiry about them elsewhere. 16. But now I shall produce the Egyptians as witnesses to the antiquity of our nation. I shall therefore here bring in Manetho again, and what he writes as to the order of the times in this case, and thus he speaks:—When this people, four hundred and ninety-three years before Danaus came to Argo; although the Argives look upon him as their most ancient king.† Manetho, therefore, bears this testimony to two points of the greatest consequence in our nation, and those three hundred and ninety-three years before Danaus came to Argo; although the Argives look upon him as their most ancient king.† Manetho, therefore, bears this testimony to two points of the greatest consequence. The first point is the exclusion from Egypt and Egyptian records themselves. In the first place, that we came out of another country into Egypt; and that withal, our deliverance out of it was so ancient in time as to have preceded the siege of Troy. Then, in another point, that this account of the former and these things which Manetho adds, not from the Egyptian records, but, as he confesses himself, from some stories of an uncertain origin, I will dispute with you hereafter particularly, and shall demonstrate that they are no better than incredible fables.

17. I will now, therefore, pass from these records, and come to those that belong to the Phoenicians. Manetho, in another Apocryphon, witnesses, for twelve years and five months; then came his daughter Acacorhes, for twelve years and one month; then was her brother Rathitis, for nine years; then was Acacorches, for twelve years and five months; then came another Acacorhes, for twelve years and three months; after him Armais, for four years and one month; after him was Ramesses, for one year and four months; after him came Armais Minamoun, for sixty years and seven months; after him was Mephamound, for twenty-five years and ten months; after him was Thmoris, for nine years and eight months; after him came Amenophis, for thirty years and ten months; then was Herodotus, for thirteen years and five months; then came his daughter Acacorhes, for twelve years and one month; then was Rathitis, for nine years; then was Acacorches, for twelve years and five months; then came another Acacorhes, for twelve years and three months; after him Armais, for four years and one month; after him was Ramesses, for one year and four months; after him came Armais Minamoun, for sixty years and seven months; after him was Mephamound, for twenty-five years and ten months; after him came Sethosis, and Ramesses, who had an army of horse, and a naval force. This king appointed his brother Armais to be his deputy over Egypt. In another case, he had him as captain of his horsemen, under his brother to be his deputy over Egypt. He also gave him all the other authority of a king, but with these only injunctions, that he should not wear the diadem, nor be injurious to the priests, nor be by his acts injurious to the mother of his children, and that he should not meddle with the other concubines of the king, while he made an expedition against Cyprus and Phoenicia, and besides against the Assyrians and the Medes. He subdued these countries, some by his arms, some without fighting, and some by the terror of his great army: and being pushed up by the great successes he had had, he went still on the more boldly, and overthrew the cities and the confederacy of the in the eastern parts. But after some considerable time, Armais, who was left in Egypt, did all those very things, by way of opposition, which his brother had forbidden him to do, without fear; for he used violence to the queen, and continued to make use of the rest of the concubines, without sparing any of them: nay, at the persuasion of his friends, he put on the diadem, and set up to oppose his brother. But then, he who was set over the priests of Egypt and the king's wife, he put him also for one of him of all that had happened, and how his brother had set up to oppose him: he therefore returned back to Pelusium immediately, and recovered his freedom again. The country also was called from his name, Egypt; for Manetho says, that Sethosis was himself called Egyptus, as was his brother Armais called Danaus.†

18. This is Manetho's account. And evident it is from the number of years by him set down belonging to this interval, if they be summed up together, that these shepherds, as they are here called, who were no other than our forefathers, were delivered out of Egypt, and came thence, and thus, and thus continued, three hundred and ninety-three years before Danaus came to Argo.
19. I will now relate what hath been written concerning us in the Chaldean histories, which records have a direct agreement with our books in other things also. Berossus shall be witness to what I say: he was by birth a Chaldean, well known by the learned on account of his publication of the Chaldean books of astronomy and philosophy among the Greeks. This Berossus, therefore, following the most ancient records of that nation, gives us a history of the deluge of waters that then happened, and of the destruction of mankind thereby, and agrees with Moses as to that part of the story. He says that Noah's ark, wherein we are the origin of our race, was preserved, when it was brought to the highest part of the Armenian mountains: after which he gives us a catalogue of the posterity of Noah, and adds the years of their chronology, and at length comes down to Nabopolassar, who was king of Babylon, and of the Chaldeans. And when he was relating the acts of this king, he describes to us, "How he sent his son Nabuchodonosor against Egypt, and against our land, with a great army, upon his being informed that they had revolted from him; and how, by that means, he subdued them all, and set our temple that was at Jerusalem on fire, and removed it entirely out of their own country, and transferred it to Babylon; when it so happened that our city was desolate, during the interval of seventy years, until the days of Cyrus king of Persia." He then says, "When Cyrus the king conquered Egypt, and Syria, and Phoenicia, and Arabia, and exceeded in his exploits all that had reigned before him in Babylonia and Chaldea." A little after which, Berossus says, "Nabuchodonosor, in his history of certain times: I will set down Berossus's own accounts, which are these: "When Nabopolassar, father of Nabuchodonosor, heard that the governor whom he had set over Egypt and over the parts of the countries which had revolted from him, was not able to bear it any longer, but committing certain parts of his army to his son Nabuchodonosor, who was then but young, he sent him against the rebel; Nabuchodonosor, who now joined battle with him, and conquered him, and reduced the country under his dominion again. Now it so fell out, that his father Nabopolassar fell into a distemper at this time, and died in the city of Babylon, after he had reigned twenty years; and Saul stood, in a little time, that his father Nabopolassar was dead, he set the affairs of Egypt, and the other countries, in order, and committed the captives he had taken from the Jews, and Phoenicians, and Syrians, into the hands of Nabuchodonosor, that he might conduct that part of the forces that had on heavy armor, with the rest of his baggage, to Babylon; while he went in haste, having but a few with him, over the desert to Babylon; whither when he was come, he found the public affairs had been managed by the Chaldeans, and that the principal person among them had preserved the kingdom for him. Moreover, the Chaldeans obtained all his father's dominions. He then came and ordered the captives to be placed as colonies in the most proper places of Babylonia: but for himself, he adored the temple of Belus, and the other temples, and took all the spoils he had taken in this war. He also rebuilt the old city, and added another to it on the outside, and so far restored Babylon, that none who should besiege it afterward might be able to overcome it by the power to drive them to enter; and he built the city three walls about the inner city, and three about the outer. Some of these walls he built of burnt brick and bitumen, and some of them thus fortified the city with walls, afterward, an excellent manner, and had adorned the gates magnificently, he added a new palace to that which his father had dwelt in, and this close by it also, and that more eminent in its height, and is its great splendor. It would perhaps require too long a narration, if any one were to describe it: however, as prodigiously large, and as magnificent as it was, it was finished in fifteen days. It was forty cubits high, and had very high walks, supported by stone piliars, and by planting what was called a penile paradise, and replenishing it with all sorts of trees, he rendered the prospect an exact resemblance of a mountainous coast. This he did to please his queen, because she had been brought up in Media, and was fond of a mountainous situation."

20. This is what Berossus relates concerning the forementioned king, as he relates many other things also in the fifth book of his Chaldaean history; wherein he complains of the Grecian writers for supposing, without any foundation, that Babylon was built by Semiramis, queen of Assyria, and for her false pretension of laying those wonderful edifices thereto relating, as if they were her own workmanship; as indeed in these affairs the Chaldaean history cannot but be the most credible. Moreover, we meet with a contradiction from that Berossus, in the archives of the Phoenicians, concerning this king Nabuchodonosor, that he conquered all Syria and Phoenicia; in which case Philostratus agrees with the others in that history which he composed, where he says, "the reign of Tyre was the last of the great Megane-thenes also, in the fourth book of his Indian history, wherein he pretends to prove that the fore-mentioned king of the Babylonians was superior to Hercules in strength, and the greatness of his exploits," and adds: "let us imitate the great part of Libya; and conquered Iberia also. Now as to what I have said before about the temple at Jerusalem, that it was fought against by the Babylonians, and burnt by them, but was opened again by Cyrus, and the land taken from him, and the wine and the gold vases and the golden lamp and the rest of the treasures, shall be now demonstrated from what Berossus adds further upon that head; for thus he says in his third book: "Nabuchodonosor, after he had burned the temple of Jerusalem, fell sick, and departed this life, when he had reigned forty-three years; whereupon his son Eriimerodach obtained the kingdom. He governed public affairs after an illegal and impious manner, and had a son by a Negeb, his sister's husband, and was slain by him when he had reigned but two years." After he was slain, Negeb, the son who plotted against him, succeeded him in the kingdom, and reigned four years. And the second king obtained the kingdom, though he were but a child, and kept it nine months, but by reason of the very ill temper and ill practices he exhibited to the world, a plot was laid against him also by his friends, and he was tormented to death. After his death, the conspirators got together, and by common consent put the crown upon the head of Nabonnedus, a man of Babylon, and one who belonged to that imposture. In his reign it was that the walls of the city of Babylon were curiously built with burnt brick and bitumen; but when he was come to the seventeenth year of his reign, Cyrus came out of Persia with a great army, and having al- ready slain all the rest of his kinsmen, he came hastily to Babylon. When Nabonnedus perceived he was coming to attack him, he met him with his forces, and joining battle with him was beaten, and fled away with a few of his troops with him, and was shut up within the city of Ecbates. Hereupon Cyrus took Babylon, and gave order; that the outer walls of the city should be demolished, because the city had proved very troublesome to him, and cost him a great deal of money and labor; and he therefore ordered Ecbates, to besiege Nabonnedus; but as Nabonnedus did not sustain the siege, but delivered himself into his hands, he was at first kindly used by Cyrus, who gave him Carmania, as a place for himself; but afterwards he was assassinated. Accordingly, Nabonnedus spent the rest of his time in that country, and there died." 21. These accounts agree with the true histories in our books: for in them it is written, that Nabuchodonosor died in the sixteenth year of his reign, laid our temple desolate, and so it lay in that state of obsequity for fifty years: but that in the second year of the reign of Cyrus its foundations were laid, and it was not finished till the second year of Darius. I will now add the records of the Phoenicians; for it will not be superfluous to give the reader demonstrations most then enough on this occasion. In them we have the names of the first nine kings of the Babylonians: "Nabuchodonosor besieged Tyre for thirteen years, in the days of Jehoiachin, their king; after he reigned Beael, ten years; after him were judges appointed, who judged the people. After them the kings of the Medes, Belshazzar and Darius, reigned. Belshazzar the son of Abdeus, ten months; Abbar the high priest, three months; Mitigoneus and Gaerstratus, the sons of Abelemus, were judges six years; after whom Belon was seven years, brother of Belshazzar. After him Belshazzar reigned one year, and Darius son of Balthasar, received from Babylon, who reigned four years; after his death their brother Hurmon, who reigned twenty years. Under his reign Cyrus the king of Persia." So this interval was fifty and four years besides three months; for on the seventh year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar he began to besiege Tyre, and Cyrus the Persian took the kingdom on the fourth year of the reign of Darius. Darius son of Balthasar is from the records of the Chaldeans and Tyrians agree with our writings about this temple; and the testimonies hereby produced are an indisputable and undeniable attestation to the antiquity of our nation. And if some scholars there be that think their several kings are not sufficient to such as are not very contentious. 22. But now it is proper to satisfy the inquiry of those that disbelieve the records of Barzabara, and think none but Greeks to be worthy of credit. In the days of Nebuchadnezzar, and of the second of Darius, when the Greeks were acquainted with our nation, and set before them such as upon occasion have made mention of us in their own writings. Pythagoras, therefore, of Samos, lived in very ancient times, and was esteemed a person superior to the philosophers in wisdom and piety towards God. Now it is plain that he did not only know our doctrines, but was in a very great measure a fol- lower, and admirer of them. There is not indeed extant any writing that is owned for his; but many there are who have written his history, of whom Herippus is the most celebrated, who was a person very inquisitive in all sorts of books: and of these Golden Verses, which are in being generally supposed to have been written not by himself, but by some of his scholars only, in agreement with what Josephus here affirms of him.
with him both night and day, and enjoined him not to pass over a place where an ass had fallen down; as also not to drink such waters as caused thirst again; and to abstain from all sorts of approaches.

After which he adds thus: "This he hid and said in imitation of the doctrines of the Jews and Thracians, which he had adopted into his own philosophy." For it is very truly affirmed of this Pythagoras, that he took a great many of the laws of the Jews into his own philosophy. Nor was our nation unknown of old to several of the laws and customs of the Jews, as is proved by the custom of circumcision. Among which he enumerates others, and particularly that which called Corban; which oath can only be found among the Jews, and declares what a man may call a thing devoted to God. Nor indeed was Herodotus of Halicarnassus, a countryman with our nation, but mentions it after a very like manner, when he saith thus, in his second book concerning the Colchians. His words are these: The only people who were circumcised in their nation were the Egyptians, the Colchians, the Egyptians, and the Ethiopians; but the Egyptians, and those Syrians that are in Palæstine, confess that they learned it from the Egyptians. And for these Syrians who live about the Red Sea, the Jews called them Medes, and their neighbors the Macrones, they say they have lately learned it from the Colchians; for these are the only people that are circumcised among men in the East, and have no thing with the Egyptians. But as for the Egyptians and Ethiopians themselves, I am not able to say which of them received it from the other. This therefore is what Herodotus says, "That the Egyptians and Ethiopians were the first circumcised." But there are no inhabitants of Palæstine that are circumcised except the Jews; and therefore it must be his knowledge of them that enabled him to speak so much concerning them. The Colchians also, a still more barbarous nation, and a poet, makes mention of our nation, and informs as that it came to the assistance of king Xerxes, in his expedition against Greece. For in his enumeration of all those nations, he last of all mentions us, as he says: "Here have passed over a people, wonderful to be believed, for they spoke the Phoenician tongue with their mouths; they dwelt in the Solymian mountains, near a broad lake: their heads were woolly, their faces square, and their noses large; and their hair grew on their cheeks, and their faces were like nasty horses' heads also, that had been hardened in the smoke." I think, therefore, that it is evident to every body, that Cheliris means us, because the Solymian mountains are in our country, wherein we inhabit, as also the lake called Asphaltitis; for this is a broader and larger lake than any other that is in Syria; and thus does Cheliris make mention of us.

But now, the time has come to speak of the Grecians, but those that are had in the greatest admiration for their philosophical improvements among them, did not only know the Jews, but, when they lighted upon any of them, admiring them also, it is easy for any one to know; for Clearchus, who was the scholar to Aristotle, and inferior to no one of the Peripatetics whomsoever, in his first book concerning asleep, says, "That Aristotle in his master's relations thereby what follows of a Jew, as it were, sets down Aristotle's own discourse with him. The account is this, as written down by him: "Now, for a great part of what this Jew said, it would be too long to recite it, but what includes in it both wonders, and indeed things so marvelous that it was amiss to discourse of. Now, that I may be plain with thee, Hyperchides, I shall herein seem to thee to relate wonders, and what will resemble fables in some respects, but I shall answer modestly, and said, For that very reason, it is that all of us are very desirous of hearing what thou art going to say. Then, replied Aristotle, For this cause it will be the best way to imitate that rule of the rhetoricians, which requires us first to give an account of the man, and of what nation he was, that so we may not contradict our master's directions. Then said Hyperchides, Go on, if it so pleases thee. This man then, (answer'd Aristotle,) by his name was Clearchus, of Colosseia: these Jews are derived from the Indian philosophers; they are named by the Indians Calami, and by the Syrians Sodani, and took their name from the country they inhabit, which is a country called Judea, and for the Jews this is a very awkward one, for they call it Jerusalem. Now this man, when he was hospitably treated by a great many, came down from the upper country to the city, and became a Grecian, not only in his language, but in his soul also; insomuch that when we ourselves happened to be in Asia about the same places whither he came, he conversed with us, and entertained us with other pleasant discourses, and witnessed the trial of our skill in philosophy; and as he had lived with many learned men, he communicated to us more information than he received from us." This is Aristotle's account of the matter, as given us by Clearchus; which Aristotle discoursed also particularly of the great and wonderful fortitude of this Jew in his diet, and continent way of living, as those that may please me learn more about him from Clearchus's book itself, for I am now desirous to speak of the philosophers, which was sufficient for my purpose. Now, Clearchus said this by way of digression, for his main design was of another nature. But for Hecateus of Abdera, who was a philosopher and one very useful in an active life, he was friendly with king Alexander in his youth, and afterward was with Ptolemy, the son of Lagus: he did not write about the Jewish affairs by the way only, but composed an entire book concerning the Jews themselves, out of which book I see willing to run over a few things, of which I have been treating by way of epitome. And in the first place, I will demonstrate the time when this Hecateus lived; for he mentions the fight that was between Ptolemy and Demetrius about Gaza, which was fought on the eleventh year that their hands were bony; that they had round ravens on their heads; that their heads and faces were like nasty horses' heads, which had been hardened in the smoke: these awkward characters probably dished the Solym of Pindar no better than they did the Jews in Judea. And, indeed, this reproachful language has given these people, in so many places, to be a strong index not only to the Jewish, but also to the Grecian, and not the Solymians Solymians celebrated in Homer, whom Cheliris here describes; nor are we to expect that they were the same. Cheliris or his son was made famous by Josephus and Eusebius, made no mistake in the Jewish history. If, by comparing their testimonies with the more authentic records of that nation, we find them for the main, to conform to these, they must be received as having ought to be satisfied, and not expect that they ever had an exact knowledge of all the circumstances of the Jewish affairs, which, indeed, it was almost impossible for them to have. See sect. 93.
after the death of Alexander, and on the hundred and seventeenth olympiad, as Castor says in his history. For when he had set down this olympiad, he says further, 'That on this olympiad Ptolomy, the son of Lagus, best in battle Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, who was named Poliorcetes, at Gaza.' Now, it is agreed by all, that Alexander died on the hundred and fourteenth olympiad: it is therefore evident that our action flourished in his time, and in the time of Ptolemy Antigonus. The point now is to the same purpose, as follows: 'Ptolomy got possession of the places in Syria after that battle at Gaza; and many, when they heard of Ptolemy's moderation and humanity, went along with him to Egypt; and he, in order to assist in his affairs: one of which (Hecateus says) was Hezekiah,' the high priest of the Jews, a man of about sixty-six years of age, and in great dignity among his own people. He was a very sensible man, and could speak very movingly, and was very skilful in the management of affairs, if any other man ever were so; although, as he says, all the priests of the Jews took tithes of the produce of the earth, and managed public affairs, and were in number not above fifteen hundred at the most.' Hecateus mentions this Hezekiah a second time, and says, that, 'as he was possessed of so great a dignity, and was become familiar with Alexander, he took certain of those Jews that were with him, and explained to them all the circumstances of their people; for he had all their habitations and polity down in writing.' Moreover, Hecateus declares again, 'what regard must be had to their war laws, and how to endure any thing rather than transgress them, because we think it right for us to do so.' — Whereupon he adds, that 'although they are in a humiliation among their neighbors, and among all those that come to them, and have been often treated injuriously by the kings and governors of Persia, yet can they not be dissuaded from acting but what they think best; but the when they are stripped on this account, and have torments inflicted upon them, and they are brought to the most terrible kinds of death, they meet them after an extraordinary manner, beyond all other people, and will not renounce the worship of their god. Hecateus has also produced demonstrations not a few of this their resolute tenaciousness of their laws, when he speaks thus: 'Alexander was once at Babylon, and had an intention to rebuild the temple of Belus. When he was fallen to the ground, and in order thereto, he commanded all his soldiers in general to bring earth thither; but the Jews, and they only, would not comply with that command; say, they underwent stripes and great losses of what they had on this account, till the king forgave them, and permitted them to live in quiet.' He adds farther, 'That when the Macedonians came to them into that country, and demolished the [old] temples, and the altars, they assisted them in demolishing them all; but for not assisting them in rebuilding them: they either underwent losses, or sometimes obtained forgiveness.' He adds farther, 'That the men deserve to be admired on that account.' He also speaks of the mighty population of our nation, and says, 'That the Persians formerly carried away many ten thousands of our people to Babylon, as also that not a few ten thousands were removed after Alexander's descent into Egypt and Phoenicia, by reason of the rest of the Persians.' Hecateus says, 'In the time of Alexander, Josephus states that the city is large, most Fruitful soil; it is called Jerusalem of Lesser Dimensions.' The same man describes our city Jerusalem also itself, as of a most excellent structure, and very large buildings, and standing out for the most ancient times. He also discourses of the multitude of men in it, and of the construction of our temple, after the following manner: 'There are many strong places and others (says he) in the country of Judea; but one city there is, about fifty furlongs in circumference, which is inhabited by a hundred and twenty thousand men, or thereabout: they call it Jerusalem. There is, about the middle of the city, an altar in the middle of the street, three furlongs, and seven broad, and the breadth a hundred cubits, in double cloisters; wherein there is a square shaft, not made of hewn stone, but composed of stones gathered together, having each side about seven cubits high, and four cubits broad; by it is a large edifice wherein there is a altar and a candlestick both of gold, and in which are two talents: upon these there is a light that is never extinguished, neither night nor day.' There is no image, or any thing, in any actions therein: nothing at all is there planted, nor sown, nor grown, nor any thing of that sort. The priests abide therein both nights and days, perform certain purifications, and drinking of wine while they are in the temple. Moreover, he attests, that we Jews went to synagogues along with king Alexander, and after he with his successors. He will add farther what he has described. Here he speaks again of the same army, concerning the actions of a man that was a Jew. His words are these: 'As I was myself going to the Red Sea, there followed a man whose name was Bismoliah: he was a young man of strong voice, and when it was said that he was a person of great courage, of a strong body, and by all allowed to be the most skilful archer that was either among the Greeks or barbarians. Now, this man, as people were in numbers passing along the road, and a certain augur was observing an augury by a bird, requiring them all to stand still, inquired which they stood for. Hereupon the augur showed them whence he took his augury, and told him, that if the bird stood where he sa

This Hezekiah, who is here called a high priest, is not named in any of the other historical chronicles; the time that he lived is not known: at that time being rather Onias, as Archbishop Usher supposes. However, Josephus often uses the word high priest in the plural number, as living many at the same time.
ill-disposed passion blinded the other's mind so entirely, that he could not discern the truth. And now certainly the foregoing records of the Egyptians, and Chaldeans, and Phoenicians, together with so many of the Greek historians, will be sufficient for the demonstration of our antiquity. Moreover, besides those forementioned, Theophilus, and Theodotus, and Mnases, and Aristophanes, and Hermogenes, Euhemerus also, and Zeno, and Conon, and many others, (for I have not lighted upon all the Greek books,) have made distinct mention of us. It is true, many of the men before mentioned have made great mistakes about the true accounts of our nation in the earliest times, Athens, they had not perused our sacred books; yet have they all of them afforded their testimony to our antiquity, concerning which I am now treating. However, Demetrius Phalerus, and the elder Philo with Eupolemus, have written truth about our affairs; whose lesser mistakes ought therefore to be forgiven them; for it was not in their power to understand our writings with the utmost accuracy.

24. One particular thing is still remaining behind of what I at first proposed to speak to, and that is to demonstrate that those calumnies and reproaches, which some have thrown upon our nation, are lies, and to make use of their own testimonies against them. And that, in general, this self-contradiction hath happened to many other authors, by reason of their ill-will to some people, I conclude is not unknown to such as have read histories with sufficient care; for some of them have endeavored to disgrace the nobility of certain nations and of some of the most glorious cities, and have cast reproaches upon certain forms of government. Thus hath Theopompos abused the city of Thebes, and Lycurgus that of Lacedaemon, and he that wrote the Triполитicus, (for he is not Theopompos, as is supposed by some) done by the city of Thebes. Timeus also hath greatly abused the foregoing people and others also, and thus treat them they use chiefly when they have a contest with men of the greatest reputation; some out of envy and malice, and others, as supposing that, by this foolish talking of theirs, they may be thought worthy of being feared, and therefore indeed they do by no means fail of their hopes, with regard to the foolish part of mankind, but men of sober judgment still condemn them of great malignity.

25. Now the Egyptians were the first that cast reproaches upon us; in order to please which nation, some others undertook to pervert the truth, while they would neither own that our forefathers came into Egypt from another country, as the fact is, nor indeed commanded to our departure thence. And indeed the Egyptians took many occasions to hate us and envy us; in the first place, because our ancestors had had the dominion over their country, and when they were delivered from there, and went to their own country again, they lived there in prosperity. In the next place, the difference of our religion from theirs hath occasioned great enmity between us, while our way of divine worship did as much amaze as that which their laws appointed, as does the nature of God exceed that of brute beasts; for, so far do they all agree through the whole country, to esteem such animals as gods, although they differ one from another in the external things of their sect, and I do not think of imitating the present form of divine worship their leaders, which neither the Macedonians nor our blessed Saviour did ever approve of.

ship which we made use of, though, when they saw our actions approved of by many others, they could not but envy our situation; and some of them have proceeded to that degree of folly and meanness in their conduct, as not to scruple to counterfeit their own ancient records, and to abuse themselves also in their writings, and yet were so blinded by their passions as not to discern it.

25. And now I will turn my discourse to one of their principal writers, whom I have a little before mentioned as a writer of antiquity; I mean Manetho. He promised to introduce the Egyptian history out of their sacred writings, and promised this: that, "our people had come into Egypt, many ten thousands in number, and saw the Egyptians," and then he had further confessed, "That we went out of country afterward, and settled in that country which is now called Judea, and there built Jerusalem and its temple."

Now thus far he followed his account; but after this he permits himself, in order to appear to have written rumors and reports passed abroad about the Jews, and introduces incredible narrations, as if he would have the Egyptian multitude, that had the honor of diverting the divine honours and their person to us, as he says they were, and that they were condemned to fly out of Egypt together; for he mentions Amonophis, a fictitious king's name, though on that account he durst not set down his own name above that of the reign, which he yet he had accurately done as to the other kings he mentions; he then ascribes certain fabulous stories to this king, as having in a manner forgotten how he had already related, that the departure of the Egyptians was the greatest event in the reign of Amonophis; and that five hundred and eighteen years before; for Tethmosis was king when they went away. Now, from his days, the reigns of the intermediate kings, according to Manetho, amounted to three hundred and forty and a half years, and his years till the two brothers, Sethos and Hemiussus; the one of which, Sethos, was called by that other name of Amonus, and the other, Hemiussus, by that of Danatus. He also says, that Sethos cast the other out of Egypt, and reigned fifty-nine years, as did eldest son Rhamass reigned after him sixty-six years. When Manetho therefore had acknowledged, that our forefathers were gone out of Egypt six years ago, he introduces his fictitious king Amonophis, and says thus: "This king was desirous to become a spectator of the gods, as had Oras, one of his predecessors in that kingdom, desired the same before him; this desire was accompanied by an earnest desire to his namesake Amonophis, who was the son of Papis, and one that seemed to partake of a divine nature, both as to wisdom and the knowledge of futurities." Manetho adds, "how this namesake of his was told him, that he might see the gods, if he would clear the whole country of the lepers and of the other impure people; that the king was pleased with this injunction, and got together all that had any defect in their bodies out of Egypt, and caused them to be carried up to Bahr; and then he caused them to be sent to those quarters which were on the east sides of the Nile, that they might work in them, and might be separated from the rest of the Egyptians." He says further, that "there were some of the lepers so pestered with those polluted with the leprosy; but that still this Amonophis, the wise man and the prophet, was afraid that the gods would be angry at him and at the king. If there should appear to have been violence offered them; who also added some further terror, that the gods would not let people come to the assistance of these polluted wretches, and would conquer Egypt, and keep it in their possession thirteen years: that, however, he durst not tell him that he left a writing behind him about all those matters, and then slew himself which made the king disconsolate." After which he writes thus verbatim: "After those that were among this; his inquiries had continued in that miserable state for a long while, the king was desired that he would set apart the city Avaris, which was then left desolate of the shepherds, for their habitation and protection; which desire was granted; and so the history of the ancient theology, was Typhon's city. But when these men were gotten into it and found the place fit for a revolt, they appointed themselves a ruler out of the priests of Heliopolis; whose name was Osarmuth, and they took their oaths that they would be obedient to him in all things. He then, in the first place, made this law for them, that they should neither worship the Egyptian gods, nor should abstain from any kind of marriage with the Egyptians; who were the highest estate, but kill and destroy them all; that they should join themselves to nobody but to those that were of this confederacy. When he had made such laws as these, and many more, and had set over the multitude of the Egyptians, he gave order, that they should use the multitude of the hands they had in building walls about their city, and make themselves ready for a war with king Amonophis, while he was from home, and he went in the name of the Egyptian, and sent ambassadors to those shepherds who had been driven out of the land by Tethmoses to the city called Jerusalem; whereby he informed them of his design, and asked their leave for him and his army, which he said that had been treated after such an ignominious manner, and desired that they would come with one consent to his assistance in this war against Egypt. He also promised that he would in the first place, bring them back to their ancient city and country Avaris, and provide a plentiful assistance for their multitude; that he would protect them and fight for them as occasion should require, and would easily reduce the country of the Egyptians to the same condition. The shepherds were all the very glad of this message, and came away with alacrity all together, being in number two hundred thousand men; and in a little time they came to the city of Avaris; the king of Egypt, upon his being informed of their invasion, was in great confusion, as calling to mind what Amonophis, the son of Papis, had foretold him: and, in the first place, he assembled the multitude of the Egyptians, and took counsel with their leaders, and sent for their sacred animals to him especially for those that were principally wrecked in their temples, and gave a particular charge to the priests distinctly, that they should do their utmost to keep the king safe and care. He also sent his son Sethos, who was also named Rameses, from his father Rhamass being but five years old, to a friend of his. He then passed on with the rest of the Egyptians, and with the care of that which the king of Egypt should like of them, against the enemy, who met them. Yet did he not join battle with them; but thinking that would be to fight against the gods, he character, and indulges the prolixity and colors of a pleader and a disputant: accordingly, it neither I am aware that an Egyptian prudent and well written, and the other bitter enemies of the Jews, with whom he had many enemies, was thereby betrayed to a greater heart, and passes them ordinary, and that by consequence he does not here reason with his usual fairness and impar-sustained back and came to Memphis, where he beheaded Apis and the other sacred animals which he had set up for to him, and presently marched into Ethiopia, together with his whole army and multitude of Egyptians, for the king of Ethiopia was under an obligation to him, on which account he required the kings of Ethiopia, that was with him, while the country supplied all that was necessary for the food of the men. He also allotted cities and villages for this exile, that was to be from its beginning during those fated three years. However, he pitched a camp for his Ethiopian army, as a guard to king Amonephis, upon the borders of Egypt. But the people of Jerusalem, when they came down there, did not contradict the king of Egypt; they treated the men in such a barbarous manner, that those who saw how they subdued the forementioned country, and the horrid wickedness they were guilty o., thought it most diabolical thing; for they did not only set the heathens, fire, but were not satisfied till they had been guilty of sacrilege, and destroyed the image of the gods, and used them in roasting of those sacrilegious, and forced the priests and prophets to be the executioners and murderers of those animals, and then ejected them naked out of the country. It was also reported, that the priest, who ordained their priests, by name was Ammon, and his name Osarsip, from Osiris, who was the god of Heliopolis; but that, when he was gone over to these people, his name was changed, and he was called Moses.

The Egyptians relate about the Jews, with much more, which I omit for the sake of brevity. But still Manetho goes on, that "after this Amonephis returned back from Ethiopia with a great army, as did his son Rhamesses with soldiers and those that were born in Egypt, and that he fought with the shepherds and the polluted people, and beat them, and slew a great many of them, and pursued them to the bounds of Syria." Those and the like accounts are written by Manetho. But it will still demonstrate and the tribes, and tells ardent lies, after I have made a distinction which will relate to what I am going to say about him; for this Manetho had granted and confessed, that he was not born Egyptian, but that they had come from another country, and subdued Egypt, and then went away again out of it. But that those Egyptians who were thus diseased in their bodies were not miracles, but those that had been born in Egypt, and brought the people out was not one of that company, but lived many generations earlier. I shall endeavor to demonstrate from Manetho's own accounts themselves."

25. Now, for the first occasion of this fiction, Manetho supposes what is so better than a ridiculous thing; for he says, that "king Amonephis desired to see the gods." What gods, I pray, did he desire to see? If he meant the gods whom they thout that was made from Osiris and his daughter Isis, and the goat, the crocodile, and the baboon, he saw them already; but for the heavenly gods, how could he see them, and what should occasion this his desire? To be sure, it was because neither king nor priests had seen them. He had then been informed what sort of gods they were, and after what manner they had been seen, insomuch that he did not stand in need of any new arms for the overthrow of the priests. However, this prophet, by whose means the king thought to compass his design, was a wise man. If so, how came he not to know that such his desire was impossible to be accomplished? for the event did not well suit. And what preface could there be to suppose that the gods could not be seen by reason of the people's mains in their bodies, or leprosy? for the gods are not angry at the imperfection of bodies, but at wicked practices: and as to eighty those mained should be expelled out of Egypt, while the Jews were made to work in the quarries, as if he were rather in want of laborers, than intended to purge his country. He says further, that "this prophet slew himself, as foreseeing the anger of the gods, and that they would proceed against him after that he had left the prediction for the king-in-writing." Besides, how came it to pass, that this prophet did not foreknow his own death at the first? say, how came he not even to see the number of those that were to die in Egypt immediately? how came that unreasonable dread upon him of judgments that were not to happen in his lifetime; or what worse thing could he suffer, out of fear of which he made haste, to kill himself? Now let us see the thing of all; the king, although he had been informed of these things, and terrified with the fear of what was to come, yet did not even think to execute them against the people of his country, when it had been foretold him that he was to clear Egypt of them; but, as Manetho says, "He then, upon their petition, gave them that city to inhabit, which had formerly belonged to the shepherds, and was called Avarias, when they were gone in crowds," he says, "they chose one that had formerly been priest of Heliopolis; and that this priest first ordained, that they should neither worship the gods, nor abstain from the flesh which was given by the Egyptians, but should kill and eat them all, and should associate with nobody but those that had conspired with them; and that he bade the multitude by oaths to be sure to continue in those laws; sure that this was the will of the gods about Avarias, he made war against the king." Manetho adds also, that this priest sent to Jerusalem to invite that people to come to his assistance, and promised to give them Avarias; for that it had belonged to the priests of those that were coming from Jerusalem; and that when they were come, they made a war immediately against the king, and got possession of all Egypt. He says also, that this Egyptian king had his army of two hundred thousand men, and that Amonephis, the king of Egypt, not thinking that he ought to fight against the gods, ran away presently into Ethiopia, and committed Apis and his priests, and certain other of his gods to the care of the priests, and commanded them to take care of preserving them." He says further, that "the people of Jerusalem came accordingly upon the Egyptians, and overthrew their cities, and burnt their temples, and slew their horsemen, and in short abstained from all sort of wickedness nor barbarity; and for that priest who settled their polity and their laws," he says, "he was by birth of Heliopolis, and his name was Osiris, the son of Scepter of Osiris, for that he changed his name and called himself Moses." He then says, that "on the thirteenth year afterward, Amonephis, according to the fatal time of the duration of his misfortune, came out of Egypt with a great army, and joining battle with the shepherds and with the polluted people, overcame them in battle, and slew a great many of them, and pursued them as far as the bounds of Syria."

26. Now Manetho does not reflect upon the improbability of his lie: for the leproser people, and the multitude that was with them, although they might formerly have been angry at the king, and yet those that had treated them so casually, and this according to the prediction of the prophet; yet certainly, when they were come out of the mines, and had received of the king a city and a country, they would have grown breaker towards him. However, had they ever so much hated him in particular, they might have laid a private plot against him, but would had undoubtedly have made war against all the Egyptians; I mean this on the account of the great kindred they who were so numerous must have had among them. Nay still if they had resolved to fight with the men, they would not have had impiety enough for to fight with their gods: nor would they have ordained laws quite contrary to those of their own country, and to those in which they had been brought up themselves. Yet are we beholden to Manetho alone, who does not lay the principal charge of this horrid transgression upon those that came from Jerusalem, but says that the Egyptians themselves were the most guilty, and that they were the cause that contrived these things, and made the multitude take their oaths for doing so. But still, how absurd it is to suppose, that none of these people's own relations or friends should be prevailed with to revolt, nor to undergo the hard and dangerous thing, and to leave lost those poluted people were forced to send to Jerusalem, and bring their auxiliaries from thence. What friendship, I pray, or what relation was there formerly between them, that required this assistance? For they say, that no one of the people were enemies, and greatly differed from them in their customs. He says, indeed, that they complied immediately, upon their promising them that they should conquer Egypt; as if they did not themselves know that country out of which they had been driven by force. Now, had these men been in want, or lived miserably, perhaps they might have undertaken so hazardous an enterprise; but as they dwelt in a happy city, and were in a contrary manner, those people were enemies, and greatly differed from them in their customs therefore, how came it about, that for the sake of those that had of old been their enemies, and those that were immured in their bodies, and of those whom none of their own relations would ever allow to run such hazards in offering them? For they could not foresee that the king would run away from them: on the contrary, he saith himself, that "Amenophis' son had three brothers, who would not have had impiety enough to lay them at Pelusium." Now, to be sure, those that came could not be ignorant of this; but for the king's repentance and flight, how could they possibly guess at it? He then says, that "those who came were brought from Jerusalem, and under this invasion they got the granaries of Egypt into their possession, and perpetrated many of the most horrid actions there." And thence he reproaches them, as though he had not himself introduced them as enemies; and although he might accuse such taunts were invited from another place for so doing, when the natural Egyptians themselves had done the same things before their coming, and had taken oaths so to do. However, "Amenophis, some time afterward, came upon them, and conspired with them in battle, and slew his enemies, and drove them before him as far as Syria." As if Egypt were so easily taken by people that came from any place whatsoever, and as if those that had been left behind by war, when it one informed that Amenophis was alive, did neither fortify the avenues out of Ethiopia into it, although they had great advantages for doing it, nor did they get ready for their defense; but that "he followed them over the sandy deserts, and slew them as far as Syria."' while yet it is not an easy thing for an army to pass over that country, even without fighting.

31. It now remains that I debate with Manetho about Moses. Now, the Egyptians acknowledge him to have been a king, as we said before: as if he were born a son: nay, they would willingly lay claim to his kindred of his own, as if they had been supplied by his power of his name, and were joined by some of the priesthood, and the consent of the nobility; although it had been demonstrated out of their records, that he lived five hundred and eighteen years earlier, and then brought our forefathers out of Egypt into the country of his own country. Moses was not subject in his body to any such calamity, as is evident from what he himself tells us: so that he forbade those that had the leprosy either to come into a city, or sit in the village, because that should be the reason why Moses should go about the Egyptians with their clothes rent; and declares, that such as either touch them, or live under the same roof with them, should be esteemed unclean: nay, it is to only those leprosies people for whose sake he made these laws, but also for us who should be affected in the kindred of their body, who yet are not permitted by him to officiate as priests: nay, although any priest, of the secret stones had not initiated, should have such a calamity fall upon him afterward, he ordered him to be deposed. Nor is it then supposed that Moses should ordain such laws against himself, to his own reproach and damage who so ordained them? Nor is it indeed possible, if any one of Moses' relations at all probable, whether he relates the change of his name, and says, that "he was formerly called Osiris," and this a name no way agreeable to the other, while his true name was Moses, and signifies a name, as it were, which was more appropriate to the Egyptians call water Moe. I think, therefore, I have made it sufficiently evident that Moses, when he followed his ancient records, did not much mistake the truth of the history; but that Pharaohs, the sacred scripture, and such a name, in case he would have purged Egypt of the men who had polluted upon them, should be no longer troubled with so frightful apparitions: that Amenophis accordingly chose out two hundred and fifty thousand of those that had been left behind, and cast them out of the country: that Moses and Joseph were scribes, and Joseph was a sacred scribe: that their names were Egyptian originally, that of Moses had been Teshitthen, and that of Joseph Petseph; that these two came to Pelusium, and lighted upon three hundred and eighty thousand that had been left there by Amenophis, he not being willing to carry them into Egypt: that these scribes made

Chereamon gives us,

Now I take it for granted, that what I have said already hath plainly proved the falsity of both these narrations; for had there been any real truth at the bottom, it was impossible that such should have been greater discredit than the particular.

But for those that invent lies, what they write will easily give us very different accounts, while they forge what they please out of their own heads.

Manetho says, that the king's desire of seeing the gods, was the origin of the exci-

tion of the polluted people; but Chereamon feigns that it was a dream of his own, spot upon him by Jais, that was the occasion of it. Manetho says, that after this he went and dwelt in Egypt, and brought the Jews to the king of Egypt, to the king was Amemophis; but this man says it was Phraiphanes. As to the numbers of the multitude that were expelled, they agree exceedingly well, the former reckoning them eighty thousand, and the other eighty thousand, and sixty and fifty thousand. Now, for Manetho, he describes these polluted persons as sent first to work in the quarries, and says, that after that, the city Avaris was given them for their habitation, tho' they had been in the war with the rest of the Egyptians, that they invited the people of Jerusalem to come to their assistance; while Chereamon says out of Egypt, and lighted upon three hundred and eighty and eight thousand men about Pelusium, who had been left there by Amemophis, and so they invaded Egypt with them again; that thereupon Amemophis fled into

Egypt, and Chereamon says, that about this time there a most ridiculous slander in not informing us who his army of so many ten thousands were, or whence they came; whether they were, native

Egyptians, or whether they came from a foreign country; who does know what he could, and what formed a dream from Jais, about the leprous people, asigned the reason why the king would not bring them into Egypt. Moreover, Manetho sets down Joseph as driven away at the same time where the city Avaris was given them, and before Moses, which four generations make almost gene hundred and seventy years. Besides all this,

Ramases, the son of Amemophis, by Manetho's account, was a young man, and assisted his father in this, and lastly, they say the same time with him, and fled into Ethiopia. But Chereamon makes him to have been born in a certain cave, after his father was dead, and that he then overcame the enemies in battle, and drove them into

Syria, being in number about two hundred thousand. O the levity of the man! For he had neither told us who these three hundred and eighty thousand were, nor how the four hundred and thirty thousand was got together, nor how they came into that land which is called Judges, and there they built a city, and dwelt therein, and that their city was named Hierosyla, from this their robbing of the temples; but that still, upon the success they had after this, they in time changed its denomination, that it might not be a reproach to them, and called the city Hierosolyma, and themselves Hierosolymites.

35. Now this man did not discover nor mention the same king with the others, but feigned a newer name, and passing by the dream and the Egyptian prophet, brings him to [Jupitrus]

Hannous, in order to gain oracles about the scabby and leprosy; and the hereditary and generotude of Jews were gathered together at the temples. Now it is uncertain whether he ascribes his name to these lepers, or to those that were subject to such diseases among the Jews

as of a prodigious rarity; for had they been only con-futed by other men, it had been more tolerable.

34. I shall now add to these accounts about

By way of irony, I suppose.

[Here we see that Josephus narrates a generation between Joseph and Moses, about 32 or 33 years; which, should be still so great a multitude remaining? Or after what manner did they pass over the desert, and get the land which we now dwell in, and build our city, and that temple which hath been so famous among all mankind? And besides, he ought to have spoken more about our language, and about giving us our own name; and to have informed us of what nation he was, and what parents he was derived from; and to have assigned the reasons why he undertook to make such a journey, and to go and concern himself about matters of injustice with regard to men during that journey. For, in case the people were by birth Egyptians, they would not on the sudden have so easily changed the customs of their country when they had been foreign: but they had for certain some laws or other, which had been kept by them from long custom. It is true, that with regard to those who ejected them, they might have sworn never to bear good-will to them, and might have had a plausible reason for so doing. But if these men resolved to wage an implacable war against all men, in case they had acted as wickedly as he relates of them, and this while they wanted the assistance of all men, this demonstrates a kind of man conduct indeed, but not of the men themselves, but very greatly so of him who tells such lies upon them. He hath also impudence enough to say, that a name impugning them with all sorts of reproaches over the city, and that this name was afterward changed. The reason of which is plain, that the former name brought reproach and hatred upon them in the times of their poverty, while, it seems, those that built the city were of that name, and in the city by giving it such a name. So we see that this wise fellow had such an unbounded inclination to reproach us, that he did not understand that robbery of temples is not expressed by the name being taken away from the fathers of us among the Greeks. But why should a man say any more to a person who tells such impudent lies? However, since this book is written to command respect, length, I will make another beginning, and endeavor to add what still remains to perfect my design in the following book.

77]

* This is the meaning of Hierotheus in Greek, not in Hebrew.

BOOK II.

1. In the former book, most honored Epaphroditus, I have demonstrated our antiquity, and confirmed the truth of what I have said, from the writings of the Phanomians, and Chaldeans, and Egyptians. I have, moreover, produced many of the Grecian writers as witnesses thereof. I have also made a refutation of Manetho and Coptic, and all their other adversaries. I shall now, therefore, begin a confirmation of the remaining authors who have written anything against us; although I confess I have had a doubt upon me about Apion the grammarian, whether he could or not to take the trouble of attacking him or not; for some of his writings contain much the same accusations which the others have laid against us, some things that he hath added are very frigid and contemptible, and for the greatest part what he says, it is very scurrilous, and, to speak no more than the plain truth, it speaks him to be a very unlearned person, and what he lays together looks like the work of a man of very bad manner, and of one more to his advantage. But that he should be better in his whole life than a moustachian. - Yet, because there are a great many men so very foolish, that they are rather caught by such orations than by what is written with care, and take pleasure in reading the books of men, and cannot be persuaded to hear them condemned, I thought it to be necessary not to let this man go off without examination, who had written such an accusation against us, as if he would bring us to make an answer in open court. For I also have observed, that many men are very much delighted when they see a man who first began to reproach another, to be himself exposed to contempt on account of the vice he hath himself been guilty of. However, it is not a very easy thing to get over this man's discourse, nor to know plainly what he means: yet does he seem, amidst a great confusion and disorder in his falsehoods, to produce, in the first place, such things as resemble what I have exposed and confuted in the first book. Moreover, he accuses the Jews that are inhabitants of Alexandria; as, in the third place, he raises the same accusations as concern the sacred purifications, with the other legal rites used in the temple.

2. Now, although I cannot but think that I have already demonstrated, and that abundantly confirmed the truth of what I have said, from the writings of the Phanomians, and Chaldeans, and Egyptians. I have, moreover, produced many of the Grecian writers as witnesses thereof. I have also made a refutation of Manetho and Coptic, and all their other adversaries. I shall now, therefore, begin a confirmation of the remaining authors who have written anything against us; although I confess I have had a doubt upon me about Apion the grammarian, whether he could or not to take the trouble of attacking him or not; for some of his writings contain much the same accusations which the others have laid against us, some things that he hath added are very frigid and contemptible, and for the greatest part what he says, it is very scurrilous, and, to speak no more than the plain truth, it speaks him to be a very unlearned person, and what he lays together looks like the work of a man of very bad manner, and of one more to his advantage. But that he should be better in his whole life than a moustachian. - Yet, because there are a great many men so very foolish, that they are rather caught by such orations than by what is written with care, and take pleasure in reading the books of men, and cannot be persuaded to hear them condemned, I thought it to be necessary not to let this man go off without examination, who had written such an accusation against us, as if he would bring us to make an answer in open court. For I also have observed, that many men are very much delighted when they see a man who first began to reproach another, to be himself exposed to contempt on account of the vice he hath himself been guilty of. However, it is not a very easy thing to get over this man's discourse, nor to know plainly what he means: yet does he seem, amidst a great confusion and disorder in his falsehoods, to produce, in the first place, such things as resemble what I have exposed and confuted in the first book. Moreover, he accuses the Jews that are inhabitants of Alexandria; as, in the third place, he raises the same accusations as concern the sacred purifications, with the other legal rites used in the temple.

1 Called by Tiberius, Cymbalhem Almond, the drum of the world.

2 This seems to have been the first dish that had been made in Egypt, and was a little before the time that Abas was given a large, well regulated and a large number of inhabitants. Abas is the first year of the seventh Olympiad, at which we shall see presently. See 1 Kings xx. 11; Isaiah xxxvi. 6.
bated and the lame out of Egypt, see how well this most accurate grammarian of ours agrees with those that have written before him. Mase- theo says, that the Jews departed out of Egypt in the reign of Tutmose, three hundred and ninety-three years before Damasus died to Argos; Lysi- machus says it was under king Bocchoris; and that it was one thousand seven hundred years ago; Molo and some others determined it as every one pleased; but this Apion, as ours, as deserving to be believed forty days they both determined it ex- actly to have been in the seventh Olympiad, and the first year of that Olympiad; the very same year in which he says that Carthage was built by the Phenicians. The reason why he added this to his narrative, was, as he thought, to strengthen his assertion by so evident a character of chronology. But he was not aware, that this character confutes his assertion: for if we may give credit to the Phae- nicians, the city of Con and the other cities growing out of their colony to Carthage, they relate that Hi- rom their king was above a hundred and fifty years earlier than the building of Carthage, con- scerning whom I have formerly produced testimo- nial evidence that may not be denied; and that this Hiram was a friend of Solomon when he was building the temple at Jerusalem, and gave him great assistance in his building that temple, while still Solomon himself built that temple, and the Phenicians were building Carthage. The Jews came out of Egypt. As for the number of those that were expelled out of Egypt, he hath contrived to have the very same number with Lysi machus, and says they were a hundred and ten thousand families. He hath moreover a won- derful and plausible occasion for the name of Sab- bath; for he says, that "when the Jews had trav-elled a six days' journey, they had babies in the womb, and they had settled on the seventh day, as having got safety to that country which is now called Judæa; that then they preserved the language of the Egyptians, and called that day the Sabbath, that they had done this. And the Sabbath became named Sabbatneian by the Egyptians." And would not a man now laugh at this fellow's trifling, or rather hate his impudence in writing thus? We must, it seems, take it for granted that the name Sabbath was taken from the time they must have these baboes. But, for certain, if those men had been blind and lame, and had all sorts of distempers upon them, as Apion says they had, they could not have gone one single day from the wilderness, and they could not have travel over a large desert, and besides that to fight and conquer those that opposed them, they had not all of them bad baboes on their groin after the sixth day was over: for no such distem- per no wise moves to the sixth day upon things that travel; but still, when there are many ten thousands in a camp together, they constantly search a settled space [in a day]. Nor is it at all possible that such a thing should happen by chance; but the word must be understood to be so supposed. However, our admirable anath Apio- no had before told us, that "they came to Judæa in six days' time" and again, that "Moses was met by himself." He knew he was called Judæa; and Araba, which was called Sinai, and was encircled there forty days, and that when he came down from thence, he gave laws to the Jews. But then, how was it possible for them to have gone from the wilderness to the plains of Canaan so quickly? The place was so barren, and so waste, and at the same time to pass all over the country between that and Judæa in six days? And as for this grammatical translation of the word Sabbath, it either contains an in- sistence of his great impudence or gross ignorance; for the words Sabbo and Sabbath are widely dif- ferent from one another: for the word Sabbath in the Jewish language denotes rest from all sorts of work; but the word Sabbo, as he affirms, de- notes among the Egyptians a snail of a babe in the groin. 3. This is that novel account which the Egypt- ian Apion gives us concerning the Jews' depart- ure out of Egypt, and is no better than a conti- vance of his own. But why should we wonder at the lies he tells about our forefathers, when he affirms them to be of Egyptians original, when he lies also about himself? for although he was born at Oeas in Egypt, he pretends to be, as a man may say, the progenitor of all the Egyptians, and yet he foresees his real country and his pro- genitors, and, by falsely pretending to be born at Alexandria, cannot deny the pravity of his fami- ly; for you see how justly he calls those Egyptians whom he says were not Jews, to be Jews for had he not deemed Egyptians to be a name of great reproach, he would not have avoided the name of an Egyptian himself; as we know that those who-beg of their own countries, value themselves there, and are so dear to their des- tery, and reprove such as unjustly lay claim thereto. As for the Egyptians' claim to be of our kindred, they do it on one of the following ac- counts: I mean, either, as they value themselves upon it, and desire to be esteemed as such or else as they would draw in us to be partakers of their own sin in. But this fine fellow Apion seems to brooch this reproachful appellation against us, [that we were originally Egyptians,] in order to be esteemed as an Egyptian, and to make war for the privilege they had given him of being a fellow-citizen with them; he also is as- sisted in this by the ill-will the Alexandrians bear to those Jews who are their fellow-citizens, and so he proposes to himself that he may, by his art of lie, be estimable according to the nation thereby, and include all the other Egyptians also, while in both cases he is no better than an impudent liar.
the founder of that city gave them the privileges belonging thereto? After the like manner do those Jews that inhabit Ephesus and the other cities of Ionia, enjoy the same name with those that were originally born there, by the grant of the succeeding princes; nay, the kindness and humanity of the Romans hath been so great, that it hath granted leave to almost all others to take the same name of the Romans upon them; so that you may see now, how especially men only of large nations themselves also; for those anciently named Iberi, and Tyrrenhi, and Sabini, are now called Romans. And if Apion reject this way of obtaining the privilege of a citizen of Athens, why should he deny himself an Alexandrian hereafter; for otherwise, how can he who was born in the very heart of Egypt be an Alexandrian, if this way of accepting such a privilege of what he would have us deprive, be once abrogated? Although, indeed, these Romans, who are now the lords of the habitable earth, have forbidden the Egyptians to have the privileges of any city whatsoever; while this same fellow, who is willingly partake of such a privilege himself as he is forbidden to make of, endeavors by calumnies to deprive those of it that have justly received it; for Alexander did not, therefore, get some of our nation to Alexander, and he himself inhabitant for this his city, on whose building he had bestowed so much pain; but this was given to our people as a reward, because he had, upon a careful trial, found them all to have been men of virtue and fidelity to themselves, and to the kings assigning us. Alexander however our nation to such a degree, that, for the equity and the fidelity which the Jews had exhibited to him, he permitted them to hold the country of Samaria free from tribute. Of this he himself was, also was Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, as to those Jews who dwelt at Alexandria. For he intrusted the fortresses of Egypt into their hands, as believing they would keep them faithfully and valiantly for him; and when he had extinguished the tyrants and other tyrants, and the other cities of Libya to himself, he sent a party of Jews to inhabit them. And for his successor Ptolemy, who was called Phidias, I see not only set all those of our nation, who we are not unjustly said to have frequented money for [their reason:] and what was his greatest work of all, he had a great desire of knowing our laws, and of obtaining the honor of carrying our name, and of enjoying his country. He desired that such men might be sent him as might interpret our law to him: and in order to have them well compiled, he committed that care to so ordinary persons, but ordained that Demetrius Philheres, and Andreas, and Aristaeus; the first, Demetrius, the most learned person of his age, and the others, such as were intrusted with the guard of his body, should take the care of this matter; nor would he certainly have been so desirous of learning our law and the philosophy of our nation, had he despised the men that made use of it, or had he not indeed had them in great admiration.

5. Now this Apion was unacquainted with almost all the kings of these Macedonians whom he pretends to have been his progenitors; who were yet very well affected towards us; for the third of those Ptolemies, who was called Ergetes, when he had gotten possession of all Syria he did not at once impose the Egyptian gods for his victory, but came to Jerusalem, and, according to our laws, offered many sacrifices to God, and dedicated to him such gifts as were suitable to such a victory; and as for Ptolemy Philopator and his wife Cleopatra, they committed their whole kingdom to the Jews, when Onias and Deodotes both were, whose names are lauded at by Apion, were the generals of their whole army. But certainly, instead of reproaching them, he ought to admire their actions, and return them thanks for arising for the glory of their nation; for when these Alexandrians were making war with Cleopatra the queen, and were in danger of being utterly ruined, these Jews brought them to terms of agreement, and freed them from the danger. And when Onias, after the death of Alexander, brought a small army afterward upon the city, at the time when Tiberius the Roman ambassador was there present. Yes, do I restore to say, and that he did rightly and very justly is so doing; for that Ptolemy who was once, making war upon the death of his brother Philopator, came from Cyrene, and would have ejected Cleopatra as well as her sons out of their kingdom that he might obtain it for himself unjustly. For this cause then, it was, that Onias sent a war against him on Cleopatra's account; nor would he desert that trust the royal family had reposed in him in their distress. Accordingly, he recovered a kingdom which he never had; and took some proceedings; for when Ptolemy Physcon, had the presumption to fight against Onias's army, and had caught all the Jews that were in the city, [Alexandria,] with their children and wives, and with a thousand elephants, that they might be troubled upon and destroyed; and when he had made those elephants drunk for that purpose, the event proved contrary to his preparations; for these elephants left the town; and the Jews were enabled to put them down, and by(turning) upon Physcon's friends, and slew a great number of them; nay, after this, Ptolemy saw a terrible ghost, which prohibited his hurting those men: his very conscience whom he loved so well, to whom he was related, and other concerning him, making supplication to him, that he would not perpetrate so great a wickedness. So he compiled with her request, and repented of what he either had already done or thought to do; whereas it is well known that the Alexander and his, with good reason celebrate this day, on the account that they had thereon been vouchsafed such an evident deliverance from God. However, Apion, he adds not that this event was owing to the nation of the Jews, or to the knowledge of their religion; and no provision was made to accuse the Jews for making this war against Physcon, when he ought to have commended them for the same. This man also makes mention of Cleopatra, the last queen of Alex- andria, and abuses us, because she was unkind to us; whereas he ought to have reproved her, who indulged herself in all kinds of injustice and wicked practices, both with regard to her near relations and husbands who had loved her, and in general, with regard to all the Romans, and those emperors that were her benefactors; who also had her sister Arsinoe slain in a temple, when she had done her no harm: moreover, she had her brother slain by private treachery, the two being destroyed the gods of Egypt and the sepulchers of her progenitors; and while she had received her kingdom from the first Cesar, she had the impudence to rebel against her son and successor: nay, she corrupt all Egypt with intoxication as she did in her youth, and made it an enemy to his country, and made him terrors to his friends, and [by his means] despoiled some

*For the sake of, or frequently, I would here read the, a great deal of money; for we, indeed, read both in Amsterdam, and the text of that Ptolemies, which has been universally supposed to have happened under Ptolemy Philopator, the fourth of those Ptolemies, that was the son of Onias, and killed his seven sons at a sacrifice, and made him terrors to his friends, and [by his means] despoiled some

1 What error is here generally believed to have been committed by our Josephus in ascribing a deliverance of the Jews to the reign of Ptolemy Physcon, whereas it is evident that those Ptolemies, which has been universally supposed to have happened under Ptolemy Philopator, the fourth of those Ptolemies, that was the son of Onias, and killed his seven sons at a sacrifice, and made him terrors to his friends, and [by his means] despoiled some citizens in proper times, but style those who are well known to be in especial danger to them all, no other than foreigners; for it does not appear that any of the kings had ever formerly bestowed those privileges of citizens upon Egyptians, no more than have the emperors done it more or less sparingly; yet it was the case that they introduced us into this city at first, the kings augmented our privileges therein, and the Romans have been pleased to preserve them always inviolate. Moreover, Apion would lay a blit upon us, to make us appear not to be of the same family as our emperors; as if those emperors did not know this before, or stood in need of Apion as their defender; whereas he ought rather to have admired the magnanimity and modesty of the Romans, whereby they do not compel those that are subject to them to transgress the laws of their countries, but are willing to receive the honors due to them after such a manner as those who are to pay them esteem consistent with piety, and with their own laws; for God; with which honors for conferring honors upon them, when they are compelled by violence so to do. Accordingly, since the Grecians and some other nations think it a right thing to make images, perhaps they have painted the pictures of their parents, and wives, and children, they exult for joy; and some there are who take pictures for themselves of such persons as were never related to them, as the Egyptians; and, some take the images of trees, the rocks, and all the rest of the real time it was, and how great a want there was then of corn, but tends nothing to the accusation of the Jews; for what all the emperors have thought of the Alexandrian Jews is well known; for this honest man, of whom it was often omitted with regard to the Jews than it was with regard to the other inhabitants of Alexandria. And if Germanicus was not able to make a distribution of corn to all the inhabitants of Alexandria, the Jews would be no more able to do it; but, if these kings think them unworthy of having the entire custody thereof upon all occasions.

6. But, besides this, Apion objects to us thus: — "If the Jews, (says he,) be citizens of Alexandria, and of the senate and its decum, of the same ed- piles of Augustus Caesar, whereby our merits (to the Romans) are justified. Apion ought to have looked upon those edpiles, and, in particular, to have read those which were made up to his half under Alexander and all the Ptolemies, and the decrease of the senate and of the greatest Roman emperors. And if Germanicus was not able to make a distribution of corn to all the inhabitants of Alexandria, why then, some take the pictures of all the rest of the real time it was, and how great a want there was then of corn, but tends nothing to the accusation of the Jews; for what all the emperors have thought of the Alexandrian Jews is well known; for this honest man, of whom it was often omitted with regard to the Jews than it was with regard to the other inhabitants of Alexandria. But they still were desirous to preserve what the kings had formerly entrusted to their care; and if the Jews were to take any part of the kings' property, they did not object to those kings think them unworthy of having the entire custody thereof upon all occasions.

7. However, I cannot but admire those other authors who furnished this man with such his materials: I mean Poseidounis and Apollonius [the son of] Molo, who, while they accuse us for not worshipping the same gods whom others worship, they think themselves not guilty of impiety when they tell lies of our cities and reproachful stories about our temple; whereas it is a most shameful thing for freemen to forgive lies on any occasion, and much more so, to forgive them about our temple, which was so famous over all the world, whereas, when our ancestors for Apion had the impudence to pretend, 'that the Jews placed an ass's head in their holy place,' and he affirms, 'that this was discovered when Antiochus Epiphanes spoiled our temple, and found that they had as much gold, that we thought it worth a great deal of money.' To this my first answer shall be this, that had there been any such thing among us, an Egyptian ought by us means to have thrown it in our teeth, since an is not a more contemptible animal than the goat and other such creatures, which among men are gods. But besides this answer, I say farther, how comes it about that Apion does not understand this to be no other than a palpable lie, and to be confessed by the thing itself, namely the clearly incredible? For we Jews are always governed by the same laws, in which we constantly persevere; and although many misfortunes have befallen our city, as the like have befallen others, and although other cities were demolished by Titus, [Epiphanius,] and Pompey, and the Great, and Licinicus Crassus, and last of all Titus Caesar, have conquered us in war, and gotten possession of our temple; yet have they none of them found any such thing there, nor indeed anywhere else, which was agreeable to the strictest justice; and although what they found we are not at liberty to reveal to other nations. But for 30 Antiochus, [Epiphanius,] he had no just cause for that ravage in our temple that he made; he only came to it when he wanted money, without declaring himself our enemy, and attacked us while we were his associates and his friends; nor did he find anything there that was ridiculous. This is attested by many worthy writers; Ptolemy of Memphis, and others of the Caesars, and of Caius Antonius, and of Demetrius, and of Ptolemy, and of Timagenes, Castor the chronologist, and Apollodorus, who says that it was out of Antiochus’s want of money that he broke his leg, and when he was brought into the temple, when it was full of gold and silver. Apion ought to have had a regard to these facts, unless he had himself either an ass’s heart or a dog’s impudence; of such a dog I mean as they worship; for he is not only a mad dog but also an external罗马的西而这全有the tale he tells us. As for us Jews, we ascribe no honor or power to asses, as do the Egyptians to crocodiles and asps, when they esteem such as are set upon by the former, or bitten by the latter. For why should a dog, and persons worthy of God. Asses are the same with which we are with other wise men, viz. creatures that bear the burdens that we lay upon them; but if they come to our threshing-floors, and eat our corn, or do other things which we impose upon them, we beat them with a great many stripes, because it is their business to minister to us in our husbandry affairs. But this Apion of ours was either perfectly unskilful in the composition of such falseries; or he was liar, or he was lying for the sake of his profit; or he was a Socinian falling into that error which is most [somewhat better] he was not able to persever to in what he had undertaken, since he hath no manner of success in those reproaches as he casts upon us.

8. But the other Grecian is false, in order to prove this ; it being not enough to say, that they who presume to speak about divine worship, ought not to be ignorant of this plain truth, that it is a degree of less impurity to pass through temples, than to forge wicked calumnies of its priests. Now, such men as are more zealous to justify a sacrilegious king, than to write what is just and what is true about us and about our temple; for when they are defending one thing indulging in another, that perfidiosity and sacrilege which he was guilty of, with regard to our nation, when he wanted money, they endeavor to disgrace us, and tell lies, even relating to futurities. Apion confesses the man’s justifying him upon this occasion, and says, that Antiochus found in our temple a bed and a man lying upon it, with a small table before him, full of dainties, from the fishes of the sea, and the fruits of the dry land; that this man had been there for days that did not betake before him; that he immediately adored the king upon his coming in, as hoping that he would afford him all possible assistance; that he fell down upon his knees, and stretched out to him his right hand, and begged to be released; and that when the king bade him sit down, and tell him who he was, and why he dwelt there, and what was the meaning of those various sorts of food that were set before him, the man made a lamentable complaint, that this was just what he had done, and that he was this account of the distress he was in, and said, that he was a Greek, and that as he went over this province, in order to get his living, he was seized upon by foreigners, on a sudden, and was brought before the king. This was seen by nobody, but was fastened by these curious provisions thus set before him; and that truly, at the first, such unexpected advantages seemed to him matter of great joy; that after this, however, it was agreeable to the strictest justice; and that length, astonishment, what their meaning should be; that at last he inquired of the servants that came to him, and was by them informed, that it was in order to the fulfilling a law of the Jews, which they must not tell him, that he was seized; and that they did the same at a set time every year; that they used to catch a Greek foreigner and fast him thus up every year, and then lead him to a certain wood, and kill him, and use him, and to make him a sacrifice, and taste of his entrails, and take an oath upon thus sacrificing a Greek, that they would ever be at enmity with the Greeks; and that then they threw the remains of the sacrifice into the sea. This is what I call the pit.” Apion adds farther, “that the man said, there were but a few days to come ere he was to be slain, and inquired Antiochus, that, out of the reverence he bore to the Grecian Gods, he would not believe, but desired that he should be allowed to consult on the point, and get back into the country, and to so die in his own blood, and would deliver him from the miseries with which he was encompassed.” Now, this is such a most tragical false as is full of nothing but cruelty and impudence; yet does it not even adduce a single instance of this; and those who wrote it in his vindication are willing to suppose; for he could not presume beforehand that he should meet with any such thing as coming to the temple; and must have found it unnecessary to assert anything of this sort to prove that he was an impostor, that was given to unlawful pleasures, and had no regard to God in his actions. But [after Apion] he has done whatever his extraordinary love of lying hath dictated to him, as it is most likely he was before he began his works; for the difference of our laws is known not to regard the Grecians only, but they are principally opposite to the Egyptians, and to some other nations also; and while it so falls out of the way of common sense, it would astonish and confound us, how comes it about that we take an oath, and conspire openly against the Grecians, and that by the effusion of their blood also? Or, how is it possible, that all the Jews should get together in these sacrifices, and the extirpation of one man should be sufficient for so many thousands to taste of them, as Apion pretends? Or, why did not the king carry this man, whosoever he was, down in Apion’s book, with great pomp back into his own country, when he might thereby have been esteemed a religious person himself, and a mighty lover of the Greeks, and might thereby have procured himself the good will from all men against that hatred the Jews bore to him. But I leave this matter: for the proper way of confuting fouls is not to use base words, but to appeal to the things themselves that are said, and lay the hand upon them. It was not ever the construction of our temple, of what nature it was, know well enough how the purity of it was never to be profaned; for it had four several courts, encompassed with choisters round about lost; I mean so far of their writings as considered that description; though it is plain Josephus perceived them all, as extent in his time.

It is remarkable that Josephus here, and, I think, in places also, roughens some few distinct courts of the temple. every one of which had, by our law, a peculiar degree of separation from the rest. Into the first course one part was set apart for the men of the first generation, and some but women, during their courses, were permitted to pass through it; all the Jews went into the second court, as well as their wives, were separated from all uncleanliness; into the third went the Jewish men when they were clean and purged; into the fourth went the priests, bearing on their ascendant garments: but for the most sacred place, none went in but the high priest, and it was only opened to him with wonder. Now there is so great caution used about these offices of religion, that the priests are appointed to go into the temple but at certain hours; for in the morning, at the opening of the inner temple, these holy persons are not to be seen; no sooner do they rise in the night than they continue as they do again at noon, till the doors are shut. Lastly, it is not so much as lawful to carry any vessel into the holy house, nor is there any thing therein but the altar (of incense), the table (of the purifying of our temple, the holy table) and the laver, which are all written in the law; for there is no thing farther there, nor are there any mysteries performed that may not be spoken of; nor is there any fasting within the place. For what I have mentioned above, I will not admit the testimony of the whole people, and their operations are very manifest; for although there be four courses of the priests, and every one of them have above five thousand men in them, yet do they not all appear together, as some imagine; those days are over, other priests succeed in the performance of their services, and assemble together at mid-day, and receive the keys of the temple, and the vessels by take, without any thing relating to food or drink being carried into the temple; nay, we are not allowed to offer such things at the altar, excepting what is prepared for the sacrifices.

None of this can we say of Apion, but that he examined nothing that concerned these things, while still he uttered incredible words about them; but it is a great shame for a grammarian not to be able to write true history. Now, if he knew the purity of our temple, he had not, entirely, omitted to take notice of it; but he forges a story about the seizing of a Gracianus, about ineffable food, and the most delicious preparation of delicacies; and pretends that strangers could go into the temple, andHoly men of the first course, as none of the Jews are not allowed to enter unless they be priests. This, therefore, is the utmost degree of impiety, and a voluntary lie, in order to the delusion of those who will not examine into the truth of the facts. For the holy men of the first course, chief among whom are the high priests, have been all of late years, as above related, became occasioned by so many calamities that are raised upon us.

10. Nay, this miracle of piety devieth us farther, and adds the following pretended facts to those former fabes: he says, that when the Jews were in a long war with the Idumeans, there came a man out of one of the cities of the Idumeans, who there had worshipped Apollo. This man, whose name was Zabius, obtained the favor of the Jews, and promised that he would deliver Apollo, the god of Dora, into their hands, and that he would come to our temple, if they would all come up with him, and receive the temple, and the Jews with them; that Zabius made him a certain wooden instrument, and put it round about him, and set three rows of lamps therein, and walked after such a manner, that he appeared to them the god Apollo, and that the sky was full of stars walking upon the earth; that the Jews were terrified frightened at so surprising an apperance, and stood very quiet at some distance; and that Zabius, while they continued so very quiet, went into the temple, and placed the golden head of an ass, (for so factiously does he write,) and then went his way back again to Dora, in great haste. And say you so, sir? as I may reply, that Apion load the ass, that is himself, and lays on him a burden of lies; and for his letters and lies, he is one of the persons that has no being, and not knowing the cities he speaks of, he changes their situation; for Idumea borders on Arabia, and is an inland country, where there is no such city as Dora: although there be, it is true, a city named Dora, in Phoenicia near Mount Carmel, but it is four days' journey from Idumea. Now, then, why does this man tell us things so confus is, as we have no books in common with other nations? If our forefathers were so easily prevailed upon to have Apollo come to them, and thought they saw him walking upon the earth, and the stars with him; for certain those who have so many feet, and particular by fifty lamps, must yet, at this rate, have never seen a candlestick! but still it seems that while Zabius took his journey over the country, there were so many ten thousands of people, nobody met him. He must, then, it seems, have been in the war, found the walls of Jerusalem destitute of guards: I omit the rest. Now the doors of the holy house were seventy cubits high, and twenty cubits broad; they were all plated over with gold, and adorned with certain precious stones, and no fewer than twenty men required to shut them every day; nor was it lawful ever to leave them open, though it seems this lamp-bearer of ours opened them easily, or thought he opened them, as he thought he had the gods in his hand. Whether, therefore, he returned it to us again, or whether Apion took it and brought it into the temple again, that Antiochus might find it, and afford us a handle for a second s Fate of Apion's, is uncertain.

11. Apion also tells a false story when he mentions an oath of ours, as if we "swore by God, the maker of the heaven, and earth, and to bear no lie will have our say any longer, and particularly by none of the Greeks." Now this oath ought to have said directly, that "we would bear no good will to any foreigner, and particularly to none of the Egyptians." For then his story about the high priests, who were bound to kill or to have destroyed all the original forgeries, in case our forefathers had been driven away by their kinsmen the Egyptians, not on account of any wickedness they had been guilty of, but on account of the calamities which they were uncaptured by force of arms; that these rather remote from them in place, than different from them in our institutions, insomuch that we have no enmity with them, or any jealousy of them. On the contrary, it hath so happened, that many of the Jews have come over to our laws and some of them have continued in their observation, although others of them, had not courage enough to persevere, and so departed from them again; or did any body ever hear this oath sworn by us? Apion, on the other hand, most unwarily and heedlessly, for he indeed was the first composer of it. In 12. However, Apion deserves to be admired for his great prudence, as to what I am going to say, which is that they are a plain mark among us, that we neither have just laws, nor worship God as we ought to do, because we are not governors, but are rather in subjection to Gentiles, sometimes to one nation, and sometimes to another; and that the city of Jerusalem, and several other cities, while their city (Alexandria) had been of old time an imperial city, and not used to be in subjection to the Romans." But now this man had better leave off his bragging, for every body but himself would think, that Apion said what he hath said against himself; for there are very few nations that have had the good fortune to continue many generations in the principality, but still the mutations in human affairs have put them into subjection under others; and most nations have been often subdued, and brought into subjection by others. Now for the Egyptians, they are the only nation that hath had this extraordinary privilege to have never served any of those monarchs who subdued Asia and Europe, and this on account, as they pretend, that the gods had into their country, and were unwilling to be engaged into the shapes of wild beasts: Whereas these Egyptians are the very people who appear to have never, in all the past ages, had one day of freedom, no, not so much as from their own lords. For I will not reproach them with relating how the Persians used them, and this not once only, but many times, when they laid their cities waste, demolished their temples, and cut the throats of those animals whom they esteemed sacred; for it is not reasonable to imitate the clownish ignorance of Apion, who hath no regard to the misfortunes of the Athenians, or of the Macedonians, the latter of whom were styled by all men the most courageous, and the former by all the wisest of men. I say nothing of such kings as have been famous for piety, particularly of one of them whose name was Cresus, nor what calamities he met with in his triumph over the city of Delphi, of the temple at Ephesus, of the destruction of ten thousand others which have been burnt down, while nobody cast reproaches on those that were the sufferers, but on those that were the authors of these calamities. Now we have Apion, an accuser of our nation, though one that still forgets the miseries of his own people the Egyptians; but it is that Sesostris, who was once so celebrated a king of Egypt, that hath blinded him: now we will not brag of our kings, David and Solomon, though they conquered many nations: accordingly we will let them alone. However, Apion is ignorant of what every body knows, that the Egyptians were servants to the Persians, and afterwards to the Macedonians, when they were lords of Asia, and were not better than slaves, while we have enjoyed liberty formerly; nay, more than that, have had the dominion of the cities that lie round about us, and the dominion of the sea in their hundred and twentieth years, until Pompeius Magnus. And when all the kings every where were conquered by the Romans, our ancestors were the only people who continued to be esteemed their confederates and friends, on account of their fidelity to them. 13. But says Apion, "we Jews have not had any wonderful men amongst us, nor any inventors of arts, nor any eminent for wisdom."—He then enumerates Socrates, and Zeno, and Cleintheus, and some others of the same sort; and after all, he adds himself to them, which is the most wonderful thing of all that he says, and pronounces Alexandria to be happy because it hath such and such a man as he is in it; and I say, he was the fittest man to be a witness to his own deserts, although he hath appeared to all others no better than a wicked mountebank, of a corrupt life and ill discourses; on which account one may justly pity them, and with good reason, if it should turn upon such a citizen as he is. But as to our own men, he hath: *This notorious disgrace belonging peculiarly to the people of Egypt, ever since the times of the old prophets of the Jews, noted both section 4 already, and here, may be seen the two views of an Egyptian of Polaeum, Epist. lib. i. cap. 499. ... that they continued in the use of those unwritten customs, although they were always changing them upon several occasions. But for our legislator, who was of so much greater antiquity than the rest, (as even those who speak against us upon all occasions, at all times, the scribes,) he absolved himself to the people as their best governor and councillor, and included in his legislation the entire conduct of their lives, and preserved with them to receive it, and brought it so to pass, that they never did, and were not answered with his laws did most carefully observe them.

17. But let us consider his first and greatest work: for when it was resolved on by our forefathers to come over to the side of Egypt, and to return to their own country, this Moses took the many ten thousands that were of the people, and saved them out of many desperate distresses, and brought them home in safety. And certainly it was here necessary to travel over a country without roads and full of sand, to overcome their enemies, and during these battles, to preserve their children, and their wives, and their prey; so all which occasions he became an excellent general of an entire army, and he conducted himself so in the mention of the laws of other nations, that are contrary to ours, those ought deservedly to thank themselves for it, who have pretended to deprive us of our laws upon such comparison of their own: nor will there, I think, be made by them a pretense to that, either that we have no such laws ourselves, an epiphany of which I will present to the reader, or that we do not, above all men, live very virtuously; wives, widows, and orphans. 16. To begin then a good way backward: I would advance this, in the first place, that those who have been admirers of good order, and of living under common laws, and who began to introduce those laws, and that degree of virtue which the legislator of the greatest advantage, which is the usual time when governments gain great powers to themselves, and pave the way for tyranny, and ascendant the multitude to live very virtuously: wives, widows, and orphans. 16. while the Athenians, and almost all the other Greeks, made laws about what was to be done or left undone, but had no regard to the exercising them thereto is practice.

But for our legislators, he very carefully joined these two methods of instruction together: for he neither left those practical exercises to go on without verbal instruction, nor did he permit them to go on without the exercises for practice, but beginning immediately from the earliest infancy, and the appointment of every one’s diet, he left nothing of the very smallest consequence to be done at the pleasure of all mankind, but so contrivingly he made a fixed rule of law what sorts of food they should abstain from, and what sorts they should make use of; as also what commodities they should have with others; what great differences they should use, as to eating or drinking, and what times of rest should be interposed; that, by living under that law as under a father and a master, we might be guilty of no sin, neither voluntary nor out of ignorance; for he did not propose this law to be so, nor did he not now explain how these notions of God are the sentiments of the wisest among the Grecians, and how they were taught them upon the principles that he afforded them. However, they testify with great assuredness that those notions are confirmed, and agreeable to the nature of God, and to his majesty; for Pythagoras, and Anaxagoras, and Plato, and the Stoic philosophers that succeeded them, and almost all the rest, are of the same sentiments, and hold the same notions of the name of God; yet we must not be idle so much as to have determined those notions of persons moral and immutible through all eternity, superior to all mortal conceptions in perfection; and, though known to us by his power, yet unknown to us by his name. It is not now expected that these men shall declare those truths unerring and immutable through all eternity, so that they may be known by the name of God; yet we must not allow these men to disclose those truths about these possessions to more than a few, because the body of the people were prejudiced with other opinions before. He, therefore, to each legislator, who was to agree to his laws, did not only present those that were his contemporaries to agree with these notions, but also imprinted this faith in God upon all their posterity, that it never could be dissolved; the reason why the constitution of this kind of government was so much better directed to the utility of all, other than public laws were, is this, that Moses did not make religion a part of virtue, but he saw and he ordained other virtues to be parts of it; and indeed, justly, he did not for tunes and temperance, and a universal agreement of the members of the community with one another; for all our actions and studies, and all our words (in Moses’s settlement) have a reference to God; for he could not do otherwise without those in suspense or undetermined. For there are two ways of coming at any sort of learning, and a moral conduct of life; the one is by instruction in words, the other by practical exercises. Now he has two ways in their opinions, and choosing one of those ways of instruction, or that which best pleased every one of them, neglected the other. Thus did the Lacedaemonians, and the Cretians, get to be learned by practical exercises, but not by words;

This expression itself, οὕτως ἀντερινεμένοι, is very peculiar. That Moses ordained the Jewish government in such a manner, may be illustrated by that parallel expression, οὕτως ἁλίθεια, which occurs in St. John, 1 and that, that Moses left it to God, to be present at his sacrifices when he pleased; and when he pleased to be absent. Both ways of speaking sound harsh in the ears of the Jews and Christians, as do several others which Josephus uses to the heathen; but still they were not very improper in him who was writing in his own tongue, and he thought it might not be endured by his contemporaries even in his Antiquities and in these books against Apion, all written for the use of the Greeks and Romans, to be read and understood, and as far as ever, his truth would give him leave. Though it be very sensible, though he never uses such expressions in his books, and was writing originally for the Jews beyond Egypt, and in their language; in neither of these, however, Josephus directly opposes the Jewish settlement under Moses to be a divine settlement, and, indeed, no other than a real theocracy.

These excellent accounts of the divine attributes, and that God is not to be at all known in his essence, as also some other books: expressions about the resurrection of Josephus, and almost all the other Greeks, made laws about what was to be done or left undone, but had no regard to the exercising them thereto is practice.

Thus did the Lacedaemonians, and the Cretians, get to be learned by practical exercises, but not by words; is affected, but some of the philosophers have been so indolent as fully to indulge such contradictions, while some of them have undertaken to use such words as entirely take away the nature of God, as others have taken away his providence and power, and then, amongst us any difference in the conduct of our lives, but all our works are common to us all. We have one sort of discourse concerning God, which is conformable to our law, and affirms that he cannot be changed, and who can question the principle of speaking concerning the conduct of our lives, that all other things ought to have piety for their end; and this any body may hear from our women and servants themselves. 22. But while we are ourselves persuaded that our law was made agreeably to the will of God, it would be impious for us not to observe the same principles, and to think that the laws may be changed? and what can be invented that is better? or what can we take out of other people's laws that will exceed it? Perhaps some would have the entire sedentary government of our ancestors shall be subject to the same punishment as if he had been guilty of iniquity towards God himself. When we offer sacrifices to him, we do it not in order to secure ourselves or be drunkards; and our excesses are against the will of God, and would be an occasion of injuries and of luxury; but by keeping ourselves sober, orderly, and ready for our other occupations, and being more temperate than others. And for the duty at the sacrifices themselves, we ought, in the first place, to pray for the common welfare of all, and after that our own: for we are made for fellowship one with another, and who prefers the common good before what is private and acceptable to God. And let our prayers and supplications be made humbly to God, not [so much] that he would give us what is good, (for he hath already given that of his own accord, and hath proposed it to us,) that we may duly receive it, and when we have received it, may preserve it. Now the law has appointed several purifications at our sacrifices, whereby we are cleansed after a generality, after what sometimes happens to us in bed, and after accompanying with our wives, and upon many other occasions which it would be too long now to set down. And this is our doctrine concerning God and his worship, and is the same that the law appoints for our practice. 25. But then, what are our laws about marriage? That law owns no other mixture of sexes but that which nature hath appointed, of a man and a woman, and that the wife adorns the husband in the procession of children. But it abhors the mixture of a male with a male; and if any one do that, death is his punishment. It commands us, also, when we marry, not to have relations with the person, nor to take upon ourselves by violence, nor to persuade her deceitfully and knavishly, but to demand her in marriage of him who hath power to markable, that although the temple of Jerusalem was built as the only place where the whole nation of the Jews were to offer their sacrifices, yet is there no mention of the sacrifice of prayer, the sacrifice of praise, the sacrifice of thanksgiving. However, those ancient forms used at sacrifices are now generally lost, to the enormous number of false religions. It is here also unnecessary to introduce the Old Testament, which is only a part of the New Testament, and where the sacrifice of prayer, the sacrifice of praise, the sacrifice of thanksgiving is nowhere mentioned.
disposes of her, and is fit to give her away by the nearness of his kindred; for (says the scripture) "A woman is inferior to her husband in all things." Let her, therefore, be obedient to him; but to have to do with another man is a wicked thing, which, if any one ventures upon, death is inevitably his punishment: no more can he avoid the same who forces a virgin betrothed to another man, or entices another man's wife. The law, moreover, compels them to bring up all our offspring, and forbids women to cause abortion of what is begotten, or to destroy it afterward; and if any woman appears to have so done, she will be a murderer of her child, by destroying a living creature, and diminishing human kind; if any one, therefore, proceeds to such fornication or murder, he cannot be clean. Moreover, the law enjoins, that after the man and wife have lain together in a sence of any ilustrious mammals, nor for them; but there is a defilement contracted thereby, both in soul and body, as if they had gone into another country; for indeed the soul, by being united to the body, is subject to miseries, and is not freed from the penalties of death, on which account, the law requires this purification to be entirely performed.

26. Nay, indeed, the law does not permit us to make festivals at the births of our children, and thereby do them the profit of those of eating to excess; but it ordains, that the very beginning of our education should be immediately directed to sobriety. It also commands us to bring those children up in learning, and to exercise them in the labors of our parents, and with the assistance of their predecessors, in order to their imitation of them, and that they might be nourished up in the laws from their infancy, and might neither transgress them nor have any pretense for their ignorance of them.

27. Our law has also taken care of the decent burial of the dead, but without any extravagant expenses for their funerals, and without the erection of any ill-fitting monuments for them; but hath ordered that their nearest relations should perform their obsequies: and hath shown it to be regular, that all who pass by when any one is buried should accompany the funeral, and join in the mourning for the deceased. It also ordains, that the house and its inhabitants should be purified after the funeral is over, that every one may thence learn to keep at a great distance from the thoughts of being pure, if he once hath been guilty of murder.

28. Our law ordains also, that parents should be honored immediately after God himself; and delivers that son who does not requite them for the benefits he hath received from them, but is disrespectful on any such occasion, to be stoned. It also says, that the young must pay due respect to every elder, since God is the eldest of all beings. It does not give leave to conceal any thing from our friends, because that is not true friendship; but it will not concur in all things to their fidelity: it also forbids the revelation of secrets even though an enmity arise between them. If any judge take bribes, his punishment is death: he that overlooks one that offers him a present, and at the same time he is able to relieve him, he is a guilty person. What is not by any one intrusted to another, ought not be required back again. No one is to touch another's goods. He that lends money must not demand usury for its loan. These, and many more of the like sort, are the rules that unite us in the bonds of society one with another.

29. It will also be worth our while to see what exactly our legislator would have us exercise in a"... that he who in our present copies of the Old Testament, our intercourse with strangers: for it will thus appear, that he made the best provision he possibly could, both that we should not dissolve our own constitution, nor show any envious mind to others, but to be kind to those who take care and think well of us. Accordingly, our legislator admits all those that have a mind to observe our laws, to do so; and after a friendly manner, as esteeming that a true union, which not only extends to ourselves, but to those who are related to us, and that by the same manner with us: yet does he not allow those that come to us by accident only, to be admitted into communion with us.

30. However, there are other things which any law does not command us to do, but forbids us to do: and what is that? He forbids us to speak evil of any one, lie, or use any invective expressions against another. He also forbids us to speak of other men's affairs, as if we were not concerned in them; or to bring them into contempt, or show any disdain of them. He also prohibits us from speaking ill of any one in the hearing of another; and he also prevents others from doing so. He also prevents us from speaking ill of any one when he is absent, or that any one has committed against him. He also prohibits us from speaking ill of any one in the hearing of another; and he also prevents others from doing so. He also prevents us from speaking ill of any one when he is absent, or that any one has committed against him. He also prohibits us from speaking ill of any one in the hearing of another; and he also prevents others from doing so. He also prevents us from speaking ill of any one when he is absent, or that any one has committed against him. He also prohibits us from speaking ill of any one in the hearing of another; and he also prevents others from doing so. He also prevents us from speaking ill of any one when he is absent, or that any one has committed against him. He also prohibits us from speaking ill of any one in the hearing of another; and he also prevents others from doing so.

31. Nay, indeed, in case it had so fallen out that our nation had not been so thoroughly known among all men as they are, and our voluntary submission to our laws had not been so openly and generally esteemed, let us not think that it was necessary to have written these laws himself, and had read them to the Greeks, or had pretended that he had been with them at the limits of the knowledge of the world, that had in ancient times been subject to; and this is true of those that have attempted to write something of the same kind for political government, and for laws, are accused as composing monstrous and indecent laws for their inhabitants, and as being contented to eat and drink, not at random or at every one's pleasure, or being under inviolable rules in lying with our wives, in magnificent clothing, and again in the observation of our times of rest; while those that can use words in war, and can put their enemies to flight when they attack them, cannot bear to submit to such laws about their way of living; whereas our being accustomed to such laws, renders us fit to show our fortitude upon other occasions also.

34. Yet do the Lyasimachi and the Moliones, and some other writers, (unkindly sophists as they call us,) and the authors of the laws, see us as the vilest of mankind. I have now no mind to make an inquiry into the laws of other nations; for the custom of our country is to keep our own laws, but not to bring accusations against the laws of others. All of us have our heads hath expressly forbidden us to laugh at and revere those that are esteemed gods by other people, [.] account of the very name of God ascribed to them. But since our antagonists think fit to run us down, it is of no great concern whether those that have been admired among the Greeks for wisdom, who hath not greatly blamed the most famous poets, and most celebrated lawgivers, for writing such nations originally among the best of the people concerning the gods such as these; that they may be allowed to be as numerous as they have a mind to have them; that they are begotten one by another, and that the kind of being is to be imagined.
They also distinguish them in their places and ways of living, as they would distinguish several sorts of animals: as some to be under the earth; as some to be in the sea; and other seats of the ancients; and indeed in the enjoyment of plenty, and using such exercises as might improve their bodies, while they made use of other men as their servants for all the necessities of life, and had their food prepared for them by others; and these good and humane actions they do for no other purpose but this, that by their actions and their sufferings they may be able to conquer all those against whom they are at war. I need not add this, that they have not been quite able to maintain their laws; for, not only a few single persons, but multitudines of them have in heaps neglected those laws, and have delivered themselves, together with their land, to the will of those that are their rulers, more accurately; that some are set to trades; those that are gods, and another goddess is a weaver; that one god is a warrior and fights with men; that some of them are harpers, or delight in archery; and besides these, they inherit the land among them, and that they quarrel about men, and this so far, that they not only lay hands upon one another, but that they are wounded by men, and find it to be not only of more weight, but also much more useful." De Orator.
and lament and mourn for such their afflictions.

But what is the grossest of all in point of lascivi uousness, are those unbound lusts ascribed to almost all of them, and their amours; which how can it be other than a most absurd supposition, especially, when it reached to the male gods, and to the female goddesses also? Moreover, the chief of all their gods, and their first father himself, overlooks those goddesses whom he hath defiled begotten with child, and suffers them to be kept flocks, or driven as shepherds; while others, like ma-ufactors, are bound in a prison of brass. And what sober persons are there who would not be proverbial at such stories, and rebuke those that forget and mix, and so seem to admit those who those that admit them for true? Nay, others there are that have advanced a certain timorous-ness and fear, as also madness and fraud, and any other passion, into that nature among the form of gods, and have persuaded whole cities to offer sacrifices to the better sort of them; on which account they have been absolutely forced to esteem some gods as the givers of good things, and to call others of them writers of evil. The rest also endeavor to move them as they would the vilest of men, by gifts and presents, as looking for nothing else than to receive some great mischief from them unless they pay them such wages.

But what do you, perchance, inquire, what should be the occasion of this unjust management, and of these scandalous about the Deity? And truly I suppose it to be derived from the imperfect knowledge the heathen legislators had at first of gods; and also from the ignorance which they had in dealing plain to the people even so far as they did comprehend of it, nor did they compose the other part of their political settlements according to it, but ought of very little consequence, and gave leave both to the peoples what gods they pleased, and those subject to all sorts of passions, and to the ostrows to procure politi social decrees from the people for the admissi of such foreign gods as they thought proper.

The painters also, and statuaries of Greeks, had herein great power, as such of them could contrive a shape [proper for a God;] the one to be formed out of clay, and the other by making the beast of such a one. But these workmen that were principally admired, had the use of very and of gold as the constant materials for their new statues: [whereby it comes to pass that some temples are quite deserted, while others are filled with gold and silver, and of all the arts, of all kinds of purification.] Besides this, the first gods, who have long flourished in the honors done them, are now grown old, [while those that found and after them are come in their room; and second seat, I may say. At any most honorably of them that I can say: nay, certain other gods there are, who are newly introduced and newly worshipped, [as we, by way of dignity, so presently of leave have to to place of worship desolate:] and for their images, some of them are already left desolate, and others are built anew, according to the pleas-sure of men; whereas, they ought to have preserved their opinion about God, and that worship which is due to him, always and immutably the same.

37. But now this Appollonius Mela was one of those foolish and partial men. However, nothing that I have said was unknown to those that were real philosophers among the Greeks, nor were they unacquainted with those frigid pretences of allegories, [which had been alleged for such purpose of them, but had still agreed with us as to the true and becoming notions of God,] whereas it was that Plato would not have politics, settlements of this kind, on the excuse that adulteries are even Homer himself with a garland on his head, and with ointment poured upon him, and this because he should not destroy the right notions of God with his fables. Nay, Plato principally imitated our Legislator in this point, that he conjoined his-citizens to have the main regard to this precept, that every one of them should learn their laws accurately. He also ordained that they should not admit of foreigners intermixing with them, who, as we have said, were not the commonwealth should keep itself pure, and consist of such only as persevered in their own laws. Appollonius Mela did no way conside this, when he made it one branch of his accepting that those who were to have a different as have different notions about God, nor will we have fellowship with those that choose to observe a way of living different from ourselves; yet is this manner of sects not among the ordinary Greeks only, but among such of those Greeks as are of the greatest reputation among them. Moreover, the Lacedaemonians continued in their way of exclusion, and would not admit of any, who are not pleased, nor indeed their very own people to travel abroad, as suspecting that those two things would introduce a dissolution of their own laws; and perhaps there may be some reason to blame the rigid severity of the Lacedaemonians, for the great privilege of their city on no foreigners, nor indeed would give leave to them to stay among them; whereas we, though we do not think fit to imitate other-institutions, yet do we willingly admit of all others. What sects are those, which I think I may reckon to be a plain indication of our humanity, and at the same time of our magnanimity also.

38. But I will shew more of the Lacedaemonians, than the Athenians, who glory in having made their city to be common to all men, what their behavior was. Appollonius did not know, while they punished those that did but speak one word contrary to their laws about the gods, without mercy; for on what other account were it that Socrates was put to death by them? For certainly he neither betrayed their city to its enmities, nor was he guilty of any sacrilege with regard to any of their temples; but it was on this account, that he swore certain new oaths, and that he affirmed either in earnest, or, as some say, only in jest, that a certain demon used to make signs to him what he should not do.] For these reasons he was committed to prison, and then to kill himself.
His accuser also complained, that he corrupted the young men, by inducing them to despise the political settlement and laws of their city; and thus was Socrates, the wisdom of Athens, punished, and put to death. And though he was of Clazomenae, was within a few suffrages of being governed and died, because he said the sun, which the Athenians thought to be destroyed and was to die, was to be published by the public proclamation, that they would give a talent to any one that would kill Diogenes of Miletus, because it was reported of him that he hungered others. This strange answer was also forbid at theirמטפסית. Protagonists also, who was thought to have written somewhat that was not owned for truth by the Athenians, about the gods, had been seized upon and put to death. If he had not fled immediately away. Nor need we at all be surprised when men attempt to conciliate the strongest of their magistrates, when they did not spare even women also; for they very lately slew a certain priestess, because she was accused by somebody that the mediating people into the worship of strange gods, necessary pretexts have been adduced for their laws; and a capital punishment had been decreed to such as introduced a strange god; it being manifest, that they who make use of such a law, do not believe those of other nations to be really gods, but only intend to give themselves the advantage of more gods than they already had. And this was the happy administration of the affairs of the Athenians! Now, as to the Scythians, they take a pleasure in killing men, and suffer little from brute beasts; yet do they think it reasonable to have their institutions observed. They also slew Anacharsis, a person greatly admired for his wisdom among the Greeks, and afterwards they appeared to come fraught with Grecian customs: one may also find many to have been punished among the Persians on the very same account. And to be sure Apollonius was greatly pleased with the Grecian customs, for having been brought up among the Persians, he was delighted with the preservative of them, because the Greeks enjoyed the advantage of their courage, and had the very same opinions about the gods which they had. This last was exemplified in the temples which the Greeks had been forbidden so to do by one of the most entirely enslaving the Grecians. However, Apollonius has imitated all the Persian institutions, and that by his offering violence to other men's wives, and castrating his own sons. Now, we may therefore say, if we do not altogether abuse even a brute beast: and as for us, neither hath the fear of our governors, nor a desire of following what other nations have in to great esteem; but we have as little to withdraw from our own laws; nor have we exerted our courage in battles, to increase our wealth, but only for the observation of our laws; and when we do, we bear the losses, yet when any persons would create policy, we have returned to it, in the first instance to go to war, though it be beyond our ability to pursue it, and bear the greatest calamities to the last with much fortitude. And, indeed, what reason can there be why we should desire to imitate the laws of our great and mighty country, when they are not observed by our own legislators? And why do not the Laconians think of abolishing that form of their government which suffer them, not to associate with any others, as well as their custom of matrimony? And why do not the Eleusians and Thebans abolish that unnatural and impudent lust, which makes them lie with males? For they will not show a sufficient sign of their repentance of what they of old thought, nor have returned to it, in the first instance to go to war, though it be beyond our ability to pursue it, and bear the greatest calamities to the last with much fortitude. 41. But as for the [distinct] political laws by which we are governed, I have delivered them accurately in my books of Antiquities; and have only mentioned them now, so far as was necessary to my present purpose; without proposing to myself either to blame the laws of other nations, or to make an encomium upon our own; but in order to convict those that have written about us unjustly, and in an impudent affectation of disguising the truth. And now I think I have said what I meant; what I intended in writing these books. For whereas our accusers have pretended, that our nation are a people of a very late original, I have demonstrated that they are exceeding ancient; for I have produced as witness to many ancient authors, who have made mention of us in their books, while they said no such writer had so done. Moreover, they had said, that we were sprung from the Egyptians, and came from another country into Egypt; while they had told lies of us, as if we were expelled thence on account of diseases on our bodies, it has appeared on the contrary that we returned to our country by a road not sordid and weak, but strong bodies. Those accusers reproached our legislator as a vile fellow: whereas God in old time bore witness to his virtuous conduct; and since that testimony of God, time it self hath been discovered to be true; it is that the same thing, which is kept by any others before us, we should have owed them thanks, as disciples owe to their masters: but if it be visible that we have made use of them, more than any other men, and if we have been more honest, than their original invention is our own, let the Apis, and the Molos, with all the rest of those that delight in lies and reproaches, stand confounded; but let this and the foregoing book be dedicated to thee, Ephraimite, who hast brought the people to the land of truth; and by thy means to those that have been in like manner desirous to be acquainted with the affairs of our nation.

AN EXTRACT OUT OF JOSEPHUS'S DISCOURSE TO THE GREEKS CONCERNING HADES.

1. Now as to Hades, wherein the souls of the righteous and unrighteous are detained, it is necessary to speak of it. Hades is a place in the world not sordidly finished and uneventful, wherein the light of this world does not shine; from which circumstance, that in this region the light does not shine, it cannot be but there must be in it perpetual darkness. This region is a place of captivity for all souls; in which angels are appointed as guardians to them, who distribute to them temporary punishments, agreeable to every one's behavior and manners.

2. In this region there is a certain place set apart, as a lake of unquenchable fire, wherein we suppose no one hath hitherto been cast, but it is prepared for a day more-determined by God, in which one righteous sentence shall deservedly be passed upon all men; where the just, and those that have been disobedient to God, and have given honor to such idols as have been the vain operations of the hands of men, as to God himself, shall be adjudged to this everlasting punishment, as having been the causes of destitution; while the just shall obtain an incorruptible and never-failing kingdom. These are indeed confined in Hades, but not in the same place wherein the unjust are confined.

3. Hades is not distant from Hades, wherein the unjust are confined. That gate we believe there stands an archangel with a host; which gate when those pass through that are conducted down by the angels appointed over souls, they do not go the same way, but the rest are guided to the right hand, and are led with hymns, sung by the angels appointed over that place, unto a region of light, in which the just have dwelt from the beginning of the world; not constrained by necessity, but ever enjoying the prospect of the good things they see, and rejoicing in the expectation of those new employments which will be peculiar to every one of them, and esteeming those things beyond what we have here, with whom there is no place of ease, no burning heat, no piercing cold; nor are any briers there; but the constancy of the fathers and of the just, which they see always, smiles upon them, while they wait for the rest and glory of Israel, which is to be among those that have been in like manner desirous to be acquainted with the affairs of our nation.

4. But as to the unjust, they are dragged by force to the left hand by the angels allotted for punishment, no longer going with a good will, but as prisoners driven by violence; to whom are sent the angels appointed over them to reproach them, and threaten them with their terrible laws, and to thrust them as they descend. Nor these, but all the rest, are set over them, and drag them into the neighborhood of hell itself, who when they are hard by it, continually bear the noise of it, and do not stand clear of the hot vapor itself; but when they have a near view of this spectacle, as of a terrible and exceeding great prospect of fire, they are struck with a fearful expectation of a future judgment, and in effect punished thereby; not only so, but where there is the appearance (as it were of a choir) of many of the just, even hereby are they punished; for a chaos deep and large is fixed between them; insomuch that a just man that hath compassion upon them cannot be admitted, nor can one that is unjust, if he were bold enough to attempt it, pass over it.

5. This is the discourse concerning Hades, wherein the souls of all men are confined until a proper season which God hath determined, when he will make a resurrection of all men from the dead: not procuring a transmigration of souls from one body to another, but raising again those very bodies, which you Greeks, seeing to be dissolved, do not believe [their resurrection.] But listen not to deceivers: for while you believe that the soul is created, exempt from all mortal bond, according to the doctrine of Plato, and this in time, be not incredulous, but believe that God is able, when he hath raised to life that body which was made as a compound of the same elements, to make it strong and perfect; for he will not ever be said of God, that he is able to do some things and unable to do others. We have therefore believed that the body will be raised again, for although it is dissolved, it is not perished; for the earth receives its remains, and preserves them; and while they are like seed, and are mixed among the more fruitful soil, they flourish, and what is sown is indeed sown bare grain, but at the mighty sound of God the Creator, it will sprout up, and be raised in a clothed and glorious condition, though not before it has been dissolved, and mixed [with the earth.] So that we have not rashly believed the resurrection of the body; for although it is dissolved for a time, and is covered with corruption, as the earth is; and will still, and is cast into the earth, as into a potter's furnace, in order to be formed again, not in order to rise again such as it was before, but in a state of purity, and at the same time also whole created, that it may not be a spittle of corruption. And to every body shall its own soul be restored. And when it hath clothed itself with that body, it will not be subject to misery, but being itself pure, it will continue with its pure body, and rejoicing with it, with the same sickness wherein they died; and such as were in unbelief, the same shall they be when they shall be faithfylly judged.

6. For all men, the just as well as the unjust, shall be brought before the Word; for to him hath the Father committed all judgment, and he, in order to fulfill the will of his Father, shall come as judge, whom we call Christ. For Minor and Rhadasanthis are not the judges, as you Greeks say of Christ, the Father hath glorified, CONCERNING WHOM WE HAVE ELSE WHERE GIVEN A MORE PARTICULAR ACCOUNT, FOR THE SAKE OF THOSE WHO SEEK AFTER TRUE KNOWLEDGE, EXERCISING THE RIGOROUS JUDGMENT OF THE FATHER TOWARDS ALL MEN, HATH PREPARED A JUST SENTENCE FOR EVERY ONE, ACCORDING TO HIS WORKS; AT HIS JUDGMENT-SEAT, WHEN ALL MEN, AND ANGELS, AND DEMONS STAND, THEY WILL SENT FORTH ONE VOICE, AND SAY, JUST IS THE JUDGMENT; THE REJOINER TO WHICH WILL BRING A JUST SENTENCE UPON BOTH PARTIES, BY GIVING JUSTLY TO THOSE WHO HAVE DONE WELL, AN EVERLASTING FULFILLMENT; BUT ALLOWING TO THE LOVERS OF WICKED WORKS TO PASS THROUGH THE UNQUENCHABLE FIRE, AND THAT WITHOUT END, AND A CERTAIN SIFTY WORM NEVER Dying, AND NOT DESTROYING THE BODY, BUT CONTINUING ITS ERUPTION OUT OF THE BODY WITH NEVER-CEASING GRIEF: NEITHER WILL SHEET manufacture TO THE BODY, THAT IT MAY AVOID A SATISFIED METHOD OF LIVING: FOR THOUGH IT MAY BE POSSIBLE, PERHAPS, TO BREAK OFF THE CHAIN OF OUR IRREGULAR AFFECTIONS AT ONCE, YET OUR AMPUTATION CANNOT BE SECURED WITHOUT THE BODY, THE PRAYERS OF GOOD MEN, THE HELP OF THE BROTHERS, AND OUR OWN SINCERE REPENTANCE AND CONSTANT CARE. IT IS A GOOD THING NOT TO SIN AT ALL; IT IS ALSO GOOD, HAVING SINNED, TO REPENT: AS IT IS BEST TO HAVE HEALTH ALWAYS, BUT IT IS A GOOD THING TO RECOVER FROM A DISORDER.—TO GOD BE GLORY AND DOMINION FOR EVER AND EVER. Amen.

DISSERTATION I.

The Testimonies of Josephus concerning Jesus Christ, John the Baptist, and James the Just, uninterpolated.

Since we meet with certain important testimonies in Josephus the Jewish historian, concerning John the Baptist, the forerunner of Jesus of Nazareth, concerning Jesus of Nazareth himself, and concerning James the Just, the brother of Jesus of Nazareth; and since the principal testimony, which is that concerning Jesus of Nazareth himself, hath of late been greatly questioned and rejected by some, who have made it appear as spurious, it will be fit for me, who have ever declared my firm belief that these testimonies were genuine, to set down fairly some of the original evidence and citations I have met with in the first fifteen centuries concerning them, and then to make proper observations upon that evidence, for the reader's more complete satisfaction.

But before I produce the citations themselves out of Josephus, give me leave to prepare the reader's attention, by setting down the sentiments of perhaps the most learned person, and the most competent judge that ever was, as to the authority of Josephus, I mean of Joseph Scaliger, in the Prolegomena to his book De Eminentissime Temporum, p. 17. "Josephus is the most diligent and the greatest lover of truth of all writers; nor are we afraid to affirm of him, that it is more safe to believe him, not only as to the events related by him himself, but as to those recorded by others, than as to the foreign to them, than all the Greek and Latin writers, and this, because his fidelity and his compass of learning are every where conspicuous."

The ancient Citations of the Testimonies of Josephus, from his own Time till the end of the Fifteenth Century.

About A.D. 116. Thuc. Annal. lib. xv. cap. 44. "Now in order to still the rumour, made by the Jews, that he himself had set Rome on fire, this accosted them who were hated for their wicked practices, and called by the vulgar "Christians;" these he punished unjustly. The author of the Apologie, who, in the sixtieth year of Tiberius, was brought to punishment by Pontius Pilate the procurator."

About A.D. 147. Just. Mart. Dialog. cum Trypho. p. 230. "You Jews knew that Jesus was put to death by Pilate, but he ascended into heaven, as the prophecies did foretell was to happen."

About A.D. 330. Origen. Comment. in Matth. p. 234. "This James was of so shining a character among the people, on account of his righteousness, that Flavius Josephus, when, in his twentieth book of the Jewish Antiquities, he had a mind to set down what was the cause why the people suffered such miseries, till the very holy house was demolished, he said, that these things befell them by the anger of God, on account of what they had dared to do to James, the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ: and wonderful it is that while he did not receive Jesus for Christ, he did nevertheless bear witness that Jesus was so righteous a man. He says farther, that the people thought that they suffered these things for the sake of James."

About A.D. 450. Contra Celso. lib. i. p. 35, 38. "Jesus of Nazareth, who was called a Jew, that admitted of John the Baptist, and how he baptised Jesus, that one who lived but a little while after John and Jesus, wrote, how that John was a baptist unto the remission of sins. For Josephus testifies in the eighteenth book of Jewish Antiquities, that John was the Baptist, and that he promised purification to those that were baptized. The same Josephus also, although he did not believe in Jesus as Christ, when he was inquiring after the cause of the destruction of Jerusalem and of the demolition of the temple, and ought to have said, that their machinations against God were the cause of those miseries coming on the people, because they had slain that Christ who was foretold by the prophets, he, though as it were unwillingly, and yet as one who speaks the truth, says, "These miseries befell the Jews by reason of their forsaking the Just, who was the brother of Jesus, that was called Christ, because they had slain him who was a most righteous person." Now this James was he whom that genuine disciple among us, Paul, said he had seen as the Lord's brother; [Gal.i. 19.] which relation implies not so much nearness of blood, or the sameness of education, as it does the agreement of manners and preaching. If therefore he says the demolition of Jerusalem befell the Jews for the sake of James, with how much greater reason might he have said, that it happened for the sake of Jesus? etc."

About A.D. 352. Eturb. Demonstr. Exov. lib. iii. p. 124. "Certainly the attestation of those I have already produced concerning our Saviour may be sufficient. However, it may not be amiss, if over and above, we make use of Josephus the Jew for further witness, who in the eighteenth book of the Jewish Antiquities, in the history of what happened under Pilate, makes mention of our Saviour in these words: "Now there was about this time Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works, a teacher of such men as had a veneration for truth; he drew over to him both many of the Jews and many of the Gentiles: He was the Christ. And when Pilate, at the suggestion of the principal men among us, had condemned him to the cross, those that loved him at first did not forsake him; for he appeared unto them alive again the third day, as the divine prophets had spoken of these and ten thousand other things concerning him; these and all the tribe of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct at this day." If, therefore, we have this historian's testimony, that he not only brought over to himself the twelve apostles, with the seven churches of Asia, but he converted many of the Gentiles also, he must manifestly have had somewhat in him extraordinary above the rest of mankind, for how otherwise could he draw over so many of the Jews and of the Gentiles, unless he performed admirable and amazing works, and used a method of teaching that was not common? Moreover, the scripture of the Acts of the Apostles bears witness, that there were many ten thousands of Jews, who were persuaded that he was the Christ of God, who was foretold by the prophets. [Acts xxii. 20.]"

About A.D. 350. Hist. Eccl. lib. i. cap. 11. "Now the divine scripture of the Gospels makes mention of John the Baptist as having his head cut off by the younger Herod. Josephus also concurs in this history, and makes mention of Herodias by name, as the wife of his brother whom Herod had married, upon divorcing his wife Herodias. She was the wife of Aretas, king of the Parthian Arabians; and which Herodias he had parted from her husband while he was alive: on which account also when he had slain John, he made war with Aretas [Ar-etas made war with him]: because his daughter had been used dishonorably. In which was, when it came to a battle, he says, that all Herod's army was destroyed, and that he suffered the because of his wicked contrivance against John."
Moreover, the same Josephus, by acknowledging John to have been a most righteous man, and the Baptist, conspires in his testimony with what is written in the Gospels. He also relates, that Herod lost his kingdom for the sake of the same Herodias, together with whom he was himself consigned to be banished to Vipsea, a city near to the territory of Gaul. And this is his account in the eighteenth book of the Antiquities, where he writes this of John:—some of the Jews thought that the destruction of Herod’s army came from God, and that the death of John was ordained by God. But he did not call against John, that was called the Baptist; for Herod slew him, who was a good man, and one that commanded the Jews to exercise virtue, both in the right and toward God and piety towards God, and so to come to baptism, for that by this means the washing [with water] would appear acceptable to him, when they made use of it, not in order to the putting away, but for the purification of the body; supposing still that the soul was thoroughly purified beforehand by righteousness. Now when [many] others came in crowds about him, for they were greatly desirous of his doctrine in the midst of men, and that this so great power of persuading men might tend to some sedition or other, for they seemed to be disposed to do every thing he should advise them to, so he supposed it best to prevent any abuse by a law which should inflict punishment on all who were drowned, as a man of piety, and would not have the law done away, he supposed, for so many pernicious acts, such as the Jewish law, and that he would not let the people be set aside, and the public should suffer, to repent [of such negligence]. Accordingly, he was sent a prisoner out of Herod’s suspicious temper, and after he had been in prison a little while, he was put to death. When Josephus had said this of John, he makes mention also of our Saviour in the same history, after this manner. Now there was a certain time over Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works, a teacher of such men as receive the truth with pleasure; he drew over to him both many of the Jews and Heathen. This is said, Josephus, the writer of their history, who says thus: That there was at that time a wise man, if (says he) it be lawful to have him called a man; a doer of wonderful works, who came to him and desired to know the time of his death, the third day from his death alive again, according to the writings of the prophets, who foretold these and innumerable other miraculous events concerning him; from whom began the congre- gation of Christians, and he gathered all sorts of men; nor does there remain any nation in the Roman world which continues strangers to his religion. If the Jews do not believe us, let them at least believe their own writers. Josephus, who was a historian, hath said this, and yet hath he spoken truth after such a manner, and so far was his mind wander- ed from the right way, that even he was not a believer as to whether he had said, but thus he spoke, in order to deliver historical truth, because he thought it not lawful for him to deceive, while yet he was no believer, because of the hardness of his heart and his pernicious inten- tions. He was not a believer, but this he would have it that he was not a believer; but this adds more weight to his testimony, that while he was an unbeliever, and unwilling this should be true, he has not denied it to be so.

About A. D. 360. Ambrose, or Hagia Sophia de Excld. Urb. Hierosolym. lib. ii. cap. 12.—We have discovered that it was the opinion and belief of the Jews, as Josephus affirms, (who is an author not to be rejected, when he writes against himself,) that Jesus of Nazareth was the Christ, as appears by Josephus, the writer of their history, who says thus: That there was at that time a wise man, if (says he) it be lawful to have him called a man; a doer of wonderful works, who came to him and desired to know the time of his death, the third day from his death alive again, according to the writings of the prophets, who foretold these and innumerable other miraculous events concerning him; from whom began the congregation of Christians, and he gathered all sorts of men; nor does there remain any nation in the Roman world which continues strangers to his religion. About the same Josephus, de Fisc. Illustr. in Josepho.—Josephus, in the eighteenth book of Antiquities, most expressly acknowledges that Christ was slain by the P°rsisenees on account of the greatness of his miracles, and that John the Baptist was truly a prophet, and that Jerusalem was demolished on account of the slaughter of James the Apostle. Now, he writes concerning our Lord after this manner: "At the same time there was Jesus, a wise man, if yet it be lawful to call him a man; a doer of wonderful works, a teacher of those who willingly receive the truth. He had many followers both as the Jews and of the Gentiles. He was believed to be Christ, and those who by the principal men, Pilate, had condemned him to the cross, yet notwithstanding, those who had loved him at first persevered, for he appeared to them alive on the third day, as the oracles of the prophets foretold; and many wonderful things respecting him; and the sect of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct at this day."

About A. D. 410. Iridorus Palaeontius, the Scholar of Chrysostom. lib. iv. cap. 325.—There was one Josephus, a Jew, of the greatest reputation, and one that was zealous of the law; one also that paraphrased the Old Testament with truth, and stood, valiantly for the Jews, and had showed that their settlement was nobler than can be described by words. Now, since he made their interest give place to truth, for he would not support the opinion of impious men, I think it necessary to set down his words. What then does he say? "Now there was about that time one Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works, a teacher of such men as receive the truth with pleasure. He drew many to him, and over him were many of the Jews and many of the Gentiles: He was the Christ. And when Pilate, at the suggestion of the principal men among us, had condemned him to die, the second day after he rose again, as the divine prophets had said these and a vast number of other wonderful things concerning him; and the tribe of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct at this day. Now I cannot but with great joy at this, man's love of truth in many respects, but chiefly where he says, "Jesus was a teacher of men who received the truth with pleasure.""

He names him Christ openly, and is not ignorant that he was condemned to the cross, and appeared on the third day alive; and that ten thousand wonderful things were foretold of him by the divine prophets. He testifies also, that those whom he drew over to him, being many of the Gentiles as well as of the Jews, continued to love him; and that the tribe named from him, was established. Now he seems to me, by this his relation, almost to proclaim that Christ is God. However, he appears to have been so affected with the strangeness of the thing, as to run as it were in a sort of middle way, as not to put any burden upon belief in him, but rather to afford his suffrage to him.

About A.D. 1490.  Platini de Vitis Pontificum in Christo.—I shall avoid mentioning what Christ did until the 30th year of his age, when he was baptized by John, the son of Zacharias, because not only the Gospels and Epistles, but all the acts of his, which he did in a most excellent and most holy manner, but the books of such as were quite remote from his way of living, and acting, and ordaining, and teaching, and ordering the Christian people as Josephus himself, who wrote twenty books of the Jewish Antiquities in the Greek tongue, when he had proceeded as far as the government of the emperor Tiberias, says, “there was in the year when the Jews were at Jerusalem, it was lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works, and a teacher of men, of such especially as willingly hear the truth. On this account he drew over to him many both of the Jews and Gentiles: He was Christ. But when Pilate, instigated by the principal men of our nation, had decreed that he should be crucified, yet did not those who had loved him from the beginning forsake him: and besides, he appeared to them the third day alive, as the divinely inspired prophets had foretold, that a very great war arose between Aretas, king of the Arabians, and Herod, on account of the sin which Herod had committed against John. About A. D. 1480. Trithumnum Abbas de Scrip
tor. Eccles.—Josephus the Jew, although he con cluded to be a Jew, did frequently commend the Christians; and in the eighteenth book of Anti quities, wrote down an eminent testimony con

Observations from the foregoing Evidence and Citations.

1. The style of all these original testimonies belonging to Josephus is exactly the style of the same Josephus, and especially the style about those matters of his Antiquities wherein we find these testimonies. This is denied by nobody as to the other, concerning John the Baptist and James the Just, and is now become equally un deniable. This is not the first time either.

II. These testimonies therefore being confess sedly and undeniably written by Josephus him self, it is next to impossible that he should wholly ommit some testimony concerning Jesus Christ; nay, while his testimonies of John the Baptist, and James the Just, are so honorable, and give them so great characters, it is also impossible that this testimony concerning Christ should be other than very honorable, or such as afforded him some advantage. This character alike from the very same author, who gave such a full and ad vantageous character of John the Baptist, the forerunner of Jesus of Nazareth, all whose dis ciples were by him directed to Jesus of Nazareth, as to the true Messiah, and all whose disciples became afterwards the disciples of Jesus of Na zareth, say nothing honorable of that Jesus of Nazareth himself? And this in a history of those very men, which he was born, and lived, and died, and that while the writer bore him but a little after him, in the same country in which he was born, and lived, and died. This is almost incre dible. And further, could the very same author, who gave such an advantageous character of James the Just, and this under the very surren dation of James the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ, which James was one of the principal disciples or apostles of this Jesus Christ, and had been many years the only Christian bishop of the believing Jews of Judes and Jerusalem, in the very days, and in the very country of this writ er; could he, I say, wholly omit any, say, a very honorable account of Jesus Christ himself, which bishop this Jesus most certainly was? This is also almost incredible. Hear what Igitius, one of the wisest and most learned of all those who have lately inclined to give up the testimony concerning Christ, as it stands in such a passage, and so express it: "If any one ob serve this occasion to me, that Josephus hath not omitted John the Baptist, the forerunner of Christ, or James the disciple of Christ, and that therefore he could not have done the part of a good histo rian, and oblige his whole account concerning Christ, I shall freely grant that Josephus was not entirely silent concerning Christ; nay I shall fur ther grant, that when Josephus was speaking of Christ, he did not abstain from his commenda tion; for we are not to determine from that in yeretate hatred which the modern Jews bear to Christ, what was the behaviour of those Jews, upon whom the miracles that were daily wrought by the apostles in the name of Christ surprised

a great number of Jews.

III. The famous clause in this testimony of Josephus concerning Christ, This was Christ, or the Christ, did not mean that this Jesus was the Christ of God, or the true Messiah of the Jews, but that he was the Messiah, which was a famous of that name, of which there were not a few, as mentioned by Josephus himself, by the addition of the other name of Christ; or that this person was no other than he whom all the world then called the Messiah, and who was known by the name of Christ, by his followers by the name of Christians. This I esteem to be a clear case, and that from the arguments following:

1. The Greeks and Romans, for whose use Josephus wrote his Antiquities, could do other wise understand these words. The Jews indeed, and afterward the Christians, who knew that a great Messiah, a person that was to be Christ the Anointed of God, and that was to perform the office of a King, a Priest, and a Prophet, to God's people, might readily so understand this expression; but Josephus, as I have already no ted, wrote here, not to Jews or Christians, but to Greeks and Romans, who knew nothing of the Messiah, but knew well the general name of living in Judea, whose name was Jesus Christ, or Je sus Christ, had founded a new and numerous sect, which took the latter of those names, and from him called Christians, Jews, Greeks, or Romans; in which sense alone could they understand these words of Josephus, and in which sense I believe he desired they should understand them; nor does Josephus ever use the Hebrew name Jesus as if he meant the Messiah, or the Greek term Christ in any such acceptance elsewhere.

2. Josephus himself as good as explains his own meaning, and that by the last clause of this very passage, where he says, the Christians were named after this: "Cosmopolita," as though he really meant he was the true Mes siah, or Christ of God. He farther seems to me to explain this his meaning in that other place, where alone he elsewhere mentions this name of Jesus of Nazareth, that is, when upon occasion of the men tion of Jesus, when he was condemned by Ama sus, he calls him the brother of Jesus, not, that was the true Messiah, or the true Christ, but only that was called Christ.

I must observe, that the purpose of Jes ophus to declare himself here to be a Christian; or a believer In Jesus as the true Messiah. Had he intended so to do, he would surely have ex plained the meaning of the word Cosmopolita written in this place. He would have re acted; he would surely have been a great deal fuller and larger in his accounts of Christ and of the Christian religion; and would such a declaration at that time have recommended him, or his nation, or his writings, to either the Greeks or the Romans; of his repu tation with both which people, he is known to have been, in the writing of these Antiquities very greatly solicitous.

The usual and natural way of writing is histori cal and declarative of facts, and of the opinions of others, and but rarely such as directly informs us of his own opinion, unless we prudently gather it from what he says historically, or so as the op inions of others. This is a duty obliged on him in the writings of Josephus, and in particular as to what he says of John the Baptist, and of James the Just; so that this interpretation is most prob able, as most agreeable to Josephus's way of writing, which is so strongly marked in the present passage.

(5.) This seems to be the universal sense of all the ancients without exception, who cite this tes timony from him; and though they almost every where own this to be the true reading, yet do not all think it desirable to reject it. It is still as unbelieving Jews, and not a believing Chris tian: nay, Jerome appears so well assured of this interpretation, and that Josephus did not means to declare any more by these words than a common opinion, that, according to his usual way, he did declare that Josephus, not to be the Messiah, but to the sense, (of which we have, I think, two more instances in his accounts out of Josephus, now before us,) he declares this clause credibilior esse Christus, has taken care particularly and clearly to preserve those histories to us. Thus, when we find that Josephus calls Jesus, the Son of Christ, by the name of James the Just, and describes him as a just and righteous man, in an especial manner, we are to remember that such is his name and character in the gospel according to the Hebrews, and the only remaining true remains of Hegesippus, but nowhere else that I remember, in the earliest antiquity: nor are we to suppose they herein referred to any other than those righteous men, by which mention is made, wherein St. Paul, (4) before he embraced Christianity, professed himself to have been blameless. Thus when Josephus, with other Jews, ascribed the miseries of that nation under Vespasian and Titus, with the destruction of Jerusalem, to the barbarous murder of James the Just, we must remember what we learn from the Ebonite fragments of Hegesippus, that these Ebonites interpreted a prophecy of Isaiah, as foretelling this very murder, and those consequent miseries. Let us take away the just one, for he is unprofitable to us: therefore shall they eat the fruit of their own ways. (4) Thus when Josephus says, as we have seen, that the priests and scribes did not believe to be the true Messiah, without believing he was more than a man; who also believed the necessity of the observance of the ceremonial law of Moses in order to salvation for all mankind, we must not suppose that he accused the Jewish Christians' faith, though in opposition to all the thirteen apostles of Jesus Christ in the first century, and in opposition to the whole Catholic Church of Christ in the following centuries also. Accordingly, I take to be the opinion proved, that Josephus was no other in his own mind and conscience than a Nazarene or Ebonite Jewish Christian; and have observed that this entire testimony, and all that Josephus says of John the Baptist, the eating of bread and drinking of wine as the Messianic and the Messiah, the statement of the Messiah in the scripture, the mission of the Messiah, the testimony of the Messiah, to the Messiah, and the Messiah himself, most of all, and the Messiah himself being the Messiah, all the rest of the apostles and their companions, exactly agrees to him under that character, and so other. And indeed to me it is most astonishing, that all our learned men, who have of late considered these testimonies of Josephus, except the converted Jew Galatinus, should miss such an obvious and natural observation. We all know this from St. James's own words, that we are not supposed to be the opinion of the Ebonites. The high priest and sanhedrim, who always persecuted the Christians, and now condemned these Christians, and especially Ebonites, were of this opinion, which is supposed to be the case, when our Lord and Josephus himself even as his own enemies, and himself, under that opinion, and of all those who thought the terrible miseries of that nation effects of the vengeance of God for their murder of this James, about A. D. 68, we may easily see these opinions could only be the opinion of the Ebonites. He who persecuted the Christians, and now condemned these Christians, and the body of those unbelief, who are supposed to suffer for murdering this James, the high priest, and the scribes and Ebonites, would not have been the case; and the Ebonites in Judaeus, could not, to be sure, be of that opinion; nor could Josephus himself, who is a plain and evident key of this whole matter.

V. Since therefore Josephus appears to have been, in his own heart and conscience, no other than a Nazarene or Ebonite Christian, and, by consequence, with them agreed all our Greek gospels and Greek books of the New Testament, and received only the Hebrew gospel of the Nazarenes or Ebonites, styled by them, The Gospel of the Hebrews, or to Christians, Testes apostles, or even according to Matthew, we ought always to have that Nazarene or Ebonite gospel, with the other Nazarenes or Ebonite fragments in view, when we consider any passages of the Christian gospel. Thus, since that gospel omitted all that is in the beginning of our St. Matthew and St. Luke's gospels, and began with the ministry of John the Baptist; in which first parts of the gospel history, and the acts of John the Baptist, and of the enrolling or taxation under Augustus Caesar and Herod, it is no great wonder that Josephus has not taken care particularly and clearly to preserve those histories to us. Thus, when we find that Josephus calls Jesus, the Son of Christ, by the name of James the Just, and describes him as a just and righteous man, in an especial manner, we are to remember that such is his name and character in the gospel according to the Hebrews, and the only remaining true remains of Hegesippus, but nowhere else that I remember, in the earliest antiquity: nor are we to suppose they herein referred to any other than those righteous men, by which mention is made, wherein St. Paul, before he embraced Christianity, professed himself to have been blameless. Thus when Josephus, with other Jews, ascribed the miseries of that nation under Vespasian and Titus, with the destruction of Jerusalem, to the barbarous murder of James the Just, we must remember what we learn from the Ebonite fragments of Hegesippus, that these Ebonites interpreted a prophecy of Isaiah, as foretelling this very murder, and those consequent miseries. Let us take away the just one, for he is unprofitable to us: therefore shall they eat the fruit of their own ways. Thus when Josephus says, as we have seen, that the priests and scribes did not believe to be the true Messiah, without believing he was more than a man; who also believed the necessity of the observance of the ceremonial law of Moses in order to salvation for all mankind, we must not suppose that he accused the Jewish Christians' faith, though in opposition to all the thirteen apostles of Jesus Christ in the first century, and in opposition to the whole Catholic Church of Christ in the following centuries also. Accordingly, I take to be the opinion proved, that Josephus was no other in his own mind and conscience than a Nazarene or Ebonite Jewish Christian; and have observed that this entire testimony, and all that Josephus says of John the Baptist, the eating of bread and drinking of wine as the Messianic and the Messiah, the statement of the Messiah in the scripture, the mission of the Messiah, the testimony of the Messiah, to the Messiah, and the Messiah himself, most of all, and the Messiah himself being the Messiah, all the rest of the apostles and their companions, exactly agrees to him under that character, and so other. And indeed to me it is most astonishing, that all our learned men, who have of late considered these testimonies of Josephus, except the converted Jew Galatinus, should miss such an obvious and natural observation. We all know this from St. James's own words, that we are not supposed to be the opinion of the Ebonites. The high priest and sanhedrim, who always persecuted the Christians, and now condemned these Christians, and especially Ebonites, were of this opinion, which is supposed to be the case, when our Lord and Josephus himself, even as his own enemies, and himself, under that opinion, and of all those who thought the terrible miseries of that nation effects of the vengeance of God for their murder of this James, about A. D. 68, we may easily see these opinions could only be the opinion of the Ebonites. The high priest and sanhedrim, who always persecuted the Christians, and now condemned these Christians, and the body of those unbelieving Jews, who are supposed to suffer for murdering this James, the high priest, and the scribes and Ebonites, would not have been the case; and the Ebonites in Judaeus, could not, to be sure, be of that opinion; nor could Josephus himself, who is a plain and evident key of this whole matter.

VI. In the same way concerning the Saviour, from Tacitus, almost all that was true of the Jews is directly taken by him out of Josephus, as will be demonstrated under the third Dissertation hereafter.

VII. The second author I have alleged for its Justin Martyr, one so nearly coeval with Josephus, that he might be born about the time that he wrote his Antiquities, appeals to the same Antiquities by that very name; and though he does not here directly quote them, yet does he seem to me to allude to this very testimony in them concerning our Saviour, when he affirms in this place to Trypho the Jew, that his nation originally knew that Jesus was the Son of God, and ascended into heaven, as the prophets did foretell was to happen. Since there neither now is, nor probably in the days of Justin was, any other Jewish testimony extant, which is so agreeable to what Justin has affirmed of the son of Josephus the Jew before us; nor indeed does he seem to me to have had any thing else particularly in his view here, but this very testimony, where Josephus says, That Jesus appeared to his followers alive the third day after his death, the divine prophets had foretold these, and tens thousand other wonderful things concerning him.
VIII. The third author I have quoted for Josephus's testimonies of John the Baptist, of Jesus of Nazareth, and of James the Just, is Origen, who is indeed allow’d on all hands to have quoted both the excellencies of characters of John the Baptist, and of James the Just, but whose supposed entire silence about this testimony concerning Christ is usually alleged as the principal argument against its being genuine, and particular instances, this would have Christ; and yet that, as we have seen, because he twice assures us, that in his opinion, Josephus did not himself acknowledge Jesus for the true Messiah, or the true Christ of God; notwithstanding their express quotation of that clause in Josephus as genuine, so that that least suppose Origen to have had no direct notion of those words from all the other ancients, we cannot conclude from this assertion of Origen's, that he had not those words in his copy, not to say that it is, after all, much more likely that he differed from other copies in this clause, or indeed omitted it entirely, than that he, on its account, must be supposed not to have had the rest of this testimony therein, though indeed I see no necessity of making any such supposition. All that is requisite for me to note is, that Origen affords us four several indications that the main parts at least of this testimony itself were in his copy.

(1.) When Origen introduces Josephus's testimony concerning James the Just, that he thought the miseries of the Jews were an instance of the divine vengeance on that nation for putting James to death instead of Jesus, he uses an expression no way necessary to his purpose, nor occurring to him unless he was referring to the way which he knew to be the true, and which they had lain that Christ which is foretold in the Prophecies. Whence could this expression come here into Origen's mind, when he was quoting a testimony of Josephus concerning the brother of Christ, but from his remembrance of a clause in the testimony of the same Josephus concerning Christ himself, that the prophets had foretold his death and resurrection, and ten thousand other wonderful things by him, that he had spoken of Jesus and his death before, and that he had a very good opinion of Jesus, which yet he could learn no way so authentically as from this testimony? Nor do the words he here uses, as Josephus was not remote from the truth, perhaps allude to any thing else but to this very testimony before us.

(2.) How came Origen to be so surprised at Josephus's ascribing the destruction of Jerusalem to the Jews' murdering of James the Just, and not to their murdering Jesus, as we have seen before? and that he did not think that Josephus's copy had spoken of Jesus and his death before, and that he had a very good opinion of Jesus, which yet he could learn no way so authentically as from this testimony? Nor do the words he here uses, as Josephus was not remote from the truth, perhaps allude to any thing else but to this very testimony before us.

(3.) How came the same Origen, upon another slight occasion, when he had just set down that as respects these concerns, we ought to have a regard to the divinity of the depositions of Josephus, who in a sort of compliance with the Romans and the catholic Christians, who thought him a God, would say any thing like his being a God.

(4.) How came Origen to affirm twice, so expressly, that Josephus did not himself own, in the clause that a Christian had been cut out of Christ, notwithstanding his quotation of such eminent testimonies out of him for John the Baptist, his forerunner, and for James the Just, his brother, and one of his principal disciples? This was not the case with Christ; and yet he is likely to persuade Origen of this as is the famous testimony before us, wherein, as he and all the ancients understood it, he was generally called Christ indeed, but not any other than as the Messiah, who was to be cut out of Christ, which was derived, and where sa al says speaks of those Christians as a sect then in being, whose author was a wonderful person, and his followers great lovers of him and of the truth, yet such a sect as he had not joined himself. Whose exposition, as it is a very natural one, so was it, I doubt, but too true of our Josephus at that time: nor can I devise any other reason but this, and the which suppose not to have had this testimony when he speaks of James the brother, not of Jesus who was Christ, but of Jesus who was called Christ, that could so naturally induce Origen and others to be of that opinion.

TWO significant passages in Suidas and Theophylact, already set down, as citing Josephus, the former, that Jesus officiated with the priests of the temple; and the latter, that the destruction of Jerusalem and miseries of the Jews were God's way to the salvation of nations to death, which are in none of our present copies, nor cited thence by any ancient authors, nor indeed do they seem altogether consistent with the other more authentic testimonies. However, since I see nothing here but a passage from Josephus's, called Memoirs of the Jews' captivity, a book never heard of elsewhere, and since both citations are not at all disagreeable to Josephus's character as a Nazarene or Ebionite, I daras as he had not joined himself. Whose exposition, as it is a very natural one, so was it, I doubt, but too true of our Josephus at that time: nor can I devise any other reason but this, and the which suppose not to have had this testimony when he speaks of James the brother, not of Jesus who was Christ, but of Jesus who was called Christ, that could so naturally induce Origen and others to be of that opinion.

X. As to that great critic Photius, in the ninth century, who quotes this passage from Josephus's, called Memoirs of the Jews' captivity, a book never heard of elsewhere, and since both citations are not at all disagreeable to Josephus's character as a Nazarene or Ebionite, I dare as he had not joined himself. Whose exposition, as it is a very natural one, so was it, I doubt, but too true of our Josephus at that time: nor can I devise any other reason but this, and the which suppose not to have had this testimony when he speaks of James the brother, not of Jesus who was Christ, but of Jesus who was called Christ, that could so naturally induce Origen and others to be of that opinion.
were not in the copies of his age. Tertullian never once hints at any of Josephus's treatises but those against Apion, and that in general only for a point of chronology: nor does it any way appear that he even saw any of Josephus's writings besides, and far from believing that he saw even those. He had particular occasion, in his dispute against the Jews, to quote Josephus, above any other writer, to prove the completion of the prophecies of the Old Testament in the destruction of Jerusalem and misery of the Jews at that time, of which he there discourses, yet does he never once quote him upon that solemn occasion; so that it seems to me that Tertullian knew no Greek Antiquities of Josephus, or his Greek books of the Jewish Wars; nor is this at all strange in Tertullian, a Latin writer that lived in Africa, by none of which African writers is there any one clause, that I know of, cited out of any of Josephus's writings: nor is it worth my while, in such numbers of positive citations of these clauses, to mention the silence of other later writers, as being here of very small consequence.

DISCUSSION II.

Concerning God's Command to Abraham to offer up Isaac his Son for a Sacrifice.

Since this command to Abraham (j) has of late been greatly mistaken by some who venture to ride without very respectful fashion from very modern notions, and this without a due regard in either the customs, or opinions, or circumstances of the times whereof these facts belong, or indeed to the true reasons of the facts themselves; since the mistakes have not only the everlasting, but even circumstances, and reasons, have of late so far prevailed, that the very same action of Abraham's, which was so celebrated by St. Paul, (g) St. James, (k) the author to the Hebrews, (l) Philo, (m) and Josephus, (n) in the first century, and by innumerable others since, as an uncommon instance of signal virtue, of heroic faith in God, and piety towards him; nay, in the sacred (p) history highly commended by the divine Angel of the Lord when he appeared to Abraham, and promised to be plentifully rewarded; since this command, I say, now at last in the eighteenth century, become a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence among us, and that sometimes to persons of other good sense, and of a religious disposition of mind also, I shall endeavor to set this matter in its true, i.e. in its ancient and original light, for the satisfaction of the inquisitive. In order wherefore we are to consider,

1. That till this very profane age, it has been
I think, universally allowed by all sober persons, who owned themselves the creatures of God, that the Creator has a just right over all his rational creatures, to protract their lives to what length he pleases; to cut them off when and by what instrument he pleases; to afflict them with what sicknesses he pleases; and to remove them from one state or place in this his great palace of the universe to another, as he pleases. This is enough for all those rational creatures are bound in duty and interest to acquiesce under the divine disposal, and to resign themselves up to the good providence of God in all such his dispensations towards them. To ask, why the mind of God ever does act in these cases after a mere arbitrary manner, or without sufficient reason, believing, according to the whole tenor of nature and revealed religion, that he hath nothing that he hath made, (c) that whatsoever he does, how melancholy soever it may appear at first sight to us, is really intended for the good of his creatures, and, at the upshot of things, will fully appear so to be; but that still he is not obliged, nor does in general give his creatures an account of the particular reasons of such his dispensations towards them; to which all these circumstances and reasons, have of late so far prevailed, that the same action of Abraham's, which so far was celebrated by St. Paul, and St. James, the author to the Hebrews, Philo and Josephus, in the first century, and by innumerable others since, as an uncommon instance of signal virtue, of heroic faith in God, and piety towards him; nay, in the sacred (p) history highly commended by the divine Angel of the Lord when he appeared to Abraham, and promised to be plentifully rewarded; since this command, I say, now at last in the eighteenth century, become a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence among us, and that sometimes to persons of other good sense, and of a religious disposition of mind also, I shall endeavor to set this matter in its true, i.e. in its ancient and original light, for the satisfaction of the inquisitive. In order wherefore we are to consider,

1. That till this very profane age, it has been
I think, universally allowed by all sober persons, who owned themselves the creatures of God, that the Creator has a just right over all his rational creatures, to protract their lives to what length he pleases; to cut them off when and by what instrument he pleases; to afflict them with what sicknesses he pleases; and to remove them from one state or place in this his great palace of the universe to another, as he pleases. This is enough for all those rational creatures are bound in duty and interest to acquiesce under the divine disposal, and to resign themselves up to the good providence of God in all such his dispensations towards them. To ask, why the mind of God ever does act in these cases after a mere arbitrary manner, or without sufficient reason, believing, according to the whole tenor of nature and revealed religion, that he hath nothing that he hath made, (c) that whatsoever he does, how melancholy soever it may appear at first sight to us, is really intended for the good of his creatures, and, at the upshot of things, will fully appear so to be; but that still he is not obliged, nor does in general give his creatures an account of the particular reasons of such his dispensations towards them; to which all these circumstances and reasons, have of late so far prevailed, that the same action of Abraham's, which so far was celebrated by St. Paul, and St. James, the author to the Hebrews, Philo and Josephus, in the first century, and by innumerable others since, as an uncommon instance of signal virtue, of heroic faith in God, and piety towards him; nay, in the sacred (p) history highly commended by the divine Angel of the Lord when he appeared to Abraham, and promised to be plentifully rewarded; since this command, I say, now at last in the eighteenth century, become a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence among us, and that sometimes to persons of other good sense, and of a religious disposition of mind also, I shall endeavor to set this matter in its true, i.e. in its ancient and original light, for the satisfaction of the inquisitive. In order wherefore we are to consider, those to us seemingly severe dispensations, nor are we certain when such seemingly severe dispensations are really such, nor do we know but shortening the lives of men may sometimes be the greatest blessing to them, and prevent or put an end to those courses of gross wickedness which might bring them to a greater misery in the world to come: nor is it fit for such poor, weak and ignorant creatures as we are, in the present state, to call our Almighty, all-wise, and all-powerful Creator to an account and upon any such occasions; since we cannot acknowledge that it is He that hath made us, and not we ourselves (r); that we are nothing, and have no more of our own lives, independent of him, but that all we are, all we have, and all we hope for, is derived from him, from his free and undeserved bounty, which therefore he may justly take from us in what way soever, and whenever he pleases; all that still remaining of what still exists of us, in such cases, with the pious Psalmist, xxx. 9, "I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, because thou didst it": and with patient Job, i. 21, ii. 10, "Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall not adversity come also? The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." If, therefore, this shortening or taking away the lives of men be an objection against any divine command for that purpose, it is full as strong against the present system of the world, and against the conduct of divine providence in general, and against natural religion, which is founded on the justice of that providence, and is no way peculiar to revealed religion, or to the fact of a future state, as we now believe. And is this less much different from what was soon after the days of Abraham thoroughly settled, after Job and his friends' debates, by the inspiration of Elisha, and the determination of God himself, where the divine providence was at length so strongly cleared and justified before all the world, as it will be, no question, more generally cleared and justified at the final judgment.

3. That this expectation is false also, I think, has been universally allowed by all sober men, that a command of God, when sufficiently made known to be so, is abundant authority for the taking away the life of any person whosoever. I doubt not but all our princes, counsellors, generals of armies, and judges, even those of the best reputation also, have ventured to take many men's lives away upon much less authority; nor indeed do the most sceptical of the moderns care so much about this authority directly and solely, as to signify a method of objecting somewhat more plausible, though it amount to much the same; they say that the apparent disagreement of any command to the moral attributes of God, such as this of the slaughter of an only child, seems plainly to be, will be a greater evidence that such command does not come from God, than any pretended revelation can be that it does. But as to this matter, although divine revelations have now so long continued, and are strong enough for that authority, it is not clear with the manner of conveying such revelations with certainty to men, and by consequence the apparent disagreement of a command with the moral attributes of God, ought at present generally, if not absolutely, to deter men from acting upon such a pretended revelation, yet there was no such uncertainty in the days of the old prophets of God, or of Abraham, the friend of God, (r) who are said to have had an entire certainty of those their revelations: and what originally shows they were not deceived, is this, that the events and consequences of things afterwards always corresponded, and secured them of such divine revelations. Thus the second voice, (s) the account of his being to that command, are demonstrations that the hams commission for what he did was divine, and are an entire justication of his doing in that matter. The words of the law being thus collected, the more they had applied them here for the letting the land into a fitter place; but the glorious promises to Abraham's obedience by the second voice must here be produced from verse 15. It is an angel of the Lord called unto Abraham's house, and said, I have sworn, saith the Lord, for this hast thou done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me, that in blessing I will bless thee, and multiply thee exceedingly. And Abraham was方多 is himself should the families of the earth be blessed, was now confirmed in the same. For he had before, in the mis3, chapt. xii. ver. 3, and xiii. 18, himself should the families of the earth be blessed, but that this blessing was to belong to his times, and to be bestowed by the means of several branches of his posterity; but to him and his seed, and to the Son of Abraham only, was not mentioned before; but, on such an amazing instance of faith and obedience, as was this his readiness to offer up his only begotten son Isaac, was the promise made to him. The only Son of Abraham, in the birth of Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of God, the Son of Abraham, (s) which highly serves our observation in this place; nor can we suppose that any thing else than clear convictions and this ingenious guess, that this man came from so good a man, and so tender a father as Abraham was, to sacrifice his own beloved son, and to be thereby all the comfort he received from him at last to be in the midst of that universal and happy prosperity from him hereafter.

4. That long before the days of Abraham, the demons or heathen gods had required and received human sacrifices, and particularly that of the Phoenicians, of all others, is a thing so evident that it is not necessary to dwell upon it, nor to speak of the sacrifices offered to the gods of Egypt in that ancient time, among whom it was unlawful to sacrifice any brute beast (bears, bulls, and pure cattle, and ganders, only excepted,) their names in. However, it is evident from Sancho Butana, Manetho, Passavers, such as a Polish rider, and many others, that such sacrifices were frequent both in Phisicia and Egypt, and that long before the days of Abraham, as Sir John Marsham and Bishop Cumberland have fully proved; nay, that is, in a time much before they were uninacquainted with the nature of the Egyptians and their religion, (though not in Egypt,) this cruel practice continued long after Abraham, and till the very third, if not also the fifth century of Christianity, before it was quite abolished. That the words of the original authors in English, "(s) Chronus offered up his only begotten son as an burnt offering, to his father Ouranos, when the gods were a female and a pestilential death consecrated to the stars Saturn, was to (s) Mathm. l. 1. (w) Ap. Marsh.'Chron. (r) Philo. Bib. ex Sanc.p.76. (s) Philo. Bib. ex Sanc.
was king of the country, and had by a nymph of that country, named Asobres, an only begotten son, whom, on that account, they called Jedus, (the Phoenicians to this day calling an only begotten son by that name,) he, in his dread of very great dangers that lay upon the country from war, adored his son with royal apparel, and built an altar and offered him in sacrifice.

"(y) The Phoenicians, when they were in great dangers by war, by famine, or by pestilence, sacrificed to Saturn one of the dearest of their possessions, chosen by public lot, for that purpose. And Sanchoniatho's Phoenician history is full of such sacrifices. [These hitherto I take to have been before the flood.]"

(5) In Arabia the Damutii sacrificed a child every year.

"(a) They relate, that of old, the [Egyptian] kings sacrificed such men as were of the same color with Typho at the sepulchre of Osiris.

(4) Manetho relates, that they burnt Typhoanian men alive in the city Iditiba, [or Ilithyba] and scattered their ashes like chaff that is winnowed; and this was done publicly, and at a set season in the dog-days.

In the Pharisaic nations did a long time admit of the slaughter of children, as of a holy practice, and acceptable to the gods. And this thing both private persons, and kings, and entire nations, practise at proper seasons.

The Pharisaic nations, whom they sacrificed with the gods of Osiris, and the land was polluted with blood." See Isr. v. 5.

"(g) The children of Judah have done evil in my sight, in that they have made their daughters to pass through the fire unto Molech, in the midst of abominations of the heathen, whom the Lord cast out before the children of Israel.

(2) Moreover, Ahas burst in the valley of the son of Hinnom, and burnt his children [his son in Josephus] in the fire, after the abominations of the heathen, whom the Lord had cast out before the children of Israel."

(6) And the Sepharvites burnt their children in the fire to Adrammelech and Anamalech, the gods of Sepharvaim," &c.

"(m) And Josiah defiled Tophet, which is in the valley of the children of Hinnom, that no man should burn his son or his daughter to pass through the fire unto Molech.

(9) Yes; they sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto demons, and shed innocent blood; the blood of their sons and of their daughters, whom they sacrificed unto the idols of Canaan, and the land was polluted with blood." See Isr. v. 5.

(3) The children of Judah have done evil in my sight, in that they have built the high places of Tophet, which is in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to burn their sons and their daughters in the fire, which I commanded them not, neither came it into my heart.

(5) Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, Behold I will bring evil upon this place, the which whosoever heareth, his ears shall tingle, because they have forsaken me, and have estranged this place, and have burned incense unto other gods, whom neither they nor their fathers have known, nor the kings of Judah, and have filled this place with the blood of innocents.

(7) They have built the high places of Baal, which are in the midst of the city of Hinnom, to cause their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire unto Molech, which I commanded them not, neither came it into my mind that they should do this abomination to cause Judah to sin.

(8) Moreover, thou hast taken thy sons and thy daughters, whom thou hast born unto me, and these hast thou sacrificed unto them to be devoured. Is this of thy wickedness a small matter, that thou hast slain thy children, and delivered them to cause them to pass through the fire for them?" See chap. xx. 28; 1 Cor. x. 20.

(4) Thou hastated the old inhabitants of thy holy land for doing most odious works of witchcraft, and for every abomination, and for the cruel and merciless murderers of children, and devourers of man's flesh, and the beasts of blood, with their priests out of the midst of their idolatrous crew, and the parents that killed with their own hands sons destined by the hand of God to be saved.

6. That Almighty God never permitted, in any one instance, that such a human sacrifice should actually be offered to himself. (though he had a right to have required it, if he had so pleased.)

under the whole Jewish dispensation, which yet was full of many other kinds of sacrifices, and this at a time when mankind generally thought such sacrifices of the greatest virtue for the procuring pardon of sin and the divine favor; this the ancient records of the heathen world attest. Take their notion in the words of Philo Byblius, the translator of Sanchoniathon: (c) "It was the custom of the ancients, in the most serious princes and dangers, for the governors of the city or nation, in order to avert the destruction of all, to devote their beloved son to be slain, as a price of redemption to the punishing [or avenging] deities, of which they were devoted in a mystical manner." This the history of the king of Moab, (d) when he was in great distress in his war against Israel and Judah, informs us of; who then took his eldest son, that should have reigned in his sted of the land, for a burnt-offering upon the city wall." This also the Jewish prophet Micah (e) implies, when he inquires, "Whever shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the God of my salvation? When shall I come before him with burnt-offerings, with calves of a year old? Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, with ten thousands of fat kids of the goats? Shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?" No, certainly, "for he hath shewed thee, 0 man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to humble thyself to walk with thy God?" It did here, (f) had had God and his son, devotion and obedience of Abraham to himself, whether they were as strong as the Pagans exhibited to their demons or idols, yet did he withal take effectual care, and that by a miraculous interposition also, to prevent the execution, and provide himself ram, as a vicarious substitute, to supply the place of Isaac immediately: (g) "And the angel of the Lord called unto Abraham, and said, Abraham, Abraham; and he said, Here am I. And he said, Lay not thy hand upon the lad, neither do anything unto him; for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me. And Abraham lifted up his eyes, and looked, and behold, a ram caught in a thicket by his horns; and Abraham went, and took the ram, and offered him up for a burnt-offering in the stead of his son." Thus though Jephthah (h) has, by many, been thought to offer up his only daughter, and child for a sacrifice, and that as bound on, upon supposition of his vow, by a divine law, Lev. xxvii. 28, 29, of which opinion I was once myself; yet, upon more mature consideration, I have been of another opinion, though it should be a mistake, and that this vow extended only to her being devoted to serve God at the tabernacle, or elsewhere, in a state of perpetual virginity; and that neither that law did enjoin any human sacrifices, nor do we meet with any example of its execution in this sense afterward. Philo never mentions any such law no more than Josephus; and when Josephus had thought that Jephthah had made such a vow, and executed it, he is so far from being disapproved, that the very compliance with any law of God, that he expressly condemns him for it, as having acted contrary thereto; or in his own words, (y) "as having offered an oblation neither conformable to the law, nor acceptable to God, nor weighing with himself what opinion the hearers would have of such a practice."

7. That Isaac being at this time, according to Josephus (e), is herein followed by Archb. Ussher, (a) no less than twenty-five years of age, and Abraham being, by consequence, one hundred and twenty-five, it is not to be supposed that Abraham could bind Isaac, in order to offer him in sacrifice, but by his own free consent; which free consent of the party who is to be offered seems absolutely necessary, in all cases: and which free consent St. Clement, as well as Josephus, distinctly takes notice of on this occasion. St. Clement describes it thus; (b) "Isaac being fully persuaded of what was the nature of the work, and of his safety, immediately performed the sacrifice." And for Josephus, (c) after introducing Abraham in a pathetic speech, laying before Isaac the divine command, and exhoriating him patiently and joyfully to submit to it, he tells us, that the sacrifice was then offered, (d) when he refers him as giving a short, but very pious answer, acquiescing in the proposal; and adds, that "he then immediately and readily went to the altar to be sacrificed." Nor does the author (e) perform his rite, whatever it were, till his daughter had given her consent to it.

8. It appears to me that Abraham never despairs entirely of the interposition of Providence to obviate the command he prepared to sacrifice his son. This seems to me intimated in Abraham's words to his servants on the third day, when he was in sight of the mountain on which he was about to offer his son: "We will go and worship, and we will come again to you." As also in his answer to his son, when he inquired, "Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb for the burnt-offering?" And Abraham answered, "My son, God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt-offering." Both these passages look to me, somewhat like such an expectation. However.

9. It appears most evident, that Abraham, and I am inclined also firmly believed, that if God should permit Isaac to be actually slain as a sacrifice, he would certainly and speedily raise him again from the dead. This, to be sure, is supposed in the words already quoted, that both he and his son would go and worship, and would come again to the servants; and is clearly and justly collected from this history by the author to the Hebrews, chap. xi. 17, 18, 19. "By faith Abraham, when he was about to sacrifice Isaac, his son, he had vowed himself, saying, Surely God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt-offering." Both these passages look to me, somewhat like such an expectation. However.

10. That the firm and just foundation of Abraham's faith and assurance in God for such a resurrection, was this, besides the general considenation of the divine variety, that during the whole time of his sojourning in strange countries, in Canaan and Egypt, ever since he had been called out of Chaldees or Mesopotamia at seventy-five years of age, he had (k) had constant experience of a special, of an overruling, of a kind and gracious providence over him, till this his 1225th year, which against all human views had continually blessed him, and enriched him, and, in his elder age, had given him first Ishmael by Hagar, and afterwards promised him Isaac to (l) spring up in him upon his blessing. He had himself answered the voice of the deadness of Sarah’s womb, when she was past age, and when it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women, (m) and had actually performed at Josephus (n) and the very other promises, how improba- bly sower that performed at promised, he had ever made to him, and this during fifty entire years together; so that although at his first exit out of Chaldees, or Mesopotamia, he might have been tempted to stagger at such a promise of God through unbelief, (o) Yet might he now, after fifty years’ constant experience, be justly “strong in faith, giving glory to God; as being fully persuaded, that what God had promised, the reasur- rection of Isaac, “he was both able and willing to perform.”

11. That this assurance, therefore, that God, if he permitted Isaac to be slain, would infallibly raise him again from the dead, entirely alters the state of the case, and brings it rather into conformity to the true God, from that of all other human sacri- fices whatsoever offered to false ones, all those others being done without the least promise of preservation of the sacrificer; for indeed, when it takes away all pretence of injustice in the divine command, as well as of inhumanity or cruelty in Abraham’s obedience to it.

12. That, upon the whole, this command to Abraham to offer his son Isaac, who was “loved of him, very like an intention of God to typify or repre- sent beforehand in Isaac, “a beloved,” or “only begotten son,” what was to happen long afterward to the great “Son and Seed of Abraham,” the Messiah, the beloved son “only begotten of the Father,” whose day Abraham saw by faith beforehand, and rejoiced to see it, (p) was that “he by the determinate counsel and foreknow- ledge of God should be crucified and slain, (q) as a sacrifice upon the altar of God. This was, in point of day, and this at Jerusalem also; and that in the mean time, God would accept of the sacri- fices of rams, and the like animals, at the same city Jerusalem, that one cannot easily avoid the appearance of an anticipation of the sacrifice here. If Abraham had been obliged to go to the land of Moriah, or Jerusalem, and why it is noted, that it was “the third day” (r) that he came to the place, which implies that the return back, after the slaying of the sacrifice, would naturally be “the third day” also: and why this sacrifice was not Ishmael “the son of the flesh” only, but Isaac the son by promise, (s) the beloved son of Abraham, and why Isaac was styled the only son, or only begotten son of Abraham, though he had Ishmael besides; and why Isaac himself was to bear the wood on which he was to be sacrificed; (t) and why the place was no other than the land of Moriah, (u) as the place of the Shechinah, or Messiah, had been seen, and God by his worshipped, even before the days of Abra- ham, and where lately lived, and perhaps was now dwelt Melchisedek, the grand type of the Mes- siah; and why the sacrifice must be made after the manner of that in Tethmis, or on Mount Calvary. This seems also the reason why the ram was substituted as a vicarious sacrifice instead of Isaac. These circumstances seem to me very peculiar and extraordinary, and to render the present hypothesis extremely probable. Nor perhaps did St. Clement mean anything else, when in his foretold passage, he says, that “Isaac was fully persuaded of what he knew was to come,” and therefore “cheerfully yielded himself up to be offered,” in order that name of this place, Jehovah-Jireh, which continued till the days of Moses, and signified, God will see, or rather God will provide, seem to be given by Abraham, on any other account, than that God would there, in the fulness of time, “provide himself a lamb [that Lamb of God (w) which was to take away the sins of the world] for a burnt-offering.”

But now, if, after all, it be objected that how peculiar, and how typical soever the circumstances of Abraham and Isaac might be in themselves, of which the heathens about them could have little notion, yet such a divine command to Abra- ham for slaying his beloved son Isaac, however be of very ill example to the Gentile world, and that it probably did either first occasion, or at least greatly encourage their wicked practices in offering their children for sacrifices to their idols, I answer, there is no room of that argument.

13. That this objection is so far from truth, that God’s public and miraculous prohibition of the execution of this command to Abraham, (which command itself the Gentiles would not then shall be surprised at because so like to their own usual practices,) as well as God’s substitution of a vicarious oblation, seems to have been the very occasion of the instant abolition, of those im- moral practices among the neighboring Egyptians, and of the substitution of more inoffensive ones there instead of them. Take the account of this abolition, which we shall presently prove was about the time of Abra- ham’s offering up his son Isaac, it is preserved through Porphyry, from Manetho, the famous Egyptian historian and chronicler, which is also cit- ed from Porphyry, by Eusebius and Theoreot: “Amosis, (a) says Porphyry, abolished the law in Egypt for offering sacrifices of children, and Manetho bears witness in his book of Antiquity and Piety. They were sacrificed to Jeno, and were examined, as were the pure calves, that were also served with them; they were sacrificed three in a day. In that country, it was com- manded that man of wax, of the same number, should be substituted.”

Now I have lately shown, that these Egyptian laws which the wisdom of those Egyptians, in which Moses was afterward learned, was derived from no other than from Abraham. Now it appears evidently by the foretold passage, that the first abolition of these human sacrifices, and the substitution of waxen images in their stead, and particularly at Heliopolis, in the northeast part of Egypt in the neighborhood of Beer-sheba, in the south of Palestine, where Abraham now lived, at the ex- pense of about sixty years after his departure from Ur, was in the days, and by the order of Tethmis or Amosis, who was the first of the Egyptian kings, after the expulsion of the Phcenian shep- herds. Now therefore we are to inquire, when this Tethmis or Amosis issued this abolition law, that is, the time of the time with the time of the sacrifice of Isaac. Now, if we look into my chronological table, publi- shed A. D. 1721, we shall find that the hundred and twenty-fifth year of Abraham, or which was also one, the twenty-fifth year of Isaac, falls.
Dissertation III.

Tacitus’s Accounts of the Origin of the Jewish Nation, and of the Particulars of the last Jewish War; that the former was probably written in opposition to Josephus’s Antiquities, and that the latter was for certain almost all directly taken from Josephus’s History of the Jewish War.

Since Tacitus, the famous Roman historian, who has written more largely and profoundly about the origin of the Jewish nation, about the chorography of Judea, and the last Jewish war under Cestius, Vespasian, and Titus, than any other old Roman historian; and since both Josephus and Tacitus were in favor with the same Roman Emperors, Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian; and since Tacitus was an eminent pleader and writer of history at Rome, during the time, or not long after, Josephus had been there studying the Greek language, reading the Greek books, and writing his own works in the same Greek language, which language was almost universally known at Rome in that age; and since therefore it is not at all impossible to suppose that Tacitus could be acquainted with the writings of Josephus, it cannot but be highly proper to compare their accounts of Judea, of the Jews, and of Jewish affairs, together. Nor is it other than a very natural paradox to me, how it has been possible for learned men, particularly for the several learned editors of Josephus and Tacitus, to be so very silent about this matter as they have hitherto been, especially when we know of so many authors as to have treated of this matter, and circumstances, is so very remarkable: say, indeed, since many of the particular facts are recorded peculiarly to the region of Judea, and to the Jewish nation, and are such as could hardly be taken by a foreigner from any other author than from our Josephus, this strange silence is almost unaccountable, if not inexplicable.

The two only other writers with whom we know of, whences such Jewish affairs might be supposed to be taken by Tacitus, who never appears to have been in Judea himself, are Justinus of Tiberias, a Jewish historian, contemporaneous with Josephus, and one Antonius Julianus, or mentioned by Suetonius Felix, in his Octavius, sect. 83, as having written on the same subject with Josephus, and both already mentioned by me on another occasion, Dissertation I. As to Justinus of Tiberias, he could not be the historian whom Tacitus took his Jewish affairs, because, as we have seen in the present chapter, he was, in that manner, a perfect stranger to the Jewish nation, and to the Jewish nation, and by his method of writing on Judaism, not there, as we know from the testimony of Photius, Cod. xxi. And as to Antonius Julianus, his very name shows him to have been not a Jew, but a Roman. He is never mentioned by Josephus, and never by another Roman or Jewish historian of Judea than Tacitus himself. He was, I suppose, rather an epitomizer of Josephus, and not so early as Tacitus, than an original historian himself before him. Nor could any other writer, as Tacitus, ever take up with such a poor and most unknown historians as these two, while Josephus’s seven books of the Jewish War were then so common; were in such great reputation at Rome; were esteemed of, and recommended by Vespasian and Titus, the emperors, by king Agrippa, and king Archelaus, and Herod, king of Chalcis; and he was then honored with a statue: and these his books were deposited at the public library at Rome, as we know from Josephus himself, and from the places which are mentioned by Josephus himself, in his own life, sect. 85, and some others from the relations of Roman people, where the affairs of Rome were concerned; and also other affairs might be remembered by old officers and soldiers that had been in the Jewish war. Accordingly, I still suppose that Tacitus had some part of his information these ways, and particularly where he a little differs from, or makes additions to Josephus; but then, as this will all reach no farther than three or four years during this war, so will it by no means account for that abridgment of the geography of the country, and entire series of the principal facts of history thushere relating, which are in Josephus, from the days of Josephus, 240 years before the war, with which Antiochus, both Josephus and Tacitus begin their distinct histories of the Jews, preparatory to the history of the Jewish war. Nor can Tacitus take the greatest part of those earlier facts belonging to the Jewish nation from the days of Moses, or to Christ and Christians in the days of Tiberius, from Roman authors; of which Jewish and Christian affairs he must have had some knowledge, and which the heathens generally did grossly pervert and shameful falsify; and this is so true as to Tacitus’s own accounts of the origin of the Jewish nation, that the reader may adduce them in constant rule, that when Tacitus contradicts Josephus’s Jewish Antiquities, he either tells direct falsehoods, or truths so miserably disguised, as renders them little better than falsehoods, and hardly ever lights upon any thing relating to them that is true and solid, but when the same is in those Antiquities at this day, of which matters more will be said in the notes on this history immediately following.

History of the Jews.—Book V. Chap. II.

Since we are now going to relate the final period of this famous city (Jerusalem), it seems, proper to give an account of its original.

The tradition is, that the Jews ran away from the island of Crete, and settled themselves on the country by the coast of Libya, and this at the time when Saturn was driven out of his kingdom by the power of Jupiter: an argument for it is fetched from their name Cretaeus, which signifies Cretans, and the neighboring inhabitants are named Idaeus, which, with a barbarous augment, becomes the name of Judei (Jews.) Some say they were a people that were very numerous in Egypt under the reign of Osiris, and that the Egyptians got free a serious confusion. It is strange Tacitus could persuade himself thus rashly to set these down. from that burden, by sending them into the adjacent countries, under their captains Hierosolymus and Judas. The greatest part, say they, were those Ethiopians whom fear and hatred obliged to change their habitations, in the reign of King Cepheus. (a) There are those who report that they were Assyrians, who wanting lands got together, and obtained part of Egypt, and soon afterward settled themselves in cities of the parts of Syria that lay nearest to them. (b) Others pretend their origin to be more eminent, and that the Solymi, a people celebrated in Homer's poems, were the founders of this nation, and gave them the name Hierosolymas, to the city which they built there. (c)

CHAP. III.] Many authors agree, that when once an infectious distemper was arisen in Egypt, and the Nile and the Aegyptiotes under their king went to the oracle of [Jupiter] Hammon, and begged he would grant him some relief against this evil; and that he was enjoined to purge his nation of them, and to banish this kind of men and those countries as hateful to the gods. (d) That when he had sought for, and gotten them all together, they were left in a vast desert: that hereupon the rest devoted themselves to weeping and inactivity; but one of those exiles, Moses by name, was sent for to the sun, and being sent from any of the gods, or from any of mankind; since they had been abandoned by both, but bade them believe in him as in a celestial leader, (e) by whose help they had already gotten clear of the Egyptian slavery; (f) That though they were unacquainted with every thing, they began their journey at random. But nothing tired them so much as the want of water; and now they laid themselves down to die, groaning to see death, and his corpse; when an herd of wild asses came from feeding, and went to a rock overshadowed by a grove of trees. Moses followed them, as conjecturing that there was some secret sown ground, and so he opened large sources of water for them. (g) That was an ease to them; and when they had journeyed continually six entire days, (f) on the seventh day they drove out the inhabitants, and others the nations wherein their city and temple were dedicated.

CHAP. IV.] As for Moses, in order to secure the nation frankly to himself, he ordained new rites, and such as were contrary to those of other men. All things are with them profane which with us are sacred; and again, those practices are allowed among them which are by us esteemed most abominable. (g)

They place the image of that animal in their most holy places, by whose indication it was that they had escaped their wandering condition and their thirst. (h)

They sacrifice the rams by way of reproach to [Jupiter] Hammon. An ox is also sacrificed, which the Egyptians worship under the name of Apis. (i)

They abstain from swine's flesh as a memoria l of that miserable destruction which the swine, which that creature is liable, brought on them, and with which they had been defiled. (j) That they had endured a long famine they attest still by their frequent fasting. (k) And that they stole the fruits of the earth, we have an argument from the bread of the Jews, which is unleavened. (m)

It is generally supposed that they rest on the seventh day, (a) because that day gave them the [first] rest from their labors. Besides which they are idle the very day of the Sabbath, and are pleased with a lazy life. Others say that they do honor thereby to Saturn; (p) or perhaps the Idae gave them this part of their religion, who as we said above were expelled, together with Saturn, and other gods; and it is not improbable, that the founders of this nation; or else it was because the star Saturn moves in the highest orb, and of the seven planets exerts the principal part of that energy whereby mankind are governed; and that their bodies, by which means the Jewish commonwealth was augmented. And because among themselves there is an unalterable fidelity and kindness, always ready at hand, but bitter enmity towards all others; (f) they are a people separated from others in year (p) and in their beds; though they be the leasted nation upon earth, yet will they not corrupt foreign women, (a) though nothing be esteemed unlawful among themselves. (v)

They have ordained circumcision of the parts

(1) The Jews had but one solemn fast of old in the whole year, the Passover; so the Ambrose, anz.
(2) Unleavened bread was only used at the passover.
(3) It is very strange that Tacitus should not know or confess that the Jews'INDEX day, and second day of rest, were in memory of the seventh, or Sabbath-day's rest, after the six days of creation. Every Jew, as well as every Christian, could have informed him of these matters.
(4) A strange hypothesis of the origin of the sabbath year, and without all good foundation. Tacitus probably had never heard of the Jews' year of jubile, so he says nothing of it.
(5) As the Jews, in the days of Moses, or long before, knew that the Greeks and Romans would long afterward call the seventh day their Sabbath, they concluded their obser"uers was not so called of old time; and it is a question whether before the Jews fell into idolatry, they ever heard of such a star or god as Saturn. Amos v. 25; Acts vii. 42.
(6) That the sun, moon, and stars, rule over the affairs of mankind, was a heathen and not a Jewish notion; neither Jews nor Christians were ignorant of such astrology, though Tacitus seems to have been deep in it.
(7) This acknowledgement of the antiquity of Moses, and of his Jewish settlement, was what the heathen minded not always to own.
(8) What these pretended awkward and impure inscriptions were.
(9) Josephus shows the contrary, as to the laws of his nation, confr. Apion, book ii. sect. 29.
(10) High and entirely false character, and contrary to their many laws against uncleanness. See Josephus, Antiq. ii. iii. chap. xii. sect. 22.
used in generation, that they may thereby be distinguished from other people: the proselytes (α) to their religion have the same usage.

They are taught nothing sooner than to despise the gods, to set them in the country, and to have their parents, children, and brethren, in the utmost contempt; (β) but still they take care to increase and multiply, for it is esteemed utterly unlawful to kill any of their children. Word. (γ) It is a mark of those who die in battle, or are put to death for their crimes, as eternal. Hence comes their love of posterity and contempt of death.

They derive their custom of burying (γ) instinctively from their dead from the Egyptians; they have also the same care of the dead with them, and the same persuasion about the invisible world below; but of the gods above, their opinion is contrary to theirs. The Egyptians worship abundance of animals, and images of various sorts.

The Jews have no notion of any more than one Divine Being, (α) and that known only by the name of 'great labr.' Such are the images of gods out of perishable matter, and in the shape of men. That this Being is supreme, and eternal, and immutable, and unperishable, is their doctrine. Accordingly, they have not their true gods in their cities, much less in their temples: they never grant this piece of flattery to kings, or this kind of honor to emperors. (β) But because their priests, when they play on the pipe and timbrels, wear ivy round their head, and there is a branch found in their temple, (γ) some have thought that they worshipped our father Bacchus, the conqueror of the East; whereas the ceremonies of the Jews do not at all agree with those of Bacchus, for he appointed rites that were of a jovial nature, and fit for festivals, while the practices of the Jews are absurd and sordid.

CHAP. VI.] The limits of Judea are bordered by the Grecian Phoenicians and the [great] sea. They have a prospect of Syria on their north quarter, as at some distance from them. (c)

The bodies of the men are healthy, and such as will bear great labors. There are not many showers of rain: their soil is very fruitful: the produce of their land is ours, in great plenty. (d)

They have also, besides ours, two trees peculiar: the banana tree, which is the palm of another tree. Their groves of palms are tall and beautiful. The banana tree is not very large. As soon as any branch is swollen, the veins quack as for fear, if you bring an iron knife to cut them. They are to be opened with the broken piece of a stone, or with the shell of a fish. The juice is useful in physic.

(α) The proselytes of justice only, not the proselytes of the gate.

(β) How does this agree with that unalterable fidelity and constancy of the Jews? Tacitus told us the Jews had towards one another? unless he only means that they preferred the divine commands before their nearest relations, which is the highest degree of Jewish and Christian piety.

(δ) These are very valuable conclusions, which Tacitus here makes. As to the unspotted piety of the Jewish nation, he might have added, that they are an infinite, unbounded rejection of all idolatry, and all worship of images, say, of the image of the emperor Caligula himself, or of sacrifices in the temple.

(α) All these conclusions were to be learned from Josephus, and almost only from him; out of whom, therefore, I think Tacitus took the finest part of his character of the Jews.

(β) This particular fact, that there was a golden vine in the Jewish temple, was in all probability, as it is very likely, taken by Tacitus out of Josephus; but as the Jewish priests were never adorned with ivy, the signal of Bacchus, how Tacitus came to imagine this, I cannot tell.
mouth, when they mix sile with them, are melt ed into glass: this sort of shore is but small, but its sand, for the use of those that carry it off, is immeasurable.

CHAP. VIII. A great part of Judea is composed of scattered villages; it has also larger towns, and the Jerusalem is the capital of the nation. In that city there was a temple of immense wealth; in the first parts that are fortified are the city itself, next it the royal palace.
The temple is enclosed in its most inward recesses. A Jew cannot get no farther with his sight; but the priests are excluded by their threshold. While the East was under the dominion of the Assyrians, the Medes, and the Persians, the Jews were of all desire, of all desire. (c)

(2) After the dominion of the Macedonians prevailed, king Antiochus tried to conquer their superstition, and to introduce the customs of the Greeks; but he was disappointed of his design, which was to give this most profane nation a character for the better, and that was by his war with the Parthians, for at this time Araxes had fallen off [from the Macedonians]. Then it was that the Jews set kings over them, because the Medes and Persians were become wiser; the Romans were not yet very powerful, and the Romans were very remote: which kings when they had been expelled by the mobility of the vulgar, and had recovered their dominion by war, stamped the Romans as less than kings that kings under which they introduced the destruction of cities, the slaughter of brethren, of wives, and parents, but still went on in their superstition; for they took upon them withal the honorable dignity of the high priesthood, as a firm security to their power and authority.

CHAP. IX.] The first of the Romans that conquered the Jews was Caius Pompeius, who entered the temple by right of victory. Thence the rebbeblem was reserved where every divine prer-ience was no image of a god, but an empty place, and mysteries, most secret places that have nothing in them. The walls of Jerusalem were then destroyed, but the temple continued still.
Soon afterward arose a civil war among us; and when therein those provinces were reduced under Marcus Antonius, Pescara, king of the Parthians, got possession of Judea, but was himself slain by Paulius Ventidius, and the Parthians were driven back: and for the Jews, Caius Sosius subdued them.
Antonius gave the kingdom to Heracl: and when Augustus conquered Antonius, he still augmented it.

After Henry's death, one Simon, without waiting for the disposition of Cæsar, took upon him the title of king, who was brought to punishment by or under Quintilius Varus, when he was present of Syria. Afterward the nation was reduced, and the children of Herod governed it in those partitions.

Under Tiberius, the Jews had rest. After some time they were enjoined to place Caius Cæsar's statue in the temple; but rather than permit that,
the temple was destroyed, and that action was put an end to by the death of Cæsar.

Claudius, after the kings were either dead or reduced to smaller dominions, gave the province of Judea to Roman knights, or to freed men, to be governed there the same as at Rome; and Caius Felix, one that exercised all kind of barbarity and extravagance, as if he had royal authority, but with the disposition of a slave. He had married Drusilla the granddaughter of Antonius, so that Frank, in his war remaining, which would work hard and difficult, but rather from the nature of the mountain, set this matter almost right, according to Josephus, and by way of correction, for that account is in his annals, which were written after this, which is in his historiography. (a)

(4) Here Josephus may use some mistake in the affairs of Cæsarius. See Of the War, B. I. ch. 21, sect. 8.

and the obstinacy of the Jewish superstition, then because the besieged had strength enough to un- dergo the distresses [of a siege.]. We have al- ready informed [the reader] that Vespasian had with him three legions, well exercised in war. Histor. book ii. chap. 5.

When Vespasian was a very young man, it was promised him that he should arrive at the highest pitch of fame: but what did first of all seem to come within his power, was his triumphs, and consol- ship, and the glories of his victories over the Jews. When he had once obtained these, he believed it was portended that he should come to the em- pire. (p)

The war is between Judea and Syria a mountain and a god, both called by the name of Carmel, though our predecessors have informed us that this god had no image, and no temple, and indeed no more than an altar and solemn worship. Vespas- ian was once offering a sacrifice there, at a time when he had some secret thought in his mind: the priest, whose name was Basilius, when he heard and over and looked at the entrails, said, Vespas- ian, whatever thou art about, whether the building of the temple, or the construction of thy law, or augmentation of thy slaves, thou art granted a mighty seat, very large bounds, a huge number of men. These doubtful answers were soon spread abroad by fame, and at what hour were ex- pected, nor was any thing so much in public vogue, and very many discourses of that nature were made before him, and the more because they foretold what he expected.

Vespasian and Vespasianus went away, having fully agreed on their designs: the former to Ant- ioch, the latter to Caesarea. Antiochus is the capi- tal of Syria, and Caesarea the capital of Judea. The commencement of Vespasian's advancement to the throne at Alexandria, where Titus Alexander made such haste, that he obliged the legions to take the oath of fidelity to him on the calends of July, which was ever after cele- brated as the day of his inauguration, although (q) the custom of laying on the hand on the fifth of the nones of July, with that eagerness that they would not stay for his son Titus, who was then on the road, returning out of Syria, chap. 79. Vespasian delivered over the strongest part of his army to his son, and continued in what remained of the Jewish war. Hist. book iv. chap. 51.

During these months in which Vespasian con- tinued in Alexandria, waiting for the usual set time of the summer gales of wind, and stayed for settled fair weather at sea, many miraculous events happened, by which the good will of heaven, and a kind of inclination of the Deity in his favor was declared.

A certain man of the vulgar sort at Alexand- ria, well known for the decy of his eyes, kneel- ed down by him and groaned, and begged of him the cure of his blindness, as the admonition of Serapius, that god which this superstition nation worships above others. He also desired that the emperor would be pleased to put some of his spittle upon the balls of his eyes. Another in- firm man there, who was lame of his hand, prayed Caesar, as by the same god's suggestion, to tread upon him with his foot. Vespasian at first began to laugh at them, and to reject them, and when they were instant with him, he sometimes said, they should have the reputation of a vain person, and sometimes upon the solicitation of the infirm, he flattered himself, and others flatter- ed him with the hopes of succeeding. At last he ordered the physicians to give their opinion, what the cause of their diseases was, and if they were curable by the art of man or not? The phys- icians answered uncertainly, that the one had not his visual faculty utterly destroyed, and that it might be restored, if the obstacles were removed; these physicians were disorders or healing virtue were made use of, they were ca- pable of being made whole. Perhaps, said they, the gods are willing to assist, and that the empe- ror is chosen by divine interposition: however they said at last, that if he should have the fortune; and saw would have the glory, if not, the poor mis- able objects would only be laughed at. Where- upon Vespasian imagined that his good fortune would be universal, and that nothing on that ac- count should hinder him, he left Alexandria, and in the sight of the multitude, who stood in great expectation, he did what they desired him: upon which the same hand was recovered, and the God of heaven doth indeed do these cures (r) are related to this day by those who were present, and when speaking falsely will get no re- ward.

BOOK V.—CHAP. I.

At the beginning of the same year Titus Caesar, who was pitched upon by his father to finish the conquest of Judea, and while both he and his fa- ther were private persons, was celebrated for his virtues, and under Alexander Titus, then emperor of the Romans, and hopes of reputation, the kind inclinations both of the provinces and of the armies striving one with another who should most encourage him. He was also himself in a disposition to show that he was not equal to his fortune; and when he appeared in armies, he did all things after such a ready and graceful way, treating all after such an affable manner, and with such kind words, as invited the good-will and good wishes of all. His language was so pure, that it sanctified the actions in the troops; he mixed with the common sol- diers, yet without any stain to his honor as a gen- eral. (s) He was received in Judea by three legions, together with Titus Alexander the young, who were Vespasian's old soldiers. Syria also afforded him the twelfth, and Alexandria soldiers out of the twenty-second and twenty-third legions. Twenty cohorts (t) of auxiliaries accompanied, as also eight troops of horse.

King Agrippa also was there, and king "Je- nus, and the auxiliaries of king Antiochus, and a strong body of Arabians, who, as is usual in na- tions that are neighbors to one another, were with them, and accustomed hatred against the Jews, with many others out of the city of Rome, as every one's hopes led him of getting early into the general's favor, before others should privatize them.

(p) Josephus takes notice in general of these many miracles of Vespasian's advancement to the empire, and distinctly adds his own remarkable prediction of it also. Of the War, B. iii. chap. viii. sect. 3-9.

(q) This allegory seems to imply that Vespasian was great, and Judea a temple, which he at that time held at Alexandria, as the whole history of Josephus im- plies, and the place where now Vespasian was, which was not considered a temple till Ptolemy Ty- rhenus, though the Mauzoleum at Alexandria was a temple, which might be celebrated afterward from his first proclamation at the great city Alexandria, only then the honor of the name was impious or false.

(r) The miraculous cures done by Vespasian are attested both by the testimony of Josephus, in section 7, and by Dio, p. 47. He is well attended, he has overthrown the heathen oracle of Serapis to procure the divine approbation to Vespasian's advancement to the empire of Rome, as he suggested the like approbation to the advancement both of Vespasian and Titus to Joseph- phus, which two were to be his chosen instruments in bringing on that terrible destruction upon the Jewish na- tion, which he had threatened to execute on these Roman armies. Nor could any other Roman generals than Ves- pasian or Titus Alexander, have so great an influence over the Jews, and destroyed Jerusalem, or this whole history in Josephus implies. Josephus also very well states, and indeed well attested, that the seven days of the humil- ity day might be celebrated afterward from his first proclamation at the great city Alexandria, only then the honor of the name was impious or false.

Dissertation III.

He entered into the borders of the empires' country with these forces in exact order of war; and looking carefully about him, and being ready for battle, he pitched his camp not far from Jerusalem.

Chap. X.] When therefore, he had pitched his camp, as we said just now, before the walls of Jerusalem, he pompously showed his legions (a) ready for an engagement.

Chap. XI.] The Jews formed their camp under the walls for some days, but soon the enemy succeeded, they resolved to venture further, but if they were beaten back, that was their place of refuge. When a body of cavalry (a) were sent against them, and with them cohorts, that were armed and numbered, the Romans began to march, but soon afterward the enemies gave ground, and on the following days there were frequent skirmishes before the gates, till after many losses they were driven into the city. The Romans then took possession of it; for, every day, the numbers repaired to their camp, and there became more seditious than before.

There were three captains and as many armies. Simon had the remotest and largest part of the walls under him. John, who was also called Barnabas, was among the Glorias, (b) which were a little less than half the city; and Eleazar had fortified the temple itself. John and Simon were superior in multitude and strength of arms; Eleazar was superior by his situation, but battles, factions, and quarrels, were confined to them all; and a great quantity of corn was consumed by fire. After a while John sent some, who, under the pretence of offering sacrifice, might slay Eleazar and his body of troops, which they did, and got the number of these; and now the city was now parted into two factions, until, upon the coming of the Romans, this war abroad produced peace between those that were at home.

Chap. XII.] Such prodigies (c) had happened, as this war, which was peculiar and strange; though in its own way, would not agree to expiate by the ceremonies of the Roman religion, nor would they atone the gods by sacrifices and vows, as these were used on such occasions. Armies were seen to fight in the sky, and their colors looked of a bright light color, and the temple shone with sudden flashes of fire out of the clouds. The doors of the temple were opened on that night, and the voices of the voices, etc., etc. was heard, that the gods were retiring, and at the same time there was a great motion perceived, as if they were going out of it, which some esteemed to be causes of terror. The greater part had a firm belief that this was done in connection with the sacred books, that at this very time the East would prevail, and that some very great event that came out of Judent was to be expected; and thus they were prepared and brought about the event.

We have been informed, that the number of the besieged, of every age, and of both sexes, male and female, was six hundred thousand. (d)

There were weapons for all that could carry them, and more than could be expected, for their number were bold enough to do so. The men and the women were equally obstinate; and when

For a long siege. After Pompey's conquest also their fear and experience had taught them generally what they should want. (a)

Moreover, the covetous temper that prevailed under Claudius, gave the Jews an opportunity of purchasing arms, and a portion of Josephus (a) leaves to fortify Jerusalem; so they built walls in time of peace, if they were going to war, they being augmented in number by those rude multitudes of people that retired thither on the ruins of the other cities, for every day, the number increased, and in the city cities, and there became more seditious than before.

(a) This is Tacitus's or the Romans' own hypothesis, unsupported by Josephus.

(b) This is what the Jews want for the Jews to build the walls of Jerusalem for money is only Tacitus's or the Romans' own hypothesis, unsupported by Josephus. Nor is Josephus's belief the same, in the transaction of Josephus, as it is in Tacitus and Sextus. Dio says, he was far from covetousness in particular. The others seem to have misrepresented his meek and quiet temper and learning, but without ambition, and his great kindness to the Jews, as the most contemptible folly. See Antiq. B. xix. ch. iv. sec. 4. He was, indeed, much ranked at first by a very bad penmaster. Palæmon declared that he was reviled and poisoned by a very bad wife, Agrippina.

against this city and nation. Caesar resolved to fight, by ramparts and ditches, since the situation of the place did not admit of taking it by storm or surprise. He parted the duty amongst the legions, that there might be no further suspense, until whatever had been invented for the taking of cities by the ancients, or by the ingenuity of the moderns, was got ready.

Annal.—Book XV.

Nero, in order to stifle the rumor, [as if himself had set Rome on fire,] ascribed it to those people who were hated for their wicked practices, and called by the vulgar, Christians: these he ordered to be put to death. The author of this name was Christ, who, in the reign of Tiberius, was brought to punishment by Pontius Pilate, the procurator. (f) For the present this punicous superstition was in part suppressed, but it burst out again, not only over Judea, where this mischief first sprang, but in the city of Rome also, whither do run from every quarter, and make a noise, all the flagrant and shameful enormities, that was done there; and when Nero, who confessed, after a vast multitude were detected by them, and were convicted, not so much as really guilty of setting the city on fire, but as sailing all mankind; nay, they made a mock of those, and despised them, by putting them into the skins of wild beasts, and setting dogs upon them to tear them to pieces: some were nailed to crosses, and others flamed to death: they were also used in the night-time instead of torches for illumination. Nero had offered his own garden for this spectacle. He also gave them Circassian games, and dressed himself like the driver of a chariot, sometimes appearing among the common people, and sometimes showing himself; when a commission arose, though the punishments were levelled at guilty persons, and such as deserved to be made the most flagrant examples, as if these people were destroyed, not for the public advantage, but to satisfy the, notorious humor of one man, who was his mistress. N.B. Since I have set down all the vile calumnies of Tacitus upon the Christians as well as the Jews, it will be proper, before I come to my obser-tion of what shows itself; and what a commission arose, though the punishments were levelled at guilty persons, and such as deserved to be made the most flagrant examples, as if these people were destroyed, not for the public advantage, but to satisfy the notorious humor of one man, who was his mistress. Since I have set down all the vile calumnies of Tacitus upon the Christians as well as the Jews, it will be proper, before I come to my observation of what appears itself, and what a commission arose, though the punishments were levelled at guilty persons, and such as deserved to be made the most flagrant examples, as if these people were destroyed, not for the public advantage, but to satisfy the notorious humor of one man, who was his mistress.

Pliny's Epistle to Trajan.

About A. D. 112.

Sir.—It is my constant method to apply myself to you for the resolution of all my doubts; for we are drawn into the same need of our just proceeding, or instruct my ignorance? I have never been present at the examination of the Christians [by others], on which account I am unac-

(f) This passage seems to have been directly taken from the accounts given by Pliny and the Christians, Antiq. B. II. ch. iii. sect. 2, of which see Dissert. I. before.

(g) Till now it seems repentance was not commonly allowed those who had been once Christians, but though they recanted, and returned to idolatry, yet were they commonly put to death. This was persecution in perfection! But I have a further account of the ancient Christians, that they commonly suffered for that bare name, without the presence of any crime; they could prove against themselves. This was also persecution in perfection!

(i) Amazing doctrine! that a firm and fixed resolution of keeping a good conscience should be thought without dispute to deserve death, and this by such comparatively pacient heathens as Pliny and Trajan.

(2) This was the case of St. Paul, who being a citizen of unknown age, he allowed himself to be examined by the Roman procurator, Aquila, about the twenty-fifth year of his age, but still discovered no more than that they were advised to the emperor to intercede for them. Hereupon I have put off any further examinations, and have recourse to you, for the affair seems to be well worth consultation, especially

(3) (a) This must probably be the feast of Easter.
on account of the number (c) of those that are in danger; for there are many of every age, of every rank, and of both sexes, who are now and hereafter likely to be called to account, and to be in danger, for this superstition is spread like a contagion, not only in cities and towns, but into country villages also, which yet is there reason that, publicly and without secrecy, to be sure, the temples, which were almost forsaken, begin already to be frequented; and the holy solemnities, which were long intermitted, begin to be revived. The sacrifices begin to sell well everywhere, of which we have had few proofs, and oflate appeared; whereby it is easy to suppose how great a multitude of men might be assembled, is place for repentance be admitted.

TACITUS'S EPISTLE TO PLINY.

My Friend—You have taken the method which you ought in examining the causes of those that had been accused as Christians, for indeed no certain and general form of judging can be ordained in this case, the people are mixed, as not to be sought for; but if they be accused, and convicted, they are to be punished; but with this caution, that he who doth himself to be a Christian, and makes it plain that he is not so, by supplicating to our gods, although he be afterwards proved to be a Christian, may be allowed pardon upon his repentance. As for libels sent without an author, they ought to have no place in any accusation whatsoever, for that would be of very ill example, and not agreeable to my reign.

Observations upon the Passages taken out of TACITUS.

I. We see here what a great regard the best of the Roman historians of that age, Tacitus, had to the history of Josephus, while though he never names him, as he very rarely names any of those Roman authors whence he derives other parts of his history, yet does it appear that he refers to his seven books of the Jewish Wars several times in a very few pages, and almost always depends on his accounts of the affairs of the Romans and Parthians, as well as of the Jews, during no fewer than two hundred and forty years, to which these books extend.

II. Yet it does appear, that when he now and then followed other historians or reports concerning the Romans, the Parthians, or the Jews, during that time, he sometimes took them in, and had better have kept close to Josephus than hearken to any of his other authors or informers.

III. It also appears highly probable that Tacitus had seen the Antiquities of Josephus, and knew that the most part of the accounts he produced of the origin of the Jewish nation entirely contradicted those Antiquities. He also could hardly avoid seeing that those accounts were contradicted by the same; and having read them, he must have been struck with wonder, and affirmed, and supported by no good evidence whatsoever; as also he could hardly avoid seeing that Josephus's accounts in those Antiquities were not at all conformable, but entirely contradictory to the ancient records of that nation, and of the neighboring nations also, which indeed no one can avoid seeing that carefully peruses and considers them.

IV. But, therefore, in concealing the greatest part of the true ancient history of the Jewish nation, which lay before him in Josephus, and producing such fabulous, ill-grounded, and partial histories, which he had from the heathens, acted a most unfair part: and this procedure of his is here the more gross, in regard he professed such great impartiality, [Hist. B. i. chap. i.] and is alleged to have observed that impartiality in the Roman affairs also.

V. Tacitus's hatred and contempt of God's peculiar people, the Jews, and his attachment to the grossest idolatry, superstition, and astral futility of the Romans, were therefore so strong in him, as to overbear all restraints of sober reason and equity, and make them thus to proceed. To be said, he was allowed so exactly to have followed them on other occasions relating to the Romans.

VI. Since therefore Tacitus was so bitter against the Jews, and since he knew that Christ himself was a Jew and his followers were Jews, and also knew that the Christian religion was derived into the Roman provinces from Judea, it is no wonder that his hatred and contempt of the Jews extended itself to the Christians also, and that he was confounded with the Jews: as therefore his hard words of the Jews appear to have been generally groundless, and hurt his own reputation instead of theirs, so ought we to esteem his sable hard words of the Christians to be blots upon his own character, and not upon theirs.

VII. Since therefore Josephus, soon after the publication of Josephus's Antiquities, and in contradiction to the Jews, wrote a book in which he denied all such idle stories about the Jews, and since one of those idle stories is much the same with that published in Josephus, against Apion, from Maimeth and Lyshmae, and no where else met with so fully and all at one, it is most probable that those Antiquities of Josephus, were the very occasion of Tacitus giving us these stories, as we know from Josephus himself contra Apion, B. I. sect. 1, that the same Antiquities were the very occasion of Apion's publication of his equal scandalous stories about them, and which Josephus so thoroughly confuted in these two books written against him. And if Tacitus, as I suppose, had also read these two books, his procedure in publishing such stories, after that he had seen so thorough a confutation of them, was still more highly criminal. Nor will Tacitus's fault be much less, though we suppose he neither saw the Antiquities nor the books against Apion, because it was very easy for him, from reading at random, and more authentic accounts of the origin of the Jewish nation, and of the nature of the Jewish and Christian religions, from the Jews and Christians themselves, which he owned were very numerous there in his time, to make such a publication of such idle stories is utterly inexcusable.

VIII. It is therefore very plain, after all, that notwithstanding the encomiums of several of our learned critics upon Tacitus, and hard suspicions upon Josephus, that all the (involuntary) mistakes of Josephus, in all his large works put together, their quality as well as quantity considered, do not amount to near so great a mass, as do these gross errors and misrepresentations of Tacitus. And such later and lesser critics should have learned more judgment and modesty from their great father Joseph Scaliger when, as we have seen, after all his deeper inquiries, he solemnly pronounces, De Exempl. p. 17, "that Josephus is the most diligent and the greatest lover of truth of all writers;" and is not afraid to affirm, that, "it is more safe to believe him, not only as to the affairs of the Jews, but also to those that are foreign to them, than all the Greek and Latin writers, and this because his fidelity and compass of learning are very where conspicuous." least in Bithynia, even in the beginning of that century, as is wholly undeniable.
