CANDLES, THE GOLDEN, or properly Candelabrum (Exod. xxv. 31-40, xxvii. 20, xxxvii. 17-24), stood on the south side of the first apartment of the tabernacle, "opposite the table of shew-bread, in an oblique position, so that the lamps looked to the east and the south; hence the central was called the 'western' lamp." Its object was partly, by its lights, to enable the priests to discharge their functions there, as all natural light was excluded from the holy place, but chiefly to be a holy sign and symbol of the invisible God, who dwells in the light which no man can approach unto, who covers himself with light as with a garment (1 Tim. vi. 16; Ps. civ. 2), who is himself light, and the source of it (Ps. xxxvi. 9). Bezaleel made it, after the divine directions, out of beaten gold. Dr. T. J. Conant (in "From the Original Texts") quite describes it thus: "The central shaft, bearing the central lamp: from two opposite sides of it proceeded other shafts, three on a side, making six branches from the main shaft, all being in the same plane with it, and each bearing a lamp. A part of the main shaft and its branches, serving for ornaments of the structure, are mentioned, — flower-cups, capitals, and flowers. In shape the capital may have had the rounded form of fruit, as indicated in some of the ancient versions and Josephus. From the representation in Exod. xxv. 33-35, these parts appear to have been arranged as follows: each of the six side-branches had three flower-cups, shaped like the calyx of the almond-blossom, and terminated in a crown or capital, with its ornamented flower as a receptacle for the lamp. The central shaft was composed of four such combinations of calyx, capital, and flower, each pair of side-branches resting on the capital of one of the three lower, the fourth and uppermost bearing the central lamp."

The question whether the seven lamps were upon one level may probably be answered affirmatively. Origen, having put to idolatrous uses the candles Christians had used in worship; and Jerome (331-420) says that the practice of burning candles during the reading of the gospel, even in the clear day, was universal in the Eastern Church (Liber contra Vigilantium, III.); and in another place he speaks of wax lights burning before the tomb of martyrs (Epist. ad Riparium, i.; Epist., CIX., ed. Migne, Opera Hieronymi, vol. i. p. 907 [726]). Chrysostom (347-407) speaks of the candles burning upon the altars in churches as a usual sight; but in chapels and before shrines, lamps were preferred. The candles were and are exclusively wax. The Roman Church forbids even stearine candles. Wax was chosen on account of its odor and its costliness; for we ought to give God our best and costliest. At mass, at least two tapers must burn upon the altar; they are carried in by the designated ceroferarii: so, in other ceremonies, candles were used, and a symbolical meaning found. Thus the baptism candles spoke of the light of the good works by which heaven was entered; the marriage candles, of the purity and joy of the heart; the burial candles, of the eternal light of heaven. The Reformed Church has properly rejected the use of candles, as savouring too much of that heathenism whence the custom was borrowed," by H. MERZ (in Herzog's Lex.).

The lamps burnt day and night, although, as Josephus says (Antiq. III. 8, 3), that the ornaments upon the shaft and branches were seventy in number, there is no proof, nor much likelihood, although he finds in the number a secret intimation of the Dekaploos, in astrology the ten degrees of a circle, and in the lamps a reference to the seven planets. Philo likewise finds symbolical reference in the seven lights; for he says, "The sacred candelabrum and the seven lights upon it are an imitation of the wandering of the seven planets through the heaven." (Quis rer div. herm. sit. § 44, ed. Mangey, Tom. I. pp. 509 sqq.; Bohm's trans. vol. ii. p. 137). Ewald, probably correctly, sees in the number seven merely the holy number, consecrated by the sabbath (Antiq. [Eng. trans.] p. 115). The lamps burnt day and night, although, as Josephus says (Antiq. III. 8, 3), it may well be that by day only three were carried in by the business of the priests to fill the lamps every evening, for which purpose the finest olive-oil was used (Exod. xxvii. 20) to clean them in the morning, snuffing them with golden snuffers, and to carry away the snuff in golden snuff-dishes (Exod. xxv. 31-40).
38). Whenever this was done, the priest was obligated to offer a sacrifice of incense upon the altar of incense in the inner sanctuary. (Exod. xxx. 7, 8.) Ewald says, giving perfect expression to the "correspondence between light and sacrifice."

The candelabrum and its appurtenances required a talent of pure gold, weighed a hundred minae, and, according to the rabbins, was five feet high, and three feet and a half broad, i.e., the distance between the exterior branches. When it was moved, the lamp-stand was covered with a blue cloth, and put, with the "lamps, tongs, snuff-dishes, and all the oil vessels thereof," in badger-skin bags, which were carried on a bar (Num. iv. 9, 10).

In Solomon's temple, instead of one candelabrum, there were ten upon golden tables,—five on the north and five on the south side of the Holy Place. The larger number fitted the larger space and the greater pomp of the worship (1 Kings vii. 49). The Chaldeans carried them to Babylon (Jer. ii. 8). In the second temple, there was only one candelstick (Eccles. xxvi. 17; "as the clear light is upon the holy candlestick, so is the beauty of the face in ripe age"). Antiochus Epiphanes removed it (1 Macc. i. 21), and Judas Maccabaeus restored it (Macc. iv. 49); and it remained in Herod's temple until the destruction of Jerusalem, when Titus carried it to Rome, and it figured on his triumphal arch, although it would seem not altogether accurately (Joseph. War, VII. 5, 5). It was then deposited in the Temple of Peace. According to one account, it fell into the Tiber from the Milvian Bridge during the flight of Maximinus from Constantinople, Oct. 28, 312; but the usually accredited story is, that it was taken to Carthage by Generici, 455 (Gibbon iii. 291), recovered by Belisarius, transferred to Constantinople, and then respectfully deposited in the Christian Church of Jerusalem 533 (id. iv. 24). Nothing more has been heard of it.

The saying of Jesus, "I am the light of the world" (John viii. 12), was probably suggested by the illumination of the temple courts on the evening of the Feast of Tabernacles, by means of four great candelabrum erected in the court of the women; although some see in it allusion to the golden candelabrum. In Rev. i. 12, 20, ii. 1, candelabrum symbolize churches.

CANDLISH, Robert Smith, D.D., one of the most distinguished founders and leaders of the Free Church of Scotland, b. at Edinburgh, March 23, 1806; d. there Oct. 19, 1872. His father, who died in 1838, was a medical teacher, and a friend of Robert Burns. He was educated at Glasgow, and, after two years spent as a tutor at Eton, he was licensed as a preacher; served as assistant in Glasgow, at Bonhill, and in St. George's, Edinburgh, and was ordained to the charge last named in 1834. In this very conspicuous sphere he gained a great reputation, and became famous. In 1839 he publicly identified himself with the party in the Established Church of Scotland which ultimately became the Free Church, by moving, in the Commission of the General Assembly, the suspension of the Strathbogie ministers who had indicated their intention to disobey the Assembly, and obey the Court of Session by ordaining Mr. Edwards as minister of Marnoch. In 1839 he was nominated by the crown professor of biblical criticism in the University of Edinburgh; but, on the angry remonstrance of the Earl of Aberdeen in the House of Lords, the nomination was cancelled. In 1841 he received the degree of D.D. from Princeton College, New Jersey: Select Sermons (posthumous). In all the public proceedings prior to the disruption (1843), and especially in the debates in the General Assembly, where he shone greatly, he took a leading part. After the disruption he exerted himself with great energy in the organization of the Free Church; and, more than any other man, he aided in her rapid development. On the death of Dr. Chalmers he was appointed by the General Assembly to succeed him as professor of divinity in the New College, Edinburgh; but, after accepting the appointment, he withdrew his acceptance, and remained minister of St. George's Free Church. On the death of Dr. Cunningham, he succeeded him as Principal of the New College. He was the chief organizer and extender of the school system of the Free Church, which was afterwards incorporated with the national system of education. For many years he was the most conspicuous man in the General Assembly, of which he was indeed the recognized leader. In every scheme and movement connected with the Free Church, he took a cordial interest, and generally an active share. His eloquence as a debater, his tact as a business-man, his high Christian character, and his thorough disinterestedness, secured for him the high place which he so long maintained, in spite of a somewhat sharp and abrupt manner, and a tendency to what some considered diplomatic management. He was a voluminous author, although his books did not attain a very large circulation. Among his writings were: Contributions towards the Explanation of the Book of Genesis, 3 vols.; On the Atone ment: Scripture Characters and Miscellaneous; Examination of Maurice's Theological Essays; The Resurrection of Life; The Two Great Commandments; The Fatherhood of God (Cunningham Lectures); Exposition of 1 John; The Gospel of Forgiveness, and generally an active share. and Dillingen,— and contributed much to stop the progress of the Reformation. In Austria, where he became court-preacher to Ferdinand I., he labored with still greater success, so that the friends of the Reformaiton in Germany called him the Austrian dog, with reference to his name. Canisius, De Hondt, the hound. His works have partly a more scholarly character, Commentarius against the Centur. Magd.; partly a more practical purpose, Summa Doctrinae et Institutionis Christianae, 1534, and Institutiones Christianae, 1534.

His works have been in wide use, being still reprinted. The modern Protestant theory is derived in part from Fourth Esdras, and is equally fabulous. The modern Protestant theory attributes the Old-Testament canon to Ezra and Nehemiah, the men of the Great Synagogue, or at least to their time.

(a) The Traditional Account of the Rise of the Canon.

The next change in the Canon was the making of a Revised Version. The Revised Version was the first to use the word “canon” as a technical term, meaning a rule or standard. It was first used in the Revised Version of 1555, and was later adopted by other translations.

(b) The Theory of the Synagogue. — The above-mentioned theory has been supposed to be the one prevalent among the Jews themselves; and indeed the eminent rabbis David Kimchi (d. 1240) and Elia Levita (1472-1549) put it forth as a settled fact (see Levita, Massoretic MSS. of the Old Testament, p. 120, ed. Ginsburg, London, 1867).

The only Talmudic passage which can be quoted directly in its behalf is in Baba Bathra; for the other quotations commonly made prove merely the care of Ezra and the men of the Great Synagogue for the law, not for the canon: indeed, mostly for the oral law, and some also for alterations in the text. The passage is in these words: “The order of the prophets is Joshua and Judges, Samuel and Kings, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, Isaiah and the Twelve. Hosea is the first, because it is written, ‘The beginning of the word of Jehovah by Hosea’ (i. 1). Did God, then, speak to Hosea first and have there not been many prophets between him and Moses? R. Jochnan explained this as meaning that Hosea was the first of the four prophets who prophesied at that time, and that Ezekiel began with it, but ends with consolation, while Isaiah is all consolation; hence we connect destruction with destruction, and consolation with consolation. But Job lived in the time of Moses: why should he not come in the first part? No; he was so small that he might then easily have been lost. Since Isaiah lived before Jeremiah and Ezekiel, ought he not to have been put before them? [No.] Because Kings closes with destruction, Jeremiah is entirely occupied with it, Ezekiel begins with it, but ends with consolation, while Isaiah is all consolation; hence we connect destruction with destruction, and consolation with consolation. Yet Ruth contains misfortune. [True; but it issues in joy. That is a support for the saying of Rab; for Rab Jehuda says, in the name of Rab, ‘Ezra did not leave Babylon until he had written his own family register.’ Who has ended it? Nehemiah the son of Hachaliah." It will be perceived that this passage says nothing about the closing of the canon, but also that it would readily furnish ground for the idea that the canon was closed in the time of Ezra and the Great Synagogue.

"(c) Criticism of the Two Theories. — They both agree in assigning the collection of the Old Testament to Ezra and his companions and successors, and also in asserting that the division into the Law, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa, was primitive. But against this, two objections may be urged: (1) Critical investigation assigns the first part of the Book of Daniel, on account of its Greek words, to a time when Greek was understood, and the second part to the time of the Maccabees [so several modern German scholars. But see art. Daniel]; (2) The position of some of the historical books, e.g., Ezra and Daniel, among the Hagiographa, is inexplicable if the canon was made at one time: Erez, Maimonides, D. Kimchi, and Abarbanel explained the fact by a difference in inspiration. But Christ calls Daniel a prophet (Matt. xxv. 15; Mark xii. 14), and quotes him as worthy of all credence.

(3) The Historico-prophetic and distinctively Prophetic Books (the so-called "second canon"). — The last Psalms were written in the time of Nehemiah; but the collection dates from David. The first collection of the Psalter of Solomon was so highly valued, that Herodotus ordered a second to be prepared (Prov. xxv. 1). The name of the wise man sufficed to recommend the Canticles; its age and contents, the Book of Job. Lamentations appealed directly to every patriotic Jew during the exile, and was accepted as sacred, although Jeremiah was not its author. Ruth, by age, and especially by its genealogy of David, was put in the third canon, and formed an introduction to the Psalter. These early writings were followed gradually by the others, probably in this order: Ezra, Chronicles, and Ecclesiastes. Esther (an explanation of Purim, the festival the Persian Jews brought back with them), and finally Daniel, in the time of the Maccabees. After this time, and down to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, A.D. 70, the nation was so affected by Greek customs, and divided by the growing rival parties, the Pharisees and Sadducees, that its religious development was too much hindered for any work to receive universal recognition, and hence canonicity. Not long after the Maccabees, the second collection or canon received its name, the Prophets, descriptive not only of a portion of its contents, but of their authorship; and thus the three divisions of the Old Testament canon — the Law, Prophets, and Hagiographa — dated from the second century B.C. See the Prologue to Ecclesiasticus.

Witnesses for the Second and Third Parts of the Canon. — (For those for the Pentateuch see section (d) 1.) Jesus Sirach shows acquaintance only with the Prophets in the wider sense, the "second canon," chaps. xlv.—lxx., especially lxx. 10. His grandson testifies to the third division also.

Philo had the same canon as ours (see C. Siegfried, Philo, Jens, 1875, p. 101), and quotes from almost all the books; while from the Apocrypha he makes no excerpts or citation, not giving it the honor he accords to Plato, Hippocrates, and several other Greek writers.

Second Maccabees, dating from before 70 A.D., in the spurious section (i. 10—18) contains an account of the recovery of the sacred fire, a quotation from the "second division" of Nehemiah (a lost apocryphal writing); and then follows ii. 13: "And the same things also were reported in the records, namely, the memoirs of Nehemiah [another apocryphal writing], and how he, founding a library, gathered together the books of kings and phantoms, and those of David, and epistles of kings concerning holy gifts." This verse bears reliable witness to Nehemiah's collection of the second canon substantially as we have it to-day, in addition to the Psalms and the documents so weighty for the rebuilt city. The next verse, "And in like manner also Judas gathered together all these books that had been scattered by canon of the war we had, and they are with us," applies only to the third canon. Therefore the last enlargement of the Hebrew canon took place under Judas Maccabee; although probably the most of the books of the third canon had previously been preserved in the temple archives.

The New Testament contains quotations principally from the Pentateuch, Prophets, and Psalms, as might be conjectured from its scope, but recognizes the threefold division of the canon (Luke xxiv. 44). (In this verse "the Psalms" does not stand for the entire Hagiographa; for our Lord meant to emphasize the fact that the Psalms spoke of him.) The absence of quotation in the New Testament of any Old Testament book argues nothing against its canonicity.

Josephus, in his book Against Apion, I. 5, bears testimony to a canonicity by reference to the first, and, as is evident, expresses the national, and not his private opinion. And, further, the books mentioned are not mere literature, but a sacred, divine collection. He enumerates twenty-two books; thus, 1. The five books of the Law; 2. The thirteen Prophets, counting the twelve minor Prophets as one book, and Lamentations with Jeremiah; 3. The four Hagiographa, – Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles. But this arrangement is not to be looked upon as either old or correct.

Supposed Jewish Dissonance from the Canon. – This dissonance is not real, only apparent; but an appeal has been made, first to the Talmudical controversies about certain books, e.g., Esther: on further examination these "controversies" are perceived to be mere intellectual displays; there is no intention of rejecting any book. Second, the Book of Sirach is quoted as Scripture; but there is no proof that it was regarded as Scripture, and the two or three quotations are memoriter, and probably made under a misapprehension of their source. Third, the Septuagint is supposed by some to show that the Alexandrian Jews altered, not only the order and division of the books, but added to them others not in the canon. But how did the Alexandrians arrive at the number twenty-two? By joining Ruth to Judges, and Lamentations to Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra and Nehemiah, Chronicles, in all, twenty-four books].

The Number of the Canonical Books. – Jewish tradition, except when influenced by Alexandria, unanimously gives the number as twenty-four. Nevertheless, it is usual to say that the original reckoning was twenty-two. If, however, the witnesses for the latter number be not counted, but weighed, it is plain that the authority they rest upon is Alexandrian; and this is worthless for getting at the primitive reckoning, because the Alexandrian Jews altered, not only the order and division of the books, but added to them others not in the canon. How did the Alexandrians arrive at the number twenty-two? By joining Ruth to Judges, and Lamentations to Jeremiah. Having thus made twenty-two, they were impressed with its numerical agreement with the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet. This idea was thought significant, part of the divine intention indeed; and so it became fixed in the Jewish mind. The Fathers took it up in their uncritical fashion; and so it has come down to our day. Josephus first gives twenty-two; but he makes greater use of the Septuagint than of the Hebrew original. It is noteworthy that Epiphanius and Jerome, who reckon the books twenty-two, mention also twenty-seven; i.e., the Hebrew twenty-two letters, with the five final letters; made by separating the double books, Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, and Ezra. But this double counting was only possible for Jews using the Septuagint, since the original does not divide these books. Further: neither in the Talmud nor in the Midrash is there the least trace of any acquaintance with the number twenty-two; but, on the contrary, the Alexandrians arrive at the number twenty-four, not because it corresponds with the twenty-four Greek letters, but simply as the natural result of the gradual rise of the canon. In the present
II. THE OLD-TESTAMENT CANON IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. 1. The Patristic and Middle-Age Writers. — No Father has impugned the authority of the Old Testament; but, because of the universal use of the Septuagint, they recognized as Scripture what we regard as Apocrypha. Since the fourth century the Greek Fathers make less and less use of the Apocrypha; while in the Latin Church councilarian action justified and emphasized their use. Jerome alone speaks out decidedly for the Hebrew canon. During the middle age the Apocrypha were not recognized by the majority of the Greeks; while just the opposite was true of the Latins, although not a few followed Jerome. The Book of Esther, because of its curious contents, was sometimes excluded from the Christian Old Testament Canon. Melito of Sardis (about 170 A.D.) omits it from his list (see Eusebius, H. E., IV. 29), although perhaps it has rather dropped out after Esdras (Ezra), inasmuch as in other lists it comes next to this name. It is also omitted by Athanasius (Epistola Festalis, I. 961, ed. Bened.), Gregory of Nazianzum (Carm. XXXIII.), and in the sixth century by Junilius (De Partibus Loja Divinae, I. 3–7). On the other hand, it is included in the canon by Origen, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Epiphanius.

2. The Ancient Oriental Versions. — The old Syrian Church did not receive the Apocrypha. They are not in the Peshito, although found in a later Syriac translation. Aphraem Syrus (d. 373) does not give them canonical authority. Aphraates (fourth century) cites from no apocryphal, but from every canonical book. [Sasse, Prolegomena in Apgaatis Sapienitis Persa Sermones Homileticas (Lips., 1879), p. 40, says Aphraates had knowledge of First and Second Maccabees.] A great difference is perceptible in the Peshito translation between the Chronicles and that of the other books. This has started the query whether the Chronicles were accepted as canonical by the Syrian Church. The Nestorians certainly rejected it. The Ethiopic translation followed Sirach. — At the throughout the Septuagint, and contains, not only the canonical, but also the apocryphal books, except that for First and Second Maccabees it substitutes two books of its own under the same name, and some pseudopigraphs of which the Greek texts do not now exist; for the Ethiopian Church makes even less difference than the Alexandrian between canonical and uncannical books. [See PSEUPOGRAPHIA OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.]

3. The Roman Church is committed to the use of the Apocrypha as Scripture by the decision of the Council of Trent at the fourth session. In order to get a normal text for purposes of quotation, a Bible was published in Rome in 1562 under the orders and care of the Pope. In it Jerome's remark, that the additions to Esther and Daniel which are printed are not in the Hebrew text, is given; and in smaller type the candid announcement is prefixed to the prayer of Manasses and the Third and Fourth Books of Ezra, that while it is true they are not in the Scripture canon of the Council of Trent, they are still included because they are quoted occasionally by certain of the Fathers, and are found both in printed and manuscript copies of the Latin Bible. The decree of the council was not passed without opposition; and later Roman Catholics, such as Du Pin, Dissert. prelim. sur le Bible, Paris, I, 1; B. Lamy, App. Bibl., ed. 2, 1539, 142, and Jahn, Edl. d. göttlich. B. B. d. Alten Bundes, I. 118, 192, 140–143, have endeavored to establish two classes of canonical books, — the proto-canonical and the deuterocanonical, — attributing to the first a dogmatic, and to the second only an ethical authority; but this distinction evidently contravenes the decision of Trent, and has found little support.

4. The Greek Church. The synods of Constantinople (1638), Jassy (1642), and Jerusalem (1672), expressly reject the view of Cyril Lucar, Patriarch of Constantinople, and others, which distinguishes the canonical from the apocryphal. And the last, which is the most important in the modern history of the Eastern Church, defined its position in regard to the Apocrypha in the answer to the third question appended to the Conjunction of Dositheus, in which it expressly mentions Wisdom, Judith, Tobit, History of the Dragon, History of Susannah, the Maccabees (four books of), and Ecclesiasticus, as canonical. But the longer Catechism of the Orthodox Catholic Eastern Church (Moscow, 1859), the most authoritative doctrinal standard of the orthodox Greeko-Russian Church, expressly leaves out the apocryphal books from its list on the ground that "they do not exist in the Hebrew." [See Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, vol. II. p. 451.]

5. The Protestant Church. — The Lutheran symbols do not give any express declaration against the Apocrypha. Nevertheless they are denied dogmatic value. Luther translated them, and recommended them for private reading. With this agrees the decisions of the other Reformed churches: the Gallic Confessions, 1559, §§ 3, 4; Belgic Confession, 1561, §§ 4–5; Thirty-nine Articles of Religion of the Church of England, 1562, § 6. [See Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, vol. III.]

The Book of Common Prayer contains readings from the Apocrypha, and especial recommendation of portions of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus. The Synod of Dort (1618), Gomarus and others raised an animated discussion by demanding the exclusion of the apocryphal Esdras, Tobit, Judith, Bel and the Dragon from the Bible. This the synod refused to do, although speaking strongly against the Apocrypha. Similarly opposed to them was the Westminster Assembly of Divines, 1647, Confession of Faith, c. I. § 3; the Arminians, Confessio... Pastorum, qui... Remonstrantes vocantur, I. 3, 6; the Socinians (Ostorodt, Unterrichtung von den cornehmsten Hauptpunkten der Christlichen Religion, Rakau, 1604) and the Mennonites (Johann Ris, Praezipiurum Christianae Fidei Articulorum Brevis Confessio, c. 29) agree with the other Protestants. For history of the relation of the Bible societies to the Apocrypha, see BIBLE SOCIETIES. For the Apocrypha in general, see APOCRYPHA.

The Apostles would naturally be turned first in proof of the existence of a canon; but while very many of their expressions can be paralleled in the New Testament, and sentences of Jesus are quoted, yet the impression left on the mind is rather that they drew from the fountain-head of tradition, and possessed written Gospels now perished, and other sources of knowledge closed to us, than that they regarded any number of writings as of paramount canonical authority. It is indeed true that it is easier to quote this early patristic support for the Epistles than for the Gospels; for [name of person], writing to the Corinthians (c. 47, cf. 1 Cor. i. 10 sqq.), Ignatius to the Ephesians (c. 12, cf. Eph. vi. 18), and Polycarp to the Philippians (c. 3, cf. Phil. iii. 1), mention the Epistles of Paul to those churches respectively. The quotations from the New Testament are fewer than from the Old Testament; and, while the quotations from the Old Testament are generally introduced by "The Scripture saith," "The Holy Spirit saith," or "The Holy Word speaks," those from the New have, for the most part, no such introduction. We conclude, therefore, that, to the Apostolic Fathers, the New Testament had not attained canonical authority. To this conclusion the testimony of Papias leads us. See Eusebius, H. E., III. 39. Papias wrote five books entitled Interpretations of our Lord's Declarations. In them he recorded not only the oral tradition, but also what he had read. How far his acquaintance with the written Gospels extended is not clearly expressed; but there is explicit information given regarding Matthew and Mark, and his acquaintance with Luke is fairly conjectured from the similarity of his preface (not given below) to that of Luke's. His silence about John proves neither his ignorance of that Gospel nor his disbelief in it. Eusebius also says that Papias "made use of testimonies from the First Epistle of John, and likewise from that of Peter." What Papias says of Mark puts the latter in silent yet evident contrast to the other evangelists, who were both eye and ear witnesses to Christ. We have a right to assert that Papias was acquainted with our four evangelists, and drew from them, and not from apocryphal sources, joined to oral tradition, his knowledge of the gospel.

The next witness is Justin Martyr, whose First Apology (before 160) was quickly followed by the Second, in both of which, as in his Dialogue with Trypho, he frequently speaks of and quotes from the Memoirs of the apostles; thus, Apology I. 66, "The apostles, in the memoirs composed by them, which are called Gospels; Dialogue 103, "The memoirs which were drawn

2 "And John the Prebyster also said this, Mark being the interpreter of Peter, whatsoever he recorded he wrote with great accuracy, but not, however, in the order in which it was spoken or done by our Lord; for he neither heard nor followed our Lord; but, as before said, he was in company with Peter, who gave him such instruction as was necessary, but not to give a history of our Lord's discourses. Wherefore, Mark has not erred in any thing by writing some things as he has recorded them; for he magnificently attests, not to pass by any thing that he heard, or to state anything falsely in these accounts." "Matthew composed his history in the Hebrew dialect, and every one translated it as he was able."
up by his apostles and those who followed them." These "memoirs" are doubtless our present Gospels. The references to Matthew and Luke are easiest recognized. Mark is called the "memoir of Peter" (Dial. 106). That silence of John's Gospel is seen, not so much in quotation as in the style of argumentation and expression. See Luthardt, Der joh. Ursprung, pp. 63 sqq. [Eng. trans., St. John, the Author of the Fourth Gospel, Edin., 1875. See Abbot: The Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, Boston, 1880.] Justin refers to the Apocalypse (Dial. 81) and to the Pauline Epistles as the authoritative writings of Christians (Apol. I. 28), and further, that the "memoirs of the apostles" were read in their weekly meetings with the same frequency and solemnity as the writings of the prophets (I. 67). Thus Justin gives us certain knowledge of a veritable canon of the New Testament. Some of our present Gospels, in this order: Galatians, First and Second Corinthians, Romans, First and Second Thessalonians, Colossians, Ephesians, and Hebrews, were collected as "scripture" (IV. 20, 2), and expressly cites the "memoirs" as "scripture" (IV. 20, 2), and expressly cites the Pastor of Hermas as "scripture" (IV. 20, 2). Clement of Alexandria (d. about 200) grounds his argument for the canon; for he lays great emphasis upon an unwritten saying of Jesus, and the Epistle of Barnabas (Strom. 6). Tertullian is the contemporary witness for Proconsular Africa (See Kösch, Das Neue Testament, Tübingen, 1871). He shows no acquaintance with Second Peter, Second and Third John, ascribes Hebrews to Barnabas (De Pudic. c. 20), and, along with First Peter and Jude, considers it an appendix to the apostolic writings, and, before his conversion to Montanism, quotes as Scripture the Pastor of Hermas (Ib. c. 10). With these six exceptions, he makes copious use of the New Testament.

The Peshito, the Syrian Bible version (see Bible Versions), surely not later than the beginning of the third century, contains the four Gospels, the Acts, Epistles of James, First Peter, First John, and fourteen Pauline Epistles (i.e., it includes Hebrews, whose apostolicity and full canonicity were afterwards denied), but leaves out Second Peter, Second and Third John, Jude, and Revelation. This, then, was at that time the canon of that part of the Church.

The Muratorian Fragment, so called because discovered by Muratori (published 1740) in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, in a manuscript of the eighth or ninth century, originally belonging to the monastery at Bobbio, contains Hebrews, and was long considered lost. It has been repeatedly published and investigated (see Muratorian Fragment, Tregelles, Canon Muratorianus, London, 1888, and Westcott, Canon of the New Testament, London, 1881), and was probably originally written in Latin, is surely of Occidental origin, dating from the last quarter of the second century, but of unknown authorship. The fragmentist draws a sharp line between the Clement of Alexandria and Origen; and Ptolemy cites the fourth Gospel as from John the apostle. Valentinus himself seems to have made a gospel-harmony: and his followers were well acquainted with the Gospel of John (Irenæus, Adv. Hær. III. 11, 7). See Heinrici: Die valentinianische Gnosis u. die heilige Schrift, Berlin, 1871.

Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons (177–202), is the next witness, exhibiting the Gallic view of the canon at the close of the second century. He quotes all the books of the New Testament save Philemon, Second Peter, and Jude. He shows special knowledge of the history of our Gospels, and emphasizes their unity and unshakable position; denies ecclesiastical authority to Hebrews, but looks upon the New Testament as the pillar and ground of the faith (Adv. Hær. III. 11); says that both the Old and New Testaments proceed from the same Spirit (III. 21); but, it should be added, he puts equal stress upon tradition (II. 4, 2), and expressly cites the Pastor of Hermes as "scripture" (IV. 20, 2). fully and the only partially received writings. The list includes the four Gospels, Acts, thirteen Epistles of Paul, First John, Second John, Jude (although, in the judgment of the compiler, the last two Epistles had as little right to their names as Wisdom to that of Solomon), and Revelation of John and that of Peter (not for public reading); excludes Hebrews, James, First and Second Peter, Third John. The compiler also declares that the Pastor of Hermas was for private reading only.

From the preceding statements it follows that, at the close of the second century, our present New Testament was completed, and in parts had received the unanimous indorsement of the Church; but, as there was no agreement as to certain books, there was no canon in a universal sense. Passing over to the third century, the first, and unquestionably the most learned, scholar to be examined is Origen (185–254). See Eusebius, H. E. VI. 25. This testimony is important; for he had the best information, derived from men, books, and travel. At the same time he was well acquainted with the schools of Hilarus and baptism. He leaves out the five Catholic Epistles, but PHILAS TRIUS (d. 387) and RUFINUS (d. 410) insert them. So AMBROSE (d. 379) numbers Hebrews among Paul’s Epistles, and the Apocalypse is universally accepted as apostolic and canonical.

The decisive judgment came from Jerome (d. 420) and Augustine (d. 430). Yet Jerome, while, out of respect to tradition, including in his canon the disputed Epistles, acknowledged that they had been often put aside. Augustine was much more influenced by the voice of tradition. The synods were also in substantial agreement upon the canon. Thus that of Hippo Regius in Numidia (393), while Augustine was a presbyter there, in its thirty-sixth canon gives the list as now received: so Carthage (387 and 419), and so Bishop Gelasius in the decree prepared by a Roman synod (405), which decree fixed the order in which the books of the New Testament at present stand.

By 387 the canon of the New Testament was established; but the canonicity of certain books was still occasionally questioned, nor is there much reason to want individual cases of their rejection. Thus Chrysostom (d. 407) ignores the Epistles of Jude, Second Peter, Second and Third John, and the Apocalypse. But these dissenting voices were few and uninfluential. The middle age came on, and the Catholic Church left off thinking and questioning on the subject. Not until the Council of Trent was the Western Church (not now Catholic, but Roman) called upon to express her mind upon the canon; and, when she did, she re-affirmed the canon of the fourth century, and anathematized all dissent. See Conc. Tril., Sess. IV., April 8, 1546.

The Reformation awoke new interest in the canon. The Reformers expressed themselves very freely upon it. First comes KARLSTADT:

In this section Eusebius hesitatingly pronounces judgment in favor of Hebrews, which he reckons among Paul’s Epistles (cf. H. E. III. 3) and Revelation.

By the close of the fourth century the doubts which had rested upon certain books of the New Testament have vanished. ATHANASIUS of Alexandria, who first uses “canon” in our sense (d. 373), Cyril of Jerusalem (d. 386), Gregory of Nazianzum (d. 390), and Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis (d. 403), have left catalogues of the New Testament, which agree in granting to the disputed Catholic Epistles an equal place with the undisputed; noticeable is also the unquestioning reception of Hebrews. The sixtieth canon of the Council of Laodicea (360) gives the list of the present New Testament (but no apocryphal books), with the exception of Revelation, and thus voices the decision of the Eastern Church of the fourth century in regard to the New Testament canon.

The Western Church also at this time had settled upon a canon. There is little difference between the lists; and what one omits another restores. Thus Hilary leaves out the five Catholic Epistles, but Philip trius (d. 358) and Rufinus (d. 410) insert them. So Ambrose (d. 379) numbers Hebrews among Paul’s Epistles, and the Apocalypse is universally accepted as apostolic and canonical.

See Conc. Tril., Sess. IV., April 8, 1546.

The Reformation awoke new interest in the canon. The Reformers expressed themselves very freely upon it. First comes KARLSTADT:
De Canonis Scripturis; and the same year and place, in German, in condensed form, Welche Bücher bibisch sind, Wittemberg, 1520. He divided the New Testament into three parts: I. The Law, the Gospels, and Acts: II. (of secondary dignity) The Prophets, thirteen Epistles of Paul, First John, and First Peter; III. (of lowest dignity) The remainder of the canon. But this purely subjective arrangement, which showed neither dogmatic nor critical principles, was of no influence. Its historical cause was the fear lest Luther should actually destroy the traditional canon by his free handling and criticism, especially in regard to Hebrews, James, Jude, and the Apocalypse. Luther attributed Hebrews to Apollos; said that James was quite beneath apostolic dignity in its style, and legal in its spirit, "an epistle of straw"; pronounced Jude "an unnecessary epistle;" while as for the Apocalypse, he considered it neither apostolic, nor prophetic, nor inspired, of no more value than Second Esdras, particularly because it presented pictures of the end of the age was not bound to respect the limits of the original collection. See Semler, Accommodatio. He anticipated the Tubingen school in the assertion that the Catholic epistles were reconciliatory documents. The founder of this school was Ferdinand Christian Baur (d. 1860). They almost give up the idea of a canon; nor does the question of canonicity enter into discussion in their later New-Testament criticism. See Tübingen School. Their opponents were wise to have abandoned the discussion, although, as Schleiermacher has said, "The Protestant Church must strive after a more definite determination of the canon; and this is the highest exegetico-theological task for the higher criticism." of Antioch (352). Thus it seems quite probable that this Greek collection contained the canons of several councils numbered in continuous succession, beginning with the Council of Nicea, and ending with that of Antioch. There were other Greek collections of canons. See Petr. et Hieron. Ballerini, De Antiquis, tum editis tum ineditis, Collectionibus et Collectioribus Canonum, in Oper. Leonis Magni, Venice, 1575, Tom. III.

But it is a mistake to ascribe an official character recognized by the whole Church, either to that Codex Can anonum used at the Council of Chalcedon or to any other collection; and the so-called Codex Canonum Ecclesiae Universae, which Christoph Justeau published in Paris, 1610, is nothing but a miscarried attempt at fabrication: both the title and the arrangement are the editor's own work.

Of the decrees of the Greek councils, only those of the Council of Nicea were immediately accepted by the Western Church (Innoc. I. Epp. ad Theophil. Alex. ad Cler. et Popul. Conat., in Schonemann: Pontif. Roman. Epistolae Genuinae, Gottingen, 1769, pp. 539, 549), and also those of the Council of Sardica and the acts of the synod of the Council of Chalcedon from another, and finally, the Council of Sardica and the acts of the synod of Sardica and the acts of the synod of Carthage (419). Beside this work, Dionysius, in the original Latin text, twenty-one canons from the Council of Nicaea, Ancyra (Ancyrani), Neo-Caesarea, Gan gra, Antiochia, Laodicea, and Constantinople, published first by Paschasius Quesnell, in Opera Leonis Magni, Venice, 1757, Tom. III. 141.

The two most noticeable among the other African collections are the Breviario Canonum, made in 546 by Fulgentius Ferrandus, deacon of the Church of Carthage, containing an extract of the Greek canon after the Isidorian translation, and the decrees of the African councils up to 528, and published, first by Pithou, Paris, 1588, and then in Biblio. Jur. Can., Tom. I. p. 448, and in Migne, Patrologia, Tom. 67, p. 135.

The African Church based its discipline principally upon the decrees of its own councils. Especially the synod of Carthage (419) was in this respect of great importance, as it incorporated with its own decrees those of the synods held under Aurelius of Carthage since 383. This collection of African canons Dionysius merged into his compilation, though in an incomplete and abbreviated shape; and the Dionysian text was afterwards translated into Greek, and combined with various Greek collections. Justeau published in 1615, in Paris, both the Latin and the Greek texts, under the arbitrary title, Codex Canonum Ecclesiae Africanae; and they have been reprinted in Biblio. Jur. Canon., Tom. I. p. 305, and in Biblio. Ecclesiast., Berlin, 1839, vol. I. p. 155.

Collections of decrees of councils and of papal decretals existed in Spain in the sixth century, as appears from the acts of the synod of Braga (563); and the overthrow of Arianism, and the restoration of the Catholic Church, made a complete and systematic arrangement of all canonical matter very desirable. Shortly after the fourth council of Toledo (663), such a collection was actually made. In the form in which we now know this collection, as published at Madrid (1808), it belongs to the eighth century; but it is quite possible to form an idea of the original collection. As the text contains much more than is indicated by the indices, it seems legitimate to infer that the indices were made to the original collection, and the office of the scribe being taken of the later additions to the text. The collection consists of two parts. Part first contains the decrees of the councils: Concilia

Innocent I., Zosimus, Boniface I., Celestinius I., Leo I., Gelasius I., and Anastasius II., on the instance of the presbyter Julian, and during the reign of Symmachus (498–514). These two works of Dionysius were afterwards united into one collection, which soon gained the precedence of all other collections, was frequently quoted by the popes, and was, according to the testimony of Cassiodorus (De Inst. Divin. c. 28), in general use throughout the Western Church in the middle of the sixth century. In the time of Charlemagne it even obtained the rank of an official Codex Canonum. Augmented with the decretals of Hilarius, Simplicius, Felix, Symmachius, Hormida, and Gregory II., it was presented in 774 by Pope Adrian to Charlemagne, and at the diet of Aix-la-Chapelle (802), it was formally recognized by the Frankish Church as Codex Canonum. This Codex Dionysio-Hilarianus was first edited by Wendelstein, Mayence, 1525, and then by Pithou, Paris, 1609; and it is found in Biblio. Jur. Canon., Tom. I., and in Migne, Patrologia, Tom. 67, p. 135.
G massacurum, after the above-mentioned so-called Spanish or Isidorian translation; Africa Concilia; Concilia Galliae (16); and Concilia Hispaniae (36).

Part second contains the papal decretals from Damascus to Gregory I. (604). The author of this collection is unknown. None of the existing manuscripts contain anything to put the collection in connection with Isidore of Seville. He is first mentioned as its author by the author of the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals; which article see.

The old British, the Scotch, and the Irish churches developed their constitution and discipline independently through their own synods; but very few of the canons of those synods have come down to us. Some canonical collections from the fifth and sixth centuries are simply penitentials. In the Anglo-Saxon Church, too, the disposition of canons. The De Jure Sacerdotali and i.

churches developed their constitution and discipline; which article see. The Pseudo-Isidorian decretals; which article see.

Ecclesienses are of Frankish origin. See Wasserschleben; Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche, Halle, 1851. But there exists an Irish collection of canons, published at Giessen, 1874, containing three hundred and eighty-one capitula, which during the Carolingian period the secular power exercised on the Church, even on its discipline, added still more new materials to the body of the canonical law; and systematical compilations also of these new elements, the capitularies of the Frankish kings, were made, for instance, by Ansegis, Benedictus Levita, etc.

After the ninth century this labor of systematization became of still greater importance; and attempts were made, on a steadily-increasing scale, almost in every country, until, in the middle of the twelfth century, the whole development reached its consummation in the Decretum Gratiani. Among the principal works of the kind may be mentioned Libri Duo de Cause Synodalibus et Disciplinis Ecclesiasticis by Abbot Regino of Prum (d. 913), written on the instance of Archbishop Rathbod of Treves as a manual for the bishops. A second collection of canons, that of the papal decretals from 1012 and 1023, and published in Migne, Patrologia, Tom. 140, p. 537 sqq.; a collection of canons by Cardinal Deusdedit, dedicated to Victor III. (1086–87), and published by Martinuci, Venice, 1869; the Decretum in seventeen books, and the Pannomonia in eight books, by Bishop Ivo of Chartres (d. 1117), both found among his works in Migne, Patrologia Tom. 161; besides a number not yet printed. But all these attempts were completely superseded by the Discorsantium Canonum Concordis, or Liber Decretorum, or simply Decretum Gratiani, consisting of three parts, of which the first is divided into one hundred and one distinctiones, each distinction comprising a number of canones; the second into thirty-six causa, each causa comprising a number of questions and answers, and the third into five distinctiones. The division of the first and third parts into distinctiones is the work of Paucopala; while that of the second part into causa proceeded from Gratian himself. The work, however, is not simply a systematical arrangement of the materials, but also, to a certain extent, a treatment of the subject. Besides the text of the canones, it also contains short explanations, Dicta Gratiani, in which the author endeavors to explain away the contradictions between the canones. To this feature the work owed a great deal of its success. Written at Bologna, and written at a time when Bologna was the centre of all juridical study, it was planned and executed in accordance with the method then prevailing in the juridical lecture-room, rather than with a view to special practical purposes. It was immediately made the subject of study. Gratian himself lectured upon it in the same manner as the glossatores on the Corpus Juris Civilian; and through the school it conquered and ruled the world, though it was never formally confirmed by the popes, or accepted by the Church as authoritative.

The Decretum Gratiani appeared in the period when the papal power stood at its highest, and developed its greatest legislative activity. Hence the natural consequence, that, though the work at its first appearance was justly considered as the Corpus Juris Canonici, only a few years elapsed before it became incomplete, or even antiquated.
Supplements were necessary; and no less than five were thought to have been selected in honor of the Holy Trinity." Other reasons were given: thus Cyprian says, "The Holy Ghost descended on the disciples on the third hour" (terce); and, for sext, St. Peter, "at the sixth hour went up to the house-top; again, "The soul was crucified at the sixth hour." For vespers, he says, "When at the departure of the sun . . . we pray . . . we are praying for the coming of Christ, who will give the grace of everlasting light." For compline, the manifest propriety of prayer before resigning one's self to the "elder brother of death" would be a sufficient reason. "Nocturna" originated in the pious custom of prayer when one awoke in the night." Matins, or lauds, were later united with nocturna. The services used at the canonical hours are manifestly appropriate only to monasteries, although all Christians might with advantage observe these set times of prayer.

In England the hours from eight to twelve in the forenoon are also called "Canonical Hours," before or after which marriages cannot legally be solemnized in any parish church without a license. See the exhaustive article by Mr. Scudamore, "Hours of Prayer," in Smith and Cheetham's Dict. Christ. Antiq., vol. i. pp. 792–799.

CANONIZATION.

CANTERBURY.

The Anglo-Saxon Cantewerburg, the Roman Duraverenum, became the metropolitan see of the English Church, when Augustine and his fellow-missionaries were settled there in 597. King Ethelbert, who gave them an old Roman church and his own palace, the church was entirely rebuilt by Lanfranc (1070), much enlarged by Anselm, and again enlarged by its restoration after the fire in 1172. The nave was rebuilt in the course of the fifteenth century, and the central tower was not finished until 1568.

The building is five hundred and forty-five feet long, and a hundred and fifty-six feet broad at the eastern transept, and is one of the largest and most magnificent cathedrals in England. Its brightest days it saw in the century following after the murder of Thomas Becket (1170), whose shrine, placed in a special chapel, was immensely wealthy, and attracted thousands of pilgrims every year, not only from England, but also from the Continent, until the commissioners of Henry VIII. destroyed the shrine, and cleared the chapel (1538).

Our word "canter" is a contraction of "Canterbury gallop," and therefore a reminder of the Canterbury pilgrimages, and the easy pace at which they were performed; for they were quite as much excursions as religious exercises. Chaucer (1385–1400), in his Canterbury Tales, has given us an admirable picture of such pilgrimages, with the manners and behavior of a party of pilgrims, leisurely enjoying the journey, and telling stories to each other on the road.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, who is the primate of all England and metropolitan, does not live in Canterbury, but in Lambeth Palace, London. The cathedral staff consists of a dean, six canons, twenty-four honorary canons, an auditor, six preachers, four minor canons, and subordinate officers. The crypt of the cathedral is a church for the religious studies and philanthropical undertakings. The church of St. Ethelbert is a church for French Protestant refugees, and still used by the small French congregation. The ecclesiastical remains in the town are very interesting, including those of the first friary of the Dominicans in England, and of the church in which Ethelbert was baptized. CANTICLES, or SONG OF SOLOMON, called in Hebrew, שמעון רוח, Song of Songs; i.e., the most beautiful of songs: so in Greek, Ἀνάγνωση, and Latin, Canticums Cantorum. The book is plainly a love-song; and the difficulty of its interpretation arises from its unique position in Hebrew literature: we have no other examples with which to compare it. But is the love immortalized merely carnal, or is it spiritual? Does the poem find its end in the earthly, or is it rather an allegory, setting forth the heavenly in the garb of the earthly? It is the task of the critic to explain first all of the peculiar phraseology, and then decide whether it compels or can bear a deeper meaning.

The poem is a unit. The persons throughout are King Solomon, his rustic Beloved, and the Daughters of Jerusalem. The same phrases repeatedly recur, cf. ii. 7, iii. 5, v. 8, viii. 4; iii. 6, v. 10; v. 1, vi. 9, 10, v. 8. Many parts are manifest parallels; e.g., ii. 8 sqq., iii. 1 sqq., and v. 2 sqq. Canticles is a lyrical drama, yet not intended for presentation on a stage so much as for recitation: Ps. ii. and xxiv. are examples of similar use of dialogue in poetry. According to the traditional view, Solomon celebrates his marriage with the Shulamite; while, according to the modern and now prevalent view (the Shepherd Theory), he celebrates rather the constancy of the country maiden, who, unmoved by the blandishments of the great king, persists in her love for an humble shepherd, until the king gives his consent to the match, and retires from the field. These two interpretations of course lead to wholly different allotments of the speeches.

(1) The Shepherd Theory quotes weighty names in its defence. It is the theory of Ewald, who thus analyzes the Song: Solomon and his suite once found in a "garden of nuts" (vi. 11) near the village of Shulem (or Shunem) a most charming and modest girl, whom Solomon attempted to get for his harem, notwithstanding the rough treatment she had received, and her lowly station and kept of a virgin (i. 6). These two play together the first scene, wherein it appears that she is in love with a shepherd (i. 7), and will not yield to Solomon's wishes. So the dramatic poem goes on. When Solomon praises her, she responds by praising her beloved swain: she longs for him by day, she seeks him in her dreams at night. The culmination of the action is in Solomon's final efforts to win her favor. He offers to her his throne: as queen he will lead her to his capital, but in vain. He tries upon her the magic of his speech (vi. 4 sqq.); but the simple-minded girl is overcome of homesickness, and the embraces of her lover are dearer to her than those of the king. Solomon, finding persuasion useless, magnanimously gives her up; and in the last act we see her walking with her lover upon their native hills. Joy has come to her at last. She has achieved her reward.

It must be confessed that the above scheme is attractive and plausible; but a careful examination of the Song shows that it is without foundation. Against it decidedly is the passage iii. 6–v. 1 inclusive,—a description of a royal marriage which is happily terminated. Where, then, is the maiden's constancy? In order to carry out his scheme, Ewald was obliged to interpolate two lines between vers. 7 and 8 of chap. iv., —"Look, my love, look! There he comes! Listen while he speaks to me,"—because there is no indication in the text of any change of speakers. It is also ridiculous to make Solomon step aside while the lovers meet. Again, viii. 11, 12, is plainly a speech of the Shulamite to Solomon. Besides, why may not Solomon be supposed to be the shepherd of the poem? Delitzsch has explained vi. 2 and elsewhere by saying, "The country-life of the maiden, and the delight of Solomon in nature, express themselves in these words, and prove by their spiritual beauty that the romantic girl saw in the lover a plain shepherd, not a king, and as such loved him, and pictured herself as sharing the garland from the court ladies. The king is also a plainshepherd, not a king, and as such she fancies the king humored her." It is noteworthy that the poem contains no word of complaint, but that Solomon's tender tones are echoed by the Shulamite—facts which are against the Shepherd Theory.

(2) The Traditional Theory. The poem consists of confessions of reciprocal love between Solomon and the Shulamite. We divide it into five acts: I. The first meeting of the lovers (i. 2–ii. 7); II. Their reciprocal longing and searching (ii. 8–iii. 5); III. The marriage in the capital (iii. 6–v. 1); IV. New seekings and findings of the lovers (v. 2–viii. 4); V. Sealing of the bond, and its meaning (viii. 5–14). The scene of the first act (i. 2–ii. 7) is a country-seat of the king's, near the home of the fair Shulamite. The pair meet; and the maiden is at sight so enamoured of Solomon, that she permits herself to be led to his garden-house, where she receives a garland from the court ladies. The king is also at once smitten, and the pair express their mutual regard. In the second act (ii. 8–iii. 5) the lover seeks his love, and finds her at home. She seeks him at night upon the streets of the city, and, finding him, expresses delight with the same words used in the first act. The latter scene is manifestly not adapted to representation. In the third act (iii. 6–v. 1) the wedding march and songs are heard. The fourth act (v. 2–viii. 4) concerns incidents of the wedding festivities. In the closing scene one, "the brothers of the bride appears, and invites her to go home with him. In the fifth act (viii. 5–14) this request is granted: Solomon and the Shulamite revisit the scene of their first meeting. Her brothers are suitably rewarded for their care of their sister. With Solomon's request of the bride to sing, and her counter-request that he should show his agility, the joyous, lively Song closes.

The book is a story of conjugal love, of its auxiliaries and rewards, and as such it deserved a place in the canon. Because of its simplicity and mystery, writers in other parts of the Bible use it as an image of the holiest desires. And the poem owed its canonical position likewise to the peculiar dignity of the king of whom it spoke; for Solomon was for his time, as David had been for his, the anointed of the Lord, the Messiah, the vicegerent of the unseen King (Ps. ii. 7, xlv. 7 sq., cx. 1). When, therefore, the king, seeking a purer, holier love than he found in his harem, condescended to raise a simple maiden of the people to a place by his side, because she realized to him the very love he sought, what was this but a picture of the Messianic marriage of which Ps. xiv. sings,—a culmination-point of the visible kingdom of God, at that time thought to be on earth? According to this hypothesis, there is no difficulty about the Solomonic origin of the poem, nor about its representation of literal facts. Yet it may be of different authorship and occasion, as the peculiarity of a few words may indicate. (The Shepherd Theory renders a Solomonic origin improbable.) The majority of the recent critics assign it to a time shortly after the disruption (930-946 B.C.), and maintain it was a popular protest against the luxury of the court of the Northern Kingdom.

In later Hebrew literature there are numerous references to it (cf. Cant. iv. 12, 15, and Prov. v. 15 sqq.; v. 6, Prov. i. 28; vi. 9, Prov. xxxi. 28; vii. 10, Prov. xxiii. 31; vii. 7, Prov. vii. 30). Questionable is the use in Jeremiah (xxii. 24), in Haggai (ii. 13; cf. Cant. viii. 6), and the references in Isaiah (v. 1); but Hosea appears to have known Canticles, and borrowed much from it. That references to it are not common in the prophetic writings is proof that it was not a people's book, but rather artistic and esoteric. It was, however, admitted into the canon, and declared by Rabbi Akiba to be so valuable, that the whole world was not worth as much as the day on which it was given to Israel. Yet a mystery was made of it: no one under thirty years old was allowed to read it (thus putting it in the same category as the breath of love). So the Protestant interpreters saw in its nuptialsong for Solomon and the daughter of Pharaoh; so others, erotically. Herodotus, in his SHAPE OF THE SONG. Dr. Green, in his translation of Zöckler's Commentary on the Song of Solomon, in the American edition of Lange's Commentary (pp. 43–47), has attempted to express the last view of the Song. CAPERNAUM (the village of Nahum, not to be connected with the prophet) is not mentioned outside of the New Testament, perhaps was not built till after the exile, but is called Christ's "own city" (Matt. ix. 1), and was the scene of many of his mighty acts. See Matt. viii. 5–14; ix. 2; xxvii. 21; John vi. 17–39; ix. 46, etc. It is plain from the Gospel that it was, (1) in Galilee (Luke iv. 31); (2) on the lake (Matt. xiv. 13; John vi. 17–24); (3) the seat of a collector and of a garrison (Matt. vii. 5), perhaps of a custom-house (Matt. xvi. 24; Mark ii. 1, 11; Luke v. 27, cf. Matt. ix. 1, 9); (4) noted for its synagogue built by a Roman centurion (Luke vii. 1, 5); (5) joined with Chorazin and Bethsaida in the denunciations of Jesus, and its destruction predicted (Matt. xii. 20–23; Luke x. 13–15). It has been inferred that it was in the land of Gennesaret; but this is not certain (cf. Matt. xiv. 54; John vi. 16, 18–24, 25).

The indications are, that the city was on the west side of the lake, and near its northern end. Constantine built there a church upon the site of Peter's house. We find references to the place in the thirteenth century, but to-day its very site is in dispute. The expression, "On the borders of Zebulun and Naphtali" (Matt. iv. 13), does not help us any, because it is uncertain where these borders were. Two places, only about three miles apart, lay claim to be Capernaum. — Khan Minyeh, on the northern end of the plain of Gennesaret; and Tell Hum, a ruin near the lake, about two miles south-west of where the River Jordan enters the lake, — and therefore more likely to get trade. To reach Tell Hum one must pass by Tell Hum in Christ's day is very doubtful. Khan Minyeh is surely much more accessible, and therefore more likely to get trade. To reach Tell Hum one must follow a narrow path (anciently a conduit) cut in the rock at some height above the lake. 2. When it is said (Mark vi. 33, 33; cf. Matt. xiv. 13; Luke ix. 10) that the people walked around the head of the lake while Jesus went across and landed, yet they arrived at Capernaum, or Kepharnome, which apparently was the nearest; i.e., Tell Hum. But, as Josephus does not say that Capernaum was the nearest village, it might just as well have been a little farther off; and the passage is not conclusive. In the only other passage in which Josephus mentions Capernaum (War, III. 10, 8), it is not the name of a place, but of a "most fertile fountain" by which Gennesaret was watered. This is probably the 'Ain et Tabighah, the fountain from which, by means of an aqueduct along the seashore, the water was carried to the northern part of the plain. It is only about two miles from Tell Hum, and a mile from Khan Minyeh: by the latter place itself flows 'Ain et Tin ("the Fountain of the Fig-tree"), which, however, falls into the sea a few hundred steps off; southward is the Round Fountain, 'Ain Mudevarah, in which, as in Josephus' Kapharnama (c. 530), that Capernaum was twice as far from Magdala as the latter from Tiberials, and that of Arculfus (c. 670), that he had seen Capernaum lying by the sea from east to west, between the sea on the south, and the mountain on the north, agree best with Tell Hum, which lies upon a point of the shore projecting into the lake. But later tradition is of small account either way.

5. Robinson interprets Tell Hum "hill of the camel-herd," which is very questionable. But to compare Hum with Nahum [the mound or ruin of Nahum] is equally false.

The statement of Theodorus (c. 530), that Capernaum was twice as far from Tell Hum one must therefore, by Robinson (1852), Macgregor (1864), Sepp (1867), Porter (1875), Kiepert, and by Lieut. Kitchener, under the present surface of the ground. This review of the arguments shows that there is much to be said on both sides. The claims of Khan Minyeh are supported by Robinson (1852), Megregor (1864), Sepp (1867), Porter (1875), Kiepert, and by Lieut. Kitchener and Selah Merrill (1877), representatives respectively of the British and American Exploration Societies; while those of Tell Hum are maintained by Dr. John Wilson (1841), Dr. W. M. Thomson (1859), and E. Dean Stanley (1871), Capt. (now Lieutenant-Colonel) Wilson (1871), Ritter, Delitzsch, Socin, in Baeckeler's Syriah and Palestine, Schaff, and CAPHTOR.

CAPHTOR, the original home of the Caphtorim, or Philistines (Deut. ii. 23; Jer. xlvii. 4; Amos ix. 7), either an island, as Jeremiah calls it, or a coast country. Various identifications have been proposed. 1. Cappadocia, favored by the old versions because of similarity of sound; but Cappadocia was originally Catpatuk, and so the similarity vanishes. 2. Cyprus, but in the Old Testament the island is called Chittim. 3. Crete; the generally received identification, supported by Amos ix. 7; the Philistines are said to have been brought from Caphtor as the Israelites from Egypt; but the Philistines are called Cherethites, cf. 1 Sam. xxx. 14, 16; Ezek. xxv. 16; Zeph. ii. 5; but the latter are Cretans, as the Septuagint calls them. The objection that Gen. x. 13, 14 (cf. 1 Chron. i. 12) makes the Caphtorim to come from the Egyptians is thus explained: the Casluhim were the inhabitants of Cassiotes; colonists from Crete or Caphtorim settled there, were counted Egyptians, and then went to Palestine, where they were joined by their countrymen direct from Crete. 4. The Phoenician colony on the coasts of the Nile delta, because Egypt, Ai-guptos = Aiaergus = Ai Kaphtor (Heb.) = Great Phoenicia. But these etymologies are not undoubted. It is improbable that at the earliest times a tribe moved from an island to the mainland: hence these "island" identifications are unlikely, while the last is likely. See J. G. Müller: Die Semiten, Gotha, 1872; Stark: Gaza. Ruetsch.

CAPITANUS (Giovanni di Capistrano), b. at Capistrano in the Abruzzi, June 23, 1381; d. at Villach, Carinthia, Oct. 23, 1456; studied law, and entered the service of the King of Sicily, but gave up this career in 1415, and became a monk. He was one of the greatest preachers of that time, and distinguished himself by the zeal and the success with which he worked against the Fraticelli. In 1450 he was sent to Germany to counteract the Hussites. In this mission he partially failed; but, after the fall of Constantinople, he succeeded in rousing once more the crusading enthusiasm of the people. He led personally an army of crusaders to the support of Johannes Corvinus, and he contributed much to the signal defeat of the Turks at Belgrade.

CAPITO, Wolfgang, b. at Hagenau, Alsace, 1478; d. at Strassburg, 1541; studied at Freiburg, first medicine, then law, and finally theology; became preacher at Bruchsal, 1511, and at Basel, 1513; removed in 1519 to Mayence, where he lived in great intimacy with the archbishop, Albrecht; but, carried away by the Reformation, he left Mayence in 1523, and settled at Strassburg, where he became one of the most prominent leaders of the reformatory movement. He is the real author of the Confessio Tetrapolitana. At the synod of Bern, 1532, he played a conspicuous part; and his moderating and conciliatory influence was also felt in the Peasant War and the Anabaptist disturbances. A list of his writings is found in Baum: Capito und Butzer, Strassburg, 1860.

CAPITULARIES. The various nations of which the Frankish Empire was composed had each its own law, according to which the people lived, also when it left its native territory. But, besides these national laws, there was also a general imperial law, valid not only for the individual, but also for the territory. In the Merovingian time the names of decretum, decretio, constitutum, editum, auctoritas, pactio, were given to such general imperial prescriptions; but during the Carolingian time capitularies — from capitula, because the edict was divided into chapters — came into general use, and it has afterwards been extended also to laws of an earlier date. The language was Latin, but the text was accompanied with translations for the provinces. As the Frankish kings exercised a legislative authority also in the affairs of the Church, many capitularies have a direct ecclesiastical bearing; and special collections of ecclesiastical capitularies were made in Jerusalem on an early date, for instance, by Ansegius, 827. Of the original copies of the capitularies, only a few fragments are still extant; but from the archives of monasteries and chapters the text of a great number of capitularies is well ascertained. The best edition of them is found in vol. III. and IV. of Pertz: Mon. Hist. Germ., Hanover, 1832-37. See Strobe: Geschichte der deutschen Rechtsquellen, Part I., p. 239, where older editions are noticed; A. Borettius: Die Kapitularien im Langobardenreiche, 1862, and Beiträge zur Kapitularientrik; 1874; G. Beseler: Über die Gesetzskraft der Kapitularien 1871. Meier.

CAPPADO'CIA, the largest and most easterly province of Asia Minor. On the north was Pontus; on the east, the Euphrates, beyond which were Armenia and Mesopotamia; on the south, Syria and Cilicia; and on the west, Galatia. It was high table-land, intersected by ranges of mountains sparsely wooded, but fitted for grain or grazing. It was conquered by Cyrus, ruled by Alexander the Great. Made a tributary by the Seleucids, it became a Roman province A.D. 17.

CAPP.EL, Jacques (Jacobus Cappellus), b. at Rennes, 1570; d. at Sedan, 1624; descended from a family which has given to France many excellent men, and was educated in the Reformed Church. In 1598 he became professor of Hebrew at Sedan, and in 1610 professor of theology. A list of his numerous works is given as an appendix to the sketch, De Cappellorum Gente, which is printed as an introductory to Ludovici Cappelli Commentarii et Notae Criticae in Vetus Testamentum, Amsterdam, 1689; and his Observationes in Selecta Pentateuchi Loca, in Genesis, Judices, etc., are contained in the same volume. His Historia Sacra appeared at Sedan, 1612. Many of his works are not printed.

CAPP.EL, Louis (Ludovicus Cappellus), a younger brother of the preceding; b. at St. Élier, a village near Sedan, Oct. 10 or 16, 1538; d. at Saumur, June 18, 1638; studied theology at Sedan, and acted for some time as tutor to the daughters of the Duke of Bouillon; received a stipend from the Reformed Church of Bourdeaux, and travelled for four years in England, Holland, Germany, and Switzerland; was appointed professor of Hebrew in the Academy of Saumur in 1613, and professor of theology in 1633. He was a man of vast learning; but the subject on which he specially concentrated his energy was the history of the text of the Old Testament, on which he wrote Arcaenum Punctationis Rereditatum, Amsterdam, 1624; Critica Sacra, Paris, 1650; and Distripta de Veris et Antiquis Hebræorum Literis, Amsterdam, 1645. By these works, advocating the comparatively recent introduction of the vowel-points in Hebrew writing, he seemed to shake the authority of the Scriptures as the inspired regula et normum fidei, and they met with great opposition in the Protestant world. The first was vehemently attacked by Buxtorf, which attack called forth the Vindicia Arcani Punctationis, Amsterdam, 1652. But among them were Daniel and his companions, and Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, began his depredations (B.C. 605). At first he carried away only a few; but among them were Daniel and his companions (xxiv. 1; Dan. i. 1–4). In B.C. 588 he came again, and took away ten thousand (2 Kings xxiv. 13–16). His next attempt upon the city occurred a few years later. He sent an army against Jerusalem, and seneed upon the very eve of success, when God slew one hundred and eighty thousand of his army, and thus prevented any attack (xvii. 17, xix. 35). One hundred years of comparative quiet passed; and then Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, began his depredations (B.C. 605). At first he carried away only a few; but among them were Daniel and his companions (xxiv. 1; Dan. i. 1–4). In B.C. 588 he came again, and took away ten thousand (2 Kings xxiv. 10–16). The seventy-years' captivity, in the ecclesiastical sense, began in B.C. 588, when, for the fourth time, Nebuchadnezzar invaded Judea, and took Jerusalem after a siege of eighteen months, whose horrors are graphically depicted in Jeremiah's Lamentations. The King, Zedekiah, and his people, were transported to Babylon, the city was burnt, and the walls broken down (xxv. 1–21). The "seventy-years' captivity," in the civil sense, came to an end when Cyrus allowed the Jews to return (B.C. 530); in an ecclesiastical sense, not until the temple was rebuilt (B.C. 517). The first company went under Zerubbabel (Ez. ii. 2); a second under Ezra (B.C. 458); and a third, under Nehemiah (B.C. 445). Those who remained in Assyria, or who were afterwards scattered over the Roman Empire, were known as the Dispersion (John vii. 35; 1 Pet. i. 1; Jas. i. 1). They were the soil for the gospel seed. See Dispersi.
CAPUCHINS.

(Medo-Persian) was from Darius the Mede to Darius Codonanus (B.C. 590–532); the Grecian, from the expiration of Alexander the Great into Jerusalem to the insurrection of the Hebrews under the Maccabees (B.C. 332–167); and the Roman, from B.C. 63. From A.D. 7 to 68 there were thirteen Roman procurators in Judea. In A.D. 70 the Jews lost every thing: their temple was destroyed; and they were driven from their land. In a sense they are still in their Roman captivity.

CAPUCHINS. A Minorite of the Observantine Convent of Montefalconi, Matteo di Basio, heard, of a brother-monk, that the capuchin (hood) which
St. Francis had used was of quite a different shape from that which afterwards his followers, the Franciscan monks, adopted. He was much struck by this discovery, left his monastery immediately, appeared in Rome before Pope Clement VII., and obtained (in 1529) permission of him to put on a long beard, to wear a pyramidal capuche, to live as a hermit, and to preach wherever he liked, on the condition that he should report once every year at the provincial chapter of the Observants. But enthusiasm is contagious. Shortly after, another Observantine monk, Ludovico di Frossono, came, enounced with the genuine capuche, the long beard, and the literal observation of the rules of St. Francis; and, together with his brother Raffaello, he repaired to Rome, where he received by a brave the same permission as Matteo had received orally. The three enthusiasts now joined fortunes, and found protection against the Observants with the Duke of Came-rono. In 1529 they had left the Observants, and joined the Capuchines. According to other accounts, the ultimate object of these peacemakers was nothing so innocent as peace. At all events, Bishop Hugo of Auxerre marched against them with troops, took them all prisoners, and condemned them to go under the cross of the Observants, and ful of palpable lies. Reliable information is found in HELYOT: Histoire des Ordres Monas-Min., Lyons, 1625.

CAPUTIATI (capuched), thus called from the
hood of their cowl; appeared first in Auvergne
(1182), under the leadership of the carpenter
Durand, who boasted to have received revelations
from the Virgin for the purpose of establishing peace in the Church, and destroying all her enemies. According to other accounts, the ultimate object of these peacemakers was nothing so innocent as peace. At all events, Bishop Hugo of Auxerre marched against them with troops, took
them all prisoners, and condemned them to go
about a whole year bareheaded, in frost and heat.
by cutting the capuche of their cowl.

CARACCIOLE, Calebazzo (Marchese di Vio),
b. at Naples, in 1417; d. at Geneva, May 7, 1586:
descended from one of the wealthiest and most distinguished families of the kingdom of Naples;
and entered early on a brilliant career at the Neapolitan court. The reformatory movement, which in this period sprang up almost everywhere in the Roman Church, and which in Nepal, under the leadership of the Spaniard Juan de Valdés, early attracted his attention and sympathy, and his acquaintance with Pietro Martino Vermiglioni, carried him still farther onward in the direction of Protestantism. But in Naples, as in so many other places, an ecclesiastical re-action followed immediately after the reformatory movement; and, though the attempt of introducing the Inquisition in the kingdom failed, the ultramontane re-action soon became so powerful that Caracciole felt compelled to flee (1551). He settled at Geneva, and became a member of the netic polarization; and while the Jesuits developed to the highest degree of excellency the positive qualities of the Church, — the unscrupu-lossous energy and cunning intrigue of a consumcative casuistry, the Capuchins succeeded in giving perfect expression to its negative qualifications, — its ignorance, its credulity, and its coarse sympathy with the lower instincts of the masses. Originally the congregation was confined to Italy; but in 1573 it invaded France, in 1592 Germany, and in 1606 Spain. In 1619 it obtained its own general, and right to walk in a procession under its own cross. In the latter part of the eighteenth century it was abolished in Germany and in France; and, in the third and fourth decades of the present century, it suffered very much both in Spain and Portugal. In the last decade, however, it seems to be recuperating in all Roman-Catholic countries.

There was also an order of Capuchin nun-headed by Maria Laurentia Longa, who in 1534 took the veil at Naples with nineteen other women. They adopted the third rule of St.
Francis, and were placed under the authority of the Theatines. But in 1538 they made a change, adopted the rules of St. Clara, assumed the pyramidal capuche, and came under the authority of the Capuchins. In 1573 they founded a monastery in Rome, and in 1606 one in Paris.

The Annales Sacr. Hist. Ordinis Minorum S.
Francisci qui Capucinini nuncupantur, by BAVIERUS, Lyons, 1652, is simply an impudent praising-up of the Capuchins at the expense of the Observants, and full of palpable lies. Reliable information is found in HELYOT: Histoire des Ordres Monas-Min., Lyons, 1625.

CAPUTIATI (capuched), thus called from the
hood of their cowl; appeared first in Auvergne
(1182), under the leadership of the carpenter
Durand, who boasted to have received revelations
from the Virgin for the purpose of establishing peace in the Church, and destroying all her enemies. According to other accounts, the ultimate object of these peacemakers was nothing so innocent as peace. At all events, Bishop Hugo of Auxerre marched against them with troops, took
them all prisoners, and condemned them to go
about a whole year bareheaded, in frost and heat.

CARACCIOLE, Calebazzo (Marchese di Vio),
b. at Naples, in 1417; d. at Geneva, May 7, 1586:
descended from one of the wealthiest and most distinguished families of the kingdom of Naples;
and entered early on a brilliant career at the Neapolitan court. The reformatory movement, which in this period sprang up almost every-
where in the Roman Church, and which in Nepal,
under the leadership of the Spaniard Juan de Valdés, early attracted his attention and sympathy, and his acquaintance with Pietro Martino Vermiglioni, carried him still farther onward in the direction of Protestantism. But in Naples, as in so many other places, an ecclesiastical re-action
followed immediately after the reformatory movement; and, though the attempt of introducing the Inquisition in the kingdom failed, the ultramontane re-action soon became so powerful that
tled at Geneva, and became a member of the Protestant-Italian congregation which had existed there since 1542; and he remained there, an exile, and a stranger to his own family, in spite of the exertions which his relatives, and, among them, his uncle, Pope Paul IV., made to induce him to return. His life has been written by BALBINI, preacher to the Italian congregation at Geneva: "Historia della Vida e degli Azioni di Caraccioli," 1587; new edition, Florence, 1875.

CARCHARACUS. The Hebrews were not alone in thinking that the dead body of any animal, clean or unclean, was defiling. The Parsees, to mention another people, shared the concept; but the Hebrew law contained many regulations upon the subject; and statute gave justification and a religious meaning to the natural repugnance to the presence of death (see particularly Lev. xi.). It was defilement to eat, even of a clean animal which had either died naturally, or been killed by other animals, or to touch it, or to carry the carcass of an unclean animal (Lev. xi. 39, 40).

CARCHEMISH (Fortress of Chemosh), very probably identical with Circesium, at the juncture of the Khabur (Chebar) and the Euphrates,—after the battle of Megiddo (about B.C. 608), and retaken by Nebuchadnezzar, B.C. 605 (lsa. x. 9, Jer. xlv. 2–12; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20). The Garmanis upon the cuneiform inscriptions is not to be regarded as identical with Carchemish, but rather as describing a city much farther north.

CARCHESI (Fortress of Chemosh), very probably identical with Circesium, at the juncture of the Khabur (Chebar) and the Euphrates,—one of the cities taken by Pharaoh-Necho shortly after the battle of Megiddo (about B.C. 608), and retaken by Nebuchadnezzar B.C. 605 (Isa. x. 9, Jer. xlv. 2–12; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20). CARNICE, Cardinal. The rights and duties of cardinals depend upon a number of older and more recent constitutions, but especially upon the "Ceremoniale Romanum" (the Concil. Tridentinum, sess. XXIV. cap. 1 de reform) and the bulls of Sixtus V. A cardinal is "created" by the Pope; and the qualities demanded in a candidate are generally the same as those demanded in a bishop,—the person must have been born in legal wedlock, be possessed of the lower degrees of ordination for at least one year before his elevation, have no progeny, have no relatives of second degrees (according to canonical computation) among the cardinals, etc. The creation takes place in a secret, but is announced in a public, consistory, when the instalment of hat, ring, etc., is performed. Until all formalities are gone through,—and they are very multitudinous, and often completely bewildering to antiquaries,—the cardinal cannot exercise his rights; for instance, not vote in the conclave, though in this respect the constitution of Eugene IV. (Oct. 26, 1431) and the rescript of Pius V. (Jan. 28, 1571) contradict each other. By the appointment the Pope is obliged to pay some regard to all nations, but the majority of cardinals are always Italians. Of the sixty-seven cardinals in 1850, fifty-one were Italians. In former times the kings had a right of presentation; and cardinals who had been created in that manner were called crown-cardinals. The principal rights of the cardinals are: they alone are eligible to the papal see (Stephan III., 769), and they alone elect the Pope (Nicholas II., 1058); and, on account of this their close connection with the papal dignity, they were allowed by Innocent IV. (1244) to wear the red hat with the pendent tassels, and by Paul II. (1464) to wear a purple robe. Urban VIII. (1630) conferred the title of Eminentissimi upon them, the same as was applied to the prince-electors of the German Empire; and offences against them were considered as crimen laesaemajestatis. Among themselves the cardinal-bishops rank first, then the cardinal-presbyters, and finally the cardinal-deacons. The oldest cardinal-bishop residing... in the Fort William College, which the marquis appointed him professor of Oriental languages; and he managed, notwithstanding the pressure of poverty, to acquire Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and a goodly amount of other useful learning, especially in natural history and botany. Thus, unknown to himself, he was being prepared for the great career God had planned for him. His attention was turned unto the heathen, and he saw plainly his duty go to them. On Oct. 2, 1792, largely through his exertions, the first Baptist missionary society was founded; and on June 13, 1793, he and his family sailed for India, accompanied by Mr. John Thomas, who had formerly lived in Bengal. On reaching Bengal, Carey and his companion lost all their property in the Hugli; but, having received the charge of an indigo-factory at Malda, he cut off his pecuniary connection with the missionary society, and began in earnest what, instead of regular missionary labor, was to be the work of his life,—the study and translation, both from and into the languages of India. In 1799 the factory was closed; and he went with Thomas to Kidderpore, where he had purchased a small indigo-plantation. Here, joined by Marshman and Ward, he started, under bright hopes, a mission, but soon encountered the opposition of the Indian Government, which forbade the mission’s enlargement, and compelled its removal, at a great pecuniary loss, to Serampore, a Danish settlement (1800), where it took opposition of the Indian Government, which for its removal, at a great pecuniary loss, to Seram for the great career God had planned for him. In 1801 it was published by the press Carey instituted. About the same time the Marquis of Wellesley appointed him professor of Oriental languages in the Fort William College, which the marquis had founded at Calcutta for the instruction of the younger members of the British Indian civil service. Carey held this position for thirty years, and taught Bengalee, Mahratta, and Sanscrit. He wrote articles upon the natural history and botany of India for the Asiatic Society, to which he was elected, 1805, and thus made practical application of tastes cultivated in former years; but this was only a part, and by far the less valuable part, of his work. That which has given him his undying fame was his translations of the Bible, in whole or in part, either alone or with others, into some twenty-four Indian languages. The Society pressed under his direction, rendered the Bible accessible to more than three hundred million human beings. Besides, he prepared grammars and dictionaries of several tongues; e.g., Mahratta Grammar, 1805; Sanscrit Grammar, 1806; Mahratta Dictionary, 1810; Bengalee Dictionary, 1818; and a Sanscrit dictionary which unhappily was destroyed by a fire in the printing establishment. Later students have discovered errors and omissions in these works; but all honor is due to Carey for “breaking the way,” and every inhabitant of India is his debtor. See J. C. Marshman, Life and Times of Carey, Marshman, and Ward, London, 1859, 2 vols.

CARLSTADT, Andreas Rudolphus Bodenstein, b. probably a couple of years before Luther, at Carlstadt in Franconia, whence his surname; d. of the plague, at Basel, 1541; made his first studies at some Italian university, and came in 1504 to Wittenberg, where in 1513 he was made professor of theology, and archdeacon at the collegiate church. He was well versed in the works of the schoolmen; and all he wrote himself at this period was scholastic in spirit and in form. But, having made a journey to Rome in 1515, he found, on his return, the whole theology of the university changed by Luther. The schoolmen had gone, and the Bible and Augustine had taken their place. His first instinct was haughty resistance; for he felt in himself the reformation of God, and saw in the books of his schoolmen and in the traditions of his university the objects of his contention. But the attempt of resistance failed; and, as failure always made him very meek and submissive, he immediately yielded to the change, and threw himself into the opposite extreme. He became a mystic. Working together with Luther for some time in perfect unison, he even anticipated him in several points, as is shown by his hundred and fifty-two theses of April 26, 1517, De Natura, Lege, et Gratia contra Scholasticos et Communem Naturam. But this reformatory activity brought him in conflict with Dr. Eck; and at the Leipzig disputation, June 27, 1510, he had the commanding superiority, and usurped the whole attention. The next year (August, 1520) he made the first attack on Luther in his De Canoniciis Scripturis, though without mentioning his name.

Carlstadt was, no doubt, sincerely devoted to the cause of the Reformation: but he was vain; he wanted to be the first, the leader, whenever he took a part in anything, and that was just the very position which he was utterly unable to occupy. While Luther was away in Wartburg, Carlstadt found the field free; and by the impetuosity and rashness of his character he carried not only the populace, but also the council and the university, into a most dangerous revolution. Christmas Day, 1521, he celebrated the Lord's Supper in his church, leaving out all the most essential features of the Roman liturgy,—the confession, the consecration of the elements, the elevation of the host, the reservation of the cup; and, by the impetuosity and rashness of his character, he carried not only the populace, but also the council and the university, into a most dangerous revolution.

In 1527 he retired to Strassburg, where he devoted himself to the study of German, and also translated Legendre's Geometry, adding an Introductory Essay on Proportion. He removed to Edinburgh in 1518, and from 1829 to 1833 contributed a number of articles to the Edinburgh Encyclopædia and the Edinburgh Review.

In 1834 he introduced Goethe to English readers by the translation of Wilhelm Meister's Lehrjahre, and in 1825 published the Life of Schiller. He married Jane Welsh in 1826, and removed in 1828 to Craigenputtoch, where he wrote his Critical and Miscellaneous Essays.

Sterne Resartus, a philosophic romance in the form of a treatise on dress, containing his views on the problems of religion and life, was published during 1833–34, in Fraser's Magazine. In 1834 he removed to London, to the house in Cheyne Row, Chelsea, where he resided until his death. In 1837 appeared The French Revolution, the first of his works to which his name was formally attached. In the same year he began lecturing, and, during 1837–48, delivered courses on German Literature, The Periods of European Culture, the Revolutions of Modern Europe, and Heroes and Hero-Worship, besides publishing Chartism, a political tract, and Past and Present.

One of his most important works, Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches, was issued in 1845, and produced a great revolution of sentiment in favor of Cromwell. In 1840 he inaugurated the movement which resulted in the London Library, of which he was afterwards elected president. During 1848–50 he wrote a number of political and social treatises, notably The Latter Day Pamphlets, the ultimate and most violent expression of his political creed.

The Life of Captain John Sartor Resartus, especially valuable as a partial expression of his own religious views, appeared in 1851. His magnum opus, The History of Frederick the Great, was begun in 1858, and finished in 1865. It is a monument of patient industry and minute research, and contains a complete political history of the eighteenth cen...
tory, but weakened his moral influence by its laudation of a despot, and its assertion and de-defence of the right of the strongest.

He espoused the Southern side in the American civil war. His unappreciative and contemptuous treatment of the question appeared in The Nigger Question and The American Iliad in a Nutshell (1863). In 1866 he was chosen rector of the University of Edinburgh, and delivered an inaugural on The Choice of Books. Mrs. Carlyle died during his absence on this occasion (April 21).

A few newspaper articles, with Historical Sketches of the Early Kings of Norway, and The Portraits of John Knox, marked the next five years, and completed his literary labors.

Carlyle's life is marked by great unity of purpose and concentration of energy. He lived for literature. With his imaginative genius, his poetic insight, and his opulent diction, he was a poet by constitution; but lack of the sense of form and proportion, and his impatience of meaured expression, made him despicable poetry. His few poetical experiments, The Night Moth, The Adieu, To-day, and The Sower's Song, are among the earliest of his literary efforts. He is a preacher and a prophet, rather than an artist.
His keen sense of the grotesque, with the real depth of his nature, made him a humorist at once racy, subtle, and satirical; but this element developed itself disproportionately, and ran into cynicism as he grew older.

Notwithstanding the large admixture of ethics and philosophy in his writings, it is well-nigh impossible to define accurately his position as a philosopher, moralist, or religiousman. Veracity is the basis of his ethical conceptions, by which he means the disposition to go behind appearances to facts, and the assertion of reality as against mere symbols and conventionalities. His hatred of sham is intense, and often leads him into needless roughness of speech. His ethical ideal is defective from its identification of physical and moral order, of might and right. It is too real and practical, his philosophy is intuitional and him. His histories are a series of striking portraits, lodging the test of right in each man's moral consciousness. Hence his fundamental falvice through the admiration of greatness. The histories is unsound in blinding the reader to the requiremensof the narrative; and hence Dr.
Robinson prefers the south-eastern extremity
of the range. The range ends abruptly: a bluff over five hundred feet high juts out into the sea.

while agreeing that Christianity is the supreme religion, denies that it embraces all truth. He seems to hold that responsibility to God is the essential truth foreshadowed in all religions, and that the essence of all religion is to keep conscience alive and shining. He believes in retribution as the natural outcome of wrong. He revered genuine piety, and his own moral life was singularly pure. As a critic he has great knowledge and keen discernment, but is too liable to be swayed by his personal prejudices.
His earlier style, as in the Essays on Burns and Scott, was natural, simple, dignified, and vigorous.
His later style is figurative, abrupt, enigmatical, sometimes turgid and involved, inverted, declamatory, and at times coarse, yet withal often beautiful, rich, and powerful, and always picturesque.

-- CARME1 Mount, (park), once the southern boundary of Asher (Josh. xix. 29); later, part of Galilee. At the time of Josephus it belonged to Tyre (War iii. 3, 1). The range runs south-east to north-west, is about twelve miles long. Its highest elevation is 1,740 feet. It is to-day covered with trees and flowers. In its forests animalsof all sorts are found. It is a magnificent sight; but the view from it is grander, inasmuch as the ridge divides the Plain of Sharon from the Plain of Jezreel, and projects itself into the Mediterranean Sea. No wonder that to the poets and prophets of the Old Testament it was a symbol of beauty (Song vii. 5; Isa.xxxv. 2 cf.xxxiii.9; Jer.1.19: Amos i.2; Nah. i.4).

Hidden there during the stormy days of Ahab, lived Elijah; and his cave is yet shown. Some answering fire proved who was the true God (1 Kings xvii. 20-42).

The traditional site is at El Mohraka, i.e., "burnt place," upon the southern slope of the range, a long way from the coast.
But this site is far from the Kishon to meet the requirements of the narrative; and hence Dr.
Robinson prefers the south-eastern extremity
of the range. The range ends abruptly: a bluff

CARMELITES. A certain Berthold came, in the latter part of the twelfth century, to Palestine, on a pilgrimage or crusade, and formed an asso- ciation of hermits at the Well of Elijah on Mount Carmel. In 1209 the association received its rule of sixteen articles from Albert, Patriarch of Jeru- salem; and in 1224 this rule was confirmed by Pope Honorius III. As long as the crusading enthusiasm sent thousands and thousands of people from Europe every year to Palestine, the asso- ciation of Mount Carmel prospered much; but when this way of doing things came to a standstill by the armistice between Frederick II, and the Saracens, the hermits at the Well of Elijah began to feel very lonesome, and in 1238 they removed to more lively places in Cyprus and Sicily. In 1240 they came to England, in 1244 to Southern France, and in 1245 they held their first general chapter at Aylesford in England. In order not to be completely ousted by the Mendicant orders, which just at that time felt very much displeased, it was necessary for the Carmelites to follow fashion; and so they did. They changed their rule (1244) to their conscription, their dress, after the Dominicans and Franciscans. But they had one piece of good luck: they invented the scapulary (1287). The scapulary consists of two stripes of gray cloth, worn on the breast and on the back, and connecting with each other on the shoulders. This innocent piece of dress was brought expressly from heaven by the Virgin herself; and she promised to go on Saturday evenings to purgatory, and relieve all those who wore it. Of course, the scapulary immediately became the rage. Large associations or brotherhoods of the scapulary were formed among laymen, and brought in a more or less loose connection with the order, which earned both fame and influence from this circumstance. As was natural, the success stimulated their ambition. They began to dispute the claims of the Dominicans to the rosary. They reckoned the Virgin Mary as one of their own generals. There were at one time four inde- pendent Carmelite generals; and all attempts at consolidating the whole order into one body failed. There were also Carmelite nuns. The first mon- astery was founded in 1452 by Soreth, a general of the order, who was poisoned at Nantes in 1471 by the discontented monks. To this order of nuns belonged the daughters of Louis XV. But in modern times the Carmelites have played no conspicuous part, and the order is at present fall- ing rapidly into decay, without any means of reconstruction. CARNAL (a word of uncertain etymology: carni-vale, “farewell to flesh-meat;” carn-avallare, “swallow flesh-meat”) denotes the period from the end of the festival of the Epiphany to the end of Shrove-Tuesday. This part of the year is in all Roman-Catholic countries considered a proper season for social enjoyment; and more especially the last seven or ten days are in many cities, particularly in Rome, given up to public merriment. The custom is of Pagan origin. It is the revelry and debauchery of the old Saturnalia and Lupercalia, which have been continued under this form in the Christian world, and nowhere in a more unrestrained manner than in the centre of Christendom,—in Rome. Several popes have tried, if not to repress the custom, at least to restrain its license. Clement XI. issued two apostolical briefs (1719 and 1721), Benedict XIV. an encyclical letter, for this purpose. But other popes, who had a clearer understanding of the economical and political import of the custom, did every thing they could to encourage it. Thus Paul II. issued a decree with very minute provi- sions with respect to the races of the Corso; and when the Italian people, during its struggle for national unity, instinctively withdrew from these frivolous dissipations, the papal government under Pius IX. was very desirous, and very active, to allure it back on the old track. The Roman Carnival of the present day is a comparatively tame affair.

CAROLINE BOOKS (Libri Carolini, or Opus Caroli). The work originated in the controversies of the eighth century concerning image-worship, the participation of Pope Adrian I. in the second synod of Nicaea (787), and the communication of the acts of this synod by Adrian to Charle- magne and the Frankish Church. Charlemagne, who just at this time was engaged in war with the Byzantine court and the equivocal policy of the Pope, had the whole matter—the authority of the synod, the orthodoxy of its decrees, etc.—discussed by the theologians of his court, and then forwarded the acts to England to King Offa, who likewise laid them before the bishops of his realm. Aeluin, who at that moment was staying in England, drew up a criticism of the decrees of the synod in the form of a letter, which he delivered personally to Charlemagne in the name of the English princes and bishops. The epistle is lost; but Charlemagne sent an elaborate answer, the so-called Libri Carolini. The work, which is divided into four books and a hundred and twenty chapters, contains a very sharp censure of the synod and its decrees, and establishes a principle, which, on the one side, gives the Christian art full freedom in the representation of Christian ideas, but on the other excludes all superstitious misuses of the merely artistic creation. The Pope received the book with admiration and extreme flattery, but declined to recognize its principles. He died, however, shortly after (765); and the synods of Francfort (794) and of Paris (825) took the book as basis for their whole relation to the question of image-worship. The first edition of the Caroline Books was given by Jean du Tillet (Elias Philgra), Paris, 1549; the best by Heumann, Augusti Concilii Nicaeni Secundi Censura, Hanover, 1731. See II. 1. CARPENTER, Lant, LL.D., an English Unitarian divine and author, b. at Kidderminster, Sept. 2, 1780; drowned between Naples and Leghorn, April 5, 1840. He was intended for the nonconformist ministry; but he joined the Unitarians, and was made to the church at Exeter, 1803–17, and minister at Bristol, 1817–39. He was made doctor of laws by Glasgow University, 1806. He published numerous works, of which the more important are: Introduction to the Geography of the N.T., 1813; Union with the Doctrine of the Gospels, 1890; An Examination of the Charges made against Unitarians and the Improved Version, by Bishop Magee, Bristol, 1820; A Harmony of the Gospels, 1835, 2d ed., London, 1838; Sermons on Practical Subjects, London, 1840. His son is Dr. W. B. Carpenter, the famous physiologist. His life was written by another son, Rev. Russell Lant Carpenter.

CARPENTER, Mary, philanthropist, b. at Exeter, Eng., 1807; d. at Bristol, June 14, 1877. She was the daughter of the Rev. Dr. Lant Carpenter, mentioned above, and was educated by him. Her life-work, the inspiration to which came in 1833 from the Hindoo reformer Rammohun Roy, was among the criminal class, whom she strove faithfully to raise. To this end she originated the system of reformatory schools for vicious girls. In the drawing-up of the bill which was passed by Parliament in 1854, she was greatly aided by the recorder of Bristol, Matthew Davenport Hill. She was also one of the chief promoters of the Industrial Schools Act, which passed in 1857. So great was her zeal, that she visited India four times in the following years, and in 1867, she edited her journal. Her noble, unselfish life had its roots in her fervent piety. She wrote much in behalf of her projects, and prepared elaborate reports for various bodies. CARPZOV is the name of a family of scholars, several of whom were theologians, and occupied a prominent position in the Church. I. Johann Benedikt Carpow, b. at Roehltz, June 22, 1607; d. at Leipzig, Oct. 22, 1657; was professor of theology at Leipzig from 1643. His work Isagoge in Libros Eccles. Luther. Symbolicos, 1653, is the starting-point of that branch of theology called "symbolics." Also his Hodgeticium, 1656, played a prominent part in the field of homiletics. As the Lutheran minister is demanded to choose his text for a certain Sunday from a certain part of the Scriptures, he may be compelled, during a career of fifty years, to preach fifty times over the same text. In this emergency he may find great help with Carpzov, who, in his Hodgeticium, found no less than one hundred different manners in which to vary the theme. II. Johann Gottlob Carpow, b. at Dresden, Sept. 26, 1679; d. at Lübeck, April 7, 1747; studied at Wittenberg and Altdorf, and was professor of Oriental languages at Leipzig from 1710 till 1730, when he became superintendent-general at Lübeck. His Introductio in Libros V. Test., 1721, Critica Sacra, 1728, and Apparatus Historico-criticus Antiquitatum V. Test., 1748, are works of great learning and talent, though his stand-point is still that of Buxtorf, and already somewhat antiquated: the authority of the text depends with him upon an almost materialistic conception of inspiration. He was a decided adversary of the whole pietistic movement, more especially of the Herrnhutters. III. Johann Benedikt Carpow, b. at Leipzig, May 20, 1720; d. at Helmstädt, April 28, 1803; became professor of Greek in the University of Helmstädt in 1748, and earned his fame chiefly as a philologist, but vindicated the name of the family as representative of pure orthodoxy by his Liber Doctrinalis Theologiae Paurioris, 1768. He was one of the last professors of Germany who continued to use the Latin language in his lectures.
CARRASCO, Antonio, one of the leaders of the new Reformation in Spain; b. in Malaga, Jan. 19, 1549; drowned in the rose du Haure disaster in mid-ocean, Nov. 22, 1576. He was converted at sixteen, and joined Matamoros's band of Bible-readers at Malaga: in consequence, he was imprisoned two years, and then sent to the galleys. On the solicitation of the Evangelical Alliance deputation at Madrid, May, 1583, Queen Isabella changed his sentence to exile; and for five years he studied theology in Geneva. In September, 1688, on the downfall of Isabella, he returned to Spain, and entered with great zeal on the work of evangelization, and was, at his death, pastor of the Free Church in Madrid, which had a membership of seven hundred. He was the best educated and the most eloquent Protestant preacher in Spain. He was president of the Protestant Synod, and made frequent visits to the scattered congregations throughout the land. See the memorial sketch in the volume of the Evangelical Alliance, N. Y., 1874, pp. 764-765.

CARSTARES, William (or Carstairs), a Scotch clergyman and political leader; b. Feb. 11, 1619, at Catheart, near Glasgow; d. Dec. 26, 1715. His father, the Rev. John Carstares, belonged to the extreme Covenanting party of Protesters. After studying at Edinburgh, he went to the University of Utrecht, and there his friendship with William III. began. This intimacy, together with his participation in the composition of the severe tracts, An Account of Scotland's Grievances by Reason of the D. of Lauderdale's Ministrie, humbly tendered to his Sacred Majesty, generally attributed to the learned James Steuart, and his being the bearer of despatches from those in Holland who sympathized with the disaffected in Scotland, made Charles II.'s government suspicious of him. Accordingly, when, at the close of 1674, he landed in England, he was arrested, lodged in the Tower, the next year transferred to Edinburgh, and kept in prison until August, 1679. He went to Ireland, and became a nonconformist pastor. But in 1682 he was again in Holland, and the next year in London. He entered into the Ryehouse Plot for an insurrection in favor of the Duke of Monmouth and to assassinate Charles II. The plot was discovered in the middle of July, 1683. He was examined before the Scottish council, tortured by the thumbscrew, but firmly refused to make any disclosures, "until he was assured that his admissions would not be used as evidence; and in the disclosures he then made he displayed great discretion." The King pardoned him. Prince William of Orange welcomed him warmly on his return to England, and appointed him court chaplain. When the Revolution of 1688 had put William on the throne of England, he became royal chaplain for Scotland; and by his broad catholic views, his tact and learning, he rendered the King invaluable service, especially in thoroughly converting the Presbyterian ministers to the new régime. He held the same position under Queen Anne and George I., with that of principal of the University of Edinburgh.

CARSON, Alexander, LL.D., b. in County Tyrone, Ireland, 1776; d. at Belfast, Aug. 24, 1844. He sprang from Presbyterian stock; was educated at the University of Glasgow; became the Presbyterian minister in Tubbermore, Ireland, 1797, but in 1805 withdrew from that denomination because of the worldliness of many of its ministers in the synod of Ulster, and justified himself in his published Reasons for Separating from the Synod of Ulster. He was followed by a majority of his congregation. Unable to retain his former church edifice without litigation, he gave it up, and preached for many years in barns or fields, until at last a rude stone church was built for him at Tubbermore. In the early part of his independent career, while studying the New Testament in order to confute the Baptists, he was converted to Baptist principles: and henceforth he advocated these views, except close communion, with all the wealth of his scholarship, which was considerable, and all the power of his mind, which was great. The Baptist denomination value his writings highly. See Baptism, in its Mean and Subjects, with a Sketch of the Life of Dr. Carson, 5th ed., Phila., 1857; also the sketch of Dr. Carson, by Rev. Dr. THOMAS ARMITAGE, in Johnson's Cyclopedia.
CARTHAGE, a famous city of the ancient world, situated near the modern town of Tunis, North Africa; was the seat of numerous church councils, of which two were very important. In 411 a conference was there held, on command of the emperor, with the Donatists, in order to refute their errors, and reconcile them with the Church. Augustine and Petilian were the principal opposing speakers; and Marcellinus, the Emperor Honorius' tribune, decided that the Donatists had been completely answered, nor from this sentence was there any appeal allowed. From this conference dates the decided decline of Donatism; for more stringent measures were adopted towards such determined heretics as they were adjudged. See DONATISTS. In 412 Paulinus of Milan appeared at the council held under Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage, as the accuser of Caelestius; and thus the Pelagian heresy received its first condemnation, and at the same time its first ecclesiastical recognition. See SCHAFF: Church History, vol. ii. pp. 365 sq., vol. iii. p. 783; and HIEPPEL: Concilien geschichte.

CARTHUSIANS, an order of monks founded by St. Bruno in the latter part of the eleventh century. Bruno was born at Cologne, studied at various schools in France, became chancellor of Coelestius; and thus the Pelagian heresy received its first condemnation, and at the same time its first ecclesiastical recognition. See DONATISTS. In 412 Paulinus of Milan appeared at the council held under Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage, as the accuser of Caelestius; and thus the Pelagian heresy received its first condemnation, and at the same time its first ecclesiastical recognition. CARTWRIGHT, Thomas, b. about 1515, in Hertfordshire; d. Dec. 27, 1603. He was matriculated as a sizar of Claire Hall, Cambridge, in 1537, and as a scholar to St. John's College, 1540. In 1560 he became a minor fellow of Trinity College, and on the 6th of April of the same year a fellow of St. John's College; in April, 1562, a major fellow of Trinity College. In 1567 he took his bachelor's degree, and in 1569 was chosen Lady Margaret professor of divinity, and began to lecture on the Acts of the Apostles. His lectures were exceedingly popular, and made a profound impression in favor of his distinctly Puritan views, but created a storm of opposition from the Prelatical party, headed by Dr. Whitgift. This conflict, under these two great champions, continued to grow more and more severe, and was continued by their successors in two great parties in the Church of England,—the Presbyterian and the Prelatical. The Puritan platform is well stated in the six propositions which Cartwright delivered under his own hand to the vice-chancellor, the grounds of his persecution by the Prelatists:

(1) That the names and functions of archbishops and archdeacons ought to be abolished.

(2) That the offices of the lawful ministers of the Church, viz., bishops and deacons, ought to be reduced to their apostolical institution: bishops to preach the word of God, and pray; and deacons to be employed in taking care of the poor.

(3) That the government of the Church ought not to be intrusted to bishop's chancellors, or the officials of archdeacons; but every church ought to be governed by its own ministers and presbyters.

(4) That ministers ought not to be at large, but every one should have the charge of a particular congregation.

(5) That no man ought to solicit, or to stand as a candidate for the ministry.

(6) That ministers ought not to be created by the sole authority of the bishop, but to be openly and fairly chosen by the people.

Having been deprived of his professorship Dec. 11, 1570, of his fellowship at Trinity College in September, 1571, he went to the Continent, and especially to Geneva, and conferred with Beza and other chiefs of the Reformed Churches. He was prevailed upon to return by his friends in November, 1572. An Admonition to Parliament for the Reformation of Church Discipline had been issued by his friends, John Field and Thomas Wilcocks, for which they had been cast into prison. Cartwright espoused their cause, and issued The Second Admonition, with an humble petition to both Houses of Parliament for Parliament, 1570. In 1572, Dr. Whitgift replied in An Answer to a Certain Libel, intitled An Admonition to the Parliament, 1572. Cartwright rejoined in A Reply to an Answere.
made of M. Doctor Whitgift against the Admonition to the Parliament, 1573. This was a renewal of the old discussion on a larger scale, going to the roots of difference; Cartwright and the Puritans contending that the church government and the discipline, as well as the doctrine, must be reformed according to the Scriptures.

The discussion took a wide range,—as to the standard of church government, the choice of ministers, the offices of the Christian Church, clerical habits, bishops, archbishops, the authority of princes in matters ecclesiastical, confirmation, etc. Whitgift replied in A Defense of the Ecclesiastical Regiment in Englande, presented to T. C., in his Replie against D. Whitgift, 1574, and also The Defense of the Answer to the Admonition, against the Replye of T. C., 1574, pp. 81, folio. An order for Cartwright's apprehension was issued Dec. 11, 1574; and he fled to the Continent, and became minister of the English congregation of merchants at Antwerp and Middelborough.

In 1576 he also went to the Isles of Jersey and Guernsey, and aided the Puritans there in setting the discipline of their churches, and then returned to Antwerp, and preached for several years. Whilst abroad, he wrote the Second Replye of Thomas Carterwright against Master Doctor Whitgift, Second answer touching the Church Discipline, 1573, and also The Rest of the Second Replye, 1577.

He also, in 1574, prepared a preface to the Latin work of William Travers, and translated it under the title A Full and Plain Declaration of Ecclesiastical Discipline out of the Word of God and out of the Declininge of the Church of England from the same, 1574, which still more embittered his foes. In 1582 he was invited to the divinity chair in St. Andrews, Scotland, but declined. In 1583, at the solicitation of the Earl of Leicester, and Lord Treasurer Burleigh, and a large number of Puritan friends, he undertook to write a confutation of the Rhemish version of the Scriptures, which took him many years; but he was prevented by the ecclesiastical severities of England from publishing his work. The year before his death, however, his Answere to the Preface of the Rhemish Testament, 1602, was issued; but the work itself, not until 1618, under the title A Confrontation of the Rhemist Translations, Glosses, and Annotations on the New Testament, so farre as they containe Manifes Impieties, Heresies, Idolatries, etc., fol. pp. lviii. 761, xviii., Leyden.

In 1585 he returned to England under the protection of the Earl of Leicester and Lord Treasurer Burleigh, but was apprehended by Bishop Aylmer, and cast into prison, where he remained from April until June, when he was released through the influence of his powerful friends, and the Earl of Leicester appointed him master of a hospital which he had founded at Warwick. His preaching was opposed by his enemies, but without success, until 1590. During this time he went over a great part of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. The latter was published in 1604 under the title Metaphrasis et Homiliae in Librum Solomonis, qui inscribatur Ecclesiastes, 4to; the former in 1617, Commentarii Sacrorum et Delucida in Proverbia Solumnorum, 8to, the first edition by a preacher in England who practised extempore prayer before sermon, although he usually employed forms of prayer. During this period the ecclesiastical conflicts waxed hotter and hotter. The Puritans had been making rapid progress. The first presbytery was organized at Wandsworth within the Church of England in 1572. Classes were rapidly organized in all parts of England, but secretly. In 1588 a rough draft of a book of Discipline was drawn up by Thos. Cartwright and Walter Travers, and at an assembly held either at London or Cambridge it was resolved to put it in practice. It was revised at a national synod in London (1584), and referred to Mr. Travers, "to be corrected and ordered by him." It was then passed around the various classes. It was adopted and subscribed by an assembly of all the classes of Warwickshire in 1588, and then by a provincial synod in Cambridge; and by 1590 the Directory had spread all over England, and was subscribed to by as many as five hundred ministers. The episcopal party were greatly alarmed, and determined to arrest Cartwright and the other leaders, and destroy as large a number of copies of the Holy Discipline as possible. A few copies were, however, preserved, and subsequently issued in English in 1644 by authority of the Long Parliament, entitled A Directory of Church Government anciently contended for, and as farre as the Times would suffer, practised by the first Non-Conformists in the Days of Queen Elizabeth. Found in the study of the most accomplished Divine, Mr. Thomas Cartwright, after his decease; and reserved to be published for such a time as this.

The discussion between the Presbyterians and the Prelatists was complicated by the Brownist party and the Martin mar-prelate tracts, which bitterly satirized the bishops. Cartwright took strong ground against the Brownists and their doctrine of separation, and opposed the Martin mar-prelate method of controversy; but it was the policy of the Prelatists to make the Puritans bear all the odium of the weaker and more obnoxious party. Manuscripts of Cartwright against the Brownists are preserved, but no printed books. In May, 1590, he was summoned before the High Commission, and committed to the Fleet. He and his associates were confronted with thirty-one articles of charges, afterwards increased to thirty-four, besides articles of inquiry. He was willing to reply to the charges, but refused to give testimony against his brethren. He was then summoned before the Star Chamber with Edmund Snape and others; but the case never reached an issue. Powerful friends worked on his behalf, and he was finally released from prison in 1592, on the promise of quiet and peaceable behavior, in broken health. The remainder of his life he passed quietly on the Island of Guernsey, and at his beloved hospital, save that he had to meet one bitter attack, to which he wrote A Brief Apologie of Thomas Cartwright against all such slanderous Accusations as it please some of his Seeral pamphlets most injuriously to load him with, etc., 4to, pp. 28, 1596.

Thomas Cartwright is the hero of Presbyterianism in England, laying the foundations of Puritanism broad and deep, upon which a great structure was erected by the first General Assembly, and continued till the present time. Some of his positions have subsequently proved untenable; but, in the main, the Presbyterian churches of Great was buried in the "Poets' Corner" of Westminster Abbey.

ARThUR GILMAN.

CARYL, Joseph, b. in London, 1602; d. there Feb. 7, 1673. He was for some time a commoner at Exeter College, and a preacher at Lincoln's Inn. He was one of the Triers for the approbation of ministers in 1653, ejected in 1662, and afterwards minister to a congregation gathered near London Bridge. His title to fame was his exposition, with Practical Observations, on the Book of Job, London, 1648–56, 12 vols. quarto, 2d ed., 2 vols. folio, 1676–77, abridged by Berrie, Edinburgh, 1836, 8vo. Spurgeon (Commenting and Commentaries, London, 1876, p. 6) says of the work, "Caryl must have inherited the patience of Job, to have completed his stupendous task. It would be a mistake to suppose that he is at all prolix or redundant: he is only full."

CASAS, Bartolemeo de las, b. at Seville, 1747; d. in Madrid, 1560; entered the Dominican order; went in 1535 to St. Domingo as a missionary among the Indians; became Bishop of Chiapa, Mexico, in 1544, and spent his life in preaching the gospel to the American aborigines, and in defending them against the cruelty of their conquerors. Nine times he travelled between America and Spain in order to induce Charles V. to put an end to the horrible miseries which the Spaniards inflicted on the Indians. But he succeeded only partially. Of his works, written about or in behalf of the Indians, there is a collected edition in 2 vols. by Llorente, Paris, 1822, containing a detailed sketch of his life.

CASEAUBON, isaac, b. at Geneva, Feb. 18, 1558; d. in London, July 1, 1614; was professor of Greek, first at Geneva (1582–96), then at Montpellier (1596–1600); removed in the latter year to Paris as librarian to Henry IV., but left France after the assassination of the king (1610), and settled in London, where he was well received by King James and the bishops of the Anglican Church. He was acknowledged to be the greatest scholar of the age, next to Scaliger; and though he was a philologist and a critic, rather than a theologian or historian, he was frequently drawn into the theological controversies of his time. Besides some minor pamphlets, he edited a Noue Testamentum Graece, London, 1597; but his Exercitationes in Barovium remained unfinished. His letters, accompanied with a carefully written life, were published by D'Almeleven, Rotterdam, 1709; but for his biography his Ephemerides, published in 1860 by The Clarendon Press, are of paramount interest. See MARK PATTISON: Isaac Casaubon, Oxford, 1875.

CASELIIUS, Johann, b. at Gottingen, 1533; d. at Helmstadt, April 8, 1613; studied at Wittenberg under Melanchthon, and at Leipzig under Camerounius; visited Italy twice (1560–63 and 1596); was appointed professor at Rostock in 1563, and removed to Helmstadt in 1599. He belonged to the Melanchthonian school, and was one of the most brilliant representatives of humanism in Germany; but he was vehemently attacked, especially in the latter part of his life, by the rigid Lutherans, who wanted to have the right to constrain them among other things as to their philosophy and classical learning ejected from the universities. Of his numerous writings many still remain in manuscript. See E. HENKE: G. Calixtus und seine Zeit, i. p. 48; Jakob Buerck-CASSANDER. 413  CASSIODORUS.

CASSANDER, Georg, b. on the Island of Caz-dand, in the Scheldt, 1515; d. at Cologne, 1588: taught classical literature, canon law, and theology at Bruges and Ghent, but retired to Cologne, and devoted himself exclusively to studying. His great object was a reconciliation between the Roman Church and the Reformers. On the instance of the Duke of Cleve, he wrote against the Anabaptists, and still nearer he approached his great idea by his work De Officio Pii, 1561. Summoned afterwards to Vienna by Ferdinand I., expressly for the purpose of such a reconciliation, he wrote his Consultatio de Articulis Fidei inter Papistas et Protestantes Controversis; but he achieved nothing but to offend the one party without gaining the confidence of the other. In some respects he is a precursor of that spiritualizing Romanism of a later date, which manages to retain even the worst misuses by representing them as mere symbolization of some fanciful but pure idea. The collected edition of his works was published in Paris, 1616. See CAL-KOEN; Vita Cassandri, Amsterdam, 1859; BIRCK: Cassanders Ideen, Cologne, 1878 (from a Roman point of view).

CASSEL, The Conference of, 1661, was, to a certain extent, the result of the great influence which Georg Calixtus of Helmstädt had exercised in this part of Germany, and engaged the personal support of Wilhelm VI. of Hesse, with whom it was a serious wish to see a union brought about between his Lutheran and Reformed subjects. The disputation lasted from the 1st to the 9th of June. On the Lutheran side, spoke Peter Musaeus and Johann Hennichen, both from Rinteln, and pupils of Georg Calixtus; on the Reformed side, spoke Sebastian Curtius and Johannes Hein, both from Marburg. The subjects of discussion were the doctrines of the Lord's Supper, predestination, the two natures in Christ, and baptism; and the whole character of the proceedings was moderate and conciliatory. A basis of union was also established, and Wilhelm VI. was requested to take measures for the further consolidation and extension of the result arrived at. But he died in 1663, and the cause was lost by the stubbornness of the Lutherans, especially in Saxony. See HENKE: Das Unions-colloquium zu Cassel, Marburg, 1862; HEPP: Kirchengeschichte beider Hessen, Marburg, 1876, II. 180–193.

CASSIANUS, Johannes, b. between 350 and 360; d. between 440 and 450; was educated in a monastery at Bethlehem, under the tutelage of abbot Germanus. In 380 the master and his pupil, now two friends, made a pilgrimage to the Egyptian hermits; and this oasis of stillness and quiet, situated on the very confines of the confusion and restlessness of the ancient world, made so deep an impression on the two wanderers, that they remained there for seven years. Leaving Egypt, they repaired to Constantinople, where Cassianus was consecrated a deacon by Chrysostom; and this was the origin of the form of matrimony; for, if it is an evil to be born, there is no other means to place Christ outside of the evils of generation than denying the reality of his human nature.

CASSIODORUS, Magnus Aurelius, b. at Scylacium in Bruttien, about 477; d. in the Monastery of Vivariers about a century later; descended from a noble and wealthy family, and entered early on a brilliant political career; became senator and consul, and carried great weight in the council of the Ostro-Gothic kings from Theodic to Vitigis, but retired in 540 from public life, founded the Monastery of Vivariers, and devoted himself exclusively to literary pursuits. As he induced his brother-monks to follow in the same track, he set an example, which, during the dark ages, made the monasteries asylum for science and the liberal arts. In the earlier period of his life his literary activity was chiefly directed to history; but in 550, which is the date of the first printed, late at Leipzig, 1733. An accurate analysis of his standpoint has been given by G. PR. WIGGERS: Darstellung des Augustinismus und Pelagianismus, 1838, II. pp. 6–183. There is an Italian translation of Cassianus's work, Venice, 1663, and a French, Paris, 1667.

CASSIANUS, Julius, a heretical teacher from the latter part of the second century, is known to us only through Clement Alexandria, who twice (Stromata, I. 21; III. 13) refers to his writings. According to Clement he was the originator of docetism; and his denial of the reality of Christ's body seems to be a natural sequence of his absolute condemnation of generation even under the form of matrimony; for, if it is an evil to be born, the birth of Christ must be an evil too, and there is no other means to place Christ outside of the evils of generation than denying the reality of his human nature.

not be attained except by leaving society and the stir of the multitude, and settling down in solitude. He went to Massilia, founded two monasteries (one for men and one for women), and wrote, for the instruction of his pupils, De Corno-biorum Instituta Libri XII., and Collationes Patrum XXIV. In the former of these works he gives first the external rules after which a hermit's life is led, and then he describes the internal labor by which the final goal is reached. In the latter he gives his experiences from the Egyptian hermits. By these books, and by his two foundations, he introduced monasticism in the Western Church.

Also from another side the Western Church was deeply moved at that moment, namely, by the genius of Augustine. But the discrepancy between the ideas of Augustine and the theological system of the Eastern Church, in which Cassianus was educated, was so great, that he never felt able to adopt such doctrines as those of predestination, the irresistibility of grace, etc. He did not separate himself, however, so far from the views of Augustine as to pass over to Pelagianism; on the contrary, on the instance of Leo the Great, he wrote his De Incarnazione Libri VII., directly against Nestorianism, but indirectly against Pelagianism; and thus he became the founder and first representative of semi-Pelagianism. The best collected edition of his works is that by GAZÉUS, Douai, 1616, which has been often reprinted, latest at Leipzig, 1733. An accurate analysis of his stand-point has been given by G. PR. WIGGERS: Darstellung des Augustinismus und Pelagianismus, 1838, II. pp. 6–183. There is an Italian translation of Cassianus's work, Venice, 1663, and a French, Paris, 1667.

CASTELL, Edmund, Orientalist; b. at Hatley, Cambridgeshire, 1606; d. in Bedfordshire, 1685. He was educated at Emanuel and St. John's College, Cambridge. While at the university, he compiled his immortal work, Lexicon Heptaglotton, Hebraicum, Chaldaicum, Syriacum, Samaritanum, Ethiopicum, Arabicum, conjunctim, et Persicum separatim, London, 1659, 2 vols. folio. He spent eighteen years, and twelve thousand pounds, upon the work: Thus he ruined his fortune and his health. In 1666 he was appointed King's chaplain, Arabic professor, and later a prebend of Canterbury: at his death he was rector of Highham Gobion in Bedfordshire. He assisted Walton upon his Polyglot (1657), not only by labor, but by money to the amount of a thousand pounds, and for it his Lexicon was specially prepared.

CASTELLIO or CASTALIO, Sebastian, b. at St. Martin-du-Fresne, a village of Savoy, 1515; d. at Basel, Dec. 29, 1563; made his studies under very difficult circumstances, and was in 1540 appointed tutor to three young noblemen at Lyons, where he published the first part of his Latin Dialogues, a work which was often reprinted, and used as a text-book up to 1731, and which has been translated into English under the title Youth's Scripture Remembrancer, London, 1743. Having made the acquaintance of Calvin at Strassburg, he was called to Geneva as rector of its high-school. But disagreement soon arose between him and the great reformer; and in 1544 he left Geneva, and settled at Basel. After living there for several years in great poverty, he published, in 1551, his Latin translation of the Bible, dedicated to Edward VI. of England; and in the following year he was made professor of Greek. In 1555 appeared his French translation of the Bible, dedicated to Henry II. of France. The Latin Bible of Castellio, the last edition of which appeared at Leipzig, 1756, may be characterized as the Bible of the Humanists. The powerful realism of the original text is often weakened by the elegant forms of the translation. But the violent attacks of Calvin and Beza find their explanation, not so much in the faults of the work as in the connection in which Castellio stood to certain anonymous treatises against Calvin's doctrine of predestination, and to Martinus Bellius's De non Puniendi Gladio Hereticis. See his Life by I. MAHL, Basel, 1892, founded upon careful study of the sources. BERNHARD RIGGENBACH.

CASUISTRY is a theological discipline which developed, generally in connection with ethics, but sometimes independently, and for a long period even succeeded in completely superseding this science. Its first germs may be found in the writings of the New Testament and its first answers to casuistical questions (Matt. xxii. 17; Luke xiv. 3). Paul does the same (1 Cor. vii., viii. 10). As the institution of confession and penance developed in the old church, manifold opportunities occurred to decide upon the moral worth of some special action. The ethical writings of Tertullian and Augustine, among the Latin fathers, are rich in such decisions. In the penitentials, or books of penance, the movement began to take shape, and show direction. They contained long lists of sins observed in common life, or imagined as possible, minutely described, and accurately classified; and to each sin was added the penance or ecclesiastical punishment set upon it. New materials flowed from the canon law, which, in consequence of its own inborn principle, always considered morality in its relation to actual circumstances; and the method which the proper treatment of such materials demanded was brought to its very perfection by the schoolmen. Thus the penitentials of the ancient church gradually grew into the medieval science of casuistry; and when auricular confession, in 1215, was made a formal law, this science became of so great practical importance, that the casuist appeared in the universities by the side of the canonist.

Raimund de Pennafort, from the thirteenth century, is generally mentioned as the earliest representative of this science of casuistry. His Summa de Casibus Punitentibus consists of four books, and is alphabetically arranged: it was edited by Hon. Vinc. Laget. Lyons, 1719. A great number of similar books followed in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, generally called Summae, and often named after the author or his birthplace: thus the Astesana, ed. Nuremberg, 1482, after Asti in Piedmont; the Pisana or Pisanella, ed. Paris, 1470, after Pisa; the Angelica, ed. Nuremberg, 1492, after Angelus, the Genevoe; the Pacifica, ed. Venice, 1574, after Pacificus from Novara, etc. But by degrees, as the science developed, its inner confusion increased. Every trace of a ruling principle disappeared, and the whole field was covered with a loose conglomerate of details. The cases became more and more intricate, the solutions more and more subtle: the power of conscience to give a clear and ready verdict was blunted and confounded; and the blight of scepticism, with its indifference and frivolity, fell upon the whole moral field of Christian education.

At this point, as at so many others, the Reformation laid the axe at the root of the evil. Luther burnt the Angelica, together with the papal bull, and declared openly that the true Christian needs no special moral instruction, as the spirit of his faith will surely lead him to that which is sanctioned by the will of God, and demanded by brotherly love. Even Zwingli, though representing a more specifically moral side of the Reformation, never ceased to assert that the individual spirit, when fully imbued with the word of God, is the true source from which to draw the moral rule, entirely independent of any external prescription. Although a number of difficult moral cases presented themselves in which the Reformers had to give a decision, as, for instance, with respect to marriage, usury, obedience to established authority, etc., most answers were furnished. Properly speaking, developed during the first decades of the Reformation; and when it later on, grew up both within the Reformed and within the Lutheran Church, it proved of a merely transient nature, and was speedily absorbed by ethics.

In the Reformed Church, W. Perkins (1558–1602) was the first who attempted to revive casuistry, though he completely abandoned the old scholastic method. He wrote in English, The Whole Treatise of Cases of Conscience, London, 1602, which was edited in Latin, by MAGER, Hanover, 1603, and DRÄKUS, Geneva, 1624, and in German, by SPRÜNGLI, Basel, 1640, and Leipzig, 1690. His pupil, WILLIAM AMES, followed the same track: De Conscientia et ejus Jure vel Casibus, Amsterdam, 1630, translated into German, Nuremberg, 1654; also others; HALL: Resolutions and Decisions of Dicers Practical Cases of Conscience, London, 1649; SANDERSON: Nine Cases of Conscience, London, 1673; I. H. ALTSTED: Theologia Carusum, Hanover, 1621, which he in his theological encyclopedia placed independently beside the Theologia Moralis. In the Lutheran Church the attempt was made a little later by Fr. Baldin (1575–1627), whose Traactatus de Casibus Conscientiae, first published (1628) in Würzburg, was meant to form an opposition to the corrupted casuistry of the Roman-Catholic Church. It contains all the casuistic materials scattered throughout the works of the Reformers, arranged after a very superficial plan; and the great regard which is paid to such subjects as ghosts, evil spirits, sorcerers, witches, etc., shows how tightly the Orthodox Lutheran Church was held in the mazes of superstition and pedantry. The same character re-appears with the other Luthéan casuists of the seventeenth century,—Fink, 1631; Dunte, 1636; König, 1654; KESSLER, 1658; DAMNHÄUSER, 1670; OSIANDER, 1680; OLEARIUS, 1694, etc. Nevertheless, the influence of Spener soon became apparent; and the clear and convincing exposition, by his pupil Buddeus, of the superfluity of casuistry as an independent branch of evangelical theology, finally made it disappear.

Quite otherwise in the Roman-Catholic Church. There, among the Jesuits, casuistry attained a new and most luxuriant growth. To re-establish the tottering dominion of the hierarchy over the souls was the avowed object of the order; and what more suitable means could be found for such an aim than the dissolution of all morality in casuistry? Consequently, instead of a deeper conception of the universal idea of morality, instead of a stronger assertion of conscience in its office as the organ of the spirit of faith, the Jesuits invented the doctrines of probabilism, of the aim justifying the means, of a difference between philosophical and theological sins, of mental reservation, etc.; and the result was an inner confusion which actually made the penitent the slave of the confessor. The most prominent among the Jesuit casuists are MARIANA, MENDOZA, SANCHEZ, MOLINA, and ESCOBAR IN SPAIN; Filliucci and Francolini in Italy; LESS and LOBKWITZ in Holland; BUSENBAUM and LAYMANN in Germany. The laxity, however, and frivolity of the Jesuit morality, caused scandal, even within the confessional, the Jesuits themselves. At the beginning of the last half of the seventeenth century, ARNAULD began the opposition; then followed FASCHEL. The SORBONE condemned the doctrine of probabilism in its Corpus Doctrina, ed. by PFAFF, TÜBINGEN, 1718.

SCHOLARS, like MABILLON and DU PIN, kept aloof from the pestiferous atmosphere; and serious men, like Heinrich a ST. IGNATIO, attempted to rear a new moral system on another basis (Theologia, 1707; Ethica Anomia, 1708). But all this was done with very little effect. There is in the doctrinal system of the Roman Church a tendency which necessarily leads to casuistry in morals, and which cannot be eradicated except together with the Church itself. Even SOBIECH's Compendium Theologiae Moralis, Breslau, 1814, bears witness to this truth.

CASUS RESERVATI are cases of sin in which the Pope or the bishop reserves the right of absolution to himself, or to a priest authorized by him. The Roman-Catholic Church justifies such reservation in the following manner: as Christ, properly speaking, conferred the power of absolution only on the apostles and their successors (John xx. 21–23), the Pope and the bishops, by further conferring the power on their substitutes, the lower ranks of the priests, have a right to make such reservations as they deem necessary for the weal of the Church; which conception has been confirmed by the Council of Trent, sess. XIV, cap. 7, de pænitentia. The cases which the Pope has reserved for himself may be found enumerated in FERRARIS: Bibliotheca Canonica, Madrid, 1785, 10 tom. in 5 vols. fol. The cases which the bishops have reserved for themselves differ in the different dioceses. With respect to Germany see HARTZHEIM: Concilia Germaniae, Tom. XI.

CATACOMBES is the name of certain subterranean galleries and halls in which the ancient Church, up to the fifth century, buried her dead; though instances of burial in the manner now common occur even in the first days of the Church. The Pagans called their burial-places σαβατηρία (dormitoria, "sleeping-rooms"); and the Christians adopted the name, which among them, from their hope of resurrection, received a new and deeper meaning: Christian cemeteries of the above description are found in Syria, Alexandræa, Melos, Malta, Sicily, Spain, and throughout the whole of Italy, especially in Naples and Rome. The most extensive, and, both in artistic and in ecclesiastical respect, the most important, of these cemeteries, are those built under the hills and corridors, excavated in the tufa, would, if stretched out in one continuous line, reach from one end of the Italian Peninsula to the other. They are computed to house about six millions of dead. In the Catacombs of Rome, there are found twenty-four more subterranean cemeteries, and thirty in the rest of Italy.

It was formerly believed that the Roman catacombs were merely quarries, which had been abandoned, and then taken into use by the Christians, in lack of something better. But it has now been ascertained beyond doubt that such was the case only with a few of them; and there is a marked difference between those which originated as independent structures, and those which were reared in the quarries. The latter have broader but also more irregular galleries, built up with masonry and props of all kinds; while in the former the galleries are narrower but higher, more regular, and always hewn out in the granular tufa, which at once is firm, easy to work, and well suited to preserve the corpses, because it is porous, and easily lets off the water. It has also been ascertained that originally the catacombs were not built secretly, nor were they fitted up in a poor and dismal style. Among the privileges which Julius Caesar gave the Jews of Rome was naturally enjoyed the same privilege. The first and graves. As the first Christian congregation also legal protection of their burial associations with a conspicuous entrance. It was a locus religiosus, though not, in the Roman sense of the words, a locus sacer. Even the remains of the martyrs could be buried without any trouble. But it is true, that, when the times of persecution came, the original entrances had to be covered up, and new entrances to be made in some forgotten corner of an adjacent quarry, where they were not easily detected. Regular service was not held in the catacombs until the second or third century, and then only exceptionally, but more frequently during the third and fourth centuries. Even the death-days of the martyrs were celebrated at the very graves. According to tradition, five or six of these subterranean burial-places date back to the times of the apostles, as, for instance, those of Priscilla, Lucina, and Flavia Domitilla; and, indeed, inscriptions, wall-paintings, and ornaments belong to the times of the Flavians and Trajan. The orchards or vineyards under which the cemeteries were excavated were given to the congregation by some wealthy member, for this purpose. Thus the first common burial-place which the Christian congregation of Rome possessed was, no doubt, founded by a noble lady at her villa, ad catacumbas, where afterwards Constantine built a church over the grave of St. Sebastian. The place was probably called κατά πνεύμα, from some natural or artificial cave; or, as κατά also means a cup, there may have stood an inn, κατά κεφαλή, catacumbas, analogous to ad enes, ad aquilas, etc., at a spot on the much-frequented Via Appia, and in the vicinity of Vicus Sulpicius, and from this inn the whole neighborhood may have received its name.

In the third century, there were in Rome twenty-five cemeteries, and almshouses for the poor and martyr or family tombs. Pope Zephyrinus placed the deacon Kallistus, propositus of the Roman clergy, over the above-mentioned Catacumbas; and, of the eighteen popes between Zephyrinus and Sylvester, thirteen were buried there. During the period of peace from Caracalla to Decius, Pope Fabianus (238) erected also, in other cemeteries, a number of small oratories for service: such a one was discovered in 1874 in the Cemetery of Domitilla. In 257 Valerian forbade the Christians to visit their cemeteries, declared their loca religiosa state property, and had Pope Sixtus and his deacon Laurentius beheaded in the Cemetery of Pretextatus. Gallienus, however, again allowed the Christians to use their burial-places (260); but from that time it became customary to conceal the entrances. Under Numinian, a great number of the faithful, who, with the vasa sacra, had sought refuge in a catacomb on Via Salaria, were buried alive; the entrance having been choked up. Shortly before his death, Aurelian issued an edict against the Christians, and in 303 the grounds under which the cemeteries were built were taken from them. Instead of that named after Kallistus, Marcellinus now founded another large common cemetery, built very deep under the ground; and the entrances to the graves of the martyrs were covered up. Under Maxentius, the persecutions ceased. In 311 the church property was restored, and with the edict of Milan (312) a new era began for the Church.

The victorious Church did not like to bury her dead in the catacombs, and consequently the catacombs were less and less used. Melchiades was the last pope interred at St. Kallistus. Sylvester lies in the basilica built by him over the Cemeterium Priscillae; and Marcus, in the cella mortuoriae at the entrance of the Cemeterium Balbinus. The example once set, graves in or near the basilicas soon came to be preferred to graves in the catacombs. The extraordinary increase, however, of the martyr-worship after the time of Constantine, contributed to give the catacombs a new interest. Costly basilicas were erected above the graves of the martyrs; and the whole side of the hill where was the mouth of the gallery leading to those graves was, so to speak, carved off in order to lay bare the graves themselves. Under Damasus this arrangement was completed. Wails were propped up, corridors and passages were formed, flights of steps were built, the chambers themselves were adorned with marble, and the calligrapher, Furius Dionysius Philiolus, was busy everywhere making inscriptions. Prudentius, in his hymns on the martyrs (Ilipoi στημάτων XI. 158-218), gives a description of the tomb of Hippolytus, such as it had been restored by Damasus. The walls of the little chapel were inlaid with slabs of Parian marble, and leaves of glittering silver; and on the birthday of the martyr such a multitude of devotees thronged to the grave, that the narrow passages proved altogether incapable of holding them. Indeed, the catacombs became a much frequented place. Jerome, in his commentary on Ezek. xi. 5,6, gives a graphic description of the visits he made while a schoolboy, and, together with his comrades, on Sundays, to this dreary yet fruitful spot. The walls were twenty feet in breadth, and the whole place is so dark, that the prophet's words, 'And they shall go alive to hell' (Ps. iv. 16), seem directed to us. Now and then a little light breaks down from above, through a wall-eye, — just enough
The Christians who died in Rome between 338 and 364 were buried in the catacombs; but between 373 and 400, not more than one-third; after 410 only a few; and none after 454. In Naples, however, and in Sicily, interment in catacombs continued as late as the ninth and tenth centuries. After the conquest by Alaric, the Christians in Rome could not afford to adorn their graves any more; and from 410 the catacombs actually began to fall into oblivion and decay. After 426 no fossores, "grave-diggers," are mentioned any more. The Ostrogoths under Vitiges (537), and again under Totila, did not hesitate to outrage the graves of the martyrs, and throw out their bones; and though the Popes Vigilius and John III. (598), and Sergius and Gregory III. (753) did much for the restoration of the catacombs, and the revival of the devotion at the martyrs' graves, when the "godless" Lombards, under Aistulf, broke open the tombs, and carried away the bones of the saints, the awe and even the respect of the people for the catacombs sank so low, that sheep pens were built in the consecrated graves. In 761 Paul I. transferred a hundred holy corpses to the new church he had erected, and dedicated to St. Sebastian and St. Sylvester. July 20, 817, Paschal I. transferred twenty-three hundred holy corpses to St. Prasede; and Sergius II. and Leo IV. carried them by the cartload into the Pantheon. Thus the ruin of the catacombs was completed. In the fourteenth century, however, three of these old cemeteries were still visited by pilgrims; but in the fifteenth the Coemeterium Catacumbas, or, as it was also called, the Cae terium Catacumbas ad Sebastianum, was the only one open to visitors; and thus it came to pass that its name, Catacumbas, became the common appellation applied to all subterranean sepulchres.

In 1578 another catacomb was incidentally discovered, and immediately made a mine from which the altars of those churches, which during the counter-reformation had been taken from the Protestants, were refurnished with relics. St. Borromeo, the chief of the counter-reformation, prayed whole nights in the catacombs; and some years before him, Filippo Neri spent every night there. Water from the wells of the catacombs, or the mere use of cups found there, began to work miracles. Pope Sixtus did his best to push the movement, discovering, investigating, and restoring catacombs. Bosio, an official of the order of Maltha, spent his fortune, and often risked his life, in examining the catacombs. Gems, utensils, sarcophagi, were found in great multitude; but most of them were lost again by bad management. What remained was gathered into the Christian Museum in the Vatican, in the eighteenth century, by Benedict XIV. The description of Bosio's discoveries appeared at Rome (1632) shortly after his death, under the title, Rescriptio on both the description and the illustrations are very inaccurate. A Latin translation by Aringhi, much enlarged, appeared in 1651; and a pocket edition, somewhat abbreviated, in 1871. The literature of the subject now began to flourish. See Cardinal Bottari: Scu terien; and Die Inschriften der römischen Côme

Catafalco, or Catafalque, from the Italian balco, a "scaffold," is a representation of a tomb, made of plain carpentry, but often magnificently decorated. It came into use in Italy, when it became customary not to bring the corpses into the church while the singing of the Vigil, Requiem, and Libera, took place; and its object was, as a visible memorial of the dead, to strengthen the devotion.

Cataclus, ST., a saint of the Roman-Catholic Church, but a person of a very fabulous record. It seems, however, that he lived in the sixth century, came from Ireland, made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, settled at Tarent, and became bishop there. In 1071 his bones were discovered; and, as they made the customary miracles, he was canonized. His festival is celebrated on May 10. The Acta Sanct., May, gives his life, and the literature belonging to him.

Catechetics, Catechisms, and Catechumenal. Catechetics, from katekhinon, "to teach," "to instruct," is a part of practical theology, and corresponds to catechesis, as theory to practice. The practical art of catechisation originated together with the Church, and in the fourth and fifth centuries it began to develop its scientific theory. Some instruction in the truths of Christianity, more or less comprehensive, more or less profound, was, no doubt, from the very first days of the Church, considered an indispensable condition for admission into membership, that is, for baptism and early the catechist appeared as an officer, the catechumenate as an institution, in the Church. The Constitutions Apostolicae, from the latter part of the third century, show the institution, its functions, and its proceedings, in a fair state of development. Later on, in the writings of Cyril of Jerusalem, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, and Augustine, it presents itself as a missionary apparatus of great completeness and vigor. After a simple application to the deacon, or presbyter, or bishop, and a preliminary instruction by the bishops, in the fourth century, the standing of the applicant, any person, Jew, pagan, or heretic, was admitted into the state of a catechumen by the sign of the cross and the imposition of hands; that is, he was recognized as a Christian, though not as one of the fideles, and enjoined to attend the catechisation in the church. As a catechumen he passed through several stages. Some distinguish between two, others between three, and others again between four; though a first class, not allowed to enter the church-building, but receiving instruction outside the wall, is a very doubtful supposition. The first class comprised the Audientes, who attended the sermon, but left the church before the strictly liturgical part of the service began; the second, the Genylectentes, or Prostrati, who were allowed to attend, kneeling, the prayer which was offered up for them; the third, the Competentes, or candidates for baptism, to whom the arcanui disciplina was unveiled, — the creed and the Lord’s Prayer. On the other side, the Church was to subdue the masses under an external training of the individual. The whole course through the catechumenate took between two and three years; and in this, its great missionary function, the Church appears to have employed as much caution as energy. In the third and fourth centuries, questions of the what and the how of this instruction were mooted; and in the fifth and sixth centuries the settled practice began to develop its theory. See CYRIL: Catecheses; GREGORY of NYssa: Oratio Catechetica; CHRYsostOM: Catecheses ad Illuminandos; AUGUSTINE: De Catechizandis Rudibus. Comp. I. Mayer: Geschichte des Katechumenats und der Katechese in den ersten sechs Jahrhunderten, Kempten, 1868.

In the period from the sixth to the sixteenth century very little was done for catechetics and catechism. The missionary activity of the Church assumed an entirely new character. On the one side, the society in which Christianity was born, and in which it was now growing into supreme power, had been thoroughly christianized; infant baptism had become the rule; the catechumenate disappeared; the instruction in Christianity was left to the family, and the clergy gradually dropped those functions which characterize the catechist, developing only those which characterize the priest. On the other side, the Church carried on its mission among the barbarians in a peculiar wholesale style, which plainly shows that the kingdom of heaven had become a kingdom on earth, and meant to vindicate itself as such. Whole nations were converted by the sword, or as a natural consequence of the conversion of their ruler; and the great object of the Church was to subdue the masses under an external organization, which did next to nothing for the internal training of the individual. The grave shortcomings of the Roman-Catholic Church in this respect were felt; but very little was done to make up for the deficiency. The capitularies of Charlemagne and Louis the Pious, the councils of Lambeth (1291), Bezier (1340), and Tortosa (1429), ardently inculcated the duty of the priest to instruct his flock in the Christian faith. In the ninth century Ottfried wrote the so-called Weisenburg Catechism; in the eleventh, Bruno of Wurtzburg, a catechism in the form of questions and answers; in the fifteenth, John Gerson, his De Chriam Traditio; in the sixteenth, only among the heretical sects of the period, — the Cathari, Waldenses, Wicilites, Bohemian Brethren, etc., — that catechesis and catechetics still lived on, and bore fruit. Among them no child was allowed to grow up without being able to give an account of its faith; and in Bohemia there are traces of graded catechumenate similar to that of the ancient Church. It is apparent, however, as we approach the outbreak of the Reformation, that a feeling of the necessity of giving more and better religious instruction becomes more and more vivid in the Church; and not only have the Brethren of the Common Life done much good in this field, but all the reformers before the Reformation found here one of their principal practical issues.

How powerful the impulse was which catechetics (and, soon after, also catechetika) received in the beginning of the sixteenth century may be inferred from the sudden and almost contemporaneous appearance in all churches of the catechism; that is, a summary of the contents of the faith, drawn up under the authority of the Church, and destined to form the basis for oral instruction. [See Philip Schaff: Creeds of Christendom, New York, 1877, 3 vols.] In the Lutheran Church several attempts had been made, by Lalaing, in 1520, by Lefrançois in 1529, when Luther published his Larger and Smaller Catechism; but they were all superseded in 1529, when Luther published his Larger and Smaller Catechism, — the former destined for the minister and the schoolmaster, the latter for the people and the children; which two books soon became, and still are, the standard text-books in the Lutheran churches in Germany and Scandinavia. In the Reformed Church the Catechismus San-Galienensis appeared in 1527; the catechism of Ecolampadius and Leo Juda in 1534; that of Calvin, in 1536; and in 1563 that of Ursinus and Olevianus, the so-called Heidelberg Catechism, which became one of the symbolical books of the Dutch and German Reformed Churches in Europe and America. In the French Reformed Church various catechisms were used, — by Capell, 1619, Drelincourt, 1622, etc., — until in 1806 the Catechisme à l’Usage de toutes les Églises de l’Empire Francais was introduced. Even the Roman-Catholic Church felt the influence of this impulse. The catechism of Canisius appeared in 1554; that of Bellarmín, in 1603; that of Bossuet, in 1687, etc. The standard work, however, is the Catechismus Romanus ex Decreto Conc. Trident., published under the authority of Pius V., in 1668 [and translated into English by Donovan, Dublin, 1829].

The two great catechisms which the Reformation produced in England are that of the Episcopal Church and that of the Presbyterian Church. The former was prepared, after the Hampton Court Conference of 1604, by John Overall, or at least in part by him, and at the instance of James I., and it is still the standard text-book of the Church of England. The latter was prepared by the assembly of divines at Westminster, and appeared in a double form, — a smaller, 1648, and a larger, 1647. It is the standard text-book for all evangelical Nonconformists in England, and Presbyterians in America. Other but less successful attempts in the same field are, Cranmer’s Catechism (1549); but it was only another attempt, to say, A Christen Instruccion of the Principall Pointes of Christes Religion, 1551; King Edward VIth’s Catechisme, 1553; Alexander Noel: Catechismus sine prima Instituto Disciplinaque Pietatis.
CATENA.

CATENA (a chain). From the very first days of the Christian Church her teachers were deeply engaged in the study and exposition of Holy Writ; and the books of the Old Testament attracted the same attention, and carried the same authority, as those of the New Testament. In the early Church produced a comprehensive and most fertile exegete; and in the middle of the fifth century her literary activity reached its acme. Ambrose, Augustine, and Jerome labored at the same time in the Western Church; and such a mass of exegetical materials was produced as to make sifting, arrangement, and epitomizing, after the manner of the old scholiasts, absolutely necessary. Thus originated exegetical collections, which the Greeks called catenae (αποκλητικα φιλοσοφικων ερωτευμων, etc. while the Latins simply designated them as glossae, postilla, etc. while the Latins also, generally for the purpose only of warning against their propositions. So far as they quote from books which now are lost. The most important of the Greek catenae are: I. To the Old Testament. — One to the Octateuch, very rich, edited by Nicephorus, Archbishop of Philadelphia, Leipzig, 1775; 2 vols. fol.; one to the Gospels, of Theophylactus to the Gospels and the Apocalypse, all dating from the tenth century, have the character of catenae, though they are not altogether without independent productivity.

Once invented, the catena flourished during the whole period of the middle ages, and up to the latter part of the sixteenth century. Rich materials exist, scattered about in the various libraries; but only a small portion of it has as yet been examined and utilized. See J. A. Fabricius: Bibliotheca Graeca, Hamburg, 1718–28, VIII. p. 837 sqq.; J. A. Nesselret: De Catenis Patrum Graec., in his Opusc. ad Hist. Ecclesi., Halle, 1817; J. Morelli: Biblioth. Marc. Venet. Manser. Græc. et Lat., Bassani, 1802, I.; and his Cod. Graec. Muser. apud Nanios Patricios Venetos. Servanti, Bonn, 1781. On closer investigation, however, it appears that there were originally only a limited number of catenae, which were copied over and over again, and abbreviated or enlarged in a rather arbitrary manner by the copyists. Among the most prominent catena writers were Nicias, Bishop of Serrói in Macedonia, and afterwards metropolitan of Thrace (eleventh century), and Macarius Chrysophæus, metropolitan of Philadelphia (fourteenth century). There occur also catenæ in the vernacular tongues, — one in Low German, on Jesu Sirach; another in High German, on the New Testament, etc. The exegetical value of these works is very small; but, besides having interest as literary monuments of the age in which they originated, they are of importance to the text-critic, especially in cases in which they quote from books which now are lost.

As the Latin catena mostly quote from works which still exist, they are only of subordinate consequence, and need no further mention here. The most important of the Greek catenae are: I. To the Old Testament. — One to the Octateuch, very rich, edited by Nicephorus, Archbishop of Philadelphia, Leipzig, 1775; 2 vols. fol.; one to the Gospels, of Theophylactus to the Gospels and the Apocalypse.

According to general acceptance, the catena began in the West with Cassiodorus, from the end of the fifth century, and in the East with Procopius of Gaza, from the beginning of the sixth century. But this is hardly correct. The true catena consists merely of extracts from a greater or smaller number of exegetes, whose names are given after every quotation. The collector himself offers no opinion of his own. His business is simply to collect and arrange, and he makes changes only when he feels compelled to abbreviate or condense. The choice of authorities from whom to make extracts was individual and incidental; but prominent teachers — Origen, Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Cyrillus in the East, and Augustine in the West — were, of course, preferred. Also heretics were sometimes quoted, but generally for the purpose only of warning against their propositions. Some of the different catenæ from this, the true catena, is another kind of exegetical collections, in which the collector uses only one authority, whom he epitomizes, condenses, transcribes, etc. To this latter kind belong the works of Procopius, Cassiodorus, Primasius, Florus Magister, Beda, and Rhabanus Maurus; and they are the nearest predecessors of the true catena.

Once invented, the catena flourished during the whole period of the middle ages, and up to the latter part of the sixteenth century. Rich materials exist, scattered about in the various libraries; but only a small portion of it has as yet been examined and utilized. See J. A. Fabricius: Bibliotheca Graeca, Hamburg, 1718–28, VIII. p. 837 sqq.; J. A. Nesselret: De Catenis Patrum Graec., in his Opusc. ad Hist. Ecclesi., Halle, 1817; J. Morelli: Biblioth. Marc. Venet. Manser. Græc. et Lat., Bassani, 1802, I.; and his Cod. Graec. Muser. apud Nanios Patricios Venetos. Servanti, Bonn, 1781. On closer investigation, however, it appears that there were originally only a limited number of catenae, which were copied over and over again, and abbreviated or enlarged in a rather arbitrary manner by the copyists. Among the most prominent catena writers were Nicias, Bishop of Serrói in Macedonia, and afterwards metropolitan of Thrace (eleventh century), and Macarius Chrysophæus, metropolitan of Philadelphia (fourteenth century). There occur also catenæ in the vernacular tongues, — one in Low German, on Jesu Sirach; another in High German, on the New Testament, etc. The exegetical value of these works is very small; but, besides having interest as literary monuments of the age in which they originated, they are of importance to the text-critic, especially in cases in which they quote from books which now are lost.

As the Latin catena mostly quote from works which still exist, they are only of subordinate consequence, and need no further mention here. The most important of the Greek catenae are: I. To the Old Testament. — One to the Octateuch, very rich, edited by Nicephorus, Archbishop of Philadelphia, Leipzig, 1775; 2 vols. fol.; one to the Gospels, of Theophylactus to the Gospels and the Apocalypse. The name catenæ is of a later date. Formerly it was generally believed that Thomas Aquinas was the first to use it; but the title Catena Aurea, of the works of Procopius, Cassiodorus, Prisias, and such a mass of exegetical materials was produced as to make sifting, arrangement, and epitomizing, after the manner of the old scholiasts, absolutely necessary. Thus originated exegetical collections, which the Greeks called catenae (σακληρικα φιλοσοφικων ερωτευμων, etc.), while the Latins simply designated them as glossae, postilla, etc. While the Latins also, generally for the purpose only of warning against their propositions. So far as they quote from books which now are lost. The most important of the Greek catenae are: I. To the Old Testament. — One to the Octateuch, very rich, edited by Nicephorus, Archbishop of Philadelphia, Leipzig, 1775; 2 vols. fol.; one to the Gospels, of Theophylactus to the Gospels and the Apocalypse. The name catenæ is of a later date. Formerly it was generally believed that Thomas Aquinas was the first to use it; but the title Catena Aurea, of his work on the Gospels, does not belong to him: all the oldest editions have Glossa Continua, or Continuum.

According to general acceptance, the catena began in the West with Cassiodorus, from the end of the fifth century, and in the East with Procopius of Gaza, from the beginning of the sixth century. But this is hardly correct. The true catena consists merely of extracts from a greater or smaller number of exegetes, whose names are given after every quotation. The collector himself offers no opinion of his own. His business is simply to collect and arrange, and he makes changes only when he feels compelled to abbreviate or condense. The choice of authorities from whom to make extracts was individual and incidental; but prominent teachers — Origen, Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Cyrillus in the East, and Augustine in the West — were, of course, preferred. Also heretics were sometimes quoted, but generally for the purpose only of warning against their propositions. Some of the different catenæ from this, the true catena, is another kind of exegetical collections, in which the collector uses only one authority, whom he epitomizes, condenses, transcribes, etc. To this latter kind belong the works of Procopius, Cassiodorus, Primasius, Florus Magister, Beda, and Rhabanus Maurus; and they are the nearest predecessors of the true catena.
The powerful impulse which biblical exegesis received in the sixteenth century from the Reformation soon produced a great quantity of new exegetical materials; and in the seventeenth century exegetical collections were made which in all essential points show the character of the old catena. Such are the Biblia Magna, Paris, 1643, 5 vols. fol.; Biblia Maxima, Paris, 1660, 19 vols. fol.; Annotations upon all the Books of the Old and New Testaments, London, 1685, 2 vols. fol.; Pearson's Critici Sacri, London, 1690, 9 vols. fol.; Abb. Calovius: Biblia Illustrata, Francfort, 1672, 4 vols. fol. And, indeed, the exegetes of the Roman-Catholic Church have retained many of the features of the ancient catena up to this very day.

CATHARI (καθαροί, "the pure"). A dualistic sect which originated in Eastern Europe, independently of the Manicheans and Paulicians, but from the same source,—an intermingling of European and Asiatic ideas. Most probably they originated among the Slavs, and in some Bulgarian country; though Shaffarik, the great authority on Slav antiquities, while confirming the Slav origin, puts their birthplace in Dragowitz, in Southern Macedonia, where, at all events, they had a bishopric in the twelfth century. Thence they spread into Thrace, where they were known as the Bogomiles, into Dalmatia, Slavonia, Bulgaria, where the crusaders brought back to France the name Bulgari, or Bogares, and Albania, where the great split took place between the absolute dualists, the Albanenses, and those adopting a milder form of dualism, the Concorezenses (from Coriza in Dalmatia, or, according to Shaffarik, from Goriza in Albania). From the Slav countries in the Balkan peninsula, where they maintained themselves up to the latter part of the fifteenth century, when they were absorbed by Mohammedanism, they spread, during the middle ages, over all Europe, more especially over the southern part.

Travelling Slav merchants early brought the heresy to Italy. Though the first traces of the sect in the Western Church are found in France and Flanders, it is expressly affirmed that the new doctrines were brought from Italy only. In Italy the first Cathari were discovered in the Castle of Monteforte, near Turin, about 1035; and their chief Girardus, together with several others, was burnt. A century later on they had spread widely in Upper Italy, especially in Lombardy; and in 1167 Nicetas, the Bishop of the Cathari in Constantinople, came to Italy, on account of the schism between the Albanenses and the Concorezenses, and for the purpose of securing the firm adherence of the Italian Cathari to the doctrine of absolute dualism. In Milan and Florence, in Calabria and Sicily, even in the Papal States, they had churches, and at last also dioceses. Political circumstances were favorable to them; many powerful nobles protected them; for centuries they withstood all the exertions of the popes and the Inquisition. But it is an extraordinary fact in the history of the Church that even Aroax tried to make Dante a preacher among the Cathari, and the Divina Commedia an allegorical libel on the Roman Church (see his Dante Herétique, Révolutionnaire et Socialiste, Paris, 1854, and Cléof de la Comédie Anti-Catholique de Dante Alighieri, Paris, 1858). It is true, though, that one of the most active members of the sect, Armanno Pangiolo, from Ferrara, was very near being canonized by the Pope in the last years of the thirteenth century. Even late in the fourteenth century the Inquisition in Italy was busy persecuting the Cathari; but after that time they are not heard of any more in that country. Their name in Italy was not Cathari, however, but Patareni, from Pataria, an obscure street in Milan, the headquarters of the rag-pickers, where they held their secret assemblies.

Their principal seat in Western Europe the Cathari had in Southern France, where they were known as the Albigenes; which article see. Thence they penetrated into the northern provinces of Spain, where they numbered many adherents in the thirteenth century. To Germany they came partly from the East, from the Slav countries, partly from Flanders and Champagne. In 1052 several Cathari were condemned to death at Goslar. In 1146 Evervin, provost of Steinfeld, held a dialogue with the Cathari, but the disputation was interrupted by a mob, and the Cathari were murdered. Still the sect lived on in the regions along the Rhine, especially in Cologne and Bonn. In 1163 several of them were burnt, after the canon Echbert had tried in vain to convert them; and in 1231 a severe persecution broke out, under the leadership of the fanatical Dominican monk, Konrad of Marburg, from which event the sect is not mentioned again in Germany. The Waldenses, however, and the Brethren of the Free Spirit, seem to have found more easy access among the Germans, and maintained themselves in the country during the whole of the middle ages. In England the Cathari found very little sympathy. They came over in 1159 from Holland, and in 1210 some are said to have been discovered in London; but their influence was very insignificant.

The doctrinal system of the Cathari consists of some imperfect speculations concerning the nature and the origin of evil, physical as well as moral, mixed up with some curious mythological fancies about the creation of the world, of man, etc. This system was derived from the O. F. FRITSCHE.

of his own free will, had separated himself from the good. Both systems maintained themselves for a long time, as the difference between them concerned only the metaphysical part of the whole system, the theology proper, the cosmology, and the anthropopacity; while the morals, the rituals, and the ecclesiastical organization remained untouched by it, the same for both parties.

The moral system of the Cathari was thoroughly ascetic. Sin was defined as lust after that which is material; for matter was the work of Satan. The soul was created by God, and heaven was its home; but Satan had allureéd her down on earth, and locked her up in a material body to prevent her return to heaven. Natural life was consequently nothing but a term of penance. Any contact with matter was sin. Any act of the will which was not an abnegation of nature, a sacrifice of the material self, was a sin. To hold property, to keep intercourse with worldly men, to tell lies, to wage war, to kill animals (except those that creep), to eat flesh (except that of fishes), were deadly sins; and the greatest of all sins was generation, whether in or out of marriage. The extreme severity of this system was somewhat mitigated by a distinction between the perfecti and the credentes. Only the perfecti formed the Church proper, outside of which there was no salvation; and all were enjoined to enter this class, if not earlier, at least in the moment of death, by receiving the spiritual baptism, which was administered by a single imposition of hands, at which the perfecti broke and blessed the bread; while the extremes of severity of this system was somewhat mitigated by a distinction between the perfecti and the credentes. Only the perfecti formed the Church proper, outside of which there was no salvation; and all were enjoined to enter this class, if not earlier, at least in the moment of death, by receiving the spiritual baptism, which was administered by a single imposition of hands, and which was not a sacramentum, but only a consolamentum.

The ritual and ecclesiastical organization were exceedingly simple. There were no churches, but only oratories, without images, crosses, or bells. All the furniture and ornament which the building contained consisted of a plain table, covered with a white cloth, on which laid the Bible, opened at the Gospel of John. The service consisted of the reading and expounding of a chapter of the Bible, after which one of the perfecti blessed the kneeling assembly. There were no sacraments. The baptism with water was rejected as something insignificant. Instead of the Lord's Supper, a kind of agape was held, at which the perfecti broke and blessed the bread; but no reference was made by this act to the body of Christ. There were parishes and dioceses, with deacons and bishops: but the clergy had no power, spiritual or secular; and that which made the Cathari most odious, and most dangerous to the eyes of the Roman Church was, no doubt, their strongly pronounced anti-clerical tendency.

CATHARINA. CATHARINA OF SIENNA.

Eusebius tells (Hist. Eccl., VIII. 14–15) that she withstood all the adulterous attacks of the Emperor Maximinus, and for that reason was banished, and despoiled of all her property. But this does not agree either with the circumstance that Rufinus calls the Alexandrian lady Dorothea (Hist. Eccl., VIII. 17), or with the principal feature of the old legend such as it is recorded in the Martyrologium Romanum, and by Simeon Metaphrastes (Migne : Patrolog. Graec., T. 116, pp. 275–302). According to the legend, St. Catharina was the daughter of King Konstos, eighteen years old, and as wise as beautiful. She converted the philosophers with whom she held a disputation on the command of the emperor. She converted also the empress, the general Porphyrius, two hundred soldiers, etc.; and, when she was placed on a torturing engine composed of wheels, she was miraculously rescued. Finally she was beheaded; and her remains were carried by angels to Mount Sinai, where afterwards the emperor, Justinian I., built a monastery in her honor. She is the patron saint of the philosophical faculty of the University of Paris; and she was a favorite subject with the painters of the middle ages, who represented her with a crown, a book, a wheel, etc. Her festival is celebrated in some places on Nov. 25, in others on March 5. See SURIUS: Fīt. Sanct., Nov. 25; Act. Sanct. Boll., March 5; BUTLER : Lives of Saints, Nov. 25.

CATHARINA OF BOLOGNA, b. 1413; d. March 9, 1463; entered the order of St. Clara in 1430, and became afterwards abbess of one of the convents of the order. She was canonized in 1724 by Benedict XIII. A book of Revelations is ascribed to her. It was first printed at Venice, 1511. See Act. Sanct., March, T. II. pp. 34–88; BUTLER : Lives of Saints, March 9.

CATHARINA OF GENOA (Catharina Flisca Adorna Vida Genesinsis), b. 1447; d. Sept. 14, 1510; was a daughter of Robert Fieschi, vice-regent of Naples; married the dissipated Giuliano Adorno, but became a widow in 1474, and devoted the rest of her life to the poor and the sick. She was canonized by Clement XII. in 1737. She wrote Demonstratio Purgatorii, Dialogus Animam inter et Corpus, and other mystico-prophetical works of the kind quite common during the middle ages. See Act. Sanct., September, T. V. pp. 123–195; BUTLER : Lives of Saints, Sept. 14; UPHAM : Life of Catharina Adorna, New York, 1858.

CATHARINA OF SIENNA (Catharina Benincasa), b. 1347; d. April 29, 1359; assumed the habit of the Third Order of St. Dominic in 1365, and enjoyed, on account of the austerity of her asceticism and the ecstatic state of her mind, so great a fame that at several occasions she could play a conspicuous part in politics as mediator between Florence and Rome, between Urban VI. and Clement VII., between Rome and Naples, etc. She was canonized in 1461 by Pius II. Her festival is observed on April 30. She left three hundred and seventy-three letters addressed to popes, cardinals, princes, etc., six treatises under the common title of Tractatus de Contemplatione Domini, and many prayers, prophecies, etc., which were published by Aldus Manutius, Venice, 1500, and again by Girolamo Gigli, Sienna, 1707–26. A separate edition of the works, chronologically arranged, was CATHARINA OF SWEDEN (Catharina Suecica Vastausensis), b. 1381; d. March 24, 1381; was a daughter of St. Birgitta, whom she accompanied to the Holy Land, and succeeded as Abbess of Wadstena. When thirteen years old she was married to a young and pious nobleman; but immediately after the wedding they both made a solemn vow of perpetual chastity, and kept it. She wrote a book, The Soul's Comforter, which is lost. In 1374 she was canonized. Her festival falls on March 22. See Act. Sanct., March, T. III. pp. 503-531; Butler: Lives of Saints, March 22.

CATHARINA RICCI, b. 1522; d. Feb. 2, 1553; entered the Dominican order at Prato in Tuscany, and became prioress of the nunnery. She was canonized in 1746 by Benedict IV. Her letters were edited by Cesare Gnosti, Prato, 1848. Her life was written by illy Guidi, her confessor. See Butler: Lives of Saints, Feb. 13. CATHARINA of SWEDEN (Catharina Suecica de Senis), b. 1331; d. March 24, 1381; was a daughter of St. Birgitta, whom she accompanied to the Holy Land, and succeeded as Abbess of Wadstena. When thirteen years old she was married to a young and pious nobleman; but immediately after the wedding they both made a solemn vow of perpetual chastity, and kept it. She wrote a book, The Soul's Comforter, which is lost. In 1374 she was canonized. Her festival falls on March 22. See Act. Sanct., March, T. III. pp. 503-531; Butler: Lives of Saints, March 22.

CATHEDRA and CATHEDRAL. Cathedra, in ecclesiastical usage, meant originally simply the episcopal throne or chair placed against the wall in the middle of the semicircular apsis, with a row of lower seats for the presbyters on each side, and so that the priest officiating at the altar faced the bishop. Afterwards the word was applied, first to the see itself, and then to the very building in which the bishop officiated, ecclesia cathedralis, in contradistinction to ecclesia diocesan. Thus the transition was made to the use, now so general, of the adjective "cathedral" in a substantive sense,—a usage which dates from the tenth century, and is confined to the Western Church.

CATHOLIC (throughout-all, i.e. general, universal). This word early came into use among Christians to distinguish their church from the Jewish, which was national: later on, it distinguished the orthodox church from the heretical sects. In modern times it has been arrogantly and absurdly claimed by the Church of Rome; and Protestants usually call her so, although it was nearer truth to say the Roman-Catholic Church. The phrase in the Apostles' Creed, "the Holy Catholic Church," is often ignorantly supposed to refer to the Roman Church; but the word "catholic" merely means "universal," and was not in the first form of the creed. The phrase is correctly explained by what follows,—"the communion of saints:" thus it simply expresses a belief that the Holy Church, the communion of saints, is not confined to one nation, but, by the appointment and help of Christ, shall be disseminated through all nations. Cf. Pearson, On the Creed, Art. IX.

CATHOLIC APOSTOLIC CHURCH, or IRVINGITES. The man to give the strongest, if not the first, impulse to this religious movement, was Edward Irving (1792-1834, see title), although he is little mentioned by the writers of this Church, who regard him merely as a forerunner, and not as the founder of their community. The historic occasion for the Apostolic Church was the manifestations which occurred in the spring of 1830, on the shores of the Clyde, among some pious Presbyterian men and women, who believed that their organs of speech were used by the Holy Spirit for the utterance of his thoughts and intentions. The same took place in London: in April, 1831, the same took place in London. The "prophesying" were addressed to the audience in intelligible English, and were like Quaker utterances; but the "tongues" were monologues or dialogues between the speaker and God, which no one could understand. Toward the end of 1832 a considerable number of persons had become believers in the supernatural character and divine origin of these spiritual phenomena, and, further, convinced that it was the will of God the apostolic office should be restored. God was believed to indicate who should be put in this office; and "by the middle of 1835 the full number (twelve) was completed, and they entered, as a twelfth Apostolic College, on the work of caring for the whole Christian Church." From these apostles this church has received its doctrine, organization, and worship. In doctrine it is eclectic. Its advocates make a great deal out of the second coming of Christ, which they think is very near: they believe in baptismal regeneration, and the spiritual presence of Christ in the Supper, with the additions that the elements after consecration have a heavenly and spiritual as well as a material character, and that the eucharist is not only a sacrament, but a sacrifice, in the patristic sense of a thanksgiving. With them it is also connected with a commemoration of the departed. They lay stress upon the ecumenical creeds, and embody them in their worship. In organization this church is very elaborate—apostles, prophets, and evangelists, for the general care of the church, and angels (or bishops), presbyters (priests), and deacons, for the care of particular congregations. All officers are called by the Holy Ghost, through the prophets, except the deacons, who are elected by the respective congregations as their representatives. In worship, as in doctrine and organization, it is eclectic and elaborate. It is highly ritualistic, with a solemn liturgy, based upon the Anglican and ancient Greek, and its symbolism, derived from a fanciful interpretation of the Jewish tabernacle as a type of the worship of the Christian Church in the wilderness. In its hierarchical constitution and ritualistic worship consists the chief peculiarity of this community. They are, upon the whole, the highest of High-Churchmen; and have, indeed, most sympathy with the Episcopal Church, from which they received the majority of their original members. Their main strength is in London, where they have seven churches, after the model of the seven churches of Asia; but they are also found throughout Great Britain and in North Germany; and they have one church in New-York City, but very few adherents in the country.

This church combines a high order of piety and humility of individual members with astonishing assumptions, which, if well founded, would require the submission of all Christendom to the authority of its inspired apostles. But, as these die, their vacancies are not filled; soon there will be none left, and then the church at large will be no better off than it was before the movement began.

CATHOLIC EMANCIPATION, the name given to the Act of Parliament, April 13, 1828, which removed from the Roman Catholics, particularly those of Ireland, the political disabilities which had lain upon them. The Act was one of simple justice; but the tardiness of its execution is a striking instance of the existence in Protestantism of that grasping, persecuting, intolerant spirit so commonly condemned by Protestants as a Roman-Catholic spirit. From their subjugation in 1691, down to the Act, Roman Catholics in Ireland were grievously oppressed. No Roman Catholic could act as guardian for any child; a son turning Protestant could dispossess his father, and take the estate; a Roman-Catholic heir to a landed property was to be set aside in event of the next Protestant heir; no office, military or civil, could be held by a Roman Catholic; he could not vote, or marry a Protestant wife; he could not practise law, or teach school; a priest marrying a Roman Catholic and a Protestant was to be hanged. Such was the law; but the practice was naturally much milder, and several of these wicked laws were repealed by the Irish Parliament of 1790. In 1806 came the Union. Mr. Pitt pleaded himself to secure an act of emancipation, but failed; and not until the agitation of O'Connell and the Catholic Association awoke the usually slumbering conscience of Great Britain about all that relates to Ireland was anything done. But when aroused, the British are always fair; and so the measure of relief was triumphantly passed. See sub Titulo Johnson's Cyclopædia.

CATHOLIC EPSILATES. Seven epistles — those of James, First and Second Peter, First, Second, and Third John, and Jude — are so denominated. Three explanations, none very satisfactory, have been given of the term: 1. Because these epistles are "general letters of instruction, the name being at first applied only to a part, but afterwards including even those addressed to private person;" 2. Because the different apostles were engaged in writing them; 3. Because of the catholic doctrine taught in them: 4. The First Epistle of Peter, and the First Epistle of John, having from the beginning been received as authentic, obtained the name of catholic, or universally acknowledged (and therefore canonical), epistles, in order to distinguish them from the Epistles of James, the second of Peter, the second and third of John, and the Epistle of Jude, concerning which doubts were at first entertained; and they were considered by many as not being a rule of faith. But, their authenticity being at length acknowledged by the generality of the churches, they also obtained the name of catholic, or universally accepted, epistles, and were esteemed of equal authority with the rest. Horne: Introduction (14th ed., London, 1877, vol. iv. p. 589).

CATHOLIC or UNITED COPTS, that portion of the Coptic Church which acknowledges the supremacy of the Pope. They numbered (1879) about thirteen thousand.

CATHOLICUS was, in the time of Constantine, a civil officer established after the organization by law of dioceses; each diocese having its catholicus, or receiver-general. As an ecclesiastical officer occurring in several Eastern churches, the catholicus occupied a position between the metropolitan and the patriarch. The Armenian Church has still three catholicus, — at Etchmiadzin, Ayhtamar, and Sis.

CATTLE-RAISING AMONG THE HEBREWS. From the Bible we know that the patriarchs led a pastoral life. Their descendants continued this life, in connection with agriculture, even after the taking of Canaan. From 1 Sam. xx. 2, 1 Kings v. 3, 5, 63, and other passages, we get an idea of the extent of cattle-breeding which existed at different times. We confine ourselves to speaking of those kinds which were generally used in the house and for sacrificial purposes; viz., —

(1) Neat-Cattle, collectively designated by the Hebrew word bakar. Single animals of this kind are alitup, an "ox," or shoar, a "bullock;" the calves are styled c'gel, a "heifer," also a young cow, even when broke to the yoke (Judg. xiv. 18; Hos. x. 11), and para, even when grown, but still in full youthful vigor. There was a great demand for neat-cattle: many hundreds were yearly slaughtered in sacrifice; others were employed for food, especially veal (e.g., Deut. xii. 21; 2 Sam. xiii. 4; 1 Kings iv. 23), although, among some ancient nations, it was regarded as an act of wanton prodigality to slay useful agricultural beasts in order to enjoy their flesh. The milk was used either sweet or curdled, and was made also into cheese. Cattle were yoked to the plough (Deut. xxiii. 10; 1 Kings xix. 19 sq.), likewise for draught (Num. vii. 3 sq.), but more especially for threshing. They were driven with a pointed stick. During summer, cattle ranged under the open sky. In the stalls their fodder was placed in a crib. Besides fresh grass and meadow-plants (Dan. iv. 29; Num. xxiii. 4), meslin (Job vi. 5; Isa. xxx. 24, to which salt was also added, Isa. l. c.) is mentioned.
Concerning the cattle the following legal enactments were given:

1. An ox and an ass must not be yoked together to the plough (Deut. xxii. 10); 2. The mouth of the threshing-oxen was not to be bound (Deut. xxv. 4); 3. A going ox was to be stoned, and his flesh not to be eaten (Exod. xxii. 28 sq.); 4. Whoever stole, and then sold or slaughtered, an ox, must give five oxen in satisfaction (Exod. xxii. 1); but, if the animal was found alive in the possession of the thief, he was merely required to make double restitution (Exod. xxii. 4); 5. Whoever met an ox that had fallen or strayed was made to restore it (Deut. xxi. 4); but, if the animal was found alive in the possession of the thief, he was merely required to make double restitution (Exod. xxii. 4); 6. The law of the sabbath had also reference to the cattle (Exod. xxiii. 12).

Sheep-breeding formed the chief employment of the Hebrews. The flesh of the sheep, especially that of wethers and lambs, was a highly esteemed food (1 Sam. xxv. 18; Isa. xxii. 13). The milk of sheep, as well as their wool, was also made use of; the former for culinary purposes, the latter for garments. Sheep-shearing was a rural festive occasion (1 Sam. xxiv. 4; 2 Sam. xiii. 20); of the wool, tithes were to be paid (Deut. xviii. 4). The color of sheep is in the East generally white (Isa. i. 18); although black ones are also found (Gen. xxx. 32), as well as spotted and grizzled.

Along with the sheep are classed the goats. They were used not only for sacrifice, but also for food (Deut. xiv. 4). Their milk was also used (Prov. xxvii. 27), it being more wholesome than that of sheep. Their skins were employed as clothing by poor persons (Heb. xi. 37), whilst their hair was often the material of tent-cloth (Exod. xxxvi. 7) as well as of mattresses and bedding (1 Sam. xix. 13, 10). On the Mosaic enactment respecting cooking a kid in its mother's milk (comp. Exod. xxxii. 19, xxxvi. 26; Deut. xxiv. 21), comp. the art. Viehzucht, in Herzog's Real-Encyklopädie (1sted.) by Leyrer.

Cave was uncritical, but extremely industrious. He did not know how to use the collections he made; but others, such as Mohler, have drawn from his reservoir. So, although he was not a scientific patristic scholar, he yet greatly helped patristic learning.

CAWDREY, Daniel, a Nonconformist; d. October, 1664; educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge; ejected from his living of Dilling, in Northamptonshire, 1662; a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and author of numerous works of a controversial character, principally against the literalism of the Church of England, against independency, and also of a work on the sabbath, which was his masterpiece.

CAVET, Pierre Victor Palma, b. at Mont- richard in Touraine, 1529; d. in Paris, 1619; studied at Geneva; was ordained minister at Poitiers, and became chaplain to Catherine of Bourbon, but was deposed by the thirteenth general synod (1594) on account of two scandalous treatises he wrote on sins against the Sixth Commandment; embraced Romanism, and was made professor of Hebrew in the Sorbonne. The Reformed monstresses and Anabaptists to whom he addressed his former co-religionists attracted no attention; and he is now known only on account of his historical works,—the Chronologie Novenaire, 1608, and the Chronologie Septenaire, 1608, and his translation of the German tale of Dr. Faustus.

CAZALLA, Augustin, b. 1506; d. May 21, 1559; studied at Valladolid and Alcala; became a pupil of Carranza, and was in 1543 appointed chaplain and almoner to Charles V. At the outbreak of the Smalcaldian war he accompanied the emperor to Germany, and returned in 1552 to Spain,—a Lutheran. He preached his new ideas in Valla- dolid and Salamanca with more and more openness, but was in 1558 arrested by the Inquisition, brought before the tribunal, and condemned to death, together with his mother, brethren, sisters, and a large circle of friends. At the Auto da fé some of the guilty were burnt alive; but others, among whom Augustin, were first strangled before they were burnt.

Cave was uncritical, but extremely industrious. He did not know how to use the collections he made; but others, such as Mohler, have drawn from his reservoir. So, although he was not a scientific patristic scholar, he yet greatly helped patristic learning.

CEILLIER, Remi, b. 1688; d. 1761; entered the Congregation of Saint Vannes (Reformed Benedictine) in 1715, and published Histoire Générale des Auteurs Sacrés et Ecclésiastiques, 23 vols., Paris, 1729–93.

CELESTIN III. was more successful. The latter addressed the Bishop of Rome as the supreme judge and arbiter of the Christian church; and Celestine was not slow in condemning Nestorius, and intrusting the necessary energy, though the case was a breach of international law, and the Pope just based his claims to political supremacy on his office as the guardian of international law.

CELESTINE I. was the name of five popes. — Celestine I., Sept. 26, 1143–March 8, 1144. — Celestine II., Sept. 26, 1144–March 8, 1144. — Celestine III., March 30, 1191–Jan. 8, 1199; began his pontificate in the fourth century, and continued during his whole reign to be contemptuously dependent on the emperor. Even in the case of Richard I. of England, who on his return from the Holy Land was taken prisoner by Duke Leopold of Austria, he dared not interfere with the necessary energy, though the case was a breach of international law, and the Pope just based his claims to political supremacy on his office as the guardian of international law.

CELESTINES, The, a monastic order, founded in 1254 by Pietro di Murrone, afterwards Pope Celestine V., followed the rule of St. Benedict, and spread rapidly in Germany, France, and Italy; but at present there are only a few convents left. There is a Franciscan congregation which bears the same name.

CELIBACY. In the Roman Church, is the state of virginity to which a person pledges himself, either by a special vow, or by receiving the consecration of one of the higher ecclesiastical orders. The Jewish priests and high priests lived in marriage; but, on account of the holiness of their office, they were forbidden to marry a harlot, a profane or a divorced woman. The high priest was to be a man without blemish (Lev. xxi. 6, 7. 8, 13. 14; comp. SAALCHUTZ: Das Mosaische Recht, II. 768–788). When preparing for actual service they were furthermore demanded to abstain from their wives, as was the whole people at the time when the law was given them on Mount Sinai (Exod. xix. 15; comp. SPENCER: De Legibus Hebraeorum Ritualibus, Tubingen, 1732, pp. 189 sqq.). The holy books of the new dispensation contain no prohibition of marriage. Several of the apostles were married (Matt. viii. 14; 1 Cor. ix. 5), and recommended even the chief of the congregation to marry (1 Tim. iii. 2), though without overlooking, that, under certain circumstances, it would be better not to marry (1 Cor. vii. 30). From this last notice and others of the same bearing, there arose very early in the Church an idea that the unmarried state ought to be preferred to the married (Hermas, lib. I. vision II. 3; Ignatius ad Polycarp. c. V.), and the idea soon developed into actual contempt of marriage (Origines in Num. Hom. VI., ed. de la Rue, Tom. II. p. 288; Hieronymus ad Jovinianum, I. 4). Already, in the second century, instances occur of voluntary vows of virginity; and the demand of abstinence before officiating was generally acknowledged as just (comp. SCHWEGLER: Der Montanismus, Tubingen, 1841, p. 122). In the fifth century, laws were issued with the same tendency, such as c. 1, Conc. Neocesarea. a. 314 (c. 0, dist. XXVIII.); c. 10, Conc. Ancyra. a. 314 (c. 8, ed.). Unmarried men were preferred for ecclesiastical offices, though ecclesiastics were as yet not forbidden to marry: nay, it was even forbidden to dissolve a marriage for religious reasons (c. 5 Apostolorum in c. 14, dist. XXVIII.); comp. the account of the close of the Council of Nicaea by SOCRATES, Hist. Eccl. lib. I. c. 11, and SOZOMENUS, Historia Tripartita, lib. I. c. 23, in c. 12, dist. XXXI.).

Celestius, Bishop of Rome in 385, declared (Ad Himerium Tarraconensem, Ep. I. c. 7, in c. 3, 4 dist. LXXXI.), that, under the old dispensation, the priest's marriage had been allowed because priests could be taken only from the tribe of Levi; but with the abrogation of this limit also the license was abrogated, as the obserance cupidityates, i.e., marriage, greatly impeded the ecclesiastical duties. The next bishops of Rome followed in the same track (see the decreets of Innocent I. from 404 and 405 in c. 4–6, dist. XXXI. and of Leo I. from 446 and 458 in c. 1, dist. XXXII. and c. 10, dist. XXXXI., etc.), and the whole Western Church soon joined issue with Rome (Conc. Carthag., II. a. 390, c. 2 in c. 3, dist. XXXI., c. 3, dist. LXXXIV.; Conc. Carthag., V. a. 401, c. 3 in c. 13, dist. XXXXI., c. 4, dist. LXXXIV., etc.). The prohibition regarded at first only bishops, priests, and deacons, but from the fifth century also subdeacons, who were not allowed to enter into marriage after ordination (Leo I., a. 446 in c. 1, dist. XXXII.; Gregory I., a. 501 and 503 in c. 1, dist. XXXI., c. 2, dist. XXXII., etc.; and Conc. Agath. a. 506, c. 39 in c. 19, dist. XXXIV.). The clergy of the lower orders were allowed to marry, though not widows, or for a second time (Conc. Carthag., V. a. 401, c. 3 in c. 13, dist. XXXII.; Gregory I. a. 601 in c. 3 ced.). The civil law confirmed these ordinances. Married persons, or such as had children, could not be elected bishops. The marriage of the clergy was highly punished. The marriage of the clergy was declared null and void, and the children sprung from such a marriage illegitimate (c. 10, 14 Cod. Theod. de Episcopis et Clericis by Constantius and Constans, a. 355 and 357; Theodosius and Valentinian, a. 434 came so formidable a weapon in the hands of the Reformation, simple prohibition, in the form of destruction of books already printed, proved impractical; and presently measures taking effect before the publication were resorted to. It was the Roman Church which introduced the censorship of books. In a letter addressed to the Archbishops of Cologne, Mayence, Treves, and Magdeburg, Alexander VI. ordered, in 1501, that no book should be printed without special authorization. In 1515 the Council of the Lateran decreed that no book should be printed without having been examined, in Rome, by the Pope or the magister sacri palatinii; in the other dioceses, by the bishop, or the inquisitor of heresies. Further and more detailed legislation followed, and the Council of Trent sanctioned the measures by its decretum de editione et usu sacrorum librorum. But while the State, which at first adopted the institution, and used it for its own purposes, afterwards abolished it as inadequate and vicious (in which it was followed by the Papacy), the Roman Church still maintains it in all its rigor. No ecclesiastic is permitted to publish any thing without the authorization of his superior.

As the Roman Church could exercise no censorship over the literatures of Protestant countries, it was necessary to continue the old prohibition. By the Council of Trent the whole subject-matter had been placed in the hands of a committee; and the results of the labors of this committee, which were never laid before the council, but sent directly to the Pope, were the ten rules concerning prohibited books and the Index Librorum Prohibitorum. The rules have been further enlarged and improved by Clement VIII., Sixtus V., Alexander VII., and especially by Benedict XIV., by his constitution of July 10, 1753. The Index was continued by a Congregatio Juristic. But it has never been acknowledged in Germany, and in France it has been formally rejected (see De l’Autorité de l’Index en France, Paris, 1833). Besides its Index Libr. Prohib., the Roman Church also keeps an Index Libr. Expurgatorum and an Index Libr. Expurgandorum.

CENSUS. In the Old Testament there is mention made of twelve censuses: 1. Under Moses (Exod. xxxviii. 26; Num. i. 2, xxvi.); 2. Under David (2. Sam. xxiv. 9); 3. Under Solomon (2 Chron. ii. 17, 18); 4. Rehoboam (1 Kings xii. 21); 5. Abijah (2 Chron. xiii. 9); 6. Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii. 14-19); 7. Ahaziah (2 Chron. xxv. 5, 6); 8. Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi. 13); 12. Under Jerubbabel (Ez. ii. 64, viii. 1-14). Some important facts are evinced by a scrutiny of these passages: e.g., the kingdom of Judah was largest under Jehoshaphat; the ratio of population was five hundred and thirty to the square mile, a dense population; but Palestine had a very fertile soil; nor is the number unparalleled in modern times.

In the New Testament, there is incidental reference to the census of the Roman Empire ordered by Caesar Augustus, in the days of that king (Luke ii. 1). We know that there were at least three such enrolments during his reign. The Roman method differed from the Jewish in requiring the enrolment of women; hence Joseph takes Mary with him to Bethlehem, and there Jesus is born. Thus upon the peculiar sanctity of the Roman census, we must regard it as the historical birth of Jesus depended. The ultimate object of the census was taxation: this design was probably at first concealed, for there is no recorded outbreak under Herod; but one later on occurred (Acts v. 37). For critical questions and difficulties in connection with Luke’s statement, see Quirinius.

CENTRAL AMERICA comprises, geographically, Guatemala, Honduras, San Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Panama, and the British Colony Honduras or Balize; but politically Panama belongs to Columbia. The number of inhabitants is only approximately: Guatemala, 1,194,000; British Honduras, 24,700; Honduras, 351,700; San Salvador, 600,000; Nicaragua, 250,000; Costa Rica, 165,000. The majority of the population are Indians. The whites, descendants of the Spaniards, form only a small minority, and the Ladinos, a mixture of Indians and Europeans, another minority equally small. The general standard of civilization has been considerably lowered in these states since their separation from the mother-country; and the cause is undoubtedly the want of treatment which the Church experienced during the Revolution and the next following decades. The property of the Church was confiscated, the monasteries were abolished, the monks banished, and the secular clergy heavily persecuted. The clergy still represents nearly all the civilization which the nation possesses; but, impoverished and down-trodden as it is, it can exercise no decisive influence, though the mass of the people is fervently devoted to the Church. At the head of the clergy stands the Archbishop of Guatemala; his suffragans are the Bishops of Leon (Nicaragua), Comayagua (Honduras), San Salvador, and San Jose (Costa Rica). The legal position of the Protant States is somewhat different in the different states. Guatemalans and Costa Ricans concluded in 1852 concordats with the Pope. In Guatemala the monastic orders, even the Jesuits, were allowed to return, and the Jesuits take care of the public education. In the city of Guatemala there is a university, the best educational institution in Central America. In Costa Rica the Roman-Catholic faith was declared the religion of the republic, but the Jesuits were not admitted. In both states free worship has been secured to the Protestants. In Honduras, San Salvador, and Nicaragua, the Church has suffered exceedingly from poverty. It has no regular revenue, and the tax which is levied in San Salvador under the name of “Religious Gift” has proved a barren source. A great number of the clergy are ignorant negroes. In Honduras the Protestant Church has the exclusive right of public worship; but other denominations are allowed to worship in private.

CENTURIE MAGDEBURGENSIS (" The Magdeburg Centuries "). The first, and, for a long time, unsurpassed attempt to write the history of the Church from an evangelical point of view, was planned by Flacius, and executed by him and a number of other scholars,—Johann Wigand, Matthæus Judex, Basilius Faber, Andreas Corvinus, Thomas Holzhauser, etc. The headquarters of the enterprise was Magdeburg, and hence the name under which the work is generally known, though its real title is Ecclesiastica Historia Noæ Testamenti. It was printed at Basel, and appeared in thirteen volumes folio, from 1538 to 1574. It comprises the thirteen first centuries of the history of the Church, and gives a volume to each century, arranging the materials under the following fifteen heads: de loco et propagatione ecclesiae; de persecutione et tranquillitate ejus; de doctrina ejusque inclinatione; de heresibus; de carennonis dieris in locis; de gubernatione ecclesiae; de schismatibus et sermonibus; de concilia; de personis illustribus in ecclesiae; de hereticis; de martyribus; de miraculis; de rebus judaicis externis; etcertaminibus levioribus; de conciliis; de personis et doctrina ejusque continuance; de haeresibus; de caeremoniis diversis persecutione et tranquillitate ejus; de doctrina ejusque continuance; and repulsive, the arrangement mechanical and awkward, the tone controversial; but the learning is immense, the criticism bold and upright, the spirit enthusiastic; and thus it became, in spite of its defects, the inauguration of the free study of church-history. See BAUR: Die Epochen d. kirch. Geschichtschreibung, Tubingen, 1852; SCHAF: Church History, vol. I. p. 97, revised edition, New York, 1892.

CEOLFRED, b. about 612 in the kingdom of Northumberland; d. at Langres, France, Sept. 25, 716; was abbot, first of Jarrow, and afterwards of Jarrow and Wearmouth. A letter by him, addressed to Naiton, King of the Picts, has been preserved by Bede (Hist. Eccl., W. 21). His life was written by an anonymous contemporary printed in Stephenson's edition of Bede, and by Bede in his Lives of the Five First Abbots of Wearmouth and Jarrow.

CERDÈ, a Gnostic teacher from the second century, the predecessor of Marcion, and known only through him; was a native of Syria, and came about 137 to Rome, where Marcion became his pupil. He left no writings. See GNOSTICISM.

CERINTHUS, a Gnostic teacher who came from Egypt, and was active in Asia Minor towards the close of the apostolic age. He was a converted Jew, and represents a mixture of Gnostic and Judaism. He left no writings, and the sect he founded soon died out. See GNOSTICISM and JOHN THE APOSTLE.

CESTIUS GALLUS was procurator provinciae in Syria when the Jewish rebellion, which ended with the destruction of the temple, broke out. From Antioch he moved slowly towards Jerusalem; and though he easily drove the Jews back to the upper part of the city, and every thing seemed to indicate a rapid close of the campaign, he suddenly retired, hastened in the rear by the exultant Jews. When Nerva heard of these proceedings, he immediately sent Vespasian to Palestine to take the command; but Gallus died before Vespasian's arrival.

CHADERTON, Laurence, the first master of Emmanuel College, Cambridge; b. at Lees Hall, Lancashire, Sept. 14, 1536; d. November, 1640. He was born of a Roman-Catholic family, and was distributed when a young man to the established Church. He was a fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge, and preached in Cambridge for many years with great applause. Sir Walter Mildmay, on refounding Emmanuel College in 1584, chose him for master, and, indeed, continued the continuation of the foundation upon his acceptance. He was one of the five Puritan representatives in the Hampton Court Conference (see title), and also one of the Bible translators, translating from Chronicles to Canticles inclusive. He published a treatise On Justification, and a sermon preached at St. Paul's Cross in 1578. Some other of his theological works remain in manuscript.

CHALDEANS. In the Old Testament, from the time of Jeremiah and the establishment of the new Babylonian Empire under Nabopolassar and Nabuchadrezzar, the terms Chaldeans and Chaldeans denote the inhabitants of Babylonia, or the culture region bounded by the Tigris and Euphrates, or by the Persian Gulf, or by the desert to the eastward. When the Book of Daniel (i. 2, 5, 10, iv. 4, v. 7, 11), and the profane historians Curtius, Strabo, and Diodorus, speak of the Chaldeans as the learned class of the Babylonian people, or even as a peculiar section of this class, the astral terminology has no foundation whatever in reality. See, for further information, ASSYRIA, BABYLONIA, etc. (Add to literature under ASSYRIA, Assyriologische Bibliothek, ed. by FREDRICH DELITZSCH and PAUL HAUPF, in course of publication at Leipzig since 1881.)

CHALCEDON, a city of Bithynia, on the Bosporus, near Constantinople. Here the fourth oecumenical council was convened (451) by the Emperor Marcianus. Six hundred and thirty bishops were present (mostly from the Orient), the legates of the Pope Leo I., and the commissioners of the emperor. The sessions began Oct. 8, and ended Oct. 31. The principal result of the debates was the condemnation of Eutychianism, and the symbolic statement of the orthodox Christology. See CHRISTOLOGY.

CHALMERS, Thomas, the leader of the Free Church of Scotland; b. in East Anstruther, Fife-shire, March 17, 1780; d. in Edinburgh, Sunday night, May 30, 1847. The family to which he belonged were middle-class people of the strictest type of Calvinism; and hence, in his opening years, received thorough indoctrination. He entered St. Andrew’s University when only eleven years old, and confined his attention almost exclusively to mathematics, but did not give up his original intention of becoming a preacher, and accordingly was licensed by the presbytery of St. Andrew’s, January, 1799. His character early developed into maturity. Instead of beginning his professional work, he continued the study of mathematics, but did not give up his according was licensed by the presbytery of St. and accordingly was licensed by the presbytery of St. Andrew’s. He showed an extraordinary power to awaken enthusiasm in almost any topic he took up; although showed an extraordinary power to awaken enthusiasm in almost any topic he took up; although this very fact which at that time cost him his place, the authorities disliked the novelty of his methods. He settled as minister of Kilmarnock, nine miles from St. Andrew’s, May, 1803, and in the following winter, while preaching regularly, opened voluntary and independent classes in mathematics at the university, which were largely attended, although generally discouraged by the authorities. He was a faithful pastor at Kilmarnock, but his heart was not in his work. He was tampered with the prevailing modernism, which put culture above piety, and states support above independence. In 1809 evidence of the trend of his thinking appeared in his Inquiry into the Extent and Stability of National Resources. The supply of man's physical and social needs was uppermost in his mind. But God was preparing him by these very studies for a glorious career of divine service. In the midst of such work he was visited with severe domestic afflictions, and a serious illness brought him to death's door; but he recovered after a year. Dr. Brewster asked him to contribute to his Edinburgh Encyclopedia. He at first chose ‘Trigonometry,’ but at length took ‘Christianity.’ And as he examined the doctrines of this religion, and went deeper into its mysteries, he realized its importance, and by studying about Christianity he became a Christian. The congregation quickly became aware that he had really not so much resumed his work among them as begun it. His whole soul was on fire, and the culture was now used to make the saving truth of saving power. He cut loose from the moorings of modernism, and became a decided Evangelical. His eloquence was expanded in new channels, and with great results.

In July, 1810, he was formally admitted as minister of the Tron Church, Glasgow. In 1813 he delivered the famous series of seven Discourses on the Christian Revelation, viewed in Connection with Modern Astronomy. In September, 1819, he was formally admitted as minister of the Tron Church, Glasgow. In 1813 he delivered the famous series of seven Discourses on the Christian Revelation, viewed in Connection with Modern Astronomy. In September, 1819, he was removed from the Tron parish to that of St. John’s, in order that he might, in a newly-constituted parish, have an opportunity of testing the practicability in a large city of the old Scottish scheme of providing for the poor. In the parish there were two thousand families. These he distributed into twenty-five divisions; and over each such district he put an elder and a deacon, — the former to attend to their spiritual, the latter to their temporal, needs. Two commodious schoolhouses were built; four competent teachers were employed, and by school-fees of two and three shillings each per quarter, seven hundred children were educated; while on Sunday the forty or fifty local clerics, and all the clergy within a hundred miles around, were present. Dr. Chalmers not only presided over all this system of work, but made himself familiar with all the details, even visiting personally every two years each family in the parish, and holding evening meetings. He also assumed complete charge of the poor; and by thorough system, and consequent weeding-out of unworthy cases, he reduced the cost of maintaining them from fourteen hundred to two hundred and eighty pounds per annum. This efficient system, however, began to wear thin; and the “English” plan of compulsory assessments, which requires much less trouble, and probably does much less good, was substituted. In November, 1823, Dr. Chalmers became professor of moral philosophy in St. Andrew’s University, and in November, 1826, professor of theology in Edinburgh. In 1833 he issued his Bridgewater Treatise, On the Adaptation of External Nature to the Moral and Intellectual Constitution of Man. This work made a great sensation; and his biographer, Rev. Dr. Hanna, says, that, in consequence, he received “literary honor, as were never united previously in the person of any Scottish ecclesiastic.” In 1834 he was elected fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and soon after one of its vice-presidents, in the same year a corresponding member of the institute of France; and in 1835 the University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.C.L.

Up to this time he had taken little part in church government; from then on he was destined to do more than any other man of the century. Chamier, Daniel, b. 1565; d. Oct. 17, 1621; studied theology at Geneva, and had charge of various Reformed congregations in France, at last in Montauban, where, during the siege, he was killed by a cannon-ball. He distinguished himself by the courage and energy with which he fought for the rights of his church at every occasion, but especially during the discussions which preceded the Edict of Nantes. His writings, which are mostly polemical, comprise Deputé de la Vocation des Ministres en l'Eglise Réformée, Larochelle, 1598; Epistola Jenaica, Geneva, 1598; La Honte de Babylon, Larochelle, 1612; Pansalutis Catholicae, unfinished, published by his son, Geneva, 1626, etc. See Memoir of D. Chamier, London, 1852; Read: Daniel Chamier, Paris, 1858.

Chandez, Antoine de la Roche, b. at the Château de Chabot in Mâconois (Sone-Loire), 1634; d. at Geneva, Feb. 23, 1501; embraced the Reformation; studied theology at Geneva; was the minister of the Reformed congregation of Paris, 1555-62, and convoked the first national synod of the Reformed Church in France, Paris, May 26, 1559; retired in 1564 to his estates in Mâconois, but did not cease to take the most active part in all the business of the Reformed Church, in the synods, and at the court, as a preacher and as an author; fled to Switzerland after the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, and lived, first in Lausanne, afterwards in Geneva, as professor of Hebrew. His principal works are, Histoire des persecutions et martyrs de l'église de Paris depuis l'an 1557 jusqu'au temps de Charles IX., Lyons, 1563; Locus de Verbo Dei Scripto, 1584; De Christi Sacerdotia, 1588; De Vera Peccatorum Remissionem, 1591, etc. Most of his writings were published either anonymously, or under the pseudonyms of Sadee and Zamariel. Collected editions appeared in 1592 and 1599.

Chandler, Edward, opponent of Collins; b. at Dublin, 1670; d. in London, July 20, 1750. He was made Bishop of Lichfield, 1717, and transferred to the see of Durham, 1730. He is best known by his Defence of Christianity from the Prophecies of the Old Testament (London, 1725), in reply to Collins's Discourse on the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion. The work went over the whole ground with remarkable biblical and rabbinical learning. In 1727 Collins replied to it in his Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered; and the controversy closed by the publication of Chandler's Vindication of the Defence of Christianity from the Prophecies of the Old Testament, London, 1728. The point in debate was the existence of an expectation of the Messiah at the time of Christ's birth. This Collins denied. See Collins, A.; also Cairns, Unbelief in the Eighteenth Century, pp. 77-78.

Chandler, Samuel, b. at Hangerford in Berkshire, 1700; d. in London, May 8, 1766. His father, who was an eminent Nonconformist minister, gave him a good education, sending him first to Gloucester, where he formed what proved to be lifelong friendships with Bishop Butler and Archbishop Secker, and then to Leyden. In 1718 he was pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Peckham; and from 1726 pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Old Jewry, London, to which he ministered for forty years. His learning and talents were recognized by his election to the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, and doctorate in theology, both from Edinburgh and Aberdeen. On the death of George II. (1760), Chandler published a sermon in which he compared the deceased king to David. This drew out a pamphlet which set forth David as a bad man. Chandler replied briefly, but was led to give more study to David's history, and so wrote his best-known and most valuable work, finished just before his death, A Critical History of the Life of David, London, 1768, 2 vols. 8vo, reprinted, Oxford, 1834. Among his other works of note (all published in London), are, A Vindication of the Christian Religion (against A. Collins), 1725; A Vindication of Daniel's Prophecies, 1728; The History of Persecution, 1738; A Vindication of the History of the Old Testament, 1741; Commentaries on Galatians, Ephesians, and 1 and 2 Thessalonians, 1777, and on Joel, 1735; four volumes of posthumous Sermons, 1768. In theology he was a semi-Arian.

Channing, William Ellery, the most celebrated and influential Unitarian theologian and philanthropist of America, and better known in Europe than most American authors; b. at Newport, R.I., April 7, 1780; d. at Bennington, Vt., Sunday, Oct. 2, 1842. His father was an honored judge and a moderate Calvinist; his mother, a refined and pious woman; under such influences he early manifested a deeply religious nature, and chose the clerical profession. He traced his conversion to the influence of the funeral of his father, and a religious revival which then swept over New England. He was graduated at Harvard College. He devoted his leisure hours chiefly to the study of Shakspeare. In 1798 he went as a private tutor to South America, and while there had such mental agony from religious doubts, that he was physically enfeebled, and returned to Newport in 1800 a "thin and palid" invalid, with a constitution permanently impaired. At home he associated much with the Rev. Dr. Samuel Hopkins,—the famous Calvinist, and follower of Jonathan Edwards,—whom he warmly esteemed. In 1802 he was licensed to preach, and at once distinguished himself by his fire, his unction, and elegant style. Although popularly supposed to be orthodox, he was really an Arian, but with the ethical principles of Dr. Hopkins. On June 1, 1803, he was ordained, and installed pastor of a puritanical Calvinistic Congregation in Federal Street, Boston. His audience increased rapidly with his reputation for eloquence and devotion. His church was always well filled. At the close of his sermons he was often physically exhausted. He introduced a new era in preaching, and enlivened the pulpit by themes of Christian philanthropy and social reform.

Not very long after this time, it became apparent that many of the Congregational churches of New England were in a state of decay, especially in Boston neighborhood, had, through various influences, become gradually Antitrinitarian and Anti-Calvinistic. In the separation which followed, Channing allied.
himself with the so-called "Liberal" party, and became their acknowledged head. He is commonly called a Unitarian; but in his own language he wished to regard himself as "belonging not to a sect, but to the community of free minds, of lovers of truth, and followers of Christ, both on earth and in heaven." This catholicity of spirit secured him the esteem of men of all schools and parties. In a letter of Aug. 29, 1841, addressed to an Englishman, he expressed the noble sentiment: "As I grow older . . . I distrust sectarian influence more and more. I am more detached from a denomination, and strive to feel more my connection with the Universal Church, with all good and holy men. I am little of a Unitarian, have little sympathy with the system of Priestley and Beilsham, and stand aloof from all but those who strive and pray for clearer light, who look for a purer and more effectual manifestation of Christian truth" (Memoir, II. 400).

Channing opposed, on the one hand, the hard and bony Puritan orthodoxy of his day, and combated vigorously the traditional views on the trinity, the atonement, and total depravity; while on the other he equally opposed the rationalist and radical Unitarianism, and sought a middle way. He emphasized the human element in Christ and Christianity, which was too much overlooked by Calvinism, and paid one of the most beautiful and eloquent tributes to the perfection of the moral character of Christ. He held up his example as the great ideal to be followed. He found in Christ a perfect manifestation of God to men, and at the same time the ideal of humanity, who spake with divine authority. He firmly believed in his sinlessness and miracles, especially his resurrection. He was "always inclined," he wrote as late as March 31, 1832, "to the doctrine of the pre-existence of Christ" (Memoir, II. 410). He was, therefore, not a humanist, like Priestley, but rather an Arminian, as his nephew calls him (Memoir, II. 83). He paid little attention to metaphysical questions, and preferred to dwell on the historical Christ. But he remained a supernaturalist to the end; and his last utterances on the Gospels and the character of our Lord are among the strongest and noblest. See Memoir, II. 431, 436, 442.

Channing, however, was not so much a theologian as a preacher and a philanthropist. He was no dreamer, but a practical reformer. He labored for the purification and elevation of life and society, and entered heartily into schemes for the abolition of slavery, of intemperance, of prison-abuses, and for the circulation of the Bible. He had an exalted idea of the nobility of human nature, and an unbounded faith in freedom and progress.

He was reserved and reticent, but earnest and ardent when aroused. He was short and slender. He had a devout and unworldly spirit. He was singularly free from selfishness, and full of sympathy for others. A French-Catholic writer calls him the "Américain Chastelot." The impression he made upon Coleridge, whom he met in England in 1822, was so favorable as to draw forth the expression, "Channing has the love of wisdom, and the wisdom of love." Dr. H. W. Bellows, one of his pupils, says (in his Centenary Address, 1880, p. 6), "He belonged to the order of Christians called Unitarians, but he belonged still more to the Church Universal; and nothing would have grieved him more than any attempt to shut him into any enclosure that shuts out the pure and good of any name,—Catholic or Protestant, Trinitarian or Unitarian."

Channing's Works were published in six volumes, Boston, 1848, and in London, 1865, two volumes; German translation by Sydow and Schulze, Berlin, 1850. The best known of them are his Evidences of Christianity, delivered at Cambridge, Mass., Nov. 26, 1814, his treatise on Milton, and his life of Christ (Memoir, II. 400). In another letter, written three months later (November, 1841), he says, "I value Unitarianism, not because I regard it as in itself a perfect system, but as freed from many great and pernicious errors of the older systems, as encouraging freedom of thought, as raising us above the deputation of the Church, and as breathing a mild and tolerant spirit into all the members of the Christian body" (Memoir, II. 400).

Channing was a supernaturalist to the end; but he remained a supernaturalist to the end; and his last utterances on the Gospels and the character of our Lord are among the strongest and noblest.

CHAPEL. (Latin, capella), a small church, destined for a family or a convent, but without parochial rights; or an addition to a large church, destined for occasional service, or for a mission congregation. The derivation of capella is obscure, but generally referred back to the capa, or cloak, of St. Martin, which the French kings carried with them in battle, deposited in a small, transportable structure, hence called a capella.

CHAPIN, Edwin Hubbell, D.D., a Universalist minister, b. at Union Village, Washington County, New York, Dec. 29, 1814; d. in New-York City, Dec. 26, 1890. In 1837 he was ordained to the Universalist ministry, and until 1840 preached to a society composed of Universalists and Unitarians in Richmond, Va. After a six-years' pastorate in Charlestown, and two years in Boston, Mass., he came to New York in 1848, as minister of the Fourth Universalist Society, and from that time until the last few years of his life, he was one of the most admired and popular preachers and lecturers of the city. Harvard College bestowed upon him the degrees of A.M. and D.D. His publications were numerous, although ephemeral, consisting in the main of sermons. Among them are Moral Aspects of City Life, 1853; True Maufulness, 1854; Lessons of Faith and Hope, 1877; The Church of the Living God, and Other Sermons, 1881; God's Requirements and Other Sermons, 1881.

CHAPLAIN (capellanus), in the Roman-Catholic Church, means a parson's assistant, ordained principally for the assistance and aiding the priest in the discharge of his pastoral duties. According to canon law, a parish has only one parson; but when the flock is very large, or other circumstances prevent the parson from fulfilling his whole duty, the bishop may order him to procure one or more assistants (Trid. Sess. 21, c. 4 de ref.). These assistants (capellani, chaplains) are in the service of the parson, are paid by him, and may be dismissed by him at pleasure, though the bishop's approbation is necessary to their appointment. In cases in which, by endowments, means have been provided for the establishment of a perpetual chaplaincy, the incumbent, whether a capellanus curatus (that is, appointed for the general assistance of the parson), or a capellanus sacellanu, or vicarius, or primissarius (that is, appointed for some special service), ceases to be in the service of the parson, and cannot be dismissed by him, though he still remains in a certain dependence. As the word "capellanus" originally meant any one officiating in a capella, there are, of course, capellani regii, capellani episcopales, etc. The Pope has also a number of chaplains, divided into three groups, - capellani honorarii, a mere title; capellani ceremoniarii, who assist him in officiating; and capellani secreti, who serve as private secretaries. See Van Esen: Jus. Ecc. Un. Un. 11: Vesoul. P. 1846; I. 332 sqq.: Hinschius: System des Kath. Kirchenrechts, 2, 321 sqq.

CHAPTERS. In the Roman-Catholic Church, mean ecclesiastical corporations, organized, both at the cathedrals, and, later on, also at collegiate and parish churches, for the purpose of the divine service. They grew up from the presbyteries; that is, from those colleges of priests and deacons which in the old church stood by the side of the bishop as his council or senate; and they assumed a more distinct form, when, from the fourth century, the monastic vita communis (communal life) began to be transferred to the secular clergy.

Euzebius of Vercelli, and Augustine, introduced the vita communis at Vercelli and Hippo. The clergy lived together in one house (monasterium); and in the latter city, also, the monastic vow of perpetual poverty was adopted. This arrangement was imitated in Africa, Spain, and Gaul; but it was not generally accepted, nor fully developed, until the eighth century. At that time the vita canonica (canonical life), based upon Acts iv. 32, and, by its idea of common property, distinguished from the monastical life (regularia vires), with its absolute poverty, was organized in France by Chrodegang of Metz, about 760. See Mansi: Conc., 14, 313; Walter: Fontes Jur. Eccle., p. 29. This organization spread so rapidly, that, under Louis the Pious, the synod of Aix-la-Chapelle (816) elaborated a new regulation, resting on Chrodegang's rules, as they rested on the rules of Benedict, and comprising not only the cathedral, but also the collegiate churches. According to both these regulations, the clergy should live together in one house (claustrum), with the bishop and their special head, who, according to Chrodegang, is the archdeacon, according to the synod of Aix-la-Chapelle, the praepositus, to whose discipline they were subject. From pure monasticism this organization differed mainly by retaining the discipline, and it followed with the gradation of ecclesiastical order and function, and the right of the individual to hold private property. In the ninth century this organization generally came to bear the name capitulum, which at first simply referred to the chapter of the Bible which was read aloud at their daily gatherings, then to the room or house in which the assembly was held (the chapter-house), and finally to the assembly itself and the whole organization.

In the latter part, however, of the ninth century, a division of the common property began to take place between the bishop and the chapter, and between the members of the chapter, each retaining for himself individually a certain portion of the common mass. At the same time it became customary for the members of the chapter, at least for those of the higher grades, to have houses of their own (mansiones); and thus the very foundation of the so-called vita canonica was gradually broken up. In the course of the eleventh century the transformation was nearly completed; but, in the latter part of the eleventh and the beginning of the twelfth century, a re-

CHAPTERS AND VERSES.

Modern. The purpose of the present division into chapters and verses was to facilitate reference. They sometimes, but not generally, ignore logical and natural divisions. Of the chapters the origin is obscure. Common opinion attributes them to Cardinal Hugo de Sanctor Caro (Hugues de St. Cher, d. circa 1202), who is alleged to have made the division for his concordance to the Latin Vulgate (circa 1240, first printed, with modification, at Bologna, 1470). This opinion rests on the direct testimony of Gilbert Genebrard (d. 1597); though that is greatly weakened by his well-known statement,—alleged as an inference from the seeming fact that theologians earlier than Hugo were ignorant of these chapters, while later ones knew them,—that “the scholastics who with Cardinal Hugo were authors of the concordance” made the division. Quétif and Echard, a century and a half later than Genebrard, who wrote competently and carefully about Hugo, ascribe to him only the subdivision of the chapters presently to be mentioned. The better opinion is, that Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1228), made it for purposes of easier citation. This rests on the direct testimony of several writers, many of whom, again, seem to repeat that of Trevet or Trivetus (1228–1328). Before the invention of printing, this division had already passed from Latin manuscripts to those of other tongues, and after the invention of printing it became general. It has undergone slight variations from the beginning to the present day. Many early printed Bibles, especially Greek Testaments, besides these chapters retain also the old breces or versi noted in the margin.

The chapters were at first subdivided into seven portions (not paragraphs, as we now use the word), marked in the margin by the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, G; reference in the concordance being made by the chapter-number and the letter under which the passage occurred. In the shorter Psalms, however, the division did not always extend to seven. In Ps. cxix. (exxvii. in the Vulgate) it seems not to have been used at all. This initial division (except that of the Hymn of the Widow, by Conrad von Halberstadt (circa 1290), who reduced the divisions of the shorter chapters from seven to... four; so that the letters were always either A–G or A–D. This subdivision continued long after the introduction of the present verses. But in the seventeenth century it became much modified; some chapters having more than four, and less than seven, subdivisions, and, though still used to mark liturgical readings or lessons, apparently useless for concordantial purposes.

The present verses differ in origin for the Old Testament, New Testament, and Apocrypha. In the canonical Old Testament they go back to the obscurity of the Massoretic division of the Hebrew Bible, appearing in the oldest known manuscripts marked with the accent soph pasik. They are thus older than the ninth century, though not used for citation by the Jews till the fifteenth century. The Hebrew concordance of Rabbi Nathan (finished 1448) seems to have been made upon the basis of its Hebrew numeral. Arabic numerals were first added for the intervening verses by Joseph Athias, manuscriptsmarked with the accent soph pastik.

1524) seems to have been made upon the basis of its Hebrew numeral. Arabic numerals were first added for the intervening verses by Joseph Athias, manuscriptsmarked with the accent soph pastik. This subdivision continued long after the Massoretic verses numbered was the Psalterium Quinqueplex (Latin) of Faber Stapelenius (James or Jacques Le Fevre), printed at Paris by Henry Stephens (Stephanus, Estienne, father of Robert) in 1509 (2d ed., 1513; 3d ed., by another printer, 1515). In 1528 Sanctes Pagninus published at Lyons a new Latin version of the whole Bible, with the Massoretic verses marked and numbered. He also divided the Apocrypha and New Testament into numbered verses; but these were three or four times as long as the present ones. The Massoretic verses have been sometimes modified in translating, in a few places; as, e.g., by Luther, for which subsequent historians (e.g., Mayer) have felt called upon to defend him.

The present New-Testament verses were introduced by Robert Stephens in his Greek-Latin Testament of 1551 (some copies erroneously have MDXL). On the titlepage, not MDXL. As stated by Wright and Tregelles), printed at Geneva. This contains, in parallel columns, the Vulgate (always in the inner column), the Greek (in the centre), and the Latin of Erasmus (in the outer). In Erasmus a smaller type serves the purpose of the Italicsof modern English Bibles. Of the verses, Stephens says in his preface that the division is made to follow the most ancient Greek and Latin copies; and that the more willingly “quod hac ratione utraque translationi possit ornato omnino egressi Graeco contexti responderi.” But it will be difficult, if not impossible, to find any Greek or Latin manuscripts whose divisions (even the later Latin, marked with G, like Pagninus's verses) coincide very nearly with Stephens's verses. It is likely, as Masch intimates, that he made this statement to forestall opposition from known enemies. His son Henry, in the preface to his Greek concordance (published in 1594, after Robert), relates that this division was made by his father on a journey from Paris to Lyons, and a great part of it “inter equitandum,” or on horseback. Doubtless this division was made with reference to his concordance to the Vulgate, then preparing, published in 1553, in the preface of which he announces his Greek concordance as also in hand. This Latin concordance, like former ones, contains references to the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, G, but also the numbers of the verses of each chapter “after the Hebrew method” of division. This latter, the preface states, has special reference to an “operi pulcherrimo et preclarissimo” which he is now printing; which must mean his splendid Bible of 1556–57, 3 vols., containing the Vulgate, Pagninus, and the first edition of Beza's Latin New Testament. Meanwhile, for present convenience, he is issuing a [more modest] Bible (Vulgate), with the verses marked and numbered. This latter was his Vulgate of 1555 (Geneva), — the first whole Bible divided into the present verses, and the first in which they were introduced into the Apocrypha. The text is continuous, not having the verses in separate paragraphs, like the New Testament of 1551, but separated by a ¶ and the verse-number. On the titlepage is a reference to the concordance, with a statement substantially the same as that which had been inserted in the preface. The verses division differs in only a very few places from that of 1551; and a comparison shows that the concordance agrees rather with that of 1551 than with that of 1555.

While Stephens was meditating this division, as his son Henry relates (ibid supra), most people thought his plan useless, if not ridiculous. “But lo! contrary to their condemnatory opinion . . . no sooner did the invention come to light than it met with universal favor, and at once obtained such influence that other editions of the New Testament which did not adopt that invention — whether Greek, or Latin, or German, or in any other vernacular tongue — were, so to speak, cashiered.” This is nearly the truth. In other languages the division appeared first as follows: French, New Testament, Geneva, 1552, Bible, Gellius Cestanius (Gillis van der Erven), Embden, 1556, Bible, Nicolaus Biens van Diest, Embden, 1560; English, Genevanew Testament, 1557, Genevan Bible, 1560; German, Luther's Bible, Heidelberg, 1598, but commonly Frankfurt—a.M., 1582.

In Beza's editions of the Greek Testament (1563–1604) sundry variations were introduced, which were followed by later editors, notably the Elzevirs (1633, etc.). But many minor changes have been made, quite down to the present day. (For variations in the Greek Testament see Dr. Ezra Abbot's collation in C. R. Gregory's Proleg. to Tisch. Gr. N. T., ed. VIII.) These Stephanic verses have met with bitter criticism; but their utility for reference outweighs their disadvantage, at least when they are confined, as they should be, to a numbering in the margin.

The providential occasion was an appeal for help to a suffering family, made to Vincent de Paul at Chartillon, just as he was about to go on a diet, which affected him so that he laid aside his sermon, and preached powerfully upon their duty toward this case. The congregation were deeply interested, and help was at once offered. But the incident led him to think upon the needs of the poor in times of sickness, and, under divine direction, to the foundation of an association of women for the care of the poor. It began with a membership of about fifteen, but quickly spread, so that in a few years it was found in more than thirty places. But the very spread of the order weakened it; for when Vincent de Paul and his missionaries could not longer give it their personal direction and encouragement, the love of many waxed cold, and many, especially in the country, who required instruction in nursing, could not get it. But at this juncture Madame Louise le Gras, née de Marillac, left a widow in 1625, and, by the advice of her bishop, under the spiritual direction of Vincent de Paul, made known her determination to devote her life to the poor. Vincent de Paul determined to avail himself of her help, but for four years he tested her, ere he sent her out to visit the order of women he had founded. She rendered him such efficient service, that she is entitled to be linked with him in the history of the order. But considerations for her family held her back from nursing very bad cases; and so Vincent de Paul found it expedient to enlist only virgins, and give them over to Madame le Gras for instruction. The order became very popular. Not only poor girls, but those of the highest rank of society, volunteered; and the world learned how much women will sacrifice and suffer for the sake of Christ. In 1633 the Archbishop of Paris raised the association into a distinct order, to be called the "Daughters of Christian Love," although they are commonly known as the "Sisters of Charity." In the lifetime of Vincent de Paul the order spread all over France, and also to England. The rule which he gave it was confirmed by Pope Clement IX., when in 1668 the order was officially acknowledged and indorsed. This rule was, that the Sisters should remember, that, in nursing the sick, they were nursing Christ, whose servants they were, and therefore go about their duty irrespective of the praise or blame of men; that they should rise daily at four A.M.; twice in the day engage, in earnest prayer; live very simply; never drink wine except in case of sickness; never refuse to nurse the sick, even in the most repulsive and infectious diseases; never to stand in awe of death; always to render implicit obedience to their superior. Moreover, they were to dress in uniform, to cultivate mutual trust and peace of spirit, and to do all and bear all, out of love for Christ. The vow is not perpetual or irrevocable, but renounced, and it is not given until after a probation of five years. The simplicity and flexibility of the rule has worked admirable in favor of the order. In France it took such a hold that it survived the storm of the Revolution; for, notwithstanding the edict of 1790, suppressing all religious orders, the poor maidens would not stop its work; and no sooner had the storm passed in 1800, when Napoléon gave them public support, than it showed a more vigorous life than before. The community was introduced into the United States, under a distinct rule, however, by Mrs. Elizabeth Ann (Bayley) Seton (1774–1821) of Maryland, a pervert from Protestantism, who, with her sisters-in-law Harriet and Cecilia Seton, took the veil as "Sisters of Charity," Jan. 1, 1800, at Emmetsburg, Md. There she opened a religious house in 1812; and "Mother" Seton became the head, or superior-general, of the order in America. Mother Seton's rule is still followed in several dioceses, but in more the French. See Seton, Mother: art. 2. CHARLEMACNE, b. April 2, 742; d. Jan. 28, 814; succeeded, together with his younger brother Carloman, his father, Pepin the Short, as King of the Franks in 768; became sole ruler of the Frankish Empire by Carloman's death in 774; was crowned Roman emperor by Leo III. in the Church of St. Peter in Rome, Christmas Day, 800, and stood, in the latter part of his reign, as one of the three great rulers of the world, the equal of the Emperor of Constantinople, and the Caliph of Bagdad.

No layman has exercised so great an influence on the history of the Church as Charlemagne; though his influence was, properly speaking, merely that of extension, organization, and consolidation. Personally he probably did not reach far beyond a tolerably accurate fulfillment of the precepts of the Church. His character has, no doubt, been much embellished by the legendary poetry of the Church. His want of chastity, and disregard of the marriage-vow, must be freely admitted. Practically the Church was to him, not only the visible representative of Christ on earth, but also an organ of civilization, an instrument of government; and he was sometimes unscrupulous enough in the use of this instrument, as, for instance, when he compelled the Saxons, by force and with unexampled cruelty, to receive baptism. Nevertheless he contributed perhaps more than any one else to make the Church a power in the history of the race, and enabled it to form during the middle ages a much-needed and highly beneficial counterpoise to the military despotism of Feudalism.

His relation to the Church is strikingly characterized by a total absence of any distinction between spiritual and temporal power. Both were identical to him; and as he unquestionably was the holder of the one he necessarily came to consider himself as holder of the other too. Without paying the least regard to the Pope, whom, under other circumstances, he was not unwilling to recognize as the representative of the Church, he condemned at the synod of Francfort (794) the decrees of the second council of Nicaea concerning image-worship; and with as little ceremony he introduced the Filioque of the Spanish churches into the Nicene Creed at the synod of Aix-la-Chapelle (809). He was liberal to the Church.

The exarchate of Ravenna was his splendid donation to the papal see. Churches and monasteries received enormous endowments everywhere in his realm; and with unexampled cruelty, to receive baptism. Nevertheless he contributed perhaps more than any one else to make the Church a power in the history of the race, and enabled it to form during the middle ages a much-needed and highly beneficial counterpoise to the military despotism of feudalism.

His relation to the Church is strikingly characterized by a total absence of any distinction between spiritual and temporal power. Both were identical to him; and as he unquestionably was the holder of the one he necessarily came to consider himself as holder of the other too. Without paying the least regard to the Pope, whom, under other circumstances, he was not unwilling to recognize as the representative of the Church, he condemned at the synod of Francfort (794) the decrees of the second council of Nicaea concerning image-worship; and with as little ceremony he introduced the Filioque of the Spanish churches into the Nicene Creed at the synod of Aix-la-Chapelle (809). He was liberal to the Church.

The exarchate of Ravenna was his splendid donation to the papal see. Churches and monasteries received enormous endowments everywhere in his realm; and with unexampled cruelty, to receive baptism. Nevertheless he contributed perhaps more than any one else to make the Church a power in the history of the race, and enabled it to form during the middle ages a much-needed and highly beneficial counterpoise to the military despotism of feudalism.

pupils, with that school which he had founded in his palace, and which became the fertile germ of the mediæval university. All these men were theologians, but not exclusively: on the contrary, their greatness was their many-sidedness. They had studied grammar, rhetoric, philosophy, classical literature, canon law, etc. They were poets, philosophers, statesmen, practical administrators, etc. They were exactly what Charlemagne wanted,—men whom he could send out as legates to see how the counts were doing in the marches, or could settle as bishops in a diocese to take care, not only of the Church proper, but also of the school and the court; for, according to his ideas, the Church was an institution with many worldly duties of education and jurisdiction; and consequently it became, under his hands, an institution with many worldly interests of property and ambition.

Charles V., b. at Ghent, Feb. 24, 1500; d. at Monastery of San Yuste, Sept. 21, 1558; son of the Archduke Philip of Austria and Joanna of Aragon; was educated in Flanders by William de Croy, an acute statesman, and Adrian of Utrecht, afterwards Pope Adrian VI.; and inherited in 1517, after his maternal grandfather, Ferdinand the Catholic, Spain, with Naples, Sar-dinia, Sicily, and the newly-discovered America, and in 1519, after his paternal grandfather Maximilian, Emperor of Germany, Austria and Burgundy. In the same year he was elected Emperor of Germany. Goaded onward by the idea of a world-empire, he spent thirty-six years in war; and hardships of every kind, but gained no other result of his enormous exertions than a clearer understanding of the impossibility of his own aim. Disenchanted, and finding a kind of rest by occupying his mind with bagatelles, he abdicated in 1556, leaving Spain and the Netherlands to his son, Philip II., and Austria and the imperial crown of Germany to his brother Ferdinand, and retired, a suffering cripple, but a monster of gluttony, to the Monastery of San Yuste, in Estramadura in Spain, where he died.

His conduct with respect to the Reformation did not spring from a settled religious conviction, but from worldly and selfish policy. The rumors which spread after his death, and which were true, are as follows: the and some of Gar- ranza's pupils, so dear, may have been educated; but, on the other hand, the cruel measures which he actually employed in Flanders, and tried to employ in Germany, for the suppression of the Protestants, were nothing but political plans, colored by the innate despotism of his nature. Charles had no devotedness to any thing but himself: he would in religious respects have been completely indifferent, but for the habits of his childhood. There was only one idea which had root in his heart, beside his many whims and vices; and that was the idea of the renewal of the empire of Charlemagne. When this idea brought him into a deadly duel with Francis I., he proved himself ready to sacrifice any thing in order to reach his goal. It was necessary for him to have peace in Germany in order to be strong against France; and he found it easiest to maintain peace by sacrificing the Protestants. Had the opportunity pointed the other way, he would have sacrificed the Pope without a moment's hesitation.

Immediately after his coronation at Aix-la-Chapelle (Oct. 22, 1520) he convoked a diet at Worms, at which (April 26, 1521) Luther was outlawed. Soon after, however, the duel with Francis I. began; and the religious conflict in Germany was followed by the Spires (1529) allowed the German princes to regulate the religious affairs of their respective states according to their own judgment. At a second diet at Spires (1529), held during a pause in the wars with France, the Roman Catholics obtained a decree purporting to stop the further progress of the Reformation; and, when the Protestant princes met this decree with a protest (April 19, 1529), an outburst of the despotic spirit in Charles's nature followed, and might have led him to some decisive step, if he had not felt the pressure of the Turk so heavily at the same moment. At the diet of Augsburg he seemed to have been gained completely over by the Romanists; and a decree of Nov. 19, 1530, not only condemned the Confession of the Protestants, but demanded their unconditional submission. However, when this decree was answered by the Protestants with the league of Smalcald (Feb. 27, 1531), and Solyman on the one side, and Francis I. on the other, began to move, Charles was ready with the truce of Nuremberg (July 23, 1532), which granted freedom of conscience. It was evident, however, that sooner or later it must come to an armed conflict between the Protestants and Roman Catholics in Germany; and, from the decided preponderance which the Roman-Catholic interests possessed in the policy of the emperor, it was easy to infer which side he would take. But after the victory of Mühlberg (1546), which was almost crushing for the cause of the Reformation, he treated the Protestants, in general, with great leniency. After his entrance in Wittenberg, the Protestant service ceased in the churches; but it was taken up again, and continued, on his express order. He had at this time fully made up his mind that the religious conflict should come to an end, and unity be restored within the Church; and he had his hands free to do what he liked. Francis I. was dead, also Henry VIII.; and the Turk had fallen asleep. But when the Pope in the council from Trent to Bologna, and proved himself unyielding at every point, Charles showed him his displeasure as openly as he ever had done with the Protestants, and chose his allies.
in the Evangelical camp. The Interim proved, however, better than any thing else could have done, how incapable he was to deal with such a question; and the affair suddenly took a pitiful turn for him, when Duke Maurice of Saxony fell upon him at Halsbruck, and compelled him to sign the treaty of Passau (Aug. 2, 1648), which gave the Protestants complete religious liberty.

In his retirement at San Yuste, the idea of the restoration of unity in the Church occupied his attention nearly as much as his clocks. He began to understand that that which had thwarted all his plans, and baffled all his hopes, was not so much Francis I. as the Reformation; and, like an old woman whose brain has only one wheel going, he began to repeat over and over again, "Put it down! put it down!" But he probably never understood that it was he who had completely mistaken the time in which he lived, and wasted his power, while history went onward, pretty nearly undisturbed by him.

CLEMMENS PETERSEN.

CHARNOCK, Stephen, D.D., the author of Discourses on the Attributes; or, in London, 1625; d. there July 27, 1680. He studied at Cambridge, but became (1644) a fellow of New College, Oxford, and ultimately proctor. In 1653 he went to Dublin as chaplain to Henry Cromwell; but in 1660 the Act of Uniformity put an end to his useful ministry there, and he returned to England. He preached afterwards irregularly until 1675, when he accepted the charge, in London, which he held at his death. His Discourses upon the Existence and Attributes of God (often reprinted) are acknowledged masterpieces, and surely take rank with the greatest of the many great products of the Nonconformist clergy. Charnock published only one sermon; but after his decease two volumes appeared, edited by Adams and Veel from his manuscripts, London, 1682-83, fol. Best edition of his complete works in Nichol's Series of Standard Divines, with introduction by Rev. Dr. James McCosh, Edinburgh, 1854, 5 vols. 8vo.

CHARRON, Pierre, b. in Paris, 1541; d. there 1603; studied law at Orléans, and practised for several years at Bourges as an advocate, but gave up this career, studied theology, was ordained a priest, and was very active in Southern France as anitist; he was finally as archbishop of the diocese of Cahors. His Traité des trois vertus (1594), and Discours chrétien (1600), exhibit him as a very orthodox Romanist; but his great work, Traité de la Sagesse (1601), suddenly revealed him as a disciple of Montaigne, drawing consequences which the master himself would have hesitated to draw. See CHANET: Considerations sur la Sagesse de Charron, Rochelle, 1643; the article in Bayle; and SAINTE-BEUVE: Causeries du lundi, vol. viii., which had the union nect to the Protestants complete religious liberty.

CHASE, Irah, D.D., one of the founders of Newton Centre Baptist Seminary; b. at Stratton, Vt., Oct. 5, 1793; d. at Newton Centre, Mass., Nov. 1, 1864. He was graduated at Middlebury College in 1814; a student at Andover, but ordained in the Baptist Church in 1817; was professor of theology in Baptist theological seminaries from 1818 to 1845,—1818-25, in the seminar at Washington; 1825-45, in that at Newton Centre, Mass. The latter part of his life was spent in literary pursuits. Besides other books, and many controversial articles, he published The Work claiming to be the Constitutions of the Holy Apostles, including the Canons, N.Y., 1848; Infant Baptism an Invention of Man, Phila., n.d., and A Life of Bunyan.

CHASSIDIM, or PIOUS, is a name given to a Jewish party which became very conspicuous in the time of the Maccabean struggle. "The zeal and even the fanaticism of this party had been admirable qualities in the hour of trial and execution" (Milman). The Chassidim rigidly adhered to the written as well as traditional law of their fathers. "Themselves austere," says Milman, "they despised all who did not practise the same austerities. Earnest in their belief, they branded as free-thinkers all whose creed was of greater latitude than their own, and considered it their duty to enforce the same rigid attention, not merely to every letter of the law, but likewise to all their own peculiar observances, which they themselves regarded as necessary, and most scrupulously performed." . . . till they finally degenerated into the "haughty, tyrannical, and censorious Pharisees, the Separatists of the Jewish religion." After the fall of the Chassidim they disappeared, until, about the year 1740, Rabbi Israel, with the epithet Saul-Shem ("Possessor of the Name," i.e., the mysterious name of God), appeared at the head of a small party of men, first at Hussee, and afterwards at Medziboze in Podolia, who called themselves Chassidim, or Saints. Rabbi Israel was most probably a man of devotional and enthusiastic spirit, who felt the insufficiency and lifelessness of Rabbinism, and thought he had discovered the essence of true piety in the mysticism of the cabalistic system. His fame soon spread, in spite of the opposition of the rabbins; and in a short time his followers were numbered by tens of thousands. As long as he lived, the sect formed one great whole, of which he was the head. After his death, which took place in 1780, it was divided into separate congregations, each of which had its own rabbi, or, as the Chassidim call him, Taddik, or Saint. They soon spread over Galicia, South Hungary, West and South Russia, Wallachia, and extended to the East. The Chassidim have separate synagogues; and their great object is,—at least they say so,—to bring each of their congregations as near as possible to the principal rabbi, or, as the Chassidim call him, Rabbi God. To effect this, they spend much time in contemplation, and in prayer use the most extraordinary contortions and gestures, jumping, writhing, howling, in order to exalt their minds, and do certainly succeed in working themselves into a state little short of frenzy. Their chief edification is the spending of the sabbath day with the Tsaddik, when they listen to a sort of moral, mystical, cabalistical discourse, which is received as the dictates of immediate inspiration. For the benefit of such as are too far removed to come on the Saturday, the Tsaddik makes journeys through his district, when he lodges with some rich member of the sect, and is treated with all the respect due to one who stands in immediate communication with Deity. He then imposes penances, dispenses amulets, and slips of parchment with cabalistical sentences written on them, to those who wish exemption from sickness and danger, or protection against evil spirits; and pronounce on the sick and the barren his benefits, and to procure the fulfillment of every wish. The late Dr. Alexander McCaul, who for a number of years labored as a missionary among the Jews in Russian-Poland, once saw one of the most famous of these Tsaddikim, the Tsaddik Medziboze, or Mezbesh, during one of these periodical visits to a large congregation. "His antechamber," says Dr. McCaul, "was crowded with Jews and Jewesses, anxiously waiting for admission. The Tsaddik himself was seated in an inner chamber, in an arm-chair. He wore a long robe, something like a cassock, of sky-blue silk, a white girdle, and cap. He was a fine-looking, portly old man, with a long white beard. His attendants all stood around him, attired in the usual costume of the Polish Jews, excepting the cap, which was not black velvet, but white cotton. His conversation was that of a shrewd, sensible man; and with us he certainly showed nothing either of the mystic or fanatic. The Jews said, at his departure, that his receipts in the town alone were two thousand silver rubles, which this evil is fed anew."}

CHASUBLE.

Covetousness on the one hand and spiritual narrowness on the other are the channels through which this evil is fed anew."  B. PICK.

CHASTITY is the inner side of modesty, the condition of bodily and moral purity in the sexual relations, and the virtue of self-control from forbidden sexual longings. Its opposites are lust, coquetry, and idle wit. It is a virtue known to and esteemed by the ancients, though rarely found among the men. Even the chosen people, as is proved by the numerous allusions to unchastity in the Old Testament, do not seem to have been exceptionally chaste. But Christ has made chastity in word and deed common, and laid its obligation upon all. The New-Testament writers employ the word ἁπάσα in this connection, the original meaning of which is dedicated, then clean, unspotted, and so chaste. The New-Testament idea of chastity is the natural result of its new view of the body as the temple of the Holy Spirit. Hence the obligation to be chaste was of the strongest (1 Cor. vii. 15-20). But obedience is difficult, owing to the force of passion (1 Pet. ii. 11). This sexual passion is not to be gratified, but is to be gratified only within the marriage bond. Unchastity is a scourge, a pestilence which lays low body and soul. It has a certain and sad effect upon the religious feelings, killing them, so that God is utterly cast out, and therefore the door is open to every sin. It leads to unnatural vice (Rom. i. 26, 27). And therefore according to the Bible the unchaste are lost (1 Cor. vi. 9; Eph. v. 5; Rev. xxi. 2, 27).

Chastity is to be in thought (Matt. v. 28) and word (Eph. v. 3, 12), as well as in deed. In regeneration the Christian receives grace to attain this high ideal. It is the duty of both sexes, and of all ages and relations, married or not, to be chaste. To some a special grace to this end is given (Matt. xix. 12; 1 Cor. vii. 7). To those who preserve absolute chastity outside of the married state, there is peculiar honor; though this is no implied disapproval to marriage (Rev. xiv. 4), which is a divinely-ordered protection. Modern ways of living have debarked many from entering that state, but their celibacy is no excuse for unchastity. See the Ethicsof HARLESS, NEANDER, SCHMID, WUTTKE, MARTHENSEN, and ROTHEN.  KARL BURGER.

CHASUBLE, an ecclesiastical garment, is derived from casula, a diminutive of casa, a "hut." Casula seems originally to have been a local or provincial designation for the paenula, an outer garment used by the humbler classes in the Roman world, and consisting of a single piece of cloth, with a hole in the centre, provided with a hood. With the head thrust through this hole, the wearer of the casula was completely covered, as if by a portable house. The Christian clergy adopted this piece of clothing as their common outer garment, the monks, as their regular dress; and after the eighth century it became a liturgical vestment, though in a somewhat altered form. It was split open on both sides in order to give free play to the arms; and afterwards the superfluous laps were cut off in the middle, and the garment reduced to two broad strips hanging down in front and behind. The color varied according to the character of the solemnity at which it was used. The changes seem first to have taken place in Italy and Spain, where the vestment was known as the pallium, a century before it was generally adopted by the whole Western Church.

CHAUCER, Geffrey, the first great English poet, b. (perhaps in London, where his father, John Chaucer, was a vintner) before 1346 (possibly in 1340, though nothing is certain about it); d. in London in the autumn of 1400 (Oct. 25 has been given as the date). The most of Chaucer's life was spent in association with the higher classes of English society; and he is preeminently the poet of the "gentleman." A person of his name entered the service of Lionel, third son of Edward III., probably as page, in 1357: and in 1358 Chaucer joined the army of Edward III. as it went to invade France. He was made prisoner, but was ransomed in 1360, before the peace; and his importance may be inferred from the fact that the king himself paid a portion of the ransom. The next seven years are blank, so far as the record of his doings is concerned; then we find him a pensioner at court, and one of the valets of the king's household,—a position always held by "gentlemen." Before this time he had married one Philippa, possibly sister of Katherine Roet, who became wife of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster; though there are reasons for doubting his relation to the duke in this way. Upon this connection, and upon various contemptuous expressions regarding the clergy, found in his poems, it has been assumed that Chaucer was a Wiclifite, and when the only corruption, Chaucer should have sympathized in the feelings of the "first Protestant," it is difficult to put out of court the testimony of the sentiments of devout Romanism found in some of Chaucer's verses. From 1370 to 1380 he was much of the time engaged in the service of the king on the continent, visiting Italy twice. The incidents founded upon passages in The Testament of Love (a composition long wrongly attributed to the 15th century) and his imprisonment in the Tower, and his release—are all contradicted by official records. He retired from court in 1386, but received new appointments in 1389, and again lost all his offices in 1391. He was in embarrassment until the accession of Henry Bolingbroke in 1399, but he died the next year. His reputation rests upon his Canterbury Tales, written at various dates during his life, and partially arranged in a connected form. These are remarkable pictures of society. Two of them are in prose,—The Parson's Tale, which is simply a sermon on penitence, from the text Jer. vi. 19 of the Vulgate; and The Tale of Melibaeus, an illustration of the law of love and mercy. Both of these are crowded with Scripture allusions, as, in fact, are most of the poems of Chaucer. In various parts of his poems he discusses the presence of God, and the subjects of predestination, pre-ordination, and free will. The latest complete edition of the poems of Chaucer is that edited by Arthur Gilman (3 vols., Bst., 1879), which is the only one containing the best text of the Canterbury Tales, that of the Ellesmere MS.

CHAUNCY, Charles, second president of Harvard College; b. in Yardleybury, Hertfordshire, Eng., in 1589; d. at Cambridge, U.S.A., Feb. 19, 1671. He was educated at Westminster school and Cambridge, Eng.; at the latter was chosen by the election of John of Brew, but by the vice-chancellor made professor of Greek. Shortly after, he left the university, and took the vicarage of St. Marston, and later of Ware, Hertfordshire (1627). His ministry was eminently successful. By his uncompromising Puritanism he involved himself with the ecclesiastical judicators, was imprisoned and fined. In an hour of weakness he recanted (Feb. 11, 1635). He never forgave himself for this, and, overcome by shame, left the country, and landed at Plymouth a few days before the great earthquake, which happened Jan. 1, 1643. He first preached in Plymouth for three years, and then at Scituate. In 1654 he received an invitation to return to Ware, and was in Boston in November to make arrangements for his departure, when he received the appointment of president of Harvard College, successor to Henry Dunster. Reluctantly he accepted the position, but faithfully and ably he fulfilled its duties. Cotton Mather, in his Magnalia Christi Americana (Bk. iii. c. 23. 2d Amer. ed., Hartford, 1855, vol. i. pp. 469-470), devotes a chapter to Chauncy, and commends especially his piety. The epitaph put on his tombstone in Cambridge (in Latin) says he was for "seventeen years a most faithful president of Harvard College in New England, a man of unsullied integrity, an accomplished debater, gifted with equal merit in piety and scholarship." He wrote Greek and Latin poems. His remorse at his weakness in yielding to his prosecutors was incessant, and led to his publication in London, 1641, of The Retraction of Mr. C. C., formerly Min. of Ware in Hertfordshire, written in 1637, and published, as he says, " for the satisfaction of all such who either are, or justly might be offended with his scandalous submission, made before the High Commission Court, Feb. 11, anno 1635" (4to, pp. 40). He published also Antisnodalicia Scripta Americana, or a Proposal of the Judgment of the Dissenting Messenger of the Churches of N. E., Cambridge, 1662 (4to, pp. 38), and several pamphlets and sermons.

CHAUNCY, Isaac, son of the above, was ejected in 1662; a successor of Dr. John Owen (d. 1683) in London, 1657; retired from ministry, 1704; taught divinity in Dissenter's Academy in London; d. Feb. 25, 1712. He wrote, The Catholike Hierarchie, or The Divine Right of a Sacred Domini on in Church and Conscience, 1684; Ecclesiasticum, or a Plain and Familiar Christian Directory, published also Antisynodalia Scripta Americana, or a Proposal of the Judgment of the Dissenting Messenger of the Churches of N. E., Cambridge, 1662 (4to, pp. 38), and several pamphlets and sermons.

was graduated at Harvard, 1871, and ordained pastor of the First Church in Boston in 1872, and there remained for sixty years. He was a learned and laborious author in public and private life, a man of religion, but not of the narrow, sectarian or orthodox, but of the broad, tolerant and catholic, and of the highest type of universalism. He wrote, Seasonable Thoughts on the State of Religion in New England, Boston, 1873; several open letters to Whitefield,—A Letter to G. Whitefield, publicly calling upon him to Vindicate his Conduct, or Confess his Faults, Boston, 1744; Second Letter to G. Whitefield, urging upon him the Duty of Repentance, Boston, 1743; and A Letter to Rev. G. Whitefield, Boston, 1745; two treatises on church-government,—The Validity of Presbyterian Ordination Asserted and Maintained, Boston, 1782, and A Compleat View of Episcopacy until the Close of the Second Century, Boston, 1771; several works on universal salvation,—The Salvation for All Men Illustrated and Vindicated as a Scriptural Doctrine, Boston, 1782; Divine Glory brought to View in the Final Salvation of All Men, 1783 (in 1784 a second ed., so Dexter supposes); The Death, Sufferings after Death, of every individual: by an extract from the Register of the Government of the Church of England, considered, Boston, 1784; Five Dissertations on the Scripture Account of the Fall and its Consequences, 1785.

CHAUTAUQUA. on Chautauqua Lake in Western New York, is the site of the Chautauqua Assembly,—a summer convocation, school, and resort, in the interest of education, religious and general, and of legitimate and wholesome recreation. The movement was projected in 1873 by Lewis Miller, Esq., and Rev. Dr. J. H. Vincent, the former a wealthy manufacturer in Akron, O., the latter, editor and secretary of the Sunday-school department of the Methodist-Episcopal Church. The first Assembly was held in August, 1874, as a two-weeks' normal (Sunday-school) institute, with general, biblical, and normal lectures, class-drills, specimen illustrative exercises, models of Palestine, an archaeological museum, etc. Its leaders early asked, and promptly answered, the questions: "How shall we increase the power of the Sunday school by connecting it more intimately with the other departments of the church and other agencies in society?" "How control, in the interest of religious culture, the forces—social, commercial, industrial, and educational—which for good or evil are affecting our pupils every day of the week?" These questions were practically answered at Chautauqua by the holding of "Church Congresses," "Reform Councils," "Scientific Conferences," and "Summer Schools." Brilliant lectures were delivered on chemistry by such men as Dr. Ogden Doremus, and Professor S. A. Lattimore; on astronomy, by Drs. Burr and Warren; on geology, by Professor Alexander Winchell, and Professor William N. Rice. Telescopes were in use night after night, season after season. A department of microscopy was established. Permanent organizations were effected for the prosecution of the several studies by persons at their homes. The Chautauqua Assembly aimed to give a start and an inspiration. Its few weeks' session at Chautauqua led individuals to read and study during the year. The C. L. S. C. (Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle) was organized in 1878. It is a "home college," and now numbers more than twenty-five thousand members. Its course of reading requires an average of forty minutes a day, and covers a period of four years. The C. F. M. I. (Chautauqua Foreign Missionary Institute) held its first session in 1879. The C. Y. F. R. U. (Chautauqua Young Folks' Reading Union), are all departments of this new movement, which aims at popular literary, scientific, and religious education at the promotion of rational recreation, at true reform,—domestic, social, and political,—and which aims to cultivate independent self-education at home by those who have hitherto lacked educational opportunity. CHEKE, Sir John, an eminent Greek scholar, h. at Cambridge, June 16, 1514; d. Sept. 13, 1557. He was appointed by Henry VIII. in 1540 the first Regius Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge. To him and Sir Thomas Smith belongs the honor of reviving the knowledge of Greek in England. In 1544 they were appointed tutor to Prince Edward, and on the accession of the latter (January, 1547) received honor and wealth; for he was appointed to various positions,—from provost of King's College, Cambridge, 1549, to secretary of state, and privy councilor. 1553. But having joined in the attempt to establish Lady Jane Grey in the government (1553), he was deprived of all his honors, and finally of all his wealth, by Mary, and confined for a year in the Tower. On liberation he obtained permission to travel; visited Italy and Switzerland; settled in Strassburg, where he supported himself by teaching Greek; and took so prominent a part in the English Church there, that the home government was alarmed, and, by means of a decoy, caught him, and brought him to England (1556). There he recanted, and even took part in the judgment of Protestants more constant than he. The Queen restored him to wealth and position; but his heart was broken, and he died from remorse, giving the best evidence that his recantation was insincere, and "carrying God's pardon, and all good men's pity, along with him." Cheke was a remarkable man, and deserves a wider fame. His Greek learning won the admiration of the day. He knew quite intimately the prominent Protestants of Europe. He was a sincere, humble, though a not sufficiently manly Christian, and inspired universal esteem by his lovely life. Curiously he anticipated two important phenomena of the present day,—the reform of the spelling, and phonography. (See Strype, pp. 161, 162.) He was also a strenuous advocate of pure English. In exemplification of his idea, he prepared a revised version of Matthew, and part of Mark, in which Saxon equivalents of Latin theological and ecclesiastical words are given. (For specimen see Stoughton's Our English Bible, pp. 176, 177.) He was a voluminous and learned writer. (For list see Strype, pp. 165-167.) The most interesting is said to be the True Subject to the Rebel, or the Hurt of Sedition, 1541 (also Oxford, 1841, with a Memoir). His translation of Matthew, and seven of his letters, were edited and published by J. Goodwin, D.D., London, 1843. His Life was written by JOHN STRYPE, new edition, Oxford, 1821.
CHEMNITZ, Martin, b. at Treuenbrietzen, Brandenburg, Nov. 9, 1522; d. at Brunswick, April 8, 1586; lost his father when he was eleven years old, and finished his education under very difficult circumstances. From 1539 to 1542 he studied at Magdeburg, preparing for the university, but was then compelled to go to Calbe, and afterwards to Writzen, and teach school, in order to earn money enough to continue his studies. In 1545 he came to Wittenberg, and attached himself closely to Melanchthon, on whose advice he studied mathematics and astrology, and who, in 1547, sent him to Königsberg with a letter of recommendation to Dr. Sabinus. In Königsberg he lived as tutor to some young Polish noblemen, as rector of the school of Kneiphof, and as a practical astrologer; which last business brought him in connection with Duke Albrecht, who in 1550 made him his librarian. From this time he began to concentrate himself on theology, having ascertained the looseness of the foundation on which astrology rested. He studied the Bible, and began to lecture in the university on Melanchthon's Loci Theologicæ; and his lectures attracted so much attention, that in 1554 he was called to Brunswick as coadjutor to the superintendent. In 1560 appeared in Cologne the Censura de Hereticiis, and became the first theologian of the Reformation. His Loci Communes, however, were not published until after his death (1592), by Polycarp Leyser.

CHEMOSH (subduer), the national deity of the Moabites, who are called the people of Chemosh, just as the Israelites were the people of Jehovah (Num. xxi. 29; Jer. xlvi. 48); identical with Molech, the god of the Ammonites (Judg. xi. 24). Solomon introduced (1 Kings xi. 7), and Josiah suppressed, his worship in Jerusalem (2 Kings xxii. 13). The Moabitish worship of Chemosh has received unexpected illustration by the Moabitic Stone (C. D. Ginsburg: The Moabitic Stone, 2d ed., London, 1871). It was to Chemnitz that Mesha offered his son (2 Kings iii. 27). See MEISA; MOAB; MOABITE STONE.

CHERUB, CHERUBIM (uncertain derivation, perhaps from strong, hence terrible). Cherubim are a distinct order of beings from angels; for they are always in the immediate presence of God, whereas angels are not (Exod. xxv. 18). They are winged, while angels are not. The Bible descriptions of their appearance are rather vague. Nothing very intelligible is said about their shape, except that they are winged. According to the Hebrews' primitive conception, they were the bearers of God when he appeared in glory upon earth (Ps. xviii. 10; Ezek. xi. 22); the witnesses of God's presence, wherever they are, are he. Very appropriately, therefore, were representations of them placed in the Holy of holies, both in the tabernacle, when the golden figures stood upon the mercy-seat (Exod. xxxvii. 8), and in the temple, where they were of colossal size (fifteen feet high), and stood on the floor, overshadowing the ark, which was between them (1 Kings vi. 27). They were pictured upon the curtains (Exod. xxvi. 1, 91, xxxvi. 8, 35), and upon all parts of the temple (1 Kings vi. 29, 32, 35, vii. 29, 36). Thus was testified the truth that God was in the midst of his people, and also the further ideas, that the holy places were under sleepless surveillance, and God by them was covered from the irreverent gaze of men. God is said to be dwelling in the Ark (Ps. xxxii. 5, 8), associated as dwelling between the cherubim (Num. vii. 89; 1 Sam. iv. 4; 2 Sam. vi. 2; 2 Kings xix. 15; 1 Chron. xiii. 6; Ps. lxxxi. 1, xci. 1; Isa. xxxii. 16). After the fall, it is said (Gen. iii. 24) God placed the cherubim, and a flaming sword (a separate thing not a sword in the hand of a cherub), to keep the way of the tree of life. The garden, having been the scene of God's presence, was an appropriate, indeed necessary, place for the cherubim (see above).

Much study has been given to the supposed non-Hebraic origin of the cherubim; but, although analogous shapes are found upon Egyptian and Assyrian monuments, it remains to be proven that these were patterns, in any sense, of the cherubim of the tabernacle and temple. What is much more likely is, that the cherubim of Ezekiel are thought to be developments of the earlier ideas under the influence of the surrounding cultus. In regard to Ezekiel, it has been noticed that he has two different sorts of cherubim in his prophecy. 1. In xxvii. 14 he calls the king of Tyre, in a passage of great beauty, “the anointed cherub” that covereth with his wings the holy things: in other words, the king is said to have been raised to a divine throne. The cherub here appears as a divine being, who upon the mount of the gods has his fire-encircled seat. There is no such use of language in the non-Hebraic peoples. The second sort of cherubism is that in i., iii. 13, xi. 22, cf. xii. 18 sq. Here we find, for the first time, a description of the shape of the cherubim, which, however, does not go far. They have four faces, four arms and hands, four wings, are covered over with eyes, stand between wheels which have wheels in them, so that they can move in any direction. They carry the throne of God. In this conception we trace Babylonian influence; for winged gods, and animals with men’s faces, and rie cerat, are common on their monuments. In Ezekiel, as in other parts of the Bible, we trace the connection between the cherubim and the thunderstorm, in which God manifests himself. There is the same fire of lightning running to and fro, and the same roar as of rumbling wheels.

Later Jewish speculation resulted in a change in the conception. The cherubim appear in the Book of Enoch, but not as the guardians of the places of God’s appearance upon the earth, but of the heavenly throne itself. They are higher than the seraphim and the ophanim, are nearest the throne, and are the sleepless watchers (Enoch xiv. 11, 18, xx. 7. lxxi. 10 sq., lxxi. 6 sq., cf. xxxix. 12 sq.). In the Apocalypse this later conception is again modified. The cherubim [who in the authorized version misleadingly are called beasts] are four in number, each resembling a different animal (iv. 6, 7); have six wings (iv. 8), like Isaiah’s seraphim (Isa. vi. 2); are the guardians (and give the seer invitation to approach, vi. 1, 3, 5, 7), not the bearers, of the throne of God; and are vocal (cf. Isa. vi. 3), not silent; are, indeed, leaders of the unceasing praises of heaven (Rev. iv. 8–10). A remarkable variation from the old Hebraic idea is the statement that one of the cherubim gave unto the seven angels the seven golden vials full of the wrath of God (xv. 7).

As the cherub-concept from the beginning served substantially to set forth a lively notion of the holiness, and particularly of the glory, of God as the Creator, and as Employer, of all things to show forth his majesty and power, so the Christian Church, as fruit of the previous development, holds fast to the notion that in the highest rank of heavenly creatures stand the angels, who, in power to reflect, and eloquence to proclaim, the glory of God, transcend all others; and from them eternally goes forth the wondrous ascriptions of honor and power unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, for ever and ever. CHILI, The Republic of, established Feb. 16, 1817, and numbered 1,938,861 inhabitants in 1869, most of whom were of pure Spanish descent. The number of independent Indians, the so-called Araucanians, is estimated at seventy thousand. The religion of the State is Roman Catholic, though the public worship of other denominations is tacitly allowed. The president of the republic, however, appoints the bishops; and no papal bull or episcopal letter can be published in the country without his placet. At the head of the Church stands the Archbishop of Santiago, with three suffragans,—La Serena, or Coquimbo, Concepcion, and Ancud, or Chiloé. The number of priests is insufficient, but there are no means to provide for any more. The Church of Chili was never rich; and after the separation from Spain, the State seized all the estates of the Church, and also the tithes. As compensation, the State assumed the duty to pay the clergy, but is not always able to fulfil it. There are two theological seminaries, and a theological faculty at the University of Santiago. Twenty missionary stations, kept by the Capuchins, Franciscans, and Jesuits, and supported by the State, are laboring among the Indians. Some of the monasteries had their property restored to them in 1830, on the condition that they should establish free schools for poor people. In Valparaiso the foreigners—Englishmen, Americans, and Germans—form two small Protestant congregations. In the city of Valdivia and Llanquihue the German settlers have an evangelical minister residing at Puerto-Montt. Another evangelical congregation was afterwards formed at Asorno.

CHILINGWORTH, William, b. at Oxford, October, 1602; d. at Chichester, Jan. 30 (?) 1644. He was made a fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, 1628; and was converted to Romanism by the Jesuit, John Piercy, alias John Fisher, who, with others of the Society of Jesus, was at that time particularly active among the talented young men of the universities and the gentry, and successful in proselyting. The marriage of Charles I. with Henrietta Maria of France (1625) had deepened the interest in the question as to the proofs ecclesiastical to the country, and Rome did her best to bring the nation over to her side. Chillingworth was persuaded to go to Douay; but his godfather, Laud, then Bishop of London, put the Protestant side so forcibly to him, that he determined to leave Douay, returned to Oxford, and wrote his great work of question de novo. The result of his investigations was his hearty acceptance of Protestant teaching. A controversy had sprung up between
Dr. Christopher Potter, Provost of Queen's College, Oxford, and Matthias Wilson, alias Edward Knott. The latter had published, in 1630, the little tractate, Charity Mistrusts; and to it Dr. Potter replied in 1633. Wilson replied to him, in Mercy and Truth, 1634. Chillingworth took a deep interest in the discussion, carefully studied the question, and replied to Wilson, in the famous The Religion of Protestants a Safe Way to Salvation, 1635, Charity Mistaken; and to it Dr. Potter replied in 1636. Wilson, the Augustinian, and the Augustinian, were each armed with a projection which would rest on the pluteis, which ran upon cart-wheels, and had a musket-proof covering to conceal the assailants, who shot through holes; they were further provided with a projection which would rest on the breastworks, and so form a bridge over the ditch into the city. In December, 1643, he was taken prisoner at Arundel Castle, when laid up by illness; and in January, 1644, he was conveyed to the bishop's palace at Chichester, where he died. A strange scene occurred at his funeral. A devout Puritan, who happened to be in the town, scandalized all decency by flinging a copy of the Bible with the utmost kindness, secured him the lodgings in the palace, nursed him, and vigorously defended his reputation, but, by his further efforts to convert him, is said to have shortened his days; and at the funeral he outraged all decency by flinging a copy of the Religion of Protestants into the open grave, exclaiming, "Get thee gone, thou cursed book go rot with thine author." He afterwards published his Chillingworth Novissima, 1644. Chillingworth was estimable for piety, modesty, and learning, for genius, acuteness, and enthusiasm. He was the best reasoner, and the most acute logician, of his age. The charge of Socinianism was brought against him by Cheynell and others; but, as Tillotson sadly explains, in that day every one that offered to give a reasonable account of his faith, and to establish religion upon rational principles, was presently branded for a Socinian. Besides, the charge of Socinianism admitted many treatises of much, though, in comparison, minor value. The best edition of his Works: reprint of the tenth folio edition of 1742, containing life by Dr. Birch, Oxford, 1838, 3 vols. 8vo; American reprint, Phila., 1840. China.

China, Christian Missions in. The knowledge that so populous an empire was ignorant of the gospel of Christ was an incentive to his followers in early times to preach it to the Chinese; and about A.D. 505 the Nestorians had missions among them. Very little authentic information, however, concerning the extent and thoroughness of their work, has been preserved. Not a single fragment of their religious literature in Chinese has been discovered, nor any portion of the Bible; no legend or ruins of an ancient church remain to bear witness of their work. The only certain relic is a stone tablet dated A.D. 781, still standing in Si-nan, the ancient capital of China. Its author was Liu Siu-yen, a court-counsellor; and it records the establishment of the King Kiao, or Illustrious Religion, in that city, with the consent of the Emperor Kien-chung.

Nestorian churches are mentioned by travellers as late as the fourteenth century; but their extinction leads to the sad conclusion, that, like the church at Sardis, they were all dead, while they had a name to live. Shut off from constant intercourse with Western Asia, dependent on a native ministry alone for their pastors, and these having no Chinese version of the Scriptures to guide and animate them, it is not surprising that ritualism, ignorance, poverty, and dissensions, gradually destroyed the mission. The Roman-Catholic Church took up the missionary work a little while before the Nestorians had entirely quitted it; and Nicholas IV. sent John de Monte Corvino, who reached Peking in 1292, while Kublai khan was living. He labored alone eleven years; when Clement V. made him archbishop, on hearing of his zeal and success, sent him seven assistants. He translated the Psalms and New Testament into Mongolian; and at his death, in 1328, he had converted more than thirty thousand infidels. At this distance of time it is impossible to ascertain what these conversions really amounted to. But the seed sown seems to have been like that which fell on stony ground; for after the expulsion of the Mongol rulers from China in 1369, nothing survived of these numerous churches or their bishops. John of Florence, one of the Pope's nuncios in China, returned to Europe in 1355, after an absence of twelve years.

The next attempt was made by Xavier in 1552, but he died just at landing; and China remained till 1580 without a Christian teacher. Matthew Ricci and Michael Ruggiero were then designated by Valignani, and entered upon their work with zeal and tact. The details of their efforts, disappointments, and skillful uses of means and ends, calculated to promote their purpose. At Ricci's death, in 1610, he was at the head of a large body of coadjutors, scattered in many cities between the capital and Canton, who were gathering churches among the people, and propagating their tenets among all ranks. His body was buried in a plot of ground west of the city, given for the purpose by the Emperor Wanli, where, with those of many of his successors, it still remains to draw the homage of visitors and believers. His work has been minutely detailed by admiring friends. They have given its modus operandi in the full belief that its results prove its purity and power. Henceforth, and for many years, the Jesuits were regarded with such consideration, that the emperor conferred on her the title of "virtuous woman."

Other societies also entered the field. Francis and Dominican priests began their labors at various points; and, as their system of operations was unlike that of the Jesuits, differences arose which tended to further separate them. Ricci was disposed to gloss over the idolatry involved in the Chinese worship of ancestors by allowing its practice with mental reservations; and the worship of Confucius was so described, that no one needed to regard it as otherwise than the veneration due to a great sage and legislator. The imperial state worship on the altars of Heaven and Earth in Peking was also divested of its idolatrous principle, and resolved into a state craft that possessed no religion at all. The advocates on each side took their discussions to Rome, and each obtained a bull in their favor, thus providing themselves with the strongest proof of their orthodoxy they could desire. In 1689 the Jesuits appealed to the Emperor Kanghi to decide between them, stating the pith of their own belief in such a manner that he could not fail to coincide with them. He assured them that "tien means the true God, and that the custom of China are political."

Soon after Longobardi became superior-general, disorders arose in the ill-governed empire; and many among the converts desired to free themselves from the legacies to their rulers. He was aided in his efforts to maintain a discreet neutrality by Adam Schaal, whose science and skill had become well known, and whose influence reached to the farthest provinces. When the Manchus took possession of Peking in 1644, Schaal and his colleagues made friends with their chiefs during the reign of Shunchi; but during the minority of his son, in 1665, a strong opposition developed at court, and its leaders succeeded in banishing, degrading, and imprisoning them and their adherents in the capital and provinces. Schaal died of grief; and dangers thickened over the heads of his coadjutors, who were beaten, imprisoned, and ordered to leave the country; so that their enemies looked for a speedy triumph, when an earthquake at Peking delivered the missionaries by terrifying their adversaries. On the majority of Kanghi, in 1671, they were gradually restored to their positions, and Verbiest took the place of Schaal in imperial favor.

During his reign of sixty years, the extension of the missions throughout the Chinese Empire suffered little real reverse: churches, schools, and other religious establishments, multiplied in the provinces; so that it is a cause for wonder that the Romish Church did not become dominant among the people. No exact data are given of its condition; but we are told, that when at Kanghi's death, in 1722, an edict was issued for the suppression of the faith, "more than three hundred churches were destroyed or suppressed, and three hundred thousand Christians abandoned to the fury of the heathen. The dispositions which arose during the last fifteen years of his reign, about the right of the Pope to direct the worship of his subjects, had aroused a spirit of suspicion among native officials; and he began to restrain the freedom of propagating Christianity while employing the missionaries in state duties. His son Yungching was sustained in his repressive policy by the officers in the capital and provinces; so that when he died in 1735, the cause had suffered severe losses. Its noble army of martyrs had also greatly increased; and the record of their constancy, patience, and fidelity, even unto death, does honor to their profession. Their foreign teachers also suffered with them, and many sealed their ministrations with their blood. It is not possible here to describe in detail how the great expectations entertained of the prosperity and final triumph of the faith were gradually destroyed by the dispersion of the native clergy, the want of foreign teachers, and the opposition of the educated class to a heretical religion, until the fires of persecution languished and died for want of fuel, towards the end of the century. Between the years 1768 and 1820 the disturbed state of Europe crippled the resources of missionary bodies, and few of their agents went to China. At the last date an estimate of the Roman-Catholic Church in China gives 8 bishops and coadjutors, 23 missionaries, 90 native priests, and 215,000 converts, as the total community. Since then it has steadily increased; so that in 1866 the report enumerates 20 bishops, 8 coadjutors, 233 missionaries, 237 native priests, 12 colleges with 331 students, and 400,000 converts: 54 boys' and 114 girls' schools were opened in the province of Szechuen alone. In 1844 France sent a Plenipotentiary, M. Lagrené as French envoy to China; and, after the latter had signed the treaty of Whampoa, he obtained from the Chinese plenipotentiary, in reply to a memorial sent to court, an imperial rescript, which granted toleration to these long-persecuted native converts, and placed them on a higher ground than ever before. Fourteen years after, an express article in each of the four treaties negotiated at Tien-tsin gave the highest sanction to the exercise of Christianity in all its forms throughout the empire. This was about three hundred years after Xavier's death at St. John's Island, near Macao.

The character of the work of these earnest laborers, if examined by the standard of the word of God, will be found to lack many vital points, and goes far to explain why the existence of such a number of Christians scattered throughout the land has failed to elevate the morality and intelligence of the natives. The greatest deficiency in this system of evangelizing is withholding the Sacred Scriptures from the people. This keeps the great salvation hidden away under a mass of ritual ceremonies; and the person of Christ is obscured by the worship of the Virgin and numerous saints, whose pictures and images too closely resemble the same thing in Buddhist temples to be easily discriminated by ignorant converts. The hierarchy which governed and guided these converts could therefore teach for doctrines the commandments of men, and control every part of their dioceses. If, therefore, a struggle arose between the civil and religious duties of the converts, their choice was in favor of the new faith; and the officers of the Chinese Government naturally resorted to force, oppression, and injustice, to maintain their power. This struggle has already developed some irritation and suspicion on the part of influential scholars and high officers, and contains in it the germs of serious troubles in the future.

The results of over two hundred years of unopposed proselytism in China by Roman-Catholic missionaries, as shown in the morals, learning, enterprise, and self-sustaining power of their converts, are sufficient proofs, that without the direct, continual instruction in the word of God, no heathen nation can ever be elevated to become a free and intelligent Christian people. Yet it is likewise true, that the good effects of so many years of careful labor are seen in many villages and communities of peaceable, industrious, and obedient believers attached to their worship. These Christian sects are found in all the provinces; and their members are generally superior to their pagan countrymen.

It was therefore, in the providence of God, a preparation for the new relations into which the ultra-Gaudentic nations were to be forced by Christian powers during this century, that the Protestant churches in Europe and America were led to establish their missions in all of them as soon as the way was opened. China was occupied first. Robert Morrison, the pioneer of Protestant missions to all that region, was told by the officers of the London Missionary Society, at his departure in 1807, that, after he had learned the Chinese language, "he might have the honor of forming a Chinese church more composite and correct than any preceding one, or the still greater honor of translating the Sacred Scriptures into a language spoken by a third part of the human race." He earned both these honors, and published the dictionary and translation before his return to England in 1824. The cordial reception extended to him by all classes—from King George IV. to the cottagers in his home at Newcastle—indicated the national sense of his services.

The year of his death (1834) saw the winding-up of the East India Company's establishment in China, and the commencement of the new era. During the past half-century the evangelizing labors of both divisions of Christians have gone on among the Chinese. The same toleration acts contained in the treaties now give each of them access to all parts of the empire, and allow a candid comparison of their modes of operation, many of which, are, of course, alike; as schools, theological seminaries, erection of chapels, orphanages, and churches, etc.

Protestant missions in China really date from 1814, when their agents first occupied the five newly opened ports. The missionaries presently procured chapels in convenient positions for the daily preaching of the gospel, and thereby soon became known to the common people in and around the cities. Connected with the missions was usually a hospital, where diseases and wounds were attended to by a trained physician as far as the means allowed; and the crowd of patients became also a company of auditors to hear the message of salvation. The first institution of this kind was opened at Canton in 1835, by Dr. Peter Parker, and has since been imitated, with uniform success, at about twenty other places. The Canton hospital has received about seven hundred and fifty thousand patients since it began; and, like the others, its operations have been aided by the donations of foreign residents in China.

Printing-offices were also opened in three or four central stations, and four or five fonts of movable metallic types (each containing nearly eight thousand sorts) cut and cast, with which printing could be cheaply done. These types have also furnished the natives with facilities for issuing newspapers, thus incidentally starting one of the powerful agencies of their education. The printing-offices and foundries at Shanghai, Hongkong, Canton, Foochow, and Peking, have issued millions of copies of works upon religion, science, history, and geography, besides many copies of the Bible in whole or in part, nearly all of which were written and translated by the missionaries. Their quality, variety, and usefulness vary greatly, of course; but all tend to one point,—the explanation and enforcement of God's truth and works. In addition to purely Chinese books, about three hundred others have been printed at these offices, —dictionaries, vocabularies, phrase-books, grammars, and numerous separate treaties of a more scientific character, besides periodical publications in the English as well as Chinese languages. From all these sources the natives have learned more, in thirty-five years, about God and their fellow-men, and their duties to each, than they had previously learned since they were a people.

their command. Through these schools and the public preaching, the missionaries have aimed more directly to carry out Christ’s command: “Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you.” Calling in the aid of native converts to supplement their own teachings, it has been shown, as it was in apostolic times, that no agency can take the place of the living voice in arousing dull intellects, vivifying dead consciences, and leading men to the cross of Christ. In a country where common schools are within the reach and means of even the very poor, it is not necessary to spend time and money in extensive plans of education. The children of converts, are, however, gathered under the care of the Church, and parents thereby taught their new responsibilities in training their offspring in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Chinese education does not much have given in ordinary cases; and the energies of the ladies who have in recent years joined the missions are much directed to the training of girls.

In no one respect is the difference between the two bodies of missionaries now pursuing their work in China more apparent than to the mass of people than in the oral preaching of the gospel. The open door of the wayside chapel, where usually stands a foreign or native teacher to invite the passers-by to enter, and hear the Word, is known in the neighborhood or village as one of the common tokens of their presence. Curiosity, for a while, draws the residents and strangers to fill the house. Out of the hundreds who hear little or much, with more or less comprehension of the truth, some are led to inquire more, and their hearts become the honest ground where fruit grows up to eternal life. But everybody at first is aroused, and learns something of the foreigner and his message. It is difficult for a stranger to understand the utter ignorance of the great body of natives of every thing pertaining to other lands; but a few years’ chapel-preaching in a town, is the result of removing much of this ignorance and prejudice. The divine declarations, “The entrance of thy words giveth light, it giveth understanding unto the simple,” is found to be constantly verified. The erection of large and expensive churches at foreign expense has been usually discouraged by Protestants. Such is not the plan of the Romish missions. An imposing edifice for the ceremonies of their Church by its bishops and priests is erected, and thus becomes a centre to attract and hold their converts, around which they group their schools and seminaries, and provide retreats for their missionaries. Some of these establishments of Christian dimensions, and prepare hundreds of catechists and native clergymen.

The growing power of the Christian Church in China renders statistics of its condition at a given time of comparatively little value. In 1879 the enlargement of Protestant missions was pushed with vigor. Out of a total of 406 men and women sent out by twenty-five societies from the United States, Great Britain, and Germany, about 280 were ordained ministers and physicians, distributed over missions and 532 out-stations in ten provinces, and assisted by 1,089 native pastors, and 8,057 helpers, colporteurs, and schoolmasters. They reported 18,707 communi- cants of both sexes in their churches, and 6,227 children in day and boarding schools, for whose education, and other religious objects, $8,571 had been contributed by the Christians in 1876. About 725 churches and chapels had been erected up to that year; and 18 hospitals were opened, where nearly 100,000 patients had been treated. No satisfactory data of the myriad copies of Sacred Scriptures, in whole or in part, and of tracts, sold and distributed, can be obtained. The estimates derived from these figures and statements, showing the progress made in leaning the dormant mind of China with religious, scientific, and political truths, will be very imperfect if their collateral results on the vast mass of people not yet reached personally by foreigners is not also considered.

These figures need only to be contrasted with the condition of mission-work at Missionary Death, in 1834, when two missionaries and four converts formed the entire working-force in the empire, to be assured that God’s time for the fulfilment of his ancient promise through Isaiah (xl. 12), “Lo these from the land of Sinim,” has at last fully come.

Choir, a body of men, or of boys, or of men and boys, or of men and women, performing or leading the song which forms part of the Christian service. There was a choir in the Jewish temple: after the time of David it was at certain occasions composed of no less than four thousand singers. There was also a choir at the worship of Bacchus, singing and dancing around his altar; and this choir became the nucleus of the Greek tragedy. Indeed, the choir seems to have formed part of all public religious worship. For ‘choir,” as an architectural term, see Architecture. Christian.

Chorazin, a city of Galilee, not mentioned in the Old Testament, nor by Josephus, and only twice in the New Testament (Matt. xi. 21; Luke x. 13), which is not connected with Caesarea and Bethsaida. The etymology of the name is uncertain. Origen (Migne’s ed. ii. p. 280) makes it a Greek name, Χωρα Ζιν (“district of Zin”); but the manuscripts give Χοραζκιν, or Χωραζιν, which, if of Hebrew derivation, might mean “woodland.” Its identification is still a matter of sharp controversy, along with that of Capernaum and Bethsaida. Ritter, who was never in Palestine, puts Bethsaida at Khan Minyeh, Chorazin at Tabiga, and Capernaum at Tell Hūm. Some writers put Bethsaida at Tabiga, Capernaum at Tell Hūm, and Chorazin at Kerazeh (two miles north of Tell Hūm), without assigning any place to Khan Minyeh. Robinson puts Capernaum at Khan Minyeh, Bethsaida (about two-thirds of a mile farther north) at Tabiga, and Chorazin (about a mile and a half north of Tabiga) at Tell Hūm. In support of this theory we have first of all the positive statement of Jerome (Migne’s ed., iv. p. 124), that these three places were all of them, with Tiberias, on the shore of the Lake of Gennesaret. Kerazeh is a good long two miles away from the lake, and the remains of buildings found there are not apparently very ancient. The inhabited site of Chorazin, which, in the time of Eusebius (Onomasticon, Lassow and Parthey’s ed., p. 375), was already deserted, may have taken the old name along with them to the new site; as in the case of Saracena by the seaside, which is now Surafend upon the hill, a mile and a quarter off. We have also the itinerary of the German bishop, Willibald, who visited Pak tin about the middle of the eighth century, and, in going up on the west side of the lake, went from Tiberias, through Magdala, to Capernaum, Bethsaida, and Chorazin (TOLHERS Descriptiones Terrarum, 1874, p. 63). This order of places is exactly that of Robinson. [For another view,

CHOREPISCOPI, i.e., lit. "country bishops," those who acted as bishops in distant rural districts under the authority of some city bishop.
They were a class between bishops proper and presbyters, and appeared first in Asia Minor, at the close of the third century, because there and then the impossibility of careful oversight of all the interests of large dioceses was first felt.
In the West they are mentioned first in the fifth century. They performed such episcopal duties as the ordination of readers, exorcists, subdeacons, but only rarely of deacons or presbyters, and never of bishops, confirmation in their own district, and the granting of letters dimissory; they also assisted at the Lord's Supper in the mother church in the city. One of the subsidiary yet important uses to which the office could be put was to make a place for schismatical bishops who had returned to the Church. In both parts of the Church they were common. But the office depaired and vanished. In the West its place was taken by the archdeacons, although in France and Germany the title was long given to an alto-
for a time among the schismatics. A modern analogy is the English suffragan bishop. See art. Choraeepiscopi, in SMITH and CHEETHAM:

CHRISM (from χρίσαω, "oil," or "unction"), the consecrated oil, or mixture of oil and balsam, which is used in the Greek and Roman Church in the administration of baptism, extreme unction, applied respectively to the crown of the head, the forehead, and the organs of the five senses, the loins, and the feet. The use dates far back into the Christian Church.
The earliest testimonies are, TERTULLIAN: De Baptismo, c. 7; ST. CYPRIAN: Epist. 71, c. 2; Apost. Consec., VII. 48, § 3; 44 § 1. The right to consecrate chrism is, since the Council of Toledo (389), an episcopal privilege in the Western Church: in the Eastern it is reserved for the patriarchs alone.

CHRISMA. The word is applied to, (1) The vessel or flask which held the chrism, (2) A cloth for covering relics, (3) Chrism, see below.

CHRISMA, the white cloth with which the Roman priest covers the head of an infant after the administration of baptism; hence the expression, a "christened child." Before the introduction of infant baptism, the catechumen received a white robe, chrismalis: which word is also used of the vessel in which the chrism was preserved.

CHRIST JESUS. See JESUS CHRIST.

CHRIST, Monogram of. In the Roman cata-comb the monogram of Christ, consisting of the first letters of his name, X and P, combined in various manners, and sometimes further adorned with an added Alpha and Omega; which article see. By Constantine this monogram was applied to the military standards, coins, etc. See MRS. JAMESON and Lady EAST-LACE: History of our Lord as exemplified in Works

CHRIST, The Order of, was founded in 1317
by Dionsysius, King of Portugal, under the name of the Knights of Jesus Christ, and for the purpose of defending Algarbia against the Moors.
In the beginning of the sixteenth century the order had four hundred and fifty canons and enormous revenues. In 1550 the grand-master ship was forever combined with the Portuguese crown by Pope Paul IV. In 1780 the order was abolished, and its estates confiscated. Its titles and insignia are now simply a token of royal favor.

CHRIST, Pictures of. None of the evangelgists gives us the least hint with respect to the personal appearance of Christ; and when afterwards a tradition began to form, it was evidently the product of incidental circumstances. The persecuted Church of the first three centuries liked to imagine Christ in his state of humiliation, starting from the prophetic description of the suffering Messiah in Ps. xxii. and Isa. li.; the victorious Church liked to imagine him in his state of elevation, starting from the Messianic pictures in Ps. xiv. and the Song of Solomon.
The first formal description of the personal appearance of Christ is found in a Latin letter, which pretends to have been written by Publicius Lentulus, a contemporary of Pilate, and "president of the people of Jerusalem" (there was no such office), and sent to the Roman Senate.
Christ is here described as "a man of noble and well-proportioned stature, with a face full of kindness and yet firmness, so that the beholders were amazed at the face of him whom they had seen to laugh, but oftentimes to weep." The letter was first discovered in a manuscript copy of the works of Anselm from the twelfth century, and it is certainly not older than the fourth century. Another description is found in the works of John of Damascus, Epist. ad Theoph.
Imp. de venerandis Imag., from the eighth century;
and a third, in the Church History of Nicephorus
I. 40, from the fourteenth century. Christ is here represented with long, waving, blond hair, and pale olive complexion. Besides these traditions and formal descriptions may be mentioned as materials utilized by modern artists in pictures of Christ, the two so-called portraits of Christ,— that sent to King Abgarus, and that imprinted on the handkerchief of Veronica. See the articles on ABGAR and VERONICA. Modern pictures of Christ show generally, either the CHRISTIAN, Origin of the Name. The Greek word used is a transliteration of the Latin Christus, the nickname meaning ‘partisan of Christ,’ given by the people of Antioch to the believers in the new religion brought there by those driven from Jerusalem by the persecution after Stephen’s death (Acts x. 19, 26). The name may have been given in ridicule, for the Antiochenes were known for their scurrilous wit; but the time had come for naming an anointed, popular, intelligent, and holy name, those who were in religion neither Gentiles nor Jews. The name arose, probably, in the mistaken belief that Christ was a proper name; nevertheless, it was the fittest, most honorable, possible: it expressed the distinguishing features of the Christian religion. It is a Person, not a system of ethics or of divinity; it is a Life, not a thought; it is, moreover, Christ, the Messiah, the Son of God, whose partisans we are, not Jesus, the Son of man,—a name common among the Jews. And it is striking, that whereas “Christian” is a term of respect all the world over, notwithstanding its meaning to the Jews, the minority in denying the Greek form of this word is suggestive. (Bishop Lightfoot is in error, when he asserts that the name comes from the Hebrew Cristinu, and is a transliteration of the Latin Christus.) It is a combination of the two widespread languages, Greek and Latin, reminding us that Christianity desires not concealment, but publicity, and by declaring that in all tongues the name of Christ shall be heard. The Christian Connection, or Christians, one of the grandest fruits in the history of combined Christianity, patriotism, and philanthropy. It was first proposed by Mr. Vincent Colyer of New York, in a letter written Aug. 22, 1861, to his colleagues of the New-York Young Men’s Christian Association Committee, and originated by a call of the young Men’s Christian Association of New York (Sept. 23, 1861) upon all similar associations in the North, to unite in a convention to consider the religious needs of the soldiers. The idea was approved by the National Committee of the Young Men’s Christian Association of the United States of America, which proclaimed the principles of the denomination, was formed in 1864. But a union was quickly effected between these different organizations, inasmuch as the expulsive force was found to be in each case the same,—the desire to be free from the “bondage of creed.” But although the Bible is their only authoritative rule of faith and practice, yet the general characteristics of their belief may be determined. They are antitrinitarians, yet call Christ a divine Saviour, and acknowledge the Holy Spirit to be the power and energy of God; immersionists, yet open communists of the widest kind, extending their fellowship to Christians of every name. In ecclesiastical polity they are congregational, but have annual State conventions, and quadrennial general conventions. At first their ministry was not well educated; but now the sect has several amounts of good done was of course incalculable. The Sanitary Commission looked after the bodies of the soldiers. The Christian Commission, after their souls; but at the same time the bodily comfort were cared for, and the soldier’s comfort was much increased. The soldiers knew where they were at home daily prayers on their behalf; and on the very battlefield God was invoked to bless the right. The evils of camp-life wereameliorated; the wounded were treated, and given spiritual comfort. Into a Christian’s ear the dying told his secret, or gave his last bequests. An aggressive work for Christ was carried on amid all the distractions of war. Bibles, hymnals, tracts, religious newspapers and books, were distributed, and personal work was done. Two special works were taken up. The Commission was the medium of speedy and safe communication between the soldiers and sailors and their friends at home; and, besides, it circulated “Loan-Libraries” of general literature through the army. The money collected for this authorized purpose aggregated nearly $2,750,000; but counting in the gifts of books, etc., and the value of the facilities gratuitously given, the official Annuals of the United States Christian Commission reckon the total amount as $8,291,107.65 (p. 729). Of course these figures do not tell the whole story; but they show how ready the Christian public was to give, to carry on the work of the Commission. The final meeting of the Christian Commission was held on Sunday evening, Feb. 11, 1866, in the hall of the House of Representatives, Washington, D.C. The leading men in this movement were the president, Mr. George H. Stuart of Philadelphia, and Dr. Nathan Bishop of New York. For a full and very interesting account of the grand work, see LEMUEL MOSS: Annals of the U. S. Christian Commission, Phila., 1868.

CHRISTIAN UNION CHURCHES.

institutions of learning, including the Christian Union College at Merom, Ind. They are distributed throughout the United States and Canada. Their membership in the United States is about two hundred thousand. See the general histories of the different denominations in the United States by Winerbrenner (1844), and by Belcher (1855); also Baird: Religion in America (1856).

CHRISTIAN UNION CHURCHES OF THE WEST. This body of Christians arose in the West in 1863-64. The official statement of their principles is as follows: 1. The oneness of the Church; 2. Christ the only head; 3. The Bible, the only rule of faith and practice; 4. "Good fruits," the only condition of membership; 5. The repudiation of controversy; 6. Each local church self-governed; 7. No partisan politics preached. They have no creed; but they unite cordially with organized Christian churches in supporting such institutions as the American Bible and the American Tract Society; and their pulpits are open to all denominations which they recognize as sound. The body holds a general council every four years, and each State a separate yearly council. They claim to number about a hundred thousand members. It seems to be a purely ephemeral movement. See art. in supplementary volume to Appleton's Cyclopædia, pp. 803, 804.

CHRISTIANS OF ST. JOHN. Some Carmelite missionaries laboring in the regions of Basrah and Susa, in the middle of the seventeenth century, met there with a body of Christians who called themselves Nazaraeans or Mendaeans, but by the Mohammedans were called Sabhians. They pretended to be the descendants of the disciples of John the Baptist, and to have been driven away from the regions of the Jordan by the Mohammedans; hence their name, "Christians of St. John." Give them to the missionaries. Their holy books are written in an Aramaean dialect. One of them has been published, with a Latin translation, Codex Nazarens, by Matth. Norberg, London, 1815-16, 3 vols. See Ignatius A Jesu: Narratio Originis, Rituum, et Epistolarum S. Iacobi, Rome, 1655.

CHRISTIANS OF ST. THOMAS, or, as they call themselves, The Syrian Church of Malagala; a Christian sect living in the southern part of the Malabar coast of India; pretend to be the descendants of the converts of the apostle Thomas on his visit to India, but originated, probably, from some early Nestorian colony. In the sixth century they were in regular communication with the Nestorian Church of Western Asia; and, though this connection was afterwards disturbed, their whole tradition rests on a Nestorian basis. When the Portuguese reached India, they found the church, numbering about sixteen thousand families, in a very poor condition, and under their protectorate its very independence and natural character were threatened. In 1569 the Archbishop of Goa brought it in connection with the Jesuits; and the conversion began; but in 1653 most of the converts again broke off from the Roman Church, and at present one-half, comprising about ninety-seven churches, follow their old Syrian rites, while the rest conforms to the Church of Rome. The language of the liturgy is not the Malabar, but the Syriac. See W. Germain: Die Kirche der Thomaschristen, Gütersloh, 1877.

CHRISTMAS, a Christian festival celebrated on Dec. 25, in memory of the birth of Jesus Christ. The English name Christmas, like the Dutch Kerstmis, or Kersmis, is formed analogous to such names as Candlemas, Michaelmas, etc. In the Romance languages the name is derived from the Latin Natalis, Natalititia, or Nativitas, Italian Natal, Spanish Natal, or Natalidad, French Noël. The German Weihnacht is a literal translation of the Hebrew Chanuka, the name of the Jewish festival of the dedication or purification of the temple by Judas Maccabeus. The Scandinavian Jaul, and the Anglo-Saxon God, mean "wheel," and refer to the winter solstice.

When the festival of Christmas is first spoken of in the ancient Church (Clement of Alexandria: Stromata, lib. I., cap. 21), it was celebrated by the Eastern Church on Jan. 6, under the name of Epiphania, and by the Western Church on Dec. 25, under the name of Natalis. The discrepancy is easily accounted for, however, by the circumstance that the gospel gives no date of Christ's birth, but simply tells that it took place during night. But the date of the Epiphania is arbitrary, so far as it rests upon an inference of merely allegorical import,—the first Adam was born on the sixth day: consequently the second Adam ought also to be born on a sixth day,—and the festival itself had something allegorical in its character. It was celebrated, not so much in memory of the actual birth of Christ, as in memory of the first manifestation of the divinity of Christ; the name Epiphania being the word commonly used in the Greek language to denote the manifestation of a god in human shape. Later on, however, from the beginning of the fourth century, when the restless searchings of the nature and person of Christ drove men's mind into many singular errors, the Eastern Church began to feel the importance of emphasizing the actual birth of Christ by a separate festival distinct from the Epiphania, with its somewhat vague historical bearing; and from a sermon of Chrysostom, delivered on the name of Natalis December 25, it appears that the Natalis of the Western Church was rapidly though gradually adopted throughout the East.

What foundation there originally was for the Roman date of Dec. 25 is difficult to decide. On account of this date, some connect the Christian festival of Christmas with the above-mentioned Jewish feast, Chanuka; and many features seem to speak for such a relation between them. Others connect it with the Saturnalia, or Brumalia, or some other pagan Roman feast; and here, too, the single features are often strikingly reminiscent. Others, again (Lighthof, Jablonsky, Munter), inveigh against the date as arbitrary, and not in harmony with the gospel narrative, etc. Nevertheless the fact remains, that the whole Western Church unanimously agreed upon this date, and that the 25th December and the conversion began; but in 1653 most of the converts again broke off from the Roman Church, and at present one-half, comprising about ninety-seven churches, follow their old Syrian rites, while the rest conforms to the Church of Rome. The date once fixed, Christmas gradually be-

CHRISTOLOGY.

CHRISTOLOGY (Χριστολογία, from Ἰησοῦς and λόγος, as "theology" is from ὄς and λόγος). It embraces the doctrine of Christ's person; while soteriology is the doctrine of Christ's work, and the doctrine of salvation. Some writers include both the person and work under the term; but when we confine it here to the former, although we admit, of course, the inseparable connection. The word was used by the English divines in the seventeenth century, and has recently been re-introduced from Germany. Christology is based upon the life and testimony of Christ, as represented historically in the Gospels, and as reflected doctrinally and experimentally in the Acts and Epistles. It treats of the mystery of the incarnation (in the wider sense of the term), (1) the humanity, (2) the divinity, of our Lord, and (3) their relation to each other in his one person. This divine-human personality forms the basis of his work, which is the redemption, reconciliation, and re-union of men with God. It is the central doctrine of Christianity (preceded by theology and anthropology, and followed by pneumatology, soteriology, ecclesiology, and eschatology). It was the one article of St. Peter's creed, and it forms the heart of the Apostles' Creed. The leading evangelical divines of Europe and America come to agree more and more in this estimate of its importance, and the ever-increasing number of Lives of Christ strengthen the christocentric character of modern theology. Yet care must be taken not to emphasize the incarnation at the expense of the equally important doctrines of the atonement by Christ's death, and the regeneration by the Holy Spirit.

2 DR. THOMAS JACKSON (1595-1640) DEFINED IT CORRECTLY AS "THAT PART OF DIVINE REVELATION WHICH DISCLOSES THE GREAT MYSTERY OF GODLINESS,—GOD MANIFESTED IN THE HUMAN FLESH." JOHN OWEN USED THE TERM; AND ROBERT FLEMING, JAN., A SCOTISH DIVINE (D. 1716), WROTE A CHRISTOLOGY, IN 3 VOLS., LONDON, 1703-1708. SOME FRENCH WRITERS ALSO WROTE ON IT; AND THOUGH THEY have much attention to the doctrine, notwithstanding the sensibility of RENAN'S LIFE OF JESUS. LICHTENBERGER (BÜRGEL, II. 120) CORRECTLY DEFINES IT: "ON DE LA CONCEPTION DE L'ENFANCE DE JESUS CHRISt QUI SE NOUS MONTRÉE SOUS CE NOM, L'ENSEMBLE DES DOCTRINES TOUTANT LA PERSONNE DU SEPTRE JUIF.

The length of this article varies from the fact that it is complete though condensed historical summary of all the connected topics; such as Apollinarianism, Eutychianism, Nestorianism, Chalcedon, Monophysitism, Monothelitism,
CHRISTOLOGY. 452

(II) It is the unanimous teaching of the New-Testament writings, that Christ combines in a most real, though mysterious way, the double character of a unique divine Sonship and a unique sinless manhood in one harmonious personality; and that by this very constitution of his person he is qualified to be the Lord and Saviour of the human race, and the only Mediator between God and man. He represents at once the nearest approach which God can make to man, and the nearest approach which man can make to God. The orthodox christology is an attempt to formulate this "mystery of godliness," and to guard it against error; but every age must grapple anew with this problem of problems, and make it alive, and fruitful for its own intellectual and spiritual benefit.

Christ strongly asserts his humanity, and calls himself about eighty times in the Gospels the Son of man; not a son of man among other descendants of Adam, but the Son of man emphatically, as the representative of the whole race; as the second Adam, destined to bear the guilt of Adam's sin, Rom. v. and 1 Cor. xv.; as the ideal, the perfect, the absolute man, the head of a new race, the King of Jews and Gentiles, the model man for universal imitation. While putting himself on a par with us as man, he claims at the same time, as the Son of man, superiority over all, and freedom from sin, and thus stands solitary and alone as the one and only spotless human being in the midst of a fallen race, as an oasis of living water and fresh verdure, surrounded by a barren desert of sand and stone. He never fell out of harmony with God and with himself; he alone needed no repentance, no conversion, no regeneration, no pardon. This sinlessness of Christ is the great moral miracle of history which underlies all his miraculous works, and explains them as natural manifestations of his miraculous person.

On the other hand, Christ as emphatically asserts his divinity, and calls himself not simply a son of God among other children of God by adoption, but the Son of God above all others, in a peculiar sense; the Son by nature; the Son from eternity; the Son who alone knows the Father, who reveals the Father to us, who calls him, not "our" Father (as we are directed to pray), but "my" Father. He is, as his favorite disciple calls him, the "only-begotten Son" (according to some of the oldest manuscripts, "the only-begotten God," ὅνοιος); or, as the Nicene theology expresses it, "eternally begotten of the essence (ἑνίον) of the Father." He is thus represented to us by himself and his disciples as a divine-human being, truly God and truly man in one person; and his words and acts and sufferings have a corresponding character and effect. Hence he puts forth claims which in the mouth of every other man, no matter how wise and good, would sound like blasphemy or lunacy, but which from his lips appear as natural as the rays of light emanating from the sun, and which command the respect even of unbelievers, so far as to prevent any charge of pride and presumption. He represents himself constantly as being sent from God, or as having come directly from God, to teach this world what he had not learned from any school or any book. He calls himself the Light of the world, the Way, the Truth, and the Life; he invites all men to come to him, that they may find rest and peace; he claims the power to forgive sins, and to raise the dead; he says, "I am the Resurrection and the Life," and promises eternal life to every one that believeth in him. Even in the moment of his deepest humiliation, he proclaimed himself the King of truth, and the Ruler and Judge of mankind. His kingdom is to be co-extensive with the race, and everlasting as eternity itself. And with this consciousness he sent forth his disciples to proclaim the gospel of salvation to every creature, forewarning them of persecution and martyrdom, and promising no reward in this life, but pledging them his presence to the end of the world, and a crown of glory in heaven. He co-ordinates himself in the baptismal formula with the eternal Father and the eternal Spirit, and allows himself to be worshipped by the sceptical Thomas as his "Lord" and his "God."

This central truth of Christ's divine-human person and work is set forth in the New-Testament writings, as a logically- formulated dogma, but as a living fact and glorious truth, as an object of faith, a source of comfort, and a stimulus to a holy life, in humble imitation of his perfect example. This is sufficient for all practical purposes. The simple narrative of the Gospels is far more powerful for the general benefit of mankind than all the systems of theology. But the mind of the Church must meditate, and try to grasp this truth; and the New Testament itself furnishes ever new impulse and food for theological speculation. The beginning of a christology we find already in Paul and John.

II. The ANTE-NICENE CHRISTOLOGY (from A.D. 100 to the Council of Nicaea, 325). The ecclesiastical development of this fundamental dogma started from Peter's confession of the Messiahship of Jesus (Matt. xvi. 16), and from John's doctrine of the incarnate Logos (John i. 14). It was at once and by two opposed formulæs,—Ethionism and Gnosticism; the one essentially Jewish, the other essentially heathen; the one affirming the humanity of Christ to the exclusion of his divinity, the other running into the opposite error by resolving his humanity into a delusive show (ἐνσωματωμα); both agreeing in the denial of the incarnation, or the real and abiding union of the divine and human in the person of our Lord.

Besides, there arose in the second and third centuries two forms of Unitarianism or Monarchianism.

(1) The Rationalistic or Dynamic Unitarianism—represented by the Alogians, Theodotus, Artemon, and Paul of Samosata—either denied the divinity of Christ altogether, or resolved it into a mere power (leivault), although they generally admitted his supernatural generation by the Holy Spirit.

(2) The Patriffassian and Sabellian Unitarianism maintained the divinity of Christ, but merged it into the essence of the Father, and so denied the independent, pre-existent personality of Christ. So Praxeas, Noetus, Callistus (Pope Calixtus I.), Beryllus of Bостra, and Sabellius.

In antagonism with these heresies, the Church taught the full divinity of Christ (versus Ebionism and rationalistic Monarchianism), his full humanity (versus Gnosticism and Manichaeism), and his independent personality (versed Patripassianism and Sabellianism). The dogma was developed in close connection with the dogma of the Trinity, which resulted, by logical necessity, from the deity of Christ and the deity of the Holy Spirit on the basis of the fundamental truth of Monotheism.

The ante-Nicene Christology passed through many obstructions, loose statements, uncertain conjectures and speculations; but the instinct and main current of the Church was steadily towards the Nicene and Chalcedonian creed-statement, especially if we look to the worship and devotional life as well as to theological literature. Christ was the object of worship, prayer, and praise (which implies his deity) from the very beginning, as we must infer from several passages of the New Testament (John xx. 28; Acts vii. 59, 60, ix. 14, 21; 1 Cor. i. 2; Phil. ii. 10; Heb. i. 6; 1 John v. 13-15; Rev. v. 6-13), from the heathen testimony of Pliny the Younger concerning the singing of hymns to Christ as God ("Carmen Christo quasi Deo dicere," Ep. x. 97), from the singular testimony of Ignatius of Antioch which we owe to the daily morning hymn of the Eastern Church as early as the second century, from the "Ter-sanctus," from the Hymn of Clement of Alexandria to the divine Logos (Pædag. III. 12), from the statements of Origen (Contra Cels. VIII. 67), Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. V. 29), and many other testimonies. Christ was believed to be divine, and adored as divine, before he was clearly taught to be divine. Life preceded theology ("Fides pre cedit intellectum"). Many a martyr in those days of persecution died for his faith in the divinity of our Lord, with very imperfect knowledge of this doctrine. It is unfair to make the Church responsible for the speculative crudities, the experimental and tentative statements, of some ante-Nicene fathers, who believed more than they could clearly express in words. In the first efforts of the human mind to grapple with so great a mystery, we must expect many mistakes and inaccuracies. The ante-Nicene rules of faith as we find them in the writings of Irenæus, Origen, Tertullian, Cyprian, etc., are essentially agreed among themselves and with the Apostles' Creed, which appears, first, in the fourth century, especially at Rome and Aquileia. (See Rufi'nus, De Symbolo.) They all confess the divine-human character of Christ as the chief object of the Christian faith, but in the form of facts, and in simple, popular style, not in the form of doctrinal or logical statement. The Nicene Creed is much more explicit and dogmatic in consequence of the preceding contest with heresy; but the substance of the faith is the same in the Nicene and Apostles' Creeds. In these ante-Nicene Rules of Faith in Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, vol. II. 11-45.

In the Apostolic Fathers we find only simple practical, biblical statements, and reminiscences of apostolic preaching for the purposes of edification. Ignatius of Antioch does not hesitate to call Christ God without qualification (Ad Ephes. c. 18: δ' γὰρ Θεὸς ἦν Ἡσυχίας δν Χρ., c. 7; i' ναρκή γενόμενος Θεός, comp. Adv. Rom. c. 6). Polycarp calls him "the eternal Son of God" (Ad. Phil. c. 2, 8), and associates him in his last prayer with the Father and the Spirit (Martyr. Polyc. c. 14).

The theological speculation on the person of Christ began with Justin Martyr, and was carried on by Clement of Alexandria and Origen, in the East: by Irenæus, Hippolytus, and Tertullian, in the West.

Justin Martyr (d. 166) takes up the Johannean Logos idea, which proved a very fruitful germ of theological speculation. It was prepared by the Old-Testament personification of the word and wisdom of God, assumed an idealistic shape in Philo of Alexandria, and reached a realistic completion in St. John. Following the suggestion of the double meaning of the Greek λόγος (ratio and oratio), Justin distinguishes in the Logos two elements,—the immanent and the transitive; the revelation of God ad intra, and the revelation ad extra. He teaches the procession of the Logos from the free will (not the essence) of God by generation, without division or diminution of the divine substance. This begotten Logos he conceives as a hypostatical being, a person distinct from the Father, and subordinate to him. He co-ordinates God, the Son, and the prophetic Spirit, as objects of Christian worship (σεβήμενον και προσκυνόμενον, Apol. I. 6). Peculiar is his doctrine of the λόγος σπερματικός, the seminal Logos, or the Word disseminated among men, i.e., Christ before the incarnation, who scattered elements of truth and virtue among the heathen philosophers and poets, although they did not know it.

Clement of Alexandria (d. 220) sees in the Logos the ultimate principle of all existence (without beginning, and timeless), the revealer of the Father, the sum of all intelligence and wisdom, the personal truth, the author of the world, the source of light and life, the educator of the race, who at last became man to make us partakers of his divine nature. Like some other ante-Nicene fathers (Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and Origen), he conceived the outward appearance of Christ's humanity as a manifestation of the Logos to have been literally without form or comeliness (Isa. lii. 2, 3); but he made a distinction between two kinds of beauty,—the outward beauty of the flesh, which soon fades away; and the moral beauty of the soul, which is permanent, and shines through the servant form of our Lord (Pol. III. c. 1).

Origen (d. 254) felt the whole weight of the christological problem, but obscured it by foreign speculations, and prepared the way, both for the Arian heresy and the Athanasian orthodoxy, though more fully for the latter. On the one hand he closely approaches the Nicene Homoeousian by bringing the Son into union with the essence of the Father, and ascribing to him the attribute of eternity. He is, properly, the author of the Nicene doctrine of eternal generation of the Son from the essence of the Father (though he usually represents the generation as an act of the will of the Father). But on the other hand he teaches subordinationism by calling the Son simply God (O déos), and a second God (lētropos déos), but not the God (6 déos, or airop déos).

In his views on the humanity of Christ, he approached the semi-Gnostic doketism, and ascribed to the glorified body of Christ ubiquity (in which he was followed by Gregory of Nyssa). His enemies charged him with teaching a double Christ (anawphotos 6 and 6, and the higher Soter of the Gnostics), and a merely temporary validity of the body of the Redeemer.

With the relation of the two natures in Christ, he was the first to use the term "God-man" (66eútpofoi), and to apply the favorite illustration of fire heating and penetrating the iron, without altering its character.

The Western Church was not so fruitful in speculation, but, upon the whole, sounder and more self-consistent. The keynote was struck by Irenaeus (d. 202), who, though of Eastern origin, spent his active life in the south of France. He carries special weight as a pupil of Polycarp of Smyrna, and through him a grand-pupil of St. John, the inspired master (66e6lógoi).

He likewise uses the terms "Logos" and "Son of God" interchangeably, and conceives the distinction, made also by the Valentinians, between the inward and the uttered word, in reference to man, but contests the application of it to God, who is above all antitheses, absolutely simple and unchangeable, and in whom before and after, think and speaking, coincide. He repudiates also speculative or a priori attempts to explain the difference between the Son from the Logos, to hold to be an incomprehensible mystery. He is content to define the actual distinction between Father and Son by saying that the former is God revealing himself; the latter, God revealed. The one is the ground of revelation; the other is the actual, appearing revelation itself. Hence he calls the Father "the invisible of the Son:" and the Son, "the visible of the Father." He discriminates most rigidly the conceptions of generation and of creation. The Son, though begotten of the Father, is still, like him, distinguished from the created world as increate,—without beginning, without change, a self-existent, eternal being; all previous representations of the eternal Logos and the incarnate Christ. Expressions like "My Father is greater than I," which apply only to the Christ of history, in the state of humiliation, he refers also, like Justin and Origen, to the eternal Logos. On the other hand he is charged with leaning in the opposite direction,—towards the Sabellian and Patripassian views,—but unjustly. Apart from his frequent want of precision in expression, he steers in general, with sure biblical and churchly tact, equally clear of both extremes, and asserts alike the essential unity and the eternal personal distinction of the Logos. The incarnation of the Logos he ably discusses, viewing it both as a restoration and redemption from sin and death, and as the completion of the revelation of God and the creation of man. In the latter view, as finisher, Christ is the perfect Son of Man, in whom the likeness of man to God (the similitudo Dei), regarded as moral duty, in distinction from the image of God (imago Dei) as an essential property, becomes for the first time fully real. According to this, the incarnation would be grounded in the original plan of God for the education of mankind, and independent of the fall. It would not put out the fall, though in some other form. Yet Irenaeus does not expressly say this: speculation on abstract possibilities was foreign to his realistic cast of mind. He vindicates at length the true and full humanity of Christ against the Gnostic doctrine of the Gnostic scholasticism. He calls Christ the Son of God, like us, in body, soul, and spirit, though without sin, if he would redeem us from sin, and make us perfect. He is the second Adam, the absolute, universal man, the prototype and summing-up (morphe, recapitulatio) of the whole race. Connected with this is the beautiful idea of Irenaeus (repeated by Hippolytus), that Christ made the circuit of all the stages of human life to redeem them all (Adv. Haer. II. 25, § 4: omnes venit per semet ipsum salutare...infantes et pueros et pueros et juvenes et seniores, etc.). To carry this out he extended the life of Jesus to fifty years, and supported it by a mistaken inference from the loose conjecture of the Jews (John vii. 57), and by an appeal to tradition. He also teaches a close union of the divinity and humanity in Christ, in which the former is the active principle, and the seat of personality, the latter the passive principle and of creation. He did not teach the God-man, as the orthodox teaching; the Son into union with the Father and Son into union with the Son into union with the Son into union with the Father.

TERTULLIAN (about 220) cannot escape the charge of subordinationism. He bluntly calls the Father the whole divine substance, and the Son a part of it, illustrating their relation by the figures of the fountain and the stream, the sun and the beam. He would have two suns, he says; but he might call Christ God, as Paul does in Rom. ix. 5. The sunbeam, too, in itself considered, may be called sun, but not the sun a beam. Sun and beam are two distinct things (species) in one essence (substantia), as God and the Word, as the Father and the Son. But we must use the language too strictly, and must remember that Tertullian was especially interested to distinguish the Son from the Father, in opposition to the Patripassian Praxeas. In other respects he did the Church christology material service. He propounds a threefold hypothetical existence of the Christos: (1) The preexistent, eternal immanence of the Son in the Father, they being as inseparable as reason and word in man, who was created in the image of God, and hence in a measure reflects his being; (2) The coming-forth of the Son with the Father.

for the purpose of the creation; (3) The manifestation of the Son in the world by the incarnation. He advocates the entire yet sinless humanity of Christ, against both the doketistic Gnostics (Adv. Marcionem, De carne Christi) and the Patripassians (Adv. Praxeas). He accuses the former of making Christ, who is all truth, a half lie, and, by the denial of his flesh, resolving all his work in the flesh into an empty show. He urges against the latter that God the Father is incapable of suffering and change.

Cyprian (d. 258) marks no progress in this or any other doctrine, except that of the Catholic unity and the episcopate. He was not so much a theologian as an ecclesiastic, and a typical High-Churchman.

Dionysius, Bishop of Rome (282), came nearest the Nicene view. He maintained distinctly, in the controversy with Dionysius of Alexandria, the unity of essence, and the threefold personal distinction of Father, Son, and Spirit, in opposition to Sabellianism, tritheism, and subordinationism. His view is embodied in a fragment preserved by Augustine, De div. Spirit. Dionysi. c. 4, and Ruth Reliqu. s. III. 381).

III. The Nicene christology (from 325 to 381) is the result of struggle with Arianism and Semi-Arianism, which agitated the Eastern Church for more than half a century. The Arian heresy denied the strict deity of Christ (his co-equality with the Father), and taught that he is a subordinate divinity, different in essence from God (Trópaseœs), pre-existing before the world, yet not eternal (έπερ οὐδὲ οὐκ ἔδραμεν), himself a creature of the will of God out of nothing (εἰκος ζειος οὐκ εἰς ζωον), who created this present world, and became incarnate for our salvation. Semi-Arianism held an untenable middle ground between the Arian hetero-ousia and the orthodox homo-ousia, or co-equality of the Son with the Father, and asserted the homoi-ousia, or similarity of essence, which was a very elastic term, and might be contracted into an Arian, or stretched into an orthodox, sense, according to the general spirit and tendency of the times.

In opposition to these heresies, Athanasius of Alexandria (the father of orthodoxy, at one time " unus versus mundum"), and the three Capsadocian bishops, — Basil, Gregory of Nazianzus, and Gregory of Nyssa, — maintained and defended with superior ability, vigor, and perseverance, the homo-ousia, i.e., the essential oneness of the Son with the Father, or his eternal divinity, as the corner-stone of the whole Christian system. This doctrine triumphed in the first ecumenical council, convened by Constantine the Great; and, after a new and longer struggle, it was re-asserted in the second ecumenical council. It is briefly and tersely laid down in the chief article of the Nicono-Constantinopolitan Creed, which has stood ever since like an immovable rock:

"(We believe) ... in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only-begotten Son of God, begotten of the Father before all worlds [God of God], Light of Light, Very God of Very God, Begotten, not made, being of one substance with the Father; by whom all things were made; who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven, and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary," etc.

LIT. — On the Nicene christology see, besides the general works already quoted of Bull, Petavius, BAUR, Dörner, Hefele's dogmengesch. der niconischen Zeit, Münster, 1862; (first part, the patristic period); Schaff: Hist. of the Christ. Ch., 1871); also the art. Arianism.

IV. The Chalcedonian christology finds its normal expression in the Chalcedonian statement of 451. It was the answer of the Orthodox Church to the heresies which related to the proper constitution of Christ's theanthropic person.

These heresies are chiefly three; viz., —

(1) Apollinarism, a partial denial of the humanity, as Arianism is of the eternal deity, of Christ. Apollinaris the Younger of Laodicea (d. 390), on the basis of the Platonic trichotomy, ascribed to Christ a human body (σωμα) and animal soul (ψυχ ψυγ), but not a human spirit or reason (ψυχ λογικ, νους, πνευμα); he put the divine Logos in the place of the rational soul, and thus substituted a θεος σαρκοφος for a real ψυγουμον, — a mixed middle being for a divine-human person.

From this error it follows, either that the rational soul of man was not redeemed, or that it needed no redemption.

(2) Nestorianism (from Nestorius, Patriarch of Constantinople, d. in exile 440) admitted the full deity and the full humanity of Christ, but put them into loose mechanical conjunction, or affinity (συνώμωσα) rather than a vital and personal union (τωνωμον); and hence it objected to the unscriptural term "mother of God" (παροιμων, Deipara), as applied to the Virgin Mary, while willing to call her " mother of Christ" (αγιωσατο). (3) Eutychianism (from Eutyches, presbyter at Constantinople, d. after 451) is the very opposite of Nestorianism, and sacrificed the distinction of the two natures in Christ to the unity of the person, to such an extent as to make the incarnation an absorption of the human nature by the divine, or a deification of human nature, even of the body: hence the Eutychians thought it proper to use the phrases " God is born," " God suffered," " God was crucified," " God died."

The third and fourth ecumenical councils
CHRISTOLOGY.

(Ephesus, 431, and Chalcedon, 451) settled the question of the precise relation of the two natures in Christ's person, as the first and second (325 and 381) had decided the doctrine of his divinity. The decree of the Council of Ephesus, under the lead of the violent Cyril of Alexandria, was merely negative, a condemnation of the error of Nestorius, and leaned a little towards the opposite error of Eutyches. This error triumphed temporarily in the justly so-called "Robber Synod" of Ephesus, in 410, under the lead of Dioscurus of Alexandria, who inherited all the bad, and none of the good, qualities of his predecessor, Cyril. But Dyophysitism re-acted; and Dioscurus and Eutyches were condemned a few years afterwards by the Council of Chalcedon. This council gave a clear and full statement of the orthodox christology as follows (see the Greek and Latin text in Act. v. in Mansi's Conc. tom. vii. p. 115, and in Schaff's Creeds of Christendom, II. 62-64):—

"Following the holy Fathers, we all with one consent teach men to confess one and the same Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the same in Godhead and perfect in manhood, and also perfect in manhood, truly God and truly Man; of a reasonable soul and human body; consisting, not parted or divided into two persons, but one and the same Son, and only begotten, God the Word, the Lord Jesus Christ; as the prophets from the beginning (have declared) concerning him, and the Lord Jesus Christ himself has taught us, and the Creed of the holy Fathers has handed down to us."

The same doctrine is set forth in a more condensed form in the second part of the Symbolum Quinque, or the falsely so-called Athanasian Creed (see the Latin text, with notes, in Schaff, Creeds, etc., II. 60-71):—

"Furthermore it is necessary to everlasting salvation: that he also believe rightly [faithfully] the Incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ. For the right Faith is, that he believe and confess: that our Lord Jesus Christ himself has taught us, and the orthodox christology as follows (see the Greek and Latin text in Act. v. in MANsi's Conc., tom. XI. p. 637, and in SchAFF's Creeds of Christendom, I. 34 sq."

V. THE POST-CHALCEDONIAN CHRISTOLOGY.—

The Chalcedonian decision did not stop the controversy, and called for a supplementary statement concerning the two wills of Christ, corresponding to the two natures.

Eutychianism revived in the form of Monophysitism (μονοφησία), or the doctrine that Christ had but one composite nature (μία φύσις συνεπεξερχομένη, or μία φύσις διάφορα), it makes the humanity of Christ a mere accident of the immutable divine substance. The liturgical symbol of the Monophysites was "God has been crucified," which they introduced into the Trisagion (μόνο ο ἐμφανίζω, Πάσχων θεών, εἰς τό καθά, έκχεων σώματα): hence they are also called Theopaschites (τεοπασχηταί). The tedious Monophysite controversies convulsed the Eastern Church for more than a hundred years, weakened its power, and facilitated the conquest of Mohammedanism.

The fifth ecumenical council (held at Constantinople, 680; also called the Third Constantinopolitan Council, or the Conc. Trullanum I.) condemned the Monothelite heresy, and repeated the Chalcedonian Creed, with the following supplement concerning the two wills (Artic. xviii. in MANSI's Conc., tom. XI. p. 637, and in Schaff's Creeds, II. 72, 73):—

"And we likewise preach two natural wills in him [Jesus Christ], and two natural operations undivided, inconvertible, inseparable, unmixed, according to the doctrine of the holy fathers; and the two natural wills [are] not contrary, far from it! (as the impious heretics assert), but his human will follows the divine will, and is not resisting or reluctant, but rather subject to his divine and omnipotent will. For it was proper that the will of the flesh should be moved, but be subjected to the divine will, according to the wise Athenæus."

The same council condemned Pope Honorius as a Monothelite heretic, and his successors confirmed it. This undeniable fact figured conspicuously in the Vatican Council (1870) as an unanswerable argument against papal infallibility, and was pressed by Bishop Hefele and other learned members of the council, although they afterwards submitted to an infallible modern pope and council rerus infallible old popes and councils. Monotheleitism continued among the Maronites on Mount Lebanon (herscov, however, afterwards submitted to the Roman Church), as well as among the Monophysites, who are all Monotheletes.

With the sixth ecumenical council closes the development of the ancient Catholic christology. The Monothelites, who arose in Spain and France toward the close of the eighth century, turned upon the question whether Christ as man was the Son of God by nature (naturaliter), or simply by adoption (nuncupativiter). The Adoptionists maintained the latter, and shifted the whole idea of sonship from the person to whom it belongs to the nature. Their theory was a modification of the Nestorian error, and was condemned in a synod at Frankfurt-on-the-Maine, 794; but it did not result in a positive addition to the humanity (except his passion), and substituted dogma. The mediaeval Church almost forgot, itself to a dialectical analysis and defence of the idea of the Greek, Latin, and Evangelical Protestant Churches: —

1. A true incarnation of the Logos, i.e., the second person in the Godhead (Ἕνας ὄψεως θεός, ἑνάς ὀψεως τοῦ Αἴγου, incarnato Verbo). This is an actual assumption of the whole human nature — body, soul, and spirit — into an abiding union with the divine personality of the eternal Logos, so that they constitute, from the moment of the supernatural conception, one undivided life forever. The incarnation is neither a conversion of God into man, nor a conversion of man into God, and consequent absorption of the one, nor a confusion (κωσμικός, συγχώνος) of the two. On the other hand, it is not a mere indwelling (τελειομον, inhabitatio) of the one in the other, nor an outward, transitory connection (συνάφεια, conjunction) of the two factors.

2. The distinction between nature and person. Nature or substance (essence, σώφια) denotes the totality of powers and qualities which constitute a being; while person (ὑποστάσεις, ὑποστάσεως), as the Ego, the self-conscious, self-asserting, and acting subject. The Logos assumed, not a human person (else we should have two persons, — a divine and a human), but human nature, which is common to us all; and hence he redeemed, not a particular man, but all men. Yet no council has denied the human personality of Christ.

3. The God-man (Θεομάν, τὸ τεῦχος) is the result of the incarnation. Christ is not a (Nestorian) double being, with two persons, nor a compound (Apollinarian, or Monophysite) middle being, a tertium quid, partly divine, and partly human; but he is one person, both wholly divine, and wholly human.

4. The duality of the natures. The orthodox doctrine maintains, against Eutychianism, the distinction of natures, even after the act of incarnation, without confusion or conversion (συνεζύγωσις, or unconfusio, insuscipientes), yet, on the other hand, without division or separation (ἀναφέρως, or indicias, and ἀναφέρως, inseparabilitas); so that the divine will ever remain divine, and the human ever human; and yet the two have continually one common life, and interpenetrate each other, like the persons of the Trinity (πάντα, πάντα, πάντα). According to a familiar figure, the divine nature pervades the human as the fire pervades the iron. The two natures are complete, and embrace every thing which pertains to them separately, even will (according to the anti-Monothelite decision). Christ has all the properties which the Father has, except the property of being unbegotten (ὁ αὐτογενής); and he has all the properties which the first Adam had before the fall: he has, therefore (according to John of Damascus), two consciousnesses, and two physical wills, or faculties of self-determination (αὐτογενής). This is the extreme border to which the doctrine of two natures can be carried, without an assertion of two full personalities; and it is almost impossible to draw the line.

5. The unity of the person (ὁμογενής, ἐνομογενής, ὑμογενής, ὑμογενής, ὑμογενής, ὑμογενής, ὑμογενής, or unio persona- lis). The union of the divine and human nature in Christ is a permanent state, resulting from the incarnation, and is a real, supernatural, personal, and inseparable union, in distinction from an essential absorption or confusion, or from a mere moral union, or from a mystical union, such as holds between the believer and Christ. The two natures constitute but one personal life, and yet remain distinct. "The same who is true God," says Pope Leo I. in his famous Epistle, which anticipated the decision of Chalcedon, "is also true man; and in this unity there is no deceit, for in it the lowliness of man and the majesty of God perfectly pervade one another. . . . Because the two natures make only one person, we read, on the one hand, 'The Son of man came down from heaven' (John iii.13), while yet the Son of God took flesh from the Virgin; and, on the other hand, 'The Son of God was crucified and buried,' while yet he suffered, not in his Godhead as co-eternal and co-substantial with the Father, but in the weakness of human nature."

6. The whole work of Christ is to be attributed to his person, and not to the one or the other nature exclusively. The person is the acting subject; the nature, the organ or medium. It is the one divine human person of Christ that wrought miracles by virtue of his divine nature, and that suffered through the sensorium of his human nature. The superhuman effect and infinite merit of the Redeemer's work must be ascribed to his person, because of his divinity; while it is his humanity alone that made him capable of, and liable to, temptation, suffering, and death, and renders him an example for our imitation.
CHRISTOLOGY.

7. The Enhypostasis, or, more accurately, the Enhypostasia (Impersonality) of the human nature of Christ. The meaning is, that Christ's human nature had no independent personality of its own, and that the divine nature is the root and rule basis of his personality. His humanity was enhypostatized through union with the Logos, or incorporated into his personality. The synod of Chalcedon says nothing of this feature: it was an afterthought developed by John of Damascus. It seems inconsistent with the dyothetic theory; for a being with consciousness and will has the two essential elements of personality, while an impersonal will seems to be a mere animal instinct.

8. Critical Estimate. The Chalcedonian christology is regarded by the Greek and Roman, and the majority of the orthodox English and American divines, as the ne plus ultra of christological knowledge attainable in this world. Dr. Shedd (History of Christ. Doctrine, I. 408) thinks it probable that "the human mind is unique to the unfolding of the mystery of Christ's complex person;" and he therefore serenely ignores all subsequent christological controversies and speculations. Dr. Hodge, in his Systematic Theology, vol. II. 297 sqq., notices and criticizes the "erroneous dogmas," — by Schleiermacher, Baur, Dorner, Rothé, and the modern Kenoticists. It is charged with a defective psychology, and now with dualism, now with doketism, according as its distinction of two natures, or the personal unity, is made its most prominent feature. It oscillates between two extremes, without truly reconciling them; as the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity stands between tritheism and modalism, now leaning to the one, now to the other, when either the tripersonality or the unity is emphasized. It assumes two natures in one person; while the dogma of the Trinity assumes three persons in one nature. It teaches a complete human nature with reason and will, and yet denies its personality. It does not do justice to the genuine humanity of Christ in the Gospels, and to all those passages which assert its real growth. It overshadows the human by the divine. It puts the final result at the beginning, and ignores the intervening process. If we read the gospel history, we find that Christ was a helpless infant on his mother's breast, — and therefore not omnipotent till after the resurrection, when "all authority in heaven and on earth" was given unto him (Matt. xxviii. 18); he grew in wisdom, and learned obedience (Luke ii. 40; Heb. v. 8), and was ignorant of the day of judgment (Mark xiii. 32), therefore not omniscient; he moved from place to place, and was therefore not omnipresent before his ascension to heaven; he was destitute of his divine glory, which he was to regain after his death (John xvii. 5). To confine these limitations and imperfections to his human nature, while in his divine nature he was, at one and the same time, omnipotent, omniscient, and omnipresent, even in the manger and on the cross, is to destroy the personal unity of life, and to make two Christs, or a double-headed Christ. How can ignorance and omniscience simultaneously co-exist in one and the same mind? How can omnipotence and omnipresence pervade the universe in the same moment in which he exclaims, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Christ speaks and acts throughout as one undivided Ego. We must, therefore, so reconstruct or improve the Chalcedonian christology as to conform it to the historical realness of his humanity, to the full meaning of his own sayings concerning himself, and to all the facts of his life. This is now generally felt among the evangelical divines in Germany, where christological speculation has been most active since the Reformation, and by not a few in other countries. If any thing has resulted from the multitude of lives of Christ, written by learned and able men in this nineteenth century, it is the fact of the possible reconciliation of divine-human personality of Jesus of Nazareth.

At the same time, the Chalcedonian dogma is the ripest fruit of the christological speculations and controversies of the Ancient Church, and can never be lost. It gave the clearest expression to the faith in the incarnation for ages to come. It saves the full idea of the God-man as to the essential elements, however imperfect the form in which it is cast. It defines with sound religious judgment the boundary-line which separates christological truth from christological error. It guards us against two opposite dangers, — the Scylla of Nestorian dualism, and the Charybdis of Eutychian Monophysitism, or against an abstract separation of the divine and human, and an absorption of the human by the divine. It excludes also every kind of mixture of the two natures which would result in a being which is neither divine nor human. With these safeguards, theological speculation may boldly and hopefully move on, and penetrate deeper and deeper into the central truth of Christianity. Protestantism cannot consistently adopt any doctrinal or disciplinary decisions of popes or councils as an infallible finale, but must reserve the right of further research and progress in the apprehension and appropriation of Christ's infallible teaching according to the Scriptures as the only rule of faith.

VII. The Orthodox Protestant Christology. The churches of the Reformation (Lutheran, Anglican, and Calvinistic) adopted in their confessions of faith, either in form or substance, the three ecumenical creeds, and with them the ancient Catholic doctrines of the Trinity, and of Christ's divine-human character and work. They condemned the old and new Antitrinitarians, and the peculiar doctrine of ages to the Socinians, — that Christ was raised by his own merit to a participation in the divine honor and dignity. The Unitarians, like the Anabaptists, were everywhere (except in Poland and Transylvania) imprisoned, exiled, or executed; and the unimpassioned Servetus was burnt as a heretic and blasphemer, under the eyes of Calvin, and with the full approval of the mild Bullinger and Melanchthon. We quote from the principal Protestant Confessions. The Augsburg Confession of the Lutheran Church (1530), Art. III. (De Filio Dei): —

also for all actual sins of men.

that he might reconcile the Father unto us, and might be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but for all actual sins of men.

The Second Helvetian Confession, by Bullinger (1566), chap. 11: —

We acknowledge, therefore, that there are in one and the same Jesus Christ our Lord, two natures, the divine and the human nature; and we say that these two are so conjoined or united, that they are not swallowed up, confused or mingled together, but rather united or joined together in one person, the properties of each nature being safe and remaining still: so that we do worship one Christ our Lord, and not two; I say, one, true, God and man; as touching his divine nature, of the same substance with the Father, and as touching his human nature, of the same substance with us, and 'like unto us in all things, sin only excepted.'

The Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, Art. II.: —

"The Son, which is the Word of the Father, begotten of the Father, is God the Word; the true God, eternal God, and of one substance with the Father, took man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin, so that two whole and perfect natures, the divine and the human, inseparably joined together in unity of person; one Christ, true God and man. And in this sense we understand the words, 'all things, sin only excepted.'" "The Son of God, the second person in the Trinity, being of one substance with the Father, the very and eternal God, and of one substance with the Father, took man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin, of her substance; so that two whole and perfect natures, that is to say, the Godhead and Manhood, were joined together in one Person, never to be divided, whereof is one Christ, very God and very man; who truly suffered, was crucified, dead, and buried, to reconcile his Father to us, and to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for [all] actual sins of men."

The Westminster Confession, which gives the clearest and strongest expression to the faith of the strictly Reformed or Calvinistic churches, thus states the doctrine of Christ's person in chap. vii. § 2: —

The Westminster Shorter Catechism, which is famous for clear and terse definitions, says (Qu. 21): —

"The only Redeemer of God's elect is the Lord Jesus Christ, who being the eternal Son of God, became man, and so was, and continued to be, God and man, in two distinct natures, and one person, forever."

VIII. The Scholastic Lutheran Christology. On this general basis of the Chalcedonian christology, and following the indications of the Scriptures as the only rule of faith, the Protestant, especially the Lutheran, scholastics, at the close of the sixteenth, and during the seventeenth, century, built some additional features, and developed new aspect of Christ's person. The propelling cause was the Lutheran doctrine of the real presence or omnipresence of Christ's body in the Lord's Supper, and the controversies growing out of it with the Zwinglians and Calvinists, and among the Lutherans themselves.

There is, however, a characteristic difference between the christology of the Lutheran and that of the Reformed churches, which affects the whole system. The former has a leaning towards the Eutychian confusion of the divine and human natures; the latter, to the Nestorian separation: yet both distinctly disown the Eutychian and Nestorian heresies. The Lutheran christology started from the principle that the finite is capable of receiving the infinite (finitum capax infiniti), and went to the very border of doketism, which destroys the reality of Christ's humanity. The Reformed christology held fast to the inseparable gulf which separates the finite from the infinite as to their essence or nature (finitum non capax infiniti), and kept open the possibility of a full appreciation of the humanity of Christ in its actual growth and development.

The progress made in christology since the Reformation, on the basis of the Chalcedonian orthodoxy, relates to the communion of the two natures, and to the states, and the offices of Christ. The first was the production of the Lutheran Church, and was never adopted, but partly rejected, by the Reformed: the second and third were the joint doctrines of both, but with a very material difference in the understanding of the second.

(1) The communicatio idiomatum, the communication of attributes or properties (都知道, proprieties) of one nature to the other, or to the whole person. It is derived from the unio personalis and the communio naturarum. The Lutheran divines distinguish three kinds or genera.

(a) The genus idiomatum (or idiomatricum), whereby the properties of one nature are transferred and applied to the whole person, for which are quoted such passages as Rom. i. 3; 1 Pet. iii. 18, iv. 1.

(b) The genus apotelesmaticum (or apotelesmaticum), whereby the redemptory functions and actions which belong to the whole person (the ἀνάθεσις, or promise) are predicated only of one or the other nature (1 Tim. ii. 5 sq.; Heb. i. 2 sq.).

(c) The genus auchematicum (or euchematicum), or majestatical, whereby the human nature is clothed with and magnified by the attributes of the divine nature (John iii. 18, v. 27; Matt. xxviii. 18, 20; Rom. ix. 5; Phil. ii. 10). Under this head the Lutheran Church claims a certain ubiquity or omnipresence for the body of Christ, on the ground of the personal union of the two natures; but as to the extent of this omnipresence there were two distinct schools, which are both represented in the Formula of Concord (1577). Brenz and the Swabian Lutherans maintained an absolute ubiquity of Christ's humanity from his very infancy, thus making the incarnation not only an assumption of the human nature, but also a deification of it, although the divine attributes were admitted to have been concealed during the state of humiliation. Chemnitz and the Saxon divines called this view a monstrousity, and taught only a relative ubiquity, depending on Christ's will (volipraesentia), which may be present with his whole person wherever he pleases to be, or has promised to be.
CHRISTOLOGY.

(d) A fourth kind would be the genus kenoticum (from κένωσις), or tapeinoticum (from ταπεινωσις), Phil. ii. 7, 8; i.e., a communication of the properties of the human nature to the divine nature. But this is decidedly rejected by the old Lutherans as inconsistent with the unchangeableness of the divine nature, and as a 'horrible and blasphemous' doctrine (Form. Conc. p. 612), but is asserted by the modern Kenoticists (see below).

The Reformed divines never committed themselves to the communicatio idiomatum as a whole (although they might approve of the first two kinds, at least, by way of what Zwingli termed ἀξεστικος, or a rhetorical exchange of one part for another); and they decidedly rejected the third kind, because omnipresence, whether absolute or relative, is inconsistent with the necessary limitation of the human body, as well as with the Scripture facts of Christ's ascension to heaven, and promised return. The third genus can never be fully carried out, unless the humanity of Christ is also eternalized. The attributes, moreover, are not an outside appendix, but inherent qualities of the substance to which they belong, and inseparable from it. Hence a communication of attributes would imply a communication or mixture of natures. The divine and human natures can indeed hold free and intimate intercourse with each other; but the divine nature can never be transformed into the human, nor the human nature into the divine. Christ possessed all the attributes of both natures; but the natures, nevertheless, remain separate and distinct. The familiar illustrations of the iron and the fire, of the body and the soul, favor the Reformed rather than the Lutheran theory; for the fire, while it pervades the iron, does not communicate its properties to the iron, nor the iron its properties to the fire. The soul resides in and interpenetrates the body; but its spiritual qualities, as cognition and volition, are not communicated to the body; nor are the physical qualities of the body, as weight and extension, communicated to the soul.

(2) The doctrine of the twofold state of Christ, the state of humiliation and the state of exaltation. This is based upon Phil. ii. 5-8, and is no doubt substantially true. The status extasificationis (humiliationis) embraces the supernatural conception, birth, circumcision, education, earthly life, passion, death, and burial of Christ: the status exalationis includes the resurrection, ascension, and the sitting at the right hand of God.

The Reformers, on the other hand, divide the office of Christ into three parts: (a) The prophetic office (munus propheticum), which relates to the Church on earth. The old divines distinguished between the reign of nature (regnum naturae sive potentia), which embraces all things; the reign of grace (regnum gratiae), which relates to the Church militant on earth; and the reign of glory (regnum gloria), which belongs to the Church triumphant in heaven.

This convenient threefold division of the office of Christ was already approved by Calvin, and used by the divines of both Confessions during the seventeenth century. Ernesti opposed it, but Schleiermacher restored it.

1 Dr. Lightfoot, also, in his Cont. on the Philippians, p. 130, gives the Reformed interpretation: 'The point of time is clearly prior, not only to our Lord's open ministry, but also to his becoming man. Even if the word ἐνυπνισθαι ἐκδόθη λαξιωτον did not directly refer to the incarnation, it still appear to do, nothing else can be understood by ἐν ἡμας ἠνεπικρίτω ἀνθρώπων γένεσις.'

1 Drs. Hodge (Syst. Theol., II. 416) objects to the Lutheran doctrine that it 'destroys the integrity of the human nature of Christ. A body which fills immensity is not a human body: a soul which is omniscient, omnipresent, and almighty, is not a human soul. The Christ of the Bible and of the human heart is lost, if the doctrine be true.'
bingen divines defended their position till the controversy was lost in the disastrous events of the Thirty-years’ War, without leading to any positive result. The Kenotic controversy was renewed recently, but in a modified form, and on a new basis (see below).

X. Modern Christologies. The orthodox christology emphasized the divinity of Christ, and left his humanity more or less out of sight (although it was always recognized in theory), and, in the last stage of its Lutheran development, arrived at the brink of Gnostic doketism. Rationalism arose, towards the close of the eighteenth century, as a reaction against sym- bolical and scholastic orthodoxy, and ran into the opposite extreme; it ignored the divine nature, and fell back upon a purely human or Ebionitic Christ. Its force, as well as its weakness, consists in the examination of the human element in Christ and in the Bible.

With the revival of evangelical faith in Germany, the divine element in Christ was again duly appreciated by theologians. Hegel and Schleiermacher mark a new epoch in christological speculation, with two tendencies—the one pantheistic, the other humanistic; and these, again, were followed by original reconstructions and modifications of the Catholic doctrine of the God-man. The pantheistic tendency of Hegel is more congenial to the maxim of the Lutheran Confession, that the finite is capable of the infinite: the humanistic of Schleiermacher, to the tendency of the Reformed Confession, which guards the divinity of Christ against confusion with the divine. The former starts from the divine, the latter, from the human element; but both may unite, and do often unite when they proceed from naturalistic premises.
CHRISTOLOGY.

Both Hegel and Schleiermacher gave impulse to orthodoxy as well as negative and destructive tendencies. To most of his pupils Schleiermacher was a sort of John the Baptist, who led them to Christ.

1. The Humanitarian or Unitarian Christology makes Christ a mere man, though the wisest and best of men, and a model for imitation. It is held in various forms, from the communicated semi-divinity of the old Socinians down to the pure humanity of modern Unitarians and Humanitarians.1 Kant may be said to have inaugurated the modern Humanitarian view. He regarded Christ as the representative of the moral ideal, but made a distinction between the ideal Christ and the historical Jesus. The more conservative Unitarians admit the sinless perfection of Christ. Dr. Channing (see that art.) was, at least in his earlier period, a firm believer in the pre-existence of Christ: hence he is sometimes called a Bovian. He certainly rose above the mere Humanitarianism of Priestley. He saw in Christ the perfect manifestation of God to man, and the highest ideal of humanity, and paid one of the noblest and most eloquent tributes to Christ's character and inspiring example.

IV. 1-29); James Martineau: Studies of Christianity (1858), Essays Philosophical and Theological (1869), Religion and Modern Materialism (1878); Theodore Parker (radical Unitarian): Discourse of Matters pertaining to Religion, Boston, 1847.

2. The Panteistic Christology, suggested by Schelling and Hegel, and best represented by Baur, Marheineke, and Goechel (of the right or conservative wing of Hegelianism), and by Daub, Marheineke, and Göschel (of the right or radical wing), starts from the idea of the essential unity of the divine and human, and teaches a continuous consciousness of this unity, and that he represents it in its purest and strongest form. Under this view Biedermann (Christliche Dogmatik) places Christ highest in the scale of humanity, not only in the past, but for all time to come. Even Strauss was at one time willing to go so far; but he destroyed nearly the whole historic foundation of his life, and ended in the philosophical bankruptcy of materialism. He regarded Christ as the representative of the divine and human, and originated an incessant flow of a new spiritual life, with all its pure and holy emotions and aspirations, which must be traced to that source. Sabellian as he was, Schleiermacher did not hold an eternal personal pre-existence of the Logos which would correspond to the historical indwelling of God in Christ. His compromise with the simplicity of the Godhead excluded an immanent Trinity. See his christology in his Der christl. Glaube, §§ 92-99 (vol. II. 26-93), and the sharp criticism of Strauss, i.e. II. 175 sqq.

Biedermann: Christliche Dogmatik, Zürich, 1869 (more serious, but almost equally unsatisfactory in its results); Emanuel Marius: Die Persönlichkeit Jesu Christi. Mit besond. Rücksicht auf die Mythologien und Mystrien der alten Völker, Leipz., 1881 (first ed., 1878), a strange compound of the mythical views of Strauss, and the mystical interpretation of Swedenborg.

3. Schleiermacher's Christology represents the highest form of Humanitarianism with an important admission of the supernatural or divine element. He regards Christ as a perfect man, in whom, and in whom alone, the ideal of humanity (the supernatual or divine element. He regards Christ as a perfect man, in whom, and in whom alone, the ideal of humanity (the inmost being) has been fully realized: at the same time he rises above Humanitarianism by emphatically asserting Christ's essential sinlessness and abso luteness ("esentliche Unschuld," and "scheelchinnige Vollkommenheit"), and a peculiar and abiding indwelling of the Godhead in him ("sein eigentliches Sein Gottes in ihm"), by which he differs from all men. He admits him to be "a moral miracle," which means a great deal for a divine of the boldest and keenest criticism in matters of history. He was willing to surrender almost every miracle of action in order to save the miracle of the person of Him whom he adored and loved, from his Moravian childhood to his deathbed, as his Lord and Saviour. He adopts the Sabellian view of the Trinity as a threefold manifestation of God in creation (in the world), redemption (in Christ), and sanctification (in the Church). Christ is God as Redeemer, and originated an incessant flow of a new spiritual life, with all its pure and holy emotions and aspirations, which must be traced to that source. Sabellian as he was, Schleiermacher did not hold an eternal personal pre-existence of the Logos which would correspond to the historical indwelling of God in Christ. His compromise with the simplicity of the Godhead excluded an immanent Trinity. See his christology in his Der christl. Glaube, §§ 92-99 (vol. II. 26-93), and the sharp criticism of Strauss, i.e. II. 175 sqq.

Lit.—A. Hard Roth (d. 1866), the greatest speculative divine of the century next to Schleiermacher (d. 1834). He was influenced by Hegel and Schleiermacher, but wrought out an original system of ethics of the highest order. He abandoned the orthodox dogma of the Trinity and the Chalcedonian dyophysitism (which he thinks goes far beyond the simplicity of biblical teaching, and makes the union physical rather than moral), but fully developed the same in its purest and strongest form. He regards Christ as the one personality of Christ, and lays great stress on the ethical feature in the development of Christ, by which alone he can become our Redeemer and Example. God, by a creative act, calls the second Adam into existence in the bosom of the old natural humanity. Christ is born of a woman, yet not begotten by man, but created by God (as to his humanity), hence free from all sinful bias, as well as actual sin. His development is a real, but normal and harmonious, religious moral growth, and a correspondingly increasing indwelling of God in him. There was not a single moment in his conscious life in which he stood not in personal union with God; but the absolute union took place with the completion of the personal development of the second Adam. This completion coincided with his perfect self-sacrifice in death. Henceforth he was wholly and absolutely God (ganz und schlecht-hin Gott), since his being is extensively and intensively filled with the true God; but we cannot say, vice versa, that God is wholly the second Adam; for God is not limited by an individual person. The death of Christ on earth was at the same time his ascension to heaven and his elevation above all the limitations of material existence (a return to the uopº 600Wov), which, however, implies also his perpetual presence with his Church on earth (Matt. xxviii. 20).

Here is the place also for the theory of Horace Bushnell (d. at Hartford, Conn., 1876), which strongly resembles those of Schleiermacher and Rothe, but differs from them by adhering to the eternal pre-existence of Christ (though only in a Sabellian sense). It was first delivered in his Concio ad Clerum, at the annual commencement of Yale College, New Haven (Aug. 15, 1848), and was published, together with two other discourses (delivered at Cambridge and Andover), and a preliminary dissertation on the Nature of Language as related to Thought and Spirit, under the title, God in Christ (new ed., New York, 1877). It gave rise to his trial for heresy. Bushnell, one of the most independent and vigorous American thinkers, was not a German scholar, but he read Schleiermacher’s essay on Sabellius as translated by Professor Moses Stuart in the Biblical Repository, and says that “the general view of the Trinity given in that article coincides” with his own view, and confirmed him in the results of his own private struggles (i.e. p. 111 sq.). He maintains the full divinity of Christ on the Sabellian basis. He rejects the theory of “three metaphysical or essential persons in the being of God,” with three distinct consciousnesses, wills, and understandings; and he substitutes for it simply a trinity of revelation, or what he calls (p. 170) an “instrumental trinity,” or three impersonations, in which the one divine being presents himself to our human capacities and wants, and which are necessary to produce mutuality, or terms of conversableness, between us and him, and to pour his love most effectually into our feeling (p. 137). “God may act,” he says (p. 152), “a human personality, without being measured by it.” The real divinity came into the finite, and was subject to human conditions. There are not two distinct subsistences in the person of Christ,—one infinite, and the other finite; but it is the one infinite God who expresses himself in Christ, and brings himself down to the level of our humanity, without any loss of his greatness, or reduction of his majesty. At the same time, Bushnell holds to the full yet sinless humanity of Christ; and the tenth chapter of his work on Nature and the Supernatural is one of the ablest and most eloquent tributes to the sinless perfection of the moral character of Christ.

4. The modern Kenotic theory differs from the theories just noticed, by its orthodox premises and conclusions as far as the dogma of the Trinity and of the eternal Deity of Christ is concerned; but it likewise departs from the Chalcedonian dyophysitism, by holding to one divine human Christ, with one consciousness and one will. It is chiefly based on the famous passage Phil. ii. 6-8 (καὶ γενόμενος Θεὸς, he emptied himself, etc., the subject of the Kenosis being the pre-existent, not the incarnate, Logos), and also on 2 Cor. viii. 9; John i. 14 (ἐγεννημεῖν, became); Heb. ii. 17, 18, v. 8; and on the general impression which the Gospel history makes of Christ as a truly human, yet divinely human being, speaking of himself always as a unit. It was suggested by Zinzendorf in the form of devout sentimentality, that brought the divine Christ down to the closest intimacy with men; it was scientifically developed, though with various modifications, by a number of eminent German divines of the Lutheran Confession (Thomasius, Liebner, Gesm, Von Hofmann, Kahnis, Delitzsch, Schöberlein, Kübel), and several Reformed divines (Lange, Ebrard, Godet, Pressensé, in Europe, Henry M. Goodwin and Howard Crosby in America). It is hardly just to call it (with Dr. Dorner) a revival of Apolloniarism and Patripassianism, or Theopaschitism; for, while it resembles both in some features, it differs from them by assuming a truly humanized Logos dwelling in a human body. It carries the Kenosis much farther than the Giessens Lutherans, and makes it consist, not in a concealment merely (κρύφθη), but in an actual abandonment, of the divine attributes of omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence, during the whole period of humiliation from the incarnation to the resurrection; the differences between the advocates of this theory referring to the degree of the Kenosis. It substitutes a genus kenoticum, or taeonium, for the genus majestaticum of the Lutheran Creed: in other words, a communication of the properties of humanity to the divinity for a communication of the properties of the divine nature to the human. It proceeds from the maxim, infinitum capax est finiti, which the old Lutheran theology rejected; while it held to the opposite maxim, finitum capax infiniti, which the Calvinists rejected. Instead of raising the finite to the infinite, the Kenotic theory lowers the infinite to the finite. It teaches a temporary self-examination or depotentialization of the pre-existent Logos. In becoming incarnate, the second Person of the holy Trinity reduced himself to the limitations of humanity. He brought the divine glory, but also of his divine mode of existence (the μορφή Θεοῦ), and assumed the human mode of existence (the μορφή ὄντος), subject to the limits of space and time, and the laws of development and growth. He ceased to be omnipotent and omnipresent: he became ignorant and helpless as a child. But he retained what Thomasius calls the essential attributes of truth, holiness, and love, and revealed them fully during his humiliation. The incarnation is not only an assumption by the Son of God of human nature, but also a self-limitation of the divine Logos; and both constitute one divine-human personality. Otherwise the infinite consciousness of the historical Christ: it would transcend and outreach it, and the result would be a double personality. The self-limitation is to be conceived as an act of will, an act of God's love, which is the motive of the incarnation; and his love is absolutely powerful, even to the extent of the utmost self-surrender.

This is the view of Thomasius, a Bavarian Lutheran. He and Lieben held, first, that the Logos actually became a rational human soul; but afterwards they assumed a truly human soul alongside with the Kenosis of the Logos, and thereby they lost the chief benefit of the Kenosis theory.

Gess, a Swabian divine brought up under the influence of the school of Bengel, Goting, and Beck, and starting from a theosophic biblical realism, carries the Kenosis to the extent of a suspension of self-consciousness and will. He identifies it with the outgoing of the Son from the Father, or his descent from heaven, which resulted in a temporary suspension of the influx of the eternal life of the Father into the Son, and a transition from a state of equality with God into a state of dependence and need. Gess and Ebrard assume an actual transformation of the Logos into a human soul, i.e., he assumed a human body from the flesh of the Virgin, but became a rational human soul, so that he had no need of assuming another soul. Consequently the soul of Christ was not derived from Mary: it was the result of a voluntary Kenosis, while an ordinary human soul derives its existence from a creative act of God. This view, therefore, is inconsistent with trinitarianism, and presupposes the theory of creationism. It is very questionable whether such a soul, which is the result of a transformation which begins with divinity, and ends with divinity, can be called a truly human soul any more than the Apollinarian Logos, who, remaining unchanged, occupied the place, and exercised the functions, of the human soul. The bond of sympathy with Christ, on the ground of the identity of his mental constitution and condition, seems to be broken by this form of the Kenotic theory.

Marten, a very able Danish theologian, more cautiously teaches only a relative, though real, Kenosis. He distinguishes between the Logos-revelation and the Christ-revelation, and confines the Kenosis to the latter. In the Logos-revelation the Son proceeds from the Father as God: in the Christ-revelation he returns to God as God-man, with a host of redeemed children of God. The eternal Logos continues in God and his general revelation to the world as the Author of all reason; while at the same time he enters into the bosom of humanity as a holy seed, that he may arise within the human race as a Mediator and Redeemer. He would, however, have become man even without sin, though not as Redeemer. The Son of God leads a double life. As the pure divine Logos (der reinen Gottheitsloge), he works in all-pervading activity throughout the kingdom of nature; as Christ, he works through the kingdom of grace, redemption, and completion, and he indicates his consciousness of personal identity in the two spheres by referring to his pre-existence, which, to his human consciousness, is the result of a recreation. But Martens does not explain how this Doppelleben of the Logos can be reconciled with the unity of his personality any more than the two natures of the orthodox creeds.

Kahnis and Lange limit the Kenosis substantially to an abandonment of the use, rather than the possession, of the attributes. Lange's christology abounds in fruitful and original hints for further and clearer development.

Julius Muller (d. 1879), one of the profoundest divines, whose humility and modesty induced him to forbid the publication of any of his valuable manuscripts, taught, likewise, a moderate Kenosis theory, which I am able to give from my notes of his Lectures on Dogmatics (1839 to 1840): "Paul contrasts the earthly and pre-earthly existence of the Son of God as poverty and riches (2 Cor. vii. 9), and represents the incarnation as an emptying himself of the full possession of the divine mode of existence (Phil. ii. 6). This implies more than a mere assumption of human nature into union with the Son of God: the incarnation is a real self-exinanition (Selbstentáusserung), and a renunciation, not only of the use, but also of the possession, of the divine attributes and powers. . . . The Church is undoubtedly right in teaching a real union of the divine and human nature in Christ. But in the state of humiliation this union was first only potential and concealed; and the unfolded reality belongs to the state of exaltation. Only with the assumption of a self-exinanition can we fully appreciate the act of the self-denying condescension of divine love; while in the orthodox dogma God gives nothing in the incarnation, but simply receives and unites something with his person." Want of space forbids further extracts.

Goodwin differs from the German Kenoticists by assuming that the Logos is the human element in the person of Christ. He teaches, with several of the Fathers and modern German divines, that the highest revelation of God, and was only modified, not conditioned, by the fall.
in God which pre-existed in him from eternity, and became incarnate by taking flesh, and occupying the place of the soul. No incarnation, he thinks, is possible without a humanization of the divine; and this implies a self-limitation, and true development from ignorance to knowledge and wisdom. The incarnation is not a synthesis or union of opposite natures, but a development of the divine in the form of the human. The Word did not assume flesh or human nature, but it became flesh. As the true idea of God includes humanity, so the true idea of man includes God. The divine and human differ only as the ideal differs from the actual, or the prototype from the copy. This essential unity is the basis of the possibility of the incarnation as a Kenosis.

only it does not go far enough, and it becomes a serious error when it denies the higher truth beyond. For Christ is also the eternal Son of God, who in infinite love renounced his glory and majesty, and lowered himself to a fallen race, entering into all its wants, trials, and temptations, yet without sin, and humbled himself, even to the death on the cross, in order to emancipate men from the guilt and power of sin, and to reconcile them to God. He is the one undivided God-man, who, as man, calls out all our sympathies and trust, and, as God, is the object of true worship. In this respect we accept fully the faith of the Church in all ages, and consider the divinity of our Lord as the corner-stone of Christianity. We hold, with Rothe and Ritschl, to the moral nature of the God-manhood of Christ, but without sacrificing his eternal divinity. We would go as far with the Kenosis theory as the unchangeable nature of God permits, and as the unbounded love of God demands. We dissent from the philsophistic and dualistic psychology of Chalcedon, and hold to the inseparable personal unity of the life, and at the same time to the genuine growth of Christ, without asserting, with the Kenotici, a growth of the divine Logos, who is unchangeable in his nature; but we substitute for this impossible idea a gradual communication of the divinity to the God-man.

This is, in substance, the Christ of the Catholic creeds and the Protestant confessions of faith. He is a mystery indeed to our intellectual and philosophical comprehension, but a mystery made manifest as the most glorious fact in history,—the birth, life, death, resurrection and ascension of the Son of God. The theme of meditation and praise for all generations. How the whole fullness of uncreated divinity can be poured out into a human being passes over our understanding, but not more, perhaps, than the familiar fact that an immaterial and immortal soul can enter into all the wants, trials, and temptations of a mortal body. And deeper and grander than both mysteries is the infinite love of God which lies back of them in the very depths of eternity, and which prompted the incarnation and redemption of a sinful world. Yet this love of God in Christ, whose "breath and length and height and depth passeth knowledge" (Eph. iii. 18, 19), is more certain and constant than the light of the sun in heaven and the voice of conscience in man.

CHRISTOPHER, St., lived, according to the oldest versions of his legend, at Saucos in Lycia, and suffered martyrdom under King Dagnus; but no place of the name Saucos is known in Lycia, nor any king of the name Dagnus. Nevertheless, though the historical kernel of this legend seems to be of a very doubtful character, few legends have grown so luxuriantly. In mediaval art and poetry St. Christopher is of frequent occurrence, generally represented as a huge fellow wading through the waters, and carrying a child on his shoulder. His day in the Greek Church is May 9, and, in the Latin, July 25. See Act Sanct., July, VI, pp. 125–149; Butler: Lives of Saints, July 25; Mrs. Jamieson: Sacred and Legendary Art, II, 439–450.

The foundation of the association was the so-called positive Christianity; that is, the faith in the divinity of Christ and the redeeming power of his suffering and death. In the beginning the association was very successful: the number of its members increased to three thousand. But in 1836 the church had to be closed, and in 1838 the association was dissolved. Having been appointed referendarius by Charles Martel, he was made Bishop of Metz in 742 by Pepin, Charles's son. Twice he visited Rome,—in 753 to conduct the Pope safely to Gaul, and in 764 to bring back with him the relics which the Pope had presented to his monasteries and churches; and the intimate relation which sprang up between the papal see and the Frankish empire was much furthered by his influence. His great fame, however, is chiefly due to his labors for the improvement of the discipline of the Church. By his rules, which in parts are borrowed from those of Benedict, he instituted or regulated the so-called Vita Canonica. Of these rules there was a double version: an older, destined only for the Cathedral of Metz, and published by Maximilian of Trier, without date, but no place of the name Saucos is known in Lycia, nor any king of the name Dagnus. Nevertheless, though the historical kernel of this legend seems to be of a very doubtful character, few legends have grown so luxuriantly. In mediaval art and poetry St. Christopher is of frequent occurrence, generally represented as a huge fellow wading through the waters, and carrying a child on his shoulder. His day in the Greek Church is May 9, and, in the Latin, July 25. See Act Sanct., July, VI, pp. 125–149; Butler: Lives of Saints, July 25; Mrs. Jamieson: Sacred and Legendary Art, II, 439–450.

Chronicles for historical purposes. — The language, when not that of quotation, betrays in idiom and words, as well as in orthography, its later age and degeneracy. The translation is after Ezra and Nehemiah (cf. Neh. xii. 47), more exactly about 330 B.C., or a little later, in the beginning of the Greek rule in Asia, as Ewald acutely argued from the application of the phrase “King of Persia,” to Cyrus and his successors (Ezra i. 8, etc.); nor is the reckoning according to darikionem (“drams”) (1 Chron. xxi. 7, and in Ezra and Nehemiah) against this view; because such reckoning would, of course, continue after the fall of the Persian Empire. — The object of the writer was not so much to retell the story of Israel, as, from the rich historical stores at his command, to select those portions which related more particularly to the history of worship in order to demonstrate to his compatriots how precious this legacy was, and how fundamental to the existence and prosperity of the new state arising from the ashes of the old. — The author was either a priest or a Levite. — The Septuagint text and the present Masoretic text are exactly the same. — The book was received into the canon because of its important additions to history; but, as it was plainly recent, it was relegated to the Hagiographa. It seems to have been originally wanting in the Peshitto.

A. DILLMANN.

Dr. Zöckler, in Lange, says, “Neither the exegetical nor the critical literature of this book is very rich: indeed, there is scarcely one portion of the Old Testament that has found fewer laborers, either in the one respect or the other. The older Jewish commentators shrank from the many difficulties which the genealogies of the first chapters presented; and there are in all very few Jewish commentators. Of the Church Fathers, Theodoret and Procopius of Gaza alone commented upon the book at any length: Jerome is very cursory and meagre. None of the Reformers have treated Chronicles exegetically.” Of modern works the best are, E. BERTHEAU: Die Bücher der Chronik erklärt, Leipzig, 1865, 2d ed.; W. CHRYSOLOGUS. b. at Imola, 406; d. there 450; was made Bishop of Ravenna in 433, and distinguished himself as one of the most eloquent preachers of the fifth century. A hundred and seventy-six Sermones ascribed to him are still extant; but only a hundred and sixty of them belong really to him. The five sermons (57-62) on the apostolical symbol are of great historical interest, as containing an independent text. The first edition of the sermons was given by Vincentius, Bonn, 1534, and often reprinted. His letter to Eutyches was edited in Greek and Latin by Vossius, 1604. Both the letter and the sermons are found in Bibli. Max. Patrum, Lyons, Tom. VII.

CHRYSOSTOM (CHRYSOSTOMOS), Joannes, b. at Antioch, 347; d. at Comana in Pratas, 407; descended from an illustrious Greek family. His father was Magister Militum Orientis. His mother, Anthusa, was a Christian woman; and, though only twenty years old when her husband died, she remained a widow, and concentrated her whole life on the education of her son. The young Chrysostom—the name is a surname (the "golden-mouthed") occurring for the first time in the beginning of the seventh century, with Isidore of Seville—was destined for a public career in the administration or the court, and received instruction from the celebrated rhetorician Libanius. But there was a deeper craving in his nature. Rhetoric became repugnant to him. At last he left the Pagan sophist for the Christian priest; and, after studying for three years under Bishop Meletius of Antioch, he was baptized.

Monasticism, and generally the ascetic views of his time, attracted him powerfully; and immediately after the death of his mother he joined a society of hermits living in the mountains outside Antioch. It was probably there that he met with Diodorus, afterwards Bishop of Tarsus, and founder of the school of Antioch; and how deep a satisfaction he extracted from this kind of life, in which study of the Bible, and meditation on holy things, alternated with prayers and manual labor, may be seen from a couple of enthusiastic treatises written in its praise, and more especially from two letters addressed to his friend Theodore, afterwards Bishop of Mopsuestia, who wished to abandon monasticism, and marry. After the lapse of six years, however, his failing health compelled Chrysostom himself to forsake the solitude; and, having returned to Antioch in 380, he was ordained a deacon by Meletius.

Thus began his practical labors in the service of the Church, and he inaugurated this period of his life by the publication of his celebrated treatise On the Priesthood. In 386 he was ordained a presbyter by Flavian, the successor of Meletius. As a presbyter he began to preach, and the very next year offered a grand opportunity for his extraordinary oratorical gifts. A rebellion broke out in Antioch, and the statues of the imperial family were hurled down from the pedestals into the dust. But the rebellion was speedily suppressed, and the city was in an agony of fear. Flavian proceeded to Constantinople to avert the emperor's wrath; and in the mean time Chrysostom delivered his famous twenty-one sermons On the Statues. The activity which he developed as a preacher during the twelve years he staid in Antioch was very great; and his fame as the first preacher of the Church was spreading rapidly. We have still from that time sixty-seven sermons on Genesis, ninety-one on the Psalms, ninety-six on the Gospel of Matthew, eighty-eight on the Gospel of John, and a number on the Epistles to the Romans, Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Thessalonians, and Titus. Of a more strongly-marked doctrinal character is the series of sermons against the Anomoeans, belonging to the same period.

In 398 he removed to Constantinople. Eutropius, the favorite of the Emperor Arcadius, wished to see him placed on the patriarchal throne of the metropolis; but Chrysostom absolutely refused to assume the responsibility of such a position. Nevertheless, by a trick he was allured to Constantinople, and by force he was compelled to accept the patriarchal ordination from Theophilus of Alexandria. Thus he suddenly found himself at the head of the whole Greek Church, very much against his own will. The situation was full of dangers to him. He was a man of single aims and straight ways. Severe to himself, he was severe to others too; and, in his passionate hatred of any thing bad or wrong, his frankness and courage prevented him from paying any regard to circumstances. But such a man was very ill adapted to manage the whims of a despotic court, and handle a population immoral beyond description, fanatical concerning its own forms and ceremonies, and extremely proud of its own doctrinal orthodoxy. Controversies with heretics, Arians, Novatians, etc., added to the difficulties; and the situation finally proved too strong for the man who had been pressed into it.

Some Egyptian monks, who, on account of the esteem in which they held Origen, had excited the displeasure of Theophilus, Patriarch of Alexandria and a very violent character, fled to Constantinople, and sought refuge with Chrysostom. Theophilus was summoned to Constantinople to defend himself. But on his arrival there he found that Eudoxia, the empress, was very ill disposed towards Chrysostom; and at the decisive moment he managed to assume the part of the judge instead of that of the accused. Under his presidency a synod was convened on the imperial estate at Chalcedon,—the so-called Synodus ad Quercum; and there forty-six accusations were raised against Chrysostom, most of them mere lies, and some of them completely ludicrous. Nevertheless, as the synod was composed of Chrysostom's enemies, it gave in a verdict of guilt. The谴责ing sentence and banishment. The Emperor accepted the verdict; and Chrysostom was secretly brought on board a vessel to be carried to Bithynia. But an earthquake which shook the city during the night, and the threatening fermentation in the population, frightened the court. Chrysostom was recalled, and received by the people with great applause. Thus he escaped the first bolt.

A few months later, a silver statue of Eudoxia was raised on a column of porphyry in front of the Church of St. Sophia, and consecrated with all those idolatrous ceremonies and licentious rites which characterized such an occasion during the days of rank Paganism. Chrysostom gave a warning: Eudoxia accepted it as a challenge. Chrysostom went farther: he is reported to have said in the pulpit, "Again Herodias is dancing; again she demands the head of John on a charger;" and the empress now determined to get rid of the man. A council of Constantinople deposed him a second time; and June 20, 404, he was dragged into exile, Cuenus in Lesser Armenia having been fixed as his abode. In this dismal village he spent three years in bodily pain and mental anguish, but without losing his influence on the Church, without even relaxing his hold on his congregation in Constantinople. No less than two hundred and thirty letters, written from this place, are still extant, and bear witness to the extraordinary power and purity of his mind. His friends, even the Bishop of Rome and the Emperor Honorius, labored for his release; but the result of their exertions was simply that he was transferred to a still more distant place, Pityos in Colchis. On the way thither he died.

CHUBB, Thomas, deist, b. in East Harnham, near Salisbury, Sept. 29, 1679; d. at Salisbury, Feb. 8, 1746. He was a tallow-chandler to the end of his life. When Whiston published his Primitive Christianity revived, Chubb wrote a defence of the idea of the supremacy of the one God and Father, expressed in the preface, entitled The Supremacy of the Father asserted, and sent it to Whiston, who printed it in 1715. This brought Chubb into notice, and induced him to write a good deal. He represents the decay of Deism in England. He stated his objections to orthodoxy in a simple, vigorous style; but he had no learning, nor very great logical ability. His principal writings are, A Discourse concerning Reason, London, 1731; The True Gospel of Jesus Christ vindicated, 1739 (advocating the pregnant idea that Christianity is not doctrine, but life: wrongly, however, he makes the true gospel of Christ identical with natural religion: Lechler characterizes it as an essential moment in the historical development of Deism); The Author's Farewell to his Readers, printed in his Posthumous Works, 2 vols., 1748. This is the most complete summary of his opinions. He denied a special providence, miracles, literal inspiration, and apparently Christ's resurrection. Stephen says his writings show a very calm and honest intellect; there is little bitterness in his attacks upon the established faith; and his arguments are fairly, though seldom vigorously, stated. He was a man of considerable natural ability, and in many of his tracts (and he wrote more than fifty) exhibits a logical faculty, which, guided by better training, might have made him a formidable antagonist. But it was not to be expected that much new light was to be thrown upon his well-worn topics by an ignorant chandler. CHURCH. I. The CHURCH IN THE NEW TESTAMENT. Meaning of the word.—The word εκκλησία in the New Testament means either the universal Church of Christ, or a local congregation. In modern use, "church" means also the "house of God," or the building in which the congregation assembles for divine worship, and a particular "denomination." [Our English word "church" is of Greek origin, from ἐκκλήσια or τῷ κοινῷ, in Anglo-Saxon, cyrce; in Scotch, kirk. The fact seems to be, that the Romance languages derive their word for church from εκκλησία; e.g., French église, Italian chiesa; and the Teutonic and Scandinavian, from κοινὰ. In profane Greek εκκλησία, from εκκαλεῖν (to call together), describes an assembly of citizens called together, usually by a herald, the members of which were therefore the "elect," εκκλήσια (the called). Instances of this usage occur in Acts xix. 32–41.—"the assembly" (ἐκκλησία), cf. ver. 39, where the town-clerk contrasts the tumultuous gathering with a "lawful assembly." (τὸνομὸς εκκλησίας). But the ecclesiastical meaning of the word in the New Testament is directly connected with the Hebrew of the Old Testament and the Greek of the Septuagint. The two expressions in the Old Testament for the people of God are λαός and Ιησους: the difference between them is, that, while both express an assembly, λαός means assembly in general, and Ιησους an assembly for divine worship; cf. Lev. iv. 13, 14, where the two words are in juxtaposition. In ver. 13 the "congregation" is general; in ver. 14 the "congregation" is that assembled for religious worship. The Seventy translate Ιησους by σωφρόνας, and never by εκκλησία, and Ιησους also by σωφρόνας, though more frequently by εκκλησία. At bottom lies the idea that the congregation is called together by God himself.

The question has often been discussed, whether Jesus contemplated a new Church in distinction to the Jewish Church. He surely announced the nearness, nay, the existence, of the kingdom of God. But did he mean by this a particular organization of his own? The allusions to and parables of the kingdom, with the exception of Matt. xvi. 18, do not lend themselves to this idea. The "kingdom" is already present (Luke xxi. 21) in those who are good ground for the seed sown by the Son of man (Matt. xii. 3–8, 37–43). These, together with those in whose hearts the seed does not come to fruitfulness, and those in whom it is mixed with weeds, are represented as standing upon one and the same field. But of any such connection between them as membership in one church would imply, there is no hint. Nor is there any in the parable of the net or of the pearl. At the same time, it is true that the disciples constituted a little body by themselves:
they were Jesus' flock (Luke xii. 32; John x. 1 sqq.), his devoted band, whose love and interest stood in boldest contrast to the indifference and hate of the rest of the nation. In Matt. xvi. 18, the prophecy of building a church upon Peter (Matt. xvi. 18); by which prophecy. But of any succession in office, and of the Church which should result from their activities occupied the most prominent positions. Yet there was no distinction in authority between them and the newer disciples; rather, when churches were established, they left them to the care of the members, and discharged in all literalness their Lord's commission, and went forth to preach in new localities the gospel of Christ. In Matt. xxiii. 34 Jesus speaks of sending "prophets, wise men, and scribes;" and in Matt. xxiv. 45 sqq., Luke xii. 42 sqq., of "stewards" and "upper servants;" all which expressions are not to be considered other than different forms of loving service, by which the Church was built up. Next to the preaching of the Word came baptism, an institution plainly Christ's; and every congregation observed the other sacrament, the Lord's Supper, as the principal feature of its peculiar growth. At first the Church was a Palestinian affair; and although one might argue it was intended to be much more comprehensive, yet there was nothing in its structure to directly support the opinion that it would ultimately unite Jew and Gentile in one society. Therefore evangelical Protestantism is right in asserting that the existence of the Church does not depend upon the apostolic forms; for our Lord's speeches concerning his Church have nothing to do with the externals of religion, the ordering of worship, and of government, nor yet with the formulating of doctrine,—phenomena which have greatly occupied later attention. [The distinction between the Kingdom of God and the Church is important to observe. The Kingdom is much more comprehensive. It exists irrespective of the Church. Its members are the ultimately saved, whether they belong to the Church as an ecclesiastical body, or not. The Church, on the other hand, is made up of all under gospel influences. Therefore, when we pray for the Church, we pray for the progress of divine truth with all its attendant blessings; but when we pray, "Thy kingdom come," we pray for the speedy presence of the saints, gathered under the sceptre of their King, Jesus Christ.] The historical Church began on the Day of Pentecost; and it was at first composed of the disciples whom Jesus had personally gathered. It was a community inside of Judaism, with peculiar worship and government. It was the εκκλησία; and by this name Paul calls it in his earliest Epistles, whether in Palestine or outside (1 Thess. ii. 14). Its complete name was the "Church of God," or the "Church of Christ." (Rom. xvi. 16), whether of a single congregation, or of the whole body of believers. It was made up of the "sanctified in Christ Jesus" (1 Cor. i. 2), the "called saints" (Rom. i. 7), the "holy nation" (1 Pet. ii. 9). In the deep conception of Paul every believer was united with Christ, and entered this close union through baptism (1 Cor. xii. 3; Gal. iii. 27). The Church was Christ's body, of which he was the Head (Col. i. 24, ii. 19).

But how comes it that this body of Christ is described by Paul as enclosing unworthy members, "vessels of dishonor" (2 Tim. ii. 20)? Not because the term is used in a general sense, just as the Israelites were called collectively the "people of God," but rather, as Luther says, because Paul speaks synecdochically, putting the whole for a part, looking not at the unsaintly, but at the saintly, at those who had really put on Christ, and by their lives gave form and value to the whole body. It was indeed the basis of the distinction between the visible and the invisible Church: only we must bear in mind that there was then no State Church; so that the relations of the unworthy to the worthy were quite different from what they afterwards became, when both made up one body politic. It is noticeable how Paul refers to Jesus' idea of the kingdom of God. He, like the other apostles, put the kingdom into an aeron, when the Lord shall in person unite Christianity, and bring it to its highest development. In the present aeron, Christianity is a developing, spreading force, working upon the hearts and practices of men: in the future it will be completed (cf. 1 Cor. vii. 9 sqq., xxv. 47 sqq., Gal. v. 21; Eph. v. 5; 2 Thess. i. 5; 2 Tim. iv. 1; Heb. xii. 28; Jas. ii. 5; 2 Pet. i. 11). The Church in the present has for its immediate duty the steady growth in God, letting his word dwell among it richly (Col. iii. 16), praying, praising, and working, reaching out its hands of love and comfort unto all needy ones, and providing especially for the necessities of the saints. Each member is a priest to offer spiritual sacrifices (Heb. xiii. 15 sqq.). To the proper discharge of these duties the Church had certain officers, who were endow with particular gifts. In a collective sense the duties were called διακονίας ("ministrations," 1 Cor. xii. 5). The leaders were known as ἀπόστολοι ("overseers"), who were the elders, or "presbyters," and "deacons." Originally they were the selection of the apostles themselves, then by the congregations. See CLERGY. They sprang up in accordance with the wants of the different churches. Thus "deacons" were a necessity in the Jerusalem church; and that church was modelled upon the synagogue. But the clergy are not divinely constituted in the sense that God gave special order for their organization, or special direction for their continuance: on the contrary, the New Testament contains no particular ecclesiastical plan for the future. The future church was free to manage its affairs according to its needs. One gift of the nascent Church was the prophetic (1 Cor. xii. 28 sqq.), it was necessary to build up the communities, and lead them unto better acquaintance with the divine Word. But the “prophets” were not an order; rather the gift was shared by presbyters (1 Thm. iii. 2, v. 17), and generally by the Church (Jas. iii. 1). The apostolic office was by its very conditions unique and untransmissible. There will never be apostles again, because they were the divinely-ordered founders of the Church. See Apostle.

There was a mighty difference between the “legal” church in Jerusalem, and the “spiritual” churches permeated by Paul’s heavenly freedom. But bond and free constituted one Church in Christ Jesus; and the test of membership was not ecclesiastical observances or theological conceptions, but love. Love to Christ, love of the brethren,— by this were Christians known to the world. “See how these Christians love one another!” was the admiring speech of their enemies. “These things I command you, that ye love one another,” said Jesus (John xv.17). And which the Church forgot minor differences. The mias. “These things I command you, that ye not found in the New Testament. In place of the holiness of the individual member, leading directly to a belief of a priesthood. The uniting band is no more

The holiness of the external Church is increasingly emphasized, instead of the holiness of the Church. And yet it contains elements which certainly are exceptions, but love. Love to Christ, love to the brethren,— by this were Christians known to the world. “See how these Christians love one another!” was the admiring speech of their enemies. “These things I command you, that ye love one another,” said Jesus (John xv.17). And which the Church forgot minor differences. The seal of this sweet brotherhood was the holy kiss.

The Catholic Church takes in all true Christians; and so each congregation was a “Catholic Church.”

With noteworthy definiteness speaks Ignatius: “Each church stands under one bishop, who is the representative of Christ or of God, and under the presbytery, and various other officials; the bishop as the apostles were about Christ.” But he does not discuss the questions, how the bishops came to occupy this position, how far they were divinely gifted for their office, and how the Church and they were guarded against erroneous leadings. Irenaeus and Tertullian voice the general opinion of their day, when they speak of the episcopacy as the representatives of the apostles, continuing their work of teaching and leading the Church, and thus giving to it “apostolicity.” See Irenaeus (IV. 26, 2) and his famous sentence (III. 24, 1): “Ubi ecclesia, ibi Spiritus Dei, et ubi Spiritus Dei, illae ecclesiae et omnium gratia” (“Where the Church is, there is the Spirit of God; and where the Spirit of God is, there is the Church, and every kind of grace”). Similarly Tertullian compares, as Clement of Rome had done, the presbytery, and especially the episcopacy, to the Old-Testament priesthood, asserting that to the Church belonged an “order of priests,” and that the bishop was the “high priest” (pontifex maximus, ιεραρχής). It must, however, be allowed that the notion of the bishop as the dispenser of the “means of grace” was the development of a later age. — The Alexandrian theology of a Clement and an Origen did not affect this development. Their philosophical and aristocratic gnosis was out of the stream of New-Testament Christianity. Against this stream Montanism tried to work its way, but failed; and we find its progress in Cyprian, to whom the bishops are the Church’s rulers, with divine authority. Baptism was indeed allowed to be valid, even if performed by heretics or schismatics; yet the schiiboleth, that “out of the Church there is no salvation,” was maintained; for those baptized by outsiders first received the saving effects of their baptism when they entered the Church. See Baptism by Heresies. Besides the expressions of Cyprian, which show that to the episcopacy he granted unconditional authority, are others which as emphatically point to a necessary participation of the presbyters, and even of the laity, particularly in the "power of the keys." Nor does he suggest any explanation of this contradiction. In him, also, the priest, in the Lord's Supper, represents Christ, and offers the body of Christ. See Mass.

It is true, however, that he does not use the word "body" in its later Roman sense. — Cyprian finds the unity of the Church in its being built upon the one Peter (Matt. xvi. 18). In Rome he sees the "cathedra Petri," the root and the matrix of the Catholic Church (De Unit. Eccl., c. 4; Epist. 70, 73, 55 [39], 45 [48]); yet he explains that the Lord granted to the other apostles, and to the post-apostolic bishops, the same power originally given to Peter, and vindicates for himself independent episcopal authority. See the Old Catholic bishop Reinkens: Die Lehre des hl. Cyprian von der Einheit der Kirche, Würzburg, 1873.

We come now to Augustine. It is from him that the Church received her deepest and fullest exposition of the doctrine of the Church. The historical occasion for this was the contest with the Donatists, who denied the holiness of the Catholic Church, because she kept within her fold those who had sinned unto death, as they claimed; i.e., those who had delivered up the sacred writings to the heathen persecutors. To these idealists Augustine opposed the true conception of the Church as really the body of Christ, because the divine energy impelled her, and not the place of the popes, and the great papal schism, which aroused the Church against the Papacy. Hence, especially in France, do we find a vigorous exposition of a Catholic Church in distinction to the Roman Church; and under the leadership of D'Ailly and Gerson (cf. his De modis unitendi et ref. eccles.) these ideas were presented in the great Reform councils: the councils were infallible, not the Pope; the Roman Church was fallible, and under the authority of the Universal Church, which was represented in the councils, composed not of bishops alone, but also of princes, and delegates from the universities; the Head of the Church was Christ; the Pope was not the head of Christ. The divine right of episcopacy, and the divine ordinance of the papal primacy, were not, however, denied; and Hus was condemned to death, even by a Gerson and a D'Ailly, for maintaining that the true Church was made up of the elect, that the Papacy was not divinely appointed, and that council were not infallible.

Notwithstanding this opposition, the papal theory gained ground. It dominated the Lateran Council (1512-17) under Leo X. The Jesuits gave it their powerful advocacy. Bellarmine defines the Church as the assembly of those professors of the Christian faith who are bound by the sacraments under the rule of legitimate pastors, and especially under the Pope. But the Council of Trent refused to decide between the opposing theories; and it was left for the Vatican Council of 1870 to give the logical conclusion of development, in its dogma of the infallibility of the Pope, when speaking ex cathedra upon matters of faith and morals. This makes the Pope the Head of the Church, and as Pope Pius IX. actually claimed, in his famous letter of Aug. 7, 1873, to the Emperor William, rightful ruler of all who have received baptism.

3. THE CHURCH AND THE PROTESTANT DOGMATICIAN OF THE CHURCH SINCE THE REFORMATION.

The Waldensians were the first to return to the primitive idea of the Church, but without any new principle of church-action, or any scientifically settled doctrine upon the subject. The first theologian who opposed to the Roman-Catholic doctrine of the Church another which was well grounded, was Wiclif, whom Hus followed. According to him, the Church is the company of the predestinated. This was so far forth both Catholic and Augustinian: but the conclusion to which his idea led him was decidedly otherwise; for he declared that to the proper administration of salvation neither priest, nor bishop, nor pope was needful. He denied the papal primacy and the de fure divino episcopacy, and maintained that God granted the laity to hold fast to truths lost sight of by the clergy. The Church, to Wiclif, was the elect, both living and dead. The champion of the Church, and only Hus is Luther, who, at the Leipzig Disputation (1517), defined the Church as the Communion of Saints, whose existence depended upon its possession of the Word and sacraments, and not of bishop or clergy. The "power of the keys," which the true Church knew, was no exclusive class-possession, but the assurance, by the means of grace, that sin was forgiven, independent of the personal character of the administrator. The saints who form the Church are those who have been sanctified by the Word and sacraments, through the exercise of faith. On this basis Luther conducted the revolt against Rome; proving out of the Word that no human agency intervened before the sinner and his Saviour, but that by faith in Christ we were saved, and became members of his body. The Church thus defined was real, although not visible, except to God, who knows his own. The evidence of saintship was a holy life, and of the Church was the preaching of the Word and the sacraments; and it consequently assumed such shape as best suited this activity. Luther held strong notions of the right and power of the Church to punish offences. The cutting loose from the Church of Rome, Luther (like the Waldensians so long before) recognized in that Church the members of Christ's Church.

Very different, of course, was Rome's opinion of Luther's followers. In the mouth of the Lutherans the Catholic Church is the Church spread all over the world and over all the centuries. Its Head is the one Christ: its bands are the one faith, one hope, one baptism. As is evident, this definition of Luther's is too vague to decide the many questions and problems which it starts: what is purity in preaching, and administration of the sacraments, and how far is it necessary? what is the power of the Church? who should exercise it? etc. The position of the Church to the State was the result of circumstances; its mode of government was almost accidental; and the return to episcopacy was left over many years. See LUTHERAN CHURCH.

Melanchthon in his later teaching emphasizes the conception of the Church as a visible organization, in which the pure Word or the pure doctrine was taught; and in its doing of these things consisted its visibility. [He also favored a modified episcopacy, and was willing even to allow a papal supervenience over the Church, provided the Pope tolerated the freedom of the gospel. See Schaff: Creeds, I. 204.]

The Reformed Confessions describe the Church as the Communion of Believers or Saints, and condition its existence on the pure preaching of the Word. They distinguish between the visible and the invisible Church; the latter composed of the elect, who, however, know their election, and therefore their membership in the invisible Church. The Reformed theologians made much less of the sacraments. They declared that the Church was in no sense the "dispenser of grace," as the Roman Catholics and Lutherans affirm. Various solutions were offered to the problem of Church and State. Zwingli made the Church the servant of the State. Calvin favored presbyterian government, and independence of the State, but could not carry out his scheme. As in the case of the Lutherans, the political surroundings and relations of the Church, and only where these were hostile did the Church assume independent government. The theory of complete separation of Church and State belongs to a later period. Inside the Reformed churches difference of opinion also existed in regard to ecclesiastical polity; and so Presbyterianism and Congregationalism sprang up side by side. The Reformed theory in government and theology reached its extremest point in Quakerism.

Unlike either the Lutheran or the Reformed churches, is the Anglican. Reformed in its teachings on the sacraments, it is yet Melanchthonian in its assertion of the visibility of the Church. But its assertion of the necessity of apostolical succession to the existence of the Church of Christ is not found in its Thirty-nine Articles.

After the Reformation, followed a period when a newly-awakened religiousness rebelled against the too tightly drawn lines of ecclesiastical polity. Then came in rationalism, religious indifference, and unbelief, which depreciated the Church in any sense. Spener strove to counteract this disintegrating tendency by awakening the laity; but Pietism sought satisfaction took on a narrow, legal character, and one related to the Reformed idea. Rationalism considered the Church as a purely human organization, on a level with other societies, and denied that Jesus ever contemplated the formation of a Church.

[Of great influence was the view of Schleiermacher (1768-1834); namely, that "the Christian Church is quickened by the Holy Ghost, and is in its purity and completeness a perfect copy of the Saviour, and that every regenerate soul is a component part of this society" (Der christliche Glaube, 3d ed., Berlin, 1836, II. 306). The theory of Rothe (1799-1867) was quite different. He held, that, in the true moral development, civil society is in itself a religious community. Every man should have a part in the Church; for only thus can his part in other associations have moral validity. It follows, that, when humanity becomes perfect, the Church vanishes; for then the sphere of the moral and that of the religious communion become one and the same: hence the Church disappears in proportion as the State becomes perfect. This gradual solution of the Church in the State can take place only by the State becoming a religious body, a kingdom of God,—a theocracy in the highest sense. See R. Roth: Die Anfänge der christlichen Kirche, Wittenberg, 1857.

The fright of revolution in the first part of the century produced in Germany, in some quarters, a longing for authority; and so a new emphasis was laid upon the Church. It was clothed with divine might and right: it was laid upon the Church. It was clothed with a longing for authority; and so a new emphasis was talk of reviving the episcopacy. The discussion elicited by this Neo-Lutheranism showed the necessity of ecclesiastically recognizing the laity, and of giving them part in the government of the Church. The condition of the Church's existence and growth is, however, not in its policy, but in its use of the divinely ordained means of grace, and, above all, in the presence of the Holy Spirit, who gives efficacy to the Word, and enables the congregations to live and work together in love.

In England, about the same time, arose High-Churchism (Anglo-Catholicism) with its Romish tendency as expressed in the famous Oxford Tracts for the Times. See Puseyism, Tractarianism. The Anglo-Catholics announced their belief, (1) In apostolic succession (i.e., the ministry of the Church of England was derived by uninterrupted descent, through episcopacy, from the apostles, and is a permanent and unalterable institution: upon this connection with the apostles rested the efficacy of the sacraments); (2) In baptismal regeneration; (3) The eucharistic sacrifice, and the real communion in the body and blood of our Lord; (4) The appeal to the Church from the beginning as the depository and witness of the truth. Opposite to them is the Broad-Church party, which, in the interests of the widest freedom, denies that apostical succession is essential to the Church and the sacraments. A strange product of the extreme High-Church view is the Catholic Apostolic Church, commonly called the Irvingite. The interpretation of the New-Testament passages in the interest of episcopacy is gradually giving way to a more liberal exegesis under the influence of such scholars as Bishops Ellicott and Lightfoot, G. A. Jacob, and E. Hatch. See Bishop; England, Church of.

CHURCH-PROPERTY. The means necessary for its organization and maintenance the primitive Church derived, partly from voluntary gifts, and partly from direct taxes levied upon its membership. The revenues thus raised were collected in a common diocesan purse, whence they were paid out, in proportionate allotments, to the clergy, for the fabrica ecclesiae (that is, the churchbuilding, the cemetery, etc.), and to the poor. The administration devolved originally upon the presbytery, and afterwards upon a steward, ἀρχιερεύς, appointed by the presbytery, and acting under the supervision of the bishop. The Council of Chalcedon (451) recommended the appointment of such an officer in every diocese, and this practice was still in existence when the Fourth Council of Toledo was held (633), though at that time the financial department of the Christian Church had long lost its original simplicity.

In 321 Constantine the Great granted permission to donate and bequeath property to the Christian Church; and this permission was so extensively used, that, already in 364, Valentinian felt constrained to enact a mortmain law in order to prevent the accumulation of land by the Church. Property consisted at that time chiefly of land; and great masses of landed property accrued to the Church from the erection or ornamentation of buildings, for the foundation or maintenance of establishments, etc. Valentinian's law, however, had no permanent influence. Under Justinian (527–565) it became a recognized maxim of Roman jurisprudence, and the general practice of the Roman courts, to put the most favorable construction on wills making dispositions of property for the benefit of the Church. It occurred very frequently, that by will a legacy was given to the Church in general, or to the poor in general, or to God; but in such cases the courts never allowed the legacy to be lost on account of the uncertainty of the instrument, but construed it to inure to the parish of the testator. Thus the Church soon became very rich, holding property in every form in which property could be held: and this wealth was well guarded; it could not be alienated by its present incumbents, and robbers of it were punished doubly.

But the question now arose, Who is the true owner of all this property? In the contest between the monastic institutions and the episcopal authority, the bishop protested that he was the real owner of all the ecclesiastical property in his diocese; but finding no support from the Pope, whose policy it was to use monasticism as a counterpoise to the episcopacy, the claim was never recognized. Again: in the contest between the episcopacy and the papacy, the Pope asserted that he, as the representative of the Universal Church, was the real owner of all the property of the Church, and to a certain extent he succeeded in establishing his claim. Finally, in the contest between the Church and the secular government, the Church declared that its property belonged to Christ, and any encroachment upon... its rights, or privileges, or immunities, was a robbery of Christ. It may be doubtful whether such an argument ever could have obtained legal force; but it is certain that it made a deep impression on people in general, and exercised great influence on the formation of public opinion, and continued to be a source of strength to the Church in the form of tradition.

In theory, the State was the owner of the property of the Church, and was applied only to its use. In practice, however, as the Reformation spread and the Church became a function of the State establishment, the Church was preserved, its rights, or privileges, or immunities, was a robbery of Christ. They can neither sue nor be sued in civil courts; and they cannot hold property directly, yet they can control property held by others for their use. Donations and grants may be legally made to trustees for the use and benefit of an unincorporated society; and courts of equity will protect them in the enjoyment of their rights, and, if necessary, will raise up legal trustees through whom they may act.

The Reformation acknowledged this principle, and acted upon it, at least in the beginning. When the object of a certain institution was rejected, as, for instance, in the case of monasteries, legacies for saying mass, etc., the institution was dissolved, and its property confiscated. But when the institution was preserved, its property remained with it, and was applied only to religious or charitable purposes. See Luther: Ordnung eines gemeinen Kastens, 1635. By degrees, however, as the Reformation spread and split, and every State organized its own church establishment, the Church became a function of the State. The bearing of the property of the Church depends upon the State,— and the State be- came the owner of the property of the Church. Such is the case in all Protestant countries, with one great exception,— America, in which the Church is perfectly free and independent of the State,— and a number of minor exceptions arising from the existence of dissenting churches beside the State establishment. Such is also the case in France; though it has proved very difficult, as the people are Roman-Catholic, to carry through there the principle of organizing the Church as a State institution. But there is at present a tendency abroad in all the evangelical countries (in the United States, for example, it is not a law), of placing the Church on the same basis as other public corporations, whose duties are to protect the church-building, and provide public worship, and see that it be orderly.

In America a church may hold property in various ways, sometimes not without impediments of various kinds, but always with perfect safety. The law of charity is here the chief protector of church-property, and, in connection with the law of trusts, also the chief regulator. When a religious society is incorporated, it is regarded by the law, and treated by it, exactly like any other civil corporation, — a railroad company, a bank, or an insurance company; and the civil courts will not interfere with its organization, order, discipline, doctrine, or ownership of property, except to enforce an application of its wealth in strict accordance with the purposes for which it was acquired. When, however, a religious society is not incorporated (and in some States a charter cannot be obtained by them), they are not recognized as having a legal existence. They can neither sue nor be sued in civil courts; and they cannot hold property directly, yet they can control property held by others for their use. Donations and grants may be legally made to trustees for the use and benefit of an unincorporated society; and courts of equity will protect them in the enjoyment of their rights, and, if necessary, will raise up legal trustees through whom they may act.

The oldest records of this kind still extant are the baptismal registers of Florence, beginning with 1500. There are French burial registers from 1515; and in 1530 Francis I. ordered that baptismal registers should also be kept. The Council of Trent (sess. XXIV. cap. 1 and 2, de reform. matris.) instituted marriage registers; and the State institution was adopted also in Protestant countries. As, however, the civil law could not well leave it entirely to the Church to decide whether or not in a certain case there existed a real marriage, a French law of Sept. 20, 1792, transferred the whole business of registering marriage to the civil officer; and this change was afterwards introduced in all civilized countries.

CHURCH-REGISTERS were books in which the minister recorded the births, deaths, and marriages, etc., occurring in his congregation. The custom originated in the Roman law; but, in spite of its eminent usefulness, it never became a general law, and never acquired a universal method. The oldest records of this kind still extant are the baptismal registers of Florence, beginning with 1500. There are French burial registers from 1515; and in 1530 Francis I. ordered that baptismal registers should also be kept. The Council of Trent (sess. CHURCHING OF WOMEN, or Thanksgiving of Women after Childbirth. The Hebrew idea, that child-bearing was in a sense a defilement which required purification on the fortieth day (Lev. xii.), passed over into the Christian Church, and comes out in Dionysius of Alexandria, the canons of Nicaea, Chrysostom, and Augustine (Quest. in Levit., lib. iii. q. 64). Primitively there were no formularies for this purpose; but there was a service of some sort, at the discretion of the priest. "On the fortieth day the mother and the child, accompanied by the godfather, went solemnly to church. Before the church-door the priest received them, signed the mother with the cross, and said over her several prayers. He then took the child, made the sign of the cross with it, and carried it up to the altar. The godfather then received it from the priest, and left the church" (Smith's Dict. Christ. Antiq., in loco). The service as now used in the Greek, Roman, and Episcopal churches, is based upon the Christress of the world; and in the same degree as the position, it ceased to be a religion, and became the most vital one, — the heart. Still greater dialectics; its wisdom became petrified in mere itself a philosophy. It sent its entusiasms sprouted out, becoming the heir of its philosophy; but, in the corresponding effect, of course, on its dogmatics. In the West, by the general decay with natural fit upon one. The ceremony prescribed in speculation; its conscience got entangled in the Church, became an active part of the State, like the change so soon took place in itsexternal condition, that it has opened a new chapter in the history of the Church, a chapter of the most decisive interest.

The Christian Church started in the Roman Empire as a forbidden organization, and was, as such, a pest, to be cast out or extirpated. In the fourth century, under Constantine the Great, this situation was completely changed. When the Emperor became a Christian, the Christian Church became an active part of the State, like the judicature, or the army, an organ, and that the most vital one, — the heart. Still greater changes soon took place in its external condition, with corresponding effect, of course, on its internal construction. In the East, when the Greek civilization had run out its course, Christianity became the heir of its philosophy; but, in the same degree as it assimilated this new acquisition, it ceased to be a religion, and became itself a philosophy. Its enthusiasm sprouted out in speculation; its conscience got entangled in dialectics; its wisdom became petrified in mere dogmatics. In the West, by the general decay of the empire, by its division into two empires, by the disintegration of the western empire, the Christian Church was made the heir of the pres tige of the city of Rome, for centuries the mistress of the world; and in the same degree as the Church took possession of this its new heirloom it ceased to be a preacher, and became itself a ruler. Most of the good which the Roman Catholic Church has done for Europe during the dark ages and the middle ages — and the sum total is incalculable — she did, not as the messenger of the gospel, but because she furnished the noblest and the strongest government.

The sources of the immense power which the Church of Rome attained during those ages are by no means a mystery. She was then teaching people the first rudiments, that is, the essential elements, of human nobleness, — to obey, not as the slave or the vanquished, but from love and reverence, and to work, not from greed or any other impulse of egotism, but from gratitude for the faculties given, and for the glory of the giver. She was then gathering into her bosom the most and the best of the genius which was produced. In the feudal world one was born in a castle, on the back of a horse, and with a sword in his hand; another in a hut, crouching on his knees in the dust: and no amount of idiocy or genius couldpossibly change their lots. But in the ecclesiastical world the gates of the Church stood open to all, to the serf as well as to the king. Provided he was a man of upright heart and clear brain, of pure will and strong understanding; and in the Church he was sure to rise according to his gifts and his energy. She was, then, the sole possessor of science and art. All knowledge, from the origin of a thunderstorm to the mysteries of the Trinity, from a song by Horace to the Lord's Prayer, she held; all skill, from the tilling of a vineyard to the rearing of a cathedral, from the curing of a fever to the fabrication of gunpowder, was in her hands. Even the science and art of war did not form an exception. She held, then, the weightiest, the most intelligible, and the only beloved and awe-inspiring title of authority. The king had his sword with what agony of blood and brand might still cling to it, and upon his sword depended all his claim to authority; could anybody dull or break it, so much the better. But the Pope had the prestige of Rome, and on the background of this radiant effulgence the words of the Lord to Peter, his predecessor: To deny this authority, was, indeed, to shut one's self out from what light the world contained, and turn away into utter darkness. Thus the idea that all power on earth emanated from the Church, and centred in the Pope, was the natural and inevitable outcome of history itself, and by no means the dream of a diseased ambition, or the result of a well-contrived fraud. But the idea was one born of time, to be again swallowed by the course of time. In Gregory VII. it became conscious of itself. In Innocent III. it found its most brilliant expression. In Boniface VIII. it already became a desperate struggle on the other side of the line, on the course downwards.

In order to realize this idea, it was necessary, first, to organize the whole mass of the Church into one compact body, independent of those divisions into states into which the secular world was cut up, and, next, to bring the collected force of this one body to bear upon each of the secular divisions individually until the State was actually crushed into submission. The first part of this problem the Roman Church handled with mar-
The investiture with ring and jurisdiction of the civil courts of the country, or over England; that is, whether, in secular affairs, the staff was reserved for the Pope; but the bishops' compact body, independent of all secular powers of the murdered Thomas Becket, the English dangerousand unbearable arrogance, and to our imperial fiefs, was not abolished. Equally am

But, even if the Church of Rome had never been found wanting herself in any respect, the idea of a universal church-monarchy would, nevertheless, have proved an impossibility on account of the steadily growing national differentiation of the mass of the subjects. Had Europe been inhabited by one nation, with homogeneous instincts and impulses, homogeneous traditions and aspirations, homogeneous customs and manners, it might still have been sitting quietly in the dark ages, lit up with Roman candles from one end to the other, and no one suspecting the existence of a sun in the world. But as it was a number of nations consolidating themselves, each having its own errand to do, the Church herself became split into many divisions: for the Church is not and can never be, like the imperium Romanum, a mere superstructure which can be stretched across all national differences. With the nations the Church became national; and already, at the Council of Trent, the Pope was compelled to make special arrangements with the special states (see Concordat), which simply amounts to a practical abandonment of the idea of a universal church-monarchy.

In the individual states the Pope still continued to exert himself in order to maintain the supremacy of the Church, with what ups and downs may be learned from the concordats with Napoleon I. and Francis Joseph I., with what final result may be inferred from recent events, — the Kulturkampf in Germany, the expulsion of the Congregations in France, etc. But if the Pope now would repeat the famous words of Boniface VIII., "Imaginum potestate urbi et scribini pectoris sui habere censetur," he would simply make the impression of a distracted actor suddenly wandering astray into a wrong part. A striking exposition of the enormous claims which the Pope made, and of the position which he met already in the period of the Council of Constance, is found in Gerson's De potestate ecclesiastica considerationes, written during the sessions of the council, Opera, vol. II. pars II., Antwerp, 1706. Among modern ultramontane writers, see Joseph DE MAISTRE: Du Pape, Lyons, 1819.

With the Reformation the principle of the relation between Church and State was completely reversed. The Roman-Catholic Church had tried to make the State her righthand by which to defend her property, temporal and spiritual, from robbers and heretics. The Reformed Church became the left hand of the State, charged with keeping back the citizens from any kind of unruly or immoral behavior. The Church supreme, the State her knight; the State supreme, the Church its servant, — that was the change. It took place in a somewhat different manner in England and on the Continent; but it was essentially the same in both cases, and had the same effect.

The maxim "cujus regio, ejus religio," the pithy definition of territorialism, which makes the religion of the ruler of the country, became the leading principle in all Protestant states on the Continent; and, in spite of a certain roughness of expression, it agrees fully with what we read in the Thirty-nine Articles: "The Queen's Majesty has the chief power in this Realm of England, and other her Dominions, unto whom the chief Government of all Estates of this Realm, whether they be Eccle-
The results to the Church herself, of this her complete subordination to the State, were, first the so-called orthodox, a barren pedantry which made it impossible for any one who had not a lawyer's smartness to become a good Christian; and, next, rationalism, which made Christianity an enlightenment of the intellect, a matter of the school merely. The opposition of piety to orthodoxy did not touch the question of the relation between Church and State; but that opposition did, which, in the third and fourth decades of the present century, arose against rationalism. It claimed that the Church should be a representation of the religious life of the congregation, and it consequently demanded that the congregation should at least have a certain share in the government of the Church. The movement was strongest in Prussia, weakest in Sweden; but it achieved everywhere some results. Elements of presbyterian or synodal government were everywhere introduced, and the movement is still in vigorous progress.

In England the Reformation did not begin from below, but from above, Henry VIII. simply taking the place of the Pope, and, making himself the head of the English Church; and, when it was finally accomplished under Elizabeth, the supremacy of the State was firmly established as the principle of the relation between Church and State. Opposition, however, soon arose, first from the Puritans, and afterwards from other dissenters. The Puritans protested that the Church and the State are two entirely distinct societies; that they ought, therefore, to stand wholly independent of each other; that the Church can in no way rightfully be made subject to the control of the civil magistrate, etc. The opposite view, the theory adopted by the Established Church itself, is represented by Hooker, Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, London, 1594, who maintains that Church and State are one and the same society, only contemplated from two different aspects, and that the State, therefore, has a perfect right to legislate for the Church. After a short victory for the Puritans under Cromwell, who, with certain limitations, adopted the principle of toleration, guaranteed free exercise of religion to all who professed faith in God and in Christ Jesus, and forbade all compulsion, by penalties or otherwise, to conform to the Established religion, there followed a violent re-action under Charles II. It is said, that, on account of the Act of Uniformity of 1662, two thousand ministers were ejected, eight thousand laymen imprisoned, and sixty thousand persons made to suffer, in some way or other, for conscience' sake. Finally, however, the Toleration Act of 1688, granting full liberty of worship to all nonconformists excepting Roman Catholics and Unitarians, broke down the main bar obstructing the freedom of the Church; and the progress towards liberty and independence has ever since been uninterrupted, though slow. The act was extended in 1778 to Roman Catholics, and in 1813, to Unitarians. The repeal of the Test Acts, etc. (1828–29), gave the dissenters access to Parliament and public offices. The Registration and Marriage Acts of 1836, 1837, and 1844, made the baptisms and marriages performed by dissenting ministers valid before the law. The Reform Bill of 1834 opened the universities of Oxford and Cambridge to dissenting students, etc. Meanwhile, also, the theory changed. In his The Alliance between Church and State, London, 1736, Warburton accepts the Puritan premise, that the Church and the State are distinct societies, but rejects the inference, that, for that reason, they should remain independent of each other, and construes the relation as an alliance, something like a contract social for the sake of mutual advantage. The book is not remarkable for any logical strength in its reasoning; but it is interesting as indicating a decisive step onward in the direction of liberty. Among more recent contributions to the theoretical solution of the question are, S. T. Coleridge: On the Constitution of the Church and State according to the Idea of each, London, 1830; Thomas Arnold: Fragment on the Church, unfinished, and published after his death.
church history is the largest, and, with the exception of exegesis, the most important, department of the historical science of sacred literature. It embraces, in the widest sense, the whole religious development of mankind, from the creation down to the present time, and is continuously growing in bulk. In a narrower sense, it is confined to a history of Christianity and the Christian Church from the birth of Christ and the Day of Pentecost, when Christianity made its first appearance in an organized form as distinct from the Jewish religion. The historian has to trace the origin, growth, and fortunes of the Church, and to reproduce its life in the different ages. The value of his work depends upon the degree of its truthfulness, or exact correspondence with the facts. Church history is not a heap of dry bones, but life and power: it is the Church itself in constant motion and progress from land to land, and from age to age, until the whole world shall be filled with the knowledge of Christ. It is the most interesting part of the world's history, as religion is the deepest and most important concern of man, the bond that unites him to God. It embraces the external expansion and contraction of Christianity, or the history of missions and persecutions, the visible organization or Church polity and discipline, the development of doctrine and theology, the worship, with its various rites and ceremonies, liturgies, sacred poetry and music, the manifestations of practical piety, Christian morality, and benevolent institutions: in one word, all that belongs to the inner and outer life of Christianity in the world. It is a panorama of God's dealings with the human race, and man's relations to God under all aspects. It shows the gradual unfolding of the plan of redemption,—a plan of infinite wisdom and goodness, in constant conflict with the Satanic powers and influences which are struggling for the ascendency, but are doomed to ultimate defeat, and overruled for good. It is the greatest triumph of God's wisdom to bring good out of evil, and to overrule the wrath of man for his own glory and for the progress of truth and righteousness. Church history is a book of life, full of warning and precept, of hope and encouragement.

II. Church History and Secular History.

—They differ as Church and State, as Christianity and humanitv, as the order of grace and the order of nature; yet they are inseparably connected, and the one cannot be understood without the other. Among the Jews the spiritual and secular history together form one history of theocracy. Both currents intermingle in the Byzantine Empire, in the European States and the Latin Church during the middle ages, in the period of the Reformation, during the colonial period of America, and in all countries where Church and State are united. Gibbon's History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire is in great part also a history of the rise and progress of Christianity, which survived the fall of Old and New Rome, and went forth to conquer the barbarian conquerors by Christianizing and civilizing them. Every history of papacy is also a history of the German Roman Empire, and vice versa. No history of the sixteenth century can be written without constant reference to the Protestant Reformation and Roman-Catholic reaction. The Puritan settlements of New England are as well a history of the ecclesiastical and secular history of North America. In modern times the tendency is more and more towards separation of the spiritual and temporal powers:
nevertheless, the Church will always be influenced by the surrounding state of civil society, and must adapt itself to the wants of the age, and progress of events; while, on the other hand, the world will always feel the moral influence, the restraining, ennobling, stimulating, purifying, and sanctifying power of Christianity, which works like a leaven from within upon the ramifications of society.

III. Sources. — They are mostly written, in part unwritten.

A. The written sources include, (1) The official documents of ecclesiastical and civil authorities, such as acts of councils, creeds, liturgies, hymn-books, church-laws, papal bulls and encyclicals.

B. The unwritten sources are works of Christian art; as churches, chapels, pictures, sculptures, crosses, crucifixes, relics, and other monuments which symbolize and embody Christian ideas.

The Roman catacombs, with their vast extent, their solemn darkness, their labyrinthine mystery, their rude epitaphs and sculptures, their symbols of faith, and their relics of martyrdom, give us a lifelike idea of the Church in the period of persecution, its trials and sufferings, its faith and hope, its simple worship, and devoted piety.

"He who is thoroughly steeped in the imagery of the catacombs will be nearer to the thoughts of the early Church than he who has learned by heart the most of Tertullian or Origen." The basilicas are characteristic of the Nicene; the Byzantine churches, of the Byzantine age and the Eastern and Russian Church; the Gothic cathedrals, of the palmy days of medieval Catholicism; the Renaissance style, of the revival of letters. "The eye of society needs most its monuments and relics. Every new building must have monuments, friends and foes, narrator, eulogist, advocate, and antagonist, whether orthodox or heretic, whether Christian, Jew, or Gentile, aiming in all this laborious investigation at "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." (2) He must, therefore, interpret the results of his investigation in a faithful and lifelike narrative, so as to present the objective course of history itself, as it were, in a photographic, or rather in an artistic painting; for a photograph gives a ghastly view of the momentary look of a person, while the portrait of the artist combines the changing moods and various aspects of his subject into a living whole. The genuine writer of history differs as much from the dry chronicle of isolated facts and dates as from the novelist. He must represent both thoughts and facts. He must particularize and generalize, descend into minute details and take a comprehensive bird's-eye view of whole ages and periods.

He must have a judicial mind, which deals impartially with all persons and events coming before his tribunal. He must be free from partisan and sectarian bias, and aim at justice and truth. It is the exclusive privilege of the divine Mind to view all things sub specie aeternitatis, and to see the end from the beginning. We can only know things consecutively and in fragments. But history is its own best interpreter; and, the farther it advances, the more we are able to understand and appreciate the past. Historians differ in gifts and vocation. Some are miners, who bring out the raw material from the sources (Flacius, Baronius, Tillyard, Gieseler); others are manufacturers, who work up the material for the use of scholars (Bossuet, Mosheim, Gibbon, Milman, Neander). Some are wholesale merchants, some retailers. Some are bold critics, who open new avenues of thought (Ewald, Baur, Renan); others popularize the results of laborious researches for the general benefit (Hagenbach, Merle, Pressensé, Stanley).

V. Periods and Epochs. — These represent the different stages in the religious development of the race. They must not be arbitrarily made, according to a mechanical scheme (such as the centurial division, introduced by Flacius in the Magdeburg Centuries, and followed by Mosheim), but taken from the actual stops or starting-points (which is the meaning of τροχος, from τρέχω, "to stop," "to pause") and circuits (περίφραξis) of the history itself. The following are the natural divisions:

A. Sacred or Biblical History, the history of the divine revelation, from the creation to the close of the apostolic age, running parallel with the Scriptures, from Genesis to Revelation. Here we must distinguish the dispensation of the law and the dispensation of the gospel, or the history of the Old-Covenant religion and that of the New-Covenant religion.

(1) Under the Old Dispensation, from the creation down to John the Baptist. Subdivisions: (a) The primitive period; (b) The patriarchal period; (c) The Mosaic period (the establishment of the theocracy); (d) The Judges, the Jewish monarchy and prophets; (e) The Babylonian exile; (f) The period of the restoration (Ezra, Nehemiah, and the post-exilian prophets); (g) The Maccabees; (h) The Roman rule till Herod the Great, and the destruction of Jerusalem.

(2) Under the New Dispensation — Christ and the apostles, or primitive and normative Christianity in its divine-human founder and inspired organs. Subdivisions: (a) The preparatory mission of John the Baptist; (b) The life and work of Christ; (c) The founding of the Church among the Jews and Gentiles by the labors of Peter, Paul, and John.
CHURCH HISTORY.

B. Christian History, or Ecclesiastical History, proper, from the close of the apostolic age to modern times: Subdivisions: (1) History of Ancient Christianity, embracing the first six centuries to Gregory I. (500). — (2) The age of scholastic and polemical confessionalism, in conflict with nonconformity and subjective piety (from the middle of the seventeenth to the middle of the eighteenth century); (3) The age of revolution and revival, and conflict between Christianity and the various forms of scepticism and secularism (from Deism in England, and the French Revolution, to our time).

VI. VALUE. — The study of history enables us to understand the present, which is the fruit of the past and the germ of the future. It is the richest storehouse of wisdom and experience. It is the best commentary of Christianity. It is full of comfort and encouragement. It verifies on every page the promise of the Saviour to be with his people always, and to build his Church on an indestructible rock. It exhibits his life in all its forms and phases; it is the triumph of his kingdom from land to land and generation to generation. Earthly empires, systems of philosophy, have their day; human institutions decay; all things of this world bloom and fade away, like the grass of the field; but the Christian religion has the dew of perennial youth, survives all changes, makes steady progress from age to age, overcomes all persecution from without, and corruption from within, is now stronger and more widely spread than ever before, directs the course of civilization, and bears the hopes of the human race. The history of the world is governed in the interest, and for the ultimate triumph, of Christianity. The experience of the past is a sure guaranty of the future.

VII. LIT. — We confine ourselves here to works on General Church History and Ancient History. — Eusebius (d. 340): Church History, from the birth of Christ to Constantine the Great (321); his successors in the Greek Church: Sozomen, Theodoret. The Latin Church contented itself with extracts from Eusebius and his continuators. The middle ages produced most valuable material for history, but no great general church history. The Reformation called forth the spirit of critical inquiry.

(2) Historians from the Sixteenth to the Eighteenth Century. — Matthias Flacius (d. 1575) and other Lutheran divines of Germany wrote the Magdeburg Centuries (Basel, 1559–74), covering thirteen centuries in as many volumes — the first history, from a Protestant point of view, in opposition to the claims of Romanism. In defence of Romanism, and in refutation of Flacius, Caesar Baronius (d. 1607) wrote Ecclesiastical Annals, in 12 folio vols. (published at Rome, 1588 sqq.; new ed. by Aug. Theiner, Barle-Duc, 1868 sqq.), continued by Raynaldus, Spondanus, Theiner, and others, — a work of extraordinary learning and industry, but to be used with great caution. Tilly (d. 1632) wrote his invaluable Memoires (Paris, 1693–1712, 16 vols.), the history of the first six centuries from the sources, in bibliographical style and in the spirit of the more liberal Gallican Catholicism. Gottfried Arnold (d. 1714), of the Pietistic school, wrote the Imperial History of the Church and of Heretics (Frankfort, 1699 sqq., 4 vols. fol., to J.D., 1688.), advocated the interests of practical piety, and the claims of heretics and schismatics, and all those who suffered persecution, and at last superseded heresies and orthodoxy. J. L. Mosheim (d. 1755) wrote his Institutes of Ecclesiastical History (in Latin, Helmstadt, 1758, and often since in several translations) in the spirit of a moderate Lutheran orthodoxy, with solid learning and impartiality, in clear style, after the centurial arrangement of Flacius, and furnished a convenient text-book, which (in the translation of Murdock, with valuable supplements) has continued in use in England and America much longer than in Germany. Schrock's Christian Church History (Leipzig, 1768–1810, in 45 vols.) is far more extensive and far less readable, but invaluable for reference, full of information from the sources. It forsook the mechanical centurial division, and substitutes for it periodic arrangement. Hense (d. 1866) followed with a thoroughly rationalistic work in 9 vols. (1788–1810).

(5) Doctrine histories by Münscher (Marburg, 1797–1809, 4 parts), C. Baur (Lehrbuch der dogmengeschichte, Tübingen, 1847, 3d ed., 1867; Vorlesungen, ed. by his son, Leipzig, 1865–67, 3 vols.). Neander (ed. by Jacoby, Berlin, 1859, 4 vols.); Hagenbach (Leipzig, 1841; 5th ed., 1867, trans. from the German, first by Cunningham in Philadelphia, 1846, then by Davidson and Hull in England, and revised and completed by H. B. Smith of New York (1857–80, in 5 vols.). The text is a more or less skeleton of facts and dates; but the body of the work consists of carefully-selected extracts and proof-texts from the sources which furnish the data for an independent judgment. Baur's Church History, partly published after his death (Tübingen, 1865 sqq., in 5 vols.), is distinguished for philosophic grasp, critical combinations, and bold conjectures, especially in the treatment of the apostolic and post-apostolic ages, and the ancient heresies and systems of doctrine. Hagenbach's Church History (in 7 vols., Leipzig, 1873) is a popular digest of the vast material for the educated lay reader. Schaff's History of the Christian Church (New York, 1850 sqq., German ed., Leipzig, 1888), 3 vols., till A.D. 600, to be completed in 5 or 6 vols., is written from the Anglo-German and Anglo-American standpoint. A new edition of the first volume, thoroughly revised and corrected, will be published 1882, together with a volume on the middle ages. England has produced greater works on special departments (as Gibbon, on The Decline and Fall, etc.; Milman, on Latin Christianity; Stanley, on The Jewish Church; Farrar, on The Life of Christ and The Apostle Paul) than on general church history.

CHURCH POLITY. See Polity.

CHURCH, States of the. (Patrimonium Petri; Stato della Chiesa), the region occupying the central part of Italy, between Tuscany and Naples, and once forming an independent state, of which the Pope was the sovereign. This sovereignty of the Pope was not, as Roman-Catholic writers like to represent it, a striking providential arrangement: on the contrary, it was a long and laborious growth of a rather vicious character. The prominence which the Roman episcopacy very early obtained was a natural and necessary consequence of the position which the city of Rome held in the empire. Nothing in Rome could be second-rate; and, from the moment Christianity became the religion of the State, the Roman bishop naturally and necessarily became the centre of Christendom. It was only through reflection that Jerusalem could be anything grand and awe-inspiring to people of Greek and Roman descent. The congregation of Rome was the largest already in the third century: in the fourth it also became the richest. It commanded respect by itself, independently of its being the “spiritual emperor;” nor did he cede the city of the western part of the empire, to the Pope. The instrument of this bequest is a forgery of the ninth century. The donation of Constantine was a mere fable.

The prominence which the Roman episcopacy became was repeated, and confirmed in 774 by Charlemagne, who completely destroyed the Lombard rule in Italy. The instruments of Pepin’s and Charlemagne’s donations are not extant; the reality is somewhat doubtful. The general character, however, of the gift, cannot be questioned: it was a fief. In 860 Leo III. severed the last bond between the papal see and the Byzantine Empire by crowning Charlemagne Roman emperor: and from that moment the Pope stands in the political field as a vassal of the Frankish Empire.

Immediately after the death of Charlemagne (814), the dissolution of the empire began. But, as the strength of the central government became weakened, the power of the feudal lords or fief-holders increased, and the popes were not slow in taking advantage of the situation. Nicholas I. (858–867) is said to have changed his mitre into a crown; and when Charles the Fat, the last emperor of the Carlovingian house, was deposed (857), the papal independence became an accomplished fact. Thus the step from simple subject to complete sovereignty was successfully made through a short, intermediate stage of vassalage. But to hold this new position proved exceedingly difficult in the beginning. First followed a century of shameless intrigue and scandalous fighting—the period of the Pamphletocracy. The Pope was elected, not by the clergy alone, but by the clergy and people of Rome; and each election was disputed by factions led by foreign and native adventurers. Sergius III. (905–911) was simply the paramour of Marozin of Tuscany, and for her sake he prostituted the dignity of the apostolic see, and squandered its treasures. The disorder continued till the emperor, Henry III. (1046), marched into Italy with a great army, deposed the three pretenders at the Council of Sutri, and seated Clement II. on the papal throne; in 1052 he ceded the Duchy of Benevent to Leo IX., a relative of his. Then followed two centuries of bitter contest with the emperors of Germany, the most brilliant and most dramatic part of the history of the Papacy. In this contest the papal sovereignty did not form the principal issue; but through the whole period it exercised a considerable influence on the papal policy, and at times it actually occupied the foreground; thus, when the Countess Mathilde of Tuscany, in whose Castle of Canossa Gregory VII. received the homage of Henry IV. (1067), bequeathed all her possessions to the Pope. She died 1115; but her will was immediately disputed by the German emperors, and the question was not decided until the days of Louis IX. When Otho IV. recognized the Pope's claim. A change, which in this period took place in the mode of electing the Pope, contributed much to consolidate the papal sovereignty. By a decree of 1059 Nicholas II. reserved the right of electing the Pope exclusively to the college of cardinals; and in 1170 Alexander III. further decreed, that a majority of two-thirds of the votes was necessary to make the election valid. Through the contest with the emperors of Germany the papal power reached its culmination. It was accepted as an undisputed fact, as a moral certainty, that in no case could there be an authority above the Pope; and only the next question was left open,—whether there could be a case in which the Pope had no authority. During the last three centuries, however, prelates, the Rerourbe, or the papal sovereignty was often in danger, but only from interior or domestic causes. Every now and then the memory of the past would flash upon the people of Rome, and cause turbulent commotions. Arnold of Brescia was the first of those heroes from Hades; and, at the beginning of the Reformation, the Pope was not only in sure and quiet possession of his sovereignty, but the sovereign of the states of the Church, nearly with their old boundaries; and for about a decade everything went on smoothly. But, since the French Revolution, the sovereignty of the Pope was only the beginning of a French army. Meanwhile a new great idea,—the national unity,—had begun to enter men's minds, and within a few years it swept away the papal sovereignty as a spider's web. In 1860 the States of the Church, with the exception of the city of Rome, were incorporated with the Kingdom of Italy; and in 1870 Victor Emmanuel took up his residence in Rome itself. The sovereignty of the Pope, if there still is anything in existence which can be thus called, is now confined to the Papal States of the Vatican.

CHYTREUS (Kochhafe), David, b. at Ingel- bingen, Feb. 26, 1530; d. at Rostock, June 25, 1600; studied, under Camerarius and Schnepf, at Tubingen, and, under Melanchthon, in Wittenberg; travelled in Italy, and was made professor at Rostock, in 1551; lectured on philosophy and theology, and distinguished himself as one of the most influential of the Lutheran theologians of the latter part of the sixteenth century. In 1569 he visited Austria, on the invitation of Maximilian II., for the purpose of organizing the evangelical church of the country. He was one of the chief directors at the foundation of the University of Helmstäd, and wrote the statutes. His theological works, among which are Onomasticon Theologicum, an Historia Confessionis Augustanae, etc., were collected in 2 vols. fol., Leipzig, 1599. He also wrote a Chronicon Saxonicum, 1500–83. His biography has been written by Strüzer (Rostock, 1601), Schütz (Hamburg, 1720), Pressel (Elberfeld, 1862), and Krabbe (Rostock, 1870).

CIBORIUM (from the Greek κηπόν) denoted originally the canopy, which, borne by four columns, surmounted the altar, but was afterwards specially applied to the shrine or vessel in which the host was kept, which occasioned the erroneous derivation from cilos (= "food").

CILICI'A, the south-easterly province of Asia Minor, having Cappadocia on the north, from which it is separated by the Taurus and Anti-Taurus Range, Syria on the east, the Mediterranean Sea on the south, and Pamphylia on the west. Eastern Cilicia was a rich plain. Western Cilicia was rough and mountainous. Tarsus, the home of Paul, was its capital, and there was a famous school of philosophy. The province contained many Jews. There are many references to it in Acts (see vi. 9, xv. 23, 41, xxi. 39, xxii. 3, xxiii. 34, xxvii. 5; also Gal. i. 21). The goat's-hair cloth, called cilicum, was one of its products: to make tents of this was Paul's trade. The word, in a slightly modified form, exists to-day in modern European languages, to describe this article, which is still produced.

CIRCUMCELLIANS. See Donatists.

CIRCUMCISION, the cutting-away of the whole or of parts of the prepuce, was, in the olden times, performed with a stone knife, both among the Israelites and the Egyptians (Exod. iv. 23; Josh. v. 2); and other nations adhered to this custom, even after becoming acquainted with sharper instruments; while in later times the Jews employed a steel knife. The operation was not without danger, especially when performed on adults. The third day was feared as the day of the crisis (Gen. xxxiv. 25). Every Israelite was allowed to perform the rite, but no Gentile. Generally it was the office of the father (Gen. xvii. 23); only under certain circumstances it became that of the mother (Exod. iv. 25; 1 Macc. i. 60). Afterwards it became the business of the physician, and at present it is performed by a special officer. According to Gen. xvii. 10–14, circumcision was laid upon Abraham, his seed, and his servants, as a direct commandment from God; and the penalty of neglect was, to be cut off from the people. The Mosaic law speaks only incidentally of it as something already established. According to Lev. xii. 3, the eighth day after the birth of a boy was the term fixed for the performance of the rite. If the days were ill, the rite could be postponed, however. The old Egyptians performed it between the sixth and tenth year; the Mohammedans of our days often wait till the twelfth or thirteenth year. With the Israelites, the naming of the child takes place together with the circumcision (Luke i. 60, ii. 11; comp. Gen. xvii. 5).

Besides by the Israelites, circumcision was practised, not only by the Terachitian peoples, such as the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites (Jer. ix. 25, the interpretation of the passage is somewhat obscured, what does it mean?); but also by the Egyptians. Herodotus (2. 36, and 2. 104), and, after him, Diodorus and Strabo, even assert that the custom was original among the latter; while the Phoenicians and the "Syrians of Palestine" (the Jews) simply adopted it; a statement which Aristobulus among the Ituraeans (Joseph.: Ant., 13, 9, 1, and 13, 11, 3). That the Egyptians should have learnt the practice from the Israelites cannot be maintained, on account of the great age of the Egyptian monuments representing the custom. In Egypt, however, it seems that only the sacerdotal caste was compelled by law to observe the rite. Josephus, Clement of Alexandria, Orig., and others, indicate that such was the case: and Apion, the adversary of Josephus, was himself an uncircumcised Egyptian, and submitted to the operation only late in life, and for physical reasons. The probability is, that the Israelites adopted the custom from the Egyptians; but, as intimate connections existed between the two nations long before the time of Moses, it is unjustifiable, and in contradiction with the whole Hebrew tradition, to place the establishment of the institution of circumcision among the Israelites after the exodus, in the times of Moses or Joshua. After the captivity, the Edomites remained uncircumcised until John Hyrcanus compelled them to re-introduce the rite, as did Josephus and the Jews. The rite was even introduced to the Persians, Turks, Arabs, it was introduced to the Persians, Turks, among the Congo Negroes and Caffrarians in Africa, the Salivas Indians in South America, the inhabitants of Tahiti and the Fiji Islands, etc.

With respect to the symbolical signification of the rite, a distinction must be made between Israel and the heathen religions. Even if it could be proved, that, among the Egyptians, circumcision originated from the phallic-worship, this would have no bearing on the Israelite view of the rite. Nor can the rite be brought in connection with the idea of sacrifice (as a remnant of an ancient self-sacrifice, sacrifice of the body, castration in honor of the Deity, etc.); for sacrifice means the selection of something pure for the service of God, and not the destruction of something impure for the sake of God. But to the Israelite the foreskin was a token of human impiety and uncleanness, and circumcision was an act of purification and cleanliness. Other Oriental peoples considered the act from the exertions of the Judæa-Christians, it was dropped 39–163, giving full information of the pertinent

CIRCUMCISION. Feast of. See OCTAVE.
CISTERCIANS, a monastic order founded by Robert, at Citeaux near Dijon, in Burgundy, on the Day of St. Benedict, 1098. Robert, who at an early age had become Prior of the Monastery of St. Michel de Tonnerre, but felt unable to reform the loose and frivolous life of his monks, obtained dispensation from Pope Urban II., then travelling in France, and preaching the first crusade, to retire, at the head of a small colony of hermits, into the forest of Molesme, in the diocese of Langres, for the purpose of leading a life of austere asceticism. The colony prospered; but the reverence of the surrounding population, and the more substantial favors which followed in its wake, brought vanity and irregularities into the hermits' camp; and Molesme was soon as bad as St. Michel de Tonnerre. A second time Robert tried a change, and retired to Haur, a desert in the middle of the thirteenth century, to eighteen hundred. In 1119 the number of Cistercian abbeys had increased to thirteen; in 1151, to five hundred; in 1199, to fifteen hundred. In 1119 the constitution of the order, the Charta Caritatis, was issued by Abbot Stephan; and confirmed by Pope Calixtus II. One of the principal points of this constitution was the establishment of the order entirely independent of the episcopal power, and directly under the papal authority; and the co-operation between the order and the Pope was at times complete. Eugenius III. belonged to the order, and was a pupil of St. Bernard. Led by St. Bernard, and following the Pope, the order occupied one of the very first places in the Christian world. It crushed the heretics, Abelard, Arnold of Brescia, the Cathari, etc.; it preached the second crusade; it called into life the military orders of the Templars, of Calatrava, Alcántara, Montesa, Avis, and Christ. In 1148 the kingdom of Portugal declared itself a fief of the Abbey of Clairvaux; and in 1578 the abbey actually tried to make good its claims.

By the middle of the thirteenth century the order had passed its point of culmination.
lost its historical mission, which was inherited by the mendicant orders; and the internal decay of the rich and landed institution soon became apparent. One of the first attempts of reform was made by Martin de Vargas in Spain, supported by Pope Martin V. (1426); and in 1409 an independent Spanish congregation was formed on the basis of extreme asceticism. Similar attempts were made a little later in Tuscany, Calabria, and the Papal States. In France, its home, the order suffered very much during the wars with England; and all the attempts of reform which were made during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries failed. In the sixteenth and seventeenth century, independent congregations were formed; the first Cistercian nunnery was founded at Tart, probably by Abbot Stephen; but the most famous was that of Port Royal.

CITIES. Cities date from the days of Cain (Gen. iv. 17). In this article we consider only those of Palestine. The Hebrew word shows that originally they were walled, and thus were in contrast to the unwalled villages and the open country. In the walls were gates, over which were towers (2 Sam. xviii. 24 sq.). Immediately inside the gate was a wide open space, known as the “gate.” Here councils and public gatherings were held (Gen. xxxiii. 10, 18; Deut. xxi. 19 sq.; Ruth iv. 1, 11; Isa. xxix. 21 sq.). Here, too, one went to learn the news (1 Sam. iv. 18; Job xxix. 7). The gates were provided with posts and bars (Judg. xvi. 3; 1 Sam. xxii. 7; 1 Kings iv. 13). From the gate the streets led into the city; the streets, like those of modern Palestine, were probably narrow and unpaved, and distinctively business streets or bazaars; as the “Street of the Bakers” referred to in Jer. xxxvii. 21. The names of the Palestinian cities have almost altogether perished, however, to comply with certain of the most general laws of the land,—the sabbath, abstinence from blood, of the land,—the sabbath, abstinence from blood, etc. (Exod. xii. 14; Lev. xvi. 29, xviii. 6, etc.). Entire strangers had no rights in Israel: they were only tolerated. Originally, foreigners could, under certain restrictions, obtain citizenship in Israel: only Ammonites, Moabites, the offspring of prostitution, etc., were excluded. Egyptians and Edomites could be nationalized in the third generation (Deut. xxxii. 1; Neh. xiii. 1). Afterwards, however, with the growing fanaticism, it was at first required to exclude all foreigners from citizenship in Israel.

RUETSCH.

2. AMONG THE ROMANS. The Roman idea of citizenship—that of a privileged class amidst a world of slaves—had no existence among the Hebrews; for their commonwealth was a congregation, and their ruler was God; men governed merely as God’s vicegerents. But Roman citizenship is several times spoken of in the Acts as a valuable franchise. It was obtained by inheritance or purchase (Acts xii. 28), by military service, favor, or manumission. It conferred the right of trial before imprisonment, and of appeal unto Caesar (xxxv. 11). Its possessors could not be scourged (xvi. 37), much less crucified. Tradition, which puts the martyrdoms of Peter and Paul on the same day, respects Paul’s Roman citizenship, and makes him die by the sword.

CLAP, Thomas, a president of Yale College, b. at Scituate, Mass., June 26, 1703; d. in New Haven, Jan. 7, 1767. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1722, and was minister of Windham, Conn., 1729–38, and president of Yale College, 1739–66. He was one of the most learned men of his day in the country: eminent as a mathematician, he constructed the first orrery in America. His devotion to Yale College was very great. The Code of Laws (in Latin) which he drew up for its government was the first book of a代码 published in New England. Although, as he was universally acknowledged, a truly pious man, he opposed Whitefield, and against him wrote, A Brief History and Vindication of the Dogmatics revised and established in the Churches of New England, with a Specimen of the New Scheme of Religion beginning to prevail (1755). His opposition caused so much feeling, that in deference he resigned his office. His Annals or History of Yale College appeared in 1786.

CLARENDON, Constitutions of, is the name given to the laws made by the general council of English barons and prelates held at Clarendon, a royal summer residence near Salisbury, Wiltshire, and subscribed to by the bishops, with the exception of Becket, Jan. 25, 1164. They are a monument in the advancement of progress; because they checked the encroachments of the Church upon the State, put clerics guilty of crime under the civil tribunals, prevented all appeal to Rome, and made Henry II. the virtual head of the Church. See Becket, Jan. 25, 1164. The Constitutions are in sixteen chapters, of which ten were condemned by the Pope: the rest were tolerated.

CLARE, St., and the CLARISSES. Clara Sciffi, b. at Assisi, 1194, d. there Aug. 11, 1233, belonged to a distinguished family, but left her home in 1212 to follow St. Francis; practised, under his guidance, the severest asceticism: founded the order of the Nuns of St. Clare, or the Clarisses; and was canonized by Alexander IV. shortly after her death. The order received its original rule from St. Francis in 1224, enjoining absolute poverty, temporary silence, fasting, etc. This rule was mitigated in 1246 by Innocent IV., and again in 1264 by Urban IV., after whom those who adopted only the mildest form of the rule were called Urbanists. In the fifteenth century, however, the development took the very opposite direction. Colette of Corbie (d. 1447) founded the Congregation of St. Colette, whose members bound themselves to a strict observance of the Congregation of the Strictest Observance; and in 1567 Peter of Alcantara founded the Congregation of the Hermits of Alcantara, both of which went still farther in austere asceticism. See Act. Sacr., and Butler: Lives of Saints, Aug. 11; and the biographies of St. Clare, by Vitalis, Milan, 1646; Stockler, Vienna, 1675; Vauchot, Paris, 1782; Orsbach, Aix-la-Chapelle, 1844; Dr. More, Marseilles, 1848; and Locatelli, Naples, 1854.

CLARKE, Adam, the commentator, b. at Moybeg, north of Ireland, 1750 or 1762; d. of cholera, in London, Aug. 26, 1832. From 1782 to 1805 he travelled as a Methodist itinerant; preached over all Great Britain and Ireland. From 1805 to 1815 he held an appointment in London, his stay being prolonged by the special request of the British and Foreign Bible Society in order that he might continue to superintend the printing of their Arabic Bible. From 1815 till his death he devoted himself to literary work. In 1849 St. Andrew's University made him LL.D.

He was a most industrious student, and acquired much varied and profound learning, particularly in Oriental languages, and wrote many elaborate works, of which the principal are, A Bibliographical Dictionary, Liverpool, 1802, 8 vols.; The Geographical Miscellany, or Supplement to the Bibliographical Dictionary, London, 1806 (both works were published anonymously); Succession of Sacred Literature, vol. i., London, 1808 (vol. ii. by his son, 1830); and his widely circulated and still used Commentary on the Holy Bible, London, 8 vols., of which vol. i. appeared in 1810, vol. viii., 1826, and which cost him forty years of work. See Memoirs, edited by his son J. B. B. Clarke, London, 1859, 3 vols.; Everett: Adam Clarke Portrayed, London, 1843; 2d ed., 1866, 2 vols.

CLARKE, John, a founder of Rhode Island, b. in Bedfordshire, Eng., Oct. 8, 1609; d. in Newport, April 20, 1679. He joined Roger Williams's colony, and at Newport, 1644, founded the second Baptist church in America. He was, with Williams, in 1651 sent to England as an agent of the Colony, and published in 1652 the famous tractate, ill News from New England, or a Narrative of New England's Persecution (4to, 76 pp.).

CLARKE, Samuel, the English philosopher and divine, b. at Norwich, Oct. 11, 1675; d. in London, Saturday, May 17, 1729. He studied at Caius College, Cambridge, and greatly distinguished himself by publishing in 1697 a Latin version of Rohault's Physics, whose system was founded upon Cartesian principles, with notes derived from Sir Isaac Newton. Having chosen the clerical profession, he rose rapidly, until in 1709 he became rector of St. James's, Westminster, London. He was the author of numerous works, several of a scientific nature; but his fame chiefly rests upon his Boyle Lectures (1704–1705), printed together under the title, A Discourse concerning the Being and Attributes of God, etc.; and his Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity (1712), a work which exposed him to the charge of Arianism. Dr. Clarke's famous proof for the being of God was not meant to be a purely a priori argument: it starts from a fact,—"something has existed from eternity,"—and often directly appeals to facts. Among other propositions, maintained, is that time and space, eternity and immensity, are not substances, but the attributes of a self-existent being. And it is incorrect, although commonly said, that Clarke argued from the existence of time and space to the existence of Deity: rather, he presupposed the existence of an immutable, independent, and necessary being, before time and space. Nor could the opinion have been borrowed from the Scholium Generale of Newton's Principia, which was not printed till 1714.

Clarke's theory of virtue was briefly this. The inherent and necessary difference between things causes them to stand in different relations. These relations make it fit that both creature and creator should act in accordance with them, separately from any command of the Creator, or any foreseen advantage or disadvantage which may follow such actions. It is fit, however, that the Creator should enforce this fitness by his positive commands, and by rewards and punishments. Inasmuch as the original tendency of things to reward virtue, and to punish vice, has failed to be effectual in the present condition of human existence, there must be a future state of existence for men in order that this adjustment may be complete."

Clarke has been accused of confounding mathematical and moral relations, and of meaning by "fitness" merely the adaptation of means to an end. But the charges are not well founded. What is true is, that he states an analogy between mathematical and moral truths, and means by "fitness" accordance to a standard of judgment.

CLARKE, Samuel. Three lesser men of this name deserve mention. 1. Biographer and divine, b. at Woolston, Warwickshire, Oct. 10, 1689; d. at London, Dec. 25, 1683. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge; was minister of St. Bennet Fink, London, and ejected 1662. He was for eight years a governor, and for two years a president, of Sion College. He was also a member of the Savoy Conference. His biographical writings are valuable, because he drew upon sources now difficult to obtain. Among them are, A Mirror or Looking-Glass both for Saints and Sinners, London, 1646, 12mo; 2d ed., 1654, 8vo; 4th ed., 1671, 1672, 2 vols. fol.; The Marsow of Ecclesiastical History, 1650, 2 vols. 4to; 3d ed., 1675, 2 vols. fol.; A General Martyrology, 1651, fol.; same with Lives of Thirty-two English Divines, 1652, fol.; 3d ed., corrected and enlarged, 1677, fol.—2. Commentator, d. Feb. 24, 1700–1701, aged seventy-five. He was made M.A. at Oxford, 1648, and in 1658 returned to his Alma Mater, to be superior of the X. vol. of Portraiture of Quakerism, London, 1807. His principal writings are, Portraiture of Quakerism (1806), History of the Abolition of the Slave-Trade (1808, 2 vols.), and Memoirs of William Penn (1813). See Memoir of Thomas Clarkson, by Thomas Elmes and Thomas Taylor, 2d ed., London, 1847.

CLASS-MEETINGS, a distinctively Methodist arrangement, whereby the members of a congregation are divided into sections, over each of which is a leader, appointed by the pastor, whose duty it is "to see each person in his class once a week at least, in order to inquire how their souls prosper; to advise, reprove, comfort, or exhort, as occasion may require; to receive what they are willing to give towards the relief of the preachers, church, and poor; to meet the ministers and the stewards of the society once a week in order to inform the minister of any that are sick, or of any who walk disorderly and will not be reproved; to pay the stewards what they have received of their several classes in the week preceding." (Book of Discipline, pt. i. ch. ii. § 1.) Mr. Tyerman, in his Life of John Wesley (vol. i. pp. 377–379), thus relates the origin of class-meetings: On Feb. 15, 1742, some of the principal members of the Bristol (Methodist) Society met to consult how the debt upon their meeting-house was to be paid. One of them said, "Let every member of the society give a penny a week, till the debt is paid." Another answered, "Many of them are poor, and cannot afford to do it."—"Then," said the former, "put eleven of the poorest with me, and, if they can give anything, well: I will call on them weekly; and, if they can give nothing, I will give for them as well as for myself. And each of you call on eleven of your neighbors weekly, receive what they give, and make up what is wanting." "It was done," writes Wesley, "and in a little while the borders of these infirm told me they found such and such a one did not walk as he ought. It struck me immediately, 'This is the thing, the very thing, we have wanted so long.'" On March 25 Wesley introduced the plan in London. At first the leaders visited each member at his own house; but this was soon found to be inconvenient, and a common place of meeting appointed. The leader began and ended each meeting with singing and prayer, and spent about an hour in conversing with those present, one by one.

The class-meeting has been traced, in idea at least, in pre-existing religious societies; but it remains to-day a Methodist peculiarity.

CLAUDE, Jean, b. 1619 at La Sauvetat-du-Dropt, in the department of Lot-et-Garonne; d. in the Hague, Jan. 18, 1687; studied theology at Montauban; was ordained in 1645, and had charge of several minor congregations, till in 1654 he was made pastor in Nismes. Having defeated in the provincial syndow a scheme of the Parisians, he was banished; and being banished, could not live in France; he presented the union of the Protestant and Roman churches, he was forbidden to preach any more in the provines, and removed to Montauban. There, too, he was forbidden to preach (1665); and in the next year he was appointed minister at Charenton, near Paris, where he remained till the revocation of the Edict of Nantes drove him in exile. His controversies with Nicole, Réponse aux deux traités intitulés la perpetuité de la foi (1665), with Arnaud, Réponse au livre de M. Arnaud (1670), and with Bossuet, Réponse au livre de M. l'Evêque de Meaux (1683), attracted great attention; but his principal work is La défense de la réformation (1678). In his exile he wrote his Plaintes de Protestants; and after his death his son published five volumes, Œuvres posthumes and letters. His life was written by De La Devèze, Amsterdam, 1857.

CLAUDIANUS (Claudianus Mamertes, Claudianus Ecclesi Mammertus), d. 474; was a presbyter at Vienne, brother of the bishop of the diocese, and an intimate friend of Apollinaris Sidonius. His work De Statu Animae, which during the middle ages exercised considerable influence on the doctrine of the soul, is written as a refutation of Faustus, Bishop of Riez, who held that the soul, like every thing else created, was material. The work has been published in Maz. Bibl. Patr., VI., and with notes by Barth, on the whole treatment of the subject, was written of the passage in Suetonius, Claudius, 25: donius. His work De Statu Animae, which during his lifetime was considered the instigator of the persecution of the Christians on account of the teaching of Apollinaris (Apollinaris Ecdicius Mamertus), d. 474; was a presbyter at Vienne — still extant; the former having been published among Apollinaris's Lectures, IV. 2, the latter in Baluze: Miscellanea, VI. p. 535. The hymn, Pange, lingua gloriosi, is generally ascribed to him. It has been published among Apollinaris's Lectures, IV. 2, the latter in Baluze: Miscellanea, VI. p. 535. The hymn, Pange, lingua gloriosi, is generally ascribed to him. It has been published among Apollinaris's Lectures, IV. 2, the latter in Baluze: Miscellanea, VI. p. 535.

CLAUDIUS, Roman emperor (41–54), is still by some historians considered the instigator of the first persecution of the Christians on account of the passage in Suetonius, Claudius, 25: "Judaeos, impulsore Chresto, assidue tumultuabatur," and to which there is a reply from the emperor in the form of an edict, edictum universitatis. Theodoric wrote directly to Claudius, to warn him against heresy; and then Claudius wrote the elaborate Apogeticum atque Rescriptum adversus Theutmirum Abbatem, his principal work. The book was condemned by an assembly of the court-clergy of Lewis the Pious, and vehemently attacked by Dungal, a Scotchman whom Charlemagne had appointed teacher at Pavia, and by Jonas, Bishop of Orleans. Nevertheless, Claudius continued his activity in Turin unimpeded, till his death; but his book, the chief source to an understanding of his views, has disappeared. In 1461 there existed a copy of it in the Monastery of Bobbia; but, since the incorporation of the library of Bobbia with the Bibliotheca Ambrosiana, the Apogeticum has never been seen. Of Claudius's other works (commentaries on the Bible), the most still remain unprinted. See Ruelle: Claud. Turin., etc., Copenhagen, 1824; H. Rüter: Geschichte d. relig. Aufklärung im Mittelalter, I. pp. 16–24.

CLAUDIUS, Matthias, b. at Rheinfeld, near Lübeck, Aug. 15, 1740; d. in Hamburg, Jan. 21, 1815; studied law at Jena, and spent most of his life at Wandsbeck, partly as reviser of the Bank of Schleswig-Holstein in Altona, partly as a private citizen. His writings consist of poems and articles published under the signature of Amor in the Wandsbecker Bote and other periodicals. Of these writings he made the first collection in 1765, the last (in 8 vols.) in 1812: of the latter, the ninth edition appeared in 1871. He was not a theologian. His articles are not sermons or devotional tracts. None of his poems are used in the churches. He exercised, nevertheless, a great influence on the religious life of his country by his strong, primitive, and sympathetic Christian feeling, expressed in an easy and individual manner, in which humor and irony are singularly blended with warm and even passionate earnestness. The tendency of his writings points directly against the rationalism of his time, though he did not forget to condemn the barren and pedantic orthodoxy.

Lit. — His life has been written by Herbst, Gothia, 1857, 3d ed., 1863; Mönckeberg, Hamb., 1870; Rüdlich: Die poetischen Beiträge zum Wandsbecker Bote, Hamb., 1871. Hagenbach.
CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, as a distinction between animals, existed apparently from the earliest times (Gen. vii. 2). Only those animals which divide the hoof, and chew the cud, were regarded as clean (Lev. xi. 3-4). The distinction was primarily related to sacrifice, but in the Mosaic law was extended to food (Lev. xi. Deut. xiv.); and indeed some of the articles pronounced unclean are really unwholesome. The underlying idea, however, was the education of a people distinguished from all the world by peculiar modes of life. The Jews keep up the distinction to this day, and have their own butchers. So ingrained was the idea, that it required a miracle to convince Peter that he might eat with Gentiles who did not observe this law of food (Acts x. 9-10). See also Apostolic Council.

CLÉMANGES, Nicolas de, b. in the village of Clémanges, in Champagne, 1360; was educated in the Collège de Navarre, in Paris; studied theology under Pierre d'Ailly and Gerson; began himself to lecture in 1391; and was in 1393 chosen rector of the university. In the ecclesiastical history of that period the University of Paris played a very prominent part, standing at the head of the party of reform, and exerting itself to restore order and unity to the Church; and many of the remarkable memoirs, addresses, and letters which it issued to kings and popes, were penned by Clémanges; thus, for instance, the memoir addressed in 1393 to Charles VI., to induce him to put an end to the papal schism, and the memorial of the following year, proposing, as the only means of ending the schism, the abdication of the popes, or a court of arbitration, or an ecumenical council, etc. When Clement VII. died at Avignon, both the French court and the University of Paris tried to prevent the election of a new pope, until the cardinals came to an understanding with their colleagues in Rome, and with Boniface IX. Nevertheless, Benedict XIII. was elected Sept. 28, 1344; and the following year Clémanges went to Avignon as his secretary. But in 1348 France withdrew from the obedience of Benedict; and in 1407 Benedict laid the kingdom and the country under a blessing, and made his residence at Valprofonds, afterwards at Fontaine-du-Bosc. His benefice of Langres he exchanged for another at Bayeux, and after the lapse of some years he once more emerged into public life. In 1421 he defended the liberties of the Gallican Church in a public disputation at Chartres: in 1425 he again took up his lectures in the Collège de Navarre. The date of his death is unknown.

During his stay in Valprofonds and Fontaine-du-Bosc, Clémanges wrote, besides a number of exceedingly interesting letters, De Fructu Rerum Adversarum, De Novis Festinatibus, etc.; De Studio Theologico (of special interest for the encyclopaedia of theology), Dissertatio de Cerchio Georità, Prétoria ut Crître manu, Principes, De Lapsu et Reparatione justitiae, etc.; and these works show that he went through a remarkable development. Always on the side of reform and liberty, he came farther and farther away from the idea of the papal authority; and his studies of the Bible brought him nearer to the great principles of the Reformation than his teachers d'Ailly and Gerson ever reached. Above all the Pope he placed the ecumenical council; but above the ecumenical council he placed the Bible; and the idea of the invisible Church, to which all the paraphernalia of an established Church may be a mere scandal, began to dawn upon him. A collected edition of his works was published by Joh. Lydus, Leyden, 1613, in 2 vols. 4to; but much of what he has written still remains in manuscript, and some of his treatises seem to have been suppressed. His life was written by Adolphe Müntz, Nicolas Clémanges, sa vie et ses écrits, Strassburg, 1846.

The two works De Ruina Ecclesiae, or De Corrupto Ecclesiæ Status, and Apostoli (i.e., littere et missoriae) et Responsio per Nationem Gallicanam Dominis Cardinalibus Appellantibus, etc., generally ascribed to him are, as Adolph Müntz has shown, not by him.

CLEMENT ROMANUS, one of the most celebrated names of Christian antiquity, but so overgrown with myths, that it has become next to impossible to lay bare the historical facts which it represents, occurs in all lists of the first Roman bishops, but not always in the same place. Thus Irenæus (Har., III. 3, 3) puts it in the third place from Peter (Petrus, Linus, Anencletus, Clemens); and so do Eusebius (both in his Church History, III. 13, 15, and in his Chronicle), Epiphanius (Har., XXVII. 8), and Jerome (De Vir. Ill., 15); only that, with the two last mentioned, the name of the second bishop after Peter is Cletus, and not Anencletus. But another succession meets us in the Chronicle of Hippolyte, in which Clement is placed before Cletus,—Petrus, Linus, Clemens, Cletus; and this succession was adopted by the Liberian Catalogue, by Augustine, Optimas, and others, as also by the Apostolical Constitutions; while at the same time the double tradition made two different persons out of the two names of Anencletus; and this was confirmed by the Liberian and Clementine Catalogues, with the following list,—Petrus, Linus, Clemens, Cletus, Anencletus. The Leonian Catalogue, however, returns once more to the old succession, according to which Clement occupies the third place after Peter; and thus the second bishop after Peter is Cletus, which is merely a combination of the Liberian and Leonian Catalogues, arriving at the following succession,—Petrus, Linus, Cletus, Clemens, Anencletus. The pseudo-Tertullian Carmen adu. Marcionem finally places both Cletus and Anencletus before Clement; while the epithet said to have been written by Clement to the apostle James narrates that Peter himself appointed Clement his successor; but the former found no advocates at all, and the latter only one,—the author of the pseudo-Clementine romance. See Lipsius: Chronologie der römischen Bischöfe, Kiel, 1869. There is, indeed, no reason to abandon the oldest tradition of the Church, according to which, Clement was the third bishop of Rome after Peter; only it must be remembered that he was not a bishop in that sense of the word which the monarchical tendency of a later period developed. He was simply one of the most prominent presbyters of the Roman Church, according to which, Clement was the third bishop of Rome after Peter; only it must be remembered that he was not a bishop in that sense of the word which the monarchical tendency of a later period developed. He was simply one of the most prominent presbyters of the Roman Church.

So much for the time in which he lived. With respect to the identity of his person, Irenæus (l.c.) makes him a pupil of an apostle: and Origen (In Joann. I. 28), Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., III. 15), Epiphanius (Hist. Rap., II. XXVII. 6), and Jerome (De Vir. Ill., 15) identify him with the Clement mentioned by Paul (Phil. iv. 3), making him a special pupil of Paul. This supposition Chrysostom carries still further (Comm. in 1 Tim.), speaking of Clement as the steady companion of Paul on all his travels; while the Clementine literature, in harmony with its Judeo-Christian character, brings him in the closest connection with Peter, and makes him his most intimate pupil. These two traditions have been combined in many various ways, all more or less artificial. But though the identity of Clement of Rome and Clement mentioned by Paul still finds its defenders (see Wocher: Die Briefe des Clemens und Polycarp, Tübingen, 1830), it has been given up by most theologians, and with good reason; as Irenæus, if he had known anything about this identity, would hardly have neglected to speak of it. The Clement mentioned by Paul was, no doubt, a Philippien. Still more intricate is the question, whether the report of the Clementine literature, that Clement was a relative of the imperial family, but not that the consul Flavius Clemens (who was sentenced to death by Domitian on account of Atheism, the common Pagan designation of Christianity) belonged to the Christian congregation, we have, then, at the same time, two prominent Christians in Rome of the same name, — the one consul and martyr, the other bishop or presbyter; and the question arises, were there originally only one person, afterwards split into two by a confusion of the tradition, or were there originally two, afterwards merged into one by the Clementine literature? On this point modern opinions deviate very much: and the question can, perhaps, never be fully answered. But it must be remembered, first, that the Christianity of Flavian Clemens is a mere assumption; next, that the martyrdom of Clemens Romanus is equally doubtful. The catacombs prove that Christianity penetrated into the Flavian family, but not that the consul Flavius Clemens was a Christian; and the report of Dio, or rather of his epitomizer Xiphilinus, is in many of its details so palpably erroneous, that it becomes unreliable as a whole. And how could the Roman congregation forget, in the course of only one century and a half, that one of its first bishops had been a consul, that the first martyr among its bishops had been a member of the imperial family? But Irenæus (l.c.) mentions Telephorus as the first martyr among the Roman bishops; and Eusebius, in the same connection well, tells Jerome (De Vir. Ill., 15), that says that Clement died a natural death in the third year of the reign of Trajan. This leads us to the conclusion that the consul and the bishop, Flavius Clemens and Clemens Romanus, were two different persons; which necessitates the admission that we know nothing of the personal life of Clemens Romanus but its approximate date and the position he occupied in the congregation.

Of the numerous writings which bear the name of Clement, most are evidentially spurious, as, for instance, the Apostolical Constitutions, and the whole group comprised under the name of the Clementines; which articles see. Nor are the two Epistles on Virginity worth a long debate. They were first published by Wetstein as an appendix to his New Testament (1729), and afterwards by Villecourt, in Migne, Patrol. Græc., I., and by J. Ph. Beelen, Louvain, 1856. But the views of asceticism which they propound, and the state of ecclesiastical development to which they refer, show that they belong to a much later period. Jerome knew them (Ad Janov. Ep. 12), perhaps also Epiphanius (Hær., XXX. 15). The two Epistles to the Corinthians, on the contrary, especially the first, among the most important documents of Christian antiquity still extant. In the Ancient Church, and in many places where they were read at divine service. Nevertheless, after the fifth century they disappeared from the Western Church, and remained completely unknown until Junius rediscovered them in the celebrated Cod. Alex., a present from Cyrillicus Lecaris to King Charles I., and published them at Oxford (1633). Up to 1857 this manuscript remained the only one known; and all editions before that year — by Wotton, Cambridge, 1718; Jacobson, Oxford, 1838; Maddox (photographic facsimile), London, 1856; Tischendorf, Leipzig, 1857; Lightfoot, London, 1869, to which an Appendix was added in 1877; Hilgenfeld, Leipzig, 1886; Laurent, Leipzig, 1870; and finally by Gebhardt and Harnack, in Dressel: Pat. Apost., Leipzig, 1875 — were taken from it alone. But in 1873 Bryennios, metropolitan of Serræ, gave an edition from a newly-discovered manuscript in the Library of the Holy Sepulchre at Farnari, in Constantinople; and in this new edition, not only were the many gaps of the Cod. Alex. filled, but also the second epistle, of which hitherto only a fragment had been known, appeared in full. Editions based upon a comparison between the two manuscripts have been given by Gebhardt and Harnack, and by Hilgenfeld, Leipzig, 1876. [The Appendix of Lightfoot gives a good English translation of both epistles.] R. L. Usely found in June, 1876, a Syriac translation of the two epistles in a manuscript purchased for the University of Cambridge at the sale, in Paris, of Julius Mohl's library. The First Epistle is an official missive from the Roman congregation to the Corinthian, occasioned by some dissensions which had arisen in the latter. As it is written in the name of the whole congregation, it bears no author's name; but ancient witnesses mention Clement as the author. Dionysius, Bishop of Corinth, in a letter addressed to Bishop Soter of Rome, about 170, speaks of the epistle as being from Clement, and adds that it was always read aloud in his congregation (Euseb.: Hist. Eccl., IV. 23). Clemens Alexanderinus also holds it in great esteem, quotes often from it, and designates its author as an apostle.
As so very little is known of Clement, the question of the genuineness of the epistle becomes a question of the date of its authorship. Formerly the opinion was generally prevailing, and is still held by Hefele ("Prolegomena," p. 296) and Wieseler ("Eine Untersuchung über den Hebärbrief," Kiel, 1861), that it was written between 64 and 68. A closer examination, however, seems to lead to the last decade of the first century, between 93 and 97. On the one side, not only Peter and Paul, but also the apostles of the chief churches in the East, such as Antioch and Alexandria, have, for this very reason, been appointed by the apostles themselves; and there are members living who have been contemporaries of the apostles.

The Second Epistle is not an epistle at all, but a homily; and, as it is the oldest existing sermon, it is, of course, of great interest. Where, at what time, and by whom, it was written, are questions of great difficulty; and, of the many hypotheses which have been offered as answers, none has proved fully satisfactory. It seems most probable that it originated in Rome, and between 130 and 140; but how it came to be connected with the Epistle to the Corinthians by Clement as a second epistle must for the present be left unexplained. For Lit. see editions mentioned above.

CLEMENT, Titus Flavius, was one of the most celebrated teachers of the Church of Alexandria. The date of his birth falls near the middle of the second century; but all the data have disappeared, and the state of the congregational life seems to indicate that some time has elapsed since that event. On the other hand, there are presbyters in office who have been appointed by the apostles themselves; and there are members living who have been contemporaries of the apostles.

The writings of Clement are rich in brilliant thoughts, often most strikingly expressed; and to a certain extent he has succeeded in permeating the whole mass of thoughts with certain grand fundamental ideas. But his talent is not systematic. Even when he most sincerely tries to systematize, much remains loose, and only mechanically tied together. The elements which he proposes to harmonize are the Greek philosophy, Pagan mysticism and Christianity, an independent reason, and an authority based on tradition. But though he never succeeds in fully defining the office of reason on the field of authority, or in fully separating that of Pagan thought which Christianity can assimilate from that to which it must reject, he is, nevertheless, exceedingly suggestive, and often eminently striking.

CLEMENT is the name of fourteen popes. — Clement I. (see Clemens Romanus.) — Clement II. (Dec. 24, 1049–Oct. 9, 1047). After the abdication of Gregory VI., Henry II., at the head of a formidable army, stood as the master of Rome and the Church; and the people and the clergy conceded to him the right of the first — and, according to the interpretation of Petrus Damiani, also the decisive — vote at the papal election. On Dec. 24 he presented Bishop Suider of Bamberg to the synod assembled in the Church of St. Peter, and seated him on the papal throne, the first German pope; and the next day Suider, who assumed the name Clement II., crowned King Henry and his wife. See Jaffé: "Regesta," and Watterich: "Pontif. Roman. Vite. I. — Clement III. (Dec. 19, 1187–March 25, 1191), a Roman by birth; ascended the papal throne just as the report of the fall of Jerusalem and the entrance of Saladin (Oct. 3, 1187) spread horror and dismay throughout all Europe. He espoused the cause with great fervor, and succeeded in rousing a general enthusiasm. Letters were sent to all the kings and princes; daily prayers were ordered for the rescue of the Holy Land; the Truce of God was preached in all countries; indulgences, dispensations, absolutions, were freely distributed; and the summons to the third crusade was accepted by the nations with nearly as much enthusiasm as that to the first. Venice and Hungary made peace with each other; the Emperor took the cross; even France and England were reconciled, and joined in the undertaking. The pitiful end, however, of this grand beginning, Clement was spared from seeing. With King William of Scotland he came into a sharp conflict. The see of St. Andrew became vacant. The chapter chose one bishop; but the Pope threatened with interdict, and the king yielded. As a reward for this concession, the Pope placed Scotland immediately under the papal authority by a bull of March 13, 1188, thus exempting it from the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of York, who had hitherto acted as papal legate for Scotland. On Nov. 18, 1189, William II. of Sicily died. The Pope, who claimed the kingdom as a fief, invested Tancred with the country; but Henry VI., son of Frederic Barbarossa, protested as the next heir, and was marching against Robert, when the latter died. The see of Puy in 1256, Archbishop of Narbonne in 1259, and cardinal in 1262. He was on a journey to England as papal legate, when he heard of his own death, and had two daughters, but was, by sorrow over the loss of his wife, led to enter the Church, and was made Bishop of Puy in 1256, Archbishop of Narbonne in 1259, and cardinal in 1262. son of Giuliano de Medici; entered the military order of St. John; was Prior of Capua, and carried the colors of the order at the coronation of his cousin Leo X., but was legitimized the very next day, made Archbishop of Florence, and soon after cardinal. After the death of Adrian VI. he ascended the papal throne by a shrewd compromise with his antagonist, Cardinal Colonna. But the great business capacity with which he had shown under his two predecessors proved altogether insufficient for his new position; and his policy brought not only him, but the Papacy itself, into the greatest dangers. Afraid of the growing influence of Charles V. in the Italian Peninsula, Clement entered into an alliance with Francis I.; but May 6, 1526, Rome was stormed and sacked; the Pope had to ransom his own person for four hundred thousand scudi; and the Medici were expelled from Florence. This war between the Pope and the emperor proved a great opportunity for the German Reformation, and the Protestants utilized it. The diet of Spires established religious liberty in Germany, and placed the Protestant churches on equal terms with the Roman. The Pope now hoped to crush the Reformation by the aid of the Emperor; but Charles V. found that a general council was altogether insufficient for his new position; and Clement VII. was afraid of such a measure, on account of his illegitimate birth, the manner in which he had obtained the tiara, etc. Once more he sought the support of France; and his niece, Catherine de Medici, was married to Henry of Orleans, the second son of Francis I. Meanwhile, Protestantism spread rapidly both in Germany and France; and when the Pope (in 1531) decided against Henry VIII. in the divorce case, the king immediately threw off all allegiance to the Papal see. See ZIRULIK: *Hist. Clementis VII., in SCHELKORN: Amenti. Hist. Eccl. et Lit.; Ross: Memorie Istoriche di Clemente VII., Rome, 1887. There was an Antipope of the same name (see URBAN VI.). — Clement VIII. (Jan. 30, 1592–March 5, 1605), Cardinal Ippolito Aldobrandini, descending to Xi. noble Florentine family, undertook the difficult task to rescue the curia from the overwhelming influence of Spain, and finally succeeded in fulfilling it. The manner in which he dealt with Henry IV. of France is very characteristic of his policy in general. The conversion of the king (July 25, 1593) was not a sufficient guaranty. The abdication did not follow until Paris and the greater part of France had accepted the king (Dec. 17, 1555). The king then recalled the Jesuits; and the Pope kept silent on occasion of the Edict of Nantes. By the aid of Henry IV. Clement VIII. was able to retain Ferrara as a papal fief when the House of Este became extinct; and thus gradually the French influence grew until it was a match for the Spanish. The same method the Pope employed in the great dogmatical controversy between the Jesuits and the Dominicans, which he smoothed down without risking the estrangement of either of the two great orders by a definite decision. See Wadding: *Vita Clementis VIII., Rome, 1728. There was also an Antipope of the same name on Dec. 1, 1764. On Jan. 7, 1765, the Pope issued the bull Apostolicum Pascendi Munus, in which he spoke of the order as a useful and holy institu-Jesuits, agreed upon Cardinal Ganganelli (b. at sea seemed possible but the destruction of the political power of the Papacy, when Clement suddenly died. See Theiner: Geschicht e. Pontif. Cl. formiarium of Jan. 30, 1768 (Aliudad Apostolatus), the Pope undertook to annul those measures. The duke answered by expelling the Jesuits; and the Pope actually began to prepare for war. But at this moment French troops occupied Avignon and Venaissin; Sicilian troops, Benevent and Ponte Coroa; and no other issue seemed possible but the destruction of the political power of the Papacy, which assembled after the death of Clement XIII. lasted for three months; and only after a hundred and eighty-five scrutiny, the two parties, the friends and the adversaries of the Jesuits, agreed upon Cardinal Ganganelli (b. at Arcangelo in the Papal States), the son of a poor physician. He was agreed upon because he was considered the most insignificant; but he succeeded, nevertheless, in steering safely through the dangers of the moment. He became reconciled to all the estranged powers, even Portugal and Parma, without losing anything of his dignity; and, while journeying, Clement narrates the romantic incidents of his life,—how his father and mother are lost; brethren have mysteriously disappeared. It now turns out that his two companions, Niceta and Aquila, are his two lost brethren. His father and mother are also found; and Simon Magus is finally overtaken, and completely crushed in a dispute lasting four days. This romantic narrative, however, is used only as the framework around a doctrinal development. The doctrine is the chief interest of the book, and may generally be characterized as speculative Ebionitism, though it is not perfectly homogeneous. Sometimes God is represented decidedly pantheistically, as the One, the All, the world's Heart, which makes the whole stream of life pulsate, etc. At other times he is represented as a person, the Creator, the Judge, etc., but with the strongest anthropomorphisms known to Judaism. These two tendencies the author never succeeds in fully blending. Of the Recognitions, the Greek original is lost. We have the work only in a Latin translation by Rufinus; but of this translation the manuscripts are quite numerous, bearing various titles, generally dramatic terms referring to the meeting between Clement and his brethren. This work was published before the Homilies, first by Sichardus (Basel, 1536 and 1538), then by Lambertus Gruterus Venradius (Cologne, 1568 and 1570). The best edition is that by Gersdorf, in Bibl. Patr. Lat., Leipzig, 1838, vol. I. [There is an English translation by T. Smith in the Ante-Nicene Library, vol. III., Edinburgh, 1867.] The difference between the Recognitions and the Homilies is comparatively small in the narrative part of the works, but very striking in the doctrinal. In the Recognitions the ideas and views are all through the work weakened and modified so as to suit a catholic reader. The Epitome, first edited by Turnebus (Paris, 1555), then by Cotelerius, is an uninteresting extract from the Homilies, to which are added extracts from the letter of Clement to James, from the Martirium of Clement by Eusebius, etc. Dressel's edition, after a newly-discovered codex, and containing a second Epitome, has no great interest; nor has the Syriac translation, edited by De Lagarde, Leipzig, 1861.

The doctrinal labor with the Clementine Literatute was begun by Neander, who, in the appendix to his Genetische Entwicklung der gnostischen Systeme, Berlin, 1818, gave a representation of the doctrinal view of the Homilies; and it was continued by F. C. Baur, who, for his conception of the ancient Church, drew a considerable amount of evidential matter from this group of writings. Baur laid at first the emphasis on the Ebionitic elements (De Ebionitarum Origine, Tübingen, 1831; Die Christenpartei in der korinthischen Gemeinde, Tübingen, 1831), but seemed afterwards inclined to ascribe more importance to the Gnostic elements (Die christliche Gnosis, Tübingen, 1835: Über den Episkopat in der christlichen Kirche, 1838). In opposition to Baur, Schleiermacher wrote his Die Clementinen nebst den verwandten Schriften und der Ebionitismus (Hamburg, 1844), a book as careful in the collection of materials as acute in the investigation of details; and this work in connection with Schweger's Nach-apostolisches Zeitalter (see I. 364 sq.), formed the transition from a purely doctrinal to a purely literary treatment. The turning-point was Hilgenfeld's Die Clementinischen Rekognitionen und Homilien, Jena, 1848. Not the doctrinal views and their systematical elaboration, but the historical origin and literary character of this group of writings, were to him the points in question; and he attempted to show that the Recognitions formed the basis for the Homilies, and were themselves based on a still older tract, of Roman origin and Judeo-Christian character,—the true Kerygma Patri, of which he found an actual remnant in I. 27–72, and a general outline in III. 75. Against Hilgenfeld, Uhlhorn attempted to show, in his Die Homilien und Rekognitionen des Clemens Romanus (Göttingen, 1854), that the author of the Recognitions had the Homilies lying before him when he wrote, and that the true nucleus from which the whole literature developed was to be found, not in Recogn., I. 27–72, but in Hom., XVI.–XIX. The one-sidedness of these two works was eliminated by Lehmann, who, in his Die Clementinischen Schriften (Gotha 1859), begins by dissolving the Recognitions into two different parts, by two different authors,—I.–III. and IV.–X.—and then penetrates deeper into the construction of the two works until he arrives at the root, the Kerygma. Still farther has this method been carried by Lipsius, in his Die Quellen der römischen Petrusage (Kiel, 1872), who finds the basis of the whole Clementine literature in the Acta Petri with their strongly-marked anti-Pauline tendency. The evidence which can be offered for this last supposition may be deemed insufficient; but the general results of the whole course of investigation are irrefragable. The Homilies, the Recognitions, and the Epitome are three independent elaborations, perhaps at first hand, perhaps at second or third, of some older tract not now extant.

CLERICUS (Jean le Clerc), b. at Geneva, March 19, 1637; d. at Amsterdam, Jan. 8, 1736; studied theology and philosophy in Geneva, Grenoble, Saumur, Paris, and London; was, by the reading of the works of Curcelius and Episcopius, drawn over to divine things, and became professor of philosophy and belles-lettres at Amsterdam, and, after the death of Limborch, professor of church history. Of his numerous works, his commentaries on the Old Testament, and his Harmonia Evangelica, are still valuable. See Nicéon: Memoires, Tom. XI. p. 294.

CLERGY, Benefit of, a mediæval custom by which accused persons who could read Latin could claim the privilege of being tried in the bishop's court. Originally such "clerks" were really ecclesiastics; but laymen who had the knowledge claimed the privilege, to the great impediment, and, in many cases, the actual mockery, of justice. The struggle between the civil and ecclesiastical authorities over this point resulted in the common law courts abandoning the extreme punishment of death assigned to some offences, when the person convicted was a "clerk" in holy orders; but a secondary punishment was inflicted. For more atroces of this exemption was not allowed: consequently offences were divided into clergyable and unclergyable. This exemption ultimately brought out the reformation of the entire criminal law. It became the practice for every criminal to claim, and to be allowed, the benefit of clergy; so that, when a crime was made capital, the statute declared that its action was without "benefit of clergy." The "benefit of clergy" in cases of felony was abolished in England in 1827. See Blackstone's Commentaries, iv. 28.

CLERGY, Biblical. It may be considered settled that there is no order of clergy, in the modern sense of the term, in the New Testament; i.e., there is no class of men mentioned whom spiritual functions exclusively belonged. Every believer is a priest unto God. Every believer has as much right as anybody else to pray, to preach, to baptize, to administer communion (Rom. v. 2; Eph. ii. 19–22, iii. 12; 1 Pet. ii. 9; 1 John ii. 12; Rev. i. 6, v. 10, etc.). Believers constitute the body of Christ (Eph. i. 22, 23; cf. Col. i. 18, ii. 19), and therefore have all things (1 Cor. iii. 21–23). The so-called "power of the keys" is theirs, for it is surely true, that whatever the Christian Church does (whether to be right or false) is bound in heaven, i.e., has also the divine condemnation, and what it loses (declares to be right or true) is loosed in heaven. But it does not follow that therefore the clergy are superfluous. Experience has shown that certain persons, are by natural endowment better fitted for spiritual functions than others, and also, that, in the Christian communities, there will be leaders to whom will gravitate the major part of the work. The clerical order took its rise, therefore, in the very necessity of the case. Decency, order, and efficiency demanded that certain persons should make it their business to conduct the services, and have the oversight, of the congregations. Without such a class, the very freedom of the gospel would be defeated. If everybody discharged the spiritual functions of which they were capable, then confusion and anarchy would result. In the sense that "order is Heaven's first law," and that progress is the object of public service, the spiritual may be said to be of divine origin.

But who selects and installs the stewards of the gospel Church were the disciples; and they were chosen by the Lord, and sent out with a direct personal commission; yet the baptism of the Spirit on Pentecost fell not upon them exclusively, but the whole body of believers (Acts ix. 17; x. 46; xii. 15, i. 11). The apostles founded the Church on earth (1 Cor. iii. 10; Eph. ii. 20; Rev. xxi. 14): consequently they cannot have successors. The foundation does not need relaying. When persecution arose, the scattered Church did not require special commissions to spread the gospel. It was more difficult to conceal than to sell the glad tidings. Thus the Church grew, and extended to localities where neither commissioned apostle nor evangelist had ever gone. The model upon which these congregations organized themselves was the Jewish synagogue. It is nowhere said that the apostles founded the office of elders or bishops, much less that they endowed it with their own plenary power. In the Jewish-Christian congregations the arrangement grew up naturally. In the heathen-Christian the example of their brethren would be decisive. We read of elders in the Jerusalem Church in very early days (Acts xi. 30, xcv. 3 sq.), and of the ordination of elders by the apostles or their pupils (Acts xiv. 23; Tit. i. 5). But in every case the congregation existed before such ordinations; and the only effect they had was to organize the congregations upon a firmer basis, and fit them better for effective work. The offices thus filled were indeed for the benefit of the Church (1 Cor. xiv. 33, 40). They were, in a sense, necessary for the Church's existence; but they are not to be put on a par with the sacraments as the ordinances of Christ. In the beginning of the Church the numerous necessary services were performed by the members in common, according to each one's natural ability and supernatural endowment (1 Cor. xi. 3-13, 27-30). The elders or bishops were merely the leaders and guides. That they were ordained by the laying-on of hands and prayer was in imitation of Old-Testament models. The conclusion of the whole matter is, the office in the Church is dependent on the means of grace, and not the means of grace on the office. The office is only necessary to the orderly progress of the Church. But the means of grace gain not a whit of efficacy from their administrator. Baptism, the Lord's Supper, preaching, and prayer, like singing, and like reading of notices, — may be performed by laymen with precisely the same spiritual effect as if the highest or the most godly minister in the land had been the administrator. The source of all power is God. If he see fit, he can make the lowest woman mightier than the pulling-down of strongholds than the whole clergy combined. If God withhold his blessing, the whole clergy are powerless to lift a finger for Christ. BURGER.

Archaeological and Historical. 1. Meaning of the Word. — The word "clergy" is derived from εκκλησία ("lot"), because the whole body of believers were the "lot," or inheritance, of the Lord (1 Pet. v. 3). The derivation from the choice of Matthias (Acts i. 26) is inaccurate; because, as a matter of fact, the clergy were not chosen by lot.

2. The Clerical Orders. — Although, in the New Testament, there is no clergy in the modern sense of the word, there had five hundred clerics, one thousand deacons, forty deaconesses, ninety-subdeacons, one hundred and twenty-five chanters, one hundred door-keepers, and a guild of eleven hundred grave-diggers. The Bishop of Alexandria was faithfully and fanatically served by their parabolani (see title) to the number of six hundred. The Bishop of Carthage had five hundred clerics under his authority. The various provincial synods met twice a year for the free discussion of their affairs. The position of bishop depended, of course, upon the size of their city or diocese; but in any case they enjoyed great influence, and received much respect. The laity, and even the emperor, bowed the head to the bishop, and kissed his hand. The terms used in speaking of him were very honoring, not to say adulatory: indeed, some epithets were profane. Thus he was styled “God-beloved,” “Most Holy,” “Holy Lord,” and “Most Blessed Pope.” His seat in his cathedral was called his throne; his vestments were very rich; his praises were sung, although the latter practice was infrequent.

Of the regulations respecting the clergy, contained in the Justinian Code, and which have been enumerated above, few now remain in force. The difference in their present condition in England has been thus concisely put: “Their judicial privileges and immunities exist no longer, except so far as the coercive power of a bishop’s court be regarded as a shadow of them. Their pecuniary privileges and immunities exist no longer; for the grant made in some countries to the clergy from the national exchequer is rather a substitute for estates confiscated than a free grant of love. Their official privileges and immunities exist no longer, unless the permission conceded to bishops to take part in national legislation, and the exemption of the clergy from having to serve in the army or on juries, be regarded as the equivalents of the honors and immunities bestowed by the Caesars with so ungrudging a hand.” It is the American idea very widely to separate Church and State; and no one who reads history with open eyes has aught but regret that the State ever undertook to coddle the Church, or the Church to rule the State. The State transcends her sphere when she attempts to regulate the Church.

5. Those Eligible to Orders.—So long as the Church was oppressed, comparatively few unworthy persons desired her offices; but, when she became the object of the liberality and care of the State, worldly men pressed into her service. Hence regulation was necessary. It was decreed that no more persons should be ordained than were needed for the service of each church. Among those ineligible to orders were soldiers, slaves, comedians, tax-gatherers, those who had been married twice, persons of a mean and servile occupation, those who had performed public penance, homicides, adulterers, lapsed, usurers, mutilated or self-crippled, clinics (see Baptism), and those once insane. See Bingham: Orig. Eccl. lib. 4.

6. Clerical Houses.—It was very common in early times for the clergy to live together, and have all things common. Leo IX. (1048-54) ordered that cloisters should be established in connection with the churches for this purpose. The power of the clergy was probably at its height in the eleventh century, when they absorbed all the learning of the time, and their houses were places of refuge. But their influence was never greater than in the seventeenth century, when, according to Von Ranke, “they sat in the councils of kings, and were given political affairs from the pulpit in the presence of the whole people. They directed schools, controlled the efforts of learning, and governed the whole range of literature.” Hist. of the Popes (bk. vi. Intro.)

Clerk is derived from the Latin clericus, and was originally the name given to those in holy orders, and is still the legal name of clergymen of the Church of England. But afterwards it acquired a secondary meaning,—a learned man, or rather, one who could read; but now it is restricted (ecclesiastically) to the persons who lead the responses in the parish churches in England.

Cletus, one of the first bishops of Rome. It is doubtful, however, whether he followed immediately after Linus, and whether he is identical with Anacletus. See Anacletus and Clemens Romanus.

Clinic Baptism (Clinici, from cliun, a “bed”) meant in the ancient Church those who received baptism on the sick-bed. Most of the Fathers considered such baptism valid; though it was a question often raised whether it should be repeated or not, if the sick recovered. The ordination of a clinicus for the presbytery was objected to; and the synod of Neo-Caesarea (314) forbade to ordain a clinicus priest.

Cloister (from the Latin claustrum, an “enclosure”) meant originally simply the wall surrounding a monastery, but became gradually applied to the whole establishment, synonymous with monastery; as, for instance, in the capitularies of Charlemagne. A little later it acquired a more special sense (now the most generally used), denoting the arcades which surround the inner court of a monastery, and which were used by the monks as places of study, meditation, and recreation.

Clothing and Ornaments of the Hebrews. The collective name for clothes is béqadim, which were made out of linen, wool, and cotton, although silk is also mentioned (Ezek. xvi. 10; Rev. xviii. 22). Clothing prepared from wool and linen was prohibited (Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 11). Costly clothing was of different colors and of needlework. Luxury in, and imitation of, foreign fashions, are often censured (Isa. iii. 10; Zeph. ii. 8). The costume of both sexes was very similar: there was sufficient difference, however, to mark the sex. The articles of clothing common to men and women were: 1. The under-garment, which was held together by a girdle, and besides which a linen shirt (sadin) is sometimes mentioned. A person who had only this under-garment on was called naked (1 Sam. xix. 24; Job. xxiv. 10; Isa. xx. 2). Persons in high stations wore two under-garments; the outer one being called meil, a robe (1 Sam. xv. 27, xviii. 4, xxiv. 5; Job i. 20). A Chaldee costume was the pattish, or mantle (Dan. iii. 21). 2. The over-garment, for which different expressions were given, which was thrown around the person. Poor people and travellers also used the outer garment as night-clothes. Both sexes made out of the superabundant folds in front a pocket or lap. Priests alone wore a kind of drawers. Besides these dresses, women wore veils. Both sexes covered the head with a turban, made of divers articles, and in different forms: hence, from its costliness, it is also called "an ornament, not beauty." Gloves were not unknown; yet they appear not to have been used as a part of the attire, but by workmen as a protection of the hands from injury and soiling (cf. Mishna, Chelin, xvi. 6, xxiv. 15, xxvii. 3). The covering of the feet were sandals of leather or wood, bound to the foot with thongs: they were dispensed with indoors, and put on when leaving the house. On entering of sacred places the sandals were cast off.

Rending the clothes was a sign of nervous irritation and of mourning. Only the high priest was forbidden to rend his garment. Lepers also had to rend their clothes. In times of distress perfumed their garments (Ps. xlv. 9; Cant. iv. 11). Public reverence and homage toward the emperor was signified by the ribbons and sandalis cast off. And the ribbon of blue attached along the way; and the ribbon of blue attached to the house. On entering of sacred places the sandals were cast off. Such costly garments were also used as presents to another, a sign of friendship (1 Sam. xviii. 4).

As for the ornaments, they were especially common to the female sex, although both sexes wore bracelets (2 Sam. i. 10; Num. xxxi. 50). Besides, we find ear-rings, which (according to Job xii. 11) were also worn by men. So-called ear-pendants (Judg. viii. 26; Isa. iii. 19) were also attached to the ear-rings. Other ornaments were the nose-rings, made of precious metal or ivory; the signet, which was suspended by a string; necklaces formed of perforated drops strung together; to which must be added the ancles, an especial ornament of the women, which were connected with step-chains to announce their coming, and to either attract or chase away the opposite sex.

CLOVIS (Cludocus, Chlodovechus, Ludovicus, Ludwig, Louis), King of the Franks 481–511; defeated Syagrius in 486; extended his dominion from the Somme to the Seine, and fixed his residence at Soissons. In 492 he married Clothilda, a Burgundian princess; a Christian and a Catholic; and a happy incident, turning the battle of Zulipich to his advantage, induced him to embrace Christianity, together with the greater part of his warriors and subjects. It is related, that, when he heard the story of the crucifixion of Christ, he exclaimed, "Would I had been there with my valiant Franks to avenge him!" He was baptized upon Christmas Day, 496. This event contributed very much to bring the Teutonic races in closer connection with the Christian Church and Roman civilization; and the circumstance that he became a Catholic, while the princes of Burgundy and of the Visigothic realm in Southern France were Arians, exercised also a considerable influence on the development of the Roman Church. Partly from political, and partly from religious, reasons, Clovis attacked and extended the boundary of the Frankish Empire to Bordeaux. The principal source to this life is GREGORY OF TOURS: Historia Francorum, ii. 27–43. See JUNGHANS: Geschichte der fränkischen Könige Childerich und Chlodovech, Göttingen, 1857.

CLUGNY. Towards the end of the ninth century, monastic life had sunk very low in France, partly because the monasteries had grown wealthy and were badly governed, and partly on account of the uncertainty which prevailed in all public life. Duke William of Aquitania, called the Pious, thought to save monasticism by reforming it. In 910 he founded a new monastery at Clugny, Cluniacensium in Burgundy, endowed it well, and placed at its head Berno, a descendant of the ruling family of Burgundy, and Abbot of Beaune in the diocese of Dijon. Berno enforced the strictest observance of the rules of St. Benedict; and this severity struck a rich vein of sympathy in the monks. The monastery immediately filled up with monks. Under his successor Odo (927–941) seventeen other monasteries joined the congregation of Clugny; and the success of the establishment continued increasing under Aymardus (941–948), Mayolus (948–954), and Odilo (954–1018). Clugny became the reformer, not only of the order of St. Benedict, but of monastic life in general. Its rules, Consuetudines Cluniacenses, first collected in the beginning of the tenth century by the monk Bernard (HERRGOTT: Vetus Disciplina Monastica, Paris, 1729), then in 1770 by the monk Ulric (D'ACHERY: Spicilegium, T. i.), and finally by Petrus Venerabilis (Biblotheca Cluniacensis, p. 1553), were generally adopted; while the popes vied with each other in conferring new privileges on the establishment. Its abbots bore the title of archi-bishops. Alexander II. decreed that no bishop or other prelate could lay the ban upon the place. Urban II. gave the abbot episcopal emblems, and exempted the monastery and its estates from the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Mâcon. Towards the end of the eleventh century three popes—Gregory VII., Urban II., and Paschalis II.—issued from the congregation. The monastery Isaac, was the largest in Christendom. In 1345 it received at one time Pope Innocent IV. and the French king, with their whole retinue. Its church was one of the most magnificent built during the middle ages, ornamented with wall and glass pictures, and embroidered tapestries, and stocked with furniture of gold and bronze.

In the beginning of the twelfth century the discipline slackened; and the establishment was...

impoorished during the incompetent rule of Pontius. He finally abdicated, and went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land; but on his return he fell upon the monastery, and sacked it. Under Petrus Venerabilis it rose again. The number of monks increased from two hundred to four hundred and sixty; and three hundred and fourteen abbeys belonged to the congregation; but the improvement was only temporary. The further history of Cluny is a steady decline. The abbey lost its power. In order to defend itself against the counts of Châlons, Cluny invoked the protection of the French king, and the monastery was surrounded with walls, and transformed into a fortress. Both the popes and the French kings interfered in the election of abbots.

In the beginning of the sixteenth century the office became a commendam in the House of Guise. In 1744 a royal ordinance placed the establishment under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Mâcon.

In vain Abbot Yvo of Vergy (1269) founded the Cluniac order in France (1412) to support by English prose and poetry which exposed the abominations of the Church. After his marriage he was excommunicated, and sold the church and the buildings in order to encourage the propagation of their doctrines; while his castle sheltered many a wandering Lollard preacher, to whose ministrations he listened with delight. His interest may have been at the start partly political; but at all events it was profound. He employed John Purvey, Wiclif's companion and fellow Bible-translator, to write books, and had Wiclif's treatises copied and distributed. In 1391 he delivered a speech in the House of Commons against the papal political despotism, which forbade the publication of excommunications issued by the Pope. In 1395 he wrote a book in prose and poetry which exposed the abominations of the Church.

After his marriage he was employed in France (1412) to support by English arms the interest of Philip the Good in Burgundy. On his return, his troubles began. His bold stand on behalf of Lollardism led to persecution, from which his rank, wealth, and popularity could not save him; and after trial he was sentenced to be burnt as a "pernicious and detestable heretic." A respite of forty days was, however, granted, perhaps in the hope that he would recant. On the night of Oct. 27-28, 1413, William Fisher, a leather merchant, came to his hiding-place, and fled to Wales, where he was discovered early in 1417.

His condition was made by the provincialsynods, though with the consent of the Pope; but, later on, the Pope rescued this cuorium episcopalia, like all cuurve majores, for his own decision (c. 13, 14, cit. c. 17 Send. [Zacharias ad Bouficiam a. 748]; c. 5, 6, X. de clerico egratante [III. 6], Innocent. III. a. 1204; Honorius III.); cap. un. de clerico egrato, in VI. [III. 5]; [Bonit, VIII. a. 1298]). The old principle, ne in una urbe duobus episcopis (Conc. Nicarn. a. 325 c. 8), was preserved, at least formally, by consecrating the coadjutor on the title of some other church. The Council of Trent further decreed (sess. XXV. cap. 7, de reform.) that coadjutors should be appointed at cathedral churches and monasteries only in cases of absolute necessity, and that they should never acquire the right of succession, except after a careful investigation of all circumstances by the Pope.

COBB, Sylvanus, D.D., a Universalist minister; b. at Norway, Me., July, 1799; wrote a Commentary on the New Testament, and other works, and was editor of a denominational paper for almost twenty years; c. in East Boston, Mass., Oct. 31, 1866.

COBHAM, Lord (Sir John Oldcastle), a prominent supporter of the Lollards; b. in Herefordshire about 1300; martyred at London, Dec. 25, 1417. He married about 1408 Joanna (whose fourth husband he was, and who married again after his death) the only daughter of Baron Cobham, and by right of his wife's title sat in the House of Lords. He was a brave soldier, an able statesman, a faithful friend. He was called the "good Lord Cobham." He seems to have been early drawn toward the Lollards (see title), and to have freely used his wealth to further the cause of Lollard preaching, and to propagate their doctrines; while his castle sheltered many a wandering Lollard preacher, whose ministrations he listened with delight. His interest may have been at the start partly political; but at all events it was profound. He employed John Purvey, Wiclif's companion and fellow Bible-translator, to write books, and had Wiclif's treatises copied and distributed. In 1391 he delivered a speech in the House of Commons against the papal political despotism, which forbade the publication of excommunications issued by the Pope. In 1395 he wrote a book in prose and poetry which exposed the abominations of the Church. After his marriage he was employed in France (1412) to support by English arms the interest of Philip the Good in Burgundy. On his return, his troubles began. His bold stand on behalf of Lollardism led to persecution, from which his rank, wealth, and popularity could not save him; and after trial he was sentenced to be burnt as a "pernicious and detestable heretic." A respite of forty days was, however, granted, perhaps in the hope that he would recant. On the night of Oct. 27-28, 1413, William Fisher, a leather merchant, came to his hiding-place, and fled to Wales, where he was discovered early in 1417.
the fall of that year taken prisoner. On Dec.
14 he was brought before the Lords in Parliament assembled, and the proclamation of January, 1414, read to him. As he had no defence which was acceptable, he was sentenced a second time; and on Christmas Day he was carried from the Tower through the city to St. Giles-in-the-Fields, and there hung in a horizontal position by means of three chains, and burnt over a fire kind led on the ground. He died praising God, and exhorting the people to follow Christ.

COCCEIUS. (Latin form of KOCH), Johannes,
b. in Bremen, Aug. 9, 1603; d. in Leyden, Nov.
4, 1669. He pursued his theological studies at the University of Franeker in West Friesland.
In 1629 he became professor of biblical philology in Bremen, in 1636 professor of theology at Franken in West Friesland, and professor of theology in Leyden.

He laid down the guiding exegetical principle, that every passage must be interpreted according to its context, and have only that sense to which the context leads. He drew his theology directly from the Bible, and from it alone; and thus he put himself in opposition to the scholastics and the Carsadians. And since the Bible is the history of redemption, in the form of a covenant between God and man after the fall, he logically conceived of the relation between the parties before the fall as also a covenant. But this covenant is not, like a human one, an agreement for mutual service:
rather it is one-sided. The fundamental law of every covenant of God with men is, he says, that man is receiver, God giver. Man was qualified by his creation to receive it. He was free, rational, and holy. The first Covenant was "of Works." God gave man the promise of eternal felicity, on condition that man remained holy, as he was able to do. This was his work. But he fell, and accordingly was cursed. After the fall he was still bound to perfect obedience and faith.
God, however, who is rich in mercy, put in place of the fallen covenants with trifling ingenuity (De OEconomia antis, &c., &c.) the new covenant of Grace, based upon precisely similar principles. God yet stands as free giver; man, as willing receiver. Cocceius shows that the fulfilment of the latter required the sending of Jesus Christ, and in the biblical history we read the doctrines of redemption under divisions, — its purpose (the promised grace), its mode (gratuitous), its foundery (a mediator), its means (faith), its recipients (believers), its cause (God's good pleasure), its revelation (the Bible), the method of its application (the operation of the Holy Spirit), its ultimate object (the redemption of men). — The history of the second Covanenant with Adam is the discussion of the God's creation of man, — antilegal (the law under the form of conscience).
The grace under which the patriarchal protovangel manifested itself, and the kingdom of God existed in the form of the family, the legal (the written law, grace in the form of ceremonial types and priests), the kingdom of the patriarchal (God's Messiah), and the postlegal economy (in which Christ himself appeared as the completely fulfilled personal law, and as the personal grace, as the personal word, and in which the kingdom of God exists in universal form). — The effects of the Covenant of Grace are the happiness of the individual soul, the conversion of physical death from a punishment into a deliverance from the body of sin, and, finally, the resurrection of the body. See his Summa Doctrinae de Fadere et Testamentis Dei, 1618, 2d ed., 1653.

The Federal theology of Cocceius does not rest upon the doctrine of predestination, as did the Teaching of the Protestant scholastics of the sixteenth century. Man, he taught, was not a machine by which the divine decree was carried out, but a person who received the divine grace into his heart, and by it was led unto perfection. See ERNARD: Christliche Dogmatik, § 257. As was to be expected, the scholastic school attacked him, and called him a heretic. He replied that "orthodoxy à la mode" was the ruin of the Reformed church, because it prided itself upon its ortho-doxy, and yet was full of worldliness. Cocceius had the spiritually-minded upon his side. He took the substance of the ground, that one should not listen to those preachers who regarded the work of teaching religion merely as a profession. Unhappily the controversy took a political turn. The aristocratic party which had supported Arminius supported the Cocceians; the Oranian party, his opponents. At one time a deeper split than Arminianism had made threatened the Netherland Church; but by pacifactory measures peace was restored, and it was established by law that one out of every three ordinarii at each university should be a Cocceian.

As an exegete Cocceius is open to the charge of fancifulness, but not more so than other students of prophecy of his day. His influence is best seen in his pupil, Campeius Vitringa. But in the history of theology he plays a very important part, in that he delivered the Reformed Church from the tyranny of the scholastic orthodoxo, and taught her to give heed to her true text, and carried through the synod a measure requiring all candidates in theology to pass an examination in Greek and Hebrew.

The Works of Cocceius and his School. — He wrote, besides his Summa Doctrinae, Summa Theo-logiae (2d ed., 1665), which was more conventional in its use of terms, but not less independent in its explanations and contents. Among his followers are Wilhelm Momma and Hermann Witsius, who carried out the analogies between the two conventions with trifling ingenuity (De OEconomia Faderum Dei cum Hominibus, Leeuwarden, 1685); but far more important is Franz Burmann (Synopis Theologiae et Speciulium Economico Faderum Dei, Utrecht, 1671), who carried out the analogies in his arrangement of his material, but enters into the discussion of all the scholastic questions which had genuine value, and embodies the results of the Federal theology in a perma-dent and lasting form: lastly, Van Til (Compendium Theologiae, Bern, 1703; Theologie utroque Compendium, Leyden, 1704) set forth a theology which had its roots in both the Federal and Cartesian schools.

The complete works of Cocceius appeared in twelve volumes folio, including two volumes Amstotae (Opera Ommnia, Theologica, Eregetica, Didactica, Polemica, Philologica, 3d ed., auctior et emendator, Amsterdam, 1701). They include commentaries on nearly the whole Bible, essays, controversial and expository (among them one on the sabbath as a Jewish institution not binding upon the Christian Church, although he favored its observance on the ground of expediency), sermons, a Hebrew and Chaldee lexicon compiled at the request of a Brandenburg princess, and letters. COCHLÆUS (Johann Dobevec), b. at Wendelstein, near Nuremberg, 1479; d. at Breslau, 1552; was successively rector of the Latin School in Nuremberg, dean at the Church of Our Lady at Frankfurt, secretary to Duke George from above Dresden, canon at Breslau, etc., and led a very erratic life as one of the busiest and most passionate adversaries of the Reformation. He was present at the diets of Worms, Ratisbon, and Augsburg, and at the disputation of Ratisbon. But as a debater he was too excited and violent. He had his force as a pamphleteer always ready, and well-nigh inexhaustible. He is, if not the inventor, at all events one of the first representatives of the view according to which the Reformation was nothing but the stupid result of an incidental jealousy between the Dominican and Augustinian orders; and in his Commentaria de Actis et Scriptis M. Lutheri et Historia Hussitarum he derives with unexampled cynicism the causes of the grandest spiritual movements from the meanest personal circumstances. See URB.

CELESTIUS, a native of Ireland: studied law; became a monk, and from 405 to 401 is often mentioned in the history of the Church as the friend and collaborator of Pelagius. He was condemned by a council of Carthage (412), but was soon after ordained a priest at Ephesus, and acquitted of heresy by Zosimus in 417. In the following year, however, he was condemned by a synod in Rome; and, after the condemnation of Pelagianism by the Council of Ephesus (431), he is not heard of any more. Of his writings (a confessio Fidei, addressed to Zosimus, and some epistles) only fragments are still extant in the writings of Augustine and Jerome.

CELESYRIA. According to the early classic geographers, Ccesalyria included only the long valley which separates the parallel ranges of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. Subsequently, however, the name came to have a wider application, including not only the region surrounding Damascus, but also a large part of the country east of the Jordan. Ccesalyria thus expanded contained nearly all the cities of Decapolis within its limits; and, though the name does not occur in the plain itself, it is frequently mentioned in the Apocryphal books (1 Eom. ii. 24, 27, iv. 48, vi. 29; 1 Mac. x. 69; 2 Mac. xiv. 3, 5, 8), and by Josephus (Ant. XIII. 4, 2; XIV. 0, 5; 11, 4) and other writers. It has a legendary history of its own, attested by curious monuments. At Kerak Nūh is shown the grave of Noah, one hundred and thirty-two feet long; and on the opposite side of the plain is the tomb of Nebi Shit, the prophet Seth; while the temples at Ba'albek have astonished the world for many centuries. The massive foundations upon which they were built by Greek and Roman architects must have been placed there at a time too remote for even tradition to reach; and long before "Toi, King of Hamath," sent presents to David (2 Sam. viii. 9–11), the Hittites of that region were sufficiently powerful to contend with the Pharaohs of Egypt for supremacy in the Valley of Cesalyria, or Hollow-Syria, as its original Greek name signifies.

That remarkable valley, now called el Bukā'a, "the cleft,"—extends to the north-east, from Jubb Jenin, under Hermon, for about one hundred miles, having an average width of seven miles. Its surface is so level; but this appearance is deceptive. It is, in fact, an elevated plateau rising gradually northward, until, at the north-east end, it is nearly four thousand feet above the level of the sea,—a cold, rugged, and barren region.

The northern end of the Bukā'a is drained by the Orontes, called el' Asy, "the rebellious,"—because its course is northward, contrary to the other rivers of Syria. Its most southern source is at Lebweh, the Libo of the ancients. By means of canals the water is conducted far away to the north, to irrigate fields of Indian corn, the chief product cultivated along the numerous streams that form the Orontes. The main permanent source of that river is the copious fountain that flows out from under the cliffs of Lebanon, near Mughrāt er Rāhib. Passing below Kamāt er Hārmal, a unique monument with hunting-scenes carved upon its four sides, the Orontes irrigates the extensive corn-growing plains of the Biblical Riblah (2 Kings xxy. 6), and the equally fertile region around the small Lake of Kedes. The shapeless ruins near Tel el Nebi Mindau may mark the site of the chief city of the Hittite Kingdom. Issuing from the artificial Lake of Kedès, six miles south of Hums, the river pursues its winding course through the land of Hamath, past the extensive ruins of Apamea, and along the eastern foot-hills of the Nusairiyyeh Mountains, where it turns westward, and, passing by Antioch, it enters the sea near the base of Mount Casius.

The central and southern portions of the Bukā'a are comparatively level, and their fertility and beauty are entirely due to the abundance of water. Perennial streams descend from the mountains on either side, and copious fountains rise in the plain itself, in such positions that the water can be conducted to all parts of its surface. Lowering down upon the Bukā'a from any one of the hundred stand-points on Lebanon and Hermon, the beholder is charmed with the checker and endlessly-varied expanse of blending wheat-fields, green or golden, recently-ploughed land, broken by broad belts of dun-colored fallow-ground, reaching to and climbing up the gray foot-hills of the mountains.

CELESYRIA.
Through the centre of the Būkā'a meanders the Litānī, the ancient Leontes, one of the longest and largest rivers of Syria. It rises at 'Ain el-Burdānī, above Ba'albek, and is joined, as it flows southward, by many tributaries, amongst them the Litānī, the ancient Leontes, one of the long est and largest rivers of Syria. It rises at 'Ain el-Berdūny, which descends from snow-crowned Lebanon, and the larger emitting fountain near the ancient Chalcis. Below Jubb Jethn the Litānī enters a profound gorge, along which it has worn its way through Southern Lebanon to the sea, near Tyre.

Coelesyria, celebrated in ancient times for its fertility, and its numerous and warlike inhabitants, large cities, and magnificent temples, is now merely an insignificant district of the Turkish Empire.

COELICOLÆ, the name of a Jewish sect first mentioned in 408, in a decree of the Emperor Honorius. Of their doctrines the decree says nothing: it only forbids their meetings. Afterwards Honorius had occasion to issue another decree, especially against the Coelicolae, enjoining either to embrace Christianity within a year, or to embrace Judaism; and this crime was considered as treason, and punished in the severest possible manner. Augustine says (Ep. 169) that they were numerous in Africa, and used a peculiar form of baptism; but it is not correct to infer from this fact that they had borrowed their custom of baptizing from the Christians, as they might have taken it from the Jewish baptism of proselytes. Like the Jews, they often used the word "Heaven" instead of "God;" hence their name of "Heaven-worshippers." See SCHMID: Historia Caelicolarum, Helmstädt, 1794.

COFFIN, Charles, a hymnist, b. at Buzancy, 1676; d. in Paris, 1749. He succeeded M. Rollin, the famous historian, in 1712, as principal of the College of Dormans-Beauvais, University of Paris, and held that position with distinguished success until his death. He was chosen rector of the university in 1718. Several of the Latin hymns which he contributed to the Paris Breviary are found in our collections in John Mason Neale's and John Chandler's renderings.

In the original they are much commended for purity of style and felicity of expression. His works appeared in 2 vols., Paris, 1755, with prefatory "Eloge" by Lenglet.

COKE, Thomas, D.C.L., first superintendent of the Methodist-Episcopal Church; b. at Brecon, South Wales, Sept. 9, 1747; d. at sea, on a voyage to Ceylon, May 2, 1814. He was a gentleman commoner of Jesus College, Oxford, and curate of South Petherton, Somersetshire; but in the latter place he came under Methodist influences, and in 1777 joined Wesley, to whom he was "a right hand," and who in 1784, at Bristol, set him apart as a superintendent of the work. Of his early connection with Mr. Wesley, it is recorded, "He meant the ceremony," says Mr. Tyerman, "to be a mere formality likely to recommend his delegate to the favor of the Methodists in America." Coke was in his ambition, wished and intended it to be considered as an ordination to a bishopric" (Life of Wesley, vol. III. p. 434). Coke and two elders arrived in America, Nov. 3, 1784, held a conference at Baltimore, Dec. 24, at which he ordained Francis Asbury to the office of superintendent, and with characteristic energy discharged his duties in this country. But he by no means confined his attention to America. On the contrary, he traversed Great Britain and Ireland, crossed the ocean eighteen times at his own expense, founded a mission among the negroes in the West Indies, and one also in the East Indies, and it was upon his voyage thither that he died. "During his life it was not deemed necessary to organize a missionary society among the Wesleyans, for he embodied that great interest in his own person." Coke was not only a missionary and organizer, he was also an author. His principal writings are (in connection with Henry Moore) Life of John Wesley (London, 1792), Commentary on the Old and New Testaments (finished 1807, 6 vols.), History of the West Indies (1808, 3 vols.). COLERIDGE, Samuel Taylor, poet, critic, philosopher, and theologian; b. at Ottery St. Mary, Oct. 21, 1772; d. at Highgate, July 25, 1834. He was the youngest child of the Rev. John Coleridge, vicar of Ottery St. Mary, Devonshire, and master of the free grammar-school founded by Henry VIII. in that town. His mother, whose maiden name was Ann Bowdon, managed skilfully the large household; while his father, a learned, guileless, good man, absent-minded and eccentric, devoted himself to his parish and school, and to writing curious unsalable books. The childhood of Samuel Taylor, according to his own account, had in it far more of shade than of sunshine. Although his father was very fond of him, and he was his "mother's darling," yet, for that very reason, Molly the nurse, who idolized his brother Frank, hated and tormented him. He became morbid and fretful, never played except by himself, read incessantly, never had the child's habits, never thought or spoke as a child. The year after his father's death, which occurred in 1781, Judge Buller, a friend of the family, obtained for him a presentation to Christ's Hospital, London, of which the noted Bowyer was then head master. Here he spent eight years, during the first half of which he describes himself as "a playless day-dreamer, a helio librorum." Among his school-fellows was Charles Lamb, who, in one of the Essays of Elia, has drawn a vivid picture of him as "the inspired charity-boy." In February, 1791, he entered at Jesus College, Cambridge. The fame of his genius and classical attainments had preceded him, and raised high anticipations of his university career, which were by no means realized. He was studious, and a great reader, as well as brilliant talker; but his only college honor was a gold medal for the Greek ode. In November, 1793, in a fit of despondency, he suddenly left Cambridge, and went to South Wales, Sept. 9, 1747; d. at sea, on a voyage to Ceylon, May 2, 1814. He was a gentleman commoner of Jesus College, Oxford, and curate of South Petherton, Somersetshire; but in the latter place he came under Methodist influences, and in 1777 joined Wesley, to whom he was "a right hand," and who in 1784, at Bristol, set him apart as a superintendent of the work. Of his early connection with Mr. Wesley, it is recorded, "He meant the ceremony," says Mr. Tyerman, "to be a mere formality likely to recommend his himself a Unitarian. He was also full of the generous but wild enthusiasm for liberty and the rights of man, aroused by the French Revolution.
In the summer of 1794 he first met Robert Southey, with whom he formed a close friendship.
He quitted college without taking a degree, and devoted himself to literature, lecturing also, and preaching occasionally in Unitarian pulpits. A scheme to emigrate to America with Southey and others, and to establish on the banks of the Susquehanna a new social order, called "Pantisoccracy," perished in its birth. In October, 1795, he married, at Bristol, Sarah Fricker, whose sister Edith soon after became the wife of Southey.
He resided for a while at Bristol, or in its vicinity, and later at Nether Stowey, near his faithful friend, Thomas Poole. At Bristol he became intimate with Mr. Cottle, who in 1796 published his Juvenile Poems. Early in this year he started a short-lived miscellany called The Watchman.
In 1798 appeared at Bristol the famous Lyrical Ballads, written jointly by himself and Wordsworth. During this period he composed his finest poems. In September, 1798, in company with Wordsworth and his sister, he went to Germany, where he passed fourteen months, mostly at Göttingen, supported by the liberality of Thomas and Josiah Wedgwood. Soon after returning home, he made his admirable translation of Schiller's Wallenstein, and began to write for the Morning Post. Later he contributed to the Courier. In 1801 he settled at Keswick, remaining there until 1804, when he went to Malta. Here he acted for a time as secretary of the governor, Sir Alexander Ball. At Rome, where he spent some months, he met William von Humboldt, Tieck the poet, and Allston the painter. With the latter he formed a friendship that lasted for life. In 1806 he returned to England, and settled again in the lake country.
In 1810 he betook himself to London, and for several years seems to have had no certain dwelling-place. This period was one of severe suffering, trials, and disappointment; relieved, however, by the hospitable kindness of Mr. and Mrs.
Basil Montague and other devoted friends. In April, 1812, he became an inmate of the family of James Gillman, a surgeon of Highgate, near London. The friendship and watchful, affectionate care of Mr. and Mrs. Gillman afforded him a refuge and home during the rest of his days;
and for this service their names should be ever held in grateful remembrance. From the time he settled at Keswick in 1801 until 1816, his lit-ery activity consisted largely in giving courses of lectures in London and Bristol, and in writing The Friend, a new edition of which, recast and enlarged, appeared in 1818, with a beautiful dedication to Mr. and Mrs. Gillman. The happy effect of his life at Highgate soon showed itself also in the Biographia Literaria and the Lay Sermons; and, a few years later, in the Aids to Reflection (1825), and Church and State (1830). After his death, four volumes of his Literary Remains, three volumes of Essays on his own Times, Confessions of a Inquiring Spirit, and a fragment on The Idea of Life, were published. In the retirement of his last years he was resorted to as an oracle of wisdom by disciples and admirers from far and near; and some of the ablest minds of the next generation were formed under his influence.

It was while at Highgate that Coleridge at last conquered the terrible habit of opium-eating.
He had first resorted to the fatal drug as a relief from disease and pain; but the taste grew into an insatiable appetite, involved him in untold miseries, and brought him to the verge of ruin.

While passing through this desolate valley of humiliation, he took his deepest lessons in the school of Christian repentance. "I feel," he wrote, "with an intensity unfathomable by words, my utter nothingness, impotence, and worthless-ness in and for myself." And here, too, he learned the infinite fulness and power of God's grace in Christ, the Redeemer of the world. He died in perfect peace on the 25th of July, 1834, in the sixty-second year of his age. The writer once received from the lips of Mrs. Gillman a very touching account of his last days on earth, and also many interesting details respecting his mannner of life during the eighteen years which he passed at Highgate. Her picture of him, both living and dying, was that of a man as remarkable for his very gentleness of disposition and his unaffected piety and goodness, as for the splendor of his intellect. Shortly before his death he composed his own epitaph, which closes thus:

"Mercy, for praise; to be forgiven, for fame—

He asked and hoped through Christ. Do thou the same."

Coleridge was one of the most remarkable men of his age. The annals of literature, indeed, hardly furnish another instance of such a union of poet, philosopher, and theologian in one and the same person. And, what is specially noteworthy, his genius as a thinker blossomed even earlier than his genius as a poet. "Come back into memory, like as thou went in the dayspring of thy fancies, with hope like a fiery column before thee,—the dark pillar not yet turned,—

S. T. C., logician, metaphysician, bard!" (LAMB).
The impression he made upon his contemporaries is shown by the testimonies which some of the most eminent of them have left on record. Here is that of John Foster: "His mind contains an astonishing map of all sorts of knowledge; while in his power and manner of putting it to use he displays more of what we mean by the term
'genius' than any mortal I ever saw, or ever expect to see." Shortly after his death, DeQuincey speaks of him as "This illustrious man, the largest and most spacious intellect, the subtlest and most comprehensive, in my judgment, that has yet existed amongst men." Less extravagant than this, but not less emphatic, is the witness borne by Sir Walter Scott, Hazlitt, Wordsworth, Dr. Arnold, Mill, Julius Hare, Maurice, and others, to his extraordinary gifts. And in full accord with this exalted opinion of his own countrymen was that of the German philosopher Schelling.1

1 Schelling once expressed to the writer his warm admiration for Coleridge, whom he pronounced the first Englishman who fully understood German philosophy. In one of his lectures he borrowed from Coleridge the remark that mythology
"is not allegorical, but tabular," and then subjoins a note in praise of Coleridge for his ingenuity in finding and acquitting him of the charge of plagiarism, so sharply made by some of his own countrymen. "Für den erwähnten treffenden Ausdruck überlasse ich ihm gerne die von seinen eigenen Landsleuten scharf,
As a poet Coleridge occupies a place not only high, but almost unique. The Ancient Mariner and Christabel, not to mention other poems, are wonderful creations, full of imaginative power and beauty. He was also pre-eminent as a critic of literature and art. The notes of his lectures on Shakespeare are rich in subtle, discriminating thought, and original views; while his dissertation on Wordsworth, in the Biographia Literaria, is unsurpassed by any thing of the kind in the language. His writings on political subjects, whether questions of the day or the vital principles of government, are marked by deep reflection, ardent zeal for both liberty and law, and a skilful use of the lessons of history. If not always convincing, he is always fresh and instructive.

But the great work of his life belongs to the sphere of Christian philosophy. Here he was without a rival in his generation; and his influence was alike profound and far-reaching. Having fought his own way, through much error and doubt, to the full light of truth, he strove to guide others to the right. With his own words, that Christianity, 'though not discoverable by human reason, is yet in accordance with it; that link follows link by necessary consequence; that religion passes out of the ken of reason, even as the day softens away into twilight, and twilight, hushed and breathless, steals into the darkness.” As a philosopher he was a power rather than a system-maker; and his power was exerted almost as much in conversation as by his writings. When he came upon the stage, the mind of England was fast bound in the systems of mechanical thought and empiricism which ruled the last century. Locke and Paley were the oracles of popular wisdom. A subtle rationalism was everywhere at work sapping the ancient foundations in morals and religion. Coleridge undertook, at first almost single-handed, to re-assert the claims of a spiritual philosophy. In order to this, he laid the utmost stress upon the difference in kind between reason and understanding,—a distinction first clearly defined by Hegel and Schelling, as old, indeed, as Aristotle. A careful statement of his views on this point may be found in Aids to Reflection, the most mature and complete of his works. He also revived the Platonic doctrine of ideas; that is, of the archetypal forms, or eternal verities, in the divine mind. Upon these two points his battle with the dominant systems largely hinged. His philosophical method and opinions were greatly influenced by Kant, of whom he was an ardent admirer. He owed much also to Schelling and Jacobi. Of Hegel he seems to have known nothing. His writings, while full of seeds of the highest thought and the noblest wisdom, are yet disciplinary rather than doctrinal: they contain no fully-developed system.

For this very reason they are, perhaps, even the better fitted to aid inquiring minds, especially youthful minds, in the search for truth, and in solving the deep problems of existence both earthward and heavenward.

His religious temper and sympathies are indicated by his fondness for such divines as Luther, Hooker, Leighton, Donne, Baxter, Jeremy Taylor, and Bunyan. The writings of Archbishop Leighton and Pilgrim's Progress were his especial delight. As a theologian he revered the Fathers of the Reformation, and accepted heartily the catholic doctrines of faith, substantially as contained in the ancient creeds and in the great Protestant symbols. His orthodoxy has been warmly impugned, particularly in reference to inspiration and the atonement. It can hardly be denied that, in the re-action from what he called bibliolatry, he sometimes expressed himself incautiously, to say the least, on the question of inspiration. With regard to the atonement, whatever may be said about certain passages, the general tone of his later writings favors the conclusion that he was in substantial accord with the teaching of the Reformed churches on this subject. In general, it may be said that he anticipated, and furnished pregnant hints on the best way of meeting, most of the objections to revealed truth which have been raised by the sceptical science and speculation of the last fifty years. Whatever his faults and imperfections, whether as a man or an author, Coleridge must still be regarded as the most original, profound, and many-sided Christian thinker who has lived in England in the nineteenth century.

COLERIDGE.

He lies buried near the grave of Wordsworth in Grasmere churchyard. He was a frail mortal, but gifted with qualities which endear him to such friends as Wordsworth and Southey, and led to the common saying, that he was no one's enemy but his own. See Poems by Hartley Coleridge, with an interesting memoir of his life by his brother Derwent, 2 vols., 1831. G. L. PRENTISS.

COLERIDGE, Sara, only daughter of Samuel Taylor Coleridge; b. at Keswick, 1803; d. in London, May 3, 1832. She passed most of her early years in the home of her uncle, Robert Southey. In 1829 she was married to her cousin, Henry Nelson Coleridge, editor of several of her father's works, and himself an author of note. While still a girl, she translated from the Latin Martin Dobrizhoffer's Account of the Ahipones, an Equestrian People of Paraguay, 3 vols., 1822. After the death of her husband (1849), she took his place as editor of her father's works. She wrote a fairy-tale called Phantasmagoria, which was much admired. She possessed real learning, superior culture, no little power and acuteness of thought, and was a very lovely Christian woman. It was said of her, that her father "looked down into her eyes, and left in them the light of his own." See Memoir and Letters of Sara Coleridge, edited by her daughter, New York, 1874.

COLERIDGE, Sir John Taylor, an eminent English jurist, nephew of Samuel Taylor Coleridge; b. at Tiverton, in Devonshire, 1790; d. at Ottery St. Mary, Feb. 11, 1876. He was educated at Oxford and the Middle Temple; became judge of the King's Bench in 1835, and privy councillor in 1848. He was an intimate friend, and the biographer, of the poet Keble.

COLET, John, Dean of St. Paul's, and founder of St. Paul's School (1512); b. at London, 1469; d. there Sept. 10, 1519, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral. He was one of the "Reformers before the Reformation." He took his M.A. at Oxford (1490), and went abroad (1493) to study Greek and Latin. On his return, in 1497, he publicly expounded Paul's Epistles at Oxford, and there became acquainted with Erasmus, with whom he maintained an intimate friendship. In 1498 he was made D.D. of a heretic: hence he was subject to various positions, — made D.D. of the University of Oxford, London, 1504, and Dean of St. Paul's 1505. His great reform was to introduce expository preaching, and a perpetual divinity-lecture on Sunday; this was known disapproval of auricular confession, celibacy of the clergy, and other Roman practices, he was considered by the faithful little short of a heretic: hence he was subject to a variety of persecutions. He wrote Absolutissimus de octo orationibus constructione Libellus, London, 1530; Rudimenta Grammatices, London, 1510 (a book designed for use in St. Paul's School, and dedicated to its first master, the famous George Lilloy); Daily Devotions, or the Christian's Morning and Evening Sacrifice (Darling mentions only the edition of 1593). For his life, see the sketch, with portrait, in Fuller's Abel Redevicus (sic), Nicholls's ed., London, 1867, vol. I. pp. 112-125; Samuel Knight: Life of Colet, London, 1724; Oxford, 1853; and recently in Seeborn: The Oxford Reform of 1498 [Colet, Erasmus, and More], London, 1869.

COIGNY, Caspard de; b. Feb. 16, 1517, at Châtillon-sur-Loing; in the department of Loiret; d. in Paris, Aug. 24, 1572, was the second son of Gaspard de Châtillon, Marshal of France (d. 1522), and Louise de Montmorency, a sister of the famous constable of France, but became the head of the family, when, in 1538, the elder brother, Odet, was made a cardinal. Gaspard was a grave, pure, and prof character. Francis de Guise was his only friend. He fought with great distinction in Germany, Italy, and Spain, advanced rapidly on the military career, and was in 1547 made commander of the French infantry, among whose wild hordes he knew how to establish discipline. In 1552 he was made Admiral of France, and in 1555 Governor of Picardy. As such he signed the armistice of Vaucelles, Feb. 5, 1556; and, when Henry II. broke it, he felt both hurt and confounded. He was an honest man, and the peace and dispensation of the sword for a moment completely reversed. Coligny came into power, and he and his brother Andelot had openly embraced Protestantism. In the solitude of the prison the truth began to dawn upon the mind of Gaspard; and a letter from Calvin, Sept. 4, 1558, brought fuller clearness.

When they entered the military arena, the youthful friendship of Gaspard de Coligny and Francis de Guise soon became a jealous rivalry; and some years later, when, in the field of politics, they found themselves placed respectively at the head of two opposite parties, their rivalry grew into a deadly enmity. During the reign of Francis II. Guise lived at the court in power and splendor; Coligny, on his family estate, Châtillon, in quiet retirement. But when Francis II. suddenly died (Dec. 5, 1560), and Henry III. ascended the throne, the position of the two party-leaders was for a moment completely reversed. Coligny came into power, and he and his brother Andelot worked in perfect unison with the Chancellor l'Hôpital. Persecutions ceased, toleration was shown on both sides, and there were fair prospects of ending the conflict with a peaceful settlement. But on March 1, 1562, the massacre of Vassy took place, and on April 2 the first religious war began with the occupation of Orléans by Andelot. On the one side, the Roman Catholics, the Guises, and Antoine de Navarre; on the other, the Protestants, Coligny, see the sketch, with portrait, in Fuller's Abel Redevicus (sic), Nicholls's ed., London, 1867, vol. I. pp. 112-125; Samuel Knight: Life of Colet, London, 1724; Oxford, 1853; and recently in Seeborn: The Oxford Reform of 1498 [Colet, Erasmus, and More], London, 1869.
March 19 peace was concluded at Amboise, by which freedom of conscience, and, within certain limits, liberty of worship, were granted to the Protestants. But the hatred between the House of Guise and Coligny was only deepened by the events. Poligny declared that he had been encouraged to murder Francis de Guise by Coligny, Beza, etc.; and although the acts of the process (comp. Mémoires de Conde, IV. 285, 339; BezA: Hist. Eccles. des Eglises Réformées, II. 291, 310, 315) show, that, in this form, the accusation was an infamous calumny, it is, nevertheless, possible that Coligny was not altogether ignorant of what happened.

Four years of peace followed. But in the mean time the development of affairs in the Netherlands, the imprisonment of Egmont and Horn (Sept. 9, 1567), and rumors of a plan to capture the Prince of Condé and Coligny, made the Protestants suspicious; and the second religious war began. Coligny’s scheme of taking possession of the person of the King at Monceaux, near Meaux, failed (Sept. 27, 1567); but the victory at St. Denis (Oct. 9, 1567) led to the second religious war (March 28, 1568), by which the agreement of Amboise was renewed. The enmity, however, between the Roman-Spanish and Protestant-English parties, was too fierce not to break the peace; and within the same year the third religious war began. It ended with the peace of St. Germain (Aug. 2, 1570), after the battles of Jarnac, Moncontour, and Arnay le Duc. By this peace the cause of Protestantism in France seemed to be much improved. Charles IX. wasaverse to the Spanish direction which French politics lately had shown. Coligny was called to Blois Sept. 12, 1571; and the king seemed to listen to him with confidence. The negotiations for a marriage between Marguerite of Valois and Henry of Navarre finally succeeded. April 11, 1572, the marriage contract was signed, and Aug. 18 the wedding ceremony was celebrated. But Aug. 22, when Coligny, at eleven o’clock in the night, returned from the Louvre to his house (the present No. 144 Rue Ricoli), he was fired upon twice by one Maurevel, who escaped, and was brought home wounded. The next day the king visited him; but their intercourse was interrupted by the arrival of the queen-dowager. On the way back to the Louvre, the king confessed to his mother, that Coligny had given him certain warnings with respect to his councillors; and in the following night the men of the Duke of Guise penetrated into the house of Coligny, murdered him, and threw his body into the street, where the young Francis de Guise severed the head from the body. The head was sent, it is said, to Rome; while the body was dragged through the streets, and finally suspended in the gallows of Montfaucon. Meanwhile the Massacre of the Day of St. Bartholomew took place, and several days elapsed before Marshal Montmorency had the body taken down and buried. An act of Parliament, Oct. 27, 1572, declared Coligny guilty of treason, and decreed that his estates should be suppressed, and that his castle be razed to the ground, and his children and children’s children be treated as infamous; but it was cancelled by another act of Parliament, June 10, 1590.

Ltr.—Of the writings of Coligny, the manuscript of a history of the religious wars was burnt by Catherine of Medic. A number of his letters have been published in Bulletin de la Société de l'Histoire du Protestantisme Français, Paris, 1532, especially in series I., II., XIV., and XXII., and in Archives des Missions Scientifiques et Littéraires, series III. COLLATION, in canon law, the conferring or bestowing of a benefice by a bishop who has it in his gift or patronage. Collation differs from institution, in that it proceeds at the bishop’s own motion; and from presentation, in that it is the act of the bishop himself, while presentation is properly the act of a patron offering his clerical nominee to the bishop for encomium. See Dictionary of the English Church, s. v., London and N.Y., n.d. (1881).

COLLECT, a short prayer used in the Western churches, with these peculiarities, according to Blunt: “(1) An invocation; (2) A reason on which the petition is to be founded; (3) The petition itself, centrally placed, and always in few words; (4) The benefit hoped for; (5) A memorial of Christ’s mediation, or an ascription of praise, or both.” The two principal derivations are from collectas: (a) Because it was the prayer said in the early times for the people “when assembled (collectus) in one church, with the whole body of the clergy, for the purpose of proceeding to another;” or (b) Because “it indicates a prayer offered by the priest alone on behalf of the people, whose suffrages are thus collected into one voice, instead of being said alternately by priest and people, as in versicles and litanies.” Many of the collects now in use in the Roman-Catholic and Episcopal churches are undoubtedly very old, being composed by Popes Leo the Great (440–461), Gelasius (492–496), and Gregory the Great (590–604). See art. Collect in SMITH AND CHEETHAM’S Dict. of Christ. Antiq.; also BLUNT’S Annotated Book of Common Prayer, p. 69; BRIGHT’S Ancient Collects, pp. 198 sqq.

COLLEGE. The word “college” is used in many senses, always, or nearly always, implying a limited company, meeting in one place, bound by common laws, and associated for mutual support in the promotion of a definite object. A college is a society of colleagues; as of cardinals, electors, physicians, preceptors, or scholars. Its purpose in a more restricted use is to promote learning. Its grade may vary from a school for boys to an association of learned men; but it usually suggests the promotion of a liberal education in distinction from a practical or elementary training.

In this country the words “college” and “university” have been unfortunately used as synonymous, so that the distinction between the two is commonly forgotten; but in England and on the Continent, and among careful writers in America, the separate functions are clearly recognized. It is the business of a college to train youth at an early age, commonly before they have reached their majority, in studies which discipline the mind, and store it with useful knowledge. It is the business of a university to advance and quicken those who have been trained. In many cases the students of a college dwell within college walls, dine at a common table, attend religious worship in their own chapel, and are governed in their daily conduct by prescribed regulations under the constant care of their tutors. Their ages, their needs, and their tastes are supposed to be so nearly alike, that substantially the same treatment may be given to them all. It is the distinctive office of a university to hold examinations, and confer degrees, and also to provide for the advanced education of those who have been trained in the fundamental sciences. The university may comprise one or more colleges and schools. Its teachings (as distinguished from those of the colleges it includes) are broader, and adapted to mature minds. The true university teacher advances the science which he professes, and brings forward, in lectures or publications, the results he has reached; while the college instructor may fitly be devoted to the routine of instruction, and excel by patiently going over and over with his scholars fundamental principles.

The earliest colleges in this country were Harvard, William and Mary, and Yale; and their influence has powerfully controlled the higher education in America from colonial times until now. They were based on the model of the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, and there is much resemblance between their organization and that of Trinity College, Dublin. There are traces, also, of Scotch influence, at least in the two New-England colleges, and of the English public schools. All three were chartered by the State, were awesomely devoted to the maintenance of Christian doctrine (as held by the Puritans at Harvard and Yale, and as held by the Church of England at William and Mary). They sustained daily religious services, provided lodgings and a common table, were taught by a rector, with subordinate teachers in the languages and mathematics, and at the close of an appointed course of studies conferred the Bachelor's degree on successful scholars.

The pupils in these colleges were usually over fourteen years of age at entrance, and often took their first degree as early as eighteen. The notion that the acquisition of this honor was only "the commencement" of an education, and that the progressive scholar would come forward a few years later for his second degree of Master, was recognized from the beginning; although, for the want of professors who had the learning and the leisure to carry on the instruction of graduate students, there was but little efficiency in this part of the scheme. The form, however, has been constantly observed of encouraging Bachelors of Art to proceed to the degree of Master; thus implying that the freer study of the university highly follows the limited training of the colleges. In recent years the second degree has in many places been restored to its proper dignity, and is now conferred only by examinations in advanced and non-professional studies.

Upon the type thus described,—an American variety from an English germ,—most of the colleges which were established during the eighteenth century were formed. They were not exactly alike, but so nearly of the same pattern that "the American college" still bears its own marked features, readily traced in charters, customs, buildings, schemes of study, and popular phraseology. To distinguish it from the schools of professional training which have grown up in later days, it is often called "the college proper," an infelicitous but significant phrase. Around the central college other institutions have in many places been planted,—the schools of theology, law, medicine, and science; and the group of seminaries thus formed is not infrequently termed the university in distinction from the college.

As the three colleges just named have been the models to which later colleges have referred, a few words in regard to the origin of each may be given.

Harvard College, at Cambridge, Mass., dates from 1636. Two years later it received a generous bequest from Rev. John Harvard of Charlestown, whose name it has since borne. Instructions began in 1638; the first rector assumed office in 1640; in 1642 the governor, deputy-governor, and magistrate of the jurisdiction, the teaching elders of six adjoining towns, and the president of the college, were constituted the overseers; and in 1650 "the corporation" was formally chartered.

At New Haven, Conn., a college was proposed by Rev. John Davenport, soon after the settlement of the town, in 1638; but, on account of the successful progress of the college at the Bay, the project was not pushed forward until 1700, when several of the ministers of the neighborhood gave their books for "founding a college in Connecticut." Instructions began soon afterward; and in 1718 a gift from Gov. Elihu Yale fixed his name upon the new institution. The first charter was granted in 1701, and a second in 1745.

Soon after the settlement at Jamestown, in 1607, a university was projected at Henrico; but the difficulties were not overcome at once, and it was 1660–61 when an act of the Grand Assembly made "provision for a college." In 1683 a charter was received from William and Mary, and in 1700 the first Commencement was held. It received royal, colonial, and private benefactions; and we are told by its historian that "in 1776 it was the richest college in North America." Between 1700 and the Declaration of Independence six colleges were added to the three already named; and, before the close of the eighteenth century, seventeen more were added to the list. Since then, the number has rapidly increased, though all will admit that many of the institutions which are enrolled as "colleges" are poorly endowed, and imperfectly taught. A discriminating report on this subject is much to be desired. The list in the United-States commissioner's report for 1878 includes 358 colleges and universities, with 3,885 instructors and 57,987

1 Professor F. B. Dexter says, that, among the early emigrants to New England, about sixty were from Cambridge, and twenty were from Oxford.
students; but these figures are not of much value without elaborate statements in respect to the character of the instruction which is given.

Among the new institutions are the universities of Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, California, and other Western States, commonly including professional schools of law and medicine with the collegiate departments. Colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts, fostered by the all the States. To a limited extent the older colleges have received assistance from the State; but their chief reliance has been the generosity of individuals. There is a long list of noble benefactors, beginning with Harvard and Yale, whose names will be held in honor by those who watch the progress of knowledge. In the West, donations of land from the United-States Government have greatly aided the foundation of colleges and universities.

The most noteworthy innovation upon the traditional college system was made by the foundation of the University of Virginia, in 1829. "A classical course of studies, with the liberal arts and science, was first established; and later, when knowledge of great value, was not introduced; great freedom was allowed in the choice of studies; and much stress was given to examinations. Gradually many of the ideas there introduced have been adopted in other places. The rapid growth of science, and the demand for instruction in modern languages and literature, have caused important changes in the college courses, and tend to-day toward the encouragement of optional or eclectic plans of study.

The Johns Hopkins University, which was opened in Baltimore in 1876, with a generous and unconditioned endowment, has been organized in such a way as to give prominence to university methods in distinction from collegiate. In the middle of its fifth year ninety graduates of colleges were enrolled among its students, twenty of whom hold fellowships; four scientific journals are published; and there are excellent collections of apparatus and books adapted to research.

Within the last few years there has been a loud call for collegiate education for women. To a limited extent, some of the colleges for men have been opened to women; but at the present time more favor seems to be given to women; and the foundations which have moulded our affairs, and given to this country its present standing as an enlightened and prosperous republic, belong to the order of the Jesuits; and it stood under the protectors or special authority of a committee of six cardinals. The committee was to communicate with trustworthy emissaries in Germany; and those emissaries had to select among the Germans, Frisians, Swiss, and Scandinavians, a number of young men between sixteen and twenty-one. These colleges also gave the Jesuits a position in a general way, and specially endowed with an easy, pleasant, and impressive address. Before leaving Germany, the young men were informed of the method and purpose of the institution; and before adopted as pupils, generally after the lapse of a year of probation, they took an oath to labor for the Roman-Catholic Church as long as they lived, to go, without a moment's hesitation, at the time and to the place appointed by the protectors, not to try to evade their assumed task by entering a monastical order, etc. By this means the Roman-Catholic Church hoped to create an effective propaganda among the German heretics, — able disputants connected with their adversaries by the secret sympathy of common race, common language, etc. Gregory XIII. founded a number of similar colleges in Rome, — a Greek (1577), an English (1579), a Maronite (1584), an Illyrian, a Hungarian, etc. The Hungarian college was in 1584 connected with the German (see Julius Cordara: Collegii Germanici et Hungarici Historia, Rome, 1770). Some of these colleges died out, but others were added. Also the constitution of the whole congregation de propaganda fide underwent some changes, especially in 1622. But the idea on which the institution was based proved a fertile and vigorous one. See Urban Cerri: Etat present de l'Eglise Catholique, Amsterdam, 1716; Notizia Statistica delle Missioni Catholiche in tutto il Mondo, Rome, 1844, pp. 21–27; Meijer: Die Propaganda, Gottingen, 1859, Part I. pp. 78–91, 225–245. COLLEGIAL or COLLEGIATE CHURCHES, in contradistinction to cathedral churches, are in the Roman-Catholic Church served by a body of canons, regular or secular, living together in college, and in the Anglican Church by a dean and a number of canons; while the cathedral churches are always served by a bishop. In New-York City the term "Collegiate Church" is applied to a corporation in the Reformed (Dutch) Church, which owns a large amount of property, in the possession of three churches, with their mission-churches. Out of the income the ministers' salaries and other expenses are paid. The fact of several clergy upon an equality in the government of the same body of communicants is true also of several other churches in the country; but the term "collegiate" is not so commonly applied to these latter churches.

COLLEGIALISM, or COLLEGIAL SYSTEM, a technical term denoting a peculiar conception of the relation between Church and State, which developed in the ecclesiastical jurisprudence of Germany during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The name, first used by J. H. Böhner of Halle, was derived from the Roman law, which, before Constantine, considered the Christian congregations a collegia illicita.

The Reformation assumed that the enforcement of the First Commandment belonged to the office of the divinely-instituted State government. In Germany, consequently, every petty state had its own church; and it was considered part of the government's duty to exclude any other form of religious worship but the true one from the territory. In Switzerland the Reformed Church was organized on exactly the same principle as the Lutheran Church in Germany. — as a State institution, founded, maintained, and superintended by the secular government. As soon, however, as the Reformation penetrated into France, where it met with a decided opposition from the side of the State authority, the Reformed Church was compelled to organize itself as an independent, self-governing association; and in Germany, too, various circumstances soon made a re-organization on a modified principle necessary, as, for instance, when the peace of Westphalia (1648) placed several churches on equal terms on the same territory. With the altered practice followed an altered theory. In his Physico-Theologic de Jure Belli et Pacis (1625) Hugo Grotius defined the State as an association based on a contract, by which each member sacrifices a certain portion of his individual freedom in order to have the enjoyment of the rest guaranteed by the association. In his De Habitu Religionis Christianae ad Vitam Civilem (1686) Pufendorff declared that religious and religious worship did not belong to that portion of his freedom which an individual sacrifices by entering the State; and Pufendorff's school at Halle further developed collegialism, or the collegial system, as the true view of the relation between Church and State. The last step was taken by C. M. Pfaff in his Akademische Reisen über das Kirchenrecht, Tübingen, 1742, in which he demonstrates the contradiction between the innate principle of the Christian Church herself, and that principle upon which she actually had been organized in Germany. It must be noticed, however, that even Pfaff tries to prove by a curious and artificial train of reasoning that the actual organization, though flatly contradicting the natural principle, is, nevertheless, perfectly just.

COLLEGIANS, or RHYNGBURGERS, a confederation of the Remonstrants formed by three peasants, Johann, Adrian, and Gilbert van der Cocke, and the fisherman Anton Cornelison, who afterwards were joined by Dr. Kamphuysen. During the persecutions which resulted from the synod of Dort, the scattered Arminians held their meetings at Warmond, in the neighborhood of Leyden. But soon the above-mentioned persons and their followers separated, and held independent meetings, which they called colleges, in the neighboring village of Rhynsburg. They adopted prophecy, and called themselves prophets. In many respects they resembled the Quakers. They rejected all symbolical books and a regular ministry. He who was called upon by the Spirit stood forth and preached. To serve in war, to hold a civil office, they considered incompatible with Christianity. Like the Anabaptists, they used immolation at baptism. The sect spread rapidly in Holland and West Friesland, but became extinct in the latter part of the eighteenth century.

COLLIER, Jeremy, b. at Stow-cum-Qui, Cambridgeshire, Sept. 23, 1650; d. in London, April 26, 1726. He took his M.A. at Cambridge, 1676; entered the ministry, but at the Revolution he refused to take the oaths, and was imprisoned (1689 and 1692) for advocating the cause of James II. In 1697 he won considerable fame by his Essays upon several Moral Subjects, of which a second series appeared 1705, and a third 1709. The essays cover much ground, and are interesting, and in their way valuable. In 1698 he issued A Short View of the Profaneness and Immorality of the English Stage, a vigorous attack which was as vigorously resisted, but resulted in the reformation of the stage. The most valuable of his works is An Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain, to the End of the Reign of Charles II. (1708–18), new edition, with life of the author, London, 1840, 3 vols. He also translated and continued Morery's Great Historical, Geographical, Genealogical, and Poetical Dictionary (1701–21), and translated the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius, London, 1701.

COLLINS, Anthony, an English deist; b. at Heston, in Middlesex, June 21, 1676; d. in London, Dec. 13, 1729. He was a country gentleman, educated at Eton and Cambridge, a pacifist, a justifier of peace, and the intimate friend of Locke. His best known work is A Discourse of Free-thinking, occasioned by the Rise and Growth of a Sect called Freethinkers, London, 1713. This was attacked, and, in the judgment of most, demolished, by Bentley, under the pseudonym of Philalethes Lysiasticus. Swift also wrote against it a pamphlet in his inimitable style, Mr. Collins's Discourse of Free-thinking, put into plain English, by way of abstract, for the use of the Poor. Collins tried to prove that all sound belief must be based on free inquiry, and, further, that the adoption of rationalistic principles would involve the abandonment of a belief in supernaturalism. The book was weak, the critics were strong; and Collins went to Holland to avoid the storm he had raised. Nevertheless, he soon returned again, and renewed the attack. In 1715 appeared his brief Inquiry Concerning Human Liberty, a defense of necessitarianism. In 1724 he published his Discourse on the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion, to show, that since the fulfillment of prophecy is the only valid proof of Christianity, and such fulfillment is only accomplished by fraud, or at least by unwarranted liberty with the text, therefore Christianity has no valid proof. In reply to Edward Chandler (see title), he wrote Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered (1727). These three works, as well as his earlier, Vindication of the Design of the Scriptures, are an attempt to show that the inspired truth can attain to a true, even if limited, knowledge of the divine attributes, and Priestcraft in Perfection (1709), an attack on the clergy, were published anonymously; but the authorship was really no secret. See also, in Schleiermacher's correspondence with C. G. von der Osten, the Three Holy Kings, of themartyrs Felix and Nabor, of St. Apollinaris, and other relics which were added to the fame of the Church. Conrad founded the cathedral in 1248, but was by the unruly citizens compelled to remove the residence to Bonn.

COLLIN, Daniel Georg Conrad von, b. at Oerlinghausen, in the principality of Lippe-Detmold, Dec. 21, 1788; d. at Breslau, Feb. 17, 1833; studied theology at Marburg, Tubingen, and Gottingen, and was appointed professor of theology at Marburg in 1810, and at Breslau in 1818. In 1830 he published, together with his friend David Schulz, Uber theologische Lehrfreiheit, which called forth from Schleiermacher a Send- schreiben, in Theol. Studien und Kritiken, 1831, pp. 1–39, also in Schleiermacher's Sammtliche Werke, P. 1, vol. 5, p. 697. Collin was a moderate rationalist, and his treatise a warning against certain orthodox formulas. In his Sendgeschreiben, Schleiermacher said that a rationalist might use orthodox formulas without any hesitation, mentally reserving his own conception; which remark caused much astonishment, and was vehemently attacked. Collin and Schulz also published Zwei Antwortsschreiben, Leipzig, 1831. Besides a number of articles to periodicals, and minor essays, Collin's principal work is his Biblische Theologie, Leipzig, 1836, 2 vols., of which especially the Old Testament part is highly valued. See his biography by David Schulz, prefixed to his Biblische Theologie.

COLLYRDIANS, according to Epiphanius (Heres, 78), a party of enthusiastic women in Arabia, who considered themselves priestesses of Mary, and, on the day consecrated in her honor, observed the same mysteries, in the presence of King Osway, at Whitby, a public debate upon the Easter controversy and other points then in dispute between the Scoio-Irish and the Anglo-Catholic. Defeated by popular vote, Colman, accompanied by all his Irish, and thirty of his English monks, returned to the parent Monastery of Hy, Ireland. In 668 he removed to the Island of Inishbofinne, now Inishbofin, off the coast of Mayo. Dissensions arising between his Irish and English monks, he placed the latter in a new monastery at Mayo, but lived himself on the island.

COLMAN, Benjamin, D.D., b. at Boston, Oct. 19, 1673; d. there Aug. 29, 1747. He was graduated at Harvard College 1692, ordained in London, Aug. 4, 1699, as pastor of the Brattle-street Church, Boston, of which he was the first minister. He was made D.D., by the University of Glasgow, 1731. He published several volumes of sermons, besides pamphlets and smaller writings. See the list in his bibliographical catalogue preceding his Apology to Dr. Dexter's Congregationalism (N.Y., 1880), in addition, Evangelical Sermons, Collected (1707, 1722, 3 vols.), Poem on Elijah's Translation (1707), Observation on Inoculation (1720, 1727, 3 vols.), Poem on Elijah's Translation (1707), Observation on Inoculation (1720), Treatise on Family Worship (1730). COLOGNE, situated on the Rhine, and now a city of about a hundred and forty thousand inhabitants, was from very old times a place of importance, and has at various times played a conspicuous part in church history. It was the chief seat of the Ului. When conquered by the Romans, it rose rapidly. Agrippina, the daughter of Germanicus, and the spouse of Claudius, was born there, and planted a Roman colony there: hence the name of the place, Colonia Agrippinensis.

In the beginning of the fourth century the city was Christian, and the seat of a bishop. In 318, on occasion of the Donatistic controversies, Macternus is mentioned as Bishop of Cologne; and in 314 his name is found, under the acts of the Council of Arles. But in 350 the city was taken by the Franks, and Christianity had to labor under very difficult circumstances till the conversion of Clovis (496). In the hands of the Franks the city was the metropolis of Germanic tribes. It was the metropolis of Germanic tribes. It was the seat of the Ubii. When conquered by the Franks, and Christianity had to labor under very difficult circumstances till the conversion of Clovis (496). In the hands of the Franks the city was the metropolis of the Ripuarians until the time of Charlemagne, when it was incorporated with the empire. Hildebalb, Bishop of Cologne (793–806), was by Charlemagne made archepiscopatus in 794, and as archbishop in 799; the dioceses of Utrecht, Liège, Bremen, Münster, Osnabrück, and Minden, forming his province. The territory, however, of the new archbishopric, underwent many modifications. In 834 it lost Bremen, which was transferred to Hamburg. Nevertheless the see grew in power and influence both in power and wealth. Archbishop Heribert (999–1021) was chancellor of the German Empire, and received the electoral dignity.

Among the most prominent of the archbishops of Cologne are Rainald of Dassel (1159–67) and Conrad of Hochstaden (1238–61). Rainald was a great friend of Frederic I., who conferred many and large donations on the see, mostly, though, of Italian estates, which soon were lost. From Italy, Rainald brought to Cologne the remains of the Three Holy Kings, of the martyrs Felix and Nabor, of St. Apollinaris, and other relics which were added to the fame of the Church. Conrad founded the cathedral in 1248, but was by the unruly citizens compelled to remove the residence to Bonn. Hermann V. (1615–48) favored the Reformation, but was excommunicated and deposed. Gebhard II. (1777–83) openly embraced Protestantism, but was also deposed and excommunicated. For nearly two centuries the see was occupied by Bavarian princes, who squandered its wealth, neglected the discipline, and coquetted with France. Joseph Clemens (1688–1723) was only eighteen years old when he was enthroned. Clemens August I., who was only fifteen years old when he was made Bishop of Ratibson, was Bishop of Hildesheim and of Osnabruch, and Grand Master of the Teutonic order, at the same time he was Archbishop of Cologne. Under Anton Victor, a son of the Emperor Leopold II., the archbishopric was secularized (1801); one part of its territory falling to France, others to Nassau, Hesse-Darmstadt, etc.

By the Congress of Vienna (1815) the territory was partitioned together, and laid under the Prussian crown; and in 1824 the archbishopric was re-established. But the relation between the Roman-Catholic archbishop at Cologne and the Protestant minister of state at Berlin soon became very difficult, and under Droste-Vischering (1835-43) it came to a crisis. The troubles arose from the mixed marriages. Droste-Vischering forbade his priests to sanction any such marriage, unless both parties promised that all the children should be educated in the Roman-Catholic faith; and the Prussian minister, Altenstein, answered by having the archbishop arrested (1837). The case ended with a compromise (1840) equally unsatisfactory to both parties.

The Cathedral of Cologne—one of the most famous, and also one of the finest, specimens of Gothic architecture—was founded in the 13th century (1248). In 1292 the choir was consecrated, and in 1337 the southern tower was ready to receive its bells. From that time, and up to the middle of the present century, the work with the building proceeded very slowly: at times it stopped altogether. But in 1842 Friedrich Wilhelm IV. of Prussia appointed a sum of fifty thousand dollars a year for the completion of the structure, and a building association was formed. Rich contributions came in from everywhere in Germany; and on Oct. 15, 1880, the completed Catholic cathedral was consecrated in the presence of the Protestant Emperor, William I., and his Protestant court, while the archbishop was absent, being in exile. The length of the building is four hundred and eighty feet; the breadth, two hundred and eighty-two feet; the height of the central aisle, a hundred and fifty-four feet; that of the hundred and fifty looped curtains. Exclusively blue and white were the breeches and mitre of the high priest. Exclusively blue was the robe of the high priest. Exclusively blue were the robe, the lace of the high priest's ephod, girdle, and breastplate of the high priest. Exclusively white were the breeches and mitre of the high priest. The cloths for wrapping the sacred vessels were either blue, scarlet, or purple. White were also the clothes of the lower priests. Added to this the blue ribbon and the fringe of the Hebrew dress, we perceive at once the use and application of the colors used in the Hebrew service. The red is only used once (Exod. xxvi. 14). Black is excluded everywhere, as well as yellow and green; which is significant. That purple, blue, scarlet, and white were used only is not merely accidental, but rather the outgrowth of the consciousness of their significance. The reason for the use of the white to the total exclusion of the black is easy to perceive. Black, as it absorbs all colors, and thus buries the complexion of the skin is redder than ruddy when we have clothes on the garments before noticed.}

Looking at the artificial colors, we notice (1) the purple. This color was obtained from the secretion of a species of shell-fish found in various parts of the Mediterranean Sea, especially on the coasts of Phoenicia. Robes of this color were worn by kings (Judg. viii. 20) and by the highest officers, civil and religious (comp. Esth. viii. 15; Dan. v. 7, 16, 29; 2 Macc. iv. 38). Purple dresses were also worn by the wealthy and luxurious (Jer. x. 10; Ezek. xxvii. 7). Next to purple we notice (2) scarlet. This dye was produced from an insect somewhat resembling the cochineal, which is found in considerable quantities in Armenia and other Eastern countries. Robes of this color were worn by the luxurious (2 Sam. i. 24; Prov. xxxi. 21; Jer. iv. 9; Lam. iv. 5), and it was also the appropriate hue of a warrior's dress, from its similarity to blood (Nah. ii. 3). (3) Blue, or rather violet. This dye was also procured from a species of shell-fish found on the coast of Phoenicia, and was used in the same way as purple, as the color of dresses worn by the princes and nobles (Ezek. xxiii. 6); and Babylonian idols were clothed in robes of this tint (Jer. x. 9). Another red color was the vermilion, a pigment used in fresco-painting, either for drawing figures of idols on the walls of temples (Ezek. xxiii. 14), or for decorating the walls and beams of houses (Jer. xxii. 14).

Symbolical Significance of the Colors.—Purple, blue, scarlet, and white are the four colors of the Mosaic cultus. The four were used in combination in the outer curtains, the veil, the entrance-curtain, and the gate of the court, as also in the high priest's ephod, girdle, and breastplate of the high priest. The first three, viz., purple, blue, and scarlet, were used in the pomegranates about the hem of the robe of the high priest. Exclusively blue were the robe of the high priest, the lace of the high priest's breastplate, the lace on his mitre, and the fifty loops of the curtains. Exclusively white were the breeches and mitre of the high priest. The cloths for wrapping the sacred vessels were either blue, scarlet, or purple. White were also the clothes of the lower priests. Added to this the blue ribbon and the fringe of the Hebrew dress, we perceive at once the use and application of the colors used in the Hebrew service. The red is only used once (Exod. xxvi. 14). Black is excluded everywhere, as well as yellow and green; which is significant. That purple, blue, scarlet, and white were used only is not merely accidental, but rather the outgrowth of the consciousness of their significance. The reason for the use of the white to the total exclusion of the black is easy to perceive. Black, as it absorbs all colors, and thus buries the light, is the symbol of death, and of every thing that tends towards death. But life, light, holiness, and joy, on the one hand, and cessation, death, darkness, malice, and sorrow, on the other hand, are biblical contrasts, of which white and black are the representatives of this twofold series of opposites. White, however, reflects the light: hence it symbolizes purity and victory. Whilst the third rider of the Apocalypse sits on a black horse, bringing with him famine, and with it death (Rev. vi. 5), the Persian horses in the eighth vision of Zechariah are white, because no worldly power had ever shown a more noble disposition towards Israel than the dynasty of the Achaemenides, which set the exiles free, and promoted the building of the temple. The first of the four apocalyptic riders has a white horse; for he went forth to conquer. The "Ancient of days," i.e., the Ever-living (Dan. vii. 9), appears in a garb scarlet along with the white in the high priest's vestments. White, however, reflects the light: hence we understand why the garments of the high priest were white. When the high priest wore the so-called golden robes over the white ones, and in the temple which Ezekiel saw in his vision the priests wore white garments only. The robes of the priests are, according to their natural color, white, as the angels and blessed appeared to the seers, and as the garments of Jesus became white, whilst on the mount of transfiguration, "like the light." White is the color of the light; and what the light is to the natural world God is above all, and to every creature. He is light, and gives light, or he is holy, i.e., holy love. Suppose that the colors in the garments of the priests have reference to their office, viz., to act as the medium between God and his congregation, it will be their duty to go before the people in holiness and purity.

Connected with white is its opposite, the fox-color of the scarlet, as the emblem of fire. The red horses in the first vision of Zechariah bring about bloody war; and the fox-colored, a consuming fire. But light and fire are opposites according to the ethical idea of Holy Writ; viz., the light is the symbol of communicating love, the fire, that of consuming anger. When Isaiah describes the sins of his people, he speaks of them as being red like scarlet, not like purple. The scarlet along with the white in the high priest's garment means, therefore, to say that he is not only the servant of the God of love, but also of the God of anger. As to the purple and blue, which are always connected, be it along with white, with scarlet, or between, as they are two kinds of one and the same purple color, which again is not a natural but an artificial color, consisting of red and violet, they refer to a twofold attribute of the royal King,—the purple to the majesty of God in his glory, and the blue to God's majesty in his condescension. The purple of the garments of the high priest denotes, therefore, that he is a servant of that God of whom the song at the Red Sea says, "The Lord will reign forever!" (Exod. xvi. 19); and the song of Moses, "And he was king over Israel." (Deut. xxxiii. 5). The red color of the red heifer, whose ashes, mixed with water, were to be used in purification of the unclean, had also a symbolical signification. Red is the color of blood, which, again, is the life. The animal intended as antidote against uncleanness through contact with a dead body was to be without blemish, and upon which never came yoke, and thus was represented in its color a picture of fresh and vigorous life. Maybe that the colors of the twelve precious stones which were on the breastplate of the high priest had a symbolical significance as to their relation to the twelve tribes whose names were engraved on them (Exod. xxviii. 17–21). This, at least, may be derived from Jewish tradition. [Compare the art. Farben (Eng. "colors") in the Bible dictionaries of Smith, Winer, Hamburger, Riehm, and Schenkel. See also BÄHR: Symbolik des mosaischen Cultus, Heidelberg, 1857–58, i. pp. 303 sq.].

COLOSSIANS. This Phrygian city was situated upon the Lycus, a branch of the Meander, twelve miles above Laodicea. In ancient days it was an important place, standing as it did on the line of travel from Eastern to Western Asia: but after the time of Cyrus it declined; so that when Paul wrote his Epistle the city was in a state he is now extinct. Lightfoot says it "was without doubt the least important church to which any Epistle of Paul was addressed. Not a single event in Christian history is connected with its name; and its very existence is only rescued from oblivion, when, at long intervals, some bishop of Colosse attaches his signature to the decree of an ecclesiastical synod." The variation in the spelling of the name is an indication of the insignificance of the place. Should it be Colosse, or Colasse? The Codex Sinaiticus gives Cólossoi in the title, and, i. 2, Kólossoi, but, in the headings of the pages and the subscription, Kόλοσσοι. The former spelling is found upon coins and in classical authors, and seems to be the correct, the latter the vulgar, form.

The church at Colosse was not founded by Paul, but probably by Epaphras, during Paul's three-years' sojourn at Ephesus (A.D. 54–57).

COLUMBIA, St., or Columbille: b. at Gartan, County Donegal, 7th December, 521; d. at Iona, Whit Tuesday, 9th June, 597. Like many of the Celtic saints, he was of princely descent; and this, no doubt, contributed to his influence, and perhaps to the biemishes, as well as to the virtues, of his character. He was educated in part under St. Finnian of Moville, and in part under St. Finnian of Clonard, from whose school so many noble missionaries sprang. He early gave himself to mission-work in his native country, and, previous to his departure from it, had founded many religious houses—monasteries in form, Christian colonies in reality,—in the midst of a still barbarous people. The chief of these were Derry, founded in 546, and Durrow, erected in 553. The cause usually assigned for his expatriation from Ireland is the part he took in a great contest in vindication of the right of sanctuary in his monasteries, and stirring up war against the king who had violated it. For this he is said to have been excommunicated, and to have been forced, as a penance, to go voluntarily consigned to go into exile, that he might gain for Christ as many from among the Pagans as he had occasioned the loss of among the Christians of Ireland.
But he was thoroughly actuated by the missionary spirit, then so characteristic of his countrymen; and his expatriation is more likely to have been prompted by this, and desire to sustain and promote the cause of Christianity in Alban, which seemed to be threatened by the misfortunes of the Dalriadic Scots under his relative, King Conal. With twelve like-minded companions, he sailed from Derry in 563, in a currach, or skiff, of wicker-work covered with hides; and touching first at Colonsay, and then, according to some, at the chief fort of his relative on the mainland, he passed on to the little island since made famous by his residence and labors,—the Island of Iona, Iona, or, as Dr. Reeves says it should be written, Iova. (See Iona.) Bede says that this island was presented to him by the Picts; but the Irish annalists claim the credit of the gift for his relative, the king of the Dalriadic Scots. Probably the concurrence of both was sought for the greater security of the infant establishment as a home for himself and his companions, a centre of missionary work among surrounding Paganas, and a shelter for such converts as might be led to lead a more thorough Christian life than they could among their Pagan relatives. After erecting a humble monastery, according to the custom of his country, he set himself to gain for Christ the nearer Pictish tribes. Having met with some success among these, he next essayed to visit Brude, the king of the whole nation, in his fort by the Ness, to make known the truth to him. We may dismiss as legendary the details of his biographer as to the miracles he wrought to secure access to the reluctant king, believing, with Bede, that it was his teaching and holy life that ultimately gained for the hearts of the king and the nation; and holding that the real miracle needed was his love and inspired with awe, not only his enemies, but his votaries, as if his motto were that afterwards appropriated by his adopted country,—"Nemo me impune lacessit." But all in all his character was a singularly noble one, and he deserves to be held in lasting remembrance as the Apostle of Caledonia. Twenty-four churches or other religious foundations are said by Dr. Reeves to have been dedicated to him in Pictland, and thirty-two in other parts of Scotland, and thirty-seven in Ireland. Three Latin hymns of considerable beauty are attributed to him; and in the ancient Irish Liber Hymnorum, in which they are reserved, there is also a preface to each, describing the occasion on which it was composed. Some Irish poems have also been ascribed to him, but apparently without so satisfactory evidence, though they are undoubtedly ancient.

COLUMBANUS, b. in Leinster, Ireland, about 543; d. in Bobbio, 615; was educated at Bangor; went thence to south of Pavia, he found a new monastery, and incorporated with the realm of the Salian Franks. Columban once more was homeless. He went to Italy, and obtained the protection of Agilulf, King of the Lombards. On the Trebia, south of Pavia, he founded a new monastery, Bobbio, which soon became a prominent centre of learning and study. There he died, according to his Labyrinth der Weit und Paradies des Herzens, etc. But while his greatest fame he attained as a pedagogue, his Geöffnete Sprachentir and Orbis Pictus were translated into all European languages; the former even into Persian and Arabic, and reprinted over and over again for two centuries. He was specially invited to England (by Ported from Egypt horses for himself and other kings. Ships were built for him in Eziongeber, which, with Hiram’s ships, used to sail into the Indian Ocean, and every three years brought back gold, silver, ivory, etc. (1 Kings ix. 26, x. 11; 2 Chron. viii. 17, ix. 10). After Solomon’s death the maritime trade declined, and an attempt made by Jehoshaphat to revive it proved unsuccessful (1 Kings xxii. 48, 49). After the exile the places of public market were chiefly the open spaces near the gates, to which goods were brought for sale by those who came from the outside; and the traders in later times were allowed to intrude into the temple, in the outer courts of which, victims were publicly sold for the sacrifices (Zech. xiv. 21; Matt. xxi. 12; John ii. 14). Under the Maccabees, Joppa was fortified (1 Macc. xiv. 34), and Herod the Great made Cesarea a port. But all trade was mainly in the hands of the Greeks; and the Jews did not care much for it, as long as they lived in the land of their fathers, and could devote themselves to agriculture. Pharisaean separatism from the uncircumcised, it is true, quenched the spirit of traffic; although the prophets Hosea (xii. 7), Amos (ii. 8 sq.), Micah (vi. 1 sq.) had greatly to complain against injustice and unfairness in dealing. Their present position in the commercial world, the Hebrews owe in part to their exile among other nations, in part to the position which they occupy among such nations, which excluded them from political rights. COMMINATION (threatening) SERVICE is an addition to the usual service on Ash-Wednesday in the Church of England, so called from the opening address, or exhortation to repentance, which contained a list of God’s curses against sin. It was a substitute introduced by the Reformers for the sprinkling of ashes on Ash-Wednesday.

COMMODIANUS, b. at Gaza in Syria, and educated in Paganism; was by the reading of the Bible led to Christianity, and stands in the history of the Church as one of her first Latin poets. Two of his works are still extant.—Instructiones, consisting of eighty acrostics of partly apologetic and polemical contents, partly parenetical, written in the third decade of the third century, first edited by Rigaltius, Toul, 1650, last by Oehler, in Gersdorff’s Biblioth. Patr. Eccles. Lat., XIII., Leipzig, 1847; and Carmen Apologeticum, consisting of ten hundred and fifty-three verses, written in 26 of the first century, was printed from the Spranger edition, Paris, 1852, T. I., last by Rünsch, in Zeitschrift f. d. histor. Theologie, XI., 1872. In both poems the author shows himself to be addicted to Chiliasm and Patrapiasmian. In formal respect it is noticeable that he models his verses, not on the principle of quantity, but on the principle of accent. A new edition has been given by Ed. Ludwig, Leipzig, 1877. KEBET.

COMMODUS, Roman emperor from 180 to 192; succeeded his father, Marcus Aurelius, but resembled him very little. Not from any just appreciation of Christianity, but from utter indifference to all religion, he left the Christians at peace. According to Dio Cassius (72, 4) it was his concubine Marcia, who, though not a Christian herself, induced him to stop the persecutions. Irenæus says (Adv. Haer., 4, 30) that Christians held positions, even in the imperial palace. As the laws against the Christians still existed, instances of martyrdom continued to occur. Thus the senator Appollonius was decapitated.

COMMUNICATIO IDIOMATICUM, a dogmatical term, referring to the relation between the divine and the human nature as united in the one person of Christ. While the ancient church, during the Nestorian, Monophysitic, and Monotheletic controversies, confined itself to simply asserting the fact of the personal union of the two natures, the Lutheran theologians, in the dogmatic interest of their doctrine of the church, undertook to expound its internal relations, which resulted in the doctrine of an actual transfer of attributes or properties of the one nature to the other. There are logically (on the basis of the Chalcedonian dyophysitism) four possible kinds of this interchange of attributes, — (1) The communication of attributes of one nature to the whole person (genus idiom tabicum); (2) The execution of personal acts and functions by one of the two natures (genus apotelesmaticum); (3) The transfer of divine attributes to the human nature (genus majestaticum); (4) The transfer of human attributes to the divine nature (genus kenoticum or tapeinoticum). The first three were adopted and taught by the Formula of Concord (1577) and the scholastic Lutherans of the seventeenth century. The fourth was rejected on the ground of the unchangeableness of the divine nature, but has been adopted by the modern Kenoticists, as Thomasius, Gess, and others. The whole theory is very artificial. The Reformed and Anglican churches rejected the third kind as destructive of the necessary limitations of the human nature of Christ, to which the Lutherans ascribed omnipotence, omnipresence, and omniscience, even in the state of his humiliation. The most recent work on the subject is HERMANN SCHULZ: Die Lehre von der Gottheit Christi. Communicatio Idiomatum, Gotha, 1881. There is also a long article on this title by Schenkel, in Herzog, ed. I., and one by H. Frank, in Herzog, ed. II. See art. CHRISTOLOGY.

COMMUNION. See LORD'S SUPPER.

COMMUNION OF THE DEAD. See DEAD, DECEASED.

COMMUNION OF SAINTS, a dogmatic expression in the third article of the Apostles' Creed: "I believe in the Holy [Catholic] Church, the communion of saints." In the creeds in the church of Jerusalem (Acts ii. 44, 45) and in the church at Aquileja, in Rufinus' Expositio Symboli, it is explained of the Christian Church, made up, from the beginning, of the saints. The words express the common Christian idea that in the Church one enjoys the society of the saints, shares in their divine gifts, and looks forward to the communion of saints. In the creed, closely linked with such communion, are the ideas of the forgiveness of sins, and eternal life; for in the communion of the Church one attains to these things. This is with the Catholic Church expressed in the development of her ideas of the saints, and of communion with them, in the explanation given in the Roman Catechism of the phrase, — Communion is in the sacraments and other gracious gifts to the Church, and in the fellowship of her members. The communion of saints is therefore only in the Roman-Catholic Church. Distinction is made between the faithful upon the earth, the saints in heaven, and the souls in purgatory: yet are these classes one; so that the saints' prayers avail for those on earth, while prayers, masses, and good works help.

The churches of the Reformation rejected these ideas. Luther declared the Church was the body of believers, who by faith were saints: hence the phrase was exegetical of the "Holy Church." So, also, the Reformed Church at first in its formula, the Helvetian Confession of 1500. Calvin, however, did not accept the phrase in this way, but rather as a description of a peculiarity of the Church; for he says (Bk. IV., chap. I., § 6), "It excellently expresses the character of the Church; as though it had been said that the saints are united in the fellowship of Christ on this condition that whatever benefits God bestows upon them they should mutually communicate to each other." He is followed in the Genevan and Heidelberg Catechisms, and in the Westminster Confession. J. KOSTLIN.

COMMUNISM means the abolition of personal property, or the surrender of all individual rights in property to the community, which acts as the proprietor proper in all relations, both to other communities and to its own members. Whether the communistic character of the primitive Church of Jerusalem (Acts ii. 44, 45) was the result of incidental circumstances, or whether there is in Christianity an innate tendency towards communism, has been a much debated question, differently answered, for instance, by the Church of England and the Moravian Society. But none, except sectarian fanatics such as Thomas Müntzer, have ever held that communism was an essential element of Christian life (comp. Lamennais). Whenever communism has been practised by small communities, and as an appendix to, or natural consequence of, a religious principle, it has proved successful. The history of monasticism gives ample illustrations; lay-societies also, as, for instance, the Beghards. But preached or practised simply as a principle of national economy, as the only means to reconcile the millionaire and the proletaire, it has always ended in foolishness and failure. See REYNAUD: Réformateurs Moderns, Paris, 1843; SUDRE: Histoire du Communism, Paris, 1850; NORDHOFF: Communist Societies of the United States, New York, 1874. See SOCIALISM.

COMPETENTES. See CATECHETICS.

COMPLINE, or COMPLETINUM, or COMPLETORIUM, the last of the canonical hours for common prayer, celebrated respectively at the first, third, sixth, ninth, eleventh, and twelfth hour of the day. See Order of Compline according to the Iliustrous Church of Sarum, London, 1881. See CANONICAL HOURS.

COMPOSTELLA, The Order of the Knights of...
San Iago de. According to a Spanish tradition, the apostle James the Elder, son of Zebedee (Acts xii. 2), was beheaded in Jerusalem (44), came to Spain, and suffered martyrdom there. The place of his suffering was called ad Sanctum Jacobum Apostolum, or Giacomo Postolo: hence Compostella. The legend is first recorded in the ninth century by Walafrid Strabo, in his Poema de 12 Apostolis; and, though the Bollandists still maintain it, it has been abandoned even by Roman-Catholic writers, as, for instance, Natalis Alexander. Among the people, however, it always found much favor; and it made Compostella the most celebrated and most frequented place of pilgrimage in Spain. It also gave the name to one of the richest and most renowned military orders in Spain, founded in 1161 by Don Pedro Fernandez, confirmed by Coelestine III., and not dissolved until 1835.

COMPTON, Henry, Bishop of London; b. at Compton, 1632; d. at Fulham, near London, July 7, 1713. He was Bishop of Oxford, 1674, and in the following year transferred to London, made a privy-councillor, and intrusted with the education of the princesses Mary and Anne. His opposition to Roman Catholicism was firm, and cost him his councillorship, and his suspension on the accession of James II.; while his liberality toward the Nonconformists was unusually great. He joined the side of William and Mary in the Revolution, and crowned the king. His prosperity returned. He regained his former positions, and was appointed one of the revisers of the liturgy; but the close of his life was imbibed by his disappointment at not receiving the primacy. He wrote A Treatise of the Holy Communion (London, 1677), and translated from the Italian The Life of Donna Olympia Maladichini (1667), and from the French The Jesuits' Intrigues (1669).

COMTE, Auguste, the founder of the positivist school of philosophy, was b. at Montpellier, Jan. 12, 1798, and d. in Paris, Sept. 5, 1857. He entered the Ecole Polytechnique in 1814, and continued to live in Paris after the school was broken up in 1816, giving lessons in mathematics. For a short time he was tutor in the family of Casimir Périer. In 1818 he made the acquaintance of St. Simon, and soon became one of his most enthusiastic disciples. But the sustained energy and systematic power of the pupil could not fail to outgrow the authority of a master whose inspirations were mainly due to his loose mental habits. In 1824 a complete and violent breach took place. From St. Simon, however, Comte received the first impulse towards philosophy, a number of loose but brilliant ideas, and the whole informing tendency of his system.

In 1825 Comte married, and in 1826 he began the first series of lectures on positive philosophy. But after the third lecture he was overcome by a cerebral derangement, and for a whole year he was confined to his bed. In 1828 the humbug lectures were renewed. In 1830 the first volume of La Philosophie Positive was published. In 1833 Comte was appointed examiner at the admission to the Ecole Polytechnique, and in 1842 he finished his great work by the publication of the sixth volume. According to his general-plan, this work is simply a re-arrangement of the hierarchy of the sciences on a new principle,—the positive principle, in contradiction to the theological and metaphysical principles. Moving from the more simple and abstract to the more complex and concrete, the scale remains mathematics, astronomy, physics, chemistry, biology, and sociology. There seems to be nothing alarming in this. As here represented, positivism is a method, rather than a doctrine. It becomes a doctrine, however, partly by that which the method excludes (all inquiry into the causes of phenomena, all theology, all metaphysics), and partly by that which the method adds (a new science, the great panacea for all the sufferings to which flesh is heir,—sociology). Comte meant that the revolutionary state of modern society is solely due to the mental anarchy into which theology and metaphysics have led us. The only way out of this confusion is the positive philosophy; for the only cognition which can compel universal acceptance, and unite all minds into perfect agreement, is that which refuses to pay any regard to the cause of a phenomenon, and simply confines itself to ascertaining the law of the evolution of phenomena; and that is just the sole object and contents of positive philosophy. As soon, therefore, as the laws of social and political evolution are recognized in their positive shape, stripped of all theological and metaphysical dreams, new and satisfactory forms of social and political life will present themselves, and revolution will cease forever.

Some remarks in the preface to the sixth volume of La Philosophie Positive caused Comte's dismissal from his position at the Ecole Polytechnique in 1842: and from that time till his death "he lived as best he could," receiving support at one time (1842–45) from some English friends of J. Stuart Mill, and at another (after 1848) from public subscriptions. Other calamities were added. In 1842 he separated from his wife. Meanwhile he was busy with his Système de la Politique Positive, of which the first volume appeared in 1851. The second and last in 1854. It proposes to found a new religion,—the religion of humanity. But while positivism as a philosophical school has exercised, and is still exercising, a most powerful influence on modern civilization, positivism as a religion has proved a miserable failure. Comte describes the development of human intellect as having passed through two stages,—the theological, at which all phenomena are explained as the effects of hidden, supernatural, divine causes; and the metaphysical, at which the causes are defined as a kind of mystical entities, which form the real substance underlying all phenomena. These two stages passed, the third is reached,—the positive, at which no more questions are made about the causes of phenomena; only the laws of the evolution are ascertained. As this description is itself the definition of a law, it is evident that the positive or the positivist is the negation of the metaphysical or theological. But it has no God, either. Humanity is an ideal, and can never be made a god; and, at this time of the day, to try to press the development of mankind back to that moment when the Greek tragedy was produced, when the god was the idea, the religious feeling was only the slumbering on each other's bosoms, is simply futile. Still worse: in 1845 Comte fell desperately in love with Madame Clotilde de Vaux, who died in the following year; and, in his plans of organization which he laid for the Church of humanity, meditated for conducting a conclave in a most disagreeable manner with reminiscences from the palmyest days of the Roman-Catholic Church. It is true, as Mr. Morley says in the last edition of Encyclopedia Britannica, that the queer dreams of the Systeme de la Philosophie Positive, sc. of Fourier, not only foreshadowed in the earliest writings of Comte. But it is also true, as J. Stuart Mill says in his essay on Positivism, that there is “a gulf” between that book and the Philosophie Positive. The latter has a relation to theology; it excludes it: the former has none; it only counterfeits it.

Of La Philosophie Positive, Miss Harriet Martineau has given an excellent English condensation in 2 vols., London, 1853. The Catechism of Positivism was translated into English by Dr. Congreve in 1858; the Politique Positive, anonymously, in 1875-77. Essays on positivism have been written by J. Stuart Mill, Herbert Spencer, Huxley, etc. See also, Fiske: Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy, Bost., 1874, 2 vols.; Lewes: Biog. Hist. of Philosophy, Lond., N. Y., 4th ed., 1871, 2 vols. (vol. ii.).

CONCEPTION, Feast of, a festival of the Roman-Catholic Church which is celebrated Dec. 8, in honor of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary. See Immaculate Conception.

CONCEPTION OF OUR LADY, Nuns of the Order of. This religious order was founded by Beatrice, sister of James, First Count of Poralego, Portugal, in 1484; confirmed by Innocent Vili. 1489; given the rule of St. Clara by Cardinal Ximenes, but by Julius II. given a separate rule in 1511.

CONCEPTUALISM denotes an intermediate stand-point between nominalism and realism. Rejecting, on the one side, nominalism, which defines the universalia as merely subjective notions, as mere words (voces), and, on the other side, realism, which denies the very existence of all individual existence, Abelard tried to define the universalia as sermones; that is, as mental conceptions, which, though in themselves merely the result of an intellectual process, nevertheless corresponded to something real, existing in all individuality. The stand-point was afterwards more clearly defined by Petrus Lombardus and Albertus Magnus.

CONCLAVE means the assembly of cardinals convened in order to elect a new pope. Up to the latter part of the eleventh century, the pope was elected by the clergy and people of Rome; but by a decree of 1030 Nicholas II. gave the whole election into the hands of the cardinals, to the exclusion of the clergy and the people; and by a decree of 1179 Alexander III. constituted a majority of two-thirds of the conclave sufficient to make an election valid. At times, however, it proved very difficult to procure such a majority. When Clement IV. died at Viterbo (1268) seventeen months elapsed, and no agreement was arrived at. Bonaventura, the general of the Minorites, then induced the inhabitants of Viterbo to shut up the cardinals in the palace; and there they sat for a whole year, but still no agreement. Finally somebody hit upon the device of depriving the building of its roof, and exposing the electors to the whims of the weather; and the very same day Gregory X. was elected. This experience led the second council of Lyons (1374) to establish a number of minute rules for conducting a conclave, which, in the main, are still adhered to. The cardinals are absolutely separated from the surrounding world, the windows and doors of the assembly-room having been walled up, all but one. If no agreement has been arrived at after the lapse of three days, only one meal a day is served to the electors, and, after the lapse of eight days, only bread and wine, etc.

The method of electing generally used is the ballot; and, concerning this point, too, a number of minute rules have been established in order to prevent fraud. Every morning a ballot is cast, followed in the evening by an "accessit;" that is, if the morning ballot has led to no result, any of the electors is allowed to transfer his vote to that one of the candidates whom he can expect thereby to get elected. In spite of the minute rules, however, which govern the proceedings, and in spite of the solemn oath which binds the electors, the history of the papal conclave is crowded with the meanest and grossest frauds and intrigues which any election can present. See T. A. Trollope: On the Papal Conclaves.

CONCOMITANCE denotes the doctrine, that, when Christ’s body is present in the Eucharist, his blood is so too, and that, the godhead and manhood of Christ being inseparable, Christ himself, God and man, is present in the Eucharist when either his body or his blood is present. This doctrine forms the basis for the disciplinary rule of the Roman-Catholic Church, withholding the cup from the laity in the administration of the Lord’s Supper.

CONCORD, Formula of (Formula Concordiae), the last of the six symbolical books of the Lutheran Church, was issued on the fiftieth anniversary of the Augsburg Confession (June 25, 1550), and was signed by three electors, twenty dukes and princes, twenty-four counts, four barons, and thirty-five free cities. Since the death of Luther (1546) alarming dissensions had invaded the Church, and a split between the ultra-Lutheran orthodoxy and the Melanchthonian Crypto-Calvinism seemed imminent. The necessity of unity and concord was very strongly felt, however; and in 1567 Duke Christoph of Wurttemberg, and Landgrave William IV. of Hesse-Cassel, commissioned Jacob Andrei to draw up a formula, based upon the Confession of Augsburg, and capable of uniting all the Lutheran churches of Germany. The attempt failed; but in 1573 Andrei tried again, and the so-called Suabian Concordia—a remoulding of his famous six sermons On the Differences of the Lutheran Church—found much favor. On the instance of Duke Lewis of Wurttemberg and Margrave Charles of Baden, Lucas Osiander, Balthasar Bidebach, and Abel Schoerdinger composed, in 1575, the Formula of Maulbronn; and in the following year the Elector of Saxony invited a number of theologians to meet at Torgau, and to form, on the basis of these two formulas, a third one acceptable to all parties. The result was the so-called Book of Torgau, which was sent to all the Protestant princes of Germany, and on which the elector received no less than...

CONCORDANCE, from Latin concordare, to agree: hence a collection of passages which in one respect agree with one another. Concerences are of two kinds, verbal and topical: the first gives the exact place in the text where a certain word can be found; the second is an or dery analysis of the contents of the work. It is evident concordances can be made to any work, and we have them upon classic authors (e.g., Shakspeare, Milton, Pope, Tennyson, etc.); but in this article we treat of those upon the Bible, for which, of course, there has been most demand.

1. LATIN.— Cardinal Hugo de S. CARO (d. 1263) led the way. In 1244, with the help of five hundred Dominican monks, he prepared a concordance upon the Vulgate (see BELLARMIN: De Script. eccles. ad ann. 1245, pp. 247 sqq.) as an aid in his Commentary on the Bible. Since the vernacular was not yet used, each chapter divided arbitrarily into seven parts, which he designated by as many letters consecutively (e.g. terra, Gen. i. a; i.e., the word terra is in the first part of Gen. i.). The work was defective and short, as in the references merely words, and not sentences, were given. It was called Concordantia S. Jacobi, because Hugo prepared it at the Convent of St. Jacob, in Paris. The monks of this house found it most useful in preparing their sermons, but at the same time they recognized its defects; and so John of Derluzingon, Richard of Stavensby, and Hugo of Croydon (about 1250) set about to correct it by the repeated challenges of his Christian companions, and, in his search after materials for an answer, lighted upon a Latin Bible concordance. By diligent use of this he repelled the attacks, and, having tested its great utility, determined to prepare a concordance to the Hebrew Bible, which he conceived would be more useful than a mere translation of the Latin. Accordingly he began the work in 1438, and finished it, having called in many helpers, in 1448. He kept the chapter-divisions of the Vulgate, but added verse-divisions of his own. The concordance was printed at Venice, by Daniel Bomberg, in the year 1524, under the title De Alemannia Ord. Praedic. Concordantiae Bibliorum, etc., Argentorati (Strassburg), c. 1470, 2d ed., 1475. Bindesil, in his monograph, Uber die Concordanzen (Theol. Studien und Kritiken, 1870), the basis of this article, gives a list of sixty-four concordances to the Vulgate, substantially reprint of the first edition. The last is by F. P. DUTRIPON: Bibliorum Sacrorum Concordantiae, 7th ed., Paris, 1880.

II. HEBREW.—The first Hebrew concordance was made by Rabbi ISAAC (or MORDECAI) NATHAN. The origin of the work, according to the author's preface, was the supposed defect of his predecessor's concordance, which, it is evident concordances can be made to any work, and we have them upon classic authors (e.g., Shakspeare, Milton, Pope, Tennyson, etc.); but in this article we treat of those upon the Bible, for which, of course, there has been most demand.

II. HEBREW.—The first Hebrew concordance was made by Rabbi ISAAC (or MORDECAI) NATHAN. The origin of the work, according to the author's preface, was the supposed defect of his predecessor's concordance, which, of course, there has been most demand. Editions of this work appeared subsequently at Venice (1564) and at Basel (1581), while the longer were, as usual, divided into seven (letters a-g), and by reducing the number of words or parts, the Nicolaites, John, which materially reduced its size. This new sort of concordance entirely supplanted the old, and was the one printed. The influence of this concordance is seen in the printing upon the margin of the Vulgate, even as late as 1826, in an edition printed at Frankfort, which contains one concordence to divide the chapters. During the Council of Trent (1431–49) a grave defect in the concordance was discovered. John of Ragusa, a very learned man (d. 1444), held an animated discussion with Bohemians at the council, upon the true meaning; in the Bible, of the particle nisi, and later, with Greeks at Constantinople, wither the council had sent him, over the true meaning of per and ex. But the concordance failed him just here; for it did not contain particles. He determined to remedy this defect, and, unable himself to command the time, intrusted the task to the Spanish doctor of theology JOHN OF SUABIA, who alphabetically arranged the particles, and then, in 1437, published the work, with an historical introduction. Sebastian Brant carried the first edition of it through the press of John Peter and John Froben, in Basel, 1496, under the title Concordantiae partium sincerorum, or, dictionum indeclinabilium totius Bibliæ ("Concordance to the particles or indeclinable words in the entire Scriptures"), as the second part of the Conrad Concord and. So and the defect in Hugo's Concordance was supplied. The first printed concordance bore the title Pratis Conradi de Alemannia Ord. Predic. Concordantia Bibliorum, etc., Argentorati (Strassburg), c. 1470, 2d ed., 1475. Bindesil, in his monograph, Uber die Concordanzen (Theol. under Buxtorf's supervision; and a Latin translation (compiled by his son) was made by Jacob Reuchlin, Basel, 1556. An unprinted Latin translation by Nicholas Fuller is preserved in the Bodleian Library, Oxford.

The second Hebrew concordance was undertaken by the Franciscan scholar, Marius de Calasiao, appointed by Pope Paul V. public teacher of Hebrew at Rome. He wrote a Hebrew grammar and dictionary; d. Jan. 24, 1620. He was over seventy when he began the concordance, and at his death left it not quite ready for the press. By papal command it was given over to the Minorite general, Benignus of Genua, who employed upon it the Minorite provincial, Michael Angelus of St. Romulus, professor of theology and Hebrew. It was finally printed in four folio volumes, in Rome, 1621, under the title Concordantiae Sacrorum Bibliorum Hebraicorum. Each word was accompanied by its different meanings in both Hebrew and Latin, then the corresponding words in the other Semitic languages, with Latin interpretations, and finally the Bible passages in which the word is found.—Hebrew verses on the right-hand, Latin on the left. This concordance was three times published:—Cologne (1646), Rome (1657), London (1747–49), 4 vols. fol. It was confessedly an improved edition of Nathan's. It is, therefore, upon the same general plan. Each Hebrew word is followed by Nathan's explanations in rabbinical characters, but also in Latin. An improvement is the assignment of the different passages where it occurs, instead of massing the passagestogether. A great many missing references were supplied, errors corrected, and, not the least, at the end a concordance of the Chaldee words in the Old Testament. Yet two defects are pointed out by Buxtorf himself: certain particles are missing, and all the proper names. Modern edition, edited by Bernhard, 1863, 2 vols. fol. Two abbreviations of Buxtorf's great work were published: one at Wittenberg, 1553; the other, edited by Christian Raw, under the title Fount of Sion, Berlin and Frankfort, 1677.

The two defects already noticed in Buxtorf were remedied, as far as the Hebrew particles were concerned, in the Concordance of Christian Nolde, Copenhagen, 1679, small quarto. Later came other Hebrew concordances; among others Dr. John Taylor's Hebrew Concordance adapted to the English Bible, disposed after the manner of Buxtorf, London, 1754–57, 2 vols. fol. These were superseded when Baron Tauchnitz brought out that of Dr. Julius Förster, assisted throughout by Dr. Franz Delitzsch (to whom he generously ascribes great praise), Librorum Sacrorum Veteris Testamenti Concordantiae Hebraicae atque Chaldaicae, Leipzig, 1840, folio. This well-known and elaborate work is based upon Buxtorf, but is a great improvement upon the original. Yet even in it are wanting most of the Hebrew particles and pronouns, and all proper names. Förster follows Buxtorf's plan. He gives under each word its Latin translation; ascribes an alphabetical character; then arranges the different inflections of the word in regular order, and under each the passages in unpointed Hebrew. There are eight appendixes: 1. Etymological Index; 2. Explanatory List of Bible names (pointed Hebrew), to which is appended a syllabus of Ethnic-Hebrew (i.e., Phoenician) names; 3. A Lexicon of Aramaic and New Hebrew (i.e., the correspondences to Hebrew, arranged in alphabetical order); 4. An Etymological Table; 5. A Scheme of the Formation of Words; 6. "Propylaea Masora" (an orderly arrangement of the Masoretic notes); 7. "Chronicles of the Holy Tongue" (entirely in unpointed Hebrew); 8. A Comparative Table of Arabic, Syriac, Aramaic, and Hebrew. It was brought out that of Dr. Julius Fürst, assisted by Bernhard Bär, Stettin, 1861. Two abridgments of Förster's great work were published: one at Wittenberg, 1853; the other, edited by Hebraist's Wade Mecum, edited by Mr. Wigram (a verbal index to the Hebrew and Chaldee Scriptures), London, 1867, is valuable. It gives all the Hebrew words, with their English terms by which it is rendered in the authorized version, with index to the same. The work is very painstaking and useful, but is defective in that it makes no distinction between the inflections of the nouns; e.g., father and his father are under the same head.

The Hebrewman's Hebrew and Chaldee Concordance was prepared, designed 1830, published London, 1843, 3d ed., 1866, 2 vols. The editor, who also paid for the work, was George Wigram, who contributes an eccentric preface. Among the collaborators were S. P. Tregelles and B. Davidson. The work is superior. Each page presents (1) The Hebrew word (pointed); (2) Its pronunciation; (3) In the case of nouns, the gender, of verbs, the moods and tenses; (4) The passages of Scripture in which the words occur, quite fully printed, the title-words being distinguished by italics. The appendixes are (1) Hebrew and English index (after each Hebrew word the various English terms by which it is rendered in the authorized version are given in alphabetical order); (2) Table of the variations of chapter and verse in the English and Hebrew Bibles; (3) List of proper names (pronounced), together with their occurrences, with index to the same. The work is very painstaking and useful, but is defective in that it makes no distinction between the inflections of the nouns; e.g., father and his father are under the same head. III. GREEK.—Euthalius Rhodius, a monk of St. Basil, is said to have finished (1300) a concordance to the entire Bible in Greek. But the work was never printed, if, indeed, it was ever written. These Greek concordances are usually either to the Old Testament with the Apocrypha, or to the New Testament. We consider first, (1) The Concordances to the Old Testament and Apocrypha. — The first was made by Conrad Kircher, Frankfort, 1607, and was a Hebrew-Greek, rather than a Greek, concordance, inasmuch as the work follows the order of the Hebrew words, placing the corresponding Greek words after it. Each Hebrew word had its Latin translation; and then, without alphabetical arrangement, followed the various Greek equivalents, with the passages in which they occur. There is a register of the Greek words, and a distinction made between the canonical and apocryphal words. But the second independent concordance is much more valuable. It appeared under the CONCORDANCE. 524 CONCORDANCE.

The first appeared under the title Συμφωνία, η συλλέξη της θάδερης της καυς (literally, “Symphony, the gathering-together of the New Testament”), Basel, 1546. It was the work during eight years’ labor, and he was eighty-four when it appeared. It is still the standard work.

Tromm’s derogatory remarks on Kircher led to the publication, by Professor John Gagnier, of Vindicia Kircheriana animadversiones in novas Abr. Tromnn Concordianias gracae versiones LXX., Oxford, 1718.

(2) Concordances to the New Testament.—The first appeared under the title Συμφωνία, η συλλέξη της θάδερης της καυς (literally, “Symphony, the gathering-together of the New Testament”), Basel, 1546. It was the work during eight years of ΥΕΚΤΟΥΣ ΔΕΣΚΥLΛΙΟΣ (Sixtus Birken), librarian of the city library at Augsburg. The references are only to books and chapters, as verses did not then exist.

The second was brought out by HENRY STEPHENS, the famous printer, Paris, 1594. Stephens did not do the work himself, but merely wrote the preface. In this concordance the verses, invented by his father, Robert Stephens, are for the first time used. The Greek words are interpreted in Latin.

The third was by ERASMUS SCHMID, Wittenberg, 1638. It corrected the faults of the two concordances mentioned, and won at once universal applause. In 1717 Erasmus Connon Cyprian brought out a new edition containing a few corrections. Bagster (London, n.d.) has published a 32mo edition of it.

The fourth is KARL HERRMANN BRUDER’s, under the title Τίμημων της καυς διάδοχος λέξων (“Treasury of the words of the New Testament”), Leipzig, 1842. This is the latest and best concordance to the Greek New Testament, and is to be credited to the famous publisher, Karl Christian Tauchnitz.

Besides the above, there is the Englishman’s Greek Concordance of the New Testament (London, 1840, 5th ed., 1868), edited and paid for, as was the Englishman’s Hebrew Concordance, by George V. Wigram, and prefaced in the same eccentric manner. The work is excellent, and by English readers is decidedly to be preferred to all others. It gives all the words of the Greek New Testament in alphabetical order, according to their uninflected forms, as in a dictionary. Each word is transliterated; but so further attempt is made to indicate its pronunciation, except by marking a diaeresis or a long vowel. Under the word are the passages from the English New Testament in which the word, in its various cases or tenses, etc., appears, the translation of the word being italicized; e.g., ἐπιμόνωσι (επιμόνωσι). On next line, Matt. vii. 16: “Ye shall know them by their fruits.” Mark ii. 8: “And immediately when Jesus perceived,” etc. At the close is an English-Greek index, by means of which the English reader can see how many words in Greek are used to express the English, and a Greek-English index, differently arranged, which performs exactly the opposite service.

The preface gives a minute account of its genesis and execution. It gives the Greek words in dictionary order, the English translations of the authorized version alphabetically, in bold-faced type, and by each all the passages where the translation is found. Thus, μετά, between, Matt. xviii. 15, etc.; mean-while, John iv. 31; next, Acts xii. 42. At the close all the proper names are given and assigned; then follow an index of the English words, an appendix of various readings in larger clauses, and a supplement giving the readings of Tischendorf’s eighth edition, which vary from those of his seventh edition. The last two parts are the work of that admirable scholar, Professor Ezra Abbott.

IV. SYRIAC.—CARL SCHAFF published at Leyden (1709) a Lexicon Syriacum Concordantiale, omnes Novi Testamenti Syriaci voces, completes. As the title indicates, it is more a lexicon than a concordance; yet its completeness is sufficient to allow its use in this way.

V. GERMAN. — 1. The honor of preparing the first concordance to any modern version belongs to JOHANNES SCHRÖTER, who published Concordantia des neunen Testamentes zu teutsch, Strassburg, 1724, folio,—a concordance to Luther’s version.

2. CONRAD AGRICOLA (Bauer) first brought out a concordance upon the entire German Bible, Concordantia Bibliorum, Das ist biblische Concordantz und Verzeichniss der Pünvernoten Wörter, Frankfurt-a.-M., 1010. In 1612 he issued an appendix, which supplied deficiencies. Editions appeared 1621, 1632, and 1640, which incorporated the appendix. CHRISTIAN ZEISIUS (in Leipzig, 1855) brought out an improved concordance based upon Agricola’s.

3. FRIEDRICH LANCKISCH issued Concordantia Bibliorum Germanico-Graecae, Deutsche, Hebräische und Griechische Bibli, Leipzig u. Frankfurt-a.-M., 1877, folio. This was a truly important work, and well received; 2d ed., 1888, 3d ed., 1896, 4th ed., 1905, each edition being carefully revised and improved. Notwithstanding the pains already taken, CHRISTIAN REINERK found it worth while to prepare a fifth edition (1718). Lanckisch himself died in 1669, before the first appearance of his laborious work, which had these objects,—to revise, correct, and enlarge the Zeise edition of Agricola; to arrange under each German word the Greek or Hebrew words of which it was the translation; to place next to every Hebrew word a Greek letter, and to every Greek word a Latin letter, and then to use...

these letters to represent the word in the passages quoted from Luther's Bible, so that the reader seeing the letter would know of what Hebrew or Greek word the German was the translation.

4. The Cruden of Germany is GOTTFRIED BüCHNER. His concordance, moreover, agrees with Cruden's in that it is a so-called Real Concordanz, i.e., it contains definitions and notes. After the notes come the texts, as in other concordances. It appeared in two forms. Of the smaller the 1st edition appeared Jena, 1740; 2d, 1746; 3d, 1756; 4th, 1765; 5th, 1776; of the larger the 1st edition appeared Jena, 1750; 2d, 1757, 2 vols.; 4th, 1765. Up to 1778 the smaller or Hand-Concordanz was a widely-circulated work; but in that year the publisher failed, and the concordance oddly fell into disuse. The appearance of WICHMANN's Concordance (Dessau und Leipzig, 1782, new ed., 1806, 2 parts), and the theology of Büchner, were two causes operative against the work. It would not sell at any price; and the remaining copies were about to fall into the paper-manufacturer's hands, when their then owner determined to make a final attempt. He employed Dr. H. L. Heubner to revise the work, and got out a new edition (the 6th, Halle, 1840) at an increased price. His confidence was justified by results. Once more Büchner was the popular work: the 7th edition appeared 1854; 8th, 1855; 11th, Braunschweig, 1859; 13th, 1877. In 1871 the first American edition appeared in Philadelphia (published by I. Kohler), provided with a Preface by Dr. Schaff, and an Appendix of eight thousand and sixty omitted passages by Professor A. Spittl. The work answers, in a measure, the purposes of a Bible-dictionary: thus an historical sketch of Jerusalem is given under the name.

VI. FRENCH. — Of these may be mentioned MARK WILKS: Concordance des Saints Écritures, Paris, 1810.

VII. ENGLISH. — The first concordance was entitled The Concordance of the New Testament, most necessary to be had in the hands of all soche as desire the communication of any place contained in the New Testament, London, n.d., but certainly before 1540, and very probably by the printer JOHN DAY,though attributed to a "Mr. Thomas Gibson." The first concordance to the entire Bible was by JOHN MARBECKE, entitled A Concordance, that is to say, a Works wherein, by the ordre of the letters A, B, C, ye maie redely finde any worde conteigned in the Bible, London, 1550, folio. The references are only to chapters. In the same year appeared a translation from the German, A Briefe and a Compendious Table, in maner of a Concordance, opening the way to the principal Historie of the whole Bible, and the most common articles grounded and comprehended in the Newe Testament and Olde, in manner as amply as doeth the great Concordance of the Bible. Gathered and set forth by Henry Bullinger, Leo Joute, Convrade Pellicane, and by other ministers of the Church of Ligurie (Zurich). Translated from the High Almayne into English by Walter Lynam. To which is added a translation of the Third Books of Machabees. This was a translation of Bosch's Concordantia biblicarum Helvetiorum et Lusitanorum, Zurich, 1837. See additional titles in Darlington's Cyclopaedia Bibliographica. Subjects, folio, 1859. He enumerates six concordances made between 1578 and 1737, of which the most important was by SAMUEL NEWMAN, London, 1650, reprinted at Cambridge, 1720, and generally known as the Cambridge Concordance.

But all these attempts were forgotten on the publication by ALEXANDER CRUDEN of his Complete Concordance to the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, London, 1737. This work is likely to keep its place as the best of all the concordances, so long as King James's Version remains in use. It has appeared in different shapes, and with more or less completeness. The original work contains explanatory notes on important words, exhibiting oftentimes much acuteness, and always profound piety. Those editions which contain them are therefore desirable. The concordances of Brown, Cole, and Eadie, are only revisions of Cruden. The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge issued an edition (London, 1859), which is an improvement upon his, inasmuch as it is more complete; for Cruden does not give all the words of the Bible, and is especially defective in proper names. There are several American editions of Cruden: the most to be consulted is that of Dodd, Mead, & Co., New York.

The latest, best, and most comprehensive concordance is by ROBERT YOUNG, LL.D.: Analytical Concordance to the Bible, Edinburgh, 1879, 4th revised ed., 1881. According to the title-page it is "on an entirely new plan, containing every word in alphabetical order, arranged under its Hebrew or Greek original, with the literal meaning of each, and its pronunciation; exhibiting about three hundred and eleven thousand references, marking thirty thousand variant readings in the New Testament, with the latest information on biblical geography and antiquities, etc.; designed for the simplest reader of the English Bible." It is the outcome of forty years' labor, and took Dr. Young "nearly three years (from six A.M. to ten P.M.) merely to carry it through the press." It has been well received, and needs only revision in accordance with the revised version to be a work of permanent value. For the first time we have a really complete concordance. Very curiously in the first edition all reference to the "Holy Spirit" and "Holy Ghost" under "Holy" was missing. By means of this concordance the merely English reader may become to no inconsiderable degree a Bible critic.

Akin to a concordance is an analysis. Such a one was that made by MATTHEW TALBOT, London, 1800, quarto, revised and reprinted in America by NATHANIEL WEST, D.D., New York, 1853, which was again thoroughly revised and greatly improved by Professor ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D.D., LL.D., and issued under the title New and Complete Analysis of the Holy Bible, N. Y., 1870. It is the best work of its kind. Besides the analysis proper, it contains Cruden's Concordance as revised by Dr. Eadie, and several appendixes, including a brief Dictionary of Religious Denominations, Sects, Parties, and Associations.

CONCORDAT.

SAMUEL M. JACKSON.

CONCORDAT. means a treaty between the Pope, as the head of the Roman-Catholic Church, and a temporal sovereign, concerning the relations between the State and the Church. The name was first used in 1418 for those agreements on reform which Martin V. made with the nations of the Council of Constance. But it soon became general, though, officially, a concordat is still made between concordats and conventions; the latter name being applied to treaties with sovereigns not belonging to the Roman Church. There is, however, a striking difference between the earliest concordats and those of a later date. Thus the Concordat of Worms (Sept. 23, 1122) contains nothing but concessions from the side of the emperor. He gives up the right of investiture with ring and staff; he guarantees the freedom of the elections and consecrations of bishops in Germany; he promises to restore all ecclesiastical estates in his possession, etc. But from the beginning of the fifteen century, when nationall kingdoms were consolidating and monarchical states organizing, the concordata changed character. It was now the Pope who had to make concessions; or, at all events, the concessions became reciprocal.

The motion that the principal measures of reform should be agreed upon before the new pope was elected could not be carried in the Council of Constance; and when Martin V. was elected (Nov. 11, 1417), it soon became evident that he intended to frustrate the reform. Nevertheless, concordats were made with France, Germany, and England. The two first are dated May 2, 1418; the last, July 11. All three are given by Von der Harzt in Gesammelte Schriften, Leipzig, 1700, in tom. I. p. 1035, tom. IV. p. 1605, and tom. I. p. 1076, respectively. That with England was considered as final, those with France and Germany only as provisional. The principal features of these concordats are limitation of the number of cardinals, and provisions with respect to their appointment, revenues, etc.; restrictions of the appeals to the Pope, of excommunications, etc.; prohibition of the papal dispensations, of indulgences, etc.; very severe rules against simony, etc.

The opposition of the episcopal system to the papal system, which had showed itself already in the Council of Constance, became still more apparent in the Council of Basel. A series of the decrees of that council was adopted by the French clergy, July 7, 1438, and, under the name of the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges, incorporated with the law of France. The popes, however, never recognized the Pragmatic Sanction; at times it was not maintained even by the French kings; and Aug. 18, 1516, a new concordat was concluded between Leo X. and Francis I., the principal feature of which was, that it left the nomination of bishops to the king, but made no provision with respect to the temporalities which the papal institution should follow. Much haggling between the papal curia and the royal government was the necessary result; and in 1582 the French clergy, headed by Bossuet, issued the famous declaration in which the principles of the episcopal system and the National Church were formally asserted. See Histoire contenant l'Origine de la Pragmatique Sanction et des Concordats, in Traité de Droit et Libertés de l'Eglise Gallicane, Paris, 1731, tom. I.

By the Revolution, the Roman-Catholic Church was abolished in France, but re-established by the concordat of July 15, 1801, concluded between Pius VII. and Napoleon Bonaparte. It was extremely humiliating to the Pope; and the high-handed manner in which Napoleon carried on the negotiations did not sweeten the pill. The number of bishops was reduced from a hundred and fifty-eight to sixty; and the right of nomination was vested in the first consul. All claims to property confiscated by the Revolution were renounced, and the clergy to be paid by the State at a fixed rate. The worship should be free, though subject to the general police regulations of the country. Without awaiting the final consent of the Pope, Napoleon published the concordat in the Moniteur as part of the law of France, and ordered that a number of organic articles which the Pope had never seen, and never would recognize. See Potali: Discours, Rapports, etc., sur le Concordat de 1801, et les Articles Organiques, Paris, 1845; Mémoires des Cardinal Consulat, Paris, 1864, 2 vols.; Haußmiller: L'Eglise Romaine et le Premier Empire, Paris, 1883; Aug. Theiner: Histoire des deux Concordats, etc., Paris, 1869. After the restoration, the papal curia and the royal government labored in unison to effect a complete change. The concordat of 1801 was abolished, and that of 1516 was restored. It was intended to re-establish a number of episcopal sees, and to endow them with real estate, etc. But, when the proposition was laid before the chambers, it met with such an opposition, that it had to be abandoned. After the revolution of 1830, the concordat of 1801 was again adopted; and, though somewhat modified, it still forms the basis for the relation between the Gallican Church and Rome.

The reformatory decrees of the Council of Basel were also adopted in Germany by the diet of Mayence, March 26, 1439, though not in exactly the same form. The Concordats of Augsburg, 1439, especially emphasized by the Instrumentum Acceptationis (see Kocz: Sancio Pragmatica Germanorum Illustrata, Strassburg, 1782) are those concerning the regular recurrence of ecclesiastical councils and the Pope's submission to them, concerning provincial synods, the discipline of the clergy, the appeals to the Pope, the annates, etc. Eugene IV. tried to make resistance, and disposed the archbishop-electors of Treves and Cologne, the two first prelates of the German Church, but also known as the two stanchest adherents of the Council of Basel. At the diet of Frankfort, however (March 21, 1446), all the electoral princes of Germany agreed to present an ultimatum to the Pope,—either he should accept the decrees of the Council of Basel, restore the two archbishops, convocate an oecumenical council in some German city on May 1, 1447; or, if the Pope should leave this guidance, and follow the council; which might mean that they would follow Felix V., the Antipope. Eugene IV. yielded. He accepted the Concordata Principum Francofortensis, and his successor, Nicholas V., confirmed it. See Kocz, CONCORDAT. 527  CONCUBINAGE.

1. c. p. 197. Some modifications, however, were introduced in the final text of the concordat, among others a passage about restitution for losses which the papal see might incur from the restrictions of the appeals, indulgences, dispensations, annates, etc.; and the fulfilment of this obligation gave occasion to a new concordat, that of Aschaffenburg, concluded at Vienna with Frederic III., Feb. 17, 1448. By this agreement the Pope gained great advantages, especially with respect to the nomination and institution of bishops; the relation between the German Church and Rome was thereby made vague and uncertain, and remained so until, in the beginning of the present century, the influence of the French Revolution, the wars with France, and the dissolution of the German Empire, produced a complete change.

The confusion began to break into the German Church immediately after the peace of Luneville (1801), when Germany adopted the French idea of secularizing the ecclesiastical estates; and at the time of the Congress of Vienna it had become so complete that the Pope realized that he was left in the position of the Pope in the whole church of Germany. The curia, however, did not want a new organization; it simply demanded a restitution of the status quo ante bellum, the restoration of the ecclesiastical property and revenues, the re-establishment of the ecclesiastical principalities, etc. This was soon found to be an impossibility; and in 1815 negotiations began between the Pope and the various German states. Concordats were concluded with Bavaria in 1817, with Prussia and Hanover in 1821, with Baden and Wurttemberg in 1827, with Hesse in 1829, etc. The most remarkable of all the German concordats is that with Austria of Aug. 18, 1855. See Moy and Vering: Archiv. für kathol. Kirchenrecht, 21, 22. In Austria the Josephine traditions were still continued, though tempered by the character of ruler and the spirit of the government. After the confusion of 1848, however, a strong re-action set in; and the result was a concordat, which, in the middle of the nineteenth century, actually attempted to galvanize into life the principles of the middle ages.

The term "concubine" not regularly pledged to him can leave her, and marry another;” c. 13, “Whoever has both wife and concubine must be kept from communion; not so he who has only the latter.” Tribur (585), c. 38, “Marriage is only allowable among equals. A man who already has a concubine can marry; but, if he has a concubinate slave, he must remain faithful to her.”

The great synod in Rome (1059), c. 12, “A layman who has both wife and concubine will be excommunicated.” Placentia (1065), which is very strong, c. 1, “Nobody will be allowed to do penance who does not renounce concubinage, hate, and other deadly sins.” The Roman synod of 1069 also forbade the Eucharist to all living in concubinage.

The Hungarian national synod at Ofen (1279), c. 47, “No laic may publicly have a concubine.” Nougarot (1303), c. 14, “All notorious concubinators, usurers, and adulterers are to be publicly announced as excommunicated;” c. 3, “No concubine was to be tolerated by the priests, under penalty of a heavy fine.” Valladolid (1332), c. 22, “A married man who has openly a concubine, and also every unmarried man who has an infidel concubine, is ipso facto excommunicated.” Benevent (1301), c. 57, “No married man is allowed a concubine.”

Palencia (1388), similar to Valladolid. Copenhagen (1425) ordered the parish priests to announce to those living in concubinage that they must separate within a year. As will be seen by the above-quoted canons, concubinage was a very common practice; and the reason why it lasted, notwithstanding its repeated condemnation, was, because the clergy very commonly set the example, for the Church called their unions with women, "concubinages," and in many places the payment of a yearly tax to the bishop secured them immunity from molestation. See CELIBACY. It was therefore evident to the earnest moralists that the evil among the laity could best be reached through the clergy: hence the reform-legislation in the Council of Basel (1431–49), which was of the most vigorous description. The guilty priests were to be punished with loss of position, imprisonment, and banishment; and every concubine was to be driven from the houses of the clergy, and the children born of such unions were not to be allowed to remain with their father.

In the wake of this earnest effort to clear the Church of reproach came the Lateran Council (1516), under the guidance and inspiration of Leo X., which inaugurated church-legislation against the unmarried men who had concubines. The Council of Trent (1543–63) likewise, not only put this sort of concubinage under the ban of the Church (sess. XXIV., De Sacramento Matrimonii), but revised the marriage regulations, and thus made the distinction between concubinage and marriage more pronounced; for the bridegroom and bride must publish their intention before their own pastor and two witnesses. According to the present law in the Roman-Catholic Church, every commerce of the sexes other than in lawful marriage is forbidden and punished. If, after the above-mentioned warnings, the concubine is not given up, both parties are put under the ban; and if, in the course of a year, a separation does not take place, the concubine is removed, if necessary, by the civil power. The canons of the Council of Trent (sess. V., De Matrimonio) have nothing to say about concubinage. In canon 2 we read, "If any one saith that it is lawful for Christians to have several wives at the same time, and that this is not prohibited by any divine law, let him be anathema." This is rather a prohibition of polygamy (Schaff, Creeds, vol. ii., p. 185). But the Protestant churches the immorality of concubinage has never been doubted. It constitutes ample ground for the excommunication of a member. The connivance by the Lutheran Reformers at the bigamy of Philip of Hesse is an exceptional case.

CONCURSUS DIVINUS, a dogmatical term referring to the relation which exists, in the evolution of nature and history, between the divine agency, as causa finalis, and the natural agencies, as causa efficientes. In the Bible the idea does not occur. The Bible says that the earth covers itself with grass and herbs. Men and animals multiply, etc.; and it also says that it is God who covers the earth with grass and herbs, and God who makes men and animals multiply. And, again, the Bible says that we act from the impulses of our own hearts, and it also says that in God alone we live, and move, and have our being. The idea belongs to the dogmatic speculations, and is the result of philosophical reflection. It has been most elaborately expounded by the schoolmen (Thomas Aquinas) and the theologians of the old Lutheran orthodox school (Gerhard, Quenstedt); while modern dogmatists seem most inclined to leave the question in the form it has in the Bible, and refer the whole matter to philosophy.

CONDIGNITY and CONQUIRTY, or meritus de condigno and meritus de congruo, are terms used by the schoolmen after Thomas Aquinas in their attempts at reducing the doctrines of grace into one harmonious system; meritus de congruo denoting the inborn ability of the human will to perform certain works of a lower order of obedience, thereby throwing itself in the direction of divine grace, while meritus de condigno denotes the ability to perform works which are pleasing and acceptable to God, and not occur. The Bible says that the earth covers itself with grass and herbs. Men and animals multiply, etc.; and it also says that it is God who covers the earth with grass and herbs, and God who makes men and animals multiply. And, again, the Bible says that we act from the impulses of our own hearts, and it also says that in God alone we live, and move, and have our being. The idea belongs to the dogmatic speculations, and is the result of philosophical reflection. It has been most elaborately expounded by the schoolmen (Thomas Aquinas) and the theologians of the old Lutheran orthodox school (Gerhard, Quenstedt); while modern dogmatists seem most inclined to leave the question in the form it has in the Bible, and refer the whole matter to philosophy.

CONFERENCE. I.—In the Roman-Catholic Church the term is used to describe, (1) the assemblies of priests called by themselves of free choice pastoral conferences, and (2), those called by the constituted colleges of priests, chapter conferences. 1. Although the Roman-Catholic Church does not forbid, she by no means favors, such. For, under the name of synods they shall be limited both in numbers and in topics, and shall be under the entire control of the ordinariats. The amount of liberty enjoyed may, therefore, be imagined. Yet such course is eminently wise, for Rome has never pretended to be the friend of free speech or of the progress of learning.

2. The second kind of conference first took place in the ninth century, as a consequence of the great size of the diocesan synods, which made it impossible for all the clergy to meet together: so district meetings were ordained. These conferences were held upon the first day of every month, if it was not a fast (hence the name calendae), and were called by the archbishop or dean. Harduin gives account of several. One was held in London, 1237; but after that date there is no record of any, until, in 1565, Cardinal Carl Borromeo issued directions for their organization and guidance, and accordingly several met. They were looked upon as substitutes for the diocesan synods, but have failed to become general in the Roman-Catholic Church. See WETZER U. SCHAFF: Creeds, vol. i. pp. 706–709.

3. The Savoy Conference was held in the Savoy Palace, London, from April 15 to July 25, 1681, between twenty-one Episcopalian (twelve bishops and nine assistants) and an equal number of Presbyterians. The object of the meeting was the revision of the Prayer-book; but such was the temper on both sides, that no results were arrived at. But it embodied the changes desired by the Puritans in his Liturgy, the hasty work of a fortnight. The book was never used, yet has a certain value. It was republished by Professor C. W. Shields of Princeton, Philadelphia, 1887; new edition, New York, 1880.

IV. — In the METHODIST-EPISCOPAL CHURCH in America there are four judicatories so named. 1. The General Conference, which meets once in four years, is composed of ministerial and lay delegates; one ministerial for every forty-five members of each Annual Conference, and two lay for each Annual Conference. Two-thirds of the whole number of delegates constitute the quorum. The two classes of delegates deliberate together, but vote separately whenever such separate vote is demanded by a third of either order. One of the general superintendents presides. The conference has full power to make rules and regulations for the Church, provided such enactments do not alter in essentials the doctrine nor the polity of the Church. "Provided, nevertheless, that upon the concurrent recommendation of three-fourths of all the members of the several Annual Conferences who shall be present and vote on such recommendation, then a majority of two-thirds of the General Conference succeeding shall suffice to alter any of the restrictions [except in relation to doctrine]; and also, whenever such alteration shall have been first recommended by two-thirds of the General Conference, so soon as three-fourths of the members of all the Annual Conferences shall have concurred as aforesaid, such alteration shall take effect" (Book of Discipline, ed. of 1880, ¶ 63–72, pp. 47–52).

2. The Annual Conference appoints its own place of meeting; but the length of its sessions, over a week, is determined by the bishop who presides. There are now (1880) ninety-four annual conferences (Discipline, pp. 231–258). Attendance is obligatory upon all travelling preachers. The conference takes cognizance of all matters properly ecclesiastical, collect statistics of membership, baptisms, church-property, Sunday schools, benevolent collections, ministerial support, and current expenses, and publishes the same. It elects and ordains deacons and elders. Particular attention is given to the mission churches; and all those able to support themselves are not allowed to remain on the list of its missions. A certified copy of the minutes is sent to the General Conference (Discipline, ¶¶ 77–89).

3. The District Conference is composed of the travelling and local preachers, the exhorters, the district stewards, and one Sunday-school superintendent and one class-leader from each pastoral charge in the district. It meets once or twice a year. A bishop, or else the presiding elder, presides. Minutes sent to the Annual Conference. Its province is the superintendence of church matters in the district in a manner similar to the CONFESSION OF FAITH.

Quarterly Conference (Discipline, ¶¶ 87–94, pp. 61–68).

4. The Quarterly Conference "is composed of all the travelling and local preachers, exhorters, stewards, class-leaders, and trustees of the churches in the circuits or stations, and the first superintendents of our Sunday schools; said trustees and superintendents being elected by our circuses and approved by the Quarterly Conference." The presiding elder, and, in his absence, the preacher-in-charge, is president. The regular business of the conference is to hear complaints, and to receive and try appeals, take cognizance of all the local preachers and exhorters in the circuit or station, to inquire into their usefulness, to license proper persons to preach, and to try, suspend, deprive of ministerial office and credentials, expel or acquit, any local preacher against whom charges may be preferred, to elect trustees and stewards, and to supervise the Sunday schools within the circuit, and to remove unworthy superintendents. The order of business in the respective successive Quarterly Conferences is minutely and clearly laid down.

V. —The Wesleyans of England and Ireland have annual conferences attended by all the ministers. The Free Will Baptists, as well as other minor religious bodies, call their annual meeting by this term.

CONFESSIO OF SINS. See CREED.

CONFESSIO OF FAITH. See CREED.

CONFESSIO OF SINS. Roman-Catholic writers like to date the institution of private or auricular confession back to the very first days of the Christian Church. See BINTER: Denk-überliegungen, 1825–33, I. 1, 3; KLEE: Die Beichte, 1823; SIEMERS: Die sacrament. Beichte, 1814. Already Dallaeus, however (De Sacramentali s. Auric. Confessione, Geneva, 1601), proved that this assertion rested on a confusion between private and public confession. See, for the latter, the article on Penance. Private confession originated in the monastery, where only transgressions of the rules of the order were subject to public confession and penance. According to its idea, monastic life presupposes all sin impossible but sin in thought, and this was to be confessed to the abbot. See JEROME: De miisterio absolutionis, de episcopi absolutione, and BAs.: Instit. Regul. Monachar., in Op. XI. 499; and BASIL: Regul. Brev., in Op. II. 492. Outside the monastery, private confession at first met with opposition from the side of the clergy. The Bishops of Apulia and Campania demanded that sins confessed in private should be made publicly known to the congregation; and it was this demand which first caused Leo the Great to officially recognize and confirm private confession as a legal institution. See Op. Leonis M., ed. BALLERINI, Ep. 168. In the eighth and ninth centuries the practice thus legalized was made compulsory. The synod of Liége (710) decreed that every person should confess once a year to the priest of his parish; and the can. 21 of the Lateran Council of 1215 confirms the old established custom. Chrodegang's rules (MANSI, XIV. 313) demanded that ecclesiastics should confess twice a year and that the synod of the sixth century recommended lay people to confess frequently; they made the confession of ecclesiastics weekly (HARTZHEIM, VII. 679). The Council of Trent (sess. 25, can. 10) decreed that nuns should confess once a month. It was also in the thirteenth century that the formula of absolution used by the priest, Dominus absolvat ("May the Lord absolve thee"), was changed to Ego te absolv ("I absolve thee"). When the right of hearing confessions was granted to the Dominican order, conflicts arose with the parochial clergy; and indeed the chancellor of the University of Paris demanded that confessions made to a Dominican friar should be repeated to the priest of the parish, but Pope John XXII. refused his confirmation. The Reformers absolutely rejected compulsory confession, though the Lutheran churches generally retained confession in some form as a preparation to the celebration of the Lord's Supper.

CONFIRMATION. In the Apostolic Church baptism was invariably connected with imposition of hands, by which act the gift of the Holy Spirit was communicated, and without which the sacrament was not complete. From several passages, however, of the New Testament (such as Heb. vi. 2, Acts xix. 6, viii. 12–19) it would seem as if these two features were or could be kept separate; the latter, the imposition of hands, being considered an apostolical, and afterwards an episcopal, prerogative; and this direction the development took during the first century. Tertullian describes the sacramental act as consisting of three distinct elements,—the baptism proper, the anointing with chrism, and the imposition of hands. The question of the validity of heretical baptism gave occasion to a still sharper separation between these elements, as the party which refused to repeat the baptism maintained the necessity of the imposition of hands; and the circumstance that the baptism proper was administered by the lower ranks of the clergy, while the imposition of hands was reserved for the bishops, finally caused a separation also in time between these two acts. Both Jerome and Augustine were opposed to the tendency involved in this development; but the interest of the hierarchical system, and the tremendous growth of this interest, finally forced the measure through; and by the synods of Lyons (1274) and Florence (1439) the imposition of hands, the episcopal act of confirmation, was established as the second sacrament of the Roman-Catholic Church.

The sacrament, which, in accordance with the various aspects from which it may be viewed, is called confirmatio, sigillum, consimiatio, christma, sanctio, or imposito manum, is administered by the bishop at various places of his diocese, and at various times of the year, according to convenience. The catechumen must have filled his seventh year. He has generally a sponsor, and receives a confirmation-name. A spiritual preparation is recommended, but not demanded; the external signs—fasting, cutting off the hair, etc. —are sufficient. The principal feature of the act is the anointing with the chrism. After an introduction with prayer, the bishop makes the sign of the cross on the forehead of the catechumen with the words of the synod of the sixteenth century recommended lay people to confess frequently; they made the confession of ecclesiastics weekly (HARTZHEIM, VII. 679). The Council of Trent (sess. 25, can. 10) decreed that nuns should confess once a month. It was also in the thirteenth century that the formula of absolution used by the priest, Dominus absolvat ("May the Lord absolve thee"), was changed to Ego te absolv ("I absolve thee"). When the right of hearing confessions was granted to the Dominican order, conflicts arose with the parochial clergy; and indeed the chancellor of the University of Paris demanded that confessions made to a Dominican friar should be repeated to the priest of the parish, but Pope John XXII. refused his confirmation. VON ZEESCHWITZ.
an equipment for the battle of life. In the Greek Church it has essentially the same character as in the Roman, with the exception that it can be administered by every priest.

From the very first the Reformers rejected confirmation as a sacramental act—partly because it lacks the true characteristics of a sacrament (it was not established by Jesus; and it involves no divine promise), and partly because it detracts from the sacrament of baptism. Calvin has especially expounded this latter point with great vigor. It was not the idea, however, of the Reformers simply to abolish the institution without putting anything in its place. There is also an evangelical confirmation, though without any sacramental character. Most closely this new institution resembles the old Roman-Catholic in the Anglican Church, where it is administered by the bishop or his assistants, and while the catechumens are still very young. In the other Reformed churches, and also in the Lutheran, it was often put in a certain relation to the first communion as a preparation for the sacrament of the Lord's Supper; the catechetical exercises, the confession, and the use of the sacrament being its most characteristic feature. It was not generally adopted, however, nor did it develop any high degree of vigor until the time of Spener. His idea of confirmation was that of a renewal of the baptismal pact, a conscious and responsible assumption, by the individual himself, of the vow, which, at his baptism, had been made for him by his sponsors. Its principal features were the catechetical exercises, the confession, and the use of the sacrament, and its purpose a kind of new-kindled or revived devotion. In this form it was almost unanimously and universally adopted by the Lutheran churches of Germany and Scandinavia. In the Calvinistic churches of the United States a public confession of faith, prior to the first communion, is the substitute for confirmation. See BACCHMANN: Die Konfirmation der Katechumenen in der evangelischen Kirche, Berlin, 1852.

CONFLICT OF DUTIES. See Duties, Confliet off.

CONFUCIUS. (A name Latinized from Kung fu-tse, i.e., the "Master Kung") was born in the district of Tsow, in the feudal kingdom of Lu, now the southern part of Shantung, in the year 551 B.C. His father was governor of the district at the time,—a man of prowess, and honored by his country, who died at the age of seventy-three, when his son was three years old. His mother, though struggling with poverty, carefully cherished his love of learning; but our information concerning his early training is scanty and legendary. His grave demeanor and precocious mind early attracted attention, and he was led to study carefully the ancient laws and records. At nineteen he married. The following year he became a keeper of granaries, and overseer of public fields, in which the reforms he instituted gained him the favor of his sovereign. Induced by the disregard for law among his countrymen to examine more closely the ancient writings, and satisfied as to the ability of their teachings to check existing evils, he began to gather pupils around him. Although only twenty-two, his reputation attracted many young men to his house; and their numbers increased as the value of his instructions was recognized. The death of his mother when he was twenty-four afforded him opportunity to offer a sincere tribute to her memory, and also to revise an old custom of retiring from office in order to mourn three years, upon the death of a parent. His example has been followed to the present day. With the exception of a visit to the court of the Duke of Lu, he devoted the next ten years of his life to still further study and instruction of his numerous disciples, all the while rising in influence as a public teacher and learned man, one who was qualified to rule and advise in affairs of the state. This course of life he continued till he was thirty-four years old, when his wish to enter public service was gratified. One of the chief ministers of Lu on his death-bed (B.C. 517) advised his son to join the school of Confucius to learn the nature of ceremonial observances, in order to better perform his official duties. He and a near relative did so; and they gave new éclat to the master, who was ere long, at their representation, sent by his sovereign, Duke Chao, to the imperial court at Loh-yang, to study the rites then in use, so as to introduce them into Lu. He went as a private man, to see and learn, which he was permitted to do without restraint, and returned home the same year.

Soon after, Duke Chao was obliged to fly to the adjoining state of Ts'ı to save his life; and Confucius followed as a loyal subject. Not approving his position there, the sage returned home. He was now known as a great teacher. Lu was distracted by civil strife, from which he managed to keep aloof during the next fifteen years. In the year 500 Duke Chao's brother Ting came into power in Lu, and the rival factions were gradually put down. Confucius was fifty years old when he was appointed magistrate of the town of Chung-tu. The influence of his stern virtue, and the wisdom of his administration, wrought a speedy revolution in the social and economical condition of the country. The next year he was raised to be minister of crime, in which he introduced many reforms to simplify and enforce the administration of justice. These reforms, however successful, excited the envy of neighboring lords, whose efforts finally succeeded in seducing the ruler of Lu to remove the sage from office (B.C. 496).

During the next thirteen years he wandered from state to state, at one time honored, at another in danger of his life, but always surrounded by a band of faithful disciples. In many respects it was the most useful and influential period of his career. When sixty-six years old, he returned to Lu, and employed his remaining years in completing his literary works. He died 478 B.C., at the age of seventy-three. His wife and only son, Kung Li, had both died before him; but he was honored and mourned by many attached followers. His tomb at Kiuh-fau in Shantung is surrounded by an extensive collection of temples, halls, and courts, and has been recently described by Rev. A. Williamson in his Journeys in North China, vol. I. chap. xiii. His descendants still live in that region, and the head of the family is known as the Sacred Duke Kung. Though discouraged and neglected at the end of his career, Confucius, through his literary works, was destined to compel such homage from his fellow-men as no other man has ever had, and which amounts in reality to worship. In every city of China, down to those of the third order, there is a temple to him, and in every college and school he is venerated and adored.

The ideal of Confucius, to the attainment of which all his efforts and teachings were directed, was a condition of happy tranquillity prevailing throughout the empire. He considered that this could be accomplished by maintaining the sacredness of the universal obligations of human society; viz., those between sovereign and minister, between father and son, between husband and wife, between elder and younger brother, and between friends, each one faithfully performing the reciprocal duties arising from each. He claimed, to a certain degree, unlimited authority for the sovereign over the minister, father over the son, husband over the wife, elder brother over younger; thus inculcating as his leading tenets the subordination to superiors, and virtuous conduct.

In harmony with the practical character of his system, he taught, with great minuteness, rules for social intercourse, and laid special stress upon the care and education of the young, which he regarded as the foundation of the welfare of the state. His teachings in regard to political and social morality are based essentially upon the same grounds. He taught that the sovereign was the father of his people, and as such entitled to the same obedience, mingled with reverence, which is due from a child to its parent. His idea of government was a paternal despotism. But on the other hand, ascribing great importance to the power of example, he insisted upon personal rectitude and good government as the pledges of social morality, and the end of government was a paternal despotism. But on the other hand, ascribing great importance to the power of example, he insisted upon personal rectitude and good government as the pledges of social morality, and the end of government was a paternal despotism.

Throughout his works and teachings Confucius seldom referred to the great problems of human condition and destiny. To his practical mind the consideration of theology and metaphysics seemed uncertain and useless in its results; and he evaded, if he did not rebuke, his disciples, for prying into things beyond their depth. “To give one’s self earnestly,” said he, “to the duties due to men, and, while respecting spiritual beings, to keep aloof from them, may be called wisdom.” This contains the essence of his teachings in regard to the ancient creed of China. While he enjoined respect for its twofold worship and religious observances, enforcing his command by his example, yet he crushed out every spiritual tendency by discountenancing speculation upon higher things. It has been questioned whether he even did not doubt the existence of a divine Power, and regard the universe as a vast self-sustaining mechanism; but he undoubtedly gave occasion to his disciples for such a belief by his silence upon the subject, and his use of the indefinite term “heaven.”

For twenty-three centuries Confucius has held complete sway over the minds of nearly a third of the human race. The source of this influence may be ascribed to the use of the Four Books and the Five Classics as text-books. In adopting them as the text-books at the national examinations, the rulers of China took the best moral guides their literature afforded, and trained their rising youth in the habits of government they possessed. Not only does every scholar learn at the lap of Confucius, but all civil offices are reached only after going through the competitive examinations in those nine classics. His doctrines are thus deeply impressed upon the Chinese mind. But, however great his influence has been in the past, it is destined to wane in the near future. His system is not capable of being expanded proportionately with the progress of the nation, for it lacks the high sanctions and the vital force of Christianity.

For particulars of the life and times of Confucius, see LEGGE: Chinese Classics, vol. I. chap. V. of the Prolegomena, pp. 56–129, ed. 1861; it contains all that is really trustworthy. LEGGE: The Religions of China; Confucianism and Taoism compared with Christianity, Lond., 1880. S. Wells Williams. CONGREGATIO DE AUXILIIS DIVINAE GRATIE. The name is applied to the commission ordered by Pope Clement VIII., in 1598, to examine the Jesuit Molina’s book, Concordia liberi arbitrii cum gratia (“On Harmony between the Freedom of the Will and Divine Grace”), Lisbon, 1588. The occasion of this famous examination was briefly this: A Spanish Dominican, Dominicus Banez, issued a book on the doctrine of grace, which was aimed at the newly-established order of the Jesuits. Molina prepared the above-mentioned book, which received ere the issue the approbation of the censor of books in the Spanish inquisition. The Arch-deacon of the Portuguese arch-deacon, who had examined it on complaint of Banez.

The work met at first with almost universal applause. The Dominicans alone, under the leadership of Banez, opposed it strenuously, on the ground that it was Semi-Pelagian in its teachings, inasmuch as it emphasized the freedom of the human will at the cost of divine grace, really made the divine action dependent on the human, and thus impeached the authority of Augustine and Thomas Aquinas, and revived the old Pelagian and Semi-Pelagian theology. It was said, moreover, that the Molinists denied the necessity of divine grace at all in the work of human salvation, and ascribed to purely natural works the first rank of merit.

So between the Dominicans and the Jesuits a great fight broke out, and continued for many years. In the beginning of 1589 the Pope ordered the formation of a vatical commission, called “Congregatio de auxilliis divinae gratiae,” to examine Molina’s book. After three months and eleven sittings, nine out of the eleven examiners condemned the book in the strongest terms; and the result of a second examination, at the papal order, was precisely the same. Meanwhile influence of all kinds was brought to bear in favor of Molina; and accordingly the Pope ordered a debate between the two parties, who, however, argued on the questions in dispute rather than upon Molina's book. As the Pope himself inclined to the Dominican side, the Jesuit Gregor Valenti very shrewdly addressed himself directly to him, and with such effect, that the Pope did not condemn Molina's book, but determined upon a second debate. This began March 20, 1602, in the Vatican, before the Pope, and lasted four years. The debaters were cardinals, bishops, doctors of theology, censors, generals of the Dominican and Jesuit orders, and professed theologians. After listening for some three years to the discussion of Molina's book, the Pope formed the odd notion to read it himself, but unhappily died (March 3, 1605) ere he could find time to do so. The weary debate continued under his successor, Paul V., until Aug. 28, 1607, when Paul V. closed the proceedings, and afterwards issued an order allowing each party to teach as it pleased, so long as it did not call the other heretical. Thus ended the struggle of many years. It was a virtual victory for the Jesuits, who obtained full liberty to preach their pernicious doctrines to the present corruption of Roman-Catholic theology.

Naturally the history of this Congregatio was one of the burning questions in the subsequent Jansenist controversy. Santamour and other Jansenists circulated the history written by Pegna, Corneil, and De Lemos, along with a decretal, said to have been prepared, but not promulgated, by Paul V., in which he condemned Molina. But it may be a forgery. In the beginning of the eighteenth century a Dominican, Hyacinth Serry (under the name Augustine Le Blanc), and a Jansenist (anonymous), published at Lyons another history. To meet this, the Jesuit Levin Meyer, under the name of Theodore Eletherius, prepared his Historia Controversiarum de divina gratia auxiliis sub. P. Sixto V., Clemente VIII., et Paulo V., Antw., 1706. See complete and interesting art. Congregatio de auxiliis, in WETZER U. WELTE: Kirchen-Lexikon, 1st ed. vol. ii. pp. 786-794; also G. CONGREGATION. (Hebrew יִדְמָא, or יִדְמָא, assembly; Greek ἱερατεία, those called together, from κατά, to call: see further, on etymology, under CHURCH), an assembly, a gathering of people of neither political or religious purposes.

I. Scriptural Usage.—In the Old Testament the word denotes the Hebrew people in its collective capacity, under its peculiar aspect as a holy community, held together by religious rather than by political bonds (Deut. xxxi. 30; Josh. viii. 35; 1 Chron. xxix. 1). The congregation was governed, ere Israel had a king, by a council of seventy elders, chosen from the chiefs of the tribes and head of families (Num. xvi. 2, xi. 16). In post-exilian days this council developed into the Sanhedrin. By this council the king was chosen (1 Sam. x. 17; 2 Sam. v. 1: 1 Kings xii. 20; 2 Kings xi. 19). In the New Testament the word is used of the Christian Church at large, or in a local congregation as the translation of ἱερατεία. See CHURCH.

II. Ecclesiastical Usage. 1. General.—The primitive congregations were modelled upon the synagogue, and governed by the elders, who were styled "presbyters," while deacons cared for the temporalities; but in all the arrangements and proceedings the entire congregation took part. With the growth of the priesthood in authority, especially because of the development of the mass, the congregation decreased in power, until the Roman Church reached, long before the Reformation, its present system of government, in which the Pope, as the representative of Christ, appoints for each diocese the bishop, who, in turn, appoints the parochial clergy, and thus the congregational power is reduced to a minimum. Yet the primitive idea is so far recognized, that each parish has its so-called patrini ("church fathers"), who, however, although chosen by the congregations, have very limited powers. The churches of the Reformation, both Lutheran and Reformed, rejected the papal theory, and thus in measure the conciliar notion. The Lutheran Church vindicates the rights of the congregation to representation and expression in the ecclesiastical courts, to complaint against pastors offensive in doctrine or conduct, to at least a negative vote in the choice of pastors, and of local self-government. Yet so closely allied are these churches to the state, that they are considerably under its control. The Reformed Church gives much more authority to the congregation. It is republican in its idea. Calvin taught the complete identification of Church and State. He organized the presbytery, composed of both teaching and ruling elders, as the board of control, into its hands placed the government of the churches, and made it responsible for the care of things temporal and spiritual; in all which, however, the congregations took more or less active part. According to the old Reformed principle, the presbyter exercised his functions for life, and another was chosen to fill his place at death. Congregationalism in England and America has developed most fully the principle of independence (see those articles). See MEIJER: Lehrbuch des Kirchenrechts, 9th ed., Götttingen, 1889.

2. Roman Catholic.—In the Roman Church the term is applied, (a) To the committees of cardinals appointed by the Pope to expedite the business of the Roman curia. These congregations are eleven in number, thus named: (1) Of the Inquisition, or the Holy Office; (2) Of the Council (i.e., of Trent, which decides cases arising out of misunderstanding of that council's decrees); (3) Of Bishops and Regulars; (4) Of the Index; (5) Of the Ritual; (6) Of Consistorial Affairs; (7) Of the Election, Examination, and Residence of Bishops; (8) Of the Propaganda; (9) Of Ecclesiastical Immunities; (10) Of Sacred Relics; (11) Of Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs. Besides the serergal congregations, there are others which have been called to meet emergencies, or supply temporary service; as those of Study, of the Fabric of St. Peter (to keep the building in repair, etc.), and of Ceremonial. See CARDINALS; CURIA, ROMAN. (b) To communities which are bound by monastic vows, yet are not monkish, for contemplative, ascetic, or practical purposes. (1) Some of these congregations are removed from the world, others attend unto nursing or education. They are modelled upon the pattern of the monastic orders, and differ in the strictness of their rules. Their members are laity of both sexes. (2) Besides these, are communities of clergy, who may live in society, and do not assume the vow of poverty, although they all take the vow of chastity. Some of these congregations have been very useful to the Roman Church; such as the Congregation of the Brothers of Christian Love, the Congregation of the Camaldulenses, of Cluny, the Cistercians,—all of the eleventh century. From the latter, under the lead of the Abbot Bouthillier de Rancé (1662), was developed the strict and severe Trappist Congregation.

III. — In Scotland the title “Lords of the Congregation” is given to the chief subscribers to the First Covenant, which was signed at Edinburgh, Dec. 3, 1557. The title came from the frequency which with the word “congregation” occurs in the document. See the text in Hetherington’s Hist. of the Ch. of Scot., chap. ii.

CONGREGATIONALISM, English. I. The distinguishing principles of English Congregationalism are,—

1. That Jesus Christ is the only head of the Church, and that the word of God is its only statute-book.

2. That visible churches are distinct assemblies of godly men gathered out of the world for purely religious purposes, and not to be confounded with the world.

3. That these separate churches have full power to choose their own officers, and to maintain discipline.

4. That, in respect of their internal management, they are each independent of all other churches, and equally independent of state control.

English Congregationalism is not merely a development of English Puritanism. It is an independent system of church government, as fundamentally distinct from Episcopacy and Presbyterianism, as they are from each other.

II. Amongst the refugees to the Continent, from the Marian persecution, there were representatives of both the hierarchical and Presbyterian systems. Heylin, in his History of the Reform.
Brown developed the principles of Congregationalism more perfectly, and held them more consistently, than those who came after him; but he held them uncharitably. He not only denied that the parochial assemblies could in any sense be regarded as Christian churches, but refused communion with anyone who were identified with them. His little church at Norwich was persecuted by puritans as well as by hierarchists, as local records abundantly prove; and he and they concluded "that the Lord did call them out of England." Consequently they resolved to remove to Scotland, where, in consequence of their attempting an too rigorous internal discipline, the church was distracted and divided, as the result of which he relinquished his office, and returned to Scotland in December, 1583. There he protested against the whole discipline of Scotland, and was cited to appear before the authorities. At length he returned to England, where after various trials and sufferings, which apparently unhinged his intellect, he at least outwardly conformed to the Established Church, about 1586, and accepted preferment in it.

IV. Henry Barrowe and John Greenwood caught the falling flag, and held it aloft for a season, till they, in their turn, were imprisoned, and at length executed, April 6, 1593. During their imprisonment they wrote much and well in exposition, till they, in their turn, were imprisoned, and after that, in 1602, one hundred and one members of this congregation left Leyden. — a Pilgrim band; and on the 11th December in the same year, the first company of them from "The Mayflower" landed in America, on Plymouth Rock. Robinson returned to England from Holland, where he had been in communion with Ames and Robinson, that a church was organized in Southwark, which has had a continuous existence to the present time. Jacob continued in the pastorate eight years, and then emigrated to Virginia. He was succeeded by John Lathrop, who, being summoned before the High Commission to answer various articles touching the keeping of conventicles, in order to avoid the consequences, sailed to America in 1634. Henry Jessey apparently succeeded him in the pastoral office. A second church was formed by Mr. Hubbard in 1621, to which John Caune after Dr. Johnson's departure for the Hebrides, and for it a house of worship was opened in Deadman's Place, Southwark, in 1640–41.

V. In 1592 an Act of Parliament was passed, entitled "An Act for the Punishment of Persons obstinately refusing to come to Church." Its object was to extirpate the Brownists and Separatists, who had by this time increased, if not to a very considerable number, at least so much as to become a formidable body. Barrowe and Greenwood were condemned and executed under the powers of this Act; but its principal effect was to drive the greater number of these Brownists from the country, many of whom removed to Holland. There Francis Johnson became the pastor, and Henry Ainsworth the teacher, of a Brownist, or rather Barowist church at Amsterdam. Barrowism, it was found, could be worked in two ways. Men of liberal principles could respect the feelings and opinions of the brotherhood; whilst men of autocratic temper could ignore them. There were men of both these classes at Amsterdam, and after a while this church divided; the liberal party, under Ainsworth, leaving the rest under Johnson. But in 1608, before this separation, Smyth, Clifton, and John Robinson, with the members of the Scrooby Church, came to Amsterdam: they found the church here in an unsettled state, and "contentions ready to break out; separated from any, resolved to remove to Leyden, that they might not be involved in them. In the following year they carried out their purpose.

VI. When Robinson arrived in Holland, he was a strict Brownist; but, after his settlement at Leyden, he modified his views and practice respecting fellowship. Divine light, brought to his mind through intercourse with Dr. William Ames and others, led him to admit to the communion of his church members of other churches not reformed according to his model; which churches he would not deny to be true churches, though he saw it necessary to separate from them. In regard to the Dutch churches, he allowed his own people to unite with them in ordinary worship, but not in sacraments and discipline. His practice in this respect has been generally followed by churches of this order in succeeding times, and he has therefore not improperly been called the Father of Modern Congregationalism. The church increased in Leyden, and grew in grace under Robinson's ministry for seventeen years enjoyed rest and peace. But anxious to live in a country they could call their own, in which they could also enjoy their religious freedom, and desirous also of carrying the gospel to the heathen, they resolved to emigrate. On July 1, 1620, one hundred and one members of this congregation left Leyden. — a Pilgrim band; and on the 11th December in the same year, the first company of them from "The Mayflower" landed in America, on Plymouth Rock. Robinson remained at Leyden, intending to follow the pioneers with the residue of the church; but he died at Leyden in 1625, before they left. Though decided in his opinions, he was no bigot in the matter of church government. Whereunto he had already attained by the light given to him, he walked by that rule, and then patiently waited till God should reveal more unto him; and when the first Pilgrims left Leyden he urged them to pursue the same course.

VII. After the church was scattered of which Richard Fitz was pastor, we find brief notices of other societies of the same character, which appeared from time to time like islands in mid ocean: but, after the general banishment of the Brownists and Separatists in 1592, scarcely any of these little societies remained, and, if any existed, they were compelled to remain in concealment; and it was not till 1618, when Henry Jacob returned to England from Holland, where he had been in communion with Ames and Robinson, that a church was organized in Southwark, which has had a continuous existence to the present time. Jacob continued in the pastorate eight years, and then emigrated to Virginia. He was succeeded by John Lathrop, who, being summoned before the High Commission to answer various articles touching the keeping of conventicles, in order to avoid the consequences, sailed to America in 1634. Henry Jessey apparently succeeded him in the pastoral office. A second church was formed by Mr. Hubbard in 1621, to which John Caune after Dr. Johnson's departure for the Hebrides, and for it a house of worship was opened in Deadman's Place, Southwark, in 1640–41.

VIII. The victims of Laud and Wren, in the reign of Charles I., were Puritans, and not Separatists. Many of these went to Holland, which they called "their hiding-place," which proved to be their training-school; for there they were led to embrace the principles the maintenance of which gave them the distinguished position they occupied in the new era which presently commenced. Shortly after the opening of the Long Parliament (Nov. 3, 1640) several of those who had gone to Holland as Puritans returned as Congregationalists. Such were Thomas Goodwin, Nye, Burroughes, Hooker, Symson, and Bridge. The cause of their exile, the course they pursued in Holland, and the purpose they so earnestly desired to effect on their return, can best be presented in their own words (Yarmouth Ch. Bk.): "The urging of Popish ceremonies and divers innovated injunctions in the worship and service of God by Bishop Wren and his instruments, the suspending and silencing of divers godly ministers, and the persecuting of godly men and women, caused divers of the godly in Norwich, Yarmouth, and other places, to remove, and to pass over into Holland, to enjoy the liberty of their conscience in God's worship, and to free themselves from human inventions."

After they came into Holland, divers joined themselves to the church there, and abode members of that church five or six years; among whom were Mr. William Bridge and Mr. John Ward, who also were chosen officers of the church there. But after the glad tidings of a hopeful Parliament, called and convened in England, was reported to the church aforesaid in Rotterdam, divers of the church (whose hearts God stirred up to further the light they now saw, by all lawful means, in their own country, — not without hope of enjoying liberty there, — after much advising with the church, and seeking God for direction) returned, with the assent, approbation, and prayers of the church, into England, etc."

These men, with a few others holding similar principles, soon found themselves, not an insignificant company of returned exiles, but chosen and honored members of the Assembly of Divines, which was gathered to give advice to the Parliament of England on matters concerning religion. One consequence of their acceptance of this position was, that they felt themselves constrained to advise and entreat "all ministers and people" to the house of commons to "constantly join the meeting of themselves into church societies of any kind whatsoever;" in the hope that they might be comprehended in some new national organization, or at any rate permitted to form Congregational societies, which should enjoy a full toleration. The Presbyterian far outnumbered them in the Assembly; and these, urged on by Baillie and the Scots divines, and backed up by the Scots army, were altogether disinclined to allow a toleration; whereupon these "dissenting brethren" argued incessantly, until, the power of Cromwell being in the ascendant, more liberal counsels prevailed. Congregational churches were now formed generally in the kingdom; and during the Commonwealth and Protectorate we find them of two different types.

\( \text{Gathered} \) churches were societies formed by the voluntary adhesion of Christians, having no respect to parochial boundaries; and their ministers were in no sense (at least at first) parish ministers, but were chosen and maintained by the churches themselves.

\( \text{Reformed} \) churches, on the other hand, were those formed in parishes, the rectors or vicars of which, happening to embrace Congregational principles, selected the godly inhabitants of their parishes, and formed them into Congregational societies. These societies met in the parish churches, and the ministers continued to receive their maintenance from the tithes. The greater number of both these types eventually found their way into Cromwell's comprehensive establishment, where orthodox men of all tolerable opinions on church government labored together in considerable harmony.

The doctrines held by the Congregationalists of this period, and the discipline maintained by them, are set forth in the "Confession agreed on at the meeting of messengers from the Congregational churches at the Savoy Palace," held immediately after the death of the Protector, September, 1658.

It was necessary that this Congregationalism, true but mixed, should be delivered from secular entanglements, should be shaken and sifted, that the true and only those that could not be shaken might remain. The restoration of Charles II. followed in 1660, and the sifting began.

\( \text{IX. The hierarchy was re-established, and the} \) \( \text{Episcopal Church re-instated in its former position. All the ministers officiating in churches, who had not been legally presented by the patrons, were removed, if the old sequestered incumbents were living, and the latter were at once restored. On Bartholomew Day, Aug. 24, 1662, all other ministers who could not submit to the requirements of the new Act of Uniformity were ejected from their curates. More than two thousand ministers, many of them among the best and best qualified of the time, were thus sent forth to endure poverty, persecution, and contempt. Most of these men were Presbyterian in their ideas of church government; but twenty-six years of stern repression, often involving imprisonment, drew them very much nearer to their fellow-sufferers of the Congregational order, several of whose churches lived on through all the persecution, and continue to the present day.} \)

X. After the Revolution in 1688 a new era commenced; the Congregationalism was passed. The Congregational churches which survived came out of their concealment. Most of the old meeting- houses were then built which were known to the last generation. Now these are almost all removed. The new churches which were then formed were of two classes, — Congregational, according to the Savoy platform of order, and Presbyterian. The latter had no presbyters, and thus resembled the Congregational, except in this one point, that their elders had greater power than those of the Congregational churches. Both parties had become more tolerant in spirit; and the leaders on both sides thought they could unite.

In 1691 Heads of Agreement were drawn up; old names of distinction were discarded; the union was declared, and henceforth all were to be known as The United Brethren. But differences in principles, and perhaps, too, infirmities of temper, prevented the smooth working of the plan, and it was abandoned. The attempt, however, was not without result. The more general rules of the Heads of Agreement took the place of the stricter requirements of the Savoy Confession in matters of church government, and now they almost universally prevail.

XI. After the death of King William III. attempts were made to deprive dissenters of the restricted liberties they had secured; but the death of Queen Anne, the last of the Stuarts, put an end to such endeavours; and, under the present religious faith, these liberties have been extended, disabilities have been removed, and the day seems not far distant when religious equality shall be enjoyed.

XII. In English Congregationalism since the Revolution, the power of the eldership has been but little recognized: the churches have managed their own affairs, and have been jealous of their independency. So much has this jealousy prevailed, that, though they have never repudiated associations and councils, they have not till lately encouraged them. Informal meetings of ministers and formal associations have often had cause of doubt or difficulty brought before them for advice; but no organization existed specially to meet such cases. Of late, however, some county unions have appointed committees of reference, which may be called together if any of the churches desire their assistance: and some churches have resolved, that when difficulties arise, especially if they are of a threatening kind, they will at once seek the advice of neighboring churches.

XIII. "The Congregational Union of England and Wales" was, after much consideration and amidst many fears, formed in 1833. It meets to deliberate, to legislate; to advise, not to compel; and its Declaration of Faith is not a creed to be subscribed. It meets twice in the year,—in the spring, in London; in the autumn, in one or other of the larger provincial cities or towns; and its influence is quickening and healthful. Its profess is objects are: (1) To strengthen the fraternal relations of the Congregational churches, and facilitate co-operation in every thing affecting their common interests; and also to maintain correspondence with the Congregational communities throughout the world. Under its auspices Mr. Benjamin Cragg published his Historical Memorials relating to Independents, 3 vols. 8vo, 1830–44.

Two other volumes were published, entitled Tracts and Treatises of John de Wycliffe, and Select Works of Rev. David Clarkson, B.D.; and the project of printing The Works of John Robinson, 3 vols. 8vo, 1551, was approved, and afterwards carried out by the Rev. R. Ashton. The Union has published fifteen courses of Congregational Lectures, delivered 1833–51, and six other courses of a more recent date.

XIV. About the middle of the eighteenth century the churches felt the necessity of more intercourse and communion with sister-churches than they had up to that time been enabled to maintain; and gradually associations were formed in almost every county, their objects, in addition to the manifestation of fraternal sympathy, being, generally, to encourage and sustain home missionary work, and to assist the weaker churches within their bounds. Of late years the conviction has been growing, that there were districts in the country which were not able to accomplish these ends effectively by reason of the sparseness of the population, the poverty of the churches; and it has been resolved to form a Union of unions, the design of which is, that the stronger and wealthier districts should contribute to aid those which are more feeble. The Congregational Church Aid and Home Missionary Society was therefore formed in 1875, with these objects in view: (1) To aid the weaker churches; (2) To plant and foster new churches; and (3) To do everything that evangelistic work in spiritually destitute places, and to do these things through the existing county associations, all of which contribute to a common fund, which is distributed to each as they severally need, or as nearly as possible in this proportion.

XV. With regard to the growth of English Congregationalism, it may be stated that in 1716, less than a generation after the Revolution, the number of Congregational and Presbyterian churches in England was 860; in 1851 the Congregationalists alone possessed 3,244 places of worship in England and Wales. The statement given in the Congregational Year-Book for 1881 shows the total number of churches, branch churches, and preaching-stations in England and Wales, to be 4,188; and the total number of pastors, lay-preachers, and evangelists, to be 2,733. Within the same limits, there are 18 Congregational colleges, having 42 professors, 458 students for the ministry: from all which it will be seen that the denomination is growing in numbers and strength. Its periodical literature is represented by The British Quarterly, The Evangelical Magazine, The Congregationalist, The Nonconformist and Independent, etc.

CONGREGATIONALISM IN THE UNITED STATES denotes a system of belief in general historical agreement with the Reformed Confessions, and a polity combining the principle of the autonomy of the local church with that of the duty of fellowship between sister churches.

I. History.—"The Mayflower" bore to the completion of the Cambridge Platform, is thearian church (1620). Under the increasingly liberal teaching of John Robinson, its pastor, it leading writers and the "organizing minds" were pendancy, viz., semi-separatism, and was thus pre been providentially trained, by removal to the here found themselves, to form a polity in har what was called the New-England way, the Middle mony with the Plymouth pattern. Thus arose Browne: History of Congregationalism in Nor who give credible evidence of regeneration by the churches of the Puritan or Nonconformist emi

sions, and a polity combining the principle of the historical agreement with the Reformed Confes

England had increased to fifty-one; viz., two in the Colony of Massachusetts, five in Connecticut, dim inthepublicmind and conscience, of the principle of a regenerated membership was too strongly held to be dis

ment of the Lord's Supper was administered to . dements it was of unquestionable civil and political advantage. Under these conditions it would be strange if desire for civil rights and political influence in the colonies to which the colonists sought a change in the terms of church-membership. If, however, such motives operated, no traces of them appear in the discussions of the time which have come down to us. The clergy, rather than the laity, were foremost in the movement for relaxation; and it is clear that at least the main reason, and the one which controlled the course of events, was religious,—the desire to extend the privileges and blessings of church-fellowship. The traditional principle, and, still more, the inherited feeling, that persons unbaptized were as Pagans, probably had a great influence. Still the principle of a regenerated membership was too strongly held to be discarded; and so a compromise was made, by which baptized persons of orthodox belief and reputable life, upon covenanting with the church, were allowed to offer their children in baptism. The covenants in use were so evangelical and full, that it is difficult to understand how they could have been taken by persons who were not ready and willing to enter into full communion. They were, however, understood to imply something less than a full profession of personal repentance and faith. The principle of membership upon lower terms being thus once admitted, it received development, until, in some churches, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered to all who took what has been called the "Halfway Covenant;" and Solomon Stoddard advocated the theory that "the Lord's Supper is instituted to be a means of regeneration." The influence of this modification and practical abandonment of the primitive belief of the Congrega tional churches deserves more thorough, exact, and comprehensive investigation than it has yet received. The worst effect, doubtless, was the diminution, in the public mind and conscience, of a sense of the obligations of personal religion; and this disastrous result was wide-spread.

The evils thus introduced were partially arrested by the "Great Awakening,"—a religious revi vival under the preaching of the elder Edwards, Whitefield, and others, which added, it is claimed, from twenty-five thousand to thirty thousand communicants to the church, and was the effect of the trials through which the churches passed in this defection was very important as to doctrine, polity, and Christian activity; the discipline, though severe, proving to be very salutary. This chapter, also, in the history of the denominations, has not yet found its historian, though very valuable contributions to it have been made. [See Gillett: Hist. Cong. 1871, pp. 292-324; Clark: Hist. Sketch of the Cong. Churches in Mass.; Burgess: Pages from the Eccles. Hist. of N. E.; Ellis: Half-Cent. of the Unit. Controversy; Puchard: Hist. of Cong., vol, V. pp. 557-589.]

In 1708 a synod, convened at Saybrook by order of the Legislature of Connecticut (which now included the Colony of New Haven), adopted what is called the Saybrook Platform; viz., the Sayrev Confession of Faith, the Heads of Agreement (which had united Presbyterians and Congregationalists in Connecticut), and concluded the Administration of Church Discipline, the chief peculiarities of which are the union of churches with their pastors in consociations, of ministers in associa-CONGREGATIONALISM.

II. DOCTRINE.—Congregationalism emphasizes the principle, that the Scriptures are the only authoritative rule of faith and practice. Its understanding of that rule is expressed in the creeds of its local churches, and in the symbols which its general synods and other organizations have commended. These formulas of faith are not imposed, either upon individual members of the churches, or upon the local churches or other ecclesiastical bodies. Each candidate for membership, each church or conference, seeking recognition, determines freely what is accepted as of faith. On the other hand, each organization decides for itself whether the confession of an applicant is sufficient. As general standards, or testimonies, the Westminster Confession (adopted substantially by the synod of 1646–48) and the Savoy Confession (adopted by the synods of 1680 and 1706) have held the foremost rank. The National Council of 1865 declared its adherence to the faith "substantially as embodied" in these confessions, and added an impressive statement of the "fundamental truths in which all Christians should agree," and on the basis of which catholic fellowship and co-operation can exist in the work of extending the Redeemer's Kingdom (Burial Hill Declaration). The indefiniteness of the word "substantially" and the growing and prevalent conviction that the Westminster and Savoy Confessions fail to represent adequately the present beliefs, led the National Council at St. Louis (Nov. 15, 1890) to appoint a committee of seven to "select from among the members of our churches, in different parts of our land, twenty-five men of piety and ability, well versed in the truths of the Bible, and representing different shades of thought among us, who may be willing to confer and act together as a commission to propose, in the form of a creed or catechism, or both, a simple, clear, and comprehensive exposition of the truths of the glorious gospel of the blessed God, for the instruction and edification of our churches." This commission has been formed, and is expected to publish its labors.

This effort to secure a new statement of belief has its roots in the doctrinal discussions originated or promoted by the elder Edwards. The practical problems presented to the churches by the immense home missionary work devolved upon them have also had an important influence. Theology has been cultivated with special reference to preaching; and preaching has aimed at conversion, and the promotion of active benevolence. The chief discussions have related to "questions of anthropology and soteriology.

The controversies with Unitarianism and Universalism have widened the range of inquiry. The attention given to theology, especially in New England, has been remarkable in its extent and degree; and what is known as the "New-England Theology" has exerted a powerful influence in other communions than the one in which it has most flourished.

For an account of this theology, and special references, see Professor H. B. Smith's additions to Hagenbach's Hist. of Doctrines, II. 180, 192, 495–492; N.Y. ed., 1898; Ib.: Hist. of the Church of Christ in North America, 1707–1883, 1883; Strong's Cyclopedia, II. 479, X. 327, art. on New England Theology, by President Warren.

For the early history of Congregational churches in the Dominion of Canada, see Puchard, Hist. of Cong., vol. iv. chaps. 12, 13, 17, 18, 19.

III. Polity. — The Congregational polity is a body of usages as well as a system with principles. These usages are set forth in platforms and manuals, which are recognized by courts of law and ecclesiastical councils, although their authority is declarative, and not canonical. It is of chief importance to mark the fundamental principles of the system, as it is by these that usages must be tested.

A. The Formal Principle. "The Holy Scriptures, and especially the scriptures of the New Testament, are the only authoritative rule for the constitution and administration of church government; the church is, therefore, required to be dependent on Christians as a condition of membership and communion in the church" (Boston Platform, Pt. I. chap. i. 1). "The New Testament contains in express precept, or in the practice of the apostles and primitive churches, all the principles of church organization and government." (Constitution of the Illinois and of other Associations).

The Cambridge Platform asserted more than this; viz., that "the parts of church government are all of them exactly described in the word of God . . . so that it is not left in the power of men . . . to add, or diminish, or alter any thing in the least measure therein." So John Robinson and the early Congregationalists generally. The best thought and aspiration of the next century recognized more fully the light of nature and the province of human reason. Near its beginning, Rev. John Wise argued, on rational grounds, that the best species of government is a democracy, and that it is to be presumed that Christ has prescribed such a form to his churches. He also quietly assumed this to be the polity derived from the Scriptures by the framers of the Cambridge Platform. Congregationalism, in accordance with the spirit of the age, became democratic, and also less rigid in its claim to a complete prescriptive basis in the Scriptures. The progress of more recent times in exegetical and historical theology has strengthened this tendency.

B. The Material Principle. — This is a combination of the two principles of the self-government of local churches and of their obligation to preserve church communion. The distinctive character of Congregationalism arises from its union in one system of these two principles. Its formal principle has been admitted by other bodies. The autonomy of the local church is also elsewhere conceded. The claims of fellowship also have been admitted. Congregationalism alone has endeavored to blend local self-government and church communion, to unite them in one organic connection, to develop new and higher agencies which are requisite for this end. It has been aptly described, from this point of view, as an ellipse, the two principles of autonomy and fellowship being the foci. The Cambridge Platform makes this definite, complete, and fundamental statement: "Although churches be distinct, and therefore may not be confounded one with another; and equal, and therefore have not dominion one over another; yet all churches ought to preserve church communion one with another, because they are all united unto Christ, not only as a mystical, but as a political head, whence is derived a communion suitable thereunto."

Besides recognizing the obligation of fellowship, Congregationalism supplies the needed instrumentalities. It provides organs of fellowship.

One of these is an ecclesiastical council, — "the agency by which the churches determine with whom they will be in fellowship as Christian churches."

Another such organ is a conference or association of churches, — the agency through which churches in fellowship co-operate in advancing the kingdom of Christ.

These local or district bodies now generally unite in forming a state association or conference, which meets annually, and also the National Council, representing these local bodies. Where the constitution and more special functions of councils, see Boston Platform and the accepted manuals by Upham, Punchard, Dexter, and others. The same, also, for customs and usages.

Associations of clergymen for mutual improvement and for co-operation were early formed. Under the system of consociationism they became an integral part of the system. In New England, and to some extent elsewhere, they have for many years examined and approved candidates for the Christian ministry. Out of New England and districts adjacent they are passing away, and their functions are devolved on properly ecclesiastical bodies. Where they still flourish, the tendency is to regard them less as public and more as private bodies; although by common consent they render service in various ways in respect to questions of ministerial fellowship and certification.

Originally the ministry was limited in theory to occupants of the office of pastor or teacher in a particular church. This conception was soon outgrown, yet, until comparatively recent times, was allowed largely to determine in the churches the methods of ministerial discipline. The Boston Platform gave a broader definition, which has been generally accepted. The National Council at St. Louis (1880) adopted a resolution definitely recognizing the responsibility of every ordained minister to the communion of the churches. See the Minutes.

A review of the history of Congregationalism as a polity shows a progressive practical adjustment of the two principles, autonomy and the duty of fellowship.

During the eighteenth century, in connection with the increasing purpose to secure political independence, and with other movements in the public mind, the original conception of church communion was overshadowed. The organiztiation of the Union of States, the outbreak of Unitarianism, with the lessons it enforced, the growth of the missionary spirit, the propagation of Congregationalism in the West, the necessity of a definite basis of cooperation in order to a national extension of the system, have restored the neglected element to its due influence. At the same time, the principle of self-government and the rights of individual liberty and responsibility are sacredly cherished and guarded.

CONNOTA, in scholastic usage, are such concepts as must necessarily be thought of together; e.g., creator and creation. G. CONNOTA, in scholastic usage, are concepts which necessarily suggest one another; e.g., father suggests the idea of son, son that of father.
CONSCIENCE.

CONON, pope from Oct. 21, 686, to Sept. 21, 687; was a Thracian by birth, and educated in Sicily. The report that he commissioned St. Kilian to go as a missionary into Eastern Francognia is wholly unhistorical.

The followers of Conon, Bishop of Tarsus in Cilicia in the beginning of the seventh century; held certain tritheistic views, which, through Conon, they had derived from Johannes Philoponus. In other points, as, for instance, with respect to the resurrection of the body, Johannes and Conon disagreed very much. The sect had disappeared at the end of the seventh century.

CONRING, Hermann, b. at Norden in East Friesland, Nov. 9, 1606; d. at Helmstädt, Dec. 12, 1681; was educated at Helmstädt and Leyden, and became professor at Helmstädt in 1632, first in natural philosophy, then in medicine, and finally in law. He was one of the most learned men of his age, and in the field of theology he wrote a number of valuable treatises; and he held the juridical position of the Protestant Church in its relation to the Roman-Catholic Church, the empire, etc. -

15, 1801. But he soon became utterly disagreeable to Napoleon; and in 1806 he was commanded to resign, and was banished to Rheims. After the fall of Napoleon, however, he was returned to his office; and the restoration of the papal dominions nearly in the old extent was due to his remarkable diplomatic skill. He also succeeded in concluding advantageous concordats with Spain, Naples, Austria, Russia, etc. His internal government was less successful. He had to last no other means of protecting the country against the robbers and burglars with whom it was armed, but pensioning them. CONSCIENCE (New Testament Greek, συνείνώς). The word comes to us from the Latin conscientia, "being conscious thereof"; but neither Greek nor Roman used it in our sense. It had no religious bearing. It is known to the Old Testament, never used by our Lord, nor by the New Testament writers except Paul (and those inspired directly by him) and Peter. But Paul makes direct appeal to the conscience (2 Cor. iv. 2; Rom. ii. 15, xiii. 5, 6), and speaks of "weak" consciences (1 Cor. viii. 7, x. 25 sqq.). Elsewhere he uses it of the Christian conscience, as conscience exclusively (Acts xxvii. 22, 2 Tim. i. 19). In the Epistle to the Hebrews (ix. 9) the word is a short expression for the state of mind of those under the old covenant. The pre-Christian conscience "is," according to Paul, the divinely ordered ground of obedience (Rom. xiii. 4 sq.), or, generally speaking, the moral sense which sides with the requirements of the law (ii. 14 sqq.) because of a self-judgment testifying to the inner-most fact (ix. 1; 2 Cor. i. 12), and therefore to be placed alongside of that of the Searcher of hearts (2 Cor. v. 11; Rom. ii. 15, 16), and which also can judge the actions of others (2 Cor. v. 11, iv. 2). But Paul never hints at a conscience consciousness between the pre-Christian and Christian conscience. The New Testament knows nothing of a coercive conscience; rather it may be weak, narrow, erroneous (1 Cor. viii. 7 sq.). There can be "conscience" or "consciousness of guilt," which is removed by purification (Heb. x. 2).

The discussion of the "weak" conscience leads Paul to recognize the individuality of conscience. This was an important advance. He lays down the law that one should follow his own conscience, not another's, even though his conscience be weak, else moral personality were destroyed (1 Cor. x. 29 sqq., cf. viii. 10 sqq.). — By the blood of Christ the conscience is cleansed, and so the Christian has a "good" conscience (Rom. ix. 1; 2 Cor. i. 12; Heb. ix. 14, x. 22; in Pet. iii. 19 it is connected with baptism), and struggles earnestly to keep it (Acts xxiv. 16; Heb. xiii. 18; 1 Pet. iii. 16). This Christian "good" conscience is not the certainty of reconciliation, but the mirror of the moral condition in its true colors. Hence conscience is its own surety (2 Cor. i. 12), which testifies to its purity (1 Tim. iii. 9; 2 Tim. i. 3). Its opposite is a branded, defiled conscience (1 Tim. iv. 2; Tit. i. 15), the witness of conscious wickedness (1 Tim. i. 19); and therefore the "faith unfeigned" stands or falls with the "good" or "pure" conscience (1 Tim. i. 5, 10, iii. 9, iv. 1, 2).

There is no evidence that Paul considered conscience as competent to give of itself a correct knowledge of God, nor that from him the word — like "faith," "love," "spirit" — passed into the early Christian current speech: on the contrary, the word is seldom met with in the oldest Christian literature, and first comes up frequently when exegesis arose. Chrysostom gave the earliest clear expression to the idea of a "commanding, authoritative" conscience; but both Augustine and Pelagius repeat the popular idea of moral consciousness. The connection between "conscience" and "consciousness" was emphasized by the schoolmen in the interest of their subjective views of ethics. The most peculiar thing about the first scientific treatment of conscience is Ale...
same time distinguished from it. The word came from Jerome; but the schoolmen, under the influence of the Aristotelian psychology, found in it the practical intellect; i.e., what they called the potentia or habitus of the moral principle. Conscientia, on the other hand, denoted the only an actus. With its application came in the idea of fallibility; and so the door was opened to all sorts of hair-splitting judgments, notably by the writers of books upon casuistry. The Jesuits carried this direction the farthest; but they ignore a prejudice which probabilism removes. By Gerson and other mystics the syncretists defined the longing and power of the soul to come into immediate contact with God. See Kähler: Sententiarum, quas de cons., § 5. For the scholastic theory, and especially for the syncretiz, the best work is W. Gass: Die Lehre von Gewissen, Berlin, 1860, pp. 43 sq., 216 sq. The Jesuits to read are Escobar: Liber Theol. Moral., Ludig, 1844, specially chap. vi., and Gury: Comp. Theol. Moral., Brux., 1853, specially chap. iv.

During the middle age the idea of conscience was developed far beyond the New-Testament limits, and played a prominent part in the Reformation. Luther used the word in the sense of consciousness of duty, and appealed to its tribunal for its approval of the doctrine of justification by faith. Calvin calls conscience “the sense of divine, imperial justice.” Rome has since that day developed her casuistry; and Protestantism has ever called upon the religio-moral individual consciousness. Conscience is now recognized as an inalienable possession, but the idea itself has undergone no further development. A school of Protestant casuistry has sprung up for the settlement of cases of conscience and theological doubts, which indulges too much in the old minute subdivisions, but yet seeks to form “pure and unadulterated” theological judgment. Fichte speaks of the “Christian” conscience, by which one is to govern his life. The phrase “innate ideas” was abandoned for the “moral sense.” Rousseau talked about an instinct which led to licentious lives. The Jena University authorities felt called upon to deny all connection with the scandalous sect, and deputed Professor J. Musius to write for them. The result was Ablösung der ausgepreßten abscheulichen Verleumdung, ob wäre in der Universität Jena eine neue Sekte der sogenannten Gewissener entstanden, Jena, 1874, 2d ed., 1875. After this we hear no more of the sect. A letter of Knutsen is reprinted in Historia Atheismi a Jenkino Thomasio. See Adlung: Gesch. d. menschlichen Narrheit, Leipzig, 1755–99, 8 vols.

CONSECRATION. This term means to set apart for holy use and is variously applied. In the Bible both persons and things—vessels (Josh. vi. 19), profits (Mic. iv. 13), fields (Lev. xxvii. 28), cattle (2 Chron. xxix. 31), individuals (Num. vi. 9–13), and nations (Exod. xix. 6)—were separated to God’s service. In the ecclesiastical sense it is limited to persons and things distinctively holy. Thus churches, bishops, and the elements in the Lord’s Supper, are consecrated. For the latter uses of the word see Bishop and Lord’s Supper respectively. This article is limited to the Consolation of Churches. 1. The idea of setting apart for holy use is applied to....

Then one of the sub-deacons takes ashes, parchment is added containing the day of the parts of divine service; after which, the bishop walled Saturday, Sept. 13, 355. The dedication of St. Sophia in Constantinople (380) was with 'prayers and votive offerings.'

In later times it became customary to build churches over the tombs of martyrs; and then relics came to be regarded as 'absolutely essential to the sacredness of the building, and the deposition of such relics in or below the altar henceforward formed the central portion of the consecration-rite.' All the ancient rituals of consecration now extant belong to this later period.

These consecrated buildings were henceforth set apart exclusively for devotion. No eating or drinking was permitted in them, nor any carrying of arms. This latter prohibition speedily made them solemnities; and the Theodosian code extended the privilege to the various surroundings of a church, where meals might be taken, and sleeping-quarters established, for any length of time, by another law, however, it was modified by excluding public debtors, slaves, and Jews from benefiting by it in future; and Justinian afterwards excluded malefactors.'

2. The modern Church of Rome, in the matter of consecration of churches, retains the ancient usage, although the rite itself is commonly designated as a 'dedication.' The ceremony has been thus described: 'The relics which are to be deposited in the altar of the new church are put into a clean vessel, together with three grains of incense, to which a piece of parchment is added containing the day of the month and year, and the name of the officiating bishop. Three crosses are painted on each of the church walls, and over each cross a candle is placed. On the morning appointed for the ceremony, the bishop, arrayed in his pontifical vestments, and attended by the clergy, goes to the door of the church, where they recite the seven penitential psalms, after which he makes a tour of the church-walls, sprinkling them in the name of the Holy Trinity. This rite being performed, he knocks on the church-door with his pastoral staff, repeating from Psalm xxiv., Adolitae portas, et intrób Rit Gloria ('lift up, O gates, and the King of Glory shall come in'). A deacon shut up in the church demands, Quis est iste Rex Gloria? ('Who is this King of Glory?') To which the bishop answers, Dominus foris et popus, Dominus potens in praetio ('The Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle'). At the same time the bishop crosses the door, repeating the following verse: Ecce Crucis signum, fugiat phantasmata cuncta ('Behold the sign of the Cross, flee every kind of evil spirit, flee'). On the admission of the bishop and clergy into the church, the Veni Creator is sung. Then one of the sub-deacons takes ashes, and sprinkles them on the pavement in the form of a cross. Next follow the litanies and other parts of the service; after which, the bishop with his pastoral staff describes, as with the two alphabets [the Greek and Latin] in the ashes sprinkled by the deacon, and proceeds to consecrate the altar by sprinkling it with a mixture of water, wine, salt, and ashes, in the name of Jesus Christ. The consecration of the altar is followed by a solemn procession of the relics, which are deposited under it with great ceremony. During the whole of this imposing solemnity the church is finely adorned, and tapers are lighted upon the altar. Mass is afterwards performed by the bishop, or by some other person.'

3. But outside of Rome, in the Greek and all other Episcopal churches, some form of consecration has always been used. In the Church of England and the Episcopal Church of this country there is no authorized form of consecration for churches; but one prepared by the bishops in 1712 is used on both sides of the ocean. It is printed in the Prayer-Book. In the Methodist Episcopal and other Protestant denominations the setting-apart of buildings for divine service is usually called their 'dedication,' and the forms vary greatly. That used in the Methodist Church is given in § 501 of the Book of Discipline (ed. 1880), and consists of Scripture readings, prayers, a sermon, etc., all which service is conducted by the bishop.

CONSENSUS GENEVENSIS, drawn up by Calvin for the purpose of unifying the Swiss Reformed churches with regard to the doctrine of predestination, appeared at Geneva in 1552, having received the signatures of all the pastors of that city. But beyond Geneva it acquired no symbolic authority. The attempts to enlist the civil government in its favor created dissatisfaction and opposition in Berne, Basel, and Zürich. See Niemeyer: Collectio Confessionum, Lips., 1840, pp. 218 sqq.; Schaff: Creeds of Christendom, New York, 1877, 3 vols., vol. I. p. 471.

CONSENSUS TIQUIRINUS was drawn up by Calvin, in concert with Bullinger and the ministers of Zürich, in 1549, for the purpose of uniting the Swiss Reformed churches with regard to the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. It appeared at Zürich and Geneva in 1551, was adopted by the churches of Zürich, Geneva, St. Gall, Schaffhausen, the Grisons, Neuchatel, and Basel, and favorably received in France, England, and parts of Germany. See Niemeyer: Collectio Conf. in Eccles. Ref. public., Lips., 1840, pp. 191–217; Schaff: Creeds of Christendom, 3 vols., New York, 1877, vol. I. p. 471.

CONSILIA EVANGELICA. In contradistinction to the procepta, the Roman-Catholic Church calls such moral rules as are not obligatory on all Christians consilia evangelica. By adopting and fulfilling them, a Christian rises above that stage of holiness and virtue, which, strictly speaking, is the result of predestination, appeared at Geneva in 1552, having received the signatures of all the pastors of that city. But beyond Geneva it acquired no symbolical authority. The attempts to enlist the civil government in its favor created dissatisfaction and opposition in Berne, Basel, and Zürich. See Niemeyer: Collectio Confessionum, Lips., 1840, pp. 218 sqq.; Schaff: Creeds of Christendom, New York, 1877, 3 vols., vol. I. p. 471.

CONSILIA EVANGELICA. In contradistinction to the procepta, the Roman-Catholic Church calls such moral rules as are not obligatory on all Christians consilia evangelica. By adopting and fulfilling them, a Christian rises above that stage of holiness and virtue, which, strictly speaking, can be demanded from him, and acquires a, so to speak, superfluous merit which can be transferred to others. Already, very early, people believed that traces of such rules could be found in the Old Testament (see Matt. xxv. 21; Luke xvi. 10; 1 Cor. vii. 10, 25; comp. Hug. Tom. : Pastoral-Simil., III. 1, 3; E. Origen: Ad Rom., III., in tom. IV. p. 507, edition by De la Rue); and the doctrine began to develop, comprising, at first, only the three vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience, with; or, in reference to Matt. xix. 11, 21; Luke xiv. 26. With Thomas Aquinas the distinction between procepta and consilia is fully developed (Sum., II. 1, Quest. 108); and in the mean time the number of vows increased from three to twelve, referring to such places as Matt. v. 29, 35, 39, 42, etc. The three original vows, however, continued to be considered as the praecipua et substantialia perfectionis consilia; and on them was based a whole series of doctrines on monasticism and a contemplative life, on the distinction between a higher and a lower virtue, on the merits of the saints, on the thesaurus operum supererogationis, etc.

Before the criticism of the Reformation this whole illusion vanished. Not only was the distinction between praecipua and consilia completely disregarded, but the whole series of doctrines developed from it was decidedly rejected. As in a sound moral system there can be no adiaphora, so in a sound moral life there can be no opera supererogatoria; and that which, in the Scripture passages above referred to, the Roman-Catholic Church mistook for peculiar moral rules of a higher order, is nothing but a necessary regard to individual circumstances. See Confess. August., art. VI.: Apologia, cap. VI.; Form. Concord., art. VI.; and the first Protestant theologians, as, for instance, Chemnitz: Loci Theol., par. 102. The Roman-Catholic dogmatists felt the difficulty, and for a long time they used to settle the question of opera supererogationis in a hasty and vague way, until Möhler tried to take up anew the half-forgotten subject in his Symbolik oder Darstellung der dogmatischen Gegensätze der Katholiken und Protestanten, Mayence, 1832. A fresh investigation of the matter by Baur, Nitzsch, Rothe, and others, led to a second destruction of the whole web. See H. W. J. Thiersch: Vorlesungen über Katholizmus und Protestantismus, II. 106, 2d ed., Erlangen, 1848, 2 vols.

CONSISTENCIES. See Penitents.

CONSISTORY means, in the Roman-Catholic Church, a meeting of the College of Cardinals, presided over by the Pope, and, in the Lutheran Church, a mixed board of ecclesiastical and lay officers, generally appointed by the sovereign of the country. The papal consistories, or consistories of cardinals, are either public, when the Pope, surrounded by the cardinals, receives the foreign ambassadors, and public affairs are decided by his allocutions; or private, when only the cardinals are admitted, and affairs are discussed. In the Lutheran churches the consistories often perform the functions of the bishop, administering and superintending ecclesiastical affairs, and in some countries exercising jurisdiction and inflicting penalties. In the Reformed churches the consistory corresponds to the session of the Presbyterian Church.

CONSTANCE. The Council of, sat from Nov. 5, 1114, to April 22, 1118, and was the second of those three councils, which, during the fifteenth century, were convened for the purpose of reforming the Church, head and members; that of Pisa being the first, that of Basel the last. It was called by Pope John XXIII. and the Emperor Sigismund; and its three great objects were to heal the papal schism, to examine the heresy of Hus and the religious disturbances thereby caused in Bohemia, and to carry through a general reform of the Church. The Council was attended by twenty-nine cardinals, three patriarchs, thirty-three archbishops, about one hundred and fifty bishops, more than one hundred abbots, more than five hundred monks of different orders, and a similar number of professors and doctors of theology and canon law, besides princes, noblemen, ambassadors, etc. The Pope was also present. He rode into the city on Oct. 28, with great magnificence, sixteen hundred horses carrying his retinue and luggage. The emperor arrived on Christmas Eve; but he had only one thousand horses in his train. The total number of visitors to the city during the council was computed, at the lowest rate, at fifty thousand; but of these, more than one-third were mountebanks, money-lenders, strolling actors, and prostitutes. The most prominent and most influential members of the council were Pierre d'Ailly and his pupil Gerson.

The Council of Pisa (1409) had attempted to put an end to the schism by deposing both Gregory XII. (Angelo Corraro), who resided in Rome, and Benedict XIII. (Pietro de' Luna), who resided at Avignon, and elective in their stead Alexander V. But the result was simply, that there now were three popes instead of two; and the confusion continued unabated, when, after the death of Alexander V. (1410), the leaders of the Pisan council elected Cardinal Colonna. The result was, however, that the German, French, English, and Spanish nations, and in the plenary sessions the Italian nation, though ever so heavily represented, had, of course, only one vote beside the four other nations, —the German, French, English, and Spanish. He now endeavored to urge upon the assembly the view that the Council of Constance was nothing but a simple continuation of that of Pisa, which had formally condemned his two rivals, and, indirectly at least, legitimized his own election. But in this, too, he failed; and the party of Pierre d'Ailly finally succeeded in carrying a motion that all the three popes should be compelled to abdicate, and a new papal election take place. John XXIII. abdicated in the hope of being re-elected; but he soon became aware of his mistake, fled in the disguise of a groom, protested, was caught, and was finally brought to acquiesce in the decisions of the council. In its fifth plenary session (April 6, 1415), the assembly agreed that an ocumenical council, legally convened, and fully representative of the Church, has its power directly from Christ, and its decrees are consequently obligatory on all, even on the Pope. May 29, 1415, John XXIII. was deposed; July 4, 1415, Gregory XII. voluntarily abdicated; July 26, 1417, Benedict XIII. was deposed; and Nov. 11, 1417, Cardinal Odo Colonna was elected Pope, and assumed the name of Martin V., who closed the council April 22, 1418, at its forty-fifth session.

The Bohemian affairs were treated with great thoroughness. The Hussites were burnt July 6, 1415, and Jerome of Prague, May 30, 1416. But a final settlement was not arrived at, still less a satisfactory one. It was the school-wisdom of the university which here overwhelmed and tried to crush the free evangelical movement of popular life. Still more consequentially the council failed in its reform plans. A collegium reformatorum was formed in August, 1415; but characteristically enough for the whole situation, when Cardinal Zabarella read aloud to the assembly the decree of April 16, 1415, he willfully left out the passage it contained on the power of the council to undertake reforms in the Church. It was the lower clergy, the monks, the doctors, and professors, led by Pierre d’Ailly and Gerson, and supported by the emperor, who demanded reforms. But the abuses in which reforms were necessary — such as the appeals to the Pope and the papal procedure, the administration of vacant benefices, and the giving in commendam, simony, dispensations, indulgences, etc. — were the very sources from which the Pope, the cardinals, and the huge swarm of ecclesiastical officials in Rome, drew their principal revenues. In fighting against reforms, the cardinals fought pro aris et focis, and they proved unconquerable. The emperor's wish for the question of reform discussed and decided before the election of a new Pope; but the cardinals declared that the worst ailings of the Church was its lack of a head: and, when Martin V. was elected, he understood how to bury away the whole affair quietly and smoothly, by grave hesitations and cautious procrastinations.

CONSTANTINE THE GREAT AND HIS SONS. I. Constantine, Roman Emperor from 306 to 337; was born in 274, at Naissus in Upper Moesia, a son of Constantius Chlorus and Helena, and was, after the death of his father at York (July 25, 306), proclaimed emperor by the legions of Gaul. He immediately took possession of Britain, Gaul, and Spain; and after a series of brilliant victories over Maxentius, ending with the bloody battle at the Milvian Bridge, just under the walls of Rome, he also became master of Italy (312). He now ruled over the Western Empire, as Licinius over the Eastern: but war broke out between them in 314; and in 323, after the battle of Chalcedon, in which Licinius was killed, Constantine became sole lord of the whole Roman world. He died in 337, at Nicomedia.

Tradition tells us that he was converted to Christianity suddenly, and by a miracle. One evening during the contest with Maxentius, he saw a radiant cross appearing in the heavens, with the inscription, “By this thou shalt conquer.” The tradition is first mentioned by Eusebius, in his De Vita Constantini, written after the emperor’s death. This miracle has been defended with ingenious sophistry by Roman-Catholic historians, and by Car. Dr. Newman (Two Essays on Biblical and on Ecclesiastical Miracles, 3d ed., Lond., 1873, pp. 271 sqq.), but cannot stand the test of critical examination. Constantine may have seen some phenomenon in the skies; he may even have desired a change of policy in favor of Christianity as the rising religion; but his conversion was a change of policy, rather than of moral character. Long after that event he killed his son, his second wife, several others of his relatives, and some of his most intimate friends, in passionate resentment of some fancied infringement of his rights. In his relation to Christianity he was cool, calculating, always bent upon the practically useful, always regarding the practically possible. He retained the office and title of Pontifex Maximus to the last, and did not receive Christian baptism until he felt death close upon him. He kept Pagans in the highest positions in his immediate surroundings, and forbade every thing which might look like an encroachment of Christianity upon Paganism. Such a faith in such a character is not the result of a sudden conversion by a miracle: if it were, the effect would be more miraculous than the cause. Judging from the character both of his father and mother, it is probable that he grew up in quiet but steady contact with Christianity. Christianity had, indeed, become something in the air which no one occupying a prominent position in the Roman world could remain entirely foreign to. But the singular mixture of political carefulness and personal indifference with which he treated it presupposes a relation of observation rather than impression. He knew Christianity well, but only as a power in the Roman Empire; and he protected it as a wise and far-seeing statesman. As a power not of this world, he hardly ever came to understand it.

His first edict concerning the Christians (Rome, 312) is lost. By the second (Milan, 313) he granted them, not only free religious worship and the recognition of the State, but also repARATION of previously incurred losses. Banished men who worked on the galleries or in the mines were recalled, confiscated estates were restored, etc. A series of edicts of 315, 316, 319, 321, and 323, completed the reformation of the Church and Helens, and ordered the offices of the State, both military and civil; the Christian clergy was exempted from all municipal burdens, as were the pagan priests; the emancipation of Christian slaves was facilitated; Jews were forbidden to keep Christian slaves, etc. An edict of 321 ordered Sunday to be celebrated by cessation of all work in public. When Constantine became master of the whole empire, all these edicts were extended to the whole realm, and the Roman world more and more assumed the aspect of a Christian state. One thing, however, puzzled and annoyed the emperor very much,—the dissensions of the Christians, their perpetual squabbles about doctrines, and the fanatical hatred thereby engendered. In the Roman Empire the most different religions lived peacefully beside each other, and here was a religion which could not live in peace with itself. For political reasons, however, unity and harmony were necessary; and in 325 the Emperor convened the first great ecumenical council at Nicaea to settle the Arian controversy. It was the first time the Christian Church and the Roman State met each other face to face; and the impression was very deep on both sides. When the council was held there, among the three hundred and eighteen bishops, tall, clad in purple and jewels, with his peculiarly haughty and sombre mien, he felt disgusted at those coarse and cringing creatures who one moment scrambled to face; and the impression was very deep on both.

He saw that with Christianity was born a new sentiment in the human heart hitherto unknown to mankind, and that on this sentiment was descent from the gods; but this was not sufficient for the emperor. He wanted to defend and develop the eastern part of the empire from Rome, etc. Probably there were also, in Rome, traditions which Constantine, as the first Christian emperor, wished to escape from, since he had not power to break them. He chose Byzantium for his new capital, and spent immense sums of money in rebuilding and adorning it. Strong walls and commodious harbors were constructed; gorgeous palaces, baths, and theatres were erected; numerous magnificent churches were built,—that of the Apostles, that of St. Sophia, afterwards rebuilt by Justinian, etc.

The character of this new capital during the first centuries of its life is well known from the writings of St. Chrysostom. It was elegant but protrial, feverish in its aspirations, over-refined in its enjoyment, and lax in its morals. What it produced was brilliant and gorgeous, but there was often poison in it. A striking feature was the prominent part which women played in its life. They cultivated the artistic forms, until, in Byzantine literature and art, the ideal contents were completely suffocated; and they introduced the same formalism into actual life. They nursed the court-intrigues until Byzantine government became a mere struggle between the eunuchs of the antechamber; and they transferred this trickery to the affairs of the Church. Nevertheless, as a mere rival to Rome, Constantinople has been of invaluable service to the Christian Church, however her direct influence may be considered.

The Bishop of Constantinople belonged originally to the metropolitan diocese of Heraclea. But just as the political prestige of Rome formed the most powerful impulse in the development of the papacy, exactly the same political prominence of Constantinople forced the Constantinopolitan episcopacy out of the shadow. The Council of Constantinople (381) decreed in its can. 3 that the Bishop of Constantinople should have the title of Patriarch (like the bishops of Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Rome), and should rank next to the Bishop of Rome, no other reason being alleged, but that Constantinople was the new Rome, the second capital of the empire. The Council of Chalcedon (451) went still farther. Its can. 28 gave the Bishop of Constantinople equal rank with the Bishop of Rome, and the right of superintendent, ordination, and convocation of synods for Fontus, Thrace, and Asia. The Concilium Quinisextum (692) repeated, confirmed, and even enlarged all these privileges. Of course, the bishops of Rome protested. Leo I. rejected can. 28 of the Council of Chalcedon rather inconsistently, as he accepted all its other decrees; and Gregory I. almost forgot himself when John Ignatius in 587 assumed the title of Ecumenical Patriarch. These protests, and the shrewd manner in which the Roman bishops played upon the ever-recurring difficulties between the Constantinopolitan patriarchs and the Constantinopolitan emperors, contributed much to prevent the formation of a Constantinopolitan papacy, but could not prevent a split between the Roman and the Greek Church; which latter article see.

The succession of the Constantinopolitan bishops is almost completely known (see Fabri: Bild. Greg., VI. p. 78); and in many cases a mere glance over the list gives an insight into the turbulent events of this history; as, for instance, when Ignatius, Callistus, and Philotheus are found to have been deposed and re-instated, etc. Four periods may be conveniently distinguished: the first, to the controversy with Photius (801), or the complete separation from the West (1054); the second, to the establishment of the Latin dynasty, during which (1204–61), the Patriarch of Constantinople removed to Nice; the third, to the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks (1523); and the fourth, to our times. During the first centuries of the Turkish rule the patriarchs of Constantinople, charged not only with the ecclesiastical, but also, to some extent, with the civil jurisdiction over their flock, presented a sad picture of weakness, injustice, simony, fraud, and violence. (See Heineck: Abiblung d. alt. und neuen griech. Kirche, I. p. 46, and III. p. 49; Thomas Smith: De Eccl. Græc. Statu Hodierno, in his Opuscula, Rotterdam, 1716; Geis: Darstellung d. Rechtzustandes in Griechenland während d. türk. Herrschaft, Heidelberg, 1855.) By the consolidation of the Russian Church their power lost in compass, but their influence as caliph, so far that his authority over the Mohammedan world is now only nominal. Sultan Hamid has made great efforts to revive it, but without much success. It seems justly, that the caliphate will ultimately be transferred to Mecca, and become a purely spiritual office. Constantinople will then cease to be a Mohammedan city.

The non-Mohammedan population of Constantinople occupies a peculiar position. There are some sixty thousand Greeks, who are Turkish subjects, but under the authority of their own Bahom Bashı. There are also seven Christian communities—the Greeks, Armenians, Bulgarians, Latins, Armeno-Catholics, Protestants, and Syrians—which have separate organizations, and “enjoy special immunities,” or, more justly, are under special disabilities. The Mohammedan conquerors of the Byzantine Empire adopted the plan of dealing with all non-Mohammedans whom they found in the country enhasse as communities and not as individuals. These communities were regarded by the Turks as religious rather than national, and their religious chiefs were recognized as their official representatives at the Sublime Porte. They were nominated by the communities, and appointed by the Sultan, their rights and duties being carefully specified in the imperial trade which confirmed the appointment. The results of this system have been both good and bad. It has consolidated and preserved the churches, but it has secularized them. It has protected the Christians from persecution to a certain extent, but has left them without any interest in the government, and helpless in the hands of their own ecclesiastics. Viewed from a Turkish stand-point, it has preserved the purely Mohammedan character of the government; but it has insured its ultimate destruction. Since the Crimean war the Turks have seen what was coming, and have made some half-hearted attempts to escape this result. They have sought to divide up the Christian communities, to modify their charters, to create an Ottoman nationality to include Mohammedans and Christians, “with equal rights and duties:” but these attempts have failed thus far because the Sultan and the ulema are unwilling to modify the essentially Mohammedan character of the government.

The authority of the religious chiefs of the Christian communities has been very much weakened; but, so far as the Turkish Government is Concerned, this has been more than counterbalanced by the rapid growth of national feeling, the increasing influence of the laity, and the general progress of enlightenment in these communities. They are more opposed to Mohammedan rule than ever before. They would submit to the Sultan as a civil ruler under proper European guarantees; but they think that the time has come when Constantinople must soon cease to be a Mohammedan city.

Some important religious changes deserve to be mentioned here. The Greek Patriarch, since the beginning of the century, has lost most of his importance. He no longer has any authority over Greece, Servia, Montenegro, or Roumania; and by the Bulgarian schism he lost four million of his flock. His church numbers about two million at the present time. The Roman-Catholic Church, it has been generally successful. It has adopted a liberal constitution, which limits the power of the ecclesiastics, and increases that of the laity. It encourages education and reform, and has ceased to persecute those who adopt evangelical views. An independent Bulgarian exarch has been recognized by the Porte, and a new church organized, which is in doctrinal agreement with the other orthodox Oriental churches, but liberal, and inclined to reform. There are but few Bulgarians in Constantinople, but this is the seat of the exarchate.

Protestantism has also been officially recognized as one of the authorized religions of the empire. It has its official creed at Constantinople; but most of its adherents are in Asia Minor, Armenia, and Syria. Its establishment resulted from the labors of American missionaries, whose influence for good has extended far beyond the circle of their converts.

Among the most interesting institutions in modern Constantinople are Robert College and the American School for Girls at Scutari. Robert College was founded in 1826, by the munificence of Mr. C. R. Robert of New York, and under the direction of Rev. Cyrus Hamlin, D.D., formerly a missionary of the American Board. It was designed to give to the people of the East, without distinction of race or religion, an educational institution in all respects equal to the best American colleges; and it has won the respect and confidence of all the nationalities of the empire. It has now fifteen professors and two hundred and twenty-seven students. While not in any sense sectarian, it is a Christian college; and it has already exerted an influence for good which can hardly be over-estimated.

The school at Scutari was established later; but it is a mission school, and its success is due entirely to the work which Robert College is doing for young men.

Modern Constantinople is no longer what it was even fifty years ago. The material civilization of Europe has invaded it and transformed it. Steamships, railways and tramsways, telegraphs, and newspapers have forced their way into it. The streets are lighted with gas. Ready-made clothing and Manchester cottons have transformed the people. Great fires have desolated the city, and made way for stiff European houses built of brick and stone. The janizaries have disappeared. The European ambassadors, who used to submit quietly to every indignity, now dine with their wives at the Sultan's table, and dictate his policy. The Christian qâbah no longer trembles in presence of a Turk, nor gets down from his horse when he passes the palace. The Mohammedan smokes his pipe in Ramazzan if he pleases; and the Christian eats meat in Lent without fear of the Patriarch. The vices and follies of Europe have been added to those of the East; and, while there have been many changes for the better, it may be doubted whether, on the whole, there is as much genuine religious faith in the city as there was fifty years ago.

CONSUBSTANTIATION, a technical term denoting the Lutheran view of the elements of the Lord's Supper, in contradistinction from the Roman-Catholic view,—transubstantiation. According to the Roman doctrine, the bread and the wine are by the consecration transformed into the flesh and blood of Christ: while, according to the Lutheran doctrine, the bread and wine remain bread and wine; though, after the consecration, the real flesh and blood of Christ co-exist in and with the natural elements, just as a heated iron bar still remains an iron bar, though a new element, heat, has come to co-exist in and with it,—an illustration which Luther himself has used in his letter to Henry VIII. It is but proper to state that the Lutheran divines repudiate the popular term "consubstanciation," in the sense of a permanent connection of the elements with the body and blood of Christ. They confine this connection to the act of the communion.

Contarini, Gasparo, b. in Venice, Oct. 16, 1483; d. at Bologna, Aug. 24, 1542; descended from a noble Venetian family, and received a very careful but entirely secular education. He wrote De Immortalitate Animi adversus Pomponatium, but from a purely rational point of view. In 1521 he was sent to Germany as ambassador of the republic to Charles V.; and he accompanied the emperor back to Spain. After the conquest of Rome he contributed much to bring about a reconciliation between the Pope and the emperor, and between the emperor and the republic. The depth of his interest, and the compass of his capacity as a statesman and diplomatist, he proved by his work De Magistratibus et Republica Venetorum. From early youth, however, he had been open to strong religious impressions. In the days of Leo X. he had joined the Oratorium S. Amoris; and in Venice he stood at the head of the movement which wished a reform of the Church, and was willing to work for it. Thus, when Paul III. on 1531 suddenly and unexpectedly made him a cardinal, he accepted the position without hesitation. In 1537 he was made a member of the committee formed for the purpose of examining the state of the Church, and making propositions to its reform; and when Paul III. received his Consilium de Emendanda Ecclesia without of- fense, if not with favor, he was full of hope and confidence. But nothing came of the matter. Under Paul IV., the treatise, which had been published without the knowledge of Contarini, and circulated in Germany with Luther’s annotations, was put on the Index. As unsuccessful was his mission as papal legate to the Diet of Ratisbon (1541). He was fully convinced of the necessity of reform; but Luther, whom he had met at Worms, he disliked, and the German reform in its popular shape he utterly distrusted. He wanted a reform from the head. The evangelical doctrine of justification by faith he had accepted, but only in its positive form, not so as to exclude the whole false practice of the Roman Church. In Ratisbon he did not win the Protestants, and he roused the suspicion of the Romanists. After his return he was made papal legate at Bologna; but he lived to see the reaction set in, and his friends fleeing to foreign countries to escape the Inquisition. His works were pub- lished in Paris (1571) and in Venice (1589). In the latter edition, however, the text of the trea- tise on justification is mutilated and altered. See BRIEGER: Th. Gasparo Contarini und das Regensburger Concordienwerk, 1870; Die Rechtfertigungs- lehre der Card. Contarini, by the same, in Studien und Kritiken, 1872, I.; CHRISTOFFEL: Card. Contarinis Leben und Schriften, in Zeitschrift f. his- torische Theologie, 1875, II. C. WEIZSÄCKER.

CONVENT means both the whole establish- ment in which a society of monks or nuns are settled, its buildings, rules, purpose, etc., and the members of those members of the institution who are entitled to give their advice on certain points of administration or government.

CONVENTICLE (Latin, conventiculum) meant in the primitive church any meeting for the sake of religious worship, but is, since the time of Charles II., applied in English only to the meet- ings of the dissenters from the Church of Eng- land.

CONVENTICLE ACT, the first passed 1604, the second April 11, 1670; repealed by the Toler- ation Act, May 24, 1689. According to the first, "If any person above the age of sixteen, after the 1st of July, 1664, shall be present at any meeting, under color or pretence of any exercise of religion, in other manner than is allowed by the liturgy or practice of the Church of England, where shall be five or more persons than the household, shall for the first offence suffer three months’ imprisonment, upon record made upon oath under the hand and seal of a justice of the peace, or pay a sum not exceeding five pounds; for the second offence, six months’ imprisonment, or ten pounds; and, for the third offence, the offender to be banished to some of the American plantations for seven years, excepting New England and Virginia, or pay one hundred pounds; and in case they return" [i.e., ere the seven years], "or make their escape, such persons are to be punished, as being notorious, without benefit of clergy. Sheriffs or justices of the peace, or others commissioned by them, are em- powered to dissolve, dissipate, and break up all unlawful conventicles, and to take into custody such of their number as they think fit. They who suffer such conventicles in their houses or barns are liable to the same forfeitures as other offenders. The prosecution is to be within three months. Moreover, all persons at conventicles are to be imprisoned for twelve months, unless their husbands pay forty shillings for their re- demption. This act to continue in force for three years after the next session of Parliament." In 1670 the act was renewed in a modified form; the fines were increased, and the risk of exile was removed. On the other hand, the chance of escape was made much less; for any justice of the peace who refused to execute the act was fined five pounds, and the greatest encourage- ment given to informers.

The Conventicle Act is a blot on English history. It caused much suffering to innocent worthy people. It was not even administered impartially; for, as Neal testifies, the Roman Catholics were not molested. See Neal: History of the Puritans, part iv., chaps. 7, 8 (Harper’s ed., vol. ii. pp. 272, 273).

CONVERSION (Hebrew תַּחַת, "return," "re- pentance" [only once, Isa. xxx. 15], from בַּחַת, "to turn;" Greek μετάνοια, "a change of mind;" εὐαγγελίας [once, Acts xv. 3], "a turning towards or about;" Latin, conversio) denotes the act in which the soul estranged from God turns back to him in order that it may share refresh in his grace. It is a return, because man re-enters his former position towards God, which he had lost by the fall. It is also a turning-from, because former sins are abandoned (Acts xiv. 15), and, again, a change of mind (Acts xxvi. 20). By nature the "slave of sin," and therefore a "child of wrath" (Eph. ii. 3), and "dead" (Eph. ii. 1; Col. ii. 13), he is renewed in the spirit of his mind, and puts on "the new man, which after God hath been created in righteousness and holiness of truth." (Eph. iv. 21). But how can this radical change be made? Not by his own unaided will (John xv. 5), nor any more without his will (Acts iii. 10; 2 Pet. iii. 9). The condition, therefore, is the divine aid; and so repentance is a gift of God (Acts xi. 18; Phil. ii. 13), and therefore something to be thankful for. Yet every Christian knows that he "beareth not the fruit of repentance;" rather he has earnestly desired the altered life. In this work of God, therefore, the human and the divine acts stand side by side, and both must be equally recognized, not the one at the expense of the other.

It is a problem to find exactly where the human meets the divine. Pelagians, Semipelagians, Syr- ergists, have in vain tried to solve it. The Lu- theran doctrine on the means of grace (the Word and sacraments) solves it. This is, that these "means" are divine gifts, which convey the Spirit to their recipient, and thus he is strengthened, and awakened into new energy. But the grace is not irresistible; on the contrary, can be effectually and utterly resisted. The will formed by this grace is no longer bound by sin, but inclined towards God. Weak though it may be, it is incapable of the wrath without the grace of God is in it, and he will see to its development.

No one can lay down laws for the process of conversion. One man is quickly turned about: to another a long struggle is requisite. In the former case there will be found a preparation, unconscious though the subject be of it. Take the crucial case of Paul (Acts ix. 1-22). His was a sudden, spontaneous visitation, and the very days between the appearance of Christ to him upon his journey from Jerusalem to Damascus, and the visit of Ananias, must not be overlooked; for, during those hours of enforced cessation from work, the truth of that new faith for which Jesus himself was crucified, may have been borne in upon his soul. Even so in the cases of the jailer at Philippi, there was an acquaintance with Paul's preaching (Acts xvi.); yea, the malefactor on the cross (Luke xxiii. 40 seq.) showed that he had been impressed by Christ.

When we speak of the baptized, we must bear in mind that, by the very fact of their baptism, stand upon quite a different plane from the unbaptized. They are no longer "natural" men in the above sense of the word. Each of them has been accepted by God, called by his name, and has the seeds of the new life sown in his heart. For baptism is the "laver of regeneration" (Tit. iii. 5). Regeneration is not, however, the same thing as conversion. It is rather that act of divine grace whereby God sets the new manhood in a man, not as the ultimate fruit, but as a seed. It is therefore conceivable, and indeed actually, though rarely, the case, that this "seed" steadily grows unto its perfection. For such there is no "conversion" necessary. But for the great majority the seed sown in baptism is partially killed; yet not entirely. The grace of baptism affords a basis for the divine operation. By other means of grace the process of growth is effected, particularly by the word of God, in the form of preaching (Rom. x. 17) in its two forms of law and gospel. They work together,—the law, repentance; the gospel, faith. It is indeed true that the assurance of faith for which Jews and Gentiles, by both Calvinists and Arminians. It is, however, taught by the High Anglican theologians (see BLUNT: Dictionary of Doctrinal and Historical Theology, art. Baptism). The Calvinistic view of conversion is given in HODGE: Systematic Theology, vol. iii. chap. xv., "Regeneration;" the Arminian, in WATSON: Institutes (29th ed. N.Y.), vol. ii. chap. xxiv. See REGENERATION.

CONVOCATION, in the Church of England, an assembly of the bishops and clergy by their respective metropolitan, in pursuance of royal order, within the provinces of Canterbury and of York. Its sessions are contemporaneous with those of Parliament, and concern ecclesiastical affairs. Each convocation has two houses,—the Upper, which consists of the bishops; and the Lower, of the clergymen, archdeacons, proctors for the chapters, and proctors for the parochial clergy. Their actions were formerly of great importance; but since Henry VIII.'s time they have been shorn of their power. In consequence of the Bangorian Controversy (see Bishop HODLEY), the Convocation of Canterbury, which has always been by far the more important body, was prorogued in 1717; and no license from the Crown for the transaction of business was obtained until 1861. In this body originated the Anglo-American Bible-revision movement, February, 1870 (see CANTERBURY). See the article Convocation in Encycl. Brit., 9th ed., vol. vi. pp. 825-830. In the Episcopal Church in America there is no body exactly corresponding to Convocation. See EPISCOPAL CHURCH. T. LATHBURY: History of the Convocation of the Church of England, and of the Anglican Ecclesiastical Councils, from the Earliest Period, London, 1842.

CONVOLUTIONISTS is the name of a fanatical sect of the Jansenists. In 1727 the Dean of Paris died, and was buried in the Cemetery of St. Médard. A "Jansenist every inch," he had belonged to the Appellants, and died with the appeal in his hand. His saintly life, the ascetic practices which caused his death, and the extraordinary charity which made him divide his great revenues among the poor, had made a most effective propaganda for Jansenism and the Appellants among the lower classes in Paris. In 1729, when the intrigues of Abbé Dubois, the violence of Cardinal Fleury, and, more than any thing else, the retraction of M. de Noailles, Archbishop of Paris, had brought the victory into the hands of the Jesuits, it was suddenly reported that miracles were wrought on the grave of François, God himself thus bearing witness against the Pope and his hated bull Unigenitus. People came in great numbers to the cemetery, and when they reached the grave they were often overtaken by violent fits of convulsions: hence the name. In this state they prophesied, and testified against the bull; and a guaranty of the truth of their prophecies and testimonies was given by the instantaneous cures from dis-CONYBEARE, William Daniel, b. at Bishops-gate, Eng., June 7, 1876; d. near Portsmouth, Aug. 12, 1857. In 1839 delivered the Bampton Lecture on the Christian Fathers during the Ante-Nicene Period. He was made Dean of Llandaff in 1853. The majority of his writings were upon geological topics; and of the Geological Society he was an early and staunch friend.

CONYBEARE, William John, son of the preceding, d. 1857. He was a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and a frequent contributor to the Edinburgh Review, upon ecclesiastical and social topics, of which essays the most famous was on Church Parties, i.e., the parties within the Anglican Church. He also wrote a novel, Persecution, or the Causes and Consequences of Infidelity, London, 1856. But his title to fame rests upon his labor, in conjunction with the Rev. J. S. Howson (now Dean of Chichester), upon the Life and Letters of St. Paul, London, 1850-53, 2 vols., since often reprinted in England and the United States. Of the twenty-eight chapters of this work Mr. Conybeare contributed nine; but these include the speeches and letters of Paul, all of which he translated and annotated. His translations are spirited and faithful. A volume of his Sermons preached in the Chapel Royal, Whitehall, London, appeared London, 1844; and his Essays, Ecclesiastical and Social, have been collected and published.

COOK, Charles, the father of Methodism in France and Switzerland; b. in London, May 31, 1787; d. at Lausanne, Feb. 21, 1838. Merle d'Aubigné said of him, "The work which John Wesley did in the British Kingdom, Charles Cook did upon the Continent, except that it was not so extensive." He went to France in 1816, was indefatigable in labor, and largely through his agency was there a revival of religion among French Protestants under the Restoration. He organized numerous little societies, which either joined the Reformed Church, or continued independent. On one occasion he was shipwrecked off the island of Ouessant, and after five days^s anxiety he was landed on the coast of Brittany. He then traveled about the country, and his agency was there a revival of religion among French Protestants under the Restoration.

COOKMAN, George Grimston, b. in Kingston-upon-Hull, Yorkshire, Eng., Oct. 21, 1800; lost at sea in the steamship President, March, 1841. He became a Methodist preacher in 1823, and in 1825 settled in America, first in Philadelphia, and became an itinerant preacher, although his purpose in leaving England was to convert the negroes. From the first year of his ministry he took a commanding position. His speech at a meeting of the Young Men’s Bible Society in New Brunswick, N.J., in the year 1828, was one of his earliest platform addresses, but immediately established his reputation as a first-class orator. He served upon various circuits. In the spring of 1838 was sent to Washington, and in the winter was elected chaplain of the United-States Congress. Here he won fresh laurels, and not only human plaudits, but the approval of his conscience; for he did not shun to declare the whole counsel of God. In the spring of 1841 the expiration of that Congress terminated his chaplaincy. He then determined to revisit England. He was made a fraternal delegate to represent the American Bible Society at the anniversary of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and bearer of the first despatches to the British Government from the incoming administration of Gen. Harrison. He preached a farewell sermon in the Capitol,—one of the greatest oratorical triumphs of his life. He sailed from New York March 11, and was never heard of more. He wrote no books; and with the exception of a triumph of his life. He sailed from New York going from place to place, and everywhere doing the work whose record is on high. He was licensed as an exhorter in the Methodist-Episcopal Church in Baltimore, Nov. 1, 1845. He held various appointments in connection with different conferences, and lived the life of a popular and beloved Methodist minister, carrying on his work in connection with antiquity. COPTS AND THE COPTIC CHURCH. Egypt Proper, that is the Valley of the Nile from the sea up to Assuan, contains at present a population of about five millions and a quarter, of which the five millions are Mohammedans, and the rest Christians. Of the Christians, by far the greatest and most interesting portion belongs to the Coptic Church, a native institution of the country, while a minor portion belongs to various foreign churches.

Ethnographically speaking, the Copts have descended directly from the old Egyptian population, so far as this was a pure and unmixed race at the time when Christianity was introduced in the country, during the Roman and Byzantine rule. While the mass of the people, after embracing Islam, suffered a considerable influx of Arabian blood, the Copts kept pure their blood as well as their creed. Their very name proves their direct connection with antiquity. The word “Copt” is not derived from Coptos, a city in Upper Egypt, but from ‘Alytiſtioſ, of which it is an abbreviation or corruption. When the Arabs conquered Egypt, and “Ghubt” or “Ghibt” is still the name for “dispersing of Browne’s bookes against the Church of England; and for this offence they were both hanged. See DEXTER: Congregationalism, as seen in its Literature, N.Y., 1880 (pp. 208–210).

COPE (Latin capa), a long cloak reaching from the neck to the heels, open in front, but fastened at the top by a clasp; was known in antiquity as one of the most common fashions of overcoat, then adopted as an ecclesiastical vestment, and worn, until quite recently, in the English Church, by bishops in Parliamentary sessions at coronations, and on other similar occasions.

COPLESTON, Edward, an English prelate; b. at Offwell, Devonshire, Feb. 2, 1776; d. near Cherstow, Oct. 14, 1849. He was elected a fellow of Oriel College, Oxford (1799), and in 1800 appointed professor of Hebrew. In 1813 he published the substance of his famous lectures under title Prelectiones Academica. In 1814 Provost of Oriel College, he became in 1826 Dean of Chester, and took the degree of D.D. by diploma, and in 1827 Bishop of Llandaff, and Dean of St. Paul’s. He published, besides articles, several important theological works, of which the best is Enquiry into the Doctrines of Necessity and Predestination, London, 1821. Dr. Whateley edited his Remains with REminiscences of his Life. See, also, W. J. Copleton: Memoirs of E. Copleston, with Selections from his Diary and Correspondence, London, 1851.

COPPING (Copin, Copyn), John, a martyr of Congregationalism, a layman of the preceding Edmunds, who was hanged on Friday, June 5, 1583, for “dispersing of Brownes (Robert) bookes and Harrisons bookes.” In 1576 he was committed at Bury by the commissary of the bishop for disobedience to the ecclesiastical laws, and was imprisoned in all seven years, although not very strictly. In August, 1578, a child was born to him; and, because there was no minister in the place who “could make a sermon,” he refused it baptism for four months. This action aggravated his case. During his long imprisonment he and his fellow-prisoner, Thacker, found means of circulating Browne’s books against the Church of England; and for this offence they were both hanged. See DEXTER: Congregationalism, as seen in its Literature, N.Y., 1880 (pp. 208–210).
towards old Egypt. Circumcision, for instance, performed together with baptism and total abstinence from pork, are peculiarities which the Copts hardly have adopted from the hated Moslems.

With respect to religious and ecclesiastical relations, the present Coptic Church is a continuation of the old Monophysitic Church of Egypt. By the zeal of the Syrian monk Jacobel-baradde (whence the sect name, Jacobites), Monophysitism spread to such an extent in Egypt that nearly the whole population adopted it; and neither the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon (451), condemning its doctrines, nor the edicts of the emperors, were able to eradicate it. The party of the Orthodox Church were called "Melechites;" that is, royalists, because they were supported by the state, by the emperor. The party was very small; but it comprised the officials, it commanded the populace, partook, but also the swarms of fanatic and pugnacious monks and hermits, who, divided into several parties, bloody contests arose, in which not only the populace partook, but also the swarms of fanatical and pugnacious monks and hermits which covered the neighborhood of Alexandria and the deserts on both sides of the Nile Valley. The steadily repeated attempts of suppression from the side of the Byzantine Government produced a steadily increased exasperation among the Egyptian Christians; and the result was, that the latter actually sailed the Arabs (in 638) as liberators. Not only they made no resistance against the invaders, but they actually aided them in driving out the Imperialists, and in taking possession of the country. In recognition of their services, they were at first treated with mildness and regard by the conquerors, and many privileges were granted to them. But by degrees, as the proselytizing zeal of the Moslems came into active play, and large portions of the Christians proved willing to abandon their faith, persecution was instituted against the stubborn ones, and the Coptic Church has suffered much from the intolerance and fanaticism of Islam. The Copts form at present nowhere in Egypt a compact population. They are scattered all over the country, mostly in small communities. They are most strongly represented in Fayûm (the famous oasis in Middle Egypt) and in Cairo, where the community numbers about ten thousand souls. Their total number is about two hundred thousand. But, in spite of its circumscribed dimensions, the Coptic Church has a very elaborate articulated hierarchy and a numerous clergy. At the head stands the Patriarch, who, like all the higher dignitaries, is taken from among the monks. He resides in Cairo, but is still styled "Mutrub-el-Iscanderijeh" (Metropolis of Alexandria), and regarded as the successor of St. Mark. Next to the Patriarch ranks the abuna of the Abyssinian Church, residing at Gondar; then follow the bishops, of whom there are not less than twelve; then the lower clergy, arch-priests, priests, and deacons; and finally the inmates of the monasteries, monks and nuns, whose rules are said to be very strict. There are quite a number of monasteries, and some of them date back to the first Christian centuries. One of the most prominent among them is that of St. Anthony, situated in the Eastern Desert. The Patriarch is very rarely taken from among its monks. Celibacy is common among the clergy, though not universal. In the Coptic, as in other Oriental churches, marriage is forbidden to the regular clergy and to the higher grades of the secular clergy. Generally the clergy is much revered by the people; though the stand-point it actually occupies, spiritually and morally, does not command respect. Of theological education very little will be said, even among the highest dignitaries. The priests know generally nothing of the Bible but the Gospels and a few Psalms: they can read Coptic, but they cannot understand it. Unfortunately their morals are not better than their theology. They are avaricious, and full of swindling and lying. As they are poor, and without any fixed pay of any kind, the most make their living by begging, and shifts of all kinds. But the worst of all is, they drink. Drunkenness is the besetting sin of the Coptic Church: head and members drink nakti together, and even the church festivals are almost disgraced by frightful outbursts of this vice.

The church-buildings are generally miserable, dirty, and out of repair. Only in Cairo and Alexandria are there large and comely churches: that of Alexandria was built in 1871. The church of Mary, however, at Old Cairo is noticeable; as it dates from the sixth century, and is the oldest Christian church in Egypt. It is built over a grotto, in which Mary is said to have lived with the infant Jesus during her stay in Egypt. The interior of the churches is generally divided into several parts. The Holiest of the Holy contains the altar, but is entirely concealed from the eyes of the congregation. In the Holy the priests officiate. In the room occupied by the congregation a place is set apart for the women. As the building is, so is the service,—mean, monotonous, unimpressive, and without dignity. It consists mostly of recitation of passages from the Bible or the Liturgy, in the Coptic or in the Arabic language; no preaching, or, at all events, very seldom. Still the service is very long, beginning at daybreak, and ending with a kind of agape and, as the custom is to stand, all are supplied with crutches of the proper height to lean upon. Again: as the service in the church, so the life in the congregation,—dull, dead, a mere routine. Fasting, and prayers to the virgin and the saints, are considered essential features of piety. Of late, however, European and American missionaries have brought some life into this inert mass. The first attempt was made by the English Church Missionary Society (1825), and with marked success. In 1855 the United Presbyterian Church of North America entered the field; and in 1873 it founded at Sint a promising seminary for the education of young Coptic preachers. The St. Chrischona Society at Basel began in 1861 the foundation of several missionary stations in connection with their mission in Abyssinia; but the undertaking was abandoned in 1872. COQUEREL, Athanasie Laurent Charles, French Protestant liberal theologian; b. at Paris, Aug. 25, 1748; d. there Jan. 2, 1828. He studied theology at the Protestant seminary of Montauban, and was ordained 1816, and from 1817 to 1832 was pastor of the French church at Amsterdam. In 1832, on the invitation of Baron Cuvier, he came to Paris to be colleague to Marron. He was very Protestant liberal theologist; b. at Paris, Aug. 25, 1831, he founded successively the journals, Le Protestant et état of Dec. 2, 1851, he confined himself exclusively to profession duties. His last days were spent in writing. Eight volumes of his sermons were published between 1819 and 1852. He wrote, besides, Biographie sacrée (1825–26), Histoire sainte et analytique de la Bible (1830), Orthodoxie moderne (1812), Christologie (1858). These and other of his works have been widely circulated at home, and translated into English, Dutch, and German.

COQUEREL, Athanase Josué, son of the preceding; b. at Amsterdam, June 15, 1820; d. at Fismes (Marne), July 24, 1875. He was an even more pronounced liberal than his father, whom he succeeded as editor of Le Lien in 1849, and kept the position until 1870. In 1852 he joined in founding the Historical Society of French Protestantism; in 1855 published, besides others, his remarkable work, On the Catholic Church (1855). In 1875 he was the seat of one of the most celebrated schools of theology and jurisprudence. The Synod of Cordova was convened in 832, on the instance of the Caliph Abderrahman II. Many Christians, especially monks, implored by the Caliph Hakem II. Before that time, but not yet in the Saracens, carried a decree forbidding this kind of voluntary martyrdom; but a minority — among which were the presbyter Samson, author of an Apologieus contra Hostegisum, the monk Alvarus, author of a Vita S. Eulogii, and Eulogius himself — protested; and practically the minority retained the field. The Synod was styled the impium conciliabum, its acts were destroyed, and we know its proceedings only from the works of Eulogius. See Aguirre: Collectio Conciliorum Omnium Hispaniae, Rome, 1693, III. 149; W. Baudissin: Eulogius und Alvar, Leipzig, 1872.

CORBAN (Old Testament קָרָב, “offering,” קָרָב, oblation; in New Testament, σκυλί; Vulgate explains by donum). The word occurs very frequently in the Hebrew text of Leviticus and Numbers, but only in those books in the Old Testament, and once in the New Testament (Mark vii. 11). It means “an offering to God, of any sort, bloody or bloodless, but particularly in fulfillment of a vow.” The teaching of the scribes, which our Lord so vigorously repudiated, was, that a son might say to his parents, in respect to any thing they might require, “It is corban [i.e., devoted] that whatever of mine thou mightst have been profited by me,” and henceforth be free from all claim upon him for their support. Or, according to Luther’s paraphrastic note, “Corban means an offering; and it was as much as to say, ‘Dear father, I would willingly give it to thee; but it is corban: I count it better to give it to God than to thee, and it will help thee better.’” Josephus relates that Pilate spent the money which was corban, and as such deposited in the temple, upon aqueducts (War, II. 9, 4). Matthew uses the word σκυλί (Matt. xxvii. 6) to indicate the treasury. It was in the court of the women, where stood thirteen chests, called “trumpets” from their form, to receive the money offered in the temple.

CORBINIUS, whose true name was Waldekis, was born at Chartrettes, near Melun, in France, towards the close of the seventh century, and died as Bishop of Freising, in Upper Bavaria, Sept. 8, 730. He was one of those Franks who labored in the service of the Frankish major domus for the establishment among the Germans of ecclesiastical order and authority, and may be considered as precursors of St. Boniface. They generally labored under the sanction of the Pope, and must be distinguished from the Iro-Scottish missionaries; but the result of their labor was so insignificant, that St. Boniface and the popes completely disregarded them. The life of Corbinian has been written in German, Dutch, and English, and is found in Act. Sanct. (Bolland) Sept., III. p. 281; Butler: Lives of the Saints, II. p. 494.

CORDERIERS, a name generally given in France to the Franciscan monks, because they wear a rope tied around the waist. According to tradition, it originated during the wars between Louis IX. and the Saracens, in the following manner: the king, seeing the monks pursuing the enemy, asked who they were, and was answered that they were the men corde lićs.
and a complete university began to flourish. In the beginning of the twelfth century this institution had a library of about six hundred thousand books, and the best astronomical observatory in the world; and it was renowned as the centre of the study of astronomy, mathematics, medicine, and philosophy. A little later it became the principal seat of the Arabian study of Aristotle; and thus it became a mediator between the antique philosophy and the mediæval speculation. Its most famous teacher was Averroës, and its most famous pupil was Maimonides. See Jourdain: Recherches critiques sur... traductions latines d'Aristote, Paris, 1843; E. CORINTH, the "Star of Hellas," and the capital of Achaia, stood on the isthmus, which, stretching between the Gulf of Corinth and the Gulf of Ægina, connects the Peninsula of Morea with the Greek mainland. It was defended by a citadel built on a lofty rock, Acro-Corinth, which rose just in the rear of the city. It had two harbors,—Cenchreae on the Gulf of Ægina, and Lechæum on the Gulf of Corinth; and it commanded two very important commercial routes: one east to west, between Asia Minor and Italy; and one north to south, through Macedonia and Greece.

The old Greek city—rich, beautiful, the capital of the Achaian League, the arena of the Isthmian games—was totally destroyed by Lucius Mummius (146 B.C.); and for a whole century its site lay bare and desolate. But in 44 B.C., Caesar rose just in the rear of the city. The origin of this festival was the vision of Juliana, princess of the Nunnery of St. Corneli, near Liège, recorded in her Life, in Act. Sanct., April 6. She saw the moon fully illuminated, with the exception of one dark spot, and was told that this dark spot referred to the lack in the Church of a festival in honor of the transubstantiation. See J. C. DANNHAUER: De festo Corpora Christi. Strassburg, 1602.

CORPUS DOCTRINÆ is the common name, which, in the sixteenth century, the Protestants applied to certain collections of doctrinal treatises made for the purpose of forming an authorized and normative representation of a certain type of faith, or of a certain individual church. The first of these collections—the so-called Corpus Doctrinae Philippicum, or Missicum, afterwards Corpus Doctrinae Christianae—was published at Leipzig in 1560, and consisted of all the principal doctrinal and confessional writings of Melanchthon,—the Confessio Augustana, Apologia, Confessio Saxoniae, Locae Theologici, Examens Ordinandorum, Responsio ad Articulos Bavariae Inquisitionis, together with the Refutatio Serveti. It was issued first in a German edition, and shortly after also in a Latin, and was accepted by Saxony and other evangelical countries; not without opposition, though. It represented exclusively the influence of Melanchthon; and since the adiaphoristic controversy a sharp distinction had been drawn between his standpoint and orthodox Lutheranism. In the stand-point and orthodox Lutherdom. In the Central, or, at least, to establish a regular "correspondence" between them. In the diets it often proved necessary to treat the interests of an individual state as a common Protestant interest; and, as the Roman-Catholic states from the very first appeared and acted as a unit, both parties gradually came into the habit of treating with each other de corpore ad corpus. Its complete constitution, however, the Corpus Evangelicorum did not obtain until July 22, 1653, when it was organized under the leadership of the Elector of Saxony. All Protestant interests, general and special, were placed under its authority, and it corresponded independently with the emperor and with the separate states, and even with foreign powers. When, in the latter part of the seventeenth century, the electoral house of Saxony was converted to Romanism, the Corpus Evangelicorum came under the leadership of a Roman-Catholic prince; but the danger of throwing the country out of the alliance, together with its ruler, determined the union to bear with this singular anomaly. With the dissolution of the German Empire the Corpus Evangelicorum also dissolved. See H. W. v. BULOW: Uber Geschichte und Verfassung des C. E., Regensburg, 1705; [A. FRANZ: Des Katholischen Directories des Corpus Evangelicorum, Marburg, 1880.]

CORRODI, Heinrich, b. at Zürich, July 31, 1752, d. there Sept. 14, 1793; studied theology in Halle, under Semler, and was in 1786 appointed professor of morals and natural law in the gymnasium of his native city. He was considered one of the great lights of the rationalism of his age; but his works, Geschichte des Chalismus (1781), Geschichte des jüdischen und christlichen Bibelkanons (1792), Beiträge zur Beförderung des vernünftigen Denkens in der Religion (1780–98), have had no influence, and are now of no interest.

CORVEY, the famous Westphalian abbey, the centre of the Saxon and Scandinavian mission, and for a long period the principal seat of learning among the Germans, was a colony from the Monastery of Corbie, in the diocese of Amiens. The subjugation of the Saxons by Charlemagne, the slow progress of Christianity among them, and, more especially, the education of a number of young Saxons in Corbie, finally ripened the idea with Abbot Adalhard of sending out some of his older monks to make a permanent settlement in Saxony. The first attempt was made in 815; and the place chosen was Solling, near the present city of Uslar. But the locality was too unfavorable; and, after seven years of hard labor and vain exertions, the settlement had to be moved to the imperial villa of Hysori, the present Höxter, on the banks of the Weser. Here it thrived prodigiously under the name of Corveja Aurea, or Vetus, the mother-convet. During the lifetime of Adalhard it remained united to Corbie under the same abbot; but after his death it obtained its own abbey, Varnius, and, after the lapse of a short time, it outshone the old place. Louis the Pious endowed it with Höxter, Eresburg, and Meppen, and gave it the right of coining money, besides many other privileges. Count Gerolt bequeathed to it all his estates in 851. The transference of the remains of the martyr Vitus from the Abbey of St. Denis, in 836, contributed still more to the material prosperity of the young institution, as the Saxons believed that the possession of these relics would secure them good luck and the ascendency over the Franks. But the real reason for the success was, of course, the energy and talent of the first settlers and their immediate pupils.—Ansgar, Rimbert, Authbert, Gautbert, Nithard, Unni, etc., the great Scandinavian missionaries, and Bruno of Cologne, Thigrin of Halberstadt, Bruno of Verden, Weggert of Hildesheim, Folkmar of Paderborn, etc., celebrated as leaders in the German Church. As its missionary activity came to a close, Corvey gradually developed as a seat of learning and an educational institution of the greatest importance. It possessed an excellent library. It kept at one time twenty-four professors. In its schools were taught not only theology and languages (Latin and Greek), but also the sciences. History was cultivated with great success. But of his life it is lost; but Wirtschaft's history of Saxony is still extant (Res Gestae Corbejensium, Leipzig, 1779; and Codex Transliterationis Corbejensium, Leipzig, 1779; and Paul Wigand: Geschichte Corveys, Höxter, 1819, unfinished, ending at 1146.)

CORVINUS, Antonius, b. Feb. 27, 1501, at Warburg, near Paderborn; d. at Hanover, April 5, 1553; was educated in the Monastery of Loccum, from which he was expelled on account of his holding Lutheran views; studied theology at Wittemberg, from 1523 to 1526; was a preacher at Goslar from 1528 to 1531, and at Witzenhausen from 1531 to 1541, and labored during the last part of his life for the introduction of the Reformation in the Duchy of Brunswick-Lüneburg. In 1546, however, Duke Erich II. was converted to Romanism; and on Nov. 1, 1549, Corvinus was seized at Pattensen by Spanish soldiers, and carried to Kalenberg, where he was imprisoned for three years. Without very great creative power, he had a considerable talent for organization; and he labored with faithfulness and patience in the cause of the Reformation. COSMAS INDICOPLEUSTES, an Egyptian merchant, who, in the middle of the sixth century, navigated the Mediterranean, the Red Sea, the Persian Gulf, and even visited India, whence his surname. Tired of the business of the world, he became a monk, and wrote, among other works, which are lost, A Christian Topography of the World, in Greek and a few Latin books, which has come down to us, and is found in most of the monastic libraries. His other writings are published in the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, Oxford, 1843–55, 5 vols.

COSMAS and DAMIANUS, two brethren from Arabia; lived in Cilicia, where they practised medicine without taking any fees, and were martyred during the persecution of Diocletian, having refused to offer sacrifice on the Pagan altars. They are commemorated by the Roman Church on Sept. 27, and were revered during the middle ages as the patron saints of physicians and druggists. An order of spiritual knights, devoting themselves to take care of pilgrims, was instituted in the eleventh century, and named after them, but met with no success. See Act. Sanctor., Sept. 27; BUTLER: Lives of the Saints, II. p. 326.

COTELERIUS (Cotelier), Jean Baptiste, b. at Nismes, in December, 1627; d. in Paris, Aug. 19, 1689; studied theology and philosophy in Paris; was in 1677 commissioned by Colbert to investigate and catalogue the Greek manuscripts of the Royal Library, and became professor in Greek at the Royal College in 1674. His principal work is his edition of the Apostolical Fathers,—Barnabas, Clement, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarpus,—Paris, 1672, in two volumes. Most of the copies of the original edition were consumed by a conflagration in 1698 and 1724. Cotelier also published Eccles. Graec. Monumenta, Paris, 1677–88, 3 vols., and Homilie IV. in Psalmos, Paris, 1691, which he ascribed to Chrysostom. See ANCILLON: Mémoires, p. 379; NicéRON: Mémoires, IV. p. 243; and Baluze's Letter to Bigot, after the preface to vol. II. of Patr. Apost. HAGENBACH.

COTTON, George Edward Lynch, Bishop of Calcutta; b. at Chester, Oct. 29, 1832; accidently drowned at Kooshtea, on the Ganges, Oct. 6, 1866. He was graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, appointed head master of Marbrough College in 1852, and in 1858 Bishop of Calcutta, and metropolitan in India and Ceylon, —Paris, 1672, in two volumes. Most of the copies of the original edition were consumed by a conflagration in 1698 and 1724. Cotelier also published Eccles. Graec. Monumenta, Paris, 1677–88, 3 vols., and Homilie IV. in Psalmos, Paris, 1691, which he ascribed to Chrysostom. COTTON, John, b. at Derby, Eng., Dec. 4, 1585; d. at Boston, U.S.A., Dec. 23, 1652. He was graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, appointed head master of Marlborough College in 1582, and in 1588 Bishop of Calcutta, and metropolitan in India and Ceylon, and "by his piety, courtesy, catholicity of sentiment, and high accomplishments, obtained the esteem of all parties." He wrote Doctrine and Practice of Christianity, 3d ed., London, 1632; two volumes of Sermons, 1835 and 1838; and since his death, Sermons preached to English Congregations in India, London, 1887, and his Memoir, with Selections from his Journals and Correspondence, by his widow, London, 1870, have been published.

COTTON, John Wilson (see DEXTHER, p. 653). He died of lung-fever in consequence of exposure in crossing the ferry to Cambridge. Cotton Mather, his grandson, says of him, "If Boston be the chief seat of New England, it was Cotton that was the father and glory of Boston" (Magnalia, third book, chap. i., ed. Hartford, 1855, p. 292). Extravagant praise, yet indicative of Cotton's position and character, which are thus set forth by Palfrey: he was "far from being the ruling spirit of the Colony," yet "acting with others, and advised and directed in their decisions by them, he rendered it memorable service. . . . There was no mistake in the opinion which his neighbors universally entertained of his devoted piety. . . . He had acuteness and learning for controversy, a moving eloquence for the pulpit, and an affectionate and winning address, and a knowledge of common business, which, in the less public duties of the sacred office, secured to him great power" (History of New England, vol. II. p. 410).

He was a voluminous writer: Dexter mentions thirty-six of his publications. The most important of these are, Questions and Answers upon Church Government (written, not printed, 1634); The Way of Life (1641); A Brief Exposition of the Whole Book of Canticles (1642); The Churches Resurrection and The Pouring out of the Seven Vials (his first book, 1641); The Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven, and Power thereof, according to the Word of God (1644), reprinted Boston, 1852; The Way of the Churches of Christ in New England (1645); The Grounds and Endes of the Baptisme of the Children of the Faithfull (1647); The Way of Congregational Churches cleared (1648); A Briefe Exposition of Ecclesiastes (1654); The New Covenant (1654); Exposition of the Thirteenth Chapter of the Revelation (1655). See COTTON MATHIER: Magnalia Christi Americana, ed. Hartford, 1855, vol. I. pp. 252–282.

COUNCIL (concilium). In the history of the Christian Church, the councils form centres of development with respect to doctrine and liturgy and constitution. They grew up from the very needs of the Church; and in the Apostolic Council at Jerusalem (reported in Acts xv.) they found their model and their legitimation. The first councils or synods of which we have a reliable account were held in Asia Minor, against the Montanists, and not earlier than the middle of the second century (EUSEBIUS: Hist. Eccl., V. 12). Meanwhile, in Asia, in North Africa, where, under Cyprian, they began to attract the attention of the Latins in the Western countries. The first Latin synods were held in the beginning of the third century, in North Africa, where, under Cyprian, they became very frequent. Meanwhile they lost in the East the aspect of being something irregular. According to a letter from Firmilian, Bishop of Cesarea in Cappadocia, to Cyprian (Ep. 75), councils were held regularly twice a year in Asia Minor in the beginning of the third century; that is, they had become a fixed institution, part of the constitution of the Church. Gradually they also grew in dimensions, especially after the middle of the third century. Thus the synod of Iconium in Phrygia (256) was frequented by bishops both from Galatia and Cilicia; and the synod of Arles (314), not only by bishops from Gaul, but also by bishops from Brittany, Germany, Spain, and North Africa. In course of time the diocesan synod developed into the metropolitan synod, and this, again, into the patriarchal council, until finally the great ecumenical council, authoritative to the whole Church, could be convened.

The first eight ecumenical councils (325–869) form a group by themselves. They were convened by the emperors (Roman and Byzantine); they received their impulses from the Greek Church; and they are principally of doctrinal interest. They form, so to speak, the mental process by which the Christian Church became conscious of the full meaning and proper bearing of its own fundamental doctrines; and, finally, the later logical systematization and philosophical argumentation have modified the outlines of the definitions, none of the dogmas then settled has ever afterwards essentially been changed. The Council of Nicaea (325), convened by Constantine the Great, frequently by three hundred bishops, and led by Hosius of Cordova, and Athanasius of Alexandria, and the Council of Constantinople (381), convened by Theodosius the Great, frequented by a hundred and fifty bishops, and led by the two celebrated Cappadocian bishops, Gregory of Nazianzen and Gregory of Nyssa, settled the dogma of the Holy Trinity so far as regards the constitutions which necessarily go into the definition; and only the dialectical relations between these constituents were left to be elaborated by the aftertime. See ARIANISM. The Council of Ephesus (431), convened by Theodosius II. and Valentinian III., frequented by about two hundred bishops, and led by Cyrilus of Alexandria, and the Council of Chalcedon (451), convened by Marian, frequented by five or six hundred bishops, and led by the representatives of Bishop Leo of Rome, laid the foundation upon which the orthodox doctrine of Chalcedon, settled the dogma of the Holy Trinity so far as regards the constitution of the Church. Gradually they also grew in dimensions, especially after the middle of the third century and a half after the Council of Constantinople (869), there were held in the Western Church only provincial and national synods, in Spain, France, England, and Germany. Though several of these synods, held in France, exercised great influence on the history of the Church, none of them obtained authority throughout the whole Church. The series of ecumenical councils is opened again with the Lateran synods, thus called from their place of meeting,—the Church of St. John Lateran in Rome. There are four belonging to this period,—the first, convened by Calixtus II. (1123), and frequented by about three hundred ecclesiastics, for the solemn establishment of the concordat of Worms, by which the emperor renounced the right of investiture with ring and staff; the second, convened by Innocent II. (1139), and frequented by about a thousand ecclesiastics, for the purpose of cancelling all the decrees issued by the antipope Anaclet; the third, convened by Alexander III. (1179), of merely disciplinary interest; and the fourth, convened by Innocent III. (1215), and frequented by four hundred and twenty prelates, besides by ambassadors from the Byzantine court, and a great number of princes and noblemen,—one of the most brilliant ecclesiastical assemblies which ever met. Its debates encompassed the whole field of ecclesiastical legislation,—doctrine, liturgy, discipline, etc.; and both the results and the form of these debates give evidence of the towering height to which the Papacy had reached. The dogma of transubstantiation was promulgated, the decree of auricular confession was issued, the Inquisition and other courts of heresy were established, etc. Both and other measures did not originate in the assembly itself: they were, so to speak, dictated to it by the curia, as appears from the new formula under which they were adopted,—sacra universali synodo approbante sanctum. To this group also belong the two councils of Lyons, of which the first was convened by Innocent IV. (1245), for the purpose of excommunicating and deposing the Emperor Frederic II.; the second by Gregory X. (1274), to accomplish the union between the Greek and the Latin Church; and, finally, the Council of Vienne, convened in 1311 by Clement...
V., by which the order of the Templars was dissolved.

With the “Babylonian captivity” the Papacy begins to decline, and by the great schism it actually seems to be brought very near ruin. To heal the schism was also one of the principal objects of the Councils of Pisa (1409) and of Constance (1414–18). At the same time there arose within the Church itself a strong re-action against the prevailing corruption; and the demands of reform were loud, not only in the Council of Constance, but still more in the Council of Basel (1431–39), and even in the fifth Lateran synod (1512–17). The proceedings of these councils—the great reformatory councils of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries,—in which, however, all endeavors of reform were baffled by the curia, are described in separate articles, as are those of the Council of Trent (1545–63), whose principal business transaction was the condemnation of the German Reformation. After the Council of Trent, no ecumenical council was held until that of the Vatican (1869–70), by which the dogma of the infallibility of the pope was declared.

The proceedings of these councils,—the legal proceeding was very simple. The complaint was made either by the parties themselves (Deut. xxi. 20, xxii. 16), or by others. Both parties had to appear before the judge, who had to hear and to investigate very carefully the matter (xxv. 1). Two or three witnesses were necessary, especially in penal cases; and, when capital punishment was decreed, the witnesses were the first to exercise it. Whoever committed perjury was subjected to the same punishment which had otherwise threatened the accused. When parents brought their disobedient sons before the judge, no witness was required. Sometimes the lot was used in exercising judgment (cf. Josh. vii. 14; 1 Sam. xiv. 40 sq., etc.). An immediate divine judgment is mentioned in the case of a woman suspected of adultery. The sentence was given orally, but in later times also in writing (Job xiii. 26; Isa. x. 1). All documents and contracts were legal when signed before witnesses. That oppression, bribery, partiality, and false witnesses often perverted the right and the law, we see from the many censures which the prophets pronounced. [P. B. COURT, Antoine, the organizer of the “Church of the Desert,” the restorer of the Reformed Church in France; was born at Villeneuve de Berg, in the department of Ardèche, May 17, 1696, and died at Lausanne, June 15, 1760. He lost his father when he was four years old, and grew up in poverty under the shadow of the martyrodom of Brousson and Homel, and among the wonders and miseries of the wars in the Cevennes. Reports of people who were burnt alive, put on the rack, sent to the galleys, or hunted down like wild beasts, for the sake of their faith, made his daily bread; but these poor and dismal circumstances proved to be the right tutor for his character. When Louis XIV. issued the edict of March 8, 1715, declaring that there was no Protestantism in France, the young man stood ready to give the lie to the royal bravo. He

COURT AND LEGAL PROCEEDING AMONG THE HEBREWS. In the oldest times the heads of tribes, or of chief houses in a tribe, were the judges of the following kind: Moses regarded the tribal constitution; and this supposition seems to follow from Deut. i. 15: "I took the chief of your tribes." When the people settled in Canaan, the elders of the city and the heads of the tribes adjusted all legal matters. During the period of the judges, in so far as they stood at the head of the people or of single tribes, the judgment was exercised by them; and of Samuel we know that he judged in several cities of the country, and appointed his sons judges at Beersheba (1 Sam. viii. 2). Afterwards the kings acted as judges; and from 2 Chron. xix. 8–11 we know that Jehoshaphat appointed a high tribunal at Jerusalem, to which the Levites, priests, and chiefs of the fathers, belonged. The prophets also exercised judicial functions. After the return from Babylon, the Sanhedrin adjusted all legal matters.

The legal proceeding was very simple. The complaint was made either by the parties themselves (Deut. xxi. 20, xxii. 16), or by others. Both parties had to appear before the judge, who had to hear and to investigate very carefully the matter (xxv. 1). Two or three witnesses were necessary, especially in penal cases; and, when capital punishment was decreed, the witnesses were the first to exercise it. Whoever committed perjury was subjected to the same punishment which had otherwise threatened the accused. When parents brought their disobedient sons before the judge, no witness was required. Sometimes the lot was used in exercising judgment (cf. Josh. vii. 14; 1 Sam. xiv. 40 sq., etc.). An immediate divine judgment is mentioned in the case of a woman suspected of adultery. The sentence was given orally, but in later times also in writing (Job xiii. 26; Isa. x. 1). All documents and contracts were legal when signed before witnesses. kept it walled up as in a tomb. Marriages consecrated by a Reformed minister were considered by the civil law as mere concubinage, and children of such a marriage were treated as bastards. To preach Protestant ideas was death on the gallows. To participate in Protestant worship was imprisonment, or labor in the galleys. And in these circumstances no change took place at the death of Louis XIV. The regent continued the persecutions. From 1715 to 1723 seven Protestant meetings were surprised, and the men were sent to the galleys, the women to the Aigues-Mortes. In 1718 Etienne Arnaud was hanged as a "preacher of the desert." Houses and villages were razed to the ground: whole counties were fired. Nor was the internal state of the Protestant congregation without its dangers. While one part, the "newly-converted" as they were called, gradually relapsed into Romanism, another, in-luenced by the prophets of the Camisards, was led astray by a spiritualism which rejected the Bible as norma et regulae fidei, and produced sectatarianism. Nevertheless, in 1714–15 Court made his first journey as a travelling preacher through the Cevennes, Languedoc, Dauphiné, to Marseilles; and on Aug. 21, 1715, the first synod met at sunrise in a place where two roads cross each other, near Nimes. Only a few persons were present; but a church ordinance was agreed upon, with regular services, with synods, and with a church discipline; and thus the "Church of the Desert" was founded.
In 1720 Court visited Geneva, and established a connection and intercommunication between the Reformed Church of Switzerland and that of France. For a similar purpose he also began a correspondence with William Wake, Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1722 he returned to France, and continued his work under innumerable danergies, but with very great success. Congregations were formed in Poitou, Bretagne, Agenois, Foix, Provence, and Picardie. After an interruption of sixty-six years, the first national synod met on May 16, 1729. In 1728 the evangelical numbered about two hundred thousand in Languedoc and Dauphiné. In Languedoc (with Rouergue and Narbonne) there were one hundred and two parishes with three synods and four ministers (Cortes, Court, Durand, Roger). In 1729 Court retired, and settled at Lausanne, where, some years earlier, he had established a school for the education of ministers for the Reformed Church of France. Only once more (in 1741) he again visited his native country; but he continued to the last to labor for the "Church of the Desert," and his work prospered in spite of cruel persecution. In 1744 the church had thirty-three ministers, and sixty-two in 1763. In the former year Normancie numbered seventeen parishes, Poitou thirty, Dauphiné sixty. Nîmes alone contained twenty thousand Protestants; and it began to dawn upon the French Government that a change of policy with respect to its evangelical subjects was absolutely necessary. The principal work on Court is Edmoires de Pierre Carrière, dit Cortes, Strasbourg, 1861; D. Benoît: Un martyr du desert, Jacques Roger restaurateur du protestantisme dans la Daup-hiné, Toulouse, 1875.
Cousin, Victor, b. in Paris, Nov. 28, 1792; d. at Cannes, Jan. 14, 1867; was educated in Lycée Charlemagne and École Normale, and began to lecture on philosophy in 1815 in the Sorbonne, where he soon gathered a great number of enthusiastic students around his chair. In 1821, when the re-action thought itself strong enough to indulge its passions, Cousin was discharged; but he was re-instated in 1823, and, after the revolution of 1830, he was made counsellor of state, director of École Normale, peer of France, and for a short time (1840–41) minister of public instruction in the cabinet of Thiers. After the coup d'état of Dec. 2, 1851, he retired into private life. His principal works are, Cours de l'histoire de la philosophie, 3 vols., Paris, 1840; Cours de l'histoire de la philosophie moderne, Paris, 1841 (translated into English by Wight, New York, 1851); Cours de l'histoire de la philosophie moderne, Paris, 1849 (translated into English by Wight, New York, 1854). The direct influence which Cousin exercised on Christian theology was not great, and may be limited to his edition of Abe-ard's works (1836–40). But indirectly his activity was of great consequence. He changed the whole character of the French philosophy. He led the students of philosophy among his countrymen from the materialism of the eighteenth century in France to the idealism of the Scotch school; and, again, he dissolved the dogmatic method of the French and Scotch philosophy, and introduced the dialectic method of German philosophy. A complete system he did not produce. He was an eclectic, but his eclecticism was not a mere mosaic. The vigorous understanding and vivid representation of the various philosophical systems which he gives, are everywhere permeated by a spirit of idealism, which, in the latter part of his life, drew him and his pupils nearer and nearer to Christianity.
Covenant, an agreement or mutual obligation, contracted deliberately and with solemnity.
2. Theology. The term "covenant" signifies his solemn promise or engagement (Gen. xvii. 14; Exod. xxxiv. 10; Deut. iv. 13; Isa. lix. 21). The Hebrew word for covenant is from נַ֣ת ("to cut"), and has reference to the practice of cutting animals in two, and passing between the parts, in ratifying a covenant (Gen. xvii. 14; Jer. xxxiv. 18). The term "the covenants," in Rom. ix. 4, refers to the various promises made to Abraham and the other patriarchs. The most important use of the word is, however, in relation to the two great dispensations which are distinguished as the Old and New, or as the Covenant of the Law and the Covenant of the Gospel. The former was made with the children of Israel, through Moses, and rested much in the outward ceremonies and observances which the law enjoined (meats and drinks, and divers washings, and carnal ordinances). The new covenant was made with Christ, sealed by his own blood, and secures to every believer the blessings of salvation and eternal life (comp. Exod. xx. 24; Gal. iii. 15, 17; Heb. viii. 6 sqq.). The titles "Old and New Testament" arose from the inaccurate rendering in the Latin Vulgate of the word "covenant" (בָּרָקָה) by testamentum. It would be a decided gain if the correct titles could be used. In the revised version of the New Testament, the word "covenant" is everywhere the translation of διαθήκη in the text, with "testament" in the margin (e.g., Matt. xxvi. 28). But the American revisers (Classes of Passages, X.) prefer that "the word 'testament' be everywhere changed to 'covenant'" without an alternate in the margin, except in Heb. ix. 15–17.

2. Ecclesiastical Use. The Congregationalists and Baptists apply the term "covenant" to the agreement between the members of a church. It is either original, or derived from some authoritative symbol. On the "National Covenant" of Scotland, see Covenanters.

3. Covenant of Salt is a covenant in whose sealing or ratification a seal was used, imparting to it an inviolable character (Lev. xxii. 13; Num. xxx. 19; 1 Chr. xii. 8).

COVENANTERS. The name given to the Scottish Presbyterians, or a portion of them, of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, derived from a form of agreement called a "Covenant," by which they bound themselves for religious and patriotic ends. The first document of the kind was drawn up in 1580, at the request of King James VI., by his chaplain, John Craig, and was first called "The king's Confession." Afterwards it was called "The National Covenant; or, the Confession of Faith." It was subscribed in 1580 by the king, and by persons of all ranks in 1581; and its object was to maintain the reformed religion and the king's majesty, in opposition to the machinations of Romanism. In 1589, on occasion of a memorable revival of earnest religion, it was proposed that the Covenants be renewed; and the proposal was very cordially carried out by the General Assembly in the Little Church of Edinburgh, March 30, 1596. In 1638, when prelacy was overthrown, the Covenant was again renewed, with a bond binding the subscribers "to adhere to and defend the true religion, and forbear the practice of all innovations already introduced into the Church, and to endeavor the recovery of the purity and liberty of the gospel as it was professed and established before the aforesaid innovations." It was subscribed by barons, nobles, gentlemen, burgesses, ministers, and commons, a memorable scene occurring at its subscription in Greyfriars' churchyard, Edinburgh, where it was first publicly read and signed. It was approved by the General Assembly 1638 and 1639, and ratified by the Parliament of Scotland in 1640; and, besides the people, it was subscribed by Charles II. at Spey in 1650, and at Sooon in 1651.

Another document, drawn up by commissioners of the English Parliament and the Westminster Assembly, and by committees of the Scottish Estates and the General Assembly, was called "The Solemn League and Covenant for Reformation and opposition to popery, prelacy, and other ecclesiastical officers depending on that hierarchy, superstition, heresy, schism, profaneness, and whatsoever shall be found contrary to sound doctrine and power of godliness, lest we partake in other men's sins, and thereby be in danger to receive of their plagues; and that the Lord may be one, and his name one, in the three kingdoms." The Covenant contained, among other clauses, a very explicit declaration of loyalty to the king. It was approved by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and by both Houses of Parliament in 1638, and taken and subscribed by them in the year 1643. It was thereafter, by the same authority, taken and subscribed by all ranks in Scotland and England the same year; ratified by the Scottish Parliament in 1644; again renewed, and taken, with an acknowledgment of sins and engagement to duties, by all ranks in 1648, and by Parliament in 1649; and (with the older Covenant) subscribed by Charles II. at Spey in 1650, and at Sooon in 1651. The most characteristic feature of the Solemn League and Covenant as compared with the National Covenant was the repudiation of prelacy.

King Charles I. was so exasperated at the proceedings of 1638, that he gathered an army, and advanced towards Scotland, to compel submission. The Covenanters prepared to meet him, and entrusted the command of their troops to Gen. Leslie; and it was on this occasion that the banner was displayed "for Christ's crown and covenant." The Scotch obtaining some successes, a peace was concluded, but broken by the king in the following year, and once more renewed.

After the Westminster Assembly and the signing of the Solemn League and Covenant, war broke out again. The Marquis of Montrose made a great stand in Scotland for the royal cause, but in vain. Then came the flight of Charles I. to Scotland, his surrender into the hands of the English, and finally his execution. This event filled the Scots with consternation, and immediately Charles II. was proclaimed king. All means were used to compel submission to Scotland, he took the Covenanters, though this turned out to be an act of pure hypocrisy. Their intense loyalty to the king threw the Covenanters into antagonism to Cromwell and those with whom they were really at one. But when King Charles was restored in 1660, instead of having the Covenanters respected, and the Presbyterian Church purified from abuses, a bitter persecution followed that lasted for twenty-eight years.

The "Act recessory" rescinded all acts passed between 1638 and 1650. In 1662 it was declared by the obsequious Scottish Parliament, that the ordering and disposal of the external government and policy of the Church doth properly belong unto his Majesty as an inherent right of the crown, by virtue of his royal prerogative and supremacy in causes ecclesiastical. In the exercise of this prerogative, ecclesiastical courts of the Covenanters, episcopal government was restored. The Covenanters were denounced, and all who supported them proclaimed traitors. In 1661 the Marquis of Argyle was beheaded, and
James Guthrie also died on the gallows. Diocesan courts were instituted, and no minister was allowed to remain in a parochial court without satisfying them. A commission headed by the Earl of Lauderdale was sent over the west country to enforce this law, when, to the great surprise of the commissioners, four hundred ministers resigned their charges rather than submit to the unlawful conditions. The ejected ministers were prohibited from holding meetings for worship under pain of death. Fines and imprisonment were inflicted on those who attended such services, and were found to have abetted the Covenanters. Detachments of troops headed by such men as Sir James Turner and Graham of Claverhouse, scouring the country, persecuting all who were suspected of being friendly to them. Sometimes resistance was offered to the soldiers. A rising took place in Galloway in 1666, which terminated in the defeat of the insurgents at Raillen Green among the Pentland Hills near Edinburgh. A commission headed by the Earl of Lauderdale among the Covenanters defeated Claverhouse; but at Bothwell Bridge they were vanquished. At Sanquhar, in 1680, a declaration was drawn up, disowning Charles II. as king, in consequence of his having acted as a tyrant, and violated the constitution of the country. Conspicuous among the authors of this declaration was Richard Cameron, who gave his name to the body called in common parlance Covenanters, but more strictly Reformed Presbyterians, at Airdmoss, in 1680, Cameron and his friends gave battle to the royal troops; but they were defeated, and Cameron himself was killed. The year before (in 1679) James Sharp, Archbishop of St. Andrews, formerly a Presbyterian, was of the noblest character, and conformed incalculable benefit on both Church and State. See CAMERONIANS.

Among some of the friends of the Covenant an opinion has sometimes prevailed that they bound all the succeeding generations of Scotsmen, inasmuch as they were entered into by a corporate body,—the nation, which never dies. This opinion has but few supporters, and is manifestly extreme and untenable. Those who made the Covenanters bound themselves very firmly; but they could not bind those who came after them; nor could these come under the obligation of the Covenanters, except in so far as they were personally willing to do so.

COVERDALE, Miles, b. at Coverham, in the north riding of Yorkshire, and probably in the district that gave him his name, Coverdale, which lay in what was called Richmondshire, about 1488; d. in London, and buried, Feb. 19, 1569, in the chancel of St. Bartholomew. (When this church was taken down, in 1840, his remains were removed to St. Magnus.) The early part of his life is unknown. He entered the convet of the Augustine Friars at Cambridge, whose prior in 1538 was Robert Barnes, an early martyr (burnt at Smithfield, July 30, 1540), by whom, probably, Coverdale was converted to Protestantism; for about this time he appeared as the champion of the new faith, and would have been persecuted but for the known fact that Cranmer was his patron. As it was, in 1528 he went to the Continent. Nothing certain is known of Coverdale's whereabouts until the appearance of his Bible in London, in 1535. See English Bible Versions.

The year before the revival of earnest religion were associated with them. The rugged character of the times, the general want of a tolerant spirit, and the absence of suitable leaders, may have led to excesses, and caused some degeneracy in the movement in its later stages. But the stand for freedom, civil and religious, made by the Covenanters, was of permanent import, and conferred inestimable benefit on both Church and State. Had they been crushed, ecclesiastical liberty would have almost perished within the Reformed churches of Europe.

The year before the Revolution occurred in 1688; James II. being dethroned, and William and Mary coming to the throne. During the reigns of Charles II. and James II. the cases of persecution were very many. The general want of a tolerant spirit, and the abhorrence of liberty, holy martyrs and confessors, the savours of the martyr. It is very probable that between 1580 and 1588 the friends and upholders of the Covenanters embraced nearly all of the most learned, devout, and earnest ministers of the church, and many laymen in high position. The real lovers of the gospel were Covenanters, and COWL. COWEPER.

COWL, corresponding to the Latin cuculla, means primarily the hood which the monk draws over the head to prevent the eyes from glancing right or left. But this hood was the most characteristic part of a monk's dress,—and indeed it was the only article specially mentioned in the Rules of St. Benedict (c. 55).—cowl gradually came to be applied to the whole monastic garment, corresponding to the Latin cula.

COWLES, Henry, D.D., a commentator; b. in Norfolk, Conn., April 24, 1803; d. at Jainesville, Wis., Sept. 6, 1881. He was graduated at Yale College, 1829; studied theology; was from 1828 to 1853 a pioneer missionary on the Western Reserve in Ohio; from 1865 to 1843, professor, first of the New York Theological Seminary of the Oberlin University; from 1843 to 1863 he was editor of The Oberlin Evangelist. In 1863 he began his Commentary, which eventually spread over sixteen volumes, covering the entire Bible, and completed it in 1881. It was published by D. Appleton & Co., New York, and intended for the educated laity. He was a man of strong practical sense, and of excellent judgment.

COWPER, William, poet and hymnologist, b. at Great Berkhamstead, Hertfordshire, Nov. 15, 1731; d. at East Dereham, Norfolk, April 25, 1800. He was the son of George Cowper, one of George II.'s chaplains; and his grandfather was a judge, and brother of the first Earl Cowper, the Lord Chancellor. He was a delicate child; and his "fagging" experiences in the Westminster public school told sadly upon him, and may have, in part, induced his subsequent madness. At eighteen he began the study of law, and at thirty-two was nominally engaged in its practice, but really given up to literature. When his income began to be insufficient, he was nominated by influential friends clerk of the journals of the House of Lords; but, the right of nomination being disputed, he was required to submit to an examination, and nervous dread of the ordeal unsettled his reason (already affected by grief over his uncle's refusal to allow him to marry his daughter), and he had to be put under medical care, in the private madhouse of Dr. Cotton, who was a pious man. While there he was converted by reading a Bible which had been purposely put in his way. In 1753 he removed to Huntingdon, and there formed acquaintance with the Unwins, and made his home with them. In 1767 Mr. Unwin was killed by a fall from his horse; and Mrs. Unwin and Cowper moved to Olney, on the invitation of the famous Rev. John Newton, one of the great lights of the Evangelical party, to which the pair belonged. But this new relation was fraught with danger to the hypochondriacal Cowper; for the life they now led was one continuous round of religious exercises. The only redemptive feature is the contact Cowper had with the poor, by which he enlarged his knowledge of life, and at the same time drove away melancholy. But again Cowper went mad; and it was not until after sixteen months, during which Mrs. Unwin assumed entire charge of him, that he recovered his reason under Dr. Cotton's skilful treatment. The departure of Newton was a favoring providence for him. Another was Mrs. Unwin's suggestion that he should write poetry. He had already joined Newton in writing the Olney Hymns (1779), and contributed sixty-eight to Newton's two hundred and eighty; but he now took a broader field, and produced The Moral Swords (1782). It was the poetic Lady Austen, who by her vivacity, her tact, and knowledge of the world, exerted the most beneficent influence upon him. It was she who told him the story of John Gilpin, which he has immortalized, and set him The Task, by which he achieved fame. Soon he wrote to Lady Austen left, and Lady Hesketh, his cousin, another woman of the world,—came, and likewise favorably affected the poet. He then gave English literature a number of minor poems, and notable translations from Homer (1791) and Horace. In 1795 he obtained a pension of three hundred pounds per year. But four years of his life were passed under a cloud. His reason was well-nigh destroyed, and the only original poetry he wrote was The Task. After his death his charming letters were collected and published.

Cowper's hymns are among the most popular; such as, "God Moves in a Mysterious Way;" "Oh for a closer walk with God;" "There is a fountain filled with blood." There is no gentler, purer, more winning character among English poets than William Cowper; and there is no better letter-writer among English authors.

CRABBE, George, poet; b. Aldborough, Suffolk, Dec. 24, 1754; d. at Trowbridge, Feb. 3, 1832. His career was somewhat checkered. Educated as a surgeon, he abandoned his profession in 1780, and for a time was a literary adventurer in London, where he endured much suffering until he won the patronage of Edmund Burke, and was enabled to publish The Library (1781). By the help of Thurlow he entered the Church; and, although he never rose to fame or position as a preacher, he enjoyed the esteem of his parishioners. In 1788 he issued The Village, his first great success. His poems are still read. Though religious in their tone, few of them are suited for singing as hymns. See his Complete Works, with Memoirs by his Son, London, 1834, 8 vols., reprinted in 1 vol.

CRADOCK, Samuel, a nonconformist divine; b. 1629; d. at Bishop's Stortford, in Hertfordshire, Oct. 7, 1706. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge; became a fellow; was ejected in 1662 from his living at North Cadbury in Somersetshire. He wrote Knowledge and Practices, London, 1659, 4th ed. with eight new chapters, 1702; The Apostolical History, 1672; The History of the Old Testament methodized, 1683, in Latin, at Leyden, 1685; Harmony of the Four Evangelists, 1688; Exposition of the Revelation, 1692.

CRAIG, John, one of the Scotch Reformers; b. 1531; d. in Edinburgh, Apr. 1, 1600. He was a Dominican monk, but, converted by Calvin's Institutes, condemned by the Inquisition in Rome to be burnt for heresy. The execution was stayed by the death of Pope Paul IV.; and the mob opened his prison, and he escaped. He returned to Scotland, became the colleague of John Knox, wrote the National Covenant in 1550, and compiled part of the Second Book of Discipline.

CRAIG, John, d. 1732; a Scotch mathematician, and author of the extraordinary Theologia Christianae Principia Mathematica, London, 1656; reprinted, with a learned preface, at Leipzig, 1755, in which he endeavors "to calculate the duration of moral evidence, and the authority of historical facts. By this mode the author attempts to show that the proofs of the Christian religion will cease in a certain number of years in proportion as the force of the testimony decays." According to his reasoning, Christianity will last until 3153, and then disappear, "unless the second coming of Christ prevent its extinction."

CRAKENTHORPE, Richard, b. at Strickland, in Westmoreland, 1667; fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, 1686; d. at his rectory of Black Notley, in Essex, 1624. His fame rests on his controversial writings: Popish Falsifications, London, 1607; A Defence of Justian, 1618; The Defence of Constantine, with a Treatise on the Pope's Temporal Monarchie, 1621; Defensio Ecclesiae Anglicanae, 1625, reprinted in the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, Oxford, 1847.

CRAMER, Johann Andreas, b. at Johstadt, Saxony, Jan. 27, 1723; d. at Kiel, June 12, 1788; studied theology at Leipzig, and took his degree of master in 1745; became pastor of Crellwitz in 1748, and of Quedlinburg in 1759; was in 1754 invited to Copenhagen as court-preacher to the Danish king; removed in 1771 to Lübeck as superintendent; and was in 1774 appointed professor of theology in Kiel, and in 1784 chancellor of the university. His character as a theologian is that of a popularizer of rationalism, and the means he employed were those of a mistaken poet. But the almost incomprehensible pathos with which he preached about virtue as the safest stepping-stone to happiness, and the almost nauseous sentimentality with which he expounded the beauties of the Second Book of Discipline, and literary enjoyments, corresponded exactly to the taste of the time; and he exercised a consid-
Cranmer was a most influential advocate of the truth. He is the principal author of the Thirty-nine (at first forty-two) Articles of Religion, and of the Anglican Prayer-Book (in its English dress), which are the noblest and most enduring monuments of his labors.

CraFshaw, Richard, b. in London, 1613; d. at Loretto, 1643. The son of a fiery anti-Romanist, and educated at Cambridge, he was ejected from his fellowship in Peterhouse College, 1644, fled to France, embraced the Roman-Catholic religion, in 1616 became secretary to Cardinal Pallotta, and in 1650 a canon of the Holy House of Loreto. There is no religious poetry in English so full at once of gross and awkward images and imaginative touches of the most ethereal beauty. The faults and beauties of his very peculiar style can be studied best in the Hymn to St. Theresa. His poems, in Latin and English, were first collected in the volume by W. B. Turnbull, London, 1638: a private edition, in two volumes, was published in 1872, edited by the Rev. A. B. Grosart.

Crato von Crafftheim (Johannes Krafft), b. at Breslau, Nov. 22, 1619; d. there Oct. 10, 1653; entered in 1534 the University of Wittenberg to study theology, and lived for six years in the house of Luther, where he also formed an intimate friendship with Melancthon. His feeble health, which made it difficult for him to preach, induced him to give up the theological career, and from 1539 to 1540 he studied medicine at Leipzig and Padua. In 1540 he was appointed city-physician in Breslau; and his cures and writings rapidly made such a fame for him, that in 1600 he was called to Vienna as body-physician to the emperor. He was made an Imperial Counsellor, ennobled, etc., and, both under Ferdinand I. and Maximilian II., he exercised great influence. Under Rudolph II. he was for a short time dismissed; but he was speedily recalled and remained till 1581, when he retired into private life. His stay at the court of Vienna was of the greatest importance for the cause of the Reformation in Austria. All the intrigues of Bishop Hoseus and the Jesuits he baffled, and it was not until after the death of Maximilian II., and during the latter part of the reign of Rudolph II., that the Jesuits really gained the ascendancy. He exercised, also, considerable influence on the development of the Reformation in Germany. He belonged originally to the Melanchthonian school, and fought with great zeal against the Flacians; but gradually he was won over completely. CRAWFORD, Thomas J., D.D., a theological author, was born at St. Andrews, Scotland, in 1812, where his father was professor of moral philosophy, having been the immediate predecessor of Dr. Thomas Chalmers. As a minister of the Established Church, he filled successively the charges of Cults in Fife, Glaids in Perthshire, and St. Andrews in Edinburgh. On the death of Dr. John Lee, he was appointed professor of divinity in the University of Edinburgh. His principal works were on the Atonement, and on the Fatherhood of God. On the former subject he maintains the old Calvinistic doctrine, and criticises the modern theories of Bushnell, Robertson of Brightont, Young, and others. On the subject of the Fatherhood he controverts certain views maintained by Dr. Candlish in his Cunningham Lectures on that subject. He died in 1876. [His books are: The Fatherhood of God, considered in its General and Special Aspects, and particularly in Relation to the Atonement, a Review of Recent Speculations on the Subject, 2d ed. (with reply to Dr. Candlish), Edinburgh, 1868; The Doctrine of Holy Scripture respecting the Atonement, Edinburgh, 1871, 3d ed., 1880; The Mysteries of Christianity (being the Baird Lecture for 1874), Edinburgh, 1874; The Preaching of the Cross, and other Sermons, Edinburgh, 1876.]

CREATION. One of the points in which Judaism differs most conspicuously from the Paganism of antiquity is its cosmogony,—its doctrine of a creation out of nothing, and progressing through six days. The Paganism of antiquity has nothing which shows even a distant resemblance with such an idea. Stoicism is the true precursor of modern monism. God and the world, force and matter, are absolutely one, and every trace of dualism is anxiously avoided. Platonism is dualistic; but its dualism has something of the vagueness of a dream. God is not wholly merged in the world, the idea in matter. Yet the world is eternal, like God: matter is eternal, like the idea. Creation is only an informing process of the idea in matter, a formative activity of God in the world.

Adopted by Christianity, the Hebrew doctrine of creation became the very basis of the Christian view of nature. But Christianity is a living growth, and not, like Judaism or Islamism, a mere crystallization. The Christian view of nature receives perpertually new impulses from the science of nature, and thus it came to pass, that, in course of time, the doctrine of creation underwent numerous modifications, though modifications of interpretation only. The keynote was retained, though the harmonies into which it was developed were very various. Indeed, the history of the doctrine of creation is for many centuries the history of natural science.

Down to the middle of the eighth century the Christian view of nature was more or less influenced by the Alexandrian school. In the two first centuries the Christians apologetics and polemists were occupied with refuting the theories of emanation, and the vague dualism held by the Pagans and the Gnostic sects; but most of their writings are lost. Tertullian's Adversus Hermogenem, however, gives a good instance. Hermogenes denied the creation out of nothing, because, in that case, God would also have been the creator of evil. Tertullian refuted him. With Origen the influence of Plato became visible. His great commentary on Genesis is lost, with the exception of some fragments; but a homily by him on the Creation is still extant in a Latin translation; and this work, together with various passages in his De Principiis and Adversus Celsum, give a complete representation of his views. The principle of the biblical narrative he retains; but the details he transforms from facts into symbols. The act of the creation was the work of one moment, and the progressive succession of the biblical representation is an accommodation to the wants of the human understanding. The separation between the dry earth and the sea on the third day means the separation between the good works a man does and the wild waves of his passions, etc. From Origen this method of allegorization spread widely in the Eastern Church; but in his great commentary De Genesi contra Manicheos, as well as in books XI.—XIII. of his Confessiones, and book XX. of his De Circutio Dei, where he also treats the subject, a method of allegorization is applied not essentially different from that of Origen and the Eastern Church; but in his great commentary De Genesi ad Literam the allegory often assumes the character of casuistry. Like Lactantius and Ambrose, Augustine was well versed in natural science. He knew what was known in his time, and he applies his knowledge with great boldness. Doubts and objections are heaped up in the form of questions. Were the venomous animals and the beasts of prey created before the fall of man, or after? Why were only terrestrial animals, and no fishes or marine animals, present in Paradise when Adam named the animals? The questions are often more subtle than the answers are satisfactory. In the track of Augustine followed all the commentators down to the time of Beda.

During the middle ages, from the eighth century to the period of the Reformation, the whole range of theology, its exegesis as well as its dogmatics, was under the sway of the Aristotelian philosophy; and the influence is conspicuous also in the manner in which the doctrine of creation was treated, both by the mystics and the scholastics. Of Hugo of St. Victor, the father and representative of French mysticism, two expositions of the dogma of creation are still extant, one in his Annotationes Etucadatoriae to the Pentateuch, and one in the opening chapters of his De Sacramentis Fidei. The idea of an instantaneous creation, introduced by Origen, and retained by Augustine, he abandons, and follows strictly the biblical narrative in its progression from one day to another, introducing at each stage a chapter of natural history, formed after the Aristotelian method of classification and description, but modified by an addition of a peculiar mysticism. Curious is his exposition of the creation, on the first day, of the primitive light as a radiant cloud rising above the earth, and throwing a dim light over chaos; and, on the fourth day, of the sun which is made out of the radiant cloud by a kind of transformation similar to that which took place at Cana when Jesus made wine out of water. Quite another character, and yet not without a certain air de famille, show the Libri Sententiarum by Petrus Lombardus, the true representative of medieval scholasticism. Every trace of subjective mysticism, or of merely individual conviction, has disappeared: the foundation of the whole building is the tradition of the Church; and the great problem is, by means of the huge engine of the Aristotelian logic, to bring all the various elements of the tradition into harmony with each other. It is principally Augustine, Beda, Alcuin, and Hugo of St. Victor, from whom Petrus Lombardus draws in his exposition of the dogma of creation. Augustine's view of a simultaneous creation of the whole world in one instant he mentions, praises, and then cautiously drops as not conformable to the tradition of the Church in the nobler and more effect as it had succeeded in making the whole question receive a new point by the appearance of Darwin's Origin of Species, and the rise of the theory of evolution,—a phase of the question which is still under treatment. See Evolution.

Lit. — Zöckler: Theologie und Naturwissenschaft, Gütersloh, 1877–79, 2 vols., a very elaborate representation of the historical development of the whole question, from which the above article is derived.

CREATIONISM denotes one of the three theories of the origin of the human spirit: traducianism and pre-existence are the two others. In his commentary on the Canticles, Origen describes these three hypotheses of allegory, createdism, and traducianism, as follows: first, whether the human spirit is created, or has existed from the beginning (pre-existence); next, if created, whether it was created once for all, and connected in such a way with the body as to be propagated, along with it, by natural generation (traducianism), or whether it is created successively, and, in each individual case, added from without, in order to vivify the body forming in the womb (creationism)."

The first of these theories (pre-existence) originated with Plato. He taught that all human souls had existed from the very beginning, though only in the realm of potentiality. Still silent they sleep there, until they, one by one, through the birth of a child, enter into the realm of actuality. Origen adopted this theory, and introduced it into Christian theology. It was widely accepted throughout the Eastern Church. The christological development, however, after the Council of Nicaea, made the view almost untenable; for when two natures are assumed in Christ, a divine and a human, what can be the relation in the pre-existence between his divine and his human spirit? The final condemnation of Origen, under Justinian, threw his divine and his human spirit into a still deeper shadow over his ideas. Yet the theory of the pre-existence of the soul was still held by the last of the fathers, Maximus, and by the first of the schoolmen, John Scotus Eriugena; and it has recently been revived within the new-rationalistic school of theology in Sweden. Its able and eloquent champion, Viktor Rydberg, protests that it forms the basis of the whole psychology, morals, and eschatology of the New Testament. Julius Muller, in his great work on the Doctrine of Sin, defends the pre-existence in order to explain the problem of hereditary guilt. Dr. Edward Beecher, in his Conflict of Ages, advocated the same view in America. But the origin of sin is thus only put back to prehistoric times, not explained.

In the Western Church traducianism was for some time the prevailing view. It was first taught by Tertullian, who, from the palpable unity of the human race, and the easily observed propagation per traducem of qualities and propensities, not to say of virtues and vices, from parents to children, inferred that the human soul, once created in Adam, naturally propagated itself along with the body by generation. But this theory, which corresponds so well with the peculiarity of Tertullian,—he protests that everything real must have a body, and he consequently ascribes materiality, not only to the soul, but also to God (De Anima, chap. 9),—was unable to satisfy the deepest religious instincts of mankind; and, as the theory of the pre-existence of the soul had become untenable, on account of the above-mentioned christological difficulties, creationism gradually developed, and came, though without any formal or official declaration, to be considered the orthodox view, both in the Eastern and in the Western Church. During the Pelagian controversy the question was much debated; but Augustine refrained from giving any definite answer. He accepted the premises of traducianism, the unity of the human race, and the transmission of qualities and propensities by inheritance; but he rejected the theory of the pre-existing materiality of the soul, and led the way to the new theory, which confined the propagation by generation to the material sphere (to the body), and assumed a concursus divinus, a new creation, at the origin of each new individual. With Jerome and Leo the Great the theory is almost complete; and with the schoolmen, Anselm, Peter Lombard, Thomas Aquinas, and others, it forms a conspicuous part of the whole theological system. Dr. Charles Hodge thus states the arguments for it: 1. It is more consistent with the prevailing representations of the Scriptures, which is that the spirit comes directly from God; 2. It is also most consistent with the nature of the soul, which is indivisible; 3. It explains the freedom of Christ's soul from sin, although he was conceived and born of a woman. Theology, ii. pp. 70–72. On the other hand, traducianism most easily explains the problem of hereditary sin, and has been adopted by all the orthodox Lutheran divines. See LUTHARDT: Kompendium der Dogmatik, p. 107.

Each of the three theories represents an element of truth,—the theory of pre-existence, the ideal pre-existence of man in the divine mind; creationism, God's agency in the origin of each human soul; traducianism, the parental agency. But it is well to remember the word of Augustine on this difficult subject: "Non sum ausus aliquid definire, quia fateor me nescire" ("I do not venture to define a matter of which I must confess myself to be ignorant").

CREDERENCE TABLE, a table or shelf on which the sacramental bread and wine were put before their consecration. CREEDER, Karl August, b. at Waltershausen, near Gotha, Jan. 10, 1797; studied at Jena, Breslau, and Göttingen; lived for several years as a tutor (1821–27), and was appointed professor of exegesis at Jena (in 1838) and (in 1852) at Giessen, where he died in the summer of 1857. He belonged to the rationalistic school of theology, and his rationalism became more and more conspicuous in his works as he grew older. Nevertheless, his labors as a biblical critic, especially his investigations of the origin of the books of the New Testament and of the history of its canon, are valuable, not only on account of their richness of information, but also on account of the clearness and objectivity of the representation. His principal works are, Beiträge zur Einleitung in die biblischen Schriften (I. 1852, II. 1858), Einleitung in das Neue Testament (1838, generally considered his chief work, but unfinished), Zur Geschichte des Kanons (Halle, 1847), and Geschichte des neustestamentlichen Kanons, edited after his death by Volkmann, Berlin, 1860. CREED. A creed is a confession of faith for public use. It may be of any length, and in any form. It may merely state the essentials of belief, or the entire body of doctrine. It may be written or oral, secret or published. It must, however, be authoritative,—the recognized tenets of the body from which it issues. It may be professedly limited in its constituency, or lay down the law for the world.

Creeds never precede faith, but presuppose it. They emanate from the inner life of the Church, independently of external occasion. They would have existed, even if there had been no doctrinal controversy of the soul and the spiritual life. They are, indeed, not the foundations of the Church; but they are, in a sense, the cement which unites the stones of the building.
The Church has only one foundation, which is Christ, but many builders: hence her creeds are many and different. The lack of agreement is rather in detail than in cardinal truth: so, if there is a disensus, there is also a consensus; and by both the Church manifests her corporate and individual life.

A creed may proceed from the general life of the Church in a particular age without any individual authorship (as the Apostles' Creed), or from an ecumenical council (the Nicene Creed), or from the synod of a particular church (the Decrees of the Synod of Dort), or from a number of divines commissioned for the purpose by ecclesiastical authority (the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England), or from one individual, who acts in this case as the organ of his church or sect (the Augsburg Confession and Apology, composed by Melanchthon), the creeds of Congregational and Baptist churches, drawn up by the pastor. What gives it binding force is the formal sanction or tacit acquiescence of the body it represents. In the Protestant system the creed is not co-ordinate with, but always subordinate to, the Bible; for in the best case it is only an approximate and relatively correct exposition of revealed truth. It follows, therefore, that the creed not only may be, but should be, improved when the Church's increased knowledge from the Bible and Christian experiences demands it. The creed is the answer of man to the word of God. He should be willing to give a better answer if he can. The creed and the Bible are related as stream and fountain. The authority of the latter is divine and absolute: that of the former is human and relative. The Bible regulates the general religious belief and practice of the laity as well as the clergy: the creed regulates the public teaching of the officers of the Church, just as constitutions and the Bible, to interfere with the liberty of conscience and the right of private judgment, to produce hypocrisy, intolerance, bigotry, and so, by way of re-action, dissent, dogmatic indifference, and insufficiency. But these objections apply particularly to the creeds of state churches, and also, in a modified degree, to those of denominations and sects. A church whose clergy do not believe the creed they profess to believe has a plain duty before it, — to make a creed which shall express their belief.

The creeds of Christendom may be divided into four classes, — the ecumenical, and those of the three main divisions of the Church, the Greek, Latin, and Evangelical. The first are concerned chiefly with theology proper and christology: they are the Apostles', Nicene, Chalcedonian, and Athanasian. The second class embraces those setting forth the distinctive faith of the Greek Church, particularly in distinction to Rome, which so long and so cunningly tried to subjugate her: hence their distinguishing elements concern the doctrine of the Procession of the Holy Spirit and the Papacy. The third class are the Roman creeds, from the Council of Trent (1543–63) to the Council of the Vatican (1870). The fourth class, the Evangelical, are the most numerous, and are subdivided into Lutheran and Reformed. These agree almost entirely in their principal tenets, but differ in their doctrines of divine decrees and of the nature and efficacy of the sacraments, especially the mode of Christ's presence in the Lord's Supper. They date mainly from before 1650. — See Schaff, Creeds of Christendom (3 vols.), for further information and abundant literature.

Crispin, Jean, b. at Arras; studied law at Louvain, and began to practise as an advocate in Paris, but embraced Protestantism, and fled in 1548 to Geneva, where he established a printing-house; was made a citizen in 1555; and d. 1572. Like many other celebrated printers he was himself an author, and wrote, besides other books, L'Estat de l'Eglise (1548) and Histoire des Martyrs (Geneva, 1554), giving the history of the martyrs of the sixteenth century. The latter became a very famous book, was translated into Latin by Claude Baduel, and repeatedly reprinted with additions, 1570, 1610, etc. The first-mentioned was translated into English, The Estate of the Church, London, 1602.

Crisp, Tobias, b. in London, 1600; d. there Feb. 27, 1643. He took his doctor's degree at Balliol College, Oxford. He was the leader of the Antinomians, although personally an amiable and benevolent Christian. His closing years were ruffled by controversy. After his death fourteen of his sermons were published under the title, Christ Alone Exalted, London, 1643, 4th ed., with Memoirs of his Life, and a Conference with Scalne Sin, 1691; new ed. by Dr. Gill, 1832, 2 vols. 8vo.

Crispinus and Crispianus, two brothers of a distinguished Roman family; left Rome in the beginning of the reign of Diocletian, and went to Gaul to labor for the conversion of the Pagans. They regulated their life under any special divine guidance. But because creeds are objected to is no good reason for rejecting them. The benefits claimed for them can be obtained in no other way; and it is hard to see any valid objection to a plain and full statement of belief, provided it is a real belief. What has done most to bring creeds into disrepute has been the notorious discrepancy between the actual belief of a particular church and the creed printed in its standards. A church whose clergy do not believe the creed they profess to believe has a plain duty before it, — to make a creed which shall express their belief.
In their missionary labor they seem to have been very successful until they were martyred by the Emperor Maximilianus. They are commemorated by the Roman Church on Oct. 25, and venerated as the patron saints of the shoemakers. See Butler: Lives of the Saints, II, pp. 210-212.

CRITICISM, Textual. See Bible Text, New Testament.

CROCIUS, Johann, b. at Laasphe, in Hesse, July 28, 1599; d. at Marburg, July 1, 1639; stood for many years at the head of the Church of Hesse-Cassel, which occupied a distinct position between the Confessio Augustana and Calvinism. After studying at Herborn and Marburg, he became court-preacher at Cassel in 1612, and in 1617 first professor of theology at Marburg. But in 1621, the Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt, by the aid of Tilly's soldiers, expelled the Reformed, or, as they called themselves, Evangelical, professors, from Marburg; and Crocius retired to Cassel, where he resided till after the Peace of Westphalia. Those of his writings in which his religious standpoint is at all defined are Commentarius de August. Confess. (Cassel, 1647), Illustratio Dissertationis Osbruigenais (Cassel, 1647), De Ecclesia Unitate et Schismaticoe (Cassel, 1650). The most remarkable of his polemical writings are Anti-Bezaeus (1643) and Anti-Weigeliius (1661).

CROMWELL, Oliver, Lord-Protector of the Commonwealth of England, b. at Huntingdon, April 25, 1599; d. at Whitehall, Sept. 3, 1658. He studied for a year at Cambridge University (1616-17), but left it on the death of his father, and applied himself to law. In 1620 he married, and settled down on his patrimonial estate. In 1628 he represented Huntingdon in Parliament, and in 1640 Cambridge in the famous Long Parliament. His sturdy independence was shown by his vigorous opposition to the royal interference in the drainage of the Bedford fens, which won him the sobriquet "Lord of the Fens." When in 1642 war between King and Parliament broke out, Cromwell raised a company of volunteers to help the people's side. He perceived that the strength of his cause lay rather in its righteousness than in the military skill and training of his troops; and he generally believed in this fact, the more invincible would they be. Accordingly he gathered around him a thousand men, selected on this principle; and his regiment, the famous "Ironsides," who went into battle singing psalms, justified his wisdom, for it was never beaten. During the memorable struggle between the Cavaliers and Roundheads, Cromwell was the most prominent figure; and although, at the beginning, he knew nothing of tactics, he developed so much skill that he defeated the royalists on the hard-fought fields of Marston Moor (July 2, 1644), Naseby (June 14, 1645), and Preston (Aug. 17, 1648). He was a member of the High Court of Justice which tried Charles I., and as such signed the warrant for his execution, Jan. 29, 1649. In August, 1649, he was nominated lord-lieutenant and commander-in-chief in Ireland, and by a strong hand put down opposition. The Scotch Presbyterian advocacy of the royalist side—for Prince Charles had signed the Covenant, and captured the national heart—led to his recall. Being made captain-general of all the forces of the Commonwealth, June 26, 1650, he marched into Scotland, and was completely successful, by trusting in God, and keeping his powder dry. The victories of Dunbar (Sept. 3, 1650), of Edinburgh (Dec. 19, 1650), of Perth (Aug. 2, 1651), put the country under him. The battle of Worcester (Oct. 5, 1651), ended the war. Cromwell returned to London, and took up his residence at Hampton Court, Oct. 12, 1651; dissolved Parliament (which had become a mere "Rump," and so it was appropriately called) April 20, 1653; formed a Council of State April 30; summoned the Little (Barebone's) Parliament, which lasted from July 4 to Dec. 12; became Lord-Protector Dec. 16; and was solemnly installed in Westminster Hall. "He showed himself equal to the hard task he had undertaken, by sharp, decisive means keeping down plotting royalists, jealous Presbyterians, and intractable levellers, and by a bold and magnanimous foreign policy making England greater and more honored than ever. He interfered for the protection of the Vaudois Protestants, cruelly persecuted by the Duke of Savoy, and paid a large sum (£37,097) raised for their relief." He also informed the Pope that he would take the first opportunity to send a fleet into the Mediterranean to visit Civita Vecchia, and so the sound of his cannon should be heard in Rome itself. He had to rule mostly without parliaments, since they gave him so much trouble. The one before the last offered him the title of "king;" and he was disposed at first to accept it, but finally declined it (May 8, 1657), and was again installed in the Protectorate with greater solemnities and added power.

At length the weight of cares and domestic afflictions broke down even his strength; and Friday, Sept. 3, 1658, the anniversary of so many triumphs, he won his greatest victory, that over death and the grave. He was interred in Henry VII. Chapel, at Westminster, with unheard-of funeral pomp, Nov. 29, 1658; but on June 30, 1661, by order of Charles II., his remains were exhumed, beheaded, and burnt at Tyburn.

One of the most remarkable reversals of historical judgments in modern times is in relation to Cromwell. Instead of the simple presentation of Cromwell's letters and speeches in chronological order, with sufficient explanatory matter to render them intelligible, Thomas Carlyle produced this change in popular sentiment. From being canvassed, Cromwell was praised. The old epitheta’s “regicide,” “usurper,” “tyrant,” “fanatic,” “bigot,” “hypocrite,” were exchanged for those of “statesman,” “patriot,” “wise, just, and religious ruler.” The latter epithets express the truth about this man, who was not only the greatest Englishman, but the greatest man, of his age, and who deserves the reverence of all time. Possessed for a long period of absolute authority, he used it moderately. Living with narrow-minded, persecuting Puritans, he cherished lenient sentiments, and promoted religious liberty. Belonging to the Puritan party, he spoke in Bible language, as they did, and held as tenaciously to their sOMBRE but profound theology; but in many respects he was unlike them, and was far too great to be sectarian. His prediction has been fulfilled: “I know God has been above all ill reports, and will in his own time vindicate me.”

CROSIER, or CROZIER, the pastoral staff of the bishop, the emblem of his office as shepherd of the flock of God, the symbol of his right to rule the flock, and his duty to support it. It is borne before him when he appears officially, though not outside the territory over which he exercises jurisdiction. The crozier of the bishop terminates in a hook, that of the archbishop in a flared cross, that of a patriarch in a cross with two, and that of the Pope in a cross with three, transverse bars. The emblem, however, does not seem to be of Christian origin. The staff has always been the emblem of the office of the king, the judge, and the priest; and on old bas-reliefs the Roman augur is represented with a hooked staff in his hand, very similar to the bishop’s crozier.

CROSS. The Cross as a Sign and a Symbol. — The cross has been used everywhere and throughout all times as a means of marking and adorning. Among Pagan tribes, both in the Old and in the New World, it occurs under every possible form, as representative of natural forces, or accessory to idols; and after the crucifixion of Christ it became the true symbol of Christianity. The custom of making the sign of the cross with the hand or the fingers, as a means of conferring blessing, or preserving from evil, is very old. Basil the Great refers it back to the apostles. Cyprian (De Unit. Eccl.) and the Apostolical Constitutions (III. 17) mention the signum Christi as a part of the baptismal rite; and Lactantius (Inst. Div., IV. 27) speaks of it as especially fearful to the demons by the baptismal exorcism. Prudentius (Hymn. 6) advises it every night, before going to sleep, to the head and the breast, as a preservative against temptations and bad dreams. In the Western Church it was made with the thumb, in the Eastern with the first finger, among the Armenians and the Raskolnik with the index and the middle finger. In the fifth century it became customary to apply the sign at the beginning of treaties, diplomatical notes, etc., instead of an invocation of the name of God, and at the end, beside the name of the signer, as a token of trustworthiness. Ecclesiastics always used it in this way. The Greek emperor used to put a red cross before his name when signing; the Byzantine princes, a green; the English kings, a golden. In the Lutheran Church the custom of making the sign of the cross was continued: in the French Reformed and most Calvinistic churches it was abandoned as not warranted by Scripture, and as superstitious.

The sign made with the hand or the finger was the crux usualis: the cross actually executed in some kind of wood, and painted, must have occurred even at his time; and Chrysostom, in his homily on the divinity of Christ, speaks of them as found everywhere,—in the houses, market-places, deserts, along the roads, on the hills, on bedsteads, arms, utensils, etc. In the fifth century they first appear on the tombs.

The anchor , the Buddhist Soastika symbol and the monogram of Christ, which can be traced back to the third or even to the second century, were not crucex dissimulatae, but independent symbols occurring along with the crosses. The first actual representation of the cross dates from the second half of the fourth century. When Constantine adopted the cross in the labarum, and afterwards had himself represented as the victor, with the cross over his forehead, the start was made; and soon crosses were seen on helmets, bucklers, and standards, on crowns and sceptres, on coins and medals, etc. Their principal application, however, they found in the church-buildings, and in certain parts of the worship. In the procession the cross was the chief object; and the most important feature in the consecration of a church-building was the planting of the cross. At the time of the crusades the cross became the ground-plan of the whole church-construction, and at the same time it rose prodigiously in popular reverence and enthusiasm by being the Christian banner over against the crescent.

Thus variously employed, the cross assumed various forms: from crocussa, “a cross,” became a special part of heraldry. Of these forms the principal are: I. The crux decussata, Afterwards called the Burgundina cross, or the cross of St. Andrew, because the apostle Andrew is said to have suffered death on it; II. The crux commissa, in the form of the Greek letter Tau, was the cross on which the apostle Philip died, and is also called the Egyptian cross, or the cross of St. Anthony, because by that St. Anthony is said to have stayed the plague, and destroyed the idols of Egypt; among them it always remained a supplicium service (Hor.: Sat., I. 3, 80–83; Cic.: In Verrem, V. 68), applied only to slaves or to the meanest criminals, such as highway robbers, assassins, and rebels. Tibersius ordered the priests at the Temple of Isis to be crucified, because by fraud they had induced a distinguished Roman lady, Paulina, to surrender herself to the lust of a certain Menedas (Josephus: Arch. 18; 3. 4). After the conquest of Jerusalem, Titus could not find place enough for the crosses, and not crosses enough for the Jews he wanted to punish (Josephus: Bell. Jud., V. 11, 1). In the oldest times the execution was performed by soldiers, commanded by a centurion or tribune on horseback (Tacitus: Ann., 3, 14; Seneca: De Ira, 1, 16), afterwards by specially appointed persons, apparitores, belonging to the retinue of the procurator provincia.

The execution generally took place just outside the city, beside the most frequented road (Quintilian: Decl., 274; Cicero: In Verrem, V. 68; Tacitus: Ann., 16, 44; Livius VIII., 16), and was preceded by a scourging, performed by soldiers, commanded by a centurion (patibulum); and, when the soldiers compelled Simon of Cyrene to carry the cross of Christ, it was simply a coarse joke. Having arrived at the place of execution, the victim was stripped naked, and nailed, with the arms outstretched, to the cross-bar, which then was hauled up, and fastened to the stake. At the same time the body was brought in position on the sedile, and finally the feet were nailed to the stake. The scaffold or the crown of thorns, found in all Christian representations of Christ crucified, are additions of the imagination; and the representations of the medieval German painters—Christ being nailed to the cross while the cross is still lying on the ground—are wrong. According to Cyprian, Gregory of Tours, and old Christian art, a nail was driven through each foot: according to Josephus: Bell. Jud., 5, 11; Livius, 33, 36; Curtius, 7, 11, 28). The victim carried the cross himself, that is, the cross-bar (patibulum); and, when the soldiers compelled Simon of Cyrene to carry the cross of Christ, it was simply a coarse joke. The Invention and the Raising of the Cross.—In 326 the Emperor Constantine determined to build a church on Golgotha; and his mother Helen, who was staying at that time in Jerusalem, tried, together with Bishop Macarius, to make out the exact spot on which the cross of Christ had stood. Two centuries before, however, the Emperor Adrian had made the place of the crucifixion completely unrecognizable: the sacred tomb had been filled up, and a temple in honor of Jupiter and Venus erected over it. Nevertheless, by extensive excavations the rock-tomb was found; and close by were discovered the three crosses, the tablet with Pilate's inscription, the tablet with the cross-bar, the two nails used at the execution, and the tablet with Pilate's inscription. The question now arose, which of the three crosses was that of Christ. There was one of them to which the tablet fitted best; but more decisive testimony was necessary, and Macarius knew how to produce it. A distinguished lady of Jerusalem was sick unto death. She was brought to the place, and made to touch the three crosses. The empress and a great number of spectators were present. She touched the two first crosses without any effect at all, but hardly had she laid her hand on the third before she rose from her couch perfectly cured, healthy and strong. Eusebius, who was contemporary with these events, does not seem to have known them; but half a century later they were generally known and accepted. The miracles, however, did not end with the "invention" of the cross. One part of it, together with the nails, the empress sent to her son; but the larger part was framed in silver, and intrusted to Macarius to be preserved in the principal church of Jerusalem. Chips of this cross were presented to distinguished persons; after a while they were sold, and very soon an enormous trade in chips of the genuine cross sprang up. Everybody wanted them. They were incased in silver and gold, and worn as amulets around the neck. But the great marvel was, that, though cartloads of such chips were shaved from the cross, the bulk of the genuine cross sprang up. Everybody wanted them. They were incased in silver and gold, and worn as amulets around the neck. But the great marvel was, that, though cartloads of such chips were shaved from the cross, the bulk of the cross itself was not thereby diminished.

In 615 Jerusalem was taken and burnt by the Persian King, Chosroes II., and thousands of its inhabitants were killed, or carried away in captivity. Before the catastrophe, the Patriarch Zacharias had hidden the holy cross in a sealed box; but the box was discovered, and carried away among the other spoil. But in 628 a reverse of fortune took place. Sireos, the son of Chosroes II., was defeated by the Emperor Heraclius; and one of the conditions of peace was the return of the holy cross. The box was restored with the seal unbroken; and in 631 the cross was brought back to Jerusalem by the emperor himself. He carried it on his back up the Golgotha, and there it was again "raised" in its old place in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. In commemoration of this event a festum exaltationis crucis was instituted, just as a festum inventionis crucis had been instituted in commemoration of the discovery of the cross. The former of these festivals is celebrated on Sept. 14, and enjoys great reputation in the Eastern Church. In the Western Church it was introduced by Honorius I. CRUCIGER, Kaspar, the trusty but modest and quiet collaborator of Luther; was born at Leipzig, Jan. 1, 1504, and died at Wittenberg, Nov. 10, 1548. In 1521 he removed with his parents to Wittenberg, where he studied under Luther and Melanchthon, also medicine, natural history, and the Hebrew language. From 1524 till 1528 he was rector of the Johannes School in Magdeburg, but returned in the latter year to Wittenberg as preacher and professor; aided Luther in the translation of the Bible, and partook, mostly as secretary, in the numerous disputations of the day. He was an expert in short-hand writing, and thus preserved many of Luther’s sermons and lectures. Some of his letters and orations are found in Corpus Reformationis, I., II.

CRUDEN, Alexander, the author of the Concordance; b. at Aberdeen, May 31, 1701; d. in London, Nov. 1, 1770. He was graduated at Marischal College, Aberdeen; took the degree of M.A., and was about to be licensed, when suddenly he first revealed that lunacy from which he suffered in a greater or less degree all his life. From 1722 to 1732 he taught; but at the latter date he settled in London as bookseller, and corrector of the press, and eventually became bookseller to the queen. In 1737 he issued his immortal work, A Complete Concordance of the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments (4to), dedicated to Queen Caroline. His means having been exhausted by the printing of his book, he was obliged to sell his stock in trade. This step naturally produced a return of his malady. He was confined in a private asylum, but escaped. He then issued (March, 1738) The London Citizen Exceeding Injured; giving an account of his severe and long campaign at Bethnal Green for nine weeks and six days; the Citizen being sent there in March, 1748, by Robert Wightman, a notoriously conceited, whimsical man; where he was chained, handcuffed, striait-waistcoated, and imprisoned; with a history of Wightman’s Blind Bench, a sort of court that met at Wightman’s room, and unaccountably proceeded to pass decrees in relation to the London Citizen, etc., and instituted legal proceedings against Wightman, the proprietor of the asylum, and Dr. Munro the physician. He pleaded his own cause, it is needless to add, unsuccessfully, yet had a report of the trial printed, and dedicated to the king, George II. He resumed his occupation of corrector of the press; and, with the exception of a few days in 1753, he was not again confined in confinement. His unbalanced mind led him to do very odd things. He thought himself called to be the public censor; assumed the title “Alexander the Corrector,” and tried to reform public manners, especially in regard to keeping Sunday. He also habitually carried a sponge, with which he effaced all inscriptions that were of an immoral tendency, according to his notions. He appeared as parliamentary candidate of the city of London, applied for knighthood, sought to marry a daughter of a lord-mayor of London; and, to further these and other wild schemes, he published extraordinary pamphlets. In 1761 he issued a new edition of his concordance, again in quarto; and the labor it cost him, in connection with his professional proof-reading for the Public Advertiser (a daily paper), had a most benificent effect upon his health; so that thenceforth he was little troubled. In 1768 the third edition (4to) appeared. It is satisfactory to record, that, for the second, he received five hundred pounds, and for the third three hundred pounds more, besides twenty copies on fine paper. He was thus reimbursed for his early expenditure, and acquired a comfortable provision. His Concordance was not a monetary speculation, but originated and was carried on in a sincere love for the Bible, and desire to promote its study. He prepared also an Account of the History and Excellency of the Holy Scriptures, a Scripture Dictionary (published posthumously at Aberdeen), the very elaborate verbal Index affixed to Bishop Newton’s edition of Milton’s Poetical Works, and an autobiography, under the title, Adventures of Alexander the Corrector.

Cruden was a most excellent man, kind-hearted, benevolent, fearless in the discharge of duty, a public-spirited citizen, and a humble, devout Christian. The definitions in his concordance, which are unhappily omitted in so many editions, are strongly Calvinistic; but he was no bigot. He was a member of Dr. Guyse’s Church (Independent), and proved by a blameless life of enthusiastic, albeit eccentric philanthropy, how deeply interested he was in the cause of humanity, which is the cause of God. He was found dead upon his knees in the act of prayer.

CRUSADES. The conquest of Jerusalem by the Mohammedans, and the insults offered to the most sacred memories of the Christian world, roused such a feeling of shame and indignation throughout Christendom, but especially in Western Europe, that a series of wars, called crusades, from the cross which was worn by all participants as a badge, was undertaken for the purpose of reconquering Palestine. The chief motive power in this movement was at first pure religious enthusiasm, helped on, it may be, by the ample ecclesiastical indulgences and great social exemptions which were granted to all who took the cross; and the idea which precipitated whole nations like a rushing stream towards the Holy Land, no doubt continued to be the principal impulse in many a noble heart. But gradually the restless and adventurous spirit of the age, to which, in this fierce struggle of God, found satisfaction for its coarsest cravings without any disturbance of its gross superstition, transformed the religious contest about the Holy Land into a romantic tournament between the Christian knight and the Moslem warrior; and finally political ambition and commercial greed degraded the whole undertaking into a mere means of intrigue, speculation, and fraud. The number of these wars is seven; but there were several minor expeditions, such as the premature rushing-wards under Peter the Hermit, the Children’s Crusade, etc., which are not counted, because they miscalculated the very outset.

I.—The first crusade (1096–99) was led by Godfrey of Bouillon, Duke of Lorraine; Hugh of Vermandois, a brother of the king of France; Robert, Duke of Normandy, a son of William the Conqueror; Bohemund of Tarent; and Tancred of Hauteville; the sons of theCount and the nephew of Robert Guiscard, etc. The powerful address of Urban II., delivered to an enormous audience at Clermont in November, 1095, and answered with an unanimous “God will it!” may be considered as the real starting-point of the first crusade. The organization of this enterprise was, of course, slow and difficult. Aug. 15, 1096, was fixed as the day on which the armies should begin to move. But people could not wait. One swarm started in March under Peter the Hermit, another a little later under Walter the Penniless, a third under Gottschalk; but all these swarms, after committing horrible excesses and crimes, melted away under the resistance and punishment of the Magyars, the Slavs, and the Greeks. The regular armies, moving by sea and by land, united in Constantinople in the last days of 1096; and June 24, 1097, Nicæa was captured; but Antioch was not taken until June 3, 1098; and Jerusalem not until July 15, 1099. All the Jews in the city were burnt alive in the synagogue: all the infidels—some say seventy thousand—were massacred. Through the desolate streets the victors went in a procession to the Church of the Resurrection, singing their hymns, and wading in blood. Shortly after, the kingdom of Jerusalem was established, and Godfrey was made king. The sources to the history of the first crusade, reports by eyewitnesses and contemporaries (among which the Historia Hierosolyma, by William of Tyre, is the most important), are collected in Bonnarius: Gesta Dei per Francos, Hanover, 1611. See also, Matthew of Edessa: Recit de la première croisade, trans. from the Armenian by Edouard Delaurier, Paris, 1850; H. Sybel: Geschichte d. ersten Kreuzzuges, Leipzig, 1841, 2d ed., 1851; H. Hagenmeyer: Peter der Eremite, Leipzig, 1879.

II.—The second crusade (1147) was caused by the conquest of Edessa by the Mohammedans, and their advance against Jerusalem. The religious enthusiasm of the West was rekindled. Eugene III. placed himself at the head of the movement; and Bernard of Clairvaux preached the crusade in France and Germany, promising certain victory, promising even that God would smite the hosts of the infidels by a miraculous interference. Two brilliant armies, led by Conrad III. of Germany and Lewis VII. of France, moved toward the Holy Land. But the Byzantine emperor was more afraid of the crusaders than of the Turks. He made peace secretly with them; and chiefly by his treachery the German army was wasted in the defiles of Asia Minor. The French army also suffered severely; and, when the remnants of the magnificent army joined King Baldwin III. before the walls of Damascus, famine, disease, dissensions, and the treachery of the Pallæans (the Christian inhabitants of the besieged city, descendants of the first crusaders), soon brought the whole undertaking to a sorry end. Consternation, anger, and despair filled the whole of Germany. Francis, and Bernard added what he could to the misery. He saved his fame as an inspired prophet by declaring the crusading armies unworthy of victory, and the defeat a divine punishment of their sins. See Kugler: Geschichte des zweiten Kreuzzuges, Stuttgart, 1866.

III.—Oct. 3, 1187, Jerusalem was taken by Saladin, and Gregory VIII. preached a new crusade. Frederick Barbarossa of Germany, Philip Auguste of France, and Richard I. (Cœur-de-Lion) of England, followed the summons; and all Christendom seemed to respond to the undertaking. Frederick Barbarossa forced his way through Asia Minor, but was drowned in the Kalykadnus (July 10, 1190); and his army was much reduced when it reached Acre, led by his son, Frederic of Suabia. The French and English kings arrived by sea, splendidly equipped, and in full vigor; but the siege of the city was long, and cost, it is said, about three hundred thousand lives; and, immediately after its capture, Philippe Auguste returned to France. Richard continued the contest, but rather as if it were only a chivalresque tournament between himself and Saladin; and the result was very meagre,—permission for the Christian pilgrims to visit Jerusalem. He left the Holy Land in 1192; but on his journey back to England he was captured by Duke Leopold of Austria, and sold to the emperor, Henry VI., who, to the great scandal of the whole Christian world, made a good bargain by exacting an immense ransom. Wilcke: Geschichte des Tempelherrenordens, Berlin, 1826-35.

IV.—How the spirit from which the crusades originated had changed in the course of little over a century, became sadly apparent when Innocent III. preached the fourth crusade (1203). A number of the most distinguished noblemen—Thibaut of Champagne, Simon of Montfort, Baldwin of Flanders, etc.—assembled at Venice with about twenty thousand combatants. But Venice demanded eighty-five thousand marks silver for the transfer of the crusaders to the Holy Land; and, as they were unable to pay this sum in cash, they went first to Dalmatia, where they conquered Zare for Venice, and then to Constantinople, which they also conquered (April 12, 1204), and where they established a Latin Empire under Baldwin of Flanders. To the Holy Land they never went. The Pope felt shocked, and summoned a new crusade. He was answered by the children. In France arose a movement in 1212 which even the government was not able to suppress. Thousands of children, boys and girls, often of the tenderest age, took the cross, and rushed in feverish enthusiasm towards the Holy Land. Some swarms reached Italy; and there they melted away, by hunger and disease, in the waves, and in the slave-markets. Two regular armies were organized in 1217 by Andrew II. of Hungary, and Count William of Holland. But, Andrew leaving left the enterprise with the best part of his troops, the rest of the armies went, not to the Holy Land, but on a robber-expedition to Egypt, where most of them perished in the Nile floods. See Geoffroy de Ville-Hardouin: Livre de la conquête de Constantinople, Paris, 1656; G. Z. Gray: The Children's Crusade, New York, 1872; L. Streit: Beiträge zur Geschichte des vierten Kreuzzuges, Anklam, 1877.

V., VI., VII.—The complete failure of the undertaking of Andrew II. and Count William was generally ascribed to the Emperor Frederic II., who had taken the cross in 1215, but steadily refused to fulfil the promise given. Compelled by the Pope, Gregory IX., he finally embarked (Aug. 15, 1227) at Brundisium, but returned a few days afterwards, protesting that he was sick. Utterly provoked, the Pope put him under the ban; and the next year he actually went on the expedition. He was very successful. Palestine was reconquered; and in 1229 he crowned himself King of Jerusalem, and returned to Europe, defying the Pope and the excommunication. Jerusalem, however, was not long in the possession of the Christians. The uproar which the Mongol avalanche caused in Southern and Western Asia reached also the Holy Land. The Chawaesrians, a Turkish tribe, overran the whole country, and (1247) Jerusalem was taken and pillaged. In the following year Louis IX. of France took the cross for the rescue of the city, and landed with a great armament in Cyprus. After spending the winter on that island, and making still further preparations, he went (in 1249) to Egypt, and conquered Damiette and Mansura. But, when he attempted to penetrate farther into the country, he suffered very severe losses, and was finally compelled to surrender with his whole army. In 1254 it cost France most of its wealth to ransom its King and its warriors. Notwithstanding this great misfortune, Louis IX. did not give up the idea of delivering the Holy Land from the sway of the infidels. In 1260 he began a new crusade, the last; and the whole French nobility followed him. Political reasons led him to open the campaign with an invasion of Tunis; and there he died (Aug. 24, 1270). His son and successor, Philippe III., made peace with Tunis, and returned to France. See JoHNVILLE: Histoire de St. Louis, edited by Char. du Fresne, Paris, 1868.

During the last part of his life the students of the university were divided into two camps, the Crusians and the Ernestians; but the noble reposes of his mind was not disturbed by the contest. E. CRYPT (Latin crypta; Greek κρύπτης, "a hidden place") meant in its classical use any subterranean room or passage, and was applied both to the sewer and the fruit-cellar. By an easy transition it afterwards came to denote the subterranean cemeteries of the Christians, the so-called catacombs, or, more properly, such single passages and galleries of them in which martyrs or saints were buried. As it became customary to erect chapels, or even churches, on the surface of the catacombs, just over the grave of a martyr, and with an opening under the altar which allowed to look down into the grave, into the crypt, it was natural that afterwards — though the cathedrals were not built over the graves of the martyrs, but the graves of the martyrs were dug under the cathedrals — the name "crypt" was transferred also to these excavations under the choir of the basilicas and churches of the Romanesque style, which sometimes were so extensive as to form whole subterranean churches, and often were used as places of interment for bishops and archbishops. With the Romanesque style the crypts disappeared.

CRYPTO-CALVINISM is the term properly applied to those Germans who secretly held the Calvinistic doctrine on the eucharist (i.e., the spiritual presence of Christ), while they rejected that on predestination. Luther's view of the Lord's Supper implied the ubiquity of Christ's body. Melanchthon's later view agreed essentially with Calvin's; and for a number of years it was that entertained by the majority of Lutheran divines, even at Wittenberg and Leipzig, and at the court of the Elector of Saxony: it was also in various ways officially recognized with the Augsburg Confession of 1540. But as soon as the two views were labelled "Luther's," "Calvin's," there was no doubt in the public mind which should be accepted. The first to call attention to the true authorship of Melanchthon's view was Joachim Westphal, a rigid Lutheran minister at Hamburg, who in 1552 opened war upon those who denied the corporeal presence, and the literal eating of Christ's body even by unbelievers. Calvin took part in the controversy, and appealed to Melanchthon, who, however, prudently declined to take active part in the strife, although he never concealed his essential agreement with Calvin. (See Corp. Reform., vol. viii. p. 352.) His followers were now stigmatized as Crypto-Calvinists. The controversy was carried all over Germany with incredible bigotry and superstition. In Bremen and Heidelberg the Calvinistic view prevailed; but in Würtemberg and Saxony it was finally condemned, and in the latter kingdom its defenders suffered exile and even death. In the American Lutheran Church the charge of Crypto-Calvinism was in 1881 renewed against the Missouri Lutherans; but, however, for holding the Calvinistic doctrine of the Lord's Supper, for they hold rigidly to Luther's view, but for defending the (semi-
CUDWORTH.

CUDWORTH, Ralph, English Platonist; b. at Aller, Somersetshire, 1617; d. at Cambridge, June 26, 1688. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge; was fellow of his college, and M.A., 1639; rector of North Cadbury, 1641-43; master of Clare Hall, Cambridge, and Hebrew preacher, 1644-54; D.D., 1651; master of Christ's College, 1654-62; rector of Ashwell in Herefordshire, 1662; and prebend of Gloucester, 1678.

As a philosopher and theologian he occupied an intermediate position between the Puritanic and Romanizing tendencies of his time; and, without taking actual part in the controversies upon church government and doctrine, he stood boldly forth as the champion of revealed religion against the reigning deism. Besides a _Discourse concerning the True Notion of the Lord's Supper, with two Sermons_ (1642), _The Union of Christ and the Church_ (1642), the posthumous _Treatise on Eternal and Immutable Morality_, published by Bishop Chandler in 1731, and _A Treatise on Free Will_, edited by Rev. John Allen, 1838, he wrote the great work upon which his fame rests, _The True Intellectual System of the Universe, wherein all the Reason and Philosophy of Atheism is refuted, and its Impossibility demonstrated_, 1688, fol.; 2d ed. with Life of the author by Dr. Birch, 1742, 2 vols. 4to; _Abridgment of 1st ed._ by Rev. Thomas Wise, 1706, 2 vols. 4to; Latin translation by Mosheim, Jens, 1739, 2 vols. fol., with improvements, Leyden, 1773, 2 vols. 4to; original English edition, reprinted, Andover, U.S.A., 1857, 2 vols. 8vo; enlarged edition, containing translation, by John Harrison, of Mosheim's valuable Notes, and also an Index, London, 1845, 3 vols. 8vo.

The treatises quoted above are parts of a gigantic whole, of the refutation which Cudworth had planned to give the doctrine of necessity as held by atheists, deists, and some Christian theologians. The treatise on _Morality_ contends in its position over against the refuted errors made in _the True Intellectual System of the Universe_, wherein all the _Reason and Philosophy of Atheism is refuted, and its Impossibility demonstrated_, 1688, fol.; _2d ed., with Life of the author by Dr. Birch_, 1742, 2 vols. 4to; _Abridgment of 1st ed._ by Rev. CULDEES.

The derivation and meaning of this name, and the exact functions of a bit, and opinions of those who bore it, have been the subject of much controversy, if not also, as Dr. Reeves asserts, of much mystification. But by the publication, in our day, of so many of the old records relating to their establishments, British scholars are coming to agree in a different view respecting them, though Dr. Ebrard still ably defends the long-received view. That view was not, in any sense, as it is sometimes charged, an invention of Presbyterians seeking historical support for their system. It came to them from Hector Boece and other pre-Reformation historians, and at first was substantially accepted by all Protestants, who, perhaps, were too eager to find historical prototypes or precursors in the primitive Church. Nor, if the old Protestant view is abandoned, should we be warranted without qualification to accept what some have proposed to substitute for it, and altogether to identify the Culdees of the British Isles with certain disorderly canons cleric of the Continent. The following are in brief the conclusions of Mr. Skene respecting them, than whom no one has treated the subject more learnedly and impartially. The monastic Church of the Columbites, after the fervor of its first zeal had passed away, was assailed by a twofold disintegrating influence: 1st, The introduction of a secular clergy from abroad; and, 2d, An influence from within in favor of increasing asceticism, leading not a few, in whose... breast the fire of piety still glowed, to abandon the cenobitical life for the cell of the anchorite. This form of ascetic life had long existed in the Christian Church, and had come to be regarded by many as a higher form of it than the cenobitical; and the name Deicola came in time to be assigned to those who followed it, as that of Christicola was extended to ordinary Christians, or specially appropriated to Cenobites. Such preference for the solitary over the cenobite life had occasionally been shown in early times among the Columbite monks; and many of their monasteries had their desert, cave, carcar, or lone islet, to which one seized with a longing for solitary communion with God could retreat for a longer or a shorter time. It was towards the end of the seventh, or beginning of the eighth, century, that this passion for a solitary life increased so much among them, that it tended greatly to break up the regular monastic system, and became embodied in what is termed the third order of Irish saints, as distinct from the second or Columban, as that was from the first or Patrician. “These were holy presbyters and a few bishops who dwelt in desert places, and lived on herbs and water and the alms of the faithful. They shunned private property; they despised all earthly things, and wholly avoided all whispering and backbiting; and they had different rules and masses, and different tonsures;” or, in other words, with all their fervor they belonged, many of them at least, to the party in South Ireland, who, in the course of the seventh century, conformed to the Roman tonsure, time of observing Easter, etc. Before the close of that century they not only lived in strict solitude, but seem at times to have formed “hermitical establishments,” where a number of so-called hermits lived in separate cells, but within a common enclosure; and the nomenclature of the Continental hermits began to appear among them in an Irish form, Celle De being applied to them as an equivalent of Deicola, meaning primarily “hermit,” and secondarily “servant” or “familus Dei.” The Latinized Irish form of Celle De was Colidati; its Scottish form, when it appeared later, Callidei and Keledei. Callidei is the name applied by Jocecin to the singulara cleric of Kentigern’s church, who lived in separate huts around it. Keledei is the name which came to be used in Scotland generally to denote the Culdees. Historically they made their appearance in the territory of the Southern Picts after King Nechtan had expelled the old Columban monks for refusing to conform to the Roman time of observing Easter; and Mr. Skene supposes that Adamnan himself, after breaking with the stricter party at Iona, may have had to do with the introduction of them. So he thinks may St. Serf or Servanus, to whom he assigns a later date than that of Palladius or Kentigern, and whom he supposes to have been, by the mother-side, of Pictish descent. He is specially connected with the history of the church in Fife in his time; and it is in connection with the house founded by him at Lochleven that Culdees are first referred to in actual documents as “Keledei.” As Mr. Skene says, “It is probable that these anchorites had degenerated from their first original, even in the days of Queen Margaret. Her biographer, as quoted by Mr. Skene, expressly states, that at this time “there were many in the kingdom of the Scots, who in different places, enclosed in separate cells, lived in the flesh, but not according to the flesh, in great straitness of life, and even on earth lived the life of angels. In them the queen did her best to love and venerate Christ, and frequently to visit them with her presence and converse, and to commend herself to their prayers. . . . Whatever was their desire she devoutly fulfilled, either in recovering the poor from their poverty, or relieving the afflicted from the miseries which oppressed them.” Among those better anchorites, Mr. Skene includes the Culdees of Lochleven, to whom the king and queen gave the town of Bal christie, and to whom, as to those living devoutly in a school of all virtues, Bishop Fothad sometime before had given the Church of Auchterderran. Even these met with harsh treatment at the hands of King David. (For references to the opinions and practices of the Culdees, see art. KELT1c CHURCH.)

CULLEN, Paul, D.D., cardinal, b. in Dublin, April 27, 1803; d. Oct. 24, 1878. He was educated at Rome, became archbishop of Armagh (1850), archbishop of Dublin (1852), and cardinal-priest in 1866. He was the main supporter of the Roman-Catholic University of Dublin.

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH is a growth of the present century. It originated in the remarkable revival of religion which began, in 1797, to develop itself in South-western Kentucky, under the labors of Rev. James McCreary of the Presbyterian Church. This revival rapidly grew to such proportions as to create a demand for ordained ministers of the gospel greater than could be supplied. This circumstance caused the Cumberland Presbytery to ordain certain men who could not quite meet the theological and educational requirements of the Confession of Faith and Form of Government to which that presbytery was amenable. This produced dissensions in the synod of Kentucky, to which the Cumberland Presbytery belonged, and which culminated, in 1806, in the dissolution of the presbytery. The synod annexed to the adjoining Transylvania Presbytery the members who had not been placed under prohibition to preach the gospel and administer its ordinances, by the committee appointed by the synod, in 1805, to take charge of the matter. The Cumberland Presbytery had taken the ground in the controversy, that the proceedings of the committee appointed by the synod were unconstitutional, and, of course, that the proscribing act was unconstitutional and void. Nevertheless, from a general respect to authority, and from an obvious desire to procure a reconciliation, and enjoy peace and quiet, as far as possible, both the proscribed members, and those who had promoted their induction into the ministry, and sympathized with them, constituting a majority of the presbytery, organized themselves into what they called a council, determining in this manner to carry forward the work of the revival, to keep the congregations together, but to abstain from all proper presbyterial proceedings, and await what they thought would be a redress of their grievances. This council continued their organization from December, 1805, to February, 1810. By that time they became satisfied that they had nothing to hope, either from the synod or the General Assembly. As a last resort, and in order to save what they represent to the General Assembly as "every respectable congregation in Cumberland and the Barrens of Kentucky," two of the proscribed ministers, Finis Ewing and Samuel King, assisted by Samuel McAdow, one of those who had been placed under an interdict by the commission for his participation in what they denounced the irregularities of the presbytery, re-organized the Cumberland Presbytery at the house of Mr. McAdow, in Dickson County, Tennessee, on the 4th of February, 1810. It was organized as an independent presbytery. It will be observed that it was a re-organization of a presbytery which had been dissolved, and which had received its name from its locality. The church which grew up from these beginnings naturally took the name of its first presbytery as a prefix. Hence this church is called, from the circumstance of its origin, "The Cumberland Presbyterian Church." This church has grown with exceeding rapidity, extending from Pennsylvania to the shores of the Pacific, and from the Lakes to Louisiana and Texas.

The new presbytery immediately set forth a synopsis of its theology and principles of action by which it proposed to be governed. Its theology was Calvinistic, with the exception of the offensive doctrine of predestination, so expressed as to seem to embody the old Pagan dogma of necessity or fatality. The construction which they, in opposition to the letter, or form, of the Calvinistic symbols, put upon the "idea of fatality," was: (1) That there are no eternal reprobates; (2) That Christ died, not for a part only, but for all mankind, and for all in the same sense; (3) That infants dying in infancy are saved through Christ and the sanctification of the Spirit; (4) That the Spirit of God operates on the world, as co-extensively as Christ has made the atonement, in such a manner as to leave all men inexcusable. The exception of this one "idea of fatality," corresponding to these four points, must have meant and included only their antipodes: (1) Eternal reprobation; (2) An atonement limited to the elect member; (3) The salvation of only elect infants; (4) The limitation of the operations of the Spirit to the elect. Aside from these points, covered by the exception, the doctrine of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, as set forth in its Confession, was, according to the opinion of its founders, identical with that of the Westminster Confession. In the year 1813 the Cumberland Presbytery had become so large, that it divided itself into three presbyteries, and constituted the Cumberland Synod. This synod, at its sessions in 1816, adopted the Confession of Faith and Catechism of the Presbyterian Church. This Larger Catechism was omitted, and also some sections of the chapter on "God's Eternal Decrees." The form of government is Presbyterian.

In 1826 its first college was organized, under the supervision of the church. It was located at Princeton, Ky. In 1842 it was transferred to Lebanon, Tenn., and the name changed to Cumberland University. It is composed of four schools—preparatory, academic, law, and theological; each school having its own corps of professors and lecturers. It is one of the oldest, and has long been one of the most useful, educational institutions in the South-west, notwithstanding the great difficulties under which it has had to struggle much of the time. The church now has colleges at Tehuacana, Tex., Lincoln, Ill., and Waynesburg, Penn., besides a number of theological seminaries.
of high schools and academies under presbyterian and synodical control. It has only one theological school,—the one in connection with Cumberland University at Lebanon, Tenn. It employs four regular professors, and the course of study extends through two years of ten months each.

In 1830 the first newspaper under the patronage of the church was published: it was a weekly religious and literary journal published at Princeton, Ky. The church now has under its patronage three weekly newspapers, one quarterly, and one monthly, besides the usual Sunday-school magazines and papers. It has a board of publication at Nashville, Tenn., a board of missions located in St. Louis, Mo. It sustains four missionaries in the foreign field, besides doing much mission-work at home. The incomplete statistics reported to the General Assembly, May, 1880, are as follows:

CUMMING, John, D.D., b. in Aberdeen, Scotland, Nov. 10, 1810; d. in London, July 6, 1881. He studied at King's College, Aberdeen; was tutor near London; ordained pastor of the Scotch Church, Crown Court, Covent Garden, London, in 1833, and resigned only a short time before his death. He was a member of the Established Church of Scotland, and strongly opposed to the disruption of 1843. His reputation as a preacher was for many years very great, due rather to his topics than to his genius. His great themes were Prophecy and Roman Catholicism; and they exactly suited his fervid, impassioned, brilliant mind. He portrayed the future as if it were the present, and saw in it the final, desperate conflict of Protestantism with Romanism.

His publications were originally discourses. They include the Apocalyptic Sketches (1849), The Great Tribulation (1859), The Great Preparation, or Redemption Draweth Near (1861), The Destiny of Nations (1864), Sounding of the Last Trumpet (1867), The Fall of Babylon Foreshadowed in her Teaching, in History, and in Prophecy (1870), and The Seventh Vial, or the Time of Trouble Begun (1870). In the last volume he quotes reliable evidence in proof that the Scripture predictions have been fulfilled, and stands firmly by his own interpretation of prophecy.

CUMMINS, George David, D.D., first bishop of the Reformed Episcopal Church; b. near Smyrna Del., Dec. 11, 1822; d. at Lutherville, near Baltimore, Md., June 26, 1876. He was graduated from Dickinson College (1841), and, after a two-years' licentiate in the Methodist-Episcopal Church, became (spring, 1846) an Episcopalian minister, and assistant at Christ Church, Baltimore. He afterwards held the following charges: 1847, Church Church, Norfolk, Va.; 1853, St. James's Church, Richmond, Va.; 1855, Trinity Church, Washington (in May, 1857, he held the first independent Episcopal Church in the city); 1858, Christ Church, Capitol; in July, 1857, he received the degree of D.D. from Princeton College); 1858, St. Peter's, Baltimore; 1863, Trinity Church, Chicago. In these different fields of labor he greatly endeared himself to his congregation. On June 1, 1866, he was elected, and on Nov. 15 he was consecrated, assistant-bishop of Kentucky. He was speedily recognized as a leader of the Evangelical party in the Protestant-Episcopal Church. He shared the belief that a revised prayer-book would meet the difficulties. He clung to the idea of reform within the Church: so when, in the summer of 1869, the necessity of separating was put to him, he could not acknowledge it, but persevered in his efforts against abuses, greatly crippled by his subordinate position, for he could not forbid what he disliked. At length, thinking the time for decisive action had come, he wrote (on Nov. 10, 1873) to his senior bishop, declaring that he could no longer seem by his presence to countenance the ritualistic practices of certain churches of his diocese; that he had lost all hope that this system of error could be or would be eradicated by any action of the Church; and, lastly, that the abuse he had received for communicating with his fellow Christians during the General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in New York (October, 1873) had convinced him that he must take his place where he could give open expression of the Christian brotherhood without alienating (of his) an household of faith: and accordingly he withdrew from the Episcopal Church, and was in consequence deposed from the ministry. Conferences with some who were like minded followed, and out of them grew the "Reformed Episcopal Church" (for its history, see title). In this new enterprise Bishop Cummins entered with all his energy, for it he willingly spent himself; but the burden of labor, and the far heavier burden of abuse, the bitterness of finding that few had the courage or the conscience to follow where he led, in comparison with the many who were expected so to do, broke him down, and after a brief illness he died. The Church which he founded revives his memory as...
CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS. The cuneiform, or wedge-shaped, characters were used by various peoples of Western Asia from the earliest historic times down to Alexander's conquest. They even appear occasionally still later. They originated in picture-signs, now lost, which were probably traced on papyrus, or some like material, and degenerated slowly into mere collections of lines and angles. When clay tablets were substituted for papyrus, and the characters were made by the pressure of a chisel-like instrument, the lines easily became wedges; and thus the wedge was gradually adopted as the normal element of the character.

The earliest specimens known to us of cuneiform writing are in the Accadian language, which, together with the Sumerian, a dialect of the same tongue, was spoken by a cultivated people of Babylonia. (See Ass, Assyria, Babylonia, Sumeria.) The Sumerians had probably invented the picture-signs and perhaps the inventors of the picture-signs out of which it was developed. From them it passed to the Shemitic Babylonians, who possessed their land by invasion, and thence to the Assyrians, the Medes, and the Persians; while the Assyrians, in their turn, gave it to the people bordering on Lake Van, the confines of Armenia. Little is known as yet of the Vannic language; but Georg Friedrich Grotefend, the first to succeed in deciphering it, thought that it was spoken by a cultivated people of Western Asia from the earliest historic times down to Alexander's conquest.

The use of picture-characters in its simplest stage requires merely that there be attached to each character the sound of the name belonging to the object pictured. But the Accadians had gone farther, and had not merely combined two or more characters into a third, representing a compound word, but had sometimes given this compound character an entirely new pronunciation. Moreover, they had so far forgotten the picture-origin of the characters, that in many cases these came to represent mere syllables; e.g., the character meaning "hand" might be used for the preposition "to," simply because both were pronounced šu. In short, the system, at first the preposition "to," simply because both were

In all these cases the values which are simplest, and most easily learned, are made to explain more unusual or difficult ones. Assistance has been derived also from the representations on the bas-reliefs accompanying many inscriptions; and general information gained from Greek and other historians has had some value for the decipherer.

History of Decipherment.—The first inscriptions read were Persian. In 1618 De Fignero, a Spanish ambassador, visited and described the ruins of Persepolis, calling special attention to the cuneiform inscriptions there; and in 1621 Pietro della Valle expressed the (correct) opinion that they were to be read from left to right. For generations no further progress was made; but in 1774–78 a new impulse was given to investigation, when Carsten Niebuhr published an account of his travels in the Orient, with many plates of inscriptions from Persepolis. He noticed that there were three distinct kinds, often parallel, and was followed in his attempts to decipher, at least the simplest kind, by Olaf Tychsen and F. Münter. But Georg Friedrich Grotefend of Hanover, Germany, was the first to succeed in this task. He deciphered in the year 1802 two short Persian inscriptions from Niebuhr's collection. Knowing that at Persepolis the Achaemenian kings had built palaces, and assuming that these brief inscriptions contained royal names, he adopted the suggestion of Münter, that a certain oft-repeated character must stand for "king," and observed that each of his inscriptions contained this character, and two groups of characters beside. The first group in one he perceived to be the same with the second group in the other; hence he concluded that the "king" followed only the first group, while in the other it followed both. He inferred that three persons were named (two royal, and one not), and that the relationship between the three was that of son, father, and grandfather. The translations, “Xerxes the King, son of Darius the King,” and “Darius the King, son of Hystaspes,” proved to meet all the requirements; and not only was this translation found, after many tests, to be correct, but the number of accurately known letters in the Old Persian was raised, by this one decipherment, from two to eleven, besides others read with approximate accuracy. Some decades later (1836) E. Burnouf and C. Lassen contributed materially to further progress; N. Westergaard and A. Holtzmann followed. In 1837 Henry C. Rawlinson discovered the great tri-lingual inscription of Darius on the cliff of Behistun; and through the labors of these scholars, together with E. Hincks and J. Oppert, a full knowledge was gained of the old Persian characters and language. Meanwhile, the discoveries in Babylon and Nineveh had begun. Rich (1820) brought to England a small box of stone fragments from Nebi-Junus and the Louvre received its treasures. Botta was jik. Further excavations were made in the same region by Hormuzd Rassam (1852–54),— to whom after many tests, to be correct, but the small box of stone fragments from Nebi-Junus and the Louvre received its treasures. Botta was succeeded in the work by Place; and A. H. Layard (1845–51) not only brought to light four great palaces at Nimrud, but made brilliant discoveries in the mounds of Nebi-Junus and Kuyundjik. Further excavations were made in the same region by Hormuzd Rassam (1852–54),— to whom belongs the credit of discovering the palace of Tiglath-pileser I. at Kîleh-Shergat, and the crowning glory of unearthng the library of Asurbanipal at Kuyundjik, — by George Smith (1873–76; he died at Aleppo on his third expedition, 1876), and by Rassam again, since 1876. In Babylonia, Fresnel and Oppert made a valuable collection (1851–54); but the boat which held it capsized in the Tigris (1855), and all was lost. Something was done by Loftis and Taylor (1853–55); and since 1878 H. Rassam (see above) has made important discoveries in Babylonia as well as in Assyria. A vast amount of material for the decipherer has thus been gathered. It was found that the inscriptions were chiefly in a character like the third species in the tri-lingual inscriptions mentioned above. The Persian proper names of the kings by decipherers have the pronunciation of many signs in the parallel species, and in this way became the key to the whole Asyro-Babylonish language. As early as 1849 De Sauley discovered that the language was Semitic; Hincks found that the signs represent (words and) syllables, not letters. H. C. Rawlinson published and translated the Babylonian text of the Behistun inscription (1851); Oppert, Menant, Norris, Fox Talbot, Lenormant, followed, with grammatical and lexical as well as epigraphic studies. The new science began to rouse wide enthusiasm; and since 1870 it has been pushed with redoubled vigor by Rawlinson, Smith, Sayce, Pinches, and others in England; Oppert, Menant, Lenormant, Pogson, and Geyard in France; and by Schrader, Friedrich Delitzsch, Haupt, Lotz, and Hommel in Germany.

The contentsof the inscriptions, as well as the materials inscribed, are most various. Stone slabs, gems, clay tablets, glass, and metals are all employed; and the subject-matter is historical, poetical, mythological, religious, official, commercial, astronomical, and mathematical. A few of the most striking inscriptions are: accounts of the creation and the flood; the Eponym Canon, or list of officials whose names mark successive years; records of the Assyrian kings, Nebuchadnezzar, Sennacherib, Ashurbanipal, the last great Assyrian king; records of the Babylonian and Persian kings, Nebuchadnezzar, Nabonidus, Cyrus (his capture of Babylon is described), and Darius. The cuneiform inscriptions are preserved chiefly in the British Museum; some, particularly those of Sargon, are in the Louvre in Paris; a few are in Berlin and elsewhere. The sculptured and inscribed slabs owned by several American museums all date from the Assyrian king Assurnasirpal (B.C. 883–858); and the inscription is the same on all, with only slight variations. It celebrates the restoration of the ancient city of Calah (Nimrud).

FRANCIS BROWN.

Cunningham, William, D.D., an eminent Scotch theologian and controversialist; b. at Hamilton, Oct. 2, 1805; d. in Edinburgh, Dec. 14, 1861. He studied at Edinburgh under Dr. Chalmers and others; was licensed as a preacher in 1828; settled as a minister in Greenock in 1830; translated to Trinity College Church, Edinburgh, in 1834; appointed professor in the New College in 1843, and principal (in succession to Dr. Chalmers) in 1848. From his student-days his great capacity for theological learning and singular controversial power were apparent. He threw himself with great energy into the strife in the Church of Scotland, which began to become earnest about the time of his settlement in Edinburgh. Both his ecclesiastical learning and his debating power found a splendid field, as the strife advanced, in conflict with such learned men as Lord Medwyn and Sir William Hamilton. In the General Assembly his speeches were singularly weighty and telling. To his combativeness his foes spoke of him with dread and horror, his friends were devotedly attached to him. As a professor he had a remarkable power of inspiring his students with confidence in himself, and enthusiasm for their studies. When appointed professor, he was requested by the General Assembly to go to America, and make himself acquainted with the methods of study pursued there. Among other friendships thus formed was one of unusual warmth and sympathy for Dr. Hodge of Princeton. In theology Dr. Cunningham was a thorough Calvinist. His works (chiefly posthumous) were: *Historical Theology [Edinburgh, 1862], 2 vols.; *The Reformers and the Theology of the Reformation [1862]; *Discussions on Church Principles [1863]; Lectures on the Evidences, Canon, etc. [N. Y., 1872]; *His Life was written by the late Rev. James Mackenzie, and Rev. Dr. Rainy, who succeeded him as professor of church history, Edinburgh, 1851. W. G. Blairke.
CURCELLÆUS. See Currellæus.

CURATE denotes, in the Church of England, the lowest degree of ministers, licensed by the bishop, and employed by the incumbent of a parish as his assistant, either in the same church, or in a chapel of ease, but removable at pleasure by the bishop or the incumbent. There was formerly a distinction made between perpetual and temporary curates, the former not being removable without the assent of the incumbent of a parish; and this is also the original meaning of the name in the Roman-Catholic Church. There too, however, curatus came, in the course of the fifteenth century, to be used only for the vicars or assistants of the regular incumbents of the fifteenth century, to be used only for the vicars of the name in the Roman-Catholic Church. There too, however, curatus came, in the course of the fifteenth century, to be used only for the vicars or assistants of the regular incumbents of the churches, though the office never sank so low in social respect as in the Anglican Church. The Council of Trent forbade to employ temporary curates, removable at pleasure (sess. vii. chap. 5, 7, de reform.). In the performance of their duty, in their cura actualis, the real incumbent of the church, the parochus primitivus, exercises only a cura habitualis.

CURATE, Perpetual. See Curate.

CURETON, William, a distinguished Oriental scholar, especially in Syriac; b. at Westminster, Shropshire, 1808; d. there June 17, 1864. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford; was sub-librarian of the Bodleian (1834), assistant keeper of the manuscripts in the British Museum (1837–39), chaplain to the queen (1847), canon of Westminster, and rector of St. Margaret’s, Westminster (1849). His services, especially to biblical and patristic learning, were very great, as a mere enumeration of the titles of his publications will show: Syriac Version of the Epistles of Ignatius (1845); Catalogue of Arabic Manuscripts in the British Museum (1846); Vindiciae Ignatianae, or the Genuine Writings of St. Ignatius, as contrasted with the Ancient Syriac Version, vindicated from the Charge of Heresy (1816); Corpus Ignatianum, a complete collection of the Ignatian Epistles, genuine, interpolated, and spurious, together with numerous extracts from them, etc., in Syriac, Greek, and Latin; an English translation of the Syriac text, copious notes and Introduction (1841); John, Bishop of Ephesus, the Third Part of his Ecclesiastical History [in Syriac], (1853); the same, translated by Dean Smith, 1860; Spicilegium Syriacum, containing Remarks of Bar-decan, Meliton, Ambrase, and Mara-Bar-Serapion, with an English Translation and Notes (1855); Quatuor Evangeliorum Syriacae, recensiones antiquissimae, atque in occidenti adhibae ignata quod superest (1858).

CUREUS, Joachim, b. at Freistadt, Silesia, in 1532; studied theology and philosophy at Wittenberg (1550–54), and medicine at Pavia and Bologna (1557–59), and settled as practical physician at Glogau, where he died in 1573. He was a passionate disciple of Melanchthon, and the author of the famous Exegeseis Pergpecia et Fermo Integra Controversiae de Sacra Cena, which appeared anonymously at Leipzig in 1574, by the same publisher who had issued the Corpus Philip-and assumed finally a position as minister of the interior, too, having the command of the papal troops and the direction of the papal legates, which placed nearly the whole administration of the Papal States, both the patrimony and the legations, in his hands. The centre of the whole machine was of course the Pope, to whom the final decision of all questions belonged, and who, in connection with the consistory, exercised a general superintendence.

The whole organization, such as it had developed and was working in the beginning of the sixteenth century, before the Council of Trent, comprised the College of Cardinals assembling in consistory, the two signatures (Signatura Gratiae and Signatura Justitie), the Pontenitària, the Rota, the Dataria, and the Chancery. The last-mentioned, the Cancellaria Apostolica, was simply a bureau of expedition in which the affairs treated by the College of Cardinals and in the signatures received their final business form, and were issued. The Dataria originated as a mere department of the chancery, as a kind of board of control, in which all ingoing and outgoing communications were dated and registered; but, on account of the great importance which this simple function had for all cases of benefices, the department soon became independent, and gradually came to exercise a considerable influence. The Rota was the Supreme Court of Christendom, and an immense amount of business flowed into its rooms. It consisted of twelve members (auditores),—three Romans, one from Bologna, one from Ferrara, one alternately from Tuscany or Perugia, one from Venice, one from Milan, one German, one Frenchman, and two Spaniards. It lost some of its importance when the Signatura Justitiae was established above it as a court of appeal for Italy; and by degrees, as the jurisdiction of the Pope was confined on the one hand to a small number of cases, on the other, first to the Papal States, then to the City of Rome, and finally to the palace of the Vatican, the Rota and the Signatura Justitiae shrank into mere shadows. The Signatura Gratiae and the Pontenitària treated all cases, assorting to the postestas legundi et solvendi dispensations, indulgences, etc., the former in a more private and personal way, the latter publicly and officially. Affairs of dogmatics, liturgy, finance, general policy, appointment of bishops, etc., belonged to the College of Cardinals, among whose members every country, diocese, monastic order, etc., had its special protector, who reported on its affairs, pleaded its cause, and took care of its interests.

From the middle of the sixteenth century, however, a great change was effected in this organization by the establishment of the so-called Congregations, committees of cardinals formed for some special range of business. The oldest of these congregations is the Sancta Congregatio Judicis Librorum Prohibitorum, for all ecclesiastical and monastical affairs; S. C. Rituum, for rituals, liturgy, canonization, etc.; and S. C. Consistorialis, to prepare all business matter before it is brought into a regular consistory. Of the congregations established in the seventeenth century, the most important are De Propaganda Fide (1629), for the centralization of all mission business; S. C. Immunitatis Ecclesiasticæ (1629), to guard against any encroachment from the side of the State on the privileges of the Church; S. C. Indulgentiarum (1669), etc. The Gerarchia Cattolica for 1875 mentions still more congregations. The relation between these congregations and the old authorities still existing often gives rise to very difficult questions. Generally, however, the old and the new authorities are equally competent; and he who has any business to transact can choose the party with which he prefers to deal, for reasons of cheapness, speed, personal connections among the officials, etc.

Curio, Calixtus Secundus b. at Cirie, near Turin, May 1, 1503; d. at Basel, Nov. 24, 1569; one of those numerous Italians, who, attracted by the evangelical movement of the Reformation, were compelled by the counteraction of Rome to leave their native country, and seek refuge beyond the Alps. While studying classical languages, history, and jurisprudence at Turin, he became acquainted with the writings of Luther, Melanchthon, and Zwingle, through an Augustinian monk, Hieronymus Niger; and the impression he received was so strong, that he immediately set out for Germany in order to study the new theology. But, on the order of the Cardinal-bishop Boniface of Ivrea, he was arrested near Aosta, and imprisoned. Released after two months, he was brought to the Monastery of St. Benignus to continue his studies; but after half scandalizing and half seducing the monks by his views, which he never desisted from preaching, he fled from the monastery, visited Rome and other Italian cities, and finally settled at Milan, where he married Margaretha Blanca of the distinguished family of Isachi. In order to avoid the war troubles, he successively removed to Piedmont, Savoy, Pavia, where he lectured in the university; but, as he was zealous in defending and preaching the evangelical views, he was seized at Pavia by the Inquisition, and by degrees imprisoned. He escaped, however, and found refuge in Venice, and at the court of the Duchess Renata of Ferrara. On her recommendation, he obtained a position at the University of Lucca. But he had Hardly begun to teach, before the Pope demanded that he be delivered up; and, when the city declared itself unable to defend him, he fled (in 1542) to Switzerland, where he was professor of literature, languages, and rhetoric, first at Lausanne (1543–47), and then in Basel. As a humanist teacher he earned a great reputation, and received splendid offers from Maximilian II., the Duke of Savoy, and even from Pope Paul IV.; but he declined to leave Basel, where alone he felt free and safe. He was not, strictly speaking, a theologian, but took great interest in all the theological movements of his time, and was not without influence. In Basel he stood at the head of that latitudinarian group of Italians which gathered there; and he was looked upon with suspicion, not only by the Roman Catholics, but also by Calvin and the orthodox Lutherans. His most widely known and most characteristic work is his Passaquili Ecstatici, a satire on the papacy and the Roman Church, Geneva, 1544. A positive representation of his religious standpoint may be found in his Christianæ Religiosæ Institutæ, Basel, 1549. But this work which caused the most contradiction from all sides was his De Amplitudine Beatæ Regni Dei, 1554.

CURTIUS, Valentin (Korte, or Kortheim) b. at Lebus, in Brandenburg, Jan. 6, 1493; d. at Lübeck, Nov. 29, 1567; came to Rostock to study theology in 1512, and entered the order of the Franciscans, but embraced the Reformation, and was made Protestant preacher at the Church of the Holy Spirit in 1528; married in 1532; was called to Lübeck in 1534, and made superintendent in 1536. Lübeck was at that time the centre of orthodox Lutheranism in Northern Germany, and Curtius occupied a prominent place in the conventions and disputations of that time. He drew up the Formula Lubecensis (1560), which, up to 1668, was signed by every ecclesiastic appointed in the city, and the Protostata contra Synodum Tridentinum (1561). But he was also very eager to have the English refugees of 1554 expelled from the city on account of their Calvinism. See C. H. Starcke: Lübeckische Kirchen-Historie, Hamburg, 1724; J. J. Grøken: Dissertatio de Form. Lub., Göttingen, 1735.

Cusanus, Nicolaus (Nicolaus Krypis, or Krebs), also known as Nicholas de Cusa; b. at Cues, or Cusa, a village on the Moselle, in the diocese of Treves, 1401; d. at Lodi, Aug. 11, 1464; was the son of poor parents, but was by Count Ulich of Mandscheid, in whose service he had entered, sent to the school of the Brethren of the Common Life, at Deventer, and then to the University of Padua, where he studied law, and took the degree in 1424. He lost, however, the very first case he tried to bring before the court of Padua, and this decision, with a subsequent one which deprived him of his position as a member of the faculty, caused him to leave the university. He then studied mathematics and astronomy, Hebrew and Greek, philosophy and theology, with great zeal; and he was Archdeacon of Liège, when, in 1433, he was sent to the Council of Basel. There he attracted general attention by his De Catholica Concordandia and De Auctoritate presidendi in Concilio Generali. In the former he declares that the papal authority is not tied up with the Roman see; that the true successor of Peter is he who is duly chosen by the representatives of Christendom, and not he who incidentally occupies the chair of Rome; that the donation of Constantine is a fable; that the secular princes are completely independent of the Pope in all secular affairs, etc. In the latter he vindicates the authority of the ecumenical council above that of the Pope; and, when he conceives to the Pope the right to preside at the ecumenical council, this right is one of honor only, not of power, etc. Nevertheless, some years later we find him travelling in Germany as papal legate, and defending in the diets of 1440–42 the very opposite views. He had in the mean time become a friend of Eugenius IV.; and he served him with great devotedness on many important missions,—to Constantinople, to work for the union of the two Churches; to Germany, to gather money for the building of the Church of St. Peter, etc. Nicholas V. also showed him great confidence, and made him cardinal in 1448, and Bishop of Brixen in 1451, in spite of the protest of Archduke Sigismund. During the Congress of Mantua he was the Pope's vicegerent in Rome, and published his Cœtaria Aichori. His troubles with Sigismund disturbed his last days (when the duke imprisoned the bishop, and the bishop excommunicated the duke); and unhappily the decision of the emperor in his favor was not given until after his death.

The extraordinary change in Cusa's views has generally been explained as the result of ambition and cowardice. He saw that nothing could be attained in the Church except by standing on the Pope's side, and he was tempted. He saw that his views could not be carried through without causing a complete revolution, and he was frightened. There is, however, in Cusa's character, nothing at all to justify such an explanation. He was an honest, open, simple-hearted man, who for truth's sake could have sacrificed his worldly prospects, even his life, without regret, without fear, without the least trace of the martyr's bravado, if he had only known the truth. But there was just the hitch. In his intellect, though he actually broke with the tradition of the schoolmen, and thought he often is spoken of as the dawn of modern philosophy, there was just that kind of confusion and obscurity, which, with an honest man who is too naive to conceal anything, makes such a glaring inconsistency almost a matter of course. In his books De Docta Ignorantia and De Conjecturis, his two principal philosophical works, he defines the relation between absolute truth and the human mind as one of complete incongruity. Absolute truth the human mind is utterly unable to grasp; it can only form opinions, conjectures, about it. But, when the intellect can establish no other relation than that of conjecture between itself and absolute truth, the character can, just because it is honest, hardly escape, a single once in the course of its development, to be thrown from that stand-point which it holds over to the very opposite, unless it can keep itself forever oscillating.
in a sceptical dilemma. But Cusa was not a sceptic, either intellectually or morally. Intellectually he was a realist, not without a tint of materialism. He was a great mathematician. His propositions for the improvement of the Julian Calendar resembled those adopted afterwards by Gregory VII. He anticipated Copernicus in his views of the earth's position in the planetary system. He was the father of Giordano Bruno. Morally he was a mystic, with a strong leaning towards asceticism. He taught that glimpses of the absolute truth could be caught by means of intuition, which aided the mind in divining, as spectacles aid the eyes in seeing. He was a pupil of Meister Eckhart.

The speculative result of this singular combination was an obscure and inconsistent pantheism—God as the maximum has nothing outside himself, the world is a finite condensation of the maximum—which frightened his contemporaries; and the practical result is a number of mystico-materialistic absurdities—De Quadratura Circuli, De Novissimis Diebus, according to which the universes should perish in 1734—which deter a modern reader. But of cowardice and ambition, and other moral blemishes, there is not much in the man. Cusa's works make three volumes, and have been published thrice; last edition by Henri Petri, Basel, 1565. The last edition, by R. Stumpf, Die politischen Ideen Nic. von Cusa, Cologne, 1869; Scharpf: Nic. von Cusa als Reformator, Tübingen, 1871; Richard Falckenberg: Philosophie d. CUSH (Hebrew כָּשׁ, Egyptian Kaš, Kî, or Keš, Assyrian Ki-š, and Median Kist, Kust, Kest, Kust, Kest, Aethiopia, Vulgate Ethiopia, except Gen. x. 6-8, 1 Chron. i. 8-10, where LXX. have Xoic, Vulgate Chus) is a name applied in the Old Testament to a person, a land, and a people. As a person, Cush is the first son of Ham, having five sons of his own—Seba, Havilah, Sabatah, Raamah, Sabtechah, and being also the progenitor of Nimrod (Gen. x. 6-8). Two sons, Sheba and Dedan, are assigned to Raamah (v. 7). The Scripture-writer appears to look back to Cush, with his sons and grandsons, as the founders of peoples known in his time; and, where these names are elsewhere mentioned (Gen. ii. 13, and elsewhere in the Old Testament,—twelve passages in all). On the Cush of Gen. ii. 13 see Eden. In the other eleven passages it denotes the Nile Valley southward from Egypt, with the lands between the Nile and the Red Sea, from Syene (Ezek. xxix. 10) as far south as the junction of the Blue and White Nile. The earlier boundaries toward the south were quite vague; and, even when Cush became a well-defined province and kingdom, tribes of the same origin with the historical Cushites dwelt outside its borders. In a sense which would include these, the African Cush extended into Abyssinia, and perhaps covered it; but the restricted sense is the ordinary one in use. In the Book of Esther (i. 1 and viii. 9) Cush is named as the extreme south-west limit of the kingdom of Abasurus.

This land of Cush was called by the Greeks Μέρος, from its ancient capital city (native name Meru or Merua, “white cliff”), situated near Mount Barkal, and identical with Napata. The people of Kaš (Keš or Keš) are, in the Egyptian records, always distinguished from negroes (Nahara), in name and in appearance. They are depicted with Caucasian features, and their color is red or brown. They appear to be kindred with the Egyptians. It is believed that the ancestors of all the historic inhabitants of the Nile Valley came of a single stock (Cush and Mizraim are brothers, Gen. x. 6), and had a common home in Asia. One stream of immigration entered North-eastern Africa by the Isthmus of Suez, and became the Egyptian people; another, starting from the same source, moved down into Southern Arabia; then a part crossed the Red Sea into Africa, and occupied the region described above, becoming the historic Cush; as such they are named some twenty-five times in the Old Testament; others remained in Arabia, and it is possible that reference is had to these in 2 Chron. xxii. 16: “Arabians that were near the Ethiopians.” (As to the theories that another branch wandered northward, and became the Phoenicians of history, and that Babylonia was peopled by colonists from the African Cush, see PHOENICIA, NIMROD.)
The (African) Cushites are first mentioned in the Egyptian records of the twelfth dynasty (Lepsius, §). They had been successful against them. During the reign of the Hyksos in Egypt, the native Egyptian kings, forced southward, came into closer contact with the Cushites; and, after the expulsion of the Hyksos (seventeenth century B.C.) Koš was treated as a province of Egypt, and had an Egyptian governor. In the time of the twenty-first dynasty it gained its independence; and, in the eighth century B.C., the Cushite king, Piankhi I., conquered all Egypt. The twenty-fifth dynasty of Manetho is composed of Cushite kings,—Shabak (Sabacu = αὐλακ, 2 Kings xvii. 4), Shabatak (Sebichu), and Taharqa (Tirhaka). The relation between these kings is obscure; and, besides these, Miamun Nut, successor, and perhaps son, of Piankhi, figures on the monuments. The Cushite kings of Egypt came repeatedly in contact with the Hebrews. Hoshea of Samaria tried to form an alliance with Shabak against the Assyrians (2 Kings xvii. 4). Isa. xviii. seems to imply like proposals from the Cushites to the Hebrews. Sennacherib's march through Philistia was checked by the approach of Tirhaka, the most formidable of all the Cushite kings. Both before and after this time, there is mention of individual Cushites who lived in Palestine: Ebed Melech (Jer. xxxviii. 7f., xxxix. 16f.) is a notable example. The Cushite control of Egypt ended with the defeat of Tirhaka and the establishment of an Assyrian protectorate on the Lower Nile by Esarhaddon (King of Assyria 681–668); and an attempt of Tirhaka to regain a foothold there was foiled by Asurbannipal, son of Esarhaddon, about B.C. 666. After this we find Ethiopian soldiers in the service of Egyptian rulers (Jer. xlv. 9; Ezek. xxx. 4f.); but Tirhaka's successors were powerful monarchs in their own domain, and were still reigning at the old Meroe when Cambyses made his unsuccessful attempt to conquer Ethiopia (B.C. 524). As late as B.C. 450 Herodotus speaks of the "long-lived Ethiopians," whose capital was at the old Meroe. The later Meroe, the island in the south, near Khartum, was included in the empire of Tirhaka and his successors, but probably did not become the capital of the kingdom till about the third century B.C., under Ergamenes, contemporary with Ptolemy Philadelphus. The later Greek writers begin to distinguish from the civilized Meroites various ruder Cushite tribes, such as the Blemmyes, Megabares, and Troglo-dytes. These occupied the territory from the Lake of Axum, in Abyssinia, up to the Egyptian boundary, and were the ancestors of the present Beja, or Bishari tribes.

The Cushite kingdom existed until after the Christian era (Acts viii. 27 names Candace, Queen of Ethiopia); but by degrees the Nubians, who had been crowded out by the Cushites, began to get the upper hand of it, and at length it disappeared. The precise date of its extinction is unknown.

In person the Cushites were large, strong and handsome. Their land produced corn and costly woods, such as ebony and balsam; of minerals they exported gold and gems; besides these they drove a large trade in cattle and rare animals, as well as in negro slaves. These are all depicted on the monuments as articles of tribute paid to Egypt.

The culture and religion of the Cushites were derived from Egypt, and began to take firm root among them as early as the time of the Hyksos. They developed the arts thus received; so that, toward the end of the eighteenth dynasty, not only the natural products named above, but artistic furniture, covered with woven stuffs of many colors, shields lined with variegated skins, chariots of gold and iron, rich garments, ear-rings, and bracelets, together with other fine work in gold, appear in a representation of tribute-offerings.

The language of the African Cushites was distinct from the Egyptian, and is represented by that of the modern Bishari; but they employed the Egyptian hieroglyphs from an early time. A peculiar demotic character which abounds in the neighborhood of the island of Meroë is not yet deciphered, but is believed to belong to the later Cushite period, probably since the time of Ergamenes.

The land and people of Cush are usually called, after the Greek writers (so in the LXX., the Vulgate, and the Authorized Version), Ethiopia and Ethiopians; but the Cushites must be carefully distinguished, not only from the Nubians and negro tribes generally, but also from the Shemitic people of Abyssinia, who spoke the Ge’ez (Ethiopic) language, and have transmitted to us a considerable Christian literature. These also came across the sea from Arabia, but cannot be traced back beyond the Christian era. See ABYSSINIAN CHURCH.

Of Cush, the Benjamite (Septuagint Ἀκοι, Vulgate Chusi), who is named in the inscription of Ps. vii., nothing further is known. He must have been a persecutor of David, and was, perhaps, an instrument in the hands of Saul.

Cuthbert, St., d. at Farne, March 20, 687; was born, in the first half of the seventh century, in Northumbria, beyond the Tweed, of humble descent. While shepherding his flock one night (in 651), he received, it is said, a heavenly revelation in form of a vision, and went immediately to the Monastery of Melrose (the Old Melrose, situated at the confluence of the Leader and the Tweed), whose provost, Boisil, admitted him into the brotherhood. Melrose was a colony from Lindisfarne, but was at this time sending out colonies herself. Cuthbert accompanied one which went to Ripon to found a monastery on a spot presented to him by Alchfrith, which fitted successfully, and served there as hostiarus (with whom rests the entertainment of strangers). But when Alchfrith adopted the Roman views of Easter, the tonsure, etc., the monks of Ripon could not agree with him. They returned home to Melrose in 681; and in the same year, Boisil having died of the plague, Cuthbert succeeded him as provost. Afterwards, however,
Cuthbert must have adopted the Roman views himself; for in 664 he was called as provost to Lindisfarne expressly for the purpose of introducing those views among the monks of that monastery; in which task he succeeded. For twelve years he staid at Lindisfarne; but in 676 the ascetic tendency of his disposition gained upon him; he resigned his office, and settled as a hermit in one of the small islands of Farne. In 684 he was prevailed upon to return to Lindisfarne as its bishop, but only for two years. In 686 he was prevailed upon to return to Lindisfarne in one of the small islands of Farne. In him: he resigned his office, and settled as a hermit in one of the small islands of Farne. In 686 he went back to his hermitage on the lonely island, and there he died.

Already during life Cuthbert was revered by his brother-monks as a saint, and for centuries after his death his fame was still increasing. The power of working miracles was ascribed to him, and even to his remains. Before he died, he gave permission that his corpse might be brought to Lindisfarne, on the condition that the monks vowed never to desert it. Consequently, when the Danes took the monastery (in 875), and the monks fled, they carried Cuthbert's corpse along with them on a bier for eight years, until (in 883), they were settled at Chester-le-Street. Overtaken here, too, by the Danes, they began their wanderings again in 900, but were finally settled in 992 at Durham, in whose cathedral Cuthbert's remains now rest.

Of Cuthbert's own writings, Ordinationes and Praecepta Vite Regularis, nothing has come down to us; but the materials for his biography are very rich. The oldest life of him was written between 698 and 705, by some unknown brother-monk, either from Lindisfarne or Melrose, and is printed in Act. Sanct. (March 20), and in Steven son's edition of Bedae Opera Minora (pp. 259–284). Of the two Lives of Bede, the oldest is in verse, the best in prose, both printed in Stevenson's B. Op. Min. (pp. 1–43, 45–137) and in Act. Sanct. (March 20). The Historia Translationis S. C. from the second century, by Reginald Monachi Danelensis Libellus (of the twelfth century, and treating especially of his miracles, and the so-called Irish life from the fourteenth century, have been published by the Surtees Society. A full account of the materials for the history of St. Cuthbert is found in Hardy: Desc. Cat. I., 297–317. See also James Raines: Saint Cuthbert, Durham, 1828; A. C. Fryer: Cuthbert of Lindisfarne, London, 1851.

CYPRIAN, Ernst Salomon, b. at Osteheim, Franconia, 1673; studied at Jena, and was appointed professor of philosophy at Helmstedt, 1699, rector of the gymnasium of Coburg, 1700, and member of the Over-Consistory, in 1713, in Gotha, where he died in 1745. Friedrich Wilhelm I. of Prussia, who considered the controversy between the Lutheran and Catholic churches "a bitter sauce mixed by the priests," conceived the plan of effecting a union between all Protestant churches; and at first it seemed as if the plan would succeed. At this juncture, Cyprian appeared as one of the few stanch champions of the old orthodox Lutheranism, and wrote three pamphlets, Abgedrungener Unterricht, etc. (1722), Authentique Rechtfertigung, etc. (1722), and Das Urtheil englischer Theologen von der Synode zu Dortrecht und ihrer Lehre (1723), which by their rich historical illustrations give considerable information about the whole question.

CYPRIANUS, Thascius Cecilius, which last name he assumed in honor of an old presbyter, Cecilius, who was instrumental in his conversion to Christianity, was born in Northern Africa, towards the close of the second, or in the beginning of the third, century, and educated at Carthage, where, in the fourth decade of the third century, he held a prominent position as a teacher of rhetoric. He was a man of wealth. His house and gardens were beautiful, his landed property considerable. He was also a man of elegance and dignity, both in dress and manners, both in literary productions and in business affairs. Of the history of his conversion nothing is known, but he was baptised in 250. Shortly after baptism he gave away a part of his fortune to the poor; and all his time he seems to have devoted to the study of the Bible and the Christian writers of the second century. His Epistola ad Donatum, De Idolorum Vanitate, and Libri III. Testimoniorum ad . . . Judges, in the last two of which works he closely follows Minucius Felix and Tertullian's Apologeticus, belong to this period.

The African Church was at this period flourishing enough externally, but internally its state was rather precarious. The long peace it had enjoyed (nearly thirty years) had slackened the zeal and the discipline of its members. Even the character of the episcopate had suffered. Many of the bishops were engaged in agriculture or trade, or even in usury. Instances of fraud and swindling occurred among them. Sometimes they were so ignorant that they could not instruct the catechumens, nor distinguish between orthodox and heretical compositions. Under such circumstances the conversion of a man like Cyprian naturally made a sensation, and awakened expectations. In 248 the episcopal chair of Carthage became vacant, and he was elected bishop. It is characteristic, however, that it was the lower mass of the church-members which carried his election, while a portion of the presbytery opposed it to the very last. The poor, the ignorant, the humble, of the Church of Carthage, felt how good it would be to them to have for their bishop a man of wealth, a man of learning, a man of social standing. They knew of Cyprian that he was liberal with his means, that he was possessed of brilliant literary talents, that he showed both decision and tact in business transactions, and they would hear of no refusal. Between July 248 and April 249 he was consecrated bishop. The opposition did not dissolve, however, after its defeat. On the contrary, it became more firmly organized; and it soon found a point from which to launch an attack against which Church of Carthage. Early in 250 Decius issued the edict for the suppression of Christianity, and the persecution began. Measures were first taken against the bishops and officers of the church: by slaying the shepherds it was hoped the flock would be stolen. The proconsul on circuit, and five commissioners for each town, administered the edict; but, when the proconsul reached Carthage, Cyprian had fled.

In his book De Lapsis, and in his letters to his congregation, to his fellow-bishops of the African Church, and to the clergy of Rome, Cyprian defends very adroitly the line of conduct he had adopted; but none of the reasons which he profers— the necessity of preserving himself for the good of his church, the direct command of God through a vision, etc.—are quite acceptable, and with the idea of heroism they are altogether incompatible. But it must be remembered, first, that martyrdom had not yet become a fashion, a rage, the necessary close of a distinguished life, the greatest grace which God could grant. When the Decian persecution broke out, Dionysius of Alexandria, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Maximus of Nola, and many other bishops, did as Cyprian, fled before the storm. Next, the edict was directed principally if not alone, against the bishops.—a circumstance which could not but influence their policy. In Rome the congregation left, for this very reason, the episcopal chair unoccupied for sixteen months after the martyrdom of Fabian. Finally the individual character must be taken into account. Cyprian was a man of education, not of genius; he reasoned from facts, not from enthusiasm; he acted upon convictions, not upon passion. But with such characters every thing grand is the result of a slow growth, not of a moment's inspiration; and the remark of Augustine about Cyprian's style, that it ripened with age, growing simpler, nobler, and more fit to express the fulness of Christian truth, must be applied also to his conduct. Nevertheless, his flight gave his enemies a dangerous weapon. Towards the close of 250 he sent the two bishops, Cledonius and Herculanus, to Carthage with money for the poor, with spiritual aid for the weak, with disciplinary power for those who had fallen. But in Carthage Cledonius and Herculanus met with the most determined opposition from the side of Felicissimus, a deacon; and when Cyprian excommunicated Felicissimus, five presbyters, headed by Novatus, took up his cause: a schism thus broke out. In spring of 251 Cyprian returned; and the great question of the re-admission into the Church of the lapsi, especially of the libellati, was now to be decided. The most extreme views found defenders. One party refused altogether to re-admit the lapsi; another granted them re-admission without any restriction at all. Cyprian adopted a middle course: after due penance he re-admitted those who had fallen. In the synod of Carthage (251 and 252) he carried through his policy, and it became the policy of the whole Christian Church. The two other parties, however, in which his adversaries were mixed up in a most singular manner (see the articles on Felicissimus, Novatianus, and Novatus), appointed each an anti-bishop, Maximus and Fortunatus. The schism was thus complete.

It would seem, however, that the authority of Cyprian was in no way impaired by this schism. The practical wisdom, the inexhaustible energy, and the great self-abnegation with which he administered to the weal of his flock during the horrible plague which reached Carthage in 252 (see his De Mortalitate and De Eleomosynis), drew all true Christians close to their bishop; and the schismatics were forgotten. At the time when the controversy concerning baptism broke out between him and Bishop Stephen of Rome (255), Cyprian stood undisputedly as the prominent and most influential leader in the Christian Church. The Roman Church held that baptism administered in due form was valid, even when administered by a heretic, and admitted baptized heretics and schismatics by simple imposition of hands; while Cyprian protested that there was no baptism outside of the orthodox church, and baptized, or rather re-baptized, heretics and schismatics, before admitting them into the Church. The Roman view held the ground; but it is very instructive to notice the relation in which Cyprian places himself to the Bishop of Rome. Acknowledging Rome as the natural centre of Christendom, and the successor of Peter as prima inter pares, he recognizes the precedence as one of honor only, and by no means as one of power. Of a feeling of subordination, of a yielding to a higher power of jurisdiction, there is in all his tracts and letters not the least trace. The papacy was not yet born. On the contrary, it is Cyprian who is styled Papa by the Roman bishop; and he does not give back the title to his interlocutor.

In spring of 257 Valerian's edict against the Christians was issued, and in August, Cyprian appeared before the proconsul, Aspasius Paternus; and, when he refused to offer sacrifice to the Roman state-gods, he was banished to Curulis, a lonely place on the seashore, but only a day's journey from Carthage. He lived there eleven months, in decent retirement, and in steady communication with his flock. An appeal to him was made by Bishop Stephen. But the execution followed immediately. But the proceedings were carried on, from the side of the State, with a regard for the victim which shows the great weight he carried in public opinion; and the execution was witnessed with a sympathetic awe which was still vibrating in people's hearts when Augustine preached.

Lit.—The first collected edition of Cyprian's works is that by Erasmus (Basil, 1520); among the later are those by Goldhorn (Leipzig, 1838–39, 2 vols.), and G. Hartel (Vienna, 1868–71, 3 vols.). The last is by far the best: it rests upon a careful comparison of above forty manuscripts. Translations into English of his treatises On Mortality, On the Lord's Prayer, etc., are numerous. Of his complete works there are two,—by Marshall (London, 1717, fol.), and by R. E. Wallis, in Ante-Nicene Library, vols. VIII., 1868, and XIII., 1869.

The sources to Cyprian's life are, besides his own writings and the church-history of Eusebius, Pontius, De Vita Cypriani, and the Acta Proconsularia Martyrli Cypriani, both given by Ruinart, Act Mart., II., and the former in CYPRUS.

HAGENBACH (LEIBRACH).

CYPRUS, a large fertile island of the Mediterranean Sea, triangular in form, a hundred and fifty miles long, and from fifty to sixty miles broad. Its principal towns were Salamis at the east, and Paphos at the west, end of the island. It is called Chittim in the Old Testament. The island was conquered by Alexander the Great in 333 B.C. The chief goddess was Venus, who had a famous temple at Paphos, and hence was called the Paphian goddess, as well as Cypria. The island is called Chittim in the Old Testament. The Greeks gave it the name Kypros, perhaps from the plant of that name, which is our henna. Copper, and articles in copper, made the inhabitants rich. Cyprus was successively tributary to the great empires of antiquity, and finally fell under Rome (B.C. 58). Cicero was proconsul there (B.C. 52). In the reign of Trajan (117 A.D.) the Jews there revolted, massacred the Greek inhabitants, but were massacred themselves. In the division of the Roman Empire the island fell to the East; in the seventh and ninth centuries the Saracens seized it; but each time it quickly lapsed again into the hands of the Byzantine emperors; but from them the Crusaders, under Richard I. of England, wrested it and gave it to "the titular king of Jerusalem, and as some compensation for the loss of the holy city." Later the Genoese and Venetians held it, until in 1570 the Turks dispossessed the Venetians. According to the terms of the treaty of Berlin (1878), the island was secured by the English Government.

In the Acts alone Cyprus is mentioned. The gospel very quickly reached it; and the response to the Master's command, "Go," was very prompt (Acts xi. 19, 20; cf. xvi. 16). Barnabas was a Levite of Cyprus (iv. 30), and naturally began there his missionary activity (xiii. 4), and sailed thither after his dispute with Paul (xiv. 30). The other New Testament references are purely geographical. The title of "Cyprian" occurs in ancient writers can be found in MUNZ Opera, vol. iii., Flor., 1744, and in ENGEL: Kypros, eine Monographie, Berlin, 1841, 2 vols.; FR. CYRENE, the capital of a small province, and the chief city of Libya, in Northern Africa. Modern Tripoli corresponds to the province. It was a Greek city, dating from B.C. 631. Alexander the Greek granted the Jews, who formed about a fourth of its population, the rights of citizenship on equal terms with the Greeks.

After Alexander's death, the city became a dependency of Egypt, and in B.C. 75 became a Roman province. The New Testament allusions to it are of singular interest. Simon, a Cyrenian, bore our Lord's cross (Matt. xxvii. 32); Cyrenians were present at Pentecost (Acts ii. 10, vi. 9), and of them were some of the earliest preachers of the gospel (Acts xi. 20, xiii. 1). The city was destroyed by the Saracens in the fourth century, and is now desolate.

CYRENIUS. See QUIRINIUS.

CYRIACUS (synonymous with Dominicus, "belonging to the Lord") is the name of several persons, some legendary and some historical. Thus the Acta Sanctorum contain no less than eleven saints of this name, among whom are a deacon of Rome, who was sentenced to the galleys under Diocletian, fled to King Sapor of Persia, and was beheaded under Maximian; and a pope of Rome, who resigned his office, and followed St. Ursula and her eleven thousand virgins to Cologne, where they all suffered martyrdom. It has proved impossible to get a place for this pope in the papal succession; but then it has been suggested that the cardinals may have erased his name from the catalogues, from indignation over his abdication! The Church of St. Cyriacus, however, in Neuhausen, near Worms, boasts of possessing his remains.

Historical are Cyriacus, Patriarch of Constantinople in the time of Gregory I., and Cyriacus, Metropole of Carthage in the time of Gregory VII. The former was presbyter and acononus of the Church of Constantinople, when (in 550) he was elected patriarch, on the death of John IV. Like his predecessor, he assumed the title of "Ecumenical Patriarch," and a synod of Constantinople confirmed the title; but these proceedings were met with the most violent protests from Gregory I. of Rome, who wrote letters upon letters to the Emperor Mauritius and to the other patriarchs of the Orient, denouncing the assumption as scandalous, perverse, punishable, anti-Christian, Satanic, etc. (see JAFFÉ: Regesta Pontif., i. 1105, 1109, 1111). In 602 Mauritius was dethroned by Phocas, a rude and coarse soldier; and disagreement soon arose between the emperor and the patriarch. Gregory I. was too wide awake not to avail himself of such an opportunity; and, according to Roman historians, Phocas issued an edict in which he designated the Bishop of Rome as caput omnium ecclesiatur. But the edict does not exist, and is probably a mere fable. At all events, the edict had not appeared when Cyriacus died (Oct. 7, 606); and the connection with some of Paul's letters have thought to find between the imperial edict and the death of the patriarch is mere fiction. See Gregori I. Epistola, VII.

Cyriacus of Carthage, living in the latter part of the eleventh century, was one of the last Christian bishops of Northern Africa. He refused to perform uncanonical consecration; and for this reason some of his flock accused him before the Saracenic emirs, who tortured him in a most cruel manner. He addressed himself to Gregory VII., and received from him letters of consolatio and exhortatio. See Gregorii VII. Registr., I., xxii., 23; and JAFFE: Reg. Pont. ad ann., 1079, See Gregorii VII., I., 22; and JAFFE: Reg. Pont. ad ann., 1079, See Gregorii VII., I., 22; and JAFFE: Reg. Pont. ad ann., 1079, See Gregorii VII., I., 22; and JAFFE: Reg. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA was b. in Alexandria, towards the close of the fourth century, and d. there in 444. After living for several years as a monk in the Nitrian Mountains, he succeeded his uncle Theophilus on the patriarchal chair of Alexandria, in 412. Like his predecessor, he distinguished himself by his violence against any deviation from what he considered orthodox faith. He expelled the Novatians from their church, and robbed their church-treasury; he led in person the mob which drove all Jews away from Alexandria in 418; and he took part, at least indirectly, in the foul murder of Ulpia. He became most notorious from his controversy with the Antiochian bishopsof Northern Africa. He refused to accept the decisions of the ecumenical council of Constantinople, was one of the last Christians, and was condemnedby the Church. His friend surrounded the palace of his successor, Cyril of Beroea, who had been sent to Constantinople, and conceived the bold scheme of ingratiating Protestant doctrines on the old ecumenical creeds of the Eastern Church, thereby effecting her reformation. In 1593 he was ordained in Alexandria a priest of the Greek Church, and afterwards archimandrite by his uncle, who was the patriarch. In 1395 he went as exarch to Poland to oppose the union of the Greek and Latin churches; from this event dates his hatred of the Latin Church. In 1602 he was elected Patriarch of Alexandria, and of Constantinople in 1621. In 1629 he was deposed by the intrigues of Jesuits, and banished to the island of Rhodes, but re-instated mainly through the exertions of the English ambassador at the Turkish court. In 1629 he wrote in Latin his remarkable Confession, and in Greek in 1631, with an addition of four questions and answers. It was published in both languages at Geneva, 1633. It expresses his own individual faith, which he vainly hoped would become the faith of the Greek Church. It is divided into eighteen brief chapters, each fortified with Scripture reference.

Eight chapters contain the old Catholic doctrine, while the rest bear a distinctively Protestant character; thus in chap. ii. he maintains that the sacraments are two in number, and that faith is the condition of their application, and in chap. xvii. that there is a real but spiritual presence. As might be supposed, Cyril was persecuted. Five times he was deposed, five times re-instated. He was well aware that his foes were many, and his staunch friends few. The Jesuits, with the aid of the French ambassador at the Sublime Porte, spared no intrigues to counteract and checkmate his Protestant schemes, and to bring about instead a union of the Greek hierarchy with Rome. Even the printing-press, which he had imported from England on which to print his Confession and several catechisms, was, on their instigation, destroyed by the Turkish Government. At length they succeeded in their unprincipled designs. They accused him of conspiring against the government. He was strangled by order of the Sultan, and horrid scenes followed. His body was burned at the Bosphorus. His friends surrounded the palace of his successor, Cyril of Beroea, who had been a chief instigator of his murder, crying, "Pilate, give us the dead, that we may bury him." But it was not until the body, once thrown up by the tide, had been recovered on the unwholesome waters, and again returned, that it was given over to the dead man's adherents. Cyril of Beroea was himself soon after deposed and anathema-tized for fraud, extortion, and the part he took in Cyril Lucar's death; and the next patriarch, Parthenius, granted the reformer a decent burial.

Cyril unfortunately left no followers able or willing to carry on his work. His doctrines were denounced by the Patriarch Cyril of Beroea and the synod of Constantinople held in 1383; which condemnation was confirmed by the synods of Jassy, in Moldavia, 1642, and of Jerusalem, 1672. The two latter synods, and others (Cyprian and his school is never mentioned by Cyril), condemned his Confession of Faith, which he knew was to be obtained only on condition of acceptance of the Protestant faith. He certainly did his best to bring about this desired result. He entered into correspondence with Protestant divines in Switzerland, Holland, and England (e.g., with Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury), sent promising youths to Protestant universities, and enlisted the press to circulate the truth. But all was in vain. Yet not all; for his nobility of thought and conduct, his ability and courage, his sincerity and piety, have endeared his memory to that nation which he was fain to lead to the liberty and religion of Christ.

Cyril Lucar has a peculiar claim upon Bible students, because he presented the famous uncial codex Alexandrinus, denominated codex A. (see BIBLE-TEXT, N.T.), to Charles I. of England, 1628. He also translated the New Testament into the modern Greek language, Geneva (or Leyden), 1638, London, 1703.

in 335, by Bishop Makarios, and presbyter, in 345, by Bishop Maximus, and where he finally became bishop himself. In the Arian controversy he tried to maintain a neutral position, in which, however, he did not succeed. After the death of Maximus, or, as Socrates and Sozomen have it, after the expulsion of Maximus by the Arians, Cyril became bishop by the aid of this party. At all events, he was consecrated by Acacius of Cesarea, who was an Arian. But the harmony between him and Acacius did not last long. According to the seventh canon of the Council of Nice, the Bishop of Jerusalem ranked immediately after the Bishops of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, though with reservation of the right of the Bishop of Cesarea as metropolit. From this point the disagreement began, but it was greatly inflamed by religious discrepancies. Acacius cited Cyril before him; and, when the latter declined to appear, the former had him deposed by a council of only a few bishops (335). Cyril appealed to another and larger council, held at Constantinople, which confirmed the deposition of Cyril; and it was only the death of Constantius and the accession of Julian which enabled Cyril to return to his see. During the last twenty years he lived in comparative peace and quiet, though he was expelled twice more, under Valens.

Of the works ascribed to Cyril, the homilies are certainly spurious, though with the exception of the one on the impotent man at the Pool of Bethesda, first published by Thomas Milles in 1703, which seems to be genuine. The letter addressed to the Emperor Constantius, and giving an account of a vision of a radiant cross in the heavens, is, at all events, much interpolated. But the catechisms, or catechetical lectures, are genuine, and are of the greatest interest, both for the history of the Christian dogmas, and for the true understanding of the liturgy and catechetical methods of the ancient Church. They were edited by J. Prevot (Paris, 1698), Thomas Milles (Greek and Latin, Oxford, 1703, fol.), and A. A. Toutée (Paris, 1728, fol., repr. ed., Venice, 1767). They were translated into German by Feder, Bamberg, 1786. See VAN VOLENHEUENV: Specimen Thol. De Cyr. Hier. Cat., Amsterdam, 1837; I. TH. PLITT: De Cyrillus Hier. Cyrillus and Methodius were born there in the first half of the ninth century.

Cyrillus, whose true name was Constantinus, studied philosophy at Constantinople, obtained the friendship of the learned Photius, was for some time a teacher himself of profane science, and was given the surname "the Philosopher," which he retained ever after. Soon, however, the religious tendency of his nature gained the ascendancy. He entered the clerical estate, took up his abode in a monastery, together with his brother Methodius, removed thence, and finally settled in the solitude of the mountains. At the same time he began to take active part in the dogmatical controversies. He had a dispute with Photius about the unity or duality of the soul; he defended the worship of images; he distinguished himself as a Christian apologist against the Mohammedans; and in this last direction went also and was given the surname "the Philosopher," himself as a Christian apologist against the Moslems.

As a Christian apologist against the Moslems, he had also visited them; and when, in 860, they addressed the emperor, Michael III., on the question of Cyrillus to them, he prepared himself properly for the mission, Cyrillus first settled at Cherson, and began to study the language of the Chazari; and it was in Cherson that he came in possession of the remains of Clement of Rome, which he afterwards always carried about wherever he went. After due preparation he penetrated deeper into the country; and, under the protection of the chief, he preached and held disputations in defence, and for the propagation, of Christianity. It also seems that a considerable number of the inhabitants decided in his favor; but there is not the least trace of any church organization among them; and, some years later on, the majority of the Chazari had adopted either Judaism or Mohammedanism.

Having effected the release of a number of Greek captives, Cyrillus returned with the relics of St. Clement of Rome, which he afterwards always held the hands of the Greek Church. The Greek missionaries employed only instruction, no violence, and held disputations in defence, and for the propagation, of Christianity. It also seems that a considerable number of the inhabitants decided in his favor; but there is not the least trace of any church organization among them; and, some years later on, the majority of the Chazari had adopted either Judaism or Mohammedanism.

Rastislav had just formed a great Slav Empire on the eastern boundary of Germany. Its name was Moravia; its boundaries are uncertain, and were probably somewhat variable. A number of the inhabitants decided in his favor; but there is not the least trace of any church organization among them; and, some years later on, the majority of the Chazari had adopted either Judaism or Mohammedanism.

The establishment of the Slav Church was, to some extent, an encroachment upon the rights of the Archbishop of Salzburg; and in 871 a memorandum appeared, setting forth how the countries now belonging to the diocese of Methodius originally had received Christianity from Salzburg, and how the Greek Methodius had seduced the people, and allured them away from the doctrine, liturgy, and language of the Roman Church. On the merely juridical side of the question this memorandum made no impression, either in Moravia, or in Germany, or in Rome. But Pope John VIII. was very much averse to the use of the Slav language in divine service, and considered that the time had come to take back the concession which his predecessors had granted. He consequently ordered Methodius to substitute the Latin for the Slav language; and, when this order was disregarded, he summoned him to Rome. But when Methodius arrived in Rome, and began to explain the whole matter, the Pope understood that he could not treat the Slav Church in this high-handed manner, without throwing it directly into the arms of the Patriarch of Constantinople. Methodius returned from Rome in 880 with an express confirmation of the use of the Slav language in his Church, and with his doctrines and practices fully justified.

In the mean time a suffragan see had been established at Neitra, and its first occupant was Wiching. But Wiching was a vehement adherent of the use of the Slav language in divine service, and considered that the time had come to take back the concession which his predecessors had granted. sary of Methodius and the Slav churches. As Swatopluk, the successor of Rastislav, also leaned towards Germany, Wicings succeeded, by suppostitious letters from the Pope, exciting him against Methodius, whose position became more and more difficult. Methodius addressed himself to the Pope for support, and the Pope answered him very kindly March 23, 851. But John VIII. died in 852; and in the contest with Wicings, Swatopluk, and the German prelates, Methodius finally succumbed. His successor, Gosrad, a Slav, was expelled. The Slav language and liturgy were abolished in the service, and supplanted by the Latin; the Slav priests were persecuted, and finally banished: they fled to Bulgaris, whether they brought the Slav translation of the Bible.
The death-year of Methodius is not known: it varies between 851 and 910. The Pannonian legend gives April 6, 885. The Bohemians and Mor-vians celebrated the thousandth jubilee of their apostle, July 5, 1863. Cyrilus and Methodius were canonized in 891, under Pope Leo XII.,

ALBRECHT VOGEL

CYRUS THE GREAT. (date of birth unknown,
d. B.C. 529) is named in the following passages of the Old Testament.—2 Chron. xxxvi. 22, 23;
Ex. i. 1–8, iii. 7, iv. 5, v. 13, 14, 17, vi. 3–5, 14; Isa. xlv. 28, xliv. 1; Dan. i. 21, vi. 28, x. 1.
For his history in detail we must look to Greek writers, particularly Herodotus, Xenophon, and Ktesias, and to scanty but invaluable contemporary records in the cuneiform character.
His early life is obscured by conflicting traditions, through which only a few general facts may be plucked, and the date of his birth is disputed.
K'ur'ush, Babylonian Kuraz, Hebrew K'oraz, Babylonian Kuraš, Hebrew Kunh, Greek Kōrh:
the meaning is in dispute) was the descendant of a line of kings ruling in Anzan (Babylonian An-san, or Aššan), a country known to the nations west of it as Elam (highland). They had estab-lshed themselves there by invasion, not many generations before Cyrus, whose genealogy is inscribed in the inscriptions no farther than his grandfather, Teispes. What relation this royal line had sustained to Persia, the country south-east of Anzan, we cannot certainly tell; but to Media on the north it had probably paid a continuous or occasional tribute.
Herodotus and Xenophon tell us that Cyrus's mother was Mandane, the daughter of Astyages, King of Media: this is opposed to the testimoniocy of Ctesias, and is unlikely. It is still more unlikely that Astyages sought to kill his grandson, because he was heir to the throne (Herodotus).
All traditions, however, point to a sojourn of Cyrus at Astyages' court, presumably as hostage.
While there, he no doubt observed the degeneracy of the Median kingdom, and the disaffection of the nobles from Astyages, who estranged them by his arbitrariness and favoritism. In B.C. 558, probably at the death of Cambyses his father, Cyrus ascended the throne of Anzan; and his ordinary title in the contemporary cuneiform records is "King of Anzan", rarely "King of the land of Persia." How soon the struggle with Astyages began is not clear; but its decisive settlement was not reached till 550, when, in the midst of a campaign, the soldiers of Astyages revolted, and delivered him into Cyrus's hands.
Cyrus then seized and plundered the royal city Ecbatana. After the fall of Media, and the voluntary or forced acknowledgment of Cyrus's authority by several tributary peoples, with Armenia already his friend, he soon turned his attention toward Lydia. Croesus, its king, was overcome, and Sardis captured in 547; and while the general of Cyrus was reducing the whole Ionian coast to submission. Cyrus himself marched toward the East. The following eight years were spent in triumphant campaigns, which made his power felt even beyond the Indus. But a further achievement was in store for him, less difficult, as it proved, than many others, but of far-reaching importance. He must become master of Babylonia. In the mouth Tammuz (July), B.C. 539, he entered Accad, or Northern Babylonia, with a powerful army. The empire which Nebuchadnezzar had made so terrible had, however, become outwardly reduced and inwardly weak. Naboni-dus the king was too inactive to secure the enthusiasm of the people, and too negligent of the gods and temples to retain the support of the powerful hierarchy. Accad revolted from him, and none were more eager than the priests in welcoming the conqueror. Cyrus entered Sippar ("City of the Sun," comp. Heb. DynED) with out striking a blow; and two days later his general, Gobryas, occupied Babylon, where Naboni-dus, who had fled from the field at the time of the revolt, was taken prisoner. Cyrus followed in person nearly four months later (3d Marches-d, 529), and appointed Gobryas and others to official positions. Nabonidus died before the close of the year.

Cyrus's religious policy began at once to show a marked difference from that of Nabonidus.
He repaired the shrines; he issued a proclama calling Merodach and Nebo "his lords," and recognizing his victory as due to them; his son Cambyses presided at a great religious festival;
he pacified tributary peoples by restoring to them the images of their gods which had been brought to Babylon. Among those whose religious feelings he thus regarded were the captive Hebrews, to whom he at the same time restored certain political and social rights. The coming of this policy of conciliation. The remaining years

ly and the Samarian・・・
of Cyrus were spent chiefly in reducing to order the affairs of his vast empire. Some dated tablets prove, that, as early as B.C. 532, he set Cambyses on the throne of Babylonia as semi-independent ruler of that province. He himself was doubtless engaged elsewhere. His last expedition was against a people in the north-east (either the Massagetae or the Derbikkes), and it ended in his death from wounds received in battle B.C. 529. His tomb, of doubtful genuineness, is still to be seen on the plain of Murgab, north of Persepolis.

Cyrus was not a monotheistic zealot: he was probably a polytheist, and no Zoroastrian at all. His own records show him uttering the same language in regard to Merodach that Ezra puts into his mouth with reference to Jehovah. It can hardly have had much depth of meaning in either case. But he was politic and considerate, knowing how to use the sentiments of others for large political ends; and, even if his friendly treatment of the Hebrews sprang mainly from a desire to have attached subjects on a threatened frontier, he was none the less their deliverer from bondage.

In the nature of the case he could not organize his vast conquests as Darius afterwards did. If he had been born heir to a great empire, instead of having to create one, his administrative power would have had freer play. As it was, the qualities of a determined, rapid, successful, politic, benignant conqueror, are those that will perpetuate his fame.

DACH, Simon, b. at Memel, July 29, 1605; d. at Königsberg, April 16, 1639; studied at Königsberg, Wittenberg, and Magdeburg, and became teacher in the cathedral school of Königsberg in 1639. He was the most prominent member of what, in the history of German literature, is called the School of Königsberg, and wrote a great number of poems, social and religious; the former without any value, the latter highly esteemed. They were printed separately, on loose leaves; but there are comprehensive collections of the original prints in the libraries of Königsberg, Breslau, and Berlin. The Prussian hymn-books of 1665 and 1675 contain many of his religious poems. The Charbran- denburgische Rose, Adler, Loe, und Scepter (1680) contains the verses he wrote in honor of the reigning dynasty. A selection of his poetry, and a life of him, is found in Karl Goedeke and Julius Tittmann: Deutsche Dichter d. 17ten Jahrhunderts, Leipzig, 1876.

DA COSTA, Isaak, b. in Amsterdam, Jan. 14, 1798; d. there April 28, 1860; belonged to a rich and distinguished family of Portuguese Jews, but embraced Christianity in 1821. He studied jurisprudence and belles-lettres at Leyden, and developed, under the influence of W. Bilderdyk, into one of the most brilliant poets of the Dutch literature. His poetical works appeared in three volumes at Harlem (1801). But, besides being a great poet, he was one of the most energetic and influential of modern Christian apologists. Possessed of comprehensive knowledge and considerable critical power, he opposed the anti-Christian tendencies of the age, especially the Tübinger school, with a zeal and perseverance which had effect also outside of his own country. He worked principally as a lecturer, and his apologetical works originated in the lecture-room. The most important was The Four Witnesses (1810, translated into English by D. Scott, London, 1851), directed against D. F. Strauss’s Leben Jesu. His Life has been written by H. J. Koenen, in Handelungen von der Maatschappy der Neder. Letterkunde, 1880.

DAGGETT, Oliver Ellsworth, D.D., b. at New Haven, Conn., Jan. 14, 1810; d. in Hartford, Sept. 1, 1880. He was graduated at Yale College (1828); was pastor of the South Church, Hartford, and of the First Congregational Church, Canandaigua, N.Y., twenty-three years; pastor of Yale College three years, and of the Second Congregational Church, New London, Conn.; and was one of the compilers of the Connecticut Hymn-Book, 1845.

DAGON (גַּם ‘great fish’), a Philistine divinity, having a marine body, and human face and hands. Philo Byblus, followed by others, falsely derived the name from Eben (corn), and designates the god as Zeos φιστρός (the god of agriculture). That the former derivation is correct is plain from 1 Sam. v. 4, where it is reported, that, when the hands and face were broken off, only “Dagon” was left. The English version puts in what is not in the Hebrew, “the stump of Dagon.” Dagon is allied to the Syrian female divinity, Atargatis (also called Derecto), and is probably the same as the Assyrian fish-god, Odakon, mentioned by Berosus. He had temples in Ashdod (1 Sam. v. 3 sqq.), where, on two successive nights, his image fell to the floor when the ark of the Lord was placed beside it, and at Gaza (Judg. xvi. 23 sqq.). This latter Samson pulled down by pushing out the two columns. Cities in Judah (Josh. xv. 41) and Asher (xix. 27) were called Beth-dagon (“home or temple of Dagon”).

DAILE, Jean, b. at Châtellerault, Jan. 6, 1594; d. at Charenton, April 15, 1670; studied at the seminary of Saumur, under Camero and Gomaribus; was an intimate friend of Amyraut and Cappel; lived for a number of years in the house of Gov. du Plessis-Mornay as tutor to his grandson, with whom he visited Italy, where he made the acquaintance of Sarpi at Venice, Switzerland, England, and Holland; and was in 1626 appointed pastor at Charenton, that is, to the Reformed Congregation of Paris. His principal work is his treatise De usu Patrum (1636), translated into English (1651) under the title, A Treatise concerning the right Use of the Fathers in the Decision of Controversies that are at this Day in Religion, re-edited by Jekyll, London, 1841, Philadelphia, 1842. His Exposition of the Philippians and of the Colossians have also been translated into English by Sherman, London, 1841.

D'ALLI, or D'AILLY. See Ailly.

DALBERG, Karl Theodor (baron, arch-chancellor of the German Empire, prince-primate of the Rhenish Confederacy, grand duke of Frankfurt), was b. at Hernsheim, Feb. 8, 1744, and d. at Regensburg, Feb. 10, 1817. He studied first law at Göttingen and Heidelberg, but entered afterwards the church, advanced rapidly, and became, as governor of Erfurt (from 1772), one of the centres of literary and political life in Germany, a friend of Goethe, the Maecenas of Schiller, an intimate of Joseph II. Some very spirited writings of his belong to this period: Betrachtungen über d. Universum (1777), Verhältniss zwischen Moral und Staatskunst (1786), etc. In 1787 he was appointed coadjutor and successor to the Elector of Mayence, and in 1788 coadjutor to the Bishop of Mayence. In the same year he was consecrated Archbishop of Tarsus, and in 1797 he was made provost of the chapter of Würzburg. When the French invasion began, in 1797, he belonged to the patriot party; and for several years on he still clung to the old establishment of the empire. But he was unable to withstand Napoleon, who alternately coaxed and threatened him, until he became a mere tool in his hands. He was present at the coronation in Paris (1804); when he signed the Rhenish Confederacy in 1806, and was made prince-primate; he accepted in 1810 the title and function as grand duke of Frankfort; but he paid in honesty what he got in DALE, James Wilkinson, D.D., b. in New Castle County, Del., Oct. 16, 1812; d. at Media, Penn., April 19, 1881. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1831, and at Princeton Theological Seminary. He also studied medicine with a view to more efficient missionary service in India; but the financial difficulties of the American Board prevented his departure, and for seven years he held an appointment from the Bible Society of Philadelphia, to distribute Bibles throughout the State. From 1843 to 1871 he was pastor of the united Ridley and Middle-town Presbyterian churches in Delaware County, Pennsylvania, from 1871 to 1880 pastor of the Wayne, and, at his death, of the "Glen Riddle," Presbyterian Church.

Dr. Dale was a man of intense activity. He issued many sermons, and labored zealously in behalf of total abstinence. His reputation, however, was made by his elaborate works upon baptism, in which he defends pedobaptism and sprinkling. The volumes are, "Classic Baptism" (Philadelphia, 1867), "Jublie" (1871), "Johannic" (1872), "Christie and Patriotic" (1874). Condensed statements of his views will be found in The Cup and the Cross, Philadelphia, 1872, and in his article Baptism, contributed to this Cyclopædia shortly before his death.

DALMATIC (Dalmatica sc. vestis), a white tunic with long and wide sleeves, worn by rich and distinguished persons, at one time by the Roman senators, derived its name from the province Dalmatia, in which it was first manufactured. By a decree of Pope Sylvester I., 335, it was made a part of the deacon's vestment, and as such adorned by two longitudinal stripes behind. It is often mentioned in the Old Testament, as Abraham's trusted servant Eliezer was a native of Damascus (Gen. xxiv. 6), which Ananias was to inquire after Saul of Tarsus (Acts ix. 10). The window in the wall through which Paul was let down in a basket (2 Cor. xii. 33), the house of Ananias, and the house of Judas are also shown; and "the street which is called Straight," and in which Ananias was to inquire after Saul of Tarsus, still bears that name.

At present the city is a hotbed of Mohammedan fanaticism: the Moslems mingle curses on the Christians with their prayers to Allah. Every Christian there remembers the frightful massacre among the Druses in the Lebanon, the Moslems arose, on the 9th of July, against the Christians; and on that day and the following about three thousand adult males were murdered in cold blood, and many others afterwards died of their wounds, or perished in the desert. The Turkish Government looked on without interfering. A wholesome lesson, however, was given to the Moslems by the French expedition, and the punishment it inflicted upon the guilty; but the hatred is still burning, and restrained only by fear.

Since 1843 the United Presbyterian Church of America and the Presbyterian Church of Ireland have jointly maintained a mission in Damascus, with a church for converts from the Jews and the Greek Christians, and with schools. The London Society for the Conversion of the Jews has also a mission there.

DAMASUS is the name of two popes. — Damasus I. (366–384) was born in Rome, (probably 306), and made archdeacon in 355. His election to the episcopal see was contested by the deacon Ursicinus, and the contest spread even into the provinces. He was a stanch opponent of Arianism, and held none in Rome (in 382), which condemned the two Illyrian bishops Ursacius and Valesius, and another (in 370), which condemned Auxentius of Milan. He stood in intimate relations to Jerome, whom he encouraged to revive the Latin translation of the Bible. He showed also great interest for the artistic improvement of the Roman Catacombs. After his death he was canonized. His festival falls on Dec. 11. His works, consisting of letters and poems, appeared in Rome 1638 and 1734, and in Paris 1810. See also Martin Rade: Damasus, Bischof von Rom., Freiburg in B., 1877. — Damasus II. was Bishop of Brixen, when, in 1018, he was elected Pope by the influence of Henry III.; but he died twenty-three days after his accession.

DAMIANUS, or DAMIANI, Peter, b. at Ravena, 1007; d. at Faenza, Feb. 23, 1072; studied at Ravenna, Faenza, and Parma, and taught for several years in his native city, with great success, but retired, when about thirty years old, suddenly and unexpectedly, to the hermits of Fonte Avello, near Gubbio. Here, too, he distinguished himself; was made prior and abbot, enlarged and consolidated the congregation, and brought into fashion a new system of flagellation. The flogging, performed with a leather thong on the bare back, accompanied the recitation of the psalms, and followed along with the measure of the verses. To each psalm belonged a hundred strokes; to the whole psalter, fifteen thousand. But three thousand strokes were computed to be equal to one year of damnation, and an energetic person could by one day's work make up for several years of penance. The fashion became a rage; and monks flogged themselves to death after the music of the psalms; and Damiani himself had to interfere, and try to moderate the enthusiasm. Meanwhile his fame grew prodigiously. The whole party among the Italian monks who inclined towards an austere ethics separated from dogmatics. DANAEUS, Lambert, b. at Beaugenzy, in 1530; d. at Castres, in 1581; studied, first law at Orléans, afterwards theology at Geneva, and was made pastor in Chien, but driven away by persecution in 1583; fled from France after the Massacre of the night of St. Bartholomew (1572), and was pastor in Geneva, and citizen of the city from 1581; accepted an invitation to Leyden, but was compelled to give up the position after the fall of Leicester; was finally made pastor and professor at Castres, in the Kingdom of Navarre. A list of his works, exegetical, dogmatical, ethical, etc., is given in Haag, La France Protestante, IV. p. 104. He was one of the first to treat Christian ethics separately from dogmatics. His Commentary on the Minor Prophets was translated into English by Stockwood, London, 1594.

DANCE AMONG THE HEBREWS. The Hebrew language has several expressions denoting the art of "dancing." Thus we find rend, which means to skip, or leap for joy (Exod. iii. 4); karar, "to jump or spring" (2 Sam. vi. 14, 16); chagag, "turning round in a circle" (1 Sam. xxx. 16); and chul, "to twist," probably referring to the whirling motions of the dances (Judg. xx. 21). Occasions for dancing and dancing processions in connection with divine service is mentioned. When it is said, "Return, return, O Shulamite; return, return, that we may love" (Song of Songs, vi. 13), a form of DANCERS. Wild enthusiasts of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. Religious dancing, of a reverent and decorous sort, as, for instance, among the Shakers, has been occasionally introduced into Christian worship; but the sect of the Dancers, who were enthusiasts, first appeared in 1374, on the Lower Rhine, dancing in honor of St. John, although why he was selected no one knows. In July of that year they made their appearance at Aachen,—a crowd of men and women dancing hand in hand, either in pairs or in a circle, on the streets, in the churches, in private houses, wherever they might be, without shame, without rest, hour after hour, until they were exhausted. Then convulsions set in: they felt severe pain in the abdomen, and so they cried out lustily, until by blows with the fists, or even by being trodden on, they got relief. During the dance they sang, "Here sent Johan, so so, frish ind fro, here sent Johan," and encouraged themselves to renewed exertions by crying, "Frish, friskes." They also employed unintelligible expressions, which were, of course, interpreted as calls upon an unheard-of demon; visions visited them: in short, these dancers were thorough-going fanatics. But the mania spread in a short time through all the Low Country, and even into France: wherever these dancers went, they found ready imitators. Children left their parents, and joined the wandering; crazy throng; wives forgot their duties; all classessent themselves. The evil was universally attributed to demoniacal possession, and therefore it was to be cured by solemnly exorcising the devil. This was done with great success, although it was noticed. (1) His devotion to principle. He began his career by renouncing to partake of that which he had been taught to regard as unclean (i. 8). The temptations of preferment and court favor could not corrupt him; and he was thrown into a furnace for disobeying the royal command to bow down to a golden image (Dan. iv.), and into the lions' den, for refusing compliance with an injunction forbidding for thirty days prayer to God (vi.). (2) His distinguished wisdom. He was known above all the magicians and astrologers of the realm for skill in interpreting visions and dreams (i. 20). To this he added practical knowledge of statecraft. (3) His fearlessness. He hesitated not to convert Nebuchadnezzar to a belief in God's purpose to abase him (iv. 32), and to interpret in the presence of the royal reveellers the doom of Belshazzar (v. 28). Ezekiel refers to Daniel as a pattern of righteousness (xiv. 14) and of wisdom (xxviii. 9). His life bears a strong resemblance to that of Joseph, who, also an exile, acquired the highest dignities at a foreign court, and gave one of the most conspicuous illustrations of fidelity to God under the most trying temptations. His career is also a comforting example of God's protection of his people. DANIEL, Book of. There is testimony, outside the limits of the book which bears his name, to the life of Daniel. Ezekiel twice (xiv. 14, xxviii. 3) refers to him as a well-known personage. The first passage was written 592 B.C. If Daniel was deported to Babylon in the third year of Jeohai-kin's reign (605 B.C.), he must have been, at the time of the Book of Daniel, some thirty years old; for at the date of deportation he had already passed the years of childhood (Dan. i. 4). In order to a just judgment of the book, two things must be taken into consideration: (1) Nowhere in the book itself is any direct claim made to Danielic authorship (but see chaps. vii.-xii. and remarks below); and (2) In the Hebrew canon the work is placed among the Hagiographa, and not among the Prophets. This location determines nothing certainly as to the date of composition, but proves, that, although Daniel was endowed with prophetic vision, he was not in the strict sense a prophet by vocation. The work is certainly derived from Danielic traditions, a statement justified by the above references in Ezekiel, which speak of a Daniel of the exile period, who was a wise and righteous man. A comparison with the apocryphal additions which pretend to narrate facts of his life, fully establishes the majestic simplicity of the book, and its accurate acquaintance with Babylonian and Persian institutions. The book is divided into two parts of six chapters each. Its language is the Aramaic from chap. ii. 4 to chap. viii. otherwise Hebrew. The Hebrew, when compared with that of the ancient authors, as well as the Mishena, exhibits many peculiarities, and much harshness of style, but testimony of being the chronicles of him who wrote at the opening of the Greek period (third century B.C.). The Aramaic is distinguished from the later Aramaic of the Targums, as, for example, the "has not yet been abbreviated into ã. With the Book of Ezra it is the oldest monument in existence of East-Aramaic. The Aramaic was used in the Babylonian realm, at the side of the Assyrian; and the transition from Hebrew needs no other explanation than that the author desired to let the Chaldaens speak in their own tongue. The work throughout is homogeneou s; and the theory of Lenormant and Zöckler, that the work contains interpolations, is resorted to in the interest of the Danielic authorship, but is without facts to warrant it. The Greek names of three musical instruments, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer (σάραγης, συμφωνία, φαληρόν, chap. iii. 5), seem to indicate a date in the second century B.C. It is possible, but, as Lenormant himself acknowledges, very improbable, that these should have been known in Babylon in the time of Nebuchadnezzar. But we know from Polybius (Atheneus, x. 52) that the dulcimer was a favorite instrument at the court of Antiochus Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.). This seems to be more than a mere casual coincidence.

The truth of the historical narrative has been questioned; but it must be granted that savants in Assyriology are more conservative in their judgment on this point than others. Lenormant says he is more and more impressed with the genuineness each time he peruses the book. Oppert thinks he has found the very pedestal on which the image of Dura rested. Talbot illustrates the punishment of the fiery furnace from inscriptions. These investigators find confirmative testimony of Nebuchadnezzar's insanity in Berosus, Abydenus, and Josephus. In 1854 an inscription was discovered at Mugheir, containing the name of Belšar-usur, son of Nabonahid. In regard to other historical difficulties advanced, it must not be overlooked that chap. v. 30 speaks only of the death of Belshazzar, not necessarily of the termination of the Chaldean monarchy. It is difficult, also, to harmonize the account of Darius with the records of profane history, and no place may have yet been found in contemporary accounts for his dynasty; but it deserves, on the other hand, to be carefully noticed that the inscriptions of the first two years of Cyrus's reign designate him as "King of Nations," and for the first time in its third year he styled "King of Babylon, King of Nations." The attempt of Lenormant to clear up the difficulty by supposing Darius to have been a viceroy of Cyrus fails. The book evidently lets a Median monarchy follow the Chaldean.

As regards the monarchies (see DARIUS) of Nebuchadnezzar's dream (chap. ii.), which Ménant thinks have the ring of a word-for-word paraphrase of some cuneiform inscription, the old interpretation (Hengstenberg, etc.) represents them as respectively the Chaldean, Medo-Persian, Grecian, and Roman. The better view (Ewald, Bleek, Zoëcker, etc.) agrees in making the last monarchy to be the Grecian, thus excluding the Roman entirely.

With chap. vii. begin the visions, and from the second verse Daniel speaks in the first person. This chapter contains visions and prophecies of events coming up out of the sea, in appearance like a lion, a bear, and a leopard, and the fourth "dreadful and terrible," with ten horns (ver. 7). A little horn (the eleventh) grows up among the ten horns of the fourth beast, and plucks up three of their number by the roots. Then the Ancient of days appears, who destroys the beasts, and confers upon "the Son of man coming in the clouds" (ver. 13) a kingdom which is indestructible. The beasts of this vision refer to the same monarchies as the image of chap. ii., and the Son of man corresponds to the stone cut out of the mountain. While our first impulse is to interpret the fourth beast to be the Roman Empire, the vision of chap. viii. forces us to the former conclusion, that it was the Grecian. There (chap. viii.) the Medo-Persian is represented by the ram, and the Grecian (ver. 21), so it is expressly stated, by the goat, which overcomes the ram. At first it has one horn, whose place is subsequently taken by four others. A fifth then grows out, which reaches to heaven, casts down some of the stars, tramples them under foot, and oppresses nations, and especially the saints for two thousand three hundred days (Hebrew, evening-morning). This great horn is Alexander the Great, and the other four, stretching "toward the four winds of heaven" (ver. 8), the Macedonian, Syrian, Egyptian, and Thracian dynasties. The little horn (ver. 9) which desolates the sanctuary (vers. 11, 12) is Antichus Epiphanes. The testimony of the two thousand three hundred days (ver. 14) is marked by the resecession of the temple in 104 B.C., an event which the Jews have since commemorated by a yearly festival, beginning the 25th of Kislev. It being settled that the little horn of chap. viii. is Antichus, there can be no doubt that we should interpret the fourth beast of chap. vii. and the fourth world-kingdom of chap. ii. as the Grecian, and not the Roman, Empire. The conduct of the "little horn " (chap. viii.) and the fourth beast (chap. vii.) towards the saints is the same,—cruel and relentless; and, though there are variations in the descriptions, they are no greater than those between the fourth beast of chap. vii. and the fourth kingdom of chap. ii. This view is further favored by the correspondence in the periods during which the desolations of the arch-enemy continue. According to chap. vii. 25 they last for a "time, and times, and the dividing of time" (chap. ix. 27) they stop in the middle of the week, or after three days and a half; and chap. xii. 7 agrees with this description. Turning back to chap. vii. 19, these desolations are said to occur just before the "end of the indignation." Comparing xii. 27 with v. 13, the meaning to meument to be the same, and are again forced to the conclusion that the fourth beast of chap. vii. is identical with the "little horn" of chap. viii. which Gabriel interprets to be "Grecia" (ver. 21).

The result, then, we finally reach is, that the four kingdoms preceding that of the Messiah, of chaps. ii., vii., and viii., are the Chaldean, Median, Persian, and Greek. That the Median and Persian were distinct is confirmed by the additional fact that the ram of chap. viii. 20 had two horns, and that, while Cyrus is styled "King of Persia" (x. 2), Darius never is. The symbolism of the fourth beast of chap. vii., as so closely related, of the same composition is the winter of 168 B.C., soon after the ignominious third Egyptian campaign of Antiochus, and the attack upon Jerusalem by Apollonius.

To the above discussion, in which the author with great learning presents his own view, it is proper to add the following upon the chronology of Daniel, and the question of genuineness.

I. Chronology. — The interpretation of the seventy weeks (four hundred and ninety years), and the expectation (or "Messiah," comp. Lev. iv. 3, Hebrew), fell, and in 170 B.C. Antiochus plundered the temple, took and destroyed, and a flood of desolations will occur. In the middle of the week sacrifices are to cease. This week is the "time, and times, and the dividing of time," or it may be "a time, and an eighth of a time, and a half of a week;" (or the sixty-two weeks after the 62+1. That we are justified in regarding the sixty-two weeks as antecedent, and the seven weeks as subsequent, to the one week, is apparent from the fact that the end of the period 62+1 is marked by a terrible judgment (ix. 26); the end of the whole period, 62+1+7 (seventy weeks), on the other hand, by the final salvation, etc. (ver. 24). This obliges us to put the seven weeks after the 62+1. Here, however, we meet the difficulty, that, if we count from 104 B.C. (the end of the 62+1), the seven weeks (forty-nine years), we do not reach the birth of Jesus.

Wieseler avoids the difficulty by assuming that the seven weeks stand for an indefinite period, like the Jubilee Year. But the difficulty still remains an unsolved mystery. As for the words of Christ (Matt. xxiv. 15), the author can only establish the prophetic character of Dan. ix. 26 sq., but, while he refers the prophecy to the destruction of Jerusalem, it does not follow that it was not fulfilled before (under Antiochus), and will not be fulfilled again in antichrist (2 Thess. ii. 4). The first fulfilment of the prophecy may be only partial. It is not necessarily exhaustive.

In spite of the conclusion to which we have thus arrived, that Antiochus Epiphanes is the stand-point from which Daniel makes his eschatological observations, we cannot draw an absolutely certain inference that the book was written in the period of the Seleucidae. But the weight of the considerations cannot be denied, which make for a date at this time (the middle of the second century B.C.), — a man of God incorporating into a work of consolation for the Jews, Babylonian and Persian traditions, and prophecies of Daniel which had been handed down. The more exact date which commends itself to us for its composition is the winter of 168 B.C., soon after the ignominious third Egyptian campaign of Antiochus, and the attack upon Jerusalem by Apollonius.
the life of Antiochus Epiphanes (175 B.C.—164 B.C.). He died at the termination of the last week (164 B.C.), in the middle of which (167 B.C.) the sacrifices (by his sacrilege) were violently discontinued in the temple.

2. The prophecies were fulfilled in Antiochus Epiphanes. But, in accordance with the view of a cyclical and progressive fulfilment of prophecy, were fulfilled again at the time of Christ, and will be fulfilled once more at his second coming.

3. The third view is the one generally prevalent in the church,—that reference is exclusively to events of Christ's life and the time that followed, some including the Pope of Rome in the fulfilment. This view denies all allusion to Antiochus Epiphanes. Dr. Pusey, in his extended work on Daniel, places the inception of Christ's ministry at the beginning of the last week, his death in the middle, and the rest of the week (three years and a half) he refers to the years that immediately follow.

4. The modified view elaborated in the preceding essay. Epiphanes fulfils the events of the single week; but the seven weeks (forty-nine years) follow upon these events, and the prophecy connected with them (ix. 25) refers to Christ.

As regards these views, the following may be said. The first view must be discarded, as it denies the prophetic character of the work and the reference to the kingdom of Christ, which the book evidently intends. The stone cut out of the mountain, and the Messiah the Prince of the 62+1 weeks has a character so different from the conclusion of the whole seventy weeks, that we are almost at a loss for the explanation of the 62+1 weeks. But no event can be found in fact till the destruction of Jerusalem, forty-nine years after its commencement (forty-nine years). The second view (Westcott, in Smith's Bible Dictionary, and others) does not sufficiently account for the definiteness of the prophecy of the Messiah. But the cyclical principle of interpretation may still be applied as Delitzsch himself does. The third view, while the most plausible, strains the significance of the expressions in chap. ix. 25-27. For example, the death of Christ in the middle of the last week can hardly be made to fulfil the words, "and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease" (ix. 27). These did not cease, but were discontinued by the destruction of Jerusalem, forty-nine years afterwards. Another consideration bearing against this view is, that no event can be found to correspond with the end of the single week, which is at the same time the end of the whole period of seventy weeks. We then turn to the view in Dr. Delitzsch's article. The arguments he gives in its favor need not be repeated. The events in the life of Antiochus correspond so exactly to the minute details of the prophecy, that the conclusion can hardly be escaped that they refer to him. The change in the order of counting the weeks to 62+1+7 has much in its favor, and carries us back exactly to the battle of Carchemish as a starting-point. The conclusion of the 62+1 weeks has a character so different from the conclusion of the whole seventy weeks, that we are almost shut up to this way of counting. This is the principal objection to this view is, that the interval from the death of Antiochus to the birth of Christ is a hundred and sixty-four years, while the prophecy only allows seven weeks (forty-nine years).

II. Genuineness. — The received date of the Book of Daniel is 570–536 B.C. The date given by some modern critics is 175–160 B.C. The first to deny the Danielic authorship was Porphyry (239–302 A.D.). No further attempt was made to discredit it till many centuries later, by Spinoza and Sir Isaac Newton. The first critical attack of much weight was made by Bertholdt in 1803. It has since been one of the burning questions of biblical criticism; such scholars as Bleek, De Wette, Hitzig, and Ewald, denying the authenticity, and Heugtenburg, Haveriick, Gausen, Auburien, Pusey, and Moses Stuart, asserting it.

Arguments against the Genuineness are: 1. Philosophical. Nothing can be certainly determined from the Hebrew and Aramaic used, although, as indicated above, the peculiarities rather make for the early date. As for the Greek terms employed for the musical instruments (chap. iii. 7), Bertholdt adduced ten. But their number has been reduced to three (see above); and only in the case of one of these is the evidence unquestionable (Lange's Commentary, p. 26). It is argued that no Greek instruments were known in Babylonia before the conquest of Alexander, and therefore the work could not have been composed at the received date. This argument, however, presumes too much. Rather is it likely that Babylon, the "city of merchants" (Ezek. xvii. 4), had intercourse with the Greeks even before the fifth century B.C.; and, according to Strabo (xiii. 3, 2), a brother of the Greek poet Alcaeus served in the armies of Nebuchadnezzar.

2. Historical. There are several difficulties under this head deserving special mention here. Two errors are professedly found in chap. i. 1, and chap. ii. 1. In the first passage the statement is made that Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem in the third year of Jehoiakim's reign. This is said to contradict Jer. xlv. 2, where the event is referred to the fourth year of his reign. A proper explanation is secured by assigning the first passage to Nebuchadnezzar's departure for Jerusalem (comp. Jonah i. 3), the second for the actual arrival, not forgetting the loose usage of the terms "day" and "year" amongst the Hebrews. The second apparent error affords more difficulty; for the scriptural chronology more than vindicates our author. Chap. i. 5, Daniel is said to have been in tutelage three years. But Nebuchadnezzar is called King (chap. i. 1) at the time of the siege of Jerusalem; and it was in the second year of his reign (chap. ii. 1) that he dreamed his dream. There seems to be no place for these three years. We shall see that the term "king" was only given to Nebuchadnezzar by anticipation at the siege (chap. i. 1), Nabopolassar being then king, and that Daniel's statement is strictly accurate in chap. i. 6, ii. 1. Nebuchadnezzar's actual reign began about a year after Daniel's arrival in Babylon. This is proved by the following calculation. Jehoiakim's reign lasted seven years after the siege (2 Chron. xxxvi. 5). His son Jehoiachin, after a short reign of three months (2 Chron. xxxvi. 9), was carried into captivity. He had spent thirty-seven years in captivity when Evil-Merodach began to reign, and his predecessor, Nebuchadnezzar, died (2 Kings xxv. 27). Counting up, we have fully forty-four years from the siege of Jerusalem till the death of Nebuchadnezzar. But that monarch, as we know from other sources, only reigned forty-three years. This would bring us about one year after the siege. With this year, and the statement that it was not till the second year of his reign that he had his dream, we have an interval sufficient to comprise the three years of Daniel's tutelage after his deportation to Babylon. Two other historical difficulties may be mentioned. In the list of kings given by Berosus, Belshazzar is not mentioned. Great stress was at one time laid upon this omission. But the scriptural account has been fully confirmed by an inscription found by Sir H. Rawlinson in 1854 among tablets obtained at Mugheir. It mentions a Bil-shar-uzur, a son of Nabonidus, whom that monarch associated with himself on the throne. This enables us to understand how Daniel could be called the "third ruler" (v. 16, 29). It is said that profane history knows nothing about Darius the Mede, King of Babylon. Various explanations have been given; the one identifying him with Cyaxares II., whom Xenophon said preceded Cyrus, having perhaps most in its favor. It was not uncommon for individuals to bear two names, just as Daniel did himself. Some future discovery may clear up this difficulty as satisfactorily as the preceding one has been.

3. The main objection is based upon the supernatural events and prophecies which the book records. The miracles are said to be too portentous to be authentic, and the prophecies too minute and definite to accord with the general spirit of the genuine prophecies of the Old Testament. This objection seems to imply a dogmatic prepossession averse to the belief in the miraculous. But, leaving this aside, it may be said that the peculiar position of Daniel and the Jews in exile demanded a striking exhibition of divine power, such as was given in other exigencies of Old Testament history.

Arguments for the Genuineness. — 1. The work is either by Daniel, or else an imposture. The justice of this dilemma is denied by many critics; but, on the very face of it, the work seems to show us upon which of these two views. In chapters vii.–xii. the author speaks of himself as Daniel. 2. Christ refers to it (Matt. xxiv. 15) as a prophecy spoken by (πρόδρομος) Daniel. 3. According to Josephus (Ant., XI. 8, 4), the book was placed before Alexander (356–323 B.C.) 4. The work betrays an accurate and intimate acquaintance with Babylonian and Persian manners, such as only a contemporary could be expected to have, as in the description of the courtiers' dress (iii. 21), punishment by burning alive (iii. 8), presence of women at feasts (v.), etc. 5. The whole spirit and method of the book, which distinguishes it in a marked manner from the apocryphal additions, makes strongly for the genuineness. To these arguments the following considerations must be noted. Whether we settle upon the later or earlier date, the work, in both cases, remained a prophecy of Christ. And, second, too much stress cannot be laid upon the fact that the great Assyrologists do not grant the conclusions reached by critics unfavorable to the genuineness. Monumental evidence is always decisive as against arguments based upon induction. Discoveries in Babylon have already confirmed statements of Daniel which were denied by critics. They may be expected to do so in the future.

DANTE A L I G H I E R I, b. at Florence, between May 18 and June 17, 1265; d. at Ravenna, Sept. 14, 1321. Dante is a contraction of Durante, by which name he was baptized. The family name of his mother, Donna Bella, is unknown. His teacher was Brunetto Latini, a philosopher and historian, under whom he learned the classic poets, rhetoric, and the elements of mathematics. He also applied himself to painting and music, and later to theology and philosophy, and became master of all the science of his age.

He belonged to the Guelf or Papal party, and fought with distinction at the battle of Campaldino in 1288, in which the Ghibellines or Imperial party were utterly and finally routed.

In 1295 he became a member of the Arte degli Speziali, or druggist's guild, and in 1300 was chosen one of the six priori in whom the executive power of the State was lodged. The Guelf party became split into the Bianchi and Neri (Whites and Blacks). Dante was instrumental in banishing the leaders of both parties; but the next year the Neri, returning, enlisted the aid of Charles of Valois. To defeat this combination, Dante, with three others, was sent to Rome to secure the veto of Pope Boniface VIII.; but the delay gave the advantage to the Neri, and on Dante's return he was arraigned on a charge of peculation, and was sentenced, in January, 1302, to a heavy fine and to perpetual banishment. From this time he espoused the Ghibelline side, until he gradually detached himself from both parties, and created a party for himself. In 1292 he married Gemma Donati, by whom he had seven children, and whom he never saw after his banishment. The history of his exile is obscure. He appears at Arezzo, Verona, Padua, Milan, whither he went to meet Henry of Luxemburg on his assumption of the iron crown; at Paris, Lucca, Venice, and finally at Ravenna, where he died, of a malarial fever, at the age of fifty-six years and four months, and where his remains still rest.

Literary Works. — 1. The Vita Nuova; or, Life renewed by love. Its inspiration was Beatrice Portinari, whom he made the subject of an ideal passion, and afterwards the incarnation of divine philosophy in the Commedia. The Vita Nuova is the story of this passion. It is written in prose, in short chapters, interspersed with brief poems, to each of which is appended a short explanation in prose. It contains the first hint of the Commedia, and without it the latter cannot be thoroughly understood. Its date is somewhere from 1295 to 1307.

2. Convito; or, The Banquet. An incomplete work projected in fourteen treatises, only four of which were written. It was intended to be a handbook of the knowledge of the date. Date uncertain.

3. Canzoniere; or, Minor Poems, a collection of songs, ballads, and sonnets, some of them by other hands.

4. De Monarchia (On Monarchy), date between 1310 and 1313. Written in Latin, and consisting of three books, in which he tries to prove that monarchy is the normal and divinely instituted form of government; that Rome is its divinely appointed seat, and that the Romagna, sovereign God's civil vicegerent; that man with his double nature is subject to a double order, temporal and spiritual, the empire and the papacy, the Pope being God's spiritual vicegerent, and, like the emperor, having his legitimate seat at Rome, and being, though the two jurisdictions are independent, in some sense superior to the emperor, as the mortal interest of man is subordinate to the immortal.

5. De Vulgari Eloquio (On Popular Eloquence), also in Latin. It treats of poetizing in the vulgar tongue, and of the different Italian dialects; and its object is to establish the Italian language as a literary tongue, and to give rules for the composition of Italian poetry. It was projected in four books, but only two are extant.

7. De Aqua et Terra (On Water and Earth).

8. The Bucolic Eclogues. Two epistles in Latin hexameters, in answer to an invitation to come to Bologna and compose a great Latin work.

9. Divina Commedia. Composed during the nineteen years between Dante's banishment and death. He called it Commedia, because, though beginning harshly, it ends pleasantly, unlike tragedy, which, with a pleasing beginning, issues in a catastrophe. The term "divina" is a later addition; the original title is Inci pit Comedia Dantis Alighierii Florentini natione non moribus. "The subject of the whole work," he says, "taken literally, is the state of souls after death regarded as a matter of fact: taken allegorically, its subject is man, in so far as by merit or demerit in the exercise of free will he is exposed to the rewards or punishments of justice."

The composition of the poem is based upon the Ptolemaic system. The central point of the universe is the centre of the earth. The globe is divided into two equal hemispheres,—the eastern, of land; and the western, of water. Jerusalem is the centre of the land hemisphere; and the lowest point of Hell is directly under it, and forms the centre of gravity. Hell is in the form of a hollow inverted cone divided into nine concentric circles, each devoted to the punishment of a different class of sins. Purgatory is a lofty island-mountain in the western hemisphere, its shores washed by the western sea. From its base a path rises in a spiral of three circles, forming Ante-Purgatory, and terminating at the Gate of St. Peter, the entrance to Purgatory proper, a series of seven concentric terraces girding the mountain, and communicating with each other by steps in the rock. On each terrace one of the seven sins is expiated. The soul then emerges to the Earthly Paradise on the summit, where it bathes in the River Lethe, and drinks the waters of Eunoe, thus obliterating the memory of earthly sin and sorrow, and awakening the memory of good.
Above the Purgatorial Mount rise the nine heavens, each a hollow revolving sphere, enclosing and supporting all with the Primus Mobile, or Crystalline Heaven, which controls the motions of the lower spheres. Outside this is the Empty, the abode of God and of the saints, who, arranged in the form of a rose, surround a vast lake of light.

The poem consists of three parts, or cantice,—

Inferno, Purgatorio, Paradiso,—each part divided into thirty-three cantos in allusion to the years of Christ's earthly life. Dante, in the midst of his life-journey, finds himself astray in a gloomy and savage forest, where he is met by the shade of Virgil, sent by Beatrice to conduct him through the three worlds. Passing through the successive circles of Hell, they reach the apex, where Virgil sits, and, climbing by the shaggy hair of the fiend round his haunch, they pass the centre of gravity, and make their way to the shores of Purgatory. Ascending the steps on the sixth of which they are joined by the poet Statius, they reach the Earthly Paradise, where Virgil leaves Dante to the guidance of Beatrice, in whose company he ascends through the successive heavens to the presence of the Eternal.

The poem is written in the terza rima, the lines being hendecasyllabic. The scheme of rhyme consists of six lines, the rhyme falling on the first and third, the second and fourth, while the fifth introduces the basis of the next group of rhymes, interlocked with its predecessor by the sixth line, which retains the rhyme of the second and fourth. The poem is a picture of mediæval society at the end of the thirteenth and beginning of the fourteenth century. Its range of allusion is encyclopedic. Great is as Dante's pictorial power; his real sublimity is moral. He rises highest in depicting human character and human passion. The intense moral purpose of the Commedia divests even the hideous details of the Inferno of vulgarity. Under his pervading conception of man as the inheritor of a moral destiny, distinctions of time, race, and position, disappear, and classic heroes and mythical creations mingle with popes, martyrs, and Christian emperors. His terrible satire respects neither civil nor ecclesiastical dignity. The poem is packed with similes, allegories, portraits, historical and personal references, and theological and philosophical disquisitions. It is intensely personal, often egotistic, revealing the poet's consciousness of his own genius, tinged with the bitterness of his stern and deeply wounded spirit, and recording his cruel wrong and his coarsely scorned, yet revealing also the sympathy and tenderness of a great soul. No work "more faithfully depicts a noble character in its strength and dignity." Dante is impatient of vagueness. He is intensely realistic. In his pictures every space is measured, every region mapped, every dimension noted as in a schedule. His vividness is in certain places grows out of his determination to express his thought on all sides. In his sublime passages he is attentive to details. His similes are chosen without regard to their source, with the single view of illustrating his thought; and the most grotesque images appear amid the very sublimities of heaven. He unites a delicate sense of the beauty of his word to its wonderful power of expression.

The qualities of his genius are definiteness, intensity, sincerity, and brevity. The faults of the poem are grotesqueness and obscurity.

Dante as a politician, he represents the ideal of the Holy Roman Empire, a universal Christian monarchy, consisting of the Roman Empire and the Roman Church. As a theologian, he is the voice of mediæval faith, "the painter of its visions," and the exponent of the law of mankind doing in the light of mediæval creeds and in the terms of the scholastic philosophy.

As a man of letters, he is the founder of modern literature, and the creator of Italian poetry. He broke loose from the scholastic Latin of literary Europe, and out of the mass of Italian dialects created a noble, pure, universal Italian.

He is the first Christian poet. Christianity furnishes the main motive of the Commedia. The poem is the first great exponent of the struggle of the human will and the aspiration of the human soul toward God. Its highest ideal of beauty is Christian: it is pervaded with the sense of moral responsibility, moral destiny, and the sanctifying power of sorrow.

The literature is enormous. Vid. for bibliography FERRAZZI BASSANO, Manuale Danteesco (1865–71), and COLOMB DE BATIX, Bibliographia Danteasca, 2 vols., Prato, 1845–48.

DANZ, Johann Traugott Leberecht, b. at Weimar, May 31, 1769; d. at Jena, May 15, 1851; studied theology at Jena and Göttingen; was for many years rector of the Latin School of Jena; and became professor of theology in the university there in 1810, from which position he retired in 1837. He was an exceedingly prolific writer. His principal theological works are; Lehrbuch d. christ. Kirchengeschichte, Jena, 1818–26; Libri Symbolici Eccl. R.-C., dedicated to Gregory XVI., Paris, 1837. He was an exceedingly prolific writer. With this agree the Bibliarecord, which relates, that in the second year of his reign,—the date given to the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah,—Darius, having found in the palace at Ecabatana a decree of Cyrus ordering the building of the temple, renewed the order; and the work was resumed, money supplied for it, and in the sixth year it was finished (Ez. vii.). The Bible record implies piety, generosity, and wealth.

DARIUS (šahr), Greek Ahasior, Persian Dāra-γuš, Babylonian cuneiform Dāraγuš, meaning the restrainer, which was an epithet applied to a god or mighty king). Several kings of this name are mentioned in the Old Testament.

1. Darius the Mede (Dan. v. 31, etc.), "the son of Ahasuerus" (ix. 1). There is no mention of this character in profane history; but it would be rash to affirm that therefore he did not exist, since our knowledge of Babylonian affairs is far too defective. The Bible, which is yet unimpeached, and whose marvelous accuracy is attested by recent discoveries, makes him the immediate successor of Belshazzar, whom he slew, and king of the Chaldeans at sixty-two years of age, and therefore the immediate predecessor of Cyrus. But no satisfactory explanation of this Median interregnum has yet been given. Some would identify Darius the Mede with Cyaxares II. of Xenophon's Cyropædia (so Josephus, Antiq., x. 11, 4), who was the son and successor of Astyages, and uncle of Cyrus. If this identification, which is only one of many, stands, the notice of Darius's ascent to the throne is compatible with the taking of Babylon by Cyrus, who acted really as his lieutenant.

2. Darius, son of Hystaspes (in the Babylonian cuneiform Uastašpi), the founder of the Perso-Aryan dynasty, B.C. 521–486 (Ez. iv. 5, 24; Hag. i. 1, 15; Zech. i. 7). The principal of his cuneiform inscriptions (mostly trilingual) is the famous one at Behistun, which relates his dethronement of the magician Gaumata (Pseudo-Smerdis) and his six allies, and the overthrow of other rivals. Darius appears in these inscriptions as a very pious man. His reign was very prosperous. With this agrees the Bible record, which relates, that in the second year of his reign,—the date given to the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah,—Darius, having found in the palace at Ecabatana a decree of Cyrus ordering the building of the temple, renewed the order; and the work was resumed, money supplied for it, and in the sixth year it was finished (Ez. vii.). The Bible record implies piety, generosity, and wealth.

3. Darius the Persian (Neh. xii. 22), usually identified with Darius Codomannus, the antagonist of Alexander the Great, and who reigned from B.C. 336 to 330.

His chief work was Liber V. ex recensione textus Hebraei et versionum antiquarum Latinae versi, notisque philologicos et criticis illustrati, Halle, 1791, 6 vols.; besides this he edited Erasmus' Spicilegium latentium (Halle, 1782), vol. 1 of Glassius' Philologia Sacra (Leipzig, 1776), and Walton's Prolegomena (Leipzig, 1777). DAUB, Karl, b. at Cassel, March 20, 1705; studied at Marburg, and was appointed professor of theology in 1794, at Heidelberg, where he died Nov. 22, 1836. He was the founder of the speculative school of theology. But though the idea he pursued—a scientific argumentation of the Christian dogma as a necessary part, or, indeed, as the very kernel, of philosophical truth—has played a conspicuous part in the history of modern theology, the result of his individual efforts has fallen into oblivion. The rapid development of the German philosophy in his age caused him to change his basis repeatedly. In 1801 (Lehrbuch der Kaiselicheit) he is still with Kant; but in 1803 (Orthodoxie und Heterodoxie) he has left for Fichte, and in 1806 (Theologomena), he has already reached Schelling. Schelling he then follows for several years (Einleitungen in das Studium der Dogmatik, 1810); but in 1816 (Judas Ischariot) it is evident that he is steering towards Hegel, and in the Hegelian philosophy he finally anchors (Die dogmatische Theologie jetziger Zeit) 1833; and it is perhaps this circumstance, which, in spite of his great talent and genuine piety, gave to his speculation the aspect of a brilliant chimera. DAVENDANT, John, D.D., Dean of Cork; b. at Tracton Abbey, County Cork, Ireland, Aug. 23, 1832; d. at St. Anne's, Barney (six miles from Cork), Monday, June 17, 1875. He was graduated from Trinity College, entered holy orders, and, after faithful service elsewhere, was called to be rector of St. Matthias', Dublin, a most important charge. His wealth suggested great crowds, and his private labors drained his strength, but blessed many. He went about doing good. He was made Canon of St. Patrick's, and in 1875 Dean of Cork. His life was too busy for authorship. After his death, friends issued his six Donnellan Lectures, delivered in Dublin (The Person and Offices of the Holy Spirit, London, 1879), and compiled from his discourses The Morning of Life and Other Gleanings, Dublin, 1881. See F. R. Wynne: Spent in the Service, A Memoir of the Morning of Life, London, 1879, 3d ed., 1880.

DAVENANT, John, D.D., Bishop of Salisbury; b. in London about 1570; d. at Cambridge, April 20, 1641. He was made M.A. at Queen's College Cambridge, 1594, professor of theology, 1619, master of his college, 1631, president, 1639. He had, with three other divines, to the synod of Dort, 1618, raised to the see of Salisbury, 1621. He was a divine of great learning and piety. He wrote Expositio Epistolae D. Pauli ad Colossenses, Cambridge, 1627, trans., London, 1831, 2 vols.; Dissertationes due, de Morte Christi, et de Predestinatione, Cambridge, 1630; Projectiones, etc., Cambridge, 1631, trans., A Treatise on Justification..., London, 1844–48; 2 vols.; An Exhortation to Brotherly Communion between the Protestant Churches, Cambridge, 1641 (the Latin original appeared 1640). Fuller relates, that, when he was on his death-bed, "he thanked God for this his fatherly correction, because in all his lifetime he never had one heavy affliction, which made him often much suspect with himself whether he was a true child of God or no, until this his last sickness. Then he sweetly fell asleep in Christ, and so we softly draw the curtains about him." (Church History of Britain, Tegg's ed., vol. iii. p. 470).

DAVENPORT, Christopher (known as Francis cus à Sancta Clara), an English Romanist; b. in Coventry, 1598; d. May 31, 1680. He was educated at Oxford and Douay, entered the order of St. Francis, and became a missionary in England, and chaplain to Queen Henrietta Maria, wife of Charles I., and subsequently to Queen Catherine of Braganza, wife of Charles II. He was repeatedly chosen provincial of his order in England because of his zeal and ability in furthering the Roman-Catholic cause. His works were published at Douay, 1665, 2 vols. fol.

DAVENPORT, John, brother of the preceding; b. at Coventry, Eng., 1597; d. at Boston, Mass., March 15, 1670. He was educated at Oxford, and when nineteen years old began to preach in London, and eventually became rector of St. Stephen's, Coleman Street. He was great regard by his piety and learning. In 1626 he joined in a scheme to purchase impropriations (church lands in the hands of laymen), and "with the profits thereof," says Cotton Mather, "to maintain a constant, able, and painful ministry in those parts of the kingdom where there was most want of such a ministry. But Bishop Laud looking with a jealous eye on this undertaking, least it might in time give a secret growth to nonconformity, he obtained a bill to be inhibited in the exchequer court of criminal part referred unto was never prosecuted in the star-chamber, because the design was generally approved, and multitudes of discreet and devout men extremely resented the ruine of it." Soon after this he was converted to Puritan principles by John Cotton, and hence "fell under the notice and anger" of Laud; to avoid which in the fall of 1633 he went to Amsterdam, and became colleague to Mr. Paget. Here, however, his objection to the baptizing of children of non-professors was used against him; and in 1635 he retired to London. He was procured of the patent for the Massachusetts Colony (1628), although his name was not mentioned through fear of Laud's opposition, he finally set sail thither, and arrived in Boston June 26, 1637; but on March 30, 1638, he sailed... for Quinnipiack (now New Haven), where he started a new colony. For thirty years he served this people as pastor. With Cotton and Hooker he was invited to sit in the Westminster Assembly, but his congregation declined to allow him to go. In 1667 he was called to the First Church of Boston, and there died of apoplexy.

John Davenport was one of the great men of early New-England days who united learning with piety, and knowledge of men with kindness of heart. He was involved in all the general troubles of his day, compelled by his position to take part in the secular government no less than in the ecclesiastical. Thus in the beginning of New Haven Colony he was elected one of the "seven pillars" to support the civil government. He vigorously opposed the "Half-way Covenant" (see Congregationalism in the U.S.A.), and it was as the great champion of the old ideas that he was called to Boston. His reputation for learning caused the Indians to call him "So big study man." He wrote, however, comparatively little. See list in Dexter: Congregationalism as seen in its Literature, Appendix. Of most interest are The Saints Anchor-Hold in All Storms and Tempests (1661, 24mo, pp. viii, 232), and The Power of Congregational Churches Asserted and Vindicated (1672, 16mo, pp. x, 194). See Cotton Mather: Magnalia Christi Americana, Bk. III. chap. iv., ed. Hartford, 1855, vol. i. pp. 321–331.

DAVID (beloved), the youngest son of Jesse, of the tribe of Judah; b. in Bethlehem, according to the common reckoning, B.C. 1085; d. in Jerusalem B.C. 1015. While a fugitive from Saul, he headed a band of freebooters (1 Sam. xxii. 1, 2), whose centre of operation was the cave, or, if we read נֵבֶל instead of נֵבֶל, the stronghold of Adullam, either near the city of Adullam, in the low country of Judaea, about ten miles south-west from Jerusalem, or, according to tradition, in the Wady Khuritun, amid the mountains of Judaea, near Bethlehem. On the death of Saul, the tribe of Judah chose David king and he reigned for seven years at Hebron, while Ishbaal (Ishbo-sheth) had his capital at Mahanaim. The son of Saul gradually lost his hold on the allegiance of the ten tribes. The desertion of Abner brought matters to a climax, and after the murder of Ishbaal the twelve tribes came under David's sway (2 Sam. v.) Jerusalem was captured, and made the capital of the united kingdom. David was king in all forty years (B.C. 1055–15). His reign was prosperous and memorable. Israel possessed the Promised Land well nigh entirely. David gave them their first military organization (1 Chron. xxvii. 1 sqq.).

As a Psalmist.— Later Jewish tradition, as recorded in the Talmud, ascribes the entire book of the Psalms to David: modern critical scepticism denies that he wrote a single one. The truth lies between these extremes. The Hebrew titles in the Psalm ascribed to David seventy-three Psalms out of the hundred and fifty; the Septuagint, eighty-eight. Of these, many, no doubt, are not his; how many cannot be accurately determined. Ewald allows him to have written Ps. iii., iv., vii., xii., xvi., xxii., xxiii., cxiv., cxv., cxxi., cxxii., cxxiii., cxlvi., cxxv., cxviii., cxix., cxxii., cxviii., cxxix. To those in the Psalm should be added his dirge over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 19–27) and the two psalms in 2 Sam. xxii., xxiii., of which the first re-appears in a slightly altered form as Ps. xviii. The uncertainty as to the authorship of the different psalms necessitates their very cautious use as sources of his biography. He remains, however, the "Sweet Singer of Israel," and the "Father of Hebrew Psalmody." See Psalms.

Character.—"The character of David has been very differently judged. In his own day he was the idol of his people; to the subsequent prophets and priests he was the model king; to the later Jews, his kingdom typified the kingdom of the Messiah, of whom he was himself a type. His piety, his zeal for Jehovah, his tender compassion, his generous sympathy, his bold enterprise, his dauntless courage, entitle him to admiration. He is recognized as the worthy leader of the chosen people, and, next to Abraham, the Father of the Faithful, comes David, the man after God's own heart. Some writers, such as Bayle, Voltaire, and, in our day, Kuenen, have slighted David's claims upon the enthusiasm of the Church, and sought to emphasize his faults so that they might sneer at his religion. But the best refutation of this detraction is the Bible record, so free from flattery, so candid and comprehensive, and yet leaving the impression that its subject was a hero, a man cast in a rare mould. It should be borne in mind that his likeness is sketched with a fidelity unrivalled in antiquity. His sayings and doings fill well-nigh three entire books of the Old Testament, while references to him are found upon almost every page of the Bible. He comes before us in every light,—as shepherd, musician, champion, courtier, fugitive, chief, warrior, king: what life could be more varied? In a more domestic way he appears as obedient son, respectful younger brother, modest youth, ardent lover, faithful friend, tender husband, and indulgent father. All along the line of his development, private and public, his piety is marked. The psalms he wrote attest the depth of his love for God, and his unwavering confidence. His character was essentially the same from the days when under the glistering stars, as boyish poet, he sang, "The heavens declare the glory of Jehovah" (Ps. xix.), until the day when as aged monarch it was said of him, "The prayers of David, the son of Jesse, are ended" (Ps. lxxvi.). He was by no means perfect. He was compassed with infirmities; but he mourned his defections, and was pardoned. The struggle with his passionate nature, strong and proud, was kept up incessantly, and, though oft defeated, he conquered at last. The sins for which he is to-day mocked were precisely those of an Oriental king. He was the man after God's own heart, not in his sins, but in his repentance and in his earnest effort after a higher and purer life.

Criticism of the Text.—The narrative in the Books of Samuel, the Kings, and the Chronicles, is derived from different sources, official and traditional. Much attention has been given, especially of late, to the text; and, according to the critics, several errors of arrangement, and a few interpolations, are discoverable. But the changes demanded in the Hebrew text, so far as they conflict with the history of what is called xxii., xxiii., cxxiv., is recognized as the worthy leader of the chosen people, and, next to Abraham, the Father of the Faithful, comes David, the man after God's own heart. Some writers, such as Bayle, Voltaire, and, in our day, Kuenen, have slighted David's claims upon the enthusiasm of the Church, and sought to emphasize his faults so that they might sneer at his religion. But the best refutation of this detraction is the Bible record, so free from flattery, so candid and comprehensive, and yet leaving the impression that its subject was a hero, a man cast in a rare mould. The sins for which he is to-day mocked were precisely those of an Oriental king. He was the man after God's own heart, not in his sins, but in his repentance and in his earnest effort after a higher and purer life.

Criticism of the Text.—The narrative in the Books of Samuel, the Kings, and the Chronicles, is derived from different sources, official and traditional. Much attention has been given, especially of late, to the text; and, according to the critics, several errors of arrangement, and a few interpolations, are discoverable. But the changes demanded in the Hebrew text, so far as they conflict with the history of what is called xxii., xxiii., cxxiv., is recognized as the worthy leader of the chosen people, and, next to Abraham, the Father of the Faithful, comes David, the man after God's own heart. Some writers, such as Bayle, Voltaire, and, in our day, Kuenen, have slighted David's claims upon the enthusiasm of the Church, and sought to emphasize his faults so that they might sneer at his religion. But the best refutation of this detraction is the Bible record, so free from flattery, so candid and comprehensive, and yet leaving the impression that its subject was a hero, a man cast in a rare mould. It should be borne in mind that his likeness is sketched with a fidelity unrivalled in antiquity. His sayings and doings fill well-nigh three entire books of the Old Testament, while references to him are found upon almost every page of the Bible. He comes before us in every light,—as shepherd, musician, champion, courtier, fugitive, chief, warrior, king: what life could be more varied? In a more domestic way he appears as obedient son, respectful younger brother, modest youth, ardent lover, faithful friend, tender husband, and indulgent father. All along the line of his development, private and public, his piety is marked. The psalms he wrote attest the depth of his love for God, and his unwavering confidence. His character was essentially the same from the days when under the glistering stars, as boyish poet, he sang, "The heavens declare the glory of Jehovah" (Ps. xix.), until the day when as aged monarch it was said of him, "The prayers of David, the son of Jesse, are ended" (Ps. lxxvi.). He was by no means perfect. He was compassed with infirmities; but he mourned his defections, and was pardoned. The struggle with his passionate nature, strong and proud, was kept up incessantly, and, though oft defeated, he conquered at last. The sins for which he is to-day mocked were precisely those of an Oriental king. He was the man after God's own heart, not in his sins, but in his repentance and in his earnest effort after a higher and purer life.
story of Goliath (1 Sam. xvii.), the common text represents Saul as ignorant of David (xvii. 55–58); whereas, according to xvi. 19–23, David played before him, and was his armor-bearer. The best explanation of this difficulty is that David had grown out of Saul’s recognition. But a comparison of the Hebrew and the Septuagint shows that the latter omits xvii. 12–31, 55–xviii. 5. These verses read together like parts of an independent narrative of the same event. Accordingly, those who consider the Septuagint text purer than the Masoretic remove all difficulties in this narrative by omitting the verses referred to. It should, however, be remarked that such eminent Hebrew scholars as De Wette, Ewald, and Bleek, consider that the Hebrew text of the Goliath episode “has not been corrupted or interpolated, but that the two sections (from whatever source originally derived) form an integral part of the work as it came from the hand of the writer or compiler;” and also that we should be cautious in accepting the authority of the Septuagint upon this point; for we do not know what manuscripts it was before the Alexandrine translators, nor whether they were not willing, as in this case, to omit a portion of the original Hebrew text to secure a more consistent narrative.

At the same time, reverence for the word of God compels honest endeavor to obtain a pure text.

DAVID (Welsh Dewi), St., d. 601; the most eminent of Welsh saints, a semi-mythical personage, about whom nothing can be definitely asserted. Rev. Charles Hole, in Smith and Wace, Dict. Christ. Biogr., relates the story of his life, leaving out the fabulous element, thus: He spent ten years of his youth in the study of the Bible, and afterwards founded a monastery, which in memory of him is now called St. David’s. He won so high a reputation for theological learning, that the orthodox compelled him to leave his retirement to defend their side against the Pelagians in the synod of Breif. His wonderful success led to his election to the primacy of the British Church. Shortly after, he convened another synod for the same purpose,—to destroy Pelagianism,—and succeeded so grandly that the synod bore the name, “Synod of Victory.” Up to this time the diocesan system was not in existence. He was the first bishop of a metropolitan see, and the first to found a cathedral. He was the first to call his diocese by the title Civitas David.

It cost the author forty years of labor. In Amsterdam, 1618, a specimen was published, under the title Civitas David.

DAVID OF DINANT (so called from Dinant, a town in Belgium, on the Meuse) lived in the beginning of the thirteenth century; was Magister Artium and Theologe from the University of Paris, and stands as one of the most prominent representatives of that pantheistic tendency which now and then became very apparent during the middle ages. He is by some called a disciple of Amalric of Bena, and by others, his teacher. The truth seems to be, that the two systems, in spite of their internal resemblance, originated independently of each other. That of David is imperfectly known, however. His work, Quaterni, or Quaternuli, is lost: only fragments of it have come down to us through Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas. It was condemned by the synod of Paris (1209), and burnt (MARTENE, Studien und Kritiken, 1847, I. 2; HAURÉAU: De la phil. scholast., Paris, 1850, I. p. 414; JUNDT; Histoire du panthéisme populaire, Paris, 1853, p. 14.

DAVES, David, a distinguished Independent preacher of Wales; b. in Carmarthenshire, June, 1763; d. at Swansea, Dec. 16, 1816. After a short ministry at Trefach he went to Swansea, where his preaching revolutionized the morals of the town, but on being arrested for misanthropy, he was sent to prison. On his release, he renewed his ministration and seventy of his hymns have passed into Welsh hymn-books. E. FAXTON HOOD (Christmas Essays, London, 1881) devotes a chapter to Davies.

DAVES, Samuel, an eloquent Presbyterian preacher, and president of Princeton College; b. of Welsh ancestry, in New Castle County, Delaware, Nov. 3, 1724; d. at Princeton, Feb. 3, 1761. His father, to use his own words, was “one of the most eminent saints he ever knew upon earth.” He pursued classical studies under a minister, and subsequently in the school at Fagg’s Manor. In 1746 he entered upon his ministry at Hanover, Va., having received a governmental license to “officiate in and around Hanover at four meeting-houses.” His ministry was very successful, attracting people from great distances.
DAY, AND DIVISIONS OF TIME, AMONG THE HEBREWS. The Jewish day was reckoned from evening to evening, probably because of the use of a lunar calendar. The sabbath was the only day with a name: the others were simply numbered. The day was divided into morning, noon, and night (Ps. iv. 17), and also into six unequal parts, which were again subdivided: 1. Dawn, subdivided into gray dawn and rosy dawn. 2. Sunrise. 3. The heat of the day, about nine o'clock (1 Sam. xi. 11; Neh. vii. 3, etc.). 4. The two moons (Gen. xliii. 16; Deut. xxviii. 29). 5. The cool (lit. wind) of the day, before sunset (Gen. iii. 8). 6. Evening. The phrase “between the two evenings” of Exod. xii. 6, xxx. 8, probably means “between the beginning and end of sunset.”

Hours are first mentioned in the Bible in Dan. iii. 14, xix. 14 means the Paschal Friday, or the Friday of the Paschal Week. It was considered a proper day for solemn and joyous observance, and therefore was named in the calendar; and it was observed with great solemnity and festivity. The “Preparation of the Passover” in John xix. 14 means the Paschal Friday, or the Friday of the Passover. It was celebrated with great festivity, and was considered a proper day for solemn and joyous observance, and therefore was named in the calendar; and it was observed with great solemnity and festivity.

The Jews got their first sun-dial from Babylon. The Hebrews, however, were not uncommon among the Jews at that time. The diaconate grew out of a special emergency in the congregation of Jerusalem, in consequence of the complaint of the Hellenists, or Greek Jews, against the Hebrews, or Palestinian Jews, that their widows were neglected in the daily ministration (Exod. xxi. 26) or that of a sexton or beadle. DEACON.

primitive sense of the term; for, although they are not called "deacons" in the Acts (which never uses this term), their office is expressly described as an office of help (δοκινεῖ) or serving at the tables (δίκινος τραπέζιος, Acts 1. 2). An exegetical tradition is almost unanimously in favor of this view, and the latest and best commentators sustain it (comp. Meyer, Alford, Hackett, Lange-Leclerc, Jacobson, Howson and Spenke, on Acts vi. 3; also Lightfoot, Philippians, pp. 185 sqq.). In the ancient church the number seven was considered binding; and at Rome, for example, as late as the middle of the third century, there were only seven deacons, though the number of presbyters amounted to forty-six (Euseb., Hist. Eccl., vi. 43). There is indeed a difference between the apostolic and the ecclesiastical deacons, a difference which is acknowledged by Chrysostom, (Eccumenius, and others; but the latter were universally regarded as the legitimate successors of the former,—as much so as the presbyters were the successors of the presbyter-bishops of the New Testament,—notwithstanding the changes in their duties and relations.) But in the early days, as says Alford, on Acts vi. 3, "titles sprung out of realities, and were not mere hierarchical classifications."

(2) The Duties. The diaconate was instituted first for the care of the poor and the sick. Those who held the office were alms-distributers and nurses; the deacons for the male portion of the congregation, the deaconesses for the female. But this care was spiritual as well as temporal, and implied instruction and consolation as well as bodily relief; for Christian charity uses poverty and affliction as occasions for leading the soul to the source of all comfort. Hence Paul counts the help and ministrations (ἀναπηρίας) among the spiritual gifts (1 Cor. xii. 28). Hence the appointment of such men for the office of deacons as were of strong faith and exemplary piety (Acts vi. 3; 1 Tim. iii. 8 sqq.). The moral qualifications prescribed by Paul are essentially the same as those for the bishop (presbyter). Hence the transition from the diaconate to the presbyterate was easy and natural. Stephen preached, and prepared the way for Paul's ministry of the Gentiles; and Philip, another of the seven deacons of Jerusalem, subsequently labored as an evangelist (Acts viii. 4–50, xxi. 8). But they did this in the exercise of a special gift of preaching, which in the apostolic age was not confined to any particular office. The patriarchic interpreters understand the passage in 1 Tim. iii. 13, of promotion from the office of deacon to that of presbyter; but "the good standing" (κακός ἢδρος) which is gained by those who "have served well as deacons" refers to the honor rather than to the promotion. (See Wiesinger, Eliott, Pinnpre, and Speaker's Com. on 1 Tim. iii. 13.) We should not confound the liberty of the apostolic church with the fixed ecclesiastical order of a later age. In the fulness of the Holy Spirit, and under the guidance of inspired apostles, the church of the first century stood above the need of the mechanism of office, and divine charity was the leveller and equalizer of all class distinctions. The canonical age for deacon's order was reached the greater part of the business of the diocese. The canonical age for deacon's order was twenty-five, according to Num. viii. 24; but the Council of Trent reduced it to twenty-three (Sess. xxiii. cap. 12).

The diaconate was the necessary step to the priesthood. "Ex diacono ordinatur presbyter" (Jerome); but not all deacons were promoted to the second order. In the West they could not become priests if they continued in the marriage relation. The Council of Trent forbids marriage to all the clergy; the Greek Church, only to bishops.

III. Deacons in the Protestant Churches have different meanings and functions.

(1) In the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States they form part of the three sacred orders. The other constitutions have no deacons at all, and leave the charge of the temporalities of the church either to the lay elders, or to a board of trustees, who need not be communicant members, but simply pew-holders. See H. M. DEXTER, Congregationalism, Boston, 1876, pp. 191 seqq. (2) In the Church of England and the Presbyterian Churches deacons constitute an order in the ministry, as in the Episcopal Church, but without the jure divino theory of apostolical succession. They are elected by the annual conference, and ordained by the bishop. Their duties are, "1. To administer baptism, and to solemnize matrimony; 2. To assist the elder in administering the Lord's Supper; 3. To do all the duties of a travelling preacher." Travelling deacons must exercise their office for two years before they are eligible to the office of elder. Local deacons are eligible to the office of elder after preaching four years. In the Church of England the "diaconus" is merely a title, inherited from the Roman Church, of certain assistant clergymen and chaplains of subordinate rank, but equal standing with ordained ministers. In recent times they are often called second or third preacher or pastor. Luther dispensed with the diocesan diaconate and provided three deacons for the care of the poor and the church property (Works, XIII. 2464, ed. Walch). But in Germany the civil government has assumed the control of the ecclesiastical funds.

But in Germany the civil government has assumed the control of the ecclesiastical funds.

(4) In the Reformed Churches the apostolic diaconate was revived, as far as circumstances would permit, with different degrees of success. In the Reformation of the Church of Hessia (1526) it was prescribed that each pastor (episcopus) should have at least three deacons as assistants in the care of the poor. The Church of Basel in 1529 made a similar provision. Calvin regards the diaconate as one of the indispensable offices of the church, and the care of the poor (cura pauperum) as their proper duty (Instit. I. iv. c. 3, 9). The Reformed Confessions acknowledge this office (Conf. Gallicana, art. XXIX.). CONF. BELLIG. ART. XXX. In the Dutch and German Reformed Churches the deacons are to collect and to distribute the alms and other contributions for the relief of the poor, or the necessities of the congregation, and to provide for the support of the ministry of the gospel. The Presbyterian Church in the United States of America teaches, in its form of government (chap. vi.), "The Scriptures clearly point out deacons as distinct officers in the church, whose business it is to take care of the poor, and to distribute among them the collections which may be raised for their use. To them, also, may be properly committed the management of the temporal affairs of the church." But in practice this article is much disregarded, and many Presbyterian congregations have no deacons at all, and leave the charge of the temporalities of the church either to the lay elders, or to a board of trustees, who need not be communicant members, but simply pew-holders.

(5) In the Congregational or Independent churches the deacons are very important officers, and take the place of the lay elders in the Presbyterian churches. At first the Pilgrim Fathers of New England elected ruling elders; but the custom went into disuse, and their duties were divided between the pastor and the deacons.

The title of "diaconess" is without sufficient foundation. It would, in all probability, be surprising if Paul had fixed the sixth year for entering upon an office which must have demanded much labor and hardship. Nor can we agree with Neander, who finds here only a reference to the widows to be supported; for the widows of a younger age might be just as deserving of support. The reference is rather to admission to that which was subsequently known as the Order of Widows (τὴνα γυναῖκα). They held among their sex a relation something like that of the presbyters. (See Tit. ii. 3-4.) This order is attested by Irenaeus, Adv. Haeres. III. 34. 1. (Herr. 79, 4), Tertullian (De Virg. Vandalia, 9), etc. The eleventh canon of the synod of Laudicea, which abolished the office, calls them "Elder Widows" (vīduae seniorēs) in distinction from the deaconesses, who also soon received the name of widows. This interchange of apppellations is accounted for by the fact that deaconesses were at first selected from the widows. But they were not drawn exclusively from this class, much less from aged widows. "Tertullian speaks of a girl of twenty years being admitted to the order of widows (in viduitate). They were consecrated to their office by the laying-on of hands of the bishop and his blessing. The Nicene Council forbade this consecration in order to avoid giving the appearance as if the deaconess was consecrated to perform priestly functions (Epiph., Hær. 90, 3).

Their duties consisted in the care of the poor, sick, and imprisoned. In some churches they prepared the female catechumens for baptism (4th Council of Carthage, xii.) and assisted in the immersion of female believers (Const. Ap. viii. 28). The order of deaconesses, however, had not a protracted existence. The first synod of Orange (441) and that of Epaon (517), abolished it in France. The names “deaconess” and “archdeaconess” were for a time used in the Greek Church, only as designations of officers in convents. They are still found at Constantinople at the end of the twelfth century, aiding in the communion. The total disappearance of the deaconess is, to a large extent, due to the State’s having assumed the care of the poor and the sick, as also to the gradual introduction of infant baptism, and the administration of the rite by sprinkling, which made the assistance of women unnecessary.

HERZOG.

DEACONESSES, institution of, is of recent origin in the Protestant Church. Among the rare notices of the existence of deaconesses since the Reformation are those in connection with the church of Wesel from 1575 to 1610, and the Puri church of Amsterdam. In Gov. Bradford’s Conessions of Westphalia,” and opened a hospital and training institution at Kaiserswerth. This institution, which has grown to large proportions, educates three kinds of deaconesses. The first class are nurses, and devote themselves to the care of the sick, the poor, and the fallen in Magdalen asylums. The second dedicate themselves to teaching; and the third class, the parochial deaconesses, aid ministers in parish-work. The fundamental conditions of admittance to the diaconate (after the regular course of training) are Christian character and a strong constitution. Among the others are these: the candidate must be between eighteen and forty years of age, must be unmarried (or a widow), and must consecrate herself for five years to the office. The Kaiserswerth deaconesses take no vows, wear no crucifixes, and are distinguished by simplicity, but not necessarily the Roman idea of uniformity, of dress. One of the chief characteristics of the order is, that, unlike the sisterhoods of charity in the Roman Catholic Church, they are presided over by men.

Besides supplying many institutions in Germany, this institution on the Rhine has under its care many hospitals in foreign lands, and controls in the Protestant Church similar to the diocesan seminaries of Smyrna (1855), Florence (1860), etc. It has, moreover, become the mother of many similar training institutions in different parts of the world, — in Paris (1811), Strasbourg and St. Loup (1842), Dresden and Utrecht (1844), Berne (1845), Stockholm and Berlin (1847), etc. Miss Florence Nightingale went through a thorough course of training under Pastor Fliedner before taking charge of the Female Sanitarium in London; and Mrs. Fry, after a visit to Kaiserswerth, estabished the first English institution of the kind in Devonshire Square, London. The large North London Deaconesses’ Institute was formed on the Continental plan in 1861. In 1849 Pastor Fliedner brought with him to America four nurses, who became the nucleus, under the direction of Dr. Passavant, of an institution for deaconesses at Pittsburg. The statistics of 1881 for the whole order are 53 homes and 4,748 deaconesses at work in 1,436 stations.

DEAD.

xii.—The Sisterhood of St. John the Baptist at Clewer was founded in 1849, and devoted itself more especially to the reformation of fallen women. In his charge May 2, 1850, the Bishop of London emphatically commended the Kaiserswerth institution. Since that time, many sisterhoods, with various names, have been formed in England. The custom of putting a piece of the eucharistic bread as viaticum into the mouth of Christ, or the kiss, nor cover the dead either the eucharist or the kiss, nor cover the body with the velum or the altar-cloth (Hefele, Concilien-geschichte, vol. ii. p. 52); Carthage (third), A.D. 397; Auxerre, A.D. 578, "one must not give the dead either the eucharist or the kiss; nor cover the body with the velum or the altar-cloth." (Hefele, vol. iii. p. 49). The early Church the dean is the next ecclesiastic to the bishop. In general they are divided into deans of cathedrals and rural deans. The bishoprics of Sodor and Man, Liverpool, St. Albans, and Truro have no deans. The deaneries of the "Old Foundation," i.e., those of date prior to the Reformation, are elective: those of the "New Foundation," i.e., created by Henry VIII., are appointed by the crown. The jurisdiction of the dean is supreme in his cathedral in all matters except those which affect doctrine. The deans of Westminister and Windsor are independent of all superior ecclesiastical authority. (4) The rural deans of England are clergymen appointed by the bishop "to execute the bishop's processes, and inspect the lives and manners of the clergy and people within their jurisdiction" (Phillemore, Eccles. Law). The guilds of the middle ages had their deans, and the title is still given to an officer in some universities. The oldest cardinal is the dean of the Sacred College, and has an authority second only to the Pope.

DEAD, Communion of. In the ancient church the custom existed of putting a piece of the eucharistic bread as viaticum into the mouth of Christians who by sudden death had been prevented from communing. The proof of this statement is the prohibition of the practice by the following councils.—Hippo, A.D. 303 (Hefele, Concilien-geschichte, vol. ii. p. 62); Carthage (third), A.D. 397; Auxerre, A.D. 578, "one must not give the dead either the eucharist or the kiss; nor cover the body with the velum or the altar-cloth." (Hefele, vol. iii. p. 41). Quinisexta or Trullan Synod of Constantinople, can. 63 (Hefele, vol. iii. p. 311); to which Balasson adds, the bishops were given the eucharist after their death, to protect them from demons while on their way to heaven. This idea was at the bottom of the custom. Later, a piece of the eucharistic bread, instead of being put in the mouth of the corpse, was simply laid upon the breast, and buried with it. Gregory the Great tells, in the second book of his Dialogues, how Benedict of Nursia did this in the case of a monk who had left his monastery and gone home without permission, but in consequence had died on his return-journey, lest the earth should refuse to harbor his dead body. Another trace of the custom is found in the ninth century. The monk Yso relates that when the body of Óthmar, Abbot of St. Gallen, was moved, under his head and upon his breast were found round pieces of bread. Some of them were replaced, others preserved in a box as witness of the holiness of the man. Yso himself was ignorant of the object of the bread.—a proof how entirely the early custom had vanished even from memory. See C. J. W. AUGUSTI: Chriatliche Archäologie, VIII. 231 sqq.; IX. 590; JOSEPHUS, Antiq., vol. i. 425-427.

DEAN, from the Latin decanus, originally a military term designating the leader of a decania, or body of ten Roman soldiers. The word early acquired the more general meaning of overseer of a small number of inferiors. It was used in households for the overseers of slaves, and subsequently in Constantinople for police officials. The term, passing over into ecclesiastical usage, has had different applications. DEATH.

terrible. The "Portress of Hell-gate," who gave Death birth, says,—

. . . . "I fled, and cried out, 'Death!'

Hell trembled at the hideous name, and sighed
From all her caves, and back resounded: 'Death!'"

Par. Lost, ii. 785.

And again, at hearing Satan's plan of tempting the race,—

. . . . "And Death

Grinned horrible a ghastly smile, to hear
His famine should be filled," etc. Par. Lost, ii. 845.

In the Scriptures death is also personified, and described as intelligent (Job xxxviii. 22), as sitting on a pale horse (Rev. vi. 8), or cast with hell into the lake of fire (Rev. xx. 14). It has always excited man's fears. The very thought he has
on a pale horse (Rev. vi. 8), or cast with hell
mentioned in the departed's life. Scripturelikewiseexpresses in the lake of fire (Rev. xx. 14). It has always the expressions "perishing" (John iii. 15), and and the expression of the divine wrath (Ps. xcv. 7–10; Rom. ii.
"eternal punishment" (Matt. xxv. 46).

2. Origin of death. Sin and death are indissolubly associated together in the Old and New Testaments. Death is not merely the natural fruit of sin (Jas. i. 15), but its just punishment or wages (Gen. ii. 17; Rom. vi. 23), and expression of the divine wrath (Ps. xc. 7–10; Rom. ii.
that physical death was included in this penalty. The body is regarded as having been mortal before the fall. This view is in contradiction of the divine plan of creation (Ps. xxxi. 10; Eccles. iii. 20).
It must be regarded as a benignity for the righteous man (Num. xxiii. 10; Rom. vii. 24), but as a dread calamity to the impenitent, whom it ushers to his own place (Acts i. 25).— Physical death is a state of sin and darkness, in which we are alien ated from God, who is the fountain of life and light (1 John i. 5), and are consequently destitute of the true spiritual life. The whole world, at the coming of Christ, was sitting in the shadow of this death (Luke i. 70). All men, without exception, are dead in trespasses and sins (Eph. ii. 1, 5; Col. ii. 13; comp. Luke xv. 32). Our Lord became subject unto the death of the body, but was always in communion with the Father, and free from sin. The entrance upon a life of faith is called arising from the dead (Eph. v. 14), or becoming alive unto God (Rom. vi. 11). Spiritual death is not a stagnant condition, but a progressive state, the heart becoming more hardened, the eyes more blind (John xii. 49; Rom.
ii. 15), the conscience seared as with a hot iron (1 Tim. iv. 2), and the pleasure in lust and hatred of God increased (Rom. i. 26–31).— The second death is the complete ruin of the individual from the stand-point of God. The personality is not destroyed; but God's image is wholly defaced, and heavenly blessness forfeited. The soul suffers final shipwreck. This terrible doom of the second death is described under the figure of a lake burning with fire and brimstone, into which the finally impenitent are cast (Rev. xx. 14, xxii. 8). Those who overcome (Rev. ii. 11), and are partakers of the "first resurrection" (regeneration, comp.
Eph. v. 14, etc.), shall in no wise be hurt of it
(Rev. xx. 6). The same idea is expressed by the expressions "perishing" (John iii. 15), and
"eternal punishment" (Matt. xxv. 46).

DEATH, Dance of. A famous subject of art in the fifteenth century. Death, in the figure of a skeleton, is depicted in the company of representatives of every class of society. None are too holy, none too rich, none too powerful, to evade his presence. The artists introduced pope and clergy, emperor and aristocracy, as well as the artisan and beggar, into their pictures. The fell enemy is represented in the most various attitudes;
now harshly tugging at the victim, and now gently leading him; now walking arm in arm, and now beating him; now smiling as he politely guides him, now gloating, as with spear he transfixes the knight. An hour-glass is very generally found somewhere in the pictures. The Dance of Death was painted on the walls and windows of churches, on house-fronts, in illuminated books, and on bridges. The oldest are those of Minden (1486), Dijon (1486), and Basel (1441): the principal ones, those of Basel, Berne, and Erfurt. Moral and descriptive verses were frequently printed below the pictures, and usually closed with such sentences as, "Death awaits all," "Death awaits thee also," "Cruel Death is near," etc. Hans Holbein is the only painter of fame associated with these curious works of art. He, however, never went farther than to make sketches. These were engraved on wood by Lützelburger, and appeared at Lyons (1538), but, as Peignot says, are totally different in spirit from the representations in Basel. As might be expected, they were characterized by humor and poetic imagination.

DEBORAH (77º: a bee). (1) The nurse of Rebekah (Gen. xxxv. 8). (2) Judge and prophetess. She judged Israel from under a palm-tree in Mount Ephraim. All that we know of her is given in Judges (iv., v.). By her heroic example and suggestion she became the savior of her country from the yoke of Sisera, the Canaanitish king.
With great boldness she summoned Barak to strike against the oppressor. After securing her promise to go with him (iv. 8) to battle, he gathered together ten thousand men from the tribes of Zebulon and Naphtali. The battle was fought on the banks of the Kishon, and the Canaanites were completely routed. Their king, Sisera, leaping from his chariot, fled on foot. He was executed by the hand of Jael, the wife of Heber the house of Simeon and Siselkah, who put a nail in her head, and thus she killed him (Judg. iv. 19).

The Ten Commandments were inscribed on two tables of stone (Exod. xxxiv. 28; Deut. x. 4, etc.). It is recorded in Exod.
xx. 2–17 and Deut. v. 6–21. The only important variation in these accounts is the motive urged for the observance of the Sabbath. The account in Exodus recalls God's rest after the six days of creation; that of Deuteronomy looks back upon the bondage in Egypt. This variation in the letter is easily explained on the hypothesis that the same author wrote both records. There have been three arrangements of the Decalogue, — the Talmudic, the Augustinian (adopted by the Roman-Catholic and Lutheran churches), and the Hellenistic. The view of Philo, Josephus, Origen, the Greek and Reformed churches, etc. The following table exhibits the differences, the record in Exod. xx.

The Ten Commandments were inscribed on two tables of stone (Exod. xxxiv. 15). How were they distributed? The Parashas, or divisions for public reading in the Hebrew Bible, favor the division of three for the first table, seven for the second. This arrangement would give seventy-six words for the first, and ninety-six for the second. The contents, however, of the Commandments, outweigh this consideration, and favor five for each of the tables. The first table would then contain our duties to God, parents being represented as his representatives, or the so-called duties of piety; and the second table our duties to our neighbor, or the duties of probity. Paul's grouping (Rom. xiii. 9) seems to favor this division.

The Decalogue is the summary of God's will to Israel. Although its injunctions are negative rather than positive, and social rather than per-personal, yet they contain the whole duty of man in to the external act, there

Paul is right therefore in calling lust (Rom.
vi. 7) a violation of this Commandment. But in the code of the kingdom of God (Matt. v. 27-32) Christ made no distinction between committing adultery, and coveting a neighbor’s wife. The law for a people concerns the outward commission of sin: the law for the individual deals with it at its roots. The Commandment for the observance of the Sabbath, like the other Commandments, is a part of the eternal law of God. The life of man is to be an alternation between labor and rest, and he should set apart one day out of the seven for his spiritual interests, and to recruit his physical strength.

The circumstances under which the Ten Commandments were spoken give to it a unique and solemn authority above all the other legislation of the Mosaic code. Thunderings and lightnings attended its transmission (Exod. xix. 10); and it alone was preserved upon tablets of stone, which were inscribed by the very finger of the Almighty (Exod. xxxi. 18). There is a striking contrast between the contents of the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount. The former issue forth from the holiness and majesty of Jehovah, which cannot tolerate sin; the latter, from the love of Christ, who pities the sinner. The former addresses a sinful world, and demands absolute obedience; the latter are gracious and merciful in tone. The very surroundings in which the Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount were spoken bring out this contrast. Sinai itself is a silent though powerful sermon, preaching the terrible majesty of Jehovah. Its stern, lonely, and awful scenery was no less fit a place for the promulgation of the Law than the green banks of the Jordan. It is three times referred to in the Bible (Matt. iv.25; Mark v.20, vii.31).

DEGRADATION denoted in the ancient church a punishment by which the offender was moved from a higher to a lower grade of office: the presbyter became a deacon; the deacon, a sub-deacon, v. a. o. DE GRAFTIA. Following the example of Paul, who protests that he has been called to the apostleship by the "will of God," the bishops, as the successors of the apostles, very early began to use similar designsations of themselves. Felix of Rome (356) styled himself per gratiam Dei episcopus; and similar expressions—Dei or Christi nomine, miseratione, misericordia, etc.—soon became common among ecclesiastics. Afterwards also secular persons of high rank, kings, and dukes, adopted this style. Agilulf (581) called himself gratia Dominii, gratia regni, etc., and many others have used the phrase. The remedy for this state of affairs seems to lie in an absolute neglect of academic titles, or a limitation of their use to the institution which confers them, or an announcement of the source from which they are derived. DEISM.

Bible, rationalism, in that it accords to reason unrestricted authority to investigate and explain Christianity and its records.

De...Nourished in England in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and was an indirect product of the strife of parties within and without the pale of the Anglican Church. In this strife was engendered the impulse to find, outside of all, religious ground upon which all could unite. Some of these philosophers were also, to some extent, responsible for its rise. Bacon (d. 1626) laid down the principles of empiricism as the gauge of knowledge; and while he himself made a sharp distinction between knowledge and faith, philosophy and theology, others took up his principle, and applied it to theology as well as to philosophy. Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679) derived all knowledge from sense-perception and the reason (sensualism), affirmed that disinterested affection did not exist, accorded to the sovereign the highest official position in the Church, and denied that the contents of God's Word could ever be contrary to reason, though they might be above it. Hobbes has been called the "Grandfather of English freethinkers." John Locke (d. 1704) likewise affirmed the sovereign right of human reason to determine not only the reality, but the true meaning, of a revelation. Revelation cannot teach any thing contradictory of reason, but such things, however, as reason may not have itself discovered. That Christianity is not a product of reason, but in agreement with it, is the fundamental proposition of his work, The Reasonableness of Christianity (1693).

Of the Deists, properly so called, the first is Lord Herbert of Cherbury (1581-1648). In his two principal works, De Veritate (1624) and De Religione Gentilium (1645), he assigns to religion a high place, and designates it as the only distinguishing characteristic of man. He lays down five fundamental principles (notitia commones), of which he affirms the qualities of having been received at all times and in all places (semper et ubique). They are, (1) The existence of God, (2) Obligation to worship, (3) Virtue, the chief end of God's creatures, (4) Remission from sin, (5) Rewards and punishments in this life and the life to come. These five principles are sufficient for salvation, and independent of revelation (which he did not declare to be impossible, only not needed). The obscurantism of the pure and primitive religion based upon these principles, he attributes to the priests. — Lord Herbert was closely followed by Charles Blount (1654-93), in his Anima Mundi (1679), and his posthumous work, Oracles of Reason (1695). — John Toland (1670-1722) is the next figure, and his Christianity not Mysterious marks an epoch. He lays down the propositions that the teachings of the gospel are neither contrary to reason nor above it, and that Christianity contains nothing really mysterious (i.e., not before revealed). The mysteries in Scripture were not a part of Christianity in its original form, but Jewish and heathen excesses. In his Antinomy he suggests doubts of some of the records of the New Testament. — Anthony Collins (1676-1729) defended, in his Discourse of Freethinking (1713), free thought as a privilege which none had a right to suppress. He affirmed that the Scriptures allowed it, the prophets themselves of the Old Testament were great freethinkers, Christ exhorted to search the Scriptures, and Paul recognized this freedom of judgment by the use of the word parables. This book, which is written in a spirit of bitter hostility to the Church, called forth many works in reply, of which the most powerful was that of Richard Bentley. In his Discourse of the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion (1724), Collins again attacked by an application of Whiston's principle, that its main argument is prophecy and prophecy as interpreted allegorically. He affirms that the belief that Jesus was the Messiah was gotten, not from Christ, but based upon the Old Testament. If the argument from prophecy, so he reasoned, was strong, Christianity stood. But the argument depended upon an allegorical interpretation of prophecy. This was weak: hence the conclusion, which, however, is only inferentially found in this work. This attack upon the prophetic basis of Christianity was followed by an assault upon the miracles by Thomas Woolston (1669-1738). In his Discourses on Miracles (1727-30) he explains fifteen miracles, and finds in the suspicious look of the narratives, and the character of the persons introduced, grounds for the conclusion, that, taken literally, the narratives are absurd and incredible, and therefore are meant to have only a mystical sense. His ablest opponent was Sherlock, in his Trial of the Witnesses (1744). — The Earl of Shaftesbury (d. 1713) does not strictly belong to the Deists, but leans in that direction. In his Characteristics (1711) he attacked those who opposed Christianity covertly. According to him, its purpose was to advance morality. But Matthew Tindal (1656-1733), called by Skelton the "Great Apostle of Deism," represents deism in its highest development. In his Christianity as Old as the Creation he maintains the propositions that natural religion is absolutely perfect, and that Christianity is genuine only so far as it agrees with natural religion. In this sense both date from the creation. He defines religion to be the discipline of morality in obedience to the will of God, or as he elsewhere puts it, the "self conduct of the mind," and that this morality is perfect, and stands not in need of a revelation. This work may be called the Deist's Primer. — Thomas Chubb (1679-1747), a glove-maker, follows next. His work, The True Gospel of J. Christ Asserted, takes up the discourses, works, and commandments of Christ. The author comes to the conclusion that Christ enjoined only what reason commands; that his mission was to restore the true moral conception of life which Jewish and heathen folly had blunted; and that Christianity consists not of confession and assent, but of active morality. He reiterates the proposition of Tindal, that the gospel is identical with natural religion. — Thomas Morgan (d. 1743), in his Moral Philosopher, carried the deistical principle to the extreme, by affirming a deep chasm between the Old and New Testaments, criticizing the Old severely, and discarding the Old Testament and other doctrines of the New as corrupt dregs of Judaism. — Lord Bolingbroke's (1768-1751) works betray a low view of religion, which he regards purely as a handmaid of the State. In spite of his disclaimer to the title Deist, he, too, identifies Christianity with natural religion.
Finally, Doddwell the Younger, in his Christianity not Founded on Argument (1742), declares against all rational faith, and all attempts to ground faith in reason, and proves that it is not reason, but the gracious operation of the Holy Spirit, which can lead to genuine faith. In David Hume (1711–76), Deism, or the attempt to identify Christianity with natural religion, ran off into scepticism. But, while this was taking place, the Methodist revival came, and ushered in a better era of faith.

DE KOVEN, James, D.D., a leader of the High-Church party in the Episcopal Church; b. at Middletown, Conn., Sept. 19, 1831; d. at Racine, Wis., March 19, 1879. He was warden of Racine College from 1859 to his death. In 1875 he was elected Bishop of Illinois; but his extreme High-Church views prevented his confirmation. He was noted for eloquence of speech, and earnestness of manner. See the posthumous volume of his Sermons Preached on Various Occasions, with an Introduction by Morgan Dix, S. T. D., N.Y., 1880.

DELUCE. See NOAH.

DEMETRIUS is the name of three kings of Syria noticeable in Jewish history. — Demetrius I., Soter (Σωτήρ “the savior”), 162–150 B.C., was educated in Rome, whither he was sent as a hostage by his father, Seleucus IV. When Antiochus IV. died (104 B.C.), Demetrius claimed the crown; and when the Roman Senate preferred his cousin, Antiochus V., he fled from Rome, landed at Tripolis in Phoenicia, obtained the support of the people of Syria, put Antiochus V. to death, and took possession of the country. Once seated on the throne, he was recognized by the Romans; but difficulties soon arose. In the contest then raging in Judea, he took the side of the Greek party against the nationalists. He succeeded in establishing Alcimus as high priest in Jerusalem; but later on his generals, Nicanor and Bacchides, were repeatedly defeated by Judas Maccabaeus, and the latter finally concluded a treaty with Rome which expressly forbade Demetrius to interfere in the affairs of Judea. In other points, too, he ran counter against the Roman interests; and his violence and extravagance gradually turned the hearts of his own subjects away from him. When Alexander Balas stepped forward as pretender to the throne, Demetrius looked in vain around to find allies. Jonathan, the successor of Judas Maccabaeus, the Romans, etc., espoused the cause of Alexander; and Demetrius fell in the battle against him. — Demetrius II., Nicator (Νικάτωρ “the victor”), 147–127 B.C., and his successor, escaped to Cilicia under the usurpation of Alexander, but returned in 148, and defeated the usurper, though he was still supported by Jonathan. The relation betwen Demetrius and Jonathan, and Jonathan's successor, Simon, was always uncertain, for Demetrius was false and faithless; nevertheless, the Jews sided with him, and aided him materially during the rebellion of Tryphon. In 138 B.C. he invaded Parthia, but was taken prisoner, and kept in captivity for nearly ten years. Antiochus Sidetes, who in the mean time occupied the throne of Syria, also invaded Parthia; and, when Demetrius succeeded in defeating him, he returned to Syria, but was assassinated shortly after, perhaps by his wife Cleopatra. — Demetriaus II., Eucerus (Εὐκεροῦς), 94–88 B.C., a grandson of Demetrius Nicator; became King of Syria, together with his brother Philip, after the death of Antiochus Eusebes. He defeated Alexander Janneus, but was prevented from any further interference in Jewish politics by the breaking-out of a war between him and his brother. He was defeated, and sent to Parthia, where he was detained in captivity till his death. — The history of Demetrius I. and II. is told in the Books of the Maccabees; that of Demetrius III., in Josephus: Ant. XIII.

DEMETRIUS, Bishop of Alexandria from 189 to 231; took a vivid interest in the catechetical school, and appointed Origen teacher when Clement left (203). Afterwards he sent Origen on an important mission to the Roman governor of Arabia; but the friendship between them was finally transformed into open opposition. In 228 Origen was ordained presbyter at Cesarea; but in 231 Demetrius excommunicated him. See Origen.

DEMETRIUS CYDONIUS, a Greek theologian of the fourteenth century; was b. at Thessalonica or Constantinople; occupied a prominent position at the court of John Cantacuzenus, and retired with him from public life, and became monk in 1355. Afterwards he went to Milan to study the Latin language and theology, and spent the latter part of his life at Cyclone in Crete; d. after 1384. He has written and translated much, but most of his works remain in manuscript. Of his Greek translation of the Summa of Thomas Aquinas, one part, De contemmendam morte, has been edited by R. SIEBER, Basel, 1565, and KUINDEL, Leipzig, 1786. His Monodia was published in Latin and Greek by CANISIUS in his Minoriae post Theophanem; and his De processione Spiritus Sancti was translated into Latin by CANISIUS, in his Lectiones Antiquae, Ingolstadt, 1604.

DEMISSION. The name, in Scotch Presbyterian churches, for the act whereby a minister resigns his charge.

DEMIGRACE. See GNOSTICISM.

DEMME, Charles Rudolph, D.D., an eminent Lutheran minister; b. at Mühlhausen, Thuringia, April 10, 1795; d. in Philadelphia, Sept. 1, 1863. He was severely wounded in the battle of Waterloo; on recovery he studied theology; emigrated to America (1815), rose to distinction, and from 1825 to 1859 he was chief pastor of St. Michael's and St. Zion's churches, Philadelphia. He edited a German translation of Josephus, adding numerous and valuable notes.

DEMONIACS. 624 DEMONIACS.

Greek, Homer (Il., xvii. 98, 99) uses the term interchangementally with ἄνεγος, a god. Somewhat later in Hesiod the demons are beings intermediate between the gods and men (Op. 121). Plato (Symp., p. 202) fixes the term in this sense, and enumerates as among their number the departed spirits of good men. It was believed that they became tutelary genii, who presided over individual destiny. Socrates speaks constantly of his demon. In the Septuagint the word is employed to represent the Hebrew words "gods" (Ps. xxv. 8), "devils" (Deut. xxiii. 17), "pestilence" (Ps. xci. 6), etc. In Josephus it is always used of evil spirits. He defines demons to be the spirits of the wicked (De Bell. Jud., vii. 6, 3). In the New Testament the term is employed several times in the general sense of heathen deities (Acts xvii. 18; 1 Cor. x. 20); but as a rule the term is used for evil spirits who believe and tremble (Jas. ii. 19), recognize Jesus to be the Son of God (Matt. xxi. 29), and are the agents of Satan (Matt. xii. 24). See DEMONIACS.

DEMONIACS. Among the most striking miracles of our Lord were the cures of those possessed with demons. The condition of these unfortunate persons calls our attention to the activity of the powers of darkness in the world and the connection of human life with a terrible realm of fallen spirits. This class of cases is known neither to the Hebrew Scriptures nor [with some doubtful exceptions] to post-apostolic times.

1. The representations of the New Testament. Persons under the influence of demons are said to be "possessed with demons" (Matt. iv. 24, etc., Greek διαμοῖναι, or "vexed with unclean spirits" (Luke vi. 18, etc., ἑνοχλοῦσιν, etc.). The spirits which produce this condition are called "demons" (Matt. x. 8, etc.), "spirits" (Matt. viii. 16, etc.), and "unclean spirits" (Matt. x. 1). The cure, with allusion to the demons, is termed "casting out" (Matt. xii. 10), and, with allusion to the victims, "healing" (Luke vi. 18, θεραπεύειν; Matt. xv. 38, λάθσω). These various terms are of themselves a sufficient evidence that the New-Testament authors did not intend to designate a mere bodily disease. The demons are the bad spirits who compose the realm of darkness, and serve Satan. This is clearly taught in the passage (Matt. xii. 24–29) in which Beelzebub is called the prince of demons. The influence of the demons upon their victims was made evident in every case by affections of the body. The soul has lost its control of the body. Between the two a foreign influence has injected itself, which acts deleteriously upon the bodily organs of the soul. But nowhere does the demon take the possession of the soul. It does not take up its habitation in the soul, nor exert its influence directly upon the spiritual nature. It attacks first the nervous system, and works through it, producing the same symptoms as are produced by other agencies disturbing the bodily organism. Demonic possession is not exerted through the spiritual upon the moral nature (this was the way in which Judas was affected, who, however, was not possessed with a demon,— John xiii. 27), but through the physical upon the rational nature. The demonized state showed itself in a kind of clairvoyance, the demons recognizing Christ to be the Son of God (Luke iv. 34), in insanity (Mark v. 8 sqq.; Luke viii. 27), epilepsy (Luke ix. 4), dullness (Matt. ix. 32, xii. 22), lameness (Luke xiii. 11), and blindness (Matt. xiii. 22). In all these cases the victim, as well as his acquaintances, attributes the unnatural state to demonic agency. If the demonic influence was in the first instance physical, the question arises, whether, perchance, the cause of the infirmity is not to be looked for in moral offences. The case of the lunatic boy settles the question in the negative, and shows that the two were not necessarily connected. He was possessed from childhood. Demonic possession is, therefore, a misfortune which results from the fall and sinful condition of the race, and originates in the disturbing agency of dark powers upon a soul which is powerless to resist. Our Lord's cures of this infirmity were effected by a command directed to the demon (Matt. viii. 10). He gave the disciples power to do the same (Matt. x. 1); and even Jews who did not believe in him seem to have exercised it (Matt. xii. 27). Josephus (De Bell. J., vii. 6, 3) mentions the formulas and roots which were used by the Jews, and which were reported to have come down from Solomon. In this connection it is well to notice that the demons usually tore their victims as they were about to be cast out (Mark ix. 20), and the victims trembled for fear of the cure (Mark v. 7).

2. Down to the eighteenth century the view prevailed universally that satanic agency was exercised, and produced the infirmities attributed to demons in the New Testament. There was a difference of opinion about the origin of the demons, some holding that they were the souls of departed men (Philostratus, Apoll., I. 18); others, that they were the spirits of the giants who perished in the flood (Pseudo-Clementines, viii. 18); and still others, that they were fallen angels. In the middle ages it was held that they still pursued and possessed men; and the great question was upon the power of exorcism. In the eighteenth century there came a violent change, which can hardly excite surprise when the trials of the witches of the preceding two centuries are remembered. Hobbes (Leviathan) was the first to express doubts. He was followed by Lardner (1758) and Farmer (1775) in England, and Semler (1760) in Germany. The latter made the express statement, that demoniacal possession was nothing more than insanity, or some other natural disease. From him the view passed into all rationalistic commentaries. That diseases accompanied demoniacal possession there can be no doubt; but the question is, whether the diseases are to be attributed to demonic as well as the demon. Reference has been made to the belief in demonic possession prevalent in the heathen world before and at the time of Christ, and the conclusion drawn that it was a mere superstition of the time. Many of the instances referred to, as the excitement of the Corybantes and Bacchanals (Herodot., iv. 79, Eurip., Bacch., 293 sq.), have nothing analogous to the possession of the New Testament, which was involuntary. However, it is plain from the above reference to Josephus, that the Jews knew of persons so afflicted, and that the heathen also attempted to expel evil spirits with formulas of exorcism (Plutarch, Sympos., vii. 5, and Lucian, Philop., 16). But, even if these were not real cases, they do not prove those of the New Testament to be false. Alongside of the light of revelation in Israel went the twilight of heathendom, and at the side of prophecy those human anticipations which concealed an element of the truth. On the other hand, if it be granted that no cases of the kind occur now, this cannot disprove their real existence. Refuge is also had to the explanation that Christ accommodated himself to the view current in his day. They were purely physical maladies; but they were popularly held to be the result of demonic agency, and Jesus fell in with the belief. But, leaving aside the argument that such a method of procedure is at odd with the principles of physiology, there are passages which are wholly inconsistent with this explanation. In Luke xi. 17–26 he makes demonic agency the subject of a didactic discourse. And again: he not only never speaks a word to discourage the popular belief, but repeatedly speaks on the presumption that such agency was the immediate cause of infirmities (Matt. x. 8, xvii. 21; Luke x. 17 sqq.). Some, feeling the force of these considerations, have, passing beyond the theory of accommodation, affirmed that Jesus, as well as his contemporaries, was concerned as to the nature of the diseases (Paulus). Christ, who is the truth, teaches that there is a kingdom of darkness. On rational grounds nothing can be said in objection to the doctrine promulgated by him, that this kingdom is composed of beings of other nature than our own, who, having fallen into sin, now employ their powers against God and man. Experience confirms what Jesus has taught, that they influence our moral freedom. Passing one step further, it can hardly be contested, that, in addition to this agency upon man's spiritual nature, they may act through his physical nature upon his rational soul.

3. The teaching of the New Testament about the victims of demonic possession is not in contradiction to the principles of physiology. It is a well-ascertained fact that the soul, with its desires, and power of volition, exerts its influence on the body, and is less influenced by it. A fever, for example, attacking the body of a pious man, poisons the blood of the brain, and thus affects the soul, till it is filled with the most insane fancies. Through dyspepsia men become gloomy and despondent frequently a spiritual malady is removed by removing a bodily complaint. With these facts, and the well-known facts of animal magnetism before us, the agency of demons becomes intelligible. If effects between man and man can be produced by animal magnetism, and the diseases of the body can produce disturbances of the soul, so the belief in another world may influence and disturb both the physical and rational natures of man.

DEMPSTER, John, an eminent Methodist educator; b. in Florida, Fulton County, N. Y., Jan. 2, 1794; d. at Evanston, Ill., Nov. 28, 1863. He was admitted into the Methodist General Conference in 1816. From 1847 to 1854 he was professor in the Biblical Institute, which he founded, first at Newbury, Vt., soon afterwards removed to Concord, N.H., and now at Boston as the School of Theology, Boston University. From 1855 till his death, he was professor in the Garrett Biblical Institute, Evanston, Ill. "The great work of his life was the organization of theological seminaries in the Methodist-Episcopal Church. After eighteen years of labor he published two of these (Concord and Evanston), and fully established as the fruit of his own industry, energy, and perseverance." The only volume of his published is Lectures and Addresses, Cincinnati, 1864.

DEMPSTER, Thomas, a Scotch writer, b. at Cliftbog, Aberdeenshire, Aug. 25, 1579; d. near Bologna, Sept. 6, 1625. He studied at Cambridge and Paris, and was professor at Pisa and Bologna. He stood high in papal favor, and was remarkably gifted. His chief work is Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum, a biographical dictionary of Scotchmen,—every curious book, more remarkable for its fictions than for its facts; for he has not hesitated to claim as Scotchmen authors who never saw Scotland, and to describe minutely the lives of imaginary persons.

DENCOR, J., a man of one of the unruly elements which disturbed and impeded the movement of the Reformation; is first known as rector of a school in Basel, whence he moved, in 1523, to Nuremberg, on the recommendation of Ecclamadius, as rector of the school of St. Sebastian. In Nuremberg, however, he immediately began to preach openly the wild ideas he had adopted from Thomas Müntzer and the Anabaptists; and in 1524 he was expelled from the city. In 1525 he was also expelled from Augsburg, in 1526 from Strassburg, in 1527 from Worms. By the influence of Ecclamadius he was allowed to return to Basel; and there he died, from the plague, in November, 1527. In connection with L. Haetzler he translated the prophetic books of the Old Testament, Worms, 1527; and the translation has its value. See HEBERLE, in Studien und Kritiken, 1851, 1, and 1856, 1.

DENIS, St., the first bishop of Paris, the apostle of the Franks, and the patron-saint of France; came to Gaul about 250,—according to Gregory of Tours (d. 593), Hist. Frank. I. 28,—and died by the sword, in Paris, probably under Aurelian (272). According to the Acts of the martyrs, also dating from the 4th century (Act. Sanct., Oct. 9), he was sent into the country by Bishop Clement of Rome, and was accompanied by Rusticus, a priest, and Eleutherius, a deacon. In Paris they were all three tortured and beheaded, and thrown into the Seine; but their corpses were rescued by a pious woman, and interred in a church near by, on the Montmartre (Mons Martyrum, as tradition has it; though Mons Mercurii was the original name of the place). See Davin, La Tradicion sur le premier Tombeau de St. Denis, Paris, 1876. Thence the relics were brought to the afterwards so famous Abbey of St. Denis, founded in the middle of the seventh century by Dagobert I., and consecrated to the memory of the apostle of the nation over which he ruled,—the Franks. In the first half of the ninth century, Hilduin, Abbot of St. Denis, wrote, at the request of Louis the Pious, a life of the saint (Patrol. Latina, cvi. 23); and here, for the first time, St. Denis is identified with Dionysius the Areopagite. But all that great and admirable activity which the Abbey of St. Denis developed in the field of French history from the ninth to the fourteenth century is concentrated upon the idea that Dionysius the Areopagite is the patron-saint of France, the star of French history. Abelard had his doubts, but was whipped instantly through the whole people, and, at the Diet of Copenhagen (1536), the Roman-Catholic Church was quietly abolished; its whole authority, spiritual and secular, was abrogated, and vested in the crown; all its property was confiscated; its friars were dismissed, its mendicants and the nobility; and the bishops themselves, all but one, signed the instrument of the transaction.

In Denmark the period of the Reformation was one of new beginnings in almost every field of human life. But the spring was very short, and there came no new current of intolerance set in. Protestants of the French Reformed Church, who sought refuge in the country, were rudely driven away; and a royal ordinance of 1580 made death the penalty for introducing formulas enough, but no life; much disputation, but without ideas; and the learned parson, who put poor people in the stocks, and fined the rich, endured little too much "blood" and "wounds" in their preaching, and a little too much prohibition and punishment in their discipline; but they brought life. They closed the theatres, tethered literature, put poor people in the stocks, and fined the rich ones, when they did not go to church twice every Sunday, etc. But they brought with them the Confirmation, which proved one of the noblest moral agencies in Danish society, and a new kind of hymns, which melted the indifference of the preceding century into enthusiasm, though of a somewhat sentimental description. How deep an impression the Pietists made became apparent from their encounter with the rationalists. Rationalism was also a foreign importation, but from France, rather than from Germany, and reached Denmark in the latter part of the eighteenth century. The radicals among the party proposed to use the interdicts against the clergy, and employ the ministers as lecturers on agriculture and political economy; but such propositions had, of course, no other effect than producing some scandal and laughter. The radicals among the party proposed to use the interdicts against the clergy, and employ the ministers as lecturers on agriculture and political economy; but such propositions had, of course, no other effect than producing some scandal and laughter. Quite otherwise with the milder, more cautious, and more dignified form of rationalism, with its fine artistic taste, and broad scientific sense. It took possession of the church and the school; and, wheresoever it came in conflict with the pietism of the peasants, it used force. See article on BALLE.

The overthrow of rationalism in Denmark, in the third decade of the present century, took place with an almost dramatic effect. Its chief representative, H. N. Clausen, a young man, but a man of great ability, was professor of theology in the university, and stood as the acknowledged teacher of the Danish Church. Suddenly he was most violently attacked by N. F. S. Grundtvig, then a minister in the church. Grundtvig was an offshoot of the pietists; but the old, narrow, and somewhat low-bred pietism was here transmuted with the young enthusiasm of the Romantic school, and stood as a stronghold of the instinct of liberty and democracy. It was not the old family pietism, whose exclusiveness was almost sure to run counter to any form of an established church, but a grand idea of the will of God, which demanded a whole people for its realization. See article on GRUNDTVIG. The controversy ended with a lawsuit (1827). Grundtvig was suspended, forbidden to perform any of the offices of the Christian ministry, put under royal censorship, etc. Then the contest began. Clausen's victory produced just heat enough in the hearts of his adversaries to allow Grundtvig's ideas to germinate; and a party began immediately to form. In 1840 it was necessary to reinstate Grundtvig in his office. In 1850 it was evident that the Danish people was going to be long to him, whatsoever might become of the Danish Church. Before he died, his pupils held the freer constitution of June 5, 1849.

DENSC, Peter, b. at Boom in Belgium, 1690; d. at Malines as archbishop of St. Rumold's Church, Feb. 15, 1775; was the author of a Theologia Moralis et Dogmatica, which was often reprinted (e.g. Dublin, 1832, 4 vols.), and much used as a textbook in Roman-Catholic seminaries. See J. F. Berz: Synopsis of the Theology of Peter Dens, Philadelphia, 1846, 4th ed. 1869.

DENUNCIATIO EVANGELICA, a term of canon law and Roman-Catholic morals, means the denunciation of sin before an ecclesiastical authority. But as every civil case—for instance, the non-payment of a debt—may be conceived of as a sin, it may, according to the principle involved in the denunciation evangelica, be drawn into an ecclesiastical court.

DEPOSITION, a term of canon law, which, in the ancient church, meant the deprivation not only of benefice and office, but also of orders, but which, from the beginning of the twelfth century, came to mean, in contradistinction to degradation, a simple deprivation of benefice and office, but not of orders. After deposition, re-statement is possible, but after degradation not. In some free Protestant churches, however, not dependent on State authority, degradation and deposition are synonymous. See DEGRADATION.

DEPRIVATION "the taking-away" (depratio), for cause, of a clergyman of the Church of England from his preferment. There are two sorts of deprivations,—depratio ab officio, deprivation of clerical standing, or degradation (which see).

DEPUTATUS, in the Greek Church (demukax), means a lower class of ecclesiastics, who, on solemn occasions, accompany the bishops or deacons with lighted tapers, but form no special order themselves. In the Roman Church, deputati occur as directors of regiunculae. As the diocese is divided into deaneries, so the larger deaneries are sometimes divided into regiunculae; and the director or superintendent of such a division, the deputatus, is generally subject to the authority of the dean, though, in some cases, he ranks immediately under the bishop, and the dean is simply primus inter pares.

DERESER, Thaddäus Anton, b. Feb. 9, 1737, at Fahr in Franconia; d. July 16, 1827, at Breslau; studied philosophy and theology at Würzburg and Heidelberg; was ordained a priest (1780), and appointed professor of Oriental languages in the University of Heidelberg. In 1790 to Strassburg, in 1797 to Heidelberg, and in 1807 to Freiburg. In 1810 he was made parish priest at Carlsruhe, but was dismissed in 1811, on account of a funeral sermon over the Grand Duke of Bade; became professor at the Lyceum of Luzern in 1811, but was suddenly discharged in 1814, and was in 1815 made professor in Breslan. He belonged to the liberal wing of the Roman Church, and his Tu es Petrus (1790) was put on the Index. He published commentaries, and a translation of the Old Testament.

DERVISH, or DERVESE, a Persian word, signifying “the sill of the door,” or those who beg from door to door. Dervishes are a Mohammedan approach to Christian monks, while the ulema are the secular clergy. They are bound by oaths of poverty, chastity, and humility, and live together in communities, under the headship of a sheik. But, unlike monks, some of them are allowed to marry, and live outside of the convent, although they must pass at least two nights of every week within. There are numerous orders of dervishes, the largest and most popular being the Mevlevi (from Mevlevi Jelal ed-Din el-Rumi, a Persian poet of the thirteenth century) and the Rifa'i (from Sheikh Ahmed Rifa'i, who dates from 1182), called by travellers the “whirlers” or “dancers,” and the “howlers,” respectively. The former is joined by persons of the highest rank; but, if they do not go beyond the first stage, they may meet all requirements by saying a few prayers at home, and wearing the blackest robe and the taj, or white cap. The public services they conduct are certainly fanatical, and yet witnessed by the people with the utmost decorum and solemnity. The Dancing Dervishes, dressed in white flowing gowns, and with high white hats of stiff woven stuff, after preliminary exercises of prayer and prostration, whirl around upon the left heel to the music of flutes and tambourines, ring within ring, without touching each other, their hands outstretched, their eyes half closed, and the faces fanatically illuminated, all the time quietly but closely watched by the sheik. They keep up this extraordinary performance, with brief intervals of rest, for an hour, and give a performance once a week. The Howling Dervishes, either in line or a ring, sway themselves backward and forward, crying incessantly and with all their might, “La ilahá ill'Alláh” (“No God but Allah”), until they drop from sheer exhaustion. It is a wild spectacle, which, to a European, has neither dignity nor grace, but impresses one with the tremendous power of fanaticism.

Besides the members of the regular orders, there are many dervishes in the Mohammedan world who wander about and support themselves, and even acquire great wealth, by their incantations, feasts of legerdemain, and other kinds of more or less conscious imposture. The dervishes as a class have great power among the people, but are dreaded by the sultans, because they do not recognize the legal exposition of the Koran, nor acknowledge the authority of any other than their spiritual chief, or of Allah himself speaking directly to them. See J. P. Brown: History of the Dervishes, Philadelphia, 1868; Osman-Bey: Les Imams et les Derviches, pratiques, superstitions et meurs des Turcs, Paris, 1851.

DE SALES. The French mystic, Antoine de Sainte-Flour, called Louis de Sales, born at Sales, March 21, 1567, and d. at Genoa, Aug. 25, 1622, was one of the most famous of the spiritual missionaries of the three hundred years of the Reformation. His Meditations, Paris, 1616, and the Life, Eng., Nov. 27, 1657; d. at Upminster, where he had been rector since 1689, April 5, 1735. He was graduated from Oxford, 1675, made F.R.S., 1702, canon of Windsor, 1716, D.D., Oxford, 1730. He was the author of the once famous Physico-theology, London, 1713 (the substance of his Boyle Lectures for 1711, 1712), new ed., 1708, 2 vols., French trans., Rotterdam, 1726, German trans., Hamburg, 1730; Astro-theology, London, 1714, 4th ed., 1726, French trans., Paris, 1729, German trans., Hamburg, 1765: Christo-theology (a sermon on Acts xxvi. 29), London, 1730; and A Defence of the Church's Right in Leasehold Estates, London, 1731. DESCARTES, René (Renatus Cartesius) was b. at La Haye in Touraine, March 30, 1596, and d. in Stockholm, Feb. 11, 1650. He received his first education in the College of the Jesuits, at La Flèche, and served afterwards (1617-22), first under Maurice of Nassau, then under Maximilian of Bavaria, and finally under Tilly, not from any passion for war, but in order to gather knowledge of men and manners. In the latter part of his life he travelled much, for the same purpose. He visited Italy and Denmark, England and Hungary. His home he fixed in Holland (from 1629), for the sake, he says himself, of that quiet and seclusion which he found necessary for a meditative life, but more probably in order to be safely out of the reach of the Roman-Catholic Church. In 1649 he went to Stockholm on the invitation of Queen Christina, the eccentric daughter of Gustavus Adolphus.

In pursuance of the principle of enumeris est dubitandum (“you shall doubt about every thing”), Descartes arrived at his cogito ergo sum (“I am, therefore I exist”) as an ultimate fact of consciousness which cannot be doubted. From this point of primary unity between thought and being,—the corner-stone of the ontological evidence of the existence of God,—he developed a system of unmitigated dualism. In man, for instance, soul and body touch each other only at one single point, the pineal gland of the brain, and animals are mere machines; a doctrine which, with some of his disciples,—the physician Delaforge, the theologian Malebranche, etc.,—gave rise to very singular conceptions. In the social circles of Paris his philosophy was received with great enthusiasm. The Duke de Luynes translated his Latin writings into French, and Rohant’s lectures were frequented by ladies and gentlemen of the highest rank. The congregations also accepted it; that of the Oratory, Bérulle, Malebranche, etc.; that of Port Royal, Arnauld, Nicole, etc. The Jesuits, however, proved averse; and at their instance the Roman curia forbade the printing and reading of Descartes’ writings. In France the prohibition was enforced by a royal decree; but it fell soon into desert, as many of the most prominent characters of the Gallican Church, Bossuet, Fénelon, etc., were Cartesian. In Holland, too, Descartes’ philosophy exercised considerable influence on theology; though at one time it was accused of being atheistic, and generally was confounded with the views of Cocceius. When, however, Descartes’ doctrine of vortices had been completely superseded by Newton, and his views of innate ideas were abandoned for those of Hobbes and Locke, Cartesianism gradually lost all direct influence, and lived on only through its continuators, Leibnitz, Wolff, etc.

DESER T is the English equivalent in the Authorized Version for four Hebrew words, no one of which means “a sandy waste,” but, on the contrary, simply “untilled pasture-land, which may be covered with a luxuriant vegetation.” The four words are: 1. Arabah (חָרָה), the name of the remarkable depression which runs from the Sea of Galilee to the Gulf of Akabah; this tract, though now waste and parched, is capable of cultivation (the Hebrew word occurs only in the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel); 2. Midbar (מִדָּבָר), “pasture-land”; 3. Horbah (חֵרֶב), occurs only three times in the Hebrew (Ps. cxii. 1; Isa. xlvi. 1; Ezek. xiii. 4); 4. Yeshimon (יַשָּׁם). See Young’s Concordance under Desert, for the Bible passages.

DESSERT, Church of the. See Camisards, Bossuet.

DESMARETS, Samuel (Latin, Maresius), b. at Ossemont, Picardy, Aug. 9, 1590; d. at Gröningen, May 18, 1673; studied theology at Saumur and Geneva; and was appointed pastor at Laon (1630), professor at Sedan (1631), pastor at Maastricht (1632), and at Bois-le-Duc (1636), and professor at Gröningen (1643). Though up to his twelfth year he took no other food than milk, and though, in his very first controversy with the Jesuits at Laon, he was stabbed in the chest by way of argumentation, he was one of the most prolific and most rabid polemics of the Reformed Church, pursuing with equal zest the liberal tendency represented by the Academy of Saumur (Amyraut), the Socinians, and the Jesuits. He wrote more than a hundred works, of which a list is given in La France Protestante; but they are now all forgotten.

DESMARETS DE SAINT-SORLIN, Jean, b. in Paris, 1585; d. there 1676; began his public career as a debauched fool, and ended it as a hypocritical rascal, equally ridiculous and equally vicious in both characters. Before his conversion, he manufactured poetry of all descriptions; after his conversion, he manufactured visions of the worst kind. His Les Delices de l’esprit, Paris, 1658, fol., pretends to be a commentary on the Revelation, by which he felt authorized to promise Louis XIV. and the Pope an army of one hundred thousand faithful to destroy the Turks and the Jansenists. He is now known only from the infamous manner in which he brought Simon Morin to the stake, and from Nicole’s Lettres imaginaires, Paris, 1664-66.

DESSERVANT, in the Gallican Church, means, first, a priest appointed by the bishop to perform all ecclesiastical functions in a parish during a vacancy; second, a priest occupying an ecclesia succursals; in contradistinction to the ecclesia parochialis (the true parish-church), there are in France, Belgium, and the Rhenish Provinces, a great number of auxiliary churches (ecclesia succursals), organized in places where the congregation was found too large for the parish-church, whose occupants, the desservants, differ from the curates only by having a smaller salary, and by standing more directly under the control of the bishop.

DESUBAS (Mathieu Majal), a pastor of the Desert, so called from his birthplace; b. at Desudas, 1720; d. as a martyr, at Montpellier, Feb. 2, 1746. As pastor of Vivarais he sat in the National Synod of Bas Languedoc, Aug. 18, 1744, and distinguished himself by his wisdom and patriotism. He was arrested April 6, 1745, and taken to Vermoux. The supplications of a throng of his parishioners were answered by a round of musketry, and the one and only “massacre” occurred only by having a smaller salary, and by standing more directly under the control of the bishop.

DETERMINISM is the common name for all those theories of the human will which represent it as absolutely determined by motives which lie entirely outside of it, thereby reducing its freedom to a mere delusion. There is a dogmatic determinism, which, in order to glorify the majesty of God, excludes all other causality from human action but God himself (Luther, De servo arbitrio); and there is a philosophical determinism, which explains all human actions as results of surrounding circumstances (La Mettrie). There is a fatalistic determinism, which places God himself in the grip of an iron necessity (the ancient idea of Nemesis, Islam); and there is a pantheistic determinism, which makes even the faintest gleam of human freedom vanish into the darkness of a natural process (the Hindus, Stoicism, Spinoza). Indeed, like the chameleon, determinism is capable of assuming the color of any thing which happens to be next to it, and fanaticism is as apt to produce it as indifference; but it is always characterized by placing freedom and necessity in such an opposition to each other that the former disappears. One of the most interesting forms under which determinism has appeared in theology is that which it received from Schleiermacher and his school. See I. P. Romme, Ueber Willen, Freiheit und Determinismus, Bern, 1835.

DEUROFF, William, b. in Amsterdam, 1650; d. there 1717; was a basket-maker by profession, but a speculative genius by nature; studied theology and philosophy, though in a desultory and un系统的 way; lectured in the evenings, often to large audiences; wrote books, which were published in a collected edition (1715), and caused considerable stir in the Dutch Reformed Church. His special study was Descartes; and the Cartesian occasionalism found great favor with him. Still, his ideas of God as a mere force pervading the universe, and of the individual human soul as a mere modification of the one thinking substance, show his affinity to Spinoza.

DEUSDEDIT, also called Deodatus, Adeodatus, sometimes Adeodatus I., in opposition to the usual bearer of that name (see title); b. in Rome, according to one report; the son of a sub-deacon, Stephanus; and chosen Pope in 615, after the death of Boniface IV.; d. 618. His life is connected with legends, and his pontificate with false decrets; but he has passed into the galaxy of Roman-Catholic saints, and is commemorated Nov. 9.

DEUSING, Herman, b. at Groningen, March 14, 1654; d. there Jan. 3, 1722; studied, first mathematics and medicine, but afterwards theology, and made himself known as one of the most extreme representatives of the typical school of scriptural interpreters, by his Historia Allegorica V. et N. Testamenti (1690), Commentarius Mysticus in Decalogenum (1700), and Mysteriösa S. Triadas (1712). Having been accused of heresy, and his pontificate with false decrets; but he has passed into the galaxy of Roman-Catholic saints, and is commemorated Nov. 9.

DEUTSCH, Emanuel Oscar Menahem, an eminent Oriental scholar; b. of Jewish parents, Oct. 28, 1829, at Neisse, Prussian Silesia; d. at Alexandria, Egypt, May 12, 1873. His uncle, a learned rabbi, gave him his early education, and he studied at Berlin. From 1853 to his death he was assistant in the library of the British Museum. He contributed articles to Chamber's Encyclopædia, Kitto's and Smith's Bible dictionaries, and to various periodicals. From childhood he was a student of the Talmud, and intended to write an elaborate volume upon it. In October, 1867, he published an article on The Talmud, in The Quarterly Review. By it he became famous. The article was translated within a year into French, German, Russian, Swedish, Dutch, and Danish. But hard work induced disease, and death drew on apace. Twice he visited the East, — in 1869 and 1872. Besides in Hebrew, Deutsch made remarkable attainments in Sanscrit, Chaldee, Aramaic, and Phoenician. His Remains, edited by Lady Strangford, with a brief sketch, appeared, London and New York, 1874.

DEUTSCHMANN, Johann, b. at Wittenberg, Aug. 10, 1855; d. there Aug. 12, 1700; was professor of theology from 1657, and was one of the most curious representatives of the orthodoxy of that time. With an almost furious hatred of the younger Calixtus and Spener, he connected an almost ridiculous love of the so-called Theologia paradisiaca, and was very busy in proving that not only the Old, but also the New Testament, the Book of the patriarchs, and even of Adam, harmonized with the Confessio Augustana and the Formula Concordiae. Symbolum Apostolicum Adami is the title of one of his works.

DEVAY, Matyas Biré, one of the most prominent of the Hungarian Reformers; was born in the village of Déva in Transylvania, towards the close of the fifteenth or in the beginning of the sixteenth century; and died, probably in Debreczin, about 1547. In 1523 he studied in the University of Cracow, where the Hungarians from Transylvania and the Theiss Valley formed a peculiar nation. In 1557 he was called home as a Roman-Catholic priest; but in 1529 he went to Wittenberg, where he stayed, for one year and a half, in the house of Luther. After returning home, he preached the new doctrines, first in Öfen, then at Kaschau, and published two pamphlets, De sanctorumdormitione, against the worship of saints, and a more systematical representation of the theology of the Reformers, in fifty-two propositions; which two pamphlets, however, circulated only in manuscript copies, because as yet there was no printing-press in Hungary. At the instance of Thomas Szaladzhy, Bishop of Erlau, he was arrested, and kept in prison, first at Likava, then at Pressburg, and finally in Vienna. He was soon released, however; but when, immediately after his release, he took up again his former business as a preacher of the new doctrines, he was arrested once more, and kept in prison for nearly three years (1532-34). Released a second time, he settled at Sárvár, in the county of Wasch, under the protection of Count Nádasdy, a powerful Hungarian magnate, who had espoused the cause of the Reformation. In 1537 he again visited Wittenberg, and went thence to Basel, where he published his Orthographia Ungarica, etc., a refutation of the Censurae, etc., which Gregory Szegedy, the provincial of the Franciscans in Hungary, and member of the Sorbonne, had written against his fifty-two propositions. On his return to Sárvár he put up a printing-press there, and published his Orthographia Ungarica, the first book printed in Hungary, and containing a grammar of the Hungarian language, and extracts of Luther's minor catechism, written in Hungarian. Justly realizing with what kind of weapons the Reformation was most likely to win in the contest, he was also a zealous teacher in the school which Count Nádasdy, a relative of Nádasdy, and, like him, a Protestant. In Switzerland he had become acquainted with Zwingli's views of the Lord's Supper, and adopted them; and he now preached them openly in Debreczin, to the disgust and scandal of Luther and the Wittenberg Reformers. In one of the last years of his life he published...
DEVELOPMENT, Theological and Historical, is held in different shapes. (1) The evangelical Protestant theory maintains that Christianity objectively considered is perfect in Christ and the New Testament, but that its understanding and application is gradual, and progressing from age to age. In this sense there can be no history without motion and development. (2) The rationalistic theory holds that Christianity itself is imperfect, and will ultimately be superseded by philosophy or a humanitarian religion, or that reason will take the place of the Bible as a rule of faith and action. (3) The Roman-Catholic theory, as advocated by Cardinal Newman, in his Development of Christian Doctrine, London, 1845, written just before he went over to Rome, but never endorsed by the Roman Church, is that the New Testament contained the germs of certain doctrines, i.e., those distinctive to the Roman and Greek Catholic Churches, which, under divine care, have been developed into their present shape. It is true that the doctrines and practices of these churches can be traced to very early times; but that is quite a different thing from allowing that such development was always in the way of truth and purity. One of the most vigorous replies to Dr. Newman was W. A. Butler's Letters on the Development of Christian Doctrine, in reply to Mr. Newman's Essay, Dublin, 1850. See, also, Philip Schaff's Introduction to the Study of the New Testament, Philadelphia, 1861.

DEVELOPMENT, Scientific. See EVOLUTION.

DEVIL, an apostate angel, the ruler of the kingdom of darkness, the enemy of all good, and the source and promoter of all evil. His chief designations are Satan (Σατανάς), meaning adversary, and Devil (διάβολος), calumniator. He shall treat the subject by giving the Old and New Testament doctrine, and by presenting the views that have prevailed at various periods of the church.

1. The Old Testament does not contain the fully-developed doctrine of Satan that is presented in the New Testament. It does not portray him as at the head of a kingdom, ruling over kindred natures, and an apostate from the family of God. The belief in evil spirits, the Sherim and Sedim (Deut. xxxii. 17; Isa. xii. 21, xxxiv. 14, etc.), is distinctly alluded to. Their element is the night, and their habitation waste places. It was forbidden to offer sacrifices to them (Deut. xxxii. 17; Ps. civ. 37, etc.). In the older books, God is described as the source from which come influences noxious to man, such as hardening Pharaoh's heart (Exod. viii., etc.), smiting the first-born (Exod. xii. 29); but there are not wanting references to evil spirits, to whom are attributed evil agencies, as the evil spirit which troubled Saul (1 Sam. xvi. 14), and the lying spirit among the prophets of Ahab (1 Kings xxii. 20 sq.). In this connection thepara-epiphanies of God (2 Sam. xv. 17) and 1 Chron. xii. 1, should be compared, and it will be found that the same event is attributed in the first passage to God as its author, which in the second is attributed to Satan (comp. in the New Testament Luke xii. 15 and Heb. ii. 14). The rare mention of evil spirits in the Hebrew Scriptures is to be explained, on the one hand, by the jealous monotheism of the Hebrews; and, on the other, the subordination of evil to God's supreme power and purpose agrees exactly with the more definite statements of our Lord and his apostles.

The term "Satan" is used in the general sense of adversary (Ps. cix. 6, etc.), but more particularly also as the spirit of evil, who comes in collision with the plans of God, and plots the hurt of man. It is not definitely stated, in the account of the fall, that the serpent who tempted Eve was the Devil, or his agent. The first identification of the two is in the Book of Wisdom (ii. 28 sq.), and is taken for granted by John in the expression, "that old serpent called the Devil" (Rev. xii. 9; comp. John vii. 44). This inference is justified by the words which the serpent used, and agrees exactly with the portrait of the Devil as the tempter (ὁ πεπόνησας). The only other reference to Satan in the Pentateuch is Lev. xvi. 8. Aaron is there instructed to cast upon each of two goats, on the great day of atonement, a lot, "one for the Lord, and the other for Asazel" (margin.). This certainly means an evil spirit, if not Satan himself. In the Book of Job he is definitely brought out as a distinct personality. He presents himself before the Lord with the sons of God (i. 6), and, after questioning the motives of the patriarch, secures permission to tempt and torment him, but not to kill him (i. 12). The Cyclo. Brit. assumes too much when it says (art. Deevil), "Satan is not represented as the impersonation of evil or as a spiritual assailant of the patriarch. The evils with which he assails Job are outward evils." This is in the line of Herder, Eichhorn, and others, who affirm that Satan was a good angel, delegated by God as his agent. But, if he was a good angel, how could the evil design originate with him of bringing Job to bodily plagues, and, as we suppose, spiritual doubts, to curse God? The whole conversation between him and the Almighty (i. 7–12) leaves the impression that he was the restless (ver. 7) agent of evil. In Zech. iii. 1 he is portrayed as standing at the side of Joshua the high priest to assauli him. These descriptions complete the portraiture of the Old Testament, which, if it is far from being as full as that of the New, has no traits dissonant with it.

2. The New Testament is full of allusions to the personality and agency of the Evil One. His character is drawn in strong colors, because he is the adversary of the kingdom of grace which Christ came to establish, and rules over the kingdom of darkness with which this shall be engaged in a life-and-death-struggle. He bears the titles of Tempter (1 Thess. iii. 6), Belzebub and Prince of devils (Matt. xii. 24), the Evil One (Matt. vi. 13, xiii. 19, etc.), Prince of this world (John xii. 31, xiv. 30, xvi. 11), God of this world (2 Cor. iv. 4), Prince of the power of the air (Eph. ii. 2), the dragon and the serpent (Rev. xii. 9, xx. 2), and of the air (Matt. xxii. 29) which is hostile to the kingdom of Christ (Acts xxvii. 15), and dominates over a realm of demons (Matt. ix. 14). Created one of the angels, he became an apostate (John viii.
44), and fell from heaven (Luke x. 18; Jude 6).

He is the bitter and indefatigable adversary of the kingdom of grace, but will ultimately be overthrown, and cast into everlasting punishment (Matt. xii. 31; Rev. xvi. 10). He endeavours to traduce Christ himself (Matt. iv. 1), worked among the apostles (John xiii. 2), and workedeth in the children of disobedience (Eph. ii. 2).

Conversion is the passage and deliverance from his kingdom of darkness to the kingdom of light (Col. i. 13). He is restlessly sowing seeds of error and doubt in the church (Matt. xii. 28), blinding the eyes of them that believe not (2 Cor. iv. 4), goes about as a roaring lion (1 Pet. v. 8), and has the power of death (Heb. ii. 14). Christ has given a more definite description of him (John viii. 44) as a "murderer and liar." His chief characteristics are power and craft. He is as a "strong man" (Matt. xii. 29), and his subtle (comp. Gen. iii. 1) is exhibited in treacherous snares (2 Tim. ii. 29), wiles (Eph. vi. 11), and devices (2 Cor. iv. 11), and the delusive shift of transforming himself into an angel of light (2 Cor. xi. 14).

It was to undo the desolation, and destroy the works of this Satan, that the Son of God was manifested (1 John iii. 8). It has been attempted to make him out to be a mere personification of evil, and to show that evil exists only as it is found in the human heart. Schleiermacher thinks that Jesus accommodated himself to the ideas and language that then prevailed in Judea, but did not himself regard Satan as a real and living person. But certainly this is beneath the dignity of Christ. He would hardly, in speaking of him, make use of such strong language, and bid the disciples beware of his craft and power. In the exposition of the parable of the tares he makes the didactic statement that the enemy who sowed them was the Devil (Matt. xiii. 39).

The Satan of the Scriptures is a portrait independent of Persian mythology. He and Ahriman agree only in this, that they are alike spirits of evil. In subordinate particulars they are disparate. Ahriman rules over one-half the world, and is independent of Ormuzd. Satan's dominion is limited, and subject to the supreme authority of God. Ahriman is co-eternal with Ormuzd, Satan is a creature who apostatized from the truth.

3. The church fathers agreed in representing Satan as an apostate, and the invertebrate enemy of the Church and the believer. The work of the atonement was regarded by Irenæus, Origen, etc., as a price paid to Satan. During the middle ages the belief in the Devil took the wildest shapes. He was represented with horns and hoofs, painted on bridges and canals, regarded as living in witches and ghouls; and Luther afterwards found an easy explanation of mosquitoes, mice, and similar troublesome creatures, in his creative agency. The Bogomili went so far as to call him the elder brother of Christ, so great was the dread of his power. The Reformers clung with their deep consciousness of sin also to the belief in Satan. The strong individuality of Luther is nowhere more clearly apparent than in his imagined visions of the Evil One, at whom he once threw his ink-bottle. On another occasion he said, "I heard some one walking on the floor above my head; but, as I knew it was only the Devil, I went quietly to sleep." The rationalists deny the existence of Satan as a mere superstition. Even Schleiermacher with great ability combats the view of a personal Satan, which has been held by many philosophers, like Martensen, Nitzsch, Twstseen, Julius Müller, Dorner, etc., hold firmly to his personality. Three of the greatest, poets of three languages have given pictures of Satan, his rebellion, and his realm,—Dante, Milton, and Goethe.

How Satan came to fall is a deep question which has been differently answered, but can hardly be settled. Milton, following the ancient fathers, represents (i. 37) pride as the motive. . . . "His pride Had cast him out from heaven with all his host Of rebel angels."

And again (i. 281), — "My choice To reign is worth ambition, though in hell."

Martensen says he was "Christ's younger brother, and became God's adversary, because he was not content to be second, but wanted to be first; because he was unwilling to bear the light of another, and wanted to be the light itself." Jacob Böhme: "Lucifer envied the Son his glory; his own beauty deceived him, and he wanted to place himself on the throne of the Son." An attempt has even been made to fix the date of that apostasy. Lange thinks it occurred on one of the days of the creative week; while Kurtz and others hold that the formless and void chaos of the world (Gen. i. 2) was the result of Satan's fall. In connection with these views it may be stated as fixed: 1. The possibility of Satan's apostasy is as conceivable as the fall of man; 2. The inveterate and undying hostility of Satan to the kingdom of Christ makes the denial of eternal punishment on the ground of the divine compassion untenable; 3. In proportion as the Christian consciousness of sin is deep does the belief in the personal agency of Satan prevail. The denial of the personal Satan is the first step in the denial of the sinfulness of sin. In the New Testament it is the struggle between the kingdom of Christ and the kingdom of Satan which causes apostasy to grow in the description, and draws forth the vivid exhortations to fight manfully and with the armor of God, and to resist by prayer and vigilance. We may say with Dorner, that the conviction of a great struggle going on between the two kingdoms of darkness and light, a struggle in which we all may take part, is adapted to produce an earnest conception of evil, and develop watchfulness and tension of the moral energies. See art. Démon.

DEVIATION, DEVOTIONAL EXERCISES, and BOOKS OF DEVOTION. By devotion we mean every sort of exercise of the soul, prayer and meditation, whether public or private, free or set. Devotional exercises include two distinct elements: the first consists in the more or less self-conscious determination to turn the attention to things divine; the second, the exaltation of the soul to God. To these exercises belong public, family, and private worship, consisting in reading the Bible, prayer, praise, meditation, and exhortation. There is danger of viewing devotions as purely external matters, and therefore in performing them perfunctorily, as a mere matter of duty. But, the closer one walks with God, the less constraint will one feel. Devotional exercises should be privileges most highly valued. But, whatever the feeling in respect to them, they should be carefully maintained, as habits of prayer will produce praying habits. By services at stated times we are far more likely to see God at last than if we postponed them until we "felt like it."

Books of devotion characterize every phase of church life and history. The temper of the times is reflected by them. Such books as The Shepherd of Hermas, Augustine's Confessions, Thomas A Kempis' Imitation of Christ, Tauler's Sermons, the Theologia Germanica, mark the pulse of an ascetic though spiritual life. Those written by Protestants breathe an altogether different spirit. Jeremy Taylor's Holy Living and Holy Dying, Baxter's Saints' Everlasting Rest, Böhme's Way to Christ, Arndt's True Christianity, Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, Ritschl's Religion in the Soul, are books addressed to those who live in homes, not to those in cloisters. In the Roman-Catholic Church the writings of Francis de Sales, Fenelon, Molinos, and others, though full of heavenly piety, are not so well adapted to men and women tossed to and fro by worldly cares and business. These books, and many others, are gifts from God of inestimable worth. Their perusal has been of saving efficacy unto many, and cannot be too strongly recommended. At the same time, devotional reading must be mingled with Scripture and prayer, and followed by direct effort in practical Christian work. The defect of present-day Protestantism is that it is too active and too little meditative. It needs to be recalled to the duty of acquainting itself with the devotional thoughts of the ages, and of spending time in devotion.

No devotional volume should be suffered to usurp the place of the Bible. Only from it do we receive the rays of divine light unrefracted. The devotions of the church in public and private should make more of Scripture reading. In non-liturgical churches it is too commonly curtailed. If the words of God were heard more, and the words of man less, in our churches, it would be better for us.

DE WITT, Thomas, D.D., b. at Kingston, N.Y., Sept. 13, 1791; d. in New York City, May 18, 1874. He was graduated at Union College, 1806, and at the New Brunswick Theological Seminary, 1812; pastor of the Reformed Dutch churches of Hopewell and New Hackensack, N.Y., 1812-25; of Hopewell alone, 1825-27; and one of the Collegiate Church pastors, New York City, from 1827 till his death. He edited The Christian Intelligencer, 1831-43; was vice-president of the New York Historical Society for thirty years, and its president from 1870 to 1872. He was an honored citizen of New York, and for many years one of its favorite preachers and pastors. By all who knew him esteemed for his many virtues, pre-eminently for his humility and simplicity. His writings consisted, for the most part, of occasional sermons and translations from the Dutch, relating to ecclesiastical history. The latter are found in The Christian Intelligencer (1830-74), The Historical Collections of the State of New York, and in The Documentary History of the State of New York.

DIABOLUS. See DEVIL.

DIACONICUM means, in ecclesiastical writings, sometimes a text-book for the duties and functions of a deacon, but more often a separate building of apsidal form, adjoining the basilica, just south of the bema, and communicating with it through a door in the side-wall. In this building, the modern vestry or sacristy of the church, the deacons kept the holy vessels and vestments, prepared and lighted the incense, etc. No priest of a lower order was allowed to enter.

DIA NIA OF THE EPHESIANS. In the city of Ephesus was one of the wonders of the world,—the Temple to Diana. But this goddess is not to be confounded with the Artemis of the Greeks, or the Diana of the Latins. She was a nature goddess, and the point of similarity is in her nourishing power over all life. She was not, like Artemis, the goddess of the chase, the chaste and virgin sister of Apollo. For a description of her temple and her image, see EPHESUS. See, also, A. CLAUS: De Dianae antiquissima apud Graecos Graecos natura, Breslau, 1851.

DIASPORA, a term applied to the Jews who were scattered through the Roman world (Jas. i. 1; 1 Pet. i. 1). See CAPIVITY. On the Moravian diaspora, see MORAVIANS.

DIATESSARON (literally, through four) is applied to the combination of the four Gospels in one consecutive narrative. While the harmony of the accounts is thus brought out, the individuality of the writers is lost. The earliest diatessaron was Tatian's, in the second century. See Theodor Zahn, on Tatian's Diatessaron, in the First Part of his Forschungen zur Gesch. des Neu. Test. (1854). Tregelles says that this work "led to a confusion and intermingling, on the part of transcribers, of the words and expressions of one Gospel with that which was found in another," and thus "had more effect apparently on the text of the Gospels in use" throughout the church than all the designed falsifications of Marcion and every scion of the Gnostic blood" (Horne's Introduction, vol. iv, p. 40). Tatian has had many followers. A few are to be numbered among the English works of the late Mr. Greenwood, London, 1765; J. White (with Greek text), Oxford, 1799, new ed., 1856; T. Thirlwall, 3d ed., London, 1804; J. D. Macbride, Oxford, 1837; John Forster, 3d ed., London, 1847; W. Stroud (with Greek text), London, 1853; The Gospels Consolidated, London (Bagster's); E. Garz, Don, Andover, 1871; The Life of our Lord in the Words of the Four Evangelists, N.Y., 1877. See list in Darling, Cyclopædia Bibliographica, also Harmony of the Gospels, Tatian.

DIAZ, Francisco, a Dominican monk; born at St. Cébrían de Maynelas in Castile; went as a missionary to the Philippine Islands in 1532, and in 1535 to China, where he was killed during a persecution, Nov. 4, 1546. He wrote a catechism in Chinese and a Chinese-Spanish dictionary.

DIAZ, Juan, b. at Cuenca, in Castile; studied in the University of Paris, and was converted to the Faith in 1540. He was present at the diet of Ratisbon, December, 1544, and his conversations with Pietro Malvenda and the other Spanish priests stirred up the Spanish fanaticism and pride to the highest pitch. His brother, Alphonzo, who was an officer at the papal court, hastened to Germany with the fixed purpose to kill him; and March 27, 1546, he perpetrated the foul deed, at Neuburg-on-the-Danube. In Germany this fratricide produced general horror; but the emperor and the Pope approved of it, and the murderer was not punished. He committed suicide, however, in 1551. Juan Diaz wrote a confession of faith, Christianae Religionis Summa, which was published at Neuburg, 1546, put on the Index by Pius IV., 1564, and translated into French, 1565, and into Spanish, 1865. In the epistolary part of Opera Calvini are found several letters of Diaz. See Bokhmer: Spanish Reformers of Two Centuries, from 1520, Lond., 1874.

DICK, Thomas, LL.D., a Christian philosopher; b. at Dundee, Scotland, Nov. 24, 1774; d. at Edinburgh, July 29, 1857. He was for two years (1803-05) in the ministry of the Secession Church (United Presbyterian Church), but spent the rest of his life in teaching and literary labor. His first work appeared in 1824, The Christian Philosopher, or the Connection of Science with Religion. It was a great success, and determined him to follow still farther the line of combined instruction and edification. Perhaps the best known of his works are, The Philosophy of a Future State (1828), Celestial Scenery (1838), The Sidereal Heavens (1840), The Practical Astronomer (1845). Their circulation has been very large. Several of his books have been translated into different languages, the last-mentioned even into Chinese. They are written in a simple and admirable style, and present the result of much study in an interesting form; while the religious reflections attest the piety of the author, and edify the reader. Shortly before his death the government granted him a pension, in recognition of his most servicable services in the cause of science. His own edition of his works, both in print, Cincinnati, 2 vols. 8vo, and Phila., 10 vols. in 5, 12mo.

DICKINSON, Jonathan, a prominent Presbyterian divine, and first president of Princeton College; b. at Hatfield, Mass, April 22, 1688; d. at Elizabeth, N.J., Oct. 7, 1747. He graduated at Yale College, 1706, and in 1708 settled at Princeton. He covered an extensive area, preaching regularly to six or seven congregations. He not only exerted a permanent influence in building up churches, but was an acknowledged leader in the old synod of Philadelphia, and subsequently in the synod of New York. Although a strong Calvinist, and sound in the doctrines of the Westminster Confession, he nevertheless firmly opposed the binding authority of creeds and confessions drawn up by uninspired men, when the question of subscription was brought up before synod in 1746.

Dickinson took a prominent part in the measures which led to the formation of the synod of New York (1745), the second of the Presbyterian Church in the United States. David Brainerd and Indian missions found in him a warm friend. He also took a deep interest in education, and was the most prominent among the founders of Nassau Hall (Princeton College). Under his counsel a charter was received for the institution in October, 1746. He was elected president, but only lived to perform the duties a single year. Dr. Gillett ( Hist. Presb. Ch., I. 40) characterizes him as a man of "rare sagacity, calm judgment, and unshrinking firmness." Dickinson's writings are considered to be among the soundest expositions of Calvinism that America has produced. Dr. John Erskine said that the British Isles had not produced any writers on divinity in the eighteenth century equal to Dickinson and Jonathan Edwards. His works are, Four Sermons on the Reasonableness of Christianity, Bost., 1722; Display of God's Special Grace, Bost., 1742; Familiar Letters upon Subjects in Religion, Bost., 1745; Vindication of God's Saving Free Grace, Bost., 1748; True Scripture Doctrine concerning Some Important Points in Christian Faith (an able dis-

DICKSON, David, a commentator; b. at Glasgow, 1583; d. in 1682–83. He was professor of philosophy in Glasgow after his graduation; from 1618 to 1641 he was minister in Irvine, after which he was professor of divinity at Glasgow and Edinburgh, and was ejected at the Restoration in 1662. He wrote A short Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews (Aberdeen, 1631, reprinted London, 1839), A brief exposition of the Gospel of Matthew (London, 1655, 3 vols., reprinted Glasgow, 1834, 2 vols.), Therapeutica Sacra (in Latin, Edinburgh, 1650, in English, 2d ed., 1897), Exposition of all the Epistles (1650).

DICTATES OF POPE GREGORY VII. (Dictatus Papae Gregorii Dilecti Brandinii) consist of twenty-seven short propositions relating to the supreme power of the Pope, and are found among the works of Gregory VII., inserted between the fifty-fifth and fifty-sixth of his epistles. By modern critics they are generally considered spurious. See Mosheim: Church History, English translation, 1854, pp. 101. DICTOINARIES AND CYCLOPÆDIAS, Biblical, Ecclesiastical, and Theological. I. The following are the best known and most useful Bible Dictionaries. — Augustine Calmet: Dictionnaire historique, critique, chronologique, géographique et littéral de la Bible, Paris, 1722, with a supplement, 1728, 4 vols. fol. This work was the first of its kind, and has been often reprinted, translated, and abridged. It is now superseded. The best reproduction of it is by Dr. E. Robinson, Boston, 1836; 4th ed., enlarged and much improved, 1847, 1848. Still valuable; it has never been translated. John Kitto: Cyclopaedia of Biblical Literature, Edinburgh, 1845, 2 vols. reprinted in N.Y. the same year; new ed. by Dr. Burgess, Edinburgh, 1856; 3d ed., thoroughly revised, much enlarged and improved by Dr. W. L. Alexander and a staff of contributors, Edinburgh, 1862–65, 3 vols. royal 8vo; the first to combine the labors of specialists under editorial management. William Smith: Dictionary of the Bible, London, 1800–04, 3 vols. 8vo, a monument of British biblical scholarship; American edition by H. B. Hackett and Ezra Abbot, with the co-operation of a number of American scholars, N. X., 1868–70, 4 vols. 8vo. The American edition is an improvement upon the English original, in correctness, fulness, and usefulness (e.g., by means of cross references). Patrick Fairbairn: The Imperial Bible Dictionary, Edinburgh, 1865, 2 vols. royal 8vo. Like Smith’s, it is a composite work, but of a more popular character. John Ayre: The Treasury of Bible Knowledge, London, 1886, 2d ed., 1889, small 8vo, 943 pp., double column; excellent, an immense amount of well-digested information packed into a very small space. Daniel Schenkkel: Bibel-Lexikon, Leipzig, 1859–75, 5 vols. 8vo; written by a number of scholars of the liberal (i.e., more or less sceptical) school. E. G. A. Riem: Handwörterbuch des biblischen Alktertums, Leipzig, 1857 sqq.; represents the conservative biblical scholarship of Germany. Spol: Dictionnaire de la Bible, Paris, 1877. A. R. Faussert: The Englishman’s Bible Cyclopaedia, London and N.Y., 1878, 2d ed., 1881.

Unlike the last two mentioned, this work is of single authorship. Its plan is peculiar in that it is expository as well as critical, and therefore a partial substitute for a commentary on the whole Bible. — Among the smaller Bible dictionaries two claim mention, — that published by the American Tract Society, A Dictionary of the Holy Bible, for General Use in the Study of the Scriptures, N.Y., 1859, pp. 534, and that published by the American Sunday School Union, A Dictionary of the Holy Bible, including Biography, Natural History, Geography, Topography, Archaeology and Literature, Phila., 1850, 3d ed., 1852, pp. 535. The first was essentially edited by Dr. Edward Robinson, and is a model of condensation, accuracy, and felicity of expression, but is now a little antiquated. The second was edited by Dr. Schaff, and is more comprehensive, embracing every name in the Bible, and utilizing the most recent discoveries and researches of the Palestine Exploration Societies. Both these dictionaries are copiously illustrated, and contain maps. Of quite different aim is J. Hamburger: Real-Encyclopädie des Judenthums Wörterbuch für Gemeinde, Schule und Haus, Neustrelitz, Abtheilung I., 1874, Abtheilung II., 1874 sqq. It is recommended in emphatic terms by Dr. Franz Delitzsch. The object of the author is to treat alphabetically not only those historical, geographical, and natural-history articles, but also those ethical, dogmatical, and juridical articles which require explanation to the reader of the Bible or the Talmud. It is written by a Jew for Jews. II. Dictionaries of the Bible Languages. — Hebrew and Chaldee. — The standard source of Hebrew lexicography is still Gesenius: Novus Thesaurus philologicus criticus Linguae Hebræae et Chaldaicae, 2 vols. (2d ed., 1859; 3 vols. But besides this, there are numerous manuals. The best is Gesenius: Hebräisches und Chaldisches Handwörterbuch über das Alte Testament, Leipzig, 1812, 2 vols.; 8th revised ed. by Mühlen and Volck, 1878, 1 vol., with improvements which should be incorporated in the English translations by Edward Robinson, Boston, 1836; revised, 1854; 20th edition, 1872), Samuel Prideaux Tregelles (London, 1847, new ed., 1857).

German-Hebraic indexes; but these have been dropped in their translation. An index to Gesenius has appeared separately. J. L. Potter: English-Hebrew Lexicon; Index to Gesenius's Hebrew Lexicon, Boston, 1872. A more elaborate work is M. Schulbaum: Neues, vollständiges deutsch-hebräisches Wörterbuch mit Berücksichtigung der talmudischen und neuebraeischen Literatur, Lemberg, 1881. Besides these large works, there are many small, handy volumes, of which the best probably is Bagster's Pocket Hebrew-English Lexicon, containing all the Hebrew and Chaldee Words in the Old Testament, London [n.d.], pp. 287. A work sui generis is B. Davidson: The Analytical Hebrew Lexicon. In it every separate word in the original Old Testament is parsed, and referred to its proper conjugation or declension, primitive form or root. Thus every grammatical difficulty is solved, and anybody who knows the Hebrew letters can by the use of this volume read the Hebrew Old Testament.

IV. General Biblical, Ecclesiastical, and Theological Dictionaries. — J. Newton Brown: Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, Brattleborough (N.H.), 1835; revised by Rev. G. P. Tyler, 1858; reprinted in Philadelphia, 1875. The book in matter and illustrations belongs to a former generation. J. Aschbach: Allgemeines Kirchen-Lexikon, Frankfurt a.M., 1846–50. A useful and reliable work; written by Roman-Catholic scholars. Wetzer und Wolte: Kirchen-Lexikon, Freiburg-im-Breisgau, 1847–56, 12 vols. (the 12th is supplementary); 2d ed. begun by Cardinal Hergenröther, continued by Dr. Franz Kaulen, 1880 sqq. (to be completed in ten vols.). The best Roman-Catholic cyclopaedia. The first edition was moderated liberal; the second is in the hands of Ultramontanists. J. J. Herzog: Real-Encyklopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche, established by C. H. Seybold, vol. 1, Hamburg, 1854, vols. 2–9, Stuttgart a. Hamburg, 1854–58, vols. 10–21, Gotha, 1858–66, in all 22 vols.; 2d ed. revised and partly rewritten, Leipzig (Hirnrichs), 1877 sqq., vols. 1–7 by J. J. Herzog and G. L. Plett (d. Sept. 10, 1880), vols. 8 sqq. by J. J. Herzog and A. Haeck. This is the great storehouse of German theology in all its branches, and is the basis of the present work. J. H. A. Bomberger: The Protestant Theological and Ecclesiastical Encyclopedia, being a Condensed Translation of Herzog's Real-Encyklopädie, with Additions from other Sources, Phila., 1860, 2 vols., begun in 1856, but never completed, and now superseded by the new Herzog. McClintock and Strong: Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, N.Y., 1867–81, 10 vols., with one or more supplementary volumes to be published in 1882. The work was begun in 1853. It is the most complete religious cyclopaedia in the English language. Its vocabulary is said to embrace about 50,000 titles. The literature, given under each article, has been brought down to date. The whole work is profusely illustrated, and contains several new maps. In the original distribution of the work Dr. Strong had charge of the biblical department; but after Dr. McClintock's lamented death, in 1870, the heavy burden of the whole work fell upon him. Different occasional contributors and several persons constantly employed have materially aided in carrying out the extensive scheme. In each department, dictionaries and text-books have been freely and otherwise, especially in the earlier volumes. Not a few articles bear marks of mechanical compilation, and undue prominence is given to minor biographies; nevertheless, it is a most useful collection of information upon a very

Diderot, Denis, b. at Langres, in Champ-agne, Oct. 5, 1713; d. in Paris, July 30, 1784; was educated in the Jesuit college of his native city; studied law for a short time, and then engaged in literature in general. He began with translations of the English deists, and then became a preacher of deism himself. In 1746 he published his Pensees Philosophiques; but the first work in which he proved himself an original thinker was his Letter on the Blind, 1749. It was, however, a little too sharp for the taste of the time: he was prosecuted, and put in the dungeon of Vincennes for three months. Here he conceived the idea of the great work of his life, the Encyclopédie, of which the first volume appeared in 1751, the last in 1772. In 1759 its publication was forbidden; and D'Alembert, Tur- got, and others of his most brilliant collaborators, left him. Aided only by mediocrities, and compelled to employ all kinds of shifts in order to avoid the interference of the police, he finished the work alone and with enormous toil. He was not exhausted, however. Besides the Encyclo- polie, he has written a multitude of comedies, criticisms, spirited impromptus (Regrets on my old Dressing-gown), philosophical controversies (D'Alembert's Dream), etc. The collected edition of his works, by Assézat and Tourneux, Paris, 1877, comprises twenty volumes; his correspond-ence with Grimm, Paris, 1829, fifteen volumes. Diderot was not a dogmatical philosopher, but a critic; and his criticism, though in many respects excellent, whether it treats of art or science, has almost total absence of positive propositions, the informing tendency of this criticism is nowhere doubtful: it is a somewhat coarse materialism, tinged with a very prosaic sentimentalism and a rather low-bred humor,—a character very fre- quently met with among the philanthropic atheists or atheistic philanthropists of the eighteenth century.

Didimus, called "the Blind." b. in Alexandria, 305; d. there 365; became blind in the fourth or fifth year of his age, according to Jerome and Palladius, but became, nevertheless, one of the most learned men of his time. He was one of the last directors of the catechetical school of Alexandria, laboring there for more than fifty years. Jerome, Palladius, Ambrose of Alexandria, Evagrius, Isidore of Pelusium, etc., were among his pupils. Though he fought with great zeal against the Arians, he was condemned as a heretic by the second council of Nice, because he defended the Sinozaphos of Origen. Of his many writings,—of which a complete list is given by Jerome, De Vir. Ill., 1., 14, 18, Fabrius, Biblioth. Graeca, vii., only the following have come down to us. I. A work on the Trinity, translated by Jerome, and found among his works, and published separately at Cologne, 1531, and at Helmstädt, 1614. See J. Basnage: Annales versions in Didymum. II. A short commentary on the canonical and Catholic epistles, translated into Latin by Ephiphanus Scholasticus, and found in Max. Bibl. Patr., Lyons, 1677, Tom. iv. p. 319. III. Fragments of a Greek work against the Manicheans, given by Basnage, l.c. IV. Three books on the Trinity, discovered by Aloysius Mingarelli, and published by his brother, Rome, 1704. See Guerike: De Schola Alexandrino, i. 92–97; ii. 83–96, 332–377.

Didymus, Gabriel, b. at Joachimsthal, in Bohemia, 1457; d. 1555. He studied in Prague and Wittenberg; entered the order of the Augustines in 1562, and was ordained a priest in 1513, but embraced the Reformation in 1521. He was one of those vehement characters which it often proved difficult for Luther to manage. He fol-allowed Carlstadt in his eccentric attack on the schools and universities; and, though he afterwards was brought to repentance by Luther, he left Wittenberg, and was minister, first at Altenbur, then at Torgau, from which latter position he was discharged by Maurice of Saxony, on account of his opposition to the Interim of Leipzig, in 1549. He afterwards lived in retirement. See Terne: Nachricht von dem G. D. Ignatius fädem Leben, Leipzig, 1577.

DIPDENBROCK, Melchior, b. Jan. 6, 1798, at Bochohl, in the principality of Salm-Salm; d. at Johannesberg, in Austrian Silesia, Jan. 20, 1853. As a boy he was remarkable for the exuberance of his spirits. He was sent from one educational institution to another, no teacher being able to curb his feeling of independence. Even from the military school of Bonn he was dismissed for insubordination, and, after serving for some time as a lieutenant in the Prussian army, he was advised by his superiors to resign his position. But an incidental meeting with Sailer, in 1817, changed his character at once and completely. He began to study theology; was ordained priest in 1823; and lived for several years with Sailer, as his secretary. He studied especially the medi-

DIES IRAE. The opening words of one of the most celebrated Latin hymns from the middle ages, still used in the Roman-Catholic Church against the liberal aspirations of the people; and more than once it was Dipdenbrock who finally carried through the government's schemes of taxation and other measures by his pastoral letters to his flock. He was rewarded: in 1850 he was made a cardinal. See his Life by his successor, Foerster, Breslau, 1850.

Diestrich, Veit (Vitus Theodorus, or Theodorus), b. at Nuremberg, 1506; d. there March 24, 1549; studied theology at Wittenberg, and became the amanuensis of Luther in 1527, and preacher to the Church of St. Sebaldus in Nuremberg, in 1530. He translated into German, and edited, a number of Luther's and Melanchthon's minor writings; wrote sermons and hymns, and an Agenubisch von der Pfarrerschaft dem Land (1544); and maintained a lively correspondence with all the most prominent of the Reformers. See Ströbel: Nachrichten von dem Leben und Schriften, V. D., Nürnberg, 1872.

DIESTEL, Ludwig von, a German theologian of the liberal school in Old Testament exegesis; b. Sept. 28, 1825; d. May 15, 1879. He was educated at Königsberg, Berlin, and Bonn; in the latter university he was privatdozent (1851), and then extraordinary professor of theology (1858) until 1862, when he went to Greifswald as ordinary professor. He subsequently was called to Jena, 1867, and to Tübingen, 1872, where he died. His best work is the Geschichte des Alten Testaments in der christlichen Kirche, Jena, 1868, a full history of Old-Testament exegesis down to the present time.

Diet (Latin dies, day). The earliest diets of the German or Holy Roman Empire were assemblies in which the emperor discussed with his subjects the choice of religion. Originally all members were bound by their feudal tenure to be present: absence cost them not only their votes, but also rendered them liable to fine. Thus the diet was a feudal, not a representa-tive, parliament. But, since gradually the feudatories of the emperor became independent sovereigns, the diet was at last a mere congress of princes, in which the emperor, instead of presiding in person, was represented by a delegate, called "principal commissarius," and to which the princes sent envoys; the right of suffrage belonging, not to individuals, but to certain territories or districts. The diets consisted of three bodies, who met and voted in separate colleges: (1) The electoral college; (2) The princes of the empire, spiritual and temporal; (3) The free imperial cities. When the three colleges agreed, the decree, or access as it was called, was submitted to the imperial sanction; but the emperor had no power to modify it. The diet met regularly twice a year,—in the spring, to discuss general matters; in the autumn, finance. From 1603 it met in Regensburg. The power of the diet steadily declined after 1648. The diets of great religious importance—for religion, of course, was a topic of discussion—are Worms (1521), which issued an edict of outlawry against Luther; Spires (1526), which allowed choice of religion to the several states; Spires (1530), at which the name "Protestant" originated; Augsburg (1530), where the famous Confession was presented; Augsburg (1555), famous for the "Religious Peace of Augsburg," which regulated the civil relations of the Lutherans.

Dietrich, Veit (Vitus Theodorus, or Theo-dorus), b. at Nuremberg, 1506; d. there March 24, 1549; studied theology at Wittenberg, and became the amanuensis of Luther in 1527, and preacher to the Church of St. Sebaldus in Nuremberg, in 1530. He translated into German, and edited, a number of Luther's and Melanchthon's minor writings; wrote sermons and hymns, and an Agenubisch von der Pfarrerschaft dem Land (1544); and maintained a lively correspondence with all the most prominent of the Reformers. See Ströbel: Nachrichten von dem Leben und Schriften, V. D., Nürnberg, 1872.
DIEUTRICH.

DIEUTRICH OF NIEM, b. at Niem, or Nieheim, in Westphalia, between 1338 and 1348; became Scrip tor Apostolicus in the papal chancery in Avignon, 1571; followed Gregory XI. to Rome in 1377, and held the position there of papal prothonotary and abbreviator, until 1418, after which time nothing is known about him. See H. V. Sauerland: Leben des Dietrich von Nieheim, Göttingen, 1875; Lenz: Drei Traktate, Marburg, 1876. According to Lenz, the following works are by Dietrich of Niem: De modis uniendo ac reformando ecclesiasticum in concilio universal, though it is printed by Hardt, in Magnum Ec. Concilium Constant. II.., as a work of Ger son; and Avisamenta pulcherrima de necessitatibus reformations in capitale et membris, printed by Hardt, 1628, as a work of Allii. P. Tschackert.

DIEU, Louis de (Lodewyk), b. at Vliesingen, April 7, 1590; d. at Leyden, Dec. 22, 1642; was appointed pastor at Middelburg in 1613, and at Vliesingen in 1617, and professor at the Walloon College, in Leyden, in 1619. He was a distinguished Orientalist, and published a Compendium Hebrewae Grammaticae, Leyden, 1626; Grammatica Trilinguis, Hebraica, Syriaca, et Chal daica*, Leyden, 1628; and a Persian grammar, 1639. His extensive knowledge of Oriental languages and history he applied with success to the exegesis of the Bible. His exegetical writings were published in Amsterdam, 1693, collected under the title of Critica Sacra.

DIGBY, Sir Kenelm, b. at Gothurst, Buck inghamshire, Eng., June 11, 1603; d. in London, June 11, 1665. Educated in the Protestant religion, in Paris, he became (1626) a Roman Catho lic, as his father had been, after he had been graduated from Oxford (1621), been knighted by Charles I., and given various high positions. On his return to England (1638), he joined the Royalist side; was imprisoned by order of Parliament; was released by request of the French queen dowager, and in 1643 retired to France, where he formed an intimacy with Descartes, and wrote his Peripatetick Institutions (London, 1646), Treatise on the Nature of Bodies (London, 1644), Peripatetic Institutions (London, 1640), Treatise on the Soul (London, 1660). By the friendship of Cromwell he was permitted to return to England. At the Restoration he returned to London; was one of the first council of the Royal Society. His other works are: A Conference about a Choice of Religion, Paris, 1638, London, 1654 (justifying his conversion); Letters (on the same subject), London, 1651; Observations on Religio Medicis, London, 1649; A Treatise of Adhering to God, London, 1654; On the Cure of Wounds by the Powder of Sympathies, London, 1658 (one of his curious hobbies). See The Private Memoirs of Sir K. Digby, written by himself, London, 1827.

DIMAN, Jeremiah Lewis, D.D., b. at Bristol, R.I., May 5, 1831; d. at Providence, R.I., Feb. 3, 1881. He was graduated from Brown University, Providence, R.I., 1851; studied privately for a year; entered the Theological Seminary at Andover, Mass., completed the junior and middle years; went to Europe, 1854; studied in Halle and Halle; returned, 1856; was ordained in the Congregational Church; pastor, first at Fall River, Mass., 1856–50, and then at Brookline, Mass., 1860–64. In 1864 he was inaugurated professor of history and political economy in Brown Uni versity, and held the position at his death. Professor Diman was a ripe scholar and a most catholic Christian. After his death, two books, made up of his lectures and sermons, appeared: The Theistic Argument, and Orations and Essays [and sermons], with Memorial Discourse, by J. O. Murray, D.D., both Boston, 1881.

DIMISSORY LETTERS (literae dimissoriae or dimissoriales) is the name of a kind of documents by which a person belonging to the jurisdiction (diocese, congregation) of a certain ecclesiastic is by him formally permitted to withdraw from his authority, either forever (literae dimissoriae perpetuae), or for a particular purpose, such as ordination (literae dimissoriae temporales).

DIMGERITES (from δύοσιν, two-thirds) is the name of the adherents of Apollinaris the Younger, so called, because, in the person of Christ, they recognized only two human elements, — the Θεός ιησους and the body; the divine Logos taking the place of the voice, the Θεός λογος. Sozomen (Hist. Eccl., VI. 25) calls them Vitalians from Vitalis, their bishop. Facundus of Hermione (Pro Defensione trium Capitulorum, Paris, 1679), Synoisiates, because they taught that the flesh of Christ was of an eternal and heavenly nature, forming one substance with his godhead.

The last name, however, is applicable only to one of the two parties of Apollinarists, the Polen ians, thus called from their leader Polemo, who, according to Photius (Bibl. Cod., CCCXX.), declared that the doctrine of two natures in Christ was a mere invention by Athanasius, the two Gregories, Basil the Great, and the Italian bishops.

The other party, the Valentinians, thus called from Valentinus, who is said to have kept very closely to the doctrines of Apollinaris (Theodore, Harr., IV. 8, 9), held the very opposite views. Augustine's division of the sect (De dono perseverantiae, 69) — into those who recognize no soul in Christ, those who recognize no rational soul, and those who consider the divine Logos itself transformed into flesh — is consequently not fully correctly.

HERZOG.

DINANT, or DINANTO, David of. See David of Dinant.

DINTER, Gustav Friedrich, b. at Borna, in Saxony, Feb. 29, 1700; d. at Königsberg, May 29, 1831; studied theology and philosophy at Leipzig, and was appointed pastor of Kitscher (1757), and director of the normal college of Dresden, in 1797. For the sake of his health he left Dresden in 1807, and settled as pastor of Gornitz, where he founded a normal school and business college. The school was very successful; and in 1810 he was called to Königsberg as professor of theology, and president of the board of education. He was a very prolific writer, and a rationalist every inch; but he was a man of great tact, and never touched the vulgar, or made fuss about the unnecessary. His Schullehrerbibel (Bible for the Schoolmasters) is the most widely known of his productions, and caused much controversy. See Schwabe: Zur Geschichte der Schullehrerbibel, etc. Neustadt-on-the-Oder, 1892; Über Witz und Brauchbarkeit d. Schullehrerbibel, Bunzlau, 1828. His Autobiography (Neustadt-on-the-Oder, 1829) gives insight both into his character and his system.

the civil division of the empire, which Constantine undertook, into dioceses, and the dioceses again into provinces, should be transferred to the church, so that each diocese was placed under an archbishop or patriarch, and each province under a metropolitan. In the course of time the name “diocese” changed its meaning, and was applied, from the beginning of the ninth century, to any territorial circumscription of ecclesiastical authority, but more especially to the episcopal. The earliest name for a bishop’s see was parish (καθολικών). The right of founding or changing dioceses belonged, after the fourth century, to the metropolitan and the provincial synod (c. 50, Concord, II. a. 390, c. 5 c. 51, ead. (Conc. Carthag., III. a. 397, c. 20)); but in the Western Church it was, after the eleventh century, reserved to the Pope, like all other causa episcopales (c. 1. X. de translatione episcopi, I. 7, Innocent. III. a. 1198).

DIOCLETIAN, or DIOCLETIANUS, Caius Aurelius Valerius, Roman emperor, 284–305; was b. at Salona, in Dalmatia, 245 (the son of a freedman), and d. there 313, having committed suicide by poison. He entered the army as a simple soldier, but rose rapidly, and was elected emperor at Chalcedon, after the assassination of Carus and Numerianus. He took up his residence in Nicomedia, and appointed Maximian co-emperor (Augustus) in 286, and Galerius and Constantius Chlorus, Caesars in 292. In the beginning of his reign he paid no particular attention to the preservation of the empire; and in 303 the persecution began suddenly and violently. An imperial edict of Feb. 24 ordered all Christians who held offices in the army, the administration, or in the very palace, that a Christian had no rights as a citizen or free man, that a Christian slave could never be manumitted, etc. A third edict of the same year ordered, that, of the Christians who had been imprisoned, those who were willing to sacrifice should be released, while those who refused should be compelled by force. Finally, a fourth edict of 304 ordered that all Christians, without any exceptions, should be compelled to sacrifice; and the employment of tortures of all kinds was allowed. The effect of these edicts was really startling. Among the Christians a great number hastened to surrender their books, to deny their faith, and sacrifice to the idols; but a still greater number remained firm and faithful in spite of the rack, even in spite of death. Among the Pagans many magistrates were very lenient, and mixed together, fighting each other at all other points, but perfectly agreed in their attacks on the orthodox church. He had, however, vigor and strength enough to take it up with them all; and the zeal and success with which he combated Platonists and Porphyrians, Manichaeans and Apollinarists, etc., made his name one of the most revered and most feared in the Christian Church.

Curiously enough, however, although during the ascendency of the Arians in Antioch he wrought persistently to keep together the remnants of the orthodox church, assembling with them for worship in all kinds of secret places, and, when even that became impossible, visiting them one by one in their houses; although the Council of Constantinople (381) appointed him who was only Bishop of Tarsus Metropolitan of Cilicia (Socr.: Hist. Eccl., 5, 8), and an imperial edict (Cod. Theod., I. XVI., tit. 1, I. 8) mentions him as the fourth of those bishops who were to give judgment in any question of orthodoxy; although he was a friend of Basil the Great, and numbered Chrysostom among his pupils, — hardly fifty years elapsed after his death before the shadow of controversy was the cause. authority against Nestorius, if he had existed and been known to them, the Severians asserted that Cyril had actually quoted the works of Dionysius in his books against Diodorus of Tarsus and Theodore of Mopsuestia, as might have been the case if there were copies of the works in the libraries of Alexandria. The works here referred to are: I. Περὶ τῆς οἰκουμενικῆς ἑρμηνείας ("On the Heavenly Hierarchy"); II. Περὶ τῆς ἐκκλησιαστικῆς ἑρμηνείας ("On the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy"); III. Περὶ διδακτικῶν ὑπομονῶν ("On the Names of God"); IV. Περὶ μυστικῆς ἡθολογίας ("On Mystic Theology"); and V. — ten letters (the eleventh is spurious), all evidently belonging to the same author. They are mentioned for the first time in the records of the above conference; but after that time they are very frequently spoken of. Severus himself, monophysite patriarch of Antioch from 614, often quotes them, and so does Epiphanius, orthodox patriarch of Antioch from 520. Commentaries upon them were written by Joannes Sthethopolitanus in the sixth century, and by Maximus Confessor in the seventh. Pachymeres paraphrased them in the thirteenth. In the Greek Church they enjoyed, on the whole, a great reputation, though the genuineness of their authorship was not altogether undoubted.

In the Western Church, Gregory the Great is the first who refers to these writings (Hom., 34, in Ec. Luc.; but when the Byzantine emperor, Michael the Stammerer, sent a copy of them to Louis the Pious in 827, they soon became better known; and after the invention of Abbot Hilduin, combining Dionysius the Areopagite, and St. Denis the patron saint of the Franks, in one person, they became quite celebrated. Joannes Scotus Egerina translated them into Latin at the instance of Charles the Bald, and he was himself deeply influenced by them. In the Western Church, among the schoolmen, the Areopagite became a leader towards mysticism, a teacher of mystical theology. Hugo of St. Victor, Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, Dionysius Carthusianus, etc., drew their inspiration from him. Coetzee shows how much Thomas Aquinas owes to the Areopagite. The Platonists of the Italian renaissance also appreciated him very much, as did other humanists, for instance, John Colet, Dean of St. Paul’s in London, who were swayed by Dionysius’ angelology, not to speak of the poets, Dante, Milton, etc. (Cf. Jo. Coletus super opera Dionysii. Ten Treatises on the Hierarchies of Dionysius by Dean Colet. New first published with a translation, introduction and notes by J. H. Lupton, London, 1869.)

The development, however, of literary criticism (Laurentius Valla, Erasmus, etc.), one of the most prominent features of the period of the renaissance, could not help destroying, first the invention of Hilulhin (the identification of Dionysius the Areopagite and St. Denis), and then the glory of the apostolic date of the authorship. The internal evidences of a later date, besides the want of mention or quotation up to the conference of Constantinople (533), were too striking and too strong,—the difference between the pompous and inflated style of the writings and the simplicity of the apostolic age; the use of theological terms which were not formed until the fourth century; references to an elaborately developed church ritual and church government; allusions to later persons and events, as, for instance, to the martyrdom of Ignatius, and to "Clement the Philosopher" (Clemens Alexandrinus); appeals to "ancient traditions," etc. Even such bodies as the Society of Jesus (under Launoi, Morinus) gave in; and the attempts of the Jesuits (Halloix, Delrio, Natalis Alexander, Schebrate, etc.) to vindicate the authorship of Dionysius the Areopagite were easily met and reduced by Dallaeus, Le Nourry, etc.

The non-authorship of Dionysius the Areopagite once agreed upon, the question arose, by whom, then, and at what time, these works were written; and a number of hypotheses were professed, from that of Baumgarten-Crusius, placing the author at Alexandria, in the third century, to that of Westcott, placing him at Edessa, at the beginning of the sixth century. The general outcome, however, of the critical researches is, that the philosophical, and more especially the mystical, ideas expounded in these books presuppose that later development of Neo-Platonism which was due to Proclus; and, as Proclus died 485, the date of the authorship of the books seems to coincide with the date of their first notice.

Lit.—The works were first printed at Basel, 1539 (Greek). By P. Lansellius they were edited (Greek and Latin), Paris, 1015. The best edition is that by the Jesuit, Balthasar Corderius, Antwerp, 1634 (containing the commentaries of Maximus and the paraphrase of Pachymeres), which was reprinted at Paris, 1644, Venice, 1755 (with augmented apparatus), Brixiae, 1823, De Dion. DIIONYSIUS OF ALEXANDRIA, also called the Great, a pupil of Origen, succeeded Heraclius in 232 as director of the catechetical school, and in 247 as bishop. A few years later on (250) he was overtaken by the Decian persecution. He fled, as did Cyprian; but, unlike him, he did not afterwards assume a severe attitude towards those who had become lapsed during the persecution. On the contrary, the mild discipline which he exercised he defended both in letters to his friends and colleagues, and, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., VI. 40), in a separate book. He was a man of a mild and kind temper; and the position he occupied in the schism of Novatian, in the controversy concerning the heretical baptism, etc., was that of a mediator. During the persecution of Valerian he was banished (257), first to Kephren in Libya, and then to Kolluthian in the Marcian; but the edict of Galienus (250) allowed him to return to Alexandria. In the last part of his episcopacy the city was fearfully devastated by uproar, murder, plague, and famine, of which a striking picture is found in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., VII. 22.

Dionysius is generally considered the most prominent of Origen's pupils. He opposed successfully the chiliastic views revived by Nepos; and his critical comparison between the Gospel and the Revelation by St. John is a model production. He was a member of the Alexandrian school. His opposition to Sabellianism was less successful: he stood on the very verge of heresy, but retreated safely through a book dedicated to Dionysius of Rome. Of his many works, polemical, ascetic, exegetical, and apologetical, only fragments have come down to us. Most of these are found in Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., VII. They have been collected by Gallandi: Bibl. Patr., III. p. 481, by Routh: Reliquiae Sacrae, Oxford, 1814, II. and IV., etc. Comp. Forster: De doctrina et sententia D. M. Berlin, 1885; Dittrich: Dionysius d. Große, Freib., 1827.

DIONYSIUS OF CORINTH became bishop of that city in 170, and wrote eight letters, — to the Lacedaemonians, Athenians, Nicomediens, etc., —which enjoyed a great reputation in their time, and are greatly praised by Jerome. They are lost, however; and only fragments of them have been preserved by Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., iv. 23.

DIONYSIUS OF ROME, bishop, 230–269, succeeded Xystus, having been presbyter of the Roman Church under Stephen. He was a Greek by birth, and maintained a lively connexion with the Greek Church. When Dionysius of Alexandria, in his controversy with the Sabellians, went too far in the opposite direction, and defined the nature of the Son as a mere creation, Dionysius of Rome stepped forward, and compelled him to retract. Afterwards the two Dionysii, of Rome and Alexandria, acted in union against Paul of Samosata at the councils of Constantinople (264 and 269).

DIONYSIUS EXIGUUS ("the Little"), a Scythian by birth, one of the most conspicuous and influential men of the Latin Church in the sixth century; he is said to have been about to be made Bishop of Rome, and d. there, as abbot of a monastery, 556. He translated a number of Greek works into Latin: Ratzerius: Epistola Paschalis, Vita St. Pachomii; Proclus: Lawsuitsen in Mariamus, and his epistle to the Armenian clergy; Gregory of Nyssa: De conditione hominis, etc. But that which has made his name most famous is his collection of canons and decretales (see Canon Law), and his Cyclus Paschalis, which forms the basis of the Christian or Dionysian era. See Era.

DIONYSIUS THE CARTHUSIAN, also called Richard, from his birthplace, or Lewis, the name of his family, was b. in 1403, in the diocese of Liége, the present Belgian Limburg; studied theology and philosophy in Cologne, and entered in 1423 the Carthusian Monastery of Roermonde, where he d. in 1471. He boasted of his iron head, severest ascetical exercises, and of his iron head, which enabled him to write more than one hundred works. He also boasted of receiving divine inspirations and revelations, on account of which he enjoyed a great reputation, obtained the title of Doctor Estaticus, and was taken into the intimacy of kings and kaisers. But when his chief work — Enarrationes, or Commentarii on the whole Bible, a heap of quotations from the Fathers and mystical-allegorical trifles — was printed at Cologne (in 7 vols., 1530–36), in order to be used as a thunderbolt against the Reformers, it proved entirely ineffectual. His Life, written by a brother Carthusian, Theodorich Loer, was published at Cologne (1532), and is found in Act. Vitae Patrum, 1708. Some information about his ecstasies is given by Doriandus in his Chronicon Carthusiense, Cologne, 1608.

HERZOG.

DIOCLETIANUS succeeded Cyril, in 443, as Bishop of Alexandria, and presided in 449 over the so-called Robber synod at Ephesus, which deposed Flavian, Patriarch of Constantinople, but was himself condemned and deposed by the Ecumenical council of Chalcedon (457), and banished to Gangra, PhaphLAGONIA, where he died, 454. See Eutyches and Ephesus.

DIPPEL, Johann Konrad (Christianus Democritus), b. at Frankenstein, Aug. 10, 1673; d. at Witgenstein, April 25, 1734; represents a curious mixture of rationalism and mysticism, frivolity and piety. After studying at Giessen, he went, in 1695, first to Wittenberg, and thence to Strasburg, where he lectured on alchemy and charomancy, and preached against the pietists, but was expelled on account of debt and disorderly conduct. In 1677 he published, under the pseudonym of Christianus Democritus, his Orthodoxia orthodozorum, in 1698 his Papismus Protestantium capulans, and in 1699 his Wett und Oel in die Wunden des gestübten Papsthums; but these books in which he rejected the doctrines of inspiration, atonement, etc., were suppressed by the censor. After practising in Berin as an alchemist, inventing the oleum Dippelii, the Berlinblue, etc., and in Amsterdam as a physician, he settled at Altona, but was arrested on account of some incunabulc remark on the Danish Government, and imprisoned in Bornholm from 1719 till 1725. After his release he went to Stockholm, where he found a flattering reception, and was made of gold, silver, ivory, or some kind of fine wood. On these tablets were written down the names of such persons, living or dead, as were to be specially mentioned in the prayer preceding the consecration, — benefactors of the church, teachers, popes, patriarchs, metropolitans, and bishops. To have one's name registered in the diptychs was considered a great honor, and to have it struck out was synonymous with expulsion from the communion. But the diptychs fell out of use in the Latin Church; but they are still in use in the Greek and Armenian churches.

DISCALCETANI, or BAREFOOTED MONKS and NUNS, is the common name of all such reli-Disciples of Christ, or Christians.

Name.—This religious people, sometimes called "Campbellites," or "Campbellite Baptists," in accordance with their cherished principles of union and apostolic simplicity, wish to be known only by the names applied to followers of Christ in the inspired Word. They reason from 1 Cor. iii. 4, and kindred passages, that sectarian names are unscriptural, and causes of division; and in harmony with Acts xi. 36, xxvi. 28; 1 Pet. iv. 16; and Rev. xx. 9, as individuals and as a people, call themselves simply "Disciples of Christ," or "Christians," and their churches, "Churches of Christ," or, using the adjective, "Christian Churches." Under this title they plead for the union of all lovers of Christ.

History.—As a distinct body of believers they date from the early part of the present century. Simultaneously, in different parts of the United States, arose teachers among the religious denominations, who pleaded for the Bible alone, without any human addition in form of creeds or formulas of faith, and the union of Christians of every name upon the basis of the apostles' teaching. This movement assumed most notable proportions in Virginia, Ohio, and Kentucky. In 1823 Alexander Campbell (see title) of Bethany, Va., began to set forth with great vigor and learning, in a periodical entitled The Christian Baptist, the plea for a restoration of the original gospel and primitive order of things, as under the apostles. It was not a reformation that was sought, but a restoration, a renewal of the ancient landmarks of the Christian religion. But, as long before as 1811, he had publicly advocated the principles already stated, and had organized the first regular organization at Brush Run, Penn., May 4, 1811, with thirty members. The Campbells, father and son, having been convinced of the Scriptures necessity of immersion, were themselves immersed, and impressed the doctrine and practice upon their followers. From that hour Thomas Campbell gave place to his son Alexander, who was afterwards the soul of the movement. In 1813 the Brush Run Church united with the Redstone Baptist Association, and ten years later with the Mahoning Association in the Western Reserve of Ohio. In 1827 the Baptist churches withdrew fellowship from those who contended for the Bible alone, and the followers of Campbell organized themselves anew. Since the death of Alexander Campbell (1866), the religious people known as "Christians," or "Disciples of Christ," have made their mightiest strides. They number now in the United States six hundred thousand communicants, fifty-one hundred churches, and thirty-eight hundred ministers, besides holding missions in churches in England and Australia, and missions in France, Denmark, Turkey, and Jamaica.

Their strength in this country lies chiefly in the West and South-west; Illinois, Indiana, and Kentucky having the largest bodies.

Educational Enterprises.—They are active in the work of education, supporting two universities (the North-Western Christian University, Indianapolis, Ind., and Kentucky University, Lexington, Ky.) and thirty-two colleges and seminaries of high grade, the best known of which are Bethany College in West Virginia, founded in 1840 by Alexander Campbell, and presided over by him until his death; and Hiram College, Hiram, O., of which James A. Garfield was for a time president. They publish forty religious periodicals.

The most prominent man among them was the late President, James A. Garfield, who was an active member of this body, and, by his elevation to the chief magistracy of the United States, did much to bring the principles of the disciples into notice. He was baptized by Elder William A. Little, March 4, 1850. For five years, while a teacher at Hiram College, he preached the doctrines of the church with great eloquence and success, until 1856, when his political career began. During all his subsequent life, until his death, Sept. 19, 1881, he was devoted to the church of his choice, a trustee of Hiram and Bethany Colleges, and actively interested in the local churches of the Mahoning Association in the Western Reserve of Ohio. In 1882 he was for a time president. They publish forty notices. He was baptized by Elder William A. Little, March 4, 1850.

Disciples hold, that, while both Old and New Testaments are equally inspired, both are not equally binding upon Christians. The Old Testament was God's will with reference to the Jews; the New, God's will in reference to us, God having spoken unto us by a Son. Accepting fully the Scripture statements concerning the Godhead, they repudiate all philosophical speculations, both of Trinitarians and Unitarians. They do not use the theological terms common to the schools, but insist on the form of sound words given in the Scriptures. Accepting the Bible as the all-sufficient revelation of the divine will, they repudiate all authoritative creeds and human bases of fellowship. Receiving Jesus in all his divinity and Christhood, they accept the truth that he is the Christ, as the one article of faith, the creed of the church, the fundamental fact of the Christian religion and belief; faith in that, with all the heart, being all they ask in order to baptism and church-membership. Recognizing the agency of the Holy Spirit in conversion, they repudiate all theories of special spiritual operations outside of the Word, but demand that the sinner shall hear, believe, repent, and obey the gospel, trusting God to do the rest. Admitting the necessity of faith and repentance, they submit no other tests, no human formula of belief; but on a confession of Christ, and assurance of heartfelt desire to abandon sin, and work righteousness, men are baptized, and received into the church. Accepting baptism as a divine ordinance, they insist that “he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved.” They bid men “Repent, and be baptized for the remission of sins,” and claim that the evidence of pardon and of the gift of the Spirit is not in dreams or visions, but in the sinner’s knowledge of his heartfelt acceptance of the terms of pardon, and his assurance of the faithfulness of God. Claiming the Lord’s Supper a divine ordinance, they consider it not as a sacrifice, but a memorial feast, and keep it on every first day of the week, meeting as the Lord’s people, and recognizing neither open nor close communion. The Lord’s Day they regard not as the sabbath, but a New-Testament appointment in memory of the resurrection. The Church of Christ with them is not a sect, but a divine institution. Sects are not branches of the church, but unscriptural: God’s people are to be gathered from them, and united in the “one body,” of which Christ is the Head.

In regard to the action of baptism, the Disciples are in accord with the Baptists. Immersion with them is the divinity of baptism, and requirement that could be universally accepted. As to the subjects of baptism, they receive to that ordinance only believers in Christ. With respect to the design of baptism, they accord more with Pede-baptists. They baptize “for the remission of sins,” and claim that the sinner, in obeying this ordinance, appropriates God’s promise of pardon, relying on the divine testimony, “He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved,” i.e., pardoned. The Disciples date the beginning of the Christian institution from Pentecost, not from Abraham, Moses, nor John the Baptist. The Jewish institution, they claim, passed away when Christ exclaimed, “It is finished.” All things then became new; and the New Testament contains the history, constitution, and laws of the Church of Christ. In church government they have no distinction of clergy and laity. Their government is congregational, with evangelists, bishops or elders, and deacons. The Bible is their only book of doctrine and discipline.

The special plea of the Disciples is the restoration of original apostolic Christianity, and the union of the church. Under Discussion, that as the church was in the beginning, there was one spiritual brotherhood, — one body with one Lord, one faith, and one baptism, — there should be but one to-day; that all party names, creeds, and organizations should be abandoned, and the church have no creed but the Bible, no law but the Lord’s, no name but the Master’s; and that, as the basis of that primitive union was the common teaching of Christ and the apostles, nothing is now essential to the union of Christians but the apostles’ teaching, and nothing is essential to the conversion of the world but the union and co-operation of Christians with the apostles’ teaching or testimony.

DISCIPLINE. The Christian congregation, like every other community, needs discipline for the sake of self-protection, in order to suppress or eliminate any thing that might impair or destroy its life. But, as the Christian congregation is a community of the faithful, the character of its discipline is purely spiritual. The object of all church-discipline is to prevent scandal, with a further view to retrieving the offender himself; and the only means which can be employed for this purpose is, properly speaking, exclusion, partial or total, from the community. A punishment which has a civil effect is inadmissible.

The centre of the whole scriptural doctrine of ecclesiastical discipline is the passage Matt. xviii. 15-18; and its practical application in the apostolical church we learn from 1 Cor. v. and 2 Cor. iii. 4-8. A member of the Corinthian congregation had taken his stepmother for a wife, and the congregation had made no objection. Paul then wrote to the Corinthians, that he who had done that deed should be excommunicated, and “delivered unto Satan;” and his words produced such an impression not only on the congregation, but also on the offender, that, when he wrote again to the Corinthians, Paul could recommend mercy. It is, however, not only for such flagrant offences as the above that he demands punishment, but also for such minor failings as idleness, by which a man is made a burden to his fellow-men (2 Thess. iii. 0); and the danger against which he warns the congregations most urgently is heresy, for it eats like a canker (2 Tim. ii. 17). A heretic, after admonishing him once or twice in vain, reject (Tit. iii. 10): do not even bid him God speed (2 John 10, 11). The punishment, however, must never be administered in a spirit of retaliation. Church discipline, though ever so necessary for the self-protection of the church, has its last and highest aim in the reconciliation of the offender; and in the spirit of love it must dictate its punishments (2 Cor. ii. 6-8).

The apostolical institutions of excommunication and reconciliation lived on in the post-apostolic church, and during the period of persecution became even more peremptory in their demands. Under Decision, that as persecution have been the total destruction of Christianity, there occurred, by the side of the most admirable examples of faithfulness, so frequent instances of defection, that a special regulation for the reconciliation of the lapsi became a necessity. This regulation, which continued valid down to the fifth century, established a course of penance (see art.) which ran through various stages, and comprised a period of several years; but its severity naturally called forth devices of evasion and subterfuge, such as the libelli of the confessors (see art.) and at various times and in various places church-discipline became somewhat lax. A re-action towards greater severity followed, and the Montanists arose, declaring that the excommunicated ought to remain for their whole life in a state of penance, and the Novatians, declaring that the church had no right at all to forgive the lapsi their sins, though the Lord might be willing to do so, etc. When the persecutions ceased, and the Christian Church became the Church of the State, great numbers of uncovered and worldly people entered it as members, and thereby discipline was almost lost. It became not only laxer, but entirely changed character. Already in the sixth century there existed casuistical regulations of penance-fines. The first book of penance in the Greek Church was written by Johannes Jejunator, Patriarch of Constantinople (d. 593). A new re-action followed, and the Donatists arose, demanding that the church should be kept absolutely pure, and declaring that one who had been excommunicated could never administer the sacraments. But no re-action against the degeneration of the discipline of the church was of any avail from the moment the church adopted the theory of indulgences, and put it into practice.

Under Gregory the Great the doctrine of purgatory became the doctrine of the church; and on this foundation Peter Lombard reared the theory of indulgence, according to which the church was the power, not only to transform the punishments of purgatory into earthly punishments, but also to transform the latter into simple money-fines. The most prominent among the schoolmen followed in the track of the doctors of the Greek Church; and in 1343 Clement VI. solemnly confirmed the theory of the dogmatists. The Rationalists, of course, abolished all such regulations, which continued valid down to the fifth century, established a course of penance, and regulation, not at all. When the Church is a State, church-discipline is apt to become a matter of civil legislation. Thither princes ordered their subjects, under heavy penalties, to go to church thrice every Sunday; if not, the poor were scourged, or put in the stocks, and the rich were fined. Very often no distinction can be made between church-discipline and police-regulations. The Rationalists, of course, abolished all such laws; but at the same time they also swept away every trace of church-discipline, and it was not until after 1848 that the question was again mooted within the Lutheran Church.

In the Reformed Church, with its strong sympathy for the Old Testament, with its view of the congregation as the chosen flock of the Lord, organized as it was under the form of a theocracy, but wholly repudiating the private confession, it was quite natural that its discipline should be established, not on the merely negative principle of preventing evil, but on the positive principle of producing good; as a kind of superintendence in its totality, but also of that of each individual member. In Zürich, Calvin trans-ferred the whole church-discipline to the magistrature; and he considered it right that the church should provide for whose improvement simple excommunication proved insufficient should be further prosecuted and punished. In Geneva, Calvin formed a special consistory for church-discipline, composed of elders, magistrates, and clergymen; but this consistory, too, added heavy civil penalties, even death, to the ban. In the Reformed Church discipline became a social institution, whose aim was to form a holy congregation by superintending the moral purity of the members; and, thus organized, it was exercised with much greater vigor, and developed much further, than in the Lutheran Church; though in the course of time it was much modified and mitigated, in France, the Netherlands, Scotland, and America.

DISCIPLINE.

In the Episcopal Church, discipline is laid down in the canon. It relates mainly to the clergy; but laymen can be kept from the sacrament of the Lord's Supper on conviction of serious offenses.

In the Presbyterian Church, discipline is in the hands of the session, or the governing board of each local church, consisting of the pastor and elders; but, if the party feels aggrieved, an appeal can be made to the next higher court, the presbytery, thence to the synod, and thence to the general assembly. The method of trial in all such cases is minutely laid down in book ii. of the Form of Government. In the Northern Presbyterian Church, reference to the highest court can only be made when the points involved are doctrinal or constitutional. Discipline is defined to be "the exercise of that authority, and the application of that system of laws, which the Lord Jesus Christ has appointed in his church." The subjects of discipline are "all baptized persons." The offence must be public, or such as demands the cognizance of the church judicatory; but private exhortation must first be employed.

In the Congregational Church, discipline is a purely congregational matter; and there can be no appeal. See H. M. DEXTER: Congregationalism, Boston, 4th ed., 1870, pp. 185-195.

In the Methodist Church, "an accused member shall be brought to trial before a committee of not less than five, who shall not be members of the quarterly conference (and, if the preacher judge it necessary, he may select the committee from any part of the district), in the presence of the preacher-in-charge, who shall preside in the trial, and cause exact minutes of the evidence and proceedings in the case to be taken. In the selection of the committee the parties may challenge for cause." The various causes of such action are stated. "The accused shall have the right to call to his assistance as counsel any member in good and regular standing in the Methodist-Episcopal Church." If the pastor-in-charge dissent from the finding of the committee, he can appeal to the ensuing quarterly conference. Expulsion is the penalty for unworthy conduct on the part of accused members. See The Doctrines and Discipline of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, 1880 (N. Y., 1880), pp. 144-151.

Origin, Doctrine, and Rules; II. Government of the Church; III. Administration of Discipline; IV. Educational and Benevolent Institutions; V. Temporal Economy; VI. Ritual of the Church.
DIVORCE. 648

that of property; and hence the man who sought for a wife bought a daughter from her father for this purpose. But in time the money went, in many tribes, with the daughter to her husband; yet the feeling still was that she was her husband's property. If he was unfaithful to her, he had the right of putting her to death: if she did not suit him, he could send her back to her friends. But his infidelity to her gave her no corresponding rights against her husband. The earliest conception of adultery was, that a married woman must be one of the parties, but a man married could not be guilty of this crime with an unmarried woman. The penalty for the crime was commonly death, but might be, by act of the husband, mitigated into sending away or divorce. It would seem, that, when the crime was committed, the trial of the woman, according to the practice among the Jews, came, in time, to be put into the hands of "righteous men" (Ezek. xxiii. 45), in which case a public trial was evidently thought of. Probably all that the husband ordinarily did was to put away a guilty wife; but, if she were caught in the act, he could kill her and her paramour.

There is in the Hebrew Scriptures no evidence that the woman could get herself divorced from her husband; and Josephus (Antiq. xv. 7, 10), when he speaks of Salome's sending a bill of divorce to Costabarus, adds that this was not in accordance with Jewish law; so that a woman separated by her own act from her husband could not marry another, but only if she were put away by her first husband. What meaning, then, are we to give to Mark x.12? Was the wife's power to put away a husband creeping in among the Jews, who lived under Greek or Roman law? or did our Lord give a rule to his apostles, as future teachers of the heathen world?

Divorce on the husband's part was at first unrestricted. But in Deut. xxiv. 1 two restrictions were laid upon it: the one of them, that a "bill of divorce" should give the woman a life, which would show that she had committed no crime, and might marry again; and the other, that the first husband could never take back the wife so put away, in case the second husband should repudiate her. This would greatly pollute the land (Jer. iii. 1). The cause or causes of divorce in Deuteronomy, i.e., are expressed by the words erath dabar, the meaning of which, since the times of Hillel and Shamai, in the century before Christ, has been matter of dispute. They occur also in Deut. xxiii. 14, and may be rendered "uncleanness or filthiness from a thing" in a moral sense, as Shammai's school understood them, or any thing disgusting or unpleasant in a physical sense, as was Hillel's opinion. The passage in Mal. ii. 16, "For the Lord the God of Israel saith that he hatcheth putting away," indicates a moral and humane dislike of what was once tolerated.

Our Lord and the apostle Paul go far beyond these restrictions on divorce. Christ (Matt. v. 31, 32, xix. 3–9; Mark x. 2, 12), without giving a code of rules, sets aside the practice allowed in Deut. xxiv. 1 to the husband, and forbids the practice of a separation without the consent of the other, except for the cause of her fornication. To this he adds that the woman thus divorced commits adultery by her marrying another man, and that this new husband is involved in the same guilt: in other words, adultery is the only cause for which a man can put away his wife, and for which, as Mark adds, a woman can put away her husband, without violating this commandment. In Matt. xix. 3–9 and Mark lord places before his disciples his views concerning marriage, which accorded entirely with this prohibition. The union commenced by marriage was so close that they became one flesh, and could not cease to be such by one of the parties tearing away his body, except by a violent disruption, from the other. This was the original idea in the institution, which really opposed polygamy also; and it was a departure from the original law of our nature when Moses, on account of the Jews' inveterate attachment to an evil usage, "suffered them to put away their wives." Adultery only can separate this close union; and there can be no marriage of either consort to any one else, except on this account.

Of the addition in Mark to what is contained in Matthew we have spoken already. The passage in Luke xvi. 18 completes the teaching of our Lord found in the Gospels on this subject. It contains no exception or qualification, as if all remarriage after divorce were adultery. But the passage is found in company with others with which it has a very remote connection. It seems to have been a portion of the Sermon on the Mount, and must be interpreted by the fuller account in Matthew.

In no other place does our Lord act as a legislator and an amender of the law of Moses; and even here he gives no body of rules, but confines himself to a single command. The command itself is confined to that case which was touched in Deuteronomy. One may still ask whether the guilty party, divorced on account of adultery, may marry again: the answer must be affirmative, in so far as the adulterer or adulteress ceases to be one flesh with his or her former partner. But, as much adultery would be a capital crime by Jewish law, there was less need of saying anything further about it, and it is a wonder that it can be tolerated in any Christian country.

The apostle Paul, in 1 Cor. vii. 10–16, gives directions to the Corinthian Church, which may be called a supplement to our Lord's commands, as contained in the synoptical Gospels. These directions consist of two parts, one of which is intended to meet a case which would have occurred when both husband and wife were professed Christian believers (vers. 10, 11). A wife is commanded not to separate herself from her husband, to which is added, that, if she be already in a state of separation from him, she is to remain unmarried, or be reconciled to him. The husband also is not to put away his wife. Here we remark, first that the word denoting "be or become reconciled" implies a serious dissen-
The apostle's other precept relates first to cases where either husband or wife was still an unbeliever, but might wish to live with his or her Christian partner. In this case the Christian was not to leave the unbeliever (vers. 12–14). Or again: the unbeliever might wish to separate himself or herself from the Christian. The apostle's direction here is, if the unbeliever depart (παρελθεῖται), that is, lives separate, let him depart (παραλείπεται), as in vers. 10, 11. In such cases the Christian wife or husband is not in bondage, that is, is under no such obligation, or in such a state of bondage, as to feel constrained to continue the marriage connection. This feeling might be cherished in the hope of saving the unbelieving husband or wife; but this was too uncertain an event to demand that the Christian should keep up the family life when the heathen was bent on separation, and when God had called believers in peace, i.e., to be in the ethical condition of peace. Thus the believer is to be passive, and not active, in the separation, and is not to feel that the possibility of saving a heathen wife or husband at any expense of strife is a duty. Here in vers. 15 and in vers. 10 the word παρελθεῖται must be understood, we must believe, as simple separation; although this has been much disputed.

From Christ's precepts it follows that a marriage is dissolved by adultery, so that the innocent party may marry again, and that other separations are not included in this permission.

On these foundations the practice of divorce in Christendom has been placed, after long struggles of both parties for a law by which we have no room to unfold. The Catholic doctrine of the sacraments modified the view of marriage, and so of divorce, by forbidding second marriages after divorce for cause of adultery; and divorce became simply separation a mensa et toro, in every case where the parties were both Christians. Where one of them was a heathen, the Roman Church simply withheld a permission conceded by Christ to remarry in that one case, but enjoined nothing new. And to this may be added, that cases of nullity, of which Christ says nothing, were much disputed. Divorce also was beset by enlarged civil and by spiritual relationships. The dissolution of such marriage, however, is not an act of divorcing, but of pronouncing a marriage in form no marriage in substance, and therefore void ab initio. It cannot be denied that the Catholic Church, by its sacramental theory applied to marriage, takes the most sacred of all natural institutions out of the hands of the civil power in great measure. It can endure what is called civil marriage, although loath to make any concession; but divorce it must keep under its control; its principle being that re-marriage, while a husband or wife is living, places a person outside of the pale of the Church.

In Protestant countries, when the new State churches were founded, they were very considerably under the control of civil powers, which asserted their own rights of controlling marriage and divorce. Yet the State law concerning divorce was not framed, we believe, without the consultation of the Church. Thus in the old ecclesiastical courts lost this jurisdiction. The law of divorce was also altered. Divorce absolute may be granted for adultery of the wife, or for adultery, connected with certain other crimes, of the husband; and judicial separation may be granted to either party for adultery, cruelty, or causeless desertion for two years or more.

Other Protestant countries in modern times have greatly multiplied the causes for which divorce or separation may be obtained, by adding to the original two causes stated already such others as cruelty, imprisonment for crime, drunkenness, contagious or incurable disease, and even insanity. In some countries incompatibility of temper, in some, mutual agreement, with no allegation of crime, are allowed to be causes for divorce absolute. In one of the United States the judges are left free to grant divorce when they think that the happiness of the marriage relation requires it. Separation a mensa et toro is one of the reliefs generally provided for parties petitioning to have their marriages terminated by law; but a number of the States of the American Union grant divorce absolute alone.

In the Catholic countries of Europe either no absolute divorce or separation is granted, which we have no room to unfold. The Catholic doctrine of the sacraments modified the view of marriage, and so of divorce, by forbidding second marriages after divorce for cause of adultery; and divorce became simply separation a mensa et toro, in every case where the parties were both Christians.

Nowhere is the problem of divorce so poorly solved, or so charged with danger for the future, as in the United States. It is certainly an alarming fact that the ratio of divorce to marriage is as one to ten, or even greater, in some States; and that in another State it has sunk, within twenty years, from the ratio of one to fifty-one, down to the ratio of one to twenty-one. Happily, these and similar indications of a greater ratio than is elsewhere known are now exciting the attention of many Christian people, as is shown by the recent formation of the New-England Divorce Reform League, in which all the Christian denominations are united with a hearty interest.

The evils of divorce in the United States are felt in no one quarter of the Union, but are more exactly known in the Eastern States. If the laws grant dissolutions of marriage for grounds which Christians cannot find to be justified in the Scriptures, it must injure the church, and society suffers still more. Loose laws aggravate the evils they are made to relieve. If any partners in marriage were told by the State that they can be separated on declaring, for instance, their mutual consent and desire before the court, they would, of course, be tempted mentally to put, "as long as we agree," into the place of "until death do us part." The ideal of marriage would then be lowered. It is no longer the close union denoted by "twin becoming one flesh," or by God's joining man and wife together, so that man may not put away his wife, but it is a contract made between two persons for their own convenience, and made with the less caution because either can put the other away. The real closeness of the union cannot be preserved unless the parties feel the truth of what Christ says of it. Then, again, law, in a country like ours, is liable to constant changes for the worse, if the feeling of the sanctity of the marriage is not sustained; but this feeling cannot be sustained without some religious sense of the nature and ends of marriage. Bad laws tend to make bad husbands and wives, and hence bad families. The laws of divorce and the opinion of society will act upon one another.

When the laws respecting divorce and the opinions concerning divorce in the New Testament are in conflict, there is no question, in most cases, what is the duty of Christians. The law can be permissive only; that is, it may leave it to individuals to choose whether they will make use of the license it affords them or not. It does not oblige them to bring suits for dissolution of marriage, even in the case when a husband or wife has been unfaithful in their marriage relations. The offence may be condoned, and they may live together still. And again: law could not, without being tyrannical, require a church, which has disciplined one of its members on account of divorce and re-marriage contrary to the rule of Scripture, to restore him to his standing. But, although this be true, a church may be brought into great perplexity when State law opens a gate which the law of the New Testament shuts. For the thoughtless are tempted by the law to do what is held to be unlawful by the Church; while the Church has no option in regard to exercising its discipline upon offenders within its folds. The State's permission is no more a bar to discipline in such case than if the church-member had opened an authorized gambling or drinking house. But if the law had agreed in its provisions with the Church, there would have been no such trouble, and those who, in the case supposed, had been led by the State into unlawful marriages, would, in all probability, have been deterred from committing such an offence.

There is, however, one case which deserves notice on account of its difficulty. Two irreligious persons have connected themselves in marriage, one of whom had put away a wife or husband for an offence not recognized by the law of Christ as justifying dissolution. They live for years together, and have a family. At length they become believers in Christ, and apply to the church for admission. In such an extreme case as this, shall the request be denied? Shall they be required to live apart afterward, until the former husband or wife of one of them shall die? We leave the settlement of this case to casuists, glad that it is rare, and only remarking that its peculiarity consists in the performance of important duties which cannot be performed when once the parties are separated.

DIXON, James, b. in Leicestershire, 1788; d. at Bradford, Yorkshire, Dec. 28, 1871. He was president of the British Conference (1841), and delegate of the Wesleyan Conference to the General Methodist Conference of the United States. He wrote Methodism in Its Origin, Economy, and Present Position (printed by the Methodist Book Concern, N.Y., 1843).

DOANE, George Washington, D.D., LL.D., Protestant-Episcopal Bishop of New Jersey; b. May 27, 1799, in Trenton, N.J.; d. at Burlington, N.J., April 27, 1859. He was graduated from Union College, N.Y., 1818; admitted to holy orders, 1821; was consecrated bishop, Oct. 31, 1832. He was energetic, indefatigable in labor, but had bitter enemies and numerous controversies. His writings in prose and verse were collected by his son, who prefaced them with a Memoir, The Life and Writings of G. W. Doane, D.D., N.Y., 1860, 4 vols. An edition of his Songs by the Way, under the same editorship, appeared, N.Y., 1873. His best known hymns are, "Softly now the light of day," and "Thou art the way: to thee alone."

DOBritzHoFFER, Martin, b. at Grätz, in Styria, 1717; d. in Vienna, July 17, 1791; entered the Society of Jesus in 1738, and went in 1749 to Paraguay as a missionary among the Abipones and Guaranas, but returned to Europe in 1767, when the Jesuit missionaries were expelled from Spanish America. In 1784 he published his Historia de Abiponibus, Vienna, 3 vols., which was translated into English by Sara Coleridge, Account of the Abipones, an Equestrian People of Paraguay, London, 1822, 3 vols.

DOCTOR (teacher). Originally there were only two degrees in graduation,—bachelor and Jerome, Hilary, Gregory the Great, Chrysologus, four of the Greek fathers (Athanasius, Basil, for the purpose of instructing the people, more instruct any one, young or old, ignorant or educated, Bonaventura, and Alphonso Liguori). Sent them into the streets, and out upon the high construction of the catechumens was called in the early Church. The title Doctor is used in the present Greek Church; thus the interpreters of the Gospels, Epistles of Paul, and the Gospels, are called Doctors of the Gospels, the Apostle, and the Psalter respectively.

Doctor is also part of the epithet describing the most prominent quality or trait of several of the great schoolmen of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries: thus, Thomas Aquinas, D. (i.e., Doctor) Angelicus; Johannes Bonaventura, D. Seraphicus; Johannes Duns Scotus, D. Subtilis; Raimundus Lullus, D. Illuminatus; Alainus de Insulis (de l'Isle), D. Universalis; Durandus d. S. Porcella, D. Resolutus; Gregorius de Rimini, D. Authenticus; Johannes Taulerus, D. Illuminatus; Johannes Gersonus, D. Christianissimus; Alexander Hales, D. Irrefragabilis; Roger Bacon, D. Admirabilis; William Occam, D. Singularis. For the Jewish Doctors of the Law, see RABBINS.

DOCTRINAIRE is the common name of two religious associations which originated, independently of each other, in Italy and France. In Italy the association of the Padri della Dottrina Christiana was founded in Rome (1562) by Marcus de Sadis Cusanus, a nobleman from Milan, for the purpose of instructing the people, more especially the children, in the catechism. Under Pius V. it spread rapidly. In France the association of the Doctrinaires, or Pères de la Doctrine Chrétienne, was founded by Caesar de Bus, priest and canon of Caullion. He gathered a number of young priests; and after due preparation he sent them into the streets, and out upon the highways, to catechise every one they met; while he walked himself from house to house, offering to instruct any one, young or old, ignorant or educated, in the catechism of the Roman Catholic Church. The association prospered, and in 1597 Clement VIII. confirmed the constitution. See HELOY: Histoire des Ordres Monastiques, etc., Paris, 1714–19.

HEBZOG.

DOCTRINES, The History of Christian, did not become an independent branch of Thomistic learned until after the latter part of the eighteenth century. Before that time, it was treated simply as a chapter of dogmatics or church-history. But the richness of its materials, and the importance of its study, naturally led to a more elaborate treatment. The first impulse was given by the rationalists: CH. W. FRANZ WALTCH: Gedanken v. d. Geschichte d. Glaubenslehre, Göttingen, 1750; EXNER: Einleitung zu S. J. Baumgarten's Glaubenslehre, 1759; and RISSLER: Lehrbegriff der chr. Kirche in den 3 ersten Jahrhunderten, Frankfurt-a-M., 1771. In the earlier Protestant theology the subject forms only an appendix, either to church-history or to dogmatics. See the Magdeburg Centuries, Basel, 1559–74. CHEMNITZ: Examen Concilii Tridentini, Frankfurt, 1615; JOH. GERMANN: Confessio Catholica, Leipzig, 1679. Twice, however, it was treated independently,—by L'AVIUS, a Roman Catholic (Opus de theologica dogmatis, 4 vols., 1702, and D. FORBESIUS A CORSE, a Scotchman of the Reformed Church (Institutiones historico-theologicae de doctrina Christiana, Amsterdam, 1645); but in both cases the treatment was more argumentative than truly historical. The rationalists found the method by which a history of Christian doctrines can be written, but they failed to find the right standpoint from which it ought to be written. They did not understand that the whole sum of Christian truth has been given in the teachings of Christ and the apostles; that, however great may be the difference between the confession of the church of our day and that of the primitive church, in precision, elaborateness, etc., nothing new has been added; that the history of a dogma is simply an evolution of form, put in motion by a craving for a deeper conception of the idea, and, at every stage of its movement, authorized by its results on the conscience of the whole church. They hold the history of Christian doctrines as a contest between merely subjective opinions about religious matters, without any foundation in a given revelation, and without any regulation from an inherent logic. The same standpoint was occupied by MÜNCHEN, the most erudite of the historians of Christian doctrines (Handbuch d. chr. Dogmengeschichte, Marburg, 1783–1809, 4 vols., and Lehrbuch d. Dogmengeschichte, 1812, 2d ed., 1819, 3d ed. by Coelius and Neudecker, Cassel, 1892–93). But a change took place under the influence of Neander and Schleiermacher, and the results have been very rich: BAUMGARTEN-CRUSSUS: Lehrbuch d. Dogmengeschichte, 1802, and Compendium d. chr. Dogmengeschichte, Leipzig, 1840–46, 2 parts, the 2d part edited by C. Hase; the Lehrbücher von P. DOD. Albert Baldwin, a Presbyterian scholar and divine; b. at Mendham, N.J., March 24, 1805; d. at Princeton, Nov. 20, 1845. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1822, and at the Princeton Seminary, and was professor of mathematics in the college from 1830 to his death, teaching in his latter years architecture and political economy in addition. He was widely read, and gifted with a philosophical mind of rare power. His contributions to The Princeton Review are remarkable, especially those on phrenology (April, 1838) and on capital punishment (April, 1842). Some of them are reprinted in The Princeton Essays, N.Y.; and one, on Transcendentalism, was issued separately.

DOD, John, Puritan, called the Decalogist from his work named below; b. at Shotledge, Ches- shire, 1547; d. as rector of Fawesley, Northampton- shire, August, 1615. He was fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge, and then pastor for many years; eminent for Hebrew learning. His wit was also famous; and his Sayings were proverbial, and to be found in cottages. He wrote, in connection with Robert Cleaver, Expositions of the Ten Commandments, London, 1606, 18th ed., 1632; Of Proverbs, 1635; Of the Lord's Prayer, 1635.

DODDRIDGE, Philip, D.D., a celebrated dissenting (Independent) divine, and writer of hymns; son of a merchant, and last of twenty children; was b. in London, June 26, 1702; d. at Lisbon, Oct. 26, 1751. From infancy he was of infirm constitution. He enjoyed the instructions of pious parents, and early turned his attention to the constitution. He was as scrupulous in his habits of study; rising at five in the morning, and laying out plans of study, and subjects of sermons, months ahead. He made it a rule to avoid controversy, and showed sympathy with the Methodists,—a course which drew upon him the charge of "trimmer and double-dealer."

Among his works, the most important are Life of the Rev. John Emmanuel, The Family Expositor, A Continu- entary on the New Testament (which became a household work in England), and The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul (1745), which he wrote at the suggestion of Dr. Watts. With the Pilgrim's Progress, Henry's Commentary, and Al- leine's Alarm, it has been more extensively used as a stimulus to piety than any other work in the English language. As an author of hymns he was very prolific. Among the more favorite ones are, "Awake, my soul, stretch every nerve," and "Grace, 'tis a charming sound!"

DODWELL, Henry, a learned though whimsi- cal theologian; b. at Dublin, October, 1641; d. at Shottesbrooke, Berkshire, June 7, 1711. He was a fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, but resigned on taking orders (1666), and settled in London (1674); wrote in defence of the Anglican Church, and made such a reputation that he was appointed Camden Professor of History at Oxford in 1668, but lost the chair by the accession of William III., by refusing to take the oath of allegiance, for he had joined the party of James II. He defended the non-juring bishops, declaring those "schismatics" who submitted, and himself left the Anglican communion, but afterwards changed his mind, and as publicly recognized the authority of the "schismatics," and shortly before his death re-entered the Church of England. His works were numerous, particularly in the various departments of classical literature, and attest great industry and learning, but little judgment. He is remembered for his assertion, in his Dissertationes in Irenæum (Oxford, 1659), that the New-Testament demoniacs were epileptics, and for his Epistolary Discourse, proving from the Scriptures and the First Fathers that the Soul is naturally Mortal, but immortalized actually by the Pleasure of God, to Punishment, or to Reward, or its Union with the Divine Baptismal Spirit, London, 1706. He raised a violent opposition, but vigorously defended himself. He connected immor- tality with baptism, and also advocated priestly absolution. In private life he was exemplary, and led to strict to asceticism. Curiously enough one of his sons (Henry) became noted for scepticism, and another (William) for orthodoxy.—See Works abridged, with an Account of his Life, by FRANCIS BROKESBY, B.D., London, 1715.

DOEDERLEIN, Johann Christof, b. at Wind- sheim, in Franconia, Jan. 20, 1745; d. at Jena, Dec. 2, 1792; studied at Altorf; was made pro- fessor in theology there in 1772, and moved in 1782 to Jena. Of his exegetical works, his Jesuïtes (1775) and Solomon's Wisdom (1778) were much appreciated; but it was more especially in the field of dogmatics that he exercised influence, Institutio theol. Christianæ (1780) forming a transition from the old orthodoxy to the dawning rationalism. In the same spirit he also edited the Theologische Bibliothek from 1780.

DOEG, an Edomite servant of Saul, who being at Nob, prefacing an account of executed lep- rous, saw the interview between Ahimelech and David, and reported it to Saul, whose anger was so raised that he put the entire priesthood at Nob to death, with the solitary exception of Abi- athar who escaped to David, and the settlement

DOGMA. (Greek `dōma) means, first, a fixed and final resolution, especially when having a public and general character,—a decree. In this sense the Septuagint and the New Testament use it for all obligatory precepts with respect to practical life, for the decrees of civil authorities (Esth. iii. 9; Dan. ii. 13, vi. 8; Luke ii. 1), for the decrees of the apostles (Acts xvi. 4), and for the Mosaic decrees (Col. ii. 14; Eph. ii. 15). Next, it denotes in the language of the philosophers, more especially in that of the Stoics, such definitions of principles and ideas as are considered settled forever, and raised above doubt. Thus Plato applies it (De Rep., VII. 538 Steph.) to those axioms of the philosophy of the good and beautiful which he wanted children to learn in the school. Finally, it means such propositions or sentences, expressive of ethico-religious truths, as are believed to have originated from a divine revelation. Thus Josephus (Contra Apion., I. 8) calls this the contents of the sacred books of the Jews τὸν δόμον; and for the application of the name to the Christian revelation, see Ignatius: Ad Magnes., 13; Origenes: De Princ. Fragm., IV. 156; Clement Alxandrinus: Strom., VII. p. 783, etc.

DOGMATICS (from dogma, see above) means the systematic representation and scientific argumentation of the tenets of a religious community. Judaism and Mohammedanism might have their dogmatics, like Christianity, and partially have. Generally, however, the name is confined to the systematic treatment of the Christian verities as they have been divinely revealed and historically developed and comprehended.

A Christian science (that is, a philosophical exposition of the ideas of Christianity, and a scientific argumentation of the truth of these ideas) arose very early in the Church; but, as it arose almost exclusively as a defence against the attacks of Pagan or Jewish civilization, it naturally assumed the character of apologetics, and that character it retained down to the beginning of the fourth century. (See art. Apologetics.) When Christianity became the State religion of the Roman Empire, it needed the apology no more: but the scientific spirit, once awakened within its bosom, was not destined to go to sleep again; it only changed object. From the fourth to the ninth century it was engaged in a scientific definition of the Christian truths, in the formulation of the Christian dogmas; and this task was performed through a continuous series of literary controversies, rising now and then into furious contests. With the beginning of the ninth century this fermentation was about finished; and then followed, down to the beginning of the sixteenth century, a period in which all the doctrinal results of the preceding debates were most carefully gathered and sifted by the schoolmen, while at the same time the reasoning methods of the Greek philosophy were applied to their exposition. This produced with the Reformation, shorter, but less comprehensive, but equally sharp and bitter. After the lapse of a century, or little more, it ended with the establishment of the Protestant Confessions.

While moving through these various stages of apologetics, polemics, scholasticism, and confessionalism, Christian science found no necessity of making any distinction between the theoretical and the practical aspeact of its subject. The whole Christian truth, so far as it existed in the Church under the form of well-defined doctrine, was embraced in its contents. Theology treated not only of the nature of God and his relation to the world, but also of the duties which this relation involves for man; not only of the person of Christ and the end and aim of his activity, but also of the hopes which this aim involves for man; not only that which a Christian believes, but also that which he acts upon. There are instances in early Christian literature, in which practical questions and practical principles are treated independently in separate works; as, for instance, by Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and others: but it happened incidentally. The sacra doctrina (Anselm), the loci theologici (Melanchthon), the Instituto religiosi Christianiae (Calvin), etc., made no distinction between theoretical and practical. The schoolmen considered a chapter on the virtues, often strongly marked with an influence from Cicero, as an indispensable part of the science which they taught. The distinction was not made until the latter part of the seventeenth century, when the sacra doctrina, the loci theologici, etc., begin to branch off into two independent parts,—one practical (ethics), and one theoretical (dogmatics), each from that time following a course of its own, though, of course, under steady interaction with its partner. The name dogmatics theologa dogmata (Anselm), the loci theologici, etc., begins to branch off into two independent parts,—one practical (ethics), and one theoretical (dogmatics), each from that time following a course of its own, though, of course, under steady interaction with its partner. The name dogmatics theologa dogmata was first used by Hildebrand (1692), then by Niemeyer (1702), Jäger (1715), and so on. In English and American theology it has not superseded the older name of "Systematic Theology." After this separation, by which dogmatics was established as an independent branch of Christian science, as its theoretical division, the questions which have exercised the greatest influence on its further development are, From what sources can dogmatics draw its materials? and, According to what norms has it to treat them? To the Roman-Catholic Church it proved comparatively easy to answer these questions. She presents in Scripture and tradition a double field from which her dogmatists can gather their materials; and in the decisions of the living Church, of the infallible Pope, she has established an absolute norm for the truth of a dogma and for its correct interpretation. It must not be inferred, however, from the utter arbitrariness of this norm, that, within the Roman-Catholic Church, dogmatics has sunk down to a mere registration of the papal whims: on the contrary, Roman-Catholic dogmatics has now and then admitted fertile impulses from other powers, and now and then utilized them with considerable freedom. (See art. Hermes, and K. Werner: Geschichte der katholischen Theologie seit dem Trienter Konzil, München, 1867.) Much greater difficulties the Protestant churches experienced in answering the above-mentioned questions: For a long time they adhered to the norm altogether; and of the two Roman-Catholic sources they recognized only the one, Scripture, to the exclusion of the other, tradition. Indeed, in the Protestant churches, Scripture became at once the only dogmatic source and the true dog-
But again: from these almost revolutionary proceedings it must be inferred that the old Protestant dogmatics drew its values: Schleiermacher's reaction was, on the contrary, besides its articuli puri, which were derived directly from Scripture, it had its articuli mixiti, which were derived from the general religious consciousness; and though these articuli mixiti were not to be adopted as part and parcel of Scripture, they became the channel through which a great mass of merely traditional materials were carried from the Roman-Catholic dogmatics into the Protestant. (See Glass: Geschichte der protestantischen Dogmatik, Berlin, 1834–67, 4 vols.)

In course of time this incongruity between the contents of the old Protestant dogmatics and the dogmatic contents of Scripture became too palpable to pass by unnoticed. Criticism began its dogmatic contentsof Scripturebecame to opalpa

It rejected the doctrine of the inspiration of Scripture held as the norm of Christian truth. It took the doctrine of inspiration as the highest norm for revealed truths (D. F. Strauss), — a self-contradiction which must lead to the denial of all revelation, that is, out of Christian truth. The lasting result, however, of the rationalistic criticism, was the distinction between a purely scriptural dogmatics developed into an independent branch of the theological system, under the name of Biblical Theology, and the whole sum of Christian truth such as it has been grown up from Scripture in Christendom during a period of nearly two thousand years. The question then arose, where to seek that supplementarystitution constituent, which, together with Scripture, could form the absolute norm for this truth; and it is on this question that modern dogmatics is divided; Schleiermacher preyinging to have brought into the public consciousness; "I. T. Beck and Schenk, in the conscience;" H. Plitt, in the "inner religious experience;" H. Martensen, in a "perfect mediaition between the ideas of Scripture and the ideas of modern civilization, and so on. J. Köstlin.

DOGS among the Hebrews were not so highly esteemed as they are among us. They were not man's companions and friends. While useful as the guardian of herds (Job xxx. 1; Isa. iv. 10), they are often spoken of as disturbers of the night (Ps. lix. 6, 14; Isa. lxi. 11), and devourers of dead bodies: hence to be unburied was a revolting thought and a curse (1 Kings xiv. 11, lvi. 4, xxx. 19, xxv. 38; 2 Kings ix. 10, 56; Ps. lxviii. 23; Jer. xv. 3). They appear in Bible proverbs, thus: "Against any of the children of Israel shall not a dog move his tongue" (the exodus would be safe, Exod. xi. 7); "He that passeth by, and meddleth with strife belonging not to him, is like one that taketh a dog by the ears" (the folly of meddling, Prov. xxvi. 17); "As a dog returneth to his vomit, so a fool returneth to his folly" (the hopelessness of sin, Prov. xxvi. 11, quoted in 2 Pet. ii. 22). The Hebrews were forbidden to sacrifice dogs (Isa. lxvii. 3) as several nations of antiquity did; and the word was an epithet of that which was unclean, profane, and altogether vile (cf. 1 Sam. xviii. 42; xxiv. 14; 2 Sam. ix. 8; 2 Kings viii. 13; Phil. iii. 2; Rev. xxii. 15). So foreigners were called "dogs" by the Jews (Matt. xv. 20, even as Christians are now by the Mohammedans. In the Orient to-day the dog is a filthy, ignoble cur, howling in the streets, and making night hideous by his barks and yelps, whose only redeeming feature is his capacity to fill the position of scavenger.

DOGETUM (docetism) is a theory according to which Christ had no real body: his appearance in the actual world was only a magical apparition, his body a phantom, his birth and death visions. The origin of this theory seems to date very far back. Ideas of the kind are refuted in 1 John iv. 2 and 2 John vii.; and in one form or the other the theory entered into nearly all Gnostic systems, as, for instance, in those of Saturninus, Basilides, Valentinus, Marcion, etc. Towards the close of the second century there existed a sect called Dokers, δόκηται (Theodore, Ep. 82; Clem. Alex., Strom. 7, 17; Eus., Hist. Ecc., 6, 12). The root from which the theory sprang was the idea of matter as being the cause of evil. Ascribing all evil to matter, it seemed necessary to represent Christ as entirely disconnected with the material world; and gnostical subtlety hoped to do this without making his whole nature totally unreal. Undoubtedly, however, the theory was often connected with a peculiar superficiality of feeling which transformed the deepest religious instincts of human nature into a merely aesthetical playing with intellectual ideas; as, for instance, when Basilides taught that it was Simon of Cyrene who was crucified under the disguise of Jesus, while Jesus stood by, in the disguise of Simon of Cyrene, and laughed at his persecutors.
DOLCINO was b. in the diocese of Novara; a son of a priest, and joined in 1291 the sect of the Apostolic Brothers; which see. After the death of Segarelli (1300) he became the leader of the sect, and made an armed resistance to the troops sent to arrest him; but in 1307 he was defeated and burnt. Of the three works he wrote, the third and last has perished altogether; but of the two others, extracts and fragments are still extant. In his second book (1303) he recounted the history of the sect from its origin in 1303; and both are addressed to the scattered members of the sect. He distinguishes four stages in the historical development of providence. The first begins with the patriarchs, the second with Christ and his apostles, the third with Sylvester and Constantine the Great, and the fourth and last with Segarelli and himself. Each stage is good by itself; but degeneration makes reform, and the development of a new stage, necessary. Thus, when the great masses of Pagan adopted Christianity in the fourth century, the Christians were compelled to assume the responsibility of riches in order to show how the goods of the earth shall be used to the glory of God and for the sake of the poor. But the attempt proved a failure; and neither the rules of St. Benedict, nor the still severer rules of St. Francis and St. Dominic, were able to mend matters. The true reform, the return to the example of Christ, the transformation of all earthly relations, marriage, property, etc., into spiritual relations, comes with the fourth stage, ushered in by Segarelli and Dolcino. In his first book (1300) Dolcino announced that in 1303 all his enemies should be vanquished, and the whole Christian world gathered into the sect. In his second book (1303) he was compelled to announce a postponement of one year, which he did without losing the confidence of his followers. There are, indeed, in his works both true religious enthusiasm and a sharp sense of the corruption of the Church; but both are the whiffs of a sensuous and ill-regulated imagination.

DOMINIC, St., and the DOMINICANS. Domingo de Guzman, the founder of the Dominican order, was b. 1170, at Calaruega, in the diocese of Osma, Old Castile, and d. in the Monastery of St. Nicholas, at Bologna, Aug. 6, 1221. From his sixth year he was educated by his uncle, who was archbishop at Guymel de Ycan; and when he was fourteen years old he entered the University of Palencia. In 1194 he was made a canon, and afterwards sub-prior of the chapter of Osma, where he aided the Bishop Diego de Azevedo in introducing the rules of St. Augustine. He also labored among the Mohammedans and heretics of the neighborhood. In 1204 he accompanied Diego on a diplomatic mission into Southern France, and there he came into contact with the Albigenses. The task of converting these revolters against the faith and authority of Rome had been intrusted to the Cistercians; but they had utterly failed, and were about to give up the work, when in 1206 about a hundred of them and Dominic persuaded them to go on. But the success was slight: only a few were converted. Diego soon left for his diocese; also the Cistercians withdrew; and Dominic with a few followers was left alone in the field. From Bishop Fulco of Toulouse he received some support; but the foundation of an asylum for girls at Prouille, in the diocese of Toulouse, was nearly the only result of his activity.

This nunnery of Prouille became the place of rendezvous for Dominic and his followers until the Cellanis joined the brotherhood, and presented them with a house in Toulouse. The Roman curia also showed that it felt obliged to Dominic: it offered him the bishopric of Beziers. Innocent III. had no confidence in prayers and preaching as weapons against heretics. The sword and the battering-ram he considered more effective; and after the assassination of his legate, Cardinal Castelnau, he preached a crusade against the Albigenses. Dominic and the brotherhood followed in the wake of the terrible army as a kind of court of inquiry. All suspicious or suspected persons were placed before this court; and, having been convicted of heresy, they were passed on to the stake. After the end of the war Dominic determined to transform the brotherhood he had founded into a permanent weapon of attack against heresy, into an order of predicant monks. Bishop Fulco, who liked to see his diocese becoming the seat of a new monastic order, was charmed at the idea, and accompanied Dominic to Rome, where the fourth council of the Lateran was just assembled (1215); but the council determined that no new order should be founded, and the petition of Dominic was left unheeded. He did not give up his idea, however; and finally Innocent III. gave his consent on the condition that the brotherhood should adopt the rules of some older, already recognized order, and organize itself in the simple form of colleges of canons. The brotherhood chose the rules of St. Augustine, to which were added some others from the statutes of the Praemonstratensians,— silence, poverty, fasts, complete abstinence from flesh, linen clothes, etc.; but the prospects of success were very small. Then Innocent III. died (July 17, 1216); and his successor, Honorius III., held a much more favorable opinion of the efficacy of a new order. Dominic hastened to Rome; and in December (same year) Honorius confirmed the statutes, and gave the order, as its symbol, a dog with a lighted torch in his mouth; the order being destined to watch the Church like a dog, and to illuminate it like a torch. The brotherhood now began to develop a great activity for the purpose of spreading the order. Some went to Spain, others to Paris, where a monastery was founded in the house of St. Jacob, whence the Dominicans in France were afterwards called Jacobins. The Dominicans went to Rome, Venice, Metz and other places. During a visit to Rome he began to preach to the lower servants of the papal household, who were allowed, it seems, to live on without any spiritual care at all; and he was then appointed Magister Sacri Palatii, or court-preacher to the Pope, an office which still exists, and still is held by a Dominican. Still the order would not grow. Something was missing in order to insure success, and it took time before Dominic discovered what it was.
In 1219 he seems to have been present at the chapter-general held by the Franciscans at Assisi.
There he saw how an ostentatious display of poverty and destitution, an almost crack-brained passion for dirt and rags and all the disgusts of misery, made the monks accepted by the mass of the people as brethren: consequently, he immediately threw himself upon the track pointed out by the Franciscans. At the chapter-general which the Dominicans held in 1220, in the Monastery of St. Nicholas, at Bologna, the order renounced the possession of property in any form or shape, and declared for complete poverty, and the sustenance of life. When the next chapter-general was held in Bologna (1221), sixty monasteries were represented, and members were sent to far-off places to make new foundations. Thus Dominic lived to see his order successful; and during its reign the history of theology, philosophy, and art is indebted to it for some of the finest spec-men of Gothic architecture. Still greater was the influcence which it exercised on science. In 1228 the Dominicans and the Franciscans. The controversy between Thomists and Scotists—the question of the predestination of Man, and the controversy between Jews and Christians—the doctrine of hereditary sin—began and ended in this rivalry. The Dominicans were victorious; and many great and good men they produced,—Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, Meister Eckart, Johann Tauler, Heinrich Suso, Savonarola, Las Casas, Vincent Ferrier, and Vincent of Beauvais. They have given the Church more than eight hundred bishops, a hundred and fifty archbishops, sixty cardinals, and four popes; but they gradually degenerated. At the beginning of the Reformation they held supreme sway over theological science; but they were shockingly ignorant, and by their activity as dealers in indulgences they actually prostituted the Church.
Still worse: they lacked the power of regeneration, such as the Franciscans proved themselves possessed of, by the formation of reformed congregations; and the end of their long labors through six centuries was a severe rebuke by the head of the Church, when, on Dec. 8, 1554, Pius IX. pronounced the dogma—Founder of every conception of the Virgin,—a dogma they had always opposed.

DOMITIAN, Roman emperor 81-96; is com-affair amounts to this: first, under Vespasian and Titus a tax was levied upon the Jews for Jupi-

12), that, under Domitian, this tax was extended also to such as lived instead of upon their bare hand, or a veil.

DONATISTS.  As a direct result of the persecution of Dicletian, there arose among the Christians a great enthusiasm for sufferings, and even for death, for the sake of the faith. They were demanded to surrender their sacred books; but not only did many refuse to comply with this demand, but some even stepped forward purposely, and boasted that they had the books, and could by no means be forced to give them up. The name of a traditor, that is, one who has surrendered his Bible, became extremely odious. Men- surius, Bishop of Carthage, openly opposed the fanaticism of the voluntary martyrs and the extravagant reverence shown to confessors. He sent his archdeacon, Cæcilianus, into the prisons where the confessors sat, and had the crowds which gathered there in enthusiastic devotion dispersed by force. But thereby the fanatics became only so much the more excited, and it was to be expected that they would seize upon the first opportunity to avenge themselves. In 305 a synod was convened at Cirta; but, before the synod was opened, the primate of Numidia, Bishop Secundus of Tigris, proposed that an investigation should be made, whether there were any traditores among the assembled. The result of the investigation was, that nearly every one of the bishops present was proved guilty of the crime, in some form or other. Suspicion fell even upon Secundus himself. He was consequently compelled to drop the investigation; but he, nevertheless, saw fit to assume the attitude of a guardian of the discipline of the Church, and, when he heard of the troubles which had occurred in Carthage, he sent a warning to Men- surius and Cæcilianus. Men surius died 311, and, according to the common course of affairs, the archdeacon succeeded the bishop; and, as Cæcilianus was known to hold the same views as Men surius, the moderates hastened to elect him, without awaiting the arrival of the Numidian bishops, and without inviting the primate, Secundus of Tigris, to perform the consecration. The Numidian bishops felt much offended at the slight shown to them, and allied themselves with the rigorists. Secundus convened a synod, and summoned Cæcilianus to defend himself. As Cæcilianus did not appear before the synod, he was deposed and excommunicated, and Majorinus was elected in his stead. When Majorinus died (in 313), Donatus, called the Great, became his successor.

Thus the schism originated in the Church of Carthage. There were two bishops and two congregations. From the capital it spread through the whole province. A majority of the country people, and a considerable number of bishops, declared in favor of Donatus. Outside of Africa, however, Cæcilianus was generally recognized as the legitimate bishop; and the opposite party (the pars Majorini, afterwards the pars Donati, the Donatiani, or Donatiste) were considered as schismatics who had separated from the true Catholic Church. In an edict of 313 Constantine the Great promised the Church of Africa his protection; but the Donatists were expressly excluded from the imperial favor. They immediately addressed themselves to the emperor, and begged him to examine their complaints against Caecilianus. He consented, and appointed a committee of five bishops from Gaul, with Melchisedec, Bishop of Rome, at its head. The committee summoned Caecilianus, and ten African bishops of each party, to its presence. Donatus of Caseae Nigre was the spokesman of the Donatists; but, in spite of all his exertions, Caecilianus was acquitted, and Donatus was deposed. The other Donatist bishops were allowed to retain their office and dignity, on the condition that they returned to the Catholic Church. But the condemned would not submit. They complained to the emperor of the partiality of the verdict, and begged that some juridically educated persons might be sent to Africa, to hear witnesses, and gather evidence, and the case be laid before a synod of bishops. Their request was granted, and imperial commissioners appeared in Carthage. But the commissioners decided in favor of Caecilianus. The Donatists became extremely excited on account of this verdict, and in an unfortunate moment they appealed directly to the emperor. Constantine was astonished and disgusted, that he, a Pagan, was asked to decide upon the internal affairs of the Christian Church; but he accepted, nevertheless, the appeal, summoned Caecilianus and his accusers to Milan (316), and condemned the latter as guilty of calumny. All further resistance now became a crime against the imperial majesty; but the Donatists, nevertheless, refused to submit. Constantine preferred, however, to ignore the whole affair; and, although no less than two hundred and seventy Donatist bishops were present at a synod held in 330, the policy adopted by the emperor would probably have proved the best way of healing the schism. At last, however, did not continue his father's policy, and the severity with which he treated the Donatists immediately produced very strange effects. Africa suffered at that time much from a vicious kind of ascetics,—the so-called Circumcelliones. An affiliation took place between these Circumcelliones and the lower elements of the Donatist party; and the result was a complete uproar, which, however, was speedily suppressed by Taurinus (345). At this time Caecilianus died, and an opportunity presented itself of healing the schism by recognizing the Donatist bishop. But the Donatists had made themselves so despised and hated, that a compromise was impossible. Gratian succeeded Caecilianus as Catholic bishop, and the schism continued. Soon a new uproar broke out. As most of the Donatists belonged to the poor class, and many were completely destitute, Constanst sent (in 348) Paul and Macarius to Africa to inquire into the matter, by means of a liberal support. But Donatus the Great declared with vehemence against this attempt of seduction; and Donatus of Bagai met the negotiators at the head of a swarm of armed Circumcelliones. The commotion, however, was speedily suppressed. Donatus of Bagai was decapitated, Donatus the Great was banished, and the Donatist churches were closed. A complete change took place in the condition of the party when Julian ascended the throne. It was his policy to fight the Catholic Church by means of heretics and schismatics. The Donatists were immediately allowed to use their churches, and their banished bishops returned. Donatus the Great had died; but Julian appointed Parmenianus his successor, and established him in Carthage by means of force. The Donatists had for a short time the power, and they did not use it sparingly. But Valentinian I. and Gratian issued again very severe laws against them (373 and 375).

Meanwhile the inner decay of the sect had begun. One of its most prominent members, Tychonius, distinguished for his great learning, and appreciated as the author of the Regulae septem ad investigandum intelligentiam Sacrarum Scripturarum, rejected the Novatian views held by most Donatists, and objected to the ostentatious exclusiveness of the party. Such milder and more moderate views found many adherents; and Primianus, the successor of Parmenianus, belonged to the moderate side of the sect, and came soon in conflict with the extremists, at whose head stood the deacon Maximianus. The conflict was very bitter; and, when he ventured to excommunicate Maximianus, the extremists convened a synod (393), deposed him, and elected Maximianus bishop in his stead. Thus there were three bishops in Carthage; and, just as the sect in this way was gliding down into a state of dissolution, it encountered its most decided and most powerful adversary, Augustine. After writing several books against the sect, as it would seem, without any great effect, Augustine himself consented to an appeal to force, referring to Luke xiv. 23. A synod of Carthage (403) petitioned the Emperor Honorius to issue penal laws against the Donatists. The petition was granted: laymen should be fined, clergymen banished, and the churches closed. But Honorius could not afford to make any more enemies than those he already had, and in 409 he issued an edict of tolerance, by which the Edict raised such a storm in the Catholic Church, that it had to be immediately repealed. A disputation was then arranged in Carthage (411), Collatio cum Donatista. Two hundred and eighty-six Catholic and two hundred and seventy-nine Donatist bishops were present: Augustine and Aurelius were the speakers of the former; Primianus and Patilianus, those of the latter. For three days the debate lasted, but no result was arrived at. Finally the imperial commissioner declared the Donatists vanquished, and very severe measures were decided upon against them. In 414 they lost all civil rights; in 415 they were forbidden to assemble for worshipping, under penalty of death. Nevertheless, they had not become extinct, when, in the seventh century, the Saracens occupied the country, and destroyed the African Church.

DONE, John, D.D., divine and poet, son of a merchant; b. in London, 1573; d. March 31, 1631. He was educated at Oxford and Cambridge, but did not take a degree. In 1592 he renounced the Roman-Catholic faith, and subsequently wrote two polerical treatises against it, — Pseudio-Martyr (1010), and Ignatius his Canonclav (1111). He followed civil pursuits, until, induced thereto by James I., who had read the Pseudio-Martyr, he took orders (1614), a step to which he had been urged seven years before by Dr. Morton, afterwards Bishop of Durham. He was immediately appointed royal chaplain, in 1620 Dean of St. Paul's, and in 1630 preached his last sermon, which was afterward published under the title, Death's Duel. He is buried in St. Paul's Cathedral. Donne's poetical works were excessively admired by his own generation, praised by Dryden, and paraphrased by Pope. His published sermons are marked by metaphysical insight and poetical imagery.

DONELL, Robert, one of the early leaders in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church; b. in Guilford County, North Carolina, April, 1784; d. at Athens, Ala., May 24, 1854. His parents early moved to Tennessee. Under a deep conviction of the urgent need of more ministers, he offered himself in 1806 to the so-called "Council" of the Cumberland Presbytery, who encouraged him to exercise his gifts as a catechist and exhorter. He preached independently of ecclesiastical connection, and for the most part in Alabama, until 1811, when he placed himself under the care of the newly organized Cumberland Presbytery. From that time on he labored incessantly, in Tennessee, Alabama, and Western Pennsylvania, organizing many churches, and winning the position of a leader in his denomination. He preached the opening sermon at the First General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. He is the author of Thoughts on Various Subjects, last ed., Nashville, 1880.

DONELLAAN LECTURE, The, was founded by the provost and senior fellows of Trinity College, Dublin, with a legacy of twelve hundred and forty-three pounds, left by Mrs. Anne Donnellan, dated Feb. 22, 1794, "for the encouragement of religion, learning, and good manners." The lecturer is elected on the 20th of each November, and delivers six sermons upon such topic as the board may designate. Perhaps the best known volumes thus produced are GRAVES, Lectures on the Pentateuch, London, 1807, 2 vols.; and DAUNT, The Person and Offices of the Holy Spirit, London, 1879.

DONOSEO-CORTES, Juan (Marquis de Valdegamas), b. May 9, 1809, at Valle de la Serena, in Extremadura; d. in Paris, May 3, 1853; studied law in Seville; settled in Madrid in 1830, and engaged in literature and politics. In 1837 he entered the Cortes as a representative of the city of Cadiz, and took his seat as a member of the moderate-liberal section of the house. But the study of Bonald and De Maistre, and his acquaintance with the queen-mother, Marie-Christine, gradually changed his views; and in 1840 he suddenly startled his party and his country with a bitter denunciation of all liberal principles, and the demand for a dictatorship. In 1850 he was sent as ambassador to Berlin, and afterwards to Paris, where he died. In 1861 he published his Essay on Catholicism, Liberalism, and Socialism, which was immediately translated into French and German, and in 1862 also into English, by Madeleine Goddard, Philadelphia. It is an eloquent and brilliant plea for the ideas of Gregory VII. and Innocent III., against modern philosophy; and it suddenly startled his party and his country with a bitter denunciation of all liberal principles, and the demand for a dictatorship. In 1850 he was sent as ambassador to Berlin, and afterwards to Paris, where he died. In 1861 he published his Essay on Catholicism, Liberalism, and Socialism, which was immediately translated into French and German, and in 1862 also into English, by Madeleine Goddard, Philadelphia. It is an eloquent and brilliant plea for the ideas of Gregory VII. and Innocent III., against modern philosophy; and it ushered in the Donostian Revolution of the latter part of the nineteenth century. A collected edition of his works was published in Madrid by Tejado, 5 vols., 1854–55, and also at Paris, in French, by Louis Veuillot, 3 vols., 3d ed., Lyon, 1876.

DONUS I., or DOMNUS, pope 676–687, is noticeable only on account of his passion for adorning the churches of Rome. — DONUS II. is sometimes put down as having reigned a short time in 974, between Benedict VI. and Boniface VII.; but his whole existence depends upon an error of the copyist. See Giesebrecht, in Jahr. der deutschen Reichs, 1840, vol. ii., part 1., p. 141.

DOOLITTLE, Justus, b. at Rutland, N.Y., June 23, 1824; d. at Clinton, N.Y., June 15, 1880. He was graduated from Hamilton College in 1846, and Auburn Seminary, 1849; from 1849 to 1859, and from 1872 to 1873 missionary in China, at Foochow, Tientsin, and Shanghai. He was the author of The Social Life of the Chinese, N.Y., 1863, 2 vols. (an exhaustive treatment for a limited district of China), and Vocabulary and Handbook of the Chinese Language, Romancized in the Mandarin Dialect, New York, 1872, 1873, 2 vols.
DOOLITTLE, Thomas, Nonconformist; b. at Kidderminster, 1830; educated at Cambridge; settled in London; ejected for nonconformity in 1862; kept a private school, and preached till his death, May 24, 1707. Among his works, which were very popular, were A Treatise concerning the Lord's Supper, 9th ed., 1675; A Call to Delaying Sinners, 1683; A Complete Body of Divinity, 1723, folio; Lose to Christ Necessary to Escape the Curse at His Coming, reprinted 1830.

DORA, Sister (Dorothy Wyndlow Pattison), b. at Hauxwell, Yorkshire, Jan. 16, 1832; d. at Walsall, South Staffordshire, Tuesday, Dec. 24, 1878. Her father was rector of Hauxwell, and a man of means; yet she voluntarily left her position in society, and in 1861, after three years of village school-teaching, joined the Church of England "Sisterhood of the Good Samaritans." In 1863 she was sent to the Cottage Hospital at Walsall, then under the charge of the sisterhood. She quickly developed that marvellous capacity both for nursing and general management which made her so famous. In Walsall she labored until 1876, and only left off to die. Her life there was a practical embodiment of the spirit of Christ. Her biography is more thrilling than a novel, and yet the changes of her life were few. By unwavering courage and unfailing devotion she won the respect of all, and was recognized as the friend of every patient in the wards, and of every poor body in the town. She was one of the noblest of women. Like her Master, she went about doing good. The anecdote told of one of the railroad employees reveals the regard in which she was held. He was asked why he thought her monument ought take the form of a statue; and he said, "Why, nobody knows better than I do that we sha'n't forget her, no danger of that; but I want her to be there, so that when strangers come to the place, and see her standing up, they shall ask us, 'Who's that?' and then we shall say, 'Who's that? — 'Why, that's our Sister Dora.'"

In the exercise of her profession she had the unquestionable advantages of good birth, liberal education, excellent health, fine personal appearance, abundant animal spirits, great natural shrewdness and tact. Walsall is a manufacturing town, and accidents are constantly occurring. Sister Dora became a skilful surgeon as well as nurse. But the secret of her influence was, after all, her religion. She was not content to heal the body simply: she aimed to touch the heart, to convert the soul; and to many she was thus, in the words of Maurice, "a practicable embodiment of the spirit of Christ.

DORCAS SOCIETY. The name comes from the good friend of the poor mentioned in Acts ix. 36, and fitly describes its work, which is to provide the poor with clothing, or else with materials to make up. Such societies are common in connection with churches, and afford Christian women useful employment. Dorcas is the Greek equivalent of Tabitha, an Aramaic form of the Hebrew word which means "gazelle," and was a favorite name among Hebrews and Greeks, because the gazelle was considered to be the standard of beauty. Dorcas must have been comparatively rich, and was probably of some rank. Peter restored her to life after she had been some time dead.

DOROTHEUS, Bishop of Martianopolis in Moesia, and a zealous Nestorian, joined, at the Council of Ephesus (431), the party opposite to Cyril, and pronounced Cyril's excommunication. Shortly after he was excommunicated himself; and when his congregation refused to accept his successor, he was banished to Cesarea in Cappadocia. He left some letters which are found in the Synodicon, Nos. 73, 115, and 137, and in BALUZE: Concil. N. Coll.

DORT, Synod of, the largest and [next to the Westminster Assembly] the most imposing synod ever held within the bounds of the Reformed churches, was convened by the States-General at Dort (Dordrecht), Nov. 13, 1618, and adjourned May 9, 1619. The Arminians, or Remonstrants, after the death of Arminius (1609), had set up their head Simon Episcopius, professor at Leyden, and included among their number John of Barneveld (Advocate-General of Holland) and the learned scholar and statesman Hugo Grotius. At the head of the Calvinists, or Counter-Remonstrants, stood the statesman of Maurice, Salomon Poelenburgh, and the learned scholar Hugo Grotius. In 1610 He was excommunicated himself; and when his congregation refused to accept his successor, he was banished to Cesarea in Cappadocia. He left some letters which are found in the Synodicon, Nos. 73, 115, and 137, and in BALUZE: Concil. N. Coll.

In November, 1617, the States-General passed an act convoking a synod at Dort to settle religious issues. The synod was designed to be a national assembly. The Reformed churches of other lands (with the single exception of Anhalt) were requested to send delegates; but it was particularly stated in the invitation that their presence and counsels were desired in order that a more cautious conclusion concerning the controversies prevalent in the Church of the Netherlands might be arrived at. Twenty-eight delegates in all came from Germany, the Palatinate, Switzerland, and England. The four delegates selected by the National Synod of France were forbidden being present by the king. The English commission was (chosen by James I.) were Carleton, Bishop of Llandaff; Davenant, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury; Samuel Ward, professor at Cambridge; Joseph Hall, afterwards Bishop of Exeter and Norwich; and Walter Balanquall, a Scotchman, and chaplain to the king. Among the Dutch delegates were thirty-one ministers, five professors, and twenty elders. There were also eighteen commissioners appointed by the States-General. All of the delegates from the Netherlands belonged to the Calvinistic party, the three Remonstrants regularly elected from Utrecht being denied seats.

The synod convened Nov. 13, 1618, and, after listening to a sermon in the Great Church of Dort, chose at its second sitting John Bogermann, a pastor at Leeuwarden, its president. The Remonstrants were treated from the first as an accused party, and at the opening of Episcopius, and twelve other Remonstrants were summoned to appear at the expiration of fourteen days before the synod, and defend their doctrines. In the interval a committee was appointed to prepare a new translation of the Bible, whose labors subsequently gave birth to one of the most accurate versions in any language. The question of the administration of baptism to the children of heathen parents in India was also discussed.

At the twenty-second session, the thirteen Remonstrants appeared before the synod. Episcopius, who managed the defence, spoke with much eloquence, but gave offense by his confidence and boldness of statement. He declared the synod to be a schismatical assembly. His judges reprimanded him for his temerity; and after he had given the Remonstrant construction of the five articles, or "knotty points," of Calvinism, a protracted discussion took place, which was brought to a close at the fifty-seventh session (Jan. 14, 1619), the Remonstrants being excluded from the floor. This done, the synod occupied itself with the preparation of articles refuting Remonstrant tenets and the definition of the five articles. The thirty-sixth session (April 23, 1619), the "Canons of Dort," teaching strict views of predestination, were passed. The delegates, however, from England, Hesse, Nassau, and Bremen, had argued persistently in favor of recognizing a conditional universalism; that is, the divine intention and sincere offer of salvation to all men. The synod then unanimously, with the exception of the delegates from Hesse and England, voted the sentence upon the Remonstrants of ecclesiastical rebels and offenders, and that as such they were to be excluded by the synods and classes from their ecclesiastical places. Before adjournment, the Heidelberg Catechism and the Belgic Confession were indorsed. In the hundred and forty-fourth session the synod repaired to the Great Church, where the canons and the sentence were read in Latin to an overflowing audience. The hundred and forty-fifth (May 9, 1619), was its last.

The canons of the Synod of Dort are infraapscholar; and ten professors. But it made the town the headquarters of the Roman-Catholic Episcopal Church; and on the continent, it housed all their intrigues. Campian and his colleagues, Sherwin and Briant, came from Douay. This gave rise to great disturbances; and, after a Huguenot riot, the college was compelled to move (1579), but found an asylum at Rheims, under the protection of the Duke of Guise. In 1580, however, the college returned to Douay; and in 1602 the Old Testament of the so-called Douay Bible was issued there. See T. F. Knox: The First and Second Diaries of the English College, Douay, and an Appendix of Unpublished Documents. With an Historical Introduction, London, 1878. On the Douay version, see English Bible Versions.

DOVE. More than fifty times this bird is mentioned in the Bible; and it is the only one that could be offered in sacrifice, and was usually selected for that purpose by the less wealthy (Lev. vi. xii. 6; Luke ii. 24); and, to supply the demand for it, dealers in this kind of birds sat about the precincts of the temple (Matt. xxi. 12, etc.). The raising of doves was from an early day a pursuit peculiar to the Jews (Isa. lx. 8); although there were also many wild doves in Palestine (Ezek. vii. 16), which built their nests in clefts of the rocks (Jer. xxviii. 29; Cant. ii. 14), or at least sought a refuge there when chased (Ps. xi. 1). The flight of the dove was employed by the poet as a figure of swiftness (Ps. lv. 6; Hos. xi. 11; Isa. lx. 8). In songs of love, the eyes of the beloved, as expressive of attachment and of innocence, are compared with those of the dove (Cant. i. 5, iv. 1). The voice of the dove is represented by the poets as a sigh, as an expression of sorrow (Isa. xxxviii. 14, lux. 11; Nah. ii. 7). To the white and glimmering plumage reference is made in Ps. lxvii. 13. The dove was the harbinger of reconciliation with God (Gen. vii. 8, 10 sqq.), and is frequently mentioned as the emblem of purity and innocence (Matt. x. 10). In Christian art the dove is employed as the emblem of the Holy Ghost (cf. John i. 32). D. P. C.

DOW, Lorenzo, an eccentric Methodist preacher; b. at Coventry, Conn., Oct. 16, 1777; d. at George town, D.C., Feb. 2, 1834. He began itinerating after, and never joined any other, although in sequence won him listeners and converts. He was fearless earnestness and native eloquence won him listeners and converts. He was a voluminous writer. See Dealingsof God, Man, and the Devil, as Exemplified in the Life of L. Dow, with his Writings, N.Y., 1854, new ed., 1875; Peck: Early Methodism, N.Y., 1860.

DOWLING, John, b. in Sussex, Eng., May 12, 1807; d. in New York, July 4, 1878. He is best known by his History of Romanism, N.Y., 1845, of which a revised edition appeared in 1871. He was pastor of the Berean Baptist Church in New York city for many years.

DOXOLOGY (δοξολογία, glorificatio, gloria). There are a greater and a minor doxology. The former—Doxologia major, Gloria in excelsis, Hymnus Angelicus—consisted originally only of the few words communicated in Luke ii. 14, Gloria in excelsis Deo et in terra Pax hominibus bonae voluntatis. Early, however, an addition was made, first in the Greek Church, and then in the Latin, probably due to Hilary, Bishop of Poitiers, who died 366; and in the fifth century the Doxologia major read thus: Glory to God on high, and on earth peace to men of [his] good will. [or] Glory to Thee, we bless Thee, we worship Thee, we glorify Thee, we give thanks to Thee for Thy great glory. O Lord God, heavenly King, God the Father Almighty; O Lord, the only-begotten Son, Jesus Christ; O Lord God, Lamb of God, Son of the Father, that takes away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us; Thou that takest away the sins of the world, receive our prayer; Thou that sittest at the right hand of the Father, have mercy upon us; For Thou alone art holy, Thou only, Jesus Christ, with the Holy Ghost, art most high in the glory of the Father. Amen.* [or] Gloria in excelsis Deo et in terra paz hominibus bonae voluntatis. Laudamus te, benedictum te, adoramus te, glorificamus te, gratias agimus tibi propter magnam gloriam tuam. Domine Deus, rex cælestis, Deus Pater omnipotens; Domine, Fili unigenite, Jesu Christe; Domine Deus, agnus Dei, Filius Patris, qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis; Qui tollis peccata mundi, suscipe deprecationem nostram; Qui sedes ad dextram Patris, miserere nobis; Quoniam tu solus sanctus, tu solus Dominus, tu solus laissimus, Jesu Christe, cum Sancto Spiritu in gloria Dei Patris. Amen. Considerable opposition was made to this addition, but suppressed by the fourth Council of Toledo, 633. Down to the twelfth century the Doxologia major was used only by the bishops, and by the priests only at Easter. In olden times it seems to have been used principally at Christmas. In the Lutheran Church the Gloria in excelsis was retained in its Latin form for a long time as an essential element of the divine service, and has been often thus used, even in the nineteenth century. [It is a regular part of the service in the Episcopal Church, but only in the English version.] The Doxologia minor consisted originally of the simple formula, Gloria sancto in sancta, and the translation was left free, whether “Glory to the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit,” or “Glory to the Father in the Son and the Holy Spirit,” or “Glory to the Father through the Son in the Holy Spirit.” When the Arians, however, intentionally confined themselves to the two last formulas, the Church forbade them as heretic, and an addition was made; “as it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be, world without end” [sicut erat in principio et nunc et semper et in saecula saeculorum]. At divine service the Doxologia minor, as used at the end of each hymn: the priest intoned it, and the choir responded.

The term “doxology,” or “doxological formula,” is also applied to those passages of glorification with which a prayer may end, as, for instance, in Romans xvi. 27; Eph. iii. 21; and the Lord’s Prayer such as it is found in Matt. vi. 13, in the textus receptus [also to the verse or verses commonly sung either at the beginning or end of the service]. D’OLY, George, the commentator; b. in London, Oct. 31, 1778; d. Jan. 8, 1846. He was fellow of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and rector in various places. In connection with Richard Munt, afterwards Bishop of Down, he edited "Notea de Emnentis" on the Authorized Version of the Bible, taken principally from the Most Eminent Writers of the United Church of England and Ireland, London, 1814, 3 vols. 4to. ed. (and improved) by Bishop Hobart, N.Y., 1818, 2 vols. 4to. The work has had a large sale among Protestants.

DRABICIUS, Nicol. b. at Stradteiss, Moravia, 1555; grew up in a community of Bohemian Brethren, and from 1616 worked as an evangelical preacher, but fell out with the Protestant clergy of the neighborhood, and moved in 1629 to Lednitz in Hungary, where he lived in poverty, engrossed by theological studies. From February, 1638, he pretended to receive divine revelations, and prophesied that the house of Austria should be overthrown in 1657, that Lewis XIV. should be made Roman emperor in 1666, that the Papacy should be abolished, and the Church reformed, etc. As his prophecies became more and more extravagant, they were published by J. A. Comenius in 1657, under the title Luz in Tenebris. In 1659 they were republished, in connection with other prophecies of the same kind, under the title Historia Revelationum, etc. There is a third edition from 1665, and with the original title. See KöLER: Disp. de N. Drabito, Altenburg, 1791.

DRACHM, DRACH'MA. See MONEY.

DRACONITES, Johannes (properly Drach, or Trach, sometimes, also, named after his native city), b. at Karlstadt, 1494; was appointed teacher in the philosophical faculty at Erfurt, and canon of the Church of St. Severin, but declared for Luther, and went in 1523 to Wittenberg. In the same year he was chosen minister at Mittenberg, but was soon driven away by the Romanist clergy of the neighborhood, and returned in 1524 to Wittenberg. After being minister at Waltershausen for a few years, he was professor of theology at Marburg, 1547, and at Rostock from 1551 to 1550. But there was something restless in the man's character; and in 1560 he retired to Wittenberg, where he died, April 18, 1560. He was a good Hebrew scholar, and wrote commentaries on Genesis, the Psalms, Obadiah, Daniel, etc. But his principal work is his Biblia Pentapla, which occupied him for many years, but of which only fragments have been published.

DRACONITUS, Blossius Emnllus, a Latin poet who flourished during the reign of the younger Theodosius, in the beginning of the fifth century. He was probably a native of Spain. His great poem in heroic verse on the creation, Hexameron, was first published at Paris, 1560, together with the Genesis of Claudius Marius Victor, then at Paris, 1610, by Simond, together with the Opycata of Eugenius of Tolmed, and in a version corrected and enlarged by Eugenius, and finally at Rome, 1791, by Arevali, together with the poem De Deo, of which the Hexameron evidently is a fragment. This last edition is reprinted in Migne: Patrologia, LX. Some minor poems by Draconitus were published at Leipzig, 1573, by Fried. de Duhn.

DRASEKE, Johann Heinrich Bernhardt, b. at Brunswick, d. at Middletown, June 8, 1810. He was in Bremen 1814, and since 1832 Bishop (general superintendent) of Prussian Saxony, from which position he retired in 1843. Possessed of an extraordinary power of eloquence and a very impressive personal appearance, he became one of the most celebrated pulpits of modern Germany, and was much admired. But he lacked that sharp decision of character and that wide range of intellect which alone are able to sustain a fame under trying circumstances. He was educated among rationalists, but he soon burst the narrow bands of philosophy. The rich sympathy of his nature connected him with all that was great and growing in his time. In 1814 he published Predigten über Deutschland's Wiedergeburt, 3 vols., and in 1817 Das Heilige auf der Bühne. He had an interest both in politics and the theatre. Even his theology went through a considerable development. His Predigten für denkende Verehrer Jesu, 1804–12, 5 vols., represents a Pelagian and merely humanitarian stand-point; but his Vom Reich Gottes, 1830, 3 vols., shows a much deeper conception of the truths of Christianity. He was a brilliant meteor of his time,—brilliant, more light than heat,—a meteor passing away.

DRAGON. In the apocryphal book Bel and the Dragon, mention is made of the worship of a dragon (i.e., a large serpent) at Babylon. But, as we do not read elsewhere of such a thing among the Assyrians and Babylonians, it has been rashly conjectured that this apocryphal book was written in Egypt, where we know the species of idolatry was common, and that this worship was very unhistorically introduced. But upon Babylonian inscriptions there is frequent representation of gigantic serpents, which plainly had a religious meaning; and often upon Assyrian representations of sacrifices, near the altar are two serpents bound upon staffs. Moreover, Didorus Siculus (II. 9) says that there was a serpent in the right hand of Hera in the Temple of Bel, and that Rhea stood near two large silver serpents. In the Assyrian inscriptions one reads of the "great serpent with seven heads" (Fried. Delitzsch: Assyrische Studien, Heft I. p. 87).

The reverence of serpents was common in other Semitic peoples, although among the Phoenicians there is no certain trace of it. Indeed, almost all peoples have called serpents "wise;" and far outside of Semitism one finds serpent-worship. See Baudissin: Die Symbolik der Schlange im Semitismus, in his Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, Leipzig, Heft I., 1876 (pp. 255–292), and art. "Apokryphen des A. T.," in Herzog, 2d ed., vol. i. p. 499.

DRAM. See MONKEY.

DREAMS, among the Hebrews, as universally in antiquity, were thought to be of importance, as lifters of the veil. At the same time the word is used as a metaphor, and in a version corrected and enlarged by Eugenius, and finally at Rome, 1791, by Arevali, together with the poem De Deo, of which the Hexameron evidently is a fragment. This last edition is reprinted in Migne: Patrologia, LX. Some minor Pharaoh and his chief baker and butler (Gen. xl.); of the Midianitish soldiers (Judg. vii. 13 sqq.).

The prophets particularly depended upon dreams, although the power of their interpretation is (Gen. xl. 8, xli. 16; Dan. i. 17). Of dreams from an awakened conscience we mention that of Abimelech (Gen. xx. 3) and of Laban (Gen. xxxi. 28). In general the dream corresponded to the character. Sometimes the imagination was the vehicle of revelation, in which case imagery indicated the divine will. So Joseph saw the sheaves bowing to his sheaf (Gen. xxxvii. 7), and Nebuchadrezzar the image (Dan. ii. 36 sq.).

The prophets also had dreams, which are spoken of as, like Urim, a legitimate way of finding out the future (1 Sam. xviii. 6). The false prophets particularly depended upon them, and hence the test was given that only those prophets who encouraged the people in the worship of God were to be listened to (Deut. xiii. 1–5; Jer. xxiii. 25; Zech. xii. 10). The prophetic gift was called forth in the interpretation of dreams; so Joseph, and particularly Daniel. Josephus relates the prophetic dreams of Archelaus and his wife Glaphyra, and how the first was interpreted by Simon the Essene (Antiq., XVII. 13, 3, 4). His likewise claims to have himself received prophetic dreams (War, III. 8, 3).—[Dreams have been vehicles of divine revelation, but as such always inferior to visions. The greater number of such dreams recorded in the Bible were "granted to those who were aliens to the Jewish covenant; and, where dreams are recorded as they are almost always referred to the periods of God's revelation to his chosen servants, they are almost always referred to the periods of their earliest and most imperfect knowledge of him." See Franz Delitzsch: A System of Bib. Psychol., Edin., 1867, 2d ed., Ger. orig., Leip., 1861.]

DRESS OF THE HEBREWS. Se CLOTHING AND ORNAMENTS AMONG THE HEBREWS.

DRESS OF THE EARLY CHRISTIANS. There never has been a particular Christian costume. The early Christians, both clergy and laity, dressed like their Pagan neighbors, and according to their station. The Epiistle of James testifies to great inequality in this respect, even in the assemblies conducted by the apostles themselves. James does not blame the rich for wearing any more of the "fine" clothing any more than he commends the poor man for his "vile" clothing; but he does blame those who paid respect to a man in proportion to the value of his clothes. The virtues of humility and modesty conflict with extravagance in dress, and therefore the latter has always been recognized as unbecoming a Christian. Some of the exhortations savor, however, too much of asceticism. Thus CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (close of second century) would have his hearers not only eschew ornaments, silks, all embroidered and dyed goods, particularly purple, but have the men and women dress precisely alike (Stromata, ii. 10, C. in Ante-Nicene Library, vol. i. pp. 235–263). More stringent are the demands of TERTULLIAN (d. about 225), who inveighs against either sex wearing gold, jewels, or dyed garments, or having the hair elaborately dressed, or in any way making a show. The Christian, he claims, should be modest and humble, and not only be so, but seem so. Then follows this striking passage: "Such delicacies as tend by their softness and effeminacy to unman the manliness of the faith are to be discarded. Otherwise I know not whether the wrist that has been wont to be surrounded with the palm-like bracelet will endure till it grow into the numb hardness of its own chain. I know not whether the leg that has rejoiced in the anklet will suffer itself to be squeezed into the gyve. I fear the neck beset with pearl and emerald nooses will give no room to the broadsword. . . . Go forth [to meet the angels] already arrayed in the cosmetics and ornaments of prophets and apostles, drawing your whiteness from simplicity, your ruddy hue from modesty; painting your eyes with bashfulness, and your mouth with silence; implanting in your ears the words of God; fitting on your necks the yoke of Christ." (De Cultu Feminarum, ii. 13, T. in Ante-Nicene Library, vol. i. pp. 331, 332). To the same intent, CYPRIAN, in his interesting and forcible treatise On the Dress of Virgins, earnestly counsels Christian women to lay aside all luxury in dress, all dyed fabrics, and all ornaments: "For God neither made the sheecket scarlet or purple, nor taught the juices of herbs and shell-fish to dye and color wool, nor arranged necklaces with stones set in gold, and with pearls distributed in a woven series or numerous cluster, wherewith you would hide the neck which he made, that what God formed in man may be covered, and that may be seen upon it which the devil has invested it with" (c. 14). It is especially severe upon the use of cosmetics and paints: "The work of God, and his fashioning and formation, ought in no manner to be adulterated, either with the application of yellow color, or with black dust or rouge, or with any kind of medicament which can corrupt the lineaments destined to divine agency. . . ." (De Cultu Feminarum, ii. 13, T. in Ante-Nicene Library, vol. i. pp. 343, 344).

Two strange freaks of the ascetic spirit were for women to cut off their hair, and to wear men's (i.e., monks') clothes (in order to show that for the saints there was no longer male or female), as was done among the Eustathians. These were condemned by the synod of Gangra (A.D. 370), in canon 13, "If any woman, under pretence of asceticism, changes her apparel, and, instead of the usual women's clothes, wears those of men, let her be accursed;" and in canon 17, "If any woman, under pretence of asceticism, cut off her hair, which God has given her as reminder of her subjection, let her be accursed." (Hefele, Concilien geschichte, 1. § 94). The frequency of the denunciations of luxury proves how common the intention of Mrs. Drew to add to his original endowment of three hundred thousand dollars for ministerial education, but his financial reverses defeated his plans. Through the efforts of the then president, the Rev. Dr. J. F. Hurst, a new endowment of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars for endowment, was subscribed, which is now in process of collection. The number of students is at present eighty. There are five departments of study; viz., New Testament exegesis, Old Testament exegesis, practical theology, systematic theology, and historical theology. The first president of the seminary was the Rev. Dr. John McClintock, who died in 1870. His immediate successors, Drs. Foster and Hurst, have been elected to the episcopal office. The present president is Rev. Dr. Henry A. Buttz, who is also professor of New Testament exegesis. His associates in the faculty are James Strong, S.T.D., professor of systematic theology; George R. Crooks, D.D., professor of New Testament theology; Samuel F. Upham, D.D., professor of practical theology. The library contains fifteen thousand volumes. Since the year 1809 the seminary has sent out into the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church two hundred and fifty-nine graduates.

DREY, Johann Sebastian, b. at Killingen, Oct. 16, 1777; d. at Tubingen, Feb. 19, 1853, was ordained priest in 1801, and appointed professor of catholic theology at Eliavgen in 1812, and in 1817 at Tubingen, from which position he retired in 1816. His principal work is his Christian Apologetik, Mayence, 1838-47, 3 vols. In connection with Gratz and Hirscher he founded in 1819 the Theologische Quartalschrift, one of the ablest periodicals of the Roman-Catholic Church.

DROTHEM (Norwegian Drammen; Latin Nidarosia), the seat of the first Christian bishop of Norway, founded in 1020. Norway belonged originally to the archiepiscopal diocese of Hamburg-Bremen, after 1104 to that of Lund, but obtained in 1132 its own metropolitan, who resided in Drammen. The cathedral of the city, containing the shrine of the patron saint of the country, St. Olaf, was one of the largest and most magnificent church-buildings in Scandinavia; but it was never finished. In the time of the Reformation it was literally plundered. Shortly after, it was struck by lightning, and partially burnt down. Only the choir is still standing, and in repair.

DROSTE ZU VISCHERING, Clemens August, Baron von, b. at Munster, Jan. 22, 1778; d. there Oct. 19, 1845; was consecrated priest in 1798, and in 1807 elected vicar-general by the chapter of his native city. In 1813 he resigned because he was opposed to Napoleon; but after the latter's fall he again assumed his office, and administered the diocese of Munster until 1829, when he formally abdicated on account of disagreement with the Prussian Government. He retired into private life until 1835, when he was appointed Archbishop of Cologne.

Before being installed, he subscribed to the convention concluded between the government and the Roman Catholics, but did not keep it; and when his proceedings, governed by the maxim that the State is absolutely subordinate to the Church, became too arbitrary, the Prussian Government had him arrested (Nov. 20, 1837). The affair caused great excitement, mostly, though, of a literary character. About two hundred pamphlets were issued pro et contra; but a result was not arrived at. Droste was not re-installed. He was compelled to choose a co-adjutor; but the Roman priests were allowed to carry on a fanatic agitation among the people.

The writings of Droste are few, and not remarkable. The most characteristic of his standpoint are Uber die Religionsfreiheit der Katholiken, 1817, and Uber den Frieden unter der Kirche und den Staaten, 1843. The principal sources for the study of the whole movement are, RHEINWALD: Acta Historico-ecclesiastica, II. and III.; IRENAEUS (Gisseler): Uber die cöltischen Angelegenheit, Leipzig, 1838; Commonitorium ad archiepiscopum Coloniensem, Lyons, 1837; GÖRRES: Athanasius, 1838; K. HASE: Die beiden Erzbischöfe, Leipzig, 1839.

DROZ, Charles Xavier Joseph, b. at Besancon, Oct. 31, 1773; d. in Paris, Nov. 5, 1850; studied law in Paris; served three years in the army of the Rhine; was appointed teacher in the Ecole Centrale of his native city, and settled in 1803 in Paris, where he devoted himself exclusively to literature. His Essai sur l'art d'etre heureux, Paris, 1809, is the production of an outspoken sceptic of the epicurean description. His Pensées sur le Christianisme, Paris, 1842, contains many deep and sincere conceptions of Christian truths, though strongly tainted with Romanism. His principal works, however, are De la philosophie morale, Paris, 1853, and Histoire de Louis XVI., Paris, 1838-42, 3 vols.

DRUIDISM is the general designation of the religion of the old Celtic race. The derivation of the name is uncertain,—from the Greek ἄγενος "an oak;" or from the Celtic deru, "an oak," and vol., "lord;" or from the Celtic de, "God," and roud, "speaker," etc. Nor is our knowledge of the doctrinal system and hierarchical organization of Druidism any more certain, gathered as it is from stray notices by Latin and Greek writers, beginning with Caesar, and from some few reminiscences in old Irish songs. The Druids performed various functions in Celtic society. They were the teachers and poets, the prophets and seers, the judges and priests of the people. According to function they were divided into classes; —bards, vates, and Druids proper, of which the last class ranked first. The dark oak-groves were their temples; and there reigned not only mystical wisdom, but also abominable savagery. Human sacrifices were offered up with peculiar cruelty. Of an equally mixed character was their doctrinal system: it was based upon faith in one supreme being. But this monothelism of an Oriental description was singularly-blended with wild polytheism and stupid superstition, belief in Jesus, Tentates, the misteltane, the snake-egg, etc. The conflict between Druidism and Christianity seems to have been long and very severe, but very little is known with certainty about the matter.

DRUSES. Occupying the western slope of the Lebanon and the whole Antilebanon, from Beyrout in the north to Sur or Tyre in the south, and from the Mediterranean in the west to Damascus in the east, there lives under Turkish supremacy, but enjoying a considerable measure of political freedom, a peculiar people, the Druses, whose religion is as mysterious and perplexing as is their ethnography. The name Druse, or more properly Durus, is probably derived from Darasi, the founder, or one of the foremost leaders of their religious sect; it is supposed to derive it from an Arab verb (darasa), to which they ascribe various fanciful meanings. Referring to their religion, they call themselves Muwaahhidun ("Unitarians"), and their creed Tauhid ("Unitarianism"). They have also some settlements east of Palestine, in the Hauran (the Aus-ranitis of Greek writers), and at Safed in Palestine Proper; and they number about seventy thousand men, not reckoning women and children. A number of Crypto-Druses (that is, Druses according to religion, but not according to descent) are said to live in the neighborhood of Cairo, where their religion first originated. The Druses proper, the mountaineers of the Lebanon and Antilebanon, are probably, like the Maronites with whom they live in close contact, descendants of the old Syrians. The report that they descend from a French colony settled in the Lebanon during the Crusades and exterminated by a certain Count Dreuix, is a mere fiction.

The creed of the Druses is a child of Mohammedanism; but in some of its fundamental and most characteristic tenets it completely repudiates the very spirit and essence of the mother-creed, and approaches Christianity. Its origin must be sought for among the Shiites, the great antagonists of the Sunnites, and more especially among the Batiniya, or Batenians, one of the most radical sects of the Shiites. The Batiniya interpret the Koran on the principle that every exterior must have a corresponding interior; that, consequently, every passage of the Koran must have behind its plain grammatical sense a deeper, occult, allegorical meaning. This principle was by one group of the Batiniya (the Karaita, or Karaitians) actually used as a means to destroy all faith in a divine revelation, and led finally to absolute materialism and atheism.

The further step taken by the Druses, and which brought them not only out of Mohammedanism, but in conflict with it, was their doctrine of incarnation. There is no god but God, they say with the Mohammedans, and he is unknowable to man; senses cannot grasp him, words not define him. But he has revealed himself to man, they add, by setting an uncreated man, by incarnation (an idea which to a Mohammedan is utter abomination); and the last of these incarnations which has taken place, and ever will take place, is that of Hakim Biamrillahi (caliph from 1019 to 1044), the sixth of the Fatimides. In 1040 he first claimed publicly, in the mosque of Cairo, to be the incarnated God; and with that year begins the era of the Druses.

Hakim, who on his accession to the throne assumed the surname of Biamrillahi (that is, he who judges by the command of God), was a cruel and half-crazy tyrant, yielding without restraint to the freaks of a diseased mind, an object of terror and scorn to his own people. During the twenty-five years of his reign he succeeded in killing about eighteen thousand men. He hated the Christians and the Jews, and ordered them to be marked off, so as not to be mistaken for Mohammedans: the Christians with blue clothes, the Jews with black; the Christians with a cross three feet long, and weighing five pounds; the Jews with a heavy wooden club, etc. About thirty thousand Christian churches and monasteries were destroyed in their entirety by his commands. One little trait is very characteristic of this man, who became the god of the Druses. The ladies of Cairo gave him offence by their extravagance and luxury. Suddenly he ordered, that, under penalty of death, no woman should show herself in the streets, or even look out of the doors and windows. The effect of this order was that many women who had none to take care of them died of starvation. Hakim belonged to the Batiniya, and was very anxious for the propagation of their doctrines. But he had a further purpose of his own. In 1040 his favorite, Ismael Darasi, a Persian by birth, suddenly appeared in the mosque of Cairo, and began to expound to the astonished audience that Hakim was Allah incarnated. People were very indignant. A riot ensued, and lasted for several days. Hakim dared not defend Darasi, who fled to Damascus, where he began to expound his new doctrines among the mountaineers of the Lebanon. Another attempt, by Haidara Fergini, to get the divinity of Hakim recognized, failed as signally. Finally, however, Hamza suc-
Deceived in managing the affair. He was also a Persian in birth, and lived a monastic life on the side of Cairo. But he was shrewd and cautious. the creation, La première semaine, made a deep impression, and represents the Puritan movement of religion, just as Ronsard represents the sceptical. In 1584 he published La seconde semaine, an epic destined to comprise the whole period from the creation to the revelation in Christ, but unfinished. There is a collected edition of his works from 1629. His Weeks were translated into English by J. Sylvestor, London, 1641.

DUBOSC, Pierre, b. at Bayeux, Feb. 21, 1623; studied theology at Montauban and Sammur; became minister of the Reformed Congregation of Caen in 1645; was banished from France in 1658 and settled at Rotterdam, where he died Jan. 2, 1692. He was one of the most prominent pulpit orators of his time, and among the first to abandon the old dry doctrinal exposition, and employ illustrations and rhetorical language to make the Christian truths impress the heart and the imagination. Two collections of his sermons appeared at Rotterdam, 1692, in 2 vols., and 1701 in 4 vols. His son-in-law, Legendre, wrote his life, Rotterdam, 1694; enlarged edition, 1716.

DUBOURG, Anne, b. at Riom, in the department of Puy de Dôme, 1531; burnt at the stake in Paris, Dec. 23, 1559; was professor of civil law in the University of Orléans, when, in 1557, he was appointed conseiller-cleret to the Parliament of Paris. In his father's house he became acquainted with the doctrines of the Reformation; and, as he was conscientious, he made a deep study of the Scriptures, the fathers, and the early church-history, before he undertook to decide upon the question. He had not embraced the Reformation, however, when he was called to Paris. But he heard mass for the last time, Easter, 1558; and shortly after he began to frequent the meetings of the Reformed Congregation in Paris. In the Parliament most of the younger members inclined towards the Reformation; and of the older members some of the most prominent, as, for instance, the president Harlay, Seguier, etc., were in favor of very mild proceedings against the so-called heretics. There was, however, another party in the Parliament,—a party of fanatical Romanists,—led by Minard, Le Maistre, and St. Andrés; and a conflict was not slow in arising. In the Grande Chambre,—that division of the Parliament in which the civil affairs of the king, the crown, the university, etc., were treated,—the Romanists had the majority; while the friends of the Reformation had the majority in the Chambre de la Tournelle,—that division to which all criminal matters belonged. In the spring of 1559 the Chambre de la Tournelle condemned four citizens of Toulouse, who were accused of rejecting the doctrine of transubstantiation, to banishment; while at the same time, the Grande Chambre condemned a poor vine-dresser, Pierre Chenet, to the stake for the same crime. In order to reconcile this discrepancy, the procurator-general, Bourdin, convicted a Mercureide; that is, a plenary assembly of all the divisions of the Parliament, thus called because it always convened on Wednesday,—Des Mercureide. From the protracted and bitter debate, it was evident that the friends of the Reformation were in the majority; and that the councilists thought it necessary to proceed them directly to the king, Henry II. The king appeared personally in the Parliament, at the head of an imposing escort, and reproached it for the lukewarmness it showed with respect to the Church. Dubourg spoke immediately after the king, and spoke with great openness and eloquence; but the king became so provoked that he immediately ordered Dubourg arrested. Legally; a member of Parliament could be judged only by the Parliament itself. Nevertheless, the king appointed a committee to investigate the case of Dubourg, and the committee consisted of the most enraged Romanists. Dubourg appealed successively to the archbishops of Paris, Sens, and Lyons; but the appeals were not accepted. An appeal to the Pope was still possible; but Dubourg refused to have anything to do with "Antichrist." The death of Henry II., July 10, 1559, only made the situation still more desperate; as, by the accession of Francis II., the Guises came into power. It was evident that the life of Dubourg was wanted. All exertions of his friends, Coligny, the elector Friedrich III., of the palatinate, etc., were in vain. For a moment Dubourg wavered. The first confession he presented was ambiguous, and was considered as a surrender by the Romanists; but he soon recovered, and the confession which he finally gave in, and which has often been printed, is a masterpiece of clearness, precision, and completeness. Dec. 21 the verdict was given, and two days afterwards the execution followed. See La vraie histoire contenant l'inique jugement et fausse procédure contre Anne Dubourg, Anvers, 1561, reprinted in the Mémoires de Condé, London, 1743.

DU CANGE, Charles Dufresne, Sieur, b. at Amiens, Dec. 18, 1610; d. in Paris, Aug. 10, 1688; studied law at Orléans, but soon abandoned the juridical career, and devoted himself exclusively to the study of the history of the middle ages, living first at Amiens, afterwards (from 1608) in Paris. He was a scholar of the very first rank, his industry equaling his accuracy; and at the same time he was a man of extraordinary loveliness of character, modest and disinterested. By his labor he rescued the history of the middle ages from that dense obscurity into which the Renascence and the Reformation had thrown it. His principal works are Glossarium mediæ et infimæ Latinitatis, and Glossarium mediæ et infimæ Graecitatis. The former, which is not simply a dictionary of the Latin language during a certain period, but an encyclopaedia of the history, geography, archeology, etc., of that period, appeared first in Paris, 1678, 3 vols. fol., then at Frankfurt, 1681 and 1710, Venice, 1738–86, 6 vols. fol., Opera et studia Monachorum O. S. Bened.; which edition was reprinted at Basel, 1782, with a supplement by the Benedictine monk Carpenter, in 4 vols., 1790, of which an extract was published at Halle, 1772–84, 6 vols.; the last complete edition, by Henschel, embodying the labors of previous editors, Paris, 1840–50, 7 vols. [A Medieval Latin-English Dictionary, based upon this edition, by Dayman and Hessels, appeared, London, 1882.] The Greek glossarium appeared in Paris, 1688, 2 vols. fol. The first work which Du Cange published was his Histoire de l'empire de Constantin au surnom de Constantinople, Paris, 1567; the last, not appearing until after his death, was his edition of Chronicon Paschale, Paris, 1688. Duchobortzi, a sect which originated in the Russian Church about 1740. Their doctrinal system is variously described. By some they are said to adhere faithfully to the Christian doctrines which the Russian Church has adopted; while others tell us that they have developed these conceptions into a fanciful mysticism, dissolving the idea of trinity into merely different forms of action, placing the fall before the creation, etc. In their practical tenets they resemble the Quakers. They refuse to take oaths, to serve in the army, to partake of the sacraments, etc.; and they reject a liturgically arranged service, a sacerdotal class, etc. The sect arose among the Molokans, and was very severely persecuted by Catherine II. Under Alexander I. they were tolerated and a settlement was granted them near the Sea of Azov, whence they were removed in 1837 to the Caucasus. See Lenz: De Duchovorxi Commentatio, Dorpat, 1829; W. Dudith, Andreas, b. at Buda, 1533; d. at Breslau, 1859; studied at Breslau and Verona. In the latter place he made the acquaintance of Reginald Pole, and accompanied him to England in 1553, when, after the accession of Mary, the cardinal returned home as the legate of Julian III. Over Paris, Dudith went the following year back to Hungary, and was made provost of Felhez. Once more he visited Italy, where he translated Pole's biography from the Italian into English (Venice, 1563, London, 1590); and after his return he was made apostolical prothonotary, count-palatine, and bishop of Tina. In 1562 he was sent to the Council of Trent as representative of the Hungarian clergy; and five speeches he made there contain many attacks on the Reformation, though he advocated the use of the Lord's Supper also for laymen. In 1565 the Emperor Maximilian sent him on a diplomatic errand to King Sigismund of Poland, and there he fell passionately in love with one of the queen's maids-of-honor. He resigned all his offices, married her, and settled at Smigla in Bohemia; afterwards he also left the Roman Church, and embraced Socinianism. But, though Paul V. put him under the ban, both Maximilian, and after him Rudolf II., continued to protect him and to use him. The last ten years of his life he spent in Breslau. His works were edited by Reuter, Offenbach, 1619; his Five Speeches appeared at Halie, 1745; his Biography was written by Stief, Breslau, 1756. Herzog.

Duff, Alexander, D.D., a very eminent missionary in India; was born at the farmhouse of Auchnahyle, in Moulin, Perthshire, Scotland, April 25, 1806; d. in Edinburgh, Feb. 12, 1878. He studied at the University of St. Andrews, under Dr. Chalmers and others, and was licensed to preach the gospel in 1829. At the age of twenty-three he was appointed first missionary to India of the Church of Scotland. On his way to Calcutta he was shipwrecked, and lost all his books,—a circumstance to throw his more earnestly on the divine arm for support and guidance. Having been left to adopt the mode of aggressive operations which he deemed most expedient in the circumstances, he resolved to make an educational institution a leading feature in his plan, partly in order to train up native evangelists, and partly to scatter the darkness associated with the Hindoo religion. There was a powerful party in Calcutta, the old Orientalists, who thought that any progress, intellectual or social, to be made in India must be on the old lines, recognizing the traditions, prejudices, and other absurdities which the past had consecrated. Duff looked on all that as nonsense, and felt assured that the Hindoo mind was quite ready to be carried onward on the lines of Western civilization and progress. Practical effect was given to this conviction in his Calcutta school, which was conducted on two great principles,—first, that Christian Scriptures were to be read in every class able to read them, and to be used as the foundation and permanent rule of life; and, second, that through the English language, the science of the West was to be taught, notwithstanding the revolution it must inevitably cause in many Hindoo notions, including some of the most sacred and venerable beliefs. On these lines Duff worked from the very beginning, and worked with such effect that his school was extremely popular among the natives; and the Orientalist party were placed hors de combat. Quite a revolution, indeed, was effected. At the same time the mission did not want for striking spiritual fruit. Among its early converts was a number of young men of great power and prominence, and the esteem in which they were held was evinced by the fact that the Church Missionary and other societies got some of them as their agents, and they turned out to be very useful in their work in India.

Returning home in ill health in 1834, Duff, on recovering, made a tour through Scotland, and most wonderfully increased the interest in his mission. His speeches in the General Assembly were wonderful specimens of gushing eloquence, and made a profound impression. The degree of D.D. was conferred on him by the University of Aberdeen.

After his furlough he returned to India, and prosecuted his work. The disruption of the Scottish Church in 1843 was in one way a great trial; although he and all the other missionaries of the Church to both Jew and Gentile had no hesitation in throwing in their lot with the Free Church. As the property of the mission belonged legally to the Establishment, Duff was stripped of everything. His trust in God remained; and he was enabled to build up a new institution from the foundation, and equip it as well as the old had been. The influence of his work continued to increase. Interesting conversations took place. Public storms raged whenever a conspicuous youth was baptized; but they passed away, and it became apparent to all that the tree which Duff had planted was spreading forth its roots as Lebanon. In 1850 he again returned home, and sought to rouse the Free Church to new and more energetic efforts in the cause of missions. He was called in 1851 to the chair of the General Assembly. He also visited America, under the auspices of Mr. George H. Stuart of Philadelphia, and by his overwhelming appeals and eloquence made a deep impression both in Canada and the United States.
DUFRESNE.

He returned to India, and continued his labors for some years; but, his health utterly failing, he returned permanently to Scotland in 1864. Appointed Convener of the Foreign Missions Committee, he had the chief management of the foreign work of the Free Church, and showed his catholicity by the deep interest he took in South-African missions, and especially by the share he had in organizing the Livingstone mission on Lake Nyassa. In 1867 he was appointed first professor of evangelistic theology in the Free Church.

Dr. Duff took an active interest in many important movements of the home church. He was an active promoter of the proposed union of the Free, United Presbyterians, Reformed Presbyterian, and English Presbyterian churches, which, however, came to no satisfactory result. He was deeply interested in the Colportage Society of Scotland, of which, for a time, he was president. He took an active part in the preparations for the General Presbytery Council at Edinburgh, but was unable to be present, through illness. His strength continued to decline thereafter, and on Feb. 12, 1875, he fell asleep. His Life was written by George Smith, LL.D., Edinburgh and N.Y., 1880.

DUQUET, Jacques Joseph, b. at Montbrison, on the Upper Loire, Dec. 9, 1648; d. in Paris, Oct. 25, 1738; entered the Congregation of the Oratory in 1667, but left it in 1686, when its members were compelled to subscribe a condemnation of Jansen. Afterwards he lived for some time in Brussels with A. Arnauld, and at various places in France, always in retirement, and always pursued by the ruling power in the Church. He was a prolific writer, and one of the best writers among the Jansenists. His Traité de la prière publique, etc., Paris, 1707, was often reprinted, and so were his Lettres sur divers sujets de morale, etc., 1718, originally in 3 vols., but afterward enlarged to 10 vols., and his Explication du mystère de la passion, 1729, originally in 2 vols., but afterward enlarged to 14 vols. He also wrote Explications of Genesis (6 vols.), Job (4 vols.), and other parts of the Bible. A biography of him is found in that edition which Goujet has given of his Institution d'un prince, etc., 1739. See also André: L'esprit de M. Duquet, etc., Paris, 1764.

DUHALDE, b. in Paris, Feb. 1, 1674; d. there Aug. 18, 1714; entered the Society of Jesus in 1708; succeeded Father Legobien as editor of Leçons ediées et curieuses écrites des missions étrangères, of which he published vols. IX.–XXVI., and wrote The General History of China, Paris, 1735, 4 vols., translated into English by Brookes, London, 1736, 4 vols.

DULCINISTS. See Dolcino.

DULIA (service). The Roman Church teaches that saints and angels should receive dulia (reverence), the Virgin hyper-dulia (the highest kind of reverence), and the Persons of the Trinity latreia (adoration, or worship proper). The distinction between these three kinds of worship is generally obscured by the lowly pray as much as possible and as fervently to one class of divine helpers as to the other, but who, it is probable, pray quite as much to the images as to the persons imaged.

It is, however, by this fine distinction that the Church rides herself of the charge of idolatry.

DU MOULIN, Charles, b. in Paris, 1500; d. there Dec. 27, 1506; studied law in Orléans and Poitiers. A fault of pronunciation debarrèd him from success as a pleader; but in Paris, where he settled in 1550, and where, in 1549, he joined the Reformed Congregation, he soon acquired great celebrity as a consulting lawyer. Of his many writings (fifty-two in number), two are of great interest to church-history. In 1551 he published his famous Commentaire sur l'Édit des petites dates, in which he shows that Henry II. was right, when, as a move in his contest with the Pope, he forbade the exportation of gold or silver from France to Rome. And so victorious was the argumentation, that the Pope immediately dropped the question so far as the king was concerned; but brought the author to trial for heresy, and when he was acquitted the priests caused a riot, and had his house pillaged. Du Moulin fled; and from this moment till his death he moved from one place to another (Strassburg, Tubingen, Geneva, Lyons, etc.), everywhere attracting people by his learning and acuteness, but always pursued by the Roman Church. He returned to Paris in 1564, and published his Consultation sur le fait du Concile de Trent; but the Parliament of Paris, though approving of his views, condemned his book. He was imprisoned, and released only by the exertions of Jeanne d'Albret. After his death the priests said that he had secretly returned to the bosom of the Roman Church; but they have told the same story about many others without proving it.

DU MOULIN, Pierre (Molinos), b. at Buhy, on the boundary of Normandy, Oct. 16, 1568; d. at Sedan, March 10, 1658; was educated in Paris and Sedan, and studied at Cambridge (1588–92) and Leyden, where he was made professor, first of ancient languages, and afterwards of philosophy. In 1589 he was ordained and appointed pastor of Chambres, and chaplain to Catherine of Bourbon, a sister of Henry IV. With this last appointment began his career as the most vigorous and brilliant controversialist of the French Reformed Church. According to the fashion of the day, a dispute was arranged (1602) between Du Moulin and a Roman-Catholic scholar, Palma Cayet, in the presence of Catherine, her husband (who was a Roman-Catholic), and others. Du Moulin's victory was unquestionable; and the books he published in consequence of the dispute—Éaux de Siloe pour estinder le purgatoire 1602, and Accroissement des eaux de Siloe, La Rochelle, 1604—attracted much attention. Of still greater importance, while producing a much wider and deeper impression, were his controversies with the Jesuit Cotton about the dogmatics and morals of the order, Trente-deux demandes prononcées par le P. Cotton, etc., La Rochelle, 1607, and Geneva, 1635; with the Jesuit Gontier about transubstantiation, Véritable narci de la conférence entre les sieurs Du Moulin et Gontier, 1609, and Apologie pour la sainte cène du Seigneur, Geneva, 1610; and with the Dominican Coefeteau, Analyse de l'Erreur du P. Coefeteau, etc., London, 1625, both masterpieces as a controversialist is his Bouclier de la foi, the most complete work of the kind produced by the French Reformed Church, and, though now antiquated in form and tone, still valuable on account of its learning and keenness. The Jesuit Arnaud, confessor to the king, preached against the Reformed Confession; and Du Moulins took up the challenge, and wrote Défense de la confession de l'Eglise reformée de France (Charenton, 1617), Bouclier de la foi (Charenton, 1617, 3d ed., 1619, last ed., 1845, Eng. trans., London, 1831), and Fuites et évasions du sieur Arnaud (Charenton, 1619.) It was, however, not only the Roman-Catholics who had to smart under his polemical ire, but also the various sects of his own denomination, especially the Remonstrants. A bitter controversy arose shortly after the death of Henry IV., consequently in a very critical moment, between him and Tilenus, professor of theology at Sedan; and they were not reconciled until 1617. In that year Du Moulins was engaged by the commission of the National Synod of Vitré, to prepare a formula consensus, in which all sects or parties of the Reformed faith would agree; but the formula consensus turned out the Anabaptiste de l'Arménisme, which, 1619, — a harsh and scathing criticism of Arminianism. Meanwhile his position at Charenton, always difficult, became actually dangerous. For many years he had stood in intimate connection with James I. de la foypour JacquesI.; and in 1615 James I. sought refuge in Sedan, which belonged to the dominion of the Duke of Bouillon. He was made professor of theology, and spent the rest of his life there, somewhat more quietly, though never giving up what seemed to be his nature,—criticism and polemics. To this period belong his Anatomie de la Messe (Sedan, 1636, 2d ed., 1638, pp. 170, 345, 532, given; AYM : Synodes nationaurde France, VII., p. 273, containing a list of his works; ARM : Essai sur la vie de Du Moulin, Strasburg, 1846, trans.; SCHMIDT DUNCAN, John, LL.D., a Scotch Orientalist; b. at Gilcomston, near Aberdeen, 1796; d. in Edinburgh, Saturday, Feb. 26, 1870. He was graduated from the University of Aberdeen, 1814; studied divinity in Edinburgh, and was licensed June 24, 1825. In 1828, under the influence of Cesar Malan, he was converted; in 1831 he was settled in Glasgow; went in 1841 to Pesth as missionary of the Church of Scotland to the Jews; in 1843 he became professor of Hebrew and Oriental languages in New College, Edinburgh, and served in that capacity until his death. He was an extraordinary man: learned in several departments, gifted as a talker, and profound as a thinker, he impressed all he met. His students did not get much Hebrew instruction, for he was a very poor teacher; but they were inspired by his spirit so eminently godly. He lived above the world, and drew them up with him. His religious experience comprehended all grades, from scepticism to faith. His most brilliant period intellectually was when farthest from God; but his most fruitful was during his latter years, when he showed a simple piety which was based upon personal knowledge of the deep things of God. Many stories are told of his eccentricity; but the charm of his biography lies in its revelation of a rare personality. See DAVID BROWN: Life of the Late John Duncan, LL.D., Edinburgh, 1872, 2d revised ed. same year; the same: John Duncan in the Pulpit and at the Communion-Table, Edinburgh, 1874; also his striking sayings in WILLIAM KNIGHT: Colloquia Peripatetica, by the late John Duncan, LL.D., 2d ed., Edinburgh, 1870. DUNGAL, the author of the Responsa contra perversas Claudii sententias, written in 828, against Claudius of Turin, and edited by Masson, Paris, 1806, and in Bibl. Patr. Max., XIV. He was a Scotchman. But very little is known about his life. By some (Hist. Litt. de la France, IV., p. 493) he is identified with a certain Dungal of St. Denis, who wrote some Latin poems (MARTÈNE ET DURAND: Ampl. Col., VI. p. 811) and an Epistola ad Carolum Magnum de duplici eipsi solari (D'ACHERY : Spicilegium, III. p. 624). More probably he is identical with that Dungal whom Lothar mentions in one of his decrees as teacher in Pavia. DUNIN, Martin von, b. at Wal, a village of Western Poland, Nov. 11, 1774; d. at Posen, Dec. 26, 1842; was educated in the Collegium Germanicum in Rome, and was appointed Archbishop of Gnesen-Posen, 1831. In Poland the validity of the canon law remained unquestioned up to 1763: it was even specially confirmed and extended by a bull of Benedict XIV., Aug. 8, 1748. But by the treaty of Feb. 13, 1768, between Poland, Russia, England, Prussia, Denmark, and Sweden, the canon law was suspended in various fields of social life. Thus mixed marriages were declared legitimate; and it was determined, that, of the children, the boys should be brought up in the religion of the father, and the girls in that of the mother. This rule was continued in those parts of Poland which were incorporated with Prussia, and no trouble arose from its application until 1836. Inspired, no doubt, by the behavior of Droste zu Vischerin, Archbishop Dunin suddenly demanded permission of the Prussian Government, either to go back to the regulations of 1748, or to ask the Pope for new instructions. As neither was granted, the archbishop issued a pastoral letter (Jan. 30, 1838) to his clergy, in which he simply forbade the priests to consecrate a mixed marriage, or to admit any Roman-Catholic who lived in unconsecrated wedlock to the sacraments. But this injunction was annulled by a royal decree of June 25, 1838; and legal proceedings, begun against the archbishop. Feb. 28, 1839, the supreme court of Posen gave the verdict that the archbishop had transgressed his power, and that the transgression should be punished with deposition, and incarceration in one of the fortresses for half a year. The king transmitted the incarceration in a fortress to simple residence in...
DUNSTAN, St., b. at Glastonbury, 924; d. May 19, 988; was educated by Irish monks, settled in his native city, and was twice introduced into the king's household, but was both times driven away by the enmity of the rough soldier-courtiers. After taking the monastic vow, he lived for some time in retirement, studying and teaching; but King Edmund made him Abbot of Glastonbury, and appointed him treasurer of the whole kingdom. Under the reign of Edred (940–955), Dunstan seems to have been the real ruler of the country. Under Edwy he was con-

pelled to flee the country (955), and seek refuge in Ghent, but only for a short time. When Edgar succeeded in establishing himself on the throne of Mercia and Northumbria, Dunstan returned to power, and was made Bishop of Worcester and clef of his time, and as a worker of miracles; and the fact of his canonization shows the indebtedness of the Church to him. Others represent him as a statesman; and, indeed, for many years he ruled England with great energy and wisdom. Several works have been ascribed to him,—a commentary on the Benedictine rule, a Regina "Concordia," etc.; but the authorship is doubtful. For his life, see Act. Sanct., May 19; E. W. Robertson: Dunstan and his Policy, in Historical Essays; Dean Hook: Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury.

DUNSTER, Henry, first president of Harvard University; b. in England; d. at Scituate, Mass., Feb. 27, 1659. He was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford; emigrated to America, and was chosen president of the recently established college at Cambridge, Aug. 27, 1640, but compelled to resign Oct. 24, 1651, on account of his Baptist views, and he spent the rest of his days in retirement. He was a learned, modest, and pious man. See Jeremiah Chaplin: Life of Henry Dunster, Boston, 1872.

DU PLESSIS-MORNAI, properly PHILIPPE DE MORNAI, Seigneur du Plessis-Marly, b. at Buhy, Normandy, Nov. 5, 1549; d. at La Forest-sur-Sevre, Nov. 11, 1623; one of the most prominent leaders of the French Protestants during one of the most critical periods of their history. Carefully educated, he was about to join the Protestant army under Condé, in 1567, when a fall of his horse threw him on the sick-bed. In 1568 he started on a great tour through Europe, visited Italy, Austria, Bohemia, Germany, the Netherlands, and returned to Paris in June, 1572. A pamphlet he wrote concerning the Spanish domination in the Netherlands attracted the attention of the Prince of Orange; another, concerning the expediency for France to support the Netherlands introduced him to Coligny. Only with great difficulty he escaped the massacre of Aug. 24, 1572. He fled to England, and entered upon an unsteady career of many years, spent partly on the battle-field, partly at the writing-desk, partly in diplomatical negotiations.
1575 he married; and it is characteristic of the earnest piety of his wife, that she desired her husband to give her a wedding-presenta religious treatise; and accordingly he wrote for her his Discours de la vie et de la mort, Lausanne, 1576, Paris, 1580; translated into English, London, 1576; Latin, Francfort, 1885. Among his writings from this time are Traité de l'église (London, 1579; translated into English, 1579; Germa-nian, 1580; Italian, 1591; Latin, 1594); and Traité de de la vérité de la religion chrétienne (Paris, 1582; Leyden, 1583; Lyons, 1597, etc.). Meanwhile he had made the acquaintance of Henry of Navarre, and the acquaintance soon grew into friendship. He became Henry's most intimate and most trusted adviser; and he fought for him and the cause he represented in the battles, in the cabinets of the Protestant princes, and in the literature:
Rémonstrance à la France; Déclaration du roy de Navarre; Déclaration et protestation du roy de Navarre, etc. After the assassination of the Duke of Guise, and the revolt of the League, he succceeded in bringing about a reconciliation between Henry III. and Henry of Navarre, and his reward was the governorship of Saumur, where at last (1589) he was able to prepare a home for hisself and his family. He made Saumur a strong fortress, and he made it also the seat of a flourishing Protestant academy. When Henry IV. changed his faith in order to secure the crown of France, the friendship between him and Du Plessis-Mornay of course cooled off; but the latter continued to labor with unblamed energy for the Protestant cause, and contributed much both to the internal organization of the party and to the just enforcement of the edicts concerning their social position. In 1598 he published De l'instinction, usage et doctrine du saint sacrament de l'Eucharistie; and the book made a great sensation.
It became, nevertheless, instrumental to a deep humiliation for its author. Du Plessis-Mornay had always had a weakness for religious disputation, and was more than willing to accept the proposition for a great debate with Duperron at Fontainebleau, in the presence of the king and the great Prelates. But the Duke of Guise, when the debate began, was so jaded, that he could not contribute errors which he was to correct not sooner than late in the night preceding the debate, so that he was compelled to work all night, and was therefore jaded when the debate began; yet he acquitted himself very creditably. A number of works of edification and the famous Le mystère d'iniquité, an attack on the Papacy, belong to the last part of his life. In 1621, when the religious war broke out afresh, he retired to his castle, La Forêt-sur-Sèvre.

DUPRÉAU, Gabriel, French theologian and philologist: b. at Marcoussis (Ile de France), 1511; d. at Fontainebleau, April 10, 1589. His Latin name was Prateolus. He was for many years a professor in the College of France in Paris. His principal work was De Viuís, sectís, dogmatisús omnium arætericorum, Paris, 1569.

DURAND OF ST. POURÇAIN (Durandus de Sancto Forciano), the most prominent representative of scholasticism in the fourteenth century;
was b. towards the close of the thirteenth century in the village of St. Pourçain, in the present department of Puy de Dôme, and entered very early the Dominican order at Clermont. After studying in the Monastery of St. Jacques, in Paris, where (June 29, 1303) he signed the appeal of Philip the Fair to a general council, he taught in the University of Paris as licentiat et doctor, and was by Clement V. called to Avignon as Lector Curie et Magister S. Palatii. John XXII. made him Bishop of Puy-en-Velay, 1518, and in 1326 Bishop of Meaux, where he died Sept. 10, 1344.

Of his works a number still remain in manuscript in the National Library in Paris: the most important, however, have been printed. I. Com-mentarius in Libros Sententiarum Lombardi, which Gerson recommended to his pupils as the best work on the subject; printed in Paris, 1508;
Lyons, 1533; Vénice, 1571, etc. II. Statuta Synodi Aniciensis, over which synod he himself presided (1320), edited by Gissey, Lyons, 1620.
III. De Origine Jurisdictionum, etc., an argumen-tive of scholasticism. Theology and philosophy have, in the controversy between the French prelates and Philip the Fair concerning the amenability of the clergy to the civil courts, printed, together with other tracts to the same purpose, Paris, 1506.
IV. Tractatus de statu animarum, etc., a polemical tract against the view of Pope John XXII., that the departed souls are not able to see God perfectly happy until they have re-assumed their bodies.

His surname Doctor resolutissimus he received from the resoluteness with which he adopted and followed the principle that there is no human authority above the human reason; that a man who bends his reason before any human authority degrades himself into a beast, etc. The first consequence of this principle was an open split between faith and knowledge, between theology and philosophy. The Anselmian proposition, credo ut intelligam ("I believe, that I may know"),
and its complement, quæro intelligere ut credam
("I seek to know, that I may believe"), he rejected, though they form the very foundation of scholasticism. Theology and philosophy have, his said, nothing to do with each other. The question then arose, When it has only faith for its contents, is theology then a science? And he boldly answered, No, thereby openly breaking off from the Thomistic school, which defined theology as the science of God. He made the object (or subject, as he called it) of theology to be man, and declared the Scriptures were for practical help in attaining heaven by good works. Thus he completely inverted theology: man was the centre around which theology turned.

In regard to the sacraments, he denied that they had any inherent efficacy: they are merely divinely ordained conditions of grace. Hence the benefit came not from the sacrament as such, but directly from God. Nor do the sacraments confer any spiritual quality upon the recipient; but he declared, that, just as the stamp of the mint sets a certain value upon a coin, so the sacraments set the divine seal upon an existing relation between God and man. He divided the sacraments into two classes: those strictly such, and those such only in a wider sense. Among the latter he puts marriage. He disputed the current scholastic teaching respecting transubstantiation, which he declared to be unscriptural and unintelligible, and preferred to say transformation, since the material of the bread changed its form, and took on that of the Body of Christ. By these views he prepared the way for the reformers of the sixteenth century. See reviews of his ideas in the histories of theology by J. L. HENRY, M. HAUEREAU, FRANTIL, and J. LAENEOY: Syllabus officiorum, Mayence, 1453, of which the first part, Sententiae de Pacis rationibus inter Evangelicos (also apart in 1638, and in English in 1641). He returned to the Continent to the meeting of the Protestant States at Frankfort, which passed a resolution that they "did judge his work most laudable, most acceptable to God, and most necessary and useful to the Church." Once more returning to England, he received encouragement from King Charles I., and went with commendations to the Continent, visiting the States of Holland, the various classes, synods, and universities, passing then into Germany, and through Sweden and Denmark, everywhere winning friends to his cause (from 1655 to 1640). Among these, Calixtus of Helmstadt was most energetic. In 1639 he presented to Sir Thomas Rowe a Summary Discourse concerning Church and State Ecclesiastical (published 1641). He passed over into England in 1641, and presented a petition to the House of Commons, urging "that the blessed and long-sought-for union of Protestant churches may be recommended unto the publick prayers of the church," and "that his majesty with your honour's advice and counsel, might be moved to call a general synod of Protestants in due time, for the better settling of weighty matters in the church which now trouble not only the consciences of most men, but disturb the tranquillity of publick states, and divide the churches one from another, to the great hindrance of Christianity and the dishonour of Religion." He also issued a Memorial concerning Peace Ecclesiastical, in 1641, addressed "To the King of England and the Pastors and elders of the Kirk of Scotland meeting at St. Andrews." Soon after, he accepted the position of chaplain to the princess royal of England at the Hague, and then became pastor of the English Church at Rotterdam. The commencement of the civil wars in England disturbed all his plans. But he did not weary in his efforts. He became a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and was diligent in his labors for peace. He took part in the discussion with the Independents, publishing in 1644 An Epistolary Discourse, discussing how far and with what limitations Independents should be tolerated. In 1647 he issued A model of Church Government. In 1649, by the recommendation of Parliament, he became the Librarian of St. James, under the supervision of Whitlock, and issued in 1650 The Reformed Library Keeper, and other kindred publications. He protested and labored against the execution of the king, and with the Presbyterians, although with an irenic spirit. He thus brought on himself the ridicule of Prynne, who calls him "the time-serving Proteus, and ambidexter divine." In reply he published in 1650 a tract, in which he vindicated Dr. Whitlock and the single-hearted peacemaker." Under the Commonwealth he persevered in his irenic efforts, assembling the Presbyterian and Congregational ministers of London on several occasions, "to compare their own differences, and join with me in the design of my negotiations towards the churches." A declaration was penned, and subscribed by the heads of the universities and the ministers of London, both Congregational and Presbyterian, authorizing him to advocate that business among the churches in their name; and, securing the support of Cromwell, he journeyed to the Swiss churches for the purpose. He issued in 1654 An earnest plea for gospel Communion, and also A summary Platform of the heads of a body of Practical Divinity.

He renewed his efforts at the Restoration through Lord Chancellor Hide and the Earl of Manchester, but in vain, and left England to spend the rest of his life on the Continent. In 1662 he issued in Amsterdam his Irenæorum Tractatuum Prædomus, and continued to work in a more quiet way until an advanced age. In 1674 he issued at Frankfort Manière d'expliquer l'Apocalypse par elle même, etc., and seems to have died soon after at Hesse, where he enjoyed the protection and support of the Princess Sophia. Peace among Protestants, by Samuel Hartlib, Lond., 1641; A declaration of John Durie, Lond., 1690; Relié's Memoirs of Westminster Divines, Paisley, 1811; and Chalmers' Biographical Dictionary.

DUTIES, Conflict of, is a misnomer, strictly speaking; for duty is always the one thing to be done: hence there cannot be several duties which clash. But the phrase as used really means that one is in doubt what to do, or that the conflict is between duty and inclination: as soon as duty is obeyed, the conflict ceases. The supposed collision of duties occupied large space in books of casuistry; but the phrase should vanish, as the thing it expresses is imaginary.

DUTOIT, or DUTOIT-MEMBRINI, Jean Philippe, b. at Moudon, in the canton of Vaud, 1721; d. at Lausanne, Jan. 21, 1793; has interest both as a local revivalist of considerable power, and as a representative of mysticism within the pale of the French Reformed Church. He studied theology at Lausanne, and became (in 1750) acquainted with the works of Madame Guyon, which made a great impression upon him. To him Madame Guyon is a cherub, a seraph, etc.; and her works are sacred books, divine writings, inspired by the Holy Spirit, the divine logos. Nevertheless, the practical tendencies of his Protestant and biblical standpoint preserved him from the extremes of quietism. Though he never occupied any official position in the church, he was a frequent and very successful preacher. He actually drove Voltaire out of Lausanne. After 1759 he ceased to preach, on account of ill health; and a circle of friends then began to form around him, and spread his influence among the masses, not without some chicaneries from the friends of Voltaire, but without any serious impediment. His two principal works are Philosophie divine (1764, 3 vols.) and Philosophie chrétienne (1800–19, 4 vols.). He also published a new edition of the Letters of Madame Guyon, augmented with the Correspondance secrète de M. de Fénelon avec l'auteur, London, 1707, 5 vols. DUVEIL, Charles Maria, b. at Metz, Lorraine; d. in London about 1700. He was born a Jew, and educated in that faith; but study led him successively to enter the Roman-Catholic, the Episcopal, and the Baptist churches. His works embrace a Literal Exposition of the Cantičes (London, 1679, in Latin), and (in English) Literal Exposition of the Minor Prophets (London, 1680). A Literal Explanation of the Acts of the Apostles (London, 1685, new ed., London, 1851).

DUVERGER, DE HAURANNE, Jean, generally known under the name of St. Cyran, was b. at Bayonne, 1581, and d. in Paris Oct. 11, 1643. While he studied at Louvain, he became acquainted with Jansen; and perfectly agreeing in their contempt of scholasticism, and enthusiasm for the fathers, especially Augustine, they spent several years together at Bayonne (1611–10), and afterwards maintained an intimate correspondence through life. In 1620 Duverger was made abbot of the Monastery of St. Cyran, at Brenne; but the severity of his reforms, and his violence in introducing them, caused such an opposition that he left his abbey, and settled in Paris. Having been appointed court-preacher and confessor to Henrietta of France (married to Charles I. of England), he undertook to re-organize the Roman-Catholic Church in England after the model of the Gallican Church, and wrote a work upon the subject (Petrii Aurelii Theologi opera), which was accepted by the general conviction of the French clergy, but which brought him into strife with the Jesuits. In 1635 he was made confessor and director of the Abbey of Port Royal; and the reforms he succeeded in introducing there form the great work of his life. But the jealousy and hatred of the Jesuits, once aroused, continued to pursue him; and in 1638, a few days after the death of Jansen, he was arrested by order of Richelieu, and kept imprisoned at Vincennes until the death of the cardinal, Feb. 6, 1643. One of his principal works is his Somme des fautes, written in 1625 against the Jesuit Garasse. See Sainte-Beuve: Histoire de Port-Royal, Paris, 1840–60.

Dwight, Timothy, an eminent American teacher, preacher, and theologian; b. at Northampton, Mass., May 14, 1752; d. at New Haven, Jan. 11, 1817. His mother was a daughter of Jonathan Edwards. Dwight was graduated at Yale College in 1774, where he was a tutor from 1771 to 1777. For more than a year he was a chaplain in the army of the Revolution. From 1783 to 1795 he was at the head of an academy in Greenfield, Conn. From 1790 to his death he was president of Yale College, where he acquired a very high reputation as an instructor and also as a preacher. His sermons in the college chapel constituted a system of divinity, and were published, with a preface and notes, in 1818, under the title of Theology Explained and Defended. This work attained to great popularity, not only in this country, but it also taught a moderate Calvinism, with an avoidance of extreme statements, but in general consonance with the Edwardean or New-England theology. Its freedom from metaphysical refinements, and the warmth of Christian feeling pervading it, contributed to its wide diffusion. President Dwight, in the earlier part of his life, published two extended poems, — The Conquest of Canaan (1785) and Greenfield Hill (1794). These are not read at the present day; but his hymn, "I love thy kingdom, Lord," is used wherever the English language is spoken. Other writings of Dr. Dwight are Travels in New England (1822, 4 vols.), Sermons on Miscellaneous Subjects (1828, 2 vols.), besides minor publications. The fame of Dr. Dwight in his own time was due in no small degree to his conversational powers, his impressive eloquence as a preacher, and his uncommon influence as an instructor of youth. (Sprague's Annals of the American Pulpit, Sprague's Life of Dwight, and Memoir prefixed to his System of Theology.)

Dwight, Sereno Edwards, son of the preceding, b. at Greenfield, Conn., May 18, 1786; d. at Philadelphia, Nov. 30, 1850. He was graduated at Yale College, 1803; tutor there 1806–10, and a lawyer 1816–15. In 1816 he entered the ministry; 1817–26 was pastor of the Park-street church, Boston, resigned on account of health; 1838–31 taught in New Haven; 1833–35 was president of Hamilton College, New York. "He was an able preacher, a good writer, and a captivating teacher." His most celebrated work was The Hebrew Wife (an essay on the lawfulness of marriage with a deceased wife's sister), 1836. He also wrote a life of his great-grandfather, Jonathan Edwards, prefaced to his edition of Edwards's works in 10 vols., N.Y., 1830. See Memoir by his brother, Rev. Dr. W. T. Dwight, in a volume of Select Discourses, 1851.
EACHARD, John, D.D., b. in Suffolk, 1836; d. as Master of Catherine Hall, in Cambridge, July 7, 1897. He is famous for his essay on The grounds and occasions of the contempt of the clergy and religion, inquired into in a letter to R. L. (1670), with its sequel, Observations on An Answer to the Inquiry, in a second letter to the same (1671), and for his vigorous attacks upon Thomas Hobbes. He was master of a light, bantering, satirical style, which was very effective. He attributed the failure of the clergy to their defective education, small salaries, and lack of spirituality, and illustrated these points very humorously. His Works were published, London, 1705, best edition, 1784, 3 vols., with account of his life and writings.

EADFRID, Bishop of Lindisfarne 698–721, wrote and illuminated the celebrated Evangelarium, known as the Durham Book, or Lindisfarne Gospels, to which Aldred added an interlinear gloss in the Anglo-Northumbrian dialect. The manuscript, which is one of the most beautiful in Europe, and noticed by every writer on paleography, is preserved among the Cottonian manuscripts of the British Museum, and has been edited by Stevenson and Waring for the Surtees Society, and by Kemble, Hardwick, and Skeat, for the Syndics of the University of Cambridge. The gloss has been printed by Karl Bouterwek: Die vier Evangelen in altnordischmischer Sprache, 1857.

EADIE, John, D.D., LL.D., pastor, professor of theology, and commentator on some of the Pauline Epistles; b. at Alva, Stirlingshire, Scotland, May 9, 1810; d. at Glasgow, Saturday, June 3, 1876. He was educated at the University of Glasgow and in the theological seminary of the United Secession, now United Presbyterian, Church. He was ordained, on Sept. 21, 1835, to the pastorate of the Cambridge-street Church, Glasgow, which he retained until, in 1863, he removed, with a portion of his people, to form the new Lansdowne church, of which he was minister until his death. As early as his student days, he showed his leaning to the department in which he achieved his greatest success by writing an able article in the Edinburgh Theological Magazine for 1832, in review of Moses Stuart’s commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews; and he had so diligently given himself to biblical study in later years, that, on the death of Dr. John Mitchell, he was elected by the synod of his church (May 5, 1843) to the professorship of biblical literature in its divinity hall. Such an appointment at that time did not involve, as it now does, the dissolution of the pastoral relationship; for then the seminary sat for only two months in the year, those of August and September, and the professors were at once pastors and professors. But in the professorship Eadie found the great sphere of his life, and now began that course of industry which resulted in the extensive authorship which is indicated below.

He held the offices of pastor and professor for thirty-three years: and just after the synod had decided to remodel its theological seminary by lengthening its annual session from two to five months, shortening its curriculum from five to three years, increasing its corps of professors, and dissolving the relationship between them and their congregations, he died, on the 3d of June, 1876.

As a preacher, Eadie was satisfying rather than striking. His manner was not elegant, and his utterance was often thick; but he was always, like Elihu, “full of matter,” and one could not listen to him without learning much at his lips. He was especially excellent as an expositor, and frequently by a few clear sentences cast a flood of light upon a difficult portion of the word of God. As a professor he was affable, easy, and natural, “wearing his load of learning lightly like a flower,” and possessing that magnetic influence which quickened all his students into enthusiasm. His scholarship was extensive and accurate, and was so generally recognized, that he was chosen as a member of the New Testament company to whom was committed the preparation of the Canterbury revision of the English Bible. His commentaries are distinguished for candor and clearness, and above all for an evangelical “union” not common in works of the kind, and which may, perhaps, be accounted for from the fact, that, while he was poring over these epistles in his study, he was also discoursing on them from his pulpit. His influence gave an immense impulse to biblical exegesis in the denomination to which he belonged, and indeed to Scotland generally. He received the degree of LL.D. from the University of Glasgow in 1844, and that of D.D. from the University of St. Andrews in 1850.

LIT. — Besides contributions to the Eclectic and North British Reviews, and Kitto’s Journal of Sacred Literature, Dr. Eadie did an immense amount of literary work in connection with McKenzie’s Imperial Dictionary of Universal Biography (in which he had charge of the department of ecclesiastical biography), with the first and last (3d) editions of Kitto’s Cyclopaedia, and with Fairbairn’s Imperial Bible Dictionary. He prepared an excellent Concordance to the Scriptures on the Basis of Cruden (1839), and compiled the series published in Edinburgh, and very widely circulated, The Bible Cyclopaedia (1848, based upon The Union Bible Dictionary, Phila., in condensed form, under the caption Dictionary of the Holy Bible for the Young; new ed. of the Cyclopaedia, entirely re-written, 1860); An Analytic Concordance to the Holy Scriptures (1830); and The Ecclesiastical Cyclopaedia (1861). He published two volumes of discourses, The Divine Love (1855), and Paul the Preacher (1859). But his fame rests on his commentaries on the Greek text of Ephesians (1851), Colossians (1856), Philippians (1859), Galatians (1869), and, published posthumously, on First Thessalonians (1877). In addition must be mentioned his interesting biographies of John Kitto (1857) and William Wilson, his posthumous treatise on Scripture Illustrations from the Domestic EADMUND, or EDMUND, king and martyr; was b. in 840, and ascended the throne of East Anglia in 855, when King Offa abdicated, and also outraged the nuns, burnt and pillaged churches and houses. Edmund tried to stem the flood, but was overwhelmed, taken prisoner, tortured, and finally beheaded, Nov. 20, 870. His remains were interred at Bury St. Edmunds, and miracles were wrought at his grave. In 1020 Canute the king succeeded in having a papal legate sent to England to neutralize the influence of the English holy days. The English kings have adopted and practised asceticism since a boy: and with Christmas the most joyous day observed by the Church—Term. — The term is derived from the Saxon Ostara, or Eostre (German Ostern), the goddess of spring. The French designation paques preserves a reference to the Jewish pascha, or passover. In the early church, pascha designated the festival of Christ's crucifixion. After the second council of Nicaea (A.D. 787), it designated both the festival of the crucifixion and the resurrection (πάσχα σταυροῦ καὶ ανάστασιος). Subsequently the term was limited to the latter. Only in a single instance is the original rendered Easter (Acts xii. 1) in our version; in all other cases, passover. The Revised Version has rectified this inconsistency in translation.

Date. — In the early church there was no uniformity in the day observed (Epiphan., Har., LXX.). Bede at a later date makes frequent mention of the place of the sun's rising, answering to divarō (east) and orienis, and means the east in distinction from the west (Josh. xi. 3; Ps. l. 1, ciii. 12; Zech. viii. 7). Kedem means rather the east as one of the four quarters (Bede, Hilgenfeld, et al.), Joh. xxiii. 9, 10; Ezek. xlvii. 18 sq.). Each term has a secondary or derivative meaning. Kedem is the proper name for the countries on the immediate coast of the Holy Land; while mirazakh designates the far east (Isa. xii. 1, 25, xili. 5, xivi. 11).

EADWORTH, or EDWARD, III., the Confessor, king of the Anglo-Saxons; b. 1004; crowned King at Winchester, April 3, 1043; d. at Shene Jan. 5, 1066. He dedicated Westminster Abbey, Dec. 28, 1065. His virtues were monastic rather than regal; but such was his reputation for sanctity, that he was canonized by Pope Alexander III. in 1166. An interesting and sympathetic sketch of Eadward is given by Green, in his Short History of the English People (Harper's ed., pp. 91-100); but for full information see FREDERICK MAN'S History of the Norman Conquest (vol. ii.), and also Luard's Lives of Edward the Confessor.

EAST. The Hebrew mikra, and kedeem are both translated "east." The first means literally rising (i.e., of the sun), and therefore indicates the place of the sun's rising, answering to ανατολή and orienis, and means the east in distinction from the west (Josh. xi. 3; Ps. l. 1, ciii. 12; Zech. viii. 7). Kedem means rather the east as one of the four quarters (Bede, Hilgenfeld, et al.), Joh. xxiii. 9, 10; Ezek. xlvii. 18 sq.). Each term has a secondary or derivative meaning. Kedem is the proper name for the countries on the immediate coast of the Holy Land; while mikra designates the far east (Isa. xii. 1, 25, xili. 5, xivi. 11).

The early Christian emperors signalized its return by setting minor criminals at liberty (Cod. Theod., ix. 38, 3). For fourteen days public spectacles were intermitted, and business largely stopped. But by the third Council of Orleans,

In the Roman-Catholic Church elaborate rites

In the Protestant churches of Europe, Easter is generally observed, especially among Lutherans and Episcopalians. It was at one time dis-

English dissenters and Scotch Presbyterians, but is coming to be pretty generally observed in America.

N.Y., Aug. 3, 1872. He was professor of ancient languages in Georgetown College, Ky. (1831–33), of mathematics and natural philosophy (1833–37), and of ecclesiastical and civil history (1837–50),
at the Literary and Theological Institution, Ham-

1846 as Madison University; in it he served as professor of systematic theology (1850–61), and president of the theological seminary, and professor of homiletics (1861–71).

March 20, 851; was the son of a serf, but the foster-brother of Louis the Pious, and was given freedom by Charlemagne; educated in a cloister school, ordained priest, and appointed to some ecclesiastical position at the imperial court.
Louis the Pious made him Archbishop of Rheims in 816; and in 822 he assumed the lead of the Danish mission. He visited Denmark twice; and it was no doubt due to him that the Danish king, Harold Klak, when heavily pressed by domestic foes, sought refuge at the Frankish court, was baptized, and returned with Ansgar in his retinue. But there is no evidence, except

He was less successful in manipulations of the same kind in his native country. Though he owed every thing to Louis the Pious, he deserted him once more when the battle was lost, and the poor emperor was condemned to make public penance. Ebbo was there to take off his golden arms, and lay on the sackcloth and ashes, announcing to the world that he was thereby incapacitated to reign. But he could in order to allure people away, by bribes and by threats, from the camp of Louis; and when the battle was lost, and the poor emperor was condemned to make public penance, Ebbo was there to take off his golden arms, and lay on the sackcloth and ashes, announcing to the world that he was thereby incapacitated to reign. But there came a turn in the affairs. Louis the Pious once more was in power; and Ebbo hastened to the diet of Authurphen (1809). The Pope reconciled to him. The emperor was too angry, however. He threw the archbishop into a dungeon at Fulda; and there he lay, in spite of the Pope's protest, till the death of Louis (840). Lothair re-instated him in the archiepiscopal see, but Charles expelled him. Lothair then gave him as a recompense the abbeys of Stablo and Bobbio; but Ebbo felt disappointed, and tried Louis the German, who, however, had only a pittance left for him, — the administration of the diocese of Hildesheim. Besides the above Apologia, Ebbo has also written an Indiculum de ministeris Remens. Eccles.

EBED JESU (Syria, "Servant of God"), sur- named Bar Brika ("Son of the Blessed"), a Nestorian theologian of comprehensive scholarship; was born in the middle of the thirteenth century, in Gozarta, an island in the Tigris; became early Bishop of Sinshar and Arabia, and was, and was, 1263 and 1287, made metropolitan of Nisibis, or Zola, where he died in the beginning of November, 1318. He left twenty works: one, exegetical, on the Old and New Testaments (not allegorical, as often stated); three, dogmatical, on the incarnation of the Logos, on the sacraments, and the on the verity of the faith (edited in Syriac and Latin by A. Mai, in Script. Vet., 10, 317-368); several works referring to canon law; The Paradise of Eden, a collection of fifty poems (comp. Assenami, Biblior. Or., 3, p. 323); twelve poetical tracts on the sciences; a book on the philosophy of the Greeks; a rhymed catalogue of two hundred Syrian authors (Assenami, Biblior. Or., 3, 1, p. 1-362), enumerating also his own works. Different from this Ebed Jesus is another Nestorian patriarch of the same name, who in 1592 was converted to Romanism. R. Gosche.

EBEL, Johannes Wilhelm, Dr., b. March 4, 1784, at Passenheim; d. Aug. 18, 1861, at Hohen- eck-in-Württemberg. After his graduation at Königsberg, he became acquainted with Johann Heinrich Schönherr one of the most original thinkers of the period, and espoused his views of relative dualism (see SchöNHERR). His pronounced evangelical views, and eloquent advocacy of practical Christianity, were distasteful to the rationalistic and dead orthodox clergy of the province, who tried, from the very beginning of his ministerial career at Hermsdorf (1807-1809), to awe him into submission, and, upon his removal to Königsberg as preacher and teacher of Frederick College (1810), resented his growing popularity by charging him with heresy. The matter being referred by him to the local consistory, the latter, whose mask was duly penetrated by Schleiermacher, received a scathing and well-merited rebuke for their ill-natured odium theologicae; while Ebbe, whose dignified bearing under this persecution increased both his influence and popularity, was chosen preacher of the Old Town Church at Königsberg, the largest in the city, in 1816, and filled that high position until his deprivation in 1842. This was brought about as follows. In 1826 a ministerial rescript, warning the several consistories against excesses in pietism, and separatism, was eagerly seized by Schön, the provincial governor, a notorious enemy of Christianity, and an utterly unprincipled man, and the opponents of Ebbe and Diestel, his brother minister and friend, as an opportunity for assailing him, on the presence that he had founded a sect which held secret meetings, and advocated tenets of perilous and immoral tendency. The wildest rumors were circulated and believed; and after an animated controversy, necessitating the withdrawal of the first from Königsberg, Ebbe and Diestel were openly charged with having founded a sect. Schön appointed Kähler, a member of the consistory, known to be personally hostile to and jealous of Ebbe, to investigate the matter, with the result that he discovered, or rather invented, him guilty of the alleged charge of having founded a sect. Ebbe refusing to admit the charge, and to submit to an interrogatory, unless the specifications were communicated to him, the consistory arbitrarily and illegally decreed his suspension ab officio, Oct. 7, 1835, and that of Diestel, Dec. 9, 1835. The action of the consistory led to a criminal suit, which lasted four years, with the result that the accused were acquitted of all charges except that of having founded a sect, and sentenced to be deposed, and Ebbe to be imprisoned until he should have given proof of amendment. From this sentence appeal was made; and, after a further delay of eighteen months, the finding of the lower court was cancelled. Ebbe acquitted of the charge of having founded a sect, but nevertheless deprived, on the ground of gross neglect of duty. There is probably no criminal case on record more flagrantly unjust; for, in spite of the acquittal of the offence with which Ebbe and Diestel were falsely charged, they were punished with degradation from the ministerial office, of which they were bright and shining ornaments. Their persecution, originating in theological hatred, and eventuating in their sacrifice to it, took place at a time (1842) when the judicial process in Prussia was still praised: that explains the injustice. To-day it would be impossible to bring such a case to the cognizance of a jury. After his deprivation, Ebbe lived at Grunenfeld from 1842 to 1848, at Meran-in-the-Tyroli from 1848 to 1850, and at Hoheneck-in-Württemberg from 1850 to 1861, in which year he was deprived of his office. The memory of that noble man, purified from all the aspersions of theological hatred, and the calumnies of ungodly men, has been vindicated in the following and other works: HAHNENFELD: Die Religiose Beweigung, etc., Braunsberg, 1853; von der Grüben: Die Liebe zur Wahrheit, Stuttgart, 1850; Kаниitz: Aufklärung nach Actentquellen, Basel and Ludwigsburg, 1862. The last is a masterpiece; and its author has succeeded, by making the official record disclose the truth, in inducing every respectable encyclopedia and church-history to correct the slanderous and false notices which twenty years ago disfigured their pages. — An article on the Religious Suit may be seen in the Bibliotheca Sacra, 1869, vol. XXVI., No. 104, and the full history in my Life of Ebel, London and New York, 1852. — The most important of the works of Ebel are: Die Weisheit von Ohen, 1823, 2d ed., Basel, etc., enlarged, 1868; Die Treue, 1835, 2d ed., ibid., 1863; Gottesliche Erziehung, Hamburg, 1825, in English, 1825; Die apostolische Predigt ist zeitgemäss, Hamburg, 1835; Verstand und Vernunft (by Dierstel and Ebel), Leipzig, 1837; Zeugnis der Wahrheit (by the same), 1839; Die Erkenntiss der Gottes Wahrheit, ib., 1852; Die Philosophie der heidischen Urgunde des Christenthums, Stuttgart, 1854–56; Compas de route, containing extracts from most of these works, and also from the Liebe zur Wahrheit. — See also s.v. In 1541 he was appointed professor in Latin grammar, and began to lecture on the whole range of the artes liberalis, publishing a handbook of Jewish history, a historical calendar, destined to supplant the calendar of Roman saints, etc. In 1557 he was made professor of the Old Testament, and in 1558 superintendent-general of the whole electorate. During the last years of his life he devoted himself almost exclusively to theology, and took part in the various theological controversies and dispositions of the time, though essentially as a mediator. / Bisla Latina, a correction of the Latin translation of the Old Testament, is himself considered as his principal work. In Ulm he became acquainted with the writings of Luther, and began to preach the views of the reformers. Compelled to leave the city, he went to Switzerland, where he wrote his first book, Die fünfzehn Bundeigenossen, 1521, dedicated to Charles V. A stay in France (1528–29) made him familiar with the works of Erasmus. After a stay in Basel (1530) he returned to Ulm, and became intimately acquainted with Luther and Melanchthon, he visited the regions of the Rhine, especially Basel and Ulm, preaching and publishing pamphlets in the spirit of the Reformation. During a second visit to Wittenberg he published his Wie sich eyn Diener Gottes worts ynn all seymun thun halten soll, etc., 1523. The last years of his life he spent in Thuringia, steadily working with energy and success, though in his own independent and original way, for the cause of the Reformation. See Bernhard Rigenbach: Johann Eberlin von Günzburg und sein Reformprogramm, Tubingen, 1874. / EBIONITES. This designation was at first, like "Nazarenes," a common name for all Christians, as Epiphanius (d. 403) testifies (Adc. H. xxix. 1). It is derived from the Hebrew יִבְיוֹנֶה, "poor," and was not given, as Origen supposes, in reference to their low views of Christ, but to their own poverty. This poverty, especially characteristic of the Jews of Jerusalem, evoked from the pagan and Jewish world the contemptuous appellation of "the poor." Minutius Felix says, "That we are called the poor is not our disgrace, but our glory" (Octa., 38). Subsequently its application was limited to Jewish Christians. "The Jews, or "Israelites," many of whom are called Ebionites," writes Origen (c. Cels., II. 1). Then, when a portion of the Jewish Church became separate and heretical, the designation was used exclusively of it. Later in the fourth century Epiphanius, Jerome, and others use it of a separate party within the Jewish Church distinct from the Nazarenes. This outline of history proves that Tertullian was wrong when he derived the term from a pretended founder of the sect called Ebon. The notices in the early fathers are fragmentary, and at times seem to be contradictory on account of the double application of the term, now to Jewish Christianity as a whole, now to a party within it. The New Testament knows of no sects in the Jewish Church, but indicates the existence of different tendencies. At the Council of Jerusalem a legalistic and Judaizing spirit manifested itself, which was in antagonism to the spirit of Paul, and was shown in the Judaizing teachings which did so much mischief in the Galatian churches. But it was not until after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the founding of Aelia Capitolina by Hadrian, in 134, that Jewish Christianity became a distinct school, gradually becoming more heretical, and separated into the two sects of Ebionites proper and Nazarenes. The latter still held to Paul as an apostle, and, while they kept the law themselves, did not demand its observance of the Gentile Christians. The former held the observance of the law to be obligatory upon all Christians alike, and rejected Paul as an apostate. This was the state of affairs at the time of Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryph., 47). Ireneus, who does not mention this party division, describes the Ebionites as stubbornly clinging to the law, as rejecting the apostle Paul as an apostate, and all the Gospels except Matthew. He further notices a christological heresy. Denying Christ's birth from the Virgin, they regarded him as a mere man. Origen (c. Cels., V. 81) distinguishes between two branches of Ebionites, those who denied and those who accepted the miraculous birth. The Ebionites proper became apparent in the later fathers, as Jerome, Epiphanius, etc., the notices are more frequent; but nothing is added to our knowledge except that the Egyptians were chiliasm (Jerome ad. Esdr., 35, 1). In Epiphanius' day (d. 403) they dwelt principally in the regions along the Dead Sea, but also in Rome and Cyprus. The disintegration of Jewish Christianity was consummated by the introduction of Gnostic philosophy, of Greek culture, as also, perhaps, of Oriental theology. See the art. EKLESIAETES.

EBRARD OF BETHUNE, a place in Arbois, lived in the latter part of the twelfth and the beginning of the thirteenth century, and acquired a name as a writer on grammar and theology. Of his personal life nothing is known. His two known works are, Graecismus, a poem of two thousand verses, on grammar, prosody, rhetoric, etc., used for a long time as a handbook in the schools of the middle ages, and Liber anthematores, a refutation of the heresies of the Cathari, at that time very numerous in the Flanders. The latter work, still important as a source of information concerning the doctrines of the Cathari, was first printed by the Jesuit Greter, under the title Contra Wahlenses, in his Tris Scriptorum contra Wahlenses, Ingolstadt, 1614, then in Max. Bibl. Patr., Lyons, vol. XXIV., and finally in Greter's Works, vol. XII. Several other works are ascribed to Ebrard; but the books are unimportant and the authorship doubtful. C. Schmidt.

ECBATANA (Greek 'Ahyatana, or 'A'Ektana, Babylonian Agamatanu or Agamantu), the capital of Media, is mentioned (Ez. vi. 2) as 'Achnish'tha. It was the place where, in Darius' time, was found the record of Cyrus' decree authorizing the restoration of the temple at Jerusalem. The name occurs often in Aramaic (Abodōs, 'Aschylus, Ctesias), and notably in the apocryphal books (Tob. iii. 7, vii. 12, 14; Jud. i. 1, 2, 14; 2 Macc. ix. 3, etc.). It was, however, applied to several different places; and the question has been discussed whether the Ecbatana, whose magnificent fortifications are described by Herodotus (i. 98, 99), and in the Book of Judith (i. 2–4), is the same with the Ecbatana which was the summer residence of the Persian kings, — the modern Hamadan, and if not, which of the two is the Hebrew Achnish'tha. Sir II. Rawlinson has sought to place the former at Takht-i Suleiman, to the north of Hamadan, where there are remarkable ruins, and where topographical features are thought to favor Herodotus' description. There is, however, no evidence from the cuneiform inscriptions that the Agamantu, the royal city of Astyages, which Cyrus captured (Trans. Soc. Bibl. Arch., VII.), was not the Agamatana of Darius (Behistun Insocr. 60), and the identity of this with the old Median capital on the one hand, and with Achnish'tha on the other, is probably to be maintained. In the autumn of B.C. 1064, Darius I. (the Great) spent some months in Ecbatana, and celebrated the Dionysia (Arrian, Exp. Alex. iii. 19); but after his death it had a checkered history, losing much of its prestige and influence, and subjected to the harsh treatment of successive conquerors. It was favored by the Parthian rulers, who made it once more the royal summer residence. But this honor was again taken away under the Sassanides; and it was completely overshadowed by Bagdad and Isphahan, dropping almost entirely out of notice. Hamadan, its modern representative, is an active business town of some fifty thousand inhabitants. There are few traces of antiquity to be found there, though the tombs of Esther and Mordecai are pointed out with pride. See KARL RITTER; Erdkunde, IX. 98–128; II. ECCH ELENSESIS, Abraham, b. at Eckel, in the latter part of the sixteenth century; d. in Rome 1641; was educated in the Maronite College in Rome, and appointed professor of the Syriac and Arab languages at the Congregation of the Propaganda. His chief work was his participation in the edition of the Paris polyglot under Le Jay, which lasted from 1640 to about 1653, though with interruptions. He furnished the Syriac, Arab, and Latin texts of the Book of Ruth, and the Arab text of the third Book of the Maccabees. He also undertook a revision of the labor of his predecessor, Gabriel Sionita; but this revision brought upon him a very severe criticism by Valerian de Flavigny (Paris, 1640), to which, however, he gave a very sharp answer (Paris, 1647). Comp. MASCHE: Bibl. Sacra, i. 537 sqq. Among his independent works are: a Syriac handbook, Rome, 1629; Eutychius Patriarcha Alexandrinus vivdictus, Rome, 1661; a defence of the episcopacy, directed against J. Selden; an edition of the letters and sermons of Anthony, Paris, 1641 and 1646; an edition of the Chronicon Orientale of Ibn ar-Rúbih, Paris, 1653; Concordianus nationum Christ. Orient. in fidei catholicae dogmata, Mayence, 1655 (together with Leo Al- lius), etc. Assemani's verdict on him is severe but not undeserved. — R. Gosche.

ECCLESIASTES (אֶכֶלְסְיָסְטָה, לְשָׁה, 'Eκκλησίαςτης). 1. Title. — "The Book of Koheleth, the son of David, King in Jerusalem" (i. 1). The word Koheleth is the feminine participle of Kāḥel, "to call together," "to assemble." Though feminine in form, which does not necessarily imply that the writer wished to identify himself with Wisdom (cf. Prov. i. 20), it is manifestly common meaning, following the analogy of Sophorētē (Neh. vii. 57), Pockerēt (Ex. ii. 57), Alēneth, and Azmōreth (1 Chr. viii. 36). It is interpreted "preacher" (as in the Hiphil, one who addresses an assembly, — Septuagint, the Vulgate, and Modern Versions), "deacon" (so also the early Christian assembly), "collector" (i.e. of different opinions), "gatherer" (i.e. of an assembly).

2. Author. — (1) Solomon. — This is the traditional view. It is maintained by the rabbins, the fathers, and by the great majority of commentators. In its favor are: (a) The age of the opinion, (b) the evident purpose of the book in its favor; (c) The eminent fitness of Solomon to write this book, because of his divine wisdom and wide experience; (d) The style and diction belong to the golden age of Hebrew literature (so, e.g., argues Taylor Lewis); but others maintain the exact opposite; (e) The claim of the book itself, not made for a death-struggle with the language; (f) The absence of such abuses; (g) The late reception of the book, because of his divinity and wide experience.

The advocates of this theory emphasize the point that no other Hebrew than Solomon answered the descriptions given of the magnificence in which the unnamed author lived, nor is known to have possessed such riches an experience.

3. Date.—Among those who deny the Solomonic origin there is no agreement as to time. Opinions among the denomin vary from 975–588 B.C.—somewhere between Solomon and Jeremiah (Nachtigal)—to A.D. 8, the time of Herod the Great and the author to be God-fearing Israelite of the sect of the Chaldeans. Zöckler thinks that Ecclesiastes was written somewhere between B.C. 240 (the death of Zeno) and B.C. 181 (that of the death of Ptolemy Epiphanes); his principal reason for this extraordinary difference being the different opinions held as to the historical period whose social condition could explain the general tone of the production; for all agree that the time must have been very evil. To quote two eminent modern commentators upon Ecclesiastes: Zöckler, in Lange, and Dean E. H. Plumptre. Zöckler says, "The book may be considered as contemporary with Nehemiah and Malachi, or between B.C. 450 and 400, and the author to be a God-fearing Israelite of the sect of the Chaldeans, at A.D. 8, the time of Herod the Great;" Zöckler, "I would be inclined to A.D. 8, the time of Herod the Great and the author to be God-fearing Israelite of the sect of the Chaldeans." tents of his teachings. Zöckler, following other commentators, divides each of these discourses into almost as many subdivisions (viz., 40) as (here) are versions. But instead of putting the book under the scalp, and laying bare its bones, it is better to consider it as a living body, and discover the secret of its life. Taken thus as a whole, it may be considered as a confession written in prose, devoid of plan, except so far as it is a continuous unburdening of self. Its unity is in its authorship and theme,—the vanity of life. Its contents are miscellaneous illustrations of the theme, derived from experience, and told with great sadness. It is because the book is thus a collection of observations, that some interpret the title, Koheleth by "collector."

5. Character and Tendency.—Many advocates of the Solomonic hypothesis find in the book evidence of his change of heart. But, whether Solomon be the author or not, it will be probably best to consider it a unique exhibition of Hebrew scepticism, subdued and checked by the Hebrew love of wisdom, and reaping lessons of wisdom from the follies of life. The tone is sad. On every side the writer sees persistent and gigantic evil. Nothing turns out as he would like. "O vanity of vanities, all is vanity." And yet the conviction is fixed that it is always right to do right; and, in view of the coming judgment (xi. 9), the book closes with this memorable sentence: "Fear God's way of happiness,—a blameless, trustful, pious life."

ECK, Johann Maier von, b. at Eck, on the Günz, Nov. 19, 1486; d. at Ingolstadt, Feb. 10, 1543; was the son of a peasant, but was educated by an uncle, Martin Maier, at Rotenburg, on the Neckar. He studied at Heidelberg, Tubingen, and Cologne, and took his degree, as master of arts, at Tubingen, 1501. From 1502 to 1510 he lived in Freiburg, in Brisgau, studying and teaching; and here he made his debut as a writer by his Logicae Exercitamenta. He also found opportunity to distinguish himself as an orator, more especially as a disputant; and in 1510 he was appointed professor of theology in the University of Ingolstadt, which institution he actually ruled for the rest of his life. He was a man of great learning, though not a great scholar. His learning was knowledge rather than insight, the result of a remarkable memory rather than the product of a clear intellect. He was also possessed of great talent as a disputant; though he generally had the misfortune to confirm his adversaries in their own opinions, instead of altering them over to his, for he lacked that seriousness of conviction which alone is able to create conviction in others. Though by no means a charlatan, he was one of those vain characters who believe the victory won when they feel their vanity gratified. Characteristically enough, he came into laurels as a disputant by defending, in October, 1514, at the instance of the merchants of Augsburg, the proposition that "aury," as the taking of five per cent interest was then called by the Church, was legitimate business.

Having received the ninety-five theses of Luther, with whom he before had had friendly relations, Eck circulated, in March, 1518, a manuscript criticism on them,—Obelisci (marks made in books to draw the attention to suspicious passages). As Luther was away on his Heidelberg journey, Carlstadt published some counter-criticism (Conclusions); and, when Luther returned, he answered with his Asterisci. A rapid exchange of theses and counter-theses now followed; and the affair was finally wound up by a grand disputation, which was solemnly opened at Leipzig, June 25, 1519. On June 26 and 29, and on July 1 and 3, Eck disputed with Carlstadt concerning divine grace and good works, etc.; and from July 4 he disputed for ten successive days with Luther concerning the absolute supremacy of the Pope, purgatory, penance, etc. The general impression was that Eck had won. He was flattered and feasted as the "Achilles of the Church." But the real result was, that Luther went away much clearer and more decided with respect to the futility of the Pope"s claim to infallibility. Eck himself, however, does not seem to have felt quite sure about his victory. He suffered the humiliation that the arbitrators declined to give any verdict; and though he continued to shower a multitude of rabid theses, criticisms, etc., down upon the heads of the Dominican, he never saw fit to appeal to force. With the German princes he failed; but in January, 1520, he went to Rome, and the result was the bull Exurge Domine, which he was to make public in Germany himself in the quality of apostolical prothonotary and papal nuncio. The task, however, proved less enjoyable than he had expected. From Leipzig, from Erfurt, etc., he had to flee from the riots of the mob, covered with ridicule and scorn; and even in his own city, in Ingolstadt, he found it difficult to get the bull published with due solemnity.

Twice more Eck visited Rome on diplomatic errands; and though he was not received by Adrian VI. with the same cordiality as by Leo X., he nevertheless achieved his purpose. In Bavaria, too, his influence was steadily increasing, and he fairly succeeded in transforming the country into a province of the Spanish Inquisition. One process of heresy followed the other, and in them all Dr. Eck played a conspicuous part; but, in his ever-raging contest with the reformers, his successes were half only. His Enchiridion locorum communium adversus Lutherum ran through forty-six editions between 1525 and 1576. It was read and admired, but it had no permanent effect. Similarly with his disputation with the Swiss reformers. It cost him much exertion and many intrigues to bring it about. Zwingli would not leave Zürich, and to Zürich Eck dared not go. Finally Baden-in-Argau was fixed upon; and from May 21 to June 8, 1526, the disputation took place. Ecocolampadius and Eck were the principal interlocutors, the doctrine of transubstantiation the principal subject. But, though Eck seemed to be in an uncommonly conciliatory humor, the only result of the disputation was, that the Swiss-reformed doctrine of the Lord's Supper became still more distinctly developed in its difference from the Lutheran. At the diet of Augsburg (1530) Eck had to write the refutation of the Protestant Confession; and he worked on it day and night from June 27 to July 13, assisted by twenty other theologians. But he was compelled to re-write it twice before it suited the emperor. In the last years of his life he was chiefly occupied in counteracting the various attempts made to bring about a reconciliation. It was due to him that the Roman-Catholic princes rejected the Regensburg Interim in 141.

ECKHART (generally called Meister Eckhart), the most remarkable of the German mystics of the fourteenth century, was probably born at Strassburg, 1290, and died, probably on a journey to Avignon, 1329. He belonged to the Dominican order, and was prior of Erfurt towards the close of the thirteenth century. In 1302 he taught in the College of St. Jacques in Paris, and took the degree of licentiatus theologiae. In 1303 he was appointed provincial of his order for Saxony, and in 1307 vicar-general for Bohemia. In 1308 he again taught in Paris, and in 1316 he settled at Strassburg as vicar for the grand-master of his order. There he became acquainted with the Brethren of the Free Spirit; and when, some time after, he was removed to Francfort as prior of the Dominicans, he retained the character of his preaching aroused suspicion, and he was accused, before the grand-master Hervé (at that moment present at Metz), of entertaining connections with suspicious persons. An investigation was instituted, and Eckart was acquitted. Archbishop Henry of Cologne, however, the implacable enemy of the Bechhards, had formed an opinion of his own about Eckart; and in 1325 very heavy accusations against him were laid before the chapter of the order assembled in Venice. Nicholas of Strassburg, as papal nuntius et minis- ter, was charged with the investigation; and, as he himself belonged to the mystical school of theology, he found nothing to blame in Eckart. But Henry would not suffer himself to be robbed of his prey in this way. He accused both Eckart and his protector, Nicholas, of heresy; and a regular process was instituted before an episcopal court of inquisition. Both Eckart and Nicholas protested against the competency of the court, and appealed to the Pope; but they were, nevertheless, both of them condemned. On Feb. 13, 1329, Eckart read from the pulpit of the cloister-chapel in Cologne a solemn declaration, in which he protested his willingness to recant any error into which he might have fallen. Immediately after, he set out for Avignon; but when the papal decision was given, in the bull of March 27, 1329, he had died. The bull, however, treated the case with great leniency. On account of the declaration he had made at Cologne, Eckart was evidently considered as one who, before death, had returned to the bosom of the Church. The bull condemned seventeen propositions of his, and pointed out eleven more as suspicious. But, in spite of this only conciliatory document, the beclouded enemy of the Bechhards was subjected to a series of trials, and a declaration clung to him with great reverence and love. When Heinrich Suso wrote his autobiography, in 1360, he spoke of Eckart as the "holy master;" and his sermons were frequently copied in the monasteries of Germany, Switzerland, Tyrol, and Bohemia. In 1430 the papal condemnation was repeated; but in 1440 Nicholas of Cusa, nevertheless, mentions Eckart's works as one of the sources of his system. A collected edition of his works was given by Franz Pfeiffer, Leipzig, 1857. What startles the reader in Eckart's writings is his strongly pronounced though mystic pantheism, often expressed with singular power. God is not the highest being, he says, for he is the only being. Outside of God there is nothing but illusion and deception. In its true existence every creature is not only a revelation of God, but "a part of him;" and—here enters the easy transition from Eckart's pantheistic speculations to his ascetic morals—the true object of human life must consequently be to strip it of all illusions and deceptions, and return into the one great being, God.

ECLECTICISM, a philosophical method by which a philosopher extracts from various systems of philosophy that which seems to him to be most strikingly true, and fits it together as best he knows how. The method is completely unscientific, and has never produced results of any account. It generally becomes very fashionable, however, in all post-philosophical ages, when the true philosophical productivity has died out. Neoplatonism was at the bottom eclecticism, and so was Roman philosophy in general.

ECUADOR, The Republic of, situated between Brazil, Peru, the Pacific Ocean, and Colombia, comprises an area of about three hundred thousand square miles, and contains, according to the census of 1875, about nine hundred thousand inhabitants, besides two hundred thousand Indians who are semi-civilized. The bulk of the civilized population consists of descendants of whites and Indians, Indians with fixed abodes, negroes, and descendants of negroes and whites, and negroes and Indians. They are all Christians; while the Indians, among whom formerly was carried on a very active mission, have now relaxed completely into Paganism. According to the constitution, the Catholic-Apostolical-Roman Church is the Church of the State, and other denominations are excluded. Toleration is shown, however; but as yet no independent congregation has been established in the country. The relation to Rome is based upon a concordat of Sept. 26, 1862. The capital (Quito) is the seat of an archbishop. There are episcopal seats at Guayaquil, Riobamba, Cuenca, Ibarra, and others in several Austrian families; lived for some time he had reached the standpoint of absolute rationalism, considering all the positive religions as defective forms, and reason as the highest authority also in the field of religion; and with this conviction he proposed to retire into obscurity, and maintain himself as a weaver. But he had already written his Unschuldige Wahrheiten (1735), and his friends induced him to go on to keep it "(ii.15); i.e., to cultivate and guard here the woman was fashioned out of his rib (Gen. ii.21)." God (ii.19, 22, cf. iii.8), with only one restriction to observe,—the prohibition to eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil (ii.17). Through the specious words of the serpent (iii.1-5) the woman was led to disobey the command, and the man followed her example (iii. 6). Thus they lost their innocence; and the Lord passed sentence upon them, and cursed the serpent. He provided tunics of skins (iii. 21) to take the place of the aprons of fig-leaves which the man and his wife in their shame had made (iii. 7), and then sent them out of the garden, that, with their newly-gained knowledge of good and evil, they might not eat of the tree of life also, and so live forever (iii. 22, 23). On the east of the garden the Lord placed “the cherubim, and the flaming sword, self-brandishing, to guard the way to the tree of life” (iii. 24).

(See Adam, Cherubim, Creation, Eve, Serpent, Sin.)

geographical knowledge, and wide disagreement still prevails. There are said to have been in all some eighty hypotheses as to the position of Eden. (a) The language of Gen. ii. 10 only shows the eccentric proposals to find it in Prussia, on the shores of the Baltic (Hasse), or in the Canary Islands (Creuzer), and others of like character.

All the views which deserve notice here may be grouped under three heads:

I. THEORIES WHICH PLACE EDEN IN THE FAR EAST. — This class of views is sometimes called “traditional,” because it can be traced back to Josephus, and has been thought to rest on genuine tradition. It identifies the Pison with the Indus or the Ganges, and Havilah with India or, vaguely, with the Eastern region. Cush is then commonly the country south of Egypt, or, in general, the south land of Asia and Africa (see Cush), and Gihon is the Nile; or else Cush is derived from the supposed Caspian people, Kossaia; and Gihon is the Oxus, called by Islamites Gakhtua. (When Pison is made identical with Indus, then Gihon has sometimes been explained as Ganges.) It is then sometimes supposed that Euphrates and Tigris have been inserted in place of two other Eastern rivers. This general theory has been held, in some form of it, by Josephus, most church fathers, and, among modern writers, Ewald, Renan, Maspero, Bertheau, Dillmann, Rüetschi, etc. In support of this view such grounds as the following have been adduced, (a) The language of Gen. ii. 8, iv. 16, xi. 2, as well as modern research, point to the far East as the early home of man. (b) The Indian conception of Meru suggests that the biblical account rests on recollections from that region. (c) Gold and gems are products of India. (d) Havilah (being, perhaps, originally an appellative from वीर्, “sand,” hence “the sandy,” or “sand-land”) can be applied to India as a country of which the Hebrews had only dim knowledge; it denoted in their history a land south and south-east of Palestine; to extend it vaguely eastward was easy. (e) Gihon (＝ Nile, called Βέσσων；LXX. (Jer. ii. 18) for Hebrew יונה) may be regarded as the re-appearance of an Asiatic river, or as flowing out of the same earth-embracing Οκεανός from which the Pison, Tigris, and Euphrates came. Gihon = Oxus is of course relieved from all such difficulty. It is replied to these arguments, (a) The language of Gen. xi. 2 only shows that after the flood men came from the East; and although the legends of other peoples identify the original home of man with the resting-place after the flood (see Lenormant, Arrat and Eden, Contemp. Rev., September, 1881), there is no evidence that the Hebrews did the same. Gen. iv. 16, however, says nothing of the location of Eden, but only of the land of Nod; and Gen. ii. 8 need not mean more than that Eden was eastward from the writer of the account, or from those for whom he wrote. The scientific word as to the cradle of man among the Hebrews is, so definite as to warrant the theory. (b) The assumption that the form of an Arayan tradition is a sure key to Semitic traditions is groundless. (c) Gold and gems are indeed found in India, but not only there. (d) Havilah was a land known to the Hebrews (see Cush); and, whether India was so or not, the Hebrews must have been aware that Havilah did not extend across Tigris and Euphrates, and off into the distant south-east. (e) The “river” of Gen. ii. 10, which “went forth from Eden,” can have nothing to do with Okeanos; and there is no proof that the notion of a river which disappeared in one continent, and reappeared in another, existed among the Hebrews. As to the identification of Gihon with Oxus: the Arabic Gaihūn is an appellative, and can be applied to any rushing river (e.g., Araxes, Gakhūn or Ras); and the Kossaia did not live east of the Caspian Sea, but, as is clear from the cuneiform inscriptions, in the mountain-region south-west from the Lake of Oromiah, and thence eastward toward the borders of Elam and Media.

II. THEORIES WHICH FIND EDEN IN ARME-NIA. — These take as the starting-point the known sources of the Tigris and Euphrates, and seek two other rivers rising in the same region. Thus, Pison = Phasis, Havilah = Colchis (or Pison = Kur, Cyrus); Gihon is identical with Caspian, and the Representatives of this class of views are Roland, Calmet, Leclerc, Keil, etc. But, if the Kossaia cannot be found on the eastern shore of the Caspian, neither can they on its western shore; and although some might be tempted to make use of the name of the country Kūsu, or Kusha, which appears on a Cappadocian tablet (Proceedings Soc. Bibl. Arch., November and December, 1881), still it is not easy to see how this could be connected with an Armenian river. The other proposed identifications are still more precarious. Further: by no possibility could these four rivers be supposed to be branches of one parent-stream. When it is claimed that nakar can mean “river-system,” this is not borne out by the usage of the language (see above); and the hypothesis (Luther and others) that the flood altered the physical features of Asia, so that the courses of streams are now different from the original courses, is unsupported by any thing in the biblical account of the flood, and is so far from being hinted at by the writer of Gen. ii. that he evidently expects, in his description, to be understood by his contemporaries as referring to a region still accessible to men, and recognizable by them.

III. THEORIES WHICH PLACE EDEN IN BABYLONIA. — Advocates of this location had their attention fixed by the fact that the Euphrates and the Tigris are actually united for a certain distance in the Satt el-Árab, which then empties into the Persian Gulf by two or more mouths. The Satt el-Árab was therefore regarded as the “river” of Gen. ii. 10; the Euphrates and Tigris were looked upon as its branches, reckoning up the stream; and the Pison and Gihon were identified with the two main streams through which the Satt el-Árab empties. Calvin, who held this view, considered the Pison to be the eastern arm, and the Gihon the western. Scaliger and others followed him; while Huet, Bochart, etc., found Pison in the western, Gihon in the eastern arm. A modification of Calvin's view is given by Pressel (Herzog's Real-Encykl., ed. I., vol. XX., art. Paradies), to the effect, that, instead of being these outlets of the Satt el-Árab, Pison and Gihon are two tributary streams flowing in from the east. This form of the theory is more consistent.
than the other, since it seeks all four branches in the same general direction,—up the stream; but the words of Gen. ii. oblige us to seek them all in the opposite direction,—down the stream. Only in the direction of its current could the river, on leaving the garden, divide into four branches. Against these theories it is further urged that we have ample grounds, from classical history and from the cuneiform inscriptions, as well as from the nature of the soil and from the present rate of physical change in that region, to believe that the sea once extended a hundred miles or more beyond its present limits to the north, thus covering the supposed site of Eden, and that the Euphrates and Tigris emptied into it without uniting (PRINCY: Nat. Hist., VI., § 31; RITTER: Erdkunde, X. 3; KIEPERT: Alte Geog., p. 138).

Another view has been proposed, and advocated with great force and skill. It finds Eden in Northern Babylonia, immediately about the site of Assur. (ARRIAX: Exp. Alex., VII. 7, contr. Xen. Anab., I. 7, 15). The effect was that of an extremely wide river flowing in almost countless channels. This is claimed to satisfy the requirements of Gen. ii. 10, and to be precisely the way in which an Oriental would conceive of irrigation,—the express object of the “river.” As the Euphrates and Tigris, which have thus formed in effect only the outside limits of this great irrigating stream, diverge more widely from each other, they resumed their independent course; and from the former there proceeded two important streams, partly natural, perhaps partly artificial, like the water-courses named above: the Satt en-Nil (= Gihon) on the east, and the Pallakopas (= Pison) on the west. The Satt en-Nil was known as an important navigable stream as late as when the Arabs overran Babylonia. It is always designated in the cuneiform inscriptions by its later name, in Assyrian pisinu, “water-holder,” “channel,” (as late as when the Arabs overran Babylonia. Whether the Beth-Eden of Amos i. 5 ("Ty'n'3, A.V., "house of Eden") is the same people, it is a matter of question. This is at any rate more likely than its identification with 'Ehdon on Lebanon, Beit Djeen at the foot of Hermon, or Dysseck et-Kalb, south-east from Laodicea, the Paradise of Ptolemies. The fact that it is named in connection with Damascus does not necessarily disprove its identity with the Mesopotamian Eden; for the intention of the prophet might be to extend his threatening to the Aramaic tribes generally.

At all events, the Hebrew pointing of "p" in these passages shows a correct apprehension that these Edens were distinct from the Eden ("Ty'n'3") of Genesis.

EDESSA, a city of Northern Mesopotamia (the Armenian Edesia, the Syrian Urho, the Arab er-Rohá, the present Orfa or Urša), is situated on the Daisun, a tributary to the Euphrates, old city. One tradition identifies it with Erech, but the connection with Damascus does not necessarily disprove its identity with the Mesopotamian Eden, for the intention of the prophet might be to extend his threatening to the Aramaic tribes generally.

EDICT, an order issued by a ruler, either of command or prohibition. It is applied in church history to the orders of the Roman emperors relating to Christianity. From Trajan to Constantine these edicts had instituted persecution. But Constantine issued three which forbade meddling with Christians on the part of the authorities. Several religious edicts of previous Roman emperors are extant; but, as they are altogether too favorable to Christianity, grave doubt is thrown upon their genuineness. The distinction between an edict and a rescript is that the latter is issued in answer to an inquiry. See Persecutions, and Keim, Rom und d. Christentum, Berlin, 1881.

(2) Edict is the technical name for a formal invitation given by presbyteries in Scotland to all who know any thing against the character of a pastor-elect to come forward and testify.

EDIFICATION, a New-Testament designation, comparing the Church and the Christian believer to a house or temple (1 Cor. iii. 9; Eph. ii. 21).

Christian character is an edifice built on Christ (Eph. ii. 20; Col. ii. 7), and enlarged by the Word (Acts xx. 32), Christian intercourse (1 Thess. v. 11), and all the other means of grace. The Holy Ghost himself dwells in the believer regarded as a temple (2 Cor. vi. 19); and the constant indwelling of God is, that it should be kept holy, and thus be a fit sanctuary of God (1 Cor. iii. 17).

(Esaú ("Ty'n'3"), the twin-brother of Jacob, was the son of Isaac and Rachel, and was so called because he was "hairy" (Gen. xxv. 25). He was subsequently named Edom ("Ty'n'3", "red"), because he said to Jacob, "Feed me with that same red," meaning lentils (xxv. 30). The traits of their ancestor re-appear in the Edomites; for, like Esau, they were wild hunters, and of low spiritual tone.)

The land of the Edomites was called Seir ("Ty'n'3", "rugged"). The original inhabitants were the Horites ("dwellers in caves"), or troglodytes. The Edomites, who dispossessed these, are sometimes called "children of Seir" (2 Chron. xxv. 11, 14). The country lay south of the Dead Sea, and west of the Arabah (Josh. xv. 1; Judg. v. 4); although in a wider sense the same name is given to a stretch to the east of the Arabah (Deut. ii. 1). And so the country was the "Mount of Edom" (Obad. 9, 19, 21). From the "Mount of Judah" it was separated by the wilderness of Zin (Josh. xv. 1). Bozrah (now Buseirah) was, at all events, at times, its capital (Isa. xxxiv. 7). Among its other cities were Sela (Petra), in a narrow wady off the Arabah (2 Kings xiv. 7; Isa. xvi. 1); Moab (now Ma'an) (Judg. x. 12); Elath, or Eloth, and Ezion-gaber, the important harbors at the northern end of the Red Sea (Deut. ii. 8; 2 Chron. viii. 17). The borders of the country varied, especially to the west and east, as their fortunes rose and fell.

The country is mountainous; but the soil in the glens and on the mountain-terracces bears a luxuriant growth of plant and vegetable life,

The People and their History. — There were kings in the land of Edom "before the "reigned any king over the children of Israel" (Gen. xxxvi. 31). The Edomites were brave warriors, and fond of the chase; but they also cultivated the soil, and carried on trade, especially from their great ports Elath and Ezion-geber. They, or at least the Temanites, one of their tribes, were famous for wisdom (Jer. xiii. 7; Obad. 8; cf. Eliphaz the Temanite, Job ii. 11). In religion they were polytheists, and probably Baal-worshippers.

Their history as given in the Bible begins with the victory of their King Hadad over Midian (Gen. xxxvi. 35). When the Israelites, on their way to the promised land, asked permission to go through Edom, they were refused (Num. xx. 11–17), and therefore they went around (xx. 21). The insult was all the greater because of Moses’ recognition of brotherhood in Edom. The ill feeling thus naturally produced increased; and, as soon as the Israelites were united under a king (Saul), they made war upon the Edomites, whom they now called ‘enemies,’ and under David brought them into subjection (1 Sam. xiv. 47; 1 Kings xi. 15 sqq.); in which condition they remained until the reign of Jehoram (2 Kings vii. 20–23), when they broke the yoke, and ‘made a king over themselves.’ Amaziah fifty years afterwards attempted to reconquer them, but was only partially successful (2 Kings xiv. 7; cf. 2 Chron. xxvii. 17). The later kings of Judah were too much engrossed by troubles with Assyria to undertake expeditions against Edom, and therefore the Edomites enjoyed independent government (Jer. xxvii. 3). The relations between the two kingdoms probably continued hostile: at all events the Edomites joined Nebuchadnezzar in the siege and pillage of Jerusalem, and therefore are cursed by the prophets (Ezek. xxxiv. 15; Amos i. 11, 12; Obad. 10). They also improved the opportunity to leave their territory, and go as far north as Hebron (1 Macc. v. 65); and therefore they went around (xx. 21). The People and their History. —

Some have inferred from Deut. vi. 8, 9, xxvii. 2–8, that a knowledge of reading and writing was common; but this is probably going too far. The priests, of course, could read and write; and thus there was always a large body of educated men. Educated laymen are also mentioned, such as the historians of the Judges and Kings, the surveyors of the promised land (Josh. xviii. 8, 9), and the diplomats, who conducted the business with foreign courts and peoples (2 Kings xviii. 20). That the mass of the people were illiterate was nothing particularly unfavorable to Judaism; for what ancient people, except possibly the Chinese, could show any different state of things? Popular education is, in our sense of the term, a very modern and Protestant phenomenon. It may be claimed for the ancient Hebrews that their sacred books and their profound religious mysteries and services gave them a mental training far superior to that of any contemporary nation.

From the mention of “sons of the prophets” (1 Kings xx. 35; 2 Kings ii. 3, 5), it has been inferred that certain young men were trained for the prophetic office in so-called “schools of the prophets,” at Naioth (1 Sam. xix. 18 — for this name is interpreted in the Targum “the house of learning”), Bethel, Jericho (2 Kings ii. 3, 5), and other places; but such training was ento a few, and, besides, was technical, con-velopments to understand their own sacred books. Contact with great nations like the Babylonian, the Greek, and the Roman, ever-grew the Hebrew mind. Other things than higher grade of intelligence in religious and educational matters characterized the national life. religion claimed attention. Jerusalem became the seat of a university, and in strange contrast precisely of heathen culture. In the towns and villages education was not carried so far. Reading and writing, the law, and the tenets of the Jewish faith, were probably the only topics studied the Bible, at ten the Mishna, and at fifteen the Talmud." A graphic description of the school in Nazareth in our Lord's day is given by an anonymous writer in these words: "The schoolroom is] "the interior of a squalid building rude and constructed of stone, with a domed roof, and whitewashed walls, a wooden desk or cupboard, on one side, and an inscription in Hebrew over the door. From the building, as we approach, comes the hum of many children's voices, repeating the verses of the sacred Torah [the law] in unthinking and perfunctory monotone.
The aged teacher sits silent in the midst. As we look in, we see his huge turban, his gray beard, and solemn features, appearing over the ruddy faces of the dark-eyed boys who sit on the floor around him. The long row of tiny red slippers extends along the wall near the door.
The earthen water-bottle stands on the mat beside the Khazzan, or synagagogue teacher.
The scholars are the children of the richer members of the village community; of the Betlanim, or ' men of leisure,' who form the representative congregation at every synagogue service; or of the poor, who go about with the village priest for a week in Jerusalem, to fulfill similar functions in the temple ritual" (Rabbi Jeshua, Lond. and N.Y., 1881, pp. 23, 24).
Thus, even then, education was limited, and there was much ignorance; so that the phrase "country people" was synonymous with the "illiterate." Of these the contemptuous remark was made by the Sanhedrin, "This multitude which knoweth not the law are accursed" (John vii. 49). Very probably this ignorance was principally among the lowest class, the linear descendants of the primitive settlers of Palestine, whose children are the wretched fellahin of today. According to Philo (On the Virtuous being also Free, Bohn's trans., vol. iii. 500) Josephus (Contra Apion, i. 12), and the Talmud, the pious Jews took great pains with their children's education. "Jerusalem was destroyed because the education of children was neglected." "The world is preserved by the breath of the children in the schools." So said the rabbins. The later Jews were taught a trade in their schools, and thus could earn their own living. That Saul of Tarsus, the learned pupil of the great rabbin Gamahel, had a trade (tent-making) was quite in the order of "as Acts xviii. 3). The most cele-bated does for the law supported themselves.
- Unmarried. "If women were forbidden to teach boys." The Essenes are honorably mentioned for their care of children.
Female education was of very limited extent among the Hebrews, as among all Oriental peoples; but more advantage was open to Hebrew mothers than to those of other lands. They were taught the law (for they were expected to join their husbands in educating their children) and also woman's proper work. The Hebrew ideal wife (Prov. xxxi. 10–31) was a woman of superior training; destitute though she might be of booklearning. To be a model wife and mother was set before the Hebrew maiden as a loftier object of womanly ambition than a so-called "higher education." Yet a few women acquired learning.
After the destruction of Jerusalem the Jewish rabbis set up high schools in other places.
Two of these achieved great fame (Tiberias and Babylon); for they furnished respectively the Jerusalem and the Babylonian Talmud (i.e., the Gemara portion), in which they poured forth a stream of varied learning unparalleled in history.
"The Talmud is an encyclopedia of all the sciences of that time, and shows that in many departments of science these Jewish teachers have anticipated modern discoveries." See the EDUCATION, Ministerial. — Organizations and Measures for aiding in. — From the earliest ages it has been the policy of the Christian Church to aid in the education of worthy but indigent students who had consecrated themselves to the gospel ministry. Calvin, in his Institutes, Book IV.

chap. 4, § 9, speaking of the pattern set for us in this particular by the primitive fathers, says,
"For to form a seminary which shall provide the church with future ministers, those holy men took under their charge, protection, and discipline such youths as, with the consent and sacration of their parents, enlisted themselves in the spiritual warfare. And so they educated themselves from an early age, that they might not enter on the discharge of their office ignorant and unprepared." And this custom was kept up through the middle ages by the monastic schools, which were liberally endowed for this purpose by pious souls, and it is still maintained everywhere by the Roman Church. Her priests are to this day all and altogether educated at the church's expense. The Protestant churches have been no less wisely liberal in their provisions for the supply of their pulpits. Neither by those of the Lutheran or Reformed name was poverty allowed to bar any worthy young man from the privilege of qualifying himself for the Christian ministry:
aid was furnished him, sometimes by scholarships attached to the schools, and sometimes by contributions taken up directly for this purpose by the congregations, and sometimes by private mu-church may be furnished with a sufficient number of ministers and on vacant congregations, as well as by voluntary annual subscription." These and other initiatory measures culminated in the organization of a "board of education" by the General Assembly in 1819. This board, with various modifications of rules and measures, has continued until this time. At present (1881) the maximum appropriation for a student, when the funds allow it, is a hundred and fifty dollars per annum.

There is also a board of education in Presbyterian churches (South), conducted on the same principles.

In the Episcopal Church the education work is left to the several dioceses, some of which have small societies collecting each a few hundred dollars per year. It has, besides, two general societies representing the two prominent schools of thought in the Church; viz., the Society for the Increase of the Ministry (organized 1857, and having its office in New York, mainly High Church in its tendencies, which has helped to ordinate five hundred young men), and the Evange-colic Education Society (organized 1862, and having its office in Philadelphia, which has contributed two hundred and fifty men to the ministry). It acts upon a liberal policy, and grants stipends according to the needs of the student, even to the amount of three hundred dollars per annum.

must add, that it is to the wise and liberal policy thus pursued the fact is largely due that the magazine Of Protestant Christianity throughout the world has attained its present high repute, not only for sound moral and religious character, but also for broad intelligence and extensive learning.

D. W. POOR.

EDWARDS, Bela Bates, D.D., was b. in Southampton, Mass., July 4, 1802; graduated at Amherst College in 1824, at Andover Theological Seminary in 1830. In the two years 1826-28 he was a tutor in Amherst College, and in the five years 1828-33 he was assistant secretary of the American Education Society. In 1837 he was ordained as a minister of the gospel, and was also appointed professor of the Hebrew language in Andover Theological Seminary. Professor Moses Stuart having resigned his office in 1848, Professor Edwards was elected as his successor. In this professorship he explained the Hebrew and Greek grammars with great acuteness and success. He was an enthusiast in sacred philology. He injured his constitution by his unremitting toil. In 1846, in consequence of enfeebled health, he made an extended tour in Europe, visiting England, France, Germany, and Italy. In 1851 he again compelled himself from Andover, and spent the winter in the South. He died at Athens, Ga., April 20, 1852 when he was nearly fifty years of age. He was distinguished not only as a skilful instructor, but also as a wise counsellor. He united soundness of judgment with rare delicacy of taste and poetic sensibility. Without grace of elocution, he was an eloquent preacher. The tenderness of his sensibilities, and the earnestness of his piety, were indicated in his countenance and tones of voice, as well as in his pure and classical language. He originated and planned many philanthropic institutions, among others, that has resulted in his countenance and tones of voice, as well as in his pure and classicallanguage. He was "a zealous Calvinist, and a most voluminous writer." His principal works were, Discourse concerning the authority, stile and perfection of the books of the Old and New Testament, London, 1693, 3 vols.; A complete history, or survey, of all the dispensations and methods of religion from the beginning of the world to the consummation of all things, as represented in the Old and New Testament, London, 1699, 2 vols.; The preacher, London, 1705-1709, 3 vols.: Theologia reformata, London, 1719-28, 3 vols. folio.

EDWARDS, Jonathan, the Elder. The ancestors of Jonathan Edwards in this country were notable men. His great-grandfather, William, and his grandfather, Richard, were among the pillars of society in Hartford, Conn. His father, Rev. Timothy Edwards, was born at Hartford, in May, 1699, graduated with distinguished honor at Harvard College in 1714, ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in "Windsor Farms," now East Windsor, Conn., in 1719. He remained pastor of this church more than sixty-three years, and died Jan. 27, 1758, at the age of eighty-eight.

There was a marked resemblance between the sermons of the father and those of his son. — The mother of Jonathan Edwards was Esther Stoddard, daughter of the noted "father in Israel," Solomon Stoddard, who for more than fifty-six years (1672-1739) was pastor of the Congregational Church in Northampton, Mass. She was a woman of queenly presence and admirable character. She was born in 1672, married in 1694, became the mother of eleven children, and died in 1770, in the ninety-ninth year of her age. Ten of her eleven children were daughters; Jonathan being the only brother in a nest of sisters, four of whom were elder, and six younger, than himself. He was born in East Windsor, Conn., Oct. 5, 1703. In his early years he was instructed, partly at the public school, chiefly by his parents and sisters, at home. His father being an excellent classical scholar, his mother being uncommonly intelligent and refined, his elder sisters being well trained in Latin and Greek, were the best instructors he could have had. He began the study of Latin when he was only six years old. Before he was thirteen, he had acquired a good knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. In his childhood he was taught to think with his pen in hand, — thus to think definitely, in order that he might express his thought clearly. When he was about nine years old he wrote an interesting letter on Materialism, and when he was about twelve he wrote some remarkable papers on questions in natural philosophy. One month before he was thirteen years of age, he entered Yale College. There he spent four years, and was graduated with the highest honor in his class, in 1720. At the age of fourteen, one of his college studies was Locke on the Human Understanding. "Taking that book into his hand upon some occasion, not long before his death, he said to some of his select friends who were then with him, that he was beyond expression entertained and pleased with it when he read it in his youth at college; that he was so much engaged, and had more satisfaction and pleasure, in studying it, than the most greedy miser in gathering up handfuls of silver and gold from some new-discovered treasure." As a child, his sensibilities were often aroused by the truths of religion. He united himself to the church, probably at East Windsor, about the time of his graduation at college. After his graduation he spent nearly two years as a resident scholar in New Haven: then and there he pursued his theological studies. He was "approved" as a preacher in June or July, 1722, several months before he was nineteen years of age. From August, 1722, until April, 1723, he preached to a small Presbyterian Church in New-York city. Here he penned the first thirty-four of his well-known Resolutions, and some exquisitely poetical descriptions of the spiritual life. His eloquence in the pulpit moved his hearers deeply. They desired him to become their pastor, but he felt impelled to labor elsewhere. In September, 1723, he was appointed a tutor in Yale College. He devoted himself to severe study in the winter and spring of 1723–24, and entered on his tutorship in June, 1724. In this office he remained about two years.

On the 15th of February, 1727, when in his twenty-fourth year, he was ordained as pastor of the Congregational Church at Northampton. On the 27th of the next July he was married to Sarah Pierrepont, daughter of Rev. James Pierrepont, "an eminent, pious, and useful minister at New Haven," one of the fathers and trustees of Yale College. At the time of her marriage she was in the eighteenth year of her age, was distinguished by her graceful and expressive features, her vigorous mind, fine culture, and fervent piety. The description which Mr. Edwards gave of her in her girlhood was regarded by Dr. Chalmers as a model of fine writing. During her married life she relieved her husband of many burdens which are commonly laid upon a parish minister, and thus enabled him to pursue his studies with comparative freedom. Often he spoke extempore, oftener from brief but suggestive notes. The traditions relating to their power and influence appear well-nigh fabulous.

In 1734–35 there occurred in his parish a "great awakening" of religious feeling; in 1740–41 occurred another, which extended through a large part of New England. At this time he became specially intimate with George Whitefield. During these exciting scenes, Mr. Edwards manifested the rare comprehensiveness of his mind. He did not favor the extravagances attending the new measures of the revivalists; but he felt compelled to advocate the principle out of which those extravagances needlessly sprang. He did more, perhaps, than any other American divine in promoting the doctrinal purity, and at the same time quickening the zeal, of the churches; in restraining them from fanaticism, and at the same time stimulating them to a healthy enthusiasm. His writings were in his own day, and are in our day, a kind of classic authority for discriminating between the warmth of sound health and the heat of a fever. He did not remain stationary, like the centre of a circle: he moved in an orbit not eccentric, but well-rounded and complete.

As early as 1744 he preached with great vehemence against certain demoralizing practices in which some of his parishioners indulged. He offended several influential families by his method of opposing those practices. In process of time he became convinced that his grandfather, Mr. Stoddard, was wrong in permitting unconverted persons to partake of the Lord's Supper. He followed his convictions: he made the sacrifice of himself. He feared, that, in resisting the authority of Mr. Stoddard, he would make a sacrifice of himself. He followed his convictions: he made the sacrifice. After a prolonged and earnest controversy, he was ejected from the pastorate which he had adorned for more than twenty-three years.

In August, 1751, about a year after his dismissal from Northampton, Edwards was installed pastor of the small Congregational Church in Stockbridge, Mass., and missionary of the Housatonic tribe of Indians at that place. Here he was in the wilderness. He was sadly afflicted with the fever and ague and other disorders incident to the new settlement. His labors were interrupted by the French and Indian War. He persevered, however, with marked fidelity in his mission. He preached to the Indians through an interpreter. He gained their admiration and their love.

While living in a kind of exile, among the Indians at Stockbridge, he was invited to the presidency of the college at Princeton, N.J. He was elected to the office on the 26th of September, 1757. He hesitated to accept it, but finally yielded to the advice of others, and was dismissed from his Stockbridge pastorate, Jan. 4, 1758, after having labored in it six years and a half. He spent a part of January and all of February at Princeton, performing some duties at the college, but was not inaugurated until the 16th of February. In 1758, when his congregation was worried by the small-pox, he was inoculated for the small-pox. After the ordinary effects of the inoculation had nearly subsided, a secondary fever supervened, and he died on the 22d of March, 1758. He had then resided at Princeton about nine weeks, and had been the inaugurated president of the college just five weeks. His age was fifty-four years, five months, and seventeen days. His aged father died only two months before him. His son-in-law, President Burr, died in his forty-second year, only six months before him. His daughter, Mrs.
President Burr (the mother of Vice-President Burr), died in her twenty-seventh year, only sixteen days after him. His wife died in her forty-ninth year, only six months and ten days after him.

While the pastor at Northampton, President Edwards published the following works: God glorified in Man's Dependence, 1731; A Divine and Supernatural Light Imparted to the Soul by the Spirit of God, 1734 (a sermon noted for its spiritual philosophy; the hearers of it at Northampton requested it for the press); Curse ye Meroz, 1735;
A Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God in the Conversion of many Hundred Souls in Northampton, etc., London, 1736; Five Discourses pretached to the People of Northampton, 1737; Remarks ixed to the American Edition of this Narrative, 1738; Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God, 1741
(one of his most terrific sermons; frequently republished; severely criticised without regard to the character and condition of the persons to whom it was preached); Sorrow of the Bereaved spread before Jesus, 1741; Distinguishing Marks of the True Spirit, 1741; Thoughts on the Revival in New England, etc., 1742; The Watch-man's Duty and Account, 1743; The True Excellency of a Gospel Minister, 1744; A Treatise concerning Religious Affections, 1746 (one of his most spiritual and analytical works; "it will no doubt always be considered as one of the most important guards against a spurious religion"); An Humble Attempt to promote Explicit Agreement and Visible
Union among God's People in Extraordinary Prayer, 1748; Of Things Concerning the Soul of Man, 1750.

After he had left his first pastorate, more important works were published; some of them not until after his death: "Misrepresentations Corrected, and Truth Vindicated, in a Reply to Mr. Solomon Williams's Book on Qualifications for Communion, to which is added a Letter from Mr.
Edwards to his Late Flock at Northampton, 1752; True Grace distinguished from the Experience of Devils, 1752; An Essay on the Freedom of the Will, 1754 (Dr. Chalmers said that he recommended to his pupils this Treatise on the Will "more strenuously" than any other "book of human composition"); and he added, it was "read by me forty-seven years ago, with a conviction that has never since faltered, and which has helped me, more than any other uninspired book, to find my way through all that might otherwise have proved baffling and transcendental and mysterious in the peculiarities of Calvinism"); The Great Christian Doctrine of Original Sin defended, etc., 1758; Eighteen Sermons annexed to Dr. Samuel Hopkins's Memoir of Edwards, 1764; History of Redemption, 1772; Dissertation concerning the End for which God created the World, and Dissertation concerning the End of True Virtue, 1788; Two New Volumes of Sermons, 1780 and 1783; Miscellaneous
Observations on Important Theological Subjects, 1793; Remarks on Important Theological Contro-ersies, 1796; Types of the Messiah, 1829; Notes on the Bible, 1829; Charity and its Fruits, 1851 (edited by Rev. Dr. Tryon Edwards, and republished in 1872 under the title of Christian Love as Manifested in the Heart and Life); Selections from the unpublished writings of Jonathan Edwards, 1865 (edited by Rev. Alexander D. Grosart. See Biblio-

The published works of Edwards were collected, and printed in eight volumes, at Worcester, Mass., under the editorship of Dr. Samuel Austin, in 1809. A larger edition of his writings, in ten volumes, including a new Memoir and much new material, was published at New York, in 1829, under the editorial care of Rev. Dr. Sereno Eddwards Dwight. Some of Edwards's writings were originally published, and many of them have been republished, in Great Britain. They have been collected in an English edition, and The edition more commonly used in the United States at the present time is entitled The Works of President Edwards, in four volumes; a Reprint of the Worcester Edition, with Valuable Additions, and a Copious Index, New York.

The works of Edwards have received the highest encomiums from Dr. John Erskine, Dugald Stewart, Sir Henry Moncrief, Dr. Priestley, Dr.
George Hill, Isaac Taylor, and other British scholars. Robert Hall says, "I consider Jonathan Edwards the greatest of the sons of men. He ranks with the brightest luminaries of the Christian Church, not excluding any country or any age, since the apostolic." Sir James Mackintosh says of Edwards, "This remarkable man, the philosopher and metaphysician of America... His power of subtle argument, perhaps unmatched, certainly unsurpassed, among men, was joined, as in some of the ancient mystics, with a character which raised his piety to fervor." Robert Morehead says, "Eddwards comes nearer Bishop Butler as a philosopical divine than any other theologian with whom we are acquainted."
the Indian. By these means I acquired the knowledge of that language, and a great facility in speaking it. It became more familiar to me than my mother tongue, and I knew the names of some things in Indian that I did not know in English. Even all my thoughts ran in Indian; and, though the true pronunciation of the language is extremely difficult to all but themselves, they acknowledged that I had acquired it perfectly, which, as they said, had never been done before by any Anglo-American. On account of my skill in their language in general, I received from them many compliments applauding my superior wisdom. This skill in their language I have in a good measure retained to this day.51

The elder Edwards, being himself a missionary to the Indians, intended that his son should be one also, and therefore sent him, in October, 1755, to a settlement of the Oneida Indians, on the banks of the Susquehanna, in order that he might learn their language. At this time the boy was not eleven years old. He was accompanied by his father's friend, Rev. Gideon Hawley, who, having made a close acquaintance of Mr. Hawley, the noted missionary to the Oneidas. The boy endeared himself to the Oneida tribe; and on one occasion, when they expected an attack from the French, the Indians took him upon their shoulders, and bore him many miles through the wilderness to a place of safety. The settlement of the Oneidas was about one hundred miles distant from any English settlement; but young Edwards exhibited a rare degree of courage, fortitude, and perseverance. He uttered no complaint, when, in the depth of winter, he was compelled to sleep on the ground in the open air. He returned to Stockbridge in 1756, and resided there until January, 1758, when his father removed to Princeton. In less than ten weeks after that removal the father died, and in less than seven months after the father's death the mother died; and thus in his fourteenth year young Edwards was left an orphan. He entered the grammar-school at Princeton in February, 1760; was admitted to Princeton College in September, 1761, and was graduated there in September, 1765. He became a member of the church in 1763, studied theology with Dr. Joseph Bellamy in 1765–66, and was "approved" as a preacher, in October, 1766, by the Litchfield County Association in Connecticut. In his early childhood he had been afflicted with an ocular disease, and therefore did not learn to read at so early an age as his instincts prompted. His father's ecclesiastical troubles deprived him of certain facilities for his education; but his native power triumphed over all discouragements. He was indefatigably diligent while at college; was appointed a tutor there in 1767, remained in that office two years, and received an appointment (which, however, he declined) to a professorship of languages and logic in the college. On the 5th of January, 1769, he was ordained as pastor of an important church in New Haven, Conn. He remained in this office more than twenty-six years. Several members of his church were advocates of the "Half-way Covenant," he opposed it. His pastorate was also disturbed by the spiritual re-action which had followed the "great awakening" in 1740–42, and by the demoralizing influences of the Revolutionary War. The result was his dismissal from his pastorate on the 19th of May, 1799.

In January, 1799, he was installed pastor of the church in Colebrook, Conn. Here he desired and intended to pass the residue of his life. His parishioners were intelligent, affectionate, and confiding. They gave him leisure to pursue his theological and philosophical inquiries. In May, 1799, however, he was elected president of Union College, Schenectady, N.Y. As he had declined a professorship at Princeton, so he was prompted to decline the presidency of Union College. He applied to an ecclesiastical council for advice; the advice was in favor of his removal. He was therefore dismissed in June, and entered on the duties of his presidency in July, 1799. He discharged his duties with his accustomed fidelity. His reputation as a philosopher gave him an uncommon influence over his pupils, and his skill as a teacher heightened his reputation as a philosopher. He remained in this office, however, but a short time. About the middle of July, 1801, he was attacked by an intermittent fever, and on the 1st of August, 1801, he died. A sermon was preached at Schenectady, on occasion of his death, by his friend Rev. Robert Smith of Savannah; another sermon was preached at New Haven by President Timothy Dwight.

The college at Princeton conferred on Mr. Edwards the degree of D.D.: hence he is usually styled "Dr." Edwards, in distinction from his father, who is styled "President" Edwards. As a theological teacher Dr. Edwards was eminently successful. He was powerful in his conversation with his pupils, a prince among disputants. Several of his scholars in theology rose to eminence. One of them was his nephew, Timothy Dwight, President of Yale College; another was Dr. Edward Dorr Griffin, President of Williams College; still another was Dr. Samuel Austin, President at Burlington College. Each of these presidents bore hearty testimony to his faithfulness and skill as a teacher. Among his other pupils were Dr. Samuel Nott and Dr. Jedediah Morse.

One great work of Dr. Edwards's life was his editorship of his father's writings. He was an early and confidential friend of Dr. Joseph Bellamy and Dr. Samuel Hopkins. From them, especially from the latter, he obtained many nice discriminations in regard to the President's theories. He studied the President's writings with great assiduity. He prepared for the press the President's History of the Work of Redemption, or his Miscellaneous Observations on Important Theological Subjects, his Remarks on Important Theological Controversies, and two volumes of Sermons. After careful study of his father's doctrinal system, as that system was modified by Hopkins, Bellamy, Smalley, and others, Dr. Edwards wrote a noted paper on the Improvements in Theology made by President Edwards and those who have followed his Course of Thought. It is in his published works that the influence of Dr. Edwards has been most conspicuous. While he was at Coblebrook he published, in 1797, A Dissertation concerning Liberty and Necessity, in Reply to the Rev. Dr. Samuel Perhaps this volume is the fairest exponent yet given of President Edwards's theory of the will.

Dr. Edwards published a large number of articles in The New York Theological Magazine over the signatures "I" and "O." He also published many sermons: one in 1783, at the ordination of Rev. Timothy Dwight, at Greenfield, Conn.; one in 1791, on the Injustice and Impolicy of the Slave-trade (Dr. Edwards, like his friend Hopkins, was an early opponent of the slave system); one in 1791, on Human Depravity; one in 1792, at the ordination of Rev. Dan Bradley, at Hamden; one in 1792, at the ordination of Rev. William Brown at Glastenbury; one in 1792 (Concio ad Clerum), preached in the chapel of Yale College, on the Marriage of a Deceased Wife's Sister; one in 1793, on the Death of Roger before his Excellency the Governor, and a large request. "They have been frequently republished. It exhibits a singular acuteness of mind, a depth of penetration, a rare precision of thought and style. In 1788 he published a paper which established his fame and prefixed to them a Memoir.

Nearly all of Dr. Edwards's published writings were collected and reprinted in two octavo volumes, each of above five hundred pages, in 1812. Rev. Tryon Edwards, D.D., edited them, and prefixed to them a Memoir.

Dissimilar as the two Edwardses were in some, they were similar to each other in many, respects.

Dr. Samuel Miller of Princeton says, "The son greatly resembled his venerable father in metaphysical acuteness, in ardent piety, and in the purest exemplariness of Christian deportment."

The son, like the father, was a tutor in the college where he had been a student; was first ordained over a prominent church in the town where his maternal grandfather had been the pastor; was dismissed on account of his doctrinal opinions; was afterwards the minister of a retired parish; was then president of a college; and died at the age of about fifty-five years, so soon after his inaugural services, and prefixed to the Connecticut Society, during their sessions at New Haven, in October, 1785, and published by request." tery of Rathmelsigi, and made, when smitten by the plague (644), the vow, that, if he recovered, he would go to foreign countries to preach the gospel to the Pagans. He recovered, and immediate steps were taken. Oliver, the master of the school, was by step-by-step argument compelled to return, and settled in the monastery of Hy. Thence he sent out Wicbert and twelve others missionaries to Friesland, and contributed much to stimulate the missionary zeal of the Scoeto-Irish Church. In Hy he persuaded the monks to adopt the Roman calculation of Easter and the Roman tonsure. See Beda: Hist. Ecc. Angl., III. 27, V. 10, 11, 23.

EGBERT, or EGBERT, Archbishop of York, a pupil and friend of Bede, was first teacher in the cathedral school of York, and brought it into a flourishing condition by his talent and learning. Among his pupils were Alcuin and Albert. In 731 he was made Bishop of York; and in 735 York was made an archiepiscopal see, with metropolitan authority over all bishoprics north of the Humber. He continued, however, his activity as teacher in the school till his death, 776. He was appointed librarian by the library he founded, and also his successor as teacher. He left a collection of canonical prescriptions: De jure sacerdotali, of which, however, only fragments are still extant; Dialogue de ecclesiasticis institutionis; De remediis peccatorum, probably an extract from the first-mentioned work made by another hand, all to be found in Mansi, XII.

The penitentials ascribed to him are not by him.

EGEDE, Hans, the apostle of the Greenlanders, b. at Senjen, in the northern part of Norway, Jan. 31, 1693; d. at Stubbekøbing in the Danish island of Falster, Nov. 5, 1758; studied theology in the University of Copenhagen, and was appointed pastor of Waagen, one of the Lofoten Islands, 1707. In the same year he married Gertrude Rask. From his brother-in-law, a whaler from Bergen, he heard that the south-western part of Greenland was inhabited by heathen savages; and the reading of old Norwegian chronicles made him believe that these heathen savages were descendants of former Norwegian colonists. Greenland was, indeed, discovered by Pagan Norsemen from Iceland in the tenth century; and in 1352, the natives having been pushed towards the interior, a flourishing colony was founded on the south-western coast. Under Olaf the Saint, about 1000, Christianity was introduced in the native tongue. But in 1727 the trading company of Bergen dissolved; in 1730 Frederik IV. died; and in 1731 Egede received notice that the royal support would be withdrawn, and that all Europeans should return home immediately, or remain on their own risk. Egede hesitated; but when the Greenlanders themselves implored him to stay, and his wife consented, he remained. The new king, however (Christian VI.), belonged to the Pietists, and when Count Zinzendorf came to Copenhagen he easily induced the king to renew the support: only it was for the future to be divided with another mission, sent out by the Moravian Brethren; and with this mission Egede could not work in harmony. But the troubles thus arising were soon forgotten for that horrible calamity which befell the country in 1735. A Greenland lad returning from Copenhagen brought the small-pox with him; and in the course of a few months more than three thousand people died. The misery was unspeakable. The settlements were transformed to graveyards. Egede's wife died. He himself held out heroically as long as the hardships demanded his exertions; but when all was over he felt himself a broken man. July 30, 1736, he preached his farewell sermon, intrusted the work to his son Paul, and returned to Copenhagen. In Denmark the Greenland mission had in the mean time awakened much interest. A seminary for the education of fit laborers was established, and Egede was made its director. In 1747, however, he had to leave Steenstrup; but he continued to labor for his life-work till
EGINHARD. 703

EGYPT. Ancient. NAME. — The name Ayut or Ayut-A for Ayut-A or Ayut-A is used by Homer both of the country and of the river which has formed the country, the Nile. Some have derived it from a Semitic root, gaph; others, from a Sanscrit, agupta: but as it occurs only among the Greeks, and peoples connected with the Greeks, its Greek origin seems certain, though no root has been found for it in the Greek language. The native name was Kene, represented hieroglyphically with the ideographic character of the crocodile-tail. It means "black" both in the hieroglyphic inscriptions and in the Coptic language. Egypt was thus called "the black country." It is not on account of the color of the skin of its inhabitants, for that was red and not black, but on account of the color of its soil; the floods of the Nile covering the bottom of the valley with a black mud, and thereby distinguishing the fertile fields from the surrounding deserts. Herodotus noticed that the soil of Egypt resembles neither that of Arabia nor that of Libya, but is black from the mud which the river carries down with it from Ethiopia. The native name has often been brought into connection with the Hebrew name Ham, the name of one of the sons of Noah, the progenitor of the Hamites. But the Hebrew root ham means "hot," and not "black;" though the Hebrew Ham, like the Greek Athiopis, was used as a general designation of the hot southern countries. The common Hebrew designation of Egypt was Masér, or more frequently the dual form Mitsrayim, from Matsar, to enclose. This was borrowed from the cuneiform inscriptionsshowing the two peoples. The cuneiform inscriptions show that Mesr or Masr was generally used in Asia as name for the Nile. In our days, Cairo is called by the Arabs El Masr. The dual form referred to the division of the country, Upper and Lower Egypt being not simply geographical or political, but historical, manifesting itself in the language, customs, and worship of the two peoples. The cuneiform inscriptions show that Masr was generally used in Asia as name for Egypt.

Country. — Egypt, in the narrower sense of the word, comprises only the Valley of the Nile from the first cataract to the Mediterranean, between 24° 30' and 31° 30' N. Lat. So far as the river runs along undivided, the average breadth of the valley is only about six miles, though occasionally it widens to about sixteen miles; but at 30° N. Lat. both the walls enclosing the valley retreat to the east and to the west, and the river divides into several arms, and forms the low fertile plain of the Delta. Surrounded on the north by the sea, and on all other sides by immense deserts, the long narrow strip of fertile and inhabited country forms an oasis, whose perfectly secluded position has exercised a decisive influence on the his death. His son, Paul Egede, remained in Greenland till 1740, wrote a Greenland grammar and dictionary, and translated the New Testament into Greenland. The Greenland mission was afterwards never abandoned by the Danish Government; and, though the zeal slackened somewhat during the rationalistic period (1790–1820), the Christian Church in Greenland is at present in a flourishing condition. There are no more heathen in the country. Somewhat during the rationalistic period (1790–1820), the Christian Church in Greenland is at present in a flourishing condition. EGINHARD, or EINHARD, b. in Francia, about 770; d. at Seligenstadt, March 14, 844; was educated at the court of Charlemagne, a pupil of Alcuin; acted first as secretary to the emperor, and superintendent of public buildings at Aix-la-Chapelle, then as tutor to the children of Louis le Debonnaire, and retired finally to the monastery which he had founded at Seligenstadt, near Mühlheim, on the Rhine. He wrote a life of Charlemagne, which is invaluable for the general history of the age, and of great interest also to church history. He left seventy-one letters, and a minor essay, De adoranda cruce, which now is lost. His works have been edited by Teulet, Paris, 1840–43, and by Jaffé, in Monumenta Carolina, Berlin, 1867.

EGLINUS, Raphael (Latin Iconius), b. at Rieseckon, in the canton of Zürich, Dec. 28, 1559; d. at Marburg, Aug. 20, 1622; studied at Zürich, Geneva, and Basel; settled as a teacher at Sons, in the Veltlin, in Lombardy, but was compelled, like all other Protestants, to leave the place in 1588; was made professor of the New Testament in 1592; and was called to Marburg in 1606 as professor of theology. He was an enthusiastic student of alchemy; and it was his reputed proficiency in that art which procured for him the call to Marburg. In other respects, too, he was inclined to a fanciful mysticism. He wrote, in defence of the Rosicrucians, Assertio fraternitatis R. C., 1618, and also Meervunderliche Prophesiezeitung, etc., 1611, in which, from the peculiar appearance of a herring caught in Norway in 1598, he believed himself able to discover the secrets of the future. He is of interest in church history, however, on account of the influence he exercised on the Hessian theologians: gradually bringing them over from the standpoint of Melanchthon to that of Calvin. His two principal theological works are, besides a number of disputations, theses, etc., Diezudos theologischereselsaerches, in St. Augustin’s manner, 1611, and Disput. theolog. de fideer gratiae. A list of his works is found in Stiredder: Hess. Gelehrten-Geschichte, III, pp. 301–318. EEPF.

EGILON (calf, edible). I. A king of the Moabites who made an alliance with the Ammonites and Amalekites, subjugated Israel, and kept them in bondage for eighteen years (Judg. iii. 14). He resided at Jericho, and was assassinated there by Ehud.

II. An Amorite town conquered by Joshua, and allotted to Judah (Josh. x. 3–5, xv. 39). Ruins of it were found ten miles north-east of Gaza, covering a hill, now called Ajlon, and situated among cornfields and tobacco-plantations.
towards the close of March the harvest begins, the highlands between 19 and 16° N. Lat. Waters are let in over the fields. At the end of the second month the dams are cut in Upper Egypt. Water rises during three months: at the end of June, and the Delta at the end of June. The river decreasing all the while until June, when a flood reaches the first cataract in the middle of June, when new rotation begins. Egypt has thus only three seasons, each of four months— the water-season, June—September; the gardening season, October—January; and the harvest-season, February—to May. Egypt was in antiquity famous for its great fertility. It was the granary of all neighboring countries. Abraham and the sons of Jacob were attracted thither by its richness in grain (Gen. xii. 10, xiii. 1, xiii. 2). But, besides corn, also other kinds of food abounded. The children of Israel longed for the flesh-pots of Egypt (Exod. xvi. 3), and for its fish, cucumbers, melons, leeks, onions, and garlic (Num. xi. 5). Pictorial representations on its monuments bear witness to its richness in cattle, sheep, goats, swine, game, wine, figs, fruits, and vegetables of all kinds. In a tomb near the Pyramids of Memphis 835 cows, 220 calves, 760 asses, 974 sheep, and 2,235 goats are enumerated as belonging to the interred person. Among the plants growing in the country the papyrus and the lotus were especially noticeable: the former, however, is not found any more in Egypt. The date-palm, on the other hand, which now is of the greatest importance to the country, occurs very seldom, either in the hieroglyphic inscriptions, or in the pictorial representations on the monuments, and the camel not at all. The camel cannot have been entirely unknown to the ancient Egyptians, as it was much used by all neighboring peoples, especially in Palestine, for mercantile expeditions to Egypt (Gen. xxiv. 10, xxx. 43, xxxvii. 27). Tharaq even presented camels to Abraham (Gen. xii. 10). The horse seems to have been a couple of horses. Under the kings of the nineteenth dynasty great numbers of horses were used, though only to draw the chariots: the Old Testament, however, speaks also of cavalry (Gen. l. 9; Exod. xiv. 8, 29). The animal generally used for riding was the ass, which was kept in great numbers. Wild asses are still found in great herds in the highlands of Nubia. The Leviathan of Job xli. 1 is the crocodile: the Belemoth of Job xli. 15 is the rhinoceros. The country was also rich in minerals and in building-stones. Through the larger part of the country both the walls of the valley consist of limestone of a fine and firm quality. Beyond Thebes, in the neighborhood of El Cab, the sandstone begins, of which there are famous quarries at Sisileh. Granite and sienite of beautiful coloring occur in the cataract, caused by long protracted rains regularly occurring in the tropical highlands between 15° and 16° N. Lat. The flood reaches the first cataract in the middle of June, and the Delta at the end of June. The water rises during three months: at the end of the second month the dams are cut in Upper Egypt, a month later in Lower Egypt, and the waters are let in over the fields. At the end of September the waters retreat; in the course of October the ground becomes dry, and is sown; towards the close of March the harvest begins, the river decreasing all the while until June, when a new rotation begins. Egypt has thus only three seasons, each of four months— the water-season, June—September; the gardening season, October—January; and the harvest-season, February—May. History. — The fertility of the soil, the ease of life under a sky always gay, and in a warm, healthy climate, and especially the seclusion of the geographical position of the country, preventing all interference by unruly neighbors, were the natural advantages which made the Egyptians the first people on earth having a history. The historical sense, once awakened, found in the country excellent and abundant materials for its gratification by erecting monuments; and in this respect the Egyptians have preceded and surpassed all other peoples. After further development, a want arose for correct annalistic reports of events. All the neighboring countries, including the monuments even of the first historical epoch, the old empire, give ample evidence of the knowledge of astronomical periods based upon long and accurate observation of the stars. What we know chronologically of the first Egyptian...
Empire, before the invasion of the Hyksos, we owe to the work of Manetho (supreme pontiff at Heliopolis), which he wrote in Greek on the command of Ptolemy Philadelphus, drawing his materials from the annals and chronicles of the temple archives. Extracts of this work have come down to us through Josephus, Africanus, and Eusebius; and the historical character of the statement that there ruled thirty dynasties in Egypt before the Greek rule began is proved by the deciphering of the hieroglyphics. Already Champollion reached back as far as the beginning of the new empire (the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries), and now also the first part of Manetho's dynasties must be considered an indubitable historical fact. A great multitude of monuments, whose dates are ascertainable, present us a nearly continuous series of kings as far back as the fourth dynasty; and we have the hieroglyphic names and annalistic reports as far back as Menes himself, the head of the first dynasty. There were originally two different views with respect to Manetho's dynasties: one represented by Böckh, Manetho und die Hundertsternperiode, Berlin, 1845; and the other by Bunsen, Aegyptens Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, Hamburg, 1848, and Lepsius, Chronologie der Aegypten, Berlin, 1848. Böckh holds that the thirty dynasties have succeeded each other, and places the first year of the reign of the first king (Menes) at 5702. Bunsen and Lepsius hold that several of these dynasties have been contemporary, and place the beginning of the Egyptian Empire, the former at 3043, the latter at 3892. The latter view is now generally adopted by Egyptologists.

The Egyptians, like all other peoples, assumed, that, before the human dynasties spoken of in the annals began, there had been a government by gods, and that in three dynasties: the first consisting of Ra, the sun-god, the family of Osiris, and the local god of the oldest royal residence, This, in Upper Egypt; the second of twelve gods, with the moon-god at their head; and the third of thirty demigods. See Lepsius: Ueber den ersten ägyptischen Götterkreis, Berlin, 1849. Between the government by the gods and the first historical king (Menes) the Egyptians further placed a prehistoric dynasty of so-called Manes, whose residence was at This, the native city of Menes. Menes came from This, and settled in Lower Egypt, where he founded Memphis and the first historical dynasty. During the fourth dynasty the old empire reached its point of culmination. The two largest Pyramids—those of Cheops and Chephren, the khufu and khafre of the inscriptions—were then built. From the tombs arranged around the royal Pyramids, partly hewn into the cliffs, and especially from the chambers destined for the worship of the dead, with their innumerable inscriptions and pictorial representations, we derive a surprisingly complete idea of the life which the Egyptians then led—their arts and trades, their riches, customs, offices, honors, their worship of the gods and the dead, etc. More than three thousand years before Christ, while all the rest of the world is still in the mire of the popular view. At the same time as the fifth dynasty, the names of whose members we find in the tombs of Memphis, reigned in Lower Egypt, the sixth dynasty, descending from Elephantine on the Ethiopian frontier, reigned in Upper Egypt; and thus the Ethiopians appear for the first time in Egyptian history. Under the following dynasties up to the eleventh the prosperity of the country decreased. The eleventh was the first Theban dynasty; and with it began the power and fame of that city, hitherto unmentioned, and of its local god Ammon. Under the twelfth dynasty (the second in Thebes) the country again flourished. The grand character of the whole epoch is proved by the gigantic undertakings which were accomplished, as, for instance, the construction of the Joseph Canal. It carried the waters of the Nile into an artificial lake (Morris), and thereby transformed Fayum, by nature one of the poorest provinces of the country, into one of the most fertile. Amenemha III., who reigned for forty-two years, extended the empire to the present Semneh in Ethiopia, beyond the second cataract. He ordered the height of the annual flood to be measured, and denoted on the cliffs of the shore. The pyramid and temple which he built in Fayum afterwards became the centre of the famous Labyrinth. Shortly after his death (about 2100 B.C.), the Hyksos, a warlike people, shepherds, coming from the East, invaded the country. Without opposition, they took possession of all Lower Egypt, captured Memphis, which they made their capital, laid tribute both upon Lower and Upper Egypt, and fortified the northeasterly entrance to the country, which they themselves had found open, but which they wanted to close against any other people likely to follow them, more especially against the Assyrians, who at that time were powerful in Asia. After a hundred and eleven years they reigned in Egypt. At last the native kings, who had kept independent in Upper Egypt and Ethiopia, succeeded, after long and stubborn resistance, in expelling them from their principal stronghold, Avaris, near the later Pelusium, and driving them into Syria. This first counter-movement from the south, against the stream of peoples which from Central Asia rushed onwards to the south and to the west, must have produced an effect so much the greater as it was followed by the brilliant victories and great conquests of the Pharaohs of the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties, which extended the boundaries of the Egyptian Empire far into Asia. A people numbering hundreds of thousands, and, at least to some degree, conversant with the arts and sciences of Egypt, could not be compelled to change abode without causing a corresponding commotion among other peoples; and, indeed, all the historical or historico-mythical reminiscences of the nations of antiquity, especially so far as they concern immigration, colonization, introduction of divine worship, or knowledge of mythological genealogies, can be traced back to this epoch (between the sixteenth and fourteenth centuries B.C.), and no farther.

The expulsion of the Hyksos has often and very early been put in connection with the exodus of the children of Israel. The two events have even been declared identical. He held this view. He does not notice that he is in complete contradiction to his source. An impartial examination of the statements of Manetho does not leave it in the least doubtful that the Egyptians themselves considered the two events as entirely different. According to Manetho, the expulsion of the Hyksos from Avaris took place under King Thummosis, or Tuthmosis (Thothmes) III.; while the exodus of the Israelites—which by Egyptian historians is generally spoken of as the expulsion of a rebellious tribe under the leadership of a Heliopolitan priest, Osarsih, who afterwards called himself Moses—took place under a king who was the son of a Rameses and the father of a Sethos, and who consequently can be no other than the Menophes, or Menephthes (Africanus reads Amenophetes), of the list of Manetho, who was the son of Rameses II., and the father of Sethos II. (Josephus calls him sometimes Amenophis, and sometimes Menophis). As the two kings, Thothmes III., and Menophes, denote the beginning and the close of the epoch of the greatest prosperity of Egypt, they are both perfectly well known to us through the monuments. The latter lived about fifteen years beyond the former, and that period consequently separated the two events from each other.

With respect to Manetho's views of the two events there can be no difference of opinion. The date of the reign of King Menophes can be ascertained from the fact that the last Sothis period, beginning 1832 B.C., and ending 139 A.D., was, according to the mathematician Theon of Alexandria, called the era of Menophes, because it opened during his reign. The question now arises, How do the statements of the Old Testament correspond with those of the Egyptian historian? They are so far from contradicting each other, that, on the contrary, the Egyptian tradition would receive its most decided confirmation. We notice the two events from each other.

to Manetho, the twenty-fifth dynasty. Tirhakah afterwards retired to the old Ethiopian residence on the mountain of Barkal, the Meroe of Herodotus, where he built several temples, the names upon whose ruins show that his dynasty still flourished there for a long time.

When the Ethiopians had gone, there followed a period of dissolution and confusion, described by Herodotus as the dodekarchy, but not mentioned by Manetho, who speaks only of the legitimate rulers. Finally, Psammetichus I., one of the dodekarchs, and the legitimate heir of the crown, succeeded in putting an end to the anarchy; and under him and his successors, forming the twenty-sixth dynasty, the country once more enjoyed a period of great prosperity. Psammetichus I. ascended the throne by the aid of Ionian and Carian mercenaries; and in reward he gave them large estates and great privileges, which no doubt was the reason why, during his reign, a large portion of the national warriors emigrated to Ethio-opia. The Greek colony in the country increased rapidly. Amasis allowed them to build the city of Naukratis, which soon became an important commercial port. The gates of Egypt were opened to foreign commerce, and greater riches flowed into her lap than in the times of the victories of the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties.
The number of cities is said to have increased under Amasis to twenty thousand; and private people were able to build for themselves rock tombs larger and more magnificent than the royal tombs of Bab-el-meluk. But the military strength of the country did not increase in a corresponding measure, and the empire finally succumbed before the power of Persia. From 323 to 504 Egypt was a Persian province; and, though she once more enjoyed a short period of independence under the twenty-ninth and thirtieth dynasties, she was conquered a second time by the Persians in 340, and fell in 332 to Alexander the Great, who founded Alexandria, where he was buried (323).

Under the Ptolemies, Egyptian civilization may be said to have fulfilled its last mission in the history of the world, after which it vanished.
During this period, Greek curiosity, still young and active, took possession of all the accumulated wisdom and learning of the dying country as its legitimate inheritance; and Alexandria became the centre of Greek study. Immense libraries were formed; and every important work, not only of the Egyptian literature, but of all Oriental literatures, was translated into Greek. While this infiltration of the Oriental into the Greek civilization was still going on, Egypt finally lost its independence under Cleopatra VI. After the battle of Actium (30 B.C.), the country was incorporated with the Roman Empire. Already in the first century after Christ, Christianity was introduced into Egypt, and spread rapidly, though hieroglyphical inscriptions are found in the tem-ules of Esneh dating from the middle of the third century; and the Isis-worship at Philae did not cease completely until the middle of the sixth century, under Justinian.

RECENT DISCOVERIES. — In the summer of 1851 there were discovered in a cave near Thébes seventy-nine royal mummies, besides papyrus rolls and other objects of interest and value. Among the mummies was that of Rameses II., the Pharaoh of the oppression. It was in a perfect state of preservation, in a mummy-case of plain sycamore-wood, unpainted and unvarnished, carved to represent Rameses as Osiris. The arms are crossed upon the breast. In his right hand he holds the royal whip, in the left the royal hook. The mummy itself is wrapped in rose-colored and yellow linen, figured with lotus-flowers, of a texture finer than the finest Indian muslin. One of the bands which pass across the shrouds to keep them in place bears a hieratic inscription stating

EGYPT. 707

that this (the mummy of Rameses II.) was concealed in a pit at a time when a foreign army invaded Egypt. In January, 1882, G. Maspero, the director of the Boulak Museum, made his official report of this remarkable discovery.

Another discovery in 1881 was that of a tri-lingual stela containing the decree of the synod of priests assembled at Canopus, ordaining the deification of Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy Euergetes (q.v.), and creating a fifth order of priests, to be called Euergetes. This Ptolemy is supposed to have been prophetically described Dan. xi. 7, 8. He was one of Egypt's greatest rulers. The date of the decree is B.C. 238, and it is therefore a century older than the Rosetta Stone. The inscription upon the newly discovered tablet is the same as that upon the stone of Sân, discovered in 1865, but better preserved.

The year 1881 witnessed also the opening of the Pyramid of Maydoom, which is a century older than the Great Pyramid of Cheops, and probably is the tomb of Sneferu of the third dynasty, B.C. 3000-2756.

Meanwhile, our knowledge is being increased through the correct decipherment of the demotic writing, which was a very much abbreviated form of the hieratic,—the usual style of penmanship employed by the priests. In the demotic the ordinary business and legal transactions of the Egyptians were recorded. From the numerous documents written in it which have been preserved, an insight will be given into the laws, social state, customs and manners, of the Egyptians, such as is not afforded by those in the monumental styles of the hieroglyphic and hieratic. But there is a growing conviction among Egyptologists, that the earliest Egyptian civilization we know of is the highest, and that all we know of it is its decadence.

RELIGION OF ANCIENT EGYPT. — The Egyptians were among the most religious of the ancient nations. It is true that the principal reason why most of the documents which have come down to us are of a religious character is that all the ancient monuments of Egypt have perished, except some which were necessarily of a religious nature, such as the shrines and temples of kings and nobles. The palaces of kings and nobles have utterly disappeared. Our knowledge of Egyptian civil architecture is derived from paintings in the tombs. Many texts of historical interest have been preserved; but the original intention was not historical, but religious. Religion in some form or other was dominant in every relation of life in ancient Egypt. The Egyptian deities were literally innumerable. Every town and village had its local patrons. Every month of the year, every hour of the day and of the night, had its presiding divinity. All these gods had to be propitiated; and Egyptian life thus became a constant round of religious and semi-religious ceremonies and festivals which amazed the foreigner. When Herodotus visited Egypt, in the middle of the fifth century B.C., the first remark he made of the people was that they were religious to excess. He said it was easier to find a god in Egypt than a man.

In order to reduce this bewildering multitude of deities into something like a mythological system, it is only necessary to notice that special titles and names were given to deities according to the place in which they were worshipped. Thus Osiris was called Che (“the child”) at Thebes, Ura (“the great one”) at Heliopolis, Oh (“the sovereign”) at Memphis. The goddess Hathor was identical with Isis at Denderah, with Sekhet at Memphis, with Neith at Sais, with Saosis at Heliopolis, with Nebemaniit at Hermopolis, with Bast at Bubastis, with Sotisis at Elephantine, etc. Hence the explanation of the singular fact thatApis is called the son of Ptah, of Tum, of Osiris, and of Sokari; that Horus is called the son of Isis and of Hathor; that Osiris is called the father, brother, husband, and son of Isis, and also the son of their child Horus; that Horus is said to have been born in Tattu, but also in Cheb, etc. What at first glance represents itself as different deities is in reality only different aspects of the same deity.

That Egypt which Menes first gathered together under one sceptre was a country divided up into nomes. Each nome had its own capital, and each capital had its own gods with their special names. But it is in the names which are different: the doctrines are everywhere the same. It is evident that Mentu and Tum, two of the great gods of Thebes, are merely individual or local aspects of the sun-god Ra; and so are Ptah and Ammon: indeed, the whole swarm of gods of the first order is easily reduced to two groups: the first representing the sun-god Ra and his family, and the second, Osiris and his family. Ra is not only the name of the sun-god, but also the word commonly used to denote the sun itself. In other mythologies the sun-god generally rides across the sky in a chariot drawn by horses; in Egypt he sails in a boat. The sky is conceived as an expanse of water, to which the Nile forms the earthly counterpart. The adversary of Ra is Apap, and the conflict between them is that between light and darkness. Osiris is the eldest son of Seb (“the earth”) and Nut (“the sky”), but more powerful than his parents. He wedded his sister Isis whilst they were yet in their mother's womb, and their son was Horus. Osiris' adversary is Set, who shall slay him; but he shall be avenged by Horus. Osiris means the same as Ra, only that Ra is identical with the sun-god in its features. Already in antiquity it was the subject of much subtle meditation and many fanciful interpretations. Modern mythologists do not find it difficult—either with this particular myth, or with the whole Egyptian mythology—to go behind the wild, gaudy, coarse, and often ridiculous polytheism, which was the religion of the multitude, to the subtle, mystical, often sublime monotheism, which was the heart and conscience of the educated classes.

Egyptian religion, considered not as a mythological system, but in its bearing upon morals and practical life in general, presents two very remarkable features,—its worship of the dead, and its worship of sacred animals. In Egyptian life the tomb played a much more prominent part than the temple. The temple was exactly a place of worship for the living, whereas the tomb was essentially and essentially an offering made by the king to some god: but the tomb was the centre of all family worship. The greatest importance was attached to the permanence of the tomb, to the continuance of the religious ceremonies, and even to the prayers of passers-by. We constantly find men praised for having imbibed the names of their father and mother, or of their fathers' fathers," live again. Ancestor-worship, however, even though it may not be the first origin of all religion, is a part of human nature itself, commands respect, even when it presents itself under such curious forms, and will continue under some refined form as long as human nature keeps whole and sound. But animal worship is always a strange phenomenon, and it became especially so in Egypt on account of the grotesque forms under which it presented itself. Some kinds of animals were held sacred universally, others received only a local veneration. To the first class belonged the cat, sacred to Bast or Sekhret; the ibis and the cynocephalous ape, sacred to Thoth; the hawk and the beetle, sacred to Ra, etc. None of these animals were allowed to be killed or injured. In each locality where any kind of animal was sacred, some individuals of the species were attached to the principal temple, where they had their special shrines or chambers, and their train of priestly attendants, who carefully fed them and cleaned them. When they died, they were embalmed according to the most approved method, and entombed with much pomp and ceremony. The origin of this animal-worship may have been natural enough, starting from the idea of transmission; but its continuance down to the third century of our era exposed the Egyptians to the laughter and contempt of the rest of the civilized world. The Greek comedy-writers of the middle and of the last school, and the Christian fathers, as, for instance, Clemens Alexandrinus and Origen, agree in their feelings on this point. See P. LE PAGE RENOUF: Religion of Ancient Egypt (the Hibbert Lectures for 1879), New York, 1880, from which these last paragraphs have been chiefly drawn.

RELATIONS OF EGYPT AND THE BIBLE. — With Abraham the mention of Egypt in the Bible begins, and is, as always, minutely accurate (Gen. xxi. 10—xxii. 3). The plenty in Egypt in that time of famine was the attraction, for the overflowing Nile has always blessed that land. Sarah was taken into the royal harem, as the tale of The Two Brothers (trans. in Records of the Past, vol. ii. 137—152) was customary in the case of beautiful women. The very prison where Joseph was confined is copied upon an existing mosaic found in a Roman house at Preneste (see woodcut in Geikie's Hours with the Bible, vol. i. p. 461). The wine-drinking habits of the ancient Egyptians (ch. 1) are illustrated by the tombs of Beni Hasan, built long before Abraham. The importance of dreams was universally granted in antiquity; but Joseph dared a good deal in invading priestly prerogatives in interpreting those of his fellow-prisoners (xli.). His sudden call to the presence of the Pharaoh (a Hyksos), Apepi, according to Brugsch, cleanly dressed and closely shaven (xli. 14), as custom demanded, and his sudden promotion (xli. 41), are thoroughly Egyptian. So, too, are the insignia of his rank, the new name, and the mode of his public reception (xli. 42, 43). By his marriage with Asenath ("devoted to Neith"), the daughter of a priest in the great university temple of the Sun at On, near Memphis, he was incorporated into the priesthood, and therefore into the highest class of the land. The "divining bowl," which comes up in the subsequent narrative (xliiv.), is a proof how a man's environment saps his faith. Brugsch finds an allusion to the seven years of famine in an inscription at El-kab from the age of Joseph: "I gathered grain, a friend of the god of harvest; I was watchful at the seed-time, and, when a famine arose through many years, I distributed the grain through the town in every famine."

The land of Goshen, where Joseph settled his family (Gen. xlvii. 4), was admirably adapted for the purpose. It lay on the north-east of the Delta, toward the Isthmus of Suez, and was isolated from the native Egyptians in the Valley of the Nile, who held in abhorrence all shepherds (xlvii. 34). Goshen was famous for its fertility; and, being especially fitted for tillage, the Israelites there were providentially led to change from their pastoral life to an agricultural people. To the south were Memphis, the ancient capital, and On, the seat of a great university. In direct contact with Egyptian pomp, at a period when the nation was at its height, the Israelites lived unmolested for four hundred years. The Pharaoh who welcomed them was a Hyksos king; but after a struggle of a hundred and fifty years the Hyksos were driven out, and a native dynasty once more reigned. Then began oppression. They were set to building and beautifying cities (Exod. i. 11). The outrages to which the modern felâskin in Egypt are subjected give an idea of the sore trials of the chosen people. But "at evening time it shall be light," and to the weary Israelites day was about to dawn; for in one of their most pious families, to judge by the names of his parents,—Amram ("kindred of the Lofty One") and Jochebed ("my glory is Jehovah") (vi. 20),—Moses, their future savior, was born (ii. 2). By the instrumentality of Thermouthis, as Josephus calls the princess who found him (one of the wives of Rameses II., as a contemporary document proves), he was taught all the learning of the Egyptians. But his mother was... his first teacher, and from her he received his religious. His killing of an officer was the cause of his flight, rendered all the more imperative because he had buried the body in the sand (ii. 12), and thus prevented its embalming, without which, according to Egyptian belief, the dead man's soul could not live.

When Moses returned, Menephta, the thirteenth son of Rameses, was on the throne. The plagues (vii. 14–xii. 29) were directed against the idolatry of Egypt. By them, in order, the following gods were mocked: (1) Osiris, the great god of the Nile, the sacred river; (2) Hekti, the "driver away of frogs;" (3) and (4) The fly gods; (5) The sacred ram worshipped at Thebes, and the sacred ox at Memphis and On; (6) "Human sacrifices of foreigners were offered yearly, and their ashes scattered in the air, to avert evil from the land; but now ashes similarly cast abroad carried misery far and near." (7) The multitude of divinities who had charge of the air; (8) The insect' gods; (9) The sun, the chief Egyptian divinity; (10) The destruction of the first-born put the whole religion to shame; for it demonstrated that a greater than any god in their pantheon had the Egyptians in his power, and favored unmistakably the despised Israelites. For a discussion of the exodus, see EXODUS OF THE CHILDREN OF ISRAEL.

The references to Egypt after the exodus are few and incidental, although several Pharaohs are named. Sheshonk, or Shishak, in the ninth year of Rehoboam (969 B.C.) came up against Jerusalem with twelve hundred chariots and sixty thousand horsemen, and took all the walled towns of Judah (2 Chron. xii.). Upon the south wall of the Temple of Karnak is inscribed, among the conquered kings, "Yuthmalk:" probably Rehoboam is meant. Osarchon, or Zerah, the Ethiopian who was expelled by Asa 940 B.C. (2 Chron. xiv. 0), is inscribed on the same temple. In 1878 an inscription of Tirhakah (2 Kings xix. 9), contemporary of Hezekiah (700 B.C.), is inscribed on the same temple. Tirhakah (2 Kings xx. 19), who defeated Sennacherib, was discovered at Tanis (the Bible Zoan). Pharaoh-Hophra is mentioned in Jer. xlv. 30. EICHHORN, Johann Andreas, b. at Mannheim, 1654; d. at Heidelberg, Dec. 20, 1704; was educated in the Collegium Sapientiae, and studied Hebrew and Arabic in Holland and England; was appointed registrar at the Palatine court in 1683, and professor of Oriental languages at Heidelberg in 1700. The fanatical hatred of Christianity which characterized the Jewish rabbins of that period, more especially his teacher of Hebrew, the famous David Lida, engendered an opposition against the publication from the emperor, and even offered to buy the whole edition for twelve thousand florins; but Eisenmenger demanded a thousand florins; but Eisenmenger demanded a sum of money with which the emperor on behalf of the heirs, but in vain. Finally, however, the book was printed at Königs burg (1711) at the expense of the Prussian King. Eisenmenger's Lexicon Orientale Har dicum was never printed. His edition of the Hebrew Bible (without points), which he undertook in connection with Leusden, was published 1694.

EINSIEDELN, or MARIA—EINSIEDELN, a Benedictine monastery in Switzerland, and a famous place of pilgrimage. In the first half of the ninth century Meginrad, or Meinrad, from Sulzburg, in the Neckar region, settled on the top of the Etzel, a cliff on the southern shore of the Lake of Zurich, where he afterwards penetrated farther into the wild Alpine regions, until in 861 he was murdered by robbers in his cell. In the beginning of the tenth century Beuno and Eberhard came to the spot where St. Meinrad had been murdered; and there they founded a monastery, which was splendidly endowed by Otho I. and Otho II., and prospered much. It never attained, however, the celebrity of the neighboring St. Gall; and when the Reformation began, it became almost completely deserted. Abbot Joachim Eichhorn (1544–90) retrieved it, and made it once more hold the counter-Reformation. The French invasion of 1798 it also outlived; and when, in 1861, it celebrated its millenary anniversary, it numbered about a hundred inmates, and was visited by about a hundred and fifty thousand pilgrims. The food for the poor and the destitute is taken to the black image of the Virgin, preserved in a separate chapel; and the origin of a special devotion in this chapel is, according to the legend, the circumstance that on Sept. 14, 948, Mary herself and the angels came down from heaven, and consecrated the chapel. Materials for the history of the institution are found in Documenta Archivi Einsiedlensis, published in 3 vols. fol. in the seventeenth century, under Abbot Placidus Reymann; and a continuous history was given in 1612 by the librarian F. Chr. Hartmann, in his Annales Einsidelf. See H. EwALD: JahrBücher d. biblischen Litteratur (10 vols.), and finally his Repertorium für biblische und morgenländische Litteratur (19 vols., 1777–99), which from 1797 to 1803 was followed by his Allgemeine Bibliothek der biblischen Litteratur (10 vols.), and finally his Einleitung in d. Alte Testament (Leipzig, 1780–83, 3 vols.), a work written with great boldness and enthusiasm, and accepted by its times as a new departure in theological science. To his Göttingen residence belong his Einleitung in d. apokryphischen Büchers des A. T. (1795: Kritische Schriften, I.–IV.), Einleitung in d. N. T. (1804–12: Kritische Schriften, V.–VII.). EKKEHARD is the name of several monks of literary fame, of the Monastery of St. Gall.—Ekkhard the First, d. 973; was educated there; became director of the cloister-school, and dean of the convent, and made the place a centre of learning and study. He wrote hymns, and a Latin poem on the life and deeds of Walter of Aquitania, last ed. by R. Peiper, Berlin, 1873. —Ekkhard the Second (surnamed Pannonius), d. April 23, 990; was a nephew of the preceding, and educated by him; taught for some time in the school of St. Gall, but was by the Duchess Hedwig of Suabia invited to Hohentwiel, where he taught the duchess Latin and Greek. He was afterwards called to the imperial court as one of the chaplains of Otho II., and was finally made provost of the Cathedral of Mayence.—Ekkhard the Third was a cousin of the preceding, and accompanied him to Hohentwiel as teacher of the young clerics at the court of the duchess.

ELAITH, or ELOTH (strong trees), a sea port at the northern extremity of the eastern arm of the Red Sea, the Gulf of Akabah, belonged to the Edomites, and owed its prosperity to its trade with the Indies. Israel passed by it on their exodus from Egypt; and David conquered it (Deut. ii. 8; 2 Sam. viii. 14). From the 9th to the 11th century A.D. it was occupied by the Greeks, who replaced by the old Aramaic Bethgebrim. In 796 it was razed to the ground by the Saracens, and its Greek name was replaced by the old Aramaic Bethgebrim. In the twelfth century the crusaders built a fortress on the spot, which was taken by Saladin, and retaken by Richard. At present the site is occupied by an insignificant village (Beit Jibrin), and covered with ruins. See Robinson: Biblical Researches, New York, 1841.

ELEUTHERUS, Bishop of Rome 177-193; was a Greek by birth. Two events are noticed during his administration: first, the churches of Lyons and Vienne sent Ireneus (then a presbyter, afterwards bishop) to Rome to present to Eleutherus the acta marianus from the persecutions which the churches had just suffered (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., V. 4); next, the British king, Lucius, wrote to Eleutherus (according to Beda, Hist. Eccl., III. 23, and the Liber Pontificalis) to tell him that he was ready to accept Christianity as soon as Eleutherus would send him teachers. The latter notice is a little suspicious; as, towards the close of the sixth century, Augustine found in Britain a Christianity quite different from the Roman type, while Beda was naturally anxious to catch any hint at an early connection between Britain and Rome.

ELEVATION OF THE HOST. See Mass.

ELI ("elevation"), a descendant of Ithamar, and high priest. The proof of the first statement is this: Abiathar was a lineal descendant of Eli (1 Chron. xxiv. 3), and the sins of his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, brought down the house of Eli. Samuel disclosed to him these sorrows upon his head, and entailed the destruction of his house. He had grown dim of sight, only aided him in deciphering the enigmas of the Cabala, and was in reward for his administration: first, the churches of Lyons and Vienne sent Ireneus (then a presbyter, afterwards bishop) to Rome to present to Eleutherus the acta marianus from the persecutions which the churches had just suffered (Eusebius, Hist. FR. W. SCHULTZ.

ELICISIUS, b. at Chatelat, near Limoges, about 588; d. at Noyon, Nov. 30, 658 or 659; descended from a Gallo-Roman, not Frankish family and was apprenticed to the goldsmith Abbo, at Limoges, the mint-master of the king of Aquitania. In 610 he went to Paris, the residence of the king of Neustria; got work in the royal treasury; acquired the particular favor of King Clotaire, and accumulated a fortune. Meanwhile, the influence of Columban reached the Neustrian court from Burgundy and Austrasia; and obtained absolute sway over Eligius and his young friend Audouenus, at that time page to the king. Without abandoning his trade, Eligius began an ascetic life; and he soon earned a great reputation, not only as an artist, but also for his piety. In 628 Clotaire died, and was succeeded by his son Dagobert; but this change only made the influence of Eligius stronger at the Neustrian court. For Eligius was opposed by the Frankish chieftains and courtiers, headed by the major domus. Young Saxons were then brought to Paris, often in great numbers, and sold there as slaves. He bought them by the hundreds, and gave them freedom, either sending them home or making them monks. Monasteries and churches he founded, built, adorned, and supported in the most lavish manner. The Monastery of Solignac, near Limoges, was one of his foundations; the great nunnery at Paris, another. Even on the appointment of bishops, he is said to have exercised a decisive influence. But in 638 Dagobert died, and Ilercuvard, the major domus who governed the realm during the minority of Clovis II., wished to have Eligius removed from the court. In 640 he was made Bishop of Noyon, at the same time as his friend Audouenus was made Bishop of Rouen. As a bishop he was said to have exercised active influence not only over the chapter of his cathedral and the monasteries of his diocese, but also over the courts of the Frankish chieftains, whose wild drinking-bouts and fighting-feasts were a scandal to him. In the synod of Chalons (614) he effected the deposition of the metropolitan, Theodosius of Arles, on account of his arbitrary and unrational rule. In the synod of Orleans (650) he and the whole clergy of Neustria declared in favor of Martin of Rome, and persecutions were instituted against the Monothelists. In 656 both Clodvig II. and Herchenoald died; and, during the reign of the pious Queen Bathilde, Eligius again occupied his old position at the court. After his death, miracles were said to take place at his grave, and he was honored by the people as a saint. His life (Vita S. Eligii) was written by his friend Audenuis, and is found in D'ACROY: Spicilegium, II. pp. 76–123; but, in the form in which it is found there, it belongs certainly to a later time. Some sermons ascribed to him, and printed in BIBL. MAX. PVR., Lyons, 1677, XII. pp. 300–322, belong evidently to the Carlovingian period. A letter from him to Desiderius, Bishop of Cahors, is found in CANISII, Antiqu. Lect., ed. Basnage, I. p. 640.

ELIJAH (אֵלַיָּה, or אֵלִיָּה, "My God is Jehovah"). LXX. Ελίζα; New Testament [West. and Hort] Ελίζας), the greatest of the prophets belonging to the northern kingdom of Israel, and one of the grandest and most romantic characters in Hebrew history. The events of his life are recorded in four chapters of 1 Kings (xvii., xviii., xix., xxi.), and in the first two chapters of 2 Kings, recorded in four chapters of 1 Kings (xvii., xviii., xix., xxi.). In the case of Daniel, and of a majority of the twelve minor prophets, nothing is known of his parentage. Six times in the course of the narrative, including a later reference (2 Kings ix. 30), he is called "the Tishbite," which indicates his birthplace. This cannot have been the THISBE OF UPPER GALILEE, from which Tobit was carried captive by the Assyrians in the time of Shalmaneser (Tob. i. 2), since Elijah the Tishbite is said expressly to have been "of the inhabitants of Gilead" (1 Kings xvii. 1). The Septuagint reads, "from THISBE [OR TISHBI] of GILEAD." "Josephus (Ant., VIII. 13, 2) also says, "of Tethrona, a city of Gilead." Somewhere in this wild but fertile and beautiful district the great prophet was born; and the exact spot is now probably determined. In the fourteenth century Parchi, the learned Jewish traveller in Palestine, heard of it, and considered it the birthplace of Elijah. In 1876 it was found and identified by Dr. Selah Merrill, archaeologist of the American Palestine Exploration Society. The name of the place is EL-ISTIB, which Dr. Van Dyck of Boyrout pronounces the exact Arabic equivalent of Tishbi. It is in the Wady Mareb, which opens northward into the Wady Yabis, which in turn opens westward into the Jordan Valley. El-Istib (or Listib) is about twenty-two miles in an air line south of the Lake of Galilee, some ten miles east of the Jordan, and some six miles south-east of ancient Pellia. The brook Cherith was probably in the same immediate neighborhood, though no relic of the name has yet been discovered.

We have no account of the early life of the prophet, nor is it certain at what time exactly his translation occurred. From the narrative in Kings it might perhaps be concluded that it occurred in the reign of Ahab, king of Israel (887–880 B.C.), the immediate successor of Ahab. But if the "writing" spoken of in 2 Chron. xxi. 12 was a personal letter from Elijah to Jehoram, king of Judah (892–885 B.C.), Elijah must have commenced his public ministry before his master's translation. At all events, the public ministry of the Tishbite in Israel ended with his rebuke of Ahaziah (897–890 B.C.); the great errand of his life having been to antagonize the idolatry of Ahab (919–897 B.C.).

The dramatic interest of the narrative is surpassed only by that of the exodus from Egypt. Ahab, seventh of the nineteen kings of Israel, a weak man, who had married the Phoenician Jezebel, gave himself up also to the Phoenician idolatry, and the true religion was in imminent danger of being rooted out. Suddenly the apostate king is confronted by a rough-looking man from beyond the Jordan, described as a hairy man wearing a leather girdle and a sheepskin cape or mantle. It was Elijah the Tishbite, who had been sent by the prophet of Jehovah to tell the king there should be neither dew nor rain but according to his word. And then the prophet hastens back to Gilead. There, in the Wady Cherith, the ravens feed him till the brook dries up, and he is told to betake himself to the Phoenician Zarephath, where a widow-woman had been commanded to care for him, where he and the widow's family are fed miraculously, and the dead son of the widow is restored to life. Some three years later, when drought and famine had become well-nigh intolerable, he meets Ahab again, calls down fire from heaven upon his altar on Carmel, and adds, with Ahab's consent, the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal, reddening the Kishon with their blood. Then he prayed for rain; and then he ran before the chariot of the apparently repentant Ahab, sixteen miles across the plain of Edraelon, to the entrance of Jezebel. But the rage of Jezebel drives him to Beerseba, and into the desert south of it, where he sinks down discouraged, praying for death. Thence he goes on to Sinai, where he has wonderful visions of the God which revived him and gave him courage. Some six years later he appears again to denounce both Ahab and Jezebel for what they had done to Naboth, causing him to be put to death on a false charge of blasphemy, that they might seize his vineyard. His last personal appearance was to Ahaziah, son of Ahab and Jezebel, some three or four years after the Naboth tragedy. Elijah's life was thus one of bold, sudden appearances and disappearances in a gallant struggle against the mad idolatry that was working the ruin of the northern kingdom. Where he was, and what he was doing, during the long intervals of his public ministry, we can only conjecture. His departure out of life was in keeping with the whole previous tenor of it. His sheepskin mantle, rolled up into a rod, smote a path for himself and for Elisha across the Jordan. A chariot of fire, and horses of fire, parted the two prophets, and the Tishbite mounted up in a storm into the sky. This, however, does not quite end his biography. Second only to Moses, who, also, was strangely snatched away not far from the same locality, Moses and Elijah came back together to meet the "writing" spoken of in 2 Chron. xxi. 12 was a personal letter from Elijah to Jehoram, king of Judah (892–885 B.C.), Elijah must have commenced his public ministry before his master's translation. ELIM (strong trees), the second station of Israel after crossing the Red Sea (Exod. xv. 27; Num. xxxii. 9). As the place had twelve springs and seventy palm-trees, and no alteration is likely to have taken place in the desert times that time, Elijah is with most probability identified with Wady Gharandel; though by some it is placed a little more to the south, at Wady Wuseit, or Wady Taiyibeh. See Schaff: Through Bible Lands, p. 182, 184.

ELIOT, John, "The Apostle to the Indians" (1604–90), was a native of Nasing, Essex County, Eng. Of his childhood and youth but little is known, except that he was blessed with eminently godly parents, by whom, to use his own language, his "first years were seasoned with the fear of God, the Word, and prayer." He was educated at the University of Cambridge, where his superior attainments, especially in the knowledge of the Hebrew and Greek languages, marked him out already for the great work to which in the New World his life was to be consecrated. Upon leaving the university, he became an usher in the grammar-school of the Rev. Thomas Hooker, at Little Baddow, near Chelmsford in Essex. Mr. Hooker had been silenced for nonconformity. He afterwards emigrated to New-England, and is known in history as the father of the Connecticut churches. Eliot's con- nexion with this admirable man formed a turning-point in his spiritual history. "When I came to this blessed family," said he, "I then saw, and never before, the power of godliness in its lively vigor and efficacy." He resolved to devote himself to the ministry of the gospel, and as his nonconformist principles exposed him to the tyranny of Laud, he sought the shores of America, arriving at Boston in November, 1631. In November, 1632, he was settled as teacher of the church of Christ in Roxbury, and continued in that office until his death,—a period of nearly sixty years. He married also in the same year. In 1639 he was appointed, with his colleague Mr. Welde, and Richard Mather of Dorchester, to make a new version of the Psalms. It was printed in the following year, and was called The Bay Psalm Book, and is best known as The New-England Version of the Psalms. It was the first book printed in North America.

Soon after his settlement at Roxbury, Eliot became deeply interested in the Indians, and at length resolved to preach the gospel to them. There were some twenty tribes within the limits of the Colonies, but they spoke substantially the same language. Having acquired a competent knowledge of it, he met for the first time an assembly of Indians at Nonantum, in the present town of Newton, Oct. 28, 1646, and opened to them the way of salvation. He thus entered upon that career of missionary zeal and labors which has rendered his name so illustrious throughout Christendom. He was violently opposed by the sachems and powwows, or juggling priests; but, nothing daunted, he prosecuted his mission with apostolic energy, until villages of praying Indians began to appear in different parts of the Colony. In 1660, at Natick, the first Indian church was organized. Eliot tried also, though with only partial success, to civilize as well as convert the Indians. In process of time he came to be regarded by them as their best friend. His influence over them was extraordinary; and he exerted it for their good, in things temporal and spiritual alike, with rare wisdom and sagacity. He exerted his mission among the different tribes is full of interest. In 1661 he had the joy of publishing the New Testament in the Indian language, and three years later the whole Bible. Richard Baxter said of a copy of it sent to Charles II., "Such a work and fruit of a plantation was never before presented unto a king." Of this Bible Cotton Mather wrote: "Behold, ye Americans, the greatest honor that ever ye were partakers of,—the Bible printed here at our Cambridge; and it is the only Bible that ever was printed in all America, from the very foundation of the world." Eliot's Indian Bible is the grandest monument of early American scholarship and evangelism. The longest word in it is in Mark i. 40, Wutappesitiutquusannoochelbinkquoph ("kneeling down to him"). Eliot also translated into the Indian tongue a catechism, Baxter's Call to the Uncon- verted, and various other treatises on practical religion, besides preparing an Indian grammar. At the end of the latter he wrote, "Prayer and pains, through faith in Christ Jesus, will do any thing." For many years, while weighed down by bodily infirmities, and unable and eager to preach, or to visit the Indians, he induced several families to send their negro servants to him once a week, that he might instruct them in the truths of the gospel. His old age was adorned with the simplicity and ariteness of a little child, with wonderful humility, and a charity that never failed. Nor was he wanting in fine touches of humor. He pretended to fear that his old friends and neighbors, Cotton of Boston, and Mather of Dorchester, who had gone to heaven many years before, would suspect him to have gone the wrong way, because he staid so long behind them. His missionary work excited great interest in England; and the funds for carrying it on were chiefly supplied by the Society for propagating the Gospel in New England. This corporation, instituted in 1649 by an ordinance of the famous Long Parliament, largely aided him also in defraying the expense of publishing the first and second editions of his Indian Bible. Mr. Eliot died on the 20th of May, 1690, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. His wife, a woman of uncommon excellence, and singularly adapted to be his companion and helper, passed on to the better country three years before him, in the eighty-fourth year of his age. They had six children,—a daughter and five sons. Four of the sons were graduated at Harvard College, and three of them became ministers of the gospel. Only the daughter and one son survived their father.

Elisha was a worthier or more venerable name than that of John Eliot, because he is to be found in all the annals of New England. "There was no man on earth whom I honored above him," wrote Richard Baxter. Southey pronounced him "one of the most extraordinary men of any country." Even in his own day he was called "The Apostle to the Indians;" and, although he earnestly deprecated such a title, it has adhered to him ever since by common consent of the Christian world.

Lit.—In addition to his Indian Bible, grammar, etc., Eliot published various other works, among them, _The Harmony of the Gospels, The Divine Management of Gospel Churches by the Ordinance of Councils, The Christian Commonwealth_, also several letters and other writings relating to the progress of the gospel among the Indians. The best account of him and his missionary labors is _Life of John Eliot, the Apostle to the Indians_, by Conyers Francis, vol. V. of Spark's _Library of American Biography_ (Boston, 1830).

ELISÆUS (Armenian _Egishé_), an eminent Armenian historian and theologian of the fifth century; was educated by Sahak and Mesrob, and served as secretary to the Armenian prince Vartan during the rebellion against Yazdegird II., the Persian king, who threatened the existence of Christianity in Armenia. Elisæus was afterwards made Bishop of Amatunik, and was such present at the great national synod of Ardashud, 449. He died 450 at Reschdonni, on the southern shore of Lake Van. His principal work is a history of the Persian persecution of Christ and his people from the time of the first martyrdom to the time of Stephen, in which he gives particular details of the sufferings of the Christians in Persia, and relates the various attempts made by the Persians to destroy the Christian Church and to extirpate its influence from the land. His work was first printed in Constantinople, 1764; the best edition is that published at Venice, 1852. It was translated into English by Neumann, Lond., 1830. He has also written commentaries on various books of the Old Testament and other theological works, of which a collected edition appeared at Venice, 1838.

ELISHA (ºpºs, "God is salvation;" LXX. _Eloi, "Eloïa_; New Testament _Elías_), Hebrew prophet, and successor of Elijah. As he was engaged in ploughing, Elijah consacrated him to the prophetic office by throwing his mantle over him (1 Kings xix. 18–21). He left his plough, and became the most faithful and eminent disciple of the great master. His prophetic activity fell in the reigns of four kings, and lasted more than half a century (c. 890–840). Under his predecessor a religious reformation had been effected, so that the times of Elisha were favorable to a dispensation of healing and of grace. It was this difference of temper and spirit that gave rise to a disturbance in the church, which was to be attributed to the difference in kind of the activity of the two prophets. Elisha was stern and severe, solitary and lonely; Elisha benevolent and tender, a man of the city and the home. He was often seen in the vicinity of Jericho, and on the Jordan, at Gilgal and at Bethel, and owned a house at Samaria. He is the friend of the poor and needy, who interests himself in the smallest details of domestic life. Now he heals the impure waters with salt (2 Kings ii. 19–32), now he makes the peneurous face of the sons of the prophets palatable (iv. 33–41). He helps the widow out of debt (iv. 1–7), and restores to a widow's son the axe which he had fallen into the water (vi. 1–7). A few loaves through his blessing suffice for a hundred (iv. 42–44). To his hospitable Shunammite friend he promises a child (iv. 8–17); and, when it has died, restores it to life (viii. 1–6). His fame extended to Syria; and Naaman the captain, by his counsel, bathes in the Jordan, and loses his leprosy (v.).

But Elisha's gracious activity was not confined to cases in private life. King Joram applies to him for counsel in his distress (iii. 11–20). His prediction of the Syrian attacks is so accurate, that the Syrian commander attributes his defeat to a traitor in the camp (vi. 11); and, when he seeks to take the prophet captive, Elisha leads him and his army to Samaria, as though they had been stricken with blindness (vi. 13–19). Elisha was obliged to follow the divine direction, and against his will, and with tears, predicted before Hazael that he would come to the throne, and would ravage Israel (viii. 7–15). He had constantly before his mind the well-being of his people, as is evidenced by the unceasing esteem of the nation, and the testimony of a king at his death, who called him his father, and Israel's "chariot and horsemen" (xiii. 14).

In sublime intellectual power Elisha was not equal to his predecessor; but in him the grace of God shows its tender and solicitous care for the smallest events. His miracles approach nearest to those of the Saviour, in which the fulness of divine grace revealed itself. He who sees deeds of supernatural power in the saving life of Christ will not deny them to his type in the Old Testament.

ELIZABETH, ST., of Hungary, the daughter of Andreas II., King of Hungary; b. in Pressburg, 1207; d. at Marburg, Nov. 19, 1231. In her fourth year she was betrothed to Ludwig, son of Hermann, Landgrave of Thuringia, to whose court she was at once sent in a silver cradle. The Wartburg, the residence of the landgrave, was at that time one of the most brilliant courts in Germany. The marriage was perfected in 1221, Ludwig having succeeded his father in 1216. It proved to be a happy one. Both were of serious temperament, and under their administration the tone of life radically changed at the Wartburg. Elizabeth displayed in an ever increasing measure the virtues of humility, mercy, and charity. She was in friend of the afflicted, in person relieved the sufferings of the sick, and distributed large sums among the needy; and in the famine of 1226 her charity relieved the poor from far and near. She founded a hospital.
ELIZABETH ALBERTINE, countess-palatine, b. at Heidelberg, Dec. 28, 1618; d. at Herford, in Westphalia, Feb. 11, 1690; was a daughter of Friedrich V., elector of the Palatinate, and king of Bohemia, and Elizabeth Stuart, a daughter of James I. She was educated at the Hague, where her parents kept a quiet court. She learned six languages. Descartes was her teacher in mathematics. Malebranche and Leibnitz were among her friends and correspondents. She early decided to remain unmarried, and devote her life to philosophy; and the decapitation of her uncle, Charles I. (1648), and the unhappy marriage of her brother, Karl Ludwig of the Palatinate, etc., only confirmed her decision. In 1667 she retired to Herford in Westphalia as abbess; and there she had opportunity to show hospitality to the exiled Elector Palatine, in 1670, and to the Quakers in 1676; circumstances which, towards the close of her life, gave her mind a more decidedly religious turn. Biographies of her have been written by GUEHR, in Raumer's hist. Taschenbuch (1851), and by GOKEL, in his Geschichte d. christ. Lebens, etc., vol. II.

ELIKESAITES, a school in the Jewish Christian Church, whose doctrines were tinged with Gnosticism. Our principal sources of information are the Philosophumena of Hippolytus and Epiphanius, who also calls them Sampsoi (from ἵππος, "horse"). The derivation of the name has led to many conjectures. Delitzsch derives it from a Galilean village (Elkesi); others, from a Hebrew word meaning apostate; while the church fathers derive it from a pretended founder, Elxai. Epiphanius (Her., xix. 2) defines the name to mean "hidden power" (ὅμως κρυπτόμενος). It was probably merely the designation of a book. At any rate, the Elkesaites had in their possession a book which was widely used, and, according to Origen, believed to have fallen from heaven, or, according to the more accurate Philosophumena, was revealed by the Son of God himself. Elxai is reported to have received it in Parthia in Trajan's reign, and to have presented it to the Sobaii (Epiphan., xix. 1; Philos., ix. 13). The work itself contains a large element of natural religion mingled with Judaistic and Christian ideas. It authorizes the practice of astrology and magic. Besides those features which Elke-saitism had in common with Ebionism may be mentioned the doctrine that baptism washes away sins; and the frequent repetition of the rite is enjoined. Before the Philosophumena were discovered (1211), the Elkesaites were identified with the Ebionites (Gieseler), and the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies were regarded as the main authority on the subject. But the two works differ: the Philosophumena teaching an intensified Ebionism, and the Homilies a modified type, giving up circumcision. The book of Elxai was widely circulated, but cannot be regarded as the confession of Ebionism. The Elkesaites were not a distinct sect, but rather a school scattered among all parties of the Judeo-Christian Church. *Lit.—Ritsch.: Ensteh. d. altkath. ELLER, Elias, b. at Ronsdorf in the duchy of Berg, 1690; d. there May 16, 1750; married at Elberfeld a rich widow (Bolckhaus), and established himself at the head of a sect of adventistical millenarians, called "Ellerians," or "Ronsdorfer," who received their revelations through a young baker-daughter from Elberfeld (Buchel), whom Eller married after the death of his first wife. The Bible the sect accepted as the word of God, but it needed various kinds of supplements; and these were given by Buchel, in the Hirtentasche ("shepherd's bag"). Abraham, Moses, and Elijah were only prototypes of Eller, in whom the whole fulness of divinity dwelt. The Messiah was to be born again by Buchel, etc. When investigations were had at Elberfeld concerning the meetings of the sect, Eller moved (in 1737), with all his followers, to Ronsdorf, where a church was to be built, and a minister was appointed (Schleiermacher). After the death of his second wife, Eller married another rich widow (Boselmann); and the sect, though suspected of immoralities, began to spread, when disagreement broke out between Eller and Schleiermacher. Investigations were had at Elberfeld concerning their brethren, but he was also able to improve their temporal condition by his practical knowledge. In his boyhood he had worked enthusiastically at market-gardening; and, in the year before he sailed on his first missionary journey, he learned not only theology, but printing and book-binding. He became the means of propagating the faith, and facilitating many species of fruits and plants in the South Sea Islands, which have been a source of revenue to the inhabitants, and also to set up the first printing-press in Polynesia. His books are not merely faithful and interesting records of missionary labor, but contributions to science.

ELLWOOD, Thomas, a Quaker, the suggester of Paradise Regained; b. at Crowell, Oxfordshire, 1639; d. at Hunger Hill, near Amerdean, Buckinghamshire, March 1, 1713. He was Latin reader to Milton for some months. During the Great Plague in London (1665) he took a house for Milton at Giles Chalfont; and there he read the manuscript of Paradise Lost, which he returned with the remark, "Thou hast said much here of Paradise lost; but what hast thou to say of Paradise found?" To Ellwood we are indebted for much information in regard to Milton and the persecutions of the Quakers. Of his own works the most important are, Forcery no Christianity (London, 1674), and Foundation of Tithes Shaken (1682), and his Autobiography, with supplement by Joseph Wyeth (1714), reprint, Boston, 1877, in the Choice Autobiographies series, edited by W. D. Howells.

ELOHIM (אֱלֹהִים), the term most frequently used in the Old Testament for God. It is the plural form, the singular, Eloah (אֵלֹהַ), being exclusively used in poetry. The ancient Semitic name for God, El (埃尔), occurs seldom. It defines God, beyond dispute, as having absolute power. So in Assyrian aššu means "powerful." But Eloah cannot be proved to mean "powerful." The verb means in the Arabic "to be afraid," and (according to Oehler) is connected with the Assyrian aššu, so that it would mean power which inspires fear. Elohim, as the designation of the true God, is not used in any of the Semitic languages except biblical Hebrew. Various explanations have been given of this plural form. The ancient theologians, beginning with Peter Lombard, found a reference to the Trinity; and, by pointing to the inexhaustible fulness of the Deity, it is, to say the least, inconsistent with an abstract monotheism. A second view sees in the plural form a relic of an ancient polytheism; but the opinion is unto, that the monotheism of the Old Testament developed out of polytheism. A third view finds the higher spirits who surround God referred to; but the use of the word for angels cannot be proved, confessedly not [many commentators, like Perowne on the Psalms, dissent] in Ps. viii. 5, xcvii. 7, cxxviii. 1, where the Septuagint translates it "angels." And in Ps. lxx. Elohim does not mean, as Hupfeld thinks, angels, but the theocratic officers of the law. The correct view was advanced by Dietrich in his Hebrew grammar (1846), who regards it as a plural of grace (1846), who regards it as a plural of Eloth. Ely, the seat of an English bishopric, is a town on the Isle of Ely, near the Ouse, sixteen miles north-north-east of Cambridge. A monastery was founded there by Etheldreda, Queen of Northumbria (673), of which she died abbess (679); but, when the town was ravaged by the Danes (870), it was burnt. Ethelwold, Bishop of Winchester, rebuilt it in 970, and placed in it the church, etc., as found in Mansi, II., together with a dissertation in three books by Mendoza. Ely is paid fifty-five hundred pounds yearly. The present incumbent (1882) is Dr. James Russell Woodford. See Whitaker's Almanack for 1882, p. 169.

Emancipation denotes a theory of the relation between God and the universe, according to which the world was not created by a divine fiat, but developed through various stages, and by an involuntary outflow of the divine substance, gradually deteriorating, and at last ending in mere matter. In a vague and confused form this theory may be found in most Oriental religions; but it owes its elaborate and systematic form to the Neo-Platonists, from whom it was borrowed by the Gnostics. Its scientific value was absolutely null; but teaching people, as it did, to raise themselves above their natural state, and strive towards the divine, it has had some moral influence.

Embalming, an art peculiar to the Egyptians, was practised by the Hebrews, and is mentioned in the Bible only in the cases of Jacob and Joseph (Gen. 1. 2, 26), both of whom died in Egypt, and were afterwards transferred to Canaan; the former immediately after his death, the latter not until after the lapse of centuries (Exod. xii. 19; Josh. xxiv. 32). According to Herodotus (II., 86), the Egyptians knew three different methods of embalming. After the first, which cost about one talent of silver, the brain was removed through the nostrils, and replaced with drugs. An opening was then cut in the left flank, and the intestines taken out by the hand, placed in a peculiar vessel, and thrown into the river. The cavity was rinsed with palm-wine, and filled with aromatic herbs, after which the opening in the flank was again closed by being sewn up. The corpse thus prepared was then steeped for seventy days in "natron" (according to a recent analysis, sub-carbonate of soda), and swathed in linen bandages smeared with gum. The mummy was finally laid in a coffin of sycamore-wood, which was placed vertically in the tomb. After the second method the intestines were not removed, but by means of cedar-oil, which, introduced into the body, dissolved them. The corpse was then steeped, as usually, in natron. After the third method, the corpse was only rinsed internally by an infusion, and then steeped. The embalming of Jacob's corpse took only forty days; but it appears, from the mummies preserved at Memphis, that a method of embalming was employed there, less complete and less careful than that employed at Theba. In the Christian Church embalming seems to have been used now and then with martyrs and saints, as intimated by Tertullian (Apol., 42); or perhaps this was only an adaptation of the Jewish custom of filling the grave with myrrh and spices (2 Chron. xvi. 14; John xix. 39). Ember Days are the first Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday after the first Sunday in Lent, after Whitsunday, after the 14th of September, after Christmas, and after the 13th of December, which were fixed by the council of Placentia, 1095. Their name is in Latin, Jejunia Quatuor Temporum; in French, Quatre-Temps; in German, Quattember; in Danish, Tamperdag; which seems to indicate pretty plainly the derivation of the English name, though another has been attempted, from the Anglo-Saxon Ymbreu, "a circuit." In the ancient church they were solemnized with fasting, and prayers for God's blessing on the seasons ushered in by them. Afterwards they were fixed by the Roman and the Anglican Church as fixed by the council of Placentia, 1095. said to have been born. In 1708 the first Methodist chapel was built, on the site of the present John-street Church; and upon it he worked as a carpenter. In 1709 the first missionaries sent out by Wesley came to the city, which then had a population of only twenty thousand; and Embury resigned his charge, and went to Camden, near which place (at Ashgrove) he organized a society, and continued his joint work of carpenter and preacher. His remains were thrice interred,—in Camden, Ashgrove, and finally, by order of the Trov Conference, in Woodland Cemetery, Cambridge, N.Y.

EMERSON, Ralph, D.D., b. at Hollis, N.H., Aug. 18, 1757; d. at Rockford, Ill., May 26, 1838. He was graduated at Yale College 1811, and at Andover Seminary 1814, and was professor of ecclesiastical history and pastoral theology in that seminary from 1829 to 1834. Besides a life of his brother, Rev. Joseph Emerson, he translated and annotated the first volume of Wigger's Ausstattung und Paganismus (Andover, 1840), and contributed to various periodicals.

EMMAUS (Hebrew Khammath, "hot spring"). The village, "three furlongs, or sixty stadia (seven miles and a half), from Jerusalem, where Christ revealed himself to the two disciples on the day of his resurrection (Luke xxiv.13). Its site has not yet been satisfactorily determined, although many attempts have been made. It has been identified with (1) Amwas, the Emmaus-Nicopolis mentioned in 1 Macc. iii. 40, 57, ix. 50, where Judas conquered the Greeks. So an old tradition supported by Eusebius and Jerome. The conclusive arguments against this view are that Emmaus-Nicopolis was not sixty, but a hundred and sixty, stadia from Jerusalem, and was not a small village, but a town of some importance. (2) Kubeibet, seven miles north-west of Jerusalem, the last halting-place before reaching that city, in the beautiful Wady Beit Channia. Supported by tradition dating back to the twelfth century, the times of the crusades. So Robinson. See II. ZsCHONKE: Das neueste Emmaus, Schaffhausen, 1865. (3) Khameza, now a ruin. Supported similarity of name, but opposed by distance from Jerusalem, which is at least eight miles and a half in a straight line, and nine miles and a half by road. (4) Beit Mizzez, a ruin a mile north of Kolonieh (Colonia); but it is only forty furlongs from the city. (5) Kolonieh. This was and is still a place of resort by the Jerusalemites. The expression "went into the country" (τις ἐφώσκει, Mark xvi. 12) may be understood of making this usual excursion. Josephus states that Emmaus was colonized by eight hundred of Titus' soldiers, hence the name Colonia; and the Talmud asserts that the willows which adorned the temple at the Feast of Tabernacles were brought from there. These two facts make out a case for Kolonieh. But the distance is too short. See Quarterly Statement of the Pal. Explor. Fund for January (p. 49), July (p. 237, 238), and October (p. 274), 1881.

EMMERAM, HAIMAREM, was twice Bishop of Piotiers in the beginning of the eighth century, but abdicated shortly after in order to go to Pannonia as a missionary to the Pagan Avars. At Radaaapon, the residence of Duke Theodo of Bavaria, he was persuaded to remain for some time, purifying and consolidating the Christian Church in Bavaria. After a stay of three years, he left for Rome, but was overtaken, still on this side of the mountains, by Theodo's son, Lautbert, who had him tied to a ladder, and sawed to pieces joint by joint; the reason being that Lautbert's sister Uta confessed, immediately after the missionary had left, that she was pregnant by him. Just before dying, however, Emmaram explained that he was innocent, that he had allowed Uta to accuse him only in order to save herself, that the guilty man was one Siegbald, etc. When Duke Theodo heard this, he ordered the bones of Emmaram to be gathered, and deposited in a chapel at Aschelum. Another chapel was afterwards built in his honor in Regensburg, and he was made a saint, Sept. 6 being fixed by the Roman-Catholic Church as his day of celebration.

The life of St. Emmaram was written in the second half of the eighth century, by Abbo, Bishop of Freising, and again in 1068 by Arnold of Vochburg, and finally by Meginfrid a short time after. These three biographies are found in Acta Sanctorum, Sept. VI.; CANISIUS: Lectiones Antiquae III.; and FERTZ: Monument., VI. It has proved very difficult, however, to lay bare the historical kernel of the Emmaram legend on account of its chronological absurdities; and it must be added that such a feat, even if it could be done, would probably hardly be worth doing.

EMMONS, Nathanael, D.D., was b. April 20 (O.S.), 1745, in the parish of Millington, in the town of East Haddam, Conn. This town was also the birthplace of the missionary brothers, David and John Brainerd, of President Edward Dorr Griffin, and his brother George D. Griffin, Esq., of the jurist, Jeremiah Gates Brainard, and the poet, James Brainard Taylor. In 1763, at the age of eighteen, he entered Yale College. Here he was a classmate of John Trumbull, the author of McFingall; John Treadwell, governor of Connecticut; and Dr. Samuel Wales, professor of divinity in Yale College. These three and Emmons were the first four scholars of his class, which was contained in each year, and filled up by order of the Troy Conference, in Woodland Cemetery, and was not a small village, but a town of some importance. EMPEROR. bridge, Mass. He was a brother-in-law of Rev. Dr. Spring of Newburyport, Rev. Dr. Austin, President of Burlington College; Rev. Leonard Worcester, Rev. William Riddle. These four Hopkinsian ministers married the daughters of Rev. Dr. Hopkins of Hadley, who himself was not a Hopkinsian.

Dr. Emmons published more than two hundred Articles in various periodicals, such as The Massachusetts Missionary Magazine, The Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, The Utica Christian Repository, The Hopkinsian Magazine, and The Christian Magazine. He also published numerous ordination collected editions of his works. The following are his more important publications: A Dissertation on the Scriptural Qualifications for Admission to the Christian Sacraments, in Answer to Dr. Hemmenway (1783); Candid Reply to Dr. Hemmenway's Remarks on [this] Dissertation (1785); an Essay on Miracles (1786); a Treatise on Emmons (1800); a second volume (1812); a third volume (1813); a fourth volume (1823); a fifth volume (1825); a sixth volume (1826). In 1812 many of his sermons were collected, and published in a uniform edition of six octavo volumes. His son-in-law, Rev. Jacob Ide, D.D., prefixed to this edition a Memoir of Dr. Emmons. In 1850 a seventh volume of his sermons was published. In 1850 and 1861 a new collected edition of his works was published in Boston in six large octavo volumes; and to this edition was prefixed a Memoir containing 489 pages, by E. A. Park of Andover. Theological Seminary.

The house of Dr. Emmons was a theological school. No private instructor in our land has educated so many young men as he for the Christian ministry: the number of them cannot be exactly ascertained, but was probably not less than a hundred. Among his pupils nine became presidents or professors of colleges or theological seminaries, fourteen had an important agency in establishing literary and charitable institutions, forty-six are noticed in the biographical dictionary of eminent men.

Few ministers in the world have devoted themselves so earnestly, patiently, and methodically as Dr. Emmons to their professional work. He preached nearly or quite six thousand times, and spent ten, twelve, or fourteen hours every day in his study, with his pen or book in hand, for more than seventy years. He was temperate, even abstemious, in his diet, regular in his habits, and was a model of punctuality, self-consistency, persevering industry. He combined a sprightly wit with a profound reverence for the truth. His style of thought was precise, definite, sharp. Dr. Leonard Woods of Andover said, "Emmons has one of the grandest understandings ever created." He was an original thinker, and formed his theological system with rare independence of mind. Although a man of study, rather than a "man of affairs," he entered with zeal into several public enterprises. He was one of the fathers of the Massachusetts Missionary Society, and for the first twelve years of its existence was its president. He was one of the original editors of The Massachusetts Missionary Magazine. When the Masonic fraternity was most popular, he was a pronounced anti-Mason. When abolition was most generally condemned, he was an active abolitionist. In politics he was an older ultra-Federalist. His Jeroboam Sermon is a curiosity in politico-homiletical literature.

The theological system of Dr. Emmons is often confused with that of Dr. Samuel Hopkins. The following statement of the two systems was given by Emmons himself, and will explain the difference, as well as the agreement, between the two.

The distinctive tenets of Hopkinsianism are:
1. All real holiness consists in disinterested benevolence; 2. All sin consists in selfishness; 3. There are no promises of regenerating grace made to the doings of the unregenerate; 4. The impotency of sinners with respect to believing in Christ is not natural, but moral; 5. A sinner is required to approve in his heart of the divine conduct, even though it should cast him off forever; 6. God has exercised a manner as he purposed would be followed by the existence of sin; 7. The introduction of moral evil into the universe is so overruled by God as to promote the general good; 8. Repentance is for faith in Christ; 9. Though men became sinners by Adam, according to a divine constitution, yet they have and are accountable for no sins but personal; 10. Though believers are justified through Christ's righteousness, yet his righteousness is not transferred to them.

The distinctive tenets of Emmons's system are:
1. Holiness and sin consist in free, voluntary exercises; 2. Men act freely under the divine agency; 3. The least transgression of the divine law deserves eternal punishment; 4. Right and wrong are founded in the nature of things; 5. God exercises mere grace in pardoning or justifying penitent believers through the atonement of Christ, and mere goodness in rewarding them for their good works; 6. Notwithstanding the total depravity of sinners, God has a right to require them to turn from sin to holiness; 7. Preachers of the gospel ought to exhort sinners to love God, repent of sin, and believe in Christ immediately; 8. Men are active, not passive, in regeneration. Dr. Emmons believed that these eight statements are involved in the system of Dr. Hopkins; that they are evolved from that system, rather than added to it. Still they characterize Emmonism as it is grafted upon Hopkinsianism.

From 1824 to 1833 he was book-agent and editor for the Methodist Church at New York, during which time he paid off all the debts of the book concern, and put it in a far better position than ever before. He also founded the Methodist Quarterly Review; and nearly all the original articles in the first two volumes are from him. In 1832 he was elected a bishop. He was one of the organizers of Dickinson College. He wrote Defense of our Fathers, N.Y., 1824; The Episcopalian Controversy Reviewed, N.Y., 1838. — Robert, son of preceding; b. in Philadelphia, July 29, 1814; d. in Baltimore, May 18, 1845. EMSER, Hieronymus, b. at Ulm in March, 1747; d. at Dresden, Nov. 8, 1827; studied at Tübingen; there, and accompanied Cardinal Raymund of Petrandias as secretary on his tour of visitation through Germany. Raymund was a great collector of relics, and Emser's first work was an essay on crosses said to have fallen down from heaven. After lecturing on humaniores at Erfurt, where he had lectured among his hearers, and editing the works of Picus of Mirandola, he went to Leipzig, where he lectured on canon law, and published some essays on the propriety of toasting each other when drinking (1505), on the improvement of wine, beer, and vinegar (1507), etc., and an apocryphal of Bishop Benno, which has been incorporated with the Acta Sanctorum.

In 1510 he was sent by Duke George of Saxony to Rome to negotiate the canonization of Benno; and on his return he received several rich benefices, and settled at Dresden, where Luther was his guest in 1517. It was already then apparent, however, that, if the case of the reformer should ever become decidedly serious, Emser would not be found on his side; and immediately after the conference of Leipzig a rupture took place between them, and a controversy began, of a character by no means edifying, and without any profit to the cause. Luther called him the goat of Dresden, with reference to his escutcheon, and he called Luther the bull of Wittenberg: that is about all which needs be said of the controversy.

In short, a theory of the Papacy is propounded and the point of unity; but the bishops, as the successors of the apostles, have from Christ received the power of the keys, the right to give laws and to suspend them, etc. Any person living in a diocese is subordinate to the bishop; no recourse can be had to the Pope except through the bishop; the office of the nuncio must be abolished; exemptions cannot be granted only by the bishop; monastic orders in the diocese cannot be governed by a general outside the diocese, etc. In short, a theory of the Papacy is propounded which involves the very cessation of the Papacy, and which only existed in reality before the Papacy itself had ceased. Since the conciliar councils of the fifteenth century, such an attack was never made upon the Papacy by dignitaries of the Church.

In the controversy which now ensued, the Pope took care not to touch the principal question,—whether the conception of the Papacy set forth by... the Punctation was right or wrong. His first step was to order the nuncios to continue their work in accordance with the instructions given. This, however, it was impossible for them to do, as the archbishops opposed them at every point; and it began to look doubtful whether the Pope would not finally be compelled to yield. Then aid came from various sides. The emperor, on receiving the Punctation, advised the archbishops to try to come to a complete understanding with their suffragan bishops and the secular powers of their dioceses. But this the archbishops neglected to do, and the exclusiveness of their proceedings gave umbrage to the bishops. Many bishops believed, and perhaps not altogether without reason, that the real purpose of the Punctation was to transfer the power which had hitherto been exercised by the Pope to the metropolitanians; and they preferred the Pope far away in Rome, to the metropolitanians close at their doors. Thus it came to pass that several German bishops, headed by the Bishop of Spires, declared against the Punctation. A still more effective aid the Pope obtained from the Elector of Bavaria, Charles Theodore. Bavaria did not form a compact diocese, but was in ecclesiastical respects cut up in a number of sections, each section belonging to some foreign dioceses. Discontented with this state of affairs, Charles Theodore had worked hard for the establishment of a nunciature in Munich, and he now supported the nuncio with all his might in the contest with the archbishops. The archbishops were defeated. Finally the union between the archbishops became loosened by the ambiguous behavior of the Archbishop of Mayence. He was a member of the Fürstenbund (Union of Princes) which Friedrich II. had formed in 1785 against Austria; and, as he was an old man, Friedrich was very anxious to have Baron von Dahlberg, who was decidedly in favor of the Fürstenbund, appointed his coadjutor. But this could not be done without the consent of the Pope; and, though no definite results ensued, the union of the archbishops was incapacitated for action. When the case was laid before the diet of Ratisbon (1788), the diet advised the archbishops to seek reconciliation with the Pope, each for himself. The brooding thundersstorm in France, whose first low murmur just now became audible, also acted as a persuasion to drop the question; and the Pope’s answer to the Punctation (November, 1789) was consequently received with a kind of passive and silent acquiescence, though it openly took its stand upon the Isidorean decreals, and flatly denied the justness of any of the remarks of the Punctation. ENCRATITÉS (abstinents) is not the name of any distinct sect, but denotes generally the adherents of a certain false view of asceticism. According to this view, enjoining abstinence from flesh-meat, wine, the marriage-bed, etc., did not originate within the pale of Christianity. It was found a long time before our era, in India, among the Jews (the Essenes), and among the Greeks (the Pythagoreans). When entering the Christian world, it became very popular among the Gnostics; though not all Encratites were Gnostics, or held the Gnostic doctrine of matter as evil and a creation of the evil principle. The most prominent leaders among the Encratites were Tatian, Saturninus, Marcion, Julius Cassianus, and Severus. They used the gospel according to the Egyptians, the Acts of Andrew, John, and Thomas, and other apocryphal writings.

ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF THEOLOGY means, in one sense of the words, simply a dictionary of theological knowledge: in another, it denotes a distinct branch of the theological science itself; that branch, namely, which represents and explains the inner organization of this science, its divisions, and the relation of these divisions, both to each other reciprocally, and to the system as a whole. In this latter sense the name occurs for the first time in S. MURSINNA’s Prime lineæ Encyclopædææ theologicae (Magdeburg, 1784), adopted from the Greek τόμος παπαία (orbus doctrine), which meant, among the ancient Greeks, that course of general instruction which every free boy had to go through before he adopted a special trade or profession. The real development, however, of theological encyclopaedia as a science, is still later, and was due to Schleiermacher. As soon as the church began to develop a theology, there arose, of course, certain ideas about what was necessary for a teacher in the church to know in order to fulfil his duty; and hints were thrown out with respect to the proper way in which to attain this knowledge. Thus CHRYSOSTOM’S De officiis ministrorum, AMBROSIUS’ De doctrina Christiana, etc., may be considered encyclopedias of theology; only it must be noticed that these works have a practical rather than a theoretical character. They teach how to study theology, rather than explain what theology is. They correspond to what we now call methodology; and this character all works of the kind retain, more or less, up to the days of Schleiermacher. Noticeable during the middle ages are the Didascalion of HUGO OF ST. VICTOR (d. 1141), in which the differentiation begins (the first three books being of purely propedaeutic, the last three of marked methodological character), and the De studio theologicouf NICOLAUS OF CLEMANGIS (b. 1380). From the Reformation the theological encyclopedia, like every other branch of theological science, received a new impulse. The Lutheran Church produced, among many other works, the Methodus studii theologicu, by JOHANN GERHARD, Jena, 1617, and, more in harmony with the humanistic tendencies of the age, the German theologian GREGORIO CALIXTUS, Helmstädt, 1628. The Reformed Church produced the Theologia seu de ratione studii theologici, by ANDREAS GERHARD (Hyperius), Marburg, 1572, in which the quadripartite division of theology into exegetical, dogmatical, historical, and practical theology occurs for the first time; and the Academy of Saumur, corresponding in the Reformed Church to the University of Leiden, the essays of Stephan Gassen, De studiis theologicis ratione, De natura theologiae, etc. The Roman-Catholic Church also showed signs of life. Possessinus' Bibliotheca selecta de ratione studiorum (Cologne, 1607) is merely an instance of modern scholasticism; but the Méthode pour étudier la théologie, by L. Ellis du Fin (1716), is a meritorious work, and was translated into several foreign languages.

A new epoch in the history of the theological encyclopedia, by which this branch of theological science really became a science itself, was ushered in by Schleiermacher's Darstellung des theologischen Studiums zum Behufe einleitender Vorlesungen, Berlin, 1811. An exposition of the internal organization of the theological system is here attempted and achieved for the first time. A tripartite division into philosophical, historical and practical theology, is employed. But the philosophical theology comprises only apologetics and polemics; while dogmatics, as well as exegesis, belong to historical theology. That part of the book, however, which most strikingly shows the author's powerful grasp of his subject, is the section on practical theology, considered under the double view of church-government and church-service. At its first appearance this book seemed not to have attracted any particular attention; but, after the appearance of its second edition in 1830, the strong influence which it had exercised soon became evident. In 1831 appeared the Encyclopædie der theologischen Wissenschaften, by K. Rosenkranz, completely under the influence of the Hegelian philosophy; in 1833, the Encyclopädie und Methodologie der theologischen Wissenschaften, by K. R. Hagenbach [10th ed., edited by Kautsch, 1880]; in 1837, the Encyclopädie und Methode, by G. C. A. Harless, etc. The influence of Schleiermacher's work is felt also in the Reformed Church. J. G. ENCYCLOPÉDIST is the name generally given to the editors of and contributors to the Encyclopédie ou Dictionnaire raisonné des Sciences, des Arts et des Métiers, which appeared in Paris, 1751–64, in 21 vols. fol. This work, so famous on account of the extraordinary influence which it exercised on its age, was edited by Diderot, and, for its mathematical and physical articles, by D'Alembert. Among its contributors were Rousseau, Voltaire, Euler, Buffon, Haller, Marmontel, Montesquieu, D'Anville, Helvétius, Sulzer, Turgot, etc. Its religious, theological, and ecclesiastical articles were mostly written by Abbé Malébranche, a professor in the Collège de France, and a great friend of the Encyclopédistes, who later became a cardinal. But this is a mistake. Though the article on the Jesuits is written with great gusto for scandals, and though the article on the Pope vindicates the Gallican views of the episcopacy, the work as a whole is confidedly Roman Catholic, and the Reformation, with all that belongs to it, is treated in a supercilious manner as a vicious innovation; to which must be added that there is hardly any Christian dogma which is not accepted and defended,—such as those of the trinity, of inspiration, of the atonement, etc. But (and this is characteristic of the book) the reasons for the acceptance of the Christian dogmas are generally of such a quality that a flat rejection, for no reason whatever, could not have made the matter worse. Theism is preferred to atheism, because it is better for the development of human happiness than to reject the idea of the existence of God. Christ is the first and foremost of all religious founders, because he revealed the best and highest morality, etc.

By this pernicious acquiescence in something which it felt itself too weak to overpower, the book presented itself to the eyes of a godless and religiously indifferent age as the soundest and wisest compromise with an existing superstition, and obtained freedom to preach its sensualistic philosophy, which sooner or later would surely extinguish said superstition. The philosophical programme of the book—that is, its intellectual and moral stand-point—is set forth in the preface, written by D'Alembert; and there is really no contradiction between the sensualism and eudaemonism of the preface, and the choice reasons on which the Roman-Catholic Church are accepted and defended in the book.

ENERGUMENS (ἐνεργομένου, "possessed by an evil spirit"); cf. Eph. ii. 2, ἐνεργοῦσα). Were those in the early church who were, according to popular belief, plagued by demons, but who in our day would be simply called "insane." They were not permitted to enter the church if they were violent, but commanded to stand in the porch, so that they could hear the singing and prayers; and with them might be found lepers, and persons of offensive lives (see Hefele, Concilienge schichte, vol. i. § 16, see Can. 17). After the prayers they came in to receive the blessing of the bishop (see Constt. Apost., viii. 6, 7, 32); but, if they were quiet, they were allowed in the church, yet separated from the catechumens, and listened to the sermon. They were also called Exorcists. Among the contributors to Diderot's work were men who, by the storms and billows of uncontrollable impulse, and not because they were "exposed to the inclemency of cold or rain," as many have explained it. The exorcists daily brought them food, laid their hands upon them, and prayed for them. After their recovery they kept a twenty to forty days' fast, then partook of the sacrament; a particular prayer was made for them by the priest, and their names were entered upon the church-records, with especial mention of their recovery. See the excellent art., Entdeckung, in Kraus: Real-Encyklopädie.

Engedi (the fountain of the kid), the present Ain Jidy, a small town about one mile from the western shore of the Dead Sea, at the foot of the mountains of Judaea, between three hundred and thirty and five hundred feet above the level of the Dead Sea, and about twelve hundred feet below the summit of the cliffs; received its name from the neighboring thermal springs, and is known to history as David's hiding-place from Saul (1 Sam. xxiii. 29, xxiv. 1-4).

Engelbrecht, Hans, b. at Brunswick, 1599; d. there 1644; was the son of a tailor, and a weaver by trade, but suffered from infancy so much from bodily illness, that he became very melancholy, and at times was oscillating between suicide and lunacy. In his twenty-second year he began to be haunted by religious inspirations, and revelations, which he expounded before admiring crowds, generally to the great disgust of the clergy. Expelled from Brunswick, he roved about in Northern Germany, and was for some time imprisoned in Hamburg; but he finally returned to his native city, and died there in loneliness and seclusion. He wrote several pamphlets about his revelations, which appeared in a collected edition in a Dutch translation in 1697. See Rehtmeier: Braunschw. Kirchengesch. IV. 6. HERZOG.

Engelhardt, Johann Georg Veit, b. at Neustadt-on-the-Aisch, Nov. 12, 1791; d. at Erlangen, Sept. 13, 1855; studied at Erlangen, and was appointed professor at the gymnasium there (1817), and professor of theology in the university (1821). Besides a number of dissertations on the church fathers and the mystics, he wrote a Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte in 4 vols., Erlangen, 1833-34, and a Dogmengeschichte in 2 vols., Neustadt-on-the-Aisch, 1839.

England, Church of, is the established National Church of England, and adopts as its creed the Thirty-nine Articles, together with the Book of Common Prayer. In its autonomous organization it is, like the other churches of the Continent; but under his successors, able ecclesiastics asserted and won the independence of the Church. Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, bury (1070–89), secured the institution of special ecclesiastical courts, in which all ecclesiastical causes were tried. The learned and pious Anselm (1033–1109), obliged the crown to relinquish its ancient custom of investing the new bishops with ring and crosier, and vindicated the dangerous precedent, that appeals should be made to Rome. Another great archbishop, Thomas Becket (1120–70), associated with Henry II. who sought to reform the abuses growing out of clerical exemption from civil jurisdiction. The churchman was murdered, but victory did not rest with the king. It still remained for the State as a national body to come into subjection to the ecclesiastical power of Rome. This was accomplished under the most depraved, but, according to Green, the ablest, of the Angevin kings, John. For daring to resist the wishes of the papal see, his realm was placed under interdict by Innocent III. (1206). John finally submitted (a submission which was no more ignominious than it was politic), and accepted Stephen Langton (1207–28), the papal appointee, as primate.

The Church passed into a state of lethargy, and the clergy into official carelessness and personal corruption. The earnest and plain preaching of the Dominicans (1216) and Franciscans (1224) aroused the laity for a time; but, becoming fat with lands, they lost their hold on the popular mind. Here and there a great bishop, like Grosseteste of Lincoln, 1235–53 (see Grosseteste), lifts up his voice boldly against the corruption of the clergy, dares to resist the Pope's assumption to force appointments within his diocese, and insists upon the authority and preaching of the Scriptures. The State is not completely paralysed, and seeks to meet the ecclesiastical abuses with remedial legislation. Two great acts stand out as protests against them. The statute of mortmain (1279) forbade the alienation of lands to religious corporations in such wise as to be exempt from taxation. The statute of premonitory (Richard II.) made a royal license necessary to the validity within the realm of papal appointments and bulls. Neither of these acts accomplished much. At the time, but the latter was used effectively by Henry VIII. Finally protests from the people and clergy themselves were beginning to be spoken. John Wyclif (1328–84), the "morning star of the Reformation," translated the Scriptures, and asserted the rights of conscience. William Longland, without Erasmus' scholarship, but in a more popular and earnest vein than he, sang rhymes ridiculing the friars. The Lollards were so numerous, that, according to the chronicler Knighton, every other person on the road was one. The indistinct mutterings of the Reformation were heard, and although many were disinterred, and scattered in the Swift, and the Church slumbered on for more than a century longer, the great movement finally came out of which Christianity in England, crystallized in the Church of England, started forward on a new career of life and achievement.

II. History since the Reformation. — The Church of England dates its existence as a national body, independent of the papal see, from the passage of the Act of Supremacy (1534), and received its distinctive doctrinal character at the adoption of the Forty-two Articles in the reign of Edward VI. (subsequently reduced to thirty-nine under Elizabeth), and the approval of the Book of Common Prayer. In the controversy over ecclesiastical corruption, and the reform of the papal appointee, as primate.

The Church entered upon clerical abuses, the independence of thought, and the support of the Reformation movement in England that inspired the Reformation on the Continent. However, the movement in England had its own salient and distinguishing features. It preserved in unabridged form the ecclesiastical orders and succession of the Catholic Church, many of the bishops identifying themselves with it. But it did not in the first instance owe its origin to a pure motive to remedy ecclesiastical abuses, and correct doctrinal errors. The glorious character of some of its early history, as Canon Perry says, cannot be denied. Yet some of the reformers of England, like Ridley and Latimer, were men of the most fervent piety and lofty devotion; and its first annals describe the heroic constancy of a noble galaxy of martyrs who sacrificed their lives for their mission. Circumstances had been preparing the way for the Reformation in England. The signs of the times in the early part of the sixteenth century indicated a mighty movement of men's minds in England as well as on the Continent. The revival of classical learning and such names as Erasmus, Colet, and Thomas More, the bold satire upon clerical abuses, the independence of thought (e.g., Erasmus' appeal to the Greek New Testament in the preface of his edition, Basel, 1516, and More's dreams of improvements in Church and State in his Utopia), the translation of the New Testament by Tyndale (1520), and its circulation in spite of public burnings and private espionage, were amongst the signs. Luther's mighty words from across the sea, arraigning the papal dominion as the Babylonish captivity of the Church (1520), found an eager audience in England, which the public conflagration of his tracts by Wolsey (1521) could not quiet. But these were only the signs and forerunners of the Reformation: they did not accomplish it. The rupture from Rome in England was not, in the first instance, the product of the protest of religious principle against ecclesiastical abuse, however widespread the prevalent Reformation sentiments were among all classes: it was a political necessity to which Henry VIII. resorted in order to accomplish and to justify his divorce from Catherine, and marriage with Anne Boleyn. In 1581 Henry arraigned the clergy of a violation of premonitory for being accomplices with Cardinal Wolsey, who had exercised legitmate functions without the royal consent. The two convocations compounded by the payment of a hundred and eighteen thousand pounds. But the king, not satisfied with this evidence of a submissiveness to temper demanded that he should be recognized as "chief protector, the only supreme lord and head of the Church and clergy in England." The Convocation of Canterbury accepted the title, only adding the limiting clause, "So far as the law of Christ will allow." In 1533 a parliamentary statute forbad all ecclesiastical appeals beyond the kingdom. The year following, actuated thereto by the Pope's command to take back Catherine, Henry secured the passage of the Act of Supremacy, by which the English sovereign became, without limitation, "the only supreme head in earth of the Church of England."
called the ‘Anglicana Ecclesia.’” This statute made all papal appointments within the realm illegal, and vested in the crown unlimited authority to reform and redress ecclesiastical abuses. The Church in England was thus severed from the papal communion, and constituted an independent body. It was not long before the king made a bold use of his new authority by abolishing the monastic establishments, and confiscating them, amounting to thirty-eight million pounds (1536–39).

But a thorough doctrinal reformation was not among the purposes of Henry. With the Continental Reformation he had little or no sympathy. The ten articles adopted by convocation in 1536 retained the doctrine of the real presence, the use of images, prayer to saints, purgatory, and auricular confession, and only divested these practices of some of the grosser superstitions. The king seemed to take higher ground when he gave his sanction to the translation of the Scriptures known as the Great Bible (1539). But all hopes of a thorough doctrinal reformation were doomed to disappointment. The six so-called “Bloody Articles” of 1539 denounced all denial of transubstantiation as heresy, and declared strongly in favor of auricular confession, the celibacy of the clergy, and the sacrifice of private masses. Henry had done his work. He was no reformer from principle; but Providence had used him to assert the independence of the Church of England, and to break the spell of tradition.

Under Edward VI. the doctrinal reformation was accomplished. The six articles were repealed, and the sympathy with the Continental reformers shown in the call of Bucer and Fagius to Cambridge, and Peter Martyr and Ochino to Oxford. A Prayer-Book was issued in 1549, and a second three years afterwards. The Forty-two Articles were drawn up in 1552. They state, in general, that “the Church of Rome hath erred not only in its living and manner of ceremonies, but also in matters of faith” (xix.). They expressly denied transubstantiation, admitted the marriage of the clergy, discontinued auricular confession, approved of the use of the Lord’s Table, and their adoption the formative period of the Church of England closes. The reign of Mary (1553–58) checked the Reformation for the moment, but did not crush it. Hooper, Latimer, Ridley, Cranmer, were brought to the stake, and many refugees fled to the Continent in Mary’s reign returned strongly prejudiced against an elaborate ritual, and in favor of the Genevan form of government. Cartwright, Margaret Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, was the ablest exponent of these views (1570). There was no uniformity practised in the conduct of public services and the dress of the clergy. Hooper, Bishop of Gloucester, who died at the stake (1555), for a long time refused to be consecrated, from conscientious scruples against the usual episcopal habits; and only divested these

With Elizabeth, Protestantism was restored, and — in spite of occasional resistance from within, the Spanish Armada and papal deposition from without (1570) — became the permanent religion of the large majority in the land. Two periods stand out in the history of the Church under Elizabeth. In the early part of the reign the divorce of the National Church from the Roman-Catholic see was consummated; in the latter part its position was clearly stated in regard to Puritanism, which demanded recognition, if not supremacy, within its pale. The queen was no zealous reformer, but directed the affairs of the Church with the keen sagacity of a statesmanship which placed national unity and the peace of the realm above every other consideration. In the first year of her reign the Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity were passed. By the former, all allegiance to foreign princes was forbidden; by the latter, the use of the liturgy enforced. The royal title of “Defender of the Faith and Supreme Head of the Church” was retained, with the slight alteration of “Head” to “Governor.” But the passage was struck out of the Litany which read, “From the tyranny of the Bishop of Rome in points of ritual, Elizabeth did not interfere by any public measures with the results of the Reformation of Edward VI. The reduction of the Forty-two Articles to thirty-nine (1559), the form which they have ever since retained, did not impair their Protestant character.

The independence of the National Church being thus permanently settled, it only remained to settle disputes within her own pale. The great question was, whether Puritanism should be tolerated. This was a question not of doctrine, divine sovereignty, and predestination; for the prevailing doctrinal views were Calvinistic, and all of Elizabeth’s bishops, almost without an exception, were Calvinists. It was a question of ecclesiastical polity and ritual. Many of the refugees who had fled to the Continent in Mary’s reign returned strongly prejudiced against an elaborate ritual, and in favor of the Genevan form of government. Cartwright, Margaret Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, was the ablest exponent of these views (1570). The early years of the English Reformation were characterized by a contest between Catholics and Protestants. The Church of England was established by the Act of Supremacy (1534), which declared the King Supreme Head of the Church in England. The Act of Uniformity (1559) further enforced uniformity in religious practices. The Thirty-Nine Articles of 1563 defined the Church's doctrine and practice. The Vale of Health Act (1571) made the consumption of alcohol illegal. The Test Acts of 1673 and 1677 barred Puritans from holding public office. The Test Act of 1673 was repealed in 1701.

The history of the seventeenth century is marked by the consolidation of the Church in England. The principle of the Church of England was that the state and church were separate. The Church of England was governed by a synod of bishops, and the king was the supreme head. The Thirty-Nine Articles of 1563 were adopted as the basis of the Church's faith and practice. The Church was organized into dioceses, each governed by a bishop. The Church was divided into High Church and Low Church factions. The High Church faction believed in a strong hierarchy and the authority of the Pope. The Low Church faction believed in a simpler, more direct form of worship.

The controversy was closed in 1593 by an act of parliament, the Act of Uniformity, which required the use of the Book of Common Prayer. The Act of Uniformity was followed by the Act of Supremacy, which declared the king supreme head of the Church. The Act of Uniformity was repealed in 1662, but the Church of England was still the national church of England. The Church was governed by a council of bishops, and the king was the supreme head. The Church was divided into dioceses, each governed by a bishop. The Church was organized into parishes, each governed by a rector or vicar. The Church was divided into High Church and Low Church factions. The High Church faction believed in a strong hierarchy and the authority of the Pope. rights, a movement in the interest of deeper piety, more aggressive effort, churchly zeal, and church authority, was spreading at Oxford (1838). Dr. Pusey was the moral, Dr. Newman the intellectual leader, and the saintly Keble the poet, of this movement. It led to a new investigation of the claims of the Catholic Church; and, before a decade had passed, the Church received a blow, from which, Lord Beaconsfield said a few years ago, it "still continues to reel." John Henry Newman, Edward Manning, Frederick W. Faber, and others of her ablest men of the clergy and nobility, went over to the Roman-Catholic communion.

The present state of opinion in the Church is classified under three heads. The High-Church party lays emphasis upon the exclusive right of episcopacy and apostolical succession, and practices an advanced ritual. The extreme wing, known as the Ritualists, has introduced practices which the Reformers regarded as papistical, such as the elevation of the host, auricular confession, the burning of candles, etc. Some of their number go even so far as to declare the Reformation to have been a mistake and a misfortune. They display great zeal and devotion in benevolent church-work. Occupying opposite ground is the Low-Church party, which holds strictly to the natural interpretation of the Thirty-nine Articles, denies episcopacy to be of the essence of the Church, and renounces so-called ritualistic practices. Between these two schools a third has grown up within the last fifty years. Its combination of tolerant sympathies with loyalty to the Church has secured for it the name of the Broad-Church party. Among its more prominent representatives have been Arnold, Julius Hare, Maurice, Kingsley, and Stanley. During the century the vigorous life of the Church has been further shown by the restoration of cathedrals, and construction of churches, in the creation of new episcopal sees at home, — Truro, St. Albans (1877), and Liverpool (1880), — and the rapid extension of the Church and Episcopate in the Colonies. At no time in its history has it been stronger and more vigorous than now, more alive with theological discussion and achievement, more competent to cope with infidelity, more solicitous to relieve the poor and fallen, more munificent in its gifts for the conversion of the heathen, or more adapted to secure the esteem, and win the respect, of the Anglo-Saxon people on the island of Latimer and Ridley, as well as far beyond the seas, in the United States and Australia and India.

III. Theology and Worship. — The doctrinal standards of the Anglican Church are the Thirty-nine Articles and the Book of Common Prayer. To these may be added the Catechism and the two Books of Homilies issued in the reign of Edward VI., and sanctioned by the Thirty-nine Articles. Within the pale of the Church the most divergent views have prevailed concerning its doctrinal status. On the one hand it has been represented as strongly Calvinistic, both in respect to the sacraments and to the decrees: on the other, theologians, — such as Dr. Newman (before his transition to Rome), the late Dr. Forbes, Bishop of Brechin, Dr. Pusey (Eirenicon), and others, — minimizing the Protestantism of its standards, hold that nothing is taught in the Thirty-nine Articles which cannot be harmonized with the Tridentine decrees. An unprejudiced study of the plain and natural meaning of the language, without any inferences from what is left unsaid, will force upon us the conclusion that the Anglican standards teach a moderate Calvinism, and are, in the main, in sympathy with the Protestant Reformation of the Continent. The sole and supreme authority of the Scriptures is emphasized, as also justification by faith; Art. xi. reading, "Wherefore that we are justified by faith only is a most wholesome doctrine," etc. Original or birth sin is the corruption of nature of every descendant of Adam; and predestination is God's everlasting purpose to redeem "those whom he hath chosen in Christ out of mankind" (Art. xvii.). The erroneous doctrines of purgatory, the mass, celibacy, etc., are specifically denounced. The teaching concerning the Lord's Supper is plainly against transubstantiation, which in Art. xxviii. is declared to be "repugnant to the plain words of Scripture," the "body of Christ being given, taken, and eaten only after an heavenly and spiritual manner." Art. xxvii. can hardly be pressed to favor the theory of baptismal regeneration. But the case is different in the service of baptism in the Prayer-Book. After the child has been baptized, the minister says, "Seeing now . . . that this child is regenerate, and grafted into the body of Christ," etc. And again, after repeating the Lord's Prayer, he gives thanks to the heavenly Father for regenerating the infant, etc. These words interpreted naturally teach baptismal regeneration; but they are frequently explained as being used only in a hypothetical sense. For a fuller statement under this head, see Articles Thirty-nine.

The worship of the Church of England is liturgical, and regulated by the Book of Common Prayer, one of the most precious legacies of the Protestant Reformation. Its beautiful forms of service, and its numerous and variable prayers, are not only among the choicest specimens of English, but exert an influence on the ear and heart of those who use them which nothing else can replace. The rubrics (so called from having been printed in red ink) give directions for the small details of the service. The sabbath services consist of prayers, lessons from the Scriptures, responsive reading of the Psalms, chants, hymns, the offertory, and the sermon. The form and matter of the service of baptism, communion, marriage, and other services, are all prescribed. The inconveniences of this method are not to be overlooked, by which all departure from the fixed form is forbidden. An illustration is found in the service of burial. In all cases, over the most notorious sinner, as well as the pious churchman, the same consolatory passages (1 Cor. xv., etc.) are read, and the same prayers offered. But, on the other hand, there are the innumerable advantages which it would be hard to deny. See, on this subject, art. Liturgy.

IV. The Clergy and Clerical Patronage. — The clergy consists of three orders, — deacons, priests (presbyters), and bishops. The canonical age is respectively twenty-three, twenty-four, and thirty. The duties of the deacon are to render assistance to the priest in the services of the sanctuary and in pastoral work. He may preach, read the prayers and Scripture-lessons, assist in the distribution of the elements at communion, and administer baptism. In his ordination he assents to the Thirty-nine Articles and the constitution of the Episcopal Church as agreeable with the word of God. The priest serves at the altar, and confirms the children of God. At his ordination the bishop pronounces upon him the words, “Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a priest in the Church of God,” etc. This is interpreted to be a petition for the anointing of the Holy Spirit, or to mark the transmission of a heavenly grace through the bishop, according to the different standpoint of the interpreter.

The bishop has the exclusive right of ordination, confirmation, or admitting members to the Lord’s table, and the consecration of churches. Bishops have charge of cathedral position may hold besides only one incumbent; and, in the event of a disagreement between patron and bishop, the case is decided by the Court of Arches. The people have no voice in the choice of their rector; but the rector, once instituted, has absolute control of his church, so that not even the bishop may enter it without his consent. Many of the parishes have endowments in lands: others are supported, in whole or in part, from public funds, such as Queen Anne’s Bounty. The system of patronage has led to very little ability or small interest in the spiritual welfare of the people. The Plurality system, by which a clergyman might hold any number of livings at the same time, and which was so much abused in the latter part of the last century, has been modified by parliamentary legislation. Under the present law no one can hold two cathedral positions at the same time. The holder of a cathedral position may hold besides only one parish. A clergyman may hold two parishes; but, if the one numbers three thousand souls, the other may not include more than five hundred. The evils of non-residence have likewise been restrained by law. The yearly income of the Church of England amounts to at least eight million pounds. The income of the Archbishop of Canterbury is fifteen thousand pounds; of York, ten thousand pounds; of London, ten thousand; of Durham, eight thousand pounds. The lowest income is that of the Bishop of Sodor and Man, which amounts to two thousand pounds. The average income of a dean is one thousand pounds. The incomes of the clergy are from one hundred and fifty pounds upward. A fund managed by the so-called “Ecclesiastical Commission,” and supplied by the revenues of suppressed canories, sinecures, and the surplus revenues of bishoprics over and above the episcopal salary, is used for the augmentation of bishoprics, the increase of the smaller salaries, the endowment of new ministers, etc. This commission was constituted in 1835.

V. Church Polity. — The Church or spirituality of England is one of the estates of the realm. Its relation to the State is one of dependence, the Sovereign being its supreme governor, and Parliament its highest legislature. The Archbishop of Canterbury is the first peer in the realm, and crowns the king. The bishops have their “palaces,” and seats in the House of Lords, except the Bishops of Sodor and Man, Liverpool, Truro, and St. Albans. The Church does not legislate for itself independently or directly: it is subject to Parliament.

The Convocations of Canterbury and York are the two highest official church bodies. Constituted by Edward I., they enjoyed independent rights of ecclesiastical legislation until 1532, when, by the Submission of the Clergy, they became subject to the king. In 1717 the Convocation of Canterbury was dissolved by George I., for the supposed unfaithfulness of the lower house to the House of Hanover, who was not revived till 1852, and did not receive the royal license to proceed to business till 1861. These convocations consist of two houses. Over the upper, consisting of the bishops, the archbishop presides. The lower house, whose presiding officer is called prolocutor, is made up of the archdeacons, deans, and representatives of the lower clergy. The laity have no representation. In the Convocation of York the distinction between the two houses is only made on occasions of actual transaction of business. The archbishops have the right of veto upon all measures. Convocation is assembled by the king’s writ, and cannot proceed to make new canons without his license, nor have its decisions validity till confirmed by his sanction.

The judicial business is transacted in three courts. The lowest is the Diocesan Consistory Court, presided over by the bishop’s chancellor.Appealed cases go up to the Court of Arches, the official head of which is styled Dean of the Arches. The last tribunal of appeal is the king in council. There are three church censures—suspension (for the neglect of parish duties), deprivation, and degradation. The two latter follow upon the disuse of the Prayer-Book, teachings subversive of the Thirty-nine Articles, simony, or conviction in a civil court. The Court of Arches alone exercises the right of deprivation.

1. Anglo-Saxon. —

The Durham Book, however, is ascribed to the priest Aldred, eighth or ninth century.

2. Wiclifite. — Prior to Wiclif we have the Oromlum, so called from its author,Orm or Orm, an English monk who lived in or about the twelfth century, and was warden of Baliol Hall, rector of Fylingham, and warden of Canterbury Hall (1361–65), royal crown with the prebend of Aust and the rectory of Lutterworth in Leicestershire, which he held until his death (1384). The generally received statement, that it was only during the last ten years of his life that he was engaged upon the translation of the Scriptures, lacks proof; and it is safer to hold, with Baber, that he bestowed upon that great work a much longer period. His translation of the Bible is the first published translation, which important work must have been unremitted in its zeal to diffuse it among the people; and the proof is furnished in the fact, that, in spite of the prohibition of 1408, numerous copies of it have come down to us. His version was made from the Vulgate; i.e., from Jerome's version, or such copies as passed for it. The portion from Genesis to Baruch iii. 20 was made by Nicholas de Hereford, an English ecclesiastic: the balance of the Old Testament and of the Apocrypha, as well as the whole of the New Testament, are ascribed to Wiclif. The original text of the version was completed about 1380; the revision of it by Richard Purvey was finished about 1388. It may be considered certain that Hereford did not translate from the Latin alone, but used the French translation, from which the new idiom introduced is clearly taken. The New Testament of Wiclif was made from the Latin and Anglo-Saxon, and is rather literal; the revision by Purvey is a more polished, though quaint. The peculiar strength of the Authorised Version is of Wiclifite origin. In the absence of illustrations, for which no space can be found, a few examples of curious renderings may be given (Matt. v. 22, "fy" or "fogh" for "raca," Luke xvi. 13, "bishop" for "high priest"), as well as of explanatory glosses, now more obscure than the word to be explained; e.g., yvel fame, schendeschephe; incorruptible, that may not dye ne ben pegred; justified, founden tree; acception of persons, that is put oon before another that is withouen deserte. Of obsolete words employed, the following are samples: tendih, kindleth; anenits, with; unbelief, unbelieving; leende, loins; herhore, lodging; mawmetis, idols; haburioun, breastplate; arettel, imputed; thike, the same; site, ascend; seney, mustard; culueris, doves; chepynge, market; evene, fellow.

3. Tyndale.—William Tyndale b. in Gloucestershire, 1471; went to Oxford about 1500; took his degrees at Magdalen Hall; began the translation of the New Testament from the Greek as early as 1502; but upon his removal to London in 1522 met with so little encouragement there for the accomplishment of his purpose, and on account of his evangelical sentiments became so obnoxious to the clergy, that he left for the Continent, where he translated the New Testament (1524–25) from the Greek, strongly but legitimately influenced by Luther's Version. He proceeded to Cologne, and was carrying his quarto edition through the press, when, in consequence of the opposition of the local authorities, and the interference of the chaplain, and commissioned by Bruges (1374); on his return to England he was presented by the crown with the prebend of Aust and the rectory of Lutterworth in Leicestershire, which he held until his death (1384). The generally received statement, that it was only during the last ten years of his life that he was engaged upon the translation of the Scriptures, lacks proof; and it is safer to hold, with Baber, that he bestowed upon that great work a much longer period. His fixed: the strongest probability points to Wittenberg. But the writer of this article feels warranted to announce the established facts, that the Pentateuch was not printed at Marburg, that Hans Luft never had a printing-press in that place, and that neither Tyndale nor Fryth ever were at Marburg. These conclusions, published by the author Dec. 10, 1851, have since been fully confirmed by Professor Dr. Julius Caesar, the librarian of the University of Marburg, and are stated at length in his forthcoming volume on the English versions. — The numerous surreptitious editions of Tyndale's New Testament cannot be noticed here. The Pentateuch was published in 1530, the Book of Jonah in 1531. There is evidence that Tyndale translated, though he did not live to publish, other portions of the Old Testament from the Hebrew, most probably to the end of Second Chronicles, and several of the prophetical books. The translation of the Old Testament was his occupation in the gloomy prison of Vilvorde, where he was confined from Mar. 14, 1531, till Oct. 6, 1535, on which day he suffered martydom, having been first strangled, and then burned. — Tyndale's translation is the first English version made from the original tongues. His helps were very meagre; and although he used the Vulgate, Wiclif, and Luther, he is thoroughly independent. His English is noble, and his phraseology Saxon, his idiom singularly pure; and much of his version remains unchanged in the Authorized Version, of which it is really the original basis. Samples of his felicitous renderings are: (Matt. xiv. 14) "his heart did melt upon them;" (xx. 37) "the whelps eat of the crumb;" (xxiv. 11) "iniquity shall have the upper hand;" (Mark viii. 29) "thou art very Christ;" (Luke xxi. 1) "the feast of sweet bread drew nigh, which is called Easter;" (John ii. 7) "filled them up to the sea;" (Acts xiv. 13) "brought oxen and garlands unto the church porch." — The numerous editions of Tyndale's New Testament cannot be noticed here beyond saying that that of 1525 is the first; and of 1534—35, with the monogram G. H. on the second title, the last. (See Fry's Collation of Three New Testaments of William Tyndale, etc., and Biographical Description of Tyndale's New Testaments, and of two editions of the Bishops' Version, London, 1879.)

4. Coverdale's. — Miles Coverdale, b. about 1488 at Coverdale, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, was educated at Cambridge, and priested by John, Bishop of Chalcedon, at Norwich, in 1514. He fled to the Continent; but his meeting with Tyndale is purely conjectural, and his having assisted him in the translation of the Scriptures not only improbable, but absurd; for he was not an independent scholar, and his moderate proficiency in the tongues the accretion of a later period. Where he was from 1528 to 1535 is not positively known. At the instance of Cromwell he took in hand the translation of the Bible; and, as he was unquestionably an excellent German scholar, his proficiency in German explains, as the nature of its execution sustains, the honest titlepage of his first edition of the Bible (printed most probably by Frosocher at Zurich, 1535); viz., Biblia — the Bible: that is, the Holy Scripture of the Olde and Newe Testament, faithfully and truly translated of Deuchche and Latyn into Englishe, MDXXXVII. The "Douche" undoubtedly signifies "German," and the German versions he used were Luther's and the Zurich, perhaps also the Worms editions. The Latin versions he used were the Vulgate and that of Pagninus; and the published portions of Tyndale were the basis of his English translation. The Old Testament from Second Chronicles onward is Coverdale's own work; that is, it is a translation of Luther's and the Zurich versions, and a very servile one. His Diglott New Testament (exhibiting the English and the Vulgate in parallel columns) appeared in three editions (1538) translated by Thomas Rogers, and corrected by Andrewe Hester in 1550, and by R. Jugge in 1553. The part Coverdale had in the production of the Great Bible is noticed below. Coverdale's Version, though a second-hand production, has the merit of a pure and strong idiom: it is the basis of the version of the Psalter in the Book of Common Prayer. His language and his renderings are very musical; e.g., (Ps. xc. 10) "The days of our age are threescore years and ten;" (Isa. xlviii. 19) "Thy seed shall be like as the sand in the sea, and the fruit of thy body like the gravel-stones thereof; thy name shall not be rooted out, nor destroyed before me." He is also very quaint; e.g., (Job xix. 18) "Yea, the very desert fools despise me;" (Prov. xvi. 28) "he that is a blabbe of his tongue maketh division;" (Jer. xvii. 1) "graven upon the edge of your altar with a pen of iron and with an adamant claw;" (Col. ii. 10) "Let no man make you shoot at a wrong mark, which after his own choosing walketh in humbleness and spirituality of angels, things which he never saw."

5. Matthew's. — The name of Thomas Matthew is an alias of John Rogers, who was Dean of Deritend (in Birmingham); educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge (B.A., 1552); transferred to Cardinal College, Oxford, where he took orders the same year. He was next rector of Holy Trinity, London (1592), and accepted the chaplaincy at Antwerp, probably in 1594; there he became acquainted with Tyndale, and subsequently his literary executor. He published (where is not known, but most probably at Wittenberg) a folio edition of the Bible, entitled The Bible, which is all the Holy Scriptures, in which are contayned the Olde and Newe Testaments, truely and purely translated into English, by Thomas Matthew. Esaye I, Hearcken to, ye heavens, and thou earth, peace eare: for the Lorde speaketh. MDXXXVII. This folio is a composite volume, and its critical analysis shows that the Pentateuch, and the portion from Joshua to Second Chronicles, as well as the whole of the New Testament, are Tyndale's translation: the remainder is Coverdale's. Rogers, however, did not merely put together these materials, but very skilfully edited and revised them. He added very valuble prefatory matter, especially the "Summe and content of all the Holy Scripture, both of the Olde and the Newe Testament," and "A Table of the pryncipall matters conteyned in the Byble, in which the readers may fynde and practyse many commune places," filling twenty-six folio pages, and constituting a sort of concordance and dictionary. It is chiefly taken from the French Bible. He likewise added several alternate renderings in his notes, introduced by the formula, "Some reade." He placed the contents or summaries before each chapter, and the notes at the end. His notes are diversified (textual, doctrinal, polemical, and practical), and form almost a running commentary. They are of various origin: many are taken from Pellicanus, and quite a number are original. His anti-papal notes are very striking: that on Matt. xvi. ("I say unto thee that thou art Peter, and upon this rock," etc.) reads, "That is, as saith St. Austin, upon the confession which thou hast made, knowlingly, I say to thee, Christ, the Son of the living God, I will build my congregation or Church;" that on xxv. ("And the wise answered, Not so, lest I will build my congregation or Church; " that on xxv. 35) reads, "That is, as saith St. Austin, "That is, as saith St. Austin, theew preparest a table before me against mine enemies: 1 thou anointest my head with oil, and fillest my cuppe full;" (i. 29 (TYNDALE), "Thou shalt prepare a table before me against them that trouble me;" (GREAT BIBLE, 1539) "Thou shalt prepare a table before me against them that trouble me," (GREAT BIBLE, 1539) "ye know therefore" (scita iijurut); iii. 29 (TYNDALE), "by promise," (GREAT BIBLE) "according to the promise" (justa promissionem). This Bible was very popular. A new edition appeared in the next year, again revised (and unsurprisingly, though often for the worse) by Corderdale. It had a preface by Cranmer; and the editions of April, July, and November, 1540, and May, November, and December, 1541, are really the Cranmer Bibles. This Bible (the Great and Cranmer's) remained the authorized version for twenty-eight years. The greater part of the portions of the Scriptures in the Prayer-Books of 1549 and 1552 were taken from it. It contains numerous paraphrastic and supplementary clauses from the Vulgate, and is decidedly inferior to the original Greek the New Testament, first in May, November, and December, 1541, are really Tyndale's, revised, collated with the Great Testament of 1557 was a small octavo, entitled The Newe Testament of our Lord and became very popular, more than one hundred and thirty editions having been published, the last in 1614, and the Authorized Version, with the Genevan notes, in 1715. Peculiar and novel features were, the attempted restoration of the original form of Hebrew names, the omission of St. Paul from the title of the Epistle to the Hebrews, the use of Italic letters for supplemental words, the substitution of biblical events and the names of reformers for the names of saints in the Calendar, and the entire omission of the Apocrypha. The Anglo-Genevan edition of the New Testament of 1576, by Lawrence Tomson, one of the best linguists of the day, introduced many changes, especially in the rendering of the article by that (e.g., John i. 1, 4, 5, 9, 14, etc.), and the notes, which, though more numerous, are less pithy than the old ones. The first Bible printed in Scotland (1578) is an exact reprint of the Genevan of 1571.

9. The Bishops'.— The superior merits of the Genevan Bible, its great popularity, and the general dissatisfaction with the Great Bible, induced Archbishop Parker to make preparations for a new edition under church authority, looking to a revision of that Bible by the originals with the aid of Pagninus and Münster, etc., temperate annotations, the marking of unedifying portions, and the use, where required, of nobler forms of expression. Some of his episcopal coadjutors held extraordinary views (e.g., Bishops Guest, Cox, and Sandys), and the archbishop exercised accordingly a wise discretion in the assigning of the several books. The revision — on which not less than eight bishops were engaged (hence its name), as well as several deans and professors — was completed, and the Bible published in a handsome folio, on good paper, and superbly printed, in 1568, 1569, 1570, 1571 (New Testament), and 1572. It contains a vast amount of excellent prefatory and introductory matter, among it the preface by the archbishop, and Cranmer's prologue, and is highly ornamented, some of the ornaments of the original fastuous taste; and together with them the introduction is of unequal merit; the different books in the edition of 1568 being qualitatively unequal, and the whole edition of 1572 greatly superior to

8. The Genevan.— Three among the English exiles at Geneva (namely, William Whittingham, Thomas Sampson, and Anthony Gilby) are conspicuous among the translators of this version; and among these three the most laborious was William Whittingham, b. at Lanchester, near Durham, in 1524; an Oxford man; married the sister of John Calvin's wife (Catherine Jaque maine of Orleans); and was minister of the English Church at Geneva. They produced from the original Greek the New Testament, first in 1557, and a distinct version of it, with the whole Bible, in 1560. The first seems to have been the sole work of Whittingham, and was printed before the translation of the entire Bible was taken in hand. The Testament of 1557 was a small octavo, entitled The New Testament of our Lord Jesus Christ, conferred diligently with the Greke and best approved of all translations as well before the Chapters, as for every Boke and Epistle, also diversities of readings, and most profitable annotations of all karte places: wherunto is added a coping Table. At Geneva, printed by Conrad Badius, MDLEVI. This Testament is the first English Testament with ornamentation of very dubious taste. As a translation it is of unequal merit; the different books in the edition of 1568 being qualitatively unequal, and the whole edition of 1572 greatly superior to the former. That of 1572 is the basis of the Authorized Version. The critical helps available to the Genevan translators were used by the translators of the Bishops’ Bible; and, while the influence of the Genevan Version on this is very pronounced, the original was diligently consulted. The critical examination of Isa. iii. by Professor Westcott yields the result, that, of twenty-one corrections, five are due to the Genevan, five agree with Pagninus, three with Leo Judae, three with Castallo, one with Münster, one is linguistic, and three are apparently original. These last are the omission (lii. 3) “Yea, he was . . . regarded him not,” and (lii. 4) of “and punished,” and the correction (lii. 4) of “infinities” into “infirmity.” In Job xix. 25 the Bishops’ of 1568 brings the new rendering, “he shall raise up at the latter day them that lie in the dust.” Twenty-nine passages in the New Testament of 1568, faulted by Lawrence as incorrect, were, for the most part, as corrected by him, received in the edition of 1572, and into the present text of the Authorized Version. The examination of Eph. iv. 7–16 (by Westcott) in the Great Bible of 1550, and the Bishops’, shows, that, among twenty-six changes, seventeen are new, nine being due to the Genevan, and the remainder the result of close and thoughtful reference to the Greek. The independence of the revision is evident in that only four of the new changes agree with Beza, while nine go against him. But, in spite of many excellences, the Bishops’ Bible was the least successful of all the English versions. As peculiar to this Bible appear the attempted classification of the books of the Bible into legal, historical, sapiential, and prophetic (with the curious result that the Gospels, the Catholic Epistles, and those to Titus, Philemon, and the Hebrews, are described as legal, the other Pauline Epistles as sapiential, the Acts alone as historical, and Revelation as prophetic), the indication of ostraecnized portions, and, in one edition, two versions of the Psalter (Matthew’s and the new). Twenty-six changes, seventeen are new, nine being made, not only equal authority with the original, but also “new renderings,” “the great diversitie and multitude” of the Greek fathers are sure to sustain it, and, if their text, especially in the correct use of the article, often agrees with the Greek, and in spite of their deification of the Vulgate, even as authorized by the Council of Trent, and their ceaseless fulminations (in the notes) against heretics, they are greatly indebted to the Genevan mouse (Beza), the Genevan Version, the Bishops’ Bible, and to Wiclif. The New Testament appeared in 1582, at Rheims, and the Old Testament in 1609, at Douay. The production is very scholarly, in fact, equal to that of any version extant at the time, and on that very account utterly useless as a translation. It is designedly literal, and its English so utterly unenglish, that it might pass for Latin; e.g., (Matt. i. 17) “transmigration of Babylon,” (vi. 11) “supersubstantial bread,” (xvi. 29) “what permutation,” (Mark v. 35) “arch-synergogue,” (xiv. 40) “wrapped him in the sinner.” (Luke xxii. 7) “the day of the Aymes . . . the pasche,” (John vii. 5) “Sceunopegia was at hand,” (Rom. i. 30) “edible to God,” (1 Cor. x. 11) “written to our correction,” (xi. 4) “dishonesteth his head,” (Phil. i. 7) “examineth himself,” (Phil. iv. 9) “evident in the agitation,” (Heb. vi. 7) “grasse commodious,” (ix. 23) “exemplars of the celestial,” (xii. 10) “God is promerited,” (Jas. iii. 4) “with a little sterne whither the violence of the director wil,” (iii. 6) “the wheels of our natuility,” (1 John iv. 3) “every spirit that dissolueth Jesus,” (Rev. xxii. 14) “blessed are they that wash their stoles.” This new beatitude may have been necessary in certain monasteries, but cannot be accepted by the Latin Church; for many copies of the Vulgate add, “in sanguine Agni.” The version is nevertheless meritorious in other respects, notably in the uniformity of its renderings (e.g., of Amen, Rabbi, charity, multitude, wort); but not a word of commendation can be said of the notes, which are truly savage. Lord Bacon liked this version. It is proper to add that the modern editions are less unenglish and less furious. See Vulgate New Testament with the Douay Version of 1582, London, 1881. See also below in Miscellaneous.

11. The Authorized Version.— At the Hampton Court Conference (1604) the demand of Reinolds for a new translation was really the starting-point which eventuated, mainly through the king’s dislike (pretended or real) of the Genevan, in the Authorized Version,—the work (in all) of fifty-four scholars (forty-seven on the list), divided into six companies, of which two met at Westminster, two at Oxford, and two at Cambridge, for the space of three years; after which six men, two from each place, met in London to superintend the publication. Bilson, Bishop of Winchester, who wrote the arguments of the several books, and Dr. Miles Smith, who wrote the noble preface, were the final correctors. The preface states, among many other matters, that their object was to make of many good translations a principal good one, to avoid extremes, and produce uniformity of rendering. “Never was a great enterpris like the production of our Authorized Version . . . carried out with less knowledge handed down to posterity of the labourers, their method, and order of working” (Sriverner, Intro. to Cambridge Paragraph Bible). It was published in 1611; and a number of years elapsed before its intrinsic superiority and merits drove all others before it. It is a transcendent work. Taken as a whole, it is the best and most truly English version. Couched in noble language, it abounds in felicities. It is musical, dramatic, and even tragical. It is, in turn, pathetic and sublime, and has, withal, a directness and force which commend it to all classes and conditions of men. But it is far from perfect; and wherein, in the opinion of many of its most ardent admirers, it should be made to conform more thoroughly and consistently with the original Scriptures remains to be briefly indicated under the following heads, preparatory to the Anglo-American revision:—

1. The critical apparatus at the command of the translators of King James's Version was that already noticed in the earlier portions of this article, to which must be added, for the Old Testament, the Latin translations of the Hebrew by Arius Montanus (1572) and Tremellius (extended to the Apocrypha by his son-in-law, Francis Junius, 1579). They had likewise the translation of the Syriac New Testament by Tremellius, and of the Greek by Theodore Beza (London, 1593, 1597). For the Greek text of the New Testament they had Beza's edition of 1598, and the third edition of Stephens, with this result (following from the critical apparatus of value of the two Testaments), that many readings of the Authorized Version are unsupported by any known Greek manuscript, and that the Greek text they used, in more than a thousand cases, requires to be corrected by what is now known to be the true text (Professor Abbott's Paper in Anglo-American Bible Revision, New York, 1879). Of then existing critical versions (i.e., those made directly from the original) they had Luther, the Genevan-French (1587–89), the Italian by Diodati (1607), and the Spanish by C. Reynal (1589), and Valera's (1602).

2. The improvements made upon former English versions, and their sources.—A critical examination of Isa. liii. shows, that, of forty-nine changes, about seven-eighths are due to the Genevan Version, two to Tremellius, two to Paginus, that the Genevan is abandoned three times, and one rendering is independent (Westcott); to which I would add, that in three instances, the Authorized Version returns to older English versions, that two renderings (comeliness, ver. 2, and griefs, ver. 4) are original, and in thirteen places the Genevan is rejected. In the New Testament the same scholar notes, that, in Romans, seventeen phrases are common to the Saxon and Latin versions, and seven original or linguistic. Of thirty-seven alternative readings in Mark he found one-half to agree with the Genevan, or Beza, six with the Rhemish, three with the French, six with earlier English versions, and one each with Castalio and the Vulgate.

3. Alleged blemishes requiring correction.—These are very numerous and diversified, and touch geography, proper names, mistakes of the meaning, grammar, archaisms, etc. For full and long lists and illustrations, impossible to supply here, see the LITERATURE below.

The felicities of the Authorized Version are confessedly remarkable; e.g., (Gen. ii. 19) "Thou mayest freely eat," (xv. 2) "Seeing I go childless," (1 Chron. xi. 9) "David waxed greater and greater," and the now naturalized Hebraisms, "God of peace," "Man of righteousness," "Man of sin," "Man of sorrows," "Son of man," "Rock of ages," etc. The Saxon-English of the version is also striking. In the Lord's Prayer (Matthew) the sixty-five words exclusive of Amen consist of fifty-nine Saxon and six Latin ones. The first thirty-five are all Saxon in succession.

12. The Anglo-American Revision. — The action taken by the Convocation of Canterbury in February, 1870, of a committee (consisting of two companies, one for the Old, the other for the New Testament) for the revision of the Bible in England, beginning their work June 22, 1870, and of a similar committee (with two companies) in America, beginning work Oct. 4, 1872, has culminated thus far in the publication, on May 17, 1881, of the first fruits of their joint labors; viz., The New Testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, Translated out of the Greek. Being the Version set forth A.D. 1611 Compared with the most ancient authorities, and Revised A.D. 1881. The whole number of the English revisers in 1880 amounted to fifty-two, twenty-seven in the Old-Testament company (Dr. Browne, Bishop of Winchester, chairman), and twenty-five in the New-Testament company (Dr. Ellicott, Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, chairman). The whole number of the American revisers amounted in 1880 to twenty-seven, fourteen in the Old-Testament company (Professor Dr. Green, chairman), and thirteen in the New-Testament company (ex-President Dr. Woolsey, chairman, and Professor Dr. Schaff, President, of the American Bible Union). Less than two-thirds of the English revisers belong to the Church of England; the remainder are representatives of other churches. The American revisers represent the different Protestant churches. And all the revisers, both in England and America, are eminent biblical scholars. The general principles on which the revision is made are: 1. The least possible changes in the text of the Authorized Version consistent with fidelity; 2. To be expressed, if possible, in the language of the Authorized and earlier English versions; 3. To be twice revised; 4. The text to be adopted to be that sustained by preponderating evidence, and the changes to be noted in the margin; 5. Textual changes to be made by simple majorities on the first revision, by two-thirds majorities on the second; 6. The voting on changes causing discussion to be decided by a vote of the next. The work of the revisers seems to have been of high quality; and the book now before us is an admirable work of literature.
American co-operation are substantially as follows: "The English revisers to send their revision to the American revisers, to consider the American suggestions, to furnish them with copies of the revision in its final form before publication, and to allow them to present in an appendix remaining differences of reading and rendering of importance not adopted by the English revisers." The result, thus far, of this harmonious suggestion and co-operation, is the Revised New Testament, which is unquestionably a most faithful and noble English version, and equal to any version of the sacred original, for the following reasons:—

(1) Its text, i.e., the Greek, is the purest extant, based on the authority of documentary evidence without deference to any printed text of modern times; which imports that only the most ancient and authentic manuscripts, versions, and patristic quotations were received, and diligently compared by competent experts, and their united testimony required for the adoption of any, even the minutest, integral portion of the sacred volume. The readers of the new revision have the undoubted assurance that the Greek text from which it has been translated has been verified, as far as human learning and fidelity could verify it, as the word of God. What the revisers rejected from the text had been added by careless or designing transcribers, what they received into it had been omitted by them. No version rests on a purer text.

(2) Its translation is a marvel for fidelity, accuracy, elegance, purity of idiom, and harmony of expression. Some of its noblest features depend for their full appreciation on the publication of the Old Testament. The changes introduced are fivefold: 1. Those required by change of reading in the Greek text; e.g., (1 Pet. ii. 21) "Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example." 2. Where the Authorized Version appeared to be incorrect; e.g., (1 Cor. xi. 34) "that your coming together be not unto judgment." 3. The removal of ambiguous or obscure renderings; e.g., (Matt. xvi. 20) "then art a stumbling block unto me." 4. The removal of inconsistent renderings; e.g., (1 Cor. xxv. 27, 28) "For He put all things in subjection under his feet." But when he saith, All things have been subjected unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subjected to him that did subject all things unto him, that God may be all in all." 5. Changes made necessary by consequence (see Preface). The grammatical inaccuracies of the Authorized Version have been removed; e.g., (Matt. ii. 4) "The Christ;" (1 Tim. iv. 10) "a root of all utterly undignified, if not vulgar and profane, production. The edition of the Authorized Version, containing for the first time the chronological dates (see Authorized Version) is known as Arch-bishop Tenson's of 1701. The Cambridge edition of the Bible by Dr. Paris (1768) and the Oxford edition by Dr. Blayney (1789) are important: the latter, on account of its great accuracy, is regarded as the standard in England. Dr. Scrivener's Cambridge Paragraph Bible (1873) is said to be the most accurately edited in the language. The Rheims New Testament was printed in a second edition, 1600, in a third at Douay, in 1621, and in a fourth, probably at Rouen, in 1633. The Old Testament appeared in a second edition in 1635. Among the later Roman-Catholic versions are prominent: (1) Naryl's New Testament, 1719 (Dublin?), a vast improvement on the Rheims and Douay in tone and English; (2) Wetham's New Testament, 1730–33 (Douay?); (3) Troy's Bible, Dublin, 1816, with very savage notes; (4) The Holy Bible, Dublin and London, 1825, in better English, but a very corrupt text; (5) A New Version of the Holy Bible, London, 1836, by far the best of all, and on that account disparaged by Roman-Catholic writers, notably by Cardinal Wiseman.

ENNODIUS, Magnus Felix, b. at Arles about 473; d. at Pavia, July 17, 521; belonged to a distinguished but poor Gallic family: lost his parents very early, and was educated at Milan by an aunt, who died 489, and left him nearly destitute. Having made a rich match, he lived, as it seems, only to enjoy himself, when a severe sickness awakened him to serious reflections. His wife entered a nunnery, and he was ordained a deacon: as a prelate of the highest order he was consecrated a bishop. His life was a mournful picture of pietas, and as such, he accompanied Bishop Epiphanius of Pavia on his mission to the Burgundian King Gundebaud (494), and, two years later on, he distinguished himself in Rome by an apology for Pope Symmachus and a panegyric of Theodoric. By Pope Hormisdas he was made Bishop of Pavia, and as such he was twice sent as ambassador to Constantinople (515 and 517). His works (consisting of some poems, a number of letters, the panegyric of Theodoric, the defence of Symmachus, a life of Bishop Epiphanius, etc.) were first printed at Basel, 1569, Tournay, 1610, Paris, 1611 (best edition), and afterwards often, also in Migne, Patro. Lat., vol. 63. They have no aesthetic merits, and only small historical interest: they show that in theology he was a semi-pelagian, and with respect to church-poliety an ardent champion of the Papal supremacy. He was the first who addressed the Bishop of Rome as papa.

E'NOCH (initiator, or initiated). There are several of this name mentioned in the Old Testament (Gen. iv. 17, and, in the Hebrew text, xxv. 4, xlii. 9; and Exod. vi. 14); but the only one of any interest is the son of Jared and the father of Methuselah (Gen. v. 18, 21–24). He "walked with God," a phrase expressive of constant companionship, an undisturbed, intimate intercourse with God; he had left his own country and had been sixty-five years (very young for an antediluvian), suddenly he was not, for God took him. His disappearance was, in the antediluvian age, the striking evidence of immortality, just as Elijah's was to his age, and Christ's resurrection is to us. Men may have looked for him, as they did subsequently for Elijah (2 Kings ii. 10), but as vainly. He had gone, not to return. He had been translated. In the absence of biblical information, speculation has been active. According to the majority of the rabbins and the fathers he was taken to paradise, although some put him in heaven, and others in the seventh heaven. A parallel to Enoch's translation will be that of the saints who are alive at the second coming of Christ (1 Thess. iv. 17; 1 Cor. xv. 51). In the Epistle to the Hebrews, Enoch's walk with God is regarded as a triumph of faith (Heb. xi. 5).

Tradition has made of Enoch not only a preacher of repentance, and prophet of judgment, which indeed is very likely, but also (as "Enoch" may mean the initiated) a sage acquainted with divine secrets by reason of his walk with God, the transmitter of the true yʾwʾṣ in contradistinction to the knowledge which demons had brought into the world, and the inventor of writing and the sciences, particularly astronomy. Finally, in the century before Christ, a book was attributed to him, in which all the knowledge then attained about God, nature, and history, was by a fiction transferred to him. A quotation is made from it in Jude 14. See Enoch, Book of, in art. Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament, and A. Dillmann, Das Buch Henoch, Leipzig, 1853. Among the Arabs, Enoch or Idris (the learned), as he is more commonly called, plays the rôle of a medium of the higher knowledge and science.

The heathen myths of the assumption of Heracles, Romulus, and others, are not in point; because the ground for the translation of Enoch was his relations with God, while the legends rest upon a belief in the immortality of the soul, which merges the gods with the highest human development. Much nearer to the biblical account is the Babylonian Xisuthrus in the history of Berosus, who indeed corresponds to Noah, but who was after the flood translated, and was sought for until his voice was heard announcing, that, on account of his piety, he had been removed to dwell among the gods. In the cuneiform inscriptions he is termed Chaldeus, and his wife taken away to live as the gods in a remote place at the mouth of the rivers. [See GEORGE SMITH: The Chaldaean Account of Genesis, ed. Sayce, pp. 288, 309.] Another supposed parallel to the Bible Enoch is King Annakos, or Nannakos, who is said to have lived three hundred years before the Deukalion flood, and to have prophesied with tears the overthrow of the race after his death. But this story comes through Zenobius (200 A.D.), who borrowed freely from Didymus of Alexandria (30 A.D.); and it is therefore extremely probable, as the similarity of names would itself indicate, that the story is really derived from Jewish sources.

An endeavor has been made to identify Enoch with the Latin Janus, the god of the new year, because the year has 365 days, and he had 365 years; but it remains only an endeavor. See the commentaries and Bible histories and Bible dictionaries and the account of Enoch in the Bible. [BARING-GOULD: Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets, American reprint, N.Y., pp. 85-91].

VON ORELLI.

ENTHUSIASM (from ένθεος, filled or inspired by God) is an intense moral impulse or all-engrossing temper of mind. There is an enthusiasm for popular freedom and for art, for the emancipation of the slaves and for conquest. The engrossing temper of mind. There is an enthusiasm designation of a zealous judgment, or religious enthusiasm. The difference between genuine and morbid enthusiasm will often depend upon the wise discrimination of a keen judgment, or the moral standpoint of the critic, as in the case of that ridicule which is by some applied to all religious workers or philanthropists who have undergone hardship, or even death, in the service and for the benefit of others; as in the case of monasticism, and of the apostles on the Day of Pentecost, who were said by some to be drunken (Acts ii.13). Enthusiasm is the quality without which the best in any department cannot be reached, nor the largest amount of results achieved. It is also a quality, which, controlled by ignorance, or misapplied, although conscientiously it may be, may work great harm.

In the better sense of the term, our Lord was the highest illustration of enthusiasm. His soul was possessed with overwhelming affection for men, and an intense impulse to help them. The apostles were enthusiasts in a good sense; being constrained by an overwhelming desire to preach the gospel, and ready to show it by suffering and death. The early monks, St. Francis of Assisi, Dominic, Hus, the Reformers, the early Methodists, and the present missionaries in foreign lands, are also examples of religious enthusiasm. Hence, then religions have had their enthusiasts, as well as the Christian.

Christian enthusiasm in the good sense is derived from two motives,—love for men (brought out in a strong way by the author of Eccle Homo) and love for Christ. The New Testament combines both these motives in the labors and heroism of the apostles, the greatest of whom, however (St. Paul), attributes his enthusiasm prevailingly to the love for Christ (Phil. i. 21, “To me to live is Christ; 2 Cor. v. 14, “The love of Christ constraineth us”).

In the bad sense, enthusiasm is almost synonymous with fanaticism, and enthusiasts with zealots. It is fervor of soul drawn from wrong principles, founded on wrong judgments, and applied to wrong ends. Neither selfish nor impure motives necessarily prevail in such a temper of mind, and zeal of activity. Such enthusiasm may proceed from a sincere desire to glorify God. It substitutes fancies for the truth, and in its last stages the disorder of the mind becomes mental insanity. Warburton defines enthusiasm in this second sense as that “temper of mind in which the imagination has got the better of the judgment” (Div. Leg., V., Appendix).

The term “enthusiasts” has also had a technical sense, as in the Elizabethan period. Jewel, Rogers (Thirty-nine Articles, p. 158, Parker Soc. ed.), and others speak of Enthusiasts as they do of Anabaptists. During the Commonwealth period, and afterwards, the term was frequently applied to the Puritans in a tone of depreciation, as notably by Robert South, who preached a special sermon on the subject, “Enthusiasts not led by the Spirit of God,” meaning by enthusiasts the Puritans. See ISAAC TAYLOR: Natural Hist. of Enthusiasm, 9th ed., Lond., 1843.

ENZINAS, Francisco de (Dryander, Ducheme, Van Eyck, Eichman, translations of the Spanish name “oakman”), b. at Burgos, 1520; d. at Geneva, 1570: studied in Italy, afterwards at Louvain and Wittenberg; embraced the Reformation; was arrested at Brussels (1545), escaped to England (1545), and lived afterwards on the Continent,—at Strassburg, Basel, and Geneva. He translated the New Testament into Spanish, and dedicated it to Charles V. — His brother, Jaques de Enzinas, also embraced Protestantism, and was burnt at the stake in Italy, 1546.

EON, or EUDO DE STELLA, an enthusiast in the middle of the twelfth century, and probably connected with the Cathari; was b. in Bretagne, and was, by the words which he once heard in the church (“per eum qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos”), led to believe that he (“Eon”) was meant by that eum. Preaching, prophesying, and working miracles, he roved about in Bretagne, and much people gathered around him, and were seduced by him. In 1145 the papal legate, Cardinal Albericus of Ostia, preached against him at Nantes; then Archbishop Hugo of Rouen wrote a book against him, Dogmatum christianae fidei Libri Tres (found in Bibl. Patr. Mex., Lyons, T. XXII.); and finally troops were sent against him. Several of his adherents were burnt in the diocese of Alet, while he himself retreated into Gruyenne. In 1148 he appeared in Champagne, but was caught, together with a number of his disciples. When placed before the synod of Rheims, and asked by Pope Eugenius III. who he was, he answered, “In qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos.” The synod declared him crazy, and ordered him shut up in a dungeon: his followers were burnt, and very soon all trace of his sect disappeared.

EPHESUS. The Council of, was held in 517 in a town of Burgundy whose site cannot be identified any more. It was called by Avitus, Bishop of Vienne, and Viventius, Bishop of Lyons, and attended by twenty-four bishops. On Sept. 14, 517, they subscribed forty canons, mostly of a disciplinary character, regulating the relations of bishops, priests, and monks. Canon 4 forbids bishops, priests, and deacons to keep hawks or dogs for hunting; canon 9 forbids an abbot to preside over two monasteries; canons 15, 16, 20, and 33 concern heretics, and forbid Catholic clergymen to eat at the same table with a heretic, etc.; canon 20 forbids any altar not of stone to be consecrated with chrism, etc. See LABBE: Dissertatio philosophica de Concilio Epaunensi; MANSI: Conc. Coll., VIII. 318–342, 347–372, 553–574.

EPARCHY (ἐπαρχία) denoted originally a merely political division, being the official administrative name of a province. It consisted of counties, and formed part of a diocese. This scheme of secular administration was afterwards followed by the organization of apostolic dioceses. Thus the head of a county community became a bishop, the head of an eparchy a metropolitan, and the head of a diocese a patriarch. At the time of the Council of Nicaea (325) this organization and its terminology were fully developed.

EPHESIANS. Epistle to the. See PAUL.

EPHESUS, renowned as a seat of heathen rites, and conspicuous in the history of early Christianity, was an opulent city on the western coast of Asia Minor. It was advantageously situated and conspicuous in the history of early Christianity. It was on the direct road to Sardis. To the south of it, on the Maeander, lay Miletus; at an equal distance to the north, Smyrna, on the Hermus. The city was colonized as early as the eleventh century, by Androclus, the son of the Athenian king, Codrus. It soon became famous as a mart and hostelry, the harbor affording ample shelter for ships. Asiatic elements mixed on its streets with Greek influences, and colored the social life. The city became successively a bishopric, and was probably stirred up to write his Gospel by the indications of heretical sentiments here manifesting themselves. Here Apollos first preached (Acts xviii. 24–28); and here the third ecumenical council met, which defined the doctrines of the Church over against Nestorius. Before passing away from the history of Christianity in Ephesus, it is proper to make a more specific mention of the labors of St. Paul in the city. His first visit was on his return from the second missionary tour. He was then accompanied by Priscilla and Aquila. On his second visit he made a sojourn of two or three years (Acts xx. 31). After preaching in the synagogue, he went to the school of Tyrannus. His teaching was so effective, that many brought their books of magic, to which the city was addicted, and made a bonfire of them; and it interfered so materially with the superstitious traffic in silver shrines (xix. 20), as to arouse the enmity of Demetrius and the craftsmen. A riotous popular tumult was excited, and the watchword rang through the city, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians;" but Paul himself escaped.

EPHESUS, Councils of. The third ecumenical council was held in St. Mary's Church, Eph-sus, A.D. 431 (June 22—Aug. 31). It condemned the heresy of Nestorius, that Christ had two persons as well as two natures. It was convened by lettering Theodosius II., and the Syriac and Greek. Cyril of Alexandria presided, and opened the meetings with a hundred and sixty bishops. The number was afterwards increased to a hundred and ninety-eight. Nestorius was cited, but refused to appear until all the bishops had arrived, some of whom, the John of Antioch, were delayed. In the mean time, his heresy was denounced, and himself excluded from the episcopal office, and from all sacerdotal fellowship.

The so-called Robber Council was convened by Theodosius in 449. It was first so denominated by Leo, Bishop of Rome (Epist. 95), on account of the partisan and overbearing demeanor of the presiding officer, and the use of violence in the introduction of soldiery. Dioscorus of Alexandria, a man of hierarchical temper and inordinate ambition, presided. A hundred and thirty-five bishops were present. The council restored Eutyches, who had been deposed at the synod of Constantinople (445). Flavian, Patriarch of Constantinople, was deposed from his office for the hand he had taken in the deposition of Eutyches. All efforts to express dissent were brutally checked. Hilary, Deacon of Rome and papal delegate, one of the dissentists, only narrowly escaped with his life; while Eusebius, Bishop of Doryleum, the accuser of Eutyches, lost his through the violence of the soldiery. The decisions of this scandalously conducted council were reversed by the Council of Chalcedon (451).

EPHESUS. The Seven Sleepers of. This legend gained currency very early, and was adopted in the Koran. Seven Ephesian youths of noble extraction, in the persecutions of Decius (249—257), concealed themselves in a cave which was ordered by the authorities to be sealed up. They fell into a slumber which lasted for a hundred and eighty-seven years. Some of the stones being removed from the entrance, a ray of light was admitted. Awaking, as from a night's sleep, they sent one of their number (Jamblichus) into the city to buy bread. The obsoleness of his dress, and the antiquity of the coin which he offered to the merchants, immediately expired. See the story well told, Gibbon's Romé, Am. ed., iii. 338 sq.

EPHOD. See HIGH PRIEST.

EPHRAÈM, generally called Ephrem Syrus, is the most prominent of the fathers of the Syrian Church in the fourth century, and the greatest orator and hymn-writer produced by that church. Life.—Besides the so-called Confessions of Ephraém (existing both in Greek and in Armenian) and his testament (existing both in Syriac and Greek), we have a panegyric of him by Gregory of Nyssa (written shortly after his death, and found both among Gregory's works and in the first volume of the Roman edition of Ephraém's Greek works), and an elaborate life of him (Acta Ephraém), written in Syriac, and found in the third volume of the Roman edition of his Syrian works. All these materials are very unreliable, however. They contradict each other, and are full of legendary matter. In modern times his life has been written by Zingerle, in the first volume of his translation, and by Alßelein, Berlin, 1853.

Ephraém was born in the beginning of the fourth century, according to a notice in his commentary on the Genesis (Op. Syr., I. 23), in Mesopotamia; according to Sozomen (Hist. Eccl., III. 16) and later writers, he was educated by Bishop Jacob of Nisibis, and seems to have accompanied him to the Council of Nicea (325). When, in 363, the Emperor Jovian surrendered Nisibis to the Persians, Ephraém moved first to Amid, the native place of his mother, and then to Edessa, at that time the centre of Syrian learning. He settled among the anchorites in a cave outside the city, adopted a life of severe asceticism, and devoted himself wholly to theological study and authorship. Now and then he appeared among the people; and his hymns and polemical speeches, directed against the Chaldaean astrologers, against Bardesanes and Harmonius, the Arians and Sabellians, Apollinaris, Marcion, etc., made a deep impression, and obtained a lasting influence. Later writers (Assemani, Bibl. Orient., IV. 924) tell us that he founded a school in Edessa; and it is, at all events, certain that he had pupils, and among them some of great celebrity. A tradition reports that he visited Egypt, and stayed there eight years; another, that he visited Basil the Great at Caesarea. He died during the reign of Valens, either 373, or 375, or 377.

Works.—Ephraém was a very prolific author; but of his numerous writings only a part exists in the original Syrian text, and the rest in Greek, Latin, Armenian, and Slavic translations. A complete list of his writings is given by J. S. Assemani, in Bibl. Orient., I. 100—184, and in the preface to the Roman edition of his Greek works. See also Wright: Catalogue of Syriac Manuscripts in the British Museum, 3, 1271. The Slavic translations from his works were edited by J. P. Kohl, Moscow, 1701; the Armenian, by the Mekhitarists, Venice, 1836. The principal edition of the Syrian and Greek texts is that which appeared in Rome in 6 vols. fol., 1732—46, under papal authority. —3 vols. Greek text, with Latin translation, edited by J. S. Assemani, and 3 vols. Syrian text, also with Latin translation, edited by Petrus Benedictus. See also the Berlin ed., 5 vols.

It is doubtful whether or not Ephraém himself understood Greek; but it is quite certain that those of his works which have come down to us only in a Greek version are translations. Sozomen says that the works of Ephraém were very early translated into Greek, even in the lifetime of the author; and this statement is corroborated by the fact that Chrysostom and Jerome were acquainted with them. They consist of sermons, homilies, and tracts, exegetical, dogmatic, and ascetic. Photius mentions (Bibli. Cod., 196) that he knew fifty-two such productions by Ephraëm, and had heard that there existed more than a thousand. In many churches in the East they were read aloud during service, after the Bible recitals; and they seem to have attained the same honor in the Western Church. Translations into Latin were early made. Small collections of Ephraëm's discourses translated into Latin circulated in the fifteenth century. The first larger collection (in 3 vols. fol.) was given by Gerhard Vossius, Rome, 1589, and reprinted in 1593 and 1598. It contains 171 pieces, of which only one was translated directly from the Syrian. Augmented editions of this collection appeared at Cologne (1597), and at Antwerp (1619). The first collected edition of Ephraëm's Greek works was given by Ed. Thwaites, Oxford, 1709. The best edition is Rome, 1732–46, 6 vols. folio, ed. by the Assemanis.

The existing Syrian works of Ephraëm consist of commentaries on the Pentateuch and most of the historical and prophetical books of the Old Testament. According to Ebed Jesu (Assemani, Bibl. Orient., III. 1, p. 62), he also wrote a commentary on the Psalms. Of his commentaries on the books of the New Testament, only an Armenian translation of that on the Pauline Epistles, and on Tatian's Diatessaron [for the representatives of stoic philosophy, was b. at Hadrianopolis, in Epiph.], where he continued teaching, and finally died. He wrote nothing himself; but many of his teachings were taken down by his pupil, Flavius Arrianus, and are still preserved. They have a peculiar interest to the church-historian on account of the influence they exercised on Marcion and Tertullian. The best edition of the works of Epictetus is that by Schweighäuser, Leipzig, 1790–1800, 6 vols. There are at least two English translations,—one by Elizabeth Carter (London, 1758, 4to, new revised ed. by Thomas W. Higginson, Boston, 1865), and one by George Long (London, 1876). The Enchirition was translated by T. Talbot, and also by T. W. H. Rolleston, both London, 1881. See F. W. Farrar: Seekers after God; Lives of Seneca, Epictetus, and Marcus Aurelius, London, 1868.

Epicureanism is the common name of a system of morality, with the happiness of human actions, and pleasure as the only true happiness of human life (eudaimonion). The metaphysics on which this system is based is necessarily materialistic, and often atheistic. Such, however, as it was expounded by its founder, Epicurus (342–270 B.C.), in his garden in Athens, the system seemed not only decent, but even attractive. It meant to lead its pupils to a quiet and frugal, but elegant and refined enjoyment of life; but when in the time of the Roman emperors, and again in the time of the English deists and the French encyclopedists, the metaphysical premises of the system were carried out to their last practical consequences, the system was found to lead its pupils into shameless debauchery and abject stupidity. See art. Moral Philosophy, also F. v. Gизьци: Über das Leben u. die Moralphilosophie d. Epikur, Berlin, 1879, 44 pp.; W. Wallace: Epicureanism, London, 1880; E. Pfeiffer: Eudaimonismus u. Epicurismus, Leipzig, 1880.

Epiphanius, Bishop of Constantia (the old Salamis of Cyprus), was b. in the beginning of the fourth century, at Besandirke, a village of Palæstine, in the garden of Paul the presbyter, and educated among monks. He afterwards lived for some time in Egypt, also among monks, and founded, after his return to Palestine, a monastery in his native town, of which he became abbot. His fame for holiness brought him to the metropolitan chair of Constantinia (387), and from that time he took an active part in the theological controversies of his age. He was present at a synod in Antioch (376), and at another in Rome (382), where the trinitarian questions were debated. He went to Palestine in 394 to crush the influence of the famous Origen, and to destroy the Arian doctrine in Egypt for the same purpose. He died on board the ship on which he was returning from Constantinople to Constantia.

The life of Epiphanius fell in a period when monasticism—sprung from the martyr-inspiration of the primitive Church, and hailed by the age as a higher standard of virtue—spread rapidly in the East, but at the same time assumed a character of narrow hostility to all free theological investigation, always preferring a system of stiff dogmatic definitions to the life of a vigorous personal conviction. But the man's character was well suited to the demands of the time; and he, as well as his friends, considered it a great merit to spend a whole life in bitter opposition to the Eastern Church and the Eastern Church to ever produce, without understanding him. He seems, however, to have discovered during his stay in Constantinople,—whether he went at the instance of Theophilius of Alexandria, and for the purpose of opposing Chrysostom, and through him Origen,—that he had in most cases been a tool in other men’s hands. He left the city abruptly and in a rage.

His principal works are, Πίππαριον ("the drug-chest"), a description and refutation of eighty different heresies, confused and trivial, but of some historical value, and Ἀγκωβία ("the anchor of faith"), a dogmatical work, much read in its time. A life of him by a friend was edited, together with his works, by Πέτρος, Paris, 1822, 2 vols. fol. The best edition of his works is Diendorf’s, Leipzig, 1859, 5 vols.; and of the Panarion by Oehler, Berlin, 1859, 4 vols. Part II of the Panarion and the Vitae et de la Vie de S. Epiphane, Paris, 1738; EBERHARD: Die Beteiligung des Epiphanius an dem Streite über Origines, Treves, 1859; LIFRIS: Zur Quellenkritik des Epiphanius, Vienna, 1865. SEMISCH.

EPIPHANIUS, Bishop of Pavia, was b. in that city (459) of noble descent, and educated for the Church. When he was eighteen years old he was ordained a sub-deacon, and in 466 he was unanimously elected bishop by the clergy and the people. After his accession to the episcopal dignity, he increased the severity of his asceticism: he took only one meal a day; he abstained altogether from flesh, from wine, from baths, etc. The same energy he also evinced in taking care of his diocese and the Church in general. He was one of those admirable Italian bishops, who, while the dissolution of the Western Empire was going on, rapidly and inevitably, stood like rocks in the midst of the confusion, breaking the surges. In the wars between Anthemius and Ricimer, Glycyrius and Euric, Odoacer and Theodoric, he often succeeded in making peace between the combatants; and, when peace could not be made, he was always able at least to mitigate the evils of the conflict. He died in 494. His life has been written by his successor, Ennodius, among whose works it is found. HEIZOG.

EPIPHANIUS SCHOLASTICUS translated, at the instance of his friend Cassiodorus, the works on church history by Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, from Greek into Latin; which translations, corrected, condensed, and connected with each other by Cassiodorus, formed the Historia Tripartita so famous in the middle ages. Epiphanius also translated the so-called Cözes Encycelicius, a collection of synodal letters to the Emperor Leo I. in defence of the synod of Chalcedon, and the commentary by Epiphanius, Bishop of Cyprus, on the Song of Songs, the commentary of Didy- mus on the Catholic Epistles, etc.

EPIPHANY (ἐπιφάνια, Tit. ii. 11, iii. 4), one of the oldest Christian festivals, originated in the Eastern Church, and opened the annual cycle of the festivals, though it referred to the baptism of Christ rather than to his birth. It was generally held, however, by the Eastern Church, that the manifestation of Christ to man took place at his baptism, and not at his birth; and consequently his nativity was celebrated only as an introduction to his epiphany, which fell on Jan. 6. The separation of the two festivals did not take place until the latter part of the fourth century, according to a homily preached by Chrysostom in Antioch, Dec. 25, 388. It was also generally held in the Eastern Church, that, by his baptism, Christ imparted certain qualities to the waters, which made them a fit bath of regeneration; and consequently the Epiphany became a favorite festival with other men’s hands. He left the city abruptly and in a rage.

From the East the festival was introduced to the West. The first trace of it in the Western Church is the report, by Ammianus Marcellinus (XXI. 2), that Julian celebrated it at Vienne in 360. But its doctrinal basis was changed. It was referred, not to the manifestation of Christ to man in general, but to his manifestation to the heathens, to the Three Wise Men of the East, to the Three Holy Kings. It also lost favor as a term for baptism. Pope Leo I. opposed this custom as an "irrational novelty." On the whole, in the Western Church it never became a favorite festival. This is an appendix to the Nativity: hence its familiar English name "Twelfth-Day." supreme authority in the Church and over the bishops. 1. The Jansenist Church of Holland, and the Old Catholics, both agree with the Roman-Catholic Church on the question of Episcopacy, but differ from it in their allegiance to the Pope. The episcopate in Holland was received (in 1724) from Dominique Marie Varlet, Bishop of Bablon, then living in Amsterdam. Other Catholic bishops, on being applied to, refused the rite of consecration. Each new consecration ever since has been noticed by a special excommunication from Rome. The Old Catholics secured their orders from the Jansenists of Holland, Bishop Reinkens (Aug. 11, 1873), who subsequently consecrated Dr. Herzog, Bishop for Switzerland (Sept. 18, 1876); so that they preserve the apostolic succession.

IV. The Church of England and the Episcopal Church of the United States tolerate two classes of opinion,—the Anglo-Catholic or High Church view, and the Low or Broad Church view. 1. The Anglo-Catholic view of the episcopate is in essential particulars that of the Roman-Catholic Church. It does not recognize the superior authority of the Pope, as the vicar of Christ and the infallible successor of St. Peter, nor even place ordination among the sacraments. But it regards Episcopacy as indispensable to the very being of the Church, holds to the transmission of grace by the imposition of hands, and accepts apostolic succession. Bishops, as "being the successors of the apostles, are possessed of the same power of jurisdiction" (Blunt). They are, and have been from the time of the apostles, an order distinct from the priesthood and diaconate, and higher than both. Archbishop Laud (1633-45) was the most extreme representative of the jure divino right of Episcopacy. 2. The Low and Broad Church view regards the episcopate as desirable and necessary for the well being of the Church, but in no wise indispensable to its existence. The episcopate is not the only form of government with scriptural authority (if, indeed, it or any other be recommended by Scripture); but the one that is being tried by the Anglo-Catholics is the best means of transmitting the interests of Christ's kingdom among men. The best writers on this side agree that the episcopate developed out of the presbyterate, and that there are only two orders of the ministry in the New Testament,—presbyters and deacons. Dr. Lightfoot, Bishop of Durham, in his very scholarly and exhaustive discussion of the subject in his Christian Ministry (Com. on Phileippians, pp. 180-267), says, "It is clear, that, at the close of the apostolic age, the two lower orders of the threefold ministry were firmly and widely established; but traces of the episcopate, properly so called, are few and indistinct." "...The episcopate was formed out of the presbyterial order by elevation; and the title, which originally was common to all, came at length to be appropriated to the chief of them." And again he says, "The episcopate was formed out of the presbyterate." The late Dean Stanley, in the chapter on the Clergy in his Christian Institutions, representing the same view, says (p. 210), "According to the strict rules of the Church derived from those early times, there are but two orders,—presbyters and deacons."

This view, which is also held by such men as Arnold, Alford, Jacob, and Hatch, was the view of the divines of the English Reformation. Cranmer, Jewel, Grindal, and afterwards Field ("The apostles left none to succeed them," Of the Church, vol. iv. p. vii.), defended Episcopacy as the most ancient and general form of government, but always acknowledged the validity of Presbyterian orders. (See this subject ably discussed by Professor Fisher, in the New-Englander, 1874, pp. 121-172.) Bishop Parkhurst looked upon the Church of Zurich as the absolute pattern of a Christian community; and Bishop Ponet would have abandoned even the term "bishop" to the Catholics (Macaulay, Hist. of Eng., vol. I. p. 30, Bost. ed.). Ecclesiastics held positions in the Church of England who had only received Presbyterian ordination. Such were Wittingham, Dean of Durham, and Cartwright, Professor of Divinity at Cambridge. It is doubtful whether any prelate of the English Church in Elizabeth's reign held the jure divino theory of Episcopacy. Two of the most elaborate defenders of the Low-Church view in the seventeenth century were Stillingsfleet and Usher, the latter representing the episcopate as only a presidency of the presbyters over his peers; yet the Episcopal Church re-ordains all ministers who have not been episcopally consecrated, but accepts priests of the Greek and Roman-Catholic Churches without re-ordination.

V. The Reformed Episcopal Church holds to an Episcopacy of expediency. "It adheres to Episcopacy, not of divine right, but as a very ancient and desirable form of church polity" (Decl. of Principles, passed Dec. 2, 1873). Its founder and first bishop was Dr. Cummins, who had been assistant bishop of the Episcopal Church in Kentucky.

VI. The Moravian Church deserves separate and special mention, for three reasons. Its episcopate was active before the Reformation on the Continent and in England began; it is in the apostolic succession; and its bishopric in America antedates those of the Episcopal (1764) and Methodist (1784) denominations by forty years. The first Moravian bishop was consecrated in 1467, by the regularly ordained Waldensian Bishop Stephens. (See Wetzer and Welte, Encyclop., ii. p. 65, and De Schweinitz, Moravian Episcopate, Lond., 1877.) The British Parliament, in 1749, recognized the validity of Moravian ordination. But the recent course of Bishop Stevens of Pennsylvania, in re-ordaining a Moravian presbyter, disparages the episcopate of this venerable body. This occurred in Philadelphia (Sept. 30, 1851), and was designed to give the applicant, to use Bishop Stevens' own language, "a more ample ordination." The Moravians, or, as they prefer to be called, the Brethren, recognize the ordination of other Christian bodies as valid, admitting presbyters at once into their ministry (Law Book of the Church, ix. 63).

VII. The Lutheran Church has for the most part abandoned Episcopacy. The bishops on the Continent, unlike the bishops in England, held aloof from the Reformation. In Germany one order of the ministry only is recognized. An officer with jurisdiction somewhat similar to that of bishop is called superintendent. The office is only one of expediency. The Lutheran Church in Sweden has bishops, the validity of whose orders a committee was appointed in 1574, by the convention of the Church in the United States, to investigate. The convention has taken no further action. There is much doubt concerning the integrity of the succession. Lawrence Peterson was consecrated by Paul Justin, Bishop of Abo, in 1573 Archbishop of Upsala. The evidence for the validity of Justin's consecration is defective. But the confessions of the Swedish Church recognize the equality of the ministry. The bishops of the Church of Denmark have no claim whatever to apostolic succession, although the English bishops of India have recognized Danish ordination. Christian III. in 1536 imprisoned the old bishops; and the new ones whom he appointed were at first called superintendents, and ordained by Bugenhagen.

VIII. The Reformed Churches recognize two other orders,—presbyters and deacons. The bishops of the New Testament are regarded as identical with presbyters. They do not deny that Episcopacy as a matter of expediency is justifiable; but they do not concede either its divine origin, or the transmission of grace by the imposition of hands, or apostolic succession, in the Anglo-Catholic sense. (See Form of Government of Presbyterian Church, chaps. iii. v., etc.)

IX. The American Methodist church has an Episcopacy. It is neither diocesan nor hierarchic, but itinerant and presbyterial. The bishops constitute an "itinerant general superintendency," and are "amenable to the body of ministers and preachers," who may divest them of their office. They are not a distinct order of the clergy, but only presbyters. The Methodist Church cannot lay claim to apostolical succession, if it would. John Wesley, after having previously applied in vain to the Bishop of London to ordain preachers for America, himself ordained the first bishop, Thomas Coke, in 1784. The Evangelical Association and the Church of the United Brethren also have episcopalates. Their bishops are only elected for a stated period, and not for life. For further information see the articles under these special communions.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH. The Protestant, in the United States of America. History.—The first known clerical representative of the Church of England in America was Albert de Prato, a learned mathematician, and a canon of St. Paul's, London, who visited St. John's, Newfoundland, in August, 1527. The next clergyman appeared after the Reformation, in connection with Frosham's expedition of 1578. This was Woolfall, who landed in the Countess of Warwick's Sound, and celebrated the first English communion recorded in connection with the New World. In 1583 Sir Humphrey Gilbert proclaimed the order of the English Church and State in Newfoundland. In 1584 Sir Walter Raleigh commanded his unsuccessful attempt to colonize Virginia, where, in 1587, the clergyman attached to the Colony baptized Manteo, an Indian chief. About the same time he also baptized Virginia Dare, the first white Christian born in Virginia. D. S. SCHAFF.
The Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. John Moore,

ginians were almost exclusively Episcopalians.

The church continued to grow, especially under the war the church was a melancholy wreck.

The first meeting for organization was held at

New Brunswick, N.J., in May, 1784. In Septem ber, 1785, another convention was held in Philadelphia, when the so-called “Proposed Book” was drawn up, and when the convention also framed and adopted a constitution for the church known as

“The Protestant Episcopal Church.” At this convention held in Philadelphia the following

June, the members not being satisfied with the consecration of Dr. Seabury, the Rev. Samuel

Provoost, D.D., the Rev. William White, D.D.,

and the Rev. David Griffith, D.D., were chosen, and instructed to proceed to England, and obtain consecration. Feb. 4, 1757, Drs. White and Provoost were consecrated in Lambeth Chapel by

the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. John Moore,

Dr. Griffith failing to appear. Subsequently the Rev. James Madison, D.D., was consecrated, the organization of the church. The presiding officer of the General Convention meets triennially. The Diocesan

meets annually; being composed of three lay deleates from missionary jurisdictions to a seat;

and they also have a voice on matters in which they are specially interested, but have no vote.

The upper house is presided over by the bishop senior in consecration, who also has charge of various interests affecting the general administration of the church. The presiding officer of the lower house is chosen by ballot. The General Convention meets triennially. The Diocesan

meets annually; being composed of three lay deleates from each parish in union with the convention, in addition to the duly qualified parochial clergy. Recently the attempt has been made, with some degree of success, to introduce the provincial system, in accordance with which two or more dioceses may enter into a confederation for the purpose of promoting such particular objects as may not come within the range of either Diocesan or General Conventions. Such confederated dioceses may have a special council and an appellate court. Many dioceses are divided into convocations, whose chief work is to advance missions within their own boundaries.

Lay representation forms a special feature of this church, in which respect it is unlike the Church of England.

Discipline. — The discipline of the church is administered in accordance with the canons expressly provided; and all classes of the bishops, clergy, and laity, must be presented and tried by their peers. The church at large has no appellate court; but an appeal may be taken to the General Convention.

Doctrine. — The doctrine of the church, as drawn from Holy Scripture, is incorporated in the Book of Common Prayer, and is expressed chiefly by means of the Apostles’ and the Nicene

Creed, together with thirty-eight of the Articles of the Church of England, modified to meet the condition of things in this country. In framing the Book of Common Prayer, the American Church, while affirming a general agreement with the Church of England, made certain departures. The Athanasian Creed is omitted. In the Apostles’ Creed, the clause “He descended into hell” is made optional, as well as the use of the sign of the cross in baptism; while the Absolution is made declarative, instead of positive, and is left out of the office for the visitation of the sick. In various other respects the American Prayer-

Book conforms better to the wants of the average mind. The office for the Holy Communion is generally regarded as more especially the work of Bishop Seabury, showing as it does, quite strongly,

the influence of the Scotch Communion office.

Yet, while decided in its teaching as respects the presence of Christ in the sacrament, its language is irrevocably opposed to the theory of an objective presence, as it is to consubstantiation; the worshipper being taught that Christ is truly present, but in a spiritual sense, and in a manner that had baffled all attempts at statement upon the part of the doctors of the Catholic Church. The baptismal office has been cited in support of that extreme view of "the washing of regeneration" which has been pushed to the border of the opus operatum; yet the bishops of the church, in 1570, put forth what is known as the "Declaration," affirming that the word "regenerate" is not used in the baptismal office so as to determine that a moral change in the subject of baptism is wrought in the sacrament." The Articles, to which Bishop Seabury was strenuously opposed, as the Scotch Church had none, do not meet with universal approval. In substance they are orthodox, and in spirit thoroughly Protestant; still they are intended to be comprehensive. On Predestination and Free Will they seem to serve the purpose of both Calvinist and Arminian. Indeed, the entire doctrinal system of the Protestant-Episcopal Church is tolerant. The church has continued in the lines of reformation adopted by the Church of England, in opposition to the policy of many Roman Catholics. The Episcopal Church is not affected by the legendarian.

Institutions. — The institutions of the church are quite numerous, and the principal ones only can be mentioned. The foremost is the Domesday, and the American Church Building-Fund Society, and the American Church Missionary Society. Mention should also be made of the Episcopal Church, which, in the Protestant type of thought, which, in the Protestant Episcopal Church, often comprehends the liberal Evangelical and the high advocate of church order; being a feeling as well as a conviction, though it also includes the rationalist and the legendarian.

The English, unlike the Continental Reformation, was political in its origin. Henry VIII., casting off the yoke of the Pope of Rome, became himself the Pope of England. Thus released from ecclesiastical bondage, the English Church, under Edward VI., who was largely guided by Archbishop Cranmer, attained a much more intelligent conception of spiritual truth.

The English reformers compiled the First Book of Edward, but died before they had completed the Second. During Mary's reign, the Church of England fell back into the superstitious Latin Church, which were issued in 1571, were, as a consequence, uncompromisingly Protestant in their tone. The royal commissioners of 1689 failed in their effort to bring the Formulary back to the spirit of the Second Book of Edward.

The English Prayer-Book, being thus the offspring of compromise, contains within itself antagonist elements; its ritual (which constitutes its educating power) looking towards Rome; its articles of faith, towards Geneva. As a conse-
The Church of Rome. It is estimated that by land with Anglo-Catholic ideas. These ideas now prevalent in the Church of England and became the Protestant-Episcopal Church of the United States; conspicuously so at the time consigned, on the other—became increasingly distinct and pronounced; the latter grasping the organized machinery of the church in its domestic missionary work; and the former, in self-defence, organizing three societies, — one for publication, a second for missionary labor, and a third for ministerial education. The Low-Church party sought in this way to defend, conserve, and disseminate its principles.

These measures widened the chasm. Evangelical men became more and more restive as the purpose of the dominant party to mould and control the church in the interest of mediaevalism became increasingly apparent. Discussions were had, conferences held. Particular attention began to be paid to the writings of the English reformers; and finally the conclusion was reached by many, that the root of the difficulties which beset the church was to be found in the Romanism latent in the Book of Common Prayer as a result of the Elizabethan compromise. Urged by this conviction, a movement was quietly set on foot looking toward the revision of the Prayer-Book; and at a conference held in Philadelphia, 1867, a committee was appointed to consider and report upon the subject. Meanwhile the flames of discontent were fanned by events which indicated a determination on the part of the High-Church party to deal oppressively and repressively with their opponents.

These events were keenly watched by the Christian public generally, and undoubtedly exerted a great influence on the struggle.

I. The trial (February, 1867) and admonition of the Rev. S. H. Tyng, jun., for preaching in a Methodist Church in New Brunswick, N. J., within the claimed parochial limits of a parish of the Protestant-Episcopal Church.

II. The trial (1868) of Rev. J. P. Hubbard of Rhode Island, for exchanging pulpits with a Baptist clergyman.

III. The sentence of suspension, subsequently of degradation, passed by an ecclesiastical court, in the diocese of Illinois, upon Rev. (now Bishop) Charles E. Cheney, for the omission of the word "regenerate" in the baptismal office.

Meanwhile the General Convention of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, which meets triennially, was besieged with remonstrances, suggestions, and petitions for redress and relief. These pleadings brought no result. The applications were either dishonored, or referred to committees, for quiet burial, to be heard of no more.

The fate of these measures convinced many of the Low-Church party that the dominant majority were resolved to yield nothing, that no reform could be brought about within the Protestant-Episcopal Church, and they must either crush their consciences, or seek relief elsewhere.

They were anxiously waiting the indications of Providence when the Sixth General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance met in the city of New York (October, 1873). While this distinguished body was in session, a union communion service was held in one of the churches of the city, at which, in company with the representatives of other denominations, Bishop George D. Cummins, D.D., assistant bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the diocese of Kentucky, by invitation officiated. For this act of Christian courtesy and fellowship he was at once bitterly assailed through the press by representatives of the High-Church party. Pained by this manifestation of exclusiveness, and convinced, by previous experience in the diocese of Kentucky, that his official position obliged him to countenance, in some degree, the growing evils of ritualism, Bishop Cummins reached the conclusion that he could not, without sin, longer give his life, ministry, and influence to the advancement of a church, the theory and practice of which, as interpreted by the great majority of its adherents, denied the brotherhood of believers in Christ.
EPISCOPAL CHURCH.  750

The oblation of the Body and Blood of Christ is offered to have addition to the membership by confirmation and the United States, in England, Canada, and the Bermuda Islands. It has parishes in the chief cities of the United States as the Word of God, and the sole Rule of Faith and Practice; in the Creed "commonly called the Apostles' Creed;" in the Divine institution of the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper; and in the doctrines of grace substantially as they are set forth in the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion.

I. — This Church recognizes and adheres to Episcopacy, not as of divine right, but as a very ancient and desirable form of church polity. It holds the Divinity of Christ, the descent of the Holy Spirit at the baptism of Jesus, the atonement by his suffering and death, and his ascension into heaven. It accepts the Book of Common Prayer, as it was revised, proposed, and recommended for use by the General Convention of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, A.D. 1785, reserving full liberty to alter, abridge, enlarge, and amend the same, as may seem most conducive to the edification of the people, "providing that the substance of the faith be kept entire.

II. — This Church recognizes but two orders in the ministry,—the presbyterate and the diaconate. The episcopate is not an order, but an office; the bishop being simply the first presbyter. The bishops preside over synods or jurisdictions, do not, as in the Protestant-Episcopal Church, constitute a separate house, but in council vote with and as their brother-presbyters, and are subject to confirmation or appointment by the General Council. See Journals Eight General Councils R. E. C.; Memoir Bishop Cummins, N.Y., 1878; B. Aycrigg: Memoirs R. E. C., N.Y., 1875, new ed., 1893.

EPISCOPIUS, Simon, b. in Amsterdam, 1583; d. there 1648; studied, at Leyden, philosophy and theology, under Jacob Arminius and Francis Gomarus; but, when the great controversy between the Arminians and the Gomarists broke out, he declared for the former, and suffered (especially after the death of Arminius, 1609) so much from the intolerance of the latter, that he left Leyden altogether, and settled at Franeker. In 1610 he accepted the position as minister of Blyswick, a village in the neighborhood of Rotterdam; and when in 1611, Gomarus retired from his chair in Leyden, Episcopius was appointed his successor. In the beginning he experienced no troubles. He wrote his commentaries upon the Revelation and the First Epistle of John, his paraphrase of the twenty-four first chapters of Matthew, etc.; but by degrees, as his fame grew and the importance of the Arminian party increased, the annoyances from the side of the Gomarists began. At the synod of Dort (1618) he was the principal spokesman of the Arminians, but produced very little effect. He and twelve other Arminian theologians were condemned by the synod, and banished from the country. Episcopius went to the Spanish Netherlands, and settled in Brussels, where he wrote his Confessio (1622), in the name of all Arminian theologians, and his Responsio ad duas Petri Waddingi Jesu Mariae, etc. On the outbreak of the war between France and Spain he removed to France, where he lived, partly in Paris and partly in Rouen, and wrote a great number of his minor treatises. In 1628 he was allowed to return to his native country, and was appointed preacher at the Reformed Church in Amsterdam, and in 1634 professor of theology in the Arminian college in that city. To this last period of his life belong, besides his Apologia pro Confessione et Verus Theologus Remonstrans, his two principal works, Institutiones Theologicae and Responsio ad auestiones Theologicae, which became the standard works of Arminian theology. A collected edition of his works appeared in two volumesfolio, the first volume edited by Carcellaeus, 1650, the second by Pölenbrugh, 1665. His life was written by Philip Limborch in Dutch, and afterwards translated into Latin, 1701. [See Calder: Memoirs of Simon Episcopius, New York, 1837.]

HEPTE.

EPISCOPIUS IN PARTIBUS, episcopus titularius, episcopus suffraganeus. When the Arabs conquered the southern part of Spain, the Christian bishops were expelled, and fled to Oviedo. There they remained for centuries, waiting for a return to their dioceses; and when one of them died, a successor was immediately appointed to him. Something similar took place when the Eastern Church was broken up by the Mohammedans. Dioceses entirely in the hands of the infidels had bishops, who lived in Rome, or elsewhere, as it became customary to employ these bishops without dioceses as help to such bishops as were unable to manage the whole business of their diocese. Many misuses and corruptions grew.

His letters were the answers of his heart and head to questions submitted to him. He put all his learning, his dialectical skill, his tact and judgment, and also his love and affection, into a prayer for the salvation of his fellow converts and friends. His fellow-writers did the same, according to their ability.

In the Epistles are many doctrinal statements, upon which different theologies are founded, besides rich practical instruction. The chief facts of the gospel are alluded to; and so, if the Gospels were destroyed, the Church would yet possess an inspired though fragmentary history of her Lord. One of the most important services of the Epistles is their stimulus and support to the piety of the Church. Many passages in Paul’s writings, 1 and 2 Peter, and 1 John entire, have ever been of incalculable value in centering the thought of the Church upon Christ. The common sense of James makes it the “business man’s epistle;” but even this is full of the spirit of the Master. No other religion can boast of such letters as the twenty-one Epistles of the New Testament. Their existence is an unanswerable argument for the divine origin of Christianity.

EPISTOLE OBSCURORVM VIORUM.

The first edition of this famous book appeared in 1515, containing forty-one letters. A second edition, unchanged, soon followed, and a year later a third, augmented with seven letters. In 1517 a new series appeared, numbering sixty-two letters, which in the second edition were augmented with eight. Full information with respect to the history of the work may be found in Eduard Böcking: Ulrichi Hutteni operum supplementum, Leipzig, 1864–70, 2 vols., containing also the various answers to the book.

The immediate occasion for the production of the Epistle obscurorum viorum was the publication in 1514, at Tübingen, of the Epistle clarorum viorum. The latter intended to place the mental wealth of the humanists in a proper light; and, as a supplement, the former undertook to give a picture of the mental poverty and moral obscenity of the Roman-Catholic Church, its monks, and its scholasticism. In its details the book is often coarse, and somewhat offensive to modern taste; but, considered as a whole, it is nevertheless a brilliant performance. The caricature of
The style and language then used in the monasteries is extremely ludicrous; and the naïveté with which the monks lay bare their own ignorance and stupidity is very enjoyable.

With respect to the authorship, the plan of this "minimal satyrē" was due to Crotus Rubianus; and Ulrich von Huten, a learned and fearless knight (see art.), was his principal collaborator. The effect was tremendous. In some places the monks mistook the book, and believed it to be a serious performance in their favor; but the mistake was of course soon discovered, and the delight turned into rage. Ortwin Gratius, to whom the letters are addressed, a comical person, used his example against the hierarchy, when forbidden to preach because they were used to date the year after the reign of the king, as is done in Kings, Chronicles, and the Prophets. When the Israelites had kings of their own, they dated the year after the reign of the king; and, though in the reign of the king of Judah and of the king of Israel, the year began after the year of the king, the reference now was to the date of the year of the Israelite king. The dates of this kind also occur in the New Testament (Luke iii. 1; Matt. ii. 1; Luke i. 5). Sometimes, though not often, great national events are used as chronological starting-points; as, for instance, the exodus (Exod. xix. 1; Num. xxxiiii. 28; 1 Kings vi. 1), or the beginning of the Babylonian exile (Ezek. xxxiiii. 21, xi. 1). When the Jews became Syrian subjects, they adopted the Seleucid era, beginning with the year 312 B.C. It is uniformly used in the first two books of the Maccabees; but so real was the character of these books, that the authors of the books of the Maccabees do not date from exactly the same starting-point.

The establishment of the Christian Church was not immediately followed by the establishment of the Christian era. For centuries the Christians continued to date, each in the way to which he was accustomed. Thus the Christians of the East continued to use the Seleucid era; and, indeed, the Syrian Christians still use it in all ecclesiastical affairs beside the Christian era, only that a difference with respect to the computation of New Year has crept in among them; the Nestorians and Jacobites reckoning from Oct. 1, and the Roman Catholics from Sept. 1. In Alexandria the era of Diocletian was adopted for the computation of Easter. It begins with the reign of Diocletian (Aug. 29, 284); and, as this reign was ushered in with horrible persecutions, the era received the name of æra Martyrum. It was commonly used in Egypt, in all civil affairs, down to the invasion of the Arabs; and it is still used by the Egyptian and Ethiopian Christians, though the latter also employ a world-era, beginning from the creation. The Christian Armenians date from the year 551 A.D., when their chronology was reformed and finally fixed by the patriarch Moses.

The Christian era, thus called because it dates from the person of Christ, is now universally used by the nations of Europe and America; but five centuries elapsed before it was invented, and five more before it was generally adopted. In 537 the Emperor Justinian ordered that all public documents should be dated by the year of the emperor, the name of the consul, the indication (tax-period), the month, and the day (Novella, XLVII). But in 541 the third civil war came, and the need of a new starting-point for the computation of time, fixed once for all, and generally adopted, became more and more urgent. Meanwhile, in 526, the Roman abbot, Dionysius, had begun in his Easter-tables to count the years ab incarnatione Domini, and not after the era of Diocletian; which, though adopted by the Alexandrians, never became popular among the Christians. The first year of this Dionysian era runs from Jan. 1 to Dec. 31, 754 A.U.C.; and the birth of Jesus falls towards the close of the year,—Dec. 25, as, according to common patristical usage, incarnatio means conceptio, and not nativitas. This method of computing time found great favor; and Bede and Charlemagne contributed much to introduce it. In the tenth century it was widely adopted. In Spain, however, it did not supersede the so-called Spanish era, beginning with the year 716 B.C., until the latter part of the fourteenth century. In Russia it was introduced in 1700 by Peter the Great. Great inconveniences arose at first, from the circumstances that, in different places, the year was begun at different dates. — Dec. 25, Jan. 1, March 25, or Easter Day. Thus there was a difference of a whole year between the chronology of Pisa and that of Florence; and uniformity was not established until 1749. The German emperor began the year at Dec. 25, until the latter part of the sixteenth century; France, at Easter Day, until 1567. Jan. 1 was not fixed upon as New-Year's Day in Scotland until 1599, and in England 1752. A world's era, dating from the creation, and constructed out of the Old Testament, was in use among the Jews at the time of Christ. The Jewish historian, Josephus, employs it in his work on archaeology. Such an era seems to recommend itself in several respects; but its construction presents difficulties which can hardly ever be overcome. Every scholar who tries comes to a different result. L'art de vérifier les dates gives no less than a hundred and eight different views; and the two extremes differ no less than two thousand years from each other. Julius Africanus counts, from the creation to Christ, 5,500 years; Eusebius, Bede, and the Roman martyrologium, 5,199; Scaliger and Calvisius, 3,950; Kepler and Petaurus, 3,944; Ussher, 4,004, etc. Uniformity is not to be hoped for under such circumstances; and without uniformity no practical good can be accomplished. The so-called Byzantine or Constantinopolitan era also begins from creation, and counts 5,509 years down to Christ. It first occurs in the Chronicon Paschale, from the seventh century; but it was afterwards generally adopted by the Byzantine historians, the East-Roman emperors, and the patriarchs of the Eastern Church, and it is still used throughout the Greek Church, with the exception of Russia.

ERASMUS, St., was bishop somewhere in the patriarchate of Antioch, suffered much under Diocletian in Antioch and Sirmium, and d. at Formia in Campania, whither he had retired. Already Gregory the Great calls him a martyr (Ep. 1. 9), and his acts are found in Act. Sanct., June 2. In the Formia of Florence, destroyed by the Saracens, his bones were brought to Gaeta; nevertheless, several other Italian cities boast of possessing them. As he is often represented with the intestines laid bare, he has become the popular patron of stomach-ache and all kinds of complaints of the bowels. In Italy and Portugal he is worshipped under the name of St. Elmo.

ERASMUS, Desiderius, the most brilliant representative of humanistic culture at the beginning of the sixteenth century, and the head of a movement in the interest of a reformation of ecclesiastical abuses which prepared the way for the Protestant Reformation. His life divides itself naturally into three periods; the first, lasting till 1507, was the period of gradual emancipation from the fetters of his age; the second lasted till 1519, and marked his greatest reputation and most efficient reformatory activity; the last is the period of conflict, isolation, and final abandonment of the Reformation movement.

Erasmus was b. in Rotterdam, and d. in Basel July 12, 1536. The date of his birth is variously put in 1466, 1467, and 1469. Oct. 28, 1465, is probably the right one, and is favored by the statement of Rhenanus, that Erasmus died in his seventieth year, as by his own statement (Ep. 207, Feb. 26, 1518), "I was sixty last first year." He seems to have been born out of wedlock. His father, Gerhard Roger, according to some accounts, was a priest at the time; but according to others he did not enter a convent till after the event. Erasmus was sent to the famous school of Hegius at Deventer, attended at that time by two thousand scholars. His parents died in his thirteenth year, and, being cheated by a guardian out of his inheritance, he entered the convent school of Herzogenbusch, and subsequently took vows in the convent of Emaus, at Steyn. At a later period (1514) he calls this step the direst misfortune of his life. In 1491 he went into the service of the Bishop of Cambray, who sent him to Paris to conclude his studies. While attending the College of Montaigu he contracted a disease, which forced him to seek relief in Holland. Returning to Paris, he acted as tutor to several English youths, one of whom, Lord Mountjoy, induced him to visit England in 1498. Erasmus resided for a while at Oxford, and formed a close friendship with More and Colet. In the face of Henry VII.'s offer of a house, and a pension amounting to a thousand pounds in present money, he returned to the Continent. In 1500 his Adagia (a collection of proverbs and witty sayings derived from ancient writers) appeared, and in 1502 the Enchiridion Militis Christiani, which, he says, was "designed to counteract the error of those who place piety in ceremonies and external observances, but neglect its very essence" (Ep. 102). In 1505 he edited Valla's Annotations to the New Testament with a preface, which calls for a return to the Greek text, and its grammatical exposition as the fundamental conditions of a right understanding of the Scriptures. In 1506 he visited Italy, taking the degree of doctor of divinity at Turin, and receiving from the highest dignitaries marks of distinction. In 1509 he returned to England, forming on the way the plan of his Encomium Moriae ("The Praise of Folly"), which subsequently appeared with a dedication to More in 1511. Here the second period of his career begins.

Erasmus was now in the zenith of his fame, a fame which has never been surpassed in the annals of letters. He lived in England about five years, a part of the time lecturing at Cambridge. Returning to Brabant, he was elected by the archduke one of his counsellors, and subsequently to a similar position by Charles V. From 1515 to 1521 he resided in Brussels, Antwerp, and Louvain (Ep. 384). A papal brief gave him a much desired relief from the duties and dress of his monastic vow. From 1514 all his writings were published by Froben at Basel. This necessitated frequent journeys to Switzerland through Germany. These journeys were triumphant processions; scholars, councils, and bishops doing him homage. His correspondence at this period was enormous, and included princes, the highest prelates, and the Pope himself. In Germany a party grew up called the "Erasmians," which regarded him as a leader of a new movement in the church as well as in the department of letters. Among the writings of this period are a school-book, de Duplici Copia Verborum ac Rerum, 1512, and the Colloquia Familia; 1518, 1522, much enlarged in 1526. The latter is the most read of all Erasmus' writings. It contains the keenest sarcasm, and wittiest satire, and he laid the egg which Luther hatched out. It was the first principle of life: in Erasmus it was the enthusiasm of a moral cause. He says he would rather sacrifice a part of the truth than destroy peace (Ep. 643, Dec. 25, 1522). After long vacillation, in which the fear of man comes out only too conspicuously, he cut loose from the Reformation.

The third period of Erasmus' life is marked by a complete rupture with the Reformers. The most prominent of these attributed their emancipation from the dominion of the Church to his writings. He was popularly classed with them. But Luther saw deeper, and wrote to Lange (Letters 22, 29), "I fear that Erasmus does not sufficiently exalt Christ and the divine grace." But down to his letter of March 28, 1519, to Erasmus, he had the highest esteem for him, calling him "our pride and hope." In his reply (Ep. 320) Erasmus, while applauding Luther's attitude towards the friars, counsels him to be moderate and careful. After preserving, as long as it was possible, an attitude of neutrality, he gradually drew off from the German reformer, and studiously avoided his writings, lest he should be called upon to give an opinion upon them. [Mr. Froude keenly discriminates between these two men in his essay: "In Luther, belief in God was the first principle of life; in Erasmus it was an inference which might be taken away, and yet leave the world a very tolerable and habitable place," etc.] In spite of this, his enemies (Ep. 562) said Luther had sucked poison at his breast, or that he "laid the egg which Luther hatched out." Erasmus was, however, still opposed to persecution, and did not conceal his disgust at the papal bull of excommunication. But in a letter to Leo X., dated Sept. 13, 1520, he hastens to clear himself of all connection with the excommunicated reformer, and to declare that only his imprudence, and fear of stirring up strife, keep him from answering Luther (Ep. 599). Neither death nor life would induce him to leave the communion of the Church (Ep. 621, 645).

In 1521, no longer feeling himself safe in the Netherlands, Erasmus went to Basel to reside permanently. The open breach with Luther was now to occur. In September, 1524, he wrote, in answer to the reformer's Diatribe de Libero Arbitrio. The work shows him to be unequal to the problem, and inferior to Luther, who replied in the De Servo Arbitrio. Erasmus wrote, in 1526, a feeble retort, — Hyperaspistes. Luther henceforth regarded Erasmus as a "sceptic and epicurean, an enemy of all true religion." In 1523 Erasmus broke off correspondence with Zwingli, and henceforth he regarded the Reformation as a calamity and a crime (Ep. 906). In contrast to his former utterances, he now ridiculed the marriage of the clergy, and proclaimed for the authority of the Church to punish heretics with death. The Reformation extended to Basel; and he removed to Freiburg, in Breisgau, where he heard with satisfaction the news of Zwingli's and Calvin's situation en face de l'église et de la libre pensée, calamity and a crime (Ep. 906). In contrast to his former utterances, he now ridiculed the marriage of the clergy, and proclaimed for the authority of the Church to punish heretics with death. While bowing submissively to the Church, he still continued to ridicule ecclesiastical abuses. The Sorbonne, in 1527, condemned thirty-two articles extracted from his works, after having previously forbidden the circulation of the Colloquies in France. But the Pope's friendship suffered no abatement. Paul III. offered to make him cardinal, but he declined on account of age. Erasmus returned to Basel in 1535, where he died of an attack of his old trouble, the stone, combined with dysentery. He died without the priest, but invoking the mercy of Christ. His body lies interred in the cathedral of Basel. A lifelike portrait by Hans Holbein hangs in the museum of the same city.

ERASTIANISM. See ERASTUS.

ERASTUS, Thomas, b. Sept. 7, 1524, at Baden, in Switzerland, or, according to another account, at Augen, in the margraviate of Baden; d. at Basel, Jan. 1, 1583; studied theology at Basel, and philosophy and medicine at Bologna and Padua, and was in 1585 appointed body-physician to the elector-palatine, and professor of medicine, and in 1586 he moved, as professor of medicine, to Basel. As a practical physician he enjoyed a great reputation, and as a student of nature he strenuously opposed the astrology, alchemy, and magic of Paracelsus and his school; but it is chiefly as a theologian that his name has become known to the afterworld. He was a pupil of Zwingli; took active part in the conferences at Heidelberg (1560) and Maulbronn (1564); and defended, in the controversy concerning the Lord's Supper, the Swiss view against Dr. Johann Marbach, a Lutheran minister at Strassburg. Some years later he had occasion to defend his master's ideas against the Calvinists in a question of church-polity. There was in Heidelberg a Calvinist party, headed by Caspar Olearius, which wanted to introduce in the country a purely presbyterian church-constitution with a corresponding church-discipline. Erastus strongly opposed the movement, but in vain. He was himself the very first victim of the established church-discipline, being excommunicated on a charge of latent Unitarianism. He was restored after five years; but, six years after his death (1589), Castelvetro, who had married his widow, published a work of his, Explicatio graecissimae questionis, utrum excommunicatio manuitur divino, an expugnata sit ab hominibus, written in 1568, and found among his posthumous papers. The book, written, according to the fashion of the time, in form of theses, and denying that excommunication is a divine ordinance, that the Church has any power to make laws or decrees, and to inflict pains and penalties of any kind, that the sins of professing Christians are to be punished by pastors and elders, instead of the civil magistrate, etc., attracted much attention, and was attacked by Beza. It was translated into English in 1639, and again, in 1644, by R. Lee; and its views were adopted by a distinct party in the Westminster Assembly, headed by Selden, Lightfoot, Coleman, and White Locke. Since that time the doctrine of the State supremacy in ecclesiastical causes generally goes under the name of Erastianism; though in its broad sense, and wide application, this doctrine is by no means due to Erastus. ERNESTI, Johann August, b. Aug. 4, 1707, at Tennstädt, in Thuringia; d. at Leipzig, Sept. 11, 1781; studied at Wittenberg and Leipzig, and was appointed professor, in the latter place, of classical literature (1742), of rhetoric (1748), and of theology (1758). As a philologist he enjoyed a great fame. His editions of Cicero, Homer, Xenophon, Tacitus, etc., were celebrated; and his Opuscula Oratoria (1762), Opuscula philologico-critica (1764), and Inuita Doctrina Solidaria (1736) were much read. His principal theological work is his Instituto Interpretis N.T. (1761), [translated into English by Terrot, and published in the Biblical Cabinet, Edinburgh, 1834] which opened a new epoch in the history of hermeneutics, and founded the grammatico-historical school. Its principle is, that in the divinely inspired book, the sense shall not be sought for, nor can it be found out, by any other method than that applied to an ordinary human book; and by this principle the chains of the old dogmatical method of interpretation were burst. His other works, also edited and published, were of the same spirit. E. W. W. historis. 1760-69, second, 1775-79. See TELLER: Ernesti Verdienste um Theologie und Religion, Leipzig, 1783; SEMLER: Zusätze zu Teller, Halle, 1783.
ERSKINE, Ebenezer, M.A., founder of the Scottish Secession Church; b. June 22, 1680; d. June 26, 1776. His father, Henry Erskine, an English Nonconformist minister (ejected by the Act of Conformity, 1662), and a sufferer otherwise from the persecutions of the reign of Charles II.), belonged to the family of the Earls of Mar. His mother, Margaret Halcro, was descended, on one side, from Halcro, Prince of Denmark, and on the other from the Duke of Albany, son of James V. of Scotland. Both parents were even more distinguished by their piety and holy living than by birth. The son inherited their more valuable qualities, but also somewhat of the high spirit of their race. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and having been licensed as a probationer in February, 1703, he was ordained minister of the parish of Portmoak before the end of the same year. In 1731 he was translated to the more important charge of Stirling, which he occupied till his deposition from the ministry of the Church of Scotland, in 1740.

As a minister of the National Church, no less than after his secession, his labors were most abundant, and eminently successful. Few ministers of that day enjoyed greater popularity as a preacher. People came from distances of sixty or seventy miles to benefit by his ministrations; and at the dispensation of the communion it was sometimes found necessary, even in the small parish of Portmoak, to make provision for no fewer than two thousand participants. His discourses were plain, even homely in style, but were delivered with a certain elevation and dignity of manner which was always characteristic of him. A contemporary, Mr. Hutton, minister of Dalkeith, writes, "I never saw so much of the majesty of God in any mortal man as in Ebenezer Erskine."

But it is chiefly as a leader in ecclesiastical affairs, at a critical period of the history of the Church of Scotland, that Mr. Erskine is known. In his own day, or will be remembered in after-times. The ministry of the secessionists of 1733 (at that movement small, but destined to influence materially the ecclesiastical and religious life of Scotland) cannot be told here. (See Secession Church.) Of this first considerable division in the Scottish Church, Mr. Erskine is admitted both by friends and foes to have been the prime mover. The immediate occasion of the rupture was an act of the General Assembly of 1732, in connection with the casus renovae of Patronage. It may be noticed, however, that the relations of Mr. Ebenezer Erskine and his followers to the "ruling party in the Church" had been already strained long before this; first, in the controversy as to The Marrow of Modern Divinity,—a book condemned by the Assembly, but which Erskine and others as warmly approved; and again, in a celebrated case of alleged heresy,—the case of Mr. John Simson, professor of divinity in the University of Glasgow. In fact, in announcing their secession in the formal Protest of Nov. 16, 1733, the four original members of the Associate Synod, as the new body was at first called, expressly expressed the step which they felt it their duty to take, not to any one act of the Church, but to "a course of defection from our Reformed and covenanting principles."

Among the incidents of his later years must not be omitted the part he took at the time of the rebellion of 1745, when he even offered his services as a volunteer soldier on behalf of the government, and for his patriotic conduct received the public thanks of the Duke of Cumberland. It is also to his credit, that when the Associate Synod was in 1747 rent asunder by disputes as to the religious clauses in some burgher oaths, he took the side of toleration, refusing to make non-subscription a term of communion.

Mr. Erskine was twice married, and left a numerous family. His only published works were occasional sermons, collected after his death in four volumes 12mo.

ERSKINE, John, D.D., a distinguished minister of the Church of Scotland; b. at Edinburgh in (or about) 1721; d. there Jan. 19, 1803. He was the eldest son of John Erskine, Esq., of Carnock, Stirlingshire, bar, and the author of The Institutes of the Law of Scotland. His mother was a daughter of the Hon. James Melville of Bagarvie, and grand-daughter of the fourth Lord Melville. It had been intended by his parents that he should follow his father's profession; and for a year or two, out of deference to their wishes, he applied himself to the study of law. But a strong predilection for the service of the Church had been early formed, and showed itself, even while he was still a law-student, in the publication of a theological work which gained him the friendship and correspondence of Bishop Warburton. He became a licentiate of the Church in 1743; and in 1744 he was ordained minister of the parish of Kirkintilloch, near Glasgow. In this laborious country-charge Dr. Erskine, from the first, devoted himself earnestly to the performance of his professional duties, with the duties which throughout his life he always regarded as having paramount claims on his attention. And he here, also, formed those habits of careful preparation for the pulpit which never failed to render his sermons, which are vigorous... expositions of Calvinism, if not eloquent, interesting and useful.

It was at this period of his life, too, that he began a practice which illustrates an important phase of his character; namely, that of maintaining friendly intercourse on religious questions with the representatives of foreign churches. In an age of bigotry and intolerance—at least among the members of the party to which he himself belonged—Dr. Erskine was, if no Broad Churchman in the modern acceptation of the term, a man of wide sympathies and enlightened Christian liberality.

In the list of his earliest correspondents were several distinguished ministers of America, amongst them being found the honored name of Jonathan Edwards. A frequent interchange of letters between Dr. Erskine and leading American ministers was indeed continued down to his death. Reference has already been made to his friendly intercourse with Bishop Whiteburton, many of whose letters will be found in Moncreiff's Life. He had no less loyal correspondence with some of the English Dissenters, especially with Mr. George Whitefield and the Wesleys. His correspondence with members of the Continental churches was carried on for a long time under circumstances of peculiar difficulty, from his ignorance of any foreign language except French; and it is a singular proof at once of his Christian liberality. In the list of his earliest correspondents were several distinguished ministers of foreign churches, at least as far as Dr. Erskine's knowledge of those languages would permit him to appreciate their views. Such views were, in Scotland at least, equally indifferent to what is now recognized as one of the chief obligations of the Christian Church.

It is greatly to Dr. Erskine's honor that he was one of the first advocates of missions to the heathen in the Church of Scotland, having actively supported and strenuously defended them to a time when, as a rule, churchmen and dissenters were, in Scotland, at least, equally indifferent to what is now recognized as one of the chief obligations of the Christian Church.

He was married in the year 1746; his wife being Christian Mackay, a daughter of George, Lord Reay. In 1750 he was translated from Kirkintilloch to the parish of Cilross, and thence he removed, in 1758, to New Greyfriar's Church, Edinburgh; which charge he held for nine years, afterwards exchanging it for the Collegiate Church of Old Greyfriars in the same city. Here he had Principal Robertson, the historian of Charles V., as his colleague, and, in spite of their differences in ecclesiastical politics, as one of his best friends. In Edinburgh he found his work as a minister somewhat different in character from that of either of his country parishes, but not less laborious; and he was equally conscientious in giving his first attention to it, while always finding time for literary study, and for social intercourse with his friends. As an Edinburgh minister, he was also called to take a more prominent place in public business than before. As a leader in the church courts, he represented for many years the evangelical party in the Church. In this position, as in every other, he was far from adopting extreme views; and it may be added that he enjoyed the respect and esteem of all parties throughout the whole of his long and useful life.

Lit. — A striking description of Dr. Erskine's appearance and manner in the pulpit, and his character as a preacher, evidently derived from personal observation, is given by Sir Walter Scott, in his Minstrelsy (see above), p. 383. Two graphic pen-and-ink sketches of him, with biographical notices, will be found in Kay's Series of Original Portraits, Edinburgh, 1857, vol. I. pp. 171–176. See, however, especially, the Account of the Life and Writings of John Erskine, D.D., by Sir Henry Moncreiff Wellwood, D.D., Edinburgh, 1818.

ERSKINE, Ralph, M.A., minister of Dunfermline, N.B.; b. at Monilaws, on the English border, March 15, 1685; d. at Dunfermline, Nov. 6, 1752. He was a brother of Ebenezer Erskine (see above), whose ecclesiastical views he sympathized, and whose secession from the Church he eventually joined. His diary shows him to have been a man of fervent piety. He was hardly less popular as a preacher than his brother; and his Gospel Sonnets and other Scripture Songs were received with favor in his own day. His works were published after his death, in two vols. folio, Glasgow, 1764. See Donald Fraser: Life and Diary of Ralph Erskine, Edinburgh, 1834.

ERSKINE, Thomas, of Linlathen, b. in Edinburgh, Oct. 13, 1778; d. there March 20, 1870. He was educated a lawyer, and practised from 1810 to 1816; but then, succeeding to the family estate at Linlathen, near Dundee, he retired from the bar, and spent the rest of his life in the care of his property, and in literary labors in behalf of his views. He never married. While still a young man, he rebelled at the current Scotch theology, and at length found what he conceived was a better way in which to represent the divine revelation. His views may be thus expressed: the only proper criterion of the truth of Christianity is "its conformity or nonconformity with man's spiritual nature, and its adaptability or nonadaptability to man's universal and deepest spiritual needs." The incarnation of Christ was the necessary manifestation to man of an eternal sonship in the divine nature, apart from which those individual qualities which God demands from man could have no sanction." Faith as used in the Bible is "a certain moral or spiritual condition which virtually implied salvation, because it implied the existence of a principle of spiritual life possessed of an immortal power. This faith could be properly awakened only by the manifestation, through Christ, of love as the law of life, and as identical with an eternal righteousness which it was God's purpose to bestow on every individual soul" (Encyc. Brit., 9th ed., vol. viii. pp. 530, 581). Such views were not "orthodox," and at first subjected Mr. Erskine to considerable adverse criticism. But they gained favor; and he numbered among his intimate friends some of the finest minds of the century. — Thomas Carlyle, Edward Irving, Frederick Denison Maurice, John McLeod Campbell, Bishop Ewing, and Dean Stanley. English and American popular religious thought; and it was Campbell’s public advocacy of them which led to his expulsion from the Kirk. Mr. Erskine’s theology was part of his life, it permeated his being; and it was his unflagging delight to impress his views upon all he met. His sincerity, his earnestness, his pure and lofty character, gave him a great influence.

Besides minor and fugitive pieces, he wrote (all except one published in Edinburgh): Remarks on the Internal Evidence for the Truth of Revealed Religion, 1820, 1st ed., 1821, reprinted Andover, 1835, new ed., 1871; An Essay on Faith, 1822, 3d ed., 1823; The Unconditional Freedom of the Gospel, 1828, new ed., 1873; The Brazen Serpent, or Life coming from Death, 1831; The Doctrine of Election, London, 1837. There also appeared, posthumously, Spiritual Order and Other Papers, further, as a mighty and sagacious king. One of the earliest acts of his reign was to subjugate his letters, edited by Dr. William Hanna, with reminiscences by Dean Stanley and Principal Sharp. The numerous cuneiform inscriptions dating from an inscription which speaks of his transplanting “inhabitants of the mountains and the sea of the rising sun” (i.e., the Persian Gulf) to the conquered city of Sidon (Cun. Ins. of West Asia, I. 43, i. 31–35). His records, and those of his son Asurbanipal, represent him, further, as a mighty and successful king. Out of the earliest acts of his reign was to subjugate Babylon (B.C. 680). Thenceforth he repeatedly designates himself “Ruler of Babylon, King of Sumir and Accad” (Southern and Northern Babylon). Polomy’s canon, or list of Babylonian kings, names him as ‘Annegative, and, in agreement with the inscriptions, assigns him a reign of thirteen years. But, besides this, he waged successful wars against districts of Media, and subdued all Western Asia as far as Cyprus, including Judah, Phoenicia, and Phialis. Cylinders from his reign and that of his son give rise to numerous names of “twelve kings of the seacoast” and ten kings of Cyprus who paid tribute to him. The list begins “Baal, king of the land of Tyre; Manasseh, king of the land (var. ‘city’) of Judah; Kausagab, king of the land (var. ‘city’) of Edom; Musuri, king of the land (var. ‘city’ of Moab; Sil-Bel, king of the land (var. ‘city’) of Gaza,” etc. Among the tributaries from Cyprus are the kings of Idalium, Salamis, Paphos, Soli, and Curium. In the latter part of Esarhaddon’s reign (subsequent to B.C. 673) he extended his authority over Egypt. He vanquished the powerful Cushite king, Tirhakah, and put an end to the Cushite dominion in Egypt, where he established his own governors. In his later inscriptions he takes the title “King of Egypt and Cush,” or “King of the Kings of Egypt and Cush.”

Besides these conquests, in which he often showed a wise clemency as well as great military vigor, his reign was marked by splendor at home. He built or restored the “South-west Palace” at Babylon (2Chron. xxxiii.11) was Esarhaddon, or his son Asurbanipal, probably the “great and noble Asnapper” of Ez. iv. 10. The term may have been derived, like the old designation, De Novissimis, from Jesus Sirach (vii. 36). The expression τατοπάρα, or “the last things,” is of biblical origin (comp. Isa. ii. 2; Mic. iv. 1). This sketch cannot go into a discussion of the particular subjects of eschatology. They will be found treated under their special heads,—Anaktastasis, Death, Hades, Purgatory, etc.

The meaning of death, and the question of a future life, have engaged thought at all times; and hardly a people has been found destitute of all belief in a future existence.

The position of the Old Testament on this question has been a matter of dispute. Expositors, from the old Jews and the church fathers down to the present day, have differed as to whether it teaches immortality or not. Israel, in the first instance, turned its hopes not to the destiny of the individual, but to the coming of the Messiah, and the generation living at the time of that coming (Hos. vi.2; Isa.xxv. 8; Ezek. xxxvii.). Only as a secondary matter is the presentiment introduced of the restoration of the righteous dead, who should participate in the glory of Israel (Isa. xxvi. 19; Dan. xii. 2, 13). God is recognized as having power over death and its king (Deut. Hes. ii. 1; Isa. xxv. 5; Ezek. xxxvii.). As a secondary matter is the presentiment introduced of the restoration of the righteous dead, who should participate in the glory of Israel (Isa. xxvi. 19; Dan. xii. 2, 13). God is recognized as having power over death and its king (Deut. Hes. ii. 1; Isa. xxv. 5; Ezek. xxxvii.). As a secondary matter is the presentiment introduced of the restoration of the righteous dead, who should participate in the glory of Israel (Isa. xxvi. 19; Dan. xii. 2, 13). God is recognized as having power over death and its king (Deut. Hes. ii. 1; Isa. xxv. 5; Ezek. xxxvii.). firms the expectation of a Messianic judgment, and the sifting judgment upon God's people and against the world that is at enmity with it. In the Apocrypha the national hope of the Messianic coming is intense, and pictured in rich colors; and at the side of this the belief in personal immortality is brought out, which was afterwards so strong among the Pharisees at the time of Christ.

From an eschatological point of view, as in other respects, our Lord did not destroy, but fulfilled. Adopting the expression "kingdom of God," and associating it with his own person, he gives prominence to the expectation of that kingdom, which was so universal among the Jews. He also predicted his second coming, which implies his resurrection. We must notice the construction he gives to the views he takes up. In the parables of the kingdom of heaven he conveys his resurrection. We must notice the construction he gives to the views he takes up. In the parables of the kingdom of heaven he confirms the expectation of a Messianic judgment, but gives to it a purely moral (as opposed to a national) significance (Matt. viii.11 sqq., xxi.43, xxii.1 sqq.). All will be rewarded in the final adjuration, according to their relation to Christ, with full communion with God on the one hand, or onrushing, not (annihilation) on the other (Matt. vii.21 sqq., xxv.31 sqq.). Of individual immortality our Lord speaks expressly only on special occasions, but then bases it upon our union with God (Matt. xxii.23 sq.). Of this certainty the Gospel of John testifies most positively (iv.14, v.24, vi.39 sq., x.28, xi.25 sqq.).

In the writings of the apostles three things are to be noticed. Their first preaching of the gospel gives prominence to eschatological subjects (Acts ii.17 sqq., iii.19, x.42, xvii.30, 31); (2) The hope of eternal life is associated immediately with the person of a risen Christ, who will return again (1 Cor. xv.; Eph. i.7 sqq.; Col. iii.3, 4; Heb. ix.28; Jas. v.7; 1 Pet. i.7 sqq.; 1 John iii.2, etc.); (3) This hope reaches out with confidence beyond this earthly development, and the moral distinction between heaven and earth shall be blotted out (1 Cor. xv.44 sqq.; 2 Pet. iii.10 sqq.; Rev. xxi.22).

The Church, in its first period, opposed to heathenism and its pessimistic tendency, a renunciation of the world, and a confident assurance of the victory with which it awaits the Lord and prosecutes the evangelization of the world. The second coming of Christ may be called the oldest dogma (Dorner, Person of Christ). This was followed by the pantheistic renunciation of individual immortality. Finally came the triumphant sneer against the future life, as the last enemy of speculative criticism (Strauss, Glaubenslehre, § 106 sq).

ESCOBAR Y MENDOZA, Antonio, b. at Valladolid, 1598; d. July 4, 1669; entered the Society of Jesus in 1604, and acquired a great name both as a preacher and as a writer. His collected works, mostly on morals, comprise forty volumes in folio. The principal are Summula Casuum Conscientiae, Universae Theologiae Moralis Problematum, and Liber Theologiae Moralis, the last of which appeared in Lyons, 1646, ran through forty editions in the author's lifetime, and has been translated into several foreign languages. His works give the most complete and also the most authoritative representation of the moral system which the Jesuits inculcated; and they far outdo any other attempt of the kind, even the writings of Busenbaum, in the audacious frivolity of their probabilism and the ludicrous subtility of their casuistry. After passing through the hands of Pascal, Moliere, and Boileau, they became an object of scorn, even to devout Roman Catholics; and in French speech the author's name, Escoberlarie, is now synonymous with egotism, levity, and licentiousness adroitly covered up with hypocrisy.

ESCOIRAL, or ESCORIAL, one of the most remarkable monasteries in the world—at once a palace, a church, a convent, a mausoleum, and a museum. — is situated twenty-seven miles north-west of Madrid, at an elevation of thirty-five hundred feet above the level of the sea, in a barren and inhospitable waste. It was built by Philip II (1557-93), in honor of St. Lawrence, on whose day (Aug. 10) the battle of St. Quentin was won (1557). With an allusion to the martyrdom of the saint, the ground-plan of the whole ensemble of buildings shows the form of a gridiron; and, in spite of its splendor and real magnificence, it makes a most gloomy and dismal impression. The church, one of the noblest in Europe, is three hundred and forty feet long, two hundred feet broad, and three hundred and twenty feet high under the dome. The convent houses two hundred monks of the order of the Hieronymites. The picture-gallery contains the masterpieces of Velasquez and Murillo.

ESNIK, b. at Kolp, near Mount Ararat, 397; d., as Bishop of Bagrewand, 478; was a pupil of Sahak and Mesrob; travelled in Mesopotamia, Syria, and Greece, whose language he learnt; took an active part in the conflict between the Christian Church in Armenia, and Parseesim, and wrote a book, which is still extant, against various forms of Pagan infidelity and Gnostic heresy. The book was first printed at Smyrna, 1702, and then by the Mehitarists, Venice, 1826. It was translated into French by Le Vaillant de Floris, Paris, 1853.

ESPER, Zeger Bernhard van, b. at Louvain, July 9, 1646; d. at Amersfoort, in the diocese of Utrecht, Oct. 2, 1728; studied theology and canon law at the university of his native city, and was appointed professor there of canon law, 1675. As he sided with the Jansenists, his Jus Ecclesiasticum, which appeared at Louvain, 1700, was put on the Index; and he escaped from further persecution only by living in a very quiet and retired manner. Nevertheless, when, in 1729, the chapter of Utrecht elected an archbishop in opposition to the Roman curia, he stepped forward, and defended the election as valid. But he was then compelled to flee from Louvain, and all his works were put on the Index; which condemnation, however, does not seem to have detracted anything from their authority. The translation of the New Testament, which he made in connection with his cousin Karl, appeared in 1807 at Brunswick, and ran through many editions. The first part of the translation of the Old Testament did not appear until 1822; the second followed, 1836; and the first edition of the whole Bible was published, 1840, at Sulzbach. He also gave out editions of the Vulgate (1822), the Septuagint (1824), and the Greek text of the New Testament (1827). Persecuted in every way by the Romanists for his zeal in spreading the Bible among laymen, he wrote a number of pamphlets in defense of his views, some of which have a scientific interest, as, for instance, his Geschichte der Vulgata, Tubingen, 1824. His library is now in the Union Theological Seminary, New-York City, and is extremely valuable, containing as it does that of the abbey of Marienmünster. It consists of over 13,000 volumes, including 430 incunabula, 1,246 numbers of reforming literature in original editions, 37 manuscripts, about 200 editions of the Vulgate and of German Bibles (the earliest being 1470). It was bought in April, 1838, at the suggestion of Dr. E. Robinson, one of the professors of the seminary.

ESSENES. The. At the time when Christ appeared on earth, a sect of Jewish refugees from the religious parties, the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes. With the first two we are somewhat familiar from the New Testament, but not with the last, who were the object of admiration to Jews, heathens, and Christians, although their admirers are uncertain to this day whether they were Jews, or a school of Jewish proselytes, or, as Eusebius thinks, Christians.

Sources. — The sources from which our information is derived concerning the Essenes are, chiefly, Josephus (Jewish War, II. 8, 2-13, Antiquities, XIII. 5, 9, XV. 10, 6, 10, 11), Philo (Every virtuous man is free, §§ 12, 13 [Mangey's ed. ii. 457-459] and Apology for the Jews [preserved by Eusebius, Prep. Evang., VIII. 11, also found in Mangey's ed. ii. 682-684]), and Pliny (Nat. Hist., 5, 17). These sources were afterwards made use of by Sorinius, Porphyry, Eusebius, Hippolytus, and Epiphanius, all of whom copy either the one or the other.

Name. — As to the name, which is variously written in the Greek, it has provoked countless interpretations. The best is probably that given by Ewald, according to whom it means "the pious;" whilst Lightfoot prefers "the silent ones."

Origin.—As difficult as the explanation of the name is the fixing of the precise date of its origin. The probable date may be derived from Josephus, who had all assimilated the time when the Pharisees and Sadducees had their origin; that is, in the middle of the second century before Christ. But it is questionable whether they were the outgrowth of Judaism, or whether they stand between Judaism and Hellenism. They were allied to the Pharisees, and yet with very distinctive differences: they were zealous in the spirit of the prophets, and yet more painfully intent than the Pharisees on outward purification. They were Jews, and yet shut themselves out from the nation; servants of Jehovah, and yet following another benediction; in two years they were," as Keim remarks, "like a mosaic picture, with no inward unity,—a phenomenon of religious despair."

Organization and Tenets.—According to Philo and Josephus, the number of the Essenes amounted at their time to more than four thousand, and they lived exclusively in the Holy Land and in the adjoining parts of Syria. But Pliny found the Essenes also on the western side of the Dead Sea, near the city of Engeddi; and, if we may believe Josephus, they were found everywhere. They lived in a separate community, having every thing in common. There existed no distinction among them. They lived peaceably with all men, reproved slavery and war, and would not even manufacture any military instruments whatever. They were governed by a president, who was elected by the whole body, and who also acted as judge of the community. All matters of the society were governed by a jury of at least a hundred members. A brother guilty of a gross offence was excommunicated, but received again after due repentance. Celibacy being the rule of the order, a spade to bury the excrement, an apron to be used at lustrations, and a white robe put on at meals. He was not at once admitted, but had to pass through a novitiate of twelve months, when he was admitted to the lustrations. Then followed another novitiate of two years, and at the end of this period he was admitted to the common meals, after having bound himself by a most solemn oath not to divulge anything to outsiders, and to be open with the members of the order. In order not to come in contact with such as did not practise the laws of Levitical purity, the Essenes raised the supplies of all their wants among themselves. Each one of the community took his share of work in the department in which he most excelled. Some were tillers of the ground; others tended flocks, and reared bees; some prepared the food; some made articles of dress; some attended to the sick, and instructed the young; whilst all of them devoted certain hours to studying the mysteries of nature and revelation, and of the celestial hierarchy. They always got up before the sun rose, and never talked about any worldly matters till they had finished their morning exercises, when their faces turned towards the sun, offered up their prayer. This done, every one betook himself to his allotted work. They remained at their work till about eleven o'clock A.M., when they assembled together for a common bath. Having put on their white robes, they entered, with great solemnity, the refectory, to partake of the common meal, which was very simple, consisting chiefly of vegetables. The blessing having been invoked by the priest, the repast commenced. The deepest silence reigned throughout, to be interrupted only by the priest, who concluded the meal by offering thanks; whilst all, according to the sign they had just taken, upon all withdraw, dressed themselves in their working-dress, resumed their several employments till the evening, when they assembled again in the aforesaid manner to partake of a common meal. Whilst every thing was done according to the directions of the overseers, yet they were at liberty to act as they pleased in relieving the distressed with as much money as they thought proper, and to manifest their compassion for those who were not of the brotherhood as much as they liked and whenever they liked. Such was their mode of living during the week. The Sabbath was observed very strictly. They prepared the food on the previous day in order that no fire need be lighted on the Sabbath, and did not dare to remove a vessel from its place on that day. They even restrained the necessities of the body. The whole day was given up to religious exercises and to exposition of the Scriptures. In the synagogue, as at meals, each one took his seat according to age, in becoming attire. Every grown-up candidate, upon entering the order, had to cast all his possessions into the common treasury. The blessing having been invoked by the priest, the meal past commenced. The deepest silence reigned throughout, to be interrupted only by the priest, who concluded the meal by offering thanks; whilst all, according to the sign they had just taken, upon all withdrew, dressed themselves in their working-dress, resumed their several employments till the evening, when they assembled again in the aforesaid manner to partake of a common meal. They even restrained the necessities of the body. The whole day was given up to religious exercises and to exposition of the Scriptures. In the synagogue, as at meals, each one took his seat according to age, in becoming attire. One read aloud out of the law of their land, and the most experienced among them expounded, and the rest, nothing the less, turned towards the sun, offering up their prayer. They remained quiet, only giving a sign of assent or doubt with the head, the eye, or hand. In their abstinence they went even so far as to abstain from anointing the body, which in hot climates is almost a necessity of life.

Theology of the Essenes.—They had a tendency to sun-worship. This tendency is rather a foreign element in Judaism. As has already been indicated above, at daybreak they addressed certain prayers to the sun, "as if treating him to rise." They were careful, also, to conceal and bury all polluting substances, so as not "to insult the rays of the god." They denied the resurrection of the body, but believed in the immortality of the soul. Whilst they refused to offer sacrifices at Jerusalem, they sent gifts to the temple. They believed in angels; and to conceal the names of the angels was included in the oath taken by the candidate. They studied sacred books, which, however, are not described. They also learnt the qualities of roots and the properties of stones. By means of these and similar studies connected with their lustrations, the Essenes believed to be enabled to foretell the future; and Josephus affirms, that, in their prophecies, they seldom erred, giving some examples of fulfilled prophecies.

The question has been raised, and has been agitated by Continental scholars, whence Essenism derived its foreign influences, which distinguished it from Pharisaic Judaism; for, although most of the peculiarities which distinguish Essenism could be traced back to Judaism, yet there is an alien admixture of foreign elements which could hardly be reconciled with Judaism. Some have regarded the distinctive characteristics of the sect as an offshoot of the Neo-Pythagorean school grafted on the teaching of Judaism. This solution is suggested by the statement of Josephus, that "they practise the mode of life which among the Greeks was introduced by Pythagoras." This theory has found its ablest and most persistent advocate in Zeller, who draws out the parallels with great force and precision.

(Geschichte der Philosophie der Griechen, III. 2, p. 281.) This theory of Zeller was objected to by Lightfoot from a chronological and geographical standpoint, showing, on the one hand, the priority of Essenism to Neo-Pythagoreanism, and, on the other hand, that Essenism (having its home on the eastern borders of Palestine, the shores of the Dead Sea) was least of all exposed to the influences of Greek philosophy. Lightfoot is rather inclined to trace the tenets of Essenism back to the influence of Parseism, and makes his assertion good by drawing out the parallels between both. Which of the two theories is the correct one is hard to decide. This much is certain, that the theories of Jewish and Christian writers who would explain Essenism from a Talmudic standpoint have no foundation at all. Of greater importance, however, is the question as to the relationship between —

Essenism and Christianity. — It has become a common practice with a certain class of Jewish and Christian writers to call Essenism to their aid in accounting for any distinctive features of Christianity. We cannot enter into a refutation of the false premises and misunderstandings ascribed to Essenism and Christianity adduced by such writers as Graetz and Ginsburg. This theory has been ably treated and refuted by Lightfoot. Suffice it to say that Essenism, notwithstanding all its favorable effect upon individuals, had no influence upon the Jewish people in particular, or upon the world in general. "Essenism," as Keim says, "was, in fact, only an admission of helplessness against the actual state of things, renouncing the attempt to restore all Israel, to which it was opposed as heterodox and impure. . . . In short, the salvation of individuals in the general shipwreck is frankly the watchword of the party. We hear nothing from them of a cry for the kingdom of God, nor for the Messiah, since these were enclosed within their own limits. . . . We may learn from its weakness, that the healing power which arose upon the nation, and, indeed, upon the world, with fresh creative fruitfulness, cannot be counted among the impulses and forces of Essenism."

ESTHER (star, from the Persian siarshch), the Persian name of the Jewish Hadassah (ii. 7), and the adopted daughter of Mordecai, her cousin. After the deposition of Vashti, her charms won the admiration of Ahasuerus, who chose her above many competitors for his queen. Through her mediation the extermination of the Jews in the Persian Empire was averted, and their bitter enemy, Haman, executed. Esther's patriotism and heroism have won for her a place beside Deborah and Judith in the gratitude of her nation.

Book of. The Book of Esther describes the elevation of Esther to the Persian throne, the overthrow of Haman's scheme for the destruction of the Jews, and Haman's own ignominious death. The scene is laid in Susa, at the court of Ahasuerus (Xerxes). The book opens with the description of a great feast for the princes of the empire (488 B.C.), the deposition of Queen Vashti for refusal to comply with the king's request (i. 12), and the elevation of Esther to the throne. The narrative then dwells upon the power of the prime minister Haman, his wounded pride at the refusal of Mordecai to bow before him, and his plot to exterminate all the Jews in the empire, out of revenge (iii. 6). He secured a decree to this end; and the Pur, or lot for its execution, fell on the thirteenth day of Adar (iii. 7). The wariness of Mordecai, and Esther's influence over the emperor, were used to secure counter-legislation, whereby the evil effects of the irreversable decree were averted (v. 6). The Oriental monarch now changes his mind towards Haman himself, and orders him to be hung on the gallows he had erected for Mordecai (vii. 9). At this point, with the humiliation of Haman's haughty pride and the deliverance of the people by the counter-decree, the story culminates. The book closes with the appointment of a national festival to commemorate the deliverance, and a notice of the advancement of Mordecai to Haman's place of power. The whole narrative is told with consummate dramatic skill. It gives a striking illustration of patriotism, a terrible warning against pride and contempt for inferiors, and shows how the self-sacrificing devotion of the heroine fits in with the workings of Divine Providence to defeat the plot of the enemy.

The authorship has been attributed to Morde-
The authenticity has been questioned, but without good reason. The allusions to Persian manners are minute and accurate. The luxurious habits and capricious temper of Xerxes are in exact accord with the portraiture of secular history. The great assembly of his princes, recorded in chap. i., agrees with the statement of Herodotus, that the king had made preparations for his Grecian campaign in the third year of his reign. That Herodotus does not mention Esther (for Amestris cannot be identified with her) offers no difficulty when we remember that Persian monarchs did not limit themselves to one wife. But an irrefutable argument for the truth of the narrative is the Feast of Purim, which commemorates the facts, and is inexplicable on any other hypothesis than that they occurred.

The religious character of the work has from the earliest times been the subject of unfavorable criticism. It makes not a single mention of God by name, and yet mentions the Persian monarch a hundred and eighty-seven times. Luther speaks of its marked Judaistic features, and its heathen frivolity, and thought it unworthy of a place in the canon. Others have spoken of the spirit of national revenge and pride which pervades it (De Wette). But, in spite of these criticisms, the book is not irreligious in tone. But, in spite of these criticisms, the book is not irreligious in tone. The allusion to Persian customs, and the absence of any further interest in the peculiar faith of his wife. When Augustine, however, landed at the Isle of Thanet in 597, he was well received by Ethelbert, who was converted and baptized in the same year; and it seems that Ethelbert henceforward used all his influence as king and Bretwalda for the promotion of Christianity. He removed the royal residence to Reculver (Regulbium), and left Canterbury to Augustine; he aided in the rebuilding of the old Roman church, and himself built a large monastery (St. Augustine) outside the walls of Canterbury; and, among the ninety dooms and decrees of his which are extant (Thorp: Ancient Laws and Institutes of England), one makes provision for the security of property and ecclesiastical officials. He also made the earliest code of Anglo-Saxon laws now extant. He founded the see of Canterbury (802) and that of Rochester (904).

ETHICS. 764

ETHICS, from the Greek Ἐθικα, which, besides the objective element (customs, habits, the Latin mores, whence disciplina moralis), also includes a subjective element, a conscious feeling at home in the customs, an approval by conscience of the habits, which transforms the merely mechanical routine into responsible action, and elevates the merely instinctive disposition to character.

Ethics is the science of conduct; Christian ethics, the scientific representation of the truths of Christianity in their practical application to individual life as duties and ideals. (Philosophical ethics, see MORAL PHILOSOPHY.) In the science of divinity considered as an organic whole ethics occupies a position of its own as one part of systematic theology. From exegesis and church history it is distinguished by its very object; for it is neither a demonstration of what, according to the authentic documents of the divine revelation, is true Christianity, nor a record of what historicalChristianism has done itself as such, but an exposition, with respect to a peculiar sphere,— the sphere of conduct,— of Christianity as the highest truth. Less distinct is its relation to dogmatics, which forms the other part of systematic theology. At one time it was treated as a mere appendix to dogmatics; at another it was fairly in the way to entirely supersede it. In general, however, the relation between dogmatics and ethics may be defined as that between the theoretical and practical aspects of the same thing; not that ethics has no theoretical interest, and dogmatics no practical bearing: on the contrary, the connection between them is a deep, reciprocal interdependence.

Rich materials for a Christian ethics are found in the writings of the apostolic fathers, Clemens Romanus, Ignatius, Polycarp, Barnabas, Hermes. The last, in his Third Epistle (ad Polycarp), a letter addressed to the Polycarpian Christians, begins his epistle with these words: "I beseech you, brethren, by the Lord Jesus Christ, and by the love which is in the church of God at Ephesus, and to you all which are beloved in Christ, to walk worthily of the vocation wherewith ye have been called, with all humility and constancy, in the spirit of Christ;"--a beautiful expression of the consciousness of their own life as they lived it in Ephesus, and how their life stood in relation to Christ and the church. To this end he exhorts: "To write to you of every thing, dear friends; even as I felt under the influence of the spirit of the Lord I wrote to you, even in those days."

The gradual development of the idea of the Christian or ecclesiastical church now becomes the principal ethical relation of his life. The full realization of this idea was the result of a long development; but in this development Cyprian occupies a central position. His views were the natural outcome of the Montanist and the Novatian movements; and they reached their perfection by Augustine's victory over the Donatists. While the Montanists accepted the sudden outbursts of individual enthusiasm as the true medium through which the Holy Spirit communicates with the congregation, and consequently demanded absolute obedience to the dictates of this ecstatic prophecy as a condition of communion between the spirit and the individual, the Novatians found the true vehicle of spiritual communion in the church itself considered as a totality, as an organization of the universal priesthood under presbyterial forms; and they were consequently very rigorous with respect to admission to membership. Cyprian opposed both parties, and did so in favor of the hierarchical development of the idea of the church. Though he asserted the possibility of a second penance, and the Novatians vindicated a church of saints, he agreed with the Novatians in the holiness of the church as a totality; but this totality he found represented by the episcopacy, which, in its nature and essence, is one and undivided, though in reality it is distributed over a plurality of individuals. With this idea of the episcopacy as the true expression of the unity of the church, he turned upon the Montanists, and opposed to their abrupt, sporadic, and incidental ecstatics the sacrament of ordination as the true medium of communion between the spirit and the church. He did not go the full length, however, of his own argument. He never daringly assert that infallibility and personal holiness followed as necessary effects of the sacrament. He demanded blind obedience to the bishop, but he granted that the congregation might expel an unholy and unworthy bishop. He stopped in a self-contradiction. The Council of Nicaea led the way out of this contradiction by basing the infallibility of the church, its inspiration, not upon the individual bishop, but upon the collective episcopacy, the episcopal council; and when the Donatists, nevertheless, vehemently urged the holiness of the bishop as an absolute condition of the holiness of the church, Augustine was naturally led to object, that, in that case, the whole idea was reduced to something merely subjective, and quite impalpable. It is not necessary, he said, that the sacrament of ordination shall confer personal infallibility and personal holiness on the ordained: it is sufficient, when it gives authority in teaching, efficacy in the administration of the sacraments, and power to govern the congregation; for the church is holy, not on account of the holiness of its members, but because it is a divine institution; its holiness is impersonal. Thereby the foundation was laid for the hierarchical fabric soon to be reared, and thereby the ethical relation between the church and the individual was fixed in a manner soon to become strikingly apparent; for the more vigorously the church developed as a divine institution, a holy state, the more closely its ethics assumed the aspect of a criminal code. A war, so-called higher virtue, with the character of a pre-eminently negative asceticism, and blooming forth in monasticism, virginity, poverty, etc., became the real focus of Christian life, and found in the penitential its true literary expression. Ethical studies, in the broader and sounder sense of the word, were few and far between; nor do they generally evince any marked originality. Ambrose, De officiis (comp. J. Daseke, Cicernonis et Ambrosii de officiis Libri III., etc., Augsburg, 1875); Gregory the Great, Magna Moralia; Martin of Bracara, Formula honestae vitae; Alcuin, De virtutibus et vitiis; Paschasius Radbertus, De fide, spe, et caritate—that is about all produced down to the time of Thomas Aquinas. On the other hand, the so-called Libri Pientinatiles (that is, collections of disciplinary precepts extracted from the apostolical constitutions, the fathers, and the canons of the councils) were innumerable: some of the most prominent are those made by Johannes Jejunator, Fulgentius Ferrandus, Cresconius, Theodorus Cilix, Bede, and Rhabanus Maurus.

The ethics of the medieval mystics is also ascetic, but the asceticism that is there of another and higher type. By John Scotus Eriigena the Greek mysticism—represented by Makarius the Egyptian, Dionysius Areopagita, and Maximus Confessor—was introduced into the Latin world, and became the starting-point of the mysticism of the Western Church, both in its Romanic form (Hugo and Richard of St. Victor, Bernard of Clairvaux, Bonaventura, Gerson, Molino) and in its Germanic form (Suso, Ruysbroeck, Tauler, Eckhart). So far as this mysticism developed an ethics, the principle of the false asceticism was retained. The contradiction between finite and infinite, matter and spirit, world and God, was left standing. To escape from the finite, to die away from the world, to crush the flesh, was still considered the only true ethical process. But this mere negation was added a positive object, to be absorbed by the infinite, to arrive at spiritual freedom, to live in God; and thereby the mainspring of Christian ethics was actually touched. When, nevertheless, the medieval mystics failed to produce a true ethics, the reason was that they lacked that conception of the human personality which achieves a perfect union of finite and infinite by means of the created soul's capability to receive the divine,—an idea which first obtained full form in Luther's doctrine of faith and justification by faith. Alongside with the mystics—who, in spite of all shortcomings, form the real sap-carrying vesicles both of ethics and dogmatics during the middle ages—the scholastics went their own way, in some respects continuators, they too, of asceticism, though generally more deeply engaged in other directions. After the example of Petrus Lombardus, they used to incorporate a certain amount of ethical materials with their dogmatical sententiae and summæ. To the four philosophical virtues—justitia, fortitudo, modaritudo, et sapientia—the three theological virtues were added,—faith, hope, and charity; thus making the sacred seven full. The internal relation, however, between these two groups of virtues always remained somewhat vague. The treatment which the subject found among these theologians was that by Thomas Aquinas, in his Prima et secunda Sentencia—where modern ethics became the model for all later Roman-Catholic ethics. But, besides these products of the theoretical interest of the scholastic philosophy, the practical wants of the confessional called forth a luxuriant ethical literature of quite another type, the so-called casuistry. (See article.) When the Reformation took its final stand upon Scripture, it not only escaped the great errors of the middle ages, but it also succeeded in establishing the true principles of Christian ethics. By the new doctrines of faith, and justification by faith, the fundamental ethical ideas of duty, virtue, and highest good, were, so to speak, melted down and recast. A new ethics appeared, bearing the characteristic marks of the double development of the Protestant or evangelical principle,—the Lutheran Church, with its talent for plastic representation, art, hymnology, science; and the Reformed Church, with its talent for practical action, discipline, missions, statesmanship. Though neither Luther nor Calvin has written on ethics, in the proper sense of the word, both have occasionally treated of various ethical subjects, such as prayer, oath, marriage, civil authority, etc., especially in the form of expositions of the Decalogue in the Catechism. The Catechism is, indeed, the primitive form of evangelical ethics. Just as evangelical dogmatics arose from the regula fidei and the apostolical symbolum, so evangelical ethics grew out of the Decalogue. The religious relations of ethics were treated under the first three Commandments,—more especially the doctrines of worship, prayer, and devotion, under the third,—family, education, school, state, and civil authority, under the fourth; the duties towards our neighbors, temperance, care of the body, also the question of capital punishment, under the fifth; marriage and chastity, under the sixth; property and honor, under the seventh and eighth. Even the scientific writers retained for a long time this form; as, for instance, David Chytraeus (Virtutum descriptiones, 1551); L. T. von Kempis (Ethici de doctrina libri IV., 1571), Lambert Daneus (Ethics Christianae, Geneva, 1577). Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that the evangelical churches, especially the Lutheran Church, in the beginning, showed a lack of fertility in the field of ethical science; and the reason seems to have been a certain awkwardness in the establishment of the true relation between philosophical and theological ethics. The new principle was obtained in the doctrines of faith, and justification by faith. Materials were plentifully at hand in the works of the ancient philosophical ethics; but the evangelical theologians felt a certain shyness when applying the newly opened field to old materials, and for some time he, the most fertile of all ethical principles, was left in a state of lonesome grave, like a king without subjects. Melanchthon, in his Philosophia moralis (1559) and Enarratio aliquid librorum Aristotelis (1545), derived his whole system from general human consciousness and philosophical knowledge, without attempting to give to Christian ethics an entirely new shape by the application of the principle of faith. In his Systema ethicon (Geneva, 1614), Keckermann places the philosophical ethics after the theological, as the practical part. The theological ethics deals only with via interior, the bonum gratiae, the vir pius et religiosus; the philosophical, only with the bonum civile, the felicitas civis, the vir probus et honestus. Less mechanical was Calixtus, in his Epitome theologiae moralis, Helmstädt, 1634. He distinguishes between philosophical and theological ethics by distinguishing between a natural and a supernatural law; but he defines both laws as eternal, and ascribes to human nature an ineffaceable right within Christianity, and to Christianity an eternal affinity to human reason. What was needed as a preparation for a completely harmonious union of the philosophical and theological principles in ethics, was an independent development of each of them; and a development in that direction—in the direction of the emancipation of the philosophical principle—began with Hugo Grotius, Puffendorf, and Thomasius. In his De jure pacis et belli (Paris, 1625), Grotius defines the highest good, and the duty therein involved, as the weal of the kingdom of heaven, though placing the kingdom of heaven as the highest good, in direct opposition to the doctrine of the Roman-Catholic ethics; and this idea Rothe retained, making it the object of the Church, so to speak, to resolve itself into the State. Beside Rothe must be mentioned Schmid (Christliche Sittenlehre, ed. by A. Heller, Stuttgart, 1831, noticeable especially for its development of the idea of the law). Strongly polemical, both against Schleiermacher and Rothe, is Wuttke (Handbuch der christlichen Sittenlehre, 3d ed., Leipzig, 1874, 2 vols.); though both are left alone in the field. They lost, however, the great advantage which Buddeus, as an indefinable realm beyond the grave, or the definition of the Roman-Catholic moralists, as a ready-made institution on earth, — the Church. The kingdom of heaven he found produced and reproduced in every sphere of human life—church, state, science, art, family, marriage, etc. He thereby opened the long series of eudaimonistic attempts. On the other hand, Buddeus (1711), J. F. Reuss (Elementa theologiae moralis, 1711), C. A. Crustius (Moralethologie, Leipzig, 1772), developed the principle of faith, as the true principle of Christian ethics, defining the highest good as the kingdom of heaven, though placing the kingdom of heaven beyond the earth. A philosophical ethics, truly deserving the name, was first founded, however, by Kant (Kritik der reinen Vernunft, Bistamberg, 1780, etc.). Ethics then became severer from religion by the autonomy of the individual; but an end was put forever to the flat eudaimonism of the ethics of the Wolffian school. The subjectivism of Kant having reached its last consequences in Fichte, philosophy turned with Schelling once more towards objectivism; and on this basis of identity of subject and object Schleiermacher became the founder of modern theological ethics. He returned to the old idea of the kingdom of heaven as the highest good, —an idea which had entirely disappeared from the ethics of the Wolffian and Kantian schools,— but without adopting either of the indefinable realm beyond the grave, or the definition of the Roman-Catholic moralists, as a ready-made institution on earth, — the Church. The kingdom of heaven he found produced and reproduced in every sphere of human life—church, state, science, art, family, marriage, etc. —an idea which was condemned, the whole mystical branch of Roman-Catholic ethics withered, and the Jesuits were left alone in the field. They lost, however, all hold on public confidence by their doctrine of probability, by their attack on Port Royal, and by the merely mechanical method of their ethics. But from the philosophy the Roman-Catholic, like the evangelical moralists, received powerful and fertile impulses during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries: from the Wolffian school, Luby, Schwazhuber, Schanza, Stadler; from the Kantian school, Wanker, Mutschelle, Hermes, Elvenich, Vogelsang; from Fichte, Geishütter; from Schelling, C. Weiller. More independent founded in 524, contains a valuable library, is the seat of the Catholicos, or patriarch of the other nations. Thus King Aretas had settled from Schelling, C. Weiller. More independent rulers bore it; as, for instance, Simon (1 Macc. xi.47), his son Hyrcanus (Josephus, Arch., 14, 3d ed., 1880; a bishop. In 1787 he founded the Society of the United Brethren for Propagating the Gospel in the Alps to preach the gospel in the Valley of the Rhine, and occupied the episcopal chair of Treves for twenty-five years. According to the criticism of the Bollandists he belongs to the second half of the third century; and the legends of his missions and miracles are mere fables. Euchelaiion, in the Greek Church, is the "prayer oil," consecrated by seven priests, and used for the unction of the sick. It is counted one of the seven sacraments of the church, and corresponds to the extreme unction of the Roman Church, but is not limited to cases of mortal illness. See Extreme unction.

EUDOCIA, Empress, wife of Theodosius II.; was b. at Athens; the daughter of a sophist; came while very young to Constantinople, where she captivated not only Pulcheria, but also her brother, with her accomplishments; was baptized, and married to the emperor, April 27, 395, and divers had been; so also d. Nov. 6, 404. She descended from a Frankish family; was married to the emperor, 413 or 421. The latter part of her married life was clouded, however, by some misunderstanding between her and her husband; and she lived, separated or divorced, in Palestine. Photius mentions several works by her,— a paraphrase in verse of the Pentateuch, Joshua, etc.; a poem on the martyrdom of St. Cyprian, etc.— and he praises them much; but they have not come down to us. She is also said to have finished the Centones Homericorum of Patri- cius, — a life of Christ composed of verses, or fragments of verses, of Homer, printed at Francefort, Paris, 1578, and Leipzig, 1793.

EUDOXIA, Empress, wife of Arcadius; descended from a Frankish family; was married to the emperor, April 27, 395, and d. Nov. 6, 404. The origin of the enmity between her and Chrysostom is not clear, but she caused his banishment in 403. The horror which seized the inhabitants of Constantinople on account of an earthquake compelled her to recall him; but his denunciation of the Pagan chants and dances which accompanied the inauguration of her silver statue, raised in front of the Church of St. Sophia, exasperated her to such a degree, that she caused him to be banished a second time. See CHRY- SOSTOM.

EUDOXIUS was made Bishop of Germanicia, on the confines of Syria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, in 331, Bishop of Antioch in 347, and finally Patriarch of Constantinople in 360. He died in 370. He was a full-blooded Arian, a disciple of Eunomius I. (Aug. 10, 654–June 1, 657) was a weak man, who for the sake of peace, and in order to escape the fate of his predecessor, Martin I., who had been sent in banishment by the emperor to the Thracian Chersonesus, made an agreement with Pyrrhus, Patriarch of Constantinople, and leader of the Monothelites, on the basis that Christ had neither one nor two wills, but three (unam super duas),— a compromise worthy of a farce. See JAFFÉ: Regest. Pont. Rom.: BOWER: History of the Popes, III. 70.— Eugenius II. (June, 824–August, 827) submitted with good grace to the imperial sway which Louis the Pious still exercised over the Church, in imitation of his father. Louis sent his son Lothair to Rome with an army, to establish order and peace in the city; and the decrees of a council which he convened at Paris (November, 823), and which decided the question of image-worship in the same spirit as the synod of Francfort, were received with satisfaction by Eugenius, though without exercising any influence on the practice of the Roman Church. See JAFFÉ: Regest. Pont. Rom.— Eugenius III. (Feb. 15, 1145–July 8, 1153) was a monk from Clémeur, and a pupil of St. Bernard of Clairvaux. Imme-fathers. Of the works of Euhemerus, nothing has come down to us but a fragment of a Latin translation by Ennius.

EULALIUS was put up as antipope against Boniface I. (in 418), after the death of Zosimus, by a minority of the clergy of Rome, and the city prefect, Symmachus. The emperor convened a council to decide the question, and ordered the two contenders meanwhile to leave the city. Boniface obeyed; but Eulalius did not, and was consequently banished from the city by the emperor. He was afterwards made Bishop of Nepe, and kept quiet during the reign of Boniface I. After the death of the latter the friends of Eulalius wished him to step forward and try to enforce his claims; but he declined.

EULOGIA (εὐλογία), properly fine, sonorous speech; hence praise, benediction, consecration. Thus the formulas with which the liturgical materials were consecrated, or the benediction of the congregation spoken by the bishops and prebaters, were called "eulogies." From many passages in the works of Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, etc., it appears, that up to the fifth century, eulogia was used synonymously with eucharistia, probably referring to Paul's words (1 Cor. x. 16); but after that time it was confined to the consecrated bread which the participants of the Lord's Supper brought home with them to sick persons or absent friends.

EULOGIUS OF CORDOVA was elected Archbishop of Toledo in 858, but by the Moors prevented from entering upon the duties of his office. He was a zealous champion of Christianity in its contest with Mohammedanism, and would not reinstate; but Eunomius was recalled, with Constantius; and in 359 he was made Patriarch of Constantinople. Aëtius he could not or would not re-establish; but Eunomius was recalled, and made Bishop of Cyzicus, 360. He remained there four years. In the beginning he refrained, at the instance of Eudoxius, from openly proclaiming his extreme Arian views; but hypocrisy was not his vice, and the contempt he felt for people who were not of his opinion soon made him forget all prudence. The inhabitants of Cyzicus repeatedly and bitterly complained of him and his heresies; and finally Eudoxius was compelled, by a direct order from the emperor, to summon him to Constantinople, and institute an investigation, the result of which was that he was deposed and banished. He then placed himself at the head of the Anomoeans (who from this time generally bore the name of the Eunomians), and wrote and spoke in their interest; but he never again held an official position in the church. He moved about from place to place, always in banishment. In his treatment of the great question of his day,—the divinity of Christ,—he started from the conception of an absolute unlikeliness in substance between the Father and the Son, and was thereby led to represent the Son as a creature among other creatures, as a mere man. These views produced such an indignation, that successive imperial edicts ordered his books to be burnt. Of his Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, of his Letters (more than forty, according to Photius), nothing has come down to us. The Confession (setBackground of the pisteis), which he presented to Theodosius in 383, but which was not accepted, was first printed by Valerius, in his Notes to the Epistles, then by Baluze, in his Concill. Non. Collect., I. 59. Of his two Apologies, the first was written directly against the Nicene doctrine of the Trinity, the second as a defence against the attacks of Basil. From several manuscripts of the latter's work (Adversus Eunomium) it has been possible to restore the work of Eulogius.

The attempt was first made by Cave (Hist. Lit., I. 220), and then more completely by Fabricius (Bibl. Graeca, V. 23). There is also an English translation of the book by Whiston, Eunomianismus Redivivus, Lond., 1711. About the second Apology, Philostorgius, an admirer of Eunomius, tells us that Basil died of despair after reading it; while Photius, an adversary, states that Eunomius dared not publish it until after the death of Basil. The writings of Eunomius were, indeed, as much extolled by his adherents as they were disparaged by his enemies. After his death his party separated from the church, and branched off in a number of minor divisions named after various leaders, such as Eutyches, Theophronius, etc., until it was dissolved by internal dissensions. See Kloß: Gesch. u. Lehre d. Eunomius, Kiel, 1838, G.88.

EUNUCH (lit. bed-keeper, chamberlain). This class of persons is a natural consequence of polygamy, and is numerous to-day throughout the East. Frequent mention is made of them upon Egyptian and Assyrian monuments, and they were common in the degenerate days of Greece and Rome. The men who sing soprano in the Sistine Chapel at Rome are eunuchs. Eunuchs always display the same character: they are cowardly, jealous, intriguing, licentious, and shameless. They incline to melancholia, and frequently commit suicide. Yet they rose to the highest eminence, and were intrusted with the life of the sovereign.

According to Deut. xxiii. 1, eunuchs could not enter into the congregation of the Lord. In the Christian Church eunuchs could not be ordained.
History records a few instances of self-mutilation (of which the most famous is Origen) out of a fanatical or ascetic obedience to our Lord's words (Matt. xix. 12) : "There are eunuchs who made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake." If, however, a man was a born eunuch, or was made one by his persecutors, the prohibition against ordination did not apply to him. Abelard was mutilated, but, notwithstanding, rose to be an abbot. In the famous saying of Christ's already referred to, the word "eunuch" is used in three senses: (1) of those who were born so, (2) of those who were made so, (3) of those who abstain from marriage in order that they may give their attention more exclusively to the interests of the kingdom of heaven.

Euphrates (Hebrew נָחָם; LXX. Ἐφθάρτα; Assyrian Purât, Puritude, "the river") occurs (Gen. ii. 14, xv. 18; Deut. i. 7, xii. 24; Josh. i. 4; 2 Sam. viii. 3; 2 Kings xxiii. 29, xxiv. 7; 1 Chron. v. 9, xviii. 2; 2 Chron. xxv. 20; Jer. xiii. 4, 5, 6, 7, xiv. 2, 6, 10, li. 63) as the name of the well-known river. It takes its rise in the mountains of Armenia, its volume being due to the union of two streams, the Murâd Su or Eastern Euphrates, and the Frat or Northern Euphrates, — which unite about lat. 39° and long. 39°. The sources of the Euphrates are expressly mentioned by Salmonasar II. (B.C. 860–825), who relates how he marched from the sources of the Tigris to those of the Euphrates (probably meaning the sources of the Murad Su, north-east of Lake Van; the Frat begins near Erzroum), and there sacrificed to the gods, dipped "the weapons of Assur" in the water, and set up his royal likeness.

The river breaks through the Taurus range toward the west, then turns southward in a winding course, making a second great bend toward the mainland. From the Khabûr (Assyr. Purât, Purâtu, "the river") occurs (Gen. ii. 14, xv. 21; Exod. xxiii.31; A.W. "flood," Josh. xxiv. 14, 15), and even "river" (נָחוּד, Isa. vii. 20; Jer. ii. 18; Mic. vii. 12). EUSEBIUS. 771

EUSEBIUS OF ALEXANDRIA is the author of a number of homilies (twenty-one) which enjoyed great reputation in the Eastern Church during the sixth and seventh centuries. Nothing is known with certainty of his life. In the manuscripts of his works he is described as a monk and high dignitary of the church,—bishop, archbishop, patriarch, papa; in an old biography of him, printed by Cardinal Mai, in Spicileg. Rom., IX. p. 703, he is designated as Bishop of Alexandria after Cyril. But we have the list of Alexandrian bishops; and there is nowhere room for an Eusebius, least of all immediately after Cyril. Some of the homilies, which, however, are of no great interest, are found in Gallandi, Bibl. Patrum, VIII. p. 252. See Thilo, Ueber d. Schriften d. E. v. A., Halle, 1832.

EUSEBIUS, surnamed Bruno, Bishop of Angers from 1047 to his death (1081), was, at least for some time, an adherent and defender of Berengarius. Berengarius himself reckoned him one of his patrons (Caen. Sacr., ed. of Liege expressly charges him with having renewed the old heresy concerning the Lord's Supper, that it contained only a semblance or shadow of Christ's body (Gallandi, Bibl. Patr., XIV. p. 244). Nevertheless, after the death of Count Gaufrid of Anjou (1060), the valiant champion of the cause of Berengarius, he seems to have lost his courage. At the conference of Angers (1062) he assumed a very cool attitude towards Berengarius; and in the same mood is the famous letter written (somewhere between 1063 and 1069), in which he declines to act as arbiter in a disputation between Berengarius and Gaufrid Martini. Levis has called this letter one of the most excellent theological productions of the eleventh century; but this is simply a mistake. The letter is nothing but a cunningly devised cover for a cowardly retreat. The letters of Eusebius are found in authentic text by Menardus: Augustini c. Julian. operis imperf. 1. 2 priores, p. 499. The texts given by Du Roye and Du Bouley are mutilated. Two new letters were given by Sündendorf, Bereng. Tironensis, 1856.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Cesarea (surnamed Pamphili, “the friend of Pamphilus”), was b. in the latter part of the third century, between 260 and 270, probably in Palestine; d. at Cesarea, 340. One of his earliest teachers was Bishop Melitus of Pontus, who, during the persecution of Diocletian, sought refuge in Palestine. Afterward he went to Antioch, and imitated the Dorotheus. But the two great decisive influences in his education were the writings of Origen, and the intimate intercourse, at Cesarea, with Pamphilus, under whose guidance he made his first literary attempt as an exegete (305). In 309 he was compelled to leave Cesarea on account of the persecution, during which Pamphilus suffered martyrdom. He fled to Tyre, and thence to Egypt. After his return he was made Bishop of Cesarea (313). The principal problem which presented itself for solution during his episcopate was the Arian controversy, opened in 318. His own stand-point was one intermediate between Arius and Athanasius, based on Origen; but he had neither dialectical power to justify, nor force of character to maintain it. At the Council of Nicea (325) he tried to effect a reconciliation between the two contending parties, but failed. After fighting against the idea of homousion to the last, he finally yielded, and signed the orthodox confession. But he retained in his heart a feeling of rancor against Athanasius, and he was ever afterwards one of the leaders of the Arians. He presided at the synod of Tyre (335), convened for the purpose of depositing Athanasius. But the attempt at reconciliation he made at Nicæa procured him the friendship of the emperor. He enjoyed the confidence of Constantine in a particular degree; though it may be, that, in many cases, this confidence was addressed to the author, rather than to the person. In his relation to Constantine, however, he showed for the same weakness of character as in his relation to Athanasius. As he was unable to see the truth when it concerned Athanasius, he was unable to speak the truth when it concerned Constantine.

It is as an author, however, rather than as a bishop, that Eusebius attained his great fame. His writings are historical, apologetic, theological, and exegetical. The most important of them are those on history; and his ékkAnalaatuK) (eschatologia), in ten books, giving the history of the Christian Church from its origin to 324, has naturally procured for him the title of the “Father of Church History;” not because he was a master of the historiographer's art,—for he has neither method with respect to the whole, nor criticism with respect to details; neither style nor absolute veracity,—but because he was the first in the field; because he was possessed of materials which would soon have been lost if he had not utilized them; and because he availed himself of these advantages with indefatigable industry and energy. As a repertory of facts and documents, his work is invaluable. The principal historical work of Eusebius (Du Velois), with Latin translation, Paris, 1859, re-edited by Reading, Canterbury, 1720; by Heinichen, Leipzig, 1827, 2d ed., 1868, 3 vols.; Burton, Oxford, 1838; Schwiegler (pocket edition), Tübing., 1852; Dindorf, Leipzig, 1871. [Into English the book has been translated by Hamner, 1854, and, better, by C. F. Cruse, N.Y., 1863.] Special investigations into the trustworthiness of the book have been made by Möller, Copenhagen, 1813; Danz, Jena, 1815; Kestner, Göttingen, 1816; Reuterdahl, Lund, 1826; Kienstra, Treves, 1833. Before he wrote his Ecclesiastical History, and as a preparation for it, Eusebius compiled his Chronicle, of which the first part gives an outline of the history of the world to 325, and the second an extract of this outline, arranged in tabular form. Of the original Greek text, only fragments have come down to us. Of the second part, Jerome gave a free translation into Latin. Collections of all fragments (Greek, Latin, and Armenian) of the Chronicle have been made by Mai (Script. Vet. Nov. Colt., 1833, VIII.), and best by A. Schöne, Berlin, 1886, 1875, 2 parts. Among the other historical works of Eusebius: a Life of Constantine, written after 327, edited by Heinichen, Leipzig, 1830, 2d ed., 1869, a somewhat fulsome panegyric of Constantine, written on the occasion of the thirtieth anniversary of the conversion of the pagans, during the persecution of Diocletian; a letter on pictures of Christ, to the sister of Constantine, etc.

Next in importance to his historical writings are his apologetic works, especially the two most elaborate ones — the Preparation for the Demonstration of the Gospel (προτυποδοσία) and the Demonstration of the Gospel (διανομή). The former (edited by Vigerus, Paris, 1888, and Heinichen, Leipzig, 1842) shows the insufficiency and inner unreasonableness of Paganism; the latter (edited Paris, 1628, Cologne, 1688, and by Gaisford, Oxford, 1852) proves the truth of Christianity from its internal character and its external effects. The gist of both these works was compressed into the Theophania; but that book exists only in a Syrian translation, first discovered for Oxford, 1852, and proved the truth of Christianity from its internal character and its external effects.

Of much less consequence are Eusebius' dogmatical and exegetical writings. The former comprise two works against Marcellus, generally printed as an appendix to the ἀποκάλυψις, independently edited by Gaisford, Oxford, 1852. Of his Defence of Origen, written in company with Pamphilus, only the first book is extant, and that only in an unreliable translation by Rufinus.

The former comprise two works against Marcellus, generally printed as an appendix to the ἀποκάλυψις, independently edited by Gaisford, Oxford, 1852. Of his Defence of Origen, written in company with Pamphilus, only the first book is extant, and that only in an unreliable translation by Rufinus.

A work of special interest is his Onomasticon, of which the first part contains a toponography of Palestine, and specially of Jerusalem; the second, an alphabetically arranged list of names of biblical places, with descriptions. The work was edited (Greek and Latin, the Latin text being a free translation by Jerome of the second part) by Bonfrère, Paris, 1631; Clericus, Amsterdam, 1707; Larsof and Franck, Berlin, 1802; Lagarde, Göttingen, 1870. A collected edition of all the works of Eusebius is found in Migne, Patrologia Graeca, XIX.—XXIV.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Doryleum, lived as a rhetorician in Constantinople, and held some minor government office (agens in rebus), when one day, in 430, he arose in full church, and interrupted Nestorius in the midst of his sermon, with a protest against his views as heretical; and shortly after he posted in the principal church of Constantinople an elaborate denunciation of the Nestorian heresies, comparing them to those of Paul of Samosata. As he thus opened the Nestorian controversy, he also opened the Eutychian heresy of Eutyches at the synod of Constantinople (448). He had in the mean time been appointed Bishop of Doryleum in Phrygia; and by his persistency he succeeded in getting the Eutychian doctrine deposed. By the synod of Ephesus, however (449), he was himself deposed, and fled to Rome; but by the Council of Chalcedon (451) he was re-instated, and died in his see. Some more polemical writings of his — Libellus adv. Eutychem, Libellus adv. Dicostrum, etc. — have come down to us, and are found in Labbé, Conc. Coll., IV.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Emesa, d. about 360; was b. of a distinguished family in Edessa, Mesopotamia; studied under Eusebius of Caesarea, and Tertullian of Scythopolis, also in Antioch after 390 (with the method and spirit of whose school he became thoroughly imbued), and finally in Alexandria. His fame as an exegete and preacher was so great, that in 341 the synod of Antioch designated him as a fit successor to the deposed Athanasius; but he knew too well how ardently the Alexandrian congregation adhered to its bishop, and he declined. He was then appointed Bishop of Emesa, in Phoenicia; but there, too, he encountered great opposition. The inhabitants feared his astronomical knowledge, and rose against him as a magician. He fled to Laodicea, and settled afterwards in Antioch, where he spent the rest of his life. Of his numerous writings (Jerome mentions polemical works against the Jews, Pagans, and Novatians, ten books of commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, and homilies on the Gospels; Theodoret mentions polemics against the Marcionites and Manicheans; Ebed Jesu, a work on the Old Testament, etc.), nothing but fragments have come down to us. The homilies edited by Gagnée, (1547) and by Fromy (1575) are spurious; but the two first homilies against Marcellus, ascribed to Eusebius of Caesarea, and found among his works (Opuscula 14, ed. Sirmondi, 1640), belong probably to Eusebius of Emesa. His Life, written by Bishop George of Laodicea, is also lost. See August: Eus. Emes. Opuscula, Elberfeld, 1828; Thilo: Eus. of Alex. and Eus. von Emes., Halle, 1832.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Laodicea, in Syria, d. 269; was b. in Alexandria, and gave, while deacon, his removal from an insignificant to the most splendid see. As the representative of the Alexandrian bishop, he was present at the synod of Antioch which condemned Paul of Samosata; and the impression he made was so favorable, that he shortly after was elected Bishop of Laodicea. See Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., v. 11, 21, 23, 32. SEMISCH.

EUSEBIUS of NICOMEDIA was first Bishop of Berytus, in Phoenicia, then of Nicaea, where the imperial court resided, and finally of Constantinople, where he died 342. Distantly related to the imperial house, he not only owed his promotion from a minor to the most splendid episcopal see to his influence at court, but the great power he wielded in the church was also derived from that source. With the exception of a short period of eclipse, he enjoyed the complete confidence both of Constantine and Constantius; and it was he who baptized the dying emperor, May, 337. Like Arius, he was a pupil of Lucian of Antioch, and it is probable that he held the same views as Arius from the very beginning. He afterwards modified his ideas somewhat, or perhaps he only yielded to the pressure of circumstances; but he was, if not the teacher, at all events the leader and organizer, of the Arian party. At the Council of Nicaea (325) he signed the Confession, but only after a long and desperate opposition. His defence of Arius excited the wrath of the emperor, and a few months after the council he was sent into exile. After the lapse of three years, he succeeded in regaining the imperial favor; and after his return (in 329) he brought the whole machinery of the state government into action in order to impose his views upon the church. In 331 a synod of Antioch condemned and deposed Eustathius, one of the pillars of the orthodox party. In 336 Athanasius was banished to Treves, and in 337 Arius was invited to Constantinople to be solemnly received again into the bosom of the Catholic Church. The Arian party was victorious, and ready to take possession of the church; and the victory was chiefly due to Eusebius. See, for further information, literature, etc., the article on Arianism.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Samosata, on the Euphrates, since 361, d. about 379; was one of the chief pillars of the orthodox church during its contest with Arianism in the latter part of the fourth century. During the reign of Valens he travelled through the dioceses of Syria, Phenicia, and Palestine, in the disguise of a soldier, exhorting the faithful, and consecrating orthodox priests; and the election of Basil to the see of Cesarea, in Cappadocia, was chiefly due to his exertions (370). In 373 he was banished to Thrace, and lived in exile to the death of Valens, 378. Shortly after his return, while engaged in the re-organization of the Syrian Church, he was killed at Dolica (a small town in the district of Comagene) by a stone thrown at him by an Arian woman. See, besides Theodoret (Hist. Eccl., 2, 28: 4, 12, etc.), the Letters of Basil (Ep. 5–9, 253–265; Opp., ed. Paris, 1638, III.) and Gregory Nazianzen (Ep. 28–30, 204; Opp., ed. Paris, 1690, I.)

EUSEBIUS, Archbishop of Thessalonica, flourished about 600; wrote ten books against the Apithartodocete (a branch of the Monophysites), which have been lost, but of which Photius gives the list of contents (Bibl. Cod., 162); and was by Gregory the Great encouraged to employ still more vigorous measures against heretics (Ep. 10, 42: 11, 74).

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Vercelli, in Piedmont, d. about 371; was b. in the island of Sardinia, and educated in Rome by Pope Eusebius. Elected Bishop of Vercelli by an unanimous vote of the people and the clergy, he became one of the principal champions of the orthodox church in its contest with Arianism during the reign of Constantius. The synod of Milan was convened in 335. The orthodox party hoped to procure a vindication and restitution of Athanasius. The Arians tried to get the condemnation of Arius reversed. Emperor Constantius finally employed force, and the Arians gained the ascendency; but Eusebius did not yield. He was banished, first to Scythopolis, afterwards to Cappadocia, and finally to the Thebaid; and in the latter places he was kept in close confinement. After the death of Constantius he regained his liberty; but the contest with Arianism still continued, and he was finally stoned to death, according to the legend, by his adversaries. His Letters are found in Galland's, Bibl. Part., V. p. 78, etc. For his life, see Jerome, Vires Illustres. c. xxvi. Migne's ed., T. 23, p. 697; Act. Sanct., Aug., I. p. 340; and Ughelli, in Italia Sacra, IV. p. 747.

EUSTATHIUS, or, as the Greeks call him, EUSTACHIUS, is one of the most celebrated saints of the Roman-Catholic Church, though his life lies wholly in the field of romance. According to his acts, written in Greek, and dating from the eighth century, he was an officer of some repute in the army of Trajan. His name was Placidus. By a miraculous apparition of Christ he was converted; and, after many wonderful vicissitudes, he was roasted to death in Rome, together with his whole family. His remains came afterwards to France, and rest now in the Church of St. Eustache in Paris. In the Roman-Catholic Church he has been of late date canonized. See, for further information, literature, etc., the article on Arianism.

EUSTATHIUS OF ANTIOCH, b. at Side, Pamphylia; d. at Philippi 337; was first Bishop of Berrhoea (Syria), and then of Antioch. In the Council of Nicaea he vehemently opposed the Arians; but they took revenge when they got into power, and deposed him in 331. The inhabitants, however, of Antioch, arose in defence of their bishop, though in vain; they only succeeded in provoking the emperor, and Eustathius was banished to Thrace. Of his numerous writings, only a work against Origen is still extant: Bibl. Max. Patr., XVII.

EUSTATHIUS, Bishop of Sebaste (Armenia) from 350; a native of Cappadocia; d. 389; changed several times from orthodoxy to Arianism, and from Arianism to Semi-Arianism, and back again, and joined finally the Eunomians, but was condemned by several synods, and lost at last the confidence of all parties. He built a hospital for sick people and travellers in Sebaste, and introduced monasticism in Armenia, Pontus, and Paphlagonia, which gave rise to the formation of an enthusiastic ascetic party, the Eustathians. They were condemned by the synod of Gangra, and disappeared speedily. See Socrates: H. E., II. 43; Sozomen: H. E., III. 14. Herzog.

EUSTATHIUS OF THESALONICA, b. in Constantinople in the first half of the twelfth century; metropolitan of Thessalonica since 1175; d. there in 1194; has long been famous for his commentaries on the Greek classics, especially Homer. But the publication of his theological works by Tafel (Opuscula, Francfort, 1832, and De Thessalonica, Berlin, 1839) shows, furthermore, that he was a man of true Christian spirit, with a sharp eye for the moral and religious depravation of his time, and with something of the talent and character of a reformer. His ·Monastic Life (τιανάκας· βίον μωναχοῦ) was translated into German, Betrachtungen über d. Mönchstand, by Tafel, Berlin, 1847.

EUTHALIUS. 774

EUTYCHES.

Rome about 370; made while young a vow of perpetual virginity, which caused Jerome to write his De Virginitate, and devoted herself to an ascetic life. Together with her mother, she accompanied Jerome to Palestine (385); and, after the death of Paula, she became superior of the convent in Bethlehem, where she died 418. In the Roman Church she is considered a saint. Her day of celebration is Sept. 28.

EUTHALIUS, a deacon of the Alexandrian Church, and afterwards Bishop of Sulca; flourished in the middle of the fifth century, and introduced in the Acts, the Epistles of Paul, and the Catholic Epistles, the same division into chapters and verses which had already been introduced in the Gospels by Ammonius of Alexandria in the middle of the third century. See Bible Text, p. 269.

EUTHYMIUS ZIGADENUS, or ZIGABENUS, one of the most prominent Byzantine theologians of the twelfth century, and a characteristic representative of the whole school. Of his life very little is known. He was monk in a monastery and verses which had already been introduced in the Catholic Epistles, the same division into chapters and verses which had already been introduced in the Gospels by Ammonius of Alexandria in the middle of the third century. See Bible Text, p. 269.

EUTYCHES and EUTYCHIANISM. Eutychism denotes that form of the older christology in which the Alexandrian doctrine of one nature in the incarnation was pushed to a doctetic absorption of the human by the divine in the person of Christ. It originated as a reaction against Nestorianism. The reconciliation which (in 423) was effected between the Syrian and Egyptian Churches, and between the schools of Antioch and Alexandria, was nothing but a compromise; and the vague formulas of the instrument could not fail increasing the confusion. Both parties claimed the victory of their opponents; the Alexandrians resented the strong emphasis which was laid upon the two natures; and the Alexandrians exulted over the actual condemnation of Nestorius. In the his Apollinarism, Valentinianism, Doceism, etc. Under tears and sob, as the official style has it, he was deposed from his office as a priest and archimandrite, and expelled from the community of the faithful.

Eutyches, however, Dioscorus, Chrysophius, and the whole party whose interests were at stake, did not feel willing to acquiesce in the decision. Their first move was to demand a revision of the acts of the synod. It was granted, but no irregularity was discovered. They then began to clamor for a new ecumenical council. Flavian and Leo I. tried to prevent such a measure; but when Leo I. dated his famous letter (Leo. Ep., 28, in Mansi, v. 1360), by which he hoped to place himself as arbiter between the two contending parties (June 13, 449), the invitation to the new council had already been sent out (March 20, 449). It opened at Ephesus (Aug. 8, 449), under the presidency of Dioscorus, a shameless and violent character; it proceeded amid the howlings and tumult of drunken soldiers and fanatical monks; and it bears in history, for good reasons, the name of the "Robber Synod." Eutyches was re-instated, and Eusebius was even not allowed to speak. Flavian was condemned; and when some bishops attempted to embrace the feet of the president, and move him to pity, he cried out for the soldiers; and in broke the rabble with unspeakable confusion. Flavian was trampled upon, and beaten almost to death. Eusebius fled; also the papal legate escaped. The bishops who had been banished by Pulcheria and her husband Marcian, were restored; and by means of falsified acts the sanction of the emperor was obtained. The triumph of the Alexandrian party was complete; but it did not prove lasting.

The sudden death of Theodosius II. (450) produced a change in the affairs. The new rulers, Pulcheria and her husband Marcian, were orthodox. The bishops who had been banished by the instrumentality of Dioscorus were recalled; the remains of Flavian were brought to Constantinople, and entombed in the Church of the Apostles; Eutyches was once more excommunicated, and banished from the metropolis. It was the wish of the new government to give the country peace; and nothing seemed better suited to stop all controversies, and appease the reigning feeling of excitement, than a fourth ecumenical synod. It was convened at Chalcedon, and opened Oct. 8, 451. Dioscorus was unanimously condemned; not on account of heresy, however, but on account of the frightful accusations of fraud, violence, and crimes of almost every description, which were raised against him by his own confraternity. More difficulty was experienced in elaborating a set of christological formulas, which should exclude all heresies, and gather the whole church together. The problem was solved, however, by taking the above-mentioned letter of Leo I. for a basis; and an imperial edict of Feb. 7, 452, made this confession obligatory. The measures which were employed against the Eutychians were rather harsh. Numerous remnants of the party, having monasteries of their own, and celebrating service in a somewhat peculiar manner, lived on for a long time. See the article CHRYSTOLOGY.

EUTYCHIUS, Patriarch of Alexandria, b. about 360; d. 409; was a monk and catholicos in the city of Amasia, in Pontus; came in 402 as delegate from his bishop, and gained the favor of the Emperor Justinian by proving from Scripture that it was right to lay the ban of the church upon men, even though they had died long ago; was in the same year made Patriarch of Constantinople; played a prominent part in the "Three Chapters" controversy, and presided at the ecumenical synod of 553, but lost the favor of the emperor by refusing to acknowledge the doctrine of the monophysite Aithiartodocetes as orthodox; was deposed, and banished to Amasia 565. After twelve years of banishment he was reinstated in his see by Justin II.; and by the church he was honored with the dignity of a saint on account of his sufferings for the cause of orthodoxy. His Life, written by an intimate servant of his, is found in Act. Sanct., April, i. p. 550. Of his writings three fragments on the Lord's Supper have been published by Mai; Class. Auct., x. 493, and Script. Vet. Nov. ColL, ix. 023. A letter from him to Pope Vigilius, dated 553, is found in MANSI, x. 186.

EVAQRIUS PONTICUS was b. at Iberis, on the Black Sea; studied under Basilius, Gregory of Nyssa, and Gregory Nazianzen, who brought him to Constantinople in 379, and with whom he went to Jerusalem in 388. He afterwards retired into the Nitrian Desert, and lived a hermit among the hermits. The year of his death is unknown. From contemporary accounts it is evident that he enjoyed a considerable reputation; and the reason why the after-time treated him so coolly is simply, that, in the Origenistic controversy, he took the side of Origen. EVANGELICAL UNION. In 1841 James Morison, minister of the United Secession Church at Kilmarnock, Scotland, was deposed for holding anti-Calvinistic views upon faith, the work of the Spirit in salvation, and upon the extent of the atonement. Faith was declared to be one’s belief that Christ died for him; the Spirit is “poured out upon all flesh,” and strives with all the unregenerate, and dwells in all believers; while the atonement was universal. Mr. Morison’s father, who was a minister, and two other ministers who held these views, met at Kilmarnock, and formed the Evangelical Union. The movement spread, and now the union embraces about ninety churches. These are independent in government, and also in the mandates, except in general the Congregational churches of Scotland and the Cumberland Presbyterian Church of the United States. Mr. Morison is the author of very valuable commentaries upon the Third Chapter of the Epistle to the Romans (Loud. 1856), Matthew (1870), and Mark (1873, 3d ed., 1881). See Evangelical Union Annual, and F. Ferguson, History of the Evangelical Union, Glasgow, 1870.

EVANGELIST (εὐαγγελιστής, “a herald of glad tidings”) is from the same root as the words translated “gospel” (εὐαγγέλιον) and to “preach the word” (εὐαγγελίζω). In Eph. iv. 11 the evangelists are enumerated side by side with apostles, prophets, pastors, and teachers, and follow prophets. This special mention leads us to attribute to them a distinct form of activity. It did not consist in the execution of apostolic functions, the exercise of prophetic gifts, the oversight of churches, or diaconal service, but in preaching, and testifying to the facts of Christ’s life. But the evangelists are not to be regarded as a distinct order of church officials. Deacons, presbyters, and apostles (Acts vi. 2, etc.), all might exercise evangelistic functions. Timothy, the bishop-presbyter, was exhorted to “do the work of an evangelist” (2 Tim. iv. 5); and Philip, one of the seven deacons at Jerusalem, is called an evangelist (Acts viii. 5, xxi. 8). The evangelists are to be regarded as itinerants, travelling from place to place. This was the case with Philip, who preached in Samaria, expounded the word to the eunuch on his way to Gaza, and then labored in Cesarea and the cities round about (Acts viii. 40). They acted independently (Acts viii. 4), but largely as “fellow-laborers” and assistants of the apostles (Acts v. 17, etc.), all might exercise evangelistic functions. Theodoret was the first to restrict the term to itinerant preachers (περιπλανώμενοι εὐαγγελισταί). The apostle James applied it forthestime strictly to the authors of the Gospels. The term is used at the present time in both these senses.

EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION, an ecclesiastical body which in all essential particulars follows the doctrine and polity of the Methodist-Episcopal Church. Its founder, Jacob Albright, was a man of limited education, but earnest piety. Originally a Lutheran, he connected himself with the Methodist Church, and began to preach in 1796. A meeting of his followers in 1803 ordained him as a minister of the gospel in accordance with Acts xiii. 1–3. Albright labored amongst German-speaking classes; and, as the Methodists were a separate denomination. In 1807 a conference was held, and Albright elected bishop, and instructed to draw up articles of faith and discipline. Several years after his death (1808) his followers, who had been known as “Albright People,” adopted for their organization the name of Die evangelische Gemeinschaft von Nord America, “Evangelical Association of North America.” The organization took place at the Methodist-Episcopal Church. Bishops and presiding elders are elected by the general and annual conferences, and hold office for four years. The itinerant system is practised. In doctrine they are Arminian, but are very decidedly biblical; credulous, but impartial; and his work is invaluable for the understanding of the Nestorian and Eutychian controversies. It was first edited by R. Stephens (Paris, 1544, Geneva, 1612), then by Valesius (Paris, 1673, Francfort, 1679, etc.), and finally by Reading (Canterbury, 1720). EVANGELIUM AETERNUM was a supposed book, neither a real book, based upon the writings of Joachim of Floris, and referring to certain ideas entertained by one party of the Franciscans concerning the reforming and reorganizing mission of their order. Gerhardus, a Franciscan monk belonging to the above party, compiled in the middle of the thirteenth century, from the writings of Joachim of Floris (d. 1292), a book, which he called Introductorium in Evangelium Aeternum, in which he applied to his order Joachim's vague prophecies of a third stage in the history of mankind,—the era of the Holy Spirit. From the title of this book arose the rumor of a new gospel, the Everlasting Gospel, in the possession of the Franciscans. The book itself has perished; but it is partially known to us from a fragment of a work by Hugo of Caro (d. 1282), Processus in Evangelium Aeternum, communicated by Quetif and Echard, in Script. Predic., I, 202–213. See Joachim of Floris.

EVANS, Christmas, an eloquent Baptist preacher of Wales; b. at Eggeswen on Christmas Day, 1767; d. July 14, 1838. He was the son of a shoemaker, and after his father's death was forced to work at servile employments for a living. At the age of seventeen he was converted, and for the first time learned to read. At this period he lost an eye in an act of self-defence. He was ordained 1790, and, after a pastorate of two years at Llwyn, went to the Isle of Anglesea, where his salary for many years was only seventeen pounds. In 1826 he removed to Tonyvelin, and in 1833 to Caernarvon. Evans was a man of ardent piety, and great power as a preacher. The fragments that remain of his sermons show him a master in the parabolic comparison and dramatic representation. These characteristics have won for him the title of the "Welsh Bunyan." When Robert Hall was reminded that Evans had only one eye, he replied, "Yes, sir; but that eye could lead an army through a wilderness at midnight." In recent years he has made the most active as a powerful stimulus upon Dr. Moody.

His best-known work is his Discourses concerning the Christian Temper; being Thirty-eight Sermons upon the Principal Heads of Practical Religion, Lond., 4th ed., 1873, 2 vols., edited, with a Life, by Dr. John Erskine, Lond., 1855.

EVANSON, Edward, a minister of the Church of England; b. at Warrington, Lancashire, April 21, 1731; d. at Colford, Gloucestershire, Sept. 25, 1805. He took his M.A. at Cambridge, 1753. In 1773 he was tried in the Consistorial Court of Gloucester for publicly altering or omitting such phrases in the church-service as seemed to him to be untrue, correcting the authorized version of the Scriptures, and for conversing against the Creeds and the divinity of Christ. The case was carried on appeal to the Court of Arches, and finally quashed, on technical grounds, in 1777. He gave the widest currency he could to his heretical views in his Dissonance of the Four generally received Evangelists, and the Evidence of their Respective Authenticity examined, with that of other Scriptures deemed Canonical (Gloucester, 1782), in which he rejected the greater part of the New Testament as a forgery, and accepted the Gospel of Luke alone of the four. To this book Thomas Falconer replied in the Bampton Lecture for 1810,—Certain Principles in Evanston's Dissonance of the Four generally received Evangelists, etc., examined. Evanston's views upon the sabbath brought him into controversy with Dr. Priestley.

EVE (אֵיבֵה), "life;" so LXX., in Gen. iii., translates by ζωή "life;" elsewhere, however, etc., "the mother of all living." According to Gen. ii. 20, God would give man a "help meet for him;" literally, a help as before him; i.e., corresponding to him, his fellow in body and spirit. The simple, straightforward Bible narrative of Eve's creation and reception is given in Gen. ii. 21–25. Different interpretations have found defenders and expositors.

1. The Literal.—While Adam slept, God took one of his ribs, and fashioned out of it a woman. Adam recognized the identity of substance and unity of life, and called the new creation אָדָם "Ela," the mother of all living. According to the story, she had borne the promised deliverer. Her identity is plain that by the story is meant the creation of Eve. How long the first pair lived in Eden is unknown. By eating of the forbidden fruit, under the temptation of Satan, they fell. Outside of the garden, Eve bore her first-born, and called him Cain ("vanity"). Seth ("compensation"), because God had appointed her a seed, instead of Abel. With this remark the history of Eve closes.

2. The Allegorical.—The allegorists find their Corcyreus in Philo, who, having declared (in the second book of his Allegories of the Sacred Laws, after the Work of the Six Days of Creation, II, § vii.) the literal statement (that Eve was made out of Adam's rib) to be fabulous, proceeds to explain that by the story is meant the creation of the external sense immediately after the creation. of the mind. This took place when the mind was asleep. By "rib" he understands "one of the many meanings that go to make up a batchet. When Eve had to be drawn out of the side of Adam, she was not extracted by the head, lest she should be vain; nor by the eyes, lest she should be wanton; nor by the mouth, lest she should be given to gossiping; nor by the ears, lest she should be an eavesdropper; nor by the hands, lest she should be meddlesome; nor by the feet, lest she should be a gadabout; nor by the heart, lest she should be jealous; but she was drawn forth by the side: yet, notwithstanding all these precautions, she has every fault specially guarded against." It was a rabbinical fancy that Eve was Adam's second wife, the first being Lilith. In this way the double account of woman's creation (Gen. i. 27 and ii. 18) was accounted for. Lilith was formed of clay at the same time with Adam, but expelled for pride and bad conduct. She subsequently married the Devil, and was the ancestress of the Jins,—creatures endowed with human and devilish qualities. According to the Targum of Jonathan, Eve was made from Adam's thirteenth rib.

Evelyn, John, b. at Wotton, Surrey, Oct. 31, 1620; d. there Feb. 27, 1706. He is best known by his Sylva, London, 1664, an elaborate work upon arboriculture (the first book published by the Royal Society), and by his Diaries from 1641 to 1706 (best edition by William Bray, with Life by Henry B. Wheatley, London, 1879, 4 vols.), a treasury of information in regard to the private life of his century. He is mentioned here because of his History of Religion, a Rational Account of the True Religion (first published from his manuscript by Rev. R. M. Evanson, London, 1850, 2 vols.), a valuable epitome of arguments against the infidelity of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Evelyn preserved an un tarnished reputation at a time when men of his high social position were commonly lax in morals.

Evilmerodachs (Heb. יִשְׂרָאֵל יִשֶׂרְאֵל; LXX. Ἠβῶνος, ὁ Ἰσραήλ, and variants in Babyl. Avîl-Marduk; late pronunciation of Amil-Marduk, "man of the god Merodach") was the son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, and reigned, according to Ptolemy's canon (list of Babylonian kings), B.C. 551–560. The only scriptural indication of the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar is in Josephus, Antiquities, III. chapter 5, verses 27–30 (= Jer. lii. 31–34), where it is related, that, in the year of his accession, he released from prison, after a captivity of thirty-seven years, Jehoiachin, king of Judah, that he changed his prison-garments, set his seat above the seat of the EVOLUTION.

Babylonian vassal-kings or princes, gave him a daily allowance, and made him his constant table companion. Notwithstanding this, Josephus (c. Ap., I. 50) represents him, on Berossus' authority, as a lawless and absolute ruler. On the same authority he was murdered, after a two-years' reign, by his brother-in-law Neriglisar, whom Ptolemy's canon also names as his successor. The statement of Josephus (Ant., X. 11, 2), that he reigned eighteen years, is as little worthy of credence as the twelve years assigned to him by Alexander Polyhistor (Euseb., Chron., I. 6), or his regency of seven years, of which Jerome speaks (on Isa. xiv. 19). Contemporary records exist in the form of eleven contract tablets, inscribed in the cuneiform character, and dated in his reign, three from the year of his accession (B.C. 592), four from his first year, and four from his second year (W. St. C. Boscawen, in Trans. Soc. Bib. Arch., VI. p. 52). FRANCIS BROWN.

EVOLUTION and DEVELOPMENT. These phrases, so much used in the present day, have much the same meaning. Both point to one process viewed under two different aspects. Both indicate that one thing comes out of another. But development denotes the process going on; whereas evolution refers more to the process as we look back upon it. We talk of the seed being developed into the plant, and of the plant being evolved from the seed. Development or evolution is a method of procedure adopted by God, both in the kingdom of nature and the kingdom of grace.

I. There is undoubtedly development in nature. It is wrong in religious people to deny it. Everybody acts upon it. We all regard events as coming out of antecedent circumstances, commonly out of a concurrence, or train of occurrences. The process is seen more particularly in organic nature, in which there is a double development,—the seed from the plant, and the plant from the seed; the child from the parent, and, it may be, growing into the parent. Generally, in God's works, the present is the fruit of the past and the seed of the future. This was noticed from the beginning of observation. But of late years it has been scientifically examined, and the process is shown to be extensively employed, in a sense to be universal. What science and philosophy combined require to do in the present day is to determine the precise nature of development and the limits to it.

For several ages it has been acknowledged that there is universal causation; not merely the grand first and abiding Cause, but second causes. It is God who produces the spring; but he does so by agents, like the sun, the seed, and the soil. Pious people have come to acknowledge this, and have found it not inconsistent with their belief in God, to whose existence these works bear witness. There is not only individual causation, that is, one cause producing its effect: there is combined and co-operative causation. I believe that J. S. Mill has shown that there is more than one agent in all physical causation. We speak of the cause of the killing of that plant to be the frost; but the full and true cause consists of the cold, and the frost, with their effect; the frost's effect would not have occurred. I have shown that there is a like duality, or plurality, in the effect; each agent producing other effects.

Almost all natural action there is a considerable number of agencies in the operation. What a variety of combined powers in the growth of every plant and in the production of spring!

Now, development consists essentially in a combination, or rather I would call it an organization, of causes, or, better still, a corporation of agencies for mutual action. Such are the united powers that produce the spring, that produce the plant, that produce the animal. Such are the activities which unite to produce the great events of history,—the rise and fall of literature in Greece, and of the Roman Empire, the Protestant Reformation, the English, French, and American Revolutions.

In many of these organizations I discover evident design. Such is the union of elements and powers producing vision,—the coats and humors, the rods, cones, and nerves, so arranged as to enable us to see. Such are the vibrations, the canals, convolutions, hammer and stirrup, and fibres, which work together to give the power of hearing. Men are led spontaneously, and I hold reasonably, to believe that there is design in these collocations, and adaptations of one thing to another, to produce a good end.

In some cases there is only one set of agencies in the development. A number of agencies are thrown, as it were, into a closed ball (this was a Pythagorean idea); and these as they work produce certain results, which are the same from year to year, and from age to age. In other cases, powers come in from without to act upon and with the more central and abiding agents, and so far modify and vary their actions: hence the varieties in the same species of plants and animals, and the differences between events so far alike, such as the English, French, and American Revolutions. In evolution thus considered there is nothing irreligious, provided we see therein the wise God carrying out his designs, and connecting the past, the present, and the future in one grand system.

The great and utterly inexusable error of certain physicists is, that they make development do every thing, and supersede all other natural powers, and even God himself. This has made many good men turn away from the name and thing with aversion. But it is surely possible to maintain that evolution (that is, organized causation) reigns widely, even universally (that is, over all nature), and yet believe, that, like all creative action, it is limited, and is not the only process in operation, and that it is one, and only one, exercise of the mighty power of God. Let us notice its limitations.

1. It cannot give us the original matter, which must be there before it begins to develop. Its very name and nature indicate that there was something prior, from which it is derived. Whence did this come? We have cleared up the intelligence needed to organize nature (Nagó̄g, as Anaxagoras expresses it), and it is most reasonable to believe that He who arranged it also made it. At all events, evolution cannot give us the original matter, and we have to call in a power which is prior of which the latter is a part.

2. Development cannot account for the beneficent order and special arrangements of the universe. Being itself blind, it might as readily work standing and the conscience presuppose both the information given by the senses, and the understanding and the conscience. In our bodily frame, mind acts upon and acts with the previously existing powers. In the original molecule, say a conscious self. Was there a power of discerning things, of comparing and judging, of noting resemblances and differences? Had they the power of reasoning, of inferring the unseen from the seen, of the past from the future? Were there emotions in these primitive existences, say a hope of continuous existence, or a fear of approaching dissolution? All sober thinkers acknowledge that there is no evidence whatever in experience or reason to show that matter can produce mind, that mechanical action can manufacture consciousness, that electricity can reason, or organic structure give us the idea of the good and holy. According, then, to the principles of thinking and right observation, we have to call in powers above the original physical forces to produce such phenomena. In particular there must have been a special act when man appeared with intelligence and moral discernment, with free will and love.

When these new and higher powers come in, they act upon and act with the previously existing powers. In our bodily frame, mind acts harmoniously with matter, and the two produce joint results. The memory proceeds upon the information given by the senses, and the understanding and the conscience presuppose both the senses and the memory. Man is made of the dust of the ground; but there is breathed into him the breath of life, and he becomes a living soul.

As the result of the whole — of the action of the old forces and the introduction of the new — the work goes on in eras or epochs, in which we have, first, lifeless creation with all things mixed, then the separations of air from water, and of land from sea, the distinct appearance of the old and the superaddition of the new — is progressive, advancing from the inferior to the higher. This progression is still going on; and from causes now operating, especially from the intelligence and industry of man, there will be an increased force of evolution, and the old and the principal inhabitant will be brought to a higher and higher condition.

In regard to development, see, on the one side, Darwin's Origin of Species and Descent of Man, and Herbert Spencer's works, and, on the other side, Dawson's works, — Fossil Men and their Modern Representatives, The Chain of Life in Geological Time, Life's Dawn, Nature and the Bible, The Beginning of the World according to Revelation and Science, — and Mivart, On the Genesis of Species, and Man and Apes.

II. Analogous to this there is evolution in the kingdom of heaven. Many interesting correspondences may be traced between the two kingdoms. In both there are old powers and new, leading to higher and higher products. The kingdom of heaven is like to leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, and which ferments there. It is a seed becoming a tree. There is first the blade, then the ear, and then the full corn in the ear.

It is our privilege to live under the dispensation of the Spirit. There were anticipations of the operation of this blessed agent in the Old Testament, who converted and sanctified individuals. But these manifestations were only partial. “For the Holy Ghost was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified.” But Jesus spoke of “the Spirit which they that believe on him should receive.” When Jesus was taken up into heaven and glorified, the disciples waited for the promised blessing, which was fulfilled when the day of Pentecost was fully come, and the Spirit was poured out on high.

When the spiritual begins to act, we have now two powers tending towards development and progression. First there are the mental powers, which have been acting previously, and which we may call the old or natural powers. Then there is the higher or spiritual power superinduced.

When a new power comes in, it does not set aside the old ones: on the contrary, it acts with them. We have this in the geological ages; for instance, in the introduction of intelligence in the midst of animalism. The senses continued to work, and to supply information, which is received, shaped, and guided by the intellect. When, at a further stage, the moral power came in, it did not supersede the intellect, which still operates, and tells us what things are; and upon this representation the conscience proceeds. It is the same when the spiritual power acts. It does not push aside the senses, the conscience, the intelligence; but it purifies and guides them, and devotes them to higher ends.

There is the fullest accordance between the old powers and the superadded ones. They work in concert, as the soul does with the body, as the higher reason does with the senses and the animal impulses. The inspiration of Moses, of the prophets and apostles, did not destroy their natural character: it only sanctified and elevated them. The spirits of the prophets were subject unto the dispensation of the Spirit. There were anticipations of the operation of this blessed agent in the Old Testament, who converted and sanctified individuals. But these manifestations were only partial. "For the Holy Ghost was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified." But Jesus spoke of "the Spirit which they that believe on him should receive." When Jesus was taken up into heaven and glorified, the disciples waited for the promised blessing, which was fulfilled when the day of Pentecost was fully come, and the Spirit was poured out on high.

When the spiritual begins to act, we have now two powers tending towards development and progression. First there are the mental powers, which have been acting previously, and which we may call the old or natural powers. Then there is the higher or spiritual power superinduced.

When a new power comes in, it does not set aside the old ones: on the contrary, it acts with them. We have this in the geological ages; for instance, in the introduction of intelligence in the midst of animalism. The senses continued to work, and to supply information, which is received, shaped, and guided by the intellect. When, at a further stage, the moral power came in, it did not supersede the intellect, which still operates, and tells us what things are; and upon this representation the conscience proceeds. It is the same when the spiritual power acts. It does not push aside the senses, the conscience, the intelligence; but it purifies and guides them, and devotes them to higher ends.

There is the fullest accordance between the old powers and the superadded ones. They work in concert, as the soul does with the body, as the higher reason does with the senses and the animal impulses. The inspiration of Moses, of the prophets and apostles, did not destroy their natural character: it only sanctified and elevated them. The spirits of the prophets were subject unto them. Religion does not eradicate the natural powers: it moulds and directs them.

The development goes on in eras or epochs, like the ages of geology, like the days of Genesis. The patriarchal dispensation grows out of the antediluvian, the Jewish out of the patriarchal, the Christian dispensation out of the Jewish. We may discover marked epochs, even in the Christian Church, — the time of the fathers (a time of establishing), the medieval church, the reformation churches, the denominational churches, the missionary churches, to expand into the millennial church.
The issue of this joint action of the old powers and the new is progression. We have an example in the opening of Genesis, where new mani-

There is undoubtedly progression, development if we properly understand it, in the revelation which God has been pleased to make of his will. In Isaiah's times mention was light like that of the dawn. There were prefigurations under the Levitical dispensation more minute and specific than in the patriarchal dispensations. There is higher ethical teaching in the prophetic books than in the older Scriptures. There is more spiritual teaching in the New Testament than in the Old. Jesus, in the fulness of time, becomes the light of the world. There is the fullest revelation of specific truth in the Epistles. Here there is provision made for God dealing with each individual soul. There is room for convictions and conversions, for getting grace and more grace, for seasons of revival and refreshing.

EDWALD, Georg Heinrich August, was one of the most learned Oriental scholars of the century; b. Nov. 16, 1803, in Göttingen; d. there of heart-disease, May 4, 1875. His father was a linen-weaver. In 1820 he entered the University of Göttingen, where Eichhorn was then teaching; but Edward denied having been much influenced by him. After teaching in the gymnasium at Wolfenbüttel for two years, he began in 1824 to teach as Repetent in Göttingen, and was made professor in 1827.

In 1837 he was expelled from his position for having signed, with six other Göttingen professors, a protest against the revocation of the liberal constitution of 1833; which Ernest August, king of Hanover, effected. This action made him famous. In 1829 and 1836 he had visited France and Italy, and now (1838) visited England. The same year he received a call to Tübingen; he never contented during his stay there, and came into bitter feud with Baur and the Tübingen school. After laboring ten years in Tübingen, he was recalled in 1848 to Göttingen, where he continued until 1866, when his bitter attacks upon the Prussian government, and his refusal to take the oath of allegiance to the king of Prussia, were punished with his exclusion from the faculty of philosophy; but he was still allowed his salary and the entitled work in its line and Parliament. [In 1874 he was imprisoned for three weeks for libel against Bismarck, whom he accused of ruining religion and morality in the war against Austria, and of picking out the best time for plunder and robbery in the war against France.]

Edward was a solitary man. He was married twice; but from his childhood up he stood aloof from his fellows, had no intimate friends, and was, in an ever-increasing measure, intolerant of all opinions which contradicted his own. He felt himself called upon to be the last mouth of his family, to discontinue the old.

The issue of this joint action of the old powers and the new is progression. We have an example in the opening of Genesis, where new mani-

EXCOMMUNICATION.

I. AMONG THE HEBREWS. — Any person or thing — man, animal, weapon, tool, or piece of ground— which to pious eyes seemed abominable, or dangerous, or incorrigible, the Hebrews used to set apart from common life, transforming it into a kind of ban-offering, and sacrificing it to God, for him to do with it as he pleased,— destroying it, or simply rendering it harmless, or perhaps forgiving it. This usage, of which traces are found both among the Gauls (Cæsar, De Bello Gallico, 6, 17) and the Germans (Tacitus, Ann., 13, 57), was very old among the Hebrews, and showed itself conspicuously in their relation to foreigners, to heathenism, and to anything opposed to their own system of religion. Not only objects of heathen worship, such as altars, idols, temples, etc., but even the larger portions of the theocracy. It then became, not the fulfillment of a vow, but the execution of a punishment, and assumed the form of an excommunication. Thus a single person, or even a whole city, which broke the covenant with God, and fell into sin, was put under the ban, and accounted of a religious principle.

Its most awful application, however, this principle obtained within the nation itself, as a weapon against anything attacking the sacred institutions of the theocracy. It then became, not the fulfillment of a vow, but the execution of a punishment, and assumed the form of an excommunication. Thus a single person, or even a whole city, which broke the covenant with God, and fell into idolatry, was put under the ban, and with a curse abandoned to destruction. If a single person, he was killed (Lev. xxvi. 29): if a whole city, all that breathed within its precincts was killed, and the rest were burnt (Deut. xxiii. 16). That which could not be thus destroyed, such as metal utensils, the soil, etc., remained the property of the sanctuary (Lev. xxvi. 21-23).

EXCOMMUNICATION.
As instances, may be mentioned the punishment of the people of Suceoth and Penuel (Judg. vii. 4–17), of Jabesh (Judg. xxi. 10), of Benjamin (Judg. xx. 48), etc.

In the course of time the rigor of the law abated, and the punishment assumed the character of a simple ecclesiastical penalty; as in the time of Ezra also, there were those who would not send away their foreign wives from the synagogue, and their property confiscated. In the period of the New Testament there seems to have been two different kinds of excommunication,— one milder (the ἐξωκάτωγος γίνεσθαι or ποιεῖν of John ix. 22, xii. 42, and xvi. 2). The Talmud and the Rabbins also distinguish between two kinds of excommunication,— the ἐξωκάτωγος, which was limited to thirty days, and to the most intimate relations, and which did not exclude from the service, though the person was shut out from the temple and the synagogue through a peculiar door; and the ΡΩΓ, which should be pronounced by at least ten members of the congregation, and meant not only exclusion from the temple and the synagogue, but also from intercourse with co-religionists. See Buxtorf: Ezec. Talm.; Lightfoot: Hebr. Heb. ad Jot., 9, 22.

II. IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. — On scriptural authority (Matt. xvi. 19, xviii. 18; John xx. 23; 1 Thess. v. 14; James v. 18; 1 John i. 8, v. 16; 2 Cor. v. 18) grave sins were punished in the ancient church with excommunication; and by the councils of Ancyra, 314 (c. 4, 6, 8, 9, 11, and Nicea, 325 (c. 11, 12), the proceedings were completely systematized; only after a severe course of penitence the excommunicated was re-admitted into the bosom of the church. In the Western Church, however, this practice of doing public penance never obtained firm hold, and soon disappeared altogether. But a double kind of excommunication developed,— an excommunicatio minor, excluding the culprit from the sacraments only; and an excommunicatio major, which also excluded him from the exercise of the law of God, from burial in consecrated ground, from ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and from all intercourse with other Christians, excepting a few cases,— utile, lex, humile, res ignorata, necesse. This last part, however, of the punishment, the Church could not enforce by her own power: she had to ask for the aid of the State, and she obtained it. The State declared the excommunicated infamous (c. 17, C. 16, qu. 1), all obligations to him, as, for instance, the feudal obedience, null and void (c. 4, 5, C. 15, qu. 6), etc. How completely the medieval State submitted to the Church may be seen from the demands which the Pope made (1213 and 1210) to the Emperor Frederic II., and (1230) to his son King Henry VI., and to which these princes consented (Pertz, Mon., 4, 224, 231, 267).

The canon law reigned supremely in most relations, and aspired to do so in them all. With the Reformation a great change took place. In all Protestant countries where the State took the supremacy over the Church, the excommunicatio major was abolished as a secular punishment; but the excommunicatio minor was still retained as a point of church discipline, as a pena medicinalis. Luther held, as did most of the Reformers, that, by admitting an impenitent to the Lord's Supper, the minister shared in the sin thereby committed. But he also held that this excommunication from the Lord's Supper should never be administered unless with the concurrence of the whole congregation. This last idea, however, never came out; and the excommunication itself gradually fell into disuse in the Reformed churches. The Roman-Catholic Church, which still pretends to maintain her social independence, and her supremacy over the State, continued to treat the prescripts of canon law as valid theoretically. Practically she has found out long ago that modifications are necessary, since an excommunication pronounced by the Pope, but not enforced by the State, would have no civil effect whatever; and an enforcement by the State is not likely to take place any more. The present theoretical arrangement of the whole question is set forth in the constitution of Oct. 12, 1869, Apostolica sedis. See Köcher: Der Kirchenban, Tübingen, 1857; Goeschien: Doctrina de disciplina ecclesiastica ex ordinationibus, Halte, 1589.

EXEGESIS, EXEGETICAL THEOLOGY. I. DEFINITION. — One of the four leading departments of theological science, and lying at the base of the others,— historical, systematic, practical. It has to do with the interpretation of the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, which in the Protestant churches are regarded as the only infallible rule of the Christian faith and life, and the ultimate tribunal in all controversies. The term ἔξωκατώγος (from ἐξώκατωμα, "to lead out," "to expound") is borrowed from classical usage: the expounders of the oracles of Delphi, and the sacred rites in Athens, were called "exegetes" (ἐξωκάτωγος). In the New Testament the verb occurs once, in John i. 18, where it is said of Christ that he declared or revealed (ἐξωκάτωγεν) the hidden being of God. Exegesis originated among the Jewish scribes, passed into the Christian Church, and is now most extensively cultivated in Protestant Germany, Great Britain, the United States. Every theological school must, first of all, have a chair of exegesis or biblical literature: most of them have two or more, for the Old and the New Testaments.

II. BRANCHES. — Exegetical theology, in the widest sense, embraces, beside exegesis proper, the following auxiliary and supplementary branches of theological learning: 1. Biblical philology (Greek for the New Testament, Hebrew and Chaldee for the Old Testament); 2. Biblical geography (Egypt, Mount Sinai, Palestine); 3. Biblical archaeology or antiquities; 4. Biblical history (from the creation to the close of the apostolic age); 5. Textual criticism (the restoration of the original-text of the sacred writers); 6. A literary history of the Bible, usually called Historical-Critical Introduction (including an account of the several books, their genuineness, integrity, authorship, time and place of composition); 7. History of the canon; 8. Biblical hermeneutics (the science of the laws of interpretation); 9. Biblical theology (the summing-up of the results of exegesis in systematic form). See those titles.

III. KINDS OF EXEGESIS. — 1. Translation; 2. Periphrase; 3. Commentary. Of commentaries proper we may distinguish again three kinds.

1. Philological or grammatico-historical exegesis brings out simply the meaning of the writer according to the laws of language and the usu locund i at the time of composition, and according to the historical situation of the writer, irrespective of any doctrinal or sectarian bias. It implies a thorough knowledge of Greek and Hebrew, and familiarity with contemporary literature.

2. Theological exegesis develops the doctrinal and ethical ideas of the writer in organic connection with the whole teaching of the Scriptures, and according to the analogy of faith.

3. Homiletical or practical exegesis is the application of the well-ascertained results of grammatical and theological interpretation to the wants of the Christian congregation, and belongs properly to the pulpit.

IV. History of Exegesis. — I. Jewish Exegesis, confined to the Old Testament. It began soon after the age of Ezra, but was first carried on by oral tradition of the scribes and Jewish scholars. It was especially devoted to the law (the Torah), i.e., the Pentateuch, and derived from it minute rules for the individual, social, and ecclesiastical relations. The body of these interpretations is called "Midrash." The prevalent method of exegesis was the rabbinical literal. It excluded all foreign ideas, and was subservient to the strictlegalism of the Pharisees. But among the Hellenist (Greek-speaking) Jews, especially in Alexandria, the allegorizing method obtained favor, especially through Philo (d. about 40 A.D.), who endeavored to combine the Mosaic religion with Platonic philosophy, and prepared the way for the allegorizing exegesis of Clement, and Origen of Alexandria. The Jewish rabbins of the middle ages cultivated grammatical exegesis at a time when the knowledge of Hebrew had died out in the Christian Church. The most distinguished among them are Ibn Ezra (d. 1167), R. Sal. Isaac or Rashi (d. 1105), David Kimchi (d. 1190), Moses Maimonides (d. 1204). Their commentaries are printed separately, and also in the so-called Rabbinical Bibles (e.g., of Buxtorf, Basle, 1618, 3 vols. folio). The exegesis of the Protestant Reformers of the sixteenth century marks a new epoch. It was full of enthusiasm for the word of God, and free from the slavery of ecclesiastical tradition. It went directly to the original Greek and Hebrew Scriptures, and furnished the best translations for the benefit of the people; while Romanism regards the Bible as a book for the priesthood, and discourages or prohibits efforts for its general circulation without note or comment. All the leading Reformers wrote commentaries, more or less extensive, on various books of the Bible, — Luther (d. 1546), Melanchthon (d. 1560), Zwingli (d. 1531), Ecolampadius (d. 1531); the ablest of them are by Calvin (d. 1564) and his pupil and successor, Beza (d. 1623). Calvin combines almost all the qualifications of an expounder, in rare harmony; and his commentaries on Genesis, the Psalms, the Prophets, and all the books of the New Testament (except Revelation, on which he did not write), are valuable to this day. Beza, by his Greek Testament, his Latin version and notes on the New Testament, had great influence on the English version of King James.

2. Patristic Exegesis. — The first use made of the Bible in the Christian Church was practical and homiletical. It was to the early Christians what it is still to the great mass of believers, and will be to the end of time. — a book of life, of spiritual instruction and edification, of hope and comfort. Scientific or learned exegesis began soon after the age of Ezra, but was first carried on by his Greek Testament, his Latin version and notes on the English version of King James. The principal patristic compilations are: (a) In the Greek Church, those of Ecumenius (d. 908), Theophylactus (d. 1067), Euthymius Zigabenus (d. 1118), and Nicephorus (fourteenth century); (b) In the Latin Church, Wallafried Strabo (d. 875), Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274). The Catena aurea in Evangelia of Thomas Aquinas has been reproduced in an English translation by Pusey, Keble, and Newman.

Among the more independent biblical scholars of the middle ages who prepared the way for the Reformation must be mentioned Nicholas of Lyra (d. 1340); "Si Lyra non iurasset, Lutherus non saltasset," says Erasmus, and "Lyra and Laurenz," says Melanchthon (1565).

4. The exegesis of the Protestant Reformers of the sixteenth century marks a new epoch. It is full of enthusiasm for the word of God, and free from the slavery of ecclesiastical tradition. It went directly to the original Greek and Hebrew Scriptures, and furnished the best translations for the benefit of the people; while Romanism regards the Bible as a book for the priesthood, and discourages or prohibits efforts for its general circulation without note or comment. All the leading Reformers wrote commentaries, more or less extensive, on various books of the Bible, — Luther (d. 1546), Melanchthon (d. 1560), Zwingli (d. 1531), Ecolampadius (d. 1531); the ablest of them are by Calvin (d. 1564) and his pupil and successor, Beza (d. 1623). Calvin combines almost all the qualifications of an expounder, in rare harmony; and his commentaries on Genesis, the Psalms, the Prophets, and all the books of the New Testament (except Revelation, on which he did not write), are valuable to this day. Beza, by his Greek Testament, his Latin version and notes on the New Testament, had great influence on the English version of King James.

5. Protestant commentaries of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, by Hugo Grotius (d. 1645; Arminian); Vitringa (d. 1722; Dutch Calvinist); Hammond (d. 1690: Church of England); Matthew Poole (Presbyterian; d. 1679; Annotations upon the Whole Bible, an English synopsis from his Latin synopsis); Matthew Henry (Independent; d. 1714; the best homiletical commentator of England; many editions, from 3 to 9 vols., Lond. and N.Y.); Patrick, Lowth, Arnold, and Whitby (Lond., 1694 sqq., new ed. Lond., 1822, in 6 vols., Phila. and N.Y., in 4 vols.); Calovius (Lutheran; d. 1686; Bibbia Illustrata, versus Grotii); A. Clarke (Methodist, Lond., 1810–23, in 8 vols., best ed., London, 1844, in 6 vols.); John Gill (Baptist; d. 1771; London, 1763, 9 vols.); Philip Doddridge (Independent; d. 1751; author of Family Expositor); J. A. Bengel (Lutheran; d. 1752; author of the Latin Gnomon of the New Testament, twice translated into English, and largely used by John Wesley in his Notes, an admirable specimen of multum in parvo); Thomas Scott (Family Bible, London, 1796, 4 vols., 11th ed., 1825, 6 vols.). Collective works: Critici Sacri (Lond., 1660, 9 tom., Amsterdam, 1698–1732, in 13 vols.), compiled from the principal commentators, as an appendix to Walton's Polyglot, under the direction of Bishop Pearson and others; Poole's Synopsis Criticorum aliorumque S. Scrip- turae interpretum (London, 1669–76, 4 vols. in 5, fol.), a very useful abridgment from the Critici Sacri and other commentators.

6. Exegesis in the nineteenth century. It is exceedingly prolific, chiefly German, English, and American. The Bible is now more studied than ever before, and with a better knowledge of the languages, antiquities, geography, and history. We can only mention a small number of works.

(a) Commentaries on the whole Bible: Lange's Biblewerk (Bielefeld and Leipzig, 1857–77, in 16 parts; English translation, with large additions, by Philip Schaff, aided by more than forty American contributors, New York and Edinburgh, 1864–80, in 25 vols. royal 8vo, including a separate volume on the Apocrypha and a complete index), a threefold commentary, critical, doctrinal, and homiletical, for the use of ministers and theological students; Chr. Wordsworth (Bishop and conservative; The Pulpit Commentary, ed. by J. B. McClellan, Lond., 1879, in 3 vols.); Illustrated Popular Com., ed. by Schaff, with English and American contributors (N. Y. and Edinb., 1879–83, in 4 vols., also issued since 1882 in small volumes, revised, under the title International Revision Com., based upon the Revised Version of 1881). Besides, there are many shorter and denominational commentaries. The Revision of 1881, and the International Lesson system, have greatly stimulated exegetical activity; and the market is now flooded with all sorts of helps for the study of the Bible.

(c) On the New Testament: Olshausen (1837–50), trans.; De Wette (d. 1849), revised by Bruck- ner and others; Meyer (d. 1874), revised in every new edition by Weiss and others, Eng. trans. pub. by Clark, Berl. (Eng. trans., pub. by Oxford); Alford's Commentary, etc. (in 4 vols., 6th ed., London, 1866 sqq.); J. B. McClellan (Lond., 1st vol., 1875). All these are for critical students of the Greek text. Popular commentaries on the New Testament: Albert Barnes (d. 1870) was one of the first, and had by far the widest circulation of any in America and England. More recent works: A New Test. Com. for English Readers, ed. by Bishop Ellicott (Lond., 1875, in 3 vols.); Illustrated Popular Com., ed. by Schaff, with English and American contributors (N. Y. and Edinb., 1879–83, in 4 vols.), also issued since 1882 in small volumes, revised, under the title International Revision Com., based upon the Revised Version of 1881). Besides, there are many shorter and denominational commentaries. The Revision of 1881, and the International Lesson system, have greatly stimulated exegetical activity; and the market is now flooded with all sorts of helps for the study of the Bible.

(d) The present century has also produced a large number of exegetical works of the first order on separate books of the Bible, which it would be impossible here to enumerate. Among recent commentators on one or more books of the Old Testament, Gesenius (Isaiah), Ewald (the poetical and prophetical books), Hupfeld (the Psalms), Hitzig (Psalms, minor prophets), Hengstenberg (Psalms, etc.), Delitzsch (Psalms, Isaiah), Keil (historical books), Schottmann (Job), Stuart (Daniel, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes), Joseph A. Alexander (Psalms and Isaiah) occupy the first rank. Of New-Testament commentators on special books must be mentioned Winer (on Galatians), Fritzsche (Matthew, Mark, Romans; all in Latin), Tholuck (Romans, Hebrews, Sermon on the Mount), Lücke on the Gospels, Hengstenberg (Psalms, etc.), Delitzsch (Psalms, Isaiah), Keil (historical books), Schottmann (Job), Stuart (Daniel, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes), Joseph A. Alexander (Psalms and Isaiah) occupy the first rank.

EXEMPTION.

SAMUEL BERGER: De Glossariis et compendiiis exegeticiis quibusdam mediævo, Paris, 1879; L. WOGUE: Histoire de la Bible et de l'exxe du biblique jusqu'à nos jours, Paris, 1881 (Jewish exegesis; also art. HERMENEUTICS, and the literature there quoted). EXEMPTION, in ecclesiastical law, means the transference of persons or institutions from the jurisdiction of their nearest regular superior to that of some special or higher superior. The most noticeable instance of exemption in the Roman-Catholic Church is found in the history of monasticism. The monks were originally subject to the jurisdiction of the bishop. See the Council of Chalcedon, 431, can. 4 (c. 12, Can. XVI. qu. 1; c. 10, Can. XVIII. qu. III.). But in course of time, first single monasteries, and then whole orders, were exempted from the episcopal rules, and placing themselves immediately under the Pope. The change, however, did not take place without contest; and the acts of the Council of Constance and Trent show the bitterness which prevailed on both sides. In the Reformed Churches there was no use for exemptions, except in cases in which the Lutheran and the Calvinistic or one of the Reformed and the Roman-Catholic Church met each other in the same parish. The first instance of exemption in the Reformed Churches was that of the prince, who placed himself outside of the regular ecclesiastical jurisdiction; then followed, in some countries, that of the royal officers, in others, that of the army, and in others, that of the whole nobility, etc.

EXERCISES, Spiritual (exercitia spiritualia), a term applied, in the Roman-Catholic asceticism, to certain exercises in meditation and mortification practices, both by ecclesiastics and laymen, generally under the guidance of the confessor, and partly as general penance, partly as a preparation for the Lord's Supper, ordination, etc. It was Ignatius Loyola who developed this institution of spiritual exercises to its highest and most elaborate form; and Pope Alexander VII. granted full absolution to any one, ecclesiastics or laymen, who for eight days should practise these exercises in a house of the Society of Jesus, and according to the method of Loyola. See The Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius of Loyola, trans. from the Latin by Charles Seager, Baltimore, 1849.

EXETER, chief town of Devonshire, Eng.: population, 34,650; on the Exe, ten miles from its mouth, in the English Channel; is on the site of the British stronghold Caer Isc, and the Roman town, Isca Dumniorum. It was occupied by Britons and Saxons, and called Exancaster, whence comes the modern name. In 1060 the episcopal see of Devonshire, founded at Crediton, 910, was removed to Exeter. Its cathedral dates from the twelfth century, and, although not as large as some others, is inferior to none in architectural beauty. It was restored 1877. The income of the see of Exeter is £4,200; and the present bishop is Dr. Frederick Temple, who was consecrated 1869.

EXODUS OF THE CHILDREN OF ISRAEL.
The Pharaoh of the exodus is Menephthah I., the son of Pharaoh Amon, and Amon was chief governor, according to the oppression. This is now so generally acknowledged, that it may be accepted as a settled fact. The other view—that Amosis I. was the Pharaoh of the oppression, and Thothmes II. that of the exodus—has been given up by R. S. Poole, formerly its chief advocate, in his article upon Egypt, in the ninth edition of the Britannica. The date of the exodus may be set down as April 15, 1317 B.C. The other view mentioned would put it in 1855 B.C. A striking though strangely unnoticed passage in Herodotus seems to add confirmation to the accepted date. (See Schaff, Through Bible Lands, p. 162.) He says that the son of Rameses, whom the Greeks called "Sesostris," undertook no warlike expeditions, being struck with blindness, owing to the following circumstance. The river had swollen to the unusual height of eight cubits, and was overflowing the fields, when, a sudden wind arising, the water rose in great waves. Then the king, in a spirit of impious violence, seized his spear, and hurled it into the strong eddies of the stream. Instantly he was smitten with disease of the eyes, from which he never recovered, and the country remained blind, continuing without the power of vision for ten years" (II. c. 111). This reads like a confused reminiscence of Menephthah's overthrow in the Red Sea. It is no objection that the king is said to have lived ten years thereafter; for the Bible-account does not compel us to believe that the Pharaoh perished then. The monuments, as was to be expected, contain no account of the disaster.

The route of the exodus is thus described in Scripture language: "The children of Israel journeyed from Rameses to Succoth" (Exod. xii. 37); from Succoth they went to Etham, in the edge of the wilderness (xiii. 20), where they turned, and encamped "before Pi–hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal–Zephon" (xiv. 2). In Numbers (xxiii. 2–10) there is another account, which presents the same facts in a more condensed form. The identification of the localities mentioned is not yet settled; but that given by Ebers seems most probable. This is: Rameses was el Mashuta, at the head of the Wady Tumilat; Succoth, Sekhet (Taubastum of the Romans), north-east of Lake Timsah; Etham (fortress), a frontier fortress city; Pi–hahiroth, Ajrud, a fortress a few miles north-east of Suez ("Pi" is merely the Egyptian article); Migdol, Bir Suweis, about two miles from Suez; Baal–Zephon is Mount Atakah.

The collection of the great multitude—six hundred thousand men capable of bearing arms (i.e., between twenty and sixty years old), beside women and children, or in all between two millions and three millions — was the work of three or four days. The rallying-place was Rameses (el Mashuta). To this point the Israelites streamed from different parts, as they had been directed to do. The existence of tribal organization explains the fact that they marched in some sort of order. Yet they had so recently been emancipated, and were so entirely unarmed, that it was, humanly speaking, impossible for them to stand an attack from the disciplined Egyptian army. Accordingly, when Moses had led them as far as Etham...

upon the highway to Palestine, the seat of a garrison, he abruptly turned to the south, and went south for fifty miles until they reached Pi-hahiroth, over against Baal-Zephon, in the neighborhood of the present Suez. But their sudden disappearance from Etham naturally led the garrison there to believe that they had become entangled in the wilderness: and word to that effect was sent to Pharaoh (Exod. xiv. 3). The explanation of the delay in their pursuit is, that the universal bereavement had centred the attention of the Egyptians upon their funeral-rites, which required some ten week (Gen. i. 3), and which were paramount in importance. Nothing could be done until they were over. At the end of the seventy days, active measures were taken to bring back the fugitive slaves; and to the Israelites came the dismaying intelligence that the host of Pharaoh was upon their track. Before them was the Red Sea, behind them the angry host. No wonder they murmured, and said to Moses in bitter irony, “Because there are no graves in Egypt (that land of graves) hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness?” (Exod. xiv. 3). But man’s extremity is God’s opportunity. “Moses stretched out his hand over the sea; and the Lord caused the sea to go back by a strong [north] east wind all the night, and made the sea dry land, and the waters were divided. And the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground; and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand and on their left” (Exod. xiv. 21, 22).

There are three chief explanations of these verses.

1. The Arab tradition locates the crossing of the sea about ten miles from Suez, where the sea is about ten miles broad, and supposes the host to have made the distance thither in the night. This view meets best a literal interpretation of the narrative; for then the waters would have been a veritable wall upon either hand, and is maintained by von Raumer (Zug der Is. aus Aeg. nach Canaan, Leipzig, 1837). But it would have required an accumulation of miracles to have brought them to the place in so short a time, especially as there is but a narrow footpath between the Atakah range and the sea. Besides, the mention of the wind suggests that God employed natural means. Hence this view may be dismissed for the second.

2. The crossing took place at the head of the gulf, near or north of Suez. The gulf is here horn-shaped, and is a mere channel about four miles long by less than a mile wide. At low water, small islands and sand-banks are visible in it, and it is fordable by those acquainted with it. The strong wind laid this stretch bare, and over it the Israelites crossed. The waters had been driven into the south-west bay: and there they were a wall on the one hand, while those of the open sea were a wall on the other. The miracle was, as Dr. Robinson says, a “miraculous adaptation of the laws of nature to produce a required result.”

3. The theory now associated with Brugsch (L’ezode et les monum. egyptiens, Leipzig, 1875, for trans. see below in Lit.), although it is older, having been advocated as early as 1726 by Hermann van der Hardt, and recently by M. J. Schleiden (Die Landenge von Suez, Leipzig, 1858), Sayce adopted it in 1881. According to this, the Israelites assembled at San (Zoan); and the “crossing” was not over the Red Sea at all, but over the Serbionian bog. To this view there are so many objections, that, as Dr. Bartlett says, it “derives its chief importance from the eminence and ability of its latest advocate (Brugsch).” It requires a renaming and replacing of every locality,—in itself, be it granted, no insuperable objection. Yam Suph is the Serbionian bog; Mara is the Bitter Lakes; Elim is Thent-remu; Etham is just before one crosses the lowest part of Lake Menzaleh; Pi-hahiroth is at the hither side of the Serbionian bog; Baal-Zephon is Mount Casius, upon the Mediterranean Sea. There the Israelites crossed, and came south-west and south to Ain Musa. The theory turns upon the meaning of yam suph. The words mean literally the weedy or reedy sea. Surely they fit better the shallow, reedy lakes of North-eastern Egypt than the Red Sea; but the stubborn fact is, that they are uniformly applied to the latter by the Seventy, who had the best means of knowing what the Hebrew meant; and thus the argument upon which the theory rests is worthless, and all Brugsch’s learning and enthusiasm cannot give it value. He derives his proofs mainly from the following letter, written, Geikie thinks, to recall the gendarmerie who had watched the wall at Takhu, a fortress on the eastern frontier of the Delta, when the Hebrews, prior to the exodus, were advancing toward it. It reads thus: “Notice! when my letter reaches you, bring the Madjai at once, who were over the foreign Safkhi who have escaped. Do not bring all the men I have named in my list; Give attention to this. Bring them to me to Takhu, and I will admit them and you” (Hours with the Bible, vol. ii. p. 182).

That the Seventy were correct in interpreting yam suph by την ἐρέθισ τοῦ ἀλοῦσα (“the Red Sea”) is very plain when another passage in Exodus is compared. Thus (Exod. x. 10) the locusts were cast by a west wind “into the Red Sea” (την ἄλοοσα την ἠρεθησα); but it would have required a south wind to have blown them into the Serbionian bog.

There are other objections to the Schleiden-Bruigsch theory. Ebers contests the Egyptological proof. Dr. Bartlett (p. 171) urges that the identification of Rameses and Zoan “seems incompatible with the use of both names in the Scriptures and in the same book (e.g., Numbers), without a hint of their identity.” Dr. J. P. Thompson, in the Bibliotheca Sacra for January, 1875, adds: (1) “This theory, locating Rameses at Zoan, would require the Israelites first to march a long distance away from their destination to the place of rendezvous, to cross the Pelusiac arm of the Nile, and to recross it next day,—a process sufficiently improbable; (2) That the supposed route would take them on the most direct way towards the Philistines, contrary to the express statement of Exod. iii. 17; (3) That the leading of an army into the treacherous Serbionian bog, when there was a military road and a great thoroughfare south of it, implied a blunder not supposable in Moses, much less in Egyptian generals who were accustomed to the whole region, having frequently led their armies to the east.”
It is important to remember that the night of the crossing was a terrible one. In the language of the Psalmist, "The clouds poured out water; the skies sent out a sound; thine arrows [the lightnings] lightened the world; the earth trembled, the earth shook." The yell of fire between the Israelites and the Egyptians: so where the latter, accustomed to see the flaming torches at the head of the host, supposed the van of the Israelites to be, there was really their rear. Misled, therefore, they forced their jaded horses onward, thinking they had already got into the very midst of the flying slaves. Under divine guidance, and perhaps miraculously hastened, the Israelites made the crossing in safety; but the Egyptians labored under unexpected difficulties. "At the morning watch the Lord looked unto the host of the Egyptians," and "troubled" (i.e., threw them into confusion), and "took off their chariot-wheels, so that they drove them heavily." The morning dawned. The Egyptians saw their slaves upon the bank, but saw also that the sea had broken its barrier, and was pouring in upon them. Amid groans and cries the pride of Egypt's army sank beneath the waves; while the Israelites sang their beautiful colored map and a sketch-map enable the reader to understand Ebers's and Brugsch's theories of the exodus; Philip Schaff: Through Bible Lands, N.Y., 1878, pp. 152-162 (with sketch-maps illustrating the various theories); The Hebrew Migration from Egypt, Lond., 1879; Brugsch: History of Egypt under the Pharaohs, from the Monuments, with appendix containing translation of Brugsch's paper on The Exodus and the Egyptian monuments, vol. ii. pp. 357-400, cf. additional notes, pp. 421-432, Eng. trans., London, 1879, 2d ed., 1881, 2 vols.; A. EXORCISM (ἐξορκοεσθαι, "adjuration"), a solemn adjuration with the intent of expelling evil spirits. Our Lord cured many cases of demonic possession, and conferred the power to do the same upon his disciples (Matt. X. 8). They were, however, not always successful (Matt. xvii. 19). The Jews likewise professed to have the power of casting out evil spirits; and Josephus mentions that it was done in his day with the aid of roots and a ring, by which the demon was extracted through the ring. In the early church, exorcism was regarded as a charism which belonged to all Christians. Tertullian (Apol. 23) lays it down as an indisputable fact that the simple command of a Christian was sufficient to expel evil spirits. Origen (Cont. Celsum, VII.) testifies to the same thing, and notices that no artificial incantations were used. At a later period the exorcist was one of the four inferior orders of the clergy, and received ordination (Apost. Const., VIII. 26). Bishop Cornelius of Rome (251) makes mention of this. The Roman Council of 1179 forbade this custom, but in vain. It was restricted by the Council of Constance, again forbidden by the Council of Basel, and finally abolished by the Council of Trent. Only in one case the Council of Trent still acknowledged it (Sess. 25 de reform. c. 7), in the case of the appointment of a coadjutor to a bishop with expectancy of succession.

EXSUPERIUS, Bishop of Toulouse in the latter half of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth century, distinguished himself by the noble charity he showed during the frightful depredations of the Alani, Vandals, and Suevi, neglecting his own sufferings in order to administer to the sufferings of others. Jerome dedicated his commentary on the Prophet Zechariah to him. See Act. Sanct., Sept. 28.

EXTERM UNCTION. (the rite of anointing the dying with oil) is the fifth of the seven sacraments of the Roman-Catholic Church. It is based upon Mark vi. 13 and Jas. v. 14, 15. In both these cases the rite is applied for the purpose of healing the sick, not in order to prepare them for death; which is the principal meaning of the sacrament in the Catholic Church. As for the fathers of the Greek Church, it will suffice to say that John of Damascus treats only of baptism and the Lord's Supper under the mysteries of the Church. Among the writers of the Western Church, Irenæus has been appealed to as the first witness to the existence of the institution; but Irenæus (I, 21, 5) simply says that the Herakleonites, a Gnostic sect, anointed the dying with a mixture of oil and water to protect them from hostile spirits in the other world. This practice, by no means implies, as Bellarmine and other Catholic theologians affirm, a church sacrament of which it was a perversion. Tertullian and Cyprian, who describe at length the customs of the Western Church, do not mention extreme unction, while they discuss the Lord's Supper and baptism at length.

The use of oil, however, for producing miraculous cures, is noticed by many of the Fathers. Tertullian (Ad Scap. 4) mentions that Proculus healed the Pagan Severus, the father of Antoninus, with oil. Popular superstition took hold of these cures, and went so far, that, as the fourth century, we find the people stealing the lamps from the churches in order to preserve the oil for miraculous cures (Chrysos., Hom. 32, in Matth. vi.). They did the same with the baptismal water. This superstition was the germ of the subsequent sacramental idea of the church. The transition is apparent in a letter of Innocent I. (410) to Bishop Decentius of Eugubium, which expressly calls anointing with oil a kind of sacrament (genus sacramenti). But the application of the oil was not confined to the priesthood: it was the prerogative of all Christians. From the close of the eighth century the rite is mentioned very frequently in the acts of councils. The consecration of the oil is the prerogative of the priest; and the rite, which may be repeatedly administered, is only in extreme cases applied in private dwellings. In all other points its practice and definition agrees with those of the Latin Church. [The late Bishop Forbes of Brechin (d. 1875), in his exposition of the Thirty-Nine Articles, calls "the unction of the sick the lost pleiad of the Anglican firmament."]

THOLUCK.
EZEKIEL

EZEKIEL (God will strengthen, or the strength of God), one of the prophets of the exile. He was the son of Buzi, and a priest (Ezek. i. 3). He lived in his own house (iii. 24, viii. 1), on the River Chebar, near Tel Abib, among the captives whom Nebuchadnezzar had deported with King Joaichim. He was married, as we learn incidentally (xxiv. 18). He prophesied from the fifth to at least the twenty-fifth year of the captivity (591–572 B.C.). The statement of Josephus (Ant. X. 6, 3) that he was only a boy when carried to Babylon, is rendered improbable by the date of the close of his prophetic activity, which we assume to have been the probable date of his death. This would have made him quite young at the time of his death. Although the exiles at times took offence at his prophecies (ii. 6), he was held in high esteem by them (viii. 1, xiv. 1 sqq., xx. 1, etc.). This is the extent of our reliable information concerning Ezekiel's life. Untrustworthy traditions speak of a meeting between him and Pythagoras, of various miracles, and a death by martyrdom. His pretended tomb was shown near Bagdad, where an autographic copy of the prophecies was said to be preserved.

EZEKIEL, Book of, without doubt the work of Ezekiel, is divided into two main divisions; chaps. i.–xxiv. closing with the inception of Nebuchadnezzar's siege of Jerusalem (589 B.C.), and chaps. xxxiii.–xlviii. beginning after the destruction of the city (587 B.C.). The intervening chapters contain denunciations against nations hostile to Israel. Both of the principal divisions are preceded with a reference to the importance and responsibility of Ezekiel's prophetic office (iii. 18 sqq., and xxxiii. 6 sqq.). The first part is characterized by the announcement of judgment against Jerusalem; the second, by the promise of its re-education. The first portrays God's wrath; the second, God's mercy.

The first main division is introduced by a vision of God in all his glory enthrone on the cherubim, in which the prophet receives the prophetic mission to speak against Israel. He inaugurates his activity by a series of vehement predictions of the siege and consequent desolation of Jerusalem (iv.–vi.7). In chap. viii. he has a vision of the city's siege, and prophecy of its fall. He is therefore held to be a master in the description of the grand and sublime; and many passages are examples of the finest lyric and elegiac poetry; as, for example, in the lamentation for the princes of Israel (xiv. 1 sqq.), the description of the fall of Tyre (xxvi. 15–xxvii.), the dirge over Pharaoh, represented under the image of the crocodile (xxxii.), etc. Although he excels as an author, he is not to be regarded as never having spoken his prophecies. His popular eloquence is expressly attested in chap. xxxiii. 30 sqq. And, in the absence of immediate activity, there are many references to symbolical acts with which he used to emphasize his prophetic utterances,—eating and drinking (iv. 9 sqq.), shearing his hair (v. 1 sqq.), stamping his foot (vi. 11), etc. His own person was a type (xxxiv. 24, 27), and the circumstances of his life typical of his nation's destiny (xxiv. 15 sqq.). The prophecies are usually introduced with such formulas as "Thus saith the Lord," and "The word of the Lord was addressed by God and angels by the title "Son of man." These and like peculiarities attest the originality and unity of the composition. In common with Jeremiah, Ezekiel draws upon the earlier prophets, and, in a larger measure than Jeremiah, he shows the influence of the Mosaic legislation (comp. chaps. xiii.-xvi.), and the history of Israel (comp. Gen. ii. 8 with Ezek. xxviii. 13, xxxi. 8 sq., xxxvi. 35, and Gen. i. 28 with Ezek. xxxvi. 11).

The spiritual and theological teachings of the book. The characteristic of Ezekiel is, that though an exile in a foreign land, and living in a period of disintegration, he points to a better time in the future for the theocratic kingdom. With Jeremiah, he predicts the fall of the Jewish State as unavoidable, and pronounces the hopes of the patriots, based upon treaties with Egypt, as altogether illusory. The minuteness and detail of these prophetic references must impress us all the more when we bear in mind the prophet's separation from Jerusalem (see xii. 12 sq., xxi. 23 sqq., xlii. 2, etc.). But Ezekiel restored again in the picture of his visions the old institutions of the temple, and in a pure form. In these descriptions his priestly training shows itself; but he did not, in his concern for the outward form, overlook the ethical and spiritual. In chapters xviii. and xlii. he urges Ezekiel to serve God, and loving our neighbor, and reminds his hearers of their individual and personal responsibility. He insists upon the necessity of a new heart (xi. 19 sq., xxxvi. 25 sqq.). God's glory is the ultimate end of the restoration of Jerusalem (xxxvi. 22), and his aim not to destroy, but to revive, his sinful people (xxxiii. 11). It is the prophet's peculiarity that his eye is directed not so much to the personal representatives as to the kingdom itself, where the glory of God should dwell in the midst of a holy nation of priests, serving him (xlii. 7). The description is given in the last eight chapters, and stands alone in the Old Testament. The vision here recorded of the temple is not of a mere building, although the architectural proportions given are exact. He passes beyond the material edifice to an ideal temple, with the waters of life (xlvii.). In the furniture and services of this temple he presupposes the Mosaic legislation (xlii. 7 sqq.). But it was not his purpose to revise it, or he would have made some reference to the ark of the covenant, the highpriesthood, the day of atonement, etc. As of special significance for the times, he mentions the Sabbath (xx. 12 sqq.), refers to a more joyful celebration of the feasts in the future (xlv. 9 sqq.), insists upon the purification of the temple (xlili. 7, xlv. 9), and bases the new division of the land on the equal rights of the tribes, all of which were to receive portions west of the Jordan.

The book has given difficulty to the Jews, because its statements do not always agree with the ritual of Moses; and this gave rise to some dispute regarding its canonical dignity. But this very fact is a pledge that not the letter of the law, but God's will, which was therein only expressed, was in a way adapted to the time, is eternal. The Christian Church has also found difficulty in distinguishing between that which was merely Jewish in the prophecies, and that which is Messianic. Less clearly than in the other prophets can the distinction be drawn between the spiritual contents and the temporary form; but the book is, nevertheless, a prophecy of the new covenant of grace in the language of the old covenant of the law. The complete consummation of the kingdom of God on earth, however, alone can reveal how far the form in which Ezekiel clothes it was mere shadow, how far an adequate picture of that perfect manifestation. EZRA (telp), priest, scribe (Neh. viii. 1, 2), and reformer of the period succeeding the Babylonian captivity. The book which bears his name, and the latter part of Nehemiah, are the only reliable sources of his life. He was of high priestly descent (Ex. vii. 1). With Artaxerxes' consent he led an expedition to Jerusalem (458 B.C.). He must have been held in esteem at court; for the king intrusted him with authority to appoint magistrates and judges, and with the power of life and death in Jerusalem (vii. 12–20). At the River Ahava (viii. 15) he gathered the members of the expedition together, and ordered a fast and prayer for divine protection. Arriving in Jerusalem, he delivered up the gifts the king had sent to the temple and his commissions to the Persian officials (viii. 30). He was grieved to find that his compatriots had intermarried with women of other nationalities, and succeeded in inducing them to put away their "strange wives." from which Jewish rabbis in succeeding centuries read and interpreted the history and sacred writings of Israel. He was afterwards looked up to with reverence by the scribes as the founder of their order. According to Kuenen and others, Ezra was the author of a large share of the Pentateuch,— the so-called priestly Torah. According to the somewhat modified view of Professor W. R. Smith (The O. T. in the Jewish Church, chap. ix), he at least “gave the last touches to the ritual” of the Pentateuch, which he calls the “Canon of Ezra.” (See Pentateuch.) Tradition, which is rich in details of Ezra’s life, once says that he restored the entire Pentateuch (which had been lost), either from memory, or by special inspiration. In another place it describes him as the president of the great synagogue, and the collector and editor of the canon. The latter is made very probable when we remember the intense interest he had aroused in the law. In this interest a desire to have the writings of the historians and prophets would certainly be begotten.

According to Josephus (Ant., XI. 5, 5), he died and was buried in Jerusalem. According to other writers, he died on a journey to the king of Persia, and was buried in Jerusalem. According to other writers (Ewald, Gerhard, and others), he died on a journey to the king of Persia, and was buried in Jeru-

The authenticity of the history recorded in the Book of Ezra is generally conceded. The facts are such as might be expected, and there is no reference to the miraculous to arouse suspicion. The main questions are the authorship, and the relation of the Book to Nehemiah. The Jewish Church, and the church fathers, regarded Ezra and Nehemiah as a single work. They are followed in this view by many modern scholars (Ewald, Bertheau, Dillmann, Davidson, etc.), who hold, that, with the two Books of Chronicles, they formed parts of one great work. But the LXX. and the Vulgate separate them into two books. This division (defended by Keil, Schultz in Lange’s Commentary, Rawlinson in the Speaker’s Commentary, etc.) has in its favor the opening words of Nehemiah: “The words of Nehemiah,” etc. Their union in the Hebrew canon may be explained by the fact that they are chronicles of one and the same general period of restoration.

The Authorship.— It is not disputed that Ezra wrote chaps. vii. 27–ix. He here speaks in the first person. The preceding portion of the book and chap. x. have been attributed to other authors. The reasons urged are the laudatory reference to Ezra in chap. vii. 6, and the use of the third person instead of the first (vi. 6, 11, x. 1). But examples of such transitions are found both in other portions of Scripture (comp. Is. vii. 1–16 with vii. 1, etc., also Dan. vi. 4 with vii. 2) and in profane writers (e.g., Thucydides, comp. Hist., I. 1 with I. 20–22, etc.); and the notice of vii. 6 is not so laudatory but that a modest man might have written it. The second objection would be equally valid were Ezra only the general editor, which it is generally acknowledged he was. The reasons are not sufficient to overthrow the traditional view, which is defended by Keil (Einleitung), Lange, Rawlinson (Speaker’s Commentary),— that Ezra was the author of the whole work. The text of Ezra is in a bad condition, and many variant readings exist. Portions of the work are in Chaldee (iv. 8–vi. 18, and the decree of Artaxerxes, vii. 12–26). The language bears a close resemblance to that of the Chronicles and Daniel.

FABER, Basilius, b. at Sorau, in Nether-Lusatia, 1520; d. at Erfurt, 1575 or 1576; studied at Wittenberg; was a teacher in Nordhausen, Tenna-stadt, and Magdeburg, and became rector of the school of Quedlinburg in 1560; but, being a strict Lutheran of the Flacian wing, he refused to sign the Corpus Doctrinae Philippicæ as a crypto-Calvinistic innovation, and was discharged in 1570. Next year, however, he was made rector of the gymnasium of Erfurt, where he remained till his death. Besides some writings of pedagogical interest,—Thesaurus eruditionis scholasticæ (1571) and Libellus de disciplinis scholastica (1572),—he translated Luther's commentary on Genesis into Latin (1557), was a contributor to the Magdeburg Centuries (1557–60), and published some eschatological tracts.

FABER, or FABRI, Felix, b. at Zürich, 1441 or 1442; d. at Ulm, March 14 or May 15, 1502; studied theology at Basel; entered the Dominican order in 1472, and was made lector and preacher at the cloister of Ulm in 1478. Twice he visited the Holy Land (1480 and 1483–84); and his principal work is Evagatorium in Terræ Sanctæ, Arabia, et Egypti perceptuæ, edited by Hassler, Stuttgart, 1843–49, 3 vols. He also wrote a Historia Sacerdotalis, edited by Goldast, Francfort, 1605, Ulm, 1727. He was bright, and a good observer, but very credulous, and too fond of curiosities. His Latin is of an exceptionally "canine" description.

FABER, Frederick William, a Catholic theologian, and distinguished hymn-writer, of Huguenot ancestry; b. June 28, 1814, at the vicarage of Calverley, Eng., of which his grandfather, Thomas Faber, was the incumbent; d. Sept. 26, 1863. He studied at Balliol College, Oxford, and became while there an ardent admirer of John Henry Newman. He was made fellow of University College. In 1801 he delivered the Bampton Lecture, which appeared under the title of Horæ Marianæ. In 1803 he left the university; and was vicar at various places, till he was made prebendary of Salisbury Cathedral (1831), and master of Sherburn Hospital (1832). He was a man of varied erudition, and a voluminous author of theological works; among these the principal are, The Origin of Pagan Idolatry, 3 vols. (1810); Difficulties of Romanism (1826), Sacred Calendar of Prophecy, 3 vols. (1826), and Papal Infidelity (1851).

FABER, George Stanley, D.D., an English divine, and uncle of the former; b. Oct. 25, 1773; d. Jan. 27, 1854. He was educated at Oxford, and became fellow and tutor of Lincoln College. In 1801 he delivered the Bampton Lecture, which appeared under the title of Horæ Marianæ. In 1803 he left the university; and was vicar at various places, till he was made prebendary of Salisbury Cathedral (1831), and master of Sherburn Hospital (1832). FABER, Henry (Real Name, Henry Ward), an English author and reviewer; b. at Leutkirch, in Suabia, 1478; d. in Vienna, May 21, 1541; studied theology and canon law at Tübingen and Freiburg-im-Breisgau; and was minister, first of Lindau, then of Leutkirch; vicar-general of the diocese of Constance (1518); chaplain and confessor to King Ferdinand (1524); and Bishop of Vienna (1531). He belonged originally to the humanistic and liberal party, and maintained friendly relations to Erasmus, Zwingli, and Melanchthon. In 1520 he corresponded with Zwingli in a cordial and familiar manner; in 1521 he openly disapproved of Eck and his manoeuvres; but in the same year he made a journey to Rome in order to straighten some difficult money matters, and he returned as one of the busiest and most violent adversaries of the Reformation and the Reformers. He wrote against Luther Opus adversus nova quædam dogmata Lutheri (Malteus in haeresin Lutheranam), and, in defence of celibacy and the papal authority, Pro celibatu and De pontificæ poderi contra Lutherum. He fought on the Roman side in the conferences and disputations; and he was active in burning people in Austria and Hungary (Kaspar Tauber and Balthasar Hubmeier). Of his works there is a collected edition in 3 vols. fol., Cologne, 1537–41, and a minor collection containing only his polemical writings, Leipzig, 1537. See C. E. KETTNER: De J. Fabri vita scriptisque, Leipzig, 1737. — II. Johannes Faber Augustanus, d. about 1530; was b. at Freiburg, in the latter half of the fifteenth century; entered the Dominican order, and was made prior of the monastery of Augsburg in 1513, professor of theology at Bologna in 1516, confessor to the Emperor Maximilian I., and afterwards court-preacher to Charles V. He was a friend of Erasmus, and in favor of lenient proceedings against Luther; but he afterwards changed his mind, and became a harsh adversary of the Reformation. His funeral-oration on Maximilian I. (Jan. 16, 1519) is the only work he has left. — III. Johannes Faber of Heilbronn was b. at Heilbronn, on the Neckar, 1504; studied theology and philosophy at Cologne; entered the Dominican order, and was made preacher at the cathedral of Augsburg, 1530. The date of his death is unknown. He was a bitter adversary of the Reformation, and wrote Quod fides esse possint sine caritate (1548), Enchinidion biblicorum (1549), Fructus quibus dignoscuntur haeretici (1551), etc. WAGENMANN.

FABER, or FAVRE, Pierre François, b. at St. Barthélemy, in the canton of Vaud; was minister of Laudun, in Lower Languedoc, accompanied by Francis de la Baune, Bishop of Halicarnassus, on his tour of visitation to Cochin-China, as his secretary and confessor; and published in 1746 his Lettres édifiantes et curieuses sur la visite apostolique que M. de la Baume a la Cochinchine en 1740, which gives a report of the abominable manner in which the Jesuits pushed the mission in those regions, and the infamous intrigues with which they tried to cover up their misdemeanors. The book was condemned by the Bishop of Lausanne, and publicly burnt at Freiburg; and the Jesuits bought up every copy they could reach. Large extracts of the work are found in SIMLER, Urkunden zur Beleuchtung der Kirchengeschichte, I., pp. 159–256.

FABER STAPULENSIS, Jacobus (Jacques Le faitre d'Etaples), b. at Etaples, a village in Picardy, 1450; d. at Nérac, 1536; studied in Paris; visited Florence, Rome, and Venice; and began, after his return to Paris, to lecture on Aristotle, and to publish Latin translations, and paraphrases of the Aristotelian writings. From 1507 to 1520 he was abbot; and while here he began to study further proceedings against him, but was prevented that one-fourth of the whole revenue of a church should be put aside for this purpose, and afterwards the matter became the subject of a very varied and intricate, but wholly local, legislation. Thus, in the grand duchy of Baden, it is the rule that the nave and roof are kept in repair by the treasurer of the church, the choir by the minister, the walls and outer buildings by him who enjoys the tenths, and the tower by the parish.

FABRICATION, Johann, b. at Altorf, Feb. 11, 1644; d. at Helmstädt, Jan. 29, 1729; studied at Altorf and Helmstädt; travelled in Germany and Italy, 1670–77; and was appointed professor of theology at Altorf, 1677, and at Helmstädt, 1697. His principal work, besides his Amaenitates Theologica (1699) and Historia Bibliothecae Fabricianae (4 vols. 4to, 1717–24), is his Consideratio variarum controversiarum (1704), in which he pursued the irreligious principles of Calixtus, but carried them unto weakness. In the same year a Gutenchoder was recalled, and made librarian in the royal castle of Blois; but even there he was not safe; and, after publishing his translation of the Old Testament, he retired to Nérac, the residence of Marguerite of Navarre, where he died. He had, indeed, espoused all the chief principles of the Reformation, and he applied them with vigor in his writings; but he remained in the Roman Church, hoping that a reformation could take place without any violent concussion. For open fight with hostile powers he was completely unfit. He was not unlike Melanchthon, but he had no Luther by his side.

FABRICE EECLESII, a technical term referring to the provision made for the maintenance of the fabric of the church,—its buildings, furniture, utensils, etc. In the latter part of the fifth century, Simplicius, and after him Gelasius, ordered that one-fourth of the whole revenue of a church should be put aside for this purpose, and afterwards the matter became the subject of a very varied and intricate, but wholly local, legislation. Thus, in the grand duchy of Baden, it is the rule that the nave and roof are kept in repair by the treasurer of the church, the choir by the minister, the walls and outer buildings by him who enjoys the tenths, and the tower by the parish.

FABRÍCIUS, Johannes Albert, b. at Leipzig, Nov. 11, 1668; d. at Hamburg, April 3, 1736; studied theology at Quedlinburg, and was made professor of philosophy and rhetoric at Wolfenbüttel, 1845.

FABIAN, the nineteenth bishop of Rome (236–250), was, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., VI. 29), scandalously killed at the election after the death of Anteros, and was unanimously chosen, because a dove came down from heaven and rested on his head. Of his reign nothing is known with certainty. In Cyprian's Letters to his successor, Cornelius, he is often mentioned with respect.

FABER STAPULENSIS, Jacobus (Jacques Le faitre d'Etaples), b. at Etaples, a village in Picardy, 1450; d. at Nérac, 1536; studied in Paris; visited Florence, Rome, and Venice; and began, after his return to Paris, to lecture on Aristotle, and to publish Latin translations, and paraphrases of the Aristotelian writings. From 1507 to 1520 he lived in the Benedictine abbey of St. Germain des Prés, near Paris, where his friend Briçonnet was abbot; and while here he began to study the Bible. The first result of this study was his Psalterium quintuplex, 1508; then followed, in 1512, his commentary on the Pauline Epistles, in 1522, on the Gospels, and in 1525, on the Catholic Epistles. A critical edition of the Latin Vulgate (De Math. et Morb. Lat. canonica) which he published in 1517 gave the authorities occasion for an accusation of heresy; and Noël Bédier, syndic of the theological faculty of Paris, had the book formally condemned by a decree of Parliament, Nov. 9, 1521. Bédier, who suspected a secret Lutheran in Faber, wanted to institute further proceedings against him, but was prevented by the interference of Francis I. and Marguerite of Navarre in his behalf. In 1523 Faber fled to Strassburg. After the release of Francis I., he was the transference of a certain power of ecclesiastical jurisdiction from the original holder to a subordinate officer for the purpose of speedier execution of the canons of the Council of Trent, and of giving strength and energy to the Roman Catholic mission in Protestant Germany. As, under these circumstances, conflicts would now and then arise between the papal nuncios and the bishops, the latter generally received the same faculties, though only for a certain length of time; as, for instance, five years (facultates quinquennales). Bishops may also grant faculties, transferring to their vicars-general, officials, deacons, or priests, some measure either of their own authority (auctoritas ordinaria or propria), or of that granted to them by the Pope (auctoritas apostolica). See Papal Nuncios.

The word is used in England in the sense of a special dispensation to do what by law could not be done or the death of the clergyman's son, etc. In this case the court are also registered the certificates of bishops and noblemen granted to their chaplains to qualify them for pluralities and non-residence.

Facundus, Bishop of Hermiane, in the North-African province of Byzacena, was one of the bishops whom Justinian, in 544, summoned to Constantinople in order to get the Three Chapters condemned, and an agreement established with the Western Church. The emperor failed in his purpose. Facundus wrote his twelve books (Praelectiones), in which he opposed, when the African bishop broke off communion with the Roman bishop Vigilius, he wrote Contra Mosia num schola tici um in defence of their action. Of his later life nothing is known. His work, which was first edited by Sirmond, then in Gallandi (Bibl. Max., XII. 1–124) and Migne (Patrol. Lat., LXVII. 762), has more interest from an ecclesiastico-political than from a dogmatic point of view. He wrote not so much in order to justify Theodore and Theodoret, as in order to restrain the emperor from interfering in the affairs of the Church.

FAQUIUS, Paul (Büchlin), b. at Rheinazbern, in the Palatinate, 1594; d. at Cambridge, Nov. 13, 1549; studied at Heidelberg and Strassburg, especially Hebrew, under W. Capito, and afterwards under the celebrated Elias Levita; and was appointed rector of the school at Isny in 1537, and professor of theology, and preacher in Strassburg, 1543. But, when the Interim was introduced in Strassburg, he emigrated to England, where he was well received, and made professor in Hebrew at Cambridge in 1549. Most of his writings (Sententiae apicantis Planebrarum, 1541; Annotationes in Targum, 1546; Isagoge in linguam Hebraicam, 1544, etc.) refer to his Hebrew studies; and as a teacher of Hebrew he exercised considerable influence in the university, and his books, especially the Typology, are useful. In person he was of commanding figure. His principal works, which are published in Edinburgh, are, The Typology of Scripture, 1847, 2 vols., 6th ed., 1880; Ezekiel and his Book of Prophecy, 1851, 4th ed., 1878; Prophecy viewed in its Distinctive Nature, its Special Functions, and its Proper Interpretation, 1856, 2d ed., 1896; Hermeneutical Manual, 1858; Revelation of Law in Scripture, 1868; The Pastoral Epistles, 1874; Pastoral Theology, with a Biographical Sketch of the Author, 1876. He also edited The Imperial Bible Dictionary, London, 1867, 2 vols. royal 8vo, and translated, in part, Schroeder's Commentary upon Ezekiel, in the American edition by Lange, N.Y., 1876.

Principal Fairbairn was one of the founders of the Free Church Theological College at Glasgow. Principal Fairbairn was one of the founders of the Free Church. He emigrated to England, where he was educated at King's College, Aberdeen, and after many years' pastoral experience was professor at Aberdeen, and, from 1856 to his death, principal, and professor of systematic theology and New Testament exegesis, in the Free Church Theological College at Glasgow. His principal works, which are published in Edinburgh, are, The Typology of Scripture, 1847, 2 vols., 6th ed., 1880; Ezekiel and his Book of Prophecy, 1851, 4th ed., 1878; Prophecy viewed in its Distinctive Nature, its Special Functions, and its Proper Interpretation, 1856, 2d ed., 1896; Hermeneutical Manual, 1858; Revelation of Law in Scripture, 1868; The Pastoral Epistles, 1874; Pastoral Theology, with a Biographical Sketch of the Author, 1876. FAITH (Faith). All personal relations in human life rest on faith. I can respect no one, unless I believe him possessed of some affinity to me, — naturally in the blood, or spiritually in the mind. In human life, faith is the connecting link between man and man. Thereby it becomes the latent source from which all individual development springs, mental and spiritual. Man was made for faith, and it is faith that makes the man. He who has lost his power of faith, his faculty of belief, is dead. But in no relation is this more true than in man's relation to God.

With respect to its form, faith is not a simple opinion formed by the intellect, and differing from cognition only by the subjective character of its evidences. The Church distinguishes between a fides historiae ("historical faith") and a fides salutis ("saving faith"). The latter is a movement of the heart, of all the fundamental powers of the soul, of the very roots of the personality; and hence it is propagated to all the branches: it involves knowledge, it stirs up the feelings, it acts upon the will. Knowledge, assent, and trust are all demanded in faith according to the doctrine of the Evangelical Church. None of them can be entirely missing; but their measure may be very different, according to the different standpoint of the individual.

The object of faith cannot be seen by the eyes, nor can it be grasped by the understanding; it belongs to the realm of the invisible, the spiritual, the divine (Heb. xi. 1, 6; 1 Pet. i. 8; 2 Cor. v. 16; John xx. 29). But this invisible, spiritual, divine, is not something unknowable: it proves itself to the inner man. The absolute object of faith is the revelation of God to mankind, originating in his love, and making his holiness manifest; and the centre of this revelation, the true fulfilment in relation to which all preceding preparations are only accommodations to the susceptibility of the race (Luke xxiv. 25, 26; Heb. i.), is the incarnation of God in Christ. Faith, in the absolute sense of the word, is therefore a personal and spiritual union with Christ, through which we become one with him, as he is one with the Father.

This union with Christ man cannot accomplish by his own efforts: God himself must awaken the new life in his soul (John vi. 29; 1 Cor. ii. 5). It is the Holy Spirit who works the faith in the heart; and the means by which he does this is the preaching of the word of God, the preaching of the grace of Christ (Rom. x. 17; 1 Cor. i. 21). But the soul can prepare itself for the coming of the new life by abandoning all confidence in itself and in the world, and by breaking all the selfish instincts under which it labors; and when, by repentance, it has made itself a fit receptacle for the work of the Holy Spirit, that movement of the heart will follow which is the faith,—the faith by which sins are forgiven (Acts xxvi. 18), and man is made just before God (Rom. iii. 26; v. 1; Gal. iii. 21).

The Roman-Catholic Church, proceeding from James, teaches that justification is by faith and works. But though it defines faith as meaning belief, not simply as an opinion, but as a conviction that "those things are true which God has revealed and promised, and this especially, that God justifies the impious by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (Conc. Trid., sess. VI. c. 6), it nevertheless confines faith to the consent of the heart; and only expects an influence from thence upon the feelings and the will. In its further development in the Roman-Catholic Church, this doctrine led to a direct deterioration of the idea of faith. From a living agency in the human soul, faith became a merely passive obedience to the authority of the Church; and such an emphasis was laid upon the merits of works, that morality itself was corrupted. This aberration has been happily corrected by the Reformed churches. Proceeding from Paul, they teach that justification is by faith alone; but faith they define, not as a merely intellectual process of acceptance, but as the true, vitalizing point of the whole life of the soul.

FAITH, Rule of. See Regina Fidei.

FAKIR (Arabic poor man), a class of Hindoo religious mendicants, numbering now perhaps two millions, and found in India from very early times. They are noted for their self-inflicted tortures, by which they excite pity, and obtain the reputation of "saints," so that, although the people have little respect for them, they dread their curses, and the very rayat will rise up on his elephant to salute them. The British Government has greatly curtailed their liberty to injure themselves, and forbidden their going around perfectly nude. It is questioned whether there is any religious sentiment in their performances. According to the oft-quoted summary of Hassan al-Basari, a fakir is like a dog in ten things: (1) he is always hungry; (2) he has no sure abiding-place; (3) he watches by night; (4) he never abandons his master, even when maltreated; (5) he is satisfied with the lowest place; (6) he yields his place to whoever wishes it; (7) he loves whoever beats him; (8) keeps quiet while others eat; (9) accompanies his master without ever thinking of returning to the place he has left; (10) and leaves no heritage after death. Fakirs go either singly or in companies. They were formerly a dangerous element in Hindoo life, for their fanaticism nerved them for deeds of great cruelty.

FALASHAS (exiles), a people in Abyssinia, who are either Jews, or, according to some, the descendants of proselytes to Judaism, and whose belief and practice is a mixture of Judaism and Paganism. There is no authentic information when they came into the country. They pretend to belong to the tribe of Levi, but their appearance is not Jewish. That they were early converted to Judaism is manifest from their ignorance of both the Babylonian and Jerusalem Talmud, of the fringed praying-scarf (taleth), of phylacteries, and of the Feasts of Purim and Dedication. They are also entirely ignorant of Hebrew; yet they possess in Geex the canonical and apocryphal books of the Old Testament; a volume of extracts from the Pentateuch, with comments given to Moses by the Lord, upon Mount Sinai; The Laws of the Sabbath; the Ardit, a book of secrets to Moses the Lawgiver; the Ingathering, Tabernacles (although they do not build booths), the Day of Assembly, and Abraham's Day. But joined to these Jewish rites are Pagan ones, such as the shedding of the blood of a sheep or a fowl in a new house in order to render it inhabitable, the use of fire in purification of uncleanliness, and the worship of the goddess Samat, really the Sabbath personified. Monasticism exists among them; but the priests are free to marry once; if their wives die, they are prohibited, like the Greek priest, from a second union. Education, which is imparted only to boys, is in the priests' hands. No one can be a priest, who himself, or whose father or grandfather, has eaten bread with a Christian. The Falashas are superstitious, and believers in magic. They offer sacrifices for the dead on the third day, up to which time they believe these souls dwell in a place of darkness; but every morning for seven days they formally lament them. Prayers for the dead are offered in the synagogues.

The Falashas are industrious and peaceable, dwell in villages of their own, for the most part, which it is said can be easily recognized by the red clay pots on the tops of their synagogues. Their exact number is unknown,—perhaps about a hundred and fifty thousand. See Flad: Falashas of Abyssinia (trans. from the German), London, 1859; J. Halevy: Travels in Abyssinia (trans. from the French), London, 1878.

FALK LAWS. The (also called the "May Laws"), is the name generally applied to a series of laws carried through the Prussian diet, in the period between 1872 and 1875, by Dr. Falk, at that time Minister of Cultus and Public Instruction and Sanitary Affairs in Prussia. In March, 1872, the first of these laws was passed, transferring the superintendence of the primary schools from the Church to the State, by ordering that the school-inspector should be a layman. In June followed a ministerial order, prohibiting the members of religious orders to teach in the schools, and thereby still further limiting the influence of the Roman-Catholic clergy on the school. Next, the laws of November, 1872, and March, 1873, materially narrowed the bishop's power over the inferior clergy, and the clergy's power over the laity, whereby the whole ecclesiastical system of the country was changed, and at the same time a royal ecclesiastical court was established, enabling the government to deal in an effective manner with refractory bishops. A law of March, 1874, made civil marriage obligatory; and another, of April, 1875; required the bishop and clergy to sign a declaration of obedience to the laws of the State, before entering upon office. At the same time laws were passed forbidding the religious orders living within the borders of the Prussian dominion to receive new members, and transferring the control of the church property of a parish to a board of trustees of laymen.

In the so-called Kulturkampf those laws played a most prominent part; that is, in the contest between the feeling of national independence so deeply rooted in Germany by the Franco-Prussian war, and the ambitious aspirations of the Roman curia, so strongly pronounced by the council of the Vatican and the promulgation of the dogma of papal infallibility. They originated, as simple acts of self-defence, from the side of the State; and it was repeatedly declared, both by Dr. Falk and Prince Bismarck, that, within the State, every confession (church) should have freedom to move and develop, but none the opportunity of being with ordered by the State, or using the secular power for particular denominational purposes, or of eluding its civil duties, under pretence of some religious precept. "We will never go to Canossa" (Nach Canossa gehen wir nicht) said the chancellor, May 14, 1872. The Ultramontane party, however, among the Roman-Catholic clergy in Germany, was very far from viewing the Falk Laws as merely defensive measures. On the contrary, it considered them as evidences and means of an intolerable tyranny; and encouraged by the Pope, whose encyclical of 1874 declared the laws null and void, the party adopted a policy of bitter and unflinching opposition. Several bishops were banished from their sees; and other sees, which became vacant by death, remained vacant. A turn, however, took place in the course of affairs when Pius IX. died, in 1878. Prince Bismarck had observed more than once during the contest, that, as the so-called "peaceable pope" in Rome; and, indeed, immediately after the accession of Leo XIII., negotiations concerning a modus vivendi between Germany and the Pope were begun, and seem, on account of reciprocal concessions, likely to succeed.

FALL OF MAN. See SIN.

FAMILIAR SPIRITS (from the Latin familiares, "a household servant") were the spirits supposed to be at the service of the necromancers, by which they divined, and wrought their spells (Lev. xx. 27; Deut. xvii. 11; 1 Sam. xxviii. 7, 8, and many other places).

FAMILIARES is the name of certain lay members of monasteries, such as servants, mechanics, etc., generally admitted as members of the community through certain religious rites. As in the middle ages the old-established ceremonial through which worldly tendencies were introduced into the monasteries, several popes insisted upon their complete separation from the monks and the monastic community.

FAMILIARS OF THE INQUISITION, the officers who arrested suspected persons. Their name came from the circumstance that they formed part of the inquisitor's family. They were often men of rank; and peculiar spiritual privileges, such as indulgences, were attached to the position.

FAMILISTS, Familia Charitatis, Huis de Liefde, a sect founded by a certain Henry Nicholas, a native of Münster, who, after living for some time in Holland, came to England under the reign of Edward VI. His efforts to make proselytes seem at first to have succeeded quite well: even theologians were found willing to listen to his ideas. But in 1580 Elizabeth ordered an investigation, and after that time very severe measures were taken against the sect, which disappeared during the reign of James I. The ideas of Henry Nicholas are often identified with those of David Joris, with whom he lived in close personal connection, as his followers were often confounded with the Anabaptists, though they acknowledged the baptism of infants, and showed no antagonism to the Anabaptists, though they acknowledged the baptism of the sect as its mysticism, which gave rise to very peculiar doctrines of Moses as the prophet of faith, Christ as the prophet of faith, and Henry Nicholas as the prophet of love, etc. In 1575 they published a confession of faith, in which they endeavored to prove themselves in harmony with the Reformed Churches. See John Rogers: The Displaying of a horrible Sect naming themselves the Family of Love, London, 1579; and Kneusche: Confutation of the heresies of Henry Nicholas, London, 1579.

FANATICISM (from Latin fanum, "temple"). The term "fanatici" was originally applied to all priests who pretended to receive divine revelations, and announced oracles, but more especially to the priests of Cybele and Bellana, who were noted for their wild enthusiasm. In the writings to the priests of Cybele and Bellana, who were noted for their wild enthusiasm. In the writings of the satirists, Horace, Juvenal, etc., the word gradually changed its sense, and came to imply something of a fraudulent inspiration, consisting of hollow excitement and empty visions. In this sense it was still used in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, when enthusiasm for an idea has been transformed into mere hatred of its opposite.

Farel, Guillaume, b. at Gap, in Dauphiny, 1489; d. at Neuchâtel, Sept. 13, 1565; studied in Paris, and was appointed professor in the college of Cardinal le Moine on the recommendation of Lefèvre d'Étalges (Faber Stapelensis). His reformatory activity he began in the diocese of Meaux, under the auspices of Guillaume Briconnet; but in 1523 he was compelled to fly by the beginning persecutions. He went to Basel, where he was cordially received by Calvin; but his disputations, lectures, and preachings in that city, came to a sudden end in 1524: he was exiled, probably, on the instance of Erasmus. After a short stay in Strassburg and Mömpelgardt, he returned to Switzerland in 1525, and began to preach the Reformation in various places belonging under the authority of Berne,—Aigle, Morat, Grandson, Biel, etc.,— often with danger of life, but generally, also, with eminent success. After a visit to the Waldenses, he came in 1529 to Geneva; and the first establishment of the Reformation in that city is his work. In spite of a bitter and protracted opposition, the religious edict of Aug. 27, 1535, was issued; and it was followed by the confession of Geneva (written by Farel and Calvin) and the settlement of Calvin in the city. By the victory of a short-lived re-action both Farel and Calvin were expelled in 1538. Farel went to Neuchâtel, and thence to Metz; and in the latter city, as well as in the neighboring Gorze, he labored with great success for the establishment of the Reformation. But at Gorze the Evangelicals were surrounded in 1543 by the troops of the Cardinal of Lorraine; and a great number of them were massacred. Farel fled in disguise, visited Mompéldardt and his native town, Gap, and continued to labor for the Reformation, preaching and writing to the very day of his death. As a theologian he does not occupy a place in the foremost rank; but practically he was one of the boldest men who was one of the boldest men of the French reformers. Among his most noticeable works are: Sommaire, 1534, new edition, with an introduction by I. G. Baum, Geneva, 1867; Du vrai usage de la croix de Jésus Christ, 1540, new edition in Librairie de la Suisse romande, Paris, 1866; Traité de purgatoire, 1543; La glaire de la parole véritable, 1550; Traité de la Cène, 1555, etc. There is no collected edition of his works.

Lit. — His biography was first written anonymously (probably by Olivier Perrot; compare Haller, Biblioth. d. Schweizergesch., III. No. 781), then by Ancillon, Amsterdam, 1691 (French); Kirchhoffer, Zürich, 2 vols., 1831–33 (German); Schmidt, Elberfeld, 1860 (German); Juxon, Paris, 1865 (French); and Goguel, Neuchâtel, 1873 (French). Farfa, one of the most famous monasteries of Italy; situated on the Tiber in Central Italy; was twice destroyed,—in the seventh century by the Lombards, and in the tenth by the Saracens,—but both times rebuilt. Shortly after its second rebuilding it became very notorious on account of the licentiousness and dissipation of its monks. In the eleventh century, however, order was thoroughly re-established, and to that time belongs the celebrated Chronicon Farfense, by the Abbé Gregory (d. 1100), edited by Muratori: Script. Ital., T. II. p. ii.

Farindon, Anthony, b. at Sunning, Berkshire, 1596; d. in London, September, 1658. He was educated at Oxford; suffered much as a royalist during the civil war, until he came under the patronage of Sir John Robinson, an alderman of London, who secured for him the pastorate of St. Mary Magdalen's, London, in which position he died. Competent judges have pronounced him the best preacher in the Church of England of that age. He was the recognized preacher for preachers, and gave solid and edifying discourses. His Sermons appeared in 4 folio volumes, 1657–79; new ed., with Life, by F. Jackson, London, 1849, 4 vols.

Farmer, Hugh, a learned and able Dissenting minister; b. near Shrewsbury, Eng., 1714; d. at Walthamstow, in Essex, Feb. 6, 1787. He was pastor of Walthamstow for forty years. In 1701 he removed to London, to become afternoon preacher at Salter's Hall, and one of the Tuesday lecturers. His principal publications, which evince his independence and scholarship, and are still read, are: An Inquiry into the Nature and Design of Christ's Temptation in the Wilderness, Lond., 1701, 3d ed., 1776, new ed., 1822 (in which he contends that our Lord's temptation in the wilderness was subjective, a divine vision, and not real and objective); A Dissertation on Miracles, designed to show that they are Arguments of a Divine Interposition, and Absolute Proofs of the Mission and Doctrine of a Prophet, 1771, new ed., 1810; An Essay on the Demoniacs of the New Testament, 1775, 3d ed., 1818 (these were, he maintained, merely persons strongly affected by certain diseases. This work is a classic with those who hold this view); The General Prevalence of the Worship of Human Spirits in the Ancient and Heathen Nations asserted and proved, 1783. See Dobson, Memoirs of the FASTING, in the Christian Church. Fasting appears as an established practice in the primitive church (Acts xii. 2, xiv. xxxiv. 28), and to the circumstances of our Lord lying forty hours in the grave. Originally this fast lasted only forty hours, but it was gradually extended. In the fourth century it lasted three weeks in Rome, but six in Illyria, Achaia, Alexandria, etc.; and this latter term was finally adopted also by Rome. As, however, there was no fasting on Sundays, the six-weeks' fast comprised only thirty-six fast-days; and, in order to reach the symbolical number of forty, it became customary to begin the fast on the Wednesday (Ash-Wednesday) of the preceding week. An attempt was also made to introduce a quadragesimal fast before Christmas and the day of John the Baptist; but the practice never became firmly established. See H. Lienke, Die Quadragesimalfasten der Kirche, Munich, 1853.

Fasting on certain days of the week is also an old custom of the Roman Church. The Pharisees fasted twice a week,—on Thursday and Monday,—in commemoration of Moses ascending Mount Sinai, and again descending from it. The Christians adopted this practice, only the days and their signification were changed. Wednesday and Friday (see Ember-Days) were selected as the days on which our Lord was betrayed and crucified. These days were called dies stationum, the life of a Christian being compared to that of a soldier (Tertullian, De oratione, XIV.). Wednesday, however, was afterwards dropped as a fast-day. The custom, prevalent among the Jews after the exile, of keeping a fast-day respectively in the fourth, fifth, seventh, and tenth months, in commemoration of the conquest of Jerusalem, the destruction of the temple, the murder of Gedaliah, and the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem, was also adopted by the Christians; but, in this case too, both the days and their designation were changed. The days were put down as days of general fasting and praying, and arranged so that the year thereby became divided into four seasons (quaestor temporae); hence the name of Quatember-fast. (See Ember-Days.) In former times these days were also days for the collection of taxes, and hence called angaria ("servitude"). The vigilia (which see) are also fast-days; and, besides these the ordinary fast-days, the Roman Church also appoints extraordinary fast-days on special occasions.

FASTIDIUS, a Christian writer of the fifth century, and one of the few literary representatives of the ancient Briton Church. What we know of his life we owe to a few critically uncertain notices in Gennadius (Catac. ev. iii., 56), which have given rise to many untenable and self-contradictory speculations. The only certain facts are, that he was a Briton by birth, and lived about 420. His book De vita Christiana was originally printed anonymously among the works of Augustine, until Holstenius discovered the true author, and published the work separately, 1605. On other days, mourning is worn: hence they are called "fasts," in distinction from the art. Fasten, in Riehm's Handwörterbuch des bibl. Alterthums, Hamburger's Real-Encyklopädie für Bibli u. FASTING.
II. The Greek Church has on this field developed different practices in its different sections; but one characteristic mark is common to them all,—strictness in keeping the rules. The principal fasts are: 1. A quadragesimal fast before Easter, based on Matt. iv. 2; 2. A quadragesimal fast before Christmas (Oct. 15 to Dec. 24), based on Exod. xxxiv. 28; 3. The Fast of Mary (from Aug. 1 to Aug. 15); 4. The Fast of the Apostles (from the day after Whitsuntide to June 29). The old dies stationum (both Wednesday and Friday) are still retained, except between Christmas and the Epiphany, during the third week after the Epiphany (in opposition to the Armenians), and in the weeks following Easter and Whitsuntide.

III. The Reformed Churches. — The reformers were by no means averse to fasts; but they returned to the original conception of them, as a means of self-discipline and a preparation in prayer. They rejected all compulsory regulations of the practice, and wholly discarded the idea of direct moral meritoriousness. To this purport Luther expresses himself in his commentary to Matt. vi. 16; and so does Calvin in his Institutiones, IV. 12, 14. Therefore let us say something of fasting, because many, for want of knowing its usefulness, undervalue its necessity, and some reject it as almost superfluous; while, on the other hand, where the use of it is not well understood, it easily degenerates into superstition. Holy and legitimate fasting is directed to three ends; for we practise it either as a restraint on the flesh, to preserve it from licentiousness, or as a preparation for prayers and pious meditations, or as a testimony of our humiliation in the presence of God when we are desirous of confessing our guilt before him." Accordingly we find ideas of this or a very similar character incorporated with all the confessional books of the Reformed Churches (Confessio Augustana, XXVI.; Conf. Helvetica Secund., XXIV.; Conf. Bohem., XVIII.; Conf. Gall., XXIV.; Westminster Confession, XXI. 5), and carried out practically in Switzerland, England, the United States, etc. [During the civil war (1861-65), the President appointed days of national fasting, which were generally observed irrespective of denominations.]

FAUSTUS REJENSI S, or REGENSI S, also called Faustus the Breton, or of Riez, an ecclesiastical writer of the fifth century, and one of the most important literary representatives of the so-called Semi-Pelagianism; was b. in Britain, or Brittany, towards the close of the fourth, or in the beginning of the fifth, century; entered the monastery of Lerins as a monk; became its abbot in 434, and succeeded Maximus in 462 as Bishop of Reji or Regium, the present Riez, in Provence. In 481 he was expelled from his see by Eurich, king of the West Goths; but he returned in 484, and staid at Reji till his death, in 491. He wrote letters and tracts against the Arians and Macedonians (Responsio ad objecta quaedam de ratione fidei catholicae), against the Nestorians and Monophysites (Ad Graatum), on various dogmatical and ethical questions, especially on the nature of the soul, whose corporeality he asserted. He also wrote homilies and sermons, of which especially the Six Sermones ad Monachos are celebrated; but his principal work is the De gratia Dei et humanae mentis libero arbitrio libri II. In 484 he wrote a disputation on the coarse-grained exposition of Augustine's ideas of grace and predestination. Faustus answered, first in a Epistola ad Lucidum, and then in the above-mentioned work. In this book he refutes Pelagius, whom he calls pestiferus; but he also rejects Augustine, though he calls him guidam sanctorum. He attempts to take up an intermediate position, and he does it with great adroitness and no small acumen. The book proved a great success in Gallia; but in Constantinople and North Africa it met with bitter opposition, and Hormisdas afterwards declared that its author does not belong among those whom the church calls its fathers. A collected edition of Faustus' works does not exist; but most of them may be found in Bibl. Patr. Magna, T. V. Pars III. 500; Bibl. Lugd., VIII.; Migne: Patrol. Lat., LVIII., etc.

FAUSTUS THE MANICHÆAN was an African by birth, a native of Milevis; settled in 383 in Carthage, but was in 386 banished by Missionius. He was the chief of the Manichæans of Africa, and wrote a work against Christianity; but he, as well as his book, is known to us only through Augustine, who at one time wanted his instruction (Confessiones, V. 3, 6, 7, etc.), and afterwards wrote against him, Contra Faustum.

FAUSTUS REJENSI S

or REGENSI S, also called Faustus the Breton, or of Riez, an ecclesiastical writer of the fifth century, and one of the most important literary representatives of the so-called Semi-Pelagianism; was b. in Britain, or Brittany, towards the close of the fourth, or in the beginning of the fifth, century; entered the monastery of Lerins as a monk; became its abbot in 434, and succeeded Maximus in 462 as Bishop of Reji or Regium, the present Riez, in Provence. In 481 he was expelled from his see by Eurich, king of the West Goths; but he returned in 484, and staid at Reji till his death, in 491. He wrote letters and tracts against the Arians and Macedonians (Responsio ad objecta quaedam de ratione fidei catholicae), against the Nestorians and Monophysites (Ad Graatum), on various dogmatical and ethical questions, especially on the nature of the soul, whose corporeality he asserted. He also wrote homilies and sermons, of which especially the Six Sermones ad Monachos are celebrated; but his principal work is the De gratia Dei et humanae mentis libero arbitrio libri II. In 484 he wrote a disputation on the coarse-grained exposition of Augustine's ideas of grace and predestination. Faustus answered, first in a Epistola ad Lucidum, and then in the above-mentioned work. In this book he refutes Pelagius, whom he calls pestiferus; but he also rejects Augustine, though he calls him guidam sanctorum. He attempts to take up an intermediate position, and he does it with great adroitness and no small acumen. The book proved a great success in Gallia; but in Constantinople and North Africa it met with bitter opposition, and Hormisdas afterwards declared that its author does not belong among those whom the church calls its fathers. A collected edition of Faustus' works does not exist; but most of them may be found in Bibl. Patr. Magna, T. V. Pars III. 500; Bibl. Lugd., VIII.; Migne: Patrol. Lat., LVIII., etc.

FAUSTUS THE MANICHÆAN was an African by birth, a native of Milevis; settled in 383 in Carthage, but was in 386 banished by Missionius. He was the chief of the Manichæans of Africa, and wrote a work against Christianity; but he, as well as his book, is known to us only through Augustine, who at one time wanted his instruction (Confessiones, V. 3, 6, 7, etc.), and afterwards wrote against him, Contra Faustum.

FELICISSIMUS was appointed deacon in the Church of Carthage by the presbyter Novatus, without the assent of Cyprian, and belonged to that party which represented the aristocratical and presbyterial system of government in opposition to the monarchical and episcopal system, represented by Cyprian. Cyprian protested against the appointment, but did not depose Felicissimus; and when, shortly after, the Decian persecution broke out, he fled from the city, and left his see. During his absence the presbyters undertook to re-admit the lapsi into the church by virtue of the libellos pacis, which they procured from the martyrs. This, too, Cyprian considered as an encroachment upon his authority; and he sent an episcopal committee to the city. Felicissimus, however, supported by five presbyters, declared that he would admit none into the community of his church who appeared before the episcopal committee; and, when Cyprian returned (Kaster, 251), he was formally excommunicated by the party of Felicissimus, which chose a certain Felicissimus called the Regula. Felicissimus himself repaired to Rome, to gain over to his side the Roman Bishop Cornelius; but, the Novatian controversy having at this time broken out both in Rome and Carthage, Cornelius and Cyprian were naturally allies, and Felicissimus' mission failed; after which nothing more is heard of him and his party.

KLAEGER.

FELICITAS is the name of two saints of the Roman-Catholic Church: one, a distinguished Roman lady, a widow, who, together with her seven sons, was martyred in Rome under Marcus Aurelius, and is commemorated on July 10; and another, a servant-girl, who was martyred under Septimius Severus, in Carthage, together with Perpetua, and is commemorated on March 7. See Act. Sanct. on the respective dates.

The facts which the Acts give—that Felix at the time of Paul's imprisonment (58 or 59) had been “of many years a judge unto this nation” (xxiv. 10); that he had married a Jewess, Drusilla (xxiv. 21); and that, after the lapse of two years, he was succeeded by Porcius Festus (xxiv. 27)—are confirmed by the other sources, without being affected by their differences. Thus when Josephus calls Drusilla a sister of Agrippa II., while Tacitus calls her a grand-daughter of Anthoy and Cleopatra; or when Josephus tells us that Felix was not sent to Judea as procurator until after the deposition of Ventidius Cumanus (52 or 53) by Claudius, and at the instance of the high priest Jonathan, at that time present in Rome, while Tacitus says that he was for many years procurator of a part of the province Sama-ria, still by the deposition of Cumanus he was appointed procurator of the whole province by the Syrian prefect, Quadratus,—these differences have no effect on the report of the Acts. Among the additional facts derived from extraneous sources may be mentioned: that Felix was a brother of Pallas, the imperial favorite, and, like him a freedman; that Festus died in Judea, holding office only a very short time, etc. The picture which the Acts give of the two men—of Felix as a vulgar ruffian, and of Festus as a frivolous cynic—also corresponds well with that which Josephus and Tacitus give.

FELIX THE MANICHÆAN, one of the leaders of the sect in Africa, came to Hippo, and held a disputation with Augustine in the Christian Church, and in presence of the congregation. The disputation lasted in two days, and ended with the conversion of Felix. The acts, prepared by notaries, and signed both by Felix and Augustine, are still extant, and are found both in the Paris and the Benedictine edition of Augustine's works.

FELIX THE MARTYR, and his fellow-sufferer Felicissimus, were, according to tradition, the first to bring Christianity to the city of Zürich, and are still venerated as its patrons. They were executed under Maximian, and gave rise to a very luxuriant legend. See Mithteilungen d. ant. Gesellschaft zu Zürich, 1841, vols. I. and II.

FELIX OF NOLA became a confessor during the persecution of Decius. Legend tells us how he concealed himself in a fissure of an old building, and was saved by a spider drawing her web across the fissure, and thereby hiding him from the messengers. His fate was celebrated by Paulinus, Bishop of Nola, in a long poem of fourteen songs.

FELIX OF URCEL, See ADOPTIONISM.

FELIX is the name of five popes.—Felix I. (289–274), a Roman by birth, is said to have buried with his own hands three hundred and forty-two martyrs, and was probably martyred himself during the persecution of Aurelian. His day falls on the 30th of May. The fragment of a letter from him to Bishop Maximus of Alexandria, which Cyrillus gives in his Apologeticus, is of doubtful authenticity; but the letters ascribed to him by the pseudo-Irenaeus are certainly spurious. See Act. Sanct., April, pars I.; JAFFE: Reg. Pontif. Rom.—Felix II. (355–358) was elevated to the Roman see by the Arian court party, without the concurrence of the clergy and the people, when Liberius refused to sign the condemnation of Athanasius, and consequently was driven to exile. After the lapse, however, of three years, Liberius, tired of his exile, submitted to the imperial will, returned to his see, and drove away Felix. Of the latter fate of the latter nothing is known with certainty. According to Jerome, he tried to regain the see by force; according to Socrates, he was formally banished by the emperor; according to others, he lived in seclusion at Porto, and died in obscurity. Singularly enough, though his title is very dubious, he is a saint of the Roman-Catholic Church. His sainthood was confirmed by Gregory XIII. in 1582. His day falls on July 30. See Baroni-us: Ann. eccl. ad an. 557; JAFFE: Reg. Pont. Rom.—Felix III. (March, 483–Feb. 25, 492) was elected by the influence of Aдоaor, and became noted for the vigor and decision with which he inter-FERED in the affairs of the Eastern Church. The Emperor Zeno issued the Henoticon on the instance of his patriarch, Acacius, and for the purpose of reconciling the Monophysites. But Félix placed himself at the head of the opposition against this measure, and deposed and excommunicated Acacius at a synod of seventy-seven bishops, thereby occasioning the first schism between the Eastern and Western churches. See Act. Sanct., February, III., and JAFFE: Reg. Pontif. Rom. 7, 1451. In 1434 he abdicated, left the government of Savoy to his son, and retired to Ripaille, on the Lake of Geneva, as head of the knightly hermit order of St. Mauritius. The process which the Council of Basel instituted against Eugenius IV. roused his ambition; and when, through various intrigues, he was actually elected Pope by the council, he eagerly assumed the name of Felix V., and immediately formed a curia, mostly consisting of Frenchmen. But residing at Geneva, without any revenue, not in possession of the States of the Church, not acknowledged by any of the great powers, he presented a piteous spectacle. Even the cardinals he made declined the honor. When Germany and France recognized Nicholas V., Felix abdicated, and retired to Ripaille. His reign forms simply an interlude of the States of the Church, not acknowledged to whom Dr. Fell had given the thirty-third edition of the Greek Testament, Lond., 1675 (which was the standard edition until Mill), and Parallel and Annotations upon the Epp. of St. Paul, Lond., 1675, 3d ed., 1673. See Hook, Eccl. Biogr.

FELL, John, Bishop of Oxford, was b. in Berkshire, June 23, 1625; d. July 10, 1688. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, of which his father was the dean. He was a royalist, and after the restoration of the Stuarts was made dean of Christ Church, and in 1678 Bishop of Oxford. He was distinguished for learning, and munificent benefactions to the university. The following famous lines were written by a student to whom Dr. Fell had given the thirty-third epigram of Martial for translation:—

"I do not like thee, Dr. Fell, The reason why, I cannot tell; But this I know full well, I do not like thee, Dr. Fell." Amusing works among the more important were an edition of the Greek Testament, Lond., 1675 (which was the standard edition until Mill), and Parallel and Annotations upon the Epp. of St. Paul, Lond., 1675, 3d ed., 1673. See Hook, Eccl. Biogr.

FELLMANN, François de Salignac de la Mothe, Archbishop of Cambray, and one of the most brilliant and devout of French divines; was b. Aug. 6, 1651, at the castle of Fénelon, in Péris; d. Jan. 7, 1715, in Cambray. Brought up by pious parents, he was early set apart for the priesthood. In his twelfth year he was sent to the then flourishing university of Cahors, and passed from there to his uncle's in Paris, the Marquis de Fénelon, an able statesman. At his request, Fénelon, who was now eighteen, preached several times, and with great acceptance. He entered the college of St. Sulpice, where he remained for five years, applying himself assiduously to study and to spiritual exercises. The Archbishop of Paris, M. de Harley, recognizing his talents, appointed him the superior of the Nouvelles Catholiques,—an association of Catholic ladies of noble birth, for the instruction of Protestant girls. The experiences which he had at this post during ten years of service were embodied in his book De l'éducation des filles ("The Education of Girls"). He entered the first instance for the Duchess de Beauvilliers, the pious mother of a large family, it unfolded the principles of education and heart-training as they are found in Scripture and suggested by a careful observation of child-nature, with a practical wisdom that can hardly be surpassed.

Fénelon's success as Superior of this association attracted the attention of the king, and brought him into contact with Bossuet, the eloquent Bishop of Meaux, with whom he entered into a close friendship. Louis XIV. determined to use his gifts for furthering a plan of bringing over the whole of France to one faith, and assigned him a mission in Poitou for the conversion of the Protestants. Fénelon accepted the duties, but declined the military escort which it was customary to send on such occasions, preferring, like the apostles, to use only the weapons of the Spirit. He secured, at least, the respect of the Protestants, if he did not succeed in bringing them over to the Roman Church. Returning to his old position, he was accused of holding Protestant principles,—an accusation which he sufficiently refuted.
FEÑELO.
The nobility of Fénelon's character was shown most conspicuously during the war of the Spanish Succession (1701–13), when his diocese was for a while the seat of war. In a general way he sought to mitigate the horrors and ravages of the war by wise counsels to the Duke of Burgundy, who was commander-in-chief. When, in 1708, Flanders, in which Cambray was located, was desolated, he opened the chambers of his palace to the wounded and the sick; and when a dearth of grain was felt he offered his whole income to the state. The French admired their archbishop for his self-denying interest in the suffering and wounded, and bowed before his piety. No less did the enemies of France esteem his virtues; and Prince Eugene and Marlborough not only treated him politely, but sent troops to guard his property.

He died of a fever. His last days were peaceful. The latter part of the fourth chapter of Second Corinthians and the fifth chapter were read and re-read to him, affording great comfort. After listening to the high-priestly prayer in Gethsemane (John xvii.), he blessed his attendants, and went to sleep, aged sixty-four. Fénelon's death was regarded as a loss, not only to the diocese of Cambray, but to all France. His virtues and talents were known throughout Europe, and recognized by all church communions. He was a strict son of the Roman-Catholic Church; but, above all, he was a genuine, believing, active Christian, liberal and charitable enough to sympathize with Protestants, who, in turn, revere his memory.

The description of St. Simon, in his Memoirs (XXII.), deserves to be quoted. "He was a tall, thin man, well made, pale, with a large nose, eyes whence fire and talent streamed like a torrent, and a physiognomy the like of which I have never seen in any other man, and which, once seen, could never be forgot... It united seriousness and gayety, gravity and courtesy; the prevailing characteristics, as in every thing about him, being refinement, intellect, goodness, modesty, and, above all, noblesse, etc."

G. V. LECHLIE.

FERGUSSON, David, one of the fathers of the Scottish Reformation, was b. not later, and probably some years earlier, than the year 1525 (see Wodrow MSS., vol. xviii. No. 16). He d. in 1598, "the suilldest minister that tyme in Scotlant" (James Melville's Diary, Edin., 1842, p. 437). He seems to have been a native of Dundee, and by original occupation a Glover (Fergusson's Tracts, ut infra, Introd., p. xiv.). Though not a great writer, he showed his genius in the many wise and witty sayings which he has, doubtless, truly enough, attributed to him, a familiarity with the classical languages and classical literature.

In July, 1560, he was selected by the Parliament to be minister of Dunfermline, an important charge, as containing a royal palace, which afterwards became the favorite residence of James VI. But he had been one of six men, as he tells us himself, who began to preach the Reformed faith in Scotland some years before the Reformation; at a time "when" (to use his own words) "there was no stipend heard tell of; when the authority, both ecclesiastic and civil, opposed themselves; and when scarcely a man of name and estimation [was found] to take their cause in hand" (James Melville's Diary, p. 357). As to the matter of stipend, indeed it must be here added, that, even after the establishment of the Reformation, there was for some years little change for the better in this respect. In one of the Tracts already referred to, and afterwards particularly noticed, a tract published in the year 1683, Fergusson, speaking of himself and his brethren generally, says, "The greatest number of us have lived in great penury, without all stipend; some twelve months, some eight, and some half a year, having nothing to sustain ourselves and our families, but that which we have borrowed of charitable persons, until God send it to us to repay them" (An answer to Renan Benedict, p. 11). He proved an excellent minister, "preaching," says Row (Hist. p. 418), "with great boldness, wisdom, and holiness," and "bringing the people [of his charge] to very good order, knowledge of the truth, and obedience to the discipline of the Kirk." As a church-leader, he was characterized by firmness, sagacity, sound judgment, and also what Wodrow (Analecta, Glasgow, 1842, vol. I., p. 120) calls "pleasant and facetious conversation, by which," Wodrow adds, "he often pleased and pacified the king when he was in a fury." He was, accordingly, very frequently employed by the Church as a medium of communication with the king.

Fergusson published two tracts in his own lifetime. The first is a controversial work, entitled An answer to a tract written by René Benedict, the French doctor, to John Knox, and the rest of the brethren." This treatise was printed at Edinburgh, in the year 1603, and was reprinted for the Bannatyne Club in 1860, from a unique copy in the library of the University of Edinburgh. It contains an able discussion of the chief points at issue between the Romanists and Protestants at the period of the Reformation. His second publication appeared nine years afterwards, being a sermon preached before the regent and nobility at Leith (Jan. 13, 1571–72), during the meetings of the General Assembly. It relates chiefly to the inadequacy of the existing provision for the Reformed ministers, the schools, and the poor; and it condemns in no measured terms the neglect by the king and Parliament of objects regarded by the Church from the first as containing paramount claims on their attention. The sermon was printed at the request of the General Assembly held at Perth in the year 1572, with the special approbation of five of the most eminent ministers of that day, to whom it had been submitted for revision; John Knox, the Refig. 418. He shows his imprimitur in these words: "John Knox, with his dead hand, but glad heart, praising God, that, FERRAR, Nicholas, an English clergyman of asetic tastes; b. in London, Feb. 22, 1592; d. Dec. 2, 1637. He studied at Clare Hall, Cambridge; in 1624 was elected to Parliament; and in 1626 was ordained deacon by the Bishop of St. David's (Laud). He consecrated himself to a life of retirement and devotion, and refused flattering offers to benefices. He turned his manor, Little Gidding, into a sort of conventual establishment, at which vigils and other formal religious exercises were scrupulously observed. Ferrar himself slept on the floor, and rose at one in the morning for religious meditation. He also did much good by providing a free school for the children of the neighborhood, and himself catechised them. See Lives of Ferrar by Dr. Peckard (Camb., 1790), Macdonough (2d ed., Lond., 1837), and by his Brother and Dr. Jebb (1 vol., Camb., 1855).

FERRAR, Robert, Bishop of St. David's, and martyr; b. at Halifax, Yorkshire; d. at the stake, in Chermarthen, Wales, March 30, 1555. He studied at Cambridge and Oxford, and was elevated to the see of St. David's, under Edward VI., in 1548. Bishop Burnet (Hist. of Ref., I. p. 451) describes him as "a rash and indiscreet man," and as having been arbitrary in his treatment of the canons of his cathedral. At the accession of Mary he was deprived of his see, and tried and condemned for heresy. To a young man who deplored his death-sentence he is reported to have said, "If you see me once while I suffer the pangs of burning, then you may believe me when I say, 'I die.'" He made good his assertion, and was felled to the ground by a blow on the head. See Foxe: Actes and Monuments; iLook: Eccles. Biogr., vol. v.

FERRARA–FLORENCE, Council of. The course of opposition to the Pope and the curia, which the Council of Basel pursued, was even more pronounced than had been anticipated. A breach became unavoidable; and the project of a union between the Eastern and Western churches, started for political reasons by the Byzantine emperor, and eagerly caught at by the Pope, gave the occasion. For many reasons, Eugenius IV. wished that these negotiations should be carried on in Italy; and he proposed to transfer the Council of Basel to some Italian city. But the council refused; and after the stormy meetings on March 6 and 7, 1437, the papal minority left Basel, and placed itself at the disposition of the Pope. Jan. 8, 1438, the council was solemnly opened at Ferrara; and in March, same year, the Eastern delegates arrived, numbering about seven hundred persons, and including, besides the emperor, Johannes VI. (Paleologus), all the highest dignitaries of the Greek Church,— the patriarchs of Constantinople, Joseph I.; the archbishop of Nicæa, Bessarion; the archbishop of Ephesus, Alexander; Marcus Eugenius, patriarch of Kiew, Isidore, etc. April 9, 1438, the debate of the union question began.

The principal points of the debate were, the procession of the Holy Spirit (Filioque), the intermediate state of the soul between death and judgment (purgatory), the use of unleavened bread in the Eucharist, the primacy of the Pope, etc. The debates were very copious; but though the union had several warm friends among the Greeks, as, for instance, Bessarion, and though the emperor, pressed as he was on all sides by the Turks, and well knowing that the union was the condition of help from Western Europe, did his utmost to dampen the ardor of his theologians, nothing seemed likely to come out of the attempt. Troubles of another kind were added. The Greeks were the guests of the Pope, but the Pope had not money. In this emergency he addressed himself to the rich Florentine bankers; but the Florentines demanded that the council should be transferred from Ferrara to Florence, and this transference frightened the Greeks. Nevertheless, Feb. 26, 1439, the council was opened at Florence; and, after some months of more discussion, an agreement was actually arrived at. An act of union was signed by thirty-three Greek and a hundred and fifteen Latin church-dignitaries; and July 6, 1439, the Pope celebrated a commemorative service of unity in the Cathedral of Florence. Unfortunately, this union, so pompously announced to the world, was in reality a mere illusion. With respect to the principal dogmatical question, — the procession of the Holy Spirit, — the Latin addition (Filioque) was recognized by the Greeks, but not adopted in their creed: with respect to the principal practical question, — the papal primacy, — the claims of the Pope were recognized by the Greeks; but at the same time the rights and privileges of the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, were renewed and confirmed. In the West the union produced no enthusiasm for the suffering Greeks; and in the East it intensified the hatred to the Latins. Several of the Greek ecclesiastics who had signed the act of union were made to suffer for it. Isidore was thrown into prison; Bessarion had to flee to Rome, etc. In 1472 the Greeks solemnly renounced the union.

Likewise, the most important acts of the council are lost; but a documentary history of it, probably written by Archbishop Dorotheus of Mytilene, is found in vol. 9 of HARDUIN, and vol. 31 of MANSI. It is in favor of the union. From the opposite stand-point wrote Sylvester Syropoulos, a Greek priest, whose work was edited by Creyghton, London, 1660. FERRARA, Renata (Renée), celebrated for her relations to the Reformers, was the daughter of Louis XII. of France, and wife of Hercules of Este, Duke of Ferrara, whom she married in 1527; was b. at the castle of St. Blois, Oct. 25, 1510; d. at Montargis, June 12, 1575. Brought up in the court of Francis I., she came into intimate relations with Margaret of Navarre, whose evangelical sentiments she imbibed. Her mind was enlightened in the pursuits of literature and art; and her court at Ferrara attracted the learned men of Italy. She remained true to evangelical sentiments, in spite of opposition and the forced separation of her children, and welcomed to her palace her court at Ferrara attracted the learned men of Italy. On the death of her husband (in 1539) she returned to France, and made profession of the Reformed faith, in which she died. See P. FERRER, Jérémie, b. at Nimes in 1565; d. in Paris, Sept. 26, 1629; was appointed pastor of the Reformed Congregation of Nimes in 1601, and considered one of the most talented and courageous champions of the Reformation in France. He publicly defended the thesis that the Pope was Antichrist. He preached with such a violence against the Jesuits as to cause riots, etc. Nevertheless, some suspicion of his sincerity arose in 1611; and in 1613 he was forbidden to preach, because it was evident that he had sold himself to the Court and the Romanists. He went to Paris and abjured Protestantism in 1614. In the same year he wrote De l'Antichrist et de ses marques, contre les calomnies des ennemis de l'Eglise catholique. FERRIS, Isaac, D.D., L.L.D., b. in New York, Oct. 3, 1799; d. at Roselle, N.J., June 16, 1873. He was graduated from Columbia College, 1816; a pastor in the Reformed Dutch Church over different charges (New Brunswick, N.J., 1821–24; Albany, 1824–36; New York, Market Street, 1836–54); and chancellor of the New York University, 1852–70, emeritus, 1870–73. His service to the university was long and faithful. By his efforts a crushing debt of a hundred thousand dollars was extinguished, four professorships enabled, and several new departments added to the course of instruction. He possessed great sagacity, common sense, and administrative ability. As preacher, pastor, and professor, he was beloved. His presence was majestic. He delivered the address at the Jubilee of the American Bible Society, New York, 1866, subsequently published, —Jubilee Memorial of the American Bible Society; being a Review of its First Fifty Years of Work, N.Y., 1867.

FERRY, Paul, b. at Metz, Feb. 24, 1591; d. there July 28, 1669; was pastor of the Reformed Congregation there for about sixty years. He was a very prolific writer; but most of his works still remain in manuscript, and those which have been printed are mediocre. He is noticeable, however, for his participation in the project of uniting the Protestants and Romanists of France. His correspondence with Bossuet on that occasion is found in vol. xxiv. of the works of the latter. His Lettre aux ministres de Genève, in defence of a poor lunatic who was burnt at Geneva for blasphemies against the Trinity, is found in vol. ii. of Bibliothèque Anglaise.

FERRY LAW, The, is the name generally applied to a law concerning public instruction, especially in the higher schools, which was laid before the Legislative Chamber of France, March 15, 1879, by Jules Ferry, at that time minister of public instruction, and passed by the Senate, July 19, same year. The tendency of this law is to exclude the influence of the Roman-Catholic Church from the school. Article VII. of the law, the centre of the debate, and the object of a very bitter contest, prohibits the member of a not recognized religious association to be the director of, or to teach in, a public school. In consequence of this article, twenty-seven Jesuit colleges were closed, and eight hundred and forty-eight Jesuit teachers were forbidden to work. But, besides the Jesuits, twenty-six other religious communities which could not obtain, or would not seek, the confirmation of the government, were affected by the law. See FERRY, ECCLESIASTICAL STATISTICS OF.

FESCH, Joseph, b. at Ajaccio, Jan. 3, 1763; d. in Rome, May 13, 1839; was a younger stepbrother to Letitia, the mother of Napoleon I., and was educated for the church in the seminary of the Hundred Days, but returned then to Rome, leonso persistently, that he entirely lost his favor. He received by the Pope. He joined Napoleon during correspondence with their respective titles.

I. The Pre-Ezilian Festivals. — There are (a) The Seventh Day, or the Sabbath; (b) The Feast of Trumpets, or New Year; (c) The Day of Atonement; (d) The Feast of Tabernacles; and (e) The Feast of Pentecost. Besides, each seventh year was observed as a sabbatical, and, after seven times seven years, the Feast of Jubilee was observed. On the holy seasons in general comp. Exod. xxiii. 10–17; Lev. xxiii., xxv.; Num. xxviii., xxix.; Deut. xvi. As these festivals are treated separately, we need not enter upon the mode of their observation.

II. The Post-Ezilian Festivals. — After the exile, other holy seasons were added to those already enacted by Moses; thus the four fasts mentioned in the Mishna Taanith (for which comp. the Fastes), the Feast of Esther, or Purim, that of the Dedication of the Temple on its restoration by Judas the Maccabaeus, and that of Wood Offering, on which offerings of wood were brought for the use of the temple, and on which see the Mishna Taanith iv. 6. FESTUS. See Felix and Festes.

FETICHEISM, or FETISHISM (from the Portuguese fetico, fetise, a “charm,”) denotes one of the lowest forms of religion,—the worshipping of fetiches. The fetich is not itself considered a deity by the worshipper, or even a symbol of a deity: it is simply supposed to be a vehicle through which a supernatural power makes itself felt in the world; and, as no logical connection is demanded between the power and the vehicle through which it acts, any object, whether natural or artificial, animate or inanimate, may become a fetich. Entirely incidentally,—by a dream, by some kind of delusion, by a mere whim,—some one is induced to believe that a supernatural power exercises influence on his destiny through this pebble or that feather; and immediately he falls down and worships the pebble or the feather, and makes it his fetich. But just as incidentally the object may lose this dignity of being a fetich. If the worshipper discovers, or thinks he has discovered, that the influence is not so real as he supposed, he will withdraw his allegiance, and perhaps take vengeance. If the fetich is an animate object, it will be punished: if it is an inanimate object, it may be destroyed. The idea, however, of influencing, perhaps coercing, the supernatural power through the vehicle, is not altogether foreign to the fetich worshipper; for the fetich has, at least to some extent, the character of being a means of witchcraft.

This form of religion was observed and described for the first time, when, in the fifteenth century, the Portuguese boarded the coasts of Guinea. Afterwards numerous traces of it were found among the savages in America, Australia, and Siberia; and De Brosses, in his Du Culte des Dieux Fétiches (Dijon, 1760), brings it in connection with the religion of the ancient Egyptians. General attention was drawn to it by A. Comte, who, in his Philosophie positive (Paris, 1830–42), places it as the first stage in the logical evolution of religion, and defines it as a conception of nature, according to which all bodies are animalized, in the same manner as the human body, and, like that, governed by a will. This definition depends upon a mistake; for fetishism is not pantheism, but just the reverse of pantheism, a very coarse dualism, as has been very ably shown by Sir John Lubbock, in his Origin of Civilization, 1870, and by Herbert Spencer, in his Sociology, 1879. See Fritz Schultze, Der Fetischismus, Leipzig, 1871.
he led for several years a very precarious life as a tutor in Zürich and Warsaw, and as a student in Leipzig and Königsberg. He came out, however, from those years of poverty and embarrassment with a character of steel. His first strong intellectual impression he received from the writings of Lessing. Afterwards, in the course of his mental development, he successively moved from the freethinking of Lessing to the determinism of Spinoza, and again from the determinism of Spinoza to the criticism of Kant. In Kant's limitation of causality to the world of phenomena he found the starting-point for his own philosophy.—that audacious deduction of both nature and God from the human ego, as to whose true character (atheism, or not) people still disagree. In 1794 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Jena; and the following year he published his chief work, Die Wissenschaftslehre (translated into English by A. E. Kroeger, Science of Knowledge, Philadelphia, 1868), and the beautiful essay, Ueber die Bestimmung des Gelehrten (translated by W. Smith, The Vocation of the Scholar, in his Popular Writings of J. G. Fichte, 2 vols., London, 1847–48, new edition, 1871). Both his writings and his lectures made a deep impression. But a suspicion of atheism was already abroad; and when, in 1799, in a little essay, On the Grounds of our Faith in the Divine Government of the World, he declared that the moral order of the world is God, and that there is no other God, he was formally rebuked by the government, and discharged. The rest of his life he spent in Berlin, where he lectured to great audiences, and took an active part in the foundation of the university. The effect of his lectures (as, for instance, his Reden an die deutsche Nation), was felt through all Germany, and can still be felt at this very day. In these later writings, as, for instance, in The Destination of Man, 1800 (translated by Mrs. Sinnett, London, 1846), The Nature of the Scholar, The Characteristics of the Present Age, The Way towards the Blessed Life, etc., 1805–07 (all translated by W. Smith in the mentioned above), he took great pains to clear up his relation to religion, especially to Christianity. In some points he succeeded. It is evident that he was very far from considering Christianity a mere code of morality: he recognized it as an agency of much deeper significance in the history of the human race. But the incarnation, for instance, seems to have been to him nothing more than a typical representation of what takes place in every man when he is converted. Of the historical facts on which Christianity rests, he seems to have grasped the typical significance only. His collected works were edited (Bonn, 1834–46, 11 vols.), and his life was written, by his son, I. H. Fichte, Sulzbach, 1830, 2 vols., 2d ed., Leipzig, 1862.

Fichtet, Johann Gottlieb, b. at Rammenau, in Upper Lusatia, May 19, 1762; d. in Berlin, Jan. 27, 1814; was educated at Schulpforta, and studied theology at Jena. The son of a poor ribbon-weaver, he was enabled to follow his intellectual ambition only by the aid of Baron von Miltitz, and, when this his benefactor died, he led for several years a very precarious life as a tutor in Zürich and Warsaw, and as a student in Leipzig and Königsberg. He came out, however, from those years of poverty and embarrassments of all kinds, a character of steel. His first strong intellectual impression he received from the writings of Lessing. Afterwards, in the course of the reform, the reputation of the monastery increased so rapidly, that the envy even of the mother-institution at Citeaux was excited, and Barrière was compelled to ask support from the Pope. In 1588 the Pope not only confirmed the reforms, but also forbade the Cistercians to meddle with the affairs of Feuillans. Monks from Feuillans were invited to Rome; and monasteries on the reformed plan were founded in Rome, in Paris, and in Bordeaux. In 1598 the Pope entirely exempted the Feuillans from the authority of Citeaux, and confirmed their constitution as an independent congregation. Under Henry IV. they obtained the right of electing their own general; and in the middle of the seventeenth century they numbered about thirty monasteries in France and Italy. Nunneries were also founded; the first by Barrière, in 1588, at Montesquion, in the diocese of Rieux, for fifteen inmates; a second, in 1599, at Toulouse; a third at Poitiers, in 1617, etc. See Joseph Morotius: *Cistercii refugioscens ... Ficrè. (Irish-Gaelic, raven or worth), d. 670; a saint of Gaul, and patron of the gardeners, who celebrate his festival on Aug. 30. He was most probably of Irish parentage, and went to Meaux, probably of Irish parentage, and went to Meaux, in 1640 a merchant rented a building in Paris for his carriages, which he hired out. Over the building was an image of the saint, and the building itself was called Hôtel de St. Fiacre. The name passed to the vehicles themselves. See Bollandist: Acta SS., Aug. 30, vol. vi. p. 604 sqq.; A. J. Ansart: Hist. de St. Fiacre, Paris, 1782; Smith: Dict. Christ. Biog., art. Fiacrius.

Fichte, Immanuel Hermann, the son of the former; b. at Jena, July 18, 1797; d. at Stuttgart, Aug. 13, 1879; was professor of philosophy at Bonn (1836–41) and at Königsberg; was a very prolific writer on all branches of philosophy, and exercised considerable influence as a champion of Christian theism. In this respect his Die speculative Theologie, Heidelberg, 1846, and System der Ethik, Leipzig, 1850–53, are of special interest. He founded the Zeitschrift für Philosophie.

FICINUS, Marsilium, b. at Florence, Oct. 19, 1433; d. in his villa, at Careggi, Oct. 1, 1499; was a son of the body-physician of Cosimo di Medici, and grew up in the palace, enjoying the instruction of Gemistus Pletho, and the intercourse of all the leaders of the Renaissance. In time he became one of the leaders himself; and he, more than any one else, was instrumental in familiarizing the age with the ideas of Plato and the Neo-Platonists. It was an enthusiastic conviction of his, that the depraved theology of his time could be regenerated only by an infusion of Platonism. In that spirit he preached, having been consecrated priest in 1477; and in that spirit he wrote and lectured as president of the Platonist Academy. He gave a complete Latin translation of Plato and Plutinus, and published a number of original works,—Theologia Platonica, De Religione Christiana, De Immortalitate Animo, etc. Collected editions of his works appeared at Venice, 1516; Basel, 1561; Paris, 1641. Among his pupils were Pico di Mirandola, Reuchlin, Sixtus IV., etc. See Sieverke, Geschichte d. platonisch. Akademie zu Florenz, Göttingen, 1812.

FIDDES, Richard, D.D., a fertile theological author; b. at Humeley, Yorkshire, in 1671; and d. at Putney in 1725. He was educated at Oxford; became rector of Halsham about 1694, but, losing his voice, resigned, and devoted himself with much industry to authorship. Among his works are: A Body of Divinity, Lond., 1718–20, in 2 vols. (the first discussing the doctrines of natural and revealed religion,—Theol. speculativa, the second, the duties,—Theol. practica); a Life of Cardinal Wolsey, Lond., 1724 (in which the writer disparages the Reformation); and 3 vols. of Discourses, Lond., 1710–15, passing through three editions.

FIDELIS, St., properly Marcus Roy, was b. at Sigmaringen, 1577; studied law, and began to practise as a lawyer in Ensisheim, but suddenly changed career, entered the order of the Capuchins, and was consecrated priest, and appointed preacher at Feldkirch, in the Vorarlberg, in 1621. His great aim was to re-establish the Roman Catholic Church in these regions; and at the head of an Austrian regiment of dragoons he set out on a missionary trip. But the peasants rose in defence of their religious liberty, defeated the dragoons, and put Fieldis to death, April 24, 1622; for which Benedict XIV. declared him a saint.

FIELD, Richard, an eminent divine of the Anglican Church; b. Oct. 15, 1561, in Hensford, Hertfordshire; d. Nov. 21, 1616. He studied at Oxford; was made rector of Burk- scrake in 1588, chaplain in ordinary to Elizabeth, and in 1610 raised to the deanship of Gloucester. He was an intimate friend of Hooker, recognized as a good preacher and profound theologian, and esteemed by James I., who, after hearing him for the first time, expressed his sentiments in the pun, “This is a Field for God to dwell in.” Fuller, in his Holy War, calls him “that learned divine, whose memory smelteth like a Field the Lord hath blessed.” Field’s fame rests upon his work entitled Of the Church, Five Books, by Richard Feake, D.D., and sometime Dean of Gloucester, 1606–10. It treats of the nature, members, and government of the true church, and was occasioned, as he says in the dedication to the Archbishop of Canterbury, by “the unhappy divisions of the Christian world, and the infinite distractions of men’s minds.” It seeks to “discover the vanity of the insolent boasings of the Papists, that all men may know that we have not departed from the ancient faith, or forsaken the fellowship of the Church Catholic.” In the fifth book, which discusses the ministry, he takes the moderate view of episcopacy. “When the Apostles had finished their course, they left none to succeed them... yet they authorized presbyters and deacons.” Feake’s work has been republished by the Ecclesiastical History Society, 4 vols., Cambridge, 1847. For his life, see Some Short Memorialis concerning his Life, by his son, Nathaniel Field, London, 1716, 1718. He was canonized as a good preacher and profound theologian, and esteemed by James I., who, after hearing him for the first time, expressed his sentiments in the pun, “This is a Field for God to dwell in.”

FIFTH-MONARCHY MEN, republican and millenarian enthusiasts of the Commonwealth period, who attempted to set up “the kingdom of Jesus,” or the fifth monarchy of Daniel. Powell and Feake were the first leaders, and called Cromwell “the dissemblingest perjur’d villain in the world.” They formed a plot in 1657 to murder Cromwell; but it was discovered by Secretary Thurloe, and some of the chief conspirators imprisoned. On Sunday, Jan. 6, 1661, a band numbering about fifty, and headed by Venner, a wine-cooper, rose again in insurrection. They carried a banner with the design of a lion couchant (the lion of the tribe of Judah). They were quickly dispersed, and Venner taken prisoner, and hung. The Independents and Quakers were unjustly accused of being in sympathy with the Fifth Monarchy Men. See Neal: Hist. of the Puritans, ii. 176, 220 (Harper’s ed.); Carlyle: Life of Cromwell: STOUTHON: Rel. in England, new ed., Lond., 1881, vol. ii. pp. 57–69.

FIJI ISLANDS, a group of two hundred and fifty islands in the Southern Pacific, and comprising an area of nearly eight thousand square miles. The two largest ones are Vanua Levu (Great Land), which is about one hundred miles long, and has an average breadth of twenty-five miles, and Viti Levu (Great Viti, or Fiji), which is ninety by fifty miles. Eighty of these islands are inhabited. They are the result of coral and volcanic formation. The climate is delightful, the thermometer seldom rising above 90°. The islands were discovered by Tasman in 1643, and visited by Bligh in 1789, and by Wilson in 1797. The ethnological relations of the Fijians have given much difficulty. They combine characteristics of the Melanesian and Polynesian types. Physically they are an athletic, well-formed race, and mentally they are far above the Papuans. The population was divided up into tribes, and ruled by kings, until 1874, when the islands were annexed to Great Britain. The more powerful chiefs voluntarily proposed the cessation, and signed articles to that effect in October of 1874. Sir Arthur Gordon was appointed the first governor. The advantages accruing to the islands from the annexation have been signal. A code of laws has been adopted, and justice is now administered in courts. When the English governor arrived at the islands in 1875, they were in a state of almost hopeless poverty. A terrible pestilence had carried off, the year previous, one-third of the population. From that time the yearly revenue has rapidly increased from £16,000 in 1875 to £75,150 in 1879. The chief productions are yams, sugar-cane, maize, copra (cocoanut), and bananas. The population in 1880 was 110,000 natives, 1,902 Europeans, and 3,200 Polynesians, imported to work on the plantations.

In no part of the world have modern missions had a more glorious triumph than in Fiji. The first missionaries were Messrs. Cross and Cargill, who went in 1835 to Fiji from the Friendly Islands, where Mr. Cross had been laboring for eight, and Mr. Cargill for two years. The religion of the islands was a degrading superstition, and witchcraft was widely practised. The tribes were in a constant state of war with each other. The people wore no covering, except a kilt, four inches wide, around the waist. Their ornaments were limited to whale-teeth; but they took great pride in the shape of their headdress, which was trained as to form a large bushy covering for the head; and so careful were they to protect it, that, in the place of pillows, they substituted a narrow yoke, one or two inches wide at the top, on which they rested their necks. Polygamy was practised, and the condition of woman was a very inferior one. The wife or wives were strangled at the death of the husband. Life was cheap, the kings sacrificing men at the launching of a new canoe, or the inception of a campaign, or the erection of a house. Cannibalism was also practised on a large scale, although there were some who the missionaries found averse to eating human flesh. The victims of war, and shipwrecked mariners, were invariably served up on the table. The treatment of women has undergone a complete revolution; and the practice of cannibalism has been entirely given up (except among a few mountain tribes), under the influence of the missionaries.

The English Wesleyans have been left to undisputed control of the islands ever since 1835 by the other Protestant churches. Messrs. Cross and Cargill were re-enforced by Messrs. Lythe and Hunt in 1839, and by Mr. Williams and others in 1840. The work was carried on amidst great discouragements and perils during the first years, and the all but universal practice of the West.

The doctrine in whose statement the word Filioque came from John xv. 26, in which Christ speaks of the Spirit of truth who "proceedeth from the Father" (τρόπον τοῦ πατρὸς ἐκπορεύεται). Inasmuch as nothing is said in this passage or in any other of the "double procession," i.e., from both the Father and the Son, the Greek Church holds to the single procession, and defends its position, not only by an appeal to the text of Scripture and to the original form of the Nicene Creed, but also to the "monarchy" (μοναρχία) of the Father as the sole fountain, root, and cause of the deity. It distinguishes sharply between the eternal metaphysical procession of the Spirit from the Father alone, and the temporal mission of the Spirit by the Father and the Son (John xiv. 26, xvi. 7). The former belongs to the trinity of essence, the latter to the trinity of revelation, and begins with the Day of Pentecost. The Latin Church defends the double procession on the grounds of the double mission of the Spirit and the essential unity of the Son with the Father; so that, if the Spirit proceed from the essence of the Father, he must also proceed from the essence of the Son, because they have the same essence. The Greek patriarchs attended the Vatican Council of 1870, on the ground of the heresy of the Latin Church upon this point.

A compromise was suggested from the writings of John of Damascus, to say that the Spirit proceeds from the Father, through the Son. This was accepted by the conference held in Bonn (August, 1870) between the Old Catholics, Orientals, and Anglo-Catholics, in which the Filioque was rendered as an unauthorized addition to the Creed.

FILLAN (the Scotch form of the Irish Faelan) is the name of two Iro-Scotch saints. The one whose festival falls on June 20 had his chief churches at Ballyheidy, Queen's County, Ireland, and at the eastern end of Loch Earn, Perthshire, Scotland. The other, whose festival falls on Jan. 9, had his chief churches at Cluan Mosaic, Westmeath County, Ireland, and at Strathfillan, Perthshire, Scotland. The legend of the latter is found in Act. Sanct., Jan. 9, Tom. i. p. 504, and in Forbes, Kat. Scot. Saints, 342.

FINLAND, The Christianization of, is the common story of the Roman-Catholic missions in the middle ages,—the conquest of the country, the forced baptism of the people, the building of fortresses, and the establishment of bishoprics. The latter was a branch of the Uralo-Altaic family, and allied to the Magyars. The Magyars, scattered settlements throughout Northern Europe at the time when the migration of the nations began. Pushed farther towards the North by the Germanic peoples and the Russians, they seemed in many places to melt away; and Finland, the large peninsula between the Bothnian Gulf and Gulf of Finland, is the only part of Europe in which a Finnish tribe succeeded in maintaining itself as a nation up to our time. The country comprises an area of 144,221 square miles, with 1,912,647 inhabitants, according to the census of 1875.

On account of their sombre and savage religious rites, the ancient Finns had the reputation, among their neighbors, of being a nation of sorcerers and magicians; and their passion for piracy and plunder was, of course, not suited to mend the reputation. Sweden was especially exposed to their attacks; and in the middle of the twelfth century the Swedish king, Eric, determined their disturbances. As the war was waged against heathens, the campaign became a crusade; and Archbishop Henry of Upsala, an Englishman by birth, accompanied the king. After landing in Finland (1157), Eric completely defeated the Finnish army, baptized those of his soldiers who did not slay, built the fortress of Abo, and established a diocese at Rendamecki. Christianity, however, did not make great progress in the country. Some Finns came and paid their tithes, in ermine, at Rendamecki; but the great majority of them remained heathen, and Henry was killed. Even the political ascendency of Sweden waned away; and small support for it was derived from the elevation of the slain Henry to a saint, and the patron of the country. But in 1248 Birger Jarl made a new campaign, and built the fortress Tavaste; and in 1293, under the reign of the young King Birger, the Swedish chancellor, Torkil Kruitson, completed the conquest of the whole country, built the fortress of Viborg, moved the episcopal see from Rendamecki to Abo, and made Finland a Christian province. It was found, however, when in the sixteenth century the Reformation was introduced in the country from Sweden, that most of the inhabitants, even such as regularly paid their ermine tithe, lived in utter ignorance of Christianity, and in open enjoyment of their heathen license. In Finland the Lutheran minister was a missionary rather than a reformer. In 1909 the country ceased to be a possession of the czar of Russia and a considerable measure of national independence was granted to it. The Czar of Russia bears the title of Grand Duke of Finland; yet the government of all the interior, especially the ecclesiastical affairs of the country, is completely separated from that of Russia to put the population, ninety-eighth per cent belong to the Lutheran Church, only two per cent to the Greco-Russian Church or other denominations; but there is complete freedom for other religious bodies. The Lutheran Church is represented by the Archbishop of Abo, the Bishops of Borgå and Kuopio, and an ecclesiastical assembly, consisting of thirty-four clerical and fifty lay members, and convened every ten years. The country has four hundred and forty-eight primary schools, besides a number of itinerant teachers in the more sparsely settled regions, three seminaries, and a university with a flourishing theological faculty. The official language is Finnish. Swedish is spoken only in a few parishes. See Ruhé: Finnland und seine Bewohner, Leipzig, 1808; and Bishop Reuter-
FINLEY, James Bradley, a distinguished pioneer of Methodism in Ohio; b. in North Carolina, July 1, 1781; d. at Cincinnati, Sept. 6, 1856. Joining the Ohio Conference in 1809, he was made preacher in 1810. Several of his sermons were published with much success. From 1845 to 1849 he was chaplain of the Ohio Penitentiary. He took a very prominent part in the organization of the Colozion Society (1816). In 1817 he accepted the presidency of the University of Georgia (Franklin College), located at Athens, where he died a few months after. Several of his sermons were published during his lifetime.

FINLEY, Robert, D.D., a Presbyterian divine; b. in Princeton, 1772; d. at Athens, Ga., 1817. He graduated from Princeton College in his sixteenth year. After studying theology under Dr. Witherspoon, he became pastor at Basking Ridge, N.J., 1795. In 1803 a powerful revival was felt in his church, a hundred and twenty persons being admitted at one communion. He took a very prominent part in the organization of the Colonization Society (1816). In 1817 he accepted the presidency of the University of Georgia (Franklin College), located at Athens, where he died a few months after. Several of his sermons were published during his lifetime.

FINLEY, Samuel, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, and president of Princeton College; b. in Ireland, 1715; d. July 17, 1786. He came to America in 1734, and studied, so it is supposed, under Mr. Tennent in Log College. Licensed in 1740 by the presbytery of New Brunswick, he co-operated vigorously with the friends of revival preaching. In 1743 he was called to Milford, Conn., but was before many months expelled from the colony for preaching, in violation of the statute, in another pulpit than his own. In 1744 he was called to Nottingham, Md., where he established an academy which educated some prominent men. In 1761 he was chosen the successor of President Davies at Princeton College. Died and was buried in Philadelphia. Several of Dr. Finley's sermons were published during his lifetime, the principal of which were one on Matt. xii. 28, Christ triumphing, and Satan raging (1741), and The Curse of Meroz (1757).

FINNEY, Charles G., a powerful revivalist preacher, and president of Oberlin College; was b. at Warren, Litchfield County, Conn., Aug. 29, 1822; d. at Oberlin, O., Aug. 16, 1875. When he was only two years old, his parents removed to Western New York. This placed him beyond the reach of anything more than a common-school education. At seventeen he began to teach, and in 1818 to study law at Adams, in Western New York. Neither of his parents was a church-member, nor did he up to his twentieth year enjoy any but the most meagre opportunities of hearing the gospel. His conversion in 1821 was remarkable for its suddenness, thoroughness, and the definitely marked stages of his experience. Feeling an immediate call to preach, he forsook the law, held prayer-meetings, was received under care of presbytery (1822), and licensed to preach 1824. He at once turned his attention to revival labors, which were continued, with few interruptions, until 1860, when he was forced to give up the work of an itinerant evangelist on account of age. These labors, beginning in Western and Central New York, were extended to Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and other cities of the East, and reached to England, which Mr. Finney visited in 1849 and 1858, preaching with much power. In 1832 he accepted a call to the pastorate of the Second Free Church of New-York City, and, two years later, another to the recently organized Congregational Church known as the Broadway Tabernacle. In 1835 he went to Oberlin as professor, where he continued to labor till the time of his death as instructor of theology, pastor, and college president (1852). During his residence at Oberlin he still continued, as before, to hold revival meetings in Eastern cities until 1860.

Mr. Finney's career naturally falls under the two heads of revivalist preacher and theological teacher. His power as a preacher was very great; and his labors produced, in many places, wonderful effects. Wherever he went, extensive revivals prevailed. His manner was vigorous, direct, and personal. He used simple language and illustrations. His presentation was clear, and strictly logical. He directed his appeals to the conscience, rather than the affections, and made it tremble and quake by the most searching analysis of the motives of the heart. On one occasion he says, "Everybody was out, at meeting, and the Lord let me loose upon them in a wonderful manner" (Autobiog., p. 100). He chose for themes those passages which delineate the sinner's condition as one of conscious alienation from God, and sinning against him. He dwelt upon the enmity of the carnal mind, the want of holiness, and the inevitable destruction of the impious. He called upon his hearers to come to an immediate decision, and submit to God. "Instead of telling sinners," he says, "to use the means of grace, and pray for a new heart, I called on them to make themselves a public ally, and pressed the duty of immediate surrender to God" (Auto- biog., p. 189). These meetings were often accompanied by violent bodily manifestations; and Mr. Finney practiced the methods of calling upon the audiences to go forward to the anxious-bench, or to arise in attention of mighty movements of attendant circumstances, and Mr. Finney's methods of preaching, early evoked criticism and strong opposition. Mr. Nettleton and Dr. Beecher were among the opponents of the "new measures;" and a convention was held in July, 1827, at New Lebanon, of prominent ministers (such as Dr. Hawes of Hartford, Edwards of Andover, Beecher of Boston, Boman of Troy, etc.) to take the whole matter into consideration. However, with better information, the opposition decreased. Mr. Finney's preaching reached all classes; lawyers and educated men being particularly convinced by it, as notably at Rochester.

As a teacher at Oberlin, Mr. Finney's influence was also great. He was an original thinker, and very positive in his convictions. His lectures on theology define his position as a theologian. It is here not necessary to do more than merely state some of the main and distinguishing views. He held to the plenary ability of the sinner to repent, regarded happiness as the chief aim, and explained regeneration (which he did not clearly distinguish from conversion) to consist of an act of the will, rather than an act of the Holy Spirit. He exerted a shaping influence over the minds of his students; and his theology, in a modified form, had a wide acceptance in his own denomination in the West.

Lit.—Mr. Finney's works are: Lectures on Revivals, Boston, 1835, passed through many editions (new and enlarged edition, Oberlin, 1886); Lectures to Professing Christians, Oberlin, 1836; Sermons on Important Subjects, New York, 1839; Lectures on Theology, Oberlin, 1846, new ed., 1875, republished in London. See, for a criticism upon Mr. Finney's theology, Dr. Hodge, in Princeton Review, April, 1847; for his life, Memoirs of Charles G. Finney, an Autobiography, New York, 1876.

FINTAN, a native of Leinster, Ireland; was carried off by a swarm of marauding Northmen, but escaped, and spent two years on the coast of Caithness with a bishop; went thence to Rome, and from Rome to Switzerland, where he entered the monastery of Rheingaw, or Rheinau, in the canton of Zurich, as a monk. In 800 he retired from the monastery, and lived to his death (in 827) as a hermit in the neighborhood, practising the most austere asceticism. He was venerated as a saint, even during his lifetime; and after his death he was adopted as the patron of Rheinau. See MABILLON, Act. Sanct. O. S. B., W. PRESSEL.

FIRKOWITSCH, Abraham, a Jewish archaeologist; b. at Lutzk, in the Crimea, 1750; d. 1814; deserves mention for his lifelong labors in collecting Hebrew manuscripts, biblical and other, fifteen thousand of which he deposited in the Imperial Library at St. Petersburg. He was a Caraita, and it was his interest in the authors of his sect which determined him to devote his life to finding as much as he could about them. Many of his manuscripts have probably considerable critical value in determining the Hebrew text of the books of the Old Testament (comp. Gen. xli. 3; 2 Chron. xxii. 3).

that a feeling of gratitude toward the Giver of all good was shown by the first men in offering the first-fruits, or the first and best which they had. What seems to have been at first a natural feeling was afterwards regulated among the Hebrews by the Mosaic law, which ordained the following first-fruits offerings. (a) On the morrow after the Passover sabbath (i.e., on the 16th of Nisan) a sheaf of new corn was to be brought to the priest, and waved before the altar. This offering was accompanied by a lamb as sacrifice, two tenth-dells of flour, and a drink offering of a fourth part of a hin of wine (Exod. xxix. 39 sq.; Lev. xxiii. 9 sq.). (b) Seven weeks from this time (i.e., at the Feast of Pentecost), an oblation was to be made of two loaves made of two tenth-dells of flour. They were accompanied by a burnt offering of seven lambs, one young bullock, and two rams, a meat and drink offering, a sin offering, each of the goats, and the large for a peace offering, which were waved with the loaves, but afterwards belonged to the priests (Lev. xxi. 17 sq.). (c) The Feast of Ingathering (i.e., the Feast of Tabernacles), in the seventh month, was itself an acknowledgment of the fruits of the harvest (Exod. xxxix. 22; Lev. xxiii. 39).

Besides these stated occasions, every Israelite was to consecrate to the Lord a part of the first-fruit of the land; as of oil, honey, dough, wool,—in fact, of every thing. The fruits of every newly-planted tree were not to be eaten or sold, or used in any way for the first three years, but considered "uncircumcised," or unclean. In the fourth year, however, the first-fruits were to be consecrated to the Lord, and in the fifth year became available to the owner (Lev. xix. 23 sq.). As the quantity of these offerings was not fixed by the law, but was left to the good will of the individual (Deut. xvi. 10), tradition has laid down rules and regulations, with such minuteness as only rabbinism is capable of; and the Talmudic treatises Biccurim and Therumoth (cf. art. Talmud) are especially full on this matter. For a description of a Biccurim procession, see DRITZSCHE: Jewish Artisan Life at the Time of Jesus, Eng. trans., Lond., 1877, p. 94 sqq. FISCH, George, D.D., b. at Nyon, Canton de Vaud, Switzerland, July 6, 1814; d. at Vallorbes, Switzerland, Sunday, July 3, 1881. He studied theology at Lausanne, and was for five years pastor of a small German church at Vevey; but in 1846 he was called to Lyons, France, to be assistant preacher to Adolphe Monod, of the Free Church, whom he subsequently succeeded. In 1853 he was called to Paris as the colleague of Presensé. He was warmly attached to the cause of the Free churches, and took part in the Constitutional Synod of 1849, which formed the union of the Evangelical churches of France. From 1863 till his death he was president of the Synodal Commission, and thus directed the work of the Free churches. He was one of the founders of the Evangelical Alliance, and "the very soul of the branch of this society in France," an active member of different home and foreign missionary societies, particularly interested in South-African missions and in Mr. McAll's mission in Paris. But in every way he labored to advance the gospel. He was remarkably gifted, and used his powers to the utmost. Twice he visited the United States (in 1861 and in 1873), coming the last time as a delegate to the Evangelical Alliance Conference held in New York, Oct. 2-12. He was also a delegate to the First Council of the Presbyterian Alliance in Edinburgh, July 3-10, 1877.

FISH, Henry Clay, b. at Halifax, Vt., Jan. 27, 1820; d. in Newark, N.J., Oct. 2, 1877. He was graduated from Union Seminary, New York, in 1845; entered the Baptist ministry, and after a five-years' pastorate at Somerville, N.J., came to the First Baptist Church of Newark, 1850, and was its pastor when he died. He was very successful, attracting large audiences, and making a profound impression. His preaching was essentially revivistic. He was an ardent and efficient worker in the Baptist Church. Notwithstanding his devoted pastoral labors, he found time to prepare several meritorious works: Primitive Piety Revived, Boston, 1855 (20,000 copies sold in two years); History and Repository of Pulpit Eloquence, N.Y., 1866, 2 vols., new ed. in 1 vol., 1877; Pulpit Eloquence of the Nineteenth Century, N.Y., 1857, new ed., 1875; Select Discourses from the German and French, N.Y., 1858; Heaven in Song, N.Y., 1874 (a poetical compilation); Handbook of Revivals, Boston, 1874; Bible Lands, Hartford, 1876 (based upon his visit in 1874).

FISHER, John, Bishop of Rochester; was b. at Beverley, Yorkshire, in 1490, and beheaded at Tower Hill, June 22, 1535. He was educated at Cambridge, where he subsequently became master of Michael House. Taking orders, he was appointed chaplain and confessor to Margaret, the mother of Henry VII.; in 1501 was elected Chancellor of Cambridge, and 1504 consecrated Bishop of Rochester. He took a deep interest in the revival of learning, and began himself the study of Greek in his sixtieth year. Among his friends were Reuchlin and Erasmus. He was by no means blind to the clerical abuses of the time, but had no sympathy with the Reformation ideas which began to prevail in the latter years of his life. Following the king's example, he published an able rejoinder to Luther's tract, De Babylon Capitulate. He was one of the chief advisers of Henry VIII. until the divorce with Catharine began to be agitated. In 1531 he signed the formula constituting the sovereign the supreme head of the Church, with the limiting statement, "so far as the law of Christ permits," but retired from all active work in extending the Baptist Church. Not far from the time of his death, he began himself the study of Greek in his sixtieth year. Twice he visited the United States (in 1861 and in 1873), coming the last time as a delegate to the Evangelical Alliance Conference held in New York, Oct. 2-12. He was also a delegate to the First Council of the Presbyterian Alliance in Edinburgh, July 3-10, 1877.
was sent to the Tower. The Pope sent him a cardinal's hat to protect him; but this served only to exasperate the king, by whose orders he was executed.

FISK, Pliny, a devoted American missionary in Syria; b. in Shelburne, Mass., June 24, 1792; d. at Beyrout, Oct. 23, 1825. He graduated at Middlebury College (1814) and Andover Seminary. On Sept. 23, 1818, the prudential committee of the American Board of Missions determined to establish a mission in Palestine, and the same day appointed Levi Parsons and Fisk missionaries. The latter was ordained at Salem, Nov. 5, 1818; and after spending a year in Georgia and South Carolina, collecting money for the Board, he embarked with Parsons for the East. The first years after their arrival were spent at Smyrna and the Island of Scio, seventy miles off. In January, 1822, he went to Alexandria, where Parsons soon after died. He finally settled down between Jerusalem and Beyrout, distributing tracts and Bibles, and preaching. He died at the age of thirty-three, in Beyrout, a few days after separating from Dr. King, but tenderly cared for by Dr. Goodell. Fisk was a man of much missionary enthusiasm; and, as one of the founders of the thriving missionary station at Beyrout, his work lives on. See Alván Bond: Memoir of P. Fisk, Boston, 1828; Anderson: Oriental Missions, Boston, 1872, i. 1–33.

FISK, Wilbur, D.D., first president of Wesleyan University; b. in Brattleborough, Vt., Aug. 31, 1792; d. at Middletown, Conn., Feb. 22, 1839. After graduating at Brown University, he gave himself up to the study of law, but soon changed his mind, and became an itinerant preacher in the Methodist Church. In 1826 he was made his own president of the Wilbraham Academy, and in 1828; ANDERSON: Oriental Missions, Boston, 1872, i. 1–33.

FIVE-MILE ACT (called also OXFORD ACT, the session of Parliament which passed it having met at Oxford), entitled "An Act to restrain Nonconformists from inhabiting Corporations," was promoted by Clarendon, Archbishop Sheldon, and others, and passed by Parliament in 1665. It enjoined upon all nonconformists an oath not to take up arms against the king, or attempt any alteration of government either in Church or State. It forbade their approach within five miles of any corporation represented in Parliament, or any place where they had preachers, on penalty of a fine of forty pounds for each offence. A penalty of forty pounds was also enacted against those who, refusing to take the oath, taught school or kept boarders. Any offence against the act must be reported by the justices Impending, in the time of Parliament. This legislation caused intense suffering among the nonconformists, only very few of whom took the oath. See Neal: Hist. of Puritanism, ii. p. 255 sqq. (Harper's ed.); Green: Hist. of Engl. People, iii. 375 sqq. (Harper's ed.).

FIVE POINTS OF CALVINISM, a theological term indicating the five characteristic tenets of Calvinism as opposed to Arminianism. They were defended by the synod of Dort (1618, 1619) in answer to the Five Articles of the Armenians or Remonstrants, put forth in 1610. They are particular predestination, limited atonement, natural inability, irresistible grace, and the perseverance of saints. The best special discussions of the Five Points are by Whitby (Lond., 1710) on the Arminian side, and Gill (Cause of God and Truth, 4 vols., London, 1735–38) and Jonathan Dickinson (Philadelphia, 1741) on the Calvinistic. See ARMINIANISM and CALVINISM.

FLACIUS (VLACICHI), Matthias, b. March 3, 1590, at Albona in Istriana (hence the surname Hyliricus); d. at Francfort, March 11, 1755; was very early sent to Venice to study ancient languages, and was about to enter a monastery and become a monk, when a relative of his, Baldus Lupetinus, provincial of the Minorites, advised him to go to Germany, and study theology there. He visited first Basel (1593), then Augsburg, and came in 1541 to Wittenberg, where he was kindly received by Luther and Melancthon; and in 1544 was appointed professor in Hebrew. He also lectured on the Epistles of Paul and on Aristotle; but his activity was suddenly interrupted by the outbreak of the Smalcaldian war. He fled to Brunswick, where he lived by teaching school; but, though he was recalled by the elector Maurice, the establishment of the Leipzig Interim drove him away again, and he settled at Magdeburg (1549), where printing and publication were still free. The literary activity he there developed against the Interim, in the adiaphoristic controversy and in the Osiander, Schwenkfeld, and Major controversies, was very comprehensive, and of great influence; but it placed him in direct opposition to Melancthon. And when, in 1557, he was appointed professor at Jena, together with Museus and Wagend, Jena became the headquarters of the strict Lutheran party, as Wittenberg was that of the Philippians. In the beginning he exercised great influence on the development of affairs in Saxony, but, having lost the confidence of the duke, he was discharged in 1561, and went to Regensburg. There he endeavored to found an academy, but his plans were frustrated by his enemies. In 1568 the magistrates of the city even withdrew their protection, and he was glad to accept an invitation to Antwerp. The progress, however, of the Spanish army, soon compelled him to leave that city; and he betook himself to Francfort. Meanwhile a somewhat hasty utterance of his raised the storm of persecution into a very whirlwind. In an essay accompanying his Clavis, he declared (1657) hereditary sin to be the very substance of human nature since the fall; and this untenable proposition was immediately made the basis for an accusation of Manicheism. Even his old friends from Jena, ultra-Lutherans like himself, attacked him in the harshest manner; and every thing he did in order to come to the defense of this intellectual vanity. Expelled from Francfort, he went to Strassbourg; expelled from Strassburg, too, he returned to Francfort, but was hardly allowed to die there.
FLAGELLANTS.

That there was something narrow and exclusive in his standpoint, something obstinate and bitter in his politics, no one doubts; that he was too ready to abandon the old and espouse the new, which overtook him may not have been altogether undeserved. But the great ability of the man, and the fundamental integrity of his character, are proven by his brilliant scientific performances,—the Catalogus testium veritatis, answering the Romanist's objection to the Reformation as a mere innovation; the Magdeburg Centuries, of which he was the originator and leading spirit (see Centuries, Magdeburg); and the Clavis scripturae sacrae, the basis of biblical hermeneutics.

The antipathy which for centuries has clung to his name is unjust. W. Preger has recently vindicated his memory by his excellent work, Matthias Flacci Illyricus und seine Zeit, Erlangen, 1859–61. [See also J. W. Schulte, Beitrag zur Entstehungsgeschichte d. Magdeburger Centurien, Nesse, 1871.]

FLAGELLANTS (Flagellants), Brothers of Flagellation, or shirt-bearers, were a religious sect that emerged during the Middle Ages, characterized by flagellation, or public self-punishment, as a form of penance. The movement was at its height in the fourteenth century, particularly in Italy, where it was known as the Flagellant movement.

The movement began in Provence in the early 13th century and spread throughout Europe. The Flagellants were a diverse group, including both clergy and laity, who sought to express their devotion through violent self-punishment, often taking the form of public processions and flagellation rituals.

The Flagellants believed that the punishment of their bodies would purify their souls and bring them closer to God. They believed that the sufferings of Christ were mirrored in their own self-inflicted pain, and they sought to imitate his sacrifice through their own flagellation.

The Flagellants' beliefs were often controversial, and they faced opposition from the Catholic Church and the authorities. The movement was eventually suppressed by the Church, and its followers were arrested and punished.

The Flagellants were a significant religious movement in the Middle Ages, and their influence can be seen in the development of certain aspects of popular religion and devotion. Their beliefs and practices continue to be studied and debated by scholars today.
FLAVEL.

FLAVEL, John, an eminent English Nonconformist divine, the son of a minister; b. in Worcestershire about 1607; d. in Exeter, June 28, 1691. He was educated at Oxford, and became curate of Deptford. From there he went to Dartmouth in 1656. By the Act of Uniformity he was deprived of his living, with two thousand others, and retired to Hudscott Hall, in Devonshire, where he was liberally supported by the lord of the domain. He preached privately in the woods and remote places, until, at the expulsion of the Stuarts, he returned to Dartmouth, and labored as pastor of the Nonconformist Church. Flavel was a prolific writer on practical religion; and some of his works are eminently adapted to stimulate piety. His principal works are: Husbandry Spiritualized; The Fountain of Life Opened up (in forty-two sermons); The Soul of Man; Exposition of the Assembly's Shorter Catechism; Seaman's Companion (in six sermons), etc. Complete edition of his works appeared, in 10 vols., at Nimes, 1782. His life was written by A. DELACROIX, Paris, 1865, 2 vols.

FLEETWOOD, William, a learned English prelate; b. in London, Jan. 21, 1650; d. at Tottenham, Middlesex, Aug. 4, 1723. He was educated at Cambridge; became Canon of Windsor 1702, Bishop of St. Asaph 1706, and was one of the most eloquent preachers of his day. A complete collection of his Sermons, Tracts, etc., appeared at London, 1737; Complete Works, 3 vols., Oxford, 1854.

FLESH (_alive) Biblical Meaning of. The Bible has different representations of man's material nature. The term "flesh" is always used with reference to man's body; so that Chrysostom's comment on Gal. v. 16 is any thing but precise,—"The flesh (alive) is not the body, nor the essence of the body, but the evil disposition, the earthly, lustful, and lawless reason." The same is true of Julius Muller's definition,—"The flesh is the tendency or inclination of human life turned away from God, the life and movement of man in the midst of the things of this visible world." The flesh is regarded as being endowed with mind, _šáma_: (Rom. viii. 9), desire, of lust, _léstikos_: (Gal. v. 16); and _šáma_: (Eph. ii. 3), etc. It cannot, therefore, stand for a disposition of the will. But as _kócuoc_ ("world") designates, not a tendency of the world hostile to God, but the world with that tendency, so _alive_ ("flesh") designates, not a tendency or... disposition of the flesh, but the flesh itself with that disposition.

Flesh is the substance of the body. It is sometimes used with the bones, as constituting the body (Luke xxiv. 39), or with blood (1 Cor. xv. 50). By synecdoche it is used for the body (Ps. xvi. 9; 2 Cor. x. 3). This use of the term is a Hebrew idiom, and is really foreign to the Greek; so that the LXX. often translate the Hebrew word פֱֶּלֶּשׁ ("flesh") by σῶμα ("body"). The expression "all flesh," is sometimes used for the race in its totality (Gen. vi. 17), but usually for the race as human (Gen. vi. 12; Luke iii. 6, etc.).

We are thus led to the peculiarity of the biblical use of the word. It designates man, because man appears through it, and manifests his nature by it. Thus, as flesh, he is weak and frail, "a wind that passeth away" (Ps. lxxviii. 39). Flesh is not spirit, nor vital power (Isa. xxxi. 3), but stands in living and moral contrast to spirit, the spirit of God (Deut. v. 29).

Flesh also indicates the peculiarity of man's visible nature. Thus, he is opposed to σάρξ, or spirit (Col. i. 5); and a distinguishing characteristic of the earthly life is that it is a "life in the flesh" (Phil. i. 22). To boast of the flesh means to build on man's visible nature. The sinfulness of the flesh is specially brought out in Paul (Rom. vii.). The expression "The Word was made flesh" (John i. 14) gets its force from the contrast with (ver. 1) "The Word was God." The same contrast is brought out in Ps. lvi. 5, 2 Chron. xxxii. 8, 2 Cor. xi. 4. The flesh then designates human nature as weak (Matt. xxvi. 41) and sinful in contrast to God.

The sinfulness of the flesh is specially brought out by Paul (Rom. viii. 3). In this sense he calls the body "a body of the flesh," σῶμα τῆς σαρκός (Col. ii. 11), and life a "walking in the flesh" (2 Cor. x. 3). But sinful flesh is not a disposition (Chrysostom and Müller), as above quoted, nor is it sufficient, with Neander, to define it as "human nature in its alienation from God," nor, with Holsten, to describe it as essentially finite and evil, so that in the Pauline theology sin was a necessity. The flesh is only the substance of the body, the seat of sin, but not originally evil: it is man's human or bodily nature, as Hofmann says (Schriftenweisen, i. 559), in the state in which it was left after the fall.

The flesh contains the germ of physical life (John i. 13, iii. 6); it is the essence: the body is the form. Sin now inheres in the flesh, and therefore all who are sons of Adam are sinners, because he was a sinner; and he who overcomes the flesh overcomes it by a conflict between the νοῦς ("mind") and the flesh, and thereby overcomes sin. Christ entered into the flesh with all the consequences of sin or the fall (Col. i. 22; Heb. ii. 14); but his own spiritual nature overcame, so to speak, at the very beginning, its disposition to sin.

neighborhood ringing a bell, that no one might be able to give as an excuse for non-attendance at church that he did awake early enough. Now he appeared suddenly at vulgar entertainments, and with Knox-like fearlessness preached to the astounded revellers upon the folly of forbidden pleasures. "Those sinners," says John Wesley, "that tried to hide themselves from him, he pursued to every corner of his parish by all sorts of means, public and private, early and late," etc. Great and blessed results necessarily followed from such fidelity. In 1708 he was called to preside over Lady Huntingdon's College at Breweca, Wales. He accepted the position, but did not leave his parish. Disagreements with the authorities on points of doctrine led him to resign in 1771, but no unpleasantness was connected with the resignation.

As a preacher, Fletcher directed his appeals to the conscience. He was well trained, and had a fine voice. J. Wesley said, that, if he had had physical strength, he would have been the most eloquent preacher in England. As a man, he was characterized by saintly piety, rare devotion to God, and blamelessness of life, which Wesley said he had not found equalled in Europe or America. In the judgment of Sonthey, "no age ever produced a man of more fervent piety, or more perfect charity, and no church ever possessed a more apostolic ministry;" and, according to Bishop Ryle, "his devotion has been equalled by few, and probably surpassed by none."

In theology, Fletcher was an Arminian of Arminians. Most of his writings are directed against Calvinism, were written to defend Mr. Wesley, and grew out of controversies with Toplady and Mr. Richard Hill. Some of these works are still extensively circulated, and are authorities in the Methodist churches. However, controversial as his writings are, Fletcher was not a polemic, but always treated his opponents with fairness and courtesy, and in this respect he presented a polemic, but always treated his opponents with FLEURY, a town with a celebrated abbey (Floriacum), situated in the diocese of Orléans, on the right bank of the Loire, and founded by Leodebad, Abbot of St. Aniane, in the first years of the reign of Chloderic II., 638–637. When the Lombards destroyed Monte Casino, Abbot Mummolum sent the monk Aigulf to Italy in order to bring the remains of St. Benedict to Fleuray. The expedition occurred, and the relics worked so many miracles, that the monks of them filled four big volumes (Floriacencis vetus bibliotheca Benedictina, etc., Opera Joannis a Bosco, Lugduni, 1605); and Fleuray became, as Leo VII. expressed it, caput ac primum omnium canonicorum. The Danes visited the place thrice. The first time the monks fled, and the vikings plundered the abbey; the second time the marauders were defeated and repulsed by the monks; and the third time St. Benedict himself appeared in person, and the heathen barbarians were converted to Christianity. Reformed by St. Odo, towards the close of the ninth century, the abbey rose to still greater distinction. Its library was one of the richest in the realm, and its school had at one time five thousand pupils; but it never produced any great scholars. During the Huguenot wars it suffered so much, that it lost its independence, and joined the Congregation of St. Maur.

FLEURY, Claude, b. in Paris, Dec. 6, 1640; d. there July 14, 1723; was educated by the Jesuits at Clermont; studied law in Paris, and practised as an advocate for nine years, but changed his career, was ordained priest in 1672, and lived from that time till his death at the court, as tutor, first to the Prince of Conti, then to the Count of Vermandois, and finally to the Dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berry, and as confessor to Louis XV. (1716–22). He was an ardent student and a prolific writer. He was made Abbé of Loc-Dieu (1684), member of the Academy (1696), prior of Argenteuil (1709), when he resigned his abby, and was throughout a friend of Fénelon. The results of his juridical studies came out in his Histoire du droit français (Paris, 1674, 1st ed., 1679) and Institution au droit civil (1692, lasting, 1810), and several other historical sketches of a pedagogical tendency. But his principal work is his Histoire ecclésiastique (Paris, 1691, 1st ed., 1714, but continued to 1414, but continued to 1584 by Claude Fabre, in 16 vols., 1722–30, with 4 vols. of indexes, 40 vols. in all), a work of considerable merit, designed for the educated public in general, and still read with satisfaction (Eng. trans. down to 1770, Lond., 1727–32, 5 vols.; and by Cardinal Newman, with notes, from the Second Ecumenical Council (381) to 436, Oxford, 1842–44, 3 vols.). Of his minor works, Éménée gave a collected edition, Opuscules de l'Abbé Fleury, Paris, 1807.

FLEIDNER, Theodor, D.D., the founder of the institution of Protestant deaconesses, b. Jan. 21, 1800, the son of a clergyman, at Eisleben, near Wiesbaden, and d. at Kaiserswerth, the scene of his labors, Oct. 4, 1864. He was a plain, unpretending German pastor, of great working power, indefatigable zeal, fervent piety, and rare talent of organization. Left an orphan at the age of thirteen, he studied at Giessen, Göttingen, and Herborn; was for one year tutor in a family at Cologne, and began to doubt his fitness for the ministry, when he received and accepted, in November, 1821, what he considered a providential call, with the promise of a salary of a hundred and eighty Prussian dollars, from a small Protestant colony at Kaiserswerth, a Roman-Catholic town of eighteen hundred inhabitants, on the Lower Rhine, below Düsseldorf. The failure of a silk manufactory, upon which the town depended largely for support, led him to undertake, in the spring of 1822, a collecting tour to keep his struggling congregation alive. By the end of a week he returned with twelve hundred thalers. This was the beginning of much greater things. By experience and perseverance he became one of the greatest beggars in the service of Christ. In the year 1823 he made a tour to Holland and England, which not only resulted in a permanent endowment of his congregation, but suggested to him the idea of his benevolent institutions. "In both these Protestant countries," he tells us himself, "I became acquainted with a multitude of charitable institutions for the benefit both of body and soul. I saw schools and other educational organizations, alms-houses, orphanages, hospitals, prisons, and societies for the reformation of prisoners, Bible and missionary societies, etc., and at the same time I observed that it was a living faith in Christ which had called almost every one of these institutions and societies into life, and still preserved them in activity. This evidence of the practical power and fertility of such a principle had a most powerful influence in strengthening my own faith." Fliedner made two more journeys to Holland, England, and Scotland (in 1832 and 1833), in the interest no more of his congregation, but of his institutions. He also visited the United States in 1848. Twice he travelled to the East, — in 1851 to aid Bishop Gobat in founding a house of deaconesses in Jerusalem, and again in 1857, when he was, however, too feeble to proceed farther than Jaffa. King Frederick William IV. of Prussia and his Queen Elizabeth took the most cordial interest in his labors for the sick and poor, granted him several audiences, furnished him liberally with means, and founded a Christian hospital, with deaconesses at Berlin (Bethany) after the model of Kaiserswerth. In the parsonage garden at Kaisersworth there still stands the little summer-house, with one room of ten feet square, and an attic over it, which was the first asylum for released female prisoners, and the humble cradle of all Fliedner's institutions, the most important of which is the institution of Evangelical Deaconesses, founded in 1836 on the basis of the apostolic precedent, and with some resemblance to the catholic sisterhoods of charity, but without binding vows. At his death the number of deaconesses in connection with Kaiserswerth and its branch establishments exceeded four hundred. In 1873 there were thirty-four houses, with over seventeen hundred deaconesses, teaching students and training sisters; in 1878 the number of institutions in Germany, Switzerland, France, Scandinavia, Russia, and Austria, rose to fifty-two, and the number of sisters to nearly four thousand, who labored on eleven hundred stations.

Floidoard, or Froboard, or Flavaldus, b. at Epernay in 894; d. March 28, 906; was canon at the cathedral of Rheims, and wrote a poem in hexameter, and in three parts, on the life of Christ, the exploits of the first martyrs, and the history of the popes; a chronicle (Annales) of his own time, from 910 to 966, best edition in Pertz, M. G. Script., III.; and a Historia Ecclesiae Remensis, first published by Sirmond, Paris, 1611. There is a collected edition of his works by Le Jeune, Rheims, 1854, also in Migne, Patrol., vol. CXXXV.

Florence, The Order of (Floriacenses, or Florenses, to be distinguished from Floriacum, the Latin name of the abbey of Fleury), was founded by Joachim, Abbot of Flore (Flor), in Calabria, (1111-30); which article see. The constitution of the order was confirmed by Celestine III. (1199), and its houses were richly endowed by Henry VI. and his wife Constance. It spread rapidly, and numbered many monasteries, not only in Calabria, but throughout Italy. Originally it rose as a branch of the Cistercian order; but its rules were more severe, and this circumstance gave Gregory IX. occasion to forbid the Cistercians to receive any Floriacensian into their order. The Cistercians became infuriated at this slight, and did their utmost to ruin the privileged rival: they finally succeeded. In the beginning of the sixteenth century the order of Flore disappeared. Most of the members joined the Cistercians; others, the Carthusians or the Dominicans. See Helyot, Histoire des ordres monastiques, Paris, 1714-19, 8 vols.

Florian, a martyr, and a saint in the Roman-Catholic Church, whose day falls on March 4. He was a soldier in the army of Diocletian (284-305), and was drowned in the Enns, because he openly confessed the Christian faith. On the spot where his corpse drifted ashore, a magnificent monastery was afterwards built. But his remains were brought to Rome, where they rested until 1168, when Pope Lucius III. presented them to King Stephen of Casimir of the Hungarians. Thus St. Florian became the patron saint of Poland.

Florus (not Drepanius, surnamed Magister, on account of his great learning; or Diacus, from his ecclesiastical position), lived at Lyons in the ninth century, and took a prominent part in the dogmatical controversies of his time. A decided adversary of Paschasius Radbertus's doctrine of transubstantiation, he taught that there is no other participation in the body and blood of Christ than that through faith, and calls the bread the mystical body of the Lord. See his Expositio in Canon. Missae, written before 894, and first printed in Paris, 1548, though without his name. In the controversy concerning predestination he wrote his Liber adversus Joh. Scoti errores definitiones (852) and Sermo de predestinatione, though without fully adopting the ideas of Gottschalk. He was present at the first synod convened in the case by Hilmar, at Chiersy, 849. In the controversy between Agobard and Amalarius he wrote a number of passionate letters, which made much noise in their time. They are found in Bibl. Patr. Magz., XV., and, together with his other essays, in Migne, Patrol. Latin., 110. His most comprehensive work, a commentary on the Epistles of Paul, was soon completed, and its due development. It was formerly ascribed to Bede, and is found in the Basel and Cologne editions of his works; but Florus's authorship has been conclusively proved by Mabillon. [F. MAASSEN: Ein Commentar des Florus von Lyon zu einigen d. sogennannten Sermoidenschen Constitutionen, Wien, 1879.] G. PLITT.

FLORUS, Gessius, succeeded Albinus in 64 A.D. as Roman governor of Judæa, and caused by his rapine and tyranny that insurrection which led to the destruction of the temple in Jerusalem, and the annihilation of the national independence of the Jews. What finally became of Florus himself is not known; but vivid descriptions of his nefarious rule in Judea are found in Josephus (Antiq., XX. 9, and De Bello Jud., II. 24, 25) and in Tacitus (Hist., V. 10).

FLÖE, Niklaus von, generally known under the name of Bruder Klaus, was b. at Flueli, in the canton of Unterwalden, Switzerland, March 21, 1417; and d. in his hermit's cell at Ranft, close by his native place, March 21, 1487. He grew up without receiving any other education than that which naturally resulted from active participation in the business of the home. Nevertheless, he soon grew very well, both in body and mind, and became a judge. In 1450 he married. He had ten children in seventeen years; and he was known as an energetic, prudent, and tender house-father. Nevertheless the whole bent of his nature was towards a life of seclusion and devout contemplation, and spent the rest of his life. To the greatest esteem, reverence which all who knew him felt for him, was soon added a tide of the miraculous. People told of him that he never ate. Pilgrimages were made to his cell. Everybody wanted his advice; and he exercised great influence in the surrounding country, not only in general by his example, but in numerous special cases by his exhortations or warnings. At the diet of Stanz (1491) he actually saved the confederation from civil war, and brought about an agreement on that constitution under which Switzerland lived until the close of the eighteenth century. After his death, his countrymen made the greatest exertions to have him canonized. But a canonization is a very expensive affair; and in spite of subscriptions, heavy taxes, etc., nothing more than a beatification could be obtained from Clement IX., 1689.

Lit. — The literature concerning Bruder Klaus is very great. A complete list of it may be found in E. L. ROCHELZ, Schweizerlegende von B. K., Aranu, 1876, pp. 255–306. The best biography of him is that by JON. MING, 3 vols., Luzern, 1861–71.

FONSECA, Pedro da, b. at Cortizada, Portugal, 1528; d. at Coimbra, Nov. 4, 1599; entered the order of Jesuits in 1548; studied at Evora, and became professor at Coimbra. Among his works are an early commentary on the metaphysics of Aristotle (4 vols., Rome, 1577–89), and Institutiones dialectice (Lisbon, 1564), etc. He was the first who taught the doctrine of a scientia media Dei (i.e., what God might have done, but did not), which afterwards received its name, three hundred years, and its influence, under the hands of Molina.

FONT, The Baptismal, originally a cistern, rather beneath the level of the floor of the baptistery, surrounded by a low wall, and entered by steps; afterwards a vessel for containing water used at the administration of baptism. The form of the font, whether a cistern or a vessel, was generally the octagon, with reference to the eighth verses in their time. They are found in Bibl. Patr. Lat., and are also found. In the Western Church the fonts were generally made of some fine marble, and often highly ornamented: in the Eastern Church they were made of metal or wood, and generally without any ornamentation. See art. Font, in Smith and Cheetham, Dict. Chr. Antiq., and art. Baptism, in this Cyclopaedia, p. 208.

FONTÉVRAUD, The Order of (Ordo Fontis Ebraldi), was founded by Robert of Arbrissel (the present Arbrasse), b. 1047; d. 1117. After acting for some years as administrator of the bishopric of Rennes, and teaching theology for some other years at Angers, Robert retired into the forest of Craon, and settled there as a hermit. Others joined him; and in 1050 he formed a community of regular canons, out of which afterwards grew the abbey De la Roc, or De rota. Selected by Urban II. to go through the country, and preach penance, the overwhelming impression he made, especially on women, led to the foundation of a large great monastery institution of Fontevraud. It comprised, under the title of pauperes Christi, a male and a female division. The former was dedicated to St. John: the latter consisted of three subdivisions, of which the first was dedicated to the Holy Virgin, and contained three hundred virgins and widows; the second to St. Lazarus, containing a hundred and twenty lepers; and the third to Magdalene, containing a number of female penitents. The whole institution stood under a female head: its first abbess was Petronella of Craon-Chemillé. But the separation between the two sexes was complete, and the rules for both divisions very severe,— perpetual silence, total abstinence from flesh and wine, etc. In 1106 Paschal II. confirmed the constitution of the order: in 1109 Calixtus II., in person, consecrated the church. At the death of Robert, the monastery numbered three thousand monks; and the number rose still higher. Indeed, the institution was still flourishing when it was dissolved by the Revolution. The buildings were transformed into a jail; and the last abbesse, Charlotte de Pardaillan, died in destitution, in Paris, 1799. See Bayses et constit., de l'ordre de Fontevrault, Paris, 1845; Nicer, de l'ordre de Font., Paris, 1643; J. de la Mainferme: Clypeus Fontebaldensis, Paris, 1864 (an apologetic work).

TH. PRESSEL.

FOOT-WASHING, an ancient act of hospitality (Gen. xviii. 4; Judg. xix. 21; 1 Sam. xxv. 41, etc.), made necessary in Palestine by the dry climate, dusty roads, and the fact that sandals, covering only the sole of the foot, were worn. Our Lord, the night before his crucifixion, washed the feet of his disciples, and wiped them (John xii. 1–17), and commanded his disciples to do likewise (xiii. 14). This is usually interpreted to mean that they should emulate his spirit of ministration and humility. It has, however, been taken literally. Upon the basis of this passage and of 1 Tim. v. 10, in which one of the conditions of being admitted to the presidency of a bishop is that she have "washed the saints' feet," the Roman and Greek churches and the Tunkers still practise the rite.

Augustine (Ep. ad Januarium) refers to the ceremony of foot-washing as taking place on Maundy-Thursday (the Thursday before Easter). The synod of Toledo, in 691, went so far as to exclude from the communion-table those who refused to have their feet washed on this day. Bernard of Clairvaux even sought to have it excluded from the communion-table, where they could wash their entire body. By Marinus of Tours, a native of Rome; was made Cardinal-Bishop of Porto in 864 by Nicholas I., and, both by him and by Adrian II., employed in many important missions, but was by John VIII. deprived of his ecclesiastical position, and even excommunicated, April 19, 876, on account, as it was said, of participation in a conspiracy against Charles the Bald and the holy father himself. By Marinus he was restored, however, to his former dignity; and at the death of Stephen VI. he succeeded to the papal chair, the first instance in the Western Church of the transfer of a bishop from one see to another. On account of the almost complete dissolution of the Frankish Empire, the Pope found it necessary at this period to lean upon some of the native Italian princes; and Wido, Duke of Spoleto, was crowned emperor, together with his son Lambert. But it soon became apparent that dependence upon a neighbor was too dangerous; and Formosus, therefore, called the German king, Arnulf, into Italy, and crowned him emperor. Immediately after Arnulf's return to Germany, Formosus died; and Lambert now entered Rome, and took his revenge by the aid of FORBES, John, a Scottish divine; was b. at Aberdeen, 1593; d. March 28, 1635. He was made Bishop of Aberdeen 1618. His principal work was, An Exquisite Commentary on the Revelation, Lond., 1613. See the Biographical Memoir prefixed to The Funeral Sermons, Orationis, etc., on the Death of the Right Rev. Patrick Forbes, D.D. (1635), edited by C. F. Shand, Edinb., 1845.

FORBES, William, a learned Scottish divine; was b. at Aberdeen, 1585; d. April 1, 1634. Charles I., on a visit to Edinburgh (1633), was much pleased with his preaching, and made him First Bishop of Edinburgh, January, 1634. His work, Considerations Modeste de Justificatione, etc., first published in Lond., 1658, was reprinted in the Library of Angli-Catholic Theology, Oxford, 1850–52, 2 vols.

FOREIRO, Francisco, b. at Lisbon, 1523; d. at Almada, Jan. 10, 1587; entered the Dominican order; studied theology in Paris; and was, after his return in 1540, appointed court-preacher in Lisbon. He distinguished himself as one of the Portuguese delegates to the Council of Trent (1561), and was appointed a member of the committee charged with the compilation of a Roman-Catholic Catechism, with the revision of the Missal, and with the compilation of the Index. Most of his writings—commentaries on the Books of the Old Testament, a Hebrew dictionary, etc.—still remain in the Latin script.

FORMOSUS, Pope (Sept. 21, 891–April 4, 896), a native of Rome; was made Cardinal-Bishop of Porto in 864 by Nicholas I., and, both by him and by Adrian II., employed in many important missions, but was by John VIII. deprived of his ecclesiastical position, and even excommunicated, April 19, 876, on account, as it was said, of participation in a conspiracy against Charles the Bald and the holy father himself. By Marinus he was restored, however, to his former dignity; and at the death of Stephen VI. he succeeded to the papal chair, the first instance in the Western Church of the transfer of a bishop from one see to another. On account of the almost complete dissolution of the Frankish Empire, the Pope found it necessary at this period to lean upon some of the native Italian princes; and Wido, Duke of Spoleto, was crowned emperor, together with his son Lambert. But it soon became apparent that dependence upon a neighbor was too dangerous; and Formosus, therefore, called the German king, Arnulf, into Italy, and crowned him emperor. Immediately after Arnulf's return to Germany, Formosus died; and Lambert now entered Rome, and took his revenge by the aid of Formosus's successor, Stephen VII. The corpse of the late pope was dug up from the grave, and seated in the papal chair; and then a synod was held, accusatory (of his III., and John X.), recognized the proceedings of the synod, while others (Theodore II., John IX., and Benedict IV.) declared them null and void; a circumstance which presents an embarrassing argument in the question of papal infallibility. See the writings of Auxilius and Vulgarius, in MABILLON (Analecta Vetera, Paris, 1728) and in DÜMMELER (Auzilius und Vulgarius, Leipzig, 1860). R. ZÖPFFEL.

FORSTER, Johann, b. at Augsburg, July 10, 1495; d. at Wittenberg, Dec. 8, 1560; studied Greek and Hebrew at Ingolstadt, under Reuchlin, and the Law at the University of Vienna. He became one of Luther's favorite pupils, aided him in translating the Old Testament, and was, on his recommendation, made preacher in Augsburg, 1533. But in Augsburg, as afterwards in Tubingen and in other places, his strict and exclusive Lutheranism brought him in conflict with his colleagues. In 1518 he was made professor in Hebrew at Wittenberg. His great work is his Dictionarium Hebraicm Novum, published at Basel, after his death, 1557.

FORTIFICATIONS AMONG THE HEBREWS. In general each place was surrounded by a wall; but municipal places had fortifications containing garrisons, especially in times of war (2 Chron. xvii. 2). Thus Jerusalem was fortified by David (2 Sam. v. 7, 9), and the work of its fortification continued in later times (2 Chron. xxii. 5). Solomon also built forts throughout the land (1 Kings ix. 15, 17 sq.; 2 Chron. viii. 5); and their number was increased as necessity required it, especially after the exile and during the Jewish war. Among them were Masada and Machaerus. Such fortified places were surrounded by one, sometimes by double or triple, walls (2 Chron. xxix. 9), with bulwarks (xxvi. 13) and towers, sited every 200 feet. Over the gateways, which were closed by ponderous doors, and secured by wooden or metallic bars, were watch-towers, and around the walls was a ditch. Besides these large fortresses, there were also castles or citadels, as well as forts. In the forests and in the open fields watch-towers were also found.

During the war, in case a city thus fortified would not surrender voluntarily, a siege was laid against it, and operations began, whereby the wall could be approached (2 Sam. xx. 15; 2 Kings xix. 6, 8, 24; Ezek. xxvi. 8 sq.). After this the battering-rams were set against it. That the besieged did not remain idle, but endeavored to prevent the approach of the enemy, we see from passages like Isa. xxii. 10; Jer. xxxix. 4, 2 Sam. xi. 21, 24, 2 Chron. xxvi. 10; and thus it happened that strongly fortified places were not so easily taken. Thus Ashdod was besieged twenty-nine years, Samaria three years (2 Kings xvii. 5), Jerusalem a year and a half (xxvi. 1, 2). But cities taken were razed to the ground, and their inhabitants killed, or sold as slaves. If they capitulated, they were more leniently dealt with (Deut. xx. 11 sq.; 1 Macc. xiii. 15 sq.). The Chaldeans were the most famous besiegers of antiquity.

FORTUNATUS, Venantius Honorius Clemensianus, b. about 530 at Treviso; d. at Poitiers about 600; studied grammar and rhetoric at Ravena; lived for some time at the court of Sigibert, king of Austrasia, whose favor he won by his poetry; repaired thence to Tours, and afterwards to Poitiers, where he settled in a monastery founded by the divorced wife of Clothaire I., the learned Radegund; entered finally the service of the church, and became Bishop of Poitiers about 559. His fame, however, he acquired as a poet; and he is, indeed, the last great poet of the period before Charlemagne. He wrote epics (among which is the life of St. Martin, in hexameters, based on the works of Sulpicius Severus), lyrics (especially hymns), epistles, epigrams, didactic and descriptive poems, etc. The two most celebrated in his hymns are Vexilla regis prodeunt et Pange, lingua, gloriosi; of which Neale's translations are found in SCHAFF'S CHIST in New York, 1869. The best edition of his works is that by Luchi, Rome, 1786, in 2 vols. 4to, incorporated with MIGNE, PatroL Latin., vols. lxxii. and lxxvii. See EBERT: Geschichte d. latein. christ. Literatur bis zum Zeititer Karl d. Grossen, Leipzig, 1874, pp. 494–516.

FOSCARARI (Egidius Foscherarius), b. at Bologna, Jan. 27, 1512; d. in Rome, Dec. 23, 1564; entered early the Dominican order; preached, and taught theology, in various cities of Italy; and was appointed Magister sacri palatii by Paul III. in 1546, and Bishop of Modena in 1550 by Julius III. In 1551 he was sent to the Council of Trent, and when (April 28, 1552) its meetings were suspended he returned to his episcopal see. Under Paul IV. (in 1555) he was accused of heresy, and imprisoned in the Castle St. Angelo. Though the Inquisition could prove no heresy against him, he was not released until after Paul's death. By Pius IV. he was once more sent to the Council of Trent, and made a member of the Committee on the Catechism and the Revision of the Missal.

FOSTER, John, a Baptist clergyman and eminent essayist; b. in Halifax, Yorkshire, Sept. 17, 1770; d. at Stapleton, near Bristol, Oct. 15, 1843. He engaged in weaving wool till he was seventeen. How he secured his primary education is unknown. Becoming a member of the Baptist Church at this time, he determined to study for the ministry; entered Brearly Hall, and subsequently passed into the Baptist College, Bristol. In 1792 he preached for three months at Newcastle-on-Tyne; passed from there to Dublin, and in 1797 was invited to become pastor of the Baptist Church, Chichester, where he remained till 1800, when he was called to Downend. From here, in 1804, he removed to Frome. A throat trouble obliged him to resign in 1806. The year before, he published his essays, and became contributor to The Electric Magazine. In 1817 he determined to take up pastoral work again, and went back to Downend, but remained only six months. He was frequently called upon to lecture, and preached at intervals, until his death in 1843. Foster was a man of very delicate sensibilities, reserved disposition, and humility of Christian character. He was not successful as a preacher; but as an essayist he excels in vividness of imagination, penetration of thought, and earnest sincerity. Writing was, however, a laborious task to him, and he is said to have spent several days in the elaboration of a single paragraph. His friend Robert Hall said of him, "His conceptions are most extraordinary and original." Foster's principal work is Essays on Decision of Character, which has passed through many editions. Other works are, Evils of Popular Ignorance (1840), patriotic notes (1845), Lectures delivered at Broadmead Chapel (2 series, 1844–47), a hundred and eighty-five contributions to The Electric Review, and Observations on the Character of Mr. Hall as a Preacher. See Ryland: Life and Correspondence of J. Foster, 1846, republished in Boston, 1851; W. W. Evert: Life and Thoughts of J. Foster, New York, 1849.

FOX, George. This great reformer, a man of original genius and deep spiritual discernment, was b. in July, 1624, at Drayton-in-the-Clay, now called Fenny Drayton, in Leicestershire. His father, Christopher Fox, was a weaver, called "righteous Christopher" by his neighbors; his mother, Mary Lago, was, as he tells us, "of the stock of the martyrs." From childhood, Fox was of a serious, religious disposition. "When I came to eleven years of age," he says (Journal, p. 2), "I knew pureness and righteousness; for, while I was a child, I was taught how to walk to be kept pure. The Lord taught me to be faithful in all things, and to act faithfully two ways; viz., inwardly to God and outwardly to man; . . . and that my words should be few and savory, seasoned with grace; and that I might not eat and drink to make myself wanton, but for health, because Fox had bidden the justicesto "tremble at the word of God." He was imprisoned at Darby in 1650, Carlisle in 1653, London in 1654, Lancaster in 1656, Lancaster in 1660 and 1663, Scarborough in 1660, and Worcester in 1674, in noiseous dungeons, and with much attendant cruelty. In prison his pen was active, and hardly less potent than his voice. In 1660 Fox married Margaret Fell of Swarthmore Hall, a lady of high social position, and one of his early converts. In 1671 he went to Barbadoes and the English settlements in America, where he remained two years. In 1672 he attended the Yearly Meeting at Newport, R.I., which lasted for six days. At the end of this meeting he says, "It was somewhat hard for Friends to part; for the glorious power of the Lord, which was over all, and his blessed truth and life flowing amongst them, had so knit and united them together, that they spent two days in taking leave one of another, and of the Friends of the island." In 1677 and 1684 he visited the Friends in Holland, and organized their meetings for discipline. He died in London, Nov. 13, 1690, having preached with great power two days before, and was buried on the 16th, in the Friends' Ground, near Bunhill Fields.

Fox is described by Thomas Ellwood, the friend of Milton, as "graceful in countenance, manly in personage, grave in gesture, courteous in conversation." Penn says he was "civil beyond all the 16th, in the Friends' Ground, near Bunhill Martyrs; was b. in Boston, Lincolnshire, 1517; of Milton, as "graceful in countenance, manly in personage, grave in gesture, courteous in conversation," but never received a word in due season to the conditions and capacities of most, especially to hº in that were weary, and wanted soul's rº: valiant in asserting the truth, bold in defºng it, patient in suffering for it, immovable at a rock."

THOMAS CHASE

(President of Haverford College).

FOX (or FOXE), John, author of the Book of Martyrs; was b. in Boston, Lincolnshire, 1517; d. April 15, 1587. He was educated at Oxford, and became fellow of Magdalen College, where he applied himself to the diligent study of church history. He espoused Protestant sentiments, and for this was expelled from his college. He became tutor in Sir Thomas Lucy's family, and then to the children of the Earl of Surrey, but was obliged to seek refuge from persecution on the Continent. He went to Basel, where he laid the plan of the work which has given him fame. At the elevation of Elizabeth he returned to England, but never received higher position than that of prebend of Salisbury Cathedral. Called by Archbishop Parker to subscribe to the canons, he refused, and holding up a Greek Testament, said, "To this will I subscribe." He was fearless in the avowal of his convictions, and petitioned the queen earnestly but unsuccessfully to spare him his own. The Roman Catholic seºs: but it has no primate of its own. The primary of Aquitania, or even that of the whole Gaul, is, like the pallium, which pertains to certain sees (for instance, to that of Autun), a distinction of rank only, not of dignity, still less of power. Though five of the archbishops are cardinals (Bordeaux, Cambray, Paris, Rennes, and Rouen), they have as such no special authority in the country. Each bishop is the sole and proper chief of his diocese, and maintains direct communication with the State and with the Pope. Apostolic equality between the bishops is the first maxim of the French Church. The bishop governs his diocese independently, restrained only by the general ecclesiastical laws and the will of the Pope. He arranges the whole course of theological education, lays out the programme of study, selects the textbooks, chooses the professors: he ordains, appoints, and discharges the priests, founds or confirms all religious associations, calls or installs the ecclesiastics who teach in the State schools, excommunicates and re-admits, etc.

In the administration of his diocese the bishop is aided by vicar-generals, secretaries, a court, and a chapter. The number of vicar-generals varies with the size of the diocese. The government pays two, or sometimes three. Their title is vicaires généraux titulaires, and their number 157. Others are appointed by the bishop himself, but only for the internal affairs of the church. Their title is vicaires généraux honoraires, and their number may be larger. Of secretaries, the government pays 133. The episcopal court, whose competency, by Code Napoléon, is confined to matrimonial affairs and church-discipline, is composed of an official, a vice-official, one or more assessors, a promoteur, and a greffier; but all the members hold other offices at the same time. The chapter has also lost its former importance. It is divided into three classes,—chanoines d'honneur, titulaires, and honoraires; but only the second class is paid by the State, and has any practical significance. It takes care of the service, and numbers 763.

The lower clergy consists of curés, desservants, and vicaires. The curés are priests of the curés, or parish priests, paid by the State, and appointed by the bishop; though their appointment must be confirmed by the government. In 1876 they numbered 3,440. The desservants are priests of the succursales, or subordinate parishes, and are appointed and dismissed by the bishop alone (ad nutum amovibility). Though they are only a kind of help to the curés, the latter have no authority over them, only a right of superintendence with report to the bishop. The number of desservants is 31,191. The vicaires, finally, who act only as assistants to the curés and desservants, number 11,679. As in the large cities the service of the mass requires a greater number of officials, the State pays 4,423 prêtres habituels for this purpose. Adding furthermore the almoners of the lyceums, colleges, normal schools, hospitals, and asylums (who are appointed by the respective administrations), but stand under the authority of the bishop), the clergy of the army, the navy, and the colonies, the teachers and pupils in the theological seminaries, etc., the total number of the clergy recognized and paid by the State amounts to 65,750. The budget of 1877 allowed 51,526, the episcopal court 13,234, the churches 13,234, and the diocesan institutions 7,538. The budget of 1876 allowed 31,920, 4,975, and 3,545 for the same purposes. The bishops, who are paid by the State, number 224. The clergy recognized and paid by the State amounts to 224 Congrégations & succursales, or subordinate parishes, and are appointed and dismissed by the bishop alone (ad nutum amovibility). Though they are only a kind of help to the curés, the latter have no authority over them, only a right of superintendence with report to the bishop. The number of desservants is 31,191. The vicaires, finally, who act only as assistants to the curés and desservants, number 11,679.

(a) The religious associations consist of two groups,—the religious orders, properly speaking, whose members separate from the world, and bind themselves by a vow; and the religious societies, whose members remain in the world, and undertake certain works of charity, without binding themselves by a vow.

By the laws of Feb. 13, 1790, and Aug. 18, 1793, the religious orders were abolished in France. Napoleon, however, by a decree of Feb. 18, 1809, allowed the re-establishment of communities of female nurses; though reserving to himself the right of examining their statutes, fixing the number of members, etc. He also gave his consent to the re-establishment of female communities with educational purposes; and from that time the religious orders gradually crept into the country, half permitted, half tolerated. Though a decree of March 18, 1836, formally declared that the government would never allow the establishment of a community whose aim was a merely contemplative life, the congregations, nevertheless, contrived to set apart for this purpose a portion of their members. It is very difficult, however, to obtain complete and reliable statistics on this field. There is a general report from 1861. — Statistique de France, Strasbourg, 1864, the result of the general census of 1861; and there is a more special report, — État des congrégations, communautés et associations religieuses autorisées ou non autorisées, laid before the legislative assembly in 1878. Both are valuable documents, but neither is complete. A comparison between these two reveals the interesting fact, that while, in 1877, 11,084 of all the members, male and female, of the religious orders in France were only 108,110, in 1879 risen to 158,040. This last figure, however, is not correct any longer, since the law of 1879 made the confirmation by the State necessary to the legal existence of any association whatever; and disobedience to this law caused the expulsion of the Jesuits, Benedictines, Dominicans, etc.

The female associations which have been confirmed by the State comprise 224 Congrégations à supérieure générale proprement dites, organized for the whole country, namely, 11 for nursing, 58 for education, and 153 both for nursing and education, with 2,450 houses and 69,215 sisters; 35 Congrégations diocésaines à supérieure générale, organized only for some special diocese, namely, 6 for nursing, 6 for education, and 23 both for nursing and education, with 102 houses and 3,794 sisters; and 644 Communautés à supérieure locale indépendantes, namely, 312 for education, 159 for nursing, 157 both for education and nursing, and 19 for a contemplative life, with 16,741 sisters. The total number of members of these associations is 113,750, to which must be added, according to the report of 1878, 14,003 sisters belonging to religious orders not recognized by the State. The names of the principal orders of the first kind are, Filles de la Charité de S. Vincent de Paul, numbering 9,130 members, with 89 stations; Petites Sœurs des Pauvres, founded at St. Servan, in Bretagne, in 1840, by Abbé le Poilleur, and numbering 2,955 members, with 184 stations; Filles de Sagesse, founded at St. Tropez, in 1848, by Abbé Dumas, and numbering 1,832 members, with 35 stations; Sœurs de S. Joseph, numbering 2,520 members, with 155 stations, etc. See Calmette, Traité de l'administration des associations religieuses, 1877.

Only 32 male associations have obtained the confirmation of the State; the reason being, that according to the law of Jan. 2, 1817, the chief of the State can confirm a female association by a simple decree, while a male association must be recognized by the legislative assembly. Among the legalized associations two are devoted to work in the seminaries,—Congrégation de S. Lazare (numbering 1,195 members) and Compagnie des prêtres de S. Sulpice (numbering 200 members); and three are devoted to missionary work,—Congrégation des Missions étrangères (with 480 members), Congrégation de S. Esprit (with 515 members), and Congrégation de S. Sulpice de Sales (with 28 members). The total number of members belonging to these 32 associations is 22,843. In certain respects, however, the associations which never sought and never obtained the sanction of the civil government were of much more importance,—the Jesuits, Benedictines, Dominicans, Carthusians, Franciscans, etc. The Jesuits returned to France with the Bourbon Restoration, and from that time their influence has been steadily increasing up to 1879, in which year they possessed 58 houses, with 1,471 inmates. The Benedictines numbered 239 members, in 15 houses; the Dominicans 303, in 21 houses; the Trappists 1,139, in 17 houses, etc. But, as all turned by consideration of the state of the nation, the State's legalization of their existence, the houses were broken up in 1830, and the inmates expelled.

Among the lay associations, especially two have acquired great celebrity; namely, Société de St. Vincent de Paul and Société de St. François Régis. The former devoted itself, besides, to other kinds of charity,—to guarding the youth from temptation and seduction; and in 1832 no less than 131,000 young persons stood under its protection. The latter devoted itself to the regulation of unhappy matrimonial affairs; and from 1829 to 1835 it treated no less than 4,471 cases. In 1870 these two associations were united in one, which holds its annual convention in May or April, in Paris. The clergy exercises, of course, a great influence in the working of this great society; but the president's chair is always occupied by a layman. Another lay association of great importance is Société de Foi, in Lyons, devoted to missionary work. It has about six millions of francs a year at its disposal, and publishes Annales de la propagande de la Foi and Les Missions catholiques, which appear at Lyons, the former in eight, the latter in four languages. See Manuel des œuvres et institutions religieuses et charitables, Paris, 1877.

(c) From of old the Christian clergy has considered the education of the children of the Christian congregation their duty and their privilege; and the French clergy has, in the face of a strong opposition, steadily endeavored to bring this whole field under their authority. They were already near their goal, when the so-called Ferry Laws of 1879 entirely reversed the state of affairs. The effect of those laws cannot yet be exactly stated; but a fair estimate may be formed by considering the content of the laws, and the state of affairs before their issue.

With respect to the primary schools (in which free instruction is given), the latest statistics are found in A. LEGOY, La France et l'étranger, études de statistique comparée, Paris, 1870. Of primary schools maintained by the State, 35,348 schools for boys, or for boys and girls, with 1,086,441 pupils, had lay teachers; while 2,038 schools with 412,832 pupils had teachers from the congregations. Connected with these schools were 4,818 supplementary schools for apprentices. Since 1875 it is required that 1,005 inmates be under lay, and 1,008 with 15,065 inmates under clerical leadership. Of 14,059 schools for girls, 5,098 with 317,342 pupils had lay teachers; while 8,961 with 697,195 pupils had teachers from the Congregations. Of 1,192 boarding-schools for girls, 1,089 teachers fared no better. The teachers belonging to the recognized associations, and numbering 22,709, were as yet not interfered with; but the article in the future be subjected to the same examinations as lay teachers, instead of simply obtaining an episcopal certificate.

II. The Protestant Churches. The constitutions of the Reformed and Lutheran churches rest on the law of April 7, 1802, completed and somewhat modified by the law of March 26, 1839. Each congregation has its presbytery, whose lay members are elected by universal suffrage. Above the presbytery stands the consistory, one for each six thousand souls, and consisting of the ministers and representatives of the presbyteries. The consistory chooses its own president; but he must be a clergyman, and obtain the confirmation of the government. Five consistories were destined to form a provincial synod in the Reformed, and an inspection in the Lutheran Church. The provincial synods, however, were never formed, nor was the Reformed Church allowed to convene its general synod until 1872. The Lutheran Church was in this respect more fortunate. It formed its inspections, and obtained in its directory a centre of organization, to which the power of appointing the ministers was confided, without any restrictions from the side of the consistories or the congregations. The Reformed Church comprises 100 consistories (one for each 4,675 souls), and the Lutheran 6 (one for each 13,373 souls). The State pays 616 Reformed ministers (one for each 759 souls), and 64 Lutheran (one for each 4,675 souls). The budget of 1877 allowed 1,450,000 francs for the expenses of the Protestant churches; but this sum was overrun by 20,000 francs.

For the historical development of the French churches see the arts. FRANKS, GALICANISM, GAUL, HUGUENOTS, etc.

The above is a condensation of the articles by Alb. Matter and C. Pfender in Herzog, in some cases supplemented with more recent statistics.

FRANCE, Protestantism in, since the Revolution. At the outbreak of the Revolution the number of Protestants in France, including the Lutherans of Alsace, amounted to about eight hundred thousand; but their religion was not recognized by the State. They were excluded from all civil offices: as they mostly lived in small groups, dispersed all over the country, they were prevented from exercising any appreciable social influence, and had to submit to numberless petty chicaneries from the surrounding Roman-Catholic population; and, though the churches of the Desert were generally conunpli at, actual persecutions occurred now and then. In this state of affairs the edict of toleration brought a change in 1757; and, as the Protestants could not fail recognizing a movement towards liberation in the dawning Revolution, they joined it with eagerness. There sat nine Protestant pastors in the Constituent Assembly. A decree of Dec. 24, 1789, made the Protestants eligible to all civil offices, and another, of Dec. 25, 1790, restored the state of affairs the edict of toleration brought a persecution. Now and then, in this of the Desert were generally connived at, actual prevente from exercising any appreciable property confiscated by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. It was an era of the age, which, indeed, though none as yet attacked it, most had ceased to understand. Religion regained rapidly in the nineteenth century what it had lost in the eighteenth. But a crisis like the French Revolution cannot be gone through without making all the old forms more or less unfit for use. A movement was necessary; but it was a misfortune that it should come from without, and come at a moment when the Church was bereft of its principal organ of authority, the national synod.

The first who attempted the evangelization of France were disciples of Wesley. In 1700 they founded several small missionary stations in Normandy and Bretagne; but during the reign of Napoleon their activity was almost ceased. After the battle of Waterloo, however, they immediately resumed work, and a church was built at Cherbourg. They labored with prudence and moderation; but it was, nevertheless, easy to see, that, if they succeeded, the result of their labor would be the establishment of a number of independent churches, and the breaking-up of the Reformed Church of France. In 1825 Guizot characterized the situation as merely involving a difference between those who looked at the primitive, and those who looked at the progressive, in the common religion. But the characteristic was too mild: independent churches were at that moment formed or forming in Lyons, Havre, Strassburg, St. Etienne, etc. In 1834 the consistory of Paris took some steps in order to organize an authoritative representation of the Reformed Church of France, and thereby procure a revision of her organic law. In 1839 the minister of worship and public instruction made a similar attempt, but both in vain; and when, finally, an unofficial synod was assembled in 1848, the actual split took place. There were at that moment three parties within the Church: one, the Latitudinarians, whose principal object was the maintenance of the national Church; another, the Revivalists, who considered a separation unavoidable when the cause of true religion should be truly served; and a third, which considered it possible to reach the object of the Revivalists by the means of the Latitudinarians. The synod assembled Sept. 11, 1848; but when the assembly altogether refused to attempt the establishment of a clear and positive confession of faith, F. Monod and Count Gasparin retired, and in- vited, a month later, the Protestant Church to meet at a new synod held the following year. At this synod, which assembled Aug. 29, 1849, thirteen churches perfectly constituted, and eighteen churches in process of formation, were represented; an explicit confession of faith was adopted, and the Union des Eglises ecclésiiques de France.
was constituted. The imperial decree of March 26, 1832, made considerable changes in the organization of the church in France (thus it gave back to the parishioners the right to elect their pastor); but on the development of the internal life of the Church it had no influence. The last hope of healing the split was the convocation of a national synod such as had not met since that of Le Mans, 1594; and, in June, 1872, the thirteenth national synod met in Paris, but not under the most favorable auspicies. All relations had ceased for several years between the orthodox and the liberal; and the incessant polemics had caused many to entirely forget that they were members of the same church. A vehement debate arose on the question of the confession of faith. By a vote of sixty-one against forty-five, a short confession was adopted, and its subscription made obligatory on all youn g pastors. But the result of this vote was, that, when the synod assembled in a second session (Nov. 20, 1873), the seats of the left stood empty, and the liberal party was represented only by a protest laid on the table. There was, however, on both sides, among the orthodox as well as among the liberals, a strong feeling against a schism, even though it might be affected without the separating party losing any of the advantages which accrue to the Church from its connection with the State. In a circular of Nov. 12, 1874, the liberals declared that the difference between the orthodox and themselves was not a question of faith, but simply a question of authority in matters of faith; that though, on account of this difference, there had arisen factions within the Reformed Church, these factions were not sects, etc. Equally conciliatory are the orthodox in their expressions; but there is nevertheless very little hope at present that a new nationalsynod will be able to bring about a full and thorough agreement.

FRANCIS OF ASSISI, St., was b. at Assisi, 1182; d. there Oct. 4, 1226. His true name was Giovanni Francesco Bernardone. His father was a rich merchant. Handsome, bright, and adventurous, with a keen relish of beauty in all its manifestations, but disinclined to serious work of any description, he grew up without learning anything, became the leader of a club (corti) of the gay youths of Assisi, served in a campaign against Perugia, and was taken prisoner, etc. But a heavy sickness which befell him brought a change into his life. He retired into solitude; and when again he appeared in the world it was as a nurse to the sick, selecting such as suffered from contagious or disgusting diseases. He made a pilgrimage to Rome; and, while there, a voice from above seemed to say to him that he should go and restore the ruined house of God. He took the words in their literal meaning; and, with the money which he begged together, he rebuilt a small decayed church in his native city (the Portiuncula), which ever after remained his favorite residence. A sermon he heard on Matt. x. 9, 10, opened up a new channel to his energy. He determined to become a preacher, to restore the ruined house of God in a higher sense of the word; and fitted out like one of the apostles, without shoes, and with no staff (for he had already disinherited himself), he began to preach penitentance in the streets of Assisi. He made an impression.
Other young men joined him; and in 1210 he lived with ten followers in hermitages near the Portiuncula Church. For these ten followers he wrote a set of common rules containing the common monastic vows of poverty, chastity, obedience, but emphasizing the first point with particular stress. He then repaired to Rome, to have his rules confirmed, and his society recognized by the Pope; but he obtained only the verbal assent of Innocent III. Shortly after his return from Rome, however, he was joined by Clara Sciffi, the foundress of the order of the Clarisses (which article see); and this circumstance threw great lustre both over his person and his enterprise. In 1212 he sent out the brethren, two and two, to reform the world by preaching penitence. He went himself to Tun-cany. In Perugia, Pisa, and Florence he found many followers; in Cortona he was able to find the first Franciscan monastery; from the Count of Casentino he received Monte Alberno as a present. But the five brethren he had sent to Morocco to preach the gospel to the Mohammedans were martyred; and he now determined to go thither himself. In Spain, however, through which he took his way, he was detained by sickness, and compelled to return. Meanwhile, the order grew steadily and rapidly in Italy. At the general assembly of the order, in 1219, no less than five thousand members came together; and brethren were sent to Spain, Egypt, Africa, Greece, England, and Hungary. Hitherto every attempt the order had made to penetrate into Germany had failed. But in 1221, Cesarius of Spire, with twelve other brethren of German descent, went to Germany; and from that moment the order took root in the country. In the same year Francis himself set out for Egypt, and actually preached before the Sultan, though without any effect. The success of the order was now fully recognized; and he was consequently willing to transform his verbal assent into official acknowledgment. By a bull of 1223 Honorius III. confirmed the rules, and sanctioned the order, and Francis was made its first general.
In the very next year, however, he left the government of the order to Elias of Carvons, and retired to the Portiuncula Church, where he died.
He was canonized in 1228 by Gregory IX.

with that by Bonaventura, is found in Acta Sanc-

FRANCIS OF PAULA, St., b. at Paula, Naples, 1416; d. at Plessis-les-Tours, France, April 2, 1507; entered, when he was twelve years old, the Franciscan monastery of San Marco, in Calabria, and became in a short time a great virtuoso in fasting and other ascetic practices. When he was fourteen years old, he retired to a cave on the seashore, where he lived as a hermit; and when he was twenty, so great a number of hermits had gathered around him, that he could constitute them an order, and give them a rule. They were to outshine the Franciscans in austerity; and to the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, was added a fourth one, of perpetual fasting; that is, of refraining not only from all kinds of flesh, but also from milk, butter, cheese, eggs, etc. The order was confirmed in 1474 by Sixtus IV., under the name of the "Hermits of St. Francis," which by Alexander VI. was changed to that of the "Minims," and Francis was made its superior. His fame as a miracle-worker was so great, that Louis XI., on his deathbed, had him brought to France, and implored him to prolong his life; which, however, he refused to try. Charles VIII. also held him in great favor; and Francis remained in France, where he founded several monasteries. He was canonized by Leo X. in 1519. See HIARION DE COSTE: Le portrait de S. Francois de Paul, Paris, 1635; FR. Giry: Vie de S. Francois de Paul, Paris, 1890; Act. Sanct., April; [Rolland: Histoire de Saint Francois de Paule, 2d ed., Paris, 1876]. See MINIMS.

FRAncis of Sales, St., b. at Sales, Savoy, 1567; d. at Lyons, Dec. 28, 1622; studied law and theology in Paris and Padua; entered the church against the will of his parents; was soror of Molinos and Fénelon, the first representatives of the so-called Quietism. His collected works have often been published; e.g., in Paris, 1836 (4 vols.), again in 1874 sq. He was canonized by Leo X. in 1519. See HIARION DE COSTE: Le portrait de S. Francois de Paul, Paris, 1635; FR. Giry: Vie de S. Francois de Paul, Paris, 1890; Act. Sanct., April; [Rolland: Histoire de Saint Francois de Paule, 2d ed., Paris, 1876]. See MINIMS.

FRAncis Xavier, b. at Xavier, in Navarre, April 7, 1506; d. in Canton, China, Dec. 2, 1552; was a teacher of Aristotelian philosophy in Paris when he became acquainted with Loyola; and was one of the original members of the Compagnia Jesu. Until the order was confirmed by the Pope, he labored in the hospitals of Northern Italy. He then went as a missionary to the East Indies. April 7, 1541, he left Portugal, and May 6, 1542, he landed at Goa. Seven years he spent in the Indies. April 1549 he went to Japan, where he spent two years; and in 1552 he went to China, where he died. The immediate result of his missionary labor was, perhaps, not very great, as he did not understand the languages, but was compelled to use an interpreter; at the same time he seems to have exaggerated to call him the apostle of the Indies, and to compare him with Paul. But indirectly he exercised a great influence by organizing and consolidating the Portuguese mission in the Indies, and by opening up Japan and China to the Christian missionaries. The principal source of his life is his Letters, the best edition of which is that of Bologna (1795). His life was written by Tursellini, 1596; Joar de Lucena, 1600; Bontours, 1862; Reithmeyer, 1849 (Roman-Catholic); and by Venn, 1862, and W. Hoffmann, 1869 (Protestants). FRANCIS, Convers, D.D., a Unitarian clergyman; b. at West Cambridge, Mass., Nov. 9, 1795; d. at Cambridge, April 7, 1863. He graduated at Harvard in 1815; was pastor of the Unitarian Church in Watertown from 1819 to 1842, and professor of popular and pastoral care at Harvard from 1842 until his death. He published some lectures, and wrote the biographies of Rev. John Eliot and Sebastian Râle for Sparks's Am. Biogr.

FRANCISCANS (Minorites, Gray Friars, in England and Ireland, sometimes also the Seraphic Brethren), The Order of the, was founded by St. Francis of Assisi in 1210, and confirmed by Honorius III. in 1223. In the middle of the thirteenth century it had eight thousand monasteries, with two hundred thousand monks.

This extraordinary success was due to various causes. Immediately after his death, the founder of the order was transformed into a kind of deity in the eyes of the time. The story that Christ had appeared to him on Monte Alberno, and imprinted on his hands and feet the stigmata of the crucifixion, was universally believed. Pope Alexander IV. and St. Clara had seen the marks; Gregory IX., Nicholas III., Benedict XII., and Paul V., vouched for the truth. When Bonaventura wrote his life of St. Francis, the most incredible fictions would be easily believed when told of the "seraphic" saints; and in 1399 Bartholomew Albizzi actually instituted a comparison between Christ and St. Francis, in his Liber Conformitatum. Of still greater effect were the enormous privileges which the popes granted to the order. Already in 1222 Honorius III. allowed the Franciscans to celebrate service, though with closed doors, in places which were under the ban. Soon after, they obtained the right to preach wherever they liked without first procuring the consent of the bishop or the parish priest. They were permitted to hear confession, and give absolution; and, in the same year they were constituted as an order, they received the Portiuncula indulgence; that is, every one who visited the Portiuncula Church on the anniversary of its consecration (Aug. 2) received absolution. But, beyond these and other favorable circumstances, the very idea on which the order was based, the very principle on which it worked, corresponded to the deepest wants of the time. Everybody felt that reform was necessary; and the humble, miserable Franciscan, clad in rags, but filled with holy enthusiasm, struck everybody as the reformer.

But success always engenders jealousy; and the Dominicans were the born rivals of the Franciscans. The two orders fought for a time cordially together, side by side, as long as they had a common object; namely, to get access to the universities. But hardly were Bonaventura the Franciscan, and Thomas Aquinas the Dominican, installed as doctores theologiae at the university of Paris, before a strongly marked scientific difference between the two orders became apparent, and it continued to separate them during the whole period of the middle ages. The Franciscans were realists; the Dominicans, nominalists: the Franciscans leaned towards Semi-Pelagianism; the Dominicans towards Ockhamism. The Franciscans were Scotists; the Dominicans were Thomists: in the debate on the immaculate conception of Mary, the Franciscans said Yes, and the Dominicans, No. But the difference was by no means confined to the sphere of science: it came to many vexatious and sometimes ridiculous outbursts of rivalry between the two orders also in practical life.

Of much greater importance, however, was the difference which arose within the order itself almost immediately after its foundation. The absolute poverty which the founder had ordered seemed to some to be a mere impediment to the success of the order; while by others it was vindicated as the very character of the order. There thus arose two parties,—a milder, headed by Elias of Cortona; and a severer, headed by Cæsarius of Spires (see H. Rycka, Elías von Cortona, Leipzig, 1874); and the contest between these two parties not only threw the order itself into confusion, but at times also involved the Pope and the kings in serious difficulties. Nicholas III. attempted a reconciliation by the bull Exult, 1279, in which he explained, that though the Franciscans were not free in their own things, they were, of course, allowed to use things; that the real owner of all the treasures, grounds, buildings, etc., which the order had amassed, was the Pope; and that the members of the order only had the use of these treasures by his permission, etc. This subtle distinction did not satisfy the severer party. Under the leadership of John of Oliva they raised a violent opposition to the bull and to the general of the order, Matthias of Aquas Spartas, who headed the milder party. The latter was victorious, however; and the Spiritualists, as the severer party was called, were cruelly persecuted. In Naples they were expelled; and in many places they were seized by the Inquisition, tortured, and burnt. Nevertheless, they continued their resistance, and under John XXII. the strife broke out with renewed vehemence; the general, Michael of Cesena, being this time at the head of the Spiritualists (see E. Guderian, Michael von Cesena, Breslau, 1876). The result was a permanent split in the order. The Observants, the severer party, were formally recognized by the Council of Constance in its nineteenth sitting (Sept. 23, 1415); and Leo X., after an ineffectual attempt to gather the whole order under one obedience, constituted the milder party, the Conventuals, an independent congregation, by a bull of 1517. Each division obtained its own superior; though that of the Observants (the minister generalis) took rank before that of the Conventuals (the magister generalis).

In another respect these internal differences contributed much to keep the order alive; and the frequent formation of more or less independent congregations proved the presence of an active principle of development and reform. By the Reformation the order lost heavily, and a great number of its convents were broken up. Nevertheless, at the beginning of the eighteenth century it still numbered about a hundred and fifteen thousand monks; and its monasteries are still flourishing, from the interior of Russia to the interior of America. It has produced five popes (Nicholas IV., Alexander V., Sixtus IV., Sixtus V., and Pius VII.), and a considerable number of theologians (Bonaventura, Alexander of Hales, Ockham, etc.), and of poets, Thomas de Celano, the author of Dieu ira, Jacopone da Todi, the author of Stabat mater, etc. (See OZANAM, Les poètes franciscains en Italie, Paris, 1852.)

LIT.—The history of the order has been written by an Irish Franciscan, Lucas Wadding (Annales minorum s. tr. ordinum a. s. Francico institutorum), 17 vols., Rome, 1731–41, reaching to 1540, and continued to 1563 by I. de Luca. See also the works of Helvét (vol. vii.) and Henri-Fehr and F. Morin, St. François et les Franciscains, Paris, 1853. (GAUDENTIUS, Franciscan Orden im Kampfe gegen den Protestantismus, 1 Bd., Botzen, 1860.)

FRANCK, Sebastian, b. at Donauwörth, 1499; d. at Basel, 1542; was appointed evangelical preacher at Gustenfeld, near Nuremberg, 1525, but resigned this position in 1528, and followed for some time the Anabaptists. Dissatisfied with them, too, he separated from them, and determined to belong to no party-church, but to devote his life to a literary representation of the ideal, the truly spiritual church. Sustaining himself and his family first by running a soap-factory, and afterwards by working a printing-press, he published Chronica, Zeitbuch und Geschichtsbibel, Strassburg, 1531, the first German world’s-history; Weltbuch, Cosmographie, Tubingen, 1534, the first German geography; and a great number of mystico-theological books,—Paradoxa, Die gültigen Arch, Das Kriegsbüchlein, etc. But as these books contained very sharp criticisms, not only of the Roman, but also of the Reformed, churches, the author was bitterly persecuted, and driven from place to place. Nevertheless, his books became popular in the true sense of the word, and many of them are still living among the people. See C. A. Hase, Sebastian Franck, der Schwarmgeist, Leipzig, 1869.

FRANCKE, August Hermann, b. at Lübeck, March 23, 1663; d. at Halle, June 8, 1727; studied theology at Erfurt, Kiel, and Leipzig, where, together with Paul Anton, he founded the famous Collegium Philobiblicum. The spiritual direction which he ever afterwards followed he received from Spener, whom he met in 1688; and the success he achieved, and the eminence he aroused, at the very beginning of his career, were due to his "Fiatism." In 1689 he began to lecture on the Epistles of St. Paul in the university of Leipzig, and his lectures attracted extraordinarily great audiences; but in 1590 they were forbidden by the faculty. In that year he was called as preacher to Erfurt, and, when he preached, the church was crowded; but he was suddenly ordered to leave the city within twenty-four hours. In 1691, however, he was appointed professor at the newly-founded university of Halle, first in Oriental languages, and afterwards in theology; and there, the homestead of Pietism, he was allowed to develop all his energy undisturbed and in peace. Of his works several have been translated into English, such as Manuductio ad Lectionem Scripturae Sacrae, Halle, 1593, by Jacques, London, 1613; Nicoolenus, a Treatise against the Fear of Man, London, 1709; and Footsteps of Divine Providence, London, 1717. But it was less as a writer than as a teacher and preacher that he multiplied Frank, &c., 1683, containing his correspondence with Spener; Neue Beiträge, 1875 [see Frank, &c., 1683]. Minor sketches of his life are very numerous. Kramer.

FRANK, Jacob Joseph, a Hebrew sectary; b. in Poland, 1712; d. in Offenbach, Austria, Dec. 10, 1791. He acquired fame as an expounder of the Cabala, but accepted the doctrine of the Trinity, and founded a sect whose tenets are a mixture of Judaism and Christianity. He was compelled to declare himself a Christian, and was accordingly baptized into the Roman-Catholic Church at Warsaw, Dec. 25, 1759. A charge of heresy led to his imprisonment; and he was not released until 1773, when the Russians invaded Poland. He emigrated to Austria, was wonder fully successful in attracting followers, and by the first, condemning Felix and Elipandus, the leaders of the Adoptionists; and the second, condemning the decisions of the second Council of Nicaea (787) concerning image-worship, which was accepted by the Pope. See Mansi, Cons. XIII. Frankenberg, Johann Heinrich, was b. at Grosslogau, in Silesia, Sept. 18, 1726; d. at Breda, in Holland, June 11, 1804; studied theology in his native city and in Rome, and was made a coadjutor to the archbishop of Goerlitz 1749, archbishop of Magdeburg 1759, and cardinal of Breslau 1774. He was one of the most decided opponents against the church policy of Joseph II. The question was about the abolition of the episcopal seminaries, and the establishment of a general seminary, under royal superintendence, at Louvain. Frankenberg protested, and continued to protest, until the whole country was brought almost into open revolt. He also opposed the Revolution, and was by the Convnet sentenced to deportation, but escaped by flight. See Augustin Theiner, Der Kardinal Frankenberg, Freiburg, 1850.

FRANKFURT, The Council of, was convened by Charlemagne, in 794, at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, and was attended, according to later writers, by three hundred bishops, from Germany, Gaul, England, Spain, and Italy, and two delegates of the Pope. Fifty-six canons are ascribed to it, of which the most important was the first, condemning Felix and Elipandus, the leaders of the Adoptionists; and the second, condemning the decisions of the second Council of Nicaea (787) concerning image-worship, which was accepted by the Pope. See Mansi, Cons. XIII.

FRANKS, The, was the name of a wild, war-like, and cruel, but highly gifted Germanic race, which, divided into several branches (the Salian Franks, the Ripuarian Franks, &c.), lived, during the third century after Christ, on the right shore of the Rhine, along its middle and lower course. When Carausius conqueredBrittany, and drew the legions away from Belgium, the Salian Franks crossed the Rhine; and though Roman historians tell us that they were often defeated by Constantius, Constantine, and Julian, they were never thrown back beyond the Rhine. In 406 they began to advance towards the west and the south; and in 486, Chlodwig, the son of Childeric, the son of Merowig, who in 481, when only fifteen years old, had succeeded his father as chief of the Salian Franks, defeated Syagrius, the Roman governor of Gaul, at Tolbiac, and extended the Frankish Empire to the Loire. In Gaul the Franks met with a remarkable after-bloom of the classical civilization: and though for centuries they remained rude and coarse and cruel to the very core of their being, yet so completely did they yield to the mental superiority of the conquered race, that, even before 490, Latin had become their official language,—the language in which their famous law, Lex Salica, was written down. In Gaul the Franks also met with Christianity; and though Chlodwig allowed his men to burn and plunder the Christian churches, he nevertheless stood in great awe of the Christian bishops. In 496 he married Chlothildis, a Burgundian princess, and a Christian. Their children were baptized; and Chlodwig, like many of his men, was hesitating with respect to this new and strange religion, when an incident decided his course. He was compelled in 496 to give battle to the Alemanni; and on the field of battle, Chlodwig made a vow to the God of the Gauls, that, if he gained the victory, he would become a Christian. The victory he gained, and he and many of his men were baptized. But in this, as in so many other cases of conversion, the way from the baptism to a thorough Christianization was very long, a distance of several centuries.

FRATERNITIES (Fraternitas, Sodalitas) are associations formed in the Roman-Catholic Church for special religious purposes, such as nursing the sick, supporting the poor, practising some special devotion, etc., but of a less rigorous description than the monastic orders. They have their own statutes, religious exercises, privileges, etc.; but they stand under the authority of the bishops, and are only morally separated from the world. Such a fraternity, dedicated to Mary the Virgin, is mentioned by Odo, Bishop of Paris, May 9, 1765; d. at St. Geniès, also in France, May 9, 1765; d. at St. Geniès, also in Southern France, where they had spread widely, a number of Fraticelli were seized by the Inquisition between 1318 and 1352, condemned, and burnt. Only a few were willing to recant. But after the middle of the fourteenth century they gradually disappeared. By later writers they, like all heretical sects, have been accused of various abominable vices; but there are no proofs. C. Schmidt.

FRAYSSINOUS, Denys, b. at Curibres, in Gascony, May 9, 1765; d. at St. Geniès, also in Gascony, Dec. 12, 1841; studied theology, and appeared, after the conclusion of the Concordat of 1801, as one of the most zealous and most successful agitators for the Roman-Catholic Church, and against the reigning atheism and materialism. In 1809 he was forbidden to continue his conferences in the Church of St. Sulpice, in Paris; but he resumed his work after the Restoration, and was made general; Germaine de Gercier, "was confirmed by Clement V., 1265–71. Among the most prominent were those of the Scapulary, the Rosary, Corpus Christi, etc. One, the Frates Pontifices, was formed for the purpose of procuring good bridges across the watercourses. The fraternities may be divided into four classes. 1. Those which particularly relate to the worship of Christ, such as the fraternities of the Most Holy Sacrament of the Altar, of the Most Holy Heart of Jesus, of the Most Holy Name of Jesus, of the Holy Five Wounds, etc. 2. Those which pay particular honor unto the Virgin Mary. 3. Those which particularly relate to the conversion of sinners, founded in Paris, 1387, by Abbé Dufriche Desgenettes. 3. Those that are charitable. FRATRICELLI, FRATICELLI. Wishing to put an end to the split in the Franciscan order, which had prevailed for the larger part of the thirteenth century, Celestine V. authorized the brothers Petrus de Macerata and Petrus de Faro Sempronius, and some other Italian Spirituals, to form an independent congregation under the name of Pauperes Eremita Domini Celestini. This congregation was heavily persecuted by the rest of the Franciscans, and finally dissolved by Boniface VIII.; but, excited by Peter Olivi's apocalyptic prophecies and vehement invectives against the Pope, the hermits, now generally called "Fraticelli," determined to resist. They declared that there had been no true pope since Celestine. They pushed the vow of poverty to the extreme, whence they were often called "Bizochi," from the Italian bizoche, French benence, a beggar's sack. They entered into communication with the Beghards, and taught that they were possessed of the Holy Spirit, and exempt from sin; that they needed neither penitence nor sacraments, etc. An attempt of Clement V. to re-unite the Spirituals with the Franciscans failed in 1312; and meanwhile the growth of the heresy was unmanageable. In 1314 they expelled by force the Franciscans from the monasteries of Béziers and Narbonne. This caused John XXII. to adopt severer measures against them. In 1317 the Inquisition was ordered to step in. In Italy, Sicily, and Southern France, where they had spread widely, a number of Fraticelli were seized by the Inquisition between 1318 and 1332, condemned, and burnt. Only a few were willing to recant. But after the middle of the fourteenth century they gradually disappeared. By later writers they, like all heretical sects, have been accused of various abominable vices; but there are no proofs. C. Schmidt.

FREDDERICK III. THE WISE, Elector of Saxony 1486–1525; was b. at Torgau, Jan. 17, 1463; and d. at Lochau, May 5, 1525. He was a man of common sense, probity, and firmness, and much respected, both in the realm and among foreign princes. One of the most consequential of his acts as a ruler was the foundation, in 1502, of the university of Wittenberg, and the appointment of Luther and Melanchthon as professors. It was by no means his intention, however, to make his new university a school of reform: on the contrary, he was as yet a true son of Rome. In 1493 he had made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and brought back five thousand pieces of relics for the church of Wittenberg. Nevertheless, when Luther, in 1517, nailed his theses on the church-door in Wittenberg, the elector kept quiet; and when the Roman curia, in 1518, demanded that Luther should be sent to Rome to be punished for heresy, the elector refused: yea, when Dr. Eck returned from Rome in 1519 with the bull of excommunication against Luther, the elector declined to lend his aid to its enforcement; and, when Luther publicly and solemnly burnt this same bull, the elector saw no reason why he should interfere. The greatest service, however, which Frederick the Wise did to the cause of the Reformation was the removal of Luther to the Wartburg after the Diet of Worms, probably the only means of protecting him against the Pope and the emperor. There was in this policy,—so firm, so consistent, and yet so cautious,—no doubt, a high political wisdom; but there was also something else. A spark of Luther's conviction had fallen into Frederick's soul; and shortly before he died he took the Lord's Supper under both forms. See TUTZSCHEMM: Friedrich der Weise, Grimma, 1848; G. SPALATIN: Fried. d. W., ed. by Neudecker and Preller, Jena, 1851; [CARL BECKER: Das edelstichsische Fürsten-Kleeblatt, Berlin, 1861; K. SCHMIDT: Wittenberg unter Kurfürst Fried. dem Erisen. FREDERICK III., THE PIOUS, Elector of the Palatinate, 1530–76; was educated by Bishop Eberhard of Liège, and at the court of Charles V., but was, nevertheless, early impressed by the ideas of the Reformation. In 1537 he married the Lutheran Princess Maria of Brandenburg-Bayreuth, and in 1549 he openly embraced Lutheranism. On his accession he found the Lutheran Church almost fully established in the Palatinate; but, shortly after, a violent controversy broke out between the Lutheran and the Reformed theologians, concerning the Lord's Supper. Frederick asked Melanchthon to interfere; but the theses which Melanchthon wrote approached the ideas of Zwingli or Calvin so closely, that Frederick himself became wavering. The religious disputation at Heidelberg (1560) completed his conversion; and, as his people also seemed inclined to Calvinism, the festivals of Mary and the saints were abolished; the altars, organs, baptismal fonts, images, etc., disappeared from the churches; Calvinists were appointed as teachers and preachers; the government of the church was confided to a council-board, consisting of three ecclesiastical and three lay members, etc. In 1562 appeared the Heidelberg Catechism, written by Ursinus and Oeconomus, but under the eyes of the elector himself; and it found so much favor, that it immediately was translated into French, English, Dutch, and Latin, and adopted almost by the whole body of the Reformed Church. An attempt was made by the Lutheran princes of the empire to prevent the establishment of Calvinism in the Palatinate; and they even went so far as to threaten the elector with war and deposition. But at the diet of Augsburg (1563) he met them with such composure and reasonableness, that the case was dropped. To the end of his life he was a great support to the Reformed Church, both in France and in the Netherlands. See his life, by Kluckhohn (Nördlingen, 1877–79), who has also edited his letters (2 vols., Brunswick, 1868–72).—KLÜPFEL.

FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. See SCOTLAND, FREE CHURCH OF.

FREE CONGREGATIONS (Friends of Light, Protestant Friends) were formed in Prussia during the fifth decade of the present century, as the result of a rationalistic re-action against the revival of positive Christianity. Under the presidency of Uhlich, pastor of Pommelte, near Magdeburg, a number of pastors belonging to the old rationalistic school assembled in 1841, firstly at Gnadau, and then at Halle; agreed upon a platform of nine strongly pronounced rationalistic propositions; adopted the name of Friends of Light, afterwards Protestant Friends; and decided upon the publication of a periodical,—Blätter für christliche Erbauung. At their seventh meeting at Cothen (1844), a hundred and thirty theologians and about five hundred laymen were present. Uhlich delivered a lecture, in which he openly rejected the doctrines of hereditary sin, atonement, the trinity, the divinity of Christ, and the Church. He was followed by Wislicenus, pastor at Halle, and a rationalist of a younger stamp, but of a still deeper dye. The stand-point of Wislicenus was a popularized form of the pantheism of the young Hegelian school; and in his lecture, Ob Schrift? Ob Geist? he broke with the church of which he was a servant, and which establishes Scripture as the rule of faith. The authorities then interfered; and in 1845 Wislicenus separated from the Established Church of Prussia, and formed a free congregation at Halle. Other free congregations were formed by Uhlich at Magdeburg, by Rupp at Königsberg, and at other places, often accompanied with rather tumultuous expressions of enthusiasm. A combination was, however, brought about with the German Catholics in 1847; and in 1848 the leaders of the movement, Wislicenus, Rupp, and, indeed, most of the leaders, gradually moved outward from one negation to another, until at last they ended in complete nihilism, without any positive basis at all, teaching a religion without any God, and forming congregations without any faith, the government began to suspect the congregations as political instruments. In Saxony and Bavaria they were completely suppressed; and in Prussia they lived on, only under great difficulties, and affiliating themselves with atheists and materialists. In 1868, however, there were a hundred and twenty-one free congregations in Germany, with about twenty-five thousand members. In the United States of America there are also found some free German congregations, —in Philadelphia, St. Louis, Hoboken,—which mostly act in unison, more or less cordial, with the various free-thinker associations.—KAHNIS.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, established in Boston, Mass., May 30, 1867, aims at the emancipation of religion from all sectarian limits, the reconciliation of faiths, and the application of the scientific method to the study of noting a class of writers and thinkers who deny candid freethinker. In 1713 Antony Collins published his work, entitled A Discourse of Free Form: since then it has been published in the Index of Boston, Mass.

FREE SPIRIT, Brethren of. See Brethren of the Free Spirit.

FREETHINKERS, a general designation denoting a class of writers and thinkers who deny the truth of revealed religion. The term was applied primarily to the deists of England. A letter to Locke, in 1697, refers to Toland as "a candid freethinker." In 1713 Antony Collins published his work, entitled A Discourse of Free-thinking, occasioned by the Rise and Growth of a Sect called Freethinkers. The term "free thought" is often used in a broad sense for all rationalism and infidelity. See A. S. Farrar, Hist. of Free Thought (Bampton Lectures), Lond., 1863. See Deism.

FREEWILL BAPTISTS, a denomination of American Christians who baptize by immersion, and are Arminian in doctrine.

History.—The first Freewill-Baptist Church was organized at New Durham, N. H., in 1780, by Benjamin Randall (1749–1808). Converted under the preaching of Whitefield, Randall joined the Baptist Church. In 1779 he was called to account for holding to an unlimited atonement and the freedom of the will, and was disfellowshipped. He was ordained in 1780, and at once began to propagate his views. A sect with similar tenets which had been organized in 1751, in North Carolina, under the preaching of Shubael Stearns, and were called "The Separate Baptists." Randall's followers continued to claim to be Baptists; but the claim was repudiated by the original Baptists, who called them "Freewillers,"—a designation which they themselves subsequently adopted. In 1827 the first General Conference was held: and the body has extended to Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia.

Doctrine and Polity.—The Freewill Baptists agree in all the fundamental Christian doctrines with other evangelical denominations. With the regular Baptists they practise baptism by immersion. They differ from the Baptists on the questions of predetermination, the extent of the atonement, and the ability of the sinner to repent. On the latter point those views of Faith thus express the views of the denomination: "God has ordained man with power of free choice, and governs him by moral laws and motives; and this power of free choice is the exact measure of his responsibility. All events are present with God from everlasting to everlasting; but his knowledge does not include the future; nor does he decree all events which he knows will occur" (chap. iii. 2, 3). "The call of the Gospel is co-extensive with the atonement to all men, both by word and the strivings of the Spirit: so that salvation is rendered equally possible to all; and, if any fail of eternal life, it is their own" (chap. viii.). While they hold to regeneration, they deny the doctrine of the perseverance of saints. The Freewill Baptists differ also from the Baptists in practising open communion.

The church has an ordained ministry, and herefore individual churches have ordained ministers; but the Conference of 1880 deprecated this practice, and called upon the churches to proceed on such occasions with the advice of the Quarterly Meetings. The church adopts a form of government intermediate between the Congregational and the Presbyterian. The individual churches are independent organizations, governed by elders and deacons, and alone have authority over their members. There is no court of appeal for the member. There are three associate church bodies. The Quarterly Meeting is composed of two or more ministers voluntarily bound together. The Yearly Meeting is composed of two or more Quarterly Meetings, and the "General Conference of the Freewill-Baptist Connection" is composed of delegates from the Yearly Meetings, and assembles every three years, in the month of October. Each of these associations may "labor with the next lower down to the church "as a body;" but neither has appellate jurisdiction.

Statistics.—The report of the General Conference of 1880 (the centennial year) gives the following numbers: churches 1,432, ordained ministers 1,213, communicants 75,000. Almost one-half of their strength (or 38,000 members) is concentrated in New England. The denomination is much stronger in Maine, where it has 290 churches and 15,000 communicants, than in any other State. The denomination maintains flourishing institutions at Lewiston, Me. (Bates College), and Hillsdale, Mich.; also has colleges at Ridgeville, Ind., and Rio Grande, O.; and maintains a mission in India, with eight missionaries and four assistants. The Freewill or Free Baptists number 9,389 members in New Brunswick, and 3,308 in Nova Scotia. See Stewart: History of the Freewill Baptists (from 1780 to 1830), Dover, 1862; A Treatise on the Faith and Practice of the Freewill Baptists, Dover, 1871; Freewill-Baptist Register and Year-Book, 1880.

FREEMAN, James, D.D., pastor of the first Unitarian Church of New England; b. in Charlestown, Mass., April 22, 1759; d. at Newton, Mass., Nov. 14, 1839. Graduating at Harvard College in 1777, he was called to King's Chapel, then an Episcopal Church, Boston, as reader, in 1782. He gave up the belief in the Trinity, and, being refused ordination by the bishop, was ordained pastor by his church (1787), which adopted his views. Thus the oldest Episcopal Church in New England became the first Unitarian Church of America. Dr. Freeman was a man of fine social qualities, and much power in the pulpit. He was one of the founders of the Massachusetts Historical Society, and in 1832 published a volume of Sermons and Addresses. See Ware: Unitarian Bap.

FRENCH PROPHETS were Camisards (see art.), who appeared in England in 1706, and distinguished men, among whom was John Lacey, who, although previously a member of Dr. Calamy's congregation, entered into all their aberrations for Foreign Missions. "His eloquent tongue was ever ready to plead for every good Christian or humane cause." He was one of the most distinguished Christian laymen of his day. See his Memoir, by the Rev. T. W. FRESENIUS, Johann Philipp, b. at Niederwiesen, near Kreuznach, Oct. 22, 1705; d. at Frankfort, July 4, 1741; studied theology at Strassburg; and was appointed minister at Oberwiesen, 1727, court-preacher at Giessen, 1734, and preacher at St. Peter's in Frankfort, 1743. The influence which he exercised as a preacher and as a minister in general was very great and beneficial. Several of his sermons were published in the church; such as Die heilsamen Betrachtungen und des menschlichen Naturtheils (1750, new edition, 1872); Epistelpreilungen (1754, new edition, 1839), etc. He followed the Spener-Francke direction, but was strongly opposed to the Moravian Brethren, against whom he wrote many volumes. His Antivielgierelnus against the Jesuits also attracted much attention (1731). His life was written (1743) by K. Griesbach, the father of the famous editor of the Greek Testament. Goethe describes him, in the fourth book of Wahlk eit u. Dichtung, as a "mild man, of handsome and pleasing appearance, who was universally revered in Frankfort as an exemplary minister and good pulpit-orator, but not relished by those who sympathized with the Moravians, because of his attacks upon them." He received from his mother a strictly pious though legalistic education; studied theology at Jena, 1699; became acquainted with Augustus Hermann Francke, the founder of the Orphan House at Halle, married his only daughter, Anastasia, and succeeded in 1722. In 1725, he was appointed minister and good pulpit-orator, but not relished by those who sympathized with the Moravians, because of his attacks upon them. G. E. STEITZ.

FRIEDOLIN. See FRIEDOLIN.

FRIEDOLIN or FRIDOLD (also Tridolin or Trudelin), often styled the "First Apostle of Alamannia," and still venerated as the patron of the Swiss cantons of Glarus, Uri, and Schwyz, and the last and northernmost canton of the old Frisia, and, preached Christianity to his heathen countrymen, but repaired afterwards to Poitiers, where he restored the church and congregation of St. Hilary (ruined and corrupted under the influence of Arianism) to their former splendor and purity. Moved by a vision of St. Hilary, he set out for Allemagena, and received from Chlodvig an island in the Rhine (Säckingen), where he built a church, and founded a monastery, and which he called Bavaria. All that is known of Erichr is drawn from a Life by written by Bulther, a monk of Säckingen, and dedicated to Notker Labeo of St. Gallen, who died 1022; but as this Life is written four centuries after the time of Erich, it is rather slim. The best edition of it is found in Monk: Quelle von deerbadischen Landesgeschichte, Carlsruhe, 1843. See Gelpke: Kirchengeschichte. Schweiz, Bern, 1859; Heber: Die römerb. christlich. Glaubenskelden, Göttingen, 1897; Erb: Die trocett. Missionskirche, Gutersloh, 1873. R. Zöppfel.

FRIENDLY ISLANDS. This group, discovered by Tasman, 1643, and named by Capt. Cook, on account of their friendly demeanor towards him, lies five hundred miles south-east of the Fiji group. It consists of a hundred and fifty islands with an area twenty-one by twelve miles, and Vavau, the second in size, is forty-two miles in circumference. In 1847 the missionaries estimated the population to be fifty thousand. It does not now exceed twenty or twenty-five thousand. These islanders were excellent seamen, and frequently visited the Fiji group to procure wood for the manufacture of boats. They were superior in intelligence to the Fijians, but, with them, cannibals, and far sunken in iniquity. The first missionaries went to them in 1797, of whom several were murdered, and the rest retired in 1800. In 1825 the Wesleyan Missionary Society undertook missionary work amongst them in earnest. In 1834 a revival of great power passed over the islands. King George Tubou was converted, and became an active Christian worker, often occupying the pulpit himself. A great change took place in the habits of the people. Slavery has been utterly abolished, the language has been reduced to writing, schools are scattered through the islands, and education is compulsory. The Christians of the islands early sent missionaries to the Fiji group. In 1869 the contributions of the native churches were £5,069, £3,900 of which were devoted to benevolent and missionary purposes. One of the last reports gave 126 churches, 8,900 communicants, and 17,000 attendants on church. Lit. — Mariner: Account of the Natives of the Tonga Islands, 2 vols., Lond., 1813; Rev. T. FRIENDS, Society of. The rise of this body of Christians is one of the most noteworthy events in the religious history of England in the seventeenth century. In the midst of the conflicts and sores, the great events of the period, and the religious complications of the times, there were men who felt that Luther and Cranmer had not gone far enough, and that there was still much sacerdotalism to be purged away, before the original simplicity of Christianity could be restored. Such men found a leader in George Fox. He and his followers announced as their aim the recovery of the original simplicity of Christianity, and this phrase remains as the best definition of their work. The privilege of direct access to God, without the intervention of human priest or rite, was revealed to Fox's soul. Having found one, "even Christ Jesus, who could speak to his condition," he longed to impart his discovery of the spirituality of true religion to others, and in 1647 began his labors in public ministry, going forth through England on foot, and at his own charges. His message appears to have been mainly to direct the people to the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls, who died for them, and had sent his spirit into their hearts, to instruct and guide them in the things pertaining to life and salvation. "I was sent," he says, "to turn people from darkness to the light, that they might receive Christ Jesus; for, to as many as should receive him in his light, I was sent, to give 'power to become the sons of God, which I had obtained by receiving Christ. I was to direct people to the Spirit that gave forth the Scriptures, by which they might be led into all truth, and so up to Christ and God, as those had been who gave them forth." To the illumination of the Holy Spirit in the heart he turned the attention of all, as that by which sin was made manifest and reproved, duty unfolded, and ability given to run with alacrity and joy in the way of God's commandments. He preached repentance towards God, and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and showed that one became a true disciple, not by a bare assent of the understanding to the truths contained in the Bible, nor by any outward rite, but by a real change of the heart and affections, through the power of the Holy Spirit. The soil was ready for the seed, and the rapid spread of Fox's doctrines was surprising. All classes flocked to his preaching; and among his converts were persons of the best families in the kingdom, priests of the Established Church, and ministers of other societies, and many men of wealth and learning. For four years Fox was the only minister of the society; the second preacher was Elizabeth Hooton. In the fifth year there were twenty-five preachers; in the seventh, upwards of sixty. Within eight years, ministers of Friends preached in various parts of Europe, in Asia, and in Africa, and heroically endured persecution in Norway, Malta, Austria, Hungary, and other places. Among the noteworthy preachers in the earlier years, Francis Howgill, John Audland, and Samuel Fisher had been clergymen; George Bishop, Richard Hubberthorn, and William Ames, officers in the army; Anthony Pearson and John Crook, justices of peace. The courtly and cultured Penn, and Barclay, a member of a noble family in Scotland, a near relative of the Stuart kings, and a man of thorough classical and patristic scholarship, joined the society about twenty years after its formation. In 1880 the number of Friends in Great Britain was not less than sixty-six thousand. America was first visited by Friends in 1656, when Mary Fisher and Anne Austin arrived in Boston from Barbadoes, to which island they had gone to preach the gospel the preceding year. They were charged with holding “very dangerous, heretical, and blasphemous opinions,” and were kept in close confinement, at first on the vessel, and afterwards in jail. Their books were burned by the common executioner, and even their persons searched to discover signs of witchcraft. They were then sent back to Barbadoes.

In 1680 this same Mary Fisher held an interview with Sultan Mahomet IV., at Adrianople, where he was then encamped with his army. Two days after the banishment of the first Friends from Boston, a vessel having on board eight other Friends arrived from London. They were at once imprisoned, and, eleven weeks afterwards, sent back to England. But, nothing daunted, others of the same faith continued to arrive in New England, to suffer crouging, and prisondiscipline, in the adoption of enlight, and prisondiscipline, in the adoption of enlight.
rîtes themselves as inconsistent with the whole spirit of Christianity, in which types have given place to the substance. Their views in regard to the ministry are also characteristic. They believe that no one should preach the Word without a direct call from God, and that this call may come to male or female, old or young. No high learning or no course of theological study are necessary qualifications for a minister, who may be as unlettered as were most of the apostles, if plenteously endued with heavenly grace. But Friends do not deny the self-evident proposition, that learning and intellectual ability conduces to the usefulness of a preacher of the gospel, and that a church needs men possessing both, to assert and defend the truth. Any one who feels it laid upon him is allowed to speak in the meetings for worship, so long as he speaks things worthy of the occasion. If, after sufficient probation, he is formally acknowledged as a minister, and is allowed one of the seats at the head of the meeting. Besides ministers, the society appoints elders, whose especial duty is to sympathize with and advise ministers, and watch that they be sound in the faith, and their answers to the prayer breathed forth by his inmost soul he feels conscious of a closer union with God, and strengthened for his future warfare with the world, the flesh, and the devil. And, if some brother or sister is led to offer vocal service, it often happens that the word of exhortation or reproof or comfort, or the earnest petition to the throne of grace, harmonizes with the private exercise of mind which the hearer has passed through, confirming his faith, and invigorating his resolution.

The theory of the exercise of the ministry among Friends asserts the prompting and guidance of the Holy Spirit, both what to say, and when to say it. It does not, however, intelligently understood, claim any infallibility, or plenary inspiration, in the speaker. The treasure is borne in earthen vessels, and the imperfections of the instrument may sometimes appear. Yet he that lives daily near his Lord, and is careful not to assert more than he has tested in his own experience, or to utter words beyond those in which he feels a full consciousness of divine leading, seldom outruns his Guide, or fails to speak to the edification of the church.

Education.—The society provesthat all its members shall receive a good practical education, and cherishes also the higher learning. It has colleges at Haverford, Penn., Richmond, Ind., Wilmington, O., and Oskaloosa, Ia., and one for girls at Bryn Mawr, Penn. There are excellent boarding-schools in most of the Yearly Meetings.

Organization.—The congregations are grouped together to constitute Monthly, Quarterly, and Yearly Meetings; the Monthly Meetings sending representatives to the Quarterly, and the Quarterly to the Yearly. Each Yearly Meeting is an independent body, but united with all the others by a common faith. There are two Yearly Meetings in Great Britain, and ten in America. The number of members is about twenty thousand in Great Britain, and eighty thousand on this continent. Besides these, there is a large number of regular attenders of Friends’ meetings, sympathizing with their views.

Hicksites (so called). There are six Yearly Meetings of this body, all in America, with about forty thousand members. They have a flourishing college for both sexes at Swarthmore, near Philadelphia. (See Hicks, Elias.)

Willehad, among his pupils, Lindger, a native learning. Among his helpers were Lebuin and the Weser. Nevertheless, when the Saxons arose, Frisians followed the example; and Christianity was under Wittekind, against Charlemagne, the Frisians nearly driven out of the country together with Frisian. In the latter part of the eighth century the Anglo-Saxons. One missionary followed the other. Winfred, too, made his first and his last attempt as a missionary in Friesland. Willibrord, the apostle of the Frisians (700–730), procured a foothold for Christianity in the country. The conversion of the Frisians seems at that time to have been what we now would call a fashion among the people together with the Franks. It was not Frankish missionaries, however, who converted the Frisians, but Anglo-Saxon. The Franks and the Frisians did not understand each other, but the Anglo-Saxons and the Frisians did. St. Amandus (626) and Eligius (641) met with resistance, who professed the same views of the Lord’s Supper. But he not only persisted in his views on purgatory, but wrote in prison a treatise on the Lord’s Supper, in which he declared transubstantiation. He was tried, and condemned by Dr. Stokesly, Bishop of London, to the stake. He was burned at Smithfield, in company with Andrew Hewet, a tailor’s apprentice, who professed the same views of the Lord’s Supper. Frith was regarded as an able and learned man by his contemporaries. He was the first English martyr for the true doctrine of the Lord’s Supper, and the first of the Reformers of England to write against transubstantiation. Besides the treatises already mentioned, he put forth a tract on Baptism, and A Mirror or Glass to know thyself. His writings are published in vol. iii. of the Actes and Monumentes. For his life, see that volume, and Foxe’s Acts and Monuments. of the sacred documents. His principal works are Latin commentaries on Matthew (1829), Mark (1830), and the Epistle to the Romans (1836–43), 3 vols., all marked by great philological learning and acumen. He always lectured in Latin. He was by nature a controversialist, and gave stinging blows.

FROMENT, Antoine, b. at Triers, near Grenoble, 1509 or 1510; d. in Geneva at an unknown date, but after 1574; entered early into relations with Faber Stapulensis, Marguerite of Navarre, Farel, and the whole party of Reformers, and exercised considerable influence on the reformatory movement in its beginning. In 1529 he labored at Aigh, in 1530 at Tavannes, in 1531 at Bienne and Grandson. In 1532 he arrived at Geneva. As it was not possible to preach the Reformation there openly, he established a school, and advertised that he would teach everybody, young or old, man or woman, to read and write the French language in one month. People crowded to the school, where they were taught, not only of Christendom, John of Damascus, Irenaeus, Gregorius of Nyssa, Basil, etc., he published La Cause des Éclectes Nègres (1788, 2 vols.), which attracted great attention in France.

FROUDE, Richard Hurrell, an ardent supporter of the Oxford movement; b. March 25, 1843, at Dartington, Devonshire; d. there Feb. 28, 1886. He was educated at Eton and Oxford; elected fellow of Oriel College, 1866; and ordained priest, 1829. During the last four years of his life he resided in Southern Europe and the West Indies. He was a man of fair talents and a love of the pure and good, but of gloomy temper and ungovernable will, as his mother's letters expressly testify. He was a brother of the well-known historian. See Newman's Apologia, also Tractarians.

FRUCTUOUS, the apostle of the Subves and Lusitanians, Archbishop of Braga, in Galicia, since 656; d. about 670; was educated in the episcopal school of Palencia, and sold his estates in order to get money for the foundation of monasteries, of which he had built no less than seven, in Lusitania, Asturia, and Galicia, up to 647; and he continued building to his death. There exist two sets of rules written down by him for his monks. The first (Regula Complutensis) is based on the rule of St. Benedict, and written for the monks of Complutum (not the famous place in Castile, the present Alcala, but a place of the same name, probably in Asturia or Leon). It fixes the life of the monks in the minutest details. Not only they should not walk about or speak without the permission of the superior, but they were compelled before crossing the church to kneel, or rise from their seats, unless on a given signal. The other (Regula Communis) regards cases in which a whole family entered a monastery. All family ties were immediately dissolved, and all the property appropriated by the monasteries. Both rules are given by Joseph X-Brockie, in Cod. reg. monasticorum, II. See Montalembert: Monks of the West, II.

FRY, Elizabeth, an eminent philanthropist, daughter of John Gurney, a Friend; was b. near Norwich, Eng., May 21, 1790; d. at Ramsgate, Oct. 13, 1845. She was of fascinating manners, and manifested little interest in religious matters until her eighteenth year. At twenty she married Joseph Fry, a wealthy London merchant. At the death of her father, in 1808, she spoke for the first time in public, and was soon recognized as a minister among the Friends. Her attention was being drawn in 1813, by a report of Friends, to the wretched condition of criminals in the jails, she visited the prison at Newgate. "The filth, the closeness of the rooms, the ferocious manners and expressions of the women toward each other, and the abandoned wickedness which every thing bespoke, are quite indescribable," were her own words in describing what she had seen.

Mrs. Fry at once instituted measures for the amelioration of prison morals and life, daily visiting the prison, reading to the prisoners the Scriptures, and teaching them to sew. A committee of ladies was soon organized to carry on the work on a larger scale. These labors effected a complete change in the condition of the criminals. Riot, licentiousness, and filth were exchanged for order, sobriety, and comparative neatness of person. Previously many who had entered the prison only comparatively abandoned, left completely daubed. Now the process was reversed, and many profligate characters went out of the prison renewed. The mayor and aldermen early took notice of these labors, and acknowledged their beneficence.

In 1818, in company with her brother, J. J. Gurney, Mrs. Fry visited the prisons of Northern England and Scotland, and in 1827 those of Ireland. Kindred societies for the help of female criminals were organized in other parts of Great Britain; and the fame of her labors attracted the interest, and stimulated the competition, of women in foreign lands. In 1830, 1840, and 1841 she visited the Continent, extending her travels as far as Hungary. She found the condition of the prisons lamentable. In Hungary many of the criminals slept in stocks, and whipping was universally practised, even to bastinadoing. Her example and immediate efforts secured remedial legislation, and the organization of prison-reform societies in Holland, Denmark, France, Prussia, and other Continental countries. In the mean while her efforts secured the organization of a society (1839) for the care of the criminals after their discharge from prison, and for the visitation of the vessels that carried the convicts to the colonies.

Mrs. Fry did not confine her labors to prison reform. She successfully prosecuted a plan to supply coast vessels and seamen's hospitals with libraries. A governmental grant was supplemented by liberal private donations which enabled her and the society to distribute 52,464 volumes among 620 libraries (report for 1836).

After several years of growing feebleness, she died at Ramsgate, full of faith, and interested, to the very hour of her departure, in labors of charity for the seamen. A fitting memorial was erected to her in the Elizabeth Fry Refuge. Mrs. Fry was a woman of even temper, great practical skill, tenderness of heart, and deep knowledge of Scripture. Her maxim was "Charity to the soul is the soul of charity," and Sir James Mackintosh rightly characterized her as the "female Howard." See Lives of Mrs. Fry by Timson (Lond., 1847) and Corder (Lond., 1853), also Journals and Letters, edited by her daughter, London, 1847.

Fulcher of Chartres, b. about 930; d. about 1029; was educated by Bishop Odo of Chartres, and in Gerbert's school at Rheims; founded in 968 a school himself at Chartres, which soon rivaled even that of Rheims, and in which Berengarius of Tours was a pupil; and was elected Bishop of Chartres in 1007. He left, besides some hymns and minor essays, a hundred and thirty-eight letters, which are of great interest for the history of his time, and are found in Migne: Patrolog. Lat., vol. 140.

Fulcher of Chartres was chaplain to Baldwin, the second king of Jerusalem, and wrote Gesta peregrinacion Francorum, a history of the crusaders up to 1137. The best edition of it is that by Duchesne, in Script. Hist. Franc., Tom. IV.

Fulco, minister of Neully, near Paris, and one of the most popular preachers of his time; d. 1202; seems to have led a rather supercilious life of pleasure until a great change suddenly took place with him in 1192. He went every week-day to Paris to study under Peter Cantor; and the sermons he delivered on Sundays began to attract the greatest attention. Soon he preached, not only in the church, but also in the marketplace, not only in Neully, but also in Paris and all the great cities of France. In 1198 he was charged by Innocent III. with preaching the fourth crusade; and in 1201, he asserted that more than two hundred thousand had received the cross from his hands. Of most importance, however, was, perhaps, the influence he exercised on his own colleagues, whom his words and example led to a more conscientious fulfillment of the duties of their office. See Jacob a Vitriaco and Otton de St. Blosio, in Recueil des Historiens de la France, vol. xviii.; Geoffrey de Ville-Harouin: Chronique de la prise de Constantinople, and in Buchon: Coll. des chroniques nationales francaises, vol. iii.

Fulda, The Monastery of, was founded in 744, by St. Boniface, who lies buried there. The place was selected by Sturm, a pupil of Boniface; the ground was given by Duke Karlmann; the internal organization was adopted from Monte Cassino and the rule of St. Benedict. In 754 the Pope sanctioned the institution, and exempted the abbey from episcopal authority, placing it immediately under the papal see. The first abbot was Sturm; and before his death, in 779, the number of monks had increased to four hundred. New donations were given by Pepin and Charlemagne; and under the leadership of Rabanus Maurus, himself a pupil of Fulda, the school became the centre, not only of learning, but of general progress and civilization in Germany. It gave instruction in theology, grammar, rhetoric, dialectics, mathematics, physics, and astronomy. Among its pupils were Walafrid Strabo, Serenus Lupus, Otfrid, etc. It also cultivated the arts. Isambert, Rudolf, Candidus, Hatto, and others of its monks, were celebrated artists; and great numbers of well-trained artisans, weavers, tanners, carpenters, etc., spread from its rooms over all Germany. After the time of Rabanus Maurus, the school lost some of its lustre, though it continued to exercise a great and beneficial influence for several centuries. Under Abbot Werner (985-982) the monastery obtained the primacy among the abbeys of Germany and Gaul; and Otho I. gave the abbey the title and dignity of arch-chancellor of the realm. In the fourteenth century the abbey successfully resisted an attack of the burghers of the city of Fulda, and... in the sixteenth it fortunately escaped the Reformation; but its significance as a social institution is of course lost long ago.

FULGENTIUS FERRANDUS, a friend or relation of Fulgentius of Ruspe, whom he followed into banishment under Thrasimund, king of the Vandals, and with whom he lived at Cagliai, in Sardinia, until 523, when he returned to Carthage, where he became a deacon, and died before 547. He left a Vita Fulgentii Ruspeensis, a Brevislat Canonum (of great interest for the history of canon law), and a number of Letters, of which especially one addressed to the Roman deacons Pelagius and Anatolius, concerning the Three-Chapters controversy, is of great interest. His works were first published by W. Pirkheimer (Nuremb., 1520), and most completely by Mangeant (Paris, 1841), also in MIGNE: Patrol. Lat., vol. 67.

FULGENTIUS OF RUSPE, b. at Telepte, a city of North Africa, 408; d. at Ruspe, in the province of Byzacena, Jan. 1, 533; belonged to a distinguished senatorial family, and was educated for a brilliant political career, but felt himself so strongly drawn towards a life of devotion, seclusion, and asceticism, that he entered a monastery, very much against the wishes of his family. After a journey to Sicily, Italy, and Rome, occasioned by the Arian King Thrasi mund's persecutions of the Catholics, he was chosen Bishop of Ruspe in 508, but was shortly after banished, together with sixty other Catholic bishops, from North Africa. He settled in Sardinia, and remained there till 523, when the death of Thrasimund allowed him to return. A year before his death he retired from office, and spent his last days in a monastery. As well during his exile, as before and after, he developed a great literary activity; and his writings, among which the most prominent are Contra Arianos, Ad Moni mum, De Divinù, De Incarnatione, De Veritate Praedestinationis, etc., contributed very much to stop the progress of Semi-Pelagianism, and establish a modified Augustinianism. They were first published by W. Pirkheimer (Nurembr., 1520), and most completely by Mangeant (Paris, 1841), also in MIGNE: Patrol. Lat., vol. 63. See Act. Sanct., Jan., 1; WIGGERS: Augustin und Pelagius, II. 369 sqq.

WAGENMANN.

FULK, William, D.D., an able Puritan divine; b. in London some time before 1538 (as we learn incidentally from his own statements); d. Aug. 1589. Educated at Cambridge, he became fellow of St. John's College. He studied law for six years; but, turning his attention to the ministry, he espoused the Puritan cause and became a most zealous champion of Puritanism. A sermon preached in 1565 against popish habits in ecclesiastical establishments evoked the opposition of the university authorities. Refusing from his office, he was made, in succession, rector of Wareley and Kedington. After a trip to the Continent, he was chosen (1578) Master of Pembroke Hall and Margaret Professor of Divinity. On a tablet erected to his memory at Kedington are these two lines amongst others:

"His works will show him free from all error, Rome's foe, Truth's champion, and the Remishes' terror."

They indicate the general tenor of Fulke's life. He was a fearless opponent of Romanism, at different times being engaged in public disputations with Papists. In controversy he was one of the ablest divines of his day. His principal works are, Conflation of a libelle, etc. (1571), The Discovery of the Dangerous Rock of the Papish Church (1580), Defence of the sincere and true transl. of the Holy Scriptures into Engl. against the Carils of Gregory Martin (1588), recently published by the Parker Society, Cambridge, 1845. He was also the author of some works against astrology. See BROOK, Lives of the Puritans, I. p. 355 sqq., Lond., 1813, and the Memoir prefixed to the volume of the Parker Society.

FULLER, Andrew, a distinguished Baptist divine; b. at Wicken, Cambridgeshire, Feb. 6, 1734; d. at the appliance of D. D. by Princeton and Yale Colleges, but never used the title. Mr. Fuller's reputation rests, not upon his pulpit achievements, but upon his services as a theological writer, and a promoter of Baptist missionary efforts. He stood in intimate relations with Carey, and contributed to awaken in his mind an interest in the heathen. He was one of the founders of the Baptist Missionary Society in a back-parlor at Kettering, Oct. 2, 1792, and was made its first secretary. As a theological writer, one of his biographers (Dr. Ryland) pronounces him "the most judicious and able theological writer that ever belonged to the Baptist denomination." He shared with Robert Hall and John Foster a first place in the esteem of the Baptists of his day. His principal works are the following. The Gospel Worthy of all Acceptation, a work which involved him in controversy of nearly twenty years. In opposition to hyper-Calvinism, he here elaborates the principle that all may apply to such writers as Thomas Paine. The Calcinis benefits. "No man is an unbeliever," he says, "but because he will be so." The Gospel its own Witness, an able criticism upon Deism, and reply to such writers as Thomas Paine. The Calvinistic and Socinian Systems Examined, pronounced by Robert Hall to be his ablest work. Expository Notes on Genesis, 2 vols. Dialogues and Letters between Crispus and Gaius, containing discussions of Total Depravity and other theological topics.

LIT. — Complete Works, Am. ed., 1833, 2 vols., with Memoir by his son, Andrew Gunton Fuller; Lives of Fuller, by his friend JOHN RYLAND, D.D. (Lond., 1816), J. W. MORRIS (Lond., 1830), and THOMAS EKINS FULLER, his grandson (Lond., 1863).

FULLER, Richard, D.D., an eloquent Baptist preacher; b. in Beaufort, S.C., April 22, 1804; d. in Baltimore, Oct. 20, 1876, from a malignant carbuncle. After graduating at Harvard (1824), he practised law in his native town, where he soon secured a lucrative practice. In the meetings of the great revivalist Rev. Daniel Baker, in 1832, he was converted, and joined the Baptist Church. "His case was a very clear and delightful one," is an entry in Mr. Baker's journal, referring to him. He was ordained the same year, and began his ministry in Beaufort. In 1847 he became pastor of the Seventh Baptist Church in Baltimore, and in 1871 removed with a part of the congregation to the fine new edifice on Eutaw Place.

Dr. Fuller was a man of fine presence of body, and endowments of mind. He was a born orator, and is said to have carried off, on several occasions, the honors with Webster and Clay on the platform. As a preacher he stood in the front rank of the most eloquent and scriptural of his generation. He was for a time co-editor of the Baltimore Herald, and published Letters on the Roman Chancery (Balt., 1840), Baptist and Communion (Balt., 1841), and a number of sermons in pamphlet form. See Cuthbert: Life of R. Fuller, N.Y., 1879.

FULLER, Thomas, D.D., a learned and witty divine and church-historian; b. 1608, at Aldwinkle, Northamptonshire, where his father was rector; d. Aug. 16, 1661, in London. He was educated at Cambridge, and in 1631 was made fellow of Sidney College, and prebend of Salisbury. This year he issued his first publication, David's Haimous Sine, Henrie Repentance and Henrie Punishment. In 1634 he was made rector of Broad Windsor, and, 1641, lecturer of the Savoy in London. The year before, he published at Cambridge The Hist. of the Holy War, an account of the Crusades, and in 1642 The Hist. of the Holy and Prophane States, an interesting collection of essays and biographies. Fuller was a Royalist; and in 1643 he entered the Royal army as chaplain, but kept a prudent silence during the Commonwealth period. During his service in the army, he began the investigations which resulted in a work, published after the author's death (1692), entitled History of the Worthies of England, Undertaken by Tho. Fuller, D.D. The subject matter of this work is treated under the several counties of England and Wales, and includes the most varied information about their products, animals, buildings, battles, proverbs, eminent men, etc. In 1650 he issued his Piscatory, or the sight of Palestine and the Confines thereof, with the history of the Old and New Testament acted thereon. Fuller was presented with the living of Waltham Abbey in 1648, and at the Restoration, in 1660, was re-admitted to his lectureship in the Savoy, and made chaplain in extraordinary to the king.

In 1656 Fuller published his great work, Church Hist. of Britain from the birth of Jesus Christ to the year 1648, to which was subjoined a Hist. of the University of Cambridge. This, as all of his works, abounds in quaint humor and epigrammatic sayings. He was an inveterate punster, and delighted in striking alliterations, but was also recognized by his contemporaries as a "perfect walking library." His memory is also reported to have performed almost incredible feats. He was able to repeat five hundred strange words after hearing them twice, and on one occasion undertook to repeat unceasingly the alphabet forwards and backwards in regular order all the shop-signs along the street from Temple Bar to Cheapside, after passing them once, and accomplished it. Coleridge says that "he was incomparably the most sensible, the least prejudiced, great man of an age that boasted a galaxy of great men."

LIT.—Amongst the works by Fuller not already mentioned are his devotional manuals, Good Thoughts in Bad Times (1645), Good Thoughts in Worse Times (1647), Mixture Contemplations in Better Times (1660); all bearing upon the vicissitudes of the Royalist cause, but containing thoughts for all times, and which to-day are read with delight and profit. Most of Fuller's works have been republished in this century. The best edition of his Church History is that of J. Nichols, 3 vols., Lond., 1868; Of the Worthies of England, by Nuttall, 3 vols., Lond., 1840. See the biographies by Russell (Lond., 1844) and of Bailey (Lond., 1874), the latter an exhaustive work.

FUNCK, Johann, b. at Wöhrd, a suburb of Nuremberg, Feb. 7, 1518; beheaded at Königsberg, Oct. 25, 1566; studied theology at Wittenberg, and was appointed preacher in his native town in 1539, but was dismissed by the magistrate of Nuremberg in 1547, on the approach of the emperor. In the same year he entered the service of Duke Albrecht of Prussia; was made court-preacher in 1549; became one of Ossiander's most ardent adherents, and after his death the leading representative of his ideas, and exercised, through his intimacy with the duke, a decisive influence on all affairs in Prussia, political as well as ecclesiastical. Though he in 1556 became reconciled with the Wittenberg theologians, and in 1563 actually retracted what he had written in defence of Ossiander, he was, nevertheless, in 1566, put under the accusation of heresy, and disturbance of the peace, and condemned. Of his Chronologia ab orbe cond., the first part appeared in 1545, the rest in 1552. See C. A. Hase: Herzog Albrecht von Preussen u. sein Hofprediger [Funck], Leipzig, 1879. W. Möller.

FUNDAMENTAL DOCTRINES OF CHRISTIANITY. The distinction between fundamental and non-fundamental doctrines is a useful one, as adapted, by bringing out in sharp outline the great cardinal articles of the Christian faith, to unify the various parts of the Christian Church, and to develop a spirit of tolerance towards each other with regard to the fundamens of lesser importance in which they disagree.

History. — The Roman-Catholic Church rejects the distinction (Wetzer and Welte, art. Dogma, III. pp. 185 sqq.) on the ground that it resolves doctrines into essential or necessary, and unessential or incidental. Although it is not universally made by Protestant theologians, it early came into use. Hunnius, in 1626, was the first to use the distinction in the Lutheran Church in his De fundamentali disensu doctrine Luth. et Calvin. (the fundamental difference in the Lutheran and Calvinistic theologies). He was followed by Quenstedt and others, and recently by Philippi (Glaubenslehre, i. 73 sqq.), who, starting from the atonement as the constitutive principle, defines as fundamental all articles which necessarily follow from it.

In England the distinction was urged by the younger Turretin, Chillingworth, Stillingfleet, Waterland, and others in the interest of ecclesiastical toleration; Lord Bacon having before, in his FUNDAMENTAL DOCTRINES.

Adventures of Learning, insisted upon distinguishing "between points fundamental and points," which he calls "points of further perfection." The Parliament in 1643 treated Christianity to all who professed the "Fundamentals," and appointed a commission, consisting of Archbishop Ussher (who resigned, his place being filled by Baxter), Owen, Goodwin, and others, to define what these were. Baxter was for holding to the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments. But the commission drew up sixteen articles, which were presented to Parliament, and only missed ratification by its sudden dissolution. Neal (Hist. Puritans, II. pp. 143 sq., Harpers' ed.) gives a full account of this movement. The varying importance of the doctrines of the Christian system and the growing tolerance of this century have produced the conviction that it is desirable to emphasize the more important articles. The Evangelical Alliance, which was organized 1846, on the assumption that agreement in fundamentals is a sufficient foundation for Catholic communion, adopted a constitution of nine articles.

Definition.—The distinction of fundamentals and non-fundamentals is based upon the valid assumption that some articles are of greater importance than others. It is justified by the example of Paul in his teaching over against the Judaizing tendencies of his time. The following distinctions will help us in defining the term:

1. Fundamental when applied to articles does not imply that they are the only articles which it is expedient or desirable for a church to teach, and the individual to believe. The apostasy of the angels, the eternal duration of future punishment, the single or double procession of the Holy Spirit (the Filioque clause being rejected by the Greek Church), may all be scriptural doctrines which are not synonymous with the doctrines essential to salvation. The latter depend upon the answer to two questions,—"What do ye of Christ?" and "What must I do to be saved?" A living faith in Christ as the Son of God for the salvation of the world is essential to salvation, and sufficient for it (John vi. 47; Acts xvi. 31). The fundamental doctrines of Christianity are broader in their scope. They concern it as an objective system of truth.

2. The fundamental doctrines of Christianity are not to be confused with the distinctive tenets of a denomination. Denominational differences may be important, but the mode of baptism, for example, or the particular theory of the decrees (however valuable a right view on this subject may be as a constructive principle in dogmatic theology), or the special form of ecclesiastical polity, cannot be regarded as fundamental. Christianity might not do as well with one class of opinions on these subjects (say, baptism by sprinkling, supralapsarianism, and the congregational principle of church government) as it would with another; but it would still remain radically unchanged, and continue to exert its beneficial influence.

3. The fundamental doctrines of Christianity are not synonymous with the doctrines essential to salvation. "The latter depend upon the answer of the individual to two questions,—"What think ye of Christ?" and "What must I do to be saved?" A living faith in Christ as the Son of God for the salvation of the world is essential to salvation, and sufficient for it (John vi. 47; Acts xvi. 31). The fundamental doctrines of Christianity are broader in their scope. They concern it as an objective system of truth.

4. Again: the term fundamental is not applied to doctrines which distinguish Christianity from natural religion. There is a distinction between the fundamentals of religion and those of Christianity. Religion is possible on the basis of the superstructure of the Christian religion needs a broader and deeper foundation. But some of the tenants which Christianity has in common with natural religion, as the existence of God, are fundamental to the former.

5. The Apostles' Creed, though a most venerable and excellent summary of the Christian's faith, is not a perfect statement of the fundamental articles of Christianity. On the one hand, it brings out only by implication the doctrine of atonement, passes over entirely the Scriptures, and on the other, as Waterland puts it, is in this connection "peculiar in excess."

The fundamental doctrines of Christianity, then, are those which lie at the basis of the Christian system, and without which its professed supernatural aspect (the existence of God and the highest welfare of man) could not, by logical necessity and with subjective certainty, be evolved. Waterland's definition is as follows: "Fundamental, as applied to Christianity, means something so necessary to its being, or at least its well-being, that it could not subsist, or maintain itself tolerably, without it" (p. 103).

The most fundamental doctrine of Christianity is salvation by Christ; and the principle will hold good, that whatever doctrine stands in most necessary connection therewith is the most fundamental. The statement in Rom. i. 1-5 (the divine existence, Scriptures, incarnation, grace, faith, and resurrection) approaches nearest of any passage in Scripture to a comprehensive enumeration of the fundamental doctrines. Waterland enumerated seven: (1) The Creator; (2) Covenant; (3) Charter of the Covenant, or Sacred Writ; (4) Mediator; (5) Repentance and a holy life; (6) Sacraments; (7) Two future states. The central principle from which he started was the Christian covenant. The sacraments, however, can hardly be regarded as a fundamental. We prefer the following statement: (1) The Fatherhood of God; (2) The Trinity; (3) The incarnation; (4) Atonement; (5) Faith or union with Christ, the condition of man's best being; (6) The immortality of the soul; (7) The Scriptures the summary of the divine purposes concerning man.

In defining what is fundamental in Christianity, it is equally desirable to avoid a narrow and a latitudinarian tendency. Certain communions insist upon regarding episcopacy and the authority of the church as fundamental. Individuals might insist upon particular views of original sin, the divine decrees, the inspiration of the Scriptures, or the duration and nature of future punishment. But few of these are touched upon in the Apostles' Creed, and none definitely answered. Divergence of view on these points is of inconsiderable importance in comparison with the cardinal doctrines of God's existence, the Messiah's work, saving faith, the soul's immortality, and the sufficiency of Scripture for human illumination and guidance, and cannot limit the perpetuity of Christianity. It is, however, not to be forgotten that a church may profess these fundamental doctrines, and yet so combine fundamental errors as to modify, if not to completely destroy their force. Of such errors, as held in the Roman-Catholic Church, Sherlock says (p. 314) that "all the wit of man cannot reconcile them with the Christian faith." On the other hand, a religious communion (as the strict Unitarians or Universalists) may deny fundamental truths, and yet sincerely accept Christianity as the only and perfect religion, and Christ as the Lord and Saviour.

FUNERAL. See BURIAL.

FURSEUS, a native of Ireland; founded the abbey Knobbersburg, in East Anglia, with the support of King Sigbert. Leaving Knobbersburg to his brother Foillan, he retired into seclusion, and lived as a hermit, but was by King Penda's persecutions compelled to flee the country, and repaired to France, where, with the support of Chlodvig II., he founded the monastery of Lagny, near Paris, and died between 650 and 654. See Act. Sanct. Jan. 18, vol. 3; MABILLON: Act. Sanct. O. S. B. ad a 650.

FÜRST, Julius, Hebrew lexicographer; b. at Zerkowo, Posen, May 12, 1805; d. in Leipzig, Feb. 9, 1873. He studied at Berlin, Posen, and Breslau, and in 1844 became professor at Leipzig. He was of Jewish descent, and won fame by his Oriental researches. One of his theories was that triliteral should be reduced to biliteral roots. This idea is now generally discarded. In consequence of this and other philological notions, his great Hebräisches u. chaldaisches Handwörterbuch (Leipzig, 1837-61, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1863, 3d ed. by Victor Ryssel, 1876, Eng. trans. by Samuel Davidson, Leipzig, 1865, 1866, 4th ed., 1871) is not generally considered as equal to Gesenius. Probably his best work was upon his Concordantiae Libr. Sacr. V. T. Heb. et Chal. (Leipzig, 1837-40), in which he was sided by Franz Delitzsch, as he handsomely acknowledges. See Concordance. Among his other works (all published in Leipzig) are: Bibliothece Judaica, 1849-63, 3 vols.; Gesch. d. Karäerthums (said to be very inaccurate), 1862-65, 2 vols.; Gesch. d. bib. Lit. u. d. jüd.-hell. Schriftkuns, 1867-70, 2 vols.; and Kanon d. A. T. nach d. Uebertief. in Talmud u. Midrasch, 1868. Fürst's books evince great learning, but must be used with caution, for they are not reliable.

The FOREIGN THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY was commenced in 1846, and from that time to this Four Volumes yearly (or 148 in all) have appeared with the utmost regularity.

The Publishers decided to begin a NEW SERIES with 1880, and so give an opportunity to many to subscribe who are possibly deterred by the extent of the former Series.

With this view, Messrs. CLARK beg to announce as in preparation:
DR. KEIL'S HANDBOOK OF BIBLICAL ARCHAEOLOGY.
GOEBEL'S PARABLES OF JESUS.
REUSCH'S BIBLE AND NATURE.
WEISS'S LIFE OF CHRIST.

From time to time other works will be added to this list; but the Publishers are sanguine enough to believe that a Series containing the works of writers so eminent, upon the most important subjects, cannot fail to secure support.

The Binding of the Series is modernized, so as to distinguish it from the former Series.

The Subscription Price will remain as formerly, 21s. annually for Four Volumes, payable in advance.

MEYER'S

"Meyer has been long and well known to scholars as one of the very ablest of the German expositors of the New Testament. We are not sure whether we ought not to say that he is unrivalled as an interpreter of the grammatical and historical meaning of the sacred writers. The Publishers have now rendered another seasonable and important service to English students in producing this translation."—Guardian.

CRITICAL AND EXEGETICAL

COMMENTARY ON THE NEW TESTAMENT.

By Dr. H. A. W. MEYER, OBERCONSISTORIAL RATH, HANNOVER.

The portion contributed by Dr. MEYER has been placed under the editorial care of Rev. Dr. Dickson, Professor of Divinity in the University of Glasgow; Rev. Dr. CROMBIE, Professor of Biblical Criticism, St. Mary's College, St. Andrews; and Rev. Dr. STEWART, Professor of Biblical Criticism, University of Glasgow.

1st Year—Romans, Two Volumes.
Galatians, One Volume.
2d Year—St. John's Gospel, Vol. II.
Philippians and Colossians, One Volume.
Corinthians, Vol. I.
St. Matthew's Gospel, Two Volumes.
Corinthians, Vol. II.
Ephesians and Philemon, One Volume.
The Thessalonians. (Dr. Lünemann.)
5th Year—Timothy and Titus. (Dr. Huther.)
Peter and Jude. (Dr. Huther.)
Hebrews. (Dr. Lünemann.)
James and John. (Dr. Huther.)

The series, as written by Meyer himself, is completed by the publication of Ephesians with Philemon in one volume. But to this the Publishers have thought it right to add Thessalonians and Hebrews, by Dr. Lünemann, and the Pastoral and Catholic Epistles, by Dr. Huther. So few, however, of the Subscribers have expressed a desire to have Dr. Dümsterdieck's Commentary on Revelation included, that it has been resolved in the meantime not to undertake it.

*I need hardly add that the last edition of the accurate, perspicuous, and learned commentary of Dr. Meyer has been most carefully consulted throughout; and I must again, as in the preface to the Galatians, avow my great obligations to the acumen and scholarship of the learned editor."—BISHOP ELLIOTT in Preface to his 'Commentary on Ephesians.'

"The ablest grammatical exegete of the age."—PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D.

"In accuracy of scholarship and freedom from prejudice, he is equalled by few."—Literary Churchman.

"We have only to repeat that it remains, of its own kind, the very best Commentary of the New Testament which we possess."—Church Bells.

"No exegetical work is on the whole more valuable, or stands in higher public esteem. As a critic he is candid and cautious; exact to minuteness in philology; a master of the grammatical and historical method of interpretation."—Princeton Review.

'Illustrated and defended with an ability and learning which must command the reader's admiration.'—Dublin Review.

'A great contribution to the literature of this subject. M. Janet has mastered the conditions of the problem, is at home in the literature of science and philosophy, and has that faculty of felicitous expression which makes French books of the highest class such delightful reading; . . . in clearness, vigour, and depth it has been seldom equalled, and more seldom excelled, in philosophical literature.'—Spectator.

THE BIBLE DOCTRINE OF MAN.
(Seventh Series of Cunningham Lectures.)
By JOHN LAIDLAW, D.D.,
Professor of Systematic Theology, New College, Edinburgh.

'An important and valuable contribution to the discussion of the anthropology of the sacred writings, perhaps the most considerable that has appeared in our own language.'—Literary Churchman.

'The work is a thoughtful contribution to a subject which must always have deep interest for the devout student of the Bible.'—British Quarterly Review.

'Dr. Laidlaw's work is scholarly, able, interesting, and valuable. . . . Thoughtful and devout minds will find much to stimulate, and not a little to assist, their meditations in this learned and, let us add, charmingly printed volume.'—Record.

'On the whole, we take this to be the most sensible and reasonable statement of the Biblical psychology of man we have met.'—Expositor.

'The book will give ample material for thought to the reflective reader; and it holds a position, as far as we know, which is unique.'—Church Bells.

'The Notes to the Lectures, which occupy not less than 180 pages, are exceedingly valuable. The style of the lecturer is clear and animated; the critical and analytical judgment predominates.'—English Independent.
Messrs. Clark are now happy to announce the completion of this Series. It has been received with marked approval by all sections of the Christian Church in this country and in the United States, as supplying what has long been felt to be a want, and also on account of the impartiality, learning, and care with which Editors and Translators have executed a very difficult task.

From the Right Rev. the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.
‘A useful, valuable, and instructive Commentary. In all the interpretation is set forth with clearness and cogency, and in a manner calculated to commend the volumes to the thoughtful reader. The book is beautifully got up, and reflects great credit on the publishers as well as the writers.’

From ‘The London Quarterly Review.’
‘The second volume lies before us, and cannot fail to be successful. We have carefully examined that part of the volume which is occupied with St. John—of the Acts we shall speak by and by, and elsewhere—and think that a more honest, thorough, and, in some respects, perfect piece of work has not lately been given to the public. The two writers are tolerably well known; and known as possessing precisely the qualities, severally and jointly, which this kind of labour demands. We may be sure that in them the highest Biblical scholarship, literary taste, and evangelical orthodoxy meet.’

From ‘The Record.’
‘The first volume of this Commentary was warmly recommended in these columns soon after it was published, and we are glad to be able to give as favourable a testimony to the second volume. . . . The commentators have given the results of their own researches in a simple style, with brevity, but with sufficient fulness; and their exposition is, all through, eminently readable. . . . The work is one which students of even considerable learning may read with interest and with profit. The results of the most recent inquiries are given in a very able and scholarly manner. The doctrines of this Commentary are evangelical, and the work everywhere exhibits a reverence which will make it acceptable to devout readers.’

PROFESSOR GODET'S WORKS.

In Three Volumes, 8vo, price 31s. 6d.,

A COMMENTARY ON THE GOSPEL OF ST. JOHN.

BY F. GODET, D.D.,
PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY, NEUCHATEL.

This work forms one of the battle-fields of modern inquiry, and is itself so rich in spiritual truth that it is impossible to examine it too closely; and we welcome this treatise from the pen of Dr. Godet. We have no more competent exegete, and this new volume shows all the learning and vivacity for which the Author is distinguished.—Freeman.

In Two Volumes, 8vo, price 21s.,

THE GOSPEL OF ST. LUKE.

Marked by clearness and good sense, it will be found to possess value and interest as one of the most recent and copious works specially designed to illustrate this Gospel.—Guardian.

In Two Volumes, 8vo, price 21s.,

ST. PAUL'S EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.

We have looked through it with great care, and have been charmed not less by the clearness and fervour of its evangelical principles than by the carefulness of its exegesis, its fine touches of spiritual intuition, and its appositeness of historical illustration.—Baptist Magazine.

DEFENCE OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITH.

TRANSLATED BY THE HON. AND REV. CANON LYTTELTON, M.A., RECTOR OF HAGLEY.

This volume is not unworthy of the great reputation which Professor Godet enjoys. It shows the same breadth of reading and extent of learning as his previous works, and the same power of eloquent utterance.—Church Bells.

Professor Godet is at once so devoutly evangelical in his spirit and so profoundly intelligent in his apprehension of truth, that we shall all welcome these contributions to the study of much debated subjects with the utmost satisfaction.—Christian World.

MODERN DOUBT AND CHRISTIAN BELIEF.

A Series of Apologetic Lectures addressed to Earnest Seekers after Truth.

BY THEODORE CHRISTLIEB, D.D., UNIVERSITY PREACHER AND PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY AT BONN.

Translated, with the Author's sanction, chiefly by the Rev. H. U. Weitbrecht, Ph.D., and Edited by the Rev. T. L. Kingsbury, M.A.

We recommend the volume as one of the most valuable and important among recent contributions to our apologetic literature. . . . We are heartily thankful both to the learned Author and to his translators.—Guardian.

We express our unfeigned admiration of the ability displayed in this work, and of the spirit of deep piety which pervades it; and whilst we commend it to the careful perusal of our readers, we heartily rejoice that in those days of reproach and blasphemy so able a champion has come forward to contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered to the saints.—Christian Observer.
BIBLICO-THEOLOGICAL LEXICON OF NEW TESTAMENT GREEK.

By HERMANN CREMER, D.D.,
PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF GREIFSWALD.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF THE SECOND EDITION (WITH ADDITIONAL MATTER AND CORRECTIONS BY THE AUTHOR)
By WILLIAM URWICK, M.A.

'Dr. Cremer's work is highly and deservedly esteemed in Germany. It gives with care and thoroughness a complete history, as far as it goes, of each word and phrase that it deals with. . . . Dr. Cremer's explanations are most lucidly set out.'—Guardian.

'It is hardly possible to exaggerate the value of this work to the student of the Greek Testament. . . . The translation is accurate and idiomatic, and the additions to the later edition are considerable and important.'—Church Bells.

'A valuable addition to the stores of any theological library. . . . It is what it claims to be, a Lexicon, both biblical and theological, and treats not only of words, but of the doctrines inculcated by those words.'—John Bull.

'We very heartily commend this goodly volume to students of biblical literature.'—Evangelical Magazine.

'We cannot find an important word in our Greek New Testament which is not discussed with a fulness and discrimination which leaves nothing to be desired.'—Nonconformist.

'Cremer's Lexicon is, and is long likely to be, indispensable to students whether of theology or of the Bible, and must always bear witness to his scholarship, erudition, and diligence.'—Expositor.

'A work of immense erudition.'—Freeman.

'This noble edition in quarto of Cremer's Biblico-Theological Lexicon quite supersedes the translation of the first edition of the work. Many of the most important articles have been re-written and re-arranged. . . . We heartily congratulate Mr. Urwick on the admirable manner in which he has executed his task, revealing on his part adequate scholarship, thorough sympathy, and a fine choice of English equivalents and definitions.'—British Quarterly Review.

'As an aid in our search, we warmly commend the honest and laborious New Testament Lexicon of Dr. Cremer.'—London Quarterly Review.

'The judiciousness and importance of Dr. Cremer's design must be obvious to all students of the New Testament; and the execution of that design, in our judgment, fully establishes and justifies the translator's encomiums.'—Watchman.

'A majestic volume, admirably printed and faultlessly edited, and will win gratitude as well as renown for its learned and Christian Author, and prove a precious boon to students and preachers who covet exact and exhaustive acquaintance with the literal and theological teaching of the New Testament.'—Dickinson's Theological Quarterly.

It is really a work of exceptional value; and no one can read it without perceptible gain in theological knowledge."—English Churchman.

Substantially, however, the book remains the same, and the hearty commendation with which we noted its first issue applies to it at least as much now."—Rock.

"The value, the beauty of this volume is that it is a unique contribution to, because a loving and cultured study of, the life of Christ, in the relation of the Master of the Twelve."—Edinburgh Daily Review.
