PREFACE.

The object of the Religious Encyclopædia is to give, in alphabetical order, a summary of the most important information on all branches and topics of theological learning,—exegetical, historical, biographical, doctrinal, and practical,—for the use of ministers, students, and intelligent laymen of all denominations. It will be completed in three volumes.

The Encyclopædia was suggested by the Real-Encyklopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche, edited by Drs. J. J. Herzog, G. L. Plitt, and A. Hauck (Leipzig, 1877 sqq.). This work, with which I have been familiar from its start, as one of the contributors, is universally acknowledged to be an invaluable thesaurus of solid information in all departments of biblical and ecclesiastical learning, under the responsible names of a large number of eminent German and other European scholars. The first edition, edited by Dr. Herzog alone, was begun in 1854, and completed in 1868, in twenty-two volumes. The second edition, thoroughly revised and partly rewritten, is now in course of publication, and will be completed in not less than fifteen volumes. A mere translation of this opus magnum would not answer the wants of the English and American reader.* While many articles are very long, and of comparatively little interest outside of Germany, the department of English and American church history and biography is, naturally, too limited. For instance, the art. Brüder des gemeinsamen Lebens has 82 pages; Eherecht, 35; Gnosis, 43; Jerusalem, 37; Liturgie, 36; Luther, 36; Mandäer, 17; Mani, 36; Melanchthon, 54. These articles are all very good; but a proportionate treatment of important English and American topics which are barely mentioned or altogether omitted, would require a much more voluminous encyclopædia than the original. In the present work few articles exceed four pages; but the reader is throughout referred to books where fuller information can be obtained.

My esteemed friend Dr. Herzog, and his editorial colleagues,—the late Dr. Plitt, who died Sept. 10, 1880, and Professor A. Hauck, who has taken his place, as also the publisher, Mr. H. Rost, who issued the German edition of my Church History—have kindly given me full liberty to make such use of their work in English as I may deem best. It is needless to say that I would not have undertaken the task without a previous honorable understanding with the German editors and publisher.

This ENCYCLOPÆDIA, therefore, is not a translation, but a condensed reproduction and adaptation of all the important German articles, with necessary additions, especially in the literature, and with a large number of new articles by the editors and special contributors. More than one-third of the work is original. Every article is credited to its author, except the majority of editorial articles, which are unsigned. An apology may be due the German authors for abridging their contributions, but we have studied to give all the essential facts. Dissenting opinions, or material additions, are included in brackets. The bibliography has been largely increased throughout, especially by English and American works. Living celebrities are excluded. Denominational articles have been assigned to scholars who represent their denomination in a liberal Christian spirit. On important topics of controversy both sides are given a hearing. It has been the desire of the editors to allow a wide latitude of opinion within the limits of evangelical Christianity.

All important encyclopædias besides that of Dr. Herzog, and a large number of books in different languages, have been carefully consulted, but never used without due acknowledgment. The assistant editors have devoted their whole time and strength to the work, in my library, and under my direction.

I have been fortunate in securing the hearty co-operation of a number of eminent American and English scholars of different denominations and schools of thought, who can speak with authority on the topics assigned them, and will largely increase the original value of this ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

PHILIP SCHAFF.

AUTHORIZATION.

We the undersigned, Editors and Publisher of the "Real-Encyklopädie für Prot. Theologie und Kirche," hereby authorize the Rev. Dr. Schaff of New York to make free use of this work for the preparation and publication, in the United States and in England, of a similar although much shorter work, under the title "A Religious Encyclopaedia, based on the Real-Encyklopädie of Herzog, Plitt, and Hauck.

and Ω, or ALPHA and OMEGA, the combination of the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, is the phrase used three times by our Lord, in the Apocalypse, to set forth his eternity (Rev. i. 8, xxi. 6, xxii. 13). [The E. W. and the received text have it also in i. 11, where the best MSS. omit it.] The idea is much older. In the O. T., Isa. xliv. 6 (comp. xlii. 4, xliii. 10), Jehovah calls himself "The first and the last," in contrast to the perishable idols. In both Testaments the phrase expresses the popular conception of eternity as endless duration, and at the same time the idea of divine causality; the Alpha looking back to the ἀρχή, the beginning, the creation; the Omega, to the τέλος, the end, the completion of the kingdom of God in Christ.

Tertullian (De Monag. c. 5) and Prudentius (Cathemer. hymn. IX, 10–12) use the figure. Marcus the Gnostic discovered that the numerical value of α and Ω was equal to the numerical value of the individual letters composing τοπάρπα (dove); whence he inferred that Christ called himself A and Q with reference to the Holy Spirit, who descended on him at his baptism (Irenaeus, Adv. Haeres. I., 14, 6; 15, 1; Tertullian, De Praescription. c. 50). This trifling was employed by Primasius in his commentary on the Apocalypse (Bibl. Patr. Max. X. p. 338) to prove that the Holy Ghost is of the same substance with the Father.

The combination of α and Ω, by its simplicity and suggestiveness, commended itself as a symbol of Christian faith from the earliest times, and was used extensively on monuments of every description; sometimes alone, but more frequently in connection with the monogram of Christ in its various forms:

Sometimes the two letters, of which the Ω is almost always of that uncial form which resembles the minuscule, are hung by chains from the arms of the cross. One of the oldest instances of the use of the letters is in the catacombs on the Island of Melos, and dates from the first part of the second century or the latter part of the first. (See Ross, Reise auf den griech. Inseln des ägäischen Meeres, vol. III. p. 149.) The oldest coin on which it is used belong to Constance and Constantine, the sons of Constantine the Great. It is found on rings and sigils, in pictures, illustrations, mosaics, reliefs, &c. Occasionally it is used by Protestants, e.g., on the front of the royal mortuary chapel at Charlottenburg, near Berlin, on the altar of the Matthäikirche in Berlin [in the Madison-square Presbyterian Church, New York, and in other American churches].

AA'RON (mountaineer, or, according to another root, enlightened), the first high priest of the Jews, eldest son of Amram and Jochebed, of the tribe of Levi, brother of Miriam and Moses, husband of Elisheba, and father of Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar (Exod. vi. 20, 23); was the "prophet," or mouthpiece, of Moses (Exod. iv. 16), and associated with him in all the preparations for and the actual conduct of the exodus and the subsequent wandering. By divine command he and his sons were set apart for the priesthood, and accordingly were consecrated by Moses (Lev. viii.); and the choice of Aaron as high priest was afterwards miraculously confirmed by the budding rod (Num. xxvii.). Aaron held the office for almost forty years; and it then passed to Eleazar, the older sons having died at the hand of God (Lev. x. 1, 2). The most prominent defect in his character was weakness. He reflected the mood of those about him, and never acted independently. Thus he yielded to the solicitations of the people at Sinai, during the absence of Moses, and made the golden calf (Exod. xxxii. 4). He joined Miriam in her jealous murmuring against Moses (Num. xii.), and subsequently Moses in his impatient disobedience of the divine command at Meribah (Num. xx. 10). For this latter sin he was kept out of the promised land (verse 24). He died on Mount Hor, at the age of a hundred and twenty-three years, in sight of all the people, who mourned sincerely over his death. See Moses, Priest.

ABBY, a religious house under the superintendence of an abbot or abbess. They were of two general classes,—royal abbeys, founded and endowed by kings, which rendered an account of their temporal administration to the crown; and episcopal abbeys, which were directly under the care of the bishops. Their jurisdiction was at first confined to the immediate lands and buildings in possession of the house; but subsequently they very much extended their sway, from town to town, and from city to city, issuing coin, and acting as courts of justice. The abbey and priory of England, a hundred and ninety in number, and possessing lands valued in that day at £2,850,000, were suppressed under Henry VIII., and their property confiscated. Similar was the fate of the French abbeys in the revolution of 1790. See Convent, Monastery, Priory.

ABBO of Fleury, b. near Orleans; d. Nov. 13, 1004. He was educated in the Abbey of Fleury; studied at Rheims and Paris; went in 985, on the invitation of Archbishop Oswald of York, to England, where, since the days of Alfred, studies and learning had sunk so low, that very few priests understood Latin; taught for two years in the school of Ramsery; was chosen Abbot of Fleury in 988, and brought the school of this place to a flourishing condition; so, on the whole, he occupies a prominent position in this barren time which followed after the bloom of the age of Charlemagne. In the synod of St. Denis, 995, he took the part of the monks against the bishops; and when the former aroused the people, and dispersed the latter, he wrote his Apologetica in their defence. He was not a blind partisan, (ib. viii. 15;) the monks he introduced severe reforms in the monasteries of Fleury, Marmontier, Mici, Saint-Père de Chartres, and Réole; and it was the monks who in the last-men tioned place roused the people against him, and caused the riot in which he was killed. His life, written by his pupil Aicyon, is given by Mabillon: Act. Sanct. Ord. Benedict. VI. 1; his Apologetica and a number of very interesting letters by Fr. Pithon: Codex Canonum, Paris. 1687. Many of his works, mathematical, astronomical, historical, and dialectical, still exist in manuscripts, in Hunderhagen (Heidemann).

ABBOT (Greek άββας, Latin Abbas, Italian Abate, French Abbé, German Abt, from the Chaldee or Aramaic form of the common Hebrew word for father) was introduced in the East, first as a general term of respect for any monk, and then as a special title for the superior of a monastery. As such it was afterwards replaced among the Greeks by other terms, as, for instance, Archimandrite; and in the West it was retained only by the order of the Benedictines and its branches,—the Cistercians, Bernhardines, libraries, while Ben Nephthali made a similar collection from those of the Eastern libraries. These collections are the first Hebrew books in which the vowel-signs are given, and to their authors the honor of this invention is often ascribed. See Bible Text, O. T.

ABAD'DON (destruction), in the O. T. the kingdom of the dead, Hades, or Sheol (Job xxvi. 6; Prov. xv. 11). The rabbins used the word of the heathen myth of the infernal regions; and thus the Abol'ss of Lucia wore the title of Episcopo was an entirely exceptional case; but her right to be present at councils and synods was generally acknowledged in the Western Church. See MANNI: Coll. Con. Tom. I. Supp. pp. 519, 523. See Regard: Antiq. of the AngloSaxon Church, I. 139.

ABBOT (Greek άββας, Latin Abbas, Italian Abate, French Abbé, German Abt, from the Chaldee or Aramaic form of the common Hebrew word for father) was introduced in the East, first as a general term of respect for any monk, and then as a special title for the superior of a monastery. As such it was afterwards replaced among the Greeks by other terms, as, for instance, Archimandrite; and in the West it was retained only by the order of the Benedictines and its branches,—the Cistercians, Bernhardines, Trappists, Grandmontanes, and Premonstratensians; while the Carmelites, Augustinians, Dominicans, and Servites used the titles of Protopositus or Prior Conventualis; the Franciscans, those of Custos or Guardianius; the Camaldulensians and Jumilhac, those of Major and Rector, etc. In course of time the titles applied also to other clerical orders, though not monastical offices; and we find abbates castrenses, preachers appointed for army service, abbates curie palatii, etc. Another distinction, not of title only, but also of position, was that between abbates regularis, secularis, and laici. The abbas regularis was elected by the monks, and was not only not monks, but a member of the secular clergy, holding an abbacy in commendam; that is, as a benefice, enjoying the honor of the title, and a certain amount of the revenues, but taking no part in the administration or jurisdiction. From this system of giving monasteries in commendam arose the abbates laici. They were not only not monks, but they did not even belong to the clerical order. They were simply laymen, in the beginning warriors, afterwards courtiers. In the time of Charles Martel it was determined to employ monastic revenues, at least temporarily, for the pressing needs of the warfare against the Saracens; and the noblemen who led the troops raised in this way thus became titular abbots. But the patriotic purpose was soon forgotten; and a practice grew up which, finally, in the time of Louis XIV., became a public scandal.

The abbas regularis was elected by the monks, and from among themselves; only, in cases when a monastery seemed to present no fit subject, he was chosen from another congregation. Originally the right of nomination rested with the bishop of the diocese; but in the middle of the sixth century, during the reign of Justinian, this right was by law transferred to the monks throughout the Western Church, and the bishops retained only the right of institution. The system of commendation, however, and also other circumstances, gave both the bishop and the king manifold opportunities to interfere with the elections. Once elected and confirmed, the abbot held office for life, and could be deposed by the bishop only with the consent of his fellow-presbyters and abbots. With respect to discipline and jurisdiction, his power was almost absolute; and though the praepostus or prior nominated by himself, and the decani and cenabari elected by the monks, could exercise some influence, it became necessary for the councils to enact laws prohibiting abbots from binding or mutilating their monks. In earlier times their power was somewhat checked by the episcopal authority; but, in the beginning of the twelfth century, the Councils of Rheims (1119) and of Rome (1122) entirely emancipated them from the episcopal jurisdiction, and placed them immediately under the pope. In secular things, however, especially with respect to the Abbey property, their power was often very circumscribed; and, as they were unable to interfere in persons with civil suits, it often happened that the advocatus ecclesiae or aeconomus or procurator usurped an exclusive authority over the administration of the revenues. But in a later period, a.s. on the 24th of May 1212, a later date, prohibiting abbots from lending money on usury, limiting the number of their horses and attendants, etc.; and the frequent rumors of debauchery and intrigue were not confined to the abbates laici, but touched also the abbates regularis.

ABBOT, George, b. at Guildford, Oct. 19, 1562; d. at Croydon, Aug. 5, 1633; studied at Balliol College, Oxford; was chosen Master of University College 1597, and appointed Bishop of Lichfield 1600, Bishop of London a month later, and Archbishop of Canterbury within the lapse of a year. In 1604 he was chosen one of the eight Oxford divines who were intrusted with the translation of the New Testament, excepting the Epistles; and in 1608 he accompanied the King to Paris, having manoeuvred about a union between the churches of England and Scotland. In both cases he distinguished himself, but his rapid preferment was nevertheless due as much to his flattery of James I. as to his merit. He showed considerable firmness, however, when once seated in the archiepiscopal chair, both in his relation to the King and the court, and more especially to Laud: he was even suspended for a short time, having refused to license a sermon preached by Dr. Sibthorp, which stretched the royal prerogatives beyond their constitutional bounds. Of his numerous writings, his Geography, or A Brief Description of the Whole World, ran through many editions; and his Exposition on the Prophet Jonah (1600) was reprinted in 1815. A Life of him was published at Guildford in 1797.

ABBOT, Robert, b. at Guildford, 1560; d. at Salisbury, March 2, 1617; elder brother of the archbishop, was, like him, educated at Oxford, where he became Master of Balliol College, and professor-regius of divinity. In 1615 he was made Bishop of Salisbury. He was a learned man and a prolific writer, following his brother's policy, especially in his opposition to Laud; but most of his works, even his Mirror of Popish Subtilties (1594) and Antichristi Demonstratio (1603), have fallen into oblivion.

ABBOT, Robert, b. about 1588; d. about 1657; was at once vicar of Cranbrook, Kent, and minister of Southwick, Hampshire; but, when parliament decided against pluralities of ecclesiastical offices, he gave up the former benefice, though it was the larger. Afterwards he was made rector of St. Austin, Watling Street, London, where he died. Though a strong churchman, and much prized up in his brother's policy, especially among the Brownists, especially the Brownists, he stood as a remarkable specimen of the Puritan type of clergyman of his time; and his prose writings were very popular; as, for instance, his Milk for Babes; or, A Mother's Catechism for her Children, first published in 1640, and often reprinted.

ABBOTT, Jacob, a popular American author, b. at Hallowell, Me., Nov. 14, 1803; d. at Farmington, Me., Oct. 31, 1879. He was graduated at Bowdoin College in 1820; student of theology at Andover, Mass., 1822–24; tutor in Amherst College, 1824–36; professor of mathematics and philosophy, 1825–29; principal of the Mount Vernon School for Girls, in Boston, 1829–34;

ABEEL, David, D.D., an eminent missionary, b. at New Brunswick, N.J., June 12, 1804; d. at Albany, N.Y., Sept. 4, 1844. He was graduated from the seminary of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in his native town, and in 1826 was licensed, and settled at Athens, N.Y.; but failing health compelled him to resign, and at length he went in 1829 as a chaplain of the Seaman's Friend Society to Canton; in that capacity he there remained a year, when he put himself, as had been at first proposed, under the American Board, by whose direction he visited Java and other Eastern countries in order that he might report their true condition. In 1833 he returned home to recruit his health, but on his journey through Europe embraced every opportunity to present the cause of foreign missions. In England he was instrumental in organizing a society for promoting female education in the East. He returned to China, February, 1839, and was the founder of the Amoy Mission, 1844; returned to America, 1845. He was an estimable man, and a sincere and devoted Christian. His gentle, refined manners made him welcome everywhere, and, joined to his practical wisdom, enabled him to wield a wide and consecrated influence.

ABEL (breath). The second son of Adam and Eve, and, according to some, the twin-brother of Cain, who from envy killed him. Abel was a shepherd, the first farmer; and thus the two chief callings of the Hebrews were represented in the first family (Gen. iv. 1-8). Abel was the first "martyr," and hero of faith (Matt. xxiii. 35; Heb. xi. 4). In patristic theology the brothers are regarded as types: as, by Augustine, Abel is the representative of the regenerate or spiritual, Cain of the natural or corrupt, man.

ABEL (meadow), as a prefix, enters into several Hebrew names of places:—

1. ABEL-BETH-MA'ACHAH (meadow of the house of oppression), also called ABEL-MA'AM (meadow of waters), and twice simply ABEL (2 Sam. xx. 14, 18), identified with Abil-el-Kumh, a ruin on a stream north of the waters of Merom, in the north of Palestine, near Damascus (2 Sam. xx. 14, 15; 1 Kings xv. 20; 2 Kings xv. 29).

2. ABEL-MERO'alah (meadow of the dance), a place in the Jordan valley (Judg. vii. 22), interesting because Elisha lived there (1 Kings xix. 16). The identification is uncertain.

3. ABEL-MIZ'RAIM (meadow of Egypt). The name given by the Canaanites to the place, somewhere east of the Jordan, which was the scene of the final "mourning" of the Egyptians over Jacob (Gen. li. 16).

4. ABEL-SHI'TTIM (meadow of the acacias), called Shittim (Num. xxxv. 1),—the last halting-place of the Israelites (Num. xxxvii. 49).

5. "The great Abel" of 1 Sam. vi. 18, a copyist's error for "the great stone."

ABELARD, b. at Palais, a village of Brittany, in 1079; d. in the priory of St. Marcellus, near Chalon, April 21, 1142. He was the eldest son of a knight, the lord of the village. His Christian name was Pierre de Palais (Peter Palatinus); but when he renounced his right of primogeniture, and gave up his claim to his parental inheritance in order to devote his whole life to studies, he assumed the name of Abelard, either from the French abeille, a bee, or from the French beaum, —Latin, bajulus,—a tutor. His first teacher in philosophy was Roscellinus, who kept a school in Lوكmenach, near Vannes, and was a decided Nominalist, declaring all universalia to be merely mental conceptions. His second teacher was William of Champeaux, who presided over the cathedral school of Paris, and was a decided Realist, declaring the \textit{universalia} to be the very essence of all existence, and individuality only the product of incidental circumstances. Between these two extremes, whose bitter opposition to each other forms the moving power in the whole history of scholastic philosophy, Abelard attempted to occupy a position of his own. His positive views, however, such as they are developed in his \textit{Dialectica}, \textit{Glossae in Porphyrium, in Categorias, in Topica Boètii}, &c., are vague and even self-contradictory. In philosophy, as in theology, he is merely a critic; but his criticism is as bold as it is brilliant, and in many points it placed him far in advance of his age. He attacked William of Champeaux, and compelled him to alter his system,—a feat only to be compared with the gaining of a decisive battle. After this success, he opened a school of his own,—though he was still a very young man,—first at Melun, then at Corbeil, and finally at Paris. But William, though beaten, was still a powerful man. Abelard was compelled to leave Paris; and about 1113 he staid at Laon, where he studied theology under Anselm, a pupil of Anselm of Canterbury. Shortly after, however, he returned to Paris, William having retired; and now followed the most brilliant period of his life. He taught both theology and philosophy, and more than five thousand pupils gathered around his chair. Nearly all the great men of the age, both within and without the Church, heard Abelard. Celestine II. and Arnold of Brescia were both among his pupils; and his books "went across the sea and the Alps." But this brilliant career was suddenly checked by his relation to Heloise.

Heloise was a young girl of eighteen years, an illegitimate daughter of a canon, and living in the house of her uncle, the Canon Fulbert of Paris. She was very studious, and her further instruction was confided to Abelard. A passionate love sprang up between them; and they eloped to the house of Abelard's sister, where Heloise bore a son, Astralabius. In order to reconcile Fulbert, the two lovers were married; but, from a regard to the ecclesiastical career of Abelard, it was determined to keep the marriage secret. To this Fulbert would not consent; and when Abelard brought his wife to a Benedictine nunery at Argenteuil, near Paris, Fulbert suspected an attempt to get rid of her by making her a nun, and sought revenge. One night he fell upon Abelard, and had him mutilated, thereby preventing him from ever holding any ecclesiastical office. Broken by shame and anguish, Abelard retired to the Monastery of St. Denis, and here he lived quietly for a couple of years (about 1118), teaching in a secluded place—the \textit{cela}—built for the purpose. But his views of Dionysius Areopagita, the patron saint of the monastery and of France, brought him in conflict with the monks. He fled, but was compelled to return and recant; and though he afterwards was allowed to retreat into the wilderness of Nogent, near St. Denis, outside of Paris, he lived for a time at Clugny, where he built an oratory,—the so-called \textit{Paracletus},—he was still subject to the authority of the abbot of St. Denis. The original \textit{Paracletus} was made of reeds and sedges; but so many pupils gathered around the celebrated teacher, that soon a building of stone could be erected. Abelard, however, felt miserable. One of his principal theological works, \textit{De Unitate et Trinitate Divina}, was condemned by the Council of Soissons, 1121, and he lived in perpetual fear of persecution. He accepted the election as abbot of the Monastery of St. Gildasius at Ruys, in Brittany; but here he literally fell among a gang of ruffians. It was impossible for him to establish discipline. Twice the monks tried to poison him. Finally they attempted to strangle him, and he had to flee for his life. Meanwhile Heloise had moved to the \textit{Paracletus}, the Monastery of Argenteuil having been closed in 1127; and here Abelard lived for some time; but his stay caused scandal, and he left. For several years—until the conflict with his great adversary, Bernard of Clairveaux, begins—the continuity of his life is lost to us. We only know that John of Salisbury heard him teach in the school on the hill of St. Geneveva, in Paris, in 1136, and that he wrote his autobiography, \textit{Historia Calamitatum}, during these years.

As a theologian, Abelard was a disciple of Anselm of Canterbury; but being by nature a critic, while Anselm was a mystic, his dialectics drove him on every point beyond the pale of the established faith. The doctrine of the Trinity, which forms the centre of his theology, he always treats in harmony with the \textit{loci theologici}, but contradicts each other at every point, without any solution being offered. At the Council of Sens, 1140, Bernard presented a formal accusation of heresy; and Abelard left the council without defending himself, and appealed directly to the pope. But Bernard wrote himself to the pope, denouncing Arnold of Brescia as one of the champions of Abelard; and Innocent III., now decided against the latter, forbade him to write or teach any more, and ordered his writings to be burnt. By the friendly mediation of Peter Venerabilis, abbot of Cluny, he was allowed to spend the rest of his days in that place. He continued his studies, "read always, prayed frequently, and kept silent." He died (sixty-three years old) on a visit to St. Marcellus, and was buried in the \textit{Paracletus}. Heloise died May 16, 1164, and her body was laid in the same coffin, beside that of Abelard. They now lie together in the famous tomb at Père-Lachaise, Paris.

\textbf{LIT.} — A complete edition of Abelard's works, philosophical, theological, poetical, and letters, was given by \textit{Cousin}, 2 vols., Paris, 1848 and 1859. In Migne's edition: \textit{Patrol.}, vol. 175, the \textit{Dialectica} and the \textit{Sic et Non} are lacking. Separately have been published: \textit{Epistola}, by \textit{Richard Rawlinson}, London, 1718; \textit{Historia Calamitatum} by Orelli, Turin, 1841; \textit{Sic et Non} by Henke and West, and \textit{Sic et Non} and \textit{De Unitate} by \textit{I. ABITHAI (or Abithai, m. acceptableness, i.e. liberal), the tenth high priest of the Jews, and fourth in descent from Eli, and the last priest of the house of Ithamar. In consequence of his support of Adonijah, he was deposed by Solomon (1 Kings ii. 27). This act put an end to the double high priesthood, and thus deprived the party of David, and Solomon, of the party of Saul, and, as Abiathar also fulfilled the prophecy made to Eli (1 Sam. ii. 31).

ABGARUS, the name, or perhaps the title, of a series of toparchs reigning, during a period of three and a half centuries,—up to A.D. 217,—over Osroeus, the north-western part of Mesopotamia, with the capital of Edessa. Of the fifteenth of these toparchs Eusebius tells (Eccl. Hist. i. 13), that suffering terribly from diseases, and having heard of the miracles of Jesus, he sent a letter to him, professing belief in his Messiahship, and asking him to come to Edessa and help him. To this letter Jesus transmitted an answer, promising, that since he could not come himself, he would, after his death, send one of his disciples to him. Both these letters Eusebius claims to have found in the archives of Edessa, and to have translated literally from the Syriac text; and he adds, from similar sources, that Thaddaeus, one of the seventy, was sent by the apostle Thomas to Edessa, that he cured the king, and preached Christianity, etc. In the fifth century Moses Chorenensis repeats this story in his Hist. Arm. ii. 30–33, and adds that Christ sent a portrait of himself to Abgar; that Abgar wrote about Christ to the Emperor Tiberius, to Nerses, King of Assyria, and Ardashis, King of Persia, etc. In the East the truth of these stories was never doubted, nor the genuineness of the letters; and even in the West, though a Roman synod of 494 declared the letters apocryphal (Mansi: Collect. Concil. VIII. 159), both Rome and Genoa still claim to be in possession of the original picture (W. Grimm: Die Sage vom Ursprung des Christusbildes, Berlin, 1849); and the genuineness of the letters has been defended by Weitz in Tüb. Quartalschrift, 1842, and by F. W. Rinck in Zeitschrift f. d. hist. Theologie, 1843. [See R. A. Lipsius: Die ecleziesische Abgar-Sage. Braunschweig, 1880.]

K. SCHMIDT.

ABIJAH (whose father is Jehovah). The name of several men and of one woman (the mother of Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxix. 1) mentioned in the Bible. The only one of importance was the second king of Judah, called in Kings Abijam, who succeeded his father Rehoboam (B.C. 959). He only reigned a part of three years, and even in that short period fell from Jehovah to idol worship; nor was his promising attempt to recover the allegiance of the ten tribes followed up as it should have been, and the kingdom grasped firmly (2 Chron. xiii. 16, 20). Lust and idolatry were his ruin.

ABILENE (from Abila). The tetrarchy governed by Lysians in the time of John the Baptist (Luke iii. 1). It was a small district of Celsyria, upon the eastern slopes of Anti-Lebanon, north-west from Damascus. Abila the capital was on the Barada, and stood in a gorge called Suk Wady Barada, eighteen miles from Damascus. Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 6, 10, xx. 7, l. E.-J.
ABIMELECH. 15

ABRAHAM.

II. 11, 3. Tradition makes it the death-place of Abel, confounding Abel, a meadow, from which Abia comes, with Hebel, vanity.

ABIMELECH (father of the king). 1. The name of two Philistine kings at Gerar who had similar dealings with Abraham and Isaac and with their wives successively (Gen. xx., xxvi.). "Abimelech" was probably, like Pharaoh among the Egyptians, a title given to their kings. 2. A son of Gideon by his Shechemite concubine. He was proclaimed king by the Shechemites after he had slain his seventy brothers, but at the end of three years was killed by a piece of a millstone while storming Thebez (Judg. ix.).

ABISHAG (source of error). The young Shuammite who nursed the aged David (1 Kings i. 11). David appointed him commander of one of the divisions of his army, and led it successfully against the Edomites (1 Chron. xx. 10), against Absalom (2 Sam. xviii. 2), and against Sheba (2 Sam. xx. 6).

ABLOI, a village on the left bank of the Seine, twelve miles from Paris, is noticeable as the first place of public worship conceded to the Protestants of Paris. The promulgation of the Edict of Nantes, May 2, 1598, caused great indignation among the Roman Catholics in France, and its execution in detail was accompanied with innumerable intrigues and subterfuges. ABRAHAM.

rescuing him from his enemies (Gen. xiii., xiv.). It was on his return he met that mysterious personage, Melchizedek. Year after year passed, and the faith of Abram in the fulfillment of God's promise that he should have a son was more and more tried, since Sara remained barren; and yet theophany and vision had declared it to be certain. At Sara's suggestion he took her maid Hagar, an Egyptian, as his concubine; and she bore him a son, Ishmael. He was then eighty-six years old. But Ishmael was not the promised son. At ninety-nine God appeared again to him, and solemnly renewed his promise, and changed his name from Abram to Abraham, and Sara's (generous) to Sarah (princess). In token of the Lord's sincerity, the rite of circumcision was instituted; and, accordingly, Abraham and Ishmael and all the males of his household were circumcised. The declaration was made by an angel to Sarah, subsequently, who received it doubtingly. At this time the Lord revealed to Abraham the impending destruction of the cities of the plain. The intercession of Abraham (Gen. xviii. 29–35) is one of the most touching acts of faith; for though he interceded for not ten righteous persons in it, Sodom was destroyed. Very probably in consequence of the destruction of those cities, Abraham emigrated unto Gerar, upon the entrance south of Canaan, and there practised the same weak deception as in Egypt. Yet the Lord watched over Sarah; and Abraham, Ishmael, the King of Gerar, administered to the patriarch a deserved rebuke. The Father of the Faithful does not appear in a very good light.

ABRAHAMITES. I. A branch of the Paulicians (which see). II. A deistic sect which arose in Bohemia in the latter part of the eighteenth century, professing the faith of Abraham before his circumcision, accepting the doctrines of one God and the immortality of the soul, and of the Scriptures, the Decalogue, and the Lord's Prayer. As their children were not allowed to be educated in the faith of the parents, the sect died out in the same generation in which it arose.

HERZOG.

ABRAXAS is a word with a mystic meaning, arbitrarily formed by combining together those letters of the Greek alphabet, which, when considered according to their numerical value, and added together, give the sum of 365. This word was first applied by the Gnostic Basilides as the name of the Supreme Being of the universe, the God of the 365 heavens, the Divine Source of the 365 emanations of which Basilides pretended to know something. Now the name is generally given to every kind of symbolical representation of Gnostic ideas, such as were produced in great masses in the form of gems, or images engraved on metal, or inscriptions in Greek, Cop.
tic, etc., on stones, metal tablets, etc., with and without pictorial additions, from the second down to the thirteenth century.

The characteristic most frequently occurring in these representations, the Abraxas image proper, shows the head of a cock connected with two serpent tails as legs by means of a body in armor, which on one side and a bird on the other. According to scholars who have devoted themselves to the study of Gnostic archaology, this figure represents the totality of cosmic intellectual forces, watching over that which is pure in the world, and leading it triumphantly through life back into the source of all purity. Often this figure, the central symbol of Basilian wisdom, is combined with other figures symbolizing other Gnostic ideas derived from Jewish, Egyptian, or Greek sources. Often, also, the symbolical representation is confined to a mere oval, formed by a serpent, and combined with some more or less unintelligible inscription.

The Abraxas literature is very heavy. The study, however, is of psychological rather than historical interest: the question what such symbols mean is of less interest than that how people ever came to think that such symbols could mean anything. The subject was first taken up by Jean Chiplet: Maccari Abraxas seu de Gemmae Basiliadinae, Antw., 1657. It was then treated by Capello: Prodromus Iconicus Sculpturarum, Gemmarum, Venecia, 1702; Montefano: L'Abra- xas Eskipulito, Paris, 1702; Passerio: Theasaurus Gemmarum, Florence, 1750; Bellermann: Die Gemmen der Alten mit dem Abraxasbilde, Berlin, 1817-19; Walsh: Ancient Coins, London, 1828; Matter: Histoire de Gnosticisme, Paris, 1828.

ABULFARAJ (Bar Hebraeus), b. at Malatia in Cappadocia, 1226; d. at Maraga in Adharbaid- shan; the son of a Jewish physician, who had embraced Jacobitism; was appointed Bishop of Gubos in 1246, Bishop of Aleppo in 1247, and Maphrian, or Primate of the Jacobites in Chal- dea, Assyria, and Mesopotamia, in 1266. Of his numerous works have been published: Chronicon Syriacum, in Syriac and Latin, the Civil Chronicle by F. I. Bruus and G. W. Kirsch, Leipzig, 1788; and the Ecclesiastical Chronicle by J. B. Abbe- loos and Th. J. Lancaster, Louvains, 1872; Historia compendiosa Dynastiarum, in Arabic and Latin, — an extract of the above work by E. Pocock, Ox- ford, 1053; a Syriac grammar, a liturgy, and several minor pieces in Wiseman: Horae Syriacae, and Bernstein: Christology Syriaca.

ABYSSINIAN CHURCH. Ethiopia was in antiquity a geographical name of rather vague significance, embracing all that is, as Abyssin, these lands, while they were Chris- tian, formed the Ethiopian Church. At present Christianity is confined to the plateau and mountains the name of Abyssinia; and thus the Abyssinian Church of our time represents the Ethiopian Church of antiquity.

Native tradition ascribes the name of the country and the foundation of the state to Ethiopians, the son of Cush, the son of Ham, who settled in the old capital of Axum in the present Province of Tigre. After centuries of Paganism, the visit of the Queen of Sheba to Solomon led to the conversion of the people to Judaism. She bore a son to Solomon, Menilek, who was educated in Jerusalem by his father. When Menilek returned to Axum, he brought along with him, not only a number of Jewish priests, but also the ark, which was carried away from the Temple of Jerusalem, and deposited in the Ethiopian capital; and from that time, down to our day, Abyssinia has been ruled by a Solomonid dynasty; the succession having been broken only now and then by usurpers and conquerors. Of course, all this is mere fable. At the time of the introduction of Christianity, rank had been called throughout the country, and the custom of circumcision, practised together with baptism, may have been introduced from Egypt. A Jewish immigration must, nevertheless, have taken place, as is proved by the presence in the country of a great number of Jews, the so-called Falashas; but the time, manner, and magnitude of this immigration, cannot be ascertained.

During the reign of Constantine the Great, about 330, Frumentius and Aedesius came incidentally to Ethiopia, and began to preach Christianity. Aedesius afterwards returned to Tyre; but Frumentius continued the work, went to Alexandria, where Athanasius occupied the patriarchal see, obtained missionary co-workers from him, and was himself consecrated bishop, and head of the Ethiopian Church, under the title of Abba Salăma, “father of peace,” which title is still in use, together with the later one Abūna, “our father.” Thus the Ethiopian Church was established in close relation to the Egyptian; and the Abyssinian Church of our time still stands as a branch of the Coptic. In the fifth and sixth centuries, the Ethiopian mission received a new impulse by the immigration of a number of monks from Upper Egypt. They brought monasticism along with them, and the legends and worship of saints. Also the Ethiopian translation of the Bible seems to belong to this time, though a tradition ascribes the translation of the New Testament to Frumentius, and parts of the Old Testament are said to have been brought from Jerusalem by Menilek. [See further under Bible Versions A. VI. Ethiopic.] The Ethiopian Bible, however, has not exercised any great influence on the Christian growth of the people; for the Ethiopian language, a tongue of Semitic origin, by the Abyssinians called Geez, that is, “original speech,” was already at that time completely superseded by Amharic, a dialect which arose in the Eastern Province of Tigre, and which is much mixed up with African elements. At present Ethiopian is an entirely dead language, used only in the Church, and studied only by the priests; but most of them can only read it without understanding it. In the Abyssinian Church, Ethiopian plays the same part as Coptic in the Egyptian Church.

The close connection between the Abyssinian and Coptic churches is very apparent in the sphere of doctrines. Like the Coptic, the Abyssinian Church holds a purely monophysitic view of the person of Christ. But, while this question has been settled long ago for the whole rest of the Christian Church, here it is still debated under the form of a double or triple birth of Christ, and gives rise to violent controversies. Indeed, in spite of the spiritual barrenness and ecclesiastical petrifaction of the Abyssinian Church, these controversies have, nevertheless, caused such enmities, that both Theodorus and Joannes of Tigre have reaped considerable advantages from them in their plans against Shoa. Also the questions of the person and dignity of Mary,—whether she really bore God, or only was the mother of Jesus; whether she is entitled to the same worship as Christ, etc.,—are eagerly debated, though it seems to be the general view that an almost divine worship is due to the Virgin; that she and the saints are indispensable mediators between Christ and man; that the saints, who died not for their own sins, died for the sins of others, etc.

The Abyssinian canon, called Semnaja Abādā, “eighty-one,” because it consists of eighty-one sacred books, comprises, besides the sixty-five books of our canon, the Apocrypha, the Epistles of Clement, and the Synodus; that is, the decrees of the Apostolic Council of Jerusalem. See W. FELL: Canones Apostolorum :Ethiopic, Lips., 1871. Only a very slight difference, however, is made between this canon and some other works of ecclesiastical literature,—the Didascalia or Apostolical Constitutions, the Haïmanot-Abo, giving quotations from the councils and the Fathers, the writings of the Eastern Fathers, Athanasius, Cyril, and Chrysostom, and the Fetha-Nagast, the royal law-book. On the whole, the tradition of the Church has the same authority as the Scriptures. Of the councils, only those before the Council of Chalcedon (451) are recognized, because at Chalcedon the monophysite heresy was condemned. The Apostles’ Creed is unknown; the Nicene is used. At the head of the Church stands the Abānā, who resides in Gondar. He is appointed by the Coptic patriarch of Cairo; and, according to a law from the twelfth century, no Abyssinian, but only a Copt, can become Abūna. He alone has the right to anoint the king, and to ordain priests and deacons. Both in secular and in ecclesiastical things he has a great power; and his favor or disfavor may be of importance to the king himself. The duties of the priests consist in celebrating divine service three or four times a day, purifying houses, utensils, and tools, etc. The priests, as well as the monks and the scholars, take the Lord’s Supper every morning fasting. The deacona perform all the subordinate business, baking bread for the Lord’s Supper, cleaning the church and the sacred vessels, etc. They dare not enter the Holy of holies, where the ark stands. The Deberas, the teachers, are not ordained, nor are the Alakas, to whom is intrusted the whole administration of the Church. Beside the secular clergy stands the monastic clergy, under the head of the Ethēqē, who ranks...
steadily progressing. In order to distinguish declared the Roman-Catholic Church the Church mission of 1555, which labored there for nearly a century; but, as everywhere else, the mission Church undertook in Abyssinia was the Jesuit ary activity of the Jesuits was deeply mixed up to on, called mateb, which they always wear around the authority of the Roman-Catholic Church. purpose seems to have been to establish there a nomadic tribe, consider themselves to be Jews, ance for somebody else. The first missionary work which the Western Church undertook in Abyssinia was the Jesuit mission of 1555, which labored there for nearly a century; but, as everywhere else, the missionary activity of the Jesuits was deeply mixed up with the politics of the country, and their sole purpose seems to have been to establish there the authority of the Roman-Catholic Church. After a frightful massacre of the opposite party, King Samson declared the Roman-Catholic Church the Church of the State; but in 1640 the Jesuits, with their Roman archbishop, went on with him. The number of monks and nuns living after the rule of Pachomius, is very great. The principal monasteries are those of Debra Dammo (where nearly three hundred monks live together in small huts), Axum, Aba Garima, Walubba, Debra Libanos, and St. Stephan. The church-buildings are exceedingly numerous in Abyssinia, generally small, low, circular structures, with a conical roof of thatch and four doors, one towards each of the cardinal points. An outer court surrounds the building, occupied during service by the laymen, and often serving at night as a place of refuge for forlorn travellers. The interior, dirty and neglected, but overloaded with frightfully bad pictures of the Virgin and the saints, the angels, and the Devil, is divided into two apartments,—the holy for the priests and deacons, and the Holy of Holies, whose walls stand the ark. This ark is the principal object in the whole church. Neither the deacons nor laymen dare touch it: if they do, the church and the adjacent cemetery become unclean, and must be purified. Service consists of singing of psalms, recitals of parts of the Bible and Liturgy, and prayers, especially to the Virgin and the wondering working saints: it is undignified and unedifying. Of sacraments, the Church numbers two; but the language lacks the word, and with the word also the idea seems to have become lost. Besides the Christian Sunday, also the Jewish sabbath is kept: in all, one hundred and eighty holidays are celebrated. In the discipline, fasting plays a prominent part. There are in all two hundred and forty fast-days; but they are not kept. For a small compensation, the priest undertakes to do penance for somebody else. Not all the inhabitants of Abyssinia belong to the State Church or to Christianity. The Zalanes, a nomadic tribe, consider themselves to be Jews, and keep aloof from the Christians, though by travellers they are described as being really good Christians. The Chamantes are baptized, and have Christian priests; but in reality they are nearly Pagans, and celebrate many thoroughly Pagan rites. The real Jews, the Falashas, live along the northern shore of the great lake Tsana, in the neighborhood of Gondar and Shejiga, where they pursue agriculture and trade. They are more industrious than the Christians, but also more ignorant, and spiritually more forlorn. The Mohammedans make about one-tenth of the whole population, and Mohammedanism is slowly but steadily progressing. In order to distinguish themselves from all non-Christians, the Christians receive at baptism a cord of blue silk or cotton, called mateb, which they always wear around the neck.

ACACIUS. I. Bishop of Cesarea, a disciple and the successor of Eusebius. d. 363; one of the leaders of the Arian party, and as such deposed by the synods of Antioch (341) and Seleucia (355); fell out with the radical fraction of the party, and gathered a large number of followers. The Acacians, who, though denying the sameness, accepted the likeness of substance, between the Father and the Son, subscribed finally to the Nicene symbol. A fragment of his work against Marcellus of Ancyra is found in Epiphani: Her. 72, 5. 39.

II. Patriarch of Constantinople since 471; d. 488; persuaded the emperor Zeno to issue the Henotikon, by which was brought about a reconciliation with the Monophysites, but was for this very reason excommunicated by Felix, the Bishop of Rome, nunquam anathemas vinculis exuendus, whereby a schism was occasioned between the Eastern and the Western churches. III. Bishop of Beroea, b. 422, d. 436, was one of Chrysostom’s bitterest enemies, and was present at the council ad Quercum (403), which deposed him. In the controversy between Nestorius and Cyril he tried to mediate. Three of his letters—two to Alypius and one to Hieraplinkos, and one to Cyril—are given by Baluzius in Nov. Coll. Conc. c. XVII., XII., LV.
ACCEPTANTS is the name of that party which in the Jansenist controversy accepted the bull Unigenitus. See JANSENISM.

ACCESS. I. In the Liturgy of the Roman Church, a collection of prayers preparatory to the celebration of mass; in the Liturgy of the Church of England, a prayer falling between the consecration and the communion.

II. In canon law a form of electioneering; the minority changing their votes, and conferring on the candidate of the majority by an accedo domino, in order to give him the number of votes necessary to election.

ACCOLTI, Peter, generally known as the Cardinal of Bologna, b. in Florence, 1497, d. there in 1549; was apostolical abbreviator under Leo X., and drew up the famous Bull of 1520 against Luther. Under Clement VII. he was made a cardinal; but under Paul III. he was arraigned for peculation, and imprisoned in San Angelo. He paid an enormous sum in order to be released, but left, nevertheless, a large fortune to his three children. Some poems by him are found in Carmina Ill. Poetarum Ital. Flor., Florence, 1562. Vol. I.

ACCOMMODATION, a theological term meaning in its broad sense an ethical notion, and, in its narrow, a certain exegetical method prevalent from the second half of the eighteenth century to the second quarter of the nineteenth. An accommodation in the theological sense is demanded by ethics whenever a person's circumstances, or the condition of his feelings, render him incompetent to understand the whole truth. God must lessen his pace if he would keep sleepless his great work as a collector and editor of the material of preaching so as to get rid of or greatly lessen the supernatural element of Scripture. The easy-going rationalism of the last century declared that many things in the Bible were figurative, mere accommodations to human understanding. Thus Zachariä, in his Essay upon the Condescension of God toward Man, published in 1763, explains the epiphanies of the Old Testament, the covenants of the Old and New Testament, the incarnation, in short, all the facts of revelation, as "accommodations." And, the more Christianity lost its hold upon the theologians through this kind of talk, the more eager were their answers to the question, How many of the Bible statements are accommodations? Their voices are heard arguing the matter in the opening years of this century, but die away as the school of Strauss makes itself known. Its method is shorter, more decisive, and apparently more reverential. It says, "The facts you cannot accept because they are supernatural, you need not trouble yourselves about. We have discovered that the writings in which they are found are not genuine. Thus we have vindicated God from the charge of deceiving you, for he simply did not inspire the irrational statements." As we look at the throng who are rapidly retreating before the "critical school," we see that there is still general desire to do away with all biblical statements which clash with (their) reason, but at the same time do not want to attack directly the authority of Scripture. In this fashion they did away with the Messianic Prophecies,—those Jesus applied to himself merely to induce the Jews to believe in his Messiaship, although he did not himself (!); with the doctrine of angels and demons,—Jesus and the Bible-writers merely employed the current talk; the doctrine of the atonement,—a condescension to popular ideas in order to console the Jews for the loss of the sacrificial worship. It should be said, however, that not all the theologians were thus madly undermining the faith. Such men as Hauff (1758), Gess (1797), and others, fought against the theory as destructive of the Church, and it is now universally condemned. It is, however, an unquestionable fact that the Bible-writers use the popular speech in regard to natural objects; for they say, "the sun rises;" also the conduct of Paul in circumcising Timothy (Acts xvi. 1–3), and in taking the vow at Jerusalem (xxi. 17–20), was an accommodation. But this use of language, and this prudent, conciliatory conduct, did no injury: indeed, by these means the cause of truth was advanced. —RUDOLF HOFMANN.

ACEPHALI, from the Greek α and κεφαλή, without head or chief, a term applied to certain ecclesiastical parties, as, for instance, to that which, at the council of Ephesus, would follow neither Cyril nor John of Antioch; and to that which separated from the patriarch of Alexandria when he signed the Henotikon; and others.

ACHERY, Jean Luc d', b. at St. Quentin 1609; d. in Paris, April 29, 1685; was educated by the Benedictines; entered their order in 1632, and was appointed librarian at St. Germain des Prés, in Paris, 1640, the principal seat of the congregation of St. Maur, in which position he achieved his great work as a collector and editor of the Acta Sanctorum Ordinis S. Benedicti, 9 vols., Paris, 1668–1701, with prefaces and notes by Mabillon; Veterum aliquot scriptorum Specielegiam, 13 vols., Paris, 1655–77, enlarged by Baluze, Martène, and La Barre in 1723; and Lanfranc's Opera Omnia.
with an appendix containing many documents concerning the introduction of Christianity in England, Paris, 1648, etc.

ACOEMETAE, from the Greek ἀκοιμητας, the "sleepless" or " unresting," an order of monks established in the East in the middle of the fifth century, and named from the circumstance that in its monasteries the members were divided into six choirs, which alternately kept up the work of prayer and praise without intermission day and night. Their principal seat was in Constantin ople, in the celebrated monastery, Studium, so called after its founder Studios, a Roman noble.
But also in the Western Church they found imi tators; and in the beginning of the sixth cen thury they were established in the Abbey of St.
Maurice of Aganne in Valois, by the Burgundian king, Sigismund.

ACOLYTHS, from the Greek ἀκολουθος, the "followers." The first of the four minor orders in the ancient Church originated in the beginning of the fourth century, and was developed from the plan being to destroy all copies, not only of the Bible, but of any book dear to the Christians VIII. 2). Nevertheless, as soon as the perse uctions ceased, and Christianity became victor ious, in the reign of Constantine, the old lives of martyrs were re-written; and, as people looked upon these lives as the record of the heroic age of the Church, great zeal was bestowed upon the task. Eusebius wrote his report on the mar tyrs of Palestine as an appendix to the eighth book of his Hist. Eccl., and also a general his tory of the martyrs of the whole Church, which latter work he mentions himself, but which, at the end of the sixth century, could not be found, and seems to have been lost. After his time, the subject continued to be cultivated, and that in a twofold manner: first in a meagre form, simply for liturgical purposes, the so-called Calendari; and then in a more elaborate form, for the pur pose of edification, the so-called Passiones or Gesta martyrum.

Of catalogues of martyrs, Calendaria, made for some special church, and giving the names of the martyrs for the respective days of the calen dar, several specimens are still extant. The Jesuit Egidius Bucherius found one in Rome belonging to the Roman Church, and dating from the fourth century (Ruinart : Act. Sincera.
Martyr., p. 541). The number of saints anno tated is very small, however; the first part con taining only twelve days commemorating Roman bishops, and the second twenty-five commemo rating other martyrs. A Calendarium belonging to the Church of Carthage, and dating from the fifth century, was discovered by Mabillon, and dates numbers eighty-one days of commemoration.
Such Calendaria as were destined for the use of some special church gave only the names of those martyrs who had suffered within the diocese or neighborhood of the church; but soon these Calendaria were combined, and formed into a real Martyrologium; that is, a catalogue of martyrs comprising the whole church. Such a Martyrologium, used in the Roman Church at the close of the sixth century, is described by Gregory I. (Epist. VIII., 19). It contains only the names of the martyrs arranged according to the order in which they were celebrated in the mass, and the day and place of the passion, without any further description; but for each day several saints from various countries and provinces are mentioned, and thereby the character of the Calendarium is changed into that of the Martyrologium.

The existence of the other kind of compilations, which, for the sake of edification, gave elaborate narratives and descriptions, we learn from the Council of Carthage, 307, in which it is said: 47 (BRUNs: Concil. I. p. 193) grants that readings may be made not only from the Scriptures, but, on the days of commemorations, also from the Passiones Martyrum. A Council of Rome, 491 (MANSI: Concil. VIII., p. 119), showed more discrimination, and forbade the reading of the Acta Martyrum in the churches, because the names of the authors were not known, and because infidels, heretics, and idola were brought to it. The reading of these two kinds of Acta Martyrum, the Calendarium for liturgical, and the Passiones for devotional purposes, there developed a new branch of ecclesiastical literature, the so-called Acta Sanctorum,—more or less reliable works by known authors, on men remarkable in the history of the church, written principally for a purely literary purpose. Both the Greek and the Latin churches possess considerable collections of the kind. In the beginning, these Acta Sanctorum showed a meagre and statistical character similar to that of the Calendarium; but in the ninth century an entirely different treatment of the whole subject was introduced,—a treatment which paid no regard to historical truth, but transformed and invented facts in the most arbitrary manner. Thus began the era of the legend. The object of the work is to trace the history of the gospel from the ascension of Christ to the imprisonment of Paul in Rome, or from the beginning of the earthly kingdom of Christ in the capital of Judaism to the time when the Church took hold in the capital of the world. This will the more clearly appear when we analyze the book. It may be divided into three parts. I. (Chap. i. 4–viii. 2). The success of the gospel in Jerusalem. Pentecost with its miracle, a day of large ingathering. The new Christian community not separated from the surrounding Judaism, except in its belief in Jesus as the Messiah, characterized by a remarkable community of good and brotherly love. The ordination of deacons. The preaching of Stephen, which involves the early Church in conflict with her deadly foes. II. (Chap. viii. 3–xx. 33). Dispersion of the disciples consequent upon the persecution under Saul's leadership. The apostles remain together, and quietly continue their superintendence. Philip evangelizes Samaria. Saul the persecutor miraculously converted on the road to Damascus. Peter, cured of prejudice by a vision, Prepares the gospel to the Fagan Cornelius and his friends. The gospel spread into-
Phenice, Cyprus, and Antioch. Barnabas sent to seek Saul. 1 James the brother of John beheaded by Herod Agrippa I. Peter, arrested by the same, miraculously released. The first great missionary journey of Paul and Barnabas. The Apostolic Council of Jerusalem. Results: the Mosaic law not laid upon Gentile Christians, the conversion of the Gentiles perceived to be the intention of God. Thus the formation of Gentile Christianity was not the revolutionary and violent act of Paul, but the natural and irresistible consequence of the progress of the gospel, and as such is accepted by the mother-church in Jerusalem. III. (Chap. xv. 34–end). Paul and Barnabas propose to go upon another missionary journey, but differ and separate. Luke follows the fortunes of Paul only from this point. Paul traverses Galatia, Asia Minor, Macedonia, and Greece, on to Corinth, where he stays in each place visited, establishing a church, or at least collecting a nucleus for future work. After a flying visit to Antioch, Paul fixes for two years his residence in Ephesus. At last he goes to Jerusalem to take Peter and James to Rome; almost shipwrecked on the way. Conference with the Jews there. Luke abruptly terminates his book by Paul’s declaration that the gospel which the Jews rejected will be a testimony with the Jews there. Luke abruptly terminates his book by Paul’s declaration that the gospel which the Jews rejected will be accepted by the Gentiles. The book’s end in this fashion does not necessarily imply that another volume was in Luke’s mind: rather are we to see the completion of his plan, which was to show to Theophilus, at the first instance, how ill founded were the insinuations and attacks of the Judaizers who opposed Paul, and that in Corinth there was strife. That Luke, while noting these, does not go into particulars, was because his object was different. But this is quite another thing from the theory held by the followers of Baur and Zeller, that the sole object of the Acts was to clear up difficulties, and heal disputes; and to this end all opposing facts are carefully omitted, e.g., the blaming of Peter at Antioch, related in Gal. ii. 1. If this were so, then the Acts is not history, but special pleading. The door is open to the wildest speculations as to the character of the facts omitted. Paul, as well as Peter, loses by such supposed suppression.

These ideas about the Acts are modern. The ancient Church had no doubt of its authenticity and genuineness and consequent canonicity. The sects which rejected it did so from dogmatic motives. And yet, although acknowledged, it was little used. Of this Chrysostom complains. This came from its position in the canon, between the Gospels and the Apocalypse. Even the earliest church writers, as Chrysostom in the Apocalypse. In the ancient and mediæval Church it was considered as the first chapter of church history; but at the Renaissance the lacunza in the sequence of events were remarked, and that the history did not concern much else than Peter and Paul. Grotius considered it to be the parallel biographies of the two founders of Christianity. The free handling of the book may be said to have begun with Schneckenburger, professor at Bern, who in 1841 published his Über den Zweck der Apostelgeschichte, and advocated the theory that the author drew a parallel between Peter and Paul, matching every discourse and miracle of Peter in the first part by a discourse and miracle of Paul in the second part. Then came Baur and his school. With learning and ingenuity, but without proper fairness of mind, they attempted to show that Luke was an unreliable author, inasmuch as he was dominated by his dogmatic purpose, and therefore made artificial and arbitrary combinations,—made Peter talk like Paul, and Paul act like Peter; and so to the second century, when, as Baur thought, the work was written, the author presented a picture of the Christian Church as he was pleased to have it. His conception of Christianity, while the reality was quite different. But two facts correct these errors. The first, that the third Gospel and the Acts are from the same author, and therefore his bias and character will be the same. If he showed himself in his Gospel to be fair-minded, the presumption is that he will be the same in the Acts. The second fact is more decisive. The author, so far from giving rein to his imagination, carefully investigated the sources before he began his history. Here, then, we have history well based and well matured. The accuracy of Luke descends to the minutest particular, as has been abundantly verified. 1

A very remarkable, indeed unparalleled feature, of the Acts, is the use of the first person plural to denote the presence of the author. We can thus tell exactly when Luke began to travel with Paul, where he left him, and where he met him again. Thus the see begins xvi. 10, and ends v. 17, resumed xx. 5, and continued unto the end of the book. We can also detect in the narrative the vivacity and confidence of an eye-witness.

It were, of course, very desirable to have a twofold history of the planting of Christianity; but, in lack of this, we are able to test the reliability of Luke by the study of contemporary documents. The Apocalypse, the Epistle of James, and other Judgeo-Christian documents prove that he reported correctly the state of things in Jerusalem; and the Epistles of Paul show how faithfully Luke presents the great apostle. But, although faithful and reliable, the Acts canmake no pretensions to completeness. The passing reference in 2 Cor. xi. 23–33 contains events not even hinted at in the Acts. The dis
The triarchate, independent of Rome; and at the synod of Mainz (Mayence), 1049, he first presented his plan to the church. Neither Henry III. nor Leo IX. made any great opposition; but the actual ruler of Germany, and once more his teacher and tutor of the young king, became the metropolitan see of Hamburg-Bremen, the successor of Rimbert, became the representative of the race,—humanity in person. Out of him, as the progenitor of the race, Eve was taken. But we do not comprehend his true position until we look at him in relation to Christ, the second Adam. Each is a representative head. Each is a representative head. But from the second Adam has come just as the progenitor of the race,—humanity in person. Opposite to the species and genera of beasts, stood the single man. He was not a male, still less a wife-man: he was man. Out of him, as the progenitor of the race, Eve was taken. But we do not comprehend his true position until we look at him in relation to Christ, the second Adam. Each is a representative head.

ADALBERT, Archbishop of Hamburg-Bremen, 1015-1072; d. at Gosslar, March 16, 1072; a Saxon by birth, studied in Magdeburg; was ordained priest in 981, and elected Bishop of Prague in 983. He was a severe and energetic man; and vehement strife arose between him and his wild, half-heathenish countrymen, especially, because he was a stiff representative of the Germano-Roman influence, and opposed to the Greeks. Twice he left his see, and retired to the Monastery of St. Boniface in Rome, and twice he again returned to Prague. Finally, in 986, he went, with the support of the Duke of Poland, Boleslav Chrobry, as a missionary to the Prussians, but was killed by a Pagan priest before he had achieved any thing. His title as the Apostle of the Prussians is merely honorary.

ADALBERT of PRAGUE (Woytech, "the comfort of the host"), b. 939; d. April 23, 997; a Bohemian by birth; studied in Magdeburg; was ordained priest in 981, and elected Bishop of Prague in 983. He was a severe and energetic man; and vehement strife arose between him and his wild, half-heathenish countrymen, especially, because he was a stiff representative of the Germano-Roman influence, and opposed to the Greek character and independent development of the Bohemian Church. Twice he left his see, and retired to the Monastery of St. Boniface in Rome, and twice he again returned to Prague. Finally, in 986, he went, with the support of the Duke of Poland, Boleslav Chrobry, as a missionary to the Prussians, but was killed by a Pagan priest before he had achieved any thing. His title as the Apostle of the Prussians is merely honorary.

ADALCAR, Archbishop of Hamburg-Bremen, 885-909, the successor of Rimbert, became involved in a long controversy with the Archbishop of Cologne, because, before the establishment of the metropolitan see of Hamburg-Bremen, the bishopric of Bremen had formed a suffragan see under the Archbishop of Cologne; and as now the see of Hamburg-Bremen increased much through the Scandinavian mission, and the establishment of the suffragan sees under it in Denmark and Sweden, the Archbishop of Cologne claimed his former supremacy over the bishopric of Bremen. The controversy was carried on with great violence, and not decided in the time of Adalgar; but an exhaustive representation of its course and significance is still wanting. See the Vita Rimberti in PERTZ: Monumenta Script. vol. 2; ADAM of BREMEN, etc. — CARL BRETHAUL.

ADALHARD, b. 751; d. June 2, 826; a grandson of Charles Martel, and cousin-german to Charlemagne; was expelled from the court, and sent to the Monastery of Corbie by the latter, but regained afterwards his confidence, and went in 790 to Italy, whose government he administered till 814, when Louis the Pious recalled him, and banished him to Hermitzert, at the mouth of the Loire. In 821 he returned to Corbie, where he died. He founded Neu Corwey in Westphalia, established many schools, and did much to encourage studies. Of his works, the most important, a treatise entitled "Therapeutica," is lost; but extracts of it are given by Hincmar (Opp. Paris, 1645, II. 206-215). His Statuta Ant. Abbatiae Corb., dated 822, is found in D'ARCHERY's Script., I. 586-592; and two letters, dated 801 and 814, in Epp. Caroliniae, IV. 417.

ADAM means man, and is the name given by God himself to the first human beings (Gen. v. 5). The important place occupied by man, according to the biblical idea, is as the close, the appointed climax, of creation. Inanimate nature looked forward to man. To his creation God gave special care. It was sufficient for him to order the other creatures into being; but man was moulded by the divine fingers out of the dust of the earth, and so far he belonged to the created world: but into him God breathed the breath of life, and thus put him in an immeasurably higher place; for the possession of this breath made him the "image" of God. What this "image" was we learn from the Bible (Gen. i. 26, ii. 7): it was likeness to God in the government of the creatures and the possession of the same spirit. See Image. God, the absolute personality, reflects himself in man, and therefore the latter becomes the lord of creation. Adam was the representative of the race,—humanity in person. Opposite to the species and genera of beasts, stood the single man. He was not a male, still less a wife-man: he was man. Out of him, as the progenitor of the race, Eve was taken. But we do not comprehend his true position until we look at him in relation to Christ, the second Adam.
Adam lived to be nine hundred and thirty years old, and died the father of sons and daughters, although mention is made of only three sons (Gen. v. 4).

Materialism sees in man a mere product of nature. It is difficult to see how it makes place for self-consciousness. The unity of the race is also given up; and so logically Darwinism leads to belief in a plurality of race-stems. Theology, on the other hand, holds fast to the personality of man, but has from the beginning of the science, wavered in regard to the position Adam occupied toward the race. The oldest Greek fathers are silent over this point. Irenee is the first to touch it; and he maintains that the first sin was the sin of the race, since Adam was its head. Origen, on the other hand, held that man sinned because he had abused his liberty when in a pre-existent state. In Adam semi-naturally the bodies of all his descendants (Contra Celsum IV. cf. Kahnis, Dogmatik II. p. 107 sq.). Gregory Nazianzen and Gregory of Nyssa and John of Damascus hold that the first sin was the sin of the race, Tertullian, Cyprian, Hilary, Ambrose, and Augustine represent the biblical standpoint. Pelagius saw in Adam only a bad example, which his descendants followed. Semi-Pelagianism similarly regarded the first sin as opening the flood-gates to iniquity; but Augustinianism upon this point has dominated the Church since it was formulated, — in Adam the race sinned.

The two prominent orthodox views are: (1) The Augustinian, known as Realism, is, that there was a real though impersonal and unconscious participation of the whole human race in the fall of Adam, their natural head, who by his individual transgression vitiates the generic human nature, and transmitted it in this corrupt and guilty state to his descendants by ordinary generation. He sinned as an individual and as mankind. This view is taught by Anselm, Peter Lombard, Thomas Aquinas, Luther, Melanchthon, and Calvin. (2) The Federal theory of Turrettini and the Princeton theologians, which in English.

ADAM, Thomas, a Puritan commentator and preacher. The time of his birth and death is unknown, and only a few scattered references of his life have come down to us. He was preaching in Bedfordshire in 1612, afterwards in various localities: was in 1653 a "decrepit and necessitous" old man, yet living in 1658. Southey called him "the prose Shakespeare of the Puritan theologians;" and a writer in the Encyclopaedia Britannica (ninth edition) says of him, "His sermons place him in the van of the preachers of England. Jeremy Taylor does not surpass him in wit. His numerous works display great learning, and are unique in their abundance of stories, anecdotes, aphorisms, and puns." ADAMS, William, b. Colchester Conn., Jan. 25, 1807; d. Orange Mountain, N.J., Tuesday, Aug. 31, 1880. He was prepared for college under his father, John Adams, LL.D., principal of Phillips Academy, Andover, and graduated with honors from Yale College, 1827, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1830. He was pastor of the Congregational Society of Brighton, Mass., from February, 1831 to 1834, when he was called to the Broome-street (Central) Presbyterian Church of New-York city. His success here was remarkable. He gathered, in the course of his twenty years of service, a very large congregation, out of which was formed in 1853 the Madison-square Presbyterian Church, whose new edifice was opened in November, 1854. His church was one of the most influential in the city, and he was regarded as the leading Presbyterian pastor in the country. In 1873 he became president of the Union Theological Seminary, and professor of sacred rhetoric. He occupied this position with distinguished ability and success till his death. In 1852 he was chosen moderator of the New School General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, and was very active in bringing about the re-union of the New and Old School branches. He will be long remembered as a fervent, eloquent, and persuasive preacher of the Word; as a faithful, affectionate, and prudent pastor; as a dignified, learned, and efficient presiding officer, and as a Christian gentleman of the highest type. He had a remarkably symmetrical character. His personal appearance was commanding, and at once indicated him as a prince among men. "He was greater than any thing that he did." He wrote much for the religious press, and issued the following volumes: The Three Gardens, Eden, Gethsemane, and Paradise; or, Man's Ruin, Redemption, and Restoration (N.Y., 1856); an edition of Isaac Taylor's Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, with a biographical introduction (1861); Thanksgiving: Memories of the day and Helpsto the Habit (1865); In the World, and not of the World (1867); Conversationsof the religious press, and issued the following volumes: The Three Gardens, Eden, Gethsemane, and Paradise; or, Man's Ruin, Redemption, and Restoration (N.Y., 1856); an edition of Isaac Taylor's Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, with a biographical introduction (1861); Thanksgiving: Memories of the day and Helpsto the Habit (1865); In the World, and not of the World (1867); Conversations of Jesus Christ with Representative Men (1868). Perhaps the most admired single effort of his life was the Address of Welcome to the members of the conference of the Evangelical Alliance Oct. 2, 1873, a model of its kind. He was to present to the age the rare picture of a Christian statesman. The best edition of his works is by Bishop Hurl, London, 1811, 6 vols. 8vo.

ADELBERT, or ALDEBERT, the powerful adversary of St. Boniface, and leader of a national party in the Church of the Frankish Empire, opposed to the introduction of the Roman constitution and the Romish hierarchy, and supported by the people, the native clergy, and Carloman. Boniface denounced him as a heretic, and seducer of the people, accused him of the grossest frauds, and brought him, in 744, before a synod in Soissons, which condemned him. This condemnation, however, raised such a storm of indignation, that the verdict remained a dead letter; but the next year Boniface sent the priest Deneard to Rome, to Pope Zacharias, with a formal accusation, and documents of evidence. A countercril was sent herewith, the Würzburg letters, and Deneard appeared before it as prosecutor. Adelbert was not summoned, nor was any investigation instituted, as the protocols still extant vince; but he was, nevertheless, unanimously condemned as a new Simon Magnus. This time too, however, the verdict seems to have been without effect; for two years later on, in January, 747, we hear Boniface and the pope speak of having Adelbert placed before a new council. Perhaps Carloman, in spite of his friendship with Boniface, still continued to shelter Adelbert. It is at all events a suggestive fact, that Boniface triumphed, and Adelbert vanished immediately after the abdication of Carloman, when Pepin became major domus alone.

The second adiaphoristic controversy, on the contrary, which forms a chapter of the history of pietism, touched the very centre of Christian ethics. Spener protested that "a Christian shall do nothing which he cannot do to the glory of God, in the name of Christ, and for the benefit of his fellow-Christian." There are consequently no adiaphora: and such things as dancing, playing cards, visiting theatres, etc., must be repudiated as indifferent, medius, neutra, idonea, as, for instance, to have an equal or unequal number of hairs on the head, to raise the finger in this way or that, etc.

In the Bible the idea is indirectly rejected, though in a different way, by the Old and the New Testament. The Old Testament, which declares it as a sin to worship God in an illegal form as to worship an idol, can, of course, not acknowledge the existence of any thing indifferent to the law; but, in accordance with its pedagogical character, it endeavors to answer this question in details, commanding and forbidding in each special case as it occurs in practical life. The New Testament gives no such prescriptions; but the idea of adiaphora is there absolutely excluded by the ideas of the kingdom of heaven, the perfection of man in Christ, the "Christ in me," though at the same time it gives complete liberty: "unto the pure all things are lawful." Finally it found a most lamentable solution in the casuistry of the Jesuits.

The Reformation was in this point, as in so many others, simply a return to the stand-point of the New Testament. On account, however, of the character which the Reformation very early assumed in Germany, it is not to be wondered at that the first so-called adiaphoristic controversy should turn upon a point, not of morals, but of doctrine. Against the Augsburg Interim the Catholic party, the "cuiuslibet" party, as the Romanists, Melanchthon, Bugenhagen, and others drew up the so-called Leipzig Interim (1548), in which several doctrinal and liturgical prescriptions; but the idea of adiaphora is there absolutely excluded by the ideas of the kingdom of heaven, the perfection of man in Christ, the "Christ in me," though at the same time it gives complete liberty: "unto the pure all things are lawful." The question may be said to be still under debate; though the true basis for its solution seems to have been found by the latest writers on evangelical morals, Rothe, Schmid, Martensen, etc. Somewhat after the example of Thomas Aquinas, the existence of adiaphora is here accepted in abstracto, but rejected in concreto; because the individuality, character, and mental state of a person, at every moment, necessitates a yes or no, for which he feels responsible in his conscience, even in cases and with respect to things which objectively lie outside of the moral law.

ADONIJAH (my Lord is Jehovah). The fourth son of David by Haggith, born at Hebron, heir-presumptive after the death of his three elder brothers (2 Sam. iii. 4). For pushing his claims (1 Kings i.) when Solomon had been designated, he came near losing his life, but was pardoned (1 Kings i. 62), and might have lived in security, but for his asking the hand of Abishag: this being construed as a fresh attempt upon the throne, he was put to death (1 Kings ii. 25).

ADOPTION. 1. Biblical. The biblico-theological term for the act which restores the normal condition of the sinner to God is adoption: the persons adopted are called the "children," or "sons," of God. This idea is not original with the New Testament, but is found in the Old (Deut. xiv. 1), although the pious Israelite regarded himself rather as the servant than the son of God. Against this the Romanists, Melancthon, Bugenhagen, and others drew up the so-called Leipzig Interim (1548), in which several doctrinal and liturgical points were yielded as adiaphora. This roused the indignation of the extreme Lutherans,—Flacius, Westphal, and others; and a vehement controversy broke out, which, however, lost its importance by the peace of 1555 and the Formula Concordiae.

The second adiaphoristic controversy, on the contrary, which forms a chapter of the history of pietism, touched the very centre of Christian ethics. according to Paul, the adoption takes place in the course of the Christian’s upbuilding for eternity. In the rest of the New Testament, while the idea is found, it is not set forth with such doctrinal precision as demands particular attention.

2. Theological. The Church doctrine distinguishes the Johannean idea of “being born of God” as the starting point of the new life, from the Pauline idea of “adoption” as its essential point. The first idea, theology calls regeneration. Our attention will therefore be limited to the second. In ascetic literature, adoption, the sonship of the believer, plays a very prominent part. The fathers regard adoption generally as a magical effect of baptism, and derive many illustrations of it from Roman jurisprudence. Thus Clement of Alexandria (Ped., 1, 6). This became the doctrine of the Greek Church. [See The Orthodox Confession of the Eastern Church, Q. c. II. in Schaff’s Creeds of Christendom, Vol. II. p. 271.]

Regeneration and adoption, and the latter is the second. In ascetic literature, adoption, the sonship of the believer, plays a very prominent part. The fathers regard adoption generally as a magical effect of baptism, and derive many illustrations of it from Roman jurisprudence. Thus Clement of Alexandria (Ped., 1, 6). This became the doctrine of the Greek Church. [See The Orthodox Confession of the Eastern Church, Q. c. II. in Schaff’s Creeds of Christendom, Vol. II. p. 271.]

In the Roman-Catholic Church, on account of the prevailing semi-pelagian denial of the free grace of God and identification of justification and sanctification, the joyful state of sonship with God has not been clearly comprehended, suppressed, as its experience must be, by self-condemnation and works of satisfaction and penance. Hence the Roman Church denies that the subject can be certain of his justification, and, consequently, of his being in a state of grace. Thus Council of Trent, Sess. 6, c. 9. [Schaff’s Creeds of Christendom, Vol. II. pp. 98–99.]

“...No one can know, with a certainty of faith which cannot be subject to error, that he has obtained the grace of God.” Inasmuch as baptism is regarded as imparting the spiritual birth in the form of an indelible character, and as working, not alone the remission of original sin and actual guilt, however enormous, but a positive infusion of grace ex opere operato (through the act performed), it is further regarded as rendering the subject a child of God. Catechism of the Council of Trent [translated by Rev. J. Donovan, Baltimore, n.d., pp. 127, 130]. In the Protestant Church, adoption has been preferred to treat adoption in connection with baptism. Regeneration and adoption, as also justification, they taught, involve each other. Adoption follows justification. But, after baptism entered the Church, the Lutheran came nearer to the Reformed type, and the doctrine of regeneration underwent a material change, so that, from being regarded as only a form of justification, it was held that it not only precedes it, but, as the first effect of operating grace, takes its place. The Reformed theologians distinguish theoretically, though not practically, regeneration and adoption; and the latter is repeatedly discussed, because much stress is laid upon personal assurance of salvation. The adoption of the Old Testament saints is taught. The Methodists (e.g., Wesley, Watson) teach the Reformed doctrine, putting particular value upon repentance and the inner testimony of conversion. One of the services Schleiermacher performed was to restore adoption, which had become synonymous with the firm hope of eternal life, unto its proper place. He said, “It is not possible for Christ to live in us, unless we are in the same relation to the Father, and consequently share in his sonship, which is the power, originating in him, to become the sons of God and this includes the guaranty of sanctification; for it is the right of sonship to be brought up in the fullest household liberty; and the law of nature is, that the community of life develops in the child likeness to the father.” For a recent carrying-out of this idea see A. Schweizer: Christliche Glaubenslehre, II. 2, p. 336 sq. It is undeniable that there are treasures upon this subject which lie as yet buried in the Scriptures. Theology should bring them out.

The Westminster Shorter Catechism defines adoption as the act of God’s grace, whereby we are received into the number, and have a right to all the privileges, of the sons of God. Its position in the scheme of salvation, Calvinistically conceived, is brought out very clearly by Professor A. A. Hodge, in his Outlines of Theology, p. 316, revised edition, New York, 1879.

churches. A certain Migetius who preached in the city of Sarum, which was held by the Moors, and where the Christian Church consequently stood in a very loose connection with Rome, gave a very gross exposition of the doctrine of the holy Trinity; teaching that there were three persons bodily, and a triple manifestation in history, of the Son of God against him Elipandus. Archbishop of Toledo, wrote a letter vindicating the orthodox idea of the immanence of the Trinity, but at the same time establishing a very sharp distinction between the second person of the Trinity and the human nature of Christ. According to his divine nature, Elipandus said, Christ is the true son of God,—"I and the Father are one;" but, according to his human nature, he is only adopted by God, filius adoptius, —"The Father is greater than I." This distinction, however, between the two natures in Christ, sounded in the ears of the time as a distinction in his very personality, and was by many considered a relapse into the Nestorian heresy. Its historical genesis is obscure. Some ascribe it to an influence from the surrounding Islamism; others find it in a colony of Eastern, perhaps Nestorian Christians who came to Spain with the Arabs, and whom Elipandus, in a letter to Felix, mentions as his good friends having the right faith: while Alcuin, in a letter to Leidrad, denounces them as the true fathers of adoptionism. Elipandus was attacked by Abbot Beatus of Liubua, Bishop Etherius of Osma, and a majority of the Asturian clergy. A vehement controversy broke out, and it soon spread from Spain into France, through Felix, Bishop of Urgel, which, situated in the Pyrenees, belonged to the Frankish Empire, to the diocese of Narbonne. At the synod of Regensburg, 792, Felix defended the adoptionist view in the presence of Charlemagne. But the bishops condemned him; and he was sent to Rome, where Adrian I. kept him in prison till he drew up an orthodox confession, and took his oath upon it. As soon, however, as he had returned to Urgel, the confession was made under compulsion, and fled into the domains of the Moors.

Elipandus, and those Spanish bishops who belonged to his party, now addressed a letter to the Frankish bishops and to Charlemagne himself; and the case was once more investigated by the synod of Frankfort, 794. The result was four letters,—from the Germano-Frankish bishops, from the Italian bishops, from Adrian I., and from Charlemagne,—all condemning the adoptionist movement, and exhorting to concord and quiet. But the Adoptionists were very zealous in propagating their views, which spread rapidly among the masses. Also in the literary field the controversy grew hotter. In 798 Felix wrote a book, and sent it to Alcuin. It was answered both by Paulinus of Aquileia and Alcuin (Epistulae adn. Felix at. 1.), the latter of whom received a very rough rejoinder from Felix. The case began to look serious, and demand energetic measures. In 798 Leidrad of Lyon, Neprid of Narbonne, and the Abbots Benedict of Aniane, visited personally the infected places in France and Spain. In 799 Leo III., formally condemned Felix at a synod in Rome, and in 800 a disputation was arranged between Felix and Alcuin at the synod of Aix-la-Chapelle. Felix resisted for a long time, but at last he declared himself beaten, ret reacted, and wrote a circular letter to his friends, admonishing them to return to the Orthodox Church. This letter, the new work by Alcuin in seven books, and the preachings of Leidrad and Benedict, finally smoothed down the commotion, and the sect disappeared.

ADRAM' MELECH (Adar is king). 1. One of the gods of Sepharvaim worshipped by the Assyrians transplanted to Samaria (2 Kings xvii. 31). Children were sacrificed to it. The name appears to consist of Adar (אָדָּר or אַדָּר "lordly:" Movers, die Phönizier, Bd. 1, 1811, p. 340, wrongly derives it from the Persian azar "fire"), a designation of the god, and melek, Assyrian malik, "king," which is a frequent honorary epithet. It is uncertain whether any such god has, however, been yet read of upon the Assyrian monuments. But Adar, possibly the same as wot, occurs in proper names, e.g., Atarilu, "Atar is God." See SCHRADE, Die assyrisch-babylon. Keilinschr., 1872, p. 148 sq. The name Adramelus also indicates a god Adar. It is very questionable whether Atar-samain, "Atar of the heavens," as a North Arabian god in Assyrian inscriptions, should be identified with Adar, as is done by Schrader; much more likely with Atargatis (Astarte), which see, whom Jeremiah apparently calls the "queen of heaven" (Jer. vii. 18).

2. Son and murderer of Sennacherib, King of Assyria (2 Kings xxi. 37; I. xxxvii. 38), called Adramelus by Moses of Chorene (I. 23), and Andremuzanes by Eusebius, after Polyhistor in the Armenian Chronicle (ed. Maj. p. 19).

ADRIAN is the name of six popes. — ADRIAN I. (Feb. 9, 772, to Dec. 25, 795) leaned from the very beginning of his reign towards the Frankish faction in Rome, and addressed himself directly to Charlemagne for help, when Desiderius, king of the Longobards, invaded his territory. Charlemagne came to his rescue (773), defeated Desiderius, confirmed and increased the donation of Pepin; and a very cordial relation was established between the Frankish king, Adrian understood how to draw the huge mass of Charlemagne's empire nearer to Rome. He labored in union with the king against the Adoptionists; his legates played a prominent part in all the many synods which were held under the presidency of the king. In 799 he was in introducing the Gregorian chant, first in Metz, afterwards in other parts of the realm, etc. Nevertheless, in this whole relation, Charlemagne was the master. When the decrees of the Council of Nice of 787, re-establishing the worship of the saints, and sanctioned by the papal legates, were laid before him, he had them refused by the Liber Carolinii, and rejected by the synod of Frankfort (794), and the pope could do nothing. His letters are found in JAFFE: Biblioth. Rerum German, vol. IV. —

ADRIAN II. (Dec. 14, 867, to Nov. 25, 872) interfered repeatedly, but with very little success, in the affairs of the Frankish Empire. In the conflict between the emperor Louis II. and Charles the Bald, King of France, he sided with the former, and addressed a high-handed and threatening letter to the latter. But in the answer which was drawn up by Archbishop Hincmar of Rheims, the king coldly declined to pay any regard to the pope's interventions in secular matters. In 871 Bishop Hincmar of Laon was deposed by the synod of Duziacum, but appealed to the pope, who, on the authority of the Pseudo-Isidorean Decretals, claimed for himself the power of the pope, and made an attempt to reorganize the government of the city on its ancient model. Arnold of Brescia preached at that time in the very city of Rome against the secular power of the pope, and made an attempt to organize the government of the city on its ancient model. Adrian protested, fled to Orvieto, and made the breach still wider by the outrageous manner in which he spoke of the Reformers. In 872 Adrian and Frederick Barbarossa was very cordial. Arnold of Brescia praedicated at that time in the very city of Rome against the secular power of the pope, and made an attempt to reorganize the government of the city on its ancient model. Adrian protested, fled to Orvieto, and laid interdict on the city. The senate then compelled Arnold to leave Rome; and on his flight he fell into the hands of Frederick, who, after a successful campaign in Northern Italy, was slowly approaching Rome. A bargain was now struck between the pope and the king. Frederick delivered up Arnold, who was hanged and burnt, and Adrian crowned Frederick emperor. The peace was soon disturbed, however. Adrian addressed a letter to the emperor and the German bishop, which was understood to say that the German Empire was a fief of the papal crown. Frederick was in a rage, the bishops felt provoked, and Adrian did not succeed in explaining away the offensive expressions. When Frederick again visited Italy (1158), he convened an assembly of Italian jurists to define his right and power according to Roman law. This assembly agreed that the present emperor had the same power as the ancient imperator, that is, "quod Principi placuit, legis habet vigorem." From this moment Frederick began to exercise his imperial authority very regardless of the pretensions of the pope; and Adrian was on the point of dying from the strain he endured. He died at Agnani. The bulls and letters of Adrian IV. are found in Migne: Patro, vol. 188, p. 1381 sq. —

ADRIAN V. (July 12 to Aug. 18, 1276) was a native of Genoa, named Ottobuono de Fieschi, a nephew of Innocent IV., held as Archdeacon of Campania, and, after the death of Cardinal Ximenes (1517), regent. He was a pious and honest man, of strong moral principles; but his views of the German Reformation were utterly mistaken. He believed that the whole movement was nothing but a re-action against the corruptions of the Church; that the doctrines propounded by the Reformers were mere nonsense, which no sensible man could seriously entertain; that a reform of certain flagrant misuses in the Church would be a sufficient means to stay the commotion, etc. Thus he spoiled his case with his own party by the confessions he made and the reforms he promised; and, on the other side, he made the breach still wider by the outrageous manner in which he spoke of the Reformers. Adrian was on the point of excommunicating him when he died at Agnani. The bulls and letters of Adrian IV. are found in Migne: Patro, vol. 188, p. 1381 sq. —

ADRIAN VI. (Jan. 9, 1522, to Sept. 14, 1523), b. at Utrecht, 1450; the son of a poor mechanic; became professor of theology in the University of Louvain, and tutor to Charles V., who in 1516 sent him as his representative to Spain, where he was made Bishop of Tortosa, cardinal, and, after the death of Cardinal Ximenes (1517), regent. He was a pious and honest man, of strong moral principles; but his views of the German Reformation were utterly mistaken. He believed that the whole movement was nothing but a re-action against the corruptions of the Church; that the doctrines propounded by the Reformers were mere nonsense, which no sensible man could seriously entertain; that a reform of certain flagrant misuses in the Church would be a sufficient means to stay the commotion, etc. Thus he spoiled his case with his own party by the confessions he made and the reforms he promised; and, on the other side, he made the breach still wider by the outrageous manner in which he spoke of the Reformers. Adrian was on the point of excommunicating him when he died at Agnani. The bulls and letters of Adrian IV. are found in Migne: Patro, vol. 188, p. 1381 sq. —

ADULLAM. A royal city of the Cannanites (Gen. xxxviii. 1), allotted to Judah (Josh. xii. 15), fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xvi. 7), and made, later on, one of the abodes of royalty (Mic. i. 15), repeopled by the Jews after captivity (Neh. xi. 30). It has been proposed to locate the case of Adullam, so famous from its connection with David's early history, in the neighborhood of this city; but it is more usual to suppose it was in the neighborhood of Bethlehem in the Wady Khadd and that intercourse with a married woman, is in all primitive civilizations considered from a purely religious point of view. It is a sin, an offence against God. In course of time, however, as civilization progresses, the social aspect becomes more and more prominent. This is the case both with Christianity and Judaism. When it became acquainted with Christianity. Frequent occurrence among the Jews. Roman scourged with a leathern whip. The idea of divorce. But a great change took place when Christianity became the religion of the State, although not by reason of any direct command-ment. Christ recognized adultery as a legitimate reason for divorce (Matt. v. 32). But in this instance, as always when in contact with real life, he gently pushed aside the shifting and fugitive forms of the surface, and applied his reform—the word that saves—to the very root of the matter. He condemned the evil passion and lustful look from which adultery springs (Matt. v. 27–32). Of adultery and divorce, the New Testament says very little: it speaks only of that in which all such details are summed up,—of chastity. Nevertheless, the presence of both Christianity made upon man's mind, as it gradually took hold of the world, was so overwhelming, that it became impossible to look at anything from any other point of view than a religious or specifically Christian one. As a new beginning, Christianity also has a period of primitive civilization. Once more adultery became a sin, an offence against God. Constantine defined it as sacrilege, and punished it with death. Canon law and early ecclesiastical discipline point in the same direction. The Council of Anzeyra (314) refused the eucharist to the adulterer, even at the moment of death; and the Sixth Council of Orleans deposed every clerical who had committed adultery, and locked him up for life in a monastery. First in the beginning of the seventeenth century the subject again breaks loose from the religious ground, and becomes a matter purely of civil legislation. Compare the articles Marriage and Divorce.

ADVENT is a preparation for the Feast of the Nativity, as Lent is a preparation for Easter: consequently no celebration of Advent could be instituted until the Feast of the Nativity was fixed; and this was not done in the Western Church until after the fourth century. The first traces of such an institution are found with Cæsarius of Arlecte (d. 542). Two sermons of his are still extant, in which he exhorts his congregation to go frequently to church, do good to the poor, etc., during the season of preparation for the great feast. Another evidence, from the same time, gives a decree by the Council of Lerida (524), ordering that no wedding shall take place during Advent, as little as during the fast before Easter. The ancient Church considered Advent a season of fast, exactly like Lent, during which all amusements ought to cease. The synod of Tours (567) decreed a daily fast for monks during Advent; and the synod of Macon (581) ordered, that, from the day of St. Martin, in which all things are stoned. With respect to the duration of the season, no general agreement was ever arrived at. If a quadragesimal fast shall precede Christmas, as it precedes Easter, it must begin with the day of St. Martin (Nov. 11); and such, indeed, was the custom in France for a long time. Later on, however, the Fast of Advent was limited, and began with the day of St. Andrew (Nov. 30). At the present time, the Roman and Lutheran churches have only four Sundays in Advent; while the Greek has six, the season beginning with Nov. 15.

Besides being a preparation for Christmas, the season of Advent has another significations: it forms, since the sixteenth century, a preparation for the ecclesiastical year, which before that time began with Easter, both in the Orient and in the Occident. The occasion of the change was the circumstance that the ecclesiastical year of the Jews also begins with Easter. As the Reformed Church has no ecclesiastical year, properly speaking, it had no celebration of Advent either. The minister being at liberty to select his text, with reference only to the wants of the moment, may preach on the passion during Advent. In Germany, however, the Reformed churches have generally adopted the practice of the Lutherans. They practice immersion; believe in the soul from the hour of death to the day of annihilation of the wicked, and in the sleep of justice. They are scattered throughout the United States, and reported, on Nov. 7, 1879, to the General Conference held at Battle Creek, Mich., 144 ministers, 509 churches, and 14,111 members. The amount of moneys pledged to the Systematic Benevolence Fund was $31,714. They bear an excellent reputation. See MILLER, WILLIAM; MILLENARIANISM.

ADVOCATE OF THE CHURCH (Advocatus, or Defender Ecclesiae), an officer charged with the secular affairs of an ecclesiastical establishment, more especially with its defence, legal or armed. As soon as the Church became possessed of large estates, it necessarily became implicated in many proprietary relations which it was impossible for the clergy to maintain, prevented as they were legally from pleading in a civil court, and morally from wearing arms. Under such circumstances it became necessary for a church or monastery to have a defender. The office originated in Africa, in the beginning of the fifth century; and among the Germanic nations it assumed a peculiar form on account of their peculiar juridical ideas. According to German views, only he could hold property, in the full sense of the word, who was a free man, capable of wearing arms, and, in case of necessity, able to defend his rights by force. Persons who were free, but unable to wear arms, such as women, children, old and sick people, needed a representative under whose ward (mundium, mundibundium) they stood. To this category the clergy belonged; and though at first they refused to be considered and treated legally as minors, they finally accepted the situation, because it gave them safety against violent attacks, and exemption from many shocking details of German procedure. By a decree of 783, Charlemagne ordered that each church or monastery should choose a warden to act as its caustudicus before the court, take oath in its name, have fugitive slaves and alienated property restored, command the soldiers sent by the establishment to the army, etc. Very often, however, this advocate of the Church developed into a tyrant, keeping the establishment in absolute submission, despoothing and plundering it. He usurped the whole power of administration, limited the authority of the bishop to the purely spiritual affairs, absorbed the tithes and all other revenues, and doled out to the clergy only a mean modicum. Innocent III., however, succeeded in checking the growing importance of this institution, and soon the office itself disappeared.

ÆGI DIUS, b. in Rome 1247; d. at Bourges 1316; descended from the family of the Colon- nas; studied in Paris under Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventura; became tutor to Philip the Fair, for whom he wrote De Regimine Principum (printed in Rome, 1482); acquired great fame as a teacher of theology and philosophy in the University of Paris, and was styled Doctor fundamentalis, Theologiae princeps; Archbishop of Bourges, 1293. He was a very prolific writer, but only a few of his works have been printed: De Peccato Originali, Oxford, 1479; Questiones Metaphysicae, Venice, 1501; Lucubrationes de Lombardi Sententiae, Basel, 1629.

ÆLFRIC is the name of two prominent prelates in the Anglo-Saxon Church,—one, Archbishop of Canterbury, 900–1006; the other, Archbishop of York, 1023–1051,—but whether the learned Benedictine Ælfric (grammaticus) is identical with one of these archbishops, or not, is a question as yet unsolved. As Alfred was the founder, so Ælfric was the model, of the Saxon prose. He wrote a Saxon grammar and glossary; and he translated into Saxon a number of homilies, the Heptateuch, etc. But of his personal life nothing is known but a few notices scattered about in his works. In his honor the Ælfric Society was formed in London, in 1842, for the purpose of publishing his works and those of other Saxons. For this society Benjamin Thorpe edited the homilies in 1844. The grammar and glossary were printed at Oxford in 1859 and 1868. See WHARTON: Anglica Sacra; Wright: Biograph. Brit., 1812.

ÆNEAS of Gaza, a philosopher of the Neo-Platonic school; converted to Christianity; flourished in Alexandria about 487; and is the author of twenty-five letters, printed by Aldus in his Epist. Graec. Collecta, Ven., 1499, and of a dialogue, Theophrastus, edited by Boissonade, Paris, 1836, and translated into Latin by Ambrosius, Venice, 1513.

ÆNEAS, Bishop of Paris, 843–877, took part in the controversy between the Eastern and Western Churches occasioned by Photius, and wrote Liber adversus Gracae, found in D'ARCHERY: Spicileg. I., pp. 112–149.

ÆPINUS, JOHANNES, b. at Ziesar in Brandenburg, 1499; d. in Hamburg, May 13, 1533; became a pupil of Bugenhagen in Belbuck, 1517–21; studied afterwards in Wittenberg, under Luther and Melancthon, but was expelled from his native country on account of his ardent adherence to the doctrines of the Reformers, and found it even necessary to change his name (Hoeck): labored in the cause of the Reformation at Stralsund, 1524—28, and was appointed preacher to the Church of St. Peter in Hamburg, in 1529, and superintendent in 1532. By his comment on the Sixteenth Psalm he caused a very violent controversy concerning Christ's de- secratus ad inferos, which ended with the deposition and expulsion of his adversaries from Hamburg.

The beginnings of Christianity in Africa are obscure; but, on account of the very lively intercommunication between Rome and this province, it was natural that the new religion should be carried thither very early, and, once introduced, it could not fail to produce an impression, either of passionate enthusiasm, or of fanatical hatred, on a popular mind so vigorous, so ardent, and so unsophisticated as the African. AGAPE.

Pl. p. AGAPE; pl. ACAPE.

From the Greek ἀγάπη, "love," feast of love, a custom in the primitive Church according to which all the members of a congregation, even the master and his slaves, met together at a common meal, celebrating the Eucharist, as brethren among brethren. It would not be difficult to find striking precedents for such an institution, both among the Jews and the Greeks and the Romans. In his letter to Trajan, Pliny classes it among the meetings of secret societies, so well known to the Romans of the empire. It is more probable, however, that it grew up directly from the simple and natural commemoration of the events of "the night in which the Lord was betrayed" (1 Cor. xi. 23). It is mentioned for the first time in the Epistle of Jude (12) and during the next three or four centuries it is often spoken of by the Fathers. Tertullian gives a vivid and touching description of it in his Apoplogicus, ch. 39.

Originally the character of the agape was strictly devotional: the feast was celebrated in the church, and at the time of the Feast of the Passover its religious character was not denied; it being a social symbol of the equality and solidarity of the congregation. Here all gave and received the kiss of love; here communications from other congregations were read and answered. But, as the congregations grew larger — the social differences between the members began to make themselves felt, and the agape changed character. They became entertainments of the rich. In Alexandria "the psalms and hymns and spiritual songs" of old (Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16) were supplied by performances on the lyre, the harp, and the flute, in spite of Clement's protest (P edagogue, II. 4). In other places the rich retired altogether from the meetings, and the agape sank down into a kind of poorhouse institution (August, Contra Faustum, XX. 20). Again, in Northern Italy, Ambrose suppressed them altogether, because they gave rise to disorders, and propagated reminiscences from the Pagan paenula. Other circumstances contributed also to throw the agape out of use. The Third Council of Carthage (301) decreed that the Eucharist should be taken fasting, and thereby separated the celebration of the Eucharist from the agape. The synod of Laodicea, and again the Third Council of Carthage, and finally the Council in Trullo (692), forbade to hold the agape in the church-buildings, and benefited them thereby altogether of their devotional character. After the close of the fourth century they began gradually to disappear; and an attempt made by the Council of Gaugra (about 380) to restore them to their old position by anathematizing all who despaired them, and kept away from them, was in vain.

AGAPETUS.

The name of two popes. — 1. AGAPETUS I. June 3, 533, to April 22, 556, pawned the holy vessels of the churches of Rome in order to procure money for a journey to Constantinople, ostensibly for the purpose of averting the war with which the Emperor Justinian threatened Theodosius, king of the Ostrogoths, but in reality intent upon attacking the monophysite heresy represented in the Eastern Church by Anthimus, patriarch of Constantinople, the Emperor Theodora, and a large party at the Byzantine court. In this he was completely successful. Anthimus was deposed, and Mennas put in his place. But Agapetus did not enjoy his triumph very long; he died during his visit to Constantinople. Five letters of his are found in Mansi: Concord. VIII. — 2. AGAPETUS II. April, 916 to November, 933, owed his elevation to the intrigues of Alberticus, in whose hands he remained a willing tool during his whole reign. In France, Archbishop Artold of Rheims had been expelled from his see by Hugo of Vermandois, and the contest between the two prelates grew almost into a civil war. Agapetus sided first with the one party, then with the other, and had no influence... on the final decision by the synod of Ingelheim (1916), where Hugo was excommunicated, and Artold re-instanted. As weak and vacillating was his policy in Germany. Having invited Otho I. to come to Rome and be crowned emperor, he became frightened when the king arrived at Pavia, and stretched his hands out towards his enemies.

AGATHA, St., whose death-day is celebrated by the Roman-Catholic Church on Feb. 5, belongs to that class of saints of which one does not know whether they ever have existed, or not. See Dr. Franz Görres: Kritische Untersuchungen über die kirchliche Christenverfolgung, Jena, 1873. What the acts and biographies contain is such a mixture of legend and fable, that hardly the smallest particle of historical fact could be extracted from them. But although it is probable that St. Agatha never lived, her name has, nevertheless, played a conspicuous role, especially in Southern Italy and Sicily. In several places in Sicily she is still worshipped as the patron-saint against the eruptions of Mount Etna; and the cities of Palermo and Catania still contain the house where she lived. A SICILIAN monk, succeeded Domnus on the papal throne. On the sixth oecumenical council at Constantinople (680), he took a decided stand in the Monothelitic controversy, and carried his point, though his victory involved the anathema to his policy in Germany. Having invited Otho I. (948), where Hugo was excommunicated, and Artold re-instated. As weak and vacillating was his policy in Germany. Having invited Otho I. to come to Rome and be crowned emperor, he became frightened when the king arrived at Pavia, and stretched his hands out towards his enemies.

AGATHIAS, b. at Myrina in Eolis about 530; d. in Constantinople about 501; studied philosophy in Alexandria, and law in Constantinople; picaded in the courts of the latter city; and wrote, besides some poetry, a history of the Byzantine Empire from 533 to 550, containing much interesting and reliable information about the character and religion of the various nations with which the Byzantine government had to deal. Best edition by Niebuhr in Corpus Script. Graec.

AGER. Both Church and State require a certain age in those who do, or have done upon them, certain acts. Thus confirmation is not to be administered until "years of discretion" are reached. On the Continent, among Protestants, this is usually understood to be at fourteen; among Roman Catholics, as early as seven. Marriage-contracts are declared void by canon law if the parties are under seven; marriage before the man is fourteen and the wife twelve, and not without the consent of their guardians ere they are twenty-one. State laws differ upon this point, varying from eighteen to twenty-five for the man, and fourteen to eighteen for the wife, as the ages of permisibility. The question of age enters into the matter of ordination. The Roman-Catholic Church has determined upon the following: For the lowest orders, the tonsure, etc., seven years; the diaconate, twenty-two; the priesthood, twenty-four; the episcopacy, thirty. The pope can, if he pleases, grant a dispensation to allow ordination at earlier ages, and allows the bishops to consecrate to the priesthood a year under twenty-four. Monastic vows cannot be assumed, according to the Council of Trent, before the sixteenth year, nor can a female enter an order before she be twelve; but the majority of orders demand a higher age. Thirty years is also the youngest age for an abbot, and forty for an abbeis or priores.

AGELLIUS, or AGELLI, Antonio, b. at Sorrento 1592; d. at Accerno 1608; was a member of the institution of the scholastici, who had charge of the printing establishment of the Vatican; superintended the correction of the Vulgate and the Roman edition of the Septuagint; became Bishop of Accerno in 1595, and wrote commentaries on the Psalms, the Canticles, the Book of Lamentations, the Book of Proverbs, Habakkuk, etc. He also edited Cyril's Five Books against Nestorius, Rome, 1607, accompanied by a Latin translation.

AGENDA, German form AGENDÉ (Lat. "things to be done"), describes divine worship in general, and the Mass, in particular. The oldest writers use it only in the plural. We meet with agenda diei, the office for the day; agenda mortuorum, the office for the dead; agenda matutina and vesperina, morning and evening prayer; but in the Roman Church, since the sixteenth century, the word "Ritual" has been used. See Liturgy, Missal, Ritual.

When Luther had broken with the Church of Rome, he found himself compelled to arrange a public service which should embody the ideas of the Reformation. The greatest difference touched the Lord's Supper. Luther began with forms for the Wittenberg Church (1524); but these books were quickly multiplied; the divided condition of the empire necessitated different books for each petty kingdom or duchy. Though quite different in contents, they are all distinguished from the Missal of the Roman Church by being written in the vernacular, although in some the Latin text was also printed. They retain the older ecclesiastical terms, and speak of ordination and confirmation, although the Episcopate had been abolished. The oldest Agenda is of the Duchy of Prussia (1525). As the religious development took these forms, — the strict Lutheran, the Calvinistic, and the Semi-Catholic, — each form had its distinctive liturgy. So things went on till the Thirty-Years' War, that period of dire confusion, destroyed all peaceful church life, and well-nigh the Church itself. When the distracted churches again could lift their heads, they arranged new forms (1650), which differed...

as much as ever; and yet all showed the new spirit which had arisen.—Pietism, that striving after greater devotion in worship and purity of life. The next century was a decided falling-off. Pietism gave place to Rationalism. The Iron Age was followed by the Lead Age. But in the present century reform has been made, and the matter is under earnest discussion, and many are the printed specimens of revised liturgies. The new epoch began with the appearance of the New Prussian Agenda, 1822. The desire is to unite the Lutheran and the Reformed churches in Prussia in one worship.

The Reformed churches have from the beginning manifested an equal interest in the order of worship; and Zwingli demanded, as Luther, the fullest liberty of choice. The movement followed a course similar to the Lutheran. From 1523 on appeared, one at a time, forms for the more important services,—baptism, marriage, Lord's Supper, etc.—composed by Zwingli or Leo Juda. The name Agenda is rarely used. The Swiss liturgy is peculiar in the sacramental portions, in the announcement of the dead from the pulpit, and in the particular prayers for the different feasts. The Calvinistic or French liturgy follows that of Calvin, composed for the Genevan Church: it sometimes appears bound up with the New Testament.

AGIER, Pierre Jean, b. in Paris, Dec. 28, 1748; d. there Sept. 22, 1823; studied law, and held various high positions in the French courts, both then and there Sept. 22, 1823; studied law, and held various high positions in the French courts, both years, which assumes its most definite form in the theory of knowledge, but rests the doctrine that the Infinite and Absolute are unknowable, on the limitation of human intelligence, maintaining that the Infinite transcends the limits of our knowledge, and must, on that account, remain unknown, while the existence of the Infinite God must be a matter of belief. There is thus considerable diversity as to the grounds on which Agnosticism finds favor; but the prevailing form of the theory is that resting upon the assertion of the exclusively phenomenal aspect of human knowledge.

Agnosticism is a theory of the Unknowable, which assumes its most definite form in the denial of the possibility of any knowledge of God. This negative position is connected with a theory that we know only the phenomenal. It may be said to spring out of this theory as a logical deduction; though Agnosticism has been favored by those who do not hold the phenomenal theory of knowledge. For its doctrine that the Infinite and Absolute are unknowable, on the limitation of human intelligence, maintaining that the Infinite transcends the limits of our knowledge, and must, on that account, remain unknown, while the existence of the Infinite God must be a matter of belief. There is thus considerable diversity as to the grounds on which Agnosticism finds favor; but the prevailing form of the theory is that resting upon the assertion of the exclusively phenomenal aspect of human knowledge.

Agnosticism is of modern growth, and may be traced to Kant's theory of knowledge. Kant's Critical Philosophy was an attempt to ascertain the conditions of knowledge by determining how much comes through experience, and how much is contributed by the mind, not as actual knowledge, but as necessary forms of knowing, thus determining the possibilities of our knowledge. Kant attributed all our knowledge to three distinct cognitive faculties,—the sensory, the understanding, and the reason. The sensory gives us the observations or perceptions of the phenomenal world, the understanding the judgments of experience, and the reason the concept or idea. The sensory and elaborated knowledge, grouped under the categories or pure conceptions,—quantity, quality, relation, and modality; the reason gives us the ideas which are regulative of the whole system of our knowledge; and these are the soul, the universe, and God. In prosecuting his task Kant proceeded to show that there are certain a priori elements in all knowledge, whether given by the senses, the understanding, or the reason. "All our knowledge begins with sense, proceeds thence to understanding, and ends with reason, beyond which nothing higher can be discovered in the human mind for elaborating the matter of intuition, and subjecting it to the highest unity of thought" (Critique of Pure Reason, Meiklejohn's Trans., p. 212. Transcendental Dialectic, Introduction, II. A.). "The matter of intuition" describes the successive impressions received through the sensory. This matter is worked up into systematized knowledge under the categories of the understanding, which power may therefore be described as "a faculty for the production of unity of phenomena by virtue of rules" (Ib. p. 214). When Kant speaks of our knowledge ending with reason, he means that reason, "the faculty of principles," supplies to the understanding the regular principles of thought and this is the highest reach of human intelligence. In this way Kant's theory of knowledge is, that all the matter of our knowledge is phenomenal, coming through the senses; all the form is supplied by the mind itself; and in this way it follows that space and time, the categories, and the ideas,—the Soul, the Universe, and God,—are only regulative of mental procedure, and do not afford any knowledge of real existence. This latter conclusion is not a mere casual inference from the doctrine elaborated by Kant, but is formally announced, worked out in detail, and insisted upon. There is, indeed, an important and valuable corrective in Kant's philosophy, that is, his ethical system, with the categorical imperative,—the "thou shalt" of moral law,—carrying by implication the reality of the divine existence. At the same time it will be remarked, that, according to him, the idea of God is illusory, just as, and not otherwise than, the idea of self is, and the idea of the universe. Standing in these relations, his theory that God is unknowable will be disposed of under the demands of practical life by the rejection of the suggestion that self and the universe are equally, and for the same reasons, unknowable. But the thorough-going rejection of Kant's Agnosticism is to be found only in the criticism of his theory of cognition, and the supplanting of it with a true theory of knowledge.

Hamilton and Mansel may be taken together, as, by their conjoint efforts, they present the next phase of Agnosticism. Sir William Hamilton, influenced rather by the general drift of Kant's thinking than by the actual structure of his theory, insisted that the Infinite must be "incognizable and inconceivable; its notion being only negative of the conditioned, which last can alone be positively known or conceived" (Discussions on Philosophy, p. 12). In the following manner he works out his view: "The mind can conceive, and consequently can know, only the limited and the conditionally limited. The unconditionally unlimited, or the Infinite, the unconditionally limited, or the Absolute, cannot positively be construed to the mind; they can be conceived only by a thinking away from, or abstraction of, those very conditions under which thought itself is realized: consequently the notion of the unconditioned is only negative,—negative of the conceivable itself" (Ib. p. 15). Pushing this representation to its utmost verge, he says, "The Infinite and Absolute are only names of two counter imbecilities of the human mind" (Ib. p. 21). His position as to the divine existence is brought into relation with his doctrine of ignorance, or negative conceptions thus: "We must believe in the infinity of God; but the infinite God cannot by us, in the present limitation of our faculties, be comprehended or conceived" (Lect. on Metaphysics, II. p. 374). This is not the Kantian doctrine; but it is still a theory of ignorance based on the recognized limits of human thought. It admits a belief, but denies a knowledge, being explicit on the limits of knowledge, but far from explicit on the limits of belief. On this account, Kant's doctrine on its purely intellectual side (omitting the ethical) has a consistency which does not appear in Hamilton's theory. From the structure of his theory, it becomes a necessity with Kant to insist upon this illogical action of reason; and he does this resolutely, as if it were a leading feature in his scheme. Thus he urges, that, in our reason, there exist fundamental rules and maxims "which have completely the appearance of objective principles" (Ib.). This illusion he declares it impossible to avoid, and refers to the appearance of the sea being higher at a distance than near the shore. His general position is indicated thus: "I accordingly maintain that transcendental ideas can never be maintained as constitutive ideas, that they cannot be conceptions of objects, and that, when thus considered, they assume a fallacious and dialectic character" (Appendix to Transc. Dialectic, Ib. p. 393). This rapid summary of Kant's doctrine may suffice to show how strenuously he denied that our idea of God is any guaranty for the reality of the divine existence. At the same time it will be remarked, that, according to him, the idea of God is illusory, just as, and not otherwise than, the idea of self is, and the idea of the universe. Standing in these relations, his theory that God is unknowable will be disposed of under the demands of practical life by the rejection of the suggestion that self and the universe are equally, and for the same reasons, unknowable. But the thorough-going rejection of Kant's Agnosticism is to be found only in the criticism of his theory of cognition, and the supplanting of it with a true theory of knowledge.

AGNOSTICISM.
This, however, leaves unexplained the philosophic harmony of reason and faith; that is, the possibility of showing how our thoughts concerning God are to be harmonized with our belief in his existence. The whole range of this discussion has been brought under review by the present writer. (Philosophy of the Infinite.) The discussion involves a difference of words, which is of slight value, leading to debate as to the true Infinite and Absolute, and not within our thoughts, but above all, and beyond all. Its real interest lies in the theory of knowledge connected with the theory of belief — a theory which must involve an answer to the question, "Can the infinite God reveal himself to finite intelligences?" And this is a question: for eternity as well as for time, since it is needless to introduce, in the language of Hamilton, "the present limitation of our faculties;" for the limitation must continue hereafter, as it is recognized in the present. That the finite cannot comprehend the Infinite is a position which can occasion no discussion; but, to those granting a belief in the infinitude of God, the question is, How far does such belief imply knowledge? Hamilton and Mansel both denied the possibility of knowledge, and from their own standpoint were upholders of Agnosticism.

From these two philosophers we find the doctrine pass over into the hands of a different school of thinkers. Those who trace all knowledge to experience naturally accepted a doctrine of Agnosticism as to Infinite and Absolute, and specially hailed it as coming from the opposite school of thought. To them it seemed as a surrender of the whole theory against which they contend, and a vindication of their favorite theory. Philosophers of the a priori school had been fabricating a weapon which could with great advantage be turned against themselves. Discussions on the relativity of human knowledge were eagerly taken up by sensationalists, under the lead of Hamilton's theory, as illustrated in J. S. Mill's Examination of Hamilton's Philosophy, p. 2. Mill was not hampered, as Hamilton was, with the admission that "we must believe in the infinity of God;" but he could state, "It is almost superfluous for me to say that I am entirely with Sir W. Hamilton." According to his theory of knowledge, Mill necessarily rejected the doctrine "that we have an intuitive knowledge of God," saying, "Whatever relates to God I hold to be matter of inference; I would add, of inference a posteriori" (Ib. p. 45).

Mill's quarrel with Hamilton is, that he does not carry out his theory of ignorance with sufficient thoroughness, and does not rigidly treat absolute and infinite as "meaning abstractions" (Ib. p. 70).

Herbert Spencer as an Evolutionist began his system of philosophy with "The Unknowable," professedly "carrying a step farther the doctrine put into shape by Hamilton and Mansel," and giving his adhesion to a belief in "an Absolute that transcends not only human knowledge, but human conception" (Preface to First Principles). He enters upon the relations between religion and science; admitting that "religious ideas of one kind or other are almost, if not quite, universal" (Ib. p. 13), and that religion "expresses some eternal fact." Thus Herbert Spencer escapes the meshes of the Manichean theory, in which J. S. Mill was entangled. Treating of the absurdities of our former beliefs he directs attention upon general "symbolic conceptions," such as we have of the earth. Such conceptions "are legitimate, provided, that, by some cumulative or indirect process of thought . . . we can assure ourselves that they stand for actualities;" but without this a mere system of thoughts "are altogether vicious and illusive, and in no way distinguishable from pure fictions" (Ib. p. 29). As to the origin of the universe, he seeks to show that the Atheistic, Pantheistic, and Theistic views are "verbally intelligible," but, when critically examined, "literally unintelligible" (Ib. 45). Nevertheless he allows "that we are obliged to suppose" that "there is a First Cause, and are driven by an inexorable logic" to the conclusion that he must be infinite and independent (Ib. 37, 38).

Next he quotes from Mansel as proving that the Infinitude and Absolute cannot be known. "It is given in experience, in every act of it, and is the knowledge of self as distinct from experience, without recognizing at once subjective experience and objective existence. And this is not a matter of inference or thought, but of knowledge. So is it as to the knowledge of self. It is given in experience, in every act of it, and is the knowledge of self as distinct from experience, and yet as possessing experience. In both cases knowledge is of more than the phenomenal. By another line of advance, knowledge is wider than the circle of experience. There is much known which never can be encompassed by experience, yet is recognized as explaining experience. The Infinite Being cannot be embraced in experience, cannot in this way be known. But there are truths not derived from experience, but daily implied in the interpretation of experience, which are self-evident truths, and not mere forms of thinking. Of these the law of causality is an example. This truth, that power exists adequate to the production of phenomena, is implied in all interpretation of experience and in all structure of science, and must carry us onward to knowledge of the First Cause, since knowledge of the effect is in some measure knowledge of the cause. A phenomenal theory of knowledge stands in conflict with all the sciences; while theology, by identity of rational data and method, is in harmony with them all.

Ontologically. — From the theological position, proceeding upon belief in the Divine existence as a certainty, admitted as such even by some upholders of Agnosticism, the theory is an exposition of alleged limits or restrictions applicable to the One Infinite and Absolute Being, and inconsistent as such. From the standpoint of theology,—taking finite existence as a reality, and personal existence as indubitable,—there is an inconsistency in supposing that God can create finite being, yet cannot make himself intelligible to an intelligent creation. Any difficulty which exists (there is a difficulty connected with the application of mere logical forms) applies as much to the creation of finite existence as distinct from the Self-existent One, as it applies to the knowledge through finite forms of the Infinite Being. If there be an intelligent creation and an intelligent Creator, he must assign to finite intelligence laws of intellectual action, guiding to certainty, so far as that is possible within the limits of the created intelligence, and especially to the harmony of all in the one great Source of all.

AGNUS DEI (Lat., “the Lamb of God”), an old Latin hymn, based on John i. 29: Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis, early introduced into the Mass of the Roman Church by Sergius I. in 680.

This name is also applied to wax medallions, bearing the figure of a lamb, made from the remains of the paschal taper, consecrated by the pope, and by him presented to distinguished persons. These medallions were often enclosed in cases of costly workmanship, and carefully preserved, almost as if they were relics. One said to have belonged to Charlemagne is among the treasures of the Cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle. The popes give them.

AGOBARD, b. in Spain 779; d. at Saintonge 810: since 810 Archbishop of Lyons; the successor of Liuthard, belonged to that group of great men which grew up in France under the reéstablishing and stimulating influence of Charlemagne. In theological respects he became known by his polemic against the Adoptionists and the Jews, by his liberal views of the doctrine of inspiration, by several works upon liturgy, etc.; but he also attacked and refuted many superstitions of his time, such as the production of hail-and-thunder-storms by bad men, etc., and he wrote against one of the most hated customs of his age, the ordoals and judicial combats. His works were edited by PAPHUS Masson, Paris, 1695; by BALLUCU, Paris, 1666; by GALLAND: Biblioth. Patr. XIII.; by MIGNE: Patro. 101. [See LECKY: History of Rationalism, 1865; REUTER: Geschicht der Aufklärung im Mittelalter, 1875.]

AGERADA, Maria de, b. 1602; d. May 24, 1665; superior, since 1627, of the Franciscan Convent of the Immaculate Conception, which her parents had founded on their estate at Agedra. Old Castile; and author of the Mística Ciudad de Dios, Madrid, 1670, — a biography of the Virgin, whose romantic and fantastic contents gave so much the more offense since the Francisians introduced the book as a divine revelation. In the Roman-Catholic Church there arose a sharp controversy, both as to whether the said nun was author of the book or not, and also to the contents of the book, which by the Sorbonne was declared to be scandalous and offensive, and which occasioned the Spanish and Portuguese inquisitions to forbid its reading. The pope, however, never saw fit to give a decision.

AGRICOLA, Johann, b. April 20, 1492, at Eisleben, whence he was often called Magister Isidius; d. in Berlin, Sept. 22, 1566. He studied in Wittenberg under Luther, and was in 1525 appointed director of the school of Eisleben, and preacher to St. Nicola. He was a very successful preacher; but his aspiration was a chair in the University of Wittenberg, and when, in 1526, Melanchthon was preferred to him, his vanity was deeply wounded. The doctrinal difference between him and the other reformers, though not yet noticed, had also developed; and in 1529 he attacked the Agricult of Melanchthon. Dissatisfied with his position in Eisleben, he suddenly gave it up in 1536, and came to Wittenberg, where Luther took him and his family into his own house, and procured a pension for him from the elector. But the discrepancy between them, in character and doctrine, was now too great; and in the following year Agricola directed an attack against Luther, and began the Antinomian controversy. Luther refuted him, and he retracted. New conflicts arose, however; and the new reconciliations proved too frail. In 1540 he fled to Berlin, where he was made preacher to the court, and afterwards superintendent of the Mark. He drew up the so-called Augsburg Interim, and labored much to have it adopted by all Protestant countries, thereby deepening still more the breach between himself and the reformers. Besides his theological works, Antonomia, Antinomina Theor., etc., he published a collection of German proverbs, Magdeburg, 1526. [GUSTAV KAWRAU: Johanna Agricola von Eisleben, Berlin, 1881.]

G. PLITT.

AGRICULTURE AMONG THE HEBREWS. Cain and Noah (Gen. iv. 2, ix. 21) were agriculturists, and thus at the very beginning of the race this pursuit was recognized. The patriarchs, although essentially nomads, now and then betrayed an inclination for a settled mode of life (cf. Gen. xx. 1 sq., xxvi. 6 sq.); but Isaac and Jacob and Joseph had all, absolutely necessary to support life, and were not farmers in the ordinary sense of the term (Gen. xxvi. 12, xlii. 1). God, however, intended his people to cultivate the fertile valleys and plains of the Holy Land, and to this end arranged that the descendants of Jacob should for many years occupy the rich Goshen, and there be trained for their future; and thus the transition from the shepherd to the farmer life was easily made,—another evidence of God's wisdom and forethought. That the growing people of Israel carried out this intention is manifest from the fact that the hungry and thirsty tribes included in their retrospect of the attractions of Egypt a reference to Egypt's fertility (Num. xx. 5). The Mosaic legislation was pre-eminently adapted to agriculturists (cf. Michaelis, Mos. Recht, I. § 38 sq.); and it is well known that only the tribes of Simeon on the west, and of Reuben and God on the east bank of the Jordan, were nomadic. The other tribes had their fields and olive-yards, and jealously did Moses guard them. At the Year of Jubilee, the family property, even although another had bought it, reverted to its original owner (Lev. xxv. 23, 28). The ploughing was a “load flowing with milk and honey.” Not only vineyards and orchards, but also fields covered with abundant harvests, gladdened the eyes with promised plenty. The cereals—wheat, barley, millet, and spelt, or, as others say, vetch (Vicia sativa), but not rye, which is unknown in southern countries—were raised. Beans and lentils, flax, cucumbers, cumin, and onions were extensively cultivated. From the earliest times there was flax (Josh. ii. 6; Prov. xxxi. 13; Hos. ii. 9); and the linen of the Hebrews enjoyed an excellent reputation. Mishena, babalanim, 10.9; Ketuboth, 5.9; Movrins: Phain. III. 1. p. 216 sq.

Canaan was a land full of water (Deut. viii. 7), and in this respect it is contrasted with Egypt (xi. 10–12). But the labor not put upon irrigation was required to build terraces, and thus agriculture was about as laborious there as elsewhere. It is the neglect to terrace which is one chief reason of Palestine's present comparative sterility. Fertilizers were also used; such as burnt stubble (Isa. v. 24, xlvi. 14), the chaff of the threshing-floors, the excrements of cattle, and dung prepared with straw (Isa. xxv. 10; cf. 2 Kings ix. 37; Ps. lxxxiii. 10); the ploughing and harrowing were done with oxen (1 Kings xix. 19; Job i. 14; Amos vi. 12) or cows (Judg. xiv. 18); sometimes, also, with asses (Isa. xxx. 24, xxxii. 20), either singly or in pairs. The yoke used was a croostree with two bows, to the upper side of which the yolk was fastened by a cord. The animals were urged by a goad some six or eight feet long. The plough was merely a crooked stick having a wooden share shod with a triangular piece of iron. The land was generally ploughed every winter, spring, and summer. For harrowing, a board loaded with stones was employed, usually before, always after, the sowing (Job xxxix. 10; Isa. xxviii. 24).

The winter crops, particularly the pulse, were sown towards the beginning of November, just before the autumn or former rains; the barley, a fortnight later; and still later the wheat, which was cast in rows (Isa. xxviii. 25). In December the fields were green (John iv. 35). The sowing of the summer crops—millet, beans, also of barley—came in January and February, in time for the later rains of March and early April. Soon after began the harvest-labor, rendered dangerous by the sun's heat (2 Kings iv. 18 sq.). Barley, lentils, and vetch were first gathered. The wheat and the spelt were harvested about the same time; but of course the time was later in the high lands than in the lower, and that by from a fortnight to a month. The grain was cut by a sickle, pretty close to the head, bound, and heaped. Gleanings were left to the poor (Lev. xix. 9; Ruth ii. 2). The threshing-floors were generally round, about fifty feet in diameter, if possible placed on high ground, so that the wind might carry off the chaff. Cattle or asses were driven upon the grain, and so it was threshed out; or else a machine was employed. The common kind was a board three feet wide, five or six feet long, and three inches thick. Holes were bored on the lower side, and stones fastened so as to project through the holes, thus acting as teeth. But there was another kind, which consisted of a heavy square frame, or four iron rings serrated like the teeth of a saw. Afterwards the wheat was cast in rows (Isa. xxviii. 27). Smaller quantities of grain and tender cereals were beaten out by a stick (Ruth ii. 17; Isa. xxviii. 27). The winnowing was accomplished by a broad shovel, or by a wooden fork with bent tines. The grain was blown against the wind, so that the chaff was blown away. Usually this was done from four p.m. until sunrise (Ruth iii. 2; cf. Jer. iv. 11; li. 2). The chaff and stubble were burnt (Isa. v. 24; Matt. iii. 12). Corn was sown in a sieve (Amos ix. 9), and then collected in great heaps. So it remained until it could be put into holes or into barns.

The scarcity of grain in spring and autumn, the droughts, sirocco, the grasshoppers, and attacks of enemies, rendered the crop a matter of uncertainty, and decreased the yield. And yet the yield was considerable. Some cereals gave two crops a year. The joy of harvest was proverbial (Ps. ix. 3). Canaan was always able to supply the neighboring lands (1 Kings v. 11; Ezek. xxxvii. 17; Ez. iii. 7; Acts xii. 20).

The law ruled agriculture as everything else; for example, it was forbidden to plough with an ox and an ass together, because clean and unclean animals must not be joined (Deut. xxii. 10); and diverse seeds must not be sown (Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 9). It was allowed to pluck the heads of ripened wheat while passing along the little path purposely made through the field (Deut. xxvii. 29; Matt. xii. 1; Luke vi. 1). The permission symbolized the beneficence of God, who feeds the hungry. The corners of the field, and gleanings, were always to be left at harvest-time (Lev. xix. 9; Deut. xxiv. 19). The ox who trod out the corn must not be muzzled (Deut. xxv. 4). The object of these latter regulations was to teach kindness toward God's creatures. We find upon the Egyptian monuments examples of similar laws. The first-fruits belonged to the Lord; the three first years' fruit of a young vineyard must not be gathered; the fruit of the fourth year belonged to Jehovah; and it was not until the fifth year that the owner could eat of it (Lev. xix. 23–25).

The three principal feasts of the Jews were connected with agriculture, and fitted to a people whose chief support was from their farms. On the day after the Passover Sabbath, the 16th of Nisan, a sheaf of the first-fruits was brought. The conclusion of the seventh week after Passover was marked by the offering of two wave loaves, made out of the new flour of the year; while the first-fruits and vine harvest were celebrated by the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. xxiii.). Every sabbath, and especially every sabbath-year and year of jubilee, by its abstinence from out-door labor. taught the Israelites God's sovereignty over their time and their land, and also that the highest good is not the product of earthly work and wealth.

Herod Agrippa II., in whose presence Paul declared his life, was a son of the preceding, but only seventeen years old when the father died. In 48 he obtained the principality of Chalcis, and the privilege of nominating the high priest, and superintending the temple of Jerusalem. In 62 he further obtained the tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias, with the title of king. But the Jews never liked him; and, in the rebellion under Vespasian, he sided with the Romans, and fought by the side of Titus at the conquest of Jerusalem.

A/GRIPPA, Heinrich Cornelius, b. at Cologne 1496; d. at Grenoble 1536; studied in Cologne, and Paris; spent then a couple of years (1507–8) in Spain; lectured in 1509 in (the University of Dôle, Franche-Comté), on Reuchlin's book, De Verbo Mirifico; served for some time at the court of Catherine de' Medici, queen of France, and regent of the Netherlands; went thence to England on some secret mission; returned to the Netherlands, but fell out with the monks; went to Cologne, and lectured on questiones quodlibetae; served for seven years in the imperial army in Italy (1511–1518), though at one time during this period he was sent to the Council of Pisa as a theologian, while at another he lectured on medicine, jurisprudence, and Hermes Trismegistus in Pavia and Turin; was appointed syndic at Metz in 1518, but was compelled to flee from the Inquisition; entered the service of the Duke of Savoy; practised medicine at Freiburg in 1523, became physician to the queen-mother of France, but was expelled, and fled to the Netherlands; was appointed historiographer to Charles V., and lived for some years under the protection of Archbishop Hermann of Cologne, but returned finally to France, where he died. As his life, so his books: he wrote about every thing. Of his two most celebrated works, the one, De Occulta Philosophia, written in 1539, but not printed until 1531, is a compilation from the Neo-Platonists and the Cabalists, and gives a plan of the world as a basis for the explanation of the art of magic; while the other, De Vanitate Scientiarum (written in 1526, printed in 1529, and translated into various languages, into English in 1634), is a compilation from the Humanists and the Reformers, and gives a sceptical criticism, not only of all sciences and arts, but of life itself. But this contradiction is the character of the man. A devotee of the old church, he was always in opposition to its clergy; a champion of the spirit of the new time, he was utterly foreign to the Reformation. He was learned, but never became clear: he was active, but never in harmony with himself. A collected edition of his works was published at Lyons, 1600. See MORLEY: Life of Agrippa. London, 1856, 2 vols. C. WEISZACHER.

AQUIRE, Joseph Sanz d', b. March 21, 1630, at Logroño, Spain; d. in Rome, Aug. 19, 1699; entered the order of the Benedictines; became professor of theology in the University of Salamanca, Abbot of St. Vincent, and secretary to the Inquisition, and was made cardinal in 1686 by Innocent XI., as a reward for his book, Defensio cathedrae Sancti Petri adversus Declarationes Cleri Gallici, 1682. He was a very prolific writer. The two most important of his works are, Collectio Maximorum Orationum Hispanicae et novi orbis cum notis et dissertationibus. Rome, 1693, 4 vols.; 1753, 6 vols.; and Theologia S. Anselmi in 3 vols., but unfinished.

A'GUR. See Proverbs.

A'HAB (father's brother). 1. The son of Omri, a king of the northern kingdom, called in the Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions Acha-abire Sir'Isai; i.e., Ahab of Israel. Through his wife Jezebel, the daughter of a Sidonian priest-king, he was led into the Baal worship, and allowed Jezebel to persecute the Jehovah prophets (1 Kings xviii. 4). Instead of these, Ahab maintained four hundred and fifty Baal, and his wife four hundred Ashera prophets (1 Kings xviii. 10). But that he was not successful in killing entirely the love for pure worship is manifest from the reception Elijah's efforts received, and particularly from the fact that his successor, Jehoram, who was the governor of Ahab's house, had one hundred Jehovah prophets hidden in a cave, and that Jehovah told Elijah that there were yet seven thousand who had not bowed the knees.
unto Baal (1 Kings xix. 18). Nevertheless Ahab inflicted incalculable injury upon Israel through his idolatry. In spite of Jehu and Hosea, the nation fell under a merited doom.

Ahab reigned brilliantly for twenty-two years, for in him the power of the northern kingdom culminated. He built cities, beautified Jezreel and made it his capital, erected an ivory palace (1 Kings xxii. 39), and several times waged successful war against Syria (1 Kings xx.). He entered into alliance with Jehoshaphat (1 Kings xxiii.), as did later on Jehoram, Ahab's second son (2 Kings iii.). Ahab's daughter Athaliah married Jehoshaphat's son Jehoram (2 Kings viii. 18). But, although he thus exhibited shrewdness and energy, Ahab had not the ability to utilize his opportunities and advantages. Indecision and weakness characterized him. He trembled before Elijah, whom at first he denounced: he was moved by Micaiah's prophecy, although at first he pretended to be fearless. His action about the vineyard of Naboth was childish (1 Kings xxii.). His repentance was shallow: he was moved by impulses. And yet there was a gleam of virtue in him: he spared Benhadad his enemy (1 Kings xx. 30); and he had physical courage enough to stay upon the battlefield after his fatal wound (1 Kings xxiii. 35). But upon him and all connected with him the curse of God rested. He dragged Israel and Judah into ruin.

2. A false prophet among the exiles in Babylon, who was roasted in the fire by Nebuchadrezzar (Jer. xxix. 21, 22).

AHASUERUS (mighty man), the name of the king, not an epithet, mentioned in Esther, and identified with Xerxes, the son of Darius Hystaspes (B.C. 485–465), a Medo-Persian king, who is called upon the cuneiform inscriptions Khshā-u-ărshā, or Khsay-ārshā (see Benfey, The Cuneiform Inscriptions of Persia; Schrader, die Keilinschr. u. des alte Test. p. 245). The identification is complete: not simply are the names the same, but the characters described, especially the love of splendor and banquet, the tyrannical disposition, the insconsiderateness and the intellect of splendor and banqueting, the tyrannical disposition, the insconsiderateness and the intellect of splendor and banqueting, are characteristic of Xerxes. It is said of Xerxes that he moved by impulses. But upon him and all connected with him the curse of God rested. He dragged Israel and Judah into ruin. But it is not definitely settled who the Ahasuerus mentioned is called upon the cuneiform inscriptions Khsy-u. das alte Test.p. 245). AHAZIAH (ehom Jehovah sustains). 1. The son and successor of Ahab, as King of Israel: he reigned two years (B.C. 897–896). Very few, but very bad, things are told of him. He did evil in the sight of the Lord. While ill from injuries received in battle, he died. He was succeeded by his son Jehoram as King of Israel.

him respectfully, he went, and in person repeated his prophecy. So Ahaziah died according to the words of the Lord (2 Kings i.), for he was childless. The only event of importance recorded about him is his commercial expedition to Tarshish in connection with Jehoshaphat of Judah. But his ships were destroyed (cf. 1 Kings xxii. 49; 2 Chron. xx. 30).

2. The son and successor of Jehoram, King of Judah, reigned only one year, B.C. 885 (2 Kings viii. 25–29; 2 Chron. xxii. 1–9), called Jehoahaz in 2 Chron. xxii. 17, and Azariah in 2 Chron. xxii. 6, either through mistake of the scribes, or because the names are the same. He allied himself with his uncle Jehoram, King of Israel. Israel rebelled under Jehu. The two kings met in battle, and Jehu killed Jehoram. Ahaziah fled, was pursued and mortally wounded at the pass of Gur, but escaped, and died at Megiddo. In this way the two differing accounts of his death (2 Kings ix. 27 and 2 Chron. xxii. 9) can be reconciled.

Ahimelech (brother of the king) was probably a son of Ahithophel, although this is not always stated. He was often called his "son" (1 Sam. xxii. 9, 20), an Aarone of the line of Ithamar, and therefore a successor of Eli in the priesthood at Nob, when fleeing from Saul, was fed by him upon the show-bread, and furnished with Goliath's sword, for which he and eighty-four lower priests were slain by Saul at the instigation of Doeg the Edomite (1 Sam. xxii. 18).

Ahithophel (brother of foolishness), a native of Giloh, and therefore styled the Gilonite in 2 Sam. xv. 12, the counsellor of David, highly valued because of his shrewdness and discretion. But, as the issue showed, he was not sincere in his attachment to David; for he offered to become his adversary, and recommended Absalom's counsel, under the mistaken idea that Absalom's rule would be permanent. But when he foresaw its downfall, and found his counsel slighted, he hanged himself, dreading David's revenge (2 Sam. xvii. 23).

Aldan, b. in Ireland 605; d. at Lindisfarne, Aug. 31, 651; was educated in Iona, and went as missionary to Northumbria in 635. He took up his residence in the Island of Lindisfarne, where he founded a monastery of the Kudee fashion and under Columba's rules. He could not speak the Saxon language when first he came to the country; but the king himself acted as interpreter; and his personal life, as well as that of his companions and pupils, made so deep an impression on the people that Northumbria was Christianized before he died. See Bede: Hist. Eccl. III. c. 5 sq. Thomas McLauchlan: Early Scotch Church, Edinburgh, 1863; Daniel de Visne: Irish Primitive Church, New York, 1870; P. H. A. Ehrard: Die iro-schottische Missionskirche, 1873.

Aigradus (Angradus or Anagardus), a monk of Fontanelles, near Rouen; wrote, about 699, a life of St. Anselm, Abbot of Fontanelles from 675 to 698, which, though interpolated by a later hand, is still of great value (Act. SS. B sale, Feb., 11); in 707 it was indeed thought to be the work of the author of a fragment of a life of St. Lauthert, given anonymously by Marilhon, Acta SS. Ben. III. 2 p. 462-465.

Ailli, Pierre de' (Petrus de Alliaco), b. at Alliaco, haut-clocher, in the department of Abbeville, 1350; d. in Avignon, Aug. 9, 1420; entered the University of Paris as a student of theology in the College of Navarre, 1372; wrote in 1375 his first book, a commentary on Petrus Lombardus (Quaestiones super threes sententiarum), which was published in 1410; and began to lecture on philosophy in the university, where he soon made the nominalism of Occam preeminent. In 1380 he was made a doctor of theology; and his treatise at this occasion, as well as two other essays (De Legitimo Dominio and Utrum indoctus iure dicatur positum juste professae in ecclesia regno, written at the same time, and published in Gerson, Oper. edition Dupin, Tom. I, pp. 641–644, 1700), show his theological stand-point. The Christian Church, he said, is founded on Christ, not on Peter; on the Bible, not on the canon law; and still more directly he enters into opposition to the Papists of his time by protesting that the pope is fallible in matters, both of faith and fact, and that the true representative of the Church is not the pope, but the ecumenical council. Nevertheless, in his later works, although he still adheres to the same principles, he never transgresses the narrow boundaries of the medieval Church. Dogmatically he defines faith as a knowledge of theological truths, and describes it as a magically infused inspiration; politically he considered the union of the Church as far more precious than its purity. In 1384, having in the mean time made a great impression by a series of sermons on St. Francis of Assissi (Tractatus et sermones, Arg. 1490), he became director of the College of Navarre, where he had Gerson and Nicholas de Clemanges among his pupils; and in 1390, having two years previously gained great fame by his defence of the immaculate conception and the defeat of the Dominicans, he was made Chancellor of the University. Thus at the head of one of the most influential institutions in the Church, and possessed of a great fame as the "Hammer of Heretics," his views of ecclesiastical affairs, more especially of the papal schism, became of great consequence, and he understood how to make them felt. After the death of Clement VII. (1394), Benedict XII. was elected his successor; and it was due to Ailli's exortions that he was recognized by France. Nor did Benedict XIII. show himself ungrateful. In 1395 he made Ailli Bishop of Puy, and in 1397 Bishop of Cambrai. Meanwhile the various negotiations made it perfectly plain to Ailli that a general council was the only effective remedy against the schism; and this view, while it estranged him somewhat from Benedict XIII., drew him nearer to John XXIII., who in 1411 made him a cardinal. His views at last prevailed. The Council of Constance deposed Gregory XII., John XXIII., and Benedict XIII.; and, though the Cardinal of Cambrai was one of the candidates for the papal throne, he lived on very good terms with Pope Martin V., as whose legate he acted in Avignon. Besides being a very prolific writer on theological subjects, Ailli also showed himself interested in geography; and his Imperii Mundi (1410) has still interest as one of the sources from which Columbus drew his view of the possibility of a western passage from Spain to India. His astronomical writings occupy an intermediate position between astrological superstition and true science; but his propositions to the improvement of the calendar show comprehensive and sound views. There is a collected edition of his works, Douay, 1634; but it is not complete. See Paul Tschackert: Peter von Alli, Gotha, 1857.

AILREDUS, b. 1109; d. 1188; a native of England, was educated in Scotland, entered the order of the Cistercians, became Abbot of Reveley, Lincolnshire, and wrote Historia de Vita et Miracula S. Edwendi; Genealogia Regum Anglo- rum; De Bello Standardi; Historia de Sancti- manordi de Waltham; all in Twisden, Decem Scriptores, London, 1652; and Sermones de Temp- pores et Sacres: Tractatus de pauro Jesu dundre- ni; Speculum caritatis, libri III.; De Spirituali Amicilia, libri III., etc., edited by Gibbon, Douay, 1651; and in Bibl. Cister. V. and Bibl. Patrum, XXIII.

AIMOIN or AIMOYIN, monk in St. Germain des Pres, near Paris, about 889; wrote a history of saints, of which the libri duo de S. Germani, episcopi Parisiensis miraculis have some historical value (see Baur: Geschichte der romischen Lit- teratur in carolingischen Zeitalter, p. 232). Different from him is Aimoin, monk in Fleury, d. 1008, who, on the instance of Abbo of Fleury, his patron, wrote the Historia Francorum, libri IV., from 253 to 654. The work itself has no worth; but the continuation of it up to 727 is valuable (Bouquet: Script. rer. Franc., III.).

AINSWORTH, Henry, b. at Pleasington, Lan- cashire, about 1590; d. in Amsterdam about 1623; was educated in the grammar-school of Blackburn; studied at Cambridge; adopted the platform of the Independents, such as represented by the Brownists; and was in 1593 driven away from his native country. For the rest of his life he lived in Amsterdam, at the beginning in great poverty, but afterwards, as teacher of the Brownist Church of that city, in better circumstances. He partook with great zeal in the controversies of the day, and wrote, for instance, A Defence of the Holy Scriptures against Smyth, 1609; but his cashire, about 1560; d. in Amsterdam about 1623; was educated in the grammar-school of Blackburn; studied at Cambridge; adopted the platform of the Independents, such as represented by the Brownists; and was in 1593 driven away from his native country. the latter of which had begun so successfully (358) suddenly and desperately collapsed, he was one of the martyrs. The flesh was torn from his bones by the Church of St. Mary—the only monument of Carlovigian architecture still preserved complete—once stood outside a palace, which was connected with the church by a splendid colonnade. In this palace, or in the Church of St. Mary, sat the diet of Charlemagne, a mixed assembly of laymen and ecclesiastics summoned by the em- poror to pronounce, both on secular and ecclesiastical and religious matters. Generally, however, the ecclesiastics were preponderant in discussing ecclesiastic affairs, and formed a synod or council, Concilia Aquigraenensis, though not always assuming that name. We shall briefly enumerate these assemblies.

I. 797. Revoked, at least partially, the bloody laws which since 785 had been imposed on the conquered Saxons. III. 799. Against the Adoptians. IV. 801—803. The separation of the bishops, abbots, and secular knights into three benches or bodies; various laws concerning discipline. V. 809. On the procession of the Holy Ghost. VI. 818. The final enactment of the canons of the synods of Mentz, Rheims, Tours, Chalons-sur-Saone, and Arles. VII. 816. Regu- lations for the life of canonici. The rules of Chrodegang, which hitherto had been optional only, were now made obligatory, besides being much enlarged. VIII. 817. The reforms of Benedict of Aniane. IX. 819. Regulations for missa dominici. X. 825. Concerning the trans- ference of the bones of St. Hubert from Liege to the Monastery of Andoin. XI. 831. The Empress Judith. XII. 836. The restoration of those estates which Pepin, King of Aquitanie, had taken from the Church. XII. 837. About the election of abbots. XIII. 842. Mediation between Lothair, Louis the German, and Charles the Bald, which led to the treaty of Verdun, 843, XIV., 860, and XV., 862. Concerning the di- vorce between Lothair and Theutberga. XVI. 1165. The dissolution of the rabbinical schools in Palestine (358). He excelled all his contemporaries in compass of knowledge and acuteness of inter-interpretation, on the whole field of the Halacha (law-tradition), which he systematized and codified. He found a meaning in every word of the Thora, even in the particles and the manner in which letters were written. Under Domition he pleaded the case of his people in Rome. The latter uprising under Hadrian was chiefly his work. By journeying to the most distant countries he collected among his exiled countrymen the necessary means, and it was he who repre-

iron combs. In a definite literary form he has left nothing; but the Mishnah and the literature of the Talmud and Midrash contain numerous definitions, interpretations, etc., which give a striking picture of the powerful man. See Grätz: Geschicke der Juden, vol. IV., p. 241; see also Alon Abi, ed. C. de Visch, Antwerp, 1634. They consist of essays in verses, in rhyme or elegiac measure, on moral, philosophical, and devotional topics: allegorical commentaries on various parts of the Bible; sermons; a short Summa de arte praedicatoria; a Liber patensitatis, etc. But the question is, who was the author of these works. Generally they are ascribed to one of the schoolmen,—Alanus de Insulis, commonly known by the surname of Doctor universalis. Of his life only little is known, and this little is full of confusion. There were other writers of the name Alanus, especially one, Bishop of Auxerre; and another, Alanus de Padua. Oudin (Comment. de script. eccles. T. II. p. 338) maintains that Alanus de Insulis and Alanus of Auxerre are one and the same person, while Bulaeus (Hist. Acad. Paris, T. II. p. 432) distinguishes between them. The latter holds, however, that they were both natives of Lille, which fact again is contested by Cave (Hist. litt. script. eccles. pp. 586, 624) and by the author of the Hist. litteraire de la France, T. XVI. p. 396. This much, however, is certain: Alanus was a native of Lille or Ryssel, Flanders, belonged to the order of the Cistercians, flourished in the twelfth century, and spent most of his life in England. He is the author of all the works, with the exception of the Summa quadrupartita, and perhaps the life of St. Bernard, which latter may belong to Alanus de Auxerre. The Summa quadrupartita is evidently written in Southern France, and it is more likely that the author was the Alanus whose surname, de Padua, shows that he descended from Provence, than the Fleming Alanus, residing in England. Of Alanus de Padua we have a moral tract, found in manuscript at Avranches (Ravaisson: Rapport sur les bibliothèques de l'Ouest de la France, Paris, 1841, p. 157), and another work, also in manuscript and variously titled: Oeumus, Oeumus Sacrum, Esquiovaco, etc. (Hist. litt. de la France, I. c. p. 421). See Dupuy: Alain de Lille, 1550. C. Schmid.

Alb., from the Latin alba, "white," is a long term, or vestment, of white linen, worn by the Roman priests during service, and differing from the surplice used in the Church of England by fitting closer, and being held together by a girdle. In the ancient church the newly-baptized were dressed in white garments (in alba) as a symbol of purification of their state; and these white garments were worn on Sunday after Easter, White-Sunday (Whitsunday). As early, however, as the fourth century, we find the alb mentioned as a special part of the ecclesiastical garment. See Smith and Cheetham: Dictionary of Christ. Antig.

Alban, St., the proto-martyr of England, was born at Verulam, Herfordshire; served seven years in the army of Diocletian; was converted to Christianity by a priest, Amphibulus, to whom he had extended hospitality; and was beheaded during the persecution of Diocletian, in 303. In the place where he suffered martyrdom a church was erected, which, having been destroyed by the Pagan Saxons, was restored in 709 by King Offa of Mercia. At the side of the church a monastery arose, and afterwards the city of St. Alban. But the very existence of this saint is doubtful: his name is not mentioned before Gildas (560) and Venantius Fortunatus (580). His life is given at length by Beda: Hist. Eccle. bib. I., and in Acta Sanctorum, June IV., p. 136, in Latin and Acta, in verse and in prose, by Potthast, Bibl. p. 588.

Albanenses, a fraction of the sect of the Cathari, derived their name from Albania, and maintained, in opposition to the Bogomiles of Thracia and the Concoresses of Bulgaria and Italy, an absolute dualism, by which good and evil were referred to two eternally opposite and equally potent principles. See the article Cathari.

Alber, Erasmus. The date and place of his birth are unknown; and many points are unsettled in the course of his erratical life, — as a student in Wittenberg (1520), pastor of Spredlingen (1528), court-preacher to the Elector of Brandenburg, reformer of the Church of Hanau-Lichtenberg, pastor of Magdeburg, etc. He died May 5, 1553, as superintendent of Neu-Brandenburg. In Brandenburg he came incidentally across a copy of the Liber Conformitatis S. Francesci et vitam Jesu Christi, by Bartholomeus Albicius; and against this book and some other legends he wrote, Der Barfuesser Mönche Eulenspiegel und Alcoran, which was published anonymously, but with a preface by Luther, in Wittenberg, 1542, and afterwards translated into Latin, French, and Dutch.

Alber, Matthaeus, b. at Reutlingen, Dec. 4, 1495; d. at Blaubeuren, Dec. 2, 1576; studied at Freiburg and Tübingen, and received a call as second pastor to his native city, where he immediately began to preach the doctrines of the Reformers. The first pastor complained to the Abbot of Königsbronn and the Bishop of Constance; and the two prelates remonstrated with the magistrates of Reutlingen, the Swabian Union, and the Austrian Government in Stuttgart. Alber was, nevertheless, appointed first pastor by the magistrates; and when he was summoned before the bishop he did not only not appear, but, as if to make the breach with the Roman Church irreparable, he married. Reutlingen was now put under the ban both by the pope and the emperor, but nobody cared; and Alber went on with his reforms: the mass was abolished, the images were removed, and the German language was introduced in the service. Dec. 18, 1524, he was summoned before the imperial court at Eslingen, and he went, accompanied by fifty citizens of Reutlingen; but, after two days' investigation and debate, the case was dropped. The dangers of the Anabaptist movement and the peasants' war he averted from Reutlingen; but, when the interim of 1548 was forced on the city, he was compelled to leave, and entered the service of Duke Ulrich of Württemberg, who first made him preacher at the principal church of Stuttgart, and afterwards Abbot of Blaubeuren. See J. Hartmann: Mönche und Abtei Tübingen, 1863, Wilkex.

ALBERT OF LUSIGNAN (1193–1280). Born at Lusignan, in the foreground of the Latin Dominicans in Germany, in which system of Aristotle to the understanding of his capacity he traversed Germany on foot from end to end, visiting the monasteries, and enforcing the plan of Berthold, after his death in 1198, he finally succeeded in establishing Christianity in the country. In 1255 Riga was made the metropolis of the Lithuanian and Prussian Church.

ALBERT THE GREAT (Albertus Magnus), b. at Lauingen, in Bavaria, 1193; d. in Cologne, Nov. 15, 1280. He studied at Padua and Bologna: entered the order of St. Dominic in 1223, and from Lübeck across the Baltic. In 1201 he founded Riga, in 1202 the knightly order of the Brethren of the Sword; and though he experienced many troubles from the order, which wanted to become independent and operate on its own account, and from the Danes, who conquered Estonia in 1219, he finally succeeded in establishing Christianity in the country. In 1234 he had Thomas Aquinas among his pupils. After a stay of three years in Paris (1245–48), he was made rector of the school of Cologne; and in 1254 the chapter of Worms chose him general of the Dominican order in Germany, in which capacity he traversed Germany on foot from end to end, visiting the monasteries, and enforcing discipline. In 1260 Alexander IV. made him the head of a crusading army, from Liébave across the Baltic. In 1251 he returned to the university of Paris, where he had Thomas Aquinas among his pupils. Albertiniani, a name which from the beginning of the eleventh century was used in the Latin world, procured for him the surname of doctor universalis; while his knowledge of natural science and its practical applications made him a sorecver in popular estimation. His chief exploit was the introduction of the complete system of Aristotle to the understanding of his age through a kind of loose reproductions (De Prædicatione; Super Octo Libros Physicorum; Libri XIII. Metaphysicorum, etc.), not of the Greek originals, but of the Arabic versions and commentaries, richly interlarded with compilations from Plato, the Neo-Platonists, Avicenna, the Arabian philosophical and medical writer of the eleventh century, etc. By this scientific brokerage, which has yielded him many an undeserved compliment from modern scientists, he furnished the scholastic philosophy with means for its highest development. His theological works comprise: commentaries on various parts of the Bible; sermons; moral and ascetical treatises (Paradisus Animalis Vertebrarum; dogmatical expositions (Summa Theologiae), etc. Many of his works have been published separately. A collected edition was given by P. Janmy, Lyons, 1651, in twenty-one vols. fol.

ALBERTI, Jean, b. March 6, 1698, at Assen, Holland; d. in Leyden, Aug. 13, 1762; was a minister at Harlou, became afterwards professor of theology in Leyden, and wrote: Observationes philologicae in sacros Novi Eucharis libros, Leyden, 1725; Glossarium graecum in sacros Novi Eucharis libros, Leyden, 1735. He also edited the first volume of Hesychius' Lexicon, afterword continued and completed by Ruhnkenius, Leyden, 1766.

ALBERTI, Leander, b. at Bologna, Dec. 11, 1719; d. there in 1752; studied theology under Baviatero; entered the order of St. Dominic in 1735; was called to Rome in 1725 as assistant to the general of the order, and became afterwards inquisitor-general in Bologna. He wrote: De viris illustribus ordinis Praedicatorum, Bologna, 1517; also a Descrizione di tutta l'Italia, Bologna, 1530, afterwards republished, and a Historia di Bologna, Bologna, 1541, continued by Cacciauemici.

ALBERTINI, Johann Baptist von, b. at Neuwied, Silesia, Feb. 17, 1769; d. at Bethelsdorf, near Herrnhut, Dec. 6, 1831; descended from a Swiss family of the Grisons, and was educated together with Schleiermacher, with whom he formed a very intimate friendship, at Nisky (1782–85) and at the theological seminary of Barbey (1785–88). But while Schleiermacher turned to a penetrating study of philosophy, and attempted a reconciliation between the spirit of Christianity and the spirit of modern civilization, Albertini retained his Christian piety in its simplicity and childlike form in which it was gained in the Moravian congregation; and his thirst for knowledge found its gratification in the study of languages, mathematics, and botany. Thus he wrote, in connection with Schweinitz, a monograph on Fungi. From 1788 to 1810 he worked as teacher in the school of Nisky, from 1810 to 1821 as preacher and bishop in Nisky, Gnadenberg, and Gnadenfrei (Silesia); in 1821 he became a member, and in 1824 president, of the department for church and school, which position he occupied till his death. His works consist of Predigten, 1803; Geistliche Lieder, 1821; and Predigten, 1832. Some of his spiritual lyrics are of rare beauty.

ALBIGENSES, a sect which from the beginning of the eleventh century spread rapidly and widely in Southern France, and maintained itself there till the middle of the thirteenth century; received its name from the city of Albi, Latin Albigea, the present capital of the department of Tarn, which was one of their principal seats. The name does not occur, however, until the time of the Albigensian crusade. Before that the sect was spoken of as the Poblanists, or Poblanead, probably a corruption of the name of the Paulicians, which the crusaders had brought back to Western Europe, or as the Bos Homes, Latin, Boni Homines, French, Bons Hommes, which name they themselves gave to those among them who reached the highest state of perfection, the perfeci. Of the doctrines of the Albigenses nothing is known with certainty. They have left no writings, confessional, apologetical, or polemical; and the representations which Roman-Catholic writers, their bitter enemies, have given of them, are highly exaggerated. It is evident, however, that they formed a branch of that broad stream of sectarianism and heresy which arose far away in Asia from the contact between Christianity and the Oriental religions, and which, by crossing the Balkan Peninsula, reached Western Europe. The first outflow from this source were the Manicheans, the next the Paulicians, the next the Cathari, who in the tenth and eleventh centuries were very strong in Bulgaria, Bosnia, and Dalmatia. Of the Cathari, the Bogomiles, Pateroni, Albigenses, etc., were only individual developments. In general they all held the same doctrines, dualism, docetism, etc.; the same moral tenets, an austere simplicity bordering on asceticism; the same organization, a division into two classes of credentes, or auditores, and perfeci; and the same policy, opposition to the Roman-Catholic Church. See the article Cathari.

From Italy the movement reached Southern France in the beginning of the eleventh century; and here the soil was wonderfully well prepared for the new seed. The country was rich, flourishing, and independent: the people, gay, intellectual, and progressing; the Church, dull, stupid, and tyrannous; and the clergy, distinguished by nothing but superstition, ignorance, arbitrariness, violence, and vice. Under such circumstances the idea of a return to the purity and simplicity of the apostolical age could not fail to attract attention. The severe moral demands made impression, because the example of the preachers corresponded to their words. The doctrine of an absolute and original dualism naturally recommends itself to the understanding as the easiest solution of many a knotty problem. No wonder, then, that the people deserted the Roman-Catholic priests, and crowded around the Bos Homes. In a short time the Albigenses had congregations, with schools and charitable institutions of their own. Then they drove away the Roman-Catholic priests from the churches, took possession of the buildings, and erected their own priests and bishops. Finally the lords of the land, the great barons and counts, openly placed themselves at the head of the movement; and in 1167 the Albigenses held an Albigensian synod at Toulouse for the purpose of perfecting their organization. The Roman-Catholic Church, so far as it still could be said to exist in the country, had become an object of contempt and derision. This state of affairs caused, of course, great alarm among the orthodox; and in 1110 a council was convened at Toulouse; and the tenets of the Cathari, such as preached by the Bos Homes, were condemned.

This state of the sect was spoken of as the Poblanists, or Poblanead, probably a corruption of the name of the Paulicians, which the crusaders had brought back to Western Europe, or as the Bos Homes, Latin, Boni Homines, French, Bons Hommes, which name they themselves gave to those among them who reached the highest state of perfection, the perfeci. Of the doctrines of the Albigenses nothing is known with certainty. They have left no writings, confessional, apologetical, or polemical; and the representations which Roman-Catholic writers, their bitter enemies, have given of them, are highly exaggerated. It is evident, however, that they formed a branch of that broad stream of sectarianism and heresy which arose far away in Asia from the contact between Christianity and the Oriental religions, and which, by crossing the Balkan Peninsula, reached Western Europe. The first outflow from this source were the Manicheans, the next the Paulicians, the next the Cathari, who in the tenth and eleventh centuries were very strong in Bulgaria, Bosnia, and Dalmatia. Of the Cathari, the Bogomiles, Pateroni, Albigenses, etc., were only individual developments. In general they all held the same doctrines, dualism, docetism, etc.; the same moral tenets, an austere simplicity bordering on asceticism; the same organization, a division into two classes of credentes, or auditores, and perfeci; and the same policy, opposition to the Roman-Catholic Church. See the article Cathari.

From Italy the movement reached Southern France in the beginning of the eleventh century; and here the soil was wonderfully well prepared for the new seed. The country was rich, flourishing, and independent: the people, gay, intellectual, and progressing; the Church, dull, stupid, and tyrannous; and the clergy, distinguished by nothing but superstition, ignorance, arbitrariness, violence, and vice. Under such circumstances the idea of a return to the purity and simplicity of the apostolical age could not fail to attract attention. The severe moral demands made impression, because the example of the preachers corresponded to their words. The doctrine of an absolute and original dualism naturally recommends itself to the understanding as the easiest solution of many a knotty problem. No wonder, then, that the people deserted the Roman-Catholic priests, and crowded around the Bos Homes. In a short time the Albigenses had congregations, with schools and charitable institutions of their own. Then they drove away the Roman-Catholic priests from the churches, took possession of the buildings, and erected their own priests and bishops. Finally the lords of the land, the great barons and counts, openly placed themselves at the head of the movement; and in 1167 the Albigenses held an Albigensian synod at Toulouse for the purpose of perfecting their organization. The Roman-Catholic Church, so far as it still could be said to exist in the country, had become an object of contempt and derision. This state of affairs caused, of course, great alarm among the orthodox; and in 1110 a council was convened at Toulouse; and the tenets of the Cathari, such as preached by the Bos Homes, were condemned.

ALBIZZI, Antonio, b. in Florence, Nov. 25, 1547; d. at Kempen, in Bavaria, July 17, 1626; was secretary to the Cardinal of Austria, but embraced Protestantism; left Italy, and resided afterwards in Augsburg, Innsbruck, and Kempen. He wrote: Sermones in Matthaeum, Augsburg, 1612; Principium Christianum, stenoma, 1612; De principiis religionis Christianae, 1612; Exercitatio theologica, Kempen, 1616.

ALBIZZI, Bartholomew (Bartholomeus Albicus Picanus), b. at Rivasco, Tuscany; entered the order of the Franciscans; became a celebrated preacher; and taught theology at Bologna, Padua, Siena, Florence, and Pisa, where he died Dec. 10, 1401. He is the author of the famous book, Liber conformitatum sancti Francisci cum Christo, which in 1399 was accepted with great applause by the chapter of his order, and during the following century published in various editions. A refutation by Vergilius De fidei sopra i foletti di san Franciscus, was put on the index, and its author declared a heretic. In 1542, however, Erasmus Alber published at Wittenberg his Der Barfiisser Mönch Eulenspiegel und Alcoran, and the following editions of the Liber conformitatum were then altered, both in contents and title: Liber Aureus, 1590; Antiquitates Franciscane, 1823, etc.

ALBO, Joseph, b. at Soria, in Old Castile, in the latter half of the fourteenth century; d. as rabbin at Montalvan, in 1428; was one of the Jewish representatives at the famous disputation held in 1412 before Benedict XIII. between Jerome de Sancta Fide and a number of Jewish theologians. In 1425 appeared his Sefer ha-ikkarim, a defense of the Jewish dogmatics as opposed to the Christian. The thirteen fundamental articles of Maimonides he reduced to a new divine revelation similar to that on Mount Sinai. Of this work, which has been frequently reprinted, Schlesinger has given a German translation, Francfort, 1844.

ALBRIGHT, Jacob, the founder of "the Evangelical Association of North America," b. near Pottstown, Montgomery County, Penn., May 1, 1759; d. May 8, 1808, at Mühlbach, Lebanon County, Penn. His parents were Pennsylvania Germans of the Lutheran Church, and in it he was himself trained. He was taught in the prevailing defective fashion the rudiments of education; but as he grew up he found his surroundings less and less congenial to his intellectual and spiritual life. After his marriage, he moved away some seventy miles, into Lancaster County, where was a more active population. Here he carried on a successful tile and brick business, and was on the road to wealth. In 1790 several of his children died in quick succession. The keenness of his grief and the faithful funeral addresses of the Rev. Anton Hartz, a German Reformed minister, roused him from his religious indifference, and led to his conversion. He found no time to understand his religious state among his German Lutheran neighbors; and prejudice kept him from going to the Methodists until he fell in with a Methodist lay-preacher, Adam Ridgell, who taught him the way of God more perfectly. Albright then desired to get others to share his joy, but met with opposition: so finally he turned to the Methodists, studied their church government, was pleased with it, joined them, and received an exhorter's license; but he then had no intention of becoming a minister. His mind brooded over the spiritual condition of his German brethren, and he prayed earnestly for their conversion. During a visitation he became convinced that he was to undertake the work of reform, which he did October, 1796. He gave up secular interests, and devoted himself to preaching as an itinerant wherever he found hearers. Although opposed, he persevered, traveled at his own expense, went only on doing good. He would have remained in the Methodist Church, but could not, because it at that time did not intend entering on the German field; and so as he was forced to give some kind of an organization to the little bodies of his converts; he separated from them from the Methodist Church, and so, entirely contrary to his plan, he became the founder of a new denomination called the "Evangelical Association." By 1800 he had organized three congregations. In 1803 a council was held, and an organization adopted, Methodist in general features, but independent of the Methodist-Episcopal Church. In 1807 the first conference was held. It was this body of laymen which unanimously elected and ordained Albright as their pastor and bishop, and declared the Bible to be their only rule of faith and practice. Albright was requested to compile articles of faith and a discipline for the guidance of the so-called "Albright people." Shortly after this conference Albright died. Bishop Yeakel, who contributes the sketch of Albright in the Lives of the Leaders of the Church Universal (Amer. ed. by Rev. Dr. Maccracken, Phila.), thus describes his personal appearance: "He was nearly six feet high, had smooth black hair, a high clear forehead, small, deeply-set, piercing eyes, aquiline nose, mouth and chin well proportioned, a symmetrical form, a white complexion, the sanguine and choleretic temperaments well combined." See Evangelical Association.

ALCANTARA, ORDER OF. In 1212 Alfonso IX. of Castile laid siege to the city of Alcantara, in the Province of Estremadura, on the Tajo. In 1218 he conquered it from the Moors, and placed it under the defence of the Knights of Calatrava, who soon after transferred it to Nugno Fernandez, third grand-master of the order of San Julian de Paregro. This order was founded in 1156 against the Moors, by the brothers Suaro and Gomez Fernando Barrientos, while defending a frontier castle of the above name; it assumed the reformed rules of St. Benedict, and was confirmed in 1177 and 1183 by the popes Alexander III. and Lucius III. But after the conquest of Alcantara the knights adopted the name of that city, and ranged themselves under the grand-master of Calatrava. On the occasion, however, of a contested election of grand-master, the Knights of Alcantara separated from those of Calatrava, and Don Diego Sanche became their first grand-master. The thirty-eighth grand-master, Juan de Zuniga, was also the last. In 1406 he resigned the office, and became Archbishop of Seville; and, with the consent of Pope Alexander VI., King Ferdinando now united the grand-maisterships of St. James, Calatrava, and Alcántara to the crown. In its days of prosperity the order possessed fifty commanderies; but in 1808 all its revenues were confiscated by King Joseph, and only parts of them restored in 1814 by King Ferdinando.

In 1873 the order was altogether abolished, but re-established in 1874 by King Alfonso XII.

For the elder history of the order see HELYOT: Histoire des Ordres monastiques, T. VI., pp. 53-63.

ALCIMUS, called also Jacimius (Joseph., Antiq. XIII. 9, 7), the Hebrew form of the name, an apostate Jewish priest who attached himself to the Syrians from self-interest, and was created high priest by Demetrius (B.C. 162), and sent with a military escort, under the Syrian general Bacchides, unto Jerusalem. At first he was successful in deceiving many principal men into believing his peaceful intentions, but quickly revealed his bloodthirsty disposition. Judas and his party knew the truth about him, and opposed him, such was the simulacrism of priestly authority, and had to call upon the Syrian king for additional aid. Nicamor, who was then sent, was killed by Judas, Adar 13, 161 B.C. Bacchides was then sent, and he got him into the city; but Alcimus died suddenly just as he was about to pull down the walls of the temple in Jerusalem (Nisan B. C. 160). See 1 Macc. vii., ix. 54–56. Joseph., Antiq. XII. 9, 7, and 10.

ALCUIN (Edwine, Alcæon, Alcuuin, Latinized Flaccus Albinus), b. at York about 735; d. at Tours, May 19, 709; belonged to the royal family, was made abbot of the place, and in 705 Bishop of York. He was the most prominent Frankish nobleman of that circle of great men, whichLaberius, in his poem, De viris illustribus, enumerates; b. at York about 735; d. at Tours, May 19, 709; belonged to the royal family, was made abbot of the place, and in 705 Bishop of York. He was the most prominent Frankish nobleman of that circle of great men, which Theology he consequently considered as the principal element of education. His own theology is wholly positive, without originality, derived from the Fathers. He wrote both on dogmatism: De Fide Sancta et Individualis Trinitatis; De Trinitate ad Fridigium Questiones; Libellus de processione Spiritus Sancti, etc.; and on exegetics. In his exegetical writings the mystico-allegorical method predominates. Classical learning, however, must not be neglected for theology. Classical and ecclesiastical traditions belong together; and, by combining them, the Christian Church becomes the true guardian of civilization.

The Christian state which Charlemagne is establishing shall be a new Athens, of a higher stamp,—an Athens in which Christ is the master of the academy, and the seven arts an introduction to the septuple fulness of the Holy Spirit. In the classical field, however, Alcuin himself was only a compiler. He wrote on grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic. He was a prolific poet, but the greatest success in the literary line he achieved by his letters. By Charlemagne's orders he revised the Latin Bible, and undertook the service for which we should be grateful, as he restored God's word to a state of comparative purity. See Latin Versions under Bible Versions.

The sources to Alcuin's life are, his poem, De Pontificibus, his letters, and a vita written by an anonymous author, but based on communications of Sigulf, a pupil and companion of Alcuin. The best edition of his works is that by Froben, Ratisbon, 1777, 2 tom. fol. See also Migne, Patr. Tom. C and CI.

The letters and historical poems have been published in Monumenta Alcuin., by Dümmler and Wattenbach, Berlin, 1875.

MÖLLER.

ALDFRITH, King of Northumbria 685–705, a son of Aswin, was educated in Ireland, or perhaps at Iona, at all events within the pale of the Kuldee Kirk, but was by Wilfrid drawn over to Romanism. He continued, however, to entertain friendly relations with the Kuldee Kirk, with Adnaman, Aldhelm, etc.; and when Wilfrid, who was re-instated as bishop in 687, urged his claims on the estates of the Church, he displaced him once more in 692, and no reconciliation took place between them afterwards. See Smith and Wack: Christ. Biog. I.

ALDELM, b. in the middle of the seventh century; d. May 25, 709; belonged to the royal family of Wessex, and was educated by Maildulf, an Irish scholar who had founded a school at Maildulfi Burgus (Malmsbury); studied at Canterbury; succeeded Maildulfi at Malmsbury, and was made abbot of the place, and in 705 Bishop of Sherborn. He acquired a great celebrity as a scholar, being the first Englishman who cultivated the Latin language with success. Also practising himself he exercised a high influence in his time. He pathly leaned decidedly towards Canterbury. His collected works have been edited by Dr. Giles, Oxford, 1844. The earliest biography of him is that by Fabricius, published in Act. SS. Boll. May ALEANDER. Alexander, b. in Edinburgh, April 23, 1500; d. in Leipzig, March 17, 1565; while a canon at St. Andrews, in 1526, he was employed to bring Patrick II. amilton to recant, and attend him at the stake, but received so deep an impression, both of the martyr’s arguments and of his ardent conviction, that he himself was converted to the reformed doctrines, and in 1530 he fled to Germany. After 1534 he was invited to England by Henry VIII., and made professor at Cambridge; but in 1540 he returned to Germany, where he spent the rest of his life as professor, first in Frankfort-on-the-Oder, afterwards in Leipzig, and in intimate connection with the Reformers, especially Melanchthon. Besides commentaries on various parts of the Scriptures, he wrote: De necessitate et merito bonorum operum, 1560; De justificacione; De Sancta Trinitate; Responsio ad trinita et duas articulos theologorum Loweniansium; other names were Alane. He assumed the other in exile.

ALEXANDER is the name of eight popes. — Alexander I. occupied the Roman see in the beginning of the second century, between Evaris-tus and Xistus I.; but the dates, both of his accession and of his death, are uncertain. Euse-bius gives 103–114 in his Chronicle and 108–118 in his Hist. Eccl.; Codex Libertii gives 109–116. etc. According to the Liber Pontificalis and Acta Alexanderi, he suffered martyrdom together with Evertias and Theodolus, and was buried on the Via Nomentana. — Alexander II. (Anselm of Lucca), Oct. 1, 1061—April 21, 1078, a native of Baggio in the Milanese, became, in the Monastery of Bec, acquainted with those ideas of reform which at that time spread from the Monastery of Cluny, and preached them in Northern France. He was generally considered the spiritual father of the so-called Pataria, — a popular movement directed against the depraved clergy, and their allies the arrogant city nobility. Even after his elevation to the episcopal chair of Lucca, he continued his connection with the Pataria, and was twice sent to Milan as papal legate in its affairs. But comp. H. PACH: Die Pataria in Mainland, Sondershausen, 1872, and KRÜGER: Die Pataria in Mainland, Breslau, 1874. After the death of Nicholas II., Anselm was elected pope through the influence of Hildebrand, and his reign shows plainly the spirit which ruled him. As the consent of the Empress Agnes and her minor son, Henry IV., had not been obtained, a synod of Basel elected Bishop Cadalus of Parma pope, under the name of Honorius II. (Oct. 28, 1061), and bloody battles were fought between the two popes outside the walls of Rome. Through the influence of Archbishop Hanno of Cologne, who held the young king and with him the regency, a general council was then convened at Mantua, and here Alexander was recognized, and Honorius excommunicated. But Hanno did not earn much thanks for what he had done, and (in 1068) on a journey to Rome, he made a visit to the excommunicated Cadalus on some secular errand. Alexander refused to see him until he presented himself before him in the garb of penitence and with naked feet. Still harsher the king was treated. In 1071 the Roman curia deposed Bishop Charles of Constance, though the king had invested him with ring and staff. In 1072 the same measure was taken against Archbishop Gottfried of Milan; and when Henry IV., nevertheless, had Gottfried consecrated, the pope put him in ban. Also in his relations to Philip I. of France, Robert Guiscard of Sicily, and William the Conqueror, of England, Alexander knew how to vindicate the papal authority. The idea of filling all the episcopal chairs of conquered England with Normans originated with him, and he raised Lanfranc of Bec to the archiepiscopate of Canterbury, and made him primate of the Church of England. See R. BAXMANN: Die Politik der Päpste von Gregor I. bis Gregor VII., Elberfeld, 1869. — Alexander III. (Roland), Sept. 7, 1159–Aug. 30, 1181, a native of Siena, seems to have taught justice and a most liberal support. The death of Victor IV. (April 20, 1164) did not end the schism.

Reinald von Dassel immediately established a new anti-pope, Paschalis III., without paying any regard to the canonical forms of election; and, when Paschalis died (Sept. 20, 1168), the imperial party in Rome and the people chose Calixtus III. In 1165 Alexander III. made an attempt to establish himself in Italy, and entered Rome (Nov. 23). But in the following year the emperor arrived in Italy with a great army. Rome was taken by storm; Paschalis was re-established; and Alexander was again compelled to flee. Nevertheless, his authority was steadily increasing; and when, in 1167, the Lombardian cities formed a union against Frederick I., under the protectorate of Alexander III., the former showed himself willing to open negotiations. These failed, however, and the emperor once more marched an army into Italy; but this time he was so completely defeated in the battle of Legnano (May 29, 1175) that he had to submit to all the demands of the pope, and at the congress of Venice (Aug. 1, 1177) he not only recognized Alexander III., but conferred on him the prefecture of the city of Rome. A still greater triumph he gained over King Henry II. of England; for Becket was canonized, and the king compelled to submit to a humiliating penance. The culminating point of his success is the Lateran synod of 1179. Here the Catharists were excommunicated, and a crusade inaugurated against them; and here a change was made in the papal election, excluding the lower clergy and the people, and abolishing the emperor's right of confirmation. The sympathy of the Romans, however, Alexander III. never obtained. Though Calixtus III. formally abdicated (Aug. 29, 1178), and acknowledged Alexander, a new anti-pope, Innocent III., was elected. Alexander was driven out of Rome for the third time, and died at Civita Castellana, an exile. See H. REUTER: Geschichte Alex. III., Leipzig, 2d ed. entirely revised 1860–64, 3 vols.— Alexander IV. (Rinaldo de Conti), Dec. 12, 1254–May 25, 1261, was made cardinal-jus canonum for some time at Bologna, and is the author of the so-called Summa Magistri Rolandi. In 1150 he was called to Rome by Eugene III., and made cardinal-deacon; and from 1153 he held the influential position as papal chancellor, placing himself at the head of the anti-imperial party among the cardinals, and advocating a close alliance with William of Sicily. After the death of Adrian IV. he received all the votes but three, which were cast for the cardinal-presbyter, Octavianus. The latter, however, succeeded in obtaining the assent of the clergy and the people, assumed the name of Victor IV., and thus the schism began, which lasted for nearly twenty years. The emperor, Frederick I., convened a council at Pavia, which confirmed the election of Victor IV. (Feb. 11, 1161), and placed Alexander III. under the ban; but Alexander, who had refused to be present at a council convened by an emperor, answered by excommunicating Frederick, March 24. But two years later (March 23, 1162) he was compelled to flee from Italy, and seek refuge in France, where Louis VII. took him into his protection, and offered him the crown which now arose between Alphonso of Castile and Richard of Cornwallis, he took the part of the latter in a most energetic manner. His interest in the English alliance, however, was merely pecuniary: for from England came the money which enabled him to carry on the war against Manfred. In August, 1258, on a rumor of the death of Conradin, Manfred himself assumed the crown of Sicily; and, after the victory of Montaperto and the conquest of Florence, he stood as the acknowledged head of the Ghibelline party. The pope renewed the excommunication against him Nov. 18, 1260; but, in spite of the reverses of Ezzelino da Romano, the Ghibellines were in the ascendency; and shortly before his death Alexander experienced the humiliation to see Manfred elected into the Roman senate. The last year of his reign was also much troubled by the Flagellants, whose processions and preachings in Rome he suppressed. The council which he called at Viterbo, for the purpose of setting on foot a crusade against the Tartars, did not convene until after his death.— Alexander V. (Peter Philargi), June 26, 1409-May 3, 1410, an orphan-boy from Candia, educated in a Minorite monastery, entered afterwards the order, travelled in Italy, England, and France, acquired a name as a teacher of rhetoric in the University of Paris, received a notable appointment at the court of Duke John Galeazzo Visconti, and was made Archbishop of Milan in 1402, and cardinal-presbyter by Innocent VII. The Council of Pisa, convened for the purpose of ending the schism between Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII., elected him, then seventy years old, to the chair of St. Peter, having deposed the two rivalling popes. But the measures adopted by the council did not succeed. Benedict XIII. was still acknowledged by Spain, Portugal, and Scotland; Gregory XII., by Naples, Hungary, and parts of Germany; and Alexander V., by France, England, and parts of Germany; and the three popes reciprocally excommunicated and anathematized each other.— Alexander VI. (Rodrigo Lanzol). Aug. 11, 1492-Aug. 18, 1503, a native of Valencia, was adopted by his uncle, Calixtus III., into the family of the Borgia, made Bishop of Valencia, a cardinal-deacon, and vice-chancellor of the Roman curia. This remunerative position he prostituted to amass an enormous wealth; but his scandalous life did not impede his ecclesiastical promotion. He was made Cardinal Bishop of Porto, and after the death of Innocent VIII. he ascended the chair of St. Peter, having bought a majority of the votes. Nor did he change his life after becoming pope. His adultery with Julia Farnese, the wife of one of his nephews, and with his own daughter, Lucretia Borgia, was notorious; and it was generally said, though never proved, that he had committed incest with his own daughter, Lucretia Borgia. In vain the secular powers remonstrated; in vain the more serious men censured: the former were eluded, the latter silenced. Alexander V. knew only two motives of action,— the gratification of his sensual passions, and the elevation of his children to power and wealth. The latter motive finally concentrated itself upon his son, Cesar Borgia. He had been made Archbishop of Valencia in 1492, and cardinal in 1493; but he wished to leave the Church, and found a secular sovereignty, and he began the execution of his schemes by murdering his brother Juan. Duke of Gandia, June 14, 1497. In 1499 he married Charlotte d’Albret, a sister of the King of Navarre, and was made Duke of Valence; and while the father continued his intrigues at the courts of Naples, Spain, France, etc.,— intrigues which, though they involved death and destruction to thousands of human beings, have no real interest, religious or political,— the son was busy in the Romagna, expelling the ruling families by open force, or exterminating them by assassination and poison. The immense property of the family of Colonna was confiscated, and immediately after the despoliation of the Colonnas that of the Orsini began. The old Cardinal Orsini was compelled to drink poison. In 1501 the Romagna and the Marches, these the two principal provinces of the papal dominion, were transformed into a domain of the Borgia family. As the latter grew ambitious of a kingdom, they became more unscrupulous. The pope intrigued for the acquisition of Pisa, Lucca, and Siena from the emperor, and mediated the elevation of the Romagna into a kingdom, but was suddenly caught in his own trap. He intended to poison the rich Cardinal Adrian at a feast, in order to appropriate his enormous wealth; but Adrian bought the cook, and the poison was placed before the pope himself, who died from its effects. See Gordon: Life of Alexander VI., London, 1729; Domencio Cerr: Borgia ossia Alessandro VI. Papa e suoi Contemporanei, Turin, 1856; Gregorovius: Lucretia Borgia, Munich, 1870; V. Remck: Papst Alexander VI. Eine Rechtfertigung, Linz, 1879.— Alexander VII. (Fabio Chigi), April 7, 1655-May 22, 1667, partook as papal legate in the negotiations of the peace of Westphalia, but declared that he would enter into no communication with heretics, and protested publicly against the validity of the treaties of Münster and Osnabrück. After his return from Germany he was made a cardinal and secretary of state, and it was due to his influence that Innocent X. condemned as heretical the five propositions extracted from Janesnius’s Augustinus. He was completely under the sway of the Jesuits; and in their controversy with the Port Royal he first condemned all who asserted that the above five propositions could not be found in Jansenius’s book, and then all who doubted the infallibility of the pope also with respect to historical or matter-of-fact questions. But such over-assertions are simply the products of weakness, and the waning vigor of the papacy became very apparent at several occasions under this pope. The French ambassador, Duke de Crequi, considered himself insulted on account of a brawl between his retinue and the Corsican guard of the pope, and left Rome. As sufficient satisfaction was not immediately given, Louis XIV. ordered the papal nuncio to leave Paris, and the Pope, Alexander VII., already threatened with an invasion. In order to obtain peace the pope had to submit to very humiliating conditions. Also in Portugal his policy nearly proved fatal. In 1640 Portugal separated from Spain, and chose a king of its own, of the house of Braganza. But Innocent X. refused to recognize the new king and to confirm the bishops appointed by him. Alexander VII. continued this policy; and the result was, that King John IV. left the episcopal sees vacant, and employed the revenues for the army and other secular purposes. Indeed, he even meditated to separate altogether from Rome, and form a national church, in which the right of confirming the bishops should belong to the archbishop. This, however, was prevented by Clement IX.—Alexander VIII. (Pietro Ottoboni), Oct. 5, 1689-Feb. 1, 1691, under whom the relation to France so far improved that the king surrendered Avignon, and renounced his claims on the right of asylum for his ambassador. The real cause of the controversy was not removed, however. After long hesitation the pope pronounced an indulgence in four propositions agreed upon in 1682 by the king and clergy of France, and establishing the freedom of the Gallican Church, and absolved the French clergy from the oath which was made on the propositions.

R. ZÖPPFEL.

ALEXANDER, patriarch of Alexandria 313–326. Under him the Arian controversy broke out in 319. Arius was condemned by a synod in Alexandria, in 320, at which a hundred bishops were present. When banished, he went to Palestine: and, as he was well received there, Alexander wrote first to certain bishops separately, then an encyclical letter to all the bishops of the church, setting forth the errors of Arius. The interference of the Emperor Constantine, though intended to still the rising storm, gave only occasion to more debate; and in 325 the first ecumenical council followed. Of Alexander's letters two have come down to us,—one having been preserved by Socrates (I. 6), and another by Theodoret (I. 4).

ALEXANDER, Archibald, D.D., LL.D., the first professor in the Princeton Theological Seminary, and one of the founders of Princeton theology; b. in Pennsylvania (Rochester) County, Va., April 17, 1772; d. at Princeton, N.J., Oct. 22, 1851. At ten years of age he was sent to the Liberty Hall Academy, of which the Rev. William Graham was principal, and where he had remarkable men for teachers; at sixteen he became a family tutor, but was converted in the "Great Revival" of 1799, studied theology, and after licensure went as missionary through the sparsely-settled portions of his native State, and eventually became pastor of two churches. From 1796 to 1801 he was president of Hampden-Sidney College. In 1807 he succeeded the Rev. Dr. Miller, and was president of the Third Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. In 1812 he was called by the General Assembly to that great work which has given him an undying reputation,—the organization of the Princeton Theological Seminary. For the first year he taught all the departments, then Rev. Dr. Miller joined him; and to them in common belonged the glory of establishing the school. Dr. Alexander was distinguished for practical common sense, profound knowledge of human nature, keen sympathies, and, above all, simple, earnest, Christ-like piety; which rendered the study of his life a pleasure, as the life itself was a joy and an inspiration. It is not too much to say that he gave tone to the Presbyterian Church in America, and the high-water mark to her piety. By his lectures upon theology he taught the teachers of the Church; and so to-day his influence is felt. In common with men of his class and day, he had a great horror of German theology as necessarily misleading. Dr. Alexander wrote many books, of which the principal are: Outline of the Evidences of Christianity (1823, often reprinted); Canon of the O. and N. T. (1820); History of Log College (1840); and posthumously, Moral Science (1832); all these were published in Philadelphia. He prepared, also, the Bible Dictionary of the American Sunday-school Union (Philadelphia, 1831), an excellent little book, which served Christian families for a generation, although for purposes of instruction superseded by the new Bible Dictionary of the Union (Philadelphia, 1850). He was the third son of Rev. Dr. J. W. Alexander, N.Y., 1854.

ALEXANDER, James Waddell, D.D., b. in Virginia, March 13, 1804; d. in the same State, July 31, 1859. He was graduated at Princeton, 1820; was pastor in Virginia from 1824 to 1828; in Trenton, N.J., 1828 to 1832; professor of rhetoric and belles-lettres in the College of New Jersey, 1832 to 1844; became pastor of the Duane-street congregation, New York; again a professor, 1849, this time of ecclesiastical history and church government in Princeton Theological Seminary; but in 1851 he returned to New York as pastor of the Fifth-avenue Presbyterian Church, and until his death wielded a great influence. The charm about his preaching was its spirituality. He spoke as the ambassador of Christ. His zeal in Christian work was tireless, and to practical and not scholarly ends he addressed his writings; one of the best of these is his Plain Words to a Young Communicant, which has been of much help to young believers. Of great homiletical value is his Thoughts on Preaching, N.Y., 1861. He wrote also some of the best translations of German hymns, which first appeared in Scharf's Deutsche Kirchenfreund. Some of them, especially P. Gerhardt's passion hymn "O sacred Head now wounded," have passed into many hymn-books. See Forty Years' Familiar Letters of Rev. Dr. J. W. Alexander, edited by Rev. Dr. John Hall of Trenton. N.Y., 1860; 2 vols.

ALEXANDER, Joseph Addison, D.D., b. in Philadelphia, April 24, 1809; d. at Princeton, N.J., Jan. 28, 1860. He was the third son of Archibald Alexander; educated in Princeton, and was graduated there, from the College of New Jersey, with the highest honors, although only seventeen. He had already shown that taste for languages which distinguished him, and availed himself of a little leisure, after graduation, to carry forward his favorite studies. In connection with Professor Robert B. Patton, he taught a classical academy at Edge Hill, near Princeton, and bore the heavier part of the burden of preparing Professor Patton's first American edition of Donnegan's Greek Lexicon. In the fall of 1830 he became adjunct professor of ancient languages and literature in the College of New Jersey, but resigned in the spring of 1833, and went to Germany. On his return, he became instructor in the Oriental languages and literature in Princeton Theological Seminary, although the formal acceptance of this chair, to which he had been elected in 1835, was not given until 1838. In 1852 he changed to the chair of church history, and 1858 to that of New Testament literature, which he held at the time of his death. He was a scholar of wide reading; of catholic tastes, and great industry. His theme that: a bachelor, he was incessantly occupied with, and wholly engrossed in, his work, and lived much to himself, took very little regular exercise, and by his abstracted ways won a reputation for eccentricity and kouleus; yet he was a man of tenderness, modesty, and piety. As a preacher, he was popular and brilliant, and to the inner circle who knew him there was no more charming friend. He was the most remarkable linguist America has produced. He read some thirty languages, and with many of these had a critical acquaintance, and could speak seven; he devoted himself chiefly to Hebrew. As a commentator, he followed Hengstenberg, but not slavishly, for the everywhere present hand of his admired master may have somewhat altered his judgment, as it certainly detracted from the originality of his work. He published commentaries upon the Psalms, N.Y., 3 vols., 1850; Isaiah, N.Y., 2 vols., 1846–47, his masterpiece, best edition, edited by Rev. Dr. John Eadie of Glasgow, 1875. Professor Charles Hodge and he planned a series of popular commentaries upon the New Testament, of which he finished Mark, N.Y., 1858, and Acts, N.Y., 1856. Matthew was posthumously published, N.Y., 1880, besides two volumes of Sermons (N.Y., 1880), and Notes on New Testament Literature. His Biography was written by his nephew, H. C. Alexander, N.Y., 1870, 2 vols.

ALEXANDER BALAS, according to his own account and that of his adherents, a natural son of Antiochus Epiphanes, but by his adversaries considered an impostor, landed at Ptolemais in 152 B.C., and conquered the Syrian throne after a two-years' contest with Demetrius Soter, who was betrayed and killed in 150. In 147, however: Demetrius Nicator, a son of Demetrius Soter, raised a rebellion in Syria; and when the Egyptian king, Ptolemy, invaded the country, and declared himself in favor of Demetrius, Alexander was routed, and murdered at Aboe in Arabia, whither he had fled, 146. His relations to the Jews, especially to their leader, Jonathan, were very friendly, as appears both from the first Book of the Maccabees and from Josephus.

ALEXANDER JANNAEUS, king of the Jews, 104–78 B.C.; the third son of John Hyrcanus; opened his reign by putting to death one of his brothers, and received from his own subjects the surname “Thracides” (as cruel as a Thracian). Besides his wars with foreign provinces, with Ptolemy Lathyrus, with the Moabites and Ammonites, with Demetrius Eucarus, Aretas, etc., his reign was an almost uninterrupted series of internal revolts and massacres. He had to surround the altar with a screen of boards when he sacrificed, because the people assembled in the temple threw lemons at him; and, when he once asked them what he should do to win their good will, they simply answered, “Kill yourself.” After his death, his widow Alexandra gave the Pharisees a considerable share in the government in order to preserve the throne for her two minor sons; and from this occurrence dates the political influence of the Pharisees.

ALEXANDER NEVSKI, b. at Vladimir 1218; d. Nov. 13, at Gorodetz 1263, a son of the grand duke Jaroslav; ascended the throne 1252, and governed so wisely, that, when he died, the Russian people inscribed him in their calendar as a saint. On the spot on the Neva where he gained one of his greatest victories, defeating the Swedes and the Teutonic knights, Peter the Great built one of the greatest and richest monasteries in Russia, bearing his name; and the day of his burial (Nov. 23) as well as the day on which his relics were transferred to the monastery, are consecrated by the Russian Church as his festivals. Of the great exertions of Innocent IV. to make him join the Roman Church, and received his approbation. It is not a commentary on the sentences of Lombardus, but an independent work, giving a triple series of authorities, those who say yes, those who say no, and then the reconciliation or judgment, and choosing the authorities not only in the Bible and among the Fathers, but also among Greek, Latin, and Arab poets and philosophers, and among later theologians. It treats in its first part the doctrines of God and his attributes; in its second, those of creation and sin; in its third, those of redemption and atonement; and, in its fourth and last, those of the sacraments. Among the doctrines which have been specially developed, and, so to speak, fixed, by Alexander of Hales, are those of the thesaurus supererogationis perfectorum, of the character inde liletia of baptism, confirmation, and ordination, etc. See Hauréau: De la philosophie scolastique, Paris, 1856. 1.; Stücker, Geschichte d. Philosophie, Mainz, 1865, Bnd. II., pp. 317–326; Ueberweg, Hist. of Philosophy, Vol. I., pp. 433, 434.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT, the famous king of Macedonia, and conqueror, b. B.C. 356; d. at Babylon B.C. 323; and was buried at Alexandria, which he had founded, B.C. 322. By his conquests he brought Europe and Asia into contact, made Greek the ruling language of civilization, and thus unconsciously prepared the way for the spiritual conquest of the gospel. His name does not occur in the canonical books, but in the Apocalypse, 1 Macc. i. 1–9; vii. 2, and figuratively is mentioned in Dan. ii. 39, where he is represented first as the belly of brass in Nebuchadnezzar's image; then, vii. 6, as a leopard with four wings; as one-horned he-goat, viii. 5–7, to indicate his great strength, and the swiftness of his conquests; and finally is directly spoken of, though not by name, in xi. 3, 4. Alexander won his epithet "The Great" by an unparalleled career. From the time he succeeded his father Philip, B.C. 330, until his death, he was restless and resistlessly marching from place to place. He subdued Egypt on the west, and Syria, Palestine, Persia, and Bactria on the east. He pushed his way across Asia as far as to the Punjab in India, and left a monument of his presence in that country in the shape of twelve altars of enormous size on the Hyphasis, of which remains exist. It is sad to record that this brilliant man died of fever caused by intemperance; and that the empire which he had gathered was divided at his death among his four generals. Josephus relates (Antiq. xi. 8, 5) that after the siege of Tyre Alexander visited Jerusalem, and was so much impressed with Daniel's prophecy concerning him, which time has been fulfilled, that he granted the Jews everywhere the most important privileges. There is no mention of this incident in heathen historians.

ALEXANDRIA, founded in 322 B.C. by Alexander the Great, rose rapidly under the dynasty of the Ptolemies, and was, at the beginning of the Christian era, one of the first cities of the world, with a population of three hundred thousand freemen. In 80 B.C. Ptolemy Alexander bequeathed it to the Romans; but it did not become actually a Roman possession until 30 B.C., when it was taken by Augustus. He placed it directly under the imperial power; and it was governed by imperial prefects up to A.D. 196, when Severus restored its municipal freedom. Always turbulent, and ready for rebellion, it was treated with extreme harshness by some of the Caesars; and from the beginning of the third century, when in 215 Caracalla put to death every youth in the city capable of bearing arms, it began to decline. Nevertheless, when (in 640) it was taken by the Arabs, Amru could write to the caliph Omar that he had conquered a city with four thousand palaces, four thousand baths, twelve thousand dealers in fresh oil, twelve thousand gardeners, forty thousand Jews paying tribute, and four hundred theatres. But greater disasters were in store for it from the hands of the pirates: its commerce was disturbed; the decline became decay. When Cairo was built (in 969), it lost its prestige. When the route to the East by the Cape of Good Hope (in 1497) was discovered, its commerce was completely ruined. At the beginning of this century it was a mere village; but is now a large and prosperous city of two hundred thousand inhabitants.

Commercial Importance.— The city stood on the narrow stretch of land which separates Lake Mareotis from the Mediterranean, twelve miles west of the Canopic mouth of the Nile. A mole one mile long connected the mainland with the Island of Pharos, where was the famous lighthouse. On both sides of this mole spacious harbors were built, and the westernmost of these harbors was by a canal connected with Lake Mareotis, which again, by another canal, was connected with the Canopic arm of the Nile. From these two harbors, which were called Brucheum and the Jews' ward, commerce was exported; and for several centuries Rome and Constantinople depended on Alexandria for the principal element of their food. The exportation of breadstuffs, however, was only one branch of the business of the city. Alexandria was really the mistress of the commerce of the world, the common place of exchange for the products of Spain and India, Scythia and Ethiopia; and this, its cosmopolitan character, it showed in its population, in its very building. It consisted of three quarters,— Rhacotis, Brucheum, and the Jews' ward. In Rhacotis the Egyptians lived, and here was the famous Temple of Serapis. Brucheum was occupied by the Greeks; and here was the still more famous Museum; with the greatest library the antique world ever saw, numbering seven hundred thousand rolls or books, and representing the Latin, Greek, Egyptian, and Indian literatures. The Jews' ward was very populous. Jewish immigration to Egypt was frequent and of old date. Philo says that at the time he wrote there lived more than one million of Jews in the country. After the capture of Jerusalem, Ptolemy I. settled a numerous colony of Jews in Alexandria, and gave them equal rights with the Greeks. The Romans confirmed these privileges; and Augustus established a Jewish council to administer Jewish affairs under the authority of the imperial prefect. But, by closer acquaintance, the Jews became distasteful to the Greeks, and hateful to the Romans. Under Caligula, they lost their privileges; under Vespasian, their temple and synagogues were closed; in 415, when Cyril was patriarch, they were even expelled from the city.

Literary Character.— When, after the Macedonian conquest, the literary life of Greece was transferred to Alexandria, it had already lost its creative power, and become essentially critical. Instead of poetry, it produced grammars, rhetorics, archæology, and mythology; instead of philosophy, it produced mathematics, astronomy, medicine, and geography. But the physical and mathematical sciences are to philosophy exactly the same as the linguistical and historical sciences are to poetry,—a dissolvent. In the field of philosophy, however, there arose, from the peculiar circumstances under which life was led in Alexandria, a peculiar problem which, though critical to all appearances, could not be solved by criticism alone; and which, though forming a new phase in the history of philosophy, had to leave philosophy altogether in order to find its true solution. Here the idea of scientific knowledge as the highest state of the human mind met with the ideas of a divine revelation, without which all other spiritual gifts are poor; here the idea of imaginative reasoning as the highest energy of the human mind met with the idea of a prophetic inspiration, without which every mental exertion is blunted and blind; here Greek philosophy and Jewish religion, Roman positivism and Indian faintheartedness, the whole West and the whole East, met each other face to face, and every day; an explanation soon became necessary. One attempt to mediate between these contrasts was made from the Jewish side by Philo. His power of appreciating and assimilating Greek thought was extraordinary; it was essential to his speculations that which is specifically Jewish is lost. The strict and unconditional submission to the revealed word evaporates into arbitrary allegorical explanations. Religion is gone. Another attempt was made from the Greek side by the Neo-Platonists. Their expositions of the relation between God and the world, the divine and the human, spirit and matter, are often fantastic, and often Christian, as for instance when Plotinus touches the idea of the beautiful, very striking. But in their speculations that which is specifically Greek is lost. The subtle but sober exactness of the inference runs astray in the wildest dreams and vagaries. Science is gone. Not until the problem reached that stream of Christian thought which during the first four centuries flowed with powerful current through the life of Alexandria, not until it presented itself to the mind of Athanasius as the very heart of the Christian faith, found it its true solution.

Ecclesiastical Institutions. — Under such circumstances arose the catechetical school of Alexandria. The instruction which the Lord had ordered to be given in connection with baptism was in the first days of the Church always given before the sacrament, with the exception of the few cases in which infants were baptized with their parents. There was, however, no special office, either of preacher or of teacher, in the primitive Church; though the increase of the congregations, the occurrence of heresies, and the more definite formulation of the Christian doctrines, soon made a regularly established teaching necessary. As a simple and natural consequence of circumstances, Christian teaching, very early and for the first time, assumed in Alexandria the form of a regular catechetical institution. The frequent conversion of educated pagans, even philosophers and scholars, and the rise of Gnosticism, made it necessary for the Alexandrian bishops to intrust the instruction of catechumens only to scholars and educated Christians. They often chose converted philosophers for the purpose; and the lectures and discussions of these teachers were heard not only by educated pagans, but also by Christians who wished to have a scholarly exposition of Christianity. Often several catechists taught at the same time. No pay was given for the instruction; but rich catechumens used to offer presents, which, however, many teachers declined to accept. The instruction was given in the house of the teacher, where the pupils, men and women, gathered from early morning to late in the night. The method of teaching was very various, generally adapted to the individual wants of the pupils, and often assuming the form of alternating questions and answers. The origin of the school is obscure. According to tradition, St. Mark the Evangelist was its founder. But the first of whom we know with certainty that he filled the office of a teacher in the school was Pantaenus. He was followed by his pupil Clement, and in 202 Clement was succeeded by Origen. Although Origen was only eighteen years old, he soon raised the school to the highest point of its prosperity. In 232 he was expelled from the city, and founded another catechetical school in Caesarea in Palestine; but the school of Alexandria still continued to flourish under the leadership of Heraclies and Dionysius. After the time of Dionysius, the history of the school again became obscure. Arians is said to have taught in it. From 410 to 435 the blind Didymus was director. He was followed by Rhodon, and Rhodon by Philip from Sida. But having exhausted itself in the Origentinic, Nestorian, and Monophysitic controversies, the institution, once the repository of that brilliant and fruitful phase of theological science, gradually sank down into a school for children.

The theological character of the teaching of this institution, a Platonicizing speculation on the basis of an allegorical interpretation of the Bible, is a true mirror of the whole literary life of the city, full of errors, and rich in the sweetness of a certain kind of poetry, often perishing over everything with shallow vanity, and touching the deepest chords of the human soul, but always stirring, always suggestive, greater in influence than in results. See the articles on CLEMENT, HERMENUTICS, ORIGEN, etc.

ALEXIGANS, from their patron Alexius, or CELITA, from cella, a tomb, was the name of an association of men formed in 1300 at Antwerp, for the purpose of nursing the sick, taking care of the poor, and burying their dead. The association was simply a branch of the BEGINS, or BEGHIARDI, which see.

ALFORD, Henry, D.D., Dean of Canterbury, b. in London, Eng., Oct. 7, 1810; d. Jan. 12, 1871. He was one of the most variously accomplished clergymen of his day,—poet, preacher, painter, musician, biblical scholar, critic and philologist; and would unquestionably have been far more eminent in any one of these lines if he had not tried to excel in all. He was his father's only child, and his mother died at his birth. His father, a scholarly clergyman, took the utmost pains with his education, and was rewarded by his precocity. After the usual preparation, Alfard entered Trinity College, Cambridge, October, 1827, where his career was successful. He was ordained deacon Oct. 26, 1833; elected a fellow of his college, Oct. 1, 1834, and priest, Nov. 6, 1834; married his cousin, in the spring of 1833; and simultaneously became vicar of Wymeswold, Leicestershire. In 1839–40 he edited Dearden's Miscellany, a monthly magazine. He declined the bishopric of New Zealand in 1841, and that of New Brunswick in 1844. In 1842 he took the post of examiner in logic and moral and intellectual philosophy in the University of London. In September of 1853 he became incumbent of Quebec Chapel in London; in March, 1857, he was advanced by Lord Palmerston to the deanship of Canterbury. He was the founder and first editor of The Contemporary Review, 1860–70. The great work of his life was his edition of the Greek New Testament, 1810–61, 6th ed., revised and enlarged, 1898, which had the distinguished merit of introducing German learning (Olahausen, Stier, De Wette, Meyer, Tischendorf) to English readers. The amount of patient labor expended upon the four volumes of the index of this edition, and the improvements made in each successive edition, entitle him to the lasting gratitude of scholars, ALFRED.

After his Greek Testament, there was posthumously published in 1872 a revised version and explanatory commentary of Genesis and part of Exodus, portions of a projected commentary on the Old Testament. In 1818 appeared his New Testament for English Readers, 4 vols., 8vo; in 1869, a revision of the A. V. of the New Testament. He was largely instrumental in advancing the cause of Revision, and was one of the original members of the Revision Committee. Besides these exegetical and critical labors, Alfred published the School of the Heart and Other Poems, 2 vols., 1855, the Abbot of Muchelney, 1841, Psalms and Hymns, 1844, —poems which asserted his claim to be considered a genuine, though minor, religious poet; some of his hymns are likely to live, especially his “Ten thousand times ten thousand, In spotless raiment bright.” His little book entitled The Queen's English, 2d ed., 1864, had the fortune to call forth a trenchant criticism from Mr. G. W. Moon, entitled The Dean's English. In addition to the volumes already mentioned, there came from his hand at various times volumes of sermons, lectures, essays, and reviews, translations from the Greek, and, in conjunction with his niece, a novel, Netherton on Sea (1869). Dean Alfred was a truly catholic man. On more than one occasion he publicly appeared in gatherings of Dissenters, and sat with them. This trait is not common in English deans. His private life was very joyful. He was an humble Christian, while enjoying a world-wide fame. See his Life and Letters, edited by his widow. London, 1872, 2 vols.

ALFRED THE GREAT, king of England, 871–901, was born in 849 at Wantage in Berkshire, although it will be conceded that he was rather the youngest son of Æthelwulf and Osburgha. 901, was born in 849 at Wantage in Berkshire, although it will be conceded that he was rather the youngest son of Æthelwulf and Osburgha. 901, was born in 849 at Wantage in Berkshire, although it will be conceded that he was rather the youngest son of Æthelwulf and Osburgha. 901, was born in 849 at Wantage in Berkshire, although it will be conceded that he was rather the youngest son of Æthelwulf and Osburgha.

Although it proved impossible to find among his countrymen one who could instruct him in Latin, he was, nevertheless, possessed of an elevated and distinct idea of what learning and civilization meant; and although his reign, with its intermittent contest with the Danes, contains many vicissitudes, he succeeded, nevertheless, in realizing his ideal of reform and progress. He remodelled the whole political and ecclesiastical organization of his realm; see Leges Ælfredi. He rebuilt the churches, monasteries, and schools, burnt down by the Danes, and founded new ones, such as the Monasteries of Athelney and Winchester, and the University of Oxford. He invited a number of learned men to his country, and provided for them, and, through the intimate connection which he maintained with Rome, he was able to procure books and form libraries. But of a still greater importance were his personal exertions to arouse among his countrymen a desire of knowledge and culture. He translated Boethius: De consolatione philosophiae, edited by L. S. Cordale, London, 1829; and Orosius, edited by Dr. Bosworth, Oxford, 1839. Both works maintained their popularity, and as a digest of the Liber pastorialis cura by Pope Gregory I., edited by H. Sweet, 1872, a book well calculated to influence the spirit of the Saxon clergy. The dialogues of Pope Gregory were not translated by Alfred, but under his supervision, by Werferid, Bishop of Worcester; and the soliloquies of St. Augustine, as well as the collection of proverbs and the adaptation of the fables of Esop, belongs to a later period. William of Malmesbury tells us that Alfred began to translate the Psalms; but of the Anglo-Saxon Psalms, edited by Benjamin Thorpe in 1835, hardly any belong to the king. [Alfred was epileptic, yet incessant and most efficient in labor. Some recent English expositors (Jowett and Lightfoot) use this fact in corroboration of the theory that Paul’s “thorn in the flesh” (2 Cor. xi. 7) was epilepsy. See Schaff's Popular Commentary, Galatians, Excursus on Chap. iv., 13–15.]

ALGER OF LIEGE, or ALGER OF CLUNGY, also Alper Scholasticus, or Alper Magister, b. at Liege about 1055; d. at Clugny about 1131; was educated in the high school of Liege,—at that time the educational centre of the whole north-western Germany; was appointed dean and scholasticus at the Church of St. Bartholomew about 1100, and afterwards canon at the Cathedral of S. Marie et S. Lambertii, but retired about 1121 to the Monastery of Clugny. The two most remarkable of his works are De sacramentis corporis et sanguinis Domini, libri III., which has been often reprinted, and occupies a prominent place in the development of the doctrine of transubstantiation; and Tractatus de misericordia et justitia, printed by Marline, Nov. anecdot. Tom. V., Migne, Patrol. 180th vol. See A. L. Richter: Alper von Lüttich, Leipzig, 1854; and H. Huffer: Alper von Lüttich, Münster, 1862.

ALLAN (ALAN, ALLAN), William, b. in Lancashire in 1532; d. in Rome in 1594; entered the University of Oxford in 1547; studied at Oriel College; was made principal of St. Mary’s Hall in Queen Mary’s time, and canon of London in 1558. Among those who hailed the return to Romanism, which took place with the accession of Mary, Allan was one of the most ardent; and when Mary died, and Elizabeth re-established the Reformed church-order, he left England. Concentrating on this one idea, the maintenance of Romanism in England, he settled at Louvain; and soon this city became the centre whither all the Romanish emigrants from England gathered. In 1565 he returned secretly to England. He took up his residence in the vicinity of Oxford, and for three years his intrigues remained unnoticed; but in 1568 he had to flee for his life. He now founded a college at Douay for the education of English priests; and this institution was so well supported by France, Spain, and Rome, that it soon numbered a hundred and fifty students, and eight or ten professors. But as it stood in close connection with the Jesuits, and showed itself very hostile to Queen Elizabeth and the Anglican Church, it had to be removed to Rheims, where Allan was appointed canon. At the same time he was also active in literature, and published a number of pamphlets, apologetical and polemical, which, although without any real literary value, are striking for their hatred and recklessness. One of the most characteristic is his Admission to the Nobility and People of England, printed in Antwerp, 1588, and distributed in England as a forerunner for the Spanish Armada. In England these pamphlets caused great indignation, even among the Romanists, and it was made treason for a subject of the English crown to correspond or entertain any kind of connection with Allan; but by Rome and Spain he was magnificently rewarded. Philip II. made him Archbishop of Mechlin, and he lived in Rome in princely style. He was one of the translators of the Rheims New Testament (1582). G. LECHLER.

ALLEGORICAL INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE assumes a double or threefold sense of the Scriptures,—an obvious literal sense, and a hidden spiritual or mystic sense, both of which were intended by the sacred writer. History is not merely history to the allegorist; indeed, the historic value of a passage is generally the least interesting fact about it: what is of most importance are the spiritual lessons it conveys. Thus the Book of Joshua has quite recently been treated, by a popular writer, as an allegory of the soul's progress. Carlyle, indeed, is the first translator to undertake the interpretation of Joshua as an allegory of the soul's progress. He holds that its fertility consists in the various meanings which any man at his pleasure may assign. Let us know, then, that the true meaning of Scripture is the natural and obvious meaning; and let us embrace and abide by it resolutely. This style of interpretation is not exposition, but imposition: the meaning is not read out, but read in. His Platonic ideas into Scripture: Paul drew out the deeper meaning of the same. Philo idealized, Paul spiritualized, Mosaiism. The one left nothing in it but philosophy and myth: the other drew from it the gospel.

Into the early Christian Church allegorical interpretation came, and first, as was to be expected, from the Jews at Alexandria: for the Christians there were now interested, as the Jews had been, in reconciling their religion with Greek thought. Clement of Alexandria (circa 200) taught that the verbal sense is merely for elementary faith: the allegorical sense alone leads to the gnosia. But the chief allegorist of the Church is Origen (185-253), that fertile, but not well-balanced, writer. He taught a threefold sense of Scripture, corresponding to the three constituents in man,—body, soul, and spirit. Once introduced, the system more or less developed has maintained its hold on the Church. In the middle ages four senses were found in Scripture,—historical, allegorical, moral, and ana conical; e.g., Jerusalem is literally a city of Palestine, allegorically the Church, morally the believing soul, ana conically the heavenly Jerusalem. To this fourfold sense the present Roman-Catholic Church holds. The Reformers returned to the grammatical sense; and this may be said to constitute the basis of Protestant exegesis. Allegorical interpretation has its advocates to-day in Protestantism. Many sermonizers and popular expositors are allegorists. Many scholarly men have, in this idea, followed the Fathers. Bishop Wordsworth is a prominent instance of a commentary written largely on this principle.

The system is so easily learnt, so specious in its promises, that it is no wonder that it attracts many. It seems to turn the Bible into a "fountain of living waters." Everywhere under its inspiration Christ is seen: the desert is gladdened by his presence, the wilderness is a flower-garden. Genealogical tables by mere interpretation of the names became a system of spiritual truth. But the allegorical interpretation tampers with the Word of God. It substitutes human fancies for divine facts and truths. As Calvin, by general acknowledgment one of the ablest commentators, says, by the allegors Scripture was tortured away from its true sense. They concluded that the literal sense was too mean and poor, and that under the outward bark of the letter there lurked deeper mysteries, which cannot be extracted but by beating out allegories. God visited this profanation by a just judgment, when he suffered the pure meaning of Scripture to be buried under false interpretations. I acknowledge that Scripture is a most rich and inexhaustible fountain of all wisdom, but I deny that its fertility consists in the various meanings which any man at his pleasure may assign. Let us know, then, that the literal sense of Scripture is the natural and obvious meaning; and let us embrace and abide by it resolutely. This style of interpretation is not exposition, but imposition: the meaning is not read out, but read in. History, the grammar, and the dictionary are the proper aids in Bible study; not the subjective imagination. We must find out, under the guidance of the Spirit, what the holy men of old were by him moved to say.
The Swedenborgians have as a matter of revelation a modification of the allegorical method. Swedenborg laid it down that “all and every part of the Scripture, even to the most minute, not excepting the smallest jot or tittle, signify and involve spiritual and celestial things” (Arcana Coelestia, I. No. 2). This deeper sense is in the literal as the soul is in the body, but was lost until revealed to Swedenborg. His allegorizing is arbitrary, fanciful, often ingenious, often absurd. Thus he considers the first chapter of Genesis to represent in its spiritual sense the regeneration of man, of which the process the six days are the successive stages; Adam in Paradise is the primitive Church; the four rivers are goodness, knowledge, reason, and science, etc. His exegesis is critically worthless.

ALLEGORY is most closely allied in the domain of art to the symbol, in that of literature to the parable. But while in art the symbolical representation leads the mind by a natural and necessary association from the sign given to the idea intended, — as when, for instance, a lion rising from a lion skin symbolizes defiance courage,— in the allegory there is only a conventional and incidental connection between sign and idea, and the key to the meaning of an allegorical representation is generally found in its symbolical attributes, as, for instance, when a woman in Greek costume is recognized as America by means of the flag she holds in the hand. The difference in literature between the allegory and the parable is somewhat similar. The parable consists of two parts, — a plain narrative from real, practical, everyday life, to which is added a parallel from the spiritual or moral sphere; and the relation between these two parts is that of a striking and easily comprehended illustration of profound spiritual teaching. The allegory, on the contrary, consists only of a fictitious and fantastic narrative; but by means of subtle hints and allusions this narrative leads the reader to seek for a real and substantial meaning beneath the fanciful surface.

In Christian art, which is very rich in beautiful symbols,— the Cross, the Lamb, etc., — the allegory has always played a somewhat subordinate part; though in the earliest times, and on account of the social position of the congregation, it was of frequent occurrence, and in ingenious artificiality often approached the puzzle; as, for instance, where Christ was allegorically represented by the picture of a fish, because the Greek name of fish, Ἰχθύς, is composed of the initial letters of the words ἤχθι Ἰχθύς, Τετράχθυς Χριστός Σωτήρ, “Jesus Christ, God’s Son, the Saviour.” In Christian literature it was often employed in books of devotion and moral teaching, and it has produced at least one lasting and very prominent work,— The Pilgrim’s Progress; not to forget that, introduced by Philo as a means of reconciling Judaism and Platonism, it was adopted by the theological school of Alexandria as the highest principle of biblical exegesis, and through Augustine transplanted to the Western Church, where it was cultivated during the Middle Ages.

Clemens Petersen.

ALLEGRI, Gregorio, b. in Rome about 1580; d. there Feb. 18, 1652; studied music under Nanini, and was made director of the papal choir by Urban VIII., 1629. He was one of the first who composed for stringed instruments. His most celebrated composition is a Miserere for two choirs, still performed each year during Holy Week in the Sixtine Chapel. It was forbidden, under penalty of excommunication, to give or take copies of this music. In 1771, however, Dr. Burney procured a copy, and published it in London; but it was soon discovered that the effect of the music depends upon a peculiar execution, of which the papal choir alone has the secret.

ALLEN, David Oliver, b. at Barre, Mass., 1804; d. at Lowell, Mass., July 17, 1863; was graduated from Amherst College in 1823; studied theology in the Seminary of Andover; went in 1827 as a missionary to India; returned thence in 1833; and published in 1836 a History of India.

ALLEN, John, b. in 1476; murdered July 28, 1534, at Artane, near Clontarf; was educated at Oxford; and by Archbishop Warham sent to Rome, where he staid nine years. On his return, he was brought before Wolsey, whose policy he adopted; and in 1528 he was made Archbishop of Dublin. He wrote Epistola de Pallii Significatione and other minor pieces.

ALLEN, John, b. at Truro, Cornwall, 1771; d. June 17, 1839, at Hackney, near London, for thirty years he kept a private school. He published in 1813 a translation of Calvin’s Institutes of the Christian Religion, and in 1816 Modern Judaism.

ALLEN, William, D.D., b. at Pittsfield, Mass., Jan. 2, 1784; d. at Northampton, Mass., July 16, 1838; was graduated at Harvard College in 1802; studied theology; was licensed in 1804; and soon after appointed assistant librarian of Harvard College. He issued in 1809 an American Biographical and Historical Dictionary, the first work of the kind in America. His diligence in collecting materials, as well as the growth of the country, are evidenced by the increase of the book from seven hundred titles to eighteen hundred in the second edition, 1832, to seven thousand in the third edition, 1857. In 1810 he succeeded his father as pastor of the Pittsfield Congregational Church. Became president of the university intended by the New Hampshire legislature to supplant Dartmouth College; this scheme failing, he afterwards became president of Bowdoin College in 1820, and retained the position until 1839. He removed to Northampton, where he carried on useful literary labors. He was the father-in-law of Professor Henry B. Smith, D.D., LL.D.; and in the memoir of the latter (N.Y., 1880) will be found some notice of him.

Allenites, the followers of Henry Allen, who, b. at Newport, R.I., June 14, 1748, d. in Nova Scotia, in 1784, began in 1774 to propagate his ideas by preaching and by publishing tracts. He held that all the souls of the human race were emanations from one great spirit; that they were all present in the Garden of Eden, and took actual part in the fall; that the human body and the whole material world did not exist before the fall, but were created to prevent the absolute destruction of the human race by the fall, etc. He made a considerable impression, especially in Nova Scotia, and gathered a number of zealous prolesytes; but after his death his party gradually dwindled away.

ALLEY, William, b. about 1512 at Chipping Wychham, Bucks. Eng.; d. at Exeter, April 13, 1570; was educated at Eton, Cambridge, and Oxford; and espoused the cause of the Reformation, but kept himself in retirement during the reign of Mary. Elizabeth made him reader in St. Paul's, and in 1590 Bishop of Exeter. He translated the Pentateuch for the Bishops' Bible, and wrote an exposition of 1 Peter in The Poor Man's Library.

ALLEY, EVANGELICAL. A voluntary association of evangelical Christians from different churches and countries, for the purpose of manifesting and promoting Christian union and religious liberty.

I. ORIGIN AND AIMS. — The Alliance owes its origin to a wide-spread and growing desire for a closer union among evangelical Protestants, both for the sake of union, and for a more successful conflict with infidelity on the one hand, and superstition on the other. This union is to be entirely free and voluntary, and to leave room for great variety within the limits of scriptural or evangelical belief. The object is, not to create union, but to acknowledge, exhibit, and strengthen that spiritual union which has always existed among true Christians as members of Christ's body, but which is sadly marred and obstructed by the many divisions and rivalries of Protestant denominations and sects. The Alliance aims not at an organic union, nor at a confederation of churches, but simply at a free Christian union of individual members from different churches who hold essentially the same faith; although such a union will naturally tend to bring gradually the churches themselves into closer fellowship and mutual recognition. It claims no official and legislative authority that might in any way interfere with the internal affairs of the denominational organizations, or the loyalty of its members to their particular communion. It relies solely on the moral power of truth and love.

The other object of the Alliance is the defence and promotion of religious freedom in that sense in which it is understood by the advanced sections of Protestantism, especially in Great Britain and the United States. It is freedom as distinct from mere toleration, freedom of conscience as a fundamental and inalienable right of every man, and freedom of worship which is the natural result of the former, and which the government is bound to protect. The Alliance is the only Christian organization which attends to this important interest, and comes to the aid of all who are persecuted for the sake of religion. By its unsectarian character and freedom from all political complications, it can accomplish and has accomplished a great deal for the relief of suffering brethren and the recognition of the sacred rights of conscience.

II. THE FOUNDING OF THE ALLIANCE. — After a number of preparatory meetings and conferences, the Alliance was founded in a remarkable and enthusiastic meeting held in Freemasons' Hall in London, Aug. 19-23, 1846. The meeting was composed of eight hundred Christians,—Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Independents, Methodists, Baptists, Lutherans, Reformed, Moravians, and others,—and included many of the most distinguished divines, preachers, and philanthropists from England, Scotland, Ireland, Germany. France, Switzerland, the United States, and other countries. Sir Culling Early, Bart., presided, and became the first president of the British branch. Eloquent addresses were delivered, fervent prayers offered, and nine doctrinal articles adopted; not, however, as a binding creed or confession, but simply as an expression of the essential consensus of evangelical Christians whom it seemed desirable to embrace in the Alliance.

III. THE DOCTRINAL BASIS. — The nine articles are as follows:

1. The divine inspiration, authority, and sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures.
2. The right and duty of private judgment in the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures.
4. The utter depravity of human nature in consequence of the Fall.
5. The incarnation of the Son of God, his work of atonement for the sins of mankind, and his mediatorial intercession and reign.
6. The justification of the sinner by faith alone.
7. The work of the Holy Spirit in the conversion and sanctification of the sinner.
8. The immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, the judgment of the world by our Lord Jesus Christ, with the eternal blessedness of the righteous and the eternal punishment of the wicked.

Some regard this doctrinal statement as too liberal, others as too narrow (especially on account of Art. 9 which excludes the Quakers), while still others would have preferred no doctrinal basis, or only the Apostles' Creed, the simplest and most generally accepted of all creeds. Nevertheless it has answered a good purpose, and maintained the positive evangelical character of the Alliance. The American branch, at its organization (1867), adopted the nine London articles, with the following important explanatory and qualifying preamble:

"Resolved, That in forming an Evangelical Alliance for the United States in co-operative union with other branches of the Alliance, we have no intention to give rise to a new denomination: or to effect an amalgamation of churches, except in the way of facilitating personal Christian intercourse and a mutual good understanding; or to interfere in any way whatever with the internal affairs of the various denominations; but simply to bring individual Christians into closer fellowship and co-operation, on the basis of the spiritual union which already exists in the vital relation of Christ to the members of his body in all ages and countries.

"Resolved, That in the same spirit we propose no new creed, but taking broad, historical, and evangelical catholic ground, we solemnly reaffirm and profess our faith in all the doctrines of the inspired word of God, and in the consensus of doctrines as held by all true Christians from the beginning. And we do more especially affirm our belief in the divine-human person and atoning work of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, as the only and sufficient source of salvation and Christian fellowship and as the centre of all true Christian union and fellowship.

"Resolved, That, with this explanation, and in the spirit of a just Christian liberality in regard to the minor differences of theological schools and religious ensions, we also adopt, as a summary of the contents of the various evangelical Confessions of Faith, the Articles and Explanatory Statement set forth and agreed on by the Evangelical Alliance at its formation in London, 1846, and approved by the separate European organizations, which articles are as follows, etc.

IV. Branch Alliances.—The Evangelical Alliance thus auspiciously organized soon spread throughout the Protestant world. Branch alliances were formed in Great Britain, Germany, France, Holland, Switzerland, Sweden, and even among the missionaries in Turkey and East India; more recently also in the United States, Canada, Italy, Australia, Brazil, Mexico, Egypt, and among the Protestant missionaries in Japan. There is no central organization with any controlling authority; and the General Alliance appears in active operation only from time to time when it meets in general conference, which has assumed the character of a Protestant ecumenical council, but differs from the ecumenical councils of the Greek and Roman Churches in claiming only moral and spiritual power. The various national branches are related to each other as members of a confederation with equal rights. The British organization, being the oldest and largest, and having a house (in London, No. 7 Adam Street, Strand), and salaried officers who devote their whole time to the work, has been heretofore the most influential; the Continental branches are more elastic, and confine themselves to occasional work; the American branch, which was organized at the Bible House, New York, in 1867 (a previous attempt having failed on account of the anti-slavery agitation before the Civil War), has in a short time become the most vigorous and popular: for in the United States, where all Christian sects are represented on a basis of equality before the law, there is also the greatest appreciation of religious freedom, the strongest desire for Christian union and co-operation, and the widest field for the realization of the idea of a universal Christian brotherhood on the basis of a free development of denominational peculiarities in dogma, morals, or canon of discipline, and have no legislative authority, but simply moral power. They are held in the great capitals, and arranged by the branch in whose bounds they meet, with the co-operation of all the sister branches. They last from seven to ten days, and are spent in prayer and praise, brotherly communion, and free discussion of the leading religious and social questions of the day. The various countries, and speaking various languages, are brought together face to face to become personally acquainted, and to encourage each other in every good work.

V. The Annual Week of Prayer.—This was originally proposed by the English and American missionaries in India, adopted by the Alliance, and has become an institution and means for promoting Christian union and the spread of the gospel at home and abroad. The first week of January is set aside for united prayer. A programme is issued several months beforehand for their revision and adoption. Each branch adapts it to the condition and wants of the country which it represents, and gives it a wide publicity. Some convenient church or hall is selected in those cities and villages which observe the custom, and the ministers and laity of different denominations unite in praying for the common objects of Christ's kingdom, with special reference to the conversion of the world. This week of prayer has become almost an institution (like the holy week), and is very generally observed in London, Paris, Berlin, Basel, Geneva, Rome, Cairo, Beirut, New York, and other large cities to the shores of the Pacific.

The following programme, issued by the American Branch for the year 1881, is given as a specimen:

"January 2. — Theme: Christ the only hope of the lost world.
"Monday, 3. — Thanksgiving for the blessings, temporal and spiritual, of the past year, and prayer for their continuance.
"Tuesday, 4. — Humiliation and confession on account of individual, social, and national sins.
"Wednesday, 5. — Prayer for the Church of Christ, its unity and purity, its ministry, and for revivals of religion.
"Thursday, 6. — Christian education; prayer for the family, Sunday schools, and all educational institutions; for Young Men's Christian Associations, and for the press.
"Friday, 7. — Prayer for the prevalence of justice, humanity, and peace among all nations; for the suppression of intemperance and Sabbath desecration.
"Saturday, 8. — Prayer for Christian missions, and the conversion of the world to Christ.

VI. Conferences.—Another means of promoting the objects of the Alliance are national and international Conferences. The British organization holds a meeting annually in October in some city of England. The Irish and Scotch Branches do the same. The American Branch holds an American meeting every two years. The Continental and other branches meet less regularly. Far more important are the General Conferences which are convened at intervals of from four to six years according to circumstances. They have an international as well as interdenominational character, and may be called Protestant ecumenical councils, with this important difference, however, that they do not settle dogmas or canons of discipline, and have no legislative authority, but simply moral power. They are held in the great capitals, and arranged by the branch in whose bounds they meet, with the co-operation of all the sister branches. They last from seven to ten days, and are spent in prayer and praise, brotherly communion, and free discussions of the leading religious and social questions of the day. The various countries, and speaking various languages, are brought together face to face to become personally acquainted, and to encourage each other in every good work.

Seven general Conferences have been held thus far, and others will be held from time to time as long as the Alliance has vitality and a mission to fulfill. The first general Conference took place in London in 1831, the year of the great exhibition of the works of industry of all nations in the British metropolis; the second in Paris, 1855; the third in Berlin, 1857; the fourth in Geneva, 1861; the fifth in Amsterdam, 1867; the sixth in New York, 1873; the seventh in Basle, Switzerland, 1879. These meetings were all well attended, and left a most favorable impression upon the delegates and the country in which they were held. See a brief history of the first five Conferences, by Rev. James Davis, in the report of the New York Conference of the Alliance. New York, 1873, pp. 189, seq. The Conference held in New York Oct. 2–12, 1873, is regarded by many as the most enthusiastic, interesting, and
VI. RELIGIOUS LIBERTY. — The Alliance assumed from the beginning that freedom of conscience and Christian union, far from being inconsistent with each other, are one and inseparable; that freedom is the basis of union, and union the result and support of freedom; that a union without freedom is only a dead, mechanical uniformity; that true union implies variety and distinction, and a full recognition of the rights and peculiar gifts and mission of other families in New York alone. The seventh Conference in Basle was not so large and imposing, but do not supersede nor interfere with the Evangelical Alliance and its general conferences.

VII. RELIGIOUS LIBERTY. — The Alliance as informed the death-penalty for apostasy from Mohammedanism in his dominions after the Crimean War (1856). It interceded for the Methodists and Baptists in Sweden (1858), which has since abrogated the penal laws against Roman Catholics and Protestants not belonging to the Lutheran Confession. It sent in 1871 a large deputation, in which prominent citizens of the United States took a leading part, to Prince Gortschakoff and the Czar of Russia (then at Friedrichshafen) to plead for the oppressed Lutherans in the Baltic Provinces; and these have not been disturbed since that time. It sent a similar deputation to the embassy from Japan, when they visited the United States and the courts of Europe in 1872, to remonstrate against the persecution of Christians, mostly Roman Catholics, in that distant empire of the East; and the persecution has since ceased. It has not forgotten the Nestorians in Persia, who appealed to the Alliance for protection against the oppression of a Mohammedan government; and prepared a memorial to the Czar on the persecution of Baptists in the South of Russia (1874). At the seventh general Conference in Basle (1879), a deputation was appointed to wait on the Emperor of Austria in behalf of certain Christians in Bohemia, who were debarred the liberty of holding even family worship; and the request was granted by the special interposition of the Emperor. The Alliance placed public opinion on the subject of freedom of conscience and religious worship, as expressed by the Alliance, has always found a respectful hearing, and must sooner or later be obeyed by every civilized government on the globe.

LXXI. — The Proceedings of the London meeting of 1816, when the Alliance was organized, and the Proceedings and Addresses of the General Conferences at London, Paris, Berlin, Geneva, Amsterdam, New York, and Basle, were all published in English, and most of them also in French, German, and Dutch, in the cities where they were held, and may be had at the office of the British organization, 7 Adam Street, Strand. The most important are: Evangelical Alliance Conference, 1873, edited by Dr. Schaff and Prime, published by the Harpers, New York, 1874, 773 pp., double col. The American Committee distributed gratuitously six hundred copies of this statey volume among delegates and theological libraries in Europe and America. Siebente Hauptversammlung der Evang. Allianz gehalten in Basel, 1879, herausgeg. von Prof. Dr. Riggenbach, Basel (Bahnmaier), 1879, in 2 vols. of 1,054 pp. The same in English, under the title, The Religious Condition of Christendom described in a series of papers presented to the Seventh Gen. Conf. of the Ev. Alliance held in Basle, 1879, edited by Dr. J. Murray Mitchell, London ( Hodder and Stoughton), 1880. To this should be added the report of the Deputation of the Basle Conference to the Emperor of Austria in behalf of religious liberty in Bohemia, published in German and French at Basle, 1880. The British branch publishes from time to time special papers. The American branch has issued from 1867 to 1880 fifteen documents, among them a report on the state of religion in the United States for the Conference in Amsterdam, by the late Professor Dr. Henry B. Smith (1867), a similar report prepared for the Conference in Basle by Dr. Schaff (1879), and a report on the Alliance Deputation to the Czar of Russia in behalf of religious liberty (1871). The Alliance has no special organ, but uses the various religious periodicals friendly to the cause in different countries. The British organization reports its proceedings every month in the Evangelical Christendom, published by William John Johnson, in London, Edinburgh, and Dublin.

ALLIANCE OF THE REFORMED CHURCHES
(popularly called "Presbyterian Alliance"). A voluntary organization formed in London 1875; somewhat similar to that of the Evangelical Alliance, but confined to Reformed churches holding the Presbyterian system of government, and more churchly in the character of its representation. It realizes a desire strongly entertained by Calvin (letter to Cranmer, 1552) and Beza (conference at St. Germain, 1561), to heal the divisions among Protestants by the formation of some general council. Nothing came of their efforts, and the different Protestant churches rapidly became still farther separated.

The English-speaking portion of the Presbyterian churches that did not see their way to entering the Alliance was prepared, from whose basis we extract the following:

"1. This Alliance shall be known as The Alliance of the Reformed Churches throughout the world holding the Presbyterian system.

"2. Any church organized on Presbyterian principles, which holds the supreme authority of the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments in matters of faith and morals, and whose creed is in harmony with the consensus of the Reformed Creeds, shall be eligible for admission into the Alliance."

It was also proposed that there should be a triennial council of delegates, ministers, and elders, in equal numbers, to be appointed by the different churches in proportion to the number of their congregations; and that this council, while at liberty to consider all matters of common interest, should "not interfere with the existing creed or constitution of any church in the Alliance, or with its internal order or external relations."

The Alliance which was thus proposed, was one, not of individual Christians nor of individual Presbyterians, but of Presbyterian churches, and its constitution met with great favor. It furnished an opportunity for the different church organizations to come into close fraternal relations with each other while retaining their separate existence and independence; while the council, it was seen, might in some measure informally do duty for that "missing link" of a worldwide Presbyterian Church, a General Assembly.

In 1876, therefore, almost every Presbyterian organization adopted the constitution, and appointed delegates, who — to the number of three hundred and thirty-three, and representing more than forty-nine separate churches, scattered through twenty-five different countries, and consisting of more than twenty thousand congregations — met in Edinburgh, July 3–10, 1877, and constituted the First General Council of the Reformed Alliance. The session lasted eight days, during which papers were read and discussed on The Harmony of the Reformed Confessions; The Fundamental Principles of Presbyterianism; The Eldership; Co-operation in Mission Work, and such like.

The Second General Council, composed of nearly three hundred delegates, was held in Philadelphia, Sept. 23 to Oct. 2, 1880, and was an occasion of great interest. Papers were read and discussed on many vital Christian doctrines, e.g., Inspiration; The Atonement; Future Retribution, — expressing on the whole strong adherence to the old doctrinal positions of the Reformed Churches, while important movements were initiated that look to a unifying and simplifying of the Reformed Creeds, and to cooperation by the whole Reformed Church in enterprises of a missionary and benevolent character. The Third General Council will be held in Belfast, Ireland, in 1884.

ALLIANCE. The Holy, was a league between Alexander of Russia, Francis I. of Austria, and Friedrich Wilhelm of Prussia, for the purpose of maintaining that peace and order which, after the fall of Napoleon I., the congress of Vienna had succeeded to establish. In its original intention the Holy Alliance no doubt was a Christian effort with pure and lofty aims, professing, as it did, to carry out the principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ in all relations between sovereign and subjects, and between sovereigns and sovereigns. In reality, however, the league became a most vicious instrument of suppression and re-action. The form of the instrument was due to Alexander, who at that period stood under the inspiration of Madame Krüdener: the use to which it was put was determined by Austrian traditions and the character of Prince Metternich.

PETER ALLIX, b. at Alençon, 1641; d. at Salisbury, 1717; was educated in the Reformed theological seminary of Sedan; was minister in Normandy or Champagne, and afterwards at Charenton, but left France on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes and went to England, where James II. allowed him to establish a French church for the numerous French fugitives. He contributed much to uphold this wrong view. After the fall of Napoleon I., the congress of Vienna was determined by Austrian traditions and the character of Prince Metternich.

PRINCE METTERNICH, remarked that peace and order which, after the fall of Napoleon I., the congress of Vienna had succeeded to establish. In reality, however, the league became a most vicious instrument of suppression and re-action. The form of the instrument was due to Alexander, who at that period stood under the inspiration of Madame Krüdener: the use to which it was put was determined by Austrian traditions and the character of Prince Metternich.

ALL-SOULS' DAY, the day following All-Saints' Day, Nov. 2, is by the Roman Church consecrated to the memory of the dead and to prayer for the souls suffering in purgatory; but its celebration is a custom which has become general, rather than a definite institution. Since the days of Gregory the Great (d. 604), when the doctrine of purgatory became generally accepted, it was considered a sacred duty for all Christians to pray for the dead; and an incident contributed to mould this general duty into a fixed form. A pilgrim returning from Jerusalem reported that, on approaching Sicily, he had seen flames from purgatory bursting through the earth, and heard the wailings of the suffering souls. They implored him to go to the Monastery of Clugny, and beg the monks to have mercy on their woes, and by prayers and alms free them out of purgatory. From this time, 998, the pious abbot of Clugny, Odilo, considered it a duty for his monastery to celebrate every year the day after All-Souls' Day in commemoration of all deceased believers, which example soon spread to other monasteries.

ALMONER (aumónier, eleemosynarius), an officer among the court clergy; occurs at the French court from the thirteenth century, and was originally employed to distribute the king's alms. Later on there were several almoners, and from the fifteenth century a grand almoner is mentioned. He stood at the head of the whole court clergy, made propositions for the appointments to bishoprics and other benefices, and exercised a considerable influence. In the Revolution the office was abolished. In England the duty of the hereditary grand almoner consists in distributing the coronation medals among the spectators; and that of the lord high almoner, in distributing twice a year the Queen's bounty, that is, as many silver pence as the Queen has years of age.

ALMS (from ἰδιωματις, mercifulness). To give alms was a duty laid upon the Jews, who were also required to leave gleanings in the fields that the poor might be fed (Lev. xix. 10, xxiii. 22; Deut. xv. 11, xxiv. 19, xxxvi. 2–13; Ruth ii. 2). Every third year a tithe of the entire increase was to be divided among the Levite, the stranger, and the fatherless and the widow (Deut. xiv. 28, 29). Alms-giving was part of the Pharisaic practice, "to be seen of men" (Matt. vii. 2). In the temple there were thirteen boxes for this purpose (John viii. 20). The idea that there is merit in alms per se, has been always fruitful of ill. Men think by them to purchase salvation; but what is the motive? and what is the amount? (2 Cor. viii. 12.) The widow's two mites were more precious than the rich men's princely gifts. Alms-giving was early recognized as a condition of piety, and as a "fundamental law of Christian morality," for there be benevolence, there can be no spiritual life; and mention is made in the Acts of collections for the poor as a bond of Christian unity (Acts xi. 29; Rom. xii. 13; Eph. iv. 28; 1 Tim. vi. 18; Heb. xiii. 16; 1 John ii. 17). It was the exhortation of the pillar apostles (Gal. ii. 10), and a special care of Paul (1 Cor. xvi. 1). Frequent are the exhortations of the fathers; and it became an integral part of the Church worship. The money went, before the fifth century, into the hand of the bishop, and was distributed by the deacons. But in the Western Church in the fifth century there was a fourfold division of them: 1, for the bishop; 2, for the clergy; 3, for the poor; 4, for the fabric and sustenance of the churches. See ALMONER.

ALOGI, or ALOGIANS, αλογοι, a branch of the Monarchians, flourished in Asia Minor; and received, according to Epiphanius, Hares. v. 54, 1, their name from the fact that they denied the existence of the Logos, taught by St. John, and rejected both St. John's Gospel and probably also the Revelation. Theodotus the currier, who about 200 was excommunicated by the Roman bishop, belonged to this sect, according to Epiphanius, v. 54. 1. HERZOG.

ALOMBRADOS, Illuminatii, Illuminés, a mystic sect, which originated in Spain in the first part of the sixteenth century, and appeared at the same time in the vicinity of Cordova and in Castile. The Inquisition, however, was prompt in its action. Among those suspected was Ignatius Loyola: twice he was called before the Inquisition and imprisoned. Also Juan d'Avila, Luis de Granada, Francis de Borgia, and others among the Spanish theologians, were examined. (Cf. Llorente: Historia de la Inquisicion.) The doctrines of the Alombrados, such as they are represented in the acts of the Inquisition, remind one sometimes of the Quakers on the one side, and on the other of the German Anabaptists

Münzer, Schwenkfeld, etc. A report of Jan. 28, 1558, summarizes them in the following manner: I. Only the inward prayer is commanded by God and meritorious, while the external praying with the lips is a merely symbolical or sacramental action without any religious worth. II. The confessor who recommends such external, bodily exercises, shall not be obeyed. III. The true servant of God is above practices of this kind, nor is it necessary for him to do good works in the common sense of the word. IV. The violent movements, cramps, and faintings which accompany the inner devotion, are token of divine love and the grace of the Holy Spirit. V. In the state of perfection the secret of the Holy Trinity is revealed to us, even while here on earth, and all which we shall do or not do is communicated to us directly by the Holy Spirit, etc. (Llorente: Historia of the Inquisition.) A still more complete record of the doctrines of the Alombrados is found with Malvasia: Catalogus omnium haeresium et conciliorum, Rome, 1601, Centur. XVI., pp. 299–374, from which it appears that they endeavored to please God and render Him very doubtful character. This was more especially the case with a branch of the Alombrados discovered in 1575 in the neighborhood of Cordova, and founded by the Carmelín nun, Caterina de Jesus, and a certain Juan de Willelpando, from Teneriffa; and with another branch flourishing about 1623 in the dioceses of Sevilla and Granada. Both these sects were suppressed with great severity by the Inquisition, and many of their members perished at the stake. Closely allied to the Spanish Alombrados, and different from the German Illuminati of the eighteenth century, were the Illuminés of Northern France; the sect was founded in 1634 in Flanders and Picardy by Antoine Boquet and Abbé Guérin, pastor of St. George de Roye, after the latter of whom it was often called Guérinet. Another sect of French Illuminés flourished in Southern France in the beginning of the eighteenth century. They seem to have adopted several Masonic elements, and formed a transition from the Alombrados to the Illuminati. See J. H. BLUNT: Dictionary of Hieres, etc., London, 1874; HERPE: Geschichte der quetzlichen Mystik in der Katholischen Kirche, Berlin, 1875. ZÜCKLER.

ALOYSIUS OF GONZAGA, b. at Gonzaga near Mantua in 1568; d. in Rome in 1591; belonged to the princely family of Castiglione; distinguished from early youth by his piety and strong ascetic leaning, he became a Jesuit in 1567. He died by the plague, sacrificing himself in order to alleviate the sufferings of the poor. He was canonized by Benedict XIII. in 1726, and is commemorated in the Roman Church on June 21. HERZOG.

ALSTED, Johann Heinrich, b. in 1588; d. in 1638; was professor of philosophy and theology at Herborn; represented the Reformed Church of Nassau at the synod of Dortrecht ( Dort), 1618, and became afterwards professor of philosophy and theology at Weissenburg, in Transylvania. He was a very prolific writer, and his works give a striking idea of the literary and scientific methods of his age. The most remarkable are his two great cyclopædias: (1) Cursus philosophici Encyclopædia, Herborn, 1620, of which one volume, consisting of 3,072 quarto pages, comprises, I. quatuor præcognitæ philosophiae: archæologia, heæologia, technologia, didactica; II. undecim scientiae philosophiae, theoreticae; metaphysica, pneumatica, physica, arithmetica, geometria, cosmographia, uranographia, cosmiologia, optica, musica, architectonica; III. quinqve prudentiae philos. practicae; ethicae, economicae, pollicæ, scholasticae, historiae; the other comprises "the seven liberal arts:" (2) Encyclopædia septem tomis distincta, Herborn, 1650, containing, I. quatuor præcognitæ disciplinarum; II. philologia, i.e., lexiæ, grammatica, rhetorica, logica, oratoria, poetica; III. philosophiæ theoreticae; IV. practicae; V. tres facultates principes: theologia, jurisprudentia, medicina; VI. artes mechanicae; VII. miscellaneous: one section is entitled tabulaeologia, or the "doctrine" of the use and abuse of tobacco. The various theological disciplines he treated in separate works: Theologia scholastica didactica, Han. 1619; Theologia polemica, 1620; Theologia casuum, 1621; Theologia apologetica, Theologia divina, etc. He also wrote a Tractatus de mille annis, in which he fixes the beginning of the millennium at 1694, and a great work, De manu deutone spirituali, etc.

ALEX. SCHWEIZER.

ALTAR, Hebrew. The first altar was probably no more than a heap of stones, or mound of earth; similarly the altar which Moses was commanded to build was to be made either of earth or stone; in the latter case it was expressly required to be rough, the use of a tool being regarded as polluting (Exod. xx. 24, 25). In the Jewish worship two altars were used. 1. The altar of burnt offering, or the brazen altar, which was seven feet and six inches square, and four feet and six inches high, and stood directly in front of the principal entrance of the Tabernacle. The casing was of shittim-wood overlaid with gold; only incense might be put upon it, yet on the Day of Atonement it was stained by blood (Lev. xvi. 18, 19). The altar of incense is the only altar in heaven (Rev. viii. 3, 4).

Christian. The New Testament has a double designation for the Christian's altar, namely, ἑυαγγελία, from εὐαγγέλιον, "to sacrifice," translated "the altar" (Heb. xiii. 10), and ἱερόν, translated literally "the Lord's table" (1 Cor. x. 21), of which the first one is applied to the Jewish altar of burnt-offerings in the Septuagint and the Gospels (Matt. v. 23, 24; Luke i. 11). Both names were afterwards used promiscuously by the Greek Fathers to the exclusion of other designations, such as ἱράρχης and τρυφεῖον, which were applied to the heathen altars only. The Latin Fathers use ara and altar, and later on altarium, without making any such distinction.

The Christian altar combined from a very early date two ideas or offices together,—that of the celebration of the eucharist, and that of the worship of the martyrs. When, during the time of the persecutions, the eucharist was celebrated in the subterranean cemeteries, the catacombs, the celebration took place on the slab covering the martyr's tomb, which tomb stood under an apse or arch built over it; that is, the grave of the martyr served as an altar. Afterwards, when churches were built in the cemeteries, but above ground, the altar was placed just above the martyr's tomb, and an aperture was made so that the tomb could be seen. Still later, when churches were built also outside the cemeteries, the martyr's bones were transferred to the new place, and entombed or enshrined under the altar. This custom of the Church was by Felix I., 269-274, made a law in the Church, and spread throughout all Western countries, so that the martyr's tomb, the martyrium, confessio, testimonium, memoria, became a part of the altar itself. And so it is still in the Roman Church up to this very day. No altar can be raised without relics; and when a new church is consecrated, the consecratio altaris, the inclusio of the relics of the patron-saint of the building in the sepulcrum, is the principal point of the ceremony.

In the combination of these two offices, the construction, position, and ornamentation of the Christian altar find their explanation. The structure itself had the form of a sarcophagus, and was first made of wood, afterwards of stone, but always highly ornamented, inlaid with gold, silver, pearls, and precious stones, or covered with cloths of velvet and silk, vestimenta altaris, costly embroidered, over which was spread, at the celebration of the eucharist, a fine white linen cloth, pallæ or palæ corporalis or corporale, symbolizing the winding-sheet of Christ. Over the altar, and at times hiding it away from sight, rose the ciborium on four columns, between costly embroidered curtains. From the ninth century it became customary to place the shrine with the relics of the saint on the top of the altar, and as a decoration around this shrine developed the altar-piece with its wings, the retabulum. Later on, the shrine or reliquary was again placed under or in the altar, but over the altar-piece. In the period when Gothic art stood at its highest, when wood-carving was carried to perfection, and painting in oils newly invented, these altar-pieces were often wonderful works of art. Among the other accessories of the altar, the lights were not introduced until the twelfth century, and the vases with flowers still later. In the middle of the ninth, Leo IV. decreed: Super altares nililum ponitur nisi capsa et reliquiae Sanctorum aut forte quatuor Evangelia et busta cum corpore Domini ad altariam interosserum ("on the altar nothing might be lawfully placed except a case containing relics, or perchance the codex of the Gospels, and the pyx or tabernacle in which the Lord's body was reserved for the last sacrament of the sick"). [Migne, Patrol. cxv.677]. Even the crucifix was not placed on the altar, but suspended above it.

Originally there was only one altar in each church, placed in the apsis which terminated the middle nave, and consecrated to the patron-saint of the building; but just the circumstance that the altar was connected with the worship of martyrs and saints gave rise to the introduction of several altars at the same church, and thus the Apostolic Constitutions established the development of a new altar means the separation from the old bishop; for as yet one altar bound the bishop and the congregation together into one body, by one faith. But, as other relics than those of the patron-saint were introduced into a church, special altars were raised and consecrated to them; and at these altars private mass was said at special occasions. Thus Paulinus, from Nola, described the church of the Holy Sepulchre, erected by Constantine in Jerusalem, as rich in "golden altars;" and Ambrose mentions several altars in the church of Milan. Also the portable altar, ara gestatoria, portadita, notoria, cataca, itineraria, etc., was an outgrowth from the altar's office in the worship of saints. As mass could not be said at an altar not consecrated, and no altar could be consecrated without enclosing some relic, princes on their campaigns, missionaries on their voyages, high ecclesiastics, when travelling, carried with them a portable altar, a box of wood or metal, costly ornamented, and containing the relic, the hostie, and the communion cup.

It was, therefore, quite natural that the Reformation should take offence at the plurality of altars in the same church, as it completely abolished that part of the altar's office which stood in connection with the worship of saints. Wherever the Reformation became victorious, all the by-altars were generally broken down; and when in some cases, as for instance in the Church of St. Laurentius, in Nuremberg, they were left standing, they were bereft of all liturgical signification, and remained only as monuments. In Lutheran churches the chief altar was generally retained nearly in its original shape; the reliquary disappeared, but the altar-cloth, the altarium, remained. The Reformed churches generally went more radically to work. In Switzerland the altar was replaced by a plain communion-table; and in Holland and Scotland even this communion-table was not tolerated except when communion was actually celebrated.

ALTHAMER, Andreas, b. about 1500 in Brenz, Württemberg; studied in 1518-19 at the universities of Tübingen and Leipzig; was a teacher in Hall, Suabia, in 1521, and became minister in Gmünd in 1524. On account of the Peasant War he fled from Southern Germany, and came in 1525 to Wittenberg. Here he very soon became a disciple of the Reformers, attacking the Romanists in his Annotationes in Jacobo Epist. 1517, etc., and defending Luther in his De Sacramento Altaris, etc. He also assisted at the conferences of Berne in 1528. In 1526 he returned to the South as minister in Eltersdorf; in 1527 he became deacon to St. Schaldus in Nuremberg, and in 1528 minister in Ansbach. About the latter part of his life nothing certain is known. A biography of him, containing several of his letters, was written by J. A. Ballemestadius, Wolfenbüttel, 1740.

ALTING, Johann Heinrich, b. at Emden, Friesland, Feb. 17, 1583; d. at Garmingen, Aug. 25, 1644; studied at Garmingen and at Herborn under Piscator; travelled much; became in 1608 tutor to the Prince Palatine whom he accompanied to Sedan and to England, and was appointed professor of dogmatics at Heidelberg (Lov. communia) in 1613, and in 1616 director of the seminary in Collegium Sapientiae. After the capture of Heidelberg in 1622 by Tilly, he fled to Holland, where in 1627 he was made professor of theology in Garmingen. He published nothing during his lifetime, but after his death his works were published by his sons: *Excerpta Augustana Confessionis, Amsterdam, 1652; Script. Heidelbergens, three vols., Amsterdam, 1602, containing, I. Locos Communnes; II. Problemat. theologicae: III. Excerpta Augustanae Paral. Theologiae historicae, Amsterdam, 1604.—(2) His son, Jacob Alting, b. at Heidelberg, Dec. 27, 1618; d. at Garmingen, Aug. 20, 1679; studied Oriental languages, and succeeded Gomarus as professor in Hebrew at Garmingen, 1667. His works on Hebrew language and literature were published at Amsterdam in 1687, in five folio volumes, by Balthazer Becker.

ALYPIUS, Saint, b. at Tagaste, Numidia; was a pupil and friend of Augustine, with whom he went to Rome to study law. For some time he held a position in the imperial treasury; but in 388 he went with Augustine to Milan, was converted from Manichaeism to the Catholic faith, and baptized by Ambrose on Easter-eve, 387. After returning to Africa, the two friends settled near Tagaste, and lived in seclusion until 391, when Augustine was chosen priest by the people of Hippo. Shortly after Alypius took charge of a monastery in Hippo, and in 394 he was elected bishop of Tagaste. He was present at the council of Carthage, 403 (see Donatists), and was one of the six Catholic representatives in the great conference convened by Honorius. When Augustine died in 430, he was still living, but nothing is known about the last days of his life. He is commemorated by the Roman Church on Aug. 15. See Augustine, Confession. VI., 7, 8, 9, 10, 12; IX., 6; and Epist., 22, 28, 188, 201;

There is another St. Alypius, the Stylist, commemorated by the Dionysian Church on Nov. 28. He was born in Adrianople in the middle of the sixth century; and, in imitation of Simeon the Stylite, he ascended a pillar, and remained standing on its top during more than fifty years.

Alzog, Johann Baptist, an eminent Roman-Catholic church historian, b. at Ohlau in Silesia, June 29, 1808; d. at Freiburg, Germany, March 1, 1878; educated at Brieg, Breslau, and Bonn, from 1830-33, he was a private tutor at Aachen; and on July 4, 1834, he was ordained a priest at Cologne; in the next year he received from the Münster Academy, as the result of a public disputation, the degree of Doctor in Theology; his thesis was on the principles of Roman-Catholic exegesis (Explicitio Catholicorium Systematis de Interpretatione Litterarum Sacrarum, Monasterii, 1835). Immediately thereafter he was chosen professor of church history and exegesis in the Theological Seminary in Posen, where he remained until 1844. During this time he materially aided his archbishop, Martin von Dunin, in the fight against the mixed marriages, and published the first edition of his Lehrbuch der Kirchengeschichte (Mainz, 1841). In 1844 he was called to a similar position at Hildesheim; but at length his great desire to be a professor in a university was gratified by his call to Freiburg in 1853. From then until his death he led the quiet, active, useful life of a scholar. Nor was he without recognition by the secular authorities in the way of titles and medals; but what he valued most highly was the confidence manifested in him by his peers. In 1864 he attended the memorable congress of Roman-Catholic scholars held at Munich; and in 1869 he was summoned by the Pope to Rome to take part in the preparation for the Vatican Council. He died of apoplexy.

Alzog was not only respected by Roman Catholics, but also by Protestants. He was no narrow partisan, but a broad-minded student of history. Accordingly his works are deservedly popular in the best sense. In his Manual of General Church History, the ninth edition of which appeared in 1872, he endeavored to do for the Roman Catholics what Hase did for the Protestants,—present a brief yet full, readable, and reliable church history. It has been translated into French, Spanish, Italian, Portuguese, Bohemian, Polish, Armenian, finally into English by Messrs. Pabish and Byrne, Cincinnati, 1874, sqq., 3 vols. But the English translation skillfully removes the manly candor of Alzog, and turns him into the conventional Roman-Catholic apologist who sees no good in Protestantism and no bad in Romanism. The unfairness of this may be judged by the following extracts of a letter of Dr. Alzog, dated Freiburg, Sept. 15, 1868, to his Protestant fellow-historian, Dr. Schaff: "The correspondence with a colleague of the Protestant Church of such excellent spirit is to me of inestimable value. I shall soon give expression to my joy and gratitude by sending you a copy of the latest edition of my Compendium of Church History, and of my Oraito apologética de fuga of Gregory Nazianzen, now in the press. Your interesting and valuable communications from America give me new light, and induce me hereafter to pay greater attention to this part of church history, availing myself of your suggestions," etc.

Alzog wrote also Das katholische Gebet-Gesangbuch, Mainz, 1849; Handbuch der Patrologie, Freiburg in Breisgau, 1866, 3d ed. 1878; Grundriß der universal Kirchengeschichte, Mainz, 1898 (an abridgment of his larger work); besides many smaller treatises. See F. X. Kraus: Gedächtnissrede auf Johannes Alzog. 2d ed., Freiburg in Breisgau, 1879.

Amalarius, deacon and then priest in Metz, and afterwards abbot of Hornbucc, near Metz; d. in 837; wrote about 820 a book, De officio ecclésiastico, or as he calls it himself, Liber officii, which he dedicated to Lewis the Pious (Max. Bibl., T. XIV., p. 394, sqq.). The book is a curious instance of the allegorizing tendency. The author finds a symbolical meaning, even in the smallest details of the garment of the priest. Nevertheless, it contains much information concerning the spirit and characters of the age. He also wrote a work, De ordine antiphonaria or De ordine psalmorum (Max. Bibl., T. XIV.), in which he criticised Agobard's improvements of the church song; but Agobard not only refuted the criticisms, but also attacked Amalarius, Liber officii contra libros quattuor Am. abbatis. M. B., T. XIV., p. 325.

A'malek (dweller in a valley) was the grandson of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 16), but was not the founder of the Amalekites, because, according to Gen. xiv. 7, they existed before his birth.

Amalekites, "the first of the nations," as Balaam called them (Num. xxiv. 20), and the only one of the peoples outside of Canaan who were put under the ban of total extinction (Exod. xvii. 14). The reason of this cause was Amalek's cowardly attack upon Israel's rear-guard, "even all that were feeble," while the host was faint and weary. The battle was, however, turned against them by the miracle of Moses' prayer (Exod. xviii. 8-16). The origin of the Amalekites is not known; but from the fact that in the time of the judges (Judg. xiii. 19) there was a hilly district in Ephraim, called by this name, it is reasonable to conjecture that once they lived there, and that gradually they took up a nomadic mode of life, perhaps even before Abraham's emigration, until they had moved southwards and westwards into the wilderness between Palestine and Egypt, where they were found in the sixth century; and, in imitation of Simeon the Stylite, he ascended a pillar, and remained standing on its top during more than fifty years.

king (2 Sam. viii. 12.). At length, however, in the days of Hezekiah they were completely destroyed (1 Chron. iv. 43.).

AMALRIC OF BENA (French, Amaury), b. at Bena in the diocese of Chartres, in the middle of the twelfth century; taught theology and philosophy in the University of Paris, and enjoyed a great reputation as a subtle dialectician; but was accused of heresy in 1204, and called to Rome to defend himself before Innocent III. The pope decided against him; and, soon after his return to Paris, he died of grief. It was not, however, until after his death that the sect which he had founded was discovered; though in Paris itself not less than thirteen ecclesiastics belonged to it, and it numbered many members in the diocese of Paris, Longres, Troyes, and Sens. In order to suppress the sect, a synod assembled in Paris in 1399. Amalric's doctrines were condemned, he himself excommunicated, his bones exhumed, and scattered over the fields. Nine ecclesiastics, and Wilhelm the goldsmith, one of the pupils of the school of Dagobert, who worked secretly at the stake: the four other priests were imprisoned for life. The same synod condemned also a book by David of Dinant, the metaphysical works of Aristotle, several theological works in the vernacular tongue, etc. At the fourth council of the Lateran in 1215, Innocent III, confirmed the condemnation of Amalric's doctrines, which he characterized as mere craziness.

Only three propositions can with certainty be referred back to Amalric himself: the rest of his system is known to us only through his disciples. Nevertheless, as he founded the sect himself, and the sect was discovered immediately after his death, there can be no reasonable doubt that the doctrines of his disciples originated with him.

The three above-mentioned propositions read: I. God is all; II. Every Christian must believe that he is a member of the body of Christ, and therefore David's gail, sister of David, and therefore David's nephew; commanded the army of Absalom; was completely defeated, but was nevertheless appointed by David Joab's successor; and eventually died by Joab's hand (2 Sam. xjvi. 25, xviii., xix., xx. 10). See JoAB.

AMAZIAH (whom Jehovah strengthens), son and successor of Joash as king of Judah, B.C. 838–809; slew Joash's murderers; defeated the Edomites; attacked Jehosh, king of Israel, and was defeated; Jerusalem was taken and pillaged. But he reigned for fifteen years after the death of Jehosh, and was at last murdered (2 Kings xiv.).

AMBADUSS, missionary among the Franks in the reigns of Dagobert I. and Sigbert III.; bishop of Mästricht, and a zealous champion of the interests of Rome; was ordained priest at the tomb of St. Martin; and visited Rome, where St. Peter appeared to him in a vision, and summoned him to go and convert the pagan Franks. Laboring in the vicinity of Ghent, he obtained from Dagobert, about 720, a law making baptism compulsory: and he succeeded in converting the wealthy Alluwin, afterwards called Bavo, who furnished him with means to found two monasteries. Nevertheless the chief result of his labor was a conflict with the Iro-Scottish missionaries, seven of whom he expelled, and Dagobert finally banished him. In 647 he was made bishop of Mästricht; but, unable to govern his clergy, he abdicated, and took up once more his missionary work on the Lower Danube, in Spain, and on the Scheldt, though nowhere with success. The date of his death varies between 601 and 684. According to Roman records, he did many miracles, and is styled the "Apostle of Belgium." See SMEDT: Vie de St. Amand, 1861; GOSSE: Essai sur St. Amand, 1866; EHRARD: Iro-Scottische Missionskirche, 1873.

AM'ASA (a burden), a son of Jether and Abigail, sister of David, and therefore David's nephew; commanded the army of Absalom; was completely defeated, but was nevertheless appointed by David Joab's successor; and eventually died by Joab's hand (2 Sam. xvii. 25, xviii., xix., xx. 10). See JoAB.

AMBO (Greek áušov, from ēvaSalvo, "to ascend," not from the Latin ambire, "to circumvent," or from ambo, "both"), denoted generally the platform, which, raised a few steps above the ground and surrounded with rails, caused its hearers to be elevated from the altar-place, sanctuarium, presbyterium, to the west into the nave of the church, and, during service, was occupied by the lower clergy, especially the singers and readers. In a more special sense, the name was applied to a scaffolding erected at the northern and southern extremities of the raling of the sanctuarium, of a considerable elevation, provided with two flights of steps, and sustaining a desk from which the Scriptures were read and the formulae solemnes were spoken. If there were two amboines, one on each side, that to the right of the altar was higher and more richly fitted up; but both were provided for the reading of the Gospels; while the lower and plainer one to the left was destined for the reading of the Epistles. When there was only one ambo, it contained two desks, one, more elevated, for the Gospels, and another, lower, for the Epistles. The deacon preached from the ambo, while the bishop preached from his thronos behind the altar, or, if the church was too large, from the pulpit before the altar. C. BROCKHUIS.

AMBROSE OF ALEXANDRIA, the friend of Origen, was active in establishing an orthodox bishop at Sirmium, and in procuring copies of the Old Testament. See ETRAC: Hist. Eccles., VI. 18; EPHPHANUS: HAres, c. 64, 3; JEROME: De Viris Illust. c. 56.

AMBROSE (Latin form, AMBROSius), Saint, b. at Treves, 340; d. at Milan, April 3–4, 397; one of the great leaders and teachers of the Church. Belonging to a noble and rich Roman family, he was educated in Rome for the bar; and was, about 370, appointed consular prefect of Liguria and Emilia. He took up his residence at Milan; and when in 374, after the death of Auxentius, a fierce contest arose between the orthodox and the Arian party, concerning the election of the new bishop, he, as the first magistrate, repaired to the church to maintain order. While he was there addressing the crowd, a child suddenly cried out, "Ambrosius episcopus." The idea struck the multitude, and by an unanimous vote he was transferred from the judicial bench to the episcopal chair. He was as yet only a catechumen; but he was immediately baptized, and eight days afterward, Dec. 7, 374, he was consecrated bishop, having bequeathed all his property, money, and estates to the Church whose servant he had become.

As a leader of the Church, Ambrosius has done much more good than the three bishops who, during his time, occupied the papal chair,—Liberti, Damausus, and Siricius. He saw that the Roman state was hastening towards dissolution. The problem then became, to organize the Church so that it would outlast the destruction of the State, and be a saving ark to human society. For this purpose the Church must be one, and in concord with itself. Though not personally intolerant, Ambrosius opposed the spread of heresy in the church with all his might. In 379 he succeeded in establishing an orthodox bishop at Sirmium in spite of the efforts of the Arian empress Justina. In 385-6 he refused to deliver up a basilica in Milan to the empress for Arian worship. These contests with Arianism he has reported himself in his letters to Marcellina (Ep. 20 and 22), and to Valentinian II. (Ep. 21), and in his oration De Basiliis Tradendis. Also with the Roman monk, Jovianus, he had a sharp controversy (Ep. 42). The Church, however, should not only be one and authoritative: it should also be powerful. Paganism must find no support by the state. In the senate-hall in Rome stood an altarpiece for Victory, on which all oaths were taken. Gratian had this altar removed, but in 384 it was restored. At the urgent demand of Ambrosius, Valentinian had it once more removed; but in 389 it was again restored: until, shortly before the death of Ambrosius, Theodosius had it removed forever (Ep. 17 and 18). On the other hand, he opposed the spread of heresy in the State, though interfering with pagan worship. When Gratian ordered the Synagogue to be rebuilt at the expense of the Christiansburnt a synagogue at Calinicum, in Mesopotamia; and Theodosius ordered the synagogue to be rebuilt at the expense of the bishop of the place. In 370 the people of Thessalonica murdered, during a riot, the military governor; and Theodosius did not prevent the soldiers from retaliating with a fearful massacre. In both cases, Ambrosius addressed himself to the emperor, and in the latter he counselled him to make public penance in the Church of Milan (Ep. 51).

Also as a teacher of the Church, Ambrosius exercised a great and beneficial influence; and his writings, though not distinguished by any great originality, are rich in striking practical remarks. Of his dogmatical works the De Mystério reminds the reader of Cyril of Jerusalem, and the works De Fide and De Spiritu Sancto follow Basil very closely. Also his exegetical works are mostly founded on Basil; but they, as well as his sermons, are chiefly characterized by their practical tendency. Among his moral and ascetic works are, De Officialis Ministerii, De Virginitate, De sidus et Galen. His ascetic views of Ambrosius have often been misunderstood. He does not speak against marriage. He places marriage and virginity on a level with each other; but he recommends virginity and separation from the world as an easier and surer way to purity and holiness. In the field of liturgy Ambrosius introduced a comprehensive reform in the church-music (see the article on AMBROSIAN MUSIC), and gave the Church of Milan a new liturgy, which, if it had come down to us without any modifications from the Roman Missale, would have been the oldest liturgy in existence. From Ambrosius we also have a juridical work, Lex Dei sive Monacarum et Romanarum Legum Collectio.

Immediately after his death Ambrosius was interred in the Ambrosian basilica in Milan, under the altar, and between the martyrs Protasius and Gervasius. In 824 his bones were laid in a sarcophagus of porphyry by Archbishop Angilbert II.; and his sarcophagus was found Jan. 18, 1864, though not opened until Aug. 8, 1871 (BIRAGHI: I tre Sepolcri Santambrosiani, Milan, 1864). The best editions of the works of Ambros are: the Benedictine, Paris, 1869-90, often reprinted, e.g., in Migne, PatroL Lat., XIV; and that by Ballerini, Milan, 1875, sqq. The sources of his life are, besides his own works, especially his letters, Augustine’s Confessiones and De Civitate Dei, and the Vita by Paulinus probably dates from the eighth century.

AMBROSE

AMBROSE THE CAMALDULE, or AMBROSIUS CAMALDULENSIS, properly Traversari, b. at Portico, near Florence, in 1538; entered the order of the Camaldules in 1400; became the general of the order in 1431, and distinguished himself as reformer of his order, as legate and supporter of Eugene IV. in Basel, Ferrara, and Florence, as leader of the negotiations for the union of the Greek and Roman Churches, and as a writer. He translated many Greek works into Latin, and wrote himself on history. His letters have considerable interest for the history of his time. S. AMBR. CAM.: Eiusst. et Oration., ed. Canuetus, Florence, 1738, Tom. II.

AMBROSE, ISAAC, Puritan divine, author of Looking unto Jesus; b. 1603–4; d. 1664. He was educated at Oxford, and was vicar of Garstang, when the Act of Uniformity compelled him to leave his charge, and retire to Preston. "As a religious writer he has a vividness and freshness of imagination possessed by scarcely any of the Puritan Non-conformists. He is plainspoken as Flavel, and as intense as Baxter. Many who have no love for Puritan doctrine, nor sympathy with Puritan experience, have appreciated the pathos and beauty of his writings, which have never been out of print from their first edition. The style is another, the treatment of the text is different, many views are in direct opposition to those of Ambrose, and the author's knowledge of Greek is very imperfect, while Ambrose was complete master of that language. Various other authors have been guessed at; but it is entirely in vain to ask who the author is, because the word was used always as an appropriate word (Rom. xvi. 24; 1 Cor. xiv. 19; Col. i. 20). In the Christian Church it was customary to say "amen" to the prayers of the rabbin or pastor. To this day it is also usual in liturgical churches. See WEBER: Comm. in Amen Evangelicum, Jena, 1734.

AMBROSIASTER, or PSEUDO-AMBROSIUS, is the name now applied to the author of those Commentaria in XIII. Epistolam Beati Pauli, which are published among the works of Ambrose. The first who quoted these commentaries over the name of Ambrose was Hinckern of Rheims, about 870; then Ivo of Chartres, d. 1116; then Petrus Lombardus, d. 1160; and Honorius of Autun, d. 1215, supposed the authorship of Ambrose was Erasmus, 1527; and now all agree that they do not belong to him. The style is another, the treatment of the text is different, many views are in direct opposition to those of Ambrose, and the author's knowledge of Greek is very imperfect, while Ambrose was complete master of that language. Various other authors have been guessed at; but it is entirely in vain to ask who the author is, because the work cannot possibly be the product of one single man. The treatment of the several Epistles is wholly different: short and pithy in the Epistle to the Romans, lengthy and vague in the Epistle to the Philemon, and Colossians. And, again, the text of Scripture from which is quoted, varies continually. While Ambrose always quotes from the Itala, the quotations of these commentaries are taken now from the Itala, now from the Vulgate, and sometimes from another version of the Itala than that used by Ambrose. The work is evidently a compilation, of which the oldest part dates from about 380, the commentary on 1 Tim. iii. 15 pointing directly to the time of Damasus; while the latest part dates from about 800, the commentary on Phil. ii. 9–11 containing an allusion to the Adoptionist controversy.

THEOD. PLITT.

AMEN (true, faithful) expresses an energetic affirmation and confirmation of the truth of a statement; accordingly a repetition of the word was the force of a superlative. In the Old Testament "amen" is the public assent to a sentence (Deut. xxvii. 15–26), and to a judge's charge (Num. v. 22); the solemn closing word to several books of the Psalms (Ps. xxvi. 13, lxxvi. 19, lviii. 53, cxvi. 58). It was frequently uttered by Christ, although the Authorized Version generally translates "verily," as in Matt. v. 18; Mark iii. 28; Luke iv. 24. Also by the apostles as an appropriate word (Rom. xvi. 24; Rev. xxii. 20, 21). Jesus calls himself the Amen (Rev. iii. 14). "Amen" has been used as a prayer in the Christian Church it was customary to say "amen" to the prayers of the rabbin or pastor. To this day it is also usual in liturgical churches. See WEBER: Comm. in Amen Evangelicum, Jena, 1734.
AMERICAN AND FOREIGN CHRISTIAN UNION. This society, as its name denotes, is the Union of the "American Protestant Society," founded in 1843; the "Foreign Evangelical Society," instituted in 1839 as the expansion of the "French Association" of 1835; and the "Christian Alliance" of 1842. The A. and F. C. U. was organized May 10, 1849, to do in a more efficient way the work of the three societies named, which was to convert Roman Catholics, or to quote its constitution, "by missions, colportage, the press, and other appropriate agencies, to diffuse the principles of religious liberty, and a pure and evangelical Christianity, both at home and abroad, where a corrupted Christianity exists." The society was for a number of years very prosperous, and spread its influence over Europe, North and South America, and the adjacent islands. From 1849 to 1859 its yearly receipts averaged $60,000. But it was compelled gradually to contract its operations. It withdrew from France in 1886, from Italy and Europe, and other foreign stations generally, in 1873. Quite recently, however, it has begun work on an important scale for the evangelization of France (1880). The Christian World, its monthly organ, gives a summary of news about Roman Catholicism, and the work done to evangelize the adherents of the Papal Church.

See the April number (1880) of The Christian World for a historical sketch of the thirty-years' work of the Union; and the June number of the same year, for the annual report.

AMES, William, b. at Norfolk, Eng., 1576; d. in Rotterdam, Nov. 14, 1633; educated in Christ's College, Cambridge; was appointed chaplain to the University, but being a rigid Puritan, and without hope of preferment in the Church of England, and having given great offence by a sermon on the irregularities of the students, he left his native country, settled at Leyden, and was by Sir Horatio Vere, commander of the English troops in the Netherlands, and a great patron of the Puritans, made preacher to the garrison in the Hague. He immediately entered into the Arminian controversy, and published De Arminianorum Scholastica, 1613; De Arminis Sententia, 1616; and Coronis ad Collationem Hagiensem, etc., 1018. Shortly after the opening of the Synod of Dort in 1618, Sir Horatio Vere was compelled by episcopal intrigues to dismiss Ames: but the States gave him a pension to settle at Dort and assist the president of the synod, and in 1622 he was appointed professor of theology in the Academy of Franeker by the influence of Prince Maurice. In 1629 he published Medulla Theologiae, and in 1634 De Conscientia, his principal works, the former dogmatical, the latter ethical, and though on Protestant ground, and with a sound practical purpose, a continuation of the old scholastic science of casuistry. Of his other works, which, both in Latin and English, enjoyed a great reputation, especially in the Netherlands, are Puritanismus Anglicanus, 1610; Anti-Synodalia, 1629, against the Remonstrants; Bellarminus Enervatus, against the Romanists; and A Fresh Suit against Ceremonies in God's Worship, 1634, which latter book made a Non-conformist out of Richard Baxter. Shortly before his death he removed to Rotterdam, as pastor of the English church of the Brownists (Independents), there. He had great influence, though an Englishman, upon Continental thought, and under his Latinized name, AMEsi us, is well known on the Continent today. A collected edition of his Latin works was published in five volumes at Amsterdam, 1658. See Neal: History of Puritans, I.; Brooks: Lives of Puritans, II.

AMLING, Wolfgang, b. at Münnerstadt, Franconia, in 1542; d. at Zerbst, May 18, 1606; studied at the universities of Tübingen, Wittenberg, and Jena; was appointed rector of the school of Zerbst in 1566, minister at Koswig in 1573, and, shortly after, minister at St. Nicolai in Zerbst, and superintendent. He was vehemently opposed to the formula concordia, which stood at the head of the movement which led the population of Anhalt from Lutheranism to Calvinism. His adherents were called the Amlinges. He wrote the Confessio Antiochii.

AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, a native of Antioch, pursued, while a youth, philosophical and rhetorical studies; entered the army under Constantius, accompanied Julian in the war against the Persians, and took part under his successors in the wars both of the Orient and the Occident; but retired afterwards to Rome, devoted himself to historical studies, and died there about 378; but the first thirteen of the thirty-one books are lost. The remainder, beginning with the year 353, is of great interest for the history of the Christian Church, as it gives much valuable information, not only of the general state of the Church, but of many important particulars: the character of Julian, his proceedings, etc. The best edition is that by Wagner in three volumes, Leipzig, 1808. An English translation was published by Philemon Holland, London, 1609. The question, whether Ammianus was a Christian or not, has often been mooted. Claud. Chifflet, De Ammiani M. viva, etc., Livon., 1627, answers in the affirmative; Guili. Ad. Cart, Questiones Ammianae, Berol., 1668, pp. 23-42, in the negative. The general opinion is, however, that he was not a Christian. The question of Ammianus, Christianity as an outsider, reporting and explaining; and the sympathy and appreciation he shows the natural results of his religious standpoint,—a vague deism, to which a sublimated dogma of inspiration as a Jewish conceit, and makes common-sense the test of revealed truth. But in 1817 he completely surprised his readers by his Bittere Arzneifür die Glaubensschwäche der Zeit, a defence of the famous Theses of Claus Harms. His engagement in Dresden had brought him in rather perplexing relations with the minister Einsiedel, who was influenced by the Moravian Brethren, and as Schleiermacher expresses it, "So lawven the boat, so winds the eu." But the revolution of 1830 compelled Einsiedel to retire; and in 1833 Ammon published Fort-bildung des Christenthumszur Weltreligion, 4 vols.; the current had poured back to its old bed. In 1842 followed Leben Jesu; in 1849, Die wahre und falsche Orthodoxie, etc.; but these later works failed to attract any interest in the theological world.

AMONITEN. The descendants of Ammon, the incestuous son of the younger daughter of Lot, Ben-ammi, "my folkson," to indicate that he was of no strange father (Gen. xix. 35). The name appears upon the Assuan inscriptions, first under Shalmaneser II. (B.C. 858–823), and under Assur-haddon (B.C. 681–668), as part of the three peoples allied to the Israelites by blood and speech, which formed the barrier on the south-east to the wild tribes of the desert. By destroying the Zamzummim, they occupied land spreading from the Arnon River to the Jabbock and the Jordan. They were territorially, as well as by blood, related to the Moabites, and shared with them in fortunes. They appear together, as hiring Balaam (Judg. xi. 34). For their conduct in joining Moab to hire Balaam they were excluded from the citizenship in Israel, but not from political privileges (Deut. xxiii. 3, 4; Neh. xiii. 2, 46; Neh. xiii. 2, 46; Neh. xiii. 2, 46). Their army was subdued by David, who, in revenge for their incursions, drove out the Amorites, and the Ammonites occupied their territories. They were occupied this territory (Num. xxi. 21–26), which, though small, was rich, as is evidenced by the abundant harvests (2 Chron. xxvii. 5; Ezek. xxvii. 17; cf. xxv. 4).

The Ammonites were the foes of Israel. In religion they were gross idolaters; their god was Molech or Milcom (1 Kings xi. 3, 7), which was substantially the same as Chemosh (Judg. xi. 33). For their conduct in joining Moab to hire Balaam they were repulsed with great slaughter by Jephthah (Jud. xi. 33) and Saul (1 Sam. xi. 11, xiv. 47). David avenged upon them the insult offered to his ambassadors; their capital, Rabbah, was destroyed, and the Ammonites subjected (2 Sam. xx. 5–31). In Jehoshaphat's reign they fled, and the Moabites rebelled; but so utter was their overthrow that it took three days to collect the spoil (2 Chron. xx.). They were obliged to pay tribute to Uzziah and to Jotham (2 Chron. xxvi. 5, xxvii. 5). They took advantage of the overthrow of Israel to take the cities of Gad (Jer. xlix. 1–6; Zeph. ii. 8, 9). They made common cause with the Chaldeans and Syrians against Jehoiakim (2 Kings xxiv. 2). Wherefore Jeremiah and Ezekiel in their prophecies declare against them (Jer. ix. 25 sq., xxv. 21, xxvii. 2; Ezek. xxvi. 15 sq.); and after the destruction of Jerusalem their king Baalis employed Ishmael to murder Gedaliah, in order to hinder the reconstruction of the Jewish state (2 Kings xxv. 25; Jer. xi. 14). They opposed Nehemiah (Neh. iv. 7). Judas Maccabees had to fight many battles with them till they were discomfited (1 Mac. v. 7). They shared with the Jews the change of masters, from Greek to Egyptian and to Syrian lords. An Hellenic colony, named Philadelphia, after Ptolemy Phildadelphus, was made out of their capital city Rabba. This city enjoyed great splendor for a while, and fell under the Romans as part of the province of Syria, B.C. 64. Justin Martyr (d. 166) mentions the Ammonites as in his day a numerous people. But afterwards they are lost to sight, becoming a part of the general Arab population. FR. W. SHULTZ.

AMONIUS of Alexandria, the teacher of Origen; who, about the middle of the third century, prepared a harmony of the Gospels, or a Diates-seron, in which he divided the Gospels into sections, to this day known as the Ammonian sections, and found indicated upon most MSS. See BIBLE TEXT, New Testament. A translation of this Diatesseron into Latin was made by Victor, Bishop of Capua (d. 544), and has often been reprinted, e.g., Mayence, 1524, and by Migne. Eusebius (H. E. vi. 19) mentions his work, The Harmony of Moses and Jesus, but this is entirely lost. See next below. AMONIUS, called Saccas (a sack), because in his youth he was a porter, and therefore carried sacks; lived in Alexandria in the second century, and became the founder of the Alexandrian school of philosophy. Plotinus and Longinus were among his disciples, but he wrote no books. Porphyry tells of him that he was born of Christian parents, but deserted Christianity; and when Eusebius (H. E. vi. 19) denies this statement, he seems to mistake Ammonius Saccas, the pagan eclectic, the reconciliator of Plato and Aristotle, for the Christian philosopher of the same name, who is mentioned above. See AMMONIUS.

AMOLO, or AMULO, educated in the school of Lyons under the tuition of Agobard, and, since 840, his successor in the archi-episcopal chair; d. 852; represents the strong hierarchical views of his time, but seems to have been entirely free from its credulity and superstition. A peculiar case of relic-worship and its effects was laid before him by Bishop Theutbold of Langres; and without hesitation, he designated it as a piece of fraud and avarice (M. Bibl., T. XIV., f. 324). He also wrote against the Jews, and against Godchalk (M. Bibl., T. XIV., f. 332–336).

AMPHIBALUM, a word of Greek origin, but used only by Gallican writers, was the name of a peculiar kind of casula, without sleeves and with a hood, which the Gallican clergy of the eighth and ninth centuries wore in offices of holy ministration.

AMON (the hidden). 1. An Egyptian and also a Lybian and Ethiopic divinity, originally and particularly worshipped in Upper Egypt, and had his principal temple in Thebes (No-Amon, the dwelling of Amon) with a numerous and learned priesthood; here was also a famous oracle: both destroyed by Cambyses. The divinities of the nature-religions are related to light as the source of fruit and life. The Egyptians distinguished between Amon, as the original sun-power personified was called in Upper Egypt, but Ptah, in Lower Egypt, or Ra, the general name, and Osiris, the representative of the beneficent activity of the sun; i.e., they distinguished between the sun and the effects of the sun. But Amon was not allowed to stand alone. He was the head of the Theban triad, associated with Mut, i.e., the original material out of which he came and upon which his power was exerted, and Khonsu, or Ammon. Under the name of Amon-Ra he eventually became the great god of all Egypt. He was addressed as "the King of all gods," as "the husband of his mother, his own father, and his own son," as "the beneficent and lovely, but also the invincible foe and destroyer of evil." The Greeks identified him with Zeus. In later times he occupied a higher place, and was worshipped as the all-destroying and all-disposing divine Intelligence. As Amon Num, the binding one, i.e., day and night, in the Great Oasis and in the temple of Jupiter Amon, he was represented with a ram's head; but generally as a man clad in a linen tunic, gathered about the waist by a belt. In one hand he holds the symbol of life, in the other the staff of authority; and on his head is a cap with two high plumes. He was also worshipped as Amen-Ra-Ka mut-ef, "Amen-Ra, who is both male and female," or the generative principle. In the latter form he is accompanied by sacred trees, similar to the "groves" of the Old Testament; and thus he is connected with Baal.

2. The son and successor of Manasses, and king of Judah B.C. 643-611 (642-610), cf. 2 Kings xxix. 19-26; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 21-25. He was twenty years old when he began to reign, and he reigned two years. Zephaniah's prophecy contains a saddening picture of the times. Amon feared himself to commit iniquity. He worshipped the host of heaven, reveling in the grossest idolatry. At last his own servants slew him, and with Josiah issued a better day for Judah.

4. The name of an ancestor mentioned in Neh. vii. 39.

FR. W. SCHULTZ.

AMORITES (inhabitants of the high lands). The name distinguishes them from the Canaanites, the "inhabitants of the low lands," and the Perizzites, the "inhabitants of the flat lands." The Amorites (the word is, however, always singular in the Hebrew) were one of the chief Canaanitish tribes. The description of their size and strength given by Amos ii. 9, need not be taken literally, but was probably an echo of the spies' report (Num. xiii. 32, 33). At one time the Amorite territory took in "all Gilead and Bashan" (Deut. iii. 10), but it varied; thus in Abrahan's time it was about the Dead Sea; shortly before the exodus, the Amorites crossed over the East Jordan country, and, when the Israelites invaded the land, they inhabited that fertile district bounded by the Arnon, the Jabok, and the Jordan. They opposed the Israelites, but were defeated (Deut. iv. 30), and their territory divided between them and Gad, and the half tribe Manassseh (Josh. xiii. 8 sq.). The Gideonites, inhabitants of an Amorite city, contrived, through fraud, to avert from themselves the doom which fell upon their clansmen (Josh. xix.). Joshua fought and defeated five Amorite kings (Josh. x. 5). They were so successfully exterminated as a tribe, that they never again were numerous and powerful, and are rarely mentioned.

AMORTIZATION. See MORTMAIN.

AMOS (a bearer), the third of the minor prophets, originally a herdsman and farmer of Tekoa, a town twelve miles south-south-east from Jerusalem (vii. 10), and destitute of a prophetical education. Although thus a native of Judah, under divine inspiration he prophesied against the sins of the northern kingdom. The Fathers wrongly identified him with the father of Isaiah (Amoz), because his name in the LXX. is identical with that of Isaiah's father. Amos prophesied in the northern kingdom some time between 807 and 769, during the reigns of Uzziah in Judah (807-755) and Jeroboam II. in Israel (822-786), when Israel was at the very height of its splendid prosperity. His prophecies were apparently all given in one year, specified as "two years before the earthquake," a momentous but undisputable event. His plain speaking led to the charge of conspiracy against the government, because he alienated the people; and therefore he was compelled to return to Judah (vii. 10-17). Nothing more is known of him.

The Book of Amos, after the opening verse, is divisible into three parts. I. chaps. i. 2-ii. 16. The judgments of God upon Damascus (vs. 3-5), Philistia (vs. 6-8), Tyre (vs. 9, 10), Edom (vs. 11, 12), Ammon (vs. 13-15), Moab (ii. 1-3), and Judah (vs. 4-6). Israel (vs. 6-16). II. chaps. iii.-ivi. Three discourses upon Israel's wickedness. 1. chap. iii.; 2. chap. iv.; 3. chaps. v., vi. 3 is divisible into three parts. (a) v. 1-17, (b) 18-27, (c) chap. vi. In these discourses he sets forth in his usual rhetorical manner the moral and religious degeneracy of the people, and the impending judgment (iv. 1, vi. 4-6, 8); their uncleanness and viciousness (ii. 7), their righteousness and dishonesty (iii. 9, 10, iv. 1, v. 7, 11, 12, cf. ix. 4-6), their idolatry (v. 26), and especially the union of calf-worship and the Jehovah cultus at Bethel, Gilgal,
AMPHILOCHIUS.

Great and Gregory Nazianzen, he lived in very intimate intercourse, and it is from notices in their works we know what we know with certainty of him; his life, as given in Migne, Patr. Graec. xxxix. p. 14, being a mere monkish fiction. The year of his death is uncertain, but falls after 382, as in this year Jerome published his De Vir. Ill., in which Amphilochnus is mentioned (133) as still living. His day is given both in the Greek and Latin calendars as Nov. 23. Of the works ascribed to him, some are decidedly spurious; thus the legendary biography of Basil would not have been written by a friend and contemporary of him. Others are of doubtful authenticity. They have all been collected, together with fragments of works which are lost, and edited by CAMBESIUS, Paris, 1644. Genuine is the Epistola Synodica in defence of the orthodox conception of the Holy Trinity (COTTELIER: Mon. eccl. gr., T. II.; and THILIO: Bib. pat. gr. dogmat., vol. II.).

AMSDORF, Nikolaus von, b. Dec. 3, 1483; d. May 14, 1563; studied theology in Wittenberg, and was appointed pastor in Magdeburg, 1523, bishop of Naumburg-Zeitz, 1541, and superintendent in Eisenach, 1548. He was one of Luther's staunchest adherents and most intimate friends, accompanied him to Worms, knew of his abdication to the Wartburg, received him in his house on his secret visits to Wittenberg, partook in the translation of the Bible, was consecrated bishop by him Jan. 20, 1542, and superintended the Jena edition of his works. He was a man of sharp but narrow understanding, somewhat harsh and unyielding, and in his polemics he often overleaped the goal. Thus in a controversy with Menius he was led to say, in a pamphlet reprinted in Baumgarten, Geschichte der Religionsparteien, 1172–78, that good works were detrimental to salvation. After the death of Luther he became completely estranged from Melanchthon and the Wittenbergers. A biography by I. Meier is found in MEYER: Leben d. Altertür d. luth. Kirche, vol. III.

Consist of gems or small bits of some natural object,—for instance, a root, or tickets of parchment or metal,—inscribed with some word or sentence of Holy Writ, or with some magical sign, and are worn on a string generally around the neck, as a means of protection against witchery, ill-luck, etc. The word first occurs in Pliny, Nat. Hist. 29, 4; 19; 30, 15; 47; and is derived by some from the Latin amoliri, "to avert," by others, from the Arab hamalat, "to carry." The superstition was almost universal in ancient times, and especially among Eastern people. It arose naturally from the idea that human life is influenced by the stars, by spirits, etc.; and, where there is a belief in witchcraft, there must also be a belief in the remedy against it. Among the Jews amulets were much used, though the law forbade them, and the whole spirit of the Old Testament excludes the idea on which they rest. Nevertheless the Jews were firm believers in, and skilful makers of, amulets of all kinds, from the idolatrous earrings which Jacob hid under the oak at Shechem (Gen. xxxv. 18), to the cabalistic signs in the "David's shield" and "Solomon's seal." Also among the Christians the superstition crept in; and the Council of Trullo excommunicated the makers of...
AMYOT, Joseph, b. at Toulon, 1718; entered the order of the Jesuits, and went in 1750 as a missionary to China, where he labored forty-four years, and died in Peking, 1794. He wrote a life of Confucius, Paris, 1789, a Manchou-Tartar dictionary, and a Manchou-Tartar grammar, and gave much valuable and interesting information on Chinese customs, laws, religion, and history, in Lettres Édifiantes et Curieuses.

AMYRAUT, Moïse (Moses Amyraldus), b. at Bourgueil, 1590; d. at Saumur, 1664; descended from a distinguished family belonging to the Reformed Church, and studied jurisprudence at Poitiers, but was, by the reading of Calvin's Institutio, induced to devote himself to the study of theology, and entered the academy of Saumur. Appointed professor here in 1633, together with Josué de la Place (Placaeus) and Louis Cappel (Cappellus), he soon brought the academy in a most flourishing condition, and students from foreign countries, especially from Switzerland, gathered to its halls. The teaching of the academy, however, was somewhat out of the common routine, and, in dogmatic respects, the time was very irritable. It was believed, especially in Switzerland, that Amyraut's exposition of the doctrines of grace and predestination differed materially from the formulas of the Synod of Dort. His Traité de la Predestination, published in 1634, caused a great sensation, and was fiercely attacked by Pierre du Moulin (Molinaeus), professor in the orthodox academy of Sedan, by André Rivet of Leyden, and others. Formally accused of heresy at the national synod of Alençon, 1637, and again in that of Charenton, 1644, he was both times acquitted; but the controversy was, nevertheless, kept up, especially by Friedrich Spanheim of Leyden, and he was accused and acquitted a third time, in the synod of Loudun, 1659. Though most of the prominent French divines, even Pierre du Moulin, in course of time, became reconciled to him, the Swiss students were recalled from Saumur, and the last symmetrical work of the Reformed Church, the Formula Consensus, was drawn up against his views in Geneva, 1673. His works relating to this controversy, besides the above-mentioned, are the Examenillon de la Doctrine de Calvin sur la Predestina tion, 1637; De la Justification, 1638; De Pro videntia Dei in Malo, 1638; Défense I. Calvin. Doctrine de Absolut. Reprob. Decreto, 1641; Dissertationes Theologicae Quatuor, 1643; Declaratio Fidei contra Errorem Arminian., 1646; Disputatio de Libero Arbitrio, 1647; and Specimen Ani matorum, 1648 (1,896 pages!), directed especially against Spanheim. ANABAPTISTS (from the Greek ἀνα, "again," and βάπτισσαι, "to baptize") is the name of a violent, mystical sect which, representing the deepest-going radicalism, broke away from the general reformatory movement of the sixteenth century, and soon became lost in fanaticism and excess. The general character is an absolute break with the existing order of things, ecclesiastical, political, and social. While the Reformers wished everywhere to respect the forms of real life, wanting only to correct, improve and develop, with the Bible as their guide, the Anabaptists rejected every thing they found established in Church or State, and proposed to create an entirely new order according to their own inspirations. But the special point from which they started was a rejection of infant-baptism, on the ground that an infant is unable to assume the responsibility of the sacrament. Questions concerning the proper administration of baptism had already, before this time, appeared in the history of the Christian Church. During the third and fourth centuries there were people who declared baptism invalid when performed by a heretic. In this form, however, the question soon died out, while, as a doubt with respect to the validity of infant-baptism, it reappeared every now and then during the middle ages. In the sixteenth century it then became the watchword of, and gave the name to, one of the wildest and fiercest sects ever bred within the pale of the Christian Church.

The sect originated in Zwickau in Saxony. Here Thomas Münzer gathered a great crowd, especially of mechanics, by his fanatical preaching; and, in conventicles, the members boasted of divine revelations, and spoke openly of the overthrow of the whole social order. Expelled from Zwickau, some of the adherents of Münzer attempted to get a foothold even in the very centre of the Reformation, in Wittenberg. Nikolaus Storch and two others appeared there as prophets (the so-called Zwickauer prophets) sent by God to preach the truth. Not to the letter, but to the spirit, should one listen; infant-baptism must be rejected, as only personal faith can save; God is now about to found a new holy congregation, etc. The powerful preaching of Luther, however, soon destroyed the impression they made; and Münzer now endeavored to realize his radical ideas in Mühlhausen, at that time a free city of Thuringia, till the massacre at Frank enhausen put an end to the whole movement. The adherents of Münzer, however, did not practice re-baptism, and did not form a congregation; but they all wore the marks of a peculiarly sombre mysticism, speaking of the "bitter" Christ as the example to follow, and scolding Luther as an easy-going fraud.

Quite another character the sect exhibited in Switzerland. Several of Zwingle's co-workers, Wilhelm Reublin, Simon Stumpf, Ludwig Hetozer, Felix Manz, and Konrad Grebel, gradually separated from him and the congregation, and began to worship in private houses surrounded by crowds of excited mechanics. The apostolic congregation was the ideal of these sectaries, an ideal with which the state-establishment of Zwingle's church did not harmonize; and the formation of a congregation of true Christians in strict accordance with this ideal became an object most ardently pursued. Soon arose a of the validity of infant baptism: some parents refused to have their children baptized; the magistrate threatened with expulsion; and, just in this moment of excitement and anxiety, Jacob Blaurock, a former monk from Chur, asked Grebel, at one of the meetings, to give him the true Christian baptism. Blaurock then baptized others; and thus the First Anabaptist congregation was formed, re-baptization being the common bond between its members. The general character, however, of this whole movement, was peaceful, in spite of the prevailing excitement. Nobody thought of carrying out the new ideas by force. In striking contrast to the Munster uproar, meekness and sufferings were here understood as the most essential elements of the Christian ideal. From Switzerland the movement spread to Southern Germany. Zealously propagated by its itinerant missionaries, it found, during the general excitement and fermentation of the times, ready acceptance, especially among the lower classes, though also among the higher. Augsburg, Nuremberg, and Nicholasburg in Moravia, became its centres.

Then began the persecution in autumn, 1527, both from the Roman-Catholic and Protestant side. Most of the leaders were killed, hundreds of the members were expelled, thrown into dungeons, and massacred. This persecution was followed by an inner transformation of the whole spirit of the movement. A few of Munzer's adherents who had escaped at Frankenhausen brought the ideas of a social revolution to the Anabaptists of Southern Germany; and, though at first rebuked, the fiery spirit soon found foothold. Apocalyptic dreams, expectations of a divine judgment near at hand and full of revenge, and finally the ideas of establishing the kingdom of heaven by means of the sword, took hold of men's minds, and caused unspeakable confusion, and even great danger. Melchior Hoffman appeared in Strassburg as the prophet of the Anabaptists, spreading the speedy establishment of the kingdom of New Zion. In Munster John of Leyden (Johann Bochhold, sive title) gained supremacy, actually assumed the title of king, and led the population into the most frightful excesses. At many other places in Germany and Holland, great disturbances took place. The grapple with the secular power was short, however, and fearful revenge was taken. The movement was completely suppressed; and the few members who were left scattered about in various places were organized into small congregations by Menno Simons. ANACLETUS is the name of two popes.— ANACLET II. (Peter Leoni), Feb. 14, 1130–Jan. 25, 1138, descended from a wealthy Jewish family, and spent, successfully, his fortune on his ambition. After the death of Honorius II., one party declared for the cardinal-deacon Gregory (Innocent II.), and another for the cardinal-presbyter Peter Leoni (Anacletus II.); and by using his own enormous resources as well as the treasures of the Church for bribery, the latter succeeded in gaining over the lower clergy and the populace of Rome. Innocent II. was expelled from Rome, and fled to France; but by the powerful aid of Bernard of Clairvaux he was recognized only by the city of Milan and King Roger of Sicily. Lothar of Germany made two campaigns to Italy, 1133 and 1136, to unseat him; and the last time he was accompanied by Bernard, who succeeded in separating not only the city of Milan, but also many of the most prominent Roman families, from his party. Even with Roger negotiations were opened. But at this moment Anacletus II. died. R. ZÖPPFEL.

ANAM'MELECH, a divinity in whose worship, as in that of ADRAMELECH, which see, the Sephardites burnt their children (2 Kings xvii. 31). In the Assyrian inscriptions the name is Anu-malikt, = King Anu. In the Babylonian-Assyrian pantheon, Anu occupied the first place in the first triad, Anu, Bel, Ninurta. It is not at present decided whether the gods of the first triad represent the powers of nature, as those of the other triads do. Perhaps they were heavenly or sun divinities; at all events, there is mention of the "wide heavens of the god Anu" (George Smith, Assyrian Discoveries, 1875, p. 339). Nor is the description of him upon the inscriptions as a "fish-god" against such a designation, because the heavenly divinities were also the marine, with many peoples, inasmuch as the heavens were thought to be a sea joining with the earthly ocean: thus the Hindoo divinity Varuna (= Vis-

NAME) was a sea-god. Anu is represented as a man who bears a fish's head for a tiara, and along his back the fish's body. He is identical with the Oceanus of Berosus, who, half-man and half-fish, at daybreak arose from the sea, and began his instruction of men in science and art, but at night returned to the sea; even as the sun was fancied to sail through the ocean at night as it sails through the heavens.

The female divinity corresponding to Anu was Anatuv. The name is found in the Old Testament towns Beth-anath (Josh. xix. 38; Judg. i. 33) or Beth-anoth (Josh. xv. 56), i.e., the "house of Anath;" also in the proper name Anath (Judg. iii. 31, v. 6). See Berosus. See Warburton, 1829, pp. 124–127. The name appears as 'įnmā' upon Greek-Phoenician inscriptions. Upon Phoenician coins Anatuv is drawn as riding upon a

ANANIAS (the Greek form of Hananiah, whom Jehovah has graciously given). The name of three persons mentioned in the Acts. 1. The Jewish Christian of Damascus, who, with his wife Sapphira was miraculously killed for lying unto God, in trying to conceal the real selling of property nominally consecrated (Acts v. 1–11). 2. The Jewish Christian of Damascus who visited Saul in his blindness, and restored his sight, and baptized him (Acts ix. 10–18). 3. A Jewish high-priest, appointed by Herod of Chalcis, A.D. 48; sent to Rome to answer a charge of oppression preferred by the Samaritans, but was acquitted, and returned A.D. 52. Paul was tried before him, A.D. 58; and accused him before Felix and Festus. He was deposed, A.D. 59, and was murdered, A.D. 67. (Josephus: Antiq. xx. 5, 2; vi. 2; Jewish War, ii. 17, 9.)

ANAPHORA (Ἀναφορά, which is that is lifted up, offering) corresponds in the Greek liturgy to the canon missae in the Latin, and denotes that part of the eucharistic Office which includes the consecration of the elements and the oblation. Books containing the whole celebration of the holy eucharist are also sometimes called Anaphoras, as, for instance, that by Johannes, bishop of Bostra, Arabia; d. 650. See Renaudot: Collections of Oriental Liturgies, 1716, vol. II.

ANASTASIUS, whose true name was Astric, b. in France in 854; d. in Hungary, Sept. 10, 1044; entered the order of the Benedictines at Rouen; went to Rome; accompanied Adalbert to Prague; was considered a heretic by all ecclesiastical writers.—Anastasius III., 911–913, a native of Rome; but Marcella, a friend of Jerome, now arraigned him before Anastasius for him of introducing heresies; and the pope condemned the works of Origen, and broke off all ecclesiastical communication with Rufinus, though the latter sent in a perfectly orthodox confession.—Anastasius II., Nov. 496–Nov. 498, a native of Rome, was very anxious to end the schism which the monophysite controversy had caused between the Eastern and Western churches. The situation was this: in 482, the emperor Zeno issued the Henotikon which denied the authority of the synod of Chalcedon; and, two years later, on the pope, Felix II. (or III.), communicated the patriarch of Constantinople, Acacius, because he had sanctioned that decree. Anastasius II. now sent two bishops to the emperor with letters declaring himself willing to recognize the consecrations which Acacius had performed. On the condition that his name (Acacius) should not be mentioned in the crowd; and at the same time Photinus, deacon of Thessalonica, arrived at Rome, and was very friendly received by the pope, though he held the views of Acacius, and consequently was a heretic in the eyes of Rome. The Liber Pontificalis states that, in this point, the clergy disagreed with the pope, and even withdrew their allegiance to his authority; and from Gratian, who, in a decree, designated Anastasius II. as “one thrown off by the Church,” and down to the sixteenth century, he was considered a heretic by all ecclesiastical writers.—Anastasius III., 911–913, a native of Rome. —Anastasius IV., July 11, 1153–Dec. 3, 1153, remained in Rome as the vicar of Innocent II., when the latter fled to France. In his short reign he succeeded in ending a harassing controversy with Friedrich I., concerning the appointment to the archiepiscopal see of Magdeburg, in Saxony. In his mission, and brought back a crown of gold, and a bull conferring on Stephan the title of the Apostle of Hungary, and acknowledging him as the head of the Hungarian Church.

ANASTASIUS SINAITA. It is a question whether, according to Nicephorus and his followers, there was only one of this name, or whether, according to some recent critics, there were several. According to Nicephorus, Anastasius lived as a hermit, on Mount Sinai; was elected bishop and patriarch of Antioch; was banished in 572 on account of his opposition to the doctrine of the incorruptibility of the body of Christ, and d. in 599. Among the works ascribed to him are: Anagogicae contemplationes in divinis officiis, lib. XI. (in Magna Bibli., Patr. Colon., Tom. VI., P. I.; Book XII. has been edited by Allix, London, 1841); and òðµως ðεν δει ποτε δει ναόν ανηρρειρους (in Archiep. ed. Greuter, Ingolstadt, 1806, in which the doctrine of the incorruptibility of the body of Christ is attacked. These works, however, are sometimes ascribed to another Sinaite hermit of the same name, who, according to some, d. before 606, according to others after 678. There is still a third Anastasius Sinaita who succeeded the first, and was slain by the Jews in a riot in 609.

ANASTASUS is the name of four popes, and one antipope.—Anastasius I., 398–402. Under Siricius, Rufinus of Aquileia had translated Origen's κατα τούτον, and introduced the work in Rome; but Jerome, a friend of Jerome, now arraigned him before Anastasius for him of introducing heresies; and the pope condemned the works of Origen, and broke off all ecclesiastical communications with Rufinus, though the latter sent in a perfectly orthodox confession. —Anastasius II., Nov. 496–Nov. 498, a native of Rome, was very anxious to end the schism which the monophysite controversy had caused between the Eastern and Western churches. Properly anything laid up or suspended, and synonymous with avanua, from divaríðmu (denotes lasI. He d. in 886. See Migne, PatroL Tom., of biographies of the popes, from Peter to Nicolaus). His work on the paschal question, a fragment has been preserved by Eusebius (Hist. eccles., VII. 32). The Latin translation of the entire work, Canon Paschalis, published by Agüíns Bucherus, Amsterdam, 1664, has been proved spurious by Ideler (Handbuch der Chronologie). Some fragments of his mathematical works were published in Paris, in 1543.

ANASTASIUS was a presbyter of Antioch, and accompanied Nestorius to Constantinople in 428. He was a friend, or, as Theophanes calls him, the syncelus, that is, confidential secretary, of Nestorius; and it was he who caused the jealousy and rivalry which existed between the schools of Antioch and Alexandria to burst forth in open hostilities, by his attack on one of the favorite terms of the Alexandrian theology, Mary the mother of God." In a sermon he said, "Let no one call Mary Μορφή. She was but a human being. It is impossible for God to be born of a human being." Proclus, the representative of the Alexandrian theology in Constantinople, and the unsuccessful competitor of Nestorius for the patriarchate, made a furious attack on Anastasius. Nestorius placed himself by the side of his friend, and the controversy began. It seems, however, from one of Cyril's letters (Epist. VIII.), that Anastasius in 430 made an attempt to reconcile Nestorius and Cyril. After the banishment of the former, he still labored for his cause in Constantinople. The date of his death is not known.

ANASTASIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, was a native of Alexandria, and came to Constantinople as the apocrisiarius of bishop Dioscurus, and was, through his influence with the emperor, made patriarch in 449, after the deposition of Flavian by the Robber-synod. He presided over the synod of Chalcedon together with the Roman legates; and by the famous canon XXVI. he obtained rank of patriarch and next the bishop of Rome, extension of his jurisdiction to the dioceses of Pontus, Asia, and Thrace, right to ordain bishops in barbaric countries, etc. On his accession to the patriarchal see, he had shown great adroitness in destroying every suspicion with respect to his orthodoxy; and he now proved himself equally dexterous in calming down the jealousies of Rome. He d. in 458. A letter by him to Leo I. is still extant (Com. T. IV., p. 903).

ANASTASIUS, abbot of St. Maria Trans-Tibéline in Rome, and librarian of the Vatican, was present at the Council of Constantinople, in 863, and translated its canons into Latin. He is also the author of an Historia ecclesiastica, mostly extracted from Nicephorus and Syncellus, and of the so-called Liber pontificalis (see title), a series of biographies of the popes, from Peter to Nicolaus. He d. in 899. See Migne, PatroL Tom., 127. 8. 9.

ANATHEMA (ἀναθήμα), in the Greek classics synonymous with ἀφόρνα, from ἀφόρνοι, denotes properly any thing laid up or suspended, and then any thing placed apart in the temples, and consecrated to the gods. In the New Testament ἀφόρονα corresponds to the Hebrew ἁγιόν, and is the proper term for excommunication (1 Cor. xvi. 22), implying an exclusion, not only from the sacraments and the congregation, but also from the grace of God, consequently a direct delivering-up of the person to Satan (1 Cor. v. 5), which last idea is prominent in Gal. i. 8, and Rom. ix. 3. The term, and the ideas connected with it, were adopted by the language and usage of the Church. The Council of Elvira, 305, can. 52, and the Council of Laodicea, 307, can. 29, apply it to offences against the Church; and the Council of Nicea, 325, lays the anathema on any one who holds or teaches the Arian view of the relation between the Father and the Son. In later ecclesiastical practice this anathema was the heaviest form of excommunication, the excommunicatio major, as appears from the acts of numerous councils, especially from those of the Council of Trent.

ANATOLIUS, b. in Alexandria, about 239; d. about 292. He was the successor in 269 of Eusebius, bishop of Laodicea, in Syria Prima. Eusebius the historian (II. E., VII., 32) says that he attained the highest eminence in mathematics, philosophy, and rhetoric. He journeyed about 264 from Alexandria to Cæsarea in Palestine, and was there ordained, and made bishop-coadjutor of Theoctenus; but on passing through Laodicea he was constrained to become bishop there. Eusebius says, that, although he did not write much, he left a solid reputation for eloquence and erudition; and gives us an extract of Anatolius' work on the Paschal Festival. What purported to be a Latin version of this work was published by Bucherus: Doct. Temp. Antw. 1633, but Ideler (Handb. der Chronologie, ii. 266) pronounces it a forgery. Fragments of a work upon mathematics have been published, Paris, 1543; and by Fabricius: Bibl. Graeca, iii. 402.

ANATOLIUS, bishop of Constantinople, consecrated 449; d. 458, after being the "apocrisiarius" (see title) of Dioscurus, patriarch of Alexandria, at Constantinople. He found his new position by no means easy. He was more than once accused of heresy, of ambition, of injustice; but, notwithstanding, seems to have been innocent of the more serious charges. The Council of Chalcedon, held at his request in part, in its twenty-eighth canon declared that equal dignity be ascribed to Constantinople as to Rome; because it was the New Rome, and the seat of government. Hefele: Conciliengeschichte, 2d vol., p. 509. Anatolius crowned the Emperor Leo, the first performance of the ceremony (Gibbon: in loco). He was best known as the author of some very sweet hymns, particularly one call Mary Μορφή. She was but a human being. It is impossible for God to be born of a human being. ANCHIETA, José de, the Apostle of Brazil. b. at Laguna, 1539; d. at Revitibia, June 9, 1587; entered the Society of Jesus, 1550; went to Brazil as a missionary in 1553, and labored with great success among the Brazilian Indians, of whose language he gave an admirable grammar, 1595.

ANCHORITES or ANACHORITES (ἀναχορέω, to retire, withdraw). From the Old Testament Elijah and Elisha may be taken as typical instances of anachorism, and afterwards John the Baptist, who by Jerome is called princeps anachoretarum. Jerome also calls the Therapeutae of Egypt, who probably simply had taken up the example of the Essenes, a community of Christian monks (Catal., c. 11). Anchorites, properly speaking, were persons who retired from the world, and practised their devotional exercises in solitude in order to fight out the spiritual battle with so much the more prospect of success: the persecutions of the second and third centuries gave a special impulse to the movement. Anchorites were also called ἀσκεταῖοι, ἀσκηταί, μονόφωτος, or philosophers, as many of them wore the philosopher's mantle, and lived according to the rules of Epictetus. They lived in caves, avoided all intercourse with their fellow-men, abstained as much as possible from food, spoke no word, but prayed in silence. One stood in a temple for years with his hands uplifted to heaven, never sleeping. Others stood motionless on high cliffs or tall columns (Stylites), in wind and snow.

Ancilla of the Russian Church. In 476 the stylite Daniel went to Constantinople to defend orthodoxy against the emperors, and brought Julian Sabas to Antioch to employ his help against Arianism. At the same time Thraates stepped before the emperor, Valens, and warned him not to do any harm to the Christian monks (Catal., c. 11). One stood in a temple for years with his hands uplifted to heaven, never sleeping. Others stood motionless on high cliffs or tall columns (Stylites), in wind and snow. They were numerous, especially in Egypt, Syria, Palestine, and Thrace; and during the ecclesiastical controversies of the fourth and fifth centuries they sometimes appeared suddenly, in the very midst of the noise and bustle of the large cities, rebuking both the prince and the people; as, for instance, St. Anthony (ATHANAS. : Vita St. Anton., c. 46, 69). In 378, bishop Acacius of Berœa brought Julian Sabas to Antioch to employ his help against Arianism. At the same time Thraates stepped before the emperor, Valens, and warned him not to do any harm to the Church. In 476 the stylite Daniel went to Constantinople to defend orthodoxy against the emperor Valens. In course of time it became customary for several anchorites to unite and form small communities (ząpalka), the cells being built in a circle around a chapel; and thus the transition was made from anchorites to coenobites. St. Chariton is said to have built the first such cell, about 340, at Pharao, near the Dead Sea; St. Euthymius the next, near Jerusalem, in the fifth century; then followed St. Sabas and St. Quriasius, and in Egypt Antonius, Pachomius, Macarius, and others. Nevertheless, in spite of the rapid development of monastical institutions, anchorites still continued to occur. The Trullan Council of 692 ordered (can. 41), that a person who wished to become an anchorite, should first go through a kind of novitiate in a monastery. Charlemagne wished to have all anchorites sent to the monasteries. Nevertheless, they occurred even in Western Europe, at a very late date; and on Mount Athos there still live anchorites and hermits independently of the monastery proper.

ANDERSON.

ANCULLON, David, b. at Metz, March 17, 1617; d. in Berlin, Sept. 3, 1692; a great-grandson of president Ancillon, one of the founders of the Reformed Church in Metz; and a son of Abraham Ancillon, an eminent lawyer. He was educated in the Jesuit college of his native city, but withstood all the attempts of his teachers to convert him to the Roman faith. He then studied theology at Geneva, and was appointed preacher at Meaux, in 1641, and at Metz in 1653. In 1657 a conference on the tradition of the Church was held between him and Dr. Bédaciar, the suffragan of the bishop of Metz; and, as a false report of this conference was spread by some monk, Ancillon published his celebrated Traité de la tradition, Sedan, 1657. In 1666, he wrote an apology of Luther, Zwingli, Calvin, and Beza. By the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, he was compelled to leave France, and settled first at Frankfort, then at Berlin, where the elector Friedrich Wilhelm appointed him preacher to the French congregation. The Vie de Farel which appeared at Amsterdam, 1691, under his name, is only a mutilated and bungling copy of a manuscript which he had not destined for publication. See CHARLES ANCillon: Mélanges critiques et littéraires, Basel, 1699, 3 vols.

ANCULLON, Charles, son of the preceding, b. at Metz in 1537; d. in Berlin in 1715; was judge and director of the French colony in Brandenburg, and historiographer to Friedrich I. Of his writings the following have interest for the church historian: Reflexions Politiques, Cologne, 1685; Irrévocabilité de l'édit de Nantes, Amsterdam, 1688; Histoire de l'établissement des Français refugés dans les états de Brandebourg, Berlin, 1800.

ANCULLON, Jean Pierre Frédéric, great-grandson of David Ancillon, b. in Berlin, April 30, 1767; d. there April 10, 1837; studied theology, history, and philosophy; visited Geneva and Paris; was appointed teacher in the military academy of Berlin, and preacher to the French congregation; attracted much attention by his sermons; was made tutor to the crown prince in 1806, and in 1825, minister of state, which position he held to his death. In 1818 he published two volumes of sermons at Berlin.

ANDERSON, Lars (Laurentius André), b. probably at Streugnas, 1480; d. in the same place, April 29, 1532; was chancellor of the realm, and the most intimate councillor of the king from 1523 to 1540, and stood, together with Olans and Lucretius Petri, at the head of that movement which introduced the Reformation in Sweden, on the diet of Westeraas, 1527. He also partook with Olans Petri in the translation of the Bible into Swedish, of which the New Testament appeared in 1526, the whole in 1541. In 1540 he was accused of being cognizant of a conspiracy against the life of the king, and condemned to death. The king pardoned him, but he was dismissed from all his offices, and lived afterwards in retirement in Streugnas. See SWEDEN.
ANDERSON, Rufus (D.D., LL.D.), for thirty-five years the corresponding secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, b. Aug. 17, 1796, at North Yarmouth, Me.; d. May 80, 1850, at Boston, Mass. He was graduated at Bowdoin College, Me., where his uncle was the first president, in 1815; studied in Andover Theological Seminary 1819-1822. While in the senior class, he aided in conducting the correspondence of the Board, during the absence of Mr. Evarts; and after graduation he was made assistant secretary, and in 1832 corresponding secretary, which position he held until 1866, when he resigned because he was convinced that seventy years form "a limit beyond which it would not be wise for him to remain in so arduous a position." He was then elected a member of the prudential committee; but failing health compelled his resignation, after nine more years of service. He visited officially a part of the Sandwich Islands (1870), another on missions to India (1874), and two on the missions to the Oriental Churches (1873). But more than foreign missions claimed his attention. He was one of the founders of Mount Holyoke Seminary; was president for a number of years of the trustees of Bradford Academy; a member of the board of trust of Andover Seminary; was active in benevolence. "In every position and place the wisdom of his counsels seldom failed to command respect; his hopeful habit, resulting from a deeply settled trust in the promises and providence of God, carried with it an abiding power of inspiration."

ANDOVER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. In the year 1807 a plan was formed for the establishment of a theological seminary in Andover, Mass. The Seminary was to be connected with Phillips Academy, an institution founded at Andover in the year 1772. The persons who projected the seminary at its opening was thirty-six. The number of students who entered the seminary at its opening was thirty-six. The number who have been connected with it during all the seventy-two years of its existence is not far from three thousand. Of these a large proportion have been presidents and professors of colleges and theological seminaries; and an uncommonly large proportion have been missionaries to the heathen. The most conspicuous of the men who projected the seminary of the "moderate Calvinists" was Rev. Eliphalet Pearson, LL.D.; and the most conspicuous of those who projected the seminary of the "Hopkinsians" was Rev. Samuel Spring, D.D. The two men who were most influential in uniting the two parties were Dr. Pearson and Dr. Leonard Woods. Dr. Pearson was the first professor of sacred literature in the seminary. He remained in office only one year, but was a trustee of the seminary eighteen years, and of the academy forty-eight years. Dr. Woods was the first professor of Christian theology, and remained in office thirty-eight years. Rev. Edward Dorr Griffin, D.D., was the first professor of sacred rhetoric; Rev. James Murdock, D.D., the first professor of ecclesiastical history. Rev. Moses Stuart succeeded Dr. Pearson in the chair of sacred literature, remained in office thirty-eight years, and was succeeded by Dr. B. B. Edwards. Dr. Edward Robinson was professor extraordinary of sacred literature from 1830 to 1833. During these three years he gave instruction in the Hebrew department, to which a distinct professorship is now devoted. Other professors now deceased have been Rev. Ebenezer Porter, D.D., Rev. Ralph Emerson, D.D., and Rev. Thomas H. Skinner, D.D. Besides the five chairs of instruction already named, the institution has a professorship of eloquence, also of the relations of Christianity to science, also of theology and homiletics in a special course. The most eminent contributors to the funds of the seminary have been Madam Phoebe Phillips, Hon. John Phillips, Samuel Abbot, Esq., Hon. William Bartlett, Hon. John Norris, Moses Brown, Esq., Lieut.-Gov. William Phillips, John Smith, Esq., Peter Smith, Rev. John Sampson, Rev. Joseph Hitchcock, Esq., Frederic Jones, Esq., Henry Winkley, Esq., Madam Valeria G. Stone, and Miss Sophia Smith. The donations from each of these benefactors have ranged from fifteen thousand dollars to one hundred and sixty thousand dollars. The edifices belonging to the seminary are two dormitories, a chapel for morning prayers, lecture-rooms, etc., a chapel for sabbath worship, a library building containing thirty-eight thousand volumes, eight houses for the professors, etc. The institution is within an hour's distance by railroad from the flourishing cities and towns of Eastern Massachusetts.

The history of Andover Theological Seminary — the oldest theological seminary in the land — has been identified with many religious and philanthropic movements of the day. The "American Education Society," the "American Tract Society," the "American Temperance Society," the "American Bible Society," the "Andover Press," have their origin on Andover Hill.

The "Andover Press" has been noted in the religious community during the last seventy years. The works of Drs. Porter, Woods, and
ANDRADA. 82

ANDRADA, Antonio d', b. at Villa de Oleiros, near Alentejo, Portugal, in 1558; d. at Goa, Aug. 20, 1633; entered the order of the Jesuits at Coimbra in 1590; went in 1601 as a missionary to India, and was appointed superior of the mission of Mongolia. Hence he made two journeys to Thibet, the first of which he has described in his Nouo Descobrimento do Grão Catálo de dos Regnos de Thibet, Lisbon, 1626, translated into French in 1629.

ANDRADA (Diogo Payva d'Andrade), b. at Coimbra, Portugal, in 1558; d. in Lisbon, in 1575; was a member of the order of the Jesuits, and one of the Portuguese delegates to the Council of Trent. Martin Chemnitz's attack on the Jesuits, — Theologia Jesuistarum presenta capita, 1563; — he answered by his Liber orthodoxarum expositionum de controversis religionis capitibus; but this book gave Chemnitz occasion to write his celebrated work, Examinis Concilii Tridentini opus integrum, 1565-73, to which Andrias made only a feeble reply in his Defensio Tridentinae fidei Catholicae. — His brother Thomas de Jesus, an Augustinian monk, was taken prisoner in the battle of Alcazar, Aug. 4, 1578, and confined in a dungeon to his death, April 17, 1582. While here he wrote in Portuguese his celebrated book, The Laboris Jesus, which was translated into Spanish, Italian, and French.

ANDREE, Jakob, b. at Walblingen, Württemburg, March 25, 1529; d. at Tubingen, July 7, 1589; was in charge of the expense of his native city in the Pedagogium of Stuttgart, and studied theology in Tubingen 1541-1546. On leaving the university he was made a deacon in Stuttgart; and during the occupation of the city by Spanish troops, in 1547, as a consequence of the Smalcald war, he was the only evangelical minister who was allowed to remain in the city; the rest were expelled. Returning to Tubingen in 1548, he was made chaplain to the hospital, and preached the Protestant faith in one of the asiles of the Collegiate Church, at the same time as an Intern-priest said mass in the choir. In 1553, he was appointed superintendent general at Göppingen, and in 1560 professor of theology, provost, and chancellor of the university of Tubingen. The activity which he developed in the cause of the Reformation, during the thirty-seven years he spent at Göppingen and Tubingen, is stupendous. He felt that there lay a great danger to the success of the Reformation in the division of the Protestant party into minor factions; and, though he was an ardent champion of Lutheranism pure and undefiled, he undertook to reconcile the various parties among the Lutherans, and unite them into one body. His first plan was to neutralize the differences by means of formulas so general that they could be accepted by all. Two years he spent in travelling, visiting every university, and conferring with every theologian of any consequence from Geneva to Copenhagen. But neither the Flacians nor the Philippists, the two extreme parties among the Lutherans, had full confidence in him; and on the convention of Zerbst, May, 1570, the attempt proved a failure. Andréa, however, did not give up the plan: he only changed the method of its execution. He now proposed to unite all Lutheran congregations in Germany into a firm alliance by drawing a sharp line of distinction between them and the adherents of Zwingli and Calvin, and thus destroy the Philippists and every other individual shade of Lutheranism. In 1573, he sent a paper to the theologians of the Suabian Concordia, to the theologians of North Germany, for examination and criticism. May 28, 1576, a convention assembled at Torgau to compare and harmonize the Suabian Concordia with these answers to it which had come in, — the Subalian-Saxonian Concordia and the Mainz. The result of this convention was the so-called Liber Torgenses; and then followed, May 19-28, 1580, three final conferences between Andréa, Chemnitz, Schnecker, Chytraeus, Musculus, and Körner. In June 28, 1580, the Formula Concordiae appeared, and was accepted by all Lutheran governments, as the symbolical books of the denomination. The works of Andréa number more than a hundred and fifty, and belong to the most characteristic from the closing period of the Reformation. They consist of sermons and essays, polemical, dogmatical, and practical.
ANDRÉAE.

ANDREAS, Johann Valentin, a grandson of Jacob Andreae; b. at Herrenberg, Württemberg, Aug. 17, 1588; d. in Stuttgart, June 27, 1654; studied at Heidelberg, Ingolstadt, 1574, but the Greek text not until 1586, at Heidelberg, by Syburg. It was afterwards several times printed together with the commentary by Arethas, which see. SMITH & WACE: Christ. Biogr. I.

ANDREAS OF CRAIN, a singular phenomenon among the predecessors of the Reformation, though, properly speaking, not one of them himself: was a Slavonian by birth; entered the order of the Dominicans; was made Archbishop of Carniola by the emperor, Friedrich III.; in 1482 he repaired to Switzerland, and was very active to get a new general council convened at Basel. With letters of recommendation from Bern, he addressed himself to the magistrates of Basel, and after delivering his interdict; and finally Andreas was arrested by the local authorities, and placed in a prison, where, on Nov. 13, 1481, he was found strangled, he having probably committed suicide. His death was kept a secret for some time. His corpse was put in a barrel, and thrown into the Rhine. His own secretary, Peter Numagen of Treves, considered him crazy (cerebro lassus). See Gesta Archiepiscopi Craigenis in J. H. HOTTINGER: Hist. Eccles., pp. 403–412.

ANDREWES, Lancelot, b. in London, 1585; d. at Winchester, Sept. 25, 1626; was educated in Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, of which he afterwards became master; was appointed chaplain to the queen, and Dean of Westminster, by Elizabeth, and by James, Bishop of Chichester in 1605, of Ely in 1609, and of Winchester in 1618. He was a man of great learning and fervent devotion, and enjoyed reputation, both as a theologian and as a preacher. He was a member of the Hampton Court Conference (1604), at which the present authorized version was proposed, and was appointed head of the first company of translators to whom was assigned the books of the Old Testament as far as 2 Kings. He published ninety-six sermons, of which an edition in five volumes was given in the Anglo-Catholic Library, Oxford, 1841–43; wrote Tortura Terti, 1609, against Bellarmine, who had attacked King James's Defence of the Rights of Kings; Præces Privatus (in Greek and Latin), translated by Dr. Stanhope, London, 1826; The Pattern of Cathchistical Doctrine (an exposition of the Ten Commandments), 3d ed., London, 1675, modern ed., Oxford, 1846, etc. See ISAACSON: Life of Bishop Andrewes (in Fuller's Ael Readex, ed. Nichols, London, 1676, 3 vols.); GAW: Lives of the Bishops of Winchester, London, 1826.

ANGARIE. See FASTS.

ANGELA MERICI, also called Angela of Brescia, b. at Desenzano, on Lake Garda, March 21, 1479; d. at Brescia, Jan. 27, 1540; felt herself from early youth drawn towards a life of solitude and devotion, and entered a Franciscan convent, but devoted afterwards to the world, and began to teach small children, in which she succeeded so well that she was called for the same purpose to Brescia, where she spent the rest of her life.

ANDREÆ.

ANDREÆ, A native of Angermannland, Sweden, the son-in-law of Laurentius Petri; came in conflict with King John, who wished to restore the Roman-Catholic Church in Sweden, and was compelled to flee to Germany in 1580, but was elected Archbishop of Upsala by the local authorities, and placed in a prison, where he died in 1607. During his residence in Germany he partook in the theological controversies of the day, and wrote, among other works, Forum Adaptatorem, Wittenberg, 1586.

ANDREÆ CRETENSIS, b. at Damascus, spent some time in Jerusalem, so he is sometimes styled Ipopomvrios; was sent by Bishop Theodore of Jerusalem to the Sixth Council of Constantinople (680); was ordained a deacon there, and made a Bishop of Orphans, and became finally a guardian of orphans, and became finally inadvice of the Bishop of Crete. His works, consisting of homilies, canons, and hymns (of which several became very celebrated, and are still sung in the Greek Church), were edited by COMBES, Paris, 1615; by Galland: Bibl. Patr. XIII., 698; and by Migne: Patr. CXVII. ANDREASE, Bishop of Cessareas in Cappadocia, wrote towards the close of the fifth century a commentary on the Book of Revelation. Nothing more is known of his life. Of his work, a Latin translation by Peltanus was published at ANGELIC.

On Nov. 25, 1535, in the Church of St. Afra, in Brescia, she and eleven other maidens formed an association under the patronage of St. Ursula, for the purpose of teaching small children, aiding the poor, and nursing the sick. It was originally not a strictly religious order (the members made no vows, did not live together, adopted no common dress, etc.); but it soon developed in that direction. On March 16, 1537, the number of members had increased to seventy-six, and Angela was elected superior. In 1544 the order was confirmed by Paul III. See Ursulines; Das Leben d. h. Angela Merici, Augsburg, 1811, and M. Sintzel: Leben d. h. Angela; Regensburg, 1842.

ANGELIC ORDER, The, also called the Guaselines, was founded (in 1530) by the Countess Torelli of Guastalla, who at that time was twenty-five, a widow for the second time. The order was destined for maidens who should live in angelic purity (whence the name), and was confirmed in 1534 by Paul III., on the rules of St. Augustine. It was exempt from episcopal jurisdiction, but subordinate to the Barnabites of Milan, in which city it had its first house. In the beginning the nuns accompanied the Barnabites on their missions; but in spite of the coarse garment, the wooden cross on the bosom, the hempen string around the neck, the easy manners of the nuns gave offence, and to which was sometimes added a crown of thorns, the cure for the scandals was found in giving up the joint missions, and secluding the nuns.

ANCELIS, Girolamo, b. at Castro Giovanni, Sicily, in 1567; d. in Japan, Dec. 4, 1623; entered the order of the Jesuits in 1585, and went in 1602 to Japan. When in 1614 the Jesuits were expelled from that country, Angelis remained, disguised in Japanese dress, and was not discovered until after the lapse of nine years, when he was imprisoned, and burnt alive. His Relazione del Regno di Yezo was published in Rome, 1625. He was canonized by Pope Pius IX. in 1842.

ANGELS, Biblical. The commonest name in the Old Testament for these creatures who are represented, in prophetic vision and poetic fancy, as surrounding the throne of God, is "the sons of God," which brings out their near relationship to their Creator (Job i. 6, xxviii. 7; Dan. iii. 25; Ps. xxix. 1, lxxxix. 6). They had other names, "the saints" (Job v. 1; Ps. lxxxiv. 5, 7; Dan. viii. 13); in Jewish theology, "the family above" (cf. Eph. iii. 15); in the Septuagint, in several places, two of which are cited in the New Testament (Heb. i. 14; Hebrews x. 21), and in the later Jewish theology, "elohim, gods;" nevertheless a sharp distinction is drawn between them and God, to whom they pray; but they are not prayed to by any creature. The Epistle to the Hebrews (i. 14) designates them "spirits;" but the Old Testament does not recognize any such epithet.

Before the exile they were not known by name, save those called in general cherubim and seraphim; but they properly form a class by themselves. Angels bore a human figure, and to paint them with wings is erroneous, but is derived from the false rendering of the Vulgate (velo edones) in Dan. ix. 21. The assertion that angels are mere personifications of natural powers is answered by saying that it is not God in nature, but God in history, whom they assist. And this idea dominates in every part of the Bible; and thus the further idea, that the salvation of man must be accomplished by some being, holy, and related to God, was instilled.

The so-called "angel of Jehovah" first appears Gen. xvi. 7, and often afterwards, but must be distinguished from the "angel of Jehovah" spoken of 2 Sam. xxiv. 16; 2 Kings xxix. 35, who was evidently a creature; whereas the way in which the "angel of Jehovah" is spoken of in the other passages, as in the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges, raises a question in regard to his nature. A fair interpretation of Scripture does, however, compel the creature-view of this being; for, as he was the same who appeared in the visions of Zechariah (i. 12, iii. 1), he is plainly distinguished from the Arch, and is subordinated to him. And so the "angel of the covenant" (Mal. iii. 1) is not identical with the Lord, but is his messenger. This angel is called God's "presence" or face (Exod. xxxiv. 14); not, however, that dreadful face on which no one, not even Moses (Exod. xxxii. 20) and Elijah (1 Kings xix. 13), could gaze, but rather an angel who revealed that face (Gen. xxxii. 30); who was called Jehovah and Elohim and Eli, i.e., God (Gen. xviii. 33, xxii. 24 sq. cf. xxxi. 13), because God's "name" was in him (Exod. xxxii. 21), but who yet is as little God as the angel who declared "I am Alpha and Omega" (Rev. xxi. 14), and yet rebuked John for worshiping him (xxii. 9). The angel of Jehovah calls himself the "Captain of the Lord's host" (Josh. v. 14, 15 cf. Exod. iii. 5).

In the term the "angel of the presence" (which can mean either the angel in whom Jehovah allows himself to be seen, or the angel who sees Jehovah's face) may be found the connecting link between the primitive simple conception of angels and the later idea of an heavenly hierarchy, i.e., a division not only according to quality, but according to rank. The post-exilic writings, both canonical and uncanonical, exhibit this altered view. Thus in Dan. vii. 10 we read: "Thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him." At their head were princes, of whom Michael, the protector of Israel, was chief (x. 13, 21, xii. 1), and at his side was Gabriel (viii. 16, ix. 21). Going into the region of fiction and mere earthly wisdom, we find that the later Jewish theology made seven archangels: chief of them were Michael, Gabriel, Raphael (Tob. iii. 17), and Uriel (Enoch iv. 1, 30). But here is an unanswerable derivation from the Persian doctrine of the seven Amesha spenta; and in the Babylonian theology there are "great lords" who adore the Divinity by prostrating themselves. See Schrader, Hallschrift der Istar, p. 100; Lenormant, Études accadiennes II. 1, p. 140. The latter explains the words "great lords" by "celestial archangels."

In Daniel we read of angels who are the protectors of particular peoples (cf. Sirach xvii. 17 also Ps. xcvii. 7); in Tobit, of the archangel Raphael accompanying Tobias; in the Epistle of Jude (9) of Michael contending with Satan about the body of Moses: but the idea of guardian

Art. Angel in Encyclopaedia Britannica (9th ed.) by W. Robertson Smith, provoked much discussion and adverse criticism. The various treatises on biblical theology and theology in general may be consulted, especially that of Martensen.

ANGEL OF THE CHURCH (Rev. ii. 1 etc.) is the presiding elder of the city, an office which eventually developed into the episcopate. These officers, as rulers and teachers of their congregations, would naturally be the recipients of such messages as the Saviour should send. They are with propriety called "angels," "messengers," because by them the word of life is conveyed. The Roman-Catholic and Anglican view is, that these officers were really and fully bishops in the present sense of the term, and in proof is advanced (1) the analogy of Gal. i. 8, iv. 14; (2) their representative position toward the several churches; (3) the fact (?) that John appointed bishops in the cities of this very region; (4) the current interpretation of the term from very early times, as by Augustine (Ep. 43, c. 8, § 22 in Migne, tom. ii., col. 170), Jerome and Ambrose. Other views are, that the angel of the church was (1) really an angel; (2) corresponded to the deputy of the synagogue; (3) figurative personifications of the churches themselves. See, for discussion of this interesting point, Schaff: Hist. Apost. Ch., pp. 537-541.

ANGELS AND ARCHANGELS IN CHRISTIAN ART. The earliest Christian representation of angels dates from before the fourth century: afterwards they were very common. On the various monuments which have been preserved, we see that these attributes were popularly given to them in early ages. 1. The human form, masculine (the sex of most dignity and power). 2. Wings, representing their ability to ascend or descend, or to move very swiftly. 3. This representation is found in other religions, e.g., Assyrian, Egyptian, Greek, and Roman. 3. Clothing, before seventh century, white; later on, colored, red and blue. 4. The nimbus. 5. In the first eight centuries it was exceptional to portray angels with anything in their hands; but archangels, later on, held swords and spears, and other angels often carried musical instruments. Four archangels are named Michael, Gabriel, Raphael, Uriel. See art. "Angels and Archangels" in Smith and Cheetham: Dictionary of Christian Antiquities.

ANGILRAM, Bishop of Metz, 768, archchapelain to Charlemagne, and was used by him in many difficult negotiations. By Bertha, the daughter of Charlemagne, he was father to Nithard and several other sons. In 790 he retired from public life to the Convent of Centule, the present St. Riquier, of which he became abbot in 794. He wrote a history of the abbey, and several poetical works, on account of which he called the Homer of his time. D. Feb. 18, 814. See Act. Sanct., Feb. 18.

relating to suits against clergymen, especially against bishops, and generally bearing the name of Capita Angilrami. The introduction to these capitula tells, in some manuscripts, that Angilram presented them to Pope Adrian; in others, that the pope presented them to Angilram. But in either of these versions the story is very improbable. In the controversy between Hinschius and Gratian, the collection is quoted both as Capitula Angilrami, not Angilrami, and in the earliest works on canon law, such as those by Burchard of Worms and Gratian, it bears the same name. It is most probable that Angilram has had nothing at all to do with these capitula, but that they were written by the author of the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals himself. See Pseudo-Isidor Decretals; HINSCHIUS: Decretales Pseudo-Isid., Leipzig, 1863.

ANGLO-SAXONS, their Conversion to Christianity. When Christianity was introduced to England is unknown; certain it is that it took root among the old Britains in the second or third century, and that it was suppressed but not destroyed by the Anglo-Saxons, who invaded the island in the sixth century, and introduced by forces their own worship of Odin. The British Christians were powerless to labor among their fierce and hated conquerors. They retreated before them; and where the light of the gospel had shone there were the lurid fires of superstition. To Gregory the Great belongs the credit, under God, of converting the Anglo-Saxons; for he sent Augustine (d. 605; see title), the first Archbishop of Canterbury, who landed on the Isle of Thanet, 596, and in 597 restored to its original worship the old Christian Church of St. Salvador in Kent, by permission of Ethelbert the converted king. In 600 the bishopric of Rochester was founded. As in Kent, so in Essex, royal women and presents of Pope Boniface V., allowed in Kent, by permission of Ethelbert the converted bishop, the old Diana temple in his capital, London, with a large plot of ground, for a Christian cathedral. The faith thus established remained in these places during the reigns of the Pagan princes, although persecution drove out the bishops, and upset their altars. In Northumberland, Eadwin, induced by the entreaties of his Christian wife from Kent, and by the cajoleries and presents of Pope Boniface V., allowed Bishop Paulinus to carry on missionary labors. Meanwhile he studied the Christian system for himself, was at length converted, and solemnly renounced the Pagan gods, in the National Council, in the presence of his chieftains (627). St. Peters in York was chosen for the cathedral, and Paulinus the bishop. In East Anglia Sigebert (d. 650) introduced Christianity, to which he was converted in France. Oswald, King of Northumberland, in 633 introduced Christianity in its Scotch form, and made Lindisfern a bishopric (which did not come under Roman jurisdiction until 694). About the same time Pope Honorius sent Buns to make himself a bishopric by earning it out of the Pagan English. Eynugil, King of Wessan, was baptized by him, and the Bishopric of Dorchester erected (635); then came Winchester (660) and Sherburne (708). Fifty years were destined to pass ere heathenism was sufficiently rooted among the Saxons. As in Mercia, held out for heathenism. Penda the king considered himself the invincible champion of Paganism, but his hour came. In the great battle at Leada he was defeated and killed, and his kingdom thrown open to the gospel. As has been noticed, the conversion to Christianity was not imposed by the masses on the individual. If the king went, his whole people followed: hence the baptisms were by thousands at a time. There seem to have been no compulsory measures, either to advance or to retard the new faith. While these conversions were going on, the Scotch missionaries came into Northumberland and Mercia, preaching the doctrine of Columba; but differences in the young church were averted by King Oswin's prompt calling of a synod at Streanehalch (Sinus Phari, Whitby) in Yorkshire (604), which decided in favor of the Roman form of faith and worship. This settled the matter. England was for the time a part of the Roman Universal Church: the pope was her spiritual head. Hitherto, as Kemble says, there had been churches in England; but henceforth there was only one. But Rome was not able to make the sturdy Anglo-Saxons her faithful sons in all things. Down to the Norman invasion Anglo-Saxon was the ecclesiastical language; the baptismal form was Anglo-Saxon; the Bible existed in Anglo-Saxon; and in the vulgar tongue homilies were circulated. Papal supremacy, canon law, ecclesiastical celibacy, was not recognized. On the other hand, the Anglo-Saxon kings and nobles vied with each other in building monasteries and abbeys; and the longing for holy quiet was found among this class as nowhere else. They also were fond of going upon long, toilsome pilgrimages, true to the Norse blood which flowed in their veins. To these days before the Norman Conquest, which so completely revolutionized the Church, and made it a limb of the body of Rome, without any independence, belongs the first foreign missionary enterprise of English Christianity. Bishop Wilfrid (d. 709, et. seventy-six) has the high honor of being the first to set such work on foot; for he sent the gospel to Friesland. See Augustine (Archbishop of Canterbury) Englad, Church of C. SCHOLL.

ANGLUS is the true name of Thomas White, but who also called himself Albinius, Albinus, Candidus, Bianchi, etc., was born in England in 1582, but spent most of his time on the Continent, as teacher in the Roman-Catholic seminaries for Englishmen in Lisbon, Douay, Paris, and Louvain. Among the Molinsists, the Jansenists, etc. Among his philosophical works are De Mundo, Paris, 1642; Institutiones Peripateticae, Lyons, 1648; Institutiones Theologicae, 1652. D. 1676.
ANICETUS, Bishop of Rome, succeeded Pius I., and occupied the papal chair from 187 to 188, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. IV. 11, 10).

About 160 Ptolemeus came to Rome, and one of the questions discussed by him and Anicetus was the difference between the Church of Rome and that of Asia Minor with respect to the celebration of Easter. No agreement was arrived at, but the dispute continued. Polycarp, celebrated Easter in Rome according to the traditions of his Church (Eus. Hist. Eccl. IV. 24). Anastasius Bibliothecarius tells that Anicetus introduced the tonsure as a rule for all clergymen; and Isidorus Mercator gives a letter from him to that end, but the letter is evidently spurious. The Roman Church commemorates him as a saint on April 17.

ANIMALS. I. Regulations respecting Clean and Unclean. — 1. For Food. According to the lists (Lev. xi. 1-31, 46; Deut. xiv. 1-19), the clean animals (i.e., those flesh which could be "eaten") were ruminant quadrupeds which parted the hoof, were cloven-footed, and chewed the cud: aquatic animals that had fins and scales; all birds except the nineteen species specified; only those flying insects, which, like the grasshopper, had two long legs for leaping. No vermin was clean, nor was the carcass of any clean animal, if it had died naturally, or been torn to death. Every thing was unclean that touched the unclean: so was the kid seethed in its mother's milk, the heathen sacrifices in all their parts. Every thing was unclean that touched the unclean, and by imputation guilty (Lev. xx. 15, 16). The law inculcated great kindness towards the lower animals. Man was placed at their head (Gen. i. 28, 29). It was declared to be like God to be humane (Prov. xii. 10, cf. 1 Cor. xiv. 9). The same spirit showed itself in the prohibition to muzzle the ox when he trod out the corn (Deut. xxv. 4). And how tender is this: "And whether it be cow or ewe, ye shall not kill it and her young both in one day" (Lev. xxii. 30). Ritualistic rather than moral considerations forbade the spanning of different species of animals (Deut. xxii. 10); but the two were combined in the law against castration (Lev. xxii. 24 "and this ye shall not do in your land.")

2. For Sacrifice. The general rule was, that only the clean animals could be sacrificed: therefore, no animal of the chase. Doves might seem to be an exception; but they were so generally used as food by the poor, and were so easily caught, that they were not regarded as wild. Every animal offered must be without blemish (Lev. xxii. 20), at least seven days old (ver. 27; Exod. xxii. 20), because too young flesh is disgusting, and therefore unclean. Nor must it be too old: for vermin might have been in it. The usual (Exod. xxii. 38; Lev. ix. 3; Num. xxviii. 9; Lev. i. 5, "bullock," a young ox). What man would not eat, it was an insult to sacrifice.

3. The Moral Aspect. Animals shared in the consequences of the fall. Instead of being man's friend, many became his enemy, and in regard to all he was obliged to cultivate their friendship. The apostle Paul has been supposed by many to refer to a desire on the part of the brute creation for a restoration to their original condition, when he says that "the earnest expectation of the creation waiteth for the revealing of the sons of God." Instead of being man's enemy, so was the beast killed, as well as the human being. But the beast had done no wrong: it was its being used for such a purpose that rendered it unclean and by imputation guilty (Lev. xx. 15, 16). Animals and birds were offered as sacrifices: therefore, men were not required to eat their flesh. But they were appointed to be eaten with gratitude (Lev. xi. 21). For they were especially used in offering sacrifices (Gen. vii. 21 to xiv. 23), and were used in the worship of false gods (Exod. xxii. 21). They were used in ornamentation of sacred places. Doves might seem to be exceptions; but they were domesticated. Some birds, like the turtle dove, were kept as pets, and used for sport (Gen. xxi. 30, 31; xxiv. 7, 10, 12), in the prohibition to muzzle "the ox when he trod out the corn" (Deut. xxv. 4).

And how tender is this: "And whether it be cow or ewe, ye shall not kill it and her young both in one day" (Lev. xxii. 29). Ritualistic rather than moral considerations forbade the spanning of different species of animals (Deut. xxii. 10); but the two were combined in the law against castration (Lev. xxii. 24 "and this ye shall not do in your land.")

II. The Emblematic Use of Animals in the Bible and the Church. — 1. In the Old Testament, locusts were used as the symbol of the divine judgments. "Scorpion" was the name given to a kind of whip (1 Kings xi. 11). The cherubim were used in ornamentation of sacred places. Thus at divine command a pair were placed on the mercy-seat (Exod. xxv. 18 sq.) in the tabernacle, and a larger pair standing on the floor of the Holy of holies in Solomon's temple (1 Kings vi. 23). They were also blazoned on the doors, walls, curtains, etc., of the tabernacle and temple. They were composite figures of man, lion, ox, and eagle. See CHERUBIM. Besides them... there were the twelve oxen which bore the brazen sea in the court of the temple (1 Kings vii. 25); also in prophetic vision animal shapes appeared (Ezek. i. 10, x. 4).

2. In the New Testament Peter uses a lion as the emblem of Satan (1 Pet. v. 8); on the other hand, a lion is the emblem of Christ (Rev. v. 5). The ass symbolizes peace (Matt. xxi. 5); the dove, innocence and the Holy Ghost; the swine, uncleanness and vulgarity (Matt. vii. 6; 2 Pet. ii. 22). But the emblematic use of beasts is much greater in the Revelation than in all the other books of the Bible combined. Constant mention is made of the four living creatures, (iv. 6, etc.), who were from the fifth century considered as symbolizing the four evangelists. Christ is constantly called the Lamb; the Devil, the dragon (xiii. 3, etc.). There are, besides, a beast who comes out of the bottomless pit (xi. 7), horses (vi. 2, etc.), locusts (ix. 3), birds (xix. 17), and frogs (xvi. 13).

3. The ecclesiastical use of animals was very great and varied. There was not only the lamb for Christ, but also dolphins, hens, pelicans, apes, and centaurs. The dragon appeared as, for instance, the opponent of St. George. The old Gothic churches exhibit these fanciful and really heathen designs. Bernard of Clairvaux raised his voice against them. In the catacombs one finds the drawing of a fish to symbolize Christ, because the initials of the title of Christ Χριστός Ουαγίας ήως Ύψηλα spell the Greek word for fish IXΩΥΣ.

III. The Use of Emblematic Animals in Worship.

1. Among the Hebrews there are two spoken of. The brazen serpent which Moses made, which was at last destroyed by Hezekiah, because it was worshipped (2 Kings xviii. 4). The golden calf, a direct imitation of Egyptian worship, was not intended as a substitute for the Jehovah worship, but as an aid; but it became a snare to Israel in the wilderness before Sinai (Exod. xxxiii.), and in the days of Jeroboam I. and his successors on the throne of Israel (1 Kings xii. 39). Among the neighboring people there were an idolatrous worship, and thus the Hebrews copied. Thus at length they served heathen deities under various animal forms, without the apology of a Jehovistic meaning. The Jews were falsely accused of worshipping an ass's head. Josephus c. Apion II. 7. See Ananias.

But all the nations around Judah were led into this worship of animals. The Egyptians worshipped the crocodile, the cat, the wolf, the dog, the ape, the goat, the sheep, the beetle, and also the lion, and other animals. The Assyrians had the eagle-headed god Ninurra, and used very extensively drawings and figures of animals, but probably not idolatrously. So at all events it was with the Persians. They divided animals into two classes, religio-morally good or bad: e.g., the unicorn, the hen, the dog, the ox were holy to Ormuzd, who himself appeared sometimes as an eagle, sometimes as a hawk. The head of the unclean animals was the dragon, the emblem of Ahriman, the darkness. J. G. Müller.

ANNA, St., the mother of the Holy Virgin, was, according to the tradition of the ancient church, a native of Bethlehem and a daughter of the priest Matthan. She had two sisters, both married in Bethlehem, of whom one was the mother of Elisabeth and the grandmother of John the Baptist. Anna married Joachim of the tribe of Judah. They settled at Nazareth, and their lives are told with great elaborateness in the Evangelium de Nativitate Mariae and in Protevangelium Jacobi. According to another account, Anna and Joseph married after the birth of Maria, and Anna then married first, Cleophas, to whom she bore Maria, the wife of Alphæus, and, next, Sama, the wife of Zebedæus. But Jerome and Augustine doubted these statements. In the Greek Church the worship of St. Anna originated in the fourth century, and traces of it are found in Gregory of Nyssa and Epiphanius (Hær. 78, 79). It becomes prominent in the homilies of the monk Antiochus, in the Encomium of St. Joachim and St. Anna by Cosmas Vestitor, and especially with Johannes Damascenus, his successor. Irenaeus, in his De Fid. Orth., iv. 1, de nuptiâ Orant. de Dorn. B. Mariae, and in his Orat. I. and II. in Nativ. Mariae. Greek hymns in her honor are preserved in Lambecius: Comm. de Biblioth. Vindob., i. III., p. 297, and Andreas Cretensis: Hymni Sacri. In 550 the emperor Justinian dedicated a church to her in Constantinople; and not only the day of her death (July 25), but also that of her wedding and of her conception (Sept. 9 and Dec. 9), are celebrated. In the Western Church, Pope Leo III. had in the eighth century the history of St. Joachim and St. Anna painted in the basilica of San Paolo; and in 1584 Pope Gregory XIII. ordered that a double mass should be said in honor of St. Anna in all churches on July 26. In Spain she became very popular, especially through the exertions of the Augustinian nun Anna, a pupil of St. Theresa: also in Italy, where the Minorite monk, Innocent of Clusa, surnamed Annaeus, wrought many miracles by the aid of St. Anna: indeed, in the seventeenth century an Italian writer, Imperialis, even applied to her the idea of an immaculate conception; but his doctrines were condemned by the pope. See Acta Sanctor. Vit. e. comment. Cuperi, vi. Jul. 9 and Dec. 9.

ANNAS, whom Josephus calls Ἀραβάς, one of the chiefs of the Jewish people at the time of the public ministry of Jesus (Luke iii. 2; John xviii. 13), was the son of Seth, and was high priest during the taking of the census by Quirinius (A.D. 6), but deposed by the procurator Valerius Gratus (Joseph. Antiq., 18, 2, I and 2). Afterwards he exercised great influence, for five of his sons were high priests. Annas, and Caiaphas his son-in-law, were contemporary chiefs, the former as president of the Sanhedrin, the latter as high priest. There is no difficulty in understanding Luke's term ἀρχιερεῖς (Luke iii. 2), which is ambiguous, of the president of the Sanhedrin, for he regularly uses it in this sense in the Acts (Acts v. 21, 27, vii. 1, ix. 1, xx. 5, xxii. 2, 4, xxiv. 1). The word only occurs once in the LXX. (Lev. iv. 3; the common term, like the Hebrew, being אֶלֶף or אֶלֶף μηו, and is used by Josephus, as in the New Testament, of the head of the temple priests as well as of the not necessarily identical person, the president of the Sanhedrin: for Ezra is called (in 1 Esd. ix. 40) אֶלֶף קַרְפּוֹא.) ANNIHILATIONISM.

ANNIHILATIONISM denotes a theory according to which the everlasting punishment of the wicked, as first taught on the authority of St. Peter, has not actually any existence. The theory has never been adopted as part of any denominational creed; but individually its many subtle points, psychological and theological, have found very able advocates, such as Richard Whately: A View of the Scripture Doctrine of a Future State, London, 1832; and Hudson: Debt and Grace as related to the Doctrine of a Future State, Boston, 1857; and recently, perhaps its ablest exponent in Rev. Edward White, an English clergymen, whose Life in Christ (first edition, London, 1875; third edition, 1878) has not only sold largely, but made many converts.

ANNIVERSARIUS (sc. dies). From the second century it became usual in Christian congregations to celebrate the death-days of their martyrs with divine service. Also single families used to commemorate their departed members on their death-days. Thus the festivals of the martyrs and the saints originated, as also those anniversaries for departed members of the congregations which are still held in the Roman-Catholic Church, and consist in masses and alms. As only the rich can avail themselves of this custom, the All-Souls’ Day has been instituted for the poor.

ANNI CLERI. Any loan raised for the erection of a church or parsonage must be paid by the succeeding parsons out of their benefits in fixed instalments. This method of payment is called _anni clerii._

ANNULUS PISCATORIUS. To the official costume of a Roman-Catholic bishop belongs a ring which designates his espousals to the church. Also the pope wears such a ring, and one with the device of St. Peter fishing. From the thirteenth century all papal briefs were sealed with red or green wax showing an impression of this device, and for this reason they were said to have been issued _sub annulo piscatorii._

ANNUNCIADE is the name of two orders of nuns instituted in honor of the announcement. — I. The first was founded at Bourges, in 1500, by Jeanne de Valois, the sister of Charles VIII. and the divorced wife of Louis XII. It was also called the Order of the Ten Virtues, with allusion to the ten festivals of the Holy Virgin kept by the Roman Church. At the time of its abolition, under the Revolution, it numbered forty-five monasteries in France. It still flourishes in the Netherlands. — II. The second, also called the Order of the Celestines, was founded in Genoa by the widow Maria Victoria Formari, and confirmed by Clement VIII. in 1684. Besides in Genoa and Rome, it has also monasteries in France.

ANNUNCIATION, Feast of the, is the ecclesiastical commemoration, upon March 25, of each year, of the Incarnation of the Word of God, when in Nazareth the angel Gabriel announced to the Virgin Mary the overshadowing of the Holy Ghost. It is uncertain when the Church began the general celebration of this event. There is a collect for the day in the Sacramentary of Gelasius (A.D. 492) and in that of Gregory the Great (A.D. 590), and a homily exists which was preached upon the day by Proclus, patriarch of Constantinople, in the first half of the fifth century. The Council of Toledo (A.D. 589) agreed. In the central figure in the feast is Mary, who humbly, wonderingly, rejoicingly yields herself to be the human mother of the Son of God.

ANNUS CARENTIE, the term during which a canon or other prebendary must renounce his revenues in favor of the pope, the bishop, or some ecclesiastical purpose. In some countries a certain per centum is annually paid to an ecclesiastical fund.

ANNUS CLAUDRASIL, the first year in which a canon holds his benefice, and during which he is bound to be in residence.

ANNUS DECOTORIUS, the year 1024, which by the peace of Westphalia was taken as the basis for the division of German territory between the Roman-Catholic and the Protestant churches.

ANNUS DESERVITUS, or ANNUS GRATIAE, denotes the term, different in different countries, during which the heirs of an ecclesiastic are entitled to enjoy his revenues after his death.

ANNUS LUCTUS, the year of mourning, in some countries an obstacle to marriage.

ANSEGIS, the abbreviated form of Ansegisil.— I. The elder Ansegis, b. in the latter part of the eighth century, d. at Fontanella, in the diocese of Rouen, July 20, 833; received his first instruction in a cloister-school in the diocese of Lyons; became a monk in the Monastery of Fontanella, and was made Abbot of St. Germain de Flay, in 817. Afterwards he was called to the court of Charlemagne in Aix-la-Chapelle, and made superintendent of all the emperor’s architectural undertakings. Also Louis the Pious held him in great favor, and endowed him in 817 with the Abbey of Luxeuil, and in 823 with that of Fontanella, whither he finally withdrew, old and exhausted. In Fontanella he finished his collection of Frankish laws: _Libri IV. Capitularum_, which in 829 obtained official authority. Most of these _capitulæ_ we are able to compare with the original documents; and the comparison shows that Ansegis altered very little in the text,—quite different in this respect from Benedict of Mainz, who, twenty years later on, continued his work, and made arbitrary, not to say fraudulent, alterations. In the ninth century the work was translated into German, and up to the thirteenth century the German kings took an oath on the book as containing the rights of the realm. The best edition is that by Pertz in the first part of his _Monumenta Germaniae Legum._ — The younger Ansegis became Archbishop of Sens in 871, and was in 876 appointed papal vicar in France and Germany with right to convocate synods, and act as the representative of the pope in all affairs of the church. At the synod of Ponthion, however, a number of the Frankish bishops refused to acknowledge his authority, and we hear nothing of a real activity from his side. In 877 his see seems to have lost the confidence of the pope, as in 878 another papal vicar was appointed. Ansegis died Nov. 26, 592. On his tombstone he is called Primus Galliarum Papa: and up to the fifteenth century the Archbishop of Sens was styled Gallus et Germaniae Primas.

P. HINSCHIUS.

ANSELM OF CANTERBURY, b. in 1033, at Bec in Piedmont: d. at Canterbury, April 21, 1109; the father of medieval scholasticism, and one of the most eminent English prelates. He belonged to a rich family of old Lombard nobility, but felt himself so strongly drawn towards a life of study and contemplation, that, in spite of his father's protest, he entered the Monastery of Bec, in Normandy, where he studied under the tuition of his celebrated countryman, Lanfranc, and finally took holy orders. In 1063 he was chosen prior, and in 1078, abbot of Bec; and under his guidance and by his teaching the fame of the school of the place steadily increased. In 1093 he was appointed Archbishop of Canterbury; and, though he was a very mild and meek man, he had adopted the Gregorian views of the relation between Church and State, and followed them out in practice with unswerving consistency. Strife soon broke out between him and the king, William Rufus, who exiled him in 1097. Under William's successor, Henry I., he returned; but the strife soon broke out again. Once more he went into exile; and a reconciliation was not brought about until 1106, when the king renounced the right of investiture with ring and staff, and the archbishop consented to take the oath of allegiance for his feudal possessions. The dogmas of the church are to him identical with those of reason so far, that it seems to be mere vanity to doubt a dogma on account of its unintelligibility. Credo ut intelligam, non quero intelligere ut eradam, is the principle on which he proceeds; and after him it has become the principle of all orthodox theology.

As a metaphysician he was a Realist; and one of his earliest works, De Fide Trinitatis, was an attack on the Nominalist Roscellin's doctrine of the Holy Trinity. His two most celebrated works are Proslogium, written before 1078, and setting forth the ontological proof of the existence of God, and Cur Deus Homo, finished at Capua in 1098, and developing those views of atonement and satisfaction which still are held by orthodox divines. His Meditationes and Orationes are of an edifying and contemplative character rather than dialectical, but are often very impressive.

J. L. JACOBI.

ANSELM, Bishop of Havelberg, was sent in 1135, by Lothair II., as ambassador to the court of Constantinople; and here he held a conference with Nicetas, Archbishop of Nicomedia, on the principal points of controversy between the two churches. On his return, in 1145, he visited Rome; and on the suggestion of Pope Eugene III. he wrote down a report of the dispute. In the mean time a papal vicar had come to Rome, sent by the emperor: and the defence which he delivered for the Greek liturgy seemed to have made some impression on the pope; at least, the pope deemed it right that some kind of an answer should be prepared, and for this purpose the above report was published. See D'ARCHERY: Spicilegium I., 161.

ANSELM, St., surnamed Baduarius, because he descended from the family of Badagio: b. in Milan, 1036; d. in Mantua, March 18, 1086; was a nephew of Pope Alexander II., whom he succeeded as Bishop of Lucca in 1061. He soon resigned, however, and retired to the Monastery of Cluny. Gregory VII. ordered him to return to his see; but, being a devoted friend of the pope, the adherents of the emperor expelled him, and he then lived at the court of the Countess Mathilda, until Leo IX. sent him as papal legate to Lombardy. In the conflict between Gregory VII. and Henry IV. he wrote a Defensio pro Gregorio VII. and a pamphlet, Contra Guiberium Anti-popam, which are found in Romaniti Bibliotheca Pontificia IV. His biography was written by the Bolla NDIST, March 18, and by ANDREA ROTA, Veron., 1735.

ANSELM OF LAON, or Laudinensis (Laon being his birthplace), studied under Anselm of Canterbury, in the Monastery of Bec; taught from 1076 scholastic theology in Paris, and contributed much to the rising prosperity of that university. Towards the close of the eleventh century he returned to his native city, where he was made archdeacon and scholasticus. In this position he became director of a theological school, which soon was much frequented. Abelard was for some time among his pupils. He was an enthusiastic teacher, and refused several times the episcopal dignity, in order to stay with his school; died 1117. His Glossa interlinearis, a commentary to the Vulgate, written in notes between the lines, formed for a long time, together with the Annales Lauresium by Walfrid Strabo, the principal source of all exegetical knowledge. It was printed in Basel in 1502 and 1508, and in Antwerp in 1634.

ANSGAR. (from Angeli or Osger, the modern Oscar, "God's spear"), the apostle of Scandinavia, b. Sept. 9, 981, near Corbie in the diocese of Amiens; d. in Bremen, Feb. 3, 965; was educated by Adalhard and Wala in the Monastery of Corbie; moved in 822 with a number of brother-monks to the newly founded Corvey in Westphalia, and accompanied King Harold Klak back to Jutland, in 826, as missionary among the Danes. In 831 the bishopric of Hamburg was founded, and Ansgar was appointed bishop; and in 834 this see was united with that of Bremen, and elevated to an archbishopric,—the metropolitan see of Scandinavia. Ansgar made also two journeys to Sweden; and though in 845 the heathen Danes swept down upon Hamburg, burnt the city, and drove away the missionaries, Christianity, nevertheless, got secure foothold in Denmark before Ansgar died. See Rimbart: Vita Ansgaris in Pertz: Mon. II.; Adam of Bremen: Gesta Hamb. Eccl. Pont., in Pertz: Mon. VII.; Tappehorn: Leben d. hl. Ansgar, Münster, 1863; and the article Denmark.

ANSO, a monk and (776–800) abbot of Lobbes, but not also a bishop, as his predecessors had been. In his day the monastery continued independent of the diocese of Liege; but in 889 it was annexed. Anso was a very worthy, zealous man, but far from wise. We owe to his industry while a monk the compilation from the sources of biographies of two of the abbots-bishops who preceded him at Lobbes, the "Vita S. Ursarii" (circa 689–713), which the Bollandists reprinted under April 18, II., also, by Mabillon, Acta Benedict. III. and, later, was re-written by Bishop Rathearius of Verona, and Abbot Foculion of Lobbes; and the "Vita S. Ermini," or "Erminos" (713–757), reprinted by the Bollandists for the complete account of him. The Chronicle of Alberich confounds him with Ansegis of Fontanella (see title).

ANTERUS, Bishop of Rome (Nov. 21, 235-Jan. 3, 236), succeeded Pontianus, and suffered, according to one account, martyrdom. Eusebius (Hist. eccl. VI., 29) places him in the time of the Emperor Gordian.

ANTHOLOGIUM, "Ανθολογίον, the name of one of the church-books of the Greek Church, containing the offices for the festivals of the Lord, the Virgin Mary, the principal saints, etc., having been much augmented by successive editors.

ANTHONY, St., the father of monasticism; b. in 251, in the village of Coma, in the neighborhood of Thebais, Egypt; d. in 356, in the mountain-deserts on the border of the Red Sea; belonged to an old and wealthy Coptic family, but gave away all his wealth to the poor, and began to lead an ascetic life in his native village, supporting himself by the labor of his hands. Soon, however, the temptations began; the irresistible passions of human nature, and perhaps also the allurements of pride, trying to carry him back into the world which he had renounced. In order to conquer, he adopted a still severer manner of life, repairing to a cave, and mortifying his flesh by protracted fasts. But here the temptations reached their highest force. He experienced, according to an ill-true report, that he was shown to his earthly remains. His life was written in 365 by Athanasius, who had known him personally; and, shortly after, the work of Athanasius was translated into Latin by Evagrius, and introduced to the Western Church, where it gave monasticism, if not its first, at all events its most powerful impulse. The authenticity of this work, however, is doubted by H. Merk.

ANTHONY DE DOMINIS (Marco Antonio de Dominis), b. between 1560 and 1570, in the dominion of the Republic of Venice; d. in Rome in 1674; was educated by the Jesuits; entered some practical work, this exercised a most beneficent influence on him and saved him. He became the spiritual leader of many ascetics, and the desert around him became peopled with hermits. From distant places men came to him asking his advice, or doing him homage; and it availed him nothing that he moved farther into the desert in order to escape these disturbances. During the persecution of Maximinus he went to Alexandria, and exhorted the Christians to be true to the end. Once more, during the Arian controversy, he visited the Egyptian metropolises, in order to defend orthodoxy; and both times his appearance in the busy world produced the profoundest impression. When he was dying, he ordered that the place of his burial should be kept secret, in order that no idolatrous honor should be shown to his earthly remains. His life was written in 365 by Athanasius, who had known him personally; and, shortly after, the work of Athanasius was translated into Latin by Evagrius, and introduced to the Western Church, where it gave monasticism, if not its first, at all events its most powerful impulse. The authenticity of this work, however, is doubted by H. Merk.

ANTHONY, St., Order of. Towards the close of the eleventh century, there raged in France an epidemic (sacer morbus), which people commonly called the "Fire of St. Anthony," because they expected aid against the evil from this saint. And when the only son of a rich nobleman, Gaston, in the Dauphiné, was taken ill by this disease (1095), the father went to the Church of S. Didier la Mothe, in which the relics of the saint were sacred to the saint of the order, probably expected aid against the evil from this saint. And when the only son of a rich nobleman, Gaston, in the Dauphiné, was taken ill by this disease (1095), the father went to the Church of S. Didier la Mothe, in which the relics of the saint were said to have been buried, and made a vow, that, if the son recovered, he would give all his wealth to the saint, to be spent in releasing those who suffered from the same disease. The son recovered, and the promise was redeemed. A hospital was built in which the sick were nursed, and the father as well as the son and eight friends devoted themselves to this service. In 1208 this brotherhood of laymen were allowed by Innocent III. to build a church; in 1228 Honorius III. permitted them to take monastic vows; and in 1237 Boniface VIII. confirmed them as regular canons under the rules of St. Augustine. They wore a black garment with a blue T, or the cross of St. Anthony; and when collecting alms they carried a small bell around their necks, thus announcing their arrival. People used to present them each year with a pig, which was consecrated to the saint of the order, probably with reference to the destruction of the herd of swine (Matt. viii. 30–32). The order spread in France, Germany, and Italy, and attained great wealth. The Abbot of St. Antoine, Vienne, was its grand-master. For the time of the Reformation it had degenerated, and the conduct of its members gave occasion to much satire. In the seventeenth century a reform was attempted, but failed. In 1774 the order was united with that of the Maltese, and with the latter it was finally dissolved.

the order; taught philosophy in various places in Northern Italy; and was appointed Bishop of Segni, in the neighborhood of Rome, in 1506, and two years afterwards Archbishop of Spalatro, and Primate of Dalmatia and Croatia. Disagreeing with the pope, Paul V., concerning the interdict laid on the city of Venice in 1506, suspected of entertaining views somewhat similar to those of Paolo Sarpi, and hated by the Jesuits, from whose order he had been expelled, he went to Rome to defend himself. The Inquisition acquitted him, but did not declare him guiltless; and, provoked by this equivocation, he left Italy, and went to England, explaining in a Latin memoir, published in 1616, that it was the innovations and errors of the Roman popes which drove him out of "Babylon." In England, where he was very flatteringly received by James I., he was converted to Protestantism, joined the Church of England, and was made Dean of Windsor. This apostasy caused a great sensation, the more so, as Anthony now attacked the Roman Church, and various of its doctrines, in a series of learned and brilliant works. In the De Republica Erastiatiea he denied the primacy of St. Peter and the papal see, and defended the Anglican view of the equality of the bishops with the pope. In his views of the relation between the pope and the various state-governments, he follows closely in the track of his countryman Sarpi, whose history of the Council of Trent he published in London, 1819. Suddenly, however, he left England, disappointed, as it would seem, at not being made Bishop of York; and in Brussels he returned to the Roman Church, and various of its doctrines, in a series of learned and brilliant works. In the Life of De Dominis, London, 1800; Anthony of Padua, b. at Lisbon in 1195; d. at Padua in 1231; the most celebrated of the followers of St. Francis of Assisi; entered, when fifteen years old, the order of the Augustines, but joined afterwards the new order of St. Francis; settled for some time in a monastery near Bologna, and lived there under the severest practices of penitence; studied theology at Vercelli, and taught at Bologna, Toulouse, Montpellier, and Padua, but devoted himself later on exclusively to preaching; in which office he achieved such a success, that even the fishes, it is said, ascended from the waters to hear him. His works have been published as an appendix to those of St. Francis, by L. Wadding, Antwerp, 1623; and by Horowy: Medii ævi bibliotheca patriarcha, Tom. VI., Paris, 1890.

ANTHONY OF LEBRIJA (Antonius Nebrissenius), b. in 1442; d. in 1522; studied at various universities in Spain and Italy; was professor of classical literature, first in Salamanca, and then in Alcala; assisted since 1508 in the edition of the Complutensian Bible Polyglot; described, as historiographer to Ferdinand and Isabella, two decades of their reign; and published, not unnoticed by the Inquisition, but protected by the favor of Cardinal Ximenes, Quiquagena Locum. St. Scriptures, non vulgariter enarratorum, 1520, besides.

ANTHROPOMORPHISM (anthropos, man, morphe, form) and ANTHROPOPATHISM (anthropos, man, pathos, passion). These terms designate those views of God which represent him as possessed of human attributes or human passions. Thus the Audians of the fourth and fifth centuries taught that all passages of the Bible which speak of God's hands, ears, eyes, etc., are to be interpreted literally: on the other hand, many philosophers call the conception of God as a personal spirit anthropomorphic. While the Scriptures, rightly interpreted, lend no support to either extreme view, they yet declare that we are made in the image of God, and that therefore He who made us is like us in every pure emotion, and is possessed of all our powers, but not in the same way or measure with ourselves.

ANTHROPOMORPHITES. See Audians.

ANTICHRIST. The word occurs in the New Testament only in the Epistles of John; but the idea—an antitype to the Messiah, a worldly power working against the divine scheme of salvation, the last and greatest enemy which the Saviour of mankind has to defeat—is often referred to in the eschatological discourses of the Gospels (Matt. xxiv. 15 sq.), in the Epistles of Paul (2 Thess. ii. 3), in Revelation (xvi., xvii.); and it has its root in the Old Testament (Ezek. xxxviii., xxxix.; Dan. xi.). The idea is apocalyptic in its whole character, —dim, giving only one vague glimpse of what is to happen when the time has come, and yet full of warning, and, by its fitness for application, offering a clue to the meaning of the passing times. Daniel seems to apply it to Antiochus Epiphanes; the Revelation, to Nero,—if the interpretation of the cabalistic figure 666 is correct,—the Christians of the eighth century, to Mohammed; the Reformers, to the pope,—the idea involving the double element of hostility to Christ, and falseness, —Hengstenberg and his school, to that combination of social radicalism and military despotism which characterized the government of Napoleon III.; Frederic Godet, II. Martensen, and others, to that merely negative liberalism, which, accompanied by an almost cynical sensationalism, works in modern civilization as a most baneful agency of demoralization. ANTIDICOMARIANITES, or ANTIMARIANS, adversaries of Mary, the mother of the Lord, a sect which flourished in Arabia towards the end of the fourth century, and is specially treated by Epiphanian in the book which they taught, that, after the birth of Christ, Mary had borne children to Joseph; and, by a lengthy argument communicated in the above place, Epiphanian endeavors to refute them. They did not separate from the Church, however, but must be considered as belonging to the Church, and by monkish excitement fomented, Mariolatry of the times.

Antimessianum denotes in the Greek Church the cloth, which, at the beginning of the mass, was spread over the altar. The Greek as well as the Roman Church holds that mass cannot be celebrated except on a consecrated altar (comp. Gregor. Nysa. Opp. Tom. III., p. 399); and such a consecration cannot be performed except by a bishop, no mass can be celebrated in those churches which as yet have received no episcopal consecration. From this circumstance originated the antimessianum, which, in the Greek Church, corresponds to the altar portabile in the Latin. See Altar.

Antinomianism is an exaggeration of that antithesis between faith and works, the gospel and the law, on which the whole Pauline theology is based; faith (the gospel) being emphasized so strongly and one-sidedly, that works (the law) lose their legitimate position in the system of salvation, and assume the aspect of something intrinsically wrong and bad. The first traces of Antinomianism are found in the Gnostic systems, which often dropped the whole moral sphere of human life as something to which a truly spiritual man could and should be entirely indifferent. The opposite extreme is developed by the Roman Church, which ascribes a value to works, the mere actions, in their naked externality, the mechanical observation of the precepts and rites of the law, independently of sentiment, intention, conviction, etc. As a re-action against the Judaizing legalism of the Roman Church, in which the life-principle of the gospel had become entirely lost, the Reformation naturally came to lay much stress upon the faith (the gospel), in contradiction to the works (the law); and with some of Luther's co-workers, especially with Agricola, this tendency developed into rank Antinomianism. He would hear nothing about a moral condition for salvation: the only condition was faith,—faith pure and simple. As an inexcusable cause of this disagreement between the Reformers were smoothed over by a conference between Agricola and Melanchthon at Torgau (1527); but in 1537 the former renewed his attacks, and went so far as to say that "all who had anything to do with Moses would go to the devil, for Moses ought to be hanged." He was completely refuted by Luther, left Wittenberg, and lived quietly in Berlin until 1562, when a sermon by him on Luke vii. 37-49 again started the controversy. Agricola died in 1566, but others continued the strife for some time. Amsdorf declared that "good works were detrimental to salvation." After the establishment of the Formula Concordiae (1577), the movement died out, however, in Germany; but Antinomian tendencies became visible, both among the Puritans under Cromwell, and among the Quietists (Madame Guyon).

Antioch in Syria, the second capital of Christianity, and the third city of the Roman Empire, as to population, wealth, and commercial activity, was situated about three hundred miles north of Jerusalem, upon the left bank of the Orontes, and sixteen miles and a half from the Mediterranean. The city lay in a deep pass between the Lebanon and Taurus mountain-ranges. Its founder was Seleucus Nicator, who (B.C. 300) removed thither the inhabitants of Antigonia. In order to distinguish it from fifteen other Antiochs built by the same indefatigable city-builder, who in this way perpetuated his father's name, its common epithets were "Epiphannes" (near Daphne, the notorious temple and grove), or "on the Orontes." It owed much of its splendor, which was particularly in streets and porticoes, to Antiochus Epiphanes and Herod the Great; but all its rulers successively beautified it. — Roman emperor no less than Syrian king. Victorious Pompey made it the seat of the legate of Syria (B.C. 64), and a free city, which further increased its population and prosperity. A mixed multitude inhabited it; and Antioch quickly ranked next to Alexandria, and kept her place for centuries, and this notwithstanding the danger from earthquakes, which several times destroyed the city, and doubtless produced the superstitions so common in the place. The most severe of those recorded was A.D. 526, when two hundred and fifty thousand persons are said to have been killed; there being an assembly of Christians at the time. But after each visitation in old times, the city rose, and, helped by its stored-up resources and the liberal donations of the emperors, it again became noted for its beauty. One remarkable feature was an avenue which traversed the city from east to west, a distance of about four miles, and which had two rows of columns forming a covered way on either hand, with an open granite-paved road between. Palaces of imperial and provincial dignities, mansions of wealthy merchants, houses of unpretending folk — all that luxury could suggest and money could buy, Antioch contained. The people were gay, pleasure-loving, and proud. The street-life was wonderfully varied. Every sense was pampered, though every sensation was shocked. Dancing-women charmed by their grace; adventurers of all sorts amused by their mimicry, or amazed by their skill. There was also much culture, though, for the most part, misdirected. Philosophers, rhetoricians, and poets exposed their intellectual wares: but too often the first excused the sin, the second glorified it; while in melodious verse the third class sang the praises of guilty love. Science, of a sort, existed: the stars were studied, principally for their supposed effect upon, or prophecy of, human destiny; animate nature was scanned, in order to find an answer to the questions of future weal or woe.

From its foundation, Jews formed a considerable fraction of its population. Seleucus Nicator put a colony there, and gave them equal privileges with the Greeks (Joseph. Ant., 12. 3. 1.; c. Apion. 2. 4). It is probable, however, that they held their Pagan neighbors in too great disdain to make much exertion to teach them any thing. Yet one of the first deacons was Nicolas, a proselyte of Antioch (A.D. 37), and he could not have been alone. But at the beginning of Christianity troubles and religious influence; for thither fled some of those whom persecution, after Stephen's death, drove from Jerusalem (Acts xi. 19, 20); and so impor-
tart was the work there begun, that Barnabas was sent (A.D. 41) to look up Paul, and secure his aid, as a man of wider culture and deeper philosophic insight in preaching the gospel to those subtle Greeks (Acts xi. 26). The soil was rich. The wisdom-loving multitude heard of the wisdom and love of God. They found refreshment in the gospel's pure water of salvation. Many, "bitter with weariness and sick with sin," listened with faith to the truth, and gladly escaped the defilement of their world through the protection of Christ. Between the mother-church and its daughter there was great intimacy, but by no means agreement: indeed, the first church council was occasioned by the difference between them in regard to the necessity of circumcision (Acts xv.). (See Apostolic Council.) It was at Antioch that Paul so sternly rebuked Peter's inconsistent conduct (Gal. ii. 11). But for two most important things the world is the debtor to the gay capital,—the Christian name given by the witty populace to distinguish those whom the Jews called the "Nazarenes" from their Jewish kinsmen (see Christian, origin of the name), and Christian missions; for from these proceeded Paul and Barnabas on their first missionary journey, and thither they returned (Acts xiii. 1, 4, xiv. 20). Their second tour began there likewise, though they did not go in company (Acts xv. 39, 40); and there ended Paul's second (xviii. 23). After the fall of Jerusalem, the Antiochian Church took the lead in Asia, and ranked with that of Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, and Jerusalem, as the seat of a patriarch, when the patriarchates were formed in the fifth century. This position it still holds, not only in the Greek, but also the Latin Church: indeed, in the latter communion the title of "Patriarch of Antioch" is used by the Eusebians as a cover under which their extreme Arian position was defended. Now it is a miserable, dirty town of six thousand inhabitants. Repeated earthquakes have rendered even the traces of the ancient walls a matter of great curiosity, and the name, Antakie, reminds the traveller of the once popular, populous, powerful Antioch. But, as the gospel is again taught there in its purity by Protestant missionaries, it has become a religious centre, and may once more send out missions to bless all Asia and the world.

Lit.—The writings of Josephus, Libanius the Sophist, and Chrysostom are the most copious original sources of information respecting Antioch. See, also, Johannes Malalas: Historia Chronicon, Codex Pulgar, the most complete monograph upon ancient Antioch. C. O. Muller: Antiquitates Antiochener, Gottingen, 1839. Modern Antioch is described by Pococke: Description of the East, London, 1743–45. Ritter: Pa- list. u. Syrien (part of Die Erdkunde), trans. by Gage, The Complete Geography of Palestine and the Sinaitic Peninsula, Edinburgh, 1896, 4 vols.

Antioch, School of. This term does not denote an educational institution, like that of the cathedralschool of Alexandria, but a theological tendency, which, from Antioch as its centre, spread through the whole Graeco-Syrian Church. The presbyter and martyr Lucian (d. 311), who exercised a great influence as a teacher, and his colleague, the presbyter Dorotheus, are generally mentioned as the founders of this school; and the attempts which have been made to carry the date of its origin still farther back have invariably led to uncertainty. There is, however, if not a historical connection, at least a psychological affinity, between Lucian and Paul of Samosata, though the monarchianism of the latter stands on quite another ground than the later Christology of the Antiochian school. But both show, at least in a general way, a tendency to emphasize an absolute distinction between the divine and the human nature in Christ, in opposition to a mystical conception which confounded them; and both are characterized by a certain cool intellectualness, which shrank back from the mystery of the incarnation, and under other circumstances became Arianism. Arius himself, Eusebius, and the Sophist, and Chrysostom, are the most copious original sources of information respecting the East, London, 1743–45. Ritter: Paliast. u. Syrien (part of Die Erdkunde), trans. by Gage, The Complete Geography of Palestine and the Sinaitic Peninsula, Edinburgh, 1896, 4 vols.

For the fragments of his commentaries still extant are ascribed to Asterius. Of the Arian bishop Theodore of Heraclea, it is not known whether he ever received instruction from Lucian; but he belongs, at all events, to that group of men who, from a psychological point of view, as his biblicalexegesis he started a new principle, directly opposed to the dogmatico-allegorical expositions of the school of Origen, and propagated by a number of able disciples. Arius taught for some time exegesis in the cathedralschool of Alexandria, and commented upon the Gospels, the Psalms, and the Epistle to the Romans; but the fragments of his commentaries still extant are ascribed to Asterius. Of the Arian bishop Eusebius of Emesa. He was born, like Lucian, in the eastern part of Syria, in the neighborhood of Edessa; studied under Eusebious of Cesareas, and his exegetical method exercised a decisive influence on Diodore. Also Eustathius of Antioch belongs to the school, not so much on account of his dogmatical standpoint — for he was a staunch adherent of the Council of Nicea — as because of his exegetical works. His celebrated essay on the witch of Endore De Engastrimathia, is directly opposed to the exegetical method of Origen. In a more special sense of the word, Diodore of Tarsus may be called the father of the Antiochian school. He was presbyter in Antiochia, and occupied a prominent position as a teacher. Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia were among his pupils, and the latter became the classical representative of the school. His theology is vigorous and original, a genuine offspring of the old Greek theology, in vital connection with its father, Origen, and emphasizing human freedom, to utilize the Ciceronian argumentation to the Augustinianism of the Latin Church. Both Diodore and Theodore agree with the great Fathers of their time with respect to the Nicene Creed, and contend not only against Arianism, but also against Apollinarism. But, with respect to exegesis, Diodore declares that he prefers the historical to the allegorical; and Theodore pushes his hermeneutical principles still further towards a true grammatico-historical exposition. Also Theodore's brother Polychronius, first monk in the Monastery of St. Zebins, near Kyros, afterwards Bishop of Apamea (d. 390), deserves to be noticed. He was superior to his brother in knowledge of Hebrew and Syriac; and his commentary on Daniel, of which a large fragment has been given by Angelo Mai in Script. Vet. Nova Col. I., occupies a prominent place among the exegetical works of the school. See O. Bardenhewer: Polychronius, Bruder Theodors von M., Freiburg i. Br. 1879. In a practical way, Chrysostom is, of course, the finest fruit which the school produced; but both he and Iasidore of Pelusium made concessions to the allegorical method, or do not distinguish clearly between type and allegory. The last representative of the school was the learned and adroit but somewhat wavering Theodoret: his exegesis is, like his dogmatics, a compromise.

Antiochus is the name of twelve kings of Syria, of whom the following are of interest for sacred literature. — Antiochus II., with the surname ὅν γὰρ τὸν Μεσίλιαν γὰρ ἔδωκεν, which the Mileseans gave him for freeing them from the tyrant Timarchus (261 to 219), was, after a war of eight years with the Egyptian king, Ptolemy II. (Philadelphus), compelled in 219 to accept peace on the conditions that he should divorce his wife and step-sister, Laodice, and marry Berenice, a daughter of Philadelphus. Two years after, Philadelphus died, and Antiochus now took back his first wife. She, however, had not forgotten the slight offered her by the divorce: she poisoned her husband and Alcilla, who was step-sister to Berenice. Berenice's brother, Ptolemy III. (Euergetes), hastened to Syria with an army, but came too late to save her. To this unfortunate marriage-connection between the dynasties of the South (Egypt) and the North (Syria) refers the passage in Daniel (xi. 6), and in a general way it is symbolized by the feet of the colossus, half of iron, and half of clay, but unable to stand firmly (Dan. ii. 33-39). Antiochus III., the Great (224 to 187), began war with Egypt in 218, but was completely defeated at Raphia, near Gaza, and saved from further loss only by the slovenliness of the Egyptian king, Ptolemy Philopator (Dan. xi. 11). He then turned towards the eastern frontiers of his realm, against Parthia and Bactria; penetrated into Northern India, and organized a formidable army, including a hundred and fifty Indian elephants. In 204 Philopator died; and the Egyptian crown now devolved on his son, Ptolemy V. (Epiphanes), a boy of five years. This circumstance Antiochus meant to utilize. He conquered Coel-Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine, and gained a decisive victory, in 198, at Paneas in Coel-Syria. Peace was then concluded; and he promised to give his daughter Cleopatra, who was engaged to Ptolemy Epiphanes, the three conquered provinces as a dowry; but the promise was not redeemed (Dan. xi. 13-17). He then invaded Asia Minor, and in 195 he crossed the Hellespont, and advanced into Europe. Here he encountered the Romans; but in 190 he was totally defeated at Magnesia by Scipio Aemilianus, and he obtained peace from Rome only on very severe conditions (Dan. xi. 18; 1 Macc. viii. 6). Retiring to his eastern provinces in order to raise money for the tribute he owed to Rome, he was slain in 187, while plundering the temple of Belus in Elymais. — Antiochus IV. Epiphanes (176 to 164), grasped the sceptre after the death of his brother, and retained it in spite of the just claims of his nephew (Dan. xi. 21). The most prominent trait of his character was an overwhelming pride (2 Macc. v. 21, ix. 8; Dan. vii. 8, x. 20, xi. 36). He called himself διός, and assumed the surname of the Olympian Zeus, as a true Oriental despot he ordered that all his subjects should form one nation, with one god and one worship. This god should be the Olympian Zeus, whose worship was unknown to most of his subjects (Dan. xi. 36-39); but, as he wholly identified himself with this deity, it was, indeed, his own worship he ordered introduced (2 Macc. vi. 7). Among the Jews there was a party which favored Paganism in its Greek form, and this party found ready support with Antiochus (1 Macc. i. 11-15). In 175 the pious high priest Onias was overthrown by his brother Jesus, who changed his name to the Greek Jason, bought the office as high priest from Antiochus, and received permission to introduce Greek games at the temple, which caused the worship of Jehovah to be much neglected (2 Macc. iv. 7). Three years later on, Jason was overthrown by Menelaus, who made a higher bid for the office, and succeeded in retaining it by the foulest means: thus he slew Onias (2 Macc. iv. 23-50). Antiochus made four campaigns to Egypt, and had hopes of entirely subjugating that country, when he suddenly died in his own camp near the Romans (168). In the interval between the first and the second Egyptian campaign he plundered... the temple in Jerusalem (1 Macc. i.20); and on his final return from Egypt he ordered that the worship of Jehovah, circumcision, the Sabbath, the distinction between clean and unclean, should be abolished; that the sacred books should be burnt, and altars raised, on which every one was to sacrifice to the Olympian Zeus, under penalty of death (1 Macc. i.29; 2 Macc. v.29). On Chisleu 15, 164, an altar was erected secreted in the temple to the Olympian Zeus (2 Macc. vi.2; 1 Macc. i.54, Βασίλειον ἑρμοσύνης; comp. 1 Macc. i.59 and iv.38), and on Chisleu 25 the first burnt offering was presented. To this altar refer Dan. ix.27, xi.31, xii.11; comp. also Matt. xxiv.15. On Mount Gerizim the worship of Zeus Xenios was established (2 Macc. vi.2). This last step had long been prepared by the Greek party among the Jews, and the bloody persecutions made many renegades. Many, however, remained true to their faith in spite of the most horrible tortures (1 Macc. i.52-64; 2 Macc. viii.10). At the head of the faithful stood the priest Mattathias. At Modin, near Joppe, he struck down the Syrian captain before the idolatrous altar, and thus he ushered in the armed resistance of the Jews. Antiochus determined to put down all resistance; but, being in need of money (2 Macc. viii.10), he divided his army into two parts, and went himself with the one-half to his eastern provinces for the purpose of collecting the tribute (1 Macc. iii.34); while the other was placed under command of Lysias. Lysias, however, was completely defeated by Judas Maccabeus, and the Jews once more became masters of the temple. On Chisleu 25, 165, exactly three years after the presentation of the first Pagan sacrifice, the temple was purified with great solemnity, and it was determined that an annual feast should be celebrated in commemoration of the day (1 Macc. iv.59), called "the Feast of the Dedication" (John x.22). Meanwhile Antiochus met with very little success in the East. He attempted to plunder the rich temple of Nanae in Elymais, but was repelled by the inhabitants, and died shortly after (164) at Tabib, having just received the news from Judaea (1 Macc. vi.4; Polyb. xxxi.11; Jerome on Dan. xi.). In the Old Testament he is represented as the fiend of the Lord, of his people, and of his dispensation (Dan. xi.21; 1 Macc. i.10); in the New, as the prototype of Antichrist (Rev. xiii.5). —Antiochus V., Eupator (164 to 162), a son of Antiochus Epiphanes, was a minor when his father died, and had been placed, during his father's absence in the East, under the tutorship of Lysias. The dying Epiphanes, however, had made Philippus tutor of his son, and regent of the whole realm; and when Lysias heard of these dispositions, he immediately made peace with the Jews. The peace of Judaea was of short duration, however. The Greek party and the high priest Menelaus continued to incite the Syriac government against the faithful (1 Macc. vi.21-27; 2 Macc. xiii.3); and in 163 an army of a hundred thousand foot, twenty thousand horse, and many elephants, invaded the country. The fortress of Bethzura surrendered; Jerusalem was beleaguered and taken. But Antiochus now learnt that Philippus advanced from Persia with a great army. He immediately made peace with Judas Maccabeus, and turned against Philippus, not, however, until after destroying in a faithless manner the fortifications of Jerusalem (1 Macc. vi.51,52; 2 Macc. xiii.23). Philippus he defeated; but in 162 Demetrius escaped from Rome, landed at Tripolis, and took possession of the throne of Syria almost without resistance (1 Macc. vii.1-4; 2 Macc. xiv.1). —Antiochus VI. Epiphanes Dionysius, was a son of Alexander Balas (see title), who in 146 was overthrown by Demetrius II. Though a mere child at the death of his father, he was raised to the throne by Tryphon. He gained the high priest Jonathan, and the brother of the high priest Simon, over to his side (1 Macc. xi.57-74, xii.24-54); but Tryphon showed himself a traitor, and in 143 both Jonathan (1 Macc. xii.39) and Antiochus (1 Macc. xiii.41) were murdered. —Antiochus VII. Sidetes (from Sida in Pamphylia, where he was educated) was a brother of Demetrius II., who in 141 was taken prisoner in Parthia (1 Macc. xiv.1-3), and obtained in 139 the crown of Syria (1 Macc. xv.10). He won the high priest Simon for his side, and succeeded in shutting Tryphon up in Dora (1 Macc. xv.14, 25, 26); but as Simon had conquered several towns belonging to Syria, and Antiochus demanded that he should give up these places, or pay a thousand talents in silver, war broke out between Syria and Judaea. After defeating Tryphon, Antiochus sent his general, Cendebaeus, with an army, into Judaea; but he was defeated by Simon's son, John Hyrcanus (1 Macc. xv.27-xvi.10). In 136 Simon was murdered (1 Macc. xv.14), and his murderer, Ptolemay, asked for help from Antiochus (1 Macc. xvi.18). Antiochus then invaded Judaea, and pushed onwards victoriously to Jerusalem. It was the time of the feast of tabernacles; and so nobly did Antiochus behave during the celebration of the solemnity, that the Jews gave him the surname of Eusebes. Peace was concluded shortly after. The Jews retained free exercise of their religion, but were compelled to surrender their books, and should be burnt, and altars raised, on which sacrifices should be abolished; that the sacred books should be destroyed; and that the distinction between clean and unclean should be abolished; that the sacred books should be burnt, and altars raised, on which every one was to sacrifice to the Olympian Zeus, under penalty of death (1 Macc. i.29; 2 Macc. v.29). On Chisleu 15, 164, an altar was erected secreted in the temple to the Olympian Zeus (2 Macc. vi.2; 1 Macc. i.54, Βασίλειον ἑρμοσύνης; comp. 1 Macc. i.59 and iv.38), and on Chisleu 25 the first burnt offering was presented. To this altar refer Dan. ix.27, xi.31, xii.11; comp. also Matt. xxiv.15. On Mount Gerizim the worship of Zeus Xenios was established (2 Macc. vi.2). This last step had long been prepared by the Greek party among the Jews, and the bloody persecutions made many renegades. Many, however, remained true to their faith in spite of the most horrible tortures (1 Macc. i.52-64; 2 Macc. viii.10). At the head of the faithful stood the priest Mattathias. At Modin, near Joppe, he struck down the Syrian captain before the idolatrous altar, and thus he ushered in the armed resistance of the Jews. Antiochus determined to put down all resistance; but, being in need of money (2 Macc. viii.10), he divided his army into two parts, and went himself with the one-half to his eastern provinces for the purpose of collecting the tribute (1 Macc. iii.34); while the other was placed under command of Lysias. Lysias, however, was completely defeated by Judas Maccabeus, and the Jews once more became masters of the temple. On Chisleu 25, 165, exactly three years after the presentation of the first Pagan sacrifice, the temple was purified with great solemnity, and it was determined that an annual feast should be celebrated in commemoration of the day (1 Macc. iv.59), called "the Feast of the Dedication" (John x.22). Meanwhile Antiochus met with very little success in the East. He attempted to plunder the rich temple of Nanea in Elymais, but was repelled by the inhabitants, and died shortly after (164) at Tabib, having just received the news from Judaea (1 Macc. vi.4; Polyb. xxxi.11; Jerome on Dan. xi.). In the Old Testament he is represented as the fiend of the Lord, of his people, and of his dispensation (Dan. xi.21; 1 Macc. i.10); in the New, as the prototype of Antichrist (Rev. xiii.5). —Antiochus V., Eupator (164 to 162), a son of Antiochus Epiphanes, was a minor when his father died, and had been placed, during his father's absence in the East, under the tutorship of Lysias. The dying Epiphanes, however, had made Philippus tutor of his son, and regent of the whole realm; and when Lysias heard of these dispositions, he immediately made peace with the Jews. The peace of Judaea was of short duration, however. The Greek party and the high priest Menelaus continued to incite the Syriac government against the faithful (1 Macc. vi.21-27; 2 Macc. xiii.3); and in 163 an army of a hundred thousand foot, twenty thousand horse, and many elephants, invaded the country. The fortress of Bethzura surrendered; Jerusalem was beleaguered and taken. But Antiochus now learnt that Philippus advanced from Persia with
iii. 11: Ps. cvi. 48, cxlvii. 7; Matt. xxvi. 30.), and thence early introduced in the Christian Church. Socrates (Hist. Eccl. 2: 8) says, Ignatius (116) employed it in Antioch. Basil (329-379), in one of his letters (Epist. 95 ad Neronem.), gives a description of this mode of singing, which is to-day in common use in all liturgical churches.

ANTIPOPE means a rival pope, one not elected in the proper canonical way, but resting his claims on intrigue or force. There has been quite a number of such antipopes. At one time (1046) there were four rival popes, namely, Sylvester III., Benedict IX., Gregory VI., and Clement II. But it has not always been easy to decide which of the rivals was the true pope; so in such cases the church has been divided by a schism. The longest schism broke out after the death of Gregory XI., and lasted for fifty years (1378-1429). As the rivalling popes always condemned and excommunicated each other, this chapter of the history of the Roman Church forms a somewhat peculiar introduction to the dogma of papal infallibility.

ANTITRINITARIANISM is the general name for a number of very different views, which, however, all have this one quality in common, that they oppose the dogma of the Trinity. Such views occur in the earliest days of the Christian Church, even in the apostolic age; and, indeed, the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, such as it was formulated by the Council of Nicaea (325), in the Athanasian Creed, and such as it is still held by the orthodox side of Christendom, alike in the Greek, the Roman, and the Reformed churches, may be said to have developed gradually in steady contest with a rigid, narrow, and Judaistic Monotheism. Unable to grasp the innermost kernel of Christian dogmatics,—the idea of one God in three persons,—and fearful of falling into Pagan Polytheism, the Antitrinitarians of the Anti-Nicene period tried to vindicate Monotheism, either by making the difference between the Father and the Son so great that Christ became a mere creature, a divine being, though not God, a man, though the best of all, etc., or by identifying the Father and the Son so closely, that the Son became nothing but the Father incarnated, crucified, etc. The first of these two Antitrinitarian types, the Monarchians, was represented in the apostolic age by Cerinthus and the Ebionites; and it found its highest development in Paul of Samosata. Probably it is this influence, which, running through the Antiochian school of theology, at last burst forth in Arianism. The other type of Antitrinitarianism, the Patripassians, made its first appearance with Praxeas, in the time of Marcus Aurelius. Then followed Nectus of Smyrna, and Beryllus of Bostra, and the time of Marcus Aurelius. Then followed Theodotus the Younger, a banker in Rome, and Arteus, etc., or by identifying the Father and the Son all free-thinkers, from the spiritualists to the positivists, from the materialists, are by necessity Antitrinitarians; but the dogma of the Holy Trinity is seldom the point of Christian dogmatics which they attack. The Swedenborgians admit a Trinity in one person, but not of persons. See Böck: Historia Antitrinitariorum, Königsberg, 1774-84, 2 vols.; Lange: Geschichte der Unitarier vor d. Nic. Synode, Leipzig, 1831; Trechsel: Die protestant. Antitrinitarius vor F. Socin, Heidelberg, 1839-44.

ANTON, Paul, b. at Hirschfeld, in Upper Lusatia, 1661; d. in Halle, 1730; studied theology in Leipzig; founded, together with Francke, the so-called Collegium Biblicum; was in 1699 made superintendent of Rochlitz, in 1699 court-preacher in Eisenach, and in 1695 professor of theology at the University of Halle, where, together with Breithaupt and Francke, he became a leader of the Pietist movement. His lectures, Collegium Antiatheticae, were edited in 1732 by Schwitzel. The Denkmal des Herrn Paul Anton, published soon after his death, contains an autobiography (to 1725) and Francke's Lectio Parenatica.

ANTONELLI, Giacomo, an Italian cardinal and statesman, b. April 2, 1806; d. in Rome, Nov. 7, 1876. He early achieved distinction, and in 1846 was made minister of finance to Gregory XVI. Pius IX., the next pope, made him a cardinal-deacon (June 12, 1847), papal secretary of foreign affairs (i.e., prime-minister) in 1849, and his chief political adviser, in which capacity he strenuously and persistently opposed every liberal step of the Inquisition; in 1859 he became dean of the order of cardinal-deacons. He had the mortification to see Victor Emmanuel enter Rome as King of Italy, Nov. 21, 1871. He left immense wealth, which he declared on his death-bed was derived entirely from his patrimony. He was certainly one of the oldest statesmen of his day; but his policy was bad.
After his death, a suit involving his moral character was begun, to obtain his property, by the Countess Laura Lambergini, who claims to be his natural daughter, which is not yet (1890) decided.

ANTONIANS, an Antinomian sect of recent date; originated in Switzerland, in the canton of Berne, and received its name from its author, Anton Unternehrer. Born at Schüpfheim, in the canton of Lucerne, Sept. 5, 1570; d. in the jail of the city of Lucerne, June 20, 1824. Under-nehmer was educated and confirmed in the 1404; became vicar-general of the order of Berne, and received its name from its author, Anton Unternährer. Born at Schüpfheim, in the Canton of Lucerne, June 29, 1459; became vicar-general of the order in Tuscany and Naples in 1436, and was elected Archbishop of Florence in 1446. In both of these offices he labored zealously to reform the monasteries under his authority, and won the esteem and love of all by his energy, and readiness for self-sacrifice during the plague (1448) and the earthquake (1453). By Adrian VI. he was canonzized (1523). His principal works are: Summa theologica, treating the moral system much after Thomas Aquinas, first printed at Venice in 1477, and afterwards often revised and augmented, in Italy as a text-book; Lettire di S. A., Florence, 1550, addressed to a distinguished lady, Dolo-data degli Adimari, and treating moral subjects with great earnestness; Summa confessionum, or Chronicon ab orbe condito bipartitum, a world's chronicle, reaching down to the year of 1457, first printed in 1480, and afterwards augmented and altered by the Jesuit P. Maturus, Lyons, 1587. Colclected editions of his works appeared at Venice
in 1741 (4 vols. fol.) and at Florence in 1741

APHAR'SITES, one of the peoples with whom the Assyrians colonized Samaria (Ez. iv. 9), but otherwise utterly unknown.

APHAR SATHCHITES, perhaps identical with the Apharsachites (cf. Ez. iv. 9, v. 6), probably the Paralakhaei, a people on the Medo-Persian border, whom the conquering Assyrians had put in a strange land in order to make harmless, even as they did the Israelites.

WOLF BAUDISSIN.

APEH, in favor of the name of natural cities.

I. A city belonging to the tribe of Asher (Josh. xiii. 30), but never conquered by the Israelites (Josh. xiii. 4); also called Aphuk (Judg.
i. 31); the classical Aphica, the present Afka, situated on Mount Lebanon, near the source of the River Adonis, and at one time famous for its Venus temple, which was destroyed by Constantine the Great.

II. A city in the tribe of Issachar, east of Shunem, on the slope of the Lesser Hurmon, not far from Jezreel (1 Sam. xxix. 1). Here the Philistines encamped before the battle in which Saul lost his life, and here the Syrian king Ben-hadad II. fell into the hands of Ahab (1 Kings xx. 26).

III. A city near Mizpah, north-west of Jerusalem, where the Philistines encamped before the battle in which the sons of Eli were killed (1 Sam.
iv. 1; comp. xii. 12), and perhaps identical with the royal city of the Canaanites (Josh. xii. 18).
IV. A city standing on the plateau east of the Sea of Galilee, probably the present Fik, or Wadi Fik.

APHRATES, a Persian sage, who was martyred 345. Very little is known about him. He composed apocryphal names, and was a bishop and abbot of the Cloister of Mar Matti, upon Mount Elpheph, in the neighborhood of Mosul. His homilies were so highly esteemed, that they were translated from Syriac into Armenian before 500, although under the name of Bishop Jacob of Nisibis. Under this name, Nicholas Antonelli (1756) issued the Armenian text, with a Latin paraphrase. The identification of the name is very recent. In 1869 W. Wright issued twenty-three Homilies of Aphraates, London. The first ten of these are in letter form, and dated 336, 337; the next twelve, joined in alphabetic order; the remaining are dated 343, 344; and the last, August, 345. Aphraates is valuable, because his gospel citations are derived from Tatian's Diatessaron, on which Ephraem Syrus, his contemporary, had written a commentary; and that he is a witness to a very early text. APION, b. in Oasis, of Egyptian descent: studied in Alexandria under Apollonius and Didymus; taught rhetoric in Rome under Caligula; and wrote works on Homer, the history of Egypt, etc., of which, however, only a few and rather insignificant fragments have come down to us. But he has become noted on account of his hatred to the Jews, which he proved both by writing directly against them, and by heading his famous Alexandrian embassy, whose object was to excite Caligula's suspicion against them. Philo headed the Jewish embassy, and Josephus wrote against Apion. On Apion's authority rests the story of Androclus and the lion, of the rest the story of Androclus and the lion, of the case it was secretly killed by the priests, thenew Apis was installed in the temple as an incarnate god. The birth of an Apis was considered an occasion of popular joy, and the death an occasion of popular mourning. All the movements of an Apis were watched with the closest attention by the priests, and interpreted as involving oracles. See MARIETTE: Le Serapéum de Memphis, Paris, 1857.

APOCRISIARIUS. From the time of Constantine, when the great emperor stood at the head of the whole ecclesiastical constitution, it became, of course, of great importance to the patriarca to maintain an uninterrupted connection with the imperial court. For this purpose they appointed ecclesiastical ambassadors (apokruphos, responsæ, from ἀποκριθῆναι, to respond), who resided in the metropolis, and through whom they addressed themselves to the emperor, and received his decisions. It was also the duty of the apocrisarius to introduce the patriarch, or the bishops of the patriarchal diocese, to the court when they visited the metropolis. As long as Rome formed part of the eparchate, and remained dependent of the Greek crown, the pope maintained an apocrisarius in Constantinople. See Du Cange, s.v.

APOCRYPHA OF THE OLD TESTAMENT. The word apokryphas, "hidden," applied to writings, describes both such as are considered mystic or such as are of unknown origin, and those whose meaning or authorship is concealed. The apocryphal is, generally speaking, the obscure, both in purport and origin. The word is used in both senses in the patristic writings. In the first sense Clemens Alex. speaks of the apocryphal books of Zoroaster. Strom. I. 15, 69. So Origen distinguishes between the books in open use in the church and those "apocryphal" (cf. Matt. xxiii. 35; 2 Tim. iii. 8). Similarly the rabbins employed the Hebrew g'natz to designate those copies of the Holy Scriptures which were buried because they were no longer fit for public use. G'natz has also the meaning of uncanonical. In the second sense, of having an "unknown origin," the word naturally shifted into "false." So Ireneus, Tertullian, Augustine, and Jerome. The obscure origin is, of course, suspicious.

In the ancient church and in the middle age the designation "apocryphal" was almost never applied to those books we commonly describe as the Apocrypha. Jerome and a few isolated writers are the only ones who do so. (See Hugo a. Sct. Caro in DE WETTE-SCHRADER, Einleitung in d. A. T., p. 256 sq.) In the first sense the word in this sense in Protestant. The first one to use it thus was Carlstadt (1483–1541) in his book, De Canonis Scripturis Libellus, Wittenberg, 1520 (see CREEDNER: Zur Gesch. des Kanons, 1817, p. 291 sqq.). The first edition of the Bible, in which the uncanonical books of the Old Testament were styled "apocryphal," is the Frankfurt edition of 1531. (See PANZER: Gesch. d. deutsch. Bibliübersetzung, 1783, p. 294 sqq.)

This article is upon not only those books called by Protestants "The Apocrypha," but also those pieces found in the Greek and Latin Bibles, but not in the Hebrew canon.

I. THE POSITION OF THE APOCRYPHA IN THE CANON. The Hebrew canon was settled before the Christian era: Josephus is the witness to this (c. Apion I. 8). He is the better witness, because he uses books which are not in the Hebrew canon. The Greek Bible canon was broader, taking in many writings which are not in the Hebrew. The proof of this is the fact that the Christians quote such uncanonical books from the Septuagint. In the New Testament there is no term to distinguish the canonical from the uncanonical, which is the more remarkable as the writers habitually employ the LXX. See, for Paul, KAUTsch: De Veteris Testamenti Locis a Paulo Apostolo allegatis, 1869. It is important in this connection to bear in mind that in the New Testament only the Pentateuch, the Prophets, and the Psalms are frequently quoted; there are few references to the historical books, and no references to Canticles. Ecclesiastes, Esther, Ezra, and Nehemiah. And since the Apocrypha belongs to these occasionally quoted books, we must not lay too much weight on the absence of express quotation; for there are passages in the New Testament which presuppose the Apocrypha. Thus cf. Jas. i. 19; Ecclus. v. 11; Heb. i. 3; Wis. vii. 26; Heb. iv. 12, 13; Wis. vii. 22-24; Rom. i. 20-32; Wis. xiii.—xv.

The Fathers generally made use of the Apocrypha, and that when there is not the form of a quotation; so that one can say that the church of the first three centuries made no essential difference between the writings of the Hebrew canon and the so-called Apocrypha. Melito of Sardis (fl. second century) and Origen (185-253) do make a distinction, as the result of learned investigations, but not such as to put the apocryphal writings out of use. Still the result of such a distinction as Origen made was to call attention to the fixed character of the Hebrew, as contrasted with the shifting Greek canon; and so in the fourth century there were a number of catalogues of sacred books which limited the canon to the Hebrew, and either did not mention the other books, or else put them in a secondary class. Thus Athanasius (296-373), Cyril of Jerusalem (315-386), Gregory Nazianzen (328-389), and Amphilochius (d. 393), made such catalogues.

(See De WETTE-SCHRADER, Einl., in d. A. T., p. 56 sq.; KEIL, Einl., in d. A. T. 3 Aufi. p. 632.) Epiphanius (310-402) is sometimes erroneously added to this list. But the only one in the ancient church who decidedly opposed the Apocrypha was Jerome, who was the best Hebrew scholar of the church. All these men, however, quote the Apocrypha as “Holy Scripture;” while Augustine (353-430) puts the apocryphal books among the Hebrew canonical books, and calls them canonical, and so do the catalogues of Hippo (393) and Carthage (397), held under his influence. And this may be said to be the position of the entire church, both East and West,—the Council of Trent having declared all but the two books of Esdras and the Prayer of Manasses to be canonical,—until the Reformation, and is the position of the Church of Rome to-day. So the Apocrypha appear in the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and all Roman-Catholic Bibles.

In the Protestant Church, as already remarked, Calvin was the first to draw the line firmly between the canonical and apocryphal books of the Old Testament. In the first complete edition of Luther’s Bible (1534), the Apocrypha were omitted from the other books, and put as an appendix to the Old Testament, with the title “Apocrypha;” that is, books which, although not contained in the Hebrew canon, are yet useful and good to read.” The Apocrypha occupied a similar position in the Reformed Church, but a stricter sentence was passed upon them. In modern times, twice has an agitation been raised against them, each time begun in England (1829 and 1850); and the result has been a substantial increase in our information about them. But also, that whereas they were printed in all Protestant Bibles, and by the British and Foreign Bible Society, up to 1826, since then that Society has omitted them, and the American Bible Society has followed their example. See the works of De WETTE, Keil, and CREEDNER, already quoted; also MOULINIE: Notice sur les livres apocryphes de l’ancien Testament en réponse à la question faut-il les supprimer? Genève, 1828; REUSS: Diss. polonicae de libro V. T. apocryphis perpem plebi negatis, Strassb., 1829; R. II. MANUSCRIPTS OF THE GREEK TEXT. Comp. the Prolegomena, in the editions of the Septuagint by HOLMES-PARSONS and TISCHENDORF, and in FRITSCHE’s edition of the Apocrypha. The number of manuscripts is considerable; but they are mostly of a kind called “cursive,” or “minuscule,” because written in a small letter. The following nine are the only known uncial or majuscule manuscripts: 1. Cod. Vaticanus contains almost all the Bible (Tischendorf sets it in the fourth century: only the Books of the Maccabees are wanting from the Apocrypha); 2. Cod. Sinaiticus, fourth century; 3. Cod. Alexandrinus, fifth century; 4. Cod. Ephraemi, fifth century; 5. Cod. Venice, sixth century; 6. Cod. Basiliano-Vaticanius, ninth century; 7. Cod. Marchallianus, sixth or seventh century; 8. Cod. Cryptoferratensis, a palimpsest fragment of the Prophet, seventh century; 9. Palimpsest fragments of Wisdom and Sirach, sixth or seventh century.

III. OLD TRANSLATIONS. 1. Latin. The old Latin and the Jerome translations must be distinguished.

a. The Jerome translation. Jerome, it is well known, started out with the intention of merely revising the old Latin translation by means of the Septuagint. But he eventually abandoned the effort, and translated directly from the original Hebrew. This, of course, led him to omit the Apocrypha. It is true, he did revise Tobit and Judith, but not as a part of his Bible work.

b. The old Latin. This contains the following books: apocryphal additions to Ezra, Esther, and Daniel, Baruch, Tobit, Judith, 1 and 2 Maccabees (of 2 Maccabees there appears to be no existing Latin translation), Sirach and Wisdom of Solomon. The last two exist only in one Latin translation.
2. Syriac. The vulgar Syriac or the Peshito these is the Syriac hexaplar translation are to be mentioned. The first is unevenly done; but the second in which appears Witzel and Si which is excellent throughout, and for the textual the critic is on this account of great value.
IV. Editions of the Greek Text.—The principal editions of the Septuagint, which includes the Apocrypha, are, 1. The Complutensian Polyglott, in Complutensi universitate, 6 vols., Oxford, 1514–1517; 2. The Aldina: Sacrae Scripturae
Vetere Novaece omnia, Venice, 1518; 3. Vetus Testamentum Graece, ed. Holms and Parsons,
5 vols., Oxford, 1798–1827; 4. Tischendorf:
Vetus Testamentum Graece juxta LXX. Interpretes, The best separate edition of the Apocrypha is by Fritzsche: Libri Apocryphi Veteris Testamenti

1. Translations.—Luther translated the Wis don of Solomon, 1529, the rest of the books in 1534 and 31; when all were collected in his first complete edition of the Bible, 1534. Since then, De Wette, in 1858, and Bunsen, in his Bibel werk fur die Gemeinde, in 1869, have published translations into German. The current English translation of the Apocrypha is found in King James’s version, revised by seven scholars from the previous versions. A complete Hebrew translation was issued by Frankel: Hexapra Apocrypha Posteriora denominata Apocrypha, Lips., 1830.
2. Commentaries.—The most accessible of the older are Arnald: Critical Commentary upon the Apocrypha (part of Patrick, Lowth, and Whitby Commentary on the Bible), London, 1744–52, fol., 2d ed., 1760, new ed. by Pitman, London, 1822, quarto, Philadelphia, U.S., 1846; Charles Wilson: The Books of the Apocrypha, with Crit. and Hist. Observations prefixed, Edin., 1801. By further work of a similar character was much helped. The only American Commentary, but one fresh, able, and scholarly, with a full bibliography appended, is by E. C.
xxv. of Am. ed. of Lange’s Commentary.

VI. The Origin and Nature of the Various Books of the Apocrypha.—1. A.
The apocryphal Ezra, commonly called 1. Esdras.
The title in the authorized version was first given to it in 1560 by the translators of the so-called Geneva version. But the Vulgate calls it “3rd Esdras.” In the Old Latin, Syriac, and Septuagint versions, it was called “1st Ezra.” As a whole, the book is a pretty worthless compilation, identical in its chief contents with the canonical Ezra. This will appear by comparing:
Chap. i. = 2 Chr. xxxv. 6. The restoration of the temple-worship under Josiah (B.C. 639–609), and the history of the successors of Josiah until the destruction of the temple (588).
Chap. ii. 1–14 = Ez. i. Cyrus, in the first year of his reign (537), allows the return of the exiles, and gives them the vessels of the temple.
Chap. ii. 15–23 = Ez. iv. 7–24. In conse quence of charges against the Jews, Artaxersxes (465–455) forbids the further building of the temple and the walls of Jerusalem.
Chap. iii. = Ez. v. 6. Zerubbabel wins the favor of Darius (521–485), and receives permis sion for the return of the exiles.
Chap. v. 7–70 = Ez. ii. 1–iv. 5. List of those who returned with Zerubbabel, activity of Zerubbabel, and interruption of the temple building from the time of Cyrus (536–529) to the second year of Darius (320).
Chap. vi., vii. = Ez. v., vi. Recommence ment and finishing of the temple in the sixth year of Darius (516).
Chap. viii., ix. 30 = Ez. vii. = x. Return of Ezra, with a number of exiles, in the seventh read the law.

From the canonical Ezra the apocryphal is distinguished by these four points: (1) The pas sage of the canonical Ez. iv. 7–24 is in the apocryphal Ezra much condensed, and improved in point of style; (2) The passage of the apocryphal
Ez. iii. –v. 6 is from an unknown source: (3)
2 Chr. xxxv., xxxvi., is prefaced; (4) Neh. vii.
73–viii. 13 is added. Through the first two dif ferences the confusion from which the canonical Ezra partly suffers is materially increased.
The sources are two: (1) The canonical Ezra according to the Septuagint, not the Hebrew: (2) the passage iii.–v. 6 is bodily introduced from some existing Greek work, and it flatly con trasts the rest of the book.
The purpose of the whole compilation has already been rightly expressed by Bertholdt (Einzl. III. 1011): “The author desired to pre sent a history of the temple from the last days of the legal cultus to the building of the temple and the restoration of the worship, compiled from older works.”
In regard to the age, it can only be said that

B. The Second Book of Esdras had for its original title “The Revelation of Ezra;” and it were well if it were retained, as it is appropriate.
It was written originally in Greek. The com mon Latin translation, from which the English was made, contains two important interpolations.
1. — ii., xv., xvi., which are evidently of Christian origin, and are pervaded by an anti-Jewish spirit.

The original work (iii.-xiv.) consists of a series of angelic revelations and visions, in which Ezra is instructed in some of the great mysteries of the moral world, and assured of the final triumph of the righteous.

The time of composition is unsettled. Keil maintains it was written by a Hellenistic Jew of Palestine, about the end of the first Christian century, and early known to the Christians. The first witness to the existence of the book is Clemens Alex. Strom. III. 16. It is quoted with respect by Irenaeus, Tertullian, and Ambrose, but with contempt by Jerome.

2. Additions to Esther. — In the Septuagint Esther the following pieces are inserted, and that so skilfully as to make no break in the narrative: (1) Before Esth. i. 1, the dream of Mordecai of the wonderful deliverance of his people; (2) after Esth. iii. 13, the edict of Artaxerxes, as he is called, to exterminate the Jews; (3) after Esth. iv. 17, the prayers of Mordecai and Esther for the preservation of their people; (4) instead of Esth. v. 1, 2, an account of the reception of Esther by the king; (5) instead of Esth. viii. 13, the second edict of Artaxerxes recalling the first; (6) after Esth. x. 3, Mordecai learns the meaning of his dream.

These additions are later than the Greek translation of Esther. Josephus is the first one to use them, Antiq. Jud. xi. 6, 4 sqq. The subscription, stating that in the fourth year of Ptolemy and Cleopatra, Dositheus and his son brought the book to Egypt, refers to the whole book, and does not therefore give any hint as to the age of the additions, especially since there were not less than four Ptolemies whose queens were named Cleopatra.

There are two Greek texts of Esther, — a revised and an un-revised.

3. Additions to Daniel. — a. The Prayer of Azarias and the Song of the Three Children in the Oven, inserted after Dan. iii. 23. b. The History of Susanna. In the Greek text this usually forms the first part of Daniel (although it also occurs after the twelfth chapter), because he is regarded as the son of Susanna, and her deliverer through his wisdom. c. The History of Bel and the Dragon: this forms an appendix to the book. b. and c. make no pretensions to be part of the original text. They were written in Greek. There is an interesting correspondence extant, between Julius Africanus and Origen, in regard to Susanna, the former attacking, and the latter defending, its genuineness. See separate ed. Juli Africani de Historia Susanna Epistolam et Origenis ad ilium Re-though leading a very exemplary life (i. 1–iii. 6).
At the same time a woman named Sara, the daughter of Raphael in Ecbatana, is very strangely plagued (iii. 7–15). Both these persons pray for help at the same time; and the angel Raphael is sent to them, who delivers them, and unites Sara and the son of Tobit, Tobias, in marriage (iii. 16–xii. 22), whereupon Tobit sings a psalm of praise. He lives to be a hundred and fifty-eight, and Tobias, to be a hundred and twenty-seven (xiii., xiv.). The whole forms an interesting didactic tale, which may have a true story as its basis, but surely is not true in its present form. The object is plainly to show the value and reward of serving God faithfully.
As to the time of composition, nothing definite can be said; but, since the original is Greek, it is probably about B.C. 200. Hitzig (Zeitsehr., f.
Wissenschaft. Theol., 1860, p. 250 sq.), upon insufficient grounds, puts it into the Post-Vespasian period, and thinks it was designed to comfort the Jews over the destruction of the temple.
The Chaldean version of Tobit is of late origin.
Of the Greek text there are three recensions.

8. Judith. — The story of the book is briefly this: Holofernes, the general of Nebuchadnezzar, turns his victorious arms against the Jews, who resolve upon a desperate defence. Holofernes lays vigorous siege to the strong fortress Bethu-lina (i.—vii.). In their darkest hour, one of the besieged, a beautiful widow named Judith, voluntarily assumes their rescue by stratagem. She enters the hostile camp, wins the affection and confidence of Holofernes, and then, while wink in a drunken stupor, she cuts off his head, and returns to the fortress with this trophy of victory. The besieged avail themselves of the confusion to make a destructive attack. The enemy are put to flight, and in this way the people are delivered: and Judith, amid the praises of her nation, and to a good old age (a hundred and five), lived to see the permanent effect of her daring deed.

Here, as in Tobit, we have no sober narrative, but a didactic fiction. Amazing liberties are taken with history. Nebuchadnezzar is called the King of Assyria, and the temple is said to have been rebuilt in his time. The object is to stir up the Jews during the distresses of the Maccabean time,—most probably the time of composition,— to maintain a confident resistance.

It was written originally in Hebrew. The Chaldean version which Jerome had before him was surely not the original. There are three recensions of the Greek text.

läche verteidigt und erklärt, Leipzig, 1861. See

9. The Books of Maccabees. — The name Maxachas was originally only the surname of Judas, the son of Mattathias (1 Macc. ii. 4); but it is not exactly determined what the name means.
The common interpretation, "the hammer," is open to the objection that the sort of hammer described by the Hebrew word adduced is a little, workman's hammer, and not the war or smith's.
Professor Curtius, in his brochure, "The Name Machabee," Leipzig, 1876, advocates the meaning "the extinguisher" (cf. Isa. xiii. 17), because Judas "quenched (extinguished) his foes as tow." The objection to this derivation are, that the use of such a picture by Isaiah does not prove it to be allowable to use as a symbolical name [and, moreover, it rests upon showning, that, in the original form of the name, Kaph was used instead of Kopf, but that Jerome transliterated it by ch in his revision: however, it is not generally allowed that Jerome made a revision of 1 Maccabees on the basis of the Hebrew

The date is thus exactly determined, becausethe

A. The First Book of Maccabees relates the fortunes of the Jews from the accession of Antiochus Epiphanes (B.C. 175) to the death of the high priest Simon (B.C. 135), the period during which, under Judas, who raised the rallying standard, and was chief until his death (B.C.
160), the Jews waged war against their Syrian lords, and under Judas' brother Jonathan (B.C.
160–143), who was recognized as prince and high priest, kept up the struggle, though less actively, and under the third brother, Simon (B.C. 143–135), also high priest, achieved their independence.

This book is reliable history, drawn from trustworthy sources, and can be with confidence set down in the first decade of the first century B.C.
The date is thus exactly determined, because the author was, on the one hand, acquainted with the chronicle of the deeds of John Hyrcanus (B.C.
135–105), and, on the other, ignorant of the conquests of Pompey in Palestine (B.C. 63). It was written originally in Hebrew.

The Second Book of Maccabees runs in time a little before and then parallel with the First book, inasmuch as it extends from the last part of the reign of Seleucus IV. Philopator (or about B.C. 180) to the victory of Judas Maccabees over Nicanor (B.C. 161 or 160), and furnishes a sort of legendary commentary upon it. It is untrustworthy; has far more a religious than an historic interest. The original is Greek. The book is professedly an extract from a history of the Maccabean struggle, in five books, written by Jason of Cyrene. But he is otherwise entirely unknown. In regard to the time, we can only say it was before the destruction of the temple. Josephus does not use either Jason or his epimother. The first express citation occurs in Clemens Alex. Strom. V., p. 505, ed. Sylb.

C. The Third Book of Maccabees can lay no claim to be at all connected with the Maccabees, because it relates altogether to an earlier period. It and the remaining books of the Maccabees are not found in the Vulgate, nor in the English Apocrypha. The story is this: Ptolemy IV. Philopator (B.C. 222–205), after his victory at Raphia (B.C. 217), made a visit to Jerusalem, and attempted to enter the Holy of Holies, but was unable to do so, because, in answer to the high priest's prayer, he fell down paralyzed. In revenge, on his return to Alexandria he persecuted the Jews there. But his attempts at their destruction were wondrously frustrated, and at last became his own friend and benefactor. The book resembles Esther, but only to show its inferiority.

The style is bombastic and involved. Although the book bears the print of un reliability, still it rests partly upon a basis of fact: for Josephus relates of another Ptolemy — Ptolemy VII. Physcon (c. Apion ii. 5) — an incident similar to that recorded of Ptolemy IV., and regard to its use of elephants to trample down the Jews, and also says that the Alexandrian Jews celebrated the deliverance by a yearly feast. The attempted entrance of the temple may have been made by Ptolemy IV., and tradition set also to his account. B. The Second Book of Maccabees describes the martyrdom of Eleazar and of the seven brothers (cf. 2 Macc. vi. 18–vii. 41); but, as the second title of the book, On the Supremacy of Reason, indicates, the history is a mere illustration of that theme. The book is the product of an Alexandrian Jew who had imbued stolical notions. The Fathers attributed it to Josephus; but it is not his, although it well may have dated from his times. It has no historical value; but the style, though rhetorical, is correct and vigorous, and truly Greek, which is the original language. It abounds in words peculiar to the book. Tischendorf published fragments of it in vol. VI. of his Monumenta Sacra Inedita, Leipzig, 1869.

E. The Fifth Book of Maccabees. It is printed in Arabic, in the Paris and London Polyglotts, and contains a history of the Jews from the attempt of Heliodorus (cf. 2 Macc. iii.) to the birth of our Lord. The author based his work upon I. and II. Maccabees and Josephus, but displays ignorance, and perverts the statements of others. He must have lived after the fall of Jerusalem, and probably outside of Palestine.

The original was probably Hebrew. See article by Professor B. F. Westcott in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible. Amer. ed., vol. II., p. 1729.]

10. The Fourth Book of Maccabees. The apocryphal counterpart to the Book of Proverbs, and, like it, of wide range and earnest spirit, proving the author to have been a moralist of exceptional training. It is well worthy of repeated reading. The form of the book is poetical. It has no perceptible plan. The Greek text, which alone has come down to us, is announced by itself to be a translation from the Hebrew; but, even if it were not so stated, it must be so regarded, and one very slavishly and not faultlessly made. In the Talmud there are quotations from it (cf. Zenz: Die gottesdienstl. Vorträgeder Juden, p. 101 sq. Dr. Litzsch: Zur Gesch. der jüd. Poesie, p 201 sq. Dukes: Rabbinische Blumenlese, p. 67 sq.) Jerome says he saw a copy of the Hebrew text. The book in his day was commonly called ' Ecclesiasticus,' as it is to-day.

The author calls himself 'Jesus, the Son of Sirach of Jerusalem;' and the translator was his grandson, who, in his thirty-eighth year, came to Egypt, during the reign of Euergetes.
APOCRYPHA.

i.e., the thirty-eighth year of Euergetes. This gives us a date for the book, because the first of the two Ptolemies who bore the name Euergetes reigned only twenty-five years. But the second, who was named in full Ptolemy VII. Physcon Euergetes II., reigned from B.C. 170 in conjunction with his brother, and from B.C. 145 alone; but he counted his reign from B.C. 170: consequently it was B.C. 132 when the grandson of Sirach came to Egypt: and the book itself may well have been written B.C. 190-170, which was about the time of the death of Simon II. (see Josephus, Antq. XII. 4, 10), whom it eulogizes.

The first Christian writer to quote the book is Clemens Alexandrinus.

11. The Wisdom of Solomon is an animated hymn in praise of Wisdom, who in the beginning sat with God on his throne (ix. 4), and was by him when the world was made (ix. 9), resting upon the ideas about Wisdom made familiar to us by the Book of Proverbs (vii., ix.) and Job (xxviii. 12 sq.).

The author of the book was a Jewish philosopher of the Philo order,— the union of Jewish faith and Greek philosophy. It is true the book Pretends to be from Solomon (viii. 10 sq., ix. 7 sq.); and one modern (Roman-Catholic) theologian, Schmid, can be quoted in behalf of this view. Philo was considered by many, e.g., Luther, to be the author: but it is more probable that it was written between the time of Ecclesiastes and Philo (B.C. 150-50). It is expressly quoted by many Irenæus. It was originally written in Greek.

APOCRYPHA OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

The relation between canonical and apocryphal writings is quite another with respect to the New Testament than with respect to the Old. The apocryphal books of the Old Testament aim simply at a continuation of the sacred history, and pursue this aim in an honest manner, though without divine authority. The apocryphal writings, on the contrary, relating to the New Testament, purpose directly to substitute spurious sources for genuine. They are very numerous; and the second of the four groups into which the New Testament may be divided (B. H. 2.) is given up entirely to these apocryphal writings — exercised at one time great influence on the church, and was considered the most dangerous source of heresy. Of course, not all of these writings were composed for directly heretical purposes. Many of them, no doubt, originated from much more innocent causes, as a mere pious fraud. But from the very oldest time a suspicion of heresy clung to them all, and contributed much to finally throw the whole literature into the shade. When the canon of the New Testament was fixed, and the apocryphal books thereby became exiled, they ceased to be read; and in the middle ages, even their names were forgotten. Nevertheless, although the books themselves were delivered up to contempt and oblivion, not so with their contents. From their fables sprung a sacred legend, which was kept alive in the congregation during the middle ages, —an ecclesiastical tradition, which the church often utilized in the development of its dogmas. Indeed, the origin of numerous dogmas and usages and traditions dates back to these apocryphal writings; and it was consequently of as much interest to the Evangelical Church to subject this whole literature to a thorough investigation as it was to the Roman Church to keep the whole matter in convenient obscurity. The first collection of apocryphal writings relating to the New Testament was given by Mich. Neander, Basel, 1564: a more comprehensive one, made by J. A. FABRICIUS, Hamburg, followed in 1703; then came J. C. THILO's Codex Apocryphus, N.T., Lips., 1852, still incomplete, but of considerable critical value; and finally the whole literature was gathered, sifted, and published by TISCHENDORF, Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, Lips., 1851, and Evangelia Apocrypha, Lips., 1853, ed. alt., 1876. [See the English translations by B. HARIS COWPER, London, 1857, and by WALKER, in the "Ante-Nicene Library," Edinburgh, 1870.]

I. Apocryphal Gospels. — About fifty apocryphal Gospels are still extant, or at least known to us. Some have come down to our time entire, others only in fragments; and of a few we possess nothing but the names. The method employed in these compositions is always the same, whether the author intended simply to collect and arrange what was floating in the general tradition, or whether he intended to produce a definite dogmatical effect. Rarely he threw himself on his own invention; but generally he elaborated what was only hinted at in the canonical Gospels, or transcribed words of Jesus into actions, or described the literal fulfillment of some Jewish expectation concerning the Messiah, or repeated the wonders of the Old Testament in an enhanced form, etc. The work done, he took care to conceal his own name, and inscribed his book with the name of some apostle or disciple, in order to give it authority. We mention first those seven apocryphal Gospels which exist entire, and then those of which we possess only fragments. See RUD. HOFMANN: Das Evangel. nach den Apokryphen, Leipzig, 1851. G. BRUNET: Les évangiles apocryphes, Paris, 1893.

1. Protevangelium Jacobi — ascribed to James, the brother of the Lord — comprises in twenty-five chapters the period from the announcement of the birth of Mary to the massacre of the inno-
APOCRYPHA.

It is a very old, was widely circulated, and shows traces of Ebionite origin. Fragments of a Syrian codex are given by Wright: Contributions to the Apocryphal Literature of the N.T., collected and edited from Syrian MSS. in the British Museum, London, 1885.

1. Evangelium Pseudo-Matthais sive Liber de Ortu Beatae Mariae et Infinitae Salvatoris — beginning with the announcement of the birth of Mary, and closing with the youth of Jesus — seems to be of Latin origin, and to have been drawn from the Proteanogl. and the Evangel. Thomas.

2. Evangelium Nicodemi consistsof two separate works, — Gesta Pilati and Descensus Christi ad Inferos, — which were joined together at an early date, though the combination did not receive the name it now bears until after the time of Charlemagne. The former of these two works is of some importance for the explanation and further elucidation of the canonical Gospels; while the latter is of very little interest. In connection with these two works, Tischendorf gives some other apocryphal productions, which together form a group by themselves: namely, Epistola Pilati, a letter from Pilate to the emperor, containing a report on the resurrection of Christ; Epistola Postii Pilati, another letter by him, in which he excuses the unjustness of his verdict by the impossibility of resisting the prevailing excitement; Anaphora Pilati, a report on the trial, execution, death, and resurrection of Jesus; Paradoxis Pilati, a report of the examination of Pilate before the emperor, his condemnation and execution; Mors Pilati, Narratio Josephi Arimathiae, and Vindicta Salvatoris. See Tischendorf: Pilati circa Christum Judicium quid lucis in Acta Pilati, Lips., 1853; Lipsius: Die Pilatus-Arten, Kiel, 1871.

3. Evangelium de Nativitye Mariae contains in ten chapters the history of Mary before the birth of Jesus.

4. Historia Josephi Fabri Liguarii — first published in Arabic, with a Latin translation by Georg Wallin, Leipzig, 1722—contains the whole-biography of Joseph in thirty-two chapters, and gives an elaborate description of his death. As it is evidently written in glorification of Joseph, and destined for recital on the day of his festival, and as the worship of Joseph originated among the Coptics from the monophysics, the origin of the work is probably Coptic, and not Arabic.

5. Evangelium Thomae — next to the Proteanogl., the oldest among the apocryphal Gospels — was, in the middle of the second century, in use among the Gnostics, more especially among those Gnostics who held docteric views of the person of Christ. Wright published a Syrian codex in London, 1875.

6. Evangelium Infantiae Arabicum — first published in Arabic, and with a Latin translation, by H. Sike, 1697—comprises in fifty-five chapters the period from the birth of Jesus to his twelfth year, and consists mostly of stories from his residence in Egypt. The first nine chapters follow very closely the Proteanogl.; the last twenty chapters, the Evangel. Thomae: but the intermediate part seems to rest on some national tradition, which explains the favor it has found among the Arabs, and the circumstance that several of its details have been incorporated with the Koran. The whole work has an Oriental character. Oriental demonology and magic come everywhere to the surface, and many points cannot be understood without some knowledge of Oriental science and the religion of Zoroaster. The Arabic text, however, is hardly the primitive one, but probably a translation from a Syrian text.

7. Evangelium Nicodemi consists of two separate works, — Gesta Pilati and Descensus Christi ad Inferos, — which were joined together at an early date, though the combination did not receive the name it now bears until after the time of Charlemagne. The former of these two works is of some importance for the explanation and further elucidation of the canonical Gospels; while the latter is of very little interest. In connection with these two works, Tischendorf gives some other apocryphal productions, which together form a group by themselves: namely, Epistola Pilati, a letter from Pilate to the emperor, containing a report on the resurrection of Christ; Epistola Postii Pilati, another letter by him, in which he excuses the unjustness of his verdict by the impossibility of resisting the prevailing excitement; Anaphora Pilati, a report on the ed Romanizing or popish tendency. Thus the "Historiae Apostolicae Pseudepigraphae, Libri X.," ascribed to Abdias (Bishop of Babylon, and the first bishop consecrated by the apostles them- selves), is simply a compilation from earlier heretical writings. According to tradition, the work was originally written in Hebrew, and is quoted by Abdias, and then translated into Latin by Julius Africanus. But it shows a complete ignorance of the time in which it is said to have been written, and can hardly be dated further back than the seventh century. The comprehensive collection of Tischendorf contains:

III. Apocryphal Epistles. — The Epistola Abgaru ad Christum and Epistola Christiad Abgarum are given by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles., I, 18), who pretends to have seen the original documents in the archives of Edessa, and in a somewhat modified form in the Acta Thaddaei. [See R. A. LIPSC: Die edessenische Abgar-aage kritisch untersucht, Braunschweig, 1880.] Also other Scripula Christi are known to tradition: but they are so evidently mythical as to lose all interest. They are given complete by Fabricius in Cod. Apoc. N. T., I, 303–321; II, 439, 511 sq. Several letters from the Virgin Mary are mentioned, one to Ignatius, the pupil of John; another to Mesumines; and a third to the Florentines (FABRICIUS: Cod. Apoc. N. T., I, 834, 844, 851). But they all belong to a very late time. Of the two letters from Peter to James, the first one was placed as an introduction to the Recognit. Clement., and its authorship of Peter is not certain. The second is found in Fabricius: Cod. Apoc. N. T., I, 807. From Col. iv. 16 we learn that Paul wrote a letter to the Laodiceans, which is lost; and it is not to be wondered at that this last letter soon found an apocryphal substitute. But it is questionable whether the text which has come down to us, and is first found in Latin in Pseudo-Anselm, in Col. iv. 16, is identical with that mentioned by the Fathers. The letter was incorporated in the Latin Bible-translations before Luther. — The correspondence between Paul and Seneca, consisting of six letters from Paul, and eight from Seneca, is first mentioned by Jerome, who accepts it as genuine (Catholic Script. Eccles., 12), while Augustine doubts its genuineness (Ep. 138; De Civ. Dei, 6, 10). In the middle ages these letters found great favor, and were incorporated with the editions of Seneca's works; and Faber Stapules even ventured to place them among the Pau- linian Epistles of the canon, Paris, 1512. The whole correspondence, however, is nothing but a piece of fiction, based on a conjectural con- ception of Acts xviii. 12. [See F. W. FARRAR: Seekers after God, London, 1860. J. B. LIGHTFOOT: Epistle to the Philippians, London, 1873.]

In a similar manner the passage from 1 Cor. x. 9, where Paul speaks of an earlier letter which he has lost, fed the fabrication of a third letter from Paul to the Corinthians. FABRICIUS: Cod. Apoc. N. T., I, 926. — Finally the Epistola S. Ioannis Apostoli ad Hydropicum, is in the apocryphal work of Prochorus: Narrat. de S. Joanne, cap. 34.

IV. Apocryphal Revelations. — Although we know the names of quite a number of apocryphal apocalypses, we possess the texts, or fragments of the texts, of only a few. There is an Apocryphale Ioannis, different from the canonical, and published by Tischendorf. The apocryphal which Cerinthus used was referred back to St. John, but differed in essential points from that contained in the New Testament, as Cerinthus claimed to have received revelations himself. Another "Revelation of St. John," discovered in Spain in 1595, is said to have been translated into Spanish by St. Cerealis, a disciple of James the Elder, though at that time there existed no Spanish language. One Apocryphale Petri is mentioned very early, as used by the heretic Theodotus; another is quoted in the twelfth century by Joebus de Vitro, and is identical with the Liber Perfectionis, discovered in 1821 by Alexander Nicoll. One Apocryphale Pauli, occasioned by 2 Cor. xii. 2–4, is mentioned by Epiphanius as being used by the Cajanes: another, used by the monks of the fourth century, is, according to Du Pin, still in use among the Copts. A Syrian text of this work, discovered among the Nestorians, was published, together with an English translation, in 1866, by Cowper. The Coptic text of an apocryphal work entitled Revelationes Bartholomei, was published, together with a French translation, by Dulaurent, Paris, 1835. Some fragments of an Apocryphal Mariæ are given by Tischendorf. An Apocryphale Thomae and an Apocryphale Stephani are mentioned by Gelasius.

APOKATASTASIS. — The term describes the doctrine of the return of all sinful and con- demned creatures unto the favor of God, the moral life in God, and heavenly felicity, and is derived from Acts iii. 21 (Greek text), "restitutio." The first Christian writer known to advocate the doctrine as deduced from the Scriptures was Origen (185–253). He held that unrepentant souls after death were punished, but also were instructed by spirits who stood nearer God, and so — some sooner, some later, but all at last — will be led in sorrow and repentance unto God. He placed himself upon the Bible of Christ: rule must be universal, and God must be all in all (Ps. cx. 1; 1 Cor. xv. 27 sq.). The saying of Jesus, that the sin against the Holy Ghost was not forgiven in the impending aeon, does not stand in the way, because, after the next aeon, there are many others in which it could be forgiven. Origen considered this teaching esoteric, and calculated to do harm, if spread among the masses. A similar doctrine, it is claimed by some, was taught previously by Clement: but he merely asserted, that, in the next world, there is an operation of salvation upon lost souls; but how far it could be banished by the entering light of God See Origen, De Princip., I., 6. 2: II., 3. 1, 3; III., 6. 1 sq. Hom. XVII. in John. Hom. XIX. in Jeremiah. Contra Celsum, VI., 26. See E. R. Redepenning's edition of De Principiis, Lipsiae, 1836, which contains Hieron. ad Aed. Similar ideas in regard to the divine goodness, human freedom, and sin, led to the advocacy of the Apokatastasis by Gregory of Nazianzen (328–389), although not openly, Gregory of Nyssa (332–398) very publicly, Didymus of Alexandria (305–365); by theologians of the Antiochian school, Diodorus of Tarsus (fl. 375), and Theodore of Mopsuestia (350–420), even Chrysostom, as appears in his comments upon 1 Cor. xv. 28.

In the West the doctrine had no prominent advocates. Augustine (353–430) declared against it. The doctrines of Origen were condemned by the Council of Constantinople (381). Afterwards the Apokatastasis was advocated by some men as the Monophysite monk Bar Sudaili in the sixth century; but it rose to far greater prominence in later times, when Johannes Scotus Erigena (d. about 884), drawing from the pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite and Maximus, from Origen, and Gregory of Nyssa, incorporated it into his theology. He taught that God is the substance of all things, and all things at last return to God: accordingly, the Apokatastasis is only a part of the universal process by which all individuality is extinguished. But the theory did not prevail. See Christlieb, Scutus Erigena, Gothia, 1860. The mystics, Eckart (1260–1327), Suso (1300–1365), and others, did not advocate it: on the other hand, the "Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit" (thirteenth century) did, and that fanatically.

We are thus brought down to the Reformation. Johann Denk (d. 1527) taught that even the devil would be saved; and he spread the notion among the Anabaptists. (See Bullinger, Der Widerständern Ursprung, Buch 2, Kap. 5; Menius, der Geist der Widerständer in the Witten. ed. of Luther's Werke, II., 233; Unihorn, U. Rhegius, p. 222; Baum, Capito u. Butzer, p. 935.) Denk, although well acquainted with Origen, did not draw exclusively from him, but grounded himself upon Bible studies, conducted in the spirit of the Reformation, citing Rom. v. 18, xi. 32: 1 Cor. xv. 22 sq.; Eph. i. 10; Col. i. 20: 1 Tim. ii. 4; Ps. lxxvii. 8 sq. The chief reformers, however, did not merely confine the church view, and the Augsburg and other confessions of faith declare strongly for an eternal hell.

Towards the end of the seventeenth century the doctrine of the Apokatastasis again appears, and ever since, it has found numerous advocates. The earliest were Jane Lead of London (1623–1701), J. W. Petersen (1619–1727), and the "Philadelphian Society," which Mrs. Lead founded. With them the theory was established not only upon the Bible, but upon personal revelations. It is noteworthy that Jacob Boehme (1375–1624), who influenced them, did not teach this belief. The "Berleburger Bibel" shared their belief; but the most prominent advocate was F. C. Oetinger, the famous Pietist. He read the writings of Mrs. Lead and of the Philadelphians, and wove this tenet into his theological system, depending chiefly upon 1 Cor. xv. and Eph. i. 9–11. J. A. Bengel (1687–1752), the father of modern exegesis, believed it, but thought it dangerous to teach. The modern Dunkers, a Baptist sect in Pennsylvania and Ohio, are supposed to hold this view, derived from Petersen and the Berleburger Bible.

The Rationalists of Germany since the second half of the former century commonly, and supernaturalists frequently, have, upon various grounds, advocated the return of all souls unto God. Schleiermacher pronounced in its favor. He maintained that the sensitiveness of the conscience of the damned was a sign that they might be better in the next life than in this, and, quite characteristically also, that it would make an inexplicable "dissonance" in God's universe, if a portion of God's creatures were debarred forever from participation in the redemption of Christ. But his principal arguments were derived from this description of the method of the operation of the atonement.

In England and America the opposition to the doctrine of the absolute eternity of future punishment has led to the formation of a denomination called the Universalists, which see.

An unprejudiced critic cannot find support for the Apokatastasis in the sayings of Christ or of the apostles, save Paul. Indeed, Matt. xii. 32. xxv. 41, xxvi. 24, Mark ix. 48, xiv. 31, are directly opposed to it. At the same time Rom. v. 18 sq., xi. 32, 1 Cor. xv. 22, have to be read in a different sense from that which lies on the surface, in order to avoid the conclusion that Paul taught it.

Roth and Martensen, among recent theologians, have brought out the inner, dogmatic, and ethical objections. Thus Roth, in opposition to Schleiermacher, declares that an Apokatastasis contradicts the self-determining will-power of acceptance of salvation, without which there can be no ethical value in the process; for, if the man is free to accept, he is equally free to refuse. Martensen lays stress upon the conflict between God's sovereignty and human freedom, and, along with the belief in God's intention.
to save everybody, admits the possibility of an endless damnation.

APOLLINARIS, or APOLLINARIUS, Claudius, Bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia, a contemporary of Melito; flourishing in the reign of Marcus Aurelius (161–180), and occupied a prominent position as an apologist of Christianity, and opponent to Montanism. He was a very prolific writer, and Eusebius and Photius mention several works by him, especially his Apology addressed to the emperor; but only a few fragments of a work on the Passover have been preserved in the Chron. Paschal ed. Dindorf, I., p. 13. The catena contains numerous fragments marked Troponia; but they have never been carefully examined, and it is probable that most of them belong to Apollinaris from Laodicea.

APOLLINARIANISM, the doctrine of APOLLINARIUS THE YOUNGER, Bishop of Laodicea in Syria (d. 390), the son of Apollinaris the Elder, of Alexandria, who taught grammar and rhetoric, first at Berytus, and afterwards in Laodicea. He became a literary man in the latter city. When the Emperor Julian forbade the Christians to read the Greek literature, he undertook to indemnify them as best he could, and gave, among other works of the same kind, a poetical paraphrase in Homeric verses of the historical books of the Old Testament. The son, who was also a teacher of rhetoric, and afterwards (335) a lector in Laodicea, but who surpassed the father both in talent and learning, began his literary career in a similar way, but later on concentrated himself on Christian theology. He wrote commentaries on various portions of the Bible, a defence of Christianity against Porphyry, a defence of the Nicene Creed against Eunomius and Marcellus, etc.; and these works brought him in close connection with the representatives of the Orthodox Church, such as Athanasius and others. He was made Bishop of Laodicea, and for a long time he was considered one of the chief supporters of the Nicene symbol, when gradually his christological theory, originally aiming simply at a refutation of Arianism, began to develop into open heresy. On the fall of the Nicene Creed, there had grown up a view according to which although both divinity and complete humanity were united in Christ: he being at once a perfect God and a perfect man. But to Apollinaris this idea seemed wholly untenable and self-contradictory, whether approached from an ontological, or psychological, or doxological point of view. Two different substances, he reasoned, each complete and perfect in all its attributes, can never unite into one. A complete God and a complete man can never melt together in one person. The idea of an anthropomorphus is a monstrosity on a level with such mythological creations as the minotaurs, etc. Furthermore, the idea of such a union in Christ, between perfect divinity and perfect humanity, at once destroys the whole idea of atonement. Where there is complete humanity, there is sin; and the guilt of sin is a potentiality in the nature of Christ, he is disqualified for the work of atonement. As perfect divinity and perfect humanity cannot possibly unite in one person, the humanity of Christ, if considered complete, must have moved mechanically beside his divinity, and it is only the man in Christ who has suffered, been crucified, and died; but "the death of a man does not kill death." The solution which Apollinaris offered of this difficulty consisted in limiting the humanity of Christ to a body and an animal soul inhabited by the divine Logos. These doctrines made a great sensation, partly because they pointed to certain weak points in the orthodox confession, partly because they fell in with the general drift of public opinion; and they caused the Church considerable embarrassment on account of the prominent position of their author. The Council of Alexandria (362) condemned them. Athanasius wrote against them in 371. But neither in the one nor in the other case was the name of Apollinaris mentioned. Bk. 375, ...
timius Severus, but not published until after her death (217). The latest edition is that by Westermann, Paris, 1849. The object of this work is evidently to give a representation of the ideal New-Pythagorean philosopher; and although the chronological details are correct, and in accordance with other historical facts, this object is pursued with such an unswerving profusion of mysteries and miracles, that it becomes wholly impossible to separate the real Apollonius from the fancy picture by Philostratus. That the biography was written as a direct parallel to the gospel narrative of Christ can hardly be maintained; but it was often employed as a weapon against Christianity, both in ancient and modern days. See the English translation by Charles Blount, 1680; the French translation by Castil- lan, 1774; Baur: Apollonius und Christus, Tüb., 1832; A. APOLLONIUS is the name of two men active in the Christian Church in the second century. The one was an ecclesiastical author, and lived, as it seems, in Asia Minor. He wrote a work against the Montanists while Montanus and his prophetesses were still alive. The other enjoyed a great reputation among the Roman Christians as to prove by evidence from the Scriptures, to the fancy picture by Philostratus. That the plausibility of the ideas of Socrates and Plato, is the weapon by which he contends for the truth of the Christian doctrines: the former is a philosopher; and logical reasoning, with proper application of the ideas of Socrates and Plato, is the weapon by which he contends for the truth of the Christian doctrines: the latter is a jurist, and in the principles of the Roman law he finds the arms with which he fights for the inalienable rights of the individual. Clement of Alexandria institutes with superior calmness and impartiality a comparison between the religious ideas of Paganism and Christianity. He brings proofs in a more legal tone, but with admirable acuteness and stupendous erudition, the trustworthiness of the Gospels, the divinity of the miracles, and the intrinsic reasonableness of the Christian doctrines; while Tertullian appears as the legal defender of Christianity, and pleads his cause with the sharpness and sarcasm. In the series of Latin apologists follow Minutius Felix, Cyprian, Arno- bius, and Lactantius; in that of the Greek, Methodius and Apollinaris of Laodicea.

Its point of culmination the ancient apology reached in the period from Constantine the Great to the middle of the fifth century, when, freed from any pressure from without, the church obtained the leisure necessary to purely scientific pursuits. In his two works, Adv. Gentes and De Incarnatione, Athanasius made the first successful attempt to vindicate Christianity by proceeding from its very centre, the doctrine of redemption, and to refute its adversaries by a provisionally as one between theory and practice: and as theory always comes after practice, and experience always precedes science, it may be found easiest to explain the relation of apologetics and apologetics, and fix the position of the former in the theological system, in the course of an historical study devoted exclusively to the subject.

genetical demonstration of their errors. From this time the aphoristical and casual character of the apology disappears, and a scientific treatment according to principles becomes more and more prominent. Although the attacks of Julian gave rise to a number of works simply adapted to the special occasion, the systematic development of the apology was, nevertheless, continued by Eusebius of Caesarea, and Augustine. In order to silence the reproach frequently made against Christianity, that it was the cause of the decay of the Roman Empire, Augustine combined in his De Civitate Dei the speculation and historical demonstration of his predecessors, constructed the whole politico-religious defence of Christianity on the basis of a contrast between the kingdom of heaven and the kingdom of this world, and interpreted the downfall of the Roman Empire as the fulfilment of a divine judgment in favor of Christianity. His disciple Orosius took the same ground, and the systematic form of the apology was cultivated also by Tyconius and Vincent of Beauvais.

After the downfall of the ancient world, during the first half of the middle ages, the Talmudic Judaism and the appearance of Islam still occasioned some apologetical activity. Against the former wrote Agobard of Lyon, De Insoletia Judaeorum, 822; against both, Raymond Martius, Pugio Fidei advers. Maurus et Judaeos, 1278; also the Dialogus inter Philosophum, Judaeum et Christianum, by Abelard, may be mentioned here.

II. Apologies directed against adversaries within the Church. Although the apology always contained more or less polemics against heresies, up to the second half of the middle ages it was, nevertheless, chiefly occupied with adversaries outside of the church; but from this time it became more and more necessary for it to vindicate the divine basis of the Christian faith also before the reasoning spirit of the Christian Church. The scholastic elaboration of the Christian dogmatics was hardly completed, when the whole building was shaken by the question of the relation between science and faith, reason and revelation, and the development of an entirely new position. The Summa Cathol. Fidei con. Gentiles, by Thomas Aquinas, was the first attempt to give an apologetical theory of the Revelation in its relation to reason; but it was not until after the fifteenth century, when the revival of the classical studies by the Humanists in Italy turned the sway of Aristotelian forms of reasoning into an enthusiasm for Pagan ideas, that the doctrine that natural religion forms the true kernel of all revelation — on the basis of which assertion, first the necessity and value, next the truth and possibility, of a supernatural revelation, were attacked — called forth a rich apologetical activity. England produced an enormous number of apologetical works. Some of these apologists, however, were not free from deism themselves; they endeavored to find a ground common to them and their adversaries; they yielded too much to the principle of their opponents (Locke, Whitley, Clarke, Foster, and others); they often sacrificed the kernel in order to save the shell (Burnet, Robinson, Archibald Campbell, Williamson, and others). Others, however, assumed a decidedly polemical attitude, and developed with great thoroughness and industry the historical evidences of Christianity, — the miracles (Leland, Pearce, Adams, especially George Campbell against Hume), the resurrection of Christ (Dutton, Sherlock, West), and the prophecies (Edward and Samuel Chandler, Sydus, Newton, Hurd). Noticeable are also Robert Boyle, who founded an apologetical institution which soon was imitated in other countries, for instance, in Holland, — Richard Baxter, Cudworth, Stillingfleet, Origines sacra, 1682, and Vindication of the Doctrine of Trinity, 1697. Richard Bentley (against Collins), Warburton (The Divine Legation of Moses, 1758), Waterland, Watson, Stackhouse, Conybeare, Addison (Essay on the Truth of the Christian Religion). Lardner (The Credibility of the Gospel History, 12 vols., 1741) showed with great thoroughness and minuteness the trustworthiness of the New Testament history and its authors. A still greater influence was exercised by Butler's book, The Analogy of Religion to the Constitution and Course of Nature, 1736, a work of great originality, which holds its own to this day, remarkable for thoroughly refuting objections without mentioning the name of a single objector, and which still belongs to the standard works of English theology.

During the second half of the seventeenth and the whole of the eighteenth century, deism and naturalism reigned widely in England, France, and Germany. In England the doctrine that natural religion forms the true kernel of all revelation — on the basis of which assertion, first the necessity and value, next the truth and possibility, of a supernatural revelation, were attacked — called forth a rich apologetical activity. England produced an enormous number of apologetical works. Some of these apologists, however, were not free from deism themselves; they endeavored to find a ground common to them and their adversaries; they yielded too much to the principle of their opponents (Locke, Whitley, Clarke, Foster, and others); they often sacrificed the kernel in order to save the shell (Burnet, Robinson, Archibald Campbell, Williamson, and others). Generally, however, the necessity and demonstrability of the biblical revelation formed the somewhat narrow ground occupied by

APOLOGETICS. APOLOGETICS.

The contest against Voltaire, Rousseau, and the encyclopedists, was carried on among the English apologists. They considered Christianity as a divine plan in history.

III. Apologetics proper. — Most of the above-mentioned works owe their origin to some practical demand, rather than to any purely scientific interest. But, from the beginning of the nineteenth century, a desire grew up to gather together all that was permanent and fundamental among the various apologetical materials, and form it into an organic system, an independent science.

In France during the eighteenth century, frivolous latitudinarianism, materialism, and atheism followed in the track of the deistical enlightenment. The contest against Voltaire, Rousseau, and the encyclopedists, was carried on among the Roman Catholics by Le Vassor, Denyse, Houtteville, d'Aguesseau, Bergier (Traité historique et dogmatique de la vraie Religion, 12 vols., 1780), and Chateaubriand, whose Génie du Christianisme, 1803, made a great impression by emphasizing the aesthetic side of Christianity; and among the Protestants by Jacquelot (against Boyle), J. A. Turrettin (Cogitatio et Dissertatio Theol., 1737, and Traité de la vérité de la rel. chrét.), and Fontet (La palinodnie philosphique, 1764), who, from his peculiar standpoint of natural philosophy, undertook to reconcile the belief in miracles with the scientific conception of the laws of nature.

In Germany, as in England, the apologetic literature of the eighteenth century showed a double character, influenced in the former country by rationalism, as in the latter by deism. Rationalistic latitudinarians defended only the reasonableness and high morality of Christianity against open deniers; while the orthodox supranaturalists vindicated the revelation, with its miracles and mysteries, as divine truth against both the naturalists and the rationalists. In his celebrated Theodice (1710) against Boyle, Leibniz maintained the complete harmony between reason and true religion; and in the same direction followed Pfaff, Mosheim, A. F. W. Sack, Euler (Reügion der gött. Offbg., 1747), Jerusalem (Beiträge über die vornehmsten Wahrheiten der Rel., 1798), Nosselt (Vervollkommnung der Wahrheit und Göttlichkeit der christ. Rel., 5th ed., 1783), Haller (Briefe über die wichtigsten Wahrh. d. Offb., 1st ed., 1779), and Briefe über einige Einwürfe nach lebender Freigeister, 1775). Lillianthal. Die gute Suche der gött. Offbg., 16 vols., 1750–82, occupies a prominent place on account of his thorough historical investigations; also Less: Beweis d. Wahrheit d. christ. Rel., 6th ed., 1755, and M. Fr. Roos: Beweis dass die ganze Bibel von Gott eingegangen, 1791. After the appearance, however, of the Wolfenbüttel Fragments in 1777, and during the ascendency of Lessing's principle of the transformation of revealed truth into reasoned truth, the old question was of little or no importance to the apologists, which was offered by the rationalists (Doderlein, Semler, Seiler, and others) was much inferior to Kleuker’s Neue Prüfung und Erklärung der vorzügl. Beweise für die Wahrheit und den göttlichen Ursprung des Christenthums, 1787, and Untersuchung der Gründe für die Achtung und Glaubwürdigkeit der Urkunden des Christenthums, 5 vols., 1793. These works, like Koppen’s Die Bibel ein Werk der göttlichen Weisheit, 1787, 3d ed., 1837, represent Christianity as a divine plan in history.

APOLOGETICS.

APOSTASY (ἀποστασία, apostasiā, "revolt") comprised, when the doctrine first was formed in the Church, both the apostasia perfidiae (revolt against the faith), the apostasia inobedientiae (revolt against authority) and the apostasia irregularitatis (revolt against the rules). A precise distinction between the two last forms of apostasy was not established, however; and at present the apostasia inobedientiae is identical with apostasia a monachatu (revolt against the monastic vow), and the apostasia irregularitatis with apostasia a clericatu (revolt against the clerical vow). Neither of these forms is possible outside of the Roman-Catholic Church; while the apostasia a fide or perfidiae is known also to Protestant churches.

Apostasia a monachatu takes place when a regular member of an ecclesiastical order leaves his monastery and its rules without due permission from his superior, and returns to the world either as ecclesiastic or as layman. Apostlea a clericatu, which can be committed only by ecclesiastics of the higher grades, is an unpermitted return to the world of some such ecclesiastic: apostates of this kind were Talleyrand, Rouge, etc. Both forms of apostasy were by the Council of Chalcedon beclouded with anathema, to which later ecclesiastical legislation has added loss of all privileges of order and estate, excommunication, and infamy. All bishops were required to seize and imprison criminals of this kind when found in their dioceses. Apostates from monastic vows were delivered up to the superior of their order, to be punished in accordance with the peculiar laws and usages of the order: apostates from the priesthood were detained in prison until they returned to obedience. Neither of these forms of apostasy is punished by the state.

Apostasia a fide means secession from the Christian congregation, and disowning the name of Christ. It is allied to heresy and schism, involves both these crimes, and has always been considered a higher grade of them. The passages of Scripture on which the legal treatment of this form of apostasy is based are, Heb. iii. 12, iv. 8, vi. 18, ix. 26, 27; 2 Pet. ii. 15-22; Acts vii. 59; 1 Cor. xi. 1; Luke xi. 9. In the ancient church, during the epoch of persecution, this crime was, of course, much more frequently met with than now: but the ancient church made a distinction, and called only such as seduced voluntarily apostates; while those who fell from weakness, or were compelled by force, were classed as libellatici, sacrificati, traditores, etc. All were excommunicated; and at first the church refused to grant absolution, either altogether, or till the hour of death; but afterwards this severity decreased, and the excommunicated were received into the church once more on condition of repentance and penance. This is still the actual state of the case. The decree of Boniface VIII., identifying apostasy to Judaism with heresy, has been of special importance, as it has been extended also to other cases of apostasy, and its principle has been adopted by the state. Apostates to Islamism, the so-called renegades, are still treated by the Roman Church in the same way. To apostates to modern atheism, however, the principle cannot be applied, as such apostates generally make no public confession, which is necessary to prove the crime.

Under the first Christian emperors, the Roman state considered apostasy as a civil crime. It was punished with confiscation of property, loss of Testimontiafactio, inability to serve as a witness, infamy, etc.: see Tit. Theodos. Cod. de apostat. (16, 7) tit. Just. Cod. cad. (1, 7) I. 1, 7. Th. C. de Just. (16, 8); comp. Plaut. Quest. de Jure Criminis, cap. 57. During the middle ages the German Empire had no occasion to make laws against apostasy: it adopted the above-mentioned ecclesiastical view, and considered apostasy a qualified heresy. The German criminal codes of the early middle ages know no form of apostasy, and the criminal code of Charles V. (1532) abolished also the penalties for heresy.

With respect to the Protestant churches it is in the very nature of the idea of a state-church, indeed, of a church in general, that it cannot remain altogether indifferent to apostasy. It must take notice of the fact in some way or other; but of course it cannot employ the aid of the state. See LINDE: Staatkirche, Gewissensfreiheit und religiöse Vereinig., Mainz, 1845, p. 17; AMTHOR: De Apostasia Liber Singularis, Coburg, 1833; GEORG FRAEN: Jux Ecclesiae Catholicae adversus Apostatas, Pest., 1847.

APOSTLE. This name, "sent of God," was given in the Old Testament to the organs of the divine revelation (Num. xvi. 28; Isa. vi. 8; Jer. xxvi. 5); and in the New Testament to Jesus, as frequently in John (cf. Heb. iii. 1), but to John the Baptist (John i. 6), and to those whom Jesus sent forth (cf. Luke xi. 49; Matt. xxiii. 34, 37). This is surely the derivation of the word "apostle," and that it came into such universal and early use is good evidence that it was the name given by Jesus to the Twelve (Luke xi. 13). To the apostles Jesus gave a special training. They were particularly to be witnesses of his resurrection. Their number was twelve, because there were twelve tribes, and after the death of Judas, the disciples filled the break by an election (Acts i. 15 sqq.). The apostles made their nation's capital the centre of their work; and, as the church grew, they remained its head, and staid in the city after the disciples were dispersed (Acts viii. 1), continuing, however, when necessary, to make excursions into the neighborhood (cf. viii. 14 sqq., ix. 32 sqq.). Their number received, the addition of another, Paul, who call to the apostolate was precisely as good as theirs, and whom they eventually recognized as every way fitted to work among the Uncircumcision as they were among the Circumcision (Acts ix., Gal. ii. 11 sqq.). The different spheres of labor being thus recognized, there was no clashing and no jealousy. It may well be that Paul and Peter could not work together in the same place; but that there was a dissension between them is unproven and improbable. The Tübingen school has overstrained the difference between the two leading apostles.

Tradition assigns to each apostle a specific part of the then known world; accordingly there is a festival of the “Dispersion of the Apostles,” celebrated July 15; but there is no proof that this was the case. This much is true: Peter and John, as is proven by their letters, left the centres of Judaism, and labored, like Paul, amid heathen populations, and, it would seem, among the heathens themselves. The signs of an apostle were (1) Witness of the Resurrection (Acts i. 21, 22); (2) Commission from Christ himself (Luke vi. 13; Gal. i. 1); (3) Inspiration (John xvi. 13); (4) Miraculous powers (Acts ii. 43; Heb. ii. 4). The word “apostle” is also used in a wider sense of a gospel herald (2 Cor. xi. 23; Phil. ii. 25.)

APOSTLES’ CREED, The (Symboolum Apostolorum), can, in its present form, be traced back with certainty to the beginning of the sixth or the end of the fifth century. The text, Latin and Greek, first occurs in a manuscript from the eighth or ninth century of the Psalterium Graecum et Romanum, erroneously ascribed to Gregory the Great. But it is evident from the pseudo-Augustinian sermons, that this very text was used in the churches of Gaul about the year 500. As now no trace of it can be found before this time, while various other creeds deviating more or less from it can be proven to have been in common use, the year 500 may be put down approximately as the date of its origin. Singular it is, however, that a formula of so late a date should have obtained the epithet “apostolic,” and of the meaning of this epithet there can be no doubt, as the legend telling how the apostles made the creed, by adding each one separate sentence, is contemporary with the creed itself. Hence it would seem probable that there must have been in the Roman Church a creed already, which was what is now known as the Apostles’ Creed, transferred its dignity, name, and legend to its successor. And so there was. The conjecture fits the known facts. Between 250 and 400 the Church of Rome used a shorter symbol, or creed, which was held in the highest esteem, in which no alterations were tolerated, and which was considered the common work of the twelve apostles brought to Rome by Peter. The Greek text of this older and shorter Roman symbol first occurs in Marcellus of Ancyra (336-341), the Latin in Rufinus (390). It must be noticed, that, while with the younger and longer Roman symbol the Greek version evidently is a translation of the Latin, in the older and shorter, the Latin is certainly a translation of the Greek.

See both texts in Schaff’s Creeds, Vol. II., pp. 47 sqq., and see K. Schmidt: Kritische Untersuchungen über einige der ältesten liturgische Stellen (1871). Also Jerome, Coelestine I. (422-431), Sixtus III. (431-440), and Leo I. (440-461) allude to the apostolical origin of the symbol; and so highly did Ambrosius prize it, that he ascribed a greater authority to it than to any work of any single apostle. The questions then arise, Whence did this older, shorter, Roman symbol come? and in what relation did it stand to the younger and longer?

With respect to the first question, the very circumstance that the Latin version is a translation of the Greek points towards an Eastern source; but there is nothing to show that the said Greek text ever has been actually used by any Greek church. Generally there is a great difference between the creeds of the Western Church and those of the Eastern Church, both internally and externally. All the creeds of the Western Church have, if not their root, at least their type, in the old, short Roman symbol. They have all an historical character. New facts are added in some local creed to make the symbol more fully representative of the Christian faith; but nothing pertaining to the original type is ever left out. The Eastern Church, which knew nothing of a creed made by the apostles themselves, is free about the matter. All Oriental creeds are pre-eminently dogmatical; and changes were made simply to suit circumstances, for polemical purposes, in order to crush dogmatical heresies. Important historical facts are left out, and anti-Gnostic, anti-Monarchian, anti-Arian definitions take their place. Thus the Oriental creeds are in a state of steady transition up to the moment when the Nicaeno-Constantinopolitan Creed is established, and a rigid conservatism adopted. Nevertheless, in this stream of shifting shapes, the presence of something typical is very strongly felt, and though this type cannot be bodily caught, and palpably traced out, its resemblance to the old, short Roman symbol, cannot be mistaken. But at this point all further demonstration becomes impossible. The common source of these two types is a matter of pure construction. Only it may be asserted that the starting-point cannot have been the common work of the twelve apostles, or the work of any single apostle. In that case, the history of the creeds during the second and third centuries would have been another than that here described.

With respect to the second question, it seems probable that it was the adoption by the Church of Rome of the Nicaeno-Constantinopolitan Creed which mediated the transition from the older to the younger Roman symbol. The rule of the Ostrogoths in Italy brought the Church of Rome in dangerous proximity to Arianism, and, in order to emphasize its attitude with respect to this heresy, the church felt compelled to adopt a more explicit, so to speak polemically formed, symbol. Then, again, when this necessity ceased to press on the church, and a return to a simpler creed became possible, the old symbol had grown dim in men’s memory; while the new stood fresh and vigorous, recommending itself with its noble simplicity, its easy completeness, and the great favor it had already won in the churches of Gaul.

APOSTOLIC BROTHERS, or APOSTOLICS, is the name of a sect which was founded in Upper Italy, in the latter half of the thirteenth century, by Gerhard Sagarelli, a native of Alzano, in the dominion of Parma. It arose as a re-action against the ostentatious and vainglorious splendor of the Roman Church, and its principal tenet was a literal imitation of the life and apparel of the first followers of Christ. At first Sagarelli made only a very slight impression, and found only very few adherents. But the interference of the Bishop of Parma (in 1280), the decrees of Honorius IV. (in 1286), suppressing all religious associations not sanctioned by the pope, the ex-communication of Sagarelli by the synod of Würzburg (1287) finally attracted attention to him. The number of his adherents increased, and his attacks on the worldliness of the church grew bolder. In 1294 he was seized, and compelled to recant; and in 1300 he was burnt for having relapsed. A man of much greater gifts, Dolcino, now took the lead of the sect; and by his enthusiasm and apocalyptic prophecies he attracted great numbers of followers. He were sent to arrest him, he defended himself by force; but in 1307 he was defeated and burnt. Still the sect did not yet succumb. In 1310 it was condemned by a synod of Treves; in 1311 it appeared in the neighborhood of Spoletto, in 1320 in Toulouse; in 1328 it was condemned, by a synod of Lavaux; and in 1374 this condemnation was repeated by a synod of Narbonne. In France and Germany the sect often united with the Fratricelles and Beghards. See DOLCINO.

APOSTOLICAL CANONS. Under the title Canones qui dicuntur Apostolorum, an appendix is in many codices, though not in all, added to the eighth book of the Apostolical Constitutions, giving sometimes fifty, sometimes eighty-five, rules concerning ecclesiastical discipline. As far as their contents are concerned, these rules have been drawn partly from Holy Writ and apostles' command. It, too, contains a number of liturgical formularies. Chap. iv., on Ordination, is found in various collections, both Oriental and Greek. The style is peculiar, the form is that of ordinances; the style is that of ordinances; the questions of tithes (ii. 25, 28; vii. 29; viii. 30). The Apostolical Constitutions were never recognized by the Western Church, and were hardly known in Western Europe before the sixteenth century. In the Eastern Church, opinions were divided about the worth and dignity of the work, until the Council of Trullo (692) decided the question by mandatum, which was first published by Turrianus (Venice, 1683); afterward by Cotelerius, in his Patres Apostolici (Paris, 1672), and by Uützen, Constitutiones Apostolicæ (Schwerin and Rostock, 1553), De Lagarde, Didascalia Apost. Syriacæ (Lips., 1854), Greece (1853). The Ethnico-theological book was edited and translated into English by Thomas Pell Plat (1834); the Coptic, by Henry Tattam (1848), both for the Oriental Translation Fund.

1. The Council and the Speeches. — The narrative informs us that the leaders, and the great majority of the congregation, were liberal in their views; but the opposition of some Pharisaical members in the private preliminary meeting which seems to have been held (vers. 4, 5) was so vigorous as to compel the apostles to bring the matter before the whole body; and thus the decree had the full force of the sanction of the entire church (vers. 7–11). This final unity proves that the Jerusalem Church was accustomed to the view Peter held in his speech, "We believe that we shall be saved according to the declaration of the Holy Spirit in the decrees, as in the general tenor of their remarks. The decrees: abstention from (1) meats offered to idols; (2) blood; (3) things strangled (as fowls and other animals caught in snares); (4) fornication. The closing salutation, like the opening one, was Greek, not Hebrew, indicating the complexion of the council.

The decrees deserve more detailed study. They are most likely exactly the prohibitions laid upon so-called Proselytes of the Gate, which, according to Jewish tradition, were among those laid upon Noah and his descendants; mark, before circumcision, and before Moses. We find, however, that they are contained in Lev. xvii. and xviii. The design of the decrees was to shut off all objectionable heathen customs, so that the Gentile Christians might escape defilement. (1)

(1) The first prohibition was called for by the permission of the social life by Paganism. That the sacrifice was used by the sacrificer as food, or else sold. The effect of the prohibition was, therefore, to debar the Gentile believer from all festivities, sacrificial feasts, and all eating of such idol-offered food was universal.
“Blood” was forbidden, because “the life of the flesh is in the blood” (Lev. xvii. 11). It was a very common article of food among the ancient Jews. (3) So particular were the Jews in regard to the slaying of their food, that they would employ only a Jewish butcher; and the same spirit is shown now. Consequently the council laid upon the Gentile converts a similar obligation. (4) The fourth prohibition was directed against that sin, which, in the then heathen world, was regarded as natural and permissible, and committed without shame. It is, however, perhaps probable that “fornication” in this passage may include unlawful marriages within the forbidden degrees of kindred (Lev. xvi. 18). We thus see, that, although the council may have considered its decrees very moderate and light, yet really it called upon the Gentile to live a different style of life, and to raise matters of perfect indifference into matters of conscience. And it is noteworthy that while, in regard to fornication, the present Church of Christ is in unison with the Primitive Church, in regard to the other decrees the Eastern or Greek Church in the second Trullan Council (692) re-enacted the law against eating blood and things strangled, and still retains it; but the Latin Church very properly has gradually let this prohibition drop. The decrees found a ready reception, and exerted a great influence (cf. xv. 31, xvi. 4, xxi. 25). They established a code of manners which protected the weak Christian, and distinguished all believers from the heathen.

3. The Effects of the Council. — The immediate effect was to greatly cheer the Gentile converts. They breathed more freely. The Judaizers were similarly depressed. But the council did not settle all points; for it yet left open to a Jewish Christian to put aside his Mosaism, while at the same time James and others were in favor of retaining it. Consequently the liberal Jew could quote the spirit of the letter; the strict Jew, the text of it. Peter in Antioch acted not so much with the decrees of the council as with himself, his speech and behavior. We can trace the influence of the first and greatest of the church council in the history of the Church, and the manner earnestness, with which, in the First Epistle to the Corinthians (v., vi. 8–10) and in the Apocalypse (ii. 14, 20), fornication and idolatry are spoken of; and the sentiments therein expressed are evidently not unusual, but the voice of the church. In regard to the eating of blood, the information is slight; but it can be said, that, in the second half of the second century, it was abhorred in the church. See Tertullian, Apologie, c. 9; Clement, Hom. VII. 4, 8; Recogn. IV. 36.

There has been a suspicion that the Acts indicated an altogether too prominent position for the Jerusalem Church in the council. But examination shows that there was no authority exerted upon the Gentile converts which did not coincide with their convictions. So Paul could heartily defend the position there taken.

4. The Accounts given in Acts xv. and Gal. ii. 1–10. — An examination of so much importance, we should expect, would be mentioned again in the New Testament; and, indeed, a reference (disputed) has been found in Paul’s Epistle to the Galatians (ii. 1–10). But there are evident differences, although they can be reconciled. The points of dissimilarity are, (1) The visit to Jerusalem mentioned in the Acts after Saul’s conversion: in Galatians it is apparently the second. (2) The Acts relate a public meeting of the entire church. Galatians refers to a private meeting between Paul and the principal (“pillar”) apostles; but he hints also at a public meeting. (3) In Galatians the circumcision (?) of Titus is mentioned: there is nothing said about it in the Acts. (4) The Acts give the text of a letter: there is no reference to it in Galatians. — actions rather than words are mentioned, — and the only exhortation given was “to remember the poor.”

In view of these dissimilarities it has been common with “liberal” theologians, especially of the “Baur” school, to throw discredit upon the fourteenth chapter of Acts, to regard it as written to reconcile the Petrine and Pauline parties, but not as history. But this view is being abandoned, at least in part, even by liberal critics, as Weizäcker, Keim, and Schenkel, who have come to the conclusion that the difference between Peter and Paul was not nearly as great as Baur had represented it. Schenkel confesses himself now convinced that the Acts is contemporary and reliable (Das Christusbild der Apostel, Leipzig, 1879, p. xi.). Krüm (Aus dem Urchristenthum, Zürich, 1878, p. 89) says, that, although the book is defective, it yet supplements Paul, and tells the story of active and sympathetic cooperation with Paul. A closer study of the two passages serves to bring out their harmony, and does away with the necessity of Paley’s suggestion that in Galatians we have mention of a visit to Jerusalem, not elsewhere recorded. 1. There are five visits of Paul to Jerusalem mentioned in the Acts. In identifying that of Galatians (ii. 1-10), the first (ix. 29) and the last (xxi. 25) must evidently be considered the true facts, while the second (xii. 25) and the fourth (xvii. 22) have found advocates. But against the first identification there are the facts (1) that it is not easy to place fourteen years between the visit of chap. ix. 27, and that of chap. xi. 30; (2) the visit of chap. xii. 30 appears in the history as confined to the single object of carrying relief to the suffering poor of the church at Jerusalem; (3) the question as to enforcing circumcision had not then been raised after its apparent settlement in the case of Cornelius; (4) had the agreement referred to in Galatians (ii. 9) preceded the council, it would assuredly have been raised in the course of the debate at the council. Against the second there are the facts (1) that the interval would in that case have been more than fourteen years; and (2) that it was not likely that the question should have been raised again after the decision of the council. (5) But in view of the importance of the case, we should expect, Paul’s Epistle to the Galatians (2:1-10). We decide, therefore, that the attendance of Paul on the council was his third visit. Paul does not say, “I went up the second time,” but "I went up again." The absence of reference to it in Galatians is explained by the fact that there he is stating how much intercourse he had had with the chief apostles, and as, on this visit, he probably did not see them, he omits all mention of it. Hence there is no discrepancy between Acts xv. and Gal. ii. in regard to time.

8. Nor is there any necessary difficulty in regard to the contents of the two accounts. (1) In both, the matters of consultation are circumcision and the Mosaic law; and the origin of the consultation was in each case the effort of the Judaizers. (2) In both, the practice of the apostle was confirmed. (3) In both, Peter appears as the equal of Paul. (4) In both, the Pauline principles are triumphant. (5) It was evidently impossible for Paul to carry on his argument for his apostolic position, and yet be silent about this most important council; for it was in it that his claim was first recognized. Therefore, that Paul ascribed his journey to revelation proves the coincidence between outward events and the Spirit's action. The Antiochian Church sent him; but God prompted him to go. Paul deals with the private, inner history of the council; the Acts, with the public. Hence the Acts are silent about this most important thing to refer perplexing questions to the council; the Acts, with the public. Hence the Acts are silent about this most important point of church government in such a council, and at the same time to be able to prove that no one does not follow that the order was of binding force. As far as we can gather, there were regularly appointed delegates from Antioch, a meeting of the council, and a new method is entirely favored by it. About the same time to be able to prove that no one had had with the chief apostles, and as, on this visit, he probably did not see them, he omits all mention of it. Hence there is no discrepancy between Acts xv. and Gal. ii. in regard to time.

5. The Apostolic Council at Jerusalem and Church Government. — Each form, Episcopal, Presbytery, Congregational, appeals to this council for support. But, while it must be freely granted that there was some particular order then used, it does not follow that the order was of binding force. As far as we can gather, there were regularly appointed delegates from Antioch, a called meeting of the apostles, and another, a further meeting of the church, a presiding officer (James, not Peter), and a letter, which was official in the sense that it received the indorsement of the Jerusalem Church. This letter contained directions which were thought to be inspired. It is easy to see elements of the three great methods of church government in such a council, and at the same time to be able to prove that no one method is entirely favored by it. About the only things it does prove are, that there was no supremacy of Peter, that it was considered a good thing to refer perplexing questions to the council; the Acts, with the public. Hence the Acts are silent about this most important thing to refer perplexing questions to the council; the Acts, with the public. Hence the Acts are silent about this most important point of church government in such a council, and at the same time to be able to prove that no one had had with the chief apostles, and as, on this visit, he probably did not see them, he omits all mention of it. Hence there is no discrepancy between Acts xv. and Gal. ii. in regard to time.

Lit. — Editions. The best editions of this whole body of literature are those by J. B. Cotterell, Paris, 1762, which was the first collection re-edited with notes by J. Clericus (Le Clerc), Andover, 1829, 2d ed., London, 1846; by G. A. Russell, London, 1846; by J. C. Heppele, Tubingen, 1839, 5th ed., by F. W. Funk, 1878; by J. F. Dresel, Leipzig, 1857, 3d ed. by Gebhardt, Harnack, and Zahn, 1876. The last edition is the best and fullest. LIGHTFOOT'S promised edition, so far, embraces only S. Clement of Rome, London, 1869, and an appendix, containing Brynnio's newly recovered portions of the Epistles of Clement, 1877.— Translations. There are good translations of the Apostolic Fathers by Archbishop Wake, London, 1693, often reprinted, latest edition, carefully revised, Oxford, 1861; by Robert A. Baldwin, Oxford, 1840; and by W. H. Davey, London, 1842. A good German translation is that of H. Schulze, Gutersloh, 1862, edited, latest edition, carefully revised, Oxford, 1861; by F. C. A. SCHWEDER: Das nachapostolische Zeitalter, Tubingen, 1846 (full of untenable hypotheses). REUSS: Hist. de la théol. chr. au siècle apost., Strassburg, 1877. The latest editions of the Apostolic Fathers, as a convert of Paul, belongs to a much later age. The Apostolic Fathers are valuable for the contrast they present to the New-Testament writers. They move in the element of living tradition, and make reference to the oral preaching of the apostles; but by their language they plainly show that the difference between them and the apostles is one of kind, not of degree. The pious, and in the main excellent Clement of Rome, Ignatius, with his morbid, feverish longing after martyrdom, Polycarp, with his remarkable echoes of the New Testament, Barnabas, allegorical and tedious, Hermas, ingenuous thought stirred, not the order, as silent, as quiet, Titus, as they are about the giving to Paul of the right hand of fellowship.

APPEALS to the pope, in his quality of primate of the Roman-Catholic Church, were not formally recognized as a legal instrument in the adminis

Council of Sardica. It was there agreed that a bishop who had been condemned by a synod had a right to appeal to the Roman patriarch, similar prohibitions were enforced now and then, appeals to Rome continued to occur until the time of Henry VIII. In Germany the first re action against this papal usurpation appeared in the “Golden Bull,” which forbade appeals to Rome from a civil court. Next the Concordatum Constant of 1418, and the decree of the thirty-first sitting of the Council of Basel, determined that appeals to the pope should not be decided in Rome by the curia, but by judices in partibus, chosen first by the provincial or diocesan synods, and afterwards, when this institution had fallen into decay, by the bishops and chapters. This was a decisive blow to the appeals to the pope; and even before the reforms of Joseph II., all German governments, Roman-Catholic as well as Protes tant, had forbidden such appeals.

Appeals from the pope to a general council were forbidden by Pius II. by a bull of Jan. 13, 1450.

APPROBATION OF BOOKS is a measure which the Roman-Catholic Church employs, in connection with the censure, in order to direct the course of literature in the interest of pure doctrines. The fifth council of the Lateran 1512) decided, that, under penalty of a fine or of excommunication, no theological book should be published without having previously obtained the approbation of the bishop of the diocese in which it was destined to appear; and this decis ion was incorporated with the decrees of the Council of Trent (Trident. ress.4). It is still valid, and. for regular members of the ecclesi astical orders, it is further extended, so that not only theological works, but any kind of literary productions, must have the approbation of the superior before they can be published. The Prot estant churches have no institutions of the kind; though in earlier times, when the censure was in use, the censorship for theological books was often vested in the consistory of the Established Church.

APPEALS TO THE POPE
AQUAVIVA, Claudius, b. Sept. 14, 1543; d. Jan. 31, 1615: joined the order of the Jesuits in 1567, and became its general in 1580. Under his rule, the order flourished in spite of the great difficulties and troubles which overtook it; but he was prudent enough to silence Molino, when the allowableness of the murder of tyrants was perfectly hot, and to silence Mariana, whose doctrine of the allowableness of the murder of tyrants produced the deepest indignation. He wrote sixteen letters, which are incorporated with the constitutions of the order, and a book. Industriae ad Cu-randus Animas Mortues, Venice, 1606. The Ratio Studiorum and Directorium Exercitorum St. Ignatii were compiled and published after his order, and under his superintendence.

AQUILA, Johannes Kaspar, b. at Augsburg, Aug. 7, 1488; d. at Saalfeld, Nov. 12, 1560: studied theology at Wittenberg and Leipzig, and became camp-preacher to Sickingen in 1515, and pastor of Jenga in 1518, but joined Luther immediately in 1517; married, and was thrown into the dungeon of Dillingen by the order of the Bishop of Augsburg, and released only on the instance of Queen Isabella of Denmark, a sister of Charles V. Repairing to Wittenberg in 1521, he was first tutor to the sons of Sickingen, and afterwards minister at Saalfeld. He aided Luther in translating the Old Testament; wrote with such a vehemence against the Interim, that Charles V. put a price of five thousand guilders on his head; and partook with great zeal in the theological controversies of the day, though most of his writings are only essays and pamphlets. See G. A. F. GENSLER : Vita M. J. C. Aquilae, Jena, 1816.

AQUILEIA, a town of Northern Italy, fifteen miles north-east of Venice, traces back the origin of its church to St. Mark, and occupied during the earlier middle ages a conspicuous place in history as the rival of Rome. In 381 the Bishop of Aquileia assumed metropolitan rights over the churches of Venice, Istria, Carniola, Carinthia, Friuli, and Styria; and in 557 the metropolitan took the title of patriarch. In his contest with the pope, the patriarch leaned first against the Lombard king, afterwards against the German emperor. In 1722 the patriarchate was divided into the two archbishoprics of Gorizia and Udine.

Aquileia is noticeable, therefore, as the seat of a patriarch, as the place of several synods, and as the cradle of a peculiar creed.

Several other Italian bishops beside the Bishop of Rome, namely, those of Milan, Ravenna, and Aquileia, labored from the earliest time to assume patriarchal powers; and they partly succeeded. But the Bishops of Milan and Ravenna were so hard pressed by the Arian Longobards during the decade from 570 to 580, that they preferred to enter into closer communication with Rome; and only the Archbishop of Aquileia, who since 508 resided in the Island of Grado, continued obstinately to resist any attempt at a union. Pope Honorius I. (625–638) felt compelled to consecrate the Bishop of Aquileia Patriarch of Grado, simply to keep up the appearance of supremacy. In 1516 the patriarchal see was removed to Venice; but this gave rise to perpetual conflicts between Austria and Venice, both claiming the right of electing the patriarch. Finally Pope Benedict XIV. abolished the Patriarchate of Aquileia altogether in 1731, and established the patri-archof Udine for the Venetian possessions in Friuli, and an apostolic vicariate at Aquileia for Austria. Venice, however, was not satisfied with the pallid arrangement; and, on the suggestion of Aus-

The first synod of Aquileia was convened in 381 to decide whether or not Palladius, Bishop of Ilyria, was justly accused of Arianism. Thirty-two bishops from Italy, Gaul, and Africa, were present on Sept. 3. The Eastern bishops had been invited, but did not appear. Valerian, Bishop of Aquileia, presided; but the true leader of the investigation was Ambrose of Milan; and Palladius, as his presbyter Secundinus, was found guilty and deposed. The second synod of Aquileia (1098) concerned the Three Chapters controversy. The bishops declared against the condemnation of the Three Chapters: but their decision never obtained authority in the church on the contrary, they were themselves considered schismatics. In 1409 Gregory XII. held a synod at Udine in the diocese of Aquileia, and anathematized both his rivals Benedict and Alexander V; but just at the same time the Council of Pisa declared for Alexander V. Other synods were held 1305, 1311, and 1339. See Three Chapters.

The above-mentioned peculiar creed of the Church of Aquileia has the words, which was probably intended for a decisive testimony against the Patrisians. It also contains the formula, and has a hujus before carnis resurrectionem. Schaff: Creeds of Christendom, II., p. 65.

\[ credo in Deo omnipotente, \]

Arabia (ḥaḍriyya), prairie does not in the Bible denote the whole peninsula between the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf, but only the northern part, contiguous to Palestine (Isa. xxi. 13; Jer. xxv. 24; Ezek. xxxvii. 21); and in the same manner "the Arabian" (Isa. xiii. 20; Jer. iii. 2) does not denote the Arab in general, but only an inhabitant of the northern prairies and deserts. Only in the later books of the Old Testament, as, for instance, in 2 Chron. xxii. 16, where "the Arabsians" are spoken of together with the Ethiopians, or in Neh. ii. 19, vi. 1, and in the New Testament (Acts iii. 11; Gal. i. 17, iv. 25) the name seems to have obtained a more general signification. Other designations employed by the Hebrews, such as "the people of the East," and "the land of the people of the East" (Gen. xxix. 1; Judg. vi. 3, 33, vii. 11, viii. 10; Job i. 3; Isa. xi. 14), must be limited in the same way.

Arabia comprises an area of about one million square miles, with about eight million inhabitants. Though it connects two continents with each other, it occupies a very isolated position, partly on account of the inhospitableness of its coasts, partly on account of the huge desert, which, to the north, separated the Arabs even from their nearest kinmen, — the Hebrews, the Syrians, the Chaldeans, and the Assyrians. From this country, however, so peculiarly shut up within itself, there broke forth at one time one of the most powerful impulses which the history of mankind ever received; and, long before that period, it attracts the attention of the student of the Bible on account of the conspicuous part it played in the history of Israel.

The population is essentially Semitic, though the southern part of the country contains Cushitic elements. Of the Cushitic tribes mentioned in Gen. x. 7, only the first one, Sheba, belongs exclusively to Africa; already the second one, Havilah, belongs without doubt to Asia (Gen. xxv. 18); and the last ones, Sabatah, Raamah, and Hararrah; and, on the east coast, Oman.

In 1409 Gregory XII. held a synod at Udine in the diocese of Aquileia, and anathematized both his rivals Benedict and Alexander V; but just at the same time the Council of Pisa declared for Alexander V. Other synods were held 1305, 1311, and 1339. See Three Chapters.

The above-mentioned peculiar creed of the Church of Aquileia has the words, "credidi ad impossibilem" added to the formula, "credo in Deo omnipotente," which was probably intended for a decisive testimony against the Patrisians. It also contains the formula, "descendit ad inferna," and has a hujus before carnis resurrectionem. Schaff: Creeds of Christendom, II., p. 65.

Arabia (ḥaḍriyya), prairie does not in the Bible denote the whole peninsula between the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf, but only the northern part, contiguous to Palestine (Isa. xxi. 13; Jer. xxv. 24; Ezek. xxxvii. 21); and in the same manner "the Arabian" (Isa. xiii. 20; Jer. iii. 2) does not denote the Arab in general, but only an inhabitant of the northern prairies and deserts. Only in the later books of the Old Testament, as, for instance, in 2 Chron. xxii. 16, where "the Arabsians" are spoken of together with the Ethiopians, or in Neh. ii. 19, vi. 1, and in the New Testament (Acts iii. 11; Gal. i. 17, iv. 25) the name seems to have obtained a more general signification. Other designations employed by the Hebrews, such as "the people of the East," and "the land of the people of the East" (Gen. xxix. 1; Judg. vi. 3, 33, vii. 11, viii. 10; Job i. 3; Isa. xi. 14), must be limited in the same way.

Arabia comprises an area of about one million square miles, with about eight million inhabitants. Though it connects two continents with each other, it occupies a very isolated position, partly on account of the inhospitableness of its coasts, partly on account of the huge desert, which, to the north, separated the Arabs even from their nearest kinmen, — the Hebrews, the Syrians, the Chaldeans, and the Assyrians. From this country, however, so peculiarly shut up within itself, there broke forth at one time one of the most powerful impulses which the history of mankind ever received; and, long before that period, it attracts the attention of the student of the Bible on account of the conspicuous part it played in the history of Israel.

The ancient geographers distinguished between Arabia Petraea, Arabia Deserta, and Arabia Felix. The first synod of Aquileia, convened in 381 to decide whether or not Palladius, Bishop of Ilyria, was justly accused of Arianism. Thirty-two bishops from Italy, Gaul, and Africa, were present on Sept. 3. The Eastern bishops had been invited, but did not appear. Valerian, Bishop of Aquileia, presided; but the true leader of the investigation was Ambrose of Milan; and Palladius, as his presbyter Secundinus, was found guilty and deposed. The second synod of Aquileia (1098) concerned the Three Chapters controversy. The bishops declared against the condemnation of the Three Chapters: but their decision never obtained authority in the church on the contrary, they were themselves considered schismatics. centre of the frankincense trade. Raamah, mentioned in Ezek. xxvii. 22, together with Shibah, as a place from which drugs, diamonds, and gold were sent to Tyre, is probably Regma, or Regama, an Arabian port on the Persian Gulf. Among the Shemites it was the descendants of Joctan, the brother of Peleg, who took possession of Yemen and the rest of Southern Arabia. The Leukitic place of descent from Abraham and Hagar, the Egyptian woman,— Nebajoth, Kedar, Dumah, and Massa,— came later; but their place of settlement has not been ascertained. The tribe of Tema (mentioned in Isa. xxi. 14; Jer. xxv. 23; Job. vi. 19) settled between Petra and Medina; and that of Jetur (the Irurames), across Arabia Deserta from Egypt to the Gulf of Persia (Gen. xlv. 12 sqq.).

The other tribes, descending from Abraham and Ketura (the Midianites and their kindred), were settled in the western parts, among the Jocatanites. This report of a difference between the northern and southern Arabians with respect to descent is supported by the existence of marked differences between them in history and language, in physical features, and moral habits. In habits, features, and language, the Southern Arabians resemble the Ethiopians. The language which in ancient times was spoken in Southern Arabia was the Himyaritic, as has been proved from numerous monuments discovered in Yemen. But the Himyaritic occupies an intermediate position between the Ethiopian and the tongue spoken in Central Arabia. The principal seat of South-Arabian civilization was the kingdom of Sheba with the capital of Mariba, or Mareb. Thence came the queen to visit Solomon (1 Kings x. 1–13), and thither belonged most of the Himyaritic inscriptions, as probably also, in the times of the earliest Christian settlement, upon the children of the East (1 Kings iv. 30). The Bible, especially the prophets, speaks of the Sabaean as a distant but far-reaching, rich, and enterprising people, which brought gold and diamonds, incense, cassia, and slaves to the northern countries from India and Africa (Jer. vi. 20; Ezek. xxvii. 22; Ps. lxxii. 15; Isa. ix. 6; Joel. iv. 8). But, besides this peaceful city population, the kingdom of Sheba also contained a country or desert population of another temper, and these Bedouins appear in connection with the Jocatanites and the Keturans. In the beginning of the third century of our era the city of Mareb was destroyed by an inundation, and several tribes then emigrated to the north, where they founded the kingdoms of Hira on the Euphrates, and of Gassau in the Hauran Mountains.

Of the two chief tribes of Ishmael, Nabajoth and Kedar, the latter plays by far the most prominent part in the records of the Old Testament. The Kedarans are mentioned in Solomon's Song i. 5, as living in black tents; in Isa. xiii. 11, Jer. xlix. 31, as settled in open villages; in Ezek. xxviii. 21, as going forth; in Gen. xlix. 10, 17, Jer. xlix. 28, as good archers, withstand the attacks of the Assyrians and Chaldeans. According to the annals of Assurbanipal, and in fulfilment of the predictions of the prophets (Isa. xxi. 11; Jer. xxv. 23, xxix. 28), they were subjugated by the Assyrians. In the period immediately after Alexander the Great they disappear as an independent tribe; but at the same time the Nebaioth or Nabateans, who are mentioned in the Old Testament only as related to the Edomites (Gen. xlix. 10, 29), gain ascendency. They not only held a great portion of Arabia Proper, for instance Aila, but they also came into possession of the land of the Idumeans with the capital Petra, and pushed onwards into the region east of the Jordan and the Syrian desert, as far as the Hauran Mountains (1 Macc. v. 25, ix. 35), and Damascus (Joseph. Ant. xili. 15, 2), thus ruling over all the lands between the Red Sea and the Euphrates. Their relations with the Jews now became of consequence. While the Arab princes Emalchuel entertained friendly relations with the Syrians (1 Macc. vi. 30), and Arabs entered the Syrian army as mercenaries (1 Macc. v. 39; 2 Macc. xii. 10), so that the Maccabees had to take the field against them (1 Macc. vii. 31), the Nabateans are repeatedly mentioned as friends and allies of the Jews (1 Macc. v. 25, ix. 35). They held kings of their own, among whom was Aretas, the father-in-law of Herod Antipas. He waged war, both against his son-in-law and the Romans, and occupied at one time Damascus (2 Cor. xli. 32). At the beginning of our era, however, the Nabateans distinguished themselves, not only in warfare, but also in the arts of peace, as shown by the ruins of Petra, by coins, inscriptions, etc. Their empire was destroyed under Trajan.

Among the Keturite tribes, only the Midianites are of any interest in antiquity. They appear in the history of Joseph as merchants (Gen. xxxvii. 28, 36). In the times of Moses they showed themselves friendly to Israel in the Sinaitic peninsula (Exod. ii. 15, iii. 1; Num. x. 29), but hostile in the region of Moab, where, however, the Israelites defeated them (Num. xxi. Comp. Num. xii. 4, xxv. 6, 14–18). In the times of the judges they pressed heavily upon Israel in connection with other Arab tribes, but were repulsed by Gilead (Judg. 6–8. Comp. Isa. ix. 3, x. 28; Hab. iii. 7; Ps. lxxxv. 10). Of any great development of power in those reigns which belonged to the Keturite tribes, nothing is heard until much later in the Christian era, when just in these lands Mohammed succeeded in raising the name of Arabia to a splendid and magnificence which it had not before attained.

Of the religion of the ancient Arabs very little is known with certainty. It is probable, however, that there existed with respect to religion the same difference between north and south as with respect to language and character; and it seems that the northern Arabians really maintained for some time a connection with Abraham and the Jews. Both the native historians and cuneiform inscriptions from the seventh and eighth centuries B.C. testify to the existence of a very old Allah-worship; and the tradition that Abraham and Ishmael were the founders of the city of Mecca, is but another point in the same direction. In later times, however, monotheism was all but lost among the ARABIANS.

Arabs. In the southern part of the country, the sun, Samas, or Sabis (feminine), and the moon, Alkamah (masculine), were worshipped together with the star of Venus, Almas, and other stars. In Northern Arabia, Orotal and Alliat, identified by Herodotus with Dionysos and Urania, were worshipped. At various times and in various places, polytheism even sank down into fetichism. Objects which, on account of form or qualities created admiration, came to be considered, not only as receptacles of divine powers, but as specimens of the divine essence, as gods. There may at all times have been persons among the Arabs who stood above such notions; but the popular level from which Mohammedanism arose was, as might be expected, very low.

ARABIC, or ARABIANS, a Christian sect, arose in the beginning of the third century in Arabia, in the times of Septimius Severus. They were a kind of Christian materialists, and held, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccles., VI., 37), that the soul dies with the body, but shall be resurrected along with it. This doctrine grew up from the view, frequently met with in antiquity, that consciousness could not exist without a body. Origen refuted them in a synod held in 216, and generally known as the Council of Arabia.

A'RAD (place of fugitives), a royal city of the Canaanites (Num. xxii. 1, xxxiii. 40; Josh. xii. 14), situated on the south-western border of the desert of Judah (Judg. i. 16), about twenty miles south of Hebron, on a hill, now called Tell Arad, still covered with ruins.

A'RAM, such as it occurs in the Old Testament, comprises all those peoples which inhabited Syria and Mesopotamia, north to the Taurus, east to the Tigris; but, as these peoples never formed a political unit, the name is not used collectively, but only with reference to some particular tribe or region or state. Thus the Old Testament distinguishes between I. Aram Naharaim, Aram between the two rivers, the land between the Euphrates and the Tigris, still called the island (Gen. xxiv. 10; Deut. xxxii. 4; Judg. iii. 8; Ps. lx. title); II. Aram Dammeke, in the north-eastern part of Palestine, often called simply Aram be-by the Arabic; and in the thirteenth it disappeared (see SYRIA). The other branch bears, since the days of Jerome, the name of the Chaldean language, though the old Chaldeans, or Babylonians, never spoke Aramaic (see BABYLONIA). The Hebrew Bible calls this branch the "Aramaic" (Dan. ii. 4; 2 Kings xviii. 26). In the time of the kings it was understood in Jerusalem, if not by people in general, at least by all educated persons; and it was the business-language throughout the Assyrian realm. The Persian Government afterwards issued its edicts, so far as they concerned the provinces of Western Asia, in the Aramaic tongue. After the exile, this tongue gradually became the popular language of Palestine, not only of Galilee and Samaria, but also of Judea. Christ and the apostles spoke it, as may be seen from several words and phrases occurring in the New Testament. The only specimens of this dialect which have come down to us are sections of the Books of Daniel (ii. 4-vii. 28) and of Ezra (iv. 8-v. 18, vii. 12-26), and the Chaldean paraphrase of the Old Testament, the so-called Targums; but of these the specimens the first mentioned show so strong a coloring of Hebrew, that many linguists have been inclined to consider the Chaldean dialect a mere mixture of Hebrew and Syriac.

ARCHAEOLOGY, Biblical, a discipline which has been very variously defined, some authors (Dionysius Halicarnassus, Josephus, Jahn, etc.) incorporating with it the whole history of the Hebrew nation, and the whole geography of the Holy Land, others (De Wette, Gesenius, Hagenbach, etc.) excluding one or both of these elements from it; while finally others have confined it to purely artistic monuments. We would propose a middle course. Leaving out biblical history, properly so called, we define biblical archaeology as a representation of the physical, geographical, statistical, economical, and social conditions of that nation which produced the Bible. Of the antiquities of other nations which came in contact with the Hebrews, either on account of race relationship, such as the Arameans, Arabs, Canaanites, Philistines, etc., or through some political combination, such as the Egyptians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, Persians, Greeks, and Romans, we admit only that which has a direct bearing on some scriptural passage. Thus defined, biblical archaeology is a most important aid, not only to the expounder, but also to every reader, of the Bible.

The sources of this science comprise: I. Antiquity monuments and buildings, plastic representations, inscriptions, and coins. To this group belong not only the ruins and architectural monuments from an ante-Mohammedan period in Palestine itself, which, although recent investigations and excavations have brought several to light, are not very numerous, but also the temples and palaces of Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Persia, Phoenicia, and Syria, with their plastic and pictorial representations, yield valuable instruction. The pertinent inscriptions are found collected in the Corpus Inscrip. Graecar.: vol. III. (1553), p. 211; Corpus Inscrip. Latin. ed.; Mommsen, vol III. (1873); Le Bas und Waddington: Inscriptions Grecques et Latines, tom. III., 1870; De Vogüe: Syrie Centrale, Paris, 1898; Wetzstein: Ausgewählte griech. und latein. Inschriften, in Abhau. d. Berliner Akad., 1893. The literature concerning the sarcophagus of Eshmunazar (Phoenician), the tablet of Marzilles (Punic), and the stone of Mesa (Moabitic), will be found under the respective heads. The coins have been examined by Eckhel, Momnet, Bertheau, Cavedoni, De Saulcy, Levy, and Madden (art. contile on Money). Among the written sources the Bible occupies the first place, though a careful discrimination is necessary between the various epochs in which the various books were written. Also the writings of Philo and Josephus give excellent information with regard to their own times; but for the other periods, they must be used with caution. The Talmud, Targums, and the Rabbinus form a "rich but not clear source." The older portions of them are of great value for the explanation of the New Testament. See Meuschen: N. T. et Talmud, 3 vols., Leipzig, 1874; Em. von Schelstrate: Talmud hebr. et talm. in N. T., Cantabur, 1658; Schöttgen: Hora hebr. et talm. in N. T., 1733 et 1742; Wetzstein: Annott. in N. T., 1757. Several Greek and Roman authors, such as Herodotus, Xenophon, Polybius, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Plutarch, Appian, Pliny,Tacitus, and Justin contain important notices, but cannot be used without the most careful criticism. Among Oriental writers the Arabic geographers and natural philosophers are of great value, such as Istachri, Edrisi, Ibn Hautal, Abulfeda, Yakut, Abulfalagh, Avicenna, and others; also the religious books of the Arabs and Parsees, and the older poets and historians, are of interest. Of still greater importance are the numerous travellers' sketches from the Orient, old and new, which will be enumerated in the article on Palestine. We mention here only two works, giving extracts from older travels, and applying them immediately to passages in the Bible. E. F. C. Rosenmüller: Das alte und neue Morgenland, 8 vols., Leipzig, 1818, an enlarged translation of Burder's Oriental Customs, London, 1802, 5th ed., 1816, 2 vols.; and Th. Harnar: Beobachtungen über d. Orient aus Reisebeschreibungen, ed. J. E. Faber, Hamburg, 1772, and Clarke, London, 1874, 4 vols.

Of the separate branches of biblical archaeology we mention first biblical geography and natural history, including the views of the Hebrews of the universe and the earth, and their knowledge of geography and ethnology. For more detailed information on this point we refer to the special articles, and mention here only the principal works on natural history according to the Bible. J. J. Scheuchzer: Physica Sacra, 1731 (illustrated); Odmann: Gemische Sammlungen, Rostock, 1786; J. B. Puchemann: Bibel, Naturkunde, und Mediz. Fragemente, Nürnberg, 1818; Tristram: The Natural History of the Bible, London, 1873, 3d ed.; S. Bochart: Hierozoicon, 1663, ed. Rosenmüller, Lips., 1793; Ol. Celsius: Hierobotanicon, Upsala, 1745. Next follows a representation of the domestic relations and customs of Israel — family and marriage, parents and children, master and slaves, house, garments, agriculture, etc., which we propose to speak of in special articles. The legal and political antiquities of the Jews have been treated by J. D. Michaelis: Mos. Recht, 1770, 6 vols.; Hüllmann: Statverfassung der Israeliten, Leipzig, 1834; Saalschütz: Das Mos. Recht, Berlin, 1833; also Selden: De Jure Naturali et Gentium juxta Dis. cipil. Hebr., London, 1840. The so-called sacred antiquities, relating to worship, have been treated by Spencer: De Legibus Hebr. Rituales, Camb., 1683; J. L. Lund: Die ältesten jüdischen Heilig. und Lebensfragen, Paris, 1803; H. Reland: Antiquitates Sacrae, Trag. ad Rhen., 1708, with notes of Kau and Ugelino, ed. by Vogel, Haile, 1769; Bähr: Die Symbolik des Mos. Kultus, Heidelberg, 1837, 2 ed., vol. i., 1874; Haneberg: Die relig. Alterthümer der Bibel, Munich, 1898. Hebrew archaeology has been specially treated by Goodwin: Moses et Aaron, Oxon., 1616, ed. Hottinger, 1710; Iken:
ARCHAEOLOGY. Ecclesiastical, is a branch of church history; but its boundaries have not yet been finally fixed, either with respect to the extension of time, or with respect to the amount of material, which it ought to encompass. Some, as for instance Walch, confine it to the three first centuries: while others, as for instance Rosenkranz and Piper, want to continue it up to our time. In the latter case its name has sometimes been altered; thus Pellicia calls its work Christ. Ecclesiae Politica. Again: some place the boundary-line at the twelfth (Augusti) or the fifteenth century (Baumgarten); while others, following the example of Joseph Bingham, place it at the death of Gregory the Great (944). The limitations of the material vary in a similar way. Formerly almost every thing was admitted; and the subject-matter was arranged, rather arbitrarily, after the fashion of Terentius Varro. It was Rosenkranz and Schleiermacher who first brought system into the limitation and arrangement of the materials. In his Encyclopedie der Christ. ARCHBISHOP. See Bishop.

ARCHDEACONS and ARCHPRESBYTERS occur very early in the dioceses as helpers, and, under certain circumstances, as representatives. of the bishops; the archdeacon standing at the head of the secular clergy in all questions of government and administration, and the archpriest heading the priestly cultus.

The origin of the office of the archdeacon is not clear. The name, ἀρχιδιάκονος (Sozom. Hist. eccl. VIII. 12), or ἀρχιδιακώνος (Sozom. Hist. eccl. VI. 9), seems originally to have been given in the Greek Church to the oldest presbyter of the diocese as a matter of course; but by degrees, as a definite distinction became established between the episcopate and the presbyterate, we find, that, towards the close of the fourth century, the senior presbyter came to occupy an intermediate position between the bishop and the ARCHDEACONS. ARCHICAPELLANUS.

In Western Europe, especially in Germany, the office developed in a somewhat different way. Here the episcopal dioceses, corresponding to the old missionary fields, were much larger, and so were the parishes into which the dioceses were divided, and which often followed the boundary-line of some political subdivision. Each parish had its church, often erected on the site of some ancient Pagan temple; but besides these parochial churches (eclesia baptismatis, plesis, tituli majoris), in which full service was performed every Sunday, with baptism, burial, etc., each parish had a number of minor churches (oratoria, capelle, tituli minores), often connected with a castle, and in which only sermons were delivered, and prayers held, but no full service performed. In course of time these oratoria, capella, tituli minores, became parish-churches themselves, with full service; but the original parochial church, whose incumbent now assumed the title of archipresbyter, or decanus ruralis, continued, nevertheless, to exercise some kind of supervision and superintendence over them.

Archdeacons occur as superior officers in the administration and jurisdiction of the episcopal diocese as early as the pontificate of Leo the Great. In the eighth century they were regular priests, and superior to the rural deacons. In the ninth century in France, and, somewhat later in Germany, the dioceses were divided, and each bishop had several archdeacons under him. With the development of the chapter-houses the powers of the archdeacons were much increased, as the archdeaconates were generally held by the provost of the cathedral and the canons; but from this circumstance arose also a conflict between the archdeacon and the bishop. Originally the archdeacon was only the coadjutor or representative of the bishop in the exercise of the episcopal jurisdiction; but, in the beginning of the thirteenth century, he is called judex ordinarius, and, but for the obstinate resistance of the bishops, he would probably have usurped the whole episcopal power of jurisdiction. He had also the right to hold visitations, to examine the candidates for ordination, to appoint and regulate the archpriests, etc. During the thirteenth century several councils (Tours, 1239; Liege, 1287; Mainz, 1310, etc.) tried to circumscribe the powers of the archdeacons in favor of the bishops, and very complicated questions of competence arose every now and then. But the Council of Trent finally settled the conflict. The archdeacons lost their right of visitation, of jurisdiction in criminal cases and cases of marriage, etc., and gradually the office lost its importance, or assumed other forms. In the Roman curia, the archdeacon became the cardinal-camerlengo, as the archpriest had become the cardinal-vicar; while in other episcopal curias, for instance in Germany, the office disappeared altogether, and its business was transferred to the vicar-general. In the Church of England, there are seventy-one archdeacons appointed by the bishops, and acting as a kind of vice-bishop, with right of visitation, suspension, excommunication, etc. See FERTSCH: Urspriprung der Dra- koven, Hildesheim, 1743; CHIFFS: Law relating to the Church and Clergy, 1850.

ARTHREALUS (ruled of the people), a son of Herod the Great by the Samaritan Malthaké; brought up at Rome with his utterine and older brother, Herod Antipas; succeeded, according to his father's will, on the latter's death (B.C. 4), although not without opposition on the part of Antipas, to the government of Judea and Samaria, with the title of ethnarch, not king as he is called by Josephus (Antiq. XVIII. 4. 3) and Matthew (ii. 22). He was so cruel, that, in the tenth year of his reign, he was deposed by Augustus, who had originally given him his government, and banished to Vienna in Gaul, on complaint of the most prominent Jews and Samaritans, A.D. 6. He died there. Josephus also relates that he magnificently rebuilt the palace at Jericho, and built a village, called after him Archelais. He was twice married, first to Mariamne, whom he divorced in order to marry Glaphyra, the former wife of his brother, Herod Antipas; succeeded, according to his second marriage was illegal. ARCHIVEITES, the name of a people transplanted by the Assyrians into the depopulated Samaria (Ez. iv. 9). They were inhabitants of Erech and its neighborhood, mentioned (in Gen. x. 10) as belonging to the kingdom of Nimrod. Erech has been identified in the ruins of Warka, on the left bank of the Euphrates, eighty-two miles south-east from Babylon, a former seat of power, and apparently the necropolis of the Assyrian kings, judging from the number of clay coffins and royal inscriptions. In the cuneiform inscriptions the place is named Arku. The Greeks called it Orchos.

ARCHICAPELLANUS (apocrisius, palatianus, abbas regii oratorii, etc.) was the highest dignitary in the church of the ancient Frankish Empire. To the royal court, still ambulant, and changing its residence from place to place, there belonged a number of clerical persons, at the head of whom stood the archicapellanus. His office was to report to the king all ecclesiastical affairs; and as the Frankish Church of that time, in vindication of its independence of Rome, sought and found its centre in the royal power, the archicapellanus became naturally the most influential and powerful of the Frankish prelates.

Soon his office extended also to secular affairs. He became chief of the chancery, and the summen cancellarius became his subordinate. The office was generally filled by an archbishop, after the division of the empire it was even connected with a certain see, — for Germany with Mainz, for Gaul with Treves, for Italy with Co-
The notice which the Bible gives of Hebrew architecture are very few, and so are the architectural remains from biblical times found in Palestine. The common house was that generally met with throughout the whole Orient, built of baked or sun-dried brick, sometimes of hewn stones (Isa. ix. 10), cemented by lime (Isa. xxvii. 9) or gypsum, and often plastered (Lev. xiv. 41; Ezek. xiii. 10; Matt. xxvii. 23). The beams and the roofing were generally in wooden bars, and the posts were adorned with carvings or inlaid with ivory (1 Kings xxi. 39; Jer. xxii. 1). The doors were shut by wooden bars, and the posts were adorned with carvings (Deut. vi. 9). Rich people had rooms provided with a hearth (Jer. xxxvi. 22; Num. xvi. 9). Rooms in the back were destined for the harem, etc. A wall of three rows of huge hewn stones, with a battlement of cedar-wood (Isa. xix. 10; Jer. xxii. 14). In palaces, columns and colonnades were of frequent occurrence (Judg. iii. 23). Larger houses consisted of several stories, and were built in a square, around a roomy court-yard, which contained the well and the fountain (2 Sam. xi. 2, xvi. 18). Sometimes such houses had a front-court, from which people entered into the inner court through a door, or ascended to the upper stories or to the roof by stairs (Mark xiv. 68; Luke xvi. 20; John xviii. 14; Acts x. 17).

The roof was flat, only a little inclined to let off the rain-water, and provided with a breastwork (Deut. xxii. 8). It was used for various domestic purposes,—for recreation and sleep, for lonely meditations and religious exercises, and in cases when somebody wished everybody to see and hear what he said or did (2 Sam. xi. 2, 1 Sam. ix. 2). Acts x. 8; 2 Sam. xxxi. 22; Matt. xxvii. 11; Isa. xxii. 1). Stairs led up to it, both from the street and from the interior of the house. With the roof communicated the so-called upper room, which was used as a place of retirement, a kind of house-chapel (2 Sam. xviii. 32; 2 Kings xxii. 12; Acts iii. 3, xx. 8), or as a spare-room for guests (2 Kings iv. 10). It was cool (Judg. iii. 20), and here the corpse was laid out before burial (Act. ix. 37, 39). The walls were generally wainscoted, the panels being sometimes inlaid with ivory (1 Kings xxii. 38; Jer. xxii. 14). Light was admitted through latticed windows (Judg. v. 28). The doors were shut by wooden bars, and the posts were adorned with proverbs (Deut. vi. 9). Rich people had rooms for the summer, and rooms for the winter, the latter provided with a hearth (Jer. xxxvi. 22; Amos iii. 15). The back rooms were destined for the women, and could be entered by none but the master of the house.

A Hebrew architecture, in the proper sense of the word, did not arise, however, until the times of kings. But, immediately after the conquest of Canaan, the Israelites became masters of the city, and to erect a palace for himself. Still greater and more brilliant were the undertakings of his son Solomon. He enlarged and strengthened the city-wall and the Castle of Millo (1 Kings iii. 1, ix. 15, 24, xi. 27), erected fortresses and palaces also outside of the capital (1 Kings ix. 15—19), and built a costly aqueduct by which excellent drinking-water was led from the region of Etam, south-west of Bethlehem, to Jerusalem. His two most magnificent buildings, however, were the temple and the palace. It took seven years and a half to build the former (1 Kings vi. 38), besides three years to gather and prepare the materials, during which time a hundred and eighty-three thousand Jews and strangers were employed. The contractors and superintendents were Phoenicians. The cedar and cypress wood, and probably also the stone, was brought from Lebanon, floated down to Joppa, and thence hauled to Jerusalem. On Mount Moriah enormous trees were to be raised, in which huge stones were used, thirty feet long, seven feet and a half thick, and hewn in a manner not met with outside of Phoenicia and Syria. These truly cyclopean walls have partially withstood the vicissitudes of thirty centuries, while the temple itself withstood the building of the royal palace took thirteen years (1 Kings vii. 1). It stood on the north-eastern side of Mount Zion, west of the temple, and consisted of two large courts connected by a passage-yard (2 Kings xx. 4). In the centre of the front court stood the House of the Forest of Lebanon, two hundred feet long, one hundred feet broad, and sixty feet high, consisting of three stories, and forming an interior court-yard, surrounded by open galleries, which rested on four rows of columns of cedar-wood. A flight of stairs led to the passage-yard, with a hall one hundred feet long and sixty feet broad, resting on columns, where stood the magnificent throne (1 Kings x. 18). In the back court was the palace proper, with the harem, etc. A wall of three rows of huge hewn stones, with a battlement of cedar beams, surrounded the whole structure. The interior decorations consisted exclusively of foliage ornaments, whose character, though very different from what elsewhere occurs in antique art, is tolerably well known from ancient Hebrew tombs.

From the circumstance that both under David, and still more under Solomon, every architectural undertaking was executed by the aid of King Hiram of Tyre and his Phoenician artisans (1 Kings v. 9; Joseph. Ant. 8, 5, 3), it has been generally inferred that Hebrew architecture was a mere repetition of Phoenician architecture. Nevertheless, in the description of the palace, not only the general impression, but a number of details, remind most decidedly of the palaces of the valley of the Nile, and, with respect to the temple, the model was the tabernacle, and in the details foreign influence can have made itself felt only so far as it was compatible with the Jewish idea of God. In Hebrew architecture, when it stood at its highest, in the time of the kings, both Egyptian and Assyrian influences have asserted themselves beside the Phoenician. After the time of the Maccabees, especially under the Herodian dynasty, Greek art became prevailing. All the magnificent structures from that time—gymsnaumi, baths, theatres, palaces, and colonnades—were Greek, and so was, to a great extent, the new temple built... by Herod (Joseph. Ant. 13, 8, 1; 15, 9, 4; 6; 15, 10, 3). See Tabor, Temple.

ARCHITECTURE, Christian, does not denote a special chapter of the history of architecture. Taken into the service of the Christian Church, and adapting itself to the liturgical demands of Christian worship, architecture burst into a new bloom, and produced some of its grandest fruits: but it received this new spirit, and acted upon this new impulse, without deserting its old, already established norms, without any sudden breach in its onward development.

The gospel was preached in the synagogues of the cities (Acts iv. 1, xvi. 17, xvii. 4, xviii. 19, xix. 9); but as a congregation this structure was formed, and a peculiar worship began to develop, the Christians separated from the synagogue, and held their gatherings in private houses (Acts ii. 46, xx. 9; Rom. xvi. 5; 1 Cor. xvi. 19). In the times of persecution every place might become a place of worship,—the desert, the ship, the inn, the jail, and the tomb (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. V. 22). For a long period the catacombs of Rome were the church of the Roman congregation, the place of their teaching and their worship. Independent church-buildings, that is, buildings erected or set apart for the divine service of the congregations, existed in the third century; but the slight and frail character of these structures is proved by the circumstance, that, during the persecution of Diocletian, the famous Church of Nicomedia was destroyed and leveled to the ground by the Praetorian guard in the course of a few hours (Lactant. De Mortib. Persec. c. 12).

Not until the time of Constantine did Christian architecture become an art; and so slight were its pretensions to originality, so closely did it adapt itself to the artistic forms already existing, that it has appeared to us in two entirely different styles. I. The Basilican, and II. The Byzantine, corresponding to the two principal types of national civilization,—the Roman and the Greek. Between these two styles there is very little similarity; for in neither of them is there, in their first productions, any thing strikingly and pronouncedly Christian. The Byzantine was the more magnificent and brilliant of the two. But it soon became stationary, and even degenerated, while the Basilican developed two new and grand phases, III. The Romanesque, and IV. The Gothic style.

1. The Basilican style sprung from the Roman basilica, which was not only imitated, but in many cases actually taken possession of, and, with few and slight alterations, used as a Christian church. The style became prevalent throughout the Western countries, and lasted till the beginning of the eleventh century. Under the reign of Constantine, and partly by his support, several magnificent structures were erected in this style, both in the East and in the West, such as the Basilica of Tyre, built (313–22) by Bishop Paulinus, the Church of St. Mary in Bethlehem (329–30), the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem, consisting of a basilica and a rotunda, the Church of the Vatican (339), that of the Lateran, etc. As specimens still existing and in good repair may be mentioned, S. Paolo fuori le mura, S. Agnese fuori le mura, S. Clemente in Rome, S. Apollinare in Classe in Ravenna, etc.

The Roman basilica, an imitation of the Greek ἱερός ὄρος, thus called because the second arch, the οἶκος βασιλέως, held his court there, was a rectangular structure of two stories, presenting a bare wall to the street, and forming in the interior a large hall surrounded by columns and galleries. In the front was an open court, atrium, narthex; in the rear a semicircular addition covered with a vault, hemicycle, tribuna. The main hall was used by the Romans as a kind of bourse, or exchange: in the tribuna sat the court,—the judge, the lawyers, the witnesses, etc.

The changes which it was necessary to make in order to transform this structure from an ex-
ARCHITECTURE.

II. The Byzantine style originated, according to some art-historians, from the Roman mausoleum, according to others, from a Persian influence, most probably from both. The cupola, which is the most prominent feature in Byzantine church architecture, was frequently used in Roman tombs; and the transition from a Pagan mausoleum erected in honor of some hero, to the Christian church raised as a mausoleum over the remains of a martyr, seems both easy and natural. But in the Roman tombs the cupola was always placed on a circular substructure, and it was in Persia that the problem was first solved of placing the cupola on a square substructure by forming an octagon in the interior of the square by means of a huge pillar in each angle. This Persian form of dome-building—the combination of the cupola and the square—the Eastern Church adopted: and in this ground-plan it found its spirit expressed, its wants satisfied. The structure became higher and loftier; and, by the opportunity it afforded to place galleries on lower columns between the pillars, it at once acquired a more picturesque and imaginative appearance, and met the want, so peremptory in the East, of full separation between the sexes. In the Roman basilica, with its atrium for the catechumens and penitents, its nave for the congregation, its apsis, or sanctuarium, for the officiating clergy, we recognize the Western Church, with its striving for clear and definite organization, for policy. In the Byzantine dome, in which the light and broad aisles have been transformed into narrow and dark corridors, in which the atrium, and even the apsis, with the altar, have shrunk into insignificance, in which the whole construction is concentrated on the free, central space, where a dim light floats far aloft under the cupola, we recognize the Eastern Church, with its craving for dreamy and subtle speculation, for theology.

Several fine specimens of this style were produced in the reign of Constantine, such as the so-called Dominium Aureum in Antioch (381); the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem, which, as above mentioned, combined a basilica with a rotunda; the Church of the Apostles in Constantinople; the Church of the Ascension on Mount Olivet, etc. But its point of culmination did not reach until in the sixth century, under the reign of Justinian. The two masterpieces of the style are St. Vitale in Ravenna (526–47) and St. Sophia in Constantinople (532–57). The latter is probably the grandest monument of Christian art, covering an area of seventy thousand square feet. The bulk of the building forms nearly a square, two hundred and thirty-five feet, the one way, and two hundred and fifty feet the other. The central dome—a hundred and seven feet in diameter, and forty-six feet high—raises a hundred and eighty feet from the floor; east and west it rests, not on pillars with piers, but on two semi-domes of the same dimensions, and thus a central space, two hundred feet long and a hundred feet broad, is left entirely free and unencumbered. Above these two, and in the main cupola, gold and silver, ivory and precious stones, porphyry and marble—corresponded to the grandeur of the dimensions; and when the building was finished, Justinian burst out, "I have eclipsed thee, O Solomon!" Since 1453 St. Sophia has been used by the Turks as a common mosque.

A latter development of the Byzantine style shows a substitution of the Greek cross for the square substructure, and a multiplication of the cupolas. The number of cupolas was then increased to nine—one at the end of each arm, one over the crossing, and one in each corner of the square: and various fantastic, almost grotesque forms were attempted. Many examples are found in Russia. In Western Europe the style penetrated only as far as the Hungarian frontier, with the exception of a number in Northern Italy; but in Eastern Europe and Western Asia it was and is generally prevailing.

III. The Romanesque style was simply a development from the basilican by adaptation of various Byzantine motives, especially the round arch. It dates as a definite style from the beginning of the eleventh century, and produced a number of fine buildings in Upper Italy and in the valleys of the Rhine and the Rhone. It was, nevertheless, only a transition style; and during the thirteenth century it disappered, its true and perfect ideal having been found in the Gothic style.

Under the rule of the Romanesque, both the ground-plan and the interior and exterior arrangement of the old basilica were materially changed. The most important of these changes was the introduction of transepts, or the adaptation of the cruciform plan with fixed mathematical proportions. In the old basilica, all proportions had been completely arbitrary; but in the cruciform plan the proportions became fixed, as the cross was invariably produced by repeating the square, chosen as unit, three times to the west, and one time respectively to the north, east, and south. The establishment of chapters, or the connection between the church and the monastery, made an extension of the choir necessary. The introduction of side-altars produced a number of apses, especially at the termination of the transepts and the aisles. The development of the vault over the martyr's bones into a complete crypt caused the choir to be raised considerably above the floor of the nave. In the Cathedral of Bologna, light of twenty-two stairs led from the latter to the former. The atrium disappeared; and the cantharus was moved inside the door, where it became the font with holy water. A belfry was raised,—first one, and as an independent building, then two, and, lastly, the tall campanile, which is the elevation of the main building,—where, instead of the atrium, a front façade was formed, with an elaborate portal and window, etc.
Of still greater consequence were the changes which the introduction of the round arch caused in the construction of the building. When the flat wooden ceiling was discarded, the barrel-vault was first tried, as the easiest to build; but, as the barrel-vault pressed with equal force on every point of the side-walls, it was necessary to give these an enormous strength. Then the cross-vault was adopted, in which the pressure is concentrated on those four points in which the ribs touch the side-walls. These four points became necessary to strengthen with additional masonry; while the intervening portions of the wall could be made thinner and lighter without weakening the structure. Thus the dead saineness of the wall was broken, and the formation of pillars began. Also the cross-vaulting—looking like a softly undulating cloth, fastened to the points of abutment, and along the ribs, but raised as if by an upward breeze—made a much stronger impression of life and animation than the flat wooden ceiling; and, compared with the old Basilian style, the Romanesque was a decided improvement, though it generally makes a somewhat heavy, and not fully harmonious impression.

IV. The Gothic style realized all the aspirations of the Romanesque. Retaining the ground-plan and general arrangement such as they had been fixed by the Romanesque style, the Gothic seized upon the new principle of construction introduced, but only feebly developed, by the Romanesque,—the arch,—and carried it out to its last consequences and to its highest perfection, producing buildings which are marvels of audacity, and marvels of beauty.

The difference between the Romanesque and the Gothic style arises from the substitution by the latter of the pointed arch for the round. To whom the invention of the pointed arch belonged is not known: but true lancet arches were much used in Asia by the Saracens at the time of the first crusade, and it is probable that it was the crusaders who brought this novelty back to Europe, as we find it introduced almost simultaneously in France, England, Germany, Spain, and Italy. The most palpable advantage which the pointed arch has above the semicircular is, that it makes it easy to vault an oblong as a square place by allowing arches of different span to enter into the same system. They need only to be constructed on different radii in order to be carried to the same height. But still greater consequences were involved in the principle. The pressure of the pointed arch is, of course, more perpendicular than that of the semicircular. The side-thrust is smaller. Thus it becomes easier with the pointed arch to gather the whole pressure of the vault upon the points where the ribs are in contact with the side-walls, and giving each shaft at the sustaining point its own part of the vault to carry. Thereby all the lines of the construction assume an upward tendency, which wholly obliterates the idea of a mechanical contrivance, and as the head becomes the impression of organic growth. It is the great triumph of the Gothic style that it alone, among all styles, has been able to give the aspect of movement to stationary forms, the illusion of life to dead masses.

The style arose in the twelfth century, culminated in the thirteenth, degenerated by excesses (such as the Flamboyant in France, and the Perpendicular in England) in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, and finally gave way to the Renaissance. The earliest fully-developed example is the Cathedral of St. Denis, consecrated in 1144; and in Northern France the style reached its highest perfection in the cathedrals of Notre Dame in Paris (1163–1312), Chartres (1195–1260), Rheims (begun in 1212), Amiens (1220–88), etc. Also in England it produced a number of exceedingly fine buildings, such as the Cathedral of Canterbury (1174), Westminster Abbey in London (1245–89), the cathedrals of Salisbury (1220–58), Exeter (1327–69), etc. But the difference between Gothic architecture in France and in England, though a difference of national taste only, not of artistic principle, is, nevertheless, very pronounced, and strikes the beholder at the very first glance: the English cathedral is long and low, stately and solemn; the French is short and high, airy and spirited. In Germany, Spain, and Italy, the decision was generally the same, though it generally makes a somewhat heavy, and not fully harmonious impression.

V. The Renaissance style, which in the course of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries completely superseded the Gothic, has sometimes been designated as a return to Paganism. It was, at all events, a return to the classical forms. It began as eclecticism. The round arch, the cupola, the column in its classical proportions and significance, etc., were once more resorted to; but it ended in merely copying antique temples; that is, the shell of them being transferred into modern cities by means of a most minute imitation. Between these two points, the Renaissance period has a very varied history, of great interest to the architect proper, but not so very impressive to the student of Christianity and its influence on the world. Its chief monument is the Church of St. Peter in Rome, commenced in 1506 by Bramante, continued by Raphael (1514–20), Peruzzi (1520–49), Michelangelo (1546–64), Carlo Maderno (1605–29), and finished by Bernini in 1667.

Like the Romanesque, the Renaissance style bore the character of being a transition, with the difference, however, that it did not lead to anything. In modern times church-building is generally a more or less strict adaptation of some older style, without any distinct ideas of its own. Sometimes it is a mixing-together of all styles; sometimes a renunciation of style altogether. The latter is especially the case in America. A great number of churches is built here; but, though some of them are very costly and more or less magnificent structures, most of them are constructed merely with regard to convenience and comfort.

ARCHONTICI, a sect of the fourth century, composed a peculiar kind of works which they called revelations* (see Pseudepigrapha of THE CHRISTIAN), in one of which, "The Symphony," they treated of the seven heavens, each of which had its own ruler. The mother was a certain Thotina, they said that they fed on human souls, and could not exist without such food. The ruler of the seventh heaven they called Zabaoth (Sağıº); and the devil, who was identical with the god of the Jews, was one of his sons. They rejected baptism; but some of them used to sprinkle the head of the dead with water or oil, thereby intending to make them invisible, and raise them above the reach of the heavenly powers. The sect was started by Peter of Capharbaricha, near Jerusalem, and, especially under the vigorous preaching of his disciples, spread among rich and prominent people. Its doctrines, Gnostic in general, were afterwards carried into the Greater and Lesser Armenia. The source of all our knowledge is Epiphanius, Hist. xvi. Later writers merely copy him.

ARCHICOMBOLOTI, Giovanni Angelo, b. in Milan in the latter part of the fifteenth century, d. in 1555, studied law, obtained an appointment in the service of the Roman curia, became gregarius et referendarius apostolici for all financial matters concerning the erection of the Church of St. Peter, and was in 1514 made commissary-general for the sale of indulgences in Northern Germany and Scandinavia. In Denmark he stayed two years, and realized immense profits by selling "forgiveness for all kinds of crimes, restitution to the state of innocence and purity at the time of baptism, and free entrance through the gates of heaven." But when, in order to achieve a similar success in Sweden, he tried to gratify himself with the Swedish grandees by betraying to them the plans of the Danish king, all the property he had amassed in Denmark, consisting of money, jewelry, iron, butter, and eggs, was confiscated. He had to flee for his life, and a formal accusation of treachery was raised against him in Rome. The pope, however, acquitted or forgave him, as the Danish king proved himself favorable to the Reformation, and Archiboliti afterwards served Charles V., was made Bishop of Novara in 1525, and Archbishop of Milan in 1536. In literary history he is acquired a name by his discovery of the five first books of the Annales Taciti in the library of the Monastery of New-Corvey.

ARGOSOLIUM, from arcus, an "arch," and solium, a "throne," a "bath-tub," a "coffin," denotes a peculiar tomb-arrangement found in the Roman catacombs, and employed at the graves of martyrs and other eminent persons. The arrangement is this: an arch is hewn into the living rock, and under this arch the sarcophagus is placed, or the niche is closed by a small slab. The tomb thus formed is covered by a loose slab. Often in various other ways.

ARGEIAS. 1. A contemporary of the Jewish high priest Jason and Menelaus, and of the King of Syria, Antiochus Epiphanes, B.C. 170 (2 Macc. v. 8).

2. The King of Arabia, Nabatean, and father-in-law of Herod Antipas; but, when the latter divorced himself from his (Aretas') daughter to make way for Herodias, Aretas revenged the insult by arms and completely defeated the army of Herod Antipas. Antipas complained to his patron, the Emperor Tiberius, who commissioned Tellius, Governor of Syria, to attack Aretas. But the death of Tiberius prevented him. The new emperor, he thought, might not desire to continue the feud of his predecessor. The interesting point in this history is, that to Aretas, having now the good graces of the Romans, Caligula restored the government of Damascus, and thus the accuracy of Paul is fully sustained. It was while Aretas was king, that he submitted to the authority of that city, invited by the Jewish priests, desired to apprehend Paul. This was A.D. 38 or 39. Mionnet, Descript. de médailles antiques, tom. V., p. 285, mentions a coin from Damascus with the name of Aretas upon it, which is to be set down as probably from A.D. 37 or 39.

ARGEIAS. Benedictus, a native of Bätterkind, in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, studied at Marburg, and was appointed professor of theology in 1563, in Bern, where he died in 1574. His principal work — Theologiae Problemata, Geneva, 1579, republished in 1617 — was highly valued, and found many imitators. His Examen Theologicum is also a useful book, and run through six editions in fourteen years. His commentary on the New Testament, published in 1550, was republished in 1610, and his commentary on the Pentateuch and the Psalms in 1618. He also gave a commentary to Findar, and a description of the flora of Stockhorn and Riesen. See Melch. Adam: Vita Theolog.

ARGENTINE REPUBLIC, The, extending between the Andes to the west and the Atlantic to the east, between Patagonia to the south and Bolivia to the north, was discovered by Juan Diaz de Solis in 1516, occupied by the Spaniards in the following decades, and organized as a part of the viceroyalty of Peru. In 1778 a separate viceroyalty was established, with Buenos Ayres as its capital, and comprising Bolivia, Paraguay, Uruguay, and the states of the Rio de la Plata. In 1810, after the dethronement of the Bourbon dynasty in Spain, a revolution broke out in this group of colonial lands, which ended, in 1812, with the formal recognition of their independence by the mother-country. But at the same time an internal war began between the several members of the group, which finally resulted in the establishment of so many independent republics.

With the Spaniards the Roman-Catholic Church came into the country; and it is still the church of the state, having five bishoprics,—Buenos Ayres, Cordova, Salta, Sarana, and Cuyo. The liberal ideas, however, which, since 1813, have reigned in the government, and prevailed in the people, have considerably modified the position of the Roman Church. Most of the convents have been suppressed, and their property confiscated; and the government has assumed the administration of the tithes, applying one part of them for educational purposes. In 1825 religious toleration was established, and in 1834 mixed marriages were recognized.

As long as the mission was in the hands of the Jesuits (1590-1767), great results were effected. Large numbers of Indians were reclaimed from the savage state, and led into the paths of a Christian and civilized life. They were induced to settle in villages around the missionary stations; they were taught agriculture and trade; they received the first elements of education; and on every occasion they showed a most remarkable docility towards their teachers. But, after the expulsion of the Jesuits, the Roman Catholic Church—now represented by the Dominican and Franciscan orders—became indolent, greedy, and tyrannous. It lost its hold on the hearts of the people; and thousands of Indians relapsed into heathenism and savagery.

Protestant missionaries first came to the country in 1835, and several flourishing stations have been established, especially by the Methodists. A special aid in their work the Protestant missionaries have found in the circumstance that of late a great number of Protestant settlers have emigrated to the country. See the Report of the Miss. Soc. of the Meth. Ep. Church for 1879, New York, 1880.

ARIANISM, so called from its leader—Arius (Arius), a presbyter of Alexandria (d. 336), see ARIUS—is one of the most powerful and tenacious christological heresies in the history of ancient Christianity. It was during a part of the fourth century the ruling creed in the Eastern Church, though under constant vigorous protest of the orthodox party. It was also at first the creed of most of the barbarian Teutonic races, before they were converted to Catholicity.

I. History of Arianism. The roots of the Arian conflict lie deep in the differences of the ancient Nicene doctrine of the Logos, especially in the contradictory elements of Origen's Christology, which was claimed by both parties. Origen, on the one hand, attributed to Christ eternity and other divine attributes, which lead to the Nicene doctrine of the identity of substance (homoousia); but, on the other hand, in his zeal for the personal distinctions in the Godhead, he taught with equal emphasis a separate essence and the subordination of the Son to the Father, calling him "a secondary God," without the article, while the Father is "the God." He taught the eternal generation of the Son from the will of the Father, but represented it as the communication of a secondary divine substance. Athanasius laid stress on the first, Arius on the second element in the Christology of Origen.

(1) History of Arianism from 318 to the Council of Nicaea (325).—The controversy broke out at Alexandria, A.D. 318. According to the account of Socrates, Alexander, the bishop of Alexandria, gave the first impulse by insisting, in a meeting, on the eternity of the Son; whereupon Arius openly opposed, and charged him with Sabellianism. He reasoned thus: "If the Father begat the Son, he must be older than the Son, and there was a time when the Son was not; from this it further follows, that the Son has his substance (hypothesis) from nothing." The account of Sozomenus and Epiphanius differ in this, that they date the conflict from discussions among the presbyters and laymen, and Sozomenus represents Alexander as at first wavering between the two opinions. In 321 Alexander convened a council of about a hundred Egyptian and Libyan bishops at Alexandria, which excommunicated Arius and his followers for their open denial of the true deity of Christ. But Arius spread his views all the more zealously in an entertaining half-poetic work, Thalia (the Banquet), of which only fragments remain in Athanasius. He found powerful friends in Eusebius of Caesarea, the famous church historian, and other bishops, who either shared his view, or at least considered it innocent. In a short time the whole Eastern Church was turned into a metaphysical battle-field. The Emperor Constantine was inclined to look upon the controversy as a mere logomachy, and never understood its deeper import. But, for political considerations, he called, at the suggestion of some bishops, the first ecumenical synod of the church, to settle the Arian controversy, together with the question of the time of celebrating Easter, and the Melitene schism in Egypt.

(2) The Council of Nicaea (325).—The first ecumenical council, held at Nicaea, Bithynia (now a miserable Turkish village, —Isnik), consisting of three hundred and eighteen bishops (about one-sixth of all the bishops of the Greco-Roman Empire), resulted in the formal condemnation of Arius, and the adoption of the "Nicene Creed," so called, which affirms in unequivocal terms the doctrine of the eternal deity of Christ in these words: "(We believe) in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only Son of God, begotten of the Father, God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten, not made, being of one substance with the Father, by whom all things were made [in heaven and on earth]; who for our salvation, came down and was made man, and for our salvation, came down and was made man, and was crucified also for us, the third day he rose again, and ascended into heaven; from thence he cometh to judge the quick and the dead." The passages enclosed in brackets were omitted or changed in the so-called Constantinopolitan Creed (381). To the original Nicene Creed is added the following anathema: "And those who say: there was a time when he (the Son) was not; and: he was made out of nothing, or out of another substance or thing, or the Son of God is created, or changeable, or alterable;—they are condemned by the holy catholic and apostolic Church." This anathema was likewise omitted in that form of the Nicene Creed which is usually, though incorrectly, traced to the Constantinopolitan synod of 381, and which since the Council of Chalcedon in 451 entirely superseded the original Nicene Creed of 325. (See below.)

The creed was signed by nearly all the bishops. Hosius at the head, even by Eusebius of Caesarea, who, before and afterwards, occupied a middle position between Athanasius and Arius.
ARIA NISM.

This is the first instance of such signing of a doctrinal symbol. Eusebius of Nicomedia and Theonas of Sebaste—persistently refused to sign, and were deposed, and banished for a short time. Only two Egyptian bishops—Theonas and Sebaste—persistently refused to sign, and were deposed, and banished for a short time.

condemnatory formula appended, and for this first example of the civil punishment of heresy, banished, with Arius, to Illyria. This is the doctrinal symbol. Eusebius of Nicomedia and opened the long and dark era of persecutions for all departures from the catholic or orthodox faith. Theognis of Nicaea signed the creed, but not the synodicalexcommunication. The unflinching cornerstone of the Christiansystem. The poison of Constantine, who baptized Constantine on his death-bed. Constantine was turned favorably to Arius, he recalled him from exile, and ordered him to be solemnly restored to the communion of the Catholic Church at Constantinople; but, on the day preceding his intended restoration, the heretic died suddenly (336). See Arius. In the year following, Constantine himself died, and his son Constantine II. recalled Athanasius; and the orthodox Council of Sardica, A.D. 343 (not 347, as formerly supposed; see Hefele, Concilien geschichte, I., 515 sqq.) and the Arian counter-synod of Philippopolis; the councils of Sirmium, 351; Arles, 353; Milan, 355; the second council at Sirmium, 357; the third, 359; at Antioch, 358; at Arles, 364; at Constantinople, 360. Aided by Constantius, Ariusian, under the modified form represented by the term homo-ousion (similar in essence, as distinct from the Nicene homo-ousion and the strictly Arian hetero-ousion) gained the power in the empire; and even the papal chair in Rome was for a while desecrated by heresy during the Arian interregnum of Felix II. But the death of Constantius in 361, the indifference of his successor, Julian the Apostate, to all theological disputes, the toleration of Jovian (d. 364), and especially the internal dissensions of the Arians, prepared the way for a new triumph of orthodoxy. The Eusebians, or semi-Arians, taught that the Son was similar in substance (homiousios) to the Father; while the Aetians (from Aetius, a deacon of Antioch) and the Eunomians (from Eunomius, Bishop of Cyzicus in Mycia) taught that he was of a different substance (heteroousios), and unlike (anomoios) to the Father (hence the names Hetero-ousiasts and Anomoeans). A number of synods and creeds of compromise were devoted to the healing of these dissensions, but without permanent effect.

On the other hand, the defenders of the Nicene Creed, Athanasius, and, after his death (373), the three Cappadocians bishops—Basil the Great, Gregory of Nazianzum, and Gregory of Nyssa,—triumphantly vindicated the Catholic doctrine against all the arguments of the opposition. When Gregory of Nazianzum was called to Constantinople in 379, there was but one small congregation in the city which had not become Arian; but his able and eloquent sermons on the deity of Christ, which won him the title of "Theologian," contributed powerfully to the resuscitation of the Catholic faith; and two years afterwards he presided over the second ecumenical council. The rising influence of monasticism, especially in Egypt, was bound up with the cause of Athanasius; and the more conservative portion of the semi-Arians gradually accepted the orthodox in spite of the persecutions of the violent Arian emperor, Valens.

(1) The final triumph of the Nicene orthodoxy under Theologius the Great (381).—This emperor was a Spaniard by birth, and reared in the Nicene faith. During the Arian persecution (379–395) he completed externally the spiritual and Intellectual victory of orthodoxy already achieved. He convened the second ecumenical council at Constantinople (381), which consisted of only one hundred and fifty bishops, and was presided over successively by Melitius, Gregory of Nazianzum, and Nectarius of Constantinople. The council condemned the Pneumatomachian heresy, which denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit, and virtually completed the orthodox dogma of the Holy Trinity. The Nicene Creed now in common use (with the exception of the Latin clause Filioque, which is of much later date, and rejected by the Greek Church) is usually traced to this council of Constantinople, but existed at an earlier date: it is found in the Aceratus of Epiphanius, A.D. 373, and derived by him from a still older source, namely the baptismal creed of the Church of Jerusalem. It is not in the original acts of the Council of Constantinople, but was afterwards incorporated in them. Dr. Hort derives it mainly from Cyril of Jerusalem, about 362–364. See his Dissertations quoted below, and the art. NICENE COUNCILS.

The emperor gave legal effect to the doctrinal decisions and disciplinary canons, and in July, 381, he enacted a law that all church-property should be given up to those who believed in the equal divinity of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Arianism, after forty years’ reign, was forcibly driven out of all the churches of Constantinople, and generally forbidden throughout the empire. We meet the last traces of it in Constantinople under the Emperor Anastasius (491–518).

After Theodosius, Arianism ceased to exist as an organized form of theology and ecclesiastical history; but it reappeared from time to time as an isolated theological opinion, especially in England. Emlyn, Whiston, Whitby, Samuel Clarke, Lardner, and many who are ranked among Socinians and Unitarians, held Arian sentiments; but Milton and Isaac Newton, though approaching the Arian view on the relation of the Son to the Father, differed widely from Arianism in spirit and aim.

(5) Arianism among the Barbarians.—The church legislation of Theodosius was confined, of course, to the limits of the Roman Empire. Beyond it, among the barbarians of the West, who had received Christianity in the form of Arianism during the reign of the Emperor Valens, it maintained itself for two centuries longer, though more as a matter of accident than choice and conviction. The Ostrogoths remained Arians till 553; the Visigoths, till the Synod of Toledo in 589; the Suevi in Spain, till 560; the Vandals, who conquered North Africa in 429, and furiously persecuted the Catholics, till 530, when they were expelled by Belisarius; the Burgundians, till their incorporation in the Frank Empire (in 531): the Lombards in Italy, till the middle of the seventh century. Alaric, the first conqueror of Rome, Genseric, the conqueror of North Africa, Theodoric the Great, King of Italy, and hero of the Niebelungenlied, were Arians; and the first Teutonic translation of the Gospel Scriptures, of which important fragments remain, came from the Arian or semi-Arian missionary Ulfilas.

II. The Creed of Arianism.—The Father alone is God: he alone is unbegotten, eternal, wise, good, unchangeable. He is separated by an infinite chasm from man. God cannot create the world directly, but only through an agent, the Logos, who is himself created for the purpose of creating the world. The Son of God is pre-existent, “before time and before the world,” and “begotten of the Father from before all the ages,” i.e., before the relation being between God and the world, the perfect image of the Father, the executor of his thoughts, yea, even the Creator of the world.

In a secondary or metaphorical sense he may be called “God.” But, on the other hand, Christ is himself a “created”—the agent for the creation of the Son, through whom the Father called other creatures into existence. He is “made,” not of the “essence” of the Father, but “out of nothing,” by “the will” of the Father, before all conceivable time, yet in time: he is therefore not eternal, and there “was a time when he was not.” Neither is he unchangeable, but subject to the vicissitudes of a created being. With the limitation of Christ’s duration is necessarily connected a limitation of his power, wisdom, and knowledge. It was expressly asserted by the Arians that the Son does not perfectly know the Father, and therefore cannot perfectly reveal him. He is essentially different from the Father (heterousios, in opposition to the orthodox formula, homousios, co-equal, and the semi-Arian homousios, similar in essence). Aetius and Eunomius afterwards more strongly expressed this by calling him u.ikos the Father (anomousos).

As to the humanity of Christ, Arius ascribed to him only a human body with an animal soul, not a rational soul. He anticipated Appollinarius, who substituted the divine for the human, but from the opposite motive,—of saving the unity of the divine personality of Christ.

The subsequent development of Arianism by Aetius and Eunomius brought out no new features of doctrine, merely inconsistencies and contradictions, and the negative and downward tendency of christological error. The controversy degenerated into a heartless and barren metaphysical war. The eighteen or more creeds which Arianism and semi-Arianism produced between the first and the second ecumenical councils (325–381) are leaves without blossoms, and branches without fruit.

The Arians supported their doctrine from those passages of the Bible which seem to place Christ on a par with the creature (Prov. viii. 22–25: Acts ii. 36; Col. i. 15), or which ascribe to the incarnate Christ (not the pre-existent Logos) in his state of humiliation lack of knowledge, unchangeability, weariness, sorrow, and other changing affections and states of mind (Luke ii. 51; Heb. v. 7, 9; John xii. 27, 28; Matt. xxvi. 39), or which teach some kind of subordination of the Son to the Father (especially John xiv. 28: “The Father is greater than I,” which refers, not to the essential nature, but to the state of humiliation). Arius was forced to admit, in his first letter to Eusebius of Niochoria, that Christ was called God (εστιν θεός) without any qualification of “the full, Only-begotten God,” according to the famous disputed reading for μονογενεις θεον, “only-begotten Son,” in John i. 18. See on this the first Dissertation of Professor Hort, Lond., (1870). But he reduced this expression to the idea of a subordinate, secondary, created divinity. The dogmatic and polemical works of Athanasius and Eusebius were chiefly negative and rationalistic, amounting to this: The Nicene view of the essential deity of Christ is unreasonable, inconsistent with monotheism, with the dignity and absoluteness of the Father, and of necessity leads to Sabellianism, or the Gnostic doctrine of emanation.

On the other hand, Arianism was refuted by an array of scriptural passages, which teach directly or indirectly the divinity of Christ, and his essential equality with the Father. The conception of a created Creator, who existed before the world, and yet himself began to exist, was shown to be self-contradictory and untenable. There can be no middle being between Creator and creature: no time before the world, as time is itself a part of the world, or the form under which it exists successively; nor can the unchangeableness of the Father, on which Ariaus laid great stress, be maintained, except on the ground of the eternity of his Fatherhood, which, of course, implies the eternity of the Sonship. Athanasius charges Arianism with dualism, and even polytheism, and with destroying the whole doctrine of salvation. For if the Son is a creature, man still remains separated, as before, from God: no creature can redeem other creatures, and unite them with God. If Christ is not divine, much less can we be partakers of the divine nature, and in any real sense children of God.

The Arian system is a refined form of Paganism, and substitutes a created demigod for the eternal uncreated Logos. It lowers Christianity to a merely relative value. It separates God from creature, man still remains separated, as before, from God: no creature can redeem other creatures, and unite them with God. If Christ is not divine, much less can we be partakers of the divine nature, and in any real sense children of God.

ARISTOTLE.

Troas (Acts xix. 29, xx. 4); shared his imprisonment at Cesarea (Col. iv. 10), and accompanied him on the perilous sea-voyage to Rome (Acts xxvii. 2), but seems to have left him very soon after their arrival thither (2 Tim. iv. 11). According to tradition, he was Bishop of Thessalonica, or Apollonia, and suffered martyrdom under Nero in Rome.

ARISTEAS, a high officer at the Egyptian court; was sent by Ptolemy Philadelphus with an embassy and rich gifts to Jerusalem to procure an authentic copy of the Old Testament for the Alexandrian Library, and brought back with him not only the copy, but also seventy learned Jews, who translated it into Greek. This account of the origin of the Septuagint, often mentioned, and generally accepted both by Jewish and Christian writers of the three or four next centuries, is based upon a reputed letter from IV. Aristobulus, a son of his brother, printed at Basel, 1561, at Oxford, 1692; in Gallandius: Biblioth. Patrum, II., 771, translated into English by Lewis, London, 1715; and is discredited by scholars.

ARISTIDES, by profession a teacher of rhetorics and philosophy, but by faith a Christian, presented, about 133, an apology for the Christians to the Emperor Hadrian. The work itself is now lost, except a fragment discovered in Venice in 1878. It was of a philosophical character, highly valued in the church, and used by Justinus. See Sancii Aristidii Philosophi Atheniensis Sermones duo, Venetiis, 1678; Baunard: De uno certe et d'un fragment de l'Apologie de S. Aristide d'Athenes, traduit de l'armenien, Ariss, 1879 (15 pp.); A. Harnack: Griech Apologia, Leipzig, 1882.

ARISTOBULUS, a Jewish priest residing in Egypt during the reign of Ptolemy VI. (Philometor), and spoken of in 2 Macc. i. 9 as a man of influence in the Jewish community, and as the "teacher" of the king. He is by some identified with the peripatetic philosopher Aristobulus, who dedicated to Ptolemy VI. (Philometor) an allegorical exposition of the Pentateuch, in which he tried to show that the doctrines of the peripatetic school were derived from the Old Testament. Of the work itself, some fragments have been preserved by Clement of Alexandria and Eusebius.

ARISTOBULUS is the name of several noticeable persons in the last period of Jewish history.

I. Aristobulus, a son of John Hyrcanus, assumed the power and also the title of king after the death of his father (107 B.C.), though by the will of the latter the government was intrusted to his mother. He had both his mother and his brothers murdered in order to secure the vacant throne in his favor (106 B.C.). Hyrcanus, however, escaped the usurpation, but died himself soon after (106), stricken with terror and remorse. - II. Aristobulus, a younger son of Alexander Janneus and Alexandra, compelled his elder brother, Hyrcanus, to renounce the crown and high priesthood in his favor (70 B.C.). Hyrcanus, however, refused the renunciation, and fled to Arabia Petrea, whose king, Aretas, invaded Judaea, and besieged Jerusalem (65 B.C.). Aristobulus succeeded in driving him out of Judaea by the aid of the Romans, but was defeated by Gabinius, the lieutenant of Pompey, and sent to Rome a second time as a prisoner. In 49, however, Julius Caesar set him free, and sent him back to Judea to work in his interest against Pompey; but he died on the journey, poisoned by Pompey's spies. — III. Aristobulus, a son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, was educated in Rome, together with his brother Alexander, in the house of Pollio, and afterwards married to his cousin, Berenice, a daughter of Salome. Having become suspicious in the eyes of their father, the two brothers led a very precarious life at home, and twice called upon the defence of foreigners, — first of Augustus, and afterwards of King Archelaus of Cappadocia, the father-in-law of Alexander, — yet finally they both fell victims to their father's cruelty. They were strangled at Aretes, and buried in their father's palace at Sebaste, 57 B.C. — IV. Aristobulus, a son of Herod, King of Chalcis, and a great-grandson of Herod the Great; was made king of Armenia Minor in 55 A.D., and of Armenia Major in 61, and of Chalcis in 52. He was married to Salome, a daughter of Herodias.

ARISTOTLE, b. at Stagira in Thrace 384 B.C.; d. at Chalcis 322; became the pupil of Plato in 367, and remained with him for twenty years; lived after the death of Plato, in 347, three years at the court of Hermias in Mysia, and seven years at the court of Philip of Macedon, where he became the tutor of Alexander the Great; opened his school in the Lyceum shortly after the accession of Alexander, and taught there for twelve years, but retired to Chalcis after the death of Alexander, when the anti-Macedonian party got the ascendency in Athens.

The philosophy of Aristotle is a strongly pronounced dualism: matter and form, God and the world, are distinct though inseparable existences. The harmony of this duality is an equally pronounced Pantheism: God is an act rather than a will, a process and not a person. But the dualism of Aristotle is not materialistic; the form, God, is the principal constituent; and his Pantheism is absolutely monotheistic, directly opposed to every form of polytheism. Therefore it might be inferred that he would not fail to win at least some sympathy in the Christian Church; and so while some of the Fathers attack him vehemently, as, for instance, Ireneus, and others, such as Justinus Martyr, pass him by in silence, there are those, as, for instance, Clement of Alexandria, who consider him a precursor of Christ, holding the truth such as it could be held before Christ came. Then, when the dialectical elaboration of the Christian dogmas began, his great labors on logic were by no means neglected. The heretics used them in the fourth and fifth centuries, and the Catholics followed the example in the sixth and seventh.

In the Latin Church Aristotle was introduced by Boethius and Cassiodorus. The study of him received a powerful impulse from the Jewish and Arab doctors, who translated his works into Syriac and Arabic; and the anxiety which the Roman Church felt with respect to his metaphysical works, and which led to their condemnation, and exclusion from the universities, disappeared after the time of Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas. The Renaissance, which brought the works of Aristotle to the West in the original Greek text, developed an Aristotelian and a Platonic school; but when the Renaissance grew into the Reformation, and the splendid edition appeared, and became the basis of the later scholastic philosophy — the mediaeval scholasticism — tumbled down, Aristotle, lost at once and forever his influence on Christian theology. See Scholasticism.

ARIUS ('AR'ius), one of the most famous heretics; b. about 256, in Libya (according to others, in Alexandria); d. 336, at Constantinople. He was educated by Lucian, presbyter in Antioch, and held a prominent position as presbyter in the Church of Alexandria when the Arian controversy with Bishop Alexander began (about 318) concerning the eternal deity of Christ and his equality with the Father (homoousia), which he denied, holding that Christ was of a different essence, and a creature of the Father, though created the Father among the hypostases of the Trinity. His enmity toward the Father has given him a notoriety that of Nestorius and Pelagius; and, if it had not been for his heresy, he would have been highly esteemed. His enemies said that the real cause of his opposition to Alexander was a personal grudge, because he was not himself elected bishop; but the subordination views which he had imbibed in the Antiochian school are sufficient to explain the direction of his development and the course of his life. Condemned by the synod of Alexandria (320), he left the city; but he was kindly received both by Eusebius of Cesarea and Eusebius of Nicomedia, and it was evident that not a few of the Asiatic churches favored his ideas. A reconciliation was brought about between him and Alexander; but hardly had he returned to Alexandria before the strife broke out again, and with still greater violence. A letter to Alexander, addressed to Eusebius of Nicomedia, and carried to Alexandria by Hierius of Cordova, availed nothing: the whole Christian world rang with the contest. But, in spite of his many and powerful friends, Arius was defeated at the Council of Nicaea (325), and banished to Libya. Soon, however, a re-action in his favor set in. The Euphrasian party espoused his cause more openly, and through Constantia, the sister of the emperor, he got access to the court. He was formally recalled from banishment; and all the chiefs of the Eusebian party were assembled in Constantinople to receive him back into the bosom of the church, when he suddenly died the day before the solemnity (336), at the age of over eighty years, at a time and in a manner that seemed to the orthodox party to be a direct interposition of Providence, and a condemnation of his doctrine; while his friends attributed the death to poison. Athanasius relates the fact in a letter to Serapion, on the authority of a priest, Macarius of Constantinople (De Mortu Arii, Opera, ed. Bened. tom. I., pp. 1, 340), and ventures to interpret Providence in the uncharitable style of his age, yet not without some reluctance of his better Christian feeling.

EPIPHANIUS (Haer. 68, c. 7) compares his death to that of Judas the traitor. Socrates (Hist. Eccl. I., 38) gives the following account: “Going out of the imperial palace, attended by a crowd of Eusebian partisans like guards, Arius paraded proudly through the midst of the city, attracting the notice of all the people. On approaching the place called Constantine's Forum, where the column of porphyry is erected, a terror, arising from the consciousness of his wickedness, seized him, accompanied by a violent relaxation of the bowels. He therefore inquired whether there was a convenient place near, and, being directed to the back of Constantine's Forum, he hastened thither. Soon after, a faintness came over him, and, together with the evacuations, his bowels protruded, followed by a copious hemorrhage, and the descent of the smaller intestines. Moreover, portions of his spleen and liver were carried off in the effusion of blood, so that he almost immediately died.” Sozomen (H. E., I., 30) gives a similar account, and adds, that, for a long period, everybody avoided horror the spot on which Arius died, until a rich Arian bought the place of the public, and built a house on the site, that there might be no perpetual memorial of his death.

His principal work, called Oνοκα, The Banquet, which he wrote during his stay with Eusebius at Nicomedia, was a defence of his doctrine in an entertaining popular form, half poetry, half prose; but, with the exception of a few fragments in the tracts of Athanasius, it is lost. A letter of his to Eusebius of Nicomedia, and one to Alexander of Alexandria, are still extant.

(See Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr., VIII., p. 309.) His doctrine on the divinity of Christ and his relation to the Father has given him a notoriety far outstripping his talents and learning. Neander (Ch. H., IV., 685) ascribes to him an acute but contracted intellect without the intuitive faculty. See Arianism and Athanasius.

Lit. — The chief sources on the life and character of Arius are, besides the fragments of his own works, the writings of Socrates of Constantinople, 68th and 69th, Hesychius of Ephesus, the church histories of Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, and Philostorgius. See also the works quoted under Arianism, and Schaff's art. Arius in SMITH and WACE I., 102 sq.

ARK OF THE COVENANT. This was a chest, made in the Wilderness by express divine com-command, three feet nine inches in length, two feet three inches in width and height, made of shittim-wood, and covered with gold plates within and without, encircled near the top by a border or crown of gold, and covered by a lid of solid gold, which was called the "mercy-seat." On each end of the "mercy-seat" was placed the golden image of a cherub (see CHERUBIM), facing inward, and bending down the ark. Two gold rings were attached to the body of the ark on each side, through which passed the staves or poles, made also of shittim-wood, and overlaid with gold: these were used in carrying the ark from place to place, and were never taken out. The ark was so called because in it were the two tables of the law, of the covenant between God and Israel (Exod. xxv. 10 sq.).

The cherubim upon it indicated the place where God revealed himself, made his presence felt among the Israelites: consequently the Holy of holies, in which was the ark, was the dwelling of God. This being so, we see the propriety of covering the ark, of keeping it behind curtains, so that only the high priest saw it, and of entrusting it to the care of a particular Levitical family, the Kohathites. The high priest could only see it when surrounded by clouds of incense.

The contents of the ark were the two tables of the law, the pot of manna, and Aaron's rod that budded (Heb. ix. 4; cf. Deut. xxxi. 26; Exod. xvi. 33; Num. xvii. 8). It is probable that the two last were lost while the ark was among the Philistines; for, when Solomon brought the ark into the temple, there was nothing in it save the two tables of stone.

From the time of Joshua until that of Eli, the ark was at Shiloh in the tabernacle, except once it was brought to Bethel (Judg. xx. 26, 27: "house of God") in the authorized version should be Bethel). For seven months it was among the Philistines in Eli's time, and when returned was lodged at Kirjath-jearim (1 Sam. v. 6, vii. 1); here it remained until David's day, when, after an interruption, it was put under a new tent (2 Sam. vi.). Solomon put it in the temple (2 Chron. v. 7, xxxv. 3). It was probably burnt up in the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar: and in the tractate Yoma (see ATONEMENT, DAY OF) it is said that there was a stone in the Holy of holies on the spot where the ark should have stood; and on this stone the postexilian high priests set the censer.

ARKITE, The, the designation (in Gen. x. 17; 1 Cor. i. 15) of one of the families in Canaan. The town was called Arka, and to-day its ruins bear the same name. They are upon the sea-coast twelve miles north of Tripoli, at the foot of Mount Lebanon. See Robinson's Bib. Researches (1812). III. pp. 579-581 Renan, Mission de Phénicie (1864), pp. 115, 124. Under the emperors it was called Cesarea Libani, and was an important place. It contained a temple dedicated to Apollo, under the Great, and where Alexander Severus was born, A.D. 205. It was a famous stronghold in the days of the crusades; besieged vainly for two months, in 1099, by Raimond of Toulouse, but taken by William of Sartanges. In 1292 it was destroyed by an earthquake. See the travels of Shaw, who was there in 1722 (2d ed. 1757); Burkhardt, 1812; Robinson, ed. Gesenius, 1829, pp. 271 sq., 429 sq.), Robinson and Smith, 1852 (Letter to Dr. Schaff, 1857, pp. 754-759).

ARMEANIA. extending from the Black to the Caspian Sea, and from the Caucasus to the Taurus, and divided by the Euphrates into Greater Armenia to the east, and Lesser Armenia to the west, is the most elevated portion of Western Asia. Here the Old Testament locates Paradise (Gen. ii. 10); and for a second time this country became the cradle of the human race, when the ark of Noah rested on Mount Ararat (Gen. viii. 4), to which event the names of several places refer, such as Erevan, "upwarp," the spot where Noah first discovered land; Akori "he plants the vine," the place where Noah first planted the vine, situated on Mount Ararat, but utterly destroyed by an earthquake in 1810; Marmond, "the place of the mother," with the tomb of Noah's wife; Ararat, "by the side of Noah," and in the language of the Parthians "the place where Noah is buried, etc. In Scripture, the country is mentioned under various names, which, however, seem to apply to various parts of it. Thus it is probable that Arrat (Gen. viii. 4; 2 Kings xiv. 37; Isa. xxxvii. 38; Jer. li. 27) indicates the eastern part, the dominion of the most ancient rulers: the natives use this name only for one of the fifteen provinces of Greater Armenia, and the celebrated mountains they call Masis. Farther to the west, immediately on the Euphrates, and south-east of Cappadocia, lay Tigran (Gen. x. 3; 1 Chron. i. 6; Ezek. xxvii. 14, xxxvii. 6), and still farther to the west, in Northern Phrygia, Ashkenaz (Gen. x. 3; Jer. li. 27). The Greeks and Romans knew the country only under the name of Armenia, which they derived from Aramenus, or Armenius, who is sometimes represented as one of the companions of Jason; but the natives themselves, though they know this name, and derive it from Aramenak or Armenak, the son of Haik, or from Aram, the sixth ruler of the dynasty of the Arsacidae as its king. The dynasty of the Arsacidae reigned till the beginning of the fifth century A.D., when it became extinct, and then the Hyksos, or the Soei, under the Great, and their successors, governed the provinces of Greater Armenia (vii. xvii. 10). After the downfall of the Parthian dynasty (1045), another branch of the same family, the Rubenians or Rhupenians, held sway over the country; but, after the invasion in 1370 by the Manuelus, the nation became scattered, and the country divided: at present Russia, Turkey, and Persia hold each one part of it.

Armenian Church.—It is now impossible to decide how much truth there may be in the somewhat mythical stories of the correspondence between Christ and Abgarus, and the missionary activity and martyrdom of Thaddæus, Bartholomew, Simon of Cana, and Judas Lebbæus; but it is certain that Christianity was introduced very early in Armenia. Unmistakable traces of it may be found in the second century; and in the fourth the country became a Christian kingdom. The first Christian ruler of Armenia was the Illuminator, the apostle of Armenia. Supported by King Tiridates, he christianized the whole country. Greek and Syrian priests were invited, churches were built, bishoprics were formed, and he himself was consecrated patriarch of Armenia by Leontius, Archbishop of Caesarea. For a long time the patriarchate remained in his family. Nerses the Great was his grandson. In 361 Nerses convened a synod at Ashtis, which regulated several important points of doctrine. But at the Council of Chalcedon; but when Abraham, pope sent him the staff and the veil, the symbols of the patriarchal dignity; and an opportunity to give all these compliments a practical bearing soon offered itself. Leon II., the Armenian ruler of Cilicia, wished to obtain the royal crown from the Latins, and addressed himself to Pope Cælestine III. and Emperor Henry VI. concerning the matter. Both the pope and the emperor were willing to grant him the favor on the conditions that he would celebrate the religious festivals on the same days as the Roman Church, and hear the mass in the church, and together with the congregation. But the closer relations became between the Armenian and the Roman churches, the more exasperated the Greeks felt. They broke off all official connection with the Armenians, though they continued to cause much confusion by their intrigues. The attempt of Johannes of Kherrni, in 1330, to organize the whole Armenian Church after the Roman model, at one sweep, proved, of course, a miserable failure; but the measures which the popes adopted for the same purpose proved more successful, because they were more cautious. Pius IV. gave the Armenians a church in Rome, in 1562, and established an Armenian printing-press from which the Psalms were issued in 1567, and, later on, also other works. Gregory XIV. even thought of founding a school in Rome for the education of young Armenians, but he died before he could realize the plan. Such an institution, however, was not established. Gregory XIII., when the Mekhitarists (which see) settled in the Island of S. Lazzaro at Venice. There are between seventy-five and one hundred thousand Armenians now belonging to the Roman Church.
A reformatory movement in an evangelical direction has also been started. The Armenian Bible was published in 1813 by the British and Foreign Bible Society, and in 1817 by the Russian Bible Society; and in 1831 the American Board of Foreign Missions established a Protestant mission among the Armenians, which has worked with considerable success, not only in Turkey and Asia Minor, but also in Armenia Proper. (See below.)

Armenian Literature. — The Armenian literature is wholly Christian, and pre-eminently theological. Moses Chorenensis compiled a missal among the Armenians, which has worked with considerable success, not only in Turkey and Asia Minor, but also in Armenia Proper. (See below.)

The period, however, was not characterized by translations only. Several of the disciples of Mesrob and Sahak left original works. Esnik wrote four books against heretics, printed at Venice in 1826, and translated into French by Le Vaillant de Florvra, Paris, 1833. A biography of Mesrob by Koriam, hostile by Mambres, and various writings by the philosophe David, have been published; and the works of Moses Chorenensis, published in Venice in 1842, and again in 1864, have acquired a wide celebrity: his history of Armenia has been translated into Latin, French, Italian, and Russian. Another flourishing period falls in the twelfth century during the reign of the dynasty of the Rubenians. Nerses Kajenis and Nerses Lambronensis belong to this period; also Ignatius, whose commentary to the Gospel of St. Luke appeared in Constantinople, 1795 and 1824; Sargis Shnorhali, whose commentary to the epistles of Paul to the Galatians was published in Constantinople in 1743, and again in 1826; Matthew of Edessa, whose history, comprising the period from 952 to 1192, and continued by Gregory the Priest to 1163, contains many interesting notices concerning the crusades; Samuel Aniensis, the historian of Armenia, whose history has been edited with a French translation by V. Langlois, Paris, 1864, Mekhitar Kosh, of whom a hundred and ninety fables appeared at Venice, 1790 and 1812. A most powerful impulse the Armenian literature received in the eighteenth century by the foundation of the Mekhitarist monastery in Venice, from whose press the treasures of the Armenian literature were spread over Europe, and new works, explaining and completing the old, were added. The Armenian liturgy was published in 1826, the breviary in 1845, the ritual in 1891.

Armenians, Protestant. It was not the intention of the American missionaries to found a separate Protestant church. The report made by Messrs. Smith and Dwight of the character of the church and the people was so favorable, that it was believed that missionaries would be readily received by them, and that the church might be reformed and spiritualized without any disruption. This hope was cherished for many years by the missionaries; but, as their influence increased among the people, the hierarchy of the church took alarm, and commenced persecuting those who adopted evangelical views. As the constitution of the Turkish Empire gave to the patriarch the right to fine and imprison his people, and as his ex-communication made them outlaws without civil rights, he was able to persecute them even to the death. This persecution became so violent and widely extended, that the missionaries reluctantly took measures to form a separate Protestant church. This could only be done by decree of the Sultan; but this was at last obtained through the influence of Lord Stratford, the English ambassador. This charter of the Protestant community recognizes no particular form of Protestantism, and stipulates that the I'kel, or official representative, must be a layman; but, as the missionaries were mostly from non-episcopal churches, most of the Protestants of Turkey have adopted similar views.

The spirit of the Armenian Church is now very different from what it was before this disruption took place. There is a general recognition of the fact that the church needs reform, and a new development of spiritual life. The Bible, which was translated by the American missionaries into the modern language, has been generally circulated and read. Education has been made in, and great changes have taken place in the hierarchy of the church. Friendly relations exist between the Protestants and the old church, and it would not be strange if the separate organization were finally given up as the whole church becomes evangelical.

The whole number of Armenians is about three millions, of whom two-thirds are in Turkey; but the Catholicos, or head of the church, resides in Russia.

The American missionaries commenced their work in Turkey among the Armenians in 1831. The Protestant community was constituted in 1850. It has now some seventy-five churches, five thousand communicants, and twenty-five thousand adherents. There are three theological schools, two colleges,—in addition to Roberts College of Constantinople, which is not connected with the mission, but is a fruit of it,—fifteen boarding-schools for girls, and primary schools in all the Protestant communities. — See Rev. Dr. Anderson's Hist. of Miss. of the A. B. C. M. to the Oriental Churches, Boston, 1872, 2 vols. G. Washburn (of Constantinople).

ARMINIANISM, Historical. It should not be considered an isolated and merely incidental phenomenon in the history of the Reformed Church. That revival of the Augustinian doctrine of predestination which arose naturally and necessarily the Reformation in general developed within the pale of the Reformed Church into a somewhat one-sided and particularistic view of an unconditional election by which the universality of the divine grace seemed to become lost; and it is as a re-action against this view that Arminianism arose naturally and necessarily. In the University of Leyden a contest gradually grew up, not so much between the dogmatists of Zwinglei and that of Calvin, as between a biblico-psychological tendency and a stiff dogmatism; the former represented by the mild but somewhat vague catechism of Heidelberg, the latter by the acute but somewhat rigid Confesio Belgica. In this contest Jacobus Arminius is the great champion, if not the originator, of the view of a conditional election, the opposition against the reigning tradition, the re-action.

Arminius (Harmensen) Jacobus, b. in 1560 at Oudewater an der Yssell (whence Veteraquinas), d. at Leyden, Oct. 19, 1609; studied (1575–82) at the University of Leyden under Lambert Danius, who made him an ardent disciple of Petrus Ramus, and afterwards (1587–57) at the University of Geneva, under Theodore Beza, at that time considered the best exponent of the dogmatists of Calvin. He also visited Padua and Rome, and was in 1588 appointed preacher in Amsterdam. In this city the writings of Dirik Volkaerten zoorn Koornheert had caused considerable commotion. Though a layman only, he had openly attacked the Reformed Church, more especially Calvin's doctrines of predestination. A disputatio was arranged, and Koornheert, not convinced, refused to retract, and was declared a heretic. The board of supervisors now invited Arminius to refute Koornheert's writings, and as at the same time a controversy had broken out between the Supralapsarians and Infralapsarians, Lydus of Frascati also was anxious that he should come to the support of the pure faith,—the views of Beza. But, while pondering the question, Arminius felt himself more and more strongly drawn in the opposite direction, and the public noticed the change. A sermon he delivered on Rom. vii. 10 occasioned an accusation for Pelagianism. This time he stifled the alarm by declaring that he would teach nothing which was against the catechism of Heidelberg and the confession of the Church of the Netherlands. But another sermon on Rom. Ch. iv. 4 came to cause new troubles. New investigations were instituted, new disputations took place; but the only result was, that Arminius felt more and more convinced that the Calvinistic dogmatists were mistaken with respect to predestination and grace. In spite, however, of his suspected orthodoxy, he was called to a chair in the University of Leyden after the death of Junius, in 1603; and a preliminary parley with his future colleague, Gomarus, led to a satisfactory result. But in 1604 he fell out with Gomarus on the question of predestination, and the controversy was renewed. In order to bring about a reconciliation, a general synod was spoken of in 1606, and a formal disputatio was held in 1608. But no result was arrived at, and in the mean time Arminius died. He was a learned and able divine, of a meek, "Christian spirit." "Condemned by others," Grothus said, "he condemned none."

After his death, however, his ideas continued to spread; and, while spreading in the masses, they began to undergo an internal development. Originally Arminianism simply meant the assertion of the universal grace of God; but gradually it came to denote a much more comprehensive tendency of liberality, both in religion and morals. Thus the Gomarists considered the symbolical books as the absolute norm for the explanation of Scripture; while the Arminians vindicated a complete exegetical freedom, and would be bound by the symbolical books, only so far as they agreed with Scripture. The movement rapidly took hold of the people; and in 1610 the Arminians presented a Remonstrantia (whence the name "Remonstrants"), consisting of five articles, to the estates of Holland and West Friesland. The first of these articles reads: "By an eternal and inseparable decree, before the foundation of the world, God ordained to save in Christ, because of Christ, and through Christ, from out of the human race, which is fallen and subject to sin, those who by the grace of the Holy Spirit believe in His grace and glory by the same grace, persevere unto the end in that faith and the obedience of that faith," etc. The second article says that Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, died for all and each one, etc.;

the third, that man of himself and by the power of his free will cannot do or think any thing good, etc.; the fourth, that the grace of God, though not irresistible, is the beginning, the progress, and the perfection, of every thing a good man does or thinks, etc.; and the fifth, that those who are grafted into Christ, and partake of his vivifying spirit, have the means by which to fight against Satan, sin, the world, and their own flesh, and to obtain victory by the aid of the grace of the Holy Spirit, etc.

Against this Remonstrants the Gomarists presented a Contra-Remonstrantia; but it was drawn up in much less moderate expressions, and the negotiations which were attempted only made the controversy more bitter. In 1614 the Estates of Holland forbade all discussion, and commanded peace and patience; but the Gomarists set themselves against the civil authorities, and the negotiations which were attempted only made the controversy more bitter. In 1614 the Estates of Holland forbade all discussion, and commanded peace and patience; but the Gomarists set themselves against the civil authorities, and the parties became involved. Olden-barneveldt (John of Barneveldt, 1557–1610), at the head of the Republicans, favored the Remonstrants; and Maurice of Orange, at the head of the Monarchists, favored the Contra-Remonstrants.

In order to stop these disturbances, which became more and more violent, the famous synod of Dort was convened (Nov. 13, 1618–May 9, 1619). Bogermann, an ardent adversary of the Remonstrants, presided; and the assembly at once constituted itself accuser and judge. The five articles were condemned; the Catechism of Heidelberg and the Confessio Belgica were sanctioned. About two hundred Remonstrant ministers were deposed, and such among them as would not consent to keep silent were banished. (The execution of Olden-barneveldt, however, and the imprisonment of Grotius, had principally political reasons.) Most of the deposed ministers gathered in Amsterdam; and from there they sent forth a defence, very adroitly drawn up, in which they refuted the charge of conspiracy against the prince-stadholder. This defence, and also the very acts of the synod, published in 1620, made a favorable impression on the government; and when, in 1625, Prince Henry succeeded his brother Maurice as stadholder, the Remonstrants obtained, first, toleration, and then (in 1630) liberty to live in any town or place in Holland, and to build churches and schools. In 1621 and 1622 Simon Episcopius, the ablest dogmatic writer among the Remonstrants, published in Dutch and拉丁文 a Confessio in twenty-five chapters, which gave a clear and succinct statement of their faith; and the Censura of this Confessio issued by four professors of Leyden, was ably met with the Apologia of the same author. Singularly enough, however, as soon as the persecutions ceased, and the party could settle down in peace and quietness, its number began to decrease.

For their organization the Arminians are indebted to Uytenbogaert. The constitution is very simple. A synod composed of all the preachers,—at present twenty-one,—the professors of the seminary, and delegates from the congregations, exercises the highest authority. It assembles every year, alternately in Amsterdam and Rotterdam. The current business is managed by a committee of five members. Generally speaking, however, the Arminians form a theological party, rather than a religious sect. They claim the members of the Reformed Church. Their seminary in Amsterdam has had many eminent theologians among its professors, — Episcopius, Curellaeus, Limborch, Le Clerc, not to speak of the philosopher Grotius: but the congregational bond is somewhat loose. From the Arminians properly speaking, the Quindecim Articulares must be distinguished, a branch of anti-trinitarian Remonstrants. Heterodox parties, such as the Socinians, have often found it easy to amalgamate with the Arminians, and their inclination towards Semi-Pelagianism has now and then given them a direction towards Romanism.

The history of Arminianism has been written by Uytenbogaert: Kerklyke Historie, Amsterdam, 1647; by Gerhard Brandt: Historia Reformationis Belgiae, Amsterdam, 1671–1704, trans. by Chamberlayne, London 1720, vols. 4: Limborch: Relatio Historica, etc., appended to his Theologia Christiana, 1714.

The best doctrinal expositions besides those already mentioned have been given by Cattenburgh: Bibliotheca Scriptorum Remonstrantium, Amsterdam, 1728; and G. S. Francke: De Historia Dogmatum Armin., Kiel, 1813.

ARMINIANISM, the (Five) Articles of. The Articles constituted the positive part of the Remonstrance drawn up by Uytenbogaert, signed by forty-six ministers, which was presented to the States-General of Holland and West Friesland in 1610 by the party of Arminius (1560–1609). The Calvinists issued a Counter-Remonstrance; hence the party names, Remonstrants, Counter-Remonstrants. The subject of the controversy discussed, the controversy arising has been called the quindecim Articulares. The Remonstrance is first negative, stating the five Calvinistic Propositions in order to reject them, and then positive, stating the five Arminian Articles, as follows:—

ARTICLE I. — That God, by an eternal, unchangeable purpose in Jesus Christ, his Son, before the foundation of the world, hath determined, out of the fallen, sinful race of men, to save in Christ, for Christ's sake, and through Christ, those who, through the grace of the Holy Ghost, shall believe on this his Son Jesus, and shall persevere in this faith and obedience of faith, through this grace, even to the end; and on the other hand, to leave the incorrigible and unbelieving in sin and under wrath, and to condemn them as alienate from Christ, according to the word of the gospel in John iii. 36: 'He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life: but the wrath of God abideth on him,' and according to other passages of Scripture also.

ART. II. — That, agreeably thereto, Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, died for all men and for every man, so that he has obtained for them all by his death on the cross, redemption, and the forgiveness of sins: yet that no one actually enjoys this for-
ARMINIANISM.

ARMINIANISM (Wesleyan), — Doctoral Methodism claims to adhere to original Arminianism as set forth by Arminius himself, and developed by Episcopius, Limborch, and others, without the freethinking tendency taken on by the intermediate English Arminianism, symptoms of which had appeared in some of the early Remonstrants, such as Grotius and Curcellaeus. John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, was an Arminian stock; his father Samuel, in common with many of the Anglican divines, inclining more strongly against Calvinism (see Tyerman's Life of Samuel Wesley, p. 144); and the Holy Club at Oxford contained both these elements, the Wesleyans throughout the British Empire, and the Methodists in America, are universally Arminians; and whatever may be their differences in church organization, social sentiments, or practical views of evangelical economy, or even their individual opinions on minor points of theological dogma, they heartily concur in opposition to the essential Calvinistic doctrine of God's absolute predestination concerning men's everlasting destiny. This they all regard as incompatible with divine equity and human freedom. It will suffice here to show briefly the relations of this cardinal theme to the great redemptive scheme as conceived by all the followers of Wesley, both in this country and abroad. This will be their best discrimination and vindication from Pelagianism on the one side, and Augustinianism on the other. On all the essential points of vital Christianity, such as the Trinity, human depravity, the atonement, the necessity of regeneration and personal holiness, of course they do not differ from other evangelical denominations.

1. Wesleyanism, or Methodist Arminianism, while maintaining God's supremacy as sternly as Calvinism, makes a radical distinction between the desires and the purposes of God, precisely as it does between the wishes and the determinations of man. The divine foreknowledge is regarded as logically preceding the divine volitions, and not as an inference resulting from them. Hence, when God resolves, it is in view of all the contingencies and circumstances of the case, and his prescience is simply intuitional. What he knows,— whether as to the past, the present, or the future,— although absolutely certain, is not necessitated by that cognition. He not only knows that it has taken, or is taking, or will take, place, but also that it might have been or could be otherwise. This is considered a fundamental difference between the Arminian and the Calvinian conception of God.

2. As a corollary from the foregoing distinction, Wesleyans hold, that while God absolutely or if any preference to say arbitrarily — determines natural (i.e., physical) events, he has not done so with occurrences belonging to the moral sphere, but has left these contingent upon the volitions of his rational creatures within certain limits. This forms, in their view, the basis of human probation and free-will.

3. Especially they believe, that while man is born with corrupt moral affections, and therefore is of himself unable either to love or to serve God acceptably, yet by virtue of the universal atonement of Christ, and the general distribution of the Holy Spirit, such gracious aid is supernaturally afforded to every man as is sufficient to enable him to overcome the bias of his depraved affections, and the weakness or perverseness of his will; so that, if he chooses, he may, through the appointed means, lay hold upon the salvation of the gospel. Just as the pivotal event of all the contingencies and circumstances of the case, and his prescience is simply intuitional. What he knows,— whether as to the past, the present, or the future,—although absolutely certain, is not necessitated by that cognition. He not only knows that it has taken, or is taking, or will take, place, but also that it might have been or could be otherwise. This is considered a fundamental difference between the Arminian and the Calvinian conception of God.

These Articles, thus set forth and taught, the Remonstrants deem agreeable to the word of God, tending to edification, and, as regards this argument, sufficient for salvation, so that it is not necessary or edifying to rise higher, or to descend deeper. See Schaff: Creeds of Christendom, vol. iii. pp. 515-49; cf. Vol. i. § 65, p. 508 sq.

tives, and yet stimulated and guided by divine light and grace. Without an original and continued influence from God, the will would never move in the right direction; yet this influence is never coercive, however powerful or effectual it may be. God's Spirit is therefore held to be the efficient agent which renews the moral nature of the subject upon the decisive act of acquiescence, as soon as it is accompanied by a positive element of acceptance, which latter is saving faith. The man does not save himself, but only consents to be saved of God, and rests upon Christ for that purpose. The penitence and faith involved in this are indeed potentially the gift of God; but their actual use and exercise are the conscious, voluntary, and personal act of the man himself. Wesleyans conceive this to be the accurate and consistent account of conversion or regeneration, involving, in due balance and just responsibility, the human and the divine co-operation. They think it relieves them from the overwhelming divine influence which Augustinianism seems to them to introduce, and at the same time from the charge of human tarianism justified brought against Pelagianism, New Divinity, etc. With any modern or moderate Calvinists who may accept this statement or explanation of the phenomena, they have, of course, no controversy on this central point of experimental Christianity.

4. Wesleyan Methodists, as we have shown, believe that conversion is the result of conscious faith, and that it involves a conscious change in the feelings. They therefore universally maintain that it is the privilege of every child of God to know his gracious state. Further, they believe that sound experience, no less than Scripture, warrants the expectation of a special divine inward testimony to the fact of the changed relation towards God; and they call "the witness of the Spirit" to the adoption. This is held to be a distinct but concomitant assurance in addition to the consciousness spoken of above, and also different from a rational conclusion derived by the person himself from his own altered demeanor.

5. Methodist Arminians, without exception, argue from the foregoing doctrine of free grace that it is likewise full, i.e., able to remove entirely the innate depravity of the human heart during the present life. This, of course, they qualify by the obvious liabilities to relapse, and by the imperfections inseparable from the present state of probation; and they differ, to some extent, among themselves, as to whether the act or process of entire purification is instantaneous or progressive, and whether it takes place immediately upon conversion, or subsequently; but they all unite in insisting upon the entire sanctification of believers as necessary prior to death, and possible indefinitely before that event. This sanctification they hold to be the joint product of divine grace and the subject's watchfulness, faith, and obedience.

6. Finally, holding the above views of the fearful power of the human will to reject salvation, Wesleyans, without exception, believe that it equally extends to the retention or loss of the divine pardon, peace, and purity, at any period during probation. They therefore reject the doctrine of the impossibility of lapsing utterly and finally from grace, and believe that any may, and that many actually do, lose their state of acceptance, and their love of holy things, and ultimately perish. They do not maintain that any one is competent to keep himself in a condition of grace, any more than to attain it unaided at first, but that the same gracious assistance is vouchsafed to the child of God throughout his earthly career, on precisely the same terms of acceptance and co-operation.

LAT.  This is very copious: we name only the most important works. The earliest, and still the best and most generally recognized authority on Wesleyan or Methodist Arminianism is FLETCHER: Checks to Antinomianism (originally published in London, 1771 sq.), as separate pamphlets in answer to Toplady, and often reprinted collectively in England and America; WILLIAM B. POPE: Christian Theology (London, 1875-77, revised ed., London and N. Y., 1878 sq.; 3 vols.); and RAYMOND: Systematic Theology (Cincinnati, 1877-79, 3 vols.).

ARMY. The Hebrew army consisted originally of infantry only (Num. xi. 21; 1 Sam. iv. 10, xv. 4), though it had to fight against people using cavalry (Josh. xi. 9; Judg. iv. 6, 10; 1 Sam. x. 18) and chariots of iron (Josh. xviii. 16, x. 26), and which its successors often re-enforced with Egyptian mercenaries (Isa. xxxi. 1, xxxvi. 9; 2 Kings xviii. 21). Every citizen was bound to serve from his twentieth to thirty-fifth year (Num. xi. 21; 1 Sam. iv. 10, xv. 4), though it had to fight against people using cavalry (Josh. xi. 9; Judg. iv. 6, 10; 1 Sam. x. 18) and chariots of iron (Josh. xviii. 16, x. 26), and which its successors often re-enforced with Egyptian mercenaries (Isa. xxxi. 1, xxxvi. 9; 2 Kings xviii. 21). Every citizen was bound to serve from his twentieth to thirty-fifth year (Num. xi. 21; 1 Sam. iv. 10, xv. 4), though it had to fight against people using cavalry (Josh. xi. 9; Judg. iv. 6, 10; 1 Sam. x. 18) and chariots of iron (Josh. xviii. 16, x. 26), and which its successors often re-enforced with Egyptian mercenaries (Isa. xxxi. 1, xxxvi. 9; 2 Kings xviii. 21). When a war broke out, each tribe furnished a proportional number of armed men (Num. xxxi. 4; Josh. vii. 3; Judg. xx. 10). When an enemy suddenly invaded the country, the nation rose en masse, called out by the sound of the trumpet, or informed, either by signals erected on the mountains, or by messengers sent through the land (Judg. iii. 27; vii. 24; Jer. iv. 5; Ezek. vii. 14; Judg. vi. 35). The host was divided into bodies of a thousand, a hundred, and fifty, each of which had a captain of its own (Num. xxxi. 14; Judg. xx. 10; 1 Sam. viii. 12; 2 Kings i. 9, x. 1; 2 Chron. xxv. 5). The general-in-chief and the captains of the divisions formed the council of war (1 Chron. xiii. 1). The soldiers wore no uniform, and had to maintain themselves, though a commissariat was maintained (Num. xxi. 21; Isa. xxi. 5), and kept under some kind of covering (Isa. xxii. 8); the helmet of brass (1 Sam. xvii. 5; 1 Macc. vi. 30); the coat of mail, protecting the chest and the stomach (1 Sam. xvii. 3; 2 Chron. xxix. 15); the sword, with double edges, borne in a scabbard on the left side (1 Sam. xvii. 39; 2 Sam. xx. 8; Ezek. xxi. 3; 1 Chron. xxvi. 27; Judg. iii. 10; Prov. v. 4); the spear of wood, tipped with a point of brass (2 Sam. xi. 10; Josh. viii. 18; 2 Kings xiv. 15); the stone, covered with leather (Gen. xxxi. 20; 1 Sam. xxx. 3; 2 Sam. xxi. 35; Ps. xiii. 31; Hab. iii. 9, etc.). The numerical force of the Hebrew army often reached very high figures, which, however, need cause no wonder, as the question is of a rising of the whole nation en masse.

During the reign of Saul the first traces occur of a standing army,—a force of three thousand men, levied from all the tribes, and completed by volunteers (1 Sam. xii. 2, xiv. 52, xxiv. 2). David followed the example, and organized a national army, which he placed at the disposal of the king. It consisted of twenty-four thousand men fit for active service in the field every month (1 Chron. xxvii. 4 sq.). Under his successors the institution became a necessity, as the Hebrews every now and then found themselves implicated in the wars of their powerful neighbors (1 Kings iv. 20; 2 Chron. xvii. 14; 2 Kings xi. 4: 2 Chron. xxv. 5, xxvi. 11; 2 Kings i. 9). After the exile, under the Maccabees the army was completely re-organized, and bodies of foreign troops were enlisted. Under Herod the Great, nearly the whole army consisted of mercenaries; and its organization, armament, and tactics were those of the Roman legions. Of the method of carrying on war originally employed by the Hebrews, there exist only some aphoristic notices. Before entering upon a campaign, the divine will was consulted (1 Sam. xiii. 4: 1 Sam. xiv. 37, xxiii. 2; 1 Kings xii. 6; 2 Chron. xviii. 4). When the army arrived in the presence of the enemy, a sacrifice was ordered (1 Sam. vii. 9, xiii. 9); a priest, or the general-in-chief, harangued the soldiers (Deut. xx. 2; 2 Chron. xx. 20); the trumpet gave the signal for attack (Num. x. 9; 2 Chron. xiii. 13), and the attack was made with yelling and noise (1 Sam. xvii. 52; Isa. xiii. 13; Amos i. 14; Jer. i. 42; Ezek. xxi. 22). The combat took place man to man; but complex movements, surprises, circumventions, etc., were effected (Judg. viii. 18; Josh. vii. 2–12; 1 Sam. xv. 5; 2 Sam. v. 23). Prisoners were treated with great harshness. The dead were pillaged (1 Sam. xxxi. 8; 2 Macc. vii. 27); the living were killed (Judg. ix. 45; 2 Sam. xiii. 31; 2 Chron. xxv. 12), or mutilated (Judg. i. 6; 1 Sam. xi. 2), or reduced to slavery. Women and children were not spared (2 Kings xv. 10, viii. 12; Isa. xiii. 16; Amos i. 13; Isa. x. 14, xiii. 16; Nahum iii. 10; 2 Macc. v. 13). The conquered cities were often burnt or destroyed (Judg. ix. 45; 1 Macc. v. 28, x 94). The Pagan sacrifices were always destroyed (1 Macc. vi. 98). Victory was celebrated with cries of joy, and triumphal songs and dances (Judg. v.; 1 Sam. xviii. 6; 2 Sam. xxii.; Judg. xvii. 12; 1 Macc. iv. 21). Conquered arms were deposited in the temple (2 Kings xi. 10; 1 Chron. x. 10).

ARNAUD, Henri, b. in Paris, Feb. 8, 1624; d. in Bangkok, Aug. 8, 1694; was educated at Calvi and Lisieux, and began to study law, his father being a famous member of that profession, but afterwards changed jurisprudence for theology; studied under Lescot, the confessor of Richelieu; entered the Sorbonne in 1634; and took his degree as doctor, and was ordained priest in 1641. In 1643 he published his De la Fréquente Communion, and with this book began his life-long contest with the Jesuits. It was sanctioned by many bishops and doctors of the Sorbonne; and the whole result of the intrigues and machinations of the Jesuits was the censure by the pope of one sentence in the preface. But in 1644 Arnauld entered into the controversy concerning the Augustinus of Jansen by his first and second Apologie de Jansenius. In 1655 he published his two letters, of which the second contains the famous distinction between a decision de jure and de facto; and in 1656 he was expelled from the Sorbonne, and deprived of his doctorate. The Peace-edict of Clemens IX. (1668) made his social position safe once more; and from 1669 to 1674 he published his Grande Perpétuité de la Foi de l'Eglise as a defence of Jansenism against the accusations that it led to Calvinism. But in 1669 he also published the first volume of his Morale Pratique des Jesuites, of which the eighth and last volume was published in 1694; and this work again brought the hatred of the Jesuits into full flame. In 1679 he was made a lay coadjutor of the Jesuits; settled in 1682 in Brussels, steadily pursued by ARNAULD, Henri, b. in Paris in 1597; d. at Angers, June 8, 1694; a brother of Antoine; was first an advocate, but embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and became successively Abbess of St. Nicholas, Bishop of Toul, and Bishop of Angers. He was a stanch Jansenist, and very active in the practical affairs of the State and the Church. He left a work, Négociations à la Cour de Rome, which was published in five volumes in 1748.

ARNAULD, Jacqueline Marie (Marie Angélique de Ste. Magdeleine), b. Sept. 8, 1591; d. Aug. 6, 1691. She was the second daughter of the famous advocate Antoine Arnauld, and sister of the preceding. By her father's influence she was nominated Abbess of Port-Royal when only eleven years old. At first she discharged her duties with increasing dislike as she was better able to appreciate her position; but in 1689 she was converted, reformed her life, performed a severe penance, and wrought a revolution in the convent. She was subsequently Abbess of Mauabisson 1618–23, of Port-Royal 1623–26, then of Port-Royal de Paris, as the new house of the community was called. She resigned her position, and spent the rest of her life in pious labor at different posts. See Frances Martin: Angélique Arnauld, London, 1873.

ARNAULD D'ANDILLY, Robert, b. in Paris in 1597; d. Aug. 18, 1661. He was a stanch Jansenist, and very active in official records he occurs as deacon and presbyter; but Arno gained the favor and confidence of the new ruler, and Charlemagne confirmed the Church of Salzburg in the possession of all its estates on which Arno made a report to him: Congestum Indiculus, Arnonis, ed. by Keinz, Munich, 1869.

After the close of the war with the Avars, all the conquered lands were placed under the spiritual authority of the see of Salzburg; and, on April 20, 798, Arno was consecrated Archbishop of Bavaria. His attempt to interfere between Tasso and Charlemagne failed; in 788 Bavaria was incorporated with the Frankish Empire.

ARNO, b. in the diocese of Freising, in whose official records he occurs as deacon and presbyter up to the year 770; d. as the first Archbishop of Salzburg, Jan. 24, 821; made the acquaintance of Alcuin while Abbot of Elone, in Hainault, between 779 and 785, and was in the latter year made Bishop of Salzburg by Duke Tassilo of Bavaria. His attempt to interfere between Tasso and Charlemagne was very vague, Christ's office being that of a mediator between God and man;

ARNOLD, Johann, b. at Ballenstädt, Anhalt, Dec. 27, 1555; d. at Celle, Hanover, May 11, 1621, studied theology at Helmstedt, Wittenberg, Strassburg, and Basel; and was appointed minister at Badeborn, a village of Anhalt, in 1588; d. there Sept. 27, 1674; the eldest brother of Antoine; held various positions in the government and at the court, but retired in 1640 to Port-Royal, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. His Saints Pères du Désert was translated into English: Lives of the Fathers of the Desert, London, 1757, 2 vols.

ARNODT, Johann, b. at Ballenstädt, Anhalt, Dec. 27, 1555; d. at Celle, Hanover, May 11, 1621, studied theology at Helmstedt, Wittenberg, Strassburg, and Basel; and was appointed minister at Badeborn, a village of Anhalt, in 1581, but was discharged in 1300 by Duke Johann Georg, who leaned towards Calvinism, and demanded the abolition of images and of the exorcism. In the same year, however, he was appointed minister at Quedlinburg; in 1599 he moved to Brunswick as pastor of St. Martin; and in 1611 he was called to Celle as court-preacher. Of his celebrated work, De ratione Arnom (Christianum), the first part was published in 1605, the three others in 1609. He made immediately a deep impression. Edition followed edition. Translations were made into Latin and into all European languages; into English by A. W. Boehm, 1712, and by William Jaques, 1715, the first part having been translated as early as 1646. Few books of devotion have equalled its popularity; but at the same time it also excited much opposition and bitter criticism. The delay in the publication of the three last parts was due to the opposition of his colleagues and superiors in Brunswick. Combining social and theological tendency, it was indeed a precursor of the later Pietism, and came, naturally enough, in conflict with the Lutheran orthodoxy in its life-scholastic form. Of his other writings, his *Porru-
ARNOLD OF BRESCIA, b. at Brescia in the beginning of the twelfth century; d. in Rome 1155; first appears in the humble position of a lector in the church of his native city; studied afterwards in Paris under Abelard, and became one of his most ardent adherents; attracted, on his return to Brescia, general attention by the austere pietiness of his life and the fire of his eloquence, and developed by degrees into an enthusiastic ecclesiastical reformer. His reforms were all of a practical character. To the doctrines of the Roman Church he seems to have offered very little opposition. But comparing the first Christian congregation, the church of the apostles, with the church of his own time, he felt scandalized at the difference. The root of the evil he found in the wealth of the church. All the vices and all the worldliness of the clergy he ascribed to their riches. The first reform he demanded was, that, like the apostles, the priests should hold no property, but content themselves with the voluntary offerings of the faithful. How these ideas originated with Arnold has been differently explained; but there is no reason to seek the origin outside of his own moral consciousness. He was a gifted man, upright and fervent. The frightful corruption of the church naturally struck him, and in the Bible itself he found the corrective. In Brescia and its neighborhood his preaching made a deep impression, and caused considerable commotion. Finally Bishop Manfred laid the case before the synod convened at the Lateran in 1139. And Arnold was banished from Brescia, and forbidden to preach. He went to France, where at that moment the controversy between Abelard and St. Bernard was at its height. With great zeal Arnold espoused the cause of his teacher, but thereby he only provoked the wrath of St. Bernard. The synod of Sens condemned both him and Abelard; and the pope, confirming the verdict, ordered the Archbishops of Rheims and Sens to imprison the two heretics. Arnold fled to Switzerland in 1140, and found protection in the diocese of Constance by Bishop Herrmann. But St. Bernard continued to pursue him, and urged the Bishop of Constance to expel or imprison him. He fled again; and this time he found refuge with the papal legate, Cardinal Guido a Castellis, a friend of Abelard. But even here he was not safe. The Abbot of Clairvaux was irreconcilable, and the legate dared not defy him. Meanwhile Innocent II. died, and Arnold determined to return to Italy. During his absence from Italy, perpetual contests had taken place in Rome between the pope and the people; and it is probable that Arnold’s ideas were known in Rome, though he himself had never been there. After 1145, however, he began to preach publicly in Rome, and with great effect. For his religious ideas the Romans had no sense; but the practical consequences of these ideas, their influence on social life, fired the enthusiasm of the light-minded populace. Then, again, the enthusiasm of the audience reacted on the preacher. He himself forgot the religious starting-point, and, inspired by the remembrance of the spirit of his teacher, became a practical political reformer. Rome should stand free, independent of the pope and the emperor, ruled by no single man, but by the senate and the people; and, when thus the old liberty was restored, the old greatness would follow. The people became much excited; and in 1155 a new constitution was framed, and Adrian IV. was demanded to sanction it. The pope refused, and withdrew to Orvieto. Shortly after, he laid the interdict on the city, and put Arnold under the ban; and as Frederick Barbarossa at the same moment approached the city at the head of a great army, a panic caught the inhabitants: Arnold was expelled, and the pope returned. For some time Arnold found shelter with the mobility of the Campania, but was afterwards surrendered to Frederick Barbarossa, who misjudging his most powerful ally in a contest with the papal see, and eager to buy the imperial crown at any price, surrendered him to the pope; and by the pope he was hanged, burnt, and his ashes thrown into the Tiber.

ARNOLD, Gottfried, b. at Annaberg, Saxony, Sept. 5, 1666; d. at Perleberg, Prussia, May, 1714; studied theology at Wittenberg, but received by far the strongest spiritual influence from the works of Spener; acted for some time as a tutor in a noble family, and was in 1697 appointed professor of history in Giessen, but resigned this position in the next year, and lived in retirement at Quedlinburg, till, in 1704, he became minister and ecclesiastical inspector at Werben, whence he moved in 1707 to Perleberg. His great work, Unparteiische Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie, of which the two first volumes appeared in 1699, the two last in 1700, made an epoch in the study of church-history. The principle on which this book rests—that none, either individual or sect, shall be condemned because the church of his time has condemned him—has been generally accepted, though the author himself often went too far in its application. The polemical bent of his mind, and his Pietistical view of Christianity, often made him partial to heretics, and exposed him to very severe attacks from the orthodox party. Of his other works—fifty-three in number, and some of considerable size—many are still in use among the German Pietists; as, for instance, Die erste Liebe, edit. by Lämmert, Stuttgart, 1844; Die Verkündigung Jesu Christi, edit. by Lämmert, 1742; Die Abführung des invidigen Christentums, 1709, etc. See Arnolds gedoppelter Lebenslauf, Leipzig, 1716; Dibelius: Gottfried Arnold, Berlin, 1873.

ARNOLD, Nicolaus, b. at Lissa (Lesna), Poland, Dec. 17, 1618; d. at Franeker, Holland, Oct. 15, 1680; studied theology at Leiden, and was joint editor of Diogenes; joined the Society of Amos Comenius; went in 1685 to Dantzic, where he studied philosophy and rhetoric; then in 1641 to Francée, where he studied theology under Maccovius (Maceovsky) and the famous Coecilia; visited the academies of Göttingen, Leyden, and Utrecht; travelled in England; and was appointed minister at Beegum in 1615, and professor of theology at Francée in 1631. He edited the works of Maccovius. His own works are mostly polemical. Against Socinianism: Religio Sociniana seu Cathecesis Raccoviana major publicis disputata, 1654; Against the Socinians, 1656. Against Romanism: Apologia Aurelii contra Erhermannum. Against the prophecies of Comenius, concerning the millennium: Discourseos theologici, contra Comenii prophecias lucem intellectualis, 1660.

ARNOLD, Thomas, b. at West Cowes, in the Isle of Wight, June 13, 1795; d. at Rugby, June 12, 1842; was educated at Warminster and Winchester; entered the University of Oxford in 1811; became a fellow of Oriel College in 1815; was ordained a deacon in 1816, and settled in 1819 at Laleham, where he established a preparatory school for young men who wished to frequent the universities. In 1828 he was ordained priest, and appointed head master of the school at Rugby; and in 1841 he was made regius-professor of modern history at Oxford, but he delivered only one course of lectures. His influence was due more to his character as a man than to any particular talent. His proper field was education, and the chief element of his educational method was religion. His religious views have made themselves felt far beyond the school, both in the literature and in the church. He was a strong adversary of the Oxford Tractarian movement, and became the founder of the Broad-Church party, which, though not very numerous, comprises some of the greatest English preachers and writers. His ideas of the Christian Church, and its relation to the State, are fully expressed in the two pamphlets: Church Reform, 1853, and Fragment on the Church, which latter is directed against the Tractarians. Among his other religious writings are five volumes of Sermons. His historical works comprise, beside an annotated edition of Thucydides, the History of Rome, 3 vols., London, 1840–43, unfinished; History of the Later Roman Commonwealth, 2 vols., London, 1849; Lectures on Modern History, London, 1843. See Stanley: The Life and Correspondence of Thomas Arnold, 1846.

ARNOLDI, Bartholomeus, b. at Ueingen 1463; d. at Erfurt 1532; an Augustinian monk, professor, first of philosophy, then of theology, at Erfurt, and the teacher of Luther. Ardently opposed to Humanism, he was, nevertheless, eager for a purification of the scholastic theology; but when this purification, in the hands of Luther, became a thoroughgoing religious reform, Arnold recoiled, and after 1521 he became an active and open adversary of the reformative movement. A list of his works is found in Höhn's Chronologia Provinciorum Rheno-Suevicarum Ordinis Fr. Eremitarum, p. 106.

ARNOLDISTS, a sect which maintained the ideas of Arnold of Brescia for half a century after his death, but became lost, in the beginning of the twelfth century, among other factions hostile to the church and the clergy, and at that period very numerous in Northern Italy. The Arnoldists are first mentioned when condemned by Pope Lucius III. at the Council of Verona, 1184 (Mansi XXII., 476). A short time after (about 1190), Bonacorsus speaks of them in an amanuensis delivered at Milan against the Catharists. It is not improbable, that at the time of Bonacorsus, about thirty years after the death of Arnold, there were opponents to the clerical hierarchy who still used the name of the great reformer, and continued to issue his disciples; but it is doubtful whether such was the case at a later period, though the name of Arnoldists still continues to occur, as, for instance, in the laws of Frederick II. against heretics from 1224 (Mansi XXIII., 580). At that time no other trace is found of a distinct sect calling itself Arnoldists. It seems most probable, therefore, that the emperor took the name, like several others, from the decrees of Lucius III., and cited them only to be sure to condemn all heretical parties, without any exception. From Frederick's laws the name then went over in the bulls of later popes, and the works of various writers against heresy: but the sect was extinct before the beginning of the thirteenth century.

ARNULPH, Bishop of Lusieux, accompanied Louis VII. to the Holy Land in 1147, on the second crusade; went to England in 1160 as the legate of Alexander III. to restore harmony between Henry II. and Thomas Becket; retired afterwards to the Abbey of St. Victor at Paris, and died there Aug. 31, 1182. Some poems and essays by him are found in the Biblioth. Stehr, but of much more interest for the history and character of his age are his letters, edited by Turnerius, Paris, 1855, and by J. A. Giles, Oxford, 1814.

ARNULPHUS, St. (more correctly ARNULFUS), b. about 852, near Nancy; d. Aug. 16, 941; distinguished statesman, and in 611 or 612 made Bishop of Metz. In this position he exercised considerable influence on the government of the Frankish Empire, en-yeing at the same time the friendship of Pipin the Elder, and the confidence of the Austrasian nobility, which enabled him to retire into the wilderness of the Vosges, where he lived as a hermit, and acquired the fame of a saint. His remains rest in the church in Metz named after him. Through his son Ausges, who married Pipin's daughter Begga, he became the antecedent of the House of Lotharingia, and an old family of the Franks (MAILLON: Acta SS. ii., 150) and a more recent one (BOLLANDISTS: Acta SS., July IV., 435); but the former is by far the most reliable.

APRAPHAD. The names in the table in Gen. x. being those not of individuals, but of tribes or lands, Apraphad (Gen. x. 22, 21, xi. 10) means the district called Arrapachitis by the Greeks. To-day the name is preserved in 'Arhabak and Alabakh, by which the Armenians and Kurds designate the mountain-land east of Gordyene. In the course of the sons of Shem is described by the names as from south to north, then west, and finally south-east to the Euphrates again; for this is the order, Elam, Assur, Apraphad, Lud, and Aram.

In regard to the etymology of the name, there has been much discussion. The interpretations, "the border of the Chaldeans," "the stronghold of the Chaldeans," are open to objection because of the erroneous conception of the word as a union of Hebrew and Arabic. It is better to interpret "dispersion," and to read in the word that the Hebrew race, passing to the remote ancestors called Apraphad in this chapter, had originally its seat in Arrapachitis, and from there pressed first to Mesopotamia, then over the Euphrates to Caucau and Arabia. It is confirmatory of this view that the progenitors of the Hebrews are said to have come from Ur of the Chaldees (Gen. xi. 22 sq.). See KNOBEL: Die Völkerfahrt der Genesis. Giessen, 1850.

ARROWSMITH, John, b. March 29, 1602, near Newcastle-on-the-Tyne; d. February, 1668 (9). He was educated at Cambridge, where he became fellow of Catherine Hall, subsequently a preacher at Lynn, in the county of Norfolk, was called from thence to take part in the Westminster Assembly. Robert Baillie describes him as "a man with a glass eye in place of that which was put out by an arrow, a learned divine, on whom the Assembly was on the committee to draw up a confession of faith, and preached thrice before Parliament, the sermons being published: The Covenant Annoying Sword Brandished (Lev. xxxii. 25), London, 1645, 4to, pp. 34; A great Wonder in Heaven; or, a lively Picture of the Militant Church, drawn by a Divine Penman (Rev. xii. 1). London, 1617, 4to, pp. 44. In 1644 he was appointed by Parliament master of St. John's College, Cambridge, and subsequently became master of Trinity College, and Professor of Divinity in the University, resigning the professorship in 1655, but retaining the mastership until his death. Whilst at Cambridge he published Tactica Sacra, sive de Militis Spirituali Pugnante, Vincente, et Triumphant Dissertatio, Cantab., 1657, 4to, pp. 48; and the conclusion to the greater Art of Wegeianism. After his death there were published: Armilla Catechetica, A Chain of Principles; or, an orderly Concatenation of Theological Heads of Christian Religion are asserted and improved, Cambridge, 1659, 4to, pp. 400; an unfinished work designed to form a complete body of divinity in thirty aporphias, only six of which were completed, covering for the most part the ground of the first seven questions of the Larger Westminster Catechism, in essentially the same order; also Theanthropos, or God-Man, London, 1660, 4to, pp. 311, an exposition of the Gospel of John i. 1-18, discussing the divinity and humanity of Christ, and maintaining the catholic doctrine against all heresies.

ARSENIUS, deacon in Rome, was recommended by Bishop Damasus to Theodosius the Great, on account of his learning and piety, and obtained the position as tutor to Arcadius, 353. The emperor held him in such esteem, that he compelled the son to receive his instruction standing, while the tutor was sitting; but Arcadius felt provoked, and is said to have attempted the life of his tutor. At all events, Arsenius renounced his place at the court (394), and retired into the wilderness of Scetis, in Egypt, where he lived as a hermit till his ninety-fifth, or, according to others, till his one hundred and twentieth year. He is commemorated in the Greek Church on May 8; in the Roman, on July 19. He is called the Great, and is one of the most famous of all the Egyptian monks. About him many stories are told. One of his sayings is worth remembering, "Often have I been sorry for having spoken, never for having been silent." See Acta SS. on the later date; SMITH and WACE: Dict. of Christ. Biography.

ARSENIUS, a monk of Nicea; lived for some time as a hermit on Mount Athos, and became finally patriarch of Constantinople. Theodore Lascaris II., Emperor of Nicea, intrusted his son to his guardianship; but, after his death (1259), MichaelPaleologus usurped the throne, and put out the eyes of young Lascaris. Arsenius excommunicated the usurper, and refused to re-admit him to the church, unless he restored the throne to the legitimate heir. But a council convened in Constantinople in 1262 deposed and banished Arsenius, and he died in one of the islands of the Propontis in 1267. Although his successor Joseph remitted the sentence of excommunication, there was a party in the Greek Church which considered these proceedings irregular, and in 1312 Arsenius was declared a saint.

ARTAXERXES (great warrior). The honorary title of Persian kings. Two are so called in the Old Testament. 1. Pseudo-Smerdis the Magian, the pretended son of Cyrus, and brother of Cambyses, who seized the throne B.C. 522, and was murdered after eight months (Ez. iv. 7-24). 2. Ez. vii. 7 and Neh. ii. 1 both speak of a second Artaxerxes, who is generally regarded as identical with Artaxerxes Longinanus, son of Xerxes, who reigned B.C. 464-425. Therefore Ezra's journey can be set down in B.C. 437, and Nehemiah's B.C. 444.

ARTEMON, or ARTEMAS, the founder of an anti-trinitarian sect, the Artemonites, taught in Rome in the beginning of the third century, and asserted that Christ was a mere man, though superior to any of the prophets, and that the doctrine of his divinity was a mere invention, and a relapse into Pagan polytheism. His views were afterwards adopted and further developed by Paul of Samosata; but all we know about Artemon himself depends upon a few notices by Eusebius, Epiphanius, Theodoret, and Photius.

ARTICLES. Under the editorship of Archbishop Cranmer, the Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion, English, Thirty-Nine, the Reformation Creed of the Church of England and her daughters in the Colonies and in the United States. They differ from the lengthy confessions of the sixteenth century in form, but of Henry VIII., prepared the way for a brief statement, clerical celibacy, and auricular confession. They were therefore called the "bloody Articles," and "a whip with six strings." King Henry VIII. never was a Protestant, except in opposing the pope, especially those who were his own subjects, and in his own dominion; but he did the dirty work of the English Reformation by destroying the foreign power of the papacy, and its domestic stronghold, monasticism. The positive Reform was first fairly introduced during the reign of his son and successor, Edward VI. (1547–53), under the lead of Archbishop Cranmer. He at first entertained the noble but premature project of framing an evangelical catholic creed, in which all the Reformed churches could agree in opposition to the Church of Rome, then holding the stronghold of the Continent — Melanchthon, Calvin, and Bullinger — to London for the purposes of the English Reformation. Failing in this scheme, Cranmer framed, with the aid of his fellow-reformers, — Ridley and Latimer, the royal chaplains, and the foreign divines, Bucer, Peter Martyr, and John a Lasco, whom he had drawn to England,— the Forty-two Articles of Religion for the English Reformed Church. After passing through several revisions, they were approved in November, 1532, and published in 1533. They were submitted to the royal authority and with the approval of Convocation. The re-establishment of the papacy under the short but bloody reign of Mary (1553–58) set them aside, together with the Edwardine Book of Common Prayer. Under Elizabeth (1558–1603) the Articles were revised and permanently restored. They were reduced to thirty-nine, and brought into that shape and form which they have retained ever since in the Church of England. The Latin edition was prepared under the supervision of Archbishop Parker, with the aid of Bishop Cox of Ely (one of the Marian exiles) and Bishop Guest of Rochester, approved by convocation, and published by the royal press, 1563. The English edition, which is of equal authority, though slightly different from the Latin, was adopted by convocation in 1571, and issued under the lead of Archbishop Jewel of Salisbury, 1571. They were made binding on all ministers and teachers of religion, and students in the universities; but subscription was not always enforced with equal rigor, and bitter complaints were made by the Nonconformists, who had scrupulous objections to the political articles. The Act of Uniformity under Charles II. imposed greater stringency than ever; but the Toleration Act of William and Mary gave some relief by exempting dissenting ministers from subscribing Acts XXVII and XXXVI, and a portion of Art. XVII. Subsequent attempts to relax or abolish subscription resulted at last in the University Tests Act of 1871, which exempted all students and graduates in the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham, except the heads of colleges, from subscription, and thus opens these institutions wide to Dissenters.

The Thirty-nine Articles are among the most important doctrinal formulas of the Reformation period. They cover nearly all the heads of the Christian faith, especially those which were then under dispute with the Roman Catholics. They affirm (1) the old orthodox doctrines of the Trinity and incarnation; (2) the Augustinian views on free-will, total depravity, divine grace, faith, good works, election; and (3) the Protestant doctrines on the church, and the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper. They are borrowed, in part, from Lutheran standards; namely, the Augsburg Confession of Melanchthon (1530) and the Wurtemberg Confession of Bremius (1532); but on the sacraments, especially the much-disputed doctrine of the real presence in the Eucharist, they follow the Swiss reformers, Bullinger and Calvin. In the political sections they are purely English, and teach the Erastian doctrine of the spiritual as well as temporal supremacy of the sovereign as the supreme governor of the Church of England. They have, therefore, an eclectic and comprehensive character, which distinguishes the Anglican Church from the Lutheran and the strictly Calvinistic churches of the Continent and Scotland, and from the dissenting denominations of England. They have often been interpreted and misinterpreted in the interest of particular schools and parties; while all claim them as favoring themselves. They must be understood in their plain grammatical sense; and, when this is doubt, the Prayer-Book, the Book of Common Prayer, the Catechism, and the private writings of the English reformers and the Elizabethan divines, must be called to aid. The doctrinal decisions in the Hornham, Bennet, and other recent controversies, favor great latitude in their interpretation. The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, after effecting an independent organization and episcopate in consequence of the American Revolution, formally adopted the Thirty-nine Articles of the mother-church at the General Convention held in Trenton, N.J., Sept. 12, 1801, but with sundry alterations and omissions in the political articles (Arts. XXI. and XXXVIII.), which the separation of the Church made necessary, and which are real improvements. The only doctrinal difference is the omission of all allusion to the Athanasian Creed (Art. VIII.), which is also excluded from the American editions of the Prayer-Book. By this omission the Episcopal Church in the United States has escaped the agitation of the English Church on that creed, whose damnatory clauses make it quite unsuitable for public worship.

The thirty-five Articles of Religion of the Reformed Episcopal Church in America, adopted by the Third General Council, Chicago, May 18, 1865, are based upon the Thirty-nine Articles; similarly are the twenty-five Methodist Articles of Religion drawn up by John Wesley for the Methodist Church in 1784. Both are given in Schiff: Creeds of Christendom, vol. III., pp. 187 sq.

ARTICLES OF RELIGION. These articles are one hundred and four in number; were probably composed by the learned Archbishop James Ussher, then professor of divinity in Dublin, and adopted by the convocation of the Irish Episcopal Church at its first meeting (1615), and approved by the viceroy in the same year. They are important as proving the decided Calvinistic bent of the English theologians at the close of the sixteenth century. The University of Cambridge was at this period the scene of a fierce discussion upon predestination, which, for settlement, was finally referred to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who held a consultation with Dr. Whittaker and Dr. Tyndal, Dean of Ely, representatives of the university, and a number of other learned divines, and as a result we have the so-called Lambeth Articles, adopted Nov. 20, 1595. They are nine in number, strongly Calvinistic, although Whittaker's original language was slightly softened. Queen Elizabeth was offended at the calling of the synod without her permission; and the archbishop was obliged to suppress the articles. Dr. Reynolds at the Hampton Court Conference of January, 1604, requested the addition of these articles to the Thirty-nine Articles. See Schiff: the Creeds of Christendom, vol. I., pp. 658-662; vol. III., pp. 522-523.

ARUNDEL, Thomas, Lord Chancellor and Archbishop of Canterbury, b. at Arundel Castle 1559; d. at Canterbury, Feb. 20, 1413. He was the second son of the Earl of Arundel and War- ren. Twice he held the position of lord chancellor, 1386-89, 1391-96. He was made Bishop of Ely 1374, Archbishop of York 1388, of Canterbury, January, 1396, the first instance of a translation from York to Canterbury. In 1397 he, his brother the Earl of Arundel, and the Duke of Gloucester, were impeached on a charge of high treason, and banished. He went to Rome, where he was kindly received, and nominated Archbishop of St. Andrews. He plotted against Richard II., crowned Henry IV., and was by him restored to his see. The articles he wrote were a Calvinistic appendix to the Thirty-nine Articles, composed by Dr. William Whita ker (d. 1595), the regius-professor of divinity at Cambridge, have never had full symbolical authority, but are of great historical interest as proof of the Calvinistic bent of the English theologians at the close of the sixteenth century. The University of Cambridge was at this period the scene of a fierce discussion upon predestination, which, for settlement, was finally referred to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who held a consultation with Dr. Whittaker and Dr. Tyndal, Dean of Ely, representatives of the university, and a number of other learned divines, and as a result we have the so-called Lambeth Articles, adopted Nov. 20, 1595. AS'A (healing) was the son and successor of Abijam on the throne of Judah for forty-one years,—B.C. 955-914 (1 Kings xv. 8-24). The first part of his reign was politically active and blessed: the latter part, although successful, lacked the divine blessing. He tried to uproot idolatry, and deposed his grandmother Maachah, who was queen-mother, because she had an idol in a grove. He made use of the peace he enjoyed to fortify and build several cities, and to augment and drill his army. Accordingly he was able to defeat Zerah, the Ethiopian king who invaded Judah at the head of one million men and three hundred chariots. The battle was fought at Mareshah, and was one of the most important in Jewish history (2 Chron.

ASCETICISM as a principle of conduct is not, strictly speaking, of Christian origin. It was found with the Essenes among the Jews, with the Hinlees and Buddhists, with the Pythagoreans and Stoics among the Greeks, and it was introduced into Christianity through contact with the Alexandrian school of philosophy. In the first two centuries, when the Christian Church still was, in the truest sense of the word, an itinerant community, it was necessary for the Church to amalgamate with very various secular interests, and so as the Christian Church became a settled institution, with more or less of social security and political guarantee, a distinction arose between that seriousness which ought to characterize all Christian life, and a certain austerity which claimed to represent a higher standpoint. In the earliest Christian sects this distinction is very apparent. All the various forms of Gnosticism adopted asceticism as the true principle of conduct; the disciples of Saturninus and Basilides, of Cerdo andAdrian, etc. Matter was itself something evil; and to escape this contamination, to make one’s self independent of nature, to shut up every door through which the world enters into converse with the human soul, was the great problem of holiness. But Gnosticism was the first sour and unripe fruit of the contact between Christianity and the Alexandrian philosophy. And again, when in the third century, through the example of Anthony, Paul, Ammon, and others, asceticism was made the basis of a whole new order of Christian life, it may have been the Decian persecution which started the movement: but it was the teaching of the Alexandrian school which directed and organized it; and to that source must be traced back the doctrine of a double moral principle, one obligatory to all, and another over-sight, another one available only for the select few,—of extinguishing the passions,—a doctrine which received a striking development in the history of monasticism.

village of Esdud was one of the five chief cities of the Philistines (Josh. xiii. 3; 1 Sam. vi. 17), situated midway between Gaza and Joppa, three miles from the Mediterranean. It was allotted to Judah (Josh. xv. 46), and was taken by Uziah (2 Chron. xxvi. 6); but the Israelites never obtained possession of it. It was a great and splendid city, the chief seat of the Dagon-worship; and its location on the road from Egypt to Syria, and near the frontier of Judaea, made it a point of great strategic importance. It was taken by Tartan, besieged for twenty-nine years by Psammeticus, and destroyed by the Macedeans. Philip preached there (Acts viii. 40).

ASH'IMA, one of the divinities worshipped by the Hamathites, i.e., the inhabitants of the kingdom of Hamath, whose capital, originally called Hamath, but later Epiphania, was on the Orontes, north from Antilebanon. These people were transported into Samaria by the Assyrians to repopulate that depopulated district. The god has not yet been identified. ASH'KELON (migration), one of the five principal cities of the Philistines, was taken by Judah (Judg. i. 19), but not permanently held. It was afterwards conquered twice by Jonathan the Macabee (1 Macc. xii. 68, xli. 60). It had a Temple of Derceto, a goddess with a fish-tail: the temple stood in the centre of a large pond, and traces of this pond are still visible. It was the birthplace of Herod the Great, and afterwards the residence of his sister Salome. During the crusades it was captured and destroyed several times, and now it is in ruins; but the ruins, ten miles north of Gaza, still bear witness to its former greatness.

ASH-WEDNESDAY (dies cineris et ciliici) is the first day of Lent, the first of those forty days of fast, which already in the ancient church were kept before Easter in memory of Moses (Exod. xxiv. 18) and Elijah (1 Kings xix. 8), and more especially in memory of the forty days during which our Lord fasted in the desert. The name is not simply a general allusion to the penance in sackcloth and ashes of which the prophets of the Old Testament speak, but refers more directly to a peculiar rite in the Roman Church. The palm-branches consecrated in the church on Palm-Sunday the year previously are burnt to ashes, and the ashes gathered in a vessel, and placed on the altar, before the beginning of the mass. The priest, dressed in a violet pluviate, prays that God will send one of his angels to consecrate the ashes, in order that they may become a remedium salubre to all penitents. After sprinkling the ashes with holy water, and striking them thrice with the perfumed clouds from the censer, the officiating priest kneels down, and strews silently ashes on his head. Finally the congregation approach the altar, and kneel down, while the priest at the altar on their head with the words: Memento homo, quia pulcises et in pulvis te revocavimus: Et suppletur amor tuus, et ut obsequium tuum in die veniatur. The priest then places a cross and a picture of Jesus on the forehead; in Paris by a fine brush. In Protestant churches the Lent sermons generally begin on Ash-Wednesday, but a special service is performed only in the Church of England.

ASINARII, originally a nickname given to the Jews, because they were said to worship an ass; but afterwards also applied to the Christians, of whom the same story was told. It is possible that the Jews were the first to shift the reproach from themselves on to the Christians. Tertullian (Apology c. 10; Ad Nat. i. 14) tells of a man, a former Jew, who was hostile to the Christians, that he exhibited in Carthage a picture superscribed, Deus christianorum omnium et repre- senting this god with ass-ears, a hoof on the one foot, a book in the hand, and dressed in a toga. From about the same time is the mock-crucifix discovered in 1858 in the ruins of the pedagogium for the imperial pages on the southern declivity of the Palatine. It was scratched on the wall with a stylius, evidently by some page, in derision of some Christian comrade, and represents the man with the head of an ass hanging on a cross, and to the left another figure in an attitude of worship, the whole explained by the superscription: Αλέξιμνος σεβετε θεον. The character of the letters shows that it dates from the beginning of the third century.

ASMODEUS (demon of desire), a demon who is first mentioned in the Book of Tobit as being led through his love for Sara, the daughter of Raguel at Ecbatana, to murder her seven successive husbands upon the wedding-night. But Tobias, under the direction of Raphael, married Sara, and drove away the demon by burning in the bride-chamber the heart and liver of a fish he caught in the Tigris. When Asmodeus smelled the fumes, "he fled into the uttermost parts of Egypt, and the angel (Raphael) bound him." (Tob. iii. 8, viii. 16, 17.) This demon is Talmudic origin, and is to be identified with Ashima, of which the same things are told. In the Talmud, Asmodeus has insight into secrets, Ashima is the source of all knowledge; the latter is a head of the Dævas: Asmodeus a king of the demons. A Talmudic tale relates that Asmodeus once drove Solomon out of his kingdom, but Solomon at length forced him to work for him in building the temple.

ASS. An animal indispensable in the East. It is so frequently referred to in the Bible, that the quotation of texts is superfluous; but its principal use will deserve mention. (1) For riding, the she-ass, which was also valued for its milk, was particularly liked; and of colors the white was preferred. No saddle was used, but a mere cloth or mantle; and the driver went alongside or behind the beast. (2) For ploughing, ass-ears were of every kind. (3) For grinding. Asses do not appear to have been used by the Hebrews, after Solomon's day, for warlike ASS. The Feast of the, like the Feast of Fools, the performance of mysteries, and many minor points in the Roman-Catholic ritual and liturgy, originated in perfect good faith, and was employed by the priests as means by which to explain the contents of sacred history, and impress its events upon the slumbering imagination of people who received no religious instruction, except, perhaps, in an oral form by the father or in any school, and who could not read. The festum asinorum was in great favor in Northern France, and celebrated in various manners in the various cities. In Rouen the celebration took place shortly before Christmas, and consisted in the representation of a little drama, in whose principal scene Balaam's ass (a priest concealed between the legs of an ass) appeared before the altar of the cathedral, and predicted the early coming of Christ. In Beauvais the celebration took place on Jan. 14, and consisted in a procession, which had reference to the flight of Joseph and Mary to Egypt. In the fifteenth century these feasts were forbidden, because they had become a scandal. When the ass was said, the priest brayed thrice, like an ass, instead of saying, "Ite, missa est;" and the whole congregation answered with "Hil-han," instead of Deo gratias. Such secessions could, of course, not be tolerated from the moment they ceased to be necessary.

ASSEBURG, Rosamunde Juliana von, b. in November, 1672, at Eigenstedt, near Magdeburg; received, according to her own statement, divine revelations and glorious visions while only seven years old. She saw the Saviour himself in November, 1672, at Eigenstedt, near Magdeburg, and in a pamphlet — Die Species facti von dem unheiligen Fräulein Rosamanda Juliana von der Asseburg; also containing an essay: Ob Gott nach der Auf-fahrt Christi nicht mehr heutiges Tages durch göttliche Erscheinung den Menschenkindern sich offentlichen, saß und sich dessen ganz begehrte Babat. — he addressed in 1691 all the foremost theologians of Germany, asking them whether they accepted the revelations of Miss Asseburg as divine inspirations or not. Some answered in favor, others were violently opposed. Spener was too cautious to express any opinion. Meanwhile her name became known in France, England, and Denmark; and the court of Hanover seemed to regard her with favor. The magistrates, however, and the preachers of Lüneburg took another view of the case; and, in accordance with a verdict of the theological faculty at Helmstädt, Petersen was deposed in 1692, and banished from the country. Miss Asseburg accompanied him, and lived afterwards in the house of a pious old woman near Helmstädt. She was burnt to death and sank into oblivion. The date of her death is unknown. Leibnitz defended her moral and religious character; and, with respect to her visions, he compared her to Brigitta, Hildegard, Mechtilid, and other virgins among the saints of the middle ages. See Petersen's Autobiography, 2d edition, 1719.

ASSEMANI is the name of a Maronite family of which three members became celebrated in the eighteenth century by opening up to European students the Oriental literatures, especially that of Syria. — 1. Joseph Simon Assemani, b. on Mount Lebanon in 1657; d. in Rome, Jan. 31, 1708; was educated in the Maronite college of Rome; received while yet a very young man a position in the library of the Vatican; was sent by Clement XI. to the East (1715–17) to collect manuscripts; visited Cairo, the monasteries of the Nitrian Desert, Damascus, Aleppo, etc., and brought great literary treasures back to Rome; made a second journey to the East (1726–35), and was made custodian of the library. When he died he left a great number of works in manuscript (more than one hundred volumes), partly continuations of earlier publications, partly new literary enterprises; but a large part of his work was destroyed by a fire which broke out in the apartments adjacent to the library, Aug. 30, 1765. His principal works are: 1. Bibliotheca orientalis Clementina-Vaticana, 3 vols. fol., Rome, 1719–25, forming the first part only of a larger work designed to comprise four parts. Considerable preparations, however, were made for the seven volumes forming the second part, and treating of the Syrian and Arabian translations of the Bible, the religious books of the Syrians, the Syrian and Arabian councils, etc. 2. Ephraïm Syrō Operæ Graece, Latine in VI. tomes (Rom., 1732–40). (Only the first three tomes.) 3. Rudimenta linguae Arabicæ, Rome, 1732. 4. Abraham Ecclesiæsianorum, printed in Scriptores Historiae Byzantinae T. XVII. 5. Chronicon Sacrum (227–952), after an Arabic manuscript, printed in Carnusi Bibliothæca Historica Regni Siculici, T. I. 6. Kalendarium ecclesiæ universalis, of which only the first six volumes appeared (Rome, 1735), treating of the Slavonic Ecclesiæsice Graeco-Moschica. The six following volumes, treating of the Syrian, Armenian, Egyptian, Ethiopian, Greek, and Roman saints, were partly prepared, but were burnt. 7. De sacris imaginibus et reliquiae, destined to comprise five volumes. Parts of the manuscript were saved; and extracts from it were made; the Custos of the library, after a complete list of his works, published or in manuscript, see Angel Mai: Scriptores Veterum Nova Collectio et Vaticani Cod. Edita, T. III., P. II., p. 166. — Joseph Aloysius Assemani, brother of the preceding, professor of Oriental languages in Rome, and died there Feb. 9, 1782. His two principal works are: 1. Nabathæa, etc.—were again subdued. But Egypt, under the guidance of Psammetichus, recovered its independence. Under Assur-ebibli the revolt was repeated: Nineveh was taken by Cyaxares of Media and Nabopolassar of Babylonia, and the Assyrian Empire came to an end, 625 B.C.

The Assyrian Government was, like that of the other great Oriental monarchies, an absolute and untempered despotism, organized on a crude military plan, and centring in the harem. One of the principal officers of the realm was the Našartišar, the commander of the eunuchs (2 Kings xviii. 17); and the eunuchs themselves, this institution so characteristic for an Oriental court, were at once the government, the science, and the art of the people. Foreign countries, when conquered, were generally left in the state in which they were found. The king became a vassal, and paid tribute; but no closer relation sprang up between the two peoples. If the king revolted, and was defeated, he was burnt, and his soldiers were massacred. If the whole people partook in the revolt, they were transferred in a body from their native soil, and settled in some distant region. If the revolt succeeded, the victor became at once the ruler of the whole realm, the “great king.” In the relation between Assyria and Israel we find many of these features of crude and awkward political art strikingly manifested.

In his western campaigns Assur-natsîr-pal overran Palestine and Shalmaneser II. compelled Jehu, the tenth king of Israel, to pay tribute, and recognize the supremacy of Assyría. Rimmon-ôri again exacted tribute from the “land of Omri”; and Tîglath-pîleser II. found opportunity to interfere still more effectively in its affairs. He received tribute from Menâhem, King of Israel (2 Kings xv. 19), and afterwards also from Ahaz, King of Judah (2 Kings xvi. 7), whom he supported against Pekah, the son of Menahem, and King of Israel, and Rezin, King of Damascus. The kingdom of Damascus was destroyed; and, after the death of Pekah, Tîglath-pîleser II. placed Hoshea as his vassal on the throne of Israel. So heavily, however, pressed the Assyrians showed a preference for Adar, the god of fire and war, and Istar, Astarte, the goddess of love and fertility; but they have not yet been recognized. importance of the moon as a divider of time and as a cause of certain events, they represent it as cakes, and as gardens they represent it as the "Caelestis" of Carthage, identified with Juno and represented as the Venus-star, guiding the sun.

The truth that Sin is called the moon-god upon the one occasion, when she went into the underworld, and as a war-goddess, carrying quiver and bow. See Smith's Chaldean Account of Genesis, revised ed., N.Y., 1881, p. 243.

According to the astrological inscriptions, Istar was Venus: but such identification was of comparatively recent date. By far the older is that which puts Istar side by side with Ilu, and regards them as moon and sun respectively: these two were the chief divinities of Ancient Arabia. Istar appears in connection with Thammuz and with the Greco-Phoenician Adonis. It is indeed true that Sin is called the moon-god upon the one occasion, when she went into the underworld, and as a war-goddess, carrying quiver and bow. See Smith's Chaldean Account of Genesis, revised ed., N.Y., 1881, p. 243.

Astarte, the Greek and Latin name for the principal Phoenician female divinity (called in Hebrew Ashteroth, and very frequently in plural form Ashtaroth), the correlative of Baal, the principal male divinity. She is called the goddess of the Sidonians (1 Kings vi. 5), but was worshipped also by the Philistines, even in the time of Abraham, as is shown by the name of the city Ashteroth-Karnaim. Afterward, in the days of Saul, we read of a Phallic temple in her honor (1 Sam. xxxi. 10). Solomon introduced her worship into Jerusalem (1 Kings xi. 5); and the ba'ath, or artificial mounds surmounted by altars ("high places"), he had built, were not destroyed until Josiah's day (2 Kings xxii. 13). When the plural form Ashtaroth, cf. Baalim, is employed, it indicates, as Genesis holds, the statues of Ashteroth and Baal. In the Phoenician inscriptions the goddess is called Ash'tart: hence the Greek Astarte. The name entered into the composition of proper names. The Island of Tyre was sacred to her. Her worship spread through all the Phoenician colonies. Hiram, the contemporary of Solomon, built sanctuaries to her and Baal-Melkant. The Phoenicians regarded her as the revealer of Baal. The Philistines apparently regarded her as the goddess of war, for they put the arms of the fallen Saul in her temple.

Astarte was not originally a Phoenician, but an old Babylonian goddess, where she was called according to the cuneiform inscriptions, Istar. It is a mooted point whether she was not derived from an older Turanian people. Istar (plural Istarat), as a Babylonian goddess, is sometimes the general name for female divinities, sometimes the name of a particular goddess. In the library of King Assur-bani-pal (seventh century B.C.) are mythological tales about Istar, both as the dispenser of life and fruitfulness, so that on one occasion, when she went into the underworld, procreation and birth ceased upon the earth, and as a war-goddess, carrying quiver and bow. See Smith's Chaldean Account of Genesis, revised ed., N.Y., 1881, p. 243.

ASTROLOGY

Different from him is Asterius, Bishop of Amasea in Pontus, d. about 410. His sermons were spoken of with praise at the second synod of Nicea. Several ascribed to him are still extant. Combes gives eleven in the first volume of his Auctarium Novum, besides extracts from two others, made by Photius, and an eulogy of Stephanus, the first martyr, which up to that time had been generally ascribed to Proclus, patriarch of Constantinople. Eight homilies, given by Cotkler in his Monumenta Eccl. Gr., are by him ascribed to Asterius of Amasea, but by Audin and Dupin to Asterius the Arian.

ASTROLOGY (the science of the stars) consisted of two departments, natural and judicial astrology: the former referred only to the natural sphere of phenomena, the latter, only to the moral. The former was a science, or developed into the science of astronomy. The latter was an illusion, but retained its hold on men's minds up to the dawn of modern science. Astrology, in the latter sense of the word, ascribed to the stars a subtle and mysterious influence on the human will, consequently on the destiny of man, and pretended to be able to trace out this influence, and predict its result, by inferences drawn from the relative positions of the stars in a given moment. It was much cultivated by the Chaldees, and from them it spread into the Greek and Roman world. At the time of the first emperors, the Chaldean astrologers belonged to the most feared and most flattered persons in Roman society. The Barbarians, so called, who overran the Roman Empire, took a great fancy to this occult science; and during the dark ages the sounder and stronger minds among the Christian clergy found it very hard to oppose this kind of sorcery and magic. The superstition was not completely destroyed until the elaboration of the Copernican system, when it gradually receded into the nurseries.

ASTRONOMY never developed among the ancient Israelites into a real science. They never attained a knowledge of the revolution of the moon, the planets, and fixed stars. Their studies were confined to such observations as the shepherd would make while leading his flock. Nevertheless, the distinction between the sun and the moon and the other stars was very old, and so was the division of time after the course of the moon. The arrival of the new moon was saluted by sound of trumpets, and celebrated with sacrificial feasts (Num. x. 10; xxviii. 11–15, xxix. 1; Ezek. xvi. 6; 1 Chron. xxiii. 31; 2 Chron. ii. 4, viii. 13). The whole complex of stars was called the "host of heaven" (Isa. xl. 26; Jer. xxxiii. 22); but quite a number of single stars were distinguished; such as "the morning star;" the planet Venus (Isa. xiv. 12; Rev. ii. 28); "the seven stars," the Pleiades (Job ix. 9; xxxviii. 31; Amos v. 8); "Orion," poetically represented as a giant bound by chains to the firmament of heaven (Job ix. 9, xxxviii. 31); "Arcturus," the Great Bear (Job ix. 9); "the Crooked Serpent," the Dragon (Job xxvi. 19); and "Castor and Pollux," the Twins (Acts xvii. 11).

ASTRUC, Jean, b. at Sauve in Languedoc, March 19, 1651; d. in Paris, May 5, 1706; studied medicine at Montpellier, and was professor of anatomy, first in Toulouse, then in Montpellier, and finally in Paris. In 1753, in his seventieth year, he published his Conjectures sur les Moeurs (4to) and it is printed in La Comptoir (26). In 1755, he published Sur l'Immortalite, L'Immaterialite, and La Liberte de l'Ame, Paris.

ASYLUM (Gr. ἀσύλιον, ἀναπαύσν, a place in which not only force becomes powerless, but even the law grows silent, a refuge, an escape. Among all people the awe of the holy made it an offence, or even a crime, to use force in a place consecrated to the Divinity and divine worship; and far back into antiquity the beneficial influence may be seen of the protection which such consecrated places offered against the prevailing arbitrariness and violence. The Mosaic law provides "cities of refuge" (Exod. xxii. 13: Deut. xix. 7–10, see title), and with both the Greeks and the Romans, their temples and altars formed inviolable asylums, not only to the persecuted, but even to the criminal.

In the Christian world the right of asylum was extended from the altar and the temple to all ecclesiastical buildings. Various imperial constitutions regulated the details of this privilege (Cod. Theod. Lib. IX., Tit. XLV.; Cod. Justinian, Lib. I., Tit. XII.). In 431 Theodosius II. ordered that not only the altar and the nave of the church should be considered sacred, but also the atrium, the garden, the baths, and the cells; and when, in 496, Leo I. confirmed these constitutions, he added that the steward and the advocate of the church (see title) should subject every person who demanded protection to a close examination, and act upon the evidence thus obtained. The partition between civil and ecclesiastical uses. Already in 392 Theodosius the Great excluded debtors to the state from the privilege; and Justinian added (Novella, XVII., c. 7) murderers, adulterers, and people who had committed rape.

The church has always considered it a special duty to protect any one who asked for its aid. The Council of Sardica (347) established this maxim; and in 441 the synod of Orange ordered that fugitives should not be surrendered. The synod of Orleans (311) conferred the privilege to the bishop's residence, and extended the asylum for thirty paces from the building, the so-called trigna ecclesiasti passus. In England the right of asylum was recognized by the laws of Alfred: and no considerable change took place in the matter until 1587, when a bull of Innocent VIII. declared that thieves, robbers, and murderers who tried to continue their criminal life under the shelter of the asylum, should immediately be given up to the king's officers. In 1354 an act excluded people accused of treason from the benefit of the privilege, and, when the Reformation was established under Elizabeth, the privilege itself was lost to the church. In Germany various crimes, such as highway robbery, conspiracy, etc., excluded from the asylum; and new crimes were added to the list in courses of time. For instance, in 1418 by Martin V., and in 1504 by Julius III. The privilege, however, was not entirely abolished until the last part of the eighteenth century. In France the privilege began to be limited by Francis the First, by the edict of 1539: Ordon. sur le fait de la justice. During the Revolution it was abolished. ATHANASIUS. This Syrian goddess is not mentioned in the Bible; but in 2 Macc. xii. 26 her temple at Karnion, the same place as Ashtaroth Karmaim (Gen. xiv. 5), is spoken of. She was the Syrian form of Astarte. The Greek and Roman writers represent her as a fish-goddess, the cause of the seas' fruitfulness. From this idea came “Aphrodite Anadyomené” (Venus rising from the sea). According to Ctesias, Semiramis, a celebrated queen of Assyria (fl. 1250 B.C.), was the daughter of Derketo (Atargatis) by a beautiful youth, named Abaris. She was afterwards worshipped as Aphrodite. Overcome by shame at her conduct, the goddess destroyed the youth, set her daughter in a desert, where she was fed by doves, and threw herself into the sea by Ascalon, and was changed, all except the face, into a fish; and in this shape she was pictured. Fish and doves thus became holy to the Syrians, and were not eaten. Ascalon and Hierapolis were the chief seats of her worship. Lucian speaks of her in his book De Syra Ian, calls her, however, Ilêrê, and says she combined traits of Athene, Aphrodite, Selene, Rhea, Artemis, Nemesis, and the Moirai (the three Fates). He describes her as decked with gold and many precious stones, girded like Aphrodite, sitting upon a lion; near her is Zeus, upon a bull. In one hand she holds a sceptre, in the other a spindle; upon her head, surrounded by rays, she wears a tower; one of the jewels on her forehead illumines the temple at night through its radiance. Twice a year water was brought from distant places, and poured into a cham in the temple; because, as Lucian says, according to tradition, the waters of the deluge were drained away through that opening. About her temple were oxen, horses, eagles, bears, and lions, sacred to the goddess. A fish-pond, upon which was a floating altar for the worship of the fish, was near the temple. Her rites shared the impurity of the Oriental nature-religious. See ASTARTE for further information, and to literature there given add TIELE: Ägyptische en mesopotamische Gottheiten, 1872.

ATHANASIUS, the “Father of Orthodoxy,” b. in Alexandria of Christian parents, 298 or 299; d. there May 2 or 3, 373; received the common school education of his time; studied the Greek philosophers and poets; was made a deacon by Bishop Syrianus, whose amanuensis he became, and played a most prominent part, at the Council of Nicaea, in the definition of the creed named after that council. When Syrianus was deposed and excommunicated, Athanasius was chosen his successor (June 8, 328); and was received with enthusiasm by a large majority of the congregation, but fiercely opposed by the adherents of Arius and the remnant of the Meletian party. At the instance of Eusebius of Nicomedia, the emperor demanded the re-admission of Arius into the church; but Athanasius refused, and immediately the storm broke out. He was summoned before the emperor, at that time residing in Nicomedia, and accused of conspiracy; and only, after long and wearisome exertions, he succeeded in proving his innocence. But, immediately after his return, new accusations were raised against him. It was said that he had killed a Meletian bishop, Arsenius, and used his bones for magic. The emperor commissioned a relative of his, the censor Dalmatius of Antiochia, to investigate the case, and a synod was convened at Cesarea (334). But Athanasius refused to appear; and, as he was able to prove that Arsenius was still alive, the emperor ordered the investigation to be discontinued. Eusebius, however, succeeded in changing the emperor's mind; and an imperial letter ordered Athanasius to appear at the synod of Tyre, 335. Athanasius felt obliged to obey; and July 11, 335, he set out for Tyre, accompanied by fifty bishops of Aprodisite. He soon understood the temper of the assembly, and repaired to Constantinople, where he landed Oct. 30, 335. He succeeded in convincing the emperor of the partiality of the synod; and the bishops, who in the mean time had moved the convention from Tyre to Jerusalem, were called to Constantinople to vindicate themselves. A new accusation, however, raised against Athanasius by the two Eusebiuses, that he had threatened to stop the exportation of corn from Egypt to Constantinople, brought so well on the emperor's mind, that, without being admitted to a hearing, Athanasius was banished to Treves Nov. 10, 335. Constantine died May 28, 337; and in the fall of 338 Athanasius returned to Alexandria. He entered the city in triumph; but the opposition and intrigues immediately began again, and his adversaries this time went so far as to accuse him of having sold, and employed for his own personal purposes, that corn which the late emperor had destined for the widows of Libya and Egypt. A synod of bishops from Egypt, Libya, and the Pentopolis, declared in his favor; but, as Constantius stood entirely under the influence of the two Eusebiuses, he had to go into exile a second time (March 19, 340), while Gregorius, a bishop of the Eusebian party, took possession of his see by military force. Athanasius went to Rome, where he was well received by Bishop Julius; thence to Gaul (in 343) to confer with Hosius, whom he accompanied to Sardica. The Easter of 344 he celebrated at Naisius in Dacia; that of 345, at Aquileia, with Constans, who warmly supported his cause. Meanwhile a prospect of his returning to Alexandria was opened up by the death of Gregorius, June 26, 345. The see was not filled; and the following year Athanasius repaired to Antioch, where he was well received by Constantius. Over Jerusalem he returned to Alexandria, and entered the city Oct. 21, 346. The relations of Athanasius with Constans, however (in January, 350), his position again became unsafe; and the end of a long series of intrigues and machinations was, that the dux叙利亚us and the imperial notary Hilarius formally demanded his expulsion from the city, and broke into the Church of St. Thecla during service, in the night between Feb. 8 and 9. Athanasius fled, and a great massacre ensued. In Lent, 357, Georgius from Cappadocia was appointed his successor; and his adherents were discharged, and replaced with Arians. During this his third exile (356 to 361) he found refuge among the monks and hermits of the Egyptian deserts; but at times he also lived concealed in or by Alexandria, and by his writings he continued to operate, great influence on the church of Alexandria. Immediately after the death of Constantius, a revolt broke out in Alexandria. Georgius the bishop, and the cwes Dracontius were seized by the mob, and killed; and their bodies were dragged through the streets, and burnt. The edict of Valens, however, found it hazardous to deal with the great and populous city in this way; and, immediately on the death of Constantius, Oct. 5, 335, he returned to Athens, and compelled Athanasius to flee. Valens, May 5, 335, reversed the edict of Julian concerning the exiled bishops; and Oct. 5, 335, the prefect Flavianus broke into the Church of St. Dionysius, and compelled Athanasius to flee. Valens, however, found it hazardous to deal with the great and populous city in this way; and, though he continued to persecute the orthodox in other places, his notary Basidas brought, Feb. 1, 366, a special permission for Athanasius to return, and he was left in peace for the remainder of his life.

The greatness of Athanasius is his unswerving fidelity to the idea of his life, his constant adherence to the dogma of homoeousian as the only full and satisfactory expression of the godhead of the Son. In the ancient church the whole metaphysical construction of Christianity leads to this point, and from it starts the whole speculative development of the Trinity and the Christology. To Athanasius this dogma was the only true foundation for the abstruse and subtle questions of the Christian religion. The redemption and salvation of man demand that God has not only revealed himself to man through Christ, but has become man in Christ, has been incarnated. Against the Arian doctrine, that the Son is a creation out of nothing, foreign to the divine substance, not eternal, and not divine, he fought heroically and with all the weapons available. With equal vigor and equal consistency he opposed the older emasculatory views of God, which made the world not simply the creation of God, but an element of the divine substance, and God not simply the Ruler of the universe, but an agency involved in the world-process. To this point, the dogmatical centre of Christianity, most of his writings refer. Some of them have an historical character: Apologia contra Arianos, written between 286 and 290; Epist. Engel. ad Ep. Aeg. et Lib.; Apol. ad Imperat. Const.; Apol. de Fuga sua; Hist. Arianorum ad Monachos; Ep. ad Scrip. de Mort e Ari, all written after his flight in 329; De Synodis Arian. et Selenc., written in 330, but containing some later additions. Others have a more dogmatical or polemical character: Orat. IV. ad. Arianos (350); De Decretis Nic. Synod.; De Sententia Dionysii; Epist. Fidei, etc. His exegetical writings, Ep. ad Marcellinum in Interpretationem Psalmorum and Expositione Quicunque, and the earliest works, especially referring to the doctrine of the Holy Spirit are the four epistles Ad Serapionem, written during his stay in the deserts; and, to Christology, the epistles Ad Epictetum, Adelphium, Marm. Philos., as well as the two works Contra Apollinarianum and De Incarnatione; the celebrated Vatica S. Antonii; and a number of letters, among which are the so-called Festal-Letters, preserved in a Syriac version. Collected editions of his works have been given by B. de Montfaucon, Paris, 1693. two vols. fol. (the Benedictine edition), to which some additional matters have been added by Giustiniani, Patav., 1777; and by Migne in Script. Gr. f. 25-28. The dogmatical works have been edited by Thilo: Bibl. Patr. Gr. Dogm. i., Lips., 1853.

ATHANASIAN CREED, The (also called Symbol Quicunque, after its first word), consists, according to its plan, of two parts, each ending with a dammatory clause. The first part (§§ 1-20) treats of the Holy Trinity, and comprises the doctrine of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; the second part (§§ 27-39) treat of the incarnation of Christ and his work of atonement. The doctrine of the Holy Trinity is given in short and pointed sentences; and the influence of Augustine is apparent. In the second part the influence of the christological controversies (Nestorius and Eutyches) is equally apparent, though no direct polemics is noticeable. The whole creed seems to belong to a time when all controversies concerning these two points had been settled, and the settlement universally accepted as truth not to be controverted any more. It is also characteristic, that both in the introduction, and towards the close, the false view is propounded, that adherence to the formulas of a creed is necessary in order to be saved. — From the latter part of the eighth century Athanasius was generally held throughout the Western Church to be the author of this creed; and its use as the proper doctrinal symbol spread wider and wider, especially on the northern side of the Alps. In the monasteries the monks sung it every day at the prime. The Greeks, on the contrary, who did not become acquainted with it until about the year 1000, rejected it immediately, because it teaches the double procession of the Spirit: and, as they have persisted in rejecting it, it is erroneous to call the symbol heretical. The first who in the Western Church attacked the authorship of Athanasius was Gerhard Johann Voss (1842); and it is now generally acknowledged that Athanasius cannot be the author, though great uncertainty prevails with respect to the real author, his date and place. The first certain trace of the symbol is found with Cæsarius of Arles (305–543). He quotes passages from it, and appeals to it as something settled and acknowledged, which circumstance shows that it must have been generally accepted in Southern Gaul towards the close of the sixth century. [But the sermon which contains these passages is probably not the composition of Cæsarius at all. It is found, improbably, among those of Augustine (Migne’s ed., Opp. v. ser. 244, p. 1147); and Gieseler says (vol. ii. p. 74) the reference of it to Cæsarius of Arles is a “mere conjecture.” Some scholars maintain that Hilary of Arles (420–431) is the author of the creed; but it is of much later date, see below.] Most critics and historians have sought for the author there, though none has succeeded in producing sufficient evidence.

G. PLITT.

In the Church of England this creed must be sung thirteen times a year. The damnable clauses naturally awaken most scruples of conscience. In 1865 a great controversy arose over these clauses; but, although the royal commission were predominantly in favor of removing the compulsion to say it, the obligation yet remains. The controversy, however, produced a prolific literature; and the interesting point was brought out, that there is no certain trace of the creed higher up than the eighth century. The rediscovered Utrecht Psalter, which was exhibited in the British Museum in 1873, is the earliest manuscript which contains it; but, according to the best scholars, it is not earlier than the ninth century. The opposite half of the creed, containing a summary of the Chalcedonian Christology, has been found separately, as a fragment of a sermon on the incarnation, at Treves, in a manuscript which contains it; but, according to Professor Swainson, 1871. The fact that Athanasius spent some time in Treves may possibly have given rise to the tradition that the great champion of the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity composed the whole. The Episcopal Church of the United States struck this creed out of their revised Prayer-Book (1785). See SCHAFF: Creeds of Christendom, vol. i. pp. 54 sqq., where the literature is given, to which add OMMANLEY: Early History of the Athenasian Creed, London, 1880.

THEISM in the strict sense of the word is a denial of the existence of God. Originally the word, as formed and applied by the Greeks, meant simply a denial of a certain conception, viz., the Greek conception of God; and it was one of the gravest accusations raised by the Pagans against the Christians that, they were atheists, because they denied the existence of those gods which the State recognized. This mistake we find repeated over and over again in history. Romanists consider Protestants atheists, because they refuse to worship Mary as “the mother of God,” and to recognize the divine office of the saints. Whenever an idol has fallen before a higher and more spiritual conception of the divine, the idolaters have never failed to cry, “Atheism!” But this mistake is also made in the opposite direction, when various systems of pantheism and positivism are denounced as atheistic, though they do not deny the existence of God, but simply reject that conception of him which has been developed by the Christian theology, or decline to make the question the subject of discussion. It begins, however, to be recognized, that any positive conception of a spiritual cause, though ever so feeble and unripe, is, nevertheless, always one step away from atheism, and a tendency has sprung up to designate every such conception by a name of its own; while the name of atheism is restricted to that state of mind, which, wholly negative, and utterly incapable of any kind of positive construction, must confine itself to a pure, abstract denial,—a state of mind which appears to be the result of complete moral indiffERENCE, of moral death. In this, the strict sense of the word, atheism is, of course, of rare occurrence in history, and generally confined to unscientific reporters of what is going on in the field of science; though through this channel it has sometimes penetrated far into social life, and reigned there for a while, half in the form of a fashion and half in the form of a disease, as, for instance, during the last three decades of the eighteenth century. But it is a striking remark of Plutarch (Misc. Coloniae XXXI., in Moralia, vol. VI., p. 293, ed. Tauchnitz), and one which holds good this very day: “There has never been a state of atheists. You may travel over the world, and you may find cities without walls, without king, without saint, without theatre or gymnasium; but you will never find a city without God, without prayer, without sacrifice. Sooner may a city stand without foundation than a state without belief in the gods. This is the bond of all society and the pillar of all legislation.” The intermediate stages, however, between atheism and theism,—such as deism, pantheism, positivism, materialism, etc.,—are of much greater importance, and have been the characteristic marks of whole ages, just as they are the characteristic marks of whole sciences. See JOHN CAINE: Unbelief in the Eighteenth Century, Edinburgh, 1881.

ATHENAGORAS. Under the titles Ἀθηναγόρας, Προσεύχησις περὶ γυναῖκας (a defence of the Christians by the Christian philosopher Athenagoras of Athens) and . . . περὶ ἔκωσισιν νεκρῶν (of the resurrection of the dead), two works have come down to us, whose author is entirely unknown to the tradition of the church. Eusebius Jerome, and their immediate successors, do not mention him; and, as the survey which Eusebius gives of the apologetic literature of the second century is very elaborate, his silence with respect to Athenagoras could not fail to attract attention. Very early that the Christians thought of Athenagoras, his name was doubted, and the work was ascribed to Justin. This supposition, however, is from internal reasons untenuable. The first testimony, and the only one from the third century, of the existence of the apology and the name of its author, is a quotation by Methodius (Epiph.
Heres. 61, c. 21). Some notices by an unknown scribe (Cod. Barocc. 142, fol. 216), quoting from Philippus Sidetes, from the beginning of the fifth century, state that Athenagoras was director of the catechetical school of Alexandria, lived at the time of Hadrian and Antinous, who, like Celsus, occupied with searching the Scriptures for arguments against Christianity, when he was suddenly converted; but most of these notices are palpably erroneous. In spite, however, of the entire absence of a tradition, and the close resemblance to the apology of Justin, the date of the work must be placed somewhere in the second century. It is addressed to the emperors Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Aurelius Com-modus, and various passages indicate the period between 170 and 178. The treatise on the

ATHOS. See GREECE.

ATHOS. Of the three peninsulas jutting out into the Ægean from Chalcis, the easternmost ends in the celebrated monastery of Athos. The peninsula is connected with the mainland only by a narrow isthmus, rises rather abruptly from the sea, reaches in the marble peak of Mount Athos a height of six thousand four hundred feet, and is cut in every direction by deep ravines and narrow defiles, and covered all over with dense forest. Since Xerxes dug the canal through the isthmus, numerous classical remains of very branches gathered around the place, and in the Christian era it became famous as the seat of one of the most celebrated monastic institutions.
The origin of this institution, ascribed to the Holy Virgin herself, is wholly legendary. Some historical notices tracing it back to the time of Constantine may contain some truth; but the first reliable account we possess dates from the reign of the Emperor Basilius Macedo, who, by a decree of 885, assumed the protectorate over the hermits of the mountain. According to the Gnomic Books, the hermitage must have been begun in the sixth century. The monasteries may be divided into two classes: first, the monasteries standing on the peninsula, and applied to to all general affairs common to all the establishments, which are settled by delegates from the various monasteries meeting at Karyas. The number of inhabitants, of course, varies from time to time: at present it comprises about six thousand ecclesiastics and a few laymen. Not all the monks, however, called by the Greek name caloger, "good old men," live together in the monasteries. Some of them inhabit huts in the neighborhood, where they practise the severest asceticism; others lead a complete hermit-life in cells in the forests; and some are always travelling about in pursuit of trade, in which activity they are said to evince as much zeal as talent. The principal sources of income, however, are the contributions from the Danubian principalities and from Russia: the proceeds of the garden cultivation, handicraft, and trade, would be insufficient to the maintenance of the establishment. The days when Mount Athos was a seat of learning have passed by long ago.
Among the present monks, there are a few who understand a little Old-Greek, and know something about the traditions of the place; but that is about all. The archives and libraries are in complete disorder.

ATONEMENT. I. The Word.—1. The etymology and usage of the English word. (1) Supposed to be derived from "at-one-ment," and its primary signification, "reconciliation;" (2) At present universally used in the sense of "expiation," "satisfaction for an offense," "propitiation," "price of redemption."

2. The authorized version the word occurs only once in the New Testament (Rom. v. 11), and there is the translation of ταπαται, "reconciliation."

In the Old Testament it occurs frequently as the translation of יִתְנָה, "to cover with ransom," and hence to "expiate," to "ap- peace," to "ransom," and to "ransom." 3. The biblical equivalents of the word. In the Old Testament, יתננה to make an atonement (Exod. xxx. 15, 16). יתננה a ransom (Exod.xxx. 12), a satisfaction (Num. xxxv. 31, 32). יתננה an atonement (Exod. xxx. 10; Lev. xxiii. 27). In the New Testament, (1) As it respects sin בלת, "to expiate, to make propitiation for sin." (1 John ii. 2, iv. 10; Heb. ii. 17; Rom. iii. 25). (2) As it respects the sinner, גנוב, to redeem, to purchase (Exod. vi. 20; Rev. v. 9; 1 Cor. vi. 20; Colossians, to redeem from the curse of the law (Gal. iii. 13; ξαραμένω), to release for a ransom, middle voice, to ransom (1 Pet. i. 18; Heb. ix. 12). Christ saves us by being our κτίσμα, or ransom.

II. The Doctrine.—1. The Patristic Doctrine. —The Fathers, alike those who immediately followed the apostles, and those who flourished before and after the Council of Nice (A.D. 325), adhered to the sacrificial language of the Old Testament and to the terms used by the apostles in the New Testament; yet they failed to express their views definitely, or to maintain them consistently. It is, however, certain, that, more or less clearly, they always held the doctrine of expiation and satisfaction subsequently held by the whole church (Polycarpus, Ad Philipp., i. 8. Clemens Romanus, Ad Corinthium, t. 32. Athanasius, De Incarnatione, c. VII. See OUTRAM, Das. i. ch. 17); while together with this, and often disguising the more biblical view, there prevailed from the time of Origen (i. 234) to that of Anselm (d. 1109), and especially emphasised by Ireneaus, and taught even by Augustine, a belief that Christ was offered to Satan as a ransom in the behalf of men, in whom he had acquired rights of conquest. This they derived from such passages as Col. ii. 15 and Heb. ii. 14.

2. The Anselmic Doctrine. —The view which had been implicitly defined by the Fathers was first scientifically defined by Anselm (d. 1109), Archbishop of Canterbury, in his epoch-making book, Cur Deus Homo? He taught that sin is debt (guilt); that, under the government of God, it is absolutely necessary that this debt should be paid, i.e., that the penalty incurred by the guilt of sin should be suffered; that this necessity has its ground in the infinite perfections of the divine nature; that this penalty must be inflicted upon the sinner in person, unless a substitute can be found having all legal qualifications for his office. This was also realized in Jesus Christ, a divine person embracing a human nature. The best of the schoolmen, such as Bonaventura, Alexander Hales, Albertus Magnus, and Thomas Aquinas, agreed with Anselm, except that, while holding the moral necessity for an atonement, they insisted that God possessed power to forgive sin by mere will, as involved in the metaphysical notion of omnipotence.

Abelard (d. 1142) resolved the moral perfections of God into benevolence and the liberty of indifference. He held that sin could be abolished, and the sinner received into favor, by the simple volition of God. Duns Scotus (d. 1308) denied that sin is an infinite evil, or that the sacrifice of Christ has an infinite value, and held that "tanta valet omnipotentia, ut quanta accepta Deus illud, ut non plus. Hence God accepted (acceptilatio) by a sovereign act the work of Christ as a sufficient compensation to his law, instead of the condescending punishment of sinners.

The "Reformers before the Reformation," e.g., Wycliffe (d. 1384) and John Wessel (d. 1489) and the ancient Waldenses, held the strict Anselmic doctrine. This has subsequently been adopted in the creeds of the entire Christian Church. Dec. Conc. Trent., sess. 6, ch. 7. "Jesus Christ, who when we were enemies merited justification for us by his most sacred passion on the tree, and satisfied God the Father for us." Cat. Rom. ii. 5, 63; Hase, "Ibri Symbolici," p. 684 (Form. of Concord.); Heidelberg Cat., qves. 69; Second Helvetic Conf., ch. 15; Gallic Conf., art. 18; Belden Conf., art. 22.; Westminster Conf., ch. 8. § 5; The Original Articles of the Ch. of England, Arts. 28 and 31.

3. The Moral Influence Theory was taught by Abelard, and has since, in various forms, been taught by Socinus, and such Trinitarians as Maurice, Jowett, Bushnell, etc.

According to Abelard, Christ’s sacrifice was the only divine attribute concerned in human redemption. Christ died for the twofold purpose of subduing the rebellion, and removing the guilty fears of men by the transcendent exhibition of divine love.

Socinus adopted this view, and emphasized the additional purpose of the death of Christ as the necessary prerequisite to his resurrection, whereby he brought light and immortality to light (Rev. Cat., p. 263).

Frederick Denison Maurice, in his Theological Essays, London, 1853, and elsewhere, taught that the sufferings and death of Christ were the only complete sacrifice or self-sacrifice of the spirit and body to God ever accomplished, designed "to illustrate the principle of self-sacrifice as due from all God’s intelligent creatures to Him who made them." Horace Bushnell, in his Vicarious Sacrifice, N.Y., 1866, taught that Christ suffered with us through sympathy and fellowship, the result of which was to give him a moral power over men, spiritually...
ATONEMENT.

quickening them, and moulding them by his love and example.

McLeod Campbell, in his Nature of the Atonement, London, 1856, taught that Christ has by his sympathy, at once with us and with the righteous law we have broken, so identified himself with us as sinners, that he has offered up to God a perfect confession and adequate repentance of our sins. This repentance meets all the demands of law, which, according to Maurice, are repentance or punishment. This appears to occupy the middle ground between the "moral" and the "satisfaction" theories.

4. The Governmental Theory of the Atonement was first propounded by Hugo Grotius (d. 1645), a great lawyer, in his work against the Socinians: Defensio Fidei Catholicae de Satisfacione Christi. He taught that the law under which man is held is, including precept and penalty, a positive and binding ordinance of the divine will: E. A. Park relaxes its demands at will belongs to God's prerogative as moral governor. But since the gratuitous remission of the penalty in the case of some sinners would weaken the motives restraining from disobedience the subjects of the divine government in general, by affording an example of impunity, the benevolence of God requires, that, as a precondition of the forgiveness of any sinner, he should furnish such an example of suffering in Christ as will exhibit his determination that sin shall not escape with impunity. This view has been represented subsequently by the Supernaturalists of the last age in Germany, as Staudlin, Flatt, and Storr, and, in America, by Jonathan Edwards, jun., Smalley, Maxey, Emmons, Park, and others.

The Remonstrants, or Arminians, of the seventeenth century in Holland, held substantially the same ground, while they adhered more closely to the use of biblical language and metaphors. Limborch, Ap. Thes. 3. 21, 6. "The death of Christ is called a sacrifice for sin; but sacrifices are not payment of debts, nor are they full satisfactions for sins; but a gratuitous remission is granted when they are offered."

All these various theories which have been propounded in the different schools of Protestant theologians have, in like manner, been advocated in the various schools of Catholic theologians. See Oxenham: The Catholic Doctrine of the Atonement, London, 1860, 3d ed. 1881.

5. The Mystical Theory, which exists in various forms, may be generally stated thus: The reconciliation effected by Christ is brought about by the mysterious union of God and man, accomplished by his incarnation. This was held by the Protestant Fathers, by followers of Erigena during the middle ages, by Osiander and Schwenkfeld at the Reformation, and the disciples of Schleiermacher among modern German theologians.

ATONEMENT, Day of. The directions for its observance are found, Lev. xvi., xxiii. 26–32; Num. xxix. 7–11. On this day the most imposing acts of the Mosaic law were performed: for sacrifices were offered as an atonement, not only for the people, but also for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins" (Lev. xvi. 10). Even the "holy place" was rendered unholy by its position in the midst of sinners. It is evident that the acceptance of this expiation rested upon the idea that the people were in covenant relations with Jehovah; and hence it was not made for flagrant crimes, but only for what in the Epistle to the Hebrews are called "errors" (ix. 7, cf. v. 2).

The time of this service was the tenth day of the seventh month (Tisri, i.e., October). The day was significant. It was the tenth day, to indicate the completeness of the atonement; it was the seventh month, because the month closed the festival half of the Mosaic year, and thus in a sense formed its sabbath; it was the tenth day of Tisri, because, said the rabbins, on that day Adam sinned and repented, Abraham was circumcised, and Moses came down from the mount, and made atonement for the sin of the golden calf. The day thus set apart was strictly and solemnly kept; on it, and on it alone, was there a fast enjoined; all work was forbidden on penalty of excommunication; it was a sabbath (Lev. xvi. 29-31, xxiii. 27-29) ("afflict your souls" means fasting in addition to repentance and humiliation).

The ritual of the day was the following, as detailed in Lev. xvi. The high priest must first bathe his entire body (the ordinary washing of hands and feet before sacrificing would not suffice); and then dressed in pure white linen, as prescribed, without his ornaments,—how can man appear before God except in simplicity? and how more appropriately dressed than in white linen, the symbol of holiness?—he placed his own bullock before the entrance of the tabernacle as a sin offering for himself and his house, remembering himself and his first, because he and his must be clean when he enters the presence of Jehovah. He then took the two goats furnished by the congregation, and cast lots upon them,—one lot for Jehovah, and the other for Azazel. [Oehler considers it settled that Azazel was the name of a bad spirit living in the wilderness; but see art. AzAzel in this cyclopedia.] The order of the rites is, (1) The sacrifice by the high priest of his own bullock as a sin offering for the priests; (2) He takes a censer full of live coals from off the altar of burnt offering, and two handfuls of "sweet incense beaten small," and, according to tradition, without looking round, he goes into the Holy of holies; there he puts the incense upon the fire, and the ascending smoke is a symbol of prayer, and hence a protection; (3) Leaving the censer yet smoking (in post-exilian times he set it on the stone in the Holy of holies: see ARK OF THE COVENANT), he goes out backwards, says tradition, and fetching the blood of the slain bullock, which he sprinkles with his finger on the east side of the mercy-seat, and seven times upon the floor in front of it; this completes the atonement for the priests; (4) He now begins the same lesson, only much more impressively, with every sacrifice,—man is a sinner, imperatively needs pardon, can ask for it, and will get it if he rightly asks by shedding blood. The day also looked forward to a far greater day, when the victim should be no bullock nor he-goat, but the blameless Son of God; and the altar of sacrifice should not be of brass, but of wood,—a cross, rude and gory: but the sacrifice itself would atone for the sins of the whole world.
Reference has already been made to the tractate Yoma. In it are elaborate directions for the day; and although they are preliminary, complementary, and supplementary to the Bible, they are yet valuable as exhibiting the usages of the second temple. One point not at all mentioned in the Pentateuch is dwelt on at length,—the preparation of the high priest for the day. He must live for the seven days before the fast in a room of the temple, and go through a daily rehearsal of every rite under the direction of one of the oldest of the Sanhedrin, for fear he should introduce some Sadducean innovation. On the evening of the day he took a solemn oath that he would not in any wise depart from his instructions. He was not permitted to sleep the night before the day, but read, or was read to, out of the Scriptures. In regard to the day itself, there are additional rites and explanations how to perform those prescribed. For instance, the high priest, in his usual dress, offered the morning and evening sacrifices. In each of the three formulae of confession used, two over the bullock and over the goat, the sacred name was uttered three times; and, as it was used in casting the lot, it was heard ten times. Each time it was spoken, the people and priests prostrated themselves, crying out, "Blessed be his glorious name forever!" In the second temple's Holy of Holies there was no ark of the covenant; and consequently the high priest was instructed to sprinkle the blood once upwards, and seven times downwards. The stretch from Jerusalem to the wilderness was divided into ten sections: at each was a hut in which the food and water for the refreshment of the man who drove the goat, who was conducted from station to station by appointed guards. The distance was twelve Roman miles. The end of the stretch was a precipice, over which the goat was thrust backwards, and thus killed. Along the route, at distances, on heights, and in more or less constant correspondence with the Pretender, for whose sake he had suffered so much. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, but no inscription marks the grave. He was a man of a restless and pugnacious character, and of great surface talent: he had perfect taste, but no conviction, great wit and power of combination, but no learning. He was always wrong; but the mass, which is caught by its prejudices and dragged along by its passions, always declared him right. Confusion was the result of his work. He left four volumes of Sermons, London, 1746; four volumes of Correspondence, London, 1783–87, and a number of controversial pamphlets. See Stackhouse, Memoirs of Atturby, 1727, and article in Encyclopaedia Britannica, written by Lord Macaulay.

ATOMIC, b. at Sebasté, in Armenia; repaired early on the day previous to the Day of Atonement, each man takes a cock, and each woman a hen, and, swinging it three times about the head, they each exclaim, May this cock (hen) shall go to death that I may go into the life of the blessed with all Israel. Amen." The fowls are then killed, and given to the poor, or else kept, and their value given.
Arsaces, died Nov. 5, 405, and, after four months of intrigue, Atticus, a friend of Origen, and Chrysostom of Constantineople in March, 406, which position he held till his death (Oct. 10, 429). For a long time he refused to place the name of Chrysostom on the diptychs of the church, but at last he was frightened into submission by the public indignation. Four letters of his and still extant of which one to Cyril, given by Nicephorus (VII. 23), is very characteristic.

ATTO, or HATTO, Bishop of Vercelli, Piedmont, d. about 900; left a number of works, interesting as belonging to the darkest period of the history of the Western Church. They are: I. Statuta Ecclesiae Vercellensis, mostly consisting of extracts from older collections, but important to a correct understanding of the state of ecclesiastical affairs at that time. II. De Persuasionibus Ecclesiasticis, complaining that ecclesiastics are summoned before secular courts; that princely exercise influence on the election of bishops; that the revenues of vacant episcopal sees are seized by the State, etc. III. Polypticus (πολυπτυχος), from its variegated contents) consists of an enumeration of virtues and vices. IV. A commentary to the Epistles of Paul, mostly composed of extracts from Jerome and other Fathers. V. Letters and sermons. Some of these works were incorporated by D'Arcy in his Spicilegium, T. VIII. A collected edition was given by Buranti del Signore, Vercelli, 1708, 2 vols., fol. In manuscript Atto's works are found in the library of the Vatican and in the archives of Vercelli.

AUBERLEN, Karl August, b. at Fellbach, near Stuttgart, Nov. 19, 1824; d. at Basel, May 2, 1861; studied in the Seminary of Blaubeuren (1837-41), and theology at the University of Tübingen (1841-44); travelled in 1846-47 through Germany, Belgium, and Holland, and became in 1849 "repetent" in theology at the University of Tübingen, and in 1851 professor of theology in Basel. As a young man he was much attracted by the Goethe-Hegel views of life, and very enthusiastic for the criticism of Baur; but the influence of Richard Rothe, who wrote the preface to his first book, afterwards brought him in a more direct and intimate connection with biblical Christianity, and he finally settled down as a member of the old Württemberg circle of theologians. — Bengel, Oetinger, Roos, etc. He published his first work, Die Theosophie Oetingeri, Tübingen, 1817, when he was only twenty-three years of age. Then followed, Der Prophet Daniel und die Offenbarung Johannis, Basel, 1834, translated into English, "The Prophetic of Daniel and the Revelation," by Adolph Saphir, Edinburgh, 1836: it is not a commentary, but a sketch of the philosophy of history according to the Bible, and exercised a deep and wide-spread influence. A second or revised ed. of the German appeared in 1857. In 1891 he published the first volume of Der göttliche Offenbarung, an apologetical work, translated into English by Professor Hackett in Bibliotheca Sacra, 1865. A volume of sermons appeared in 1843; a volume of lectures, in 1853.

AUBERTIN, Edme, b. at Chalons-sur-Marne, 1596; d. in Paris, April 15, 1632; was appointed minister to the reformed congregation of Chartres 1018, and of Paris 1527; and published L'Eucharistie de l'ancienne Eglise (2d ed., Geneva, 1633), which attracted much attention, and caused a great deal of controversy.

AUBIGNÉ, Théodore-Agrippa d'; b. near Pons, in Saintonge, Feb. 8, 1532; d. in Geneva, May 9, 1639; grew up under very strong impressions of the persecutions to which the Huguenots were exposed. His first tutor, Jean Cottin, was burnt at Rouen for heresy; his second tutor, Jean Morel, had a brother burnt for the same reason. On the scaffold on which several Protestants had been decapitated, the old D'Aubigné made the son swear that he would hate Romanism as long as he lived, etc. When fifteen years old, he entered a Huguenot regiment, and fought with great distinction in the wars which ended with accession to the throne of Henry IV. After the abjuration of the king, D'Aubigné retired to his estates in Saintonge, and devoted himself to literary work; but, after the death of Henry IV., his position became more and more difficult, and in 1620 he was compelled to leave the country, and seek refuge in Geneva. His two principal works are: Les Tragiques, an epic poem in nine thousand verses, first published in 1616, entirely forgotten during the eighteenth century, but recently republished in three editions, —1857, 1872, and 1876; and L'Histoire Universelle, treating in prose the same subject as Les Tragiques does in verse: namely, the history of his time from 1550 to 1610. The latter work has had the same fate as the former. Not much read in the days of its publication, and afterwards entirely overlooked, it is now reckoned among the valuable and interesting fruits of French history. Cf. Mémoires de D'Aubigné, préface par Lud. Lalanne, Paris, 1854.

AUBURN THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. This school for the education of candidates for the ministry of the Presbyterian Church is in Auburn, N.Y., midway between Albany and Buffalo, and was established by the Synod of Geneva in the year 1819, and chartered by the Legislature of the State the 14th of April of the year following. The Act of Incorporation contains the proviso that "no student of any Christian denomination shall be excluded from a participation in the privileges of the institution on account of his religious persuasion." The seat of the seminary was fixed at Auburn in consequence of a liberal contribution by the citizens towards its endowment. A finely situated piece of ground, including some ten acres, was furnished, which, by the growth of the city, has now become quite central. Upon this ground there was erected in the years 1820 and '1821 the original seminary building, afterwards enlarged at a cost of about forty thousand dollars. It included a chapel and lecture-rooms, and dormitories for sixty or seventy students. In 1839, however, the standard of architectural beauty and convenience now desired in public edifices for similar purposes. These defects were remedied by the erection, in the years 1871 and 1875, of Morgan Hall, the beautiful and complete building now used. It is 188 feet in breadth and sixteen feet long by forty-five wide, faces east and west, and provides accommodation for seventy-six students, each having a parlor and bedroom. The whole building is heated by steam, and supplied with gas and water. The lower floor is arranged for a refectory, at which the students board in common, making arrangements for themselves, by association in a club.

The cost of this hall was about a hundred thousand dollars of which three-fourths was a donation of Col. Edwin B. Morgan of Aurora. Col. Morgan also furnished one half the cost of the DODGE AND MORGAN LIBRARY on the opposite side of the seminary quadrangle; the other half having been previously offered by the Hon. William E. Dodge of New York city. The entire cost of this building, which is one of the finest for its purpose in the country, and is shelved for sixty thousand volumes, was forty thousand dollars.

Students. — The first class of students was graduated from the seminary in 1824. The total of graduates down to the present time (1880) is about eleven hundred. The students engage in evangelistic labors during their course of study, so far as possible; while the cultivation of their own religious life is carefully provided for by weekly meetings for prayer and exhortation, both in common and by the separate classes. Worship is conducted every evening in the chapel, and every lecture or recitation is opened with prayer. The classes in the seminary are senior, middle, and junior; and the course of instruction extends over three years.

Government of the Seminary. — The Auburn Theological Seminary is regarded as the property of the Presbyterian Church. Its financial administration is vested in a body of trustees, who hold the real and personal estate under the provisions of the charter. These trustees are elected by the "commissioners," who compose the co-ordinate body administering the affairs of the seminary. This chamber consists of a representation of two clergymen and one layman from each of the presbyteries constituting the synods of Albany, Central New York, Geneva, and Western New York. These presbyteries are at present nineteen in number; and the board of commissioners consists of of about one hundred leading members. The commissioners appoint the professors, and, with the concurrence of the trustees, make all necessary appropriations of funds. Each commissioner holds office for three years; one going out, and the presbytery supplying his place by a new election, each year. A body of "examiners," composed of the senior commissioners of each presbytery, attend at the annual examination of the classes at the end of the seminary year in May.

Departments. — The board of instruction in the seminary at present consists of five professors in the several departments of Christian theology, church history and government, biblical criticism, study of the Hebrew language and literature, and the chair of sacred rhetoric and pastoral theology. Each professor, on his inauguration, delivers an address, and subscribes the following pledge: "In presence of the omniscient and heart-searching God I do solemnly and sincerely affirm and declare that I believe the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments to be the word of God, and the only infallible rule of faith and practice; that I do receive and adopt the confession of faith and the catechisms of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America as containing the system of doctrines taught in the Holy Scriptures; that I do approve of the government and discipline of the Presbyterian Church as prescribed in the "form of government and discipline of the Presbyterian Church in these United States; and I do solemnly promise to maintain with zeal and fidelity the truths of the gospel, and to be diligent and faithful in all such duties as may devolve upon me as a professor in this seminary, according to the best of my abilities." This pledge indicates unmistakably that the founders of this institution were heartily and unreservedly Calvinistic in doctrine, and Presbyterian in their views of the church. The first corps of professors was drawn from New Jersey, and consisted of divines warmly in sympathy with the seminary at Princeton. Their successors ever since have belonged to the school of the most thoroughly developed evangelical theology. No leaven of Pelagianism or Arminianism has ever found its way into this school.

This statement is rendered necessary by the misconception, somewhat prevalent at one time, that Auburn Seminary was founded in the interest of a loose subscription to the confession of faith, and was designed to be the organ of what was known as the "New-School" type of doctrine. Nothing can be a more emphatic disproof of this idea than the contents of the famous "AUBURN DECLARATION." — SAMUEL MILES HOPKINS.

AU Auburn Declaration. — The "Exscinding Acts," so called, by which the churches within the bounds of the synods of Utica, Geneva, and Geneseo, and the Western Reserve, were declared to be "neither in form nor in fact a part of the Presbyterian Church," were passed by the General Assembly in May of the year 1837. On the 17th of August following, a convention of representatives from all the presbyteries in these synods assembled in Auburn to justify themselves against the charges of unsoundness in the faith, and set forth the views in theology they actually held. It consisted of about one hundred divines, and a number of distinguished laymen. Of this convention, the Rev. Dr. James Richards, professor of theology in Auburn Seminary, was, with eminent fitness, made president. As the basis for the "Exscinding Acts," a paper had been presented to the General Assembly containing a list of sixteen heresies alleged to be held by the "New-School" churches. The first of them was this, "that God would have been glad to prevent the existence of sin in our world, but was not able without destroying the moral agency of man; or that, for aught that appears in the Bible, sin is incidental to any wise, moral system." The divines of the Auburn Convention disavowed for themselves and their churches the "heresy" charged, and replied as follows: "We believe that God permitted the introduction of sin, not because he was unable to prevent it consistently with the moral freedom of creatures, but for wise and benevolent reasons which he has not revealed." In replying to the other charges of heresy, the Auburn Convention pronounced fully in the sense of the Westminster Symbols. With a perhaps unconscious Supralapsarianism, they put the doctrine of election first in order, and ranged all the other facts in the process of redemption after it; so the arrangement suggests that it was the primary purpose of God to save a definite number of men out of a race to be thereafter created; that in pursuance of this purpose man was formed, the fall decreed, and an atonement provided sufficient to meet the case of that predestined number, and no others. No affirmation of the universality of the atonement is found among these sixteen propositions. Original sin, total depravity, vicarious atonement, Christ's intercession for the elect previous to their conversion, absolute dependence upon irresistible divine grace for the renewal of the heart, instantaneous regeneration, etc., all these dogmas are emphatically affirmed. "All who are saved are indebted from first to last to the grace and Spirit of God." "The reason why God does not save all" (the thirteenth proposition affirms) "is not that he wants the power to do it, but that in his wisdom he does not see fit to exert that power further than he actually does. In short, the Auburn Declaration, contrary to the popular belief on the subject, rises well up to the highest-water mark of the Calvinistic theology.

This declaration, it is true, has no symbolical force in Western New York or any other part of the Presbyterian Church. No one is required to subscribe it as a test of his soundness in the faith; but at the same time, having been adopted under circumstances so peculiar, and at so critical a time in the history of these churches, it had the effect of pledges them irresolutely to a loyal adherence to the Westminster Confession. It consolidated the excised portion of the church, invigorated its Presbyterianism, made it jealous of any deviation from doctrinal purity, and placed it in a position to challenge before the highest courts of the country any impeachment of its ecclesiastical standing. From that time there has been a part of the church purer in doctrine, or stricter in government and discipline, than that which in 1837 was abruptly reduced to ordinary privileges and reduced the court to ordinary limits again; and in this form, approved by Valentinian III. (452), it has passed into the Justinian Code, and in the Orient, at a later day, came into greater prominence and authority. In the West, long before Constantine, the Audienzia Episcopalis was familiar, even to the heretical though Christian barbarians. AUDIN, Vincent, b. at Lyons 1793; d. in Paris, Feb. 21, 1851; studied first theology in the seminary of Argentière, afterwards law, but devoted himself finally to literature, and wrote: Histoire de la Saint-Barthélemy, 1826; Histoire de Luther, 1839, 3 vols.; Histoire de Calvijn, 2 vols., 1841; Histoire de Henri VIII., 1847; and Histoire de Léon X., 1851.

AUGER, Edmond, b. in La Brie, France, 1530; d. on a voyage to Rome, 1591; entered the Society of Jesus in 1552; was professor to Henry III. in 1575, and wrote the celebrated Catholicisme Français. See his Life by Bailly, Paris, 1852, and by Doriguy, Lyons, 1716, reprinted Avignon, 1828.

AUGSBURG, Confession of. Jan. 21, 1530, the Emperor Charles V. issued letters from Bologna, inviting the German diet to meet in Augsburg April 8, for the purpose of discussing and deciding various important questions.—the war with the Turks, the religious dissensions, etc. As soon as the letter, which was written in very moderate and conciliatory terms, came to hand (March 11), the Elector of Saxony, the head of the Protestant party, on the advice of his chancellor, Dr. Brück, summoned the principal Protestant theologians—Luther, Melanchthon, Jonas, etc.—to meet him at Torgau, and charged them with the preparation of a confession of the Protestant faith, to be laid before the emperor at the diet. Melanchthon drew up the document on the basis of earlier labors of a similar kind by Luther, and it received the unconditional assent of the latter. It was then signed, not only by the Elector of Saxony, the Margrave of Brandenburg, the Duke of Lüneburg, the Landgrave of Hesse, the Prince of Anhalt, and the magistrates of Nuremberg and...
AUGSBURG.

Reutlingen, and it was agreed to lay it before the diet as the common confession of the Protestant party. The emperor first demanded that the document should be presented to him in an informal way; but the princes declared that they would not part with it without having it read aloud in the diet. Next the emperor called the session in which the solemnity should take place, not in the large town-hall in which the diet used to meet, but in the small chapel of the archiepiscopal palace, to exclude the public as far as possible. Finally he asked to have it read in Latin; but the elector answered, “We are here on German ground;” and June 25, in the afternoon, it was read aloud to the diet by Dr. Bayer, in German, and so slowly and distinctly that people who had crowded together heard every word. The impression was very deep, even on the Romanists. The original copies of the Confession in Latin and German are lost.

The emperor now ordered the Roman theologians present — Eck, Wimpina, Cochlaeus, etc. — to prepare a “confutation;” but the first draught he rejected as utterly ineffective, and the answer to the Confession of the Protestants was not read in the diet until Sept. 3. A majority immediately declared that the Protestants had been completely confuted, and they were commanded to conform to the Roman views, which, of course, they declined to do. Meanwhile Melanchthon prepared the “Apology of the Confession;” (see below) which Dr. Bruck presented to the emperor Sept. 22, but which the emperor refused to receive. It was then printed and published, both in Latin and German, as was also the Confession. It must be noticed, however, that the Confession was not immediately established among the Lutherans as a symbolical book. On the contrary, Melanchthon continued to make changes in it, and thus arose an editio caritata and an editio invariata. At the disputation of Worms (1541) Eck called attention to this fact, and in 1561 Flacius denounced the editio caritata as altogether too favorable to the Calvinistic views. It is the editio invariata which was taken as basis for the Formula Concordia, and which has become the chief symbolical book of the Lutheran Church.

AUGSBURG CONFESSION, Apology of the, prepared by Melanchthon, at the instance of the Lutherans as a refutation of the Roman confutation of the Augsburg Confession, read in the diet, Sept. 3, 1530. The Apology was presented to the diet, although not signed by the Lutheran princes, through Chancellor Brück, Sept. 22, but refused. On the 23d Melanchthon left Augsburg, re-wrote the document on his journey, and finished and published it, together with a very free German translation by Justus Jonas, assisted by Melanchthon, at Wittenberg, April, 1531. The original draught has no authority; but the Latin text constitutes a symbolical book of the Lutheran Church. It is seven times as large as the Confession, and greatly superior to it in point of style and learning. It greatly strengthened the confidence of scholars in Protestantism. Its chief value to-day is as an authoritative commentary upon the Augsburg Confession. The books mentioned above contain it.

AUGSBURG, Interim of. After the Smalkaldian war, Charles V. once more thought of re-establishing religious unity in Germany; and at the diet of Augsburg (1547) it was agreed that a provisional arrangement should be made until the Council of Trent had completed its work. The plan to this provisional arrangement, the Interim, was prepared by Pflug, Bishop of Naumburg, Michel Hedio, and Agricola, but was rejected, both by the pope and by the Protestant princes. Nevertheless, after being revised and altered by some Spanish monks, it became a law of the empire (May 15, 1548), and was introduced by force of arms. Of the Protestant princes, only Joachim of Brandenburg and Ludwig of the Palatinate accepted it: the others met it with energetic opposition.

AUGSBURG, The Peace of, was concluded Sept. 25, 1555, and ended the religious question of Germany. The principle of this arrangement was the famous maxim, Cujus regio, hujus religio; that is, the sovereign had the choice between the Augsburg Confession and the Roman Church; and as he chose, all his subjects had to choose. There was no freedom of conscience, but a kind of freedom of territory. People were allowed to move from one state in which their religion was not the religion of the sovereign to another in which it was. Though this arrangement was a most miserable compromise, it was, nevertheless, a great defeat of the policy of Charles V., who had labored all his life to restore the religious unity of the empire; and he was not present in person at the negotiations, but had transferred all his powers to his brother, King Ferdinand.

AUGUSTI, Johann Christian Wilhelm, b. at Eschenberga, in the Duchy of Saxe-Coburg, Oct. 27, 1772; d. at Coblenz, April 28, 1841; studied theology at Jena, and became professor in Oriental literature there in 1803, professor of theology in Breslaw 1812, in Bonn 1819, and director of the Consistory of Coblenz in 1828. He was a very active man and a very prolific writer. Among his works are, Denkwürdigkeiten aus der christlichen Archäologie, 12 vols., Leipzig, 1817–31; Lehrbuch d. chr. Dogmengeschichte, Leipzig, 1825; Einleitung in d. alt. Testament, Leipzig, 1827. The most generally used of his works is Handbuch der christlichen Archäologie, Leipzig, 1836–39, 3 vols. He also assisted De Wette in translating the Bible into German (1809–14).

AUGUSTINE, St., Bishop of Hippo. See AUGUSTINUS.

AUGUSTINE, or AUSTIN, St., the first Archbishop of Canterbury: nothing is known of his early life. In 560, when he was the abbot of the monastery of St. Andrew at Rome, Gregory the Great (590–604), who for many years had taken deep interest in the English, sent him at the head of forty of his monks to England to convert the Anglo-Saxons. They met so many obstacles on their way to the coast, that they returned, and asked to be excused. But Gregory sent them and they landed in the Isle of Thanet. Ethelbert, the Saxon king, had married a Christian. Bertha, a daughter of Charibert, King of Paris, twenty years before; and thus the way was providentially opened. Ethelbert was baptised (597), and his tribe was Christianized. Augustine went to Arles, whose metropolitan consecrated him the first Archbishop of Canterbury. A deputation he sent to tell Gregory the good news returned laden with presents, and bearing the pailinus, which made Augustine independent of the bishops of France. Gregory's dream of converting the entire island to the Roman Church was not realized. The British bishops of Cornwall and Wales refused to obey the Roman bishop. But though unsuccessfully in a measure, much had been accomplished when, in 604 or 605, Augustine died.

He was afterwards canonized on the ground of a reputed miracle, curing a Saxon of his blindness.

AUGUSTINE, Sister (Amalie von Lasaulz). b. at Coblenz, Oct. 19, 1813; d. in the Hospital of Vallendar, Jan. 28, 1872; entered the mother-house of the Sisters of Charity at Nancy in 1838, but felt herself drawn towards an active life of charity, mercy, and self-sacrifice, rather than towards the monotonous devotion of the monastery, and labored from 1842 to 1849 in the Hospital of Aix-la-Chapelle, from 1849 to 1871 as Superioress of the Hospital of St. John at Bonn. In the Schleswig-Holstein and Austro-Prussian wars of 1864 and 1866 she distinguished herself by her great talent of organization; and her charity, mercy, and self-sacrifice, rather than the rules for the nuns of Hippo. When and where the so-called rules of Augustine originated is uncertain; but they belong, at any rate, not to him. Similar communities were often formed in Italy, such as the John-Bonites, the Hermits of Tuscany, the Brittinians, etc., of which especially the last-mentioned distinguished themselves by a high degree of austerity. These communities were united by Innocent IV., who, by a bull of Jan. 17, 1244, gave them the rules of St. Augustine. Alexander IV. was very anxious to further consolidate the union. Launfrac Septala of Milan was made general of the order; and four provincials, respectively for Italy, Spain, France, and Germany, were appointed. By a bull of April 13, 1256, the whole organization was sanctioned. After this time the order spread rapidly. In the beginning of the fifteenth century it numbered forty-two provinces, besides the vicarates of India and Moravia, two thousand monasteries, and thirty thousand monks. In 1567 Pius V. gave it the same rank and privileges as the mendicant orders.

The Augustinian nuns formed their first community at Hippo, under Perpetua, the sister of Augustine. An outline of their rule is given in the two hundred and eleventh letter of Augustine. An Augustinian nunnery was founded at Venice in 1177 by Alexander III., which the Princess Julia, a daughter of the Emperor Frederick I., entered as its first abbess. The celebrated Nunnery of Tournay was founded in 1424 by Pierre de Champion.

By degrees, as the order spread and grew rich, laxity and corruption crept in; and, as a re-action, independent congregations were formed at Illiceto and Carbonaria towards the close of the fourteenth century, at Perouse and in the Lombardy in the beginning of the fifteenth century, in Saxony in 1492, etc. At attempt at a radical reform was made in Portugal by Thomas a Jesus, who died in 1536. A new formation of the congregation of the Barefooted Augustini ans. Their rules were first introduced in the Monastery of Talavera. Their organization was finally completed, and confirmed by Gregory XV. in 1622. They spread much in Japan, the Philippines, Peru, etc. In Spain every province had a hermitage, to which those who wished to live as anchorites could retire, and find perfect solitude and seclusion. Johann Staupitz, well known in connection with Luther, became vicar-general of the order in Germany in 1515; but it was just Luther's appearance, which in Germany brought the order in speedy decadence. In the nineteenth century a great number of the monasteries of the order have been secularized; in 1850, however, there were still about one hundred left in Italy and France.

W. Clebus (Zöckler).
AUGUSTINUS, Aurelius, Bishop of Hippo-Regius. Sketch of his Life— He was the son of Patricius, a heathen, and Monica, a most devoted Christian, at Tagaste (Tajelt), in Numidia, Nov. 13, 353, and died at Hippo, North Africa, Aug. 28, 430. To Monica he owed his warm, loving nature; and by her prayers he was converted. His early life was unsettled. After learning the rudiments in his native place, his ambitious father, delighted with his progress, sent him to his sixteenth year, to Carthage, where he studied for three years. The now lost Hortensius of Cicero awoke his love of truth; and he began to study the Bible, but soon gave it up because its style displeased him. From this time until his conversion he restlessly strove to attain the highest good, but failed, although he found for a time satisfaction in various schools of thought. Manichaeism first allured him; and from 373 to 383 he was one of the auditors, or catechumens, in that sect. But the immorality of the electi, who were supposed to be saints, and the perceived shallowness of the system, drove him and a while into scepticism, from which, however, Neo-Platonism saved him. Meanwhile he taught rhetoric in Tagaste and in Carthage—where he published his first work, The Fit and the Fair, in 380—and in Rome. As a teacher he was not successful in maintaining order, nor in making money; yet the ability he evinced induced Symmachus, the Prefect of Rome, to send him to Milan in answer to a request for a professor of rhetoric. There he heard Ambrose; and there, too, he was converted (September, 386), at the age of thirty-three, and was baptized at Milan Easter Eve, April 25, 387. On the journey homeward Monica died, at Ostia; and the sorrow thereby caused is renewed to each reader of the Confessions. Disposing of his property, he began in Tagaste an ascetic life; but in 391 he was elected priest to the church of Hippo-Regius, and in 395 became the colleague of Bishop Valerius, and shortly after full bishop. If the romance of his life was in the early period, the value of it was in the later. From his diocese a relentless war was waged upon every heresy. Manichaeans and Donatists, Pelagians and Semi-Pelagians, fell under his blows; and the writings he produced amid the heat of these controversies have made him immortal, and have tempered the theology of all after-time. But his two most celebrated and interesting works are the Confessions—in which he reviewed his life up to the time of his conversion so humbly, so honestly, so wonderfully, that the book is a religious classic as well as the most reliable autobiography—and the City of God, in which he showed that the Church of Christ is the survivor of the wreck of Rome, and thus sent comfort to those, who, with Jerome, mournfully exclaimed, “Who is safe when Rome falls?” The closing years of Augustine’s life were troubled. He saw the Vandals overrunning North Africa, and was compelled to lead in the desperate defence of Hippo. But God mercifully took him away ere the city fell, and spared him a great grief. In the beginning of the sixteenth century his remains were carried from Hippo to Sar- dinia; in the beginning of the eighteenth century Liutprand, King of the Lombards, interred them in the Church of St. Peter in Pavia, where they remained until Oct. 12, 1841, when the Bishop of Pavia formally gave them over to the Bishop of Algiers, who carried them to Hippo, which was near the present Bona, and buried them there within a memorial chapel, Oct. 30, 1841.

Augustine is himself the source of all our knowledge of his sinful life before his conversion. He joined a dissolute company of youths when he was sixteen (Conf. II., 4, 0); and before he was nineteen he was the father of a son, Adeodatus (God-given), by his mistress (IV., 2, 2). For twelve years they lived together, mutually faithful; and he says his heart was “racked, and wounded, and bleeding,” when he sent her back to Africa, because she stood in the way of his marriage. His early life was unsettled. After his conversion as he could not have done had he not known from long and bitter experience, that he who sinneth against God wroth himself, his own soul. But in judging him we must bear in mind that he was at the time a heathen, and comparatively innocent, according to heathen standards of morality. After his conversion, he not only renounced all illicit intercourse, but devoted himself to a single life, for the sake of the kingdom of God, and never broke his vow.

Augustine is one of the doctors of the Universal Church. He is, perhaps, the most prominent leader in the development of doctrine, and to many the successor of the apostles. Luther and Calvin, in the doctrines of sin and grace, are essentially Augustinian. The Protestant emulates the Romanist in paying him honor. But, though a fountain of sweet water, he gave out bitter water too; for many of the errors of Rome, he inherited. Manicheism and Donatism, the doctrines of the church, tradition, baptismal regeneration, and the right of persecution, can be either traced directly to him, or deduced from his writings. He was pre-eminent a preacher; was in the habit of composing rapidly; and so, if many of his works were very deliberately written, many more were not, and the necessity of making up his mind quickly may have weakened his judgment. Although he was not a scholar like Jerome, for he knew little Greek and no Hebrew, he had a deeper spiritual insight into the Scriptures than any other of the Fathers. Genius, more than learning, gave him light. With all his defects, he claims the reverence of the world. Never was a man more determined and fearless in the defence of the truth; never breathed a purer, nobler spirit. The pride of the mother in her converted son is the pride of Christendom in the devotion of his splendid intellect and marvellous executive ability to the service of Christ. To understand Augustine is to understand all the preceding history of philosophy and theology, and at the same time the sources of subsequent progress. Thus he is the dividing line between the Church of the persecution and the Church of the empire. He ended the old, and began the new period of her development.

Bibliography.— Augustine's writings may be divided into— (a) Autobiographical: Confessions, Retractions, and Letters; (b) Polemical: treatises against the Manichæans, the Donatists, and Pelagians and Semi-Pelagians; (c) Dogmatical: Enchiridion, and other doctrinal treatises; (d) Exegetical: Commentaries upon large portions of the Bible; (e) Practical: sermons and ethical treatises.

Theology of Augustine.— For a comprehensive review and criticism of Augustine's theology see A. Dorner: Augustinus, sein theologisches System und seine religions-philosophische Auschau.
an entire union is possible only at the cost of one nature or the other. Both natures, he thinks, stand by themselves, or only speak together in the Person. The human nature assumed as much divinity as possible, but did not give up its humanity. A complete revelation of the Word is impossible, because the divine cannot appear completely in the human. His formulae were decisive for Leo, also for Chalcedon (451), and of great weight for all subsequent investigations.

(3) Doctrine of the Eucharist. — It is the meal through which the recipient is incorporated into the body of Christ, — the church, — and so into Christ. The sacrifice offered up in the Supper was the self-sacrifice of the corpus, the church. It cannot be proved that he taught the doctrine of the Real Presence: "since he did not allow omnipresence to the body of Christ, understanding the expression figuratively of the church.

(4) Doctrine of Sin. — Seeking to exclude both Manichean and Pelagian one-sidedness, he accepted man's inability through sin, and contracted as much as possible to the will. Evil is privation, negation, and a weakening of all spiritual power, particularly of the will: good is positive, and the effect of God's activity. He only allows so much liberty of choice as is absolutely necessary to free God from the charge of the authorship of evil of the fall, man made a bad choice, and the consequences are hereditary.
Yet man has the capacity of salvation, since the natura is not itself bad, only impaired; the intelligence is sunk in ignorantia, and the will in infirmitas. In Adam the race had a sort of predestination, the will in the one, the predetermination in the other. This opposes the Pelagian idea of an equilibrium, — the ability to turn in either direction. Sin in the genus is shared by every individual. Punishment and guilt are therefore hereditary. The former was the necessary and natural consequence of sin, and at the same time the exhibition of the divine righteousness, its ground was guilt. Yet God angers not, for he is unchangeable. He simply orders that sinful man as the weaker shall, according to the laws of Nature, come under the power of the Devil as the stronger. This captivity is as hereditary as sin, and so the race has been since the fall a massa perditionis.

(5) Doctrine of Grace. — Grace exists only in the activity of God upon the will and intelligence, giving them a new direction. Grace inspires the subject directly, but only in the line of his natural ability. Redemption is deliverance from the power and authority of the Devil, death, and sin. Christ paid a ransom to the Devil, and wrought complete deliverance from punishment, and at the same time from the infirmity of intellect and will. Thus he brings unto prominence the activity of God among men, especially in the impartation of love and knowldge. But this conception of justification is quite different from the Reformers; viz., deliverance from guilt, by which access is opened unto God. He lays no such stress upon guilt in its immediate relation to God, because he does not make enough of personality. He makes salvation depend upon the action of God upon the powers of the soul. Therefore the relation of justification to sanctification is of secondary importance, and the main thing is to determine how far the human and divine powers respectively operate in conversion.

(6) Doctrine of Predestination. — God deter-dined some, he says, of the number of the elect and who shall not. The elect are chosen that they may receive his grace: for in consequence of the fall all have forfeited this favor, and no claim can be made by any upon it; but God is willing to bestow it upon some. No one can tell whether he is of the number or not. On Christ, as the First-Elect, all depends. This is according to the predetermined plan. In God's eyes the predesti-one is a filius pacis before his actual conversion.
The plan of God embraces all events. The doctrine of predestination includes the idea of its historical application, which is effected by external causes. And because the ordinances of religion, etc., are external causes, therefore we should despair of none, but labor on the suppostion of their predestination. The non-predesti-nated are justly rejected because they refuse the to the church. Preaching and the Lord's Supper is a double sort of faith, so the conception of the Church is double. On the practical side, it is the objective institution for salvation; while, on the mystical side, it is the community of the predestined. The visible Church has good and bad elements. He commonly, however, views the Church in its eternal aspects. Out of it there is no salvation, because in it alone are the Holy Spirit and the means of grace. Ordination infallibly imparts the Spirit: therefore the priest is distinguished from the layman as one who can mediate the grace of God, and offer the eucharist.
The individual is linked, not only to the whole body, but also to the priest as the representative of the body. In like manner the validity of baptism is independent of the baptizer. Heretics and schismatics can baptize, but only as one uses stolen goods; for baptism has its blessing only in the Church. Preaching and the Lord's Supper are also similarly dependent for their blessing upon the Church. Membership in the visible Church is a condition of salvation, and unbaptized infants are damned. The Church through her priests shares in the divine Spirit and con-ple holiness. Thus Augustine teaches essentially the Roman Catholic idea of the Church.

Augustine's Ethics. He lays little stress upon nature and science, property, marriage, the family, and the state: in short, he regards all earthly things as comparatively worthless. On the other hand, he regards the cloister life as the very summit of piety. But this is only one side of his ethics. God's worldly activity is concentrated in the visible Church. The ethical sphere, which belongs to the transient, and is eaten into by sin, can only be purified by the Church. Marriage, the foundation of the family, must be a sacrament, so that it may receive the consecration of the Church. To give property to the Church is a meritorious work. Science must be kept in the right way by the Church. The State can be looked at as a morally worthy institution only when placed at the disposal of the Church.

It is erroneous to credit Augustine with the ideas caustive of the Reformation. The emphasis upon the moral personality, from whence arise the need for a pure conscience; the emphasis upon guilt and the consciousness of guilt; the striving after immediate certainty of salvation; the central position of the doctrine of justification, and the clear distinction between the legal and the evangelical stand-points,—all these are wanting in him. But his anti-Pelagian writings and his doctrines of sin and grace had a very marked influence upon the reformers, who esteemed him above all other fathers.

He must, however, be credited with recognizing, as no one before him had done, the world-conquering might of Christianity. Discarding the old notion that the world moved in sions, Augustine looked beyond the present, and saw adown the great gallery of time the grand consummation, when the many kingdoms of the world shall become the one kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ; and the Eternal City, fully established, is not heathen Rome, but the "City of God," the New Jerusalem!

AUGUST DORNER.

AURELIAN. Roman emperor 270–275, was, according to an old tradition in the church, the author of the ninth of those ten great persecutions generally spoken of by Christian writers. This tradition, however, seems to rest upon a misapprehension. In his church history (VII., 30), to which all later accounts can be referred as to their source, Eusebius says only, that, towards the close of his reign, the emperor changed his views of the Christians, and was about to act upon this change when he died. He speaks neither of the actual issue of an edict, nor of its execution, but simply of a purpose, a plan; and this corresponds better to the character of the man and to the given situation. Aurelian was a soldier, and much occupied with military affairs during his reign; and though he was much devoted to his parental faith, even to its superstitions, Christianity held, since the time of Gallinus, a publicly guaranteed position in the state, which he did not dream of as a plan of a general persecution rather improbable.

AURELIUS, Marcus. See Marcus Aurelius. AURICULAR CONFESSION (Lat. auricula, the external ear), confession into the ear of a priest in private, enjoined by Leo the Great (410-461) as a substitute for public confession. The twenty-first canon of the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), under Innocent III., makes it obligatory every year upon all Catholics, on pain of excommunication, and consequently the loss of Christian burial. See CONFESSION.

AURIFABER, Johann (Vinarieus), b. in 1519, probably in the county of Mansfeld; d. at Erfurt, Nov. 18, 1575; studied theology in Wittenberg, and became Luther's famulus, and afterwards court-preacher in Weimar, and minister in Erfurt. He partook with great zeal in the theological controversies of his time, but became most widely known as an editor of Luther's works. He was one of the superintendents of the Jena edition (1553-58), and published two volumes of Luther's German works (1561-62, two volumes of Luther's Latin letters in 1556 and 1565, and Tischreden oder Colloquia Dr. Martin Luthers in 1568.

AUSTIN, St., a contraction of Augustine frequently used. See Augustine, St.

AUSTRALASIA. This is etymologically equivalent to Southern Asia; but correct usage limits it to the Continent of Australia, the Island of Tasmania, the Islands of New Zealand, and the small islands near each of the colonies. The mainland is bounded on the north by Torres Straits, the Gulf of Carpentaria, and the Indian Ocean; on the east by the South Pacific; on the south by Bass Strait, which separates it from Tasmania; and on the west by the Indian Ocean. It is situated to the south-east of Asia, between the parallels of 10° and 39° south latitude, and in east longitude between the meridians of 113° and 154°. Its greatest length is about twenty-four hundred miles: its greatest breadth is nearly two thousand miles. It has a coast line of 7,750 miles in length. The area is three million square miles, or nearly six times as large as India, or four-fifths the size of Europe, or almost half that of South America.

Position of the Colonies. — The whole of the eastern part of the Australian Continent consists of three colonies, — Queensland, in the north, with Brisbane as its capital; New South Wales, south of Queensland, having Sydney for capital; Victoria, south-west of New South Wales, Melbourne being the metropolis. To the west lies South Australia, stretching from ocean to ocean, the northern part of which is now known as the Northern Territory. The capital of South Australia is Adelaide. The whole of the western part is occupied by Western Australia; capital, Perth. Tasmania is one hundred and twenty miles south of Victoria, across Bass Strait, and is surrounded by the South Pacific Ocean: Hobart Town (called since 1880 Hobart) is the capital. The islands of New Zealand are to the south-east of the Australian Continent, twelve hundred miles distant, Wellington being the capital.

General Features. — The exact date of the discovery of Australia is doubtful. In 1606 Dutch sailors explored the north and west coasts. In 1842 Abel Tonnson discovered Tasmania and New Zealand. Capt. Cook's well-known explorations began in 1770. The first settlement was that of New South Wales, in 1788, from which nearly all the neighboring colonies were planted. Tasmania, or Van Dieman’s Land, was settled in 1803; Western Australia, or Swan River, in 1829; Queensland, or Moreton Bay, in 1825; Victoria, then known as Port Philip, in 1834; South Australia, 1836; New Zealand, 1838. The precise number of aboriginal inhabitants in early times is not known. They have been fast disappearing before the advance of civilization, and indeed, the Tasmanians are now extinct. The Maories of New Zealand are much superior mentally and physically to the native races of the neighboring colonies. The general characteristics of the continent and islands are now pretty well ascertained. The districts, whether near the coast and the settled parts inland are fertile, but large tracts of the interior are unfit for occupation. Navigable channels are comparatively few; and the alternation of rainy and rainless periods, of flood and drought, is destructive. In these respects New Zealand and Tasmania are more favorably situated. The seasons are the reverse of those in Europe and America, June being midwinter. The hot winds and dust in summer are trying on the continent, but during the greater part of the year the climate is genial and healthy. The mean temperature ranges from 70° in Queensland to 51° in Tasmania. The kangaroo and the opossum are the best known of the numerous marsupials of Australia. Snakes are plentiful, and sharks abound along the coast. Each colony is a sort of distinct province, having a governor and Houses of Parliament of its own, on the model of the British Constitution. Wool is the grand staple product, mining and agricultural interests probably ranking next. In 1788 the first settlement consisted of about a thousand persons; in 1839 the population, including Tasmania and New Zealand, was about a million; in 1877, two million and a half. It is now, at the beginning of 1881, probably about three millions. In railway, telegraph, and postal arrangements, Australia has rapidly advanced; and there are three lines of subsidized mail steamers between the colonies and Great Britain.

The social condition of the people compares not unfavorably with that of England and America. In regard to education the colonies are thoroughly impressed with their responsibilities. The public-school system is generally unsectarian, free, and compulsory; while the higher training is admirably provided for by numerous colleges and well-equipped universities. There is no Established Church; and State aid to religion is now almost wholly abolished. New South Wales ceased to grant it in 1863; Victoria, 1869. The Episcopalian are the most numerous body: the Roman Catholics rank next. The proportion of places of worship of the various sects to the population is remarkable, considering the recent settlement of the colonies.

In the following descriptive details the statistics of each colony are from the latest available official returns. In the absence of an uniform census for the whole group, the figures represent, as the reader will easily note, a more recent date in some cases than in others.

New South Wales. The mother-colony, originally comprised all of the continent east of the 135th meridian; but the formation into separate colonies of South Australia in 1836, of Victoria in 1851, and of Queensland in 1859, has reduced it to a more moderate size. Its area is now given at 323,437 square miles, being about three times that of Great Britain and Ireland. The coast district, which is a strip of varying width, extending back to the Dividing Range, or Blue Mountains, is the chief agricultural, as the interior is the chief pastoral, land of the colony. The loftiest mountains are Kosciusko (7,308 feet), Seaview (6,000 feet), Ben Lomond (5,500 feet), and Oxley’s Peak (4,300 feet). Among the immense level tracts of the interior are the Liverpool and Monaro plains. The great rivers are the Murray, the Murrumbidgee, the Darling, and the Lachlan. On June 30, 1879, the population of New South Wales was estimated at 712,019; that of Sydney and suburbs amounted to 200,000. The other important towns are Maitland, Goulburn, and Bathurst.

Miscellaneous Religious Intelligence. — Rev. Richard Johnson, Church of England, the first clergyman in Australia, arrived 1788. The Rt. Rev. W. G. Broughton was installed first bishop of Australia June 2, 1836. The present (1881) Metropolitan of Australia, who is Bishop of Sydney, is Dr. Frederick Barker. The first Presbyterian Church was opened in 1809. The first Wesleyan class-meeting was held in 1812; the first minister, Rev. Samuel Leigh, arrived 1815. The first Congregational minister, Rev. Mr. Cover, arrived 1798. The first Baptist chapel, founded by Rev. J. Saunders, was opened in 1833. The returns of the principal religious sects for 1878 are as follows:

Victoria. — Till 1851 this colony was part of New South Wales, from which it is separated by the River Murray. Its area is about 88,196 square miles, a little less than that of Great Britain. A range of mountains divides it into two unequal parts, the highest peaks rising to six thousand and seven thousand feet. It has no large rivers; the Gipps-Land streams and the Yarra-Yarra being the only ones of importance. The climate of Victoria is healthy and agreeable; the average temperature is nine degrees higher than in London. Although one of the youngest colonies, Victoria is one of the most important, of the colonies: commercially it is probably next to India among British dependencies. In 1885 the white population was fourteen; in June, 1879, it was 887,434, Melbourne and suburbs numbering 260,678. Ballarat and Sandhurst are the other principal cities. Capt. Cook was the first European who visited the country, April 19, 1770. The first settlement was made in 1788, but in 1851 it had sunk to 2,093; in 1875, to 1,553. It seems that the natives were completely incapable of a rapid civilizational deopment. The religious returns of 1878 showed the chief denominations as follows:

Queensland, formerly known as Moreton Bay, occupies the north-east part of the continent of Australia, comprising 609,220 square miles, or fully three times the area of France. Unlike most of the other colonies, it is well-watered; some of the rivers being broad and navigable. The soil is favorable for the cultivation of tropical productions, such as sugar, coffee, tobacco, olives, rice, and kaolin. Gold, copper, tin, and coal are the chief minerals. The climate resembles that of Madeira: it is very warm, except on the large table-lands, where it is more moderate. The winters are delightful.

Tasmania, formerly called Van Dieman's Land, in honor of the Dutch governor of the East Indies. But it was not settled until 1803, when Gov. King of Sydney sent Lieut. Bowen thither with three soldiers, and ten male and six female convicts. Tasmania thus became a settlement of convicts, but, as a colony of convicts, it is remarkable for its history shows the marks of its origin. Robbery, murder, and fights, not only with the natives, but with escaped convicts, bushrangers, and among the colonists themselves, were for many years the order of the day. In 1825 it was separated from New South Wales, and organized as an independent colony; but in 1842 it had still 20,000 convicts living, besides 50,000 free settlers. And how far it is from having outgrown the disadvantages of its birth may be inferred from the fact, that in 1870 there were 55,939 persons in the colony who could read and write, 13,945 who could only write, and 26,444 who could neither read nor write.

New Zealand.—The group of North, Middle, and Stewart's Islands, of which this colony consists, are almost equal in size to Great Britain and Ireland. The country is of volcanic origin, chains of mountains running from north to south. The climate is, on the whole, free from extremes of heat and cold, and is remarkably healthy. New Zealand is rich in minerals. The grains, grasses, fruits, and vegetables of Great Britain, are successfully cultivated. Marsupials and snakes, common in the other colonies, are not found here. By the census of March, 1878, the population was 414,412, exclusive of the Maories, numbering about 43,000. Various kinds of grain and fruit have been introduced, and succeed exceedingly well. Different species of animals—sheep, cattle, horses, deer, etc.—have also been introduced, and not only thrive well, but even seem to improve. The islands were first visited by Cook in 1770, but the connection with the civilized world is now frequent and rapid. An active mission is carried on among the Maories, but, as it would seem, not with much success. According to the last ecclesiastical returns, which were made in 1874, the numbers were as follows:

AUSTRALIA contains, according to the last census (of 1869) a population of 33,634,636, of which two-thirds, or nearly 24,000,000, belong to the Roman-Catholic Church, 3,941,796 to the Greek Catholic, 3,050,830 to the Non-United Greek, 1,518,282 to the Lutheran, 2,255,113 to the Calvinist, 55,079 to the Unitarian, and 10,133 to the Armenian: 1,375,801 are Jews. The Catholic Church, including the Greek and Armenian Catholics, has sixteen archbishops, forty-seven suffragan bishops, two vicar bishops, one military bishop, and nine hundred and fifty convents, with eighty-five hundred monks, and fifty-seven hundred nuns, — in all about thirty-four thousand ecclesiastics. The Non-United Greek Church has a patriarch in Karlowitz, an archbishop in Hermannstadt, eleven bishops, about four thousand priests, and forty convents, with three hundred monks. The Protestant churches have eighteen superintendencies.

The introduction of Christianity, and the history of the Christian Church, in the various parts of the empire, will be spoken of in the articles on Bohemia, Hungary, Moravia, and Poland.

We speak here only of the church-history of the Archduchy of Austria, and of the general ecclesiastical policy of the empire.

The Archduchy of Austria, inhabited by the Taurisci, a Celtic tribe, belonged partly to Pannonia, partly to Noricum, both provinces of the Roman Empire since the time of Augustus. Hither Christianity was brought by the Roman soldiers and citizens, — from the East by St. Victor, bishop of Hildesheim, and from the West, by St. Severinus (d. 482). Lorch was the oldest episcopal see. Afterwards the country was overrun by various barbaric tribes,—Goths, Huns, Lombards, etc.; and in the time of Charlemagne the Avari were settled to the east of the Ens, and the Bajuvarii to the west. The Avari were converted to Christianity by missionaries from the Frankish Church; and the countship which Charlemagne founded here, and which forms the political nucleus of the Archduchy of Austria, was placed under the ecclesiastical authority of the Archbishop of Salzburg. Influences, however, of the Eastern Church, made themselves felt through Moravia; and during the whole period of the middle ages the Austrian Church seems to have maintained a somewhat free attitude towards Rome. At the close of this period, Turcianus preached against indulgences; the monk Jacob, against relics; Theobaldus, against the life led by the priests. Also was the Reformation at first very successful here. Paul Spenerus preached openly Luther's views in Vienna: the books of the reformers circulated freely; nearly three-fourths of the population accepted the new doctrines: the monasteries stood empty; and in 1590 the Emperor Ferdinand II. had to place the mendicant friars under the protection of the police. But the government was strongly Roman Catholic; and the unfortunate dissensions between the Protestants themselves, which, between the Phillipists and the Flicans, degenerated into unseemly quarrels and fanatical enmity, gave the Jesuits a welcome opportunity. The Emperor Rudolph (1576–1612) was their pupil and their tool. Though, at his accession to the throne, he confirmed the constitutional religious liberty of the country, nevertheless, very soon after, he discharged all officials who held the Protestant faith, abolished the evangelical service in all towns and villages belonging to the imperial domains, forbade religious gatherings without special authorization, and charged Bishop Khlesl with the organization of a complete anti-reformation. The revolt was provoked in 1584, and the revolt was not put down until 1597; but then a committee was sent all through the country to expel the evangelical ministers, and force the Roman priests on the congregations. Under Ferdinand III. (1619–57) the work was completed. The estates refused to swear fealty to him, unless he granted religious liberty; but Ferdinand let loose a swarm of Cossacks on the country, and then the estates took the oath. But when he next ordered that the whole population should at once return to the Roman faith, and all Protestant ministers and schoolmasters leave the country within a week, the peasants rose en masse, and formed in a few days an army of thirty-eight thousand men. They were defeated, however, and the order was executed with great harshness. The peace of Westphalia (1618) altered nothing with respect to Austria; and in 1632 ten Jesuits were commissioned to travel through the country, almost in the quality of an Inquisition. Seventy-three families among the nobility still adhered to the Protestant faith, but they hardly dared to speak to each other about their religious opinions. The idea, once awakened, could not die out altogether: it lived on in secret. When, in the reign of Charles VI. (1711–40), permission was granted to all Protestants to emigrate, twelve hundred persons at once demanded to go. The government was surprised, and tried to prevaricate; but the people were inflexible, and in 1735 they were transferred to Transylvania. The result of this violent suppression of a sincere and orderly movement towards freedom and truth has been, that, in Austria, the Roman-Catholic Church is altogether without influence, while religious indifference, superciliousness, and frivolity prevail in all classes of society. In spite of the fanaticism, however, with which the government tried to suppress the Reformation wherever it could, it was very jealous of its own freedom, and maintained quite an independent attitude with respect both to the pope and the clergy. During the reign of Maria Theresa (1740–80), especially after 1765, when Joseph II. succeeded his father, Francis I., Maria Theresa's husband, as Emperor of Germany, the influence of the clergy was curtailed in every way. Their power of holding councils was abrogated; public education was made a mere government affair; the relation between the religious orders and their generals residing in Rome was dissolved, and the orders placed under the authority of the bishops; numerous festivals were abolished, etc. When Joseph II. became sole regent (1780–90), the reforms were carried still further: the connection between the pope and the Roman-Catholic Church within the Austrian dominions was almost severed, and the functions of the church itself were reduced to a minimum. Many monasteries were suppressed; the Latin language was abolished in the administration of the sacraments; the tithes were turned into the treasury of the state; the priests were placed on an equal footing with other government officials, etc. Oct. 31, 1781, the celebrated edict of toleration was issued. Protestants obtained full citizens' right throughout the Austrian dominions, were admissible to the highest offices, and received freedom of worship, even in the Archduchy of Austria, where a superstendency was organized under the head of an evangelical consistory in Vienna, and a seminary for evangelical theology founded in the same city. Though many of Joseph's reforms were revoked by his immediate successors, and though ultramontane tendencies became more and more visible during the first half of the nineteenth century, the Roman Church in Austria was still kept in a position subordinate to the State, up to 1855. The dangerous political concessions which in 1848 made the Austrian monarchy tremble in its very foundation brought forward the idea to seek a support for the throne, not only in the army and the police, but also and preeminently in the Roman Church; and Aug. 18, 1855, Francis Joseph I. signed a concordat with the pope, by which the whole ecclesiastical legislation of Joseph II. was swept away, the Roman Church established in the empire as a state in the state, and its connection with the pope thoroughly cemented. Shortly after, a re-organization of the Protestant churches was promised, and in Hungary this re-organization was promptly carried out. But it was only in 1859 that the last vestiges of the empire it was long delayed; and when at last it came, in the form of a provisional constitution (April 8, 1861), it proved unsatisfactory.
The partiality shown to the Roman-Catholic Church is too flagrant. Only a Roman priest can keep a valid register of births and deaths. When a Roman-Catholic wishes to embrace Protestantism he must for six months separate himself from all intercourse with Protestants, and devote himself exclusively to the teaching of a Roman-Catholic priest; while a Protestant who wishes to embrace Romanism needs only to go to the nearest priest, and deliver himself up. In Austria Proper the Protestants are not allowed to have churches with music and bells, but only chapels without entrance from the streets, etc. Many of these petty annoyances with which the priest still hopes to fight the pastor, the Protestants have now succeeded in freeing themselves from, but, characteristically enough, only by attacking them one by one, and by going directly to the emperor himself.

AUTHORIZED VERSION OF THE BIBLE. See English Bible Versions.

AUTO-DA-FÉ, Spanish for actus fidei, "act of faith," signified the public enunciation of the judgments of the Inquisition over heretics and non-Christians, and was also called sermon publicus, or generalis de fide, because connected with a sermon on the Catholic faith. The act commonly took place on a Sunday. At sunrise, the victims, with the hair shaved off, and variously dressed, according to the different degrees of punishment, were led in a solemn procession, with the banners of the Inquisition at the head, to some public place or church. When the secular authorities whose duty it was to be present had sworn to stand by the Inquisition, and execute its orders, the sermon on the faith was delivered, and then the judgments against the dead and the living were pronounced. Next the relapers, and those who refused to recant, were expelled from the church, and given over to the secular authorities for punishment, and then the procession again began to move. The bones of the dead who were condemned were carried on sleighs to the place of execution. Those who were condemned to death rode on asses, between armed men, and wore coats and caps, called in Spanish sudenito, painted over with devils and flames. Not only the mob and the monks, but also the magistrates, and sometimes even the king and the court, were present at the spectacle. There were, however, differences in the solemnization of auto-da-fés in Southern France, in Spain, in Italy, and in the Portuguese colonies in India. From the middle of the eighteenth century the auto-da-fés disappeared, and the verdicts of the Inquisition were executed in private.

AÜPTPERTUS, Ambrosius, b. in Southern France early in the eighth century; lived at the Carolingian court as orator, but retired to the Monastery of St. Vincent, on the Voltorno, in Southern Italy, and died there in 778 or 779, as abbot. He wrote commentaries on the Psalms, the Song of Songs, and the Apocalypse, of which the last, given in Bib. Patr. Max., tom. XIII., is his principal work.

AVE MARIA, or HAIL, MARY, the angelic salutation, in which the archangel Gabriel saluted the Virgin (Luke i. 28), as rendered by the Vulgate, and afterwards the name of a peculiar form of prayer authorized by the Roman Church for the invocation of St. Mary. The prayer consists of a scriptural part,—the words of the angel, "Hail, Mary, full of grace; the Lord is with thee;" and the words of Elisabeth, "Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb," — and a precatory part: "Holy Mary, mother of God, pray for us sinners now and at the hour of our death." The first part occurs in the Liber Antiphonianus, attributed to Gregory the Great, but did not become a fixed formula until the end of the eleventh century; and the constitution of Bishop Odo of Paris (1196) is the first instance in which this formula is authorized to be taught together with the formulas of the Creed and the Lord's Prayer. The precatory part was added in the fifteenth century, and was authorized in the breviary of Pius V., in 1568.

AVIGNON, the capital of the department of Vaucluse, situated on the Rhone, formed in the middle ages, together with the adjacent districts, a countship belonging to Provence. Queen Joanna I. of Sicily, born a countess of Provence, sold the countship of Avignon in 1318 to Pope Clement VI. for eighty thousand guilders. In 1692 Louis XIV. seized the city in order to avenge a slight which Pope Alexander VII. had shown his ambassador, but gave it back again in 1693. In 1791 the countship of Avignon, as well as that of Venaissin, which King Philippe had bequeathed to the pope in 1377, were incorporated with France. From 1303 to 1377 the papal residence was changed from Rome to Avignon. Seven popes resided there,—Clement V., John XXII., Benedict XII., Clement VI., Innocent VI., Urban V., and Gregory XI.; and during this period, the so-called "Babylonian Captivity" of the popes, Avignon was one of the gayest and most corrupt cities in the world. Petrarch, who staid there for some time, called it the third Babylon.

AVIS, The Order of, originated from the nova militia, an association of knights, which King Alfonso I. of Portugal founded in 1145, to fight against the Moors who still held the southern part of the country. In 1168 Johannes Civita, Abbot of Citeaux, gave this association an ecclesiastical organization, and in 1204 Innocent III. confirmed the rules of the order. Also the name changed. In 1168 the nova militia conquered Evora. King Alfonso presented the city to the knights, who now assumed the name of "Brethren of St. Maria of Evora;" and when, in 1211, King Alfonso II. presented the city of Avis to the order, its name was finally fixed as "The Order of Avis." In the thirteenth century the order became a dependent of the Spanish order of Calatrava, but in the beginning of the fifteenth century it once more became independent. In 1789 it was transformed into an order of military merit, and the religious vows were abolished, that of chastity having been dropped already earlier.

AVITUS, Alcimus Ecdidius, descended from a distinguished Romano-Gallic family, and died in 325 as Bishop of Vienne, Burgundy. At the council of Paris, in 519, he joined the decrees of the council in condemning the Arians. In 499, he was the principal representative of the former party, and gained the confidence of the Burgundian king, Gundobald, which was of so much the greater consequence as the Burgundians were Arians. Later on, Sigismund, the son and successor of Gundobold, was converted to Catholicism by the influence of Avitus; and many, though not all, of his subjects followed his example. Avitus also presided at the synod of Epaon in 517, which regulated the ecclesiastical relations of Burgundy. But, besides being thus very active in many practical affairs, he was also a prolific writer. Eighty of his letters are still extant, addressed to the Frankish and Burgundian kings, to the bishops of Gaul, of Milan, Constantinople, and Jerusalem, etc. Of his poetical productions is extant, De Mundi Principio, a large didactic epic in five books. See Ebert: Gesch. der christl. lat. Litt. p. 377 sqq. Collected editions of the works of Avitus have been given by Sirmond, in Max. Bibl., T. IX., p. 603, and by Galland: Bibl. Tat., T. X., p. 761; Binding: Gesch. des Burgundischenreichs, Leipzig, 1808, p. 168 sqq.

AWAKENING is the term descriptive of the beginning of conversion as a divine work, because in Scripture parlance the unrepentant sinner is "asleep" (Eph. v. 14). According to the mental and moral condition of the sinner will be the outward form of the awakening,—either sudden or slow, vehement or quiet. It must, however, be acknowledged that a genuine Christian life is quite conceivable without any "awakening" at all; for many grow up in unbroken fellowship with God, and enter into conscious faith, and love and joy, not, it is true, without conviction of their lost condition, and repentance of sins, but without any perceptible beginning of a Christian experience. It is to be borne in mind that the "awakening" in any case is only a beginning; the awakened one is not yet converted, regenerated, only on the way to conversion: hence it is possible for such persons to fall asleep again, as has frequently been the case. This truth explains the wholesale falling-away which usually follows a great revival. The machinery of revivals produces many converts who are awakened, but who never get any farther. But, when God speaks, the soul hears and obeys. Those who are the subjects of his grace walk through life the exponents of righteousness. See Revivals, Spener. [See Robert Kudem: Gesammelte Vorträge: über christliche Nützlichkeit, Barmen, 1877.] Kling (Hersog, ed. 1.)

AYLMER, John, b. at Norfolk, Eng., 1821; d. in London, June 3, 1594; was educated at Cambridge; became the tutor of Lady Jane Grey, and was made Archdeacon of Stow in 1553. During the reign of Mary he retired to Zurich; by Elizabeth he was made Archdeacon of Lincoln in 1562, and Bishop of London in 1576. He was a firm but somewhat narrow-minded man, and opposed the Puritans with the same harshness as the Romanists. Against Knox he wrote, An Harbournote for faithful and true Subjects, etc., 1559.

AZAZEL. This word is a transliteration of the Hebrew term translated in the authorized version (Lev. xvi. 8 sq.) "scapegoat;" but the correct interpretation is much debated. Some consider azazel as the name of a region, "the desert," or of a person, the opposite to Jahveh, either a spirit, a demon, or Satan himself. The last interpretation has met with great favor; but against it may be urged that nowhere else in the Pentateuch is Satan mentioned, and the fact renders it all the more unlikely that he should be mentioned here by a name he never has in the Bible. It is therefore decidedly better to regard azazel as impersonal, and interpret Lev. xvi. 8: "and Aaron shall cast lots upon the two goats; one lot for Jahveh, and the other lot for Azazel, i.e., for 'going very far away.'" According to the Talmudic tractate, Yoma, the high priest, knew by a sort of telegraphic communication between Jerusalem and the wilderness,—the waving of cloths by set watchers, at regular distances,—whether and when the goat arrived in the wilderness, as was necessary, for the other sacrifices were not to be offered until it arrived there (Lev. xvi. 23, 24). See Atonement, Day of. Wilhelm Volck.

AZYMITES (from a negative, and ἀλευ, leaven), the epithet given to the adherents of the Latin Church by those of the Greek Church, because the former use unleavened bread in the Lord’s Supper. In reply the Latins called the Greeks Fermentarii. The first one to attack the Latin Church upon this question was Michael Caerularius, Patriarch of Constantinople (1051), accusing her of heresy upon this point. The Latins have made it a grievous sin to use leavened bread in the Eucharist, yet they have not presumed to damn the Greeks: so far from doing so, they declared in the council of Florence (1439), that transubstantiation took place just the same, whether the bread were leavened or not. See Carularius, Michael.

BAADER, Franz Xavier, b. in München, 1763; d. there May 23, 1811; studied, first medicine, and afterwards mineralogy; travelled in England 1792–93; was appointed, first councillor, and afterwards director, of the mining department in Munich; and became in 1826 professor of philosophy and speculative theology in the university of the same city, in which position he exercised considerable influence. He was a theosophist rather than a theologian; and the apocalyptic and paradoxical form in which he presented his mystical speculations often makes it difficult to understand him. But he was an original thinker, of great suggestiveness; and, though a Roman Catholic, he maintained a very independent position with respect to the papacy. His collected works, appeared in 16 vols. at Leipzig, 1850–60.

BAAL and BEL. I. BAAL, frequently mentioned in the Old Testament as the god of the idolatrous Israelites, as he was of the Canaanites (Phoenicians, Philistines, and Edomites). And, as the Phoenicians naturally carried their religion with them wherever they went, the name of Baal was very widely spread. See PHOENICIANS.

1. The name means "lord," or "possessor," and, when used in a special sense, "head of the wife. This meaning it shares with the other Shemitic divinities, for they all set forth the idea of power, and thus differ in conception from the Aryan divinities; and also in that, apparently, these Shemitic gods were originally one god, who took different names according to the localities in which he was worshipped, and so, in course of time, arose separate divinities.

2. The use of the name. — Baal was the commonest name for god among the Phoenicians, and everywhere designated the highest god, or the highest worshipped in any particular place. So, also, it is used as a description, e.g., "Melkart, the Baal of Tyre." In the Old Testament is frequently the plural, "Baalim;" meaning either in general "the idols," or the Baals collectively, which had their especial seats in different localities.

Baal is, without doubt, a sun-god, and a male divinity par excellence. He is very frequently called Baal Chamman; and Chamman, "hot," is applied to the sun in Hebrew. So, also, Baalbek was called by the Greeks Heliopolis (city of the sun). It is also noticeable that the Greeks and Romans identified Melkart, the Baal of Tyre, with Herakles (Hercules), the sun-god. At Beth-Shemesh (the sun-temple) was there an altar to Baal: and it does not militate against this identification when Baal and the sun are distinguished as separate divinities (2 Kings xiii. 5); for Apollo was originally a sun-god, but afterwards was distinguished from the sun.

In the Shemitic divinities the beneficent and the destructive powers were united: so in Baal we find such names as Hannibal, "gracious is Baal." Asdrubal, "Baal helps." On the other hand, Baal is set forth as a destructive god, whose wrath must be placated: and so there were sacrifices of children (Jer. xix. 5, xxxii. 35) to which many classical writers testify, although they call Baal Saturn, or Kronos. No distinction is to be made between Moloch and Baal, as if the one were destructive, while the other was beneficent. See MOLOCH.

3. Different Baals. — a. Baal-Berith (lord of the covenant), worshipped by the Shechemites, the protector of the "covenant" formed between men (Judg. viii. 33, ix. 4).

b. Baal-Peor (lord of Peor), a god of the Moabites or Midianites, so called because worshipped upon Mount Peor (Num. xxii. 28, xxv. 9). The common interpretation, which insists upon obscene rites in the worship of Baal-Peor, is altogether aside from the plain text. Not the prostitution of female devotees who yielded up their virtue in discharge of a religious duty, but fornication and idolatry, are spoken of.

c. Baal-Zebub (lord of the fly). See BEELZEBUB.

d. Baal-Gad (lord of fortune), a place near Hermon (Josh. xi. 17, xii. 7, xiii. 5.)

e. Baal-Meon (lord of the habitation), a town where was a temple: in full form, the name is the Temple of Baal-Meon, Beth-Baal-Meon (Josh. xiii. 7), a camping-ground for the Israelites, on the Red Sea, where there was a Baal imported thither from the north.

f. Baal-Tamar (lord of the palm), a place near Gibeah (Judg. xx. 33). The palm, tamar, by its height, spread, and perpetual greenness, would be a good symbol of Baal, the fruitful-making sun.

a. and i. The Palmyra inscriptions speak of two further forms of Baal, the divinities Aglibol and Malachbel. They are named and pictured together, and represented the sun and the moon; for on one monument Aglibol has a half-moon over her shoulder, while Malachbel is borne up by an eagle, and has a crown of sun-rays. In the name Aglibol we have a mingling of the word for a young steer and Baal, reminding us of the classic tales of Zeus, in the shape of a steer carrying off Europa.

4. The Baal-Cultus in Israel. It is unquestionable, that, in the earliest times, the Hebrews called their god Baal. In proof, these names, in The worship of Baal was known to the Hebrews while in the desert, and many were induced to adopt it by the Moabitish women (Num. xxv.); and this worship, in the time of the Judges, became so prevalent that it so thoroughly infected the nation, that only partially successful efforts were made to eradicate it (Judg. ii. 11, 13, iii. 7, vi. 25 sq. x. 6; 1 Sam. vii. 4, xii. 10). Then came the reformation under Saul and David: a relapse followed under Solomon; and at length Ahab, King of Israel, influenced by Jezebel, introduced the worship of the Zidonian Baal, and advanced this idolatrous worship to the exclusion of the Jehovah cultus (1 Kings xvi. 31 sq. xix. 10). And it had so strong a hold upon the affections of the people that it was not until Jehu, by stratagem, put a large number of Baalworshippers to death, that this hold was loosened; only temporarily, however, for the people returned to it not long after (2 Kings x. 18–28, xvii. 16). In Judah there was likewise ineretate Baal-worship, although not so much favored by the reigning houses. Ahaz practised it (2 Kings xvii. 3, 2 Chron. xxvii. 2); Hezekiah repressed it (2 Kings xviii. 4); but Manasseh continued it (2 Kings xxi. 3). He, however, was the last king to so do.

Baal was worshipped by animal sacrifices (1 Kings xix. 18); 2 Kings x. 24), with incense (Jer. vii. 9, xi. 13, xxxii. 29), and by kissing his images (1 Kings xix. 18). His pillars or images were made of stone or of wood (2 Kings x. 26, 27), and even of silver and gold (Hos. ii. 8, margin). It was usual for Baal to be found upon heights, and of bleeding rites (1 Kings xviii. 23; 2 Kings x. 24), with incense (2 Kings xvi. 13), and Ptolemy; and coins of the city have been found of almost all the emperors from Nerva to Galienus. The magnificent ruins which now arrest the traveller's attention, and excite his wonder, are proof of the lavish expenditure of the emperors of the second and third centuries. We are able, by coins, to reconstruct partly the two temples as they once stood. The Great Temple, one of the wonders of the Old World, designed apparently as a pantheon, and built, it is probable, by Antoninus Pius (A.D. 150), is now almost entirely destroyed. Only six columns yet stand. It was built upon the site of another temple; and in the west wall of its platform are the three famous blocks of stone, placed side by side, measuring respectively sixty-four feet, sixty-three feet eight inches, and sixty-three feet, and are thirteen feet in height. In the quarry in the neighborhood there is a stone cut out, but not yet separated from the rock, which is thirty-eight hundred feet high, and thirteen wide, and weighs probably about fifteen hundred tons. The presence of the three stones mentioned gave the temple the name.
Trillithon or "Three-Stone Temple." Slightly to the north of the Great Temple is the Temple of the Sun, which is remarkably well preserved. The columns are forty-five feet high, including the Corinthian capitals, and the circumference of each nineteen feet. The temple is entered through an exquisitely carved doorway. The central stone of the architrave having subsided since 1659, it lately became necessary to prop it, to the detriment of its appearance. At the west end of the cella was the raised sanctuary, where the altar stood during the Christian period. Further east there is a very small but very beautiful circular temple, consisting of a semi-circular cella surrounded by eight Corinthian columns. It was formerly a Greek chapel, but is now falling to decay.

In the early Christian centuries, Baalbek was one of the most flourishing seats of Pagan worship; and the Christian writers draw strange pictures of the morality of the place. In 297 Gelasinus was martyred there. The story is curious. He was a comic actor; and one day, in the course of a public mockery of Christian rites, he was jestingly baptized. But, when he came forth from the bath, he said solemnly, "I am a Christian, for I have seen in the bath an awful and majestic spectacle; and for Christ's sake I am ready to die." The people, in rage, stoned him; and the magistrate, in order to spare him further suffering, had him beheaded. See Smith and Wace: Dict. Christ. Bdg., s. v. The Emperor Constantine, according to Sozomen, issued a rescript against the licentious rites of the people, and founded a basilica among them; but, on the accession of Julian, the Pagan population broke out into violent persecution, and the city became so notorious for its hostility to Christianity, that Christians were banished thither from Alexandria as a special punishment. Theodosius the Great is said to have turned "the Temple of Balaninus, the Trillithon," into a Christian Church (Encyc. Brit. sub roco). Later on, bishops of Heliopolis are mentioned. The city was captured by Abre Ubeida on his march from Damascus to Hums. Since then it has declined. It has often changed masters, and war has left its indelible marks. The present unsightly town is a great contrast to the city of the past. Earthquakes have done much to reduce to ruins the magnificent temples reared at such cost.

The ruins of Baalbek have been often described; but one of the best, if not the best, works on the subject is still Wood and Dawkins: Ruins of Baalbec, London, 1737. See also Robinson: Later Biblical Researches, Boston, 1852, pp. 505–527; Mrs. Burton: Unexplored Syria, London; and the Handbooks of Syria by Porter (5th ed.) and Bädeker (24 Ger. ed. 1881).

Baanites. See Paulicians.

Baasha (railor), son of Ahijah, of the tribe of Issachar, third king of Israel, by the slaughter of Nadab and all his family (1 Kings xv. 27), thus unintentionally fulfilling Ahijah's prophecy (1 Kings xiv. 10). Although of common origin, he made a warlike and brave king, but increased the demoralization of his kingdom by persisting in the way of Jeroboam. Jehu prophesied against him, but without effect. While engaged in fortifying Ramah, in order to prevent any intercourse between Judah and Israel, Baasha was attacked by Benhadad, King of Syria, who had been incited by Asa, King of Judah, and compelled to stop building. See Asa. Baasha reigned probably for a long time after this; for in all he ruled twenty-two years (B.C. 935–913), and was buried in Tirzah. Upon his death and successor, Elah, the prophecy of Jehu was fulfilled (1 Kings xvi. 12, 13).

Baba. See Mishna.

Babylon, the metropolis of the Babylonian Empire, was built on both sides of the Euphrates, on the spot where the present Hillah stands. The records of the Old Testament (Gen. x. 10) ascribe the foundation of Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh, to Nimrod the Hamite (Cushite); and this agrees with the inscriptions found in the ruins, according to which Uru (the Chaldean Ur, Gen. xi. 28), Arku (the present Warka, the biblical Erech), Babilu (the Babel of the Bible), etc., were cities of non-Semitic origin. The Old Testament (Gen. xi. 9) brings the name Babel in connection with the confusion of tongues, and the dispersion of the race into nations, and derives it from the Hebrew הָבָל, "to confound, confusions." The inscriptions, however, give another etymology, explaining Bab-Il as the "gates of El," or simply "God's gates." The existence of the city as the centre of the Chaldean and a pre-Chaldean, Accadian civilization, can be traced back to about three thousand years B.C.

The whole city, enlarged and completed by Nabopolassar and Nebuchadnezzar, formed a square with a circumference, according to Ctesias, of three hundred and sixty stadia (about sixty-six miles), or, according to Herodotus, of four hundred and eighty stadia (about seventy-five miles), a difference which perhaps arose from the latter including the suburb Borsippa. A wall enclosed this city, according to Herodotus, twenty yards high and fifty yards broad, so that two chariots, each harnessed with four horses abreast, could easily pass each other between the battlements. It was built of brick and asphal- tum, mounted with two hundred and fifty towers, and surrounded by a deep and broad ditch filled with water from the Euphrates. One hundred gates, with posts, leaves, and sills of brass, led into the city. All along the Euphrates high embankments protected the city's foundation; and gates of brass, and flights of steps of masonry, led down to the town. The two parts of the city were connected by a bridge, built by Nebuchadnezzar, resting on stone pillars, and provided with a pathway of cedar-wood and palm-beams, which was removed during the reign of the Persian kings. The whole area was laid out in minor squares by straight streets one hundred and fifty feet broad, and lined with houses of three or four stories; but the interior part seems to have been occupied by gardens and orchards. This "the praise of the whole earth" (Isa. xiv. 11), "the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency" (Isa. xiii. 19), was, by its magnitude, splendor, riches, luxury, art, and science, the centre of Western Asia; but it was also a seat of boundless debauchery and vice (Isa. xiv. 11, xvi. 12). Jeth. prophesies against it (Jer. li. 41).

The ruins of the western part of the city are by far not so imposing as those of the eastern part, consisting of the three huge mounds,—

Al-kaşr, Tell Amrān, and Babil. According to inscriptions found in the mound, Al-kaşr represents the palace built by Nebuchadnezzar. The mound forms a square seven hundred yards in circumference, and consists of loose bricks, tiles, and fragments of stone. Remnants of solid walls, with traces of architectural ornamentation, are met with in the middle of the mound: in the northern part the great lion was found, of black basalt, called by the Arabs the "idol," or the "elephant." At a distance of seven hundred metres south of Al-kaşr, rises the hill Tell Amrān, thus called from a chapel or tomb erected on its top in honor of Amrān, the son of Ali. The mound forms an irregular trapeze four hundred metres broad, and its two parallel sides respectively five hundred and three hundred metres long. Of solid wall, there are here no traces. The surface consists of sand and rubbish, but it is evident that the place has been used for a long time as a burial-ground. The mound is generally thought to represent the famous "hanging-gardens," — a construction of terraces four hundred feet long, four hundred feet broad, and so high that it overlooked the towers of the palace. The most imposing part, however, of the ruins is Babil, a mound one hundred and eighty metres long, seventy metres broad, and forty metres high. Walls and other traces of architectural construction are here easily distinguishable; and it can hardly be doubted that this mound represents a Temple of Belus, identical with that temple which is mentioned in an inscription of Tiglath-Pileser IV., one hundred years before Nebuchadnezzar, and was dedicated to Bel Merodach, but different from that which, situated on the western bank of the Euphrates, at Borsippa, generally goes under the name of the "Tower of Babel," and which was dedicated to Bel-Nebo.

On the western bank of the river, are the ruins of the second royal palace, opposite the hills of Tell Amrān, and two miles farther to the north, at the old Borsippa, the much more interesting ruins of the above-mentioned Temple of Bel-Nebo. This temple formed, so to speak, an artificial mountain of brick. The ground upon which it stood was laid out as a square, two stadia on each side, and surrounded with a wall. In the centre of this ground, stood a square building of brick and asphaltum, six hundred feet on each side; and from this basis rose the tower, pyramidal, six hundred feet high. Stairs, with landings and resting-places, led, on the outside of the building, to the uppermost story, which contained a golden altar and a magnificently prepared base for the god, but no statuary. The lowest story, however, contained statuary representing the god sitting on a golden throne, behind a golden altar, on which one thousand pounds of incense were burnt every year, on the day of his festival. An inscription, which exists in two copies, tells that Nebuchadnezzar found this building partly unfinished, partly in decay, and then proceeded and completed it. It seems to date back from a very early age; and when local tradition identifies the present mound of ruins, the Birs Nimrod, with the Tower of Babel (Gen. x. 10), most Assyriologists seem willing to accept the tradition. After the fall of the Babylonian Empire the building gradually fell into decay. Xerxes broke down the uppermost story, and carried away all the ornaments. Alexander the Great thought of restoring the building; and ten thousand laborers were employed for two months in carrying off the accumulated rubbish. But with the death of the work stopped. At present the mound of ruins has only half the height the building itself had. The upper stories have tumbled down, and covered the lower with their débris. Several indications show that fire has played a part in the destruction.

The city was first conquered by Cyrus in 538 B.C., and then again in 318, after a revolt, by Darius Hystaspis, who filled up the ditch, and lowered the walls to half their original height. Xerxes plundered, not only the Temple of Belus, but also the palaces; and the restoration which Alexander the Great promised was baffled by his death. But the severest blow, the city received from the building of a new royal residence in its neighborhood, — Seleucia. From that moment it began to decay. It became a sort of quarry. Seleucia, Ktesiphon, Kufa, and even Bagdad, were built of bricks taken from Babylon. At present the site of the city is a place of unspeakable desolation, just as the prophets said it should be (Isa. xiii. 19, xiv. 4; Jer. li. 37).

BABYLONIA is the name which the Greeks and the Romans gave to the "land of the Chaldeans" (Jer. xxiv. 5, xxv. 12; Ezek. xii. 13), generally called Shinar in the Old Testament (Gen. x. 10, xi. 2, lv. 1), thereby denoting the region along the lower course of the Euphrates and the Tigris, from the point where they approach each other to their mouth in the Persian Gulf, and from Elam on the east, to Arabia on the west. This region forms a vast plain, consisting of a fat, brown soil of extraordinary fertility; and in olden time the natural productivity of the land was still further increased by excellent cultivation. Immense hydraulic works were erected in order to regulate the inundations of the two rivers, and utilize their waters. The current of the Euphrates is calm and regular, but that of the Tigris is wild and violent; and here huge embankments, immense reservoirs, and long canals were necessary. Besides agriculture, the teeming population was also successfully engaged in manufactures and commerce. Carpets, woolen and linen fabrics, articles of glass and bronze, etc., were produced; and these products were rapidly exchanged for those of Arabia, Ethiopia, and India. The country was rich. In a later period the Persian Empire drew one-third of its revenues from this province alone.

The inhabitants of this country, the bearers of this civilization, were not a pure race. The population consisted, indeed, of two layers: one, the Accadians, reminding, in many respects, of BABYLONIA.

The Turco-Tartaric or Uralo-Altaic race; and another, the Chaldean, belonging surely to the Semitic race. About the former, the Accadians, the original inhabitants of Shinar, the cuneiform inscriptions give a considerable amount of information,—about their language, which was strongly agglutinative; their literature, hymns, and epics, which the Chaldeans translated and imitated; their science and art, astronomy, and architecture, which the Chaldeans adopted and developed; in short, their whole historical position. They built cities which became centres of government and enterprise. Of four of these cities ruins are still extant; namely, Uru, the Ur of the Chaldeans of the Bible (Gen. xi. 28), situated farthest to the south on the right bank of the Euphrates, in latitude 31° north, and presented by the ruins of Mugheir; Larsam, a little more to the north, on the left bank of the Euphrates, represented by the ruins of Senkerch; Arku, still farther to the north, the present Warka, the biblical Erech (Gen. x. 10), the Greek Orbel, and finally Babylon, the capital of Babel of the Bible. Other cities, not yet identified by their ruins, are mentioned in the inscriptions and in the Bible, such as Accad, Kutha, Sepharvaim, and Nipur. That these cities were not founded by the Semites is proved by the non-Semitic inscriptions found in their ruins; and this agrees with the Bible, which ascribes the foundation of Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh to Nimrod the Hamite (Cushite) (Gen. x. 10). In the beginning, and for a long time, these towns were rivals of each other; now one, now another, of them carrying the day. A king from this first period of historical time is spoken of as very powerful. He was the ruler of Ur, and his name is generally read Uruk. A whole series of inscriptions relate to him. Another, named Kudur-nahhunte, from the same period, was King of Larsam. He is probably identical with the Kudurnamahunte, of whom the inscriptions of Assurbanipal says that he ruled over Babylonia 1635 years before Sennacherib, that is about 2280 years B.C. To an Elamitic, that is purely Turanian dynasty, belonged, probably, also the biblical Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv.). The union of Sumir and Accad, and the four nations. He also built and restored other temples, palaces, and cities, and dug one of the greatest canals, Hammurabi-nush-hum, which passed through the Babylonian territory.

The intimate intercourse between Assyria and Babylon same region during the reign of Tiglath-Pileser II. (745-728 B.C.) He made two campaigns to Babylonia (745 and 731), and succeeded in subjugating the country; but twice Merodach-Baladan of Beth-takim rebelled (721 and 710), and was not overcome until Ezbil of Babylonia, as openly acknowledged by the title which the Babylonian kings assumed after the union of the minor kingdoms, — "King of Sumir and Accad." Sumir probably being identical with Shinar.

The fall, however, of Assyria and Babylon, which passed through the Babylonian territory.

the passing of the empire from the Shemitic to the Arayan race with Cyrus, was a great gain to mankind. Though the earliest religious, scientific, and artistic traditions of our present civilization were eroded in Babylonia, the Babylonian religion, when fully developed, was, nevertheless, a mean and base idolatry, which intellectually prevented all true insight into natural phenomena, and stopped all scientific and artistic progress at a short goal, while morally it left the passions without rule and guidance, and rather encouraged sensuality and debauchery. The Babylonian gods were originally local deities. Bel and his consort, Belit or Mylitta, were originally the gods of Nipur. Hence they were transplanted to Babel; and, when Babylon became the capital of the empire, Bel became the supreme or central deity of the religious system. Sin, the moon-god, was the god of Ur, one of the oldest centres of Babylonian civilization, and was always held in higher esteem by the Babylonians than Shamas, the sun-god. Anu, the god of the heavens, and his consort, Nana, were worshipped at Erech; Hea, god of the sea and the infernal regions, and his consort, Darkina, at Eridu, etc. When all these cities were gathered into one empire, the gods were gathered into one system; a certain rank was ascribed to each of them, and a genealogy was invented. Mystical and fanciful astronomical, or rather astrological, relations were connected with their names; and a mythology was elaborated, half poetical romance, and half scientific symbolization. But when this mythology lost its hold on its devotees, no philosophy arose to take its place, and after a short career Babylonian civilization became an abomination and a curse. BACCALEAUREUS (Bachelor), an academic title first introduced in the University of Paris in the thirteenth century, by Pope Gregory IX., and given to such students as had successfully gone through the first examination, but not yet acquired the rights and rank of an independent master, or doctor. The etymology of the word is doubtful; some deriving it from baccalaurea, a "laurel-berry," others from baccus and laurea, a "laurel-twist," and others again from bacchus (bac chevalier), denoting a lower class of knights, whose estats did not allow them to take military service in an independent manner, with a retinue of their own.

BACCANARISTS, an ecclesiastical order, thus called after its founder, Baccanarii, who after the temporary dissolution of the Society of the Jesuits, in 1773, by this means attempted to take military service in an independent manner, and given to such students as had successfully passed the first examination, but not yet acquired the rights and rank of an independent master, or doctor. BACON, Roger, b. at Ilchester, in Somersetshire, in 1214; d. at Oxford 1294. His family were in good circumstances, but were much crippled during the reigns of Henry VI. and Edward II. at Oxford; took shelter (1258) at Paris, where he passed ten years in imprisonment, until released by the Council of 1268. He returned to Oxford and to study: but at the end of another decade he was in prison again, for his opinions' sake, and there he remained until about 1292. He was released only to die. He closed his literary labors with a compendium of theology. Bacon was one of the stars of the first magnitude. He had an eminently practical mind, and was much fonder of natural science than of metaphysical subtleties. His misfortune was to have been born some centuries too soon; although in many respects he shared the opinions of his time, and is therefore not altogether entitled to the extravagant praise and glory nowadays showered upon him. His popular reputation rests upon his inventions and useful arts. He not only improved the calendar, and in this connection expressed opinions which Copernicus later justified, but studied perspective, and, according to traditions now discredited (see art. "Roger Bacon," in Encycl. Brit. 9th ed.), made burning-glasses, a telescope, and gunpowder. His bondage to the state of knowledge of the time is proven by his leaning toward astrology and alchemy; and this knowledge brought him in great trouble, as it was the custom of the day to attribute unusual skill in chemistry or mechanics to the devil. The true greatness of Bacon appears in his marvelous breadth of learning. He trod the whole circle. And withal he was a devout though by no means a blind Roman Catholic; for, while humbly submitting to the pope, he protested, in the name of religion, against the corruptions of his time, and when setting forth the Bible as the highest authority in matters of religion, lamented that it was so little known. He set the practical before him, and made experience the touchstone of truth. His recommendation, especially to missionaries, to study ethnology and geography, is a case in point.

Roger Bacon fell into obscurity while living, and into oblivion when he died. Many centuries elapsed before he was at all recognized at his proper worth, and even to-day there is no complete edition of his works. This is greatly to be lamented, inasmuch as until there is there can be no satisfactory study of him. His principal works are, Opus Majus, Opus Minus, Opus Tertium, three large treatises written in prison, amidst great embarrassments, and forwarded by request, secretly, to Clement IV. The Opus Majus was published by Samuel Jebb, London, 1733. The Opus Tertium was published by J. S. Brewer, London, 1860. Of less account is Epistolae secretae operibus artis et nature et de nullitate magiae, Hamburg, 1618.

Bacon, Francis, b. in London, Jan. 22, 1561; d. at Highgate, April 9, 1626. He was a son of Sir Nicholas Bacon; was educated at Cambridge, and was for a time in the diplomatic service. In 1580 he began his legal career, and passed rapidly through its earlier stages. He sat for a number of years in Parliament. In 1607 he became solicitor-general, and at length was made lord-chancellor. Before the Parliament of 1621 he was accused of taking bribes. Judgment was pronounced against him. He was deposed and degraded. The rest of his life was passed in retirement. Pope unjustly called him "the wisest, brightest, meanest, of mankind."

The philosophy of Bacon is contained chiefly in the various parts of his principal work, Instauratio Magna, of which the second book, Noverum Organum, is the most important. His philosophy is a method rather than a system; but the influence of this method in the development of British thought can hardly be over-estimated. As Luther was the reformer of religion, so Bacon was the reformer of philosophy. Luther had claimed that the Scripture was to be interpreted by private judgment, not by authority. The problem of Bacon was to suggest a method of interpreting nature. The old method afforded no fruits. It "flies from the senses and particular..." to the most general laws, and then applies deduction. This is the "anticipation of nature." To it Bacon opposes the "interpretation of nature." Nature is to be interpreted, not by the use of the deductive syllogism, but by the induction of facts, by a gradual ascent from facts, through intermediate laws called "axioms," to the forms of nature. Before beginning this induction, the inquirer is to free his mind from certain false notions or tendencies which distort the truth. These are called Idols, and are of four kinds: Idols of the Tribe, which are common to the race; Idols of the Cave which are peculiar to the individual; Idols of the Market-place, coming from the misuse of language; and Idols of the Theatre, which result from an abuse of authority. The end of induction is the discovery of forms, the ways in which natural phenomena occur, the causes from which they proceed. Nature is not to be interpreted by a search after final causes. "Nature to be commanded must be obeyed." Philosophy will then be fruitful. Faith is shown by works. Philosophy is to be known by fruits.

In the application of this method in the physical and moral world, Bacon himself accomplished but little. His system of morals, if it may be called, is to be gathered from the seventh and eighth books of his De Augmentis, and from his Essays. Moral action means action of the human will. The will is governed by reason. Its spur is the passions. The moral object of the will is the good. Bacon, like the ancient moralists, failed to distinguish between the good and the right. He finds fault with the Greek and Roman thinkers for disputing about the chief good. "It is a question of religion, not of ethics. His moral doctrine has reference exclusively to this world. Duty is only that which one owes to the community. Duty to God is an affair of religion. The cultivation of the will in the direction of the good is accomplished by the formation of a habit. For this Bacon lays down certain precepts. No general rules can be made for moral action under all circumstances. The characters of men differ as their bodies differ.

Bacon separates distinctly religion and philosophy. The one is not incompatible with the other; for "a little philosophy inclined men's mind to atheism, but depth in philosophy bringeth men's minds about to religion." Bacon has been sometimes regarded as a defender of unbelief, because he opposed the search after final causes in the interpretation of nature. But it is one thing to discourage the search after final causes in science, it is another thing to deny the existence of final causes. "I had rather believe," he says, "all the fables in the Legend and the Talmud and the Alcoran than that this universal frame is without a mind" (Essay on Atheism). The object of scientific inquiry should be the "form," not the final cause.

While philosophy is not atheistic, it does not inform religion. Tertullian, Pascal, and Bacon agree in proclaiming the separation of the two domains. Tertullian and Pascal do it to save religion from rationalism: Bacon does it to save philosophy from the "Idols." Credo quia absurdum is expressed in the following words: "But that

BAHRDT.

After the diet of Worms (1521) he became a stanch adherent of the Reformation, which he successfully introduced in the city of Landau and its neighborhood. In 1526 he published his Gespräch-Büchlein, which is the first Protestant catechism; and in 1544 he appeared in his Neueste Offenbarungen, in which he gives a full exposition of the doctrine of the Lord's Supper, somewhat nearer to the views of Zwingli and Butler than to those of Luther. He also wrote against the Anabaptists. A curious incident in his life is his defence (Von der Gans — De Anser, Strassburg, 1520). appended to a sermon on the Lord's Supper, against the accusation of having given the Lord's Supper to a goose: one of his communicants bore the name Gans, "goose."

BADERS' SKINS are mentioned in the authorized version (e.g. Exod. xxvi. 14; Ezek. xvi. 10) as one of the coverings of the tabernacle, and as the sandals of a fine lady; but the word, from its analogy to the Arabic for seal, is now usually so translated. The badger is very rare in Arabia, if, indeed, it be known.

BAHRDT, Karl Friedrich, b. at Bischofswerda, Saxony, Aug. 25, 1741; d. near Halle, April 23, 1792; is a disgusting but striking instance of the vulgar rationalism of the eighteenth century; gifted, but destitute of truth; working hard, but never seriously engaged; always hunting after fame, but steadily sinking deeper and deeper into shame. He began his career in 1791 as a lecturer on biblical exegesis in the University of Leipzig, and preacher to the Church of St. Peter, BACON, Leonard, D.D., LL.D., b. in Detroit, Mich., Feb. 19, 1802; d. in New Haven, Conn., Dec. 24, 1881. He graduated at Yale College in 1820; studied theology at Andover, became pastor of the First Church in New Haven in 1825; resigned his active work as pastor, and became pastor emeritus in 1866; became professor in Revealed Theology in the Yale Theological School from 1866 to 1871, and lecturer on Church Polity and American Church History from 1871 to his death. He was a leading founder, and one of the first editors, of The Independent and of The New-Englander. He published the Life and Select Works of Richard Baxter (1830), Thirteen Historical Discourses on the Completion of Two Hundred Years from the Beginning of the First Church in New Haven (1839), Essays on Slavery (1840), Genesis of the New-England Churches (1874), and other books. He was a very prolific contributor, upon theological, ecclesiastical, and political topics, to the periodical press. He took a very prominent part in the antislavery reform. In the Congregational denomination he was long honored as an able and influential leader. His extraordinary ability as a public speaker on subjects of social and political reform, and before ecclesiastical bodies, was universally recognized. His conversational powers were equally remarkable. His biography is in course of preparation (1882) by his daughter LOUISE H. BACON.

BADER, Johannes, b. in the latter part of the fifteenth century: d. at Landau, August (10-15), 1545; was tutor to Duke Ludwig II. of Zweibrücken, and after 1518 minister at Landau.

faith which was accounted to Abraham for righteousness was of such a nature that Sarah laughed at it, which therein was an image of natural reason. The more discordant therefore, and incredible, the divine mystery is, the more honor is shown to God in believing it, and the nobler is the victory of faith (De Aug., Bk. IX.). Religion comes, therefore, not from the light of nature, but from that of revelation. "First he breathed light upon the face of the matter, or chaos, then he breathed light into the face of man, and still he breathed and inspired light into the face of his chosen" (Essay on Truth). One may employ reason to separate revealed from natural truth, and to draw inferences from the former; but we must not go to excess by inquiring too curiously into divine mysteries, nor attach the same authority to inferences as to principles. If Bacon was an atheist, as some claim, his writings are certainly not atheistic. He must, in that case, have been a hypocrite in order to be a flatterer, and, if a flatterer, a most foolish one. Yet the inductive method has given natural theology the facts which point most significantly to God.

of Friedrich II. overtook him. He determined to take the affair more practically, and opened a wine-shop in the neighborhood of Halle, wrote smutty novels for the circulating libraries, founded a secret society which the police had under surveillance and tried to ridicule the religious edict of 1788 by a farce on the stage, etc. The Prussian Government, however, did not appreciate his practices. He spent a year in the dungeons of Magdeburg; and shortly after his release he fell ill, and died from the use of mercury. None of his works are worth reading; but the essay on him by G. Frank, in Raumer's "Historische Taschenbücher," 1868, pp. 203-370, is instructive. See also Leyser: K. F. Bahrlit, sein Verhältniss zum Philosophen im 17. Jahrhundert, 2d ed., Neustadt, 1870.

BAILLET, Adriaan, b. at Neuvile, near Beauvais, June 13, 1649; d. in Paris, Jan. 21, 1706; was educated in the Seminary of Beauvais; took orders in 1676, and obtained a small vicarage; but was in 1680 appointed librarian to Lamoignon, secretary to the Parliament of Paris. Among his many works are: Les vies des saints, 6 vols., fol., 1701, reprinted in 1704 and 1708; Vie de Descartes, 1692; Jugements des Sarrauts; Histoire de Hollande, a continuation of Grotius, etc.

BAILIE, Robert, b. at Glasgow, April 30, 1602; died there July, 1662; studied theology; was made professor of divinity at Glasgow in 1614, and principal of the University in 1651, and took an active part in all the church controversies of his time. His Letters and Journals, edited by Laing, in 3 vols., Edinburgh, 1841-42, and provided with a notice of his writings and a description of his life, are of great historical interest. To him owe the graphic descriptions of the famous Westminster Assembly of Divines, to which body he was sent as one of the five Scotch clergymen in 1643, and sat in it for three years. See Schaff's Creeds of Christendom, vol. 1, pp. 727, 748 sq.

BAIRD, Robert, D.D., b. in Fayette County, Pennsylvania, Oct. 6, 1788; d. in New York, March 18, 1863; was educated in the Theological Seminary of Princeton, licensed to preach by the presbyteries of New Brunswick in 1822, ordained prof. 1828, and devoted his life most zealously to the cause of Protestantism, education, and temperance, residing in Europe from 1835 to 1843, and acting, after his return, as corresponding secretary of the Foreign Evangelical Society and the American and Foreign Christian Union. Besides other works, he wrote Histoire des Sociétés de Tempérance des États-Unis d'Amérique, Paris, 1836, and Religion in America, Glasgow, 1842, New York, 1836, both of which were translated into most European languages. Dr. Baird was an accomplished linguist, a pleasant speaker, and full of faith and charity. He was privileged to enter into king's palaces, but he entered as readily the houses of the poor. He exerted himself particularly to spread the gospel in Roman-Catholic countries. His life was written by his son, H. M. Baird, D.D., New York, 1868.

BAJUS (DE BAY), Michel, b. at Melin in Hainaut, 1513; d. at Louvain, Sept. 15, 1589; was educated in the University of Louvain, where he took the degree of doctor in theology in 1550, and remained connected with that institution for his whole life,—first as professor since 1551, and then as chancellor since 1575. That self-contradiction which had secretly developed within the Roman-Catholic Church during the middle ages, the Church vindicating Augustine as the highest theological authority theoretically, while practically it abandoned the fundamental doctrines of his system, and approached Semi-Pelagianism, was by Bajus brought into broad daylight. He clung with sincerity to Augustine's doctrines of sin and grace, and consequently he could not avoid coming into sharp opposition to the ruling tendency of the Church. A bitter controversy arose between him and his colleagues in the university. By the Church the whole affair was cautiously hushed up and smoothed over, treated as a mere matter of the school, on account of the dangerous proximity of the Reformation. But, in spite of all precautions, the question soon revived in the polemics between the Dominicans and the Jesuits (de auxiliis gratiae), and it finally burst forth in full flame in the Jansenist controversy. When, in 1551, four of the Louvain professors were excommunicated, Bajus was directed to step in and fill the vacancy; and when, shortly after, one of them died, he obtained his chair. As soon as the three others came home, they felt that a foreign influence had been at work, and in 1556 they effected a condemnation by the Sorbonne of eighteen propositions extracted from the lectures of Bajus. Bajus complained, and prepared for defence. But the Archbishop of Mechlin, Cardinal Granvelle, at once stopped the controversy, and commanded both parties to keep silent. In 1563, however, Bajus published a series of dogmatical tracts: De Libero Arbitrio; De Justitia; De Justificatione, etc.; in 1564 another series followed: De Merius Operum; De Prima Hominis Justitia; De Virtutibus Impiorum, etc.; in 1566 all these tracts were collected in Opera Omnia; and now his adversaries, the Louvain professors at the head, and the Franciscan monks in the rear, could not be kept quiet any more. In December, 1567, the papal bull (Ex omnibus afflictionibus) was issued, and in the formula of condemnation a comma was left out,—the famous Comma Pianum, which directly reverses the meaning when placed before or after a certain word. Bajus, however, took the bull in good faith, sent an apology to the pope, showed that some of the propositions were not his, others not his alone, but also Augustine's, etc.; and when a papal brief of May 13, 1569, still sustained the bull, he submitted and subscribed. It was feared, however, that, under a new pope, he would try to have the bull reversed; and under Gregory XIII. (1579) there was consequently issued a confirmation of it, which was to be followed up by a new subscription. Also Bajus's relations to the Reformers through St. Aldegunde, and his views of the episcopal authority, of the papal infallibility, etc., were very liberal, and spread widely in the Netherlands and Northern France. His collected works were published at Cologne, 2 vols., 1566, by Quesnel and Gerberon.
BAKING, BREAD. While, as a rule, the indispensable work of baking fell to the women, and at least one virgin princess did not consider it beneath her (2 Sam. xiii. 8), and every house had baking facilities, yet there were public bakers in the cities (Hos. vii. 4, 6); and in Jerusalem they gave the name to a street (Jer. xxxvii. 21). There were also court bakers (Gen. xi. 1; 1 Sam. vii. 13). Balaam's wife had her own oven, and yielded bread without stint, as the poorest from barley. The dough was made in wooden troughs, and leavened (Matt. xiii. 33). Unleavened bread was also used, as to-day in Palestine, and made in large paper-thin sheets: it is, however, probable that the loaves of the learned and much thicker bread were yet thin enough to be "broken;" for we do not read in the Bible of "cutting" bread (Lam. iv. 4; Matt. xvi. 26). The term "bread" is often used for food or provisions in general.

Baking is a very rapid process in the East. The mode to-day, and presumably the ancient mode was the same, is to press by means of a damp cloth a lump of dough, spread out thin, against the inner sides of a stone or metal jar about three feet high, which had been heated inwardly with wood, or dried grass and flower-stalks: in a minute the piece is baked. Heated stones and ashes (when the bread is put in pans) are also used to spread the cakes upon. But there were and are also regular ovens. The fuel was wood (Isa. xlv. 15); although in times of need camels', cattle's, and even human dung were used ( Ezek. iv. 12, 15). The Hebrews sometimes added oil to the ordinary bread (1 Kings xvii. 12). A cake made of flour twice kneaded, and probably fried in fat, seems to be meant in 2 Sam. xiii. 6, 8, 10. ORELLI.

BALAM (decourer) was a Jehovah prophet who lived in Pethor, a city of Northern Mesopotamia, not far from the Euphrates. The interesting episode in his life is related at length in Num. xxiii. 5-xxiv. 25: reference is made to him in Num. xxxi. 8, 18; 2 Pet. ii. 15, 18; Jude 11, Rev. ii. 14. The story is briefly this: Balak, king of Moab, finding himself unable to oppose Israel in battle, called upon Balaam, who had a great reputation in the East as a sorcerer and prophet, and who withal was a worshipper of the God of the Israelites, to curse them, thinking that the curse of a fellow-worshipper would be more efficacious than that of the heathen. On receiving the invitation, Balaam consulted Jehovah, and being refused permission he declined to go. A second and more imposing deputation of Moab and Midian, with promises of wealth and dignity, excited the curiosity of Balaam, who again consulted Jehovah, and this time was granted permission to go, with the distinct understanding that he was to say the words, and none other, that Jehovah would put into his mouth. He gladly went, dreaming of future glory, apparently not perceiving that the condition of the divine permission rendered such dreaming vain. On the journey the angel of Jehovah opposed his path, and it was then the ass spake; showing herself to be a more willing servant of Jehovah than her master. Balaam and Balak met, and the former told the king very plainly that he had no power to say anything except what God put into his mouth. Balak was both surprised and increasingly indignant to hear the famous prophet, whom he had been at so much pains to bring to curse Israel, bless them in exalted and inspired words. Never did the divine afflatus act so grandly. For the first two times Balaam kept up the form of the heathen auguries; but the last time, perceiving how the divine mind worked, he abandoned incantations and lonely watchings, and yielded himself up wholly to Jehovah, in a strain of eloquence never excelled, he described the future of Israel. Balak quite naturally dismissed him in anger; and the disdained, ruined prophet went back towards Pethor, but on his way stopped among the Midianites, and out of sheer desperation, desiring to regain popularity, counselled the seduction of the Israelites unto the worship of Baal-Peor by means of the Moabite and Midianite women, shrewdly judging that idolatry would quickest destroy them. See BAAL.

Thus Num. xxiv. 25 and xxxi. 8 are reconciled.

In the war which ensued, Balaam was killed; and thus the curtain drops upon a strange life, but one of great instructiveness. Balaam is used in the New Testament as the type of those who love the wages of unrighteousness, and tempt unto sin. Very aptly Hengstenberg compares him to Simon Magus (Acts viii. 9-24).

That there are difficulties connected with the narrative is no reason for rejecting it. It is too strange not to be true, and too fitting to the time to be the product of any other age. Balaam was a bad man, though a true prophet. He had no sincere convictions of the superiority of Jehovah. He followed him because it suited his interests. Thus "a man may be full of the knowledge of God, and yet utterly destitute of the grace of God."

BALDE. Jacob, b. Jan. 4, 1604, at Ensisheim, Alsace; d. Aug. 9, 1698, at Neuburg, in the Bavarian palatinate; was educated in the University of Ingolstadt; entered the order of the Jesuits in 1624; became court-preacher and Bavarian historiographer in Munich, 1640, confessor and court-preacher to the count-palatine, Philipp Wilhelm; and above all, a poet. Out of gratitude for the favor shown him by every French court he wrote "I motets, satires, and epics, of a romantic, humorous, and religious character. His Ode Parthenia to the Virgin were separately published in 1648. His Urania Victor (1657), describing the contest between the Christian soul and the temptation of the five senses, impressed Pope Alexander VII. so much that he sent the author a golden medal. A collected edition of his works appeared at Cologne, 1600, and a more complete one at Munich, 1729. Minor selections have often been made; for instance, by Orelli, 1805. See Georg Westermayer: Jacobus Balde, sein Leben u. seine Werke, München, 1888.

BALDWIN, Thomas, d. at Acre, Nov. 20, 1191; was born at Exeter, in humble circumstances, but received a good education, and was archdeacon of Exeter when he entered the Cistercian monastery of Ford, in Devonshire, whose abbot he afterwards became; was made Bishop of Worcester in 1180, and Archbishop of Canterbury in 1184; crowned Richard I. in 1189, and accompanied him in 1190 to the Holy Land. Some treatises by him have been published by Bertrand Tissier in Script. Bibl. Cisterciens, V., 1882.

BALE, John, b. at Cove, Suffolk, Nov. 21, 1193; d. at Canterbury, November, 1563; was educated in the Carmelite monastery of Norwich, and at Jesus College, Oxford, but embraced the Reformation, and had to seek refuge in Flanders; returned under Edward VI. and was made Bishop of Ossory, in Ireland, 1552, but fled to the Continent after the accession of Mary, and lived for some years at Basle; returned under Elizabeth, and was made prebendary of the Church of Canterbury in 1550. His principal work is Illustrium Majors Britanniae Scriptorum Catalogus, first published in 1548, then considerably enlarged in 1537–50; but he also became noted as a writer of Miracle-plays, in which he violently attacked bishops. His play Kinge Johan has been published by the Camden Society (1838); and the Parker Society has published a selection of his works (1849).

BALL, John, b. at Cassington, near Woodstock, in Oxfordshire, October, 1585; d. Oct. 20, 1610. He was educated at Brazen-nose College and St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, and in 1610 was ordained, and became minister at Whitmore, near Newcastle, where he remained until his death. He was the second of the faithful Puritans, one of the fathers of Presbyterianism in England, and, as Baxter says, "deserving as high esteem and honor as the best bishop in England." He issued a Small Catechism containing the Principles of Religion, which reached an eighteenth impression in 1637; and also a larger Catechism, entitled A short Treatise, containing all the principal Grounds of Christian Religion, which reached a tenth impression in 1635. These were published anonymously, and highly esteemed and widely used, and were among those consulted by the Westminster divines. He also published A Treatise of Faith, divided into two parts: the first showing the Nature, and the second the Life of Faith," London, 1631 (3d edition, corrected and enlarged 1657, 4to, pp. 428, with an introduction by Richard Sibley), an exceedingly valuable and complete discussion, his chief work, etc. published after his death by his friend Simeon Ashe, with an introduction signed by five Westminster divines, entitled A Treatise of the Covenant of Grace, London, 1645. This is of great importance as exhibiting that view of the covenants which found expression in the Westminster symbols. According to Thomas Blake, "his purpose was to speak on this subject of the covenant, all that he had to say in all the whole body of divinity. That which he hath left behind gives us a taste of it." In this he anticipated Cocceius and the Dutch Federal Theology, as indeed his view of the covenants is somewhat different from theirs. Simeon Ashe also issued several other works of Ball of a practical and controversial character.

C. A. BRIGGE.

BALLANTHE, Pierre Simon, b. in Lyons, Aug. 4, 1776; d. in Paris, Aug. 7, 1847; was an intimate member of that circle which formed around Chateaubriand and Madame Récamier, and belonged to the theocratic school of philosophers which arose in France during the restoration. His Palingénèse Sociale, 1830, is an attempt to construct the philosophy of history on the basis of the Christian revelation. The same idea is also set forth in his Vision d'Hébal, 1841, and Esquisse sur les Institutions, 1856. See St. Véran: Portraits Contemporains II.; J. J. Ampère: Balanche, 1818.

BALLE, Nicolai Edinger, b. in the Island of Lolland, Denmark, Oct. 12, 1744; d. in Copenhagen, Oct. 19, 1818; was appointed professor of theology in the University of Copenhagen, 1772, and Bishop of Seeland, 1789, and retired from public life in 1808. He wrote the primer, after which all children in Denmark, from 1794 to 1836, were taught Christianity; but the book was not a good one. Compared with the New Testament, which it professed to summarize in systematic form, it was singularly out of tune, and so was the man himself with respect to the time whose spiritual leader he was set to be. A Pietist by heart and education, he was a rationalist by study and intellect; and placed between two generations,—of which the one had been commanded to go to church twice every Sunday, under penalty of a money-fine or bodily punishment; while the other proposed to shut up the churches, and use them as public warehouses,—he misunderstood them both, and only added to the confusion. In Copenhagen he began a course between the Christiansouls and the temptation of the flesh; but he had to stop because he could not prevent loafers from playing cards in the pews. Out, in the country he employed the force of the police to introduce his Church; and children were actually taken away from their parents, in order to be educated in what the government considered the only true Christianity. Personally, however he was a pious, kind-hearted, and well-meaning man.

BALLERINI, two brothers from Verona.—Pietro, b. Sept. 7, 1698, and Girolamo, b. Jan. 29, 1702,—who, educated in the school of the Jesuits, and afterwards ordained priest, became celebrated by their joint labors on church-history and canon law. They edited the Sermones S. Xeronis, 1739, the Summa S. BALLOU, Hosea, b. at Richmond, N. J., April 30, 1771; d. at Boston, June 7, 1852: was the son of a poor Baptist minister, and struggled hard for an education; began to preach in 1792, but embraced Universalism and Unitarianism; settled at Dana, Mass., in 1794, but removed in 1802 to Barnard, Vt.; in 1807 to Portsmouth, N. H.; in 1815 to Salem, Mass.; and in 1817 to Boston, where he took charge of the Second Universalist Society. He founded the Universalist Magazine in 1810, and in 1831 the Universalist Expositor. He also wrote Notes on the Parables, 1804; Treatise on the Atonement, 1807; The Doctrine of Future Retribution, 1846, and several volumes of sermons. — Hosea Ballou, jun., nephew of the preceding, b. at Halifax, Vt., Oct. 18, 1786; d. at Somerville, Mass., May 27, 1861: was successively pastor of North Roxbury, Ayer, Medford, and from 1853 president of Tufts College at Medford, Mass. He edited the Universalist Expositor, and Universalist Quarterly, and wrote The Ancient History of Universalism, 1820.

BALM in the Old Testament is supposed to be the resin of the terebuth or turpentine tree, which flows out spontaneously or through cuttings. It is exceedingly odoriferous, and greatly esteemed in the East for its healing properties. Gilead was especially noted for it (Jer. viii. 22, xlvi. 11, cf. Gen. xxxvii. 25). But this is not the genuine balsam. The latter is known as balsam, incense, myrrh, bdellium, according to its different forms. The chief variety (Amyris Gient. L.) is mostly thornless, has large triple leaves, numerous blossoms, and small, roundstone fruit. Myrrh, native to the south coast of Arabia, has short, thorny branches, and small triple leaves. Josephus and Greek and Roman writers have much to say about balm. The former relates that the Queen of Sheba (1 Kings x. 10) brought from Arabia the first balsam-root to Solomon. On the other hand, Greek and Arabic authors affirm that the genuine balsam does not exist outside of Palestine. Certain it is that the gardens of Jericho produced the finest kind; so that Pompey brought it from there to Rome, and the Romans derived revenue from it. Cleopatra imported it thence into Egypt, and planted it in the famous gardens of Mataren, between Bilbeis and Cairo.

BALSAMON, Theodore, d. towards the end of the twelfth century, deacon and librarian at the Church of St. Sophia, Constantinople; wrote, besides other works which have not been printed, a complete commentary on the Nomocanon and the Syntagma of Photios (1106-77), in which he tries to decide how far the civil laws mentioned in the Nomocanon are authoritative or not. The commentary on the Nomocanon was first printed in Paris in 1615, edited by Christof Justellus, and again in 1620 in Bibliotheca Juris Canonici by Voellus and Justellus. The Commentary on the Syntagma is found in Beveridge: Synopsis I. See MONTREUIL: Histoire du Droit Egypton, Paris, 1816, III.

BALMES, Jaime Lucio, an eminent Spanish politico-religious writer, b. at Vich, Catalonia, Aug. 26, 1810; d. there July 6, 1848. His parents were poor; but he was able to get a good education, — first in his native town, and then in the University of Cervera, whither he went in 1826, and where he took the different degrees. He was ordained, and in 1832 became an assistant professor. In 1835 he was made a doctor, in 1837 professor. During these years Spain was rent by the strife between Maria Christina and Don Carlos. Balmes watched keenly the struggle, and while engaged in teaching, or literary work, still kept his eye upon the changes of the time. In 1840 he published a catechism, which had a large circulation. In 1842 he became associate editor of the Civilizacion, a literary journal, in which he had the coveted opportunity to express his political views. From February, 1844, to Dec. 31, 1846, he carried on the Pensamiento de la Nacion, and endeavored to repress the revolutionary spirit of his people, and advocate very strenuously the novel project of a marriage between the queen and the son of Don Carlos as the best way of ending the troubles; and when the queen was otherwise disposed of, he discontinued his journal, although it was lucrative. He still sought, however, the education of his people in what he conceived to be a sound philosophy. He hailed the advent of Pope Pius IX., and wrote a brilliant work (Pio IX., Madrid and Paris, 1847) in his praise: it was the last work he published. His principal works are two: (1) Filosofía fundamental, Barcelona, 1846, 4 vols.; translated into French, 1852, 3 vols.; into English, by H. F. Brownson, New York, 1857, 3 vols.; (2) El Protestantismo y el Catolicismo en sus relaciones con la civilización Europea, Madrid, 1848, 3 vols. 8vo.; English translation from the French by Hanford and Kershaw, Protestantism and Catholicism compared in their effects on the Civilization of Europe, London, 1810; American reprint, translation revised, 2d ed., Baltimore, 1853. This latter famous book (see A. de BLANCHE-RAPFIN: Jacques Balmes, sa vie et ses ouvrages, Paris, 1850) is an audacious attempt to show, by a review of modern civilization, in opposition to Guizot, that the influence of Catholicism has been vastly superior to that of Protestantism. The arguments are, of course, in the main, weak; but the book has accomplished its object, — it has retarded the Protestant cause in Spain.

BALUZE, Etienne, b. at Tulle, Limousin, Dec. 24, 1630; d. in Paris, July 28, 1718; was edu-
that the book of Baluze might be used in support of offence. But in 1710 the cardinal fell in disgrace of claims which the house of Bouillon made on the Dissertationes de Concordia Sacerdotii et Imperii, 1663, is the most important. Of his editions of older authors, that of Salvian and Vincent of Lérins appeared in 1683; that of Lupus of Ferrières, in 1684; that of Agobard, Amulo, Leidrad, and Florus Dianois, in 1690, etc. Of his great collections of historical documents, the Capitularia Regum Francorum appeared in 1677; the Epistolae Innocentii III., in 1682; the Nora Collectio Conciliorum, 1693, and his Miscellaneorum Nora Collectio Conciliorum, 1683. Of his more independent works the Vice Popurarum Aenemonium appeared in 1693, and his Miscellaneorum Libri Septem in 1677, 1679, 1680, 1683, 1700, 1713, and 1715. His last work was an edition of Cyprian, which he left unfinished, but which was completed by Maran.

BAMBAS, Neophyto, d. in Athens, 1835; was born in the Island of Chios; studied in Paris, and worked as professor of philosophy and rhetoric, first in the University of Corfu, then in that of Athens. He wrote manuals of ethics, rhetoric, and grammar; and, in connection with Nicholaides and Lowndes, he translated the Bible into modern Greek.

BAMPTON LECTURES, a series of eight lectures or sermons to be delivered annually at the University of Oxford, “to confirm and establish the Christian faith, and to confute all heresies and schismatics.” They were instituted by John Bampton, Canon of Salisbury (b. 1689; d. 1751), who left his estate for that purpose. The lecturer must at least be a master of arts from Oxford or Cambridge. He is chosen by the heads of colleges, and no one can be chosen a second time. The lectures began in 1780, and the volumes containing them form a valuable body of apologetical literature. See Lectures.

BAN denoted, in the civil law of the old German Empire, a declaration of outlawry, and was in the twelfth century adopted by the church as the common name for a declaration of excommunication. See Excommunication.

BANCROFT, Richard, b. at Farnworth, Lancashire, 1544; d. in Lambeth Palace, London, Nov. 2, 1610; was educated in the University of Cambridge, and became Bishop of London in 1597, and Archbishop of Canterbury in 1605. He was a High-Churchman, asserting that the episcopal authority is based upon a divine right, and most violently opposed to the Puritans, whom he often attacked in his sermons. As president of the Convocation, he presented for adoption the Book of Canons now in force, and as archbishop he was “the chief overseer” of the authorized version of the Bible, which he had opposed at the Hampton Court Conference (1604). His literary remains are unimportant.

BANGORIAN CONTROVERSY. See Howell, Bishop of Bangor.

BANBAR, Richard, b. at Vadallod, 1567; d. at Medina del Campo, 1601; entered the order of the Dominicans in 1544; lectured on theology in Valadolid, Alcina, and Avila; became the confessor of St. Theresa, and contributed, as an ardent disciple of Thomas Aquinas, very much to the condemnation of the works of Molina. Among other works he has also written a commentary on the Summa Theologiae of St. Thomas.

BANNS (plur. of ban), a public announcement in church, during service, of an intended marriage, seem to have originated very early as a custom in the Christian community, since to it Tertullian repeatedly alludes. In the English Church they became a legal enactment in 1200, when the synod of Westminster decreed that “no marriage shall be contracted without banns thrice published in the church.” So also in the Lutheran churches of Europe. The Council of the Lateran, 1215, established them as law for the whole Latin Church.

BANQUET. See Meals.

BAPHOMET (“Baptism of Metis”), a peculiar kind of figures carved in stone or wood, with two faces, one male and one female, and surrounded by serpents. Of their symbolical meaning nothing definite is known, though they played a conspicuous part in the process of the Templars, to whose insignia they belonged. See Vox Nell: Baphometische Actenstuke, Vienna, 1819.

BAPTISM. (A Pedobaptist View.) Meaning and Use of Terms. — Barrius is a derivative, modifying the meaning of its root, Barro. Barro means: (1) To do a definite act, to dip; (2) To effect a definite change of condition, to dye; (3) To effect a thorough change of condition by assimilating quality or influence, without color, to temper, to steep, to imbue. Thus Barro tempers iron by water or oil, Sophocles, Ajax 651, 653 (Scholiun); steeps with dew, Dan. iv. 30. v. 21. Septuagint: steeps with poison, Strabo, Geography, XVII., 117. immolution, Bentley, Epigraphs, 136; implies with Caesarism, Marcus Aurelius, Meditations, VI., 25; imubes with integrity, III., 6; imubes by thoughts, V., 17; imubes with Judaism, Epictetus, Enchiridion, XI., 9. These changes of condition in number and diver-ity, specialized by the characteristic of the agens, and the act of baptizing. But Baptism is, on every hand, burdened by two meanings, does not follow out this third meaning, but turns it over for development to its derivative, Baptismo.

1. Classic Baptism.—Baptismo means thoroughly to change condition by characteristic assimilating quality or influence, controlling (like its root) any act or method to this end. Thus ships and crews sunk by destructive storm or beak of hostile ship are drunkenly baptized. An altar ceremonially cleansed by water poured or sprinkled on it is ceremonially baptized. Convivialists drinking intoxicating wine are drunkenly baptized. And a man drinking a soporific draught is baptized, thoroughly changed in condition, conformably with this soporific characteristic. For proof in detail of these positions, see the author's Classic Baptism.

2. Judaic Baptism.—This is a thorough change of condition from ceremonial defilement to ceremonial purity. Heifer-ashes mixed with spring water had such legal cleansing power. As the touch of a grave defiled the whole body, so a drop of this sprinkled ashes purfied the whole body. Josephus, Jen. Antiq., IV., 4; Philo, De Sacrificantibus: Cyril of Alex., In Instaur. III., 129; Heb. ix. 13. When long and familiar use drops the defining agency, Baptismo, absorbing its idea, expresses definite condition, as in Sirach xxxiv. 30; Judith xii. 7; Mark vii. 4; Luke xi. 39; Heb. ix. 11. In such and such like cases, Baptismo means to purify ceremonially. See, for evidence, the author's Judaic Baptism.

3. Baptism of Inspiration.—This is "one baptism," a thorough change of spiritual condition, assimilating the soul to the characteristic quality of the divine baptizer. Its elements are repentance and faith: its results are remission and regeneration. It is grounded in the personal baptism of Jesus, covenanting to "fulfil all righteousness" (Matt. iii. 15), and to endure sacrificial death (Mark x. 33). It is effected by the Holy Ghost (Matt. iii. 11), received by all who enter into the kingdom of God (John iii. 3; 1 Cor. xii. 13). Its final issue is baptism "into the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost,"—subjection, reconciliation, and affiliation with the living God.

(1) The baptism of John preached (Matt. iii. 2; Luke iii. 3; Acts xiii. 24) was this "one baptism" in swelling bud; the Holy Ghost and Lamb of God within it, not yet unfolded. (2) The baptism of John administered was this "one baptism" in symbol, "making manifest Jesus, the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world" (John i. 29, 31; Matt. iii. 11; Acts xix. 4). (3) The baptism of Christianity is John's baptism unfolded, revealing the Lamb of God slain and the Holy Ghost sent (Acts ii. 23, 33, 38, x. 46, x. 19). (4) The symbol-baptism of Christianity is the perpetuation of the symbolism of the baptism John "preached," and of the "one baptism" of inspiration (John i. 28–33, iii. 22, iv. 2; Acts x. 47).

Baptismo ις expresses the ideal (Cremer, Bib. Thes., s.v. "Baptismo") passing into a spiritual element, ις μεταστασιν eis metasastasin (John iii. 5), "transformation into." Baptismo anticipates corresponding Baptos ατομο (Christianity), by which the baptized are thoroughly changed in condition, being conformed to the characteristic of the element by the power of the Holy Ghost. In Mark i. 8, ις is related to ἄνευ (Matt. xii. 13; Greg. Thaum.: De Christi Baptismo).

Baptismo τῦ is never associated with the ideal element of baptism. Acts x. 48 is no exception (see Coxeit Sinaiticus). The phrase expresses locality and agency: it cannot express passive into; with ἄνευ (Mark i. 5) it means the place where, within the banks of the river, not within the water (Iliad, XVIII., 321). No person in the New Testament is shown, by word or fact, to be under water in the administration of baptism. Sprinkling being used by inspiration to apply the blood of the type lamb of the flock, and to express the reception of the antitype blood of the Lamb of God (1 Pet. i. 2), we have divine authority to apply the water, symbol of this antitype blood, by sprinkling; and no other essentially diverse way is authorized. For minute detail and evidence, see the author's Johannic and Christian Baptism.

4. Patrician Baptism is claimed to be, and in fact is, the same in nature with the "one baptism" of inspiration. It has the same elements.—repentance, faith, remission, regeneration; the same ground basis,—the redemptive work of the incarnate Son of God; the same divine agent,—the Holy Spirit; the same ultimate end,—reconciliation with God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. It departs, in its accomplishment, from inspiration, in that "baptized" water is made co-efficient with the Holy Spirit to this end (Cyprian, see Tertullian, Migne's edition, III., 1082); also in the abandonment of the symbol-baptism of inspiration; and, further, in the introduction of a symbol-burial with Jesus in the rock sepulchre, by covering the baptized in water. This "burial" has been mistaken for the baptism. The mistake is as great and absolute as the making of θαυματία for Baptistismo. These early Christian writers make καθαρίσθη, καταλώσαι, καταθέσει, and such like words, interchangeable with θαυμα, but never with Baptistismo. On the other hand, they make καθαρίζω, ἀγιάζω, λοιφά, and such like words, equivalent and interchangeable with Baptistismo, but never with θαυματία. This symbol-burial is derived from Rom. vi. 4, where there is no confusion of θαυματία and Baptistismo. The originators of symbol-burial (not symbol-baptism) never confounded Paul's "burial in the rock" with Paul's "baptism into the death of Christ" on the cross. Such supreme error was reserved for to-day. They repudiate it: 1. Because they claim their baptism to be spiritual, a baptism of the soul by the Holy Spirit, and "baptized" water imbued with the Holy Spirit; 2. Because they omit this symbol-burial "almost daily" in baptizing the sick, yet declare the baptism "perfect." 3. Because they abundantly cite "images of baptism" which have no "covering." 4. Because they declare baptism by blood, tears, fire, sword, touch, to be glorious and perfect "baptisms"—not burials. 5. Because they deny that "simple" water can, by any covering, effect their baptism. 6. Because their baptizing water was "baptized" (purified, sanctified), "that it might be able, by its own baptism," to impart the same efficacy to others. And long usage in relations with remission and regeneration had given to Baptistismo (not θαυματία) the meaning, to cleanse from sin, to regenerate. These reasons are solidified by the following definition of Basil the Great, Moralia III., 768: “What is the purport and power of the (Christian) baptism?” “Thoroughly to change the baptized as to mind, speech, and act, so as to become, conformably with the power bestowed, such as is that of which he was born.” There is no “burial” in this definition. Through the whole of Christian testimony to the Christian church for twelve hundred years—the only case of great sickness was any other act allowed, and then only as a quasi-baptism.

The many ancient baptisteries now remaining in Asia, Africa, and Europe, were built and used for the purpose of immersion. The Oriental, Greek, Russian, Armenian, Nestorian, Coptice, and others, have always practised immersion, and allow nothing else for baptism. Gass, Symbolik der griechischen Kirche, 1872, pp. 242, 243. The western churches also preserved the baptism of the New Testament for thirteen hundred years, and then gradually introduced pouring or sprinkling. W. Dale, Inquiry into the Meaning of “Baptize,” Philologically and Historically Investigated, 1860, vol. 1, p. 109; Daniel, Codex Liturgicus (1847–53), vol. 1, p. 179 ff.; Wetzer and Welte, Kirchen-Lex. Art. “Taufe.” Luther sought, against the tendency of the times, to restore immersion (Opera Lat. 3: 394; Works 21: 17, 130, 216, 253, etc. Erlangen ed.). The rubric, in Luther’s Taufbüchlein of 1523 and 1527, to immerse (“tauche es.” [Daniel, vol. 2, p. 199, note with quotations from Luther’s works]) the candidate, was retained in many of the Agenda of the Lutheran churches during the sixteenth century. Hofling, Sacr. d. Taufe (vol. 1, p. 53, vol. 2, p. 56, 64), just as the rubric “to dip” is still retained in the baptismal service of the English and American Episcopal churches. Calvin was the first to assert that immersion was of no importance; whether the person who is baptized be wholly immersed, and whether thrice or once, or whether water be only poured or sprinkled upon him, is of no importance: churches ought to be left at liberty in this respect to act according to the difference of countries. The very word baptism, however, signifies to immerse; and it is certain that immersion was the practice of the ancient church” (Instit., Bk. IV., ch. 15, sect. 19).

All western churches, except the Baptist, have accepted sprinkling. The Recipients.—Among the last teachings and precepts of the Saviour to his apostles were these: “That repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. And ye are witnesses of these things” (Luke xxiv. 47, 48). “Go ye and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved” (Mark xvi. 15, 16). “Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you” (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20).

Acceptance of the baptism of the New Testament and of the early ages of Christianity was a dipping, a submersion of the candidate in water. All philologists and lexicographers of the Greek language give “immersion” as the constant significance of the noun or verb. The archaeologists Augusti, De Rossi, Garucci, Martigny, De Vogüé, etc., tell us that the monumental remains in Asia, Africa, and Europe, prove that immersion was the act of baptism. Historians, and theologians, and those who treat of the origin of the Christian church, unite in the same testimony. See Wall, Hist Infant Bapt. (vol. 1, p. 570). Oxford 1862; Hoffing, Sacr. d. Taufe (vol. 1, p. 40). There is not a dissenting voice in all the literature of the Christian church for twelve hundred years—only in case of great sickness was any other act allowed, and then only as a quasi-baptism.
and to "teach them to observe all things whatsoever Jesus had commanded them."

The examples given in the New Testament of baptisms by the apostles show us how they understood and obeyed these precepts. They baptized those who "repented" and "received their word" (Acts ii. 38, 41); those who "believed" (Acts vii. 56, 58; ix. 18, x. 47, 48; xvi. 15, 33, xviii. 8, xix. 5).

The mental states the apostles predicate of the baptized are those of believers only. They have died to sin, and been made alive to God to walk in newness of life (Rom. vi. 4); they drink of the "living water" (John vii. 37, 38). They were "raised to life with Christ, through faith, with Christ in his death and resurrection" (Gal. iii. 27, comp. Rom. xiii. 14); they "are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ Jesus have put on Christ" (Gal. iii. 27); they were "raised to life with Christ through the faith of the operation of God" (Col. ii. 12); and by Peter baptism is said to be, "not the putting-away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer" (earnest seeking, requirement) "of a good conscience toward God" (1 Pet. iii. 21).

The designations of the churches by Paul lead to the same conclusion. The churches are addressed, as those who are "sanctified," "called," "holy," who "call upon the name of Christ" (1 Cor. i. 2; 2 Cor. i. 1); "saints, believers" (Eph. i. 1, 22, 23); "once alienated, and enemies in their minds," but now "reconciled" (Col. i. 21); they brought forth "a work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope" (1 Thess. i. 3; 2 Thess. i. 3).

But in the second and third century after the apostolic age, the mystical power of regeneration was by many ascribed to baptism. It was imagined that none could be saved without baptism, and gradually the baptism of infants was introduced. The growth of this new custom was very slow. Many of the most eminent Christians of the fourth century did not baptize their infants. Gregory of Nazianzum in Cappadocia (b. A.D. 330), the son of a bishop, and his mother the saintly Nonna, was not baptized till he was converted at thirty years of age. Basil the Great, also of Cappadocia (b. A.D. 329), whose mother was the pious Emmelia, was not baptized till she was converted, when about thirty years old. Chrysostom of Antioch in Syria (b. A.D. 347), whose mother Anthusa was one of the noblest Christian women, was not baptized till he was converted. And the son of the holy Monica, Augustine of Numidia, was not baptized till he was converted at the age of thirty-two. Here were four of the most eminent Christians of the fourth century, who prayed for their infants both before and after their birth, who did not have them baptized. No plausible theory has yet been found to harmonize these facts with the assumed institution of infant-baptism by Christ. To the present time it has been found "difficult, if not impossible, to give a definition of the sacraments in their great leading fundamental aspects, which would at the same time apply to and include the special case of the baptism of infants" (W. Cunningham, Reformers and Theory of Reformation, p. 195). Thus arises from the contradiction between infant-baptism and the fundamental doctrines of the gospel,—election, regeneration, justification by faith,—as well as from the absence of precept or example for infant-baptism in the New Testament.

Symbolism. — The passages referring to the symbolism of baptism are, "Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life" (Rom. vi. 3, 4, comp. vers. 2, 5–11); "buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him through the faith of the operation of God, who raised him from the dead" (Col. ii. 12); "for as many of you as have been baptized into Christ Jesus have put on Christ" (Gal. iii. 27).

Besides the public confession of God, three in one, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (Matt. xxviii. 19), baptism is a symbol of "putting on Christ" (Gal. iii. 27, comp. Rom. xiii. 14); of union, through faith, with Christ in his death and resurrection (Rom. vi. 3, 4; 1 Cor. xi. 13; Col. ii. 12); that is, those who were "dead in sins," having received forgiveness, have died with Christ to sin, and have been made "alive by God through Christ" to "walk in newness of life" (Rom. vi. 3–11; Col. ii. 12, 13).

the baptism of the Holy Spirit, of which John had prophesied (Matt. xxviii. 18-20; Mark xvi. 18), and that the two went together in the early church, is proved from Acts ii. 38, x. 44 sqq., the baptism of the Holy Spirit. Of which John of regeneration (John iii. 5; Tit. iii. 5). There the recipient is bound to die unto sin. The same idea is brought out in the analogy between baptism and the circumcision of Christ: the "putting-off of the body of the flesh" (Col. ii. 11). The church, is proved from Acts ii. 38, x. 44 sqq., xix. 1 sqq. The outward washing of the body symbolizes the cleansing by the word (Eph. v. 26), as the restoration of a good conscience (Heb. x. 22, 23). The power, however, to effect these changes, lies not in the water, but in God. It also symbolizes the burial with Christ (Rom. vi. 3, 4; Col. ii. 12), by reason of which the recipient is bound to die unto sin. The same idea is brought out in the analogy between baptism and the circumcision of Christ: the "putting-off of the body of the flesh" (Col. ii. 11).

It has also been considered by some a symbol of regeneration (John iii. 5; Tit. iii. 5). There is no trace of infant-baptism in the New Testament. See BAPTISM OF INFANTS. All attempts to deduce it from the words of institution, or from such passages as 1 Cor. i. 10, must be given up as arbitrary. Indeed, 1 Cor. vii. 14 ("For the unbelieving husband is sanctified in the wife, and the unbelieving wife in the husband: else were your children unclean; but now they are holy,") rules out decisively all such deductions; for, if pedobaptism were taught by Paul, he would have linked the salvation of the children with their baptism, and not with the faith of their parents. At the same time the passage brings out the justifying ground for pedobaptism; viz., the parental faith. Baptism was administered in running water.

II. Considered in its Relation to Johannic Baptism. The speculative question involved, has greatly interested the theologians. The opinion of antiquity on this point is well summarized by Bellarmine in his De Sacramento Baptismi, Lib. I., Cap. XIX.-XXII. (ed. Romae, 1838, tom. III., pp. 260-269), and amounts to this: (1) The baptism of John was not, like the Christian, a sacrament; for, although there was water, there was no invocation of the Trinity. (2) It had neither the power nor the efficiency of Christian baptism, because it was without the co-operation of the Holy Spirit. (3) In order to be saved, it was necessary for those who were baptized by John to receive Christian baptism.

On the other hand, the Lutheran and Reformed Confessions asserted the perfect identity of the two forms of baptism, principally on the ground that John had preached the fundamentals of the gospel. So Luther (Erlaegen Ausgabe, vol. 10, p. 169); Chemnitz (Examen Conc. Trident. de Bapt. can. 1); Gerhard (Loc. Theol., vol. IX., ed. Cotta, pp. 101-103). Zwingli (tom. III. 234) characteristically says, "They were both alike, as little water-washing as the other." And Calvin (Inst. IV., cap. 15, § 7, 8) saw in the office of the Baptist nothing different from that of the apostles, and so he attributed to John the same baptism. The Socinians and the Arminians took the Roman-Catholic position, which is doubtless correct on scriptural grounds alone, and agrees with the confession of the Baptist (Matt. iii. 11), the statement of Christ himself as to the relation of the same to the kingdom (Matt. xi. 11), and with the apostolic ideas that Christ gave a new spirit to mankind, that it dwells in his Church, and that the object of baptism is the reception into the communion of this spirit.

III. Considered Practically. (1) The Right to Baptize, and Lay Baptism. There is no evidence that in apostolic times the right to administer baptism was confined to any particular office. The deacon Philip (Acts viii. 38) and the apostle Paul (1 Cor. i. 14-16) baptized; but the latter does not seem to have considered it part of his duty. Probably the disciples baptized the first converts in a place, and then let them baptize the others. Still it may well have been, that, even in these times, baptism was usually administered by the chief officer of the congregation. Tertullian, while granting in the abstract the right to the laity on the ground that what all received in common might be dispensed by all in common, nevertheless demands, in the interests of ecclesiastical order and unity, that the exercise of this right, except in cases of necessity, be restricted to the ecclesiastics, ordinarily to the bishop (De Bapt. 17). To the same effect speaks Jerome (contra Luciferianos, 4) Cyprian is the first of the church fathers who limits the absolute prerogative of the bishop as the successor of the apostles and of the bearer of the keys (Epist. 73, 7); the Apostolical Constitutions also (III. 10) claim baptism for the priestly office exclusively. The early church custom gave to bishops, and then to presbyters and deacons commissioned by them, the right to baptize, but allowed it to the laity only in extreme cases. The schoolmen, particularly Thomas Aquinas, modified this teaching by extending the right to priests. The Roman Church in the Catechism of the Council of Trent (or Roman Catechism), P. II., c. II., qu. 23, teaches that priests and bishops have equal right in the matter: deacons also can baptize on commission of the bishop, and in case of need anybody,—man or woman, Christian or Jew, orthodox or heretics. Thus the present church is more liberal than some of her founders; for Tertullian denies the right to women, as the Apostolical Constitutions (III. 9) do; and it appears from Epiphanius (Hær. 42, 4), that it was looked upon as an heretical practice. Augustine believed that baptism by a Jew or a heathen would not, even if valid, be of equal efficacy to baptism.
by a Catholic or heretic (De Bapt. VII. 53, §§101, 102). Self-baptism was not valid. But baptism given in the proper words be used, is regarded as valid by Rome.

The two Protestant Confessions differ upon the question of lay-baptism. Luther asserted that baptism was necessary to salvation; so he granted to laity the right to baptize in cases of need, but inconsistently, if unbaptized infants were lost, if their failure to be baptized did not arise from either guilt, or contempt of the divine command. The Reformed rejected his doctrine, and restricted the right to the clergy.

(2) The Subjects of Baptism. — Church Councils have decided these are: First, only the living. The practice of baptizing the dead had sprung up among the latter Montanists. Second, only those who were born. The question is discussed by Augustine, whether infants in the womb were fit subjects of baptism, and answered negatively (Ep. 157, cap. 10, § 32 sqq.). The scholastic theology allows the baptism of partially born children, even where there is an abnormal presentation; although, in the latter case, Thomas Aquinas taught, that, if the child survived, it should receive the hypothetical baptism spoken of below (Summa Theologica, Pars Tertia, Q. LXVIII., art. 11). Abortive and abnormal births are not to be baptized. Grown persons who are insane are to be baptized, if they shall ever desire it.

As the general condition of baptism, there must be the unforced decision and the personal desire of the candidate: in the case of infants of Christian parents, the agreement of parents or guardians is accepted instead. It is true that force has been used by Roman missionaries, and has been defended by councils but its use is exceptional, and contrary to the principles of the church. (Roman Catechism, P. II., c. II., qn. 37.) All those grown persons who followed a "disreputable or godless calling," as, for instance, Pagan actors, artists who maintained Paganism, and Aspersion (Sprinkling). — In the primitive church, baptism was by immersion except in the case of the sick (clinical baptism), who were baptized by pouring or sprinkling. These latter were often regarded as not properly baptized, either because they had not completed their catechumenate, or because the symbolism of the rite was not fully observed, or because of the small amount of water necessarily used. [The 12th Canon of the Council of Neo-Caesarea (314-325) is: "Whoever has received clinical baptism (through his own fault) cannot become a priest, because he professed his faith under pressure (fear of death), and not from deliberate choice, unless he greatly excel afterwards in zeal and faith, or there is a deficiency of other eligible men." Hefele, Concilien geschichte Vol. I. § 17, 1st ed. In 816 the Council of Calcuith (Chelsea in England) forbade the priests to pour water upon the infants' heads, but ordered to immerse them [Hefele, Vol. IV. § 416]; the Council of Nemours (1281) limited sprinkling to cases of necessity; and Thomas Aquinas (Summa Theologica P. III. qu. LXVI.: De Baptismo, art. vii.) says, although it may be safer to baptize by immersion, yet sprinkling and pouring are also allowable. The Council of Ravenna (1311) was the first to allow a choice between sprinkling and immersion (11th Can. Hefele, Vol VI. § 690); but at an earlier date, 287, the 12th Canon of the Council of the Liege bishop John prescribe the way in which the sprinkling of children should be performed. The practice first came into common use at the end of the thirteenth century, and was favored by the growing rarity of adult baptism. It is the present practice of the Roman Church; but in the Greek Church immersion is insisted on as essential. Luther sided with the immersionists, described the baptismal act as an immersion, and derived Taufe (German for "baptism") from tief ("deep"), because what one baptized, he sank tief in the water. Calvin declared the whole question of the mode of baptism a matter of indifference (Inst. IV. c. 15, §10). Baptism in the early church was a triple immersion. Various explanations were given; some referred it to apostolic custom. Thomas Aquinas calls it a "triple" baptism only once (c. qu. LXVI. art. vii.). The Roman ritual enjoins the trine affusion (pouring) on the head, as do the Lutheran Kirchenordnungen. Some prescribe the simple dip or pouring; others, expressly the trine pouring or sprinkling. Calvin (i.e.) regards the number of times as of no consequence.

(3) The Time of Baptism. — Tertullian maintained all times were alike; but still very early in the church determined upon the period between Easter and Whitsunday, when the so-called "Solem­n Baptism" was administered. These times were chosen with especial reference to the cate­chumens: but as infant baptism gained in favor, indifference as to the time increased. Complaints were heard, and remedies suggested, in the church councils; e.g., the second Council of Macon, Oct. 23, 1555, in its third canon decreed, on the strength of the statement that only two or three were pre­sented for baptism at Easter, that, except in necessary cases, baptisms must take place on Easter (Hefele, Vol. IV. § 280). Thomas Aquinas lays down the following principles (I. c. qu. LXVIII. art. 3), which are adopted in the Roman Catechism (qu. 31, 31-36): infants are to be bap­tized soon after birth, because they are liable to die, and also are at that age incapable of instruc­tion; but adults should not be baptized before they are thoroughly indoctrinated, and can wait for "solemn baptism." If, when they are fully prepared, there is danger in delay, there is no reason to wait until the Easter season. As a matter of fact, one finds in Rome and in cathedrals on Easter eve, no baptism except occa­sionally a Jew's. In the Greek Church there is no longer any set time.

(6) Sponsors were probably unknown before the existence of infant baptism: with them also came in a special liturgy. Originally the parents themselves took the usual vows; but the council of Mainz (Mayence), 813, can. 55, forbade them; and the Roman Catechism (qu. 28) defends the present practice on the singular ground that the difference between the spiritual and the bodily education of the child may be all the sharper emphasized. The Roman Church has detailed with great minuteness the duties of sponsors, and described in varied phrases their position. So close is supposed to be the relationship between the sponsors and those whom they have brought to baptism, that they are not permitted to marry. If they should marry, the church declares the bond dissolved. Nor can the baptizer and baptized marry. Sponsors are mentioned in the fourth century in connection with adults at baptism; and they were necessary, because of the inability of the clergy to keep watch of all who applied for baptism, and see that their walk corresponded with their profession. And even catechumens would need sponsors, if, by sudden sickness, they were deprived of speech or consciousness.

Deacons, deaconesses, widows, consecrated vir­gins, were favorite classes from which to choose sponsors. Priests, monks, and nuns were forbid­den to serve. In the beginning each baptized one had a sponsor of the same sex; but soon several were common, notwithstanding conciliar action. The Roman Catechism (qu. 29) allows no sponsors of opposite sexes. At Avignon (1337) it was declared that the expensive ceremonies expected of sponsors was the reason why many infants were unbaptized: therefore the council forbade to give more than a white dress and a wax candle.

The choice of sponsors in those Protestant churches where they exist is guided by similar principles, and they discharge similar duties to those in the Roman Church. There are, how­
The entire baptismal service, with its exorcism, renunciations, and symbolical acts, had an unmistakable reference to the heathen cultus, which the Christians sought to work of demon, and implied that the neophyte had finally broken with Paganism. Two very important and most closely connected features in the development of the baptismal liturgy deserve mention: first, a union of the originally sharply distinguished catechumenate and baptismal rites became unavoidable in the case of the sick, who, dying, desired baptism; and second, that children, by reason of original sin, were looked upon as "heathens." To them the united catechumenate and baptismal rites were applied, exactly as if they had been heathens, only, of course, since the infant could not answer the questions, nor promise to perform the duties of the new relation, the god-parents answered for them. In this way the baptismal service for infants and adults was almost exactly the same. The baptismal rite in the Roman catacombs is in this mode: (1) the water to be used, having been consecrated with the oil of mystic unction at the festivals of Easter and Pentecost, is put in the font; the sponsor presents the infant to the priest, and answers the set questions; (2) the exorcism, which consists of a prayer, and prayer; (3) an act is put into the child's mouth to indicate that he shall be protected against the corruption of sin, shall experience a relish for good works, and shall be nurtured with the food of divine wisdom; (4) He is signed with the cross upon the forehead, eyes, breath, shoulders, and ears, to indicate that his senses are opened by baptism to comprehend the things of God; (5) his nose and ears are touched with spittal (cf. John ix. 6 sqq.) because baptism enlightens the understanding to the truth; (6) The Devil and his works are renounced by the infant through his sponsor; (7) He is next anointed on the breast with the oil of the catechumens, that he may receive the true faith, and between the shoulders, that he may engage actively in good works; (8) The Christian faith is professed by the sponsors; (9) He is asked whether he wishes to be baptized, and then immediately follows baptism: (10) His head is anointed with chrism in order to mark him as a member of the Body of Christ; (11) The child receives a white cloth (sudariolum), an adult a white robe; (12) A lighted candle is put into his hand, for a Christian must be a light; and finally (13) he receives the name of some saint. See Roman Catechism, pp. 62-72. Zwinglei and Luther characterize baptism as the opening of the Ritual. the former rejected it, while the latter adopted it. The present Lutheran Church retains it in a much modified form.

IV. Considered Theologically. (1) The Patristic Doctrine of Baptism. (a) The General Teaching. Great emphasis was early laid upon baptism. It was the condition of salvation; it gave pardon of sin, and imparted righteousness: so even in the Epistle of Barnabas (cap. 11) and the Shepherd of Hermas (I vis. III cap. 3). The Fathers generally speak of it with rhetorical and allegorical exuberance; and many are the phrases used to set its virtues forth, although at the same time they contributed to its theological development. It was common to call Christ the Fish (Ἰχθύς), because the letters of the Greek word for fish were the initial letters of the phrase "Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour" (Ἰησοῦς Χριστός Θεοῦ Υἱὸς Σωτῆρος). See Allegory. Hence we find Tertullian saying, "But we little fishes, after the example of our Ἰξῆς, Jesus Christ, are born in water; nor have we safety in any other way than by permanently abiding in the water." (De Bapt., cap. 1.) Justin Martyr sets opposite to the natural birth by ordinary generation the regeneration by water in baptism (Apod. 1. cap. 61). Three effects are attributed to baptism: 1. The forgiveness of all existing sins; 2. The impartation of the Holy Spirit and all his gifts and graces; 3. Immortal life. The more sensitive the mind of the church was to the symbolical representation of baptism, the more indistinct the line between shadow and substance, the more, of course, did the symbolism of the rite, webbed to it, its reference to the death and resurrection of Christ, favor the rhetorical representations so commonly given of it. But one finds more than rhetoric in the Fathers on this subject. 1. Many strive to distinguish sharper between the sign and the operating power, and to place them in a freer relationship. So Gregory Nazianzen (Or. 40, cf. Ulmann, Gregor von Nazianz, p. 461). 2. The ethical idea of baptism shows itself in the emphasis laid upon faith as the indispensable condition of the blessing on the rite. So Tertullian (De Paed., cap. 9). Gregory of Nyssa (De scop. Christi, p. 220), Gregory of Nazianzum (Or. 40, Ulmann, p. 461), and Jerome, who very plainly says (Enarr. in Ps. 77), "He who has not received baptism with a full faith has received water, not the Spirit." 3. The Greek Fathers regard baptism as the commencement, and not the completion, of sanctification. (Hieron. in Ps. 77. XXI.) However correct may have been the views of the teachers of the church, it is certain that the church-members entertained very erroneous notions. They ascribed to baptism a magical efficacy, and particularly the cleansing from sin, entirely irrespective of the religious state of the recipient: indeed, from the beginning of the fourth century the custom to widely prevailed of postponing baptism as long as possible, even to the death-hour, so that the recipient might continue his lax life, and by this one act get rid of all the past sins, and enter heaven perfectly pure. The Fathers condemn the custom. Thus Gregory of Nazianzus, in Or. 40, and Gregory of Nyssa has a special sermon against it. But other motives for delaying baptism were in operation,—dread of the trials of a professed Christian life, the stern discipline of the church toward the lapsed, the wish to be baptized at some particular time, etc., and, of a higher character, the fear of losing the grace of baptism, and the desire to be better prepared.—Baptism was considered indispensable to salvation; but there were two classes of persons whose will was taken for the deed, — martyrs who died for the faith (later teachers distinguish the Catholics from the heretics), and those catechumens who died suddenly.

Infant baptism came in quite naturally as the consequence of the belief in the necessity of baptism. Justin Martyr's phrase (I. Apol., c. 13), " Many who have been disciples of Christ from childhood," is not indeed to be interpreted as proving the practice in his day, but rather the existence of the catechumenate. On the other hand, the saying of Irenaeus, "He came to save the world through water and the Spirit," is not to be understood as implying it; because, if it were not by their baptism, how could they be regenerated? Terentius the severely punished; those who delayed baptism were in operation,—dread of the confessional, which the Holy Spirit must first of all give, before he can dwell only in a clean heart. Baptism is therefore the "sacrament of the remission of sins" (V. 21, § 29), provided it be administered in the Church. Augustine first taught that baptism clears the soul; but later, also original sin; and this has been claimed to be the great effect of baptism. But forgiving original sin altered the complexion of all other sins. Thus concurrence in the unbaptized is a sin, in the baptized a sickness; and the approach to cure is daily closer, until in heaven the cure is complete (De Nupt. et Concup., I. 23, § 28; cap. 26, § 29). In his earlier period he taught that there could be baptism without conversion, and vice versa, and salvation in either case, if the first case was that of a babe, and the second that of a believing catechumen. In his later period he receded from this position, and made baptism absolutely necessary to salvation (Ep. 185, cap. 11, § 30), except in the case of martyrs (De Cid. Des., lib. XIII. cap. 7). —Baptism, however, does not help the unbaptized, nor one who has received heretical or schismatic baptism when he might have had the Catholic. See Baptism by Heretics.

From his earlier standpoint, when baptism was not considered as purifying original sin, nor was the absence of baptism dammatory, Augustine defended infant baptism, on the ground that the infants received first the sacrament of regeneration, and then conversion, if their Christian education was faithful; and maintained that parents or sponsors assumed the responsibility of The infant's Christian education, and also in such a sense answered the baptismal questions in the place of the child, that, if it should die, their an-wers would be received as the child's confession before God. From his later standpoint he maintained that there was at the same time a substi-utive faith of the Church, by which the band of original sin is broken, the Holy Spirit implanted in the unconscious babe, and regeneration wrought before conversion (Ep. 98). The idea of the pasive receptivity of the child was Augustine's most pregnant contribution to the Church. It is not only the root of the opus operatum doctrine of Rome, but rules the present theory of infant-baptism in the Lutheran Church. In regard to unbaptized infants, he says expressly, "it may therefore be correctly affirmed, that such infant as quit the body without being baptized will be involved in condemnation, but of the mildest character" (De Peccatorum Meritis et Remissione et de Baptismo Parrulorum, I. 10, § 21).

(2) The Later Roman Catholic Doctrine. — Augustine having laid the foundation of the Roman conception of baptism, it only remained for the schoolmen to build upon it, and for the Council of Trent and the Roman Catechism to adopt the theory thus developed without further question.
The schoolmen distinguish between the material and the form of baptism. Thomas Aquinas says it is not the water, but the application of the water: because water symbolizes the cleansing character. The form of baptism lies in the formula. The material and form and their application are the necessaries of baptism: all that is necessary to baptism is contained in the distribution of spiritual goods, so that infants who have no actual faith; (2) Nor spiritual manifestations; (3) They are justified absolutely without faith, (4) The habitudes of faith, love, and prise to baptism, and which, in its stead, is the emblem of the last effect of baptism, viz., the renewing character as such is no new disposition: it is simply a sign stamped upon the soul, by which the soul is indicated as a member of Christ's body. But since the sacraments are not merely emblems of internal gracious effects, but are effectual signs, causes of the same (see SACRAMENTS), so is the character they make itself the active cause, the energetic principle, of grace: so that it draws the latter after it as its necessary effect. Baptism puts the baptized in such a relation to Christ that they receive directly the stream of his grace. But Thomas's subtle discussion of the character imparted by baptism was without influence upon later Catholicism. The Roman Catechism touches upon this doctrine of baptismal character merely as showing the necessity of baptism to salvation, but they held that the desire might be accepted in place of the actual use of water. The teaching so distinguishes three kinds of baptism,—of water, of blood, and of fire; i.e., of the Holy Spirit or penitence (Qu.
88, art. 11, 12).

This whole theory needed considerable alteration before it would fit in with infant baptism.
Infants could not exercise any faith, nor show any desire after the rite, nor experience any essential change of feeling. Thomas, however, recalled the Augustinian idea,—the babes believe not through thier own act, but through the faith of the Church in which they are baptized, namely, by the power of the Holy Spirit who gives to the Church her unity, and in her makes an equal distribution of spiritual goods, so that infants share in the faith of the Church; but only in potentiality, there was as yet no exertion of spiritual power. The teaching of the later Church is thus summarized by Bellarmine. (1) Infants have no actual faith; (2) Nor spiritual manifestations; (3) They are justified absolutely without faith, (4) The habitus of faith, love, and

(3) The Protestant Doctrine of Baptism. (a)
The Teaching of the Reformers. 1. The Lutherians. — Three stages in Luther's baptismal teaching relates to the character which baptism impresses. He borrowed the idea from Augustine, but carried it out much farther, and made it much more a feature of his system. The external washing is only the emblem of the internal cleansing, which imparts the spiritual character to baptism, and which, in its stead, is the emblem
of the last effect of baptism, viz., the renewing

[ 1 Habitus is the condition which includes in itself at the same time a power to act. It may be infused, and then it is the condition of a man, and signifies a kind of activity required, and then it is the result of actions already performed.]

whose effects continue all one's life through. In the second stage (e.g., Die babylonische Gefangenschaft, 1529) Luther considered baptism a sign and seal which God added to his word and promise in order to strengthen and comfort. The chief thing in baptism is the divine promise. He who believes it, and is baptized, will be saved; all salvation depends upon it, only we must exercise our faith after we are baptized. So long as the baptized maintain their faith, they cannot be lost, though they grievously sin. In the third stage he taught that to the sign and word were added the command and ordinance of God, according to which the former were given together in such a manner, that the water of baptism is converted into a divine element (Erlangen Ausgabe, vol. 16, p. 63 sqq.). As he says in his Catechism of 1529, "It is the water comprehended in God's command, and connected with God's command." Melanchthon considered baptism a perpetual witness that the forgiveness of sins and the renewing of the Holy Ghost belong especially to the baptized. The operating cause of this condition is faith (Loci Comm., "De Bapt.," Corp. Ref., XXI. 853). Butzer distinguishes sharply between the water and the spirit baptism (Comment. on Matt. c. 21). Luther's latest opinion does not appear in the Confessions, except in the German original of the Schmalkald Articles. The Augsburg Confession represents Melanchthon's standpoint (art. 9). The Reformers contended that the "concupiscence" remaining after the original sin had been pardoned in baptism was really sin.

The Protestant teaching had for its starting-point its objection to the Roman opus operatum theory of baptism, and therefore the emphasis it laid upon faith. An objection to this position would seem to lie in infant-baptism. Luther saw this, and had recourse at first to the theory that the child believed through the faith of others (von der babylonischen Gefangenschaft); but later Lutherans find in his third stage of development, when the baptismal water was to him not simply water, but connected with Christ's blood, the true baptism of justification.

2. The Reformed, because of their principles, had from the beginning a far easier course of theological development into light and truth. Starting with the idea that God has not conditioned salvation upon any external work or ceremony whatsoever, Zwingli attributed no sanctifying power to baptism per se, only to faith, and that God alone can give. Baptism, therefore, is not necessary to salvation. It can neither give the Holy Spirit, nor cleanse the soul, nor forgive original sin, nor regenerate, nor finally can it strengthen faith. What, then, is baptism? It is an initiatory sign by which one is marked out as a follower of Christ, and obligated to live for God. But baptism cannot help one a particle to this end: faith alone can (Schuler and Schulthees' ed., II., vom Tauf):

Calvin held Zwingli's principles, but brought them nearer the Lutheran conception. According to him, baptism is the initiatory sign by which we are received into the communion of the visible church in order that we, implanted in Christ, may belong to the children of God. As the Lord's Supper, so baptism is a confession of our desire to be counted among the people of God; but the condition of the gracious effect of baptism is faith. Like Zwingli, he justified infant baptism by the analogy of circumcision, in place of which it comes. Each only sealed the covenant of grace in which the children already stood by reason of their parents' position, and whose privileges they inherited. As further arguments he appealed to Christ's declaration concerning the children, "of such is the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. xix. 14), and also to the reasonably supposed presence of children in the families whom the apostles baptized. To the objection that children could not be regenerated, because they could not know Christ. Calvin replied that only elect infants could be; but in regard to them it was at least impossible that they had a spark of divine light, and upon no other than the condition of regeneration could any one enter the kingdom. None of the elect die before they are regenerated, nor are unbaptized elect infants excluded from baptism; therefore baptism is therefore very far from being necessary to salvation.

[(b) The Representation of Baptism in the Church Creeds. Lutheran. — The Augsburg Confession (1530), Art. IX.:—

"Baptism is necessary to salvation, by [it] the grace of God is offered; and children are to be baptized, who by baptism, being offered to God, are received into God's favor."

Reformed. — The First Helvetic Confession (1530), Art. XXII.: —

"Baptism is, according to the institution of Christ, a laver of regeneration, which the Lord offers and exhibits to his elect in a visible sign, through the ministry of the church. We baptize our children because it would not be right to deprive of the communion of God's people those who are born through us into the people of God, whereunto they are through the divine word called, and are, so far as man can judge, members of God's elect."

The Second Helvetic Confession (1566), Cap. XX. (summary): —

"Baptism is instituted by Christ. There is only one baptism in the church: it lasts for life, and is a perpetual seal of our adoption, to be administered in the name of Christ to be enrolled, initiated, and received into the covenant, into the family and the inheritance of the sons of God, that, cleansed from our sins by the blood of Christ, we may lead a new and innocent life. We are internally regenerated by the Holy Ghost; but we receive publicly the seal of these blessings by baptism, in which the grace of God inwardly and invisibly cleanses the soul, and we confess our faith, and pledge obedience to God. Children of believers should be baptized; for to children belongs the kingdom of God, and they are in covenant with God: why, then, should not the sign of the covenant be given to them?"

The French Confession of Faith (1559), Art. XXXV.: —

"Baptism is given us as a pledge of our adoption: for by it we are grafted into the body of Christ, so as to be washed and cleansed by his blood, and then renewed in purity of life by his holy spirit. The grace it symbolizes reaches over our whole lives and to our death, so that we have a lasting witness that Jesus Christ will always be our justification and sanctification. Moreover, though it is a sacrament of faith and penitence, yet as God receives little children into the church with their fathers, we say upon the authority of Jesus Christ, that the children of believing parents should be baptized."

The Belgic Confession (1561) revised and...
BAPTISM.

approved by the Synod of Dort (1610), Art. XXXIV. (summary): —

Baptism is the substitute for circumcision: by it we are received into the church of God. As water washeth away the filth of the body when poured upon it, so the blood of Christ, by the power of the Holy Ghost, internally sprinkled upon him, doth the blood of Christ, by the power of the Holy Ghost, internally sprinkle the soul, cleanse it from its sins, and regenerate us from children of wrath unto children of God. Not that this is effected by the external water, but by the sprinkling of the precious blood of the Son of God. Baptism avails us through the whole course of our life. Infants of believers ought to be baptized, and sealed with the sign of the covenant. Christ shed his blood no less for the washing of the children of the faithful than for adult persons; and therefore they ought to receive the sign and seal of that which Christ has done for them. Moreover, whatever was the mark of difference, whereby Christian men are distinguished from Gentiles, that mark of difference, whereby Christian men are distinguished from the Gentiles, baptism is to the Jews, that circumcision was to the Jews, that baptism is to our children. And for this reason Paul calls baptism the circumcision of Christ.

The Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England (1571), Art. XXVII.: —

"Baptism is not only a sign of profession, and mark of difference, whereby Christian men are dissected from others that be not christened, but it is also a sign of regeneration, or new birth, whereby, as by an instrument, they that receive baptism rightly are grafted into the church; the promises of the forgiveness of sin, and of our adoption to be the sons of God by the Holy Ghost, are visibly signed and sealed; faith is confirmed, and grace increased, by virtue of prayer unto God. The baptism of young children is in no wise to be retained in the church, as most agreeable with the institution of Christ."

The Westminster Confession of Faith (1647), Cap. XXVIII.: —

"Baptism is a sacrament of the New Testament, ordained by Jesus Christ, not only for the solemn admission of the party baptized into the visible church, but also to be unto him a sign and seal of the covenant of grace, of his ingrafting Into Christ, of adoption into the number of his children, of regeneration, of remission of sins, and of his giving up unto God, through Jesus Christ, to walk in newness of life. By the right use of this ordinance, the grace promised is not only offered, but really exhibited and conferred by the Holy Ghost, to such (whether of age, or infants) as that grace belonging unto, according to the counsel of God's own will, in his appointed time."

(c) Later Protestant Teaching. — During the fifty years before Schleiermacher, there were many rationalists in Germany alike regarded baptism as only a significant way of admitting one into the church. His vigorous treatment of the subject caused a change in sacramental views generally. (See SACRAME-NTS.) He put it down (Der christliche Glaube, § 137) as his first proposition that baptism administered in accordance with the original institution confers salvation in reference to the divine grace in regeneration at the same time with the rights of citizenship in the Christian Church; which amounted to saying that salvation was wrought by baptism not immediately, but meditately, immanently, as if by the reception into the church is completed. He held to infant baptism, because he believed that faith might follow baptism; but in this case the baptism was an incompetent seal and confirmation as the consequent of instruction in the Christian faith. Infant baptism is therefore proper, but not necessary (L. c. § 138).

The question, What is faith? is vital in this discussion; for all Protestant theologians agree that the connection between the sign and the thing signified is an internal one, and made by faith, in opposition to Augustine's view, that they were connected in an external way. By baptism one entered into the visible church. But what is this faith? Is it one which begins and ends in the individual act of faith at work in the person who is baptized? or is it a much wider thing, with a more universal significance? Neither Luther nor Calvin fairly met the problem; but it may be safely presumed that they would give an affirmative answer to the first or second question respectively. The Lutheran and the Reformed theologians have followed the path marked out by their great teachers. Thus Kahnis of Leipzig says, Baptism is the sacrament of regeneration; but what it imparts is rather the power of regeneration, which is only of efficacy when the faith supposed by baptism is really present. Baptism with regeneration, when saving faith is present, works the forgiveness of sins, sonship to God, membership in the kingdom of God upon earth, and participation in eternal life. Who these genuine members of the kingdom are, God alone knows: as far as man can see, all the baptized are included. As no man can be born more than once, so no one can be reborn twice. Baptism, therefore, is not to be repeated. If one sin loses the grace of baptism, there remains no other means by which the lapsed is recovered. Since no one can enter the kingdom of God who is not re-born of water and spirit, it follows that baptism is necessary to salvation; yet not that only the baptized are saved, for the Word has saving efficacy, and those who, without fault of their own, fail of baptism, do not for that reason fail of salvation. Infant baptism, accordingly, finds its justification besides, on the scriptural grounds, in the substitution of the faith of the sponsors for the infant's faith, the will of the parents, and the preparation of the Christian family surroundings (Die Lutherische Dogmatik, Leizig, 1808, vol. iii., pp. 470-481). Heinrich Schmid of Erlangen says, "We have in baptism, not merely water, and not common water, but also the word of God. But there is superadded to this a higher efficacy than exists in mere natural water; and it is this, which, by means of the water, effects saving grace." His statements in other respects agree with Kahnis. (The Doctrinal Theology of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, p. 554. English Translation by Hay and Jacobs, Philadelphia, 1873.)

The Reformed theologians follow Calvin. They regard baptism as a sign and seal of church-membership, as circumcision was in the case of Abraham (comp. Rom iv. 11). Baptism does not produce conversion or regeneration, but presupposes and recognizes it. Children of Christian parents are baptized because of their descent from believing parents: adults are baptized if they profess repentance, and faith in Christ; in other words, because they are converted. Infant baptism is so far incomplete as it lacks Christian regeneration and instruction; hence it therefore should be supplemented by instruction, and completed by a personal profession of faith, and union with the church. Among modern teachers, Heinrich Hepp, who presents the typical German Reformed theology, defines baptism thus: "Baptism is the ordinance instituted by Christ, whereby God seals to the elect their connection with the covenant of grace, and obliges them as participants in the covenant to lead a holy life." The candidates of baptism are all those who belong to the covenant of grace; i.e., all who confess Christ, and are considered by the Church as belonging thereto. But since the promises extend to the children of believers, these should be baptized, precisely as the Israel- itish children were circumcised; on the other hand, those who do not belong to the Church may not be baptized ere they are instructed in the faith, and have been converted" (Die Dogmatik der evangelisch-reformirten Kirche. Loc. XXV., De baptismo, pp. 443, 5, Elberfeld, 1861). Ebrard says, "Through baptism we are buried in Christ's reconciling death in order to rise with him in his resurrection. Baptism is a visible act to which the Lord has connected an invisible act (regeneration), and the completed, final justification, with the beginning of sanctification, if the recipient is prepared by repentance." Ebrard calls infant baptism a "modified baptism," a virtual contradiction to the original design of baptism, because the infant is not yet regenerated, only ingrafted in the visible Church, and in the midst of mediocrity and immediate blessing and protecting influences, yet an actual baptism (Christliche Dogmatik, König- berg, 1852, vol. ii., pp. 557, 588, 621). Van Oosterzee thus defines baptism: "Baptism, the means of incorporation into his Church, ordained by Christ himself, is at the same time the sign and seal of the promises of the gospel to every believer, and, as such, an ordinance of inestimable value." "It is a holy symbolical act, in the name and by the command of the glorified Lord of the Church, by which every one who receives it in faith is set apart from the unbelieving world, is received into the Christian communion, is assured of the saving promises of the gospel respecting forgiveness of sins, and purifying from sin, and is pledged to a new life in holiness and brotherly love." (Christian Dogmatics, English Translation, § 138, vol. 2, pp. 747, 752). The general Reformed doctrine is thus summarized by Hodge: "(1) Baptism is a divine ordinance; (2) It is a means of grace to believers; (3) It is a sign and seal of the covenant of grace; (4) It was intended to be of perpetual obligation, in the sense that all not baptized in infancy are required to submit to baptism as the divinely appointed way of publicly professing their faith in Christ, and their allegiance to him as their God and Saviour; and that all such professors of the true religion are bound to present their children for baptism as the divinely appointed way of consecrating them to God; (5) That God, on his part, promises to grant the benefits signified in baptism to all adults who receive that sacrament in the exercise of faith, and to all infants, who, when they arrive at maturity, remain faithful to the vows made in their name when they were baptized." (Systematic Theology, vol. iii., pp. 581, 582). The Reformed theory of baptism rests upon the theory that the church is an ethical unit, and existed before the individual believer. Therefore infant baptism is allowable; for the relation the parents or sponsors bear to the church determines the position of the infant, who by birth comes within the covenant. Those who reject infant baptism reject also this theory of the church: to them it is an organized body of individuals, each of whom, prior to baptism, must be born again with a personal Christian faith. (See Baptists.)

The society of Friends (Quakers) reject water baptism and the Lord's Supper as a participation of bread and wine, and regard such rites as a lapse into the religion of forms and shadows. The practice of infant baptism is looked upon as a subservience to infant baptism and the Lord's Supper as a participation of bread and wine, and regard such rites as a lapse into the religion of forms and shadows. The practice of infant baptism is looked upon as a subservience to the Church as belonging thereto. But since the promises extend to the children of believers, these should be baptized, precisely as the Israel- itish children were circumcised; on the other hand, those who do not belong to the Church may not be baptized ere they are instructed in the faith, and have been converted" (Die Dogmatik der evangelisch-reformirten Kirche. because the heretics baptized in the name of Jesus or of the Trinity (Ep. 73, 9). All that was required was, that the former heretics should become penitents, because heretical baptism conferred forgiveness of sins and regeneration (73, 5). As it was evident that the Roman view had the practical effect of greatly facilitating the return of the heretics (74, 1), Lympius is anxious to show that the rigorous African practice did not deter them (73, 24). The representatives of the anti-Roman view made the connection between the church and baptism most close. As there was only one church, there could be only one baptism: consequently heretical baptism was no baptism. Again: the efficacy of baptism rests upon the priestly character of the legitimate priesthood; but heretics are without such priests. The treatment of returning heretics corresponded to these ideas. If they had already received Catholic baptism, they were received by the laying-on of hands; if baptized out of the church, they were rebaptized; if they had been Catholic or heretical priests, they were put among the laity. The councils of Nicea 325 (can. 8 and 10); Laodicea, 323 (can. 7, 9), Constantinople, 325 (can. 7, 8), and Ephesus, 431 (can. 83), distinguished between heretical baptism as to its validity: while Athanasius, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Basil the Great, rejected such baptism altogether. The controversy broke out again when the Donatists (see title) rejected Catholic baptism, and rebaptized their Catholic converts.

It was left to Augustine to say the last decisive word in this long debate. In his writings against the Donatists, especially in De Baptismo, he lays down the foundation principle, that the objectivity of the sacrament, and its efficacy, are quite independent of the administrator, so long as the disposition of the recipient is right. From this position he proved: 1. Baptism conferred an indelible character; leaving the church did not destroy it; 2. Although out of the church there was no salvation, it did not follow that heretical baptism was null, but that such baptism can be of no profit so long as the man remained outside of the church; 3. The heretic's baptism is therefore on the same footing as that of a mere formalist: and if the latter, on his conversion, is not baptized again, but received by the laying on of hands, so it should be with the former. Augustine settled the question. Heretical baptism was recognized, and since then the Catholic Church has practically left the matter untouched.

The question came up again when Protestantism began to form its theology. Both Lutherans and Reformed, however, came to the conclusion that every baptism in the name of the Trinity was valid, and efficacious to the believing soul. To the further question, whether baptism may not, in extremity, be administered by a minister of one's own confession, the Lutherans replied affirmatively, because they made baptism a necessary ordinance; while the Reformed, who took different ground, wavered. The practice to-day is to have a Protestant minister in all cases, and usually the pastor of one's own congregation (v. 31).

or at all events provoked a violent protest. But much earlier though less unequivocal testimony, "He (Christ) came to save, through means of the sign and seal of the new covenant, as circumcision was the practice of infant baptism. If it had been an innovation, it would have created a revolution, but as a vital force, from parent to child.

No time can be assigned to the beginning of the practice of infant baptism. If it had been an innovation, it would have created a revolution, but as a vital force, from parent to child.

It must be admitted that adult baptism was the rule, infant baptism the exception, in the apostolic age, and continued to be till the church was fairly established in the Roman Empire. Augustine, Gregory Nazianzen, and Chrysostom had Christian mothers, but were not baptized till they were converted in early manhood; and Constantine the Great put off his baptism till his death-bed. Adult baptism always comes first in every missionary church, which begins, with the preaching of the gospel to responsible adults, and then lays hold of the children. Infant baptism has no meaning without Christian family life and the guaranty of Christian education.

Hence the church has always insisted on catechetical instruction, and most churches practise confirmation as a subjective supplement to infant baptism. Compulsory infant baptism was unknown in the ante-Nicene age. It is a profanation of the sacrament, and one of the evils of the union of Church and State, against which Baptists have a right to protest. PHILIP SCHAFF.

BAPTISTERIES. buildings erected exclusively for the administration of baptism, were not known until the fourth century. In the primitive church, the river or the brook, the lake or the pond, served the purpose. During the persecutions, wells and springs found in the catacombs were used, as may be inferred from the ornamens employed around and above them; but when Christianity became the religion of the state, under Constantine the Great, separate buildings were found necessary, and were erected in the neighborhood of the church, and often connected with it by a covered gallery. These buildings were often very large, so large, indeed, that synods and councils could be held within them. The reason was, that they also served as schools, in which the children were taught the catechism as a subject (piscina), circular, octagonal, or sometimes, in allusion to Rom. vi. 4, in the form of a grave, of stone (1 Cor. x. 1), and descended into by three steps. Around this basin arose the building, circular or octagonal, and covered with a cupola, which rested either on the walls or on pillars and columns within the walls. Connected with this main building were generally, to the one side a fore-hall, the schoolroom, and to the other side an apsis, with an altar dedicated to John the Baptist, at which the catechumens received the eucharist immediately after baptism.

Gradually, however, as infant baptism became the rule in the church, and the sacrament was administered by aspersion instead of by immersion, and the right of administering it was extended to all churches and over the whole year, there was less and less use for any separate buildings. After the ninth century, no more baptisteries were built. The baptismal basin was transformed into the baptismal font; and the font was moved into the church itself, and placed in a separate chapel, or part of the building, generally near the entrance, to the left.

BAPTISTS. (The Regular or Calvinistic Baptists.)—A body of Christians comprising about one-fourth of the Protestants of the United States, and numbering in Great Britain, in 1880, a membership of 282,658; in the continent of Europe, 44,292; in Asia, 42,072; in Africa, 8,603; in Australasia, 9,018.

BELIEF.—The first Confession of the Baptists in England, A.D. 1644, antedated the Westminster Confession. When the Westminster Confession was published, it was found to contain serious errors of doctrine, in most points, with the earlier Baptist Confession; and in 1869 the General Assembly of Baptists, following the example of the Independents (Savoy, 1658), adopted that Confession, with some omissions and changes. This Confession was also adopted by the Philadelphia Association in the eighteenth century and is still the statement of doctrine most highly regarded by the Baptists in the United States.

The essential distinction between the belief of Baptists and that of other bodies of Christians is found in their view of the constitution of the visible church. Holding the supreme authority of the Holy Scriptures, and the doctrines of God's choice of his people, of regeneration as the sovereign work of the Holy Spirit, and of justification by faith alone, they believe that the churches mentioned in the New Testament were formed in closest accord with those doctrines; they believe the New Testament gives us examples of, and commands us to receive as candidates for membership in the churches, only those who give credible evidence of their faith in Jesus as their Saviour. Hence the Baptists accept as candidates for membership in their churches only those who are professed believers in Jesus.

They believe immersion in water is the baptism enjoined in the New Testament. In this view they are in accord with the Greek and all Oriental churches, with the practice of the Occidental churches till A.D. 1500, and with the present liturgies of the English and American Episcopal churches.

The American Baptists practise close communion.

Church Government.—Their churches — "bodies of baptized believers, with pastors and deacons, covenant together for religious worship and religious work" — are independent of all other human control, and supreme in the government of their own affairs. For the increase of love, for consultation, and the furtherance of missions at home and abroad, these churches, by their delegates, unite in councils and associations; but these councils have no power beyond advice, or withdrawing the hand of fellowship from an offender.

Without an authoritative creed, and with no ecclesiastical government beyond that of each church over its own members, the Baptists in the United States maintain a very close agreement in doctrine, which is best represented by the (modified) Westminster Confession.

History. Baptists in Europe. The early Baptists of the continent of Europe held the same evangelical truths, and the same view of the church, as the later Baptists of England and America; but they differed from these latter in many other points. The Baptists appeared first in Switzerland, about A.D. 1235, where they were persecuted by Zwingli and the Romanists. They are found in the following years, 1355–30, with large churches fully organized, in Southern Germany, Tyrol, and in Middle Germany. In all these places persecution made their lives bitter. Moravia promised a home of greater freedom; and thither many Baptists mi-greated, only to find their hopes deceived.

After 1534 they were numerous in Northern Germany, Holland, Belgium, and the Walloon provinces. They increased, even during Alva's rule in the Low Countries, and developed a wonderful missionary zeal. But from the middle of the seventeenth century their numbers have decreased with their zeal, until, at the present, they comprise a very small portion of the population in Holland.

Baptists in England. — During the reigns of Elizabeth and James, a large number of Baptists fled from Holland and Germany to England. What influence they exerted in spreading their views in England, is not known. We only learn of their presence by the persecutions they enddured. The first Baptist churches in England from which we have a statement of their views are those of A.D. 1614. Their principles were adopted by many, and churches rapidly multiplied. Under Cromwell, Baptists were found in the army, in Parliament, and in the Council of State. With the return of Charles II., the Baptists, with all other dissenters, suffered from the strong hand of violence. During the eighteenth century many of their churches shrivelled under the influence of hyper-Calvinism; but a new era of more faithful gospel-preaching, and of zealous missionary work, began in the latter part of the century under the lead of men like Carey and Andrew Fuller, and this has continued to the present time.

Baptists in America. — In America the earliest Baptists were found in the Massachusetts Colony, but were driven out. Some went to Rhode Island, and others to New York and Virginia. In 1770, so far as is known, the Baptists numbered 77 churches with about 5,000 members in the colonies. In 1880 they report 29,000 churches, 16,500 ministers, 2,296,327 total membership, being an increase of 163,285 over 1870.

Missions. — The American Baptist Missionary Union (Boston, Mass.) is the society through which the Baptists of the Northern States carry on their foreign missionary work. The Union has in Asia five missions, as follows: Burma, with 11 stations, 88 missionaries, 448 native preachers, 443 churches, 1,314 baptisms last year, 21,504 members; Assam, 6 stations, 17 missionaries, 49 native preachers, 75 churches, 1,331 members; Teloogoos (India), 7 stations, 21 missionaries, 77 native preachers, 11 churches, 1,547 baptisms, 15,660 members; China, 4 stations, 24 missionaries, 37 native preachers, 16 churches, 140 baptisms, 1,426 members; Japan, 2 stations, 12 missionaries, 5 native preachers, 2 churches, 20 baptisms, 76 members. Total in Asia, 162 missionaries, 618 native preachers, 473 churches, 3,191 baptisms, 40,087 members.

In Europe five missions, carried on by native preachers, but aided and directed by the Union. Sweden, 130 preachers, 298 churches, 3,272 baptisms, 18,831 members; Germany, 270 preachers, 1,21 churches, 1,897 baptisms, 25,497 members; France, 12 preachers, 9 churches, 41 baptisms, 726 members; Spain, 3 preachers, 4 churches, 14 baptisms, 140 members; Greece, 1 preacher, 1 church, 1 baptism, 7 members. Total in Europe, 438 preachers, 459 churches, 5,354 baptisms, 65,221 members. Total in Asia and Europe, 162 missionaries, 1,052 native preachers, 908 churches, 8,419 baptisms, 85,308 members. The appropriate-

sionaries, and also native assistants. Income, $15,543.67.

The Home Mission Board of the Southern Baptist Convention sustains 94 missionaries in the States and Territories. Income, $201,243.30.

The American Baptist Home Missionary Society (New York) sustained in 1879–80, 281 missionaries in the States and Territories, 8 academies for freedmen, with 1,101 pupils. Income, $349,564.46.

The educational institutions of the Baptists comprise 8 theological seminaries with 432 students, 31 colleges with 4,600 students, and 47 academies with 5,522 students. The buildings and endowments of all these institutions are valued at $1,098,054.

The periodicals, weekly, monthly, quarterly, sustained by the Baptists in America, number 69.

We have not enumerated among the "regular" Baptists the Free-Will Baptists, with 74,851 members; the Seventh-Day Baptists, with 8,518 members; the Dunkers, with 50,000 members; the Disciples, or Campbellites, with 350,000 members; the Anti-Mission Baptists, with 40,000 members; Wine-brennarians, with 30,000 members. See those articles.

BARABBAS (son of Abba), the name of a malefactor whom the Jewish mob, at the instigation of the priests, demanded that Pontius Pilot should release instead of Jesus of Nazareth (Matt. xxvii. 16 sq., cf. Acts lii. 14). According to an old tradition, Barabbas' proper name was Jesus. Some manuscripts and many ancient versions have the name Jesus before that of Barabbas. Thus the Armenian version reads: "whom will ye that I release unto you? — Jesus Barabbas, or Jesus which is called Christ?" (Matt. xxvii. 17.) According to Jerome, the Gospel of the Hebrews had the same reading. But the majority of New Testament textual scholars are agreed in rejecting it. Lange and other favor the old view that Barabbas was a pseudo-messiah. Barabbas is a common name in the Talmud.

BARAGA, Friedrich, D. D., a Roman-Catholic missionary, b. in Carniola, a crown land of the Austrian Empire, 1797; d. Jan. 19, 1868. He came to America in 1831, devoted his life to the Indians of the Lake Superior region, and was made Bishop of Sault St. Mary and Marquette. He published a Grammar of the Ojibche Language in 1851, and a Dictionary of the same in 1853.

BARAK (lightning), son of Abinoam, was the fourth judge of Israel. He marched with Deborah against Sisera, chief of the army of Jabin, King of Canaan, and, meeting him by the torrent stream of Kishon, achieved a complete victory, and broke his people's yoke of bondage, which had galled them twenty years. A forty-years' peace followed.

BARBARA, St., suffered martyrdom, according to Baronius, in Nicomedia, under Maximinus (236–238); according to Assemani, at Heliopolis in Egypt, under Galerius (306). Having been converted, she endeavored to convert her father: but he denounced her; and, as no torture could move her to deny Christ, she was sentenced to death, and decapitated by her own father. Her feast falls on Dec. 4, and in Roman-Catholic countries she is considered a special guaranty against fire, storms, etc.

BARBARIAN in the New Testament (Acts xxviii. 2, 4; Rom. i. 14) means one not a Greek, without referring to civilization: this is in accordance with classic usage. In 1 Cor. xiv. 11 it means one speaking in a foreign, unintelligible tongue. This is its primitive meaning. It by no means implies savagery.

BARBAULD, Anna Letitia, b. at Kidworth, Leicestershire, June 20, 1743; married the Rev. Rochemont Barbauld, May, 1774; d. March 9, 1825. She was the daughter of the Rev. John Aikin, D.D., a teacher, and was highly educated. Her husband was a Unitarian, who taught a school and preached in Suffolk. Assisted by her brother in 1773, she published her first volume of "Poems;" and four editions were sold in one year. In the same year appeared "Miscellaneous Pieces in Prose," by J. and A. L. Aikin; in 1775 her "Hymns in Prose," and "Early Lessons" (written for her pupils), and "Devotional Pieces compiled from the Psalms of David." Her later writings are of a general and critical character, including political pamphlets, editions of Aken- side, Collins, and of essayists and novelists. Perhaps her best-known hymn begins, "How blest the righteous when he dies!" See The Works of A. L. Barbauld, "A Memoir" by Lucy Aikin (her niece), London, 1826, 2 vols.; and the recent Memoirs by A. L. Le Breton and G. A. Ellis, 1874.

BARBEYRAC, Jean, b. at Beziers, Languedoc, March 15, 1674; d. at Groningen, March 8, 1744; first with his parents into Switzerland, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, 1685; was educated at Lausanne and Geneva; studied at the University of Frankfort-on-the-Oder; became a teacher in the College of the Reformed Congregation at Berlin, 1697; and in 1710 appointed professor of law and history in the Academy of Lausanne, and in 1716 in the University of Greningen. He translated several works of Puffendorf and Grotius from Latin into French, and accompanied them with notes and additions, which attracted much attention. Besides a number of other writings, he also wrote a Traité du Jeu, 1709, and a Traité de la Morale des Pères de l'Eglise, 1728. He was a moderate Calvinist, and refused to sign the Helvetic Formula Consensus, which disapproved of the doctrines of Amyrnat and the other Saumur theologians.

BARIER, Josué, a Protestant pastor of Li- von, whom the Bishop of Valence allured back into the bosom of the Roman Church by a pension of six hundred livres, and who became noted by his coarse libels against his former co-religionists: La Ministrapigny, 1618; and Les Miraculeux Effets de la Sacré Main des Roys de France, 1621.

BARCKHAUSEN-VOLKMANN CONTROVERSY. In 1712 Paul Volkmann, rector of the Joachimsthal Gymnasium in Berlin, and custos at the Royal Library, published his Theses Theologica, a complete representation of the Reformed dogmat- ics, in which he maintained the doctrines of universal grace and conditional election. Thereby he stirred within the German Reformed Church that question of predestination and grace which has arisen and been debated in every national branch of the Reformed Church. In 1714 Heinrich Barckhausen, a teacher in the same gymnasium, answered by an Amica Collatio Doctrine de Gratia, which he published under the pseudonyme of Pacificus Verinus, and in which he vindicated these doctrines of particular grace and unconditional election. With Volkmann sided Holzfuss, Jablonsky, Jeremias Sterky, etc.; with Barckhausen, Philip Nande, etc. Barckhausen wrote two more pamphlets in the controversy, both anonymous, Mauritius Neudorfi Caelitus Or- thodoxus and Abgehöhtie Ehr- und Lehr- Rettung der reformirten Kirchen; and the controversy be- gan to grow hot, when in 1719, the Prussian king, Friedrich Wilhelm I, stepped in, and by a royal edict commanded both partiesto keep silent.

BARCLAY, Robert, b. about 1476, probably of Scotch descent; d. at Croydon in 1552; was educated at one of the English universities; travelled much on the Continent, and was made chaplain in the collegiate church at Ottery St. Mary in Devonshire. Afterwards he became a monk in the Benedictine Monastery of Ely; and, after the suppression of the monasteries, he was vicar of Much-Badew in Essex, of Wokey in Somersetshire, and rector of All-Saints in Lombard Street. He is the author of the Ship of Fools, first printed in 1509, partly a translation, partly an imitation, of Sebastian Brandt's Das Narren Schiff. A list of his other writings is found in the introduction to Janieson's edition of the Ship of Fools, Edin- burgh, 1874.

BARCLAY, Robert, b. at Gordonston, Scot- land, Dec. 23, 1648; d. Oct. 13, 1690, at Ury; de- scended from a family of Scotch descent; received a very careful education from his father, Col. David Barclay, of war celebrity in Germany and Sweden. For his further development he went to Paris; but while there he was won over to the Roman Church by one of his maternal uncles; and it cost his father, who in the mean time had joined the Quakers, much trouble to disentangle all these religious and moral complications. He succeeded, however; and Robert Barclay became the most prominent, indeed the only remarkable, theologian of other sects. The Quakers have produced. His chief work, Theologiae Verae Christianae Aegyptiae, gives a systematic representation of that mystical spiritualism on which Quakerism is based. It was first published in 1678, translated into Eng- lish in 1678, into German in 1684, and into French in 1702, and called forth a great number of controversial writings by Anton Reiser, Bar- thold Holzfuss, Ben. Figken, William Baier, etc. Barclay's collected works were published two years after his death, by William Penn. BARDESANES, a Gnostic heresiarch, who lived at Edessa in Mesopotamia in the latter part of the second century, about 170. He was a disciple of Valentinus, and as none of his writings have come down to us—with the exception of a fragment of his book on fate, which has been preserved by Eusebius, and may be found translated in Cureton's Syriac Spicilegium, London 1853 — his system can be understood only as a variation of that of his master and of Gnosticism in general. But he seems to have been a great poet; and his hundred and fifty Syriac hymns became so popular, that Ephraim Syrus, when he afterwards wrote his orthodox hymns to take their place, was compelled to use Bardeanes' tunes. See Gnosticism.

BARLAAM, b. at Seminara in Calabria, towards the close of the thirteenth century. He was of Greek descent, but educated in the Roman Church, and entered the order of St. Basil. For his further studies, however, he went to Thessalonica, at that period a great seat of learning. He joined the Greek Church, was made Abbot of St. Salvator, and engaged in a virulent polemic against Constantine (1327), where he was made Archbishop of Thessalonica, and governed the church for many years. He was twice sent on diplomatical errands to Pope Benedict XII., at Avignon, to whom he presented himself, well recommended by Philip of France and Robert of Sicily. The real purpose of his mission was to procure the support of Western Europe against the Turks; but the ostensible object he labored for was the union between the Greek and Latin churches. Cunningly concealing the thoughts he worked for under the thoughts he spoke about, he delivered two elaborate speeches before the Pope, which belong to the most characteristic documents of the whole series of union-negotiations: but he failed, nevertheless, to produce the right impression; his mission remained without result. After returning to Greece, he began his attacks on the Hesychasts or Quietist party among the monks of Mount Athos, which he wound up with a formal accusation of heresy. A synod, presided over by the emperor and the patriarch, was convened in the Church of St. Sophia, in Constantinople, 1341; and the Hesychasts were so ably defended by their leader, Palamas, that Barlaam hurriedly left the city, and took refuge in Italy. Here he returned to the Roman Church, was made Bishop of Gieraci in the Neapolitan, and wrote a virulently against the Greek Church as formerly against the Latin. He died 1348.

BARNABAS (son of Prophecy, or Exhortation), a Levite named Jospe, of the Island of Cyprus, living in Jerusalem when the church was founded, and one of the first converts. By the Christians he was called Barnabas, because of his ability to administrate counsel and cheer. He proved the sincerity and depth of his Christian zeal by voluntarily selling his Cyprian property, and laying the money at the apostles' feet (Acts iv. 36, 37). He quickly took a leading position in the early church. Incited, probably, by a friendship previously formed when both were Jews, he used his influence to commend the converted and yet suspected Saul to the Jerusalem Church, and thus publicly insulded the strange story the apostle told (ix. 27). The fitness of Barnabas to deal wisely with young converts is strikingly illustrated by his commission to inspect the "revival" at Antioch; and the confidence he reposed in Saul is manifested by his journey to Tarsus in search of him. The two men labored together successfully for many months in Antioch (xi. 22—26, xiv. 28). Barnabas and Saul were then sent down to Jerusalem with contributions for the poor saints there (ver. 30, B.C. 44). This is the first joining of the two names. They returned from Jerusalem with John (Mark xii. 25); and, ordered by the Holy Ghost, these three went on a missionary journey. At Perga, John left them, and returned to Jerusalem; but Paul and Barnabas kept on their way (xiii. 2—5, 13). The dignified bearing of Barnabas, and the reader speech of Paul, led to the supposition of the Lystrans, that the former was Zeus (Jupiter), and the latter Hermes (Mercury). On coming back to Antioch, they were involved in a controversy with the Judaizers, and went to the Apostolic Council at Jerusalem (which see), where the matter was settled. An unhappy disension soon after parted the pair (A.D. 50), and Barnabas is not further mentioned in the Acts (xv.); but from Gal. ii. 13 we learn a little more about him, and see his weakness under the taunts of the Judaizers; and from 1 Cor. ix. 6 we gather that he was still at his missionary labors in the spring of A.D. 57. Legends begin when authentic history ends. Barnabas is brought to Rome and Alexandria. The Clementine Recognitions (i. 7) make him preach in Rome during Christ's lifetime. Indeed, according to Clement of Alexandria (Strom. ii. 20), he was one of the seventy disciples, and the tradition of the later activity and martyrdom of Barnabas in Cyprus. There is a worthless work by a Cyprian of the fifth century, "Acta et Passio Barnabae in Cypro" (see Apocrypha to the

BARDESES (Barnabas).
NEW TESTAMENT, and a eulogy by a Cyprian monk, Alexander, not earlier than the fifth century, which relate his acts. Under the Emperor Zeno (474-491), according to the last-quoted work, the body of Barnabas was found at Cyprus. But the Cyprian Church had already claimed him as its founder in order to rid itself of the supremacy of the Antiochian bishop; and so did the Milan Church, thereby to cut itself off from Rome. These traditions therefore go for little.

In this connection, the question whether Barnabas was an apostle is important, and may be answered by saying he was not, in the strict sense; and yet is so styled (Acts xiv. 14); and in the broader sense of messenger he was amply entitled to the epithet. See Apostle.

Writings attributed to Barnabas. — Tertullian and other African writers ascribe the Epistle to the Hebrews to him. This may well have been the Roman tradition (Tertullian usually follows it), since in Rome, the epistle, probably, had its first readers. But of more interest is the tradition which sets down to him an Epistle in twenty-one chapters, which is contained complete in the Codex Sinaiticus, and of which Bryennius in 1527 discovered a complete Greek manuscript in the Library of the Most Holy Sepulchre at Constantinople; but he has not yet published it. The epistle was accepted as genuine by the old Greek Church, although not as canonical. Clemens Alexandrinus (160–202) cites it, as do Origen and the Apostolical Constitutions. Eusebius threw doubt upon its canonicity, but regarded it as authentic; yet it gradually faded out of view. The opinion to-day is, that Barnabas was not the author. The epistle was probably written in Alexandria, at the beginning of the second century, and by a Gentile Christian. In no other writing of that early time is the separation of the Gentile Christians from the patriotic Jews so clearly brought out. The Jewish interpretation of the Bible is declared to be false, and the Old Testament regulations are allegorized. "Two points are especially insisted upon: 1st, Judaism in its outward and fleshly form had never been commend ed by the Almighty to man; 2d, God's covenant never belonged to the Jews at all."

That the author had read Paul is manifest; whether he knew our present Gospels is not so certain, nor love the strife; yet he defended what he deemed the truth whenever assailed. He was no enthusiast or fanatic, but simply and evidently a truth-loving, earnest, consecrated man of God. And it may be claimed with justice, that, as he was unhappy a cause of the division of his denomination, so he happily was a means of uniting it again. The first volume of his Notes Explanatory and Practical, which was on the Gospels, is dated Philadelphia, Aug. 25, 1828; and his last, on the Psalms, February, 1868. Besides these, he published The Atonement, Phila., 1859; Way of Salvation, Phila., 1863; Evidences of Christianity in BARNEVELD. See ARMINIANISM.

BARO or BARON, Pierre, b. at Etampes, 1534; d. in London, April 17, 1599; studied law at Bourges, and began in 1557 to plead in the court of the Parliament of Paris, but retired in 1560 to Geneva, where he studied theology, and was ordained by Calvin himself. In 1572 he left France, and settled in Cambridge, where he was made professor in divinity: but he soon fell out with the rigid Calvinists; and a sermon he preached on the Lambeth Articles gave so much offence, that he was compelled to renounce his chair in the university, and retire to London. Among his works are, In Ioann Prophetiae Profectiones, London, 1579; Summa Trium Prodestinatione Sententiarum, 1573, translated in Nicoll's "Life of Arminius." I. 9.

BARONIUS, Caesar, b. at Sora in Naples, Oct. 31, 1538; d. in Rome, June 30, 1607. This most learned and laborious historian of the Roman Church was educated at Veroli; began to study theology and jurisprudence at Naples; moved in 1557 to Rome; entered the Congregation of the Oratory newly founded by Filippo de Neri, was thereby led to the study of church-history in its sources; began in 1557 preparations for his great work. Annales Ecclesiastici, which first appeared in Rome, in 12 vols folio, 1588–1607; was made librarian to the Vatican, and cardinal in 1586, and came twice—after the death of Clement VIII., and again after that of Leo XI.—very near being elected pope. The Annales Ecclesiastici appeared in Rome, in 12 vols folio, 1588–1607; were the work of a chronicle; the facts being positively refuted. Baronius undertook the task, with the help of the Vatican Library, and repeated the study and jurisprudence at Naples; moved in 1557 to Rome; entered the Congregation of the Oratory newly founded by Filippo de Neri, was thereby led to the study of church-history in its sources; began in 1557 preparations for his great work. Annales Ecclesiastici, which first appeared in Rome, in 12 vols folio, 1588–1607; was made librarian to the Vatican, and cardinal in 1586, and came twice—after the death of Clement VIII., and again after that of Leo XI.—very near being elected pope. The Annales Ecclesiastici were written in opposition to the "Magdeburg Centuries" of Flicius and other Lutheran historians. They contain no open polemics, however. The great attention which the "Magdeburg Centuries" attracted made it necessary to furnish a positive refutation. Baronius undertook the task, with the help of the Vatican Library, and performed it in a way that makes his Annals still a storehouse of learning. He died at last May 4, 1607; studied at the University of Cambridge; travelled for several years in France, Italy, and the East; was ordained and made professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge immediately after his return in 1590; became professor of mathematics in 1662; but resigned in 1699 in favor of his famous pupil, Newton, and devoted himself exclusively to theology; and in 1672 he was appointed master of Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1675 was chosen vice-chancellor of the university. A collected edition of his theological works—sermons, a Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy, an Exposition of the Creed, etc.—appeared in London, 1826, 3 vols., and was reprinted in New York, 1846. A still better edition was published at Cambridge, 1598, 8 vols. His sermons are very elaborate and exhaustive, but ponderous in style.

BARRUE, Augustin, b. 1711; d. Oct. 5, 1839; was graduated in the Jesuit College of Toulouse when the order was suppressed; went to Austria and Italy; returned to France in 1774; wrote with more bitterness than weight against the infidelity of the age in L'Année Littéraire and Journal Ecclésiastique; published the Hélectanies, a more systematic confusion, in 1782; fled in 1792 to England, where he published Histoire du Clergé de France pendant la Révolution (1794), Mémoire sur Jacobinisme (1797), L'Eangile et le Clergé (1800); returned in the latter year to France, and published in 1803 Du Pape et ses...

BARTHOLOMEW'S.

Droits, which gave the Ultramontans occasion to say that he had sold himself to Napoleon.

BARSUMAS, Bishop of Nisibis 435-489, was, together with his adherents, banished from Edessa on account of Nestorianism; re-organized the fugitive church under Persian protection, and founded at Nisibis a theological school, which became celebrated, both for its exegetical labors in the spirit of Theodore of Mopsuestia, and for its missionaries to many points of Eastern Asia. In Persia, Nestorianism was for a long time the only form of Christianity tolerated.

BARTH, Christian Gottlob, b. in Stuttgart, July 31, 1799; d. at Calw, Nov. 12, 1862; studied theology at Tübingen, 1817-21; became pastor at Mottlingen in 1824, but retired in 1838 to Calw, and devoted himself entirely to the missionary cause. He founded the missionary society of Württemberg, and brought it in active co-operation with Basel and all the great missionary societies of the Christian world. He wrote some of the best German missionary hymns. He edited the Calwer Missionsblatt, and a great number of works of practical Christianity, mostly designed for children and youths: Biblische Geschichten; Kirchengeschichte; Jugendblätter, a monthly; Handbuch der Bibelklärung; Kindermissionsblätter; some of which met with an almost unparalleled success. K. WERNER: G. Barth, Calw, 1865-69, 3 vols. See the article of H. GUNDERT in Herzog.

BARTHOLOMEUS DE MARTYRIBUS, b. in Liézon, 1141; d. at Viena, 1590; received his surname from the Church De Martyribus, in which he was baptized; entered the order of the Dominicans in 1528; was for nearly twenty years a teacher of theology and philosophy; and became in 1558 Archbishop of Braga, but was in 1552 allowed by Pope Gregory XIII. to resign his office, and retire to the convent of Viana. He was an enthusiastic and energetic reformer. As archbishop, he carried through the severest reforms, not only in his palace, but also in his diocese; and in the Council of Trent he spoke of the necessary reforms of the cathedrals. He founded the first theological seminary in Portugal, and hospitals for the sick and the poor. He wrote Compendium Vitae Spiritualis; Stimulus Pastorum, etc. His collected works appeared in Rome in 2 vols. fol., 1757, edited by Malachias d'Inguingert. His life was written by DE SACY, Paris, 1663.

BARTHOLOMMESS, Christian Jean Guillaume, b. at Geisselbromm, in Alsace, Feb. 29, 1612; d. at Strassburg, Aug. 31, 1656; studied at Pfortzheim and Strassburg. He was for several years as a tutor in the Dutch family in 1623, and was appointed professor in the Protestant seminary in Strassburg. He wrote, among other works, Histoire Critique des Doctrines Religieuses de la Philosophie Moderne, 2 vols., 1855. See the article of K. SCHMIDT.

BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY, The Massacre of St., Aug. 24, 1572. On Aug. 18 the wedding took place in Paris of Henri of Béarn, King of Navarre, the head of the Huguenot party, and Margaret of Valois, a sister to Charles IX., and daughter of Catherine de Medicis. On this occasion a great number of Huguenot noblemen had assembled in Paris, and the impression which they made on the court and the populace seems to have been one of mingled hatred and fear. An incident added to the general threatening state of the situation. By a freak of his fickle mind, Charles IX. seemed to have thrown himself into the arms of Admiral Coligny, and prepared to make front against the dowager-queen, his mother, the Duke of Anjou, his brother, and the party of the Guises. In view of this danger, the idea of Catherine, which she had often hinted at to her two sons, and repeatedly intimated to the papal legate and the ambassador of Philip II.,—namely, to kill all the Huguenots, suddenly ripened. At three o'clock in the morning of Aug. 24 Admiral Coligny was murdered in his house, and his body was thrown out of the window. He had been wounded on Friday, Aug. 22, and was sick in bed. Then the tocsin of Saint-Germain-l'Auxerrois was sounded, and the general massacre began. The retinue of the bridegroom, lodged in the Louvre, was slain in the courtyard. All over the city, the houses of the Huguenots were ransacked and pillaged and fired, and the inmates were drawn down into the street to be slaughtered. Those who attempted to flee were pursued, and hunted like game. The king stood himself, and fired from a window in the palace. Between five and six thousand persons were thus killed in Paris; and the royal order for the massacre were engraved in all the great cities of France,—Orleans, Bourges, Troyes, Lyons, Rouen, and Toulouse. In all, about thirty thousand persons were murdered. As soon as the news was received in Rome, the canons of St. Angelo were fired, a solemn Te Deum was sung, and the Pope struck a medal bearing on the one side his own portrait, and on the other a picture rudely representing the massacre. Roman-Catholic writers defend the Pope on the ground of ignorance; but it took, at all events, some time to make the medals. See Coligny, Hugenots.

BARTHOLOMITES. — I. In 1307 some Basilians monks from Armenia fled from their native country on account of persecutions, and settled in Genoa, where they bought a house, and the next year erected a church dedicated to St. Bartholomew. They were joined by other members of their order; and Clement V. authorized them to celebrate divine services according to their rites. Gradually, however, they left their rules, and became incorporated with other orders. In 1550 Innocent X. suppressed the order altogether. — II. A congregation of secular priests, founded by Bartholomew Holzhauser in Salzburg (1653–59) for the purpose of preaching and teaching. Innocent XI. confirmed their constitution in 1658, and they spread rapidly in Germany, Switzerland, Hungary, and Poland. The Emperor Leopold ordered that they should always be preferred to vacant benefices in his hereditary possessions. A peculiarity of their constitution was that they never worked alone, but always two and two together. In spite of the zeal with which the order started into life, it became extinct in the eighteenth century.

BARTOLI, Daniel, b. at Ferrara, 1608; d. in Rome, 1683; entered the Society of Jesus in 1623; was a distinguished preacher and teacher of rhetoric, and wrote, besides other works, the history of his order, Istoria della Compagnia di Gesu, in 6 vols. fol., Rome, 1653–57, of which especially the parts containing the history of the society in Asia are replete with curious information. His collected works were published in 12 vols. by Marietti, Turin, 1825.

BARTON, Elizabeth, a servant-girl at an inn at Aldington, Kent, acquired a reputation in the neighborhood as a prophetess; and just as the excitement produced throughout all England by the attempts of Henry VIII. to obtain a divorce from Catherine was at its highest, the "Holy Maid of Kent," as Elizabeth was generally called, had some visions which plainly revealed the divine displeasure at the royal plans. The party of the queen, especially the clergy, was not slow in utilizing this incident. The chapel of Aldington witnessed very strange scenes, and the Holy Maid became an important argument. But in 1535 the king brought Elizabeth and her chief supporters, among whom were five priests, before Parliament. They were examined, and sentenced to death; and Elizabeth was beheaded at Tyburn, April 21, 1534.

BARUCH (blessed), the son of Neriah, friend and faithful companion of the prophet Jeremiah, whose secretary (amanuensis) he was (Jer. xxiii. 13, xxxvi. 4, 17 sq., 27, 32, xlv. 1 sq.), and whose sufferings he shared. See JEREMIAH. Baruch was accused by the princes, after Nebuchadnezzar's capture of Jerusalem, of influencing Jeremiah in favor of the Chaldeans (Jer. xl. 11). Accordingly he was cast into prison, where he was released at Jeremiah's request (Joseph. Antiq. x. 9, 1). He accompanied Jeremiah into Egypt (Jer. xxxii. 8). Nothing further is known about his fate.

BARUCH, Apocrypha of. See Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament.

BARZILAI (of iron, i.e., strong) of Rogelim, in the land of Gilead, gave timely material aid to King David when he was flying from Absalom; and on David's victorious return he refused the offer of official position the thank ful king made him, and recommended his son Chimham in his stead (2 Sam. xviii. 27–29, xix. 33, 37, 40). David remembered the family of Barzillai in his old age (2 Sam. x. 7), and charged Solomon to provide for them.

BASHCOM, Henry Bideman, b. at Hancock, N.Y., May 27, 1796, d. at Louisville, Ky., Sept. 8, 1850; began to preach in 1813; was appointed chaplain to Congress in 1823, president of Madison College, Pennsylvania, 1827, professor of morals in Augusta College, 1828, president of Transylvania University, 1842, and bishop of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South in 1850. He edited the Quarterly Review of the Methodist-Episcopal Church from 1846 to 1850; published two volumes of sermons, 1849–50; and lectures on "Infidelity," "Moral Science," etc. His collected works appeared at Nashville, 1856, in four volumes. His life was written by Dr. Henkle, Nashville, 1854.

BASEDOW, Johannes Bernhard, b. in Hamburg, Sept. 11, 1723; d. at Magdeburg July 25, 1790; studied theology at Leipzig; was tutor to a noble family in Holstein, 1740–53; professor at the Academy of Sorö in Denmark, 1753–61, and professor at the gymnasium in Altona, 1761–68. While in Altona, he published a number of theological works, — Philosophie, Theoretisches System der gesunden Vernunft, Versuch einer fremßihnichen Dogmatik, etc., — which belong among the flattest and coarsest, but also among the most amusing, specimens of German rationalism. By Rousseau's Emile he was drawn away from theology, and in 1768 he set out to become the Columbus of pedagogy; and though in this field, too, he gave ample evidence that he was personally a mere charlatan, he had some good ideas, and gave the first impulse to a most necessary educational reform. The character, however, of flat and coarse rationalism, never left him, and marred his pedagogical system in all its details.

BASEL, Conference of. The Conference of Basel was first formulated by Ecclampsius as part of a speech with which he opened the synod of Basel in September, 1331. After his death it was further elaborated by Myconius, and promulgated Jan. 21, 1534, when all citizens were summoned to meet in the guildhouses, and hear it, and declare whether they were prepared to accept it, and stake honor, property, and body on its defence. It is simple and moderate, occupying the Permeable position between Luther and Zwingli. The first Helvetic Confession is often called the Second Confession of Basel, because it was written in, not for, Basel. See Schiff: Credos of Christendom, vol. I. 385 sqq.

BASEL, Council of, Aug. 27, 1431—May 7, 1439. The Pope and the papal curia had succeeded in transferring the Council of Constance to Siena, and dissolved the assembly before it got fairly to work. In spite of this disappointment, the demand for a new council convened outside of Italy became louder and louder, especially at the courts and in the universities; and political troubles finally determined Martin V. to issue a bull convoking an ecumenical council at Basel. He died shortly after: but his successor, Eugene IV., was compelled to confirm the bull; and Aug. 27, 1431, the council was opened by Johannes Polemar and Johannes of Ragusa. So little confidence, however, had people in the sincerity of the papal government, that only a very small number of prelates accepted the invitation; and it was not until Cardinal Cesarini had arrived, accompanied by Nicolaus Cusanus, and the Roman king, Sigismund, that the interest became serious and general. The order of business on which the assembly agreed Sept. 26, 1431, was good. The old grouping of the members according to nationality was discarded; and four committees were formed, on matters of faith, political affairs, ecclesiastical reforms, and general business. These committees discussed separately; and the agreement of three of them was necessary to bring a question before a general session, over which Cardinal Cesarini presided, and make it a decree of the council. As soon, however, as the assembly was fairly constituted, and began to work, the papal government felt that it was a power, and a hostile power. The Pope was afraid, and Dec. 18, 1431, he sent a bull to Cardinal Cesarini dissolving the assembly. The Council protested, declaring that the Pope had no power to issue the thing. April 29, 1432, the Pope and his cardinals were invited to come to the council. Sept. 6, when they had not come, a process was instituted against them for contumacy; and the deposition of Eugene IV. would probably have followed very quickly, but for the mediation of the Emperor Sigismund, who had arrived at Basel on Oct. 11.

The three great questions which the Council had to solve were the Bohemian heresy, the ecclesiastical reform, and the reconciliation between the Greek and the Roman churches. Jan. 4, 1433, Procopius, Rokyczana, etc., rose into Basel; and their proud and fierce mien overawed not only the council, but the city itself. By the unexpected affability and blandness of the cardinals, a kind of reconciliation was brought about. The use of the cup in the celebration of the Lord's Supper was granted. With respect to the question of ecclesiastical reform, the cardinals were not so ready to make concessions. But it must not be overlooked, that the measures which the Council proposed June, 1435, were dictated by hatred to the curia, rather than by enthusiasm for the cause of reform. The abuses which prevailed in the monasteries, the abolition of the frivolous dramatic representations in the churches, and other questions of a purely moral bearing were treated with the same zeal as those relating to the financial and political position of the Pope and the curia, — the Peter's pence, the pallium-money, the tax on the papal confirmation of ecclesiastical promotion, the judicial authority of the Pope, etc. The Pope, the cardinals, and the whole army of officials which lived in Rome on revenues derived in this way, felt their very existence threatened, and offered the most determined resistance. Finally the question of the union of the Greek and Roman Church brought about a complete breach. John Paleologus had addressed himself to both the Pope and to the Council, and both wished to treat the case separately and independently. Political interests of considerable importance were mixed up with the question; and the passions at last grew so hot, that in the session of March 7, 1437, the fathers of the council were prevented from coming to blows only by the interference of the burgurers of the city. Cardinal Cesarini and the whole papal party now left the assembly, which from this moment fell under the sway of Cardinal Louis d'Allemont, Archbishop of Arles. — one of Rome's bitterest enemies, — and became more and more democratic and tumultuous.

In July, 1437, the process against Eugene IV. was re-opened. Jan. 24, 1438, he was suspended, and June 25, 1439, he was deposed. Nov. 5, same year, his successor was elected, Felix V., who took up his residence at Lausanne. The difficulty, however, was to enforce these acts. Eugene IV., who designated the Fathers assembled at Basel as a band belonging to Satan, convened a counter-council at Ferrara, at which the Emperor and the Patriarch of Constantinople were present. In France, the synod of Bourges (1438) incorporated the decrees of the Council of Basel with the laws of the kingdom, the so-called pragmatical sanction; but the King himself, Charles VII., still acknowledged Eugene IV. as the true successor of Peter. Germany followed in the same track, though without binding itself by any formal acknowledgment of either the Council of Basel or Eugene IV. Felix V. was not recognized by any but the Swiss, and the Duke of Bavaria. His overtures to Friedrich III. entirely failed. In course of time it became apparent that the contest between the Council and the Pope would be decided by Germany; and Eugene IV. proved to be a better diplomat than the Fathers at Basel. He bribed the chancellor of the empire, Schlick, and the secretary, Eneas Sylvius, and on Feb. 7, 1447, Germany declared for Eugene. Rome was victorious. Felix V. resigned; and, when Eugene IV. shortly after died, the Council recognized his successor Nicolas V., and decreed its own dissolution, April 25, 1449, thereby making it almost evident that a reform of the church in the way of peaceable development was an impossibility.

BASHAN (the fruitful), the country of the Rephanim, giants (Gen. xiv. 5), and of Og the Amorite, who opposed Israel, but was defeated and slain (Num. xxi. 33, xxxii. 33).

History. — It was the northern part of the East Jordan country; and it extended from "the half-land of Gilead" (i.e., the Jabbeok) on the south, to Mount Hermon on the north, and from the Arabah, or Jordan Valley, on the west, to Salchah and the borders of the Geshurites and the Maacathites on the east. It was assigned to the half-tribe of Manasseh together with half of Gilead. The cities are described by Moses as "fenced with high walls, gates, and bars" (Deut. iii. 5). The land seems to have been thickly populated and highly cultivated. In Jehu's time Hazael robbed Israel of their East Jordan possessions (2 Kings x. 33); but in Jeroboam II.'s time they were regained (2 Kings xiv. 25). Pul and Tiglath-pilesers successively overran the country, and the latter carried its inhabitants, with those of West Jordanic Israel, into captivity (2 Kings xx. 29). From this time Syrian and Arabian tribes have populated Bashan. In the confusion consequent upon the death of Alexander the Great, Bashan, or, as it is almost always called in Hebrew, the Bashan, suffered severely; for its possession was an object of continual contest. "Idumean princes, Nabathean kings, Arab chiefs, ruled in their turn." It was divided into four provinces. — Gaulanitis (Jaulan), Auranitis (Hauran), Trachonitis (Leban), and Batanea (Bashan). Augustus gave the three last provinces to Herod the Great about B.C. 20 (Joseph., Antiq. xv. 10, 1), and they passed to his son Philip; later Herod Agrippa II. received from Claudius this territory, and Abilene beside (Antiq. xx. 7, 1). A new era opened for the country, when, about the second Christian century, the region of Yemen (South Arabia) being overpeopled, several tribes sent out colonies to the Bashan. These were welcomed by the Romans, because they were orderly and sedentary; and they formed a barrier against robber tribes. It is said that these colonists of the Christians. But after the first colonists (Seldjides) came others, also Christians (Jefnides or Ghassanides); and the latter dispossessed the former, and for nearly five centuries were the rulers. — But at length, not long before the year 1000, supported by the Greeks, they succumbed to the horde of Mohammedan Arabs in the year 637. The former prosperity has never returned.

The Land. — Its productiveness was remarkable, and is mentioned frequently in the Old Testament (Ps. xxii. 12, ii. 14; Jer. i. 19). The western part to-day retains its fertility. On the east rise the beautiful Hauran Mountains to a height of six thousand feet. The soil of the western part is chalky; and the evergreen oaks, figs, and pistacio-trees, and the luxuriant grass continue to attest its richness. In the Hauran the soil is basalt and lava, but equally rich. The climate of the table-land of the Hauran, lying upwards of two thousand feet above sea-level, is very healthy; and in the afternoon the heat is tempered by a refreshing west wind. The snows on the mountains are transparent; the wheat that is sown is said to yield eighty-fold, and barley a hundred; but drought or locusts occasionally destroy the crop. Rye, barley, and oats frequently are found growing wild; but they are quite different from the cultivated varieties. No trees grow on the table-land. There are no meadows. The cattle are fed on barley. — [The Hauran in the wider sense is now bounded on the north by the Wady-el-Ajrm, belonging to Damascus, and on the south by the Belka and the steppe of Hamad. Toward the north-east, and beyond the "Meadow Lakes," extends a remarkable district, consisting of a series of extinct craters, in the centre of which is the Sofa, a long and broad lava range, with the ruins of the "White Castle." To the south and east of this lies the Harras, an undulating plain entirely covered with fragments of lava,—a dreary wilderness.] Ancient Bashan had two capital cities, Astaroth or Asherith, Karaim, and Edrei (Gen. xiv. 5; Num. xxi. 33; Deut. i. 4, etc.). Edrei has been identified with Der'at, which is even now well filled and walled (during the Christian period it was the seat of a bishop); and Ashtaroth with Bauroz, the Bostra of the Law.

The Antiquities and Modern Inhabitants. — It is when we contemplate Bashan as a land of ruins, and study these remains, that the unique character of this land comes out. There are houses, not improbably many centuries old, uninhabited, yet as perfect as when made. There every thing is of stone: doors, gates, windows, stairs, galleries, cupboards, benches, even candlesticks,—all are stone. The reason for this curious state of things is the entire absence of wood. Nor are these buildings all defective in taste. On the contrary, many of the buildings are really fine; e.g., at Kanawat there are many sculptures and beautiful houses, and above all a little ruined temple, standing on an eminence in the middle of a small valley, and surrounded by vegetation. But besides it there is a theatre, a tower, and other public and private buildings. Ruins lie scattered in every direction, attesting the present distress and the former grandeur. Many travellers would visit this interesting region, if it were not for the perpetual feuds of the different tribes, which renders travelling unsafe. For several centuries, the Druses have colonized the Hauran Mountains, so that the district is sometimes called the Druse Mountains.

BASIL, a physician, was placed in the episcopal chair of Anycra by the Eusebian party, 336, and vindicated himself in the see, though his ordination was annulled by the Council of Sar- dic, 347. He was the head of the Semi-arian party, and defended the views of the party against both the Eudoxians and the Acacians, but was finally deposed by the Arians in 360. His book against Marcellus, as well as another work by him, De Virginitate, have been lost.

BASIL, Bishop of Seleucia in Isauria, voted in the synod of Constantinople (448), but for him, at the Robbers' synod of Ephesus (449), and was, on account of this inconsistency, deposed by the

His rules were so exactly that every strong and sincere mind in the higher walks of life, the choice between Greek philosophy, with its aesthetic splendor, with its opportunities for a brilliant career, with its utter insufficiency for a hungering soul, and Christian asceticism, with its daily combats, and a victory which nobody saw, with its perpetual misery, and a peace and power which found only a little private praise, but no public recognition,—this dilemma, on which the Emperor Julian wrecked his life, seems to have solved itself very quickly for Basil. He admired Libanius, and he admired Antonius; but he never seems to have hesitated in choosing the latter. In 357 he left Athens, and staid for some time at Annesi, where his widowed mother and his elder sister, Macrina, lived a life of seve... monastic life in the Eastern Church; so that a "Basilian" simply means a monk of the Greek Church. In the Western Church the rules of Basil were afterwards completely superseded by those of Benedict of Nursia. Nevertheless, Basilian monasteries, acknowledging the supremacy of the Pope, still lingered in Sicily and in the Slavonian countries.

BASILIDES, a famous Gnostic who lived in Egypt in the first half of the second century (d. between 126 and 130), and to whom we are indebted for the oldest testimony to the Gospel of John. He quoted the passages, "The true light, which enlighteneth every man, was coming into the world," and "My hour is not yet come." See Abbot, Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, pp. 83-87. Of his works, and those of his son and pupil Isidorus, only a few extracts have come down to us in the Philotheoumata of Hippolytus, VII., 14 sq., and in the disputations between Archelaus of Kaskar and Maui, written in Egypt in the beginning of the fourth century (Zacagnus: Collect. Monument. Veter.). Of his system there are two contradictory accounts, one by Irenæus, Adv. Haer., I. 24, and Epiphanius, Haer. 21; and another by Hippolytus and Clemens Alexandrinus in his Stromata. The former bases the system on a dualistic principle,—even on a very strongly pronounced Persian-looking dualism: the latter describes it as monistic, with a preponderance of Greek, more especially Stoic elements, and with a tint of pantheism. The latter agrees best with the fragments, and is the generally accepted one; though the former corresponds better with the sect such as it lived on in Egypt until the fifth century, with its frivolous morals, its inclination to magic, its Abraxas symbols, etc. See the article Gnosticism, and Baur, Die christliche Gnosis, Tübingen, 1831; Jakobi, Basilides, Berlin, 1832; Uhlhorn, Systeme der Gnostiker, 1835; P. Hofstede de Groot: Basilides, Leipzig, 1880. See Gnosticism.

BASNAGE, Benjamin, b. at Carentan, 1580; d. 1652; pastor at Carentan, Normandy; played a conspicuous part in the synods of Carenton (1631), Alençon (1637), etc., and exercised a considerable influence on the Protestant Church of France. Among other polemical tracts to which he contributed, De l'Etat visible et invisible de l'Eglise, La Rochelle, 1612, against the doctrine of a purgatory. — Jacques Basnage, b. at Rouen, 1638; d. at the Hague, Dec. 22, 1739; studied theology at Saumur, Geneva, and Sedan; was pastor at Rouen; retired in 1653 to Holland, and was pastor first at Rotterdam, and then, since 1709, at the Hague. He was a powerful preacher, and published, when in 1720 a Protestant rising was feared in France, a most impressive admonition to his co-religionists, Instruction Pastorale, to keep quiet, and avoid all disturbances. Still greater fame he acquired as a diplomatist. He sat in the conference of Gren, truyenberg; and when, in 1716, the Regent of France, the Duke of Orleans, sent Abbé Dubois to Holland to negotiate the triple alliance, he instructed him to seek and follow the advice of Basnage. To the after-world, he is chiefly known as a scholar and an author. His writings are partly historical, partly polemical. He was historiographer of Holland, and wrote, Annales des Provinces-Unies, 2 vols. fol., the Hague, 1719-26, an excellent work. But his principal works in this line are: Histoire de la Religion des Eglises Reformées, Rotterdam, 1890; Histoire de l'Eglise depuis J. C. jusqu'à present, Rotterdam, 1899; Histoire des Juifs depuis J. C. jusqu'à present, Rotterdam, 1790. Noticeable among his polemical writings are, Examen des Méthodes..., du Clergé de France, Cologne, 1682; Réponse à M. l'Évêque de Mœurs, Cologne, 1689; directed against Bossuet. — Samuel Basnage, b. at Bayeux, 1638; d. as pastor at Zuyphen, 1721; was first pastor at Bayeux, but fell in 1683 to Holland. His Exercitationes Historico-Criticae de Rebus Sacris et Ecclesiasticis, Utrecht (1692), is a spirited criticism of the Annals of Baronius from 35, at which year Casanove stopped, to 44. He also wrote other historical and moral works. He was the grandson of Benjamin Basnage.

BASTHOLM, Christian, b. in Copenhagen, Nov 2, 1740; d. there Jan. 25, 1810; was court-preacher, confessor to the king, the most admired orator of his time, and the most striking instance of rationalism in the history of the Danish Church; gifted, humorous, superficial, the rage of the day, and a scarecrow for afterdays. He rose and fell with the times. In 1775 he published a Sacred Rhetoric, which was translated into German, and by Joseph II. introduced as a text-book in all Austrian seminaries, and in which he gave very minute advice with respect to the raising of the eyes, the folding of the hands, etc., and especially warned preachers against chewing tobacco, because it might cause them "to spit in their hearers' faces." In 1785 he published a Liturgical Exposition, which occasioned an endless and bitter controversy in Denmark, and in which he proposed to make the service elegant, diversified, and interesting, "like concerts and balls." In 1795 he published a Short Address to Clergymen, in which he exhorted them to study natural history and political economy, and to preach about poultry-farming, agriculture, truth, charity, etc. In 1803 he retired into private life, studied natural science and stoical philosophy, and died wholly forgotten.

Clemens Petersegen.

BATES, William, b. in 1625; d. in 1689; studied at the University of Cambridge, and was appointed chaplain to Charles II., though he was a member of the Conference of Savoy for reviewing the liturgy, and was engaged in the drawing-up of the exceptions to the Book of Common Prayer. He afterwards became minister of St. Dunstan's in the West, but lost the benefit for nonconformity. He wrote, Select Lives of Illustrious and Pious Persons; Harmony of the Divine Attributes, etc. His collected works, with a memoir by Farrer, appeared in 4 vols. in London, 1815.

BATH. 1. Among Hebrews. — Bathing in the Orient is a necessity, because of the heat and the dust, and the likelihood of skin-diseases, and was almost daily practised by the Jews. It was enjoined by the Mosaic law in certain cases of Levitical uncleanness (Lev. xiv. 8, xx. 5, xvii. 6, xxii. 6; Num. xix. 19, Deut. xxii. 22) and thus incorporated among the ancient Egyptians and modern Mohammedans. Bathing was required of the priests; and the high priest at his installation, and particularly upon the Day of Atonement (which see), was obliged to bathe be- fore the offering of sacrifice (Lev. xvi. 4). The rabbins increased the number to ten.

Bathing after mourning, indicative of removing a defilement, is referred to in the case of Ruth (iii. 3) and David (2 Sam. xii. 20); as part of the toilet (Ezek. xxvii. 40); as usual after birth (Ezek. xiv. 4). The Hebrews bathed not only in running water (Lev. xv. 13; 2 Kings v. 10), but also in open basins in the courtyards of private houses (2 Sam. xi. 2), and, in a later day, in public baths introduced under foreign influence (Josephus, Antiq. xix. 7, 5). There were bath-rooms in the later temple for the priests' use. Besides, there were hot baths near Tiberias (Josephus. Antiq xviii. 2, 3), near Gadara, and at Callirhoe, east of the Dead Sea (Josephus, Bell. Jud. i. 33, 5). In New-Testament times there is mention of the Jerusalem bath. Bethesda and Siloam (John v. 2, ix. 7). According to the Mishna (Pessach. ii. 7), Hebrew women sometimes used bran in the bath, or to rub themselves dry with it. Even so the modern Arab, when he cannot get water, uses sand. [In John xiii. 10 there is reference to the practice of bathing.]

In every considerable town there was a public bath. The Talmud gives us particulars of their construction and use. There were large bathing-rooms, usually darkened a little, with tubes for conveying the warm water, basins, broad stones to stand upon while cooling off, etc. The water-basins were heated underneath; and inasmuch as there was danger from the water becoming too hot, or from the floor being burned through, it was customary to offer a prayer before stepping in. The bathers, at times women, had bathing-dresses, different kinds of soaps, combs, etc. They inhaled the steam, swallowed a little of the warm water, then had cold water poured over them, or plunged into cold water, drank a mixture of wine, oil, and water, and finally were anointed with oil and perfumes. The bathing-hour was not earlier than A.M. A chastened behavior was enjoined. The bath is enthusiastically praised in the Talmud. It is declared that the reason why there were no lepers in Babylon was because the inhabitants bathed in the Euphrates. The greatest rabbins, rather than not bathe, frequented the heathen baths; and when once Rabbi Gamaliel was asked why he went to the bath of Aphrodite, he replied, "The goddess is for the ornament of the bath, but not the bath for the glory of the goddess." HAMBURG, Rect-Encyclopädie des Judenthums, Ab. 1 (1853).

2. Among Christians. — The public baths, which all classes frequented, and to which the early Christians before their conversion went as a matter of course, were so commonly places of such shamelessness, — both sexes bathed together oftentimes, — that it is no wonder that the faithful church-fathers raised their voices against their abuses. Justice requires it to be said that many of the heathen protested against this shameful corruption, some of the emperors took precautions against it, and in the great public baths of Ephesus and Ephesians. Still it is noteworthy, that though there was public censure, e.g., of women, particularly of virgins, who were immodest in the bath, there was no formal ecclesiastical prohibition of public baths. On the contrary, the Apostle John, according to Ireneus (Adv. Her. III. 3, 4), frequented them; so did Tertullian (Apol., c. 42), the rigorous ascetic; and so did Augustine; and he says he went there to calm himself after his excessive grief over his mother's death, because he had heard that the bath drives sorrow out of the heart: and hence the Greeks called it balan-

tion, as if from ballein anian, to cast out sorrow, a false though popular etymology (Confess., ix. 12). But, although not forbidden, the use of them was remitted during public calamities, penance, Lent, and for the first week after baptism.

From the time of Constantine it was usual to build baths near the basilicas, partly for the use of the clergy, and partly for other ecclesiastical purposes. In the fiscal accounts of the popes, an entry concerning the repair or the erection of such baths often appears. KRAUS: Real-Encyclopädie der christlichen Alterthümer, art. Bäder.

BATH'-KOL (daughter of the voice, i.e., echo). A Talmudic term for a supposed divine revelation. The true idea of it is, that it was the echo of a heavenly voice. Instances of it are given in the Talmud. Not only was it the utterance of a single word, but sometimes of a sentence, as when "Once in a gathering, a Bath-Kol said, 'There is a man among you who is worthy to have the Divine Majesty rest upon him; but the times are not worthy.'" All eyes were turned upon the aged Hillel, the holy and modest scholar of Ezra.

The rabbins felt keenly the great difference between their times and those of the prophets. In one place we read, "Our rabbins have related, that, since the death of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, the Holy Ghost has been taken from Israel. Nevertheless, the Bath-Kol remains." But it was not asserted that no Bath-Kol came before the second temple. One rabbi attributes it to Daniel; another, to Hagar, and Manoah and his wife. Indeed, it may be said generally that the mysterious voices heard at different times by the Bible characters were, unless they were prophecies, Bath-Kol. The same term may designate the voices mentioned in the Gospels (Matt. iii. 17- xvii. 5; John xii. 28); but the Peshito era when it refers Acts xii. 22 and Heb. iii. 10 to this source.

The Bath-Kol was (1) the first result of reflection upon the prophecies of the Old Testament, grown up upon the soil of the Old Testament, causing a sense of desertion by the Lord, and a deep longing for the return of the Shechinah; (2) it was designed to prepare the people for the remarkable voices during the last times of the second temple, which, equally with the miracles of Jesus and his apostles, pointed out the Messiah and his kingdom, until the obdurate and devoted city, immediately before its capture and destruction, was dashed to pieces. BAUMGÄRTEN, Siegmund Jacob, b. at Wollmirstedt, Saxony, March 14, 1708; d. at Halle, July 4, 1757: studied theology in the University of Halle, and became professor of theology there 1730. He was an excellent teacher, and read generally to three hundred or four hundred hearers. He was also an industrious writer, and published voluminous works on exegesis, hermeneutics, morals, dogmatics, and history. By adopting the formal scheme of the philosophy of Wolff, and applying it to the theological ideas in which he was educated, he came to form a transition from the Pietism of Spener and Francke to the modern rationalism. His life was written by his enthusiastic disciple, Seeltler (2 vols. Halle, 1781, 1782).

BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS. Ludwig Friedrich Otto, b. at Mersburg, July 31, 1785; d. at Jena, May 31, 1849; studied theology and philology at Leipzig, and became professor of theology at Jena in 1812. His principal works are Einleitung in das Studium d. Dogmawiss., Leipzig, 1820; Lehrbuch d. christ. Dogmengeschichte, Jena, 1832; Compendium d. Dogmengeschichte, Leipzig, 1810, finished by Hase, [1848]; Theologische Auslegung der Johannesevangelien, Jena, 1819, 2 vols. and again in 1822.

BAUR, Ferdinand Christian, b. at Schmiden, near Cannstatt, June 21, 1792; d. at Tübingen, Dec. 2, 1860. He was educated at the Seminary of Blaubeuren and at the University of Tübingen; became professor of Latin and Greek (1817) in the former, and in 1826 professor of church history at Tübingen. He soon gathered a large audience around his chair, and filled them with admiration by his genius, learning, and enthusiasm as a teacher. A Hegelian himself, he applied Hegel’s method of dialectical development, by mediation between two opposites, to church history and the growth of the New Testament, and thus founded the famous “Tübingen School” of theology, which revolutionized the church history of the apostolic and post-apostolic times. He must be ranked alongside of Neander and Grieser as a church historian of the first rank, independent, original, profound, and scholarly. He had a rare talent for critical combination, and the grasp of a giant in handling historical problems. He was, however, deficient in well-balanced judgment; and so, while tireless in his investigations and bold in his theories, he over-valued tendencies, and under-valued persons and facts. He ruthlessly attacked the optimistic opinion of the apostolic church, and attempted to show, that so far from being peaceful, quiet, loving, and united, it was torn by opposing factions, — the friends of Peter and those of Paul. He, thus resolved its rich spiritual life of faith and love into a purely speculative process of conflicting tendencies, a keen rivalry between the Petrine and Pauline parties, and supposed that the war stopped by the compromise the ancient Catholic Church. According to his theory, he regarded the Acts as a document of this compromise, in which the points of opposition are obscure; and, further, he unsatisfactorily rejected all those Epistles of the New Testament in which he could not find traces of such a (supposed) conflict. He was, however, acknowledged, that by his keen, critical analysis he fully brought to light the profound intellectual fermentation of the primitive church, but failed to describe the exact state of the case, because he eliminated the natural and miraculous elements. Yet, as an earnest and honest skeptic, he had to confess at last a psychological miracle in the conversion of Paul, and to bow before the greater miracle of the resurrection of Christ, without which the form of an inexplicable enigma. His critical researches and speculations gave a powerful stimulus to New Testament historical studies, and resulted in vastly increased knowledge. The studies of those times by a critical and impartial method dates from Baur. But while he acknowledged only four Epistles of Paul (Romans, the two Corinthians, Galatians), and the Revelation, to be genuine products of the apostolic age, his followers have been compelled, by the use against them of their own weapons, to yield point after point; so that now they grant the authority and genuineness of ten of Paul’s Epistles, and take their stand only at the so-called Pastoral Epistles. Baur owed his success partly to his clear, logical, pointed style. His literary activity was very great. His works fall into three groups; showing a movement from the history of doctrine to biblical criticism, and again to his Life and Works, London, 1873–75; Kritische Untersuchungen über die kanonischen Evangelien, 1847; and a great number of minor essays in the Tübingen Zeitschrift für Theologie, among which are the famous ones on the “Christ-party in Corinth,” 1831, and on the “Gospel of Mark,” 1846.

To the second group belong, Die sogenannten Pastoralbriefe des Apostels Paulus, 1833; Paulus der Apostel Jesu Christi, 1845; translated, Paul, His Life and Works, London, 1873–75; Kritische Untersuchungen über die kanonischen Evangelien, 1847; and a great number of minor essays in the Tübingen Zeitschrift für Theologie, among which are the famous ones on the “Christ-party in Corinth,” 1831, and on the “Gospel of Mark,” 1846.

To the third group belong, Das Christenthum und die christliche Kirche in den 3 ersten Jahrhunderten, 1859; translated, Christianity and the Church in the First Three Centuries, London, 1873–75, 2 vols.; Die christliche Kirche vom 4 bis 8 Jahrhundert, 1859; Die christliche Kirche des Mittelalters, 1861; Kirchengeschichte der neueren Zeit, 1869; new edition of his Geschichte der christlichen Kirchen, Tübingen u. Leipzig, 1873–77, 5 vols. Noticeable among his polemical writings are his masterly vindication of Protestantism (Gegensatz des Katholizismus u. Protestantismus, 1834, 2d, 1838) against Mohler’s Symbolik; his Sendbriefen an Dr. K. Hase, 1855; and Die Tübingen Schule u. ihre Stellung zur Gegenwart, 1859. For the character and bearing of this activity, see the article TÜBINGEN, SCHOOL OF. For biography and criticism, see Worte der Erinnerung an Ferdinand Christian von Baur, Tübingen, 1861, which contains Landerer’s Rede before the University of Tübingen.

BAUSSET, Louis François de, b. at Pondichéry, Dec. 14, 1748; d. in Paris, June 21, 1824; studied in the Seminary of St. Sulpice; was appointed Bishop of Alais, 1784; emigrated in 1791, but returned in 1792 to Paris, and supported himself, after a short imprisonment, by literary labor. In 1806 he was made canon of St. Denis, and in 1815, after the second return of Louis XVIII., director of the council of the University of Paris, peer of France, and cardinal, 1817. He wrote a Histoire de Fénélon, 1508, 2 vols., new ed., 1850, 4 vols., and a Histoire de Bosuet, 1815, 4 vols, 2d ed., 1819, of which especially the former met with much success.

BAUTAIN. Louis, author of The Art of Extempore Speaking, b. at Paris in 1798; d. 1867. He was taught philosophy at the College of Strassburg, but was suspended in 1825 because of his too liberal views, and in 1828 entered the priesthood, and rose rapidly, notwithstanding his independent ways and words. In 1838 he became professor of philosophy in the University of Strassburg, afterwards vicar-general at Paris and Bordeaux, professor of divinity at the Sorbonne, and superior of the house (congregation) of Jullié. He is known in America by the work quoted above, which was the product of his experience. His preaching was sober, earnest, and edifying. He was good rather than brilliant, and deserved respect for his piety and virtue. He was the author of many works, mainly of a philosophical nature.

BAVARIA was not fully Christianized until the middle of the eighth century, though Christianity was very early brought from Italy to the Roman colonies along the Danube. In 304 St. Aata suffered martyrdom at Augsburg, belonging to the Roman province of Rhoetia. There must consequently have been a Christian congregation in that place at that time; and at the same time there was a flourishing mission station at Lorch, belonging to the Roman province of Noricum. Nevertheless, more than one hundred years later on, St. Valentine was driven out of Passau by the Pagans, and St. Severin found the place a desert, and left it a mission station.

In the beginning, the Reformation made considerable progress throughout the country; but after the Diet of Worms, 1521, the Duke William, under the influence of Dr. Eck, adopted a most hostile line of policy. March 5, 1522, an ordinance was issued forbidding anybody to abandon the faith of his ancestors under the severest penalties; and as conversions continued to take place, and the bishops seemed to be rather lukewarm, Dr. Eck repaired to Rome to procure for the duchal government a greater judicial authority with respect to heretics. The bishops protested, but the power was granted; and from that moment the Dukes of Bavaria became the mainstays of the Roman Church in Germany. Every one who went to hear an evangelical preacher was arrested and fined. The more stubborn were severely punished. In Landenberg nine persons were burnt, and in Münich twenty-nine were drowned, for heresy in 1526. Duke Maximilian I. formed the Catholic League at Münich in 1609; and the peace of Westphalia (1648) made no concessions to the Protestants in Bavaria. In 1549 the Jesuits were called into the country; and they not only to the end of the eighteenth century, when the Elector Maximilian Joseph II., or rather, his minister, Montgelas, expelled them. The acquisition of new territories—the margraviates of Baireuth and Ansbach, the free cities of Nuremberg, Augsburg, etc., all of which were thoroughly Protestant—made a new line of policy necessary; and by the constitution of 1818, Protestants acquired equal rights with Roman Catholics.

According to the census of 1875, the kingdom had 5,022,390 inhabitants, of whom 3,573,142 were Roman Catholics, 1,302,120 Protestants, 51,335 Jews, and 5,793 belonging to other denominations. The Roman-Catholic Church has two archbishoprics (Münich-Freising and Bamberg), and six bishoprics (Augsburg, Passau, Regensburg, Eichstädt, Würzburg, and Spirea), and 2,756 parishes. With each cathedral a theological seminary is connected, and there are theological faculties in Münich and Würzburg. The number of monastic institutions is very great; namely, 305, of which 95 for monks, with 1,233 brethren, and 500 for nuns, with 5,031 sisters. In May, 1877, the Old-Catholics numbered 5,716 independent men in thirty-four congregations; but the number was afterwards decreased. The Protestant Church is governed by consistories, under a supreme consistory in Münich. It has a theological faculty in Erlangen, and numbers 1,036 parishes.

BAXTER, Richard, "the chief of English Protestant schoolmen," b. at Rowton, Shropshire, Nov. 12, 1615; d. in London, Dec. 8, 1691. Although too poor in early life to be liberally educated, he was able by great diligence, notwithstanding his feeble health, to acquire extensive learning; and so, while not an accurate scholar, he was also able to execute his work. Catholic Christianity gained the ascendancy, and at the death of Boniface the Catholic Church was firmly established in the country, having seven Episcopal sees,—Passau, Freising, Würzburg, Regensburg, Augsburg, Eichstädt, and Spirea, belonging to the archiepiscopal see of Salzburg.

Baxter's fame was to bring them back to the King and the Church. For safety's sake he withdrew from Kidderminster to Gloucester, and then to Coventry, where he remained for two years, preaching regularly to the garrison and the citizens. He then (1645) became chaplain to the Govern-ment of Whalley, the cousin of Cromwell. But in February, 1647, he finally left the army, because of a severe illness, and returned to Kidderminster. His thoughts, by his sufferings no less than by his recent experiences (for he had just come from that wonderful army which dis- continued service Breviate of the Life of Mrs. Margaret Baxter, 1681. He had need of comfort, inasmuch as the Act of Uniformity that year (1662) drove him, in company with two thousand nonconformist ministers, out of position. A cruel blow to him. In 1661 he had taken part in the Savoy Conference (so called from its being held in the Savoy Palace of the Bishop of London), between the bishops and nonconformist divines, which had for its nominal purpose a revision of the Liturgy, and to this body had submitted his Revised Liturgy. Besides, the royalist desire to win him back to the Church had been shown by Lord Clarendon's offer of the bishopric of Hereford. Encouraged by the friendly aspect of affairs, he had steadfastly preached in London. But, after the Uniformity Act, he was compelled to leave all his positions, even his beloved Kidderminster, and to pass laborious and fearful days at Acton, where he was intimate with Sir Matthew Hale, and at Totteridge, near London. His life for the next twenty-five years was a series of sorrows, aggravated by his feeble health. For preaching he was more than once arrested, his library sold, himself put under bonds for good behavior. But nothing could daunt him. He preached whenever he had opportunity, and found in God a pavilion safe from the strife of tongues. He used the press to give wider currency to his wise and tender words; published in 1669 his trumpet Call to the Unconverted, of which twenty thousand copies were sold the first year, and which has been translated into most of the literary languages of the world; 1 in 1673, the

Christian Directory, in 1674, the Poor Man's Boo trimony; and, in order to remove general doubt and fears, he spread far and wide letters addressed to him by the French pastors, Daille, Drelincourt, and Raimond Gaches, who gave Charles a certificate of Protestantism. The King showed his gratitude by appointing Baxter one of his chaplains. Upon Sept. 10, 1662, he married Margaret, daughter of Francis Charlton, Esq., of Shropshire, a young lady of wealth and station, many years his junior, who made him a most excellent wife, and with womanly fidelity stood by his side through all his troubles. She died June 14, 1681, and he has recorded his tender appreciation of this noble woman in his Breviate of the Life of Mrs. Margaret Baxter (1681). He had need of comfort, inasmuch as the Act of Uniformity that year (1662) drove him, in company with two thousand nonconformist ministers, out of position. A cruel blow to him. and over his own contentious self. Sir Matthew Hale's unfailing regard; Bishop Burnet's grateful acclamations; Locke, when he entreated him to write the Call to the Unconverted; Eliot, the Apostle to the Indians, when he translated that book next after the Bible,—all these now turn out to be more correct judges, more proficient seers, than the narrow partisans who saw in him a mere butt for argument; Lister, or a mere combatant of an opposite school.

Writings. Poetry. — Baxter was the author of a metrical version of the Psalms, published 1692, and two volumes of poetry. He wrote the hymn beginning, "Lord, it belongs not to my care." He wrote also Latin poetry. His Poetical Fragments: Heart Implantation with God and itself; The Concordant Discord of a Broken-hearted Heart, is dated, "London, at the Door of Eternity; Richard Baxter, Aug. 7, 1681." The death of his beloved wife was the occasion of its publication. Baxter had a plan of making hymns either in long or common metre, by retaining or omitting certain designated words.

Prose. — Robert Boyle, quoted in Allibone, vol.1, p.143, enables us to compare him with others when he says, "The works of Lightfoot extend to thirteen volumes; Jeremy Taylor's, to fifteen; Dr. Owen's, to twenty-eight; [but] Baxter's, if printed in a uniform edition, would not be comprised in less than sixty volumes." Orme enumerates one hundred and sixty-six treatises. It must be confessed that he is exceedingly diffuse, and therefore tedious. His Saints' Everlasting Rest, and Call to the Unconverted are probably known to most persons merely by title; and indeed the former is only readable in an abridgment of an abridgment. His other books cannot be said to be read nowadays at all; although his writings have never been reprinted, and are now very scarce. His Practical Works have been published in 23 vols., edited by Rev. William Orme, London, 1830. Another edition appeared in 4 vols., London, 1854. Select Practical Writings, with a life of the author, by Leonard Bacon, 2 vols., New Haven, 1844. The best source of information about Baxter is his autobiography down to 1684, which was published by Matthew Sylvester in 1806 under the title Reliquiae Baxterianae; or, Mr. Richard Baxter's Narrative of the Most Memorable Passages of his Life and Times. The Rev. Dr. Edmund Calamy, who was Matthew Sylvester's assistant at Blackfriars, issued an abridgment of it in 1702, and continued his life down to his death, and added as a second volume an account of other ejected ministers. In the second edition (1713) of his Continuation of the account, he refutes a number of accusations made against Baxter. Neander wrote a sketch entitled Richard Baxter, ein Mann der Wahrheit rechten Mitte, welche das Evangelium allein zu offenbaren u. zu verleihen versu.He wrote also Latin poetry. Surely is such a substance, is linguistically one. John's College, Fordham, and then its president, best ed., London, 1734–37, 5 vols. folio. His letters, 3 vols., appeared at Rotterdam, 1714; edited by DES MAÎZEAUX, The Hague, 1727–31; founder of the order of Sisters of Charity in America; but it is questionable whether pearls were. It must, therefore, have been familiar to the Jews; but it is questionable whether pearls were. The word "bdellium" occurs only twice in the Bible, once as a product of the land of Havilah (Gen. ii. 12), and again as a description of the appearance of manna (Num. xi. 7). It must, therefore, have been familiar to the Jews; but it is questionable whether pearls were. It is likely, therefore, to have been a gummy-resinous substance; and the circumference that made, one of the names for bdellium, which surely is such a substance, is linguistically one which beards, private individuals, a beard scarcely two inches long; a king; one of considerable length, square at the bottom. The figures of gods were distinguished by their beards turning up at the end. The Jews also retained the hair on the sides of the face between the ear and the eye, and this had a religious meaning (Jer. ix. 26, xxv. 23, xiii. 32). In these verses "uttermost corners" should be shaven cheeks. Incidental mention of barbers is made in Ezek. v. 1. It was an unbearable insult for any one to cut off or mutilate another's beard (2 Sam. x. 4 sq.; Isa. xvi. 20); but in times of deep sorrow the beard and the hair of the head were plucked out (Ez. ix. 3; Isa. xv. 2, 1, 6; Jer. xli. 5), or allowed to be unkempt (2 Sam. xix. 24), or covered, like the lepers, in sign one must not speak (Ezek. xxiv. 17, 22).

The practice of the Christian clergy in ancient times in respect of wearing beards was in conformity with the general custom. Long hair and baldness by shaving being alike in ill repute as unseemly peculiarities, the clergy were required to observe a becoming moderation between either extreme. In the later Roman Church, the clergy always shave the beard, and often the head, at least in part. See particularly the interesting article Beards in Encycl. Brit., Vol. III., and books on Eastern custom.

BEARD, Richard, D.D., an eminent divine of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church; b. in Sumner County, Tenn., Nov. 27, 1799; d. at Lebanon, Tenn., Nov. 6, 1880. He was licensed, and began preaching in 1820. After several years, he became a professor, first in Cumberland College, Princeton, Ky., and then in Sharon College, Sharon, Miss. From 1842 to 1854 he was president of Cumberland College; but, when the Cumberland Presbyterian Church established a chair of systematic theology in Cumberland University at Lebanon, Tenn., 1854, he was so evidently the man for the position, that it came naturally to him. He was repeatedly made moderator of the General Assembly. The position he occupied in the esteem of his brethren was the best proof of his exalted character. Besides numerous and valuable contributions to the periodical literature of his church, he issued two works of permanent importance,—his Lectures on Theology, Nashville, 1870, 3 vols.; and Why am I a Cumberland Presbyterian? Nashville, 1874.

BEATIFIC VISION, or the direct and unhindered vision of God. It is part of the reserved blessedness of the redeemed (1 Cor. xiii. 12; 1 John iii. 2; Rev. xxiii. 3, 4). Our conception of its nature must necessarily be very vague, but our belief in its existence is founded upon Scripture and reason. The only question concerns its time. This has been much disputed. The Greek Church and many Protestants, especially Lutherans and Calvinists, put the vision after the judgment day. Dr. Dodd, Hoseo vol. iii., p. 890. But the Council of Florence (1439) condemned this view in the following.

words: "We determine that the souls of those who have remained pure and spotless after baptism, and of those whose sins after baptism have been pardoned, either in this life or the next, are immediately received into heaven, and behold plainly the Triune God as he is." To the same intent speaks the Constitution of Benedict XII. (1334-43) in the previous century. So the Council of Trent, in the decree concerning the "Invocation, Veneration, and Relics of Saints," speaks of the saints as enjoying "eternal happiness" in heaven (Sess. xiv. Dec. 3, 1563. See Schaff's Creeds, vol. ii., p. 200). It is, however, reasonable to suppose that this glorious sight, this wondrous knowledge, is first revealed in heaven, and that only intimations of it are known in the intermediate state. Of it Dr. Hodge says, "The incomprehensible blessedness of heaven shall arise from the vision of God. The vision is beatific. It beattles: it passes into the soul into the divine image, transfixing it in the divine life, so that it is filled with the fullness of God. This vision of God is in the face of Jesus Christ, in whom dwells the plenitude of the divine glory bodily. God is seen in fashion as a man, and it is this manifestation of God in the person of Christ that is inconceivably and intolerably ravishing" (Systematic Theology, as above). The question of Bernard of Cluny is asked again:

"Say, O dear country of my heart! shall these thy joys be mine?

Shall I, in that my precious home, behold the light divine?

God's overflying gift obtain? —

Or is my hope, my faith, in vain?"

BEATIFICATION, a lower degree of, and a preliminary step to, canonization, declaring a person blessed after death, though not deciding whether he is a saint or not, and granting to him certain religious honors short of worship. Originally beatification was a simple episcopal prerogative, and the ceremony could be performed in any church; but Urban VIII. reserved the right for the papal chancery to forbid the ceremony to be performed in any other place but the basilica of the Vatican. See CANONIZATION.

BEATON, David, b. in 1494; a younger son of John Beaton of Balfour, in the county of Fife; d. at St. Andrews, May 29, 1546; was educated at St. Andrews, May 29, 1546; was educated at St. Andrews and Glasgow; studied canon law in Paris, and was made Abbot of Arbroath in 1523, lord privy seal in 1528, Bishop of St. Andrews in 1537, cardinal in 1538, Chancellor of Scotland, and legate a latere, in 1543. In the political contest between the French and English party, he sided with the former, and fought with energy and courage for the independence of Scotland against the plans of Henry VIII. In the religious contest between the Romanists and the Reformers, he took as decidedly the part of the hierarchy, and did not scruple to use intrigue and force when argument and persuasion failed. The persecution of George Wishart is an instance: he was seized, imprisoned in the Castle of St.- Andrews, tried in the cathedral before the cardinal and a court of priests, sentenced to death, and burnt, without the intercession of any human lord, by the pope's legate, and overtook the cardinal. A conspiracy was formed against him by a number of the Reform party, and he was murdered one morning in his bedchamber. See CHARLES ROGERS: Life of George Wishart, Edinburgh, 1878.

BEATTIE, James, b. at Laurencekirk, Scotland, Oct. 25, 1735; d. at Aberdeen, Aug. 18, 1803; studied at Marischal College, Aberdeen, and became professor of philosophy at that institution in 1790. He wrote an Essay on Truth against Hume, which was very successful (1770); also Dissertations Moral and Critical (1783); Evidences of the Christian Religion (1786), etc.; and some poetry, especially The Minstrel (1774), a poem of much merit, by which he is best known. His life was written by Sir William Forbes, 3 vols., 1807.

BEAUSOEBRE, Isaac de, b. at Niort, in the department of Deux-Sèvres, France, March 8, 1659; d. in Berlin, June 6, 1738; descended from a Protestant family; studied theology at Saumur; was made pastor at Châtillon-sur-Indre in 1683; fled to Holland in 1685; became chaplain to the Princess of Anhalt in 1686, and pastor of the French congregation in Berlin in 1695. Together with Lentant he gave a French translation of the New Testament, which appeared at Amsterdam, 1718. He also wrote Histoire de Manichée et du manichéisme, 2 vols., Amsterdam, 1734; Histoire de la Réformation, 4 vols., 1755-86, and other works.

BEBENBURG, Lupold, d. 1363 as Bishop of Bamberg; descended from a noble Frankish family; studied canon law at Bologna, and placed himself, in the controversy between Ludwig the Bavarian and the Pope, on the side of the former. His De Juribus Regni et Imperii Romanorum, first printed at Strassburg (1508), edited by Jakob Wimpfeling, is remarkable, also, on account of its method,—discussing the subject by means of historical facts rather than abstract ideas and Aristotelian politics.

BEC, Abbey of, situated in the diocese of Rouen, was founded in 1040 by St. Herluin, and became, while Lanfranc and Anselm were teachers in its school, one of the most famous centres of learning. Among its pupils were the Pope Alexander II., Guittmond, Yves de Chartres, Gilbert and Miles Crespin (who wrote the lives of its first abbots), and Robert de Thorigny, who commenced its chronicle, which was afterwards continued by anonymous writers. About 1100 the abbey was exempted from the episcopal authority.

BECAN, Martin, b. in Flanders, 1550; d. in Vienna, April 23, 1624; entered the Society of Jesus; taught philosophy and theology in the colleges of his order; became confessor to the emperor, Ferdinand II., and distinguished himself by the fury with which he labored against the Reformation. In his Controversia Anglica de Potestate Regii et Pontificis, Mentz, 1612, he defended the morality of assassinating a heretic king, and in his Augmentationis Sermontis, Mentz, 1609, he declared that no promise or oath given to a heretic was binding. Rome condemned the former proposition, but not the latter.

1878. The facts of his outward life are few: he studied at Tübingen from 1822 to 1826; left the university to become pastor of Waldtheim; in 1829 he rose to be "Stadt-Pfarrer" (city pastor) of Mergentheim; but in 1830 he left the pastorate, and entered the profession of church law as professor extraordinaire at Basel, and then as professor ordinary at Tübingen from 1843 till his death. Baur and he were for many years fellow professors, but they belonged to different schools; and in more senses than one, Beck lived after Baur died; for, in opposition to Baur, he led his pupils into the study of the Bible upon simple, positive principles. He had little respect for the learned but sceptical and really shallow theories of the higher critics. The very titles of his books show how intense was his arder for positive Bible-Christianity. He was the best modern representative of the Wurtemberg School of Bengel and Oetinger. By plain, homely ways, by a kind heart, and manly independence, he won respect, confidence, and affection. He wrote, Einleitung in das System der christlichen Lehre, Stuttgart 1839; Der Gedanke des christlichen Lebens, Basel, 1839; Die christliche Lebenswissenschaft nach der biblischen Urkunden, Bnd. I., Stuttgart, 1841; Die christliche Menschenleidung (continuation of the Gedanke d. christ. Lebens), Basel, 1842; Umriss der biblischen Seelenlehre, Stuttgart, 1843, 3d ed., 1877; English Translation, Outline of Biblical Psychology, Edinburgh, 1857; Christliche Reiben, Stuttgart, 1834-70 (6 Sammlungen); Leitfaden der christlichen Glaubenslehre, 2d ed., Stuttgart, 1869; Christliche Liebelehre, Stuttgart, 1872; Erklärung der zwei Briefe Paul an Timotheus, ed. by his son.

BECKET, Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury; b. in London, Dec. 21, 1118; d. in Canterbury, Dec. 29, 1170. The writing of his name A Becket, as if he were of noble birth, is inaccurate, and now discarded.

Life—His father, Gilbert Becket, was from Rouen; his mother, Roger or Matilda, from Caen. But, though thus Norman in parentage, he was a thorough Englishman, full of national and local patriotism. His father, a baron of the city of London, gave his son an excellent education, with the canons of Merton Abbey, in London schools, and afterwards in Paris. There is no proof that he ever went to Oxford. His father's friend, Richer of Laigle,—one of the great barons of England,—took an interest in the boy; and, in his castle of Pevensey, Becket was introduced to the sports of hunting and hawking, in which he became such a proficient. On his return from Paris, he was employed under the sheriffs of London, and so made acquainted with political business. But preferment was to be expected in the case of so brilliant a scholar; and when common friends from the other side of the Channel had recommended him to the notice of Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, who, however, was probably already acquainted with Becket's father, he was immediately taken into his service (1142), sent to Bologna and Auxerre to study civil and canon law, and to be quickly trained in the use of the see, and Proceeds of Beverley. While in this double capacity, Becket showed his loyalty to the Church, and his political tact, by cleverly solving the difficulty connected with the succession to the crown of England. Securing it to Henry, while not sacrificing papal interests, he made two secret journeys to Rome, and thwarted an effort to win over the Pope to the side of Eustace, the son of Stephen. When Henry II. came to the throne, he made Becket his chancellor (1155), on the recommendation of Theobald; and the ecclesiastical was immediately forgotten in the statesman. The key to the mystery of Becket's character, his apparent fickleness, is his complete devotion to the office he held, involving a constant study how best to magnify it. Accordingly, when a chancellor, he served the king with the utmost fidelity. He surrounded himself with the outward state besetting so exalted a station, because he had the wit to see that it would give him more power. While chancellor, he headed the chivalry of England in the war of Toulouse, and there certainly acted like a king, and not like an ecclesiastic; for he joined in their bloody work. But to him belongs the chief credit of bringing England back from utter lawlessness to strict an administration of the law as the state of England in the twelfth century allowed. So that we may emphasize this point laid upon this fact. He was one of the greatest ecclesiarchs England ever had. It was an evil day for him and for his fame when he accepted the Archbishopric of Canterbury. He left an office he was fitted for, for one he was not; and he was, alas! one of those men who show their strong side in prosperity, and their weak in adversity. But being elected in 1162, by the Chapter of Canterbury, on the King's command, archbishop, he gave up his pomp and worldliness, and began at once a life of austerities, and at the same time appeared as the champion of the Church against the State; so that he contended with Henry, his patron and friend. Yet this was not fickleness, but principle: he was loyal to his master. Once it was the King, now it was the Pope: once it was the State, now it was the Church. But because Becket was an aegrot, an canon of Clarendon, Jan. 25, 1164, which subjected clerks (clergy) guilty of crime to the ordinary civil tribunals, put ecclesiastical dignities at the royal disposal, prevented all appeals to Rome, and made Henry the virtual head of the Church. To these, however, under pressure, he set his seal; but as he had been led to suppose the King would have been satisfied with a merely verbal assent, — a very different thing in the morality of his age,—when compelled to affix his seal, he felt himself entrapped, and guilty of a great sin. The Pope absolved him, and he proceeded to anathematize the Constitutions with energy. In so doing he had great popular sympathy. To be sure, the Constitutions were not novelties; yet they appeared so in the novel form of statutes. They were really most beneficent, helpful in raising England out of barbarism into civilization; and Henry was right in urging them. But, as they undoubtedly detracted from the papal and ecclesiastical power, Becket from his standpoint was also right in exposing the absence of harmony, particularly between king and prelate, disastrously for the latter. An assembly of the people was held at Northampton. Becket was cited to appear before it to answer the suit of John the Marshal, who had charged him with injustice, and had the case removed from the archbishop's to the king's court. Thus to himself the Clarendon Constitutions, which sanctioned such proceedings, were applied; but it surely was unworthy of the king, after having gotten him in his power on one pretext, to raise in charge of malfeasance in office so long a time after his connection, with the chancellorship had ceased. This was a mean trick. Becket denied the authority of the council over him, appealed to the Pope, refused to make any explanation, fled in disguise, and after hiding in England, at last, with two companions, crossed the Channel from Sandwich to Gravelines, Nov. 2, 1164. He hastened to Sens, where the Pope (Alexander III.) then was, whither, also, the King's legates were bending their steps. The Pope favored, Louis VII. of France kindly received him, and he retired to the Cistercian monastery of Contigny, where he passed the next two years. The Pope acted cautiously in the matter, because Henry had shown a disposition to favor the anti-pope, Pascal III. But, when the Archbishop of York officiated at the coronation of Edward, who was taking Henry's place, the latter took decided measures, and threatened excommunication if the King did not make peace with Becket. This he did July 22, 1170, at Pielcover in Vendome. The first act of the reinstated archbishop was to excommunicate all his enemies, — the Archbishop of York, and the bishops who had taken part in the coronation, or who favored the Clarendon Constitutions. Becket returned to England, and was warmly received. His friends were many. The excommunicated prelates fled to Normandy, where Henry was: their arrival created a great sensation. The King is said to have exclaimed, "By God's eyes! if all are excommunicated who were concerned in the coronation, I am excommunicated also. Is this Peter's legate to me on a lame mule, to insult me and varlet that I loaded with kindness, that came first coronation, I am excommunicated also. Is this?"

years afterwards. The news of the murder greatly affected Henry, and he took rigorous and indeed humiliating measures to remove the popular impression that he was directly responsible for it. One of the most remarkable scenes in history was enacted in Canterbury Cathedral when Henry II. of England, dressed in a hair shirt, laid his head upon Thomas's tomb, and was whipped by the monks and clergy present. But, he stooped to conquer. He was a more powerful king after this penance.

Character. — Thomas Becket is a fine study. He came at a time when the country was ripe for progress; and, while chancellor, he hastened the good work; but, in his later years he tried to stem the tide. The interest of his life for most persons begins when he leaves the pomp of the chancellor for the ascereticism of the archbishop. It was of deliberate purpose that he entered into opposition to the King. He dreamed of showing a devotion to the Catholic Church equal to that of his great predecessor Anselm; but alas! he had not the same genius, self-control, and tact. Anselm and Henry I. contended for supremacy, but the friendship between them was not broken. Becket contended so hotly, that he was in open feud with his sovereign. Becket was the first Ultramontane of his day, but upon the upholding of papal privileges, more eager than the Pope about them. Curiously enough, he disappointed his two patrons, Vaughan (because he seemed to forget the Church) and Henry (because as archbishop he seemed to forget the State). Yet, in serving these two causes so faithfully, he was not inconsistent with that guiding principle already mentioned, — to be faithful to his master. But this principle surely led to great changes of outward conduct, and hence to insinuations of hypocrisy. Unfortunately, the archiepiscopal throne was not fitted to him; and hence he discharged its duties in a strained fashion, like a man who conscientiously is acting a conscience a part. But Henry is also important, in weighing his character as archbishop, to bear in mind that Thomas died for the right of his own church, — for the right of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and none other, to crown the King of England, but that the struggle began upon quite a different point, viz., the question of the exemption of the clergy from temporal jurisdiction.

Lit. — Original sources, the letters and contemporary biographies of Becket are printed in Materials for the History of Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, edited by James Craigie Robertson, Canon of Canterbury; published, under the direction of the Master of the Rolls, 1873 seqq., 5th vol. 1881. This publication supersedes the ill-arranged collection of Dr. J. A. Giles in 8 vols. Oxford, 1833–40.

BEDE, or Baeda, The Venerable (Beda Venerabilis), b. 674; d. May 26, 735; was from his seventh year educated in the Monastery of Wearmouth; moved afterwards to that of Jarrow, where he was ordained deacon in his nineteenth, and presbyter in his thirtieth year, and remained there for the rest of his life, dividing his time between devotional prayers, studies, teaching, and writing. What we know of his life we owe to notices scattered throughout his own works, especially Hist. Ecc., V. 24, and a letter on his death by one of his pupils, Cuthbert. What the later vita contain is nothing but worthless fancies. See GEILKE: Disputatio de Ven. Bed., Leyden, 1838; K. WERNER: Beda d. Ehmerkunde, Vienna, 1875; and the prefaces and introductions to the editions of Bede’s works by Stevenson and Giles. A popular account is given in the series, Fathers for English Readers, by G. F. Browne, London, n. d. The works of Bede range over the whole field of knowledge occupied at his time,—exegesis, grammar, metrics, physics, astronomy, chronology, history, and biography. At the end of his Hist. Ecc. he gives himself a list of his works; but much has become lost, much has been replaced by spurious matter, and much is still left in manuscript. The earlier editions of his collected works—Paris, 1544; Basle, 1563; Cologne, 1612—are completely uncritical; and the latest, by Giles, London, 1843 (12 vols. 8vo), and in Patrol. Curas, Paris, 1850 (xx—xxv), are unsatisfactory. Of the historical works, Bede himself mentions, the commentaries on Isaiah, Daniel, the minor prophets, Ezra and Nehemiah, are lost; and those on the Kings, Job, Genesis, the Pentateuch, and the Acts, are spurious. In these commentaries the allegorical explanation has completely superseded the grammatico-historical, and one of the chief demands of the method is a full quotation of the views of the Fathers.

Those works which have contributed most to Bede’s fame are his historical writings, more especially his Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Britonum. It was finished in 731, and gives the political and ecclesiastical history of England, from Julius Cesar down to the date of its completion. The introduction, treating the period before the conversion of Saxons, is a mere compilation from Orosius, Gildas, Prosper, Secundus, the Vita S. Germani, etc.; but the real body of work, treating the period from 500 to 731, is an independent and conscientious study of documents and other historical sources, and has made Bede the teacher of them and the founder of English language. It was translated from Latin into Saxon by King Alfred. Another work, De Ratione Temporum, is a complete chronology, to which is added the De Statibus Seculi Six, an outline of the world’s history, inspired by Augustine (Sermo 250 in oct. pasch.). The martyrologies ascribed to Bede are probably spurious.

BEDELL, William, b. Sept. 29, 1571, at Blacknotley, Essex, Eng.; d. Feb. 7, 1642. He was a scholar, and afterwards a fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge. His first charge was at St. Edmund’s-Bury, Suffolk; but after a year’s service he went to Venice (1604) as chaplain to Sir Henry Wotton; where he made the acquaintance of Father Paolo Sarpi, who instructed him to his care the manuscript of his History of the Council of Trent. In 1612 he returned to St. Edmund’s-Bury, and there married Mrs. Leah Maw, the widow of the recorder of the town, who “had five small children, and but a small estate.” Afterwards, since “the very great (Bury) congregation found a great defect in his voice,” he removed to Great Horningheath, and in 1627 he was appointed “provost of the College of the Holy and Undivided Trinity, Dublin.” He died in Ireland. Here he was very efficient. Without his knowledge, he was made, in 1629, bishop of the united dioceses of Kilmore and Ardagh; but, consistently with his views on episcopal plurality, he gave up the latter see. His position was quite trying, owing to opinions, in which he sympathized with the party of non-Conformists, who enjoyed great esteem, and he reformed many abuses. He also had the Book of Common Prayer and the Bible translated into Irish. When the Irish rebellion of Oct. 23, 1641, broke out, his home was a refuge for the neighboring English; but he was kept there a sort of prisoner by the insurgents, until Christmas, when Edmund O’Reilly arrested him, and conveyed the whole family to Loughwater Castle, where, however, they were well treated. After the Christmas holidays, he was released, and went to live with the Rev. Denzil Holles, who at that time was in Ireland. He wrote a large treatise on the questions, “Where was our religion before Luther?” and, “What became of our ancestors who died in Poperoy?” His Life, with the Letters between...
Webbeseorde and Bedell, was published by Bishop Burnet, London, 1855; by Dr. W. J. Monck Mason, London, 1843; also his Life, by his Son, edited by J. E. B. Mayor, Cambridge, 1871.

BEECHER, Lyman, b. at New Haven, Oct. 12, 1779; d. at Brooklyn, Jan. 10, 1868; was educated at Yale College; ordained pastor of East Hampton, L. I., in Sept. 5, 1799; removed in 1810 to Litchfield, Conn., and thence, in 1826, to Boston; was chosen president, and professor of theology in Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati, in 1852; returned in 1853 to Boston, and spent the last days of his life in Brooklyn. He was pre-eminent as a preacher for an uncommon union of imagination, fervor, and logic. At the same time he was a profound student of theology, of which he was professor for twenty years. Yet his results were never presented in scholastic and technical forms, but in the language of real life. He developed a theology to be preached for the conversion and sanctification of men, and for the regeneration of human society. His theological system is most fully developed in his Views of Theology, the Faith once delivered to the Saints, and his Reply to a Review of it, and in The Bible a Code of Laws. In the great theological and ecclesiastical controversy that shook New England, and divided the Presbyterian Church, he took a prominent part. [He was a man of originality and great force of character, foremost and fervid in denouncing duelling, intemperance, and every form of immorality. His Six Sermons on Intemperance exerted a worldwide influence. His ministry was eminently blessed to the conversion of souls, and has been continued by his children, of whom Edward, Charles, Henry Ward, Thomas K., Catharine, Charles Beecher, appeared in 2 vols., in New York, 1804-5, and his Works, in 3 vols., Boston, 1852.

EDWARD BEECHER.

BEE-CULTURE AMONG THE HEBREWS.

There are and have always been many wild bees in Palestine, which hive in crevices of rocks, old trees, and the like (Deut. xxxi. 13; Judg. xiv. 8; 1 Sam. xiv. 25 sqq.; cf. Herod, 5, 14). Because their sting is painful and dangerous, hostile armies are compared to them (Deut. 44; Ps. xxxvii. 12: Isa. vii. 18; cf. Homer's Iliad, 2, 87 sqq.). There were also domestic bees, which were handled by the bee-keepers, and obeyed the customary hissing and whistling (cf. the Commentaries on Isa. v. 20; Zech. x. 8). According to Philo, some of the Essenes devoted themselves to bee-culture (Mang. ed., II. p. 633; Bohn's trans. vol. iv. p. 220); and this industry is also mentioned in the Talmud. Honey is frequently mentioned in the Bible as a favorite article of food (2 Sam. xvii. 29; Ps. xix. 11; Prov. xxiv. 13, xxv. 19 sqq.; Cant. v. 1; Ezek. xvi. 13; Luke xivv. 42). "Flowing with milk and honey" was the phrase descriptive of a rich land (Exod. iii. 8; Isa. vii. 15; Jer. xi. 5; Ezek. xx. 6); also "a land of oil, olive, and honey" (Deut. viii. 8; 2 Kings xviii. 21). We find honey introduced in similies (Prov. 31. 6; Cant. iv. 10; Cant. iv. 12). Deborah, which means "bee," was a favorite female name. שֶׁכָּה, d'cash, usually rendered "honey," occasionally means rather "debs;" i.e., the sirup made of boiled grape-must, and which is an important article of commerce in the East (Gen. xliii. 11; Ezek. xxvii. 17). Honey might not be used in meat-offerings (Lev. ii. 11 sq.), not because bees were unclean, for a tithe of honey was on one occasion paid to the priests (2 Chron. xxxiii. 5), but either because it so quickly soured, or else because it was considered an offense when burnt. See Lengerke: Canaan; Thomason: Land and Book; Kitto: Physical History of Palestine; Robinson: Later Biblical Researches, Tristram: Land of Israel.

BEEZUBUB (properly, in all the New-Testament passages,—Matt. x. 25, xii. 24, 27; Mark iii. 22; Luke xi. 15, 19, 20) is the name of the prince of the demons; i.e., of Satan, and means "the Baal, master of the house." Our Lord, in Matt. x. 25, plays upon the word. But we are justified in tracing Beelzebul to the much older name Baal Zebub, which is found in the Old Testament that of an idol. 1. Baal Zebub was honored in Ekron, where he had a temple and an oracle (2 Kings i. 3). The name means "lord of flies." In classical mythology, there was a god who protected from flies. It is related that Hercules banished the flies from Olympus by erecting a shrine to Zeus Apomius (Averter of flies); and the Romans called Hercules Apomius. A similar deity is mentioned in different places; the excuse for such worship being the plague flies cause in those warm countries.

The name "lord of flies" compels us to consider him the god of the sender of, as well as the protector from, flies; and, further, as Baal Zebub is identical with the sun-god, we may conjecture his name came from the fact that flies are most numerous in midsummer, when the sun is warmest. And that he had an oracle is to be explained by a substitution of effect for cause. Flies come obedient to certain atmospheric conditions; and so the god was considered to have caused these conditions, and so at length his control would be extended to other events, and accordingly he was consulted. Sometimes Baal Zebub was known as Baal Apomius. More generally, the flies were believed, at all events by the Babylonians, to reveal the future. See Lenormant, La Divination, p. 93.)

2. Beelzebul was early identified with Baal Zebub; and, as was so often the case, turned into a bad demon, in accordance with the later Jewish ideas. Since Lightfoot (Horae Heb. in loco), it has been common to say that the name of the demon Beelzebul was purposely made out of Beelzebub, in order to express contempt and horror; i.e., "lord of dung," instead of "lord of flies." But, inasmuch as such a name for Satan does not occur outside of the New Testament, it is better to seek its derivation in the old Ekron worship, which might, in the New-Testament times, have still existed. Beelzebul may therefore be looked upon as precisely the same name as Beelzebub, except that the last syllable was softened, and therefore as having the same meaning. But why did such a god become the head of the demons? Because the fly is an unclean and annoying thing; and so the connection of Baal with the flies showed that he was in a sense the most unclean god, and therefore worthy of the greatest contempt. The rabbins, according to Selden, said, that, while flies came in clouds about the heathen sacrifices, they never approached the Hebrew. See Literature, under BAAL. WOLF BAUDISSIN.

BEER (well). 1. Name of a station of the Israelites upon the desert, to the north of Moab (Num. xxxi. 16, 18); perhaps identical with Beer-elim, "the well of the heroes" (Isa. xv. 8). 2. The place in Judah to which Jotham fled from Abimelech (Judg. ix. 21).

BEEROTH (the wells), one of the four Hivite cities to make a treaty with Joshua (Josh. i. 17), now called-el-Bir; the first resting-place upon the route from Jerusalem to Nablus, and therefore not unlikely, as tradition says, the place where Mary discovered that the child Jesus was not in the company (Luke ii. 41).

BEER-SHEBA (well of seven or of the oath) was situated at the entrance of the desert, and at the extreme limit of the land of Judah; hence the expression "all Israel from Dan to Beer-sheba." It is named thirty-three times in the Bible, only in the Old Testament. It has been a centre of religious interest from the earliest times. There Abraham lived (xxi. 33). It was a seat of idolatrous worship (Amos vi. 1, 2), as a ruin. To-day it bears the name Bir-el-Seba, in the fourteenth century was rediscovered, but in the middle ages, the seat of a bishopric attached to Jerusalem. It then faded out of notice, but in the fourteenth century was rediscovered, but as a ruin. To-day it bears the name Bir-el-Seba, interpreted by the Arabs, "the well of the lion," and has two large, fine wells, surrounded by troughs used for watering flocks and herds, — so patriarchal is the manner of life of the surrounding nomads.

BECARDS and BEGUINES. In the latter part of the twelfth century, associations of women were formed in several cities of the Netherlands, living together in a common house, and leading a pious life, under the superintendence of a patriarchal manner of life of the surrounding nomads.

BELGIC CONFESSION. The, was written in French in 1561 by Guldo de Brèg (1540–97), aided by Adrien de Saravia (professor of theology in Leyden, afterwards in Cambridge, where he died 1613), II. Modetus (for some time chaplain of William of Orange), and G. Wingen. It was revised by Francis Junius of Bourges (1545–1602), a student of Calvin's, pastor of a Walloon congregation at Antwerp, and afterwards professor of theology at Leyden, who abridged the sixteenth article, and sent a copy to Geneva and other churches for approval. It was probably printed at Antwerp for all events, and afterwards translated into Dutch, German, and Latin. It was presented to Philip II. in 1562, with the vain hope of securing toleration. It was formally adopted by synods at Antwerp (1580), Wesel (1589), Emden (1771), Dort...

(1574), Middleburg (1581), again by the great synod of Dort, April 29, 1619. But inasmuch as the Arminians had demanded partial changes, and the text had become corrupt, the synod of Dort submitted the French, Latin, and Dutch texts to a careful revision. Since that time the Belgic Confession, together with the Heidelberg Catechism, has been the recognized symbol of the Reformed Churches in Holland and Belgium, and of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in America.

The Belgic Confession contains thirty-seven articles, and follows the order of the Gallican Confession, but is less polemical and full and elaborate, especially on the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Church, and the Sacraments. It is, upon the whole, the best symbolical statement of the Calvinistic system of doctrine, with the exception of the Westminster Confession.

The French text must be considered as the original. Of the first edition of 1561 or 1562 no copies are known. The synod of Antwerp, in September, 1589, ordered a precise parchment copy of the revised text of Junius to be made for its archives, which copy had to be signed by every new minister. This manuscript has always been regarded in the Belgic churches as the authentic document. The first Latin translation was made from Junius’ text by Beza, or under his direction, for the Harmonia Concessionum, Geneva, 1581. The same passed into the first edition of the Corpus et Syntagma Confessionum, Geneva, 1612. A second Latin translation was prepared by Festus Hommius for the synod of Dort, 1618, revised and approved 1619; and from it was made the excellent English translation in use in the Reformed (Dutch) Church in America. It appeared in Greek 1529, 1531, and 1590, at Utrecht.

Belgium. The introduction of Christianity in those territories which in 1830 were formed into the kingdom of Belgium, is obscure: at the time of Constantine, however, several episcopal sees had been established here. The salient points in the history of the Belgic Church before the Reformation are: the brilliant part which the Belgic Church played in the first crusades; the rise of such sects as the Beghards and Beguines, the Lollards, and the Fratres Communia Viue, Brethren of the Common Life (see titles); and the appearance of Ruysbroeck and Erasmus. The first trace of an open sympathy with Luther was found in an Augustine monastery in Antwerp, whose prior, Jacob Spreng, was carried a prisoner to Brussels in 1521, and compelled to retract. In 1522 the whole monastery was broken up; and in 1523 two of its monks, Henri Voes and Jacobus, were burnt in Brussels. But in spite of very harsh edicts,—Worms, 1521, Malines, 1526, Brussels, 1529, 1531, etc.,—preventing the introduction and sale of Protestant writings, pursuing and punishing Protestantpreachers, etc., the Reformation spread, especially among the lower and middle classes. Marguerite of Savoy was not a fanatic, and Maria of Hungary was even suspected of favoring the movement. The excesses, however, of the Anabaptists, and the extravagances of the Brethren of the Free Spirit, hurt the Protestant cause even in the eyes of its friends, and justified the government in applying more effective means of resistance. By an ordinance of April 20, 1550, Charles V. introduced the Spanish Inquisition in the provinces; and, although the opposition was so unanimous and decided that the name of the institution had to be altered, the institution itself was actually established and put in operation by Philip II. Nevertheless, the Belgic Confession (see title) was published in 1562, sent to Philip II. in 1563, and accepted by the synod of Antwerp 1566. In 1557 the Duke of Alva arrived, and the immediate result was absolute suppression on the one side, open rebellion on the other. Alva’s successor, however, Alexander of Parma, succeeded by the treaty of Arras (May 17, 1579) in separating the southern provinces from the northern, and in reconciling them with Spain; and from this moment Belgium became the scene of a most violent Roman-Catholic re-action. When Joseph II. published his edict of tolerance, Oct. 13, 1781, the whole people arose, inflamed by the Jesuits and the priests, and a revolution was about to break out again, but this time against, and not for, religious freedom. Again, in 1815, when the southern and northern provinces had been united into one kingdom, the Roman Catholics of Belgium, fearing the contact with Protestant Holland, used every kind of intrigue, from the most insidious seductions in the royal cabinets, to the grossest play upon popular passions in the streets, in order to bring about a separation. In 1830 they succeeded.

According to the census of 1816, the last which paid any regard to the difference of confession, there were, out of 4,337,196 inhabitants, only 10,323 non-catholics. Since that time, the population has increased to 5,403,906; but the proportion between the different confessions has not changed. There are hardly more than 10,000 Protestants and 1,000 Jews in the country. At the head of the Roman-Catholic Church stands the Archbishop of Malines, and by his side five bishops,—of Liege, Namur, Tournay, Ghent, and Bruges. But the archbishop is only an administrative centre. The bishops stand immediately under the Pope, and their power is very great. They have the right of all spiritual and temporal appoint- ments in their dioceses, and all officials are ad nutum amavubiles. The church has six theological seminaries and a theological faculty in the University of Louvain: in the three other universities,—Ghent, Liege, and Brussels, there is no theological faculty. The Protestants are organ- ized into ten congregations, with fourteen ministers, and governed by a synod, which assembles every year. According to the constitution of 1830, the Church is wholly independent of the state. Every citizen has the right of free religious worship, but education has been until lately completely controlled by the Roman-Catholic priests and the Jesuits. The emancipation of the school has for several years been the burning question of Belgian politics, the cause of cabinet crises, and riots in the streets; and the victory of the liberal party is by no means assured, although recently great strides have been taken in this direction.

BELIAL (worthlessness), correct form Beliar, is given once in the New Testament (2 Cor. vi. 15) as the name of Satan (the Peshito has “Satan”). But in the Old Testament, Belial never has this meaning: there it is an appellation, "worthlessness," "destructiveness," almost always in connection with a word setting forth the person or thing whose worthlessness or wickedness is spoken of; as, "man of Belial," "most frequently, "son of Belial," "men of Belial," "daughter of Belial," further, "thoughts of Belial," etc.; and the adjunct is occasionally omitted, as in 2 Sam. xxiii. 6; Job xxxiv. 18; Nah. i. 15; when the word means the "bad," the "destroyer," the "wicked." The etymology of the word is b'lee, "without," and yak-al, "profit," either from yah-al, "to get in on the world" (one in the world), or from the idea of laying aside or abjuring, to ascend: therefore it means, to be "worthless." Although thus originally not a proper name, but an appellation, in the later Jewish and Christian literature it passed over into a name for Satan, not as the "worthless," but as the "destroyer." BELKNAP, Jeremy, b. at Boston, June 4, 1744; d. there, June 20, 1798; was educated in Harvard College, and ordained pastor of the Congregational society of Dover, N. H., 1767, and removed in 1787 to Boston. He was one of the founders of the Massachusetts Historical Society, and wrote, beside a number of sermons and Dissertations upon the Character and Resurrection of Christ, 1795, a History of New Hampshire, 3 vols., 1784–92, and American Biography, 2 vols., 1794–98.

BELLAMY, Joseph, was born in New Cheshire, Conn., Nov. 20, 1719. He died at Bethlehem [Bethlehem], Conn., March 6, 1790, in the seventy-second year of his age, and the fiftieth of his ministry in that place.

In his boyhood he was remarkable for his love of study, and his proficiency in it. When only sixteen years of age, he was graduated at Yale College. His religious zeal, his taste and temperament, were signs of his call to enter the ministerial office. In part he pursued his theological studies with Jonathan Edwards at Northampton, Mass. When he was about the age of eighteen years, he was appointed as a preacher by the New Haven Association; and on the 2d of April, 1740, soon after he had entered his twenty-first year, he was ordained as pastor of the church at Bethlehem. Between 1740 and 1744 "the great awakening" was in progress throughout New England. Young Bellamy threw his whole soul into this work; itinerated as an evangelist among the churches; in two years preached four hundred and fifty-eight times in two hundred and thirteen places. Many thought him to be, on the whole, equal to Whitefield. He was a character, and the faults commonly ascribed to him were a natural result of his marked individuality. He struggled against them. In despite of them he retained a well-nigh unbounded influence over those who knew him. In ecclesiastical councils his words were prized as eminently judicious. His judgment was honored by such literary men as presidents Burr, Davies, Finley, Wheelock; such ministers as Rodgers, Blair, Brainerd, Davenport, Tennent. He and Hopkins and Edwards were united in a triumvirate. In 1754 he was called, not unanimously, to become the pastor of the first, then the only, Presbyterian church in New-York City. The Consociation refused to dismiss him. The call was afterwards renewed, and again declined. He is said to have been "the most "useful" preacher in New-England," a pastor who established a "school of the prophets" in his own house (Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. XXXVIII. pp. 372, 373). As a theological teacher he was noted for his skill in detecting sophistry, his thorough acquaintance with the distinctive principles of Calvinism, the pithy and sententious criticisms which he passed upon his pupils. Among these pupils were Dr. Jonathan Edwards, Dr. John Smalley, Dr. Samuel Spring of Newburyport, Dr. Ephraim Judson, Dr. Levi Hart, Dr. Joseph Eckley of the Old South Church, Boston. Upon them he made a profound impression. Among these was Aaron Burr, the future Vice-President of the United States, and the son of Bellamy's life-long friend Aaron Burr, president of Princeton. The pupils who were committed to his care remembered him with gratitude for his wit, which was pregnant with wisdom. A volume of laconics might have been collected from his conversations with them.

The published writings of Bellamy fail to give an adequate idea of his eloquence in the pulpit. They develop, however, his keen insight into human nature, his skill in unravelling the intricacies of spurious religion, his fidelity to his conscience, his zeal for the purity of the Church. They are mainly devoted to the defence of Calvinism against Antinomianism on the one hand, and Arminianism on the other; also to the delineation of true piety as distinguished from fanaticism on the one hand, and latitudinarianism on the other. Some of his writings were reprinted in Great Britain, and received high commendation from such men as Andrew Fuller and John Ryland. Through the influence of Dr. John Erskine and the Earl of Buchan, two of Bellamy's warm admirers in Scotland, he received in 1798 the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the University of St. Andrews. Some of his writings have passed through several editions, and in 1811 were collected and republished in New York. The edition consists of three octavo volumes (pp. 540, 544, 546), and is prefaced by BELLS are an invention of the Christian Church. They were unknown to the Jews and the Pagans, and they are not used by the Mohammedans. Small, globular, closed bells, tintinnabula, were used by the Hebrews (Exod. xxviii. 33), the Greeks, and the Romans, on clothes, in the baths, at sacrifices, etc.; but the invention of our church-bells is generally ascribed to Bishop Paulinus of Nola in Campania, who died in 431. Also their Latin name nola or campana (campanum), the latter of which is still living in the Italian language, is generally derived from him. But this derivation seems to be a mistake; for in the writings of Paulinus, though several, even elaborate descriptions of churches are given, no mention is ever made of bells. Further, tintinnabula were called nola long before the time of Paulinus; and campana refers most probably to the aes campanum, a metal spoken of by Pliny, from which bells were first made. The German name Glocke, from the old high German cloechön ("knock") was adopted in medieval Latin under the forms cloqua, clocca, or cloccum, whence the French cloche and the English "clock."

The first bell was probably simply an enlarged tintinnabulum; and it is thus called by Polydorus Vergilinus, who ascribes its first use to Pope Sabinius, the successor of Gregory I. It was introduced to replace the cursor ("runner") and the tuba ("trumpet") in calling together the faithful to service. Its use soon became general. In the seventh century we meet it in France. It was the belfries of St. Stephen's Church in Orleans, which in 610 caused a panic in the city of King Childebert. In the eighth century bells became common throughout the realm of Charlemagne. The campanum optimum, or great bell for the Cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle, was made by Tancho, a monk of St. Gall, and a famous bell-founder. In the ninth century bells were brought to the East. Duke Ursus of Venice sent twelve great bells as a present to the Byzantine emperor (Michael, or Basilius), and the emperor erected a belfry for them at the Church of St. Sophia. In the East, however, their general introduction was checked by the spread of Islam, the Mohammedans contemplating them with a kind of dread, and forbidding even the Christians to use them.

In the Western Church the bells, like all other church-furniture, were consecrated, or, as it was called, baptized, before taken into use. The bell was washed in holy water, then invocated upon it, and under chants and prayers the priest made the sign of the cross over it. There is a capitulo of Charlemagne, from 787, which expressly forbids the baptism of cloccum. But it is probable that cloccum there refers only to tintinnabula, or such small bells as were every day used. In the tenth century it also became customary to give the bell a name. In 908 Pope John XIII.
consecrated the great bell of the Church of the Lateran, and gave it his own name, Joannes.

BELSHAM, Thomas, b. at Bedford, Eng., April 15, 1753; d. at Hampstead, Nov. 11, 1829; was educated at the Dissenting Academy of Daventry, and became afterwards head of this institution, but left it in 1789, having adopted Unitarian views; was head of the Unitarian College of Hackney during the short period of its existence; and became minister to the Essex-street chapel in London in 1833. The most prominent of his works are: Review of American Unitarianism, 1813; Rudiments of Christianity, London, 1822, 2 vols.; and The Epistles of Paul the Apostle, translated, with exposition and notes, London, 1822, 2 vols. A Life of him, together with his letters, was published by J. Williams, London, 1833. The death of Dr Priestley left him the leading Unitarian in England. The "Unitarian Society for promoting Christian Knowledge and the Practice of Virtue" was his suggestion. He had an important share in the Improved Version of the New Testament upon the Basis of Archbishop New's Translation, with Notes Critical and Explanatory, London, 1808.

BELSHAZZAR (marg Bel protect the King), the first-born son of Nabonidus (the usurper of the Babylonian throne) and a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, and thus his dynasty had a color of legitimacy. In consequence of his maternal descent, Belshazzar could be called the son, i.e. descendant, of Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. v. 2, 11 sq.). But, even if his mother had not been the daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, he might still be styled as above, just as Jargon spoke of the preceding Assyrian and so he was a descendant of his ancestors (see G. Rawlinson, The Fire Great Monarchies, 3d ed., London, 1826, II, p. 139 sq.; Schrader, Keilinschriften u. A. T., Giesen, 1876, p. 254 sq.), and as, in 2 Chron. xi. 14, the successors of Jeroboam I. are called his sons, although in fact they belonged to another dynasty. Belshazzar, the crown-prince and joint-king, was nominated by his father regent of Babylon, and to him was confided the defence of the city against Cyrus. How he kept his trust let Daniel's wonderfully graphic account testify (Dan. v.). When Babylon fell, he was killed: his name, therefore, who had been defeated by Cyrus at Borsippa, after the capture of Babylon, was banished to Carmania, but there made ruler. The narrative of Daniel in regard to Belshazzar has been abundantly verified by Sir Henry Rawlinson's decipherment of several cuneiform inscriptions. One passage reads, "Me Nabu-nahid (Nabonidus), King of Babylon, from sin against thy great divinity, do thou save me, and health and long days numerous do thou multiply. And of Bel-sar-uzur (Belshazzar), my eldest son, the delight of my heart, in the worship of thy great divinity, his heart do thou establish, and may he not consort with sinners." — This identification renders intelligible the otherwise strange promise of Belshazzar's to make the interpreter of the writing on the wall the third ruler in the kingdom. We now know that Belshazzar was the second of the last two joint-kings of Babylon, and that the first was his son. — The writing on the wall must have appeared in startling contrast to the cuneiform inscriptions already upon it, which set forth the praises of the gods and the victories of the kings. BEMA (בֵּאָמָא, בֵּאָמָא) means in classical literature an elevated platform of a semicircular shape, destined to carry the alicia curricles, or throne of some magnificently endowed church or monastery. The name for that part of the Christian church formed by the apsis, where stood the throne of the bishop and the seats of lower clergy. In this signification it occurs in the fifty-sixth canon of the synod of Laodicea, which forbids the clergy to enter the bema and sit down before the arrival of the bishop. There is, however, also a more restricted sense of the word, in which it signifies any kind of elevated seat or place, such as the cathedra, the pulpit, etc., and in which it is synonymous with ambo. BENAI'AH (whom Jehovah built), the name of several Israelites. The most important of them is the son of Jehoiada, the chief priest (1 Chron. xxvii. 5), and a Levite, though born in Kabzeel, a city in the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 21). He was the captain of David's body-guard, or the Cherethites and Pelethites (2 Sam. viii. 18; 1 Kings i. 38), and in this capacity carried over his allegiance to Solomon, and executed the royal sentence upon Adonijah and Joab (1 Kings ii. 23, 30, 31), and thus eventually became Joab's successor. In the catalogue of David's mighty men he is mentioned; and three of his exploits are recorded in justification of his rank, which was between the first three of the Gibborim, or "mighty men," and the thirty "valiant men of the armies." These three exploits were: (1) he slew two of the thirty mighty men of Israel, Saul's ancient retainers, or of the king of Moab; (2) he slew a lion which had fallen into a pit in time of snow; (3) he slew an Egyptian giant, who, according to the additions in the Septuagint, carried a spear so huge that it seemed like a tree thrown across a ravine; but, as he did not like his weapon, he killed the giant with his own weapon. Benai'ah was captain of the host for the third month (1 Chron. xxvii. 5), and his course consisted of twelve divisions of twenty-four hundred men each. In 1 Chron. xxvii. 34 we read, "After Ahithophel, was Jehoiada, the son of Benai'ah," as counselor of the king. It is probable that the names are transposed, and that Benai'ah himself, and not his son, occupied this dignified position after the death of Ahithophel.

The other men of the same name are: 1. One of the thirty mighty men, an Ephraimite, captain of the eleventh monthly course (2 Sam. xxiii. 30); 2. One of the "princes" of the families of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 30); 3. A Levite in David's time, who was musical (1 Chron. xv. 18, 20, xvi. 5); 4. A priest who blew the trumpet before the ark in David's time (1 Chron. xxiv. 6); 5. A descendant of Asaph (2 Chron. xx. 14); 6. A Levite, who in Hezekiah's time was an overseer of offerings (2 Chron. xxxii. 17); 7. The father of Pelai'ah, "a prince of the people" in the time of Ezekiel (Ezek. xi. 13); 8. Two sons of Jehoiada the priest for four generations (Ezr. 8:16); 9. A grandfather of a king's wives (Ez. x. 25, 30—35, 43). A. Orelli.

BENEDICITE, the alternative to the Te Deum in the Book of Common Prayer. These two are the only portions of the kind in the book, which are not of canonical Scripture origin. The Benedict is, however, really an expansion of the Hundred and Forty-eighth Psalm, and is otherwise called the “Song of the Three Holy Children,” and is found among the Old-Testament Apocrypha, as part of the Greek addition to Daniel, inserted between the twenty-third and twenty-fourth verses of the third chapter. It was used as a hymn in the later Jewish Church, and very early adopted for use in the public service of the Christian Church. Chrysostom calls it “that admirable and marvellous song, which, from that day to this, hath been sung everywhere throughout the world, and shall yet be sung in future generations.” See Proctor: History of the Book of Common Prayer (11th ed., 1874), p. 225 sq.

BENEDICT is the name of one schismatic and fourteen regular popes. — Benedict I., June 3, 574–July 30, 578; a native of Rome; was elected immediately after the death of his predecessor, John II., July 3, 573, but could not be consecrated until a year after, as, on account of the invasion of the Lombards, the imperial confirmation arrived, and the consecration could take place, but procured from the Emperor, Constantine Pogonatus, an ordinance, according to which the Pope, in the future, could be consecrated immediately after his election, without waiting for the imperial confirmation. He was very zealous to have the sixth ecumenical council, which had condemned the Monothelites and their heresies, called the “Council of Chalcedon.” The letter to the Spanish bishop David, ascribed to him, has been proved spurious by Pagi (ad ann. 577 not. 2).

His life is found in Muratori, Rer. Ital. Script., III. p. 133. See, also, Paulus Diaconus, De Gestis Longob., II., 10, III., 11.— Benedict II., June 20, 684–March 7, 685, had also to wait a whole year after his election before the imperial confirmation arrived, and the consecration could take place, but procured from the Emperor, Constantine Pogonatus, an ordinance, according to which the Pope, in the future, could be consecrated immediately after his election, without waiting for the imperial confirmation. He was very zealous to have the sixth ecumenical council, which had condemned the Monothelites and their heresies, called the “Council of Chalcedon.” The letter to the Spanish bishop David, ascribed to him, has been proved spurious by Pagi (ad ann. 577 not. 2).

His life is found in Muratori, Rer. Ital. Script., III. p. 145. For his relation to Wilfrid, Bishop of York, see Vita Wilfridi, by Eddius Stephens.— Benedict III., Sept. 29, 855–April 7, 857, was regularly elected, when the representatives of Ludwig II. and Lothar raised the cardinal-priest Jena, Anastasius, as anti-pope, and imprisoned Benedict in the Lateran Palace. The people, however, proved faithful to their candidate. The emissaries of the two emperors gave up the intrigue: Anastasius was expelled, and Benedict installed. The introduction of the Peter’s Pence in England, and the foundation of the Anglican school in Rome, were due to the visit of King Ethelwulf and his son Alfred to Rome during the reign of Benedict. His vigorous policy in all relations with the Frankish and Byzantine empires was characteristic of his famous successor, Nicholas I. See, besides his life in Muratori: Rer. Ital. Script., III. p. 247; Prudentiani Trecensii Annalibus, and Hincmarii Remensis Annalibus in Mon. German. Script., I., and Epistolarum Nicolai I., in Mansi: Concil. Collet, XV. p. 130.— Benedict IV., 900–903, recognized Formosanus, whom John VIII. had expelled, as a duly elected Roman pontiff. See Watterich, Pont. Rom. Vite, I. p. 639.— Benedict V. In order to sustain Leo VIII. against John XII., the Emperor Otho I. was marching with a great army against Rome; but, before he reached the city, John XII. died (May 14, 964), and Benedict V. was elected in his place. When the emperor arrived before the city, however, the people surrendered Benedict. A formal process was instituted against him. He was deposed and carried captive to Germany, where he lived at the court of Archbishop Adelwald of Hamburg till his death, July 5, 966. See Watterich: Pontif. Rom. Vite, I. p. 43; Lieutrandus: De Ottonis Rebus in Urbe Roma Gestis; Adam of Bremen: Gest. Rom. Excl. Pontif.— Benedict VI., Jan. 19, 973–July, 974, was elected immediately after the death of John XII. (Sept. 6, 972), but not consecrated until the Emperor Otho’s confirmation of the election arrived. Soon after the death of Otho I., the affairs of the empire fell into disorder. Crescentius, de Theodora and the deacon Boniface arose against Benedict, and threw him into prison, where he was strangled. His life is found in Watterich: Pontif. Rom. Vite, I. p. 66; Muratori: Rer. Ital. Script., III. 2, p. 32; 3; 972, p. 2; 973, p. 1040.— Benedict VII., October, 974–October, 983, began his reign by anathematizing Boniface VII., and showed himself very submissive to the emperor, Otho II., and very partial to the Monastery of Cluny, whose plans of ecclesiastical reform he adopted. See Watterich: Pontif. Rom. Vite, I. p. 66 and 686.— Benedict VIII., May, 1012–April 7, 1024, gained the support of Henry II., though the antipope Gregory, defeated in battle, and expelled from Rome, sought refuge at the German court; crowned Henry II. and his spouse Kunigunde at Rome in 1014, and obtained from him a renunciation of the right, held by the Othonians, to confirm the election of a pope; defeated, by the aid of Pisa and Genoa, the Saracen chief Mogheid, when he invaded Italy, and expelled him from Sardinia; worked in union with Henry Il. the general introduction of the reform-plans of Cluny, though without fully satisfying the Cluniacese themselves. See Watterich: Pontif. Rom. Vite, I. pp. 60, 700; Amori: Storia dei Muselmenni in Sicilia, Florence, 1858, vol. III.; Sadee: Die Stellung Kaiser Heinr. II. zur Kirche, Leipzig, 1877.— Benedict IX., January, 1033–July 16, 1048; a son of Count Alberic of Tusculum, a nephew of Benedict VIII. and John XIX. was only ten years old, when, by the intrigues and violence of his father, he was elevated to the papal chair, but exasperated the Romans to such a degree by his scandalous life, that a rebellion broke out in 1044, and Sylvester III. was elected in his stead. He succeeded in expelling Sylvester; but, doubting whether he would be able to maintain himself against the Romans, he sold his dignity for one thousand pounds silver to Gregory VI. Henry III. now convened a synod at Sutri, Dec. 20, 1046, in which Sylvester III. and Gregory VI. and Benedict IX. were deposed, and Clement II. was made pope. But Clement II. died Oct. 9, 1047; and before the new pope, Damasus II., could convene the council, it possessed the general introduction of the reform-plans of Benedict IX. was succeeded in returning once more to Rome. He was soon expelled, however, and compelled to retire to Tusculum. When and where he died is not known. See Annales Romani (M. G. S. V., p. 468); Th. Mittler: De Schismate in Eccle. Rom. sub Bened. IX., Turici, 1835. — Benedict X., April 5, 1058–April, 1059, was elevated to the papal chair by the Roman nobility, the counts of Tusculum, Galeria, and Monticelli, after the death of Stephen X., but resigned immediately after the return of Hildebrand from Germany, and was kept in close confinement for the rest of his life. See Watterich: Pontif. Rom. Vitae, I. pp. 203–219, 739.— Benedict XI., Oct. 22, 1303–July 7, 1304, was able, by his noble and mild proceedings, to reconcile the kings of France and Sicily, and even the family of Colonna, but was punished just as he prepared for an energetic stroke at the participants in the fray of Anagni. See Muratori: Rer. Ital. Script.. III. p. 672, IX. pp. 746, 1010, XI. p. 1224, XIII. p. 398; L. Gautier: Benedict XI., Paris, 1863. — Benedict XII., Dec. 20, 1334–April 25, 1342, remained in Avignon in spite of the urgent entreaties of the Romans to return to their city. Also Barlaam, and the approaches of the Byzantine court, he received somewhat coldly, knowing that the religious question was only used as a cover to their political interest. His dependence on the French court twice prevented him from coming to an understanding with Lewis the Bavarian: the result of which was, that Lewis emancipated himself altogether, and even assumed the imperial title without soliciting the confirmation of the pope. See Baluzi: Vita Papparem Avenionensem, I. p. 197–240; Muratori: Rer. Ital. Script., III. 2, p. 527; Carl Müller: Der Kampf Ludwig des Baiern mit der römischen Curie, Tübingen, 1880. II. — Benedict XIII., a. (Peter de Luna), Sept. 28, 1394–Nov. 17, 1422, took, in the schism between Urban VI. and Clement VII., the side of the latter, and was unanimously elected his successor on the condition that he should do everything in his power to heal the schism. The remedy proposed was that both the rival popes, Boniface IX. in Rome, and Benedict XIII. in Avignon, should resign; but neither of them was willing to do so. The schism continued; France, Spain, and Sicily adhered to Benedict von Pisa, and developed the political question. He met with a monk, Romanus, who encouraged him as from a wild animal, but soon recognized the signs of a holy life in the apparition, and by some shepherds, who first shrank back from following him, but were firmly attracted. Gradually he was drawn out of this dismal cavern; and here he spent the time in holy contemplations, and fighting the temptations of the flesh, provided with food by Romanus, who, by means of a rope, lowered down to him while he slept. The pope was even against the advice of his college of cardinals, who, by means of a rope, lowered down to him daily a part of his scanty ration. After the lapse of three years (in 497) he was discovered as a prisoner; and May, 1408, when he fled from Avignon, and took up his residence at Peniscola, an estate belonging to his family in Aragon. Twice he was formally deposed and condemned,—by the Council of Pisa, 1409, and by that of Constance, 1417; but on the rock of Peniscola he still continued to declare, "Here is the only true Church." See Baluzi: Vit. Pap. Avion., I. p. 562; Du Puy: Histoire du Schisme, 1378–1428, Paris, 1654; Maimbourg: Histoire de Grand Schisme d'Occident, Paris, 1675. — Benedict XIII., b. (of the house of Orsini-Gravina), May 21, 1381; was a learned and pious man, but somewhat weak in his relations with the temporal powers, and completely in the hands of his minister, Cardinal Coscia, who by Clement XII. was deprived of his ecclesiastical dignity, and condemned to ten years' imprisonment. He distinguished himself as an author; and his collected works appeared in Rome, 1728, 3 vols. fol. See A. Borgia: Benedicti XIII.. Vita, Rome, 1732. — Benedict XIV., (Prosper Lambertini), Aug. 17, 1740–May 4, 1758; b. at Bologna, 1475; Bishop of Ancona, 1727; cardinal, 1728; Archbishop of Bologna, 1731; distinguished himself as an author, both before his elevation to the papal chair (De Sercorum Dei Beatificatione), and after (De Synodo Diocesano). In his foreign policy he was willing to make great concessions, even against the advice of his college of cardinals, as shown by the concordats he concluded with Naples, Sardinia, and Spain. But, as a spiritual ruler of the Church, he often showed considerable firmness, especially in his relations to the Jesuits. Twice he administered very severe rebukes to the society for the frivolous manner in which it carried out the mission in China and on the coast of Malabar, accommodating Christianity to the most scandalous Pagan rites in order to secure purely commercial relations with the natives. He understood that the society had—to use a pure expression — become an anachronism; and shortly before his death, he charged the patriarch of Lissabon, Cardinal Saldanha, with a thoroughly going reform of the order, so far as Portugal was concerned. But his successor revoked the bull. With the Protestants his relations were kindly, as was shown by many small traits. He was the first pope who gave the ruler of Prussia the title of "king," the curia having hitherto always styled him "Margrave of Brandenburg." Benedict's collected works appeared in Rome, in 12 vols. 4to, 1747. — For his life, see Sandini: Vita Pontif. Roman., Ferrara, 1783, II.; Guarnacci: Vita Rom. Pontif., II., Vie du Benedeti XIV., Paris, 1783.

Benedict of Nursia, b. in 480, at Nursia, in the province of Valeria; d. March 21, 523, at Monte Cassino; was educated in Rome, but fled from the city in 494, only fourteen years old, disgusted at the worldliness and confusion, both of the students and the studies, and retired first to Enfide (the old Anfidena, the present Alfidena), and then farther east, among the mountains, to Subiaco, in order to perfect himself in holiness by a life of seclusion and devotion. At Subiago, in order to perfect himself in holiness, he met with a monk, Romanus, who encouraged him in his purpose, and aided him in carrying it out. He took up his abode at the bottom of a dismal cavern; and here he spent the time in holy contemplations, and fighting the temptations of the flesh, provided with food by Romanus, who, by means of a rope, lowered down to him daily a part of his own scanty ration. After the lapse of three years (in 497) he was discovered by some shepherds, who first shrank back from following him as from a wild animal, but soon recognized the signs of a holy life in the apparition, and prostrated themselves before him. Others were attracted. Gradually he was drawn out of this utter seclusion; and in 510 the monks of the Monastery of Vicovaro chose him their abbot. At this time Benedict was forty years old, an asceticism which he originally professed; for he allowed his monks to drink wine. But the unconditional obedience he demanded, and the strict regularity which he enforced in the hourly alternation of devotional practices and manual labor, exasperated them; and they tried to poison him.
He left the monastery, and returned to the cavern; but the world's eye was once set upon him, as upon a light lit in the darkness. Much people gathered around him,—delightful youths of rich families, old roughs from the Gothic hordes,—to obtain his guidance to a holy life. He organized minor communities of twelve monks under an abbot, and established twelve such cenobies in the neighborhood of Subiago, constituting himself supreme abbot. But new troubles arose. Though monastic life was still a wild-growing plant, without any clearly defined mission, without any thoroughly developed organization, and consequently liable to fall into the most singular aberrations, it was, nevertheless, to all men's eyes, the highest expression of the religious cravings of the age. To enter a monastery was considered the only true conversio, to live in a monastery, the only true religio. Hence arose a bitter jealousy from the side of the secular clergy towards the monks. A priest from the neighborhood of Subiago, Florentius, actually tried to poison Benedit, and Gregory failed to seduce the monks by sensual temptations. Benedict then determined to leave the place; and in 528 he led his little army into Campania, to Monte Casino, where he transformed an old Apollo temple, with its adjacent grove, into a Christian oratory in the centre of a circle of cenobies. In 529 he promulgated his famous rules, which were destined to be, through many centuries, the rules of all the monasteries of the Western Church. The monastery of Monte Cassino grew rapidly, and was soon able to send out colonies. In 580 it was destroyed by the Lombards, the monks fleeing to Rome, and it was not rebuilt until 720; but in the mean time (in 633) a French monk, Aigulf, dug up the bones of Benedict, and carried them to France, where they were deposited in a monastery near Fleury,—a priest from the neighborhood of Subiago, whose life has been written of by himself, as upon a light lit in the darkness. Much people gathered around him,—delicate youths of rich families, old roughs from the Gothic hordes,—to obtain his guidance to a holy life. Benedict, therefore, left the monastery, and returned to the cavern; but the world's eye was once set upon him, as upon a light lit in the darkness. Much people gathered around him,—delightful youths of rich families, old roughs from the Gothic hordes,—to obtain his guidance to a holy life.

The tendency towards compact unity, however, towards uniformity. At the age in which he lived, considered the monastery a rich, that is, an enjoyment of ecclesiastical revenues which is an enjoyment of ecclesiastical revenues without corresponding duties, and from the beneficium, which is an enjoyment of an ecclesiastical revenues without corresponding duties, and from the beneficium, which is an enjoyment of an

Benedict succeeded. His rules were the wisest, which is characteristic for the Church of Rome, he did not realize.

That tendency, however, towards compact unity, which is so characteristic for the Church of Rome, had already at that time grown so strong, that the very character of the institution changed. Each monastery being a law unto itself, without responsibility before any central authority, the rules were modified and remodelled, until a wide entrance stood open for all kinds of worldly interests and passions. In the best monasteries the monks lived like canoni cists, in the worst, like robbers and rioters. To this danger from within, came another from without. The riches of the monasteries began to tempt the neighboring lords, and abbey were often given as fiefs to laymen. It was Benedict of Aniane, who, in the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle (817), threw the Benedictines into the shade. The attempts at reform and re-organization made by Clement V. and Benedict XII. failed. The effects of the Reformation and of the jealousy of the Jesuits were very detrimental to the order. Nevertheless, it rose once more. In the seventeenth century it became the representative of the science of the Roman Church. The congregation of St. Maur has rendered great services to the science of history: but the political reforms of Joseph II., the French Revolution, and the civil wars in Spain, have almost killed the order; and Austria is now the only country in which it shows any vigor.

HOMEOFFICE.

Benedict is, in the Roman Church, a sacred though not sacramental act, by which the grace of God is implored in behalf of some person or thing, and which consists in the making of the sign of the cross, in aspersion of holy water, etc., together with the recitation of some prescribed formulæ. Of such formulæ there are innumerable collections, — libri beneficicae, beneficium almost every diocese having a collection of its own. In the Evangelical Church there is no act which really resembles the beneficium of the Roman Church.

BENEFICE. In ecclesiastical language beneficium ecclesiasticum, comprises both the officium or ministerium with its duties, and the compensation for their fulfilment, the stipendium or pretenda, and is thereby distinguished from the commendela, which is an enjoyment of ecclesiastical revenues without corresponding duties, and from the pensio, which is an enjoyment of a part of an...
In the primitive church there were no benefices. All the property of a church was lumped together in one mass, and administered by the bishop: the revenues were divided between the bishop and the clergy, the church and the poor. In course of time, however, as each episcopal church grew into a diocese, and each diocese became completely divided up in parishes, it was natural that the great donations of real estate which had been made to the church were partitioned out, and a suitable measure allotted to each parish for the maintenance of its minister. Instances of such a development occur as early as the sixth century, and with the eleventh the development was about completed.

As all secular property was based on a system of fief, so all ecclesiastical property was based on a system of benefices; and between the two systems there were no other differences than those naturally arising from the differences between the Church and the State, their character and purpose. The appointment to a benefice, the process or institutio, comprised the selection of a fit candidate (designatio), and the conferment of the benefice to the candidate, the collatio, confirmatio or institutio proper. With beneficiamajora the selection of the candidate often took place by election, as, for instance, by the chapters; or by the selection of a fit candidate (designatio), and the conferment of the benefice to the candidate, the collatio, confirmatio or institutio proper. With beneficiaminora the selection often consisted in a simple presentatio patroni, after which followed the episcopal admission. The conditions for a valid appointment were, that the benefice was vacant, that the candidate held no simony, that the benefice was a valid appointment. His famous canon was, The more difficult reading is to be preferred. This critical work was followed by an exegetical commentary on the New Testament, published in 1749. With his firm faith in the full inspiration and absolute authority of the Bible, he felt very much perplexed at the great number of variations in the text of the New Testament, and with characteristic humility and perseverance he immediately went to work investigating the matter. He procured all the editions, manuscripts and translations, he could; and in 1749 he published his text and an Apparatus Crirical, which indeed became the starting-point for the whole modern text-criticism of the New Testament.

BEN-HADAD (son, i.e., worshipper, of Hadad, the sun), the religious name of three Syrian kings. 1. The son of Tabrimon came to the succes- sor of Assa, King of Judah, against Baasha, King of Israel (1 Kings xvi. 18). See BAASHA.

2. The son of the preceding was at war with Ahab and Jehoram, kings of Israel, and was once badly defeated, but escaped by fraud and strata- gem (1 Kings xx.). Later on, Ben-hadad besieged Jehoram in Samaria, and so straitly, that famine compelled mothers to eat their own chil- dren. By divine intervention the Syrian host was dispersed, and plenty regained (2 Kings vii. 20). Hazael's assassination of Ben-hadad occurred the next year (viii. 15). Three successful campaigns against Ben-hadad II. are mentioned upon the tablets of the Assyrian king, Shalma- neser II. (B.C. 838-824), undertaken in the sixth, eleventh, and fourteenth years of the latter mon- arch. Thoroughly in agreement with the Bible, Shalmaneser says, that, at the time of the first expedition, the Syrian king was in league with "Achabu," i.e., Ahab of Israel (cf. 1 Kings xx. 34); and it is safe to conjecture, with Schrader (Riehm, Heb. Bib. Alt. p. 161), that the misfor- tunes of Ben-hadad in subsequent campaigns alienated the allies; for we find Israel in open revolt from her Syrian lord.

3. The son of Hazael was called Ben-hadad. He was the master of Israel; but Jehoahaz, in answer to prayer, received the promise of deliv- erance. The "Savior" was his son Jehoash (2 Kings xii. 5; cf. v. 25). The prophet Amos (i. 4) declares that a fire should devour the palaces of Ben-hadad III.

Schrader, in Riehm, calls attention to the Assy- rian form of the name, Bin-hidri, i.e., Ben-hadar, the exact form preserved in the Septuagint, which is therefore nearer right than the Hebrew.

OF TUDELA, a Spanish rabbi, b. in Navarre; d. in 1175. After many years of travel (1100-73) in Europe and the East, visi- ting Constantinople, Egypt, Palestine, Assyria, Persia, penetrating to the frontiers of China, he published his Itinerary in Hebrew, under the title Mazzaloth ("peregrinations"). The work swarms with errors, geographical, chronological, and of every kind, raising almost the presumption that the author never was in the places he attempts to describe. The work has passed through many editions, and been translated into several lan- guages. It first was printed by Soncini, at Con- stantinople (1548, 8vo), reprinted in Antwerp in 1576, with a Latin translation by Arias Monta- nus. Later editions are those of Constantijn L'Em- pereur (Brunet says the Hebrew text used was inaccurate), Lyon, 1653; in Latin; of Barratier, Amsterdam, 1704; and, best of all, that of Asher, in English, London and Berlin, 1840, 2 vols. The first volume contains the text; the second, the notes and numerous essays. See, also, the edition of Lelewel, Brus- selles, 1852.

BENNETT, James, D.D., a preacher and scholar- ly writer of the Congregationalists of England; b. in London, May 22, 1774; d. in London, Dec. 4, 1862; studied at Gospert, under Dr. Bogue; settled at Romney Hants, in 1796, and ordered there April, 1797. Whilst here, he published Memoirs of Risdon Darracott, and together with David Bogue, D.D., The History of Dissenters from the Revolution, 1858, to the Year 1808, 2d ed., London, 1838, 2 vols. In 1813 became theolog- ical tutor of the Rotherham Independent College, and pastor of the adjoining church. He attracted great attention by his Lectures on Infidelity, 3d ed., 1847, at the close of which he was accustomed to invite infidels to public controversy. His later works are, The Preaching of Christ, Justification as Revealed in Scripture, in opposition to the Coun- cil of Trent, 2d ed., 1849; Lectures on the Acts of the Apostles, 1846, and the Congregational Lecture on The Theology of the Early Christian Church, 1840. He published also a large amount of miscellaneous works in the form of letters, articles, sermons, etc. His son is the celebrated London physician, Sir J. Risdon Bennett.

LLEWELYN D. BEVAN.

BENNO, St., b. near Goslar, Hanover, 1010; d. at Meissen, June 16, 1106; was educated in a monastery at Hildesheim, where he took holy orders in 1026, and was ordained deacon in 1035, and priest in 1040; was appointed in 1085, a corresponding to the cathedral school of Goslar in 1051, and wrote, while there, De Dictamine and Expositiones supra Evangelia Domincalia, which are still extant; and became Bishop of Meissen in 1067. By Henry IV. he was twice imprisoned (in 1075 and in 1078), suspected of secretly encouraging the Saxon insurrection; and in 1085 he was even deposed for having declared himself in favor of Hermann; but in 1088 he was again re-instated in his office on the recommendation of Clement III. He was a rather insignificant character, weak and vacil- lating in all great questions; but he held the Gregorian views in all church matters; and in 1533 Adrian VI. found it opportune to canonize him, which occasioned a sharp attack from Luther. His remains are deposited in Munich, and he is the patron saint of Bavaria. See Osseili- gum S. Bennonis, Munich, 1765, by C. F. Seyx- sarth, and Apologia Bennonomana, Munich, 1778, by A. Crammer.

BENOIT, René, b. 1521, at Angers; d. in Paris, 1608; accompanied Mary Stuart to Scotland as her confessor; was after his return appointed pastor to the Church of St. Eustache in Paris, and played a conspicuous part in the controversies of the Ligue, as one of the leaders of the opposition to the Guises and the Ultramontanes. In 1568 he published a translation of the Bible, which, how- ever, was not much more than a reprint of the Geneva version in French; and, best of all, that of Asher, in English, London and Berlin, 1840, 2 vols. The first volume contains the text; the second, the notes and numerous essays. See, also, the edition of Lelewel, Brus- selles, 1852.

tried to prove that the King did not forfeit his right to the throne by professing the Protestant faith. When, as a reward, the King afterwards made him Bishop of Troyes, the Pope refused the confirmation, and in 1604 he had to renounce the office.

BENOIT, Elie, b. in Paris, Jan. 20, 1640; d. at Delt, Nov. 15, 1729; studied philosophy in Paris, and theology at Montauban; was appointed minister at Alençon in 1665; fled after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, to Holland, and became minister to the Walloon congregation in Delt. He wrote several controversial tracts, books of edification, etc.; but his principal work is his Histoire de l'Edit de Nantes, 5 vols., Delt, 1693–95, which, written with great accuracy, and giving a number of documents, is one of the best sources of the history of the Protestant Church in France.

BENTHAM, Thomas, b. at Sherburn, Yorkshire, Eng., 1513; d. at Lichfield, Feb. 21, 1578; was educated at Oxford; embraced the Reformation; left the country on the accession of Mary, and lived for some years at Zürich and Basel, but returned before her death to take charge of a Reformed congregation in London, and was made Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry in 1559. He translated the Psalms, Ezekiel, and the New Testament, and was made Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry in 1559. He translated the Psalms, Ezekiel, and the New Testament; left the country on the accession of Mary, and lived for some years at Zürich and Basel, but returned before her death to take charge of a Reformed congregation in London, and was made Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry in 1559. He translated the Psalms, Ezekiel, and the New Testament.

BERTRAM, Richard, b. at Oxford, Jan. 27, 1662; d. at Cambridge, July 14, 1742; was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; ordained deacon in 1690; nominated to the Boyle lectureship in 1692; appointed master of Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1699, Archdeacon of Ely in 1700, and professor regius in divinity at Cambridge in 1717. Besides his eminent merits as a critical philologist, he exercised a great influence on the religious views of his time, especially by his Confutation of Atheism, or Eight Sermons preached at Boyle's Lectures, London, 1698, translated into Latin, French, and German, and Remarks upon a late Discourse of Free-thinking, London, 1713, which actually silenced the atheists, and drove them into deism. After leaving the Boyle lectureship, he devoted himself to producing editions, manuscripts, etc., he published in 1717 Proposals for printing a New Edition of the Greek Testament. He anticipated the principle of Lachmann, and intended to substitute for the Textus Receptus the oldest attainable text of the Nicene or ante-Nicene age; but this plan met with so much opposition from the side of the theologians, that he was compelled to give it up. His collected works were published in London, 1839, 3 vols., edited by A. Dyck; his Correspondence, in 1842, 2 vols., edited by Wordsworth. His life was written by Bishop Monk in 1839, 2d ed., London, 1833, 2 vols., and by Jacob Mähly, Richard Bentley, Leipzig, 1868.

BEOWULF, the oldest epic poem in any Germanic tongue, recounts, in 3,184 double lines of Anglo-Saxon alliterative verse, the exploits and death of the hero Beowulf. He is represented as leaving his home in the country of the Geats, upon hearing of the murders perpetrated by a fiendish monster named Grendel, at the court of the Danish king, Hrothgar, and proceeding thither with fourteen chosen companions for the purpose of encountering and slaying the destroyer. He succeeded in this undertaking, and also in dispatching Grendel's mother, who appeared as the avenge of her son. In his old age, after having reigned for many years over his kinsmen the Geats, he was slain in combat with a dragon. His body was consumed, and a mound was reared upon a lofty promontory to commemorate his name. The poem naturally falls into four great divisions; viz., (a) Beowulf's fight with Grendel, (b) his fight with Grendel's mother, (c) his return, (d) his death. Certain episodic passages, and others which clearly imply an acquaintance with the Scriptures, must be regarded as later additions. Example of the latter are vers. 107–114, 178–188, 1724–1781, etc. The origin of the poem must be sought in heathen times, and among the Teutonic tribes of northern Denmark and southern Sweden. Though its nucleus is evidently mythical, it contains an admixture of historic fact. The Hygelac of vers. 2355–2367 and other passages has been identified with the Chochilaicus of Gregory of Tours, and his expedition with one that took place in the second decade of the sixth century.

Our recension of the poem probably dates from the beginning of the eighth century, though the single manuscript in which it is contained (Vitellius A. XV. of the British Museum) belongs to the tenth century.

BEREANS, or BARCLAYITES, a sect founded by John Barclay, 1734–1798, and still represented by a few congregations in Scotland. Claiming to imitate the ancient Bereans (Acts xvii. 11), they reject all human authority, and acknowledge only the Scriptures as the rule of conduct.

BERENGARIUS OF TOURS, b. at Tours, in the beginning of the eleventh century; d. in the adjacent Island of St. Cosme, 1088; was a pupil of Bishop Fulbert of Chartres, and became bishop of Tours. He is represented as having a freer method of reasoning and a clearer expression for his thoughts, and he soon brought the school into a flourishing condition: pupils gathered around him from every quarter. But his studies in the Bible and the fathers had led him to the conclusion that the view of the Lord's Supper generally accepted throughout the Church since the time of Paschasius Radbertus was wrong; that, indeed, the whole doctrine of transubstantiation was an inopia recorda vulgi. He taught that in the Lord's Supper it was necessary to distinguish sacramenium, and the thing symbolized, res sacra menti; and though at first he seems to have been somewhat cautious in divulging his conviction on this point, rumors of his heterodoxy gradually cozed out. In 1046, and again in 1048, Adelard, scholasticus at Liège, and a friend of his, addressed some anxious queries to him in private letters. In 1049, Bishop Hughes of Langres attacked him publicly in a book; and in 1050 he himself wrote a letter to Lanfranc, at that time the greatest teacher of the Church, reproofing him because he still held the views of Paschasius, and thereby made Scolus a heretic. Lanfranc received the letter in Rome, and immediately laid the case before a synod, which condemned Berengarius without a hearing, nay, without a summons. This injustice was too glaring, however; and a new synod was convoked to Vercelli, Sept. 1, same year. But when Berengarius went to Paris to obtain the permission of the King, his abbot, to go abroad to the synod, the King, Henry I., thought it a good opportunity to get hold of his canon's property, and threw him in a dungeon. He was condemned by the synod of Vercelli, and rescued from the King's clutch only by the powerful aid of his friends,—Count Gaufried of Anjou, and Bishop Eusebius Bruno of Angers. Henry I., vexed at having missed an opportunity of rapine, now convoked a synod at Paris, which also condemned the wealthy heretic; but, under the protection of Gaufried and Eusebius Bruno, Berengarius sat quietly in Tours, though the fanaticism and hatred of his adversaries surged higher and higher around him every hour. Then, in 1053, Cardinal Hildebrand arrived in France as papal legate, and he tried to bring the matter to an issue; and Berengarius succeeded in satisfying the synod of Tours. But only for a moment was the uproar stillled. In 1059 he was again summoned before a synod in Rome; and here he was met with such an outburst of fury, that, stunned by fright, he fell upon his face, and retracted. Thereby he saved his life; but the weakness of that moment he never forgot, and hardly had he returned to Tours before he trampled upon his own retractation, and began to teach and preach his original ideas with increased vigor and bitterness. Synod after synod condemned him; but he continued disregarding the verdicts, until at last Gregory VII., who seems to have felt kindly towards him, but was vexed because this controversy threatened to interfere with his reform-plans, compelled him, at a synod in 1078, to retire from Paris, and to keep silent for the rest of his life. He retired to the Island of St. Cosme, where he lived in deep solitude.

BERGIER, Nicolas Syste, b. at Darnay, in Lorraine, Dec. 31, 1718; d. in Paris, April 19, 1790; attracted attention, while still a teacher in the college at Besançon, by some essays on philosophy and religion. He had the sympathy of this line of study, and devoted himself to Christian apologetics, and polemics against the Encyclopedists. In 1763 he published Le Dictionnaire réduit par lui-même, and in 1768 the Certeudise des preuves du christianisme, which achieved a great success, and occasioned Voltaire, who wrote against it, to temper his tone, and to be a little more careful about his facts. In 1769 followed Apologie de la Religion chrétienne against Holbach, and in 1771 Examen du matérialisme. He also wrote a Dictionnaire théologique, which formed part of the Encyclopédie méthodique, but has several volumes been separately edited, latest, Paris, 1868, 6 vols. As a reward for his great services, he was made a canon of Notre Dame in Paris, and confessor to the courts of the king.

BERGIUS, Johannes, b. at Stettin, 1587; d. at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, 1658; studied theology at Heidelberg and Strassburg; visited England, France, and the Netherlands; and was in 1616 appointed professor of theology in the University of Frankfort, whose faculty professed the Reformed faith. He represented Brandenburg at the Leipzig conference (1631) and at the Thorn colloquium (1642), but declined to be present at the synod of Dort, as his stand-point was unionism rather than Calvinism. His ideas of the universality of the divine grace he developed in his Der Wille Gottes von aller Menschens Seligkeit, 1653. In his controversies with the Lutherans he was very moderate. On the members of the house of Brandenburg he exercised great influence.

BERKELEY, George, the author of the Minute Philosophi, b. at Kilcier, or Kilkenny, in the county of Kilkenny, Ireland, March 12, 1685; d. suddenly, at Oxford, Jan. 14, 1743. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and obtained a fellowship in 1707. He lived there in an "atmosphere charged with the elements of re-action against traditional scholasticism;" and his Com mon-Place Book shows how his mind worked under its stimulus. Very early in life he was possessed by the idea, which he subsequently in various forms worked out, that no existence is conceivable and therefore possible, which is not either conscious spirit, or the ideas (i.e. objects) of such spirit is everything. "Existing things consist of ideas or objects perceived or willed; while perception and volition are inconceivable and impossible, save as the operations of mind or spirit. No object exists apart from the mind: mind is the prior, both in thought and existence, if for the moment we assume the popular distinction between the two." From this theory he never wavered: with it he already developed he appeared as an author. In 1707 he issued two short tracts upon mathematics; in 1709 the New Theory of Vision, — an examination of visual consciousness to prove it really affords no ground for belief in the reality of the objects apparently seen. In 1710 appeared his Principles of Human Knowledge, in which his theory received complete exposition. Meanwhile Berkeley had taken orders, and 1711 he preached his Discourse on Passive Obedience, in which he worked a "theological utilitarianism." In 1713 he left the university, went up to London, formed many desire acquaintances, made a new enviable reputation for learning, humility, and piety, which was strengthened by the appearance of his Dialogues between Hylas and Philonous (1713), — a work of great literary beauty and skill. The next seven years were spent, for the most part, on the Continent. In 1722 he was appointed Dean of Dromore; in 1724, Dean of Derry, the "best prebend" in Ireland. In August, 1728, he married, and in September sailed for America, to carry out his darling project of establishing a college in the Bermudas, with the aim of extending Christianity and civilization in America. He was led to believe that government took great interest in his plans, for which he had voluntarily made great personal sacrifices and great exertions. He landed at Newport, R.I.; but three years of waiting for the promised aid convinced him of the vanity of his hopes. He returned to London, and published in 1732 Alciphron, or, the Minute Philosopher, the fruit of his studies in America. The book is a powerful refutation of the free thinking then so popular and fashionable: it is probably the most famous of his works. In 1734 he was raised to the Bishopric of Cloyne, Ireland. In 1744 he wrote the curious philosophico-medical work, Philosophical Reflections and Inquiries concerning the Virtues of Tar-water. In the second edition, printed the same year, the title Siris, and the words "a chain of," were prefixed to the original title. Professor Fraser calls it "the profoundest English philosophical work of the last century." In 1752 Berkeley went to Oxford to live, to end his days in wished-for retirement, and there he died. Bishop Berkeley was certainly one of the purest and sincerest Christians in history. While in the world, he was not of it. And he has peculiar claim upon the attention of Americans, because of his long residence on his farm near Newport. While there, he greatly endeared himself to all, and is yet remembered. Trinity Church in Newport, a fine old wooden structure in which he sometimes preached, still stands; as does the house, three miles from Newport, which he built and lived in, and named "Whitehall," in honor of an English palace. About a mile from the house is the rocky shore; and a horizontal cleft in the rocks is still pointed out as a retreat to which Berkeley went to meditate, and to which, also, he was wont to take his friends. In Alciphron, Berkeley has given permanent record of his life at Newport; and not a little of the charm of his long residence on his farm near Newport. For the most part was the work of otherwise popular and learned compilation, presenting a valuable epitome of what has been said about Berkeley.

LIT. — The classical edition, superseding all others, of Berkeley's Complete Works, is that by Professor A. C. Fraser, Oxford, 1871, 4 vols. (the fourth volume contains Life, Letters, and Dissertation on his Philosophy). Professor Fraser and Professor T. H. Green have each furnished a volume on Berkeley to the series of Philosophic Classics for English Readers and English Philosophers respectively.

Adverse Reviews of his Theory of Vision. — Balley: Review of Berkeley's Theory of Vision (1842); Abbott: Sight and Touch (1844); Monck: Space and Vision. Modern editions of separate works have appeared, e.g., The Principles of Human Knowledge, with Prolegomena and Annotations, by Professor Krauth (a meritorious and learned compilation, presenting a valuable epitome of what has been said about Berkeley).

BERLEBURG, The, was an annotated Bible with a new translation (German) as its basis, in which it was attempted to explain the Scriptures according to the teachings of the Mystics. The execution of the work is very unequal; and the spirit is sometimes rather sectarian than Christian, as when, with bitterness, opposing views are attacked. But, on the whole, it must be granted that the "Bible" contributed to quicken the spiritual life of its readers.

The work was comprised in eight folio volumes, issued 1728-32. The translation was made under the direction of M. Haug, and shows, particularly in the Old Testament, a shocking absence of grammatical knowledge, of literary taste, and of poetic sense. The commentary was in a sense an anthology, inasmuch as it presented choice extracts from mystical writers, all the way from Origen down to Madame Guyon and Mrs. Leade. But a great part was the work of otherwise totally obscure persons, who somewhat plaintively described themselves as "pastors persecuted for the sake of heterodoxy."

This pretentious work was written by the mystical school, who were the degenerate descendants of the Pietists, — the fruit of the re-action from the dry and formal orthodoxy of the seventeenth century. It was a sort of continuation of the Marburger Bible of 1712, edited by Horsch; but it was no improvement. Count Casimir of Saint-Witgenstein-Berleburg was its patron. It cannot be said to be happy in its idea or execution. Three senses of the Word were taught, — the literal, the moral, and the secret or prophetic. To interpret the latter, the compilers were boasted of the possession of the spirit who originally wrote the words. Their central doctrine was the regeneration. They taught that men could perfectly keep the commandments of God, and receive into themselves in such a manner the righteousness of Christ, that the primitive human nature is thereby restored. Of course, their conception both of sin and of redemption was heterodox.

The work never reached a second edition, and copies are not known. Curiously enough, in addition to the canonical books, they gave a number of apocyphal writings, both on the Old and the New Testament, and also extracts from Josephus and the Fathers.

BERN, The Disputation of, occupies a prominent place among the many disputations, conferences, and colloquia which were held in Germany during the period of the Reformation, because it arrived at a practical result. For a long time the Reformation made only slow progress in Bern: both the character of the people and the manner of their life made them less susceptible to new ideas. But, as soon as an evangelical party was formed, the jealousy and arrogance of the Roman Church immediately began to cause trouble. According to the usages of those days, a reconciliation was attempted by means of a disputation; and May 21, 1526, such a disputation was opened in Basel before a large and brilliant assembly. Faber, Eck, Murner of Luzern, spoke on the Roman side; Ecolampadius, on the evangelical. But the defeat of the latter party was a foregone conclusion, and the evangelical cause might have been completely lost in Bern, had not the Roman Church, by the violent and domineering manner in which it used its victory, called forth a re-action, which, in less than two years, proved fatal to her cause. A new disputation was opened at Bern, Jan. 7, 1528, and lasted to Jan. 26. The Roman dignitaries and celebrities who had been invited declined to be present. On the side of the evangelical, spoke, besides Kolb and Haller, preachers of Bern, Capito, and Ecolampadius. The assembly was very numerous; and ten doctrinal points of purely evangelical bearing were agreed upon, and subscribed to by most of the clergy in present. Feb. 7, 1528, the Reformation Edict was issued. The mass was abolished, the images were removed from the churches, the episcopal power was annulled, etc., and the Reformation was established without the least violence or disturbance.

Lit. — The acts of the disputation were published at Zürich, 1528, and again in 1608 and 1701. FISCHER: Geschichte der Disputation und Reformations in Bern, Bern, 1828. See the “Ten Theses of Bern,” in SCHAEFF: Creeds, vol. III. pp. 208 sqq.

BERN, Synod of. By this title, the first reformed synod there held (in 1532), together with all the acts it passed, is meant. The synod numbered two hundred and twenty of the clergy of the country, and lasted from the 9th to the 13th of January inclusive, with Capito as its principal figure. They formed a Pastor’s Manual and a Church Directory, distinguished, even among the monuments of the Reformation, for its apostolic form, warm hearted sincerity, homely simplicity and practical wisdom. The Acts of the Synod were officially printed at Basel, 1532, under the title “Berner Synodus-Ornung wie sich pfar down every trace of opposition; and in Italy too, whether he met schism or heresy (1137 and 1138), his manner was more effective than that of the armies of Lothair. Shortly after the ending of the schism, the controversy with Abelard began. Abelard was a rationalist; Bernard, a mystic: Abelard held that the doctrines of Christianity ought to pass through the sift of reason, in order to become a fit subject of faith; while Bernard demanded that they be embraced at once by faith, through an act of the will. With Abelard, faith meant reasoned conviction; with Bernard, intellect meant enthusiastic contemplation. Between those two men a conflict was unavoidable. But at the synod of Sens (1140), where Abelard expected to meet Bernard as his counterpart in a dispute, Bernard appeared as his accuser. Abelard refused to defend himself, and appealed to the Pope; but Bernard frustrated the appeal, and Abelard was in reality condemned unless by a general council, however, the great Abbot of Clugny, with whom Abelard spent the last years of his life, afterwards brought about a personal reconciliation between the two antagonists. Perhaps the greatest, or, at all events, the most striking exploit which Bernard performed, was the preaching of the second crusade, 1146. He roused the people of France and Germany to a pitch of enthusiasm hardly surpassed by that which produced the first crusade; but the result corresponded very poorly to the preparations, and he felt himself somewhat embarrassed at the complete failure. Very remarkable, also, was his activity in South-western France (1147–49), among the heretics of Albi and Toulouse, though he was not completely successful in this case, either. He met there with a state of mind which somewhat resembled his own, and the miraculous in personal influence became somewhat weakened by this circumstance.

The works of Bernard comprise a number of sermons, especially on the Canticles; a number of mystic theosophic treatises, De Diligendo Deo, De Gradibus Humilitatis et Superbiae, etc. : five books, De Consideratione ad Eugenium in his most characteristic writings; a poem in hexameter; and a series of hymns, still living both in the Roman Catholic and in the Reformed churches (the most famous is the familiar, "O sacred head now wounded," which was translated into German by Gerhardt); and four hundred and nineteen letters of the greatest historical and psychological interest. His style is generally strained, artificial, and cumbersome; but his thoughts have often the same power as hunger or thirst. They absorb the whole man whom they beset, and throw him with passionate decision in one direction. The best edition of his works is that by Mabillon, Paris, 1667, 2 vols. folio, afterwards often reprinted, as in Migne, 1854, 4 vols. 8vo. This edition contains his life written by his friend and disciple Godfrey.

B. de MONTENE, b. at Annecy, in Savoy, 923; d. at Novara, May 28, 1086; received an excellent education as the child of rich and noble parents, but determined very early to renounce the world, and retired to a monastery of Aosta, took holy orders, and was afterwards appointed archdeacon. In Aosta, as well as in his home, he often witnessed the unspeakable misery to which pilgrims were subjected when crossing the Alps. A hospice had been erected in one of the passes in the ninth century; but it had been destroyed, and the passes were now held by gangs of robbers. In 973 Abbot Majolus of Clugny, when returning home from Italy across Mons Jovis (Mont Joux), was captured by such a gang, and compelled to pay an enormous ransom (see Pertz: Mon. Germ. VI. 631, VII. 54). Bernard himself took part in the military expedition against the robbers; and on the highest and most dangerous spot of the pass, surrounded on all sides with perpetual snow and ice, he founded a great and magnificent hospice, and peopled it with Augustinian monks. Afterwards he added another but minor hospice in the pass of Colonna Jovis (Colona Jou); and both these hospices have been maintained to our day, having the name of their founder,—the Greater and Lesser St. Bernard. Bernard was canonized by Innocent XI. in 1681. His life is given in Act. Sanct., June 15, vol. III., p. 547-564. See also L. Burgen: Leben und Werken d. h. Bernhard, Luzern, 1856, and, with respect to the history of the hospice, Le Conserver Seuste, Tom. V., pp. 231-280.

BERNARD, Archbishop of Toledo, and Primate of Spain; the chief promoter of the Gregorian system of the Papacy in Spain; b. at Agen in France; d. in Spain, 1125; for a time was a soldier, then turned a Benedictine monk; promoted to Abbot of the Sahaguna Monastery in Castile, 1080, and rendered Gregory VII. such help as his reforms that he loaded him with favors. King Alfonso VI. nominated him Archbishop of Toledo as a reward of his services in taking that city from the Moors; and when he went to Rome (1087) to receive the pallium, Pope Urban II. named him Primate of the Spanish Church. He renewed with redoubled vigor his efforts to reform the Church according to the Gregorian plan, but by so doing raised a storm of opposition; nevertheless he persevered. Among his reforms was the introduction of the Roman Liturgy in place of the Mozarabic. As an indication of his warlike character may be mentioned his raising an army which he intended to command upon a crusade into Palestine; but Pope Paschal II. forbade him and all Spaniards, under penalty of the ban, from engaging in such an enterprise. Four of his sermons are given in Bernardi Claravall. opera V., Paris, 1719. Cf. Aschbach: Geschichte der Almoraviden, Hertzog.

BERNARD (Bernardus) DE BOTINO, b. in Parma, about the beginning of the thirteenth century; studied law at Bologna; became professor and canon there; went to Rome, and occupied for many years a prominent position at the papal court, but returned to lecture in Bologna; d. 1266. He is famous as the author of the so-called Glosa ordinaria, the Decretals of Gregory IX. issued probably 1240. Mejer.
BERNARD.

BERNARD, Claude, called the “Poor Priest;” one of the most godly men of the Roman-Catholic Church during the twelfth century, showing in his whole life what energy the romantic character can develop when deeply affected by religion; b. in Dijon, 1588; d. 1641. The son of a jurist, he studied law himself, and for a time led a licentious life, but was converted by a vision of his dead father. He became a priest, and made Paris his residence, where he exercised an extraordinary self-denial and philanthropy; gave away all he had to the poor, including an inheritance of four hundred thousand francs; spent his whole time in preaching, and visiting the poor and sick, not shrinking from the most disgusting diseases. He was a man greatly beloved and a saint, canonized, not by the Pope, but by the people. Of the sketches of his life, see especially that by L’empereur.

BERNARD OF CLUNY (not to be confounded with his namesake and contemporary of Clairvaux); b. about the middle of the twelfth century, of English parents, at Morlaix in Brittany; d. at Cluny. Nothing of his life is known, yet of De Contemptu Mundi, a Latin poem of nearly three thousand lines, dedicated to his abbot, Peter the Venerable, d. 1156, general of the Benedictine order. It is a bitter satire upon the corruptions of the age, but opens with a description of the peace and glory of heaven; and this part of the poem is so exquisite, that it excites universal admiration. The earliest publication of the poem is by Matthias Flacius, in a volume of other poems calling for a reformation of ecclesiastical abuses, Basel, 1557, and five or six times since. Dr. Trench has issued ninety-six lines of it in his Sacred Latin Poetry. The extracts have been freely reproduced by the Rev. John Mason Neale (The Rhythm of Bernard de Morlaix, Monk of Cluny, on the Celestial Country, London, 1858, 3d ed., 1861); and portions of this English reproduction have passed into general use in our hymn-books as the most popular of hymns about heaven. They are, Briefly is here our portion. (Hic hortis visi tur), For thee, O dear, dear Country! (O bona patria), and Jerusalem the Golden! (Urbs Syon aura). See them all in Schaff’s Christ in Song (New York, 1886, London, 1889). The metre of the original poem is very strange: the lines are dactylic hexameters, with the icoune (sometimes a trisyllable or dactyl) and tailed rhyme, each line being broken up in three equal parts,—a most difficult metre, which only a special grace and inspiration enabled the author, as he believed, to master. The following arrangement of the first two lines will make this intelligible:—

Besides Neale’s free translation, there are the more literal versions of portions by Dr. Abraham Coles (N.Y., 1860), S. W. Dufield (N.Y., 1867), who has attempted to reproduce the original, and D. T. Morgan (Hymnus and other Poetry of the Latin Church, London, 1880), who presents a spirited version of Urbs Syon Inclyta (The Heavenly Zion).

It is worth noting that Bernard cites the case of the Biddenden Maids of Kent, l. 1013 sqq., as a proof that the last days had come. See Flacius’ ed., Basel, 1557, p. 295. The Maids were Mary and Elizabeth Chulkere, born at Biddenden in 1100. They were joined together by the shoulders and hips, and lived to the age of thirty-four. See Brekwer: The Reader’s Handbook of Allusions, etc., sub “Biddenden Maids.”

BERNARD OF SIENNA, St., b. at Massa, 1380; d. in Rome, 1450. He was a licentious life, but was converted by a vision of God. He entered the order of the Franciscans in 1402, and became the most famous preacher of his time, often addressing audiences of thirty thousand, and impressing people so powerfully, that the men burnt their cards and dice, the women their frivolous finery. He refused the bishoprics of Siens, Ferrara, and Urbino successively. His sermons were, like most sermons of the Franciscans, moral rather than religious. A number of them have been translated into Latin, and published in a collective edition, Paris, 1633, and Venice, 1745. He was canonized in 1450 by Nicholas V. See Barmuthamier: Hist. de Saint Bernardin, Paris, 1892.

BERNICE, often, but less accurately, Bjernice (victorious), was the eldest daughter of Herod Agrippa I.; betrothed at a tender age to Mark Antony, or chief officer of the Jews, in Alexandria; but, as he died ere the marriage was consummated, she became the wife of her uncle, Herod, King of Chalcis (Joseph. Antiq. XIX. 5, 1), by whom she had two sons, Bernictanus (or Bernicianus) and Hyrcanus (Antiq. XX. 5, 2; War. II. 11, 6). Her husband died when she was but twenty years old (A.D. 48), and she went to live with her brother, Agrippa II. Her brother was the most famous preacher of his time, often addressing audiences of thirty thousand, and impressing people so powerfully, that the men burnt their cards and dice, the women their frivolous finery. Julia, daughter of King Agrippa" (Corp. Inscrip. graec. n. 361).

Bernice reminds us of Cleopatra. Both had extraordinary beauty, firm wills, and loose characters. Both were very ambitious, and fertile in resources; and both scurped not to use their charms to gain their ends.

BERNO, d. 1048; was monk in a Benedictine monastery at Pruns, near Treves, when Henry II. made him Abbot of Reichenau, at Lake Constance, 1081; accompanied Henry II. to Rome in 1014, and brought back a number of musical improvements, which he introduced in Germany; brought the school and library of Reichenau to a very flourishing condition, and built the Church of St. Mary; wrote, among other works, a Vita S. Ulrici, published, together with a German translation from the thirteenth century, at Munich in 1844; a Vita S. Meignardus, found in MAHISON: Ann. Ord. Berno, sec. IV.; and musical treatises published in BERGER: Script. Eccle. de Musica, II.

BERQUIN, Louis de, b. at Passy, about 1490; d. in Paris, April 17, 1529; studied law, and bore the reputation of being a very strict and conscientious member of the Roman Church, when a controversy with Lu Chene, member of the Sorbonne, led him into the investigation of Luther's writings and the great reformatory questions of the day. But Luther's writings had been forbidden by the Parliament of Paris; and when some of them were found in Berquin's study he was imprisoned (Sept. 1, 1527), and released only by the mediation of Louise of Savoy. He now retired to his estates in Artois; but he did not desist from his investigations, nor conceal the result of them. He translated the Enchiridion of Erasmus, with notes, and wrote several polemical tracts. On the instance of the Bishop of Amiens, he was again imprisoned (Jan. 10, 1528), and a formal process of heresy was instituted against him. This time, too, he was saved, but only by the interference of the King himself. His friends advised him to leave the country, or at least to keep silent; but this he considered to be against his conscience. He directly attacked the Sorbonne, its members and its tenets; and now his doom was sealed. Imprisoned for the third time (in the beginning of March, 1529), he was sentenced (April 10) to have his tongue pierced by a hot iron, and to remain in prison for the rest of his life. He appealed to the King; but this irritated his judges to such a degree, that by a second sentence they condemned him to be burned alive; and the sentence was immediately executed in the Grève-place, April 22, 1529. He was the first Protestant martyr in France.

BERRUYER, Joseph Isaac, b. at Rouen, 1681; d. in Paris, 1758; was a Jesuit, and became famous by his Histoire du peuple de Dieu, a kind of transcription or paraphrase of the Bible, of which the first part, the Old Testament, appeared in seven volumes, 1726; the second, the Gospels, in four volumes, 1753; and the third, the Epistles, in 1758, after the death of the author. The first part is an obscure romance, full of indecent descriptions; the third is a scandalous absurdity, drawing the Christian doctrines—for instance, that of the Trinity—down into scandality; the second is a transition from the one to the other. When the first part appeared, the bishops of France protested; and a party within the order itself compelled the general to command a new and expurgated edition. When the second part appeared, the protest of the French Church was repeated with increased energy; and the Pope put the book on the Index, repeatedly condemning it as an abomination. Nevertheless, the Jesuits published the third part, had the book translated into foreign languages, and reprint it every now and then.

BÉRTHIER, Guillaume Francois, b. at Issoudun, in the Department of Indre, April 7, 1704; d. at Bourges, Dec. 15, 1782; was a Jesuit; continued the Histoire de l'Eglise Gallicane of Brumoy down to 1529; edited for some time the Journal de Trewouz; was appointed tutor to the children of the Dauphin after the suppression of his order, but banished from the country in 1764. His Œuvres Spirituelles were published in five volumes, in Paris, 1811.

BERTHOLD THE FRANCISCAN (Fronter Pehbolt), b. at Ratisbon about 1220; d. there Dec. 14, 1272; entered the order of the Franciscans; was ordained priest, and started in 1252 on a tour as itinerant preacher, through Bavaria, Alsace, Switzerland, Austria, Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia, gathering immense crowds wherever he came, and addressing people, both in the churches and in the open field. A selection of his sermons was first published in Berlin, 1824, edited by C. F. KLING; a complete edition appeared in Vienna, 1802, by F. PFEIFFER; a translation into New High-German, by F. GÖRSEL, 1850. Berthold was strongly opposed to the frivolous preachers of indulgence, and to the false confidence in the power of the saints.

BERTHOLD OF CHIEMSEE, b. at Salzburg, 1455; d. at Saalfelden, July 19, 1543; was made Bishop of Chiemsee in 1508, but resigned in 1525. He was probably a brother of the Omne Ecclesiae, which appeared anonymously at Landshtut in 1524, and gives a trenchant description of the corruption of the Roman Church, both in head and in members. In his retirement he wrote the Teutsche Theologie, which appeared (1528) in Munich, and (1531), in Latin translation, at Augsburg. It is a scholastic development of the doctrinal system of the Roman Church, held polemically against the reformatory movement, but able and original. The book, in German, with dictionary, and a life of the author, was republished at Munich in 1852, edited by W. REITMEIER.

BERTHOLD, Leonhard, b. at Emskirchen, Bavaria, May 8, 1774; d. at Erlangen, March 22, 1822; studied theology and Oriental philology in the University of Erlangen, where he was appointed extraordinary professor of philosophy in 1805, and full professor of theology in 1806, in consequence of his important work upon Daniel, Erlangen, 1806–1808, 2 vols. His principal work is, Historisch-kritische Einleitung in das Evangelium, 4 vols., 1812–18, 2 vols. In seventeen volumes, 1805–1806, 2 vols. Of less interest is his Einleitung in d. theolog. Wissenschaft, 2 vols., 1821–22; and of still less, his Handbuch d. Dogmengeschichte, 2 vols., 1822–23. As a teacher, however, and as editor of the Kräusche

Bethel (house of God), a place twelve miles north of Jerusalem, now called Beitin, but originally Luz, the residence of a Canaanitish king (Josh. iii. 9 sq., xii. 18; Judg. i. 23, 29), and associated with the patriarchs (Gen. xiii. 3, xxviii. 17-19, xxv. 3). Joshua assigned the town to Benjamin as its frontier town towards Ephraim (Josh. xvii. 13, 22). It formed part of the Northern Kingdom; and Jeroboam made it the chief seat of the calf-worship (1 Kings xii. 28-33). The reason of its selection was probably its sacred character from patriarchal times, and the presence there of the ark and the tabernacle for so long a time (see marg. Judg. xx. 18, 26, 31, xxii. 2; cf. 1 Sam. x. 3). In manifestation of Jehovah's anger at this desecration, the prophet Hosea calls it Beth-aven (house of nothingness, or idols); and Amos (v. 5) solemnly warns the people against entering the town. After the captivity it was again inhabited by the Benjaminites (Neh. xi. 31). In the time of the Maccabees it was fortified by Judas Maccabaeus, the general of Demetrius, the usurper of the kingdom of Syria (Joseph., Antiq. XIII. 1, 3). It is not named in the New Testament; but Josephus tells us it was taken by Vespasian (War. IV. 9, 9). It is now a miserable village of about four hundred inhabitants standing amid ruins which cover about four acres (Beiliker).

Bethesda (house of mercy, or of the flowing water), a pool in Jerusalem near the sheep-gate (Neh. iii. 1, 32, xii. 39; John v. 2). Tradition incorrectly identifies it with the modern Birket-Israel, which is an empty reservoir within the city, three hundred and sixty feet long, one hundred and twenty feet wide, and eighty feet deep, half filled with rubbish. But it is a problem where Bethesda really was. The guide in these identifications should be the statement of Nehemiah, that the sheep-gate was near, and on the north, or more properly north-east, side of the temple. Robinson identified it with the interminnt Pool of the Virgin, in the Kidron Valley, which answers one of the conditions of John's narrative; but it is much too small, and does not yield sufficient space for the five porches. Capt. Warren identifies it with the double pool under the Convent of the Sisters of Zion, near the north-west corner of the Haram enclosure. In corroboration is the mention by Eusebius of two pools lying in juxtaposition, of which one was the sheep-pool. But a better identification is with the half-filled water reservoir adjoining the Church of St. Anne, which the older writers call the "piscina interior." In the time of the Crusades it was distinguished from Birket Israel, called the Sheep-pool; and around it five porches were traced. This is in all probability the same as the "piscina naturalis" (swimming-basin) in Itiner. Antonini Placentini of the sixth century. This identification may be perhaps to-day considered certain. That it preserved its curative properties is proven by the votive tablet found in the Church of St. Anne, which dates from the time of the first Crusade, beginning of the second century. The giver was Pompeia Lucilia, possibly some great lady who repaired the porches ruined during the siege. Perhaps she was the daughter of Lucilius Bassus, Roman legate in Palestine after the capture of Jerusalem (Joseph., War. VII. 6, 1 and 4).

The name Bethesda in original form and meaning is uncertain. The common interpretation is given above, but on the ground of the usage of the second component, Delitzsch proposed "house of the portico," and Canon Westcott, "house of the olive" (Bible Commentary in loco).

See article in Richm. Handwörterbuch des bibl. Altertaums, and in Lichtenberger's Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses.

Beth-horon (house of the hollow), the name of two places, the "Upper" and the "Nether" Beth-horon (Josh. xvi. 5, 3), about three miles apart, on the opposite sides of a ravine or steep pass, now distinguished in like manner, and called Beit Ur el-Tahin and El Foka. The Upper is admirably situated upon the top of a mountain spur; but the Nether was more important. Both are now uninhabited. The towns lay upon the boundary line between Benjamin and Ephraim, and were counted with the latter (Josh. xi. 22). They were very ancient, being mentioned by Joshua (Josh. xvi. 5 sq.), Judges (xxii. 1), and in connection with the murder of Jotham (Judg. i. 31). They were small villages. From their time the places appear to have been unnoticed until 1801; then again, until Dr. Robinson visited them in 1838, and afterwards described them, they are not mentioned.

Bethlehem (house of bread), the modern Beitlahm, the name of two towns spoken of in the Bible. 1. A town in Zebulun (Josh. ix. 15), now a poor village, six miles west of Nazareth.

2. Bethlehem-Judah, as it is called in Judg. xvi. 7, 9, xix. 1, 2, 18, and Bethlehem-Ephrathah in Micah v. 2, to distinguish it from the preceding. Ephrath, or Ephrathah (the fruitful) (Gen. xxxv. 19, livii. 7; Ruth iv. 11; Ps. cxxxii. 6), was, perhaps, not originally the name of the city, but a description of the locality in which it lay, and one which answers now; for the modern like the ancient Bethlehem is built upon a hill, and all about it are ridges of terraced vineyards, and gardens with evergreen olives, and luxuriant fig-trees. The name of Bethlehem is considered better than that of Jerusalem. The women rival their Christian sisters of Nazareth. Here is an air of industry, thrift, and comfort, which are very rare in the East. The inhabitants (about five thousand) are almost all Christians, the Mohammedan quarter having been destroyed in 1834. It is worthy of notice, that, in 1 Chron. ii. 19, an Ephrath as appears the wife of Caleb, and mother of Hur, whose son Salma founded Bethel (vers. 51, 54). But Salmah (Ruth iv. 20, marg.) or Salmah (ver. 21), was the father of Boaz. Hur was also the grandfather of Bezaleel, who superintended the work of the tabernacle; and, since trades are singularly fixed in the East, it may well be that the father of David, as the Targum of Jonathan relates, was a “weaver of the veil of the sanctuary;” and thus the town of Bethlehem was connected in memory with the heroic Caleb, with Bezaleel the builder of the tabernacle, and with David the poet-king.

But the "little 'city had no lack of memories. Here, long before Caleb's day, had Rachel brought forth Benoni, and yielded up her life for her child. On the spot where she died, Jacob erected a pillar; and a little while Mohammedian mosque, reminds every passer-by of the touching incident of patriarchal life (Gen. xxxv. 16-20, xviii. 7). Here, in the days of the Judges, was the scene of the charming idyl of Ruth. Here David was born. For a draught from the well at its gate he longed on one occasion, but would not take it when the three heroes broke through the ranks of the Philistines and brought it to him, because it was, in his estimation, "the blood of men” (1 Chron. xi. 15-19). Rehoboam fortified Bethlehem (2 Chron. xi. 6). Mention is made of the khan, or caravanserai of Chimham, close to Bethleham, as a resting-place or starting-point for travellers on the way to Egypt, which gives rise to the very probable supposition that Chimham, the son of Barzillai, received from David, as a recognition of his father's fidelity and self-sacrifice, a possession, perhaps a Davidic family property; upon which he built a khan. "Children of Bethlehem 'returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ez. ii.21; Neh. vii.26).

But all these facts and incidents connected with Bethlehem are of little moment, compared with the one transcendent event which there took place. “Hic de virgine Maria Jesus Christus natus est” (Here Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary.)

Tradition pointed out, even in Justin Martyr's day, in the middle of the second century, a cave in which the Lord of life saw light; and it is every way likely that for once tradition and fact coincide. Over the spot, Constantine, or rather Helena his mother, erected a basilica (A.D. 327), the oldest church in Christendom, which still stands as part of the present Church of the Nativity. Here Jerome lived for thirty years, and made his so-called Vulgate translation of the Bible, and died (419). The church escaped destruction by the Moslems, it is said by a miracle, 1010; and here Baldwin was crowned king, 1101; and in 1110 Bethleham was raised to the rank of an episcopal see. The church was thoroughly restored, and munificently decorated, by the Byzantine Emperor Manuel Comnenos (1143-80). The church was covered with lead. In 1482 the roof was repaired, Edward IV. of England giving the lead. But toward the end of the eighteenth century the Turks turned the lead roof to account by making bullets out of it. During the present century the roof has been again repaired.

The present church, like the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem, is singularly comprehensive in its plan. The façade is entered through the Latin Monastery, which looks like a mediaeval fortress. (The Greeks and Armenians have monasteries in contiguous buildings.) In the crypt beneath it is shown, in the "Chapel of the Nativity," the place where Christ was born. Opposite, and three steps down, is the Chapel of the Manger, in which there is a marble manger. The original (?) wooden one was taken by Pope Sixtus V. to Rome, and set up in the Church of Santa Maria Maggiore. In the same extensive crypt are other chapels, called after different events or persons, the most interesting of which is the Chapel of St. Jerome, the cell in which the great scholar lived and worked. See TOBLER: Bethlehem in Palestina, St. Gallen ü. Bern, 1819; [ROBINSON: Researches; SCHAFF: Through Bible Lands, 1870.] FR. W. SCHULTZ.

BETHLEHEMITES is the name of two orders of monks. I. The origin of the first is very obscure. It was established at Cambridge in 1257: its members wore a red star on the breast, symbolizing the star which led the wise men to Bethleham. II. The founder of the second order was a Franciscan monk, Pierre de Bethencourt; b. in 1619; d. in 1667. It was confirmed by Innocent XI. in 1667. Its principal seat is Guatemala, and it numbers in Central America about forty houses. Its members follow the rule of St. Augustine and wear around the neck a medallion with a representation of the birth of Christ in Bethlehem. To attend the sick is the main object of the order.

BETHPHAGÉ (house of figs), a place near Bethany upon the Mount of Olives. Tradition locates it half way between the summit of the Mount and Bethany; but more probably it was on the road from Bethany to Jerusalem, and at the spot where the holy city first becomes visible to one coming from the east.

BETHPHANY, a primitive name for the festival best known in the West as the Epiphany.

BETHSAIDA (house of fish), the appropriate name of two places upon the shore of Galilee's lake.

1. Bethsaida of Galilee, the birthplace of Andrew, Peter, and Philip (John i. 44 sq., xii. 21), the scene of many a miracle of Christ (Matt. xi. 21; Luke x. 13), was upon the west shore in or by the "land of Gennesaret," i.e., the plain of Ghesweir, not far from Capernaum (Mark vi. 45, cf. ver. 51; John vi. 17, 24). But the nearer identification of that of Capernaum (which sec), and that is a vexed question.

2. Bethsaida Julias, often mentioned by Josephus (Antiq. XVIII. 2, 1), known to Pliny, in Lower Gaulonitica, just where the Jordan empties itself into the lake. Originally a village, Philip the tetrarch enlarged it into a city, and named it Julias, in honor of Julia, the daughter of Augustus, and wife of Tiberius. In its neighborhood the feeding of the five thousand took place (Luke ix. 10).

Some scholars, e.g., Dr. W. M. Thomson, declare that the two Bethsidas were really only the east and west parts of one city, which was built upon the Jordan at the place it enters the lake now called Abu Zany.

BETH-SHE'AN (house of quiet), BETH'SHAN, or BETHSAN, (house of peace), was situated in the territory of Manasseh, between Bethel and Abel Beth Maacah, and commanded the entrance of the Valley of Jezreel where it opens into the Jordan Valley. It is on the road from Jerusalem to Damascus, and is about three miles from the Jordan. It remained in the hands of the Canaanites until the time of David; there the corps of Saul was exhibited (Judg. i. 27; 1 Sam. xxxi. 10). Under Solomon it formed part of one of the twelve commissariat districts (1 Kings iv. 12). The Greeks called it Nyssa, or Nysa, in honor of Dionysus (Bacchus), probably because of its wine; but it was more generally called Sceytopho- lis, the city of the Scythians (Jud. iii. 10; 2 Macc. xii. 29 sqq.), and in the second half of the seventh century B.C., the country was invaded by the Scythians on their way to Egypt, and a few of them settled in Bethshean. This circumstance explains how the city was considered non-Jewish and unholy (2 Macc. xii. 30; Joseph., Antiq. XVIII. 13, 2). Scythopolis became an episcopal see. It is now called Beit-sur, and contains many interesting ruins of temples, a large theatre, a Roman arch; and about it are many ancient tombs. It was invad

BETH-SHE'EMEH (house of the sun). 1. The same as Irshemesh, "city of the sun," and Mount Heres "mountain of the sun" (Josh. xix. 41; Judg. i. 53), a sacerdotal city near Kirjath-jearim, and about fourteen miles from Jerusalem. It is noted as the place where the ark rested, and at which Jehoshaph, King of Israel, defeated and took prisoner Amaziah, King of Judah (2 Kings xiv. 11). Under Ahaz the Philistines occupied it and other towns in the locality (2 Chron. xxviii. 18). Upon its site to-day is the ruined village of Ain Shems, "fountain of the sun," which is evidently constructed of ancient materials.

2. There were two other places of this name: one was in the tribe of Issachar (Josh. xix. 22); the other was Phoenician in origin (Josh. xvi. 38; Judg. i. 33), and belonged to Naphtali, but was not occupied by that tribe.

Beth-she'mesh is the name Jeremiah gives to Heliopolis, or On in Egypt (Jer. xliii. 13). The meaning is identical.

BETH'ULIA (virgin of Jehovah) was the centre of the events recorded in the apocryphal Book of Judith, but is not elsewhere mentioned. Its situation has been variously discussed. Some suppose it to be one of the mountains of Ephraim, south of the Valley of Jezreel, and near Dotham (Dothan), and on a mountain which overlooked the plain of Esdraelon, and commanded the passes from that plain to the hill-country of Manasseh. Strange as it may seem, it has not been identified, although many attempts have been made. If the place is not an imaginary one, as may well be, it is probably an altered name.

BETH-UNE, George Washington, b. in New York city, March 13, 1805; d. in Florence, Italy, April 27, 1862. He was graduated from Dickinson College, Carlisle, Penn., 1829; entered the Prince ton Theological Seminary; was married 1825; licensed by the Second Presbytery of New York, July 11, 1826; was missionary to the colored people and sailors at Savannah, Ga., for a year, — a post for which his perfect familiarity with nautical phrases, and his great love of human nature, eminently fitted him. He then began his regular ministry, and was, in succession, pastor of the following churches in the Reformed (Dutch) denomination: Rhinebeck, 1827–30; Utica, 1830–34; First Church, Philadelphia, 1834–37; Third Church, organized by him, 1837–49; Central Church, Brooklyn, 1840–50; Church on the Heights, organized for him, 1850–59; associate minister in Twenty-first Street Church, New York, 1859–62. He was in his day one of the most eloquent preachers and public speakers in the country; but he was, besides, a scholar, a theologian, and a popular essayist. His writings and publications were numerous. His most valued are: Early Lost, Early Saved, with original poem, Phil., 1816; The British Female Poets, with biographical and critical notices, Phil., 1848; Lays of Love and Faith, Phil., 1848; Memoirs of Mrs. Joanna Be thune, N.Y., 1857; Expository Lectures on the Heidel berg Catechism, N.Y., 1864. He also edited with rare skill and con amore, for he was an enthusiastic fisherman, Walton's Complete Angler, N.Y., 1847, new ed. 1880, 2 vols.

BETH-ZUR (house of the rock), in the mountains of Judah, now a ruined village, Beizier, four miles north of Hebron, was fortified by Reho boam, and once the "strongest place in all Judaea" (Joseph., Antiq. XIII. 5, 6). As such, it played an important part in the wars of the Maccabees (1 Macc. iii. 19 sqq.), and was returned to the Jews by the decree of the Decapolis, and it was here that Alexander Jan naeus made the alliance with Cleopatra (Joseph., Antiq. XVIII. 13, 2). Scythopolis became an episcopal see. It is now called Beisan, and contains many interesting ruins of temples, a large theatre, a Roman arch; and about it are many ancient tombs. It was invad

BETKIUSS, Joachim, b. Oct. 8, 1601, in Berlin; d. Dec. 12, 1653, at Linum, near Flensburg, where he was pastor for more than thirty years. He was a Pietist before Pietism yet existed. The cause of the religious misery of his age in Germany he ascribes to the ministers. Among his works are: Christianismus Ethicus, Berlin, 1633; Socceratrium, 1640; Antichristenthum, Amsterdam, 1650; Exzismum Germanicum, Amsterdam, 1666.

BEVERIDGE, William, b. at Barrow in 1638; d. at Westminster, March 5, 1708; was educated at Cambridge; became Archdeacon of Colchester in 1681, and Bishop of St. Asaph in 1704. In church-history he made himself a deserved reputation by his translation among the classics of the Cudworth Duo, London, 1689; and in canon law, by the edition and interpretation of its sources, Συνάσκεψη τον Πανδησάς κανόνας Αποστ. et Concill., Oxford, 1672. His collected works, including his Private Thoughts upon Religion, and Doctrine of the Church of England, were published in 9 vols., London, 1824, and, more complete, in 12 vols., Oxford, 1841–48. He has been styled "the great reviver and restorer of primitivo pitty." He was very learned, earnest, and devout, and justly esteemed.

BEZA, Theodore (originally de Besze), the friend and biographer of Calvin, a Suabian scholar of eminence, and a Protestant withal. With Wolmar he lived until 1534, when the latter returned to Germany. From May, 1535, to August, 1539, he was a student of law at the University of Orléans; but, when he had received the degree of licentiate in law, he began his practice in Paris. Not being fond of the law, but devoted to poetry, rarely gifted, a poet and a scholar, of high social position, abundantly supplied with money,—for, although not in orders, he enjoyed the income of two benefices, with the prospect before him of being the heir of his other uncle, Claudius, the Abbot of Froimont,—it was natural that he should yield to the seductions of the gay capital, and live among his social equals, the wits, the scholars, and the beauties of Paris. Proof is lacking that Beza was ever grossly immoral. He was probably more frivolous than criminal. Even his impure relations with Claude Desnoz were not so reprehensible as they have been represented; for he was faithful to her, and at last fulfilled his promise to marry her.

In 1548 he published his Juvenilia, a collection of Latin poems, and thereby won the reputation of being the best Latin poet of his day. But in that year he had a severe sickness, which sobered him. The orders, he enjoyed the income of two benefices, Fº his sinfullife, give up his benefices, and go to Geneva. This he did. By advice of Calvin he publicly professed the Protestant faith, and married his mistress. In November, 1549, he was appointed professor of Greek in the Academy of Lausanne; but he did not confine his energies to that department. He revived the sacred dramas of the middle ages, and wrote (1550) a highly successful one, called Abraham's Sacrifice, in which he cleverly contrasted Roman-Catholicism with Protestantism. He aided Calvin in his commentaries upon Paul's Epistles and the Epistle to the Hebrews; defended the burning of Servetus; attempted to unite Swiss and German Protestants in protesting against the French persecution of the Waldenses in Piedmont, but failed, giving up this untimely disputes about the Lord's Supper, and got more blame than praise for his attempt. In the fall of 1558 he removed to Geneva, to be professor in the academy there. He was also from this time the coadjutor of Calvin. His career was brilliant. In 1560 he issued his completed metrical translation of the Greek text, which, as it does not contain the Greek text, it certainly was not. The latter editions of Beza were long-continued and fruitful. In addition to those already mentioned, he wrote, omitting very many minor publications, 1. EpistolamagistriBenedictiPassa rantii, Parisiis, 1551 (a satire, written in macaronic verse, directed against President Desnoz and Lizet, a violent persecutor). 2. De haereticis ac cielii magistraturi punitiis, Genevæ, 1554 (a defence of the burning of Servetus). 3. Annota

(a faithful and elegant translation). 5. Confessio christiana fidei et eiusdem collatio cum papistis heresibus, Genevæ, 1800. This masterly defence of the Reformed faith appeared originally in French. It was translated into English, London, 1803 and 1805. 6. Vies de I. Calvin, Genevæ, 1563 or 1564. But his most valuable work was, 7. Iesu Christi D. N. Novum testamentum sive novum fasciculus, cuius genera testi respondent interpretationes duas, una, vetera, altera, nova, Theodori Beze, diligenter ab eo recognitae. Exiudem Th. Beze annotationes, quas tiudem in hac secunda editione recognovit et accessione non parvae locupletavit. Indices etiam duo, theologiae (praesertim Hebraice, Graec et Latinae linguae studiose) multum profuti adiecti sunt. [Genève, 1565.] The fourth edition that Beza had received, from the library of the elder Robert Stephens, a copy of the New Testament, to which was added readings from several more manuscripts than the father had used in his third edition (1550). In Beza's second edition (1582), called, however, upon the titlepage, tercia editio, much help was derived from the uncial manuscripts, Codex D. Gosp. and Acts (Codex Beza, Graeco-Latinus, now in the library of the University of Cambridge, to which Beza presented it in 1891), and Codex Claromontanus, of the Pauline Epistles, now in Paris (see Bible-Text, New Testament), from the Peshito, and a Latin translation of the Arabic version. The third edition appeared in 1589, also under the date 1588; and the fourth (1598), which differs little from the third, is less accurate, and was reprinted in 1642. The counting of the above edition is confused by Beza's improper reckoning of his Latin edition of 1557 (the title-page gives 1556, the last page, 1557) as his first edition, which, as it does not contain the Greek text, it certainly was not. The latter editions of Beza were the main basis of the authorized English version, not only because they were the latest and the best, but also because Beza, the surviving patriarch of the Reformers, exerted by his Latin version and exegetical notes a marked influence upon the King James' translators, as he previously upon the Genevan (1557 and 1560). The Historia ecclesiasticae des Eglises reformées, Antwerp, 1580, is falsely attributed to him.

BIBLE. The older Protestant theologians, under the title Affectiores Scripturae Sacrae, put together the particular attributes of the Bible as the inspired rule of faith and practice. a. The primary attributes, such as come directly from the divine origin and canonicity of the Scriptures: 1. Divine authority, in opposition to the Socinians, who underrated the Old Testament, and to the Roman Church, which grounds the authority of the Scriptures upon the Church. This attribute itself is partly an authority to bind men to believe what it teaches, and partly the final appeal in germane questions. The Scriptures had divine authority as the highest law and the supreme court. 2. Sufficiency. The Bible contains all that is requisite for Christian faith and life, and for the attainment of heaven. 3. Perspicuity, in opposition to Roman-Catholic notions of vagueness and obscurity, and Arminian and Socinian denial of the necessity of the Spirit's aid to understand the Bible. Clearness was, indeed, only predicated of the Bible as a whole; portions were allowed to be obscure: e.g., the Revelation, and parts of Ezekiel and Daniel. It was necessary to believe only the "saving truths;" and to these the historical portions of the Bible and the dogmatics of the schools did not belong. Nor was it asserted that everything implied by the Bible could in substance be grasped. There were truths only the regenerate could understand, and they not without prayer and divine aid, a knowledge of the language, and a mature and unprejudiced mind. 4. To the Scriptures was attributed a power of Self-interpretation: Scripture interprets Scripture. See HERMENEUTICS. 5. Divine efficacy, as against the Quakers and others who saw in the Scripture only "dead letters." The Truth of Scripture is usually reckoned in the first class; but this attribute is so bound up with that of inspiration, that it cannot not require to be enumerated separately. b. The secondary attributes of Holy Scripture, or such as come indirectly from the same sources: 1. Necessity. A revelation, if made, must be contained in the writing. Neither an "inner light" nor simple tradition will afford sufficient surety. 2. Integrity. Nothing necessary to the canon has been lost: the lost books were either written simply for local use, or designed simply for local use. 3. Un corrupted text. The Hebrew of the Old Testament, and the Greek of the New Testament, have come down to us as written. 4. Accessibility. The Bible is adapted to the reading of all ages, classes, and sexes.

The modern Protestant theologians have modified the definition of these predicates; yet they express substantially the mind of evangelical Christendom. H. PARET (RUD. KÖGEL).

BIBLE CHRISTIANS, or BRYANITES, a sect closely resembling the Methodists, from whom they differ merely in having a more popular form of church-government, consisting of equal numbers of ministers and laymen, in rejecting the title "Reverend," on the ground that it introduces distinctions in the body of Christ, and in giving women the fullest liberty to preach. But in doctrine and practice they are like the Methodists. In the United States the unitarian congregation, which is in Philadelphia, and calls Rev. William Cowherd, who left the ministry of the Church of England in 1800, its founder. In England, in 1756, they numbered 308 chapels and 14,352 members, with 66 preachers and 957 local preachers; in Canada, 135 chapels, 46 preachers, and 4,986 members; in Australia, 100 chapels, 34 preachers, 147 local preachers, and 2,045 members. All these claim to be the spiritual children of Rev. William Bryan of Cornwall, who left the Wesleysans in 1815. Hence the name sometimes given to them.

BIBLES, Pictured, and BIBLICAL PICTURES. Pictured Bibles have existed from the dawn of printing. Indeed, long before, in the earliest Christian days, miniatures were painted with loving care by holy hands upon the Bible parchment-rolls; for just as the ancients had illustrated Homer and Virgil, so the Christians had illustrated Bibles. The great number of these little pictures thus made, and the great beauty of many of them, attest the skill, the industry, and the piety of the makers. An instance of great interest is Codex Σ (which see under BIBLE TEXT, NEW TESTAMENT). But the cost of these pictures excluded the people from possessing them, or even seeing them. When, however, woodcuts were invented, and the printing-press set up, the people could share in whatever profit these pictures afforded. Long before the Reformation, Martin Schöon in Kolmar issued a book of the life and sufferings of Jesus, with excellent cuts. The Bible printed in 1477 by Anton Sorg and Zainer, in Augsburg, had woodcuts. Towards the close of the century there were more popular editions, with pictures from the Passion of our Lord, the Apocalypse (already a favorite theme for the artist), and the Canticles, besides the so-called Bible of the Poor (Biblia Pauperum),—brief biblical selections, with simple, rude woodcuts. The sixteenth-century artists put their powers at the service of the Bible, and to the present time their work remains unequalled. Albrecht Dürer (1498, 1507–13), L. Cranach (1509), Hans Scheufelen (1508), and other masters, illustrated different portions of Scripture. The Reformers made use of the same help in their work. Cuts derived from the Coburger Bible (Nürnberg, 1483), adorned the Apocalypse in even the first edition of Luther's New Testament. The Romanists followed. The Episcopalian, in 1526–27 printed Luther's New Testament, with a few changes, but with the addition of sixty-five cuts, as did Emser in 1527, under the patronage of Duke George, much to Luther's anger, that such...

unwashed hands should touch his work. In 1534 Luther's Old Testament, illustrated, and the New with additional illustrations, appeared in Wittenberg. Christophorus Walthier, the corrector for the press of Hans Lufft, declared that the pictures were worthy of Luther's designing; and Melancthon wrote to Stigel (Sept. 26, 1544), that he sometimes busied himself with designs for Bible pictures, which he gave over to the finishing touches of Lucas Cranach,—so high was the estimation of the Reformers for pictorial effects. The Roman-Catholic improved version of Dietenberger (1534) had many woodcuts. Indeed, it was not possible in those days to get the Bible without them. The high-water mark in this line was reached in the Bible printed by Hans Kraft in Wittenberg (1572, 1574, 1576, and 1584). Besides these illustrated Scriptures, there were collections of Bible-pictures. Thus Graff issued a Bible-history (1538–53). But the best work was produced by Hans Holbein, whose imitable Pictures from the Old Testament appeared with a Latin text in Lyons, 1550, 1553, 1554, 1547, with an English text, 1549, and with a French text, 1550. Many other similar Bible-histories followed in this century. Particularly worthy of mention is Feyerabend's (1751), a manual which sets forth the weightiest topics of biblical history and archeology by means of two hundred small woodcuts, with Latin verses attached. The letterpress was furnished by Pastor Heinrich Peter Rebenstock, and the illustrations by Jost Ammann of Zurich. Similar works were published in France and the Netherlands: Vita J. Christi, Antwerp, 1550; Figures du Vieur Testament par Tournes, Lyons, 1559; Quadris historiques de la Bibel par Claude Paradin, 1553, which appeared also with Spanish and Italian letterpress.

Wood-engraving, the glory of the sixteenth century, did not flourish in the next centuries: the copper-plate, more pretending, less "popular," took its place. In 1607 Bodalocchio and Lanfranco issued the Raffael Bible, so called because it contained the fifty-two famous pictures, mostly from the Old Testament, with which that greatest of painters had decorated the loggia of the Vatican. In a very much lowerscale of artistic merit, but more widely circulated, and really more useful, were the Icones Biblicae and Historiae Sacrae (Matthäus Merian, Frankfurt, 1625–27, and, later, in German and Dutch), veritable treasures in many evangelical households of those countries. Other nations were quite as prolific as the Germans. In the eighteenth century, books of the class were multiplied. Hubner's Biblische Historien, 1714, with unsurpassably bad pictures, was a prize for the youth of three generations. Another popular work was the Augsburg Historiae from the Bible, Illustrated, in five parts, by Johann Ulr. Kraus (1700) often reprinted. The Dutchen, Daucker (1700), Taferelen (1740), and Pet. Schots (1740); the Frenchmen, Basnage (1705) and Martin (1721); the Englishmen, Clarke (1738), and Fleetwood, whose Compendious History of the Old and New Testament (1750),—and many others in these lands, issued compilations and original works upon Bible themes, with illustrations of more or less merit. In the first year of the present century there was begun in London The Holy Bible, with engravings from pictures and designs by the most eminent artists. This great work was in seven elephant folios in classic "style," but full of the modern romantic mannerisms and affectations. Such faults are glaring in water and steel: in wood-engraving they are unbearable. Instead of the simple strength of the woodcut, these presented caricatures, unnatural, theatrical; and the matter was made worse when German book-sellers printed the engravings from casts, e.g., the horrible cheap casts which the Calver Union used for the Bible histories of Dr. Barth; although in their one hundredth edition more worthy engravings were substituted. The recent effort after so-called realism has led to productions such as Brown's Self-Interpreting Bible (London and New York), with views of Bible cities and landscapes, or the German Hildburghausen, Pracht Haushelf, published in 1830, of which a million copies have been sold. These books are in the main showy and inartistic; but of late years a few, e.g., the Word; and Olivier (1834), Oberbeck (1841), Cotta (1850), now Brockhaus, have issued illustrated Bibles which were praiseworthy. At last Julius Schnorr of Kronfeld, a masterhand, published his drawings under the title The Bible in (240) Pictures. The publisher subsequently issued an abridgment. But there is needed a Bible for the people which shall be, like the Reformation Bibles, a true house-book, a family inheritance, loved by old and young. [Bida's beautiful illustrations to the New Testament, and Dore's (1860) on the entire Bible, deserve emphasis as the cheapest, popular Com. on the N. T. is richly illustrated with Bible scenes from photographs.]

BIBLE-READING BY THE LAITY, AND BIBLE PROHIBITION. 1. In the Roman-Catholic Church. Upon this point, as upon so many others, the Roman-Catholic Church is agitated by conflicting opinions; but she does not allow these differences publicly to appear. Her conduct at different times has also varied. But it is a matter of complete demonstration, that the greatest of the Fathers upon whom she so fondly rests, such as Ambrose, not only allowed, but commended, the reading of the Bible; and further, that, from the beginning, the Scriptures have been circulated in the vernacular of many nations. (See Bible Versions.) In the middle ages, among the Romanic and Germanic peoples, there was for a long period no talk of prohibiting the reading of the Bible; although it is true the Church did not trouble herself to translate and circulate it, and looked upon the gradual spread of ignorance of Latin with great complacency, because it narrowed to extinction the circle of Bible-readers. But the growth of the Papacy was death to the study of the Bible. Gregory VII. (Hildebrand), in pious strain wrote to Duke Wratieszlaw of Bohemia, in 1080, that God was pleased to allow the Holy Word to remain in some localities unknown to the people (which he understood) in order to save the people from error.

Unhappily the appeal made to the Bible by the Cathari, Albigenses, and Waldenses,—sects of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, which strove to reform abuses,—only served to deepen the conviction of many, that the Bible was a dangerous book, because its unrestricted reading started heresies among the people. And therefore various councils, no doubt sincerely, as that of Tarracona (1594), endeavored to check its spread. As reading Greek was made to depend upon particular translations of it, many were scandalized; and the Council of Oxford (1408) ordered that no one should make such a translation without the consent of his bishop and of the provincial synod. In the same spirit, Berthold, the Archbishop of Mainz (Mayence), in 1468 issued an edict against the printing of any sort of religious book in German, giving, among other reasons, the singular one, that the German language was unadapted to convey correctly religious ideas, and therefore they would be profaned.

Notwithstanding prohibitions, the editions of German and other vernacular Bibles greatly increased. When Luther's translation came out, and was so eagerly caught up, the Roman Church was compelled to take some action concerning it. Erasmus and prominent ecclesiastics had warmly recommended the reading of the Bible. But the shrewd ones among the Roman clergy saw that this advice must be rebuked by the highest authority. One of the results, therefore, of the Council of Trent (1545–63), was a regulation in regard to reading the Bible. According to Rule III. of the Ten Rules concerning Prohibited Books, the reading of versions of the Old Testament made by heretics is allowed to pious and learned men, provided they have the permission of their bishop; but no one was allowed to read an heretical version of the New Testament. Rule IV. states, that, inasmuch as the reading of the Bible in the vernacular is in general more full of danger than of use, it can be allowed only to those who are too well grounded in the faith to be shaken, and who, for that reason, have the permission of their pastors or confessors. Such reading, moreover, is to be only of approved translations, and even then booksellers cannot sell, save upon permission of the bishop. What a sad contrast to Protestantism!

The rise of Jansenism (see title) in the seventeenth century, and especially the appearance, under its encouragements, of the French New Testament of Quesnel, (Paris, 1699), which had distinctive doctrines not based upon the Word, but contradict it. And so, while here and there are defenders of Bible-reading, the Church cannot consistently advocate the spread of the Bible. Singly enough, Semler and Lessing, and other Protestant rationalists, have taken similar ground against allowing the laity to read the Bible. See Arnauld: De la lecture de l'écriture; Hagemeyer: Geschichte des Bibelverbots, Ulm, 1783; A. J. Onyman: Entwurf zu einer Geschichte des Bibellesen, Würzburg, 1786; Van Ess: Uber das notwendigen Bibellesen, Leipzig, 1808.

2. In the Greek Church. In the Turkish Empire, as early as Cyril Lucar (d. 1638), the question of circulating the Scriptures was agitated; but the Confession of Dositheus (Q. 1) answers it in the negative as far as the common people are concerned. See Schaff's Creeds of Christendom, vol. II. p. 433. In consequence, the New Greek (Romanoic) translation, which was made about that time, had a very limited spread. Protestant versions have been more kindly received; and in 1824 the Patriarch of Constantinople allowed the printing and free circulation of such a New Testament, but stopped the Old Testament, because it was from the Hebrew, and not conformably to the Septuagint. The unwise attempt to brave this prohibition resulted, in 1836, in the condemnation of the entire Bible as uncanonical. In Greece opinion is divided. In Russia the Czar Alexander I., in 1813, as is well known, favored the establishment of a Bible Society in St. Petersburg (see Bible Societies); but his successor, Nicholas I., suppressed the society in 1826, and allowed only the old Slavonic version (see under Bible Versions) to be circulated. This was a practical prohibition of the Bible, because that version can be read by comparatively few. At no time has there been in the Greek Church the same opposition to Bible-reading as in the Roman Church; and this is particularly the case in Russia, where, at the present day, there are large sects which display considerable scriptural knowledge. Since 1869, the British and Foreign Bible Society have been able to do something. [It has, according to the seventy-sixth report (1889), agencies in St. Petersburg, Moscow, Odessa, Charkoff, and elsewhere. The one at Odessa was formed in 1868, and had, up to 1880, disseminated 842,560 copies: the one at St. Petersburg, formed in 1828, had disseminated 2,636,783. During the war with Turkey, in 1877, the New Testament was widely circulated in the Russian army. The holy synod allows the sale of the Scriptures only in the authorized Russian version.] Gass.

Bible Societies. I. British and Foreign Bible Society. — It was founded in London, March 7, 1804. Other societies had been organized previously, which partly or wholly made their object the distribution of the Bible. The principal of these were: 1. The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (c. 1698). Its objects were the erection of free schools, the spread of the Bible and the Prayer-Book, and religious tracts, also the support of foreign missions, especially in India. It published chiefly in English, Welsh, Manx, and Arabic. 2. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.
(1701), with similar objects in special reference to the American Colonies. 8. The Scottish Society for the Propagation of the Christian Knowledge (1709), whose field included the Highlands, the Scottish islands, and part of North America, supplying them with evangelists, Bibles, and edifying books in Gaelic. 4. The Society for Promoting Religious Knowledge among the Poor (1750) also distributed Bibles and books in Gaelic translation. 5. The London Missionary Society, later called The Naval and Military Bible Society (1780), which worked exclusively among the soldiers and sailors. 6. The Society for the Support and Encouragement of Sunday Schools (1785) distributed gratuitously Bible and other books in Sunday schools. Nor was Ireland behindhand. 7. The Association for Dissecting a Vice, and Promoting the Knowledge and Practice of the Christian Religion, established in Dublin in 1792, did a similar work among the poor Irish. 8. A French Bible Society was founded in London in the same year (1792), for publishing the Bible in French; but the French did not favor the enterprise, and so the money collected for this purpose was applied to other things. But the desire for such a society among the French Protestants was very great, more especially, because no Protestant Bible had been printed in France since 1778.

Although these facilities existed, yet the demand far exceeded the supply. Particularly was this the case in Wales, where the Rev. Thomas Charles of Bala in Marionethshire had been preaching for twenty years as an itinerant minister. This devoted man everywhere awakened a keen interest in the Bible; but many were compelled to walk long distances before they could get a copy; while in London, in December, 1802, the thought came to Charles, Why not found a Bible society for Wales? He imparted this idea to his friend Tarn, who introduced him to the executive committee of the London Tract Society, before whom Charles gave a moving account of the famine for the word of God among his own people. His speech made a deep impression, particularly upon a Baptist minister, Joseph Hughes, one of the secretaries of the Tract Society. "Certainly, with Welsh Bibles, not only the Tract Society might be formed; and, if for Wales, why not for the Kingdom and for the world?" Joseph Hughes had given utterance to the idea of a Bible society for the world. The next step was to awaken interest, and find out the extent of the destitution at home and abroad. In the last direction the Rev. C. F. A. Steinkopf, pastor of the German Lutheran Church in the Savoy (in the Strand, London), was particularly useful. A public meeting was held March 7, 1804, at the London Tavern (on the call of Mr. Hughes); three hundred persons attended it. Among the various denominations represented were Quakers, who were considered to be despisers of the Bible, and who kept themselves aloof from the other denominations, and did not join with them in any work, save that of the abolition of slavery. But it was quickly evident the Bible society presented common ground upon which all sects and parties could stand. Desiring by means of Bibles and tracts to supply the common work forgot, for a time, their different interpretation of the same book. But the latter were not at once ready to join the movement. The first of the Church clergy present to favor the enterprise was the Rev. John Owen, who was in a measure supplied, by a church was done as would otherwise have been. Europe had her own Bible societies: Germany in particular was well supplied. 1. The Canonmin Bible Institute was founded in 1710 by the Freiherr von Canstein (see title), and has been very active in circulating Bibles in several languages. 2. The destitution in Austria excited the merchant Kiesling in Nürnberg, and led to the organization of the Nürnberg (Nuremberg) Bible Society on May 10, 1804. The British and Foreign Bible Society contributed stereotype plates of the German Bible. The Basel friends to the Bible cause joined in the movement, and after two years (1806) it was shifted to the latter city, and called the Basel Bible Society. [They report (1880) an issue of 684,313 copies.]
3. It might be supposed that the Bible would be rarely found in the Roman-Catholic portion of Germany; nor would any expression of regret over the fact be expected. All the more, therefore, was the astonishment when a Roman-Catholic priest in South Germany wrote a letter expressing great joy over the founding of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and assuring them that many priests of his acquaintance desired their people to read the Bible. As a proof of the sincerity of his desire Dr. Wittmann, founded in 1803 the Roman-Catholic Regensburg (Ratisbon) Bible Society. Dr. Wittmann himself translated the New Testament into German. The priest Gossner in Munich, and Leander van Es (see title), the celebrated Benedictine monk and professor-extraordinary at the University of Marburg, also furnished translations, which were printed by the society, and zealously spread. The Freiherr von Wessenberg and Bishop Sailer gave the work their cordial support. But Rome viewed the society with dislike; and a Papal bull, to circulate the Scriptures, was driven out of Munich. Van Es, however, kept on his Bible work, although he resigned his positions in 1822; and, under the patronage of the British and Foreign Bible Society, pushed on his translation of the Bible, and at last published a complete Bible in German in 1840. 4. The Berlin Bible Society was founded Feb. 11, 1806. It owes its origin to the Moravian preacher Junge, who had presented to the British and Foreign Bible Society the great scarcity of Bohemian Bibles. The latter society contributed a large quantity of Bibles and Testaments in Bohemian, Polish, and Lithuanian (since a branch had been established in 1810 in Königsberg). The Berlin Society in August, 1814, was converted into the Prussian Bible Society, and set before itself the circulation of the Scriptures throughout the Kingdom. It now has many branches, and is doing noble work. [Total issues (1880) 4,691,796 copies.]
5. The most of the societies were founded after 1812, and at the incitement of Messrs. Steinkopf and Pinkerton, who repeatedly visited the Continent. In this way was started, 5, the Württemberg Bible Society in February, 1813, which became one of the most flourishing in Germany. [Total issue (1880) 1,493,861.] Others, in Hannover, Saxony, and in the smaller German states, followed; and so in Hungary in 1811, but it was suppressed by a Papal bull.
6. Nor did Switzerland lag behind. After the transfer of the Nürnberg Society to Basel, a great activity was excited. Steinkopf's tour through Switzerland in 1812 awoke great enthusiasm; and Bible societies sprung up everywhere. 7. In 1816, at Latour a Bible Society for the Wal- densians was established. [Issue last reported 4,238.]
8. The United Netherlands Bible Society was founded in 1815 [issue reported (1878) 1,396, [1815]. A Bible society in Scotland was also started. [In France the movement was begun by the London French Bible Society formed in 1792; but the breaking-out of the Revolution effectually checked it. An edition of the New Testament was printed in Paris in 1802 by another English society; but the recommencement of hostilities in 1814 again prevented the Bible's circulation. The reaction in the year 1815 found the Protestants in France ready for bolder work on their own account, and so in 1818 the Protestant Bible Society of Paris was established [issue reported (1881) 624,488]. The subsidies generously granted by the British and Foreign Bible Society were thus brought to a close of the sixth year, because of difference of views in regard to the Apocrypha. In 1826 the British and Foreign voted to exclude from their liberality all those societies which persisted in printing those books. The French society thought to cut the knot by printing Bibles with and without them. The success of this society has also been conditioned by internal strifes; for there are two parties, one contending, that instead of the so-called revision of Ostervald, which is confessedly inaccurate, the text be that of Perret-Gentil for the Old Testament, and, for the New Testament, the Geneva version and that of Arnaud. The result of the internal strife was the formation, in 1834, of the Bible Society of France, which persists in printing the old version, and rejecting the Apocrypha [issues reported (1877), 287,047].
9. In 1831 the Evangelical Bible Society in Scotland went to Copenhagen, there to embark as missionaries to Tranquebar [a town in Hindostan, then a Danish possession]. The plan fell through; but they met Thorikelin, who turned their attention to the need of Bibles among the Icelanders. There were only fifty Bibles in a population of fifty thousand. The two Scotchmen laid the matter before the British and Foreign Bible Society, which promised to defray half the expenses of five thousand Testaments. The printing was begun in 1806 at Fühnen; but the war between Denmark and England abruptly ended it. But in 1812 Henderson received permission to remain in Copenhagen in order to complete the printing of the whole Icelandic Bible; and notwithstanding the war, to correspond with England,—an instance of very marked confidence. On Aug. 8, 1814, the Danish Bible Society was founded [issues reported (1876), 346,926]; in 1815 that of Iceland [issues reported, 10,443].
10. In the Northlands the work of the British and Foreign Bible Society was quite strangely opened up: Messrs. J. Paterson and Ebenezer Henderson (Scottishmen) went to Copenhagen, there to embark as missionaries to Tranquebar [a town in Hindostan, then a Danish possession]. The plan fell through; but they met Thorikelin, who turned their attention to the need of Bibles among the Icelanders. There were only fifty Bibles in a population of fifty thousand. In 1811 the Evangelical Bible Society in Russia was established with the aim of circulating the Bible, without notes, among all Protestants dwelling within the limits of the Russian Empire. Its support comes in the main from...
Dr. Andrew Thomson of Edinburgh, and the Edinburgh Society, were leaders in opposition to the Apocrypha, in regard to which they used very hard language, it was resolved, May 3, 1827, that the fundamental law of the society be fully and distinctly recognised as excluding the circulation of the Apocrypha; and therefore no person or society spreading the Apocrypha could hereafter receive any pecuniary aid from the society. The consequence was, that the societies upon the Continent, where the Apocrypha was universally used, and of which the British Society had founded over fifty, separated themselves from the parent society. Strangely enough the Edinburgh and most of the Scotch societies, though it would seem they had won, themselves succeeded. The society then established agencies in various parts of the Continent. See Apocrypha. The refusal of the society in 1831 to alter its constitution so as to exclude non-Trinitarians, and to withdraw from circulation in France, Spain, and Portugal, Bibles translated from the Vulgate, led to the formation of the Trinitarian Bible Society of France, which, however, had limited operation. The Forty-ninth Annual Report (1880) shows that during the year it received £2,638, 9s., and circulated 37,949 Bibles, Testaments, and portions. Colporters work for it in France, Russia, and Italy.

The present work of the British and Foreign Bible Society is carried on through auxiliary and branch societies, gradually formed in every district of the United Kingdom and in the colonies; agents, who at home and abroad investigate local requirements, and supply information for the guidance of the committee; depôts for the sale of the Bible in almost every town in England and in many places abroad; colporters, to some extent in England, and very largely on the Continent and in India; and, lastly, by grants to societies, especially to those of a missionary or philanthropic nature, also in aid of Bible translations. The Seventy-seventh Annual Report was presented May 4, 1881. During the year the receipts were £299,510, and the issues £2,846,029; or, from the beginning, 91,014,448. Its president is the Earl of Shaftesbury. C. SCHOELL.

III. Bible Societies of the United States of America. (1) The American Bible Society was suggested by the success of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and was the union of many existing organizations. In 1777, during the Revolutionary War, Congress were memorialized to print thirty thousand copies of the Bible in order to supply the demand. But, owing to the want of type and paper, they could not be printed, and hence the Committee on Commerce was empowered to import twenty thousand copies from Holland, Scotland, or elsewhere, at the expense of Congress. In consequence of the embargo, this scheme could not be carried out; and in 1782, on another memorial, a committee reported, recommending a Bible printed by Robert Atiken in Philadelphia. But Bibles were not in those times printed in sufficient quantity, nor at low enough rates of sale. At first the society for the supply of the Bible was formed in Philadelphia. The idea was quickly taken up everywhere; so that in June, 1816, a hundred and twenty-eight Bible societies were reported. The credit of the idea of uniting these societies into one seems due to the Rev. Samuel J. Mills, who reported the spiritual destitution of the West and South-west in 1813; but the first one to take active measures in such a direction was the Hon. James Boudinot, president of the New Jersey Bible Society, who in Jan. 1, 1816, made the first public communication in favor of a national Bible movement. The New York Bible Society was the first to follow it by formal action. Mr. Boudinot issued a circular dated Jan. 17, 1816, and appointed Wednesday, May 8, 1816, and New York, as the time and place for holding the convention. Accordingly sixty delegates, representing twenty-eight Bible societies of various sections of our country, and of various denominations (Congregational, Presbyterian, Protestant-Episcopal, Methodist-Episcopal, Reformed Dutch, Baptist, and the Society of Friends), met, and adopted a constitution, and elected the officers and board of managers. Mr. Boudinot was appropriately made the first president.

The list of presidents since then is as follows: Hon. Elias Boudinot, 1816-21; Hon. John Jay, 1821-28; Hon. Richard Varick, 1828-31; Hon. John Cotton Smith, 1831-46; Hon. Theodore Frelinghuyzen, 1846-62; Hon. Luther Bradish, 1862-66; James Cox, 1866-71; William H. Allen, 1872-73; S. Wells Williams, 1881. The Sixty-fifth Annual Report was presented May 12, 1881. The total receipts were $606,484. The number of volumes of the Scripture printed at the Bible House, New York, was 1,085,069; thus divided,—Bibles, 974,646; New Testaments, 648,980; portions, 111,770; volumes for the blind, 200; besides 273,983 printed abroad for the society, or during the sixty-five years of its existence, 58,882,811.

The society is conducted by a board of managers, composed of thirty-six laymen, of whom one-fourth go out of office every year, but are re-elected, and so, as a matter of fact, they remain. Every clergyman who is a life-member of the society, if lie be not entitled to receive any salary, emolument, or compensation for services from the society, is entitled to meet and vote with the board of managers, and be possessed of the same powers as a manager himself. The officers consist of a president, about thirty vice-presidents, three secretaries, a treasurer, an assistant treasurer, and a general agent. In connection with the main societies there are auxiliaries, which collect money, carry on local Bible distribution, and promote interest in the Bible cause. The number of such auxiliaries in 1880 was about two thousand.

The history of the American Bible Society is not a record of unbroken peaceable labor. Two serious storms have imperiled its existence. The first of these troubles arose in 1835, when it was learned that Dr. Judson and his coadjutors had published, at the expense of the society, in their Burmese translation of the New Testament, a translation instead of a transliteration of the Greek words baptismos, baptizo; rendering them by immersion and to immerse. After long consideration of the matter, the managers Resolved, "That in appropriating money for the translating, printing, or distributing of the Sacred Scriptures in foreign languages, the managers feel at liberty to encourage only such versions as conform in the principle of their translation to the common English version, at least so far as that all the religious denominations represented in this society can consistently use and circulate said versions in their several schools and communities." This resolution was communicated to the several missionary boards receiving appropriations from the society, with the request, that, in applying for aid, they would state that the versions they proposed to circulate were in accordance with the resolution. Many of the Baptists took offense at this resolution. A controversy ensued, and the practical effect was the formation of a rival Bible society. See below American and Foreign Bible Society.

The second trouble spoken of came from an entirely different source. In 1847 the attention of the board of managers was called to the discrepancies found in different editions of the English Bible in respect to the use of Italic words, capital letters, and the article a or an. The Committee on Versions were instructed to undertake a careful collation. Their final report was made May 1, 1851, and in it they stated, that, in collating five standard copies of English and American imprint with the original edition of 1611, nearly twenty-four thousand variations were recorded, solely in the text and punctuation, not one of which marred the integrity of the text, or affected any doctrine or precept of the Bible. The standard determined upon by the committee at first met with the unanimous approval of the board of managers and the public. All the new editions were conformed to it, and for several years these Bibles were circulated without the slightest objection. The fact was, the changes in the text introduced by the committee were very few and slight; their great object being to secure uniformity, and not to touch the original version, except in cases of evident inadvertence or inconsistency, open and manifest to all. A few proper names were conformed to the Old Testament spelling, as Judah for Juda, Sinai for Sina, Zion for Sion, Noah for Noe, seraphim for seraphims, etc. As Dr. Charles Hodge said, "Not one reader in a thousand would notice the alterations, unless they were pointed out." Other alterations consisted in changing the chapter-headings, so as to make them a little more descriptive, or, as in the Song of Solomon, less of a comment. For a time all went well; but in the fall of 1856 the Rev. A. C. Coxe, then of Baltimore, now Bishop of Western New York, questioned the right of the society to make these alterations, and in January, 1857, published a pamphlet, in which he charged the society with having made twenty-four thousand changes in the version of 1611. This to his excited mind proved that the demon of rationalism, "exorcised from its German haunts," had governed the society. The pamphlet did its work. It stirred up great excitement. The Old School Assembly of 1857 debated the matter, and instructed the members of the public to resist and instruct the society to withdraw the alterations from the Bible. Dr. Hodge wrote an article on the subject in The Princeton Review, July, 1857. So great was the opposition excited, that the board of managers were compelled to bow before the storm. Among the soberest men the question was merely one of constitutional authority,—had the society the power to introduce changes from the Bible of 1611? It was finally decided it had not. Accordingly on Jan. 28, 1858, the board "Resolved, That this Society's present standard English Bible be referred to the standing committee on versions for examination; and in all cases where the same differs in the text or its accessories from the Bibles previously published by the society, the committee are directed to correct the same by conforming it to previous editions printed by this society, or by the authorized British presses, reference being also had to the original edition of the translators printed in 1611; and to report such corrections to this board, to the end that a new edition, thus perfected, may be adopted as the standard edition of the society." The committee reported in 1859 and 1860; and from this "standard edition" all English Bibles are now printed. The relation of the Bible Society to the Revised Version is at present (1851) much discussed. The constitution of the Society would have to be altered before it could adopt the Revised Version. The names of Johannes Morinus and Ludovicus Cappellus, who, in the interest of pure historicity, combine in a certain period by Jewish scholars. But, concerning the time and the principles of these changes, there was in the seventeenth century great difference of opinion among Christian (mainly Protestant) Hebrew scholars. On the one side stood the Buxtorfs (father and son) and their party, who held, in the interest of the then prevalent views of inspiration, to the absolute completeness and infallibility, and hence exclusive value, of the Massoretic text; and, further, attributed that text to Ezra and the Men of the Great Synagogue (Sopherim), who, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, cleansed the text of all accumulated error, added the vowel-points, the accents, and other punctuation-marks, thus settling the reading and pronunciation; also made the right division into verses, paragraphs, and books; and, finally, they held, that, by the care of God, the text thus made has been kept from all error, and presents to-day the veritable words of God. On the other side was the party of Johannes Morinus and Ludovicus Cappellus, who, in the interest of pure historicity, combated these opinions, maintained with equal learning the later age of the Massoretic text, and, sought to establish the supreme value of the old versions and other critical helps. They fell into many errors in respect to the details of the history of the text; but their general view was supported by irresistible arguments, and is now universally adopted. This view, instead of denying the existence and truth of any gathering of inspired men in Ezra's time, assigns it to a much later date and quite different men, and, instead of absolute, claims for it only a relative, completeness, and a higher value than other forms of the text. A glance at the history of the text will show why this agreement has been brought about.

BIBLE TEXT—Old Test.
Era, therefore, may have influenced the use of the Aramaic alphabet; but the square character was not formed in his day, nor for centuries afterwards; nor was the Aramaic alphabet then used outside of the narrow circle of doctors of the law. Math. x. 18 is commonly quoted in proof of the completion of the present Hebrew alphabet in the first century; but the recently-studied Palestinian inscriptions for the century before and after the destruction of Jerusalem give clearer evidence. The Talmud lays down minute rules on this subject, and therefore the writing of the manuscripts scarcely varies a particle through centuries.

(b) As soon as the Scriptures obtained canonical authority, and were used in divine service, the variations between the manuscripts would be observed, and the necessity of having one standard text would be apparent. The preparation of such a text began with the Law, and that among the Jews in Babylon; but the other two divisions of the canon (the Prophets and the Hagiographa) were probably not reached in this way; i.e., they were never held in as high esteem. In the oldest critical sources, in the Samaritan Pentateuch and in the Septuagint, we have evidence, from the end of the fifth century before, to the second after Christ, to show that the widest-spread and most approved manuscripts differed verbally a good deal. And these variations are not to be set down to the charge of carelessness or wilfulness on the part of the Hellenistic Jews and Samaritans, as was the old opinion, but are explained by the less weight then put upon exact uniformity of the text, and the existence of the mistakes in current copies. And when the Septuagint and the Samaritan Pentateuch agree in good readings, and still oftener in bad ones, against the Massoretic text, we are to conclude that these readings were spread by many copies current among the Palestine Jews, and are therefore not to look upon them as offensive or thoroughly unreliable. But after the destruction of Jerusalem, when Judaism was held under the authority of the rabbins, it became possible to prepare a uniform standard text, although this idea was not realized until many generations had worked upon it. But the progress toward it can be proved. The Greek versions of Aquila and Theodotion, made in the second century, have fewer variations from the Massoretic text than those which preceded them; and the Targums to the Law and the Prophets, made in Babylon in the third and fourth centuries, have still less. (The supposition is groundless that the later Jews corrected their text according to the Targums.) Still nearer the Massoretic text is Origen's. The Talmud itself bears witness, by its biblical quotations agreeing with the Massoretic text, that the consonantal text was practically finished before the Talmudic era closed.

We are not able to say upon what principles the work was done; but the way in which they have preserved the individuality of the several authors is remarkable, and shows that these critics would, on dogmatic grounds, intentionally alter a passage (cf. such verses as Ps. xxii. 18; Isa. xix. 18, liii. 9). We know nothing concerning the number or quality of the manus-
The development of the pronunciation, orthography, and verse and paragraph making, of the text, kept equal pace with its settlement. From its original composition down to the close of the Talmud, it was unvocalized and unpunctuated. The last verse of a particular section of the Greek and Josephus, depart so widely from the Massoretic text, that they settle this point. If only one differed, it were explicable; but they all differ in ways that could not happen if the present spelling were in use. Origen printed a text differing in pronunciation from the Massoretic. Jerome knew nothing about vowel-signs, not even the diacritical point over the skin. The Talmud, and so, at the present day, the public or holy manuscripts of the Jews, present an unpunctuated text. The pronunciation was not variable, however, but developing steadily towards the present system. Of course time was required to bring it into vogue; but before the end of the period it was so firmly established, that Jerome's pronunciation differed very little from the Massoretic, and he was so sure of its correctness, that he appeals to it at the text of the Version; and the Talmud gives it throughout correctly. Before the Massoretes, there was the pronunciation, not yet written, but handed down by word of mouth, although some scholars may have used sigmas in their books to help their memory.

Closely connected and mutually dependent were the pronunciation and the division of words. The latter was finished in this period. The Samaritan Pentateuch, in which each word is separated from its neighbor by a punctuation-mark; the Septuagint, which, indeed, does depart frequently in its division from the Massoretes text, but only in the case of words which might be written closer together without any loss of legibility; the Targums, which have the same word-divisions as the Massoretes; and, again, the "final letters" of the square character, are cumulative proof of the correctness of the above statement.

The third step — the division into verses — was also taken in this period. The study of the text, the custom of reading the Law and the Prophetic books in the synagogue, would make such division imperative. In the Talmud it appears to be already completed. Often the number of verses in particular books or paragraphs is given, and it nearly agrees with the Massoretes. The division of the verses in the poetical books was perhaps original, certainly very early; but, when the Massoretes introduced the accents, poetry was written close, like prose. This verse-division and counting was taught in the schools; but no rules are given for it, nor did any punctuation marks indicate it.

Earlier than the division into verses is that into sections of larger or smaller length, because these were more necessary for the understanding of the Scriptures, and their reading in divine worship. Perhaps some of them were in the original text. The sections of the Law were at least pre-Talmudic; for in the Mishna, and frequently in the Gemara, they are mentioned, and in the latter they are traced to Mosaic origin, and exist in synagogue-rolls. They were indicated by spacing — the larger sections, by leaving the remainder of the line at their close; the next section beginning with a new line, on which account they were called "open" sections: the smaller sections were separated from each other only by a small space, and were therefore called "closed."

For the divisions of the whole canon, and the arrangement of the books, see article Canon.

Extraordinary pains were taken before the Massoretes to perpetuate in its purity the text thus divided and vocalized. We find in the Talmud regulations for the mode of writing not only the ordinary, but the so-called "extraordinary," characters, which denoted the middle letter of a book, or served some purpose now unknown, or which were only by accident in the text.

3. The third period of the textual history of the Old Testament is the Massorete, usually reckoned as extending from the sixth until the eleventh century, when the Jewish scholars removed from the East to North Africa and Spain. This period embraces the age of the Massoretes proper, and has for the Bible-text the same importance as the Talmudic period had for the Law. The word Massoretes means "the Men of the Great Synagogue," and by them deduced from primitive scriptos of the Jews, present an unpointed text. But many of these K'ris were called "open," sections: the smaller sections were separated from each other only by a small space, and were therefore called "closed."

For the divisions of the whole canon, and the arrangement of the books, see article Canon.

Extraordinary pains were taken before the Massoretes to perpetuate in its purity the text thus divided and vocalized. fixed and official form. There were two chief schools working, however, together,—the Babylonian and Palestinian (at Tiberias). We readily understand their origin. They met the growing demand after accuracy. (See MASSORA.) They depended upon the existing materials, and built upon them. But a great part of their product was new.

(a) They took the "textus receptus" just as it stood, but in places made a few changes, and at all events gave it its settled form by minute attention to the writing of the consonants. They also appended critical notes upon the text, in part derived from the Talmudic period, but in part new, especially the "grammatical conjectures," showing that where, according to the grammar and the genius of the language, one should expect another reading, nevertheless the text should stand. Finally the great majority of the K'raa date from the Masoretes.

(b) The Massoretes fixed the reading of the text by the introduction of the vowel-signs, the accents, and the signs which affect the reading of the consonants (dagesh forte, mappik, rapha, and the diacritical point). And the pronunciation they thus brought about was not an invention, but the purest tradition. A striking proof is the unanimity of the Babylonian and Palestinian schools working independently. The systems were different (that of the latter was more complicated, although destined to gain and keep the ascendency), yet the result was substantially the same. The former was fully developed about the middle of the eighth century; the latter, in the seventh century. From the eleventh century the Jews have pretended that their pronunciation was primitive.

(c) The divisions of the text into verses and paragraphs made in the former period were retained, and only slightly modified. At the beginning of this period the end of the verses was marked by the Soph Paasik (), and, when the accents were introduced, by Sillak besides. The old sections (divisions for public reading) were also retained; but in addition there were introduced some fifty-three or fifty-four large sections of the Pentateuch (Parshiyoth) for sabbath public reading, and the Haphtaroth, sections from the prophets.

(d) But even these efforts could not entirely remove variations. Hence, before the end of this period, the doctors either attempted to find out by an elaborate comparison the correct punctuation, and fix it, or marked the important variations in the punctuation, or added a caution to each apparently wrong and yet correct punctuation. The mass of notes which the Massoretes added to the text relate to these matters. The notes in two main columns were gained which quickly were shared by all; and to-day, outside of the synagogue-rolls, all Hebrew is read by means of them. See MASSORA.

4. Since the Masoretes closed their labors, the history of the Hebrew text is the record of the efforts made to hold fast to and perpetuate the Massoretic text. The manuscripts may be divided into two classes,—the public or holy, and the private or common. The first are synagogue-rolls, and have been prepared so carefully, and watched so closely, that the possibility of variation and error is reduced to a minimum. But they contain only the Pentateuch, or also the five Megilloth (Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther) and the Haphtaroth, contain the text of the Massoretes, without their additions, and are, for the most part, of recent origin, although antique in form, being written upon leather or parchment. The private manuscripts are written upon the same material, but also upon paper, in book-form, with the Massoretic additions, vowel-points, etc.,—complete, the so-called Greater Massora, or, abridged, the Less. As a general thing, the consensual text, the points, the K'riss, and other additions, frequently including translations and rabbinical commentary, are written by different hands. It is often difficult, and indeed impossible, to determine the date and nationality of a manuscript; but none of the manuscripts now known are really very old. The oldest authentic date is A.D. 916 for the Prophet Codex, and A.D. 1069 for an entire Hebrew Bible, both of which are preserved in the Imperial Library of St. Petersburg.

The oldest are generally the more accurate. The number of errors which crept in awakened solicitude, and led to well-directed efforts to get a pure text. In this line the labors of Meir ha Levi of Toledo (d. 1244) upon the Pentateuch text are renowned. But the art of printing opened a way of escape from copyists' errors, and very early it was taken. The first book to appear was a Psalter, in 1477, the first complete Bible at Soncino in 1488. Luther's Old Testament was translated from the edition of this Bible, which appeared at Brescia in 1494. The first edition of the Bomberg Rabbinical Bible and the Bomberg hand-editions contain substantially the same text. The second independent edition derived from manuscripts is that in the Complutensian Polyglot (1514–17). The text is vocalized, but not accented. The third important recension is the second edition of the Bomberg Rabbinical Bible, cura R. Jacob ben Chajjin, Venet., 1555-26, corrected according to the Massora, which, indeed, it contains. This contains the various readings collected by Aaron ben Asher. It was frequently republished in the sixteenth century. The edition of Jos. Athias, cum praef. Jo. Leusdenii, 1661, rested upon some very old manuscripts, and, with improvements, was re-issued in 1705 by Van der Hooght; and this edition has remained the standard. The most recent attempt at a revised text is that of A.H. Sayles and J. Delitzsch. The edition was separatedly the Books of Genesis, Job, the Psalms, Proverbs, Isaiah, the minor Prophets, 1861-80. II. The New Testament. 1. History of the Written Text. The autographs of the New Testament very early disappeared, owing to the action of constant use upon the perishable papyrus; for this appears to have been the material (2 John ver. 12). If they were really not in the handwriting of the apostles, but in that of their amanuenses, as we know Paul's Epistles generally were (Rom. xvi. 22; 2 Thess. iii. 17), then it is the easier to account for the phenomenon. The papyrus rolls preserved to the present day were never much used: indeed, the most of them have been found in sarcophagi, and so, of course, were never used at all. The ink was lampblack mixed with gum dissolved in water; copperas (sulphate of iron) being sometimes added. The pens were of reed (calamus). The writing was entirely in uncialis (capitals), with no separation of the words (except rarely to indicate the beginning of a new paragraph), no breathings, accents, or distinction of initial letters, and few, if any, marks of punctuation. The evangelists may have used some combinatorial exercises "Gospels," although Justin regularly speaks of the "Memoirs by the Apostles;" but all addition to the name is later, and presupposes a collection of the Gospels. In the case of the Epistles the brief address, e.g., To the Romans, was probably added by the original sender, and other marks of genuineness given (cf. 2 Thess. iii. 17). The Muratorian Fragment (second half of the second century) calls our Acts and Apocalypse by these names, and so proves the early use of these designations. The designation "Catholic (General) Epistle," is first met with at the close of the second century (Apollonius in Euseb., Hist. v. 18, § 5, where the First Epistle of John is probably meant). The application and limiting of the term to the whole of our present collection is of later date; for even in the third and fourth century it was customary to give this term to ecclesiastical epistles, like that of Barnabas, or those of Dionysius of Corinth, which were not specially addressed.

The external history of the New Testament text for a thousand years prior to the invention of printing can be traced by means of manuscripts. Before the formal close of the canon (end of fourth century) there were probably few single manuscripts of the entire New Testament. Of the thousand known manuscripts of the New Testament, only about thirty include all the books. Some of those of the fourth and fifth century now preserved contain not only the Greek Old Testament (â€” A B C), but also writings which, though not canonical, were read in churches, and studied by catechumens. Thus attached to the Codex Sinaiticus (â€”) were the Epistle of Barnabas and the Shepherd of Hermas; to the Codex Alexandrinus (A), two "epistles" ascribed to Clement of Rome [the second spurious, and not an epistle, but a homily], and the so-called Psalterium Salomonis. The four Gospels were most frequently copied, the Pauline Epistles of Barnabas and the Shepherd of Hermas; to the Codex Alexandrinus (A), two "epistles" ascribed to Clement of Rome [the second spurious, and not an epistle, but a homily], and the so-called Psalterium Salomonis. The four Gospels were most frequently copied, the Pauline Epistles, the Acts, and the Catholic Epistles: the Apocalypse always last. The arrangement of the Epistles differed:

Indeed, there was no model. [On the various arrangements, see particularly Credner's Ge- schichte des N. T. Kanon, herausg. von Volkmar (1890), p. 399 ff. and Gregory's Prolegomena zu Tischendorf's 8th ed. of the Gr. Test. pp. 191 sqq. De librorum ordine.]

The use of parchment or vellum prevailed from the fourth to the eleventh century; then came in cotton, and afterwards linen paper (cf. Wattenbach, Diss. Schriftenes im Mittelalter, 2te Aufl. pp. 114 sq.). The growing scarcity of parchment led to the re-use of the old skins, the former writing being erased or washed off; and unfortunately it often happened that it was a biblical manuscript which was thus turned into a patristic one than the reverse. Such manuscripts are termed Codices palimpsesti or rescripti. In many cases, by the use of chemicals, the original text has been recovered in modern times. The most famous New Testament palimpsest is the Codex Ephraemi, of the fifth century, re-written upon in the twelfth. As papyrus disconnected the rolls, vellum generally substituted for the rolls, in manuscripts written on parchment or paper. The books were mostly made up of quaternious, i.e., quires of four sheets, doubled so as to make sixteen pages, less frequently of five, though later quires of six sheets were common. The division of the page into columns was at first retained, two being the usual number (e.g., Cod. Alex.); but in many manuscripts (e.g., Cod. Ephraemi) the lines run across the page. Exceptionally, it has four columns, B three. From the seventh and eighth centuries the present accents were more or less used, but very arbitrarily and irregularly. The uncials gradually changed their earlier simple round or square forms, and from the tenth century yielded to the cursives. The earliest punctuation was by means of a blank space and a simple point. Eusebius, a deacon in Alexandria, in the year 438 published an edition of the Epistles of Paul, and soon after of the Acts and Catholic Epistles, written stichometrically, i.e., in single lines containing only so many words as could be read, consistently with the sense, at a single glance, and therefore better adapted to the medieval form of education. The roll form was used long before in copying the poetical books of the Old Testament. It involved, however, a great waste of parchment, so that, in manuscripts of the New Testament, it was superseded after a few centuries by punctuation-marks.

[Divisions of the text were early made for various purposes. In the third century Ammonius of Alexandria prepared a Harmony of the Gospels, taking the text of Matthew as the basis, and placing by its side in parallel columns the similar passages in the other Gospels. This of course destroyed the continuity of their narrative. Eusebius of Caesarea, in the early part of the fourth century, availing himself of the work of Ammonius, devised a method of comparing the parallel passages not open to this objection. He divided the text of each Gospel into sections, the length of the Catholic Epistles varying greatly (in John xix. 6 there are three, and in twenty-four other instances two, in a single verse), was determined solely by their relation of parallelism or similarity to passages in one or more of the other Gospels, or by their having no parallel. These see...
In the Acts and Epistles the Vatican manuscript has a twofold division into chapters,—one very ancient, the other later, but both different from the Euthalian. In the older division, the Pauline Epistles are treated as one book. (For further details see Tischendorf, N. T. Var. 1867, p. xxx; Scrivener, Intr. 2d ed., 152.) Other ancient divisions of the New Testament into chapters were more or less widely current, especially in Latin and Syriac manuscripts.

The subscriptions at the end of the Pauline Epistles in many manuscripts are generally ascribed to Euthalius. At least six of these are untrustworthy (1 Cor., Gal., 1 and 2 Thess., 1 Tim., Tit.).

The division of the Bible into our present chapters has been generally attributed to Cardinal Hugo de Sancto Caro (Hugues de St. Cher), a Dominican monk (d. A.D. 1263) who used it for his great concordance of the Latin Vulgate. But there appear to be much better grounds for ascribing it to Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1228). (See Dr. C. R. Gregory's Prolegomena to the eighth critical edition of Tischendorf's N. T. Gr.) It is found only in very late Greek manuscripts. The division of the New Testament into our present verses was made by Robert Stephens (Estienne, Stephanus) in his N. T. gr. et lat., printed at Geneva, in 1551. An earlier division of the New Testament into verses about three times as long, by Sanctes Pagninus, in his Latin translation of the Bible (Lyons, 1528), did not find favor. The whole Bible was first divided into our present verses in Robert Stephens's edition of the Latin Vulgate in 1555 (not 1548, or 1545, or 1538, as stated by many writers). The first English New Testament so divided was Whittingham's translation, Geneva, 1557; the first English Bible, the Genevan version of 1560.

Another ancient division of the New-Testament text remains to be noticed,—the lessons, or lections (ἀναγνώσεις, ἀναγνώσματα, τεκμονια), from the Greek Gospels on the one hand, and the Acts and Epistles on the other. The division of the lessons in their order; sometimes also a list prefixed to each Gospel, or often in both places. A certain portion at the beginning of each Gospel is not numbered; for example, the first chapter in Matthew corresponds with our chap. ii. 1-15, and is entitled πρὸς τοὺς μάγους ("Concerning the Magi"). There is a similar division in the Acts and Epistles, to which Euthalius (cir. A.D. 458), though not its inventor, gave wide currency by his stichometric edition of these books. The Apocalypse was divided by Andreas, Bishop of Cassarea in Cappadocia (cir. A.D. 500), into twenty-four ἁγία, or chapters, and each of these chapters into three κεφαλάς, or sections, the former number answering to the twenty-four elders spoken of in the book (Rev. iv. 4); the latter suggested by the threefold division of human nature into body, soul, and spirit (comp. 1 Thess. v. 23), as the author himself tells us.

In the Vatican manuscript (B), there is a division of the Gospels into much shorter chapters (Matt. 170, Mark 62, Luke 152, John 80), very judiciously made. This has been found in only one other manuscript, the Codex Zacynthius (E).
Turning to the internal history of the New Testament text, it is evident that its original perfect purity was early lost. The quotations of the latter half of the second century contain readings which agree with later texts, but are not apostolic. Ireneus alludes (Adv. haer. V. 30, § 1) to the difference between the copies; and Origen, early in the third century, expressly declares that matters were growing worse (in Matt. xii. 31), as is proved by the quotations of the Fathers of the third and fourth centuries. From this time onward we have the manuscript text of each century, the writings of the Fathers, the various Oriental and Occidental versions, all testifying to varieties of reading for almost every verse, which undoubtedly occasioned many more or less important departures from the sense of the original text. How came this? The early Church did not know any thing of that anxious clinging to the letter which characterizes the scientific rigor and the piety of modern times, and therefore was not so bent upon preserving it; but in the New Testament copies were made rather for private than for public use: copyists were careless, often wrote from dictation, and were liable to misunderstand. Attempted improvements of the text in grammar and style; proposed corrections in history and geography; efforts to harmonize the quotations in the New Testament with the Greek of the Septuagint, but especially to harmonize the Gospels; the writing-out of abbreviations; incorporation of marginal notes in the text; the embellishing of the Gospel narratives with stories drawn from non-apostolic though trustworthy sources, e.g., John vii. 53 to viii. 11, and Mark xvi. 9 to end,—it is to these causes that we must attribute the very numerous "readings," or textual variations. It is true that the copyists were sometimes learned men; but perhaps their zeal in making corrections may have obscured the true text as much as the ignorance of the unlearned. The copies, indeed, came under the eye of an official reviser; but he may have sometimes exceeded his functions, and done more harm than good by his changes.

Attempts were made by learned Fathers to get the pure text; and three men of the third century—Origen, the Egyptian Bishop Ileschius, and the Presbyter Lucian of Antioch—deserve mention for their devotion to this object. The two last undertook a sort of recension of the New Testament (see Jerome, Epist. ad Donum); but we do not know exactly what they did, and their influence was small. In regard to Origen, while he did not make a formal recension of the New Testament text, his critical work was of the highest importance. Notwithstanding these diversities, there were, as early as the fourth and fifth centuries, affinities between manuscripts, prepared in the same district, which seem to betray certain tendencies, as is proved by the Fathers, the versions, and the Greek manuscripts themselves. This somewhat justifies us in speaking of an Oriental and Occidental, or, more correctly, an Alexandrian or Egyptian, and a Latin, as well as a Hebrew or Greek, and a Byzantine or Constantinopolitan text. According to this theory, the Alexandrian was used by those Jewish Christians of the East who already used the Septuagint: particularly was this text preserved and spread by the learned Alexandrian school. The Latin text characterizes not only the manuscripts of Western Europe, and prepared and circulated as they used. The Asiatic manuscripts were used chiefly by native Greeks in Greece, or in the Asiatic provinces having intercourse with Greece. The Byzantine manuscripts belonged to the Church of that empire. The latter alone had a certain uniformity, which in the fifth and sixth centuries, almost the only manuscripts circulated in the empire. This class of manuscripts is also the only one perfectly represented in existing documents, and is the result of the gradual mixture of older recensions under the predominating influence of an Oriental or Greek. Each of these recensions is more or less altered and corrupted; so that it is often more difficult to assign a particular reading to its proper class than to find out the original. Finally, the differences and relationships are by far most strongly marked in the Gospels, least so in the Apocalypse, and again smaller in the Epistles and the Gospels; and the Acts than in the Catholic Epistles. (See Tischendorf, Not. Test. Graec. Editio Aed. Dom. XIX., Lips., 1857, p. xxiv. seqq.)
Tregelles designates the manuscript by the letter Q. The Latin tert. represents the oldest version,— that of the second century. It stichometrically. It was retouched at different times, and edited by Sabalon (1784), and have been edited in facsimile by Sabalon (SPECIM. PALOMAR. MOSCOW, 1865). They are included in a MS in Tischendorf's GREEK TESTAMENT, seventh edition (1875).

(1) Codex Apollinaris of the Pauline Epistles (ninth century), now in Paris. Contains parts of Heb., 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and part of 1 Thess. 2, 3,4. Contains part of Heb. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and part of 1 Thess. 2, 3, 4. Written in red. Edited by Tischendorf in ANTIQ. BACH. ET PRP., 1855, and with a few corrections, 1861.

(2) Codex Buxtorfianus of the Pauline Epistles (ninth century), now in Moscow (S. Syn. 1, 2). Contains parts of Heb., 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and part of 1 Thess. 2, 3, 4. Contains part of Heb. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and part of 1 Thess. 2, 3, 4. Written in red. Edited by Tischendorf in ANTIQ. BACH. ET PRP., 1855, and with a few corrections, 1861.

The Vatican, exists only in manuscript in the Vatican Library. The manuscript was published by Ford in his APPEND. CODEX. In 1845, it was collated by Tischendorf (1843) and Tregelles (1846). The codex was now at the close of the second century. Notice the traces of the old writing under the later characters. (2) Codex Buxtorfianus, now in the British Museum, containing part of the text, is the oldest version,— that of the second century. It stichometrically. It was retouched at different times, and edited by Sabalon (1784), and have been edited in facsimile by Sabalon (SPECIM. PALOMAR. MOSCOW, 1865). They are included in a MS in Tischendorf's GREEK TESTAMENT, seventh edition (1875).

Tischendorf used in his eighth edition of the New Testament and in his ninth century, now in Paris. Brought from the East to St. Petersburg by Tischendorf and Tregelles, and printed in 1847. (2) Codex Buxtorfianus (eighth century), now in Moscow (S. Syn. 1, 2). Contains parts of Heb., 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and part of 1 Thess. 2, 3, 4. Contains part of Heb. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and part of 1 Thess. 2, 3, 4. Written in red. Edited by Tischendorf in ANTIQ. BACH. ET PRP., 1855, and with a few corrections, 1861.
BIBLE TEXT — New Test.

BACH, ET PROP. 1855. 06 at Oxford. 06 at Verona, the Greek text in Roman letters (ed. Bianchini, 1740), 06 at Zurich, on purple vellum in silver letters (ed. Tischendorf, Mon. Sac. Ined. N. C., vol. ii., col. 367). 06 at St. Gall and St. Petersburg (collated by Tischendorf). 06 of the Pauline Epistles, a leaf (sixth century), which incomparably excels Epiph. 16-134. Collected by Tischendorf and Tregelles (Mon. SACR. IN ED. N. C., vol. ii., 1857).

P(2): Codex Forschius of the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse (ninth century), a palimpsest with fine hiatus; the text particularly good in the last two sections of the Apocalypse, containing fragments of all the Gospels except Galatians. Edited by Tischendorf and Tregelles (Mon. SACR. IN ED. N. C., vol. ii., col. 367).

Q(2): A fragment of Matthew (20th-22nd), resembling the English text; now in the Library of Trinity College, Cambridge. The readings are remarkable. The fragments of the Acts were discovered in 1865, and published in his Mon. SACR. IN ED. N. C., vol. ii., 1857.

R: A fragment (ninth century) of John (vi.13-24), resembling the above.

W: Two fragments of Luke vii., viii., ix., John xi., xii., and John xvi., vii., viii., viii., viii., i.e., the Gospels complete, with occasional scholia in uncials on the margins. The Script. and Text. of the Apocalypse are particularly good.

X: A fragment of Matthew (20th-22nd), resembling the above.

Y: Codex Barcinensis of the Gospel of John, fragmentary (ninth century), a palimpsest containing fragments of John, with a Jativa interlinear translation of the Apocalypse; now in the British Museum. Edited by Tischendorf in Mon. SACR. ET PROF., 1855. Contains the Pauline Epistles, with occasional scholia in uncials on the margins.

Z: A fragment of Matthew (20th-22nd), resembling the above.

A: Codex Tischendorfianus IV. (ninth century), a palimpsest containing fragments (98 verses) of Luke and John; now in the Library of Trinity College, Cambridge. The readings are remarkable.

B: Codex Tischendorfianus II. (ninth century), a palimpsest containing fragments (127 verses) of Luke and John; now in the Library of Trinity College, Cambridge. The readings are remarkable.
In reference to the character of their text, Tischendorf classifies the uncials as follows: in the Gospels the oldest form of the text, predominantly Alexandrine in its coloring, is found, though with many differences, in Ν A B C D T L P Q R T x z δ e ο η. Next to these stand F S N Ο [2] W a b e Y γ a ο s e t. A later form of the text, in which the Asiatic coloring prevails, is presented by E F G H K M P T η θ ι, among which E K M Φ Α Π Γ ι incline most toward the first class. For the Acts and Catholic Epistles, Ν A B C give the oldest text, to which, in the Acts, D I approach, and, less closely, E; also, in the Catholic Epistles (except 1 Pet.), P; while in the Acts, H Λ P [Ο], and, in the Catholic Epistles, K L, come nearest to the later form of the text. In the Pauline Epistles the oldest text is represented by Ν A B C H Π Ο Q [R], with the Greek-Latin manuscripts, D F G; M Π approach this; while K L N stand nearest to the more recent text. The text of the Apocalypse appears in its oldest form in Ν A C, to which P comes nearer than B.

Tregelles exhibits the "genealogy of the text" and affinities of the manuscripts in the Gospels in the following form:

ALEXANDRINE.

BYZANTINE.

B N Z.

D C L R 1 3 3, P Q T R I N X A 0 9, K M H, E F G S U, etc.

Westcott and Hort attach a superlative value to B. — The same manuscript may differ in character in different parts of the New Testament; thus, A is not so excellent in the Gospels as elsewhere; D is specially good in the Gospel of Mark; Ν and D agree most closely in the Gospel of John; the cursive 1 is remarkably valuable in the Gospels, but not so in the rest of the New Testament. — E. A.

[2. History of the Printed Text. — For more than half a century after the invention of printing, the title-page of the New Testament remained unprinted. The credit for the first printed title-page of a complete text belongs to Cardinal XIMENES DE CISNEROS, Archbishop of Toledo, who made it tom. V. of his great Polyglot Bible, printed at Alcalá, in Spain (Latins Complutum, hence the name Complutensian Polyglot), in vols. folio (1514–17). The manuscripts depended upon were comparatively modern and of inferior value. Though the volume is dated June 10, 1514, the New Testament was not published before 1521 or 1522, and thus was preceded by the Greek-Latin New Testament of 1516, published by Froben of Basel, and edited by Erasmus. He used as the basis of his text in the Gospels an inferior Basel manuscript of the fifteenth century (cod. 2), and one of the thirteenth or fourteenth century in the Acts and Epistles (cod. 2). With these he collated more or less carefully one other manuscript of the Gospels (cod. 1), two in the Acts, and four in the Catholic Epistles (codd. 1 and 4), and three in the Pauline Epistles (codd. 1, 4, 7). The oldest of these (cod. 1, tenth century) has a good text in the Gospels; but Erasmus made very little use of it: the others are comparatively modern, and poor. For the Revelation he had only a single manuscript of the twelfth century, wanting the last six verses, which he translated into Greek from the Latin Vulgate. In various other places in the Revelation he followed the readings of the Vulgate in opposition to the Greek, as he did in a few cases elsewhere. The result of the whole is, that in more than twenty places the Greek of the textus receptus, which is derived ultimately in the main from the fourth edition of Erasmus, is supported by the authority of no known Greek manuscript whatever. The first edition of Erasmus was sped through the press with headlong haste ("præcipitatum fuit verius quam editum," as Erasmus himself says) in order that the publisher, Froben, might get the start of the Complutensian. It consequently swarms with errors. A more correct edition was issued in 1519: Mill observed about four hundred changes in the text. For this and later editions, one additional manuscript (cod. 3) was used in the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles. In the third edition (1522) the changes were much fewer; but it is noted for the introductions which call for notice are those of the great printer and scholar, Rob. E. Stephens (Estienne, Stephens). His Greek Testament of 1550, notwithstanding its array of various readings in the margin from fifteen manuscripts and the Complutensian Polyglot, has noted a hundred and nineteen places in which he differs from all of his manuscripts. The first edition of the seven Elzevir editions (1633), in which we find the words, "Textum ergo habes, nunc ab omnibus receptum," has, in the main, been based on Erasmus's reading as Erasmus himself says (in the preface to the second Elzevir edition, 1633, he declared that he had followed Erasmus' readings as being for the most part, Stephens's editions of 1550 or 1551, with changes here and there, many of which are not improvements. Stephens's edition of 1550 is commonly spoken of in England as the textus receptus; but on the Continent the first Elzevir edition, printed at Leyden in 1624, has generally received that designation. The expression is borrowed from the prefacing verse of the textus receptus; but on the Continent the first Elzevir edition, printed at Leyden in 1624, has generally received that designation. The expression is borrowed from the prefacing verse of the textus receptus, as if it were given in the margin.— The edition of Erasmus was sped through the press with headlong haste ("præcipitatum fuit verius quam editum," as Erasmus himself says) in order that the publisher, Froben, might get the start of the Complutensian Polyglot. That of the Complutensian Polyglot (London, 1657), Stephens's Greek text of 1550 was accompanied by the Vulgate, Peshito Syriac, Ethiopic, Arabic, and in parts of the New Testament, other ancient versions, with a critical apparatus including the readings of Codex A, D (1), D (2), Stephens's margin, and eleven curious manuscripts collated by or for Archbishop Ussher. In Bishop Fell's edition (Oxford, 1675), who reprinted substantially the Elzevir text, other authorities, including readings of the Coptic and Gothic versions, are given in the notes, though the titlepage, "ex plus 100 MSS. codicibus," is very much exaggerated. The edition of John Mill (1615-1760), Oxford, 1707, fol., the work of thirty years, marks an epoch in the history of textual criticism by its vast additions to the store of critical materials through the collection of readings from the ancient versions, and especially from the quotations found in the writings of the Christian Fathers, and by its very learned and valuable Prolegomena. Mill gave his judgment on many readings in his notes and Prolegomena, but did not venture to form a text of his own, reprinting Stephens's text of 1550 without intentional variation. — The projected edition of the Greek Testament and Latin Vulgate in parallel columns, by the illustrous critic, Richard Bentley, deserves a brief notice. Proposals for printing were issued in 1720, and a large amount of materials collected at great expense, including a collation of Codex B (published by Ford in 1799); but the work was never completed. It was to have been founded on the oldest Greek and Latin manuscripts, compared with the principal ancient versions and the quotations in the Fathers. See John Albert Bengel's (1687-1752) edition, Tubingen, 1734, 4to, while it had the advantage of some new manuscripts, was specially valuable for its discussions and illustrations of the principles of criticism, and its classification of manuscripts; but, except in the Apocalypse, he did not dare to introduce into his text any reading, even though he believed it unquestionably genuine, which had not previously appeared in some printed edition. His judgment of the value of different readings was, however, given in the margin. — The magnificent edition of Albert Brentz (1690-1734), 2 vols. fol., Amsterdam, 1751-52, the work of forty years, greatly enlarged the store of critical materials by extensive collation of manuscripts and researches into the quotations of the Fathers, and by his description of this material in very valuable and copious Prolegomena, reprinted, with additions by Senler, Halé, 1784. He gives also the readings of the chief printed editions which preceded him, and describes them fully. He in...
Presented the present method of denoting the uncial manuscripts by Roman capitals, and the cursive and lectionaries by Arabic figures. Besides the critical matter, his edition is a thesaurus of quotations from ancient Greek and Latin and rabbinical authors, illustrating the phraseology of the New Testament, or containing passages more or less parallel in sentiment. Bishop Marsh calls it "the invaluable book." His publisher insisted on the Elzevirs); but he gives his critical judgment. Following in the track of Bengel and his reprinting the textus receptus (substantially editions to be briefly mentioned are those of F. C. Alter, Vienna, 1786–87, giving the readings of twenty-four Vienna manuscripts and of four manuscripts of the Slavonic version; of Andrew Birch, Quatuor Evangelia Graece, Copenhagen, 1788, 4to, and Variae Lectiones, 1798, 1800, 1801, exhibiting the readings of many manuscripts collated in the libraries of Italy, Spain, and Germany, by himself and others; and of C. F. Matthel, Nov. Test. Gr. et Latine (Vulg.), Riga, 1792–88, in 12 vols. 8vo, also Nov. Test. Graece, Wittenberg, etc., 1803–07, in 3 vols. 8vo, for which over a hundred manuscripts were used, mostly from the Library of the Holy Synod at Moscow. Matthaei was a careful collator, but a very poor critic; and his manuscripts generally were of inferior quality.

The first edition of John James Griesbach (1745–1812) had been published in 1774–75 (the first three Gospels in synopsis); but we need consider only the second, Halle, 1786–1806, 2 vols.
8vo, in which, though not wholly freed from the fetters of the textus receptus, he first made really good use of the materials gathered by his predecessors, and augmented by his own collections. A manual edition was issued at Leipsic in 1805–06, the text of which, differing somewhat from that of the larger edition, expresses his later critical judgment. Following in the track of Bengel and Semler, Griesbach sought to simplify the process of criticism by classifying his manuscripts and other authorities. He made three classes or recensions,—the Alexandrian, the Western, and the Constantinopolitan or Byzantine,—to the latter of which the mass of later and inferior manuscripts belong. Though his system is not now accepted purely documentary evidence the text current in the Eastern churches in the fourth century, as a basis for criticism. He paid no attention to the textus receptus, and used no cursive manuscripts,
but founded his text wholly on ancient authorities, viz., Cod. Fuldensis, Amiatinus, and other manuscripts (Berlin, 1842–50, 2 vols. 8vo). Lachmann's aim in these editions was not to reproduce the original text according to his best judgment (for this he did conjectural criticism to be necessary in some cases), but to present as far as possible on purely documentary evidence the text current
in the Eastern churches in the fourth century, as a basis for criticism. He paid no attention to the textus receptus, and used no cursive manuscripts,
but founded his text wholly on ancient authorities,
viz., Cod. A B C D E (2) Q T and Z of the Gospels, A B C D E (2) (in the Acts and Catholic Epistles, A B C D (2) G H in the Pauline Epistles, and A B C in the Apocalypse, with the Latin Vulgate, and Codd. a (Vercellensis, fourth century), b (Veronensis, fifth century), and c (Colbertinus, eleventh century) of the Old Latin, for the Gospels, besides the Latin versions of the Greek-Latin manuscripts in the above list, viz., D, D (2), E (2), G (2), also of E (3); of the Fathers he used Irenæus, Origen, Cyprian, Hilary of Poitiers, Lucifer of Cagliari, and in the Apocalypse, Primæus. His attempted task was not fully accomplished, partly because the text of some of the most important manuscripts which he used (B C P Q, and the Latin Codex Amiatinus) had been but very imperfectly collated or edited, partly because the range of his authorities was too narrow, and partly because he was sometimes,
apparently at least, inconsistent in the application of his principles. But he was the first to found a text wholly on ancient evidence (Griesbach disregarded what he deemed unimportant variations from the received text); and his editions, to which harrdt), with the variations of the chief modern editors, parallel passages, etc.; also S. T. Bloomfield's Gr. Test. with English Notes (London, 1832, 9th ed., 1835, 2 vols. 8vo), mark no progress in criticism beyond Griesbach, but rather a retrograde movement. — The same is true of the large edition of the Catholic scholar, J. M. A.

Scholz (Leipzig, 1830–36, 2 vols. 4to), whose extensive travels and researches in libraries enabled him to use no less than nearly two thousand manuscripts (according to Scrivener, 516) to the list of those previously known. But of these, only thirteen were collated entirely; a few others in the greater part; many in only a few chapters; many more simply inspected, or only enrolled in the list. He was a poor critic, and as an editor and collator incredibly careless. He divided his manuscripts into two classes or recensions,—the Alexandrian and the Constantinopolitan, giving the preference to the latter. But in applying his system he was happily inconsistent, particularly in his second volume, and at a later period of his life (1845) abandoned it. His edition met with no favor from intelligent scholars; but in England, where biblical criticism was at its lowest ebb, it was welcomed and praised by many, and its text reprinted.

A new period in the history of textual criticism was inaugurated by the appearance (Berlin, 1831) of a small edition of the Greek Testament by the distinguished classical scholar Charles Lach-mann (1798–1851), followed by a larger edition in which the authorities for the Greek text were supplied by Philip Buttmann, with the Latin Vulgate in the lower margin critically edited from Codd. Fuldensis, Amiatinus, and other manuscripts
(Berlin, 1842–50, 2 vols. 8vo). Lachmann's aim in these editions was not to reproduce the original text according to his best judgment (for this he did conjectural criticism to be necessary in some cases), but to present as far as possible on purely documentary evidence the text current
in the Eastern churches in the fourth century, as a basis for criticism. He paid no attention to the textus receptus, and used no cursive manuscripts,
but founded his text wholly on ancient authorities,
viz., Cod. A B C D E (2) Q T and Z of the Gospels, A B C D E (2) (in the Acts and Catholic Epistles, A B C D (2) G H in the Pauline Epistles, and A B C in the Apocalypse, with the Latin Vulgate, and Codd. a (Vercellensis, fourth century), b (Veronensis, fifth century), and c (Colbertinus, eleventh century) of the Old Latin,
for the Gospels, besides the Latin versions of the Greek-Latin manuscripts in the above list,
viz., D, D (2), E (2), G (2), also of E (3); of the Fathers he used Irenæus, Origen, Cyprian,
Hilary of Poitiers, Lucifer of Cagliari, and in the Apocalypse, Primæus. His attempted task was not fully accomplished, partly because the text of some of the most important manuscripts which he used (B C P Q, and the Latin Codex Amiatinus)
had been but very imperfectly collated or edited,
partly because the range of his authorities was
too narrow, and partly because he was sometimes,
apparently at least, inconsistent in the application of his principles. But he was the first to found a text wholly on ancient evidence (Griesbach disregarded what he deemed unimportant variations
from the received text); and his editions, to which
his eminent reputation as a critic gave wide currency, especially in Germany, did much toward breaking down the superstitious reverence for the textus receptus which had long prevailed. — We come now to the editions of Tischendorf and Tregelles, of which bibliographical notices will be found under their names. Through their combined labors we have a solid basis for a completely critical edition of the Greek Testament in the accurate knowledge, not possessed before, of all our manuscripts of the oldest class (not including lectionaries), comprising many newly discovered, among them the Sinaitic of the fourth century. Tischendorf (1815–74) spent about eight years of his life in travels in search of manuscripts, for which he visited the East three times (in 1844, 1853, and 1859), or in collating with extreme care, or transcribing and preparing for publication, the most important of those in the various libraries of Europe which were before known, but had not been published or thoroughly examined. The following uncial Greek manuscripts (see the list above) were discovered by Tischendorf: Η Σ Π (1852) Tregelles; K (1857) Ta. He ed. 8 vo, p. 31. This was the first edition (1852) of some of the manuscripts which had been discovered by him (see the above list), and the discovery of the great Sinai manuscript, together with the acquisition of much new critical material.

After the publication of the Codex Sinaïticus in 1862, in a magnificent edition in four volumes folio, in facsimile type, with twenty-one plates of actual facsimiles, at the expense of the Russian Government, the edition being limited to three hundred copies, he issued in 1863, in 4to, his Novum Testamentum Sinaicum, in ordinary type, but representing the manuscript line for line, with full Prolegomena, and his N. T. Gr. ex Sinaïtico Codices, Vaticanae et Elzeviriana lec- tiones notata, in 1865, 8vo, with a supplement of additions and corrections in 1870. After some other publications, particularly the second edition of his Synopsis evangelica in 1864, in which the Sinai manuscript was first used, he undertook his last great critical edition of the Greek New Testament, which was issued in eleven parts from October 1864 to 1872, forming two large volumes, 8vo, Nov. Text. Graec, edition octava critica maior, Lipsiae, 1869–72, but without the Prolegomena. This edition far surpassed all that had preceded it in the richness of its critical apparatus, and, as compared with that of 1859, rests much more on the authority of the oldest manuscripts, particularly the Sinaitic. The preparation of the Prolegomena was prevented by a stroke of apoplexy (May 5, 1873), followed by paralysis, which ultimately caused his death (Dec. 7, 1874). After long delays, it was intrusted to an American scholar residing in Leipzig, Dr. C. R. Gregory; and the volume is now (July, 1881) passing through the press. Besides those mentioned above, the most important publications of Tischendorf pertaining to the textual criticism of the New Testament are: Codex Ephraemi Syri rectorum, 1843, 4to (Old Testament part, 1845; Monumenta sacra inedita, 1848, 4to; Evangelium Palaistinum ineditum, 1847, 4to; Codex Athanasiun (Vulg.), 1850, new ed. 1854; Codex Claromontanus, 1832, 4to; Monumenta sacra inedita, Nova Collectio, Vols. 1–VI., IX., 1855–70 (Vols. VII. and VIII. will probably be published hereafter by Gebhardt and Gregory), 4to; Novum Testamentum Palaistinum, 1867, 4to, containing B (2, 1869, 4to; compare Responsa ad columnas Romanas, 1870, 8vo, also Appenzell codici clem. Sinaïticus Sin., Val., Alez., 1867, 4to; Die Sinaiabibel, ihre Entdeckung, Herausgabe und Erwerbung, 1871, large 8vo. His Novum Testamentum triplum (1855), 4to, and the addition of 1854, 2d ed., 1865, is a convenient book, the three parts of which were also issued separately, and in various combinations. The Greek is his own text, with the variations of the textus receptus; the Latin, the Vulgate, critically revised from the oldest manuscripts, with the variations of the Clementine edition; the German the genuine text of Luther, though in modern orthography. Tischendorf also issued many manual editions of the Greek Testament, the three latest in his lifetime being published in 1873 by Tauchnitz, Brockhaus (to match his edition of the Septuagint), and Mendelssohn (Editio academica selecta) respectively. His large editions of 1859 and 1869–72 were issued with the critical apparatus greatly abridged, but giving the chief authorities for all the important various readings, with the titles Editio septi- mum criticum maior (1859), and Editio septi- mum criticum minor (1872–77). The latter still waits (1881) for the Prolegomena. For the more important of his numerous other works, see the article Tischendorf.

dorff. — Samuel Prideaux Tregelles (pron. Tre-gehl'lez), b. Jan. 30, 1813; d. April 24, 1875; ranks next to Tischendorf among scholars of the present century in the importance of his critical labors, and in single-hearted devotion to his chosen task. His first essay in the department of textual criticism was The Book of Revelation in Greek, edited from Ancient Authorities, with a New English Version and Various Readings, London, 1844. In 1818 he issued his Prospectus for a critical edition of the Greek Testament, the text of which was to be founded solely on the authority of the oldest Greek manuscripts, the ancient versions down to the seventh century, and the citations of early ecclesiastical writers, including Eusebius. No account was made of the "received text," or of the great mass of cursive manuscripts. Completeness and accuracy in the exhibition of the evidence of the witnesses used were especially aimed at. Like Tischendorf, Tregelles visited (in 1843–46, 1849–50, and 1862) the principal libraries in Europe for the purpose of collating manuscripts the text of which had not been published. He collated twelve uncials, E G H I' K M R U X Z TA, and the manuscripts, 1, 33, 69; for the Acts H (2) L (2) and 13, 31, 61; for the Pauline Epistles D (2) F (2) L (2) M (2), 17, 37, 47; and the cursives 1 and 14 for the Apocalypse. In many cases Tregelles compared his collations with those of Tischendorf, and settled the differences by a re-examination of the manuscript. In 1861 he edited the Codex Zacynthius (2), republishing in an Appendix the fragments of O. His edition of The Greek New Testament, edited from Ancient Authorities, with their Various Readings in full, and the Latin Version of Jerome, was issued in London in seven successive Parts: I. Matthew, Mark, 1857; II. Luke, John, 1861; III. Acts and Catholic Epistles, 1865; IV. Romans to 2 Thessalonians [III. 3], 1869; V. Hebrews [with 2 Thess. III. 9–18] to Philemon, 1870; VI. Revelation, 1872. Part V. I. Prolegomena and Addenda and Corrigenda, appeared in 1870, four years after his death, edited by Dr. Hort and A. W. Streane. A stroke of paralysis soon after Part II. was completed long delayed the publication of the Third Part. A severer stroke, when he was revising the concluding chapters of the Book of Revelation, disabled him from further labor, so that it was necessary for friends to aid him in the issue of this portion of the work. His text of Jerome was founded on the Codex Amiatinus, which he had personally collated, the variations of the Clementine edition being given in the margin. Though Tregelles added far less than Tischendorf to our store of critical material, he did more to establish correct principles of criticism, and his various writings had a wide and most beneficial influence in England. Besides many articles in Kitch's Journal of Sacred Literature, he published in 1854 An Account of the Printed Text of the Greek New Testament, with Remarks on its Revision upon Critical Principles, and in 1856 Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament, forming part of Vol. IV. of the tenth and later editions of Tischendorf's works. A second edition of this volume was also issued separately, and, in the eleventh edition of Horne's Introduction (1861), appeared with "Additions" and a "Postscript." Both of these works are of great value. — Henry Alford (1810–71), Dean of Canterbury, in his Greek Testament (vol. I., London, 1849, 6th ed., 1868; vol. iv., 1861, 4th ed., 1871), gave a critically revised text, with a digest of various readings. The work was really improved as regards the text (especially of vol. I.) in the later editions, in which he adopted substantially the principles of Tischendorf and Tregelles, giving more weight, however, to internal considerations. — The first volume of the long-awaited edition of the Greek Testament by Dr. B. F. Westcott and Dr. F. J. A. Hort was published in England, May, 1881, in the same month with the revised New Testament, and reprinted from duplicate plates in New York with an Introduction by Dr. Schaff. The second volume, containing the authors' Introduction and Appendix, followed soon after. This edition is not accompanied with any critical apparatus: it has rather been the object of the authors, by a careful study of the materials furnished by their predecessors, augmented somewhat, however, by their own researches, to trace the history of the text as a whole, to distinguish its different types, and determine their relations and their comparative value, to investigate the special characteristics of the most important documents and groups of documents, and, finally, to apply the principles of criticism which result from these studies to the determination of the original text. They have been more or less steadily engaged in this task for about twenty-eight years; and though their view of the genealogical relations of the chief ancient texts has not failed to excite strong opposition in certain quarters, it can hardly be doubted that their work is the most important contribution to the scientific criticism of the New-Testament text which has yet been made. They distinguish four principal types of text: the Western, characterized by a tendency to paraphrase or to modify the form of expression, and also to interpolate from parallel passages or from extraneous sources, represented especially by D and the Old Latin versions, also in part by the Curetonian Syriac; the neutral, represented by B and largely by S, preserving best the original form; the Alexandrian, much purer than the Western, but betraying a tendency to polish the language; and the Syriac, in the form, a mixed text, borrowing from all, and aiming to be easy, smooth, and complete. They regard B as pre-eminent above all other manuscripts for the purity of its text; the readings of S and B combined as generally deserving acceptance as being their․
of the Greek Testament indicating in different ways the text followed in the revised version of the New Testament.

[3. Principles of Textual Criticism.—It is impossible, within the limits here allowed, to state and illustrate the principles of criticism applicable to the text of the Greek Testament. A few hints may, however, be given. The object, of course, is to ascertain which, among two or more variations of the text presented by our manuscripts or other authorities, is the original. No kind of evidence, external or internal, is to be neglected. The problem is to be solved by a process of reasoning upon probabilities; and we have to consider, in every case, what hypothesis will best explain all the phenomena. This fact is sometimes partially stated under the form of the rule that that reading is to be accepted as genuine which will best explain the origin of the other variations. This is an important rule; but we have to consider, not merely the nature of the variations, but the number, independence, and character of the witnesses that support them. The process of criticism is not a mechanical one. Our authorities must be weighed, not counted. One good, very early manuscript may be worth more than a thousand copies derived from a late and corrupt archetype. Again: though the presumption is in favor of the oldest manuscripts, mere antiquity cannot prove the excellence of a copy.

One of the essential prerequisites to intelligent criticism is a thorough study of the occasions of error in manuscripts. This involves a knowledge of paleography and of the history of pronunciation. The similarity of certain letters or abbreviations in their older forms gave occasion intentionally to substitute a harsh, ungrammatical, and diphthongs originally distinct in sound (ε, α; i, a, γ, τ, υ) were pronounced alike (iatism). It involves also a study of the tendencies and habits of transcribers. Many manuscripts, in the alterations they have received from later hands, illustrate the manner in which the text was corrupted. Among the maxims resulting from such a study, in connection with the consideration of external testimony, are these: (1) The more difficult reading is to be preferred; Bengel's great rule. This applies to these variations which are to be ascribed to design. Transcribers would not intentionally substitute a harsh, ungrammatical, unusual, Hebraistic expression, one that caused a difficulty of any kind, for an easier one. (2) The shorter reading is to be preferred; Porson's "surest canon of criticism." The tendency of scribes was almost always to add, rather than to omit. They did not like to have their copies regarded as incomplete. It was common to insert in the margin of manuscripts, or between the lines, glosses, or explanations of unusual or difficult expressions. Many scribes have been corrected thus, to supplement the language of one Gospel from the parallel or similar passages in another, or to complete abridged quotations of the Old Testament from the fuller text of the Septuagint. Words accidentally omitted were also placed in the margin, or interlined. A transcriber might thus easily mistake these glosses, or supplements, of his predecessor for accidental omissions, and transfer them to his text. This rule does not apply to cases where an omission can be satisfactorily explained by homoteleuton (ἀνωτελεύτων); that is, cases where two successive sentences or parts of sentences have a like ending. The scribe copies the first of these, then his eye glances to the like ending of the second, and he thinks that that is what he has just copied, and omits unconsciously the intervening words. — Another prerequisite to successful criticism is a careful study of the principal documents, and groups or classes of documents, in connection with the history of the text, so far as it can be traced, in order to determine by a process of "comparative criticism" their peculiar characteristics, their weak points and their strong points, and the relative antiquity and value of their texts. This process includes the ancient versions, and the quotations in the writings of the principal Christian Fathers. It cannot be here detailed. Griesbach did good work in this direction, and it has been the special study of Westcott and Hort. We are thus enabled to weigh the external evidence in particular cases with some approach to accuracy. — E. A.

[4. Results of the Textual Criticism of the New Testament.—The host of "various readings" which an examination of ancient manuscripts, versions, and quotations, has brought to light, perhaps a hundred and fifty thousand in number, alarms some simple-minded people. Analysts at once dispel the alarm. It is seen that a very large proportion of these readings, say nineteen-twentieths, are of no authority, no one can suppose them to be genuine; and nineteen-twentieths of the remainder are of no importance as affecting the sense. Of how much, or rather, of how little, importance, for the most part, the remaining are, can only be thus explained; and in the corruption of the Greek language, vowels and diphthongs originally distinct in sound (ε, α; u, a, γ, τ, υ) were pronounced alike (iatism). It involves also a study of the tendencies and habits of transcribers. Many manuscripts, in the alterations they have received from later hands, illustrate the manner in which the text was corrupted. Among the maxims resulting from such a study, in connection with the consideration of external testimony, are these: (1) The more difficult reading is to be preferred; Bengel's great rule. [LIT.—Besides what have already been mentioned, the most important contributions to our knowledge of manuscripts of the New Testament in the present century have been made by F. H. A. SCHIFFNER, in his The Accurate Collation of about Twenty MSS. of the Gospels, Cambridge, 1853, and Full Collation of about Fifty MSS. of the Greek Testament, with a Crit. Introduction, appended to his edition of the Codex Augensis, 1859. Works of smaller importance in this department of the editor's labors have been published by E. A. (Eugenio) de BURJACO, 1830), Reiche, Von Mural, Dobbin (Cod. Monfortianus, 1854), Delitzsch, Handschriftliche Funde (1861-62), on Cod. 1 of the Apocalyse, the long-lost manuscript of Erasmus; also by the Catholic Cozza, and Ferrar and Abbott.

On the textual criticism of the New Testament generally, besides the Introductions to the New Testament by Michaelis, translated with valuable notes by Marsh (3d ed. 1816), Hug. De Wette, Blosk and Reuss (Geschichte der heiligen Schrift en N. T., 5th ed., 1814), may be mentioned the special treatises by J. Scott Porter (1848), S. Davidson (1832), Tregelles (1836), and Scrivener, Plain Intro. to the Criticism of the N. T., Cambridge and London, 1861, 2d ed., 1874. Scrivener represents a more conservative school of criticism than Tischendorf, Tregelles, and Westcott and Hort, though in his different writings he has steadily approached them. Smaller works are: William Milligan and Alexander Roberts, The Words of the N. T., as altered by Transmission and ascertained by Criticism, Edinb., 1873; Scrivener's Six Lectures on the Text of the N. T., 1873; C. E. Hammond, Outlines of Textual Criticism applied to the N. T., 3d ed., 1880; and E. C. Mitchell, The Critical Handbook, Andover, also London, 1885. — Among elaborate critical monographs on important passages, the following may be mentioned: J. W. Burgon, The last Twelve Verses of the Gospel according to S. Mark vindicated... and established, Oxford, 1851 (comp. an art. by Dr. J. A. Broadus in the Baptist Quarterly for July, 1869); Ezra Abbott on John i. 18, in the Bibliotheca Sacra for October, 1861, and the Unitarian Review for June, 1875; Professor James Drummond on the same passage, in the Theol. Rev. for October, 1871 (comp. April, 1876); F. J. A. Hort, Two Dissertations, I. On zung des B. Joshua u. ihr textkritischer Werth, Mörs, 1876; Fritzsche’s editions of Judges [Richter, Zürich, 1867, and Ruth (Zürich, 1864)]; Wellhausen: Der Text d. B. Sam. untersucht, Göttingen, 1871; Thümen, in the “Kurzgefr. Exeget. Handb. zum A. T.” über der Bücher der Könige, and Fr. C. Movers: Kritische Untersuchungen über die bibl. Chronik, Bonn, 1834. The translation of the Psalms and Prophets is least successful, for which fact their difficulty is sufficient explanation. On Isaiah, see Gesenius’ commentary, and [Dr. Anton Scholz: Die alexandrinische Uebersetzung des Buches Jesaja, Würzburg, 1880 (47 pp.)]. On Jeremiah, for proof that the translator must have used a text differing very much from our present text, see Movers: De utriusque recens. vatic. Jer. indeo, etc., Hamburg, 1834. The Church, from ancient times, used, in place of the Septuagint of Daniel, the more exact version of Theodotion. The long-lost Septuagint version was discovered in the Chisian Library at Rome by Simon de Magistris (1772). [See the edition of J. Cozza, Rom., 1877. On the Minor Prophets, cf. Völlers: Das Dodekagrapheon der Alexandriners, Berlin, 1830 sqq.; on Amos. J. S. Vater, Halle, 1810; on Nahum, Studer, and L. Reinken: Zur Kritik der älteren Versionen des Pr. Nahum, Münster, 1867; on Jonah, Eichhorn: Alig. Bibl. d. bibl. Liter.; on Hosea, the same. The translators of Proverbs and Job show themselves very well acquainted with Greek, but handle the original in a very free and arbitrary manner. Proverbs was evidently translated from a text which varied from our present Hebrew text: cf. P. de Lagarde: Anmerkungen zur griesch. Uebersetzung, der Proverbien, Leipzig, 1863. On Job, G. G. H. Bickell: De indole ac ratione vers. Al. in interpretando I. Johi, Marb, 1862. On Esther, cf. Fritzsche’s edition, and his excellent Libri apocrphvi V. T., Lips., 1871. But in the Septuagint were not alone canonical books; for, as the work of translating continued, additions were made from other sources, Greek and Hebrew, either lengthy passages or whole books. Such additions are called Apocrypha, and were acknowledged by their inserters not to be original, but only additions. According to the Hebrew notation and arrangement, twenty-two books. See Canon, Apocrypha. These interpolations were allowable, from their standpoint, because the Septuagint was regarded as a private undertaking. We do not know their date, only that in Theodotion’s time (second century A.D.) they were all added, and the version passed into universal use in the Christian Church, with no distinction between its contents; apocryphal and canonical books being held in equal esteem.

The discovery was quickly made that the Septuagint was not always accurate; and this fact was particularly unpleasant when the Jews quoted it. It was the first attempt at a translation upon so large a scale. This explains and excuses its errors. Greek and Hebrew are very dissimilar; and, as the translators knew more of one than the other, they failed to present the deeper and truer sense of the Scriptures, and therefore misled the Christian Church, which used their labors. But the Septuagint is of the highest importance for the criticism and history of Hebrew text. It tells us the hermenetical standpoint of the Hellenists. Their translation is not a rendering of the present Massoretic text in many places; probably because their Hebrew text was differently punctuated, or varied, or seemed to vary, in its consonants, and also because their hermeneutical principles were very free. Then the Septuagint is not a literal translation. Finally, the influence of the Septuagint upon the language of the Jews was very great. As it was the first attempt of the Hellenists to transfer their hereditary possessions (religion and history) into a new language and mode of thought, so it furnished at the same time a model. The idiom of the Septuagint became the idiom of the New Testament in more fully developed form, and thus that of early Christianity, whose writers cannot be thoroughly understood without a familiar knowledge of the Septuagint, which they so largely quote. Most of the direct quotations of the Old Testament are apparently from it, and thus its study is indispensable to an exegete.

2. Other Greek Versions.— (1) Aquila, a Jewish proselyte of Pontus, a contemporary of Hadrian (about A.D. 130), prepared a literal translation for the benefit of Jews contending with Christians, which was so successful, that it was used by Jews and Christians. It was slavishly literal; and, in his endeavor to present a word-for-word rendering of the Hebrew into the Greek, he goes to the extent of the boldest word-coining and grammatical absurdities. The Ebionites probably used it; although Ireneus, adv. her., ed. Migne, III. 21, ed. Grabe, III. 24, does not necessarily prove this. Jerome speaks of a second more literal version. Only fragments of it now remain in Origen’s Hexapla. Cf. Hody: de Bibliorum not translate. Origen used him in his Herapla; so occasionally transliterated the Hebrew he could prove this. Jerome speaks of a second more literal version. Only fragments of it now remain in Origen’s Hexapla. Cf. Hody: de Bibliorum
(2) Theodotion, a Jewish proselyte of Ephesus (Ireneus, adv. her. ed. Migne, III. 21), revised, before A.D. 160, rather than translated, the Septuagint, deriving his alterations in part from Aquila, and from the idiom of original text; which, however, he did not thoroughly understand, and so occasionally transliterated the Hebrew he could not translate. Origen used him in his Hexapla; and the Church substituted his version of the Book of Daniel for the Seventy’s. Cf. Hody, as above, pp. 579–585.

(3) Symmachus, a Samaritan Ebionite (fl. A.D. 193–211), made a version distinguished for clearness and elegance, but paraphrastic and occasionally arbitrary. Cf. Hody, as above, pp. 585–589. (4–6) Besides these named, three others are cited by Origen in his Hexapla, which are called the Quinta, Sexta, and Septima, the authors and ages being unknown. Probably the two first extended only to detached books of the Old Testament, and the last only to the Psalms. They are rather paraphrases than translations.

(7) The Versio Veneta, a very late Greek translation of several Old-Testament books, now in the Library of St. Mark’s in Venice. The manuscript is not earlier than the fourteenth or fifteenth century. It is of little value, except as a literary curiosity. It follows the Massoretic recension. See O. Gentili: Grammatica II. CHALDEE.— These versions are called “Targums” (translation, or interpretation), and were rendered necessary by the loss of Hebrew while in Babylonia (cf. Neh. viii. 8). They were at first, and for many years, oral. As might be expected, they are usually paraphrases, in which the ideas of the translator are more followed than those of the original writer. No one of those now existing extends over the whole Old Testament, although together they do with the exception of Ezra and Nehemiah. The two oldest are that of (1) Onkelos, on the Law, and that of (2) Jonathan ben Uziel, on the Earlier and Later Prophets. (1) Onkelos probably lived about A.D. 70, as he was the friend of Gamaliel. His interpretation is generally correct: it follows the text closely, and is free from the fabulous additions which mar other Targums. His Targum was first published in Bologna (1482, fol.), with Hebrew text and Rashi’s commentary; also in Buxtorf’s Rabbinical Bible (1619). A recent and much enlarged edition dates Wilna, 1852. The Targum of (2) Jonathan ben Uziel, who, according to tradition, was the disciple of Illil; but the Targum is younger than Onkelos’, and more paraphrastic and less simple. The first edition dates Leiria, 1404; but it is found also in the great Rabbinical Bibles, and in the Antwerp, Paris, and London Polyglots. [The Targums of Onkelos and Pseudo-Jonathan on the Pentateuch have been translated into English by J. W. Etheridge, Lond., 1802–85, 2 vols.]

Besides these two, which date from before the thirds century, there were other Targums of importance, particularly two on the Pentateuch, —

one complete, attributed, but falsely, to the same

(3) Jonathan mentioned above; the other only in fragments, called the (4) Jerusalem. The first is based upon Onkelos, but departs far more from the Hebrew into the region of pious fiction. It is a modern work, not earlier than the middle of the seventh century. The Jerusalem is earlier, dependent upon Onkelos’, which it corrects in places, but was never designed to be complete. Both are reprinted in Walton’s (the London) Polyglot. [S. Gronemann: Die Jonathan’sche Pentateuch-Uebersetzung in ihrem Verhältnisse zur Halacha, Leipzig, 1879.]

(5) Targums of “Joseph the Blind” on the Hagigapha.

Tradition, wrongly as usual, assigns these Targums to a person so named, who lived in the fourth century; but critical study has put their date in the eleventh century. The work separates into three parts: Targums 1. On the Psalms, Job, Proverbs; 2. On Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentation, Esther, and Ecclesiastes; 3. Chronicles and Daniel. The (1) are nearly contemporaneous, and from the same land, probably Syria. The work on Proverbs is the best, following the Hebrew as closely as possible. The similarity of this Targum to the Syriac version is extraordinary. Some suppose it was in truth copied from it, while others, with perhaps greater probability, content themselves with the independence. [Degutsch, in Smith’s Dictionary of the Bible, vol. IV. p. 3421, maintains, with Frankel, that the true explanation is, that “the Seventy is the common source of both versions, but in such a manner that the Aramaic (Chaldee) has also made use of the Hebrew.” It is true, however, through the Syriac medium.”] The Targums on Psalms and Job are mere fragments, more or less close to the Hebrew. 2. The Targums on this class are not mentioned before the twelfth century. The freedom of a version can go no farther than it does in them. They are, in fact, mere commentaries. 3. No Targum on Daniel was for a long time believed to exist; but Munk found one in the Imperial (National) Library at Paris. It was written after the first crusade, or the twelfth century. See Notice sur Saintin, Paris, 1838. The Targum on Chronicles was also long unknown. The first edition ap-ppeared under the title Paraphrasis Chaldaica ilor.
Chronicarum, cura M. F. Beck, 2 tom. Ang-Vind. (Augsburg), 1680–83, 4to.

There is also extant a Targum on the apocryphal pieces of Esther. See J. B. DE ROSSI:
Specimen variarum lectionum sacri textus et Chaldaica Estheris additamenta, Rom., 1780; ed. 2, cura J.
F. Schnurrer, Tubingen, 1783.

III. SYRIAC. — 1. The oldest and most important version is the Peshito (the correct or simple), because confined to the text, in contrast to the allegorical and mystical paraphrases. The first reliable historical reference to the version is its use by Ephraem the Syrian (d. 373) in the fourth century; but even then it was old, for Ephraem defines in his commentaries many of its words which were no longer understood by his countrymen. Hence it is no improbable conjecture which assigns the version to the second century.
It is made from the Hebrew, probably by Jewish Christians, and includes the Old-Testament canon, without the apocryphal additions, which were translated later; is accurate and close.
The version of the New Testament seems to have been made afterwards. The Old Testament was published first in the Paris Polyglot (1645), and then in Walton’s (1657), and, in critical and improved edition, by the British and Foreign Bible Society (in 1823), under care of Samuel Lee, Professor of Arabic at Cambridge. There is wanting a truly critical complete edition.

ARNOLD.

In the sixth century the Peshito was universally received by Syrian Christians, even while the controversy raged between the Monophysites and Nestorians, and so is at the present day. 2.
The version of Bishop Paul of Tella (a city of Mesopotamia), made in 616 sq., at the suggestion of the Monophysite patriarch Athanasius, was based upon the Hexaplar Greek text. It is closely literary, and thus is important in the critical study of Origen’s work.

DR. ANTONIO MARIA GHERANI

of the Ambrosian Library at Milan has published Codex syro-hebraicus Ambrosianus, 1874 sqq. The so-called Verbo Karkophones, or Montano, is neither an independent version nor a recension of the Peshito, but a Massoretic work upon the Old and New Testaments, and upon the chiefest Orthodox Greek Fathers whose works had been translated into Syriac. Cf. PAULIN MARTIN: Tradition Karkophoon, ou la Massore chez les Syriens, Paris, 1870. The so-called Figureta owes its origin to a writing or printing error, and the ensuing false interpretation. Abulfaraj (Bar He-braus) in the thirteenth century says (Abul-Phara-100), according to Focox’s translation, “The Syrians have two versions, the Peshito and the Figureta, which — translated from the Hebrew into Syriac in the time of Addai the Apostle, or, as some say, in the time of Solomon, the son of David, and Hiram, and the Figureta, according to the Septuagint text, translated from Greek into Syriac.” The words underscored should read, and of Hiram, King of Tyre, and the Septuagint. By “the Septuagint” is meant the version of Paul of Tellem. Several others are reported. Jacob, Bishop of Edessa (d. 712), made a recension of the Peshito, according to the Syro-Hexaplar text. Fragments have been published;
e.g., in Ceriani’s Monumenta sacra et prof. V. 1, 1808. The Nestorian patriarch Mar Abbas (d.
532) is said to have made a translation from the Greek. Simeon, Abbot of the Convent of St.
Licinius, and Polycarp, the author of the Philoneian New Testament, are each to have made a version of the Psalms from the Greek.

IV. SAMARITAN. — Besides a recension, the Samaritans had a translation of the Pentatateuch in their peculiar dialect. AD. BRÜEL: Das Samaritana. Targum zum Pentateuch, Frankfort-a-M., 1875, issued the first complete edition of it. It is not earlier than the second century
B.C., although the date and author are uncertain. It follows closely the Samaritan text, but occasionally contains apparent interpolations from the Targum of Onkelos. Cf. SAMUEL KOHN: Zur Sprache, Literatur und Dogmatik der Samaritaner, Leipzig, 1876.

V. EGYPTIAN versions sprang into being in the third century, or at the beginning of the fourth, in answer to the demand of the growing African Church. They were of all the various dialects, founded upon the Septuagint (except Daniel, which was from Theodotion’s), and are of indeterminate age and seniority. Portions of these versions have been published, especially by the Pentateuch and the Psalms. O. F. FRITZSCH.

VI. LATIN. Cf. PETRUS SABATTIER: Biblio-rum sacrorum latinæ versiones antiquæ, seu vetus ital., etc., Rheims, 1743–49. Also the Speculum Augustini in the Speculum Romanum, tom.
IX. 1. Vetus Latina, or Old Latin, was made from the Septuagint, or from the Old African version in the second century; for it is quoted by the earliest of the Latin Fathers, and was widely circulated. It is throughout a verbal version, made simultaneously by several men, in the de-terminated Latin of the period, with its mixture of colloquial and provincial words and phrases, i.e., in the speech of the common people. When introduced into Italy, where Greek was understood, and a higher culture common, its provincial rudeness gave offence, and so a revision was demanded. Thus arose the Itala, or the Italian version of the Old Testament. We have Augustine’s testimony that a translation of the New Testament was undertaken by any one who knew sufficient Greek. There existed then more than one Latin version of the Bible; and perhaps Britain, Gaul, and Spain had each a national version. But in Africa the Old Latin was the only one current. It was there jealously guarded and kept in use after Jerome’s version was elsewhere received. See ZIEGLER: Die lat.
Bibelübersetzungen vor Hieronymus und die Itala des Augustinus, München, 1879; U. ROBERT: Penta-tateuchi e codice Angloveneo versione e assisiina
(s. anteriore in s. Jero me ’e) (Paris, 1881).

2. The Vulgate. — Cf. LEANDER VAN ERS:
Pragmatisch-kritisiche Geschichte der Vulgata,

The term "Vulgate," that is "Vulgata editio," the current text of the Bible, was originally applied in the Church to the Septuagint. In this sense the word is used by Jerome, who, however, also applied it to the Old Latin version, which was made from the Septuagint. But there does not appear to be any instance in the age of Jerome of the application of the term to the Latin version of the Old Testament without regard to its derivation from the Septuagint, or to that of the New Testament. "Vulgata editio," meaning a corrupt text, also stands in contrast to the true Hexaplur text of the Septuagint. The Latin Fathers habitually refer to Jerome's version as our version. But the Council of Trent (1546) called it a "corruptus vulgus," and hence the term "Vulgate" is used to-day exclusively of it.

The Latin texts in current use had been corrupted by frequent copying. There was urgent need of a thorough revision. At this crisis God raised up a man to do the work. SOPHORS, EUSEBIUS HIERONYMUS, commonly called JEROME (331–420), the most learned scholar, not only of his day, but of many centuries, amply prepared, linguistically through his acquaintance with Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and morally and spiritually by his earnestness and piety, was requested in 383 by Damascus, Bishop of Rome (369 to 384), to do this almost imperative work. Nothing more at first was contemplated than a revision of the current Latin New Testament by means of the Greek original. The Gospels were taken up, all interpolations removed, and gross errors corrected. We do not know whether he went through the New Testament in this way; but it is probable. Bishop Damascus asked him to revise the Psalms. He made two revisions: the first (389) by the use of the common text of the Septuagint, the Roman Psalter, because introduced by Damascus into ecclesiastical use in Rome: the second (387) by the use of the Hexaplur text (this is the Gallican Psalter, because introduced primarily by Gaul by Gregory of Tours, then into Germany, England, and Spain, and eventually made by Pius V., in 1566, the successor of the Roman). He then designed and carried out a revision of the entire Old Testament according to the Hexaplur text, of which, however, there has come down to us only the Book of Job. But then the comparison he made the Greek text with the original Hebrew, for Jewish friends secretly supplied him with manuscripts from a synogogue (he had meanwhile taken up his abode in Bethlehem), the more desirable did a new version from the Hebrew appear. He knew full well how prejudice and fanaticism would put obstacles in the way; but solicited by friends, although without any ecclesiastical sanction, he made a beginning with Samuel and Kings in 392 (prefixed by the famous Prologus gallicus, giving an account of the Hebrew Canon), and completed his translation in 404. Poor things, also "Apolls, Ezekeil, Aber, Judith, and Tobit," were done in great haste, and there are errors, which, with more care, he would not have made; but, as a monument of ancient linguistic power, this translation of the Old Testament stands unrivalled and unique.

Although Jerome's version was used by some as soon as finished, it spread very gradually, and was, indeed, "received with a loud outcry of reproach;" and it took centuries for it to become the ecclesiastical translation of the Occident. No ecclesiastic as such, no church court, befriended it: it won its way upon its merits, and in the ninth century its victory was complete. As time went on, its text deteriorated. Owing to his eyes and general health, Jerome had originally employed scribes to write it: therefore the first copy was probably not free from errors; and each successive copy increased the evil. The old and the new version being in use side by side led to a mixture of both texts. CASSIODORUS, in the sixth century, was the first to attempt a revision; but his work could not stem the tide of corruption. So evidently bad was the case, that Charlemagne ordered ALCUIN (755–804), the most learned man of his day, and his trusted friend, in the year 802, to revise the Latin text. This Alcuin did, not by reference to the Hebrew and Greek, but to older and more correct Latin manuscripts, and presented a very good text, which, under Charlemagne's patronage, obtained wide currency, and long resisted decay. But in the lapse of years, other revisions were required, and were made by LANFRANC of Canterbury (1089). STEPHANUS II., Abbé of Citeaux (about 1109), and Cardinal NICOLAS (about 1150). In the thirteenth century so-called "Correctoribiblica" were drawn up, in which varieties of reading were discussed. But, although in the monasteries the older and more reliable texts were preserved, they were not used in the preparation of a pure text. [See De un codice critico della Bibbia Vulgata, transcritto nel secolo XII., Palermo, 1860.]

But a better day awaited the Vulgate. Printing was invented, and the first book sent out by the press in the Bible was the Vulgate. This book was more frequently printed. The text was the ordinary. CARDINAL XIMENES (1437–1517), in his Compendium Polyglot (1502–17), made the first serious attempt to revise the text. ROBERT STEPHERS (1503–58) in 1525 and 1540 made important corrections by collation of manuscripts. But there was felt a necessity for an authorized edition. This the Council of Trent demanded (1546), and it was undertaken by Pope SIXTUS V. (1552–90), and issued 1590. The text was declared by the Papal Constitution Aeternus aetate, to be "true, lawful, authentic, and unquestioned in all public and private discussion, reading, preaching, and explanation." The printing of any other text was forbidden, under penalty of excommunication. But many changes had been made; and many typographical errors, though none serious, had passed unsuspected. But the new version being in use by all, the new text took hold, and its translation being used in the usual way, the vulgus or public did not have time to recover from the shock of the new translation. For the case of the translation Sternal, and the famous Jesuit. Sixtus V. had put his Controver- sia upon the index, and therefore his hatred was excited. STEPHANUS II., Abbé of Citeaux, restored his name with the great Catholic work, the Authentic Vulgata. Swayed by hate and ambition,

3. Modern Latin Versions. — For convenience we here group a few modern translations of the Old Testament into Latin from the Hebrew. The Reformers worked in this line, particularly Zwingli and Ecolampadius, who together translated the books of the Old Testament into Latin, and were followed by a Roman Catholic scholar, the learned Dominican Sanctus Pagninus (1470-1541), who was the first to publish (in 1528) a complete Latin Bible, which won him great applause. A corrected edition of the Old Testament of this translation, along with Beza's Latin New Testament, was issued by Robert Stephens in 1557. In 1572 appeared, as an appendix to the Antiapocryphal Polyglot, a Latin interlinear to the Bible, which, in the Old Testament, was substantially the Pagninus version, corrected by Arias Montanus, and, in the New Testament, the Vulgate. Under the direction of Cardinal Thomas de Vio Cajetan (1469-1544), another interlinear of the greater part of the Old Testament, and all the New Testament save the Apocalypse, was prepared by Jewish and Christian scholars; but the Old-Testament parts were not issued in collected edition until 1639. The New Testament appeared 1530. The version was verbal, and in rather barbarous Latin. Sebastian Müsster (1490-1552) issued (in 1534-35, 2d ed. 1540) a literal, faithful version of the Old Testament, with explanatory remarks. Leo Juda (1482-1542) had almost finished a Latin version of the Old Testament, upon which he had been engaged many years, at the time of his death. At his request some friends continued it; and it was eventually completed in Zurich, 1548, folio. Sebastian Castello (1515-63), in 1551, 1555, and 1556, sent forth an elegant and accurate Latin version of the Old Testament. The version made by Immanuel Tremellius (1510-80), a born Jew, assisted by his son-in-law Francis junius (1543-1602), which appeared in 2 tom., 1579, received great praise. The New Testament appeared in reprint in England by Middleton, 1580. The translation of the Old Testament published by J. Piscator (1546-1585) was in the main only a revision of Tremellius'. Sebastian Schmid (1617-96), a very useful exegete, spent forty years upon a Latin translation of the entire Bible, and did not live to see it out of the press (1096, 2d ed. 1708). Johannes Cocceius (1603-69), the Dutch theologian, issued an almost entire translation in connection with his commentaries; and Jean le Clerc (1567-1736), the versatile Genevan, an independent able one, in parts, with a commentary (1693-1731). From the learned and acute priest of the oratory, Charles François Houliant (1580-1759), appeared, Paris, 1753, the Biblia Hebraica cum nota crit. et vers. Lat. ad notas crit. facia, 4 tom., the Hebrew text unpointed (since he held the points to be, not only useless, but dangerous), and the translation very careful. J. A. dathe (1731-91) made a conservative translation of the Old Testament, which appeared at intervals, 1773-89. Besides, there have been versions of separate books, of greater or less excellence.

Turning to the separate Latin versions of the New Testament, the earliest, most successful, and influential, is that by Erasmus (1467-1536), made in five months, but though hastily made, as was his custom, so excellent, that it has been reprinted more than two hundred times. Five editions appeared in his lifetime (1516, 1519, 1522, 1527, 1535). Theodore Beza (1519-1605) followed. His first edition appeared 1556 (1557); the other personally conducted editions were 1555, 1556, 1557, 1560, 1561, 1562, 1563, 1564, 1565, 1570, 1571, 1572, 1573, 1574. The best edition is Cantabrig., 1642. Three new translations are yet to be mentioned, — those of H. A. Schott, very handy, much used, Lips., VI. ETHIOPIC.—In the ancient language of the Axumite kingdom, commonly called since the sixteenth century, the Ethiopic, but by the natives the Geez, there exists a version of the Bible, which has always been the only authorized one among all the tribes of Abyssinian Christians, as well as among the Jewish Falashas, and which yet maintains its ancient authority, and is read in the service, although the Ethiopic long ago ceased to be spoken. We have, however, no reliable information in regard to the exact time or manner of its origin; but it is certain that it was made from the Alexandrian recension of the Greek Bible, or from the fourth to the sixth century, and it is not only the oldest monument, but also the foundation, of the whole Ethiopic literature.

It is very faithful; being, for the most part, a verbal rendering of the Greek, and yet readable and fluent, and in the service, although the Ethiopic long ago ceased to be spoken. But this varies, of course; and the variations are intentional, the result of an effort to remove archaisms, and render the diction more idiomatic. Thus, in many manuscripts, the four Gospels, the portion most read, have undergone such a change, that they read like a paraphrase rather than a translation, or like a new translation instead of the old. Those portions less read are in purer condition. The tradition which ascribes the version to Frumentius is of little value.

The uncertainty of the text led to early attempts at revision; the easier to effect because the Abyssinian pilgrims brought home with them Bibles in other languages, so there could be comparison of texts. In the books of the Ethiopic version already published [see Literature at end of this section] three texts can be distinguished: (1) The original translation, more or less corrupted, very fine in the manuscripts; (2) A text enlarged and altered from the Greek, the commonest in the manuscripts; (3) A text corrected by the Hebrew original, found in later manuscripts. Critical care and caution are therefore requisite to restore the original Ethiopic text. Since this Bible is one of the oldest daughter of the LXX., it has great critical importance, and has preserved peculiarities and originalities. Thus it had at first a different, peculiar, and partly original division of the separate books. The Occidental "chapters" were introduced at a later day into Abyssinia, under European influences. It included the Apocrypha, except the Maccabees, which were either not translated, or very quickly lost, and several pseudographs (see title), and put them upon perfect equality with the canonical writings; and in this way the number of books is given as eighty-one,—forty-six for the Old Testament, thirty-five for the New; but in particular the counting varies very much.

Of Ethiopic texts, LAURENCE issued in 1819 the Ascensio Jesae, and the Apocalypse of Ezra in 1820, at Oxford. DILLMANN has edited the Octateuch, 1853; the four books of the Kings, 1801-71; HEWORTH, 1831; Liber Jubilæorum, 1859. The first portions of the Ethiopic Scriptures that appeared in print were the Psalms and the Song of Solomon, edited by John Potken, Rome, 1513. The New Testament was first printed at Rome by J. H. CHAPUA, 1548-49, reprinted in WALTON'S Polyglot, 1657, and a Latin translation of the version made by Professor Bode, published at Brunswick, 1752-55, 2 vols. 4to. MR. THOMAS PELL PLATT edited for the British and Foreign Bible Society an Ethiopic edition of the New Testament, London, 1830. This edition, if it is true, is better printed than the Roman, but is equally marred by many errors, and the absence of an old manuscript text, so that it is critically worthless.

A. DILLMANN.

VIII. GOTHIC.—This version was the work of UPLPHILAS or VULFILA (311–381), Bishop of the West Goths, a "holy and spotless priest of the Lord," written in an alphabet he constructed for this purpose out of Greek, Latin, and Runic characters, and embraced the entire Bible, with the exception of the four books of the Kings, omitted because of their warlike, and, as he thought, dangerous spirit against idols. Much of the New Testament, but very little of the Old Testament, has come down to us. Ulpilhas was an Arian; but there is no trace of his heresy in the version, which is faithful, and so skilful, that even the finer shades of the original are happily brought out. The version is from the Greek text, and has, therefore, critical weight. As it now exists, there are traces of Latin-text influences; but these were probably of later origin, when the manuscripts were copied in Italy during the reign of the Goths. The recently debated question, whether Ulpilhas was the author of the entire translation, must be answered affirmatively in regard to the New Testament, but left unanswered in the Old; for we know too little about it. Cf. E. BERNHARDT: Krit. Unters. über die got. Bibelübersetzung, Elberfeld, 1864-69, 2 vols.; O. WALTER: Die Bruchstücke vom A.T. der got. Bibelübers. kritisch untersucht, Halle 1876. And on Ulpilhas cf. G. WATTZ: Uebcr das Leben und die Lehre des Ulf., Hannover, 1840; W. BESSEL: Ueber das Leben des Ulfilas und die Bekärung der Gothen zum Christenthum, Göttingen, 1850. Cf. also H. L. DOHERS Kirchengeschichte der germ. Völker, Berlin, 1854.

In the fifth century the East Goths governed Italy, and the West, Spain, where they ruled until the eighth century. In this way the version was very widely spread. Tregegels, indeed, says it must have been a vernacular translation of a large portion of Europe. But eventually it was entirely lost sight of for centuries, until in the latter part of the sixteenth century, Ant. Morillo reported having seen at Werden in Westphalia a Gothic codex, from which he copied the Lord's Prayer. This was probably the Codex Argenteus, taken by the Swedes at the siege of Prague (1648), and which now is the most precious treasure of the University of Upsala. It is a superb manuscript, containing fragments of the Gospels, and dates from the fifth century, first edited by Fr. Junius, Doctr., 1655, 2 vols. The best editions of all the fragments (for the exact list, see Davidson's Art. Gothic Version, in Kitto's Cyc. of Bib. Lit., 3d ed., ii. 573 sq.) are by I. C. v. der Gabelentz and J. Loeloe, Lips., 1836 (43)-46; by Fr. Ludw. Stamm, 7th ed., revised by Moritz Heyne, Paderborn, 1878; and by E. Bernhardt, Halle, 1875. The Gospel of Mark has recently been edited with a grammatical apparatus by R. Müller and H. Hoepppe: Ufblis Evangeliu Marci, Berlin, 1881. O. F. Fritzsche.

IX. ARMENIAN. — It was made from manuscripts brought from the Council of Ephesus (431) by Mesrob (d. 411: his name is spelled in six different ways), the inventor of the national alphabet, with the assistance of several of his pupils. See Mesrön. The Old Testament was from the Septuagint (Daniel, as usual, from the Heraplar Syriac text). Cf. W. G. F. Comes de Badissin: Translationis antiquae ar. lib. Job qua supersunt ex apographo cod. Mus. Brit. aliae pr. ed. atque ill., Lips., 1870; and the Lexicon, Numbers, and Deuteronomy published by Lagarde in his Materialien i. (3) Those from the Septuagint. (a) The versions in the Polyglots of the books not specified above. (b) Several Psalters described by Döderlein (Repositor. ii. 176-178, IV. 57-96). (c) Specimens of a Pentateuch from the Alexandrian recension of the Septuagint. (4) Those from the Coptic are very numerous, generally are side by side with the Coptic text; of no importance except for the Coptic. (5) Those made or interpolated from the Vulgate are also of no account.

XII. ARABIC. — There are many manuscripts containing translations of portions of the Old Testament now stored away in libraries. We consider only those which are printed or are reliably described. They may be classified into the immediate, direct from the original text, and the mediate, from other versions. 1. Immediate. (a) The version, often a paraphrase, of Rabbi Saadia ha-Gaon (d. 942), more renowned as a Talmudic grammarian. The Pentateuch was published at Constantinople, 1548. Lately P. de Lagarde, in his edited edition of the Korb Codex, published Genesis and Exodus from a Leyden manuscript. Saadia's Isaiah, Hosea, Job, and Psalms have also appeared. (b) Joshua and a fragment of Kings are in the Paris and Walton's Polyglot, made by a Jew of the tenth or eleventh century. (c) Aratus Erpenius, a manuscript of the Pentateuch (in Hebrew letters), literally translated, made by an African Jew in the thirteenth century. (d) Genesis, the Psalms, and Daniel, by Saadia, in a manuscript, a Jew of Morocco, from the Massoretic text: manuscript now in British Museum. (e) A translation of Hosea and Joel. (f) The Pentateuch of Abu Sa'id, a Samaritan of the eleventh or twelfth century, from the Samaritan text of the Pentateuch, influenced by the Hebrew and the Saadia and the Samaritan version. Samuel Kohn (Zur Sprache, Literatur, u. Dogmatik der Samaritaner, Leipzig, 1876, pp. 134 sq.) maintains just the opposite, that the version of Abu Sa'id gave Aramaic to the Samaritan. 2. Mediate. (1) Those which are made from the Peshito. (a) A version of Judges, Ruth, Samuel, Kings, and Nehemiah, found in the London and Paris Polyglots. The version of Job was published by P. de Lagarde, in 1786, in his Psalterium Job Praeclarus Arabocele. (b) Translations of the Psalms. (c) Fragments of the Pentateuch. (2) Those from the Hexaplar Syriac text. Cf. W. G. F. Comes de Badissin: Translationis antiquae ar. lib. Job qua supersunt ex apographo cod. Mus. Brit. aliae pr. ed. atque ill., Lips., 1870; and the Lexicon, Numbers, and Deuteronomy published by Lagarde in his Materialien i. (3) Those from the Septuagint. (a) The versions in the Polyglots of the books not specified above. (b) Several Psalters described by Döderlein (Repositor. ii. 176-178, IV. 57-96). (c) Specimens of a Pentateuch from the Alexandrian recension of the Septuagint. (4) Those from the Coptic are very numerous, generally are side by side with the Coptic text; of no importance except for the Coptic. (5) Those made or interpolated from the Vulgate are also of no account.

B. VERSIONS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. This section is supplementary, and refers only to the New Testament, or the Old Testament and the entire Bible, see A. As already given in the note at the beginning of this article, two works deserve mention, — Reuss: Geschichte der heil. Schriften N. T., 5th ed., Brunswick, 1874; and Schiavone: A Plain Introduction to the Criticism of the N. T., 2d ed., Cambridge, 1874.

The Philoxenian or Harclean was made by Polycarp, Rural Bishop for Mar Philoxenus, Monophysite Bishop of Mabug (Hierapolis), directly from the Greek: the Gospels were finished A.D. 508. In 610 Thomas of Harkel (Heraclea) corrected the translation by the help of three approved and accurate Greek manuscripts in the Monastery of the Antonians at Alexandria, and added a critical apparatus, and, after the manner of Origen, also asterisks and obeli. This revision is the one now generally found in manuscripts. It is so close to the Greek that it is probably the most servile version of Scripture ever made; indeed, so close as to be in places quite unintelligible without the Greek. It includes the portions of the New Testament omitted from the Peshito; although it is a question whether the Apocalypse, edited by L. de Dieu, Leyden, 1827, and often considered a part of the Philoxenian, although usually used to complete the Peshito, really belongs to it. But at all events the Catholic Epistles and Apocalypse are not the work of Thomas of Harkel; cf. Bickell: Conspexit rei Syrorum literariae, Monast. 1871. The whole Harclean version was edited by J. White, Gospels, 2 vols., 1778, Acts and Epistles, 2 vols., 1796, 1800; and later by Buxtorf: Des heil. Evang. des Johannes Syr. in harc lens. Úbers., Leipzig, 1853, and the same; De Charklines N. T. translationis syriaca, Vratisl., 1837, 2d ed., 1854. 3. The Curetonian Syriac. William Cureton, D.D., Canon of Westminster discovered in 1847, printed in 1848, and published by David Wilkins, in Oxford, 1716, the New Testament in Memphitic, under the editorship of Henry Tattam; but, as the edition contains no various readings, it is quite useless to any other than Egyptian scholars. The Society for Propounding Christian Knowledge published (1857-52) a magnificent edition of the whole New Testament in Memphitic, under the editorship of Henry Tattam; but, as the edition contains no various readings, it is quite useless for critical purposes. The Memphitic New Testament did not contain the Apocalypse: this gives a hint as to its date. The earlier Alexandrian writers, Clement and Origen, in the first part of the third century, and the later Alexandrian Church from the close of the third century onward, quote the Apocalypse without hesitation as the work of John; but about the middle of the fourth century doubts were widely expressed, as by Dionysius of Alexandria (d. 252), and the difficulty may have been powerful enough to cause its exclusion from the Egyptian canon. The order of the books of the New Testament is (1) Gospels, (2) Pauline Epistles, (3) Catholic Epistles, (4) Acts. The version is for scholars particularly useful, and Egyptian is so largely Greek in vocabulary that it is fairly adequate for the purpose. The version may, therefore, generally be consulted, even for minute variations in the text: in this respect it is perhaps the most important of all the versions for the textual critic. Fathers, free from the corruptions which pro-vailed so widely in the copies of the second century.

The Sahidic or Thebaic version has not attract-ted attention until comparatively recent times. The pioneer scholar was C. G. Woide, who in 1778 announced his intention to publish from Oxford manuscripts the fragments of the Thebaic New Testament, but he did not live to finish his work (May, 1790), and H. Ford, professor of Arabic at Oxford, completed and issued it: "Appendix ad Editionem N. T. Graecie Codice MS. Alexandrinuo a C. G. Woide descripti, in qua continentur Fragmenta N. T. juxtainterpretationem Dia-lecti Superioris Egypti qua Thebaica vel Sahidica appelatur, etc., Oxoniae, 1799. This work lays biblical scholars under heavy obligations; but, although some additions have been published since, there is greatly needed a complete collection of all the fragments of the Thebaic New Testament; the version is rougher and less faithful than the Memphitic, like it in the arrangement of the books and in the omission of the Apocalypse, but entirely independent of it in text and interpretation, and stands second in textual value.

The Bashmuric or Elearchian version, without independent value, a mere adaptation of the Thebaic, and only useful where the Thebaic is wanting, was made not later than the end of the third or beginning of the fourth century. The word
"Bashmur" means the "girdled (by the Nile) country," and was applied to Elearchia, the country of the Bucoli, of the ancient Egyptian race of horsemen who lived in the Delta. They were almost exterminated in 839, the remnant of the race being transported to Baghdad. They must have had a complete version of the Bible; but only the merest fragments have come down to us.
They are published by Engelbrecht: "Fragmenta Bashmurico-CopticaVeteris et Novi Testamenti, Havnie (Copenhagen), 1811."

III. PERSIAN.—The Christians of Western Persia belonging to the Syrian Church used the Peshito in early times; yet there are at least two translations of the four Gospels into Persia, one from the Peshito, in Walton's Polyglot, with a Latin translation by Samuel Clarke, afterwards reprinted with corrections and a learned preface by Bode, Helmstadt, 1750–51: the other is made from the Greek, published, London, 1657; edited by Abraham Wheelocke. There are older Persian versions (parts of both Testaments) still unpublished.

IV. ARABIC.—There is no version earlier than 719, nor is any of critical value. 1. Imdiate. (a) The Gospels most commonly printed, first in Rome, 1500, found in the London and Paris Polyglots; latest edition by P. de Lagarde, Leipzig, 1864. (b) By another translator the remainder of the New Testament in the Paris and London Polyglots. (c) The New Testament
ed. by Lapierre, Leyden, 1616; reprinted London, 1829. 2. Mediate. From the Peshito, in "Cod.
Tischendorf;" of the Acts, the Pauline and Catholic Epistles, except the four Antilegomena of the latter. 3. The Arabic translation of the New Testament in the Roman Bible of the Propaganda, Rome, 1671, altered from the Vulgate, and added by the Socinians for Ira} the Greek, were both designed for circulation in the East, and are of no critical value. See P. de Lagarde: "Anglo-Saxon."

(V. ANGLO-SAXON.—There was apparently no version of the Scriptures in this language before 706, when Adhelm, the first Bishop of Sherborn, translated the Psalms, followed by Egbert and Eadflod, Bishop of Lindisfarne, with parts of the Gospels, and Bonus (d. 739), with the Gospel of John. Other Saxon translations are:
in ninth century by King Alfred (d. 900), the Psalms; in tenth century by Ælfric, the Pentatuch, Joshua, Job, Judith, part of Kings, Esther, and Maccabees. The version was made from the Vulgate. The entire Anglo-Saxon version has never been published; but Spelman edited the Psalms, London, 1840; and Benjamin Thorpe in 1838 issued "Libri Psalmorum Version antiqua Latina cum Paraphrases Anglico-Saxonica, probably Adhelm's," and in 1842 "The Anglo-Saxon Version of Saxon Gospels in Parallel Columns with the Versions of Wycliffe and Tyndale," arranged with preface and notes, London, 1865. The fact that such a small part of the Bible has been published is the stranger because manuscripts are so numerous. Before the prose translation of any part, Caedmon, a monk in the Abbey of Streoneshalh in Northumbria, composed a poetical version of parts of the Bible, 664. See Thorpe: "Caedmon's Metrical Paraphrase of Parts of the Holy Scripture, Anglo-Saxon Version," 1865, with introduction, notes, and a verbal index, London, 1832."

[Modem Versions.—For account of the important German and English versions see special articles: our space admits of only the briefest mention of the principal others.]

1. FRENCH.—Le Père d'Étaples made the first Protestant version published, Antwerp, 1530;
but that of Pierre-Robert Olivetan, founded upon his, published 1535 at Serrières, near Neufchatel, at the expense of the Waldenses, as corrected by Calvin his cousin, was the nearest approach to a national version. Calvin recognized Olivetan's imperfections, and, in the preface to the edition of 1561, expressed the wish that some competent scholar would devote half a dozen years to the translation of the Bible. It is greatly to be regretted that Calvin did not do this work himself. His wish, however, was essentially met when "La Compagnie des Pasteurs de Genève" deputed the task to certain of their members, among whom was Beza, and in 1568 issued the auxiliarily awaited version. Put forth under such authority, and a manifest improvement upon its predecessor, it has kept the field until this day, although it is only a revision of Olivetan's. The Bibles of Martin (Amsterdam, 1707) and Ostervald (Amsterdam, 1724) are substantially the 1568 version, and only valuable for their notes. The attempts of Atho to make it supercede the sadly defective Olivetan have been unsuccessful; but in 1847 Rev. Dr. Louis Segond published at Geneva (2d ed., 1877, at Nancy; 3d ed., 1879, at Geneva) a new translation of the Old Testament from the Hebrew text, and in 1879 a new translation of the New Testament from the Greek. This work has been accepted by the University press, Oxford, England, and, as a note on the fly-leaf states, been printed in a first edition of fifty thousand copies. This version is regarded as a decided improvement upon all others, and as worthy of national official use. The Oxford edition is beautifully printed,—the prose portions in paragraphs, with marginal numbers to indicate the verses; the poetical in verse form. There are also occasional brief notes, mostly geographical and philological, interesting prefaces, remarques, and a brief history of the Jews to connect the Testaments, and maps, indexes of quotations in the New Testament and to the notes. The book is a pleasure to eye and mind. Never has the complete edition of the Scriptures been issued at Antwerp in 1526, by Jacob van Liesveldt, in two folio volumes. The subsequent edition having cost the printer his head, the work was the more notable. In Holland it is called the States' Bible, to distinguish it from the Synod's Bible. This latter version, which, up to the present time, has only appeared in the New Testament, is the result of the criticism of the century, and the immense growth of knowledge. In 1854 the General Synod appointed a committee of fourteen to revise the old translation, and at length, in 1867, the revision appeared. Its reception has been far from enthusiastic. This has led to an indefinite postponement of the Old Testament part.

2. DUTCH. — Portions of the Bible appeared in the opening years of the century; but the first complete edition of the Scriptures was issued at Amsterdam in 1526, by Jacob van Liesveldt, in two folio volumes. The subsequent edition having cost the printer his head, the work was the more notable. In Holland it is called the States' Bible, to distinguish it from the Synod's Bible. This has led to an indefinite postponement of the Old Testament part.

3. ITALIAN. — There were Bible translations into Italian before the invention of printing; but the earliest printed Italian Bible is that of Nicolò da Malcheri (or Malermi), published in Venice, 1471. In the same year another Bible appeared; but it is known only by title. Nicolò was a Venetian abbot of the order of Camaldoli. He speaks in his preface about former Italian translations, criticises their freedom, and declares his fidelity to the Vulgate. Nicolò's Italian is not the choice speech which had then been developed. The next version was that of the Florentine Antonio Bruccoli, made from the original texts: New Testament, 1530; Psalms, 1531; Bible, 1532, Venice. In the preface the translator waxes indignant at all prohibitions of the Bible, and every hindrance to its widest spread among the people. His work, however, seems to have been scarcely circulated in Italy outside of Venice, and was indeed put in the first class of prohibited books; still, many editions appeared. With Bruccoli the Roman-Catholic activity in the field of Bible versions practically ceased; although translations of the New Testament were issued by the Dominican Zaccaria in 1532, and by Giglio in 1531, both at Venice. These books are extremely rare.

With the expulsion of Bruccoli's version a new era of Bible study began. The liberty to read the Scriptures, denied by Romanist Italian, was enjoyed in Geneva; and there this version of the Old Testament, slightly revised, was reprinted in connection with the New Testament of the Florentine Massimo Teofilo (first printed Lyons, 1551), revised by Gallars and Beza; and so the first complete Italian Protestant Bible appeared in Geneva, 1563, for the benefit of the Dissenting congregations. The version was put into speedy disuse by the appearance of the Bible of Giovanni Diodati, Geneva, 1607, made directly from the original texts, in the Lucchese dialect, and therefore adapted for circulation among the peasants. This is the version commonly taken up by Bible societies, and used before this petition could be presented, and 1626 before the company got fairly at work. They met in Leyden. It was at the outset believed that four years would suffice; but, owing to real difficulties and unexpected hindrances, the translation took eleven years. At last, in 1637, the Bible appeared in two editions, one with, one without, references and marginal readings. So hearty was its reception, that in fifteen years it had won universal and unhesitating acceptance. It is, indeed, one of the best of existing versions; perhaps, in points, it excels them all. It is immediate, although quite evidently our authorized version influenced the translators more or less. In many cases its felicity is remarkable. In Holland it is called the States' Bible, to distinguish it from the Synod's Bible. This latter version, which, up to the present time, has only appeared in the New Testament, is the result of the criticism of the century, and the immense growth of knowledge. In 1854 the General Synod appointed a committee of fourteen to revise the old translation, and at length, in 1867, the revision appeared. Its reception has been far from enthusiastic. This has led to an indefinite postponement of the Old Testament part.

This is the version commonly taken up by Bible societies, and used in Italy to-day. In 1776 the Archbishop of Florence, Anton Martini, issued in Turin a translation of the whole Bible from the Vulgate, which the British and Foreign Bible Society adopted, published the New Testament, 1813, Bible, 1821, and now circulate in Italy. For the famous story of the persecution of the Mudalai in Florence, because they used the Bible, see title. Southern and Eastern Italy, up to this time, as before, had no Bible influences.

4. SPANISH. — The first printed New Testament is by Francisco de Eznizas (Dryander, see title); appeared in Antwerp, 1543; now circulated by the British and Foreign Bible Society. Another New Testament was that of Juan Perez, Venice, 1556. The first Bible was from Casiodoro Reyina, Basel, 1569; revised by Cypr. de Valera, Amsterdam, 1602; New Testament, separately, 1625. The Old Testament was repeatedly rendered into Spanish during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, by Jews in the Netherlands and in Ferrara. But of all these translations the fact is that they did not circulate in Spain. In 1794 Phil. Scio de S. Miguel, a Spanish ecclesiastic, issued at Madrid a translation with a commentary. The British and Foreign Bible Society have, since 1828, circulated the Spanish text. It is made, of course, from the Vulgate. See Borrow's "The Bible in Spain."

5. PORTUGUESE. — The version of J. Ferreira d'Almeida, a convert from Rome (New Testament, Amsterdam, 1712; Pentateuch and historical books, 1719), is that now printed by the British and Foreign Bible Society; although there was printed at Lisbon, 1784, a version made by Anton Pereira de Figueiredo, the first upon native soil.

6. SCANDINAVIAN. — Some parts of the Old Testament were translated into Danish in the fourteenth century, and published by Molbech, Copenhagen (1828); but the Danish translation of the Bible is the work of the Reformation. Prepared by several scholars, it bore the name of Christiern Pedersen, and was published in 1550. It was afterwards often revised. The edition now used is the work of a committee of revision, appointed in 1815: it appeared in 1824. There are two independent translations: one by I. C. Lindberg, much used in the Grundtvigian circles; and one by Chr. Kalkar, of missionary reputation. The Danish Bible was used in Norway up to the separation of the two kingdoms in 1814. After that time, minor improvements, mostly of purely linguistic import, have been made in the Norwegian Bible, and in 1871 a committee was appointed to make a thorough revision.

A Swedish translation from the fourteenth century is spoken of as having been undertaken at the instance of St. Birgitta, but has not come down to us. In Sweden, as in Denmark, it was the Reformation which translated the Bible. The complete Swedish version appeared in 1541, the New Testament by Laurentius Andres (1526), the Old Testament by Laurentius and Olaus Petri (1534). Often revised, the edition now in general use dates back to the beginning of the eighteenth century.

The Icelandic translation was begun by Oddur Gotthalskon: the New Testament appeared at Copenhagen in 1540, the whole Bible at Holm in 1584. The edition now in use is a revision by Thorlak Skuleson (1844) of Clement Petersen.

Missionary Translations. — The Bible has been translated by Protestant missionaries into all the literary languages of the world, and into many which had never previously been written; but these translations are evidently of no critical value, although useful in many cases, from the original tongues. Probably the most faithful and finished of all these versions is that into Arabic. It was begun by Eli Smith, D.D., in 1847, aided by Cornelius V. A. Van Dyck, M.D. D.D., who continued the work after Dr. Smith's death, and brought the labors of sixteen years to a happy conclusion.

The printing and electrotyping of this Bible is regarded as the greatest typographical performance of the American Bible Society, and the book itself opens the truth to the Muslim world. The first plate was electrotyped March 15, 1866. The types perfectly transcribe the best Arabic calligraphy, according to a mode designed by Dr. Eli Smith, and executed by Mr. Hollock of the Syrian Mission.

BIBLIANDER (Buchmann), Theodore, b. at Bischofzell, Thurgau, about 1507; d. at Zürich, Nov. 26, 1564; was a teacher in the school of Myconius, and professor of theology and Oriental philology in the University of Zürich after the death of Zwingli, but was dismissed in 1560 on account of his open opposition to the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination, propagated with great success in the city since 1556 by Peter Martyr Vermilius. He gave a Latin translation of the Koran, and many valuable contributions to the history of Mohammedanism. Most of his writings, however, have never been printed.

BIBLIA PAUPERUM (the Bible of the Poor) is the name given to one of the earliest "block books" printed before the use of movable type. It consists of a series of forty leaves, printed on one side, so as to make twenty when pasted together, on which forty scenes from the history of our Lord are depicted: underneath are inscriptions in the abbreviated Latin of the period. The title given above is probably misleading. It was not intended for the poor people so much as for the poor friars who went about preaching. And would, no doubt, derive help in the composition of their sermons from the pictures. Besides, they could be shown with advantage to their audiences.

BIBLICAL PHILOLOGY concerns itself with the original text of the Old and New Testaments, and the versions, the study of Hebrew and the cognate languages and dialects, of the Greek of the Septuagint, the Apocrypha, and New Testament. See HEBREW LANGUAGE; HELLENIC DIALECT.

BIBLICAL THEOLOGY, in the sense of a study of the word of God, in contrast to dogmatics, or the deductions and speculations of men, and therefore without reference to ecclesiastical formation and creed, man is the philosophical and recent development; for, so long as the Church and the Bible were believed to be in unison, there was no demand for it. The Fathers were presumed for many centuries to have conserved and developed the apostolic teaching. The medieval theologians went upon the assumption that the Fathers were infallible, and studied them, and therefore accepted the traditional patristic scriptural proofs upon all points, instead of working up the subjects for themselves. It was not, therefore, until the Reformation called attention to the discrepancy between the Bible in tradition and the Bible itself, that biblical theology began.

Unfortunately in the seventeenth century a new scholasticism replaced the old, and individual Bible-writers, and even some who were not, were minutely studied. Thus the theology of Job (1687), of Jeremiah (1696), even that of Paul (1706), was treated with minute care. The beginnings of the science were naturally unsystematic and wavering. Seb. Schmidt, in his Collegium biblic. in quo dieta V. et N. T. iuxta seriem locorum comm. Theol. explicantur, Strassburg, 1697, led the way, and he had many followers. But these works were little more than collections of proof-texts conveniently arranged for the theological lecturer. The first one to bring the term “Biblical theology” into use was Haymann, who introduced it in its present sense in his work, Versuch einer bibl. Theol. in Tabellen (1708), which ran through four editions, the last being printed 1758. Pietism loosened the connection between the Bible and dogmatics, because it emphasized the importance of the former as a means of grace, and in this context of knowledge. The result is seen in Büsching's Diss. exhibens epitomen Theol. s. solis lit. sacr. concinnae (1766) and Gedanken von der Beschaffenheit und dem Vorzuge der bibl. dogm. Theologie vor der scholastischen, Berlin, 1758.

Then came Bengel, the acute verbal critic, and his school, who wished upon the principle that the Bible does not contradict the Church, but accompanies it, and has superior authority. Semler, in 1764, in his Hist. u. krit. Sammlungen über die sog. Beseitstellungen in der Dogm., Halle, 1764-66, 2 parts, and more particularly his followers, showed the great difference between the cut-and-dried theology of the schools and the teaching of the New Testament. This led the defenders of the former to show their substantial agreement by an unprejudiced study of the Bible. So did Zacharia, Biblische Theologie, oder Untersuchung d. bibl. Grundes d. vorchristen. theol. Lehren, Göttingen, 1772, and Storr, Doctr. christ. pars theor. e sacr. libria repetita, Stuttgart, 1793. The Neologians, on the other hand, prejudiced against every doctrine not part of natural religion, began to press for a purely historical treatment of the Bible (so Gabler, De iustodiscrimine Theologiae bibl. et dogm. regundisque recte utriusque finibus, Altorf, 1787), and thus prepared the way for a rationalistic history of religion, written by such men as Ammon, Entwickel. einer reinen bibl. Theol., Erlangen, 1792. The increased attention given to comparative religion, yielded fruit in the subsequent works upon biblical theology, as Kaiser's, which attempted to educate a purely "rational" religion out of the Bible. With Schleiermacher a new direction was taken in the study of the Bible, and respects an unfortunate one. The Old Testament was sundered from the New, and attention directed to the latter. Then came up the study of individual authors, particularly of Paul and John. Neander led the way in a new departure, the unity of the Gospels in spite of their differences. Cf. C. F. Schmid, 1st ed. Stuttgart, 1853, excelled by Weiss, Lehrb., 1868, 3d ed. Berlin, 1880. Then came Ferdinand Christian Baur, the head of the Tübingen school (see title), and his followers, who have attempted in their works to split the Primitive Church into parties, e.g., Paulus, Stuttgart, 1846, Das Christenthum u. d. Kirche d. erst. Jahrhunderts, Tübingen, 1853; Schwengler, Nachapost. Zeitalter, Tübingen, 1846; Pfeiderer, Paulinum, Leipzig, 1873; and Kostlin, Lehrbegriff d. Ev. u. d. Briefes Johannes, Berlin, 1843; and thus the way was prepared for the history of primitive Christian literature and theology as the first step in the study of church history.

But the claims of the Old Testament have not been completely ignored. Indeed, the apophthegm is gaining ground, that, in order to understand the New, it is necessary to study the Old Testament as such (Hausrath), and of the immediate surroundings of our Lord's life (Schürer), and thus the way was prepared for the history of primitive Christian literature and theology as the first step in the study of church history. And it is manifestly the correct view. In this way a lack in Protestant theology is filled; for the Bible studied in this thorough-going fashion becomes in the most comprehensive sense the source and test of theology. But let it not be supposed that it is easy thus to handle the Scriptures, although it appear to be. Many preliminary questions have to be answered. Is Judaism a preparation for, or a mere predecessor of, Christianity? What is the primitive religion? Is the Bible literature, or revelation? What is the connection between the Bible and the aftertime? How much is comprehended by the word "Bible"? Does it include, for instance, Bible history?
begun in earnest, other questions arise. The order, subjects, and methods of work, must be determining for the study of the books, and in this way important contributions will be made to the discussion of canonicity.

The relation of biblical to dogmatic theology, and to the other branches of Christian learning, is an interesting point. It would seem to be unnecessary to restrict biblical theology to the subject immediately in hand. Hence, while a study of the people among whom the doctrines arose is necessary in order to determine the need and condition of revelation, it can have nothing to do with the long struggles in the Christian Church over doctrinal points. The Bible must be made the source. All that throws light upon it should be used. The more the theologian knows about outside matters, of course the better for him; but it should be his endeavor to master the text, and whatever explains the text of the sacred volume, whose contents he desires to formulate, and whose truths he desires to defend. Compare the books quoted in this article, and also Kwald:

BIBLICISTS, BIBLICAL DOCTORS, those were called, who, during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, demonstrated religious truths by the Scriptures and by the authority of the Fathers, in contrast to the theologians, who abandoned Scripture and tradition in order to give full rein to their fancy and philosophy, and in this way the famous, interminable hair-splitting subtleties arose. The most of these latter sort of doctors were Dominican and Franciscan monks, who in as much as their orders held no property, were, moreover, required to produce valuable works; but the majority of them by their method tended to bring the Scriptures into disrepute. The works arranged according to subjects are, M. LIPENIUS: Bibliotheca realis Theologica. Francof., 1853, 2 vols. (voluminous, but inexact); D. D. W.: Universal-Wörterbuch der theologischen, kirchen u. religionsgeschichtlichen Literatur. Leipzig, 1837–43, supplement, 1843 (it unfortunately lacks a table of authors).

1. BIBLIOGRAPHY IN THE ORDER OF AUTHORS. — The Fathers and ecclesiastical authors of the past have been catalogued in the elaborate works of Possevin, Cave, Du Pin and his continuator Goujet, Cellier, Oudin, and in the less voluminous works of Trithème, Mireau, Bellarmin (continued by Labbe and Du Saussay), and Olearius. These volumes contain a great deal of information on a literary character. The bibliographies of modern writers are those of ESSLIN: Bibliotheca theologica. 2d ed., Stuttgart, 1833, carrying the index to down to 1831; continued down to 1862 by ZEICHOLZ: Bibliotheca theologica. Göttingen, 1864, 2 vols.; for Roman-Catholic literature, M. Schmalhofer, publisher: Bücherkunde der kath. theol. Literatur bis. Augsburg, 1837, supplement entitled Handbuch der nächsten Literatur des Katholizismus. Schaffhausen, 1840–44. The Theaurus librorum rei catholicarum, Würzburg, 1818–50, 2 vols. with supplement, embraces all the Roman-Catholic authors arranged topically and alphabetically. D. D.: Cyclopedia bibl. litteraria. London, 1854, 2 vols., is for the most part a catalogue of a simple library — that collected by Mr. Darling, consisting of thirty thousand volumes. (The catalogue is extremely valuable for English theological authors, but much less so for those of other countries, except the old and standard writers. One feature of it is its detailed index of the contents of all the great collections, like Migne, of collected writers, e.g., Orme's edition of Baxter, and of lecture courses.)

(these two works of Baumgarten, remarkable especially for the precious collection of Bibles which is described, and for the exactitude of the bibliographical information they contain, are grouped together by a very convenient table, which refers to all the twenty volumes); J. M. Franke: Catalogus Bibliothecae Donumionum, Lips., 1750–57, 7 vols. (unhappily unfinished, valuable for its detailed information and systematic classification of the valuable library, now at Dresden, which is particularly rich in ecclesiastical history and biography); C. G. Thiele: Theseaurus literarum theologicae auctorum, Lips., 1840 (unfinished); O. Fliebig: Corpus dissertationum theologicae, Lips., 1847 (catalogues of large and excellent collections of theological theses and dissertations).

II. Exegetical Theology. 1. EXEGESIS IN GENERAL. — J. Leong: Bibliotheca sacra, new ed., Paris, 1723, 2 vols. (a vast repository of biblical works: the first volume contains a catalogue of editions of the Bible in different languages; the second an alphabetic list of authors who have written upon the Bible, with their works, followed by a systematic table of the last, in spite of errors and omissions, the book is still useful); E. F. K. Rosenmüller: Handbuch für die Literatur der biblischen Kritik, u. Exegete, Göttingen, 1797–1800, 4 vols. (this excellent work, unhappily unfinished, embraces only the introduction and criticism, the indispensable editions of the original text, hermeneutics, the ancient versions, and, among the modern, those in the Romance languages); G. W. Meyer: Geschichte der Schriftenklärung seit der Wiederherstellung der Wissenschaften, Göttingen, 1802–1806, 5 vols. (a useful work from the number of its bibliographical references). Besides these one may profitably consult Calmet: La Bibliothèque sacrée, prefixed to his “Dictionnaire de la Bible,” Paris, 1722 (often reprinted and translated, e.g., as revised by Rev. Dr. Edward Robinson, Boston, 1802); and W. Orme: Bibliotheca Biblica a select list of books on sacred literature, with notices, etc.), Edinburgh, 1824; T. H. Horne: Manual of Biblical Bibliography, London, 1839; also in the second and fourth volumes of his Introduction as edited by Ayre and Tregelles, 14th ed., London, 1877, 4 vols.; Diezel: Geschichte d. Alt. Test. in der christlichen Kirche., Jena, 1860. Ewald, in his Jahrbücher der bibl. Wissenschaften, Göttingen, 1848–65, 12 vols., took notice of almost all the works relating even remotely to biblical exegesis which were published within this time.

BIBLIOLOGY.

Concerning the Jews there is an inexhaustible mine of bibliographical information of all sorts, J. C. WOLF: Bibliotheca hebraea, Hamb., 1713–83, 4 vols. 4to; the supplement, by H. F. KÜCHER, Nova bibliotheca hebraica (Jena, 1783–84, 2 vols.), is far from having the same value.

BIBLIOLOGY, or sortes bibliice, is the term used to describe a superstitious use of the Bible, which consists in opening it haphazard, and considering the first verse the eye rests upon, or entering a church, and marking the first word of the first sentence read, as a divine indication of duty, or presaging of future good or ill. Many are the stories told of wonderful answers to prayers, and warnings and encouragements thus given.

Some eminent Christians, such as John Bunyan and John Wesley, have fallen victims to this delusion. It cannot be denied that it may please God to make use of his own Word to comfort saints or startle sinners, by such chance readings; but it can be denied most emphatically that he intended such a use of the Bible probably has encouraged bibilomancy, far as it was from the practice or commendation of these persons. The inveracity of the folly is shown by its continuance in the Church, both East and West, notwithstanding the decrees of councils. It came directly from Paganism; and in like manner had the Pagan used Homer and Virgil. In the middle ages a new use was found for it in the detection of heretics: the opened Bible would, they thought, give an answer either for or against the accused. A similar mode was at one time employed in Great Britain to root out witchcraft. The suspected old woman was taken to the village church, and weighed against the big church Bible. If she weighed more than it, she was declared innocent; but alas for her whom the Bible outweighed!

BICKELL, Johann Wilhelm, b. at Marburg, Nov. 2, 1799; d. at Cassel, Jan. 23, 1818; studied law at Marburg and Gottingen; was appointed professor of jurisprudence at Marburg in 1824; and became president of the supreme court of Hesse-Cassel in 1841, and minister of state in 1846. He wrote: Uber die Entstehung des Corpus Juris Canonic, 1825; Uber die Reform der Protestant Kirchenverfassung, 1831; and Uber die Verfassung der evangel. Geistlichen auf d. symbolischen Schriften, Cassel, 1831, 2d ed. 1840; Geschichte des Kirchenrechts, Giessen, 1843, 1848.

BICKERSTETH, Edward, b. at Kirkby Lonsdale, Westmoreland, Eng., March 19, 1788; d. at Watton, Hertfordshire, Feb. 28, 1850; studied law, and began to practise at Norwich, but felt himself strongly drawn to theology; received full orders in 1815, and was in the same year appointed secretary to the missionary society, and in 1830 rector of Watton. A collected edition of his works, of which the most prominent are, A Help to the Study of the Scriptures, Guide to the Prophecies, etc., appeared in 1853, in London, in 10 vols. He edited the Christian Family Library, 50 vols. He was a leader of the evangelicals, and one of the founders of the Evangelical Alliance. See Memoir by Rev. T. H. BIRKS, London, 1851, in 2 vols.

BIDDING-PRAYERS (corruption of "Bidding of Prayers") are formal "biddings," or exhortations, to pray,—a very early custom. A form yet in use in the Church of England before sermons which are not preceded by divine service, such as university sermons, and also before the morning sermon in cathedral churches, dates substantially from mediæval times. Before the Reformation, the prayer before sermon was called the bidding of the beads; beads meaning both "things counted" and "prayers." The preacher successively named the subjects of their devotion. After the Reformation the practice continued, but the subjects were changed. The text of the bidding-prayer is thought to be given in full in Procter: A History of the Book of Common Prayer. 11th ed., London, 1874, p. 172.

BIDDLE, John, b. in 1615 at Wotton-under-Edge, Gloucestershire; d. in a London jail, Sept. 22, 1662; was educated at Oxford, and appointed master of the day school at the Roman Catholic college at Douai. Suspected of heresy, he was called before the Parliament, and committed to custody, December, 1615, in which he remained for five years, while the assembly of divines at Westminster discussed his views. The adversaries called Biblechers, or Socinians, or Unitarians, began to form a con geration. But his translation of the Life of Socinus, and various Socinian books, again exasperated his adversaries. He was put on trial a second time (1615), and only rescued from death by Cromwell's sending him away in banishment to the Scilly Islands. After the lapse of three years he was quietly released; but after the Restoration he was again imprisoned, and fined, and died in the jail. He was one of the founders of Unitarianism, and a man of learning, blameless life, and great piety. See Tou Lmin: Life and Character of Biddle, London, 1789.

Biel, Gabriel, was educated at Cambridge; embraced the Reformation; but, while the congregation gradually became thoroughly Protestant, it seems as if he absolutely refused to recant a second time, he was condemned for heresy, and burnt at Norwich, Aug. 19, 1531.

Bilson, Thomas, b. at Winchester, 1538; d. there June 18, 1610; was educated at Oxford; and became Bishop of Worcester in 1596, and of Winchester in 1597. He was in the Hampton Court Conference (1604), at which the new translation of the Bible was proposed. He wrote True Difference between Christian Subject and anachristian Rebellion, 1585; Perpetual Government of Christ his Church, 1589, new ed., Oxford, 1586; Survey of the Sufferings of Christ for the Redemption of Man, 1604.

Bingham, Joseph, b. in 1568 at Wakefield, Yorkshire; d. Aug. 17, 1723, at Havant, near Portsmouth; studied at Oxford, and became a fellow of University College. He left on account of a disagreeable sensation he made by a sermon on the Trinity, and was appointed rector, first of Headbourn-Worthy, near Winchester, and then, in 1712, at Havant. His great archaeological work, Origines Ecclesiastica, or the Antiquities of the Christian Church, which has not yet been superseded by any of its successors, first appeared in English, London, 1708–22, in 8 vols., and was afterwards often reprinted: best edition is that by Pitman, revised by Rev. Richard Bingham, great-great-grandson of the author, Oxford, 1835, 10 vols., giving the quotations in full, a life of the author, and other of his works. A cheap edition for the use of students was published in London in 2 vols., 1832. By J. H. Grischow (Grischovius) the work was translated into Latin, and published in Halle, 1724–38, in 10 vols. A German translation, made in the interest of the Roman Church, was published at Augsburg, 1788–96, in 4 vols.

Binney, Thomas, one of the leading nonconformist ministers of England; b. at Newcastle-on-Tyne, April, 1628; d. at Clapton, Feb. 24, 1684. He spent seven years in a bookseller's em dent in his native town, where he first attracted attention by a poem published in one of the local papers. He first received private and academic training in the north of England, and then entered the theological college at Wymondley, Herts. After a brief ministry at Bedford, he was settled, in 1624, over the Congregational Church called St. James's Chapel, Newport, in the Isle of Wight. Here he wrote his well-known hymn, "Eternal Light! Eternal Light!" and published The Life of Stephen Morell, and a volume entitled The Practical Power of Faith, London (n.d.), being an exposition of a portion of the 15th chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews. In 1629 he was called to the King's Weigh-House Chapel in Eastcheap, an independent church, which dated back to 1602, the period of the ejection of the nonconformists. In 1633 the foundation of the new chapel on Fish-street hill was laid by Mr. Binney: and the address delivered by him upon that occasion led to a bitter and prolonged controversy with State churchmen, in the course of which he published the once famous pamphlet;

"What and Who Says it?" "Strike, but Hear,"

"Two Letters by Fiat Justitiae." For a long while Mr. Binney was erroneously thought by members of the Establishment to be a dissenter of peculiarly narrow and bigoted views; but before his death he not only gained the foremost position among the nonconformists, but obtained for his broad and catholic spirit an affectionate and appreciative regard from many of the most distinguished dignitaries of the Church of England. His preaching rapidly secured a wide popularity, which continued during his long ministry. He chiefly attracted young men and the business men of the city of London. He was also closely connected with the most important philanthropic and religious movements of his time, especially in connection with missionary labors in the colonies, of the society for nonconformist churches; Dissent not Schism: The service of Song in the House of the Lord, which exercised a great influence in the development of a richer and more musical service in nonconformist churches; Dissent not Schism; The Christian Ministry not a Priesthood; The Life of Sir Thomas Forwell Button; Lights and Shadows of Church Life in Australia; From Seventeen to Thirty, a book for young men; St. Paul, His Life and Ministry; Money, A Popular Exposition (n.d.); Micah, the Bread Maker (1807); First Series of Sermons (1869); his most widely sold work is, Is it possible to make the best of both worlds? He retired from the pastorate in 1869, and occupied the chair of homiletic and pastoral theology at New College, London, until his death. Mr. Binney's magnificent presence, vigorous intellect, ardent affections, direct style, and highly effective manner, combined with large-hearted sympathies, sufficiently explain the wide and long-continued influence which he exerted upon his generation.

BIRCH, Thomas, b. in London, Nov. 23, 1705; d. there Jan. 9, 1760; was ordained priest in 1731, though he had enjoyed no university education; and became Vicar of Ulting, Essex, in 1734, rector of Dearden, Essex, 1761. He developed a very great literary activity, especially historical and biographical; edited the General Dictionary, Historical and Critical, 10 vols. fol., 1734–41; Thurloe's State Papers, 7 vols., 1742, etc.; wrote biographies of Tillotson, Boyle, etc.; and was one of the secretaries of the Royal Society since 1732.

BIRGITTINES, or BRIGITTINES, The Order of the, was founded on the rules of St. Birgitta in 1370, and comprised both monks and nuns, living together in the same monastery, though in absolute separation. The monastery of Wadstena, on the border of Lake Wettern, Sweden, the first establishment of the order, was designed to hold sixty nuns and seventeen monks, besides a number of lay sisters and brethren. According to the rules, the hours of the day were divided between manual labor, studies, especially translation of good books into Swedish, and devotional exercises. The rules of silence were very severe, but the rules of fasting were mild. From Wadstena the order spread to all European countries: at one time it numbered seventy-four establishments. But in the fifteenth century it fell into decay, and with the Reformation it almost disappeared.

BISHOP. 1. IN THE BIBLE AND THE FATHERS. As usually employed, bishop is the designation of the spiritual head of a diocese (episcopus, superintendens); but the term episcopus, of which "bishop" is the translation, is used of public officers civil and religious (cf. Num. iv. 16, xxxi. 14), and in the latter sense in the Greek New Testament and later ecclesiastical writers.
(cf. Acts i. 20; Ps. cix. 8). In the same way the Bishops are persons "presbyters" (Num. xi. 16; Jer. xix. 1; Matt. xxviii. 11, 12; Mark viii. 31, etc.). No distinction is made between the words, for they both have the same meaning (cf. Acts xx. 17, 25; Tit. i. 5 sq.); a "presbuteros" occupied precisely the same position as an "episcopus" (Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 1-8); hence the apostles John and Peter call themselves "presbuteri," and "sumpresbuteri" (2 John 1; 3 John 1; 1 Pet. v. 1). The identity of the two offices comes out in the First Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, in which he uses the two words indiscriminately. In chapter forty-two he exhorts the Corinthians to submit themselves to the presbuters (παρατίθητε τοις πρεσβυτηροις), for the apostles had made their earliest converts bishops and deacons (τις εκπαιδευτος και διακονος κωστανος); in one section he calls the same persons "presbuters" and "bishops." In chapter forty-four he says it could be plainer. Other titles for the hold- ing of the dignity of presbytership. No demonstra- tion could be plainer. Other titles for the hold- ers of the office of oversight in the church were, in apostolic days, ἀρχιερεῖς ἡγοῦμαι (leaders, Eph. iv. 11; Acts xx. 28; 1 Pet. v. 1, etc.). It is indubitable that very early a distinction was made between presbyter and bishop, but it is by no means clear when or how this change came in. [The Epistles of Ignatius are full of expressions of the same kind (cf. Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 1–8); hence the words, for they both have the same meaning (cf. Heb. xiii. 7, 17, 24; Clemens, First Epistle to the Philippians, indicating the same. [The "Pastor of Hermas" (Wis. iii. 5, circa 140), and the Epistle of Polycarp (d. circa 161) to the Philippians, indicate the same. [The "Pastor" is not decisive. The passage quoted reads, "Hear now about the stones which are in the building . . . they are the apostles (ἀπόστολοι) and bishops (ἐπίσκοποι) and doctors (διδάσκαλοι, teaching elders) and ministers (διάκονοι, deacons): these walked in the grace of God, and oversaw, and taught and ministered holily and humbly to the Church." Hefele, Patrum Apostolicorum Opera, p. 334, appends the note: "These are distinct hierarchical orders," and that seems to be the only inference. Nor can Polycarp in his Epistle, c. v., be emphatically quoted; for although it is true that he exhorts the young men to be "subject to the presbuters and deacons as unto God and Christ," and omits mention of bishops, yet from his silence little can be made.] The first distinct separation we find in Ignatius of Antioch (d. 107 or 116), whose episcopoi and the presbyteri, however, are, just in these ecclesiastical matters, strongly interpolated. [The shorter Greek recension is considered genuine by the best critics.] On the other hand, Ireneus (d. 202), Adv. Her. III. 2. 3, unmistakably recog- nizes the original identity of the two offices. Particularly noticeable are the expressions of Ambrosiaster (Hilary the deacon, about 380), in commenting on 1 Tim. iii. 10, Eph. iv. 11, and Jerome (d. 420), Epist. c. i., ad Evangelum; of Gratian's decree, c. 24, dec. XCIII., comm. ad Tit. i. 7, and Decree c. 5, dec. XCV. ("The bishop clearly teaches the presbyters are the same persons as bishops: moreover, as to the fact that one was afterwards elected to be placed over the rest, this was done as a remedy for schism, lest any one, by attracting to himself adherents, should break the unity of the Church of Christ." "A presbyters is the same person as a bishop. And before party-passions arose in religion, from the instigation of the devil, the churches were governed by a board of presbyters. But when some began to think that those whom they had baptized belonged to them, and not to Christ, it was decreed in the whole world that one of the presbyters elected to the office should be placed over the rest. . . . Therefore as the presbyters know that they are subject to him who may have been placed over them from ecclesiastical usage, so let the bishops know that they are higher in rank than the presbyters, not from usage than from a principle of the Lord's appointment, and that they ought to rule the Church in common.") The defenders of de jure divino episcopacy claim for this early period the later distinction of ordo and jurisdic- tio. So Denninger, Kritik d. Vorl. d. Prof. in d. Kirchenpflege. Kehl, 1847; and Hergenröther, De Catholica Ecclesiae primordiis recentiorum Protes-
The non-episcopal writers of the Evangelical Church (e.g., Ziegler, Geschichteder kirchlichen Verfassungsformen, Leipzig, 1798, p. 7 sq.; Neander, Church History, vol. i. pp. 100–200) assume that the college of presbyters must necessarily have had a director, a primus inter pares, who alone bore the previously common name of "bishops" wherever the office was made permanent. At first the position would be given to the oldest, then to the ablest, who was specially ordained thereto. Substantially the same explanation is given by those writers who emphasize the divided condition of the Christian communities, particularly in large cities where the Christians formed several congregations (ταξιδεῖας ιερῶν άλοιχών), and maintain that union would be naturally promoted by electing one of the presbyters to the headship.

Rothe started the unprovable theory, that the episcopacy was of apostolic origin, the result of the deliberations of the survivors some time after A.D. 70, and therefore part of the original constitution of the Church, but a merely human and temporary design. Bunsen gave to episcopacy a Johannine origin,—a date after the death of Paul (about 70), and a gradual spread. See his Hippolytus and his Age, London, 1832; Christianity and Mankind, London, 1852. [So Rothe (Anfänge der christl. Kirche) and Thiersch (Gesch. des apost. Zeitalter).]

The Church of England tolerates several opposing views of the origin of the episcopate, which will be found stated under Episcopacy. The High-Anglican or Anglo-Catholic view is correctly given by the late Rev. Arthur West Had- dan, in Smith and Cheetham's Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, vol. 1, art. "Bishop;" "Bishop, first an appellate, and then an interchangeable, title of the presbyteri (presbyters), who ministered to the several churches under the apostles; but from the earliest years of the second century, and from St. Ignatius onwards, the distinctive name, adopted as such in every language used by Christians, Eastern as well as Western, of the single president of a diocese, who came in the room of the apostles, in having presbyters, deacons, and laity under him, and possessing exclusive power of ordination, and primarily of confirmation, with primary authority in the administration of the sacraments and of discipline." Mr. Hadden enumerates fully the titles by which the "bishops" have been called, grants that some of them were applied also to presbyters, but finds the actual institution implied and recorded in the New Testament: 1. In the position of James in Jerusalem (Acts xii. 7, xv. 13, xxii. 18; Gal. ii. 9), "affirmed also by the deliberations of the apostles, to be the continuance of the episcopal order, which the church of Jerusalem," 2. In Paul's appointment of Timothy at Ephesus, and Titus in Crete, to be "bishops," i.e., to ordain (1 Tim. iii. 13; Tit. i. 5) and rule both in church worship (1 Tim. i. 1–12) and over all church-members, including presbyters (1 Tim. v. 17). He probably to confirm (1 Tim. v. 22) in the apostle's stead (1 Tim. i. 3; Tit. i. 5); 3. In the angels of the churches, who were real individual persons (see Angel of the Church sub voce Angel). He further finds confirmation to the hypothesis in Clemens Romanus, ad. Cor. i. 14 (already quoted on the other side), in St. Jerome's Catal. Script. Eccl. ix. ("Last of all John, at the request of the fathers of the church, left the episcopal office to his father"); in the fact that "bishops in the later sense are actually found in every church whatsoever from the moment that any evidence exists at all, and that such evidence exists, either simply to an actual bishop at the time, or more commonly to such a bishop as in succession a line of predecessors traced up to apostles, and with no intimation of such episcopate being any thing else but the original, appointed, and unbroken order."] The establishment of the episcopate cannot be attributed to a general movement: some churches early, others later, put their government in a board of elders (presbyters); it depended upon how soon they fell into the line of development from separate congregations to the one Church. That out of the elders one would be chosen to preside, was natural, and is proven by the Fathers to have been the case from the middle of the second century. Hence in the largest communities, as in Jerusalem, Antioch, Rome, the institution would first be established. In Asia Minor and Syria the general name "episcopus" was applied in these early times to this representative. Very early, to some of these episcopi were assigned the appointment and ordinance of the new elders: but there seems to have been no rule about it; e.g., in Egypt, up to the first quarter of the third century, the presbyters ordained without episcopal supervision. But with the development of the Church in doctrine and constitution, the separation of presbyter and bishop was established. The process was hastened by the opposition of Gnosticism and other heresies: the bishops became the centres of authority, the representatives of apostolic teaching. By the fourth century the present order was firmly settled. The bishops themselves were originally elected by the neighboring bishops, and the clergy and laity of the diocese, but later on by the chapter of the cathedral, with the assent of the sovereign. [See the arts. "Bishop" and "Priest," London, in Smith and Cheetham: Dict. Christ. Antiq., and the books therein mentioned. Also the important works, G. A. JACOB: The Ecclesiastical Polity of the New Testament, London and N.Y., 1872, 6th Amer. ed., 1879; E. HATCH: The Organization of the Early Christian Churches, London, 1881.]

The bishop must be of legitimate birth, thirty years old, recognized for learning and morality. The choice is nominally made by the Pope, through the curia, although practically through the chapter (electio canonica); or, when the person is to be transferred from one bishopric to another, through their postulation, or by the nomination of the temporal ruler. Then follow the papal examination through the papal legate; if favorable, a second (final) examination by the college of cardinals upon the receipt of the fundi report; the bishop is consecrated, within three months, by a bishop commissioned by the Pope, and two other bishops or prelates, in the cathedral of the new bishop. The candidate takes the old oath of allegiance to the Pope (essentially that prescribed by Hildesbrand), subscribes the professio fidei, is anointed, solemly enthroned, and dismisses the congregation with his blessing. Consecration precedes the oath of civil allegiance. The episcopal rights and powers are derived partly from his consecration, partly from his jurisdiction, partly from his dignity. 1. Jura ordinis. He shares all the rights of the presbyters, but, besides, has as jura reverenda, propria, pontificalia (1) ordination, (2) confirmation, (3) chism, (4) consecration of res sacra, (5) beneficid of abbots and abbesses, (6) anointing of kings. 2. Jura jurisdictionis. In the broad sense these embrace the entire ecclesiastical authority of the bishop: in the narrow, the lex jurisdictionis (as the oversight, rule, and executive power) is distinguished from the lex dioecesana, the right to the various church taxes. As the bishop exercises all these rights, he is called "juxta ordinaries," but many others has he in consequence of papal taxes. As the bishop exercises all the rights and executive power is distinguished from the jura reser dignitatis. The bishop takes precedence of all the clergy, directly after the cardinals of the Roman Curia, and is addressed, as they are, "Reverendissimus," "Sanctissimus," "Beatissimus," "right reverend," "your episcopal Grace." His temporal rank is settled by special enactment, with his particular insignia and robes. To these rights correspond duties; in chief, the cure of souls, and oversight of the diocese. Each bishop, by his consecration oath, is bound at regular intervals to give a personal report in Rome of his diocese, which report must be repeated in writing.—Assistants of the bishops. Such are the archdeacons, archpriests, chapter's, constories, vicars, etc. (See separate titles.) Cf. Thomasius, Vetus ac nova ecclesia disciplina, P. I. lib. I. c. 1. 2. 50–60; Barbossa: De officio et potestate episcopi, Lugdun. 1698; Joh. Helfert: Von den Rechten u. Pflichten der Bischöfe u. Pfarrer, dann deren beiderseitigen Gehilfen u. Stellvertreter, Prag., 1832. For later literature, Hinschius: Kirchenrecht. 3. In the Churches of the Reformation. The churches of the Reformation have no bishops in the Roman sense, although the question at that time was rather the reform of the office than its abolition. The Lutheran Church in Germany is not governed by bishops, although the general superintendents are called bishops by consistory. In some parts of Germany the title "bishop" is given to a civil officer. [In Sweden and Denmark the episcopal office was retained, but without the jure divino theory. The Church of England admits different theories of the origin and authority of the episcopate and episcopal succession. The Methodist and Moravian episcopate is merely a matter of convenience, and has a missionary character.] 4. Archbishop (Archiepiscopus, Metropolitanus) is the spiritual chief of a church province (archbishopric, metropolitan diocese). The office followed naturally from the episcopate; and the dependence of the city bishops, who exercised authority over the adjacent country congregations, upon the metropolitans (see titles), was recognized by the Council of Nicaea, 325. Among the metropolitans of the church at Rome the metropolitan dignity is retained with similar powers in the Episcopal Church of Great Britain, but not in the United States. Meyer; Jacobson. BISHOPRIC, the jurisdiction of a bishop. It was formed out of the congregations which clustered around the parent church in those early days of a growing yet persecuted Christianity. Each congregation was a parish: the associated parishes formed the bishopric. These terms are still in use in the Oriental Church. In the Occidental Church, in the ninth century, the term dioecesis was applied to bishopric, and parochia to the individual churches. In Frankish Gaul the diocese often corresponded with the pagus major, and the phrases terminus, territorium civitatis, pagus, were used of the bishop's jurisdiction. The bishopric in the larger cities, as was ordered. In Germany the dioceses, comprising several provinces, were larger than those in Gaul, which took in only one. The setting up and alteration of bishopries have been, since the fourth century, the affair of the metropolitans and the provincial synods. Every year the Annuario Pontifico contains an official review of the bishoprics of the Romish Church. BISHOPS' BOOK, THE, or The Institution of a Christian Man, contains an exposition of the Apostles' Creed, the Seven Sacraments, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the Doctrines of Justification, and was compiled in 1537 by a commission of ministers and bishops of the Church of England. BISHOP, Nathan, an eminent Christian philanthropist, b. Aug. 12, 1808, at Vernon, Oneida County, N. Y.; d. at Saratoga, Aug. 7, 1880. His parents were New-England people, who moved from Connecticut to Central New York when that was called the "Far West." His father, Elmanah Bishop, was a farmer, a justice of the peace, and at one time represented his neighborhood in the New-York Legislature. His mother was a woman of rare excellence, of a strong mind, and great executive ability. The family was large. His home was the abode of piety, intelligence, and industry. He was an ambitious boy, caring little for amusements, and choosing to give all his spare time to study. At eighteen years of age he entered the academy at Hamilton, Madison County, N. Y. During his course there, and subsequently in Brown University, Providence, R.I., he supported himself. He was graduated at twenty-nine years of age (in 1837), so mature a scholar that he was immediately elected a tutor in the university. At the close of his first year in this position he was chosen superintendent of public schools in Providence. "Previous to this," says Dr. H. L. Wayland, "the common schools were of very low order, and were very largely to the labors of Mr. Bishop that the method of teaching, once so much at variance with the first of the country." In this position he spent thirteen years. Mr. Bishop was elected a trustee of Brown University in 1842, and in 1854 a member of the Board of Fellows. His marked success in the Providence schools led to his being called to the position of superintendent of public schools in Boston in 1851. In this office he spent six years with signal success: during these years he aided largely in planning several of those model schoolhouses for which Boston is celebrated.

While in Boston he received from Harvard the degree of LL.D. When nearly fifty years of age, Mr. Bishop removed to the New-York Orphan Asylum, the Ladies' Committee, and an active manager of the American Bible Society. He identified himself with the work of the church and sabbath school, teaching a large Bible-class of young men. He took great interest in the work of city missions. When the war of the Rebellion burst upon the country, there came a cry from the army for help, religious consolation, nursing and comforts for the sick; and the Christian Commission was formed. Mr. Bishop gladly gave to the work of the New-York Branch his whole time and energy till the close of the war. He was appointed by President Grant one of the ten Indian commissioners; and it was in pursuance of the work of visiting the wild tribes in 1869 that he contracted the malaria which eleven years afterwards caused his death. He was for several years a member of the State Board of Charities, a member and a delegate of the Evangelical Alliance to the Czar of Russia in behalf of religious liberty in the Baltic Provinces, a member of the advisory boards of the New-York Orphan Asylum, the Ladies' Christian Union, and the Baptist Home for the Aged. He was one of the original board of trustees of Vassar College, and for the first seven years chairman of the executive committee. He was an earnest worker for foreign and home missions, and served the American Baptist Home-Mission Society as its secretary for two years gratuitously during a time of financial depression.

He delighted to give and work for the education and elevation of the ignorant and degraded. The eight schools established in the Southern States by the American Baptist Home-Mission Society, for the education of preachers and teachers among the freedmen, elicited his warmest sympathy. To them he gave the benefit of his long experience in the management of schools, and building of schoolhouses. He was chairman of the finance committee of the American Bible Revision Committee till his death, and contributed largely to its expenses. He was a man of catholic spirit, of large benevolence, calm judgment, a wise adviser, a consistent Christian, in active sympathy with every good cause. P. SCHAFF.

BITHYNIA, a north-west province of Asia Minor, conquered by the Romans B.C. 75. After different administrative changes, Augustus raised it into a proconsularibship B.C. 27. Trajan combined it with Pontus under the younger Pliny A.D. 103-105. Under the Byzantine emperors it was again divided. Nicomedia and Nicea were its chief cities. It is mountainous, thinly wooded, and fertile. Paul was not suffered to enter it (Acts xvi. 7); but 1 Pet. i. 1 testifies to the presence of Christians there in Paul's day, and Pliny was embarrassed by their number.

BLASPHEMY. BLEMMYDES.

BLASPHEMY, technically the speaking evil of God; but etymologically it may mean any species of calumny and detraction. The Mosaic law punished with death by stoning any one, Israelite or stranger, who took the sacred name in vain (Lev. xxiv. 16); but those who spoke against foreign divinities were not punished (verse 15; Exod. xxii. 28). The Jews fell into two peculiar and absurd errors of interpretation of the law upon this subject. From Exod. xxii. 15, "Make no mention of the name of other gods, neither let it be heard out of thy mouth," they supposed they were bound to nickname the heathen gods: hence their use of "Bosheth" for Baal, "Beth-aven" for Bethel, "Beelzebul" for Beelzebub. From Lev. xxiv. 16 they deduced the notion that the mere utterance of the word "Jehovah" was prohibited: so the true pronunciation has been lost. The Jews of the New Testament regarded as blasphemy the attribution of man to any divine quality (Matt. ix. 3, xxvi. 65; John xii. 46). The Christian writers considered the Christian refusal to honor Christ (Matt. xii. 39; Mark xv. 29; Acts xviii. 6, xxvi. 11) or God (Rom. ii. 24).

The blasphemy against the Holy Ghost (Matt. xii. 31; Mark iii. 29; Luke xii. 19) is the unpardonable sin. It implies a state of final and hopeless impenitence, and is committed by those who have again and again wilfully resisted the influences and warnings of the Holy Ghost, and have made themselves incapable of repentance, and consequently of pardon.

The Ancient Church called those blasphematici who fell away during persecution, those who taught heresies, those who, in the heat of passion, spoke irreverently of God and Christ: indeed, at last the term was applied to those who spoke against the Virgin Mary. In the Middle Ages the punishment was severe. The guilty one must stand for seven consecutive Sundays at the porch of the church, without cloak or shoes, fasting, and might besides be fined and imprisoned. Sometimes the tongues of blasphemers were cut out, or pierced by hot irons. Sometimes the punishment was death. In modern times the penalty has been made lighter. In the interests of morality and religion, it were surely desirable if all those who take God's name impiously upon their lips were made to feel the heavy hand of the State. (FROMMÜLLER C. BECK.)

BLASTARES, Matthias, a monk of the order of St. Basil, wrote in 335 a compilation of civil and ecclesiastical laws: Syntagma Alphabeticum Eorum Omnium quae in Sacris Canonibus Comprehenduntur, based on Justinian and Photius, and in the form of a juridical dictionary. The work, which was much used by the clergy of the Eastern Church, is found in BEVEREGIUS: Synodicon, T. II. P. II.

BLAURER (or Blarer, Blaarer), Ambrosius, b. at Constance, April 12, 1492; d. at Winterthur, Dec. 6, 1544; studied theology in Tübingen together with Melanchthon; entered in 1518 the Benedictine Monastery of Alpirsbach, and was afterwards chosen its abbot; but, having embraced the Reformation, he left the monastery in 1521, began to preach the new doctrines in Constance in 1525, and married in 1533. From 1534 to 1538 he was active in introducing the Reformation in Württemberg, after which he again retired to Constance; but when, in 1548, the Interim was introduced in that city, he left for Winterthur. His stand-point was one between Luther and Zwingli. His character was mild and conciliatory. The works he left are mostly pamphlets and letters, both in Latin and German. His life has been written by Theodor Keim, Stuttgart, 1860, and by Theodor Preissel, Stuttgart, 1861.

BLAYNEY, Benjamin, d. at Polshot, Wiltshire, Eng., Sept. 20, 1891; studied at Oxford; became professor of Hebrew in 1787, afterwards canon of Christ Church, and rector of Polshot, and published A Dissertation on Daniel's Seventy Weeks; The Sign given to Ahaz, new translations of Jeremiah and Lamentations, and Zecharias. He edited the Oxford Bible, 1769; greatly improved the text by applying with more consistency the principle of denoting additions to the original text by Italics, and by substituting for obsolete words those in common use; he added seventy-six marginal references, and sixty-six annotations; but unhappily the misprints of his edition were many.

BLEEK, Friedrich, b. at Ahrenbök, Holstein, July 4, 1793; d. at Bonn, Feb. 27, 1859; studied theology at Kiel and Berlin; began to lecture on biblical exegesis in the latter place in 1818, and was appointed professor there in 1823, and at Bonn in 1829. His principal works are his Brief an die Hebräer, published in three parts (1828, 1836, and 1840), and his Beiträge zur Evangelien-Kritik, Berlin, 1846, containing the ablest and most decisive defence of the genuineness of the Gospel of John. After his death his lectures were published, among which are, Introduction to the Old Testament, edited by I. Bleek and Ad. Kamphausen, Berlin, 1860, and translated into English by Venables; and Introduction to the New Testament, edited by I. Bleek, Berlin, 1862, and translated into English by Urwick. [The fourth German edition of the former appeared in Berlin, 1878, edited by J. Wellhausen, and the third of the latter in 1875, edited by W. Mangold. In each case the editors have taken unwarrantable liberties with the text, making Bleek the advocate of the editors' "advanced" views.] His stand-point as a biblical critic is, at least with respect to the New Testament, very conservative; but his method is severe, and his impartiality impregnable. With an immense erudition he connected great talent for arrangement, and perfect clearness of expression. His Lectures upon the Apocalypse (1862, Eng. trans., 1874), the Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon (1865), and Hebrews (1868), published in Berlin, carefully edited, and his Synoptische Erklärung der drei ersten Evangelien, edited by Holtzmann in Leipzig, 1860-2 vols. are as yet untranslated. — AD. KAMPHAUSEN.

BLEMMYDES, or BLEMMIDA, a Greek monk from a Macedonian monastery, who, with great learning and ability, defended the Roman doctrine on the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and Son in a dispute at Nicaea by the Emperor Ducas Vatazes (1222-55). On the same subject he afterwards composed two essays, which are found in Leo Allatius' Graecia Orthodoxa Scriptores, pp. 1-60. Theodore Lasarius made him patriarch of Constantinople (asaretzhe, as the Latin Empire was established in Constantinople, and the Greek emperor resided at Nicea); but he refused the honor, and remained in his monastery.

BLOMFIELD, Charles James, b. at Bury St. Edmunds, Suffolk, Eng., May 29, 1786; d. in Fulham Palace, Aug. 5, 1857; was educated at Cambridge, and became Bishop of Chester in 1824, and of London in 1828, from which office he retired in 1856, after a vigorous and effective administration. He was an excellent Greek scholar; wrote a Greek grammar (1828); edited Aeschylus, Callimachus, etc.; and contributed numerous critical papers on classical subjects to the periodicals. His theological writings comprise Five Lectures on John's Gospel (1823), Twelve Lectures on the Acts (1829), several collections of sermons, and a Manuel of Private and Family Prayers. See BIBER: Bishop Blomfield and his Times, 1857; and the excellent Memoir by his son, 1863.

BLONDEL, David, b. at Chalons-sur-Marne, 1591; d. at Amsterdam, April 6, 1655; was early appointed minister of the Reformed congregation of Hendan, near Paris, but received in 1646 a pension from the synod of Charenton, which enabled him to devote himself exclusively to literature, and moved in 1650 to Amsterdam as Vossius' successor in the chair of history. Most of his writings, of which a complete account is given by Nideron (vol. viii. p. 48), are theological-political, directed against Romanism, and are distinguished by immense learning, great acuteness, and a decided talent for combination. The most remarkable are: Pseudo-Isidorus et Torrianus Vapulantae, Geneva, 1628; De la primauté de l'Eglise, Geneva, 1641; Apologiapro Sententia Hieronymi de EpiscopisetPresbyteris, Amsterdam, 1646; Fa milier Éclaircisement (concerning Papess Johanna), Geneva, 1628; De laprimautéde l'Eglise, Amsterdam, 1664; Fam ilier Éclaircisement (concerning Papess Johanna), Amsterdam, 1647; De juré plebis in regimine ecclesiasticum, 1648.

BLOOD, Revenger of. There is a sense in which there is a right in nature (Rousseau). Each man has a right as such to avenge the death of his nearest and dearest relations. It was a right which the ancient law of the Medes and Persians (Eccles. ix. 17) recognized. The blood vengeance in those countries was reprobated, and the law provided for compensation to the injured parties, but not for the punishment of the offenders. The object of the ancient law was to prevent the perpetration of murder, not to punish those who committed it. The law of Moses, however, was more severe. The blood vengeance was sanctioned by the Mosaic law in the case of murder (Exod. xxii. 18, 19). The law of Moses provided that the blood of the murderer should be shed upon the murderer itself (Deut. xiv. 1). The law of Moses did not call for a general massacre, but only vengeance upon the murderer himself. It was only a right of blood revenge, not a right of blood feuds. The law of Moses was not an encouragement to murder, but a deterrence to it. The law of Moses was not a law of retaliation, but a law of retribution. The law of Moses was not a law of self-defense, but a law of self-control. The law of Moses was not a law of vengeance, but a law of justice.

BLOOMFIELD.

BLOUNT, Charles, b. at Upper Holloway, Middlesex, Eng., April 27, 1654; committed suicide, August, 1688; produced in 1679 a scandalous pamphlet whose vulgar obscenity gave general offence. In 1680 his translation of Philostrata's Life of Apollonius of Tyana, with its indirect attacks on Christianity, was suppressed. The most characteristic representation of his deistical stand-point is found in his Oracles of Reason, which, however, was not published until after his death. A collected edi-
BODY, Natural, Spiritual, and Mystical.

The Greek word ἄμα (body) is used in these three relations. The difference between the first two is well brought out by Rev. Dr. Kling: "The expression 'natural [or rather, physical] body' (ἄμα σαφονέ) denotes, in general, an organization that corresponds to the soul (ψυχή); and the 'spiritual body' (ἄμα θανατατική), one that corresponds to the spirit (πνεῦμα). The soul is that by means of which our spiritual part is linked to a physical life,—a life of impulse and sensation, dependent for its nourishment upon a world of sense. The corporeity corresponding to this, and determined by it, is, precisely on this account, made dependent upon this outward world, and is affected by it, and by reason of it, is exposed to all that is expressed by the words 'corruption,' 'dishonor,' and 'weakness,' of which death is the catastrophe. The nature of the spirit is, on the contrary, a free, supermundane life of light and love in God; and the spiritual body is an organization suited to its character, being lifted above all dependence on the outward world, and the consequences following from it, and displays itself in incorruption, glory, and power” (Lange's Comm. i Cor. xvi. 44, Amer. ed. p. 388).

The Mystical Body is a phrase indicative of the Christian Church; for the union which subsists between Christ and his Church is as intimate as that between the members of our bodies, and at the same time is mystical,—to be believed rather than understood. We owe to Paul the origin of this significant designation. Cf. 1 Cor. xi. 27; Eph. i. 23, ii. 10, iv. 4, 12, 16, v. 23, 30; Col. i. 18, 24, ii. 19, iii. 15. He draws certain practical conclusions from the existence of this relationship, as that different members have different functions, and that there should be no schism in the body. The important questions, however, relate to the way in which admittance is obtained, and the means of growth with the body. It is evident that the terms of admittance into the external Church are easy; but to be really joined and the means of growth with the body. BOEHME (often written in English Behmen), Jacob, b. at Alt-Seidenberg, in Upper-Lusatia, 1575; d. at Görlitz, in Silesia, Nov. 17, 1624; descended from a well-to-do peasant family; was educated from without; and in time this development ripened into a mystico-theosophical view of his nature. Boehme developed rapidly, without any influence while the religious and philosophical instincts of his nature were easy; but to be really joined and the means of growth with the body. It is evident that the terms of admittance into the external Church are easy; but to be really joined

In 1599, as master of his profession, in Görlitz, and unsystematically; and the unfinished manuscript, Die Morgenröthe im Aufgang, began to circulate among his friends. It happened to fall under the notice of the official ecclesiastical authority of the place, Gregorius Richter, and greatly scandalized him. He was a full-blooded German. In England they attracted much attention. Three English translations have appeared, by I. Sparrow, Edward Taylor, and William Law, of which the last is the best, London, 1764, 2 vols. The first complete edition was given by L. G. Gichtel in 1832, the last, by Schiebler, Leipzig, 1834-46, 6 vols. 1633. The Consolation Philosophica was translated into English by Preston, 1805.

BOGATZKY, Karl Heinrich von, b. at Jankow, in Lower Silesia, Sept. 7, 1690; d. at Halle, June 15, 1774; was educated as page at the ducal court of Weissenfels, but left it dissatisfied, and began in his twentieth year to study, first at Jena, then, since 1715, theology at Halle. Among the Pietists he found what he sought; and, after finishing his theological studies, he lived for several years among the nobility of Silesia, afterward, from 1740 to 1746, at the ducal court of Saalfeld, and finally at Halle, engaged in literary work of a devotional character. His Golden Treasury of the Children of God, translated into English, York, 1821, was first published at Breslau, 1718; the fifty-fifth edition was published in 1873. Also his Tagesbuch der Kinder Gottes, 2 vols., 1748, ran through many editions. Of his four hundred and eleven hymns, several obtained a place in the Buch der Kinder Gottes, 2 vols., 1748, translated into English by Preston, 1695.

BOCHERMANN, Jan, b. at Oplewert, Friesland, 1576; d. Sept. 7, 1637, at Franeker, where he was made professor of divinity (1633); took a very active part in the Arminian controversy; wrote Annotationes contra H. Grotium, and Adversus Hereticus, Van het Ketter Straffen, 1601.

BOCOMILES, a branch of the Cathari which developed in Thrace. Their name was formerly derived from Bog Milni, “God have mercy;” or Bog Milni, “Beloved by God;” but Shafforik, the great authority on Slavonic antiquities, has found in some old Slavonic record a Bulgarian bishop of the name Bogomil, who, in the middle of the tenth century, was the representative of the peculiar heresies of the sect, and this seems to give a better clue to the name. The mythology which the sect developed was very fantastic, — a mixture of Manicheism, Docetism, and wild fancy. But their views of morality and polity were exactly those of the other Cathari. They were decidedly anti-clerical. The Church, with its hierarchy, its worship of relics, images, and saints, etc., they considered the work of Satan. In the twelfth century they were very numerous in Philippopolis and Constantinople. One of their leaders, Basil, was burnt in the latter city in 1118. They were repeatedly condemned, and at times severely persecuted, but the German influence, which in this case was identical with the Roman influence, lost its firm hold on the country. In 1348 the University of Prague was founded, and in very short time it became one of the most brilliant centres of learning in Europe. But its most celebrated teachers, Conrad von Waldhausen, John Milic, Matthias von Janow, were the teachers of Hus. As the University consisted of four nations, — the Bohemian, Polish, Bavarian, and Saxon, — and each nation had a vote, the foreigners exercised a considerable influence on the direction of its affairs. But in 1408 the original statutes were altered, and the Bohemian nation obtained three votes. Irritated by this slight, the Bavarian and Saxon nations left, and founded the University of Leipzig; but thereby the national movement in Bohemia became stronger. Nevertheless, lived on through the whole period of the middle ages. Their system of doctrines is completely expounded in Euthymius Zigabenus: Panoplia, edited by Gieseler, Göttingen, 1852. BOHEMIA. Christianity was introduced in Bohemia from Moravia in the latter part of the ninth century. A generation previously (845) some Czech noblemen were baptized at the court of Lewis the German, and Bohemia was put down as a Christian country belonging to the diocese of Ratisbon; but it was not until the baptism of the Bohemian duke, Borziway, and his wife Ludmilla, at the court of Swatopulik of Moravia, and the arrival of Methodius in Bohemia, that Christianity became firmly established in the country. A strong re-action took place under Borziway’s son, Wratilaw, whose heathen spouse, Drahomira, had Ludmilla and other Christian members of the reigning family murdered. But when, under Boleslas II., the German influence became prevailing in the country, Christianity was again in the ascendency, and a bishopric was founded in Prague (973). A century later on, all traces of Paganism disappeared. In 1092 the last sacred forests were felled, and the last heathen priests exiled.

Methodius, who was born and bred in the Greek Church, was the first bishop of Bohemia, on an exclusively national basis. The native language was used in divine service; the Bible was read in the Slavonic translation; the Lord’s Supper was administered in both kinds; the Roman demand of the eulogies of the clergy was disregarded, etc. This original independence of Rome determined the whole character of the history of the Bohemian Church, which, indeed, is one continuous contest between a spontaneous development, national and independent, on the one side, and plots for centralization and absorption on the other. In Adalbert the Roman designs were completely foiled: in other cases they succeeded. The tragic fate which pursued Adalbert throughout his life was his connection with Rome. Under Gregory VII., however (1073–85), the Roman liturgy and the Roman language became prevalent in the Bohemian Church.

During the fourteenth century the contest grew hotter and hotter, and in the beginning of the fifteenth the battle began. In 1346 the archbishop of Prague was founded, and the metropolitan connection between Bohemia and the see of Rome was restored. In 1349 the Bohemian Church, which, indeed, in 1348 the University of Prague was founded, and in very short time it became one of the most brilliant centres of learning in Europe. But its most celebrated teachers, Conrad von Waldhausen, John Milic, Matthias von Janow, were the teachers of Hus. As the University consisted of four nations, — the Bohemian, Polish, Bavarian, and Saxon, — and each nation had a vote, the foreigners exercised a considerable influence on the direction of its affairs. But in 1408 the original statutes were altered, and the Bohemian nation obtained three votes. Irritated by this slight, the Bavarian and Saxon nations left, and founded the University of Leipzig; but thereby the national movement in Bohemia became stronger. Nevertheless, lived on through the whole period of the middle ages. Their system of doctrines is completely expounded in Euthymius Zigabenus: Panoplia, edited by Gieseler, Göttingen, 1852. understand that by force nothing could be done. Intrigue was then adopted, and it succeeded better. The Hussites themselves were divided into two parties,—the radicals and the moderates, the Taborites and the Calixtines. By granting the tesaur of the crown, the Lant's Supper was banished, and the reading of the Bible in the Slavic translation, etc., the Council of Basel succeeded (1437) in effecting a reconciliation with the Calixtines, and thus the split between the Roman and the Bohemian Church was healed externally.

Externally, however, below the surface, the movement which had produced Hus continued its course. The Taborites disappeared; the Calixtines lost their individual stamp; but from the national depths arose the Bohemian Brethren,—a sect which Luther always treated with regard, and spoke of with respect, though at one time he called them a new order of monks only. At the time of the Reformation this sect formed the most prominent feature in the religious life of Bohemia; and through the Bohemian Brethren a lively intercourse was maintained between the Czechs and the Protestant leaders, both Luther and Calvin. But in 1526, by the extinction of the house of Jagellons, Bohemia fell to the house of Austria, and the effects of this change were not slow in making themselves felt. Immediately after the battle of Mühlberg (April 24, 1547) Ferdinand I. sent the Jesuits into Bohemia to re-romanize the country. All evangelical parties—Lutherans, Calvinists, and Bohemian Brethren—were persecuted; and numbers of families were driven out of the country. Under Maximilian II. (1564–76) circumstances bettered; he was tolerant. But under Rudolph II. (1576–1612) the Jesuits again began the game. This time they lost, however. The Bohemian Brethren compelled Rudolph II. to sign a compact (July 8, 1609) by which their social position became legalized, and complete liberty of worship was granted to them. Under Matthias (1612–19) this compact was broken by the government, not openly and by force, but, as it behooved a tool of the Jesuits, on the sly, and by chicanery. The Brethren complained; the government prevaricated; and finally the government threw representatives of the government, Martinitz and Slawata, out of the window in Hradchín, May 23, 1618, and on the next day the Thirty-Years' War began.

The battle of the White Mountains (Nov. 8, 1620) made Ferdinand II. master of the country; and with a high hand he now carried through what his ancestor, Ferdinand I., had only attempted,—the re-romanization of Bohemia. By a series of decrees, beginning from June 20, 1621, were expelled, first the Calvinist ministers, then the preachers of the Bohemian Brethren, and finally the Lutheran ministers, Czech and German; and, the evangelical party having thus been deprived of their teachers and leaders, the conversion commenced. Of the Protestant nobility, those who had taken active part in the rebellion lost the crop. See The Reform of Christianity in Bohemia; their marriages were considered and treated by the law as concubinage; their children were taken from them, and educated by the Roman priests; their poor and sick were expelled from the hospitals and asylums. Thirty thousand burgher families left the country; with respect to the peasantry, the case was rather delicate. What good would the country be to the Emperor or the Pope, if there were no peasants to till the soil? They could not be banished. But in this emergency Lichtenstein's dragoons proved of good use. The peasants were driven together in large crowds, and kept starving till they submitted. Sometimes mothers were tied to the door-post, and compelled to see their babies starving before their eyes. Sometimes all the inmates of a household were put out together. King Ruprecht's cattle left starving, until the frantic howling of the animals drove the men crazy. Thus Protestant Bohemia was converted to the Roman Church. The treaty of Westphalia (1618) does not even mention the Protestants in Bohemia, for officially there were none. They had almost all gone (more than one-third of the whole population), and in their stead had come 1,130 Jesuits, who enjoyed a yearly revenue of thirty millions.

Protestantism was, nevertheless, not completely eradicated in Bohemia, as may be seen from the very severe measures of repression which from time to time were employed. As late as 1760, some men were condemned to death for having peddled Protestant tracts and pamphlets among the peasants; and, when Joseph II. issued his edict of toleration (Oct. 13, 1781), Protestant congregations were immediately forestalled in various places of the country. Generally speaking, however, Bohemia is still a Roman-Catholic country. While in the seventeenth century four-fifths of its population were evangelical, and one-fifth Roman-Catholic, only two per cent of its present population are members of the Bohemian Brethren or the Taborites, and one-fifth are Roman Catholic. The Roman Church comprises the archbishopric of Prague and the bishoprics of Leitmeritz, Königgrätz, and Budweis, with 5,226 churches and chapels, and 3,538 priests. The evangelical churches were organized by the law of Jan. 23, 1806. They are divided between the adherents of the Lutheran or Augsburg Confession, and those of the Reformed or Helvetic Confession. Both, however, are ruled by the Church Council in Vienna. At the Basel Conference of the Evangelical Alliance (Sept. 6, 1879), the case of some Bohemian Baptists, a sect not recognized by Austria, who had been disturbed particularly in their family worship, was presented, whereupon it was resolved that a committee be appointed to present the case to the emperor. This was done upon Nov. 6, 1879, and the persecution was stopped. See also Verhandlungen der evangelischen Allianz in Basel, 1879, Basel, 1879, pp. 902–904.

BOHEMIAN BRETHREN, a sect which arose in Bohemia in the latter part of the fifteenth century, spread rapidly, and comprised one-fourth of the population in the latter part of the sixteenth century, but was suppressed or banished by the atrocious measures of Ferdinand II., and lived latent and in exile, until, in the eighteenth century, it was revived in Moravia by Count Zinzendorf, and became known once more under the name of the Moravian Brethren. The general outline of the history of the sect is perfectly clear,—its period of rise and organization under Gregor (1457–94), its period of expansion and consolidation under Lukas of Prague (1494–1528), the persecutions were raised against them, he procured a place of refuge (1457) at Kunwald, near Prague, and some other Brethren went on a journey to Italy and France was the cause and the occasion of that intimate literary intercourse which existed between the Bohemian Brethren and the Waldenses, and which has given rise to much misunderstanding. It is now proved beyond doubt that the famous Waldensian work Apoc es la causa is a translation of a Bohemian work on the Reasons for Secession from the Roman Church and again that the equally famous Waldensian work Anti-christ is founded on Apoc es la causa.

The first seed of discord was sown in this field of general harmony by Procopius of Neuhaus; a scholar, who had a conflict with the Morarian Brethren. The negotiations with Wittenberg were stopped just as the last trace of Crypto-Calvinism was wiped out there; and in aftertime, when the Bohemian Brethren were gradually absorbed by other Reformed denominations, it was with the Calvinists they easiest amalgamated.
These frequent intercommunications with other parties and foreign nations led to a very lively literary activity in the Unitas Fratrum. Young men were sent to foreign universities, especially to Tubingen, to study; collections of literary materials were made; libraries were founded, etc.; and soon the results of these exertions were felt, not only in the devotional and controversial writings of the day, but also in the fields of history, grammar, etc. The great monument of this activity is the Bohemian translation of the Bible,—the "Bible of Kralicz," thus called after its place of printing. There were earlier Bohemian translations, but they were made from the Vulgate. The Bible of Kralicz is the first made from the original, and it is a masterpiece. The New Testament, translated by Blahoslaw, appeared in 1564; the Old, translated by a number of scholars, from 1579 to 1593. It cannot be denied, however, that this extraordinary literary activity was accompanied by a relaxation of discipline and by a gradual transformation of the very spirit. The old Unitas Fratrum kept aloof from all secular affairs which had no direct religious bearing. The Bohemian Brethren of the seventeenth century became a political party; and it was not the religious conflict alone which brought Ferdinand II. down upon the country, and opened the 'Thirty Years' War.

BOLIVIA. A republic of South America, comprising an area of about 330,000 square miles, with 1,657,352 inhabitants (1858), of whom 245,000 are independent Indians, the rest a mixed race of Indians and whites. The Roman-Catholic Church is the Established Church of the country, with an exclusive privilege of public worship. There are no evangelical congregations in Bolivia. The Church comprises an archbishopric, La Plata, with residence at Chuquisaca, and three bishoprics, La Paz, Sucre, and Cochabamba: the number of priests amounted in 1846 to 1,517. There are four seminaries at the episcopal residences. In 1826 the State confiscated and sold the estates of the Church, and assumed the obligation to maintain the church officers; but the State is bankrupt.

BOLLANDEISTS is the name given to those Jesuits who carried on the Acta Sanctorum; —a vast collection of hagiography and martyrology but lately finished, intended to embrace the life of every saint in the Calendar. Héribert Roseweld, professor in the Jesuit College of Douay (b. at Utrecht, Jan. 22, 1689; d. at Antwerp, Oct. 15, 1699), conceived in 1659 the plan of uniting all the legends of saints and martyrs in one work of eighteen folio volumes; but he lived to print only the beginning of his series, Vita Patrum (1615). By command of the order the continuation of the work was intrusted to Johann Bolland (b. at Tillemont in Brabant, Aug. 13, 1596; d. at Antwerp, Sept. 12, 1665). Antwerp was made the headquarters of the enterprise, and, assisted by his eminent pupil Georg Henschen (1600–81), a vast correspondence was carried on with libraries and monasteries all over Europe. Libraries and monasteries were ransacked for information about saints, and the result was an unparalleled collection of such material. The editors worked with fiery zeal. In 1634 printing was begun, and in 1643 two thick folios appeared, which contained the Calendar for January; in 1658 two others, with that for February. In 1699 the Jesuit Daniel Paperboeck (1625–1714) was added to the editorial staff. He conscientiously executed his part of the work, and lived to see twenty-six volumes appear. On the suggestion of Pope Alexander VII., Henchen and Paperboeck made a journey through Germany, Italy, and France in search of materials. So well drilled was the staff, that the great undertaking went on, whoever died. The Bollandists, as this staff was called, suffered with the rest of their brethren in the dispersion of the order (1773). One of them was imprisoned for two years. However, they persevered in spite of many difficulties and removals. The fifty-third folio volume appeared in 1794, containing Oct. 12 to 15 inclusive. The collection they made with such care was happily, to a great extent, preserved,—the printed works at the Hague, and the manuscript at Brussels. From 1837 the Belgian Government contributed six thousand francs annuallly, and so the work is at last finished in sixty-one volumes folio, with a supplement, Paris, 1875. Le Blant: Acta Martyrum et leur sources, Paris, 1880.

BOLSEC, Jerome Hermes, author of two notorious biographies; a Parisian Carmelite monk of the sixteenth century, who, compelled to flee the city because of a sermon he preached, left his order, betook himself to Ferrara, studied medicine, and married. Converted to Protestantism, he went to Geneva, but soon after was imprisoned for publicly opposing Calvin's cardinal doctrine of predestination. He was released only to be banished, Dec. 23, 1551. Incautiously he continued his attacks in Bern, and therefore found a change of residence desirable. Went to Paris; but his opinions were condemned by a synod at Orléans (1550), and a recantation required. He refused; went to Lausanne as a physician; but, as the condition of residence there was his signing the Confession of Bern, he chose rather to leave, and return to France. Probably to no one's surprise, he went back south thereafter to the fold of the Roman-Catholic Church. He died at Lyons, 1556. He gave expression to his bitterness in his splendid Histoire de la vie, morts, actes, doctrine, constance et mort de Jean Calvin, Paris, 1577; and Histoire de la vie, morts et départemens de Th. Beze, Paris, 1578. The first work appeared in Cologne, in Latin, 1580, in German, 1581; last ed. in French, Lyons, 1875; the second, in Latin, Paris, 1853. The two works were reprinted, with a life of their author, at Geneva, in 1853.

BOLZANO, Bernhard, a Roman-Catholic theologian and philosopher, b. at Prague, Oct. 5, 1781; d. there Dec. 18, 1848. He showed marked ability in mathematics and philosophy, and was appointed professor of the philosophy of religion in the university of his native city when twenty-four years old. He at that time was already in holy orders; consequently he was subjected to ecclesiastical censure when his views developed themselves in a course contrary to the ideas of the Church. The Prince Archbishop Salm-Salm, however, protected him, and for some time he escaped expulsion, and enjoyed great popularity. But in 1820 he was charged with complicity with the students in their revolutionary schemes, and compelled to resign his chair. He was also suspended from his priestly functions in consequence of any alleged errors in his works. He lived by his pen from that time forth. His works are very numerous. Of most interest to us is the Lehrbuch der Religionswissenschaft, Sulzbach, 1837, 4 vols., which contains a philosophical representation of all the dogmas of the Roman-Catholic theology.

BONA.

BONAVENTURA, or Giovanni di Fidenza (Doctor Seraphicus), b. at Bagnarea in Tuscany, 1221; d. at Lyons, July 15, 1274; entered the order of the Franciscans in 1243; studied theology and philosophy in Paris, under Alexander of Hales and John of Rotha; succeeded the latter in the Franciscan chair of theology in the University, 1253, and was chosen general of his order in 1256, and made cardinal-bishop of Alba in 1273. His last public act was a brilliant and most impressive speech, delivered to the Council of Lyons in May, 1274, for the union between the Eastern and Western Churches. He was canonized by Sixtus V., in 1609.

Already, before he became its general, Bonaventura had had an opportunity to work for his order. In the great contest between the Sorbonne and the Mendicant orders (1254-60), occasioned by the attacks of Guillaume de St. Amour on his Doctor Seraphicus, he designated Vigilus as such; but, as this privilege involved an infringement of the royal prerogatives, King Athalarich compelled Boniface to cancel the designation, to burn the document on which it was based, and to declare himself guilty of treason. See Vita Bon. I., in Muratori’s Rer. Ital. Script. III., p. 116; and Constant: Epist. Rom. Pontif., Paris, 1721, p. 1007 sq., where his letters are found.— Boniface II. (Sept. 22, 530–October, 532), a Goth, obtained the election by bribery, which occasioned the Roman Senate to issue a decree that no election to the chair of St. Peter should be valid, if the person elected could be proved guilty of influencing the voters by promises. Boniface compelled the Roman clergy to give him the right of choosing his successor, and he designated Vigilus as such; but, as this privilege involved an infringement of the royal prerogatives, King Athalarich compelled Boniface to cancel the designation, to burn the document on which it was based, and to declare himself guilty of treason. See Vita Bon. I., in Muratori’s Rer. Ital. Script. III., p. 127.

Boniface III. (Feb. 19, 607–Nov. 12, 607) was by Gregory the Great (who styled himself servus servorum dei) sent as a prokrisiarius to the court of Constantinople in July, 607, in order to compel the Constantinopolitan patriarch to renounce the title of episcope universalis: and so intimate became his friendship with, and so strong his influence over, the mean and vicious Phokas, that the latter, in 607, was actually induced to transfer the title from the patriarch to the pope. See Vita Bonif. III., in Muratori: Rer. Ital. Script. III. p. 135; BALE: Die grossen Lom- gobi, IV. 37; I. M. LORENZ: Examen Decreti Phocae, 1790. — Boniface IV. (Sept. 15, 608–May 25, 615) continued the alliance which his predecessor had concluded with Phokas, and received permission from him to transform the Pantheon, which Agrippa had built in Rome, and dedicated to Cybele and all the Olympian gods, into a Christian church, Sancta Maria Rotunda. After the overthrow of Phokas by Heraclius, he entertained friendly relations also with the latter, without taking umbrage of his monophysite tendencies. See the letter of Columban in EBRAH: Die iro-scolastische Missionskirche, Gutersloh, 1873, p. 95. For his relations with the Anglo-Saxon Church, see BEDA: Hist. Eccl. II. 4. His life is given in Muratori: Rer. Ital. Script. III. p. 135. — Boniface V. (Dec. 24, 618–Oct. 25, 625) made a journey to Constantinople to solicit the see of England. See Vita Bonif. V., in Muratori: Rer. Ital. Script. III. p. 135; BEDA: Hist. Eccl. II. 7, § 10, 11. — Boniface VI. (898) was raised to the papal throne by a mob, after the death of Formosus (though John VIII. had deprived him of his ecclesiastical offices, on account of his vicious life), but died fifteen days later. — Boniface VII. (974–985) began his reign by having Benedict VI. strangled in the Castle of S. Angelo, but fled himself shortly after with the papal treasure to Constantinople, where he lived nine years. After the death of Otho II., he returned to Rome, and had John XIV. poisoned in the same castle, but was himself murdered in the streets of Rome eleven months afterwards. FERRUCCHI, in his Investigazioni su la Persona et il Pontificato di Bonif. VII., 1856, tries to whitewash this monstrum horrendum. — Boniface VIII. (Dec. 12th, 1294–Oct. 11, 1303) entertained the most extravagant ideas of the papal office, as instituted by God to give judgment over kings and empires, to examine the persons elected kings, and reject them if found incapable, etc.; and these ideas he actually endeavored to realize, thereby involving himself in strife with all the princes of Christendom. In Germany he succeeded. Adolf of Nassau and Albrecht of Habsburg he treated as simple vassals; but Erik VIII. of Denmark took no notice of his demands; Wenzel II. of Bohemia openly defied them; and Edward I. of England laid them before Parliament, which met them with a spiteful protest. It was in the contest, however, with Philip IV. the Fair of France, that this question of the secular supremacy of the Pope was decided generally and for ever. The relations between Boniface VIII. and Philip IV. were originally very friendly. The first case of discord, however, occurred already in 1295, when the French clergy complains of the taxes which Philip IV. levied on them, and the Pope addressed the King with the bull Clericis laicos, Feb. 25, 1296. The Pope was answered by forbidding all exportation of gold and silver, coined or uncoined, from France; and as soon as the Pope felt the famine in his treasury, he submitted, and attempted to explain away the most offensive expressions in his bull. Again the relations became very friendly. But, during the great centennial festival of 1200, the Pope showed himself to the multitude one day in the pontifical robe, with the tiara, and another day in the imperial mantle, with the crown; and in the same year Pierre Duclus, royal advocate of France, published his Summaria brevis, developing how and by what means Constantinople, Spain, Italy, etc., could be brought under the French sceptre. There were aspirations of a universal empire on both sides, and a collision was unavoidable. The appearance of Bernard of Soissons, Bishop of Pammers, at the French court, 1301, as papal legate, and urging the King to undertake a crusade, gave the occasion. The King had the bishop imprisoned. The Pope ordered the bishop released immediately, and summoned the bishops, abbots, and doctors of France to Rome to hold a council. The King released the bishop, but forbade the French clergy to go to Rome. Several went, nevertheless; and the result of this synod (opened Oct. 30, 1302) was the bull Unam sanctam, which, in a style never used by the papal curia, either before or after, sets forth the doctrine of the two swords, both intrusted to the Pope. The strife now assumed dimensions which made it of world-wide importance. The Pope, who resided at that time in Agram, prepared himself to speak the anathema against Philip IV. in the church of the city on Sept. 8, 1303; when, on Sept. 7, Guillaume Nogaret of Toulouse, vice-chancellor to Philip IV., in connection with some members of the family of the Colonna, which had been expelled by Boniface VIII., and some members of the nobility of the Romagna, which had been bought by Philip IV., penetrated into the sleeping-room of the Pope, and made him a prisoner. He was soon after liberated by the citizens; but he returned to Rome a broken-hearted man, and died shortly after. On his order was issued the Edict Teutus (see article CAESARIA, LAW). See I. RUBENS: Bonif. VIII., Rome, 1651; L. Tosti: Storia di Bonifazio VIII., Monte Casino, 1846; W. DRUMANN: Geschichte Bonifacius VIII., Königsberg, 1852; CHANTEL: Bonif. VII., Paris, 1862. — Boniface IX. (Nov. 2, 1389–Oct. 1, 1404), a mean and greedy character, spent his reign in useless intrigues against the Popes of Avignon. See Vita Bonif. IX., in Muratori: Rer. Ital. Script. III. p. 830; DU PYS: Histoire du Schisme, 1378–1438, Paris, 1854; MAIMBOURG: Histoire du Grand Schisme d'Occident, Paris, 1678. — BONIFACE. (Winfrid, the "Apostle of Germany"), b. at Kirtton near Exeter, between 680 and 683; d. near Dokkum in Friesland, June 5, 754 or 755; a Saxony by birth; was educated in the monasteries of Abercorn and Nuthurst; and had already acquired a name for learning and piety, when, in 716, he left his native country, and joined the missionary Willibrord in Friesland. Political circumstances, however, made missionary labor an impossibility in that field at that moment; and he therefore turned to the monasteries. In 718 he again started for the Continent. This time he went to France, and thence to Rome; and with papal authorization he repaired in 719 to Germany. His first attempts as a missionary in Bavaria and in the Frankish dominions failed, and he once more joined Willibrord in Friesland. After the death of the latter, Boniface returned to Germany (722) and in the region between the Lahn and the Saale he finally succeeded in taking root and forming for himself a basis of operation. From this moment to his death he labored with great success in Hesse, Bavaria, and, after the death of Charles Martel, also in the Frankish Empire. In 729 he was made a bishop; in 732, an archbishop. His last effort was a tour into Friesland, where a Pagan reaction had taken place after the death of Willibrord; and here he was killed while administering confirmation to those who had remained faithful. His work consisted, however, not so much in the preaching of Christianity as in the propagation of Romanism, which to him was identical with Christianity organized, and which, perhaps, was the best for that age. He labored mostly in countries which had already been Christianized by the Irish and Scottish missionaries; and the result of his labor was simply the establishment of the Roman hierarchy. He formed bishoprics, and secured bishops who were willing to administer their dioceses in submission to the Pope. To convert Pagans to Christianity was not his only or his chief office, but to drive away by force or intrigue the independent Christian missionaries, and replace them with Roman priests; and at the time of his death that part of Germany which had received Christianity was firmly connected with the Roman see.

BONNIVARD, Franz, the "Prisoner of Chillon," b. 1493 at Seyssel on the Rhone; d. 1570 at Geneva. He was the younger son of a Savoy family which had an almost hereditary claim upon several benefices: so when he entered the Church he thought to hold them; but, through the intrigues of the Duke Charles of Savoy, he was deprived of all save the priory of St. Victor, whose dependences comprised a country as large as that of the Genevan territory. This unexpected turn of fortune affected his life, and is the key to his career; for his hatred of the duke led him to fraternize with the young Genevan patriots who were resisting the duke's attempts to obtain control of that city. Bonnivard quickly became the leader of the movement, and was largely instrumental in bringing Geneva and Freiburg into alliance (1518). His devotion cost him for a time his priory. In 1519 the duke entered Geneva. Bonnivard fled, was betrayed by his travelling companions, and imprisoned for twenty months. Nine years later he obtained from the duke a "safe-conduct," and set out on a visit to his aged parents at Seyssel. But the duke broke his word, arrested him at Lausanne (May 26, 1530), and imprisoned him in the Castle of Chillon, where for six years he pined. It is this imprisonment which Byron has immortalized in verse, more musical than truthful. The first two years were tolerable; but after a visit from the duke he was put in the dungeon now shown to visitors. It is only a local tradition that he was fastened to a pillar. In the spring of 1536 the Bernese took the castle, and freed him. During his incarceration the priory and Church of St. Victor had been razed, and the income of the estates applied to the city hospital. By the intervention of the Bernese, the original sum of twenty thalers, granted him by the city for the payment of his debts, was increased to eight hundred, which he received in addition to a pension of two hundred thalers. Bonnivard then married, in all four times, but not happily, nor had he children. His last wife was accused of adultery. Confessed to the charge on the rack, was put in a sack, and drowned in the Rhone; while his paramour, a former monk, was beheaded. Bonnivard made the city of Geneva his heri on condition that it paid his debts; but his estate consisted only of his books, which formed the foundation of the city library.

Bonnivard's literary activity was the chief reason for the influence his contemporaries showed him; for his career was somewhat dishonorable, wavering, and time-serving. In 1517 he was entitled "poet-laureate;" and after his liberation he was commissioned by the magistracy to write a history of the republic of Geneva. This work, called Chroniques de Genève, ends with 1551, is interesting, full of anecdotes, but so marred by contradictions and exaggerations as to be unreliable, and probably did not suit his patrons. Strangely enough, his more important works were not printed until this century, although the autographs have always been in the city library. Those now printed are: Les Chroniques de Genève, Geneva, 1831, 4 vols.; Adix et des devises de l'Angleterre (1609), Genève et Paris, 1849; Adix et des devises de la suisse (1609), Genève, 1850 (with an historical introduction). BONNER, Edmund, b. at Hanley, Worcestershire, Eng., about 1495; d. as a prisoner in London, Sept. 3, 1569; was educated at Oxford, and received his first preferment from Cardinal Wolsey. After the death of Wolsey, however, he seemed to veer around towards the Reformation; was appointed chaplain to Henry VIII.: employed in various embassies to France, Germany, and the Pope; and made Bishop of London in 1540; but as soon as the King died, therefore, the episcopal seal of the bishoprick was cancelled; he refused to take the oath of supremacy, and was committed to the Fleet. After his release he was twice reprimanded by the privy council for neglect in the cause of the Reformation, and finally committed to the Marshalsea, and deprived of his see, 1549. Restored by Queen Mary, he took his revenge. In the course of three years he condemned more than two hundred Protestants to the stake; and in many cases Cardinal Pole and other champions of the Roman Church had to interfere with his persecuting fury. Immediately after the accession of Elizabeth, however, he was again committed to the Marshalsea, and died in confinement. See Life and Defence of Bishop Bonner, London, 1849. Mitford: Essays on Subjects connected with the Reformation, London, 1849.

BONOSUS, Bishop of Sardica in the latter part of the fourth century; held that Mary, in her marriage with Joseph, had borne several children beside Jesus; for this opinion he was condemned.
by a synod of Ilybian bishops, and the condemnation was confirmed by the Bishop of Rome. He found adherents, however, who afterwards affiliated with the Photinians in the East and the Adoptans in the West. See C. W. F. Walch: De Barbarus Heretici, Gottingen, 1794.

Boos, Martin, b. at Huttenried, Bavaria, Dec. 25, 1702; d. at Sayn, near Coblenz, Aug. 29, 1825; studied theology at the University of Dilingen, where an evangelical movement had been started by Sailer, Zimmer, and Weber. Without leaving the Roman Church, he began to preach justification by faith; and everywhere, in Bavaria, Austria, and Prussia, his preaching caused a religious revival, which the Roman clergy feared and hated. He was driven from place to place, hunted out of Bavaria by the Inquisition, banished from Austria by the emperor, and hardly left in peace in Dusseldorf and Sayn under the protection of a Protestant government. See I. Gossner: S. M. Boos, 1831, translated into English, London, 1836; Bodemann: M. Boos, Bielefeld, 1834.

Borger, Guigues, b. in Guineen in the beginning of the sixteenth century; studied in the University of Bourges; entered under the order of the Carmelites, and was elected abbot; but, having become acquainted with the ideas of the Reformation, he abandoned the cowl, and left France; in 1541 visited Wittenberg; occupied for some time Calvin's chair in Strassburg; returned to Bourges, and lectured on Hebrew and exegesis in the university under the protection of the Queen of Navarre. Persecutions, however, compelled him to leave his native country a second time. In 1557 he was made professor in the University of Heidelberg, and in 1574 he moved to Lausanne, where he died in 1582. A list of his works, mostly consisting of polemics against the Romanists and the Lutherans, is found in Haag: La France Protestante. See also Melchior Adam: Vita Theologorum Externorum.

Bora, Catharina von, b. at Bitterfeld in the countship of Meissen, Jan. 29, 1499; d. at Torgau, Dec. 20, 1552. She was a nun in the monastery of Nimtzsch, near Grimma; but, with the cognizance of Luther, she fled from the monastery together with eight other nuns (April 4, 1523), and repaired to Wittenberg. June 13, 1525, she married Luther, to whom she bore six children. Luther first offered her to his friend Amsdorf; but she declined, her aspirations rising higher. He married, he said, for three reasons,—to please his father, to please the Pope, and to vex the Devil. He lived in happy wedlock, and wrote many lives of Luther. Among the many libels concerning Luther's marriage the principal one is Eusebius Engelhard: Lucifer Wittenbergensis oder der Morgenstern von Wittenberg, Landsberg, 1747-49, 2 vols.

Borborians, from ἄρογος, ἁρογός ("dirt-eaters"), is the name of one of the most extraneous Gnostic sects, mentioned by Epiphanius, Hares. 26, and by Augustine, De Haeres.

relinquish the Church, and marry; but he refused. His whole ambition had become concentrated on the one idea of restoring the Church to its former dignity and power; and to the realization of this idea he devoted his whole life: he is the hero of the ecclesiastical re-action of the sixteenth century. When the Council of Trent decreed that the bishops should reside in their dioceses, he immediately repaired to Milan, preceded by the Jesuits and the Inquisition. Milan was not only the largest, but also the most difficult diocese of Italy, comprising fifteen suffragan bishoprics, twelve hundred and twenty churches, and a hundred and seventy monasteries, pervaded by all the most hideous corruptions of the Roman Church, and stirred up by the ideas of the Reformation penetrating into the country from Switzerland. But the young archbishop was equal to the task. In spite of the violent opposition which went so far as to attempt his life, he restored discipline in the Church, the monasteries, and the Catholic Church. Among his Reformers he pursued to the top of the Alps, never sparing even their lives. No wonder that the grateful Church has adopted him among its saints, especially as his personal life was stainlessly pure, and as rich in self-sacrifice as full of energy and activity. He was canonized in 1610 by Paul V.

LIT.—Ils Opera Omnia were published in Milan, 1747. His life was written in Latin by Bascapi, Ingolstadt, 1592, and De Vir, Amsterdam, 1833; in German by Sailer, Augsburg, 1823, and Dieringer, Cologne, 1846; in French by Touron, Paris, 1751; and in Italian by Gussano, Rome, 1610, and Aristide Sala, Milan, 1857-61, 3 vols. The last-mentioned work is the principal one.

BENEDICT.

BORROW, George, author of the Bible in Spain, b. at East Dereham, Norfolk, Eng., February, 1803; d. July 30, 1881. After receiving a good-school education, he was in 1818 articled to a solicitor in Norwich; but, following his natural bent, he abandoned the law for literature and philology, acquired several modern languages, including that of the English gypsies, did hack-work for London publishers, travelled, and so spent many years. From 1833 to 1839 he was in the service of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and labored as a colportor in Russia and Spain. In the latter country he was twice imprisoned. At St. Petersburg he edited the New Testament in the Manchur or Chinese-Tartar language, at Madrid, the New Testament in Spanish, and translated the Gospel of Luke into the Spanish-Gypsy language. Having returned to England, he issued Zanzeb, or An Account of the Gypsies in Spain, London, 1841, and in 1843, The Bible in Spain, or the Journeys, Adventures, and Imprisonments of an Englishman in an Attempt to circulate the Scriptures on the Peninsula. By the latter work he achieved a great reputation. The remainder of his life was devoted to literature, and to researches into the manners and speech of the gypsies in Europe. He was a popular and prolific writer.

BOSSUET, Jacques Bénigne, b. at Dijon, Sept. 27, 1627; d. in Paris, April 12, 1704; was educated in the Jesuit school of his native town, and made his theological studies in the Collège de Navarre in Paris; lived there for some time in retirement at St. Lazare before he removed to Metz, where he held a rich benefice, and developed a great activity in controversies with the Reformed church. As Bishop of Condé in 1668, he resigned this office, when, in 1670, he was appointed tutor to the Dauphin, with whom he said till 1681, when he was made Bishop of Meaux. Bossuet first attracted attention as an orator by his sermons; and, so far as eloquence is an art, his Discours Funèbres must be ranked among the highest specimens of Christian eloquence, though they reflect the splendor and greatness of Louis Quatorze more vividly than the power and humility of the Gospel. As tutor to the Dauphin he wrote Traité de la connaissance de Dieu et de soi-même and Discours sur l'Histoire universelle, the latter of which is a strikingly original attempt to construct a Christian philosophy of history on the principle that the destinies of nations are controlled by Providence in the interest of the Church. Among his controversial writings against the Protestants, the two most remarkable are Exposition de la doctrine de l'Eglise catholique sur les matières de controverse (1671), and Histoire des Variations des Eglises protestantes (1688). The latter was very sharply criticised by Juriè and Basnage, and involved its author in a long and vehement controversy. His fanaticism against the Reformation made him so blind that he characterized the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) as “le plus bel usage de l'autorité.” He was no ultramontanist, however. On the contrary, he presided in 1682 over the assembly of the French clergy which the King had convened in order to defend the royal prerogatives and the liberties of the Gallican Church against the claims of the Pope. Nor was he in the least tainted by mysticism. His attacks on Fénelon and the Quietists approached very near to persecution. His passion was cold; and his peculiar ideas of church-polity corresponded to, if they were not dictated by, Louis Quatorze’s “L’état, c’est moi.” He was no ultramontanist, however. The latest and best edition of his works appeared at Versailles, 1819 sqq., in 46 vols., edited by Cardinal Beausset, who also wrote his life. See also TaBaraud: Supplément aux Histoires de Bossuet et de Fénelon, Paris, 1822; [H. L. Sidney Lear: Bossuet and his Contemporaries, London, 1874. A translation of select sermons was published, 2d ed., London, 1801].

BOST, Paul Ami Isaac David, one of the leaders of the Réveil in Switzerland and France, b. June 10, 1790, in Geneva; d. Dec. 14, 1874, in La Force. His father was a Moravian, pious and hard-working, served as chorister, and taught music; and piety and musical tastes were shown by the son. He studied theology in Geneva; but at that time the Bible was scarcely opened, so when he was ordained (1814) he had little heart for his profession. Shortly after, however, he was converted. For the greater part of his active life he was a missionary of the London Continen tal Society. He was of an active, restless disposition, but possessed the wider his flaming love for Christ. Many owed to him under God their conversion. He was no theologian; but as composer and poet he did superior service, and he has written some valuable works. Among them, Histoire des frères de Bohême et de Moravie, Genève, 1831, 3 vols., particularly his Mé moires peuvent servir à l'histoire du réveil religieux, (Collected works: Premier réveil à Genève, 1871.)

BOSTON, Thomas, b. at Dunse, Berwickshire, Scotland, March 7, 1676; d. at Ettrick, May 20, 1732; was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and became minister of Simprin in 1699, and of Ettrick in 1707. He was a very voluminous writer, and has exercised great influence in the Presbyterian churches in Scotland and England. The two works by which he is now best known are, The Crook in the Lot, a book for mourners, being the substance of several sermons; and Human Nature in its Fourfold State of Primitive Integrity, Entire Depravation, Begun Recovery, and Conclusive Happiness or Misery. The last was first published in 1720. He left an autobiography, or Memoirs, which appeared in 1776. A collected edition of his works was published in 12 vols., London, 1852.

BOUDINOT, Elias, b. in Philadelphia May 2, 1740; d. at Burlington, N.J., Oct. 24, 1821; received a classical education, and studied law; was the president of Congress in 1782, and signed as such the preliminaries of peace with Great Britain; became a member of the Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in 1812, and in 1816 the first president of the American Bible Society, and devoted himself with great zeal and self-sacrifice to benevolent and philanthropical undertakings. He published: The Age of Reason, 1790; Second Advent of the Messiah, 1815; and Star in the West, or an Attempt to discover the Long-lost Tribes of Israel, 1816.

BOURDALOUÉ, Louis, b. at Bourges, Aug. 20, 1632; d. in Paris, May 13, 1704; entered the Society of the Jesuits in 1616; was for some time a preacher in the provinces, afterwards in Paris, and finally, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, in Languedoc, among the Protestants. As a preacher he has neither the magnificent oratory of Bossuet, nor the sympathetic strain of Massillon: his strength is in the truthfulness of his argument, the readiness and its cogency. Many of his sermons have been translated into English, London, 1776, 4 vols. One of the best recent editions is that of Paris, 1804, 4 vols. The best old edition is Héroumeau's, Paris, 1706–18, 16 vols. 8vo. His life was written by Madame de Prigny, Paris, 1705. M. Lauras: Bourdaloue, sa vie et ses œuvres, Paris, 1881 (1,292 pages).

BOURJON, Antoine, b. at Lille, Jan. 13, 1616; d. at Franeker, Oct. 30, 1680; grew up neglected and solitary because of her temper and her physical deformities, spending her time in reading mystical and fantastical books; fled just as she was about to be married, and found refuge in a monastery near Cambroy, but was expelled on account of insubordination, and wandered about for the rest of her life in Flanders, Holland, and Northern Germany, gathering a number of restless enthusiasts around her, and busily engaged in the propagation of her views, that the Church needed a thorough reformation, that there existed no more true Christians, that all religious rites were superfluous, and true workmen of the kingdom of heaven, especially women, should engage in it. In Scotland her ideas found some adherents. Her works were edited (1679–86, 19 vols.), and her life written, by Poiret, Amsterdam, 1679, 2 vols. See also: Ant. Bourignon, by M. E. S., Paris, 1876.

BOWER, Archibald, b. at Dundee, Jan. 17, 1686; d. in London, Sept. 3, 1766; was educated at Donay; went afterwards to Italy; became a Jesuit, and member of the Inquisition of Macerata. In 1720 he suddenly returned to England; became a member of the Established Church; was made librarian to the Queen in 1747, and occupied himself with literature. His principal work is his History of the Popes, 7 vols. 4to. London, 3d ed., 1750–66; which contains the most copious account of the Popes in the English language, but was very severely criticised on account of want of originality, and of the author's repeated changes of religion. Bishop Douglas of Salisbury wrote against him, Bower and Tillemont compared, London, 1751.

BOWRING, Sir John, b. at Exeter, Oct. 17, 1792; d. Nov. 22, 1872. He distinguished himself as statesman, translator, and original author in prose and poetry: he is here mentioned for his hymns. He issued "Matins and Vespers, with Hymns and Devotional Pieces," 1823 (4th ed. 1831); "Hymns, as a Sequel to the Matins," 1825. His best known hymns probably are, "In the Cross of Christ I glory," and "We cannot always trace the way" (the latter has been erroneously credited to another).

BOY-BISHOP, a boy who figured in one of the mummeries so common in the middle ages. He was a cathedral-choir boy elected by his fellows on St. Nicholas' Day, Dec. 6; arrayed in episcopal robes, with mitre and crosier, and followed by his companions as priests, he made his entry into the cathedral; and, except the offering of mass, he discharged episcopal functions. He held this mock office until Innocents' Day, Dec. 28. If he died before the close of his term, he was buried in his robes. This absurd travesty was enacted in many parts of Europe. The returning sense of the Church was, however, shown by the sixteenth canon of the Council of Trent, and the decrees of the Council of Paris, 1212 (see Hejele Concilienegeschichte, 5th ed. p. 776), peremptorily forbidding them; but this was of merely national and temporary effect, for the practice continued. In 1742 Henry VIII. of England abolished the festival; but it was revived under Queen Mary, and so late as 1556 English boy-bishops are mentioned.

BOYLE and the BOYLE LECTURES. Robert Boyle, son of Richard Boyle, Earl of Cork, was born at Lismore Castle, in Ireland, Jan. 25, 1627, and educated at Eton. From 1658 to 1644 he lived at Geneva, studying natural science; and after his return he first settled on his estate, Stalbridge, then, since 1654, at Oxford, and finally, since 1688, in London, where he died Dec. 30, 1691. He was never married, and never held an office. His great and to labor for the kingdom of heaven. As a scientist he holds a very high rank; and he was one of the founders of the Royal Society (1662), which, indeed, grew out of that association of scholars to which he gave the name Royal. As a theologian, he wrote a number of theological essays, defrayed the expenses of... the Irish translation of the New Testament, of the Malay translation of the Gospels and the Acts, of Pococke's Arabic translation of Grotius's De Veritate, etc., and instituted the Boyle Lectures, eight sermons to be preached annually, by some one elected for the purpose, against Paganism, Judaism, Mohammedanism, Deism, and Atheism.

Some of England's most prominent theologians late successively assumed the task, and thus a valuable body of apologetic literature has been produced. A selection of such sermons was given in 4 vols., by Gilbert Burnett, in 1737. A collected edition of Boyle's own works, with a life of him by Birch, was published in 6 vols. in London, 1772. See LECTURES.

BOYSE, or BOIS, John, b. at Nettlestead, Suffolk, Eng., Jan. 3, 1560; d. at Boxworth, Jan. 14, 1643; was so precocious that he could read the Bible in Hebrew when he was five years old; was fellow at Cambridge, where he specially cultivated Greek; became rector of Boxworth in 1583, and prebendary of Ely, 1615. He was appointed one of the translators of the authorized version, and was one of the company upon the Apocrypha. When it was finished, he joined, at their own urgent request, the company at work upon the version from Chronicles to Canticles, and was one of the delegates engaged in the final revision. He was one of the greatest scholars of his day in the Oriental languages. He assisted Sir Henry Savile in his edition of Chrysostom, Eton, 1618, 8 vols. folio, the first good edition. He left many manuscripts, but only one work has been published: Veteris Interpretis Cum Beza, alliisque recentioribus collatio in IV. Evangelium et Apostolorum Actis, London, 1655.

BRADFORD, John, b. at Manchester in the first decade of the sixteenth century; began to study law in the Temple, 1547, but went next year to Cambridge; studied theology, and was appointed chaplain to Edward VI. in 1552. On the accession of Mary, he was discharged, and committed to the Tower. In 1554 he was arraigned before Gardiner, Bonner, and others, and convicted of heresy, and June 4, 1555, he was burnt at Smithfield. His writings have been published: Veteris Interpretis Cum Beza, alliisque recentioribus collatio in IV. Evangelium et Apostolorum Actis, London, 1655.

BRADSHAW, William, a Puritan divine, b. at Market-Bosworth, Leicestershire, 1571; d. at Newhall, 1618. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge; obtained a fellowship at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge; took orders, and in 1601 settled at Chatham in Kent; but, refusing to sign the Thirty-nine Articles, he was soon suspended, and obliged to remove. He lectured of Christ Church, Newgate Street, London, but again got himself into trouble by his opposition to "ceremonies," and retired to his native county. He wrote: A Treatise on Divine Worship. Tending to prove that the Ceremonies imposed upon the Ministers of the Gospel in England, in present controversies, are in their use unlawful (1604); A Treatise on the Nature and Use of Things Indifferent [i.e., ceremonies] (1605); English Purity. Containing: The maine Opinions of the rigidest sort of those that are called Puritains in the Realme of England (1605). This important work is given in outline in Neil, Harper's ed., vol. i. pp. 248 sq. It was translated into Latin by William Ames, and republished in Frankfurt, 1610. See BRADFORD, Thomas (doctrin profundus), b. 1290, probably at Horfield, Cheshire; d. in London, Aug. 26, 1349; studied theology, philosophy, mathematics, and astronomy in Merton College, Oxford; became one of the proctors of the university in 1325; followed Edward III. as his confessor, since 1338, in his campaigns in France, and was chosen Archbishop of Canterbury, and consecrated at Avignon a few weeks before his death. His great work, De Causa Dei, more philosophical and metaphysical than theological in its character, was edited by Sir Henry Savile, London, 1818. Several of his mathematical works were published at Venice 1495, and again 1530. See G. Lechler: Wicif, I. pp. 234 sqq. [English translation by Peter Lorimer, D.D., London, 1878, 2 vols., vol. i. pp. 88-96.] G. Lechler.

BRADY, Nicholas, b. at Bandon, Ireland, Oct. 29, 1639; d. at Richmond May 20, 1726; was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, and Trinity College, Dublin; settled, after the Revolution, in London; became minister of St. Catharine Cree Church, and lecturer of St. Michael's in Wood Street, afterwards rector of Clapham, and finally of Richmond, and the chaplain of King William. He published (1726) a translation of the Æneid in four volumes, a tragedy, "The Innovative Imposer," three volumes of sermons (1693–1724), and, in conjunction with Tate, a metrical translation of the Psalms, London, 1695, now ordinarily printed in the English Book of Common Prayer. See Tate, Nahum.

BRAHMA. See BRAHMANISM.

BRAHMANISM is the term for the religion and practices originated and elaborated by the Brahmins, who are the highest of the four great classes, or castes, into which the Hindu people are divided,—the Brahmanas ("priests"), Kshatra ("soldiers"), Vaishyas ("agriculturists"), and Sudras ("servants"). Like other religions, Brahmaism has its sacred books and the official interpreters. The oldest portions of this collection are the Vedas ("knowledge"), or Sûtras ("that which is directly heard or revealed"). The Vedas are divided again into Mantra ("the instrument of conveying thought"), prayer and praise, embodied in texts and metrical hymns; Brahman, or ritualistic precept and illustration written in prose; and Upanishad, mystical or secret doctrine appended to the aforesaid Brahman, written in prose and occasional verse, and "the only part of the Veda much studied and appealed to by educated Hindus in the present day." There are four Samhitas, or collections of Mantra; viz., the Rigveda (upon which the others are based), the Samaaveda, the Yajurveda, and the Atharvaveda. The word Veda is applied to that unwritten knowledge which came like breath from Brahman: hence the Veda is often called Brahman, a word variously interpreted,—"the universally diffused essence," or "the spirit of devotion," or "divine spiritual knowledge." The hymns of the Vedas embrace the earliest known lyrics of the Aryan settlers of India. Dr. Monier Williams explains the word by a succession of poets, at different dates between 1500 and 1000 B.C. The oldest are found in the Rigveda: they number one thousand and seventeen, and express a nature-worship the purest known. The latest are those of the Atharvaveda, principally used by the priests for calling down or driving away curses. The Vedas, as a collection, are not easy or pleasant reading; but they throw light upon the quality of mind and the environment of our Aryan ancestors. They prove that the Aryan was a worshipper of nature, but had not learned to distinguish between the different objects of his worship: hence he gave to them the generic name deva ("the shining ones"). "In the primitive worship of the manifold phenomena of nature it is not so much their physical aspect that impresses the human heart, as the moral, the reasoning forces which are supposed to move and animate them." The primitive conception best seen in the Rigveda was gradually tarnished, taking on in the later hymns a more sensuous and anthropomorphic character. Epithets applied to the same divinity become at last separate divinities; until at a later period, after centuries of speculation, a pantheistic conception was arrived at, and this divine essence bore various names, such as Purusha ("soul"), Kama ("desire"), Brahma ("creation, prayer"). Metaphysical and theological speculation was exalted by the authors of the Brahmanas and the Upanishads; and the compromise between polytheism and monotheism resulted in the composite pantheistic system which makes Prayaëati ("lord of creatures") the personal creator of the world, the manifestation of the impersonal Brahma, the universal, self-existent soul; and this is the characteristic dogma of the Brahmanical period.

The Brahmanas, the second division of each Veda, were composed as a guide to the Brahman in sacrificing. They developed the ritual. The oldest dates perhaps from the seventh century B.C. They contain some very remarkable ideas: thus, that "the gods were merely mortals till they extorted immortality from the Supreme Being by sacrifices and austerities;" that "the lord of creatures offered himself a sacrifice for the gods;" that human sacrifices, although known, were so strongly repugnant to the Brahmanas, that they legislated against them in favor of animal sacrifices. Thousands of animals were killed every day, until in disgust the people turned from this endless succession of bloody rites.

The Upanishads, the third division of each Veda, which present the underlying doctrine, are pantheistic. "There is one real Being in the universe, which Being also constitutes the universe." They are not earlier than 800 B.C., and show the working of the Aryan mind upon religious and philosophical problems. They are more mature and systematic than the earlier writings, and contain many original ideas and striking thoughts.

Worship, as enjoined by the Vedas, rests upon the two ideas of the efficacy of prayer and of sacrifice. The very word for the officiating priest was brahman ("one who prays"). The Pantheon of the early Hindus was thus developed. In the beginning was Brahma, who was supposed to create various creatures out of his own substance. Accordingly, by meditation, he produced the waters; into them he put a seed, which developed a golden egg; and from that egg he was born. But, as the people did not abandon their worship of the old gods to take up with any such abstraction, the priests, with singular tact, incorporated the most popular of these divinities with Brahma, and so the triad was formed,—Brahma ("the creator of all things"), Vishnu ("the preserver," who underwent ten avatars, or incarnations, to deliver the people from the tyranny of as many wicked princes), and Siva ("the destroyer"). Here was no trinity, for there was no unity, but a triad,—three co-ordinate male deities. To them three female deities were respectively consorts,—Vash or Sarasvati ("the goddess of speech or learning"), Lakshmi ("beauty, fortune"), and Uma or Parvati ("the daughter of Hermanuvat," the god of the Himalaya mountains). The problem, what to do with the discarded gods of the Hindu pantheon, was solved by relegating them to the domain of Indra ("sky"), an intermediate sphere, into which men also can enter at death, if they have been obedient. The retinue of Indra consists of the Gandharvas ("genii") and their wives, the Apsaras, lovely nymphs whom the gods often select to tempt the pious devotees. The messenger between the gods and men is Varada, who sprang from the forehead of Brahma. The god of love is Kamadeva, or "the bodiless," so called because he was reduced to ashes by an angry glance from Siva, whom he had endeavored to make fall in love with Parvati, while at his (Siva's) devotions. The god of knowledge is Brahma, who in his wisdom and power transcends the gods. Siva, whom he had endeavored to make fall in love with Parvati, while at his (Siva's) devotions. The god of love is Kamadeva, or "the bodiless," so called because he was reduced to ashes by an angry glance from Siva, whom he had endeavored to make fall in love with Parvati, while at his (Siva's) devotions. The gods in this heaven of Indra resemble men in their liability to be reborn in a lower state, and also, therefore, in longing for emancipation from such a dread.

The peculiar institution which has given Indian life its distinctive flavor is caste. Professor Egge-ling states that "there can be no doubt that the Hindus do not feel, and perhaps never have felt, their class restrictions as being in any way burdensome, or still less a disgrace to them, and that even the lowest man looks upon his caste as a privilege as high as that of the Brahman." It is the opinion of the Brahmins that there is only one original caste now extant, viz., their own; all the others having resulted from successive intermixtures. The Brahman occupies his position for three reasons,—his assumed sanctity, his intellectual superiority, and his learning; for in the popular estimation he is not only a clergyman in divinity, but acquainted with the sacred books, the Vedas, and also the Shastras and the Puranas, which are modern works, composed for the express purpose of promoting the worship of some particular deity. Mr. Sherring, in his "Hindu Tribes and Castes," thus describes the Brahman's appearance: "Light of complexion, his forehead ample, his countenance of striking significance, his lips thin, and mouth expressive, his eyes quick and sharp, his fingers long, his carriage noble and almost sublime, the true Brahman, uncontaminated by foreign intruders, with his intense self-consciousness, with the proud conviction of superiority depicted in every muscle of his face, and manifest in every movement of his body, is a wonderful specimen of humanity, walking on God's earth.

Caste is later than the oldest Veda, for in the Rigveda it is unknown. The word means "color," and points to the contrast in color between the aboriginal Sudras and the conquerors, the Aryas. As among the latter only the priestly class held themselves aloof from marriage with the Sudras, therefore only this class kept the strain pure. In course of time the other castes were formed, distinguished, not now by color, but by occupation. The Kshatriyas are the governing and military class; the Vaisyas are the farmer and merchant class; the Sudras are the servants, particularly of the Brahmans, who take particular pains to keep them ignorant of both the theory and practice of religion. Between the Brahmans and the Kshatriyas there was a sharp and long contest; but, when the former were victorious, they riveted their chains upon the obedience of all lower castes by making themselves indispensable to the performance of any rite. They also framed laws which made any injury done to them a serious affair; while they might almost with impunity maltreat those of the lower castes. The three upper castes are styled the "Twice-born," because their sons are initiated into the study of the Veda, the management of the sacred fire and of the purifying rites, by a singular ceremony, that of conducting a boy to a spiritual teacher, connected with which is the investiture with the sacred cord, ordinarily worn over the left shoulder and under the right arm, and varying in material according to the class of the wearer. In the case of girls there is no such rite, nor is there any such instruction. Marriage is, however, for them accepted as an equivalent. It is just in this matter of marriage that the caste system does most mischief; for it is forbidden by Hindu laws for a man to marry into a caste above his own, while it is allowable for him to marry in any or all those below. If, however, he marries a Sudra, and has children by her, they are not admitted into the privileges of the "Twice-born."

But great social and religious changes are taking place in India. "It is satisfactory to know," says Dr. Williams, "that although it is too true that caste is still the very life and soul of Hinduism, and although this very caste is not without certain good points and advantages, yet some of its most vexatious rules are gradually giving way under the pressure of steam, electricity, and European influence. Many years ago, a Brahman who accidentally touched leather would have had to choose between public expiation, or degradation, and expulsion from caste; whereas in 1870 a Uriya Brahman held the post of sub-inspector of police in Puri itself, under the very shadow of Jagannath, although a leather belt formed part of his uniform." Again: no caste but the Brahman's pretends to fulfil the round of duties which lead to the supreme bliss, which is absorption into the one eternal soul, complete deliverance from the circle of births, by which other souls are punished and purified. This round is divided into four stages: (1) Religious student, when the youth is studying the Vedas, and supports himself by begging from door to door; (2) Householder, for marriage is obligatory, else there would be no son to perform funeral rites; (3) Anchorite, reached when the man is a grandfather, then he goes forth alone, or with his wife, to spend his time in the study of the sacred portions of the Vedas, living in the open air upon fruit, and trying to kill every worldly desire; (4) Religious mendicant, now he begs his food in the evening, lives in solitude, and meditates upon the divinity. In these days few Brahmans even are found earnest enough to go this round.

A decided change for the better is in the treatment of widows. Hindu law does not allow the remarriage of widows, and yet their treatment is outrageous. They are kept in complete seclusion, the object of scorn, abuse, and barbarous neglect; stripped of their jewels, clad in the coarsest garb, compelled to perform the most menial duties, and to eat the poorest food, avoided and despised as though they were criminals. So miserable is their condition, that it is not wonderful they should have preferred death to life, and therefore should have performed sutee, or voluntary immolation (which really is a comparatively modern institution; for the passage in the Rigveda quoted in its defence is really an exhortation to the widow to return home, and resume her usual life), burying themselves upon the pyre of their husbands. But tyrannical custom is no longer so formidable. The British Government thirty years ago succeeded in prohibiting sutee, and now, in most parts of India where the idea of widow-marriage was but lately repugnant, and considered a stumbling-block to apostasy from the ancestral religion, and the first step towards denationalization, they are becoming common. This is especially true of Bombay, Bengal, and in the Panjáb.

It remains to speak of certain peculiar objects of Hindu worship, and of two great religious movements which have greatly affected Brahmanism. Three animals are most sacred,—the cow, the serpent, and the horse. The first "typifies the all-yielding earth." There is a so-called "cow of plenty," of which images are sold in the bazaars, and everywhere revered. The serpent is the emblem of immortality, and especially associated with Siva. There is supposed to be a race of half-divine, serpents existing in the nether regions. Monkeys "are inviolable, and never under any circumstances to be molested. Swarms of them are encouraged to infest the vicinity of temples and consecrated buildings, where they subsist upon the food offered them by pious worshippers." Plants are also sacred, and are worshipped. Thus the Tulsi plant is sacred to Vishnu, the Vilva to Siva, the Pipal to Brahma; it is invested with the sacred thread. Certain stones have religious value. Indeed, the pantheism of the Hindu philosophy puts God into everything which he is not prepared to worship. We are not surprised, therefore, to find sacred places. They are of all sizes, from Benares, the Hindu's Jerusalem or Mecca, down to mere hamlets. Rivers, too, come in for their share of adoration. Stately rivers like the Ganges, and others, hold the first place. Bathing in them cleanses from the foulest sins. It is extremely meritorious to trace their course on foot,—a work of no small amount of... labor. It takes six years to make such a pilgrimage of the Ganges.

Brahmanism has encountered one formidable check,—Buddhism. This new religion sprang up in India itself. It seemed likely to gain the mastery; but after a time it became so corrupt, that it no longer attracted the people; and when the support of the powerful king who had protected it, it was withdrawn, it fell. According to the uncertain traditions which have come down to us, its suppression was accompanied with bloodshed. By the eleventh century it had died out in India. Yet it was purer in its morality, and freer in its politics, than Brahmanism. It accepted the caste system, yet proclaimed the equality of all men in point of religious privilege. Nor have all traces of its existence vanished. "The humanizing spirit of its doctrines left a deep impress on the Hindu mind," and it also led to the doubtful institution of monasticism. The convents, called matha, and their superiors mahanta. They are quite numerous in all parts of India. A qualified Buddhism exists at the present day in the important sect of the Jains. They reject the Vedas, yet retain belief in the Hindu gods. They pay great respect unto holy men who have, by conquering all worldly desire, raised themselves to divine perfection.

BRAHMO SOMAJ (worshipping-assembly) OF INDIA is the Theistic Church of India, which owes its present position and power to the Babu Keshub Chunder Sen. The movement originated in the Rajah Ram Mohun Roy (b. Bombay, 1772; d. Bristol, Eng., 1833), who, on Jan. 23, 1830, founded in Calcutta the Brahmo Somaj (Society of God). He edited a series of books and periodicals, particularly the Upanishads (the philosophical treatises), of the Vedas, were correctly interpreted, they would be found to teach monothelism; and, basing himself upon the primitive faith, he boldly dissuaded his landsmen from idolatry. But the sect made little progress until, in 1842, it was joined by Debendra Nath Tagore, who re-formed it, and led it unto success. He adopted European plans of propagandism, started a journal, published sectarian treatises, appointed teachers, and traveled, awakening a wide-spread interest, leading to the formation of branch Somajes in different parts of Bengal. The idea of an authoritative revelation in the Vedas, which Roy had defended, was formally given up. In 1838 Keshub Chunder Sen joined the sect, and quickly showed himself to be a reformer. Roy was better versed in Christian than in Hindu theology. Tagore was conservative, and clung to the ancestral faith, although he was a radical in some lines. Sen developed an eclectic theology, very largely biblical, at least in the two principal doctrines of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. After a time, it became evident that the two parties in the Somaj must separate; and in February, 1865, a large number of the younger Brahmos left the Calcutta Somaj, and in November, 1866, they organized themselves into the "Brahmo Somaj of India"; while the conservative portion is called the "Adi (original) Brahmo Somaj." The three propositions announced by Sen, and which precipitated the disruption, were,—

"1. That the external signs of caste distinctions, such as the Brahminical thread, should not be used. [See Brahminism.]

"2. That none but Brahmos of sufficient ability and good moral character, who lived consistently with their profession, should be allowed to conduct the services of the Somaj.

"3. That nothing should be said in the Somaj expressing hatred or contempt for other religions."

Under Sen, the Somaj was a grand spiritual force; for he is a man of extraordinary fervor and piety. He laid down the following Precepts of Practical Devotion (condensed):—

1. Pray unto God every day, and worship the Only Perfect, Infinite, Omnipresent, Omnipotent, Omniscient, All-mere, All-love and All-holy Brahmo rites, resurrection and the Church of England.

(6) Carefully cut off all connection with every manner of idolatrous ceremony and festival.

2. Knowing God to be the common Father, thou shalt love every man as thy brother, and every woman as thy sister.

(6) Be forgiving. (7) Govern all thy passions, and keep them under restraint. (8) Faithfully perform the domestic duties.

The movement is towards the Christian conception of doctrine and life. But, although reverencing Christ, they are essentially Unitarians. They have been well called the "Protestants" of India; for they protest against Brahmanism, polytheism, idolatry, caste, and the speculations which infidel English science spreads. Many of their adherents come from the government schools. They have churches in various parts of India.

In 1872 the "Native Marriage Act" was passed, which legalized marriages by Brahmic rites, required that the bridegroom should be at least twenty, and the bride fourteen years old, and made bigamy a penal offence for any one marrying—

ing under the Act. This Act marked a wonderful progress in enlightened views. Greatly to the consternation of the Brahmo Somaj, Keshub Chunder Sen, who had been the prime mover in agitating for the Act, and who was so generally revered, was the first to counteract a wilful departure from his own principles; for in 1878 he married his eldest daughter, aged thirteen, to the minor rajah of Kuch Behar, aged sixteen, and, furthermore, with Hindu marriage-rites. The marriage evoked great opposition on account of its un-Brahmic character; and a split, in consequence, took place in the Brahmo Somaj, and at the present day (1881) the adherents of Keshub Chunder Sen are a decided minority. It was a grievous disappointment to his followers to find the leader of the Brahmo Somaj ready to sacrifice principle to personal interest. Since 1878 Sen has certainly acted very strangely, issuing blaspheous proclamations, and showing a desire to approach the Hindu idolatry, which he once so emphatically and manfully renounced. Nevertheless the movement which he so powerfully sided with has made splendid progress, which shows that it has life independent of the great leader. The sect has a hundred and thirty small churches scattered over the country, and celebrated in 1880 its semi-centennial with pride and gratitude. The normal type of a Brahmo church embraces these features:—

Religious.

(1) Congregational worship at least once a week.
(2) Religious festivals on special occasions.
(3) Strictly Brahmic ceremonies at births, marriages, and deaths.
(4) A religious conversation-class for zealous members.
(5) A theistic library.
(6) Diffusion of principles by mission-tours, tracts, and a periodical.

Philanthropic.

(1) Charitable donations to the poor and disabled.
(2) Dispensaries for the sick.
(3) Societies for the discouragement of intemperance, premature marriages, and other evils.

Educational.

(1) Instruction of women by various methods.
(2) Schools for boys and girls.
(3) Night-schools for working-men.

The movement seems adapted to promote education and virtue, the vanguard of the Christian Host.

BRAINERD.

David, a celebrated missionary to the Indians; b. at Haddam, Conn., April 20, 1718; d. at Northampton, Oct. 9, 1747. His father, Hezekiah Brainerd, was a member of the King's Council for that colony: his mother, Dorothy, was the daughter of Rev. Jeremiah Higley, and representative man, formed by a previous marriage, the mother of Jeremiah Mason, grandfather of the great lawyer of that name. At the age of fourteen he was left an orphan. He was a thoughtful boy, inclined to melancholy, and full of religious feeling. His account of the spiritual struggles that preceded his conversion is very striking. In 1739 he entered Yale College, where he stood first in his class. In February, 1742, he was expelled, very unjustly, as he and his friends always felt. It was the time of "The Great Awakening." He was in sympathy with the "New Lights," as those who followed Whitefield and Tennent were called; and an indirect remark, to the effect that one of the tutors "had no more grace than that chair," having been overheard, and reported to the rector, occasioned his expulsion. Later he made a very manly acknowledgment of his error, and asked to be allowed to take his degree; but, in spite of the intercession of Jonathan Edwards and others, his request was refused. This caused so much indignation among his friends as to have led, it is said, to the founding of Princeton College. In July, 1742, he was licensed to preach, and in April, 1743, began to labor as a missionary at Kaunamek, an Indian village between Stockbridge and Albany. He lived in a little cabin built by himself, and lodged upon a bundle of straw. His food was chiefly boiled corn, hasty-pudding, and samp. Here he continued for a year. Declining repeated calls to churches at home, in June, 1744, he was ordained at Newark, N. J., as a missionary of the Scottish "Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge," to the Indians at the forks of the Delaware, near the present town of Easton, Penn. In June, 1745, he started a mission at Crossweekeusung, near Freehold, N. J. Here his success was wonderful; and here, with the exception of a journey through the forest to the Indians on the Susquehanna, he toiled until the spring of 1747, when, in consequence of the hardships he had endured, his health broke down, and he was advised to seek relief by travel in New England. In July he returned from Boston to Northampton, where, in the home of Jonathan Edwards, and nursed by Jerusha, the young daughter of the great theologian, to whom he was engaged,—herself a youthful saint,—this eminent servant of God passed his last days. He entered into rest Oct. 9, 1747, in the thirtieth year of his age. Brainerd's career was very brief, and in visible results it was far surpassed by that of David Zeisberger, not to mention other Moravian missionaries among the Indians. His great work was the priceless example of his piety, zeal, and self-devotion. Herein, since the days of the apostles, none have surpassed him. And his uncommon intellectual gifts, his fine personal qualities, his melancholy and his early death, as well as his remarkable holiness and evangelical labors, have conspired to invest his memory with a peculiar halo. The story of his life has been a potent force in the modern missionary era. It is related of Henry Martyn, that, "persuing the life of David Brainerd, his soul was filled with a holy emulation of that extraordinary man; and, after deep consideration and fervent prayer, he was at length fixed in a resolution to imitate his example." Brainerd's career was short, but he was both by nature and grace to leave a lasting impression upon the piety of the Church. He is the missionary saint of New England. President Edwards: *Memoirs of the Rev. David Braieral Assembly at St. Louis, in 1866, as chairman of its committee of conference on reunion, shows his patriotic ardor and services. Life of Rev. G. L. P. Braainerd, by Rev. T. Braainerd, Phila., 1865.

BRAAINERD, Thomas, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, b. at Leyden, N.Y., June 17, 1804; d. at Scranton, Penn., Aug. 22, 1866. His father, Jesse Braainerd, was a great-grandson of James Brainerd, brother of Hezekiah, the father of David, and the author of a valuable Life of John Brainerd, by Rev. T. Braainerd, Phila., 1865.

BRAHAM, John, b. at Pontefract, Yorkshire, Eng., in 1593; d. in Dublin, June, 1663; was educated at Cambridge; became chaplain to the Archbishop of York in 1623; went to Ireland in 1633, and was made Bishop of Londonderry in 1634; lived in exile during the Revolution, but returned to Ireland after the Restoration; and was made Archbishop of Armagh in 1661. Of his writings, among which his controversies with the Remonstrants is the most remarkable, a collected edition in one volume folio was published in Dublin, 1677, and republished in 3 vols., Oxford, 1842–45, accompanied with a sketch of his life.

BRANDENBURG. See PRUSSIA.

BRANDT, Gerard, b. in Amsterdam, July 25, 1629; d. there Dec. 11, 1685; was first pastor of the Remonstrant Church in Nieukoop, then, since 1660, at Hoorn, and finally, since 1667, in Amsterdam. He wrote a History of the Reformation in the Low Countries (4 vols., 1671–1704), translated into English by Chamberlayne, London, 1720–28, 4 vols. fol., and lives of Barneveldt, Ruyter, etc. 3 21

BRANT, Sebastian, b. at Strassbourg, 1457; d. there 1521; studied law and literature at Basel; and was made syndicus of his native city in 1501. He was a very prolific writer, both on law and belles-lettres, and is the author of the famous satirical poem Das Narrenschiff, 1494, translated into Latin, French, and English, often imitated, and used as text for comments and moral reflections. Barclay's Ship of Fools, 1509, is a free imitation. Watson gave an abridged prose translation in 1617. Best edition of original text by Zarncke, Leipzig, 1872: Simrock has translated it into modern German, Berlin, 1872. See CHARLES SCHMIDT: S. Brant, 1874.

BRAY, Thomas, D.D., b. at Marton, in Shropshire, 1586; d. in London, Feb. 15, 1750. He took his degree of M.A. at Oxford, 1613; founded the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," 1698; and was from March 1700 to 1701 in Maryland, U.S.A., as commissary for organizing Episcopal churches, being sent out by Bishop Compton. In 1706 he became rector of St. Botolph, Aldgate, London. He was a faithful pastor, particularly interested in the improvement of the people by parochial libraries. His principal publications were Catechetical Lectures, which induced Bishop Compton to appoint him his commissary; Bibliotheca parochialis, vol. I. (all written), 1697; 2d ed., 1707, a manual for the clergy; Papal Usurpation and Tyranny, ancient and modern, 1712 (published anonymously). A Memoir of him was published in London, 1848, by the "Bray Associates."

BRAZIL. The Roman-Catholic Church, introduced by the Portuguese when they took possession of the country in 1500, and propagated among the natives, first by Franciscans, and, since 1549, by Jesuits, is the Church of the State, and comprises, besides the Archbishopric of Bahia, 11 bishoprics and 1,593 parishes. But the Church is completely dependent upon the State: it has no property of its own. Its officials are paid, and very poorly paid, by the State. The bishops and even the priests are appointed by the emperor. The monasteries, of which there are ninety-one, are rapidly closing; as, by a law of 1860, they are forbidden to receive novices. Other confessions are tolerated, and are now allowed to have public worship, but not to build churches with spires and bells. Of late many favors have been granted to the Protestants. The German immigration, which began in 1824, has become quite important, and most of the immigrants are Protestants. For many years these Protestants lived without any proper ministerial care, choosing some laymen to act as ministers (Schnarpsparrer), and consecrate their marriages. But since the arrival of Dr. Borchard in 1864, and by the active support of the Comité für die protestantischen Deutschen in Südbrasilien, formed at Barmen, and the mission-house of Basel, the religious life of the Protestant congregations has much improved. The Presbyterian Church (North) has recently established a mission in Brazil. See the reports of the Committee of Barmen, especially No. V.

Brazil was a colony of Portugal up to 1822, when its independence was declared. The constitution of 1824, still in force, states that "the Roman-Catholic religion will continue to be the religion of the State, but all religions are tolerated, provided that they should hold worship in special buildings put up for the purpose, without the external form of churches." The constitution also determines that no bulls or apostolic constitutions shall be published and promulgated in the empire by the Roman-Catholic authorities without the placet of the sovereign. The appointment of the bishops by the Pope is also subject to the approval of the government. The liberty of the press is carefully guarded, except as to denying the existence of God and the immortality of the soul. Brazil is a Roman-Catholic province, with one archbishop (in Bahia), who is the primate, and ten bishops. The clergy are mostly Portuguese and Italian, and they exert but little influence on the government and people.

There are a good number of Protestant churches in Brazil, principally in Rio de Janeiro, São Paulo, and Rio Grande do Sul. Several foreign missionary societies have missions in the empire, and there are half a dozen native Protestant ministers.

In 1873 there was a serious conflict between the State and the Established Church. The young and intelligent Bishop of Pernambuco tried to enforce some of the injunctions of the Papal Syllabus of 1864, among them those against the Freemasons, some of whom he expelled from a certain brotherhood. The question was submitted to the government; but the bishop disobeyed orders, and was then tried by the Supreme Court, and condemned to prison. His colleague of Tará was also tried for a similar offence, and equally condemned. Later on, however, both were released; and the question of how far the Roman-Catholic Church is free in Brazil is precisely where it was before 1873. The fact is, that the constitution fails to satisfy either the Protestants or the Roman-Catholics. See Fletcher and Kidder: Brazil, 9th ed., Boston, 1878.

BRECKENRIDGE, John, b. at Cabell's Dale, Ky., July 4, 1797; d. near Lexington, Ky., Aug. 4, 1841; studied in the Theological Seminary of Princeton, and was chaplain to the House of Representatives, 1822-23; pastor of a Presbyterian Church, Lexington, Ky., 1823-26; secretary of the Board of Education of the Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, 1831-36; professor of theology at Princeton, 1836-38; secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, 1839-40. At the time of his death he was president-elect of Oglethorpe University, Georgia. He published his famous discussion with Bishop Hughes of New York under the title, Roman-Catholic Controversy, Philadelphia, 1836, and some minor controversial essays.

BRECKENRIDGE, Robert Jefferson, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister; b. at Cabell's Dale, Ky., March 8, 1800; d. at Danville, Ky., Dec. 27, 1871; a graduate of Union College, New York, in 1821. He practised law in Kentucky for eight years (1823-31), and meanwhile was several times in the State Legislature; but, convinced of his duty, he turned from law to theology, and in 1832 he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Baltimore, and rapidly made his mark as a preacher. In 1845 he accepted the pastorate of Jefferson College, but in 1847 returned to the pastorate, and from that date unto 1853 discharged the double duty of minister to the First Presbyterian Church in Lexington, and superintendent of public instruction for the State. In 1853 he entered the chair of theology in Danville Seminary, Kentucky, and held it until death. Like his brother John, he interested himself in the Roman-Catholic controversy, and attacked the Roman Church without mercy as "the great apostasy," and enemy of progress and religious liberty. The public-school system of Kentucky is largely his creation, and during the civil war he defended the Union cause. During his residence in Baltimore he edited the Literary and Religious Magazine and the Spirit of the Nineteenth Century; but his principal work is Upon The Knowledge of God, Objectively and Subjectively considered, 2 vols., N.Y., 1857, 1858. Dr. Breckenridge was the author of the Act and Testimony (1834), complaining of the prevalence of doctrinal errors, the relaxation of discipline, and the violation of church order, which played such an important part in the disruption of the Presbyterian Church. He was a stanch Old-School Presbyterian theologian, and opposed the re-union of the two branches of the Presbyterian Church, which took place in 1869.

BRECKLING, Friedrich, b. at Handewitt in Schleswig, 1829; d. in the Hague, 1711; studied theology at various German universities, and read with great avidity the works of Tauler and other mystics; was appointed a chaplain in the Danish army in 1657, and pastor of Handewitt in 1659, but was deposed in 1690 on account of his violent attacks on the officials of the Danish Church; fled to Holland, and was made pastor of Zwoll, but was deposed also here, and from a similar reason (1665), after which he lived in retirement in Amsterdam and the Hague. He stood in connection with all the revivalists and religious enthusiasts of his time, also with the Pietists, and was himself very busily engaged as a writer, though without making any impression. A list of his works and a life have been given by Jott. Möller, in his Cinemiria Literata, III. p. 72. Also Adelung has written a life of him in his Geschicte u. Geschichte der Christlichen Kirchen, 4, p. 16.

BREITHAUPT, Joachim Justus, b. at Nordheim, February, 1658; d. at Kloster Bergen, March 16, 1732; studied theology at Helmsted and Kiel; and lived for some time in France, together with Spener, whose plans of regenerating the Protestant Church he fully adopted; was in 1685 appointed court-preacher to the Duke of Meiningen; 1687, professor of theology at Erfurt; and 1691, professor of theology at Halle, where, together with Francke and Antin, he gave the whole theological study its peculiar character and tendency. In 1703 he was made superintendent-general of Magdeburg, and in 1709 Abbot of Kloster Bergen, in which positions he had an opportunity to carry out his principles in practice. Besides a number of minor writings, he published Institutiones Theologae, Halle, 1687, 2 vols., much extended, 1732, 3 vols., more extended, extended, 1732, 3 vols., and Theses Credendorum et Agendorum Fundamentales, Halle, 1700. DREYANDEL.

BREITINGER, Johann Jacob, b. at Zürich, April 14, 1645; studied theology at Franeker, Heidelberg, and Basel; was appointed minister of St. Peter's Church in Zürich in 1613; represented the church of Zürich at the synod of Dort; and exercised on all the preached the new ideas, but re-organized the church of Hall on the basis of them. He was at the free city of Hall in Suabia, 1522.

June 24, 1499; d. at Stuttgart, Sept. 11, 1570; to read mass; and in the next year he not only pressed on him, and gradually he espoused all the peasants with the same firmness as the innovators, 67,533, are Lutherans; 21,127 are Reformed; 8,932, Evangelicals (united); 4,164, Roman-Catholics; 215, other confessions; and 498, Jews.

BREMEN. Charlemagne founded here a bishopric in 787, under the metropolitan authority of the Archbishop of Cologne. But when, in 850, Hamburg was burnt down by the heathen Danes, the archiepiscopal see of that city, with its metropolitan authority over all the Scandinavian countries, was removed to Bremen, which occasioned protracted and vehement controversies with the archbishops of Cologne. Though in 1141 the Scandinavian countries were formed into an independent metropolitan province, under the Archbishops of Lund, and though the city of Bremen threw off its feudal allegiance to the archbishop in 1284, and became a free city, and member of the Hanseatic League, the Archbishop of Bremen still continued to be one of the most powerful prelates of Germany. In the city of Bremen the Reformation was introduced (1522–27) without causing any great trouble; and during the Smalcaldian War the city sustained a long siege with great heroism. But in the latter part of the sixteenth century heavy disturbances arose from the conflict between Lutheranism and Calvinism. In 1562 all Lutherans were expelled from the city. Hamburg, Lubeck, and the other members of the Hanse, interfered, and declared that they would have no dealings with the heretical city. In 1568 the Lutherans were allowed to return, though under certain restrictions. At present the majority of the inhabitants, 67,533, are Lutherans; 21,127 are Reformed; 8,932, Evangelicals (united); 4,164, Roman-Catholics; 215, other confessions; and 498, Jews.

BRENZ, Johann, b. at Weil, Württemberg, June 24, 1499; d. at Stuttgart, Sept. 11, 1570; studied at Heidelberg; and was ordained priest in 1520 by the Bishop of Spires, and appointed priest at the free city of Hall in Suabia, 1522. The appearance of Luther had made a deep impression on him, and gradually he espoused all the ideas of the Reformation. In 1523 he ceased to read mass; and in the next year he not only preached the new ideas, but re-organized the church of Hall on the basis of them. He was eminently successful, resisting the insurrection of the peasants with the same firmness as the intrigues of the Roman priests. But with the Smalcaldian War his days of trouble began. In 1548 Hall was taken by the imperial troops, and Brenz had to flee. He found refuge with Duke Ulrich of Württemberg; and, having been appointed minister of the Collegiate Church of Stuttgart in 1553, he established the Reformation in that country, distinguishing himself equally as author, organizer, and administrator. In the literary controversies of the time he took an active part, especially in that concerning the Lord's Supper, in which he placed himself on the side of Luther, and wrote the famous Syntagma Sueciaeum, 1525. The only collected edition of his works is unfinished, Tubingen, 1575, 5 vols. His life was written by J. C. Mörike, Zürich, 1874.

BRETHREN. Among the brotherhoods which arose in the Middle Ages, perhaps none was so influential as the Brethren of the Common Life. They were not members of any religious order, nor did they live in religious houses. The association which flourished in the transition period between the Middle Ages and the Reformation had its foundation in a meeting at Deventer in 1332, called by Thomas à Kempis. A visit to the priory of Johann Ruysbroek opened another avenue to him. Having returned to his native city, Deventer, he gathered a number of young men, who, under his leadership, engaged to aid each other in leading a Christian life, to occupy themselves by studying the Bible, and copying useful books, to help other people directly and indirectly in their struggle for Christian perfection, etc. The common labor led to a common purse, the common purse to full community of life, and thus the first brother-house was formed at Deventer. After the death of Groot, Floræntius (1350–1400), whose life has also been written by Thomas à Kempis, became the leader of the association. He founded a monastery for regular canons at Vindesen, another at St. Agnetenberg, near Zwolle; and the association began to spread very rapidly. During the course of the fifteenth century, nearly every larger town between the ocean and Merseburg, and between the Baltic and the frontiers of Suabia, contained one or more such brother or sister houses. The community of property, occupation, station, etc., which ruled in these houses, did not depend upon a vow such as in the monasteries. It was entirely voluntary, the free expression of love. Generally twenty brethren or sisters lived together, and formed a family. Peculiar offices were those of the Scriptarius, Librarius, Magister Novitiorum, Infermarius, and Hospitarius. At the head of the house stood the rector, chosen by the members; and all houses found their common centre in the great father-house of Deventer. With respect to the external world, the principal office of the association was education, both directly by schools and teaching of children, and indirectly by preaching, lecturing, and the diffusion of good books. School education had hitherto been confined to the mendicant orders, but very poorly performed by them. In this field the Brethren of the Common Life actually worked a revolution. During the course of the sixteenth century the association lost its significance and its importance in this respect as in many others. After the Reformation, schools were founded by the State, and put much more powerfully in operation. The printing-press made the copying of books completely superfluous, a waste of time. The sermon had become a prominent part of divine service; and preaching in the vernacular tongue was now part of the office of every clergyman, etc. Thus the very purposes for which the association had been formed were now fulfilled; and after producing many great men, such as Thomas à Kempis, Busch, Lange, Hegius, etc., and leaving behind itself a venerable memory, it gradually disappeared.

ULLMANN (from Herzog, ed. 1).

BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT, a sect which flourished in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and forms one of the most remarkable instances of heresy during the middle ages, on account of the Pantheism they taught, and the practical inferences they drew from their theory. Their doctrines may be learned from the letters of the Archbishop of Cologne (1306) and the Bishop of Strassburg (1317), and from the edicts of Clement V. (1311) and John XXII. (1330); which documents are found in Mosheim, De Begardia, Leipzig, 1790. The principal points of their theory were: all that is is God; man is God, and there is no difference between God and man. A separation, however, between God and man is caused by sin; but the union may be re-established through the consciousness of its possibility and necessity. In this state man cannot sin any more. All he does is good, as he is above all differences. Of the Church and the moral law he has no more need. Virtue is something subordinate, something relative, etc. The origin of the sect is obscure, though generally ascribed to the influence of Anamilitz of Bona, or in common use when Micrologus, i.e., Ivo, Bishop of Chartres (1125), wrote his De ecclesiasticis observationibus. The breviary was a growth. It consists of the Psalms, arranged for a weekly reading or singing. These form the foundation, and come first in order of time; next antiphons before and after the Psalms; readings from the Scriptures, the Fathers, the lives of saints and martyrs; and, finally, hymns. Most probably it means the abbreviation of the "missale plenarium," and was originally compiled for the direction of the choir. The word itself is certainly very old, for it was in common use when Micrologus, i.e., Ivo, Bishop of Chartres (1125), wrote his De ecclesiasticis observationibus. The breviary was a growth. It consists of the Psalms, arranged for a weekly reading or singing. These form the foundation, and come first in order of time; next antiphons before and after the Psalms; readings from the Scriptures, the Fathers, the lives of saints and martyrs; and, finally, hymns, which were introduced in the face of great opposition, especially in Rome. Gregory VII. (1073-85) reduced this growth to reasonable limits; and the Breviary now in common use, dating from Pius V. (1566-72), is the repeated revision of his work. In former times, besides the Roman Breviary and the monastic, which followed that made by Benedict in the sixth century, and which differ very much from the secular kind, the Ambrosian, now confined to Milan, and the Mozarabic, now used only in Toledo, were widely used. From an unaccepted revision made in 1536 by Cardinal Quignon for Clement VII., the Morning and Evening Prayers of the English Prayer-Book were condensed.

The use of the Breviary at the eight canonical hours being impracticable to any other than a "religious" (monk or nun), the secular clergy are allowed to group hours, and say them at the most convenient time. But monks and nuns are enjoined by the Council of Trent to repeat the Breviary as it stands. Most of the readings about the saints are absurd. Hence there arose in France a strong revisionary spirit, really coming from Port Royal, which carried a great reform. The original intention to read the entire Psalter once a week was again carried out; for the multiplication of saints upon the calendar had pushed the Psalter aside, and the whole service was much simplified. But, under the leadership of the Count de Montalembert, a movement was suc-

BRETSCHNEIDER, Karl Gottlieb, b. at Gers-dorf, Saxony, Feb. 11, 1776; d. at Gotha, Jan. 22, 1848; studied theology at Leipsic, and was appointed minister at Schneeberg in 1807, superintendent at Annaberg in 1808, and superintendent-general at Gotha in 1816. He was a very prolific writer, contributed frequently to various periodscals, took active part in controversies, and wrote independent works, both on exegics and dogmatics. His principal works are: Lexicon manu-alis Graecolatinum in libros N. T., Leipsic, 1829; Systematische Entwickelung aller in der Dogmatik vorkommenden Begriffe, 1850; and Handbuch der Dogmatik, 1814, which ran through many editions. They represent the stand-point of the so-called rational supranaturalism,—a rather untenable ground, intermediate between rationalism and supranaturalism. But, though destitute of genuine religious life and speculative talent, they are distinguished by clearness of arrangement, and acuteness in the definitions. His autobiography was published by his son, Gotha, 1851, and attracted much attention. [Parts of it have been translated into Enlish for the Bibliotheca Sacra.]

HAGENBACH.

BREVIARY (Breviarium) denotes an office-book of the Roman-Catholic Church which contains the office for the canonical hours (see title), in distinction to the missal, which contains those of the mass. The name has been variously explained. Most probably it means the abbreviation of the "missale plenarium," and was originally compiled for the direction of the choir. The word itself is certainly very old, for it was in common use when Micrologus, i.e., Ivo, Bishop of Chartres (1125), wrote his De ecclesiasticis observationibus. The breviary was a growth. It consists of the Psalms, arranged for a weekly reading or singing. Gregory VII. (1073-85) reduced this growth to reasonable limits; and the Breviary now in common use, dating from Pius V. (1566-72), is the repeated revision of his work. In former times, besides the Roman Breviary and the monastic, which followed that made by Benedict in the sixth century, and which differ very much from the secular kind, the Ambrosian, now confined to Milan, and the Mozarabic, now used only in Toledo, were widely used. From an unaccepted revision made in 1536 by Cardinal Quignon for Clement VII., the Morning and Even-

BREWSTER, William, the "Elder of Plymoumouth;" b. at Scrooby, Eng., in 1560; d. at Plymouth, April 16, 1644; the son of a gentleman of property and position. Educated at Cambridge University, he entered the public service at twenty-one, and went with William Davison, "that excellent and unlucky secretary" of Queen Elizabeth, on a mission to the Netherlands as confidential secretary. On the disgrace of his chief, he returned to Scrooby. Here was the starting-point of the Pilgrim Fathers. In the manor house, his father's residence, the "Protestant Nonconformists" gathered. Of this church Brewster was ruling elder, and John Robinson teacher. In 1607 the little band, after repeated malignant persecution, was compelled to emigrate, and went first to Amsterdam, where they staid a year, and next to Leyden. "Mr. Brewster, who had been reduced almost to poverty by his charities and munificent aid to his struggling brethren, earned his living by giving lessons in English, having composed a grammar, according to the Latin model, for the use of his pupils. He also set up a printing establishment, and published many controversial works." (Medley: John of Barnereld, II, p. 288.) But in 1620 a portion of the congregation sailed for New England, and landed Nov. 21. Elder Brewster was their spiritual head; but, not having been ordained, he never administered the sacraments, although he preached regularly on the Lord's Day.

BRIGNONNET, Guillaume, b. in Paris, 1470; d. at Almans, near Montereau-sur-Yonne, Jan. 25, 1534; was a son of Cardinal Briçonnet, Archbishop of Narbonne; and was made Bishop of Lodève in 1504, and of Méaux in 1516. He was possessed of a good classical education, and was twice sent as ambassador to the papal court; but a mystic by natural disposition, a pupil of Lefèvre d'Étaples, and a friend of Marguerite d'Angoulême, he soon came in a difficult position with respect to the Roman Church. He was a friend of reforms, and compelled the clergy of his diocese to reside in the places where they were appointed. He chose Lefèvre for his vicar-general, and invited Farrel, and others who had been engaged in disseminating the ideas of the Reformation, to come to Méaux, and preach. The result was the formation of a Protestant colony at Méaux. But Briçonnet's ideas of reform fell very far short of a breach with the Roman Church; and, when the opposition to the Reformation became serious, he was compelled to allow, and even to employ, very harsh measures against his own work. Of his correspondence with Marguerite d'Angoulême parts have been published by Guini, in Letters of Marguerite d'Angoulême, Paris, 1841, and Nouvelles Lettres de la Reine de Navarre, Paris, 1845.

BRIDAIN, Jacques, b. at Chuselan, March 21, 1701; d. at Roquemaure, Sept. 22, 1767; was educated in the Jesuit College in Avignon, and in the seminary of La Congrégation des Missions royales de Saint-Charles de la Croix; visited as a missionary preacher almost every city and town of Southern and Central France; came to Paris in 1744, and produced everywhere a deep impression by his sermons, which are sonorous and vehement, but full of genius and sincerity. They appeared at Avignon in 1823, in five volumes. His life was written by Carbou, Le Modèle des Prêtres, Paris, 1804.

BRIDGE, William, Puritan divine, b. 1600; d. at Great Yarmouth, March 12, 1670; he was a fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge; preached at Norwich; was silenced by Bishop Wren for nonconformity (1647), and afterwards excommunicated; but when the writ de excommunicato capiendo came out against him, he withdrew to Holland, and became pastor to the English Church at Rotterdam, where Jeremiah Burroughs was preacher. In 1642 he returned to England; was a member of the Westminster Assembly; after a time was chosen minister of Great Yarmouth, but ejected 1692. He was a Congregationalist (Independent), a Calvinist, a learned man, and had a library rich in the fathers and the schoolmen, of which he made diligent use. Neal says also, that "he was a good preacher, a candid and charitable man, and did much good by his ministry." Bridge published Babylon's Downfall, a sermon, London, 1641; also a collected edition of his works, 4 vols. 4to, 1649; and, as conclusive proof of the esteem in which he is still held, there appeared a new, and, for the first time, complete edition of his Works, London, 1815, 5 vols. 8vo: the Works are mostly sermons. See Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. ii. p. 270 (Harper's ed.).

BRIDGET, St. (Brigida), the "Mary of the Irish;" d. in 525, was the daughter of a certain Duptach, and born at Poacht Mairthenne, Len-was buried at Kildare, where a perpetual fire was lit in her honor, and kept up until 1220, when the bishop of the place forbade the superstition. This fire of St. Brigida, as well as many other traditions of her life, such as the legend of her alliance with St. Ultan, Aileran, Ceridwen, and Keruca, are not usually signed by the Pope, but by the writer of the bull; or, if it is a consistorial bull (i.e., issued with the consultio of cardinals), it is signed by all the cardinals consulted. The bulls are named from the words with which they begin, as the Jews call the books of the Bible. Thus “In coena Domini” (at the Lord's Supper), the bull of excommunication of all heretics, which is the product of centuries, although now disused; “Unigenitus” (only-born), issued by Clement XI. in 1713, against the Moral Reflections upon the New Testament, by Quesnel; “Ineffabilis Deus” (infallible God), issuing from Pius IX. (1854), declaring the dogma of the immaculate conception of Mary; “Eternalis Patris” (of the Eternal Father), the bull issued in 1868, which convened the Vatican Council of 1869 and 1870. Bulla blanca is a bull issued by a pope before he is enthroned, the seal of which is blank. Briefs are open or closed letters, of equal authority, but are not in so solemn a form. They are written on paper, in a running hand, and by the papal secretary, sealed with red wax, and impressed with the seal of the fisherman, or Peter in a boat, and the name and number of the Pope. The distinction between briefs and bulls is not much older than the fifteenth century. As both these documents are liable to be forged, various official precautions are taken. Bullarium is a collection of bulls and briefs. The oldest of such collections is the Bulla diversorum Pontificum a Joanne XXII ad Julium III. ex bibliotheca Ludovici Gomes, Rome, 1550; but it contains only fifteen documents. The first comprehensive collection is the Magnum Bullarium Romanum, made by Cherubini on the order of Sixtus V., and containing all briefs and bulls from Leo I. up to 1585. Among the later continuations of this work the most prominent are, Bullarium Magnum Romanum a Leone M. usque ad Beneditum XIV., Luxembourg, 1727–58, 19 vols. fol., and the contemporary collections by Cocquelines, Rome, 1733–48, 14 vols. fol. The latest continuation is that of Tomasetti, Turin, 1857–72, 24 vols. There are also bullariums for single countries, separate orders, etc.

BRIEFS, BULLS, and BULLARIUM, Papal. The word “bull” is from the Latin bulla, which literally means “any object made round by swelling up;” hence a drop, and so used of the “drop” of water, left eight thousand pounds to the Royal Society, to be paid to one or several authors, selected by the president, for writing a treatise “On the Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God, as manifested in the Creation.” The following eight authors were selected, and their treatises published (1833–40): (1) Thomas Chalmers: The Adaptation of External Nature to the Physical Constitution of Man, (2) John Kidd: The Adaptation of External Nature to the Physical Condition of Man, (3) William Whewell: Astronomy and General Physics considered with reference to Natural Theology, (4) Charles Bell: The Hand, its Mechanism and Vital Endowments as evincing Design, (5) Peter Mark Roget: Animal and Vegetable Physiology considered with reference to Natural Theology, (6) William Buckland: Geological and Mineralogical Considerations with reference to Natural Theology, (7) William Kirby: The Habits and Instincts of Animals with reference to Natural Theology, (8) William Frout: Chemistry, Meteorology, and the Function of Digestion considered with reference to Natural Theology.

BRIGHTMAN, Thomas, b. in 1556 at Nottingham; d. Aug. 24, 1607. He was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, and became rector of the church at Hawne, in Bedfordshire, in or about 1582. He was one of the fathers of Presbyterianism in England; as Thomas Cartwright saying, "The bright star in the Church of God." He subscribed the Presbyterian Books of Discipline. His principal work was Apocrypha Apocrypha, Frankfurt, 1609, and Heidelberg, 1612; also, a volume entitled Christian of the Revelation, Amsterdam, 1615, and Leyden, 1616, with frequent subsequent editions. Few books have been published at so many different places, and in so many different editions, and so widely read. He opened up a new path in the exposition of the Apocalypse by making two distinct milleniums: the first, from Constantine until 1300, in this correspondence with the common Orthodox view; the second, from 1300 to 2300, which was a new departure, by which he was enabled to find a place for the future conversion of the Jews, and a more glorious condition of the Church on earth, which he gains by a symbolical interpretation of Rev. xxii. and xxi. Brightman was one of the most influential of the Puritans; and his views greatly modified their interpretation of the Apocalypse, and found supporters throughout the seventeenth century. He also published commentaries on the Song of Songs and Daniel, and discussed various questions in dispute between the Puritans and the bishops. His works were collected and published, London, 1644, 4to.

BRILL, Jacob, b. Jan. 21, 1639, at Leyden; d. there Jan. 28, 1700; was a pupil of Pontiaan van Hattem, and as such deposed from his office as preacher of Phillipsburg, 1683. Between 1685 and 1699 he published about forty works of a mystical-devotional character, which were much read; but many thought such a degree that the historical Christ almost disappeared, and the sacrifice on the cross became a mere symbol of the sacrifice which shall take place in us, he says, "The bright star in the Church of God." He opened up a new path in the exposition of the Apocalypse by making two distinct milleniums: the first, from Constantine until 1300, in this correspondence with the common Orthodox view; the second, from 1300 to 2300, which was a new departure, by which he was enabled to find a place for the future conversion of the Jews, and a more glorious condition of the Church on earth, which he gains by a symbolical interpretation of Rev. xxii. and xxi. He also published commentaries on the Song of Songs and Daniel, and discussed various questions in dispute between the Puritans and the bishops. His works were collected and published, London, 1644, 4to.

BRILL. BROUGHTON, Hugh, a distinguished Hebrew scholar, b. at Oldbury, Salop, 1549; d. in London, Aug. 4, 1612. His earliest patron was Bernard Gilpin (see title), who met him accidentally, educated him at his parish school, and sent him to Cambridge, where he became fellow of Christ College; but afterwards he went to London, and enjoyed considerable reputation as a preacher. His Hebrew and Greek learning was remarkable in an age characterized by its attainments in these tongues. He translated the prophetic books into Greek, and the Apocalypse into Hebrew, and desired to translate the whole New Testament into Hebrew, believing that it would have forwarded the conversion of the Jews. While his learning and ability were unquestioned, his unhappy temper prevented his advancement. Dr. John Lightfoot edited his literary remains under the title, The works of the great Albionean divine, renowned in many nations for rare skill in Salmen's and Athen's tongues, and familiar acquaintance with all Rabbinical learning. Mr. Hugh Broughton. Collected in one volume, and digested into four tomes. Folio, London, 1692.

Brousson, Claude, b. at Nîmes, 1647; executed at Montpellier, Nov. 4, 1698; practised as a lawyer at Castres, Castelmamut, and Toulouse, and employed his talent with great courage and self-sacrifice to defend his co-religionists of the Reformed Church against the steadily-increasing injustice with which they were treated. At last he was compelled to fly; and June 26, 1694, he was condemned to death, which sentence was executed July 3 in effigie. Meanwhile he visited Berlin and Holland, to bring about a coalition between the Protestant princes against Louis XIV.; but, not satisfied with what could be done in this way, he returned in 1695 to France, and wandered about in the Cevennes, “proclaiming in the desert,” admonishing and exhorting his brethren, though a price was put on his head, and he was hunted by the government officials like a beast of prey. In 1695 he went to Holland, and staid fourteen months in the Hague as preacher to the congregation of French exiles; but in 1695 he again entered France through Sedan, and visited most of the Reformed congregations north of Loire, finally escaping through Franche-comté into Switzerland. Once more, in 1697, he visited France, but was caught at Oliérón, and sentenced to be broken on the wheel. Among his works, of which a list is given in La France Protestante, III., p. 46, the most prominent are: État des Réformés de France, La Haye, 1853; La Maune Mystique du Desert, Amsterdam, 1693; Lettres Pastorales, 1697. His life was written by Borel, Nîmes, 1852, in French, and in English by HAYNES: The Evangelist of the Desert, London, 1853. Theodore Schott.

Brown, John, grandson of the preceding, b. at Whitburn, Linlithgowshire, Scotland, July 12, 1784; d. in Edinburgh, Oct. 13, 1858; studied at Glasgow University and at the divinity school of the Burgher branch of the Secession Church, and was ordained minister of the Burgher congregation of Biggar. In 1822 he moved to Edinburgh, where he took charge, first of the Rose-street Church and afterwards of the Broughton-place Church. In 1835 he was also appointed professor of theology to the United Associate Synod. He was a great pulpit-orator, and a voluminous writer. The most prominent of his works are: Expository Discourses on First Peter, 1848; Exposition of the Discourses and Sayings of our Lord, 1850; The Resurrection of Life, 1851; Exposition of the Epistle to the Galatians, 1853, etc. See John Cairns: Memoirs of John Brown, D.D., London, 1860.

Brown, John Newton, D.D., a Baptist minister and editor, b. New London, Conn., June 29, 1803; d. at Germantown, Penn., May 15, 1888. After graduating head of his class at Madison College, New York, in 1823, he entered the Baptist ministry, and preached at several places in New England. In 1833, while at Exeter, N.H., he issued his Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge (I. vol. small 8vo), a good specimen of a pious, meritorious, useful compilation from various approved works, such as Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible, Buck's Theological Dictionary, and Evans's Sketch of the Christian Religion. His encyclopedia, it is true, is far behind the times; even the revised edition, by Rev. G. P. Tyler (1858), reprinted Philadelphia, 1886, cannot now be used. In matter and illustration it belongs to a former generation, yet Dr. Brown deserves great credit for having so ably carried through in that early day a work of such magnitude and instructive-ness. From 1838 to 1845 he was professor of theology and church-history in the New Hampton Theological Institution, New Hampshire: from 1845 to 1849 a pastor in Virginia; then editorial secretary of the Baptist Theological Society, and of their journals, The Christian Chronicle and The National Baptist. The New Hampshire (Baptist) Confession was prepared and revised (1852) by him. Brown, Robert, the founder of the Browns, and thus the spiritual father of Congregationalism. His life and principles have been for the first time intelligently and authoritatively stated by Henry Martyn Dexter, in his Congregationalism as seen in its Literature, New York, 1850; and we present his account in a very condensed form. Robert Browne was born at Tolethorp, Hampshire (Baptist) Confession was prepared and revised (1852) by him. He was educated, and in all probability took the regular degrees, at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge; and in 1571 became domestic chaplain to the Duke of Norfolk, who quickly was called upon to take his part in refusing to obey a citation to answer before the ecclesiastical commissioners, and in charge of disseminating seditious doctrines. At some time after this, Browne taught school, probably at Southwark, for three years; but after 1578 he re-entered the university to study theology. He had no license to preach, yet he preached... frequently and powerfully. When his brother obtained for him the necessary license, he not only refused to receive it, but publicly harangued "against the calling and authorizing of preachers by bishops." Discouraged by the failure to excite offensive teaching in Cambridge, inhibited from preaching, and recovered from a severe illness, he went to Norwich, where he kept on preaching his "seditious" doctrines, and in 1581 was complained against by the Bishop of Norwich, but protected by his kinsman Lord Burghley. He, with his disciples, now found it so uncomfortable that they fled to Middelburg in Zeland, to seek there amid strangers peace and liberty of worship. There is no direct evidence that Browne went to Norwich, where he kept on preaching his "seditious" doctrines, but to live as a member of the Church of England, so far as his conduct was concerned. His good behavior so mollified the popular feeling against him, that in September, 1591, he was installed rector of Achurch-cum-Thorpe, a very small living (for in the next century the parish contained only eighteen families) given him by Lord Burghley. Here the fiery, eloquent, determined Robert Browne lived for forty years. But in what condition? Dr. Dexter explains the cessation of Browne's activity, and his long residence in the little parish, on the suspension of his mental incapacity, which may at times have amounted to real insanity. It was for a mad blow at a constant he died in prison. (It is easy to understand how Fuller (Church History, V. 69) could say that Browne did not preach in his (Browne's) church: he could not. Many other slanders are likewise refuted by supposing him to be weak-minded. This account of Browne differs radically from the ordinary story, and from the well-known and celebrated History of the Puritans, in Fuller's Church History of Britain, and in books based upon them.)

The followers of Browne are known as Brownists, a term of reproach. Our knowledge of the early history of the sect is derived from Robert Browne himself, who published in 1584 A True and Short Declaration, Both of the Gathering and Joyning together of certaine Persons: and also of the Lamentable Breach and Disuision which fell amongst them (4to, pp. 24),—a treatise which answers its name, is true on the face of it, and certainly short. But Browne's change, and the bad stories about his later life, made those who shared his earlier views disclaim all connection with him: and so, although to him is due, in Dr. Dexter's opinion, the founding of Congregationalism, the denomination in England and America slights his claim. But the man merits better treatment. He was not "an ambitious bigot in his earlier, and a contemptible sneak in later, years." His voluntary association for a long period with that estimable minister and eminent Christian, the Rev. Richard Greenham of Dry Drayton, the modesty and charity with which the True and Short Declaration is written, the words already cited, and a few others, may be put in evidence to prove his character, the sincerity of his purpose, and its nobility. The movement he started was not solely to effect a change of form, but also to partake of the Lord's Supper. It was because the bishops tolerated this state of things, that he declared they were not Christ's ministers; and because the Presbyterian Puritans refused to cut themselves loose from connection with such a system, and looked forward to a State Church on Genevan principles, he would not remain with them. His independency was therefore not from policy, but from piety. In a church so corrupt as that of England, he maintained, the true Christian could not stay. Nor was there any hope of reform for the Church from the civil power, neither any obligation to wait for prince... or magistrate. He denied the ecclesiastical authority of the magistrate, and so was the first to set forth the correct doctrine of the relation of the civil and religious powers. He further declared, that any company of believers thus separated from the corrupt State Church formed of themselves a true Church, amenable only to Christ's control, and quite competent to govern themselves according to their own decisions, under the promised guidance of his Spirit. The officers of such a church were, as deduced from the New Testament, a Pastor, a Teacher of Doctrine, one or more Elders, or more Relievers (deacons) and one or more Widows. The Lord's Supper is to be the sweet and sacred bond of union in the Church, and care must be taken to keep out all unworthy members. [The practical result of this "care" was an inquisition which broke up his church at Middelberg.] He further completed his system by deciding that the relations between the various independent churches should be sisterly, admitting of no control, but inviting unto mutual love and kindness in speech and deed. But the times were not ripe for such splendid theorizing, although it was not God's design to let the world forget it. Robert Browne died, his name smothered by his proper friends, and jeeringly repeated by his enemies; but he lies the real founder of Congregationalism, and his works are the acknowledged quiver whence the defenders of his polity have drawn their sharpest arrows. The miserable, crazy dotard who died in Northampton jail had been the enthusiastic, impetuous preacher, and the man of genius, who conceived and advocated the freest type of church government. We bring out to the light once more, that we may honor, the man whose later years God shrouded in gloom, but whose years of service of Christ and his Church.

BROWNE. Sir Thomas, b. in London, 1605; d. at Norwich, 1682; studied medicine; travelled on the Continent, and settled as a practitioner at Norwich in 1636. His Religio Medici was first published in 1642, and attracted immediately a great attention, though its peculiar blending of deep religious feeling and sceptical views is not easy to follow. "It is the confession of faith of a mind keen and sceptical in some aspects, but on the whole deeply imbued with the sense of the mysteriousness of true religion, and willing to yield itself up without reserve to the requirements of faith." In 1646 appeared the Treatise on Vulgar Errors, in 1647 the Hydriotaphia, or Urnburial, and in 1658 the Garden of Cyrus. His Christian Morals was not published until 1716. The best edition of his work is that by Simon Wilkin, in 4 vols., 1836, containing his letters and Johnson's biography, reprinted by Bohn, London, 1851, 3 vols.

BROWNSON, Orestes Augustus, LL.D., b. at Stockbridge, Vt., Sept. 10, 1800; d. April 16, 1876; was for many years an able opponent of Protestantism, and an unqualified but conscientious defender of Romanism. His education was defective. His religious career was sinuous. He was originally a Baptist, joined the Presbyterian Church at Ballston, N.Y., in 1823; but in 1825 he became a Universalist preacher, and in 1826 a Unitarian preacher. He plunged into French and German literature, philosophy, and theology, and came out a Socialist, after the type of Robert Owen. While in this way, he organized in Boston, in 1836, the "Society of Christian Union and Progress," and ministered to it, until, in 1848, he avowed infidel doctrines in his book, New Fleece of Folly, Society, and the Church. In 1844 he made his final change. He had gone from Biddle Christianity to infidelity: he went to the opposite extreme, and joined the Roman-Catholic Church. Having exhausted all possibilities, he never left it, and established, in 1846, Brownson's Quarterly Review, which he edited until his death, and in which he taught the strongest Ultramontanism with energy and enthusiasm. He had a rare faculty for defending the most extreme views, and making them plausible. He wrote nearly the entire contents of his Review.

BRUEGGLERS. a sect founded in 1746 in the village of Bruegglen, in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, by two brothers, Christian and Hieronymus Kohler. During a religious excitement which at that time prevailed in the neighborhood, the two brothers, who had hitherto led a very dissolute life, and were sorely in want of means to gratify their vanity and sensuality, suddenly appeared as divine prophets, began to preach and exhort, and soon gathered a number of followers. They professed to stand in direct communication with God the Father, and to know every thing he knew. By virtue of this foreknowledge they announced that the world should perish, and the day of judgment come, on next Christmas Eve; and this event, which frightened people out of their senses, was only averted by the intercession of the two brothers. The basis of their moral system was the doctrine that the whole external part of man, the flesh of human nature, is under the dominion of Satan; and consequently Satan, and not man, is responsible for what is done in the flesh. The effects of such doctrines soon became apparent in the wildest excesses; and the two brothers were banished from the country (1750). The disorders, however, as the brothers every now and then returned secretly to Bruegglen. In 1752 they were caught; and the process instituted against them now revealed the whole abomination of their conduct. Hi-BRUNO, b. 925; d. Oct. 11, 965; a son of Henry the Fowler, and brother to Otho I.; was from infancy destined for the Church, and educated in the cathedral school of Utrecht, and was made Archbishop of Cologne in 933. He took a very active part in the political affairs of his brother, always working for peace; while in the history of the Church he stands as a representative of that school-education which was started by Charlemagne, and in the tenth century developed in a peculiar way by the Iro-Scottish monks. His life was written by Ruotger in 966, and in the thirteenth century by the monks of St. Pancræton in Cologne, where he lies buried. See Pertz: Monum. Germ. Hist. Script. BRUNO, Giordano, b. at Nola in Campania about 1550; d. in Rome, Feb. 9, 1600; entered the Dominican order; but the study of natural philosophy, and of the works of Nicolaus Cusanus and Raimundus Lullus, gradually placed him in such an opposition to the Roman Church that he was compelled to flee from his monastery, and leave Italy. In 1580 he settled at Geneva. He was not a Protestant, however. He was a Pantheist; and many of the moral principles he adopted and defended are of a very doubtful character. But the painstaking care with which the author of the Roman Church and the futility of the scholastic system was deep and striking; and the effect of his lectures, delivered at Geneva, Paris, Oxford, Wittenberg, Prague, and Frankfort, and of his numerous writings, was very keenly felt, and deeply resented. In 1592 he had the audacity to return to Italy, and began to lecture at Padua, and afterwards at Venice. But he was seized by the Inquisition, and placed before its tribunal in Rome. Every means was employed to compel him to recant; and, when he absolutely refused, he was condemned for heresy, and handed over to the secular authorities to be punished cibra sanguinis effusionem. He was burnt. His Italian works were published at Leipzig, 1830; the Latin, at Stuttgart, 1834. See Ch. Bartholomew: J. Bruno, Paris, 1844; F. J. Muns: Bruno und Nicol. von Cusa, Leipzig, 1847.

BRUNSWICK. Of the population of the grand duchy of Brunswick, 300,196 are Lutheran, 7,030 Roman Catholic, 2,793 Reformed, and 1,174 Jews. The Reformed have a church and a pastor in the city of Brunswick, and form, together with the congregations of Celle, Hanover, Bückeburg, Göttingen, and Münden, the Reformed Synod of Lower Saxony. The Roman Catholics have three churches, respectively in Helmstedt, Brunswick, and Wolfenbüttel, and belong to the diocese of Hildesheim in Hanover. The Lutheran Church, established in the city of Brunswick in 1528, and in the country in 1568, is the Church of the State, comprising two hundred and sixty congregations, and administered by a consistory, seven superintendent-generals, and thirty-three superintendents. The confession on which all ecclesiastics of the Established Church must take oath, the Corpus Doctrinae Juliani, does not contain the Formula Concordiae. The census quoted above is that of December, 1871.

BRYANT, Jacob, a learned though whimsical writer, b. at Plymouth, 1715; d. near Windsor, Nov. 14, 1804. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, where he took B.A., 1740, M.A., fellow of King's College, 1744; became tutor, and then, later, secretary, to the Duke of Marlborough, 1756. From the duke he received a lucrative appointment in the ordnance, which, as he never married, amply supported him, and was assigned two rooms at Blenheim, with permission to enter at any time the magnificent library there. The passion of his life was the cause of his death; for when eighty-nine years of age, in attempting to get a book down from a shelf by means of a chair, his foot slipped, his leg was grazed, mortification set in, and he died. He published: Observations and Inquiries, Cambridge, 1767 (in this volume he defends the reading Euryclisism instead of Euro Aquilo, proposed by Bochart, Bentley, and others; and also Melite as a different island from Malta. On both points modern scholarship pronounces him wrong; although in regard to the former point the decisive verdict was given only recently by the Codex Sinaiticus); A New System, or Analysis of Ancient Mythology, London, 1774–76, 3 vols. 4to ed., 1st vol. 1776; Account of the Author, Index, 41 plates, London, 1807, 6 vols. 8vo,—a work of great learning upon the plan of substantiating the Bible by a study of the traditional remains of all nations, but now utterly worthless; Vindicia Fiuinae, London, 1777 (a vindication of the testimony given by Josephus concerning our Saviour Jesus Christ); Treatise on the Authenticity of the Scriptures, London, 1792, prepared at request of the Dowager Lady Pembroke, 3d ed., 1810; Dissertations upon some Passages in Scripture, London, 1815. Besides these volumes, he issued several of a more purely archaeological interest. His great fondness for paradox, and his other eccentricities, rob his writings of a great part of their value.

He published Experiments of an Ecclesiastical Establishment for India, 1805;

CHRISTIAN RESEARCHES IN ASIA, 1811; COLONIAL ECCLESIASTICAL ESTABLISHMENTS, 1813, ETC. THERE IS A LIFE OF HIM BY MR. BUTZER, W. H. L. BUCHANAN, GEORGE, b. at Killearn, Stirling-shire, Scotland, 1506; d. in Edinburgh, Sept. 28, 1582; studied in Paris, 1520–22, at St. Andrew's, 1522–25, and again in Paris, whence he returned to Scotland in 1537. Having adopted Protestant views, his first literary undertakings were two Latin satires on the monks, Somnium and Francisculus, which caused such indignation among the Romanists, that he was compelled to leave the country, 1539. During his exile he taught in Paris, Bordeaux, Coimbra, etc.; and to this period belong his Latin translations of Medea and Alcestis, and his two Latin tragedies, Jephtes and Iphigeneia. Returned to Scotland in 1560, he was appointed tutor to Queen Mary in 1562, principal of St. Leonard's College, St. Andrew's, 1566, and tutor to James VI. in 1570. During this last period of his life he wrote his Latin translation of the Psalms, His De Jure Regni apud Scotos (condemned in 1584, and burnt in 1585), and Liber Scoticarum Historia, his principal work. His life was written by Dr. Irving, 1817.

BUCK, Charles, the never-to-be-forgotten author of the Theological Dictionary, a work which has sold enormously in Great Britain and America, has appeared in many shapes, under different editors, and yet is so admirably composed that it cannot become entirely antiquated. Mr. Buck was born in 171; labored in the ministry of the Independent Church until his death, in 1815. His Dictionary appeared London, 1802, 2 vols. 8vo.; in 1821, 1 vol. 8vo.; edited and much improved by Rev. Dr. Henderson, London, 1817; 1 vol. 8vo, pp. 788, Philadelphia, U.S.A., 1869. Another work, of less value, but of great popularity, was, Anecdotes, Religious, Moral, and Entertaining, London, 1799; 6th ed., corrected, 1815; 10th ed., 1842.

BUCKMINSTER, Joseph, b. at Rutland, Mass., Oct. 14, 1751; d. at Portsmouth, N.H., June 10, 1812; studied at Yale College, and was ordained minister of the North Church in Portsmouth in 1779. He published a memoir of Dr. McClintock, and some sermons. His son, Joseph Stevens Buckminster, b. in Portsmouth, May 26, 1784; d. in Boston, June 9, 1812; studied at Harvard College; took charge of the Brattle-street Church in Boston in 1805; and was appointed professor of biblical criticism at Harvard College in 1811. He published a volume of sermons, which was reprinted in London. See Memoirs of the Buckminsters, Father and Son, by Mrs. Lee, Boston, 1831.

BUDDEUS, Johann Franz, b. at Anclam, Pomernania, June 25, 1667; d. at Jena, Nov. 19, 1729; studied at Greifswald, and became professor of philosophy at Wittenberg in 1687, and at Jena in 1689; professor of Greek and Latin at Coburg in 1692; professor of moral philosophy at Halle in 1693; and professor of theology at Jena in 1705. He was a man of genuine piety and immense learning; and he exercised a precious influence, both by the conciliatory position he occupied among the various theological and philosophical schools, and by the clearness and ease with which he fulfilled his obligations as a teacher of materials. The most prominent among his works...

are, Elementa Philosophiae Practicae, 1697; Institutiones Theologiae Moralis, 1711, which, executed under the influence of Spener, caused the casuistical elements to disappear altogether from the Protestant treatment of Christian morals; also his Logique Historica ad Theologiam Unicum, 1727, is remarkable.

BUDDHISM, the religion of five hundred millions of our race, is the system of religious truth taught originally by Gautama (or Gotama), the son of Mayadevi, the queen of Suddhodana, king of Kapilavastu, a place about one hundred miles north-east of Benares. He was born probably B.C. 522 or 536, in the garden of Lumbini, and d. at Kusinagara, B.C. 543 or 477. The story of his life in its simplest form is as follows: One day Mayadevi, while dreaming, saw Buddha descend from heaven in the form of a white elephant, and accompanied by a myriad of heavenly beings, and her child was born. She hastened back again, but on the way, under a pipal-tree (Ficus religiosa), her child was born. She hastened back again, only, however, to die. The boy was named Siddhattha ("he by whom all ends are accomplished"). His aunt, Mahaprajapati, who was also the king's other wife, a childless woman, brought him up tenderly. He was early married to his cousin, the daughter of the rajah of Koli. But after a time the pleasures and pressures of his daily life ceased to satisfy him. He became conscious of a far higher destiny than that of an earthly prince; and so in his twentieth year he suddenly broke loose from all his associations, and took up an ascetic life. He first studied under two famous Brahmans, Arada and Rudraka; but, unsatisfied, he went into the jungle, and there for six years, accompanied by five disciples, lived so austere that he was wasted to a shadow. But when almost dead he perceived his mistake, and at once took proper food. This course of religious development had been all along desperately opposed by Mara, the demon of desire, whose temptations reminded us of those to which Christ was subjected; but at last he conquered, and set forth to ameliorate the world. He regathered his five disciples, whom his renunciation of asceticism had driven away, and began to publish abroad the deep things his meditations had revealed, and in his first discourse propounded "the four sublime truths," — pain, the eternal fact presented to consciousness throughout the universe; its origin in desire, which leads to action, and consequent merit and demerit; its prevention through the way, the law promulgated by Buddha, or the eight-fold path (right belief, feelings, speech, actions, means of livelihood, endeavor, memory, and meditation). He was then in his thirty-sixth year, possessed of the perfect intelligence of a Buddha. He lived for forty-four years thereafter, travelling about; and when he died his body was burned with immemorial obsequies, and his ashes sent to eight kingdoms, each of which built a monument over its portion.

Gautama, or, as he is commonly called, Sakya Muni ("the Sakya sage"), like Socrates and Jesus, proclaimed his doctrines orally, and wrote nothing: at least nothing has been preserved. But after his death five hundred of his disciples held a council, and each recited what he had heard, and then the whole assembly repeated aloud what had been thus gathered up. By a second and third council the teachings of Gautama were formulated; but it is not proved that any written statement of them is earlier than B.C. 100-88. It is yet unsettled whether the original language was Sanscrit or Pali, probably the latter.

Present Buddhism is a development of the primitive faith, which had three objects, — morality, asceticism, and nirvana. The cardinal tenets are the four truths already stated. It is open to any thing, even to a worm, to become a Buddha, provided this high office is kept steadily in view. In the past there have been many Buddhas, and in the future there will be as many. When at last one by his self-negation and virtue has become a potential Buddha (Bodhisattwa), he awaits in heaven his final change, — his birth as a man, — for then he is perfected. He is born either a male Brahman, or a Kshatriya (Gautama's caste); gains intelligence under the bothi tree at Gayá; and begins his preaching in the deer-park at Benares, and preaches precisely the same doctrines as all his predecessors. Gautama's Buddhahood was for five thousand years. Then he will enter nirvana, and the next Buddha, Maitreya, will appear, and restore to all its influence the old doctrine.

The Buddhists divide all being into the five classes: (1) Buddhas; (2) Bodhisattvas (future Buddhas); (3) Pratyeka-buddhas (individual Buddhas, who have attained to perfect knowledge, but have sought it only for themselves, while the Buddha attains knowledge in order that he may impart it); (4) Aryas (the saints who have begun to tread the road to nirvana), who are divided into four classes, called "paths," each of which is subdivided into those who are nearing the end of their "path," and those who are at the beginning of their "path," — nirvana. What is nirvana? Extinction. Annihilation is really all that awaits the Arhat, according to the philosophic writings of the Buddhists, as interpreted by many scholars. But Mr. Rhys Davids puts an entirely different construction upon nirvana, "not the extinction of a soul. He says, "it is the extinction of that sinful, grasping condition of mind and heart which would otherwise be the cause of renewed individual existence." In a word it is "holiness," "perfect peace, goodness, and wisdom" (Buddhism, pp. 111, 2). (5) Prithagyanas, the ordinary disciples who content themselves with ordinary duties, and do not aspire to the transcendental perfections of the Aryas. The general name, the vast majority.
The five above-mentioned gradations, however, mostly belong to the unseen world. The visible Buddhist communion has necessarily other divisions. The Buddhist "church" is called Sangha; and the tri-ratna, or "three precious things,"—Buddha, the law, and the assembly (sangha),—are continually mentioned in Buddhist formulas and books; but the present hierarchy is not primitive, but developed. The sangha is composed of "religious mendicants" (bhikkhus), who, after a novitiate, take vows of chastity and poverty,—vows, however, which are not irrevocable at the present day, nor, apparently, at any previous time.
Buddha from the first discouraged all painful asceticism, so prevalent in Brahminism, but laid great stress on a mendicant and celibate life. In continued devotion to the devotees, the duties of the laity are included in the third point of "taking" refuge ("I take refuge in Buddha, in his doctrine, and in his community"), and the "five prohibitions," i.e., against the sins of murder, theft, unchastity, lying; and the use of intoxicating drinks. The morality of Buddhism is its brightest side. The purity and benevolence of Buddhist books supply the want of poetry, for they are usually of little literary merit, and strongly excite the interest of the reader.
As Buddhism does not recognize the idea of God, it has properly no worship or sacrifice, and originally no religious ceremonies; but as it spread, a cultus arose. The images and relics of Buddha himself and the other holy personages of the legends were worshipped; and the ceremonies consisted of offerings of flowers and perfumes with incense and the recital of hymns and prayers. Formulas of prayer have also come into use, although the idea of a being who answers prayer is utterly foreign to the system. The prayers are supposed to produce their effect by a kind of magical efficacy. Hence the praying-machines of Tibet and Mongolia are logical consequences. The religious communities assemble for prayer three times a day; i.e., morning, noon, and evening. They publicly confess their sins on the days of the new and full moon; and the laity also attend for confession, and to listen to the reading of some sacred text. Besides these days, there are several other fast-days in the month. The end of the Buddhist system is nirvana, or extinction. In theory this is really what awaits the faithful disciple, according to his creed; but it can hardly be disputed that the great mass of Buddhist believers in every age have given to nirvana a vague meaning of future happiness.
Buddhism began to decline in India in the seventh century, and was extinct in the sixteenth. But previously it had blessed with its light the nations around. Like Christianity, it propagated itself by preaching and quiet missionary labor, and so it spread to China, where it is one of the three co-ordinate religions. (See Lit. below.) From China it has spread into Corea and Japan. Indirectly it has influenced the West. Gnosticism and Manichæism were unions of Buddhism with Christianity; and so it made itself known in a perverted way to the Western World. Stray references are found in Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. 15) and Jerome (Adv. Jorinianum, i. 42). Some suppose that the halo around the head of Christ and his saints was borrowed from the Buddhist pictures of Buddha and his principal disciples, in which it is found. Rightly to estimate this Buddhist influence on the world, we must remember that it sprang up in India. Nearly all its tenets were based on the immemorial belief of the Hindu mind. It was the moral teaching of Buddha, and his proclamation that the highest religious truth was open to all castes alike, which formed the special features of his system. All else he only borrowed or modified from the Brahmans whom he opposed. There were, in truth, only three creative national intellects in the ancient world,—the Hebrew, the Greek, and the Hindu; and Buddhism is that product of the Hindu mind, which, for good or for evil, has most widely influenced mankind.
In Tibet, Buddhism has developed itself into a hierarchy, and acquired temporal power under the name of Lamaism. The form of ecclesiastical government and service bears striking resemblance to the Roman-Catholic. The Spirit of the Buddhhas is believed to be present in the chutuktus, who occupy a position similar to that of cardinal, and to be especially incarnate in the Dalai Lama, the infallible Head of the Church, the Buddhist Pope, who is also the sole temporal sovereign of Tibet. See T. W. Rhys Davids, Buddhism, pp. 248–250, for account of the service in Lhasa Cathedral.
Reformed Buddhism is a recent development in China and Japan. It plainly shows the influence of Christianity upon thoughtful Orientals who yet are not converted. In China the sects of Reformed Buddhists are numerous; but they generally agree in rejecting polytheism, and in worshipping some one divinity, e.g., the goddess of mercy. One sect calls itself (Salvation) Without Works. In Japan more advance has been made. The sect assumes the title of Shinism, or the true religion. In Kioto they have a college, which is Western in its arrangements and curriculum. Their creed is, "Rejecting all religious austerities and other action, giving up all idea of self-power, we rely upon Amita (Infinite) Buddha with the whole heart for our salvation in the future life, which is the most important thing; believing, that, at the moment of putting our faith in Amita Buddha, our salvation is settled. From that moment invocation of his name is observed, to express thankfulness and gratitude for Buddha's mercy. Moreover, being thankful for the reception of his doctrine from the founder and succeeding priests, we must also keep the laws, which are fixed for our duty during our whole life." The striking resemblances to Christianity are: 1. Worship is rendered to one Buddha, to the exclusion of all others; 2. This one Buddha bears the title of Amita, the "Boundless," or Infinite Buddha, who pronounces all personal merit, and puts faith in nothing but the mercy of Amita; 4. The soul is brought into a state of salvation by the act of faith; 5. Though salvation is thenforward assured, the believer BUDINGTON, William Ives, D.D., a learned and able Congregational minister. b. April 21, 1815, at New Haven, Conn.; d. in Brooklyn, Nov. 29, 1879. He graduated at Yale College in 1834; studied theology in the New-Haven and Andover Seminaries, graduating from the last in 1839; and from April 30, 1840, to 1849, he was pastor of the First Church, Charlestown. On April 22 of that year he began his services in the Clinton-avenue Congregational Church, Brooklyn, N.Y. In 1845 he published his History of the First Church, Charlestown, Mass. He was a frequent contributor to the press, and issued a variety of sermons, etc. He enjoyed the esteem and confidence of his congregation not only, but of his denomination and the Christian public in high degree.

BUCOHNAGEN, Johann, b. at Wollin, Pomerania, June 24, 1458; d. at Wittenberg, April 20, 1558; studied at Greifswald, and was in 1504 appointed rector of the school of Treptow, which he soon brought into a very flourishing state. The writings of Erasmus and the Humanists had early led him to understand that an ecclesiastical reform was a necessity; but it was Luther's book De Captivitate Babylonica which revealed the truth to him. In 1521 he went to Wittenberg; and in 1522 he was appointed minister at the collegiate church of that city, in which position he remained for the rest of his life. He possessed a very extraordinary talent of organization. Without causing any great disturbances, he established the Reformation in Brunswick, Hamburg, and Lübeck; and the church constitutions which he gave these cities became the norm and rule for many others. In 1537 he went to Copenhagen, where he resided till 1542, re-organizing the whole Danish Church and the University of Copenhagen. Among his works are a history of Pomerania written in Latin in 1518, but not printed until 1728; Historie d. Leidens und d. Auferstehung Jesu Christi, 1530, often reprinted; and a commentary on the Psalms, which Luther valued very highly. His life has been written by Jänkens, Rostock, 1757; Engelken, Berlin, 1817; Zietz, Leipzig, 1834; Meurer, Leipzig, 1862; Vogt, Elberfeld, 1867.

BULGARIA. Some fifteen hundred years ago, there existed a Bulgarian kingdom on the banks of the Volga. Whence these Bulgarians came, who they were, and why they were called by this name, cannot be certainly known; but there is reason to believe that they were of Finnish origin. About 809 A.D. a portion of the Bulgarians left the Volga, crossed the Danube, and, under the leadership of the Kral Asparuch, occupied the country as far as the Balkans. The Slavic tribes who occupied this region submitted to their conqueror; but, as has often happened in these national migrations, the slave element proved to be the stronger. The Bulgarian language disappeared; and the people were amalgamated into a single nation, retaining the name of the conquerors, but little else.

This new Bulgarian nation was converted to Christianity about the year 860, and the Slavic apostles, Cyril the theologian, and Methodius the painter, natives of Salonika. It was the skill of the painter who pictured the Day of Judgment, rather than the arguments of the theologian, which confused King Boris, and through him the nation. The capital of the kingdom at that time was Preslava near Shumla. There is no connected history of the Bulgarian kingdom or church; but many important facts may be gleaned from Byzantine history and Slavic writers. They owe their alphabet and their Bible to Cyril and Methodius. They were engaged in constant wars with the Greeks, often defeated them, especially in 811, when King Krum defeated and killed the Emperor Nicephorus; in 913, when Simeon, the greatest of Bulgarian kings, besieged Constantinople; and in 1186, when King Assen re-established the kingdom, after it had been subjugated for a hundred and seventy years. In 1205 Ivan, or Calo-John as he is known in Europe, allied himself with the Greeks against the Latins, defeated and killed Baldwin, Emperor of Constantinople, and Boniface, King of Salonica. The last of the Bulgarian kings was Ivan Shishman, who was finally conquered by the Turks in 1369, and his kingdom annexed to the Ottoman Empire. In 1878, after the Russo-Turkish war, Bulgaria beyond the Balkans was constituted a semi-independent principality, and Bulgaria south of the Balkans, a semi-independent province called Eastern Roumelia.

The ecclesiastical history of these centuries may be told in a few words. King Boris, after his conversion, negotiated with Rome and Constantinople. He got the best of advice from Pope Nicholas I., which may still be seen in his letter preserved at Rome (See Mansi: Conc. Coll. XV. pp. 401–434); but he finally accepted an archbishop from Constantinople. In the early part of the tenth century, there was a Bulgarian Patriarch at Preslava, independent of Constantinople. King Samuel transferred the Patriarch to Ochrida. The Emperor Basil, surnamed the “Slayer of Bulgarians,” conquered them in 1019; and for a hundred and seventy years they were under the Patriarch of Constantinople. When King Assen re-established the kingdom, he recognized the Pope and received a Latin archbishop from Tinos. The Church again became independent, under King Ivan, early in the thirteenth century; and at the time of the Turkish conquest the Patriarch was again located at Ochrida, where he continued until 1777, when the Patriarch of Constantinople succeeded, by intrigues with the Turks, in securing the abolition of this see, annexing it to his own jurisdiction.

Immediately after the Crimean War, the Bulgarians began to agitate the question of their ecclesiastical independence; the Greeks having done everything in their power to destroy the Bulgarian nationality, and to Hellenize the people. The Roman Catholics took advantage of this agitation to intrigue for a return to Rome. In 1860 they won over a Bulgarian priest, one Joseph Spasikoff, to Rome, and through him and exercises authority over Bulgaria, Eastern Roumelia, and the Bulgarians in Macedonia. In Macedonia there is still a painful conflict of authority between him and the Patriarch, owing to the fact that the firman given by the Sultan has never been fully executed. All things considered, this Bulgarian Church is the most promising and most progressive of the orthodox churches of the East.

BULGARIS, Eugène, b. in Corfu, 1716; d. in St. Petersburg, June 10, 1806; studied at Janina and Padua; taught in the schools of Janina, Mount Athos, and Constantinople; went in 1763 to Germany in order to escape from the persecutions of the orthodox party in the Greek Church, and was in 1776 called to Russia by Catherine II., and made Archbishop of Cherson. The most remarkable of his writings are, besides a handbook of logic, still used in the Greek colleges, a Book against the Latins, Constantinople, 1796, new ed. 1818, and a History of the Apostolic Age, Leipzig, 1806. His life was written by A. P. Vietos, Athens, 1800.

BULL, George, b. at Wells, Somersetshire, Eng., March 25, 1634; d. Feb. 28, 1710; studied at Oxford; was Rector of St. George’s, near Bristol, then Rector of Suddington, Gloucestershire, Archdeacon of Llandaff, and finally, since 1705, Bishop of St. David’s. His Harmonia Apostolica (1670) is an attempt to show that Paul and James were fully agreed with respect to the doctrine of justification. His Defensio Fidei Nicene (1685) is a most learned and elaborate attempt to show that the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity existed fully developed in the Christian Church before the Council of Nice. The best edition of his collected works is that by Burton, Oxford, 1837, in 7 vols. in 8, containing the Life, by Nelson.

BULLINGER, Heinrich, b. at Bremgarten in the canton of Aargau, July 18, 1504; d. at Zurich, Sept. 17, 1575. He was educated in the school of Emmenich; studied at Cologne, and was by the "Sentences" of Peter Lombard led to the writings of Augustine and Chrysostom, and by the works of the Fathers to the Bible itself. Thus prepared, he received a deep impression of the writings of Luther and Melanchthon, and by Zwingli he was completely won for the cause of the Reformation. Appointed teacher in the cloister school of Cappel in 1522, he lectured on Melanchthon's Loci Communes, and in 1528 he accompanied Zwingli to the disputation of Bern. In 1529 he was chosen pastor of his native city, and in the same year he married. After the battle of Cappel, however (Oct. 11, 1531), in which Zwingli fell, he was compelled to leave Bremgarten, and in 1531 he was chosen chief pastor of Zurich, in the stead of Zwingli. With great energy and mildness he filled this difficult office, and contributed much to establish the Reformation in Switzerland. In the controversy concerning the Lord's Supper he wrote with great dignity against Luther, and Butzer's attempts at reconciliation found very little favor with him. More happily ended the dissension between him and Calvin, which resulted in the Consensus Tvgirinus, an agreement on the doctrine of the sacraments. The Second Helvetic Confession, drawn up by Bullinger in 1566, is the most elaborate Reformed creed, and was adopted in Switzerland, Hungary, Bohemia, and other churches. His writings are very numerous, and were highly esteemed in England during the reign of Elizabeth. The catalogue of the city library of Zurich mentions about a hundred. But they have never been collected. They consist of commentaries on the Bible, sermons, polemics against the Lutherans, the Anabaptists, etc., and dogmatical writings. De Gratia Dei Justificante, De Scripturae Sanctorum Autoritate, etc. Many of his sermons and lectures were translated into English: One Hundred Sermons on the Apocalypse, 1561; Twenty-six Sermons on Jeremiah, 1583; Five Decades of Sermons (1587), reprinted in 4 vols. (1849). His life was written by Carl Pesta-lozzi, 1858, and Roget Christoffel, 1875. See also G. R. Zimmermann, Die züricher Kirche und ihre Anteile, Zurich, 1877.

BUNGENER, Felix, the author of the History of the Council of Trent, b. at Marseilles, 1814; d. at Bonn, Nov. 28, 1860. He studied theology and philology in Marburg and Göttingen, 1808–13; was by his acquaintance with Niebuhr and Sylvestre de Sacy led to the study of ancient history and Oriental languages, and was preparing for a journey to the East, when, in 1818, he settled in Rome, first as secretary to the Prussian embassy, then as chargé d'affaires since 1823, and since 1827 as minister resident. In 1839 he was sent as minister to Bern, and in 1841 to London, where he remained till 1854. The rest of his life he spent as a private citizen, mostly residing at Heidelberg, and devoting himself to literary pursuits,—philology, history, and theology. Among his historical works are Die Basiliken des christlichen Roms, Munich, 1843, and Ägyptens Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, Hamburg, 1844–57, 6 vols., of which work is a shorter but much improved English edition, England and Egypt, 1855–67, 7 vols., with notes and additions by S. Birch, London, 1847–67. Also some of his theological writings have an historical character, such as Ignatius von Antiochen und seine Zeit, Hamburg, 1847, and Hippolytus und sein Zeitalter, London, 1852, 2 vols., which, together with his Analecta Ante-Nicaena, and Outlines of the Philosophy of Universal History, form his great work, Christianity and Mankind, London, 1854, 7 vols. A directly polemical character have his Die Verfasung der Kirche der Zukunft (1845) and Die Zeichen der Zeit (1855), both translated into English under the titles, The Church of the Future, and The Signs of the Times, the latter of which involved him in a sharp controversy with Stahl and Hengstenberg. As the positive complement to his polemical and critical writings may be considered his Völkerdichte Bibelwesen, für die Zukunft (1858, 2 vols.), translated by H. Holtzmann in 1870. His Memoirs, containing parts of his private correspondence, were published in 1898 by his widow. His correspondence with Humboldt appeared in 1898, and parts of his correspondence with Friedrich Wilhelm IV. in the historical romances, Un Sermon sous Louis XIV., 1843 ("The Preacher and the King," Boston, n.d.),—this gave him a great reputation, Les trois sermons sous Louis XIV., 1846, 3 vols. ("The Priest and the Huguenot," Boston, n.d.; 2 vols.), and, above all, the history, Histoire du concile de Trente, 1847, 2 vols. ("History of the Council of Trent," N. Y., 1855). In 1853 he conceived the idea of writing a series which should oppose Rome successively to the Bible, moral philosophy, and history. In 1859 he issued the first volume, Rome et la Bible; in 1861, Rome et le cœur humaine. The calling of the Vatican Council interrupted the series, and led him to write, in 1870, Pape et Concile au XIXe siècle ("Rome and the Council in the Nineteenth Century," Edinburgh, 1870). Besides these works he wrote Voltaire et son siècle (2 vols. 1851); Julien, ou la fin d'un siècle (4 vols. 1854); Christ et le siècle (1856); and on Calvin (1863), Lincoln (1865), Saint Paul (1867). A volume of Sermons was published after his death (1875). He aided by solid, lasting compositions, the cause of Protestantism, so dear to his heart. His writings were very numerous: many remain still unpublished. See Felix Bungener, by Jean Gabrel, in Etrennes religieuses for 1875.

1873. [Baron von Bunsen was a Christian nobleman of comprehensive culture, broad views, and great personal attraction. His hospitable home at the Capitol at Rome and at Carlton Terrace in London, was the centre of literary celebrity from all countries. He was an interpreter of German thought to England, and an intimate friend of Thomas Arnold, Archdeacon Hare, and Professor Maurice. He helped to establish the Anglo-Prussian bishopric at Jerusalem, as a basis of a larger union between the German evangelical and the Anglican churches. Like his royal patron and friend, Frederic William IV. of Prussia, he had a romantic turn of mind, and engaged in fanciful schemes. He entertained many questionable opinions; but his heart was fixed on Christ as his divine Saviour, and he died in that faith. His wife was one of the noblest and most cultured English ladies of the age, and her memoir of her husband is an abiding monument to both.]

BUNTING, Jabez, a very influential name in the English Wesleyan Church, b. at Manchester, May 13, 1779; d. June 16, 1838. Educated very carefully in his native town, and naturally of superior mental gifts, a man of great sagacity and power of administration, from the time of his becoming a member of conference (1796) he steadily rose in the estimation of his brethren and the Church at large. For fifty-seven years he served his denomination. From 1814 to his death he was president of the newly-established Wesleyan Theological Institution, which has done much to elevate the standard of Wesleyan ministerial culture; was four times president of the conference, and for eighteen years secretary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, to whose success he so largely contributed. Through him the lay element was brought out in the management of the Church. In every position Dr. Bunting was eminent. His word was law. But he used his influence for no personal ends, and withal kept his heart pure and humble. Posthumous Memoir by his son, 1859, first volume (all published). BUNYAN, John, the "Immortal Dreamer of Bedford Jail," b. in 1628 at Elstow, one mile from Bedford, Eng.; d. in London, Aug. 31, 1688. He was a tinker, like his father before him, brought up to attend the National Church, but was, according to his own confession, which must, however, be received with caution, in youth given to lying and swearing, although he was never drunk, perfectly chaste, and in truth greatly superior to his class. For a few months in 1645 he was in the army, it is uncertain upon which side, and was present at the siege of Leicester. A year after his return to Elstow, he married. He was then about twenty years old. But with the setting up of his home began his mental troubles. He became a prey to melancholy upon religion; and the wildest delusions seized his fertile brain. His wife brought him as her only portion two books which she inherited from her father,—Bishop Lewis Baily's The Practice of Piety, and Arthur Dent's The Plain Man's Pathway to Heaven, which were the only books he had in his possession. In 1660 the Act of Uniformity, compelling attendance upon the National Church, was revived. No distinction was made among Dissenters. The harmless Baptists and Quakers were equally under the ban with the fiery Independents and bigoted Presbyterians. The Bedford Baptists refused obedience; and Bunyan, for the odious sin of secretly continuing his ministry, was arrested, and committed to prison by the magistrates, who, however, were friendly to him, and would have spared him, had the law allowed. There he passed the next twelve years of his life. Tradition, without probability, puts him in the smallest of the three prisons of Bedford.

To many persons it seems wholly unnecessary for him to have been imprisoned at all; and the extraordinary opportunities given him to escape by a little casuistry show the unwillingness of all parties to keep so eminent a saint in duration vile. But as Bunyan stoutly refused to attend the National Church, or to give up preaching, his case was hopeless. To such a man the separation from his family was very painful. Two years before his arrest his wife had died, leaving him with four small children, one of whom, Mary, was left to him in the midst of the difficult period of separation. Within a year he had married a second time, and to a young woman of piety and courage. By her a pardon for him was sought through the friendly intervention of the high sheriff in consequence of a jail-delivery in honor of the coronation of Charles II, April 23, 1661. But, though Sir Matthew Hale took a kindly interest in her and her cause, the law had to be obeyed, and a pardon was refused so obstinate an offender as Bunyan. At first his imprisonment was merely nominal. He was allowed to go where he pleased, but he used his liberty to resume preaching, and so he was put into strict confinement. He was not formally tried: if he had been, he would have been transported. It was, therefore, not the cruelty of his jailers, but his own conscience, which made his imprisonment so long. "It might have ended at any time," says Mr. Froude, "if he would have promised to confine his addresses to a private circle." We should not without evidence yield to the popular notion that those twelve years were a bitter struggle against poverty and discomfort. Bunyan had with his poor wife sadly in need, and his children lacking food. No imprisonment is agreeable; and Bunyan counted it a great affliction to be debarred from ministerial labor. But as he was an influential, much respected man, had many friends, and was, so far as we can judge, in (comparatively) good circumstances, it is inconceivable that he endured any unusual suffering. Besides, would the Baptists have allowed their most distinguished preacher to starve? We see, therefore, in Bunyan's twelve years' imprisonment proof of his constancy, patience, and courage, and a wise Providence. His library consisted of the Bible, Concordance, and Foxe's Book of Martyrs. He used the enforced leisure in reading and writing (the Pilgrim's Progress was then begun, without thought of publication), and also in making tags of boot-laces, thus doing something practical, as a means of earning. But toward the close of the twelve years more liberty was given him. In 1670 we read of his preaching in the woods. In 1671 he became an elder, and on Dec. 12 of that year, pastor of the Bedford Baptist Chapel. Curiously, he was liberated by those who had no interest in him, nor sympathy with his views. Charles II., with the ultimate design of removing disabilities from Roman Catholics, issued the Declaration of Indulgence (1672), which annulled the penal acts against Dissenters; and so upon May 8 he was released, and the next day his license as pastor of the chapel was issued. Out of gratitude to Charles II., he published soon after a Discourse upon Antichrist, in which he innocently credits the King with the most honorable and pious intentions, and urges loyalty upon his countrymen. This treatise was afterwards used against him. The closing years of his life were laborious and honored. He preached annually in the Baptist churches of London; but he retained his charge at Bedford. His domestic life was pleasant; although he mourned the loss of his blind daughter, who had died while he was in prison. He seems also to have been most of the time in good health. His death was brought about by being chilled in a rain-storm on his return from effecting the reconciliation between a father and son. The exact date of this event is unknown, probably Aug. 31, 1688.

Character. — John Bunyan was one of the noblest of the many noble Puritans. He spent his life in devotion to the highest ideals of duty, and his death fifty years before his time. His early surroundings and occupation explain, if not excuse, the sins he charges himself with, and excite our wonder that he never committed the grosser sins of drunkenness and unchastity, which were probably sadly common in his class. A chaste and sober tinker was a great rarity. And the instances of the holiest men humbling themselves as sinners in the presence of an angry and perfect God, and confessing themselves miracles of saving grace, are so numerous and natural, that we do not wonder that Bunyan accused himself of so many sins. The terrible mental trials Bunyan passed through before he found peace were due more to the artificial notions of his day in regard to sin, and to his own active mind, than to any work of the Spirit. But, as we look back upon his life we see the results of the youth, under the direction of the Spirit in the hard school of experience, developed into the saintly man before whose inspired vision the Heavenly City stood revealed. Out of obscurity God lifted him into prominence; so that when he died he was mourned, not only as the most gifted minister in his denomination (his zeal had won him the sobriquet "Bishop Bunyan"), but as one of England's worthies, one of the pillars of the Church.

Writings. — The one book which God ordained John Bunyan should write was the Pilgrim's Progress. For it his life was a preparation; and because the experiences therein recorded are genuine has the book become a world classic. Every one can see himself, at least in some phase, faithfully mirrored in the Pilgrim. Two opinions, from critics of far different orders of mind, deserve quotation. Coleridge says, "I know of no book of so much interest, so much reality, so much truth, so much life, as the Bible excepted, as another world. Of all comparison — which I, according to my judgment and experience, could so safely recommend as teaching and enforcing the whole saving truth according to the mind that was in Christ Jesus, as the Pilgrim's Progress. It is, in my conviction, incomparably the best Summa Theologiae Evangelicae ever produced by a writer not miraculously inspired." In his famous essay upon Bunyan, Macaulay pays this tribute to his genius: "That wonderful book, while it obtains admiration from the most fastidious critics, is loved by those who are too simple to admire it. In every nursery the Pilgrim's Progress is a greater favorite than Jack the Giant-Killer. Every reader knows the straight and narrow path as well as he knows a road in which he has gone backward and forward a hundred times. This is the highest miracle of genius,—that things which are not should be as though they were; that the imaginations of one mind should become the personal recollections of another. And this miracle the tinker has wrought. The style of Bunyan is delightful to every reader, and invaluable as a study to every person who wishes to obtain a wide command over the English language. There is no book in our literature on which we would so straightand narrow path as well as he knows a

Burges, Cornelius, b. in Somersetshire (date undetermined); d. June 9, 1665. He was educated at Oxford and Cambridge, and was, on the accession of Charles I., appointed one of the chaplains in ordinary. He took both degrees of divinity in 1627. He was appointed a member of the Westminster Assembly in 1643 July 8 he was chosen by them assessor with Dr. White, and generally occupied the chair on account of the illness of Dr. Twisse. He was chairman of the first of the three grand committees of the Assembly, and one of the most energetic members of the body, being active especially in the discussion of Church Government and the Directory for Worship. He was energetic in political as well as ecclesiastical affairs. His chief works are: A chain of Graces drawn out at length for Reformation of Manners, London, 1622; The Fire of the Sanctuary newly discovered or a compleat Tract of Zeal, London, 1625; and Baptismal Regeneration of Elect Infants, Oxon., 1629. In the latter he maintained "It is most agreeable to the Institution of Christ that all elect infants that are baptized (unless in some extraordinary cases) doe, ordinarily, receive, from Christ, the Spirit in Baptism, for their first solemn initiation into Christ, and for their future actual renovation, in God's good time, if they live to years of discretion, and enjoy the ordinary means of grace appointed of God to this end." He delivered a large number of sermons before Parliament and other civil bodies, which were published from time to time. He is credited also with the paper subscribed by the London ministers, entitled A Vindication of the ministers of the Gospel in and about London from the unjust Aspersions cast upon their former Actions for the Parliament, as if they had promoted the Bringing of the King to Capital Punishment, London, 1648. He was an able and pious man, who was much abused subsequently by the Bishop of London.

BURGESS, Anthony, a Nonconformist clergyman, educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, but a fellow of Emmanuel College; held in 1645 the living of Sutton-Coldfield, Warwickshire; was a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines; ejected at the Restoration, lived afterwards in retirement at Tankwth. His principal works are: Vindicia Legis, London (1646); True Doctrine of Justification (1655); CX. Sermons on John xvi. (1656); Spiritual Refinings, delivered in 1654 (2d ed., 1658); Doctrine of Original Sin (1659).

BURGESS, Daniel, Dissenting divine, b. at Staines, Middlesex, 1645; d. January, 1712–13. He was graduated at Oxford; in 1667 went to Ireland as master of a school at Charleville, in 1685 minister; was charge of a congregation in Brydges Street, Covent Garden, London, afterwards in Carey Street. He was for a time tutor to Henry St. John (Lord Bolingbroke). He was noted for wit. He issued Man's Whole Duty, London, 1690, and other sermons.

BURGESS, George, b. at Providence, R.I., Oct. 31, 1809; d. on the passage home from the West Indies, April 23, 1809; was educated in Brown University; studied in Göttingen, Bonn, and Berlin; was made rector of Christ Church, Hartford, Conn., in 1834, and the first Episcopal bishop of the diocese of Maine in 1847, where his memory is still cherished. He published a translation of the Psalms in English verse, New York, 1810; Pages of the Ecclesiastical History of New England, Boston, 1817; The Last Enemy, Phil., 1859; Sermons; Last Journal, with Introduction by Bishop A. Lee, N.Y.; The Gospel of Luke, with Notes, N.Y., 1880. See Memoir by his Brother, Rev. A. Burgess, Phila., 1869.

BURGUNDIANS, The, when first known to history, towards the close of the third century, were settled in the regions between the Oder and the Vistula. In the middle of the fourth century they had moved westwards, and stood on the Upper Main; and when, in 406, Stilicho retreated with the Roman legions from the Rhine in order to protect Italy against the West-Goths, the Burgundians pushed onwards, and occupied the regions between Mayence and Strassburg. Amalgamating with other Germanic tribes, they formed in the beginning of the fifth century a powerful kingdom between the Rhine and the Rhone, which lasted till the middle of the sixth century; and produced the Gombettes, the famous Burgundian law-book, one of the most interesting and important monuments of ancient Germanic civilization. In their many dealings with the Romans the Burgundians early became acquainted with Christianity; but in the fifth century they appear to have lapsed into Arianism. Their king, Gundobad, held in 499 a great dispute between the Catholic and the Arian priests. Avitus offered a miracle in proof of the truth of the Catholic faith; but the Arians declined to accept any testimony of that kind, and the conference ended without any practical result. But in 516 Gundobad died; and in 517 his son and successor, Siegmund, who belonged to the Catholic Church, convened a council at Epaon, and quietly, without encountering any serious opposition, established the Catholic doctrines and rites among his subjects. All sources referring to the Burgundian nation and kingdom have been collected by Schöpplin in his Commentationes Historiae et Criticae, Bas., 1741. (C. A. Briggs.)

BURIAL. I. AMONG THE ANCIENT HEBREWS. — When life had fled, the relatives kissed the body, and closed the eyes (Gen. xlii. 4, 1): it was then washed (Acts ix. 37), and wrapped in numerous folds of linen (Matt. xxvii. 59), or in grave-clothes (John xxi. 44), between which were laid odoriferous spices, myrrh, aloes, etc. (John xix. 39 sq.). It may well have been that a portion of the great amount (one hundred pounds weight) brought for the burial of Jesus was intended to be burnt in his honor, and another portion to form a bed of spices, for Joseph and Nicodemus were both wealthy, and their respect for Jesus was great. At all events, we find such a use of spices in the case of Asa (2 Chron. xvi. 14). Fallen warriors were buried with their weapons (Ezek. xxxii. 27). Since, according to the law (Num. xix. 11 sq.), it was defilement to touch the dead, it was customary to bury as soon after death as possible, usually on the same day (Acts v. 5 sq.). The climate also necessitated speedy burial. A longer period than a day must, however, have elapsed between the death of Sarah and her burial (Gen. xxiii. 2, 19). The body was borne upon a bier in an open coffin, accompanied by the relatives and friends, and a procession varying in number according to circumstances (2 Sam. iii. 31; Luke xii. 12), among whom were, of course, those most intimate with the deceased, as his sons, spouse, disciples, who were obligated to pay the last respects (Gen. xxiv. 9; Judg. xvi. 31; Mark vi. 29). It was customary to hire mourning women and pipers as soon as the person died; and these, sitting among the mourners, by their shrill cries, eulogistic dirges, affected grief, and plaintive strains, kept up the grief of the really affllicted and continued their services while the body was carried through the streets (Jer. ix. 17 sq.; Matt. ix. 23; Mark v. 38). In later times there were funeral feasts, sometimes of great extravagance (Joseph.
BURIAL.

War, II. 1. 1, cf. Tob. iv. 17; Ep. Jer. 32). The passages sometimes quoted as showing the earlier Hebrews to have had this custom (2 Sam. iii. 35; Jer. xvi. 5 sq.; Ezek. xxiv. 17; Hos. ix. 4) are not to the point, because they refer to the return of the mourner to his usual food after his sorrow has abated. On the contrary, the relations of tombs, or those containing shelves or benches for the reception of the dead, about two feet from the ground, and generally with vaulted roofs; (4) nichetombs, hewn laterally in the face of the rock, about two feet and a half from the ground, of the length of the body, and about a foot and a half square.”—BöDEKER’s Palestine and Syria, p. 116.

Sarcophagi were used only by the rich, and were decorated with flowers and leaves. (Many of them are to-day used in Syria as passageways.) But the usual way was to bury without coffins. Not only kings and distinguished persons, but whoever was able, had their own hereditary family tombs (Gen. xxiii. 6 sq.), and it was looked upon as a misfortune not to be buried with honors. When possible, the dead were taken thither (Gen. xxvi. 29, 1. 5; 2 Sam. xiii. 37; 1 Kings xiii. 32). For the poor, for pilgrims and such like, and even for those in better circumstances, cemeteries became in after-times necessary (2 Kings xxiii. 6; Jer. xxvi. 25). The “Potter’s Field,” as we call such a place, may have gotten its original name from the holes out of which the clay had been dug being used for burying-places. Over the graves, monuments were occasionally built (Gen. xxiv. 20; 2 Sam. xviii. 18). Upon the graves of obnoxious persons in insult stones were thrown,—a custom still maintained in the East (Jos. vii. 26, viii. 29). In the post-exilian days those tombs which could not be easily recognized from a distance as such were “whited” (Matt. xxiii. 27) every spring, after the rains, before the passover, to warn passers-by of defilement through a touch of the same. The sepulchres of the prophets were sought out and decorated (Matt. xxviii. 27, 29). The tombs were believed to be tenanted by demons (Matt. viii. 29), and were also used for superstitions purposes (Isa. viii. 10, 11 sq.).

The tombs constitute a remarkable feature among the curiosities of modern Jerusalem. They are found all around the city. But unhappily the tombs of the kings, so often referred to in the Kings and Chronicles, have not been found as yet. The tombs so called were probably built by Queen Helena of Adiabene (Joseph. Antiq. XX. 4, 3). Every time a king, because of leprosy, as (Yziah (2 Chron. xxvi. 23), or of an unworthy life (2 Chron. xxvi. 20, xxiv. 25, xxvii. 27), or at his own request, was buried somewhere else, was particularly noticed. Jehoiada, the high priest in Joash’s day, was buried “among the kings” because he had done good in Israel (2 Chron. xxiv. 16).

H. AMONG THE CHRISTIANS.—The conviction that the bodies of those who died in the Lord were still united to Christ led to great care and reverence in handling the dead; and the Emperor Julian acknowledged that this fact was one reason for the success of Christianity. While the Romans buried their dead, the Christians always buried them, and the African Christians very gen-
The burial-place was originally, in accordance with Jewish and Roman law, outside of the city. And at Rome, Naples, and Milan, the Christians availed themselves of the nature of the soil to dig passages under the earth for burial purposes; and hence the catacombs. But when Christianity became the religion of the empire, the Christians could bury where they pleased, and quite naturally chose to lie as near as possible to saints or martyrs. Hence the burials in the churches dedicated to such worthies were frequent, and multiplied so greatly, leading, perhaps, to indecorous rivalry, that Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodotus, in A.D. 386, forbade them. Notwithstanding, they continued, and were rebuked by the Church, as in the 18th canon of the Second Council of Braga (in Portugal), A.D. 563, which expressly ordered that bodies must not be buried inside the churches, but outside, by the church-walls. (See Hefele's Conciliengeschichte, vol. 3, p. 17.) Inside the church, however, there was a place, somewhat removed from the altar, reserved for the interment of bishops, abbots, priests, and lay persons distinguished for sanctity. Others might be buried in the court before the chief entrance and other entrances, and in the corners of the church-walls. But the desire to be buried in "the holy ground" was too strong for councils and canon laws. Cloister churches often won the privilege of interment within them for those who were not monks; and family vaults were erected in churches. The regulations upon this subject, though numerous, seem to have been largely futile. The law of Germany forbids such burials, but that of England grants them on permission of the incumbent.

Funeral rites have always varied according to time and taste. Among the early Christians they were the direct antitheses to the Pagan customs, burials, but that of England grants them on statute, if it can be proved that the choice of a burial-place was unduly influenced by the priest in favor of his own church, he (the priest) falls under the ban of the Church, and only the Pope can release him from it (c. 1. de sepulturis in VI. Clem. 3 in fine de paenis V. 8).

The buying of a burial-place is denounced as simony; but free gifts were allowed. Hence arose the so-called "surplus fees," to which the pastor of the deceased is entitled in case the body is buried out of the parish. But no fees are exacted when a stranger dies in the parish, and is carried elsewhere. The amount of the fees depends upon circumstances; e.g., whether the funeral is with the ringing of bells (sepultura solennis), or without it (sepultura minus solennis).

A church-funeral is refused in general to all unbelievers, and, in the Roman-Catholic Church, to all unbaptized infants, who are to be buried in a particular (unblessed) part of the churchyard, without any liturgy. The following persons were, according to the Council of Trent, also excluded from the rites: the excommunicated, suicides (in doubtful cases these were buried in silence), those who fell in tournament or duel, usurers, robbers, incendiaries, those guilty of sacrilege, those who had not once in the year confessed, or received the sacrament, open blasphemers, those condemned, apostates, schismatics, and heretics.

faith and knowledge, of religion and philosophy—began to shake. He developed Occam's nominalism until the conflict between dogma and metaphysics, between religious and philosophical truth, became apparent. But it is not known whether he himself, or some of his adversaries, first invented the famous fable of the ass starving between two bundles of hay, and first applied it as a fit representation of the psychological state of his scepticism. His works were published in Paris, 1500, 1516, 1518, and at Oxford, 1637, 1640, 1641. See HAUREAU: Paschale, II. p. 486.

Burkitt, William, b. at Hitcham, Suffolk, Eng., July 25, 1650; d. at Dedham, Essex, October, 1703; studied at Cambridge, and became rector of Milden, Suffolk, in 1671, and vicar of Dedham in 1692. His Expository Notes on the New Testament, London, 1739, ran through many editions, and are still reprinted, e.g., N.Y., 1865. These Notes are rich in practical suggestions, and bear a very remarkable similarity to those of Matthew Henry.

Burma, Independent, a kingdom situated in South-east Asia, bordering upon Bengal. Area, a hundred and ninety thousand square miles; population, four million; capital, Mandalay. The territory was much reduced by British conquest in 1825 and 1852. The government is a pure despotism; the king dispensing torture, imprisonment, or death, according to his sovereign discretion, held in check only by fear of insurrection. They are sold for a time to strangers; and the practice has not been confined to the courts of law, where, if ill treatment is proved, divorce is readily obtained. In other respects, however, they are exposed to the most degrading treatment. They are sold for a time to strangers; and the practice of continual bribery to avoid punishment. Women have more apparent liberty than in many parts of the East; for they are not shut up, but appear openly in society, and have free access in their own name to courts of law, where, if ill treatment is proved, divorce is readily obtained. In other respects, however, they are exposed to the most degrading treatment. They are sold for a time to strangers; and the practice of continual bribery to avoid punishment.

Burman, Franz, b. at Leyden, 1632; d. Nov. 12, 1679, at Utrecht, where he was professor of theology since 1662. His principal work is Synopsis Theologica, which appeared in 1671, and attempts a dialectical reconciliation between the doctrines of Cocceius and those of the orthodox Reformed Church. He also wrote several devotional works in Dutch.

Burn, Richard, a philanthropist, b. at Winton, Westmoreland, Eng., 1720; d. Nov. 20, 1785, at Orton, where he was rector since 1740, and justice of the peace. The combination of these two offices occasioned him to write his Justice of the Peace and Parish Officer, London, 1755, 2 vols., which was several times reprinted. Also his Ecclesiastical Law, London, 1790, 2 vols., attracted much attention, and was afterwards enlarged. In 1764 he published A History of the Poor Law, and, in 1776, Observations on the Bill proposed in Parliament for erecting County Workhouses.

Burnet, Gilbert, b. in Edinburgh, Sept. 18, 1643; d. at Salisbury, March 17, 1715; was educated at Aberdeen; travelled in France and Holland; was ordained minister of Saltoun in 1663; became professor of divinity at Glasgow in 1665; removed in 1673 to London, and was made preacher at the Rolls Chapel, and lecturer at St. Clement's, and became one of the most popular preachers in town, but was dismissed in 1684 for his intimacy with Lord Russell, whom he attended on the scaffold. After the accession of James II. in 1685, Burnet visited France and Italy, and settled in the Hague, where he took a very active part in the execution of the plans of the Prince of Orange. In 1688 he returned to England with William H., and was shortly after (1689) made Bishop of Salisbury. His two principal and invaluable works are: History of the Reformation of the Church of England, of which the first volume appeared in 1681, the second in 1683, the third in 1715, and of which there is a recent, and the best, edition in 7 vols., by Pocock, 1865; and History of his own Time, published in a somewhat mutilated form by his son after his death (first volume, 1724; second, 1734), but re-edited and rendered complete by Dr. Routh, Oxford, 1833, 6 vols. Beside these two works, Burnet wrote a great number of historical, polemical, and devotional books, among which are: The Life of William Bedell, 1885; Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles, 1699, which incurred the censure of the Lower House of Convocation; Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, London, 1731; History of the year 1815, begun his labors at Rangoon. The early trials and sufferings of this man of God were the condition of ultimate success. The Baptists have the field in British Burmah to-day, and their mission has been most remarkably successful. In 1879 the condition of the mission in the districts of Rangoon, Maulmain, and Toungoo is thus reported: 83 missionaries, 160 ordained native ministers, 300 helpers, about 270 schools, 12 institutions for higher education, 440 congregations (of which 80 are ministered to by ordained native preachers), 20,811 communicants, and about 70,000 native Christians, 1,309 baptisms during 1879. See CHESTER-LYNN: Protestant Foreign Missions, Boston, 1880, p. 161. The Bible in Burmese was published by Judson in 1840. See art. KARENS.

BURRITT, Elihu, "the learned blackam rh," a Christian philanthropist and remarkable linguist, BURROUGHS, George, was an eminent Puritan, b. 1599; d. Nov. 14, 1616. He was educated at Cambridge, but was obliged to leave the university on account of nonconformity; he was assistant at Bury St. Edmunds, then rector of Titshall, but, under the pressure of Laud's persecution, he left the kingdom (1638), and settled as teacher of the Church in Rotterdam. He “afterwards became a famous preacher to two of the largest congregations about London, viz., Stepney and Cripplegate.” He was a distinguished Independent. His great work, exhibiting his learning and piety, was An Exposition of Hosea: In Divers Lectures, London, 1643-51, 4 vols., folio, reprint, London, 1863, 8vo.

BURROUGHS, George, was imprisoned in Boston, May 8, 1692; brought to trial for witchcraft, Aug. 3, and executed Aug. 19. The date and place of his birth are unknown; but he was ordained pastor of Salem in 1680, resigned the position in 1685, and lived at Falmouth (now Portland), Me., until the destruction of that place by the Indians in 1690.

BURTON, Asa, b. at Preston (now Griswold), Conn., Aug. 25, 1722; d. at Thetford, Vt., May 1, 1830, having been ordained pastor there in 1779; published Essays on some of the First Principles of Metaphysics, Ethics, and Theology, 1824.

BURTON, Edward, b. at Shrewsbury, Eng., Feb. 13, 1794; d. at Oxford, Jan. 19, 1836; became professor of divinity in the University of Oxford in 1829. He was a thorough classical scholar, an omnivorous reader, a merry companion. His famous Anatomy of Melancholy appeared in 1621, and has been plagiarized by many a wit besides Laurence Sterne. The book has been thus felicitously and humorously described by Taine in his History of English Literature, Bk. ii., c. 1: “He (Burton) read on for thirty years, put an encyclopedia into his head, and now, to amuse and relieve himself, takes a folio of blank paper, twenty lines of a poet, a dozen lines of a treatise on agriculture, a folio column of heraldry, the patience, the record of the fever-fitsof hypochondria, the history of the particle que, a scrap of metaphysics,—this is what passes through his brain in a quarter of an hour. It is a carnival of ideas and phrases—Greek, Latin, German, French, Italian, philosophical, geometrical, medical, poetical, astrological, pedagogic—heaped one on the other, an enormous medley, a prodigious mass of jumbled quotations, jesting thoughts, with the vivacity and the transport of a feast of words ending. Words, phrases, overflow, are heaped up, repeated, and flow on, carrying the reader along, deafened, wearied, half drowned, unable to touch ground in the deluge. Burton is inexhaustible. There are no ideas which he does not iterate under fifty forms. When he has expended his own, he pours out upon us other men’s,—the classics, the rarest authors, known only by savants, authors rarer still, known only to the learned. He borrows from all. Underneath these deep caverns of erudition and science there is one blacker and more unknown than all the others, filled with forget-BUSH, George, Bible commentator, b. at Norwich, Vt., June 17, 1799; d. at Rochester, N.Y., Sept. 19, 1838. He was educated at Dartmouth College and Princeton Theological Seminary, and ordained (1824) pastor of a Presbyterian church in Indianapolis. He resigned in 1829, and in 1831 became professor of Hebrew at the University of the City of New York. He began in 1840 the publication of his Notes, which covered the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges, and have been widely circulated. A new edition appeared Boston, 1870, 6 vols. Mr. Spurgeon (Commenting and Commentaries, Eng. ed., p. 49) accuses him of gross plagiarism in his Notes on Genesis, but grants at least the mere reproduction of material to him. Mr. Bush showed a marked leaning towards mystical speculations, embraced Swedenborgianism (1845), and ardently defended its tenets. Besides the Notes, he published a Hebrew Grammar, 1835, 2d ed., 1838; Anastasis, or the Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Body, 1845, and edited the Anglo-American New Church Repository. See FERNALD: Memoirs and Reminiscences of the Late Professor George Bush, Boston, 1860.

BUSHNELL, Horace, one of the great spiritual forces of the century, b. at Litchfield, Conn., April 14, 1802; d. in Hartford, Conn., Feb. 17, 1876. He was graduated at Yale College in 1827, and after a brief experience of school-teaching, and ten months of most valuable editorial work upon the Journal of Commerce in New York, he entered the New-Haven Law School. When he had finished a half-year there, he accepted a tutorship at Yale College; and so he taught and studied for two years. He was ready to be admitted to the bar; but in the winter of 1831 he was converted, and exchanged law for theology. He resigned his tutorship, and in the autumn entered the Divinity School of Yale College. In February, 1833, he went as temporary supply to the North (now Park) Congregational Church of Hartford, Conn., as a substitute pastor. In September, 1839, he delivered an address on "Revelation" before the Society of Inquiry at Andover, Mass.; and in it he broached a heresy upon the Trinity, and thus began his troubled life as a religious teacher. In the spring of 1840 he declined the presidency of Middlebury College. In 1845 he visited Europe, and was gone one year. Previously, as well as subsequently, he was interested in the Christian Alliance, an anti-Romanist organization, and published pamphlets and sermons, and made addresses, in its behalf. His book on Christian Nurture (1846) "emphasized the organic life of the family." Meanwhile he had been full of anxious longing for a higher Christian life; and in February, 1848, all at once — "not as something reasoned out, but as an inspiration, a revelation from the mind of God to himself" — there came to him the knowledge of the true way, and this conception he embodied in his work God in Christ. He addressed the Harvard Divinity School (Unitarian) in July, 1848, on the Atonement; delivered the Concio ad Cleram at Yale College in August on the Divinity of Christ, and spoke at Andover in September on Dogma and Spirit. These addresses, with an introductory Dissertation on Language as related to Thought, made up the volume God in Christ, published in February, 1849, which was the occasion of his trial for heresy. The charges against him were "his contemptuous denial of any Trinity beyond the blankest Sabellianism, and his charging those who held to a proper tri-personality in the Godhead with being heretics; that he reduced it to a mere instrumental revelation of God, in terms sometimes suggestive of its manifesting Him by a sort of pantheistic evolution, in which the so-called persons are merely the drama-ticis personae for dramatizing God to us." It must be confessed, that by his independent, bold, and original language, he laid himself open to just such charges, however erroneous they may seem to-day, when his books are read in sober quiet, and by a later generation. Such expressions in his God in Christ as — "Conceive Him (God) now as creating the worlds, or creating worlds, if you please, from eternity. In so doing, He only represents, expresses, or outwardly produces Him-offered the presidency. Into the revival of restoration of the University of California, and was told upon him; and he was obliged to insist upon his private position of pastor; and accordingly it was unanimously voted on the crisis of the fall of 1857, Dr. Bushnell entered into the acceptance of his resignation in April, and spoke his parting words July, 1859. character.—Butler was of a serious and deep-minded disposition; and this inherent bent was confirmed when he saw how deeply the infidel spirit held the brightest minds of his day, and how little was done to improve the morals of the community; yet for himself he lived close with God, unsettled by doubts. He was a very liberal man, simple, even abstemious, in his personal habits, but lavish almost to a fault upon others. He discharged the duties of his various positions conscientiously; though one so shy, sensitive, modest, and retiring, must have been naturally unfitted for the highest success as a pastor. He never married. But it was as a writer, more than as a man, that Butler found his highest self; and to this day he is esteemed as not only one of the most distinguished of English authors on theology and ethics, but also as, on the whole, the man of greatest intellectual power in the Church of England during the eighteenth century. It may be, indeed, a question whether the Analogy will always possess the reputation it has enjoyed for well-nigh a hundred and fifty years; but the fact that it has lost popularity, not because of any discovered weakness in its contents, but simply because of the shift in the grounds of unbelief, is sufficient proof of the commanding genius of its author. See Bishop Butler and the Zad-Gesiz, in Last Essays on Church and Religion, by Matthew Arnold, London, 1877.

writing.—When twenty-one years old, while at the academy in Tewksbury, he addressed a series of anonymous sermons to the Royal Society. He sent them to Dr. Clarke, upon some of the positions assumed in the latter's celebrated Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God (Boyle Lectures, 1704; pub. 1705). To these Dr. Clarke replied, and published the correspondence in subsequent editions of his book. This shows the estimate early put upon Butler by those competent to appreciate him. 1. The first publication of his own was the Fifteen Sermons preached at the Rolls Chapel, London, 1726. The book made no sensation. It took three years to sell the first edition, but it has had a steady sale ever since. In 1740 the fourth edition appeared, enlarged by the addition of Six Sermons on Public Occasions. It has long been a text-book upon moral philosophy, as at the University of Oxford; and the first three sermons of the volume, On Human Nature, have been accepted as a precious legacy of the eighteenth century to all time. They were epoch-making, for they mark a decided advance in ethics; in these two points: (1) the distinction between self-love and the particular desires, upon which, however, it is dependent; and (2) the proved co-existence of self-love and disinterested benevolence, and the discussion of their relations. Butler also emphasizes conscience, the "principle of reflection," which takes a view of motives, approves or disapproves them, impels or re-strains from action. 2. The Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature, London, 1736 (4to, Messrs. Knapton). Butler had been often engaged in controversy with the wits of Queen Caroline's philosophical tea-parties; but such unsatisfactory fragmentary discussion was the occasion of his bringing out at that time the results of twenty years' continuous thinking as a final and complete answer to the "loose kind of deism" then prevalent. The style of the book is very concise; it could hardly be otherwise, for what a man has been formulating through many years he will express concisely: but it is not obscure. The book demands and repays attentive study. Very briefly put, the argument is this: He begins with the premises of nature, and the necessary limitation of our knowledge. He thus takes the ground of the deists whom he would convince. He then argues, that, inasmuch as the difficulties in Scripture are not different from those which we find in the operations of nature, we should not only reject all arguments against the Scriptures which are founded upon these difficulties, but also infer that probably both proceed from the same author. The book has thus a narrow scope: it is in no sense a philosophy of religion; it seeks rather to remove objections to it. It is very remarkable that the book contains no quotations, and very few references: at the same time he meets fairly a host of objections which were commonly brought against Christianity; and this fact, and not its originality, has given it lasting fame. Butler was an omnivorous reader, and no one could accuse him of ignorance. The Analogy did a noble work for his generation. It rendered Christianity less despicable to its foes, and more reasonable to its friends; nor has it ceased to be serviceable. It has long been a text-book in our colleges, and may retain its place still longer. But even if it ceases to be thus used, it will always be a quarry from which apologists can derive arguments, a discipline by which mental strength can be increased. To the Analogy are usually appended two dissertations, Of Personal Identity, and Of the Nature of Virtue. 3. The only charge of Bishop Butler which has come down to us has a final finish; and therefore it is all the more remarkable that his hurried compositions should have such power.

BUTTLAR, Eva von, b. at Eschwege, Hesse, 1670; d. in Altona after 1717; received a loose and godless education; married in 1697 a French dancing-master at Eisenach, and fled gradually from the frivolities of a court life into the most hideous aberrations of religious excitement. She left her husband, and with her seducer, the theologian Winter, and her victim, the young physician Appenfeller, constituted, as she blaspheemously declared (1698), the Holy Trinity. She formed in 1702 a "Christian and Philosophical Society" at Allendorf in Hesse, and became the head of one of those abominable conventicles into which the Collegia Pietatis of the Pietists sometimes degenerated. Expelled from Allendorf, the society sought refuge at Uisingen, in the Wittgenstein domain; but here they were brought into court, and escaped sentence only by flight. Having embraced Romanism at Cologne, they settled at Pyrmont in the county of Lippe, and here their seances proceeded. They were convicted of the most unnatural excesses of blasphemy and licentiousness. Winter was condemned to death; Appenfeller and Eva, to flogging and perpetual exile: but once more they escaped. They assembled again at Wetzlar, and finally in Albeck, where they were arrested in 1717. The complete edition of Butler is beneath criticism.

Edward Steere, LL.D., of University College, London, issued Some Remains (hitherto unpublished) of Joseph Butler, LL.D., some time Lord Bishop of Durham, London, 1853, which have been reprinted by Professor Passmore in his edition of Bishop Butler's Ethical Discourses, Philadelphia, 1855. The Sermons and the Analogies have often been edited. They are readily accessible to all. There are so many editions, that selection is difficult. We have used Professor Passmore's edition of the former, which is recommended by its long and full biographical preface, the large size of the type in the body of the volume, and the appendix mentioned above; and the Rev. Dr. Howard Malcolm's edition of the Analogies, which has good notes and the usual apparatus of introduction, in a style and at a price where as an index, etc. See also W. BUTZER, or BUCER (Bucerus), Martin, b. 1491 at Schlettstadt, Alsace; d. at Cambridge, Feb. 28, 1551; was educated in the Latin school of Udenheim, and conceived a great passion for learning and study; but, having no other means than the Church or the monastery afforded to pursue this object, he entered in 1506 the Dominican order. By the favor of his prior he was sent to the University of Heidelberg; and here he heard Luther's disputation, April 26, 1518, which made a powerful impression on him. He felt the decisive difference between Erasmus and Luther, and hesitated not a moment in making his choice. But the tendency of his studies and sympathies was soon discovered, and persecution began. In 1531 he sought refuge with Franz von Sickingen; and in the same year he obtained a papal dispensation from his monastical vow, and was transferred to the secular clergy. In 1532 Franz von Sickingen made him pastor of Landstuhl; and he married a nun, thus breaking absolutely and forever with the Roman Church. The desperate circumstances, however, of Franz von Sickingen, did not allow Butzer to remain in Landstuhl. In 1533 he went to Strassburg; and in 1534 he was appointed minister of the Church of St. Aurelian, in which position he labored for twenty-five years, prominent not only among the Reformers of Alsace, but among the leaders of the movement in Switzerland and Germany. On the question of the Lord's Supper he stood nearer to Zwingli and the Swiss reformers than to Luther; but the great object of his life was to effect a reconciliation, or at least to prevent an open breach. But in this he succeeded only partially. The Conference of Marburg, Oct. 1, 1529, failed so far as a final formula concordiae was not arrived at; but it had some influence on Luther's conceptions, or at least on his temper. Butzer saw it, and went on with his work, which finally resulted in the “Wittenberger Konkordie,” drawn up by Melanchthon at the conference in Wittenberg, 1536. The firmness with which Butzer opposed the introduction of the Interim in Strassburg caused his dismissal in 1549. He went to England on the invitation of Cranmer, and was made professor of theology in the University of Cambridge. He aided Cranmer in the preparation of the Articles of Religion, and the Book of Common Prayer. Of his works, a collected edition was begun at Basel in 1577; but only the first volume appeared, containing, besides a life of him, most of what he wrote in English, whence its name, Tomus Anglicanus. See J. W. BAUM: Capitula us Butzeri, Elisbi, 1860.

BUXTORF is the name of a family which through four generations held the professorship of Hebrew in the University of Basel, and contributed much to make this study a useful and important branch of Protestant theology.—I. Johannes Buxtorf, b. at Camen in Westphalia, Dec. 25, 1564; d. at Basel, Sept. 13, 1629; studied at Marburg, Herborn, Basel, Zurich, and Geneva, under Piscator, Gryneus, Bullinger, and Beza, and was in 1591 appointed professor of Hebrew in Basel. Of all Protestant theologians, he was possessed of the most comprehensive and accurate knowledge of rabbinical literature; and he applied his knowledge of Jewish traditions and Jewish views with great acuteness to the interpretation of the books of the Old Testament. Not only did he make it more easy to learn Hebrew, but, by his staunch defence of the Massoretic text, has rendered Protestant theology a great service, as the Romanists claimed superiority in accuracy and reliability for the Greek translation and the Vulgate. His principal works are: Manuale Hebraicum et Chaldaicum (1603); Synagoga Judaica, first published in German (1603), then in Latin (1604); Lexicon Hebraico et Chaldaico (1607); De Abracciatoriis Hebraicis (1613); Biblia Hebraica cum Paraphr. Chal. et Commentariis Rabbinorum, 4 vols. (1618-19); Tiberius siei Commentarii Masoritici (1829). A complete list of his works is given in Athenae Rauricae, Basel, 1778, p. 447. E. KAUTSCB: Johannes Buxtorf der Ältere, Basel, 1879 (45 pp.). There have been lately published new editions of two of Buxtorf's works, which were originally finished by his son, and published at Basel, 1632 and 1639 respectively: Concordiæ Bibliarum Hebraicæ et Chaldaicæ, ed. Bern. Bayer, Berlin, 1863, 4to; Lexicon Chaldaicum Tal- mudicum et Rabbinicum, ed. Ph. B. Ficher, Leipzig, 1866-74, 2 vols. 4to. — II. Johannes Buxtorf, son of the preceding, b. at Basel, Aug. 13, 1589; d. there April 1, 1704; was appointed assistant to his father in June, 1664; visited in the following years Holland and England, and assumed the full responsibility of his professorship in 1669. He has given improved editions of the Tiberius and the Synagoga Judaica of his grandfather, but wrote nothing himself. — IV. Johann Buxtorf, nephew of the preceding, b. at Basel, Jan. 8, 1603; d. there 1729; was first preacher at the Mark near Basel, and succeeded his uncle in 1704. His principal work is Catalgctà Philologico-Theologica cum Man- tissa Epistol. Vitor. Clarior. Ad J. Buxtorfum Scriptorum, 1707. A complete list of his works is given in Athenæ Rauricæ, p. 434. [G. BYBLOS, an alteration, from the Greek epoch, of ancient name Gbal (which survives in the modern Jubeil), Guba-ly upon the cuneiform inscriptions. It was celebrated for its temple of Baalat, and the birth and worship of Adonis. Thus it had a sacred character, and pilgrimages were made to it. Movers maintains that the Giblites were not pure Phoenicians, but rather a mixed population, in which the Hebrew element predominated. And it is true that the inscriptions discovered have a more Hebraic style than the ordinary Phoenician. The Bible speaks of the Giblites as famous stone-cutters (1 Kings v. 18) and calkers (Ezek. xxvii. 9). Very recently a stele from the temple of Byblus has been discovered, translated, and published by M. de Vogüé: Stèle de Yehawmelek, Paris, 1875.

BYFIELD, Nicholas, b. in Warwickshire in 1579; d. 1622. He was educated at Exeter College, Oxford; was for seven years pastor of St. Peter's Church at Chester, when (1615) he became vicar of Isleworth in Middlesex, where he remained until his death. William Gouge describes him as “a man of a profound judgment, strong memory, sharp wit, quick invention, and unwearied industry.” His works were numerous, and greatly esteemed. His Mawor of the Oracles of God, London, 1629, containing six treatises previously published apart, reached an eleventh edition in 1640. The Principles or the Pattern of Wholesome Words, dedicated in 1618, reached a sixth edition in 1637, and is a valuable compend of divinity. His expository sermons on the Epistle to the Colossians were published, London, 1615, and several series on the First Epistle of Peter at various times, finally collected and enlarged in a Commentary upon the Whole First Epistle of St. Peter, London, 1637. The Rule of Faith, or an Exposition of the Apostles' Creed, was issued by his son Adoniram, after his death, London, 1620, and is an able and instructive work. He must be numbered among the Presbyterian fathers in England.

BYFIELD.

BYFIELD, date of birth unknown; d. in 1680. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and chosen chaplain to a regiment of Parliament's army in 1642. In 1643 he was appointed one of the scribes of the Westminster Assembly. The manuscript minutes of that body, now in the Williams Library, Grafton Street, London, are probably in his handwriting. He also edited, by authority of Parliament, the various papers in the controversy between the Westminster Assembly and the Dissenting Brethren, published London, 1648, including Reasons presented by the Dissenting Brethren against Certain Propositions concerning Presbyterian Government, The Answer of Assembly of Divines, Papers for Accumulation, and The Papers and Answers of the Dissenting Brethren and the Com. of the Assembly ofDivines.

BYNÆUS, Anthony, b. at Utrecht, Aug. 6, 1634; d. at Deventer, Nov. 8, 1698; was one of the most eminent Oriental scholars of his time, and wrote De Calceis Hebraeorum, Dort, 1682; Explicatio Hist. Evang. de Nativitate Christi, Dort, 1688; De Morti Jesu Christi, 1689.

C. A. Briggs.
CABALA, the title of the system of Jewish theosophy, denotes primarily "reception," then "a doctrine received by oral tradition." The term is thus in itself nearly equivalent to "transmission," or "tradition." Thus we read in Pirke Aboth I. 1, "Moses received the law on Mount Sinai, and transmitted it to Joshua." By this indefinite title we are reminded, that among the Jews, as throughout the greater part of the East, human knowledge, whether historical or scientific, rested principally on a sort of succession; and the best claim for its reception was an unbroken chain of traditionary evidence. Hence the care with which Judaism established the succession of the custodians of truth, from Moses, through Joshua and the so-called elders, to the prophets, thence, through Ezra and the so-called Great Synagogue, to the teachers of later times, subdividing at length into the various schools or periods of particular sages and their followers. While, therefore, the truth was gradually exhibited in the writings of the Law, the Prophets, and the Talmud, the Cabala indicates the verbal exposition of these, orally transmitted along with the Scriptures, and not generally known to the people, but containing a deeper or more thoroughly initiated mode of instruction. In this manner the word "cabala" ultimately became the expression of a particular theologic-philosophical system, that arose and established itself in the bosom of Judaism, yet in a measure independent of, or rather supplementary to it, which finally received a more general signification through some Christian thinkers. As all instruction in Judaism was principally verbal, and founded on memory, this philosophical instruction became ultimately a mystery, at least in the view of posterity: hence the history of the Cabala or of Jewish metaphysics is still a matter of scientific controversy; and both are entitled to a hearing,—those who ascribe to it a high antiquity, or those who regard it as a product of the middle ages. It is true that the Talmud (treatise Chagiga passim) speaks of a doctrine which was communicated to only a few and selected persons; but what this doctrine was we are at loss to know. The only works which can with any propriety claim to embody the earliest views of this theosophy are the following two (a third cabalistic treatise entitled the Sepher Bahir, edited at Amsterdam, 1651, and ascribed to a certain Rabbi Nechonja ben Hakana of the first century, has long ago been generally regarded as fictitious, although a cabalistic work of the same title is already mentioned in the fourteenth century):—

The first of these works is the Sepher Yetzira, or the "Book of Creation," often printed and edited: thus by Steph. Rittangel, Amst., 1642, with a Latin translation and commentary; by J. F. Meyer, with a German translation and commentary, Leipzig, 1830 [by J. Kalisch, with a poor English translation, New York, 1877]. Tradition ascribes it to Rabbi Akiba (d. 120). It is a short treatise, in oracular sentences, the language of which, more obscure in import than in form, resembles the Hebrew of the Mishna. As the Gemara already mentions a book under a like title, which was commented upon by R. Saadja of Fajum in the tenth century, its antiquity was traced back to that period. The other work is the famous "Book of Splendor," or Sepher Ha-zohar (so called from Dan. xii. 3), first printed at Cremona and Mantua, 1559, and often since [latest at Brody, 3 vols., 1873]. Tradition ascribes it to a contemporary of Rabbi Akiba, namely, Rabbi Simeon ben Yochoi. Incredulous criticism has declared it to be a production of the thirteenth century, the time of its first appearance in the history of literature, and ascribed it to a Spanish Jew, Moses of Leon. A more considerate disquisition recommends a middle way, tracing back its doctrines in the main features to Rabbi Simeon of the second century, and its completion in the East in the eighth century; whilst it became known in the West at a later period.

In general the Zohar seems to be a commentary on the Pentateuch. Interspersed throughout, either as parts of the text with special titles, or in separate columns with distinct superscriptions, are the following pieces, known under special names: Sepher Detzniuta, or "The Book of Secrets;" "Idra Ruba, or "The Great Assembly;" and Idra Sula, or "The Small Assembly."

In examining these original documents of the Cabala we must be careful not to interchange the contents of both; for, although they have the same idea underlying their system, yet they must be distinguished as for their matter and method. The book Yetzira opens with the enumeration of the thirty-two ways of wisdom, or the thirty-two attributes of divine mind, as they are demonstrated in the founding of the universe. The book shows why there are just thirty-two of these. By an analysis of this number it seeks to exhibit, in a peculiar method of theosophical arithmetic, on the assumption that figures are the signs of existence and thought, the doctrine that God is the author of all things, the universe being a development of original entity, and existence being but thought become concrete; in short, that instead of the heathenish or popular Jewish conception of the world as outward, or co-existent with Deity, it is co-equal in birth, having been brought out of nothing by God, thus establishing a Pantheistic system of emanation, of which, principally because it is not anywhere designated by name, one would think the writer was not himself quite conscious. The following sketch will illustrate the curious proof of this argumentation:

The number 32 is the sum of 10 (the number of digits) and 22 (the number of the letters of the of the zodiac and the twelve months of the lunar year; in human beings, the twelve parts of the body and twelve faculties of the mind (these seven also designate the material world; namely, the six ends (sides of the cube) and the palace of holiness in the middle (the immanent deity) which supports it; also the seven planets, the seven heavenly spheres, the seven days of the week, the seven weeks (from Passover to Pentecost), the seven portals of the soul (i.e., the eyes, ears, nose, mouth, etc.) This theory further has express reference to the fact, that from the combination of the letters results, with mathematical certainty, a quantity of words so great that the mind cannot enumerate them; thus, from two letters, two words; from three, six; from four, twenty-four, etc., or, in other words, that the letters, whether spoken as results of breath, or written as elements of words, are the ideal foundation of all things. Finally, these twelve single letters show the relations of things so far as they can be apprehended in a universal category. Their geometrical representative is the regular twelve-sided polygon, such as that of which the horizon consists. Their representation in the world gives the twelve signs

The medium of union of the second trinity, i.e., Beauty, or the sixth Sephira, beamed forth the masculine or active potency Firmness, corresponding to the divine name Jehovah Shabathai, and this again gave rise to the feminine or passive potency Splendor, answering the divine name Elohe Shabathai; from it, again, emanated Foundation, or the El Chai, thus yielding the third trinity of Sephiroth. From the ninth Sephira emanated the tenth, called Kingdom, represented by the divine name Adonai, and also called Shechinah. These ten Sephiroth, also called the World of Emanations, gave birth to three worlds in the following order: 1. The World of Creation, or the Briatic World and the Throne, which is the abode of pure spirits, and where the angel Metatron reigns; 2. The World of Formation, or the Yetziratic World, the habitation of the angels. 3. The third world is called the World of Action and the World of Matter, which emanated from the preceding world, the ten Sephiroth of which are made up of the grosser elements of all the former three worlds. They represent in the first three degrees the Toku, Vakhu, and Darkness, whereupon follow seven infernal hells, the prince of which is Samael ("angel of poison or of death"). He has a wife called the Harlot; but they are both generally represented as united in the one name of the Benet. As to the nature and destiny of man, according to these metaphysical ideas, according to his soul and body, he represents the universe, the body being merely a garment of the soul. Like God, man has a unity and a trinity, the latter represented by the spirit, soul, and cruder spirit. The first represents the interior world; the second, the sensible world; the third, the material world. As to the souls, they are pre-existent, and are, without an exception, destined to inhabit human bodies, and pursue their course upon earth for a certain period of probation. Hence all souls are subject to transmigration, till at last they return to God to be united in the Palace of Love with him by a loving kiss.

The most famous Cabalists are Moses ben Nachman, author of Faith and Hope; Jose de Carriil, who wrote in his cabala denuotitas, Sulzbach, 1577, sq. 3 vols. In the hands of the younger disciples of the Cabalists, the secret knowledge was not only studied in its philosophical bearing, but also, and even rather, under two new aspects not previously mentioned; namely, the practical application and the hermeneutical method. Passing over the first, which amounts to saying that a true Cabalist must also be a sorcerer, we come now to the second, because of more interest to the theologian. The principle of the mystic interpretation is very old, and not peculiar to the Cabalistic schools, as may be seen from church-history, and even from the history of Greek literature. We find it in Philo, in the New Testament, in the writings of the Fathers, in the Talmud, and in the Sohar; and the more we depart from the spirit of the sacred text, the more had it to be brought to its support by distortions of its meaning. For such operation, there are no known rules except the exigencies of the case and the capacity of the mystic interpreter. In the mean time, the Jews had already, by the arbitrary character of their alphabet, arrived at all manner of subtleties, of which we have already spoken in the earlier writings, but which were especially established as a virtuosoship in post-Soharic times. Thus we have, 1. The Gematria, i.e., the art of discovering the hidden sense of the text by means of the numerical equivalents of the letters; 2. The Notarikon, i.e., the art of forming a new word from each letter of the word; 3. The Temura, the anagram, of two kinds. The simple is a mere transposition of the letters of a word: the more ingenious kind is that by which, according to certain established rules, each letter of the alphabet acquires the signification of another; as Aleph that of Tav, Beth that of Shin, etc.; or, again, letters may be read forward and backward, or the first letter of the alphabet is connected with the twelfth, the second with the thirteenth, etc.

Among Christians the Cabala was cultivated as early as in the thirteenth century. Raymond Lully is the first who proves himself at home in this branch of science. Besides, we must mention John Picos di Miranda, and John Reuchlin, not to speak of such converted Jews as Paul Ricci, physician to Emperor Maximilian, and Judah ben Isaac Abravanel (Leo Hebraeus), son of the famous commentator, and author of Dialoghi de amore, and others, who initiated many Christian scholars into this theosophy.

CABASILAS is the name of two prominent bishops of Thessalonica during the fourteenth century. Thessalonica was at that time, next to Constantinople, the most important see of the Byzantine Church, and the principal object of the contest between the Eastern and Western Church. Both the Cabasils were decidedly anti-Roman; and for this reason the writings of the elder, Nilus, who occupied the see about 1340, were entirely unknown in Western Europe until the Reformers called attention to them. His De Principio Paepe was edited by M. Piccius Illyricus, Frankfort, 1555. The younger, Nicolaus Cabasils, occupied the see about 1354, succeeding Pasamas. He was originally a monk; and in the Hesychast controversy he took the side of the monks of Athos against Barlaam and Nicephorus Gregoras. He wrote rhetorical, liturgical, and dogmatical works, also polemics against Rome, most of which, however, have remained unprinted. But his principal work is Life in Christ (Πεπόθ τος εν Χριστω ζωής). It was much read and often copied.
in earlier times. A Latin translation by Jacob Pontanus was published at Ingolstadt in 1604. A critical edition of the Greek text has recently been given by Gass. The book is interesting as a striking instance of that mysticism which grew up in the Eastern Church parallel with but independent of the mysticism of the Western Church.

CAERULARIUS, Michael, Patriarch of Constantinople 1043–59, made complete the breach in 1044 with the Latin Church of unleavened bread in the Lord's Supper, the omission of the Hallelujah during the fast, the introduction of the word Filioque in the creed, etc.; but the tone was more violent than ever. The Emperor Constantine Monomachus was very much displeased with the letter; and when Pope Leo IX. sent his ambassadors to Constantinople to attempt to settle the questions, the emperor received them very graciously. But Michael defended his views very cunningly (Canisius, p. 283); the emperors began to waver; and the papal ambassadors departed abruptly from the city, leaving on the altar of the Church of St. Sophia a formal bull of excommunication (Canisius, p. 308). Michael maintained himself, both under Constantine and under Theodora; and though the Emperor Isaac Comnenus, in 1058, banished him from his seat, his presence between the Greek and Latin churches was, nevertheless, unremediably effected. Besides some letters given by Canisius, there also exist some decreals of Michael: De Episcoporum

CAECILIA, St., suffered martyrdom, according to an old legend, in 230, under Alexander Severus. According to a legend which dates from the fourteenth century, she sang hymns, and accompanied herself on the organ, immediately before her death; and this circumstance has made her the patroness of church-music. Her festival falls on Nov. 22. See Butler: Lives of Saints, Nov. 22.

CAECILIUS. See Donatists.

CAEDMON, the first Christian poet of England, was a monk of the Abbey of Streoneshalch in Northumbria, who lived in the seventh century. It is related of him by Bede (Eccles. Hist. iv. 24), that, before taking upon himself the monastic vows, he was on one occasion at a feast where all were in turn called upon to sing. Feeling his inability to comply, he left the hall, and betook himself to rest in the stable, where he was that night to watch the animals. In his sleep he became aware of a person who stood over him, and commanded him to sing of the creation, which he thereupon was enabled to do, repeating verses which he had never heard. On awaking, he remembered the poetry of his dream, and proceeded to add much more of the same purport.

Being brought before the Abbess Hilda, he related his vision, and, at the request of the learned men there present, translated certain passages of Scripture, which they repeated to him, into excellent verse. Thereupon he was received into the monastery, and instructed in the biblical histories, large portions of which he subsequently versified. Among these were the creation of the world, the origin of man, and the whole history of Genesis; the departure of the children of Israel out of Egypt, and their entrance into the land of promise; the incarnation, passion, resurrection, and ascension of Christ; the coming of the Holy Ghost; and the preaching of the apostles. His death took place about the year 680, and the manner of it was in complete accord with his devout and tranquil life.

CAIAPHAS.

Cæsarea and Cæsarea Philippi. Two cities of Palestine mentioned in the New Testament, and which are to be distinguished from one another. 1. Cæsarea, originally called Strato's Tower, later, Cæsarea Palestine, or Palestine, lay on the Mediterranean, between Joppa and Dor, and owed its celebrity and name, in honor of Augustus, to Herod the Great, who spent vast sums of money in its adornment, and provided it with an extensive and secure harbor. B.C. 10 (Josephus: Antiq., XVI. 5, 3; War, I. 21, 5–8). Vesuvian was declared emperor there, and made it a Roman colony, and released it from capital and ground taxes. There lived Cornelius and Philip the Evangelist (Acts x. 1, viii. 40, xxi. 8), there died Hierod Agrippa (Acts xii. 23, Paul visited, and spent two years there (Acts ix. 30, xviii. 22, xxi. 8, xxiii. 33, xxiv. 27). The contest between the heathen and Jewish inhabitants of the place in regard to their equal right to the privileges belonging to citizens was the delight of the thirteenth; was educated in Cologne, as a monk and spent about thirty years in the Cistercian monastery of Heisterbach near Bonn, as a monk and as prior; but the date and the place of his death, like those of his birth, are unknown. His theological writings, sermons, homilies, etc., were edited by Coppenstein, Cologne, 1615, under the title of Fasciculi Moralitatis, and have interest as specimens of the rhetorical art of the time. But much greater importance must be ascribed to his historical writings: Vita S. Engelberti, printed at Cologne, 1633; Catalogus Episcoporum Colonien- nium, published in the second volume of Fontes Rerum German., and Dialogus Magnus Vitae et Miraculorum, first printed at Cologne, 1591, and recently edited critically by Jos. Strange, 1851. The last-mentioned work is a dialogue between Cæsarius and Apollonius, de conversione, etc., best elucidating the subjects by anecdotes, historical narratives, observations from actual life, and thereby furnishing much precious material for the characterization of the period. See Alex. Kaufmann: Cæsarius von Heisterbach, Cologne, 1850.

CAIAPHAS (oppressor), the surname of the high priest who condemned Jesus Christ to death (Matt. xxvi. 57–68), in full, Joseph Caiaphas (Joseph. Ant. 18, 4, 3); the fourth high priest appointed by the Procurator Valerius Gratus, the predecessor of Pontius Pilate, within three or four years after the deposition of Ananus or Anna ben Seth. Caiaphas was high priest for eight years (A.D. 18–36), of which the last ten years were under Pilate. In religious bias he belonged to or favored the Sadducees (Acts v. 17). In character he was hard, coarse, brutal, yet adroit and crafty (Matt. xxvi. 3, 4; John xi. 49, 50, xvii. 14). He was son-in-law of Annas (John xvii. 13). In Luke vii. 3 Annas and Caliphas are spoken of as “high priests,” and in Acts iv. 6 Annas is called “high priest.” Very probably Annas was president of the Sanhedrin; and, as he had five sons high priests, he retained the office very largely in his own hands, and was to all intents and purposes the high priest himself. The expression Caliphas was high priest “that same year” (John xi. 49) means “the memorable year of our Lord’s sufferings,” and not that the office was annual. He was deposed by Vitellius, and nothing more is known of him (Joseph. Ant. 18, 4, 3).

CAIN AND THE CAINITES. The name of the first-born in the world is usually interpreted “a gotten one” (Gen. iv. 1); but it also resembles the Hebrew for “spear,” “smith,” “lamentation,” “dirge,” all of which words describe different turns in the Cainite history. It was also interesting to observe that the two elements, the good and the bad, which were found united in Adam, seem to have been divided between his sons; Cain receiving the bad, and Abel the good. Again: the curse which God imposed upon the ground was gotten one (Gen. iv. 12). That sacrifices and worship were found in that early time demonstrates their naturalness and reasonableness. The recognized privileges of primogeniture point to an ordered state. Cain’s dread of being killed, his ship were found in that early time demonstrates receiving the bad, and Abel the good. Again: the curse which God imposed upon the ground was gotten one (Gen. iv. 12); but it also resembles “dirge,” all of which words described different turns in the Cainite history. It was also interesting to observe that the two elements, the good and the bad, which were found united in Adam, seem to have been divided between his sons; Cain receiving the bad, and Abel the good. Again: the curse which God imposed upon the ground was gotten one (Gen. iv. 12). That sacrifices and worship were found in that early time demonstrates their naturalness and reasonableness. The recognized privileges of primogeniture point to an ordered state.
he never left the track of the tradition, he occupies a much freer position than his predecessors with respect to the Fathers; and the allegorical method he altogether abandoned. The progress he thus made met with great opposition within his own order from the Dominican Ambrosius Catharinus; and in the collected edition of his works, Lyons, 1639, many passages have undergone mitigating modifications. There is a separate collection of his writings against Luther, Lyons, 1530. See R. Simon: Histoire Critique du Nouveau Testament, 1689; Huds.: C. W. C. Kampf gegen die lutherische Lehre in Zeitschrift f. d. kust. Theol., 1858, p. 490. C. Weizsäcker.

CALAMON. See SYCAMINA.

CALAMY, Edmund, b. in London, February, 1600; d. there Oct. 29, 1686; educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge; became vicar of St. Mary's in Saffram Prior, Cambridge; thence removed to St. Edmund's Bury in Suffolk, where he remained ten years or more, until compelled to retire on account of the Book of Sports, thereby identifying himself with the Puritans. He accepted the call of William Neill, rector of Rocheford in Essex, where he remained, until in 1630 he was chosen pastor of Aldermanbury Church in London, where he labored until the Restoration. He composed with others 'An Answer to a Book entitled, An Humble Remonstrance in which the original of Liturgy and Episcopacy is discussed; and Queries proposed concerning both. The Parity of Bishops & Presbyters in Scripture demonstrated. The occasion of their Imparity in Antiquity discovered. The Disparity of the Ancient & our modern Bishops manifested. The Antiquity of Ruling Elders in the Church vindicated. The Prelatical Church banzont. Written by Smec- tymanus [e.g., S(tephen) M(arshall), E(dmund) C(alamy), T(homas) Y(yong), M(athew) N(eve- commen), and W(illiam) S(purston)].' This reply to Joseph Hall's Humble Remonstrance became the platform of the Presbyterian party, as that became the platform of the Episcopal party, each side claiming jure divino. Several other tracts were issued in the controversy pro and con. Calamy was chosen a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and took an active part in its proceedings, being moderate in doctrinal position, and inclined to a middle way between Independents and Episcopalians in some comprehensive polity. He also became one of the most energetic members of the Provincial Assembly of London; took part in the composition of the Vindication of the Presbyterian Government and Ministry, 1649; was the author of the Jus Divinum Ministerii Evangelici, 1654, both adopted by that body. He was active in restoring Charles II. to the kingdom in 1659; was one of the divines sent to Holland to treat with him. At the Restoration in 1660 he was made one of the King's chaplain's, and offered to a bishopric; but declined. With Baxter, Reynolds, and others, he gave his energies for a comprehension of Presbyterians and Episcopalians through a revision of the Liturgy, and a reduction of Episcopacy on Archbishop Ussher's model. He took part in drawing up the Exceptions against the Liturgy, and repudiated the Reasons of the Episcopal clergy. He was a great preacher, frequently delivering sermons before Parliament and the Lord Mayors on public occasions; and his lectures were frequented by the best people of London. A number of these have been published. His most popular work is, The Godly Man's Ark, 3d ed., 1661, 18th ed., 1709. He was a practical man of affairs, rather than a scholar and writer. He was ejected for nonconformity in 1662, and imprisoned for a short time. But the king interposed, on account of great public indignation, and he was released. For further information, see the Nonconformist's Memorial, 2d ed., 1802, I. p. 76; Reid's Memoirs of the Westminster Divines, 1811, I. 165. C. A. Briggs.

CALAMY, Benjamin, son of the preceding, d. 1686. Educated at Cambridge, he became a fellow of Catharine Hall. In 1677 he was minister of St. Mary's, Aldermanbury, London, and appointed one of the king's chaplains, and 1683 prebendary of St. Paul's. Unlike his father, he was a High Churchman, and very active in dissuading Dissenters. He published many sermons, which are still worth reading, 'as well for the beauty of the language as for the excellent sentiments.' His sermon on Luke xi. 41, Of a Scrupulo of Conscience, preached in 1683, and published, made a great sensation. It was directed against the Dissenters, and called forth a reply from Thomas de Laune. Other sermons were popular. Sermons preached upon Several Occasions, 5th ed. (includes Dean Sherlock's funeral sermon), London, 1715. In 1703, Edmund, grandson of Edmund, b. in London, April 5, 1671; d. there June 3, 1732. On his return from the Utrecht University (1691), he studied divinity, joined the Nonconformists, was unanimously chosen assistant to Matthew Sylvester at Blackfriars, London, 1692, and, after several changes, pastor of a church in Westminster, London, 1705. He was the author of fourteen sermons on The Inspiration of the Old and New Testaments, London, 1710, and other collections; but his principal service is as an historian of Nonconformity. In 1690 he conducted Baxter's History of His Life and Times through the press; furnished it with an index and table of contents. In 1702 he published an abridgment of Baxter, but added a history of those ministers ejected for nonconformity down to 1691. Bishop Hoadley having criticised his History, he replied in A Defense of Moderate Nonconformity, London, 1703–05, 3 vols. In 1713 he published the second edition of his Abridgment of Baxter's Life, in which he carried the nonconformist history through the reigns of William III. and Anne; and in 1721 he closed his labors in this department of special study, bringing down the story still farther. Calamy was well qualified by his moderation and catholicity to be the fair-minded historian of nonconformity. See An historical account of my own life. With some reflections on the times I have lived in (1671–1731). By Edmund Calamy, D.D. Now first printed. Edited by John Towill Rutt, London, 1828, 2 vols.

CALAS, Jean, a Protestant merchant of Toulouse, whose son, Marc-Antoine, hung himself in a fit of melancholy in the house of his father, Oct. 13, 1761. A rumor arose that the young Calas was going to embrace Romanism the very next day, that the father, from fanaticism, had killed the son, etc.; and the Roman-Catholic clergy did all in their power to rouse the passions of the populace. The old Calas was arrested, found guilty of the murder of his son, and exe-

The Knights of Calatrava, a military order founded in the middle of the twelfth century, for the purpose of defending the city of Calatrava against the Moors, and confirmed in 1164 by Alexander III. The knights fought with great success in the beginning, and the order flourished; but in 1197 they lost Calatrava, and retired to Salvatiera. In 1487 the grandmastership was annexed to the crown of Spain; and since 1608 the order has become simply an order of merit. The nuns of the order, instituted in 1219, have been suspended.

CADERWOOD, David, the historian of the Scottish Church, b. 1575; d. at Jedburgh, Oct. 29, 1650. He took the degree of Master of Arts at Edinburgh, 1593; in 1604 became minister of Crailing, near Jedburgh, and distinguished himself by his opposition to King James's scheme of prelatizing the Church of Scotland. When in 1617 James visited Scotland, Calderwood presented him a remonstrance signed by the Presbyterian clergy, but refused to deliver up the roll of signatures to it; for which conduct, joined to other acts of insubordination, he was imprisoned, and only released, notwithstanding the interference of influential persons, upon condition that he would banish himself; and on Aug. 27, 1618, he sailed for Holland. So quiet and obscure was his life there, that at one time he was supposed to be dead; and one Patrick Scott fabricated a recantation, which was published under the title Calderwood's Recantation, directed to Such in Scotland as refuse Conformity to the Ordinances of the Church, London, 1622. But about this time Calderwood probably was in Scotland, busily occupied upon his history. In 1624 he was appointed minister of Pencaitland, in the County of Haddington, Scotland. He gradually came again into prominence. It is noteworthy that it was he who introduced in 1649 the practice, now common, of requiring a dissent from the General Assembly to be recorded. In 1649 the General Assembly urged him to complete his History of the Kirk and State of Scotland, and voted him a yearly pension of £800 (Scots), or £66 13s. 4d. (sterling); but he died ere the publication began, if, indeed, it was contemplated. The History remained in manuscript, and in three forms,—the original in the British Museum, a copy in the Library of the University of Glasgow, another in the Library of the Church of Scotland,—until 1842, when the Wodrow Society began its publication, finished 1849, Edinburgh, 8 vols. Calderwood prepared an abridgment of his own work, entitled A True History of the Church of Scotland, from the beginning of the Reformation unto the end of the Reign of King James V.1., published 1678. The historical works are of great value as materials for history, collected with diligence and fidelity. In 1621 he published The Altar of Damascus, or the Pattern of the English Hierarchy and Church obliged upon the Church of Scotland, in 1623 translated into Latin, Altare Damascuscum, etc., and much enlarged, best ed, Batav., 1708.

CALES, the son of Jephunneh of the tribe of Judah (Num. xiii. 6), but called the Kenezite, or son of Kenez (Num. xxxii. 12; Josh. xiv. 14). The reconciliation of these accounts is either to suppose that that division of the tribe of Judah which Caleb headed had so intermingled itself with the Kenezites, a tribe of Southern Palestine, that he could be reckoned a Kenezite, or that Caleb was the head of the Kenezites, who had been absorbed by Judah. He was sent to spy out the land, and with Joshua rendered a true report, so particularly rich in details, that the people were ready to make one attack. For this fidelity he was richly rewarded; for he was permitted to enter the Promised Land as a conqueror, and given possession of Hebron and its neighborhood; and, when the city was set apart for the Levites, he yet retained the land and villages about. In 1487 the grandmastership was annexed to the crown of Spain; and since 1608 the order has become simply an order of merit. Also the nuns of the order, instituted in 1219, have been suspended.

CALENDAR, Hebrew. The Hebrew calendar dates from the creation. The year is semi-lunar, consists of twelve or thirteen lunar months, each of which has twenty-nine or thirty days. Thus the year has either three hundred and fifty-four or three hundred and eighty-four days. In either case it is sometimes made a day more or a day less in order that certain festivals may fall on proper days of the week for their due observance. The civil year begins in the autumn; the sacred, in the spring. The Jews had calendars wherein were recorded the festivals and saints' days; but none of those now extant are old. The oldest is Megilath Taannikh (the volume of affliction), which must have been near Bethlehem (Ephratah) (1 Sam. xxx. 14; 1 Chron. ii. 24). These references show the increased importance of the family. RÜETSCHI.

Ecclesiastical, Origin of. The ecclesiastical calendar existed in very early times. Originally it was arranged not for one year, but every year, and was in reality nothing else than a Christian adaptation of the civil calendar, in common use among Greeks and Romans. Numerous examples of the Roman Pagan calendar exist. Some had a merely local value, but others were adapted to a country. They contain astronomical data (the Greek calendar being particularly rich in this), the religious dates, feasts, and civil festivals,—either bound up with religion, as many of the public games, or in memory of some historic event, as a victory. Very remarkable is it to find Christian influence exhibited in the middle of the fourth and fifth centuries: indeed, they really mark the transfer from Paganism to Christianity so commonly made by the people. The first, from A.D. 321, published by Kollar (Anl. Vindob., vol. i. p. 961 sqq.), contains the usual astronomical and astrological data, but omits the cus-tory Pagan sacrificial and temple feasts, apparently in deference to Christian feeling, although it does not mention any Christian festival. Another trace of Christian influence is in the setting of the Christian week side by side with the Pagan: thus the year beginning Jan. 1 is divided, on the one hand, in Pagan style, by the letters A–H, and a catalogue of the Carthage Church from the end of the fifth century. Each contains bishop and martyrs were celebrated only where they suffered, two from the New Testament, three from the Church Universal, and two from the Goths. See Krafft, Kirchengeschichte der germanischen Völker, Bd. I., Alth. 1, pp. 371, 385–387. There were lists of saints' days arranged chronologically, but not in a calendar. The earliest known are a Roman one from the middle of the fourth century, and a catalogue of the Carthage Church from the end of the fifth century. Each contains bishop and martyrs' days, mostly of local interest.

The Medieval Calendar. — Since originally the martyrs were celebrated only where they suffered, each church had its own calendar; but in the middle ages the Roman calendar spread through the Western Church. Thus the separate churches materially increased their list of saints and martyrs. From the eighth century many such combined calendars were made, and they are found in great numbers. They are all designed to suit all times, are supplied with means to ascertain the movable feasts, especially Easter, of each year, and differ from those named above in that they contain not alone the letters A–G to mark the days of the week, but also the numerals I.–XIX. to mark the month within which, in each year of the lunar cycle, occur on that particular day of the month corresponding with that number. A monthly calendar thus arranged is called a perpetual (Julian) calendar, because one can find from it the day of the week of each date, and all the new moons through the year, as soon as the Dominical letter of the year is known. See F. Piper, Kirchenrechnung, Berlin, 1811, p. VI. Towards the close of the middle ages the calendar, which had hitherto been in Latin, makes its appearance in the vernacular of the different lands. An Anglo-Saxon one dates from the tenth century; one in French, from the thirteenth century; and quite a number of German calendars, from the fourteenth century. Manuscript calendars were frequently decorated, as with the signs of the Zodiac and pictures from church-history: e.g., famous for its ornamentation is the calendar in the prayer-book of Anna, wife of Louis XII., now in Paris. Particularly curious is a Russian calendar, dating from the second half of the seventeenth century, painted on wood in the form of a Greek cross, preserved in the Vatican Library, and now in the Marchioness Capponi, who presented it. The four arms of the cross contain a complete monthly calendar; the table in the middle, the movable feasts from the fourth Sunday before Lent to the Sunday after Pentecost; and each day has its picture, with the name of the saint or the Sunday written in Slavonic underneath. See Assemanni, Kalendaria ecclesiae Slavicae sine Graeco-Moschae, Rome, 1755. The earliest printed calendars naturally followed in arrangement the written. They were carved in wood, and engraved on copper; e.g., Calendar of Johannes de Gamundia, published 1498. These were all perpetual calendars. The first calendar for particular years was published at Nürnberg, in German and Latin. Johannes Regiomontanus, 1475, and arranged for 1475, 1492, 1513; i.e., for the first years of three successive nineteen-year cycles, yet so that the calendar could by calculation be made useful from 1475 to 1551 inclusive.

The Gregorian Reform of the Calendar took place under Gregory XIII. in 1582; was occasioned by the long-felt unsatisfactory method of calculating the time of Easter, and was the outcome of several attempts at a change. The Julian Calendar, which was introduced by Julius Caesar, had in course of time proved itself to be inaccurate; for it made the year 365 days long, and intercalated a day every four years, whereas the year is in reality more than 11 minutes shorter; so that in 128 years one whole day is apparently lost. Moreover the vernal equinox was reckoned according to the XIX. year cycle of 235 months, i.e., 19 × 365 = 6,935; but in reality the cycle is too short by more than a month (in 310 years a day's difference), and the full moon was put so much too late. So it came to pass, that, whereas in Julius Caesar's day the vernal equinox corresponded with the 25th of March, in Gregory's day it had retrograded to the 11th. In obedience to the Council of Trent, by a bull of Feb. 24, 1582 [translated in Mr. Lewis A. Scott's pamphlet, Act and Bull, privately printed, Phila., 1890] Gregory made the Calendar of Aloysius Cilius in his Compendium novæ rationis restitutiæ calendarii obligatory upon the Church. Accordingly to the new plan ten days in the calendar were dropped (this restored the vernal equinox to March 21, the day on which it fell at the time of the Council of Nice in 325), and a new rule of intercalation adopted, which was, every year whose number is divisible by 4 is a leap-year, excepting the centesimal years, which are only leap-years when divisible by four after suppressing the two zeros. The length of the mean year thus fixed is 365 days, 5 hours, 42 minutes, 16 seconds, — an error which amounts only to one day in 3,325 years. For an account of the Gregorian Calendar see Ideler, Handb. d. Chronologie, Bd. II, pp. 301–321. As was to be expected, the new calendar was received at once in all Roman-Catholic countries; but the Protestant states continued to use the Julian. Germany and Denmark, however, made the change in 1700, and England in 1752. The Russians use the Julian Calendar still.

One other reform remains to be effected: the calendar should be purged of its obscure saints and martyrs, and in their stead be put the truly great names of all branches of the Church Universal. As an attempt to rectify the existing state of things, see the Evangelische Kalender of Dr. F. Piper, carried on for twenty years (1850–70) in connection with brief popular yet original biographies, and finally published, after a revision, under the title, Die Zeugen der Wahrheit Lebensbilder zum evangelischen Kalender auf alle Tage des Jahres, Leipzig (Taunzschitz), 1874–75, 4 vols. These volumes contain the revised calendar, and biographies of all persons mentioned. Rev. Dr. J. Feller, Macracken published, but 1879 a translation of parts of it, with important additions, under the title, Lives of the Leaders of our Church Universal. [The original volumes contain three hundred and ninety-nine biographies, contributed by one hundred and twenty-nine writers; the translation, one hundred and twenty-five; but thirty-three of the writers are Americans, and the work has been taken up by several denominational publication boards.] FERDINAND PIPER.

CALÉNDAR BRETHREN (fratres Calendarii), a society which arose apparently in Saxony, but spread quickly over Northern and Central Germany, and to Hungary and France. The name comes from their original custom of meetings on the Kalends, or first day of every month. They are first spoken of in 1220, as in the Monastery of Ötberg. In idea the fraternity was good,— partly beneficent and partly devotional. Particular attention was given to the care of their sick, and the burial of their dead members or families, likewise bequests, it degenerated: the monthly meeting becomes an occasion for carousal and vice. The society increased in wealth through authorization and oversight of the diocesan bishop, and not of the Pope. The monthly meetings were closed by a meal, paid for out of the society's funds. As the society increased in wealth through bequests, it degenerated: the monthly meeting became an occasion for carousal and vice. The reformatory zeal of the sixteenth century swept almost entirely away. The Caland of Brunswick is the only one now existing. See H. Merz. CALENDAR BRETHREN (fratres Kalendarii).

CALF (the golden), CALF-WORSHIP. The first mention of calf-worship, or, more correctly, bull-worship, since not only does the word employed mean a bull as well as a calf; but among the other Semitic peoples, and also among the Egyptians, not a calf, but a bull, was worshipped as an idol) is Exod. xxxii. 1; cf. Deut. xx. 3-16, the episode in the wilderness. The next mention of the worship is 1 Kings xii. 27–33; cf. 2 Kings x. 29. The one was foreign and debasing; the other was domestic and orderly. Hosea is the only one of the prophets who alludes to the bull-worship; and to him the worship of an image is the same as the worship of an idol. Lit.—Selden: De dis Syria (Eng. trans. by W. A. tus was a violent adversary of Calixtus. According to this report, there lived in Rome during the reign of Commodus (180–192) a Christian of the established a banking-business in the fish-market. Of tradition, and such the trustworthiness of the martyrologium of Bede. Such is the Calixtus fabulous from beginning to end; though they celebrated Cemetery of the Martyrs bear his name; but it was always considered doubtful whether he must be old, since extracts from them occur in respect they showed themselves much more tractable than the Taborites. See Bohemia and Hussites. Calixtus I. Bishop of Rome under Helenian and Alexander Severus. The history of this bishop has assumed a new and quite different aspect since the discovery of the work of Hippolytus, Refutation of all Heresies. Previously nothing certain was known of him. The magnificent church Santa Maria Trastevere was ascribed to him; but the custom of dedicating churches to special saints is of much more recent date. The celebrated Cemetery of the Martyrs bears his name; but it was always considered doubtful whether he really built it. Two decrets of his, regulating, among other things also, the four great annual fasts, the Quatemaster fasts, are spurious. His martyrium is very improbable. The acts are fabulous from beginning to end; though they must be old, since extracts from them occur in the martyrologium of Bede. Such is the Calixtus of tradition, and such the trustworthiness of the tradition. Quite otherwise the report of Hippolytus (IX., 11), though it must not be forgotten that Hippolytus was a violent adversary of Calixtus. According to this report, there lived in Rome during the reign of Commodus (180–182) a Christian of the name Kallistus, who was the slave of a Christian official called Karpophorus. From his master he obtained a considerable sum of money, and established a banking-business in the fish-market. Much money was intrusted to him also by widows; but he conducted the business ill, and lost all. Afraid of being called to account by his master, he sought refuge in flight, and was just about to set sail for some foreign port, when Karpophorus appeared in the harbor. He jumped into the water, but was caught, delivered over to the master, and shut up in the treadmill. After some time, he had a scuffle with the Jews in Rome, on account of which he was publicly whipped, and sent to work in the mines of Sardinia. By the influence of Marcia, the concubine of Commodus, he regained liberty; and, after his return to Rome, he ingratiated himself so well with Pope Zephyrinus that he was made director of the great cemetery which afterwards came to bear his name. But here an insoluble enigma presents itself; for how could such a man be ordained priest? and how could he be placed on the episcopal chair of Rome? The fact that he could be throws a very peculiar light on the moral state of the Roman Church at that period. The conflict with Hippolytus began already in the lifetime of Zephyrinus. Hippolytus accused Kallistus of patripassianism, and Kallistus accused Hippolytus of dissent. But the controversy between them was not merely doctrinal. Hippolytus had adopted the maxim which the Novatians afterwards vindicated in all its rigor,—that those who had committed a deadly sin could never again be admitted into the church. Kallistus defended the milder practice of the Roman Church. He even taught that a bishop should not be deposed on account of a deadly sin. There were good reasons for his mildness. See Döllinger: Hippolytus and Kallistus, Regensburg, 1853. [Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1876. CHR. WOODSWORTH: St. Hippolytus and the Church of Rome, 2d ed., London, 1880. Dr. Döllinger defends the character of Kallistus against the charges of Hippolytus. On the other hand, Bishop Wordsworth accepts them, and explains (p. 140) the severity of the language and the freedom of the handling, on the ground that Hippolytus did not recognize Kallistus as a legitimate bishop of the church, because he was an abeter of heresy. The dates for the bishopric of Kallistus are 218–223. His heresy consisted in his view that the Son was merely the manifestation of the Father animating the Son as the spirit animates the body, and suffering with him on the cross. [Besides heresy in doctrine, Kallistus is accused of greatly relaxing the terms of re-admittance into the church; of allowing married men to be ordained, and ordained men to marry; of bringing the marriage-laws of the Church into conflict with those of the State; and, finally, of allowing repetition of baptism, probably as a substitute of the severe penance required of grievous sinners. [The largest of the Roman catacombs is the Cemetery of St. Calixtus; and De Rossi says it was the first common cemetery, given to the Pope by some noble family for the use of the whole Christian community. Thirteen out of the next eighteen popes after Zephyrinus are said to have been buried there.]
German emperors concerning the investiture a tedious, dangerous, and inextricable entangle ment. Even Henry V. declared himself hopeful of a reconciliation. Nevertheless, at the Council of Rheims all negotiations failed; and Henry, together with Pope Burdinus (Gregory VIII.), was once more excommunicated (Oct. 30, 1110).
By the aid of Duke William of Calabria, Calixtus succeeded in 1121 in seizing Burdinus, and shut him up in the Monastery of Cava, near Salerno, to do penance. This victory made the Emperor a little meeker, and at the same time there arose among the German princes a party which decided ly wished to put an end to the strife. At the Diet of Worms an agreement was at last arrived at (Sept. 8, 1122); and Sept. 23 the famous Concordat of Worms was solemnly read to the multitudes assembled in the plains outside of Worms.
The principal point of the agreement was that the bishops and abbots of the German Empire should receive the regalia, as temporal feudatories of the realm, from the Emperor, but the ring and staff, as spiritual servants of the Church, by the same Pope. The letters of Calixtus are given by

Calixtus III. (April 8, 1455–Aug. 6, 1458) was a Spaniard by birth, and Bishop of Valencia. His true name was Alonso de Borja, Italian Borgia.
He was seventy-seven years old, weak, good-natured, and incapable of energy, except for the elevation of his own nephews, and for a grand crusade against the Turks. In the latter undertaking he failed utterly, though the mendicant orders as alms-gatherers, and a swarm of crusade preachers were employed with loads of indulgences, sent immense sums of money into the papal treasury. But the fleet equipped did nothing; and the tithes which the German Jews

Rome, 1634, was ransacked like a plague-stricken vessel.
While his Theologia Moralia (1634) and De Arte Nova Nihosii were considered by the Roman-Catholic theologians as the heaviest blows aimed against their system for a long time, among the orthodox Lutherans they occasioned an open accusation of crypto-papismus (1640). The situation became still more involved and precarious after the conference at Thorn (1645). Calixtus hoped to bring about a reconciliation between the Lutherans and the Reformed, but succeeded only in being vehemently attacked as a crypto-Calvinist. He never gave up, however, to work for the great ideas of his life, all the while defending himself as best he could. Desiderium et Studium Concordia Ecclesiastica and Wiederlegung der Verleumdungen are among his last works. Of his writings, many of which were several times reprinted, there is no collected edition; but a complete list is given in Moeller's Cimbrina Literata his life. See E. L. TH. HENKE: Calixtus' Brief-

CALLENBERG, Johann Heinrich, b. at Gotha, Jan. 12, 1694; d. at Halle, July 16, 1760; studied theology and Oriental languages at Halle, and theology at the University of Helmstädt, 1603–09;
became prof. there, first in philosophy, 1727, then in theology, 1739. He founded in 1728 the so-called Jewish Institution,— a school for the education of missionaries among the Jews and Mohammedans; printed the New Testament, Luduction to, and dictionary of the corrupt Hebrew which the German Jews speak among themselves;

CALLMET, Augustine, b. at Mesnil-la-Horgue, in the diocese of Toul, Feb. 26, 1672; d. at Se-the Congregation of St. Vannes, and became Abbot of St. Leopold at Nancy, 1718, and of Senones, 1728. He was a very prolific writer. The most remarkable of his works are: Dictionnaire de la abridgments; e.g., Calmet’s Dictionary of the

CALLING is in theological as in popular religious speech the first phenomenon in conversion.
(The word is not so used in the Old Testament, and in the New chiefly by Paul.) It comes from God as the carrying-out of a purpose of salvation formed from all eternity (Rom. viii.
28, 29). God knows his own (Cor. viii. 3; Gal.
iv. 9). Yet it is evident that the calling is wider than the salvation: “Many are called, but few chosen” (Matt. xx. 16). The fact is, that the desire of God's heart, as testified to by his Word (1 Tim. ii. 4; 2 Pet. iii. 9, cf. Ezek. xxxix. 11), is a salvation of all; but against this wish men set themselves, so that the fault is not God's, but man's (Matt. xxii. 37; Acts xiii. 46). There is therefore in salvation a co-operation of man with God. The calling comes through the usual means of grace, particularly the Word as proclaimed by the preacher (Rom. x. 14). Paul's fruitful ministry was not exceptional. God has in every age as abundantly blessed his messengers. The assertion that the call is general means simply that the call is given to all who hear the gospel preached, and, if obeyed, leads to their salvation; for God's love takes in the world (John iii. 18), and he has put upon his Church the duty of proclaiming to all this boundless love, and promised his presence in the work (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20). [Calvinistic theologians distinguish between the external and the internal call. The former is addressed to all, elect and non-elect alike; the latter, only to the elect, and is an effectual calling. It is thus defined in the Westminster Shorter Catechism, q. 31: "Effectual calling is the work of God's Spirit, whereby, convincing us of our sin and misery, enlightening our minds in the knowledge of Christ, and renewing our wills, he doth persuade and enable us to embrace Jesus Christ, freely offered to us in the gospel." — D. v. BURGER.

CALOVIS, Abraham, b. at Mohrungen, East Prussia, 1612; d. at Wittenberg, Feb. 23, 1696. He studied theology at Königsberg, was rector of the gymnasium of Dantzig 1643–50, and became in the latter year professor of theology at Wittenberg. His Systema Locorum Theologicorum, 12 vols., 1653–71, is the most compact and comprehensive representation of Lutheran dogmatics, — the true exemplar of what has been called Lutheran scholasticism. His essential character, however, was not dogmatical but polemical. Even his chief exegetical work, Biblia Illustrata, 4 vols., roots in a polemical interest. It is a refutation of the liberal dogmas of the time, and the codification of position which he occupied in the theological world of the seventeenth century he owed to his violent polemics against Calixtus, and that reconciling tendency which was represented by the University of Helmstädt, and which generally went under the name of syncretism. His principal writings in this line are: Prolegomena Institutionum Theologicarum, 1649; Digressio de Nova Theologia Helmstadiot-Regiomontanorum Syncretitarum, 1651; Harmonia Calixtino-haeretica, 1655, etc. At last, however, he overreached himself. His Historia Syncretitarum, 1682, was suppressed. He was denounced by his own allies, and Dr. L. F. ERDMANN, in Leben des Abraham Calovis, 1859, calls Dr. Calovis "The Decline of the Academic Theology," and "The Birth of the German Historical School."— THOLUCK.

CALVINISTS, or PRIESTS OF CALVARY, a monastic association founded at Bethoram in the monastery of Martinus, before a large assembly. There were also Benedictine nuns of the Colline de Calvairre.

CALVIN (Latinized form of Caouwin or Caulein), John, b. at Noyon in Picardy, some seventy miles north-east of Paris, July 10, 1509; d. at Geneva, May 27, 1564.

1. His Life. — His father, Gerard Caouvin, was apostolic notary, fiscal attorney of the county, and secretary to the Bishop of Noyon. His mother, Jeanne Lefranc of Cambray, was noted for her personal beauty, as also for great religious fervor and strictness. His father was poor; but his influence secured his son the best educational advantages at home, and when only twelve years old the chaplaincy of the Chapel de la Gesine: so Calvin received the tonsure, although he was never ordained. In 1523 he was sent to Paris to prepare for the priesthood. He was then noted for his extraordinary ability, and also for a fairness of character which gave him his sobriquet, the Accusative Case. His support while a student was derived from church-preferments. He held successively his chaplaincy, and then the curacy of Marteville (1527) and of Font l'Evêque (1529). In 1527, on the advice of his father, he turned his attention to law, and attended lectures at the universities of Orléans, and, the next year, Bourges. His career was brilliant. At Orléans he frequently lectured to the class in the absence of the professor, and received the complimentary degree of Doctor of Law (which, however, he never used). In Bourges he was a favorite pupil of Andreas Alciati, then the most distinguished law-professor in Europe, and studied Greek, Protestantism as well, under Melchor Wolmar (see BZA), although he probably was already inclined to the new faith. On May 26, 1531, his father died; and that summer he returned to Paris and to theology. In April, 1532, he published, with a commentary, Seneca's De Clementia (On Mercy). He had assumed the cost of publication, and apparently was pecuniarily embarrassed by it; for in a letter of this time his slender patrimony. But, if poor in purse, he was rich in honors. God had, however, better things in store for him, and was pleased by a "sudden conversion" to subdue him, making him willing, as he says, "to know the truth." The change was radical and permanent, like Paul's. This was in the latter part of 1532, but he did not break at once with his studies, although he made the Bible more of a text-book than ever.

The Reformation was making headway in France under Francis I.; and Calvin preached frequently in the meetings of the Evangelical party, commonly closing with the words: "If God be for us, who can be against us?" His friend Nicholas Cop, a learned physician of Basel, was elected rector of the University of Paris; and at his request Calvin prepared for him an inaugural address on Christian philosophy (see Calvin's Opera in the Corpus Reformatorum, vol. IX.), which Cop delivered on All-Saints' Day in 1533 in the Church of the Maturins, before a large assembly.

Calvin had made the address a plea for the reform of the Church on the basis of the pure gospel.

The consequence of this bold act was the compulsory flight of Calvin to the south of France. The next two years were spent in wandering as a fugitive under assumed names, all the while sowing the seed of the kingdom. For some time he was at Angoulême with his learned friend the young canon Louis du Tillet, who subsequently joined the Protestants, using his excellent library, and preparing his Institutes. Then he was at the court of Margaret of Navarre, the sister of Francis I.; at Noyon (May, 1534), where he parted with his ecclesiastical benefices; at Poiitiers, where he celebrated with a few friends, for the first time, the Lord's Supper, according to the evangelical rite, in a cave near the town, called to this day “Calvin's Cave;” at Orléans, where he published (1534) his first theological work, Psychopolynychia, confuting from the Scriptures the Anabaptist doctrine of the sleep of souls between death and resurrection; and finally again in Paris (the close of 1534), where he met for the first time Michael Servetus, and challenged him to a debate on the Trinity. The outbreak of persecution compelled his flight to Strassburg. Thence he went to Basel, and there published in Latin (1538), when he was twenty-seven years old, his immortal Institutes. (The French edition was made subsequently, and is a translation.) The dedication to Francis I. is a model of manly eloquence. He revisited Noyon, won a brother and sister to the Reformed faith, and then returned to Switzerland, with the intention of settling there for a time, but differed to a studious life at Basle.

On Aug. 5, 1536, he arrived in Geneva, being compelled by the wars to go round that way, and intended to leave the next day; but William Farel threatened him with the curse of God if he preferred his studies to the work of the Lord. “These words,” says Calvin, in the preface of his Commentary on the Psalms, “terrified and shook me as if God from on high had stretched out his hand to stop me; so that I renounced the journey I had undertaken.” The timid scholar was forced to become a preacher at a stormy court, Luther, and Melanchthon. But Farel labored to introduce reforms into Geneva, and by the severity of their discipline won the ill will of the leaders; and on Easter Monday (April 29), 1538, they were deposed, and expelled from the city, by the Council of the Two Hundred. Banishment meant freedom; and for three years (1538-41) he quietly pursued his studies in Strassburg, and at the same time ministered to the French Church there. In September, 1540, he married Idelette de Bures, or Van Buren, the widow of Johannes Storder, an Anabaptist whom he had converted. By her he had three children, all of whom died in infancy. Calvin's married life was otherwise very happy, but lasted only nine years. During his stay in Strassburg he made the acquaintance of Melanchthon; and the "theologian" as the Germans called Calvin, and the "preceptor of Germany," were quickly firm friends.

Meanwhile Geneva was by no means forgotten. When Cardinal Sadolet tried to win it to Rome, Calvin stood boldly on its defence; and it was to him he gave his former flock his timely counsel. At length magistrates and people united in urgently and repeatedly recalling him, as the only one who could stop the disorders that had arisen; and very reluctantly he came. On Sept. 13, 1541, he made his entrance. The council gave him a house with a garden to live in, and, for salary, five hundred florins, twelve measures of wheat, and two tubs of wine. From that time on, Geneva was his home and his parish, his centre of activity, but by no means circumference of influence. Under his iron rule the city assumed a new aspect. Immorality of every sort was sternly suppressed. It was well for the success of this system that Geneva was a refuge for the persecuted in every land. Hollanders, English, Italians, Spaniards, and more particularly Frenchmen, settled in the town, and readily lent their aid in maintaining Calvin's peculiar methods. But not refugees alone came: his lectures and those of Beza attracted many thousands of students, and thus spread their fame far and wide. But incessant study, a vast correspondence, “the care of all the churches,” his sedentary life,—these conspired to make him the victim of disease, and at fifty-five years of age he breathed his last. He had lived abstinently, been most generous in his gifts, and left behind him in money only about a hundred and seventy dollars, but an inestimable fortune in fame and consecrated influence; and to him Geneva inherited faith, education, government, brave citizens, and pride in an honored name.

2. His Fundamental Ideas. — He based his system upon the Apostles’ Creed, and followed its lines. Ethics and theology were handled in the closest connection. In his view, the reformation in theology was pre-eminently a practical affair. Even the doctrine of predestination was developed, not as a speculation, but as a matter of practical concern. By the extraordinary emphasis put upon it, the Genevans were taught to consider it almost the corner-stone of the Christian faith. In opposition to the lax views of sin and grace which the Roman Church inculcated, he revived the Augustinian doctrine in order by it to conquer Rome. In so doing he was one with Zwingli, (Ecolampadius, Luther, and Melanchthon. But Farel labored to introduce reforms into Geneva, and by the severity of their discipline won the ill will of the leaders; and on Easter Monday (April 29), 1538, they were deposed, and expelled from the city, by the Council of the Two Hundred. Banishment meant freedom; and for three years (1538-41) he quietly pursued his studies in Strassburg, and at the same time ministered to the French Church there. In September, 1540, he married Idelette de Bures, or Van Buren, the widow of Johannes Storder, an Anabaptist whom he had converted. By her he had three children, all of whom died in infancy. Calvin's married life was otherwise very happy, but lasted only nine years. During his stay in Strassburg he made the acquaintance of Melanchthon; and the "theologian" as the Germans called Calvin, and the "preceptor of Germany," were quickly firm friends.

lover, of all in Christ, was the object of his reverence.

3. His Reforms. — In accordance with his principles was his work. During his first residence in Geneva he showed his determination to separate Church and State; and therefore he and his fellow-preachers protested against the interference of the State in the matter of the use of fonts, of unleavened bread in the Lord's Supper, and in the celebration of the church-festivals, as these were properly within the ecclesiastical province. When, also, he refused the Eucharist unto the citizen, because of its immorality, he asserted for the Church freedom from the civil authority. This determined stand cost him temporarily his reverend position; but, when he resumed his work in Geneva, he and the citizens knew that his power was henceforth absolute. The reforms he instituted are famous, and often condemned as infamous. They are, however, not only defeasible, but commendable, if judged by the standard of that age. We cannot withhold our admiration of the moral courage, the self-forgetfulness, the stern morality, the uncompromising zeal, with which Calvin addressed himself unto the apparently hopeless task of curbing the passions of the loose populace, and gaining the cordial co-operation of the upper classes. He succeeded. Geneva came to be regarded as a normal school of religious life. Religion was the life of the greater part of the inhabitants. With a correct insight into the necessities of the case, Calvin declared immediately after his victorious entry that he could not take up work without a re-organization of the Church, viz., by the formation of a church-court, which should have full authority to maintain discipline. On Nov. 20, 1541, at a popular meeting, the scheme he drew up was ratified. This provided for a consistory, composed of six city ministers and twelve elders, — one of the latter to be a syndic and their president, — which met every Thursday, and put under church-discipline, without respect of persons, every species of evil-doers. The rigor and vigor of this administration quickly awakened natural indignation, in part even among those who on the whole favored Calvin. His life was at times in danger. Some showed his terrified contempt for him by naming their dogs after him. In a city like Geneva, full of refugees of every description, there were many who looked upon all restraint as oppression; others who objected to Calvin's measures as going too far, or criticised its methods. In order still further to increase the authority of the church-court, Calvin secured (1550) an important modification of the city government, whereby the conseil général (the General Council), the highest law-making body, was only called twice a year, — in February to elect syndics, and in November to fill some minor offices, and fix the price of wine. But nothing might be discussed in this meeting which had not been previously determined upon in the Council of Two Hundred; nor in the latter which the Council of Sixty did not approve of; nor could this council take up anything not previously agreed to in the highest council, which thus became practically the supreme authority. The日内瓦 Municipal Council became in this way a superfluity, without the power of initiative. It had, however, accomplished its mission, — accepted the Reformation.

Most prominent among the means Calvin used to reform the city was preaching. Every other week he preached every day in plain, direct, convincing fashion, without eloquence, but still irresistibly; and the life the preacher led constituted his strongest claim upon their attention. Our reports of his sermons are probably all copies made by his hearers; which was the easier done, because, being asthmatic, he spoke very slowly. Every Friday the so-called "Congregation" was held, in which questions were answered, and debates even carried on. Minors were carefully instructed in a catechism originally prepared by Calvin in Latin, 1545. In 1536 he had issued a French, and in 1538 a Latin, catechism, which was a mere abridgment or syllabus of his Institutes, and was not in the form of question and answer; but the catechism of 1545 was in the usual form.

Calvin has the credit of first introducing congregational singing into the worship of the Reformed Church in Geneva. The first songs were some of his own metrical renderings of the Psalms.

4. His Opponents. — Like Zwingli and Luther, Calvin had his difficulties with the Anabaptists, towards whom he adopted the same tactics. He met them in public debate March 18, 1537, and so effectually disposed of their arguments, that he was not troubled again.

But he had personal controversies — (1) first with Peter Caroli, a French refugee and pastor in Lausanne, a religious chameleon, whose latest hue was that of a stickler for orthodoxy. Calvin was very indifferent to the terminology of theology, so long as the truth was expressed. In discussing the nature of the Godhead during his first residence in Geneva, he avoided using the words "Trinity" and "Person," although he had no particular objection to them; and so they did not occur in the Confession of Faith which he drew up, and to which the citizens of Geneva were compelled to assent; nor did the Geneva Church subscribe formally to the Athanasian Creed. Caroli accused Calvin and his fellow-divines of Arianism and Sabellianism; and so plausible was the charge, that Calvin was greatly troubled. However, in the synod of 1537, held in Bern, the Genevan divines fully cleared themselves, and Caroli was deposed and banished. (2) Berthelier, the son of a martyr for freedom. Berthelier was forbidden the communion (1553) by the consistory. The council absolved the bann. Calvin from the pulpit, two days before the September Communion (one of the four yearly occasions), declared that he would die sooner than give the Lord's holy thing to one under condemnation for deaising God. Perrin, who was then syndic for the second time, ordered Berthelier to stay away from communion, and so ended a dispute from which the enemies of Calvin hoped a great deal. (3) Bolsec (see title), whose presumption in denying predestination, and abusing the ministers at a congregation, drew upon him, not only Calvin's indignant reply at the time, but also imprisonment and banishment (1531). (4) But by far the most famous of all Calvin's opponents was Servetus (see title for fuller discussion), who seems to have been a rather flippant person. It is said he desired Calvin's banishment in order that he might be installed in his place. To this end he accused Calvin of perfidious, tyrannical, and unchristian conduct. It is no wonder, therefore, that Calvin treated him harshly. It is idle to shield Calvin from the charge of bringing about Servetus' death, although it is true that the mode adopted (burning) did not meet with his approval; but at the same time it is easy to excuse him on the ground of the persecuting spirit of his age. Strange as it may seem, the Protestants who had felt the persecution of Rome were ready to persecute all who followed not with them. The burning of Servetus (Oct. 27, 1553) for the crime of heresy, specifically antitrinitarianism, was approved by the Helvetic Church, and, what is more remarkable by the mild Melancthon; but it failed even then to win universal approval, and now it is usually considered a sad, ineffaceable blot upon Calvin's character. Many who know nothing else of either Calvin or Servetus are very indignant over the tragedy, and apparently reject Calvinism because of it. We ought rather to mourn than to censure. Servetus knew the danger he braved in coming to Geneva. He had as early as 1534 been in debate with Calvin, although they did not personally meet. On his intimating an intention to visit Geneva, Calvin gave him the fair warning, that, if he came, he would prosecute him to the death.1 While, therefore, we hold Calvin responsible for Servetus' death, we clear him of the charges of having allured Servetus to Geneva, and of rejoicing in his death on personal grounds. See art. Servetus; R. Willis: Servetus and Calvin, London, 1877; H. Tollin: Servet. u. die oberländischen Reformatoren, I. Bd. Servet. u. Butzer, Berlin, 1880.

No good came of the execution, only evil—ridicule from the Roman Catholics, and the adverse criticism from many friends. It likewise failed to check the antitrinitarian heresy. Calvin defended himself, and Beza aided him; but no defence could excuse the facts.

5. His Ecclesiastical Influence.—By his lectures he attracted students from every quarter. He often had as many as a thousand: therefore his influence was constantly spreading. As was natural, it was most formative in France, whence most of his pupils came, and to whose Protestants Calvin was leader and spiritual father. But in other lands he exerted his power. In Italy he came to the aid of the troubled Duchess of Ferrara. To England he sent his Commentary on Isaiah, with a dedication to the youthful King, Edward VI. To Cranmer he wrote letters; and through Knox he moulded Scotland. He counselled the Moravian Brethren. He helped the Poles in the Trinitarian controversy, and likewise the Reformed cause in Hungary. He also prepared, in his way, the present interest in foreign missions by his unfortunate mission to Brazil (1555). See VILLEGAIGNON and STAEHELIN, Johannes Calvin, vol. ii., pp. 234-238.

Calvin's relations with Switzerland and Germany were unpleasant. He strove most earnestly to unite the different branches of the Protestant Church. But unhappily he was suspected by many Swiss of Lutheran views on the Lord's Supper,—for this was the controverted point,—and by many Germans of too much Zwinglianis; so that he made but an indifferent mediator. He had high hopes of the "Consensus Turginianus" (Consensus of Zürich, 1549), which harmonized the Swiss churches; but the controversy with the Lutherans was violently renewed by Hesahusius.

6. His Personal Character.—The common conception of Calvin is erroneous. He was not the stern-hearted tyrant, the relentless persecutor, the gloomy theologian, the popular picture represents him to have been. Men, by a blessed inconsistency, are often kinder than their creeds. So, at all events, was Calvin. To the superficial observer he is not attractive; but it is the opinion of every one who has studied him that he improves upon acquaintance. Granted that he was constitutionally intolerant; that he did draft and sternly carry out regulations which were vexatious and needlessly severe; that he knew no other stand-point in government, morals, or theology than his own,—he had other qualities which entitle him to respect and admiration. He was refined, conscientious, pure, faithful, honest, humble, pious. His offering to God was a bleeding heart. He attracted men by the strength of his character, the softness of his soul, and the directness of his efforts. He had the common human affections. He loved his wife, and mourned her death. He grieved over his childlessness. He took delight in his friends; and they were the noblest in the Protestant Church. Somewhat of the forbidding aspect of his life may perhaps be accounted for by the unnatural life he was forced to lead. He desired to spend his days in study; whereas he was forced to incessant, multifarious, and most prominent labor. Experience shows there is no harder master than a timid man compelled to lead. Again: his ill health must be taken into account. He was a walking hospital. Such men are not apt to be gentle. The wonder rather is that he showed so patient a spirit. The popular verdict has been against him: butvox populi is not always vox dei. What Beza, his biographer, wrote is nearer truth: "Having been an observer of Calvin's life for sixteen years, I may with perfect right testify that we have in this man a most beautiful example of a truly Christian life and death, which is easy to contemplate, but difficult to imitate." Ernest Renan finds the key to his influence in the fact that he was "the most Christian man of his generation" (Studies of Religious History and Criticism, N.Y., 1864, pp. 286 sqq.). Professor Dorner says, "Calvin was equally great in intellect and character, lovely in social life, full of tender sympathy and faithfulness to friends, yielding and forgiving towards personal offences, but inexcorably severe when he saw the honor of God obstinately and malignantly attacked" (Gesch. d. Prot. Theol. pp. 374, 376).

7. His Personal Appearance.—He was of middle stature, and, through feeble health, of meagre and emaciated frame. He had a thin, pale, finely-chiselled face, a well-formed mouth, a long pointed beard, black hair, a prominent nose, a lofty forehead, and flaming eyes. He was modest, plain, and scrupulously neat in dress, orderly and methodical in all his habits, temperate, and even abstemious, allowing himself scarcely food and sleep enough for vigorous work. (The famous portrait by Ary Scheffer is too much idolized.)

8. His Literary Labors.—Leaving out of view his correspondence, the writings of Calvin divide themselves into the theological and the exegetical. In regard to the latter, it suffices now to say that they have never been excelled, if, on the whole, they have been equalled. He possessed all the requisite qualifications for an exegete,—knowledge of the original tongues, good common sense, and abundant piety. His expositions are brief, pithy, and clear. His theological writings are requisite qualifications for an exegete,—knowledge of the original tongues, good common sense, and abundant piety. His expositions are brief, pithy, and clear. His theological writings are remarkable for their early maturity and their unvarying consistency. Besides his minor writings, we possess that masterpiece of Protestantism, the Institutes of the Christian Religion, which came fully grown into the world, like Minerva from the brain of Jupiter. He really produced at twenty-six a book in which he had nothing to change at fifty-five. The repeated enlargements were mere developments of its germinal ideas. The first edition (1536) consisted of 15 chapters, and was intended merely as a brief apology of the Reformed doctrine: 1. Of law, with an exposition of the Decalogue; 2. Of faith, with an exposition of the Apostle's Creed; 3. Of prayer, with an exposition of the Lord's Prayer; 4. Of the other so-called sacraments; 5. Of Christian liberty, church government and discipline. The French translation made by Calvin himself appeared in Basel, 1541. The final form was given to the Institutes in the Latin edition of Geneva, 1559, when it was made into a treatise of four books, divided into a hundred and four chapters.

Lit.—Calvin's writings. Joannes Calvinus: Opera qua supersunt omnia, ed. G. Baum, E. Cu- nitz, E. Reuss, Brunsvigae (Brunswick), 1803 sqq. 2d ed., 1832. This edition superseded all others (Geneva, 1617, 12 vols. fol.; Amsterdam, 1671, 9 vols. fol., etc.). There is an English translation of Calvin's works by the "Calvin Translation Society," Edinburgh, 1842–53, 32 vols. There is an edition of those works originally written in French, Œuvres François de J. Calv., recueillies par P. L. Jacob, éd. P. L. Jacob, Paris, 1809, 16 vols. fol. (a poor edition, see Théod. de Bèze, and d'une note bibliographique, par P. L. Jacob, bibliophile), Paris, 1842, 12mo. The Brunswick edition includes Calvin's Letters, which are numerous and important. An English translation from the previous edition of Bénézet is published in 4 vols. by the Fresh Board of Pub., Philadelphia. See also A. L. Hermin- jard: Correspondance des réformateurs dans les pays de langue française, Genève et Paris, 1866 sqq. Biographies of Calvin.—Th. de Bèze: Histoire de la vie et la mort de J. Calvin, Genève, 1594; 2d French ed. (1595) contains only a portion of the text of the original French. The work was published by A. Franklin, Paris, 1864; Latin ed. by Beza, Geneva, 1575 (the chief material, along with his Letters, for an authentic biography); Ildef. Bénézet: Histoire de la vie de Jean Calvin, Paris, 1877 (Genevæ, 1835, Lyon, 1875); in Latin, Coloniae, 1580 (a mean libel; a reply to it, entitled Antitheses, appeared at Cleves, 1622); Dri- lincourt: La défense de Calvin, Genève, 1607 (a refutation of Bologne); Paul Henry: Das Leben Johann Calvins, Ham布尔, 1863–44, 3 vols., abridged in one vol., Hamburgh, 1846; English translation by Stebbing (defective, omits most of Henry's notes, and all his appendix), London and New York, 1854, 2 vols. (much valuable but ill-digested material); Audin (R. C.): Histoire de la vie de Calvin, Paris, 1841, 4th ed., 1851, 2 vols., also in English and German (bitter and scurrilous, full of misrepresentations and blunders); T. H. Dyer: Life of Calvin, London, 1849 (valuable and impartial); Felix Burgener: Calvin, Paris, 1802; English translation, Edinb., 1863 (popular but trustworthy); Winckler: Johann Kälin, sein Leben und sein Wirken in der Welt, Leipzig, 1867, vol. I. (the author died an Old Catholic in 1866); H. Elster: Life of Calvin, Elsefeld, 1863, 2 vols. (on the whole, the best biography, full, and well arranged, yet needing modification on some points); F. W. Kamp- schulte: Johann Calvin, seine Kirche und sein Staat in Genf, Leipzig, 1886, vol. I. (the author died an Old Catholic in 1884); and, unfortunately, only one volume, extending to 1546, of his able and singularly impartial biography has appeared; Thomas McCrie: The Early Years of John Calvin, London, 1880.

Herring (8. M. Jackson). CALVINISM is a term used to designate the doctrinal system of Calvin. But the doctrines are far older than the man. The system is known originally as Augu- stinianism, from its earliest champion, St. Augustine (353–430).\(^1\) Calvinism is the term for its developed and Protestant form, which finds its definition, not alone in the writings of Augustine and Calvin, but in the published confessions of those churches which have professed this form of doctrine, and in their standard theological writings.

\(^1\) It should be remembered, however, that Augustine also taught some of the leading doctrines of the Roman-Catholic Church, which still regards him as the greatest authority among the fathers. Calvinism is a development of the anti-Pelagian Augustinianism, and at the same time a development upon it, with many new features never dreamed of by the Bishop of Hippo. While the church of Calvin, and others before him, followed Augustine, only in the doctrines on sin and grace, and on predestination, but differed from him on justification, on the rule of faith, on the church, and many other important points. — Ed.
A. A Statement of the Principles of Calvinism.—I. The Relation of the Creator to the Creation. Calvinism teaches Christian Theism. It emphasizes at once the transcience of God beyond, and the immanence of God within, the world. He remains ever a conscious personal Spirit, above and above the divinity; in the exercise of his free volitions, soverignly to exercise a supernatural influence upon any part of that system of nature which he has established, ordinarily working through second causes, "yet free to work without, above, and against them, at his pleasure." At the same time his creatures are momentarily dependent upon the energy of his will for substance, and for the possession of the powers communicated to them as second causes in all their exercises.

But this is common ground for all Christians. Calvinism, or Augustinianism, just here opposes itself to Pelagianism (see title) in that it teaches, that, prior to apostasy, the spirit of man depended for spiritual life and moral integrity upon the concursus (concurrency) of the Spirit of God, the withdrawal of which is the immediate cause of spiritual death and moral impotence. This divine influence, in one degree, and in one mode or another, is common to all creatures and all their actions; and it is called "grace," when, as an undeserved favor, it is in a supernatural manner restored to the souls of sinful men, with the design of affecting their moral character and action.

II. The Design of God in Creation is declared in the Scriptures to be the manifestation of his own glorious perfections; and Calvinism seizes this principle, and applies it to the interpretation of all God's dealings with man, and of all man's duties to God.

III. The Eternal Plan of God and the Actual Succession of Events in Time is set forth thus: 1. This eternal and immutable plan of God has constituted man a free agent, and consequently, can never interfere with the exercise of that freedom of which it is itself the foundation; 2. This created free will is not, however, independent, but ever continues to have its ground in the conserving energies of the Creator; 3. In the case of an infinitely wise, powerful, and free Creator of all things out of nothing, it is obvious that the certain foreknowledge of all events from the absolute beginning virtually involves the predetermination of each event without exception; for all the causes and consequences, direct and contingent, which are foreseen in creation, are, of course, determined by creation; 4. Since all events constitute a single system, the Creator must embrace the system as a whole, and every infinitesimal element of it, in one all-comprehensive intention; ends more or less general must be determined as ends, and means and conditions in all their several relations to the ends which are made dependent upon them: hence, while every event remains dependent upon its causes, and contingent upon its conditions, none of God's purposes can possibly be contingent, because, in turn, every cause and condition is determined in that purpose, as well as the ends which are suspended upon them: all the decrees of God are hence called absolute, because they are ultimately determined always by "the counsel of his own will," and never by any thing exterior to him which has not in turn been previously determined by him; 5. This determination, however, instead of interfering with, maintains the true causality of the creature, and the free self-determination of men and angels. Since the holiness of the created moral agent is conditioned upon the dwelling of divine grace, and its turning from grace is the cause of sin, it follows that all the good in the volitions of free agents is to be referred to God as its positive source; but all the evil (which originates in defect, privation) is to be referred simply to his permission. In this view all events, with regard to them, are embraced in God's eternal purpose; even the primal apostasies of Satan and of Adam, as well as all those consequences which have flowed from them. The charge of fatalism so often made does not really lie against Calvinism; for the energizing will of the personal Jehovah, at once perfect Light and Love, is very different from fate. It is one thing to be borne along by irresistible yet utterly blind force, and quite another to be led by our heavenly Father's hand.

IV. God's Benevolence, Justice, and Grace is the Scheme of Redemption. —Justice, as well as benevolence, is an essential and ultimate property of the divine nature, and hence lies back of, and determines the character of, the divine volitions. By the perfection of God's nature he is always benevolent to the innocent, and just as certainly is he determined to punish the guilty. In the gospel, God has sovereignly separated the sin from the sinner in certain cases, in the vicious penal sufferings of his Son treating the believing sinner as a righteous person; that is, as a person with regard to whom all the demands of justice are fully satisfied. Hence he has exercised both justice and benevolence, —justice to the sin and to the law, benevolence to the sinner; which benevolence to the undeserving is sovereign grace. Calvinism, while admitting the general benevolence of God, emphasizes his justice and grace.

V. The Effect of Adam's Apostasy upon his Posterity. —The entire soul with all its constitutional faculties and acquired habits is the organ of volition, the agent willing. It possesses the inalienable property of self-determination, the moral character of which always depends upon the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, and it needs, therefore, divine help to will rightly. Adam was created in fellowship with God, and hence with a holy tendency of heart, with full power not to sin, but also, for a limited period of probation, with power to sin; and when he sinned the Holy Spirit was withdrawn from the race, and he and his descendants lost the original power not to sin, and gained the necessity to sin; in other words, total moral inability. But this theological doctrine is to be carefully distinguished from the metaphysical one of "philosophical necessity." The phrases, the "bondage of the will," etc., are intended to apply only to the corrupt spontaneous tendency of fallen man to evil, which can beremoved only by the creating energy from above. At the same time, every Calvinist holds devoutly to the free self-determination of the soul in every moral action, and is at liberty to give whatever psychological explanation of that fact may seem to him most reasonable. Hence Calvinists hold,— CALVINISM.

First as to original guilt: (1) Human sin, having originated in the free apostatizing act of Adam, deserves God's wrath and curse; and immutable justice demands their infliction. (2) Such, moreover, was the relation subsisting between Adam and his descendants, that God righteously regards and treats each one as he comes into being as worthy of the punishment of that sin, and consequently withdraws his life-giving fellowship from him. The whole race, therefore, and each individual it embraces, is under the just condemnation of God; and hence the gift of Christ, and the entire scheme of redemption in its conception, execution, and application, are throughout and in every sense a product of sovereign grace. God was free to provide it for few or many, for all or none, just as he pleased; and in every case of its application the motives determining God cannot be found in the object, but only in the good pleasure of the will of the divine Agent.

Secondly as to original sin: (1) Since every man thus comes into the world in a condition of and total death from Adam's apostasy, he is judicially excluded from the morally quickening energy of the Holy Ghost, and hence begins to think, feel, and act without a spontaneous bias to moral good. (2) But since moral obligation is positive, and the soul is essentially active, it instantly develops in action a spiritual blindness and deathliness to divine things, and a positive inclination to evil. This involves the corruption of the whole nature; and the absolute impotency of the will to good is, humanly speaking, without remedy, and necessarily tends to the indefinite increase, both of depravity and guilt. It is therefore said to be total.

VI. The Nature and Necessity of Regenerating Grace. — Grace is free, sovereign favor to the ill-deserving. Calvinists distinguish (1) "common grace," or the moral and salutary influence on the soul of the Spirit acting through the truth, as the result of Christ's work, which tends to restrain its evil passions, but which may be resisted, and is always prevailingly resisted by the unregenerate, from (2) "effectual calling," which is a single act of God, changing the moral character of the will of the subject, and implanting a prevailing tendency to co-operate with future grace in all forms of holy obedience. By reason of this new creative energy within it, the soul spontaneously embraces Christ, and turns to God. (3) Afterwards this same divine energy continues to support the soul, and prepare it for, and to concur with it, in every good work. This grace is now prevailingly co-operated with by the regenerated soul, and at times resisted, until the status of grace is succeeded by the status of glory.

VII. The Application of the Plan of Redemption.

Predestination, or the purpose of God to secure the salvation of some men, and not of all, has been popularly regarded as the distinguishing feature of Calvinism, and one most revolting to the moral sense. Some Calvinists, reasoning downward from the nature of God as absolute, and developing this doctrine in a strictly speculative manner, have made it the foundation of their system. These have necessarily conceived of it in the high and logically coherent supralapsarian sense (election before creation; the decree to create, and permit men to fall, in order to carry out their predestined salvation or perdition), which has been rejected by the great body of the Reformed theologians as unscriptural, and revolting to the moral sense. The vast majority of Calvinists, however, are influenced by practical, and not speculative, considerations, and therefore hold to the infralapsarian (election after creation) view. God, they say, elects his people out of the mass of guilty sinners, and provides redemption for them, thus securing for them faith and repentance whereby they may be saved. These gifts cannot, therefore, be conditions of salvation, as Arminians hold; rather they are its predetermined and graciously effected results.

Gottschalk (808–808) taught a double predestination, — the elect to salvation, and the reprobate to damnation. But this theory is not taught in the recognized standards of Calvinism. God elects of free grace all those he purposes to save, and actually saves them; while those whom he does not elect are simply left under the operation of the law of exact justice, whatever that may be. All infants, idiots, and all believers in Christ, are saved by grace. All others are left to the operation of pure justice. It is obvious that all do not believe, that all are not saved. Calvinistic "particularism" admits the actual results of salvation in their widest scope, and refers all to the gracious purpose and power of God, but does not restrict it one iota within the limits determined by the facts themselves.

B. The History of Calvinism. — The Eastern division of the Church had from the first, in re-action from prevalent Gnosticism, emphasized the autonomy of the human will. While the truth of human free agency was on all sides admitted, a tendency to give proportionate consideration to the correlative facts of the controlling influence of character over action, of original sin, and of moral impotency, is first traced in the Latin or Western Church, in the writings of Tertullian (220 A.D.), Hilary of Poictiers (358), and Ambrose of Milan (397). But the characteristic principles of the system now called Calvinism were first fully developed by Augustine, Bishop of Hippo (324–400).1 His great opponent was Pelagius (Morgan), — a British monk, a student of the Greek fathers, a man of pure life, moral earnestness, and wide familiarity with different parts of the Church, — assisted by Cælestius, a Roman advocate, and Julian, an eloquent deposed bishop. The opinions of Pelagius were unanimously condemned by the whole Church, Eastern and Western, at the Councils of Carthage (405–416), Mileve (410), and Ephesus (431), and by Popes Innocent and Zosimus, — a sure proof that they were not in accordance with the original faith of the Church. And up to the present time Pelagianism has never been adopted into the public creed of any ecclesiastical body except that of the Socinians of Poland (Racovian Catechism, 1605). Afterwards the doctrines of Augustine triumphed, in their conflict with Semi-pelagianism, at the Synods of Orange and Valence (520), and by the decrees of Popes Gelasius (496) and Boniface (550). Henceforth a moderate Augustinianism became the legally recognized orthodoxy of

Western Europe, and actually tintured the leading minds and events of that great community for several centuries. Bede, Alcuin, and Claudius of Turin, and afterwards the best and greatest of the schoolmen,—Anselm (1090–1150), Bernard of Clairvaux (1140), Hugo of St. Victor, Thomas Aquinas (1247), and Thomas Bradwardine (1415)—were all of the school of Augustine. The same is true of all the "Reformers before the Reformation,"—Wycliffe (1324–84), John Hus (1369–1415), the Waldenses of Italy, John Wessel (1410–93), John of Goch (1470), Savonarola (1493), John Reuchlin, and Staupitz, the spiritual father of Luther.

The Reformation was a re-action from the growing Semi-pelagianism, as well as from the idolatry and tyranny of the Papal Church. It was in all its leaders, Luther as decidedly as Calvin, and in all its centres, England and Germany as well as Scotland, Holland, or Geneva, an Augustinian movement. Although Calvin was not the first to formulate the system which goes by his name, to him, nevertheless, justly belongs the praise of presenting to the world the first and grandest work of systematic divinity,—of recasting Augustinianism in its Protestant form, and of handing it to the modern world stamped with its great author's name. By him Calvinism and its correlates—Presbyterianism in the Church, and Republicanism in the State,—were, though not invented, advocated and disseminated with transcendent ability and success. From him his doctrines passed to that "apostolic succession" of Baptists, with John the elder, Turrettin, Willet, John Owen, and Jonathan Edwards; to the Synod of Dort (1618–19) and the Westminster Assembly (1638); and so to the churches of France, Switzerland, England, Scotland; to the Independents, the Baptists, and to the Presbyterians in all lands. The Episcopal Church of England and America, whatever may be the teachings of its different leaders, was, beyond controversy, in the intention of its founders, and in the first century of its history, and is yet in its doctrinal articles, essentially Augustinian.

Thus Calvinism exhibits its life by the very varieties it presents. In Germany it has been rendered less thorough and definite through the influence of the compromising school of Melanchthon. In Holland, England, and Scotland it has been modified in form by the "Federal Scheme," introduced by Cocceius and the Westminster divines. In America it has been coerced through more radical and more transient transformations, in the speculations of Hopkins, the younger Edwards, Emmons, N. W. Taylor, and others of the New-England school.

It is the best possible refutation of the charges often brought against it. 1. It has uniformly raised the moral standard of both individuals and communities by exalting the sovereignty of God, and emphasizing the moral law. Compare the Waldensians with the other Italians; Geneva under Calvin's rule with its condition before or since; the Huguenots with their Roman-Catholic fellow-citizens; the Jansenists with the Jesuits; the English Puritans with the courtiers of Charles II.; and, finally, all those sections of America settled by the Puritans and the Presbyterians of Scotland, France, and Holland, with those settled by men of other faiths; North America with South America. Calvinism makes giants of men. William the Silent and Cromwell, Knox and Bunyan, the Shorter Catechism fought through successfully the Revolutionary War.

2. As in personal character, so, of course, in government, both in Church and State. It promotes political freedom; it establishes religious liberty. Its principles strip the ministry of all sacramental powers. They make all men and all Christians equal before God. They make God absolute, and supreme over all, and the immediate Controller and Disposer of human affairs. Hence all churches accepting Calvinism, unless prevented by external conditions, have immediately adopted popular constitutions,—Presbyterian or Independent. The republic was established at the same time with presbytery at Geneva. The Mecklenburg Declaration (May 20, 1775) was adopted by twenty-seven delegates, nine of whom, including the president and secretary, were ruling elders; and one was a Presbyterian minister. The simple enumeration of the names of the great representative Calvinistic nationalities—the Waldenses, the Swiss, the Huguenots, the Hollanders, the Puritans, the Covenanters, the New-England Scotch-Irish Americans—proves this point beyond question.

3. The relation of Calvinism to education is no less conspicuous and illustrous. The little republic of Geneva became the sun of the European world. The Calvinists of France, notwithstanding their Scotch-Irish-American settlement and devotions,—leaders in this great work. They have excelled in the education of their mission educational organizations, and in the manly and Christian type of character they have formed in the converts they have gathered of all races and in all lands.

CAMALDULES.

(Camaldulani, Camaldulenses.) The founder of this order was Romualdus, b. at Ravenna, 550; d. at Val de Castro, June 11, 1027. In his twentieth year he entered the Monastery of Classe, near Ravenna; but monastic life did not fully satisfy him. Aspiring to a higher state of holiness, he left Classe in 766, and became an anchorite. After wandering about for several years in various directions, he settled in the neighborhood of Ravenna; not for a long time, though, in the same place. He easily gathered a circle of followers around him; and, whenever the organization of such a circle into a monastic community was finished, he removed into another place. Thus at Val de Castro he founded a flourishing establishment. In 1000 Otto III. visited him in the Island of Pereo. On his wanderings he reached as far as the frontier of Hungary; but, feeling no special calling for missionary work, he returned to Italy. In 1018 he formed a small establishment at Campus Malduli, at Arezzo, in the Apennines. In 1022 Henry II. visited him at Sitrien, near Saxoforato. A few years afterwards he retired to Val de Castro, and shut himself up in his cell. It was not wholly incidental that Campus Maldoli, Camaldoli, though one of the smallest of the establishments of Romualdus, became the centre of the whole movement. The spirit of seclusion and asceticism was kept pure here than in any of the other establishments. Camaldoli became the model institution; and its moral pre-eminence naturally led to social superiority. Meanwhile the movement itself was steadily spreading. Petrus Damianii wrote the life of Romualdus about 1040; and at his death (1072) there existed an order of Camaldules, not as a reformed branch of the order of the Benedictines, but as an independent association of anchorites. The prior was called Abbot. The members lived in separate huts, where they slept and ate. At certain hours they met in the prayer-house, and recited (not sang) the liturgy. They fasted often. Bread and water was their common diet; meat was not allowed. But the principal command was silence. The fourth major, Rudolf, was the first who put down the rules in writing (1102), at the same time mitigating them somewhat. A common table was introduced, wine was allowed, etc. He also established Camaldule nunneries (1080). In 1212 the anchorites were invited to Venice. Here they became cenobites, and their establishments became regular abbeys. But, as the order grew rich, its history developed the common stages through which all religious orders have run—deviation from the severe rules of life; gradual decay of order, moral and social; attempts at reform; separations, etc. In 1476 the Congregation of St. Michael of Murano was formed, independent of the authority of Camaldoli; and the celebrated monasteries of Classe, Val de Castro, and Fonte Avellana, were incorporated with this congregation. Other independent congregations existed in Northern Italy, in Germany, and in Austria. During the latter part of the eighteenth century, when great troubles befell the monks almost in all countries, the Camaldules fared better than their brethren. The order was abolished in Austria in 1782, afterwards also in France and Italy; but the monks were well treated with harshness. In 1822 the order was restored in Naples. Gregory XVI. belonged to it. Lit. — The life of Romualdus, by Petrus Damianni, is given by Mabillon in Ann. Ord. Benedict., III. and IV. The history of the order is found in HelioT : Histoire des Ordres Mon. Rel. et Mil., III. and IV. The history of the order is found in Histoire des Ordres Mon. Rel. et Mil., III. and IV.

Its second stomach is divided into hexagonal cells, which receive and retain for gradual use the water which is drunk; so that it can go for three or four days without drinking any (and even for twenty or thirty days in the spring, provided that, at starting, it had a full supply), if it can get the dew upon the herbs it eats. But this is only one of the wonderful provisions of God which fit it for great usefulness. Its foot is large, broad, cushiony, covered with a tough sole, so that it is insensible to the heat of the sand, and well-nigh incapable of slipping, or of sinking in it; callouses protect its breast and legs from cuts when kneeling upon stones; its nostrils close like valves, so that it can breathe, though the air be full of dust; its hoofs grow outwards; there is no hump. CAMERO. 385

able.

E. SCHWARZ. G. FLITT.

CAMERO, or CAMERON, John, b. in Glasgow about 1577; d. at Montauban, 1625; studied philosophy and philosophy in Glasgow; went in 1600 to Bordeaux, and became professor of philosophy at Sedan; studied theology for four years in Paris, Geneva, and Heidelberg, at the expense of the Reformed congregation of Bordeaux, and became its pastor in 1608; was appointed professor of theology at Saumur in 1618, and at Montauban in 1621, but was here, by his doctrine of passive obedience, brought into conflict with the fanatical spirit of resistance prevailing in the place, and died from injuries received in a riot. Amyraldus, Placeaux, and Cappellus were his pupils; and the whole theological school of Saumur, with its predi-clection for the doctrines of Piscator, with its views of the intellect as the primus motor of the will, in short, with its mitigated Calvinism, had its roots in him. He was not an Arminian, however, as is proved by his Amica Collatio cum Tileus, Leyden, 1621, and his Defensio de Gratia et Liber Arbitrio, Saumur, 1624. After his death, his works were collected and published in Geneva at the expense of the national synod. A. SCHWEIZER.

CAMERON, Rev. Andrew, D.D., was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, 1822, and died at St. Kilda, Melbourne, 1877. He was educated at the high school and university of his native city, where he acted as reporter for the Witness newspaper, which was edited by Hugh Miller. Early impressed by the want of attractive religious literature, especially for Sabbath reading, he projected and carried out the Christian Treasury in 1845, which, proving successful, may be regarded as the precursor of the numerous serials of this class with which we are now supplied. He afterwards organized and edited the Free Church Magazine, the British and Foreign Evangelical Review, and the Family Treasury. After long delay through pulmonary weakness, he at length entered on the work of the ministry at Maryton, Fifeshire, whence, in 1870, after his arrival in that colony he received the degree of "D.D." from Princeton. It was as a religious journalist, that, in Australia as in Scotland, he did his greatest work. He established, and till his death edited, the Southern Cross, an undenominational weekly religious newspaper of high tone, and extensive influence in those colo-dies. Dr. Cameron has been called the "Prince of Editors," a name not undeserved, as he led the way in a most important department of literature, and conducted the various publications with which he was connected with singular ability and judgment. He was also distinguished in the pulpit and in church courts. R. S. DUFF (of Tasmania).

CAMERONIANS. The name given to a body of Presbyterians, who, however, repudiate it, and call themselves "Reformed Presbyterians." Richard Cameron was one of the authors of the Sanquhar Declaration, published in 1680, in which Charles II. was declared to have forfeited allegiance, in consequence of his tyranny, and his disregard of the constitution. Cameron was killed in the battle of Airdmoss. Those who followed him were called Cameronians, and became somewhat numerous before the revolution. The societies welcomed King William; but they did not approve of the revolution settlement, and did not join the Established Church. They objected to the church, which had made many unworthy compromises; were displeased at the want of recognition of the covenants; did not consider that the independence of the church was secured; and generally believed that God was not sufficiently honored in the new settlement. They objected, too, to the recognition of Erastianism in England. In 1706 Rev. John Macmillan of Balmagie joined the societies, and was their first minister. In 1743, another minister having joined them, they constituted "the Reformed Presbytery." In 1774 a similar presbytery was formed in the United States. A presbytery was constituted likewise in Ireland. About 1863 most of the Scotch synod came to be of opinion that there was nothing in their principles require-ting them to abstain from countenancing the political institutions of the country, e.g., from voting for a member of Parliament; but a small minority having a different opinion, a disruption took place.
In 1876 a union took place between the larger body and the Free Church of Scotland.

torical Part of the Testimony, NADMYTH: Historical Sketch of the Reformed Presbyterian Church of CAMISARDS. (from camise, a jacket which the inhabitants of the Cevennes used to put on when fighting) is the name generally applied to those French Protestants, who, in the reign of Louis XIV., rose in arms in Languedoc, and waged a bloody war (1702-05) for the purpose of restoring their Church. Neither the dragonnades nor the revocation of the Edict of Nantes succeeded in destroying Protestantism in France; but, though private worship was never forbidden, new laws were steadily enforced which made it more and more difficult, and at last almost impossible, for a French citizen to adhere to the Reformed concession. In 1686 the gatherings in the desert were forbidden, and fines, confiscations, the dron, the torches, and the scorching of the earth employed as punishments. Nevertheless, with the pressure grew the power of resistance. Religious meetings were held during night in secluded places, presided over by simple people, but fervent in prayers and exhortations; and distinguished men, such as Claude Brousson, Isaac Homel, and others, encouraged this passive resistance by a perseverance unto martyrdom.

As was natural, the miseries of the present forced up, as a necessary counterbalance, a corresponding hope of the future; and books like Jurieu's L'Accomplissement des Propheties, Rotterdam, 1686, and Suite de l'Accomplissement, 1687, in which he predicted the speedy downfall of the Papacy, contributed to give shape and direction to this unconscious movement. A certain Guillaume du Serre appeared as prophet in Dauphiné in 1688. Others followed his example. The number increased rapidly. Women and children became "possessed by the spirit." In the trance, when seized by convulsions, they saw the troops from the far-off garrisons come marching towards the place, they singed out those among their comrades who should fall in the encounter, they recognized the traitors among them, etc.; and these predictions, sent forth intermingled with words of penitence, prayer, and exhortation, were always accepted with reverence and confidence, and often they proved true. There was disease in all this,—a kind of mental epidemic. But there was also a heightening and intensification of the religious life, which attracted the wondering but sympathetic attention of the whole Protestant world, and which ought to be sheltered from any coarse imputation. At all events, if this psychological fact is left out of view, the enthusiasm and obstinacy of the Camisards is unintelligible.

The movement, however, of 1688–89, was speedily suppressed; but when the expectations of the Protestants were completely disappointed by the peace of Ryswick (1697), the fermentation began again. The Roman priests noticed, with much chagrin, that the newly-converted stood away from the churches, and took to the desert. François de Langlade du Chayla undertook to punish the refractory. At his parsonage at Pont de Montvert, in the present department of Lozère, he built a donjon, in which he shut up his guilty parishioners, and tortured them as best he could. On the instigation of the prophets Séguier, Cordere, and Mazel, the Camisards assembled, and in the night of July 23, 1702, they surrounded the house, stormed the donjon, while chanting their hymns, liberated the prisoners, and burnt the parsonage, and slew the priest. Bâville, the intendant of Langloise, and a man as heartless as a millstone, felt a particular satisfaction in pursuing the guilty. Séguier was caught, and burnt at the stake Aug. 12; but the rest escaped among the mountains, where they soon were re-enforced by new throngs formed by Castanet, Catinat, Roland, and others. In Jean Cavalier they found an able leader. He was born in 1680 at Ribae, in the present department of Gard,—a small and plain-looking fellow, but full of courage and determination, a baker by profession, but of decided military talent. Bâville, the stake and the gibbet, the rack and the galley, was unable to finish the affair. But in February, 1703, Marshal Montrevel arrived at the spot with a regular army-corps. He beat the Camisards repeatedly,—at La Jonguière, March 6; at La Tour de Bélot, April 29. He was effectively aided by loyal bands of "crusaders" kept in prison for twenty-seven years by a bull of Pope Clement XI., May 1, 1703. He employed such means as razing all the single houses and minor villages in the Upper Cevennes, whereby he made seven thousand persons houseless. Nevertheless, he, too, was unable to put down the rebellion. The Camisards never numbered more than five thousand, and they had no military organization. But they fought with despair, relying forth, with the agony of revenge in their hearts, to burn the churches, and hang the priest; and they fought with enthusiasm too, marching into the battle with the Psalms on their lips. In their camps they lived as in a church, preaching, praying, and fasting; and many brilliant victories they won,—the most brilliant at Sainte Chatte, March 15, 1704. But in April of that year Marshal Montrevel was replaced by Marshal Villars. He was in possession of the whole district and the surrounding the whole district with a line of strong military posts, thus cutting off all communication between the rebels and the outside world; and then he offered pardon to all, who, within a certain term, laid down arms, and surrendered. Cavalier, who saw that further resistance was useless, left the country, fought afterwards against his countrymen in Holland, Italy, and Spain, and settled finally in England. There he became Governor of Jersey, and died at Chelsea, May 18, 1740. Roland fell Aug. 14, 1704. Castanet, Catinat, Joanni, etc., fled to Geneva. Without leaders, the Camisard army gradually melted away. Towards the close of 1705 peace and order were restored; but desolation and destitution had in the mean time spread over one of the richest and most fertile provinces of France.

CAMPANELLA, Thomas, b. at Stilo, Calabria, Sept. 5, 1568; d. in Paris, March 21, 1639; entered the Dominican order in his sixteenth year, but devoted himself chiefly to the study of philosophy; was imprisoned for twenty-seven years by the Spanish Government of Naples, on account of certain social and political speculations, but was finally rescued by the Pope, Urban VIII.; lived for some time in Rome, but, not feeling safe there, repaired in 1634 to France, where Cardinal Richelieu gave him a pension. Strongly opposed to Aristotle, on account of the discrepancy he found between that which Nature herself showed and that which the school taught, his idea was to produce an altogether new philosophy; but this new philosophy should at no point come in conflict with Scripture, or the church, or theology. On the contrary, though a bold innovator in philosophy, he was very conservative, almost ultramontane, in theology. The Reformation was to him an abomination. Of his numerous writings, those which best characterize his position in philosophy and theology are: A theismus Triumphatus seu reductio ad religionem per scientiam veritatis. . . .
CAMPANAS, Johannes, b. at Maeseick, in the diocese of Liège, in the beginning of the sixteenth century; came to Wittenberg in 1528; was present at the Conference of Marburg, but could gain no hearing for his peculiar conception of the Lord's Supper, differing equally much from the Reformed, the Lutheran, and the Roman-Catholic; was for some time during his residence in Saxony put on suspicion of anti-trinitarian and anabaptistic heresies; repaired to Julich, where he caused great excitement among the peasants by preaching that the end of the world was speedily approaching; was again imprisoned, and died insane. His anti-trinitarian and anabaptist views he developed in two works, Wider alle Welt nach den Aposteln, and Göttliche und heilige Schrift, of which the former is lost. He held there were only two creeds; repaired to Julich, where he caused some time during his stay in Saxony imprisonment.

CAMPBELL, Alexander, founder of the Disciples of Christ (see title); b. in the county of Antrim, Ireland, Sept. 12, 1788; d. March 4, 1866. He was educated at the University of Glasgow, and came to America as a licentiate of the Seceder Church, Scotland. His father, a minister of the same denomination, had been for two years settled in Western Pennsylvania. Young Campbell had expected opposition to his changed views in theology, but found his father altered and liberalized; confirmed, probably, in the new direction, because of an ecclesiastical trial he had stood for inviting to the communion of members of other Presbyterian churches. Under him he continued his studies, and preached his first sermon July 15, 1810. He rapidly became widely popular. Many regarded the views of father and son as both novel and objectionable; hence they and the few who at first sided with them formed an isolated congregation, called "The Christian Association," organized as the "Brush Run Church," with Thomas Campbell (1786-1854) the father, as its elder, several deacons, and Alexander Campbell as its licensed preacher. The main points of this teaching in the early stages of the movement were: "The Christian union can result from nothing short of the destruction of creeds and confessions of faith, inasmuch as human creeds and confessions have destroyed Christian union;" "Nothing ought to be received into the faith and worship of the church, or be made a term of communion among Christians, that is not as old as the New Testament, or ought any thing to be admitted as of divine obligation in the church constitution or management, save what is enjoined by the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ and his apostles upon the New Testament church, either in express terms or by approved precedent." The Bible and nothing else was their confession of faith or creed. Mr. Campbell's marriage in 1812 with the daughter of a Presbyterian turned his attention to an examination of the Scripture mode of baptism, which was determined, after careful, earnest discussion, to be that of immersion. Consequently, he and his father, and the majority of the members of his church, with their families, were immersed on June 12, 1812, by Elder Loos, a Baptist minister, to whom he said, "I have come out to follow the apostles of Christ, and their Master, and I will be baptized only into the primitive Christian faith." Next the congregation, acting as they believed, in accordance with the New Testament church constitution or authority of our Lord Jesus Christ and his apostles, came widely popular. Many regarded the views of father and son as both novel and objectionable.

In 1810 he founded at Bethany, W. Va., Bethany College, in which the Bible was made a textbook. Mr. Campbell was a famous debater: indeed, by his first public debate he may be said to have called public attention to the existence of his denomination. This was at Mount Pleasant, O., in 1820, with the Rev. John Walker of Ohio, a Presbyterian, on the subject of baptism. Again, upon the same subject, he debated in 1823 at Washington, Ky., with the Rev. William McCalla, another Presbyterian; in 1828, at Cincinnati, with Robert Owen, on the Truth of Christianity; in 1830 with Archbishop Purcell of Ohio, in the same city, on the Infallibility of the Church of Rome; and in 1843, with the Rev. Dr. N. L. Rice, at Lexington, Ky., on the distinctive points of his communion. Mr. Campbell was gifted with a fine presence, great ease and skill of utterance, and possessed considerable information. His private life was stainless, and full of Christian grace. He was the author of The Christian System (often reprinted), Remission of Sin, 3d ed., 1846, Memoirs of Thomas Campbell, Cincinnati, 1861. See Richardson: Memoir of A. Campbell, Philadelphia, 1868. See Disciples of Christ.
His Lectures on Ecclesiastical History were posthumously printed: there is an edition, London, 1810. His works have been issued in a complete edition in 8 vols.

CAMPBELL, John M'Leod, b. May 4, 1800, at Ardmaddy House, near Kilninver, Argyllshire, Scotland; d. in the parish of Rosneath, Feb. 27, 1872. His father was the minister of Kilninver, and an excellent Latin scholar: so his son received good early training. From 1811 to 1820 he was a student of the University of Glasgow, but completed his course in Edinburgh. In 1821 he was licensed; and on Sept. 8, 1825, he was inducted to the parish of Row, and faithfully did he discharge his duties. His anxious meditation on the religious state of his congregation led him to the conclusion, that, in order to serve God with pure love, they must rest “assured of his love in Christ to them as individuals, and of their individually having eternal life given to them in Christ.” This “assurance,” further, rested on the promises of the gospel; but, unless Christ died for the ungodly, (Rom. 5:8), there was “no sufficient warrant for calling upon men to be assured of God's love to them.” By manfully preaching these views he involved himself in a church trial for heresy, and was in due course deposed by the Assembly, Wednesday, May 25, 1831, by a majority of a hundred and nineteen to six. He went back to Kilninver, preached throughout the neighborhood, and at last, in the first week of 1833, began an independent ministry in Glasgow, which lasted for twenty-six years (1833-April, 1859). He was married on Sept. 26, 1838. In 1851 he published his book on the Eucharist, Christ the Bread of Life (2d ed., 1869), suggested by the then Roman-Catholic controversy. He rejected transubstantiation, because it contradicts the faculty of perception, which distinguishes man as a spiritual being. “There is a spiritual eye which sees that in Christ is presented to us the appropriate food of eternal life; and to fix the thoughts on him was the proper office of the Lord's Supper. As long as it was itself the object on which thought and interest were concentrated, so long it was misused; and this misuse of the ordinance was as possible, if not as common, among Protestants, as among Roman-Catholics.” In 1856 he issued his chief work, The Nature of the Atonement, and its Relation to Remission of Sins and Eternal Life (4th ed., 1873). By one of its sentences the main thesis of the book may be thus expressed: “It was the spiritual essence and nature of the sufferings of Christ, and not that these sufferings were penal, which constituted their value as entering into the atonement made by the Son of God, when he put away sin by the sacrifice of himself.” In 1859 he was compelled by failing health to resign his charge at Glasgow. In 1862 he published Thoughts on Revelation, with Special Reference to the Present Time, a book called forth by the Essays and Reviews (1860). In 1868 the University of Glasgow made him a doctor of divinity. In 1870 he removed his home from the neighborhood of Glasgow to Rosneath, to his old house Ach-na-shue (“The Field of Peace”), an old local name. In this house, appropriately named, he partially prepared the volume which appeared in 1873, under the title Reminiscences and Reflections, referring to his early ministry in the parish of Row (1823-31); and then, with his book unfinished, but with his life-work done, at peace with God and man, honored and beloved by all who knew him, a channel of God's grace unto many, this eminent and gifted servant went to his higher service. The impression Dr. Campbell made upon all his acquaintances was that of holiness. Dr. Norman Macleod said of him, “His character was the most perfect embodiment I have ever seen of the character of Jesus Christ.” His readers testify to his sincere, humble, profoundly piety; and, where his theory of the atonement is unqualifiedly rejected, his personal charm is unhesitatingly acknowledged.

CAMPÉ, Joachim Heinrich, b. at Deensen, in the grand-duchy of Brunswick, 1746; d. in the city of Brunswick, Oct. 22, 1818; was chaplain to a Prussian regiment, and director of Baseow's Philanthropinum at Dessau; established afterwards a boarding-school for boys near Hamburg, and settled finally at Brunswick, where he wrote and edited whole children's literature. Many of his books, as for instance Robinson der Jüngere, became almost world-famous, and are still very popular. His educational principle was exclusively rationalistic. Religion he recognized only as a prop for morality, and poesy he rejected altogether, as a snare to the intellect. But the success with which he labored made him one of the most prominent champions of rationalism in Germany.

CAMPÉQUIUS (Lorenzo Campeggi), b. at Bologna, 1471; d. in Rome, 1539; was first professor of canon law at Padua, and then priest. Julius II. used him in many important diplomatical cases; and Leo X. made him a cardinal in 1517. The principal events in his career are his missions to England in 1510 and in 1528, and his negotiation of a counter-reformation in Regensburg in 1524. He represented the Pope at the diets of Nuremberg (1524) and Augsburg (1530), and played a conspicuous part at the election of Paul III., 1534. Some letters by him are found in Epist. misc. sing. Pera., Basel, 1550.

CAMPION, Edmund, b. in London, Jan. 25, 1540; executed at Tyburn, Dec. 1, 1551; studied at Oxford, and was ordained a deacon in 1565, but felt himself at variance with the tenets of the Church of England; went to Ireland, thence to Douay; embraced Romanism, and entered the Society of Jesus. In 1590 he was sent by Gregory XIII. on a propagandist mission to England, but was arrested July 1, 1581, on a charge of treason, and condemned to death. He wrote A Narratio de Dei Corpore Henrici VIII., published at Douay, 1622, and A History of Ireland, published in Dublin, 1633. For a full account of his mission to England see Froude: History of Ireland, XI. He was a man of rare culture, amiability, and diplomatic skill.

CAMP-MEETINGS are religious gatherings held in a grove, usually lasting for several days, during which many find shelter in tents or temporary houses. The main features are the open-air preaching, the night prayer-meetings, and the freedom of the life. They are not so common as formerly, at least in the Eastern States, and... are, indeed, regarded by some as morally if not spiritually objectionable. The first meeting of the kind is said to have taken place in Kentucky, on the banks of the Red River, in 1790, under a Presbyterian and a Methodist minister. These denominations at first used them in common; but gradually the Presbyterians withdrew, and of late years the Methodists and the Baptists have almost exclusively held them. In recent times the Methodists have purchased tracts of land in desirable locations on the seaboard or inland, and turned them into parks, with comfortable houses, streets, post-offices, meeting-places, biblical models, etc., and there in the summer many persons live, and there the religious gatherings of different kinds are daily held. Thus the primitive camp-meeting is continued in an improved form. The credit of introducing camp-meetings into England is due to the Rev. Lorenzo Dow (see title), an able minister of Methodist views, who in 1807 proposed it in Staffordshire. Two Methodists, William Clowes and Hugh Bourne, were so impressed with the advantages of this style of service, that they persisted in holding them after they were disapproved by the Wesleyan Conference in 1807; for doing which they were finally expelled. In 1810 they founded the Primitive Methodists, which body uses the camp-meeting. The Irish Wesleyans commenced them in 1860. See art. "Camp-meeting" in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopaedia (vol. 2, p. 60).

Camus, Jean Pierre, b. in Paris, 1582; d. there 1632; became Bishop of Belley in 1608, and lived in great intimacy with Francois de Sales; resigned in 1628; was afterwards Abbot of Saint-Denis, but retired finally to the Hôpital des Incurables in Paris. He was an extremely prolific writer, and much relished in his own time. A hundred and eighty-six works, many of which are in several volumes, were the result of his labor,— moral romances of a rather mendicant orders, etc. His L'Esprit de St. François de Sales, 6 vols., Paris, 1641, afterwards abridged by Collot, and his L'Ascencion des protestants de l'Eglise Romaine, edited by Richard Simon, Paris, 1763, are still read.

The history of Canaan is recorded in the Bible. The Israelites, after the conquest, had to deal with the Canaanites who inhabited the land. The Canaanites were described as a warlike people, and their land flowing with milk and honey was a temptation to the Israelites. However, God warned them not to be charmed by the Canaanites and their wealth.

The Canaanites were known for their agricultural knowledge and skills in trade and manufacture. They were also known for their religious practices, which included worshiping Baal and Astarte. The Canaanites were segmented into smaller tribes, which led to internal conflicts and (Deut. xiv. 2).

The Canaanites were eventually destroyed by the Israelites, who under Joshua and later leaders such as Saul and David, exercised military and political control. The Israelites established a kingdom, which was later divided into the northern kingdom of Israel and the southern kingdom of Judah.

The Canaanites were also known for their material culture, as evidenced by records such as Hatti. The Canaanites left behind artifacts and inscriptions that provide insight into their way of life, including their use of gold and ivory in decoration.

In conclusion, the Canaanites played a significant role in the early history of the land that would later become Israel. Their influence and eventual demise are a testament to the power and perseverance of the Israelites under divine guidance.
In 1867 the government of Canada became vested in a commercial company of a hundred partners, with Champlain as governor, while the name of New France was used in the charter now issued. In 1663 the company was dissolved, and Canada became again a royal province, with its affairs administered by a council, consisting of the governor—who was responsible for all military measures, the bishop—in charge of the religious and educational interests, and the intendant, or civil governor—having charge of the finances and all matters affecting trade and commerce, along with a few other officials (the inhabitants having no representation)—a system that continued in operation for a hundred years. During this period, hunters and traders finding their way westward came into collision with the English settlers in Western Pennsylvania and Ohio; and this, combined with the constant troubles with the New-England colonies,—territorial boundaries being all undefined,—led to war. Though France and Britain were nominally at peace in Europe, yet each openly assisted their respective colonists in their local conflicts. At last, in 1759, Wolfe gained, under the walls of Quebec, the decisive victory of the Plains of Abraham, which resulted in the cession of Canada to England; the vanquished securing, as conditions of surrender, the continued exercise of “their language, their religion, and their laws.” British emigrants now began to settle along the banks of the St. Lawrence; while in 1790 large tracts of land in the Niagara district were given to loyalist refugees from the revolted colonies of America. In 1791 Canada, hitherto under a military government-appointed by the Crown, received a constitution; and the upper, or western section, which was exclusively British, was separated from the lower, or eastern one, which was as exclusively French and Roman-Catholic; each division having an Upper House, or Legislative Council, appointed by the Crown, and a Lower House, or Assembly, elected by the people, along with a governor. After some years, dissatisfaction arose in both provinces against the government; while in addition, in Lower Canada, race and religious antagonism became manifest. These things brought the country, in 1837-38, to the verge of civil war, but resulted finally in the formation of a legislative union between the provinces, with Kingston as the capital. The old dissensions, however, soon reappeared; so that the great project of a federation of the several North-American provinces under a Federal Government, having a Senate and a House of Commons, but with Provincial or State Legislatures, each independent for all local purposes, was adopted in 1867, by which the two Canadas, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, were formed into “The Dominion of Canada,” with Ottawa for its capital. In 1870 the newly-formed province of Manitoba, in 1871 British Columbia, and in 1872 Prince Edward Island, entered the Dominion. In 1873, that of the West was added by the union of the North-west territories. In 1870 the newly-formed provinces were represented in both Houses; while about 85,000 are Indians, who have lived in unbroken friendship with the government. Formerly Canada was known only as a lumber and fur-producing country, having in addition some valuable fisheries; but of late it has been exporting large amounts of farm-produce and cattle. Its mineral resources of gold, silver, copper, iron, and coal, are only now becoming known. Manufactories of a great variety of articles are springing up all over the country; while its immense wheat-growing prairie territory of Manitoba and the North-west offers homes for countless emigrants.

Canada is a self-governing country, with a parliamentary system, copied largely from that of Great Britain. The franchise is almost universal. The ministers must be sustained by a majority of the House of Commons; while the governor-general, though appointed by England, merely represents the British connection, and possesses no political authority whatever.

Religion.—The Roman-Catholic Church in Canada dates from the discovery, for Huguenots were allowed to settle, only on conditions that soon proved fatal to their religion. In 1615 four Recollet priests (a branch of the Franciscans) settled in Quebec, to found the establishment. In 1624 the Jesuits arrived, and began their missionary and educational labors. In 1658 François Laval was sent out as vicar apostolic of New France, becoming first bishop of Quebec in 1672. Under him the church system was further organized. One-twentieth of all the revenue (a proportion afterwards reduced to one-twenty-sixth) was collected as the tithe, or dîme, for church-purposes. The bishop, though appointed by the Pope, must be subject to the king of France, while the parish curés were declared to be permanent in their offices. For some time after the conquest, the see of Quebec remained vacant, as the English Government would recognize its occupant only as the head of the Roman Church in Canada, and not as the bishop of that city. The difficulty was, however, that of by sale or grant to colonists was “reserved.” The Episcopal Church in British North America dates from the conquest. In 1700 the first Episcopal congregation was organized in Montreal; service being held in the chapel of the Recollets, at such hours as the building was not required for mass. In 1774, while the Roman-Catholic Church was secured in all its previous rights, it was restricted to collecting its church-dues from members of its own communion, and the purpose was intimated of establishing a Protestant Church. In 1791, when the constitutional act was adopted, one-seventh of all the land in the colony disposed of by sale or grant to colonists was “reserved” for the support of a Protestant clergy. In 1797 Dr. Inglis was appointed by the Bishop of Nova Scotia,—the first of the colonial bishops; in 1793 Dr. Mountain was appointed Bishop of Quebec; and in 1837 the see of Montreal was instituted. Since then, other sees have been organized, until now the Episcopal Church, which has no connection with the Church in England, possesses fifteen bishops, with about six hundred and fifty ministers, and theological seminaries at Emmaville, Kenmore, London, Windsor (N.S.), and Toronto.

The Presbyterian Church dates from 1765, when the chaplain of the Twenty-first Regiment began service in Quebec. In 1798 Presbyterian ministers were sent out from Scotland to Nova Scotia. In a little while the numerous divisions of the Scottish Church were reproduced on North-American soil; but of these it is not necessary now to speak, as after a series of local and partial unions, these all, reduced in number to four, — the Church of Scotland, the Canada Presbyterian Church, the Presbyterian Church of the Lower provinces, and the Presbyterian Church of the Maritime provinces in connection with the Church of Scotland, — entered, in 1765, into a union under the name of “The Presbyterian Church in Canada.” This united church now consists of about fifteen hundred congregations, with a hundred and thirteen thousand communicants; raised in 1881 a million and a quarter of dollars; and has theological seminaries at Halifax, Quebec, Montréal, Kingston, Toronto, and Winnepesaukee.

The Methodist Church dates from the presence of the London Missionary Society in Nova Scotia, in 1759, of some New-England Puritans, who were guaranteed full liberty of worship, and exemption from all disabilities, for not conforming to the Episcopal Church. In the Province of Canada it dates from 1801, when the London Missionary Society sent out an agent to Quebec to minister to a number of soldiers in the garrison there; while in 1810 the society sent an agent to Upper Canada. In 1827 the Canada Educational and Home Missionary Society was formed of Congregationalists and Presbyterians. In 1833 the Congregational ministers, received a legal status as ministers of religion. In 1840 a theological seminary was established in Toronto, which in 1864 was removed to Montreal. The present strength (1881) of Congregationalism in the Dominion is six associations, about one hundred and fifteen churches, and about seven thousand communicants.

The Methodist Church dates from the presence in Quebec, shortly after the conquest, of some soldiers of that persuasion; and subsequently Methodists from New York formed congregations in what is now Ontario. These congregations at first received their ministers from the United States, and formed an integral part of the Methodist-Episcopal Church of that country. In 1816 the English Methodist Church sent out agents, who opened several stations; so that in 1820 it was agreed that the English Church should have sole charge of Lower Canada, and the American one of that of Upper Canada. In 1824 the Canadian Methodists were formed into a general Conference of their own, and in 1828 separated from the American Church, becoming independent. In 1832 the “Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada,” as it was then called, united with the English Wesleyan Methodist Conference. This was followed by the formation, in 1834, of the “Methodist-Episcopal Church in Canada,” claiming to represent the original Canadian Methodist Church. In 1873 a union was effected between a number of the Methodist organizations of the different Canadian provinces. As the result of this we have now “The Methodist Church of Canada,” with fifteen conferences that include the whole Dominion, and about twelve hundred congregations; the “British Methodist-Episcopal Church in Canada,” with about sixty congregations; and the “Methodist-Episcopal Church in Canada,” having nearly three hundred congregations. There are several other branches of the Methodist Church, such as “The Evangelical Association,” or “Allbright Methodists,” or “The Bible Christian Church in Canada;” but these do not amount to more than perhaps two hundred congregations in all, and have their locations almost exclusively in the Province of Ontario.

There are several small bodies of Lutheran churches also, for the most part in Ontario.

The Baptist Church has about five hundred congregations in different parts of the Dominion.

Educational institutions were early established in Canada. In the early part of the seventeenth century, the Recollets, the Jesuits, and the Ursuline nuns, opened schools in Quebec, while the Sulpicians did the same in Montreal. Until the present century, however, boys could receive a superior education only in either of these cities; while numerous schools had been established for the benefit of girls. Some time ago an admirable system of public instruction was adopted by each of the present provinces of the Dominion, but with such modifications as might be required to meet circumstances and the peculiar religious condition of each locality; so that, by means of primary or secondary, high and normal schools, leading up to the university, a good education has been brought within the reach of almost every child throughout the Dominion. The expenses of the system are met by government grants, local assessments, and school fees. Masters of high schools must be university graduates, and experienced teachers. Teachers of public schools must be regularly qualified. G. D. MATTHEWS (of Quebec).

CANDACE was the title of the queens of the Ethiopian realm situated north of Meroe, with the capital Napata. From Alexander the Great, and down to the time of Eugenius, we meet with Ethiopian queens of this name, whose etymology is obscure, though apparently not Semitic. It seems that in Ethiopia the queen-widow succeeded to the throne, and that, as long as she lived, the son occupied only the second place. See LEXIUS: Briefe aus Ägypten, 1852, pp. 181, 217. In Acts viii. 27 is mentioned an eunuch who was treasurer to the reigning Candace. He was a "proselyte of the Gate," since he had come up to Jerusalem to worship; but he was not a Jew, since he was an eunuch (Deut. xxxii.). On his return from Jerusalem he met with the apostle Philip between Asdod and Gaza, and was converted and baptized. According to a loose tradition his name was Judas. He brought the first seeds of Christianity to Ethiopia; but the real evangelization of the country took place much

CANDIDUS, an Arian controversialist from the middle of the fourth century, wrote a book, De Generatione Divini Verbi, and addressed it to his friend, the celebrated African rhetorician, Victorinus, on the occasion of his conversion to Christianity. The book called forth an answer from Victorinus, Confutatorium Candidi Ariani; and the two works are generally printed together. See Migne: Patrologia, 7, III. 2.

CANDLES, use of, in divine service. There is no trace of their use during the first three Christian centuries; for Lactantius (253-330) says, "If they (the heathen) would contemplate that heavenly light which we call the sun, they will at once perceive how God has no need of their candles. But our lampshades are filled with the holy oil and wax. The Roman Church forbids even stearine candles. The candles were and are exclusively wax. The Roman Church forbids even stearine candles. Wax was chosen on account of its odor and its costliness; for we ought to give God our best and costliest. At mass, at least two tapers must burn upon the altar; they are carried in by the designated ceroferarii: so, in other ceremonies, candles were used, and a symbolical meaning found. Thus the baptism candles spoke of the light of the good works by which heaven was entered; the marriage candles, of the purity and joy of the heart; the burial candles, of the eternal light of heaven. The Reformed Church has properly rejected the use of candles, as savouring too much of that heathenism whence the custom was borrowed," by H. MERZ (in Herzog's Lex.).
