A

RELIGIOUS ENCYCLOPÆDIA:

OR

DICTIONARY

OF

BIBLICAL, HISTORICAL, DOCTRINAL, AND PRACTICAL THEOLOGY.

BASED ON THE REAL-ENCYCLOPÄDIE OF HERZOG, PLITT, AND HAUCK.

EDITED BY

PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D., LL.D.,
PROFESSOR IN THE UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, NEW YORK.

ASSOCIATE EDITORS:

REV. SAMUEL M. JACKSON AND REV. D. S. SCHAFF.

VOLUME III.

REVISED EDITION.

NEW YORK:
THE CHRISTIAN LITERATURE COMPANY.
1889.
PREFACE.

THIS volume concludes the Religious Encyclopædia in advance of the German original. The revised edition of Herzog has so far reached only the thirteenth volume, to article "Ring;" but, by the kindness of the German editor and publisher, I had the benefit of several advanced sheets of letter S. For the remaining titles the editors used the last seven volumes of the first edition (XIV.-XXI., published 1861–66, to which was added an Index volume in 1868). The best articles, which will be retained in the new edition, have been reproduced, condensed and supplemented to date by competent hands. But fully one-half of the volume is made up of original matter, with the aid of a large number of English and American scholars who are known to be familiar with the topics assigned to them. For their kind and hearty co-operation we again return our sincere thanks.

The three volumes of this work are equivalent in size to about seven or eight volumes of the German work on which it is based. Our aim has been to put the reader in possession of the substance of Herzog, with such additional information as the English reader needs, and cannot expect from a German work written exclusively for German readers. It is simply impossible to make an encyclopaedia of one country and people answer the wants of another, without serious changes and modifications. Moreover, an encyclopaedia ought to be reconstructed every ten years; and it is hoped that this work will renew its youth and usefulness as soon as the present edition is out of date.

With the reception of the work I have every reason to be satisfied. It has met with a hearty welcome, and secured a permanent place in the reference-library of ministers, students, and intelligent laymen of all denominations. Competent judges acknowledge its impartiality and catholicity, as well as the ability of the leading articles, which are written and signed by conscientious scholars of established reputation. The plan of condensation has been generally approved, as the only feasible way by which such a vast thesaurus of German learning could be made accessible and useful to the English reader. Errors and defects in a work which embraces many thousands of facts and dates are unavoidable; but pains have been taken to secure strict accuracy, and mistakes are corrected in the plates as soon as discovered.

The completed work is now committed to the favor of the public with the prayer that God may bless its use for the promotion of sound Christian learning.

NEW YORK, Feb. 1, 1884.

PHILIP SCHAFF.

AUTHORIZATION.

We the undersigned, Editors and Publisher of the "Real-Encyklopädie für Prot. Theologie und Kirche," hereby authorize the Rev. Dr. Schaff of New York to make free use of this work for the preparation and publication, in the United States and in England, of a similar although much shorter work, under the title "A Religious Encyclopedia, based on the Real-Encyklopädie of Herzog, Pfitt, and Hauck."

(Signed).

Herzog, Professor

Dr. Hart, Professor

Erlangen und Leipzig, December, 1881.
LIST OF WRITERS.

The special contributors to the American edition of this work are distinguished by a star.

*ABBOT, Ezra, D.D., LL.D., Professor in the Divinity School of Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass. (D. 1884.)

ACQUOY, J. G. R., D.D., Professor in Leyden.

ALEXANDER, Archibald, Ph.D., Professor in Columbia College, New-York City.

ALT, Heinrich, D.D., Pastor in Berlin.

ARCHINARD, André, Pastor in Geneva.

ARNOLD, Friedrich August, D.D., Professor in Halle. (D. 1889.)

AUBERLEN, Carl August, D.D., Professor of Theology in Basel. (D. 1864.)

*AVERY, Giles B., Mount Lebanon, Columbia County, N.Y.

AYRES, Anne, Miss, St. Johns, N.Y.

BACHMANN, Johann, D.D., Professor in Rostock.

*BAIRD, Henry Martyn, D.D., LL.D., Professor in the University of the City of New York.

BAUDISSIN, Count Wolf Wilhelm Friedrich, D.D., Professor of Theology in Marburg.

BECK, Carl, Prät in Schwäbisch Hall.

BECK, Hermann, Pastor in Ostermoch.

*BEDELL, Gregory Thurston, D.D., Bishop of the Protestant-Episcopal Diocese of Ohio, Cleveland.

*BEECHER, Edward, D.D., Brooklyn, N.Y.

*BEECHER, Willis Judson, D.D., Professor of Hebrew, Theological Seminary, Auburn, N.Y.

BEMRATHE, Carl, Ph.D., Professor in Bonn.

*BERGER, Daniel, D.D., Dayton, O.

BERTHEAU, Carl, D.D., Pastor in Hamburg.

BERTHEAU, Ernst, D.D., Professor of Oriental Philology in Göttingen.

*BEVAN, Llewelyn D., D.D., Pastor in Melbourne, Australia.

BEYER, Johann Heinrich Franz, Pastor in Nedemin.

BEYTSCHLAG, Willibald, D.D., Professor of Theology in Halle.

*BIRD, Frederick Mayer, Rev., Professor in Lehigh University, South Bethlehem, Penn.

*BERRING, Nicholas, Rev., New-York City.

*BLAIR, William, D.D., Dunblane, Scotland.

*BLISS, George Ripley, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Biblical Exegesis, Crozer Theological Seminary, Chester, Penn.

BOEHMER, Eduard, Ph.D., Professor in Strassburg.

*BOMBERGER, J. H. A., D.D., President of Ursinus College, Freeland, Penn.

BONNET, L., Ph.D., Pastor in Frankfurt-am-M.

*BRIGGS, Charles Augustus, D.D., Professor of Hebrew in the Union Theological Seminary, New-York City.

*BROADUS, John Albert, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Theology in the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Ky.

BROCKHAUS, Carl, Leipzig.

*BROWN, Francis, D.D., Professor in the Union Theological Seminary, New-York City.

*BROWNE, John, Rev., Wrentham, Suffolk, Eng.

BUCHRUCKER, Dekan in Munich.

RÜHSENSCHÜTZ, Georg, Pastor in St. Denis.

BUNZ, Georg, Ph.D., Pastor in Ohmenhausen.

BURGER, Karl, Pastor in Kempten.

BURK, Carl, Pastor in Stuttgart, Württemberg.

*CAIRNS, John, D.D., Principal of the United Presbyterian College, Edinburgh.

*CALAMINUS, Emilio, D.D., Professor in Elberfeld.

*CALDERWOOD, Henry, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Moral Philosophy, University of Edinburgh.

*CALDWELL, Samuel Lunt, D.D., ex-President of Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N.Y.

*CAPEN, Elmer Hewitt, D.D., President of Taft College, College Hill, Mass.

*CARROLL, Henry King, LL.D., New-York City.

CARSTENS, Propst in Tondern.

CASSEL, Paulus, D.D., Professor in Berlin.

*CATTELL, J. P., Miss, Philadelphia.

*CATTELL, William Casbady, D.D., LL.D., Ex-President of Lafayette College, Easton, Penn.

*CHAMBERS, Talbot Wilson, D.D., LL.D., Col- legiate Reformed Dutch Church, New-York City.

*CHASE, Thomas, LL.D., President of Haverford College, Montgomery Co., Penn.

CHRISTLIEB, Theodore, D.D., Professor of Practical Theology in Bonn.

COMBA, Emilio, D.D., Professor in Florence.

*COOK, Albert S., Professor in the University of California.

*CORNING, J. Leonard, Morristown, N.J.

*COXE, Arthur Cleveland, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of Western New York, Buffalo, N.Y.

*CREIGHTON, Mandell, D.D., Professor of Church History, University of Cambridge, Eng.

CREMER, Hermann, D.D., Professor of Theology in Greifswald.

*CROOKS, George R., D.D., LL.D., Professor of Church History in Drew Theological Seminar, Madison, N.J.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Writer Name</th>
<th>Title and Location</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Cunitz, E., D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Strassburg</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Curtis, Samuel Ives, Ph.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Old-Testament Literature</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dale, James Wilkinson, D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Theology, University of Texas, Austin (D. 1891)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dales, John Blakey, D.D.,</td>
<td>Philadelphia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Delitzsch, Friedrich, Ph.D.,</td>
<td>Professor in Leipzig</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Delitzsch, Franz, D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Leipzig</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Deems, C. F., D.D., LL.D.,</td>
<td>New-York City</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>De Hoop Schaffner, J. G., D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor in Amsterdam</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Deissel, Ludwig, D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Tubingen (D. 1879)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dillmann, Christian Friedrich August, D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Berlin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dilthey, Wilhelm, D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Philosophy in Berlin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dörner, August, Ph.D.,</td>
<td>Professor in Theological Seminary at Wittenberg</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Duerstieck, Franz, D.D.,</td>
<td>Oberkonsistorialrath in Hannover</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dürstfeld, Ludwig, D.D.,</td>
<td>Pastor in Velgast</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dryander, Hermann, Superintendently in Halle.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dubs, Joseph Henry, D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor in Frankfurt and Marshall College, Lancaster, Penn.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Duchemin, Pastor in Lyons</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Duff, Robert S., M.A.,</td>
<td>Pastor in Glasgow</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Duffield, Samuel W.,</td>
<td>Pastor of the Westminster Presbyterian Church, Bloomfield, N.J.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Düsterdieck, Franz, D.D.,</td>
<td>Oberkonsistorialrath in Hanover</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Easton, Peter Zachius,</td>
<td>Missionary in Persia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ebert, Adolph, Ph.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Philology in Leipzig</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ehrard, Johann Heinrich August, D.D.,</td>
<td>Pastor and Konsistorialrath in Erlangen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Eibach, R., Pastor in Neuteroth.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Engelhardt, J. G. v., D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Erlangen (D. 1885)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Erbram, Heinrich Wilhelm, D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Königsberg (D. Jan. 9, 1884)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Erdmann, Christian Friedrich David, D.D.,</td>
<td>General Superintendent of the Province of Silesia in Breslau</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Eucken, R., Ph.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Philosophy in Jena</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Euler, Carl, Ph.D.,</td>
<td>Berlin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fisher, George Park, D.D., LL.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Church History in Yale Theological Seminary, New Haven, Conn.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Flieming, D. Hay,</td>
<td>Aberdeen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fliichtner, George Frederik, Rev., Secretary for Domestic Missions (Protestant-Episcopal Church), New-York City</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fliesen, Fritz, Missionary in Madrid.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Flint, Robert D., LL.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in the University of Edinburgh</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Floto, Hartwig, D.D.,</td>
<td>Berlin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Foster, Robert Verrell,</td>
<td>Professor in the Theological School, Cumberland University, Lebanon, Tenn.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fox, Norman, Rev.,</td>
<td>New-York City</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Frank, Frank Hermann Reinhold, D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Erlangen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Frank, Gustav Wilhelm, D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Vienna</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Freybe, Albert, Ph.D.,</td>
<td>Gymnasium Upper-class Teacher in Parchim</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Frieberg, Emil, Ph.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Canon Law in Leipzig</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fritzsch, Otto Frigolin, D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Zürich</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Frommüller, P. F. C.,</td>
<td>Pastor in Reutlingen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Frothingham, Octavius Brooks, Rev., Boston, Mass</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Galiffe, Eduard, D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor in Geneva</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gass, Wilhelm, D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Heidelberg</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gast, Frederic Augustus, D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor in the Theological Seminary, Lancaster, Penn.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gebhardt, Oskar von, D.D.,</td>
<td>Librarian of the Royal Library, Berlin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Geffcken, Johann, Ph.D.,</td>
<td>Pastor in Hamburg</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gelpeke, E. T., D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Bern</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gerhart, Emanuel Vogel, D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor in the Theological Seminary, Lancaster, Penn.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Germann, Wilhelm, Ph.D.,</td>
<td>Pastor in Windsheim</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Geth van Wijk, J. A.,</td>
<td>Pastor at The Hague</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Giles, Chauncey, Rev.,</td>
<td>Philadelphia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gilfillan, Joseph A., Rev., Protestant-Episcopal Missionary to the Indians, Minnesota</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gillet, J. F. A., D.D.,</td>
<td>Court-Preacher in Breslan</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gilman, Arthur, M.A.,</td>
<td>Cambridge, Mass</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gilman, Daniel Cot, LL.D.,</td>
<td>President of Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Md.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gilman, Edward Whiting, D.D.,</td>
<td>Secretary of the American Bible Society, New-York City</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Goebel, Julius, Ph.D.,</td>
<td>New-York City</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Goebel, Karl, Ph.D.,</td>
<td>Konsistorialrath in Pozen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gode, Maximilian.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Godef, Frédéric, D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Neuchâtel</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Goltz, von der, Heinrich, D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Berlin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Good, Jeremiah Haak, D.D.,</td>
<td>Professor in Heidelberg Theological Seminary, Tifftin, O.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Goodspeed, Thomas Wakefield, D.D.,</td>
<td>Secretary of Baptist Theological Union, Chicago, Ill.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
LIST OF WRITERS.

GOODWIN, Daniel Rayns, D.D., LL.D., Professor in the Theological Seminary (Episcopal) in Philadelphia.

GOSCHE, R. A., Ph.D., Professor of Oriental Languages in Halle.

GÖSCHEL, Karl Friedrich, Ph.D., President of the Consistory of Magdeburg. (D. 1861.)

GREEN, William Henry, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Hebrew, Theological Seminary, Princeton, N.J.

GREGORY, Caspar René, Ph.D., Leipzig.

GRUNDEMANN, Reinhold, Ph.D., D.D., Pastor in Mös, Prussia.

GRÜNEISEN, Carl von, D.D., Chief Court-Preacher in Stuttgart. (D. 1878.)

GÜDER, Eduard, D.D., Pastor in Bern. (D. 1882.)

GUNDERT, Hermann, Ph.D., in Calw.

GÜNTER, Martin, Professor in the Concordia Theological Seminary, St. Louis, Mo.

GUTHE, Heinrich, Ph.D., Professor in Leipzig.

HACKENSCHMIDT, Karl, Pastor in Jägerthal (Elsaas).

HAENCHEN, Philipp E., Pastor in Erlangen.

HAGENBACH, Karl Rudolph, D.D., Professor of Theology in Basel. (D. 1874.)

HAIN, Heinrich August, D.D. (D.—)

HALL, Isaac Hollister, Ph.D., New-York City.

HALL, John, D.D., Pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New-York City.

HALL, Robert W., New-York City.

HAMBERGER, Julius, Ph.D. (D. 1885.)

HARNACK, Adolf, D.D., Professor of Theology in Marburg.

HARPER, James, D.D., Xenia, O.

HARRIS, J. Randel, Professor in Haverford College, Montgomery County, Penn.

HASTINGS, Thomas Samuel, D.D., Professor of Sacred Rhetoric, Union Theological Seminary, New-York City.

HATFIELD, Edwin Francis, D.D., New-York City. (D. 1883.)

HAUCK, Almery, D.D., Professor of Theology in Erlangen.

HEER, Justus, Pastor in Erlenbach, Canton Zürich.

HELLER, Ludwig, Pastor in Travemünde. (D.—)

HEMAN, C. F., Ph.D., Missions Inspector, Basel.

HENKE, Ernst Ludwig Theodor, D.D., Professor of Theology in Marburg. (D. 1872.)

HEPPE, Heinrich Ludwig Julius, D.D., Professor of Theology in Marburg. (D. 1879.)

HEROLD, Max, Pastor in Schwabach.

HERRLINGER, Diakonus in Nürtingen.

HERZOG, Johann Jakob, D.D., Professor of Theology in Erlangen. (D. 1882.)

HEYD, Wilhelm, Ph.D., Chief Librarian in Stuttgart.

HEYDE, Karl Ludwig Wilhelm, Ph.D., Professor of Philosophy in Erlangen.

HINSHIUS, Paul, Ph.D., Professor of Canon Law in Berlin.

HITCHCOCK, Roswell Dwight, D.D., LL.D., President, and Professor of Church History, in the Union Theological Seminary, New-York City.

HOCHHUTH, C. W. H., Ph.D., in Cassel.

HODGE, Archibald Alexander, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Theology, Theological Seminary, Princeton, N.J. (D. 1886.)

HOFMANN, J. A. G., D.D., Professor of Theology in Jena. (D. 1864.)

HOFMANN, Rudolph, D.D., Professor of Theology in Leipzig.

HOG, Moses D., D.D., Richmond, Va.

HOLLAND, Henry Scott, M.A., Senior Student at Christ Church, Oxford University.

HOLLENBERG, W. A., Ph.D., Director of the Gymnasium in Saarbrücken.

HOLTZMANN, Heinrich, D.D., Professor of Theology in Strassburg.

HÖPF, Georg Wilhelm, Ph.D., Rector in Nuremberg.

HOPKINS, E. W., Professor in Columbia College, New-York City.

HOPKINS, Samuel Miles, D.D., Professor of Church History in Auburn Theological Seminary, Auburn, N.Y.

HOVEY, Alvah, D.D., President of Newton Theological Seminary, Massachusetts.

HUNDESHAGEN, Carl Bernhard, D.D., Professor of Theology in Heidelberg. (D. 1875.)

HUPFELD, David, Ph.D., Superintendent in Schleusingen.

JACOB, Justus Ludwig, D.D., Professor of Theology in Halle.

JACOBS, Henry Eyster, D.D., Professor in the Lutheran Theological Seminary, Philadelphia.

JACOBSON, Heinrich Franz, Ph.D., Professor of Law in Königsberg. (D.—)

JESSUP, Henry Harris, D.D., Missionary of the Presbyterian Board in Syria.

JUDD, A., Gymnasium-Professor in Strassburg.

KÄHLER, Martin, D.D., Professor of Theology in Halle.

KAHNIS, Karl Friedrich August, D.D., Professor of Theology in Leipzig.

KAMPHAUSEN, Adolph Hermann Heinrich, D.D., Professor of Theology in Bonn.

KAUZSCH, Emil Friedrich, D.D., Professor of Theology in Tübingen.

KEIM, Carl Theodor, D.D., Professor of Theology in Glessen. (D. 1873.)

KELLOGG, Samuel Henry, D.D., Presbyterian Pastor in Toronto, Ontario, Canada.

KESSLER, K., Ph.D., Professor in Greifswald.

KINGSLEY, William L., New Haven, Conn.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Writer Name</th>
<th>Title, Location</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Kirchhofer, G.</td>
<td>Professor in Schaffhausen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Klaiber, Karl Friedrich</td>
<td>Ph.D., Göppingen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kleinert, Hugo Wilhelm Paul</td>
<td>D.D., Professor of Theology in Berlin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kling, Christian Christian</td>
<td>D.D., Deken in Marbach</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Klipfel, Georg Heinrich</td>
<td>Ph.D., Rector of the Gymnasium in Verden</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Klose, Carl Rudolph Wilhelm</td>
<td>Ph.D., Librarian, Hamburg</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Klosestermann, August</td>
<td>D.D., Professor of Theology in Kiel</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kluckhohn, August</td>
<td>Ph.D., Professor and Director of Polytechnic Institute in Munich</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Klufter, Karl</td>
<td>Ph.D., Rector of the Gymnasium in Verden</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Klose, Alexander</td>
<td>Ph.D., Professor in Gymnasium at Stettin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>König, Friedrich Eduard</td>
<td>Ph.D., Professor of Theology in Leipzig</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Köster, Adolph</td>
<td>Ph.D., Pastor in Erlangen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Köstlin, Julius</td>
<td>D.D., Professor in Halle</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Krafft, C.</td>
<td>Pastor in Elberfeld</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Krafft, Wilhelm Ludwig</td>
<td>D.D., Professor of Church History in Bonn</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kramer, Ph.</td>
<td>D.D., Professor and Director of Frauncke's Institution in Halle</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kübel, Robert Benjamin</td>
<td>D.D., Professor of Theology in Tübingen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Landere, Max Albert</td>
<td>Von, D.D., Professor of Theology in Tübingen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lange, Johann Peter</td>
<td>D.D., Professor of Theology in Bonn</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Laubmann, G.</td>
<td>Ph.D., Director of the City Library, Munich</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Laubmann, S. Diakonissen in</td>
<td>Stuttgart</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lechler, Gottlieb Viktor</td>
<td>D.D., Professor of Theology in Leipzig</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lee, William</td>
<td>D.D., Professor of Ecclesiastical History, University of Glasgow</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leimbach, C. L.</td>
<td>Ph.D., Director in Goslar</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lepsius, Karl Richard</td>
<td>Ph.D. (1884)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lyer, E.</td>
<td>Pastor at Plochingen in Württemberg</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>List, Franz</td>
<td>Ph.D., Professor in Munich</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Livermore, Abiel Arnot</td>
<td>Rev., President of the Theological School, Meadville, Penn</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Loyd, H. S.</td>
<td>Rev., Secretary of the Theological Seminary, Hamilton, N.Y.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lührs, F.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Luthardt, Christoff Ernst</td>
<td>D.D., Professor of Theology in Leipzig</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lütteke, Moritz</td>
<td>Pastor in Schkeuditz</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mallet, Hermann</td>
<td>Pastor in Bremen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mangold, Wilhelm Julius</td>
<td>D.D., Professor of Theology in Bonn</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mann, William Julius</td>
<td>D.D., Professor in the Lutheran Theol. Seminary, Philadelphia, Penn</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*Marling, Francis H.</td>
<td>Rev., New York City</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*Mathews, George D.</td>
<td>D.D., Quebec, Can.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Matter, Jacques</td>
<td>Professor in Paris</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*Maxson, Darwin E.</td>
<td>D.D., Alfred Centre, N.Y.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*McCosh, James D.</td>
<td>D.D., LL.D., President of the College of New Jersey, Princeton, N.J.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*McFarland, Henry Horace</td>
<td>Rev., New York City</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*McKim, Randolph H.</td>
<td>D.D., New York City</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*Meier, Otto</td>
<td>Ph.D., Professor of Canon Law in Göttingen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*Merkel, Paul Johannes</td>
<td>Ph.D., Professor of Law in Halle</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Merz, Heinrich Von</td>
<td>D.D., Prälat in Stuttgart</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Meurer, Moritz</td>
<td>Licentiate, Pastor in Callenberg, Saxony</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Meyer v. Knonau</td>
<td>Ph.D., Professor in Zürich</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Michael, Superintendent</td>
<td>in Chemnita</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Michelsen, Alexander</td>
<td>Pastor in Lübeck</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*Mitchell, Alexander F.</td>
<td>D.D., Professor in the University of St. Andrews, Scotland</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Möller, Wilhelm Ernst</td>
<td>D.D., Professor of Theology in Kiel</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*Mombert, Jacob Isidor</td>
<td>D.D., Paterson, N.J.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*Moore, Dunlop</td>
<td>D.D., New Brighton, Penn</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*Morris, Edward Davydd</td>
<td>D.D., Professor of Theology, Lane Seminary, Cincinnati, O.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*Morse, Richard C.</td>
<td>Rev., Secretary of the International Committee of Y. M. C. A., New York City</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Möller, Carl, Ph.</td>
<td>D.D., Professor in Halle</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Müller, Ewan, Ph.</td>
<td>D.D., Professor of Philology in Erlangen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Müller, Johann Georg</td>
<td>D.D., Professor of Theology in Basel</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naegebach, Eduard</td>
<td>D.D., Pastor in Bayreuth</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nestle, Eberhard</td>
<td>Ph.D., Professor at Ulm</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Neudecker, Christian G.</td>
<td>D.D., Schuldirector in Gottha</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ney, Pastor in Spier</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*Ninde, William Xavier</td>
<td>President of the Garrett Biblical Institute, Evanston, Ill.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nitzsch, Friedrich August</td>
<td>Berthold, D.D., Professor of Theology in Kiel</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*Nott, Henry J.</td>
<td>Rev., Bowmanville, Ontario</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*Nutting, Mary O.</td>
<td>Miss, Librarian of Mount Holyoke Female Seminary</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Oehler, Gustav Friedrich</td>
<td>D.D., Professor of Theology in Tübingen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Oldenberg, F.</td>
<td>Berlin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Oosterzee, Jan Jakob van</td>
<td>D.D., Professor of Theology in Utrecht</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Orelli, Carl von</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Basel</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*Ormiston, William D.</td>
<td>D.D., LL.D., Collegiate Reformed Dutch Church, New York City</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*Osgood, Howard</td>
<td>D.D., LL.D., Professor of Hebrew, Theological Seminary, Rochester, N.Y.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Oslander, Ernst</td>
<td>Ph.D., Diakon in Göppingen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Overbeck, Joseph</td>
<td>Ph.D., Professor of German in the British Military College, Sandhurst</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>*Packard, Joseph D.</td>
<td>D.D., Professor in Theological Seminary of Episcopal Church, Alexandria, Va.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Palmer, Christian Von</td>
<td>D.D., Professor of Theology in Tübingen</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

* indicates a deceased person.
LIST OF WRITERS.

PARET, Heinrich, Diakonus in Brackenheim. (D.—.)

PARK, Edwards Amasa, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Theology, Theological Seminary, Andover, Mass.

PATTON, Francis Landey, D.D., LL.D., Professor in the Theological Seminary, Princeton, N.J.

PRIP, Albert, Ph.D., Professor of Philosophy in Göttingen.

PELT, A. F. L. A., Ph.D., Superintendent in Kemnitz. (D. 1861.)

PEIP, Albert, Ph.D., Professor of Philosophy in Göttingen.

PENTZ, A., Jabel.

PESTALOZZI, Karl, Pastor in Zurich.

PETERMANN, Julius Heinrich, Ph.D., Professor in Berlin. (D. 1875.)

PETERSEN, Clemens, M.A., New-York City.

PFENDER, Carl, Pastor in Paris.

PFLEIDERER, J. G., Ph.D., Bern.

PICK, Bernhard, Rev., Ph.D., Allegenhey, Penn.

PIPER, Karl Wilhelm Ferdinand, D.D., Professor of Theology in Berlin.

PICT, Gustav Leopold, D.D., Professor of Theology in Erlangen. (D. 1880.)

PIOTT, Theodor, D.D., Pastor at Dossenheim in Baden.

POHMANN, R., Ph.D., Docent in Erlangen.

POLENZ, Gottlob von, in Halle.

POPOFF, P. J., Ph.D., New-York City.

POWELL, Frederick Dunolison, Pastor of the “Christian” Church, Washington, D.C.

PREGER, Wilhelm, D.D., Professor at the Gymnasium in Munich.

PRENTIES, George Lewis, D.D., Professor of Pastoral Theology in the Union Theological Seminary, New-York City.

PRESSL, Theodor, Ph.D., Archdeacon in Tübingen. (D. —.)

PRESSL, Wilhelm, Pastor near Tübingen.

RANKE, Ernet, D.D., Professor of Theology in Marburg.

RATMON, Rositter Worthington, Ph.D., Brooklyn, N.Y. (D. 1873.)

REUCHLIN, Hermann, Ph.D., in Stuttgart.

REUTER, Hermann Ferdinand, D.D., Professor of Theology in Strasbourg.

RIDDLE, Matthew Brown, D.D., Professor of New-Testament Exegesis, Theological Seminary, Hartford, Conn.

RIGGENBACH, Bernhard, Pastor in Arisdorf, Canton Baselland.

Ritschi, Albrecht, D.D., Professor of Theology in Göttingen.

ROBERTS, William Henry, D.D., Professor in Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati, O.

RÖDIGER, Emil, Ph.D., Professor of Oriental Languages in Berlin. (D. 1874.)

RÖNNEKE, K., German Chaplain, Rome.

RÜETSCHI, Rudolf, D.D., Professor in Bern.

SABINE, William T., Rev., New-York City.

SACK, Karl Heinrich, D.D., Professor of Theology in Bonn. (D. 1875.)

SAVAGE, George S. F., D.D., Secretary of the Chicago Congregational Theological Seminary.

SCHAFERSCHMIDT, Carl, Ph.D., Professor of Philosophy in Bonn.

SCHAFF, David Schley, Rev., Kansas City, Mo.

SCHAFF, Philip, D.D., LL.D., Professor in the Union Theological Seminary, New-York City.

SCHERER, Eduard, Ph.D., Professor in Paris.

SCHEURL, C. T. Gottlob, Ph.D., Professor of Canon Law in Erlangen.

SCHMID, Heinrich, D.D., Professor of Theology in Erlangen. (D. 1888.)

SCHMIDT, Carl Wilhelm Adolf, D.D., Professor of Theology in Strassburg.

SCHMIDT, Hermann, Professor of Theology in Breslau.

SCHMIDT, J., Frauenfeld.

SCHMIDT, Karl, Privatdocent of Theology in Erlangen.

SCHMIDT, Oswald Gottlob, D.D., Superintendent in Werdau. (D. 1883.)

SCHMIDT, Woldemar Gottlob, D.D., Professor of Theology in Leipzig.

SCHMIDT, William, D.D., Professor and Director in Wittenberg.

SCHNEIDER, J., Pastor in Finkenbach (Rheinpfalz).

SCHÜBERLEIN, Ludwig, D.D., Professor of Theology in Göttingen. (D. 1881.)

SCHODDE, George H., Ph.D., Professor of Greek, Capital University, Columbus, O.

SCHOELL, Carl, Ph.D., Pastor of Savoy Church in London.

SCHOTT, Theodor, Librarian in Stuttgart.

SCHULTZ, Friedrich Wilhelm, D.D., Professor of Theology in Breslau.

SCHÜRER, Emil, D.D., Professor of Theology in Giessen.

SCHWARZ, Johann Karl Eduard, D.D., Professor of Theology in Jena. (D. 1870.)

SCHWEIZER, Alexander, D.D., Professor of Theology in Zurich.

SCOVEL, Sylvester Fithian, Rev., President of Wooster University, Wooster, O.

SEMISCH, Carl Enotheus, D.D., Professor of Theology in Berlin.

SHEA, John Gilmary, LL.D., Elizabeth, N.J.

SHEDD, William Greenough Thayer, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Systematic Theology in the Union Theological Seminary, New-York City.

SHIELDS, Charles Woodruff, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Philosophy in the College of New Jersey, Princeton, N.J.

SIEFFERT, Friedrich Ludwig, Ph.D., Professor of Theology in Erlangen.

SIGWART, Christian, Ph.D., Professor of Philosophy in Tübingen.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Writer Name</th>
<th>Academic/Professional Information</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Sloane, J. R. W., D.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Theology, Pittsburgh, Penn. (D. 1886)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Smyth, Egbert Coffin, D.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Church History, Theological Seminary, Andover, Mass.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Spiegel, Friedrich, Ph.D.</td>
<td>Frankfurt-am-Main.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Stählin, Adolf, D.D.</td>
<td>President of the Upper Consistory, Munich.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Stearns, Lewis French, D.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Theology, Theological Seminary, Bangor, Me.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Steitze, Georg Eduard, D.D.</td>
<td>Konsistorialrat at Frankfurt-am-Main. (D. 1879)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Strong, Charles Janeway, LL.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Hebrew, Madison, N.J.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sudhoff, Carl, Pastor in Frankfurt-am-Main. (D. 1892)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thelemann, Karl Otto</td>
<td>Konsistorialrat in Detmold.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thiersch, Heinrich, D.D.</td>
<td>in Basel. (D. 1885)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tholuck, Friedrich August Gotthreu, D.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Halle. (D. 1877)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tillet, Wilbur Fisk, A.M., Rev.</td>
<td>Professor of Systematic Theology in Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tischendorf, Lobsott Friedrich Constantin, von, D.D., etc.</td>
<td>Professor of Biblical Paleography in Leipzig. (D. 1874)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Toy, Crawford Howell, D.D., LL.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Hebrew in Harvard University.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Trechsel, Friedrich</td>
<td>Pastor in Bern. (D. 1885)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>True, Benjamin Osgood, D.D.</td>
<td>Professor in the Theological Seminary, Rochester, N.Y.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tschackert, Paul Moritz Robert, D.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Königsberg.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tuttle, Daniel Sylvester, D.D.</td>
<td>Bishop of Missouri.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tyler, William Seymour, D.D.</td>
<td>Professor in Amherst College, Massachusetts.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tzschirner, P. M., Ph.D.</td>
<td>Leipzig.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Uhllhorn, Johann Gerhard Wilhelm, D.D.</td>
<td>Oberkonsistorialrat in Hanover.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ullmann, Carl, D.D., Karlsruhe. (D. 1865)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ullrich, Hermann, Ph.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Philosophy in Halle. (D. 1894)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vahinger, J. G.</td>
<td>Pastor in Württemberg. (D. 1879)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vincent, Marvin Richardson, D.D.</td>
<td>Pastor of the Church of the Covenant (Presbyterian), New York City.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vogel, Carl Albrecht, D.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Vienna.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Voigt, G., Ph.D.</td>
<td>Professor of History in Leipzig.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Volck, Wilhelm, D.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Dorpat.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wackernagel, K. H. Wilhelm, Ph.D.</td>
<td>Professor in Basel.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wagenmann, Julius August, D.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Göttingen.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wangelmann, Ph.D.</td>
<td>Mission director in Berlin.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Warneck, G., Ph.D.</td>
<td>Pastor in Rothenschirn-bach.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wasmund, George, D.D.</td>
<td>President of Robert College, Constantinople, Turkey.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wasserschleben, F. W. H. von, Ph.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Jurisprudence in Giessen.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Weigarten, Hermann, D.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Breslau.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Weizsäcker, Carl Heinrich, D.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Tübingen.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Weizsäcker, Julius, Ph.D.</td>
<td>Professor of History in Göttingen.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Werner, August, Pastor in Guben.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Whipple, Henry Benjamin, D.D.</td>
<td>Bishop of the Diocese of Minnesota, Faribault, Minn.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wieseler, Karl, D.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Greifswald. (D. 1883)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wilcken, Ph.D., Stralsund.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Williams, Samuel Wells, LL.D., Professor of Chinese, Yale Coll., New Haven, Conn. (D. 1884)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wilson, Joseph R., D.D., Wilmington, N.C.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wilson, Samuel Jennings, D.D., LL.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Church History, Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Penn. (D. 1883)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wolf, Edmund Jacob, D.D.</td>
<td>Professor in the Theological Seminary, Gettysburg, Penn.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wölfflin, Eduard, Ph.D., Professor in Erlangen.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Woolsey, Theodore Dwight, D.D., LL.D., President of Yale College, New Haven, Conn.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wright, George Frederick, Ph.D., Professor in the Theological Seminary, Oberlin, O.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zahn, Theodor, D.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Erlangen.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zesschwitz, Gerhard von, D.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Erlangen. (D. 1886)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zimmermann, Karl, D.D.</td>
<td>Prät in Darmstadt.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zöckler, Otto, D.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Greifswald.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zöppfeli, Richard Otto, Ph.D.</td>
<td>Professor of Theology in Strassburg.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Digitized by Google
INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.
INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.

INDEX.
INDEX.

Schleiermacher, Friedrich Daniel Ernst, Sequence, the, 2161. 2182.
Scottish Philosophy, 2133. Shakers, 2108. Slavery and Christianity, 2194.
Schwcbel, Johann, 2131. Severinus, St., 2167. Sirmond, Jacques, 2100.
Schweitzer, Heinrich Friedrich, 2125. Seml-Peiagianism, 2151. Simeon, the Name in Biblical History.
Schmelzer, Albert, 2131. Semitic Languages. See Semitic Languages.
Schmoekle, Benjamin, 2128. Serpent, Brazen, the, 2162. Simon ben Vocliai, 2182.
Schmidt, Oswald, 2128. Sermon. See Homiletics. Simplicius, 2186.
Schmucker, Samuel Simon, 2126. Servia, 2163. Sin again itthe Holy Spirit, the, 2188.
Schmucke, Benjamin, 2126. Shelley, James, 2167. Slaves and Slavery.
Schmucke, Samuel, 2120. Shelley, James, 2167. Smith, John Cotton, 2200.
Schmuckert, Charles Frederick, 2117. Shalem, 2187. Smith, John, 2200.
Schmuckert, Charles Frederick, 2117. Shama, 2187. Smith, John Pye, 2201.
Schmuckert, Charles Frederick, 2117. Sharp, James, 2171. Smith, John Pye, 2201.
Schmuckert, Charles Frederick, 2117. Sharp, James, 2171. Smith, John Pye, 2201.
Scholium, the, 2160. Sercles, 2162. Simon ben Vocliai, 2182.
Schweinfeld and the Schweinfelders. See Tunnels.
Scott, Thomas, 2133. School of Hermas. See Hermas.
Scottish Philosophy, 2133. School of Hermas. See Hermas.
Scottus Edgerius, John, 2134. School of Hermas. See Hermas.
Scottus, Maranus, 2135. School of Hermas. See Hermas.
Sefter, Christian, 2137. School of Hermas. See Hermas.
Seidler, John, 2137. School of Hermas. See Hermas.
Seidler, Johannes, 2131. School of Hermas. See Hermas.
Selan, Lazarus, 2142. Semina, 2162. Sermo, see Sermon.
Sellar, Edmund Hamilton, 2146. Sema, see Sermon.
Sellar, Edmund Hamilton, 2146. Semarm, see Sermon.
Sellar, Edmund Hamilton, 2146. Sema, see Sermon.
Selle, see Sermon. Sell, or Land of Selr, 2148. Sicari, 2180.
Sell, or Land of Selr, 2148. Selr, or Land of Selr, 2148. Sicari, 2180.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
Sellers, see Sermon. Selma, see Sermon. Shammara, or Shalma, 2204.
INDEX.

Teresa, the, 2309.
Tophet, 2365.
Tophet, 2310.
Torquemada, Juan de, 2370.
Tosi, Prosper, 2370.
Toussaint, Louis, 2371.
Tournemire, Rev., 2371.
Tours, Synods of, 2371.
Toyniani, Andreas, 2372.
Towsey, James, 2372.
Tosta, Thomas, 2372.
Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Noah, 2366.
Tobies, Joseph, 2366.
Tobias, Noah, 2366.
Tobias, Thomas, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
Tobias, Tobias, 2366.
INDEX.

Year, the Church, 2562.
Year, Hebrew, 2562.
Yeomans, Edward Dorr, 2563.
York, 2564.
Young, Brigham. See Mormons.
Young, Edward, 2564.
Young, Patrick, 2564.
Young Men's Christian Associations, 2566.
Young Women's Christian Associations, 2566.
Yulo, 2566.
Yvouetua, 2568.
Z.
Zabarella, or De Zabarella, 2567.
Zaccheus, 2567.
Zachariä, Gotthilf Traugott, 2567.
Zacharias, 2567.
Zacharias Scholasticus, 2567.
Zamzummim, or Zusim, 2567.
Zanchi, Hieronymus, 2567.
Zedekiah, 2570.
Zelenberg, David 2570.
Zell, Matthias, 2571.
Zend-Avesta. See Parseeism.
Zeno, 2571.
Zephaniah, 2571.
Zephryinus, 2572.
Zerubbabel, 2572.
Zidon, or Sidon, 2572.
Ziegenbalg, Bartholomew. See Missions.
Zillerthal, 2573.
Zimri, 2573.
Zinzendorf, Nicholas Lewis, Count von, 2573.
Zlon, or Zlon, 2574.
Ziska, John. See Hussites, Utraquists.
Zoea, 2574.
Zoar, 2574.
Zohe, or Zobah, 2574.
Zollkofer, Georg Joachim, 2574.
Zonaras, Johannes, 2576.
Zoraster. See Parseeism.
Zosimus, 2576.
Zwick, Johannes, 2576.
Zwingli, Huldreich, 2576.
INDEX TO APPENDIX.

Accad. See Shinar.
Adams, Mrs. Sarah Flower, 2581.
Adams, Eliza Flower, 2581.
Adventists, 2581.
Adwson, 2582.
Ahitsa, Leo, 2583.
Albene, Joseph, 2582.
Allen, James, 2582.
Aman the Karaite. See Karaite Jews.
Andrew, 2582.
Apostle, Joseph, 2582.
Anti-Mission Baptists, 2583.
Atwater, Lyman Hotchkiss, 2583.
Aubin, Harriet, 2583.
Austin, John, 2583.
Baker, Sir Henry Williams, 2583.
Bakewell, John, 2583.
Barton, Bernard, 2583.
Bathurst, William Hiley, 2583.
Bauer, Bruno, 2583.
Beaumont, Joseph, 2584.
Beddome, Benjamin, 2584.
Begg, James, 2584.
Belows, Henry Whitney, 2585.
Berridge, John, 2585.
Bible Christians, 2585.
Blacklock, Thomas, 2586.
Boden, James, 2586.
Boston University, School of Theology of, 2586.
Bowdler, John, Jun., 2587.
Brown, James, 2587.
Brown, Matthew, 2587.
Brown, Phoebe, 2587.
Brown, George, 2587.
Brown, Peter, 2587.
Brown, Simon, 2587.
Bruce, Michael, 2587.
Bryant, William Cullen, 2588.
Buller, Stephen Greenleaf, 2588.
Burder, George, 2588.
Burleigh, William Henry, 2588.
Burnham, Richard, 2588.
Byron, John, 2588.
Carlyle, Joseph Dacre, 2588.
Cary, Alice, 2588.
Cary, Phoebe, 2588.
Cawfall, Edward, 2588.
Cawood, John, 2588.
Cennick, John, 2588.
PACCA, Bartolommeo, b. at Benevento, Dec. 18, 1756; d. in Rome, April 19, 1844. The Roman curia and to the Congress of Ems by sending Pacca as nuncio to Cologne in 1786. Though he was not recognized, even not received, by the prince-bishops, he carried every thing before him with a high hand, until the advance of the French armies in 1794 compelled him to leave Germany. He filled another equally successful nunciature at Lisbon, 1795-1800; and on his return to Rome he was made a cardinal. His success led him to adopt the maxim,—never to give in, never to abandon a hair's breadth of his original claim, never to compromise; and he followed it till his death. He became one of the leaders of the Zelanti; and it was he who in 1809 drew up, and induced Pius VII. to sign, the bull of excommunication against Napoleon I. He was seized, and imprisoned in the Piedmontese fortress, Fenestrelle, but was released in 1813, and took, after the restoration, an active part in the revocation of the Jesuits, there-establishment of the Inquisition, etc. Though in the conclaves of 1823, 1828, and 1831 he failed to obtain a majority, he continued to exercise a great influence on the papal government. He wrote "Memorie storiche d. Ministero e de' due Viaggi in Francia," etc., 1828, 5th ed., 1831; "Memorie storiche sul soggiorno del C. B. P. in Germania," 1832; "Notizie sul Portogallo," 1832, 3d ed., 1845; "Relazione del Viaggio di Pio VII. a Genova," 1815, 1833; of which writings there exist both French and German translations. The "La Storia della vita di Pius VII. a Genova," containing a hundred and ninety-four articles, and printed by Holstenius, i.e., most of the letters of the alphabet, the simples souls ranking in the first classes, the smart fellows in the last; but in this respect they agree very well with the writings generally ascribed by antiquity to Pachomius, Monita ad Monachos, Verba Mystica, Letters, etc., printed by Holstenius, i.e., most of Christianity remained in a healthy condition, it found its satisfaction within the life of the congregation. But by degrees, as the church became more and more familiarized with the surrounding world, the ascetic instinct, under the influence of the dualism of the Neo-Platonicizing, Alexandrian theology, and seduced by the example of the monks of the Serapis worship, fell into extravagances; and the ascetics fled into the deserts, and became hermits. Pachomius was also swayed by this tendency; and in his twentieth year he settled in the desert to fight for the prize of asceticism under the training of Palemon, one of the most austere pupils of St. Anthony. But the movement had already reached such a speed and such a compass, that it could not go on any farther without some kind of organization; and to that end Pachomius effected this is the great merit of Pachomius. Something had already been done before his time. As the desert became peopled by anchorites, the Lauren arose; that is, a number of novices in asceticism built their cells around the cell of some hero in asceticism, in order to follow his example, and to receive from him the first trace of organization originated. Pachomius made the next step, transforming the Lauren into a monastery. In the Island of Tabennæ he founded the first cenobium (vouwslaw); that is, a house in which the anchorites, who had hitherto lived separately, each pursuing his own scheme of asceticism, came to live together in common practices and exercises, according to certain fixed rules, and under the guidance or government of a director. The success of Pachomius' undertaking was enormous. Palladius states that in his time the monastery of Tabennæ contained no less than fourteen hundred monks. Of the original rules of Pachomius, nothing certain is known. The Regula S. Pachomii containing a hundred and ninety-four articles, and printed by Holstenius, in his Codex Regularum, i. pp. 26-36, and a shorter regulative, containing fourteen articles, and printed by Gauzaus as an appendix to his edition of Cassianus' De Cenobiorum Institut., may contain fragments of the original rules; but their authenticity cannot be established. They present many curious features: thus, the monks are divided into twenty-four classes, named after the letters of the alphabet, the simple souls ranking in the first classes, the smart fellows in the last; but in this respect they agree very well with the writings generally ascribed by antiquity to Pachomius. Monita ad Monachos, Verba Mystica, Letters, etc., printed by Holstenius, i.e., most of which are entirely unintelligible. See, besides the above-mentioned writer, Acta Sanct., May 14; Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum, ii. 1179; MANGOLD.
PACHYMERES.

PACHYMERES, Georgius, b. at Nicea about 1242; d. in Constantinople, probably about 1310; held high offices at the Byzantine court during the reigns of Michael Palaeologus and Andronicus the Elder; took part with great energy in the negotiations for a union between the Greek and the Latin Church, and wrote some of the greatest and most important works of the Byzantine period. His works, distinguished by the neatness of their style, are still extant, three letters, Contra Noratianos, and two minor treatises, Paracrinias ad paenitentiam and Sermo de baptismo, which are found in Bib. Max. Lug., iv., and Migne: Patr. Lat., xiii. See Acta Sanct., March 24.

PACIFICATION, Edicts of, is the name generally given to those edicts which from time to time the French kings issued in order to "pacify" the kingdom. The first of the kind was that issued by Charles IX. in 1562, which guaranteed the Reformed religion toleration within certain limits: the last was the famous Edict of Nantes, signed at Lestoix on March 4, 1598.

PADUA (Patacium), a city of Northern Italy; stands on the Bacchiglione, an affluent of the Brenta, twenty miles west of Venice, and has about sixty-six thousand inhabitants. At the beginning of the Christian era it was the largest and most important city of Northern Italy; and even in the early 4th century it was the seat of a bishop, according to legend, even in the times of the apostles. Afterwards the see belonged under the metropolitans of Venetia. But during the Lombard rule the city was more than once compelled to accept an Arian bishop, and the Catholic bishop then moved his residence to Chioggia. The first cathedral of the city was built in the beginning of the fourth century, and was replaced by another in 1429. The present cathedral was begun in 1524, but not completed until 1754. The most magnificent church of the city is that of St. Anthony, begun in 1232, and finished in the fourteenth century. In 1797 the French carried away from that church treasures valued by some at 20,116,010 francs, by others at 39,305,446 francs; six candelabra of pure silver, weighing 5391 ounces; fifty-two lamps belonging to the chapel of the saint, one of pure gold, weighing 361 ounces, the others of gold and silver, etc. Yet the greatest and most costly treasures of the church were saved by bribing the French commissioners. See BEKNAORDO GONZATI: La Basilica di S. Antonio di Padova, Padua, 1851, etc. The University of Padua was founded in the twelfth century, and was for centuries the most famous school of law and medicine in Europe: it had at times twelve thousand students. Its theological faculty was founded in the middle of the fourteenth century by the Bishop Francesco Carrara. At present the university has six-five professors, and about eleven hundred students.

P E D O B A P T I S M (παιδόβαπτισμός, "a child," and βάπτισμος, "baptism"), the baptism of little children, commonly called Baptism of Infants (see art.).

PEDOBAPlST, a term applied to all who believe in infant baptism, as distinguished from Baptists, who reject it.

PAGANISM, from the Latin paganus, a "village," a peasant, or one who worships false gods, is heathen. For a long time in history, in the course of the fourth century, when Christianity became the reigning religion of the Roman Empire, and could look down upon the old mythology as a superstition left lurking only in some distant, far-off places: it occurs for the first time in an edict of Constantine (313-375) from the year 308 (Cod. Theod., xvi., ii. 18). It must not be understood, however, that at that time Christianity was generally adopted throughout the empire. On the contrary, though in the minority, Paganism was still a power in the State; and it was often found difficult, not to say impossible, to enforce the repressive laws which from time to time were issued. There was in this respect a considerable difference between the State of the East and that of the West. In the East, Paganism had no political significance. However firm its hold might be on the individual conscience, it was not bound up with the whole national life in such a degree as it was in Italy and Rome. Consequently, laws which could be easily enforced in the East without causing any dangerous commotion had to be managed with great caution, or left entirely unheeded, in the West.

In the East the final overthrow of Paganism was inaugurated by the laws of Theodosius I. (378-395). One of, 381, punished relapse into Paganism with forfeiture of the right to make a will; another, of 383, forbade the inspection of entrails, or the exercise of magical rites, under penalty of death; a third, of 391, ordered all sacrifices to idols to cease, and all temples to be closed. In 425 an edict of Theodosius II. (402-450) forbade Paganism to practice at the bar, to hold a military command, to own Christian slaves, etc. Nevertheless, Optatus, prefect of Constantinople in 404, was a Pagan, and a Benefactor of the Christian religion; and the first instance of a Pagan holding a high position in the government. The schools remained in the hands of the Pagan philosophers for a century more: the last of them, that of Athens, was closed in 529 by Justinian I. (527-565). In the West, Gratian (387-399) removed the statue of Victory from the curia, and refused the title and the insignia of Pontifex Maximus. The decisive measures, however, against Paganism were enacted by Honorius (395-423). He forbade the Pagan worship in 399, and ordered in 408 that the altars and the idols should be destroyed, and the temples appropriated to some secular use. Nevertheless, Theodoric the Great (493-526) found it necessary, at the instance of his son-in-law, in 500, to issue an edict threatening with death any one who should sacrifice to the idols. Gregory of Tours (538-593) tells us, that in Gaul the statue of Bercenythe was still carried around the vineyard in spring (De gloria confessorum, 2); and a capitulary of Charlemagne, dating from 788 (Salus, Capitulurias, l., 19), forbade the lighting tapers before trees and springs. In the very bosom of the Christian Church, Paganism was still found in some places in the eighth century.

PAGE, Harlan, eminent American philanthropist; b. at Coventry, Conn., July 28, 1791; d. in New York, Sept. 23, 1834. From 1825 to his death he was New-York agent of the general depository of the American Tract Society. He was a most devoted Christian, and employed every agency to do good. See his Memoir by W. A. HALLOCK, New York, 1836 (published by the American Tract Society).

PAQI, Antoine, b. at Roques in Provence, 1794; d. at Aix, 1899; entered the order of the Cordeliers, 1841; was four times elected provincial; distinguished himself as a preacher; and published Crítica historico-chronológica in Annales Baronii, Paris, 1830–1705, 4 vols. fol. In the execution of that work he was helped by his nephew, François PAGI, 1754–1771, who was also a Cordelier, and who wrote Pontificium Romanorum Gesta, Antwerp, 1717–27, 4 vols., in a strongly marked ultramontane spirit.

PAGODA, the name given to a certain kind of temple in India, and to a group of temple-like buildings. The Indian pagoda is really a group of buildings, among them being the residences of the priests, of which the pagoda proper is one, the whole surrounded by several series of walls. The temple in India, and to a Chinesetower-like templeused for secular purposes, consisting of several stories, usually nine, one upon the other, each of a single room, and surrounded by a gallery. The Indian pagoda is really a group of buildings, among them being the residences of the priests, of which the pagoda proper is one, the whole surrounded by several series of walls. The pagoda, as a religious structure, is built on the site of a burnam, and the chief one is at Rangoon.

PAINE, Robert, D.D., a bishop of the Methodist-Episcopal Church south; was b. in Person County, N.C., Nov. 12, 1799; and d. at Aberdeen, Miss., Oct. 19, 1882, being at the time of his death the senior bishop of the church. His father, Robert Paine, a highly reputable farmer, removed in 1814 to Giles County, Tenn., where he reared a large family. Young Robert made the best possible use of his early educational advantages, which, though limited, were good for that early day and for that thinly settled section. He professed religion Oct. 9, 1817, at a camp-meeting in Giles County, and soon afterwards joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in 1826 moved in 1814 to Giles County, Tenn., where he reared a large family. Young Robert made the best possible use of his early educational advantages, which, though limited, were good for that early day and for that thinly settled section. He professed religion Oct. 9, 1817, at a camp-meeting in Giles County, and soon afterwards joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in 1826 moved to Kansas, where he was licensed to preach, and was immediately employed by the presiding elder to serve as junior preacher with Rev. Miles Harper on the Nashville circuit. In October, 1818, he was "admitted on trial" into the Tennessee Conference, and in due course of time was received into full connection. He continued in the pastoral work until 1830, when he was elected president of La Grande College, Alabama. He remained there sixteen years, doing a great work for the South and South-west at a time when such work was much needed. He was a member of every General Conference from 1824 to 1846, when he was elected to the episcopacy. He was chairman of the committee of nine which adopted the plan of separation, on the basis of which the Methodist-Episcopal Church was divided in 1844. In all the assemblies of the church, from an early day, he was a prominent and influential member. Physically he was remarkably robust and active. As a preacher he was always able and instructive, and at times powerful and eloquent. His voice was musical and of great force. He had a naturally strong mind, trained to systematic study; was an able debater, and as a platform speaker he had few superiors. As a presiding officer he exhibited more than ordinary executive ability. His Life and Times of Bishop McKendree, Nashville, 1874, 2 vols., is regarded by many as the most valuable contribution to Methodist biography that has yet been made to the literature of that church.

PAINE, Thomas, political and deistic writer; b. at Thetford, Norfolk, Eng., Jan. 29, 1737; d. in Columbia Street, New-York City, June 8, 1809. His father was a Friend, who had been expelled from the society for marrying a Church-of-England woman. He received an indifferent education; left school at thirteen, and until sixteen worked at his father's trade of stay-making; then was for a while a sailor or marine. He settled at Sandwich in 1759 as a master stay-maker. From 1763 to 1774, with the exception of one year, he was exciseman. In 1772 he wrote a small pamphlet, The case of the officers of excise, with remarks on the qualifications of officers and on the necessity arising from a revenue for the sufficiency of the present salaries. It was very able, and excited the ill will of the upper officials, so that in 1774 he was dismissed the service on charge of smuggling, occasioned by his keeping a tobacco-shop. By the advice of Benjamin Franklin, whom he met in London, he came to America (1774), where he immediately entered upon a journalistic career, and political career of great prominence and usefulness. He had, earlier in that year, separated from his second wife for an unknown cause. In America he was successively editor of the Philadelphia Magazine (January, 1775), secretary to the congressional Committee of Foreign Affairs (1777), but obliged to resign in 1779 (because, in the heat of the Whig Packet with Silas Deane, he divulged State secrets), and in November, 1779, clerk to the General Assembly of Pennsylvania. In 1781 he negotiated a loan of ten million livres from France, and brought six million more as a present. In October, 1785, he himself received three thousand dollars from Congress in testimony of his services during the Revolution, and, from the State of New York, a house and farm of three hundred acres in New Rochelle. From 1787 to 1802 he was in Europe, most of the time in France, where he was enthusiastically received as the author of The Rights of Man, naturalized, and elected to the National Assembly. He had the courage to vote against the execution of Louis XVI., and thus incurred the anger of Robespierre, who threw him into prison, January, 1794; and there he remained until Nov. 4, 1794, when, on the solicitation of James Monroe, he was released. He relates that his door in the Luxembourg was once marked, in sign that he was to be executed; but his door opened outward, and so, when it was closed, the mark was of course hidden, and he escaped. On his return to the United States he was warmly welcomed, especially by Jefferson and his party. He was buried on his farm at New Rochelle. A monument to him was set up (1839) near the spot, although his remains had been taken to England in 1819 by William Cobbett. On Jan. 29, 1876, there was dedicated in Boston the Paine Memorial Building.
PAINE. 1718

PAINTING.

If Paine's writings had been only political, he would be entitled to honor as a bold and vigorous friend of human liberty. To him is to be traced the common saying, "These are the times which try men's souls," which is an opening sentence of the first number of The Crisis (December, 1776). His pamphlet, Common Sense (January, 1776), was one of the memorable writings of the day, and helped the cause of Independence. But it is as the author of The Age of Reason, an uncompromising, unfeeling, and often offensive attack on the Bible, that he is most widely known, indeed notorious. The first part of this work was handed by him, while in prison, December, 1795; the second part, composed while in prison, December, 1795; the third was left in manuscript. His ignorance," says Leslie Stephen, "was vast, and his language brutal; yet he had the gift of a true demagogue,—the power of wielding a fine vigorous English, a fit vehicle for fanatical passion." Paine was not an atheist, but a deist. In his will he speaks of his "reposing confidence in my Creator-God and in no other being; for I know no other, nor believe in any other." He voiced current doubt, and is still formidable; because, although he attacks a gross misconception of Christianity, he does it in such a manner as to turn his reader, in many cases, away from any serious consideration of the claim of Christianity. He was blind to the moral and spiritual truths of the Bible, and is therefore an incompetent critic, whose pretensions in this line are really ludicrous. His Age of Reason is still circulated and read. The Replies written at the time are not. Of these Replies the most famous is Bishop Watson's (1796).

The personal character of Paine has been very severely judged. Nothing too bad about him could be said by those who hated him for his opinions, and even his friends are compelled to admit that there was foundation for the damaging charges. Comparison of the contemporary biographies, both of friends and foes, seems to show these facts: Paine was through life a harsh, unfeeling, vain, and disagreeable man. He was wanting in a sense of honor, and therefore could not be trusted. But it was not until after his return from France, when he was sixty-five years old, very much broken by his long sufferings and the strain of the great excitement in which he had lived for years, and for the first time in his life above want, that he developed those traits which rendered him in his last days such a miserable object. The charges of matrimonial infidelity and of seduction are probably unfounded; but that he was in his old age penurious, uncleanly, drunken, unscrupulous, may be accepted as true. He did a great service for the United States in her hour of peril. But alas! he has done irreparable injury ever since in turning many away from God and the religion of Jesus Christ. His complete Works have been several times published, e.g., Boston, 1856, 3 vols.; New York, 1860, London, 1861; his Age of Reason repeatedly, e.g., New York, 1876; and his Theological Works (complete), New York, 1860, 1 vol. His Life has been written by Francis Olydys (pseudonyme for George Cheetham), London, 1791, 5th ed., 1792, continued by William Cobbett, 1796 (abusive); James Chetham, New York, 1809 (written by one who knew him in his last days; this is the source of all the damaging stories about Paine: Cheetham meant to be fair, but was disingenuous); Thomas Clio Rickman, London, 1814 (apologetic, but honest, a good corrective of Cheetham's exaggerations. Rickman speaks with propriety and moderation, was friendly to Paine, but is compelled to give him, on the whole, a bad character); W. T. Sherwin, London, 1819 (apologetic); J. S. Harford, Bristol, 1820; G. Vale, New York, 1841 (apologetic); Charles Branc, New York, 1879 (a thoroughgoing defence of Paine, written in a careful style, and interlarded with irrelevant and questionable matter; it is prefixed to the edition of Paine's Theological Works mentioned above). See also G. J. Holyoke: Essay on the Character and Services of Paine, New York, 1876; cf. Leslie Stephen: History of English Thought, London and New York, 20 ed., 1881, 2 vols., vol. ii. pp. 458-464, vol. ii. 290-294; McMaster: History of the People of the United States, N.Y., vol. i. 1888, pp. 150-154. Samuel M. Jackson.

PAINTING, Christian. The first law which governed the early Christian sculptors and painters was to present Christ as the source and centre of their life, and so to represent him as that all other figures in their compositions should appear like rays emanating from him. With respect to the contents and spirit of representation, it may be said, that, during the entire period of early Christian art, both sculpture and painting were, for the most part, limited to symbolical expression. In the beginning, symbolical representations were alone permitted. Soon, however, the art impulse partially broke away from these forms of artisticsymbolism, and served chiefly as a mere reminder of the themes of sacred history. Even at a later period, when works of art were employed in multitudes for church decoration, it manifested a great partiality for scenes from the Apocalypse, representations of Christ enthroned as Judge and King of the world, the grouping of single figures in decidedly symbolical relationship.

As early as the fourth century we find a portrait-like representation of sacred personages accompanying these forms of artistic symbolism. It was even credited that veritable portraits of Christ, the Madonna, and the apostles, existed in paintings from the hand of St. Luke, and in sculpture from that of Nicodemus, in the napkin of St. Veronica, yea, even in the so-called "exupœrator" ("likenesses of celestial origin"). In the first third of the early Christian period, from the third to the second half of the fifth century, from which numerous works of art in the so-called cemeteries (Catacombs of Rome, Naples, Syracuse, etc.) have been preserved, painting maintained unchanged the ancient plastic method of representation. Principal monuments, besides the paintings in the cemeteries, the mosaics of St. Costanza and St. Maria Maggiore in Rome,
St. Giovanni in Fonte, and St. Nazario e Celso at Ravenna. In the second third till the eighth century, art sought more and more to adapt the antique forms to the idealistic, transcendental spirit of Christianity. Principal monuments, the mosaic of St. Pudentiana and SS. Cosma e Damiano in Rome, of St. Appolinare Nuovo, St. Appolinare in Classe, and St. Vitale, at Ravenna, and a few similar works.

After the eighth century, painting, and, in fact, the entire art of early Christianity, lapsed into a continually deepening decline, till the eleventh century. Examples are seen in the mosaics of St. Prassede, St. Marco, and others in Rome, miniatures of various manuscripts, and the Iconostases of Greek and Russian churches.

In easel pictures, which previously appear to have been very little painted, there is manifest no higher artistic endeavor until the middle of the fourteenth century. After this, however, three separate schools started forth, each on its own path: (1) The Bohemian, or school of Prague, founded by Charles IV; (2) The Nuremberg school, the chief monument in the later part of the Gothic style; and (3) The school of Cologne, the followers of which are several altar-shrines in the Frauenkirche in St. Lawrence and St. Sebald in Nuremberg.

In the beginning of the fifteenth century broke forth, in opposition to the spirit of medievalism, a decided endeavor after greater truth of expression in art, — an endeavor in light, color, drawing, and composition, to bring the spiritual import of representation into harmony with the laws and principles of nature. This naturalistic development first manifested itself in Italy, and by this means to infuse new life into the old Christian types.

The Romanesque style of painting first reached completeness in Giovanni Cimabue of Florence (d. after 1300) and in Duccio di Buonsignori of Sienna (flourished about 1282). On this wise there grew up in competition with each other two separate schools of painting, — that of Florence, and that of Sienna; the Florentine, of a severer type, approaching nearer to the early Christian (Byzantine), the Siennese characterized more by tenderness and sentiment, more independent, and likewise more graceful in the rendering of form. The first of these schools was allied to its spirit was Raphael's father, Giovanni Santi (d. 1494), and Francesco Francia (d. 1517), the friend of Raphael, and one of the first masters of the fifteenth century.

The remaining schools of Italy follow the Florpainter of celestial blessedness, whose Madonnas and angels, although of surpassing loveliness, are nevertheless chargeable with those faults which are not so much over thoughts of warning and teaching mankind, as over deeds which shall con-
The only artist who can be compared with the great master of Nuremberg is Hans Holbein the younger (1497-1554). In his larger compositions, for example, in the mural paintings of the Assembly Hall of German merchants in London, he imitated the paintings of Raphael. The Darmstadt Madonna, of which the one at Dresden is an excellent copy, and his well-known Dance of Death, a series of woodcuts, are his most characteristic works.

In the second half of the sixteenth century the painting of Germany and the Netherlands lost its independence by servile imitation of Italian masters. In Italy, likewise, we find a sudden decline, which clearly evidences that art had passed its zenith. A second race of pupils became mere imitators, even exaggerating the one-sidedness of Titian, Correggio, and Michel Angelo. The best examples of these so-called “mannerists” were Fr. Salviti and Giorgio Vasari, the renowned historian of painting.

In opposition to this confusion, at the end of the century arose the Bolognese school of the Caraccio, whose advent marks for Italy the commencement of the fourth period of modern painting. Ludovico Carracci (1555-1619) and his two nephews and pupils, Agostino and Annibale Carracci (1560-1609), the latter the most gifted, established a sort of eclectic system, whose purpose was to imitate the chief distinguishing qualities of the five great masters of painting. Their best pupils were Domenichino (1581-1641), Guercino (1590-1666), Franc. Albani (1579-1660), and especially Guido Reni (1575-1642), the most distinguished of all.

The second school of Italian painting in the beginning of the seventeenth century arrayed itself in opposition to the idealism of the great masters, and developed a one-sided realism and naturalism. The principal representative of this was Mic. Angelo Amerighi da Caravaggio (1559-1609), whose pupils—the two Frenchmen, Moyse Valentin and Simon Vouet, and the eminent Spanish master, Gius. Ribera, called Spagnoletto—applied their training in France and Spain. Notwithstanding eminent talents were developed in Italy in both these directions, their chief representatives hold rank inferior to that of the masters of Spain and Netherlands in the seventeenth century; and in the eighteenth century Italian painting reached its lowest level of decadence.

It was in Spain that the new revival of Catholicism in art found, in the seventeenth century, its strongest support. The five great masters who represent the completest development of painting in Spain were almost all from the school of Seville. The founder was Titian, who, already in the year 1588, was the pupil of the school of Valencia; 2. Francisco Zurbaran (1598-1662); 3. Diego Velasquez da Silva (1599-1660), one of the most eminent of portrait-painters; 4. Alonso Cano (1601-67), founder of the school of Granada; and 5. Bartolome Esteban Murillo of Seville (1618-82), a pupil of Ribera, the greatest of all, whose paintings the peculiar excellences of Spanish art have the most brilliant illustration.

The Madonna ideal of Murillo is quite different from the Italian and the German, and is distinguished above all for the quality of religious ecstasy. In contrast with his religious paintings, Murillo developed great talent in humorous representations of street scenes among the Spanish peasantry. This flourishing period of Spanish painting was of short duration; and in the last quarter of the seventeenth century the schools of Spain degenerated into mere factories of art, such as Luca Giordano of Italy introduced.

The painting of the Netherlands maintained a certain elevation of rank for a somewhat longer period. Two distinct schools were developed out of national divisions. One had its seat in Brabant (Belgium), which, after the conflicts of the sixteenth century, returned in general adherence to Catholicism, and loyalty to monarchical institutions. The other flourished in Holland, where the freedom of Protestant faith and a moderate popular government had acquired a firm foothold. The head of the school of Brabant in historical painting, as in all other branches of art, was the most distinguished of all portrait-painters, the Rubens.

In opposition to this confusion, at the end of the century arose the Bolognese school of the Caraccio, whose advent marks for Italy the commencement of the fourth period of modern painting. Ludovico Carracci (1555-1619) and his two nephews and pupils, Agostino and Annibale Caracci (1560-1609), the latter the most gifted, especially Guido Reni (1575-1642), the most distinguished of all.

France and Germany can be considered at this position of importance during this period in a brief review of Christian painting. In Germany the Thirty Years' War had nearly uprooted all elements of culture; and when, in the eighteenth century, the country began to recover from these devastations, masters of only subordinate rank—for example, Balih, Denner, Dietrich, and Raphael Mengs (1728-79)—appeared on the stage.

In France the older and better masters, like Nic. Poussin, Eustache Lesueur, and others, strove in vain to make head against the theatrical style represented by Charles Lebrun, the favorite of Louis XIV.

Since the diffusion over Europe of that immoral and religious spirit which preceded and followed the French Revolution, Christian painting has naturally experienced a marked decline. But in Germany, France, and Belgium, individual schools have again grown up, the excellences of which, in the appreciation of the grand and the beautiful, cannot be denied. In Germany, Munich and Dusseldorf must be especially mentioned as the principal seats of revived painting, in which sacred themes occupy a not insignificant place, and these treated both in a Catholic and a Protestant spirit. As representatives of the former may be mentioned Cornelius, Overbeck, Furich, H. Hess, Schraudolph, and others; of the latter, Lessing, Hubner, Bendemann, Deger, von Gebhardt, and others.
ing, as might be expected from the religious conditions of the present time, seems partly a mere endeavor to revive a greatness and power which has perished, and partly a blind effort to reach a new goal, which is still enshrouded in darkness.

PAJON, Claude, b. at Romorantin in Lower Blois, 1626; d. at Carré, near Orleans, Sept. 27, 1885. He studied theology at Saumur, under Amyraut, Placeus, and Capellus, and was in 1650 appointed minister of Machecoul, and in 1666 professor of theology at Saumur. But the sensation caused by the attack on the Reformed church, especially by Papin, in his Essais de théol. sur la providence et la grâce, etc., Francfort, 1687; Melchoir Leydècker: Veritas evangelica triumphans; Friedr. Spanheim: Controversiarum elencus; Valentin Löschler: Exercit. theol. de Claud. Pajon., Leipzig, 1892. A. Schweizer.

PALAFOX DE MENDOZA, Juan de, b. in 1600; d. in 1659; was made bishop of Puebla de los Angeles in Mexico in 1638, and bishop of Osma in Spain in 1658. He wrote a book, Virtute del Indio, to effect another policy with respect to the natives of Spanish America; but the Jesuits compelled him to give up the cause, and return to Europe. He also wrote a history of the conquest of China by the Tartars, a history of the siege of Fortarabia, and a number of mystical and devotional books. A collected edition of his works appeared in Madrid, 1792, 15 vols. fol. His life was written by Gonzales de Resende, Madrid, 1666, French translation, Paris, 1900.

PALAMAS, Gregorius, the leader of the hesychasts; was a native of Asia, and a favorite of the emperor, John Cantacuzenus, but gave up his career at the court, and became a monk of Mount Athos. As he was the principal defender of the ideas of the hesychasts, the church of Constantinople condemned him to death Oct. 15, 1569. For some years' imprisonment, he was convicted, and sent two copies to Germany, but which was not published until 1606, at Leipzig. In 1546 he was appointed professor at Lucca; but not feeling well, he resigned his professorships, and settled as minister in Orleans, where he spent the rest of his life. He is the father of the so-called Pajonism, a peculiar development of the doctrinal system of the French-Reformed Church. Camero introduced at Saumur the views that the will is completely free, and that the origin of sin is due to an obscuration of the intellect; and from these premises he inferred that the grace which works conversion is not a "mystery", but a blind force of nature, but a moral agency. Amyraut developed these views further by distinguishing between an objective and a subjective grace, between the external means of grace, which are free to all, and the internal working of the Holy Spirit, which explains why some are converted, and others not. But this subjective grace Pajon rejected, declaring that the sum total of external circumstances is in any given case sufficient to explain the conversion of an individual; since God governs the world through the objective connection between cause and effect, without any concurring, direct interference of Providence. A literary exposition of his ideas he never gave. His Examen du lievre qui porte pour titre Préjugés légitimes contre les Calvinistes (1673) is simply a refutation of Nicol's attack on the Reformed Church; and his Remarques sur l'Avènement du Christ (1675) are to be regarded as the attacks of the Roman-Catholic clergy in France on the Huguenots. He simply propounded them from the cathedral and in the pulpit; but he found many and enthusiastic disciples,— Papin, Lenfant, Allix, Du Vidal, and others,— and caused great commotion. As after 1680 the king would not allow the National Synod to assemble, the National Synod was the only competent court in cases of heresy, the provincial synods took the matter in their hands, and the pupils of Pajon were everywhere excluded from the offices of the church. See JURIEU: Traité de la nature et de la grâce, etc. (Utrecht, 1687), which was very ably answered by Papin, in his Essais de théol. sur la providence et la grâce, etc., Francfort, 1687; Melchoir Leydècker: Veritas evangelica triumphans; Friedr. Spanheim: Controversiarum elencus; Valentin Löschler: Exercit. theol. de Claud. Pajon., Leipzig, 1892. A. Schweizer.

PALEARIO, Aonio (Della Paglia, Antonio Degli Pagliaricci), b. at Veroli in 1500; burnt in Rome July 3, 1570; one of the most prominent humanists of his age. He studied in Rome, 1527, and settled in 1530 as a teacher at Siena, where in 1536 he published his great didactic poem,— De immortalitae animarum. In 1542 he was summoned before the Inquisition, the materials for the accusation having been derived from his newly published Della prudenza, sufficiente e satisfazione della passione di Cristo; but he defended himself so brilliantly, that he was acquitted. In Siena he also wrote his Actio in Pontifices Romanos et eorum asseclas, of which in 1566 he sent two copies to Germany, but which was not published until 1606, at Leipzig. In 1546 he was appointed professor at Lucca; but not feeling safe there, on account of the paramount influence of the Romish court, he removed in 1555 to Milan. But he did not escape his fate. In 1567 the inquisitor of Milan, Fra Angelo, accused him of heresy, and sent him to Rome, where, after two years' imprisonment, he was convicted, and condemned to death Oct. 15, 1569. For some unknown reason, however, the verdict was not executed until July the following year. Collect ed editions of his works were published at Lyons, 1552, Bremen, 1619, Amsterdam, 1696, and Jena, 1728. See Gurlitt: Leben des A. P. Hamburg, 1805; Mrs. Young: The Life and Times of A. P., London, 1860, 2 vols.; Jules Bonnet: Aonio Palæario, Paris, 1862; to him was formerly attributed The Benefit of Christ's Death, Eng. trans., Boston, 1860. benrath.

PALESTINE. Palesketh (W Rich., "land of wanderers"), meaning Philistia, occurs eight times in the Old Testament, and in King James's Version is rendered three times Palestine, once Palestine, three times Philistia, and once the Philistines. The Greek Ἰδαρίας, originating probably in Egypt, occurs for the first time in Herodotus [i. 105, ii. 194, iii. 5, v. 89], who means by it only Philistia, though in one passage he appears to have carried its northern boundary as far up as Beirūt. In the later Greek and Roman period the name was applied, as we apply it, to the whole country occupied by the Israelites on both sides of the Jordan. Josephus uses the word in both of these senses. In Ant. I. 6, 2, Philistia only is meant; in Ant. VIII. 10, 3, it is the whole country on both sides of the river. The Greek name of the country was the Land of Canaan (Gen. xi. 31), or simply Canaan, "Lowland," meaning only the country west of the Jordan, in contrast with the higher lands east of the river, the western territory being all that was originally promised to Abraham. Other scriptural names are West Jordan, the land of Israel, the land of Promise, and the Holy Land (Zech. ii. 12), which last has been for centuries the most popular name. The situation and its boundaries indicated at once opportunity and isolation. It lay between great kingdoms: Egypt on one side, Chaldea, Assyria, and Babylon on the other. The Mediterranean wasthe West, with nearly one great harbor indenting the coast. A desert on the south separates it from Egypt. The same desert sweeps around between it and the Euphrates. On the north a gigantic gateway opens out between the ranges of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. The boundaries cannot be determined exactly; approximately they are as follows,—on the west the Mediterranean; on the north a line beginning near the Promontorium Album, in lat. 33° 10', trending northward, till, near the southern base of Hermon, it strikes lat. 33° 16', and then runs straight on to the desert; on the east the Arabian Desert; and on the south the parallel of lat. 31°, a little south of Beerseba (31° 12'), curving to take in Kadesh. Within the boundaries thus roughly indicated there are about twelve thousand square miles, divided by the Jordan into nearly equal portions. The length of this territory is about a hundred and fifty miles; the average breadth east of the Jordan about forty miles, west of the Jordan a little more than forty miles. The country is made up of four parallel strips of territory running north and south, lowland and highland alternating. Along the Mediterranean coast is a strip of lowland: in the Phoenician section of it about twenty miles long and from four to six miles broad; in the Sharon section of it, south of Carmel, more than thirty miles long and about ten miles broad; and in the Philistine section of it, forty miles long and from ten to twenty miles broad. This strip of lowland is interrupted by the ridge of Carmel, which branches off from the mountains of Samaria, runs north-westward for twelve miles, rises at one point to the height of eighteen hundred and ten feet above the sea, and thrusts out into the sea a promontory, five hundred feet broad. On all this coast the only bay of any importance is that of Acre, just north of Carmel. Next to this is the highland strip, some twenty-five or thirty miles in breadth, which springs from the roots of Lebanon, swells into the hills of Galilee, is interrupted by the plain of Esdraelon, as the lowland strip just referred to is interrupted by the ridge of Carmel, swells again into the hills of Samaria, reaches its greatest average height in Judæa, and then falls off into the desert south of Beerseba. This broad, high, central strip of West Jordanic territory has been likened to a ship's long-boat turned upside down. Among the highest points in Galilee are Sa'daf (probably the "city set on a hill" of Matt. x. 16), 1,775 feet above the sea, and Jebel Jermüik, near by, which is nearly 4,000 feet high. In Samaria the highest points are Ebal, 3,077, Gerizim, 2,849, and Tell Asur (supposed to be the ancient Baal-hazor of 2 Sam. xii. 23), nearly 3,400 feet above the sea. In Judæa the highest points in Jerusalem is 2,583, Olivet 2,893, Hebron 3,040, and Beerseba, 758 feet above the sea. The Jordan Valley, at some points quite narrow, and at others from five to ten or twelve miles broad, is one of the wonders of the world. The Jordan itself ("Descender"), from 1,080 feet above the sea at the foot of Hermon, falls in twelve miles to seven feet above the sea-level at Lake Hûleh, at ten miles and a half farther down enters the Sea of Galilee, 682.5 feet below the Mediterranean, and sixty-five miles farther down empties into the Dead Sea, 1,292 feet below the Mediterranean. Thus, between Hermon and the Sea of Galilee the descent is more than sixty feet to the mile, and between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea about nine feet to the mile. The fourth stripe of the Jordan is mostly high table-land, some of it 3,000 feet high, sinking away eastward into the Arabian Desert.

Of the four lakes of Palestine, the northernmost is Phiafa, five miles east of Banias, nearly round, about a mile in diameter, and of unknown depth, occupying apparently the crater of an extinct volcano. It is about 3,300 feet above the Mediterranean, is now known as an ancient lake, and is supposed, one of the sources of the Jordan, has, indeed, neither inlet nor outlet, and abounds in frogs and leeches. Lake Hûleh ("Waters of Merom," Josh. xi. 7), the Semechonitis of Josephus (Ant. V. 5, 1), some twelve miles south of Banias, in the midst of an extensive papyrus marsh, seven feet above the sea-level, is triangular in shape, with its apex pointing southward, four miles long, nearly four miles across its northern end, and fifteen feet deep. Some ten miles and a half farther down is Gennesaret, twelve miles and a half in length, eight miles in its greatest breadth (at Magdala), 185 feet deep, and 82.5 feet below the Mediterranean. This lake is remarkable for the abundance of its fish, the suddenness and violence of its storms, and the hot-springs along the shore. The Dead Sea, sixty-five miles farther south, is about forty-six miles long, with an average breadth of ten miles, 1,292 feet below the Mediterranean when the sea is at the fullest after the winter rains, and over 1,300 feet deep at the deepest point; the source of all, according to what we used to be thought the Valley of Siddim, being very shallow. The extraordinary depression of the Dead Sea was never suspected till in March, 1837, it was detected and measured by Moore and Beke, experimenting by means of boiling water. They made the depression, however, only about 600 feet, which Symons, in 1840-41, made it 1,231 feet; Lynch, in 1848, made it 1,316; and Conder, in 1874, made it 1,392 feet. No fish live in the Dead Sea, the water being extremely salt and bitter, containing twenty-six per cent of solid matter. The impression generally received of the scenery is that of grandeur and desolation. But some travellers have been much impressed, and others have noted the beautiful features of the Dead Sea. Many of the so-called rivers of Palestine are merely winter torrents, which run dry in summer. Of perennial streams, some sixteen in all, the most important is the Jordan. Itsthreesources are at Hasbeiya, at Banias, and at Tell el-Kady (the ancient Dan): the first of which contributes about one-fifth; the second, one-third; and the third, four-sevenths of the water. Between Banias (about ten miles south of Hasbeiya) and the Dead Sea, the distance is a hundred and four miles. The Jordan has four tributaries,—two from the east, and two from the west. The eastern tributaries are the Yarmuk (ancient Hieromax), which drains the Haurat, and the Zerka (ancient Jablok), which is fed by the mountains of Gilead. The western tributaries are the Jalud, near Bethshean, and the Ftr'ah, where Enon (John iii. 23) has been looked for. Three permanent streams empty into the Dead Sea from the east: the northernmost of these, about ten miles down, is the Zerka M'sain, in whose valley are the hot-springs of Edom and Moab. Eight perennial streams flow into the Mediterranean. The northernmost of these is the Mešhūk of Upper Galilee. South of this is the Namein (ancient Belus), near Acre, celebrated for the accidental discovery of the art of making glass. Next is the Mukūţa (the Kishon, "that ancient river," Judg. v. 21), which drains the large and fertile plain of Esdraelon. The plain of Samaria, extending from the south of Carmel north of Machaerus, where John the Baptist was imprisoned and murdered. Halfway down is Arion, which divided Moab from the Amorites. At the south-eastern corner is el-Ahsy, which Robinson identifies with Zered (Deut. ii. 13), the ancient dividing-line between Edom and Moab. Eight perennial streams flow into the Mediterranean. The northernmost of these is the Mešhūk of Upper Galilee. South of this is the Namein (ancient Belus), near Acre, celebrated for the accidental discovery of the art of making glass. The central part of the Jordan Valley must have been caused by some great convulsion of nature, antedating the historic period. The Dead Sea is no doubt much older than the time of Abraham, and the Cities of the Plain are not at all likely to have stood on ground now covered by the water. Hot-springs and geysers. Earthquakes are frequent and severe. In 1837 Safed and Tiberias were destroyed by a shock.

The present climate of Palestine is said by Conder to be "trying and unhealthy," but by reason of human neglect, rather than by reason of any great climatic change. The Jordan Valley is especially unhealthy, a little way north of Carmel. The northern part of the Jordan Valley is a rough, basaltic area of about five square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest part of the Jordan, the Nubian sandstone shows itself on the east side of the Dead Sea, but is not found west of the Jordan. In the Lejah district, east of the Jordan, is a rough, basaltic area of about five hundred square miles. Lava deposits are found also in the plateaus and plains west and south-west of Galilee. The lowest Palestine.

Tristram reports eighty species of mammals. Of wild animals, the lion and the "unicorn," or wild bull (Num. xxiii. 22), are extinct; and all the larger kinds are rare, for want of sheltering woods. The behemoth of Job (xl. 16), probably the hippopotamus, is no longer seen. But still there are wolves, foxes, leopards, wild boars, antelopes, gazelles, foxes, porcupines, rabbits, rats, mice, and wildcats. The dogs are nearly all of one breed (the shepherd), are outcasts and scavengers, and, like jackals, make night hideous by their howlings. Of strictly domesticated animals, the horse is much less used than the ass, the mule, and the camel; which last are more economical. The buffalo, said to have been introduced by the Persians, has in some sections taken the place of the ox; and the neat-cattle of the country in general are neither so numerous nor so well cared for as in ancient times. Sheep and goats are abundant, but swine are seldom seen. Of birds, the most common are eagles, vultures, hawks, owls, etc. W. pelicans, ravens, doves, pigeons, partridges, quails, sparrows, and nightingales. Large birds of prey are particularly numerous. Brilliance of plumage is another striking feature. But singing-birds are few, the bulbul and nightingale being the most common. Dr. Tristram collected three hundred and twenty-two species of birds, and thinks that at least thirty other species might be added to the list. A small but fine collection, made in the Jordan Valley, and on the east side of the river, for the American Palestine Exploration Society, belongs now to the museum of the Union Theological Seminary in New-York City.

Fish are often referred to in Scripture, but no species are named. Gennesaret is still remarkable for its dense shoals of fish, frequently covering an acre or more of the surface. Dr. Tristram obtained fourteen species, and thinks there may be three times that number of species in the lake. The bream and sheat-fish, among the most abundant of all, are identical with the common species of the Nile. The "great fish" of Jon. i. 17, was not a "whale," as the W. of Matt. xii. 40 is unwarrantably rendered in our version, but may have been a specimen of the great white shark (Cunius carcharias), still found in the Mediterranean, and sometimes twenty-five or thirty feet long.

Reptiles abound in Palestine. Serpents are very numerous, most of them harmless, and many of them brilliantly colored. Some are venomous. Of lizards there is an immense variety. Frogs are numerous, but are all of one species; and only one species of the toad is known. The crocodile (the "leviathan" of Job xli.) may still be found in the Jordan. There are few snakes of any kind. Insects are abundant, especially locusts, grasshoppers, crickets, and cockroaches, also fleas, lice, and mosquitoes. The bee, the wasp, and the hornet.

The immediate predecessors of the Hebrews in Palestine were the Cansanites, of Hamitic blood. But these were preceded by an aboriginal, prehistoric population, supposed to have been Semitic. This prehistoric population had probably occupied the country on both sides of the Jordan, but in the time of Abraham we find the flora of Palestine, unlike that of Egypt, is richly varied. Not less than a thousand species of plants have been reported, and probably another thousand might be added; but only a very small portion of these are noticed in the Bible. No tourist ever forgets the impression made upon him by the flowers of Palestine. For mile on mile, in the proper season, the ground is radiant with all the colors of the rainbow. Everywhere one sees the scarlet anemone, thought by some to be our Lord's "lily of the field." The ranunculus and the pheasant's-eye (Adonis palatina) are also very brilliant. The narcissus, the crocus, and the mallow are all candidates for the honor of being considered "the rose of Sharon." Of Crusader times the pine-forest then standing between Jerusalem and Bethlehem has disappeared. The treenow most common is oleander. The whole country was once well timbered; and still there are groves, and even forests, of pine and of oak beyond the Jordan. On the west side of the river, all the way up from Beer-sheba to Lebanon, there are very few trees except on Tabor and Carmel. Since the time of the Crusaders the pine-forest then standing between Jerusalem and Bethlehem has disappeared. Repeated wars and conquests, and dreary centuries of being considered "the rose of Sharon." Of Crusader times the pine-forest then standing between Jerusalem and Bethlehem has disappeared. The treenow most common is oleander. The whole country was once well timbered; and still there are groves, and even forests, of pine and of oak beyond the Jordan. On the west side of the river, all the way up from Beer-sheba to Lebanon, there are very few trees except on Tabor and Carmel. Since the time of the Crusaders the pine-forest then standing between Jerusalem and Bethlehem has disappeared. Repeated wars and conquests, and dreary centuries of being considered "the rose of Sharon." Of Crusader times the pine-forest then standing between Jerusalem and Bethlehem has disappeared. The treenow most common is oleander. The whole country was once well timbered; and still there are groves, and even forests, of pine and of oak beyond the Jordan. On the west side of the river, all the way up from Beer-sheba to Lebanon, there are very few trees except on Tabor and Carmel. Since the time of the Crusaders the pine-forest then standing between Jerusalem and Bethlehem has disappeared. Repeated wars and conquests, and dreary centuries of them mostly on the east side of the river. Ched- ochlaomer, king of Elam, the contemporary of Abraham, is described in Gen. xiv. as smiting these four tribes,— the Rephaim in Bashan, south of them the Zuzim, still farther south the Emins, and another, the South, all the Hittites and Edom. On the west side of the Jordan, in the neighborhood of Hebron (Num. xiii. 28), were the Anakim, who were driven out by Joshua (Josh. xi. 21, 22), only a remnant remaining in Philistia. The Acesim of Deut. ii. 23, assumed to be identical with the Aces of Josh. xiii. 3, also probably belonged to this same aboriginal Semitic population. The earliest historic occupants of Palestine, as we have said, were Hamites, descended from Canaan, the fourth and youngest son of Ham. The date of their immigration cannot be determined. Their conquest of the aboriginal Semitic tribes was evidently not yet completed when Abraham crossed the Jordan. In the original grant of territory to Abraham (Gen. xv. 19-21), ten tribes are named, the first two of which, the Kenites and Kenizzites, were on the south, and the remaining eight, the Kadmiones, were on the east side of the river. Usually six tribes are named, as in Exod. iii. 8 and in Josh. ix. 1; but seven is the number in Josh. xxiv. 11, where the Gergashites, usually omitted, are named as if on the west side of the Jordan. These seven were the Hittites, Gergas- hites, Amorites, Canaanites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites. In the time of Moses and Joshua, the Ammon-Moab people were on the east side of the river, but had been crowded down by the Amorites, who held the whole territory from Mount Hermon to the Arnon. Reuben, Gad, and Half-Manasseh took this East-Jordan territory: the other nine tribes and a half took the West- Jordan territory. The Hebrew commonwealth reached the zenith of its prosperity and power under David and Solomon, but the decay began about 975 B.C., with the succession of the ten tribes. Assyria crushed the northern kingdom of Israel about 720 B.C., and Babylon crushed the southern kingdom of Judah about 587 B.C. Since then the country has been almost constantly under foreign dominion, with hardly more than the shadow of independence at any time. Persians, Greeks, and Romans succeeded one another in the mastery, the heroic Macca- bbean period lasting only about a hundred years. Under the Romans, in the time of Christ, there were four provinces,— Galilee, Samaria, and Judea on the west side of the river, and Perea on the east side. Since 387 A.D., when Palestine was conquered by the Saracens, it has, with little interruption, been under Mohammedan rule. The Seljukian Turks seized the country several times and by their barbarous treatment of Christian pilgrims provoked the Crusades. The Latin king- dom, with its nine successive sovereigns, estab- lished in 1099, held Jerusalem till 1187, and staid in Acre till 1291. In 1517 the Ottomans came in, and made the country a part of the Turkish Empire. It was snatched from the Sultan by Mohammed Ali in 1832; but Europe intervened, and in 1841 it was given back again to Turkey. It now belongs to the pashalics of Damascus, which includes the three sub-pashalics of Beirut, Akka, and Jerusalem. As no proper census is ever taken, the population can only be guessed at. For the whole area of ancient Palestine, Dr. Socin, in Badeker's Handbook, allows an aggregate of six hundred and fifty thousand souls,— only about a tenth part of the country that could be made to support. The Jews, who number about twentyfive thousand, are comparatively recent comers, found only in the sacred places of Jerusalem, Hebron, Tiberias, and Safed. Jerusalem has a population of twentyfive thousand, of whom ten thousand are Jews. The Samaritans at Nablous number only about a hundred and fifty. The bulk of the people are a mixed race, descendants of the ancient Syrians and their Arab-conquerors. East of the Jordan are three important tribes dwelling per- manently within recognized limits. These are, north of the Arnon, the Adwan; south of the Arnon, the Beni-Sakhr; and in the Jordan Valley, the Ghawarneh. Besides these are four tribes of Bedaween Aensech (the Wuld 'Ali, the Hesse- neh, the Ruwala, and the Bisher), who left Arabia about 120 A.D., and are always in motion, coming northward every winter, and going southward every winter. The Turkish Govern- ment has but little control of them. Dr. Mer- rill's East of the Jordan gives us admirable pictures of Arab life in Eastern Palestine. Pilgrimages to the Holy Land began with Helena, the mother of Constantine, in 326 A.D., and have continued ever since. What was then known of the country may be found in the One- mantisc of Eusebius and Jerome. During the middle ages the principal topographers of Pales- tine were superstitious, ignorant, and careless monks, whose identifications of sacred places were largely of the legendary and childish sort. The eighteenth century contributed something towards a better knowledge of the Holy Land. Reland's learned work (1714) is still a classic. Richard Pococke was in Palestine in 1725. Korte, the German bookseller, was the first (in 1741) to question the genuineness of the traditional site of the holy sepulchre. The natural history of the country was ably treated in a posthumous work of Hasselquist, edited (1757) by Linnaeus. The nineteenth century opened a new epoch in the history of biblical geography. Seetzen was in the field from 1805 to 1807, Burchhardt in 1810, Irby and Mangles in 1817-1818. But no one man has ever done so much for the geography of the Holy Land as Dr. Edward Robinson. Not only was he thoroughly prepared for his task by fifteen years of special study, but he had a passion and a genius for exact and certain knowl- edge. During two brief journeys, in 1838 and in 1852, accompanied and aided by Dr. Eli Smith, during fifteen years of special study, but he had a passion and a genius for exact and certain knowl- edge. During two brief journeys, in 1838 and in 1852, accompanied and aided by Dr. Eli Smith, he fairly swept the whole field clean of ecclesiastical traditions. He was the first to adopt and adhere persistently to the rule of looking for ancient Hebrew names under the disguise of modern Arabic names. The number of ancient places first visited or identified by him in 1838 was a hundred and sixteen. The number of identifications added in 1852 was forty-nine. And very few of these identifications have been set aside. Next in rank, with respect to the amount and quality of service rendered, is Dr. William M. Thomson, for more than forty years an American... missionary in Syria and Palestine, whose book, in two volumes, appeared in 1858, and in a new edition, in three volumes, in 1880–83. In 1848 the Lower Jordan and the Dead Sea were for the first time thoroughly explored and surveyed by Lieuts. Lynch and Dale of the United-States Navy. In 1857, under command of Col. James C. Lane, and had Dr. Selah Merrill for its archæologist. A rapid reconnaissance survey of the whole trans-Jordanic territory was made, about a hundred photographs of ruins and scenery were taken, several places of interest and importance (such as Succoth, Mahanaim, Ramoth-Gilead, and Tishbi) were identified, and in all about 230 names appeared for the first time on Meyer's map (not published). Dr. Merrill reckons about 240 biblical names east of the Jordan, besides fourteen mentioned in the Macabees, and nearly 100 of these he thinks have been identified. At this point the work of triangulation was surrendered to the English Society, which entered the field in 1881, surveyed about five hundred square miles, and was then compelled by the unsettled condition of the country to withdraw, it is hoped only for a time. The American Society published four Statements (1871, 1873, 1875, 1877), and holds in reserve Dr. Merrill's Notes upon the Meyer map. Dr. Merrill's East of the Jordan (1881) is a valuable contribution to the literature of the subject. He is now (1883) American consul in Jerusalem. In 1877 a German society was organized, and is doing good work. It publishes a monthly periodical.

Lit. — The literature of the subject is vast. Tobler, in his Bibliotheca Geographica Palestinae (1867, with supplements in 1869 and 1875), enumerates more than a thousand writers. To mention only a few of the most important and useful: the Onomasticon of Eusebius (cir. 330), translated into Latin, with additions by Jerome (388), edited by Larow and Parthey (Berlin, 1802); Descriptions Terra Sanctae, by writers of the eighth, ninth, tenth, and fifteenth centuries, edited by Tobler (Leipzig, 1874); Early Travels in Palestine, edited by Wright (London, 1848); the Historia Theologica, et Moralia Terrae Sanctae Elucidatio, of Quaresimus (Antwerp, 1839), valuable for the traditions; MAUDRELL: Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem at Easter, 1807 (Oxford, 1807); KIERNAN'S Palestine (London, 1840); also Hie Lower Jordan and the Dead Sea were for the first time thoroughly explored and surveyed by Capt. Wilson of the English Royal Engineers. This last piece of work was done under the direction of the Palestine Exploration Fund, a society organized in 1865 for the purpose of making an exhaustive exploration and accurate survey of the Holy Land. From 1867 to 1870 Capt. Warren, under the direction of the same society, was making excavations in and around Jerusalem. In 1870 the American Palestine Exploration Society was organized to work on the east side of the Jordan. The triangulation of Western Palestine was under command of Capt. Sevier Walkart, whose health soon broke down, and was finished in 1877 by Lieuts. Conder and Kitchener. They have done a great work. Of 622 biblical sites in Western Palestine, they claim to have identified 172 out of 434 in all, which they regard as now identified with reasonable certainty. Their large map, in twenty-six sheets, in the scale of three-eighths of an inch to the mile, is published in 1880. Seven quarto volumes go with it,—three volumes of Memoirs, one volume of Name Lists, one of Special Papers, one on the Flora and Fauna of Western Palestine. The reduced map (on the scale of three-eighths of an inch to the mile) is published in 1881, surveying about five hundred square miles, and made by his first compositions—three masses dedicated to Julius III. — so favorable an impression, that he was made musical director of the Julian chapel. He held similar positions at... numerous,—masses, motets, hymns, etc., but of death; and by his compositions, which are very church-music. As his masterpiece, is generally logian; was b. July, 1743, at Peterborough, where various chapels and churches in Rome until his his father was a canon in the cathedral; d. May produced a complete revolution in the history of which only one-half has been published,—he exhibited the power of close and clear reasoning, which afterwards made him distinguished.
entering Christ College, Cambridge, in 1730, he left it after, taking his degree, in 1763, to become teacher, and subsequently assistant preacher, in Greenwich. In 1765 he received the prize from Cambridge for the best Latin dissertation, his theme being a comparison of the Stoic and Epi curate philosopies; and in 1763 he was elected fellow of Christ College. He lectured at Cambridge with success till 1775, when he accepted the living of Mungrove, Westmoreland, with which he combined several others. In 1780 he was appointed prebendary of Carlisle, 1782 arch-defender, 1783 dean of Lincoln, and 1790 deof the diocese of St. Asaph. During this period he spent much time in the elaboration of his lectures. In 1794 he published his Evidences of Christianity, which had a cordial reception, and secured for him immediate promotion in the church. He was appointed canon of St. Paul's in 1795, made doctor of theology by Cambridge, and subdean of Lincoln, and soon after offered the rectory of Bishop-Wearmouth, where he spent the remainder of his life.

The most important of Paley's writings are the Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, 1785, 2 vols., for the copyright of which he received a thousand pounds; [and which went through fifteen editions in the author's lifetime]; Hora Paulina, 1790; A View of the Evidences of Christianity, 1794, 3 vols.; Natural Theology, or Evidences of the Existence and the Attributes of the Deity, collected from the Appearances of Nature, 1802. His smaller writings and sermons were published after his death under the title Sermons and 'Tracts. The Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy (German translation by Garge) was introduced as a text-book into Cambridge in 1786, where it was retained for many years. It represents the standpoint of empiricism, and called forth replies from Gisborne, Pearson, and others. As late as 1859,
Dr. Whately edited an edition with notes.

The Evidences of Christianity was Paley's most important work, if we judge by its influence upon English theology. Until very recently it was the principal theological text-book of Cambridge, and in 1819 the examination upon it was extended to three hours. The author pursues the historical method. Bolingbroke and other deists had affirmed that the truth of Christianity ought to be proved by historical arguments. Paley and Lardner took the reverse position. In working out his plan, Paley seeks to establish the two propositions, that "there is clear proof that the apostles and their successors undertook the greatest hardships rather than give up the gospel, and cease to obey its precepts," and "other miracles than those of the gospel are not satisfactorily attested." To these evidences he appends "auxiliary" arguments drawn from the "morality of the gospel," "originality of Christ's character," etc., and a consideration of some popular objections. Paley's Evidences does not touch upon the pantheistic objections to Christianity current at the present day, and is consequently not fully adapted to our present wants. The author has no claim to originality, as the substance of his arguments had been given before in Lardner's Credibility, and the Criterion of Miracles by Bishop Douglas.
A German translation appeared at Leipsic, 1797.

The Hora Paulina (German translation by H. P. C. Henke) is an able presentation of the "undesigned coincidences" between the Epistles of Paul and the Acts. The Natural Theology (German translation by Hauff, Stuttgart, 1857) is a clear popular presentation of the teleological argument for God's existence.

Able as Paley was as an apologist for Christianity, we miss in his writings a deep conviction of sin, and the recognition of the central significance of the doctrines of the atonement and justification. See Meadley: Memoirs of W. Paley, Edinburgh, 1810; [and Lives by Chalmers (in an edition of the author's works, 1821); Edmund Paley. 1835; and of the diocese of

PALISSY, Bernard, better known as Palissy
the Potter, a Huguenot artisan of humble origin, who by force of natural abilities, indomitable perseverance, and rare integrity of character, has won for himself an enviable place in history.
He was born about 1510, if not previously married. From this time forward, his life became a desperate struggle at once to solve the secrets of nature and to ward off the poverty entailed upon him by his devotion to his chosen calling.
The demand for colored glass had much diminished; and the images of saints which Palissy had formerly painted seemed likely to be banished from the homes of the people in consequence of the progress of the Reformed doctrines. But the artistic instinct of Palissy saw in pottery, could he but succeed in covering it with a suitable enameil, a material upon which he could realize some of the conceptions of his mind. For fully fifteen years did he pursue his search. He had begun with scarcely any knowledge of the properities of the clay with which he had to deal; but his repeated failures were less exasperating than the scorn he experienced abroad as a visionary, or possibly even worse, a secret counterfeiter of the king's money; while at home he was reproached by his wife for the scanty means he contributed to the common hoard. In working out his plan, Palissy had imbibed (1546) the truths of the gospel, first preached in their purity by some obscure monks whom the intolerant legislation of Francis I. soon put to death. From a convert, Palissy soon became a lay-preacher; and, though he never was ordained as a minister, his exhortations led to the formation of the Protestant church of Saints. He has himself left us an affecting description of the wretched change produced in the course of a few years upon the morals of the people of the city and its neighborhood by the work, of which his simple reading and expounding of the Bible was the humble origin. Toward the close of the reign of Henry II. the remarkable abilities of the Huguenot potter of Saints at last obtained recognition. Constable Anne de Montmorency became his patron, and somewhat relieved his poverty by furnishing him the means of building suitable ovens for baking his novel productions. But even the safeguard given him by the constable did not prevent Palissy from being thrown into prison as a heretic, when in 1562, during the course of the first "religious war," Saints was the scene of a violent reaction movement. At the request of Montmorency, Catharine de Medici issued an order for the potter’s release, and from that time forward became his protector. In 1572 he owed his safety, during the massacre of St. Bartholomew’s Day, to the queen-mother’s commands. At that time, or shortly before, Paul was the scene of a violent reaction movement. It was impossible, however, for so outspoken a Protestant to live in Paris unharmed during the troublesome years of the close of the reign of Henry III. In 1588 Palissy was again in prison because of his faith. It was on this occasion that he is said to have been visited in the Bastille by the weak king, who in vain begged him to recant, at the same time informing him, that, should he refuse, he would be compelled to leave him to his fate. The fearless answer of the humble potter, and the answers of the humble "Confession de Sancy," has become famous in history: "Sire, you have several times told me that you pitied me; but it is I that pity you, who have uttered the words, ‘I am compelled.’ That was not spoken as a king. These girls my companions, and I, who have a portion in the kingdom of heaven, will teach you this royal language, that neither the Guises, nor all your people, nor you, will know how to compel a potter to bow the knee to images.” There is no sufficient reason for doubting the substantial correctness of the reply, as it has been transmitted to us, although the form may be somewhat affected by the style of the epigrammatic writer to whom we are indebted for it. It is certain that Palissy remained in the Bastille, together with other prisoners for the faith, until after the death of the king, and himself died there, of want and bad treatment, in 1590, at the age of about eighty years. The transcendent merits of the Huguenot potter as an artist have long been acknowledged; and his productions, many of which occupy places of honor in the museums of the Louvre, of Cluny, and elsewhere, are greatly sought after. It is only within our own times that the skilful artisan has been accorded high rank as a sound thinker on political economy and as a writer of the French language inferior to few other men in the sixteenth century. Lunartine, no incompetent judge in such matters, says of him, “It is impossible not to proclaim this poor workman in clay one of the greatest writers of the French tongue. Moutaigne does not shy, in his ‘Histoire de Jean Jacques Rousseau in vigor, La Fontaine in grace, Bossuet in lyric energy.’” It may be mentioned as an historical curiosity, that a Roman-Catholic committee erected a statue to Palissy at Saints in 1808, and in its proceedings on the occasion made light of the Protestantism of a man with whom religious convictions always held the highest position. The secretary of that committee naturally attempted to prove Palissy’s reply to Henry III. to be apocryphal. Monographs on Palissy’s life and works abound in the French language. For contemporary references to him, see LESTOILE: Journal de Henri III., and AGRÉZA D’AUBIGNE: Confession catholique de Sancy. The Bulletin of the French Protestant Historical Society contains numerous instructive articles. O. DOUEN contributes a thorough sketch to LICHENBERGER: Encyclopédie des Sciences religieuses. See also HENRY MORLEY: Life of Bernard Palissy, N.Y., 1852, 2 vols. HENRY M. BAIRD.

PALLADIUS, the opponent of Epiphanius and Jerome in the Origenistic controversy; b. in Galatia about 368; went, when he was twenty years old, to Egypt, to make himself acquainted with the great fathers of monasticism. Though the hermits whom he first approached, in the vicinity of Alexandria, were so severe that he did not feel strong enough to join them, he lived for a long time among the hermits of Mount Solymos, the Skitic Desert, and the Thebais. From Egypt he went to Palestine, where he spent three years among the monks of Mount Olivet, and became acquainted with Rufinus. In 400 he was consecrated bishop of Helenopolis in Bithynia by John Chrysostom, at that time patriarch of Constantinople. As an ardent adherent of Chrysostom, he became in 403 enthralled in the Origenistic controversy. The reports are obscure and confused concerning this point. It is certain, however, that he went to Rome, probably in order to invoke the aid of Honorius in behalf of the exiled Chrysostom. On his return to the East he was seized, and banished to Syene in Upper Egypt. After many sufferings, he was permitted to remain at Tyre in Palestine as bishop of Aspona in Galatia, where he died at the time of the Council of Ephesus, 431. Three works, still extant, have been ascribed to him; but only one of them, Historia Lausiaca, is of undoubted authenticity. It is a collection of lives of Egyptian and Palestinian monks, written c. 420, partly from Egyptian, partly from Syene, and partly from the work of Rufinus, and dedicated to Lausius, governor of Cappadocia. It is found in Migne: Patrol. Graec., xxxiv.; see also Weingarten: Der Ursprung des Münchtm. Gotha, 1877, and Baring-Gould, in Contemporary Review, October, 1877. Whether the Dialogo de vita Chrysostomi, edited by E. Bigot, Paris, 1880, and the De Genitibus Indie, edited by E. Bisseus, Lon., 1605, are by the same author as the Historia Lausiaca, or by some other Palladius, is very questionable. ZÖCKLER.

PALLADIUS, Scotorum Episcopus. Date and place unknown. Prosper Aquitanus says in his chronicle for A.D. 429, that Palladius, then a deacon, induced Pope Celestine to send St. German of Auxerre to Britain against the Pelagians. In the same chronicle for A.D. 431 occurs the well-known passage, "Ad Scoxos in Christum credentes ordinatur a papa Celestino Palladius, et primus episcopus miltitatur." None now doubts that by Scott the Irish are meant. The Irish "Lives" of St. Patrick all represent the mission of Palladius as a failure, and as lasting only a few months. Most of them say that he left the country, and died among the Britons or the Picts, although Tirechan says (and the author of the fourth "Life" of Colgan's collection countenances the tradition) that he suffered martyrdom in Ireland. This account is irreconcilable with the successes recorded in the very lives, and with the statement of Prosper, who knows nothing of St. Patrick, that Celestine had made Ireland Christian. It seems probable that the papal commission, together with the connection with St. German and other facts in the life of Palladius have been transferred to St. Patrick, and then the date of the death of the former made early enough to admit the possibility of his successor having a commission from Celestine, who died in April, 432. There is no good authority for holding as genuine any of the writings attributed to Palladius. See Colgan: Acta sanctorum veteris et Majoris Scotia, seu Hibernio: sanctorum insula, Louvain, 1645, fol. ROBERT W. HALL.

PALLAVICINO or PALLAVICINI, Sforza, b. in Rome in 1807; d. there in 1897. He entered the order of the Jesuits in 1837, and was appointed professor of philosophy at the Jesuit college in Rome in 1839, and professor of theology in 1843. His principal work is his history of the Council of Trent. In 1819 appeared the work of Paolo Sarpi, and it was considered urgently necessary to encounter its violent attacks. Consequently the Jesuit Terenzio Alciati was charged by Urban VIII. with collecting the necessary materials; and when he died, in 1651, the execution of the work was confided to Pallavicino. The book, written in Italian, appeared in two volumes folio, in Rome, 1656, 1657, and was received with great satisfaction by Roman-Catholic critics, though it is very far from having overthrown the censures of Sarpi. The best edition of it is that in six volumes quarto, Faenza, 1792-99. The Latin translation of it by the Jesuit Giattinus, Antwerp, 1673, 3 vols. In 1650 the author was made a cardinal by Alexander VII. HERZOOG.

PALLIUM (Latin pallium, "a cover," "a mantle"), a white woollen scarf of the breadth of a hand, and adorned with six black crosses, is an ecclesiastical ornamemt borne by the highest officers of the Roman-Catholic Church on the most solemn occasions. Its origin is variously explained; some referring it to the head-band of the Jewish high priest, others to the mantle of the Roman emperor. Most probably, however, it is connected with the ἄποστολος, super-humerale, shoulder-band of the high priest, which, by being adopted by the Christian Church, came to symbolize the Lord seeking after the lost lamb, and carrying it, when found, on his shoulder. From the East it was early transferred to the West, where it became a custom for the bishop of a see to present it to the metropolitan elected with his see. The testimonies to the existence of this custom in the beginning of the sixth century are spurious; but under Gregory I. (590-604), it appears to have been firmly established; and from the time of Boniface IV. (908-915) the popes protested that it was necessary for every metropolitan or archbishop to obtain the pallium from Rome. See Würtzwein: Bonifacii Epistolar, Mayence, 1789, Ep. 73. Though the candidate might have been confirmed and consecrated, the title of Archiepiscopus and the full pontifical authority, the plenitude pontificis officii, still depended upon the actual possession of the pallium: before receiving that, the archbishop could, for instance, not call a synod. On its reception, the archbishop took an oath of obedience to the pope. The pallium was paid for it. With respect to the fabrication of palliums, it was enacted that the wool should be taken only from certain sheep. On Jan. 21, the Day of St. Agnes, a number of white lambs are driven by the Vatican, where the pope speaks a benediction over them, into the Church of St. Agnes. The nuns of St. Agnes then take care of the lambs, cut and spin the wool, and make up the palliums. These are laid on the altar of the Church of the Vatican, that is, on the tomb of the apostle Peter; and on June 28, the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul, the palliums are blessed by the pope. In the East every bishop has his pallium; in the West, only the pope, the metropolitan, the archbishops, and such bishops as are "exempt." When, in 1748, the pallium was presented to the bishop of Würzburg, though he stood under the authority of the metropolitan of Mayence, the measure aroused considerable criticism. See Casp. Barthel: De pallio, Bamberg, 1753 (pro); and J. G. Pertsch: De origine, usu et autoritale pallii archiepiscopalis, Helmstadt, 1754 (contra). H. F. JACOBBON.

PALMER, Christian David Friedrich, eminent as a pulpit orator of the evangelical church in Württemberg; b. at Winnenden, near Stuttgart, Württemberg, Jan. 27, 1811; d. at Tubingen, May 29, 1875. He studied theology at Tubingen, 1828-33, and was appointed preacher at Marbach in 1838, and at Tubingen in 1843, and professor of practical theology in the university in 1851. He published Evangelische Homileik, Stuttgart, 1842, 5th ed., 1867; Evangelische Katechistik, 1843, 6th ed., 1875; Evangelische Kasualreden, 1846, 4th ed., 1865; Evangelische Pädagogik, 1852, 5th ed., 1882; Evangelische Predigten, 1857; Evan getische Pastoraltheologie, 1890, 2d ed., 1893; Evangelische Hymnologie, 1864; Predigten aus neuerer Zeit, 1874; Die Gemeinschaften u. Sekten Württembergs, 1877, etc. He wrote eighty-one articles, mostly on homiletical topics, in the first edition of Herzog.

PALMER, Edward Henry, English orientalist; b. in Cambridge, Aug. 7, 1840; murdered by the Bedawin in the Wady Sudr, Desert of Et Thib, Sinai, July 13, 1841, Friday evening, Aug. 11, 1882. He was graduated at St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1865, and was intrusted with drawing up the Sinai Survey Expedition in 1868, 1869, and in 1869, 1870, in company with Mr. C. F. Tywhitt Drake, explored the Desert of Et Thib and Moab, having acquired perfect familiarity with the language and manners of the Bedawin. On his return he was appointed Lord Almouner's professor of Arabic at Cambridge, November, 1871. About the end of June, 1882, on the outbreak of the war between Egypt and England, he volunteered to attempt "to dissuade the Bedawin from attacking the Suez Canal, to collect camels for transport, and to raise the wild men of the Thib against the rebels." For this end he landed at Jaffa, and came by the desert route to Suez. He left Suez, accompanied by European companions, Capt. Gill and Lieut. Charrington, R.N., Aug. 8; but at midnight of Aug. 10, the little party was captured by a large body of Tera-bin and Huwaytat Bedawin, acting under the direction of the Turkish governor at Nakhl, who probably had received his orders; and the next night the three Europeans were shot. Palmer was a remarkable linguist, and performed very valuable services to literature. His works, bearing directly upon biblical and religious studies, were The Nubian, or South Country of Scripture and the Deser of Et Thib, London, 1871; The Desert of the Exsultus, Journeys on Foot in the Wilderness of the Forty Years' Wandering, 1871, 2 vols. (a valuable volume, throwing light upon the Bedawin History of the Jewish Nation from the Earliest Times, 1874; Outline of Scripture Geography, 1874; The Quaran, 1880, 2 vols., besides reports on the nomenclature of Sinai, the Bedawin of Sinai, and their traditions, etc. See Walter Besant: The Life and Achievements of Edward Henry Palmer, London, 1883.

PALMER, Herbert, b. March 29, 1601, at Wingham, County Kent, Eng.; entered St. John's College, Cambridge, March 23, 1615 (16); took the master's degree in 1622; became fellow of Queen's College, July 17, 1623; ordained to the ministry in 1624; was made lecturer at Alphage Church, Canterbury, in 1626; removed to the vicarage of Ashwell by Archbishop Laud in 1632; and in the same year was made university preacher at Cambridge. In 1643 he was appointed a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and was chosen one of the assessors in 1646. Soon after, he became minister of Dukes-place Church, London, and was subsequently transferred to the larger field of the new church, Westminster. April 11, 1644, he was made master of Queen's College, Cambridge. He died Aug. 13, 1647, in the prime of life. Palmer was a devout man, scholarly, moderate, and a powerful preacher. He was especially devoted to catechising. He prepared several forms, the most mature of which is his Endeavour of making the principles of Christian Religion, namely, the Creed, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the Sacraments, plain and easy, 6th ed., 1645. The peculiarity of his method is a double series of answers; first, either yes or no, then a definite proposition summed up replies to several questions. This Catechism became the basis of the Westminster Catechism, as the minutes of the Westminster Assembly clearly show. Palmer was chairman of the committee on the directory of worship, and the subject of catechising was especially committed to him. He then became chairman of the committee on the Catechism, and acted as such until his death, when Anthony Tuckney was appointed in his place. Palmer was also earnest for sabbath observance. He united with Daniel Caudrey in composing one of the best works on the sabbath in existence, e.g., Vinidic Sat Sabbath, London, 1645-52, 2 vols. 4to. He was a moderate Presbyterian, and hesitated about the divine right of ruling elders, and favored a presiding bishop. He was appointed by Parliament one of the Committee of Accommodation in 1645. His deep piety is manifest in his Memorials of Godliness and Christianity, in three parts, 1644, 11th ed., 1673, 169th, 1708, in company with Lord Bacon, Lord Almouner's professor of Hebrew at Cambridge, November, 1871. About the end of June, 1882, on the outbreak of the war between Egypt and England, he volunteered to attempt "to dissuade the Bedawin from attacking the Suez Canal, to collect camels for transport, and to raise the wild men of the Thib against the rebels." For this end he landed at Jaffa, and came by the short desert route to Suez. He left Suez, accompanied by European companions, Capt. Gill and Lieut. Charrington, R.N., Aug. 8; but at midnight of Aug. 10, the little party was captured by a large body of Tera-bin and Huwaytat Bedawin, acting under the direction of the Turkish governor at Nakhl, who probably had received his orders; and the next night the three Europeans were shot. Palmer was a remarkable linguist, and performed very valuable services to literature. His works, bearing directly upon biblical and religious studies, were The Nubian, or South Country of Scripture and the Desert of Et Thib, London, 1871; The Desert of the Exsultus, Journeys on Foot in the Wilderness of the Forty Years' Wandering, 1871, 2 vols. (a valuable volume, throwing light upon the Bedawin History of the Jewish Nation from the Earliest Times, 1874; Outline of Scripture Geography, 1874; The Quaran, 1880, 2 vols., besides reports on the nomenclature of Sinai, the Bedawin of Sinai, and their traditions, etc. See Walter Besant: The Life and Achievements of Edward Henry Palmer, London, 1883.

PALM-TREE. When the Bible speaks of palm-trees, it always means the date-palm, as the only other kind of palm-trees occurring in Palestine, the dwarf fan-palm, does not fulfil the various requirements of the passages. The date-palm—palmis the Hebrew, פָּרָח, which in Arabic and Aramaic denotes the fruit—is found in various places in Palestine, both along the coast of the Mediterranean and in the interior of the country, sometimes in forests: Phœnicia is said to have received its name from it, פָּרָח. At present it cannot ripen its fruit in Palestine, except in the sub-tropical climate of Jericho and the Dead Sea: it requires an annual average temperature of 18°48' R.; and that of Jerusalem, for instance, is only 14°16' R. In antiquity it was cultivated with great care in the above-mentioned places. As the male and female flowers occur on different trees, it is necessary, in order to secure a plentiful harvest, to facilitate the fructification by cutting off the male flowers, and suspending them above the female. Five months later on, the reddish, sweet fruit is ripe. It is eaten fresh or dried. A kind of wine and a honey-like sirup are made from it. The tree is very graceful, with its slender, branchless trunk, between one and two feet in diameter and from forty to fifty, rarely eighty, feet high, and its evergreen crown of from forty to eighty feather leaves, each from six to twelve feet long. No wonder, therefore, that it made a deep impression on the imagination of the people. Thamna, the genus name, was first used Euphorbus, with Gen. xxxvii. 8; 2 Sam. xiii. 1, xiv. 27, and for cities, among which Jericho was specially called the "city of palm-trees." (Deut. xxxiv. 3; 2 Chron. xxviii. 15; Ezek. xlvii. 19, xlviii. 28). Palm-branches were used at the feast of tabernacles, in triumphal processions, etc. Palm-leaves were stamped on the Hebrew coins, and occur, also, as architectonic ornaments (1 Kings vi. 29, xxi. 33).

PAMPHILUS, the great patron of learned theology; descended from a distinguished family at Berytus in Phoenicia; studied at Alexandria under Ptolemy, a pupil of Origen; and was ordained a presbyter by Bishop Agapius of Cæsarea, from which not only Eusebius, but also Jerome, derived so great advantages. It contained the Hexapla and Tetrapla of Origen, the Hebrew Gospel which was connected with the primitive Eusebius, who (on account of the intimacy of the relations between them) was a favoritename forgirls (Gen. xxxviii. 6; 2 Kings vii. 19). Palm-branches were used at the feast of tabernacles, in triumphal processions, etc. (Acts xxiv. 25). From Cyrene in Africa, he was called to the episcopate of Paphlagonia. He arrived the episcopate from his predecessors to unite in the celebration of the hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Venerable Society for the Promotion of the Gospel; and to the very cordial and fervent words in which he referred to the "close communion which binds our churches in America and England, in order to be made known to the churches; (3) Letters commendatory, i.e., for intercommunion; (4) Colonial churches and their metropolitans; (5) Metropolitical discipline; (6) Courts for the same; (7) Appeals; (8) Colonial and home churches, conditions of union; (9) New missionary bishoprics, how to be made known to the churches; (10) Missionary jurisdiction. But the most interesting and most important result of this conference was the ratification of the sentence of deposition passed upon the bishop of Natal (Dr. Colenso) by the bishop of Capetown and his provincial bishops, although this was not a formal act of the conference as such, which was not assembled for purposes of discipline. An encyclical letter was issued to the churches, and the same, in the Latin and Greek languages, was sent to divers parts of Christendom.

The second conference was held at Lambeth in 1878, under the presidency of Archbishop Tait. It was attended by English, Scottish, Irish, and American bishops, "gathered from the Ganges to Lake Huron, from New Zealand to Labrador, from both shores of the Pacific, and from the Arctic and Antarctic circles." One of these was of African lineage. This conference, after pre-PANEGYRICON.

From Martin V. he received in 1425 the abbey of Maniacum, in the diocese of Messina, and was shortly after called to Rome, and made auditor of the Rota Romana and referendarius Apostolicus. In 1427, however, he entered the service of King Alphonso of Sicily, and went as his representative to the Council of Basel, where he took the side of Eugenius IV. When the latter removed the Council of Ferrara, Panormitanus remained in Basel (see his treatises of defence, in Mansi: Coll. Conc. xxxii., and Würtwein: Subsidia diplomatlica, v.) until the council deposed Eugenius. He then left, but returned soon after, on the order of King Alphonso, and was in 1440 made a cardinal by Felix V. His commentaries on the decreets of Gregory X. and the Clementines, his Quaestiones, Consilia, and treatises, which fill nine volumes, in the last edition (Venice, 1617), enjoyed great respect among his successors, even among the Reformers. Maenachthon quotes him as an authority in the Apologia, art. 4. See PANCILLIUS: De claris legum interpret, Leipzig, 1721; SCHULTE: Gesch. d. Quellen u. Literatur d. canonischen Rechts, 1753; CHARTERES: De dominio ecclesiastic, Strassburg, 1862; WEBBER: Geschichte des deutschen Reiches, 1877, 2 vols. H. F. Jacobson.

PANTHEISM and PANTHEIST.

From Martin V. he received in 1425 the abbey of Maniacum, in the diocese of Messina, and was shortly after called to Rome, and made auditor of the Rota Romana and referendarius Apostolicus. In 1427, however, he entered the service of King Alphonso of Sicily, and went as his representative to the Council of Basel, where he took the side of Eugenius IV. When the latter removed the Council of Ferrara, Panormitanus remained in Basel (see his treatises of defence, in Mansi: Coll. Conc. xxxii., and Würtwein: Subsidia diplomatlica, v.) until the council deposed Eugenius. He then left, but returned soon after, on the order of King Alphonso, and was in 1440 made a cardinal by Felix V. His commentaries on the decreets of Gregory X. and the Clementines, his Quaestiones, Consilia, and treatises, which fill nine volumes, in the last edition (Venice, 1617), enjoyed great respect among his successors, even among the Reformers. Maenachthon quotes him as an authority in the Apologia, art. 4. See PANCILLIUS: De claris legum interpret, Leipzig, 1721; SCHULTE: Gesch. d. Quellen u. Literatur d. canonischen Rechts, 1753; CHARTERES: De dominio ecclesiastic, Strassburg, 1862; WEBBER: Geschichte des deutschen Reiches, 1877, 2 vols. H. F. Jacobson.

PANTHEUS was the first teacher of the catechetical school of Alexandria. Very little is known of him; but, as the principal teacher of Clement of Alexandria, he is, of course, of great interest. Philip of Side (fifth century) calls him an Athenian. A notice by Clement seems to indicate that he was a native of Sicily. In the first year of the reign of Commodus, when Julian was bishop of Alexandria (that is, in 180), he was already active as a teacher in the school, and during the reign of Septimius Severus he was succeeded by Clement. After the persecution of 203 he is not heard of until the Eastern missionary tour, which, according to Eusebius, he made to India, and on which he discovered the Hebrew Gospel according to Matthew,—brought thither by the apostle Bartholomew,—is by some placed after 203; but as Jerome says that he was sent by Bishop Demetrius, and Demetrius was bishop in 190, he must have made the tour while he was still a teacher in the school. According to Jerome, he wrote numerous Commentaries on the Scriptures; but all his writings have been lost, with the exception of two small fragments, found in Potter's edition of the works of Clement, and in Routh: Reliq. sacr., i. His original philosophical standpoint was stoicism, from which he passed through the Platonic-Pythagorean eclecticisms prevalent in the second century, to Christianity. As a teacher, he gave the catechetical school of Alexandria that peculiar scientific stamp which it has retained ever since. See literature under ALEXANDRIA.

W. MÖLLER.

PANORIUS was the first teacher of the catechetical school of Alexandria. Very little is known of him; but, as the principal teacher of Clement of Alexandria, he is, of course, of great interest. Philip of Side (fifth century) calls him an Athenian. A notice by Clement seems to indicate that he was a native of Sicily. In the first year of the reign of Commodus, when Julian was bishop of Alexandria (that is, in 180), he was already active as a teacher in the school, and during the reign of Septimius Severus he was succeeded by Clement. After the persecution of 203 he is not heard of until the Eastern missionary tour, which, according to Eusebius, he made to India, and on which he discovered the Hebrew Gospel according to Matthew,—brought thither by the apostle Bartholomew,—is by some placed after 203; but as Jerome says that he was sent by Bishop Demetrius, and Demetrius was bishop in 190, he must have made the tour while he was still a teacher in the school. According to Jerome, he wrote numerous Commentaries on the Scriptures; but all his writings have been lost, with the exception of two small fragments, found in Potter's edition of the works of Clement, and in Routh: Reliq. sacr., i. His original philosophical standpoint was stoicism, from which he passed through the Platonic-Pythagorean eclecticisms prevalent in the second century, to Christianity. As a teacher, he gave the catechetical school of Alexandria that peculiar scientific stamp which it has retained ever since. See literature under ALEXANDRIA.

W. MÖLLER.

PAN-PRESBYTERIAN COUNCIL. See ALLIANCE OF THE REFORMED CHURCHES.

PAN-Theism and Pantheism are names of very recent origin, not yet two centuries old. In the works of Aristotle, the expression πανθεόν occurs, but only once, and in the sense of πανθεόν εἰςών, denoting a temple or holy place dedicated, like the Pantheon in Rome, to all the gods. In a similar sense, the phrase πανθεός τελετή, translated by Scaliger pανδιακα τελετα, occurs three times in the so-called "Orphic hymns," probably products of the Neo-Pythagorean philosophy. Otherwise the names are entirely unknown to antiqui ty, nor are they found in the middle ages. Down to the eighteenth century, all pantheistic doctrines were designated with the odious name of “atheism.” Even Boyle objects to Spinoza, not that he was an atheist, but that he was the first to introduce into philosophy the ideas of Leibnitz, Wolff, Brucker, nor the Protestant theologians of the seventeenth century, know the word, though several of them are adroit enough in contrasting the idea. The first to use it, and probably its inventor, is the English free-thinker Toland, in his Socinianism Truly Stated . . . recommended by a Pantheist to an Orthodox Friend, 1705. Four years later, the word “pantheism” occurs in J. Pay’s Defensio religiosis, 1709; and after that time both names become frequent.

On the first page of his Pantheisticum sive formula Societatis Socraticae, etc., 1720, Toland thus defines pantheism: Ex Toto quidem sunt omnia et ex omnibus est Totaum (“From the whole come all the parts, and from all the parts comes the whole”), which on p. 8 he further explains by saying: "The power and energy of the whole, creating all the parts over them, and always leading them towards the good as their goal, is God, whom you may call the mind of the universe, or its soul; and thence the Soulges Socratici are called pantheists.” Fay contended himself with saying, Pantheistarum enim Natura et Nomen unum idemque sunt (“‘To the pantheists nature and God are one and the same thing”); and this vague formula became the current definition, though Buhle, and, in harmony with him, also Kant, gave him more explicit descriptions, until with Schelling pantheism, which had hitherto been left rather unnoticed in the corner, came to the foreground, at least in German philosophy. In order to defend himself and his spiritual cousin, Spinoza, against the reproach of pantheism, Schelling endeavored to confine the name to “the doctrine of the immanence of all things in God.” But every thing depends upon in what way this “immanence” is explained. The ways are many, and the name “pantheism” might thus be made to cover quite enormous differences. Schleiermacher’s definition corresponds to his conception of the inseparableness of God and the world, which presupposes not only their identity and difference, but also a third something; and he protests that pantheism will always be the result whenever the idea of the identity of God and the world succeeds in throwing their idea of their difference into the shade. A new constituent was introduced in the definition of pantheism by A. Tholuck, in his Scyfusimus sive theosophia Persarum, 1821: Emanatium, he says, doctrina illa antiqua vocanda est respectu ad placitum de origine mundi ex Deo, Pantheismus euteneus, quod malum tumult hominemque prope nodum in axoq ponit Deo: that is, the doctrine of emanation and the doctrine of pantheism are identical with the dualism distinction between them, that the former refers to the problem of the origin of the world, and the latter to the problem of the origin of evil; and, indeed, no pantheistic conception of the world can admit the existence of evil in the full sense of the word, nor explain creation, without employing some form of emanation. Whenever Hegel speaks of pantheism, he always returns to the distinction between in the sense of “all,” and in the sense of “everything”: “protesting that the doctrine of the absolute identity, as Leibnitz, Schelling, and as Spinoza did again when protesting that a doctrine making every single thing that is, divine, and God the mere sum total of existing things,—that is, an absolute polytheism has never been propounded,—it is necessary to refer the term “pantheism” to the other sense of , that of “all.” Now, “all” denotes, indeed, a unity of “everything,” a whole, a totality; but here, again, it is left undecided whether the totality indicated is an absolute identity, excluding all difference, or whether it is an organization into unity of manifold differences.

In the former case, the apparent manifoldness and difference which characterize existence must be explained away as mere appearance, or illusion—as the Elatic school did, at least Parmenides and Zeno, and as Spinoza did again when he declared the “attributes” and “modes” of the one absolute substance, God, to be mere subjective ideas of the human mind, dependent on the peculiar organization of the organ of conception. This form of pantheism may be called the abstract, or absolute, excluding every and any difference between God and the world. Another form of pantheism, the concrete and relative, appears when the totality is conceived as a unity of the manifold, a harmony of differences; and, as a rapid glance over the natural growths of religion shows, it presents a great variety of individual characteristics, according as the relation between mind and matter, or between harmony and differences, is explained.

Tholuck remarks, that pantheism is as old as the human race; and, so far as the religious development of the view is concerned, he is right. From Shamanism and Feticism, up to the most elaborate mythologies, all natural forms of religion started, not from the deification of some single natural or spiritual phenomenon, but from a vague and obscure idea of something abstractly divine, from an awe-inspiring feeling of a highest Being standing behind the phenomena as their true cause. Only by degrees, as knowledge of nature increased, this primitive and fundamental deity was gradually identified with some special natural form, and this process of transition, or larger, which was his field of activity, his abode, his body; and, thus organized, the world was governed rationally and morally by the gods. At two different points, pantheism has endeavored to domicile itself in Christianity; viz., the doctrine of the omnipresence of God and the Logos doctrine. But the omnipresence of God does not mean omnipresence of substance, but only omnipresence of energy invisibly present, acting at a distance, like gravitation, light, electricity, etc.; and the Logos doctrine, by which creation was the beginning of all things, and reconciliation to God their final goal. By its doctrine of a creation out of nothing, Christianity has placed an efficient bar against any pantheistic mixing together of God and the world. As an element of Christianity, pantheism is a foreign importation. From the Gnostics and the Neo-Platonists it penetrated in antiquity into Christianity through the writings of Pseudo-Dionysius and in the form of mysticism. Thence it was brought by John Scotus Erigena to the mystics of the middle ages; but, the sharper and more logically it was developed, the more decidedly it again separated itself from Christianity.

In India the original conception of God as the vivifying power of light and heat gradually changed under the overwhelming impress of the vegetative productivity of the soil. As the plants burst forth from the ground, reposing in deep sleep, only to stay a little while, and then return to the earth again, giving room for new multitudes, so gods and men, and animals and plants, issue forth from the bosom of Brahma, not to stay, and peruse in that diversity, but soon to sink back again into the Source whence they came, the one Absolute Being in which the difference, no difference, no change.

The Persian religion a strongly marked dualism was developed; and the “all” was actually split into two halves under the rule, respectively, of Ormuzd and Ahriman. Nevertheless, the difference between the two gods was not merely a fixed contrast, but a conflict ever going on; and as the result of the conflict should be the overthrow of Ahriman’s reigns, only to stay a little while, and then return to the earth again, giving room for new multitudes, so gods and men, and animals and plants, issue forth from the bosom of Brahma, not to stay, and persevere in that diversity, but soon to sink back again into the Source whence they came, the one Absolute Being in which the difference, no difference, no change.

In the star-worship of the Babylonians, Phoenicians, Arabs, etc., the so-called Sabaeism, the pantheistic idea of one God, seems at first glance lost in the multitude of star-gods, each of whom represents some law in the course of nature and history; and yet, dimly behind the iron necessity of the stars looms up the autocratic god of chance, who gives good or bad fortune arbitrarily, just as he likes. But there is here no contradiction. Necessity without reason is only another name for chance without reason: the idea is the same. The Egyptian religion was, so to speak, based on the conflict between life in time and life in eternity; and that general power of life which manifested itself at once in time and in eternity was, indeed, the one great God of Egypt. With the conception of Godhead as the soul of the world, religious pantheism reaches its consummation, and this form was elaborated by the Greeks. Though so thoroughly anthropomorphic as to become the fully adequate and perfectly artistic expressions of the Greek ideas of motherhood and womanhood, the Greek gods were, nevertheless, not severed from nature. Each of them had his own part of nature, smaller or larger, which was his field of activity, his PANtheon (πανθέων), a place consecrated to all the gods. The Pantheon of Rome, built on a circular foundation, surrounded by one of the largest domes in the world, was erected in 27 B.C., by Marcus Agrippa, the son-in-law of Augustus, and originally consecrated to Jupiter Vindicatur, but afterwards destined to contain statues of all the gods. Despoiled of all its treasures, and engorged with the realm of darkness by the realm of light, the pantheistic monism was still preserved. In the star-worship of the Babylonians, Phoenicians, Arabs, etc., the so-called Sabaeism, the pantheistic idea of one God, seems at first glance lost in the multitude of star-gods, each of whom represents some law in the course of nature and history; and yet, dimly behind the iron necessity of the stars looms up the autocratic god of chance, who gives good or bad fortune arbitrarily, just as he likes. But there is here no contradiction. Necessity without reason is only another name for chance without reason: the idea is the same. The Egyptian religion was, so to speak, based on the conflict between life in time and life in eternity; and that general power of life which manifested itself at once in time and in eternity was, indeed, the one great God of Egypt. With the conception of Godhead as the soul of the world, religious pantheism reaches its consummation, and this form was elaborated by the Greeks. Though so thoroughly anthropomorphic as to become the fully adequate and perfectly artistic expressions of the Greek ideas of motherhood and womanhood, the Greek gods were, nevertheless, not severed from nature. Each of them had his own part of nature, smaller or larger, which was his field of activity, his

PAPACY AND PAPAL SYSTEM.

According to the doctrine of the Roman-Catholic Church, Christ has, in founding the Christian Church as a visible institution, given to the apostle Peter the precedence of the other apostles, made him his representative and the centre of the Church, and conferred on him the highest sacerdotal, doctrinal, and administrative authority (Matt. xvi. 18, 19; Luke xxii. 32; John xxi. 15–17). Now, as the Church was founded for all time, Peter must have a successor; and, as the see of Rome was a foundation of Peter, the succession of the primacy, with all the rights therein involved, was forever united to that see. It descends from bishop to bishop; and in the bishops of Rome, the popes. Peter is still living. See the union decree of the Council of Florence, 1439, in Mansi: Coll. Con., 31, 1031; the Roman Catechism, P. i. c. 10, qu. 11, and P. ii. c. 7, qu. 24; and the Constitutio Dogmatica, i., of the Council of the Vatican; 1870.

According to history, however, the primacy of the Pope is the result of a long development, going on for centuries; and so is the very doctrine of the Roman-Catholic Church itself. Of course, the Romanists cannot deny, that, during the first period after the foundation of the Christian Church, the bishops of Rome exercised no primacy; it was proposed, that, though not exercising it, they still possessed it.

It is true, that, as early as the second and third centuries, the congregation and the Bishop of Rome enjoyed great respect throughout the whole Occident. Not only was the Roman Church considered a foundation of Peter, but it was the only Occidental church which could boast of apostolic foundation. But though it may have tried in the third century to support its claim on precedence by an appeal to the succession from Peter, the prince of the apostles, the Council of Nicaea (325) knows nothing of a primacy of Rome over the rest of the Church. The much discussed Canon 6 places the Bishop of Rome, on account of his greater power — that is, his right to ordain all the bishops of Italy, — beside the Bishop of Alexandria, who had the right to ordain all the bishops of Egypt, Libya, and the Pentapolis; but it does not contain the slightest hint of a primacy. It was other circumstances which proved decisive for the bishops of Rome in their endeavors to acquire a legally fixed and generally recognized primatial power: first, their riches; next, their residence in the political centre of the world, with the prestige it gave them and the immense facilities of communication it afforded; and, finally, the truly diplomatic position they assumed in the dogmatical controversies beginning with the fourth century, — cautious, persevering, always on the orthodox side. In 343 a council of Sardica allowed any bishop who had been deposed by a metropolitan synod to appeal to the Bishop of Rome, who might give a prima facie verdict, or institute a new examination of the case by his legate and a number of bishops, just as he found it necessary; and thus the see of Rome became established as a kind of supreme court. In 445 Valentinian III. issued the famous decree which recognized the Bishop of Rome as the primarch of the Christian Church, and that, not only in judicial, but also in legial respects, authorizing not only the appeals which came to him, but also the orders which issued from him.

The Council of Sardica, however, was never accepted as oecumenical; and the decree of Valentinian was valid only in the West, and enhanced the power of the pope, without emancipating him from the still higher power of the emperor. The claims, therefore, based on such a council and such a decree, might easily prove to be mere pretexts. Nevertheless, in the latter part of the fifth century, Rome was able to make its influence felt in many important questions, even in the Orient. And though the process of centralization already begun was arrested by the invasion of the Germanic tribes; and though the new kingdoms which were organized in Britain, Gaul, and Spain, seemed to have left no door open for the Pope — Rome was as patient under adverse circumstances as it was bold when its opportunity came.

Though in Merovingian France the Pope was respected as the first bishop of Christendom, and though it was considered necessary to keep up community of faith with him, he was, nevertheless, by law excluded from any direct interference in the affairs of the Frankish Church: he could even not send the pallium, a mere token of honor, to an archbishop without the consent of the king. The king retained the power of deciding in all ecclesiastical matters: he convened the national synod, and its decrees became legally binding only by his confirmation. In the course, however, of the eighth century, under the rule of the Carolingian Majores Domus, a change took place. They entered into communication with Bouiface, and adopted his plans for the reform and reorganization of the Frankish Church. But Boniface acted as the legate of the Pope in accordance with instructions received from Rome; and thus it came to pass that the primacy of Rome was actually established in Gaul, though the Pope was not formally recognized as the highest authority. This state of affairs continued under Charlemagne, who exercised the highest power in the Church as in the State, and bestowed privileges and immunities on the Pope simply as the first bishop of his realm; but his whole ecclesiastical policy aimed at complete conformity between the Frankish Church and the Church of Rome. After the death of Charlemagne, during the political contests between Louis the Pious and his sons, and the ecclesiastical controversies between the Frankish bishops and their metropolitanans, the royal and imperial power proved too weak to maintain its leadership of the Church; and gradually the moral influence which the Pope had hitherto exercised grew into a direct and decisive interference, not only in ecclesiastical, but also in political matters. It was especially Nicholas I. (858-867), who, adroitly availing himself of every opportunity, proved successful in the realization of the grand papal scheme,— the subjection of all secular power to the Church, and of the Church to the Pope; and he received, in that respect, a mighty help from the Pseudosodorean decreats, which became known just at that time.

But the policy of Nicholas I. was not allowed to develop without interruption. The dissolution of the Frankish Empire brought confusion also into Italy. Rome was under the thumb of an aristocratical faction, which again was swayed by a couple of scandalous women. Without the aid of the young German Empire the degraded Popacy would perhaps never have been able to raise itself from the mire. Now, it is very true, that, from the middle of the tenth century (Otho I., Roman Emperor, 962) to the middle of the eleventh century, the German emperor was the real ruler of the Church; but he ruled on another moral and legal basis than the Frankish emperor had done. He never arrogated to himself the highest judicial or legislative power in ecclesiastical affairs. If he considered himself the head of the universal State, he considered the Pope the head of the universal Church; and many of the most important branches of the administration of the Church he left entirely to the Pope, such as the foundation of new bishoprics, the enforcement of older ecclesiastical laws, the introduction of reforms, etc. Then, in the middle of the eleventh century, there arose in Rome, under the leadership of Hildebrand (Gregory VII., 1073-85), a party whose settled purpose it was to free the Papacy from any influence from any secular power, and establish the Pope as the umpire of the world, politically as well as ecclesiastically. Gregory VII. protested that he was subject to no judge on earth, that he had power to depose the emperor, that he had a right to wear the imperial insignia, that he alone could convene a general council, depose a bishop, transfer him to another see, etc.

On the question of the right of investiture, it came to a deadly contest between the Papacy and the German emperor. That system, the so-called Papal System, found its classicalexample in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, could not fail to call forth a reaction; and in the fourteenth century the opposite tendency, leading to a more aristocratic form of government, the so-called episcopal system, began to develop. The rigid monarchical form, however, which the government of the Church had assumed in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, could not fail to call forth a reaction; and in the fourteenth century the opposite tendency, leading to a more aristocratic form of government, the so-called episcopal system, began to develop. The rigid monarchical form, however, which the government of the Church had assumed in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, could not fail to call forth a reaction; and in the fourteenth century the opposite tendency, leading to a more aristocratic form of government, the so-called episcopal system, began to develop. The rigid monarchical form, however, which the government of the Church had assumed in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, could not fail to call forth a reaction; and in the fourteenth century the opposite tendency, leading to a more aristocratic form of government, the so-called episcopal system, began to develop. The rigid monarchical form, however, which the government of the Church had assumed in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, could not fail to call forth a reaction; and in the fourteenth century the opposite tendency, leading to a more aristocratic form of government, the so-called episcopal system, began to develop. The rigid monarchical form, however, which the government of the Church had assumed in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, could not fail to call forth a reaction; and in the fourteenth century the opposite tendency, leading to a more aristocratic form of government, the so-called episcopal system, began to develop. The rigid monarchical form, however, which the government of the Church had assumed in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, could not fail to call forth a reaction; and in the fourteenth century the opposite tendency, leading to a more aristocratic form of government, the so-called episcopal system, began to develop. The rigid monarchical form, however, which the government of the Church had assumed in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, could not fail to call forth a reaction; and in the fourteenth century the opposite tendency, leading to a more aristocratic form of government, the so-called episcopal system, began to develop. The rigid monarchical form, however, which the government of the Church had assumed in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, could not fail to call forth a reaction; and in the fourteenth century the opposite tendency, leading to a more aristocratic form of government, the so-called episcopal system, began to develop. The rigid monarchical form, however, which the government of the Church had assumed in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, could not fail to call forth a reaction; and in the fourteenth century the opposite tendency, leading to a more aristocratic form of government, the so-called episcopal system, began to develop. The rigid monarchical form, however, which the government of the Church had assumed in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, could not fail to call forth a reaction; and in the fourteenth century the opposite tendency, leading to a more aristocratic form of government, the so-called episcopal system, began to develop. The rigid monarchical form, however, which the government of the Church had assumed in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, could not fail to call forth a reaction; and in the fourteenth century the opposite tendency, leading to a more aristocratic form of government, the so-called episcopal system, began to develop. The rigid monarchical form, however, which the government of the Church had assumed in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, could not fail to call forth a reaction; and in the fourteenth century the opposite tendency, leading to a more aristocratic form of government, the so-called episcopal system, began to develop. The rigid monarchical form, however, which the government of the Church had assumed in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, could not fail to call forth a reaction; and in the fourteenth century the opposite tendency, leading to a more aristocratic form of government, the so-called episcopal system, began to develop.
PAPHOS, a city of Cyprus; was visited by Paul, who converted the proconsul of the island, Sergius Paulus, and smote Elymas, the Jewish sorcerer, with blindness (Acts xiii. 7-13). See Lives of Paul by Conybeare and Howson, Lewin and Farrar. See also, for description of Cyprus, De Cesnola: Cyprus, New York, 1870.

PAPIAS, Bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia. He was born probably between 70 and 75 A.D., and died, perhaps, A.D. 183.1 No fact save his episcopacy is known about him, yet he is of great interest from his relation to the apostolic age. He was, according to Irenæus (Adv. Her., v. 33, 4), "a hearer" of John the apostle, "a companion of Polycarp," "an ancient man," i.e., a man of the primitive days of Christianity. By "John," Eusebius (Hist. Ecc., iii. 39) understands the presbyter, not the apostle, of that name, and declares that Papias had no personal acquaintance with any apostles. Papias, who was certainly acquainted with the present New Testament, wrote in Greek, about A.D. 130, An Interpretation of the Sayings of the Lord, in five books. His work appears to have been a collection of the words and works of the Master and his disciples, with explanatory matter derived from oral testimony. It has entirely perished, with the exception of a few small fragments preserved by Ireneus and Eusebius. The "fragments" in later writers are somewhat dubious. The first passage Eusebius quotes (I.e.) is from the preface of Papias' work, as follows:—

"But I shall not regret to subjoin to my interpretations, also, for your benefit, whatsoever I have at any time accurately ascertained and treasured up in my memory as I have received it from the elders, and have recorded it in order to give additional confirmation to the truth by my testimony. For I have never, like many, delighted to hear those that tell many things, but those that teach the truth; neither those that record foreign precepts, but those that are given from the Lord to our faith, and that came from the truth itself. But, if I met with any one who had been a follower of the elders anywhere, I made it a point to inquire what were the declarations of the elders; what was said by Andrew, Peter, or Philip; what by Thomas, James, John, Matthew, or any other of the discipies of our Lord; what was said by Arlistion and the presbyter John, disciples of the Lord. For I do not think that I derived so much benefit from books as from the living voice of those that are still surviving."

Besides quoting this passage, Eusebius speaks of Papias' stories of the daughters of Philip, who raised one from the dead, and of Justus, sur- named Barsabas, who drank poison with impunity (probably told by Papias in illustration of Mark xvi. 18), of Papias' strange accounts of the Lord's parables and doctrinal sayings, which were misunderstood the apostolic mystical narrations. Irenæus and most of the ecclesiastical writers to the New Testament, nothing can be made; for the failure to speak lies to the charge of Eusebius, not of Papias; and the silence of Eusebius is evident from his chosen passages from Eusebius design to state a few characteristic things from Papias. The attempt to prove from this silence that Papias was ignorant of the other books is vain.

Besides the quotations already given, there are several fragments of Papias of interest. [See Routh, Reliquiae sacra, vol. i., Eng. trans., in The Apostolical Fathers, Anti- Nicole Library, vol. i. pp. 441-448.] Thus in the Scholia of Maximus (c. 2, p. 32), it is stated, on the authority of Papias in the first book of his Interpretation, "The early Christian called those children who practised guilelessness toward God." Georgius Hamartolos (ninth century) cites in his Chronicle the second book of Papias as authority for the incredible statement that John, the brother of James, was killed by the Jews at Ephesus. Ireneus (Adv. Her., v. 33, 3) quotes the fourth book of Papias as authority for our Lord's saying:—

"[The days will come in which vines shall grow, having each ten thousand branches, and in each branch ten thousand twigs, and in each true twig ten thousand shoots, and in every one of the shoots ten thousand grapes; and every grape when pressed will give twenty-five metres (i.e., two hundred and twenty-five English gallons). And when any one of the saints shall lay hold of a cluster, another shall cry out, 'I am a better cluster: take me. Bless the Lord through me.' In like manner he said that a grain of wheat would produce ten thousand ears, and that every ear would have ten thousand grains, and every grain would yield ten pounds of clear, pure, fine flour; and that apples and seeds and grass would produce in similar proportions; and that all animals, feeding then only on the productions of the earth, would become peaceable and harmonious, and be in perfect subjection to man."

Eusebius apparently refers to this passage (Hist. Ecc., iii. 39) in proof that Papias interpreted the future millennium as a corporeal reign of Christ on this very earth, and further says that Papias misunderstood the apostolic material. The attempt to state a few characteristic things from Papias. The attempt to state a few characteristic things from Eusebius, moreover, charges Papias with leading Irenæus and most of the ecclesiastical writers to chiliastic notions. Another quotation from the fourth book in (Ecumenius relates to the last sickness of Judas the apostate, in flat contradiction to the New-Testament account,— a proof that Papias credulously rested upon lying tradition, not that he was ignorant of Matthew and

1 [But as the date of Polycarp's martyrdom has by recent research been put back to A.D. 135, the date of his contemporaneous friend Papias must likewise be put about ten years earlier. — Ed.]
PAPIN.

PARABLES.

the Acts. Other quotations show his preference for typico-allegorizing exposition. A note in a Vatican Vulgate manuscript of the ninth century speaks of Papias as the amanuensis of John. Eusebius appears to vacillate in his judgment of Papias; for whereas in iii. 36 he calls him "a man most learned in all things, and well acquainted with the Scriptures" in iii. 30 he says he had "a small mind" [referring to his allegorizing tendency]. The former statement lacks satisfactory manuscript support, and is probably an interpolation. Not enough of Papias is left upon which to form an independent judgment [except that he was pious, credulous, and industrious].

(\[The work of Papias was extant in the time of Jerome. Perhaps it may yet be recovered; for some work with the name of Papias is mentioned three (3:167, 506) in the catalogue of the Library of the Benedictine Monastery of Christ Church, Canterbury, contained in a Cottonian manuscript, written in the thirteenth or beginning of the fourteenth century (E. Edwards, Memoirs of Libraries, London, 1850, vol. i. pp. 122-236); and according to Menand, the monastic inventory of the property of the church at Nismes, prepared about 1218.--Donaldson, pp. 401, 402.\]

PAPIN, Isaac, b at Blois, March 24, 1657; d. in Paris, June 19, 1709. He studied theology at Saumur, but could obtain no certificate, as he would not sign a condemnation of Paganism. Having been ordained in England by the Bishop of Ely, he published in Holland his La Foy renouée a ses veritables principes, and was appointed pastor of the Reformed congregation in Hamburg, but was soon dismissed on account of the intrigues of Jurien. After a short stay in Dantzic, he returned to Paris, abjured the Reformed faith, and embraced Romanism, 1690. After his death, his collected works were published by a relative of his, Pajam of the Oratory.

PAPYRUS. See Bible-Text, Writing.

PARABLES. Figurative speech is natural to all primitive peoples, but especially to those of the Semitic race, because among them imagination and feeling have the ascendancy over the intellect. But the methods of the Hebrews, from a root meaning "to compare," the Hebrews designate all forms of speech in which an abstract idea is clothed with an image; as, for instance, the maxims of Proverbs, consisting of two propositions, the one setting forth the image almost in the form of a riddle, and the other giving in a direct manner the corresponding moral truth. In the teaching of Jesus, figurative speech plays a conspicuous part; as, for instance, in the following passages: "And if the blind guide the blind, both shall fall into a pit;" "Ye are the light of the world;" " The salt of the earth;" " Neither do men light a lamp and put it under the bushel, but on the stand." The image may extend beyond the single sentence, and through a whole discourse; as, for instance (in Isa. v.), the song which the prophet sings to his well-beloved touching his vineyard; or (Ezek. xvii.) the picture of the great eagle and the highest branch of the high cedar; or, still more striking, the tale which Nathan tells David, and by which he compels the king to look into his own soul for the evil deed (2 Sam. xii.); or, finally, the fable in which Jotham, the son of Gideon, shows the people of Shechem that the one who would become their king would be the one least worthy of the position, and most likely to become a scourge to them (Judg. ix.). It is to this last kind of figurative speech that the so-called parables of Jesus belong. The word "parable," from a root signifying to place things beside each other for the purpose of comparing them, is the Greek translation of the Hebrew waw yad; as a special term, a higher kind of figurative speech than the fable. The fable is inferior in dignity to the parable. It uses the image in order to inculcate natural truth and practical advice, or to turn certain faults into ridicule. It can consequently allow the imagination a very wide scope, putting the actors into activity contrary to their nature, lending intelligence and speech to animals and plants, etc. It is play. The parable has a higher purpose. Its teaching refers to the kingdom of God and the salvation of souls. The imagery, consequently, by which it images forth the truth, must conform strictly to reality. Each being must act in accordance with its nature: each action must have its reality as it could have occurred. The object of the representation is too sacred to allow the imagination free scope. It appears from the Gospels that Jesus began to teach in parables at a certain given moment of his ministry; and that circumstance naturally leads us to ask why he did not do so from the very beginning. Of course, he always used images in order to express his ideas more strikingly. By the incompatibility of an old garment and a piece of undressed cloth, he demonstrated the impossibility of maintaining the old dispensation by merely introducing into it some new elements borrowed from a different order of things (Mark ii. 21). Under the image of two house builders, one prudent and the other foolish, he represented to them that he was the one least worthy of the position, and most likely to become a scourge to them (Judg. ix.). It is to this last kind of figurative speech that the so-called parables of Jesus belong. The word "parable," from a root signifying to place things beside each other for the purpose of comparing them, is the Greek translation of the Hebrew waw yad; as a special term, a higher kind of figurative speech than the fable. The fable is inferior in dignity to the parable. It uses the image in order to inculcate natural truth and practical advice, or to turn certain faults into ridicule. It can consequently allow the imagination a very wide scope, putting the actors into activity contrary to their nature, lending intelligence and speech to animals and plants, etc. It is play. The parable has a higher purpose. Its teaching refers to the kingdom of God and the salvation of souls. The imagery, consequently, by which it images forth the truth, must conform strictly to reality. Each being must act in accordance with its nature: each action must have its reality as it could have occurred. The object of the representation is too sacred to allow the imagination free scope.

It appears from the Gospels that Jesus began to teach in parables at a certain given moment of his ministry; and that circumstance naturally leads us to ask why he did not do so from the very beginning. Of course, he always used images in order to express his ideas more strikingly. By the incompatibility of an old garment and a piece of undressed cloth, he demonstrated the impossibility of maintaining the old dispensation by merely introducing into it some new elements borrowed from a different order of things (Mark ii. 21). Under the image of two house builders, one prudent and the other foolish, he represented to them that he was the one least worthy of the position, and most likely to become a scourge to them (Judg. ix.). It is to this last kind of figurative speech that the so-called parables of Jesus belong. The word "parable," from a root signifying to place things beside each other for the purpose of comparing them, is the Greek translation of the Hebrew waw yad; as a special term, a higher kind of figurative speech than the fable. The fable is inferior in dignity to the parable. It uses the image in order to inculcate natural truth and practical advice, or to turn certain faults into ridicule. It can consequently allow the imagination a very wide scope, putting the actors into activity contrary to their nature, lending intelligence and speech to animals and plants, etc. It is play. The parable has a higher purpose. Its teaching refers to the kingdom of God and the salvation of souls. The imagery, consequently, by which it images forth the truth, must conform strictly to reality. Each being must act in accordance with its nature: each action must have its reality as it could have occurred. The object of the representation is too sacred to allow the imagination free scope.
asked for an explanation (Matt. xiii., Mark iv., Luke viii.). The explanation, however (Matt. xiii. 10-17), is not so easy to understand. Some have found in that passage, simply the idea that Jesus clothed the truths of the kingdom of heaven with images in order to make them more intelligible, and imprint them with greater force on the mind of his hearers. At first glance the interpretation seems very natural. Nevertheless, a second reading of the words of Jesus cannot fail to show that they contain just the opposite meaning: "Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; but to them it is not given. Therefore speak I to them in parables; seeing they see not, and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand." How could the multitude who heard the parables of the sower and the tares, which Jesus told on that very occasion, ever understand those parables, when even the apostles themselves did not apprehend the meaning of Jesus, but were compelled to seek it from his meaning of them? Was it the purpose of making his teaching unintelligible, that Jesus used the parable? There are some who think so. They consider that the moment had arrived when the people who had heard the appeals of Jesus without repentance, deserved no better than falling under that judgment of obduction of which Isaiah speaks in the very words which Jesus quotes on the occasion. Of course, there is added, the parable was intended to make the divine truth clearer and more intelligible to those whose hearts had been prepared by repentance and faith; but at the same time it also served to veil the truth to the eyes of those who had not been moved by the teachings of Jesus. A kind of sorting, preparatory to judgment, was thus effected.

The latter explanation is certainly more in harmony with the words of Jesus than the former. Nevertheless, there is room for doubt whether it hits the sense exactly, and exhausts it. It seems probable that the divine truth, if set forth directly and without veil, would be more likely to produce the effect of obduction than in a state of half-concealing figurativeness. Nor is it a gospel preaching which we wish to become the object of which the apostle says, "To the one, a savour from death unto death; to the other, a savour from life unto life" (2 Cor. ii. 16).

It seems to me that the true explanation lies in the middle, between those two extremes. The moment had arrived, when, after the moral teaching of which the Sermon on the Mount is the type, Jesus found it necessary to reveal the true nature of the kingdom of heaven, of the new order of things which he had come to establish. But that was just the point at which the divine plan, whose interpreter he was, stood in the most direct opposition to popular expectation. On questions of moral obligation the conscience of the multitude followed him with ease, and was willing to do homage to the sublimity of his teaching (Matt. vii. 28, 29). But the foundation and development of the kingdom of heaven were the secrets, or, as Jesus called them, the mysteries of God. They were the heavenly things between which and the earthly things he made a sharp distinction (John iii. 12). How could he say openly to the people, that the Messiah should not found the kingdom of God by a stroke of omnipotence, but by the slow and progressive action of the Word and the Holy Spirit? That, in the new order of things, the judgment must still be endured, because human existence should not be transformed in a moment, but in a progressive and spiritual manner? that the judgment, separating the true members from the false, should not come until the end of the kingdom of heaven? To say such things to people who expected to see the Roman Empire overthrown, and the sovereignty of Israel over the universe established, by some grand revolution of the Messiah, would be like crying out from the roofs, that he, Jesus, was not the Messiah, and his work not the fulfillment of the prophecies. And yet the moment had arrived when it had become necessary to reveal the new order of things, of which the apostles were to take charge after his own death, and for which every faithful follower was to work. But that which it was necessary to reveal to some, was necessary to conceal from others; and this double object could not have been attained by any other means so surely as by the parables which Jesus explained in private to those who ought to understand the secrets of God, while to others they were like a veil thrown over the truth. Compare the precept of Jesus (Matt. vii. 6).

The number of parables which have come down to us exceeds thirty, but cannot be precisely stated, as several pieces of the teaching of Jesus are by some considered parables, by others, simple metaphors; as, for instance, Luke xii. 35-40, 42-46, xiv. 34, 35, etc. Classifications of the parables have been attempted, on various principles. From an historical point of view, Goebel, in his De Paral etis Jesu, 1880, arranges them in three groups: (1) those belonging to the stay of Jesus near Capernaum, and collected in Matt. xiii.; (2) those belonging to his journey from Galilee to Jerusalem, and collected in Luke xxviii.; and (3) those belonging to his last days in Jerusalem. The first group refers to the kingdom of heaven as a totality; the second, to the individual members of it; and the third, to the end of the kingdom of heaven, and the final judgment of the members of the kingdom. These observations are all very just. Nevertheless, we propose another classification, which seems to us to be more natural. Out of the thirty parables, properly speaking, six refer to the kingdom of heaven in its preparatory existence under the old dispensation; six, to its actual realization in the form of a church, that is, to the new dispensation from its foundation to its consummation; and eighteen, finally, to the life of the individual members of the church.

The first group consists of: 1. The Vine-dresser (Matt. xxvii. 33-41), representing the criminal conduct of the Israelitish authorities against the Lord, acting through the prophets, and then through his son; 2. The Marriage of the King's Son (Matt. xxii. 1-14), representing the call of the Jewish people in response to the summons of Jesus and the apostles to enter the kingdom of heaven, then the call of the Gentiles, and, finally, the judgment which awaits also them; 3. The Great Supper (Luke xiv. 16-24), which by some is considered identical with the preceding, though it differs from it in several essential features; 4. The Strait Gate (Luke xiii. 24-30), in which Jesus predicts that the larger portion of the Jewish people shall be excluded from the kingdom of heaven, because they will not enter through the strait gate of humiliation, while the Gentiles shall enter in multitudes; 5. The Widen Fig-Tree (Luke xiii. 6-9), an image of the condemnation hovering over Israel, and the intercession of the Messiah, which alone averts the fatal blow; 6. The Two Sons (Matt. xxi. 25-32), in which Jesus places the conduct of the Pharisees (who pretend to obey God, but in reality are filled with revolts against him) over against that of the toll-gathers, who externally refuse obedience, but at heart hesitate, and end with surrendering themselves.

The second group consists of: 1. The Sower, which seems to have been the first perfect specimen of this kind of teaching, and still stands forth as the typical parable (it describes the different reception which the Word finds in the hearts of the hearers); this is the common difference to perfect devotion; and thus it emphasizes the foundation of the kingdom of heaven by preaching the Word, and not, as the Jews expected, by a sudden intervention of the arm of God; 2. The Tares, representing the co-existence of good and bad members of the church as the true method of development in the new order of things, though so contrary to Jewish expectation; 3 and 4. The Mustard Seed and The Leaven, which form a pair of parables representing the same idea, but under two different aspects, a combination which occurs often (the final victory of the kingdom of heaven is the idea common to both; but the former refers to a partition in the sole person of Jesus to its final consummation in the whole human race; and the latter, to its internal action, transforming spiritually the whole human life); 5. The Draw-net, describing the end of the kingdom of heaven by a sorting of the good and the bad members which the preaching has brought pell-mell into the visible kingdom of God (as they are found in Matt. xiii., together with several others — The Hidden Treasure, The Pearl — belonging to the third group, may be added, 6. The Widow (Luke xviii. 1-9), representing on the one side the dangerous state of the church from the departure of its chief to its final deliverance, and on the other side the only power which still remains to her during that period, perseverence in prayer.

The last group consists of eighteen parables referring to the realization of the kingdom of heaven in individual life. 1, 2, and 3, The Lost Sheep, The Piece of Silver, and The Prodigal Son (Luke xv.), describe the entrance into the kingdom by the grace of God and the faith of man; 4 and 5, The Pharisees and the Publican and The Friend at Midnight (Luke xviii. 9-14 and xii. 5-10), set forth the indispensable conditions of effective prayer, — repentance and faith. 6 and 7, The Hidden Treasure and The Goody Pearl (Matt. xiii. 44-46), and 8 and 9, Building a Tower and Making a Great War (Luke x. 21-26), form two pairs of parables treating nearly the same subject, — the absolute decision and complete sacrifice of every thing else, without which no one can take possession of the kingdom. Properly speaking, these nine parables refer all to such as are entering the kingdom, while the rest of this group refer to those who have already become members. 10 and 11, The Chief Seat (Luke xiv. 7-11) and The Laborers in the Vineyard (Matt. xx. 1-16), inculcate humility — the former with respect to brethren, the latter with respect to God; 12 and 13, The true disposition of the faithful. 14 and 15, The Unjust Steward and The Rich Man and Lazarus (Luke vi. 1-9 and 19-31), teach the right use of the good things of this world; not for the sake of a momentary and egoistic enjoyment, but in the service of charity. The same lesson is inculcated by 16, The Rich Man (Luke xii. 18-21), 17 and 18, The Talents and The Ten Virgins (Matt. xxv. 14-30 and 1-13) demand of the faithful that to the virtues of humility, charity, mercy, etc., he unites a practical activity and perpetual vigilance in the service of Christ. The ten virgins represent the total membership of the church, of which some profess the faith merely swayed by an instantaneous and fugitive emotion; that is, they have no other provision than that which happens to be in the lamp, and which may be soon exhausted, while others hold a separate provision of oil, which allows them to renew the flame of the lamp; that is, they stand in permanent communication with the very source of celestial life, — Christ.

Such is the system of the parables which the Lord told at different times and on various occasions. And what a wealth of religious and moral intuitions it contains! All the stages of the history of the kingdom of heaven, from its beginning under the old dispensation to its consummation at the threshold of eternity, are spread out before us. In some of the teachings of Jesus it is the powerful popular orator we admire; in others, their profound philosophical spirit. But in the parables it is the poet, or rather the painter, who lets the creations of his genius pass before our eyes. For in Jesus all the gifts of the human soul were united, and each and every one of them was put in play for the instruction and salvation of humanity.

PARADISE.

PARABOLID, from παραβολλθανυ, "to expose one's self," was, in the congregations of the ancient church, the name of the voluntary nurses of the sick. They occur chiefly in Egypt and Asia Minor, rarely, if ever, in the Latin West. They were rough but spirited fellows. At the robber synod in Ephesus (449), they acquired a sad celebrity. Even before that time, they had become obnoxious; and, in Alexandria, Theodosius placed them under the superintendence of the prefect.

HERZOG.

PARACELSUS, Philippus Aureolus Theophrastus Bombastus, b. at Einsiedeln in Switzerland, 1493; d. at Salzburg, 1541. He studied medicine and natural science; visited all the European universities; became a furious antagonist of Galen and Aristotle; acquired great fame on account of his wonderful cures; was appointed professor of medicine at Basel in 1526, but expelled from the city two years later, probably on account of the jealousy of his colleagues; strolled about as a mountebank and charlatan, though often sought for by the highest personages on account of his great medical skill; and found finally an asylum at the court of the Archbishop of Salzburg. His collected works appeared at Strassburg, 1616-18, in three volumes folio. The second volume contains his philosophical works. His system is a combination of the theosophy of the Cabala and natural science, founded on experience and experiment,—a kind of pantheism, whose mysticism every now and then becomes superstitious. His distinction, however, between faith and reason as two different organs of perception, with two different fields of activity, is not unlike modern attempts of the same tendency.

PARACLETIC or PARACLETICON is, in the modern Greek Church, the name of a kind of prayer-book, containing prayers to God and the saints appropriate to the various canonical festivals. Its general plan is due to John of Damas, though since his time it has undergone considerable modification. The first printed edition appeared in Venice, 1625.

PARADISE (C7th, Neh. ii. 8; Eccl. ii. 5; Song iv. 13; also the Targums and the Talmud; παρακλητός LXX. and N. T.) means in Persian, whence the word has been adopted into all other languages in which the Bible has appeared, a wooded garden or park. But in the Bible it is used in a twofold sense: (1) for the garden of Eden; (2) for the abode of the blessed in heaven, as Justin Martyr, the Gnostic Bardesanes, and Jerome (Commentary on the poems of Ephram (fourth century), which contained his philosophical works. His system is a combination of the theosophy of the Cabala and natural science, founded on experience and experiment,—a kind of pantheism, whose mysticism every now and then becomes superstitious. His distinction, however, between faith and reason as two different organs of perception, with two different fields of activity, is not unlike modern attempts of the same tendency.

PARACLETIC or PARACLETICON is, in the modern Greek Church, the name of a kind of prayer-book, containing prayers to God and the saints appropriate to the various canonical festivals. Its general plan is due to John of Damas, though since his time it has undergone considerable modification. The first printed edition appeared in Venice, 1625.

PARADISE (C7th, Neh. ii. 8; Eccl. ii. 5; Song iv. 13; also the Targums and the Talmud; παρακλητός LXX. and N. T.) means in Persian, whence the word has been adopted into all other languages in which the Bible has appeared, a wooded garden or park. But in the Bible it is used in a twofold sense: (1) for the garden of Eden; (2) for the abode of the blessed in heaven, as Justin Martyr, the Gnostic Bardesanes, and Jerome (Commentary on the poems of Ephram (fourth century), which contained his philosophical works. His system is a combination of the theosophy of the Cabala and natural science, founded on experience and experiment,—a kind of pantheism, whose mysticism every now and then becomes superstitious. His distinction, however, between faith and reason as two different organs of perception, with two different fields of activity, is not unlike modern attempts of the same tendency.

PARACLETIC or PARACLETICON is, in the modern Greek Church, the name of a kind of prayer-book, containing prayers to God and the saints appropriate to the various canonical festivals. Its general plan is due to John of Damas, though since his time it has undergone considerable modification. The first printed edition appeared in Venice, 1625.

PARADISE (C7th, Neh. ii. 8; Eccl. ii. 5; Song iv. 13; also the Targums and the Talmud; παρακλητός LXX. and N. T.) means in Persian, whence the word has been adopted into all other languages in which the Bible has appeared, a wooded garden or park. But in the Bible it is used in a twofold sense: (1) for the garden of Eden; (2) for the abode of the blessed in heaven, as Justin Martyr, the Gnostic Bardesanes, and Jerome (Commentary on the poems of Ephram (fourth century), which contained his philosophical works. His system is a combination of the theosophy of the Cabala and natural science, founded on experience and experiment,—a kind of pantheism, whose mysticism every now and then becomes superstitious. His distinction, however, between faith and reason as two different organs of perception, with two different fields of activity, is not unlike modern attempts of the same tendency.

PARACLETIC or PARACLETICON is, in the modern Greek Church, the name of a kind of prayer-book, containing prayers to God and the saints appropriate to the various canonical festivals. Its general plan is due to John of Damas, though since his time it has undergone considerable modification. The first printed edition appeared in Venice, 1625.

PARADISE (C7th, Neh. ii. 8; Eccl. ii. 5; Song iv. 13; also the Targums and the Talmud; παρακλητός LXX. and N. T.) means in Persian, whence the word has been adopted into all other languages in which the Bible has appeared, a wooded garden or park. But in the Bible it is used in a twofold sense: (1) for the garden of Eden; (2) for the abode of the blessed in heaven, as Justin Martyr, the Gnostic Bardesanes, and Jerome (Commentary on the poems of Ephram (fourth century), which contained his philosophical works. His system is a combination of the theosophy of the Cabala and natural science, founded on experience and experiment,—a kind of pantheism, whose mysticism every now and then becomes superstitious. His distinction, however, between faith and reason as two different organs of perception, with two different fields of activity, is not unlike modern attempts of the same tendency.

PARACLETIC or PARACLETICON is, in the modern Greek Church, the name of a kind of prayer-book, containing prayers to God and the saints appropriate to the various canonical festivals. Its general plan is due to John of Damas, though since his time it has undergone considerable modification. The first printed edition appeared in Venice, 1625.

PARADISE (C7th, Neh. ii. 8; Eccl. ii. 5; Song iv. 13; also the Targums and the Talmud; παρακλητός LXX. and N. T.) means in Persian, whence the word has been adopted into all other languages in which the Bible has appeared, a wooded garden or park. But in the Bible it is used in a twofold sense: (1) for the garden of Eden; (2) for the abode of the blessed in heaven, as Justin Martyr, the Gnostic Bardesanes, and Jerome (Commentary on the poems of Ephram (fourth century), which contained his philosophical works. His system is a combination of the theosophy of the Cabala and natural science, founded on experience and experiment,—a kind of pantheism, whose mysticism every now and then becomes superstitious. His distinction, however, between faith and reason as two different organs of perception, with two different fields of activity, is not unlike modern attempts of the same tendency.

PARACLETIC or PARACLETICON is, in the modern Greek Church, the name of a kind of prayer-book, containing prayers to God and the saints appropriate to the various canonical festivals. Its general plan is due to John of Damas, though since his time it has undergone considerable modification. The first printed edition appeared in Venice, 1625.

PARADISE (C7th, Neh. ii. 8; Eccl. ii. 5; Song iv. 13; also the Targums and the Talmud; παρακλητός LXX. and N. T.) means in Persian, whence the word has been adopted into all other languages in which the Bible has appeared, a wooded garden or park. But in the Bible it is used in a twofold sense: (1) for the garden of Eden; (2) for the abode of the blessed in heaven, as Justin Martyr, the Gnostic Bardesanes, and Jerome (Commentary on the poems of Ephram (fourth century), which contained his philosophical works. His system is a combination of the theosophy of the Cabala and natural science, founded on experience and experiment,—a kind of pantheism, whose mysticism every now and then becomes superstitious. His distinction, however, between faith and reason as two different organs of perception, with two different fields of activity, is not unlike modern attempts of the same tendency.
PARAGUAY.

1743

London, 1869; Washburn: History of Paraguay, New York, 1871; Gothelin: Der christlich-sociale Staat der Jesuiten in Paraguay, Leipzig, 1883 (pp. 69).

PÁRAN (place of caravans). Wilderness of, bounded on the north by the Wilderness of Shur and the Land ofBanah, on the east by the Arabah and the Gulf of Akitab, on the south by a sand-belt which separates it from Sinai, on the west by the Wilderness of Etham. It is now called Badiet et Tîb ("desert of the wandering"), the scene of the thirty-eight years' scattering of Israel between Egypt and Palestine. It is a high limestone plateau, crossed by low ranges of hills. Its few water-courses run only in the rainy season. The vegetation is scanty. The north-eastern portion of this plateau is the Negeb ("south country") of Scripture. The caravan-route to Egypt crossed Parar.

PARDEE, Richard Gay, Sunday-school worker; b. at Sharon, Conn., Oct. 12, 1811; d. in New-York City, Feb. 11, 1691. He was a Presbyterian layman, from 1853 to 1863 agent of the New-York Sunday-School Union, and all his life an enthusiastic and wise champion of the Sunday-school cause. He was the author of two widely used volumes, The Sunday-School Worker, and The Sunday-School Index.

PAREUS, David, b. at Frankfurt, Silesia, Dec. 30, 1848; d. at Heidelberg, June 15, 1842. He studied theology in the Collegium Sapientiae in Heidelberg, and was in 1884 appointed teacher there, and in 1890 professor of theology. His so-called Neustädter Bibel, 1887, the text of Luther's translation, with notes of Pareus, involved him in a violent controversy with Agricola, Siegward, and others; and his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, 1609, caused still more strife, and was publicly burnt in England, on the order of James I. He was, however, not a controversialist himself: on the contrary, besides his commentaries, Summarische Erklärung der wahren Katholischen Lehr, etc., his principal work is his Francesco di Giorgio, Historia ecclesiastica per gentes et municipia, liber octo, 1614, which, however, was not well received by the orthodox Lutherans. A life of him and a complete list of his works are found in the unfinished edition of his works, by his son, Francfort, 1647.

NEY.

PARIS, the capital of France, and, next to London, the most populous city of Europe, has for the past four or five centuries exerted an influence second to that of no other city in the world upon the destinies, civil and religious, of Christendom. In a sense in which it is true of no other capital, Paris has shaped and still shapes the prevalent sentiment of France, as it has again and again made and overturned its government. Under the name of Latetia Parisiorum, the town existed in the time of Julius Caesar, on an island in the River Seine, about a hundred and ten miles from its mouth, which is still known as the Île de la Cité. This town gradually extended to the banks on either side, until, by the time of the Crusades, it had come to be regarded as one of the largest and wealthiest of European cities. Two special causes may be mentioned as having contributed to its growth.—the choice of Paris by the kings of France for their customary abode, and the possession of the most famous educational
The University of Paris, under the patronage of the monarchs, and enjoying the services of such eminent teachers as Abelard and Peter Lombard, Gerson and Clemangin, was thronged with scholars from all parts of the West, who were divided, according to their origin, into the four "nations" of France, Picardy, Normandy, and England. In the fifteenth century they are said to have numbered not less than twenty-five thousand; and so strong was the will of the young, that the population of Paris, commonly called, even to the present day, the "quartier Latin," was known as the "Université." The various disasters of pestilence, famine, and siege, that have befallen Paris, have not checked its steady growth. A hundred years or more ago the city had spread far beyond its former limits of six miles, and was in the line of its razed bulwarks (boulevards), now turned into broad and stately avenues. While the increase of the population of Paris has of recent years been alarmingly slow, Paris has advanced from 1,525,942 in 1856, to 1,696,141 in 1861, 1,532,000, in 1872 (despite the great loss of human life during the siege of Paris and the conflict of the Commune), and 1,988,806 in 1876. Of this immense population the most careful estimates allow 75,000 at the utmost for the adherents of Protestant churches (i.e., 35,000 Reformed, 30,000 Lutherans, and 10,000 belonging to other branches of the Protestant stock), and 32,000 to 35,000 for the Jewish population. Of churchless Parisians are claimed by the Roman-Catholic Church, although no insinificant part is composed of more or less avowed free-thinkers or atheists.

The Roman-Catholic Church in the city of Paris is, perhaps, as thoroughly organized as in any other city of the world. The archbishop is assisted by a coadjutor and six vicars-general. The chapter of the cathedral church of Notre Dame consists of 98 canons, resident, titular, or honorary. The city and its suburbs are divided into three arch-deanories. The archdeacon of Notre Dame has under him 50 curates, and 353 vicars; the archdeacon of St. Genevieve, 20 curates and 144 vicars; and the archdeacon of St. Denis, 74 curates and 81 vicars: total, 144 curates, and 580 vicars. These figures do not include the clergy engaged in the Roman-Catholic faculty of the Sorbonne (seven professors and one adjunct professor), nor those engaged in the Seminary of St. Sulpice, and in the University, or Roman-Catholic Institute of Paris, in the Rue de Vaugirard, etc. There are sixty-three Roman-Catholic chaplains attached to the public prisons, hospitals, and other benevolent institutions. Their gradual removal is, however, believed to be only a question of a few years. The number of schools supported by the Catholic Church, both for primary and for secondary education, has heretofore been large; but the hostile attitude of the government in respect to clerical instruction, as well as the greatly increased efficiency of the government itself in the matter of the training of the young, tends inevitably to the rapid diminution of the number of establishments under ecclesiastical control. In 1876 the annual appropriation made by the city for education was only about $1,200,000. In the first ten years of the present republic it has risen to three times that amount. Before the decree of June 14, 1860, authorizing the dissolution of all unauthorized congregations (or societies of friars and nuns) to take effect Nov. 5, 1880, there were 10 authorized and 24 unauthorized congregations of men. There were also 88 congregations of women, of which 40 were more especially devoted to teaching; or else the care of orphans, the impecunious poor, asylums, hospitals, houses of correction, and charitable and missionary associations, are intimately connected with the Roman-Catholic Church, being sustained in great part by endowments, or by the voluntary contributions of adherents of that church.

The Protestants of Paris belong mostly either to the Reformed Church or to the Lutheran (Confe-sion of Augsburg).

The Reformed Church of Paris dates from the year 1555, when the handful of persecuted "Lutherans, or " Christaudins as they were for the moment styled (the name 'Huguenot' was not known throughout Northern France until five years later), first attempted an ecclesiastical or organization. The great development of this church did not take place until after the Edict of Nantes secured to the Huguenots a good measure of religious liberty. (See Huguenots.) Even then, however, the Protestants of Paris were not permitted to worship within the walls, or in the immediate suburbs of Paris, were compelled to resort, at great inconvenience and with no little personal exposure and peril, to the village of Ablon. (See ABLON.) Subsequently the king was induced to grant a more accessible spot, the village of Charenton. Here a "temple," or Protestant church, was erected, which was so large, and skillfully planned, that with its galleries it was said to be able to seat not less than fourteen thousand worshippers. This remarkable building was destroyed, and all open profession of Protestantism was suppressed, at the time of the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685). When Protestantism was, after the lapse of over one hundred years, re-organized, and made a state religion by Bonaparte as first consul, by the law of the eighteenth Germinal, year x (1802), the adherents of that religion in Paris (of the Reformed faith) were constituted a single consistorial church. The number of pastors (from two in 1805) and of places of worship has gradually increased during the past three-quarters of a century; but no division of the church was made until 1882. For thirty years the evangelical party in the church had commanded the majority of the votes in the election for members of the consistory, and had secured the church an orthodox ministry. At length the "Liberal" party prevailed upon the government, without consulting the wishes of the people, to dissolve the church, by a decree of the resident, President Guizot, March 25, 1882, the consistorial church of Paris was split up into eight parishes. In consequence of this arrangement, the Liberals, in the election of May 14, 1882, secured the control of one of the parishes,—the important parish of the Oratoire; and they have since then succeeded in introducing a single minister of their sentiments into the consistory. There are (1883) 17 pastors and 10 assistant pastors, chaplains, etc., and 18 churches, besides other places of worship. Several of the church edifices, and among them the Oratoire, were formerly Roman-Catholic churches. Provision is made for the care of the poor by the appointment of 120 deacons, by whom the sum of about $20,000 is annually distributed to the needy. The number of electors entitled to vote for members of the consistory of Paris is 3,500. Of these 2,144 exercised their privilege in the election of May 14, 1882, in which the orthodox and other places of worship, and four ministers.

The "Confession d'Augsbourg" (Lutheran Church) is composed of Protestants of German origin, descendants, for the most part, of families belonging to Alsace and Lorraine. There are (1883) 21 pastors and assistants, including clergymen officiating in the German, Swedish, and Danish languages, and 18 churches and other places of worship. The number of electors is estimated at 1,300.

Belonging to the union of the free churches, there are five churches and chapels and several ministers. The well-known Chapelle Talboust is the principal place of worship. The Methodist Church has six places of worship, and five ministers preaching in French, besides two preaching in English. The Baptist Church has two places of worship, and four ministers.

The government supports at Paris a theological seminary, which in part, to take the place of the theological school for the training of young men for the ministry of the Lutheran Church, formerly, and until the session of Alsace to Germany, maintained by the State at Strasbourg. The new seminary (Faculté de théologie protestante de Paris) is, however, intended to meet the wants of the Lorrainers.

The church history of the Huguenots, by means of its monthly bulletin and other publications. The remarkable mission to the working-men of Paris, begun under the auspices of Rev. R. W. M'All, is treated in a separate article. (See M'All Mission.)

Henry M. Baird.

PARISH (parochia, paroikia), the Christian congregation so far as it is represented by a territorial circumscription, the circuit of ground committed to the spiritual care of one priest, or parson, or minister. The first Christian congregations were formed in the cities, and such a city congregation was originally called a paroikia.

In the Eastern Church the name was retained for a long time, even though the paroikia gradually developed, both externally and internally, so as to become what we now call an episcopal diocese (diece). The bishop arose above the presbyters, and became the head of the church. Congregations were formed in the country by missionaries, and superintended, first by their founders, then by appointed presbyters, but in both cases under the authority of the city bishop. Only in his church complete divine service was celebrated. He consecrated the elements of the Lord's Supper, and sent them to the country parishes. A general service was generally celebrated also in the dependent churches, the bishop still reserved the administration of baptism to himself. But in the Eastern Church the diece continued to be called paroikia.

The distinction between paroikia and diece was first made in the well-stem Church, and it developed its great missionary activity. The dioceses were so large, that a district subdivision of them became necessary for administrative purposes. Churches were built in which complete service was celebrated every Sunday, and in which baptism, burial, etc., were duly performed by the appointed presbyter. These, for the first subdivisions, however, tituli minores, ecclesiae baptismales, were not yet the present parishes: they were still much larger, and corresponded, in many cases, to the present superintendencies in certain Protestant countries. But by degrees, as the population grew denser, a new subdivision became necessary. Oratories and chapels were built in the castles, in the monasteries, or near by; and when, in course of time, these new subdivisions, the tituli minores, became definitely established, with well-defined boundaries and fully organized administrations, the present parish system may be said to have fairly entered into existence, though of course, it was, and still is, subject to many modifications.

At what time the development was definitely completed cannot be stated; it took place at various times in the various countries. The city of Rome had forty fully organized parish churches before the end of the third century. Parish organization is spoken of in France in the beginning of the fifth century. In England the first legislation on the subject is found in the laws of Edgar, about 970. Before the Reformation, however, the connection between the bishop of the diocese and the priest of the parish continued very close. The plenitudo potestatis ecclesiasticae was vested solely in the bishop, and the priest was nothing but his representative. After the Reformation, the connection became, in the Protestant countries, much laxer, and in many particular points the State substituted the bishop; and, in more recent times also, the connection between the State and the parish has loosened, the whole idea of a parish system, as a system of territorial circumscriptions, gradually giving way to the idea of free congregations. In the United States the Roman-Catholic and the Protestant-Episcopal churches have retained the parish system, though in a modified form, on account of the complete separation between State and Church.

Parity.

A technical term first occurring in the instrument of the peace of Westphalia, 1648, denotes equality between various religious denominations in their relation to the State. Before the Reformation, the European States recognized only one religion within their respective dominions, but by the treaty of Augsburg, 1555, the compromise legislation of the German Empire was cancelled, and parity was established between Roman Catholics and Protestants. It must be noticed, however, that the parity thus established concerned only the empire, not the particular states of which it was made up. In each single state the territorial system, with its cujus regio ejus religio, prevailed, and it was only when the states met to decide upon the affairs of the empire, that Protestants and Roman Catholics had equal rights. In the separate states of the German Empire, parity was not introduced until the beginning of the present century. Prussia took the lead by the religious edict of July 9, 1788; and, later on, the great changes which took place in the boundaries of the German States during the Napoleonic wars induced them to follow the example. Under Mary he lost every thing but his life. Soon after her accession, Elizabeth appointed him Archbishop of Canterbury, Reginald Pole having died just before. He no doubt commended himself to the politic queen by the middle position he occupied between the two extreme parties in the church, and by the relation he had sustained to her mother, Anne Boleyn. The connection of power of the See of Canterbury was not easy. The difficult work lay before him of building up the Anglican Church at a time of ecclesiastical confusion, and under a queen whose religious purpose at least seemed to be fickle. Without himself being a Puritan, he sought to modify the severity of the measures passed by Parliament, Jan. 1, 1565, against all who refused to take the oath of supremacy. But at the queen's command he became more rigorous, and carried out the Advertisements which prescribed the rules (concerning dress, etc.) which the clergy were to obey in order to secure a license to preach. The Church of England honors his memory for his having enforced the Act of Uniformity. The Puritans blame him for forcing the division in the church.

Whatever may be the opinion about Parker's services to the church, there can be but one opinion about his services to letters. He was more prominent than any other single individual in arousing in England an interest in the records of antiquity, founded the Antiquarian Society, and was the instrument of rescuing a multitude of manuscripts from the ruins of the monastic establishments. The rich treasures of Corpus Christi and other colleges at Oxford are largely due to his assiduity. He was particularly interested in the antiquities of England, and had published the Chronicles of Matthew Paris, Thomas Walingham, etc. It was with his co-operation that Ackworth wrote the De Antiqu. Britan. Eccl., 1572. His private virtues seem to have been many. He gave much away in charity to the poor, founded hospitals, endowed colleges, etc. His body lies buried in Lambeth. [Elizabeth,

He was graduated B.A. from Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in 1522, and during the succeeding five years devoted himself to the diligent study of the Church Fathers. His scholarship is attested by Wolsey's fruitless effort to secure his services for his new college at Oxford. In 1533 he publicly espoused the cause of the Reformation in a sermon preached before the university. He became quite famous as a preacher, and Anne Boleyn appointed him her chaplain. The king nominated him to the mastership of Stoke-Clare College, near Cambridge, and in 1544 to the same office at Corpus Christi. In 1545 he was chosen vice-chancellor. Parker distinguished himself at the university, and was an earnest student and admirable administrator. It would have been well for him if he had remained at the university, for he had not the administrative talents for a larger sphere. He did not hesitate to meet an opponent with the pen, but he was by nature too timid and cautious to meet him face to face. Under Mary he lost every thing but his life. Soon after her accession, Elizabeth appointed him Archbishop of Canterbury, Reginald Pole having died just before. He no doubt commended himself to the politic queen by the middle position he occupied between the two extreme parties in the church, and by the relation he had sustained to her mother, Anne Boleyn. The connection of power of the See of Canterbury was not easy. The difficult work lay before him of building up the Anglican Church at a time of ecclesiastical confusion, and under a queen whose religious purpose at least seemed to be fickle. Without himself being a Puritan, he sought to modify the severity of the measures passed by Parliament, Jan. 1, 1565, against all who refused to take the oath of supremacy. But at the queen's command he became more rigorous, and carried out the Advertisements which prescribed the rules (concerning dress, etc.) which the clergy were to obey in order to secure a license to preach. The Church of England honors his memory for his having enforced the Act of Uniformity. The Puritans blame him for forcing the division in the church.

Whatever may be the opinion about Parker's services to the church, there can be but one opinion about his services to letters. He was more prominent than any other single individual in arousing in England an interest in the records of antiquity, founded the Antiquarian Society, and was the instrument of rescuing a multitude of manuscripts from the ruins of the monastic establishments. The rich treasures of Corpus Christi and other colleges at Oxford are largely due to his assiduity. He was particularly interested in the antiquities of England, and had published the Chronicles of Matthew Paris, Thomas Walingham, etc. It was with his co-operation that Ackworth wrote the De Antiqu. Britan. Eccl., 1572. His private virtues seem to have been many. He gave much away in charity to the poor, founded hospitals, endowed colleges, etc. His body lies buried in Lambeth. [Elizabeth,

He was graduated B.A. from Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in 1522, and during the succeeding five years devoted himself to the diligent study of the Church Fathers. His scholarship is attested by Wolsey's fruitless effort to secure his services for his new college at Oxford. In 1533 he publicly espoused the cause of the Reformation in a sermon preached before the university. He became quite famous as a preacher, and Anne Boleyn appointed him her chaplain. The king nominated him to the mastership of Stoke-Clare College, near Cambridge, and in 1544 to the same office at Corpus Christi. In 1545 he was chosen vice-chancellor. Parker distinguished himself at the university, and was an earnest student and admirable administrator. It would have been well for him if he had remained at the university, for he had not the administrative talents for a larger sphere. He did not hesitate to meet an opponent with the pen, but he was by nature too timid and cautious to meet him face to face.
PARKER, Theodore, the son of John and Hannah (Stearns) Parker; b. at Lexington, Mass., Aug. 24, 1810; d. at Florence, Italy, May 10, 1860.

His father—a farmer and wheelwright—and his mother were intelligent, highly respectable, and thoroughly conscientious. They had a large family, and but slender means of subsistence, so that they could do little for their children, except by their example and influence. Their distinguished son seems to have inherited largely from both his parents,—from his father, an inflexibility of mind and a nature susceptible of great stress and tenderness of feeling. Theodore had in his boyhood little formal instruction other than that of the district-school, and that only in the winter after he was old enough to assist his father in the labor of the farm and the workshop; but by his greediness for knowledge, and his eager receptivity of whatever came within his reach, he attracted the special notice, interest, and aid of several of his teachers. At the age of seventeen he became a teacher, at first in a district-school, and continued to serve in that profession, in schools public and private, till 1834. Meanwhile he prepared himself for Harvard College, passed the examinations for admission in 1830, and subsequently pursued, or rather exceeded,—at least in the classical department,—the regular college course; so that, but for a required year of residence, he might have taken his bachelor's degree with his class. In the spring of 1834 he entered the Divinity School of Harvard University, having prepared himself to join the class that had entered the previous autumn. He had already studied the Hebrew language with a Jewish teacher then of high reputation, and had acquired sufficient proficiency in it to undertake the instruction of a class of under-graduates, and, during a long absence of the professor, to fill his place in the Divinity School. His capacity of continuous and well-directed study, in his use of his time, and in his efficiency in learning, have been seldom equalled, perhaps never exceeded. At all times his reading of books demanding the closest attention was, perhaps, too rapid for accurate remembrance and citation; but the mass of his acquisitions and his facility in their use, in classical learning; history, philosophy, and theology, were almost unprecedented.

He graduated at the Divinity School in 1836. His sermons during his novitiate had been severely criticised by the professor of homiletics as dry and scholastic; but he no sooner appeared as a preacher before a larger public than he was heard with eager interest, and was regarded as a man of marked ability and promise. After several months of highly acceptable service in various churches, some of which sought to retain him permanently, he received and accepted an invitation to the pastorate of a church in West Roxbury, now a part of Boston. It was a small rural congregation, consisting in part of the families of intelligent and prosperous farmers, in part of persons whose social affinities were chiefly with the neighboring city. It is difficult to determine the period when he began to diverge from the then prevailing type of Unitarianism which was his by birthright, education, early choice, and, for a time, sincere and devout loyalty. His private papers, obviously not meant for any eye but his own, yet unsparingly used by his biographers, indicate the progress of serious, anxious, and often painful inquiry, and, at the same time, a pervading and profound sense of religious obligation, and a deeply devotional spirit; so that, however little quarter may be given to his theology, it is impossible to doubt his integrity and honesty of aim and purpose. Early in his ministry, it became known that he was latitudinarian in his opinions and in his mode of acting. He was more conservative of the Unitarian clergy, while not formally dissolving fellowship with him, were no longer ready to admit him into their pulpits. He, meanwhile, became intimate with George Ripley, Alcott, and other leaders of what was then called the "transcendental school;" and though his was a mind adapted to make, rather than to receive, strong impressions, at the same time a mental of all religious truths—the personality of God, with the correlative truth, the reality of the communion of the human spirit with him in prayer—he seems never to have entertained a doubt; while in this entire region of thought they were utterly befogged and adrift, though some of them ultimately came out into clearer light, and upon solid ground.

Parker's first open and fully avowed dissent from prevailing religious beliefs was in 1841, in a sermon preached at the ordination of Rev. Charles Chauncy Shackford, at South Boston. The subject was The Transient and Permanent in Christianity. the text, "Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away."

Charles Chauncy Shackford, at South Boston.

In this sermon, while maintaining the identity of Christ's teachings with the absolute and eternal religion, and presenting his character as the ideal of human perfection, he put the brand of exaggeration, myth, or fable, on all that is supernatural in the Gospel narrative, the full authenticity of which was by implication denied. The alarm-note was thus struck for vehement controversy. Not only dissent, but strong dissiliency was almost unanimously expressed by the Unitarian clergy. This feeling was intensified by several lectures delivered in Boston during the ensuing autumn, and afterward published, in which Parker expounded more at large, illustrated, and defended the views which, at the first statement, had awakened such surprise and consternation. There remained very few of his clerical brethren who were willing to exchange pulpits with him; and those few did so at the imminent risk, and in some instances with the loss, of their professional standing. It is believed that no then settled minister avowed agreement in opinion with him, though some were disposed to regard his ground as within the legitimate limits of Christian speculation. The Boston Association of Ministers, to which he belonged, took prompt action of dissent and disapproval, and, without a formal vote of dismissal, held a position which led to his virtual withdrawal from their body. But among the laity he held a position which led to his virtual retirement in Boston, and early in the following year by many friends to commence a regular religious service in Boston, and early in the following year he became the minister of a congregation which had a strong following. In 1845 he was urged to become the minister of a congregation which for the most part, of superior intelligence and culture, and of deservedly high social position,—some, who did not agree with him, won by his simplicity, frankness, earnestness, and fervor; some, attracted by his firmness in the advocacy of the great philanthropic enterprises then under popular odium; yet others, dissatisfied with the previously existing churches, and, from weariness of the old, inclined to make experiment of the new. His audiences were often larger than he anticipated, while he busied himself equally in diligent parochial work, in the instruction of classes of his stated hearers, in the advocacy by voice and pen of the antislavery and temperance reforms, and in meeting the constant applications for counsel and aid which multiply upon a city minister in proportion to his willingness to bear the burden. At the same time he carried through the press several volumes, and not a few sermons, lectures, and addresses. In fine, but for the evidence remaining in contemporary reports, records, and documents, the amount of labor crowded into the few years of his Boston pastorate would transcend belief. But he was undoubtedly becoming a victim to overwork. Though in appearance robust and hearty, he had inherited from his mother a tendency to pulmonary disease; and, during his student life, he must have enfeebled his constitution, though unconsciously, by insufficient food and clothing, by scanting the hours of sleep, and by the utter neglect of exercise and recreation. As early as 1836 there are entries in his journal that indicate declining health, though his own 1856, with a severe hemorrhage from the lungs. It was then found that tubercular disease was far advanced; and immediate arrangements were made for sending him, first to the West Indies, then to Europe. Change of scene and a genial climate may have had a fuller, clearer, more profound intuition of the divine image borne in various degrees of resemblance by all God's children. Jesus he characterizes "as the highest representation of God we know;" and thus as holding in the divine will and purpose a unique and unapproached position as a teacher of eternal truth, and "as the noblest example of morality and religion." He regards the divine inspiration as the source of all in man that is not "of the earth and of the earth;" of all in philosophy, art, and literature, that can enrich and ennoble the spiritual nature; of all high aspiration, virtuous aim, and worthy endeavor; and of whatever of the true and the good there may have been in the ethnic religions. Inspiration in any given instance is a question, not of fact, but of degree. It is not the communication of truth, but the quickening and energizing of those perceptive and apprehensive powers by which truth is discerned and appropriated. There is no express revelation, nor is there need of any. There is absolute truth, in God, in nature, in the soul of man, which is perceived intuitively, and can be verified by intuition alone. Jesus Christ had a fuller, clearer, more profound intuition of absolute truth, than any other human being. "I am in the midst of all things," of all in philosophy, art, and literature, that can enrich and intensified his spiritual vision. His teachings, therefore, are of inestimable worth; and on all the essentials of religion and morality they are their own sufficient proof to the recipient soul. But they have, and from their very nature could have, no other verification. Objective truth can be proved only by becoming subjective, and thus forming a part of the believer's consciousness. But, while Christ's moral perfection made him incapable of false intuitions, on matters outside of the range of spiritual consciousness he was liable to error. His predictions were mere conjectures. He had false notions as to the authority of the Hebrew Scriptures. He believed in a personal devil and in demoniacal possession. Nor was he entirely free from distinctively Hebrew prejudices. Parker did not account miracles as impossible; but he regarded them as irrelevant and worthless as credentials of religious truth, as therefore improbable, and as resting on insufficient evidence. Nothing was more natural than that reverence for a teacher of superior sanctity and of commanding influence should surround his common life, and especially his deeds of mercy, with a supernatural halo; that such narratives should be thusly published, Boston, 1861, new •■ condemnation. With these qualifications, the Old testament is, in large part, a veracious record of the development of the religious sentiment, under the most favorable auspices, in a people destined to hold the foremost place in the religious history of mankind. The Gospels are honest trans-scripts of such traditions with reference to the life and teaching of Christ, as were current in the Christian Church at the several dates of their authorship; and when allowance is made for ex-aggerations on the side of the marvellous, and for misconceptions incident to the limited intelligence of the writers, they may be regarded as furnishing an authentic biography of the Founder of our religion.

Parker's principal publications were, Discourse of Matters pertaining to Religion, 1842; Critical and Miscellaneous Writings, 1843; Ten Sermons of Religion, 1853; Sermons on Theism, Atheism, and the Popular Theology, 1853; and four volumes of Speeches, Addresses, and Occasional Sermons, 1852 and 1855. To these must be added a very large number of articles, sermons, and lectures. A collective edition of his works, in twelve volumes collecto, was published in London in 1863-65.
Among his earlier literary works should be named a translation of De Wette's Critical and History-cal Introduction to the Canonical Scriptures of the Old Testament, with annotations by the translator.
This appeared in 1843. His Prayers were posthumously published, Boston, 1861, new ed., 1882.
His Life has been written by Weiss, Boston, 1864, 2 vols., and by Frothingham, New York, 1874.

A. P. PEARODY.

PARKHURST. John, Church-of-England lexi-cographer; b. at Catesby, Northamptonshire, June, 1728; d. at Epum, Surrey, March 21, 1797.
He was graduated B.A. at Cambridge, 1748; entered into orders, but soon thereafter retired to his estate at Epum, and devoted himself to bibili-cal studies. He is remembered for his Hebrew and English Lexicon, without Points, with a Hebrew and Chaldean Grammar, without Points, London, 1762 (fourth edition, 1812), and of his A Hebrew and English Lexicon to the New Testament, which is prefixed a Plain and Easy Greek Grammar, 1769, later edition by Rose and Major, 1851. These works are now superseded, but they have done long and excellent service to the writer's method, and five since; the prefaced Hebrew and Chaldean grammar was subsequently separately reprinted by James Prosser, London, 1840); and Greek and English Lexicon to the New Testament, to which is prefixed a Plain and Easy Greek Grammar, 1769.

PARMELL, Thomas, D.D., b. at Dublin, 1679;
d. at Chester, July, 1718 (or 1717); was educated at Trinity College, Dublin; ordained, 1700; archdeacon of Clogher, 1705; prebendary of Dublin, 1713; and vicar of Finglass, 1716. He frequently visited London, and was intimate with Pope and Swift. Pope published in 1722 his Poems, to later editions of which was prefixed a sketch of his life by Goldsmith. Another volume appeared, 1736: its contents were chiefly on sacred themes.
Their authenticity has been doubted, it would seem without reason. Campbell found "a charm in the correct and equable sweetness of Parmell;"
and Goldsmith considered him "the last of that great school that had modelled itself upon the ancestors." To the devout reader the later book ascribed to him is the more interesting of the two.

PARKHURST. 1749

PARSEEISM. was, under the Achemennids and the Sassanides, the ruling religion of Persia, but is now professed only by a few congregations, the so-called Parsees living in and around the Persian city of Yazd and in the western portion of India. To India the Parsees emigrated in the middle of the seventh century after Christ, in order to escape the persecutions of the Moslem caliphs; but very little is known of their settlement and later history. Our knowledge here is limited to the period when the Vedas were not yet produced, at least fifteen hundred years before Christ. The contrast between light and darkness, the most prominent characteristic of Par-seeism, must have been developed by both peoples in common, as also the first outlines of certain deities which afterwards, after the separation, assumed differently specialized characters. The Parsees among the Persians, Indra among the Hindu, Mithra and Mitra, Nasatyau and Avgnghathyas, and others. But it was only the very beginning of a religion and a civilization which was thus made. The two peoples separated, at what time and for what reason, we know not. And among the Persians the contrast between light and darkness was gradually raised to a moral contrast between good and bad, and developed into an elaborate dualism. Ormuzd, in the older idiom Ahura-Mazda, is the cause of every thing good, and dwells in the perfect light: Ahriman, or Angra-Mainyas, is the cause of every thing evil, and dwells in the densest darkness. The inscriptions Darius mention the good principle, under the name of Aura, or Auvamazda: the evil principle they do not mention. But it is possible that the omission is accidental. Plato and Aristotle knew both the principles, as well as several of the subordinate spirits ranging under each principle.

On the relation between those two fundamental principles, Ormuzd and Ahriman, depends the whole visible world, its origin, the course of its history, and its end. The cosmology of the Par-see is somewhat differently held by the different sects. An elaborate representation of it is found only in writings from a later period. We give and Ahriman. Meanwhile the latter awakened the empty space between the realms of Ormuzd and destroyed. Ormuzd then created Meshia and Sharevar, the spirit of the metals; Spendamrat, Anandr, Saval, Naoghaithya, Taritsh, and works. Thus when Ormuzd created the stars, from his stupor, and saw with amazement what the spirits of the waters and the trees, while the spirit of the earth; Chordad and Amerdad, to irang, and Kevan (Saturn) against Mes-gah. But Ahriman had no truly creative power. He could not withstand him, but were utterly destroyed. Ormuzd then created Meshia and Meshiane; but they, too, fell a prey to the temptations of Ahriman; and hunger, sleep, old age, sickness, and death were the result of their fall. Thus the earth became the true arena on which takes place the great contest between Ormuzd and Ahriman; but, however fearful this contest may be, there can be no question, that when the nine thousand years of the truce have run out, and the great battle begins, the power of Ormuzd will have increased so much that he will easily overthrow Ahriman.

For twelve thousand years the world shall last. Of this period the first quarter is taken up with the creation; the second reaches from the completion of the creation to the appearance of Ahriman on the earth; and the third, from that moment to the birth of the great prophet of Parseeism, Zarathustra, or Zoroaster. This third quarter is the heroic or mythical age of Parseeism. Serpents, dragons, and evil kings—Dahak, Zohak, Afrasiab, and others—are poured down upon the earth by Ahriman; and Ormuzd is hardly able to counteract the effect by the creation of great heroes, such as Jenfîb, Feridan, Caicobad, and others. To send his great prophet he dares not: the power of Ahriman is still too great. Not until the opening of the third quarter Zoroaster can be born. Ahriman knew of the event, and understood its importance. By the aid of the evil spirits he first tried to prevent the birth of Zoroaster; and, having failed in that, he endeavored to destroy him. In his thirteenth year he was summoned before Ormuzd, and received from him the necessary instructions and commandments. He then presented himself before the king, Vishtaspa; and, by the miracles he wrought, he succeeded in gaining the king and his court over to the new doctrine. The accounts, however, of Zoroaster, are wholly legendary, and give not the smallest evidence with respect to time and place. Persian theologians simply tell us that Zoroaster was born three thousand years before the occurrence of the last judgment; and when foreign historians place him five thousand years before the Trojan War, or six hundred years before Xerxes, they have as little historical evidence to offer. Vishtaspa has by some been identified with Hystaspes, the father of Darius; but the supposition is very little probable. The immediate result, however, of the appearance of Zoroaster is described as being very great; for the divine word which he brings along with him is a weapon which has the same effect on the supernatural adherents of Ahriman, the Dēvā, as natural weapons have on natural bodies. After the appearance of Zoroaster, the Dēvā are unable to assume an earthly body; they can act only invisibly. There are now, also, other ways in which Ormuzd can fight against Ahriman. Every thousandth year he shall send a new prophet,—Oshedar, Oshedar-mah, and Sosioth; and though mankind may still have many sore trials to go through, there can be no doubt that in the last moment, when the mountains sink, the ocean roars with streams of molten metals, and the whole earth is on fire, Ahriman will be utterly overthrown, and Ormuzd will gather the whole human race into the eternal light where he dwells.

The practical bearing of this theoretical construction is clear and decisive. Living on the earth, where the great contest takes place between Ormuzd and Ahriman, man is not allowed to remain neutral. He must make his choice. If be chooses Ormuzd, it is not impossible that he may become very unhappy in life, for Ahriman's power on earth is very great; and for the very death, judgment will be passed on his life on earth. His good and evil deeds will be weighed and steep, that he will become dizzy, and tumble down into the depths of darkness, where Ahrman and the Devis will receive him with laughter and scorn, and torture him until the day of the final judgment comes.

In his choice, however, the Parsee is not left without the necessary guidance. His sacred book, Avesta, contains the commandments of Ormuzd, by obedience to which he will soon find himself on the right path. First, he must believe in Ormuzd; and he must prove his belief, not only by his words, but also by his thoughts and actions, avoiding all arrogance and envy, all lying and slander, all unchastity, magic, and vice of any kind. Next, he must show his reverence for the Amshaspands by protecting those creations in which they live,— Bahman, by keeping sacred all clean living beings; Ardibilz, by maintaining the fire; Shirivar, by preserving the metals pure; Chordad and Amerdad, by taking care of the trees and the waters. Nor must he neglect the still more subordinate spirits, but aid them in their working by his own doing. To gather a fortune by useful activity, to raise cattle, to make waste land fertile, to destroy serpents and weeds, and other vicious animals and plants, are meritorious works, which contribute to the extension of the realm of Ormuzd. But more especially he must always keep himself clean. Of all uncleanness, contamination by a corpse is the worst. As soon as the soul has left the body, evil spirits take possession of it; and any one who comes in contact with a corpse must undergo a purification, generally consisting simply in ablutions, but sometimes consisting in remaining in a whirlwind which cannot be avoided, as when the wind is directed properly performed without the assistance of a priest. It is, however, not enough to keep the body clean: also the soul must be preserved pure.

Evil thoughts and passions are, indeed, nothing more or less than Drujas, a sort of evil spirits, less powerful than the seven Devis, which Ahriman has succeeded in introducing in the human soul.
The way by which these evil spirits always somewhat exercise their highest power, and lasts until morning. It consists of three parts: first, hymns and offering of sacrifices; then hymns,
and recitation of portions of the law; and, finally, hymns and prayers. As sacrifices are offered small breads, called Darun, of the size of a dollar, and covered with a piece of meat, incense, and Haoma or Hom, the juice of a plant unknown to strangers. The Darun and the Hom are afterwards eaten by the priests. Besides celebrating service, it is also the duty of the priest to confess his flock. It is, indeed, the duty of each Parsee family to have a confessor among the priests, to whom one-tenth of the income of the family shall be paid. The young Parsee becomes a member of the congregation when he is fifteen years old:
after a preparatory instruction by the priests, he undergoes an examination, performs certain ceremonies, and then receives the sacred cord, the so-called Costi, which he never puts off any more.

The Parsees acknowledge that their sacred books such as they now exist are not complete.
The teachings they contain were in old times rarely put down in writing, but simply confided to the memory; and thus it can easily be understood how parts of them could be lost during the period of the Grecian and Roman domination. What has remained falls into two groups,—an older and a younger. The older group contains, besides some minor collections of prayers and hymns, the Avesta; which again consists of the two liturgical works, Vispered and Yaça-a, and the law-book, Vendidad. These three books are sometimes put together in parts, such as they are used in the divine service, and sometimes separately, each provided with a translation, and with glosses, called Zend. The proper name of the book would consequently be Avesta and Zend, and not Zendavesta. The younger group contains, besides the older books translated into Pehlevi, a Persian dialect spoken under the Sassanides, the Bundehesh, a treatise on moral questions, the Bahmanyascht, a treatise on the resurrection,
the Minukhired, a dialogue on moral questions,
and the Arda-Viraf-name, a Persian transcription of the apocryphal ascension of Isaiah. The oldest translations of the Avesta are the French by Anquetil du Perron, Paris, 1771, and the German by Kleuker, Riga, 1776. The latest translations are the German by Spiegel (Leipzig, 1852-62,

Parsons, Robert. See Parsons, Robert.

Parsons, Levi, Congregational missionary; b. in Goshen, Mass., July 18, 1792; d. at Alexandria, Egypt, Feb. 22, 1822. He was graduated at Middlebury College, 1814; sailed Nov. 3, 1819, with Phineas Fisk, for the East, under commission of the American Board. They landed at Smyrna; and on Feb. 12, 1820, Mr. Parsons arrived at Jerusalem, the first Protestant missionary to enter that city. He left it May 8. On his journey to Smyrna, where he arrived Dec. 3, he was detained by severe illness on the island of Syra, and shortly thereafter died. See his biography by D. V. Monton, Boston, 1824, also Sprague’s Annals, v. 3, 1885.

Particular and General Baptists. Among the Baptists of England are the General Baptists and Particular Baptists; the former being Arminian in theology, and holding to a “general” atonement; and the latter Calvinistic, holding to a “particular” atonement. The General Baptists are descended from the company, which, having embraced Baptist doctrines, withdrew from the main body of the Separatist exiles in Holland, and afterwards returned to England in 1612, under the lead of Thomas Helvey. The Particular Baptists are descended from the company, which, under the lead of John Spilsbury, withdrew in 1633 from Henry Jacobs’s Independent congregation at Southwark. See J. Clifford: The Origin and Growth of the English Baptists, London, n.d., and arts. Baptists and General Baptists, p. 2202.

Pasagians, the (Pasagii, Passagini), were a sect which we first hear of in the latter part of the twelfth century, and were condemned at the Council of Verona in 1184. We learn something of their doctrines from Bonaccursus (Manifesto her. Catharorum, in d’Achery, Speculum i., 212) and Bergamensis (Specimen opusc. c. Catharorum et Passagian, in Muratori, Antiq. Ital. med. eeti, v. 152). Both say that the Pasagians taught that the Mosaic law was still in force, the offerings only excepted, and denied the doctrine of the Trinity. Frederick II., in his law against heretics (1224), calls them “the Circumcised.” According to Landulphus the younger (Hist. Mediiæviæ. 41), the excommunication which the archbishop of Milan pronounced upon the opponents of Pope Anacletus in 1133 was the occasion of many Christians falling away to Judaism. A more probable explanation of the origin of the sect may be found with Neander in the intercourse of Jews with Christians. It is, however, best to look to Palestine for their origin; the term passagium ("passage") pointing to pilgrimages, or covering the same frēsāγuk ("all holy"). Erroneous is also the view that Pasagians was another designation for the Cathari. The sect seems to have shown itself principally in Italy.

Pascal, Blaise, one of the greatest thinkers of the seventeenth century; a master of French prose above all his contemporaries; an original investigator in the physical sciences and mathematics; prominent as a philosopher and theologian, and one of the most conscientious, pious, and noble sects of the Catholic Church, was born at Clermont, June 19, 1623; d. at Paris, Aug. 19, 1662. He came from an old and respected family, and was one of three children. His sister Elizabeth (b. Jan. 7, 1620), who married her cousin Florin Perier, became his biographer. His younger sister, Jacqueline (b. at Clermont, Oct. 4, 1623; d. at Port Royal, where she was sub-prior, Oct. 4, 1661), was endowed with the gifts of genius, as well as the graces of womanhood, developed her remarkable powers at an early age, and became one of the principal figures at Port Royal. In 1628 the mother died; and in 1631 the father went to Paris in order to devote himself wholly to the education of Blaise, whose fine talents he had already discerned. The son made excellent progress in the classics, and was to be kept for a time being from the study of his mathematical genius. His mathematical genius forthwith naturally into expression, and the boy was found to have discovered several of Euclid’s propositions before he was twelve years old. In 1640 his father was sent to Rouen by Richelieu, and Blaise invented the counting-machine as a help for him in his duties.

He spent five years upon its perfection. The years 1647, 1648, he devoted to investigations about atmospheric pressure, confirmed Torricelli’s law, and discovered the principle of barometric measurements. These are only examples of his investigations in the department of natural science. In 1646 the Pascal family became acquainted, through some friends, with the writings of Arnauld, St. Cyran, Jansen, etc., and the Jansenist pastor, Guillerbet. Jacqueline, at the death of her father (1651), who had opposed it, took the vows of a nun at Port Royal. Blaise, on the other hand, seemed to lose his religious disposition. He indulged in play, and lost. His favorite author was the sceptical Montaigne. But he was not satisfied. An unrequited affection for a lady of high rank increased his dissatisfaction, and the evangelical piety of Port Royal won his admiration. The poorly accredited accident on the bridge of Neuilly, when the horses ran over into the river, and the carriage was left behind on the bridge, is not to be regarded as having had much influence on his conversion. The strange document which was found, after his death, carefully wrapped up, and sewed in his coat, dated his conversion on Nov. 23, 1654. The document was designed to keep him always mindful of the divine grace which had impressed him so powerfully that night. A sermon by Singlin (Dec. 8) confirmed him in his new purpose; and at his advice Pascal retired to the quiet of Port Royal, where De Sacy became his confessor. His remarkable conversation with De Sacy about Montaigne and Epicurus proves how difficult it was for him to crush his doubts, and shows that he was determined never to become a ascetic. This was a severe ascetic discipline. Without assuming monastic vows, he remained at Port Royal, renounc
PASCAL.

1753

PASCAL.

The holy thorn occurred. On March 24, 1656, there was at this period that the celebrated miracle of the thorn, and touched it to the diseased eye of Pascale's niece, Margaret Perier. In the evening it was suddenly discovered that the eye was healed. This rendered the proposed operation unnecessary; and, eight days subsequently, the physician affirmed that the cure was a miracle. Other miracles were afterwards accomplished with the holy thorn. Pascal was deeply impressed with the miraculous cure of his niece, and determined to make much of the fact from miracles in his Apology for Christianity. He never succeeded in carrying out his plan, but left behind those thoughts and reflections which after his death were published in the much praised Pensees.

From 1656 Pascal spent most of his time in Paris. His health, always poor, declined very perceptibly after 1658; but he continued to devote himself to a severe ascetic discipline and works of charity. His last years were made painful by the measures of the court and of the Pope (1660) for the suppression of Port Royal, and by the condemnation of Arnauld, Nicole, and the nuns in agreeing to the pastoral letter. (See Port Royal.) He received the sacrament from his confessor. He lies buried in the Church of St. Etienne du Mont. A bronze statue at the Tower of St. Jacques, Paris, bears witness to his wonderful experiments as a natural philosopher in determining the weight and elasticity of air.

Pascal stands for the re-action of an offended and pious conscience against Pelagianism and Jesuitism. The depth of his nature and the strength of his Christian convictions are attested by thousands of passages in his Pensees, from whose flashes of insight and observation of human nature and its needs, multitudes have drawn spiritual comfort, strength, and hope. He broke a new path for the defence of Christianity by emphasizing its adaptation to the needs of the human heart, and bringing out its ethical element. He is one of those rare religious characters whom both Catholics and Protestants love to quote; and his defence of Christianity is, to use the fine words of Neander, "a witness to that religious conviction which is founded in immediate perception, and is elevated above all reflection."

Lit. Complete edition of Pascal's works by Bossuet, La Haye, 1779. 5 vols.; later editions, Paris, 1819, 1836, 1861, 1885. The Provincial Letters at first appeared under the title Lettres ecrites a un provincial par un de ses amis (1656) (no place), and later under the title Les Provinciales ou les lettres ecrites par Louis de Montaill, Cologne, 1657, innumerable editions since. Latin translation by Wendrock, 1658, Spanish by Pombo, 1709, French by Cosimo Brunetti, German by Hartmann, 1830, English by Royston, 1657. The Pensees sur la Religion were published in 1670 (1697?) but, to soothe the Jesuits, with some changes. The original text was published by FauCerre, Paris, 1844, 2 vols. Innumerable editions have appeared, including those of Condorcet, 1776, Voltaire (with notes), 1778, Kocher, 1873. J. de Souvres, English notes, Cambridge, 1880; Eng. trans. of Thoughts and Provincial Letters, by Wight, New York, 2 vols.

In 1728 Pascal's conversations with De Sacy about Montaigne and Epictetus was published. The literature about Pascal is very large. Lives by Gilberte Paulin, 1689; Bossuet, St. Louis, 1836; Cousin, Paris, 1857; Dreydorff: Pascal, sein Leben u. seine Kuniige, Leipzig, 1870 (a minute critical study); H. Weis: PASCAL ALS APOLGET D. CHRISTENTUMS, Leipzig, 1863.
PASCAL. 1754 PASCAL CONTROVERSIES.

[The miscellaneous works, letters, and poems of Jacqueline Pascal, were edited by FAUGÈRE, Paris, 1849, and the life written by COUSIN, Paris, 1849, and SOPHY WINTHROP WEIZEL (Sister and Saint), New York, 1890.] TH. SCHOTT.

PASCAL, Jacqueline. See p. 1752.

PASCAL CONTROVERSIES. The anniversary of Christ's death was called the Passion in the first and third centuries. From the fourth century this designation included the festival of the resurrection; and at a later period the idea of the passover was confined to the festival of Easter. The controversies concerning the differences of opinion about the special day of celebrating the anniversary of our Lord's death are known as the "Paschal Controversies."

1. The Celebration of the Passover in the First Three Centuries.—There is no doubt that Jesus was crucified during the week of the Jewish passover. According to the synoptists, Jesus ate the regular Paschal meal on the 14th, and died on the 15th, of Nisan. According to John, he died on the 11th, "the preparation of the passover" (John xix. 11, 31). The attempts to reconcile this difference have proved unsatisfactory for the most eminent commentators and chronologists deny, and justly, that an irreconcilable difference exists between John and the synoptists. Among these critics are Lightfoot, Wieseler, Robinson (Harm. of the Gospels, pp. 212-223), Lange, Ebrard, Westcott, Milligan, Plumptre, and Schaff.

It is difficult to determine when the celebration of the Passover originated in the Christian Church. There is no doubt that the Jewish Christians continued to observe the Jewish feasts, associating with them Christian ideas. It may be that the reference in 1 Cor. v. 7, 8, justifies the assumption that the feast was celebrated with Christian rites at Corinth. The Christian festivals are not mentioned, either by the apostolic Fathers or critics, as inappropriate to it. Every week was made joyous instead of mourning. The Lord's Supper was generally regarded as the Christian Passover. The controversy about the special day of celebrating the resurrection gave to the weekly festivals, have made Neander's view justifiable, that an irreconcilable difference exists between John and the synoptists. Among these critics are Lightfoot, Wieseler, Robinson (Harm. of the Gospels, pp. 212-223), Lange, Ebrard, Westcott, Milligan, Plumptre, and Schaff.

According to Hermas, Friday was passed in fasting, and the Lord's Supper was generally regarded as inappropriate to it. Every week was made to bear the impress of the week in which the Saviour was crucified. At the annual anniversary of the passion, these two days, Friday and Sunday, would have an augmented significance, and the solemnity of the former, and the joyousness of the latter, be intensified. The Christian celebration of the passover did not assume this double character in the second century, as Neander and Hilgenfeld supposed. The two features referred to were associated with the passover and Pentecost. In the wider application of the term, Pentecost covered fifty days, and commemorated the resurrection and ascension of Christ, and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, and was a period of joyous festivity. The passover, in the second and third centuries, was exclusively a memorial of the passion and crucifixion, as is apparent from the following considerations: (1) All the fathers agree that Christ was the true Paschal lamb, and looked upon πασχάν ("passover") and πασχάν ("to suffer") as related terms (Justin: Dial., 40; Iren., IV. 19; Tertul.: Adv. Jud., 10). Augustine was the first to declare definitely against this relation. Starting with this assumption, they concluded that Christ's offering had only occurred on the day of the passover offering, the 14th of Nisan. (2) Tertullian (De bapt., 19) speaks of the passion of the Lord and Pentecost as proper times for baptism: on the former we are baptized into Christ's death; on the latter, into his resurrection. Origen (c. Cels., VIII. 22) speaks of those who are risen with Christ as continually walking in the days of Pentecost; and, as he contrasts the passover with Pentecost, he cannot have associated the resurrection with the passover. According to Hippolytus, the annual Christian passover, as late as the third century, was celebrated on the Friday which fell on the 14th of Nisan, or the one next following it. It was marked by fasting; which, as Tertullian states, was continued through Saturday (De bapt., 19). Lightfoot, Ribbeck, and Robinson, Dill., 40; Iren., IV. 19; Tertul.: Adv. Jud., 10). Some fasted forty hours. The Roman Christian prolonged the fast till the cock-crowing on Sunday morning. In the fifth book of the Apostolic Constitutions the rules are further elaborated. "The fast of the forty days" preceded Paschal Week, and lasted each week five days. During Paschal Week, only bread, salt, and vegetables could be eaten. The congregations were assembled in the vigil preceding the sabbath for the baptism of catechumens, and the reading and preaching of the gospel. At the cock-crowing the Eucharist was observed, and the evidences of joy substituted for the signs of mourning.

2. The Celebration of Passover in the Church of Asia Minor, and the Paschal Controversy. —The Church of Asia Minor differed from the Roman Church in regard to the observance of the Passover. In the second century this difference was the occasion of a protracted controversy which agitated all Christendom, and remained for the historian, for a long time, one of the darkest pages in the history of early Christianity. The Church of Asia Minor celebrated the passover on the 14th of Nisan. The older theologians supposed it was the festival of the resurrection. Herrmann (vera descriptio priscorum contentionis... de paschate, 1745) properly looked upon it as the festival of the Lord's passion. But Neander, in 1823, made the assertion that these churches, following the Jewish custom, partook of a lamb on the 14th of Nisan, commemorating thereby the Last Supper. The Tubingen school developed this idea more fully, using it as a proof against the genuineness of John's Gospel. Baur urged, that if this Gospel was designed to represent Christ as the true Paschal lamb, and to prove that the 14th of Nisan was the day of the crucifixion, it could not have been written by John; for the churches of Asia Minor based their practice upon his testimony, but, notwithstanding, must have regarded the 15th as the day of the crucifixion. But Neander, in his second edition of his Church History, proved that the churches of Asia Minor looked upon the 14th as the day... on which Christ died, because the Paschal lamb was the type of Christ’s sacrifice.

When, in the year 160 (according to Lipsius, 155), Polycarp of Smyrna visited Anicetus, bishop of Rome, the question of the passover was discussed. Anicetus could not persuade Polycarp to relinquish the observance of the 14th of Nisan as the day of the passover; the latter, referring, in his justification, to the example of the apostles Peter and John. They parted on friendly terms. The controversy finally broke out in 190 (Lipsius, 192–194), when the Roman bishop Victor, with the presentiment of the primacy of his bishopric, attempted to force the Roman practice upon the churches of Asia Minor. Victor came to an understanding with other territorial churches. Synods were held in Palestine, Pontus, Gaul, Osroene, Alexandria, Corinth, and Rome; and the Roman practice was confirmed. The aged Polycrates of Ephesus replied in the name of all the bishops of Asia Minor, appealed to the apostles Philip and John, to Polycarp, Thraseas, etc., all of whom had celebrated the passover on the 14th of Nisan, and to others up the Scriptures, and would not be intimidated by Rome. Victor declared the Oriental churches heterodox, broke communion with them, and attempted to induce the other churches to do the same. Irenaeus and many other bishops declared against this course. Victor was unsuccessful in influencing the other churches to follow him, and the rupture confined itself to Rome and Ephesus.

Between 160 and 190 there was another controversy, which fell in 170, and was confined to the churches of Asia Minor. Eusebius (IV.26, 3) speaks of a “great controversy about the passover in Laodicea.” Melito and Apollinaris wrote about it, but only fragments of their writings are preserved.

The difference between Rome and the churches of Asia Minor is thus described by Eusebius (V. 23):

“The churches of all Asia believed, upon the basis of older traditions, that the passover of the Saviour was to be celebrated on the fourteenth day of the month, on which the Jews were enjoined to offer the lamb; so that the fast might be terminated on this day, no matter on what particular day of the week it fell. The other churches of the world did not adopt this practice, but held fast to the practice founded upon apostolic tradition, and still in vogue, that it was not fitting to break the fast on any day but the day of the resurrection.”

The synods, with the exception of that of Asia Minor, declared that the festival of the resurrection was only to be kept on a Sunday, and that not till that day was the Paschal fasting to be concluded.

From the above it is evident, that, as the churches of Asia Minor concluded their fasting on the 14th of Nisan, this day was regarded as the anniversary of the Lord’s death. This conclusion is confirmed by the later accounts of the Quartodecimans (the Fourteeners; that is, those who commemorated the Lord’s death on the 14th). Epiphanius states further (Her., L. 1), that the festival of the passover in Asia Minor continued only during a single day. The majority of the churches fixed the celebration by the day of the week (Friday) on which the crucifixion occurred; the churches of Asia Minor, by the day of the month of the Jewish passover.

The case was different with the Laodicene controversy of 170. Apollinaris, Clemens, and Hippolytus opposed a party, which, proceeding upon the assumption that Jesus ate the Paschal meal on the 14th, and was crucified on the 13th, celebrated a feast on the 14th in commemoration of the last passover. These Quartodecimans, these three Fathers agree in opposing, on the ground that the true Paschal lamb suffered on the 14th. This party, although orthodox, had Jewish sympathies, and referred more especially to the Gospel of Matthew, the Gospel which the Ebionites used. It aroused the heated controversy at Laodicea, in which Melito of Sardis, and Apollinaris of Hierapolis, took part. A certain Blasius, who, Tertullian says (De praes., 53), wanted to smuggle in Judaistic practices, transplanted the party to Rome, and secured a following (Eus., V. 15).

The increase of these schismatic Quartodecimans undoubtedly formed the occasion of Hippolytus’ treatment of them in his Refutation of all Heresies. He definitely assert that the distinction between Christian and Judaizing Quartodecimans is an arbitrary one. The Laodicean discussion was only a passing act in the great passover controversy, and the Roman Church succeeded in securing a representative for its views in Apollinaris. The churches of Asia Minor continued to cling to the old Christian Paschal celebration as it was established in Apostolic times.

It must be remarked (1) That every attempt to reconcile the fragments of the Paschal writings which have been preserved, and the notices about the practice of the churches of Asia Minor, has failed, so that the Laodicene discussion was not a mere passing act; (2) The Tubingen school, goes upon the false assumption that after Paul’s death, and in a hostile spirit, introduced the Judaistic practice; and (3) That the celebration of the Eucharist in Asia Minor was marked by features which distinguished it from the usual celebration in the church, and was more nearly like the celebration in the church of the first days, etc.

The church at large, appealing to the testimony of Peter and Paul, saw an approach to the Judaistic mode of observance in the practice of the churches of Asia Minor. The more intense the conflict of the Gentile churches was with Ebionism, the more keen was its vision to spy out Judaizing tendencies. The observance of the 14th of Nisan was beyond dispute the only ground of this charge; and historians failed to observe that the spirit of the Paschal celebration in Asia Minor was as much at variance with Judaizing Christianity as was that of Rome.

In consequence of this divergence, and other differences in the time of observing the passover feast (the Romans putting the day of the equinox on March 18; the Alexandrians, on March 21), the passover and resurrection days often fell in the different churches in different weeks. The synod of Aries (314) sought, but in vain, to secure a uniform practice. This result was brought about by the Council of Nicaea (325), the Oriental churches agreeing to the new ordinances. (See Easter.) In spite of the decree of the council, many Oriental congregations held to the old prac-
PASCHALIS.

The synod of Antioch (341) punished its advocates with excommunication. In the canons of the councils of Laodicea (384) and Constantinople (381) they were called τοποφωσκεκατεκτηται, or Quattuordecimani ("Fourteeners"). In the fourth century, Peter, bishop of Alexandria (d. 311), had contributed with other Patriarchs to the condemnation of the Quattuordecimani. The latter rejected the accusation of Judaistic leanings when he said, "We intend nothing else than to commemorate the passion of our Lord, and at the very time which the early eye-witnesses have handed down." Epiphanius distinguished three factions. Theodoret, in the fifth century (Hær. iv. 6, 2), states that the Quattuordecimani "say that John the evangelist, when he was preaching in Asia Minor, taught them to observe the 14th; but, as they misunderstood the apostolic tradition, they do not wait for the day of the resurrection, but commemorate the Lord's passion on Tuesday, Thursday, Saturday, or any other day on which the 14th of Nisan stood the apostolic tradition, they do not wait for the further history and celebration, see Faster.

The clergy finally agreed upon Sergius I., who was elected at the same time. The majority of the convent of St. Stephen when he was elected in 817, nominated Lothaire at Aix-la-Chapelle to share his imperial throne, Paschalis, remaining firm, was taken prisoner by Henry, was forced to demand the oath and service of fealty from the bishops. This conclusion of peace between the Church and the State was exceedingly favorable to the latter. The conflict between Paschalis and the German emperors turned out likewise to the disadvantage of the papal power.

Paschalis pronounced "eternal excommunication" against Henry IV., on March 12, 1102, and carried his bitterness so far as to release his son from the obligation of filial obedience. Henry IV. died in 1106, and Henry V. was pledged to defend the interests of the church with the sword; but after the Council of Troyes (1107), at which the Pope asserted his sole right of investiture, he found in Paschalis his most dangerous enemy. When, in 1110, Henry marched upon Rome with the purpose of demanding the crown, and settling the question of investiture, Paschalis determined to make a treaty on the basis of the principles he had learned as a Cluny monk. He proposed, in lieu of the right of investiture, that the German bishops should renounce all their rights as temporal princes, and depend upon the volun-PASCHASIUS.

1575

PASSEOVER.

Chartres and Peter of Porto thought the Pope had gone too far. The strict Gregorian party demanded the annulling of the concessions and the excommunication of Henry V; but Paschalis remained true to his oath. The synod of Vienna, Sept. 16, 1112, and other synods, excommunicated the emperor. In 1117 Henry again marched upon Rome to take measures to prevent the gift of Mathilde of Canossa falling to the papal chair, and to again treat about his right of investiture, fearing the Pope would give way. Paschalis fled from the city, and his death soon after his return stopped any further measures against the emperor. He was a man of religious earnestness and high ideals, but was destitute of firmness. See Vita e Petro Pisano, in Watterich, Pontif. Rom. rite, ii. 1 sqq.; JAFFE: Reg. Pontif. Rom. His letters are found in Migne, vol. 163; HASSE: Anselm von Canterbury. HEEFEL: Conciliengesch., vol. v.; GERVASI: PONT. GESCH. DEUTSCHLANDS unter d. Regierung Heinrich V u. Lahar III., Leipzig, 1841. GIESEBRECHT: Gesch. d. deutschen Kaiserzeit, 2d part, 4th ed., Braunschw., 1877. — Paschalis III., anti-pope (1161-63). See ALEXANDER III., p. 51. R. ZOEFFHEL.

PASCHASIUS, Radbertus. See RADBERTUS.

PASQUALIS, Martinez, b. in Provence in 1715; d. in St. Domingo in 1779. He was of Jewish origin, and the Cabala was the source from which he drew his ideas. He introduced cabalistic rites into the foundations of the new order established. The law governing its observance are Exod. xii. 21-39, xiii. 3-16. Here, likewise, the holidays, on which no work was done, and people gathered for worship. Connected with this feast is the offering of the sheaf of the first-fruits after sunset. The second year of the annual repetition of the passover is the tenth on the month of the exodus (Nisan). Every head of a family was commanded to choose, on the 10th of the month, a male lamb or goat, without blemish, and to kill it on the 14th, "between the two evenings" (Exod. xii. 6, margin). The Karaites and Samaritans explain the last expression to mean between sunset and darkness; the Pharisees, between three o'clock and sunset. Rashi and Kimchi, of the time just before and after the house, or left over to the next day. The meal was to be taken in haste, the partakers having their loins girded, shoes on their feet, and staff in their hand (Exod. xii. 11). Only the circumcised could partake of the meal. This meal introduced the seven days of the Feast of Unleavened Bread. From the 15th to the 21st, leavened bread was forbidden, on penalty of excommunication. The first and last days were great holidays, on which no work was done, and people gathered for worship. Connected with this feast was the offering of the sheaf of the first-fruits (Lev. xxiii. 10 sqq.), which does not mean crushed grains of wheat, as Josephus supposes (Ant., III. 10, 5). The use of the harvest was forbidden till after this offering had been made. The Jehovist document contains accounts of the passover in Exod. xii. 21-39, xiii. 3-16. Here, likewise, the institution of the feast is connected with the exodus; and the failure to leave the bread uncrushed is explained as a result of the people's great haste. Deuteronomy also gives an account of the passover (xvi. 1 sqq.), which is shorter than that of the Elohist, but presupposes more extensive regu-
the passover was the principal least after the first passover celebrated after the crossing of the Jordan (Josh. v. 10). And two others are specially mentioned before the period of the exile. In the notice of the one under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxv. 18), that no such passover had been kept since the days of Samuel. He means by this, as a comparison of 2 Kings xxiii. 21 sqq. shows, that no case had the legal regulations been so strictly kept.

Meaning — The passover was at once an agricultural festival of thanksgiving and an historical anniversary. It was a feast of consecration at the beginning of harvest (Deut. xvi. 9), and an anniversary in honor of the emancipation from Egypt by the divine hand. Some modern scholars, like Hupfeld, Schultz, and Wellhausen, hold that the historical idea had a secondary place, and was associated with the harvest festival at a later period, and looked upon the lamb as having been, in the first instance, an offering of the first-born on the part of the shepherds. But this is mere assumption. All the accounts dating from Moses give no indication of any such idea, and agree in associating the passover with the exodus; and the unleavened bread is distinctly referred to, not as an offering of the first-fruits of the ground (Exod. xiii. 13), but as the "bread of affliction," to remind the people of the Egyptian servitude.

The paschal lamb was a sacrifice; and this we say in spite of the Reformers, who denied to it this character. Such expressions as, "it is the sacrifice of the Lord's passover" (Exod. xii. 27), "an offering," "an oblation," (Num. ix. 7), etc., fully justify the idea of sacrifice. The idea of sacrifice is not brought out in the first celebration in Egypt; for there was then no priesthood and no altar. At a later time, the blood was sprinkled, and probably the fatty pieces burned on the altar (Exod. xxiii. 18, xxxiv. 25). It belonged to that class of offerings in which the meal was the principal part, and in which that was a representation of the communion between God and man. It was a home or family offering, where the members of the family united, and confessed themselves to be the Lord's people. Every family was a little congregation of worshippers by itself.

The blood had an expiatory efficacy, by keeping the divine wrath away from the home. The sacrificial nature of the occasion is shown by the regulations governing the selection of the lamb (or goat); and the injunction against breaking its bones points to its consecrated character. The hurried completion of the meal brings out the importance of the moment of salvation, when the people were waiting anxiously for deliverance. The bitter herbs referred back to the Egyptian oppression, and the unleavened bread also had an historical meaning (Exod. xii. 20 sq., xiii. 8). In the New Testament, the passover lamb is a type of Christ (1 Cor. v. 7), whose sacrificial death secures deliverance from the wrath of God for his church, which enters into communion with God by partaking of his body and blood.

Celebration at the Time of Christ. — Our authorities on this point are, for the most part, the later Talmudic and rabbinical writers. The Paschal lamb, like the other sacrifices, might only be slain in the forefront of the temple. For this reason the passover feast attracted an immense course of people to Jerusalem, — a fact which gave rise to great fear of, and precautions on the part of the Romans against, national revolts at this season of the year (Matt. xxvi. 5; Josephus, Ant., xvii. 9, 3, xx. 5, 3). The custom which the governor practised, of giving up a prisoner, was designed to make a favorable impression upon the Jews, and quiet them. A terrible fate overtook the people at the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, when they were shut in, and involved in its horrors. Josephus (Bell. Jud., v. 9, 3) states, that a few years previous, the Paschal lambs were counted at the solicitation of Cestius, and found to number 256,500. Reckoning ten men to a lamb, this would give a throng of nearly 3,000,-000 in attendance upon the feast. The pilgrims could not find room in the city, and were obliged to resort to the surrounding towns, or live in tents. The time of celebrating the feast depended upon the condition of the harvest. If the fruits of the field were not far enough advanced in the middle of the twelfth month to seem to justify the harvest a month later, the twelfth month was regarded as an intercalary month, and a thirteenth month added. The Sanhedrin announced when the Paschal month began as soon as the new moon had been seen, and the news was spread through the country by means of fire-signals. But when the Samaritans began to deceive the Jews by false signals, the news was communicated by messengers. The lambs were killed in the afternoon of the 14th of Nisan, at half-past two, and offered an hour later. If the day was the preparation of the sabbath, the killing began an hour earlier. The priests received the blood in silver vessels, and poured it upon the altar, and put the pieces to be offered up in another vessel. Then the Levites began to sing the Hallel. Not less than ten, seldom more than twenty, men partook of one lamb. The Talmud enjoined that each party should eat a portion, at least as large as an olive. Josephus and the Mishna assume that women also partook of the meal; but according to the Gemara they were not obligated to do so. After the first cup was drunk, the first-born son asked for an explanation of the passover ceremonies, whereupon followed a detailed account of their institution (Exod. xii. 26 sq., xiii. 8). The company then started the Hallel (Ps. cxiii.—cxviii.), and, after singing the first two psalms, drank the second cup followed by two others, and then completed the Hallel. It was after this that our Lord went out and sang a hymn with his disciples (Matt. xxvi. 30; Mark xiv. 26).
PASTORAL LETTERS. 1759 PASTORAL THEOLOGY.

[The Samaritans still celebrate the passover at the same time as the Jews did; namely, on the full moon of Nisan. Dean Stanley, who witnessed the rites in 1862, describes the scene in a note appended to vol. i. of his Jewish Church. The community of Nabûs, numbering a hundred and fifty-two individuals, gathered on Mount Gerizim, a few hundred feet below its summit. At sunset they collected about a trench; and, after the chanting of some praises and prayers, six sheep were driven into their midst. The history of the exodus was then recited, after which the sheep were killed, and the noses and foreheads of the children touched with the blood. The parties then all saluted one another with a kiss, and the sheep were fleeced, and roasted in holes dug in the ground. After midnight the feast begun, and proceeded in silence, and as it if haste. In ten minutes all was consumed but a few remnants, which were thrown into the fire, care being taken that none should be left.]—Hermon, Hierozicon, London, 1869. (pp. 551 sq.) ; Spencer : De legg. Hebreorum, Lips., 1703; Hitzig : Ostern u. Pfingsten, Heidelberg, 1838; Bachmann : D. Festgesetz d. Pentateuchs, 1858. For the later Jewish rites; Hottinger : Juris Hebrae. leges, Zurich, 1855; Otho : Lex rabbin. phil.; Ewald : [Antiquities of the Old Testament]; Oehler : [Theology of the Old Testament, vol. i.]; E. Schümmer : Ueber jugo te rod noxa, John xvi. 28. Giessen, 1883.]

PASTORAL LETTERS are letters addressed by the pastor, the shepherd, to his flock, generally by the bishop to the clergy under his jurisdiction, or to the laity of his diocese, or to both parties at once. At various times and in various places the secular government has claimed the right of exercising a kind of censure over such pastoral letters; but the claims have always been met with the most decided protest from the side of the clergy. The term also applies to letters issued by ecclesiastical bodies to the pastors under their jurisdiction, e.g., by a Presbyterian assembly.

PASTORAL THEOLOGY. Theology is divided into two parts,—Theoretical and Practical. Under the second division are included Homiletics, Catechetics, Liturgics, and Poiménics. Of these subdivisions the first three are treated in other articles under their respective headings: the fourth, Poiménics, is the one to be considered here.

The qualifications and the call of the ministry are themes incidental and introductory, and may be passed without discussion, as the proper limits of this article demand. We have to do rather with the practical work of the pastor. A presbytery, or other ecclesiastical body, in licensing a candidate for the ministry, must pass upon his fitness for the service. That verdict is to be confirmed by the call of a church and congregation to the licentiate to become their pastor: without such a call, or its equivalent in a missionary appointment, the licentiate is not to be considered as ordained. The call of a church and congregation, when accepted, involves reciprocal obligations. These obligations are represented, but cannot be fully expressed, much less can they be limited by the terms of the call; for the church and congregation owe the pastor, and the pastor owes them, more than can be put into any writing. The call made and accepted is a contract, but it is more than that. Not only must it be fulfilled on both sides with business-like fidelity, but it must be fulfilled in the large-ness of the spirit of mutual Christian love.

The true minister will never be a place-seeker. In the spirit of the saying of Confucius, — "I am not concerned that I have no place, I am concerned how I may fit myself for one,"—the true-hearted minister, having done his work of preparation with fidelity, will trust the Great Head of the church to find him a place; and the old proverb will hold good. "A stone that is fit for the wall will not be left in the roadway." Absolute personal consecration to Christ and to his kingdom is fundamental to the true idea of an evangelical ministry. Considerations of adaptation and of family ties must have weight; but always should predominate the question, "Lord, what will thou have me to do?"

Once settled in a parish, the pastor needs, not only power in the pulpit, but also power to reach and sway men by personal contact and influence. Preaching prepares the way for pastoral work; and pastoral work inspires and guides and warms the preaching, and gives it practical adaptation and power. The true pastor finds the themes of his sermons among his people, rather than in his own tastes and tendencies; and so he preaches, not for himself, but for his hearers. If for preaching, talent is first, and tact is second, for pastoral work, tact is first, and talent is second; piety being equally necessary in both relations. Tact is defined as "a finer love:" it is of the heart; and, other things being equal, the factor that is the warmest will have the people, rather than an absence of address, facility, and skill which we call tact. The large and general relation of the preacher to his congregation as a whole becomes in the pastor a personal and an individual relation to each member of the flock, without regard to condition or character. This involves the dealing with a great variety of characters, each a separate and a sacred responsibility to the pastor. The work is endless. There are always some souls in need of personal ministrations. Men are reached and saved one by one, and not in mass. The preacher must be a pastor to gather in one by one the souls to whom he has spoken from the pulpit the words of truth.

As the pastor goes among the people, what he is will condition what he says: his character and life will help or hinder his work. "The visible rhetoric" of the minister's daily conduct is more decisive in influence than the audible rhetoric of his sermons. Clerical affectations and assumptions can no longer deceive or awe the people: the visible manliness sanctified by the love of Christ, and yet only the more intensely human because christly. Once the minister was first, and the man second: now the man is first, or the minister has no place or power. In St. Paul's Epistle to Titus (i. 7-9), there are thirteen virtues enjoined as conditioning the one thing,—ability to preach; as if to show that the character is to pulpit-power as thirteen is to one.

Scholarly tastes and habits must be watched.
lest they disqualify for genial and effective converse with the common people. The scholarly must be qualified by the christly, then the small courtesies, which are of such value in the commerce of society, will not be neglected, and love will make the pastor a gentleman, welcome to every household and heart.

There is an old saying, as trite as true, “A house-going minister makes a church-going people.” The work of pastoral visitation must be systematized. A “calling-book” should be kept, in which, with the name of each family, the names of the children should be recorded. The date of each call should be noted, so that the pastor can learn at any time where his next calls should be made. Only in this way can thoroughness, regularity, and impartiality be secured in the visitation of the people. The pastor in these calls should not be always preaching; for a minister who is always preaching, never really preaches. The aim should be to enter into the sympathies of the people, to know their home-life, and to win their confidence and affection.

Besides this general visitation, there should be special visitations upon the sick and the afflicted. The tenderness and the sympathy of Christ as toward the suffering, and the words of promise, of counsel, and of comfort with which the Bible abounds, will suggest to the true pastor how he should minister among the sick and the sorrowing. Such calls should be short and frequent, and the words spoken should be few and careful.

Other special calls must be made to reach particular cases of spiritual need. As soon as may be, the pastor should inform himself concerning the spiritual condition of every member of his congregation. His work should begin with the officers of the church, to enlist them in active co-operation; then the membership of the church should be roused to prayer and labor; then Christians outside of the church should be urged no longer to delay confessing Christ. By this method of working from the centre outward, by the time he comes to seek those who are without Christ (beginning with the thoughtful, then approaching the careless, and then the sceptical), the pastor will find that the way has been prepared for him.

Meanwhile the course of preaching should correspond with the course of pastoral labor, beginning at the centre of the church, and working outwards toward those who are farthest from the truth. There will be morbid Christians, given to too much introspection, who make the radical mistake which Hamman has characterized as “the attempt to feel thought, and to comprehend feeling.” Such spiritual egoism can be cured only by Christian work. The morbid Christian must stop feeling him. His pulse, and go out into the vineyard, and try to minister for Christ; there can be no spiritual health and vigor without such work. Hence that pastor will be the most successful, who, instead of trying to do all the work of the parish himself, strives to enlist and stimulate the members of the church to work with him as their appointed leader.

There are various cases of temperament, disposition, character, and condition, that the pastor must break from bondage to himself and to his experience, and learn to judge men, not by himself, but in themselves, making large and generous allowances for differences that come of nature or of education, of antecedent or of present circumstances. In order to this, he must be a many-sided man, always studying in a docile way the endlessly varied manifestations of human nature. He must be stimulated and sustained in his systematic pastoral work, not by natural personal attractions, but by divine motives. He should school himself to see in each soul a special responsibility, for which he must account to Christ. He should see men, not in the common human way, but as made in the image of God, and as redeemed by the blood of the Son of God. This will make the pastor impartial, and faithful to all; and so his parochial work will not depend upon fitful impulses, but will be sustained by the deepest and divinest principles.

There are special relations which the pastor sustains to the officers of the church and congregation and to the heads or leaders in the organized work of the parish. The trustees, or those in charge of the secular interests of the congregation, may ask counsel of him, and then he should give it; but he should not interfere with them. Always recognizing the contention that business men should manage the business interests of the parish. The pastor’s relations to the spiritual officers of the church should be cordial and confidential. He should not dictate to them, but rather counsel with them, treating them with studied respect and consideration, while maintaining his personal independence.

As to the heads or leaders in the organized work of the church, the general rule is, that the pastor should be loyal to their leadership, and should show respect for the positions they have been appointed to occupy. The sabbath-school should be under the care of the spiritual officers of the church, and the same may be said of the choir, or the conductors of the music. It may be remarked, however, in passing, that it would be an inexcusable egoism in the pastor to demand that the devotional music in the sabbath worship should be adapted only to his individual taste and culture, and not rather to the average taste and culture of the whole congregation. And of the other relation it may be said, that, for the sabbath-school, teachers should be selected, not primarily with reference to the good they may get by having such work to do, but rather with reference to their competency to do the children good. The sabbath-school is not a gymnasium for feeble Christians, but rather it is the institution for the religious education of the children of the congregation. Not all good people will make good teachers. The pastor should visit both the choir and the sabbath-school in the spirit of courteous Christian sympathy with the departments of church life there represented.

There may be within the church, organizations for varied Christian work; such as young people’s associations, young men’s Christian associations, Dorcas or sewing societies, missionary societies, foreign and home; and to the leaders in these organizations the relations of the pastor are always delicate, and sometimes difficult. It is a question how far it is wise to multiply organizations within the church; since the church is itself the divinely appointed organization as against all evil, and for all good.
Some things must be said with reference to the pastor in his relations to the ordinances of public worship. Here we must not trespass upon the subject of homiletics, elsewhere treated. There is a danger in almost every parish, that the people will demand more frequent calls or visits than the pastor can make consistently with what he owes to his study and pulpit. There should be a careful division of time between the claims of the study and the demands for household visitation. Five hours a day at least should be kept sacred to both of these. Besides these hours, besides what is required for the preparations for the sabbath, some portion of time should be given to systematic courses of study. The time thus devoted should be protected in all possible ways from unnecessary interruptions. To be a good pastor, a minister must be a good preacher; and the converse is equally true.—To be a good preacher, a minister must be a good pastor.

Nothing in the way of activity and zeal can take the place of systematic, close, sustained study; and no amount of study can take the place of systematic, house-to-house visitation. The two departments of work, pulpit and parochial, must not conflict, but be proportionate, limited to the bounds of the pastor's ability. There should be preparation in the study, not only for preaching, but also for the other parts of public worship. The Scripture-reading should be, in spirit and manner, instructive and interesting. Regular courses of reading, continued from sabbath to sabbath, with brief expository hints, may be of great importance. The hymns should be selected with care, not merely to enforce the lesson of the sermon, but mainly to kindle and express the devotions of the people. There should be thoughtful preparation for leading the people in prayer, so that the actual condition of the congregation and of the country may be represented in the thanksgivings and supplications of the service.

The benevolences of the church constitute an important part of public worship. The pastor should not only keep himself informed concerning all the aggressive work of the church, so that he can inform his people, but he should study methods of reaching their hearts, so as to make them feel the claims of Christ in all departments of his work. They should be taught, not only that giving is worship, but that, under existing conditions, it is doubtful whether there can be true and acceptable worship unless the offerings of the heart and the lips are accompanied, sometimes at least, by the generous offerings of the hand.

The sacraments of the church involve some special pastoral obligations. As to baptism, the pastor should know the condition and habits of his people. He should know what parents have had their children baptized, and he should kindly and faithfully instruct such parents as to their covenant privileges and obligations; and, with those parents who are neglecting this ordinance for themselves and for their children, he should remonstrate, urging them to the performance of their duty.

As to the Lord's Supper, the pastor should exercise the greatest care, lest, on the one hand, he may repel or restrain those timid and doubtless Christians who need that spiritual refreshment which Christ gives only at his table. The celebration of the sacramental feast should be made bright and hopeful, self and sin disappearing, for the time, in the ascendency of the exalted Christ.

The prayer-meeting, or, as it is sometimes called, the conference-meeting, under the sole conduct of the pastor, it is to be feared is fast changing into a mere lecture, and so is losing its social character. It is a question whether it is better that the prayer-meeting should be conducted by the pastor, or by such of the officers and members of the church as have the spirituality, the tact and skill, to make this social service both interesting and profitable. No one method should constrain the liberty of the pastor in this relation: a variety of methods is more conducive to the freshness and effectiveness of this important service. A schedule of topics may be prepared, printed, and distributed, so that the people will know from week to week the theme that will be considered. Questions may be sent in to the pastor to be answered in the prayer-meeting. A course of reading should be assigned, and, if not too long or labored, may be tried with profit. The pastor should be bound by no method, but should impress his people with the deep significance, sacredness, and power of united prayer.

Unselfish consecration, the love of men for Christ's sake, power in the pulpit, tact, tenderness, a profound knowledge of human nature, and a Christlike manliness, are the fundamental necessities to success in pastoral work.

PASTORELLS.

1762

PATIENCE.

to gather in 1558. Early in the thirteenth century the Cathari appropriated the name, erroneously affirming that it came from pari ("to suffer"), because they were called upon to suffer for their faith.

C. SCHMIDT.

PASTORELLS. Those risings of the lower classes, which, under the name of pastorales or pastoraux, took place several times in France, were doubt chiefly caused by the excitement produced by the Crusades; but it is apparent that also other causes, such as hatred to the clergy, despair of the miserable state of affairs in general, etc., were at work. When, in 1251, the report reached France that Louis IX. had been taken a prisoner, a former Cistercian, Jacob of Haoenbach, announced that he was called by God to lead of a deposed priest and a runaway monk. Jacob was defeated at Bourges, his adherents were dispersed, and all the leaders decapitated. A similar rising took place in 1253, when the people of Agen were dispersed, and all the leaders decapitated. A similar rising took place in 1253, when the people of Agen were dispersed, and all the leaders decapitated.

PATARINES (Patarini, Patareni, Paterelli, etc.), a name given in the eleventh century to the deacon Arialdus, a zealous opponent of clerical marriages, and, later, to the Cathari, who condemned marriage altogether. The name does not come, as Du Cange supposes, from a certain Paterinus Romanus, who spread the heresy of the Cathari in Italy and Boenia; for then one would have expected Paterinici, but from paterinis ("col lector of rags"), a low quarter of the city of Milan, where the followers of Arialdus were wont

PATARINES (Patarini, Patareni, Paterelli, etc.), a name given in the eleventh century to the deacon Arialdus, a zealous opponent of clerical marriages, and, later, to the Cathari, who condemned marriage altogether. The name does not come, as Du Cange supposes, from a certain Paterinus Romanus, who spread the heresy of the Cathari in Italy and Boenia; for then one would have expected Paterinici, but from paterinis ("collector of rags"), a low quarter of the city of Milan, where the followers of Arialdus were wont

PATARINES (Patarini, Patareni, Paterelli, etc.), a name given in the eleventh century to the deacon Arialdus, a zealous opponent of clerical marriages, and, later, to the Cathari, who condemned marriage altogether. The name does not come, as Du Cange supposes, from a certain Paterinus Romanus, who spread the heresy of the Cathari in Italy and Boenia; for then one would have expected Paterinici, but from paterinis ("collector of rags"), a low quarter of the city of Milan, where the followers of Arialdus were wont

PATMOS. PATRICK.

however, in the middle ages, regarded it as a constituent of courage (fortitudo). Protestant systems of ethics should properly honor it upon the basis of such passages as Rom. ii. 7, v. 3, viii. 25; Col. iii. 12; 2 Pet. i. 6; Heb. x. 35, xii. 1. As a fruit of Christian faith, patience is the persistence of the believer in a state of sanctification in spite of temptations. Born of Christian love, it supplements Christian hope (Rom. viii. 25). It gradually learns to bear all things, endure all things, hope all things, to wait contentedly for the coming of the Lord (Jam. v. 7). Its foundation is the Lord's faithfulness. Scriptural songs of patience are found in Ps. xiii., lix., lxix., etc.

PATMOS, a rocky and barren island of the Egean, twenty-five miles in circumference, and situated near the coast of Asia Minor, between Naxos and Samos. It was used as a place of banishment in the time of the emperors, and the apostle John wrote there his Revelation (Rev. i. 9). The cave is still shown, where, according to tradition, he had his visions: above it stands an altar, called Calvaria, built by Alexander Comnenus. The island is now called "Patmo" or "Patmos." See GÉRARD: Description de l'Ile de Patmos, Paris, 1850; TISCHENDORF: Reise ins Morgenland, Leipzig, 1845-46, 2 vols. (i., 257 sq.), and Commentaries on the Apocalypse.

PATTOUILLET, Louis, b. at Dijon, 1089; d. at Avignon, 1158. After the death of the Venerable Bède, he wrote, in Latin, a long history of the church of St. Peter at Rome, written at the request of St. Leo the Great. It contains a history of the bishoprics of Rome, from the age of the apostles to the time when Guérin published his "Histoire de France" (1756), which was put on the IndexOUT.

PATRIARCH, as a title in the Christian Church, was given in the fourth century as a mark of respect to bishops. For the proofs, see SICUR, Theog., 140 sq., and especially Gregory Nazianzus, Onat, 1725, which was put on the Index. La progr.is des Jansenistes, Quiloa, 1753; HINSCHIUS: System d. Kathol. Kirchenrechts, i. 538 sq.; HERFLE: Concilienpreis, i. ii.

PATRICK, St., Apostle of Ireland. The early references to St. Patrick are few. The first is made by Cummianus in A.D. 634; Adamnan, in the same century, also makes reference to the saint; and of later authorities there is no lack. Prosper of Aquitania, the Venerable Bede, Co-cumban, and others are silent on the subject: the remoteness of Ireland is sufficient to account for this.

Our chief sources of information are two writings, which seem undoubtedly to be the work of St. Patrick, the Confession, and the Epistle to Coroticus. The former is found in the Book of Armagh, an Irish manuscript of about the year 800; and both, in later but independent manuscripts. The Armagh copy professes to be transcribed from an original in the handwriting of the saint. The earliest lives extant quote from the Confession, showing that at an early date the work was considered genuine: so the external evidence is not without value. The internal evidence is so overwhelming that the two treaties are accepted practically universally as authentic.

The poem known as The Hymn or Lorium of St. Patrick has been considered genuine. It is placed in very ancient Irish, and its genuineness or not, is valuable as showing the simplicity of doctrine of the early Patrician Church.

The secondary sources of information are: (1) The Hymn of Secundinus. This dates probably about A.D. 500, gives no facts, and has only the same value as the Lorium. (2) The Hymn of Fiacc. This has the same value and was written later than A.D. 554. It gives only a few names, and already the miraculous and legendary has...
PATRICK. 1764

The young Patrick, being carried away with many others, was sold in Ireland, Tirechan tells us, to a chieftain called Milicho. There he was set to watch cattle. The teaching of his youth bore fruit. In six years, guided, as he believed, by a divine vision, he made his escape; and after long wanderings, and undergoing another captivity of sixty days, Patrick, now twenty-two years old, regained his friends. All is unknown until the mission to Ireland; and, if we assume his age at that period to have been forty-five, here is a gap unfilled of twenty-three years. His Latinity, his ignorance of the doctrine and practice of the Roman Church and of the Hieronian Vulgate, show that the time was not spent in study under learned doctors, like St. Germain of Auxerre or St. Martin of Tours. But we know nothing of his private life, which might explain all. We learn from the Confession, which is largely a justification of his life, that he formed the plan of preaching to the Irish himself, that he persisted in it in spite of the opposition of his friends, and that he attributed his mission to no pope, bishop, or church. Patrick was consecrated bishop, and sailed for Ireland with a few companions, trusted from the commencement. It is possible that comparative study of the older lives might extract some truth; but at present, as historical authorities, we can only reject them.

It is impossible to settle the dates of St. Patrick's life. Nicholson labors to show that his work belongs to the third, instead of to the fifth century, and proves it by the dates assigned to the lives of the Welsh saints, in support of this view. Killen dates his mission A.D. 431 or 432. Todd makes out as strong a case as we can perhaps hope to have for about A.D. 440. A passage in the Confession fixes his age at this period as forty-five, which would give A.D. 395 for his birth: this passage is, however, doubtful, not being found in the Armagh manuscript. The Annals of Connaught make the year of St. Patrick's birth 336; Ussher, Tillemont, and Petrie, 372; Lannigan, 397; the Bollandists, 378. The year 378 is equated by some. Tillemont gives 455; the Bollandists, 460; Nennius, 464; Lannigan, and many following him, 495; Ussher, Petrie, and Todd, 492 or 493. Lannigan's date (493), which is the favorite with recent writers, rests on the assumptions of the commission from Celestine and of a regular succession of bishops, such as prevailed at later date, at Armagh, of which St. Patrick was the first. There is nothing against the ordinary date of 492, and all tradition ascribes extreme old age to the saint.

From the Confession we learn that St. Patrick was carried away captive at sixteen from Bonavem of Taberniae in the "Britanise," and it is usually assumed that he was born there. His father, Calpurnius, was a deacon, and at the same time a Roman civil officer: his grandfather, Potitus, was a priest. The fact that a priest and deacon were married men does not seem to St. Patrick to have needed any explanation. Research has failed to identify Bonavem of Taberniae. The authorities are divided between some point on the coast of Gaul and Britain, being explicable. But it is quite possible that neither of these places is the right one.

The young Patrick, being carried away with many others, was sold in Ireland, Tirechan tells us, to a chieftain called Milicho. There he was set to watch cattle. The teaching of his youth bore fruit. In six years, guided, as he believed, by a divine vision, he made his escape; and after long wanderings, and undergoing another captivity of sixty days, Patrick, now twenty-two years old, regained his friends. All is unknown until the mission to Ireland; and, if we assume his age at that period to have been forty-five, here is a gap unfilled of twenty-three years. His Latinity, his ignorance of the doctrine and practice of the Roman Church and of the Hieronian Vulgate, show that the time was not spent in study under learned doctors, like St. Germain of Auxerre or St. Martin of Tours. But we know nothing of his private life, which might explain all. We learn from the Confession, which is largely a justification of his life, that he formed the plan of preaching to the Irish himself, that he persisted in it in spite of the opposition of his friends, and that he attributed his mission to no pope, bishop, or church. Patrick was consecrated bishop, and sailed for Ireland with a few companions, trusted from the commencement. It is possible that comparative study of the older lives might extract some truth; but at present, as historical authorities, we can only reject them.

It is impossible to settle the dates of St. Patrick's life. Nicholson labors to show that his work belongs to the third, instead of to the fifth century, and proves it by the dates assigned to the lives of the Welsh saints, in support of this view. Killen dates his mission A.D. 431 or 432. Todd makes out as strong a case as we can perhaps hope to have for about A.D. 440. A passage in the Confession fixes his age at this period as forty-five, which would give A.D. 395 for his birth: this passage is, however, doubtful, not being found in the Armagh manuscript. The Annals of Connaught make the year of St. Patrick's birth 336; Ussher, Tillemont, and Petrie, 372; Lannigan, 397; the Bollandists, 378. The year 378 is equated by some. Tillemont gives 455; the Bollandists, 460; Nennius, 464; Lannigan, and many following him, 495; Ussher, Petrie, and Todd, 492 or 493. Lannigan's date (493), which is the favorite with recent writers, rests on the assumptions of the commission from Celestine and of a regular succession of bishops, such as prevailed at later date, at Armagh, of which St. Patrick was the first. There is nothing against the ordinary date of 492, and all tradition ascribes extreme old age to the saint.

From the Confession we learn that St. Patrick was carried away captive at sixteen from Bonavem of Taberniae in the "Britanise," and it is usually assumed that he was born there. His father, Calpurnius, was a deacon, and at the same time a Roman civil officer: his grandfather, Potitus, was a priest. The fact that a priest and deacon were married men does not seem to St. Patrick to have needed any explanation. Research has failed to identify Bonavem of Taberniae. The authorities are divided between some point on the coast of Gaul and Britain, being explicable. But it is quite possible that neither of these places is the right one.

The young Patrick, being carried away with many others, was sold in Ireland, Tirechan tells us, to a chieftain called Milicho. There he was set to watch cattle. The teaching of his youth bore fruit. In six years, guided, as he believed, by a divine vision, he made his escape; and after long wanderings, and undergoing another captivity of sixty days, Patrick, now twenty-two years old, regained his friends. All is unknown until the mission to Ireland; and, if we assume his age at that period to have been forty-five, here is a gap unfilled of twenty-three years. His Latinity, his ignorance of the doctrine and practice of the Roman Church and of the Hieronian Vulgate, show that the time was not spent in study under learned doctors, like St. Germain of Auxerre or St. Martin of Tours. But we know nothing of his private life, which might explain all. We learn from the Confession, which is largely a justification of his life, that he formed the plan of preaching to the Irish himself, that he persisted in it in spite of the opposition of his friends, and that he attributed his mission to no pope, bishop, or church. Patrick was consecrated bishop, and sailed for Ireland with a few companions, trusted from the commencement. It is possible that comparative study of the older lives might extract some truth; but at present, as historical authorities, we can only reject them.

It is impossible to settle the dates of St. Patrick's life. Nicholson labors to show that his work belongs to the third, instead of to the fifth century, and proves it by the dates assigned to the lives of the Welsh saints, in support of this view. Killen dates his mission A.D. 431 or 432. Todd makes out as strong a case as we can perhaps hope to have for about A.D. 440. A passage in the Confession fixes his age at this period as forty-five, which would give A.D. 395 for his birth: this passage is, however, doubtful, not being found in the Armagh manuscript. The Annals of Connaught make the year of St. Patrick's birth 336; Ussher, Tillemont, and Petrie, 372; Lannigan, 397; the Bollandists, 378. The year 378 is equated by some. Tillemont gives 455; the Bollandists, 460; Nennius, 464; Lannigan, and many following him, 495; Ussher, Petrie, and Todd, 492 or 493. Lannigan's date (493), which is the favorite with recent writers, rests on the assumptions of the commission from Celestine and of a regular succession of bishops, such as prevailed at later date, at Armagh, of which St. Patrick was the first. There is nothing against the ordinary date of 492, and all tradition ascribes extreme old age to the saint.

From the Confession we learn that St. Patrick was carried away captive at sixteen from Bonavem of Taberniae in the "Britanise," and it is usually assumed that he was born there. His father, Calpurnius, was a deacon, and at the same time a Roman civil officer: his grandfather, Potitus, was a priest. The fact that a priest and deacon were married men does not seem to St. Patrick to have needed any explanation. Research has failed to identify Bonavem of Taberniae. The authorities are divided between some point on the coast of Gaul and Britain, being explicable. But it is quite possible that neither of these places is the right one.

1 His labors in this respect are criticised by Lord Macaulay, in his History of England.
PATRISTICS AND PATROLOGY. 1766

PATRISTICS AND PATROLOGY.

ecclesia, 1754). Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, and Gregory represent this dignity among the scholars of the Western Church; Athanasius, Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, and Chrysostom, of the Eastern Church. At a later time the number of doctors has been arbitrarily increased, and made to include Hilary, John of Damascus, Anselm, Thomas, Bonaventura, Alfonso da Liguori, etc. The Protestant Church includes under the designation Fathers those writers of the ancient church who made essential contributions to the development of Christian life and doctrine. The period to which the designation may be properly regarded to refer is extended to Gregory the Great (d. 604), or to John of Damascus (d. after 754).

2. Scope of Patristics.—According to the old definition, patristics included all kinds of facts about the personal life, writings, and doctrines of the Fathers individually. Three periods are to be distinguished in the patristic literature, that (1) of the early church in the apostolic and post-apostolic age, (2) the struggling church in the ante-Nicene age, and (3) the victorious church. Others distinguish only two periods,—(1) the ante-Nicene, and (2) the post-Nicene. The Fathers of each of the various periods are distinguished into Greek or Latin; or, according to the literary form and contents of their works, into dogmaticians, writers on ethics, exegetes, historians, etc.

3. History and Literature.—We distinguish two periods separated by the Protestant Reformation. (1) The first preliminary work for a history of Christian literature was done by the historians of the ancient church, and especially Eusebius. He gives many very valuable notices of Christian authors, and excerpts from their writings. The real father of patrology is Jerome, whose work on the scriptoria of the church (De viris illustribus s. de scriptoribus ecclesiasticis), as he distinctly says in a note to his friend Dexter, was designed to briefly describe all those, who, from the passion of Christ to the fourteenth year of Theodosius, had produced any thing worthy of preservation about the Holy Scriptures. Beginning with James and Peter, he gives in a hundred and thirty-five sections short biographies and notices of works. This production was much admired, translated into Greek by Sophronius, and continued by Gennadius of Massilia (who about 492 wrote notices of ninety-five or a hundred ecclesiastical authors, mostly of the fifth century), Isidore of Seville (d. 636), and Ildefonsus of Toledo (d. 667).

In the middle ages monks copied the writings of the Fathers, carefully preserved them in the convents, and made collections of excerpts; but there was no critical study of these writings. Collections of notices were, however, made, some of which, uncritical though they be, are invaluable. Here belong the collections of Photius (d. 890), especially his Bibliotheca, or Muniments, the so-called Neumenclature veteris, who continued or imitated Jerome's Catalogue; especially Honorius of Autun (d. 1120), who, beginning his work De luminaribus eccles., etc., with the apostles, carries it down to Anselm; Sigebert of Glamours (d. 1112); and Johann Trithemien (d. 1316) who begins with Clement of Rome, and concludes with the author himself, nine hundred and seventy writers being noticed.

(2) A new period in the history of patrology dates from the rise of Humanism and the Reformation. The immense strides in culture in the fifteenth century, the classical studies of the Humanists, the growing acquaintance with the Greek language in the West, the invention of printing, etc., all redounded to the interest of this science. Patristic writings were discovered, edited with notes, first those of Eusebius, then of Greek authors. Special mention in this connection is due to Erasmus, Beatus Rhenanus, Ecolampadius, and the learned booksellers Robert and Henry Stephens, Froben, Opiorin, and others. Editions appeared of Lactantius (1465), the Letters of Jerome (1468–70), Augustine's City of God (1470), Leo's Sermons, Cyprian's Letters, Origen, and Orig's. Cont. Celsum (1471). In the sixteenth century, Erasmus, in strict succession, issued editions of the works of Cyprian (1520), Hilary (1528), Jerome (1529), Ireneus (1529), Ambrose (1527), Augustine (1528), [Epiphanius, 1529], Chrysostom (1530), [Origen, 1561], Athanasius, and also Basil (1539).

The Reformers, while denying to the Fathers an equal authority with the Scriptures, got weapons for the struggle in which they were engaged from their writings. Luther was well read in them; although he passed an unfavorable judgment upon Jerome, Origen, and Chrysostom. Melanchthon urged very earnestly the study of the Fathers, collected their opinions about the Lord's Supper (Sententias patrum de cena domini, 1530), etc. The Wurttemberg theologian, Schopff, wrote a Academia J. Chr. brevis descriptio Patrum ac Doctorum ecclesiae (Tübingen, 1593); and Schultetus wrote the Medulla theolog Patrum (Amberg, Neustedt, and Heidelberg, 1598–1613, 4 vol.). Of the seventeenth century, deserve to be mentioned, Gerhard's posthumous work, Patrologia s. de privat. eccl. doctorum vita et lucraturam (Jena, 1653, 1673), Hulsenmann's Patrologia (Leipzig, 1670), Meefurer's Corona patrum (Giessen, 1670), Olearius' Abacos patrologus (Jena, 1673, new ed., Jena, 1711, under the title Bibli. sacr. eccl.). None of these works have any critical value. In the seventeenth century, the Roman-Catholic Church did far more in this department than the Protestant. Among the Italians, Baronius and Beljarmin deserve mention; the latter writing the liber de script. eccl. (The Writers of the Church, Rome, 1613, Paris, 1618), which was often republished, and supplemented by Labbe (1680) and Oudin (Paris, 1686). The Belgian theologian, Aubertus Miraus, published a Bibliotheca ecccl. and Auctar, de script. eccl. (Antwerp, 1636; reprinted A. Fabricius, Bibli. Eccles., 1718). The French Congregation of St. Maur did a work of imperishable value in this department, by publishing editions (known as the Benedictine) for list see Bkokdictione) of the Fathers superior in
PATRISTICS AND PATROLOGY. 1767

PATRONAGE.

curse, complete,—Series Lat., 221 vols., Series French, 1693 sqq., with the thorough, rich, patristic ex-
curse, complete,—Series Lat., 221 vols., Series

In England, Ussher (d. 1656) distinguished himself by his patristic investigations; as also Grabe (d. 1706), by his Speculum patrum and his editions of Justin and Irenaeus, Pearson (d. 1686), Henry Dodwell (d. 1711), William Cave (d. 1713), and Lardner (d. 1709), who exhibits an abundance of patristic erudition in his Credibility of the Gospel History. [For the works of these authors, see the special articles] Of the German works and authors of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the following Roman-Catholic works and authors deserve mention: Wilhelm, Patrolog. ad usu acad. (Freiburg, 1775), Schrann, Analy. fidei opp. ss. Patrum et script. eccl. (Augsburg, 1780-81), Thilo, Patrolog. ad usu acad. (Leipzig, 1840), Nearchus, Patrolog. (Mainz, 1858), Nieratsch (Mainz, 1881). Among the Protestant works, those of Fabricius deserve prominent mention as of special value; viz., his Bibli. eccles. (Hamburg, 1718), Bibli. greca (1705-28, 14 vols., new
ed. by Harlais, 1790 sqq.), Bibli. latina (1897, new ed., 1874 sqq.), and their continuation, Bibli. lat.
medicae, etc. (Hamburg, 1816 sqq.). We mention further, Itzig, Analyse des escrits de autorité, etc.
(Leipzig, 1771), Walch, Bibl. patrist. (Jena, 1737, 1775, 1800, new ed. by Danz, Jena, 1834), Schone-
mann, Bibli. . . Patrum latini. (Leipzig, 1792-94, 2 vols.), Thilo, Bibl. patr. dogmat. (Leipzig, 1854), and the treatises on patrology of Pestalozzi (Gottingen, 1811), Danz (Jena, 1830). For special editions of authors, see the special articles.

LIT.—In addition to the literature already given, see the Manuals of Church History, the Histories of Philosophy of Ritter and Uberwag
(Eng. trans., New York, 1872, 2 vols.); Eberkt: Gesch. d. christl.-lat. Lit., Leipzig, 1874-80, 2 vols. A comprehensive treatise on patro-logy, desideratissimum of all information referred to, is the most satisfactory manual on patristics.
The fragments of Fathers of the second and third centuries have been published by Routh: Reliquae Sacre, Oxford, 1845, 5 vols.
See also Gebhardt and Harnack: Texte und Untersuchungen zur Gesch. d. altchristl. Lit., Leipzig, 1882 sqq. For English translations of the ante-Nicene Fathers, see CLARE'S ANTE-NICENE Li-BRARY, ed. by Roberts and Donaldson, Edinburgh, 1887-71, 21 vols.; of both ante-Nicene and post-Nicene Fathers, see Library of the Fathers of the Holy Catholic Church, anterior to the Division of the East and West, translated by Members of the English Church, Oxford, 1839 sqq. (vol. 47, St.
Cyril of Alexandria against Nestorius, 1880); and of Augustine, edited by Dodis, Edinburgh, 1871-78, 12 vols. (supplements the translations already in the Oxford Library; cf. Lowndes, Manual, vol. iv., 1890). The most elaborate English treatise upon a limited field is DONALDSON: Critical History of Christian Literature and Doctrine, from the Death of the Apostles to See also SPINDEL: Die Theologie der apostolischen
Vater, Vienna, 1890. For a glance at the ante-Nicene Fathers, see the Early Christian Literature Primers, edited by Professor G. P. Fisher, New York, 1879 sqq. Good biographies of different Fathers have been published by the S. P. C. K., London. See separate arts. The great Dictionary of Christian Biography, by SMITH and WACE (London, 1880 sqq., 4 vols.), should always be consulted.

PATRONAGE (jus patronatus). In the fifth century the opinion became current, both in the East and the West, that it was proper to grant to the founder of a church or some other religious institution the right of appointing not only the manager of the property set aside for the purpose, but also the priest or other ecclesiastics to be maintained (Nov. Justin. 186, 131, c. 10 (c. 545), c. 1, C. XVI. qu. 5, and can. 10, Council of Orange, 441). This tendency was further strengthened by a peculiar feature of the social organization of the Germanic nations.
Among them the owner of the soil, the lord of the peasant-community, exercised full right of possession over anything on the glebe, and had perfect control over the temple or over the Christian church erected on the ground, appointing and dismissing the priest according to will (can. 7, 28, 33, Council of Orleans, 541).
This arrangement was continued during the Caro-lingian age, and the consecration of the building
had to influence one's election as the owner.
But, after that time, the church endeavored to impose such restrictions upon the owner
as to prevent him from any actions contrary to the ecclesiastical purpose. He was forbidden to cancel the dotation, to have co-proprietors, to appoint incapable persons, to dismiss an incumbent without the consent of the bishop, etc. It was not,
however, until the twelfth century that the pope,
more particularly Alexander III., succeeded in re-organizing the whole arrangement on a new and firmer basis. Maintaining that the ecclesiastical character of the foundation, and not the ownership of the founder, was the decisive feature in the legal position of the institution, he de-ned the proprietary character of the donation (Nov. Justin. 131, c. 10 (c. 545), c. 1, C. XVI. qu. 5, and can. 10, Council of Orange, 441). This arrangement was continued during the Caro-lingian age, and the consecration of the building
had to influence one's election as the owner.
But, after that time, the church endeavored to impose such restrictions upon the owner
as to prevent him from any actions contrary to the ecclesiastical purpose. He was forbidden to cancel the dotation, to have co-proprietors, to appoint incapable persons, to dismiss an incumbent without the consent of the bishop, etc. It was not,
however, until the twelfth century that the pope,
more particularly Alexander III., succeeded in
re-organizing the whole arrangement on a new and firmer basis. Maintaining that the ecclesiastical character of the foundation, and not the ownership of the founder, was the decisive feature in the legal position of the institution, he de-ned the proprietary character of the donation (Nov. Justin. 131, c. 10 (c. 545), c. 1, C. XVI. qu. 5, and can. 10, Council of Orange, 441). This arrangement was continued during the Caro-lingian age, and the consecration of the building
had to influence one's election as the owner.
But, after that time, the church endeavored to impose such restrictions upon the owner
as to prevent him from any actions contrary to the ecclesiastical purpose. He was forbidden to cancel the dotation, to have co-proprietors, to appoint incapable persons, to dismiss an incumbent without the consent of the bishop, etc. It was not,
however, until the twelfth century that the pope,
more particularly Alexander III., succeeded in
re-organizing the whole arrangement on a new and firmer basis. Maintaining that the ecclesiastical character of the foundation, and not the ownership of the founder, was the decisive feature in the legal position of the institution, he de-ned the proprietary character of the donation (Nov. Justin. 131, c. 10 (c. 545), c. 1, C. XVI. qu. 5, and can. 10, Council of Orange, 441). This arrangement was continued during the Caro-lingian age, and the consecration of the building
had to influence one's election as the owner.
But, after that time, the church endeavor-
ed to impose such restrictions upon the owner
as to prevent him from any actions contrary to the ecclesiastical purpose. He was forbidden to cancel the dotation, to have co-proprietors, to appoint
incapable persons, to dismiss an incumbent with-
in Norway the right of patronage was never established, as Christianity was introduced in the country, not by the voluntary adoption of the people, but by the forcible imposition of the kings. In Denmark it was completely abolished by the Constitution of 1660. In Prussia it was abolished during the revolution of 1848, but quietly re-established when the re-action came into power again in 1850. In England, where the greater part of the benefices are presentative, it has proved impossible to abolish patronage. As real patronage—that is, a patronage which belongs to the glebe, in contradistinction to personal patronage, which belongs to the person, and is extinguished with the family of the founder—has a market-value, and can be the object of buying and selling, its abolition would bring along with it a very difficult conflict with the established ideas of property; and in 1873 the Church Private Patronage Association was founded, for the purpose of maintaining, by every legal means, the immemorial rights of private patrons. In 1849 patronage was abolished in Scotland, but re-established in 1860. It was abolished in Ireland in 1860, a pecuniary compensation having been voted to the patrons, it was suddenly restored by Queen Anne in 1712, and the patrons did not pay back the compensation received in 1890. The feeling against it was steadily increasing, however, and in 1842 a motion for its entire abolition was carried in the General Assembly. But the practical result was only the so-called "Lord Aberdeen's Act," which, in rather vague expressions, gives a certain scope to objections from the side of the congregation. In the Roman-Catholic Church a patron saint is a saint who is chosen as a protector, it may be of a nation, a city, a village, a church, a class, or an individual. The earliest witness of this usage is Ambrose of Milan (386).]

PATTeson, John Coleridge, D.D., Bishop of Melanesia: b. in London, April 1, 1827; murdered at Santa Cruz, by the Melanesians, Sept. 22, 1871. He was the son of Sir John Patteson, an English judge, and studied at Eton, and afterwards at Oxford, where he was elected fellow of Merton College, 1850. After being some time curate at Alftington, Devonshire, he went out to New Zealand in 1855, to assist Bishop Selwyn in his missionary work among the South Sea Islands, and in 1861 was consecrated Bishop of Melanesia. Possessing great linguistic talent, he reduced to writing and grammar several languages which had only been spoken before. His work among the islanders was noble and self-sacrificing, and, to his piercing view of sickness he would watch and nurse the poor natives himself, and by love and kindly example lead them up to the thought of God, till he knew their speech sufficiently to instruct them correctly. The kidnapping of the islanders, to be sent to the plantations of Queensland and Fiji, was the chief hindrance to the work in which he was engaged; and the ill feeling engendered by this traffic, to which he was much opposed, may be said to have been the cause of his death; the natives mistaking, it is likely, the missionary ship in which he was cruising about among the islands of his dio- ces, for a kidnapper's craft. Accordingly, they opened fire, and he was killed.

PAUL THE APOSTLE AND HIS EPISTLES.

This article will consider the life of the apostle and the scope and contents of his writings.

Life.—The life of Paul falls into three periods: (1) The period before his conversion, (2) The period between his conversion and the Roman imprisonment, (3) The period beginning with the Roman imprisonment. The sources of Paul's life are the letters by his hand and the Acts of the Apostles.

1. The Period before his Conversion.—Paul was of pure Jewish descent (2 Cor. xi. 22; Phil. iii. 5); belonged to the theocratic part of the nation after the exile, being of the tribe of Benjamin, an ardent Pharisee (Acts xxii. 6); and was born at Tarsus in Cilicia (Acts ix. 11, etc.). The statement of Jerome (Car., 5; Ad Philon., 29), that the life of a Jew was abolished in the time of the Romans, when Tarsus became his abode, cannot be accepted, as no record exists of a Jewish war at the time of Paul's childhood (Josephus, B. J., iv. 2, 1). Paul inherited the dignity of Roman citizenship (Acts xxii. 18). How his ancestors or father had secured the title is unknown. (See Cellarius: De Pauli Rom. citiautae, Hal., 1706; Aretzten: De civ. Penn. Traj-ad., 1725; Eckemmns: De Rom. Ap. Pauli civ., 1746.) His Hebrew name in its hellenized form was Saulos (Σαούλ), in its Aramaic form, Saoul (סואל). His Roman citizenship explains his Roman name Paul, by which he is uniformly known by the writer of the Acts, after Paul's meeting with Sergius Paulus on the island of Cyprus (Acts xiii. 9). He did not get the name from his connection with Paulus, as the teacher would hardly be called after the pupil; nor from his insignificant stature (2 Cor. x. 10); nor did he assume it as an expression of humility (1 Cor. xv. 9), Paul meaning little. It was customary for Jews who were Roman citizens to have two names, a Hebrew and Latin (Acts xii. 23, xiii. 1); and the use of the Latin name Paul, from the apostle's visit to Cyprus, is to be explained by the fact that he began to employ it exclusively in his relations to extra-Jewish peoples. The theory, based upon Rom. xvi. 22, that Paul had three names, is untenable (Roloff, De tribus Ps. nominibus, Jen., 1731).

The accounts of Paul's youth are meagre. The date of his birth is unknown. It is not fair to conclude from 2 Cor. vii. 22 that he had a brother, nor does the name of Ruckert and Hausruth do; but he had at least one sister (Acts xxii. 16). Tarsus at that time was a very flourishing city, and, like Athens and Alexandria, a seat of schools and art (Strabo, xiv. 5, 13). If Paul belonged to the upper classes of society, as his Roman citizenship would seem to imply, he must have had access to these privileges of culture. But his character was formed under the strict Jewish discipline of his home and his training at Jerusalem. The time of his going to Jerusalem is not stated; but the statements that he was "brought up" there (Acts vii. 3), and that he was a "young man" (Acts vii. 58) at the suggested the idea that his sojourn there had led him to Damascus to persecute the Christian light, above the brightness of the noonday sun.

Explain the term "yoke-fellow." in Phil. iv. 3, of the vision in 1 Cor. xv. 5-8 we have a better understanding of what Paul meant by it. The date of Paul's conversion has repeatedly been derived from 2 Cor. xi. 32, 33 (comp. Gal. i. 17 sqq.; Acts ix. 18 sqq.), and, according to the best view, is put in 34.

2. From the Conversion to the Roman Imprisonment.—Paul's conversion opened up to him a world-wide mission. He enjoyed a valuable external preparation. He had no graces of person. The descriptions of the Acts Paul et Théodora and Nicephorus (H.E., II. 37), which Renan accepts, are to be put down as distorted fancies; but from the stoning of Stephen, we gather that he was insignificant in stature; and in 2 Cor. ii. 3, Gal. iv. 13, physical infirmities are mentioned. The "thorn in the flesh" (2 Cor. xii. 7), from which he prayed in vain to be delivered, was not a spiritual temptation (Luther), but either an ophthalmic infirmity [Huxley], or epilepsy [Holsten, Ewald, Haurrat, Lightfoot, Schaff]. For pictorial representations of Paul, see Schultze: D. Katakomben, Leipzig, 1882, pp. 149 sqq.; [Howson: Life of St. Paul, chap. vii.; Mrs. Jamieson: Legendary Art]. Paul had received ineffaceable impressions from the Greek world of culture, although he did not possess encyclopedic learning (Schramm: De stupenda eruditione Pauli, Herb., 1710), or exhaustive knowledge of philosophy (Zobel: De Paulo philosopho, Altd., 1731) or jurisprudence (Stryck: De jurispr. Pauli, Hal., 1095; Kirchmaier: De jurispr. Pauli, Vitt., 1730; March: Specimen jurispr. Pauli, Leipzig, 1780).

He cited Greek poets (Acts xvii. 8), but such sentences were inserted in the battle of arguments to justify us in attributing to the apostle large acquaintance with Greek literature. At Tarsus, Paul became thoroughly conversant with the Greek language. On his way to Damascus to persecute the Christians he had seen Christ in a bystander, in the bright noonday sun. Paul declares he had seen Christ (1 Cor. ix. 1); but this can hardly have been the historical account of the appearance of Christ, as he derives his apostolic dignity from the temporal preparation. He had no graces of person. The date of Paul's conversion has repeatedly been derived from 2 Cor. xi. 32, 33 (comp. Gal. i. 17 sqq.; Acts ix. 18 sqq.), and, according to the best view, is put in 34.

3. The Conversion.—Three times the event is narrated in the Acts (xxii. 3, 4, etc.). In the midst of this persecuting activity an event occurred which completely changed the attitude of the inquisitor Paul to Christianity. On his way to Damascus to persecute the Christians he had seen Christ in a bystander, in the bright noonday sun. Paul declares he had seen Christ (1 Cor. ix. 1); but this can hardly have been the historical account of the appearance of Christ, as he derives his apostolic dignity from the temporal preparation. He had no graces of person. The date of Paul's conversion has repeatedly been derived from 2 Cor. xi. 32, 33 (comp. Gal. i. 17 sqq.; Acts ix. 18 sqq.), and, according to the best view, is put in 34.

3. The Conversion.—Three times the event is narrated in the Acts (xxii. 3, 4, etc.). In the midst of this persecuting activity an event occurred which completely changed the attitude of the inquisitor Paul to Christianity. On his way to Damascus to persecute the Christians he had seen Christ in a bystander, in the bright noonday sun. Paul declares he had seen Christ (1 Cor. ix. 1); but this can hardly have been the historical account of the appearance of Christ, as he derives his apostolic dignity from the temporal preparation. He had no graces of person. The date of Paul's conversion has repeatedly been derived from 2 Cor. xi. 32, 33 (comp. Gal. i. 17 sqq.; Acts ix. 18 sqq.), and, according to the best view, is put in 34.

3. The Conversion.—Three times the event is narrated in the Acts (xxii. 3, 4, etc.). In the midst of this persecuting activity an event occurred which completely changed the attitude of the inquisitor Paul to Christianity. On his way to Damascus to persecute the Christians he had seen Christ in a bystander, in the bright noonday sun. Paul declares he had seen Christ (1 Cor. ix. 1); but this can hardly have been the historical account of the appearance of Christ, as he derives his apostolic dignity from the temporal preparation. He had no graces of person. The date of Paul's conversion has repeatedly been derived from 2 Cor. xi. 32, 33 (comp. Gal. i. 17 sqq.; Acts ix. 18 sqq.), and, according to the best view, is put in 34.

3. The Conversion.—Three times the event is narrated in the Acts (xxii. 3, 4, etc.). In the midst of this persecuting activity an event occurred which completely changed the attitude of the inquisitor Paul to Christianity. On his way to Damascus to persecute the Christians he had seen Christ in a bystander, in the bright noonday sun. Paul declares he had seen Christ (1 Cor. ix. 1); but this can hardly have been the historical account of the appearance of Christ, as he derives his apostolic dignity from the temporal preparation. He had no graces of person. The date of Paul's conversion has repeatedly been derived from 2 Cor. xi. 32, 33 (comp. Gal. i. 17 sqq.; Acts ix. 18 sqq.), and, according to the best view, is put in 34.

3. The Conversion.—Three times the event is narrated in the Acts (xxii. 3, 4, etc.). In the midst of this persecuting activity an event occurred which completely changed the attitude of the inquisitor Paul to Christianity. On his way to Damascus to persecute the Christians he had seen Christ in a bystander, in the bright noonday sun. Paul declares he had seen Christ (1 Cor. ix. 1); but this can hardly have been the historical account of the appearance of Christ, as he derives his apostolic dignity from the temporal preparation. He had no graces of person. The date of Paul's conversion has repeatedly been derived from 2 Cor. xi. 32, 33 (comp. Gal. i. 17 sqq.; Acts ix. 18 sqq.), and, according to the best view, is put in 34.
the Gentile churches. In company with Barnabas, he went up to Jerusalem with the collection of the Antiochene Christians (xiii. 30). Retiring to Antioch, and under the impulse of the Holy Spirit, and with the conscience of the church, he started out with Barnabas and Mark on his first missionary journey, the account of which is preserved in Acts xiii., xiv. The route was to the Island of Cyprus (where the soccer Bar- jesus was humbled, and the proconsul Sergius Paulus converted), to Perga in Pamphylia (whence Mark returned to Jerusalem), Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. At these places, Paul preached, first to the Jews, and then to the Gentiles; and, although he received harsh treatment, his preaching won converts. The journey was brought to a close by the return of the two missionaries to Antioch in Syria after an absence of probably two years (46-48).

After Paul had been for some time (Acts xiv. 28) in Antioch, extreme Jewish Christians from Jerusalem came, saying: "TheUltra-Christians of that age," Hillegenfeld came, according to ancient Galatia and should submit to circumcision (Acts xv. 1). The trouble which resulted in the Antiochene Church was the occasion for Paul and Barnabas to go up to Jerusalem, and discuss the question of liberty with the local church. An account of this council is given in Acts xv. 1 sqq. and Gal. ii. 1 sqq. The differences, real or apparent, cannot be entered into here. According to Zimmer (Galatenbrief u. Apostelgeschichte, Hildburghausen, 1881), "all the differences may be explained from the different aims of the two accounts." After Paul's return, Peter met him at Antioch. Paul rebuked Peter for demanding, in spite of his own example, the Gentile Christians to live as the Jews. Barnabas was likewise carried away into the same error; and perhaps it was differences growing out of this difficulty that led Paul to refuse the proposition of Barnabas (Acts xv. 36-39) to take Mark with them on a second missionary journey. Paul chose Silas as his companion.

The account of the second missionary journey is given in Acts xv. 40-xviii. 22. After visiting some of the churches in Syria, Cilicia, and Lycaonia, accompanied by Timothy, a disciple of Lystra (Acts xvi. 1 sqq.), he went in a westerly direction to Phrygia and Galatia (a province settled by Celtic tribes about 250 B.C.), where he met with a warm reception (Gal. iv. 14 sqq.). Travelling thence through Mysia, he came to Troas, where he received a vision of Paul, Peter, and Apphia. Paul met and was entertained by Aquila and Priscilla; and here he wrote the First, and, a few months later, the Second Epistles to the Thessaaulineans. From Corinth, he returned, by way of Ephesus, to Jerusalem, for the passover, and thence to Antioch (Acts xviii. 22).

After a brief sojourn in Antioch, Paul started on his third missionary journey (Acts xviii. 23-xxi. 15), this time without a companion, and, after preaching in a number of places, went in Ephesus, where he remained nearly three years. His labors were abundantly blessed, and a wide door was opened into Asia (1 Cor. xvi. 9). Here he wrote the Epistle to the Galatians, which bears witness that enemies had crossed his path in Galatia. — Judaizing teachers preaching another gospel than he had preached (Gal. i. 8 sqq.). To this sojourn in Ephesus is also to be attributed his First Epistle to the Corinthians, whom he and already visited a second time when he wrote 2 Cor. ii. i, xii. 21, xiii. 1 sqq. The letter was designed to counteract certain abuses of which he had received reports. Since his first visit, different parties had arisen in the church, acknowledging Paul, Peter, and Apollos as leaders. Paul turns their attention to Christ. About the time of writing this Epistle, Paul left Ephesus, and went, by way of Troas (2 Cor. ii. 12), to Macedonia, where he met Timothy (2 Cor. i. 1) and Titus (2 Cor. vii. 6 sqq.), both of whom came from Corinth. No doubt influenced by them, the apostle wrote from Macedonia (perhaps Philippi, as in the Peshito) the Second Epistle to the Corin-thians (2 Cor. i. 10). After a tour in Illyria and Bovia (Rom. xv. 23), he went back into Asia, probably spending most of his time in Corinth (Acts xx. 1). This period, without doubt, belongs the composition of the Epistle to the Romans, which mentions Phoebe, a deaconess in Cenchrea, the eastern seaport of Corinth (Rom. xvi. 1), and Gaius (xvi. 23), who can be no other than the Gaius of 1 Cor. i. 14. The collection for the Jerusalem Christians, mentioned in Rom. xvi. 25 sqq., is to be regarded as that Paul urged in 2 Cor. viii. ix. Paul's Epistle to the Romans was designed to prepare for his own visit to the city by contributing to the progress of the gospel (Rom. xvi. 4 sqq.). Influenced by Jewish plots to give up his original plan to return to Syria by sea (Acts xx.), he went by way of Philippi and Troas (xx. 9-10) to Miletus, where he bade goodbye to the elders of Ephesus x. 17, and, arriving there, by way of Caearea, in spite of the warnings of Agabus (xii. 10 sqq.), to Jerusalem.

Arrived in Jerusalem, Paul soon discovered a bitter hostility against himself, as an enemy of the law, on the part of legalistic Jewish Chr tians. In order to preserve peace, he gave a proof of his regard for the temple by submitting as a substitute to the Nazarite’s vow (Acts xx. 26). But his efforts were in vain. Fanatic Jews from Asia Minor excited a mob against him, which, but for the protection of Claudius Lysias, would have killed him (xxii. 1–21). His defence before the people, and subsequently before the Sanhedrin, was without effect. In order to elude a Jewish plot, he was carried by night to Caesarea, where he came under the jurisdiction of the procurator Felix, and remained his prisoner for two years, till the arrival of his successor, M. Porcius Festus. Another hearing was granted him (xxvi. 1–23); and he might have been released, but for the fact, that, earnestly desiring to see Rome (Acts xxvii. 11; Rom. xv. 24, 26), he had used his right as a Roman citizen to appeal to the emperor (Acts xxvi. 32).

Under the guard of Julius, he sailed from Caesarea, changed vessels at Myra, but, after a stormy passage, was shipwrecked off the coast of Malta (Boyns: Eloge arch. ad difficile Pauli uter. Hal., 1771; Walch: *Antiq. manesse in utin. Pauli rom. Jena, 1787; Antoine. naufragii in utin. Pauli, Jena, 1767; Lassen: Tentam. in eter Pauli, etc., Aarhus., 1821; J. Smith: The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 4th ed., London, 1880). Paul reached Rome by way of Syracuse and Rhegium. His arrival occurred in the spring of 61, Festus having become procurator in the summer of 60. The conversion is set by Wieseler in the year 40; Anger and Ewald, 38; Schott, Godet, [Alford, Schaff], etc., 37; [Howson, 36]; Meyer, [Ussher], 33; [Bengel, 31]. For a tabular view of the chronology of Paul's life, as fixed by various chronologists, see Lange's Com. on Acts, and Farrar, Life and Work of St. Paul, p. 629.

3. The Period beginning with the Roman Imprisonment. — Paul was cordially received by the Christians of Rome. He had been familiar with the condition of the local church, as the Epistle to the Romans proves (i. 8, ii. 17 sqq., iv. xvi. 3, 5, 7, 8, etc.). It had probably been founded at an early date, perhaps by Romulus, the first procurator of the first Pentecost (Acts ii. 10). Paul remained two years in Rome, guarded by a Pretorian soldier, yet dwelling in his own hired house (Acts. xxviii. 16, 30 sqq.). Four of his Epistles were written during this captivity. The Epistle to Philemon commends the slave Onesimus to the generous treatment of his master Philemon, from whom he had fled. The Epistle to the Ephesians is ecclesiical in its character, as is clear from the inscription (i. 1), the general statement of the truth, and the absence of greetings. Ephesus is mentioned, because it was a metropolis city. This Epistle is probably the same as the Epistle to the Laodiceans (Col. iv. 16; see Anger: Uebcr d. Ephes. Brief. Leipzig, 1838). The Epistle is addressed to the Colossians and Philippians likewise belong to this period. There are no reliable records of the length of Paul's life. Only of this are we sure, that the apostle suffered martyrdom under Nero. Clement of Rome (Ad Corinth. V.) indicates this. According to Pliny, the Epistle to the Romans is not by Paul (ib. 19; see Ewald, Erl. Oeugen., 1890). The Epistle to the Ephesians (Ad. Hær., III. 1), Peter and Paul were put to death at the same time; and Caius, Roman prebyter (Euseb., II. 25), states that their graves were sacredly kept. Others speak of the time of Paul's martyrdom and the place of his grave (Euseb., II. 25). A difference of opinion exists as to whether Paul suffered martyrdom at the close of the Roman imprisonment, with which the Acts closes, or whether that event occurred after a period of freedom, during which he preached the gospel in Spain. The theory of a second imprisonment, which is advocated by Berthold, Hug Credner, Neander, Bleek, von Hofmann, Lange, Godet, [Ussher, Howson, Farrar, Lightfoot, Schaff, Plumptre], and denied by De Wette, Baur, Hilgenfeld, Reuss, Hausrath, Wieseler, Otto, Thiersch. The theory is not excluded by any thing in the Acts. Paul was not kept a prisoner by the procurator because he was a Christian, but because he had appealed to Caesar. He himself hoped to be liberated (Phil. xxii; Phil. i. 25 sqq., ii. 24). It likewise has in its favor some ancient testimonies, as the statement of Clement of Rome, who speaks of Paul's going to the extremity of the west (στησι τη τησσε της δεσοις), returning, no doubt, to Spain. The Fragment says definitely that Paul journeyed from Rome (ab urbe) to Spain. The authenticity of the three Pastoral Epistles depends upon this assumption of a second imprisonment. They are addressed to two of Paul's companions in work (Timothy and Titus), are directed against the same heresy, and have the same peculiarities of style. Attempts have been made to find a place for the composition of these Epistles before the close of Paul's first imprisonment. Titus has been put before 1 Corinthians (Reuss, Otto), or between 1 and 2 Corinthians (Wieseler), 1 Timothy, between Galatians and 1 Corinthians (Planck, Schrader, Wieseler, Reuss); and 2 Timothy has been referred to the close of Paul's imprisonment (Böger, Thiersch), or the beginning (Otto, Reuss), or close of the Roman imprisonment (Wieseler). The contents of the letters preclude these dates; and, in our view, the genuineness of the three stands or falls with the theory of a second Roman imprisonment. Paul was released before July, 64; the date of the convocation of the first Pentecost. He then went by way of Crete (Tit. i. 5), Miletus (2 Tim. iv. 20), and Ephesus (1 Tim. i. 3), to Macedonia (1 Tim. i. 3), where he wrote 1 Timothy. Then returning by way of Troas (2 Tim. iv. 13), Corinth (2 Tim. iv. 20), and Nicopolis (Tit. iii. 12), he went to Spain, and was again imprisoned at Rome.

Scope and Contents of the Epistles. — The Epistles of Paul were, in the best sense of the word, tracts for the times (Gelegenheitsschriften), intimately connected with the writer's circumstances at the time of composition, and the needs of the correspondents. The investigations of Mangold, Weitzsacker, and others, have shown this to be true of the Epistle to the Romans. Side by side with letters full of messages of friendship (Philemon, Philippians) are letters with a decided polemical purpose, with strong words of rebuke (Galatians, Colossians), and others prevailingly didactic in aim, and dialectic in method (Romans and Ephesians). Of the lost letters of Paul—if there be such—not one can remain; the Latin letter to the Laodiceans (Fabricius) not being found in the Muratorian Fragment, but mentioned by Jerome (Cat., 5). The Latin correspondence, in six letters, between Paul and the philosopher Seneca, mentioned by Jerome (Cat., 22), is also spurious. Paul wrote in Greek, and not in Aramaic (Bolten, Berthold). His training and personality are plainly reflected in his Epistles. Paul was called to the ministry according to the letter to the Galatians (vi. 11), and perhaps Philoemen (19), Paul did not write his Epistles with his own hand (Rom. xvi. 22; 1 Cor. xvi. 21; Col. iv. 18; 2 Thess. iii. 17). [It is held by Farrar and others that this was due to his weak eyes.] The traces of rabbinic culture are everywhere patent. He employs Hebrew and Chaldee terms (abba, Rom. viii. 15, etc.; amen, Rom. xv. 33, etc.; matana, 1 Cor. xvi. 22; paska, 1 Cor. v. 7, etc.), Hebraistic combinations (respect of persons, πρωτοτοκίου, Rom. ii. 11, etc.), traces of rabbinic culture are everywhere patent, other that this was due to his weak eyes. The consummate art of the psalm of trusting love (1 Cor. xiii.), and the noble dithyramb of faith, in Rom. viii. 31 sqq., led Longinus to place Paul amongst the greatest Greek orators. Some of his expressions are peculiar to him, and invented to express something inexpressible; as ὑπερπροσευξίαν (Rom. v. 20; 2 Cor. vii. 4), and ὑπερπροσευξία (Eph. iii. 20; 1 Thess. iii. 10, etc.).

In considering the contents of the Pauline Epistles, or the Pauline theology, we will examine the features of the Pauline gospel in the letters written before the Roman imprisonment, in those written during the imprisonment, and in the Pastoral Epistles. In the letters written before the imprisonment, it is to be remembered that Paul constantly has in view the Judaizing teachers.

Paul starts with the idea of how a man shall be just with God. Human righteousness consists in complete submission to the will of God. The law is the norm, but righteousness of the law is proved by experience to be impossible to man (Rom. x. 3). God, therefore, in his grace, has opened a way of righteousness which comes by faith (Rom. iv. 18, 15. 6). The righteousness of the new covenant is contrasted with that of the old covenant; and no one was better fitted, by reason of experience, than Paul himself, to state and elaborate this contrast. He allows the heathen world to speak for itself, and shows how it had darkened its own understanding (1 Thess. iv. 13; 1 Cor. ii. 13; 1 Cor. ii. 19). The aggregate of those who believe constitute the church of God (1 Cor. x. 32), which is represented under the figures of a temple (1 Cor. iii. 16 sq.) and a body (1 Cor. x. 7). The Spirit of God dwells in it (2 Cor. vi. 18); but in its present condition it is not an ideal organization. It will be consummated after the final crisis (1 Thess. iv. 17; 2 Thess. ii. 1, etc.), which will be preceded by the culmination of apostasy in Antichrist (2 Thess. ii. 3, sqq.).

The Epistles of the imprisonment have been aptly called "the Christological Epistles." They emphasize, if possible, more strongly, the redemption of the world through Christ. He is equal with the Father (Phil. ii. 6), the Creator of the world (Col. i. 15 sq.), and possesses the fullness of the Deity (Col. ii. 9), but emptied himself, and humbled himself even to the death of the cross. The true Christian is a new man (Col. iii. 10), belongs to heaven (Phil. iii. 21), lives in the world, but is not of it (Col. iii. 3), and will be led by Christ to absolute purity (Eph. v. 27); so that through Christ, all separation from God is overcome.

The contents of the Pastoral Epistles are determined largely by the obstacles to the growth of the church to which the apostle directs himself. They emphasize that a sound faith depends upon sound doctrine, which is found in the word of God (1 Tim. vi. 3 sqq., etc.); such doctrine should be cordially received (1 Tim. i. 15, iii. 16, etc.); the church, which is the organization of God's chosen people, should be well organized, its affairs properly managed by chosen and godly officers (1 Tim. v. 19; 2 Tim. i. 6, etc.).—presbyters, deacons,
The core of the Christian life is described as piety (πious), godliness of heart. — an idea nowhere else found in the New Testament, except in the Acts and 2 Peter (1 Tim. ii. 2, iv. 7 sq.; 2 Tim. iii. 5; Tit. i. 1, etc.). Its principal fruit is self-control (apistos). The expression is used by Paul in the Pastoral Epistles. It is urged by Paul in the Pastoral Epistles. They, too, strongly urge, as the only ground of salvation, the grace of God in Christ, who was made manifest in the flesh (1 Tim. iii. 16), gave himself up as a ransom (1 Tim. ii. 6; Tit. ii. 14), and destroyed death (2 Tim. i. 10). Righteousness comes not by works (Tit. iii. 5), but by grace. The Pastoral Epistles do not, as has been asserted (Pfeiffer), represent the transition from Paulinism to Catholicism.

Commentaries. — Among the innumerable Commentaries upon St. Paul's Epistles, those by the following recent writers deserve to be mentioned. On all the Epistles. — Meyer (English trans.), De Wette, Lange (various authors, American edition), Whedon, Ellicott, Cowles; Bible (Speaker's) Commentary (various authors), Ellicott's New Testament Commentary (various authors), Schaff's Popular Commentary (various authors), Cambridge Bible for Schools (various authors). On Some of the Epistles. — On the Pastoral Epistles, urging the Pastoral Epistles, urging that a trinity tour (autumn). — Paul at Corinth (a year and a half). — Paul's departure from Ephesus (summer) to Macedonia; Second Epistle to the Corinthians; Paul's third sojourn in Arabia (the months) Ephesians to the Romans; Paul's fifth and last journey to Jerusalem (spring) where he is arrested, and sent to Caesarea; Paul's captivity at Caesarea; testimony before Felix, Festus, and Agrippa (the Gospel of Luke; the Acts commenced at Caesarea, and concluded at Rome); Paul's voyage to Rome in the spring (autumn); shipwreck at Malta; arrival at Rome (60, 61); Paul's first captivity at Rome; Epistles to the Colossians, Ephesians, Philippians, Philemon; Conflagration at Rome (July); Neroan persecution of the Christians; martyrdom of Paul (?); Hypothesis of a second Roman captivity, and preceding missionary journeys to the East, and possibly to Spain; First Epistle to Timothy; Titus (Hebrews); Second Timothy;
PAUL is the name of five popes.— Paul I. (757-767) was raised to the papal throne, April 26, 757, at the death of his brother, Pope Stephen II. He was supported by the Frankish party, and followed his elevation with a letter to Pippin, the Frankish king, asking him to confirm his election, and appealing “to his help and mighty protection.” The hostile attitude of Desiderius, king of the Lombards, soon made this aid necessary. Desiderius laid hands upon the duchies of Spoleto and Beneventum, which had placed themselves under the protection of the Frankish king and the Pope, and refused to deliver Bologna and other cities to the papal see. With the aid of France, Paul secured most of his demands, but practised a double-faced policy with Desiderius to do it. Paul lived in constant anxiety lest the Byzantine emperor should form an alliance with the Lombards or Pippin. He died June 28, 767. See his Life, in Liber pontif. (Muratori, Rer. Ital. iii., 172 sq.), his Letters, in Mionz. (vol. lxxix.) and Reg. Pontif.; BARONIUS: Annuales, the Histories of the city of Rome of Reumont and Gregorovius; Hefele: Concilien. gesch., vol. iii, pp. 420, 431 sqq. (2d ed.)— Paul II. (1404-71), whose civil name was Pietro Barbo, a nephew of Pope Eugenius IV., was b. in Venice, Feb. 26, 1418; d. July 26, 1471. After occupying various positions of ecclesiastical dignity, he was made cardinal-priest of St. Mark’s, Rome, by Nicholas V., and on Aug. 30, 1464, unanimously chosen pope. He was obliged to sign a document, pledging himself to do away with nepotism, continue the war against the Turks, call an oecumenical council, etc., but understood how to break the stipulations. Paul’s deep interest in the proposed council is vouched for by the excommunication of Henry VIII. of England, 1538 (projected in 1535), after he had declared against the council his family, and got into wars and controversies in the endeavor to promote the interests of his grandchildren and nephews. The refusal of Perugia to pay a salt tax which he levied, called forth from him in 1540 an interdict, and was punished with the army he sent out under his son. In 1540 he confirmed the order of Ignatius Loyola, which helped him to check the progress of Protestantism by violent measures. But he did not give up the idea of settling matters through a council, sent delegates to the disputation at Worms (1540, 1541), and Cardinal Contarini to the Colloquy of Regensburg. In consequence of a meeting between the Pope and the emperor at Lucca, the proposed council was appointed for May 1, 1541, at Trent. This delay afforded time for the consummation of other measures for checking the spread of heresy. Cardinal Carafa proposed that all heretics should be crushed from Rome as a centre; and Paul, acting upon the idea, issued the bull Liciab initio (July 21, 1542), and appointed a tribunal of inquisitors, with headquarters at Rome, whose office it was to extirpate
It was the aim of Charles V. to gain Paul for his policy. This he failed to do when he refused to pay Paul's price, — the transfer of Milan to his nephew Ottavio Farnese. Paul threw his influence on the side of Francis I. Hostilities again broke out, and the Council of Trent was suspended July 6, 1543. In the meantime the Inquisition was established at Rome. Paul's feelings against Charles V. were intensified by his concluding peace with France (Sept. 18, 1544) without consulting him, and granting some concessions to the Protestants at Spires (June 10, 1544); and he wrote to the emperor, comparing him to the worst persecutors of the Inquisition had done its work well in Italy. Nevertheless, Franciscan missions in Germany, and by the bull Licet ab initio, the preponderance of influence. Caraffa was endeavored to lay his hand upon Parma. Paul renewed the Inquisition (freeing the prisoners), broke his statue, scattered the examples in renouncing worldly possessions. In 1527 he was in Venice, and began the role of a violent enemy of the heretics, which he pursued for thirty years. In a letter to the Pope, he said, "Heretics are heretics, and must be treated as such," etc. Paul III. made him cardinal; and he soon took sides in the concilium against the party led by Contarini, which was in favor of mild and conciliatory measures towards the Protestants. After Contarini's failure to come to any agreement with the Protestants at the Regensburg Colloquy (1541), the radical party at Rome secured the preponderance of influence. Caraffa was energetic in spying out any indications of the Reformation in Italy, and expressed by the bull promulgated July 21, 1542, the Holy Office of the Inquisition was established at Rome. Caraffa threw all his force into it. His elevation to the papal throne, May 28, 1555, enabled him to carry out his plans fully, covering Italy with a network of Inquisition offices. He extended his efforts in opposition to the Reformation, to Spain, France, and England; and the order of the Jesuits was favored by him to such an extent, that he was hailed as its second founder (Orlandini, i. 15). His last dying words to the cardinals assembled at his death-bed were in commendation of the Inquisition. His death was hailed with jubilation by the people, who stormed the house of the Inquisition (freeing the prisoners), and dragged the busts through the streets. But the next day all Rome thronged to see the remains of the great Pope, who had impressed the stamp of his mind and will upon the future history of the Papacy. See notices of the early lives of Paul in Bromato: Storia di Paolo IV., Ravenna, 1748-53, 2 vols. Very important is the manuscript work of P. Caraffa, in the British Museum, etc. RANK : History of the Popes (an excellent description of his character.
and work). [See also the Histories of the Reformation of Fisher, etc.]

PAUL V. (1605-21), whose civil name was Camillus Borghese, was b. Sept. 17, 1605, at Rome; studied philosophy at Perugia, and law at Padua; d. Jan. 28, 1621, at Rome. He was made cardinal in 1598 by Clement VIII., in recognition of his service as papal legate in Spain, and afterwards inquisitor. He was elected pope, May 16, 1605. He endeavored to increase the authority of the papal throne, but, instead, weakened it. In the controversy between the Jesuits and Dominicans over the work of the Jesuit Molina (see art.), he decided in favor of the former. He placed Venice under an interdict (April 17, 1606) on account of the State's interference in ecclesiastical matters (imprisonment of two priests, etc.). Paolo Sarpi, as well as the Senator Quirini, opposed the assumptions of Rome in able writings; and all the orders, with the exception of the Jesuits, Theatines, and Capuchins, refused obedience. Services went on, the communion was dispensed, and the refractory orders banished. The Pope endeavored to excite Spain to a crusade against the refractory State. The measure miscarried, and the Pope was obliged to submit. The State refused to acknowledge the justice of the interdict, or to deliver up the prisoners; but Cardinal Joyeuse, who conducted the proceedings, made the sign of the cross secretly, with his hand concealed behind his baretta, in order to give out that the papal censures had been recalled, and dispensation granted in the usual way. This was the last papal interdict. Paul succeeded, too, in getting worsted in his relations with England when he forbade the Catholics to take the oath of allegiance, and with France after the death of Henry IV. The Jesuit Mariana's work, commending the murder of tyrannical kings, was burned by the public hangman, by order of the French Parliament; and Bellarmín's work, written in the same spirit, against the king of England, was burned by order of the English Parliament, forbidden to be sold in the land. Thus the work which Paul commissioned Suarez to write against the English king was publicly burned by order of James I. Paul was more successful in promoting art than in state matters. The great palace of Borghese built by his gifts. The city of Rome owed the repair of its water-works to his order, was himself converted, and, adopting the name Silvanus, one of Paul's disciples, and about the year 660 founded his first congregation at Rome. Cardinal Joyeuse, who conducted the education of Adelparga, daughter of the Lombard king Desiderius. He entered the clerical order, and became intimate with Charlemagne, at whose court he remained for some time. In 796 he returned to his former cloister at Monte Cassino, Italy. Paul was versatile as a writer. From one of his poems on John the Baptist, Guido of Arezzo got names for the notes:—

"Ur quenat laxis
Rez-onare fibris
Mi-ra gestorum
Fem-muli turans
Solvae pollutum
Labil rasatum
Sancte Joannes."

His historical works are a Life of Gregory the Great (a compilation from Beda, and Gregory's own writings), Gesta episcoporum Mettensis (a History of Rome down to the time of Justinian, written for Adelparga), and especially a History of the Lombards to Liudprand's death (744), which preserves many valuable popular traditions. German translations of the last work by Spruner (Hamb., 1838) and Abel (Berlin, 1849); Dahn: Des Paulus Diaconus Leben und Schriften, 1576; Wattenbach: Deutschland's Geschichtsquellen, 4th ed., Berlin, 1877.

PAUL, a Roman lady of the highest rank and of great wealth; married, and mother to four children; settled, after the death of her husband Toxotius, most of her property on her children, and followed Jerome to the Holy Land, where she founded a monastery, nunery, and hospital at Bethlehem, and spent her life in devotional practices. She died in 404, and is commemorated by the Roman-Catholic Church on Jan. 26. See Act. Sanct. Boll., Jan. 26.

PAULICINAS, a dualistic sect of the Orient, whose name was derived from their respect for the apostle Paul, rather than from their third leader, the Armenian Paul, as Photius and Petrus Siculus affirm.

HISTORY. The founder of the sect was a certain Constantine, who hailed from Mananalis, a dualistic community near Samosata. He studied the Gospels and Epistles, combined dualistic and Christian doctrines, and, upon the basis of the former, vigorously opposed the formalism of the church. Considering himself as called to restore the pure Christianity of Paul, he adopted the name Silvanus, one of Paul's disciples, and about the year 680 founded his first congregation at Kibossa in Armenia. Twenty-seven years afterwards he was stoned to death by order of the emperor. Simeon, the court official who executed the order, was himself converted, and, adopting the name Titus, became Constantine's successor, but was burned to death in 690 (the punishment pronounced upon the Manicheans). The adherents of the sect fled, with the Armenian Paul at their head, to Epiparis. He died in 715, leaving two sons, Gennadius (whom he had appointed his successor) and Theodore. The latter, giving out that he had received the Holy Ghost, rose up against Gennadius, but was unsuccessful. Gennadius was taken to Constantinople, appeared before Leo the Isaurian, was declared innocent of heresy, returned to Epiparis, but, fearing danger, went with his adherents to Mananalis. His death was conducted the education of Adelparga, daughter of the Lombard king Desiderius. He entered the clerical order, and became intimate with Charlemagne, at whose court he remained for some time. In 796 he returned to his former cloister at Monte Cassino, Italy. Paul was versatile as a writer. From one of his poems on John the Baptist, Guido of Arezzo got names for the notes:—
(in 745) was the occasion of a division in the sect; Zachariases and Joseph being the leaders of the two parties. The latter had the larger following, and was succeeded by Baanes, 775. The sect grew in spite of persecution, receiving additions from the opponents of image-worship. Baanes, an immoral man, was supplanted by Sergius, 801, who was repositories for thirty-five years, and was received into the number of the saints. His activity was the occasion of renewed persecutions on the part of Leo the Armenian. Obliged to flee, Sergius and his followers settled at Aigaunum, in that part of Armenia which was under the control of the Saracens. At the death of Sergius, the control of the sect was divided between several leaders. The empress, Theodora, instituted a new persecution, in which a hundred thousand Paulicians in Grecian Armenia are said to have lost their lives. Under Karbena, who fled with the residue of the sect, two cities, Amara and Tephrike, were built. His successor, Chrysoroas, devastated many cities; in 867 advanced as far as Ephesus, and took many priests prisoners. In 868 the emperor, Basil, despatched Petrus Siculus to arrange for their exchange. His sojourn of nine months among the Paulicians gave him an opportunity to collect many facts, which he preserved in his "History of the empty and in their religious freedom. This was the beginning of a revival of the sect; but it was true to the empire. Several thousand went in the army of Alexius Comnenus against the Norman, Robert Guiscard: but, deserting the emperor, many of them (1086) were thrown into prison. Efforts were again put forth for their conversion; and for the consent of the people to exchange the residue of the sect, two cities, Amara and Tephrike, were built. His successor, Chrysoroas, devastated many cities; in 867 advanced as far as Ephesus, and took many priests prisoners. In 868 the emperor, Basil, despatched Petrus Siculus to arrange for their exchange. His sojourn of nine months among the Paulicians gave him an opportunity to collect many facts, which he preserved in his "History of the empty and in their religious freedom. This was the beginning of a revival of the sect; but it was true to the empire. Several thousand went in the army of Alexius Comnenus against the Norman, Robert Guiscard: but, deserting the emperor, many of them (1086) were thrown into prison. Efforts were again put forth for their conversion; and for the consent of the people to exchange the residue of the sect, two cities, Amara and Tephrike, were built. His successor, Chrysoroas, devastated many cities; in 867 advanced as far as Ephesus, and took many priests prisoners. In 868 the emperor, Basil, despatched Petrus Siculus to arrange for their exchange. His sojourn of nine months among the Paulicians gave him an opportunity to collect many facts, which he preserved in his "History of the empty and in their religious freedom. This was the beginning of a revival of the sect; but it was true to the empire. Several thousand went in the army of Alexius Comnenus against the Norman, Robert Guiscard: but, deserting the emperor, many of them (1086) were thrown into prison. Efforts were again put forth for their conversion; and for the consent of the people to exchange the residue of the sect, two cities, Amara and Tephrike, were built. His successor, Chrysoroas, devastated many cities; in 867 advanced as far as Ephesus, and took many priests prisoners. In 868 the emperor, Basil, despatched Petrus Siculus to arrange for their exchange. His sojourn of nine months among the Paulicians gave him an opportunity to collect many facts, which he preserved in his "History of the empty and in their religious freedom. This was the beginning of a revival of the sect; but it was true to the empire. Several thousand went in the army of Alexius Comnenus against the Norman, Robert Guiscard: but, deserting the emperor, many of them (1086) were thrown into prison. Efforts were again put forth for their conversion; and for the consent of the people to exchange the residue of the sect, two cities, Amara and Tephrike, were built. His successor, Chrysoroas, devastated many cities; in 867 advanced as far as Ephesus, and took many priests prisoners. In 868 the emperor, Basil, despatched Petrus Siculus to arrange for their exchange. His sojourn of nine months among the Paulicians gave him an opportunity to collect many facts, which he preserved in his "History of the empty and in their religious freedom. This was the beginning of a revival of the sect; but it was true to the empire. Several thousand went in the army of Alexius Comnenus against the Norman, Robert Guiscard: but, deserting the emperor, many of them (1086) were thrown into prison. Efforts were again put forth for their conversion; and for the consent of the people to exchange the residue of the sect, two cities, Amara and Tephrike, were built. His successor, Chrysoroas, devastated many cities; in 867 advanced as far as Ephesus, and took many priests prisoners. In 868 the emperor, Basil, despatched Petrus Siculus to arrange for their exchange. His sojourn of nine months among the Paulicians gave him an opportunity to collect many facts, which he preserved in his "History of the empty and in their religious freedom. This was the beginning of a revival of the sect; but it was true to the empire. Several thousand went in the army of Alexius Comnenus against the Norman, Robert Guiscard: but, deserting the emperor, many of them (1086) were thrown into prison. Efforts were again put forth for their conversion; and for the consent of the people to exchange the residue of the sect, two cities, Amara and Tephrike, were built. His successor, Chrysoroas, devastated many cities; in 867 advanced as far as Ephesus, and took many priests prisoners. In 868 the emperor, Basil, despatched Petrus Siculus to arrange for their exchange. His sojourn of nine months among the Paulicians gave him an opportunity to collect many facts, which he preserved in his "History of the empty and in their religious freedom. This was the beginning of a revival of the sect; but it was true to the empire. Several thousand went in the army of Alexius Comnenus against the Norman, Robert Guiscard: but, deserting the emperor, many of them (1086) were thrown into prison. Efforts were again put forth for their conversion; and for the consent of the people to exchange the residue of the sect, two cities, Amara and Tephrike, were built. His successor, Chrysoroas, devastated many cities; in 867 advanced as far as Ephesus, and took many priests prisoners. In 868 the emperor, Basil, despatched Petrus Siculus to arrange for their exchange. His sojourn of nine months among the Paulicians gave him an opportunity to collect many facts, which he preserved in his "History of the empty and in their religious freedom. This was the beginning of a revival of the sect; but it was true to the empire. Several thousand went in the army of Alexius Comnenus against the Norman, Robert Guiscard: but, deserting the emperor, many of them (1086) were thrown into prison. Efforts were again put forth for their conversion; and for the consent of the people to exchange the residue of the sect, two cities, Amara and Tephrike, were built. His successor, Chrysoroas, devastated many cities; in 867 advanced as far as Ephesus, and took many priests prisoners. In 868 the emperor, Basil, despatched Petrus Siculus to arrange for their exchange. His sojourn of nine months among the Paulicians gave him an opportunity to collect many facts, which he preserved in his "History of the empty and in their religious freedom. This was the beginning of a revival of the sect; but it was true to the empire. Several thousand went in the army of Alexius Comnenus against the Norman, Robert Guiscard: but, deserting the emperor, many of them (1086) were thrown into prison. Efforts were again put forth for their conversion; and for the consent of the people to exchange the residue of the sect, two cities, Amara and Tephrike, were built. His successor, Chrysoroas, devastated many cities; in 867 advanced as far as Ephesus, and took many priests prisoners. In 868 the emperor, Basil, despatched Petrus Siculus to arrange for their exchange. His sojourn of nine months among the Paulicians gave him an opportunity to collect many facts, which he preserved in his "History of the empty and in their religious freedom. This was the beginning of a revival of the sect; but it was true to the empire. Several thousand went in the army of Alexius Comnenus against the Norman, Robert Guiscard: but, deserting the emperor, many of them (1086) were thrown into prison. Efforts were again put forth for their conversion; and for the consent of the people to exchange the residue of the sect, two cities, Amara and Tephrike, were built. His successor, Chrysoroas, devastated many cities; in 867 advanced as far as Ephesus, and took many priests prisoners. In 868 the emperor, Basil, despatched Petrus Siculus to arrange for their exchange. His sojourn of nine months among the Paulicians gave him an opportunity to collect many facts, which he preserved in his "History of the empty and in their religious freedom. This was the beginning of a revival of the sect; but it was true to the empire. Several thousand went in the army of Alexius Comnenus against the Norman, Robert Guiscard: but, deserting the emperor, many of them (1086) were thrown into prison. Efforts were again put forth for their conversion; and for the consent of the people to exchange the residue of the sect, two cities, Amara and Tephrike, were built. His successor, Chrysoroas, devastated many cities; in 867 advanced as far as Ephesus, and took many priests prisoners. In 868 the emperor, Basil, despatched Petrus Siculus to arrange for their exchange. His sojourn of nine months among the Paulicians gave him an opportunity to collect many facts, which he preserved in his "History of the empty and in their religious freedom. This was the beginning of a revival of the sect; but it was true to the empire. Several thousand went in the army of Alexius Comnenus against the Norman, Robert Guiscard: but, deserting the emperor, many of them (1086) were thrown into prison. Efforts were again put forth for their conversion; and for the consent of the people to exchange the residue of the sect, two cities, Amara and Tephrike, were built. His successor, Chrysoroas, devastated many cities; in 867 advanced as far as Ephesus, and took many priests prisoners. In 868 the emperor, Bas PAULINUS, Pontius Meropius Ancius, usually called Nolanus, from the town of which he was bishop; a devoted ecclesiastic; was b. at Bordeaux, 353; d. June 22, 431. He belonged to one of the noblest and richest families of the land, and inherited such vast wealth, that Augustine called him opulentissimus dives. His youth was spent in the pursuit of pleasure. In 379 he was consul, and might have occupied the most distinguished civil positions. But turning his thoughts seriously to religious concerns, and under the influence of Martin of Tours, and Ambrose, he determined upon a clerical life, and separated from his wife Therasia, and with her full consent. In 383 or 394 he was made presbyter at Barcelona, and relinquished his wealth, but, retaining a certain control over it, dispensed it in charities,—building hospitals for monks and the poor, in constructing extensive water-works for Nola, etc. Martin of Tours, Augustine, and Jerome applauded his self-denial and devotion. He lived humbly, and practised strict ascetic habits. In 394 Paulinus made Nola his home, and was subsequently (409, according to Tillemont) chosen its bishop. Of Paulinus' writings there are preserved fifty letters to friends (Augustine, etc.), and thirty poems. Some of his letters contain valuable notices of the church architecture of the day, and the celebration of the Agapae. (See Augusti: Beiträge zur christl. Kunstgeschichte, i. 147–170.)

The writings of Paulinus have been edited by Bostany and Le Duc (Anwerp, 1822), Le Brun des Marquettes (Paris, 1835, 2 vols.), Migne, Mai (Nicetae et Paulini scripta et Vaticanis cod., ed. Rome, 1827). For his life, see Chifflet : Paulinum illustratus, Dijon, 1662; Tillemont: Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclesiastique, i. 319; and thirty poems.

The writings of Paulinus have been edited by Bostany and Le Duc (Anwerp, 1822), Le Brun des Marquettes (Paris, 1835, 2 vols.), Migne, Mai (Nicetae et Paulini scripta et Vaticanis cod., ed. Rome, 1827). For his life, see Chifflet: Paulinum illustratus, Dijon, 1662; Tillemont: Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclesiastique, i. 319; and thirty poems.

The writings of Paulinus have been edited by Bostany and Le Duc (Anwerp, 1822), Le Brun des Marquettes (Paris, 1835, 2 vols.), Migne, Mai (Nicetae et Paulini scripta et Vaticanis cod., ed. Rome, 1827). For his life, see Chifflet: Paulinum illustratus, Dijon, 1662; Tillemont: Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclesiastique, i. 319; and thirty poems.

The writings of Paulinus have been edited by Bostany and Le Duc (Anwerp, 1822), Le Brun des Marquettes (Paris, 1835, 2 vols.), Migne, Mai (Nicetae et Paulini scripta et Vaticanis cod., ed. Rome, 1827). For his life, see Chifflet: Paulinum illustratus, Dijon, 1662; Tillemont: Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclesiastique, i. 319; and thirty poems.
the plainest statements foolish and insolent, for our very tolerant generation would declare that to be intoleration; but I would like, in all modesty, to ask these philological illuminators, not whether a single philologist for the last seventeen hundred years can be found who stumbled upon the idea of translating the words “Jesus walked upon the sea” by “near the sea, on the shore,” but whether, indeed, the three evangelists intended to teach that Jesus was able, like ourselves, to walk on terra firma. Wonderful statement! Oh, most marvellous of miracles!"

In 1803 Paulus left Jena, not much regretted, to accept the chair of theology at Würzburg. The effort was being made, of rendering this institution a distinguished centre of the new rationalism. Schelling and Hufeland had already been called: Voss and Schleiermacher were to be. A good deal was expected from Paulus, especially in his lectures on theological encyclopaedia; but disappointment came quickly. The Catholic students all left, and the number of the Protestants was decreasing. In 1807 Paulus went to Bamberg as school director, in 1808 to Nürnberg, and in 1810 to Ansbach, to fill a similar position. He longed to be again connected with a university; and in 1811 his wish was gratified by a call to the chair of church history at Heidelberg, where he remained during the rest of his life. At Heidelberg, Paulus was very active. His lectures spread over the whole field of Old and New Testament criticism. His publications, which were numerous, are enumerated by Reichlin-Meldegg. His most important work of this period was his Life of Jesus as a Basis for a History of Early Christianity (Leben Jesu als Grundlage einer reinen Geschichte des Urchristentums), Heidelberg, 1829, 2 vols. A learned supplement to it was offered in his Commentary on the Three First Gospels (Exegetisches Handbuch über d. drei ersten Evangelien), Heidelberg, 1830–33, 3 vols. Paulus acknowledged the miraculous feature of Christ’s moral character. The miraculous in Christ is Christ himself,—his person, his sayings, and actions,—to be explained by natural causes, some of the circumstances not being handed down. [F. W. Krummacher, in his Autobiography (Eng. trans., p. 187), gives the substance of an interesting conversation with Paulus at Heidelberg: “When, in the course of my observations, I expressed the idea that to him Christ seemed to be nothing more than a mere man, he sprang suddenly from his seat, and replied with great passion and glowing cheeks, ‘That is an unjust statement, which people are not weary of repeating against me! Believe me, that I never look up to the Holy One on the cross without sinking in deep devotion before him. No, he is not a mere man, as other men. He was an extraordinary phenomenon, altogether peculiar in his character, elevated high above the whole human race, to be admired; yea, to be adored!’”]

Hug, the Catholic theologian, who was much Paulus’ superior in thoroughness and intellectual judgment, sharply opposed his exegetical principles; and Strauss, in his Life of Jesus, gave the final and crushing blow. The man who had restlessly striven to illuminate others by rationalistic methods was now left far behind, and superseded by the rapidly advancing intellectual culture. But he continued to be active, and in his eightieth year proposed to found a new periodical, The Sophronizon. The philosophical method of thought had changed, but Paulus remained the same. He still clung to his “intellectual faith” (Denkgläuben). One of his colleagues trenchantly explained the meaning of this when he said such an intellectual believer is one who “thinks he believes, and believes he thinks. There was neither thought nor faith in this intellectual faith.” To the day of his death he remained the rationalist of 1790. We do not wish to underestimate the virtues which many admired in him; but we are not able to pronounce him an evangelical theologian who, in his dying, made the confession, “I am justified in the sight of God by my desire of that which is good.” Paulus wrote a sketch of his own life (1839); and full details will be found in the work of Reichlin-Meldegg, professor of philosophy at Heidelberg, to whose hands Paulus intrusted his manuscripts and many hundreds of letters: H. E. G. Paulus u. seine Zeit, Stuttgart, 1853, 2 vols. KAHNIS.

PAUPERES DE LUGDUNO. See WALDENSES.

PAVIA, The Council of, was appointed by Martin V. in the forty-fourth sitting of the Council of Constance, and in accordance with its decree (Oct. 9, 1417) that another council should be held in five years. As the time approached for its convention, many of the nations, including France and England, which had been represented at the council of 1415, were unwilling to be represented again. In 1421 the metropolitan of Paris wished to be present at the council, but was refused admission, and the council was opened October 23, 1423. At its close, only four German, six French, and several English prelates were present, and none from Spain or Italy. A pestilence suddenly breaking out, it was transferred (June 22, 1423) to Siena, without having accomplished any thing. See MANCI, XXVIII., 1081 sqq., 1057 sqq.; HEPFEL: Konzilengeschichte, vii. 575–592.

PAVILLON, Bishop of Alet; one of the four bishops who refused unqualified assent to the papal condemnation of the five articles from Janz’s writings: was b. at Paris, Nov. 17, 1597; d. Dec. 8, 1677. He deserves a place here as a perfect type of a Jansenist bishop. He was acquainted in early life with St. Vincent de Paul, under whose direction he engaged in charitable work at Paris, and secured some fame as a preacher. Appointed to the bishopric of Alet, in the Pyrenees, by Richelieu, he was very reluctant to accept. Following the council of Vincent de Paul, he was consecrated in 1639. The diocese of Alet had been wretchedly administered. Pavillon effected a complete re-organization and reformation of the habits of his clergy, for whose education he established a seminary at Alet. Among the other customs of the day, which he denounced, was the duel. Neither Richelieu, Mazarin, nor Louis XIV. liked the bishop; and the Capuchins and other religious corporations of his diocese opposed his administration. The opposition to him increased after his refusal to assent to the papal condemnation of Port Royal; but the purity of his life, and the esteem in which he was held, prevented his deposition. See REICHLIN: Gesch. von Port Royal, Gotha, 1844, 2 vols.

PAYSON, Edward, b. at Rindge, N.H., July 25, 1758; d. at Portland, Me., Oct. 22, 1827. He was a graduate of Harvard College; studied divinity with his father, Dr. Seth Payson; and was... settled over the Second Congregational Pariah in Portland near the close of 1807. Here he continued to labor with extraordinary zeal and success, until his death, at the age of forty-four. Dr. Payson was a highly gifted man intellectually and spiritually, and left his mark upon American piety. His Life, which had a very wide circulation both in this country and in Great Britain, endeared his name to the Christian world. He was of a melancholy temperament, and not without morbid tendencies, which mar somewhat the influence of his example; but, notwithstanding this drawback, the records of his religious experience and pastoral labors are so full of impassioned love to Christ and love for the souls of men, so inspired by seraphic devotion and all holy sympathies, so illuminated by light from heaven, that no one can easily read them without being stimulated to a better life. His fine natural traits— sportive humor, ready mother-wit, facetious pleasantry, and keen sense of the ridiculous— rendered him a delightful companion, and the centre of attraction alike in his home and in society. Just before his death he dictated a letter to his sister, which is one of the gems of religious literature. Here are the opening sentences:—

"Were I to adopt the figurative language of Bunyan, I might date this letter from the land of Beulah, of which I have been for some weeks a happy inhabitant. The Celestial City is full in my view. Its glorious beam upon me, its breezes fan me, its odors waft to me, its sounds strike upon my ear, and its spirit is breathed into my heart. Nothing separates me from it but the river of death, which now appears but as an insignificant rill, that may be crossed at a single step, whenever God shall give permission. The Sun of righteousness has been gradually drawing nearer and nearer, appearing larger and brighter as he approached, and now the steps of the heavens, pouring forth a flood of glory, in which I seem to float like an insect in the beams of the sun, exulting, yet almost trembling, while I gaze on this excessive brightness."

LIT.—The Complete Works of Edward Payson in 3 vols. 8vo, Portland, 1840. This edition contains— The Life of Dr. Payson, first published in 1829; Payson's Select Thoughts, edited by his eldest daughter, Mrs. Hopkins; and his Sermons. O. L. PRETTS.

PAZMÁNY, Peter, the most distinguished Catholic prelate of Hungary; was b. Oct. 4, 1570, at Grosswardein; d. at Presburg, March 19, 1637. His parents, who were Calvinists, sent him to the Jesuit college at Kolozsvar. At the age of seventeen he entered the order of the Jesuits, and was sent to Rome to complete his education. Returning in 1597, he became professor of philosophy at Graz.

As a Writer.—In the sixteenth century the press and the schools in Hungary were almost exclusively in the hands of the Protestants: Pazmány completely reversed the state of affairs. In two writings (1603, 1605) he attacked the doctrines of Luther and Calvin. Both aroused a universal interest. These he followed up with a succession of brilliant controversial works against Protestantism. The most important was the Isteni igazságra vezető Kniaz ("Guide to the Divine Truth.") Pozsony, 1613, 3d ed., 1637)—a work in which the doctrines of Catholicism were set forth in the style of Bellarmin. His volume of sermons (Prebúkdszik, Pozsony, 1830) is used to this day in Hungary. Pazmány was a master of the Magyar language, and by his style won for himself the title of the "Hungarian Cicero."

As a Politician.—At the death of the primate Forgacs, the author of the Kalauz was made archbishop. From the moment of his elevation, he made it his object to confirm the Hapsburg dynasty in power; and he succeeded in gaining a complete victory for Catholicism in the kingdom. Pazmány was the Hungarian Richelieu. He succeeded in making converts of many of the nobles, secured the election of Ferdinand II. to the throne, in spite of the herculean efforts of the Protestant nobles at the Parliament. In 1629 he was made cardinal.

As an Ecclesiastic.—At the appearance of Pazmány the Catholic Church was much demoralized in Hungary, both intellectually and financially. The clergy were dissolute. He had to build up from the foundation. His first care was to provide the church with well-trained ecclesiastics. In 1623 he founded the seminary called the "Pazmanum," at Vienna, which is still in a flourishing condition. Theological and other schools were established in many places, and richly endowed. The Protestant clergy were driven from their parishes, and their goods confiscated. The Jesuits were everywhere in power. That Europe possesses one Protestant nation less than she has is due to the zeal and ability of Pazmány. See FRANKL: Pazmany Petés és kora (P. Pazmany and his Times), Pest, 1868-72, 3 vols.; KAUKOFFER: P. Pazmany, Cardinal, Vienna, 1856. FRANZ BALOGH.

PEABODY, George, an illustrious philanthropist, descended from New-England Puritans, was b. in the part of Danvers, Mass., which now bears the name of Peabody, Feb. 18, 1795; and d. in London, Nov. 4, 1869. He was employed as a boy in a country store; but he soon broke away from its limitations, and, before he became of age, had engaged in business at Georgetown, D.C., and in 1815 at Baltimore, in a commercial house which soon established branches at Philadelphia and New York. He visited England for the first time in 1827, and was of much service in protecting the financial interests of the State of Maryland. He made his permanent home in London in 1843. As his fortune increased, he cherished the purpose of devoting a large part of it to the good of his fellow-men. His generosity first became conspicuous when he gave a large sum to enable exhibitors from the United States to make a suitable display in the Universal Exhibition of 1851; then he made a liberal contribution toward the expense of the Grinnell expedition, which went in search of the Arctic explorer, Sir John Franklin; and in 1832, when the centennial anniversary of the settlement of his native place was commemorated, he sent to the committee a letter, offering as a sentiment this maxim, "Education, a debt due from the present to succeeding generations," and giving a generous foundation for a local library. Next came his proposal to establish in Baltimore, where he had long resided, an institute for the encouragement of literature and the fine arts. This was followed, in 1863, by his gift to the poor of London, which has been employed in building good dwellings to be rented at low rates to moral, industrious, and needy persons. This was followed, in 1866, by a noble endowment for the promotion of education in the Southern States of this Union.

The magnitude of these three last-mentioned endowments eclipses several other gifts, which, taken by themselves, would have made his name distinguished. He established a museum of archeology at Harvard, of natural history at Yale, and endowed an academy of sciences at Salem. He founded a second library in his native town, at North Danvers; built a church at Georgetown, Mass., as a memorial of his mother; and gave liberal sums to Kenyon College (Ohio), Washington and Lee University (Virginia), Phillips Academy (Andover), and to the Maryland and Massachusetts historical societies. He also founded a library in Georgetown, D.C.

He received during his lifetime innumerable tokens of the gratitude of those whose appreciation he valued. The queen, it is said, offered him a baronetcy, and, when it was declined, presented him with her portrait; citizens of London caused a statue by William W. Story to be placed in his native town, and the Exchange, Oxford conferred on him the honorary degree of J.C.D.; while his countrymen, by large assemblies in the places where he had lived, and by other innumerable tokens, manifested their admiration and respect; Harvard conferred on him the degree of L.L.D., and Congress caused a gold medal to be struck in his honor.

Deeds George Peabody was as sagacious as he was generous. He gave in his lifetime for worthy objects, and he helped them on with a nice sense of their proportionate value. He gave for purposes in which he was personally interested, and which others had neglected, yet by methods which were likely to incite and call out the co-operation of others. His deeds of trust were prepared with remarkable skill, so as to secure in successive generations excellent managers, and so as to indicate clearly the main purpose of each foundation without fettering it by too many trivial regulations. His endowments are free from narrow sectarian or sectional limitations, but are for the purpose of promoting education in the institutions for which they were prepared, for the benefit of the poor in England. His trustees were selected with great discrimination. Consequently all his gifts have been well administered, and most of them are of increasing value. They have also suggested other benefactions. It is certain, for example, that the bequest of Johns Hopkins for a university in Baltimore was quickened by the example of his foundation plan; and the John F. Slater Fund, for the education of freedmen, was indirectly due to the success of the Peabody Fund. His interest in every place where he had resided — Danvers, Thetford, Georgetown, Baltimore, and London — was shown by some endowment.

Mr. Peabody was never married. He was hospitable and patriotic, and during his residence in London was most useful in promoting a good understanding between England and the United States. His habits to the close of life were careful and thrifty; his demeanor was dignified, simple, and affable; he took great pleasure in his benefactions. When he died, his body, after funeral services in Westminster Abbey, was brought to his native land in a British man-of-war, and buried in his native town. The eulogies by Hon. R. C. Winthrop (at the funeral) and by Hon. S. Teackle Wallis in Baltimore are among the best tributes to his memory.

Mr. Wallis closes his address with these words: "Peabody has shown how the rich may keep above their riches by clinging to the treasure of their souls."

It is impossible to give a complete list of his benefactions, but those which are of the most general interest are indicated in the following list:

- Establishment of a trust for the London poor by a gift which has increased (1862) by investments to the sum of $4,000,000.
- Establishment of a Southern educational fund (besides, in Mississippi bonds, $3,000,000) for $2,000,000.
- Foundation of the Peabody Institute, Baltimore (including $1,000,000 in cash, $300,000 in Tennessee bonds, and $100,000 in Virgina bonds), total valued at $1,400,000.
- Repeated gifts for libraries in Danvers and Peabody, which amounted to $250,000.
- Peabody Museum of Archaeology, Cambridge, Mass., $150,000.
- Peabody Museum of Natural History, New Haven, Conn., $150,000.
- Peabody Academy of Science, Salem, Mass., $140,000.
- For a church at Columbia, Maryland, $100,000.
- Kenyon College endowment, $20,000.
- Phillips Academy endowment, $20,000.
- Maryland Historical Society, $30,000.
- Massachusetts Historical Society, $20,000.
- Newburyport, Mass., for a library, $15,000.
- United-States department in the World's Fair, $15,000.
- Georgetown (D.C.) Public Library, $15,000.
- Grinnell expedition to the Arctic Ocean, $10,000.
- United States Sanitary Commission, $10,000.
- Peabody Library, Thetford, Vt., $9,000.
- Washington and Lee University, $5,000.

Most of the institutions which bear the name of Peabody publish annual reports giving full particulars in respect to their operations. The proceedings of the trustees of the educational fund fill two octavo volumes of several hundred pages each.

D. C. GILMAN.

PEABODY, William Bourne Oliver, D.D., b. at Exeter, N.H., July 8, 1799; d. at Springfield, Mass., May 28, 1847; graduated at Harvard, 1817; studied divinity at Cambridge; and was from October, 1829, Unitarian pastor at Springfield.

"A man of rare accomplishments and consummate virtue," he was one of the most distinguished ornaments of his denomination. He wrote much for the North American Review, Christian Examiner, and Sparks's American Biography, and prepared for the Massachusetts Zoological Survey a Report on the Birds of the Commonwealth, 1839.

He was familiar with landscape-gardening, and gave some lectures on scientific topics. His Sermons, with a memoir by his twin-brother, appeared, 1849, and his Literary Remains, edited by his son, 1850. He published in 1839 a Lecture in Verse, with ten lyrics on the seasons, etc., among them, Behold the Western Evening Light, and in 1825 The Springfield Collection of Hymns.

F. M. BIRD.

PEACE, Kiss of. See KISS OF PEACE.

PEACE OFFERING. See OFFERINGS, p. 1888.

PEARSON, Eliphalet, LL.D., b. in Byfield, a parish in Newbury, Mass., May 19, 1759; d. at Greenland, N.H., Sept. 12, 1826. He entered Harvard College in 1779, and was graduated in 1783.

Soon after graduation he was called to teach a grammar-school at Andover, Mass., the home of 1 Owing to the loss, on the Arctic, of certain bonds, the recovery of which is still in litigation, the amount of this donation cannot be exactly stated.
his friend Samuel Phillips, afterwards lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts. In 1775 Gov. Phillips was commissioned by the General Court to manufacture gunpowder for the Revolutionary army. In this enterprise he relied very much on the scientific attainments of Pearson. He relied on the same while he laid the foundation of Phillips Academy at Andover. Pearson became the first principal of the academy, and remained in office from 1778 to 1786. He was one of the twelve original trustees, and was the first president of the board who did not belong to the Phillips family.

In 1786 he was called to the professorship of the Hebrew and Oriental languages at Harvard College,—an office for which he was well qualified. He delivered to the students a valuable course of lectures on language. He was eminently successful as a teacher of rhetoric. Occasionally he spent the entire night in correcting the compositor's work; and he was the first president of the board forty-eight years. He continued a member of the board, and was a director in the Massachusetts Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, and was the most conspicuous man in forming the American Education Society. His enterprising spirit made him a pioneer in many great and good works.

EDWARDS A. PARK.

PEARSON, John, b. at Snoring, Feb. 12, 1612; d. at Chester, July 16, 1686. He was educated at Eton, whence he proceeded to King's College, Cambridge, to be there chosen as fellow. He became prebendary of Sarum, 1629; chaplain to Lord-Keeper Finch, and incumbent of Torington, 1640; minister of St. Clement's, Eastcheap, London, 1657; rector of St. Christopher's, London, prebendary of Ely, archdeacon of Surrey, and master of Jesus College, Cambridge, 1682; and bishop of Chester, 1672. This rapid promotion is accounted for when we find Burnet pronouncing him "in all respects the greatest divine of the age." His reputation stood exceedingly high in his own day, and it has retained a lofty position in the Church of England ever since; and, if the eulogium from Burnet just quoted be somewhat exaggerated, no one can fairly dissent from the words which follow, in which the historian of his own time speaks of Pearson as "a man of great learning, strong reason, and of a clear judgment."

His great work is the Exposition of the Creed (1659), long a text-book with Church-of-England clergymen; and it is praised, not only by the general run of Anglican theologians, but by such men as Dr. Johnson, Dean Milman, and Henry Hallam. Pearson was by no means a high-flown Anglo-Catholic, but a cautious, moderate thinker, citing the Fathers in support of his positions, but nowhere exalting patristicauthority. He must have been moderate in his ecclesiastical opinions, or he would not have retained his lectureship at St. Clement's, Eastcheap, where during the Commonwealth the theological lectures which formed the basis of his distinguished treatise. The passages in his Exposition of the Creed with regard to the church would not have satisfied Thorndike or Heylin, or even Bishop Bull. He uses strong expressions respecting the atonement, speaking of it as "the punishment which Christ, who was our surety, endured," and as "a full satisfaction to the will and justice of God," and he defines faith as a "spiritual act, and consequently immanent and internal, and known to no man but him that believeth." His perspicuity of style and directness of reasoning are strong recommendations; and his orderly arrangement and compact manner of expression render him very helpful to divinity students.

Next to the Exposition in point of fame is Pearson's Vindiciae Epistolorum S Ignatii (1672). Bentley and Boyle highly esteemed this erudite work: so did Dr. Lardner, who pronounced it "unanswerable." It was very valuable at the time, and so it is still, in a measure; but much new light has been thrown on the Ignatian Epistles since Pearson's day. Pearson wrote a book entitled Annales Paulini; and the posthumous publication of it has been translated by J. M. Williams, Cambridge, 1825. Minor Theological Works by the same divine were collected and edited by Churton, with a Life and Correspondence, 1824, 2, but in 1812 he was licensed to preach by the Baptists, and subsequently was one of the pioneer preachers of this denomination. After regular pastoral labor for five years, in 1817 he was appointed by the Baptist Triennial Convention a missionary to Missouri Territory. In 1820 the mission was closed, but he continued his itinerating work there and in Illinois. In 1829 he was appointed to the same work by the Baptist Missionary Society. He was also agent (1823) of the American Bible Society, and active in the organization of Sunday-schools. By reason of his advocacy of the plan in 1826, he deserves the epithet of "father" of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, which was organized 1822. In 1832 he established the Rock Spring Seminary (now Shurtleff College); in April, 1829, The Pioneer, the first Baptist, perhaps the first religious, newspaper west of the Alleghanies. In 1835 he projected the American Baptist Historical Society. His life was that of a pioneer, and fruitful in good works. He wrote The Emigrant's Guide, Boston, 1831 (it induced large emigration); Gazetteer of Illinois, Jacksonville, Ill., 1834; Life of Daniel Boone, in Sparks's American Biography, Boston, 2d ser., xiii.; Life of Father Clark, N. Y., 1865. See R. Bancroft: Forty Years of Pioneer Life: Memoir of John Mason Peck, D. D., edited from his Journals and Correspondence, Phila., 1864.

PECK, Jesse Truesdell, D. D., Methodist-Episcopal bishop; b. at Middlefield, N. Y., April 4, 1811; d. at Scranton, Penn., May 20, 1876. He began his ministry (1816) in the Genesee Conference, and experienced those trials which accompany and characterize pioneer work. In 1824 he was appointed presiding elder of the Susquehanna district; in 1835 elected principal of the Oneida Conference Seminary; in 1839 resigned; from 1840 to 1848 edited The Methodist Quarterly Review, from 1848 to 1852, The Christian Advocate and Journal: re-entered the pastorate; from 1852 to 1857 was presiding elder of the Lackawanna district; in 1858 elected presiding elder of the Wyoming district; was superannuated in 1873. He enjoyed the confidence of his denomination to a high degree. In 1846 he was appointed by the New-York Central Conference a delegate to the General Convention of the Evangelical Alliance in London. He was a delegate to every General Conference from 1824, and was an authority in questions of polity. He was also an effective speaker and eloquent preacher. Among his numerous publications may be mentioned, Scripture Doctrine of Christian Perfection, New York, 1842, revised ed., 1848; Rule of Faith: Appeal from Tradition, 1844; Wyoming; Its History, Stirring Incidents, and Romantic Adventures, 1855; Early History of Wyoming, N. Y., 1864; Centralization of Sunday-schools. By reason of his advocacy of the plan in 1826, he deserves the epithet of "father" of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, which was organized 1822. In 1832 he established the Rock Spring Seminary (now Shurtleff College); in April, 1829, The Pioneer, the first Baptist, perhaps the first religious, newspaper west of the Alleghanies. In 1835 he projected the American Baptist Historical Society. His life was that of a pioneer, and fruitful in good works. He wrote The Emigrant's Guide, Boston, 1831 (it induced large emigration); Gazetteer of Illinois, Jacksonville, Ill., 1834; Life of Daniel Boone, in Sparks's American Biography, Boston, 2d ser., xiii.; Life of Father Clark, N. Y., 1865. See R. Bancroft: Forty Years of Pioneer Life: Memoir of John Mason Peck, D. D., edited from his Journals and Correspondence, Phila., 1864.

PECK, John Mason, D. D., Baptist; b. in Litchfield, Conn., Oct. 31, 1789; d. at Rock Spring, Ill., March 14, 1857. With early poverty, and no more than common-school advantages, he succeeded in acquiring considerable information, and in exerting a wide influence. His parents were founders of Syracuse University, 1870, and the first president of its board of trustees. He wrote The Central Idea of Christianity (New York), The True Woman (New York, 1857), History of the Great Republic (New York, 1868).
Hence the constant and strong emphasis which all the Greek Fathers, from Origen to Chrysostom, lay on human freedom: hence the shyness they evince towards any thing which might make sin appear as a natural power. However grave the consequences of the fall may be,—the overpowering sensuality and death in its track; the weakness of the will, always open to the temptations of the world, the Devil, and the demons; the dulness and the errors of the intellect,—nevertheless, actual sin is always man's own deed, issuing from that point in him which cannot be obliterated without destroying him as a moral being,—the freedom of his will. The general state of sinfulness is recognized; but at the same time it is now and then hinted — as, for instance, by Gregory of Nyssa — that there might exist human beings who were sinless. Quite otherwise in the Western Church. Tertullian, and, after him, Hilary and Ambrose, recognized in human nature a voluntary animal error, the effect of the fall of Adam, and since that time propagated in the race by generation; and they consequently define grace, not simply as an objective means of salvation, but also as the subjective cause of repentance and conversion. But it was not until the contest broke out between the British monk Pelagius and Augustine (the head of the African Church) that the development of these anthropological doctrines entered its decisive phase.

Of the earlier life of Pelagius nothing is known; but legend acknowledges the close correlation between him and his great antitype Augustine by assuming that they were born on the same day and in the same year. At what time he came to Rome from Britain cannot be ascertained; but his stay there must have been of some duration, since he gave an almost complete literary exposition of those views which soon were to cause such vehement opposition before (in 411) he left for Africa. He was thoroughly conversant with the Greek language and theology, and shows a certain affinity to the doctrinal tendencies of the Eastern Church. Tertullian seems to pull a veil over the connection between the British monasteries and the Orient was still alive. In Rome he conversed much with Rufinus, the zealous propagator of Greek theology in the Latin Church, and the circle which gathered around Rufinus, Paulinus of Nola, Sulpicius Severus, and others. The odious stories told about him by Jerome and Orosius are completely refuted by the circumstance, that, even when the controversy was hottest, Augustine never ceased to pay an unstinted respect to his moral zeal and Christian conduct.

The great work he wrote in Rome — his Commentaries on the Pauline Epistles — exists only in the orthodox redaction of Cassiodorus; but even in that work he gives a tolerably clear idea of his peculiar views. In speaking of a letter, which, during his stay in Rome, Pelagius wrote to Paulinus, Augustine complains that it is so completely occupied with the forces and faculties of nature, that it hardly mentions the grace of God; and, indeed, another letter by Pelagius, written somewhat later (415), and addressed to Demetrius, indicates exactly the same point of view. To Pelagius, religion was not the vital germ of morality, but only an external influence; and, when he sometimes mentions religion as the highest moral motive, he means the fear of God as it is found under the dispensation of the law. Nowhere in the above letter does he speak of grace as an inner agency creating a new life. He acknowledges that in the course of history sin has increased so fearfully as to become almost an element of nature; but he nevertheless maintains that at any moment the will is able to burst the meshes of sinful habits, and vindicate its own independence. In the Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans was to deprive those propositions of their Scriptural basis because he considered them subversive of all morality. It was, however, not Pelagius, but Celestius, who opened the campaign. He belonged to a distinguished family, and practised as a lawyer in Rome; and he became monk, and afterward Pelagius. In 411 they went together to Africa; but after a short stay there, during which he met with Augustine, Pelagius continued the journey to Palestine, while Celestius remained at Carthage, where he hoped to obtain the office of presbyter. In 412, however, he was accused of heresy by Deacon Paulinus of Milan, before a synod at Carthage, over which Bishop Aurelius presided. The accusation referred to six different points of heresy, of which the most prominent seems to have been that concerning infant baptism. Adam, Celestius said to maintain, would have died, even if he had not sinned. Children are born in the same state as Adam was in before the fall, and consequently they have eternal life, even though they die unbaptized. Both before and after the Lord's appearance in the flesh, there have existed people who were without sin, etc. Celestius tried to show that the question whether or not there existed a true tradux peccati was a theological problem, without any direct bearing on the general question of infant baptism. The first act of the controversy, which afterward called forth the controversy are found,—the rejection of the doctrines of hereditary sin (tradux peccati), of the connection between sin and death, of grace as the sole cause of conversion, etc. His very object in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans was to deprive those propositions of their Scriptural basis because he considered them subversive of all morality.

Between this, the first act of the controversy, and the second, in which the scene changes to the East, Augustine wrote his De pecatorum meritis, etc. In Palestine, Pelagius was very well received by Bishop Johannes of Jerusalem; but he could not avoid coming into conflict with Jerome, who considered his views a revival of those old heresies of Origen which Rufinus had defended. Jerome stood at that very moment in close communion with Bishop Aurelius of Milan about the idea of his treatise in which he abjured the doctrine of free will, and advised the Pope to abstain from any action which might lead to controversy. Jerome, who opened the campaign, was not satisfied with his vague prevarications. He was excommunicated, and repaired to Ephesus.
Johannes convened for the purpose of settling the controversy between Jerome and Pelagius. Orosius was invited to give an account of what had taken place in Africa, and laid great stress upon the circumstance that the views of Pelagius had been rejected by such a man as Augustine. But as Pelagius simply declared that the authority of Augustine had nothing to do with the subject in question, and as Johannes took the side of Pelagius, Orosius had to content himself with claiming that the final decision should be referred to the Bishop of Rome, since Pelagius was a member of the Latin Church. Johannes consented; but it soon appeared that the adversaries of Pelagius could not abide with patience the result of so slow a process. Before the year (416) came to an end, two deposed Western bishops who happened to be in Palestine (Herod of Arles and Lazarus of Aix) laid a formal accusation of heresy before the synod of Diospolis, convened by Bishop Eulogius of Cesarea. To the great chagrin, however, of Jerome, Pelagius succeeded also this time in escaping condemnation, and was recognized as an orthodox member of the orthodox church. But Celestius was condemned; and, since Pelagius acquiesced in that condemnation, Augustine was certainly right when he afterwards, in his De gestis Pelagii, protested that Pelagius could not give his assent to that condemnation without condemning himself.

Pelagius, however, caused considerable uneasiness, and it was generally determined to employ more effective measures against the new heresy. At a provincial synod of Carthage, convened in 416 by Bishop Aurelius, Orosius read a report of what had taken place in Palestine, written by the two Gallic bishops; and the synod determined to show earnestness. Pelagius and Celestius, unless they retracted. A letter was also sent to Pope Innocent I., asking him to anathematize any one who should teach that man is able by himself to overcome sin, and fulfill the commandments of God, or who should deny that by baptism children are raised from a state of perdition, and made heirs to eternal life. The Numidian bishops appearing to be in the same case, the synod addressed the Pope in a similar strain; and so did five other African bishops, among whom was Augustine, in a private letter. The Pope was much flattered by these appeals, as he called them, to the authority of the Roman see, and declared himself in perfect accord with the African bishops.

Pelagius now also presented a confession to the Pope, in which he expatiated at great length upon Christology, the Trinity, and other doctrines, but touched only vaguely the point in question, arguing against those, who, like the Manicheans, asserted that man cannot escape sinning, and against those, who, like Jovinian, asserted that man, when regenerated, can sin no more. This confession did not please, and was not before his death; but his successor, Zosimus, received it very kindly, and seemed to be more in favor of Pelagius. Celestius, who had become a presbyter in Ephisus, and afterwards had stayed for some time in Constantinople, came also to Rome about this time; and in the confession he submitted to Zosi-mus he tried to vindicate his old point of view — that the whole question was, properly speaking, praeter fidem. The result of these movements was, that Zosimus, in two letters, openly blamed the African bishops because they had listened to the accusations of the Gallican bishops, two men of ill repute, and opened a controversy withoutproperly investigating the matter.

The African bishops, however, would not brook the rebuke. A synod of Carthage immediately determined to adhere to the decision of Innocent as the only valid one; and, while Zosimus was trying to effect a decent retreat, the African bishops assembled in a general council (418), at which also delegates from Spain were present, and formally condemned the views of Pelagius. The propositions condemned were, that man was created mortal, and would have died, even though he had not sinned; that children were born without sin, and needed not baptism as an atonement; that grace works only forgiveness for sins committed, but does not help to avoid committing sins; that grace helps only by revealing the will of God, but not by communicating power to withstand sin, etc. The African bishops further succeeded in gaining the Emperor Theodosius over to their side; and an edict of April 30, 418, banished all adherents of Pelagius, laymen or clergy, from the country. Zosimus now saw fit to break openly with Pelagianism, and by his Epistola Tractoria he solemnly confirmed the canons of the African council. All Western bishops were commanded to subscribe to the letter. A few Italian bishops refused, but, according to the canons, Pelagius, Orosius, Julian, and Marius Mercator; the acts of the various councils (see in Mansi, IV.). Among modern treatments of the subject, F. Wiggers: Prag. Darstellung des Augustinusmus und Pelag., Berlin, 1881-82, 2 vols. (vol. I. translated by R. Emerson, Augustine and Pelagius, London, 1882, 4 vols.); J. L. Jacobi: Die Lehre d. Pelagius, Leipzig, 1842; Wörter: Der Pelagianismus, Freib., 1896; Klaes: Die innere Entwicklung des Pelagianismus, Freiburg, 1882. W. Möller.

PELAGIUS, the name of two Popes. — Pelagius I. (556-560), b. in Rome, and d. there March 3, 560. Under Pope Silvester he held the position of apocrisiarius at the court of Justinian I., and combined with the Empress Theodora, a secret advocate of Monophysitism, for the overthrow of doxy. But that he understood how to vigorously nish a confession of faith as a proof of his ortho

It was an act humiliating to the Papacy, when, in defend the Church against the claims of the State good his invasions into the rights of the papal

557, he decided, at the wish of Childebert, to fur consecration. He was accused of heresy, on ac

See Vita Pelagii II., in Muratori:

sqq. ; Hinschius: Decretales Pseudo-hidor., Leip

Pelagius, a foe of Monophysitism, and the eleva tion to meet papal commissioners. Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster, condemination was revoked, or to accept a propo

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against his assertion of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster,

Patriarch of Constantinople, and protested against

his assumption of the title of oecumenical bishop.

The papal document rebuking the patriarch for his

Pelagius also got into controversy with John the Faster, PENANCE. 1787

PENITENTIALS.

crown, in 1859, he lost his position at Kiel, and was nominated by the university of Greifswald to the pastorate of Kennitz, which was in its patronage. In 1857 he was promoted to be superintendent of the diocese. Pelz's greatest work is the Theol. Encyklopädie als System, im Zusam-menhange mit d. Gesch. d. theol. Wissenschaft u.
ihren Anwendungen. The manuscript was completed in 1875. This work, which divides theology into historical, systematic, and practical, is brilliant in conception, and instructive in execution. I. A. DÖRNKE.

PENANCE, the fourth of the seven sacraments of the Roman-Catholic Church, is a means of repairing a sin committed, and obtaining pardon for it, and consists, partly in the performance of expiatory rites, partly in voluntary submission to a punishment corresponding to the transgression.
It is found in all religions. In the Old Testament it occurs under the form of purification, expiatory sacrifices, fasts, etc.; but this merely juridical form of expiation was afterwards, by the prophets, elevated to the more spiritual form of repentance of the heart, and complete atonement and full expiation. See IRENÉUS; Adv.
the Church (2 Cor. ii.) on condition of public confession. On the whole, concerning confession, the effort of Leo the Great, changed into private congregation, was employed. But such an excom-unication was voluntary; it was annulled, especially by the efforts of Leo the Great, changed into private confession. The whole, concerning confession, the views were for a long time uncertain. The thirty-third canon of the Council of Chalons, 813, says (Mansi: Coll. Council. XIV.), "Some think it sufficient to confess to God alone, while others consider it necessary to subject it to the superintendent; and from it there grew up in the old British and Irish Church a number of penitentials, which, exactly in the fashion of a criminal code, prescribed certain penalties for certain transgressions. Fragmentary versions of six; (comp. Cyprian: Ep. ii., 4, 10; Lactantius: Institut., iv., 30, etc.) As public confession, however, carried with it not only great inconveniences, but even dangers, it was afterwards, especially by the efforts of Leo the Great, changed into private confession. The views of Augustine, contributed much to the establishment of the idea that the priest had the power of pardaoning or retaining sin; and though this doc-true was not accepted without certain restriciv. dist. 18; Richard of Saint-Victor: Tract.
de potest. ligandi et solvendi, 12; Thomas Aquinas: Summa, p. iii. qu. 84, art. 31), it served to spread the custom of confessing to a priest. Finally.
the fourth Council of the Lateran (1215), presided over by Innocent III, and binding on the heretics of the Cisterci and Waldenses, made confession to a priest an indispensable part of penance, and consequently compulsory. With respect to the expiatory part of penance, or penance proper, the views were originally very severe. It lasted long, often the whole life through, and the penalties were very heavy. But, as time went on, the views became milder; the penalties were confined to prayers, fasts, and alms. At first the penalties were simply considered as evidences of the sincerity of the repentance; but in course of time they became a real opus operatum. In the middle ages it was generally agreed that the penance imposed upon one person could be paid by another, at least in part; and in a collection of penitence-rules found in Mansi (Coll. Council., XVIII. p.
525) it is stated, that, by means of a sufficient number of co-fasters, a fast of seven years may be accomplished, and the debt is thus paid. The Church, considered of as a satisfaction; and consequently, as Thomas Aquinas has it, so long as the debt is paid, it does not matter who pays it. All these various features have been retained by the Council of Trent (Sess. XIV., c. 2 and 8) in its definition of the sacrament, though in a somewhat refined form. The conception of the Greek Church difters in no essential point from that of the Roman-Catholic. Penance is there considered a second baptism, the "baptism of tears" (Boissard: L'Eglise de Russie, i. p. 384). For further details and pertinent literature, see Confession, Penitentials, and Repentance.

PENITENTIALS (Libri Penitentiales) were colcections of rules for the guidance of the confessor, prescribing the penalty he ought to impose; that is, the satisfaction he ought to demand before granting absolution. In the ancient church the Councils of Ancyra (314), of Nicea (325), and others, gave such rules. Of great influence on the reigning practice were also the two epistles on the penitentials and absolution. Fragmentary versions of the Canones Patricii (about 380), the Cano-taga, Joannes Scholasticus (d. 578) gave sixty-eight canons, which were confirmed by the Trullan synod of 692; but the farther development of this literature in the Greek Church is of comparatively small interest. In the Latin Church the Letters of Basil formed the starting-point; though a work of similar kind, but of native growth, is mentioned in the middle of the third century.
(comp. Cyprian: Epist. 2, and De lapsis, 31, 62.)
The monastic discipline exercised a special influence; and from it there grew up in the old British or Irish Church a number of penitentials, which, extactly in the fashion of a criminal code, prescribed certain penalties for certain transgressions. Fragmentary versions of the Canones Patricii, the Liber Davidis (about 544), a penitential by Vennianus, or Finnianus, another by Gildas (d. 583), are still extant. By Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 699), those works were collected and arranged for the Anglican Church.
He was a Greek by birth; and his work, which from the eighth to the twelfth century was considered the highest authority on questions of penance, contains many Greek and Roman traditions.
It is doubtful, however, whether he ever wrote down his rules himself, or whether they were put in writing later on by others. The Panentiale Theodori, such as it is published in Ancient Laws and Institutes of England, 1840, cannot belong to him. The same is the case with the penitentials of Beda Venerabiles (d. 735) and Egbert, Archbishop of York (d. 767). The Anglo-Saxon penitentials were brought by Columban into Gaul, and obtained great authority throughout the Frankish Empire. But works of the same kind poured into the country also from other sides; and a great confusion ensued, which a number of Frankish synods from the first half of the ninth century in vain tried to remedy. At the instance of Bishop Ebo of Rheims, Bishop Halitargius of Cambray wrote, about 929, his celebrated Liber Pennentiatus, in six books. The sixth book (published in Canisius: Lectiones antiquae, tom. ii. part ii. p. 151) is designated as Pennentiatus Romanus, quem de serius Romanica ecclesia adsumptus, though it is certainly of Frankish origin. It must not be confounded with another Pennentiatus Romanum which is often mentioned, but which had no papal authority either. There exists, indeed, no penitential specially authorized by the Roman curia, though it often happened that a penitential writer ascribed his work to a pope in order to make it more authoritative. Thus there is a Pennentiatus Gregorii III., but it belongs to a much later period. Prominent among the productions of the Frankish Church in this line during the ninth century is the Liber pennentiatus, or Pennentiun, of Rabanus Maurus, Archbishop of Mayence (d. 855). See Opera, ed. Colvenarius, Cologne, 1627, vol. vi. None of these penitentials, however, succeeded in gaining wide acceptance with the clergy. The Pseudo-Boleslaus, king of Poland, in his time he was kept pure from vice. At Saumur he attended with great interest the lectures of the time he was kept pure from vice. At Saumur he attended with great interest the lectures of the time. In 1707, after two years' absence, he returned to London, where he made large acquisitions of learning. He returned to London with a party of young nobles and gentlemen. Presented to Louis XIV., he was a great favorite at court, handsome in person, graceful in manners, and heroism. Never did a young man sacrifice more for such a protest than our franker and more fearless admirer. William Penn was so deeply moved, that he wrote a letter to the Earl of Orrery, lord-president of Munster, in which he said, "Though to dissent from a national system imposed by authority renders men heretics, yet I dare believe your lordship is better read in reason and theology than to subscribe a maxim so vulgar and untrue." The earl ordered his release; but his father, bearing that he had turned Quaker, sent for him, and he returned home. Observing that his son did not uncover his head when he came into his presence, the admiral demanded an explanation. William answered that he could uncover only to God, and not in homage to any man. "Not even to the king?" asked the father. The son asked an hour for consideration, and, after meditation and prayer, returned with the answer, "Not even to the king." Enraged, his father beat him and turned him out of doors. However excessive his scruples may have been, the servility of that age made greater demands for such a protest than our franker and more manly times. At all events, William Penn gave the fullest scope to his sincerity, and formed a high type of Quaker heroism. Never did a young man sacrifice more when he renounced the world. Enjoying the intimacy and the favor of the king, admired at court, handsome in person, graceful in manners, adorned with every manly accomplishment, expectant heir of a title of nobility (that of Lord Weymouth), which the king was ready to confer upon his father, he was entering upon life with all the most brilliant promise of distinction and success. All this he gave up, to meet persecution and scorn. Hardest of all, he was forced to dis-appoint the fond and ambitious hopes of his father. But he never wavered. His father, the admiral, was before his death (1670) reconciled to him, and advised him to keep his "plain way." Penn held a high place as a champion of English liberty and of universal toleration. Imprisoned in the Tower, at the instance of the Bishop of London, (and this twenty-four years after the execution of Laud!) for writing a tract entitled The Sandy Foundation shaken, he sent word to his father. "My prison shall be my grave before I will budge a jot: for I owe my conscience to no mortal man." In the Tower he wrote, No Cross, No Crown, the most widely read of all his works. He said, in a letter to the secretary of state, "What if I differ from some religious apprehensions? Am I therefore incompatible with human societies? I know not any unfit for political cares he had been led by the dying admiral, was his faithful friend, and sometimes attended his meetings, and listened to his preaching. Penn did not conceal from him his liberal political views, but labored openly for the election to Parliament of the republican Algernon Sidney. On the accession of William of Orange, Penn was charged with being a Papist, and plotting for the return of the Stuarts, for which he was several times arrested, and once thrown into prison. He succeeded at length in establishing his innocence, and was made a welcome visitor at their courts by William, Mary, and afterwards Queen Anne, thus enjoying the personal friendship of five sovereigns of Great Britain. Six years before his death, he was attacked with an apoplectic disease, by which his mind was impaired, but not the strength of the soul. His spiritual communion with his Lord. "Clouds lay upon his understanding," says Cope; "but the sun shone on his eternal prospects, and the long evening sky was clear, and full of light."

As an author, Penn appears as a defender of the views of Fox and Barclay, a writer of sententious ethical precepts, an opponent of judicial oaths, an advocate of a Congress of Nations for the settlement of international disputes, and a champion of complete and universal religious liberty. Many of his books and pamphlets were translated into German, French, Dutch, and Welsh. Among the more important of them are, Truth Exalted (a defence of Quakerism, 1668); No Cross, no Crown (1670); The People's Ancient and Just Liberties asserted (1670); A Caret against Popery (1670); A Guide Mistaken (against J. Clapman's A Guide to True Religion, 1670); The Great Case of Liberty of Conscience once more briefly debated, etc. (1670); A Treatise on Oaths (1675); England's Present Interest discovered, with Honour to the Princes, and Safety to the Kingdom (1675); The Continued Cry of the Oppressed for Justice (1673); A Letter to the Churches of Jesus throughout the World, A Call or Summons to Christendom (1677); A Persuasion to Moderate (1680); Good Advice to the Church of England, and Quot;olic and Protestant Dissenters, for the Abolition of the Penal Laws and Fasts (1687); A Key (elucidating the peculiar tenets and features of Quakerism); The New Athenians no Noble Bereans (1692); An Essay towards the Present and Future Peace of Europe by the Establishment of a European Diet, Parliament, or Eupean Republic (1693); Travels in Holland and Germany, anno 1677 (1694); Primitive Christianity revived (1696); The Quaker a Christian (1698).

The bi-centennial of Penn's landing at Chester, Oct. 24, 1682, was celebrated with great enthusiasm in Philadelphia, and throughout Pennsylvania, Oct. 24, 1882.

Biographies of William Penn: MARSHALL (Paris, 1701, 2 vols.); CLARKSON (London, 1813, 2 vols.); DIXON (London, 1851, 3d ed. 1856);

PENNAFORTE, Raymond de, b. at Barcelona towards the close of the twelfth century; d. Jan. 6, 1275. He studied in his native city and at Bologna; entered the Dominican Order; was made confessor to Gregory IX. in 1230, and general of his order in 1238; but resigned afterwards that office in order to devote himself to the conversion of the Moors and Jews. He published a Summa casuum penitentiae and Decretalium Gregorii IX. compilatio.

PENNY, Ann (or Ap Henry), Congregational martyr; b. at Cefnbrit, Llangamarch, Brecon-shire, Wales, 1559; hanged London, May 29, 1598. He was brought up in the Roman-Catholic Church; matriculated as a pensioner of Peterhouse, Cambridge, Dec. 3, 1580; became a Puritan; proceeded B.A., 1583, 1584, but took his M.A. at Oxford, July 11, 1589, where he was a commoner of St. Alban Hall. He took orders, but his heterodox opinions soon brought him into trouble with the bishops. In 1587 he published at Oxford a powerful plea for more gospel-preaching in Wales. In the next year he married Helen Godley of Northampton, and at Moulay, Surrey, superintended the Puritan press of Waldegrave. It was about this time that several of his tracts and the first Martin Marprelate book (November, 1588) appeared. (See MARTIN MARPRELATE.) Later on, he staid at Nottingham; but in March, 1589, he fled into Scotland. Queen Elizabeth demanded his banishment from that kingdom; and the requisite order was given, but its execution delayed by the clergy; and it was not until September, 1592, that he returned to London. Some time before this, he had gone over to Separatism; and so, although he had written nothing since he had altered his relations to the Church of England, he was regarded as a dangerous character; and, being already suspected of the authorship of the Martin Marprelate books, he was arrested at Raticliffe, March 22, 1593, and committed to the Poultry, March 24. His examination revealed nothing against him; but two indictments for having incited insurrection and rebellion in England were preferred against him, one from his diary, and he was hanged at St. Thomas-a-Watering, Surrey, London. His last plea for mercy ends with these touching words: "Preparing myself, not so much for an unjust verdict and an undeserved doom in this life, as unto that blessed crown of glory which of the great mercy of My God is ready for me in heaven, I humbly betake your lordship unto the hand of the just Lord through Christ."

See PENNY, Ann (or Ap Henry), Congregationalism as seen in its Literature, N.Y., 1880, pp. 248-252.

PENTATEUCH. The, is the name given to that portion of the Old Testament included in the five first books, — Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy.

I. NAMES AND DIVISION. — The names which are beyond dispute given in the Old Testament to the whole Pentateuch are The Book of the Law of Moses (Neh. viii. 1), The Law (Thorah, Neh. viii. 2), The Book of the Law of Jehovah (Neh. xi. 8), The Book of Moses (Neh. xiii. 1). The Talmud and the rabbins often call the Pentateuch the Five Books of the Law (משלי וארבעה), when it was bound in book-form (e.g., Babylon. Sanhed., 44). The Greek designations were δ ψαλτος (The Law in the New Testament) and πεπανταροσ, i.e., βιβλος (The Pentateuch, Origen, In Joh., 26).

The names of the five books were, as a rule, among the Jews their first words: (1) בְּרֵאשִׁית (B'reeshith, "In the beginning"); (2) שโมת (Sh'moth, "The names"), or וָאֶלֶה שְׁמֹות (V'elekh Shemoth, "These are the names"); (3) וַיָּמָר (Vitra, "And . . . called"); (4) בֵּיתוֹת (B'itehth, "In the wilderness"), or וַיֹּאֵר (Vayoober, "And . . . spake"); (5) דְּבָרֵי (D'barre, "Words"), or דְּבָרֵי ה' (D'vel'h khi'charim, "These are the words"). The designations Genesis, etc., which we have derived from the Greek, were used by Simon Magus (Hippolytus, Harces, vi. 15, 16). Philo used the term Genesis, and Ειργασία for Exodus. The designation Deuteronomy occurs in the Epistle of Barnabas (chap. 10). The division into five books is older than the Septuagint, but not original. Another point for fixing the date is the period of Nehemiah, when the Psalter was divided into five divisions with reference to the Pentateuchal books.

II. CONTENTS. — A summary of the contents of the Pentateuch may be stated as a history of the kingdom of God on earth and in Israel, from the creation to the death of Moses, and the laws of God's kingdom in Israel. The following are the contents of the main divisions: (1) Genesis i.—xvi. The early history of the world and the human family, including the creation, the origin and development of sin, the Flood, the construction of the Tower of Babel, and Terah's removal from Ur. (2) Genesis xvii.—xlvi. The history of the patriarchs, including Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph. (3) Exodus i.—xxi. The oppression of Israel in Egypt, and its emancipation; Moses being the central figure. (4) Exodus xxii.—xxiv. 11. The march to Sinai, and the conclusion of the covenant. (5) Exodus xxiv.—xxxiv. The interruption of the divine legislation by the apostasy of the people and the renewal of the covenant. (6) Exodus xxxv.—Num. x. 10. Regulations given at Mount Sinai for the tabernacle, priesthood, sacrifices, etc. (7) Num. x. 11—xxxii. 1. The journey from Sinai to Moab, and the incidents by the way. (8) Num. xxxiii 2—xxxvi. Events and legislation in Moab, including the prophecy of Balaam and the appointment of the cities of refuge. (9) Deut. i.—iv. 43. Moses' first exhortation. (10) Deut. iv. 44—xxvi. Moses' second exhortation, including the repetition of the Decalogue, the construction of the tabernacle, the altar (Deut. xii.), the emancipation of Hebrew slaves, the rights of the priests and Levites, etc.
Joshua, therefore, cannot be the author of the entire Pentateuch. Astruc, starting, from the peculiarity of the divine names in Genesis, a fact which had arrested the attention of others, affirmed in 1758 (in his Conjectures sur les mémoires originaux dont il paroit que Moys s'est servi pour composer le livre de la Genèse), that the part of the Pentateuch treating of pre-Mosaic times (Genesis, Exod. xxiv. to Deut. xxxiv.), is composed of different documents which are seldom used, consists of two main records,—an Elohim and a Jehovah document. Eichhorn simplified this thesis by arranging the first fifty-two chapters of the Pentateuch under two heads, and did especially good service by proving that a different style prevailed in the two records. De Wette (1805, 1806) called attention to the peculiarities of Genesis, Deut. xxxi. 9—11, 22—26; that is to the body of this book (Delitzsch: Pentateuch-kritische Studien, 503—505). The testimonies of the older books of the Old Testament, the prophetic and the New Testament, and finally upon the assumption that the Pentateuch shows no vestiges of post-Mosaic events and customs, no chronological errors, but exhibits a unity of spirit and language, and meets every expectation so great an antiquity would arouse.

The external testimonies are not convincing. The Pentateuchal passages which speak of Moses as the author (Num. xxxiii. 2) refer either to isolated sections, as the victory over Amalek and the covenant code, or to Deuteronomy (Deut. xxxi. 9—11, xxxii. 24—26); that is to the body of this book (Delitzsch: Pentateuch-kritische Studien, 503—505).

The testimonies of the older books of the Old Testament are susceptible of a twofold interpretation, and do not necessitate the conclusion that Moses wrote the whole. The testimonies of the post-exilic writers, on account of the long interval separating them from the composition of the Pentateuch, are not convincing. As regards the passages from the New Testament, we must protest against their use, for the twofold reason, that the passages are isolated, and that, on the one hand, other proofs are superfluous, and are a derogation from the authority of our Lord; and that the use of such proofs removes the whole question from the historical and critical domain. We therefore do not regard the external proofs as binding, but hold it, for the nonce, possible that the terms "Five books of Moses" and "Law of Moses," are to be understood in the same sense as the expression "Book of Joshua;" namely, that Moses is thereby simply declared to be the central figure.

Passing to the internal reasons (that is, those drawn from the history of Israel when compared with the contents of the Pentateuch, those contents themselves, and various considerations which have been urged against the Mosaic authorship. Leaving aside others, there is one consideration which seems to me to be decisive; and starting with it, we are enabled to arrive more easily at a judgment concerning the others. Not only that portion which concerns the pre-Mosaic history, but the entire Pentateuch, is composed of different writings, which can still be plainly traced in many sections, and parts of which may also be traced in Joshua. Moses, therefore, cannot be the author of the pentateuch.

III. The Critical Problems. 1. The Traditional View and the Province of Criticism.—The synagogue, the church of the Fathers and the middle ages, and the modern investigators, Keil being the last among the well-known Protestant critics [in Germany], have held Moses to be the author of the entire Pentateuch, and only differ as to the authorship of the section describing the death of Moses. The older Talmudists and Josephus made Joshua the author of the last eight verses of Deuteronomy; Philo and the later Talmudists count him as the author. Keil (who follows Hengstenberg closely), in his Introduction, and his Commentary on the Books of Moses, bases the Mosaic authorship upon the testimonies of the Pentateuch itself, the historical books of the Old Testament, the prophets and the New Testament, and finally upon the assertion that the first fifty-two chapters of the Pentateuch, starting with the very just proposition that the names of God (Elohim and Jehovah) express different relations of God to the world, have exhaustively established the position that the first fifty-two chapters of the Pentateuch, starting with the very just proposition that the names of God (Elohim and Jehovah) express different relations of God to the world, have exhaustively established the position that the Pentateuch shows no vestiges of post-Mosaic events and customs, no chronological errors, but exhibits a unity of spirit and language, and meets every expectation so great an antiquity would arouse.

The external testimonies are not convincing. The Pentateuchal passages which speak of Moses as the author (Num. xxxiii. 2) refer either to isolated sections, as the victory over Amalek and the covenant code, or to Deuteronomy (Deut. xxxi. 9—11, xxxii. 24—26); that is to the body of this book (Delitzsch: Pentateuch-kritische Studien, 503—505). The testimonies of the older books of the Old Testament are susceptible of a twofold interpretation, and do not necessitate the conclusion that Moses wrote the whole. The testimonies of the post-exilic writers, on account of the long interval separating them from the composition of the Pentateuch, are not convincing. As regards the passages from the New Testament, we must protest against their use, for the twofold reason, that the passages are isolated, and that, on the one hand, other proofs are superfluous, and are a derogation from the authority of our Lord; and that the use of such proofs removes the whole question from the historical and critical domain. We therefore do not regard the external proofs as binding, but hold it, for the nonce, possible that the terms "Five books of Moses" and "Law of Moses," are to be understood in the same sense as the expression "Book of Joshua;" namely, that Moses is thereby simply declared to be the central figure.
one arranging hand throughout the whole work.

(2) The Supplemental Hypothesis. The identity of style and views in all the Elohim sections was the occasion of this hypothesis, according to which the Elohim (or original) document was supplemented by the Jehovist writer by the insertion of sections and remarks. The Deuteronomy being incorporated at a later period. This view has been advocated by Tuch, Bleek, Lengerke (Kenaan, Königsberg, 1844), and Delitzsch (though no longer), but may be regarded as given up.

(3) The Documentary Hypothesis. According to this view the entire Pentateuch, or almost the whole of it, was compiled by two or more compilers from different documents. This view is held in forms differing very considerably; the differences concerning the order of succession and age of the documents, rather than their classification. Before taking up these views separately, we will classify the names and signatures given by different critics to the various Pentateuch writers and compilers:

The first Elohist (or editor).—Tuch, etc., call his work "the original document" (Grundschrift); Ewald, "book of beginnings" (Buch der Ur sprunge); Schrader calls him "the prophetic narrator" (an nalistischer Erzähler); Schultz, Dillmann, "A"; Wellhausen, etc., "P.C."

The second (or later) Elohist. — Ewald calls him "the third narrator;" Schrader, "the theocratic narrator;" Dillmann, "B;" or "the narrator from Northern Israel;" Schultz, "C;" Wellhausen, etc., "E."

The Jehovist. — Tuch, etc., call him "the supplementer" (Ergänzer); Ewald, "the fourth narrator;" Schrader, "the prophetic narrator;" Dillmann, "C;" Schultz, "B;" Wellhausen, "J."

The Deuteronomist. — Dillmann calls him "D."

We shall, in the following discussion, use Wellhausen's terminology, because it has been adopted by many writers, and does not prejudice the student in favor of the age or order of the documents, except that we will use "P" for "P.C."

3. The Most Important Views now held.

Schrader, in the eighth edition of De Wette's Introduction to the Old Testament (Berlin, 1889), combines the documentary and supplemental hypotheses, and traces them to the close of Joshua, written early in David's reign, and was a priest. "E," who can be traced down to 1 Kings ix.; 28, was probably from Northern Israel, and wrote soon after the division of the kingdom, or about 975-950 B.C. "J," also from Northern Israel, writing about 825-800 B.C., combined "P" and "E," adding a good deal which had come down by oral tradition. The radical part of Deuteronomy (ix. 24-xxiv.) was written, not long before the eighteenth year of Josiah's reign, by a friend of Jeremiah's, who incorporated his work in "P.E.J." The separation of the Pentateuch from Joshua was made after the close of the Babylonian exile. This view is still held by Schrader.

Nöldeke (Untersuchungen zur Kritik d. A. T. Kiel, 1869) holds the following view, "P," "E," and "J" lived in the tenth or ninth century B.C. "E" was worked over by "J." "P" is the latest of the three. "D" wrote shortly before Josiah's reforms, and incorporated his work in the Hexateuch ("the six books;" i.e., the Pentateuch and Joshua). I make the following summary of a communication of Nöldeke to me, dated May 20, 1882. The final compiler is not to be identified with the Deuteronomist. The remainder of the Pentateuch, left after extracting "D" and "P," it is impossible to classify. He is not able to adopt the Graf-Wellhausen hypothesis. Ezekiel is dependent upon "P." The Deuteronomist had, in any case, before him legal writings of essentially the same style, and often in the same language [as his own work], such as the Priestly Code.

Dillitzsch will give a connected and comprehensive statement of his views in the concluding volume of his revised edition of Knobel's Commentary on the Hexateuch. The following is a summary of his views as expressed up to this time. It is uncertain which of the two is the older,—"P," or "E." "E," who lived in the flourishing prophetic period of the central tribes, is certainly older than "J," who was dependent upon "E," and was nearer being a contemporary of Moses; Dillitzsch also wrote not a little about the reforms of Josiah. "P," "E," and "J" were wrought together into one volume by a compiler. Neh. viii.—x. refers to the entire Pentateuch. "P," "E," and "J" used very ancient authorities: E, for example, incorporated the Book of the Covenant (Exod. xx.—xxiii. 19).

Delitzsch wrote in his Commentary of Genesis (p. 21), as late as 1872, "Deuteronomy gives itself out as Mosaic, and the body of it must be declared Mosaic." He has, since 1876, modified his views, and now agrees very closely with the school of Graf in reference to the classification of the original documents and their order of succession, but differs with it essentially upon the date of composition, and pronounces emphatically against the conclusions it draws for the religious history of Israel. "J" and "D" he regards as having written after Solomon, but before Isaiah; and "P" the latest, before Ezekiel. He brings into comparison the many records prior to the canonical Gospels, and adds that he is "now convinced that the process of composition and formation, out of which the law in its present form was derived, continued down into the post-exilic period, and perhaps was not at an end at the time when the Samaritan Pentateuch and the Septuagint were made." He continues (p. 621): "All the more strongly do we insist upon the Mosaic origin and the divine revelation of the foundation [Fundament] of the Torah [Pentateuch]." Compare further, for Delitzsch's view, the translation from his lectures in The Hebrew Student for 1883 (1—iv.), and Curtiss, Delitzsch on the Origin and Composition of the Pentateuch, in The Presbyterian Review for July, 1882.

Wellhausen. The Decalogue likewise is not Mosaic. The Book of the Covenant (Exod. xx.—xxiii. 19) was given to "a people sedentary, and fully accustomed to agriculture." "J" belongs to "the golden period of Hebrew literature" just preceding the dissolution of the two kingdoms by the Assyrians. "E" betrays a "more advanced religious condition, with more regulations." Both these documents, probably, went through several editions, and were probably united in one volume as they appeared in the third revision. "D" was composed shortly before the eighteenth year of Josiah's reign, and contained at first only Deut. xii.-xxvi. It then went through two editions after the exile, which increased its bulk to thirty-six chapters (5xxvii.-xxx.). This work was therefore incorporated with "JE." Lev. xvii.-xxvi. are a body of laws originating in the period of the exile between Ezekiel and the Priests' Code (which he designates "PC"), which was incorporated in "P." The remainder of the Hexateuch left after the extraction of "JE" and "D" is of post-exilic origin. The original nucleus was "Q," and the legislation of the middle books, standing in very close connection with it both by their contents and language (Exod. xxv.-xxxi., xxxv.-xxi.; Levit.; Num. i.-x., xvii.-xxviii., xxv.-xxxvi., with a few exceptions), he calls the Priests' Code. The only sections belonging originally to "JE" are Deut. xxv.-xxx., xliv.-li., Num. i.-x., xlv., xxv.-xxxvi., xxix.-xxx., and one at the end of Num. xxxi., xxxvii., xxxviii., xxxix., xlv., li., lii., liii., and lv. The legal and historical document was incorporated in "JED" in the year 444, and published by Ezra; "for there can be no doubt that the law of Ezra was the entire Pentateuch" (History, 425, 370 sqq., 421). Compare Henry P. Smith's art. in The Presbyterian Review for April, 1882: The Critical Theories of J. Wellhausen.

Graf, although he died July 16, 1869, deserves mention here on account of the great influence his main thesis has exerted. Upon the basis of studies upon the feasts, priesthood, and tabernacle, he declared that the legislation of the middle books of the Pentateuch bear the "plainest marks of their post-exilic composition;" and shortly before his death he pronounced the so-called "original document" (Grundschrift) post-exilic. "J" wrote in the middle of the eighth century; "D," shortly before the eighteenth year of Josiah; "P," after the exile, and his document was incorporated in "J D," soon after Ezra.

Reuss, who has taught, since 1833, substantially the same views as his pupil Graf, asserts in his Geschichtete des Alten Testaments (§ 77), that the Decalogue is, "perhaps, the oldest of all the parts of the written law," but not Mosaic. The Book of Deuteronomy gives "the law of the Lord" as finished before the exile. The new school represented by Graf, Kayser, Reuss, Wellhausen, and others, has introduced a wide chasm between critics of the Pentateuch. Herefore "P" has been regarded as the oldest document, and looked upon as credible, at least in the main points. The Pentateuch has been regarded as finished before the exile. The new school admits the antiquity of the Book of the Covenant alone. After it, came the historical works "E" and "J," then the first comprehensive code of laws, "D," then the later laws, "P," and finally "P." Wellhausen and others place the completion of the Pentateuch in 444 B.C.

The significance of this new arrangement is at once visible in the revolution it necessitates in our views of Hebrew history. A few notices, based upon Wellhausen's able (historical) History of Israel, will suffice. (1) The Place of Worship. — The historical and prophetic books know nothing of a central and only place of worship. The Jehovist ("JE") sanctifies many altars. The fall of Samaria is favorable to centralization. "D" demands it, and "P" presupposes it, and associates the idea with the tabernacle in early times. (2) Offerings. — "JE" represents sacrifice as a pre-Mosaic practice; "P" does not. According to "JE," with which the historical and prophetic books agree, the person to whom the sacrifices are made is prominent; according to "P," the ritual. "P" introduces the sin and guilt offerings, of which there is no thought in the Old Testament before Ezekiel. (3) Feasts. — The feasts at first celebrated the beginning and close of the harvest, and the vintage. “P” adds to their number the day of atonement; and the sabbath and jubilee years were likewise later additions. (4) Priests and Levites.—In the earliest period of Israel's history, there was no distinction between clergy and laity. Everybody might sacrifice. Hence there is no mention of a priesthood in the oldest portions of “P.” no Aaron at the side of Moses. There was a tribe of Levi, but it perished in the time of the Judges. Later it became the title of a priestly caste. According to Ezek. xlv., only the Levites of Jerusalem were to officiate as priests in the golden period, but it perished in the time of the Judges. Later it became the title of a priestly caste. According to “P,” the Levites never performed the functions of priests, but only the sons of Aaron. The capstone which “P” lays down is the high priest, a personage whose incomparableness is the high priest, a personage whose incomparableness is foreign to the spirit of the remainder of the Old Testament. We shall now proceed to lay down some criticisms of these positions of the new Pentateuchal school.

The Egyptians had, at a very early date, a rich literature, and were accustomed to write much. Why should not the Jews, who were always open to foreign influences, have imitated them in this regard, and especially Moses, who had been brought up in all the wisdom of the Egyptians? From of old, Egypt had a large and influential priestly caste, divided into orders. Israel must also have had a priesthood at an early day, and not have remained a millennium without written priestly laws. It is to be assumed that the priest-Moses (Exod. xxiv. 6 sqq.; Deut. xxxiii. 10; Ps. xxxix. 6) established a ritual. There are not wanting testimonies to the early date of a priestly law (Deut. xxxiii. 10; Mic. iii. 11; Jer. xviii. 18; Ezek. vii. 26; Zeph. iii. 4; Hos. viii. 12). Especially is Deuteronomy, which was certainly in existence at least in the eighteenth year of Josiah, rich in proofs of this assertion. Compare Deut. xxviii. 2 with Num. xviii. 20, 23 sq., and Deut. xxiv. 8, where a priestly law concerning leprosy is referred to, such as is found in Lev. xviii. 14.

The new theory leaves the basal periods of Israel's history without a literature. Moses wrote no laws nor history; David, no psalms; Solomon, no proverbs.

The reason for the larger number of, and more exact references in the post-exilic books, to the Pentateuch, is that Ezra began an entirely new period,—that of the scribes.

The new theory not only excludes the divine factor from the history of Israel, but is obliged to resort, not infrequently, to the very precarious assumption of fictitious,—a word which Wellhausen does not hesitate to use.

One of the principal arguments of the new school is, that the non-observance of a law proves its non-existence. This conclusion, however, is by no means convincing. Compare, for example, Jer. xvi. 6 with Deut. xiv. 1. When we remember the corruption of the priests, over which the prophets lament (Isa. xxvii. 7 sqq.; Mic. iii. 11; Zeph. iii. 4, etc.), it is easy to understand how the laws were lying neglected among the archives of the temple.

The writings of the Old Testament are violently treated, both from a critical and an exegetical point of view, in order to serve the new theory of Hebrew history. The following may serve as examples. (1) The Pentateuch—The Book of the Covenant (Exod xx. 24, 25), according to Wellhausen (p. 30), "sanctions" sacrifices at any locality. He explains the words, "in all places where I record my name," thus: This means that the temple did not maintain the place of communion between heaven and earth to be looked upon as having been chosen arbitrarily; but that they regarded it as chosen in some way (!) by God himself." In truth, the matter stands thus: the passage forbids an arbitrary choice of the place of sacrifice, and, while it does not exclude a plurality of such places, neither presupposes nor demands them. The command which the Book of Covenant also lays down, to appear three times a year before the Lord (Exod. xxxix. 17), decidedly points to a centralization of the worship. (2) The Historical Books—According to Wellhausen, these were subjected to many emendations and revisions, "so that the old tradition is covered up as with a Judaistic mold." The Chronicles are criticized with particular harshness. Leaving the discussions of such assertions, let me say that the picture of Ezra as given in the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah, and by tradition, does not accord at all with the picture which the new theory draws. In order to overthrow a proof of the law of inheritance which prevailed among the priests of the line of Aaron, the false conclusion is drawn by Wellhausen from 1 Sam. ii. 27 sqq., that Zadok was neither a Levite, nor of the line of Aaron. The divine threat, however, is made only against Eli's house, and not against the entire house of his father. (3) The Prophets.—The treatment which this school gives to the prophets is, to say the least, of questionable value. Wellhausen says the word בָּרָא ("create") was not originally in Amos iv. 13, Isa. iv. 6. Joel is put after the exile. More violence, however, is done in the exegesis. The difference in the aim of the law and the prophets is ignored, as is the moral character of the ritual law. The prophets were not opposed to the observance of the sacrificial ritual, but only to practices of the people. Bredenkamp very justly insists upon the distinction of the prophets of the northern kingdom, who prophesy more against the introduction of heathen rites, and the southern kingdom, who prophesy more against an external service. (4) The Poetical Books.—Job is put after Jeremiah (Wellhausen, Bleek, W. R. Smith, etc.). Job 5, however, does not fit in with the new theory of the history of offerings. Of the Psalms, Wellhausen says the question is, "whether any of the Psalms were composed after the exile, but whether any were written before the exile." If the words "burnt offering and sin offering hast thou not required," in Ps. xi. 6, were written before the exile, then the mention of sin offerings occurs before Ezekiel. If they were written after the exile, a view I do not hold, then the analogous utterances of Amos v. and Jer. vii. do not exclude the existence of the law of offerings at an earlier period. (Comp. Bredenkamp and W. H. Green, in the Pales- tine Review for January, 1882, pp. 142 sq.)

"P" contains a number of laws which were without a motive, and could not be carried out before the exile, e.g., the Urim and Thummim (Exod. xxviii. 30; Lev. viii. 8; Num. xxvii. 21; the jubilee year; Lev. xxv. 8 sqq.; the Levitic cities, Num. xxxv. 1 sqq.; the law concerning spoils, Num. xxxi. 25 sqq.). It gives only the services to be performed by the Levites in the wilderness, and no special legislation is made for the time remaining. Such a fiction would be in the highest degree astounding. The relation of "P," especially as regards the law of holiness to Ezekiel, is now a subject of animated discussion. A careful comparison of the language shows that Ezekiel is dependent upon "P." Ezekiel (xxv. 18 sqq.) differs from "P" in the number of daily offerings and the method of making them. A prophet has liberty to change; but it is inconceivable, that, at a period when so much emphasis was put upon the written word, a document like "P," laying claim to divine authority, could be composed with changes in this regard. Ezekiel was not the first to make the distinction between Lev. vii. 13 and Deut. xi. 20. It is clear that distinction (xl. 45 sqq.; xlii. 13, xliii. 18). It can be clearly shown of many laws of the Priests' Code, that they are older than Deuteronomy. To date the command to kill the sacrifices only at the tabernacle (Lev. xvii. 1 sqq.) after Deuteronomy, or after the exile, according to Dillmann, is "simple nonsense." It must have come into existence during the wanderings in the wilderness. A comparison of Deut. xiv. 3-20 and Lev. xi 3-23 shows that Deuteronomy either was written a short time before Josiah's reforms. There are serious objections (Deut. iii. 2). This book contains, at any rate, the body of Deuteronomy; for the words of chap. xxviii explain Huldah's utterances, and the contents of the book as a whole explain Josiah's reforms. And how does it occur that the book received such rapid and universal recognition? There must have been some external causation. Did Hilkiah attest it? But, according to the new theory of Hebrew life, the book of Josiah, if it had been written, have been very unwellcome to the priests at Jerusalem; yet they and Hilkiah co-operate to spread the authority of the book. This fact is a convincing proof that it already enjoyed irresistible authority at the time of its discovery. Dr. Green aptly says (Presbyterian Review for January, 1882, p. 266) "If Josiah's reforms had been made before, how easily and amicably the whole Irish question might be settled!" From the words of Isa. ix. 19, "In that day shall there be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar (mazzebah) at the border thereof," — W. Robertson Smith (Old Testament, etc., p. 354) draws the conclusion that Deuteronomy could not have been written before Isaiah. But Deut. xvi. 21, 22, only condemns idolatrous mazzebot ("pillars"), and herein agrees with acknowledged old passages (Exod. xxiii. 13). Moses himself erected twelve mazzebot at the side of the altar (Exod. xxiv. 4)! Here we find grounds again to justify us in holding that Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii. 4) recognized the binding character of the injunction of a central altar, and hence recognized the authority of Deuteronomy. Further: much of the contents of Deuteronomy is inconsistent with the theory of its origin just before the reforms of Josiah. The book speaks in a friendly way of Egypt (xxiii. 8). How different is the tone of Isaiah (xxx. 1 sqq., etc.) and Jeremiah (li. 18, 36)! It speaks in a similar way of Edom (xxiii. 8), and condemns Moab and Ammon (xxiv. 9, 10). Josiah's policy was just reversed in Jer. lix. 17, 18, lviii. 47, lxii. 6. What was the appropriateness, in Josiah's time, of the injunctions against the extermination of the Canaanites (Deut. xx. 16-18) and the Amalekites (xxv. 17-19), and in favor of conquests and war (xx. 10-20) and how could the legislation for the throne (xvii.) have originated so late? W. Robertson Smith (Old Testament, etc.) and Jeremiah (ii. 18, 36)! Itspeaks in a friendly way of Egypt(xxiii. 8). The language of "P," especially as regardsthe law of holiness, could be composed with changes in this regard. It speaks in a similar way of Edom (xxiii. 8), and condemns Moab and Ammon (xxiv. 9, 10). Josiah's policy was just reversed in Jer. lix. 17, 18, lviii. 47, lxii. 6. What was the appropriateness, in Josiah's time, of the injunctions against the extermination of the Canaanites (Deut. xx. 16-18) and the Amalekites (xxv. 17-19), and in favor of conquests and war (xx. 10-20) and how could the legislation for the throne (xvii.) have originated so late?
PENTATEUCH.

1796

PENTATEUCH.

1870, 2d ed. under the title D. Anfänge d. heil. Gesch. etc., 1877 (valuable for homiletical purposes). — Commentaries on other books: [MURPHY: Exodus, Andover, 1867; LEVITICUS, Andover, 1872.]; J. GERHARD: Deuteronomy, Jena, 1857; SCHRODER: Leviticus, Andover, 1871. — Books of the Pentateuch: DIESTEL: D. Segen Jakob's in Gen., Xilz., Braunsch, 1853; HENGSTENBERG: D. Gesch. Bileam u. s. Weissagungen, Berlin, 1842; OORT: De Pericope Num. xxii.-xxiv., Leiden, 1860; VOLK: Mosi canonicus cyanem. Nordl., 1861; KAMPHAUSEN: D. Lied Moses' Deut. xxiii., Leipzig, 1852 (331 pp.); GRAF: D. Segen Moses', Leipzig, 1857; VOLK: Der Segen Moses Deut. xxxii., Erlangen, 1873 (194 pp.). — Historical works: KÜHLER: Lehrbuch d. Bibl. Gesch. A. Test's, Erlangen, 1875; HENGSTENBERG: Gesch. d. Reiches Gottes, etc., Berlin, 1869-70, 2 vols.; EGYPT AND THE BOOKS OF Mose's, Berlin, 1841; [ENG. trans. by R. D. C. ROBBINS, Andover, 1843]; EBERS: Egyypten u. d. Bücher Mose's, Leipzig, 1868; SCHRADER: D. Keilinschriften u. d. A. T., Giessen, 1868, 2d ed., 1892; MICHAELIS: Monarchisches Recht, 2d ed., Frankfurt, 1871-72, 6 vols.; F. H. RANKER: Untersuchungen u. d. Pentat., Erlangen, 1834-40, 2 vols.; KEIL: Introduction to the Old Testament, [Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1869, 2 vols.]. — The historical and critical theory has been defended by RIEHM: Die Gesetzgebung Mosis im Lande Moab, Gotha, 1854; SCHRADER: Studien zur Kritik u. Erklärung d. bibl. Urgeschichte Gen. i.-zi., Zürich, 1863; Ewald: History of Israel, [Eng. trans., London, 1871-79, 5 vols.]; KÜHLER: Bibel und Geschichte, Eislefeld and Leipzig, 1872; BISHOP COLenso: The Pentateuch and Book of Joshua critically examined, London, 1862-79, 7 parts. — Advocates of the Graf-Wellhausen theory: GRAF: D. geschichtl. Bücher d. A. Test., Leipzig, 1886; KÜHNEN: De Godesdienst van Israel, etc., Harlem, 1869, 1870, 2 vols. — Historical works: KOHLER: Lehrbuch d. Bibl. Gesch. A. Test's, Erlands., etc., Berlin, 1873 (194 pp.). — The Pentateuch was more comprehensive than "the law of Moses," and that it was the same as "the book" referred to in Exod. xvii. 14, and contained whatever else Moses wrote in connection with the law; which was very generally been understood to affirm that the entire volume of the Pentateuch, known in later times as "the law of Moses," was now completed by the addition of Deuteronomy. That is what these words really meant in the interpretation of the writer may be inferred (1) From the interpretation put upon them in the Book of Joshua, which stands in so obvious and intimate a relation to Deuteronomy, that it cannot misrepresent its meaning in this particular. — This Book of the Law (Josh. i. 8) contained (ver. 7) "all the law which Moses commanded" and the commands of Moses by which Joshua was guided were not limited to Deuteronomy; thus, v. 13 ff., iv. 12, xxii. 2 ff., drawn from Num. xxxii., xi. 2, from Gen. xvii. 10, vv. 10, 11, from Exod. xii. 6, Lev. xxiii. 5, xiv. 1, 2, from Num. xxxi., xxxii., xxxiii., xxxiv., xxxv., xxxvi., xxxvii., xxxviii., xix., xx. Thus it is not improbable, from viii. 31-34, that "the Book of the Law of Moses" was more comprehensive than "the law of Moses," and that it was the same as "the book" referred to in Exod. xvii. 14, and contained whatever else Moses wrote in connection with the law; which is further confirmed by the fact, that a record made by Joshua himself was written in "The Book of the Law "(Josh. xxiv. 26). (2) The volume written by Moses was to be read to the people at the feast of tabernacles (Neh. viii., where vers. 14 ff. show that Ezra understood Lev. xxiii. 40-42 to be included), and to be laid up beside the ark, and preserved in the sanctuary (2 Kings xxii. 8); and this has commonly been understood to be the entire Pentateuch. Accordingly, not a few of those who deny that Moses wrote the Pentateuch, nevertheless admit that the words in question were intended to assert that he did.

But, if we give these words the most restricted sense that can possibly be put upon them, they cannot mean less than that Moses wrote the laws contained in Deut. xii.-xxvi. Exod. xxiv. 4, in like manner, affirms that Moses wrote chaps. xx.-xxiii., which is styled (ver 7) "The Book of the Covenant." In Exod. xxxx. 27 he is commanded to write vers. 10-26. All the laws scattered through Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, are expressly declared in detail to have been given by God to Moses, and by him delivered to the people. The occasion upon which these statutes were severally enacted, the circumstances which called them forth, and the actual observance in the time of Moses, are in many cases recorded in detail. Moreover, these laws bear the impress of the age and the region to which they are referred. The law of the passover (Exod. xii.) was given when each father of a family was priest in his own house; and at one time. Had they been preserved orally, changes would insensibly have been made in their language, to adapt them to the altered situation of the people after they should be settled in Canaan. The other laws in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, mostly concern the cultus, and give detailed directions from time to time, as occasion demanded, respecting the sanctuary, the priesthood, and the ritual. Deutoronomy is a solemn incalculation of the law upon which the people by Moses, in public addresses at the close of his life, immediately prior to their entrance into Canaan.

The contents of these several bodies of law are determined by their respective purpose. Their detailed regulations are given in Leviticus respecting matters not alluded to at all in Deuteronomy, or, only summarily referred to, is not because the former is a subsequent development from the latter, or because it belongs to a period when a new class of subjects engaged public attention. It belonged to the priests to conduct the ceremonial. While it was important for the people to be instructed how to distinguish clean and unclean meats (Deut. xiv. 3ff., comp. Lev. xi.), since this entered into their daily life, it was sufficient, in respect to leprosy, for instance, to admonish them, in the general (Deut. xxiv. 8), to heed the injunctions already given to the priests (Lev. xiii., xiv.). It was enough for them to be told where to bring their various offerings (Deut. xii. 6), and that the animal must be without blemish (xvii. 1). The specifications respecting them (Lev. xxvii. 19-25), and the ritual to be observed (Lev. i.-vii.), were intrusted to the priests.

It was quite natural that some modifications of the pre-existing laws should be made in Deuteronomy after the lapse of nearly forty years, whether with the view of rendering them more explicit (Exod. xxii. 2ff., comp. Deut. xv. 12, 17; Exod. xxii. 23, comp. Deut. xxii. 19, 20; Exod. xxii. 26, comp. Deut. xxiv. 10-13; Exod. xxiii. 31, comp. Deut. xxiv. 21), or for the sake of a further extension of the same principle (Exod. xxiii. 10ff., comp. Deut. xv. 1ff.), or because rendered necessary by the transition from the wilderness to Canaan (Lev. xvii. 3, 4, comp. Deut. xii. 15; Exod. xxii. 30, comp. Deut. xv. 19, 20; the omission of Lev. xi. 21, 22 from Deut. xiv.). No objection of any moment can be drawn from the fact that many of the laws are framed with reference to the condition of the people after they should be settled in Canaan (Exod. xxii. 5, 29, xxiii. 10 ff.); for in most cases their very terms imply that this was prospective (Lev. xiv. 34, xxv. 1; Deut. xii. 1, xix. 14). Some laws have been represented as mutually inconsistent, which really relate to distinct matters, and supplement, instead of contradicting, each other. Thus the titles of Deut. xii. 17, xxvi. 2ff., are frequently criticized, as Lev. xxvii. 24; Deut. xviii. 3 is distinct from Lev. vii. 34; Num. iv. 3 belongs to the transportation of the tabernacle; viii. 24, to its ordinary ministrations. And in general it may be said, that all alleged discrepancies admit of satisfactory explanation.

There is no divergence in the laws of the Pentateuch in respect to the altar. Exod. xx. 24, as Professor Strack correctly observes in the preceding article, gives no sanction to a simultaneous plurality of altars. In Leviticus, priestly duties are assigned by name to Aaron and his sons as the officiating persons. Deuteronomy, which mainly respects the future, describes the priests by the tribes to which they belonged, as Levitical priests; but it neither asserts nor implies, as has sometimes been maintained, that every Levite was entitled to discharge priestly functions. Leviticus has, of course, fuller details in respect to the feasts and the ritual than Deuteronomy; but there is no disagreement between them.

That, however, the Book of Joshua implies the existence and observance of the Mosaic law of sanctuary was, therefore, necessarily in abeyance; but there is no disagreement between them.

It should be observed here, that history cannot be expected to record the regular observance of established institutions. This is taken for granted, and rarely referred to, except incidentally, or for the purpose of mentioning instances of their violation. That, however, the Book of Joshua implies the existence and observance of the entire Mosaic law, is universally confessed. Judges speaks of but one house of Jehovah (xix. 18), and this located at Shiloh (xviii. 31); of the annual feast there (xxi. 19); of Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, as a priest (xx. 28). Though the contrary practice of good men makes the existence of such a law insupportable and impossible.

There is accordingly, no such diversity in the laws as conflicts with their having been given by Moses, and recorded by him. And the objection from the post-Mosaic history and writings is equally unfounded. It is said that the history affords no evidence of a law restricting sacrifice to one altar, or priestly functions to the family of Aaron, until long after the time of Moses, and that the contrary practice of good men makes the existence of such a law insupportable and impossible.

While thus the regular course of the history establishes the existence of the Mosaic law of sanctuary and of the priesthood, all apparent anomalies are readily explicable. Sacrifices in the presence of the ark (Judg. xx. 26, 27, xxi. 4; 1 Sam. vi. 15) were not irregular. The phrase "before God" (Josh. xxix. 1), or "before the Lord" (Judg. xxvii. 31), is a metaphor for a manifestation of a place of stated worship. "The sanctuary of the Lord" at Shechem (Josh. xxix. 26) was not a building erected for sacrifice,— for the oak was "in it," not "by it" (as the Authorized Version has it), — but a spot hallowed by its associations (Gen. xii. 7, xxiii. 18, 20, xxv. 4). The sacrifices at Bochim (Judg. ii. 1-5), by Gideon (vi. 20-29) and by Manoah (xix. 19, 20), were occasioned by the appearances of the angel of Jehovah. These extraordinary manifestations occurred elsewhere than at the tabernacle, since they were called forth by emergencies not adequately met by the ordinary means of divine communication. From the capture of the ark by the Philistines to the time of the return to Jerusalem by David, there was no longer a sanctuary, which was the habitation of him who dwelt between the cherubim (1 Sam. ii. 32-36; Ps. lxxviii. 60, 63; Jer. vii. 12, 14, xvi. 6, 9). The law of the sanctuary was, therefore, necessarily in abeyance: and Samuel, as God's immediate representative, both as a Levite and king, did not always succeed in impressing them. Elijah's sacrifice on Carmel (1 Kings xviii. 23 ff.) was offered by divine command (ver. 36); and the unrebuked altars in the northern kingdom (1 Kings xviii. 30, xix. 10, 14) were erected by those who were debarred from going up to the temple at Jerusalem.

To the psalmists, from David onward, God's sole dwelling-place is Zion; and they make frequent mention of the law, which David speaks of as "written in the volume of the book" (Ps. xli. 7). The older prophets make frequent allusions to the ceremonial and other laws, and denounce the innovations of the northern kingdom. Hos. viii. 12 refers to an extensive written law.

There are, accordingly, abundant traces of the Mosaic legislation, from the days of Moses downward; and there is no reason to discredit its claim to have been delivered and written by Moses himself. If the laws are from the pen of Moses, who was the entire Pentateuch. For in the first place, there is an integral portion of the Pentateuch, and have done so ever since the time of Ezra, when it is confessed that "The Book of the Law of Moses" (Neh. viii. 1) was the name given to the Pentateuch in its present form, which was thus attributed to Moses as its author. A book bearing this same name is spoken of on the return of the exiles (Ezra. xi. 2), as existing in the reign of Josiah (2 Kings xxii. 8, xxiii. 24, 25), of Amaziah (xvi. 4), of David and Solomon (xxi. 8; 1 Kings ii. 3), in the time of the judges (Judg. iii. 4) and of Joshua (i. 7, 8). Unless decisive reasons can be adduced to the contrary, this must be held to be the same book.

2. There is no historical evidence or intimation that the pentateuchal laws ever existed separate from the rest of the Pentateuch, with which they are closely interwoven; the whole forming a unit in plan, purpose, and theme. If Moses wrote the laws, the entire Pentateuch, as traditionally ascribed to him, must likewise be conceded to be his, unless there are valid reasons to the contrary. The Book of Deuteronomy consists of three addresses by Moses to the people (i.-iv. 40, v.-xxvi., xxvii.-xxx.) and an historical appendix (xxxv.-xxxvii.). These addresses are intimately related to one another and to the laws which are included in the second address; the aim of the whole being to urge Israel to obey these laws. The style and language are identical; one spirit reigns throughout; and like recurring phrases frequently reappear. The whole tends to inculcate the unity of the moral body of the book (i.-xxx.), and to Moses as its author, are of the most trivial description. In the appendix, Moses is expressly said to have written the song (xxxii.), and to have spoken the blessing (xxxiii.). That he did not write chap. xxxiv. is plain from its contents. Whether he wrote, or did not write, any portion of chap. xxxi., and if so, at what precise point he laid down the pen, and it was taken up by his successor, it might be difficult to determine; and fortunately this is wholly immaterial.

The laws in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, are so intimately blended with the history as to be inseparable. Whoever wrote them must of necessity have written the other likewise. And Genesis is plainly conceived and written as introductory to the Mosaic history and legislation. In fact, one consistent topic and method of treatment is pursued throughout the Pentateuch; the genealogies are continuous, and mutually supplementary; a consistent chronology is maintained; there are examples of transference from one period to another; what is found in other portions by way of anticipation or reminiscence, which bind all together. And even the alleged gaps in the history during the sojourn in Egypt, and the greater portion of the wanderings in the wilderness, only make more manifest how rigorously the plan of the entire work is adhered to.

3. Moses is expressly said, not only to have written laws, but, in two instances at least, historical incidents as well (Exod. xvii. 14; Num. xxxiii. 2); which shows both that matters designed for permanent preservation were committed to writing, and that Moses was the proper person to do it. The statement respecting Ama- sel was to be written for "a memorial in the book," which suggests a continuous work that Moses was preparing, or had in contemplation, and which would better insure its preservation than a separate fugitive record. That the explicit mention of writing in these instances does not justify the inference that he wrote nothing further, is shown from the analogy of xxx. 8; Jer. xxx. 2; Ezek. xliii. 11; Hab. ii. 2.

4. The alleged inconsistencies and statements, implying a later date than that of Moses, are capable of a ready solution. There are only a very few isolated passages, which it is necessary to assume have been added or modified at a subsequent time; e.g., Gen. xxxvi. 31 ff.

5. There are frequent allusions to the pentateuchal history in post-Mosaic writings, which not only confirm its truth, but by their evident verbal allusions, in some instances at least, imply its existence in written form. Joshua is throughout based on the entire antecedent narrative (Judg. i. 10, 20, comp. Num. xiii. 22, xiv. 24; Judg. xii. 15-26, comp. Num. xx. 14 ff., xxxi. 2 ff.). See also Judg. ii. 1-3, 7, iv. 11 (Num. x. 29). v. 4, 5, vi. 8-10, 13; Ruth iv. 11, 12, 18 ff.; I Sam. ii. 27, 28, xii. 6, 8, xv. 2, 6, 29 (Num. xxxiii. 19); 2 Sam. vii. 22, 23-24; in the Davidean Psalms, such allusions as Ps. viii. to Gen. i.; xi. 6 to Gen. xix. 24; xxxix. 10, ex. 4. In the prophetic it will be sufficient to refer to the following passages in Hosea: i. 10 (comp. Gen. xxii. 17, xxxii. 12). xi. 8 (comp. Deut. xxix. 23; Gen. xiv. 2). xii. 3, 4, 12, xi. 1, xii. 8, xiii. 4-6 (Deut. vii. 12-14). xiv. 3, 18, ix. 3 (comp. Deut. xxviii. 65). ix. 10, xii. 5 (comp. Gen. xxvii. 16). i. 2 comp. Exod. xxxiv. 15, 16 (iv. 10 (comp. xxxv. 26).

6. The language of the Pentateuch is throughout the Hebrew of the purest period, with no trace of later words, or forms, or constructions, or of the Chaldaism of the exile. The archaisms for שׁלום ("she"). יָּעָשׁ ("girl"), are peculiar to the Pentateuch. It always uses יָּד ("laugh"), never מָלַע ("fine linen"), never מָעַע ("afflict the soul"), never מָשָׁא ("fast"), nor the later derivative מָשָׁא ("fast"), מָשָׁא ("shewbread"), never מָשָׁא ("kingdom"), never מָשָׁא, מָשָׁא, or מָשָׁא, etc.

7. The familiarity with Egyptian objects and institutions shown by the writer, and presupposed in the people, as this has been exhibited in detail, particularly by Hengstenberg and by Ebers, is most readily explicable in the Mosaic period.

8. The doctrine of the Pentateuch show that it belongs to the earliest period of the Old Testament. Its teachings respecting the Messiah, divine retribution, angels, the evil spirit, and the future state, are of the most elementary nature. In respect to all these points, a great advance is made in the Psalms and other poetical books, and in the prophets. Its account of the creation, the fall, and the deluge, while uncontaminated by any Pagan or polytheistic conceptions, has, nevertheless, such points of contact with old Assyrian myths as establish its very high antiquity. Some of the Mosaic laws had already been expanded by usage at an early period of the history; as that of levirate marriage in Ruth, the Nazarite in Samson, and the consecration of the first-born in Samuel. The service of the sanctuary was enlarged by music and by courses of priests under David, and its vessels multiplied under Solomon; and the prophetic order, of which the Pentateuch speaks as still future, superseded the priestly responses, for which it made provision.

The Pentateuch outlines rites, but suggests no explanation; this was a matter of subsequent reflection, as respecting sacrifice (Ps. xi.; Isa. liii.), purifications (Ps. xxxvi. 6, li. 7), insecence (Ps. exiil. 2), the privileges of God's house (Ps. xxvii. 4), the comparative value of ritual and spiritual worship (Ps. i. 8 ff.; li. 16, 17, Isa. i. 11 ff.).

9. An argument has sometimes been drawn from the Samaritan Pentateuch, under the impression that it must have been derived from copies existing in Israel prior to the schism of Jeroboam; since the Samaritans would not have adopted it from the Jews, on account of the bitter feud between them. Nor would the northern kingdom, from which the Samaritans must have obtained it, have accepted from the hostile kingdom of Judah a volume of laws which was in open contradiction with both the worship and the civil polity existing among themselves. But, inasmuch as the grievance of the Samaritans lay in the refusal of the Jews to recognize them as their brethren (Ex. iv. 1–3), the former coveted whatever would lend support to their claim. Hence their temple, modelled after that at Jerusalem. Hence their doctrines and traditions, borrowed from the Jews, on account of the bitter feud between them. Nor would the northern kingdom, that it must have derived from copies existing among themselves. But, inasmuch as the grievance of the Samaritans lay in the refusal of the Jews to recognize them as their brethren (Ex. iv. 1–3), the former coveted whatever would lend support to their claim. Hence their temple, modelled after that at Jerusalem. Hence their doctrines and traditions, borrowed from the Jews.

But the existence and authority of the Pentateuch in the kingdom of Israel, from the time of the schism, can be established by a different line of argument. The prophets of the ten tribes, Hosea and Amos, make frequent appeals to “the law,” which was a written law of ten thousand precepts (Hos. xii. 1; xv. 1), and a covenant (xvi. 4); and the people are charged with gross criminality for disobeying it. The ceremonial which they describe, the statutes to which they refer, and the events to which they allude, are precisely those which are found in the Pentateuch. Attributing reasons can be given for supposing the volume of which they speak to be any other than the Pentateuch itself, which is thus shown to have been possessed of incontrovertible divine authority among those who had the strongest reasons for denying its binding obligation if they could.

10. The testimony of our Lord, and of the inspired writers of the New Testament, is in various passages unequivocally given to the Mosaic origin and authority of the law that bears his name, and which is indifferently denominated “The Law of Moses,” “The Book of Moses,” and “Moses.” It thus peremptorily waives aside any theory which makes the statutes of the Pentateuch, in whole or in part, the product of a later age. The Pentateuch is further, by fair implication, attributed to the pen of Moses. Jesus says to the Jews, concerning Moses (John v. 46, 47), “He wrote of me,” and, without further explanation, refers them to “his writings,” as something well known, and in their possession, and which they should believe. Wherein in the same Gospel (i. 45), “Moses in the law,” as well as the prophets, wrote concerning Jesus. The contrast with the prophets shows that it is the entire Pentateuch, and not its legal sections merely, which is here referred to. The same is the case in Luke xxiv. 27, where our Lord, “beginning at Moses and all the prophets, expounded unto them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself” (comp. Acts xxviii. 23). There is New Testament authority for understanding in a Messianic sense the protovangelium (Rom. xvi. 20), the promises to the patriarchs (John viii. 56; Gal. iii. 16), the blessing of Judah (Heb. vii. 14), the account of Melchisedec (Heb. vii.), the ladder of Jacob (John i. 51), the paschal lamb (John xix. 36), the daily sacrifice (John i. 29), the sin-offering (Heb. xii. 11, 12), the day of atonement (Heb. ix. 7), the whole system of sacrifices and lustrations (Heb. ix. 13, x.), the high priest (Heb. viii. 1), the water from the rock (1 Cor. x. 4), the prophet like unto Moses (Acts iii. 22). These, and other things of like nature, are written “in the law,” or “in Moses,” concerning Christ, and are designated by our Lord as written by Moses himself. It is not to be supposed that he makes here the special revelations of a fact or knowledge, in his own omniscience,—that Moses wrote the Messianic passages, and nothing more. But Christ affirms that Moses wrote them, because he was the well-known author of the Pentateuch, which contained them. This explicit assertion of Mosaic authorship gives the key to the proper understanding of other passages, which, taken singly, might have been susceptible of a different interpretation, but, viewed in this light, afford it abundant corroboration.

There is, accordingly, nothing to contradict, but much to confirm, the idea, which has come down from the earliest times, that Moses is the author of the Pentateuch; unless a fatal objection is to be found in the fact that it is composed of a diversity of documents. There is no space here for an examination of that hypothesis, or of the grounds on which it rests. Some things are plausibly said in its favor, but there are serious objections to it which have never yet been removed. I cannot regard it as certainly established even in the Book of Joshua, much less in the remainder of the Pentateuch, where even Bleek confessed he could no longer under the Elohist from the Jehovah: the second Elohist he could not find anywhere. Thus much, at least, may be safely said: the criteria of this proposed analysis are so subtle, not to say mechanical, in their nature, so many purely conjectural assumptions are involved, and the entire absence of external corroborative testimony, that no reliance can be placed in its conclusions, where these conflict with statements of the history itself. Genesis may be made up of various documents, and yet have been compiled by Moses. And the same thing is possible, even in the later books of the Pentateuch. If they could be successfully partitioned among different writers, on the score of variety in the literary execution, why may not these have been engaged, jointly with Moses himself, in preparing, each his appointed portion, and the whole have been finally reduced by Moses to its present form, and issued with his sanction and authority? Even the assertion that the pentateuchal documents still be traced in the Book of Joshua creates no serious difficulty. If Joshua and Eleazar, or any of their contemporaries, had a hand in the preparation of the Mosaic history and legislation, why might they not continue their work, and record what occurred after Moses was taken away? The real difficulty of the Pentateuch and Joshua lies in the subject, and not in identity of authorship. The conquest and settlement of Canaan is the end contemplated in the promises made to the patriarchs and in the whole course of the subsequent history; but it no more follows that the same pen recorded the whole than that one leader both conducted Israel out of Egypt, and brought them into the possession of Canaan. The coincidences in thought and expression between Joshua and the Pentateuch arise simply from the circumstance that the former records the execution of commands and the fulfilment of promises given in the latter, and these are naturally repeated in exact language. It simply shows that the actors in these events, and the writer of the book, had the Pentateuch before them, and carefully followed it.

As the ark of the covenant is the voucher for the unity of the sanctuary, and for the genuineness of the Mosaic legislation respecting it, so the contents of that ark form no insignificant bulwark for the unity of the Pentateuch. If monumental evidence is to be trusted, the Decalogue is Mosaic, and is preserved in Exod. xx. in its genuine authentic form. The critics assign it to the Jehovist, and claim for it the characteristics of Deuteronomy; and thus the peculiar phrases of Deuteronomy; and the reason annexed to the Fourth Commandment is based on the Elohist account of the creation (Gen. i. 1-ii. 3). This unquestionably Mosaic document includes Elohist, Jehovist, and Deuteronomist all in one.

W. HENRY GREEN.

PENTECOST. (a) The Jewish (πεντακόσιη, rabbinical נ práctica, cf. Joseph., Bell. Jud., 2, 3, 1). Among the ancient Israelites it was the second of their three pilgrimage festivals, and marked the conclusion of the harvest period with the passover, fifty days before. For reasons assigned in Lev. xxiii. 15 sq., it is usually called the "Feast of Weeks." Cf. Deut. xvi. 10. The fullest description is found in Lev. xxiii. 15-21, and Num. xxvii. 26-31, according to which, the chief offering made by the whole people shall consist in "two wave loaves" salted, brought "out of your habitations." Concerning preparations of these, cf. Exod. xxxiv. 22; Joseph., Antiqv., III. 10, 6. According to Mishna, Menachoth, 11, 4, the length of this bread was to be seven hand-breadths; its breadth, four; and its "horns" (יו י ARTICLE), the breadth of seven fingers. An analogy is found in the ἄρρος of the Greek sacrifice. In addition to this bread, Lev. xxiii. 15 sqq. presents further offerings. Cf. also Num. xxvii. 27 sqq. and, on the later practice, Joseph., Antiqv. 3, 10, 6. In addition to the public offerings, there were also some of a private character. Cf. Num. xxviii. 26; Deut. xvi. 10-12. The manner of bringing these to Jerusalem is described in Mishna, Bikkurim, 5, 2 sqq. The law restricted the Pentecost festival to one day, to be kept holy (Lev. xxiii. 21, xxvii. 26). Joseph., Antiqv., III. 10, 6, says it was called Ανάμειξη (אנמיה;), in Hebrew, and it is really called thus in the Mishna; the Pentateuch, however, preferring other designations. Cf. Lev. xxiii. 36, and Deut. xvi. 8.

The word τευτον used in this last passage, does not signify the "Feast of Tabernacles," and thus has nothing to do with the λειτουργία of the LXX., nor with the לאו "לאו " of rabbinical literature. This festival, mentioned but once in the historical books (2 Chron. viii. 13), was purely of an agrarian nature,—thanksgiving for the grain harvest, as the Feast of Tabernacles is for the fruit harvest. Only in post-biblical times did it receive an historical basis and connection. Philo, Josephus, and the older portions of the Talmud, know nothing of it. Since Maimonides (More Nebuchim, 3, 43), Pentecost is regarded as the memorial festival of the giving of the law on Sinai. This is in Lev. xxii. 27, 28; cf. Philo, BURGER: Real-EncykI des Judenthums, 1. 1057 sq.; SCHRODER: Satzungen u. Gebrauch d. talmudisch-rabbinischen Judenthums, pp. 216 sqq., and, for the literature, the art. PASSOVER. VON ORELI.

(b) The Christian. Among the Christians, Pentecost is the third of the chief festivals, closing the cycle of the festivals referring to the Lord, and thus separating the Semestre Domini and the Semestre Ecclesiae. It is connected with its Jewish predecessor, not only historically, through the events recorded in Acts vii., but also internally, being early regarded as a festival of thanksgiving for the first-fruits of the Spirit (Rom. viii. 23; cf. Augustine, Ep. 54 ad Januar.). Originally the term "Pentecost" is purely liturgical, fifty days, from Easter to the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. It is thus used by Tertullian, De Idolatr., c. 12; by Origen, Contra Cels., vii. 22; by the Antiochian Synod of 341, in canon 20; by Basil the Great, De Sp. Sancto, c. 27, Const. App. V. 20, and the Ordo Romanus. In contrast to Lent, there is no fasting during Pentecost. There, prayers were spoken while in a standing posture. In addition, this joyful period was marked by a cessation of theatre and circus exhibitions, and by increased ceremonies and liturgy in the church services.

In a narrower sense, as designating the last day of this quinquagesimal period, the word "Pentecost" is first found in a canon of the Council of Elvira, 305; cf. Labbe, Concill. I. 975. On the importance of this σημειον τορίας cf. Euseb., De Vita Const., IV. 64. Gregory of Naz., Oral. XLIV. de Pentec., honors it as ἡμέρα τοῦ πνεύματος; and Chrysostom, Hom. 11. de Pentec., as μαρτύριον τοῦ ἱεράτου. Cf. also Augustine, Ep. 64 ad Januar. c. Faust., I. xxvii. 22; Basil the Great, De Sp. Sancto, c. 27; Concil. Agath, a. 506 can. 18, 31 sqq. At an early period already the days around Pentecost were also regarded with especial honor; but, from the eighth century down, these festivals began to be curtailed, and the Protestant Church of to-day celebrates only two Pentecost days.

Because it was customary to wear white garments on Pentecost, this day is called Whitsunday, and the whole period Whitsuntide. The older literature is found in Augusti: Denkwürdigkeiten, ii. 884 sqq.; GUERKE: Lehrbuch der christ.-künstl. Archäologie, pp. 190-196. For later, cf. NILES (S. J.): Kalendarium manuale urbisque Ecclesiae, etc. (1883), tom. ii. pp. 270 sqq., 431 sqq.

PERATAE. See Gnosticism, p. 881.

PERCY, Thomas, D.D., Bishop of Dromore, County Down, Ireland; b. at Bridgnorth, Shropshire, England, April 13, 1728; d. at Dromore, Sept. 50, 1811. His fame rests upon his Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (1768); which work was edited by him in 1775. He was, in consequence of this publication, advanced in the church, being made chaplain-in-ordinary to the king, 1769, Dean of Carlisle, 1778, and Bishop PEREA. Antonio de Figueiredo, b. at Macao, Feb. 14, 1725; d. in Lisbon, Aug. 14, 1797. He was educated by the Jesuits at Villa-Visosa, but refused to become a member of the order; entered the society of the Fathers of the Oratory; devoted himself to art and literature, and attracted much attention by his Exercicios da lingua latina e portuguesa (1751) and his Novo Metodo da grammatica latina (1752). In the contest between Don Josè I. and the Ultramontanist party, he threw himself with violence on the royal side; wrote Doctrina veteris ecclesiae, etc. (1765), Tentativa theologica (1789), both translated into French; obtained a high position in the government; and became a member, afterwards president, of the Academy of Sciences. The list of his works numbers a hundred and sixty-nine. It is a translation of the Bible into Portuguese, originally published in Lisbon (1778-90, 23 vols.), which the British and Foreign Bible Society circulates.

PERFECTIONISM. Calvinists and Lutherans deny any perfection in this life; but there are three theories in the other branches of the Christian Church upon this subject, advocated by Roman and Greek Catholics, Wesleyan Arminians, and Friends respectively. There is also the theory of the Oberlin school of theology. (1) Roman Catholics teach that the observance of God's commands is possible for one who is justified. His sins are venial, not mortal. He may even offer an obedience beyond the demands of the law. Yet his venial sins compel him to use the petition, "Forgive us our debts." In some cases, by a special privilege of God, he may avoid all sins. Cf. Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent, sess. vi. chap. xi. and can. 29, 25; Schaff, Creeds, ii. pp. 100-102, 115. (2) Wesleyan Arminians teach a perfection which is not angelic, Adamic, nor absolute, but one that is relative; i.e., "according to the special economy introduced by the atonement, in which the heart, being sanctified, fulfills the law by love." "The highest perfection," says Wesley, "which man can attain while the soul dwells in the body does not exclude ignorance and error and a thousand infirmities." This is what is styled Christian perfection. Its source is the grace of God; its fruit, freedom "from all unholy tempers, self-will, pride, anger, sinful thoughts." (3) The Friends teach, in the case of the justified, "The body of death and sin comes to be crucified and removed, and their hearts united, and subjected unto the truth, so as not to obey any suggestion or temptation of the Evil One, but to be free from actual sinning, and transgressing of the law of God, and in that respect perfect. Yet doth this perfection still admit of a growth; and there remaineth a possibility of sinning where the mind doth not most diligently and watchfully attend unto the Lord." — Eighth prop. Confession of the Society of Friends. Cf. Schaff, Creeds, iii. pp. 974, 975. (4) The Oberlin school of theology teaches, that "as virtue and sin belong only to voluntary action, and are contradictory in their nature, they cannot co-exist in the soul. The beginning of the Christian life is entire obedience. Every lapse into sin involves, for the time, the entire interruption of obedience. The promises of God and the provisions of the gospel are such, that, when fully and continuousley embraced, they enable the believer to live a life of uninterrupted obedience, — an attainment which may be properly encouraged and expected in the present life." Cf. art. NEW-ENGLAND THEOLOGY, 5, p. 1837.

LIT. — See, for the Calvinistic side, HODGE: Systematic Theology, iii. (245 pp.); VAN OOSTER-ZEE: Christian Dogmatics, ii. p. 681. For the Wesleyan-Arminian side, see WESELY: Plain Account of Christian Perfection; FLETCHER: Christian Perfection. For the Oberlin side, see FINNEY: Systematic Theology; FAIRCHILD: On the Doctrine of Sanctification, in Congregational Quarterly, April, 1870.

PER'DAMON, properly PER'QAMUM (Rev. i. 11, ii. 12-17), the seat of one of the seven churches of Asia, a celebrated city of Teuthraia, Great Mysia, on the north side of the Caicus, about three miles from the Ægean Sea. The city began as a fortress upon the acropolis, and early obtained a sacred character. There Lysimachus, a general of Alexander the Great, stored his stolen treasure, which amounted to nine thousand talents. After the death of Philistarchus of Tium, a eunuch, whom he implicitly trusted, faithlessly appropriated the money, in revenge for ill-treatment by Lysimachus' wife, declared himself independent, and thus laid the foundation for a long-continued prosperity, B.C. 283. Under the house of Attalus, the city was beautified, and its territory extended. Pergamum was also a literary centre, and boasted of a library of two hundred thousand rolls, which was finally moved to Alexandria, as a gift of Antony to Cleopatra, and thus destroyed. The word "parchment" is derived from the Latin charta pergamina ("paper of Pergamum"). The city was renowned for its Æsculapian worship, as the birthplace of celebrated physicians (chief of whom was Galen), as the seat of a famous medical school, indeed, of a university, as a bathing-place, and also for its idolatry and gladiatorial shows. Here, however, Christianity made one of its first triumphs, and here some of the first blood was shed for Christ. It is probably to this persecution that the allusion "Satan's throne" (Rev. ii. 13, cf. 10) refers.

In the second century A.D., Pergamum had a population of a hundred and twenty thousand. To-day it is called Bergama; and the population is from twenty thousand to thirty thousand, of whom two thousand are Christians, the rest Mohammedans. Many ruins attest its former magnificence, but none of them anticipate the Roman period (130 B.C.).

PERICOPES (περικόπαι), or the sections of Holy Scripture appointed to be read in the services of the church, for many reasons deserve the consideration which older theology already has bestowed upon them. They belong to the distinguishing characteristics of the cultus of the religion of revelation, in its testatory character. Their history forms an interesting chapter in pastoral theology, and they possess an archeological importance. In this discussion they will be considered historically.
PERICOPES.

1. The employment of pericopes in the church originated in the forms of worship in the synagogue. The Scriptures themselves command that the law shall be publicly read (Deut. xxxi. 10-13) for the instruction of the people. Cf. also Josephus, c. Ap., ii. 17. When synagogues were built, this public reading formed a portion of the regular sabbath services. Cf. Acts xv. 21. With the reading of the law, was already, in Christ's day, associated the reading of the prophets. Cf. Luke iv. 16, 17; Acts xiii. 15. Both have been retained to the present day. The sections of the law to be read on the sabbath at the present time can be seen by a reference to the Hebrew text. They are called Parashas (getParam, separa- cat). Genesis contains twelve, Exodus eleven, Leviticus and Numbers each ten, Deuteronomy eleven, fifty-four in all. This number is arranged for the Jewish leap-year, which contains fifty-four sabbaths. In ordinary years, several of the shorter sections are sometimes read on the same day; so that each year the whole law is completed. With the Christian Church came especially the practice of the prophetic books, the so-called Haphtaras (תְּחַתָּרָא), from רַסְדֵד, dimissit, i.e., dimissio, or missio, because, after reading these, the people were dismissed), a list of which is found appended to the Hebrew Bible. Rabinhine tradition assigns a high antiquity, not only to the public reading of the prophetic books in general, but also to the present selection of the sections. The present order of the books, and a still earlier day to the Parashas. Elias Levi (cf. Bodenschatz: Die kirchl. Verfassung d. heutigen Juden, ii. p. 24) relates, that when Antiochus forbade the reading of the law, the people began to read sections of the prophets corresponding in contents to the legal Parashas. Thus, e.g., if on the first sabbath an account of creation was to be read, an prophetic section would be chosen, such as Isa. xlii. 5-xliii. 10, in which God was praised as Creator of heaven and earth. This tradition, however, is improbable. Cf. Joseph., Antiq., XII. 5, 4. Vitringa's idea (Archenasynagogus, pp. 111 seq.), that the Jews were chiefly induced by their antipathy to their enemies, the Samaritans, who read only the law, to introduce the reading of the prophetic books, is more probable. Besides, the cessation of prophecy undoubtedly had much to do with it. Lately Zunz (in his Gottesdienstl. Vorträge der Juden, Berlin, 1832) has proved from Talmudic and other sources, that at a very early date the Pentateuch in Palestine was arranged for a cycle of three years or three years and a half, so that it was read twice every seven years in accordance with the one hundred and seventy-five sections found in the Jerusalem Talmud; which division antedates that into fifty-four Parashas made in Babylon. According to the same authority, the Haphtaras were not yet fixed in the third Christian century. Cf. l.c., pp. 3, 193.

2. What is the relation of the Parashas and Epistles? A general connection, but no closer relationship, exists, as the Christian cultus is a child of that in the synagogue. Justin Martyr (Apot., i. 67) relates, that, at the regular meetings of the Christians, "the memoirs of the scribes, called the Gospels, and the writings of the prophets," were read. Tertullian (De prescript., 36) lauds the church for "mixing" (miscet) the writings of both Testaments. The author of the Commentary on Job found in Origen (tom. ii. 851) mentions that Job was regularly read in the churches during the Passion Week; and Origen himself testifies to the use of the Old Testament in the worship of the church. Cf. also Apost. Constit., ii. 58, 57. This is corroborated by later testimony. A general connection, but no closer relationship, exists.

3. In many different ways the public reading of the Scriptures was developed in the different sections of the church. Little of this process has been recorded: it belongs to what Basil calls the ἁγιερόν τῆς ἐκκλησίας μοντεία. The Sunday and sabbath lessons are already recorded in the books of the Greek Church in the western portions of the territory of the Constantinopolitan patriarch. An examination of these shows the remarkable wealth of the Greek Church in this respect; for not only do the Sundays, the prominent days of Christ's history, and the many saints' days, have their regular gospel and epistolary lessons, but such are also assigned to every day of the year. All the seven years in accordance with the one hundred and seventy-five sections found in the Jerusalem Talmud; which division antedates that into fifty-four Parashas. Elias Levi (cf. Bodenschatz: Die kirchliche Verfassung des heutigen Juden, ii. p. 24) relates, that, when Antiochus forbade the reading of the law, the people began to read sections of the prophets corresponding in contents to the legal Parashas. Thus, e.g., if on the first sabbath an account of creation was to be read, a prophetic section would be chosen, such as Isa. xlii. 5-xliii. 10, in which God was praised as Creator of heaven and earth. This tradition, however, is improbable. Cf. Joseph., Antiq., XII. 5, 4. Vitringa's idea (Archiseynagogus, pp. 111 seq.), that the Jews were chiefly induced by their antipathy to their enemies, the Samaritans, who read only the law, to introduce the reading of the prophetic books, is more probable. Besides, the cessation of prophecy undoubtedly had much to do with it. Lately Zunz (in his Gottesdienstl. Vorträge der Juden, Berlin, 1832) has proved from Talmudic and other sources, that at a very early date the Pentateuch in Palestine was arranged for a cycle of three years or three years and a half, so that it was read twice every seven years in accordance with the one hundred and seventy-five sections found in the Jerusalem Talmud; which division antedates that into fifty-four Parashas made in Babylon. According to the same authority, the Haphtaras were not yet fixed in the third Christian century. Cf. l.c., pp. 3, 193.

4. The method of reading the Scriptures in the Greek Church is, in this connection, of the highest importance. Concerning her we possess the oldest documents: she is the mother of all the Oriental churches, and thus the source, not only of their liturgies, but also of their lectionaries. The sources at the disposal of the modern student have lately been greatly multiplied by the productions of the Greek Phoenix press in Venice, and also the production of the Greek Church in the western portions of the territory of the Constantinopolitan patriarch. An examination of these shows the remarkable wealth of the Greek Church in this respect; for not only do the Sundays, the prominent days of Christ's history, and the many saints' days, have their regular gospel and epistolary lessons, but such are also assigned to every day of the year. All the seven years in accordance with the one hundred and seventy-five sections found in the Jerusalem Talmud; which division antedates that into fifty-four Parashas. Elias Levi (cf. Bodenschatz: Die kirchliche Verfassung des heutigen Juden, ii. p. 24) relates, that, when Antiochus forbade the reading of the law, the people began to read sections of the prophets corresponding in contents to the legal Parashas. Thus, e.g., if on the first sabbath an account of creation was to be read, a prophetic section would be chosen, such as Isa. xlii. 5-xliii. 10, in which God was praised as Creator of heaven and earth. This tradition, however, is improbable. Cf. Joseph., Antiq., XII. 5, 4. Vitringa's idea (Archiseynagogus, pp. 111 seq.), that the Jews were chiefly induced by their antipathy to their enemies, the Samaritans, who read only the law, to introduce the reading of the prophetic books, is more probable. Besides, the cessation of prophecy undoubtedly had much to do with it. Lately Zunz (in his Gottesdienstl. Vorträge der Juden, Berlin, 1832) has proved from Talmudic and other sources, that at a very early date the Pentateuch in Palestine was arranged for a cycle of three years or three years and a half, so that it was read twice every seven years in accordance with the one hundred and seventy-five sections found in the Jerusalem Talmud; which division antedates that into fifty-four Parashas made in Babylon. According to the same authority, the Haphtaras were not yet fixed in the third Christian century. Cf. l.c., pp. 3, 193.

5. Next in importance is the Armenian system. Professor Petermann of Berlin first translated it from the Armenian Church Almanac, published in Venice, 1782; which translation appeared in Dr. Alt's instructive work on the church year. (Kirchenjahr, ed. ii., pp. 136, 225.) Scripture-reading is a most important part of Armenian church service,—more so than in the Greek Church. During the time from Easter to Pentecost the Armenian Church does not only have services daily, but has them thrice every day, and for every service has prescribed lessons from the Old and New Testaments. During the rest of the year, this church not only celebrates every Sunday and every Wednesday and Saturday, but also every Tuesday and Thursday. In this way it is made possible that between Easter and Pentecost, during the principal services, the whole Psalter, the Acts entire, the Catholic Epistles entire, and the Gospel of St. John to chap. xiv., are read; in the matins, the first half of the Gospel of Luke, and, in the vespers, the Gospel of Matthew to xvi. 1.; and Mark to xiii. 37, are read. From Pentecost on, both the Pauline Epistles and the Gospels are read; for ten weeks, Matthew; for eleven weeks, Mark; for thirteen weeks, Luke; and from Epiphany, John i.—vii., these latter chapters thus being read twice every year. In addition to these, selections from the Old Testament are also read. The Armenian system in its kernel is very ancient. It shows enough of connection with the Greek system to prove that the latter is its source, and is thus older than the separation of these churches, in 550 A.D. But even a higher antiquity can be shown; since this system exhibits the two chief peculiarities of the Cappadocian plan, which, as early as the sixth century, presented lessons for Wednesdays and Saturdays, and also from the Old Testament for the whole year. Basil (Ep. 289, Ad Ccesarem) says, "Four times do we assemble every week,—on Sunday, Wednesday, Friday, and the sabbath, and also on the days commemorating the martyrs." Cf. also Hom. 8, De bapt. Accordingly we can see in the kernel of the Armenian system the outflow of the Cappadocian, or rather see in it a reflex of the old form of the Greek-Cappadocian system. 6. The once grand Church of Syria, owing to the dogmatic contentions of the fifth and sixth centuries and to the conquests of Islam, is represented at present only in such sects as the Nestorians, the Jacobites, the Maronites, and the Melchites. The latter, called "the royal party," have retained the cultus of the Greek Church in general, as also the Greek reading-system. Very ancient documents written in Syriac testify to this point. We have an almost complete record of the Melchite lectionary of the first half of the eleventh century. Of about the same age are the documentary evidences concerning the Nestorian system of Bible lessons. The Missale Chaldaeicum of the United Nestorians, published in Rome repeatedly, does, indeed, give no account of the age of the individual books on which the edition is based; but this list shows a predilection for a lection continuous. Thus the Nestorians contain both the Gospel and the Epistolary lessons, is based; but this can be supplied from other sources. For the first time we find here a series of lectiones selectae that are of such a character as to deserve in some respects to be placed at the side of the Roman pericope-system. For certain portions of the church-year, certain New-Testament books are used. Thus, for the first half of the Epiphany period, the Gospel of St. John, and the Epistle to the Hebrews, are chiefly employed. In place of the latter, the Epistle to the Romans is used from the Monday of the first week in Lent to Palm Sunday; and, side by side with this, sections of the Sermon on the Mount are read. From the middle of Lent, sections of St. John's Gospel are again employed, however, with some interruptions. From Pentecost on, selections from Matthew, then from Luke, follow, accompanied by selection from the Acts, and the Epistles to the Corinthians, Philippians, and Galatians. It is possible that the Nestorians adopted this arrangement to mark their contrast with the Greek Church, either originating it themselves, or taking it from existing practices. The date would then be the fifth century. The system is certainly very peculiar, and in marked contrast with the Byzantine, as is especially seen by the Old Testament selections. But the Nestorians had more than one system: at least there is a second series of epis tolary lessons recorded in a Vatican manuscript of 1301. The "Nestorian" lessons recorded by Dr. Alt (Der Christl. Cultus, ii. p. 455), as found prescribed in the New Testament for the Christians of Malabar, have some marked peculiarities, but are of doubtful authenticity. 7. The documents with reference to the reading-system of the Jacobite Christians are quite ample, but have not yet been satisfactorily examined. The very first edition of the Syriac New Testament, published by Widmanstadius, Vienna, 1855, contains a list of the New-Testament pericopes of the Jacobites; and, besides, a Jacobite Liturgy, found in the second volume of Renaudot's collection, contains relevant matter. This latter volume prescribes a twofold liturgical arrangement,—the first called Ordo communis secundum ritum Syrorum Jacobitarum (pp. 1 sqq.); and the second, Alius Ordo generalis liturgiae (pp. 12 sqq.). And, according to the investigations of Bickell, only the latter is a Jacobite, while the former is a Maronite, plan, which explains the discrepancies between them. The Alius Ordo also agrees with Widmanstadius' list. That the latter is that of the Jacobite Church is plain from the fact that Moses of Marden, from whose hand this Syriac text was derived, was a Jacobite. But this list itself lacks inner harmony, the epis tolary lessons not according with those of the Gospel. The British Bible Society, in retaining the liturgical headings of the Widmanstadius' edition, seems to have published its edition only for the Jacobite Christians. Widmanstadius' list is thus not satisfactory. But other evidences, chiefly ample and good manuscript authorities, as to the Jacobite system, are at our command. Their common peculiarity, like that of the Nestorian system, consists in the selection of particular portions of Scripture for certain prominent days. Thus Christians, is rich and contains both the Epistle and the Gospel lessons, is based; but this can be supplied from other sources. For the first time we find here a series of lectiones selectae that are of such a character as to deserve in some respects to be placed at the side of the Roman pericope-system. For certain portions of the church-year, certain New-Testa ment books are used. Thus, for the first half of the Epiphany period, the Gospel of St. John, and the Epistle to the Hebrews, are chiefly employed. In place of the latter, the Epistle to the...
Maronites, the youngest of the Syrian churches, is virtually the same as that of the Jacobites.

7. While the lectionary plan adopted by the Alexandrian churches was only a branch of the Greek, that of the Coptic churches was entirely distinct, and is a portion of the Coptic Liturgy of St. Basilian. A Latin translation is found in Renaudot's collection (i. pp. 137 sqq.), from which it is evident, that in every chief service, the Copts read from four different parts of the New Testament. Upon this they laid much stress. The constitutions of the Patriarch Cyrilus Lablaki enjoin upon the bishops to watch at non omitant lectionem liberorum, quinque in qua vis liturgia, nempe Pauli, Catholici, Actorum, Psalmorum, et Evangelii. Cf. 1. c. i., 203. The particular features of this system are not known.

8. The Ethiopic system is virtually identical with the Coptic, as is its whole Liturgy. Cf. Renaudot, i. 489, 507 sqq.

9. The proper transition from the eastern to the western systems would be the North-African lectionaries, if we were in possession of such. With the exception of the Mozarabic, prevalent among the African and Spanish Christians in the thirteenth century, no list has been preserved. An examination of Augustine's authentic works seems to indicate that a lectio continua was followed on the great days and on all other days, of course, having their fixed lessons.

10. In the Occidental Church we have, in reference to the public reading of Scriptures, a phenomenon similar to that observed in the Church of the East. As here the Byzantine system was the one most extensively spread, thus, in the West, the Roman system gradually supplanted all the rest. A difference between the two consists in this, that the non-Byzantine systems of the East were mostly followed by bodies that stood opposed to the Byzantine Church, while the non-Roman systems found a home in bodies on doctrinal and fraternal footing with the Roman Church.

11. Of the existence of a south-Italian system employed at Capua, we have ample proof in the Cod. Fuldensis, corrected in the year 545 by Bishop Victor himself of Capua.

12. That the Christians of Gaul pursued a peculiar plan in the public reading of Scriptures is already manifest from a letter of the missionary Augustinus to Gregory the Great. Besides, there are other scattered evidences from Hilary (324), Sidonius (472), Salvianus (440). Cf. Mabill., De liturg. Gallic., pp. 29 sqq. Then we have a Capitular of Charlemagne, abolishing the Gallic Liturgy in favor of the Roman.

13. The very ancient Liturgy and reading-system of the Milan Church has been more fortunate. It is still preserved under the title Missam Ambrosiana. Its original form cannot be definitely determined, as the different printed texts do not agree among themselves.

14. On the very peculiar Mozarabic system, consult the special article. It seems to be older than the Gallic system, or they form two branches from one original.

15. Of the old British and Irish systems, not a single trace remains, the Roman having entirely supplanted them.

16. The Roman system of scriptural reading, like the whole Roman Liturgy, has passed through three stages,—that of its origin and development down to the time of the Carolovinius, that of supremacy in the middle ages, and that of fixed and formal codification by the Council of Trent.

17. The oldest traces of it are found in the fifth century, about the time of Jerome, to whom Berno and later writers ascribe its origin. It consists of a double list,—one of Epistle, and the other of Gospel selections,—partly chosen freely, and partly with partiality for certain books.

18. In the second period, this system made its greatest conquests; in France supplanting the Gallic, in Germany entering with Christianity. It also experienced some internal changes during this time, especially on account of the many saints' days and the introduction of the Corpus Christi Festival in 1264.

19. Finally the Council at Trent declared the papal system the only legitimate one for the Roman Church, only allowing those churches the use of any other which could prove that the latter had been in constant use there for the past two hundred years.

20. With the Reformation effected by Luther and his German Bible, the traditional character of church services necessarily had to change also. The Bible was read, studied, and explained. The most complete system of Bible lessons was introduced in England, to some extent, also, in Germany and Switzerland. This whole subject is treated in extenso by Ranke: Fortbestand des herkömmlichen Perikopenkreises, Gotha, 1859.

21. The old pericope system has a peculiar history within the section of the Protestant Church that has retained it. In English Christianity, in writing the Prayer-Book, simply took the Epistles and Gospels as found in the Missale of the English bishops, omitting only those intended for days not celebrated by the Protestants. This latter was also done in Germany; but some other changes were made here, especially at the close of the Epiphany and Trinity Sundays. In the pre-reformatory stage, there were lessons for the sixth Sunday after Epiphany, nor for the twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh Sundays after Trinity. This defect was remedied successfully during the sixteenth century by an unknown master in liturgics; and the present arrangement is the result.

22. The subordinate services, such as the matins, vespers, as also services during the week, prayer-meetings, and the like, found great favor in the eyes of the Reformers. Luther in 1526, the Zurich order of worship for 1536, and the Geneva Liturgy, gave directions for the use of lessons in such services.

23. The Church of England pursued its own plan in arranging the daily lessons. Not content, as the Continental Reformers were, with selecting only certain sections of Scripture to be read, Cranmer arranged for morning and evening services such a course of lessons, that in every year the entire Old Testament, with the exception of the Psalter and the purely ritual sections of the Pentateuch, was read through once, the New Testament three times, and the Psalter twelve times, i.e., was to be chanted through once a month.

24. In Germany the services during the week in the course of time became almost extinct.
19. The public scriptural reading, thus reduced to the regular Gospel and Epistola ry lessons for the different Sundays, could not long satisfy the church. Already Spener advocated an enlarged pericope system; and since 1769, when the movement was started by the Elector George of Hanover, the evangelical authorities in the various provinces of Germany have sought to remedy this defect, especially by the adoption of new series of pericopes. Cf. Ranke in the original of this art. (Herzog, II. vol. xi. 400—492) and Nebe on the Pericopes.

PERKIN, S. J., Synods of Persia. (1830). The consolidation of the Roman-Catholic party in Poland, and the drawing-up of the Confessio catholicæ fidei by Stanislaus Hosius, Bishop of Culm and Ermland, as a counterbalance to the Confessio Augustana. — II. (1555). The consolidation of the Protestant party in Poland, and the sending of a royal embassy to Paul IV., demanding the celebration of the Lord's Supper in both forms, the abolition of masses for anniversaries, the abolishing of annats, the abrogation of ecclesiastical celibacy, etc. — III. (1562). The wild outburst of dissension with the Protestant camp, between Lutherans, Calvinists, and Antitrinitarians. — IV. (1564). Religious disputation (Aug. 6-14) between the Antitrinitarians, Grigor Pauli and Georg Schomburg, and the Reformed, Stanislaus Saruzikii, Discordia, and others. The Lutherans took no part in the discussion. The Antitrinitarians were excluded from any community with the Reformed Church. See POLAND.

PER'IZZITES. See CANAAN, p. 380.

PERKINS, William, b. at Marston Jabet in Warwickshire, Eng., in 1568; entered Christ's College, Cambridge, 1577; was chosen fellow of the same in 1592; entered the ministry, and was appointed lecturer at Great St. Andrews, Cambridge. He married in 1590. He was called before the High Commission for inquiry as to his participation with Cartwright in the Puritan movement. He seems, however, to have taken little interest in ecclesiastical affairs, but was a High Calvinist and scholastic. He was a powerful preacher. Fuller says, "He would pronounce the word 'damn' with such an emphasis as left a doleful echo in his auditors' ears a good while after." He was an extreme Calvinist in doctrine. His Armilla aurea, published in 1590 at Cambridge, stirred up Arminius to reply in 1602, and had a great deal to do in bringing on the Arminian controversy, on the Continent as well as in England. His Catechism, entitled The Foundation of Christian Religion into Six Principles (1602, London, 12mo), was in influence felt in numberless Puritan catechisms in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. He wrote a large number of books and tracts, the most of which were collected, and published in three volumes folio, Cambridge, 1603, London, 1606. He died 1602. For further information, see BROOK: Lives of Puritans, ii. p. 129; and COOPER: Athene Cantabrigiensis, ii. p. 340.

PERPETUA, St., a native of Carthage, who, together with her brother Saturus, and a female slave, Felicitas, suffered martyrdom under Septimius Severus. The Acts were first discovered by Lucas Holstenius, and edited, together with his notes, by Valesius, Paris, 1664. They are also found in RÜHRM: Acta primar. mortyr. (1716) and A. S. BOLL. (March, vol. i.). Their genuineness is above doubt; but there is no reason to suppose that they were written by Tertullian, though the author certainly was a Montanist, and prepared Acts for the use of a Montanist congregation.

HAUCK.

PERRONE, Giovanni, D.D., Roman-Catholic theologian; b. at Chieri, Piedmont, 1794; d. in Rome, Aug. 29, 1876. He received his doctorate at Turin (1815) ; went to Rome, and entered the Society of Jesus; was sent the next year (1816) to Orvieto as professor of dogmatic and moral theology. Recalled to Rome (1823), he became professor of theology in the Roman college, and held the position until 1873, except when rector of the colleges at Ferrara (1850-53) and Rome (1855-56). He took refuge for two years with some pupils at Stonyhurst, Eng. (1848-50). In 1854 he played a prominent part on the affirmative side in the discussions preceding the bull Ineffabilis Deus, which proclaimed the Immaculate Conception dogma. In 1869 he figured similarly upon the Ultramontane side in the Vatican Council. He was a member, and chosen councillor, of nearly all the papal congregations on doctrine, discipline, and liturgy, and thus wielded great influence. It is, however, as emphatically the theological teacher of the present Roman Church that he deserves most attention. His system of dogmatics is now that most widely used in his church, and comes up most fully to its standard of orthodoxy. His method is scholastic and traditional, but divested of the wearisome and repulsive features of old scholasticism, and adapted to the modern state of controversy. His system appears in two forms,— unabridged and abridged,— under the titles Praelectiones theologicae quas in Collegio Romano Societatis Jesu dabebat, Rome, 1835 sqq., 9 vols. 8vo, republished and reprinted in many editions at Turin (31st ed., 1865 sqq. 9 vols.), Paris (1870, 4 vols.), Brussels, Ratisbon, and elsewhere, translated into French and German; and Praelectiones theologicae in Compendium redacta (abridged), Rome, 1845, 4 vols., 36th ed., 1881, 2 vols., translated into several languages. Besides this great work, he wrote II. Hesemianismo, Rome, 1838; Tractus de matrimonio, Rome and Lyons, 1840; Synopsis historiae theologicae cum philosophia comparata, Rome, 1845; De immaculato B. V. Mariae conceptu: an dogmatico decreto PERSECUPTION OF THE CHRISTIANS IN THE ROMAN EMPIRE. It was formerly usual to distinguish between ten general persecutions; but the distinction was very arbitrary, and gave an entirely wrong idea of the real state of affairs. The first, from the beginning of Christianity to the reign of Trajan, was toleration but not legal. The second, from the reign of Trajan to the accession of Decius. Persecution is legal, and increases both in extension and intensity, but remains local, and depending on the individual view of the governor. The third, from the accession of Decius to the promulgation of the first edict of toleration in 311. Persecution is legal and general. Its reason is political. To the empire the speedy suppression of Christianity has become a question of life and death.

I. — The first persecutor was Nero. But his reason was merely incidental. Two-thirds of Rome had been consumed by a huge conflagration. The populace was on the very verge of revolt, their religion separated them from their co-citizens, and threw a veil of secrecy over their life. More was not necessary to stir up the Roman imagination, so easily touched by the idea of plots, conspiracies, attendances, etc. The persecution, however, was only short and local; though in the provinces some official may have seen fit to imitate his master, and may have been aided by the base passions of an ignorant mob. And in the main this state of affairs continued during the reigns of Vespasian, Titus, Domitian, and Nerva. A great general accusation is spoken of under Domitian; but see that article.

II. — At the beginning of the second century the number of Christians throughout the empire had increased so much, that they could not be overlooked any more, nor be identified with the Jews. But, the more the Christians came to the front, the more striking the difference became between the spirit which ruled them and the spirit inculcated by the official religion. Serious men could not fail to see that Christianity acted as a powerful element of dissolution in the Roman state; and it was consequently the good emperors of the period — Trajan, Hadrian, Marcus Aurelius — who persecuted the Christians; while the foolish, Commodus, Caracalla, Heliogabalus — who persecuted the Christians; while the fools — the lions with the Christians — The edict of Trajan. But thesetwo edicts formed, up to the accession of Decius, conscious action. He considered the Christians as worse enemies of the empire than the barbarians on the frontiers. To suppress Christianity seemed to him a political necessity, a duty of patriotism; and persecution was carried out as a regular government measure. The same policy was renewed by Diocletian, and Constantine, however, soon realized that the situation was changed. The government itself became persecutor, and from principle. What in Marcus Aurelius had been a mere instinct became in Decius conscious action. He considered the Christians in the cities as worse enemies of the empire than the barbarians on the frontiers. To suppress Christianity seemed to him a political necessity, a duty of patriotism; and persecution was carried out as a regular government measure. The same policy was renewed by Diocletian, and failed. (See the arts. DECIUS and DIOCLETIAN.)

III. — Hitherto the worst enemy of the Christians had been the mob. Stirred up by accusations of monstrous stupidity, and prompted by inborn envy and hatred, it was the mob which instituted the persecutions. But now the situation was changed. The government itself became persecutor, and from principle. What in Marcus Aurelius had been a mere instinct became in Decius conscious action. He considered the Christians in the cities as worse enemies of the empire than the barbarians on the frontiers. To suppress Christianity seemed to him a political necessity, a duty of patriotism; and persecution was carried out as a regular government measure. The same policy was renewed by Diocletian, and failed. (See the arts. DECIUS and DIOCLETIAN.)

See also: Histoire des persecutions de l'Eglise, Paris, 1875; WIESNER: Die Christenverfolgungen.
PERSEVERANCE OF THE SAINTS. This doctrine, the fifth of the so-called "Five Points of Calvinism," was first clearly set forth by the Canons of Dort, Fifth Head of Doctrine:

"Whom God calls, according to his purpose, to the communion of his Son our Lord Jesus Christ, and regenerate by the Holy Spirit, he delivers also from the dominion and slavery of sin in this life, though not from the body of the flesh and from the infirmities thereof, as long as they continue in this world." (Art. I.)

By reason of these remains of indwelling sin, and the temptations of sin and of the world, those who are converted could not persevere in a state of grace if left to their own strength. But God is faithful, who, having conferred grace, mercifully confirms and powerfully preserves them therein, even to the end. (Art. III.)

"Of this preservation of the elect to salvation, and of their perseverance in the faith, true believers for themselves may and do obtain assurance according to the measure of their faith, whereby they arrive at a persuasion of eternal salvation... and that they experience forgiveness of sins, and will at last inherit eternal life." (Art. XV.)

"By reason of these remains of indwelling sin, and the temptations of sin and of the world, those who are converted could not persevere in a state of grace if left to their own strength. But God is faithful, who, having conferred grace, mercifully confirms and powerfully preserves them therein, even to the end." (Art. III.)

This doctrine of perseverance, however, is so far from exciting in believers a spirit of pride, or of rendering them carnally secure, that, on the contrary, it is the real source of humility, bilateral reverence, true piety, patience in every tribulation, fervent prayer, constancy in suffering and in confessing the truth, and of solid rejoicing in God; so that the consideration of this benefit should serve as an incentive to the serious and constant practice of gratitude and good works, as appears from the testimonies of Scripture and the examples of saints." (Art. XII.)

This doctrine was first clearly set forth by Augustine in the Pelagian controversy (De Do cer perseverantia), renewed by the Reformers, and is held by all Calvinistic churches, as a logical con guence of the doctrine of election. See Westminster Confession, chap. xvii.

Arminius at first hesitated about it, and then left it an open question. The later Arminians took strong ground against it, and affirmed the possibility of a total and final fall from grace.

This is the position of the Wesleyan Arminians to-day in Europe and America. The Lutheran Confessions hold a middle position. The Church of England reserves room for both theories See ARMINIANISM, FIVE ARTICLES OF; ARMINIANISM, WESLEYAN.

PERSIA. A country which in the past has played not only one, but several important parts on the stage of the world's history. Going back to remote antiquity, we find, according to Sir William Jones, that "Iran, or Persia, in its original sense, was by no means insconsiderable. In extent of dominion, and continuance of power, it is worthy of comparison with Rome, and as a civilized, fertilizing power, as well. Iran and Turan represent civilization and barbarism. It was a nation of scholars and poets, as was recognized by Mohammed, in the saying, that, "if science were suspended from the height of heaven, there are among the Persians those who would possess themselves of it." Mohammedanism, on its intellectual side, was largely Persian. Arabian philosophy was Arabian only in name and language. The brilliancy of the Bagdad caliphate, the Augustan age of Mohammedanism, was largely due to Persian influence. Language and literature are rich and copious, and characterized by a union of profound thought with brilliancy of expression, and to which Persian literature owes much of its absolute originality as its giving currency and influence to the thoughts and institutions of other Oriental lands. It maintained this supremacy under all circumstances. Conquering or conquered, it made a deep impression upon all the Oriental peoples with whom it comes in contact. Hindu, Arab, Tartar, and Turk, all feel its influence. In this respect it bears a striking resemblance to Greece. In religion it occupied a still higher position. Of all non-Christian religions, it was the one most free from idolatry, most pure from moral taint, and characterized by moral earnestness, and depth of sense of sin. Life a warfare; man, soldier of the Prince of light, in conflict with the Power of darkness. The Persians were the people most in sympathy with the people of God under the old dispensation, sustaining to them a peculiar relation, delivering them from Babylon, and aiding and assisting them after their return.

Turning now to the Persia of to-day, we find that it still occupies an important central position with reference to Russia on the north, India on the east, Arabia on the south and south-west, and Turkey on the west. In political power, influence, and glory, it is but the mere shadow of what it once was. Its territory, it is true, extending nine hundred miles from east to west, and seven hundred from north to south, and embracing an area of about six hundred and forty-eight thousand square miles, is still large. But of this territory three-quarters is desert; and much of the remainder -- even of the populated parts, which, like the country along the shore of the Caspian and on the western border, is exceedingly fertile is but sparsely inhabited. In the more thickly settled districts even, signs of decay meet one, in uncultivated fields, deserted villages, and cities whose... population, in some cases, is but a tithe of what it has been. Making due allowance for exaggerated estimates, the probability is, that the population of Persia to-day is not more than a fourth of what it was two centuries ago, and that its wealth has decreased in a much larger proportion. The same causes which have shed light about the present state of things are at work to-day. The ex- tension of the government, disuse of rival princes, and the jealousy of the two leading nations,—the Tartars and Persians, between whom the land is divided,—are rapidly paving the way for the dismemberment of the empire. The Kurds, in his mountain fastnesses, watches for the oppor- tunity to swoop down, and take possession of the fertile lowlands; and Russia, who already within the present century has twice enriched herself at the expense of Persia, waits the time when the whole of Northern Persia shall become part of her possession. True, losses on the north may in part be compensated by extension on the south-west; Baghdad and the red region, rich in historical and religious memories to Persia, falling to her as her share of the possessions of "the sick man." But it is not likely that Persia will ever again be a great political power. As regards litera- ture, it was the opinion of Lord Beaconsfield, that the time is at hand when Oriental literature shall have enough force to compensate for the decay in Europe. Within the last few months Max Muller has borne very emphatic testimony to the impor- tance of this literature; and it is a noticeable fact that this conviction is a growing one among those who have given attention to the subject. The question, however, of Oriental literature, is but part of a larger question. The distinctive charac- teristic of that literature and the conspicuous amount which pervades and dominates it; and it is just here, that, at the present time, the position of Per- sia is of special significance. Persia is a distinc- tively Mohammedan country. In a population of five or six millions there are only about forty thousand Armenians, thirty thousand Nestorians, fifty thousand Zoroastrians, one hundred thousand Fire-worshippers, or about a hundred thou- sand in all. But the Mohammedanism of Persia is a peculiar Mohammedanism. In the ordinary sense of the term, the Persians are, and always have been, bad Mohammedans. They are the Broad Churchmen of that religion, and Moham- medanism in its Arabian dress has always been too narrow for them. Hence has arisen a type of Mohammedanism which may be called the Persian mystical, dervish, or monkish, Mohammedanism, the leading representative of which is Jelaluddin, author of Mesnevi, not so well known in the West as Saadi and Hafiz, but of immensely greater significance from the religious standpoint.

"Our Lord, the Majesty of the Religion of Islam," son of an eminent mystic, was born at Balkh, Sept. 29, 1297 A.D. The time of his birth is significant; as it is the period richest in Persian history in its record of the birth of distinguished poets and philosophers, thus preparing the way for the coming of him who was to bring together and un- it all the separate streams of thought in one mighty river. About 1227 we find him settled at Conya, the ancient Ionium, where in 1246 he instituted the order of Mevlevi,—dancing or whirling dervishes; and here, in 1273, he died. A truly extraordinary man, of marvellous insight and sus- ceptibility for spiritual truth, not only a profound thinker, but a man of affairs as well, a combina- tion of philosopher and statesman. For our judg- ment of him we are not dependent upon the statements of credulous disciples; the six books of Mesnevi being an imperishable monument of his genius, fully entitled him to the name of "Prince of Persian Mystics."

But what is mysticism? We may sum it up in one pregnant sentence from the Gospel of John (iv. 24), read in the order of the Greek text,—"Spirit the God;" not merely higher than matter, but that from which matter is dependent upon the continuance of God's presence; its perfection, upon rising from the word of matter to that of spirit, in some way exchang- ing the things seen and temporal for the things unseen and eternal. Hence the necessity both for something which shall be a constant pledge of God's presence, and for a new birth by which the soul enters into the spiritual world of realities. Last of all, and higher than all else,—God being the truth, of which the creature is but the manifesta- tion,—God not only was God in eternity, when besides him there was nothing, but is God to-day (creation neither adding to nor taking away from him), yes, and will be on the other side of eternity, not only the Lord of all, but the All in all; the mightiest archangel before the throne as dependent upon his grace as the weakest and feeblest of the children of men.

These propositions are not only presented, but powerfully presented, in Mesnevi, as we can find them nowhere else outside of Revelation. Well does Vaughan say (Hour with the Mystics, vol. II. p. 20), that, if the principle be true at all, its most lofty and unqualified utterance must be the best; and what seems to common sense the thorough-going madness of the fiery Persian is preferable to the colder and less consistent lan- guage of the modern Teutonic mysticism. If the Oriental is true man, and its present position is still the Oriental mind which is best fitted to understand and set forth this side of Revelation.

There are several points in this connection worthy of our attention. One is the richness of
In this work, as it were, a very seed-bed, where there is oftentimes more of meaning in a single sentence than in learned tomes: comprehensive as well as rich, the truth of Mohammedanism supplemented by the truths of all other religions: a doctrine of regeneration; practice of morality based entirely on love; claims to be the absolute religion, — the ocean, of which all forms of religion are but the streams: hence the reconciling character of the system. Not only does it furnish a centre for the multitudinous sects of Islam, but it presents a platform on which theistic Hindu and Mohammedan meet, and on which the followers of Darwin, Carlyle, and all non-Christian philosophies and sects, may unite. Another important characteristic is, that we find Jelalu addressing all classes of men, unfolding the highest themes to the lowest as well as to the highest intelligence. No man so low or so ignorant for whom he has not something fit and appropriate. To make a learned man a philosopher were nothing. The soldier, the musketer, the lowest rank of men, if he would, he could teach the lessons of divine wisdom. A still more important practical feature of this system is, that it is not a mere philosophy: it is an institution whose disciples and propagators are the thirty-six dervish sects, scattered over all the Mohammedan world, forming centres of spiritual influence in opposition to the secular element which has thus far had the upper hand.

The history of these monks of Islam is full of significance in its bearing on the history of to-day. Originating in Arabia, at the very beginning of Mohammedanism, the dervish movement did not become prominent till it was taken up in Persia. From that country it received a twofold impulse. The Hindu doctrine of successive incarnations, or, as it is termed in dervish phrase, of the constant presence of the living God upon earth in the person of the Imam, was made its foundation. Two ideas of tremendous power were thus brought together, — that of absolute subjection to the will of God, and that of a direct commission proceeding from the very mouth of God; and the result was seen in a series of revolutionary movements which, from the eighth to the thirteenth centuries, convulsed the Mohammedan world, finally culminating in that sect of the Assassins, who, for nearly two centuries, kept up a reign of terror, compared with whom, as Von Hammer says, "All earlier and later secret combinations and predatory states are crude attempts, or unsuccessful imitations." Persia, however, did something more than provide dynamite for the ascetic tendencies of the age. It was at the very time when that movement seemed to have exhausted itself, that Jelalu-d-Din appeared, and stamped upon it a universal character, thus giving it a new lease of life.

From Persia the movement goes into all surrounding lands, and, in spite of opposition, everywhere prosperous. In Persia itself it takes possession of the throne, placing upon it a dynasty whose long reign of nearly two hundred and twenty-five years, — from 1499 to 1722. Its history in the Ottoman Empire is still more marvellous. Distrusted and hated because of its Persian origin, it wins its way despite all obstacles; and to-day its power is greater than ever. Not only are many of the principal men of the nation Mevlevi, not only has the order stood high in the favor of sovereigns, the Sultan is never regarded as fully invested with imperial power till girded with the stool of Osman by the successor of Jelalu-d-Din. There remains but one position to be attained,— the caliphate itself; and that, at the present time, seems to be within its grasp. The whole trend of the Mohammedan world, nay, we may say, of the Oriental world, is in the direction of this pantheistic dervish system. The pressure of the European powers, of Christianity, and the re-action against the secularization of the official heads of Mohammedanism, all contribute greatly to strengthen dervish Mohammedanism. New orders have sprung up; old orders have been strengthened. The present Sultan might almost be called a dervish, surrounded by dervish counsellors, having, as his aim, to propagate dervish principles. The doctrine of the Mahdi, or guide, is a dervish doctrine. The impending change in the seat of the caliphate cannot fail to help the dervish movement, and if it should be the new centre, that is the very centre of the dervish world, its "City of Saints." Already there have been, within the present century, three marked manifestations of this religious system, — Muridism or Shamylism in the Caucasus, the Brahmo Somaj in India, and Babism in Persia. The first has been put down, but only after a war of thirty-five years, which tasked the resources of the Russian Empire. The other two have but begun to manifest themselves; and it is a significant fact, that they are not merely defensive, but offensive, movements. Chunder Sen has lately given out that he is about to visit Europe as the bearer of a divine command to it to abandon its sectarianism, and receive the universal religion. If we are inclined to laugh at the idea, we should do well to remember, that many of the leading minds in Europe and America are more in sympathy with this Oriental Pantheism than with Christianity; that Emerson was but a Persian Sufi in a Yankee dress; and that at the very time these lines are being penned (May, 1883), five thousand American citizens, members of the order of Bektaashi dervishes, are commemorating with Oriental rites the death of a hero of their faith. At Ashed, too, We should do well also to remember, that, whatever decay of faith there may be in Europe and America, there is none in Asia. There it is but latent, and is already beginning to manifest itself with the same power as in the days of old. Mohammedanism is not passing away in any other sense than that it is being perfected in a universal religion, which sustains the same relation to Mohammedanism that Christianity does to Judaism; and this bastard Christianity, this false logos, as we may call it in view of the fact that it holds the cardinal truths of Christianity while at the same time it makes them void by its tradi

Persia is an old mission-field. In the New Testament (Acts ii. 9; 1 Pet. v. 13) there are indications, that, even in apostolic times, the gospel message was not unknown. We may divide the work into four periods, — early Christian missions down to the fifth century, from the fifth century onward, Nestorian missions, Roman-Catholic missions, commencing with the thirteenth, and evangelical missions with the nineteenth century. For the first two, see NESTORIANS.

John de Monte Corvino, the first Roman missionary, began his work at Tabreez, near the end of the thirteenth century; and since that time Rome has made a number of efforts to gain a permanent foothold in that country. In the seventeenth century, in Chardin's time, she occupied a number of important centres. Neither the Nestorian nor the Roman missions have exercised any permanent influence upon the nation. The Nestorians to-day are a small body in one corner of the country, speaking a different language from that of the surrounding peoples; and the Romanists are mainly those who have been gained during the present century.

About the middle of the last century the Moravians made an attempt to establish a mission in Persia, which was unsuccessful. Martyn's stay, 1811-12 (see MARTYN), was brief, but memorable, and led him to the conviction which was afterwards expressed in the Mohammedan problem. For two years and a half (1829-33) Groves labored at Bagdad; Basel missionaries (1833-37), at Tabreez; and James L. Merrick (1833-45), at various points in Persia, principally at Tabreez. These different attempts had to do largely with work for Mohammedans. Dr. Perkins commenced the Nestorian mission in 1834 (see MARTYN, Grant, Perkins); in 1870 it became the mission to Persia, or, more properly, Northern Persia. In 1872 Teheran was occupied by James Bassett; Tabreez, by P. Z. Easton, in 1873; and Hamadan, by James Hawkes, in 1881. In 1889 Isphahan was occupied by Robert Bruce of the English Church Missionary Society; and in 1886 Bagdad (the mission center of the same body) was occupied. Connected with the five stations above referred to (Bagdad not included) there are 17 male missionaries (14 connected with the Presbyterian Board, 2 with the English Church Missionary Society, and 1 independent), and, inclusive of wives of missionaries, 20 female missionaries, between 80 and 90 native helpers, about 1,800 native communicants, 1,200 pupils sent out of the mission schools, and a large number of village schools. Summing up the work of the evangelical missionaries, we may say, that, thus far, much has been done for the Nestorians, something for the Armenians, and something also for the Mohammedans, but that, taking a broad view of the field, we have made but a commencement; and, while we have no reason to doubt the final success, we have no reason to expect an easy triumph.

See Literature under Cyrus, Dervish, Grant, Magi, Manichæism, Martin, Missions, Momineh, Nestorians, Parseeism, and Persians.

PERSONS, Robert (or Parsons), Jesuit emissary and agitator; b. at Nether Stowey, Somersetshire, June 24, 1546; d. at Rome, April 18, 1610. He was graduated M.A. at Oxford, 1572; but, having been converted to Romanism, he quitted England, 1574, and entered the Society of Jesus at Rome, July 4, 1575. Five years later he and Campian (see art.) were sent to England. They were the first Jesuits to visit that country. The arrest of Campian caused his return to Rome, 1588; whence, however, he continued to manage the English mission, of which he became prefect in 1592. In 1587 he was the first rector of the English college at Douay. He returned to England in 1588 was sent to Spain to look after Jesuit interests in England, in case the Armada should make its expected successful attack upon that country. He founded schools for the training of English priests at Valladolid (1589), Lucar (1591), Seville and Lisbon (1592), and St. Omer (1598), besides lending his efficient aid to the colleges of the secular clergy at Douay. He and Campian were prominent in the negotiations of England from paganism to Christianity, 1558-64, 3 parts (an answer to Fox's Acts and Monuments). For his biography, see E. Gee : The Jesuit's memorial for the intended reformation of England under their first Pope, prince, London, 1690; Hallam : Lit. hist. Eng.; Green : Hist. Eng. People.

PERU, a republic of South America, established in 1821; numbered 2,699,945 inhabitants in 1876, besides some tribes of wild Indians, estimated at 350,000 souls. Most of the inhabitants are of Indian descent, and the overwhelming majority of the people belonging to the Roman Catholic Church. In 1876 there were 5,087 Protestants, 498 Jews, and 27,073 persons belonging to other denominations; but, according to the constitution of Aug. 31, 1867, only Roman Catholics have the right of public worship. The ecclesiastical division of the country comprises the archbishopric of Lima, founded in 1538, and the bishopric of Arequipa (1609), Chachapoyas (1805), Cuzco (1538), Guanango (1609), Huancayo (1865), Puno (1862), and Trujillo (1757). In 1868 there were only 634 parishes, but 1,800 secular priests, and 720 regular clergy. During the Spanish rule the Church of Peru was exceedingly rich; and in spite of repeated confiscations of estates, and seizures of revenues which have come over her since the establishment of the republic, she is still very wealthy. But her bishops are appointed by the secular government, and treated as government officers. See D'Ursel: L'Amérique du sud, Paris, 1879.

HAUCK.

PESHTO. See Bible Versions, p. 282.

PESSTOLOZI, Johann Heinrich, b. at Zürich, Jan. 15, 1748; d. at Yverdon, Aug. 21, 1827.

He studied theology, but soon felt that the ministry would not give him the opportunities he wanted. He then tried jurisprudence, but felt still more disappointed. Finally, in 1769, he bought at Neuhauf a tract of waste land, and became a farmer, not from any business speculation, but from sheer philanthropy, hoping to do something to better the conditions of the human race by making unproductive soil productive. But his capital proved insufficient; and in 1775 he turned his farm into a kind of poor-school, in which the children maintained themselves by manual labor between the hours of instruction. In one respect, so far as education was concerned, the experiment turned out a great success. But, as the school could not financially support itself, Pestalozzi was compelled to discontinue it; and from 1780 to 1798 he devoted himself to literature. Some of his books—Lienhard und Gertrud (1781) and Nachforschungen über den Gang der Natur in der Entwicklung des Menschen-geschlechtes (1798)—attracted much attention, and made a great name for him; and in 1798 he once more found an opportunity of employing his great educational powers. He obtained the use of an old, dilapidated nunnery at Stanz, opened an orphan-asylum, and gathered together eighty children, who, after the lapse of a few months, looked, physically, intellectually, and morally, as if they had gone through a transformation-mill. But the following year the French took the nunnery for a hospital, and Pestalozzi's work was destroyed. He had determined, however, to become a schoolmaster, and he accordingly sought such a position at Burgdorf. The novelty of his method surprised people, and an investigation was made; but it served only to prove the magnitude of his achievements. In the following year he was able to found an independent educational institution at Burgdorf, which in 1803 was removed to Yverdon; and hardly ten years elapsed before he stood forth as the schoolmaster of Europe. Education was the enthusiasm of the world, and Pestalozzi seemed to realize even the greatest expectations. Pupils flocked to his school from Russia, Germany, France, and America. The emperor, Alexander I., embraced him with tears; and the Spanish king made him a grandee of Spain. His lack, however, of economical talent, dimensions among the teachers, the passing away of the educational enthusiasm, and other causes, brought on hard times; and in 1825 it was necessary to close the school on account of debt. The last years of Pestalozzi's life were full of hardships and bitterness, as may be seen from his Meine Lebensschicksale und Schwangerschaft, 1826. But, though his own school failed, his method continued active, working its way through all the schools of the civilized world. It may generally be defined as a practical application of the principles of Rousseau. It was realism in opposition to scholasticism. To bring forth the clear and precise idea was, of course, his final aim, as it must be the final aim of all instruction; but, instead of abstract logical definitions, he used, as far as possible, exhibition of the object in question, and simple induction. Many details of his method, such as mutual instruction, common recital, etc., are not, perhaps, strictly speaking, his inventions; but his system is, as both logical and didactic, and the whole is, in a practical form, and into general use. With respect to religion, he stopped short at natural religion, though without any antagonism to Christianity.

PETAVIUS, Dionysius (Denys Petau), b. at Orleans, Aug. 21, 1583; d. in Paris, Dec. 11, 1652; one of the most celebrated Roman-Catholic theologians of the post-Tridentine age,—the Aquila Jesuistarum. He studied philology and philosophy at Orleans and Paris, in which latter place he acquired the friendship of Isaac Cassaubon: indeed, he at various epochs of his life received some of his most powerful impulses from Protestant scholars,—Scaliger, Gerhard, Grotius, etc. In 1602 he was appointed teacher in the university of Bourges, but in 1605 he resigned that position in order to enter the order of the Jesuits. He made his novitiate at Nancy, studied theology at Pont-a-Mousson, and was in 1621 appointed professor of theologa positiva in the university of Paris; which position he held for twenty-two years. In 1644 he retired into private life, and devoted himself exclusively to literature. His works, numbering forty-nine (of which ten are in folio), comprise philology, chronology, and theology. Among his philological works are editions of Synesius (1611, with translation; 2d ed., 1631; 3d ed., 1633, with valuable notes), Theodotus (1613), Julian (1614), Nicephorus (Breuiarium historicum, 1616), and Epiphanius (Opera omnia, 1622, with translation and notes). Of his chronological works, the Opus de doctrinâ temporum (Paris, 1627, 2 vols. fol.; new edition by Hardouin, Antwerp, 1703, Verona, 1734—36, Venice, 1797) contains a new system of chronology, which was further developed in his Uranologium (1630), defended against the attacks of La Peyre in La pierre de touche chronologique (1636), and practically applied in his Tabula chronologica (1628) and Rationarium temporum in XIII libros (Paris, 1683—84), an outline of the world's history, which became very famous, and continued down to our time (last edition, Venice, 1846); not to speak of the eight thousand mistakes he corrected in Baroni's Annals. Of his theological works, some are polemical, of a rather harsh description, against Salmassius, Maturinus Simon, Grotius, etc.; but his principal work is his De theologica dogmatibus, Paris, 1644—50, 5 vols. fol., but unfinished. It is a "history of doctrines," planned under the influence of that aversion to scholasticism which was the universal result of the Reformation, and executed with enormous learning and great literary skill. It defends the doctrine of development. At first it made no great impression; but, when the Reformed theologians began to praise the book, it at once flew into unparalleled celebrity, and edition followed edition, the last by J. B. Thomas, Bar le Duc, 1864 sqq., 8 vols. See his biography by Franz Stanonik, Grz, 1876. WAGENMANN.

PETER, The Apostle.—I. His Life. 1. From his infancy. What may thou say, Peter, when our Lord addressed, as is proved by the fact that in the Aramaic, which he spoke, "rock" and "man of rock" would be both expressed by the same word,—Rapha. The words reminded Peter of those used by our Lord when they first met (John i. 45). They were a pledge for the future. It was Peter who subsequently led the way in inducing the Jews to accept Jesus as the Christ, and in building up strongly and lastingly the infant church. It was by his preaching that the line was drawn between those in the kingdom and those not; and this is what is meant by binding and loosing, or the "keys," in our Lord's speech just quoted. But that no superior authority was thus given to Peter by the "keys" is manifest, because precisely the same conditions were imposed on the entire church (Matt. xviii. 18). It affords, therefore, no warrant for the assertions and assumptions of the Roman Church. Peter was by force of character the leader of the apostles; but he was not primate, nor was it possible for him to transmit this position to any other, any more than he could transmit his apostleship, or his eye-witness of Jesus,—one of the necessary conditions of apostleship.

But it cannot be supposed that no earthly hopes mingled with Peter's faith in the Messiahsip of Jesus, nor that he at once understood how the sufferings of Jesus could lead to the glory that should follow. Indeed, when he first heard of the sufferings, he exclaimed, "Lord: this shall never be unto thee." For which speech he was very sharply rebuked (Matt. xvi. 22, 23). As the hour came on, the play of lights and shadows upon his moral life was more rapid. He declares how joyfully he had left all, and followed Jesus (Matt. xix. 27). But the question was, "What, then, do we have?""—"We have no thought of reward was a little too prominent. He vehemently refused to have his feet washed by Jesus, and, on receiving a warning, as vehemently desired it, but in the affair showed, along with humility and devotion, not a little wilfulness, and a certain dulness of apprehension respecting the meaning of Jesus' deed. When the supper was ended, Jesus said, "All ye shall be offended in me this night." To which Peter replied characteristically, "If all shall be offended in thee, I will never be offended." Our Lord knew better (Matt. xxvi. 31-35). Peter was honest in his intention, but he lacked strength of purpose. He gave one blow in his Lord's behalf, saw how vain was any attempt at resistance, and, therefore, no warrant for the assertions and assumptions of the Roman Church. Peter was by force of character the leader of the apostles; but he was not primate, nor was it possible for him to transmit this position to any other, any more than he could transmit his apostleship, or his eye-witness of Jesus,—one of the necessary conditions of apostleship.

2. From the Ascension of Christ to his own Death. —The Gospels constitute our only historical source for the life of Peter up to the ascension of Jesus. After this event we have the Acts of the Apostles, a few notices in the Pauline Epistles and in the Apostolic Fathers. In the Acts, Paul receives greatest attention; but in their earlier portion Peter is the principal figure. Luke derived his account from Mark (Col. iv. 10, 14; cf. Acts xii. 12), Philip the evangelist (Acts xxii. 8), and other members of the primitive church, and from certain documents; e.g., in the speeches of Peter. The result is a reliable and full history. But that it was not an unintermitted sequence of threats and persecutions of the Sanhedrin, prosecuted with great energy his apostolic calling; that he went down to Samaria (Acts viii. 14 sqq.), and, after Paul’s conversion, to the Syro-Phecenian coast, and visited Lydda, Joppa, and Cesarea (ix. 32-x. 48). On his return to Jerusalem, he was arrested by Herod Agrippa, released miraculously, and left the city (xii. 1-17), nor again appears in the historical part in the Council of Jerusalem, in which he played a prominent part (xv.). In the latter part of his life he is spoken of by Paul as making great missionary journeys, accompanied by his wife (1 Cor. ix. 5; Gal. ii. 11). His position among the primitive disciples is in thorough accord with the declaration of Jesus (Matt. xvi. 18, 19). He was their leader. On his advice an apostle is chosen (Acts i. 22); by his preaching the first great increase in the church was occasioned (ii. 14), by him the disciples were defended against the Jewish hierarchy (iv. 8, 19, v. 29), the church cleansed of unworthy members (v. 3 sqq.), the union of the outside communities with it guarded (vii. 14, ix. 32), and the first heathens received into the church (x.). But Peter’s position was so far from giving him exclusive jurisdiction, that the ordination— the first ecclesiastical officers, the seven deacons— was shared by the apostles (vi. 6); the Samaritan tour of inspection was made with John, on terms of entire equality, and on the commission of the apostolate (vii. 14); his conduct in Cesarea was sharply criticised by the strict party, and elaborately defended (xii. 1-19); and finally, in the Council of Jerusalem (xv. 1 sqq.), he was not Peter, but James (xv. 13). Paul confirms this statement, because he shows, that, while at first Peter’s authority was paramount (Gal. i. 18), later he was one of the three pillar-apostles, along with James and John, and next to James (Gal. ii. 9).

Peter’s Theology.—The speeches of Peter present the gospel in its original doctrinal statement. They assume, as we should expect, an apologetic and practical form. Their central theme is the death of Jesus. But this is shown not to be a hinderance to the acceptance of Jesus as the Messiah, because it was not the result of any fault of his: rather, it was an iniquitous deed of the Jews by means of the heathen authority (Acts ii. 23, iii. 13 sqq., iv. 10, 11, v. 30, x. 38). Jesus had proved himself by deed and sign and miracle to be the Son of God, and the Holy Spirit, who the prophet had foretold (ii. 22, iii. 14, 20-23, x. 38). Moreover, this death was the fulfilment of prophecy and of God’s decree (ii. 23, iii. 18, iv. 28), and had, as its designed result, that first blessing of the Messianic kingdom, — the forgiveness of sins. It was a further proof of Jesus’ Messiahship, that God raised him from the dead on the third day (ii. 32, iii. 15, 26, iv. 10, x. 40), showed him unto chosen witnesses (x. 41), and raised him to his own right hand (iii. 30 sqq.). By this resurrection God set Jesus forth as the Messianic King (ii. 36, v. 31), made him the corner-stone of the kingdom (iv. 11), and Lord over all (x. 36, cf. ii. 36). This kingdom is that long ago foretold (iii. 13, 24), and is attended by the graces of forgiveness (ii. 28, iii. 18, 19, v. 31, x. 40), peace (x. 38), the gift of the Holy Spirit (ii. 28-39), miraculous power (iv. 10), bodily healing (iii. 16), salvation (iv. 12), and the blessing of God (iii. 22). In order to share in these blessings it was necessary sincerely to repent, and honestly to believe in Jesus as the Christ (ii. 38, iii. 19, v. 32, viii. 21, 22). In expression of this repentance and belief, and as pledge of the blessings promised, baptism into the name of Jesus followed. Not least, however, was the Messianic kingdom fully set up. This would not be true until all Israel had turned unto the Lord, according to the prophetic announcement. But that this was near was evident; for Joel connects it with the outpouring of the Spirit, which had taken place at Pentecost. Then would God send Jesus to be the judge of quick and dead, and believers would be finally free from persecution (ii. 20, x. 49).

Peter’s Relation to the Gentiles.—Peter believed that the Gentiles would ultimately receive the gospel (iii. 25 sqq.), but he and the other apostles believed that the conversion of the Jews as a nation would come first. Hence he did not feel himself called to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, and it was only after special preparation and direction that he went. But what he then witnessed in the house of Cornelius convinced him that God put Gentiles on the same footing with Jews in the matter of salvation (x. 34, 44-48). Yet, as far as he personally was concerned, he felt no call to become an apostle to the uncircumcision. He shared, however, in the interest the mother-church took in the spread of Christianity among the Gentiles, very cordially received Paul, and, after Paul’s conversion, to the Syro-Phœcian coast, and visited Lydda, Joppa, and Cæsarea (xiii. 3 sqq.). By this means Peter’s authority was paramount (Gal. i. 18), later he was one of the three pillar-apostles, along with James and John, and next to James (Gal. ii. 9). Peter’s Death at Rome.—Peter died in Rome as a martyr, and the last days of Peter, nothing is known from the New Testament. The few scattered allusions in the Fathers and early church writers, joined to an invariable tradition, however, make it in the highest degree probable that Peter died in Rome as a martyr, under Nero. The proof of this statement may be thus presented. John xxi. 18 prophesied the martyrdom of Peter. Clement of Rome, in his first letter to the Corinthians (c. v.), says, "Let us set before our eyes the good apostles, Peter, who through unjust envy endured not one or two, but numerous, labors, and, after he had at length suffered martyrdom, went to the place of glory appointed to him." Inasmuch as tradition invariably makes Rome the place of Peter's martyrdom, and Clement speaks of Paul's martyrdom immediately after the allusion, it is at least most probable that he means Rome was the scene of Peter's death. Papias would seem also to be a witness to the Roman residence of Peter. He relates, on the testimony of a presbyter, that the Gospel of Mark, whom he calls "the interpreter of Peter," was composed in Rome. More unmistakable is the testimony to this residence of the apocryphal Acta of Peter and Paul, (second century?) of Dionysius of Corinth (Euseb., Ch. Hist., II. 25), of Ireneaus (Adr. Haer., III. 1), of Tertullian (De presc., 36; cf. Adv. Marc., IV. 5), of Clement of Alexandria (Euseb., Ch. Hist., IV. 14), and of the Roman priest Caius (Euseb., H.E. II. 25), who speaks of Peter's grave in the Vatican, and Paul's on the Via Ostia. To break the force of this concurrent testimony, recourse is had to the theory that the tradition is merely an extension to Rome of the Ebionite story of a running fight between Peter and Simon Magus. But this theory was not advanced for the fact that it presupposes an unproved diffusion of Ebionitism, the story itself is found only in the pseudo-Clementine literature, which sprang from small heretical circles, and originally had no connection with Rome. The Roman residence of Peter is mentioned in the first chapter of the letter of Clement to James, which belongs to the later parts of the literature. The Homilies and Recognitions close their account at Antioch. It is far more reasonable to trace the Ebionite story to tradition than vice versa. Besides, the Catholic tradition brings Simon Magus to Rome, without any mention of Peter. Thus Justin Martyr relates, that, under Claudius, a statue was erected to Simon upon the island of the Tiber, with the inscription Simonis Sanctis, the Sabian God. Justin is supposed to have become misled by this inscription into the statement made above.
PETER. 1815

Peter's Supposed Roman Bishopric. — For the Roman-Catholic fiction of a twenty-five years' Roman bishopric of Peter, there is no foundation. The New Testament is surely against it. Peter had not been in Rome in the year 50, for he then appeared in the Council of Jerusalem as a resident of the latter city; nor later on, at the time of his visit to Antioch (Gal. ii. 11 sqq.); nor in 58, when Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans, else would he have sent greetings to him; nor in 61-63, when Paul in Rome wrote the Epistles of his captivity, for he makes no mention of Peter. The Catholic tradition does, however, bring Peter to Rome, and there seems to be no good reason for doubting that he died there. But upon this latter point there are two stories: one makes him a martyr of the Neronian persecution; the other puts his martyrdom in the last year of Nero. The first is pure supposition. The second seems to deserve more consideration than it has received. In order to make out that Peter was for twenty-five years the first Roman bishop, he is made to go to Rome in the beginning of the reign of Claudius, and to die at the end of Nero's. These dates are apparently given in the chronicle of Hippolytus, which was composed in 284. But there is no agreement between the witnesses cited in behalf of the Roman Catholic's theory. The chronicler of 354 puts the entrance of Peter into Rome in the year 30, and his death in 55; while in the De mort. persecutorum of Lactantius (?) his entrance is set in the reign of Nero. As another element in the resultant confusion is the attempt to parallelize between Peter and Paul. They are made, contrary to history, to go to the church at Corinth, to labor together in Rome, and finally to die there upon the same day,—June 29, 64. Peter, it is related, was crucified head downwards, out of humility, because a crucifixion like his Lord's would have been too great an honor, and buried in the Vatican. The story suits more the post-apostolic than the apostolic taste.

II. His Epistles. 1. First Peter. — It is addressed to the elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion in Pontus, Galatia (including Pamphylia, Pisidia, and a part of Lycaonia), Cappadocia, Asia (including Caria, Lydia, Mysia, and perhaps Phrygia), and Bithynia. These "elect" were heathen Christians; and when Paul and the church at Corinth, to labor together in Rome, going to the mixed congregations which resulted from Paul's missionary efforts. Any other interpretation leads to forced exegesis; since these readers had formerly lived in the lusts of the flesh in their ignorance (i. 14), and had been brought through Christ to faith in God (i. 21), in times past were no people, but now as Christians were the people of God (ii. 10). These expressions could not be applied to Jews, any more than the declaration that they had formerly wrought the desires of the Gentiles (iv. 3). The use of the word "dispersion" (i. 1) is to be explained by Paul's idea of the essential unity of all Gentile Christians with the believing Jews as the true Israel. Nor does the Epistle presuppose any more acquaintance with the Old Testament than would have been expected among Gentile converts. The Epistle refers to the sufferings of these Christians, and the false charges brought against them, and warns them against giving any just offence (iv. 4, 12, 14, 15). It counsels them how to act in their respective relations (ii.-v.), and how to avoid that impending danger of purchasing the friendship of the world by compliance with its desires (i. 11, iv. 2). The allusions in the Epistle to the condition of the Christians do not refer to any persecution solely on the ground that they bore the name of Christ, since Peter expresses the hope that their good manner of life will silence their traducers (iii. 13, 18), but rather on the ground of the vague reports which were circulated among and believed by the heathen concerning the Christians' hatred of the human race and shameful secret practices. It was the object of the Epistle to cheer these Christians in their trying circumstances; and to prevent their return to heathenism by showing that they stood in the true grace of God (v. 12).

Peter exhorts them to bear patiently their ills, conscious of their rectitude and possession of the truth. He points them to the near future when their sufferings shall cease, and shows them how those very sufferings were divinely appointed for their salvation. There is no hint that his readers had reason to doubt the possibility of their preservation. Peter solidifies this by an analysis of the Epistle, which is not, however, systematically arranged. After alluding, by way of preface (i. 1-12), to the glorious end of their faith, even the salvation of their souls, as a source of comfort under their sufferings, Peter passes on to give general exhortations to a holy walk (i. 13-21), to brotherly love (i. 22-25), and the upbuilding of a spiritual house in the Lord (ii. 1-10). He then exhorts them respecting those special dangers incident to the pilgrim condition of the Christian (ii. 11, 12), further respecting their several relations, as subjects, husbands, wives (ii. 13-iii. 7), telling them not to render evil for evil (iii. 8-12), not to dictate (iii. 7-17), to imitate Christ in their sufferings (iii. 18-22), not turning back to the human passions and sins, but maintaining at all hazards their Christian character (iv. 1-19). Peter then exhorts the elders to a faithful performance of their duties (v. 1-4), the younger to be subject unto the elder, and all to be on the watch (v. 5-9). He closes with a benediction and salutations (v. 10-14).

The Epistle, in some respects, occupies a unique position in the New Testament. Although it bears evidence of the author's acquaintance with the Epistles of James, Romans (especially with xii. and xiii.), and Ephesians, the treatment of the existing material is by no means slavish. It has originality in point of style. It is not so highly dialectic as Romans, not so orderly as Ephesians, not, like James, full of gnomic sentences: it is rather loose and free, yet not confused. The style is fresh: thought follows thought with a general connection between them. Grammatical peculiarities are as such insertions between article and noun, the use of the participle with the imperative, and of the particle η. In regard to its doctrinal position, it shows the influence of Paul (cf. Rom. vi. 7, 1 Pet. iv. 1, 2; Rom. vii. 18, 1 Pet. ii. 24; Rom. xiii. 34, 1 Pet. iii. 22), yet in general presents the same theology which characterizes the speeches of Peter. So in the Epistle we have the primitive teaching concerning Christianity as the realization of the Old-Testament kingdom of God, the connection between the Old and New Testament revelation (which is emphasized, as it is not by Paul), and very clearly and strikingly the risen Christ as the source of present spiritual blessings, and pledge of complete salvation. Faith is set forth as a trust upon God, which grounds itself upon Jesus as the glorified Messiah, instead of, as with Paul, the reception of the forgiveness which has been wrought for us by the death of Jesus.

The time of composition of First Peter must have been the latter part of Nero's reign; and, since the writer uses the Epistles of Paul and James, it may be more definitely stated as 65-66. Additional evidence for this date is, that Peter would scarcely address Paul's congregation before the latter's demise, which took place 84. The place of composition is given as "Babylon" (v. 13). There is good reason for taking this as the symbolic name for Rome, as at a somewhat later date (69 or 70) it is used in Revelation. The historic Babylon, when Peter wrote, was almost entirely a heap of ruins. There was, to be sure, a colony of Jews there; but there is no tradition in either of the first Epistles to Peter of contact and comfort with this ruined city. Moreover, it is somewhat difficult to understand how Mark, who a little while before was with Paul in Rome (Col. iv. 10; Philem. 24), and a little after was again in Rome, could have been between times in Babylon. Again: figurative expressions occur in the Epistle; such as "strangers, dispersion," the "elect," "my son;" and this lessens the strangeness of a symbolic name for Rome. Moreover, if there had been any difficulty in understanding the name "Babylon," it would have been removed by Silvanus, who bore the Epistle (v. 12). In regard to the genuineness of the Epistle there is no question. It is quoted in the Second Epistle, by Hermas, Papias (Euseb., Ch. Hist., III. 39), Polycarp (Euseb., IV. 14), Basilides (Clem. Alex., Strom. IV. 12), Irenæus, Tertullian, Clemens Alex., Origen; reckoned by Eusebius among the Homologoumena, and translated in the Peshto (second century). Its genuineness was first questioned by Claudius (Uranischen d. Chr., 1808), but upon insufficient grounds. There was call for such an epistle. It in every respect is worthy of, and agrees with, the character of Peter; and that he could write Greek is every way probable. The only ground for rejecting it which the Baur school can give is the baseless assumption of an antagonism between Peter and Paul.

2. Second Peter. — The objections to its genuineness are solid. Its occasion is the entrance of false teachers of two classes, — the libertines, practical and theoretical, and the mockers of Christ's second coming. After an introduction, which reminds the readers of their connection with a general reading of the Scriptures and a knowledge of the person and character of the apostle, Peter with the delay explained by God's long-suffering, with exhortations to constancy in Christian life and works; and the ends with a reference to Paul's Epistles, with warning, exhortation, and praise to God (iii. 14-18).

The similarity between Second Peter (in chap.
Peter, Festivalsof St.—I. Depositio Petri in catacumbas et Pauli in via Ostiens.

PETER. 1817

PETER. FROMMÜLLER, in Lange (Eng. trans. by Monbacht, New York, 1867); HUNDHAUSEN (1873-78); on Second Peter, D. H. TH. SCHOTT (1862); on First Peter, C. A. WITZ (1881); in English, the Bible, Popular, and New Testament Commentaries, and the Cambridge Bible for Schools. The best English Commentaries upon First Peter separately are by LEIGHTON (very famous, first published York and London, 1868-69, 2 vols.; it is likewise a "truly heavenly work—a favorite with all spiritual men") and BROWN (Edinburgh, 1866, 3 vols.); upon Second Peter separately, T. ADAMS (London, 1833, new ed., 1882), T. SMITH (London, 1881); upon both together, LITTLE (New York, 1889). For the question whether Peter ever was in Rome, and on his asserted bishopric, see especially LIPSCITZ: Chronologe der römischen Bischofe (Brunswick, 1869), Quellen der römischen Petruswürde (1872); JOHANN SCHMID: Petrus in Rom, Luzern, 1879 (literature very fully given). [See also F. LEON: De l'authenticité de la seconde épître de Saint Pierre, Lausanne, 1877; MARTIN: Saints Pierre et Paul dans l'église syrienne moderne, Aracoeli, 1878; HOWSON: The Catholic Epistles, London, 1883.]

F. SIEFFERT.

PETER, Depositio Petri in catacumbas et Pauli in via Ostiens. The Catalogue Liberianus (554) first mentions the entombment of the bones of Peter and Paul as having taken place in the year of the consuls Tuscus and Bassus (256), and gives the form of the 1st. calendar, April, 22, as having taken place in the reign of Anastasius I. (518). After these centuries, it is mentioned in all calendars, also those of the Armenians, Ethiopians, and to a certain extent the Copts, Ethipians, and Armenians. In 1743 Benedict XIV. decreed a celebration of eight days for the city of Rome; and in 1876, the eighteenth centenary, it was renewed with great magnificence by Pius IX. —II. Festum cathedrae Petri Antiochenae. The Calendarium Liberianum mentions that a festival was celebrated on Feb. 22 in commemoration of the accessions of the apostles Peter to the episcopal chair. But it uses the words VIII. Kal. Mart.: Natale Petri de Cathedra, and thus leaves the locality of the chair in uncertainty. The same is the case with the Calendarium of Polumius Silius (448). In the Ambrosian Liturgy and in the Sacramentarium of Gelasius I. the festival is omitted altogether; but it is found in most Eastern liturgies, and another is mentioned late in the eighth century. The second named festival was observed by the Copts, Ethiopians, and Armenians. It was enjoined by Benedict XIV. decreted a celebration of eight days for the city of Rome; and in 1876, the eighteenth centenary, it was renewed with great magnificence by Pius IX. —III. Festum cathedrae Petri Romanae. Jan. 18, was generally confounded with the preceding, up to the eighth century, but became independently established, and formally fixed during the Carolingian age, to which time, also, belongs the final recognition of the tradition of the double episcopacy of St. Peter. —IV. Festum Sancti Petri ad vicinula or in vicinula is not mentioned until the ninth century in Wandelbert’s MartYROLOGIUM and Pseudo-Beda’s HONIT. DE VINCULIS SAINT PETRI. It is celebrated by the Church of Rome on Aug. 1; by the Greek Church, on Jan. 16; and by the Armenian Church, on Feb. 22. The Armenian Church has also a festival of “the finger of the Apostle Peter;” but nobody knows anything of the origin or significance of that festival.

ZÖCKLER.

PETER OF ALCANTARA, b. in 1549; d. Oct. 18, 1562. He entered the Franciscan order in 1515; became guardian of a newly erected monastery at Badaso in 1519; was appointed superior-general of the province of Estramadura in 1538; and induced the chapter of his order to sanction his reforms at a meeting in Placentia, 1540. He also aided St. Teresa in her reforms of the Carmelites. Not content, however, with the role of a reformer, he founded, with the consent of John III., a new congregation, the severity of whose rules far surpassed that of the Franciscans. He was canonized by Clement IX. in 1609. See Acta Sanctorum, Oct. VIII. Two works are ascribed to him, of which the De oratione et meditatione is genuine, while the De animi pace hardly belongs to him.

HERZOG.

PETER OF ALEXANDRIA became bishop of that city in 300, and was decapitated, on the order of Maximinus, without any preceding trial, in 311. In his time fall the schism of Meletius and the persecution of Diocletian: according to legend, he was himself the last victim of that persecution in Alexandria. He left a Λόγος περὶ μετα- φοράς, — a treatise on the subject of the läptos, the degree of their crime, and of the penance demanded for reconciliation. See Gallandi: Bibl., iv. pp. 108 and 112; and Routh: Reliquiae sacrae, iv. p. 21.

GASS.

PETER D’AILLY. See Ailly.

PETER OF BLOIS (Petrus Blesensis), d. about 000. He studied canon law at Bologna, and theology in Paris, and became chancellor to the archbishop of Canterbury, in whose service he made several voyages to Rome. Of his works — treatises on theology, philosophy, canon law, medicine, and mathematics, more or less influenced by John of Salisbury — the most interesting are his hundred and eighty-three letters to Henry II., various popes, and high ecclesiastics. They are full of characteristic traits of political and ecclesiastical life in his time, and give also some positive information of importance. The best edition of his works is that by Pierre de Goussinville, Paris, 1607.

PETER OF BRYS AND THE PETROBRUISANS. Peter of Brusy is known to us only through the book of Peter the Venerable (Adversus Petrobrusianos hereticos), and from a passage in Abelard’s Introductio ad theologiam. What later writers tell of him is only guess-work. He was a pupil of Abelard, and his general aim may be described as a restoration of Christianity to its original purity and simplicity. But his criticism was so ill judged as his reforms were violent. He accepted the Gospels; but he ascribed only a derivative authority to the Epistles, and the tradition he rejected altogether. For the Gospels, he considered a literal interpretation and application as necessary. Thus he rejected infant baptism, referring to Matt. xxviii. 19 and Mark xvi. 16, and, with respect to the Lord’s Supper, he not only rejected the doctrine of transubstantiation, but he also denied the sacramental character of the act, considering it a mere historical accident. All the buildings were an abomination to him; for the church is the community of the faithful, and the place where they gather, whether a stable or a palace, is of no consequence. Church officials, bishops, and priests, he represented as mere frauds; and generally he demanded the abrogation of all external forms and ceremonies. In Southern France, where the Cathari were numerous, he found many adherents; and in the dioceses of Arles, Embrun, Die, and Gap, he caused much disturbance. Churches were destroyed, images and crucifixes burned, priests and monks maltreated, etc. At last the bishops were able, by the aid of the secular power, to put down the movement, and expel the leaders. But soon after, Peter of Brusy appeared in the dioceses of Narbonne and Toulouse, where he preached for nearly thirty years, and with a following of his own. In 1269 he was arrested, however, and burnt at St. Gilles; but his party, the Petrobruisans, did not immediately disappear.

PETER Venerabilis visited them, preached to them, and wrote the above-mentioned book against them, but without any result. They joined Henry of Lausanne, and finally disappeared among the Henricans. C. SCHMIDT.

PETER OF CELLE (Petrus Celiensis), abbot of Mouther-La-Celle, near Troyes, in 1150; abbot of St. Remi, near Rheims, in 1162; bishop of Chartres in 1181; d. in 1183. Of his works, edited by Janvier, Paris, 1671, and consisting of mystical expositions of scriptural passages, treatises on conscience, discipline, etc., the most important are his letters to Alexander III., various princes, bishops, abbots, etc. They are not only of historical, but sometimes also of theological interest. They were edited by Sirmond, Paris, 1613.

PETER LOMBARD. See Lombard.

PETER MARTYR, or Peter of Verona, a Dominican monk, who in the middle of the thirteenth century was appointed inquisitor in Lombardy. The severity with which he exercised his power produced much hatred against him, and in 1252 he was deposed. In the very next year he was canonized by Innocent IV. See Acta Sanctorum, B. III.$$16, and, with respect to the Lord’s Supper, he not only rejected the doctrine of transubstan-tiation, but he also denied the sacramental character of the act, considering it a mere historical accident. All the buildings were an abomination to him; for the church is the community of the faithful, and the place where they gather, whether a stable or a palace, is of no consequence. Church officials, bishops, and priests, he represented as mere frauds; and generally he demanded the abrogation of all external forms and ceremonies. In Southern France, where the Cathari were numerous, he found many adherents; and in the dioceses of Arles, Embrun, Die, and Gap, he caused much disturbance. Churches were destroyed, images and crucifixes burned, priests and monks maltreated, etc. At last the bishops were able, by the aid of the secular power, to put down the movement, and expel the leaders. But soon after, Peter of Brusy appeared in the dioceses of Narbonne and Toulouse, where he preached for nearly thirty years, and with a following of his own. In 1269 he was arrested, however, and burnt at St. Gilles; but his party, the Petrobruisans, did not immediately disappear. Peter Venerabilis visited them, preached to them, and wrote the above-mentioned book against them, but without any result. They joined Henry of Lausanne, and finally disappeared among the Henricans. C. SCHMIDT.

PETER OF CELLE (Petrus Celiensis), abbot of Mouther-La-Celle, near Troyes, in 1150; abbot of St. Remi, near Rheims, in 1162; bishop of Chartres in 1181; d. in 1183. Of his works, edited by Janvier, Paris, 1671, and consisting of mystical expositions of scriptural passages, treatises on conscience, discipline, etc., the most important are his letters to Alexander III., various princes, bishops, abbots, etc. They are not only of historical, but sometimes also of theological interest. They were edited by Sirmond, Paris, 1613.

PETER LOMBARD. See Lombard.

PETER MARTYR, or Peter of Verona, a Dominican monk, who in the middle of the thirteenth century was appointed inquisitor in Lombardy. The severity with which he exercised his power produced much hatred against him, and in 1252 he was deposed. In the very next year he was canonized by Innocent IV. See Acta Sanctorum, B. III.$$16, and, with respect to the Lord’s Supper, he not only rejected the doctrine of transubstan-

tiation, but he also denied the sacramental character of the act, considering it a mere historical accident. All the buildings were an abomination to him; for the church is the community of the faithful, and the place where they gather, whether a stable or a palace, is of no consequence. Church officials, bishops, and priests, he represented as mere frauds; and generally he demanded the abrogation of all external forms and ceremonies. In Southern France, where the Cathari were numerous, he found many adherents; and in the dioceses of Arles, Embrun, Die, and Gap, he caused much disturbance. Churches were destroyed, images and crucifixes burned, priests and monks maltreated, etc. At last the bishops were able, by the aid of the secular power, to put down the movement, and expel the leaders. But soon after, Peter of Brusy appeared in the dioceses of Narbonne and Toulouse, where he preached for nearly thirty years, and with a following of his own. In 1269 he was arrested, however, and burnt at St. Gilles; but his party, the Petrobruisans, did not immediately disappear. Peter Venerabilis visited them, preached to them, and wrote the above-mentioned book against them, but without any result. They joined Henry of Lausanne, and finally disappeared among the Henricans. C. SCHMIDT.
the Venerable" was derived from his largeness of body and mind, his benevolent face, and his tone, and resign his office. After a sharp struggle, his prior. Peter was the first to acknowledge his name of Ringarde his wife. Four of his brothers became monks; one, Armanus, was prior of Cluny. At seventeen years of age Peter became a monk of Cluny, and at thirty (1122) he was elected abbot. He reformed the abbey, and established good management in all its distracted affairs. He ruled with extreme severity, and his monks; but the whole undertaking miscarried. This just and generous attitude is in strong contrast to that of Innocent and of St. Bernard, who seem equally to have disregarded Peter and his motives. To meet their insinuations concerning laxity of discipline, he called a general chapter of his order (Benedictines), at which "two hundred priors and a thousand ecclesiastics" were present, who supported him in a more stringent rule. Peter's writings embrace Epistles (lib. 6. 22, to Heloise, being notably fine), and Tracts against the Petrobrusians, Jews, and Mohammedans, together with a few Hymns and Sequences. His principal claims to modern honor lie (1) in his having secured a Latin translation of the Koran through his own labors and those of some of his monks; (2) in his kind treatment of Abelard, whom he received after his defeat by Bernard, and tenderly cared for until he died, and whose body he delivered to Heloise; and (3) in his hymn "Mortis, portis, fractis, fortis," on the resurrection. This is the conjectured original of Bishop Heber's "God is gone up with a merrynoise." Peter was decidedly broader and more genial than his age and surroundings, but his writings are of slight value. Fl. Illyricus quotes him, however, as one of his "witnesses." He was but a poor Latinist; yet, in his sermon on the transfiguration, he displays real rhetorical power. His burial was beside his comrade, Henry of Blois, Bishop of Winchester, within the church at Cluny.

Lit.—His works were published Paris, 1614, and several times afterwards: Migne (Patrologiae, vol. 186, pp. 9 sqq.) contains them all. His life can be found in Histoire littéraire de la France, xiii. p. 241, and in Migne, as above. For the best view of his character, see Moule, A Life and Times of St. Bernard, London, 1863, 2d ed., 1877.

SAMUEL W. DUFFIELD.

PETERBOROUGH, a city in Northamptonshire, Eng., situated on the left bank of the Nene, seventy-six miles, north by west, from London. It is the seat of the bishopric of the same name. The episcopal stipend is forty-five hundred pounds. The see was founded by Henry VIII., in 1541. Peterborough Cathedral is a beautiful specimen of Norman and Early English architecture. It was commenced by abbot John de Secz, 1117, and completed 1528. It is cruciform, 476 feet long, with transepts 203 feet broad, ceiling 78 feet, and tower 150 feet high. See G. A. POOLE: Peterborough, London, 1883.

PETER-PENCE (Devarius S. Petri, Census B. Petri, Romfcul, Romescol) denotes a money-tribute which several of the northern kingdoms of Europe annually paid to the see of St. Peter. It seems to have originated in England, and was, according to the report of later chroniclers, paid there for the first time by King Ina of Wessex (725), though not in the form of a tribute to the Pope, but as a support of the Schola Saxonom.—an educational institution in Rome for English clergy. The whole report, however, is somewhat doubtful, as Beda knows nothing of the affair. The first certain notice of it is found in a letter from Leo III. to Cenulph of Mercia (Mansi: Coll. Conc., XIII.; Jaffé: Regest., No. 1015), in which the Pope mentions the Offer (d. 789), the predecessor of Cenulph, had promised for himself and his successor to pay annually three hundred and sixty-five manccuse to the apostle Peter for the maintenance of the poor and the illumination of the churches in Rome. From the middle of the tenth century it seems to have been paid regularly, first as a charity, but afterwards as a duty. Gregory VII. even tried to use it as a means of bringing England into a relation of vassalage to the papal see; but William the Conqueror, though he declared himself willing to pay the duty, refused to take the oath. The money was collected through the bishops, though without some difficulties, partly because people refused to pay, partly because the bishops were unwilling to give the sums collected. Under Henry VIII. it was abrogated, by Act of Parliament, July 9, 1533. In Poland the peter-pence was refused to pay, partly because the bishops were in 1034, from the monastic vows. From Poland queror, though he declared himself willing to pay means of bringing England into a relation of vassalage to the papal see; but there it met with reverses, protected by Gustavus Vasa. Olaus was in 1593 made rector of the seminary of Strengnas, translated the Bible into Swedish. Olaus also wrote a Manuale Sueticum, an Ordo Missce Sueticum, and a Disciplina Suetica, which are very numerous, the principal are, Warheit des herrtichen Retches Jesu Christi, Magdeburg, 1092-93, 2 vols., and Geheimniss der Widerbringung aller Dinge, Francfort, 1700-10, 3 vols. fol. He also wrote exegetical works, Latin and German poems (the former edited by Leibnitz), and an autobiography, 1718. See CORRADI: Geschichte des Chiliasmus, Francfort, 1781, 2d ed., Zurich, 1794, 4 vols.

PETIT, Samuel, b. at Nimes, Dec. 25, 1694; d. there Dec. 12, 1643. He studied theology at Geneva, and was in 1618 appointed professor of Oriental languages, and pastor in his native city. Among his numerous works are Miscellaneorum Libri IX. (Paris, 1630), Eclogae Chronologicae (Paris, 1632), Leges Atticae (Paris, 1635, dedicated to De Thou), Observationum Libri III. in varia paterum scriptorum loca (Paris, 1641), etc. His autobiography was written in Latin by PIERRE FOR- MY, Paris, 1673.

PETRA. See SelaH.

PETRI is the name of two brothers—Olaus (b. at Oerebro, 1497; d. in Stockholm, 1562) and Laurentius (b. at Oerebro, 1499; d. at Upsala, 1573), who were chiefly instrumental in the establishment of the Reformation in Sweden. They studied theology at Wittenberg, and began, soon after their return home, to preach the Reformation, protected by Gustavus Vasae. Olaus was in 1528 made rector of the seminary of Stenungs, and in 1539 preacher in Stockholm; Laurentius, professor in Upsala in 1523, and in 1531 archbishop. Together with Lars Andersson, they translated the Bible into Swedish. Olaus also wrote a Manuale Sueticum, an Ordo Missae Sueticae, and a number of polemical treatises in Swedish. Laurentius wrote a Disciplina Suetica, which became part of the Swedish constitution. See SWEDEN.

PETERBROSIANS. See Peter of Bruys.

PEUCER, Caspar, b. at Bautzen, Jan. 6, 1535; d. at Dessau, Sept. 25, 1602. He studied in the university of Wittenberg, and was appointed professor of mathematics there in 1554, and of medicine in 1560. He was general of the schools of Saxony in 1563, and body-physician to the elector. From his arrival at Wittenberg he was an inmate of Melanchthon's house. In 1550 he married his youngest daughter, and after his death he became one of the most active representatives of the so-called Philippians; which article see. As he enjoyed the favor and confidence of the elector in an uncommon degree, it was easy for him to prevent anybody but Philipps from being appointed at the university. He was also very active in the publication, and introduction into the school, of the Wittenberg Catechism of 1571, which, on account of its antagonism to the doctrine of ubiquity, was an abomination in the eyes of the Lutherans. But through the electress, who was a strict Lutheran, his enemies finally succeeded in estranging the elector from him. In 1574 he was suddenly arrested, and kept in prison till shortly before the death of the elector, in 1586. After his release he returned to his old occupations, but resided at Dessau. He published an edition of Melanchthon's works (Wit- tenberg, 1582-84, 4 vols. fol.), and a collection of liberal and the prevailing orthodoxy (Institutiones historicae de P. M. 1566), a report of his imprisonment (published at Zürich in 1604), besides a great number of medical, theological, and mathematical treatises. See Henne: Caspar Peucer and Nicholas Kretl, Marburg, 1586. - Mallet.

PEW.

The word comes from the old French pui, an elevated space, puye, an open gallery with rails (hence applied to an enclosed space, or to a raised desk to kneel at), which is the Latin podion, a balcony, especially near the arena, where distinguished persons sat. So pews were originally places for distinguished persons in church. See Speck: Elymological Dictionary. In the Roman-Catholic churches on the Continent there are generally no pews, but in Protestant churches they are universal. In England they are said to date from the Reformation, and not to have been in general use until the middle of the seventeenth century. The renting of them is a common source of revenue in support of the minister in unestablished churches. They are also bought and sold, and as property can be disposed of by will. Originally there was only one pew, in which the patron and his family sat. It was forbidden other persons to enter it. In England it is quite common to have pews locked. Formerly there were square pews, and pews with very high backs; but now they are built with backs no higher than a chair's, and very commonly without doors.

PEZEL (PEZOLT, PEZOLD), Christof, b. at Plauen, March 5, 1539; d. in Bremen, Feb. 25, 1604. He studied theology at Jena and Wittenberg, and was in 1567 appointed professor of theology in the latter place. As a representative of Philippism, he was discharged in 1574, and banished from the country in 1578. In 1580 he was appointed pastor in Bremen, and in 1584 superintendent, and professor of theology. He edited Melanchthon's correspondence with Hardenberg, 1598, and his Consilia Latina, 1602, and wrote the Bremer Catechismus, the Bremen Consensus, a survey of the controversies about the Lord's Supper and the doctrine of ubiquity, Argumenta et Objectiones, etc. (1589–90), and his Apocalypse, Lebte u. Ceremonien in der reform. Kirche (1592), etc., which show that he gradually approached nearer and nearer to strict Calvinism. See Iken: Die Wirksamkeit des Christof Pezel in Bremen, in Brem. Jahresbericht ix., 1877. - Mallet.

PFAFF, Christof Matthäus, b. in Stuttgart, Dec. 23, 1686; d. at Giessen, Nov. 8, 1700. He studied at Tübingen; travelled extensively; was appointed professor of theology at Tübingen in 1714, and chancellor of the university in 1720; and removed in 1756 to Giessen, where he occupied the same position. He was a man of great accomplishments, a consummate scholar, a brilliant lecturer, wielding a great authority. He defended the collegial system against the reigning territorialism (De originebus juris ecclesiasticis, 1719), and was very active in promoting a union between the Reformed and Lutheran churches (Die nöthige Glaubensunigenigkeit der protestantischen Kirche, 1719, and Alloquium irenicum ad Protestantes, 1720). His doctrinal stand-point was more liberal than the prevailing orthodoxy (Institutiones Theologiae, 1719; Abrius von seeben Christenthum, 1750). It contained an element of Pietism, and was very antagonistic to the rising school of Wolff. His biography was written by Leporinus, Leipzig, 1726. - Klüpfel.

PFLUG, Julius, Canon of Naumburg and Misnia, afterwards Bishop of Naumburg-Weißenfels; d. 1664; enjoyed the confidence of Charles V., and was by him employed in the various negotiations caused by the Reformation. He presided at the religious disputation of Ratisbon and Worms, and drew up, together with Agricola, the Augsburg Interim. See Jansen: De Julius Pflugio, 1588.

PHARAOH (יוֹתָם), The Egyptian word for king was per-ā, of which the Hebrew paró was a transliteration: it means the "great house," and finds its modern parallel in the Turkish ruler's epithet, the "Sublime Porte." It was customary to call the monarch by this epithet, without adding his proper name, like "King," "Cesar," "Tsar." So in the Bible the name is added only in the cases of Necho (2 Kings xxiii. 29, 33 sqq.; Jer. xlvii. 2) and Hophra (Jer. xlviii. 30). The epithet is followed upon the monuments by numerous laudatory titles, which assigned to the man the attributes of the gods. Indeed, he was believed to be an earthly manifestation of Ra, the sun-god, and after death was apotheosized. His life was really a bondage. The wily and powerful priesthood watched him closely, and superintended his daily life, prescribing his duties, civil and especially religious, from hour to hour. By his side stood his wife, the queen, who might even succeed him, and by whose marriage to a usurper, in the event of the true Pharaoh's death, the legitimacy of the new dynasty was secured, if to the new king she bore a son. Unlike other Oriental sovereigns, the Pharaohs showed themselves to the people, and that accompanied by their wives and sons. There does not appear to have been any regulation-dress for the Pharaoh; but upon his neck and arms sparkled jewels, and from the magnificent girdle hung his sword. Upon his shaved head he wore a wig, and upon that his diadem, crown of either Upper or Lower Egypt, or a combination of the two; but, whichever it was, it bore the nahu, which symbolized his authority over life and death. The investment of the new Pharaoh took place on the day following the decease of his predecessor. The palaces of Egypt were surrounded by beautiful and extensive gardens; but unfortunately they were built out of brick and wood, and have perished without leaving a trace. The Pharaoh employed, in travelling through the country, either a sedan-chair, or, after the incursion of the Hyksos, a two-horse carriage. There is mention made in the Bible of seven Pharaohs, to whom no proper name is given. Several of these have been identified: thus the Pharaoh of Joseph was Sethos I.; of the oppression, Rameses II.; of the exodus, Menephthah I. See art. Egypt, pp. 706, 710. Cf. art. "Pharoh," by Ebers, in Reisch's Handb. d. bh. Altert. PHARISEES, The (Heb., perushim, Aramaic, perishim, perishayya, the "separatists"), formed a party among the Jewish people. The name they bore was not of their choice, but given them by their opponents, who looked upon them as separating themselves from the rest of the people on account of their superior piety. They called them as generally luxurious in life. On the contrary, the great esteem in which they were held by the people seems to prove just the opposite, as Josephus asserts (Antiq., XVIII. 1, 3). They represent a religious system carried to a burdensome and blameworthy extent, as doubtless among them men, like Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea, who were truly pious, and, if bigoted, were not hypocritical. The Pharisees were proselytizers. The spread of Judaism thus accomplished led to the wider spread of Christianity. It is to Paul, a Pharisee of Pharisees, that the church is indebted for the first extensive missionary operations, and from his Epistles Christian theology has been largely derived.

PHILADELPHIA. the largest city in Pennsylvania, and the second in the United States, is situated in lat. 39° 57' N., and long. W., 75° 10'. It extends north and south, along the west bank of the Delaware River, for twenty-three miles, and west an average distance of five miles and a half, beyond the River Schuykill, which flows through the city, and is spanned by thirteen bridges. It contains 130 square miles, or 82,600 acres, and has 750 miles of paved streets. It was founded in 1682 by William Penn, a Quaker from England, and was incorporated in 1701, when it had its first mayor. The first Continental Congress met in Carpenter's Hall, Sept. 4, 1774. The Declaration of Independence was adopted here July 4, 1776. (Independence Hall still stands, a noted building. The convention that framed the Federal Constitution met in an adjoining building, May, 1787.) It was the seat of the Federal Government from 1790 to 1800. Up to 1854 it consisted of the "city proper" and "districts;" but in that year they were consolidated under one municipal government.

The population in 1683 was 500; 1684, 2,500; 1700, 4,500; 1750, 800; 1800, 1,500; 1850, 408,762; 1860, 508,034; 1870, 674,022; 1880, 846,980.

Philadelphia is the "city of homes." In 1880 it had 146,412 dwelling-houses for its 185,044 families and 846,980 people,—an average to a house of only 5.79 persons.
PHILADELPHIA. 1823

PHILADELPHIAN SOCIETY.

Its annual death-rate is only 19.06 per thousand. It has forty-five cemeteries.

The first American paper, The Weekly Mercury, was established here in 1719.

The prominent educational and scientific institutions of the city are the Central High School, Girls' Normal School, University of Pennsylvania, the American Philosophical Society (founded by Franklin in 1769), Academy of Fine Arts, Academy of Natural Science, Polytechnic College, Franklin Institute, Wagner Institute, School of Design for Women, Lutheran, Episcopal Roman-Catholic, and Reformed Presbyterian theological seminaries, and nine medical and dental colleges. Its schools and seminaries, public and private, are numerous and of a high order.

The first minister was preaching to the Swedes at Tinicum Island, and a church was built at Tinicum in 1669; Episcopalian services began in 1646 (the oldest church edifice still standing is the Gloria Dei, or Old Swedes, dedicated in 1700; it was originally Lutheran); Roman Catholic, 1686; Reformed Presbyterian, 1697; Baptist, 1698; German Reformed, 1747; Bible Christians, 1817; Independent Christian, 1825; Congregationalist, 1831; Presbyterians, 1832; Jewish, 1843; Unitarian, 1845; Presbyterian and Reformed, 1352; American Sunday-School Union, organized in 1824, and also several of the missionary boards of the great religious denominations, have their head offices here. The First Day or Sunday School Society of Philadelphia, which was the first Sunday-school organization in America for missionary work, was formed here in 1791.

The places licensed for the sale of liquor number about 5,500.

The chief religious denominations began in the city as follows: forty years before Penn came, a Lutheran minister was preaching to the Swedes at Tinicum Island, and a church was built at Wicaco in 1669; Episcopalian services began in 1646 (the oldest church edifice still standing is the Gloria Dei, or Old Swedes, dedicated in 1700; it was originally Lutheran); Roman Catholic, 1686; Reformed Presbyterian, 1697; Baptist, 1698; German Reformed, 1747; Bible Christians, 1817; Independent Christian, 1825; Congregationalist, 1831; Advent Christian, 1843; Free Methodist, 1850; Church of God, 1858; Reformed Episcopal, 1873; Independent Methodist, 1879; Mormon, 1881.

There are 611 places of worship in the city.

This number includes churches, mission preaching-stations, and the other denominational institutions in which public religious services are regularly held. They are classed as follows: Advent Christian, 2; Baptist, 79; Free Baptist, 7; Bible Christian, 1; Children of Zion, 1; Christadelphians, 1; Christian (Independent), 2; Church of the Brethren (Dunkards), 2; Church of God, 2; Congregational, 2; Congregational (Independent), 1; Disciples of Christ, 4; Evangelical Association, 8; Friends, 17 (Orthodox, 7; Hicksite, 9; professing original principles, 1); Hebrews, 10; Latter-Day Saints, 2 (Mormon Anti-Polygamous, 1; Mormon Polygamous, 1); English, General Council, 11; German, General Council, 12; Independent, 1; Swedish, Augustan Synod, 1; German, Mission Synod, 1; English, General Synod, 5; Mennonite, 2; Methodist, 122 (Methodist-Episcopal, 101; African, 10; Zion African, 2; Free, 3; Independent, 6); Moravian, 5; New Jerusalem, 3; Presbyterian and Reformed, 135 (Northern Presbyterian, 92; Reformed Presbyterian, Original Covenanter, 1; Reformed Presbyterian, General Synod, 3; Reformed Presbyterian Synod, 3; United Presbyterian, 1; Reformed Presbyterian [Dutch], 5; Reformed [German]. English, 7; German, 8); Protestant-Episcopal, 96; Reformed Episcopal, 10; Roman Catholic, 47; Spiritual Association, 3; undenominational missions, 7; Unitarian, 3; United Brethren in Christ, 3; Universalist, 4. Of the total number, 500 are organized churches.

The 611 places of worship for 849,980 of a population give one to 1,386 persons of all ages: in 1776 there were 37 for a population of 60,000 or 70,000, or not more than one to every 1,600 persons.

The strongest Protestant denominations are the Presbyterian (Northern General Assembly), which was organized here in 1822, 227,477 communicants; Methodist-Episcopal, 22,747; Protestant-Episcopal, 22,679; Baptist, 18,564; making a total of 90,943. The other Protestant denominations with these will number at least 120,000 communicant members. The Philadelphia Sunday-school Association, representing all these denominations, reports 592 Sunday schools, with 148,885 scholars. The population give one to 1,386 persons of all ages: in 1776 there were 37 for a population of 60,000 or 70,000, or not more than one to every 1,600 persons.

The Jewish population is 12,000. The Roman-Catholic population of the diocese, which includes the city and several of the counties of Eastern Pennsylvania, is estimated as 300,000. The exact Roman-Catholic population of the city cannot be had,— not much, if any, over 100,000.

The Young Men's Christian Association was organized in 1854. Present membership about 3,000. It has a magnificent building on Fifteenth and Chestnut, covering 280 by 72 feet, five stories high, built in 1875. There is also a very efficient Women's Christian Association, founded by a wealthy Frenchman, in 1852, also located here, and now provides for the education of a thousand boys. R. M. Patterson.

PHILADELPHIAN SOCIETY. As early as 1692, Dr. and Mrs. Pordage and Bromley established a gathering of mystics of the Jakob Bohme pattern. To their meetings Mrs. Leade, after the death of her husband, was admitted, and in 1670 she, with those already named, founded the Philadelphia Society. To it she soon gave what were called "the laws of Paradise," which contained the ground ideas of the society. The new enterprise was designed to advance the kingdom of God by improving the life, teaching the loftiest morality, enforcing the duty of universal brotherhood, peace, and love. At the same time, no disturbance in the political world was contemplated, unless, indeed, any government acted against the light of nature and the gospel. The Philasters also believed firmly in what they called the "divine secrets," — the wonders of God and nature, the profound spiritual experiences of regeneration and soul-resurrection, — in the speedy establishment of Messiah's kingdom, and in the blessings of the future world. These ideas found such ready acceptance, that oral and epistolary intercourse with many persons of Holland and Germany was soon begun. Among those interested were Horche, Muy, Petersen, and Spener. Since the time for the ingathering of the Philadelphia Church had come, the living word must be spoken by a living man. Accordingly, Johannes Dittmar of Salzungen was appointed "inspector," and, armed with credentials, was sent to Germany for the purpose. One important part of his mission was to unite the Philadelphians with the Pietists, especially those with Professor Franke at Halle. But, although kindly received, his mission was well-nigh fruitless. At the end of 1703 the Philadelphians drew up their confession; but, instead of advancing, they declined. In England others were formed. The Holland branch withdrew, — a particularly serious embarrassment, since it had been the medium of communication with Germany. Still, the visions of Mrs. Leade were to many irrefragable proofs of divinity, and implicitly accepted. Her death ended her repute; but, if the torrent has sunk in the sand, and, after a quarter of a century of first giving practical expression to the idea of universal brotherhood, it has not vanished. See Lit. under LEADE. H. HOCHHUTHE.

PHILASTER, or PHILASTRIUS, b. in the first quarter of the fourth century, probably in Italy; d. as Bishop of Brescia, July 18, 387, a noted heretic-hunter of his time. From his youth to his death he traveled from one end of the Roman Empire to the other, to track heretics, and convert them. Especially noticeable are his attacks on the Arian bishop, Auxentius, the predecessor of Ambrose, and his appearance at the council of Aquileia (381), where the two Arian bishops, Palladius and Secundianus, were condemned. About the same time he wrote his Liber de heresibus xi (enumeration and description of the hundred and fifty-six different heresies, of which twenty-eight fall before Christ, and one hundred and twenty-eight after). A few years earlier (374-377), Epiphanius wrote his Haerapous; and as, up to a certain point (Epiphanius, 57, and Philaster, 58), the two books agree with each other, not only with respect to materials, and arrangement in general, but often, also, with respect to the minor details of the representation, — phrases and words, — it has been inferred that Philaster plagiarized Epiphanius. The inference is hardly correct, however; and R. A. Lipsius, in his Zur Quellenkritik des Epiphanius (Vienna, 1866), has made it very probable that Epiphanius, himself, derived them from the lost "Regnum" of Hippolytus. What Philaster has added of his own is completely worthless. He discovered, or rather invented, the "divine secrets," — the wonders of God and nature, the profound spiritual experiences of regeneration and soul-resurrection, — in the speedy establishment of Messiah's kingdom, and in the blessings of the future world. These ideas found such ready acceptance, that oral and epistolary intercourse with many persons of Holland and Germany was soon begun. Among those interested were Horche, Muy, Petersen, and Spener. Since the time for the ingathering of the Philadelphia Church had come, the living word must be spoken by a living man. Accordingly, Johannes Dittmar of Salzungen was appointed "inspector," and, armed with credentials, was sent to Germany for the purpose. One important part of his mission was to unite the Philadelphians with the Pietists, especially those with Professor Franke at Halle. But, although kindly received, his mission was well-nigh fruitless. At the end of 1703 the Philadelphians drew up their confession; but, instead of advancing, they declined. In England others were formed. The Holland branch withdrew, — a particularly serious embarrassment, since it had been the medium of communication with Germany. Still, the visions of Mrs. Leade were to many irrefragable proofs of divinity, and implicitly accepted. Her death ended her repute; but, if the torrent has sunk in the sand, and, after a quarter of a century of first giving practical expression to the idea of universal brotherhood, it has not vanished. See Lit. under LEADE. H. HOCHHUTHE.

PHILASTER. 1824 PHILIP THE FAIR.

PHILIP THE APOSTLE. In the Synoptists and the Acts his name occurs only in the list of apostles (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 14; Acts i. 13). In John's Gospel he is several times mentioned. It was he who introduced Nathanael to Jesus (xxi. 2); he who gravely calculated the cost of feeding the five thousand men (vi. 5-7), who, in connection with Andrew, brought the Greeks, at their request, to Jesus (xii. 21-23); and, finally, he was the one who asked, on the last night of Christ's earthly life, for a revelation of the Father (xiv. 8, 9). The patristic information about him is erroneous, resulting from confounding him with Philip the evangelist. F. SIEFFERT.

PHILIP THE ARABIAN, Roman emperor (244-249); was b. at Bostra in Arabia, whence his surname, Arabs. His reign was, in political respect, utterly insignificant; but the question whether or not he was a Christian has some interest to the church historian. Eusebius is the first who states that Philip was a member of the Christian Church, and subject to its discipline (Hist. Eccl., vi. 34); but the statement is corroborated by notices of Libanius of Rome (Chron. in Pseudo, ed. Baluze, p. 343), in the Chronicon Paschale, ad Olym. (253), by Chrysostom (App., H. 470), Jerome (Chron. ad an. 249), and Orosius (Hist., 20). Some, as, for instance, Scaliger, Spanheim, etc., reject these testimonies as dependent upon Eusebius, who introduces his story with a "People say;" — while others — Moesheim, Uihlein, etc. — accept the statement that Philip was the first Christian emperor. See AUBE: Les chrétiens dans l'empire Romain, Paris, 1881.

PHILIP THE EVANGELIST, one of the seven chosen to attend to the secular concerns of the primitive Jerusalem Church (Acts vi. 5); most probably a Hellenist, certainly, like Stephen, a most liberal Jew. He was, indeed, the first to put liberal principles in practice; for, when persecution in Jerusalem dispersed the disciples, he went to the gates of Samaria, where he was welcome, and worked, by divine command, to a proselyte of the gate, — the chamberlain of Queen Candace, whom he baptized (viii. 26-40). On leaving the eunuch, Philip made a missionary journey along the plain of Sharon to Caesarea, where he apparently made his home, for there he entertained Paul and his travelling companions (Acts viii. 40). Mention is made, in this connection of Philip's four virgud daughters who prophesied (xxii. 8, 9). Patristic tradition sadly confounds Philip the evangelist and Philip the apostle, that it is difficult to unravel the confusion. It is probable, however, that tradition correctly reports, that in Caesarea one of these daughters died, that with the other three he removed to Hierapolis, and was subsequently bishop at Tralles. F. SIEFFERT.

PHILIP THE FAIR (king of France 1285-1314), an unscrupulous man, who never hesitated to employ even the basest means in order to reach his goal, but who, in the ends he pursued, was often not the means he used. 1285; he reigned 30 years. In 1314, an unscrupulous man, who never hesitated to employ even the basest means in order to reach his goal, but who, in the ends he pursued, was often not the means he used. 1285; he reigned 30 years. In 1314, the spell by which the Pope kept bound all the nations of Western and Northern Europe. In order to defray the expenses of the war with England, he imposed a heavy tax on the French clergy. The clergy complained to the Pope; and, by the bull Clericia laicos (Feb. 25, 1296), Boniface VIII. forbade in the most vehement expressions, and under penalty of excommunication, any layman, king, or lord, to levy tax on the clergy. Philip was compelled to yield, but he took revenge. From the proceeds of the precious metal, coined or uncoined, and thereby cut off a considerable portion of the Pope's revenue. Boniface immediately entered upon the retreat. A new bull (Ineffabilis amor, Sept. 25, 1296), and several briefs to the king and the French clergy, tried to explain the bull Clericia laicos into harmony with the king's wishes. Aug. 11, 1297, he excommunicated Louis IX.; in June, 1298, he appeared as umpire between France and England,—all on the side of France, etc. The immense success, however, of the jubilee of 1300 again brought forward the papal dreams of a universal monarchy; and as Pierre Dubois at the same time published his Summaria brevis, advocating the claims on a universal monarchy, and reducing the whole power and influence of the Church to the French, the French cardinal through the influence of his staunch adversary of Philip. Thus recommended to Philip, Clement was a Frenchman, and Archbishop of Tournay, and as soon as his legation was finished, and as soon as his legation was finished, and was permitted to take place in the Church of Anagni, Nogaret, placed before a mixed tribunal, accused of treason, and thrown into prison. Boniface convened the second council of the Lateran, which resulted in the bull Unam sanctam (Nov. 13, 1302), a completely unique piece of papal arrogance. Philip assembled the states-general for the first time in the history of France; and it was evident that the French prelates were ready to support. Only the clergy preserved a respectful behavior towards the Pope. The university, headed by Occam, declared against him. Gilles Romanus wrote his De regimine principis. John of Paris, his De potestate regia et populi, and Boniface was publicly caricatured in the French mysteries. Philip was, nevertheless, afraid of the effect of an excommunication; and Sept. 7, 1303, the day before the excommunication was going to take place in the Church of Anagni, Nogaret penetrated with a number of other conspirators into the papal palace, and took possession of the Pope. See Boniface VIII. The consequences of that audacious stroke were decisive. The successor of Boniface VIII., Benedict XI., died shortly after his accession; and his successor, Clement V., was a mere tool in the hands of Philip. Clement was a Frenchman, and Archbishop of Bourdeaux; but he was known as a stanch adversary of Philip. Thus recommended to the Italian cardinals, he gained the votes of the French cardinals through the influence of Philip; and the good-will of Philip he had secretly bought by the condemnation of Boniface VIII. as a heretic, the removal of the papal curia to the territory of France, the surrender of the order of the Templars to the pleasure of the king, and some other points. The Templars he actually delivered up to the avarice of Philip; his residence he took up at Avignon, thus inaugurating the Babylonian captivity of the popes; but the first point of the bargain he escaped from fulfilling. Nevertheless, his reign indicated in the plainest manner possible the decadence of the Papacy, and Philip was by no means anxious to conceal the real state of affairs. See Clement V. BOUTARIC. La France sous Philippe le Bel, Paris, 1861.

PHILIP THE MAGNANIMOUS. Landgrave of Hesse; b. at Marburg, Nov. 23, 1504; d. there March 31, 1567; one of the most prominent characters in the history of the German Reformation. He was only five years old when his father died, and only fourteen when he was declared of age. He was present at the Diet of Worms in 1521, but had at that time not yet made up his mind with respect to religious matters. He was, however, one of those who insisted that the safe conduct accorded to Luther should be kept sacred. He visited Luther in his lodgings, and on his return he allowed mass to be celebrated in German at Cassel. In the campaign against Franz von Sickingen, in 1522, he was accompanied by a Protestant preacher; and an incidental meeting with Melanchthon, on the road to Torgau, decided him. In February, 1526, he opened his country to the Reformation; in May he joined the Torgau Union; and in June he appeared at the Diet of Spires as one of the leaders of the Protestant party, surprising the Roman-Catholic bishop by his theological learning, the imperial commissioners by his moderation, and the King Ferdinand himself by the open threat of leaving the diet immediately if the enforcement of the edicts of Worms was insisted upon.

The great task he had on hand was to unite the German and Swiss Protestants into one compact party, and at the Diet of Spires (1529) he succeeded in baffling all the attempts of the Roman Catholics of producing an open breach. The Conference of Marburg, in the same year, was also his work; and it had, at all events, the effect of somewhat mitigating the hostility of the theologians. Nevertheless, at the Diet of Augsburg (1530), the Lutherans appeared to be willing to buy peace by sacrificing the interest of the Zwinglians. Philip proposed war, open and immediate; but the Lutherans suspected him of being a Zwinglian at heart, and their suspicion made him powerless. He subscribed the Confession Augusta, but reluctantly, and with an express reservation with respect to the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Finally, when he saw that nothing could be done, while he knew that the emperor could not be trusted, he suddenly left Augsburg. This resoluteness made an impression on the other Protestant princes; and in March, 1531, he was able to form the Smalcaldian League, though he was not able to procure admission to it for the Swiss Reformed. In the same year he opened negotiations with the king of Denmark; in 1532 he compelled the emperor to grant the peace of Nuremberg; in 1534, after the brilliant victory at Laufen, he enforced the restoration of Duke Ulrich of Wurttemberg, by which that country was opened to the Reformation; in 1539 he began negotiations with Francis I.; and in 1540 he again proposed to wage open war on the emperor.
simply used the affair to completely undermine the greatest crimes in Hesse. The emperor, however, was greatly impaired, and his activity much clogged, content himself with the right of excluding some landgrave, and kept him in prison for five years during the war, the emperor treacherously seized the conferences of Naumburg in 1554, and of Catholics; thus he was very active in promoting the theologians, even Luther and Melanchthon, also consented, on the condition that the marriage should be a deep secret. The Duchess of Rochlitz, however, would not keep silent; and the question then arose, what the emperor would do. The case was so much the worse, as in 1535 Philip had issued a law which made bigamy one of the greatest crimes in Hesse. The emperor, however, simply used the affair to completely undermine the political position of the landgrave; but the profit he drew from it was the arrest of no small one. During the difficult times which followed after the peace of Crespy (1544), the Protestant party had no acknowledged leader; during the Smalcaldian war (1546–47), no acknowledged head. After the war, the emperor treacherously seized the landgrave, and kept him in prison for five years. After his release, in 1552, Philip was not exactly a broken man; but he was much humbled, and was compelled to play the part of the mediator, especially between the Protestants and the Roman Catholics; thus he was very active in promoting the conferences of Naumburg in 1554, and of Worms in 1555.

PHILIP II., king of Spain (1556–98), b. at Valladolid, May 21, 1527; d. at the Escorial, Sept. 13, 1598. He was the most powerful and relentless adversary of the Reformation. From his father, Charles V., he inherited Spain (which at that time furnished the largest, the best drilled, and best equipped army in the world), the Netherlands (the seat of the highest industrial and commercial development), besides vast possessions in the West Indies and America, from which he drew an inexhaustible wealth of gold and silver and the choicest productions of the earth. But he was of a dull and barren nature, and knew not what to do with his riches. Devoid of sympathy, and capable only of a singular kind of cold fanaticism, egotism was the sole motive-power in his will; and all his exertions in behalf of the Roman-Catholic creed were due to the circumstance that it was his creed. His dealings with the Pope clearly show, that, even in the direction of ecclesiastical affairs, he could brook no other will than his own. He nominated to all the dignities and benefices of the Spanish Church, and in orthodoxy, as in polygamy, all was to be absolute. No papal bull or brief could be read in his realm without his place. The statutes and decrees of the Council of Trent were received only by force of arms; and in the concile he did not consent himself with the right of excluding some obnoxious candidate, but claimed also the right of proposing some favorite candidate. Pius IV. complained bitterly, in the presence of the cardinal and the Spanish ambassador, Vargas, of the exorbitant pretensions of the king. Pius V. tried to force him into compliance by withdrawing the subsidies of the clergy, but in vain. Under Sixtus V., the Spanish ambassador Olivares actually proposed to the king to separate from Rome, and to convolve a national council as the best means of removing the king's own personal, political plans thwarted by the league, he sent the arms against her, and was defeated; and the supremacy of the sea passed from Catholic Spain to Protestant England. In the Netherlands he stirred up the political passions as deeply as the religious; and many of his measures, though introduced under religious pretences, were really and chiefly of political import. In France he completely spoiled the game, and actually prepared the way for Henry IV., by claiming the crown for himself. Nevertheless, though principally prompted in all his doings by his egotism, he was the most formidable adversary the Reformation had to encounter, and in his own country he completely succeeded in burning it out. See Prescott: History of the Reign of Philip II., New York, 1855–58, 3 vols.: BAUMSTARK: Philip II., Friburg, 1876.

PHILIP THE TETRARCH. See HEROD, p. 988. letter, still preserved, at their request, and to them sent all the letters of Ignatius in possession of the Smyrnian church (Polyc., Ad Phil., c. xii.).
But, from that time on, the church is not heard from, save as one of its bishops signs his name to some ecclesiastical document. The place itself is now a mere ruins. See especially Lightfoot:
PHILIPPI, Friedrich Adolf, b. in Berlin, Oct.
15, 1809; d. at Rostock, Aug. 29, 1882. He was of Jewish descent, but early embraced Christianity, studied philology and theology, and was appointed professor of theology at Dorpat in 1811, and at Rostock in 1853. His Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (Frankfurt, 1848-50) ran through several editions, and was translated into English, Edinburgh, 1878. His Kirch-lische Glaubenlehre appeared at Gütersloh, 1854-82, in 6 vols., and is a learned and able vindication of strict Lutheran orthodoxy. See his Life by L. Schulze, Nordlingen, 1883.
PHILIPPANS, Epistle to. See Paul.
PHILIPPISTS, term denoting pupils and adherents of Philip Melanchthon. It originated in the middle of the sixteenth century, and probably in the Flacian camp. At first it simply designated a theological party, and was, by the Gnesio-Lutherans, applied to the theologians of Wittenberg and Leipzig who had adopted the views of Melanchthon, and were accused of deviating from pure Lutheranism, both in the direction of Romanism and in the direction of Calvinism.
Afterwards it also assumed an ecclesiastro-political significance, and was applied to the party, which, under the lead of Feuer, Cracau, Stossel, and others, labored to bring about a union between all the Protestant powers, and to break down the confessional bar between Lutheranism and Calvinism by means of Melanchthonianism.
Luther had hardly died before the peace of the Lutheran Church was gone. The difference between him and Melanchthon had long been distinctly felt; but, as long as he lived, it was not allowed to take positive form. Immediately after his death, however, the Gnesio-Lutherans and the Philippists arranged themselves over against each other in open antagonism. The Gnesio-Lutherans— Amsdorff, Flacius, Migard, Mürlin, and others— considered themselves the representatives of the pure faith, the guardians of ortho-doxy, and looked upon the Philippists as a set of men who had been carried away by a dangerous weakness. The Philippists— Camerarius, Major, Menius, Cruciger, and others— were conscious of being the party of progress, and suspected the Gnesio-Lutherans of despising science, and bowing too submissively to the letter. Other elements— personal, political, and ecclesiastical—were introduced in the divergence, and served to widen the breach; the rivalry between the two Saxon lines, the Albertine and the Ernestine;
the jealousy between the universities of Wittenberg and Jena, etc.

The Leipzig Interim of 1548 gave occasion for the first controversy between the Gnesio-Lutherans and the Philippists; but the syncretistic controversy broke out only a little later; and all the differences between the views of Luther and Me-lanchthon— concerning justification, the Lord's Supper, the freedom of the will, etc.— were at once brought into the fire. The Gnesio-Lutherans were very violent; and the attacks which the conventions of Weimar, Coesig, and Magdeburg (1558-57), levelled against Melanchthon, were in the highest degree offensive. The Philippists, however, were more equal to the situation, as may be seen from their Synodus Avium, a satire by Johann
Major, and the famous Epistola Scholasticiorum Wittenbergensium, issued by the two Philippist universities, and pointed directly at Flacius. The culminating point is indicated by the Weimar Consuetudines (1559), in which synergism, majorism, sadiphism, etc., are confuted, and condemned as heresies. As it soon became apparent, however, that the extravagances of the Gnesio-Lutheran professors drove the students away from the university, they were dismissed (1562-65), and Phiippists appointed in their stead. But after the accession of Johann Wilhelm, in 1567, a re-action took place, and the Philippist professors had to give way to the Gnesio-Lutheran. A reconciliation of the two parties was attempted by the colloquy of Altenburg, Oct. 21, 1568, but failed.

In 1569 the Elector of Saxon demanded that all ministers in his country should subscribe to the Corpus Doctrinum Philippicum, which was a great victory to the Philippists. But the elector did so, not from any preference for Philippism, but because he believed said institution to be a representation of pure Lutheranism, free from all Flacian extravagances. The publication, however, of the Witteuberg Catechism (1571), containing a very outspoken exposition of the doctrines of the Lord's Supper and the personality of Christ, and the outcry which the whole Gnesio-Lutheran camp raised against it, made him uneasy; and when the Exegetes perspicius controvertiae de sacra vana appeared in 1574, he began to suspect that he had been the victim of some kind of mystifiction. The Philippist professors— Widebram, Petzel, Cruciger, and others— were at once dismissed, and treated in a rather harsh manner.
The blow thus struck at Philippism was fatal.
With the introduction of the Formula of Confidence, the Philippists lost their hold on the public attention; and, with the exception of a short episode in the history of electoral Saxony, 1586-91 (see the art. Krell), it survived only as a local coloring of the theology of certain universities. See the various representations in the histories of Protestant theology, by Flacius, Hepp, Frank, Gass, Dorner, and others.

PHILISTINES— נפתל (Neftalı only Amos ix. 7), LXX., Φιλιστήρις, and also άλλονος, called by Josephus, Arch., 1, 6, 2, Φιλιστών, by Herodotus, 2, 104; 3, 5, 91; 7, 89, Παλαιστίνα— were the inhab-ijants of a district along the south-western coast of Canaan, which, not counting the Negeb, south of Gaza, was only about twenty-five miles in length. We describe them:

I. The Country.— Egypt, with its district
Pelusium, extends as far as the River of Egypt (Gen. xv. 18; Num. xxxiv. 5, etc.), i.e., to the modern el-Arieh, which, coming northward out of Arabia, flows into the Mediterranean where the coast turns from the east to the north. Here the Philistine territory commenced, and extended to where the Sorek, which arises near Jerusalem, empties into the Mediterranean. The district south of Gaza already belongs to the Negeb, or PHILISTINES.

1828

PHILISTINES.

south country, and is therefore mostly a desert. One of its rare fruitful spots is the Saracen strong hold el-Arish, the ancient MINIMULA, called Lars during the time of the crusades, one of the principal stations between Egypt and Syria. A little north of this is Bir Refa, the Rafa of the Greeks and Romans; eastward of this, the ruins of Umm Jerar, the ancient Gerar. The coun try on the coast north of the Wady Sheriah was in old times highly productive. (Cf. the map of Western Palestine by Conder.) North of Ashkelon were the most fertile districts. In this terri tory proper, from Gaza to Jabne we can distinguish between D^n «|in(Deut. i.7 ; Josh. v. 1), with the corresponding Πνω (Josh. xi. 16; Jer.

xxxii. 44, xxxiii. 13), and the hilly districts ex tending towards Judaea, Πνω (Josh. x. 40, xii. 9).

Of the five chief cities, three were situated on the coast, it was surrounded by a plain rich in water and vegetation. North-west of the city is an olive-woods, the largest and most beautiful in Palestine. In the south there are immense fruit and palm orchards. The city has now six teen thousand inhabitants. The streets are nar row and ugly: there is neither wall nor gate. It lies on a slope looking to the north. The most beautiful building is the chief mosque Jami-el-

Ghaz-zeh. In old times it was the chief medium of the Syrio-Egyptian trade, and is at present yet an important market. Situated on the edge of the desert, and twenty stades (two miles and a half)
from the coast, it was surrounded by a plain rich in water and vegetation. North-west of the city is an olive-woods, the largest and most beautiful in olden times highly productive. (Cf. the map of Western Palestine by Conder.) North of Ash-kelon were the most fertile districts. In this terri tory proper, from Gaza to Jabne we can dis tinguish between D^n «|in(Deut. i.7 ; Josh. v. 1),
with the corresponding Πνω (Josh. xi. 16; Jer.

xxxii. 44, xxxiii. 13), and the hilly districts ex
tending towards Judaea, Πνω (Josh. x. 40, xii. 9).

Of the five chief cities, three were situated on the coast, it was surrounded by a plain rich in water and vegetation. North-west of the city is an olive-woods, the largest and most beautiful in Palestine. In the south there are immense fruit and palm orchards. The city has now six teen thousand inhabitants. The streets are nar row and ugly: there is neither wall nor gate. It lies on a slope looking to the north. The most beautiful building is the chief mosque Jami-el-

Ghaz-zeh. In old times it was the chief medium of the Syrio-Egyptian trade, and is at present yet an important market. Situated on the edge of the desert, and twenty stades (two miles and a half)
from the coast, it was surrounded by a plain rich
in water and vegetation. North-west of the city is an olive-woods, the largest and most beautiful
in olden times highly productive. (Cf. the map of Western Palestine by Conder.) North of Ash-
kelon were the most fertile districts. In this terri try on the coast north of the Wady Sheriah was extends to the sea north of Ashdod, then itster

North-west of this are the ruins of the old harbor ruins of Merasch, a mile south of Bét-Jibrîn.

Now the basis of Mic. i. 14, find it near the ruins of Merâš, a mile south of Bét-Jibrîn.

But the meaning of this verse is too uncertain.
From 1 Sam. v. 1-10 and 1 Sam. xvii. 52 it seems that Gath was situated near Ekron.

Al

already in the Onomasticon (cf. Πθο and Πθεβος)
there is an ancient fort. On Mic. i.

Jerome says that this city "vicina Judaeæ confino de Eleutheropolis (Bét-Jibrîn) eunutâs Gazam, nunc usque vicus vel maximus": but on Jer. xxv.

"Geth vicina atque confino est Azoto." If Gath was really situated in the Wady Samûr, which extends to the sea north of Ashdod, then its ter itory was comparatively large. No ruins of a former city are found here.

Ekron, the Accaron of the Greeks and Latina, was the most northerly of the five Philistine ci ties; and Robinson (iii., p. 229 sqq.) correctly finds it in the village of Akîr, two miles and a half north of the Wady Surar. There are, however, few evidences of a high antiquity found here. Jabne is also called a Philistine city in 2 Chron. xxvi.

6, identical with the border city of Judah, Jabneel
(Josh. xv. 11). Later it was called 'lu/ivia or 'lufrwes (Joseph., B. J., 1, 7, 7; Strab. 16, 750; Plin. 5, 14).

It is, beyond a doubt, the modern Jebna.

II. The People. — Although never able per manently to subdue any important portion of Palestine, yet the inhabitants of Philistia were sufficiently warlike to oppose Israel's supremacy in Canaan, generally to maintain their independ ence, in later times to take part in the move ments of the nations, especially of Hellenism against Judaism, and for a long time to resist the introduction of Christianity. Their historical importance, as far as Israel was concerned, con sisted in their mission of calling forth the better purposes and activity of the latter, and hence adding to its preservation and development.

The name ἐπιστρφ is probably connected with the verb falascha, retained in the Ethiopic, and related to סכ. In harmony with this is that

I. X., from Judges on, always translates 'הללוס
ב. They bore this name of "Immigrants, probably because they arrived in Canaan later than the other inhabitants. The poetic form,

ב. In the sense of immigration, was originally also the name of the people. (Cf. Ps. ls. 10, xxxiii. 8, lxxixii. 4, civili. 10; Jer. xiv. 29, 31,
but cf. Exod. xv. 14.) The country is called

ב. In the sense of immigration, was originally
also the name of the people. (Cf. Ps. ls. 10,
xxxiii. 8, lxxixii. 4, civili. 10; Jer. xiv. 29, 31,
but cf. Exod. xv. 14.) The country is called

ב. In the sense of immigration, was originally
also the name of the people. (Cf. Ps. ls. 10,
xxxiii. 8, lxxixii. 4, civili. 10; Jer. xiv. 29, 31,
but cf. Exod. xv. 14.) The country is called

ב. In the sense of immigration, was originally
also the name of the people. (Cf. Ps. ls. 10,
xxxiii. 8, lxxixii. 4, civili. 10; Jer. xiv. 29, 31,
but cf. Exod. xv. 14.) The country is called

ב. In the sense of immigration, was originally
also the name of the people. (Cf. Ps. ls. 10,
xxxiii. 8, lxxixii. 4, civili. 10; Jer. xiv. 29, 31,
but cf. Exod. xv. 14.) The country is called

םי in the sense of immigration, was originally
also the name of the people. (Cf. Ps. ls. 10,
xxxiii. 8, lxxixii. 4, civili. 10; Jer. xiv. 29, 31,
but cf. Exod. xv. 14.) The country is called

םי in the sense of immigration, was originally
also the name of the people. (Cf. Ps. ls. 10,
xxxiii. 8, lxxixii. 4, civili. 10; Jer. xiv. 29, 31,
but cf. Exod. xv. 14.) The country is called

םי in the sense of immigration, was originally
also the name of the people. (Cf. Ps. ls. 10,
xxxiii. 8, lxxixii. 4, civili. 10; Jer. xiv. 29, 31,
but cf. Exod. xv. 14.) The country is called

םי in the sense of immigration, was originally
also the name of the people. (Cf. Ps. ls. 10,
xxxiii. 8, lxxixii. 4, civili. 10; Jer. xiv. 29, 31,
but cf. Exod. xv. 14.) The country is called

םי in the sense of immigration, was originally
also the name of the people. (Cf. Ps. ls. 10,
xxxiii. 8, lxxixii. 4, civili. 10; Jer. xiv. 29, 31,
but cf. Exod. xv. 14.) The country is called

םי in the sense of immigration, was originally
also the name of the people. (Cf. Ps. ls. 10,
xxxiii. 8, lxxixii. 4, civili. 10; Jer. xiv. 29, 31,
but cf. Exod. xv. 14.) The country is called

םי in the sense of immigration, was originally
also the name of the people. (Cf. Ps. ls. 10,
xxxiii. 8, lxxixii. 4, civili. 10; Jer. xiv. 29, 31, PHILISTINES.

1829

by Josephus (Arch., 12, 610), for the land of the Philistines exclusively, but afterwards employed for all Canaan.

In reference to the origin of the Philistines, Gen. x. 14, and, in connection with it, Deut. ii. 23, Amos vi. 7, Jer. xlvii. 4, come into consideration. In the first passage they are traced to the Casluhim, in the others to Caphtor. 1 Chron. i. 12, and the older versions, show that the statement in Gen. x. 14 is not "lapis caudani." Both statements are undoubtedly correct. The descendents of Caphtor probably first went to the Casluhim, and then migrated to Canaan. Thus Baur and Köhler. The passages can be harmonized only if Casluhim and Caphtorim are virtually one and the same. Good authorities, on the basis of the view in the Targum Jerusalem, such as Knobel, Ebers, and others, connect Casluhim with the Coptic kis = hill, and lokh = sterility, the Arabic el-Rasrun, and find the locality in the dry district along the northern coast of Egypt, near Pelusium. But how about Caphtor? Many think it is Crete, because in 2 Sam. viii. 18, xv. 45-47, the larger cities had offshoots as far as the River of Egypt. (Cf. also 1 Sam. xxvii. 5 and Josh. xvi. 2; Jer. iii. 18, 25, 29.) The erstwhile island, in the same sense as the other Canaanites were "nothing else than Semites" (Schrader: Kritisches u. d. A. T., p. 74). i.e., Hamitic, degenerated Semites,— Semites in the wider sense of the word, in the same sense as the other Canaanites were such.

In reference to the language, the surest index of the origin of a people, Hitzig has attempted to connect the twelve to fifteen names and titles which we know as Philistine, with the Sanscrit and Greek, in order to support his Pelasgic theory. But everywhere the Semitic etymology proves to be the better, as the names Gaza, Gath, Abimelech, Delilah, Dagon, Jishbi, Jittai, and Saph show. Other names, such as Achasus (Gen. xxvi. 20), Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 4), have, as can be easily explained from the emigration of the Philistines from Egypt, the Egyptian ending ath (cf. Gnubath, 1 Kings xi. 20). Also the ending en in Seraim, the name of a Philistine prince, is Egyptian. The name of the Philistine harbors, Majuma, is entirely Egyptico-Philistine. Meo, in Coptic, meaning "place," and jum, "sea." Other names point to the same origin. Above all, the fact comes into consideration, that the Philistines spoke a language which the Hebrews could understand well without an interpreter.

In their religion they worshipped Dagon, according to Judg. xvi. 23 sqq., in Gaza; according to 1 Sam. v. 1 sqq., 1 Mac. x. 83, xi. 4, in Ashdod; and, according to Jerome, in other cities; and Baal-zebub in Ekron (2 Kings i. 2, 3, 6, 10). The former was probably identical with the old Babylonian divinity, Dakan: the latter was, beyond a doubt, a mere modification of the Canaanite Baal. The worship of the former, as his name and idol indicate— for ἐξωτικός points to ἐξωτικός (LXX.) = form of a fish—is derived from the fact that the people living along the seacoast saw the principle of life and productiveness in the water, and more especially in the fish. The worship of the other—connected with the Baal who brings and takes away the flies, and with whom Zeus and Hercules as ἀπώματος can be compared—was suggested by the vast number of insects in Lower Egypt and Philistia. Like the other Canaanites, they worshipped also a female principle. They had Astarte temples (1 Sam. xxxi. 10; cf. Diod., iv. 2, 9), in which they worshipped a female deity, of which was a woman, and the body a fish. (Cf. the arts. Dagon and Atargatis.) On the basis of this cultus, diviners enjoyed higher honor among the Philistines than elsewhere. (Cf. 1 Sam. vi. 1; Isa. ii. 6; 2 Kings i. 2 sqq.) Entirely distinct from this ancient religion are the later divinities—such as Baal, Belos, and others—introduced by the Syrian rulers.

For the commerce and culture of the Philistines, it was doubtless a matter of importance, that, outside of the five chief cities, also the country was densely populated. As is seen from Josh. xv. 40-47, the larger cities had offshoots as far as the River of Egypt. (Cf. also 1 Sam. xxxii. 5 and 4 Sam. xii. 5.) The productive agriculture was probably mostly in the hands of the original inhabitants. (Cf. Deut. ii. 23.) The herds were kept mostly in the Negeb (2 Chron. xvi. 11); the vine and the olive were cultivated. Hence it is easily understood why the Midianites plundered as far as Gaza (Judg. vi. 4), and that Philistia, in times of famine, was a refuge for the sufferers (2 Kings viii. 1). The people also worked in metal (1 Sam. xiii. 19 sqq., vi. 18; 2 Sam. v. 21; 1 Chron. xiv. 12; 1 Sam. xxxii. 9; 1 Chron. x. 9), and built temples for Dagon (Judg. xvi. 23-31). The various weapons carried by the soldiers are described (1 Sam. xvii. 4-6, 45, 50, xii. 9, xii. 10; 2 Sam. xi. 16). Their wealth indicates that they engaged in commerce. (Cf. Judg. xvi. 18; 1 Chron. xiii. 11; 2 Chron. xiv. 11.) The position of their country made them the natural middlemen for the Syrian and Egyptian trade. However, this trade was never very important, and never any thing like that of Phoenicia. The country did not even possess a good harbor. The chief peculiarity of these people was their bravery and endurance in war, as is abundantly shown by their contests with Israel.

The political government of the five principal cities was in the hands of five chiefs, called δικτύον (LXX., ἄρχουσι τῶν Φυλαττέων); according to Gesenius, thus, "axes of wagons," after the Arabic; according to Ewald, "rulers," from the same root.
PHILISTINES. 1830

with "b", sometimes "b" (1 Sam. xviii. 30, xxix. 8, 9). They were more than mere leaders in war (Judg. xvi. 5, 8, 18, 27, 30; 1 Sam. v. 8, 11, vi. 12, xix. 2). At the same time there are references to kings among them. Cf. Gen. xxxi. 1, 8; 1 Sam. xii. 12, xxvii. 2 sqq.; 1 Kings ii. 39; Amos i. 8; Zech. ix. 5; Jer. xxv. 20; 1 Kings v. 1. These are probably different names for the same office. In all probability there was some union between the different rulers, as they always act in harmony and unison.

The History.—Before the old Enakim, whose descendants were found in Gath, Gaza, and Ashdod (Josh. xi. 22; 2 Sam. xxi. 19-21; 1 Chron. xxi. 5-8), and to whom Goliath and other giants belonged, the Avim belonged to the original inhabitants (Deut. ii. 23; Josh. xii. 2), who, since they are not reckoned among the Canaanites in Gen. x. 15-18, or elsewhere, are to be regarded as some of the pre-Canaanites, inhabitants of Canaan. When the Philistines proper migrated into this country cannot be accurately ascertained. According to Gen. xxxii. 33, and xxvi. 1, 8, 14 sqq., 18, they already occupied the district of Gerar, south of Gaza, in the days of Abraham and Isaac. Hence this migration had no connection whatever with the expulsion of the Hyksos, about a hundred and fifty years before Moses. The statements of Herodotus (2, 128), that Philis, or Philition, led his flocks near Memphis, and the remark of Manetho, that the Hyksos retreated to Syria, show, at most, that these were possibly related to the Philistines, and does not exclude the earlier migration of the latter. That they occupied Philistia in the days of Moses is stated very distinctly in Exod. xiii. 17 sqq. They took possession of the cities along the coast; and the original inhabitants had to withdraw to the villages and open country, where they were found in the days of Joshua, and later (Deut. ii. 23; Josh. xii. 3).

The country of the Philistines, like that of the other Canaanites, was appointed to be taken possession of by the children of Israel (cf. Gen. xv. 19 sqq.); but neither Joshua nor his successors succeeded in subduing it. The subjection of the three Philistine cities, Gaza, Ashkelon, and Ekron, by the tribe of Judah, mentioned in Judg. i. 18, did not prove permanent. The necessary result of these relations between Israel and the Philistines was constant war, which, however, developed into small and irregular combat only. With a commerce of small importance, compared with that of the Phoenicians, the Philistines, owing to the density of their population, were in constant temptation of making freebooting expeditions into the neighboring districts of Judah and Dan. The deed of Shamgar (recorded Judg. iii. 31) is probably but one example of many similar but less important. Samson's adventures are probably of a similar character, but seem to belong to a later period. The great activity in the movements of the Philistines in the days of Eli, Samuel, and David, was not the result of a renewed immigration of Caphthorim, as Ewald and G. Baur think, but are rather connected with the general uprising of the Eastern nations, especially the Ammonites, in those days. (Cf. Judg. x. 7-9, xiv. 1, xv. 9.) They even exercised a certain supremacy over Israel's actions (Judg. x. 9), and the tribe of Judah deemed it necessary to deliver Samson into their power (Judg. xv. 11). Encouraged by Samuel's words, the Israelites attempted to drive them back into their own territory, but the Philistines succeeded in achieving a great victory, and secured the ark of the covenant (1 Sam. iv. 1 sqq.). Only when Israel had been more united, through Samuel's far-reaching activity, did it succeed in its endeavors against the Philistines. After forty years of oppression (Judg. xiii. 1), Israel was delivered of these enemies by a decisive battle fought in the neighborhood of Beth Kar, down the Wady Beita Hanin (just west of Jerusalem, where Samuel erected his Eben-ezer, about the site of the present Kulinieh and the New-Testament Emmaus); and 1 Sam. vii. 13 reports that after this they did not again come across the boundaries of Israel. This probably means that the frequent customary freebooting expeditions ceased.

Probably fearing the result of Israel's union under their king, Saul, the Philistines made a desperate effort to regain what they had lost. Soon after their defeat (1 Sam. x. 6), they pressed on, even beyond Mizpah, and took possession of the pass between Gibea of Benjamin and Michmash, in order to cut off the northern tribes (1 Sam. x. 5, xili. 3). And, in truth, their supremacy, to a greater or less extent, continued for a second forty years, down to the days of David. Saul's efforts did not prove successful (1 Sam. xiii. 6, 7, x. 8, xili. 7; cf. Joseph. Arch., 6, 5-7, 1). One of the episodes during these wars was the death of Goliath by David, in the southern Wady Samit, near Bethlehem (1 Sam. xvii. 1 sqq.); and later they were repeatedly defeated by David (1 Sam. xviii. 25, xii. 8). Yet they again took up arms against Israel with success (1 Sam. xxii. 1-5). David's stay with them, and his residence in Ziklag, secured for them the possession of the southern country (1 Sam. xxv. 1-15 sqq.). Saul and his sons fell in a battle with them fought in the mountains of Gilboa (1 Sam. xxxxi. 1); and, through this victory, the northern country also, in all probability, fell into their hands. Only after David had united the various tribes of Israel under his sceptre did he succeed in breaking this yoke by a series of victorious battles (2 Sam. xxii. 16 sqq., xxii. 9 sqq. v. 17 sqq., viii. 1). No attempt of complete destruction was now any longer made. Gath paid tribute to Solomon, and was fortified by Rehoobam (1 Kings iv. 24, v. 1, 4, x. 5, 2 Chron. xi. 8). After the division of Israel into two kingdoms, the Philistines seem again to have enlarged their boundaries. (Cf. 1 Kings xv. 27, xvi. 15; 2 Chron. xxvii. 11.) They even conquered Jerusalem in conjunction with the Arabs (2 Chron. xxxi. 16 sqq.; Joel iv. 4). Judaea in its better days records some victories over them (2 Kings xv. 17; 2 Chron. xxvi. 6 sqq.; Amos vi. 2; 2 Kings xviii. 8; 2 Chron. xxii. 8, xvi. 6, xxviii. 18). But they kept up their warlike proclivities to the very days of Assyrian and Babylonian domination. The Assyrian king, Ninurta (about 800 B.C.), mentions that he conquered Philistia; Tiglath-pileser boasts of having overcome Hanno (Hammur) of Gaza, and having taken that city; Sargon conquered and destroyed Gaza and other cities; his general (Tartan) later took Ashdod; Sanherib add... ed to this the conquest of Ashkelon and Ekron and Asarhabaddon completed the total overthrow of this little country in connection with the conquest of all Egypt and Asia east of the Mediterranean. (Cf. Schrader: Keilinschrift. u. d. A. T., pp. 112, 145, 171 sqq., 212, 257 sqq.) Psmamnetichus could take Ashdod, which had been strongly fortified by the Assyrians, only after besieging it twenty-nine years (Herod., 2, 157), and took Gaza also. A later Phoenician conqueror Greek for a second time (Jer. xvi. 11). Yet, notwithstanding all these humiliations, they had not suffered like the Israelites. They were not all led into captivity; and their cities were soon built up anew, though probably, in part, inhabited by Edomites from Southern Judaea. Ashdod is mentioned in Neh. iv. 7 as an enemy of Judaea; and the Philistine language is called "the speech of Ashdod." (Neh. xiii. 24). Neither the conquest of Gaza by Cambyses, and not even the terrible destruction of the city by Alexander the Great, after a siege of two or more months, could annihilate the community of this city. (Cf. Arrian. Alex., 3, 20, 27; Curtius, 4, 5, 6.) The latter made the name historic, but he did not change the inhabitants. Immediately the old and revived antiquity of the Jews seems to have sought the destruction of the Philistine nationality. Judas Maccabaeus marched against Ashdod (1 Macc. v. 66 (88)): Jonathan plundered and burned the city and the Dagon temple (1 Macc. x. 98, xi. 60). The Syrian king, Alexander Balas, made the latter a present of Ashdod to a Greek friend, to get peace (1 Macc. xi. 61 sqq.). Gaza was not entirely destroyed until under Alexander Janneus (96 B.C.). Some of these ruined cities again were built up. Gabinius, one of Pompey's generals, again built up Ashdod (55 A.D.), and founded a new Gaza, south of the old (in 58 A.D.). Pompey placed the seat of a governor under the jurisdiction of the Syrian province (Joseph., Arch., 14, 4, 4, 5): only under Herod and Agrippa I. were they to some extent united again with the Jewish kingdom. Herod favored the growth of the Philistine cities; and, owing to this favor, Ashkelon at that time assumed an importance even greater than that of Gaza; and, on account of its magnificent buildings, was afterwards called the "Bride of Syria." In consequence of their Hellenistic spirit the Philistine cities adhered to Vespasian in the last Jewish war; and the Jews, as a consequence, burned Gaza and Anthedon in 65 A.D. While Judas was utterly laid waste by this war, and later by the insurrection of Barcocheba, the Philistines continued to flourish there. In the reign of Claudius. Very little is known of his life. The sources of information consist only of scattered notices in his own writings (Legal. ad Caj., 22, 28; Contra Flaccum; De spec. leg., i. 1; De provid., 2, 107), and in those of Josephus (Ant., XVIII. 8, 1, XX. 5, 2), Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., II. 4), Jerome, Isidorus Pelus., Photius (Bibl. Cod., C. v.), and Suidas. He belonged to a distinguished and wealthy family of priestly descent, and was a brother to Alexander Lysinachus, the alabarch, or president, of the Jewry of Alexandria. In 30 or 40 A.D. he visited Rome. The imperial governor, Publius Avilius Flaccus, was very hostile to the Jews in Egypt. In undetermined years, the Jewry of Alexandria sent an embassy to the emperor, Caligula, and Philo headed the embassy. An official audience they did not obtain; and, when they were admitted to the imperial presence, the half-crazy Caligula ran about in the room, tantalizing them with their abstinence from pork, and allowing them no opportunity of presenting their grievances. Philo also visited Jerusalem and other holy places in Palestine, but at what period in his life cannot be ascertained. The legends of his meeting the apostle Peter in Rome, his conversion to Christianity, and his relapse into Judaism, are mere fables.
PHILO. 1832

PHILO.

The writings of Philo are exegetical, philosophical, and political. His exegetical works are arranged in three groups,—the cosmogonical, received from Hellenism; De mundo seems to be a later condensation of a work by Philo. Information concerning manuscripts and earlier editions of the works of Philo is found in Thomas Mangny's excellent edition, London, 1742, 2 vols. Further details are found in Delaunay's Philon d'Alexandrie, Paris, 1867, Tischendorf's prolegomena to his Philoeea inedita, Leipzig, 1868, and in the later editions of Philo by A. F. Pfeiffer, Erlangen, 1875-92, and C. E. Richter, Leipzig, 1828-30, 8 vols. [There is an English translation, by C. D. Yonge, in Bohn's Ecclesiastical Library, London, 1854-55, 4 vols.]

The peculiar blending of Jewish monotheism and Hellenic pantheistic tendencies in the works of Philo is not simply an individual feature of the author. An attempt at combination between Greek and Hebrew wisdom, a process of assimilation of those two elements, had gone on for a long time in Alexandria. It may be traced back even to the translators of the Septuagint. But Philo is the legitimate representative of that movement, its result. Already the Fathers were struck by the thoroughness with which his whole mind seemed permeated by Plato. Either Philo platonizes, or Plato philonizes, says Suidas; and Philo himself always speaks of Plato as the great, the holy. This must not be understood, however, as if Philo had sacrificed anything substantial of the faith of the Old Testament to the fancy of the Greek philosophy, anything substantial of Judaism to Platonism. By no means! His faith in the living, personal God never wavered, —the Creator and the Ruler of the world, who, out of the whole human race, had chosen Israel as his own people, and revealed himself to them through Moses. To Philo, Moses was the prophet among the prophets, and the Mosaic law the sura of the Jewish consciousness of God, and softens the austere morality of the Old Testament. See Wolff: Philo's Philosophie, Gothenburg, 1859; Sterngren: Om Philos Gudserkjendelsc, Copenhagen, 1870; Drummond: Philo: Principles of the Jewish-Alexandrian Philosophy, London, 1877. His allegorical method, always artificial, often extravagant, and sometimes violent, he borrowed exclusively from the Greek philosophers, especially Plato and the Stoics. The Stoics liked to dissolve the Greek myths into abstract ideas, to reduce to simple observations the images and personifications contained in the traditions of the popular religion; and the method they employed was the allegory. This method Philo adopted, and applied to the Bible. The Bible he taught has a double meaning,—a literal and an allegorical; the latter pervading the former like a fine fluid; and there are cases in which the literal sense must be altogether excluded, as, for instance, when a passage states something unworthy of God (God planting trees, questioning Adam, de sceousness in interpretation is Philonian, Gottingen, 1807; and C. Siegfried: Philo als Ausleger d. A.T., Jena, 1876.

By writers of the rationalistic school, Philo is generally represented as having exercised a decisive influence, not only on the ancient Christian theology, but even on Christianity itself. See Baer: Die Lehre von der göttlichen Mitwelt, 1821; Gribek: Philo, 1831; and Geschichte des Urchristentums, 1833; Grossmann: Fragestellungen Philosophens, 1829; and others. But not the least bit of evidence has ever been offered of an historical connection between Philo and the founder of Christianity, or his apostles. The whole basis of the assertion is a mere extension of certain theological ideas and expressions in the works of Philo and the books of the New Testament; and, when the logos-doctrine of John has been represented as directly derived from the logos-doctrine of Philo, the representation rests upon a gross mistake. The logos of Philo is a cosmic, naturalistic power, without real personality, borrowed from the Greeks; while the logos of John is an ethical personality in the highest sense of the word,—the realization of the Messianic idea of the Old Testament. See Kellner: Philo's Lehre von den göttlichen Mitwelten, Leipzig, 1846; Max Heine: Die Lehre vom Logos in der griechischen Philosophie, Oldenburg, 1872; Soulier: La philosophie dans les Evangiles et dans l'Apocalypse, Halle, 1873; F. Klaas: Der Logos der jüd.-alex. Religionsphilosophie, Freiburg, 1879. But his exegetical method, and its principle of allegorization, was generally adopted and extensively employed by the ancient Fathers, not only by Barnabas, Justin, Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, and Eusebius, but also by Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine. See Ges. Geschichtliche Darstellung der jüd.-alex. Religionsphilosophie, Halle, 1834. ZÖCKER.

PHILO CARPATHIUS is mentioned in Polybius (Vita Epiphanii, c. 49), and by Suidas; but whether he was from the city of Carpassia in the Island of Cyprus, or from the Island of Carpathos, situated between Creta and Rhodius, cannot be ascertained, nor when he is the author of the Commentary on the Canticles, which was published in a Latin translation in 1537, by Stephanus Salviatus, in Paris.

PHILOPATRIS is the name of a dialogue found among the works of Lucian, and generally quoted as an example of Pagan satire on Christianity. It was not until Christianity had emerged forthin a mature form, free from philosophic speculation; and it was not until Grecian wisdom had outgrown the myths of Heathenism, that philosophy appeared so strong, disdainful of religious superstition. Nor was it strange that the first meeting of the two great powers should have resulted in misunderstanding and conflict. The early Christians, claiming a revealed knowledge from Heaven, could only denounce philosophy as the foolishness of this world; and the early philosophers, in their protestations of Christian orthodoxy, were fain to despise Christianity as a mere vulgar superstition. The struggle had its practical issue in the bitter persecutions which prevailed until the triumph of Christianity under Constantine. Since this first encounter, the relations of philosophy and religion have passed through various phases, marked by the chief epochs of church history. In the patristic age (A.D. 900-1000) the previous conflict had become exchanged for an alliance; and philosophy and religion were blended within the limits of Christian theology. The Greek Fathers—Justin Martyr, Clement, and Origen— strove to base their apologetics upon the theism and ethics of Plato, and even to couch the mysteries of Christianity in Platonic terms and the atomism, in terms of the Platonic metaphysics. And though some of the Latin Fathers, such as Tertullian and Irenaeus, betrayed an anti-philosophical tendency, yet others, such as Lactantius and Augustine, did not scruple to employ the rhetoric and logic of Aristotle. The union of religion and philosophy had its hybrid form in the half-Pagan, half-Christian civilization which perished in the fall of the Roman Empire.

In the scholastic age (A.D. 900-1400) the former alliance grew into a bondage; and religion in a dogmatic form subjugated philosophy to the service of orthodoxy. The great schoolmen, such as Peter Lombard, Thomas Aquinas, and Duns Scotus, simply aimed to systematize the patristic opinions by means of the Aristotelian logic, treating the physics and metaphysics as mere tributary provinces of revealed theology. There were a few philosophic divines, such as Scotus Erigena, Abelard, Roger Bacon, who for their speculations and researches incurred persecution as heretics. The despotic despots had its hybrid form in the pseudo-Christian civilization which rendered all the art, as well as science, of the middle ages, subservient to the aggrandizement of the papal hierarchy.

In the reforming age (A.D. 1500-1800) the bondage bred a rupture, and religion once more became independent. On the philosophic side, the revolt of reason asserted successively in Italian naturalism, as led by Pomponiuss, Cardan, Vanini; in English deism, as led by Herbert, Hobbes, Hume; in French atheism, as led by Voltaire, Helvetius, Diderot; and, more recently, in German pantheism, as led by Strauss and Feuerbach. On the religious side, the recoil of faith was successively led by the Reformers, as established by Bellarmin and Loyola on the traditional patristic and scholastic dogmas; in Protestantism, as organized by Luther, Calvin, Knox, and Cranmer, by means of the reformed creeds and confessions; and ultimately in a growing sectarianism, which has filled Christendom with polemical feuds to the present hour. At the same time, the wonderful intellectual activity of the period has been practically expressed in that rich, progressive Christian civilization which has resuscitated Europe, colonized America, and is already advancing throughout Asia and Africa.

At length, in this present critical age (A.D. 1800–83), the schism has become a truce; and philosophy and religion seem poised as for some fine and momentous event. Never before have they reached a separate development so extreme. Never before have their relations appeared so problematical; and never before has the need of their reconciliation become so imperative. A few religiousmen may still talk of dispensing with philosophy, and a few philosophers may dream of superseding religion; but the intelligent mass of thinkers and divines is confidently awaiting an harmonious settlement.

At the threshold of the question, it is necessary to discriminate between true and false religion and sound and vain philosophy. All the great philosophers, from Plato to Hegel, instead of assailing religion, have claimed to free it from superstition and error; and all the theo-larians, from Clement to Calvin [and Schleiermacher], have interpreted St. Paul as deprecating, not so much a sound Christian philosophy, as one that was deceitful, and not after Christ. Only by some gross abuse of either or both has the union between them ever bred what Bacon terms an heretical religion and a fantastical philosophy.

It may be well also to distinguish their theoretical from their practical importance. Their relative worth and dignity as pursuits and interest cannot predetermine their abstract truth and knowledge. Let it be assumed, once for all, that religion is the one supreme human concern, to which philosophy itself is but subsidiary, and we may then safely proceed to define their reciprocal relations and prerogatives.

The Relation of Philosophy to Religion.— The relation of philosophy to religion has become apparent in every province of religious science.

(1) In natural theology, philosophy comes as a witness to prove the divine being and attributes, the divine government, the present state of probation, and the future state of rewards and punishments. These are tenets common to all religions, and logically prior, if not fundamental, to revealed religion. The Pagan, the Deist, and the Christian— Cicero, Herbert, and Butler—have been agreed in accepting them; and orthodox divines, as well as devout philosophers, have ever employed the physical and mental sciences for their confirmation and illustration.

(2) In apologetical theology, philosophy appears as a judge to collect the evidences of Christianity, both internal and external, and estimate their logical and ethical value. It was long ago argued by Bishop Butler, that reason, which is our only faculty for judging anything, is a proper critic of the evidences, though not of the purport or content, of a supposed revelation, unless the latter be found plainly absurd or immoral; and all the great apologists, from the time of Justin Martyr, have been striving to show that the Christian religion is reasonable as well as credible. But, whether its miracles or its doctrines be put foremost in proof, both evidential schools (Chalmers and Mansel, as well as Clarke and Wolff) have claimed to offer a more or less philosophical vin-dication of its truth and value. The countless works which have accumulated on the miraculous, prophetic, historical, scientific, and experimental evidences of Christianity, remain as but so many philosophic judgments in its favor.

(3) In dogmatic theology, philosophy is admitted no longer as a witness or a judge, but rather as a philosopher and handmaid of revealed religion, to learn its teachings, and organize them into a logical system. Once inside an accredited revelation, reason herself is ready to accept mysteries and even paradoxes. But the truths of Holy Scripture, however clear to believing minds, are not given in scientific terms, and can only be formulated by the rational faculty as trained in schools of human learning and consecrated by the Divine Spirit. Accordingly, the Fathers, the schoolmen, the reformers, and the later divines have all proceeded more or less philosophically in their construction of the Christian dogmas.

Not only so, but the most peculiar mysteries of revelation—the trinity, the incarnation, the atonement—have found frequent expression and illustration in philosophical systems of purely human origin; so that the dogmatic theology still current is full of the ideas and terms of Greek, Roman, and Arabian philosophy, as well as of the later schools of French, English, and German thought. The names of Malebranche, Cudworth, Schleiermacher, and Hodge, are enough to suggest how largely theologians have made use of philosophical learning and speculation.

(4) Even in polemical and practical theology, philosophy may be of essential service in adapting revealed doctrines to the existing state of Christianity and civilization.

The Relation of Religion to Philosophy.— The relation of religion to philosophy, though not so obvious, is quite as important, according to any definition that may be employed. (1) Philosophy, as the comprehensive science of things divine and human, embraces theology with the other sciences, and would remain forever incomplete without it. Religion is at least a conspicuous phenomenon to be explained, and the philosophy of religion a recognized branch of inquiry. Quite apart from their practical moment, the articles of natural religion are problems of speculative interest, which have tasked profound thinkers, like Spinoza, Hume, and Kant; and even the dogmas of revealed religion, as treated by Bacon, Descartes, and Hegel, have formed an integral part of human knowledge. The few philosophers like Comte, who would ignore theology, have simply substituted some grotesque imitation in its place. Instead of being monopolized by professional divines, it is now pursued by archaologists and philologists like Burnouf and Max Müller, who claim to have founded a new science of religion termed comparative theology, as well as by non-Christian writers, like Strauss, Theodore Parker, and Greg, who have been constructing ancient and modern faiths into a new philosophic creed of the future. So that, according to the principles of the latest classificator of knowledge, theology is at least entitled to rank as the last and highest of the empirical sciences.

(2) Philosophy, as the science of the absolute, requires religion on the transcendental side of the sciences for their own logical support and consisency. Separate from theism, the metaphysical ideas of causality, absoluteness, and infinity, can only appear vague and contradictory; but they at once become clear and congruous in the conception of an Absolute Will or Infinite Reason as the first and final cause of the phenomenal universe. Such a conception is not to be arbitrarily set aside as a mere anthropomorphic sentiment or superstition because it happens so largely to coincide with the religious belief of mankind. In the dry light of pure thought it affords a consistent theory of the world, which has satisfied even atheistic and pantheistic metaphysicians like Schopenhauer and Hegel, as well as theistic metaphysicians like Descartes and Berkeley; while in practical research it has been used as a sort of rational postulate by great physicists like Newton and Herschel, who have thus sought to give unity to their scientific knowledge. The agnostic school of Hamilton, Mansel, and Herbert Spencer, has simply been purging theology from that grosser anthropomorphism in which previous thinkers have assailed from the time that St. Paul first reproved it at the Athenian altar to the Unknown God. In like manner the pessimistic school of Hartmann and Bahnson is but emphasizing the riddles of evil, pain, and chance, which were long since met by revealed religion, and can only be fully solved through its aid, as the younger Fichte and Ulrici have shown. And though the history of Christian Gnosticism, as seen especially in the schools of Schelling and Marheinecke, has been full of mystical conceits, yet it serves at least to show to what extent the dogmas of creation, redemption, and judgment, have been philosophically employed in explaining the origin, development, and destiny of the universe. Theology, therefore, besides being the highest of the empirical sciences, is also their metaphysical foundation and complement, without which they would fall into nescience and absurdity, and the chief problems of philosophy remain forever insoluble.

(4) Philosophy, as the supreme science of the age, is also the science par excellence with reason in each of those sciences. Revelation by its very definition is complementary to reason, making known the otherwise unknowable, and thus meeting our intellectual as well as moral necessities. The Christian revelation in particular is found to be a transcendental communication of divine wisdom, and as such has been largely employed by philosophers, no less than theologians, in supplementing and completing the purely rational portions of our knowledge. It is, in fact, the fitting reward of philosophy for her service to theology in demonstrating the authority of revelation, that she thereby supplies the exigency of reason, and so may connect the infinite mind of God with the finite mind of man throughout the realm of cognition. The few irreligious thinkers, such as Comte, Stuart Mill, and Lewes, who have treated of the logic of the sciences in an otherwise luminous manner, have strangely overlooked, not merely the whole metaphysical domain of those sciences, but the existence there-in of a conspicuous, objective revelation, historically attested by an immense mass of cumulative evidences, as scientific in their nature, if not in their extent, as those which upheld the Newtonian theory of the solar system. And even Christian thinkers, the most learned in divinity, have yet to see more clearly the strictly philosophical value of that revelation in removing intellectual error and ignorance, as well as moral and practical depravity, and thus perfecting science no less than religion. The truth is, that philosophy, in order to accomplish its highest aim and function as the science and art of knowledge, must begin by assuming revelation and reason to be joint factors of knowledge, and then proceed to ascertain their normal, existing, and prospective relations in the scale of the sciences, and to formulate the logical rules for organizing the existing medley of rational and revealed truths, theories, and doctrines. In other words, the very foundations of a complete philosophical system must be partly laid in natural theology and the Christian evidences; and no one can foretell to what extent even dogmatic theology, as we now know it, may yet enter with the physical and mental sciences into the growing superstructure of the temple of knowledge.

The press is also teeming with worksto the same purpose, so numerous that it would be impossible to name them. The reader is referred to the writings of the younger Fichte, Ulrici, and Zöckler of Germany, Murphy, Callendar of Aberdeen of Great Britain, and Henry B. Smith, McCosh, and Porter, for examples of authors who have more or less directly treated of the subject of this article. CHARLES W. SHIELDS.

PHILOSOPHY, Christian, American Institute of, was founded in 1881, by Rev. Dr. C. F. Deems of New-York City, for the purpose of Investigating fully and impartially the most important questions of science and philosophy, more especially those that bear upon the great truths revealed in Holy Scripture. The institute holds monthly meetings, at which papers are read and discussed. It has a course of public lectures delivered in New York in the winter. It has also summer schools, at which lectures are delivered, and discussions had, of questions of current interest. Its lectures and papers are published in a monthly magazine, Character and Thought, which is sent free to all its subscribing members.

PHILOSTORGIUS, the Arian church historian; b. in Cappadocia in 368; studied mathematics, astronomy, medicine, etc., in Constantinople; and died after 425: nothing more is known of his life. Of his Ecclesiastical History, in twelve books, only excerpts have come down to us, made by Photius (Bibl. Cod., 40), who recommends its ornate and pleasant style, though, of course, he condemns its tendency. It began with the controversy between Arius and Alexander, and ended in 423. It represents Arianism as the older, the genuine Christianity, which was overthrown by the violence and intrigues of the so-called orthodox party, and sides at every point with the Arians, but contains, nevertheless, many valuable historical notices. The excerpts were first edited by Jaa. Gathofredus, Geneva, 1843, then by Val. sius, Paris, 1873, and at Canterbury, 1720. They were reprinted by Migne.

PHILOSTRATUS, Flavius, b. in the second half of the second century of our era; a native of the Island of Lemnos; studied rhetoric in Athens, and afterwards taught philosophy in Rome, where he became acquainted with Julia Domna, the wife of Alexander Severus. At her instance he wrote a life of Apollonius of Tyana, — partly from documents in her possession, — which at various times has played quite a conspicuous part in the attacks on Christianity. It was translated into English by Charles Blount (1680) and by Rev. Edward Berwick (1809), into French by Chatillon (1774), and A. Chassang (1802), and into German by Eduard Baltzer, Rudolstadt-i.-Th., 1883. He also wrote Lives of the Sophists, Commentaries on the lives of the Heroes of Homer, descriptions of paintings, letters, etc. The best critical edition of his collected works by Kayser, Leipzig 1870, 2 vols.

PHILOXENUS, whose true name was Xenajas; b. at Tahal in Persia; consecrated Bishop of Hierapolis (Mabug), near Antioch, about 500; was one of the leaders of the Monophysite party, and one of the most active adversaries of the Chalcedonian decrees. Of his writings, only the titles have come down to us (De trinititate et incarnatione, De uno ex trinitate incarnato et passo, Tractatus in Nestorianos et Eutychianos, etc.), and a few fragments, preserved by Barhebrus and Dionysius Barbalib, and collected by Assemani in his Bibl. Orient., II. For the Syriac version of the New Testament, which was made by Rural Bishop Polycarp, and is called the Philoxenian, see Rule IV. in this, p. 287.

PHOCAS, a gardener of Sinope in Pontus; suffered martyrdom in the most cruel manner under Trajan, or perhaps under Diocletian. He was the Eastern counterpart of the St. Erasmus or St. Elmo of the West, the wonder-working saint of the sailors, who during the storm sung hymns to his praise, left a place vacant for him at the dinner-table, and, when the trip was over, distributed a portion of the profit in his name to the poor. The Emperor Phocas considered him as his patron-saint, and built a magnificent church in his honor at Dhiippine, near Constantinople. He is commemorated by the Greek Church on Sept. 22, by the Latin on July 14. See Acterni. Amas. orat. in Phocam, in Migne: Patr. Græc., vol. 49. Different from him is the Antiochian martyr of the same name, who was shipwrecked on the Island of Tours, in his De glor. mort., 99. To touch the door of his tomb was a sure cure when bitten by a serpent. Act. Sanct., July III.

PHOENICIA (Greek, Φωνικια; Latin, Phoenice). The derivation of the name is doubtful, as the Greek phœnix means both a date-palm and a deep red color: the latter sense, however, referring to the reddish-brown color of the skin of the Phœnicians, seems to be preferable. The natives called themselves Benammi, and their land Kenannah. The Old Testament generally designates the Phœnicians as Canaanites, though sometimes, also, as Sidonians: in the New Testament the land is spoken of as the coasts of Tyre and Sidon (Matt. xv. 21; comp. Mark iii. 8, vii. 24). According to Augustine, the Punics of Northern Africa, descendants of Tyrian settlers, still called themselves Benammi in the fifth century.

The country occupied the narrow plain between the Mediterranean and the western slopes of Libanon, from the Eleuthereus in the north, to Mount Carmel in the south. It was well watered and very fertile, and produced an enormous amount of wheat, wine, fruit, etc. Iron and copper mines were worked. Glass and purple were among its most famous manufactures. The Bible mentions the following cities: Ano, Achzib, Zor (Tyre), Zarpath, Sidon, Berothah, Gebal or Byblos, Tripolis, Orthosias, Sin, Arke, Simyra, Arvad or Aradus.

According to Gen. x. 6, 15, the Phœnicians were Hamites, as were all the Canaanites. That statement, however, has been much questioned on account of the close relation between the Phœnician and the Hebrew language. Hebrew is, indeed, in Isa. xix. 18, called the language of Canaan. And how came the Phœnicians to speak a Semitic language, when they belonged to an entirely different race, — a race which allied them to the Egyptians and Ethiopians? There seems to be no other explanation possible than a change of tongue; though it must be left undecided whether that change took place before or after their settlement in Canaan, in the midst of a native Semitic population. Herodotus tells us, that, according to their own traditions, the Phœnicians came from the Erythraean Sea (the Persian Gulf), and penetrated through Syria to the Mediterranean coast, about three thousand years before our era; and Strabo contains the remarkable notice, that the inhabitants of Tyre and Aradus, two islands in the Persian Gulf, had temples similar to those of the Phœnicians, and declared the Phœnician cities of Tyre and Aradus to be their colonies. Nevertheless, though the Phœnicians adopted the Semitic tongue, and lived, at least at times, in very friendly relations with Israel, their national character, their social organization, their commercial and industrial spirit, their talent for navigation and colonization, etc., distinguish them very clearly from the Semites, and corroborate the statement of the Bible, that they were Hamites.
PHOENICIA.

Some traces of the oldest history of Phoenicia have been preserved in the monuments of Egypt. Shortly after the expulsion of the Hyksos people from the Delta, the Pharaohs began their campaigns into Asia; and for a long period the Phoenician cities stood under Egyptian authority. They paid an annual tribute, and enjoyed, in return, certain commercial privileges in Egypt. In the first half of the twelfth century the precedence among the Phoenician cities passed from Sidon to Tyre, and very friendly relations were formed between King Hiram and David and Solomon. From the beginning of the ninth century the Tyrians extended their commerce all along the shores of the western portion of the Mediterranean. They penetrated through the Strait of Tharsis (Gibraltar), visited the Canary Islands and Britain; and in the middle of the century Carthage was founded by a Tyrian princess, Elissa, the Dido of Virgil. At the same time the contest began between the Phoenicians and the Assyrians. In most cases, however, the Phoenician peoples profited by转变s in the Assyrian annals by the payment of a tribute; though at times some very fierce fighting took place, as, for instance, against Nebuchadnezzar, in 592 B.C. The Persian kings, who were very much in need of maritime support, were consequently accommodating in their policy towards Phoenicia. After the conquest of Tyre by Alexander, the precedence passed to Aradus, and afterwards to Tripolis, the Three-City (thus called because it was founded by colonists from Sidon, Tyre, and Aradus), where the council of three hundred senators assembled under the presidency of the kings of the three mother-cities. Under the Roman rule the Phoenician cities retained their municipal organization, with the only change that the royal power was abolished.

Their great name in the history of the world the Phoenicians owe to their commercial talent and energy: for centuries they carried on the whole exchange between Asia and Europe, the East and the West. Some of their reputed discoveries—the art of writing, of glass-making, of pottery, etc.—are due to a strict sense of the word: but the utilization of those arts, their general introduction, was, at all events, due to the Phoenicians; and they were, without doubt, the most audacious and enterprising navigators of antiquity. It was not without reason that the Greeks called the polar star the Phoenician star. Their literature was probably considerable; but only a few remnants of it have come down to us through Greek translations,—the so-called Periplus, the history of Sanchunianthon (fragments in Eusebius), etc. In the second century of our era their language died out in Asia, superseded by the Greek: in Northern Africa it lived on among the peasants until the sixth century. In the third century (Punic) it exists only in a number of inscriptions on coins, medals, sarcophagi (Eshmunazar), etc. For their religion, see the articles on As-tarte, Baal, etc.

PHOTIUS.

PHOTIUS, a native of Anency, a pupil of Marcellus, and afterwards Bishop of Sirmium in Pannonia; was condemned by the synod of Antioch (344) as an adherent of the homoousian doctrine, and also by the synod of Milan (345), because he developed the homoousian doctrine into open antagonism to the doctrine of hypostasis. He was finally deposed by the synod of Sirmium (352); but his party continued on, as the synod of Aquileia (381) asked for its suppression. His writings have perished; but his opinions are known to us through Athanasius (De Synod. 26-27), Socrates (Hist. Eccl., ii. 19, 30), Hilary (De Synod. 37), and the acts of his condemnation in Mansi: Coll. Ampl., ii. and iii.

W. MÖLLER.

PHOTIUS, b. in the first decade of the ninth century; d. in 861. In 846 the Empress Theodora, regent during the minority of her son Michael III., appointed Ignatius, the youngest son of Michael I., and a man of unblemished character, Patriarch of Constantinople. Bardas, however, the vicious uncle of Michael III., succeeded in estranging the yearned for alliance of the方才

PHOTINUS, a native of Ancyras, a pupil of Marcellus, and afterwards Bishop of Sirmium in Pannonia; was condemned by the synod of Antioch (344) as an adherent of the homoousian doctrine, and also by the synod of Milan (345), because he developed the homoousian doctrine into open antagonism to the doctrine of hypostasis. He was finally deposed by the synod of Sirmium (352); but his party continued on, as the synod of Aquileia (381) asked for its suppression. His writings have perished; but his opinions are known to us through Athanasius (De Synod. 26-27), Socrates (Hist. Eccl., ii. 19, 30), Hilary (De Synod. 37), and the acts of his condemnation in Mansi: Coll. Ampl., ii. and iii.

W. MÖLLER.

PHOTIUS, b. in the first decade of the ninth century; d. in 861. In 846 the Empress Theodora, regent during the minority of her son Michael III., appointedIgnatius, the youngest son of Michael I., and a man of unblemished character, Patriarch of Constantinople. Bardas, however, the vicious uncle of Michael III., succeeded in estranging the yearned for alliance of the方才

PHOTINUS, a native of Ancyras, a pupil of Marcellus, and afterwards Bishop of Sirmium in Pannonia; was condemned by the synod of Antioch (344) as an adherent of the homoousian doctrine, and also by the synod of Milan (345), because he developed the homoousian doctrine into open antagonism to the doctrine of hypostasis. He was finally deposed by the synod of Sirmium (352); but his party continued on, as the synod of Aquileia (381) asked for its suppression. His writings have perished; but his opinions are known to us through Athanasius (De Synod. 26-27), Socrates (Hist. Eccl., ii. 19, 30), Hilary (De Synod. 37), and the acts of his condemnation in Mansi: Coll. Ampl., ii. and iii.

PHOTIUS.

PHOTIUS, b. in the first decade of the ninth century; d. in 861. In 846 the Empress Theodora, regent during the minority of her son Michael III., appointed Ignatius, the youngest son of Michael I., and a man of unblemished character, Patriarch of Constantinople. Bardas, however, the vicious uncle of Michael III., succeeded in estranging the yearned for alliance of the方才

PHOTINUS, a native of Ancyras, a pupil of Marcellus, and afterwards Bishop of Sirmium in Pannonia; was condemned by the synod of Antioch (344) as an adherent of the homoousian doctrine, and also by the synod of Milan (345), because he developed the homoousian doctrine into open antagonism to the doctrine of hypostasis. He was finally deposed by the synod of Sirmium (352); but his party continued on, as the synod of Aquileia (381) asked for its suppression. His writings have perished; but his opinions are known to us through Athanasius (De Synod. 26-27), Socrates (Hist. Eccl., ii. 19, 30), Hilary (De Synod. 37), and the acts of his condemnation in Mansi: Coll. Ampl., ii. and iii.

W. MÖLLER.

PHOTIUS, b. in the first decade of the ninth century; d. in 861. In 846 the Empress Theodora, regent during the minority of her son Michael III., appointed Ignatius, the youngest son of Michael I., and a man of unblemished character, Patriarch of Constantinople. Bardas, however, the vicious uncle of Michael III., succeeded in estranging the yearned for alliance of the方才

PHOTINUS, a native of Ancyras, a pupil of Marcellus, and afterwards Bishop of Sirmium in Pannonia; was condemned by the synod of Antioch (344) as an adherent of the homoousian doctrine, and also by the synod of Milan (345), because he developed the homoousian doctrine into open antagonism to the doctrine of hypostasis. He was finally deposed by the synod of Sirmium (352); but his party continued on, as the synod of Aquileia (381) asked for its suppression. His writings have perished; but his opinions are known to us through Athanasius (De Synod. 26-27), Socrates (Hist. Eccl., ii. 19, 30), Hilary (De Synod. 37), and the acts of his condemnation in Mansi: Coll. Ampl., ii. and iii.
had now become fully informed about the true state of the affairs. In 869 he convened a synod in Rome, punished the legates for disobedience, and excommunicated Photius. The emperor answered in a letter full of furious invectives. The new papal embassy was not allowed to enter Constantinople; and Photius at once changed attitude, turning the controversy between the patriarch of Constantinople and the bishop of Rome into a controversy between the Eastern and the Western Church. In 871 he issued a second, more severe letter, in which he declared the whole Latin Church heretical on account of its clerical celibacy, its introduction of the word filioque into the creed, and its arrangement of the Quadragesimal Fast, and called upon all bishops, archbishops, and patriarchs of the Greek Church to unite firmly and cordially against the common foe.

The turn thus given to the course of affairs was of the greatest importance. For a moment Photius seemed to have secured success. At a synod which was convened in Constantinople (867), and which, though it was packed, pretended to be oecumenical, he formally excommunicated the Pope. But in September, same year, Michael III. was assassinated; and the first act of his successor was to depose Photius, and recall Ignatius. Political calculations seem to have been the ruling motive when the Pope's successors could be induced to take away. Shortly after, Photius fell under the suspicion of political intrigues, and embezzlement of public money; but many Jews were settled among them. In the northern part were the cities of Ancyra, Gordician, Doryleum, etc.; in the southern, Colossus Hierapolis, Laodicea, etc.

Whatever verdict may be given on Photius as a church officer, his literary merits, not only in canon law, but also in history of literature, are unequal length, strung together without any material or chronological principle of arrangement, and containing excerpts of books accompanied with historical and critical notes on the work and the author. The circumstance, that, of authors quoted, eighty are known to us only through this work, gives an idea of its value; and his correctness in all points where he can be controlled gives guaranty for his correctness in general. The first edition of the work is that by David Hoesechel, in the Augsburg edition of his canon law, and also known as that by Im. Bekker, Berlin, 1824–25, 2 vols. Of great importance is also his Ναουμαν, a collection of the canons of the Eastern Church, containing not only the decrees of the councils, but also the ecclesiastical edicts of the secular government. It is found, together with Balsamon's commentaries, in Voelius and Justellius (Bibl. juris canon., ii., Paris, 1661). His Contra Manicheos, edited by Wolf, in his Amed. Gra., 1722; and also found in Gallandi (Bibl., XIII.), has a curious resemblance to the Historia Poulicianorum by Petrus Siculis; but as Photius wrote his book before 867, and Petrus his after 868, it is the latter who has borrowed from the former. The Liber de spiritus sancti mystagogia, edited by Hergenhörther, Baisbon, 1857, shows the dialectical art of the author, presenting numerous reasons why the addition of filioque in the Latin creed is untenable. His letters, of which there is a nearly complete edition by Montagu, London, 1651, give many interesting traits of his personal life and character. Several minor treatises by him, besides his so-called Lexicon, London, 1822, 2 vols., have also been published; a collected edition of his works is found in Migne's Biblioth. Patr. Graeca. CI–CIV.

GASSB. — PRRYCHTA: Φωτιος Α΄, a collection of rather unimportant boudinées occupying the central portion of Asia Minor. At the beginning of our era the name had merely an ethnological and no geographical significance. There was no Roman province of the name Pryrgia until the fourth century. The people inhabiting that region were of Indo-Germanic descent, and closely allied to the Armenians; but many Jews were settled among them. In the northern part were the cities of Ancyra, Gordianic, Doryleum, etc.; in the southern, Colosse, Hierapolis, Laodicea, etc.

PHYLACTERY, the φιλακτήρα (Matt. xxiii. 5), [i.e., a receptacle for safe-keeping], is a small square box, made either of parchment or black calf-skin, in which are enclosed slips of parchment or vellum, with Exod. xiii.2–10, 11–17, Deut. vi.4–9, xi.13–22, written on them, which are worn on the head and left arm by the Jews, [on week-days] mornings during the time of prayer. Jewish tradition finds the injunction concerning phylacteries in Exod. xiii. 9, 10; Deut. vi. 8, xii. 18; but the Karate Jews, Jerome, Lyra, Calvin, Grothus, and others, take the passages in question in a figurative sense. At what time phylacteries were first worn is difficult to say; but the Jewish canons containing minute regulations concerning them seem to be very old. According to the rabbis, God showed to Moses, on Mount Sinai, how to wear the phylacteries. Even God himself is said to wear them; and, when he swears by his holy arm, he means his phylacteries. The phylacteries, or tephillin as they are called, were considered to be even holier than the golden plate on the priest's tiara, since that had the sacred name once engraved; but in each of the tephillin the tetragrammaton occurred twenty-three times.

As to the manner in which they are made, the following will give an illustration. A piece of leather is soaked, stretched on a square block cut for the purpose, sewed together with gut-strings while wet, and left on the block till it is dried and stiffened; so that when it is taken off it forms a square leather box. As the Mosaic code enjoins one for the hand, and another for the head, two such boxes are requisite for making the phylacteries. The box of which the phylactery for the hand is made has no inscription inside, and only one cell inside, where is deposited a square leather box, from which the phylactery is fastened to the arm. The box of which the phylactery for the head is made has on the outside, to be held in the hand, the regular three-pronged letter Shin, being an abbreviation for Shaddai ("the Almighty"), and on the side a four-pronged letter Shin. Every male Jew, from the time that he is thirteen years of age, is obliged to wear the phylacteries. He first puts on one on the left arm through the sling formed by the long strap. Having fastened it just above the elbow on the inner side of the arm, he then takes the other phylactery, and successively fastens it round the neck, and on the left side of the forehead, the middle and upper part of the forehead, and the hair above the eyebrows; and, lastly, on the upper part of the chest. The jealous of the Jesuits, however, caused many troubles to the order. It prospered, nevertheless, and in the middle of the present century it numbered about two thousand members. It is especially numerous in Austria-Hungary, where about twenty thousand pupils are under their care. See Seyffert: Ordensregeln der Piaristen, Halle, 1758, 2 vols. ZÖCKL.

PITCET, Benedict, b. at Geneva, May 30, 1655; d. there June 10, 1724. He studied theology, travelled much, and was in 1702 appointed professor of theology in his native city. His controversial writings in which he apostatized from the Jesuits, 1683; Syllabus controversiarum, 1711; Luther et Calvini concursus, 1701, etc.) belong to the best of those produced in that period. His works on systematic theology (Theologia Christiana, 1698, in 11 vols.; Medulla Theologica, 1711; Morale chrétiennne, 1685, in 12 vols., etc.) and his devotional books (L'art de bien vivre et de bien mourir, etc.) were also much valued. [See his Life by E. de Burke, Lausanne, 1874.] HERZOG.

PICTET, Benedict, b. at Geneva, May 30, 1655; d. there June 10, 1724. He studied theology, travelled much, and was in 1702 appointed professor of theology in his native city. His controversial writings in which he apostatized from the Jesuits, 1683; Syllabus controversiarum, 1711; Luther et Calvini concursus, 1701, etc.) belong to the best of those produced in that period. His works on systematic theology (Theologia Christiana, 1698, in 11 vols.; Medulla Theologica, 1711; Morale chrétiennne, 1685, in 12 vols., etc.) and his devotional books (L'art de bien vivre et de bien mourir, etc.) were also much valued. [See his Life by E. de Burke, Lausanne, 1874.] HERZOG.

PICTET, Benedict, b. at Geneva, May 30, 1655; d. there June 10, 1724. He studied theology, travelled much, and was in 1702 appointed professor of theology in his native city. His controversial writings in which he apostatized from the Jesuits, 1683; Syllabus controversiarum, 1711; Luther et Calvini concursus, 1701, etc.) belong to the best of those produced in that period. His works on systematic theology (Theologia Christiana, 1698, in 11 vols.; Medulla Theologica, 1711; Morale chrétiennne, 1685, in 12 vols., etc.) and his devotional books (L'art de bien vivre et de bien mourir, etc.) were also much valued. [See his Life by E. de Burke, Lausanne, 1874.] HERZOG.
PIERPONT, John, an eminent reformer; b. at Litchfield, Conn., April 6, 1765; d. at Medford, Mass., Aug. 27, 1869; graduated at Yale, 1804; taught in Connecticut, and at Charleston, S.C.; admitted to the bar at Newburyport, 1812; abandoned the law from conscientious scruples (1814), and went into business in Boston and Baltimore, unsuccessfully; graduated at the Cambridge Divinity School, 1818, and became Unitarian pastor in Hollis Street, Boston, 1819. Here his unflinching championing of the temperance and anti-slavery causes produced trouble with his congregation. See Proceedings of Ecclesiastical Council in his case. 1841. He was pastor at Troy, 1845-49, and at Medford, 1819-30. At the outbreak of the war, in 1861, he accepted, at seventy-six, the chaplaincy of the Twenty-second Massachusetts Regiment, and went with it to Virginia; 1862-64 he held a clerkship in Washington, and indexed the decisions of the Treasury Department. In character and life he was a typical American. His Aims of Palestine appeared, 1816, and, with other poems, 1840. These he calls "mostly occasional, the verses of a verse-wright, made "to order." As such they are far better than most of their kind, and bear faithful witness to "the author's feelings and faith, his love of right, freedom, and man." Some of his Ordination and Consecration Hymns, and others, dating from 1820 on, have been, and still are, very widely used.

PIETISM denotes a movement in the Lutheran Church which arose as a re-action of the living, practical faith which demands to express itself in every act of the will, against an orthodoxy which too often contented itself with the dead, theoretical correctness of its creed. At present it is not uncommon to find all the various phenomena of asceticism, mysticism, quietism, separation, etc., under the name of pietism; but so vague a definition is detrimental to the precise understanding of history. On the other hand, the old definition of pietism, as a mere protest against a stiff and barren orthodoxy, is too narrow. Pietism had deep roots in the Lutheran Church: it grew from the very principles of the Lutheran Reformation; and it would, no doubt, have developed, even though there had been no orthodoxy to react upon. The personal development of Spener before his public work began in 1670, assimilating, as it did, a great number of various influences, is one evidence. Another is the effect of his work, which was by no means spent with the end of the pietistic controversies at the death of Loscher, in 1747.

The movement first took shape in Francfort, where Spener was appointed pastor in 1666. He met there with some of the worst features of the Lutheran Church,—sacerdotal arrogance, superficial confession-practice, neglect of the cure of souls, neglect of the instruction of the youth, etc.; and in 1670 he invited to a kind of friendly re-union in his study, for the purpose of reciprocal edification, the serious-minded in his congregation, and thus constituted the so-called collegia pietaitis. Chapters of Lutheran and Reformed books of devotion, or the sermon of the preceding Sunday, first formed the topic of conversation; afterwards, portions of Scripture. The experiment proved a great success. Others followed the example; and, as some eccentricity could not fail to creep in, the members of such collegia pietaitis were nicknamed "Pietists." In 1682, however, Spener was able to transform his private reunions into public gatherings, and transfer them from his study to the church. Meanwhile, he published (in 1675) his Pia Desideria, in which he gave a full account of his ideas and purposes. The principal points he insisted on were the spreading of a more general and more intimate acquaintance with the Bible by means of private gatherings, ecclesiola in ecclesia: the development of a general piety by the co-operation of laymen in the spiritual guidance of the congregation, and by
PIETISM. PILATE. 1841

PIELATE, Pontius, the fifth Roman procurator (ntrpome, "governor," Matt. xxvii. 2) of Judea and Samaria from A.D. 26–36, the successor of Valerius Gratus. His cognomen Pilate was derived either from pium ("a jewel") or pīlus ("the felt cap given to a captured slave in token of his freedom"); if from the latter, he had either been such a slave, or was the descendant of one, belonging to the gens Pontia. His official and usual residence in Judea was in Cesarea; but he came to Jerusalem during the festivals, and lived in Herod's magnificent palace. During his rule occurred the ministry of John the Baptist and of Jesus Christ; and it was by his permission, although he personally was convinced of the innocence of the accused, and went through the ceremony of washing his hands before the people in token of his belief,—a ceremony already known to the Jews (Deut. xxi. 6; Ps. xxvi. 6, lxxiii. 13),—spoke kindly to him, and strove to save him, that Jesus was crucified. In the ten years of his procuratorship he was guilty of many a cruel and arbitrary deed. When the people rose against his attempts to defile their holy places by the proscription of the temple revenues from the redemption of vows for the construction of an aqueduct, he suppressed them by force; and on the latter occasion had a number massacred. At last the Jewish people could stand his violence no longer; and so, when he causelessly destroyed a number of Samaritans upon Mount Gerizim, the Samaritan senate formally complained to the president of Syria, Vitel-PILATE.

PILGRIMAGES.

lues, who ordered him to Rome to answer before Cæsar (A.D. 36). Just before his arrival there Tiberius had died, and Caligula had succeeded. According to Eusebius (H. E., II. 7), Pilate took his own life. According to others, he was banished to Vienna in Gaul (Vienna Allobrogum, Vienna-on-the-Rhone), or beheaded under Nero.

The character of Pilate, as exhibited in the New-Testament record of his treatment of Jesus (Matt. xxvii. 1 sqq.; John xviii. 28 sqq.), is that of a sceptical and scoffing man of the world, not naturally evil-minded or cruel, but entirely without perception of spiritual things, equal among all religions equally based on superstition. If it had not been against his own interests, he would have released Jesus (John xix. 10). As it was, he gave him over to crucifixion, although he found no fault in him. Yet Tertullian says it was a Christian, in conscience, and in the Ethiopic Church he is a saint. His day is June 25. The Copts also assert that he died as a Christian martyr.

Pilate is said to have forwarded to Tiberius an account of the judgment and crucifixion of Jesus in order to forestall unfavorable criticism (Justin Martyr: Apol., I. 78, 89; cf. Tertullian: Apol., V. 21; Eusebius: Chron., II. 2). As well as the two letters of Pilate to Tiberius, and the so-called Acts of Pilate, are forgeries.

Legends cluster around his name. It is said that he studied in Huesca, Spain; had Judas Iscariot for his servant; and that the emperor had his dead body thrown into the Tiber. Then evil spirits possessed it, and caused the river to overflow. After the flood, his body was put in the Rhone by Vienne; and there again it caused a storm, so that it was transported to the Alpine Mountain, now called Mount Pilatus, near Lucerne, and there sunk in the deep pool on its top; but again it caused strange commotion. Every year, on Good Friday, the Devil takes him out of the pool, and sets him upon a throne, whereupon he washes his hands. — The wife of Pilate—called Procia, or Claudia Procula, whose solemn death of Christ to effect his deliverance, but by his washing his hands. — The wife of Pilate—called Procia, or Claudia Procula, whose solemn account of the trial of Jesus—appears in the gospel of the fourth century, when Constantine and his mother Helena had visited Golgotha, Bethlehem, etc., and built churches there, pilgrimages to the Holy Land became quite frequent. In the eighth century Charlemagne made a treaty with Haroun al Raschid to procure safety to the Christian pilgrims in Jerusalem, and founded a Latin monastery in that city for their comfort. In the eleventh century it was the outrages to which the Christian pilgrims were exposed in Palestine, which more than any thing else, contributed to bring about the crusades. But in the mean time the church had taken the matter in hand; and, under her care, pilgrimages entirely changed character. They became “good works,” penalties by which gross sins could be expiated, sacrifices by which holiness, or at least a measure of it, could be obtained. The pilgrim was placed under the special protection of the church: to maltreat him, or to deny him shelter and alms, was sacrilege. And when he returned victorious, having fulfilled his vow, he became the centre of the religious interest of the village, the town, the city, to which he belonged,—an object of holy awe. Thus pilgrimizing became a life-work, a calling. There were people who actually adopted it as a business, wandering all their life through from one shrine to another; for at that time the church had come to think that it was not necessary to send all those longing souls so far away as Palestine. Places of pilgrimage, pilgrimage considered as a means of expiating sin, sprang up everywhere,—at the tombs of the saints and martyrs (St. Peter and St. Paul in Rome, St. Thecla in Seleucia, St. Stephen in Hippo in Africa, the Forty Martyrs in Cappadocia, St. Felix at Nola in Campania, St. Martin at Tours, St. Adelbert at Gniesen, St. Willibrord at Echternach, St. Thomas at Canterbury, St. Olaf at Drontheim, etc.), or at the shrine of some wonder-working relic or image (St. James at Compostella, the Virgin at Montserrat in Spain, Loreto in Italy, Einsiedlen in Switzerland, Mariastein in Styria, Oetting in Bavaria, etc.). With the Reformation all this gross superstition, which sprang from the Protestant world, but was retained by the Roman-Catholic Church. In very recent times two new places of pilgrimage have excited the Roman-Catholic world,—Lourdes in the South of France, near the Pyrenees; and Knock, near Dublin, Ireland. In both places the Virgin Mary, it is claimed, revealed herself: in Lourdes in the grotto of Massavielle during 1858; in Knock, in the village church during 1888. Miraculous cures PIRKÉ ABOTH (Sayings of the Fathers), the ninth tractate of the fourth order ("Damages") of the Mishna. It consists of six chapters of chronologically arranged pithy sayings of eminent rabbis, like Hillel, Gamaliel, and Jehuda ha-Nasi, the redactor of the Mishna. It is the oldest uncanonical collection of Jewish gnomes, and, by its easy Hebrew and interesting content, forms an admirable introduction to rabbinical literature. Numerous are the reprints and editions of it; they embrace Commentaries upon Haggai (London, 1560), Obadiah (1560), and upon part of Nehemiah (1585). These and other of his works were reprinted by the members of the university of Paris. The title in the older and later editions is commonly Die Sprüche der Väter, Karlsruhe, 1882 (56 pp.). Twice it has been translated into German (by G. H. Lehmann, Leipzig, 1884; and by Paul Ewald, Erlangen, 1825), and once into English (by Charles Taylor: Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, Cambridge, 1877). The summons of a general council was felt at the time to be a great innovation. It was the result of the long schism and of the discussions which it had awakened. There was no constitutional means of bringing it to an end; and, in default of any recognized method, recourse was had to the principle of the papal power of summation; but this limitation did not extend to cases of urgency and necessity. In the present necessity, when the law of the church had failed, the wider anarchy of a council must interpret the law. These opinions had their origin in the theologians of the University of Paris, and were accepted by the cardinals as a justification of their procedure.

The council, which was largely attended, opened on March 25, 1409. It first cited the rival popes, who had been duly summoned. When they did not appear, they were declared contumacious. On April 24 charges were brought against them of heathenism and heresy, and of being obstinate in their refusal to heal the schism, and consequently of being themselves schismatics and heretics. Commissioners were appointed to receive testimony on these points. On May 22 they reported that the charges were true and notorious. On June 5 the council declared Benedict XIII. and Gregory XIV. to be deposed as schismatics and heretics. All the faithful were absolved from allegiance to them, and their censures were declared to be of no effect. After this the feature of the ecclesiastical history of the fifteenth

tion of the reforming ideas which the schism had feribilitate Papae”), in Gerson: Opera, vol. ii., century.

of the conciliarmovement, which was the chief portunity for submission, if they had wished it. Its in its action, and did not give the popes an opportunity to take proceedings, if they had wished it. Its importance lies in the fact, that it was the expression of the reforming ideas which the schism had brought into prominence. It was the first-fruits of the conciliar movement, which was the chief feature of the ecclesiastical history of the fifteenth century.

1. — The acts of the Council of Pisa are to be found in Mansi: Concilii, vols. xxvi.—xxviii., Florence, 1737; Martene et Durand: Veterum, Scriptorum Amplissima Collectio, vol. vii., Paris,
The opinions which prevailed at Pisa are expressed by Gerson (“De Unitate Ecclesie” and “De Au-teribilitate Papae”), in Germon: Opera, vol. ii., Antwerp, 1706. The writer of the Chronique de Religieuse de S. Denys (ed. Belleaguet, Paris, 1839– 43) was at Pisa, and gives the impressions of an eye-witness. Modern works are Lenfant: Histoire du Concile de Pise, 2 vols., Utrecht, 1712; Wessenberg: Die Grossen Kirchenversammlung en des XV. und XVI. Jahrhunderts, vol. i., Constance, 1873; Hefelin: Concilii geschichte, vol. vii., 1867.

2. The second Council of Pisa was not of much importance. It was an interlude in the political career of Pope Julius II. Julius II. had joined the League of Cambrai against Venice. When he had obtained what he wanted from Venice, he left the league, and attacked his former allies.
Louis XII. of France sought to alarm the Pope by holding a national synod at Tours in 1510. The Emperor, Maximilian I., stirred up the German church to present a list of grievances, and threatened a Pragmatic Sanction. When Julius II. still refused to renew the League of Cambrai, ine nine cardinals, who for political reasons were opposed to the Pope, summoned a general council, to be held at Pisa in September, 1511. There was no reality about this council, which only held a few sessions at Pisa, and then adjourned to Milan, where in April, 1512, it declared Julius II.
to be suspended. Soon after this, it dispersed, through fear of the Swiss. Meanwhile Julius II.
held a council in the Lateran, which excommu-cicated the members of the Pisan council. The whole matter shows only a futile attempt to galvanzize into activity the conciliar movement of the previous century, and employ it for purely political purposes.

Lit. — Richer: Historia Conciliorum Generalium, lib. iv., part 1 (Cologne, 1869), contains the proceedings of the council and several of the writings to which it gave occasion. The Papal side is given in Raynaldus: Annales Ecclesiastici; sub annis 1511–12, last edition, Bois le Duc, 1877. MANDELL CKEIGHTON.

PISCATOR (Fischer), Johannes, b. at Strasburg, March 27, 1546; d. at Herborn, July 28, 1525. He studied theology at Tubingen, and was in 1572 appointed professor in Strassburg, but was soon after dismissed because he leaned towards Calvinism. In 1574 he was appointed professor at Heidelberg, but in 1577 he was dismissed again for the same reason. Finally he was settled at the academy of Herborn, founded by the Reformed Count Johann of Nassau; and there he remained for the rest of his life. He translated the Bible (Herborn, 1602–24, 3 vols.), wrote Commentaries on several books both of the Old and New Testament, and published a number of doctinal and polemical treatises. His doctrine of the insufficiency of the “active obedience” of Christ was rejected by the synod of Gap (1603), — and the synod of Rochelle (1607) even went so far as to denounce him to Count Johann as a heretic, — though he was accepted by many of the most learned Reformed theologians, as for instance, Pareus, Soultanus, Cappel, and others. HERB.

PISE, Charles Constantine, D.D., Roman-Catholic divine; b. at Annapolis, Md., 1802; d. in Brooklyn, N.Y., May 28, 1866. He was ordained priest in 1825, and officiated in the cath-dral at Baltimore. From 1849 to his death he was pastor in Brooklyn. He was eminent as a pulpit orator and man of letters. He wrote among other works, History of the Church from Establishment to the Reformation, Baltimore, 1827– 30; Father Rowland, 1829 (pronounced his best work); Acts of the Apostles done into Blank Verse.
New York, 1845; St. Ignatius and His First Compagnies, 1845.

PIS’GAH, the summit from which Moses obtained a view of the promised land, before his death (Deut. xxiv.i. 14). It was also the place of Balak's sacrifice, and Balain's prophecy (Num. xxiii. 14). It was within Reuben's possessions (Josh. xiii. 20). The exact identification of Pisgah was long a problem, until the Duc de Luynes (1684) and Professor Paine of the American Palestine Exploration Society (1879).
Independently, for the duke's account was not published until after Paine's, identified it with Jebel Staghah, the extreme headland of the range of Abarim, of which the highest summit is Nebo.
See Nebo.
PISIDIA. PIUS II.

PISIDIA (picya), a district of Asia Minor north of Pamphylia, and south of Phrygia. It was twice visited by Paul (Acts xiii. 14, xiv. 21-24). Very likely it was while going through this district that Paul was "in perils of robbers" (2 Cor. vi. 20), for the Taurus mountains, which ran through it, were infested with warlike tribes, which were the terror of the surrounding country. These tribes, under their own leaders, successfully resisted even the power of Rome. In Pisidia was a city called Antioch, to be distinguished from the more famous Syrian of the same name (see Antioch).

PISTORIUS, Johannes, b. at Nidda in Hesse, Feb. 4, 1456; d. at Freiburg, in September, 1508. He studied medicine; published De eura curande peste ratione (1568), a curious cabalistic treatise, which he afterwards followed up with his Aris cabalisticæ scriptores (Basel, 1587), and became body-physician to the Margrave of Baden-Durlach. He took a great interest, however, in theology. Educated a Lutheran, he embraced Calvinism in 1575, and was converted to Romanism in 1588, from which moment he became one of the most violent adversaries of the Reformation. He took an active part in the disputations of Baden and Emmendingen; was instrumental in the conversion of the margrave to Romanism; later became vicar-general to the Bishop of Constance, provost of Breslau, and wrote a great number of polemical treatises: Theoriae de fidei christiani unitate (1580), a cabalistic book, published Scriptores rerum Germ., 3 vols., and Polono- nica historiae corpus, 3 vols. See FRECH: Historia collegii Emendingensi, Rostock, 1694, 1709.

PITHOM, one of the treasure-cities built for Rameses II. by the Israelites (Exod. ii. 11). It has been identified by Drusig with Succoth, the first encampment on the route of the exodus, the starting-point being Rameses (Exod. xii. 37, xiii. 20), and by Naville, the archæologist of the Egyptian Exploration Fund, with the present Tell-el-Maskhuta in the Wady et Tumilat on the line of the Sweet-Water Canal, between Ismailia and the entrance of the East. It was a name common to several towns, such as Heliopolis. But Pithom-Succoth was called Hero ("storehouse"), or Heroopolis ("store-city") by the Greeks and Latins; "Hero" being the Greek transcription of Ar, Ari, or Aru, which means "storehouse." M. Naville prepared a memoir of his Pithom discoveries, which was printed by the Egypt Exploration Fund, London, 1892.

PIUS is the name of nine popes.—PIUS I. reigned in the middle of the second century; according to Jaffé, 142-157 (Reg. Pontif. Rom., 2d ed., Leipzig, 1881); according to Lipius, 130-154, or 141-156 (Chronologie d. röm. Bischöfe, Kiel, 1886). Of his reign nothing is known. The decretals ascribed to him are spurious. He is a saint of the Roman-Catholic Church, and his memory is celebrated on July 11. See DUCHESNE: Etude sur le Liber Pontificalis (Paris, 1877), and the treatises by EREBIS and LIPSII, in Jahrbücher für protest. Theologie (1878 and 1880).—PIUS II. (Aug. 19, 1455-Aug. 15, 1464), Enea Silvio de' Piccolomini; b. at Consiglano, near Siena, Oct. 18, 1405; b. at Corsignano, near Siena, in 1405; became secretary to Pope Alexander VI. He was enabled, however, to study at Siena and Florence; and in 1432 he accompanied Bishop Capranica of Fermo to the Council of Basel as his secretary. At Basel he joined the opposition party, took an active part in the negotiations which ended with the deposition of Eugenius IV., wrote his Commentary on the Council of Basel, and his Dialogus de genere Concilii auctoritate, in defence of the superiority of an ecumenical council over the Pope, and became secretary to Felix V. In 1442 he entered the service of Friedrich III., who showed him great confidence, and used him in many important diplomatic missions. He was frivolous and sensuous, the author of a heap of worthless verses, a slippery love-story (Eurialus and Lusia); but he was an able diplomat, acute and insinuating. It became necessary for him to change front; and with great adroitness he approached Eugenius IV., and obtained forgiveness. He wrote a new Commentary on the Council of Basel, but from a papal point of view, and was imprisoned in the Epi- stola retractoria, recounting all his errors of former days. Nicholas V. made him Bishop of Trieste, 1447, and Bishop of Siena, 1450. Calixtus III. made him a cardinal in 1456. As he grew older, his amorous aberrations ceased, but he became avaricious and grasping. He was known as the most scheming and shameless benefice-hunter at the papal court, next to Rodrigo Borgia, the later Alexander VI. By the aid of the latter, he was elected Pope after the death of Calixtus III., and assumed the name of Pius II., probably with an allusion to Virgil's Pius Aeneas, from whom he claimed to descend. The accession of the post-pope was hailed with great enthusiasm; but he soon disappointed his brethren of the gospels, who expected larger pensions and a more flattering attention than he saw fit to bestow upon them. Only the artists, architects, painters, and sculptors found liberal support at his court. The leading idea of his whole policy was the new crusade. The conquest of Constantinople by the Turks seems to have made a deep impression upon him; and on June 1, 1455, he opened a... of Alexander VI. he owed chiefly to the circumstances of his being very old and very weak. The approach of the French army and Cesar Borgia made it necessary for the conclave to come to an agreement as swiftly as possible; and an agreement was, of course, most easily obtained when the candidate gave sure prospect of a new election.

Pius IV. (Jan. 6, 1560-Sept. 9, 1565). His original name was Giovanni Angelo Medici, but he did not belong to the famous Florentine family of that name. He was born at Milan, in stinted circumstances; studied law, and became in 1527 prothonotary to the curia. Clement VII. and Paul III. employed him in several important missions; and the former made him a cardinal in 1549. Under Paul IV., however, he found it advisable to exile himself from Rome, and to live very quietly in his native city. But his exile paved the way for him to the papal throne. The attempt of Paul IV. at ruling in the spirit of the Gregories and the Innocents had failed utterly. The relations between the papal see and the foreign powers were very strained, and in the papal dominions the cruelty and violence of the Inquisition had spread general discontent. It was necessary to change system, and everybody's eyes fell naturally on the exiled cardinal in Milan. He was chosen, and the choice proved a success. He understood that the supremacy of the sacerdolium over the imperium could not be maintained any more, because its weapons—the ban, the interdict, etc.—had lost their effect; and he was willing to seek support for the sacerdolium from the imperium. The most difficult task which awaited him was the re-opening of the Council of Trent, and the finishing up of its business. The dangers to the papal authority were very great. Spain acted on the maxim, that the episcopacy was itself a divine institution, and not a mere emanation from the papal power; France maintained that the episcopacy had the highest powers in the church within its own limits; and the Germans went even into details, and demanded reforms of the curia, the clergy, the monasteries, abolition of the clerical celibacy, the ius primae with regard to the confessional, etc. The bull of convocation was issued on Nov. 20, 1562. The temper of the council was unmistakably martial; but Pius IV. was able, by adroit management, and by direct negotiations with the Emperor Philip II. and Cardinal Guise, to avert all danger. Indeed, the close of the Council of Trent (Dec. 3, 1563) must be considered a great triumph for the papacy. The Pope confirmed its decrees, as if they were not valid without such confirmation; and, though they were received with some reserve in France, and, though they were received with some reserve in England, in all countries, they gradually forced their way through. With the close of the Council of Trent, a new chapter begins in the history of the Church of Rome. His bulls and decrees are found in CHERUBINI: Bullarum amplissima collectio, iii. His speeches have been edited by MANSI: Orationes politico ecclesiasticas Pii II., Lucca, 1755-59, 3 vols. See HELWING: De Pii II. rebus gestis, etc., Berlin, 1825; BRETS: De Aenea Syilii, etc., Harlem, 1839; HAGENBACH: Erinnerungen an A. S. P., Basel, 1840; VERDIER: Essai sur l'A. S. P., Paris, 1843; HINEMANN: A. S., Bernburg, 1855; GENGLE: A. S. und die deutsche Rechtsgeschichte, Erlangen, 1860; GEORG VOIGT: En. Sii. de' P., Berlin, 1856-63, 3 vols., the best work on the subject. — Pius III. (Sept. 22-Oct. 18, 1503). He was a nephew of Pius II., and by him made Archbishop of Siena, and cardinal in 1450. His election after the death of order when he was fourteen years old; acted for some time as inquisitor in Como, Bergamo, and the Veltin; was called to Rome in 1550 as member of the Board of Inquisition; and made a cardinal in 1557. As Pope, he inspired the Inquisition in Italy, Spain, and the Netherlands with new vigor.
The Duke of Alba he presented with a consecrated sword; Elizabeth of England he put under the ban; and Charles IX. of France he sided with a conspiracy under the lead of the Count of Sanatafoni, whom he told “to take no Huguenots prisoners, but kill them as soon as caught.”
There were, however, traits in his character which commanded respect. His severity was sincere.
The ecclesiastical reforms began to be carried out. The Catechismus Romanus was issued; the decrees of the Council of Trent were accepted
and enforced by the Roman-Catholic princes, etc.
The papal squadron also took part in the brilliant
but fruitless victory of Don Juan over the Turks at Lepanto, Oct. 8, 1571. The bulls of Pius V. are found in Chrubini: Bullar. Magm., iii.: his Epis-tolae Apostolice have been edited by F. Gosau,
Antwerp, 1840. See also Herw. Catena: Viva del
Papa P. V., which contains his correspondence; and Falloux: Histoire de S. P.
V., Angers, 1846, 2 vols. MANOOLD.

Pius VI. (Feb. 15, 1775—Aug. 29, 1799). He belonged to a noble but poor family; studied law; entered the service of the church, and was appointed secretary to Benedict XIV. in 1755, and director of the novices in 1764. In 1773 he was made a cardinal. One of his first acts as a pope was a curious pretext against the vain-
costume. In Russia, under Catherine II., there was, indeed, in every respect an improvement. In Prussia, under Friedrich II., he allowed the brethren to go on with their work, only under another name and in an order different from that of the new order when he went on with that whole series of ecclesiastical reforms which is generally comprised under the name of Josephinism, the Pope could think of no more effective means of self-defence than a visit to Vienna. On Feb. 27, 1782, he set out for the imperial residence. He was received with great reverence and enthusiasm by the people, and with much cordiality and politiness by the emperor; but the secretary of state, Kanuntz, indulged in the grossest breach of etiquette; and the general outcome of the visit was, that the Pope had to give in on all the principal points of difference. Nor was a better modus vivendi established. In September, 1788, the emperor appointed a new archbishop of Milan; and, when the Pope hesitated to confirm him, Kainuntz reminded him that the case of papal refusal, the confirmation was to be pronounced by a special synod. Pius VI. threatened to put the emperor under the ban; but Joseph II. simply returned the letter, with the demand to have the writer of it properly punished. Once more a personal intercourse between the emperor and the Pope was resumed. Joseph II. arrived at Rome on Dec. 23, 1783, and said there till Jan. 21, 1784.
But nothing was accomplished. By a decree of April 28, 1784, he interfered with the worship of relies; by another, of March 21, 1784, he levied tax on pilgrimages; by a third, of Jan. 17, 1785, he ordered all side-altars removed from the churches;
by a fourth, of Feb. 21, 1786, the vernacular tongue was introduced in divine service. The whole Roman clergy were warned not to use it.

The ecclesiastical reforms began to be carried out. The Catechismus Romanus was issued; the decrees of the Council of Trent were accepted
and enforced by the Roman-Catholic princes, etc.
The papal squadron also took part in the brilliant
but fruitless victory of Don Juan over the Turks
at Lepanto, Oct. 8, 1571. The bulls of Pius V. are found in Chrubini: Bullar. Magm., iii.: his Epis-tolae Apostolice have been edited by F. Gosau,
Antwerp, 1840. See also Herw. Catena: Viva del
Papa P. V., which contains his correspondence; and Falloux: Histoire de S. P.
V., Angers, 1846, 2 vols. MANOOLD.

Pius VI. (Feb. 15, 1775—Aug. 29, 1799). He belonged to a noble but poor family; studied law; entered the service of the church, and was appointed secretary to Benedict XIV. in 1755,
and director of the novices in 1764. In 1773 he was made a cardinal. One of his first acts as a pope was a curious pretext against the vain-
costume. In Russia, under Catherine II.,
there was, indeed, in every respect an improvement. In Prussia, under Friedrich II., he allowed the brethren to go on with their work, only under another name and in an order different from that of the new order when he went on with that whole series
of ecclesiastical reforms which is generally comprised under the name of Josephinism, the Pope could think of no more effective means of self-defence than a visit to Vienna. On Feb. 27, 1782, he set out for the imperial residence. He was received with great reverence and enthusiasm by
the people, and with much cordiality and politi-
etc. But on March 24 he retracted, Consalvi promising to take up his residence at Avignon, Jesus, and the bull of June 2C, 1816, condemning to return to Rome, where he was received with the noble family of Chiaromonti, and was born at Cesena, Aug. 14, 1740. When sixteen years old he entered the Benedictine order, and for several years he taught theology and philosophy in its schools. Pius VI., who was related to the family of Chiaromonti, appointed him bishop, first of Tivoli, afterwards of Imola, and in 1785 he made him a cardinal. Immediately after his accession, he appointed Cardinal Consalvi, and in spite of the intrigues of Napoleon, Paca, the Zelanti, and the Sanfedists, he kept him as his friend and adviser for the rest of his life. The French occupied Rome on Aug. 10, 1809; and, when the Pope protested, he in the first years of his reign disappoint the great enthusiasm, that he could probably have given to the Church. Finally, on May 17, 1809, he signed the concordat, which incorporates the Papal States with France, declared Rome an imperial city, fixed the annual revenue of the Pope at two million francs, to be paid him by the State, etc. The decree was made known in Rome on Sept. 10, 1803, were chiefly due to his skill; but he was completely ignorant of the so-called "organic articles" with which Napoleon accompanied them, and which gave them a very limited bearing. In spite of the concordat, however, and though Pius VII. consented to go to Paris to crown Napoleon, the relation between the curia and the French emperor was always more or less strained. Napoleon was very arbitrary and peremptory in his demands; and a sincere reconciliation became an impossibility when Pius VII. refused to dissolve the marriage of Jerome and Miss Patterson. In October, 1805, Ancona was suddenly seized by French soldiers; and a letter of about the same date, from Napoleon to Cardinal Fesch, shows, that, even at that time, he had decided upon the secularization of the States of the Church. Finally, on May 17, 1809, he signed the Schiamburn decree which incorporated the Papal States with France, declared Rome an imperial city, fixed the annual revenue of the Pope at two million francs, to be paid him by the State, etc. The decree was made known in Rome on June 10, 1809; and, when the Pope protested, he was arrested in the Vatican by the French police, and carried a prisoner to the fortress of Savona in the Gulf of Genoa. His captivity was at first very mild, but became more and more severe as he showed himself firm and resolute in upholding his dignity; and in May, 1812, while on the way to Russia, Napoleon ordered him to be brought to Fontainebleau. There he was half forced and half persuaded to sign the concordat of Jan. 25, 1813, renouncing his temporal power, and liberality of his character; and, in the conclusion after the death of Gregory XVI., he was, indeed, the candidate of Young Italy. Nor did he in the first years of his reign disappoint the expectations of his party. More than six thousand political prisoners and exiles were pardoned; the most harassing restrictions of the press were removed; great reforms were introduced in the administration and the courts; a Consula — a transition from a political to a military government — was established under the presidency of Gизи. The Ultramontanes stood aghast; the Jesuits denounced the Pope as a Robespierre with the tiara; and the Liberals joined him with such an enthusiasm, that he could probably have given an entirely different character to the papacy if he had been resolute enough to place himself at the head of that movement which finally resulted in the union of Italy. But he shrank from a war with Austria, one of the pillars of the Church of Rome; and hardly had he taken the first retrograde step before a rising in Rome compelled him to flee (1848). He took up his residence at Gaeta as the guest of the king of Naples; and when he returned to Rome, two years later, under the protection of a French army of occupation, he had completely changed his views, and given up himself entirely to the Jesuits. The result was the loss of the Romagna in 1859, of Umbria and the Marches in 1860, of Rome itself in 1870; that is, the complete destruction of the temporal power of the Pope.
PIUS SOCIETIES.

Art. Church, States of the. The character of the spiritual reign of Pius IX. is strikingly represented by his establishment of the dogma of the immaculate conception, by his encyclical letter and the syllabus accompanying it, and by his establishment of the dogma of the infallibility of the Pope; by which three acts he threw, or at least encouraged to throw, the Church of Rome six centuries back, and to prevent her from ever advancing. See the arts. IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, SYLLABUS, and VATICAN COUNCIL.

The life of Pius IX. was written by Legge, London, 1875; Villefranche, Lyons, 1876; Trollope, London, 1877, 2 vols.; Testi-Fasserini, Florence, 1877; J. G. Shee, New York, 1877; Gillet, Paris, 1877; Dr. Busby, Paris, 1878; Pfeiderer, 1878; and Zeller, 1879. His speeches were published in Rome, 1872-73, 2 vols. See Gladstone: Speeches of Pius IX., in Rome and the Newest Fashions in Religion, London and New York, 1875.

PIUS SOCIETIES are associations formed in Germany for the defense of the freedom and independence of the Roman-Catholic Church. The first society of the kind was formed at Mayence in March, 1848, consisting of five hundred members, and naming itself after the Pope. But the idea met with so much sympathy, that at a general assembly at Cologne, in August, same year, no less than eighty-three such societies were represented. To prevent the influence of the State, and absolutely authoritative in the school, was adopted by the assembly as the principal proposition of its programme. For more special purposes, branch societies with special names have been formed,— the Vincent Societies, for missions among the heathen; the Canisius Societies, for the inner mission; the Francis Xavier Societies, for missions among the French; the Gallican theory and practice, see Van Espen: Tractatus de promulgatione legum ecclesiasticarum (Louvain, 1712); and Besier: Spec. de juris placet historia in Belgio (Utrecht, 1848). In Germany,— though in the period from the diet of Spires (1526) till the Westphalian peace (1648) the Empire took its stand very independently over against the Church,— the place remained a relation between the Church and the separate states,— Bavaria, Austria, Prussia, etc. See FRIEDBERG: Die Grenzen zwischen Staat und Kirche, Tubingen, 1872.

PLACEUS (Josua Laplace), b. in Bretagne, 1800; was in 1825 appointed preacher to the Reformed congregation in Nantes, and in 1829 (together with Amyrault and Capellus, who, like himself, were pupils of Camero), professor of theology at Saumur, where he d. Aug. 17, 1655. His Opera omnia appeared at Franeker in 1699, and at Aubencit in 1702, in 2 vols. quarto. His views of a mediate, not immediate, imputation of the sin of Adam, first developed in his De statu hominis lapti ac sui genus (1640), caused considerable uneasiness in the Reformed Church. But when, in 1645, the synod of Clarendon condemned those who denied the imputation of the sin of Adam, he defended himself as being not at all included under that verdict. After his death, however, the Formula consensus of 1675 presented a formal rejection of the views of Laplace and Amyrault, and, in general, of all the novelties of Saumur.

A. SCHWEIZER.

PLAGUES OF EGYPT. See Egypt, p. 710.

PLANCK is the name of two noticeable German theologians, father and son.— Gottlieb Jakob Planck, b. at Nuttingen in Wurtenberg, Nov. 15, 1751; d. at Gottingen, Aug. 31, 1833. He studied theology at Tubingen, was in 1775 appointed preacher at Stuttgart in 1780, and professor of theology at Gottingen in 1784. His studies were chiefly historical. His stand-point was that of rational supranaturalism, and his method that of pragmatic representation. His principal works are, Geschichte des protestantischen Lehrbegriffs, Leipzig, 1781-1800, 8 vols.; Geschichte der christlich-kirchlichen Gesellschaftsverfassung, Hanover, 1809-09, 5 vols. His life was written by Schläger (Hameln, 1833) and Lücke (Göttingen, 1835).— Heinrich Ludwig Planck, b. at Gottingen, July 19, 1755; d. there Sept. 23, 1813. He studied theology in his native city, and was appointed professor there in 1810. His studies were chiefly exegetical. He published the ersten Brief an den Timotheus (Gottingen, 1808), De vera natura autque indele orationis græca n. T. (Gottingen, 1810), Abriss d. philos. Religionslehre (Gottingen, 1821).

PLATINA, Bartholomeus, b. at Piadena (Latin, Platina), in the diocese of Cremona, 1421; d. in Rome, 1481. His true name was Giovanni; he first entered the army, but afterwards devoted himself to literature, and was appointed apostoli-
PLATONISM

The peculiarity of the Platonic philosophy," says Hegel, in his History of Philosophy (vol. ii.), "is precisely this direction towards the supersensuous world,—it seeks the elevation of consciousness into the realm of spirit. The Christian religion also has set up this high principle, that the internal spiritual essence of man is his true essence, and has made it the universal principle."

Some of the early Fathers recognized, as they well might, a Christian element in Plato, and ascribed to him a kind of propectic office and relation toward Christianity. Clement of Alexandria calls philosophy "a sort of preliminary discipline (μοναδική) for those who lived before the Christian Script of Paul and the Savior. Perhaps we may say it was given to the Greeks with this special object; for philosophy was to the Greeks what the law was to the Jews,—a schoolmaster to bring them to Christ (Strom., 1, 104 A; cf. 7, 505, 526). "The Platonic dogmas," says Justin Martyr, "are not foreign to Christianity. If we Christians say that all things were created and ordered by God, we seem to enounce a doctrine which Plato had sought earnestly, but in vain, in philosophy. And, though the gospel stood infinitely higher in his view than the Platonic philosophy, yet he regarded the latter as a preliminary stage to the former. In the same way did the other apologetic writers express themselves concerning Plato and his philosophy, especially Athenagoras, the most spirited, and philosophically most important, of them all, whose Apology is one of the most admirable works of Christian antiquity."

The Fathers of the early church sought to explain the striking resemblance between the doctrines of Plato and those of Christianity, principally by the acquaintance, which, as they supposed, that philosopher made with learned Jews and with the Jewish Scriptures during his sojourn in Egypt, but partly, also, by the universal light of a divine revelation through the "Logos," which, in and through human reason, "lieth every man that cometh into the world," and which illumined especially such sincere and humble seekers after truth as Socrates and Plato before the incarnation of the Eternal Word in the person of Jesus Christ.

Passages which bear a striking resemblance to the Christian Scriptures and apostles' teachings, pseudepigraphical and apocalyptic, and still more in the lofty moral, religious, and almost Christian sentiments which they express, are scattered thickly all through the Dialogues, even those that treat of physical, political, and philosophical subjects; and they are as characteristic of Plato, as is the inimitably graceful dialogue in which they are clothed. A good selection of such passages may be seen in the introductory chapters of Ackermann's work on the Platonic Element in Plato. They still strike us and seem to us collected might be made. But we do not wish to rest our thes, upon single passages, which, of course, may be exceptional, or, if taken out of their connection, might be misunderstood. To preclude mistake, we must examine the Platonic philosophy itself in its principles and spirit.

1. Perhaps the most obvious and striking feature of it is, that it is pre-eminently a spiritual philosophy. Hegel, as we have seen, speaks of "this direction toward the supersensuous world," this "elevation of consciousness into the realm of spirit," as "the peculiarity of the Platonic philosophy." There is no doctrine on which Plato more frequently or more strenuously insists than this,—that soul is not only superior to body, but prior to it in order of time, and that not merely as it exists in the being of God, but in every order of existence. The soul world existed first, and then it was clothed with a material body. The souls which animate the sun, moon, and stars, existed before the bodies which they inhabit (Timaeus, passim). The pre-existence of human souls is one of the arguments on which he relies to prove their immortality (Phaed., 75-79). Among the other arguments by which he demonstrates to once the immortality of the soul and its exalted dignity are these: that the soul leads and rules the body, and therein resembles the immortal gods (Phaed. 80); that the soul is capable of apprehending eternal and immutable ideas, and communing with things unseen and eternal, and so must partake of their nature (Ibid., 78); that, as consciousness is single and simple, so the soul itself is unpartitioned, and hence incapable of dissolution (78); that soul being everywhere the cause and source of life, and every way diametrically opposite to death, we cannot conceive of it as dying, any more than we can conceive of fire as becoming cold (102-107); that soul, being self-moved, and the source of all life and motion, can never cease to live and move (Phaedrus, 245); that diseases of the body do not reach to the soul; and vice, which is a disease of the soul, corrupts its moral quality, but has no power or tendency to destroy its essence (Repub., 610) etc. Spiritual entities are the only real existences: material things are perpetually changing, and flowing into and out of existence. God is: the world becomes, and passes away. The soul is: the body is ever-changing, as a garment. Souls or ideas, which are spiritual entities, are the only true causes; God being the first cause why every thing is, and ideas being the secondary causes why things are such as they are (Phaed., 100 sq.). Mind and will are the real cause of all motion and action in the world, just as truly as of all human motion and action. According to the striking illustration in the Phaedo (88, 89), the cause of Socrates with the death in the person, instead of making his escape as his friends urged him to do, was that he chose to do so from a sense of duty; and, if he had chosen to run away, his bones and muscles would have been only the means or instruments of the flight of which his mind and will would have been the cause. And just so it is in all the phenomena of nature, in all the motions and changes of the material cosmos. And life in the highest sense, what we call spiritual and eternal life, all that deserves the name of life, is in and through the soul. And the soul, which matter only contaminates and clouds, and the body only clogs and entombs (Gorg., 492, 493). Platoism, as well as Christianity, says, Look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporary (εποχακε), only for a season; but the things which are not seen are eternal.
PLATONISM. 1851

2. The philosophy of Plato is eminently a theistic philosophy. "God," he says, in his Republic (718 A), "is (literally, holos) the beginning, middle, and end of all things. He is the Supreme Mind or Reason, the efficient Cause of all things, eternal, unchangeable, all-knowing, all-powerful, all-preserving, and all-controlling; just, holy, wise, and good; the beginning, the middle, and the end of all things, the cause of all the phenomena of nature, of the human mind and its actions (Tim., 37 A). Therefore he made the world good; and when he saw it he was delighted (Tim., 37 C; cf. Plut., 108 D, and often elsewhere). Plato often speaks also of θεός in the plural; but to him, as to all the best minds of antiquity, the inferior deities made the world by introducing order and beauty into chaos and eternity, the highest possible good; and "Ideas" are the "forces," by which the end was to be accomplished.

3. The Platonic philosophy is teleological. Final causes, together with rational and spiritual agencies, are the only causes that are worthy of the study of the philosopher: indeed, no others deserve the name (Phaed., 95 sqq.). If mind (σοφή) is the cause of all things, mind must dispose all things for the best; and when we know how it is best for any thing to be made or disposed, then, said Plato, all that remains is to do it. The former fact, that mind is the cause of its being so (Phaed., 97). Material causes are no causes; and inquiry into them is impertinent, unphilosophical, not to say impious and absurd. Thus did Plato build up a system of rational psychology, cosmology, and theology, all of which are largely teleological, on the twofold basis of a priori grounds, and the "idea" is that which the highest good; and "Ideas" are the powers, or, in the phraseology of modern science, the "forces," by which the end was to be accomplished.

4. The philosophy of Plato is pre-eminently ethical, and his ethics are remarkably Christian. Only one of his Dialogues was classified by the ancients as "physical," and that (the Timaeus) is largely theological. The political Dialogues treat politics as a part of ethics,—ethics as applied to the State. Besides the four virtues as usually classified by Greek moralists,—viz., temperance, courage, justice, and wisdom,—Plato recognized as virtues humility and meekness, which the Greeks generally despised, and holiness, which they ignored (Euthyphron, passim); and he insists on the duty of non-retaliation and non-resistance as strenuously, not to say paradoxically, as it is taught in the Sermon on the Mount (Crit., 49). That it is better to suffer wrong than to do wrong is a prominent doctrine of the Gorgias (470 B, 508 C). But as the highest "idea" is that of the Good, so the highest excellence of which man is capable is likeness to God, the Supreme and Absolute Good. A philosopher, who is Plato's ideal of a man, and, so to speak, of a Christian, is a lover of wisdom, of truth, of justice, of goodness (Rep., bk. vi., passim), of God, and, by the contemplation and imitation of his virtues, becomes like him as far as it is possible for man to resemble God (Rep., 518 A, B).

5. Plato is pre-eminently a religious philosopher. His ethical and political doctrines, and his physics are all based on his theology and his religion. Natural and moral obligations, social and civil duties, duties to parents and elders, to kindred and strangers, to neighbors and friends, are all religious duties (Laws, bk. ix., 851 A, xi., 981 A). Not only is God the Lawgiver and Ruler of the universe, but his law is the source and ground of all human law and justice. "That the gods not only exist, but that they are good, and honor and reward justice far more than men do, is the most beautiful and the best preamble to all laws" (Laws, x. 857). Accordingly, in the Republic and the Laws, the author often prefaced the most important sections of his legislation with some such preamble, as when he calls it a sermon, setting forth the divine authority by which it is sanctioned and enforced.

6. Plato gives prominence to the doctrine of a future state of rewards and punishments. At death, by an inevitable law of its own being, as well as by the appointment of God, every soul goes to the lower world for the evil it contributed to the evil, and the good arising to the Supreme Good. When they come before their Judge, perhaps after a long series of transmigrations, each of which is the reward or punishment of the preceding, those who have lived virtuous and holy lives, and those who have not, are separated from each other. The wicked whose sins are curable are subjected to sufferings in the lower world, which are more or less severe, and more or less protracted, according to their deserts. The incurably wicked are hurled down to Tartarus, whence they never go out, where they are punished forever (τοιαίων χρόνον) as a spectacle and warning to others (Gorg., 539 sqq.; Phaed. 115 D sq.). The soul, if it is pure and pious, especially those who have purified their hearts and lives by philosophy, will live without bodies (Phaed., 114 C), with the gods, and in places that are bright and beautiful beyond description. More solemn and impressive sermons were never preached in Christian pulpits than those with which Plato concludes such Dialogues as the Gorgias, the Phaedo, the Republic, and the Laws.

We have space only to allude to other characteristic features of Plato's philosophy, such, for example, as his doctrine of "Ideas," — the True, the Beautiful, the Good, the Holy, and the like, — which, looking at them now only on the ethical and political side, is indefinable and intangible, and not dependent even on the will of God (the holy, for instance, is not holy because it is the will of God, but it is the will of God because it is holy, just, and good — Euthyph., 10 D); — the indispensable necessity of a better than any existing, not to say better than human, society and government (like the ideal republic, which is not so much a state, as a church or a school, a great family, or a Man "writ large"), in order to the salvation of the individual or the perfection of the race; — the degenerate, diseased, carnal, and corrupt state into which mankind in general have fallen since the reign of Kronos in the golden age (Laws, 713 C; Polit., 271 D: Crit., 108 D), and from which God only can save any individual or nation (Rep., bk. vi., 492, 493); and the need of a divine teacher, revealer, healer, charmer, to "charm away the evil that brings life and immortality to light" (Phaed., 78 A, 859). And we can only advert to the radical defects and imperfections of Plato's best teachings, — his inadequate conception of the nature of sin as involuntary, the result of ignorance, a misfortune, and a disease in the soul, rather than a transgression of the divine law; — his consequent erroneous ideas of its cure by successive transmigrations on earth, and protracted pains in purgatory, and by philosophy (an aristocratic remedy, in its nature applicable only to the favored few); his philosophy of the origin of evil, viz., in the refractory nature of matter, which must therefore be gotten rid of by bodily mortification, and by the death of the body; and his doctrine that the soul can arrive at its perfection; — his utter inability to conceive of such a thing as an atonement, free forgiveness, regenerating grace, and salvation for the masses, a fortiore for the chief of sinners; — the doubt and uncertainty of his best religious teachings; — his if's and whethers, especially about the Resurrection of the Body (Euthyph., 107 C); and the utter want in his system of the grace, even more than of the truth, that have come to us by Jesus Christ, for, after all, Platonism is not so deficient in the wisdom of God as it is in the power of God unto salvation. The Republic, for example, proposes to overcome the selfishness of human nature by constitutions and laws and education, instead of a new heart and a new spirit, by community of goods and of wives, instead of loyalty and love to a divine-human person like Jesus Christ. Baur (Soc. and Christ) does indeed find in the idealized Socrates of Plato an analogy (speculatively interesting, perhaps, but practically how unlike!) to the personal Christ; but even this redoded intercourse is not only for the doctrine of the "Logos" as it was developed by Philo and other Neo-Platonists. But also for the Incarnate Logos of the Gospel of John, with which it may, indeed, have some philosophical relation, but probably no historical connection, still less any corresponding influence on the history of the world.

The history of Platonism, and its several schools or sub-schools of thought and opinion, does not come within the scope of this article. It may be remarked, in general, that, in the Middle and the New Academy, there was always more or less tendency to scepticism, growing out of the Platonistic doctrine of the uncertainty of all human knowledge, and the value of "ideal" and immaterial ideas. On the other hand, inclined towards dogmatism: mysticism, asceticism, theosophy, and even theatremanship, thus developing seeds of error that lay in the teaching of their master. After the Christian era, among those who were more or less the followers of Plato, we find, at one extreme, the devout and believing Plutarch, the author of the almost inspired treatise on the Dei in the Punishment of the Wicked, and the practical and sagacious Galen, whose work on the "Use of..."
the Parts of the Human Body is an anticipation of the Bridgewater Treatises, both of whom, like Socrates, we can hardly help feeling, would have accepted Christianity if they had come within the scope of its influence; and, at the other extreme, Porphyry, and Julian the apostate, who wielded the weapons of philosophy in direct hostility to the religion of Christ; while intermediate between these two extremes there were those in the Neo-Platonic and ecclesiastic schools who came in contact with Christianity went on their way in profound indifference, neglect, or contempt of the religion of the crucified Nazarene. But not a few of the followers of Plato discovered a kindred and congenial element in the eminent spirituality of the Christian doctrines and the lofty ethics of the Christian life, and, coming in through the vestibule of the Academy, became some of the most illustrious of the fathers and doctors of the early church. And many of the early Christians, in turn, found peculiar attractions in the doctrines of Plato, and employed them as weapons for the defence and extension of Christianity, or, perhaps, for the more skilful adaptation of the Christian doctrine to its numbers and its strength. Among the most illustrious of the Fathers who were more or less Platonic, we may name Justin Martyr, Athenagoras, Theophilus, Irenæus, Hippolytus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Minutius Felix, Eusebius, Methodius, Basil the Great, Gregory of Nyssa, and St. Augustine. Plato was the divine philosopher of the earlier Christian centuries: in the middle ages Aristotle succeeded to his place. But in every period of the history of the church, some of the brightest ornaments of literature, philosophy, and religion,—such men as Anselm, Erasmus, Melanchthon, Jeremy Taylor, Ralph Cudworth, and Henry More,—have been "Platonizing" Christians.

PLATONISTS, The Cambridge. This name was given to a number of distinguished scholars, thinkers, and authors, who were graduates, fellows, tutors, and masters (provoostes) of colleges in Cambridge University, England, and who revived the study and the philosophy of Plato in the latter part of the seventeenth century. The leading men of the school were Benjamin Whichcote, John Smith, Ralph Cudworth, and Henry More. Nathaniel Culverwell, John Worthington, George Rust, Simon Patrick, and Edward Fowler also are mentioned as minor members. Joseph Glanvill, John Norris, and John Wilkins, who were educated at Oxford, were so intimately associated with them, that they are sometimes reckoned as belonging to the school. All the leaders, with the exception of More, and several of the minor members were educated at the famous Puritan College, Emmanuel. They were trained, for the most part, in contact with the Puritan origin, sympathies, and their position, in the first instance, to the Parliament and the Protector. One of them (Wilkins) married Oliver Cromwell's sister. But they belonged to the Established Church, and retained their influence after the Restoration. Several of them became bishops. About the same time, though, for the most part, a little earlier in the century, several of the Puritans at Oxford had somewhat similar school, or rather succession of scholars, authors, and divines,—John Hales, William Chillingworth, Jeremy Taylor, and others,—who represented moderation, comprehension, peace, and progress, not to say reform, in the church. But they came out from the Royalist and High-Church side in the great struggle of the century; and they directed their efforts chiefly to questions of church order and government, and to the cherishing in the church of a broad, catholic, charitable, and truly Christian spirit and life. In the latter part of the seventeenth century, Cambridge, rather than Oxford, became the centre of the liberal theological movement; and the Cambridge school took a wider range, and discussed questions which were not only vital to Christianity, but which lay at the foundation of all religion. They proved the existence of God, and illustrated his being, nature, character, and government of the world. They discussed the relation of spirit to matter, God to the world, the Creation, and the Fall. They carried their researches still farther, and inquired into the nature of matter and spirit, the laws of mind and of thought, the grounds of knowledge and belief. They combated modern materialism, agnosticism, and evolution, as they then existed in the germ. They explained and enforced the proper office of reason in religion, and insisted on the essential identity of a rational and Christian theology and philosophy. They maintained stoutly the doctrine of immutable morality, and inculcated earnestly the necessity of a righteousness that is not only legal, but ethical, imputed indeed, but also imparted, the gift of God, but living and reigning in the hearts and lives of true Christians. They argued the same, in 1633-34, at the resurrection of the body, from the light of nature and the teachings of philosophy; and they looked at all these questions from the Platonic stand-point. They had "unsphered the spirit of Plato." They translated his doctrines and arguments into the forms of modern thought. Cudworth's "plastic nature" is Plato's "soul of the world" transmigrated into the seventeenth century: his treatise translated his doctrines and arguments into the forms of modern thought. Cudworth's "plastic nature" is Plato's "soul of the world" transmigrated into the seventeenth century: his treatise on Eternal and Immutable Morality is a metaphysic of Plato's Eternal and Immutable Ideas; and he maintains, that, in their three hypostases,—Monad or God, mind, and soul,—Plato and some of the Platonists made a very near approach to the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. Henry More went so far as to hold the Platonic doctrine of the pre-existence of human souls. But Neo-Platonic demonology and modern spiritualism, but whose chief interest, to their minds, lay in the confirmation it lent to their faith in spiritual existences. They were all men of vast learning. They cumbered their pages with quotations, especially from Plotinus, Jamblichus, Proclus, and other Neo-Platonic; and so they were generally sadly deficient in the grace and beauty that shed such a charm over the writings of Plato. At the same time they were genuine disciples of Christ. They called on man to climb up to the understanding of the Deity. They were chosen fellow of Queen's College. He died in 1652, at the age of thirty-four, "a thinker without a biography." His funeral sermon was preached on his death. The Earl of Shaftesbury furnished the Preface for the Sermons. The following aphorism illustrates the Platonic cast of his mind and the general drift of his teaching: "Religion is being as much like God as man can be like him." More went so far as to hold the Platonic doctrine of the pre-existence of human souls. He died by some of the Cambridge Platonists, perhaps by all of them, even more than the unadulterated teachings of Plato himself; they Plotinized even more than they Plotinized in their religious philosophy. More and Glanvil were carried away by a belief in ghosts and witches, which was a cross between Neo-Platonic demonology and modern spiritualism, but whose chief interest, to their minds, lay in the confirmation it lent to their faith in spiritual existences. They were all men of vast learning. They cumbered their pages with quotations, especially from Plotinus, Jamblichus, Proclus, and other Neo-Platonic; and so they were generally sadly deficient in the grace and beauty that shed such a charm over the writings of Plato. At the same time they were genuine disciples of Christ. They called on man to climb up to the understanding of the Deity. They were known at the time as the "New Sect of the Latitude-men;" and their teaching was stigmatized as the "New Philosophy." It was a re-action from the long prevalent and then generally accepted philosophy of Aristotle and the schoolmen. It was also a re-action against the High-Churchism of Archbishop Laud on the one hand, and, on the other, against the High-Calvinism of the Westminster Assembly. It was partly in sympathy with, and partly opposed to, the philosophy of Descartes. Above all, it was in direct antagonism to the thinly disguised scepticism of Hobbes, and to the unbelieving and licentious tendencies of the times, particularly after the Restoration.

Principal Tulloch, in the second volume of his Rational Theology in the Seventeenth Century, which is devoted to the Cambridge Platonists, characterizes the four leaders of the school as follows: Benjamin Whichcote, reason and religion; John Smith, foundations of a Christian philosophy; Ralph Cudworth, Christian philosophy in conflict with materialism; Henry More, Christian theosophy and mysticism. For Cudworth and More, see separate articles. Benjamin Whichcote was born in 1610, graduated at Emmanuel College in 1633, fell into his appointment as provost of King's College, in 1644. He was the origin of the new philosophical and religious movement at Cambridge. His personal magnetism, and power as a preacher, greatly moved the university, and excited suspicion of his orthodoxy among the Puritan leaders. Removed by Charles II., he died, in 1658, on one of his visits to Cambridge, in the house of "his ancient and learned friend Dr. Cudworth." Archbishop Tillotson preached his funeral sermon. His principal works—Apostolical Apotheyses and Select Discourses — were collected and published after his death. The Earl of Shaftesbury furnished the Preface for the Sermons. The following aphorism illustrates the Platonic cast of his mind and the general drift of his teaching: "Religion is being as much like God as man can be like him."
After a short term of service in Prince Edward County, he was called to Petersburg in 1881. He removed to Richmond in 1884, to become the pastor of the First Presbyterian Church. In the thirteenth year of his labors in Richmond, he accepted a call to the Franklin-street Church, Baltimore, of which he had pastoral charge from 1847 to 1854, when he was elected to the chair of didactic and pastoral theology in the Western Theological Seminary at Alleghany, Penn. Owing to complications caused by the civil war, his connection with the denomination was terminated, and in 1862 he supplied the pulpit of the Arch-street Church, Philadelphia, until 1865, when he accepted a call to the Second Presbyterian Church of Pottsville, Penn. In 1867 he was elected to the professorship of didactic and polemic theology in Columbia Seminary, South Carolina; and, after filling that chair for eight years, he was transferred, at his request, to the chair of historic, casuistic, and pastoral theology, which position he continued to hold until 1886, when he was made professor emeritus by the board of directors. After his connection with Columbia Seminary closed, he continued to supply different churches in Baltimore, and other cities and towns in Maryland, until his labors were terminated by death.

This condensed enumeration of dates, and fields of labor, illustrates not only the vicissitudes of Dr. Plumer's life, and the versatility which characterized him, but the important positions and responsible trusts committed to him by the Great Head of the church.

Dr. Plumer was a man of commanding personal appearance. His manner in the pulpit was peculiarly impressive. There was a dignity, and even a majesty, in his presence, that commanded attention.

He was a voluminous writer. He wrote a Commentary on the Psalms, a Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, another on the Epistle to the Hebrews, a moralistic and practical Commentary on the Gospel; and for the Conversion of the Jews. Some of these works were republished in Europe: others were translated into German, French, Chinese, and modern Greek.

While professor in the Western Theological Seminary, he was also the successful pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Alleghany. While professor in Columbia, the church to which he ministered steadily grew in numbers, and was blessed with precious revivals. While pastor in the city of Richmond, he edited The Watchman of the South.

The presidency of several colleges, and the secretariats of several of the boards of the church, were at different times offered him; but he never saw his way clear to accept any of these appointments. In 1838 Washington College (Pennsylvania), Lafayette College (Pennsylvania), and Princeton College, conferred upon him the title of doctor of divinity; and in 1867 the University of Mississippi conferred upon him the degree of doctor of laws. In 1877 Dr. Plumer was a delegate to the council of all the Presbyterian churches of the world, which met in the city of Edinburgh.

For more than forty years he was a contributor to the periodical press, writing for reviews, for magazines, for many of the religious newspapers North and South, besides conducting a private correspondence which to most men would have been burdensome in the extreme. Perhaps no man of his time, not in political life, knew more people, or wrote on a larger number of subjects, than he did, and upon subjects so varied and important.

MOSES D. HOGE.

PLURALITIES, a term (pluralitas) in canon law for the holding, by a clergyman, of two or more livings at the same time. The canon law forbids it; but Catholic bishops granted dispensations to commit the offence, until the general council of 1273, when the right was taken from them. The popes still claim this right. In England the power to grant dispensations to hold two benefices with the care of souls is vested in the monarch and in the Archbishop of Canterbury. By 13 and 14 Victoria, c. 98, the benefices thus held must not be farther apart than three miles, and the annual value of one of them must be under a hundred pounds.

PLYMOUTH BRETHREN, so designated in the British Empire and America, upon the European Continent generally named "Darbyites" (see App., DARBY), are by themselves styled "Brethren." The characteristic of this school is an endeavor, in view of divided Christendom, to keep the unity of the Spirit. "That which characterized their testimony at the outset was the coming of the Lord as the present hope of the church, and the presence of the Holy Ghost as that which brought into unity, and animated and directed, the children of God. . . . The heavenly character of the church was much insisted upon" (Darby's Collected Writings, vol. xx. p. 19). The prophetic inquiry at the beginning of this century would explain their origin. Powerscourt Mansion, County Wicklow, Ireland, was a centre of such inquiry. It is to Ireland that we trace them earliest. About 1827 an ex-Romanist, the late Edward Cronin, gathered some sympathizers, ultimately at his residence in Lower Pembroke Street, Dublin, for "breaking of bread" every Sunday morning. Shortly afterwards another company was formed, which Cronin joined, at 9 Fitzwilliam Square: in this group, nucleus of the Brethren, the most prominent figure was the Rev. J. N. Darby. A pamphlet by Darby, On the Nature and Unity of the Church of Christ (1828), disturbed many minds in the Protestant churches, and swelled the Brethren's ranks; so that in 1830 a public "assembly" was started in Aungier Street, Dublin. Amongst those early joining the movement was "thenoble-hearted" Groves (Newman's Phases of Faith), who, however, left for Bagdad in 1829. To promote his views, Darby in 1830 visited Paris, afterwards Cambridge, and Oxford, the last place he met with B. Newton, at whose request he went to Plymouth. "On arriving," Darby writes, "I found in the house Capt. Hall, who was already preaching in the villages. We had reading-meetings, and ere long began to break bread." Their first meeting-place was called "Providence Chapel;" the Brethren, accordingly, "Providence People;" but, preaching in country-places, they were there spoken of as "Brethren from Plymouth;" hence also, from this origin, the name of Plymouth. The largest number ever in regular communion at Plymouth was a thousand, more or less. Amongst those that here embraced the "testimony" was the late S. P. Tregelles.

The title to communion originally, at Plymouth as in Dublin, may be gathered from Darby's Correspondence, which he carried on with J. Kelly (1830). He there writes of "real Christians," and doubtless feels it right to shut them out," whatever their peculiarity of doctrine: "we receive all that are on the foundation, and reject and put away all error by the word of God and by the help of his ever-present Spirit." A notable instance had occurred of the exclusion of one, who, in the story of his religious opinions, has narrated his early connection with the Brethren amongst whom he sought to introduce heterodoxy as to Christ. The Brethren, however, have always restricted discipline, or departure from others, in respect of doctrinal error, to cases falling under 2 John. Darby had written of Sardis and Thyatira, that "dispensers claimed service, and not departure from them." But the prevalence of sharp discipline from the outset to forbid the notion that the so-called "Exclusives" have later employed more stringent measures than was the wont of the Brethren at first: they may have become more consistent and systematic.

The Brethren had given practical expression to their views of the Christian ministry. Darby's Christian Liberty of Preaching and Teaching the Lord Jesus Christ appeared in 1834. In the same year was begun the Christian Witness, for which Darby wrote, On the Character of Office in the Present Dispensation (1835), uprooting all official appointment. In the same periodical he wrote, On the Apostasy of the Successive Dispensations (1838). We present an outline of these treatises:

"The old economy had fallen by the unfaithfulness of the covenant-people. The whole Christian system is dependent upon this fact. All is a matter of unbelief and obduracy. As a whole, it apostatized. The same happened with the New Testament economy. Christians were apostatized in the apostolic age. Failure ever marks man placed under responsibility. The whole Christian system depended upon continuance in God's goodness. If Christendom depart from the divine path for this dispensation, his goodness is abandoned. This is the ruin of the church. Every present ecclesiastical organization is abnormal; all Christendom obnoxious to judgment. According to Darby's tracts, Sur la Formation des Églises (1839) and sequel, there remains but this apostasy totale et sans remède. A new church organization supposes not a new creation, but the renovation (v.l. Jahrgang). All are rejected, Romanist and Protestant alike: they repose upon an unchristian sentiment. Unlike other separatists, Darby places dissenters' systems under the same ban as national churches; only he sees more corruption in the latter. He falls back upon the promesse du seigneur (Matt. 20. 27 Take up the scythe and the sickle.) He provides nothing into which the church should resolve itself. Moreover, ecclesiastical office is imposed by the church's own hands. See a tract, On the Apostasy—What is Successionism? (1840); also Le Ministère considéré dans sa Nature, etc. (1943), and De la Présence et de l'Action du S. Esprit dans l'Église, etc. The acceptance of autocratic ministry as medium is impossible. The individual man ignores the privilege, enjoyed by every believer, of access to the throne of grace. There are, nevertheless, ministers in the word; because, without such.
Christ's work would have been imperfect: he has intended to man the word of reconciliation. This is not a particular office (charge): service in the word is the faithful exercise of a spiritual gift, something of which all the individual converts were responsible to Christ alone. There are many such gifts. Every believer possesses, besides the general gift (δώρον) of the Spirit, a special gift (κωνσταντία), which he should exercise for the good of the assembly. The Spirit distributes these gifts ἀπόδοτος. It may be difficult to apprehend how Darby could reconcile this scheme with that of a church in ruins. Has Christendom all the ἱστορία, like the apostolic church? His answer lies in the difference between gift and office, and in a difference of gifts, some of which, sign-gifts, were withdrawn through the Lord's displeasure. The ministrations of gifts have no organic connection with the offices of elders, bishops, and deacons, which do not affect the dispensation, but concern the external order of the assembly and the care of its temporal affairs; yet he would not deny that those, as Stephen, who held office, might also have gifts, fruit of the Spirit's free grace. But the office was of apostolic appointment, no longer available. Since the decease of the last apostle, of Timothy, the apostolic delegates, no one has title to appoint to any. From all church officers, believers must separate, to unite with assemblies de cultu.”

Kelly explains, that “separation” does not mean entire separation from the church. In 1839 Darby wrote, “I should think it a great sin to leave a church of God because corruption were found in it” (cf. supra). Kelly says, “If there be acceptance of evil in its confession or conduct, separation from evil according to Scripture is imperative;” and, further, that “what is erroneous, it does not warrant us in rejecting those doctrines should be judged, and itsteachers put out of communion. Their remonstrances being unheeded, they were obliged to withdraw from communion at Bethesda; one of them printing a letter explanatory of his reasons for seceding. This brought forth a paper signed by ten chief persons at Bethesda, vindicating their conduct” (Ibid.). This is known as The Test. The ground taken was this: “Supporting the author of the tracts were fundamentally heretical, this would not warrant us in rejecting those who come from under his teaching, until we were satisfied that they had imbibed views essentially subversive of foundation truths,” but “that no one defending or upholding Mr. Newton’s views should be received into communion.”

The Brethren presented an unbroken front until 1845, when Darby, at the request of one of the leaders at Plymouth, repaired thither, only to have his solicitude for a consistent testimony exercised by the relapse of Newton, residing there. The spell that had held the Brethren together was broken by “the spirit of clericalism” (Miller), which sprang up at Plymouth. Newton had from his solicitude for a consistent testimony, the precedent at Bethesda, the dominion of the spirit of clericalism (Miller), which sprung up at Plymouth. Newton had from his solicitude for a consistent testimony, the precedent at Bethesda, while others [countenanced by Darby] maintained the position they had previously occupied” (Ibid.).

The seceders, and all linked with them, obtained the name of “Exclusives.” While rigidly excluding all on Bethesda ground, they freely receive into communion Christians, as well members of the Established Church as non-conformists, subject to objection raised either of ungodly life or radical error. “The explanation is this: the neutral Brethren... by acknowledging the presence of the Holy Ghost, profess to be one body: in receiving a single member from a body that professes to be a unit, the whole body, sound or unsound, is in principle received. But in the Church of Eng-
The motto of ... latitudinarianism.

The "Exclusives" have jealously guarded the balance of truth by not so employing 2 John as to contravene Rom. xiv., xv.

Between 1878 and 1881 a second great breach rent the Brethren, completed in Darby's lifetime.

Between 1878 and 1881 a second great breach rent the Brethren, completed in Darby's lifetime. A "gathering" at Ryde failed to deal with depravity in gremio. Warnings from Brethren elsewhere seemed futile; but all recognized its status.

Headed to our Lord passed through certain non-atoning sufferings in consequence of the position he had taken voluntarily in Israel, in fulfilment of scriptural prophecies, and as typical of the tribulation of the godly "remnant" in the last days. Some, unable to distinguish between this doctrine and that already condemned, raised a storm against Darby (1896), withdrawing from communion; but no division ensued.

Between 1878 and 1881 a second great breach rent the Brethren, completed in Darby's lifetime.

The Brethren at Kennington, London, where the latter lived, were slow to judge his misdeed. The leaders of Park Street, another London meeting, directed the crusade against him: hence a second breach occurred. Leaders of Park Street, another London meeting, directed the crusade against him: hence a second breach occurred. Leaders of Park Street, another London meeting, directed the crusade against him: hence a second breach occurred.

Thus the Brethren have resolved themselves into the following sections:

1. The so-called "Exclusives" in three branches:—
   - The followers of the late J. N. Darby, continuing to his ecclesiastical course,— the Pauline view of the church; the church from a Pauline point of view, modified by Johannine elements; the followers of W. Kelly, characterized by a general adhesion to Darby's views, and that in the blood,— and latitudinarianism. As to contravene Rom. xiv., xv. But thenceforth they definitely proclaimed "separation from evil as God's principle of unity." Many companions of the Brethren followed Muller. The assembly at Vevey, amongst others, was affected by Newton's doctrine, and divided; but an increasing number have carried on the testimony under Darby's guidance. Thus was made a fresh start, with accession from this time of doctrinal intelligence and definiteness. The original Christian Witness was in 1849 revised by The Tract Testimony, followed in 1856 by The Bible Treasury, still conducted by Mr. Kelly. To each of these serials Darby contributed largely.

No further rupture occurred until after the publication of Darby's Sufferings of Christ. The author had entered upon ground previously fatal to others. He held that our Lord passed through certain non-atoning sufferings in consequence of the position he had taken voluntarily in Israel, in fulfilment of scriptural prophecies, and as typical of the tribulation of the godly "remnant" in the last days. Some, unable to distinguish between this doctrine and that already condemned, raised a storm against Darby (1896), withdrawing from communion; but no division ensued.

Between 1878 and 1881 a second great breach rent the Brethren, completed in Darby's lifetime. A "gathering" at Ryde failed to deal with depravity in gremio. Warnings from Brethren elsewhere seemed futile; but all recognized its status.

Headed to our Lord passed through certain non-atoning sufferings in consequence of the position he had taken voluntarily in Israel, in fulfilment of scriptural prophecies, and as typical of the tribulation of the godly "remnant" in the last days. Some, unable to distinguish between this doctrine and that already condemned, raised a storm against Darby (1896), withdrawing from communion; but no division ensued.

Between 1878 and 1881 a second great breach rent the Brethren, completed in Darby's lifetime. A "gathering" at Ryde failed to deal with depravity in gremio. Warnings from Brethren elsewhere seemed futile; but all recognized its status.

Headed to our Lord passed through certain non-atoning sufferings in consequence of the position he had taken voluntarily in Israel, in fulfilment of scriptural prophecies, and as typical of the tribulation of the godly "remnant" in the last days. Some, unable to distinguish between this doctrine and that already condemned, raised a storm against Darby (1896), withdrawing from communion; but no division ensued.

Between 1878 and 1881 a second great breach rent the Brethren, completed in Darby's lifetime. A "gathering" at Ryde failed to deal with depravity in gremio. Warnings from Brethren elsewhere seemed futile; but all recognized its status.

Headed to our Lord passed through certain non-atoning sufferings in consequence of the position he had taken voluntarily in Israel, in fulfilment of scriptural prophecies, and as typical of the tribulation of the godly "remnant" in the last days. Some, unable to distinguish between this doctrine and that already condemned, raised a storm against Darby (1896), withdrawing from communion; but no division ensued.

Between 1878 and 1881 a second great breach rent the Brethren, completed in Darby's lifetime. A "gathering" at Ryde failed to deal with depravity in gremio. Warnings from Brethren elsewhere seemed futile; but all recognized its status.

Headed to our Lord passed through certain non-atoning sufferings in consequence of the position he had taken voluntarily in Israel, in fulfilment of scriptural prophecies, and as typical of the tribulation of the godly "remnant" in the last days. Some, unable to distinguish between this doctrine and that already condemned, raised a storm against Darby (1896), withdrawing from communion; but no division ensued.

Between 1878 and 1881 a second great breach rent the Brethren, completed in Darby's lifetime. A "gathering" at Ryde failed to deal with depravity in gremio. Warnings from Brethren elsewhere seemed futile; but all recognized its status.

Headed to our Lord passed through certain non-atoning sufferings in consequence of the position he had taken voluntarily in Israel, in fulfilment of scriptural prophecies, and as typical of the tribulation of the godly "remnant" in the last days. Some, unable to distinguish between this doctrine and that already condemned, raised a storm against Darby (1896), withdrawing from communion; but no division ensued.
administer his government of the nations under millennial blessing. After that, the final judgment of the living and the dead took place, and the dead were judged at the beginning of the Messianic reign. The immortality of the soul vindicated as well by Darby (Collect*ed Writings, vol. x.) as by F. W. Grant of America.

Endless punishment: cf. Darby's Elements of Prophecy, Kelly's Lectures on the Minor Prophets and Revelation, as to the Renewal of the Roman Empire, Antichrist, etc.

Their testimony is in the main as to the church, without neglect of evangelization. For their attitude towards ecclesiastical communities in general, see Darby's Considerations on the Religious Movement of the Day (1839); cf. his Evangelical Protestantism and the Biblical Studies of M. Gedet (1875). National churches they regard as too broad; nonconformity, as too narrow. Naturally the Evangelical Alliance has not their support. They hold the Holy Spirit’s presence in the church to be characteristic of this dispensation. “Their appreciation,” says Bledsoe, “of the Holy Spirit’s presence, power, and guidance, is the grand and distinctive character of their theology.”

In 1879 Miller wrote as follows: “In the United States 91 meetings have sprung up of late years; in Canada they have held 101 meetings; in Sweden, 39; in Germany, 189; in France, 146; in Switzerland, 72; in the United Kingdom, about 750, besides twenty-two countries where the meetings vary from 1 to 13.” In 1838 we find Brethren already in India. Bishop Wilson of Calcutta employed a charge to his clergy for an attack upon them.

In 1883 Darby wrote: “Brethren have a chargeto their clergy for an attack upon them.”

PNEUMATOMACHI. A name applied generally to all who held heretical views concerning the Holy Spirit, and more especially to the followers of Macedonius; which article see. It originated with Athanasius, and occurs for the first time in the Nicene Creed, quite a number of them, more especially the followers of Macedonius, transferred the question from the second to the third person of the Trinity, and thereby the Trinity became a mere person. Serapion, Bishop of Thmuis, told Athanasius of this new heresy; and he not only wrote to him in his own kingdom, where the city of Breslau refused to acknowledge him, and was the centre

PODIEBRAD, George of, a Bohemian noble (b. 1420), who by energy and capacity rose to such importance, that, in the absence of the Bohemian king, he was made governor in 1452. On the accession of Ladislas (1452) he remained the chief person in the kingdom, and on the death of Ladislas (1457) was elected King of Bohemia by the Diet. The reign of King George (1457-71) marks the decisive period in the religious history of Bohemia. The Hussites had been in a manner reconciled to the Papacy, and the Compacts made with the Council of Basel. On the dissolution of the council, the Papacy neither accepted nor disavowed the Compacts. It saw that a breach with Bohemia was undesirable, and hoped to foster a Catholic re-action within the land, which would slowly bring back Bohemia to Catholicism. Podiebrad was the great opponent of this policy, and was the greatest statesman of his age in Europe. He wished to unite Bohemia, and organize it into a great power. This was impossible, so long as Bohemia was rent by religious discord, and, through want of Papal recognition, was isolated from European politics. Podiebrad could not make peace with the Papacy without losing his hold on Bohemia, and attack the Papacy without losing his political position in Germany. He accordingly engaged in negotiations with the Papacy, and skillfully managed to lead the Popes, Calixtus III. and Pius II., to think that he was more compliant than he really was. Every mark of confidence which they showed he hypocritically used to assure his political position abroad. Yet there was opposition to him in his own kingdom, where the city of Breslau refused to acknowledge him, and was the centre of a Catholic opposition. At last Podiebrad's diplomacy came to an end. Pius II. was alarmed at his increasing influence in Germany, and in 1492 disclaimed the Compacts, and demanded Podiebrad's unconditional obedience. At first Podiebrad temporized, then aimed a mighty blow at the Papacy. He proposed to the various courts of Europe the summoning of a parliament of temporal princes to discuss European affairs. His object was to drive the Turks from his dominions. But this policy, which was the one point in which the Bohemian crown was given by the Diet to the head of Europe. The Bohemian crown was given by the Diet to Ladislas of Poland. The war of Hungary and Bohemia was most disastrous to Europe: it wasted the wealth of the two countries which were the chief bulwarks against the Turk. Paul II., by encouraging it, diverted the Papacy from its crusading policy, which was the one point in which it could stand at the head of Europe.

POISSY. 1680

POETRY. See Hebrew Poetry.

POIER, Pierre, b. at Metz, April 13, 1646; d. at Rheinsburg, near Leyden, May 21, 1719; the only real mystic among the French Reformed theologians. He was first apprenticed to a woodcarver, but went in 1664 to Basel, to study theology, and was in 1686 appointed preacher at Heidelberg, and in 1672 at Anweiler. He remained there in 1678 by the war, he resided for several years in Holland and at Hamburg, until he, in 1682, retired to Rheinsburg, where he spent the rest of his life. He had studied Tauler and Thomas à Kempis, and lived in intimate friendship with Antoinette Bourignon and other mystics; his theology of love, a theology based on sentiment, raising him above the differences of churches and creeds. His principal works are, L'économie divine, Amsterdam, 1887; 7 vols.; La paix des bonnes âmes (1887); Les principes solides de la religion (1705), etc., — most of them translated into Latin, Dutch, and German. He also translated the maxims of Jacob Boehme in Latin, and edited the works of Madame Guyon. [An English translation of his Divine Economy appeared Lond., 1713, 6 vols.]

POISSY, Conference of, 1561. To Catherine of Medici, regent of France during the minority of her son, Henry III., it was necessary to bring about some kind of reconciliation between her Roman-Catholic and her Reformed subjects. The latter were numerous, powerful, and influential; but the very sympathy which they met with, even in the highest ranks of society, made it seem probable, that, with a little adroitness, the differences might be bridged over. A conference between the two parties was therefore decided upon; and Poissy an abbey in the neighborhood of St. Germain, where the court resided, was chosen as the place of meeting. On Sept. 9, 1561, the first session was held, in the presence of the king, the queen, the princes and princesses of the royal house, and a great number of the highest dignitaries of the crown, gentlemen and ladies. The Roman Catholics were represented by the cardinals of Tournon, Lorraine, Chatillon, Armagnac, Bourich, and Guise, the archbishop of Bourdeaux and Embrun, and thirty-six bishops; the Reformed, by thirty-four delegates, among whom were Beza and Peter Martyr Vermigl. The conference was opened by a speech of the chancellor, L'Hôpital, which showed the Reformed that they did not meet their adversaries as they had demanded and expected, on exactly equal terms; but which also showed the Roman-Catholic prelates that they were not simply sitting in judgment, "for their verdict would have no effect if it were not found perfectly impartial and just." The word was then given to Beza. He appeared at the bar in the nobleman's black dress of the day; and, when he knelt down to pray,— the prayer which is still used in the French Reformed Church at the opening of divine service,— the queen also knelt, and the cardinals arose and uncovered. He made a long speech, and gave a succinct representation of the whole Reformed faith, in order that people might understand both the points of difference and the points of agreement between the Reformed and the Roman-Catholic churches. The speech was cool and calm and conciliatory; and it was listened to with breathless attention, its delivery being disturbed only at one single point. When Beza, in developing the Reformed doctrine of the Lord's Supper, used the expression that the body of Christ was as far from the bread as the highest heavens are from the earth, Cardinal Tournon jumped to his feet, and cried out, " Blasphemerii!" and such a tumult arose among the prelates, that the queen herself had to interpose and impose quiet. Beza, however, remained calm, and continued his speech, which the next day was printed, and distributed by the thousands among friends and foes. On Sept. 18 the second session was held. Cardinal Lorraine answered Beza. His speech was proud, but adroit and impressive. He avoided mentioning transubstantiation and the mass; and, when he spoke of the bodily presence, he used terms which remind one of those of Luther. But he refused to give the Reformed, or anybody else, a copy of his speech; and the Roman-Catholic prelates in general declined to continue the discussion in public. The following sessions (Sept. 24, 26, etc.) were consequently held in private; only the princes and the prelates and the Reformed delegates being present. In the session of Sept. 26, Cardinal Lorraine very cunningly proposed that the Reformed should subscribe the Confessio Augustana: it was, indeed, his general policy to show off the difference which existed within the Protestant camp. But the Reformed as cunningly met the threat, urging that it would be of no use for them to subscribe the Confessio Augustana unless the Roman Catholics also subscribed. In the same session a mixed committee was formed, and charged with the drawing-up of a formula consensus, which should be accepted by both parties. The committee actually succeeded in arriving at an agreement; and its formula consensus, though very vague and ambiguous, was accepted, not only by the court, but also by Cardinal Lorraine, who declared "that he had never had another faith." The doctors of the Sorbonne, however, rejected the formula as heretical; and, in the session of Oct. 6, the Roman-Catholic party presented a strictly Roman confession, which they demanded that the Reformed should subscribe. In the final session of Oct. 29, the Reformed party demanded that all the churches and all the church-property which the "heretics" had taken possession of in the various provinces should be restored. During the month which the conference lasted, a re-action took place in favor of the Roman Catholics. The financial pressure finally compelled them to yield to the Reformed demands. He needed money, and the Roman-Catholic clergy was the only body within the state rich enough to furnish the funds. Nevertheless, the Conference of Poissy gave the Protestants of France an opportunity of publicly vindicating their religious views; and the edict of Jan. 17, 1562, formally recognized the Protestant religion, so far as it gave the Protestants a right to meet for worship unarmed, and singing dirges on the anniversary of the day when the duke had ordered their idols to be burnt, or thrown into the water. Nor was the transformation within the church itself, from Greek to Roman, brought about easily. For a long time the Church of Rome felt compelled to temporize with respect to the use of the vernacular in divine service, with respect to the cup in the Lord's Supper, with respect to celibacy, and in many other minor matters. In 1516 a synod in the diocese of Breslau was convoked; and, a century later, the synod of Gnesen (1219) still complained that the decrees against the marriage of priests had had no effect. But, in spite of all pliability and cautiousness, there always was in the Polish Church a strong opposition from the side of the laity to the Hierarchy, organized; (the tithes could not be gathered, the ecclesiastical jurisdiction could not be sustained), and an equally strong opposition from the side of the hierarchy to the pope. — Gregory VII. complained in 1075 of the Polish bishops as ultra regulas liberi et absolvi, and, under Innocent III., a bishop of Posen ventured to leave an interdict pronounced against the duke of Cracow. He added that the Waldensians, the Beghards, the Fraticelis, the Bohemian Brethren, found numerous adherents in Poland; that the Inquisition, introduced in the middle of the fourteenth century, utterly failed in suppressing the anti-Roman tendencies; that the university of Cracow was founded in 1410 on the plan of Jerome of Prague, — it cannot be wondered at that the Reformation spread rapidly in the country. Dantzig espoused the cause of Luther in 1518; and, though fearfully punished in 1526 by Sigismund I., it could not be made to submit. Most of the great cities, both in Poland Proper and in Lithuania, followed the example; and when, in 1529, a papal legate undertook, in accordance with a royal special act, to publicly burn the works of Luther at Thorn, he was stoned out of the city. In 1544 the Swiss Reformation was first made known in the country (Stanislaus Latomuski), and found many adherents, especially among the nobility; and in 1536 John a Lasco began his great work of organizing the evangelical Church of Poland. Meanwhile the Roman Catholics were not asleep. They found an energetic and able leader in Hosius, Bishop of Culm, afterwards of Ermeland. Nevertheless, they could not prevent the diet of Petrikau (1565) from agreeing upon demanding a national council for the introduction of the Polish language in the mass, and the cup in the Lord's Supper, and for the abolishment of celibacy and the annulment, and in 1520 of the king. Sigismund II. issued an edict of toleration. It was, indeed, not the exertions of the Roman-Catholic party, but internal dissensions, which finally checked the progress of the Reformation. First a split took place among the Reformed on account of the unitarian or antitrinitarian views which arose among them (see Friese: Kirchengeschichte des Königreichs Polen, Breslau, 1786; Krasinski: The Reformation in Poland, London, 1875-80; Lescoeur: L'Église catholique en Pologne sous le gouvernement russe (1772-1875), Paris, 1876, 2 vols.)

D. ERDMANN.

POLE, Reginald, Archbishop of Canterbury; b. probably in Lordington, Sussex, March, 1500; d. at Lambeth, Nov. 18, 1558. His mother was a niece of Edward IV.; and governess of the eldest daughter of Henry VIII. He was placed, to make direct attack on its enemies, in preparing the revolt which was to dethrone Henry. The scheme came to nothing; and Pole found himself generally considered as a traitor, and as such he was murdered by heretics, and Charles V. The Pope, however, treated him kindly, and sent him (June, 1538) as legate to Toledo, and later (1541) to Viterbo. In the autumn of that year Henry threw Pole's mother (the Countess of Salisbury) and his brothers into prison, and in 1541 executed them all, except the youngest, who had been sent to France, and on the coronation of Mary, Pole returned to England as legate; entered heartily into the work of restoring the papal authority in England; was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury (March 22, 1558), and during his brief authority put to death as heretics five bishops, twenty-one priests, eight nobles, eighty-four artisans, a hundred peasants, although vacillating upon other points, he always,

The book, of course, filled Henry VIII. with as great a desire to bring this policy into action; and to his desire to bring England in unconditional surrender to the feet of the Pope. He did what he could to bring this policy into action; but the tenor of the English people, the temperament of Charles V., and the fanatical zeal of the Pope, must have opened his eyes to its impossibility.

POLEMICS. Very early, Christianity felt compelled, by the very circumstances under which it was placed, to make direct attacks on its enemies, simply in order to defend itself. In other words, polemics very early became a necessary part of Christian apologetics. But practice develops method; and it is evident, from the writings of Ireneus, Tertullian, Athanasius, and Augustine, that those writers were fully conscious, not only of the value of polemics as a weapon, but also of the manner in which to use that weapon with most effect. And again: conscious method is the beginning of science; not that polemics, though practised with great skill as an art, ever in antiquity developed into a systematic theory, a science. Even during the middle ages it did not reach that stage; and it was not until the Reformation had furnished new and violent impulses that the need of a complete theory of the art of polemics was felt. Hints of the kind are scattered through the works of Martin Chemnitz, Bellarmin, Hunnius, and others; but the Jesuits were the first to give systematic representations of the method of polemics: hence they were called "methodists." The Protestants followed the example, and a considerable literature soon grew up. See Abraham Calovius (Synopsis controversiarum, 1885) on the Protestant side, and Vitus Pichler (Theologia polemica, 1758) on the Roman-Catholic side. By Schleiermacher, finally, polemics was incorporated with the theological system as a part of philosophical theology. See his Der Staat der theologischen Studien (Berlin, 1811), and more especially the work of his disciple, Sack: Christliche Polemik (Bonn, 1888).
POLLENTZ.

1863

As the systematization of the various theological departments has varied, the place of polemics in the system has, of course, also varied. See Pelt: Theod. Encyclop., Hamburg, 1843; and J. P. Lange: Christl. Dogmatik; Heidelberg, 1849-52, 8 vols., etc. Such a change, however, does not materially alter its scientific character. L. Pelt.

POLLENTZ, George of. See George of Pollentz.

POLIANDER, Johann, b. at Neustadt, in the Palatinat, 1487; d. in Königsberg, 1541. He studied at Leipzig; was rector of the Thomas school, 1516-22, and acted as secretary to Eck during his famous disputation with Luther, in 1519, but was converted by Luther's argument, embraced the Reformation, and was in 1525 appointed preacher in Königsberg, where he spent the rest of his life. He was very active in introducing the Reformation in Prussia, and it was in 1525 appointed preacher in Königsberg, where he spent the rest of his life. He was very active in introducing the Reformation in Prussia, and is the author of the celebrated hymn, Nun lob mein Seel ("Now to the Lord sing praises"), translated (in Latin and Greek), but in incomplete, byHalloix, Rost: Memoria Poliandri, Leipzig, 1808.

POLITY, as applied to the church, means government or administration of the church, as far as the church is considered simply as an institution among other institutions. Among the most recent books in this department may be mentioned, G. A. Jacob: Ecclesiastical Polity of the New Testament, London, 1871; Charles Hodge: The Church and its Polity, New York and London, 1879; E. Hatch: The Organization of the Early Christian Churches, London, 1881; George T. Ladd: The Principles of Church Polity, New York, 1882; J. A. Hodge: What Is Presbyterian Law? Philadelphia, 1883; A. A. Hodge: The Polity of the Christian Church of Early Medieval and Modern Times, translated from the Latin by J. C. Bellett, London, 1883. For the various forms of church government or church polity see Congregationalism, Episcopal Church, Episcopacy, Lutheran Church, Presbyterianism, etc.

POLLOK, Robert, Scotch poet; b. at Muirhouse, Eaglesham Parish, Renfrewshire, 1799; d. at Southampton, Sept. 15, 1827. He was gradu-
POLYCHRONIUS. 1864

POLYCHRONIUS, Bishop of Apamea, and brother of Theodore of Mopsuestia, was one of the most prominent of the exegetes of the Antiochian school. Of his life nothing further is known. He wrote Commentaries on Job, Daniel, and Ezekiel. But, though he was never formally condemned, he was nevertheless considered a heretic; and of his Commentaries, only fragments have come down to us. See Bar-then in Greek by Halloix (1633), and after the death of Polycarp at Feb. 23, 155. His computation was immediately adopted by Renan, consequently worthless addition. The Acts of Quadratus at 155-156, and consequently fixed brother of Theodore of Mopsuestia, was one of the most prominent of the exegetes of the Anti-ochoan school. Of his life nothing further is known. He wrote Commentaries on Job, Daniel, and Ezekiel. But, though he was never formally condemned, he was nevertheless considered a heretic; and of his Commentaries, only fragments have come down to us.

POLYGAMY. See Marriage.

POLYGLOT BIBLES. In general, editions of the Scriptures in which two or more versions appear side by side. They have existed from very early times, perhaps from the period immediately following the return from the Babylonish captivity, when there are traces of a combination of the original Hebrew text and a Chaldee Targum. There is, in the Barberini Library at Rome, a Samaritan Pentateuch Triglot, which dates from the middle age, and contains the original Hebrew text, the same translated into the Samaritan dialect of the first Christian century, and also into Arabic. In respect to the New Testament, the necessities of the people to whom the gospel was carried obliged the early translations from Greek, and led to the separation of diglots, in which were the original text and the vernacular version. Of this character are some of the oldest manuscripts; e.g., among those having Greek and Latin texts are, for the Gospels, D (Codex Bezae), from A.D. 500; for the Acts, E (Codex Laudianus), from end of sixth century; and, for the Pauline Epistles, Irenaeus, Eusebius, and Jerome; and it is distinctly stated by Ignatius, all critics who reject those letters as spurious have tried to make its genuineness suspected. It was known, however, to, and accepted by, Irenseus, Eusebius, and Jerome; and it is distinctly stated as, for instance, the visit of Polycarp to Rome could have been brought into general circulation at the time when Irenaeus wrote (about 180), and still more difficult to understand how it could be accepted by him, the pupil of Polycarp. Nevertheless, it involves very great difficulties, is only mentioned in the chronological appendix, and that appendix is most probably a later and consequently worthless addition. The Acts themselves simply state that the martyrdom took place on Saturday, the 16th of Nisan; and the 16th of Nisan was a Saturday, both in 156 and in 155.

Of the letters of Polycarp, all have perished, with the exception of one to the Philippians. It was first published in Latin by Faber Stapulensis (1408), then in Greek by Halloix (1633), and afterwards often: the best edition is that by Zahn. As it contains a direct reference to the writings of Ignatius, all critics who reject those letters as spurious have tried to make its genuineness suspected. It was known, however, to, and accepted by, Irenaeus, Eusebius, and Jerome; and it is distinctly stated as, for instance, the visit of Polycarp to Rome was a Saturday, the 16th of Nisan; and the 16th of Nisan was a Saturday, both in 156 and in 155. The Complutensian Polyglot (Alcala, 1513-17, 8 vols. folio), one of the rarest and most famous of printed works, prepared, under the care and at the cost of Cardinal Ximenes (d. 1517, see art.), by famous Spanish scholars, among whom the work was thus divided: the Hebrew and Chaldee texts were edited by three converted Jews, Alphonso of Alcala, Paul Cornell of Segovia, and Alphonso of Zamora; the Greek and Latin texts, by Demetrius Dukas of Crete, Elius Antonius of Lebrixa, Diego Lopez de Zuniga (Stunica), Fernando Nunez de Guzman, and others. Begun in 1502, in celebration of the birth of an heir to the throne of Castile, Charles V. (Feb. 24, 1500), it was carried through the press of Arnaldo Guillermo de Brocario, at Alcalá de Henares, the Complutum of the Romans (hence the name Complutensian), from 1513 to 1517, but not published until 1520, by special permission of Pope Leo X. (March 22, 1520). The delay enabled Erasmus to have the glory of editing the first Greek Testament published (1516). The Complutensian Polyglot is in six folio volumes, of which the first four contain the Old Testament; the fifth, the New Testament (the printing of which was finished Jan. 10, 1514, from the fifth century, and presents Greek text and Sahidic version. These manuscripts tell their own story. The original had ceased to be intelligible, but the time had not yet come when it could be omitted: so there are Greek-Syriac manuscripts, Greek-Coptic, and many other similar combinations; but there has never been authorized the use of the Vulgate in connection with any version. For the critical determination of the text of the Septuagint, Origen compiled the Hexapla, in which he presented the Hebrew text, in Hebrew and Greek letters, along with the Septuagint and three different Greek versions, — Aquila's, Symmachus', and Theodotion's. Thus, although there were five texts, there were only two languages.

But all these combinations of texts are not really polyglots in the present usage of the term. Nor is the word correctly applied to those editions of the Bible which contain, (1) Merely the Hebrew and Greek originals; (2) The originals and a single complete translation for exegetical purposes, usually modern, e.g., Greek New Testament with Latin translation of Erasmus or of Beza; (3) The originals and it is difficult to understand how a spurious letter of Polycarp could have been brought into general circulation at the time when Irenaeus wrote (about 180), and still more difficult to understand how it could be accepted by him, the pupil of Polycarp. Nevertheless, it involves very great difficulties, is only mentioned in the chronological appendix, and that appendix is most probably a later and consequently worthless addition. The Acts themselves simply state that the martyrdom took place on Saturday, the 16th of Nisan; and the 16th of Nisan was a Saturday, both in 156 and in 155. The Complutensian Polyglot (Alcala, 1513-17, 8 vols. folio), one of the rarest and most famous of printed works, prepared, under the care and at the cost of Cardinal Ximenes (d. 1517, see art.), by famous Spanish scholars, among whom the work was thus divided: the Hebrew and Chaldee texts were edited by three converted Jews, Alphonso of Alcala, Paul Cornell of Segovia, and Alphonso of Zamora; the Greek and Latin texts, by Demetrius Dukas of Crete, Elius Antonius of Lebrixa, Diego Lopez de Zuniga (Stunica), Fernando Nunez de Guzman, and others. Begun in 1502, in celebration of the birth of an heir to the throne of Castile, Charles V. (Feb. 24, 1500), it was carried through the press of Arnaldo Guillermo de Brocario, at Alcalá de Henares, the Complutum of the Romans (hence the name Complutensian), from 1513 to 1517, but not published until 1520, by special permission of Pope Leo X. (March 22, 1520). The delay enabled Erasmus to have the glory of editing the first Greek Testament published (1516). The Complutensian Polyglot is in six folio volumes, of which the first four contain the Old Testament; the fifth, the New Testament (the printing of which was finished Jan. 10, 1514, the type is large and peculiar); and the sixth, a Hebrew and Chaldee lexicon, with grammars, etc.
(This volume was printed second, and was later separately published under title Alphonsi Za-morensis Introductiones hebraica, Complutum, 1526 and often.) The entire work of printing was ended July 10, 1517. In this Polyglot are given, (1) The Hebrew text of the Old Testament;
(2) The Targum of Onkelos to the Pentateuch;
(3) The Septuagint; (4) The Vulgate; (5) The Greek New Testament. (This position of the Vulgate the editors “compare to the position of Christ as crucified between two thieves,— the unbelieving synagogue of the Jews, and the schismatical Greek Church.”) The Targum and Septuagint are accompanied by literal Latin translations. The Septuagint then appeared for the first time, and not very correctly; but the Vulgate had often been printed previously, and the Hebrew several times. It was greatly to be desired that there was definite information respecting the manuscripts from which the work was derived, and the principles upon which it was carried on. Nothing is known respecting the manuscripts for the Greek New Testament, except that they were from the Vatican Library, judging from the character of the text, were late, and, after use, were returned.1 The New-Testament Greek differs considerably from Erasmus’, is but little more correct, and presents some eregious defects, especially in the Apocalypse. Of the Polyglot, six hundred copies were printed three upon vellum.

II. The Antwerp Polyglot (Antwerp, 1569-
72, 8 vols. folio), also called Biblia Regia (Royal Bible), was ultimately issued at an expense to Philip II. of Spain of two thousand ducats yearly.
Its originator was Christophe Plantin, the famous printer, who, perceiving that the cost could not be borne by him, applied to the king.
The latter not only cheerfully responded, but sent Benedict Arias Montanus (see Arias) from Spain to Antwerp to superintend the undertaking. Among his assistants were Andre Maes (Masius), Guido and Nicolaus Fabricius, Augustus Hunnseus, Cornelius Gudanus, Johann of Haarlem, and Franz Raphelang, Plantin’s son-in-law and successor. This Polyglot, besides all that is in the Complutenis, presents Chaldee Targums upon the whole Old Testament (except Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles), and the Pehitive with Latin translation: the latter is printed both with Syriac and Hebrew letters. Five of the eight volumes contain the texts; two, a Hebrew lexicon by Santes Pagninus, a Chaldee Syriac lexicon by Guido Fabricius, a Syriac grammar by Masius, a Greek vocabulary, grammar, a number of archaeological treatises under allogorical names by Arias, and, moreover, a number of brief philological and critical notes. The last volume contains a reprint of the Hebrew and Greek texts (except the Apocrypha), with an interlinear translation, which is partly the Vulgate, and partly the version of Pagninus, corrected by Arias. This last volume has been frequently reprinted. The Polyglot, looked at critically, is not very satisfactory. It depends a good deal too much upon the Complutenis; and its variations in the Greek New Testament are due to Stephen’s readings, and not to any independent study of manuscripts. Because Arias had printed in the Polyglot the Targums and much matter from Jewish sources, he was accused by the Jesuits of leanings toward Judaism, and was ultimately obliged to defend himself at Rome against the charge of heresy. (See Antwerp Polyglot, five hundred copies only were printed; and the greater part of these were lost at sea, on their way to Spain. It is therefore now a rare work.

III. The Paris Polyglot (Paris, 1628-45, 10 folios, largest size), designed by Cardinal Dup-eron, edited by Gabriel Siositta (see art.), printed in Paris by Antoine Vitre, at the expense of the parliamentary advocate, Guy Michel le Jay. In external respects it is the finest of the polyglots, but in contents has the least critical value. It is substantially a mere reprint of the Antwerp Polyglot, and makes no use of printed materials which came to hand since; e.g., the LXX., from the Codex Vaticanus (1597), and the Sixto Clementine Vulgate (1590, 1592). I t presents, as its only novelties, the Samaritan Pentateuch with the Samaritan version of the same, a Syriac and an Arabic version of the Old Testament, each accompanied by a Latin translation. Cardinal Richelieu bid a hundred thousand pounds for the glory of being its patron, but Le Jay preferred to have the glory himself. So heavy was the expense, that it absorbed his entire fortune; while the defects of the work were so notorious, the volumes so unwieldy, and the price so high, that comparatively few copies were sold, except as waste-paper. Le Jay, financially a ruined man, entered the priesthood; became dean of Verzele;
was made by Louis XIV. a councillor of state on Dec. 16, 1666; but was dismissed in 1657, when the number of councillors was reduced; and died July 10, 1674. During his lifetime (1666) three Dutch printers issued some copies of his Polyglot, with a new title-page, and a dedication to Pope Alexander VII., as if it were a new work.
The new title calls it Biblia Alexandrina Hepta-glotta. For an account of the Paris Polyglot, see Le Long: Discours historiques sur les principales editions des Bibles Polygiotides, Paris, 1713, pp. 104-204.

IV. The London Polyglot (London, 1654-57, 6 vols. folio) is the most important, the most comprehensive, the most valuable (critically speaking), and the most widely spread of the Polyglots. It was edited by Brian Walton, printed by Thomas Roycroft, and dedicated, first to Oliver Cromwell (1657, these are the so-called “Republican” copies), and then afresh (1660), in different language, to Charles II. (these are the so-called “Loyal” copies, and are by far the more numerous). Cromwell practically proved his interest in Walton’s sentiments by beholding it resolved to be imported free of duty,— a service acknowldged in the original preface. In the “Loyal” copies, however, this acknowledgment is withdrawn, and Cromwell is spoken of as “the great Dragon.” It was published by subscription,— probably the first work in England so published, at ten pounds a set. Twelve copies of the Polyglot were printed upon large paper. Walton had the assistance of all the learned men in Eng-and, particularly the Orientalists, of whom the most famous were Edmund Castell (Castelli), Edward Pocock, Thomas Hyde, Dudley Loftus, Abraham Wheelock, Thomas Graves (Gravius), and Samuel Clark (Clericus). It is said that an offer was made by a Prince for six hundred copies of his (Paris) Polyglot at half-price, for circulation in England; and that it was on his declining the offer, that the plan of a polyglot which should greatly exceed the Paris in convenience and value, but be much less expensive, was formed. The first four volumes contain the Old Testament in the following forms: Hebrew text, with the Antwerp Latin interlinear; the Samaritan Pentateuch; the Septuagint, from the Roman edition of 1587, with the various readings of the Codex Alexandrinus; the fragments of the Itala, collected by Flaminius Nobilus; the Vulgate according to the Roman edition, with the corrections of Lukas of Brugge; the Peshito, with translation of some Syriac apocrypha,—a much better text than the Paris; the Arabic version; the Targums from Buxtorf's edition; the Samaritan translation of the Pentateuch; and, finally, Psalms and Canticles in Ethiopic. All these texts other than the Vulgate are accompanied by Latin translations, and appear side by side. In the fourth volume are the Targums of Pseudo-Jonathan and of Jerusalem, upon the Pentateuch, and also a Persian translation of the same book. The New Testament is in the fifth volume. The Greek text is that of Stephen's folio of 1550, with critical apparatus, including the readings of Codex A, D (1), D (2), Stephen's margin, and eleven cursive manuscripts collated by or for Archbishop Ussher, and furnished with Arias' Latin translation. Besides the Greek original, are the Peshito, Vulgate, Ethiopic, and Arabic versions, for the Gospels also a Persian version; each with a literal Latin translation. The sixth volume contains various readings and critical remarks. The whole work is appropriately introduced by Walton's Prolegomena, in which the subjects of Bible text and translation are discussed with marked ability; indeed, this part was repeatedly separately published (e.g., Leipzig, 1777, ed. J. A. Dathe; Cambridge, 1828, 2 vols., ed. F. Wrangham), and for a hundred years remained unexcelled. In connection with the Polyglot, generally goes the Lexicon heptaglotton of Edmund Castell (London, 1659, 2 vols. folio), a lexicon to the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Samaritan, Ethiopic, and Arabic languages combined. The Persian is separately treated. From this as yet unique work a Syriac (Göttingen, 1788) and a Hebrew dictionary (1790) have been derived, both edited, with notes and additions, by J. D. Michaelis.

Besides the four great Polyglots, there are several minor ones: (1) The Heidelberg, in 3 vols. folio, Old Testament, 1586 (Hebrew, LXX., Vulgate, Latin translation of Santes Pagninus from Antwerp Polyglot), New Testament, 1599 (Greek, with Arias' Latin interlinear), the editor was probably Cornelle Bonaventure Bertram (1531-94); (2) The Hamburg, consisting of Elias Hutter's edition of the Hebrew Bible, and David Wolder's edition of the Septuagint, Vulgate, Pagninus' translation of the Old Testament, and Beza's of the New, with Luther's German Bible in parallel columns, the whole forming 6 vols. folio; (3) The Nuremberg, edited by Elias Hutter, of which, in its first form, only Genesis-Ruth were published (1596, folio), containing Chaldee, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, German, and another modern tongue, which varies in different copies; (4) The Leipzig, edited by Christian Beza, in Greek, Latin, German, and another modern tongue; (5) The Antwerp Polyglot, containing the following forms: Hebrew text, with the Antwerp Latin interlinear; the Samaritan Pentateuch; the Septuagint, Italian (Brucelloi), Hebrew (with Hutter's translation), Spanish (Cassiodora Reina), Greek, French (Genevan), Latin (Vulgate), English (Genevan), German (Luther), Danish, Bohemian, and Polish; (6) The Leipzig, edited by Christian Beza, containing the following forms: Hebrew text, with the Antwerp Latin interlinear; the Samaritan Pentateuch; the Septuagint, Vulgate, Syriac, German (Luther), Italian (Diodati), French (Osterwald), Spanish (Sciò), and the authorized English versions. It was edited by Samuel Lee, and has good Prolegomena. (7) The Hexaglotta Bible, edited by R. de Levante, London, 1871-75, 6 vols. quarto. This work is a mere reprint. It presents the Hebrew and Greek texts, with Septuagint, Syriac (Peshito), Latin (Vulgate), English (authorized version), German (Luther), and French versions.

Not falling under the head of polyglots, yet worthy of mention, are the New Testament in Greek, Latin, and Syriac (in Hebrew characters, with Tremellius' Latin version), edited by Tremellius, and published by Henry Stephens, Geneva, 1569, folio; and, finally, such curiosities as the Lord's Prayer in a hundred and fifty languages, edited by Chamberlayne, 1715; J. Adelung's Mitthridates (Berlin, 1806-17, 4 vols.), in which it appears in nearly five hundred languages and dialects; and H. Lambeck's Psalm 104 im Utrum mit seiner Ubertragung in 11 Sprachen als Specimen eiwiger Polyglotte (Kóthen, 1885).

POLYTHEISM. 1867

For the Antepon, see Annales Plantiniennes, Bibliothèque Belge, 1858 sqq. For the Paris, see A. BERNARD: Antoine Vité et le caractère orient. de la B. polyglot, Paris, 1887. Cf. encyclopedia arts. in Herzog, II., by Reusz (the basis of this); in Wetzer u. Welle, by WELTE; in Lichtenberger, by S. BERGER.

POLYTHEISM. The principal question relating to this subject is that of the origin of polytheism. The circumstance that polytheism so often has developed into pantheism, as, for instance, among the Hindus and the Greeks, seems to designate it as the primitive form of all religion; so that even the biblical monotheism might be considered as having grown up from it. The Bible itself, however, is very far from countenancing such a view. Neither Gen. iv. 26, nor Exod. vi. 3, contains any reference to a previous polytheism. Neither the Pentateuch nor the prophets show the least trace of an original polytheism. Jahre-Elohim was with the patriarch before and after Noah; and it was he who revealed himself to Moses. The animal worshipping the first commandment. The polytheism of heathendom is, indeed, in the Bible, considered a desertion from the one true God. The narrative in Gen. xi. of the building of the Tower of Babel, and the divine judgment which befell that undertaking, is a record of the separation, not only of languages, but also of nations, and has been so considered by the earliest Christian writers (Origine: Contra Celsus, l. v.; Augustine: De civ. Dei, xvi. 6) and by the latest (Schelling: Einleitung in die Philosophie der Mythologie; Kurtz: Geschichte des alten Bundes; Kauren: Die Sprachverwirrung zu Babel, 1881; M. A. Strool: Die Entstehung der Völker, 1868). Further on in the Old Testament, the development of polytheism from the primitive monotheism may be learned from the history of Abraham (in Gen. xiv. 18 the El Eljon of Melchisedec is the same god as the El Shaddai of Abraham; but, according to Josh. xxiv. 2, Abraham separated from an idolatrous father and brother when he emigrated to Canaan); from the history of Jacob, who saw the abomination of images creep into his family from Mesopotamian relatives and his father-in-law Laban (Gen. xxxi. 19); from the history of Joseph in Egypt, who married a daughter of the priest of On (Gen. xli. 50); and, finally, from the history of Moses, who, in a tremendous struggle with Egyptian and Babylonian heathenism, strove to keep his people firm in the faith in the one God. In the same manner the New Testament, whenever it touches the subject, presupposes that the Pagan religions have developed from a true primitive religion by a process of decomposition and degeneration. See Rom. i. 21; Acts xiv. 16, xvii. 29.

In spite of the plain assertion of the Bible, the opposite view, considering monotheism as a simple evolution from polytheism, has, nevertheless, found many adherents among the disciples of modern naturalism. It first took shape among the English deists of the eighteenth century; and it now occurs under three different forms, according as monotheism is developed from Fetishism, the belief in charms or enchanted objects, or Animism, the belief in spirits of ancestors and heroes, or Sabeism, the belief in the ruling power of the stars.

The fetish theory originated in the days of Voltaire and Hume. It was founded by De Brosses (Du Culte des Dieux fétiches, Paris, 1780), and perfected by A. Comte (Philosophie positive, Paris, 1880). Since that time it has been a favorite doctrine among the French, English, and American positivists. See Le Brock: Oeuvres d'Orphisme, 1867; Baring-Gould: Origin and Development of Religious Belief, 1869; J. A. Farrer: Primitive Manners and Customs, 1879; J. Colliot: La génése de l'humanité, 1880. It starts from the assumption of a primitive atheism as the basis naturally given, and reaches monotheism through a stage of childish or childlike combination between a supranatural power and some incidental natural object, — a stone, the tail of an animal, etc. But it overlooks that there is a very striking resemblance between those childish fetish idols and certain forms of superstition in Buddhism, Islam, and Roman Catholicism. For what is the fetish of the savage but the foot or the hair of Buddha's tooth in Ceylon, or the talisman of the Mohammedan, or the miracle-working saint's image of the Roman Catholic? They are all tokens of degeneration, no more and no less, — remnants of a decayed monotheism. See Harpel: Die Anlage des Menzchen zur Religion, Leiden, 1887; and O. Gougen: Die altorientalische Religion, Berlin, 1878. The same is the case with the second form of the theory, the so-called Animism. The name was first applied by G. E. Stahl (a physician, who died in 1794), to denote the doctrine of the soul; anima being the true principle of life in the human body. Thence it was transferred to the religious worship of spirits by E. B. Tylor (Primitivism in Primitive Culture, London, 1871); and to the religious worship of spirits with an astronomical basis, such as the Babylonian, Phenician, and others. It is evident, however, that, in the star-worship, we have not to do with a young, rising, religious aspiration, but with an old, sinking, superstitious effort, or as Le Page Renouf says concerning Egypt, in his Hibbert Lectures (London, 1880), "The sublimier portions are not the comparatively late result of a process of development or elimination from the grosser. The sublimier portions are demonstrably ancient; and the last stage of the Egyptian religion, that known to the Greek writers, was by far the grossest and most corrupt." A penetrating criticism of Sab-
POMFRET. 1868

POOLE.

POMPIATIUS, Petrus, b. 1462; d. 1524; was b. probably at Luton in Bedfordshire, 1677, and d. in London, 1703; educated at Cambridge, and held the living of Maiden, Bedfordshire. His Poems appeared 1699, 10th ed., enlarged, 1736. Soutey called him "the most popular of the English poets," and said, "Perhaps no composition in our language has been ofter perused than Pomfret's Choice." F. M. BIRD.

POMFRET, John, a moral and sacred poet; was b. probably at Luton in Bedfordshire, 1677, and d. in London, 1703; educated at Cambridge, and held the living of Maiden, Bedfordshire. His Poems appeared 1699, 10th ed., enlarged, 1736. Soutey called him "the most popular of the English poets," and said, "Perhaps no composition in our language has been oftener perused than Pomfret's Choice." F. M. BIRD.

POOLE, Matthew, b. at York, Eng., 1624; educated at Emmanuel College, in Cambridge; he became minister of St. Michael-le-Quernes, London, in 1646, and devoted himself to the Pres-

POND, Enoch, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Wrentham, Mass., July 29, 1791; d. at Bangor, Me., Jan. 21, 1882. He was graduated at Brown University, Providence, R.I., 1813; studied theology under Rev. Dr. Nathanael Emmons (see art.), and was licensed June, 1814, and ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Ward (now Auburn), Mass., March 1, 1815. There he remained until, in 1828, he went to Boston to edit The Spirit of the Pilgrims, an orthodox religious monthly which played an important part in the Unitarian cause. In 1831 he became president of the Unitarian Association (in which he denies the immortality of the soul upon philosophical grounds, while he accepts it as a revealed truth), De incantationibus, and De fato, both of which tend in the same direction. See OLARIUS: De Pompomatis, Jena, 1705.

POOLE. 1868 POOLE.

he came to it, it had only one professor and two students, and a library of five hundred volumes. He proved himself to be the right man in the right place; and, largely through his energy, the semi-

PONTIFICALE denotes any thing belonging to the bishop (ponifex), from the vestments he is to wear, to the rites he has to perform. In order to establish uniformity throughout the church, Clement VIII. charged a committee with drawing up a regulative in accordance with the best information on the subject which could be obtained; and on Feb. 10, 1506, the Pontificale Romanum was formally confirmed. The Pope also ordered that it should never be changed; but the printing of it was so careless, that, in 1644, Urban VIII. had to issue a new official edition of it.

PONTIANUS, Bishop of Rome, succeeded Urbanus in 230, but was, according to the Catalogus Liberianus, banished in 235 to Sardinia, where he resigned his position, and died shortly after. According to tradition, his remains were brought to Rome, and buried in the Cenoteterium Callisti.

PONTIFICALE denotes any thing belonging to the bishop (ponifex), from the vestments he is to wear, to the rites he has to perform. In order to establish uniformity throughout the church, Clement VIII. charged a committee with drawing up a regulative in accordance with the best information on the subject which could be obtained; and on Feb. 10, 1506, the Pontificale Romanum was formally confirmed. The Pope also ordered that it should never be changed; but the printing of it was so careless, that, in 1644, Urban VIII. had to issue a new official edition of it.

PONTEFALCIO denotes any thing belonging to the bishop (ponifex), from the vestments he is to wear, to the rites he has to perform. In order to establish uniformity throughout the church, Clement VIII. charged a committee with drawing up a regulative in accordance with the best information on the subject which could be obtained; and on Feb. 10, 1506, the Pontificale Romanum was formally confirmed. The Pope also ordered that it should never be changed; but the printing of it was so careless, that, in 1644, Urban VIII. had to issue a new official edition of it.

POND, Enoch, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Wrentham, Mass., July 29, 1791; d. at Bangor, Me., Jan. 21, 1882. He was graduated at Brown University, Providence, R.I., 1813; studied theology under Rev. Dr. Nathanael Emmons (see art.), and was licensed June, 1814, and ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Ward (now Auburn), Mass., March 1, 1815. There he remained until, in 1828, he went to Boston to edit The Spirit of the Pilgrims, an orthodox religious monthly which played an important part in the Unitarian cause. In 1831 he became president of the Unitarian Association (in which he denies the immortality of the soul upon philosophical grounds, while he accepts it as a revealed truth), De incantationibus, and De fato, both of which tend in the same direction. See OLARIUS: De Pompomatis, Jena, 1705.

POOLE, Matthew, b. at York, Eng., 1624; educated at Emmanuel College, in Cambridge; he became minister of St. Michael-le-Quernes, London, in 1646, and devoted himself to the Pres-

POND, Enoch, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Wrentham, Mass., July 29, 1791; d. at Bangor, Me., Jan. 21, 1882. He was graduated at Brown University, Providence, R.I., 1813; studied theology under Rev. Dr. Nathanael Emmons (see art.), and was licensed June, 1814, and ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Ward (now Auburn), Mass., March 1, 1815. There he remained until, in 1828, he went to Boston to edit The Spirit of the Pilgrims, an orthodox religious monthly which played an important part in the Unitarian cause. In 1831 he became president of the Unitarian Association (in which he denies the immortality of the soul upon philosophical grounds, while he accepts it as a revealed truth), De incantationibus, and De fato, both of which tend in the same direction. See OLARIUS: De Pompomatis, Jena, 1705.

POOLE, Matthew, b. at York, Eng., 1624; educated at Emmanuel College, in Cambridge; he became minister of St. Michael-le-Quernes, London, in 1646, and devoted himself to the Pres-

POND, Enoch, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Wrentham, Mass., July 29, 1791; d. at Bangor, Me., Jan. 21, 1882. He was graduated at Brown University, Providence, R.I., 1813; studied theology under Rev. Dr. Nathanael Emmons (see art.), and was licensed June, 1814, and ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Ward (now Auburn), Mass., March 1, 1815. There he remained until, in 1828, he went to Boston to edit The Spirit of the Pilgrims, an orthodox religious monthly which played an important part in the Unitarian cause. In 1831 he became president of the Unitarian Association (in which he denies the immortality of the soul upon philosophical grounds, while he accepts it as a revealed truth), De incantationibus, and De fato, both of which tend in the same direction. See OLARIUS: De Pompomatis, Jena, 1705.
death in the Popish Plot. He retired to Amsterdam, and died in October, 1679. Few names will stand so high as Poole's in the biblical scholarship of Great Britain. See Non-Conformist Memorial, London, 1802, i. p. 167, and an account of the life and writings of Matthew Poole, in the Annotations, vol. iv., Edinb., 1801. C. A. BRIGGS.

POOR, Daniel, D.D., Congregational missionary; b. at Danvers, Mass., June 27, 1789; d. at Mempy, Ceylon, Feb. 2, 1855. He was graduated at Dartmouth College, 1811, and Andover Seminary, 1814; sailed from Newburyport, Mass., for Ceylon, Oct. 23, 1815; returned home in 1848; went back to Ceylon, 1850. He was very successful in missionary labor. From 1823 to 1838 he was in charge of the mission seminary at Batticaloa; from 1839 to 1841, at Madura on the mainland, where, in his first year, he opened thirty-seven schools. From 1841 to his death, he labored in Ceylon. See S brague: Annals of the American Pulpit, ii. 617.

POOR MEN OF LYONS. See Waldenses.

POPE, The. The word "pope" is the Latin papa, from the Greek patér, and means "father." It was anciently given to all Christianteachers, then to all bishops and abbots, then limited to the Bishop of Rome and the Patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Constantinople. In the Greek Church to-day it is the customary address of every secular priest. The name appears, as first applied to the Bishop of Rome, in the letter of a deacon, Severus (296-304), to Marcellinus; was first formally adopted by Siricius (Bishop of Rome from 384 to 398), in his Epist. ad Orthod. prov.; officially used since Leo I. (440-461); and declared the exclusive right of the papacy by the decree of Gregory VII. (1073-85). Besides this title, the Pope is called Pontifex Maximus (literally, "chief bridge-builder"), in imitation of the Roman emperors, who united civil and religious functions; Vicar of St. Peter (Bonifacius, in 722, named the Pope this); Vicar of Jesus Christ, or of God (so, first, Innocent III., 1198-1216). The popes since Gregory I. (590-604) call themselves Servant of the servants of God (Servus servorum Dei).

The Pope dresses ordinarily in a white silk cassock and rochet: hence the expression "white pope," in contrast to the "black pope," the general of the Society of Jesus. Over this white dress he throws a scarlet mantle. When celebrating mass, he changes his gown according to the season of the church year: thus at Whitsuntide he wears red; on Easter-Eve, black; at Easter, white; in Lent and Advent, violet. His insignia consist of the pallium (see art.), which the Pope alone can wear on all occasions, the metropolitans only in their dioceses; the straight staff (pedum rectum), without a crook, surmounted by a cross; and the tiara, a mitre (see art.) surround by a triple crown. He receives the latter at his coronation, from the Cardinal deacon who presides over it on his head, saying, "Receive the tiara ornamented by the three crowns, and know that you are the father of bishops and kings, the earthly governor of the world, the vicar of our Saviour Jesus Christ, to whom be honor, world without end." The official letters of the Pope are briefs or bulls (see art.).

The Pope, as head of the church, acts successively as Bishop of Rome (the diocese comprehends the city and the country around within a radius of some miles, the cathedral of which is St. John Lateran), as Archbishop of the Roman province (which comprehends twenty-seven bishoprics, besides six suburban bishoprics), as Paramount of Italy, and as Patriarch of the East." (S. Berger.) For the manner of the election of a pope, see CONCLAVE; for the papal system, see PAPACY. See C. F. B. ALLNATT: Cathedral Perti: or, The Titles and Prerogatives of St. Peter and of his See and Successors, 3d ed., London, 1888. Cf. arts. Pope, by S. Berger, in Lichtenberg, Encyclopédie, vol. x. (1881), 163-170; Pope, by J. B. Mullinger, in Smith and Cheetham, Dictionary Christian Antiquity, vol. ii. (1880), 1681-77, and Dean Stanley's chap., "The Pope," in his Christian Institutions, London and New York, 1881.

COMPLETE LIST OF THE POPES.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Pope</th>
<th>Notes</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>67</td>
<td>Linus</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>79-91</td>
<td>Cletus, or Anaclet.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>91-100</td>
<td>Clemens I.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>100-106</td>
<td>Evaristus.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>109-111</td>
<td>Sixtus I. (Xystus).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>117-127</td>
<td>Sixtus II.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>128-138</td>
<td>Telesphorus.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>133-141</td>
<td>Hyginus.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>154</td>
<td>Pius I.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>154-155</td>
<td>Anicetus.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>155-159</td>
<td>Soter.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>159-166</td>
<td>Liberius.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>166-175</td>
<td>Marcellus.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>175-189</td>
<td>Marcellus II.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>189-193</td>
<td>Zephyrinus.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>193-202</td>
<td>Callistus I.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>202-218</td>
<td>Callistus II.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>218-222</td>
<td>Hippolytus, Antipope.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>222-235</td>
<td>Urbanus I.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>223-236</td>
<td>Fabianus, Martyr.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>226-230</td>
<td>The See vacant till March, 251.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>231</td>
<td>Cornelius (In exile).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>235-236</td>
<td>Novatianus, Antipope.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>236-237</td>
<td>Lucius I.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>238-246</td>
<td>Stephen I.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>247-250</td>
<td>Xystus (Sixtus II).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>250-259</td>
<td>The See vacant.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>259-269</td>
<td>Dionysius.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>269-274</td>
<td>Felix I.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>275-283</td>
<td>Eutychianus.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>283-296</td>
<td>Gaius (Calixus).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>296-304</td>
<td>Marcellinus.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>304-307</td>
<td>The See vacant.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>308-310</td>
<td>Marcellus.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>300-310</td>
<td>Eusebius, d. Sept. 23 (?), 309.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>309-310</td>
<td>The See vacant.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>311-314</td>
<td>Martinus (Melchiades).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>314-335</td>
<td>Silvester I.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>330-337</td>
<td>Marcus.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>337-352</td>
<td>Julius I.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>352-365</td>
<td>Liberius.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>365-366</td>
<td>Felix II., Antipope.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>366</td>
<td>Ursus, Antipope.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>366-384</td>
<td>Damasus.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>384-390</td>
<td>Siricius.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>388-402</td>
<td>Anastasius.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>402-417</td>
<td>Innocentius.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>417-418</td>
<td>Zosimus.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>418-422</td>
<td>Eutius, Antipope.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>418-422</td>
<td>Bonifacius.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>422-432</td>
<td>Celestius I.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>432-440</td>
<td>Sixtus III.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>440-441</td>
<td>Leo I.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Year</td>
<td>Pope</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------</td>
<td>------</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1870</td>
<td>1068-1081 Nicholas II.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1061-1073 Alexander II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1054-1057 Leo IX.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1047-1048 Damasus III.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1044-1046 Gregory VI.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1040-1047 Clement III.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1039-1040 Stephen IX.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1032-1038 Honorius IV.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1025-1026 Adrian II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1015-1016 Nicholas I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1003-1009 John XII.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>995-1003 Urban II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>983-984 Hildebrand (Paschal II).</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>974-983 Calixtus II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>967-974 Alexander II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>958-964 Innocent II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>954-961 Alexander I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>946-955 Gregory VII.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>935-942 Nicholas I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>928-934 Stephen X.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>922-926 Alexander II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>914-922 John X.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>908-913 Benedict III.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>903-905 Calixtus II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>902-903 Sergius III.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>900-902 Gregory XXVI.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>896-900 John IX.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>890-893 Stephen III.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>885-890 Stephen II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>879-884 Benedict II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>875-879 Alexander I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>871-874 Urban III.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>865-869 Clement II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>863-865 Urban II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>858-862 Ninian II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>850-857 Adrian I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>846-850 John XIX.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>840-844 Conon.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>836-843 Stephen III.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>832-836 Leo V.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>827-831 John XIII.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>822-826 Calixtus I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>816-820 Adrian II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>810-816 Boniface VI.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>806-809 Gregory XXVII.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>801-805 Stephen II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>795-800 Adrian I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>790-795 Paschal II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>784-790 Nicholas I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>779-784 Adrian I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>774-779 Gregory VI.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>770-774 Hadrian I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>765-770 Stephen III.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>761-765 Leo IV.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>756-761 Gelasius I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>751-756 Calixtus I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>746-750 Alexander I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>741-746 Nicholas II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>736-740 Nicholas I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>731-735 Leo V.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>726-730 John XII.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>721-725 Paschal I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>716-720 John X.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>711-715 Honorius I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>706-710 Leo I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>701-705 Gelasius I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>696-700 John V.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>691-700 Hadrian I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>686-690 John II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>682-686 Gregory II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>677-681 Nicholas I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>672-676 Leo III.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>667-671 Eugenius II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>662-666 Paul II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>657-661 Julius II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>652-656 Eugenius I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>647-651 Leo II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>642-646 John VIII.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>637-641 John VII.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>632-636 Stephen II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>627-631 Hadrian I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>622-626 Stephen I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>617-621 Leo I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>612-616 Martin I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>607-611 Hadrian I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>602-606 Gelasius I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>597-601 John I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>592-596 Simplicius.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>587-591 Gelasius I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>582-586 Marcellus I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>577-581 Leo I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>572-576 Adrian I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>567-571 Julius I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>562-566 Honorius I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>557-561 John V.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>552-556 John XXIII.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>547-551 Paschal II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>542-546 Alexander III.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>537-541 Nicholas I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>532-536 John X.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>527-531 Leo III.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>522-526 John XXIII.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>517-521 Martin II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>512-516 John XXII.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>507-511 Gregory IX.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>502-506 John XXI.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>497-501 John XX.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>492-496 Urban II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>487-491 John XIX.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>482-486 Stephen II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>477-481 Gregory I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>472-476 Hadrian II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>467-471 Leo I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>462-466 Gregory II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>457-461 Gelasius I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>452-456 Julius II.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>447-451 Calixtus I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>442-446 Sixtus I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>437-441 Gregory I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>432-436 Julius I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>427-431 Leo I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>422-426 Damasus I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>417-421 Sixtus I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>412-416 Callixtus I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>407-411 Sixtus I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>402-406 Damasus I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>397-401 Sixtus I.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
POPE. 1871

PORDAGE.

1277-1281 Benedict X.
1281-1285 Celestine V.
1285-1292 John XXII.
1292-1303 Celestine V. (abdicated).
1303-1304 Benedict XI.
1304-1305 Clement IV.
1305-1316 Clement V.
1316-1378 Boniface VIII.
1378-1394 Celestine V. (abdicated).
1394-1404 Urban VI.
1404-1410 Clement VII.
1410-1415 Boniface IX.
1415-1417 Martin V.
1417-1423 Eugenius IV.
1423-1447 Felix V.
1447-1455 Nicholas V.
1455-1464 Pius II.
1464-1471 Sixtus IV.
1471-1484 Innocent VIII.
1484-1492 Alexander VI.
1492-1503 Julius II.
1503-1513 Leo X.
1513-1521 Julius II.
1521-1534 Adrian VI.
1534-1555 Clement VII.
1555-1566 Paul III.
1566-1572 Pius IV.
1572-1574 Sixtus V.
1574-1590 Urban VIII.
1590-1591 Alexander VII.
1591-1596 Urban IX.
1596-1599 Paul V.
1599-1603 Gregory XVI.
1603-1621 Urban VIII.
1621-1644 Innozenz X.
1644-1667 Alexander VII.
1667-1689 Clement IX.
1689-1700 Gregory XIII.
1700-1721 Clement XIII.
1721-1749 Benedict XIV.
1730-1730 Clement XII.
1730-1740 Benedict XIV.
1740-1759 Clement XIII.
1759-1774 Clement XIV.
1774-1790 Pius VI.
1790-1823 Pius VII.
1823-1829 Leo XII.
1829-1830 Pius VIII.
1830-1846 Gregory XVI.
1846-1878 Pius IX. (longest reign).
1878- Leo XIII.

POPE, Alexander, b. in London, May 21, 1088; d. at Twickenham, May 80, 1744; ranks as a sacred poet in virtue of his Messiah (1712), Universal Prayer (1732), and Dying Christian to his Soul (1712). The last-named, however little fitted for worship, has been constantly included in hymn-books; and extracts from the other two have sometimes been thus used. The Universal Prayer, which has offended many, is prized by others as one of the noblest of religious lyrics.

F. M. BIRD.

PORDAGE, John, one of the founders of the Philadelphian Society (see art.); b. in London, 1608; d. there 1908. He studied theology and medicine at Oxford; was curate at Reading, and then rector at Bradfield in Berkshire. Influenced by the works of Jacob Boehme (see art.), he advocated fantastic notions, by which he attracted a little group of disciples, and also adverse criticism, the result of which was his deposition from the ministry. Pordage and the little company moved from Bradfield to London. In 1655 the plague drove them out of the city, and they went back to Bradfield; returned again to London, 1670, and remained there permanently. It was in the latter year that Jane Leade (see art.) founded the Philadelphian Society, which met in Pordage's house. Pordage was their seer, and derived his teachings from revelations. He distinguished four kinds of revelations by the Spirit: (1) Visions, the lowest degree, mere heavenly shapes, images, and forms which are spiritually perceived by the inner sense of man, by the operation of the Holy Ghost; (2) Illuminations, by which the human spirit becomes aware, as it by a ray of divine light falling upon it, of the meaning of the Eternal Spirit; (3) Immediate translations of the spirit of the soul into the principium (God), when it beholds the secrets of the Trinity according to 2 Cor. xii. 2, 4; (4) The descent of the Holy Spirit into the soul, completing its regeneration, strengthening its illuminated condition, and opening to the soul the glory of the New Jerusalem. He endeavored to popularize and expound Boehme's teaching. He taught, among other things, that God created eternal nature out of the eternal nothing, or chaos, and put in it all the forces by which, later on, the worlds were made. Nature is composed of the four eternal elements, fire, water, air, and earth; and also the three eternal principia (phosphorus, salt, mercury) was the angelic world brought in an instant at the divine command. It has three divisions,—the external court, the inner court, and the Holy of holies. It is made up of a heaven and an earth; but, instead of sunlight, it has the ineffable light of the Trinity, and, instead of stars, many "powers," which have a certain independent existence. The angels consist of three eternal things,—spirit, soul, and love. It was the disturbance of the harmony between these three that caused the fall of a part of the angels. Their fall was the occasion for a new step in creation. They fell into a hell of their own making: for, having broken through the band of eternal nature, the element of fire asserted itself, and enclosed them. They have a "tincture" by which they destroy human souls. As the opposite to the fallen angels' world, God made a world of light and love, called in Scripture "paradise." By wisdom (sophia) the first Adamic man was made out of the substance of all things. He was bisexual; but out of him, by the "female tincture," Eve was formed.

For further information, see arts. Bromley, Leade, Philadelphia Society; Wood: A New History and Dictionary of Christendom; A History of the Reformed Church in Germany, etc.; d. philadelphiae Gemeinden in Hesse, Gütersloh, 1879. Pordage's writings embrace Theologia mystica, 1680; Mystic divinitas, 1683; Metaphysica vera et divina, 1698.

H. Hochhuth

P. PORTIOPPIDAN, Erik Ludvigsen, b. at Aarhus, Denmark, Aug. 24, 1698; d. in Copenhagen, Dec. 20, 1764. He studied theology in Copenhagen, visited Holland and England, and was appointed professor of sacred rhetoric in the Andover Theological Seminary, from April 1, 1812, until 1832. He was graduated at Dartmouth College, 1792; ordained, Sept. 1, 1796, chancellor of the university of Copenhagen, 1795. While tutor in the house of the Duke of Holstein-Ploen, he came in contact with the pietist movement of Halle; and he represents that movement in the history of the Danish Church. He wrote an explanation of Luther's Catechism, which was generally used as a text-book in Denmark and Norway till the second decade of the present century; Mendologia, a theological romance in 3 vols., 1742-43; Annales ecclesiae danicae, 4 vols. in quarto, 1741-53, etc. He also wrote, and not without success, on history, geography, natural science, and political economy.

P. PORPHYRY. See Neo-Platonism.

P. PORTER, Ebenezer, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Cornwall, Conn., Oct. 6, 1772; d. at Andover, April 8, 1834. He was graduated at Dartmouth College, 1792; ordained, Sept. 6, 1798, pastor in Washington, Conn.; and Bartlett professor of sacred rhetoric in the Andover Theological Seminary, from April 1, 1812, until 1832. During this period, so popular and honored was he, that he received calls to the presidency of the universities of Vermont (1816), and of Georgia (1817), to Hamilton (1817), Middlebury (1817), and Dartmouth (1821) colleges, besides to the professorship of divinity at Yale College (1817). All these calls he respectfully but firmly declined. In 1827 he accepted the newly formed office of president of the Andover Theological Seminary. For the last twenty years of his life he was more or less an invalid. He published Young Preacher's Manual; or, A Collection of Texts on Preaching, Selected and Revised, Boston, 1819, 2d ed., New York, 1829; Lecture on the Analysis of Vocal In feclions, Andover, 1824; An Analysis of the Principles of Rhetorical Delivery, 1827, 8th ed., by A. H. Weld, Boston, 1889; Rhetorical Reader, Andover, 1831, 300th ed., New York, 1858; Letters on Religious Revivals which prevailed about the Beginning of the Present Century, Andover, 1832, later editions, Boston (Cong. Pub.) and New York, 1850 (Methodist Book Concern); Lectures on Homiletics, Preaching, and on Public Prayer, Andover, 1834; Lectures on Eloquence and Style (posthumous), Andover, 1836. See SPRAGUE: Annals, H. 351.

P. PORTIUNCULA INDULGENCE, ever since 1847, has been obtained in the Portiuncula Church, near Assisi, and in every other church belonging to the Franciscan order; but originally it was granted only in the Portiuncula Church (Nostra Signora degli Angeli; see Francis of Assisi); for there, says the legend, Christ assured Francis that he would grant plenary indulgence to every one who should confess in this church, provided Francis obtained the consent of the Pope (Honorius III.). By advice of the cardinals, the Pope limited the time of obtaining this indulgence to one day,—from the evening of Aug. 1 to the evening of Aug. 2; but Innocent XII., in 1695, extended the indulgence to every day in the year; Gregory XV., to every convent of the Franciscan order; and the papal Congregation on Indulgences, in 1847, to every Franciscan Church.

P. PORT ROYAL, the most celebrated nunnery of France, and famous on account of the influence which in the seventeenth century it exercised on French society and on the Roman-Catholic Church in general, was founded in 1204 by Mathilde de Garlande, in commemoration of the happy return of her husband from the fourth crusade. It was situated in the swampy and unhealthy valley of the Yvette, in the department of Seine, between Versailles and Chevreuse, and belonged to the Cistercian order. The neighboring Bernardine monastery, Vaux de Cernay, exercised a kind of control over it, and provided it with confessors. The abbots of Citeaux held visitations in it from time to time, and the protocols of some of those visitations are still extant. It was exempted from the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Paris; and Honorius III. granted it several great privileges,—to have administered the Lord's Supper even in times when an interdict was laid upon the country; to give refuge to such laymen as wished to retire from the world, and do penance without taking the monastic vows, etc. With such advantages, the institution soon became prosperous. In 1233 it numbered sixty inmates. In course of time it acquired rich estates, and its abbesses belonged to the most distinguished families in France. Its great ecclesiastical influence, however; despite its connection with the family of Arnauld.

Jacqueline Marie Arnauld, generally known under the name of Mère Angélique (b. 1651; d. 1661), became abbess of Port Royal in 1602, eleven years old. For some time she led a quiet and dignified though not strictly religious life. But in 1608 she was converted, and the immediate result of her conversion was a severe contest with her nuns and with her family. The nunnery, however, was thoroughly reformed, and transplanted from the valley of the Yvette to the street of St. Jacques in Paris; and of her family a great number of its members—sisters and brothers, nephews and nieces—joined the institution. After the death of St. Francis of Sales, Zamet, Bishop of Langres, became the spiritual adviser of Mère Angélique; but the course which the institution took under his direction was not satisfactory. The discipline became still more austere, but at the same time the institution assumed an air of magnificence and lofty reserve which was ill suited to the spirit of its founder. In 1638, on account of his book on virginity, and its passionate de cu 1638, on account of his book on virginity, and its passionate de mand for penitence, with its solemn warning

PORT ROYAL.
1673 against the idea of an opus operatum, with its

PORTUGAL.

St. Jacques in Paris; and of her family a great number of its members—sisters and brothers, nephews and nieces—joined the institution. After the death of St. Francis of Sales, Zamet, Bishop of Langres, became the spiritual adviser of Mère Angélique; but the course which the institution took under his direction was not satisfactory. The discipline became still more austere, but at the same time the institution assumed an air of magnificence and lofty reserve which was ill suited to the spirit of its founder. In 1638, on account of his book on virginity, and its passionate de

mand for penitence, with its solemn warning

against the idea of an opus operatum, with its

PORTUGAL.

The Kingdom of, comprises an area of 34,502 square miles, with 4,550,998 in-

against the idea of an opus operatum, with its

(PORTUGAL.)

738, 2 vols.

The success of the institution, however, soon awakened jealousy: chicaneries and persecutions began. By an order of Richelieu, who could tolerate no its breach of tradition in public life, St. Cyran was thrust into a dungeon of Vincent de Paul, in 1638, on account of his book on virginity, and not released until 1643, two months after the death of the cardinal. In the latter year Antoine Arnauld, the great Arnauld, the theologian of Port Royal (b. 1612; d. 1694), published his De la fréquence communion. With its passionate de

mand for penitence, with its solemn warning

against the idea of an opus operatum, with its
habitants, according to the census of 1878. The state religion is Roman Catholic; and other denominations are not allowed to worship in public, though they are tolerated. Hierarchically the country is divided into four provinces,—the archbishopric of Braga, with six bishoprics; the patriarchoate of Lisbon, with nine bishoprics; the archbishopric of Evora, with three bishoprics; and the dioceses of the episcopal see of Lagos. The clergy is paid partly by the state, partly by the congregations, and partly from ecclesiastical funds. Each ecclesiastical province has its own priest seminary, besides the theological faculty of the state university in Lisbon. During the union with Spain, in the sixteenth century, the Jews were expelled; and only a few returned, when, in 1820, the country was again opened to them. The Jesuits were expelled in 1759, and the union with Spain, in the sixteenth century, where it soon after was discovered that he was a pupil and intimate friend of Augustine; he wrote Moscovia (Wilna, 1586) and De rationibus Spiritus sancti, La doctrine du sicle dore, De orbis terra concordia, etc.) are full of strange eccentricities. POSTIL (postilla), in medieval Latin, meant a continuous series of notes to the text of the Scriptures, and was thus called because following after the words of the text, postilla. It seems to have originated in the time of Charlemagne: at least, the Homiliatory of the four gospels of postilla. Afterwards the word came to mean a collection of sermons; as the postils of Luther, Corvinus, Brenz, and others. Medieval Latin had also a verb postillare: thus it is said of Nicholas of Lyra, on his tombstone, postillare Bibbia. HERZOG.

POTTER, Alonzo, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of the Protestant-Episcopal Church in the diocese of Pennsylvania; b. on the sixth day of July, 1800, in La Grange, Dutchess County, N.Y.; d. on board a ship, in the harbor of San Francisco, July 4, 1865. He was the sixth child of Joseph Potter, whose ancestors emigrated from England in 1640, and settled in Rhode Island. Though his parents were members of the Society of Friends, yet two of Joseph Potter's sons, Alonzo and Horatio, became, respectively, bishops of the two largest dioceses in the United States,—Pennsylvania and New York. When but fifteen years old Alonzo Potter entered the college at Schenectady, then under the presidency of the Rev. Eliphalet Nott; and all through his connection with Union College, till he graduated with the honors of his class, in 1818, he took the first rank in scholarship.

Immediately after his graduation he visited Philadelphia; and while in that city he was baptized in St. Peter's Church by Bishop White, and shortly after was confirmed in Christ Church by the same bishop. Here he began his studies for the sacred ministry, under the direction of Bishop White and the Rev. Samuel H. Turner, D.D.; but he was soon recalled to Union College as a tutor, and in about a year later he was chosen professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in the same college. Thus, like Edward Everett, he became a professor the same year that he came of age,—instances alike of rare abilities early matured, and successfully sustained through life.

On the 1st of May, 1822, he was ordained deacon by Bishop Hobart, and two years later was advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Brownell. That same year he married Sarah Maria, only daughter of President Nott, "a lady of superior one of the foremost minds. His long experience, and breadth of view, gave much strength to his counsels; and in the University of Pennsylvania, and all over the State, and, indeed, in the country at large, he was felt as an educational power. His active energies were ever on the outlook for wholesome and needful work; and hence he was constantly called upon by various bodies of his fellow-men, and by various charitable and religious organizations, to act with them on boards and committees and platforms; and everywhere he was welcomed as one wise in council, and earnest in action, and thorough in whatever he did. As a lecturer, Bishop Potter was unrivalled. This was shown by the wonderful ability which he displayed during the several years (1845-58) in which he was engaged in delivering his sixty "Lowell Lectures" in Boston. These lectures, compassing almost the whole circle of philosophy, were delivered without the written page, and with but occasional use of a few brief notes; yet, by common consent of the best thinkers, who heard them, they were regarded as masterly, both in the grasp and treatment of the various topics which he handled.
POTTER.

He was also very prominent in all philanthropic and missionary work, both at home and abroad. As a patriot, he stood unshakingly amidst the most trying ordeals,— a staunch Union man, laboring with voice and pen for his whole country; and, in all his utterances during the civil war, he seemed to rally; but, after the death of his second wife, he was again suddenly stricken down. The assistant bishop, on whom he leaned, was also suddenly taken away by death; and though another assistant bishop was elected in 1861 (the Rev. William Bacon Stevens, D.D.), yet it was evident that the good bishop's work was nearly done. In March, 1865, he sailed for California, via Brazil and the Straits of Magellan, having for fellow-passengers to Rio Janeiro Professor Agassiz and a party of scientists en route to Brazil. At Panama the bishop went on shore to consecrate a church at Aspinwall, on the east side of the Isthmus, and there contracted a fever, of which he died, on board the steamship "Colorado," in the harbor of San Francisco, on the morning of the 4th of July, 1865.

His character was noted for its massive quietness and its thorough solidity. His life was as clear and honest as the day. He set his eye upon his destined work, and did it with "an eye single to God's glory." His influence in the diocese was felt by all men. His influence in the house of bishops was gladly recognized by all his brethren; and in all the councils of the church, conventional, educational, or missionary, his voice and words were always sound and potential. He was a man of large domestic affections and sympathies; and his Christian character was that of a humble but strong believer in Jesus, ever seeking to know and do the Master's will.

But his bishopric was characterized by the breadth of the statesman, the heart of the philanthropist, and the faith of the Christian. His long experience, and breadth of view, gave much strength to his counsels; and in the University of Pennsylvania, and all over the State, and, indeed, in the country at large, he was felt as an educational power. His active energies were ever on the outlook for wholesome and needful work; and hence he was constantly called upon by various bodies of his fellow-men, and by various charitable and religious organizations, to act with them on boards and committees and platforms; and everywhere he was welcomed as one wise in council, and earnest in action, and thorough in whatever he did. As a lecturer, Bishop Potter was unrivalled. This was shown by the wonderful ability which he displayed during the several years (1845-58) in which he was engaged in delivering his sixty "Lowell Lectures" in Boston. These lectures, compassing almost the whole circle of philosophy, were delivered without the written page, and with but occasional use of a few brief notes; yet, by common consent of the best thinkers, who heard them, they were regarded as masterly, both in the grasp and treatment of the various topics which he handled.

He was also very prominent in all philanthropic and missionary work, both at home and abroad. As a patriot, he stood unshakingly amidst the most trying ordeals,— a staunch Union man, laboring with voice and pen for his whole country; and, in all his utterances during the civil war, he seemed to rally; but, after the death of his second wife, he was again suddenly stricken down. The assistant bishop, on whom he leaned, was also suddenly taken away by death; and though another assistant bishop was elected in 1861 (the Rev. William Bacon Stevens, D.D.), yet it was evident that the good bishop's work was nearly done. In March, 1865, he sailed for California, via Brazil and the Straits of Magellan, having for fellow-passengers to Rio Janeiro Professor Agassiz and a party of scientists en route to Brazil. At Panama the bishop went on shore to consecrate a church at Aspinwall, on the east side of the Isthmus, and there contracted a fever, of which he died, on board the steamship "Colorado," in the harbor of San Francisco, on the morning of the 4th of July, 1865.

His character was noted for its massive quietness and its thorough solidity. His life was as clear and honest as the day. He set his eye upon his destined work, and did it with "an eye single to God's glory." His influence in the diocese was felt by all men. His influence in the house of bishops was gladly recognized by all his brethren; and in all the councils of the church, conventional, educational, or missionary, his voice and words were always sound and potential. He was a man of large domestic affections and sympathies; and his Christian character was that of a humble but strong believer in Jesus, ever seeking to know and do the Master's will.

POTTER.

1875
POWELL.

1876

POTTS, George, D.D., Presbyterian; b. in Philadelphia, Penn., March 16, 1822; d. in New York City, Sept. 15, 1864. He was graduated from the University of Pennsylvania, 1819, and from Princeton Theological Seminary, 1823. He was pastor in Natchez, Miss., 1823-35, and in New-York City from 1836 till his death (Duanestreet Church, 1836-44; University-place Church, 1845-61). He was an eminent preacher, a leader in religion and philanthropy, a beloved pastor and friend. He had a memorable controversy with Bishop Dwight, on the claims of Episcopal Church (No Church without a Bishop, New York, 1844, pamphlet), and published single sermons and addresses. See ALLIBONE: Dictionary of British and American Authors, s.v.

POULAIN, Nicolas, b. at Mesnils, in the department of Seine-Inférieure, Jan. 18, 1807; d. at Geneva, April 3, 1868. He was successively pastor of Nanteuil-lès-Meaux (1832-33), Havre (1833-36), Lausanne (1837-39), and Lyons (1839-66). He is the author of Qu'est ce qu'un christianisme sans dogmes et sans miracles? (1863) and L'œuvre des missions ecclésiastiques au point de vue de l'unité du christianisme (1867), both of considerable apologetic merit.

POUTS. 1876

His remains lie interred in Laurel Hill Cemetery, Philadelphia; but his monuments are the noble institutions which he founded, the far-reaching plans which he inaugurated, and that vivid memory of his parity and signal virtues which will ever linger in the diocese, and ever perpetuate his honored name as that of a godly, wise, and well-learned bishop. His Life was written by Rev. Dr. M. A. Dew. Howe, Philadelphia, 1871.

POUTS, George, D.D., Presbyterian; b. in Philadelphia, Penn., March 16, 1822; d. in New York City, Sept. 15, 1864. He was graduated from the University of Pennsylvania, 1819, and from Princeton Theological Seminary, 1823. He was pastor in Natchez, Miss., 1823-35, and in New-York City from 1836 till his death (Duanestreet Church, 1836-44; University-place Church, 1845-61). He was an eminent preacher, a leader in religion and philanthropy, a beloved pastor and friend. He had a memorable controversy with Bishop Dwight, on the claims of Episcopal Church (No Church without a Bishop, New York, 1844, pamphlet), and published single sermons and addresses. See ALLIBONE: Dictionary of British and American Authors, s.v.

POULAIN, Nicolas, b. at Mesnils, in the department of Seine-Inférieure, Jan. 18, 1807; d. at Geneva, April 3, 1868. He was successively pastor of Nanteuil-lès-Meaux (1832-33), Havre (1833-36), Lausanne (1837-39), and Lyons (1839-66). He is the author of Qu'est ce qu'un christianisme sans dogmes et sans miracles? (1863) and L'œuvre des missions ecclésiastiques au point de vue de l'unité du christianisme (1867), both of considerable apologetic merit.

POURING. The pouring of water on the head is the usual act of baptism in the Church of Rome and the Protestant communions. Sometimes, especially in Protestant circles, a mere sprinkling is used, or a simple touching of the forehead with the moistened finger. What is the origin of the custom?

In the Apostolic Church the regular baptism was by immersion. The oldest undisputed mention of pouring is found in the Epistle of Cyprian to Magnus, about 250 A.D. Certain ones converted in sickness, when immersed in water, but the sick person, in his agony, had received merely a pouring (non loti, sed perfusi); and it was denied that they were Christians in good and regular standing (legitimi Christiani). Cyprian, after referring to certain Old-Testament sprinklings, gives his opinion, that, "in a case of strict necessity," pouring or sprinkling may be accepted as valid baptism. He speaks, however, very diffidently. His language is "So far as my poor ability comprehends the matter, I consider," etc.; and "I have answered so far as my poor and small ability is capable of doing." He declares that he does not wish to prescribe to other ecclesiastics what they shall do about recognizing the validity of pouring; and he suggests that those who are not satisfied with their affusion shall, on their recovery from sickness, be immersed. This epistle shows, that, in his day, pouring or sprinkling was uncommon, and was used only when immersion was impracticable.

For a long time pouring was considered as of but doubtful propriety. Those who received it were termed clinics, as having received only an irregular, or sick-bed baptism, and they were denied admission to the higher offices of the church. Yet there were exceptions. Novatian, who had received only clinical baptism, was ordained presbyter in Rome, and was even the candidate of a party to the papal chair. Immersion still remains the usage of the Greek Church; and, says Stanley, "the most illustrious and venerable portion of it, that of the Byzantine Empire, absolutely repudiates and ignores any other mode of administration as essentially invalid." It long remained the ordinary usage of the Church of Rome. Referring to baptism, Jerome, in the fourth century, says, merginum, and Ambrose, mersisit. In the fifth century Augustine says, demersurius, Leo the Great, demersio; and Maximus of Turin, mergitur. Gregory the Great, in the sixth century, says, mergat; Alcuin, in the eighth, submersio; Hincmar of Rheims, in the ninth, mergitur, and Lanfranc of Canterbury, in the eleventh, immersion. In the twelfth century Abelard says, mergere; Anselm, mergat, and Suger, mergatur. In the thirteenth century, declares immersion still to be the older and better usage, but allows pouring and sprinkling as valid.

But, when pouring had for many centuries been permitted in cases of necessity, its superior convenience furnished a temptation to a free construction of the term "necessity," and to the substitution of affusion for immersion in cases where the strict necessity did not exist. The existence of this inclination is revealed by laws which condemned it. For example, the Council of Chelsea, in 816, decrees as follows: "And let the presbyters know, that, when they administer holy baptism, they may not pour water on the heads of the infants, but the infants must always be immersed." But, by the beginning of the fourteenth century (the time varying in different countries), the practice of immersion had, throughout most of Western Europe, fallen into disuse, and affusion had come to be employed, not only in cases of necessity, but as the ordinary usage.

Against the idea that the disuse of immersion resulted from the extension of the gospel into colder regions, it may be remarked that it was in the countries farther north that immersion was longest practised. It remained the prevailing usage in England down to the reign of Elizabeth. And it may be noticed, that the baptismal rubric of the Church of England still directs that the priest, taking the child, "shall dip it in the water," adding, however, "If they shall certify that the child is weak, it shall suffice to pour water upon it." In other words, pouring has no sanction in the case of a healthy child. And in the Prayer-Book of the Protestant-Episcopal Church of the United States, the direction, "Shall dip him in the water, or pour water upon him," which permits pouring, but by prior mention gives the preference to immersion, is a trace of the ancient Anglican usage.}

NORMAN FOX.

POWELL, Iden, mathematician, b. in London, 1796; d. there June 11, 1860. He was educated at Oxford; entered holy orders, but had no charge; was Savilian professor of geometry in his alma mater, 1827-54, when he removed to London. His writings are either upon strictly scientific topics, or upon the connection between...
PRACTICAL THEOLOGY. 1877

PRAYER.

science and theology. Among the latter may be mentioned Connection of Natural and Divine Truth, London, 1838; Tradition Unveiled, 1839 (Supplement, 1840); The Unity of Worlds and of Nature. The facts, upon which the United States of the Universe, the Unity of Worlds, and the Philosophy of Creation, 1855, 2d ed., 1856; Christianity without Judaism, 1857; The Order of Nature considered in reference to the Claims of Revelation, 1859 (the three vols. form a series). But his views obtained widest currency in the famous Essays and Reviews (London, 1850), to which he contributed an essay On the Evidence of Church History. His position was in the main rationalistic. He rejected miracles on the ground that they were out of harmony with the methods of God's government; and, moreover, an examination of evidence for those said to have happened shows that they are insufficiently attested.

PRADES, Jean Martin de, Abbé; b. at Castelsarracin about 1720; d. at Glogau, 1782. He studied law, but went to Poland and was afterwards made archdeacon of Glogau. He published an Abrégé de l'histoire ecclésiastique de Fleury, Berlin, 1767, 2 vols., to which Friedrich II. wrote the preface.

PRADES, Dominique Dufour de, Abbé; b. at Allanches in Auvergne, April 29, 1759; d. in Paris, March 18, 1837. Elected a deputy to the States-General in 1789, he sided with the king, and emigrated in 1791, but returned in 1801, and was successively appointed almoner to the emperor, bishop of Poitiers, and archbishop of Malines. Sent as ambassador to Warsaw in 1812, he failed in his mission; was recalled; joined the Bourbonson the fall of Napoleon, but was afterwards banished from the court on suspicion of having secretly corresponded with the Duke de Broglie. He recanted, and was made archdeacon of Glogau. He published an Abrégé de l'histoire ecclésiastique de Fleury, Berlin, 1767, 2 vols., to which Friedrich II. wrote the preface.

PRAEDT, Dominique Dufour de, Abbé; b. at Allanches in Auvergne, April 29, 1759; d. in Paris, March 18, 1837. Elected a deputy to the States-General in 1789, he sided with the king, and emigrated in 1791, but returned in 1801, and was successively appointed almoner to the emperor, bishop of Poitiers, and archbishop of Malines. Sent as ambassador to Warsaw in 1812, he failed in his mission; was recalled; joined the Bourbonson the fall of Napoleon, but was coldly received, and was even bereft of his archbishops. Under Louis XVIII. he joined the opposition; but, after the revolution of July, he again became a stanch royalist. Besides a number of brilliant but rathersuperficial polemical treatises, he wrote Histoire de l'ambassade dans le grand-duché de Varsovie, Paris, 1815; Quatre Concordats, Paris, 1818, etc.

PREMUNIRE (literally, to defend in front of, the opening word of the writ), a term of English canon and common law, for a certain offence, the writ granted upon it, and its punishment. It was originally used by Edward III. to check the arrogant encroachments of the papal power. He forbade (27 st. 1, c. 1), upon certain penalties, any of his subjects, i.e., particularly the clergy, to go to Rome there to answer to things properly belonging to the king's court; and also the gift by the Pope of English ecclesiastical prelatures of all grades. By these statutes Edward endeavored to remove a crying evil, but in vain. Richard II. issued similar statutes, particularly one called henceforth the "Statute of Premunire," assigning the following as the punishment for the offence: that they [the offenders] should be out of the king's protection, attached by their bodies, i.e., imprisoned during life, and lose their lands, goods, and chattels. Henry IV. and later sovereigns have given the same name and penalty (known as a Premunire) to different offences, which have only this in common, that they involve more or less insubordination to royal authority, e.g., denial a second time of the king's supremacy, assertion of the Pope's authority, refusal to take the oath of allegiance, questioning the right of the present royal family to the throne, affirming the king to be a heretic, refusal by a chapter of the bishop nominated by the sovereign.

PRAEROTTIUS isthe name of two Lutheran theologians from the sixteenth century in Germany.—Abdias Pretorius, b. in Mark Brandenburg, 1524; d. at Wittenberg, 1573; was first rector in Magdeburg, then professor of theology in Francfort-on-the-Oder, and finally professor of philosophy in Wittenberg. He is noted from his controversy with Musculus concerning the necessity of harmony with the methodsof God's government; and, moreover, an examination of evidence for these said to have happened shows that they are insufficiently attested.

PRAYERS. Speaking generically, prayer may be described as the expression of our requests to God; and, in the New-Testament usage of the word, no better definition of it can be given than that of the Westminster Shorter Catechism: "Prayer is the offering up of our desires unto God, in the name of Christ, for things agreeable to his will, with confessed and solemn acknowledgment of his mercies." Jesus commanded his disciples to pray, and taught them how to pray, by giving them that model which is called the Lord's Prayer. In the same way, the saints, under the Old-Testament dispensation, cried unto the Lord, who "heard them and delivered them out of their distresses;" and the examples of Abraham's servant, of Jacob, of Moses, of David, of Solomon, of Elijah, of Hezekiah, of Isaiah, and all the prophets, may be cited as confirming and authenticating the duty.

But, while all this is true, objections more or less serious have been made to the assertion that "men ought always to pray, and not to faint." These may be reduced to two classes,—the theological and the philosophical. The theological is to the effect, that, as God is unchangeable in his purposes, it must be idle to suppose that any appeal of men can avail to alter his determination. To meet that, some have alleged that the only effect of prayer is to be looked for in the heart of the suppliant. It avails, they assert, not to secure objective benefits, but simply to bring the spirit of the petitioner into harmony with God. Now, it cannot be denied that true prayer has such an effect upon the soul; but then, it has so only in the souls of those who believe that God, or, as they will have it, that the will which is best for them. Men will not continue to ask blessings if they suppose that the only good they are to derive is that they shall be brought to resignation and to peace; and so the experience of the subjective benefits of prayer depends on the belief in its objective power. The true answer, therefore, to the objection which we are now considering, must be sought elsewhere; and it is to be found in the fact, that the prayer of the suppliant enters into the purpose of God in connection with the bestowment of his blessings. It is his will to give benefits to his people as answers to their prayers; and along with every promise there is the implied condition, “I will yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel to do it for them.” The philosophical objection is, in a word, prayer. What, in such a connection, is meant by “laws of nature”? The Duke of Argyile, in his admirable volume on The Reign of Law, has enumerated five distinct senses in which the term “law” is used by good and reputable writers; but for our present purpose it will be enough to speak only of one. In its physical sense, a law is the formulated expression of an observed invariable sequence of certain consequences from certain antecedents. In this sense, a law is a human inference from the observation of the operations of nature, and, as Sir John Herschel has said, “has relation to us as understanding, rather than to the universe as obeying, certain rules.” They are not enactments which nature is bound to obey, but rather the generalized formulæ of the observations which men have made of what they call the operations of nature; or, as believing in a personal God, we prefer to put it, they are the classifications of men’s observations of God’s methods of operation in the universe. They are thus limited to the sphere that is within the range of human investigation, and they tell us absolutely nothing of God’s method of working in that region that is beyond the observation of man. Now, it is quite conceivably, that, in that upper region, God may so work upon the lower, as through the ordinary operations of nature, and without any miracle, to answer prayer. This is substantially the answer given by Chalmers to the objection now before us. McCosh, however, prefers to say that God has so adjusted the laws of nature, that he can, through them, and not in contravention of them, answer prayer. Within a limited sphere, one man may grant the request of another in this way, through the operation of natural laws; and what is possible to the creature within a certain area is surely possible to the Creator throughout his own universe. How this is done we may be unable to determine; yet every devout mind must acknowledge the truth of Isaac Taylor’s words, “This is indeed the great miracle of Providence, that no miracles are needed to accomplish its ends.” (See the opening paragraph of the second chapter of the second book of The Method of the Divine Government, Physical and Moral, by James McCosh, D.D., L.L.D.) We must distinguish between law and force. Force is the energy which produces the effects, but law is the observed manner in which force works in the production of these effects. If, therefore, in the last resort, that force be the volition or power of a personal, omnipotent Being, whom we call God, where is the impossibility, or even difficulty, involved in the supposition that he may exert that force through his own appointed modes of operation for the hearing of prayer? When God created the world, he certainly did not shut himself out of it; and he who gave the universe its laws, or rather, whose modes of operation these laws are, can surely see an easy way to answer the prayers of his children through them. Thus the whole question about the possibility of the answering of prayer resolves itself into one as to the existence of a personal God. If there be no God, or if, as seems to be the case with many in these days, God be nothing else than “a fine name for the universe,” then there is an end of the matter. But if there be one omnipotent and gracious Being, who is God over all, and to whom men can come as to a father, then prayer to him is as appropriate as are children’s requests to their father; and he is as able to answer petitions as the human parent is to give good gifts to the prattler that sits upon his knee. Moreover, as is evident from many instances of answers to prayer which are recorded in the Scripture, God has fulfilled the desires of his people, without having men come as to a father, then prayer to him is as appropriate as are children’s requests to their father; and he is as able to answer petitions as the human parent is to give good gifts to the prattler that sits upon his knee. Moreover, as is evident from many instances of answers to prayer which are recorded in the Scripture, God has fulfilled the desires of his people, without having men come as to a father, then prayer to him is as appropriate as are children’s requests to their father; and he is as able to answer petitions as the human parent is to give good gifts to the prattler that sits upon his knee. Moreover, as is evident from many instances of answers to prayer which are recorded in the Scripture, God has fulfilled the desires of his people, without having men come as to a father, then prayer to him is as appropriate as are children’s requests to their father; and he is as able to answer petitions as the human parent is to give good gifts to the prattler that sits upon his knee.
that, the more water is drawn off, the faster the engine goes. But when a fire occurs, some one in the city touches a spring, which rings a bell in the engine-room; on hearing which, the engineer, by the turning of a lever, causes the engine to move with such rapidity as to charge the mains to their greatest capacity, so that when the hose is attached to the plugs, water is sent to the top of the loftiest building in the place. Thus an extraordinary demand is met, not by the usual operations of a single instance, who shall say that the wise man has not adjusted the usual operations of his universe so as to admit of his meeting unusual emergencies through them?

But it is needful now to look at some of the statements of the word of God upon the subject of prayer in general. The "charter" of a Christian's liberty regarding it may be found in the words of Christ himself, "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you: for every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened." (Matt. vii, 7, 8.) But here, again, difficulty emerges; for by this same charter, there are some who insist that it is not the thing which he requested. While, in truth, for that must be agreeable to the will of God; and, third, with the purpose and prerogative of God himself, for the end of his existence is not simply to answer prayer; but he uses his prerogative in the answering of prayer, for moral purposes, making his treatment of their petitions a part of the education to which he subjects his people, and by which he trains them into holiness of character. It would be easy to dwell on each of these three conditions, and to show their great importance; but we are here with pointing out merely that they are conditions which everywhere and in all circumstances qualify the promise of universal answer to prayer. Now, when these things are remembered, it will be seen how utterly impossible it is for men to gauge the value of prayer by any merely human test. The demand made for that a few years ago, only revealed the shallow views entertained upon this subject by those who made it; though perhaps it was provoked by the extravagant and unscriptural things said by many who thought that they were exalting prayer. For how shall any test that men can apply determine when a true prayer is offered? How, again, shall any such gauge reveal whether the request is one of which God approves? And when there are one or delicate indications which shall indicate or measure the results on the character of the suppliant, which are produced, sometimes by the denial, and sometimes by the granting, of his requests?

We have left ourselves little space for the consideration of the constituent parts of prayer and the controversies of the present time have left them, for the most part, severely alone. They are, ADORATION, or the ascription of praise to God, of which the best Liturgy of direction is to be found in the Book of Psalms; THANKSGIVING for mercies received, an act which recognizes the goodness of God in our daily lives, alike in the unmerited as well as the merited; CONFESSION OF SINS, or the acknowledgment of our guilt as before God, but in order, that, by bringing it out before him, we ourselves may see how great it is, and may hate sin with a perfect hatred; PETITION, wherein we make known our requests unto God, for spiritual and temporal things for ourselves and for others. In reference to all these, the grand indispensable things are, that the suppliant be sincere, not using words to which he attaches no meaning, or confessing sins of which he does not feel the guilt, or asking things which he really does not wish to receive; and that he approach God through Jesus Christ, the great and only Mediator. He who so pours out his heart before the Lord—observe, it is the heart that he is to bring, not the lip, and the heart is to be poured out, so that nothing of burden or of gratitude is left unspoken—will surely be blessed; for the whole matter of duty and promise is comprised in the words of Paul, "Be anxious for nothing; but in every thing, by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus."
of Prayer, Amer. ed., New York; A. F. T. Trulock: Stunden christlicher Andacht, Gotha, 1840;
Eng. trad.: Hours of Christian Devotion, Boston,
1871; J. C. Ryle: Call to Prayer, New York, 1855; E. Bickersteth: Treatise on Prayer, Amer.
ed., N.Y., 1856; A. Phelps: The Still Hour, Bost., 1859, new ed., 1876; H. P. Liddon: Some Elements to a Life of Prayer, Boston, 1875; Prayer-gauge Debate, by Tyndall, E. Galton, and others, again, among others, E. C. Head, J. H. McCondee, E. S. Hart, and others. Drama and 1870; Samuel Cox: Expository Essays and Discourses, Lond., 1877; and the Records of the Fulton-street Prayer-Meeting, N.Y., by Rev. Dr.
Chambers (Hours of Prayer in the Noon Prayer-Meeting) and Prime (Power of Prayer, 1859, enlarged ed., 1873; Prayer and Its Answer, 1882; Fifteen Years of Prayer). WILLIAM M. TAYLOR.
PRAYER, Book of Common, Although the service-books of the English Church before the Reformation were mostly in Latin, English Pry默ers, originating, probably, in still simpler manuals of great antiquity, were in use at the beginning of the fifteenth century. The Portiforium secun-derum usum Sarum, i.e., the Breviary, is clearly the basis of the Book of Common Prayer, and was called "Portfory," "Porteau," "Portuary," "Por-tius," "Portuales," and "Portheo." This Prymer er of Salisbury Use (about A.D. 1400) contains in English, (1) Matins and Hours of our Lady;
(2) Evensong and Compline; (3) The vii. penitenial psalms; (4) The xv. psalms; (5) The Litany; (6) Placebo; (7) Dirge; (8) The psalms of commendation; (9) Pater noster; (10) Ave
Maria; (11) Creed; (12) The ten commandments;
(13) The seven deadly sins. Marshall's Prymer ante 1530 and 1535), suppressed on account of its aggressive sentiments, and Hisley's Prymer (1539), more conservative, and set forth at the commandment of Cromwell, led the way, with others, for The Prymer set forth by the King's Majesty (1545), which omits Nos. 4, 6, 10, and 13 of the aforesaid contents, and adds to the rest the Collects, Epistles, and Gospels, in the Prayer-Book of 1549, were almost identical with those in the Salisbury Hours, but much of the new matter introduced was taken from Hermann's Consultation. The regulations with regard to dress were, that priests should wear the surplice in parish churches, adding the robe during the sermon; and in cathedrals, that the bishop, at the communion, should wear a surplus or albe, with a cope or vestment, besides his robe, and carry a pastoral staff himself, or have an officiating priest wear a white albe, plain, with a vestment or cope, the assisting ministers to appear in albes and tunicles. The ordinal, entitled The Forme and Manner of Making and Consecrating of Archbishopps, Bishoppes, Priestes, and Deacons (4to, 1549), was published separately, and differed from the present office on these chief points: it began with an introit, required deacons to wear albes, and the celebrant should use the words:  "May albe and chalice, as well as the Bible, to be placed in the priests' hands, and the pastoral staff were given to the bishop before the words, "Be to the flock of Christ a shepherd." The archbishop laid the Bible on the bishop's neck.
The office of 1549, slightly changed, was adopted in The Second Liturgy of Edward VI, 1552. The revised book of 1552 brought the following most important changes: it introduced, (1) the sentences, exhortation, confession, and absolution, at the opening of the service; (2) the Declaration in the Holy Communion Office; (3) the last five prayers in the Visitation of the Sick.

It omitted, (1) In the Communion-Service, the Introit, the name of the Virgin, the Thanksgiving for the Saints, the Sign of the Cross in Consecration, the Invocation of the Word and the Holy Spirit, the Admixture of water with wine, and the first clause of the present form at the delivery of the elements; (2) In Baptism, the form of exorcism, the anointing, the use of chrism, and the trine immersion; (3) In Confirmation, the sign of the cross; (4) In Matrimony, the sign of the cross and the giving of money; (5) In the Visitation of the Sick, the allusion to Tobias and Sarah, the anointing, and the directions about Private Confession; (6) In the Burial-Service, the prayers for confirmation and the Churching of Women. The rubric concerning vestments forbade the use of albe, vestment, and cope, and required the bishop to wear only a rochet; the priest or deacon, only a surplice.

The most important change was doctrinal, and referred to the presence of Christ in the consecrated elements as not differing from his presence to the prayers of believers. As the influence of Luther's Service of 1533 colored the first Liturgy of 1549, so that of Bucer, Peter Martyr, Polanus, and John à Lasco, may be traced in the second Liturgy of 1552.

The Liturgy of Elizabeth (1560) agreed substantially with the book of Edward VI., 1552, except "with one alteration, or addition of certain Lessons to be used on every Sunday in the year, and the form of the Litany altered and corrected, and two sentences only added in the delivery of the Sacrament to the communicants, and none other or otherwise: " and "that such ornaments of the church and of the ministers thereof shall be retained and be in use as was in this Church of England, by authority of Parliament, in the second year of King Edward VI., until other order shall be therein taken, etc." (1 Eliz. c. 2, April 28, 1559). The prayers for the queen, and for the clergy and people, and the collect, "O God, whose nature," etc., were introduced, but placed at the end of the Litany; and one of two collects for the time of death was omitted. A series of editions of the Puritan Book of Common Prayer was published from 1578 to 1640. That of 1578 is remarkable for omissions, not only of rubrics, but of entire services,—e.g., those for the Private Celebration of Sacraments, of Confirmation, and the Churching of Women, and for the uniform use of Morning, Evening, and Minister, in place of Mattens, Evensong, and Priest. In that of 1589, most of the omissions and alterations were restored. A Full and Plain Declaration of Ecclesiastical Discipline (1574), A Brief and Plain Declaration, etc. (1584), A Booke of Common Prayer (presented to Parliament, 1584), and A Booke of the Forme of Common Prayers, etc. (1584, 1583), were Puritan substitutes for the Liturgy; but the last did not obtain the sanction of the law. Knox's Book of Common Prayer (1564) has been reprinted by Dr. Cumming, London, 1840.

Certain alterations in the Liturgy, made during the reign of James I. (1604), are of doubtful legality. Among the most important were the insertion of the term "lawful minister" in the rubrics of the office of Private Baptism, restricting the administration to the ministry of the parish, or some other lawful minister; the addition to the Catechism of the Explanation of the Sacraments (attributed to Dr. John Overall), and, to the Occasional Prayers, certain Forms of Thanksgiving answering to the Prayers for Rain, etc. The charge brought against Archbishop Laud, of having corrupted the text of the Liturgy, is utterly unfounded (Lathbury: History of the Book of Common Prayer, pp. 225-227). In 1645 (Jan. 3) Parliament took away the Book of Common Prayer, and established The Directory, which rejected the Apocrypha, discontinued private baptism, sponsors, the sign of the cross, the wedding-ring, and private communion, removed the communion-table into the body of the church, abolished saints' days and vestments, the burial-service, and their disposition, dioceses, the Creed, though the Decalogue and the Apostles' Creed were subsequently supplied. (It is reprinted in Reliq. Liturg., iii., and in Clay, Book of Common Prayer illustrated, App. ix.-xi.)

The Last Revision of the Liturgy was made in 1662. Among the important changes were, (1) The extracts from the Bible,—except the Psalter (which is Coverdale's text of 1539), the Decalogue, and the Sentences in the communion-service,—give the text of the Authorized Version; (2) The separate printing of the Order for Morning and Evening Service, with the introduction of the last five prayers from the Litany, and of the Occasional Prayers, augmented by a second prayer for fair weather, the two prayers for the Ember weeks, the prayers for Parliament and All Conditions of Men, as well as by the General Thanksgiving, and a Thanksgiving for restoring public peace at home; (3) Some new collects, epistles, and gospels were supplied, and verbal changes made; such as "church" for "congregation," and "bishops, priests, and deacons," for "bishops, pastors, and ministers;" (4) The exhortations in the communion-service were altered; the rubrics relating to the offertory, the placing of the bread and wine on the table, and their disposition, directing the form of consecrating additional bread and wine, and the covering of the elements, were added; the last clause respecting departed saints was added to the Prayer for the Church Militant; and in the Order in Council (1582), at the end of the office, the phrase "corporal presence" was substituted for "real and essential presence;" (5) Among the more important additions in the text of the book are the two Offices for the Last Days of Riper Years, the Form of Prayer to be used at Sea, new psalms in the Churching Service, and the last five prayers in the Visitation of the Sick.

There have been four Acts of Uniformity, —1548, 2 and 3 Edw. VI., c. i.; 1552, 5 and 7 do., repealed in 1559; 1558, 1 Eliz. c. ii., not repealed; and 1662, 14 Carol. ii. The last two are often printed in the beginning of the Prayer-Book. The four services, until 1659 annexed to the Book of Common Prayer, known as the State Services, by the authority of an order from the sovereign in council, repeated at the beginning of every reign, with the exception of the last about to be named, have been removed by the authority of a royal warrant, dated Jan. 17, 1859. They consist of forms of prayer for, (1) The 5th of November, the Gunpowder Treason; (2) The 30th of January, the Martyrdom of Charles 1.; (3) The 29th of May, the Restoration; and (4) The Sovereign's Accession. The Articles of Religion were first published in English and Latin, A.D. 1562, when they numbered forty-two, as attributed to Cranmer, aided by Ridley and others. A new body of Articles, presented in 1562 by Archbishop Parker to convocation, numbered thirty-eight, and were printed the next year in English and Latin. They were again revised in 1571, when Art. 29 was re-introduced, so that they numbered thirty-nine. The Rationilm, still subjoined to them, was added in 1572; and the thirty-sixth canon of 1564 required all the clergy and graduates of the Universities to subscribe to them. The Prayer-Book of 1549 was used first in Ireland on Easter-Day, 1551; and the Irish Act of Uniformity (2 Eliz., c. ii.) authorized a Latin version. The book of 1552 not having been ordered for observance, the Irish Parliament, in January, 1560, passed an Act of Uniformity, authorizing the Prayer-Book set forth in England, and the Latin version (made by Haddon) for the benefit of ministers unable to use English, and because there was no Irish printing-press, and few could read Irish (Stephens: Manuscript Book of Common Prayer for Ireland, Int. p. viii.). The use of the Book of 1562, approved by the Irish Convocation (August-November, 1562), was enjoined by the Irish Parliament in 1566. An Irish version of the Prayer-Book was printed in 1567. In Scotland the Prayer-Book had been in general use in the time of Elizabeth (between 1557 and 1564); but the Scotch bishops being averse to the adoption of the English Book, urged by James I., in the next reign framed a book of their own on the English model, with certain variations, which, though sanctioned by royal authority, and printed, never came into general use. The English Book, except the liturgical Office (framed upon the Book of 1549), is now used by three-fourths of the ministers of the Episcopal Church in Scotland; but even the use of the Communion Office are far from uniform.

The American Prayer-Book is framed closely upon the model of the English book, and was the work of three successive General Conventions (1785, 1786, 1789). It was adopted substantially in its present form by the General Convention of 1789, with many variations from the English book, of which the following are the most important: it entirely omits the Athanasian Creed, the Absolution in the Visitation Office, the Magnificat and the Song of Simeon, the Communion, the Lord's Prayer, and the Versicles after the Creed; it leaves optional the use of the cross in baptism, of the words "He descended into hell", in the Gloria Patri between the Psalms, and altogether considerably enlarges the discretionary power of the minister. Selected portions of the Psalms may be used in place of those in the Daily Order; and of late years, since the Revision of the Lectionary, both in the Church of England and the Protestant-Episcopal Church in the United States, similar discretion has been allowed by the setting forth of alternative lessons. It adds to the number of the Occasional Prayers also a form of prayers for the Visitation of Prisoners, a form of prayer, etc., for the Fruits of the Earth, a form of Family Prayers. A form for Consecrating Churches (resembling that published by Bishop Andrews) was provided in 1765, and an Office of Institution in 1804. The change of "Absolution" into "Declaration of Absolution", of "verily and indeed" into "truly and verily", and the permission of using an alternative formula instead of "Receive the Holy Ghost," etc. (Ordinal), are as significant as the introduction of the prayers of invocation and oblation in the Communion Office. The changes rendered necessary by political and local causes need not be mentioned: in the Thirty-nine Articles, the eighth does not mention the Athanasian Creed, the twenty-first is omitted, and the thirty-fifth printed with a proviso.

Standard Editions of the Book of Common Prayer: (1) In the Church of England, the Sealed Book of 1662; (2) In the Irish Church, the Manuscript Book attached to the Irish Act of Uniformity, 1868; (3) In the Protestant-Episcopal Church in the United States, the octavo edition set forth by the General Convention of 1844, published New York, 1845.

Prayer for the Dead was offered among the later Jews (2 Macc. xii. 43-45), and from them passed into the Christian Church; but at first it was a part of the Roman Catholic Church, the ritualists, continue the practice. In a certain form, that of repetition of the names of deceased believers from God in prayer, the practice—though of doubtful utility, and leaning toward superstition—is not in itself sinful; but as it exists in the Church of Rome it is coupled with the doctrine of purgatory, and in any case savors of the doctrine of probation after death. Such prayers are first among Christian writers referred to by Tertullian (c. 200) as a long-established custom (De exhortacione Castitatis, c. 11; De monog., c. 10; cf. De corona, c. 3, De anima, c. 58). St. Augustine (d. 430) often alludes (e.g., De Cura pro Mort., i. 17) to the universal usage of the church to pray for all regenerated in Christ (i.e., the baptized), though whether, or in what degree, prayer would be profitable and availing, depended upon the present life. And St. Chrysostom (d. 407) says (serm. in Philipp. hom. 3) "It was not in vain enjoined as a law by the apostles that a memorial of the dead should be made in the solemn mysteries, as knowing that great gain resulted to them, and great assistance" (Blunt). But, with these writers, prayer for the dead was the natural result of the idea of the unbroken connection between all the members of Christ's body, living and dead, and probably, also, of the idea of the body of Christ as the church. Prayer for the dead would have been unnecessary if the result, but the cause, of the doctrine of purgatory. (See Purgatory.) Such prayers are found in their least objectionable form in the ancient liturgies: e.g., Divine Liturgy (1) of James (Clark's translation, pp. 23, 26, 34, 38), (2) of Mark (p. 60), and (3) of the Holy Apostles (pp. 82, 83). In the mass, prayer for the dead is an integral part. (See Mass.) In the Edward VI. Prayer-Book (1549)-burial-service, there were several such prayers; e.g., "We commend into thy hands of mercy, most merciful Father, the soul of this our brother departed . . . that when the judgment shall come, which thou hast composed, and the memoirs of the apostles, or the writings of the prophets, are read, as long as we live to hear Bible exposition, and at the same time exhortations based directly upon Scripture. After Origen, comes that grand succession of preachers whose learning has commanded the respect even of their severest critics, and whose eloquence has stirred the feelings even of the dullest. In the instance already quoted from Justin Martyr, "the president" delivered the discourse; and so it remained, for a long time, in the church the especial duty of the bishop to preach. There is no instance of a bishop being deposed because he could not preach, but there are several instances of preachers being elected bishops because they could. A non-preaching bishop was something disreputable. Yet even in the so-called Apostolical Constitutions (I.c.) mention is made of presbyterial preaching: indeed, many instances are recorded of deacons, such as Athanasius of Alexandria (d. 373) and Ephrem Syrus (d. 378), preaching original discourses. But the theory was, that the bishop was the preacher: if a presbyter or deacon preached, it was at the bishop's substitute. As the church grew, the demand for preaching grew far more than any one man in the local church or neighborhood could meet; and therefore preachers and deacons were more and more pressed into service, and preached regularly in places where the bishop came only occasionally. Still, the theory was kept up; and the bishop was answerable for what the presbyter or deacon said, as is clearly proved by the case of Nestorius (see art.). Did laymen ever preach in the early church? As a general rule, no. But yet there were a few exceptions. Thus Origen preached before his ordination; and, more striking still, Constantine preached frequently to large assemblies; and one of his sermons has come down to us (Euseb.: De vita Con., IV. c. 28-34; Opp., ed. Zimmerm. "Constant. Imp. Oratio," pp. 1047-1117). Monks were not allowed to preach, because they were not clerics, until the middle age, when regular preaching monastic orders were organized. (See DOMINIC; FRANCIS.) Preaching by women was strongly forbidden in the Catholic Church, according to Paul's explicit direction.
(1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35; 1 Tim. ii. 11, 12), but was a feature with the heretics, and even with the Montanists, much to Tertullian's dislike (De prescript., c. 41; De bap., c. 17; De eand. virgin. c. 9).

The great day for preaching was naturally Sunday; but upon many other days, as upon holy days, every day during Lent, upon every Saturday, and at Christmas and other feasts, it was the practice in the church to have sermons, and that not only in the morning. As was to be expected, the sermons were generally simple and brief, especially in the West. Those of Augustine and Chrysostom were probably as exceptional in length as they were in matter. It is probable, although there is no direct statement of it, that the clepsydra (water-clock) was used; for the usual length of the Latin homilies which have been preserved is a quarter-hour, which would indicate some way of measuring time.

Sermons were almost invariably given in churches, and as part of a service. The preacher sat upon the throne (cathedra) or sometimes, if presbyter, stood before the altar, if deacon or monk, by the reading-desk. In the fourth century the sermon was therefore oratorial, and then the usual place for the preacher was by the desk. The congregation stood around him, and expressed their pleasure by stamping of feet, and clapping of hands,—a practice Chrysostom vigorously deprecated in a sermon which was loudly applauded. He also complains of the talking going on during preaching.

The sermons of such preachers as Ambrose, Augustine, and Chrysostom, were delivered to large audiences, and regularly taken down by short-hand reporters. But other preachers were by no means so popular: indeed, the same complaints of long sermons, poor sermons, or no sermons, and the same exhortations to be more regular in attendance, which are now made, can be read in the Fathers.

In regard to the delivery of sermons, there was then as much variety as at present. Some sermons were read (but these were especially those of admired preachers, and they were read by deacons, instead of original discourses); some were recited memoriter; others were extempore, although usually after careful preparation. This last was probably the commonest mode. Immediately before the sermon a short free prayer was offered; then came the salutation, "Peace be unto you," and the response by the people, "And to thy spirit;" the text was given out, the sermon delivered, followed by the doxology.

It is a remarkable fact, that preaching was little, if at all, cultivated in the church at Rome (Sozomen: Hist., vii. 19; Cassiodorus: Hist. tripartita). There exist no sermons of any Roman bishop prior to Leo the Great (d. 461). The example of the church was, therefore, not favorable to the practice. After the ninth century, preaching generally declined. During the middle age, in place of the sermon in the service, came, usually, a short address at the conclusion of mass. The schoolmen were not preachers for the people. Their subtleties were endless. Their debates were not upon trifles. But they were learned and scholastic. They believed, for the most part, to the Dominicans and Franciscans, and either preached in monasteries, or went from place to place, now gathering a crowd in a field, now in a church. Their sermons were eminently popular, full of quotation from the Bible, and of allusion to it; full of stories, fables, and parables. Many of these preachers were deeply spiritual, and earnestly desirous of benefiting their hearers. Prominent among the medieval preachers are those of St. Aug. and St. Chrys. as presented to the Mongols; Bernard of Clairvaux, who converted many to monasticism, and roused all Europe to the second crusade; Bonaventura, who, when asked by Thomas Aquinas for the source of his power, pointed to the crucifix hanging in his cell, and said, "It is that image which dictates all my words to me;" Francis Coster (1531-1619), whose sermons were so striking; Berthold the Franciscan of Regensburg, the greatest of the popular preachers of the time, whose audiences numbered thousands; John of Monte Corvino, the apostle to the Mongols; Savonarola, preacher and prophet, priest and politician, saint and martyr; and perhaps as one of the best specimens of medieval pulpit eloquence and unction, John Tauler of Strassburg. The latter is wonderfully tender and searching. quaint, even grotesque, in style, it is easy to understand and applicable was. Very strange stories are told about these preachers,—how bold they were in their attacks; and how they were obeyed, even when their demands were most strenuous, as, for instance, when they exhorited their hearers to give up their jewels and ornaments; how they were reverence by king and people; how they interpreted the Scriptures correctly through their spiritual insight; and how they led holy lives,—in the world, yet not of it. But the preachers whose names have come down to us were probably exceptional, not only in ability and learning, but in grace. The generality of those who assayed to preach were probably lacking in all three; for the barrenness, the conceit, the ignorance, or the pedantry of the preachers, is frequently complained of in this period. The so-called Inquisition, prefixed to his Sermons, throws a flood of light upon the shortcomings of his contemporaries.

The "Reformers before the Reformation," the men who prepared the way for Luther's work, were all preachers. John Wiclif, in England, sent out his "Poor Priests," who filled the land with his doctrines. He himself preached in a learned and scholastic manner for the university of Oxford, and in a popular and hortatory manner for his congregation at Lutterworth. Johann Wessel, in Germany, was a preacher learned and popular. Peter Waldo in France, and Hus in Bohemia, spread their doctrines by preaching. The Reformers, therefore, used a familiar weapon, but they handled it with distinguished success. Unlike many of their contemporaries, they utilized preaching primarily for edification. Luther, Zwingli, Melauchthon, Calvin, Butzer, aimed to save men and comfort them. To this end they opened to them the Scriptures. But it was not long before the Protestant ministers degenerated into disputants. The Lutheran Church was split into the rival camps of the Philippists and Gnesio-Lutherans; the English-speaking Protestants were divided into Prelatists and Presbyterians. But it was unfortunate, to say the least, that the PREACHING.

1885

PRECIOUS STONES.

Pulpit was used for sectarian purposes. Sermons were written, not to expound the Scriptures, but theological abstractions and subtleties. Preachers neglected the spiritual needs of their hearers, to show up the falsity of their opponents' position and the impregnable character of their own. A cut-and-dried Protestant scholasticism corrupted the Continental pulpit of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. There was no sense of the necessity of repentance. Then came Rationalism as a reaction. But piety cannot exist where every sentence of God is punctuated with a question-mark. The Rationalists preached finished sermons, but they failed to start the new life. While discoursing eloquently upon morals, they forgot to expound the word of God; and in consequence they preached the churches empty, and they have not since been filled. But it must not be supposed that there was not earnest preaching of the fundamental doctrines of sin and salvation. In the coldest times of formal orthodoxy, there were congregations whose hearts burned within them while their preachers were with spiritless insight opening to them the Scriptures. Spener and the Pietists were living protests against deadness and dry rot. And, while the Continental Protestants seemed to have fallen asleep, the Protestants of Great Britain and America were awake.

Such preachers of the seventeenth century as Jeremy Taylor, Robert South, Richard Baxter, John Owen, and John Bunyan in England; and anywhere; and everywhere; in the eighteenth century, the Established Church of England relapsed into torpor, John Wesley and George Whitefield, with Jonathan Edwards and Samuel Davies in America, and others like them in fervor and grace, gave powerful impetus to religion. A revival followed these efforts; and the eighteenth century saw in Great Britain and the United States the pulpit on the side of the most wonderful philanthropy. Foreign missions, Bible societies, abolition of slavery, civil-service reform, temperance, have had some of their ablest advocates in the pulpit.

In the Roman-Catholic Church, preaching has never been honored as among Protestants; but more the latter it has approved since the Reformation. The palmiest days of this church's pulpit-eloquence were in France, in the seventeenth century, when opposition to Protestantism was sharpest. Bossuet, Maisillon, Bourdaloue, and Fenelon were the greatest names. In England and the United States, Romanism has lately striven to equal Protestantism in preaching. It conducts revival-meetings called "missions." It cultivates eloquence and rhetoric, and provides churches with seats, unknown in the old Roman-Catholic countries. It is said that the Paulist Fathers in New York-City, and other missionary orders elsewhere, preach with a vigor and sternness equal to that of the medieval preachers.

PREACHING FRIARS were the Dominicans.

See DOMINIC.

PREBEND (præbenda) "allowance" meant, originally, the provision or food which each monk or cleric received from the common table: anon the term continued to be used, even after the common life had generally been dissolved, and the revenues of the institution divided among the members. The fixed income thus formed was then called a prebend, or beneficium prebendale, or beneficium prebendale. With respect to the recipient, prebends were called prebenda capitulares, or prebenda domicellares, according as they were given to a regular member of the chapter, or to some domicellaris, or junior. With respect to their size, they were divided into majors, medias, minores, and semi prebenda. The recipient of a prebend is a prebendary.

PRECIOUS STONES are often referred to in the Bible. The Hebrews were well acquainted with their value, and had countries for neighbors such as Arabia (1 Kings x. 2) and Egypt, or carried on converse with countries such as India and Cyprus, where precious stones were found. Solomon's wealth and commercial enterprise brought many precious stones to Palestine (1 Kings x. 10 sq.). The oldest market for them was Babylon. The Hebrews, at a very early period, understood the art of cutting and engraving gems, and attributed it to the influence of God's spirit (Exod. xxxiii. 5, xxxv. 33). They used them for seals and rings (Song of Songs, v. 14; Ezek. xxviii. 13), and in other ways for personal adornment. The high priest's shoulder-pieces were adorned with two precious stones, and his breastplate with twelve, upon which the names of the twelve tribes were engraved (Exod. xxviii. 9 sqq.). The earthly temple was ornamented with them (1 Chron. xxix. 2; 2 Chron. iii. 8); and so was the heavenly temple, as seen in the visions of the seer (Exod. xiv. 10; Ezek. i. 28; Dan. x. 6; Rev. iv. 3). The foundations of the walls of the new Jerusalem will be garnished with twelve precious stones (Rev. xxi. 11, 18 sqq.), which seem to be chosen with reference to Exod. xxviii. 17-20. The following precious stones are mentioned by name in the Bible. We are helped in our interpretation of the Hebrew and Greek names by the ancient versions, Josephus (Ant., III. 7, 5; Bel. Jud., V. 5, 7), and book xxviii. of Pliny's Natural History. We can arrive only at the probable truth about some of them.

(1) διανο, the sardius, or sardonyx, so called because first found near Sardis, of a reddish color, was very much esteemed and used. The finest specimens came from Babylon. (2) νεφρός, the yellow topaz, which is also mentioned by Job (xxviii. 18), came from Ethiopia, and especially from an island in the Persian Gulf [some writers identify this stone with the chrysolite]. (3) καρφωτος, the emerald ("the glittering," Rev. iv. 3), was found especially in Egypt. (4) πρασμα, the carbuncle, was the name of several stones with a glowing red color, as of the African and Indian ruby, and the garnet; which latter is probably referred to in the Bible. (Job xxviii. 6, 15). Pliny calls it the lapis-lazuli, which, however, does not seem to be meant in the Old Testament. (6)连载 is translated by Luther, "diamond." It is probably the onyx or the opal (Pliny). (7) the figure, probably means the hyacinth, which is found in Ethiopia, but, according to some, amber. (8) the agate, found in Cyprus, Syria, Egypt, etc. (9) the amethyst, which was much esteemed, came from India, Arabia, and Egypt. (10) The Old Testament. (6) The carbuncle, was the name of several stones with a but, according to some, amber. (8) The ligure, probably the chrysolite. Rosenmüller translates the word, "topaz." (11) the onyx, which came from the land of Havilah (Gen. ii. 12). (12) the much-discussed jasper (Rev. iv. 3, xxi. 11, 19), the best varieties of which came from India. (13) the carbuncle (Isa. liv. 12) and agate (Ezek. xxvii. 16). (14) the diamond, an apt illustration of Israel's obstinacy (Ezek. iii. 9; Zech. vii. 12), translated in the English version "adamant." See Gessner: De Prolifico, or Lehrs, Blauly: De cestui sacrodomum Hebra, Amsterdam, 1860, 2d ed., 1868; BELLERMANN: D. Urim u. Thummim, d. aeolsten Gemmen, Berlin, 1824; [A. H. CHURCH: Precious Stones in their Scientific and Artistic Relations, London, 1883].

PRECONIZATION (from praconizare, or praconisare, which in medieval Latin is used synonymously for praconari, "to announce publicly") denotes the act by which the Pope, in the assembly of the cardinals, proclaims new bishops, and assigns them their respective seats.

PREDESTINATION. The pagan idea of fate is, generally speaking, that of an inevitable necessity, to which the will and wants of man have no other relation than that of absolute submission. It is simply a caricature of the Christian idea of predestination, making all the intercommunica tion between God and man, God is dead to man, and man is dead to God: or, still worse, to the arbitrariness of man corresponds the arbitrariness of the gods; and as man is under the yoke of his own senses and of the demons, so the gods themselves are in the grip of a dark destiny. It must not, however, be overlooked that there are great differences between the different historical forms of paganism, and that there is no form of paganism which is absolutely pagan, that is, completely devoid of light. Wherever, in paganism, dualism prevails, as, for instance, in Parseeism, the idea of fate produces a distinction between good and bad men, between good and bad genii, nay, even between good and bad souls in the same body. The fatality of life is ascribed to the principle of evil; but, under the shield of the good genius, man can extricate himself from the meshes of fate by asceticism, by mortification of the flesh, by deadening his senses. In the pantheistic forms of paganism, fate is part and parcel of life itself. What man does is done in him by the deity, and in accordance with the laws of necessity. All distinctions, consequently, between good and bad, or between happiness and misery, are merely formal, and the freedom of the will only a phenome nal form of the necessity of life. In polytheism, finally, fate gradually becomes divided, multifarious, subordinate. The Greek Moira, the goddess of destiny, is with Homer a blind, dark power, against which Zeus strains his forces in vain. But with Hesiod she has already become the Moirai, the three goddesses, Klotho, Lachesis, and Atropos; and the Moirai are under the control of Zeus, like the Parcae under that of Jupiter and the Forni under that of Odin.

The Old Testament containing not only the germs of the doctrine of election in the con tradiction of Abraham and the world, Issac and Ishmael, Jacob and Esau, Judah and his brethren, but also the germs of the doctrine of decrees in the lives of Abraham, Issac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, and others, not to speak of the Book of Job and the Book of Joes, those grand, representative exemplifications of divine fore-ordination, it was quite natural that the idea of divine predestination should be found living and active among the Jews, though it was very differently developed in the different systems of Judaism. The Sadducees openly asserted that each man was the master of his own destiny; while the Pharisees, with their mechanical separation of human actions. The Essenes, finally, represent that form of Judaism which was most mixed up with paganism, considered destiny as an inevitable fate; the whole idea, however, being peculiarly mitigated by the religious quietism which characterized the sect. In this point, as in so many others, the Essenes were true Gnostics, and so are the Mohammedans, for Gnosticism is simply a blending of Christian with pagan and national elements. The Persian Gnosticism of Manes begins, and the Arabian Gnosticism of Mohammed consummates, the revolt against Christ. The fate of Islam is the absolute, arbitrary despotism of Allah; and when the Koran in one place teaches the inevitableness of destiny, and in an other the possibility of warding off divine punishment, it simply contradicts itself. The fatalism of Mohammed referred, probably, only to the infidels; and when to the faithful he preached absolute necessity with respect to the hour of death, he had probably only a practical purpose in view,—to make them good fighters for his religion.

The principal passage of the New Testament concerning the subject is Rom. viii. 29-30. It is full and comprehensive, articulating with great precision, and in their natural sequence, the single elements of the idea; and it is corroborated not only by parallel passages, as for instance, Ephes. i., but by the whole scriptural teaching concerning the divine scheme of salvation. Nevertheless, though the doctrine of predestination, in its immeasurable compass, in its infinite depth, has never lacked the testimony of the religious consciousness of the living church, its theological development has been long and laborious. As the first stage of that development, may be mentioned the Ebionitic and Judaizing assertions on the one side, and the Gnostic and Manichaean dreams on the other, both contradicted and rejected by the practical experience of the church,
PREDESTINATION. 1887

PREMILLENNIALISM.

though not yet refuted by any scientific exposition from the orthodox side. Such an exposition was first given by Augustine, but was by him given at once both in polemical form, against the fatalism of the Manicheans (De natura boni, etc.), and in positive form (De predestinatione sanctorum, etc.). The views of Augustine, though exaggerated by his pupils, and rejected by the Pelagians and Semi-Pelagians, were, nevertheless, carried victoriously through the controversy by the syndods of Arelate (472), Lyons (475), and Orange (529). A new stage in the development is indicated by Gottschalk. He made repuration an element of predestination, and thereby, as well as by his general treatment of the subject, he caused a controversy, in which Prudentius, Ratramnus, Servatus Lupus, John Scotus, Remigius, and others, took part, and which was brought to a conclusion in a rather violent manner by the synods of Chiency (853) and Valance (855). During the middle age the views of Augustine suffered considerable modifications. The Thomists, and were altogether abandoned by the Scotists. His infralapsarian tenet, that God elects whom he will out of the whole mass of ruined humanity, though retained by Anselm and Peter Lombard, gradually died away, and had to be revived by Thomas Bradwardine, Wi61, Hus, and the other precursors of the Reformation. With the Reformers, however,—Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin,—Augustinianism, and generally the whole question of predestination, entered into full light, and received its confessional statement; though from that very period a striking difference becomes apparent between the Lutheran doctrine, formed by Melanchthon, represented in the Formula Concordiae, and further developed by Schleiermacher and Martensen, and the Reformed doctrine in all its different forms,—infralapsarianism, supralapsarianism, hypothetical universalism, etc.

The two great stumbling-stones which embraced the theological development of the doctrine of predestination were, on the one side, a certain non-moralization of the Reformation, and, on the other, inability to harmonize the idea of absolute fore-ordination with the idea of divine justice. With respect to the former point, it is evident, that when the Arminians admit the fore-knowledge of God, but deny the fore-ordination, making election and reprobation depend upon faith and repentance, their conception of the fore-knowledge of God is untenable; for divine pre-science is something more than the prophet's knowledge of the future. With God, to know and to do are identical. The prescience of God is creative. There is, consequently, between pre-science and predestination the necessary relation of a general to a specific term. With respect to the latter point, the difficulty has been solved in various ways, of which the so-called theory of national election and the so-called theory of ecclesiastical individualism are the most remarkable.

The theory of national election confines election to communities and nations; that is, only communities and nations are by God predestinated to have the knowledge of the true religion and the eternal privileges of the gospel granted or denied to them. The theory of ecclesiastical individualism extends predestination to individual man, but without making it absolute with respect to election or reprobation: it is still confined to the outward church and the means of grace. Both these theories represent true gospel facts, and are, consequently, implicitly present in the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination such as it was formed by Calvin, and set forth in the Confess. Gall. and Confess. Belg., and, in a somewhat modified form, in the Confess. Helvet. and the Heidelberg Catechism.

LIT.—The enormously rich literature belonging to the subject may be found in Winer: Handbueh der theolog. Literatur, 1. 442, and Appendix, p. 72, and in this work under the separate heads. See A. Schweizer: Die Protestantischen Centraldogmen in ihrer Entwicklung innerhalb der reformirten Kirche, Zürich, 1854–56, 2 vols.; and Luthardt: Die Lehre vom freien Willen, Leipzig, 1863; [J. Forbes: Predestination and Freewill, Edinburgh, 1878].

PREMILLENNIALISM (Millenarianism, Christian Chiliasm), in all its forms, makes two affirmations: viz., (1) That the Scriptures teach us to expect an age on earth of universal righteousness, called the "millennium," from Rev. xx. 1–5; (2) That this millennial age will be introduced by the personal, visible return of the Lord Jesus, to establish over the whole world a theocratic kingdom. This Christian chiliasm is to be distinguished, (1) from all forms of pseudo-chiliasm among Christians, such as teach that the saints — whether by means of material force, as the Anabaptists and Fifth-Monarchy Men, or by moral and spiritual forces, as very many moderns — shall come to rule the world before the resurrection; — this all-premillenialists join the Augsburg Confession in denying; (2) from the Jewish chiliasm, as opposed to which it is held, (a) That the inheritance of the kingdom is conditioned, not by race or ritual observance, but by regeneration only; (b) That the delights and occupations of the risen saints will not be sensual, but suited to the nature of a perfectly sanctified spirit, and of a body spiritual and incorruptible; (c) That the millennial kingdom will not be final, but transi- tional. As to the time of the millennium, the premillenialists hold that it is unknown. However, individuals sometimes have presumed to calculate the date, the great majority of premillennialists have deprecated such attempts as utterly unscriptural, and of mischievous tendency. It is agreed, again, that the advent is conditioned, in the purpose of God, by the preaching of the gospel sufficiently to serve the purpose of a witness among all nations: "Then shall the end come." As to the resurrection, it is believed that the resurrection of the righteous will precede that of the wicked by a period called, in Rev. xx., "a thousand years;" during which, as most understand, many not attaining the first resurrection will remain in the flesh until the end. As to the judgment, while premillennialists hold, with the Church universal, that Christ will come to reward all men according to their works, they claim that the Scriptures also include therein in all manner of administrations of kindly rule; all which shall be in order to the establishment on earth of the everlasting kingdom of God and the promised "restoration of all things." This judgment-work of Christ will occupy the whole millennial period, beginning with the resurrection of the righteous, by Gentile Christians before the close of the first century” (Hertzog: Real-Eencky., art. “Chiliasmus”), and “was expressly rejected during the first half of the second century by most Gnostics” (Nitzsch: Dogm. Gesch., i. 401). The doctrine is found in the Epistle of Barnabas (chap. 15), the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (Jud. 25, Benj. 10), the Shepherd of Hermas (Vis. 1, 8); was taught by Papias (Eusebius: Ecclesiastical History, iii. 39); is set forth by Justin the Martyr (Dial. 80, 61), still more fully by Irenæus (Adc. Har., v. 29, 25–36) and Tertullian (Adr. Marc. lib. iii. 24). The first recorded opponent of the doctrine was Caius, a presbyter of Rome, about the beginning of the third century, from which time, through the opposition to the Montanists, who made chiliasm a prominent article of their faith, the dislike to the gross form in which some individuals presented the doctrines, and still more through the influence of Origen and the Alexandrian allegorizing school of interpretation, chiliasm rapidly declined. In the course of the fourth century, however, some eminent men—e.g., Nepos, Cyprian, Methodius, and Lactantius (Inst., vii. et seq.)—held the doctrine; but when, in Constantine, Christianity reached the throne of the Roman Empire, the church soon settled in the belief, shortly afterward confirmed by the weighty authority of Augustine, that the millennial reign, formerly expected to begin with the second advent, was really to be the beginning of the third century, from which time the question how intimate and continuous shall be the relation of the Lord and the risen saints to the subject nations of the unglorified during the millennial age; as to whether, beyond that age, the human race will continue to exist in the flesh upon the earth; as to what shall be the precise position of Israel in that age; and, in general, as to many details concerning the exact order of the events predicted. But the decision of such questions, one way or the other, plainly will not modify the chiliasmatic eschatology in its essential features.

It is commonly agreed by the best modern historians, that, from the death of the apostles till the time of Origen, premillennialism was the general faith of those who were regarded as strictly orthodox Christians. If it had some elements in common with the Jewish chiliasm, yet, “so far from being derivable from it, it may in part be more justly regarded as a polemic against Judaism” (Dorner: Doctrine of the Person of Christ, division i. vol. i. p. 408). It was “already received and standing in the church than at any time since the second century. The names of Professors Delitzsch, Van Oosterzee, Von Hofmann, Auberlen, Nitzsch, Ebrard, Rothe, Lange, Christlieb, Luthardt, Gauseen, Godet, with many others, illustrate this fact. In 1870 the Free Christian Church in Italy incorporated the doctrine into its Confession of Faith. In the United Kingdom, among dissenters, the Plymouth Brethren, as elsewhere, and a few prominent individuals in other bodies, — notably, the Jesuit Lacunza and Pere Lam, — have advocated premillennialism; but the most in the non-episcopal communions reject it. In the Episcopal Church, however, a large proportion — according to some, the majority of the clergy — are on the premillennialist side. The doctrine is taught more or less fully in the writings of Archdeacon Trench, Bishops Ellicott, Ryrie, Canons Birks, Hoare, Fremantle, Drs. E. Bickersteth, Tregelles, the late Dean Alford, and many others. In America, until lately, the doctrine has been held by only a few, among whom may be named the late Dr. N. Lord, Joel Jones, LL.D., Drs. R. J. Breckenridge and Lillie. Recently, however, through the influence, no doubt, of the writings of Lange, Van Oosterzee, Alford, and others, and the popular teaching of Mr. Moody and other premillennialist evangelists, belief in the doctrine has been spreading. In October, 1878, a public conference of premillennialists was held in New York, similar to one convened in February, 1878, in London, by Canon Fremantle, Canon Hoare, Dr. H. Bonar, Prebendary Auriol, and others. Ten denominations were represented in the hundred and twenty-two names appended to the call for the convention, of which forty-nine belonged to various Presbyterian bodies, twenty-three to the Baptists, the remainder to the Episcopalians, Lutherans, etc. The large church of the Holy Trinity (Dr. S. H. Tyng’s) was well filled on First and Second Thessalonians,in 1874, especially Excursus of American editor (Dr. Craven) on “The Basileia,” “The Future Advent,” “The First Resurrection,” pp. 93, 339, 352. Among many German works of value may be mentioned Von Hofmann: Weisagung u. Erfüllung, Nordl., 1841-44; Koch: Das Tausendjahrige Reich, Gütler, 1860; Auberlen: Daniel u. d. Offenbarung Johannis, § Auft., Basel, 1874. The subject is treated dogmatically by Gill: Complete Body of Divinity, Lond., 1791, with some notable variations from above scheme; R. J. Breckenridge: The Knowledge of God subjectively considered, N.Y., 1860, pp. 667-682; Muntensen: Christian Dogmatics, Eng. trans., Lond., 1882, pp. 465-474; The Van Oosterzee: Dogmatics, Lond., 1872, pp. 577-582, 794-803, and Image of Christ, Lond., 1874, pp. 445-497, specially full and satisfactory. In German see Rothe: Dogmatik, ii. pp. 67-77; Luthardt: Lehre v. d. letzten Dingen, § Auft., Leip., 1870. Of a more popular character are E. Bickersteth: A Practical Guide to the Prophecies, Lond., 1835; T. R. Birks: Outlines of Unfulfilled Prophecy, London, 1854; Molyneux: The World to Come, London, 1853; H. Bonar: Prophetic Landmarks, Lond., 1859; J. H. Brookes: Maramanath, 5th ed., St. Louis, 1878; J. A. Besse: The Last Times, 7th ed., Phila., 1878; Guinness: The Approaching End of the Age, London and N.Y., 1879-80; Premillennial Essays of the Prophetic Conference, Chicago, 1876. A satisfactory history of premillennialism is yet a desideratum. Corrigan’s Greek Church, 1781-83), the standard authority, full of information, only reaches to 1783, and, as has been observed, is not written with impartiality. He denies the genuineness and inspiration of the Apocalypse. The student will find most satisfaction in recent histories of doctrine, as Nitzsch, Baur, Ebrard, and especially (for first and second centuries) Dorner: History of the Doctrine of universal restoration, as Jukes (Restitution of all Things, London, 1877). But premillennialists generally differ in nothing from other evangelical Christians as to the fundamentals of faith or practice. In the work of home and foreign evangelism they appear to be specially active.

PREMONSTRANTS, or PREMONSTRATENSIAIS, is the name of a monastic order founded by Norbert in the first half of the twelfth century. Its name it derived from Prémontré (Prémonstratrum), a place between Rheims and Laon, where its first monastery was founded in 1121. It spread through all countries, and had at one time a thousand male and five hundred female abbeys. It was then divided into thirty provinces, or "circaries," with a circator as the head of each. The abbots of Prémontré, St. Martin, Floreff, and Cuisy, the four oldest monasteries, enjoyed the highest authority: they exercised a general right of visitation. The abbots of Prémontré stood at the head of the whole order as a kind of general. The province of Saxony held a prominent position in the order. It comprised the counties of Magdeburg, Brandenburg, Havelberg, and Ratzeburg, under his authority: the four latter episcopal sees were consequently almost exclusively occupied by Premonstrants. The rules were those of Augustine. The religious practices were severe. Flesh was altogether forbidden. Fasts were frequent, also scourings. Norbert of Gennep was born at Xanten, on the left bank of the Rhine, in the duchy of Cleve, and died at Magdeburg, June 6, 1134. He was a relative of the emperor, Henry V., held several rich benefices, and led a gay life until 1115, when he was converted. He left his court costume in the cathedral of Cologne, dressed himself in plain sheepskins, and walked about barefooted among the poor people, preaching and teaching. In 1118 he renounced his benefices, and distributed all his property among the poor, and, having associated himself in 1119 with Hugo des Fossées, he determined to found a new order, and selected, in accordance with a vision, the valley of Coucy (Pratum monstratum, or Præmonstratum) for the site of the first monastery. Honorius II. confirmed the order by a bull of Feb. 16, 1126; and in the same year Norbert was appointed archbishop of Magdeburg; in which position, however, his severity brought him into manifold conflicts with his chapter, the Wendish missionaries, and the burghers of the city. But his order prospered, and was for several centuries the rival of the Cistercian. Gradually, however, relaxation crept in, and losses occurred, which made reforms and restrictions necessary; and when, finally, decay set in, the collapse followed swiftly. See Hugonis annates ord. Præmon., Nancy, 1734; and Hugonis annates ord. Præmon., Nancy, 1734; and from their double office arose the eldership and the diaconate. The first mention of elders as such is in Acts xi. 30; in connection with the church at Antioch, whose elders sent the money collected for the relief of the Judean brethren,—precisely the sort of work committed to the seven. It was the apostles and the elders in Jerusalem who debated the great question of Christian liberty, and sent the letter (Acts xv.) which proves that the latter had care of spiritual no less than of temporal matters. The apostles were present when Paul made his report in Jerusalem concerning his last missionary journey (Acts xx. 18 sqq.). Further: it was the elders who were commissioned by James (v. 14 sqq.) to pray over the sick, and anoint them with oil. In the Gentle Christian world, also, elders were prominent persons. Paul ordained such in Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch (Acts xvi. 23); tenderly addressed and earnestly counselled those of the Ephesian Church (xx. 17 sqq.); and in his epistles, by wise and minute directions, showed these officers how they were to fulfil their duties, both governmental and directly spiritual, in a word, pastoral (1 Thess. v. 12; 1 Tim. iii. 1 sqq.; Tit. i. 6 sqq.). Peter ordained seven elders at Lystra (Acts xiv. 23 sqq.). But Paul’s remark, “Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honor, especially those who labor in the word and in teaching” (1 Tim. v. 17), does not imply two classes of elders, the “teaching” and the “ruling,” for there was only one class, but rather that each elder, according to his aptitude and training, was to give himself to his special work, whether teaching or ruling, and also, that, although teaching was part of the office, every elder was not called upon to teach. In similar strain, Heb. xiii. 7, 17 speaks of the teaching of the elders, and their care for the souls of their constituency.

PRESBYTERIANISM.

From these passages a clear idea of the nature of the duties of the primitive elders can be formed. They taught publicly; but this was not the whole of their work. They governed, as well as instructed. They were neither merely representatives of the congregation, nor merely preachers and teachers, nor pre-eminently organs of ecclesiastical authority; but they held the reins of the church, the congregation, and the preachers were not merely representatives of the congregation, nor merely preachers and teachers, nor pre-eminently organs of ecclesiastical authority; but they held the reins of the church, the congregation, and the preachers were not mere preachers, because every male member could preach. They were not lay-elders, because the distinction between laity and clergy had not yet been made. They stood in and at the same time over the congregation; in it, because they belonged originally and constantly to it; over it, because they exercised the right and duty of oversight and guidance. They were, as a rule, chosen by the congregation, as were the seven (Acts vi., cf. xiv. 23), under divine direction (xx. 28). Even in the cases where they were appointed by the apostles, or at their command (Tit. i. 5), there was presumably co-action on the council’s part. If these early relations of the eldership and the constitution of the congregation came about 97 A.D., when Clement of Rome, in the interest of unity and order, wrote his First Epistle to the Corinthian Church, wherein he appeals to the Old-Testament distinction between clergy and laity (chap. xii. sqq.) as a valid reason for the existence of the same distinction in the Christian Church, and, on the ground of it, calls the rebellion against the elders, which had broken out in the Corinthian Church, an attack upon divinely constituted authority. The epistle proves that already the primitive idea of the eldership had undergone a change, and that elders would speedily be a class distinct from the laity, having exclusive spiritual jurisdiction. Neither Clement nor Polycarp (Epist. chap. vi.) has any thing to say about teaching-elders. Indeed, Luther taught the priesthood of all believers, and the people’s right to call, install, dismiss, and indict their ministers. The power of the keys was also theirs. Yet neither Luther nor Melanchthon, nor any other Wittenberg Reformer, restored the eldership. Indeed, Luther maintained, that, besides preaching, there was only the care of the poor to be provided for through an ecclesiastical office. (See art. Lutheran Church.) The restoration of the eldership came from (Ecclampadius of Basel; but it was Calvin who first set forth the idea in a thoroughly practical form. This was in Geneva (1541). He was not able to carry his ideas upon this subject to their full development, because politics interfered; but he accomplished what he intended, and six elders came next to the pastors and teachers, and constituted the third official rank; the deacons, the fourth. The elders were elected by the Council of State, with the advice of the ministers, and the list was presented to the Council of Two Hundred for its approval. The elders were to be twelve in number,— four to belong to the Little Council; four, to the Council of Sixty; and six, to the Council of Two Hundred. Each elder was given a section of the city to inspect as to its moral conduct; and the body, with the six ministers, constituted the consistory, which dealt with all cases of ecclesiastical discipline.

Calvin’s idea of the eldership was adopted in France and Scotland, and sporadically in Germany. In Paris the first consistory, composed of the minister and several elders and deacons, was formed 1555, and afterwards a number of congregations took up the plan. At first the consistories had unlimited authority; but their power was curtailed by the synod of 1558. In Geneva the elders were chosen by Nazireanism, and six, to the Council of Two Hundred. Each elder was given a section of the city to inspect as to its moral conduct; and the body, with the six ministers, constituted the consistory, which dealt with all cases of ecclesiastical discipline.

Calvin’s idea of the eldership was adopted in France and Scotland, and sporadically in Germany. In Paris the first consistory, composed of the minister and several elders and deacons, was formed 1555, and afterwards a number of congregations took up the plan. At first the consistories had unlimited authority; but their power was curtailed by the synod of 1558. In Geneva the elders were chosen by Nazireanism, and six, to the Council of Two Hundred. Each elder was given a section of the city to inspect as to its moral conduct; and the body, with the six ministers, constituted the consistory, which dealt with all cases of ecclesiastical discipline.
The presbyterian polity spread from Scotland into England, and in Germany was adopted, during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, by many Lutheran churches on the Lower Rhine and in Westphalia, and received the cordial approval and advocacy of Spener.

III. MODERN. — The presbyterian polity has in this century spread very widely. In Prussia it was introduced in many hundred congregations (June 29, 1850, and Sept. 10, 1878); and the same is the case with Bavaria, Braunschweig, and other provinces of the empire. The polity is to be distinguished from that of Independence or Congregationalism, and from lay-government pure and simple (Erastianism). The true eldership has been set apart for the performance of certain duties elders are intrusted, along with the minister, with the spiritual care, the temporal affairs, and the legal representation of the congregation. See Presbyterianism.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES. I. In Scotland.

(1) CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. The following article will be dedicated to some account of, (1) the history, (2) the constitution, and (3) the present condition, of the Scottish Church.

1. History. — The Church of Scotland came into existence in the year 1560. It can hardly be said, certainly, to have been legally established in that year. The formal ratification of presbyterian church government in Scotland did not take place until 1562, when the celebrated act of the Scots Parliament was passed, which has been commonly known as the Magna Charta of the Church. In 1560, however, the temporal endowments of the church were virtually vested in the crown. It was on the seventeenth day of August of that year, that "the Scots Confession," drawn up at their request, and read aloud, clause by clause, in their hearing, was solemnly ratified by the Three Estates of the realm. Its ratification was carried by an overwhelming majority. "Of the temporal estate," says Knox, in his History of the Reformation, "only voted in the contrary the Earl of Atholl and the Lords Somerville and Borthwick; and yet for their dissenting they produced no better reason, but we will believe as our fathers believed." He goes on, "The bishops (papistical, I mean) spoke nothing. The rest of the whole Three Estates by their public votes affirmed the doctrine." It has sometimes been maintained that the Reformed Church of Scotland may claim even an earlier commencement than the year 1560, and may, indeed, assert its right to be traced back to the first introduction into the country of Christianity itself; the early Celtic Church, the Church of St. Ninian and St. Columba, being, as is alleged, essentially presbyterian. The early Celtic Church certainly was not episcopal; nor, above all, had that church any subordination to the Roman pontiff. But the resemblances to the church of John Knox, found in the monastic establishments over which the abbots presbytery of Iona so long ruled, are by no means complete; the Celtic ecclesiastical system being, as Dean Stanley has said (Church of Scotland, p. 29), "as unlike presbyterianism as it is unlike episcopacy." And especially when we consider that a strictly Romanist Church, as introduced by David I., had interrupted for four hundred years the doctrine and practice of the earliest forms of Scottish Christianity, the theory of what is called the continuity of the Church of Scotland must, upon the whole, be set aside as untenable.

The new church, though succeeding a religious establishment very differently situated, entered on its career with miserably inadequate provisions for its material support. The endowments of the Roman-Catholic Church had been enormous. It has been estimated, that, previous to the Reformation, not less than one-half of the entire landed property of Scotland was in the hands of ecclesiastics; and that, including all sources of income, the actual revenues of the Romish Church in that country must have exceeded two hundred and fifty thousand pounds a year. The proposal of John Knox and the other leaders of the Protestant party, as to the disposal of property admitted on all hands to be ecclesiastical property, will be found in the First Book of Discipline, chap. v. That scheme was not only, as regards its originators, remarkably disinterested, but, both in its general conception and in its details, wise and statesmanlike. It was to the effect that the revenues of the church should be devoted to three objects, all of them more or less contemplated by the original donors of church property in Scotland; namely, (1) the sustentation of the ministry, (2) the education of the people in schools and universities — the education to be of the most liberal description, and (3) the relief of the poor. Patriotic as was this great scheme, it met with nothing but ridicule from the members of the Roman Church. However, the three estates, "together called it "a devout imagination." The result is well known. Eventually the lion's share of the spoil fell to the crown and to the nobles and landowners of Scotland, whose votes determined the matter, and many of whom had from the first favored the Reformation less, it must be feared, from religious principle than from personal interest. A third of the old Papal revenues was, it is true, nominally assigned to the church; but of this sum only a very small portion appears to have been paid, and that very irregularly. The consequences were serious, not only to the ministers, but to the church. Thirty-six years after the Reformation, i.e., in 1596, the General Assembly complained that four hundred thousand churches "in addition to the churches of Argyll and the isles," were still destitute of ministers, "for lack of provision of sufficient stipends;" so that "the land overflowed with atheism and all kinds of vice" (Calderwood: History, v. 416). And, speaking of the year 1584, James Melville gives the following account of the state of matters. "By the insatiable avarice of the earls, lords, and gentlemen of Scotland," he says, "the ministers, schools, and poor were spoiled of that which should sustain them. . . . whereof came fearful darkness of ignorance, superstition, and idolatry, with innumerable filthy and execrable sins" (Dairy, 129). Knox speaks in terms of scathing indignation: "none [of the laity] were licentious," he says; "some had greedily gripped the possessions of the church; and others thought they would not lose their part of Christ's cost.

... The chief great man that had professed Christ Jesus, and refused to subscribe the Book of Discipline, was the Lord Erskine; and no one, he says, "had his own, his kitchen had lacked two parts of that which he now unjustly possesseseth" (History, vol. ii. p. 128).

The same narrowness of means, hampering all her operations, has characterized the Church of Scotland from first to last.

Nor has the Church of Scotland had, upon the whole, otherwise than a troubled career. Robert Wodrow calls his history, which extends from the Restoration to the Revolution, a History of the Sufferings of the Church of Scotland; and the same description might, without violence, be applied to a much more extended period of Scottish church history. Her motto, Nec tamen consumebatur, itself, indeed, implies that she has always been exposed to, no less than that she has always survived, trial and suffering.

Notwithstanding all the disadvantages under which she has thus labored, through the limitation of her resources and other hindrances, the Church of Scotland has not throughout her history been behind other churches in the work which she has accomplished. She has been, no doubt, excelled by the Church of England, and also by the Church of Rome, in her labors for the promotion of learning, at least in its highest departments, and especially as regards the number of men occupying a pre-eminent position in arts and literature, who have belonged to her communion, and been fostered by her institutions. But, even with relation to the encouragement of learning, she has not been altogether unentitled to honorable recognition; numbering, as she has done, among her sons, from the first,—that is, even in the sixteenth century itself,—men like George Buchanan, Alexander Alesius, Andrew Melville, and others of the most accurate and elegant scholars of their age, as tried, too, not by Scottish standards, but by the standard of those foreign universities in which most of them prosecuted a great part of their studies. In the seventeenth century, again, Dr. Alexander Carlyle of Inveresk,—"Jupiter Carlyle," speaking of his own contemporaries, boasts, not without reason, that there were few branches of literature in which ministers of the Scottish Church did not excel (Autobiography, p. 561).

So it has been always. Nor, when referring to her services to learning, must we forget the proposals of the Reformed Church of Scotland in The First Book of Discipline, already referred to, for a scheme of national education, which is now, in the nineteenth century, only beginning to be thoroughly appreciated; or the system of parish schools, introduced by the Privy Council in 1616, not without the active co-operation of the Church, as well as carried out under her superintendence, and which has had so much to do with the high character and the remarkable success in life for which, for so long a period, Scotchmen have been distinguished in all parts of the world. The Church of Scotland, however, has done still greater work. A Christian church mainly exists for the instruction, comfort, and edification of the people, and for the extension beyond her own bounds of the blessings of the gospel of Christ. And, judging especially from statistics which will be found in the course of this article, no church, it is believed, can appeal with more confidence to the diligence, fidelity, and success with which, in their every-day labors, the ministers and members of the Church of Scotland have fulfilled their supreme duties.

The principal events of the history of the church from the Reformation to the present times may be very briefly recapitulated. On the 20th of December, 1560, the first General Assembly met in Edinburgh. There were forty-one members, of whom only six were ministers. Its chief business related to the external organization of the infant church. In the same year the Book of Policy, or First Book of Discipline, was prepared, and laid before the Privy Council, who, however, never gave that document, as a whole, their formal approval. The principal reasons have been already noticed.

The church at its first beginnings accepted presbytery as its system of church government, having been, indeed, both in doctrine and in policy, formed on the model of the Genevan Church, from which its most influential leaders had received their own religious and ecclesiastical principles. The great controversy, however, as to episcopacy, which continued to trouble the Scottish Church from the Reformation to the Revolution, very soon broke out. It originated with the nobles, whose personal interests were bound up with the maintenance of nominal, or, as they were called in allusion to an old rustic device for making cows give milk, "tulbane" bishopries. Episcopacy was afterwards adopted, for a different reason, by James VI. and his immediate successors, who (at least as regards James himself and his son Charles I.) appear to have been chiefly influenced by the belief that there was a natural affinity between prelacy and monarchy. At the time of the Reformation it had been resolved to continue to the Istrian-Catholic church, and also to the Church of Scotland from first to last.

But in 1572, when this natural termination of the older incumbrances began to take effect, a convocation of the church at Leith was persuaded, for the reasons already stated, but under the pretext of the minority of the king, to postpone the abolition of episcopacy. It must be acknowledged that the Leith ordinances were, in an evil moment, consented to by John Knox and other leaders, as well as by the General Assembly. The retrograde movement in question was for a time arrested by the influence of Andrew Melville. Melville, laden with scholastic honors, returned from the Continent (where he had during the last ten years been completing his university education) in the year 1574, and at once assailed episcopacy, not only, like John Knox, as inexpedient, but as, in its own nature, contrary to the Scriptures. In 1580, under Melville's influence, the General Assembly "found and declared the pretended office of a bishop to be unlawful, having neither foundation nor warrant in the word of God;" and so vigorously was this resolution acted upon, that, before the Assembly of the following year, all the bishops, except five, had sent in their demissions. In 1581 a strictly presbyterian book of policy, The Second Book of Discipline, drawn up under Melville's supervision, was prepared. And though never sanctioned by Parliament, nor even approved by a majority of the Presbyteries of the country, this document became in 1592 the basis of the celebrated act of Parliament, already referred to, which established presbyterian church government, and for the time overturned the episcopal polity in Scotland. But the recovery was only temporary. James VI. had never been a Presbyterian at heart, and his succession to the English throne in 1603 gave him a new motive for a preference which was originally due, as already suggested, to political motives. From this time he abandoned himself to the scheme of assimilating the ecclesiastical policy of his Scottish kingdom to that of England; and by means of the Perth Articles of 1618 (ratified by Parliament in 1621), imposing a number of medieval festivals and ceremonies, as well as by the previous act of 1605, restoring their estates to Scottish bishops, he effectually prepared the way for certain still greater changes in the same direction, which he left to be introduced by his son. That son, Charles I., more zealous, and less astute, carried matters farther than James, but brought upon himself in the process the loss of his crown and his life. There is no doubt that the introduction, at the suggestion of Archbishop Laud, of the Book of Canons and the Book of Common Prayer, was the immediate occasion of the English Rebellion. Another re-action occurred in 1637; and presbytery, though in an exaggerated form and under unfavorable circumstances, gained the ascendent till 1661,— the date of the Restoration. Episcopacy was in 1661 again re-established, not without, in the case of the Presbyterian Church (especially as represented by the Covenanters), the accompaniment of cruel and perilous oppositions; and which having ceased from that date till the Revolution of 1688, it must be added, that, throughout this whole period of nearly a hundred and thirty years,— whatever may have been the changes in the public policy of the government,— the feelings of the people of Scotland had been consistently in favor of the presbyterian forms. After the revolution settlement which restored presbytery on the basis of the old Scottish act of 1592, the church ceased to suffer from the controversies between presbytery and prelacy. An act of Queen Anne (1711), restoring patronage in the appointment of ministers, now became, directly or indirectly, the principal source of trouble to the church. One of its consequences was the secession, in 1737, of certain ministers, with their congregations, in the parishes of Clydesdale (North and United Presbyterian Church of Scotland), which became the nucleus of the now large and important body known as the "United Presbyterian Church of Scotland." Another secession, originating in very much the same way, and eventually forming part of the same dissenting body, took place in 1745. This new secession, until its union with the seceders of 1737, took the name of "The Relief." It would be impossible, with our limited space, to go into all the details of the history of the Scotch Church in the eighteenth and the early part of the nineteenth centuries.

Within the latter period, incomparably the most important event was the "Disruption," as it has sometimes been called, of 1843. In that year a large number of the ministers, and also of the laity, of the Established Church of Scotland, withdrew from the church, and formed a body of dissenters, under the name of the "Free Church." The occasion of the step thus taken by the most considerable, at least in numbers, of all the sectors who have left the Church of Scotland, was complicated, and cannot be explained without going into details for which this is not the place. The question related chiefly to the independent jurisdiction of the church; but it originated in a proposal, on the part of the church, to modify by ecclesiastical authority the law of patronage in the appointment of parish ministers. The secession appeared at first to threaten most disastrous consequences. "It was found (Cunningham, vol. ii. p. 534) to have swept into the ranks of dissent more than a third of the clergy of the Established Church . . . and more than a third of the whole membership of the church." On the part of the seceding clergy, a noble sacrifice was made, which, the better it is understood, will be appreciated the more highly. And this is freely conceded even by those who feel most strongly that the Scottish martyrs of 1843 were, to use the words of Sir William Hamilton, "martyrs by mistake," and that the result of their action has been, not favorable, but mischievous, to the cause which they had at heart.

Among the more recent incidents in connection with the history of the Church are the resolution passed by the General Assembly in 1866, to the effect that the use of instrumental music, and other innovations in the forms of public worship, should not be opposed, unless they interfered with the peace of the church or the harmony of congregration, and which had the effect (and conceded even by those who feel most strongly that the Scottish martyrs of 1843 were, to use the words of Sir William Hamilton, "martyrs by mistake," and that the result of their action has been, not favorable, but mischievous, to the cause which they had at heart. It would be impossible, with our limited space, to go into all the details of the history of the Scotch Church as established by law is to be found in the Confession of Faith drawn up in the time of the Commonwealth (originally as a common confession for the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland,— a scheme which came to nothing) by the Westminster Assembly of Divines (1642-49), and known as the "Westminster Confession." The original Scots Confession, prepared chiefly by John Knox, and approved by the Three Estates of the Scottish Parliament in 1600, was formally superseded in favor of this new symbol, first by an act of the General Assembly, passed in 1642, and afterwards by an act of Parliament of William and Mary of 1690, re-establishing the Presbyterian Church of Scotland. In this act of 1690 the articles of the Westminster Confession are engrossed in extenso, as a part of the law of Scotland. Substantially the two confessions maintain— with, perhaps, in the case of the latter, a tendency to the more extreme form of Calvinistic theology— the same general type of doctrine. Upon the whole, too, the doctrine is in harmony with that of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England and of the other confessions of the sixteenth century.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES

(b) As regards church government, the Church of Scotland is, as already said, presbyterian. In some respects, indeed, it is more strictly presbyterian than the early French and Swiss churches, though to these, upon the whole, it in polity most nearly approaches. Thus, except for a few years after the Reformation, when the deficiency of qualified pastors to supply the vacant parishes required a special temporary arrangement, it has never, like the Continental presbyterian churches just referred to, admitted superintendents, prespositi, or inspectors as part of its organization, but has maintained presbyterial parity in the strictest sense of the term. At the same time, the Scottish Church does not now, and, as far as her legal standards are concerned, has not at any time, held extreme views on the subject of presbyterianism. It does not hold presbytery so much as Christianity to be the fundamental principle of its religious polity. In the Scots Confession of 1560, and in the Westminster Confession of 1647, it is laid down that the Kirk Session, as the Court of Supervision, is superior to the catholic and undenominational doctrines which are common to all Christian churches. In the Scots Confession the first article is "of God," and in the Westminster Confession the same place is assigned to "the Holy Scriptures." Nor has the hypothesis of a jus dicarium for presbytery—a division into distinct courts within the polity of the church constitution—ever been authoritatively accepted by the Church of Scotland. So far from professing to believe that presbytery, as a system of church government perpetually and universally binding upon the Christian Church, is prescribed in the New Testament, it freely acknowledges that "it does not think that any policy ... can be appointed for all ages, times, and places" (Scots Confession, chap. xx.); and it holds that "there are some circumstances concerning ... the government of the church, common to human actions and societies, which are to be ordered by the light of nature and Christian prudence according to the general rules of the Word" (Westminster Confession, chap. xxi.).

Within its province, and including the whole of the presbyteries of the church, the Church does not now, as you have, we believe in the same Saviour, and insist as much as you do upon all holy living." The old lady replied, "All that may be very true; but you have no kirks sessions, presbyteries, synods, and general assemblies." The Church of Scotland, however strongly it maintains its own principles as far as they go, may be glad to have it in its power to disclaim any such narrow views of true religion.

Practically the government of the Scottish Church is carried on by a body of ministers and elders who are like members of her church courts, and alike known as "presbyters;" the former being both rulers and pastors; the latter (the larger number), only rulers in the church, and thence sometimes called "Ruling Elders." The courts in which these presbyters, whether lay or clerical, exercise their authority as alike church rulers, are four in number; the initial court being the Kirk Session. The next court, the Presbytery, consisting of the ministers and representatives from the elders of a limited district. The Presbytery is a court of appeal from the Kirk Session, and exercises otherwise a higher jurisdiction than that court. The next higher ecclesiastical judiciary is the Synod. It embraces a number of presbyteries within what is called a "Province," and is consequently known by the name of a "Provincial Assembly." It has the supervision over the whole of the presbyteries within its province, and includes the whole of the members of the subordinate courts. The highest court is the General Assembly. The General Assembly is a representative court; a certain number of ministers by the 1st being the Presbytery, formed on different models unchurched, presbytery (and especially on grounds of experience) is, if not exclusively laid down in the New Testament, yet in entire harmony with the general principles of that supreme rule of faith and practice. The terms of the formula required to be signed by the ministers of the church do not, as regards this point, go beyond such general exceptions to the presbyterian polity. The terms are these: "I do own the presbyterian government and discipline now so happily established in [this church]; which government, I am persuaded, [is] founded upon the word of God, and agreeable thereto."

Dr. Edmund Calamy of London tells in his Autobiography a ridiculous story of a visit paid to him, when he happened to be in Edinburgh, by an old lady whose son had recently gone to the English metropolis. She told him she was anxious about his spiritual welfare in a place so benighted as London. "Why," said Calamy, "what is your fear? We in England have the same Scriptures as you have, we believe in the same Saviour, and we insist as much as you do upon all holy living." The old lady replied, "All that may be very true; but you have no kirks sessions, presbyteries, synods, and general assemblies." The Church of Scotland, however strongly it maintains its own principles as far as they go, may be glad to have it in its power to disclaim any such narrow views of true religion.
of the next meeting of the assembly,—a ceremony which follows a similar appointment, first of all made by the moderator of the assembly in the name and by the authority of the Lord Jesus Christ; the difference in form being, of course, a relic of a 'thousand conflicts in former times between Church and State.

(c) With respect to ritual, the Church of Scotland does not, any more than in the case of church government, require of candidates for the sacred office, or such positive institutions as the sacraments and Christian prayer, to have the explicit direction of Holy Scripture. It holds that order in ceremonies is not expressly prescribed in the New Testament; in most of the details of public worship little more than authoritatively laid down by Christ or his apostles than that God should be worshipped in spirit and in truth, that all things should be done to edification, to the edification of the Church of Scotland. As to its substance, how much longer the Book of Common Order—and of the Reformation, that church, it is true, adopted as its name imports, not a form of prayer, but an act of the General Assembly. The rubric in the name and by the authority of the Lord Jesus Christ; the difference in form being, of course, a relic of a 'thousand conflicts in former times between Church and State.

(d) The rules with respect to the ministry of the Scottish Church deserve special notice. It is required of candidates for the sacred office that they should attend at a university for at least seven years,—four years in the arts classes, and three years in the classes of the faculty of theology; entrance examinations, conducted by a synodical board, being exacted for the latter course, and that course being also necessarily followed by an examination for license before a presbytery. Appointments used to be made by "lay patrons," including the ecclesiastical courts of the principal nobility and landed proprietors, under certain conditions which were intended to prevent the intrusion of unqualified or unacceptable presentees. Since 1872 the appointment has been, by an act of Parliament, transferred to the clergy. The minister of a parish is, ex officio, the moderator of his kirk session. Strictly speaking, he has no absolute power in the administration of parochial affairs, apart from the kirk session, any more than the kirk session itself, independently of the higher courts of the church, to which there is always an appeal.

(e) The relations of the Church to the State in Scotland are clear and simple. The principle of a church establishment has always been maintained in theory. In practice there have been times when the Church was left without support or countenance by the State; but, though thus virtually disestablished, it has not ceased to assert its own rights and the duties of the State. As we have seen, it was formally accepted as the Established Church in 1592, and again, by the Revolution settlement, in 1690. Establishment has never been held, by the Church of Scotland, to imply subjection to the State in matters spiritual. It has always maintained, and now maintains, the doctrine of the headship of Christ over the Church. No church has asserted more distinctly its own rights and the duties of the State. As to the spiritual independence of the Church itself,—a somewhat different question,—the Scottish Church, though not disputing the authority of the civil magistrate within his own jurisdiction, has always protested against the interference of the civil magistrate with functions which are spiritual. It has appeared to the Church of Scotland that there is no necessary conflict between the principle of spiritual independence and the principle of a national establishment of religion, which it holds to be the duty of the State and of the Church alike to recognize. On this vital question the civil law sustains the claims of the ecclesiastical courts. In all ecclesiastical causes, and matters purely spiritual, the church courts are by Act of Parliament declared to be supreme (see the Act of 1800, the Act of Union, and other statutes therein referred to). The opinions of the judges of the Supreme Courts are to the same effect. Thus the Lord Justice Clerk Moncrieff (in Wight v. the Presbytery of Dunkeith, June 28, 1870) : "Within their spiritual province the church courts are as much so as we are within the civil courts!"

So, also, Lord Ivory (in Paterson v. the Presbytery of Dunbar, March 9, 1861) : "Each (i.e., of the two judicatories, ecclesiastical and civil) is independent of the other, and each has its own exclusive field of jurisdiction, within which it is paramount." Again: Lord President Boyle (in Lockhart v. Presbytery of Deer, July 5, 1851) : "We have just as little right to interfere with the Court of Justiciary in a criminal question."

3. Present Condition of the Church. — The most recent statistics on this subject will be found, in an authentic form, in a document drawn up in 1882 by a committee of the General Assembly for the information of Parliament.

The number of congregations in connection with the Established Church, including parishes (1,278), non-parochial charges (162), and mission stations (120), is, altogether, 1,552. These numbers are considerably in advance of those before 1843 (the year of the so-called "disruption" of the church), when the aggregate of parochial ministers remained in the church.

The communications on the church-registers appear, from a parliamentary return obtained in 1878, to be 515,000; which number, compared with the previous parliamentary return of 1878, shows an increase in five years of no less than 55,000. This number has no doubt increased, at least in the same proportion, during the last five years, and in any case compares favorably with the numbers in the official returns of other Scottish churches. The communicants in the United Presbyterian Church are returned at 172,000, and of the Free Church (excluding the Highlands, for which no returns are given) at 230,000.

As to the precise numbers of the adherents of the Church of Scotland compared with other Scottish churches, these cannot be given in an authentic form, owing to the successful resistance of the churches outside the Established Church to a religious census by the authority of Parliament. At the same time the report of the registrar-general for 1878 (the last report), showing the proportion of marriages according to the rites of the several religious denominations to be found in Scotland, throws some light on the subject, and may be here quoted. According to this report the percentages are as follows: —

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Denomination</th>
<th>Percentage</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Church of Scotland</td>
<td>45.02</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Free Church</td>
<td>22.30</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>United Presbyterian Church</td>
<td>12.37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roman-Catholic Church</td>
<td>8.05</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Episcopal Church</td>
<td>2.98</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Other denominations</td>
<td>1.54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Denominations not stated</td>
<td>0.05</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Irregular marriages</td>
<td>1.59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>100.00</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The paper from which these statistics are taken also contains some particulars as to the work of the church.

The church supports 77 endowed churches and 51 mission-stations. During the last eight years 110 additional churches have been built, at an estimated cost of upwards of £3,000,000, and providing accommodation for upwards of 80,000 sitters. The home mission committee of the church expends on objects such as these a large annual revenue. In 1880 the sum was £15,983, the whole amount drawn from the voluntary liberality of the church. Again: under the auspices of the endowment committee, the church is at this moment widely extending its old parochial organization by providing permanent endowments for unendowed churches. By the zealous labors of the committee in question, and the liberality of members of the Established Church, no fewer than the large number of 312 new parishes, with regular endowments, have been created since the year 1845, the expense amounting to at least £2,000,000 sterling. In 1880 the revenue of the endowment committee was £18,000.

Of the foreign missions of the church the like details may be given. The church maintains missions in India, Africa, and China, with 36 European and 280 native agents, and at an expenditure of nearly £20,000 in 1880, or £25,000, if the closely allied Jewish mission be included.

Then, in addition to these enterprises, the church undertakes partially the maintenance of religious ordinances in the colonies, more especially in Canada; and also the support of Continental mission-stations on behalf of Scotchmen who are resident temporarily or permanently abroad.

Under the heading of the voluntary liberality of the church, the following sums are noticed as raised during the nine years ending Dec. 31, 1880: —

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Purpose</th>
<th>Amount</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Congregational and charitable purposes</td>
<td>£640,455</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Support of ordinances, and supplement of stipends (exclusive of £4,000,000 raised by scat-rents)</td>
<td>£131,468</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Education (exclusive of all sums raised in connection with training colleges)</td>
<td>£123,940</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mission home-work</td>
<td>£249,183</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Church building</td>
<td>£488,130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Endowment of new parishes</td>
<td>£256,315</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Foreign mission-work</td>
<td>£2,588,702</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Total: £2,588,702

Giving an average annual amount of £267,633

The amount for 1880 was £319,847

These amounts do not include a princely donation of £5,000,000 for church purposes from the late Mr. James Baird of Cambusdoon.

(2) FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. The Free Church of Scotland claims to be the lawful descendant and heir of the Church of the Scottish Reformers and Covenanters, and in any exhaustive sketch of its history would start from the days of Patrick Hamilton, George Wishart, and John Knox. In 1690 its ministers, elders, and people, still feeling the constraining sense of duty to surrender the emoluments provided by the State, were obliged to form a separate organization; but clinging in all respects to the government, discipline, and worship of the church of their fathers, accepting its standards and its legislation, they protested that they represented the true "Church of Scotland," unless the essence of that church were to be held to be the possession of the temporalities, or submission to the authority of the State. As a matter of convenience, the present sketch begins with 1843; but the real history begins three centuries before.

The immediate cause of the quarrel with the State was connected with the appointment of ministers to vacant charges. It had been maintained from the earliest times, that "no minister shall be intrusted upon any patron contrary to his will;" and the Legislature at various times had passed acts acknowledging this principle. At the settlement of the affairs of the Presbyterian Church under William III., in 1690, the election of ministers was placed on a comparatively popular basis. But in 1711, in the reign of Queen Anne, soon after the Scottish Parliament ceased to have a separate existence, an Act was passed by the British Parliament, hurriedly if not surreptitiously, restoring the system of lay-patronage; that is, conferring the right of nominating ministers on certain landed proprietors connected with the several parishes. The General Assembly of the Church protested for many years against this enactment; and, in the settlement of ministers, presbyteries were required to see that, in addition to his presentation by the patron, the minister-to-be had a "call" from the people. By and by the church became more favorable to patronage; and some of the early secessions took place in consequence of certain ministers refusing to take part in what were called "forced settlements." In 1834, under the guidance of Dr. Chalmers, the Assembly passed the Veto Act, with a view to define and settle the rights of the people in the "call" to the ministry, without overturning the rights of the patrons. This Act provided, that if a majority of male heads of families, being communicants, objected to the person nominated by the lay-patron, the presbytery were to take no steps for his ordination, but intimate to the patron that the parish was still vacant. Lord Kinnoul, patron of the parish of Auchterarder, and Mr. Robert Young, his presentee, who had been vetoed almost unanimously by the people, feeling aggrieved by the subversion of the spiritual independence of the Church, and of her liberty to obey the Head of the Church in spiritual matters. In the position which the Church took up on these grounds, it was maintained that she only followed in the wake of the great leaders of the Church in her best and bravest days,—John Knox, Andrew Melville, Alexander Henderson, Samuel Rutherford, George Gillespie, and the like; while its attachment to evangelical truth—exemplified in the preaching and labors of men like Chalmers, Cunningham, Candlish, Guthrie, Duff, McChesney, and many more—showed that it inherited the spirit, as well as maintained the struggle, of the fathers in other days.

The event of May, 1843, shook Scotland to its centre, and the vibrations of the movement were felt over the civilized globe. Sympathy and aid flowed in from innumerable quarters, while the people were in many instances more devoted than the ministers. The number of congregations rapidly increased from four hundred and seventy to more than one thousand. The whole of the missionaries to Jew and Gentile, including Dr. Wilson of Bombay, Dr. Duff of Calcutta, Dr. John Duncan of Pesth ("Colloquia Peripatetica"), gave in their adherence: so also did a small proportion of the landed gentry, and a much larger proportion of the lower, middle, and professional classes. In the Northern Highlands the people forsook the Establishment in a mass, having often had bitter experience of the kind of ministers whom the patrons gave them. Parochial schoolmasters adhering to the Free Church were ejected from their schools. It was attempted to drive out professors who adhered to the Free Church from their chairs in the Universities; and a process for this purpose was instituted against Sir David Brewster, Principal of the United College of St. Andrews; but this attempt was not successful.

The Free Church determined to organize itself over the whole of Scotland, and, by means of a general fund and local funds, proceeded to build plain churches for the congregations, although in many places great hardship had to be endured from the stern refusal of some of the great landed proprietors to grant sites. In a short time a plan for the erection of numerous was organized, and, through the great exertions of Dr. Guthrie, carried to a successful issue. Another plan, for the erection of five hundred schools, also proved successful. The various foreign missions were retained, and in lieu of the old buildings, which were claimed by the Established Church, new structures were reared. Among the chief aids in the maintenance of ordinances in the disestablished Church was the Sustentation Fund. The idea of this fund was due to Dr. Chalmers. At an early period he propounded his plan, and affirmed it as certain, that, if collectors were appointed for every district to gather in the contributions to this fund by periodical visits to the people, enough would be raised to provide a stipend, up to the age of eighteen, to each minister. The proposal was received with great incredulity at first. It turned out, however, that Dr. Chalmers was right. For several years a minimum stipend from this fund of £150 had been paid to double the number of ministers originally on the fund, while many have received a further sum in the form of surplus. In addition to what is provided from this fund, the able congregations add local supplements to the minister's salary. The payment of £150 includes an annual contribution of £7 from each minister to a Widow's and Orphan's Fund. This fund now gives to every minister's widow, and orphan a yearly allowance of £24 where the mother is alive, and £30 where the mother is dead.

It would be out of place in this brief sketch to enter into detail on the work in which the Free Church has been engaged since 1843. Some of the most characteristic of her labors may be briefly referred to.

1. Home Evangelization. — This work was followed out in two departments. First, when the disruption occurred, it was the endeavor of the church to secure that the gospel should be preached in districts from which it had been virtually excluded before. There were considerable districts of the country where clergy of the "moderate" or Arminian type had long been settled; and the custom which forbade any minister to preach in the parish of another without his consent excluded those who were known and distinguished as evangelical. A great amount of ignorance and spiritual deadness prevailed in these districts. Now that the way was open, the Free Church endeavored to plant men in such districts of a more distinctively evangelical and earnest type. It was attempted to make the gospel known in all quarters by means of a settled ministry, when practicable, or by means of occasional visits from ministers, and others of evangelistic gifts and character.

The other department of home-mission work was among the lapsed masses in towns and other populous places. Before the disruption, Dr. Chalmers and his friends had had their attention turned very earnestly to the vast number of persons in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and other large towns, who had been suffered to fall into a state of complete neglect of Christian ordinances. As soon as the hurry of the disruption was over, Dr. Chalmers set himself to show what could be done in the way of reclaiming a neglected district, by organizing what he called a territorial mission, and thereafter a territorial ministerial charge, in the West Port of Edinburgh. His plan was to select a limited territory of about two thousand souls, and divide it among a number of visitors, each of whom was to take care of a small number of the people, and try to get them to connect themselves with the ministry. An minister and a schoolmaster were appointed for the whole, and by God's blessing the scheme was a great success. Many churches in the poorer districts of our cities have been erected on the same principle. All along, the Free Church has been prominent in home evangelistic work. Revival movements under suitable men have been greatly promoted by the Free Church. The late Mr. Brownlow North was recognized as an evangelist by the General Assembly; and movements like that of Messrs. Moody and Sankey have had many of their most energetic supporters and helpers from among her ministers and people.

2. Theological Education. — From the beginning, it was the earnest desire of Dr. Chalmers, principal and professor of divinity at Edinburgh, to extend and improve the system of theological training. On his death, in 1847, his successor, Dr. Cunningham, addressed himself vigorously to the same cause. It was thought by many that the policy of the church ought first to be to complete the equipment of one divinity hall; but local influence was strong at Aberdeen and at Glasgow, and now there are three theological institutions. These are all furnished with ample buildings and libraries, and a large sum has been accumulated for endowment. The "New College" of Edinburgh has seven professors and one lecturer. The chairs are, (1) Apologetics and Ecclesiastical theology; (2) Systematic theology; (3) Church history; (4) Hebrew, and Old-Testament exegesis; (5) New-Testament exegesis; (6) Evangelistic theology, or missions; (7) Natural science. The lectureship is for elocution. The other hall: have each four professors; the professor of evangelical theology at Edinburgh being connected likewise with them. The curriculum of study extends over four sessions of five months each. All students of divinity must have passed through an undergraduate course at one of the universities. The total number of students in session 1880-81 was 257. The New College at Edinburgh has usually a large number of students from other countries and churches. The following countries and colonies have sent students: Canada, United PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES. 1900 PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES.

States (North and South), England, Wales, Ireland, Holland, Belgium, France, Switzerland, Italy, Germany, Prussia, Hungary, Bohemia, Norway, Turkey, Asia Minor, Cape Colony, Natal, Australia, and New Zealand.

3. Foreign Missions. — The adherence of all the denominations to the Free Church, as well as the influence of the current of evangelical life which fell so peculiarly on that church, led to a prominent place being given to foreign missions. The method inaugurated by Dr. Duff in Calcutta was vigorously prosecuted. The rearing of native laborers in well-equipped Christian schools of Western learning has always been a chief aim of the church. It must be owned, that, in this field, the efforts of the church have not yet equalled the greatness of the enterprise. Besides missions in India, there are missions in Caffraria, Natal, and at Lake Nyassa in Africa, in the New Hebrides Islands, and in Syria. The Free Church is also associated with the English Presbyterian Church in a vigorous mission to China. The institution of a chair of missionary theology in 1867 was designed to promote among theological students an interest in missions; and to quicken their zeal for the foreign field; but it can hardly be said that as yet the results have come up to the hopes of the founders.

4. Colonial Churches. — A committee for promoting the welfare of colonial churches was in operation before the disruption; this department of work, however, has been prosecuted with more vigor since that event. One thing that has given additional interest to the colonies is the fact that not a few ministers have gone to them as their fields of labor. Though England does not fall under this category, yet it is worthy of note that the ranks of the Presbyterian Church there were largely recruited by Free-Church ministers; so that a new vigor was communicated, by the disruption, to Presbyterianism in England. The church in Canada, as well as the church in Australia and the church in New Zealand, profited by the same event. Several professors of divinity were sent out to the colonial churches. In other cases, ministers were furnished for important charges. The plan of a sustentation fund has been tried, with no small success, in several of these colonial churches. In other ways the influence of the Free Church has been evinced in the increased life and energy which many of them have shown.

5. Evangelization in the European Continent. — The energies of the Free Church have found a very congenial field on the continent of Europe. The ostensible object has been to look after Scotchmen settled in Continental cities, or residing there for a time; but the stations thus established have interested in theological centres, from which, in various ways, light has emanated to enlighten the surrounding darkness. In many of the towns of Italy the stations of the Free Church have been active auxiliaries of the Waldensian missions and of other efforts to spread the gospel among the Italian people. In the south of France, too, an important influence has been exerted of a similar kind. In Germany, Hungary, Bohemia, Malta, Gibraltar, and Switzerland, stations have been maintained. By means of bursaries, the Free Church is enabled to invite to her theological institutions young men from various Continental countries and from places more remote. The direct evangelistic work of the evangelical churches is encouraged by grants-in-aid.

6. Church Union and Co-operation. — Soon after the disruption, the Free Church received into her communion one of the smaller sections of the secession, — that with which the late Dr. McCrie was connected. For ten years negotiations were carried on between the Reformed, the United, the Free, and the English Presbyterian churches, with a view to union. The great majority of the Free Church favored this union; but a determined minority opposed it, and threatened to secede if it were carried out. In consequence of this, the negotiations came to an end; but a union was effected between the Free Church and the majority of the Reformed, or Cameroonian. The Free Church in her Assembly has always welcomed ministers from other evangelical churches, and given them opportunities of being heard. Her connection has been peculiarly intimate. In this way, with the colonial churches, and with the English and Irish Presbyterian churches. The Free Church has always encouraged union among the different Presbyterian bodies in the colonies, although minorities have sometimes been against such movements.

7. Care of the Young. — The Free Church felt specially called on to take up, as a legacy from the founders of the Reformed Church of Scotland, “the godly upbringing of the young.” The scheme for five hundred day schools, already referred to, was designed, partly to provide for the ejected schoolmasters, and partly to secure more attention to the religious element in education. For many years, under the convenership of Dr. Candlish, the Free Church was very zealous in promoting primary education. Three normal colleges were established for the training of teachers; — at Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen; these are still in full and efficient operation. But the education scheme was never very popular. The church always expressed her readiness to merge her own scheme in a general system for national education, and a few years ago this was actually done. Most of her school-buildings were given up to school-boards for national education. A large establishment of sabbath schools connected with the Free Church, all under the kirk-sessions of the various congregations. In 1880-81 the number of teachers was 16,296, and the number of scholars, 152,101. Of Bible or senior classes, mostly taught by the ministers, there were reported 1,205, and scholars, 44,303. In this department the Free Church has been specially active of late. A committee, appointed by the General Assembly, “for the godly upbringing of the young,” prescribes certain books and subjects for competition every year: members of Bible-classes are encouraged to compete. In 1880-81 the total number who obtained prizes or certificates (their examination-papers showing a value of not less than fifty per cent) was 963.

8. Financial Administration. — The Free Church has gained no little notice for the systematic thoroughness of her financial administration and the large sums of money which she has raised for her various objects. The total raised during the year...
The Free Church, throughout her career, has aimed to combine the spirit and convictions of the old Reformers and Covenanters with adaptation to modern wants and a progressive attitude, wherever progress is lawful. The conservative element has in practice had no little influence in checking progressive tendencies. For the most part, the Calvinistic creed has been held and preserved by both ministers and people. The connection with the State was tried, and persisted, and was regarded them as deserving of toleration in the State. When the Free Church gave up connection with the State, it was on the ground that the State was trying to enslave her, and not on the ground that such connection in itself was wrong. The course of events has tended to show that the old connection with the State is inexpedient, and not to be desired. The general belief now is, that the existence of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolved, so that the existing alliance of the Established Church with the State ought to be dissolve...
Synod, commonly called "Antiburghers." These two denominations grew up side by side for more than seventy years, their members and ministers having no ecclesiastical fellowship with each other, notwithstanding the fact that the United Church numbered at that time 7 presbyteries, 114 congregations, and more than 65,000 members.

Since 1847 the course of the United Church has been one of almost uninterrupted progress. Negotiations for union with the Free Church were begun in 1852, and continued for ten years; but they were ultimately abandoned, without any other issue than the adoption of a Mutual Eligibility Scheme, which permitted a congregation in one denomination to call a minister from the other. Beyond Scotland, however, a union was effected; for in Liverpool, on the 13th June, 1876, ninety-eight congregations of the United Presbyterian Synod, whose location was in England, were formally joined to the English Presbyterian Church, making together "The Presbyterian Church of England." Yet, notwithstanding that apparent diminution of strength, the statistics presented in 1882 gave the following particulars: Presbyteries, 30; congregations, 551; members in full communion, 1,745,557; income for congregational purposes, £250,927 3s. 6d.; for missionary and benevolent purposes, £82,531 17s. 4d.; total, £373,459 10s., which is exclusive of £50,271 7s. 6d., reported as from legacies. In addition to its foreign missions in Jamaica, Old Calabar, West Africa; Rajpootana, India; China; and Japan; in which, according to the report of 1868, there are 71 regularly organized congregations with an aggregate membership of 10,808 and nearly 2,000 catechumens. The total income of the Foreign Mission Fund for 1882 amounted to £37,530. In its Basis of Union it solemnly recognized the duty "to make exertions for the universal diffusion of the blessings of the gospel at home and abroad;" and it has faithfully acted on that conviction, and is probably doing more for the diffusion of the gospel throughout the world than any other denomination of its size, with the exception of the Moravians.

Doctrinal Position. In the Basis of Union just referred to, it was the conviction of the United Presbyterian Church that the Westminster Confession of Faith has formed the basis of its faith and practice. II. The Westminster Confession of Faith contains the following statement as to the nature of the Church: of Faith and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms are the confession and catechism of this church, and contain the authorized exhibition of the sense in which the Scriptures are understood that we do not approve of any thing in these documents which teaches, or may be supposed to teach, compulsory or persecuting and intolerant principles in religion. And the term of membership is a credible profession of the faith of Christ as held by this church, a profession made with intelligent and searching conscience. By a confessional creed and set of principles.

"1. The word of God contained in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments is the only rule of faith and practice."

No doctrinal test is administered to members on their admission; but elders and ministers are required, under the question in a formula for ordination and license; and among these, up to May, 1879, was one question which read thus: "Do you acknowledge the Westminster Confession of Faith and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms as an exhibition of the sense in which you hold the Scriptures? It being understood that you are not required to approve of any thing in these documents which teaches, or may be supposed to teach, compulsory or persecuting and intolerant principles in religion?" But at the meeting of synod of 1879 it was directed that the qualification in the latter clause should be as follows: "This acknowledgment being made in view of the explanations contained in the doctrinal act of council there annexed. At the same time meeting a declaratory act was adopted; and as its importance is great, not only intrinsically, but because it is the first attempt to whiten the basis of doctrinal subscription in a Presbyterian church, we give it here entire:

"Whereas the formula in which the Subordinate Standards of this church are accepted requires them as an exhibition of the sense in which the Scriptures are understood; whereas these Standards, being human composition, are necessarily imperfect; and the church has already exception to be taken to their teaching, or supposed teaching, on one important subject; and whereas the present acts in regard to the future, it has been found desirable to set forth more fully and clearly the view which the synod takes of the teaching of Holy Scripture: therefore the synod hereby declares as follows:

1. That in regard to the doctrine of redemption as taught in the Standards, and in consistency there with, the love of God to all mankind, his gift of his Son to be the propitiation for the sins of the whole world, and the free offer of salvation to men, without distinction, on the ground of Christ's perfect sacrifice, are matters which have been, and still are, to be regarded by this church as vital in the system of gospel truth, and to which due prominence ought ever to be given.

2. That the doctrine of the divine decrees, including the doctrine of election to eternal life, is held in connection and harmony with the truth that God is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance; and that he has provided a salvation sufficient for all, adapted to all, and offered to all in the gospel; and also with the responsibility of every man for his dealing with the free and unrestricted offer of eternal life.

3. That the doctrine of man's total depravity and of his inability to any spiritual good accompanying salvation is not held as implying such a condition of man's nature as would affect his responsibility under the law of God and the gospel of Christ; or that he does not strive and restraining influences of the Spirit of God; or that he cannot perform actions in any sense voluntary; or that his ignorance, sin, and misery renewed heart are not spiritually good or holy, such as accompanying salvation.

4. That while none are saved except through the mediation of Christ and by the grace of the Holy Spirit, who worketh when, where, and how he pleaseth him; while the duty of sending the gospel to the heathens who are in ignorance, sin, and misery is clear and imperative; and while the outward and ordinary means of salvation for those capable of being called by the Lord are the ordinances of the gospel: in accepting the Standards it is not required to be held that any who die in infancy are lost, or that God may not extend his grace to any who are without the pale of ordinary means, as it may seem good he may think of it in his sight.

5. That in regard to the doctrine of the civil magistrate, and his authority and duty in the sphere of religion, notwithstanding the Standards, this church holds that the Lord Jesus Christ is the only King and Head of the church, and 'head over all things to the church which is his body;' disapproves of all compulsory or insisting on religious instruction, and declares, as hitherto, that she does not require approval of any thing in her Standards that is not teachable, or may be supposed to teach, such principles.

6. That Christ has laid it as a permanent and universal obligation upon his church to once to maintain her own ordinances, and to 'preach the gospel to every creature;' and has ordained that his people provide by their free-will offerings for the fulfillment of this obligation.

7. That, in accordance with the practice hitherto observed in this church, liberty of opinion is allowed on such points in the Standards, not entering into the substance of the faith, as the interpretation of the "six days" in the Mosaic account of the creation; the church guarding against the abuse of this liberty to the injury of its unity and peace."

In general matters the United Presbyterian Church has been very progressive. She was the first among the Scottish Presbyterians to introduce hymns other than the paraphrases into public worship, and after many debates she conceded the liberty to use instrumental music in her services some years ago.

Government. — The government is Presbyterian. Each congregation elects its own minister and elders, who together constitute the session. The arrangement of the temporal affairs is deputed to a body of managers chosen for the purpose by the members; but these have no spiritual oversight of the church. The presbytery consists of the ministers and one elder from each session in a specified district; and the synod consists of the aggregate of the presbyteries. Mere ordination does not confer the right to a seat in presbytery or synod. The minister is a member as a pastor; and unless in the case of a pastor-emeritus, who remains as a colleague to a junior brother, and in those of the professors of theology and mission secretaries, no minister without charge is a member, either of presbytery or synod. Frequent efforts have been made to divide the synod into provincial bodies, and make the supreme court a general assembly; but the democratic spirit of the denomination has always defeated these, although it has been felt that a synod composed of more than a thousand members is not perfectly adapted to deliberation. Still it has worked well on the whole in the past, and there seems to be at present no disposition to change.

Theological Education. — Up till 1876 the meetings of the theological seminary, or hall, were held in Edinburgh every year during the months of August and September; and the professors, first passed through a full literary curriculum at one or other of the national universities, and having been examined for admission, were required to attend for five sessions, while the professors, retaining their pastoral charges, gave up these two months annually to the work of tuition; and during the other months of the year the students were required to perform certain specified exercises, and undergo certain examinations, under the inspection of their respective presbyteries. This plan was suited to the circumstances of the church in its earlier history; but a new scheme of education, bringing it more into line with other denominations, was adopted in 1876, when it was decided that the professors should be loosed from the pastorate; that the session should consist of five months, from November to April; and that the course should consist of three full sessions. There are five theological chairs,— apologetics, pastoral training, church history, New-Testament literature and exegesis, and Hebrew with Old-Testament literature and exegesis. The men who now hold these appointments are worthy to be the successors of Lawson, the Browns (grandfather and grandson), Dick, Eadie, and others who have made the name of the Secession Church honorably known in many lands. WILLIAM M. TAYLOR.

14-III

RELIGIOUS STATISTICS OF SCOTLAND (from The Scottish Church and University Almanac, 1885).

THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

| Synods | 16 |
| Parishes | 3,837 |
| Unendowed churches, preaching and mission stations | 35 |
| Ministers [Estimated.— Etc.] | 1,470 |
| Communicants, per parliamentary return of 1878, 819,735 |
| Christian liberality for all objects in 1881 | £551,108.19.0 |

THE FREE CHURCH.

| Synods | 16 |
| Presbyteries | 73 |
| Ministers | 1,070 |
| Members | 747,567 |
| Income for all objects from all sources | £383,730.8.4 |

UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

| Synods | 16 |
| Presbyteries | 77 |
| Ministers | 1,010 |
| Members | 787,057 |

REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

| Synod | 1 |
| Presbyteries | 87 |
| Churches (7 vacant) | 14 |

SYNOD OF UNITED ORIGINAL SECESSION.

| Presbyteries | 4 |
| Churches (6 vacant) | 29 |

EVANGELICAL UNION AND AFFILIATED CHURCHES.

| Churches (13 vacant) | 90 |

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN SCOTLAND.

| Dioceses | 7 |
| Churches and stations | 238 |

BAPTIST UNION OF SCOTLAND.

| Churches | 84 |

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCHES IN SCOTLAND.

| Ministers | 65 |

WESLEYAN METHODISTS.

| Chapels | 26 |
| Dioceses | 6 |
| Churches | 105 |

II. IN ENGLAND.

The Presbyterian Church of England differs in its history from that of Scotland. From Knox to Chalmers, the latter was a Reformation Church, which for three centuries was more thoroughly national than any other; whereas the other never reached the same depth or extent of influence. It has four marked periods,— its rise, its height as the National Church of England, its decay, its revival. 1. Its rise. Only remotely, though in many ways most really, can we trace Presbyterianism in England back to the Culdees, or, later, to Wyclif. It emerges into separate existence after the Reformation. There were two parties,— the first, reforming the church, mainly by putting the king into a position of supreme power; and the second going back, more with Calvin and the Swiss churches than with Luther and the German church, to the doctrines and government of the New Testament. For a time, men like Cranmer, Hooper, and Latimer, would have reformed England after the Presbyterian fashion of Geneva and Zurich. But this passed with the death of Edward VI.; and, when Elizabeth came to the throne, she promoted, with indomitable will, Prelacy, with its semi-popish sacraments, and absolute supremacy of the king over both Church and State.

Opposed to this movement rose Puritanism, which was primarily Calvinistic in doctrine, and anti-sacerdotal in worship, as also leaning to Presbyterianism in government. For many years the vital question was that of doctrine; but, after many debated and ineffectual appeals to Parliament and the prelates for a purer worship and a self-governing church, Presbyterianism was formally instituted. Nov. 20, 1572, and Wansford, then a few miles from London, were the date and place of the first presbytery in England, in which its Book of Order, constructed in its ground-plan on Presbyterian lines. A few ministers and laity were the members. It is interesting to mark that fourteen days afterwards John Knox died in Edinburgh. The cradle of English Presbyterianism was rocked beside the death-bed of the great Reformer, who, twenty years earlier, had sown in England the seeds from which came the harvest. Thomas Cartwright is the greatest name as thinker, writer, sufferer, among the English Presbyterians, as Walter Travers (to whom Richard Hooker replies, in his work, monumental and classical alike in English literature and thought, "The Ecclesiastical Polity") was its fullest advocate. Presbyterianism thus springs from Puritan life. The grace of God, making each soul free spiritually, makes it free ecclesiastically and civilly too: hence the orders of equal rank— ministers, elders, and deacons with different functions. 2. But, while Presbyterianism grew outsider the Church of England, the Puritan doctrinal element grew within; and, seventy years after, the small Presbyterian of Wandsworth, in the face of imprisonment, fines, and torture, conquered Elizabeth, James VI., Charles I., and Laud. By this time, Puritanism had become chiefly Presbyterian; and, when the Long Parliament abolished Prelacy, Presbyterianism was established on June 29, 1647. The memorable Westminster Assembly of 1643 drew up their Confession, Shorter and Longer Catechisms, and Directory of Worship. Four members came from Scotland,— Samuel Rutherford, Alexander Henderson, Robert Baillie, and George Gillespie. We notice two things: first, that while the Parliament established Presbyterianism, yet, under the influence of Independency and Nonconformity, it withheld its power from executing ecclesiastical decisions; second, that the Westminster Confession of Faith was never subscribed fornally in England, as it was and is in Scotland: it was only accepted as a statement of scriptural truth.

For twenty years Presbyterianism was the National Church. Its framework was set up chiefly in London and Lancashire, and partially over the country. It was a time of much noble work, prayer, and fruit. But other elements grew. Independency and Cromwell did not like Presbyterianism because it adopted the intolerant principles of an Established Church, from which no church, either in England or New England, was in that age altogether free; and the old Episcopal Church waited its time.

That time soon came. Presbyterianism was disestablished, and on St. Bartholomew's Day, 1662, two thousand ministers, most of them Presbyterians, were ejected. Among them were Baxter, Howe, and Bates. The Presbyterian church was thrust out of civil and religious rights. It did not fight in England a Drumclog or Bothwell Bridge: it did not flee to the hills and moors, as in Scotland. It was too passive, and so became feeble.

3. For, when the Revolution of 1688 came, it had grown practically independent in church administration, and never at heart regained its old fervor. The same was true of the Presbyterians in other countries. They lived in many native churches; was strengthened by like-minded Scotchmen coming to England; till at last the two classes of congregations—those connected with the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland and those which after the disruption in 1843 formed one English Presbyterian synod—joined together in 1876 under the name of the "Presbyterian Church of England." This union, which doubled the strength numerically of the unionists, did more than doubled its moral energy and helpfulness. Since the union, its growth has been more elastic, organized, and conspicuous. Even before the union, Presbyterianism stood higher in relative increase of numbers at the last ecclesiastical census than any other denomination in England. We give the latest statistical returns, those of the year 1881: Congregations, 275, of which 75 are in the presbytery of London, and 200 increased during twenty years; 264 ministers with charges, 31 without charges, 21 probationers, 58,399 communicants, 6,216 sabbath-school teachers. In 1882 the theological college had three professors, one tutor, twenty-three students. One special department, the Sustentation Fund, has yielded to every ordained minister a minimum stipend of 2290 years' worth, and in any English denomination; and this minimum sum will likely, and soon, be increased. Total amount collected in 1881 was £208,626; average stipend in Berwick Presbytery, £209; in London, £394; in Liverpool, £414.

One of the noblest and most vigorously prosecuted enterprises of the church is the China Mission. Its first missionary was W. C. Burns, a man of the highest heroic and saintly type, whose place has been filled by a succession of men and women of like spirit. Burns had for a time little outward success, but it increased greatly before he died; and the seed he sowed has grown into a rich harvest. In 1881 there were 27 missionaries, 64 native missionaries, 64 stations, and 2,570 members; and this is a large increase on 1877. This revived English Presbyterianism was thus a future in it by its living truths and its generous deeds. Moreover, coming among the distracted parties in England, it gives to episcopacy and independency the elements of liberty which the one, and of order which the other, needs. That it should ever rise to be the National Establishment, as in 1843, we do not desire; that it should ever sink as low as in 1780, we shall not believe. But, whatever its future may be, it will be a serious element, if it maintain the courage of its first years, and shun the errors of its days of power and of decay.

IV. In Wales. See Welsh Calvinistic Methodists.

V. In the United States of America. PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA (NORTHERN GENERAL ASSEMBLY).—The first Presbyterian church in America was organized A.D. 1628, at New Amsterdam (New York). It was a Reformed-Dutch church, and was gathered by the Rev. Jonas Michaelius, then just arrived from Amsterdam in Holland. It was the first Protestant church organized in the western world. The Church of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, Mass., had been organized in Holland. Other churches of this denomination were organized among the Dutch settlements in the New World at an early period in the same century. (See Reformed Church, Dutch.)

EARLY PRESBYTERIANISM IN NEW ENGLAND.—The first settlers of New England were dissenters from the Church of England. They had become known as Brownists, or Radical Independents. They came by the way of Leyden in Holland, and settled at Plymouth, Mass. A different class of refugees from the tyrannizing prelacy of the English Church came over in 1630 and during the next ten years. They were mostly Puritans, men of tender conscience, who scrupled at vestments and ceremonies and popish practices in the church. Many of them were strongly inclined to the Presbyterian way. Had they remained at home, they would have united heartily in the movement, which, during the Commonwealth, made the Church of England a Presbyterian church.

Not long after their settlement at Massachusetts Bay, "divers gentlemen in Scotland," says Cotton Mather (Magnalia, i. 73), wrote to these Puritans to learn "whether they might be there suffered freely to exercise their Presbyterian church government" in the American colony; and it was freely answered that they might. A tract of land near the mouth of the Merrimack River was selected by their agent for the Presbyterian settlement. The emigrants embarked from Scotland, and had traversed half the width of the Atlantic, but were driven back by adverse storms, and returned to the United Kingdom. Presbyterianism proper was thereby put back in its American development half a century.

Many of the New-England ministers and people, at that early period, were either Presbyterians in principle, or well disposed to such as were. The Cambridge (1618) and the Boston (1602) synods made provision for ruling elders in the churches, and favored the consociation of the churches. They were rigidly opposed to Independency, and aimed to establish "a sweet sort of temperance between rigid Presbyterianism and levelling Brownism."

When the "Heads of Agreement" between the Presbyterian and Congregational ministers were assented to at London, A.D. 1680, Cotton Mather affirmed (Magna, ii. 299) that the same "union hath formerly taken place among us, many decades, or years, exemplified in the churches of New England, so far that I believe it is not possible for me to give a truer description of our ecclesiastical constitution (A.D. 1718) than by transcribing thereof the articles of that union." Their platform was so akin to Presbyterianism, that "the Presbyterian ministers of this country," Mather says, "do find it no difficulty to practise the substance of it in and with their several congregations." Writing to Rev. Robert Wodrow, a Presbyterian minister in Scotland, Aug. 8, 1718 (Wodrow: Miscell., ii. 424), he says, "We are comforted with great numbers of our oppressed brethren coming over from the north of Ireland unto us." They were Presbyterians. "They find so very little difference in the management of our churches from theirs and yours as to count it not as a new union now. Nor differ they in any thing the Scotch nation coming over hither have heretofore been invited unto settlements with our churches."

A considerable number of Presbyterians, both ministers and people, it thus appears, emigrated from Great Britain and Ireland to New England during the troubles of the seventeenth century, and were absorbed in the Congregational churches, at that time differing but little, as they thought, from Presbyterian churches. Particularly was it so with the Connecticut churches, where Consociationism, a modified form of Presbyterianism, had generally prevailed. The Hartford North Association, in 1789, affirmed "that the constitution of the churches in the State of Connecticut is not Congregational, but contains the essentials of the Presbyterian Church in America;" and the churches in Connecticut are not now, and never were from the earliest period of our settlement, Congregational churches." They were often spoken of as Presbyterian churches.

Colonies from these churches planted themselves, at an early day, on Long Island and in East Jersey, and the churches which they organized—Southampton (1640), Southold (1641), Elizabethtown (1686), and Newark (1687)—eventually became Presbyterian, almost as soon as they had the opportunity. The church of Jamaica, on Long Island (1682), claims to have been a Presbyterian church at its organization.

The First Presbyterian Church in America.

The persecutions of the Presbyterians in Scotland and Ireland, during the later years of Charles II. (1670-85), compelled many of them to seek shelter beyond the seas. The standing order in New England, both civilly and ecclesiastically, was Congregationalism. In the province of New York the Dutch were of the Holland type of Presbyterianism, and only the Church of England was tolerated among the English. In Virginia also, none but Episcopal churches were recognized by law. A more liberal policy prevailed in East and West Jersey, in Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland. Very naturally, therefore, these emigrants sought refuge where they would be free to exercise their religion; and Presbyterian settlements were formed in these sections in the latter half of the seventeenth century, few and feeble at the best.

Application for a minister was made (1680) to a presbytery in the north of Ireland by one of these companies; and in 1683 the Rev. Francis Makemie was ordained, and sent as a missionary to these scattered sheep in the great American wilderness. He settled at Rehoboth in Maryland, and gathered the people, there and in other settlements round about, into Presbyterian churches. Other ministers were sent out, and were welcomed. Some few came to them also from New England, and took charge, here and there, of a Presbyterian church.

The First Presbytery.—At the opening of the eighteenth century these seven ministers—Makemie, Davis, Wilson, Andrews, Taylor, Macnich, and Hampton—met together (1705) in the Presbyterian church of Philadelphia, Penn., and constituted the Presbytery of Philadelphia,—the first in the New World. The American Presbyterian Church had now taken form, and entered upon a career of widely extended power and usefulness. It was destitute of patronage, and of feeble resources. It was strong only in faith and godliness.

The First Synod.—In 1710 the presbytery numbered eleven ministers. Makemie and Taylor had just died; and Smith, Anderson, Henry, and Wade had been received, in addition to Boyd, whom they had ordained in 1706,—the first Presbyterian ordination in America. They had a small congregation at Elizabeth River, Va., in Maryland, five in Pennsylvania, and two in New Jersey. Six years later (Sept. 22, 1716), they resolved themselves into three presbyteries,—Philadelphia, Newcastle, and Long Island; and constituted the synod of Philadelphia. The church of Scotland in America, seventeen, in the Province of New York they had five churches,—New York, Newtown, Jamaica, Setauket, and Southampton; in New Jersey, four churches,—Freehold, Hopewell, Cohansay, and Cape May; in Pennsylvania, two churches,—Philadelphia and Abington; and, in the regions beyond, six churches,—Newcastle, Patuxent, Rehoboth, Snowhill, White-Clay Creek, and Appoquinting. The two vigorous churches of Elizabeth-town and Newark, N.J., with their pastors, Jonathan Dickinson and Joseph Webb, came in soon afterwards. The ministers had increased to nineteen. During the first ten years twenty-seven had been enrolled, of whom five had died, and three had withdrawn.

Adoption of Doctrinal Standards.—The progress of the church from this date was steady, if not rapid. In 1729 the synod numbered twenty-seven ministers. Fifty-six had been enrolled since 1765, of whom fourteen had died, and fifteen had left the connection. No action had thus far been taken, so far as the records (of which the first leaf is lost) show, in respect to the formal adoption of any standard of doctrine or written creed. As the Church of Scotland had, from the days of the Westminster Assembly of Divines (1648), adopted and professed faith in their Confession of Faith and Catechisms, and as so large a portion, both of the ministers and people, were of Scotch origin, it is to be presumed that both the first presbytery and the synod had adhered to these standards of faith and worship.

But the times called for a decided and open expression of their faith. The alarming prevalence of Arminianism, Pelagianism, Arianism, and Socinianism, among some of the Reformed churches of Europe, and even in Scotland and Ireland, as also, the boldness with which deistical opinions were avowed and disseminated among educated circles at home and abroad, called for the erection of a barrier against the spread of these errors among their ministers and people.

After, therefore, a full and earnest discussion at their annual meeting in 1729, the synod, with a surprising unanimity, by an "Adopting Act," made the Westminster Confession of Faith their standard, "as being, in all the essential and necessary Articles, good forms of sound words and sound doctrine; and their Articles, agreeing, further, that no one should be ordained to the ministry, or received to membership, who had any scruples as to any part of the Confession, save "only about Articles not essential and necessary to doctrine, worship, and government." It was also agreed, that, in respect to such differences, they would treat one another with all due forbearance and kindness.

The First Disruption.—A considerable diversity of theological and ecclesiastical views was developed in these discussions and in subsequent meetings of the synod. A large proportion of the ministers were of foreign birth and education. The native ministry were, for the most part, from New England. The former obtained the appellation of the "Old Side," or the "Old Lights," the latter were the "New Side," or the "New Lights." They differed as to the essential qualifications of candidates for the ministry, and the matter and style of pulpit ministrations. The Old Side laid the greater stress on scholarship: the New Side insisted more on experimental piety. The former were rigid in their demands for a formal study: the latter, in the exigencies of the country and times, were ready to make large exceptions in the case of such as had considerable gifts and a great zeal, if sound in doctrine.

A period of unwonted religious interest and of spiritual revival followed. Not a few of the churches and out of New England were favored with special manifestations of divine grace. Large demands were made upon the ministry. The people were eager to hear. Popular preachers and exhorters were at a premium: they were sent from every quarter. It was a "Great Awakening." That singularly gifted evangelist of the Church of England, George Whitefield, came to America, and traversed the Atlantic coast from Georgia to New Hampshire, preaching everywhere. Great crowds attended his ministrations. The New Side churches were opened to him, and their ministers affiliated with him. The Old Side, if not opposed to the movement, were suspicious and apprehensive, and, for the most part, stood aloof both from Mr. Whitefield and the work.

At the meeting of the synod in 1740, the two parties came into collision in respect to some alleged irregularities on the part, principally, of the Presbytery of New Brunswick, or some of its prominent members. An open rupture ensued in 1741, and the offending presbytery withdrew. After repeated but futile attempts by the more moderate brethren to allay the irritation, and to reconcile the conflicting parties, the synod itself became divided. A considerable number of ministers and churches, including the presbyteries of New York and New Brunswick and a part of that of Newcastle, withdrew in 1745, and organized the synod of New York, — a New-Side synod, — in rivalry, and not in correspondence, with the Old-Side synod of Philadelphia.

The Healing of the Breach.—The latter, at the disruption of the larger body; but the former had the larger sympathy of the people, and rapidly increased in numbers, in resources and influence. The breach was healed in May, 1758. The New Side brought into the union seventy-two ministers and six presbyteries; the Old Side, twenty-two ministers and three presbyteries. The synod of New York and Philadelphia, as the united synod was called, had more than a hundred churches under its care.

In the political agitations that convulsed the British Colonies in America during the next twenty-five years, resulting in the War of the Revolution and the independence of the United States, the Presbyterian Church was a unit in the assertion and defense of civil and religious liberty, and contributed largely towards the triumph of the patriots.

The First General Assembly.—Shortly after the return of peace, measures were taken by the synod for a still further development of Presbyterian principles. The church had been greatly prospered. It was time that a general assembly, as in the Church of Scotland, should be instituted. Three years (1785-88) were given to the careful preparation and adoption of a constitution. The sixteen presbyteries of 1788 were distributed into four synods. —New York, Philadelphia, Virginia, and the Carolinas. A general assembly, composed of commissioners (ministers and elders in equal numbers), from the presbyteries, met at Philadelphia, Penn., in May, 1789. The first Congress of the United States were then holding their first session at New York. The two bodies, as well as their constitutions, are coeval.

In 1779 four of the ministers had withdrawn, on the plea of larger liberty, from the synod, and had (1780) organized the independent presbytery of Morris County. An associated presbytery was formed in 1792, a third in 1793, and a fourth in 1807. They were known as the Associated Presbyteries of Morris County and Westchester, the Northern and the Saratoga Presbyteries. At the end of a single generation they had ended their course, and been absorbed by other bodies.

PLAN OF UNION. — Before the close of the century, the church had extended itself far to the south and west. Its missionaries went everywhere, preaching the word, and gathering churches. To prevent collision with the missionaries from New England, the General Assembly of 1801 entered heartily into a “Plan of Union” with the consoled churches of Connecticut, providing for the orderly organization of churches in settlements of commingled Presbyterians and Congregationalists, and the institution of pastors. The happy influence of this fraternal plan was felt in a large part of the new towns in the States of New York and Ohio, where the two streams of emigration flowed side by side. The church now numbered twenty-six presbyteries, three hundred ministers, and nearly five hundred congregations.

The organization of the Synod of New York, of 1809, was followed by the formation of the Synod of the Ohio, and the Synod of the Southern States, containing parts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Georgia. The Synod of the Ohio was formed in 1811, and embraced a large part of the new towns in the States of New York and Ohio. The Synod of the Southern States, containing parts of Kentucky and Tennessee, was formed in 1814, and was the product of the Great Revival. In some parts of the land, particularly in Kentucky, it was manifested in a union of the Northern and the Saratoga Presbyteries. At the assembly in 1810 the Synod of the Southern States was formed, and two assemblies were organized. The church now numbered twenty-six presbyteries, three hundred ministers, and nearly five hundred congregations.

The Synod of the Southern States was formed in 1814, and was the product of the Great Revival. In some parts of the land, particularly in Kentucky, it was manifested in a union of the Northern and the Saratoga Presbyteries. At the assembly in 1810 the Synod of the Southern States was formed, and two assemblies were organized. The church now numbered twenty-six presbyteries, three hundred ministers, and nearly five hundred congregations.

The Synod of the Southern States was formed in 1814, and was the product of the Great Revival. In some parts of the land, particularly in Kentucky, it was manifested in a union of the Northern and the Saratoga Presbyteries. At the assembly in 1810 the Synod of the Southern States was formed, and two assemblies were organized. The church now numbered twenty-six presbyteries, three hundred ministers, and nearly five hundred congregations.

The Synod of the Southern States was formed in 1814, and was the product of the Great Revival. In some parts of the land, particularly in Kentucky, it was manifested in a union of the Northern and the Saratoga Presbyteries. At the assembly in 1810 the Synod of the Southern States was formed, and two assemblies were organized. The church now numbered twenty-six presbyteries, three hundred ministers, and nearly five hundred congregations.

The Synod of the Southern States was formed in 1814, and was the product of the Great Revival. In some parts of the land, particularly in Kentucky, it was manifested in a union of the Northern and the Saratoga Presbyteries. At the assembly in 1810 the Synod of the Southern States was formed, and two assemblies were organized. The church now numbered twenty-six presbyteries, three hundred ministers, and nearly five hundred congregations.

The Synod of the Southern States was formed in 1814, and was the product of the Great Revival. In some parts of the land, particularly in Kentucky, it was manifested in a union of the Northern and the Saratoga Presbyteries. At the assembly in 1810 the Synod of the Southern States was formed, and two assemblies were organized. The church now numbered twenty-six presbyteries, three hundred ministers, and nearly five hundred congregations.

The Synod of the Southern States was formed in 1814, and was the product of the Great Revival. In some parts of the land, particularly in Kentucky, it was manifested in a union of the Northern and the Saratoga Presbyteries. At the assembly in 1810 the Synod of the Southern States was formed, and two assemblies were organized. The church now numbered twenty-six presbyteries, three hundred ministers, and nearly five hundred congregations.

The Synod of the Southern States was formed in 1814, and was the product of the Great Revival. In some parts of the land, particularly in Kentucky, it was manifested in a union of the Northern and the Saratoga Presbyteries. At the assembly in 1810 the Synod of the Southern States was formed, and two assemblies were organized. The church now numbered twenty-six presbyteries, three hundred ministers, and nearly five hundred congregations.

The Synod of the Southern States was formed in 1814, and was the product of the Great Revival. In some parts of the land, particularly in Kentucky, it was manifested in a union of the Northern and the Saratoga Presbyteries. At the assembly in 1810 the Synod of the Southern States was formed, and two assemblies were organized. The church now numbered twenty-six presbyteries, three hundred ministers, and nearly five hundred congregations.

The Synod of the Southern States was formed in 1814, and was the product of the Great Revival. In some parts of the land, particularly in Kentucky, it was manifested in a union of the Northern and the Saratoga Presbyteries. At the assembly in 1810 the Synod of the Southern States was formed, and two assemblies were organized. The church now numbered twenty-six presbyteries, three hundred ministers, and nearly five hundred congregations.

The Synod of the Southern States was formed in 1814, and was the product of the Great Revival. In some parts of the land, particularly in Kentucky, it was manifested in a union of the Northern and the Saratoga Presbyteries. At the assembly in 1810 the Synod of the Southern States was formed, and two assemblies were organized. The church now numbered twenty-six presbyteries, three hundred ministers, and nearly five hundred congregations.

The Synod of the Southern States was formed in 1814, and was the product of the Great Revival. In some parts of the land, particularly in Kentucky, it was manifested in a union of the Northern and the Saratoga Presbyteries. At the assembly in 1810 the Synod of the Southern States was formed, and two assemblies were organized. The church now numbered twenty-six presbyteries, three hundred ministers, and nearly five hundred congregations.
1822. Together they sat down (1866) at the table of their common Lord, at St. Louis, Mo., and put the seal to their fraternity. A joint commission was from the same time appointed to consider and propose a plan of re-union.

The two assemblies met at New York in May, 1869, and each of them gave their cordial assent to a series of propositions for the merging of the two organizations into one. These proposals were overruled to the presbyteries. At the adjourned meetings of the two assemblies the next November, at Pittsburgh, Penn., the returns from the presbyteries showed an overwhelming majority of each body in favor of the re-union. Thus happily the breach was healed.

The disruption had continued the lifetime of a generation. In May, 1870, the first re-united Assembly met at Philadelphia amid the thanksgivings of the whole church and the congratulations of the sister-churches of the entire world. It was an unparalleled event. The little one had become a great body. For the year 1867, the year previous to the disruption, the ministers numbered 2,110; the churches, 2,865; and the membership, 2,140; the churches, 2,865; and the membership, 2,140; the churches, 2,865; and the membership, 2,140. The people were prepared for it, had long demanded it. The old controversies had died; the prejudices of the past had been buried. Fraternity and unity had taken the place of rivalry and discord. The church has proved itself one in faith and order. The former lines of demarcation have been blotted out. New life has been put into all its activities. The progress of the denomination since 1870 has been marked and gratifying. The ministers in 1882 numbered 5,143; the churches, 5,744; and the membership, 592,128. The contributions to the work of home missions for the year 1882–83 were $504,795.61; the Sunday-schools showed an average annual membership of 654,051. The average annual admission on confession since 1870 has been 32,217. The last General Assembly met May 17, 1883, at Saratoga Springs, N.Y. It was the largest since the reconstruction in 1870. Its whole spirit was exceedingly hopeful and aggressive. Fraternal relations with the Southern Church, the initiative of which was taken the year before, were now fully established by the mutual interchange of delegates and correspondence. Both assemblies, in their hearty congratulations, and to devout thanksgiving. The Book of Discipline, revised by an able committee appointed five years since, was cordially approved, and unanimously commended to the presbyteries for their adoption. A new board for aiding colleges and academies, with a view to an abundant supply of candidates for the ministry, was created with much enthusiasm. The relations of the board of home missions to the presbyteries were, after several years of more or less friction, happily adjusted. Perfect harmony pervaded the councils of the assembly, indicative of undivided counsels in doctrine and a healthful growth in church extension.

The church is now, more than ever, thoroughly organized for aggressive work, having its own boards and commissions, through which it operates in advancing the work of missions at home and abroad, in the building of church-edifices, in the publication and diffusion of a religious and denominational literature, in providing for the relief of its aged and infirm ministry, and in promoting the work of educating its children, and training a godly and scholarly ministry for its pulpits and missions. It has founded and built up colleges all over the land. It has planted and liberally endowed theological seminaries that have no superiors in the world, — Princeton, Union (New York), Auburn, Allegheny, Lane (Cincinnati), North-Western (Chicago), Danville, and San Francisco. It has schools for the education of German preachers at Bloomfield, N.J., and Dubuque, Iowa; and of colored preachers, at Lincoln University, Penn., and Charlotte University, N.C.

E. F. HATFIELD.

THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES (SOUTHERN).

1. Its Origin.— In May, 1861, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church (Old School), which met in Philadelphia, adopted a paper in reference to the civil war, then impending, which undertook to decide for its whole constituency.
of coming from an interested party. A protest eminent statesmen had been divided in opinion whom it represents, to do all that in the lists to or in the people as they were originally formed against this action was presented by the venerable sphere, and usurped the duties of the State.

In this protest it was asserted, “that the paper adopted by the Assembly does decide the political question just stated, in our judgment is undeniable.” It asserts that this body is bound by the Constitution and the Union, but it promises, in the name of all the churches and ministers whom it represents, to do all that in them lies to strengthen, uphold, and encourage the Federal Government. It is, however, a notorious fact, that many of our ministers and members consider this body as not having the allegiance of the citizens of this country, particularly due to the States to which they respectively belong, and that therefore, whenever any State renounces its connection with the United States, and its allegiance with the Constitution, the citizens of that State are bound by the laws of God to continue loyal to their State, and obedient to its laws. The paper adopted by the Assembly, in thus deciding a political question, and in making that decision practically a condition of the Constitution or law of the several States to the contrary notwithstanding. . . . The General Assembly, in thus deciding a political question, and in making that decision practically a condition of the Constitution or law of the several States to the contrary notwithstanding, does, in our judgment, violate the prerogative of its divine Master.”

Presbyterians in the South, coinciding in this view of the case, concluded that a separation from the General Assembly aforesaid was imperatively demanded, not in the spirit of schism, but for the sake of peace, and for the protection of the liberty with which Christ had made them free.

Accordingly, ninety-three ministers and ruling elders, who had been commissioned for that purpose, met in the city of Augusta, Ga., on the 4th of December, 1881, and integrated in one body, under the title of “The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the South,” adopting at the same time as their constitution the standards of their faith and order which they had always held.

After the close of the war, the name of their church was changed to that of “The Presbyterian Church in the United States.”

2. Union with Other Churches. — An organization was formed with the United Synod of the South, by which an accession of about 120 ministers, 199 churches, and 12,000 communicants, was received. This union was effected after careful conference between committees appointed in 1863, and full deliberation by the two bodies in the year following.

In 1869 the synod of Kentucky, which had separated from the Northern Assembly in 1867, was received, including 75 ministers, 137 churches, and 19,540 communicants. In 1874 the synod of Missouri, which had been united in like manner was received, including 67 ministers, 141 churches, and 8,000 communicants. In addition to these was the accession of the presbytery of Patapsco, in 1867, consisting of 6 ministers, 3 churches, and 576 communicants, formerly connected with the synod of Baltimore.

3. Benevolent Operations. — The Southern General Assembly does not consider its benevolent work by means of boards empowered to plan and direct what shall be done, but by committees, of which their respective secretaries are ex officio members, all elected annually by the assembly, directly responsible to it, and acting as executive agents under its instructions.

(1) The whole missionary force consists of 106 persons, of whom 15 are native ordained preachers, and 34 are native assistants, variously employed. The missions are established in China, South America, Greece, Italy, Mexico, and among the Choctaw and Cherokee Indians. In the Empire of Brazil there is a flourishing college, under the control of the missionaries, to which the sons of many gentlemen of the National Church are sent, not because of any sympathy with Protestantism, but because of the intrinsic value of the education to be obtained there.

The receipts for 1882-83 from all sources were $69,000, of which the Sabbath schools contributed nearly $7,000.

(2) Home Missions. — This field is of vast extent, and becoming more important every day because of the steadily rising tide of immigration from Europe and the Northern States. Contributions to home missions are distributed among what is called Sustentation, the Evangelistic Fund, Invalid Fund, and the Mission Fund (partly for the colored people), and the amount of these missions for 1882-83 amounted to $67,000, a gain of $13,000 over the previous year. This agency has not only strengthened many weak churches, but has aided in the organization of others in destitute places, and has been one of the most efficient instruments in advancing the progress and prosperity of the Presbyterian Church in the South.

(3) Publication. — This enterprise was undertaken by a great financial trouble in 1877, but is now emerging from its embarrassments. The receipts from churches, Sabbath schools, and all other sources, for 1882-83, amounted to $14,000.

(4) Education. — The whole number of students aided in 1882-83 in their preparation for the ministry was 123, from 41 presbyteries. Aggregate receipts for 1882-83, $13,000.

4. Institutions of Learning. (1) Union Theological Seminary, in Prince Edward County, Va.: established in 1821, under the care of the synods of Virginia and North Carolina; the Assembly having general supervisory power. Students in 1882-83, 56; professors, 4. Measures for the endowment of a fifth professorship have been adopted. The total amount of investments reported in April, 1883, was $231,000, yielding an income of $15,000.

2. Theological Seminary at Columbia, S.C., under the care of the synods of South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama; the Assembly having a supervision, as with Union Theological Seminary, Virginia. This institution, which was closed for two years, was re-opened in September, 1882, with encouraging prospects of future prosperity.

3. Institute for Training Colored Ministers.—Established in Tuscaloosa, Ala., in 1877. Professors; 2; students, 31. This institution is steadily growing in the confidence of the church and in the appreciation of the colored people.

4. Other Institutions, not Theological, but acknowledged Presbyterian in their character and management, are Hampden-Sidney College, Virginia; Davidson College, North Carolina; Adger College, South Carolina; Central University, Kentucky; Westminster College, Missouri; South-Western Presbyterian University, Tennessee; and the King's College, Tennessee; and Austin College, Texas.

5. Church Principles.—Holding, in common with other branches of the Presbyterian family, the Westminster Confession and Catechisms, the Southern Church lays special emphasis on the Westminster Confession and Catechisms, the

6. The Spirituality of the Church.—"Synods and Councils are to handle nothing but which is ecclesiastical."

7. Ecclesiastical Power.—"While the source of power, in all the courts alike, is Jesus, who rules in them and through them, yet the Constitution, in accordance with the word of God, assigns the courts respectively their several powers and duties, and prescribes the mode in which these powers are to be exercised. Therefore the claim by any court to exercise powers not assigned to it is a breach of the Constitutional Covenant between the several parties thereto."

8. Fraternal Relations.—Reference having been made to the causes of separation between the churches North and South, it is proper, in conclusion, to state the present relations of these bodies to each other. The Southern Assembly, which met at Atlanta, Ga., in 1883, and the Northern Assembly, in session at the same time at Springfield, Ill., "in order to remove all difficulties in the way of a full and fraternal correspondence," each adopted a minute, "mutatis mutandis, for their reciprocal concurrence, as affording a basis for the exchange of delegates."

In accordance with this action, each assembly appointed delegates to attend the meeting of the other assembly, to convey "its cordial Christian salutations" and "the expression of its warm fraternal regard."

The delegates appointed performed the duty assigned to them in May, 1883; the Northern Assembly meeting at Saratoga, N.Y., and the Southern at Lexington, Ky.

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH. See art.

THE SYNOD OF THE REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN NORTH AMERICA.—Reformed Presbyterians, or Covenanters, claim to be the lineal ecclesiastical descendants of that part of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland which refused to accept of the Revolution settlement of 1688. Finding that that famous arrangement contained Erastian elements, and failed to embody many of those principles for which they had strenuously contended from the days of Knox, and in defence of which they had recently suffered a bloody persecution of twenty-eight years, the more faithful of the Covenanters refused to give their adherence to its terms.

Standing aloof from the "Establishment," they remained a small but zealous and independent body. Emigrating to North America in small numbers, they settled here and there, mostly in the Atlantic States from Vermont to South Carolina. Ministers sent out from the mother-church in Scotland travelled through these settlements, preaching, and administering the ordinances. The first Reformed Presbytery of North America was constituted in 1798 in the city of Philadelphia; and the synod was constituted in the same city in 1809. With the exception of an unfortunate collision, which took place in 1833, with reference to the relations of the members of the church to the civil institutions of the country, the growth of this small Presbyterian church has been steady, although not rapid. The church has now 112 ministers, 10 presbyteries, 124 congregations, and 12,700 members. The contributions reported in 1882 were at the rate of $18 per member to all purposes, $1.50 per member to foreign missions, and $2.50 to home missions. It has a theological seminary with 3 professors and 20 students, a college with 6 professors and 100 students, a mission school and church among the Freedmen in Selma (Ala.), a Chinese mission church and school in San Francisco, and 6 large Chinese mission schools in city congregations. The foreign mission in Latakia, Syria, has 4 ministers, 1 physician, 3 lady-teachers, 1 adult, and 30 native helpers, 2 boarding-schools, 21 day-schools, 600 pupils, a congregation with 125 communicants, and a theological class with 8 students.

This church adheres to the Westminster Confession of Faith as her chief doctrinal standard, accepting it as it was originally received by the Church of Scotland; that is, with explanations as to her understanding of certain portions of the Confession concerning the power of the civil magistrate in ecclesiastical matters. Attaching great importance to the duty of testifying against prevalent errors as a "witnessing" church, she has published a testimony (Reformation Principles Exhibited), declaring the doctrines accepted, and denying the contrary errors condemned. As the name "Covenanter" indicates, and in accordance with her past history, the church holds, as a prime article of her creed, that public social covenants are a duty obligatory upon churches and nations in New-Testament times; and that the obligations of these bonds, owing to the organic unity of the church, are binding upon all represented in the taking of them until the ends contemplated by them have been accomplished. In accordance with this principle, the bond of a covenant having been carefully prepared, and having been sent down in outburst to the sessions and presbyteries, and by them with great unanimity approved, it was solemnly sworn and subscribed by the synod in the city of Pittsburgh in 1871, and soon after by the various congregations of the church. This covenant was intended to embody the principles of the National Covenant of Scotland, and of the Solemn League and Covenant, so far as they are applicable in this land. These subordinate standards are held as authoritative only in so far as they are agreeable unto, and founded upon, the supreme standard,—the word of God.

In point of government, this church differs in no essential element from other Presbyterian churches. More recently she has, with marked advantage, revived the office of the deacon, which had unfortunately fallen into desuetude among the Presbyterian bodies, limiting, however, the functions of this office to the oversight of the temporalities of the church. Strictly adhering to the Reformation principle, what is not appointed by God in his worship is forbidden, and finding no warrant for the use of instruments of music, or of hymns of human composition, Reformed Presbyterians praise God only in the use of the psalms of inspiration, and without organs, or instruments of any kind.

This church has co-operated freely with all the prominent reforms of the age. Organized at first, even in the Southern States, upon a strictly antislavery basis, and rigidly excluding all slaveholders from her communion, her ministers and people warmly espoused the cause of emancipation, and bore constant and consistent testimony against the evil of slavery. The temperance reform meets her earnest approval. The manufacture, sale, and use, as a beverage, of all intoxicating drinks, are forbidden by positive enactments. Any member indulging in any of these practices exposes himself to the censures of the church. Believing secret oath-bound associations of all descriptions to be unscriptural, and dangerous in their tendencies, she testifies against, and forbids all connection with, them as necessarily entangling, and inconsistent with the higher allegiance due to the Church of Christ.

The more special and distinctive principle of this church, the one in which she differs from all others, is her practical protest against the secular character of the United States Constitution. Holding to the universal headship of Christ, and that civil government is a divine ordinance, and one of the "all things" put under him as the Mediatorial Ruler of the universe, and that to him the allegiance of all nations is due, Reformed Presbyterians refuse close incorporation with any government which does not in some form recognize these principles, and give the effective expression in its legislation. On examination of the United States Constitution, that remarkable document is found to contain no recognition of God as the source of all legitimate civil authority, nor of his law as supreme above all human laws, nor of his Son as governor among the nations, nor in any form of the scriptural principle, "Let the powers that be are ordained of God;" but, on the contrary, the preamble, "We the people do ordain this Constitution," seems to arrogate to the people that which is claimed by the apostle as a prerogative of God. The Constitution does not recognize the Bible, the Christian sabbath, Christian morality, Christian qualifications for civil officials, and gives no legal basis for any Christian feature in the administration of government. This covenant she has condemned. Reformed Presbyterians refuse to take the oath to the Constitution, or perform any civil act that involves the oath; such as voting for officers who are required to swear to the Constitution as a condition of performing the functions of their office.

Civil acts that do not involve the oath to the Constitution, they freely perform. Believing that the law of Christ requires them to live quiet and peaceable lives, they endeavor, in all good conscience, to conduct themselves as useful members of the Commonwealth, bearing with cheerfulness their share of the public burdens, and doing all in their power to advance the best interests of their country. They take the deepest interest in that reform movement which has for its object the amendment of the United States Constitution in those particulars in which they consider it defective. Indeed, they feel specially called to aid in its success, at whatever cost or personal sacrifice, deeming that when these proposed amendments to the Constitution shall have been incorporated in that document, and not until then, we shall have a truly Christian government, and our beloved country be indeed a kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ.

The Westminster Confession of Faith (William S. Renyold, Philadelphia, and Scotch editions); The National Covenant of Scotland; The Solemn League and Covenant, The Form of Church Government, and Directory for Worship: The Larger and Shorter Catechisms;—all these are bound together as one book. In this country and in the present century, the church has prepared the following statements of its present position: Reformation Principles, as a statement, Book of Government and Discipline (revised in 1862), Covenant (sworn to by the synod in Pittsburgh in 1871). J. R. W. Sloane.
junction with other steps of reformation, the foundation of the Reformed Presbyterian Church was laid. After the union of the crowns of Scotland and England in the person of James VI., in 1603, this monarch claimed to be the head of the church, and alleged that "presbytery was fit only for a nation of republicans." In 1617 he attempted to impose upon the church the ceremonies of the English Church. Charles I. followed his predecessor in acts of tyranny. In 1637 the Liturgy of the Service-Book was ordered to be introduced into the churches of Scotland. The result was the great moral revolution of 1638, when the "National Covenant" was renewed, with additions. To resist pretatic innovation, and preserve and further the Reformed religion in the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, in 1643 the Solemn League and Covenant was adopted, and became part of the Constitution of Britain.

About this time the term "Covenanter" began to be applied to the Reformed Presbyterians of Scotland. In 1647-48 the Westminster Confession of Faith, and Catechisms, Larger and Shorter, were adopted by the Reformed Church of Scotland. By the passing of several supplementary acts to the first and second Books of Discipline in 1649, the General Assembly placed the cope-stone upon the work of Reformation; and the Reformed Presbyterian Church stood forth, the grand outcome of persevering struggle for the church's independence and the Mediator's headship.

The execution of Charles I. and the proclamation of Charles II. as his successor to the crown of Britain followed. After the restoration of the latter sovereign, he proceeded to restore Prelacy in Scotland. The church was divided into factions, and twenty-eight years of persecution ensued. Many succumbed to the storm. A few remained faithful, and by their fidelity became the true exponents of the church's faith as held from 1638 to 1649. Among them Richard Cameron and Donald Cargill appeared prominent. In the year 1680 they published the Sanquhar Declaration, in which the ground was taken, that when a sovereign violates his solemn engagements with his subjects, and becomes a tyrant, the people are released from their allegiance, and no longer bound to support and defend him. Although the abettors of this sentiment were accused of treason, and adjudged worthy of death, in less than ten years the entire British nation indorsed the position by the joint coronation of William and Mary in 1689; and the same principle lay at the foundation of the American Revolution in 1776. These men might be thought stern and uncompromising in their religious principles; but they understood the value of civil and religious liberty, and, far ahead of their age, they uttered the sentiments which finds to-day an echo on both sides of the Atlantic.

At the accession of William and Mary, by the terms of the revolution settlement, Episcopacy was established in England and Ireland, and Presbyterianism in Scotland. By this arrangement, royal supremacy over the church, against which the true Covenanters had so long struggled, was preserved. From it, those, principally, who had suffered for refusing allegiance to the tyranny of the house of Stuart, dissented. Among other reasons of dissent, one was, that, by the settlement, the civil magistrate usurped an authority over the church which virtually destroyed her independence, and which was inconsistent with the sole headship of the Mediator. For more than sixteen years these people remained without a ministry, organizing themselves into praying societies, and endeavoring to adhere to the church's position during the "second reformation." In the year 1706 Rev. John McMillan acceded to their fellowship from the Established Church. In the year 1743 Rev. Mr. Nairn became identified with them. The same year these two ministers, with ruling elders, constituted the Reformed Presbytery. Through this body, Reformed Presbyterians in Scotland, Ireland, British America, and the United States, have received their ministry. In 1752 Rev. Mr. Guthbertson arrived in America from the Reformed Presbytery of Scotland. He was joined by Rev. Messrs. Lind and Dobbin from the Reformed Presbytery of Ireland. By these a presbytery was formed in 1774, and the Reformed Presbyterian Church took her position as a distinct ecclesiastical body in North America. In 1792 this presbytery was disorganized by its union with a presbytery of the Associate Church. The result was, that a portion of the Associate Church and a large number of the people of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, did not approve of the union. The existence of three distinct organizations, instead of two, was the outcome.

At various intervals within about ten years from the above period, Revs. Reid, McGarrah, King, and McKinney, were commissioned by their respective presbyteries in Scotland and Ireland to manage judicially the concerns of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in the United States. In 1798, in the city of Philadelphia, Rev. Messrs. McKinney and Gibson, with ruling elders, reconstituted the Reformed Presbytery of the United States of North America. At this time the church was scattered over the United States from South Carolina to Vermont, and westward as far as the State of Ohio. The presbytery was divided into three committees. In 1809 the Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church was constituted in the city of Philadelphia, and the three committees of presbytery formed into presbyteries. In 1823 it was thought desirable to give the supreme judicatory a representative character. As a consequence, the General Synod was formed, the constituency of which is taken from the presbyteries according to a certain ratio. Among the members of synod, some held that the Constitution of the United States is infidel and immoral, and that Reformed Presbyterians could not consistently hold office or vote under its provisions. Others believed that it was defective, but not so much so as to make it impossible of accommodation. In the year 1831 this matter was made a subject of "free discussions." But in 1833, when General Synod met, a number of ministers, with adherents, refused to discuss the subject further, and withdrew from General Synod. The synod was thus diminished in numbers.

The doctrinal principles of General Synod are embodied in the Westminster Confession of Faith, Catechisms (Larger and Shorter), and Reformation Principles exhibited. The Book of Psalms, in the best attainable version,—prose or metrical, or both,—is the matter of praise in this church. Sealing ordinances are extended only to those who subscribe to the symbols of the church's faith, and submit to her authority.

The design of this is, not to unchurch any other denomination of Christians, but to maintain good order. Of this the training of children, and practical godliness, have always been reckoned matters of supreme moment in this church. The General Synod is represented in the Presbyterian Alliance, and has under its care 6 presbyteries, 40 ministers and licentiates, 45 congregations, 6,600 communicants, and about 4,000 sabbath-school scholars. To General Synod also belong one theological seminary, located in Philadelphia, and organized in 1808, and one foreign mission-station in Northern India, commenced in 1836, besides domestic mission-stations in British America and the United States.

The United Presbyterian Church of North America is descended from the Presbyterian churches of Scotland and Ireland. As early as 1742, petitions for a supply of ministers were sent from Lancaster and Chester Counties, Penn., to the Associate Presbytery, which the Revs. Ebenezer Erskine, Alexander Moncrieff, William Wilson, and James Fisher had organized in 1739. These petitions were repeated until 1753, when the Associate Synod, which had been formed in the mean time, sent out the Revs. Alexander Gellatly and Andrew Arnott. These men came, and on the 2d of November, 1753, they organized, as they had been instructed to do, the Associate Presbytery of Pennsylvania, subordinate to the Associate Synod of Scotland.

About the year 1750, and in answer to similar petitions, the Reformed Presbytery of Scotland sent out Rev. John Cuthbertson to the same general field. He was afterwards joined by Rev. Matthew Lind and Rev. Alexander Dobbin, from Ireland, and on the 10th of March, 1774, these three ministers constituted the Reformed Presbyterian Presbytery of America. Eight years after, or on the 10th of June, 1782, an agreement was made by all the Reformed Presbyterians and a large part of the Associate members and congregations to form a union. That union was consummated on the first day of the following November, in Philadelphia, by the organization of a synod, which took the names of the uniting parties, and was styled "The Synod of the Associate Reformed Church." Order of nominations, ministers and congregations did not enter into this union, and thus there were now the Associate and Associate Reformed churches. Each had its profession and usages, largely in common with the churches from which they had sprung abroad; and for over three-quarters of a century each pursued its own course. Often, however, it was felt that churches so nearly the same in their history, profession, and work, ought to be organically one, and might thus accomplish far more. Accordingly, in May, 1842, delegates from the respective synods met in Phila-delphia, and entered upon negotiations, which were carried on until May 26, 1858, when, after much deliberation and prayer, a union was happily consummated between these churches, in the City Hall, Pittsburgh, Penn., and the body thus formed was called "The United Presbyterian Church of North America."

The basis of this union, which constitutes the standing profession of the United Church, was the Westminster Confession of Faith, with a modification of the chapters on the power of the civil magistrate (circa sacra), the Catechisms ( Larger and Shorter), and a Judicial Testimony. This testimony contained eighteen declarations, which are explanatory of the sense in which the Confession of Faith and the Catechisms are understood, and are to be maintained. Most of these are held by evangelical Christians generally; but there are five which quite largely distinguish this church from others. These are as follows:

We declare That slaveholding, that is, the holding of unfree human beings in involuntary bondage, and considering and treating them as property, and subject to be bought and sold, is contrary to the law of God, and contrary both to the letter and spirit of Christianity.

We declare That all associations, whether formed for political or benevolent purposes, which impose upon their members an oath of secrecy, or an obligation to obey a code of unknown laws, are inconsistent with the genius and spirit of Christianity, and church-members ought not to have fellowship with such associations.

We declare That the Church should not extend communion in sealing ordinances to those who refuse adherence to her profession, or subject to her government and discipline, or who refuse to forsake a communion which is inconsistent with the profession that she makes, nor should communion in any ordinances of worship be held in such circumstances as would be inconsistent with keeping of these ordinances pure and entire, or such practice conducive to any corruption of the doctrines or institutions of Christ.

We declare That public social covenanting is a moral duty, the observance of which is not required at stated times, but on extraordinary occasions, as the providence of God and the circumstances of the church may indicate. It is reasonable in times of great danger to the Church, in times of exposure to backsliding, or in times of reformation, when the Church is returning to God from a state of backsliding. When the Church has entered into such important transactions, they continue to bind posterity faithfully to adhere to and prosecute the grand object for which such engagements were entered into.

We declare That it is the will of God that the songs contained in the Book of Psalms be sung in his worship, both public and private, to the end of the world; and, in singing God's praise, these songs should be employed, to the exclusion of the devotional compositions of uninspired men.

In due time the United Church adopted a Book of Government and Discipline and a Directory for Worship, and incorporated them with its standards. All these, viz., the Confession of Faith, the Catechisms, the Book of Government and Discipline, and the Directory for Worship, became the law of the church, and are required to be subscribed by ministers, elders, and all who become members. There is one profession or law for officers and members, and it is binding upon all alike.

In its government this church is Presbyterian. Its supreme court is a general assembly, which consists of commissioners from all the presbyteries, and meets once a year.
In worship, it uses only the psalms of the Bible. Its principle is, that these psalms are the only divinely authorized matter of praise. It accepts the metrical version of the Church of Scotland, and has prepared a revised and amended one, with a hundred and thirty-eight new versions of a hundred and seventeen psalms, and a much larger number of metres. Congregational singing is everywhere strictly enjoined.

Both parts of this church took steps early in their history for the training of an able ministry, and to them belongs the honor of organizing the first theological seminaries in this country. Those at Andover, Mass., and Princeton, N.J., were founded in 1808 and 1812 respectively; but in 1791 the Associate Church appointed Rev. John Anderson, D.D., professor of theology, and organized and located a theological seminary at Service Creek, Pa., ten years afterwards, or in 1804, the Associate Reformed Synod appointed Rev. John M. Mason, D.D., its professor, and prepared a constitution and course of study for a theological seminary, which it located in the city of New York, and formally opened in November, 1805. Other Presbyterianism was introduced into the United States of America by a minister of the Reformed Dutch Church of the Province of New York, and formally opened in November, 1805.

Foreign missions have been successively carried on in Trinidad, Syria, India, Egypt, and China. Believing, however, that more could be accomplished by concentrating its forces and its funds, this church limits its foreign work now to India and Egypt. In these two missions it has (January, 1883) 17 ordained foreign and 19 native ministers and presbyters, 31 female missionaries, and 192 native teachers and helpers, a total of 259 laborers. It has 22 organized churches, 1,009 communicants, 4,031 pupils in the schools, mission property valued at $101,325, and an expenditure the past year (1882) of $77,008.86. There were 401 natives brought during the year to confess Christ, or about 23 for each of the foreign missionaries. In this church the board recommends new missionaries; but in all cases the General Assembly appoints them, and directs the number that shall be sent.

The other boards are doing respectively the work their several titles imply, and at an estimated expenditure of $111,500 for this year.

In this church there are two weekly newspapers, two monthlies, and a valuable series of Sabbath-school publications.

The Presbyterian Church extends into 21 States, and has 1 presbytery in Canada, Egypt, and India, each. At its first General Assembly, in May, 1859, it had 5 synods, 42 presbyteries, 408 ministers, 56 licentiates, 55,547 communicants, and about $200,000 raised for its work. In May, 1888, it had 9 synods, 60 presbyteries, 730 ministers, 43 licentiates, 839 congregations, 65,443 communicants, and $930,125 contributed for its work.

Such is the United Presbyterian Church. In its place, and as a part of the visible body of Christ, it steadily holds on its way, bearing ever the banner that was unfurled at its organization, having inscribed on one side, "The Truth of God," and, on the other, "Forbearance in Love." J. B. DALES.

UNITED SYNOD SOUTH. See Presbyterian Church in the U. S. (Southern).

VI. In Canada.— The Dominion of Canada, extending from ocean to ocean, embracing an area equal to that of the United States of America, and almost equal to the whole of Europe, is divided into nine Provinces, each having a local Legislature, and all, except Newfoundland, united in a general confederation, whose seat of government is at Ottawa. Into each of these Provinces, Presbyterianism was introduced by the first settlers. About the middle of the eighteenth century, some Presbyterian ministers began to labor in Nova Scotia and Quebec. After the war between France and England, which resulted in the cession of the Canadas to the British in 1760, not a few of the disbanded soldiers, and a number of emigrants from Scotland, settled in the Maritime Provinces. At the close of the war of the Revolution, a large number of New England immigrants went to the Provinces, and gave character to the settlement of the country. As there were several divisions in the Presbyterian Church in Scotland, the colonists brought with them their historical prejudices and preferences; so that, from the beginning, the Presbyterian Church in the Dominion was divided into sections. The first ministers and missionaries came chiefly from the Secession Church. Some ministers before the end of the eighteenth century came from the Presbyterian and Reformed Dutch churches of the United States of America. The Rev. Robert McDowell of the classes of Albany labored most extensively in the Province of Ontario from 1788 to 1841, and organized not a few congregations. The first congregation in Montreal was formed by a minister of the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America; and the first one in Toronto, by a minister of the Reformed Dutch Church. In 1769 Rev. Messrs. Smith and Cock, from the Associate Synod of Scotland, began the real work of building up the Presbyterian Church in Nova Scotia, and formed the Burgher Presbyterian Church. Afterwards, Mr. James McGrigor, from the Secession Church of Scotland, came to Pictou, and labored very abundantly and successfully, and formed the Anti-Burgher Presbyterian Church of Pictou. Ministers from the Kirk of Scotland came later, and gathered congregations in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, in connection with the Church of Scotland. In 1844, after the great disruption of the parent church in Scotland, these congregations were divided: some formed the Free Church, and some remained still in connection with the Old Kirk.

About the beginning of the present century,
Messrs. McGrigor, Brown, Ross, and McCulloch were the evangelists of Eastern Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Cape Breton, and New Brunswick, and formed congregations in each of these Provinces.

About 1765 Rev. George Henry, as chaplain to the troops, preached to a small congregation in the ancient city of Quebec; and in 1770 Mr. Bethune preached in Montreal and in the County of Glengary. In 1787 the first congregation, composed of pious soldiers and a few civilians, was formed in Quebec; and about 1790 a congregation was formed in Montreal, which obtained Rev. Mr. Young of the Presbytery of Albany, N.Y., as their first minister. In 1793 the first presbytery was formed, and consisted of three ministers with their elders, and was styled "The Presbytery of Montreal," claiming connection with no other church. In 1792 St. Gabriel-street Church was built, which is probably the oldest Protestant church in Canada. In 1818 an attempt was made to unite all the Presbyterian congregations into one church. This laudable endeavor failed, as the ministers from the Kirk of Scotland stood entirely aloof from the movement. It was, however, the earnest and prelude to what has been achieved in later days. One party formed themselves into the United Synod; and the others constituted the three presbyteries, Cornwall, Perth, and Niagara, assuming next year the title of "The United Synod of Upper Canada."

In 1825 the Glasgow Colonial Society was formed, which sent out many ministers both to the Maritime Provinces and to the Canadas, so that the number of ministers in connection with the Kirk of Scotland rapidly increased; and in 1840 the United Synod, comprising 18 ministers, joined them. In 1833 three ministers—Messrs. Robertson, Proudfoot, and Christie—were sent out as missionaries of the United Seccession. They were soon followed by others, and in 1834 they formed the Missionary Presbytery of the Canadas. The roll contains the names of nine ministers, of whom the venerable Dr. William Frazer, for many years, and still, an efficient clerk of the highest court of the church, now alone remains. When the number of ministers had increased to 18, and congregations to 35, they formed the Missionary Synod of Canada. When the Secession and Relief churches united in Scotland, in 1847, they changed the name to "United Presbyterian Synod in Canada," embracing 26 ministers and 50 congregations.

In 1844, owing to the disruption of the Kirk of Scotland, a division took place in Canada, and 25 of the 91 ministers of the Church of Scotland in Canada separated, and formed the Presbyterian Church of Canada (Free Church). This church, fresh from convocation, great and small, had 26 ministers in 1844, increased to 169 in 1861, when a union was consummated between them and the United Presbyterian Church. This union, so happy in its results, led to a desire on the part of many for a still more comprehensive union, embracing all the Presbyterians in the Dominion.

The history of Presbyterianism in the Dominion has been one of agreement and union, as well as of difference and separation. All sections of the church held as their common creed the Westminster Confession and Catechisms, and observed the same forms and order of service. Their differences chiefly arose from their association with the churches in Scotland, and from the natural tendency to adhere to the customs and practices of the old land, to which they had been accustomed. A very strong desire had ever been cherished by her best ministers and members for a united church, characterized in the best sense of the word, that is, including all in the land holding the same faith and polity. In 1870, besides a few congregations connected with churches in the United States of America, there were four distinct Presbyterian churches in the Dominion. Measures were then inaugurated to effect a union of them all, and this was happily consummated in 1873.

The following presents a view of the different unions which led to the last, most desirable result:

In 1817 the Burgher Presbytery of Truro and the Anti-Burgher Presbytery of Pictou united, and formed the Presbyterian Church of Nova Scotia.

In 1840 the United Synod of Upper Canada united with the synod in connection with the Church of Scotland.

In 1860 the Presbyterian Church of Nova Scotia and the Free Church united, and formed one church.

In 1861 the Presbyterian Church of Canada and the United Presbyterian Church in Canada formed a union under the title "The Canada Presbyterian Church."

In 1866 a union between churches in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick formed the Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces.

In 1868 the synods of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, in connection with the Church of Scotland, formed one synod.

As early as 1851, ministers were sent to the Red River settlement, and lately, as settlers have gone thither in great numbers, the church has made marked progress. The church has made marked progress since, in every element of substantial prosperity. As early as 1851, ministers were sent to the Red River settlement, and lately, as settlers have gone thither in great numbers, the church has followed them, and there are to-day in Manitoba 48 congregations, to each of which are attached from one to six preaching-stations. There are 14 settled ministers and professors, over 40 missionaries, and a college, to which will soon be added a theological seminary. At the meeting of the General Assembly in June, 1888, Rev. J. M. King, D.D., of Toronto, was appointed principal of the college, and professor of theology. This appointment he has since accepted.
In British Columbia and Vancouver's Island the congregations which have been connected with different churches in Britain and Canada will probably very soon be a part of the one church of the Dominion.

In the Work of Home Missions the church is actively and extensively engaged. Over 100 congregations are aided in various ways. Over 200 stations are supplied with preaching: 64 ordained ministers and probationers, 84 students, and 60 catechists are employed. In 1882 more than $50,000 were raised for this work. In addition to this, an extensive work is carried on among the French population. 64 ministers — ministers, missionaries, teachers, colportors, and Bible women — are engaged in this branch of the work, for which more than $20,000 were expended in 1882.

The Foreign Mission Work of the church is also prosecuted with vigor, and liberally sustained. Missions in the New Hebrides, Central India, China, and Trinidad, and among the Indians in the late operations, are prosperous in every way. The contribution of the church for these missions is over $50,000 annually.

In the five theological seminaries — at Halifax, Quebec, Montreal, Kingston, and Toronto — there are 12 professors and a number of lecturers, and more than 100 students. Besides commodious buildings, libraries, etc., contributions to the amount of half a million dollars have been raised. Nearly one-half of the ministers of the church have been trained in their own institutions.

With an earnest and devoted ministry, and ample facilities for training as many as may be required, an intelligent membership, who are becoming every year more able and more willing to contribute, with her generous far-reaching plans for mission-work both at home and abroad, the Presbyterian Church in Canada, though as yet only in her teens, is a fair, healthy, helpful daughter in the great Presbyterian family of Christendom.

A History of Presbyterianism in Canada, in 2 vols., by Professor Gregg of Knox College, Toronto, is announced. WILLIAM ORMiston.

In Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania. See those arts.

Presbyterianism is both a faith and a form, for each of which it claims scriptural precept and sanction.

I. Principles. — 1. Form of Government. Presbyterianism derives its name from its form of government, its πρεσβυτηρίων (its "eldership"). The word πρεσβυτηρίων ("prebiter, elder "), in its several inflections, occurs in the New Testament seventy-one times. In ten or twelve instances it denotes age or social position: in all the others it indicates official position or character.

The whole Jewish people were familiar with the term. In the gospel narrative, frequent mention is made of "the elders of the Jews." "The elders of the people," "the scribes and the elders," "the chief priests and the elders," and "the elders" simply. In Luke xxiii. 66, το πρεσβυτηρίων το λαοῦ ("the presbytery of the people") is spoken of. Paul speaks (Acts xxii. 5) of κατο το πρεσβυτηρίων ("all the presbytery, the "eldership").

A distinction of men, not of ordinances — is thus indicated. They are spoken of everywhere in their sacred writings. Chosen ordinarily from the more mature period of life, they were called in the Hebrew tongue דֶּן, יְהוָה, "elders." In the Septuagint, the Greek version of the Old Testament, they are called πρεσβυτηρίου ("presbyter")...
PRESBYTERIANISM.

In writing to the church at Philippi, he makes special mention of their "bishops and deacons" (Phil. i. 1); the elders among the Greek churches being commonly known as bishops, overseers. As Epaphroditus had succeeded Paul and Luke in the work of preaching at Philippi, it is claimed that the church of that place was in form a Presbyterian church.

It is further to be observed, that these elders are in no one instance spoken of as preachers, or instructed, as Timothy and Titus were specifically, in the art of preaching. The bishops, overseers, elders, whom those presbyters were to ordain in every city, were not students, scholars, young men just setting out in the world: but, on the other hand, they were men of family, citizens of the place, tradesmen, mechanics, workmen, men of business, of good repute, of note and influence among their townsmen, grave senators, if such there were among the converts, men of good judgment, capable of giving advice (διδάσκαλοι), good, hospitable, exemplary men, well adapted to take the oversight of their fellow Christians, and to exercise discipline in the church. The elders are appointed to rule the church, ποιούμενοι τὸν ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ Θεοῦ (Acts xx. 28), the work that had belonged to the eldership among the Jews from time immemorial.

Not a few Presbyterians, therefore, claim that those elders were rulers merely, and not preachers. They affirm that the very same qualifications are now required of the ruling elder as are specified in the instructions given to Timothy and Titus relative to the bishops, the elders, of their day; that the work of preaching is nowhere assigned to any ecclesiastical office. They give a broader significance to the words διδάσκαλοι and ποιούμενοι, as implying a fitness to rule the church, i.e., to take care of the body of Christ, and to perform the work of a pastor in the largest sense. They refer to 1 Tim. v. 17, where a distinction is made between "the elders that rule well" (καλῶς προετριμμένοις) and "they who labor in the word and doctrine" (οἱ κοσμῆται ἐν λόγῳ καὶ δοσισμοί). They maintain that the latter were distinctively preachers of the Word, and that therefore there were two kinds of elders, —ruling elders and teaching elders, and that the latter were the ruling elders of the churches. It is also taken for granted that the Christian elders, as the successors of the Jewish elders, had charge of public worship as well as discipline, and took charge of the reading of Scripture and exhortation (i.e., of preaching). It is quite natural, however, to suppose that the elders, who appear always in a plurality in a congregation, were not equally gifted, and distributed their various functions among themselves according to their ability.

Nor was preaching in the apostolic age confined to any ecclesiastical office.

In his Epistle to Titus, Paul gives him specific instructions as to the qualifications of the elders, whom he was to ordain in every one of the hundred cities of Crete, when a Christian church was gathered among the Gentiles, composed, in part at least, in most cases, of Jewish converts, as well as Gentiles, they too were constituted after the same model. When Barnabas and Saul went through Asia Minor, preaching the gospel, they "ordained them elders in every church" (Acts x. 31); and a presbyter ("the presbyter") and a bishop ("the bishop") and a deacon ("the deacon") were convertible terms, as were "bishop" and "elder." In giving Timothy instructions as to the kind of overseers, as he had done in the case of Titus, it is quite natural, however, to suppose that the elders, who appear always in a plurality in a congregation, were not equally gifted, and distributed their various functions among themselves according to their ability.

Nor was preaching in the apostolic age confined to any ecclesiastical office.

Presbyterianism further claims, that ἄρτιπόσκος ("the bishop") and ἀρχιτρόπος ("the presbyter") are equivalent terms, designating the same office; the former being used only in the case of the Greek or Gentile churches, and occurring but five times in the New Testament. In one of those instances it is used of Christ: in the others it is applied to the eldership individually and collectively. Paul at Miletus, on his way to Jerusalem, sends for the elders of the church "at Ephesus, where he himself had been wont to dwell for three years," and instructs them in the oversight of "the flock over the which the Holy Ghost" had "made" them ἐπίσκοποι, bishops, "overseers" (Acts xx. 17, 28).

In writing to the church at Philippi, he makes special mention of their "bishops and deacons" (Phil. i. 1); the elders among the Greek churches being commonly known as bishops, overseers. As Epaphroditus had succeeded Paul and Luke in the work of preaching at Philippi, it is claimed that the church of that place was in form a Presbyterian church.

It is further to be observed, that these elders are in no one instance spoken of as preachers, or instructed, as Timothy and Titus were specifically, in the art of preaching. The bishops, overseers, elders, whom those presbyters were to ordain in every city, were not students, scholars, young men just setting out in the world: but, on the other hand, they were men of family, citizens of the place, tradesmen, mechanics, workmen, men of business, of good repute, of note and influence among their townsmen, grave senators, if such there were among the converts, men of good judgment, capable of giving advice (διδάσκαλοι), good, hospitable, exemplary men, well adapted to take the oversight of their fellow Christians, and to exercise discipline in the church. The elders are appointed to rule the church, ποιούμενοι τὸν ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ Θεοῦ (Acts xx. 28), the work that had belonged to the eldership among the Jews from time immemorial.

Not a few Presbyterians, therefore, claim that those elders were rulers merely, and not preachers. They affirm that the very same qualifications are now required of the ruling elder as are specified in the instructions given to Timothy and Titus relative to the bishops, the elders, of their day; that the work of preaching is nowhere assigned to them specifically or incidentally; that the words κηρύσσων and εὐαγγέλιζω are used in the New Testament, each of them not less than fifty times, to denote the work or office of preaching the gospel, being applied to Christ, to his apostles, and to the preachers of the apostolic period, but never to the presbyters, elders, bishops, overseers; and that the presbyter, the bishop of that day, was not a κηρύς, or an εὐαγγελιστής, a preacher or evangelist; "elder" and "preacher" not being convertible terms, as were "bishop" and "elder." Others give a broader significance to the words διδάσκαλοι and ποιούμενοι, as implying a fitness to rule the church, i.e., to take care of the body of Christ, and to perform the work of a pastor in the largest sense. They refer to 1 Tim. v. 17, where a distinction is made between "the elders that rule well" (καλῶς προετριμμένοις) and "they who labor in the word and doctrine" (οἱ κοσμῆται ἐν λόγῳ καὶ δοσισμοί). They maintain that the latter were distinctively preachers of the Word, and that therefore there were two kinds of elders, —ruling elders and teaching elders, and that the latter were the ruling elders of the churches. It is also taken for granted that the Christian elders, as the successors of the Jewish elders, had charge of public worship as well as discipline, and took charge of the reading of Scripture and exhortation (i.e., of preaching). It is quite natural, however, to suppose that the elders, who appear always in a plurality in a congregation, were not equally gifted, and distributed their various functions among themselves according to their ability.

Nor was preaching in the apostolic age confined to any ecclesiastical office.
This, then, is the claim of Presbyterianism, that the churches of the apostolic age were served by three classes of ministers, or office-bearers. At first, from the necessity of the case, a church had only two kinds of officers,—elders and deacons. Eventually the evangelist, or missionary, became a stated, settled minister, a pastor; or one of the elders occupied that position; so that each church had its ἄγγελος ("angel, herald, preacher"), as in the case of the seven churches of Asia (Rev. i., iii.). As the result of the development of the church, he came to be known distinctively as ἐπίσκοπος ("the bishop"); but he was the bishop of only a single church, of only one town or city. Every town or city had its own church, its own bishop. The bishops of the early ages were as numerous as the churches, residing often not more than a hundred miles from each other, and at the most only two hundred miles along the southern shores of the Mediterranean, in Italy, and in the East. They were simply what the Presbyterian pastor now is.

Such are the grounds, in general, with some possible variations, on which Presbyterianism claims to be both primitive and apostolical, as conforming more nearly than any other form of church order to any other form of church order. It is affirmed by some, that this form of church government is authoritatively and exclusively enjoined in the Scriptures; that it is therefore of universal obligation, and that no other is of divine right. They claim to be "jure divino Presbyterians." The great body of Presbyterian, however, are content to claim simply that their views are clearly sanctioned by Scripture.

In common with all the churches of the Reformation, Presbyterianism abjures the Papacy, with its woe-cregency, its infallibility, its decrees, its ceremonies, its masses, as a monstrous innovation on the truth and simplicity of the gospel, and as trustees to the Great Head of the church, in common with Independence and Congregationalism, it maintains the purity of the gospel ministry in opposition to every form of Prelacy. It discards the High-Church dogma of "apostolical succession." It teaches that the apostles, as such, had no successors; that the presbytery of the New Testament is a corporation, and as such is the successor of the apostles. They are simply servants of Christ and of his people, heralds of the cross, preachers of the gospel, not lords over God's heritage, yet, in the true sense, successors of the apostles. They are all brethren, and Christ alone is the Shepherd.

Presbyterianism claims to be the primitive Episcopacy, and abjures the exclusive Episcopacy of Prelacy as a corruption, as a usurpation of prerogatives on the part of metropolitan and other pastors, towering at length in the pretensions of patriarchs, and culminating in the tyrannical arrogance of the Bishop of Rome as the Vicar of Christ.

As to the Church, Presbyterianism distinguishes between the visible and the invisible Church; the latter including the whole company of the redeemed from among men to the end of time; the former consisting of "all those throughout the world that profess the true religion," both infants and adults. The Church, it teaches, has many parts. As the race is separated into numerous nationalities, so the Church is distributed into many families, separated by oceans and continents, and tribal barriers, and divers tongues, as also by peculiarities of faith and order. The necessities of time and place demand, that, in order to the public worship of God, these larger divisions be distributed into smaller neighborhood churches or congregations, not as independent organizations, but as parts of the one great whole.

Presbyterianism, therefore, teaches that any number of Christian people meeting stedfastly for public worship and the orderly celebration of the Christian sacraments, and covenanting together for these ends, is a particular church. It may be more or less scriptural in form, pure in doctrine, and spiritual in worship; yet it is a church, a distinct organization, dependent on no specific order of men beyond or above it, for leave to be and to do.

But, in the constitution and care of these particular churches, Presbyterianism avails itself of the advantages of a representative form of government. It makes orderly provision for the election of a council or assembly of ministers and churches, by fixed principles and uniform regulations, instead of leaving every thing to the exigencies of time and place, and traditional usage. It provides for periodical instead of only occasional convocations, for a fixed and not a fluctuating constituency of its councils, and so for the common interest of the community.

It recognizes the Church as a great commonwealth, and, by means of well-digested formulas of faith and order, it aims to bring its detached parts into an organic union, the more effectually to give expression to church-fellowship, and to secure to the particular church its rights and privileges; to provide for them a learned and godly ministry, and so preserve them from the inroads of ignorance, immorality, superstition, and intolerance in the pulpit, and conserve the purity of doctrine; to secure a ready and appropriate redress for injuries; to maintain a uniform standard of godliness; and to combine the resources of the whole for the general good.

These salutary and peremptory measures are all established by a regular series of church judicatories, the session or consistory of a particular church, the presbytery or classis, the synod, and the general synod or assembly. The principle of constitutional representation is maintained throughout; and opportunity is given, by a system of review, complaint, and appeal, for the righting of wrongs and the correction of errors; while, in a well organized and carefully compacted body, provision is made for the most effective aggressive movement against the combined powers of evil. It is a great church with numberless compacted parts, a great Christian republic, of which the Lord Jesus Christ alone is the Sovereign.

2. Articles of Faith. — In like manner, Presbyterianism claims that its faith as well as its form is based, not on tradition or custom, not on the inductions of mere human reason, or philosophical thought, but simply and solely on the word of God. It receives and adopts the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as being, not simply containing, a revelation of the mind and will of God, as given by inspiration of the Most High, and as being "the only infallible rule of faith and practice." It rejects as uninspired the apocryphal books and the whole body of papal decrees and canon law. In general, it receives and adopts Protestantism in distinction from Romanism, Trinitarianism in distinction from Ariantianism and Socinianism, and Calvinism in distinction from Pelagianism and Arminianism. (See these several titles.) It maintains the absolute dependence of every human being, from first to last, on the alone sufficiency of divine grace, for salvation from the guilt and power of sin unto eternal life, together with the free agency of man, and his responsibility for every thought, word, and deed. It exalts the infinite sovereignty of God, and his absolute control of all worlds and creatures. It represents God as overruling all human agency, so as, without violence, to bring about the purposes of his will in the work of redemption.

It maintains the innate depravity and want of original righteousness on the part of all the posterity of Adam, and the amazing grace of God in giving his Son to die for a sinful world, and his covenant and promise of fellowship to all communions that profess the faith, and hold to the headship, of our Lord Jesus Christ; and most cordially does it co-operate with Christian people everywhere, as God has taken firm root, and has obtained the most vigorous growth. More than thirty thousand churches in all the world are Presbyterian.

Its principal symbols of faith are the Canons of the Synod of Dort, A.D. 1619, and the Confession and Catechisms of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, London, A.D. 1648 (see Dort and Westminster); also the Heidelberg Catechism, by Ursinus, A.D. 1658. These symbols, however, have been so modified by the Presbyterian churches of America, in particular, as to exclude the Church and State theory, and to affirm the complete independence of the Church in respect to the State.

In fine, this system claims for itself a large-hearted catholicity. It extends the right hand of fellowship to all communions that profess the faith, and hold to the headship, of our Lord Jesus Christ; and most cordially does it co-operate with Christian people everywhere, as God has taken firm root, and has obtained the most vigorous growth. More than thirty thousand churches in all the world are Presbyterian.

In fine, this system claims for itself a large-hearted catholicity. It extends the right hand of fellowship to all communions that profess the faith, and hold to the headship, of our Lord Jesus Christ; and most cordially does it co-operate with Christian people everywhere, as God has taken firm root, and has obtained the most vigorous growth. More than thirty thousand churches in all the world are Presbyterian.

In fine, this system claims for itself a large-hearted catholicity. It extends the right hand of fellowship to all communions that profess the faith, and hold to the headship, of our Lord Jesus Christ; and most cordially does it co-operate with Christian people everywhere, as God has taken firm root, and has obtained the most vigorous growth. More than thirty thousand churches in all the world are Presbyterian.

In fine, this system claims for itself a large-hearted catholicity. It extends the right hand of fellowship to all communions that profess the faith, and hold to the headship, of our Lord Jesus Christ; and most cordially does it co-operate with Christian people everywhere, as God has taken firm root, and has obtained the most vigorous growth. More than thirty thousand churches in all the world are Presbyterian.

In fine, this system claims for itself a large-hearted catholicity. It extends the right hand of fellowship to all communions that profess the faith, and hold to the headship, of our Lord Jesus Christ; and most cordially does it co-operate with Christian people everywhere, as God has taken firm root, and has obtained the most vigorous growth. More than thirty thousand churches in all the world are Presbyterian.

PRESBYTERY (presbyterium) denotes the body of elders, whether Jewish (Luke xxii. 66; Acts xxii. 5) or Christian (1 Tim. iv. 14).

PRESBYTERY. (1) The part of the church, behind the altar, which contained seats for the bishops and presbyters (priests), divided from the rest by rails, so that none but clergy might enter it. (2) An ecclesiastical court of general Presbyterian churches, next in rank above the session, composed of all the ministers, and one elder from each church within a certain radius, and having jurisdiction over the ministers composing it, over the candidates for the ministry and licentiates, and over the churches within its bounds. See Presbyterian confession of faith.

PRESENCE, The Real. See LORD'S SUPPER, p. 1843.

PRESIDING ELDERS are officers of the Methodist-Episcopal Church who are appointed by the bishops over a certain territory (District) for a term not exceeding four years. Their duties are, to travel through this District; to be present at, as far as practicable, and to hold, all the quarterly meetings; to call together the Quarterly Conference; to hear complaints; to receive and try appeals; to renew all licenses approved by the Quarterly Conference, etc.; to oversee the spiritual and temporal business of the church in a given District; to promote all those interests; to maintain discipline; and to decide all questions of law involved in proceedings pending in a District or Quarterly Conference, subject to an appeal to the president of the next Annual Conference. They are paid by their respective Districts. It is manifest that the office is one of great power and usefulness. It was early created in the American Methodist Church, in imitation of the office of assistant, appointed by Wesley himself to help him in his onerous labor. See Discipline of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, ed. 1880, pp. 109-112.

PRESSLY, John Taylor, D.D., United Presbyterian; b. in Abbeville District, S.C., March 28, 1790; d. at Allegheny City, Penn., Aug. 13, 1870. He was graduated at Transylvania University, Kentucky, 1812, and from Dr. Mason's theological seminary, 1815; licensed the latter year by the Second Associate Reformed Presbytery of South Carolina; ordained and installed, July 16, 1816, pastor of the Cedar Spring congregation, the one in which he had been brought up. There he faithfully and successfully ministered until 1832, when he came to Pittsburgh to be professor of theology in the theological seminary of his denomination. The same year the seminary was removed to Allegheny, and Pressly became pastor in that city. He took a leading part in organizing the United Presbyterian Church, which in 1858 was formed out of the Associate and Associate Reformed Presbyterian churches; and the strength of this denomination in Pittsburgh and its neighborhood is more due to him than to any other one man. As preacher, pastor, and professor, he was unusually successful, and his presidential nomination will not pass away. See sketch of him by Rev. Dr. Kerr, in MacCracken's Lives of the Leaders of Our Church Universal, pp. 778-788.

PRESTER JOHN. See John the Presbyter.

PRESTON, John, D.D., Puritan divine; b. at Heyford, Northamptonshire, 1657; d. in that shire, July, 1628 (buried in Fawley Church, July 20). He was admitted fellow of Queen's College, 1606; entered holy orders, but never had a charge, or married. On the nomination of the Duke of Buckingham, he was made chaplain to Prince Charles, preacher at Lincoln's Inn, and master of Emanuel College (1622). He was the chaplain-in-waiting at King James's death, and "came up with the young King and the Duke of Buckingham, in a close coach, to London." In his closing years, his stance Puritanism cost him the duke's patronage. As a preacher, he attracted great attention. He was also a vigorous defender of Calvinism. His writings were very popular. See list in Darling; also Hale, The Age of Reason, Harper's ed., vol. i. pp. 275, 276, 281, 296, 297.

PRIDEAUX, Humphrey, D.D., Church of England; b. at Padstow, Cornwall, May 3, 1648; d. at Norwich, Nov. 1, 1724. He was graduated B.A. at Christ Church, Oxford, 1672; and in 1675 published there Marmora Oozonieta, or a transcript of the inscription on the Arundel Marbles (many typographical errors; more correctly presented by Richard Chandler, Oxford, 1783, folio). In consequence of this work, the lord-chancellor, Finch, gave him the living of St. Clement's, near Oxford, 1679, and a prebend in Norwich Cathedral, 1681. In 1686 he became archdeacon of Suffolk, and in 1702 dean of Norwich. He wrote two celebrated works,—The true nature of imposture fully displayed in the life of Mahomet, with a discourse annexed for the vindication of Christianity from this charge (London, 1697), and The Old and New Testament connected in the history of the Jews and neighboring nations, from the declension of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah to the time of Christ (London, 1718, 3 vols. 8vo, best ed. (the 25th) by J. Talboys Wheeler, London, 1806, 2 vols. 8vo, 3d ed. of this edition, 1876). The first of these two works maintains with great learning and prejudice the lowest view of Mohammed's character: the second presents an immense mass of erudition upon all relevant topics. See his anonymous Life (London, 1748), and his Letters to John Ellis, edited by E. M. Thompson, for Camden Society, London, 1876.

PRIERIAS, Sylvester, b. at Priero, in the Italian countship of Montferrat, about 1460. His true name was Mazolini. The date and place of his death are unknown. He entered the Dominican order when he was fifteen years old; taught theology in Padua and Rome; published Rosa aurea physiologica and Summa Sylvestrina (1515), now entirely forgotten; and was made Magister Sacri Palatii by Leo X. His place in church history, however, is not a little to further the cause of the Reformation. OSWALD SCHMIDT.

Person Eligible to the Priesthood. — This being the idea which underlies the priesthood, we have to consider what persons were eligible to the office. Modern critics, especially of the German and Dutch schools, in their radical reconstruction of the Old Testament history, utterly reject the Aaronitic priesthood as being the earliest form among the Israelites, and consider it the latest. They hold that the true principle of history is that of development, and that simpler laws and institutions must have preceded those which were more elaborate. They maintain, with reference to the object of worship, that the Israelites were originally polytheists, and that the more spiritual monotheistic conception of God was the fruitage of prophecy about the eighth century before Christ. They claim that the mode of worship in sacrifices, festivals, etc., was far simpler at the beginning of Israel's history than in the Priests' Code which mirrors the state of things after the exile. The legal documents in which they trace the gradual developments of the priesthood are the Book of the Covenant with its affiliated Jehovistic history (eighth century B.C.), the Book of Deuteronomy (621 B.C.) with the deuteronomic elements in Joshua, Ezekiel's Torah (xlviii., 573 B.C.), and the Priests' Code (444 B.C.) with related parts of Joshua, which is considered by the critics as forming, with the Pentateuch, a Hexateuch. Their theory involves the complete demolition of the traditional structure of Old-Testament history and the construction of an entirely new edifice. Those who adopt this critical reconstruction of the Old Testament discover the following successive steps in the priesthood:

1. According to the Jehovist, any one may serve as priest. This is illustrated by the history of the Jehovistic period, where Gideon, Manoah, Samuel (who, they say, was made a Levite by the chronicler), Saul, David, and others who were not sons of Aaron, or even Levites, offered sacrifices in direct antagonism to the Priests' Code (Num. iii. 10, xviii. 7).

2. According to Deuteronomy (x. 8; xxxiii. 8-10; I Sam. ii. 28) and contemporaneous writers, there is, for the first time, a priesthood which is confined to the tribe or guild of Levi. Not all Levites are priests; but any Levite who may desire, contrary to the express stipulations of the Priests' Code, may become a priest by virtue of his belonging to the tribe (Deut. xviii. 6, 7).

3. A farther step in the priesthood is exhibited in Ezekiel, who first introduces the distinction between a family, that of Zadok, and the tribe of Levi. The priesthood is limited to the family of Zadok of the tribe of Levi, because they have remained faithful in the service of Jehovah; the rest of the Levites, because they have served as idolatrous priests of the high places, are forever deposed from the priesthood (Ezek. xliv. 10-14).

PRIEST AND PRIESTHOOD. 1922 PRIEST AND PRIESTHOOD.
PRIEST AND PRIESTHOOD. 1923

PRIEST AND PRIESTHOOD.

4. The last step is seen in the Priests' Code. Here the priests trace their lineage back to Aaron: all other Levites are excluded from the priesthood, and the system is crowned through the institution of the high priest. While neither in the prophets, nor in the earlier historical writings, do we find any trace of this highly developed hierarchy, yet in the Books of Chronicles and Ezra [Nehemiah], which were written long after the introduction of the Priests' Code, we find such a hierarchy participating in the affairs of the nation. This representation, however, according to the critics, is not historical. Many of them hold that there was no intention to deceive on the part of the chronicler; but, in rewriting the history, he naturally treated it in the light of his own time, without being at all conscious that the Aaronitic priesthood was of comparatively modern origin.

Now, we cannot admit, with Brugsch, that "Moses could not have been ignorant of the art of writing, when we remember that Herodotus wrote (ii. 82), "No Egyptian omits taking accurate notes of extraordinary or striking events." But Egypt was not the only nation that had a literature at that time. Chaldea, which was the birthplace of Abraham, had already written down the primitive traditions before Moses was born; and the Phoenicians, must have cultivated people of antiquity, in whose land Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob sojourned, had undoubtedly come into possession of the art of writing. Now, when we take these facts into account, and remember that the Hebrew was really the Phoenician language, it would be passing strange if the adopted son of Pharaoh's daughter (according to the Scriptures), or the priest, who, according to tradition, was the leader of Israel, left no memorials.

4. The critics maintain that the Old-Testament Scriptures belong to two classes of authors,—the priests and the prophets. They find these two classes of writings represented in the Pentateuch and Joshua, and in the historical books. The Jehovistic writings are the prophetic; the Elohist, the priestly. It was once the claim of the critics that the Elohistic writings were the oldest, and that the Jehovistic were younger. Since the publication of Graf's work on the historical books of the Old Testament (1896), and especially of Wellhausen's "History of Israel" (1884), the majority of Old-Testament scholars in Germany have reversed the relation. But here, again, if the Egyptian priesthood had any influence on that of Israel, we must believe, if there are two classes of writings in the Old Testament, that the priestly are not younger than the prophetic; for the Egyptian priesthood were the guardians of the sacred books, which they explained to the king.

In the same way, the Israelitish priests are guardians of the written law of Moses (Deut. xvii. 18, xxxi. 9, 24). Hence not only that which we find in the Pentateuch, but what we can gather from the external history of the nation, points to the prominence of the priesthood at the inauguration of the nation. We must, therefore, during the return to first principles under Ezra.

5. The representations of the Old-Testament books, when taken according to the age which has been assigned them by tradition, give a consistent account of the origin of the priesthood, and one which we might expect from the connection of Israel with Egypt; while the notices contained in the different documents discovered by the critics in the Pentateuch are highly fragmentary.

Without raising the question as to the Mosaic priesthood, when the Egyptians had books which this, but the view of the critics would lead us to the land-tax, the priest-tax, etc. And not only remind us strongly of the regulations of the middle books of the Pentateuch are favorable to Priests' Code in treating of sacrifices, first-fruits, the view that he did not. The Book of Deuteronomy harmonizes well have prepared any regulations in regard to the he should have composed such a work, and not only institution, when the Egyptian customs and the cannot believe that Moses would neglect such an cannot be assigned to him. Some of the most temperate of the modern critics consider him the author of the Ten Commandments and the book of the covenant; but neither contain any directions as to the priesthood. It is most unlikely, however, that he should have composed such a work, and not have prepared any regulations in regard to the priesthood, when the Egyptians had books which remind us strongly of the regulations of the Priests' Code in treating of sacrifices, first-fruits, the land-tax, the priest-tax, etc. And not only this, but the view of the critics would lead us to suppose that he founded no priesthood at all. We cannot believe that Moses would neglect such an institution, when the Egyptian customs and the middle books of the Pentateuch are favorable to the view that he did not.

The Book of Deuteronomy harmonizes well with its supplementary position in connection with the middle books of the Pentateuch; but it is not adapted to give an independent account as to the origin of the Levitical priesthood. The persistent use of the terminology, "priests, Levites" (Deut. xvii. 9, 18, xviii. 1, xxiv. 8, xxvii. 21), is not only striking; and this Levitical character that any Levite may become a priest would be legitimate, if we had to do with this book alone. The references to the priesthood, however, are of a very partial and incidental character, and lead to the supposition that Deuteronomy must have been supplementary to a much larger book than that of the covenant. Such a book must have contained priestly regulations, and have been a priestly code. Indeed, on many accounts, the so-called Priests' Code is fitted to take the precedence, were it not for the critical objections which are urged. In a passage (Deut. x. 6-9), which, according to some critics, the Deuteronomiker has introduced from an older writer (Deuteronomic The sacrifice of the feast), we read, "There Aaron died, and was buried there, and Eleazar his son was priest in his stead." When did Aaron become priest? and what were the circumstances of his induction? Did the Levites belong to the same grade of the priesthood as himself and Eleazar? These are questions to which neither the Jehovist nor the Deuteronomiker gives us any response, but which are clearly answered in the Priests' Code. May any Levite become a priest? The natural inference from Deut. xviii. 6, 7, is that he may. But the answer is not unequivocal; for we find in Chronicles that sons of Aaron and their assistants are classed as Levites (2 Chron. xxii. 18, xxx. 27, xi. 13, 14, etc.). Now, these considerations show the absurdity of making the few references that we have in the book of the covenant a mirror of one stage of the priesthood, or rather of a time when there was no regular priesthood, and those that are found in Deuteronomy an indication of the first stage in the Levitical priesthood. The attempt would be utterly ridiculous, were it not that the result claimed by the critics of the festivals, in language and literature, seem to point in the same direction; but the modern critical theory rides through not a few places in the Old Testament rough-shod.

It is certain that Deuteronomy does not attempt to define the different duties of the priesthood. Even according to it, there must have been a gradation in these duties between the most menial service and the giving of a divine decision by Uriim and Thummim (Deut. xxviii. 9). It is certain that all the offices of the office, from an Aaron to a common Levite, are grouped together; and this is natural in a farewell address like Deuteronomy.

If we throw the light of the Priests' Code upon the subsequent history, it explains several things.

(1) A high priesthood is implied in the prominent mention of Aaron, Eleazar, and other priests, in Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Samuel and Kings, as well as in their use of Uriim and Thummim. (2) There is nothing but the theory of the critics in the way of supposing that there were priests and Levites during the Old Testament history. They are definitely distinguished as priests and Levites in 1 Kings viii. 4. Kuenen tries to escape from this difficulty by quoting the parallel passage in Chronicles (2 Chron. v. 5), without the connective, and assuming that in this place the chronicler exactly followed the original text of Kings. But then, if, as Kuenen assumes, the chronicler was rewriting the history from the stand-point of the Priests' Code, the omission of the connective would not be likely. He might be likely to insert it, that he might express the difference between the priests and the Levites. It is probable, therefore, that we have here a clerical error, as the versions and a very large number of the best manuscripts insert a connective. Then, too, in Isa. xxvi. 21, the priests and Levites are mentioned according to the authority of the versions and the oldest manuscripts (see Curtiss's Levitical Priests, pp. 205 ff.).

(3) The critics say that the Levitical cities existed only on paper; but there are casual references in the history to some of them, which, from their undesignated character, support the view that they really existed. The Levite who is mentioned in Judges xx. 21, if he江山 the site of Mount Ephraim, perhaps in Shechem, which was a Levitical city (Josh. xx. 21). So, too, the father of Samuel, who is mentioned by the chronicler as a Levite descended from the family of Kohath (1 Chron. vi. 7-13, E. V. 22-28), is spoken of as being from Mount Ephraim (1 Sam. i. 1). This coincides with the statement that the children of Kohath had Shechem with her surrounding pasture in Mount Ephraim (Josh. xxii. 21).

Another marked, but unintended, coincidence is found in the mention of Beth-shemesh in the first Book of Samuel (1 Sam. vi. 9-15). This city, according to the Book of Joshua, was given to the sons of Aaron (Josh. xxi. 10). If there is any point to the narrative at all, it is that the two new cities which have been selected to draw the ark of the Lord, contrary to their natural instincts under the divine guidance, leave their calves which had been shut up at home, and carry the ark to the priestly city of Beth-shemesh, where the Levites, among whom were double-bass sons of Aaron, are ready to receive it. But perhaps most prominent of all is the twofold mention of the priestly city of Anathoth, whither Solomon dismisses Abiathar from the high priesthood (1 Kings ii. 26), and where Jeremiah's father, who was a priest, resided (Jer. i. 1).
Now, if we read the history of the priesthood according to the Priests' Code, we get the following representation: it is descended from Aaron, through the houses of Eleazar and Ithamar, since Nadab and Abihu were put to death for offering strange fire (Num. iii. 4). In the subsequent historic, we can trace the sons of Eleazar only as far as Phinehas, his son. This is not strange, as it was not the object of the prophetic authors of the Former Prophets (Joshua—Kings) to give a history of the priesthood. In the Book of Samuel we are introduced to Eli, who is supposed to have belonged to the house of Ithamar. Owing to the wickedness of Eli's sons, a curse falls upon this house (1 Sam. ii. 81—84); a terrible massacre overtakes the priestly city of Nob (1 Sam. xxii. 19); and the prophecy receives its special fulfilment in the deposition of Abiathar from the priesthood by Solomon (1 Kings ii. 27), and in the putting of Zadok, a descendant of Eleazar, in his place. Under Jeroboam, a great misfortune befalls the priesthood. Since motives of state policy lead him to discourage the people from going to Jerusalem, he establishes the worship of the calves in Dan and Bethel (1 Kings xii. 28—29), and the priests are compelled to leave the land (1 Kings xii. 81; 2 Chron. xi. 18—19). Even in Judah, all the priests of the house of Zadok, and hence the sons of Ithamar serve the people in their idolatrous practices, and hence are deposed from the priesthood, and are compelled to do the work of the ordinary Levites (2 Kings xxiii. 8; 9; Ezek. xlv. 10—14). Whether this regulation extended to the children of the priests, we do not know. During the history of the royal period, as given in the Books of Kings and by the prophets, we meet with priests who occupy positions corresponding to what we might expect from the high priest.

Now, while this is the case, it is evident that the chronicler does not attempt to conform the history to the regulations in the Priests' Code; but on the contrary, he explains references to the altar of burnt offering, and keep the fire offereth the regular morning and eveningsacrifice (Lev. xxv. 9). During the sojourn in the wilderness, they were intrusted with the immediate care of the ark of testimony and of the sacred vessels of the sanctuary, which they were to cover before they were borne by the Levites (Num. iv. 4—15).

The main part of the duties of the priests had reference to the needs of the people in the special and individual offerings which they might wish to present, as described in the sacrificial ritual (Lev. i.—vii.). Besides, the priests were to offer the fat of all animals killed for domestic purposes, and sprinkle their blood upon the altar (Lev. xvii. 3—9). They were to determine the valuation of vows (Lev. xxviil.), and to conduct the ceremonies in the consecration of a Nazarite (Num. vi. 1—21). They were to examine those afflicted with leprosy, and leprous houses (Lev. xiii.—xiv.), and women suspected of adultery (Num. v. 12—31). Moreover, as the depositaries of the law, they were to teach the people the statutes of the Lord (Lev. x. 11; Deut. xxiii. 10; 2 Chron. xv. 9).

The Dress and Manner of Life of the priesthood, as well as their physical soundness, indicate their holy, and hence mediatorial character. None who were afflicted with leprosy or leprous houses (Lev. xiii.—xiv.), and women suspected of adultery (Num. v. 12—31).

The main part of the duties of the priests had reference to the needs of the people in the special and individual offerings which they might wish to present, as described in the sacrificial ritual (Lev. i.—vii.). Besides, the priests were to offer the fat of all animals killed for domestic purposes, and sprinkle their blood upon the altar (Lev. xvii. 3—9). They were to determine the valuation of vows (Lev. xxviil.), and to conduct the ceremonies in the consecration of a Nazarite (Num. vi. 1—21). They were to examine those afflicted with leprosy, and leprous houses (Lev. xiii.—xiv.), and women suspected of adultery (Num. v. 12—31). Moreover, as the depositaries of the law, they were to teach the people the statutes of the Lord (Lev. x. 11; Deut. xxiii. 10; 2 Chron. xv. 9).

The Dress and Manner of Life of the priests, as well as their physical soundness, indicate their holy, and hence mediatorial character. None who were afflicted with leprosy or leprous houses (Lev. xiii.—xiv.), and women suspected of adultery (Num. v. 12—31).

The main part of the duties of the priests had reference to the needs of the people in the special and individual offerings which they might wish to present, as described in the sacrificial ritual (Lev. i.—vii.). Besides, the priests were to offer the fat of all animals killed for domestic purposes, and sprinkle their blood upon the altar (Lev. xvii. 3—9). They were to determine the valuation of vows (Lev. xxviil.), and to conduct the ceremonies in the consecration of a Nazarite (Num. vi. 1—21). They were to examine those afflicted with leprosy, and leprous houses (Lev. xiii.—xiv.), and women suspected of adultery (Num. v. 12—31). Moreover, as the depositaries of the law, they were to teach the people the statutes of the Lord (Lev. x. 11; Deut. xxiii. 10; 2 Chron. xv. 9).

The main part of the duties of the priests had reference to the needs of the people in the special and individual offerings which they might wish to present, as described in the sacrificial ritual (Lev. i.—vii.). Besides, the priests were to offer the fat of all animals killed for domestic purposes, and sprinkle their blood upon the altar (Lev. xvii. 3—9). They were to determine the valuation of vows (Lev. xxviil.), and to conduct the ceremonies in the consecration of a Nazarite (Num. vi. 1—21). They were to examine those afflicted with leprosy, and leprous houses (Lev. xiii.—xiv.), and women suspected of adultery (Num. v. 12—31). Moreover, as the depositaries of the law, they were to teach the people the statutes of the Lord (Lev. x. 11; Deut. xxiii. 10; 2 Chron. xv. 9).
PRIESTHOOD IN R. C. CHURCH. 1926 PRIESTHOOD IN R. C. CHURCH.

(Num. xviii. 14–19), and their share in the fiftieth of half the booty which was given to the Levites in time of war (Num. xxxi. 47). They were to receive also the wave offering (Exod. xxv. 19), the heave offering, the sin offering, and the trespass offering (Num. xviii. 8–14), the best of the oil, of the wine, and wheats, as first-fruits, etc.

The Ordination of the priests was especially indicative of their sacred character. It is a mooted question whether the service of induction described in Lev. viii. was practiced on the appointment of the successors of Aaron and his sons. However this may be, these were solemnly set apart to the service of God, as mediators between him and his people, in the presence of the congregation of Israel. After they had been washed, and had put on their priestly garments, they were anointed with a precious oil, which might not be used for any common purpose. The formula of the rabbins, had only their foreheads anointed with the finger. After this, the sacrificial rites took place, consisting in a sin offering, in a burnt offering, and a peace offering. In connection with this sacrifice, Moses touched the tip of the right ear, of the right thumb, and of the great toe of the right foot, of Aaron and his sons, with blood; signifying, that, as mediators between God and his people, they were to hear his word, do his work, and walk in his ways.

PRIESTHOOD IN THE ROMAN-CATHOLIC CHURCH. Very early, indeed already towards the close of the first century, a parallel was drawn between the officials of the Christian congregations and the priests of the Old Testament. (See 1 Ep. of Clement, c. 40.) As yet, however, the idea of the priesthood of the Old Testament exercised no influence on the officers of the Christian congregation, and could exercise none, because, in the Christian congregation, no offering of sacrifices by its officials was known; the whole congregation considering itself a people of priests. According to Justin (Dial. 117; comp. Apol. 1, 67), the individual members of the congregation, and not its officials, are the acting subjects in the celebration of the Eucharist. Tertullian (De exorc. cast., 7; comp. De bapt. 17, De monog., 7) bases the right of every Christian to administer the sacraments on the universal priesthood of the faith; and the same idea occurs in Augustine (De civit. Dei, 20, 10), and in Leo the Great (Sermon, 4, 1). But, alongside of this idea of a universal priesthood of all the faithful, there developed, in course of time, another idea, of directly opposite character. In Africa people first became used, in what manner is not known, to designate bishops and presbyters as sacerdotes. The custom was current at the time of Tertullian, as may be seen from his polemics against it; and in the third century it also became prevalent in Rome. As soon, however, as a distinction was established between the members and the officers of the congregation, as between priests and laity, it was impossible to prevent the Old-Testament idea of priesthood from creeping in, and making itself felt. Now, the Old Testament, the ideas of priest and sacrifice are inseparable; and, by offering up the sacrifice for the people, the priest became the mediator between the people and God. There was also a Christian sacrifice; but, as long as the faithful themselves offered up the sacrifice, the idea was rather in favor of that of universal priesthood. As soon, however, as the idea of sacrifice changed, and the sacrifice was offered up, not by the faithful, but for the faithful, that of priest changed too, and the priest became a mediator between God and the faithful. In the time of Cyprian this change was accomplished: see his Epistles, 55, 8; 56, 3; 61, 1, etc. The priest, and not the congregation, had become the acting subject in the celebration of the Eucharist. For the transition in the Greek Church see Apost. Constit., ii. 23; 12; and in the time of Chrysostom the change had taken place.

Thus the priestly character of the higher clergy, derived from the sacrificial character of the mass, was transmitted to the mediæval church, which accepted all those ideas as axioms. (See Petrus Lombardus: Sent. iv., dist. 24 J.) When Thomas Aquinas incidentally mentions the universal priesthood of all the faithful, he gives to the idea an almost metaphorical signification: the faithful shall, like the priest, offer up spiritual sacrifices to God. The Roman Catechism also speaks of a twofold priesthood, an internal and an external; but it lays all emphasis on the latter,—the external, the hierarchy. The foundation of that priesthood is carried back to the Lord himself, who gave to the apostles and their successors the powers of consecration, of baptism, of offering and administering the Body and Blood of Christ, and also of forgiving or retaining sins; and the office itself is spoken of in the most extravagant expressions. The priest is not only the emissary and interpreter, but the very representative, of God on earth; and above his office none higher can be imagined, either with respect to dignity or to power. Admission to that office can be had only through a solemn consecration, sacramentum ordinis, which can be given only by a bishop, but which imparts to the ordained an indestructible spiritual character, by virtue of which he can discharge his lofty spiritual functions. The conditions of admission are baptism, male sex, unmarried state, twenty-five years' age, etc.; excluded are slaves, those who were born illegitimately, those who have spilt blood, those who suffer from some conspicuous bodily defect, etc. This view of the priesthood the Roman-Catholic Church retained in spite of the objections of the Protestant churches, and she still retains it almost without the least modification. [See Eng. trans. Catechism of the Council of Trent, Bolland., pp. 220 sqq.]

PRIESTLEY, Joseph, LL.D., F.R.S., b. at Fieldhead, Yorkshire, March 18, 1733; d. at Northumberland, Penn., Feb. 6, 1804. He was graduated at the dissenting academy at Daventry, and was successively Independent minister at Needham Market, Suffolk (1753), and at Nantwich, Cheshire (1758); professor of belles-lettres at Warrington dissenting academy (1761); minister at Mill-Hill Chapel, Leeds; librarian and companion to the Earl of Shelburne (1773); minister at Birmingham (1780) and at Hackney (1781); sailed for America (April 7, 1794), and lived the rest of his days on his son's farm. His great reputation rests upon his discoveries in chemistry and physics, particularly the discovery of oxygen gas, indeed, of almost all gases. But he is mentioned here because he was a vigorous champion of Unitarianism, especially the discovery of the Trinity, his book exciting a great commotion. He also wrote A History of the Corruptions of Christianity, 1782, 2 vols., new ed., London, 1871. As among these "corruptions" he puts the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity, his book excited a great commotion. He also wrote A History of the Corruptions of Christianity, 1782, 2 vols., new ed., London, 1871. By his advocacy of the "liberal" side in politics, no less than in religion, he made himself so obnoxious at Birmingham, that his house was entered and sacked by a mob on the same day, the American chemists celebrating the destruction of the Bastille. For this he received £2,502 damages. A statue of him was placed in 1860 in the museum of Oxford University; and another was unveiled at Birmingham, Eng., Aug. 1, 1874; while some friends were celebrating the centennial of his discovery of oxygen. His bibliography, compiled in 1876, and placed in the Library of Congress, comprises more than three hundred publications of various sizes, and on numerous subjects. The most of his laboratory was in 1883 delivered over to the Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C. For his biography, see Memoirs of \( \text{PRIME} \).
pastor of the Rev. Dr. Joseph Sewall, Old South Church, Boston. His memory rests upon his Chronological history of New England in the form of annals... with an Introduction containing a brief epitome... of events abroad from the Creation, Boston, vol. i., 1738; Nos. 1, 2, 3 (60 pp. in all) of vol. ii., 1755. The history proper begins with 1602. He intended to bring it down to 1730; but the strange lack of encouragement by the public probably disheartened him; so that almost twenty years elapsed after the appearance of the first volume, ere he began the second, and, his death coming soon after, he brought the history down no later than Aug. 5, 1698; and as, during the Revolutionary war, many of his manuscripts were destroyed, a large part of his invaluable collection (made during fifty years) of facts respecting the early history of the country has perished. His History was republished (ed. by Nathan Hale), Boston, 1828, and again (ed. by S. G. Drake), Boston, 1852, and portions in fifth edition of Morton’s New England History, Memorial, Boston, 1855. Besides this, he wrote An account of the Earthquakes of New England (1755), New England Psalm book revised and improved (1758), and other works. His library was bequeathed to the Old South Church, and by it donated to the Public Library, Boston, 1866, of which a catalogue has been published. See Sprague: Annals of the American Pulpit, vol. i. 304.

PRINCETON. PRINCETON. 1928

I. THE BOROUGH OF PRINCETON is situated almost midway between Philadelphia and New York, on the old Indian path between the fords of the Raritan and the Delaware, near its intersection with the line dividing the provinces of East and West Jersey, two hundred and twenty-one feet above the sea, on the first foot-hills, which, rising above the sandy plains of the south, roll on northward and westward to the Allegheny Mountains. The first settlements were made in 1694, and generally called, after the neighboring rivulet, “Stony Brook.” It was called Princeton in 1724. The battle of Princeton, Jan. 3, 1777, was a turning-point in the Revolution. Two eminent citizens of Princeton, Richard Stockton and John Witherspoon, signed the Declaration of Independence. On the 18th of July, 1776, the first Legislature of New Jersey, under the Constitution, met in Princeton, and organized the new State government; and Princeton continued the capital until the latter part of 1778. During four months, from June 20 to Nov. 4, 1788, the American Congress held its sessions in the library-room of the college; and Washington, for some time in attendance, issued his farewell orders to the Revolutionary armies from the house of Judge Berrien on Rocky Hill. The village itself, numbering three thousand inhabitants, is distinguished only by its fine trees and elevated situation; but in recent times the beautiful and spacious buildings erected by munificent patrons for the uses of the college and the theological seminary are, upon the whole, unrivaled in America. In this respect the village is admitted to approach more nearly than any other the ideal of an English university town. The cemetery has grown to be one of the most celebrated in the land; for here lie a long line of illustrious citizens, presidents, and professors, including the Bays and Stocktons of New Jersey, Edwards, Davies, and Witherspoon, of the college, and the Alexanders, Miller, and Hodge, etc., of the seminary.

II. Its Institutions. — (1) Princeton College (corporate name, College of New Jersey, and from its oldest main building, called Nassau Hall) was founded by members of the synod of New York (New Light), for the purpose of raising a godly ministry for the Presbyterian Church, and for uniting religion and science in the higher education. The most active founders were Messrs. Dickinson, Pierson, Pemberton, and Burr, residing in East Jersey. The Rev. Gilbert Tennent and Samuel Blair, leading members of the presbytery, subscribed for the papers of the college. After the battle of Princeton, Jan. 3, 1777, two hundred and twenty-one feet above the sea, on the first foot-hills, which, rising above the sandy plains of the south, roll on northward and westward to the Allegheny Mountains. The first settlements were made in 1694, and generally called, after the neighboring rivulet, “Stony Brook.” It was called Princeton in 1724. The battle of Princeton, Jan. 3, 1777, was a turning-point in the Revolution. Two eminent citizens of Princeton, Richard Stockton and John Witherspoon, signed the Declaration of Independence. On the 18th of July, 1776, the first Legislature of New Jersey, under the Constitution, met in Princeton, and organized the new State government; and Princeton continued the capital until the latter part of 1778. During four months, from June 20 to Nov. 4, 1788, the American Congress held its sessions in the library-room of the college; and Washington, for some time in attendance, issued his farewell orders to the Revolutionary armies from the house of Judge Berrien on Rocky Hill. The village itself, numbering three thousand inhabitants, is distinguished only by its fine trees and elevated situation; but in recent times the beautiful and spacious buildings erected by munificent patrons for the uses of the college and the theological seminary are, upon the whole, unrivaled in America. In this respect the village is admitted to approach more nearly than any other the ideal of an English university town. The cemetery has grown to be one of the most celebrated in the land; for here lie a long line of illustrious citizens, presidents, and professors, including the Bays and Stocktons of New Jersey, Edwards, Davies, and Witherspoon, of the college, and the Alexanders, Miller, and Hodge, etc., of the seminary.

PRINCETON, the Village, its Institutions, Theology, and Literature.

I. The Borough of Princeton is situated almost midway between Philadelphia and New York, on the old Indian path between the fords of the Raritan and the Delaware, near its intersection with the line dividing the provinces of East and West Jersey, two hundred and twenty-one feet above the sea, on the first foot-hills, which, rising above the sandy plains of the south, roll on northward and westward to the Allegheny Mountains. The first settlements were made in 1694, and generally called, after the neighboring rivulet, “Stony Brook.” It was called Princeton in 1724. The battle of Princeton, Jan. 3, 1777, was a turning-point in the Revolution. Two eminent citizens of Princeton, Richard Stockton and John Witherspoon, signed the Declaration of Independence. On the 18th of July, 1776, the first Legislature of New Jersey, under the Constitution, met in Princeton, and organized the new State government; and Princeton continued the capital until the latter part of 1778. During four months, from June 20 to Nov. 4, 1788, the American Congress held its sessions in the library-room of the college; and Washington, for some time in attendance, issued his farewell orders to the Revolutionary armies from the house of Judge Berrien on Rocky Hill. The village itself, numbering three thousand inhabitants, is distinguished only by its fine trees and elevated situation; but in recent times the beautiful and spacious buildings erected by munificent patrons for the uses of the college and the theological seminary are, upon the whole, unrivaled in America. In this respect the village is admitted to approach more nearly than any other the ideal of an English university town. The cemetery has grown to be one of the most celebrated in the land; for here lie a long line of illustrious citizens, presidents, and professors, including the Bays and Stocktons of New Jersey, Edwards, Davies, and Witherspoon, of the college, and the Alexanders, Miller, and Hodge, etc., of the seminary.

II. Its Institutions. — (1) Princeton College (corporate name, College of New Jersey, and from its oldest main building, called Nassau Hall) was founded by members of the synod of New York (New Light), for the purpose of raising a godly ministry for the Presbyterian Church, and for uniting religion and science in the higher education. The most active founders were Messrs. Dickinson, Pierson, Pemberton, and Burr, residing in East Jersey. The Rev. Gilbert Tennent and Samuel Blair, leading members of the presbytery, subscribed for the papers of the college. After the battle of Princeton, Jan. 3, 1777, two hundred and twenty-one feet above the sea, on the first foot-hills, which, rising above the sandy plains of the south, roll on northward and westward to the Allegheny Mountains. The first settlements were made in 1694, and generally called, after the neighboring rivulet, “Stony Brook.” It was called Princeton in 1724. The battle of Princeton, Jan. 3, 1777, was a turning-point in the Revolution. Two eminent citizens of Princeton, Richard Stockton and John Witherspoon, signed the Declaration of Independence. On the 18th of July, 1776, the first Legislature of New Jersey, under the Constitution, met in Princeton, and organized the new State government; and Princeton continued the capital until the latter part of 1778. During four months, from June 20 to Nov. 4, 1788, the American Congress held its sessions in the library-room of the college; and Washington, for some time in attendance, issued his farewell orders to the Revolutionary armies from the house of Judge Berrien on Rocky Hill. The village itself, numbering three thousand inhabitants, is distinguished only by its fine trees and elevated situation; but in recent times the beautiful and spacious buildings erected by munificent patrons for the uses of the college and the theological seminary are, upon the whole, unrivaled in America. In this respect the village is admitted to approach more nearly than any other the ideal of an English university town. The cemetery has grown to be one of the most celebrated in the land; for here lie a long line of illustrious citizens, presidents, and professors, including the Bays and Stocktons of New Jersey, Edwards, Davies, and Witherspoon, of the college, and the Alexanders, Miller, and Hodge, etc., of the seminary.

PRINCETON, 1928

PRINCETON.
2 Vice-Presidents of the United States, 810 high magistrates, 187 presidents and professors of colleges and theological seminaries, of whom 32 have been in the service of their alma mater. It possesses one of the most rare and extensive paleontological museums in the country, and its united libraries amount to about 75,000.

III. THEOLOGY. — The philosophy taught in Princeton from the first, by Jonathan Edwards, Wutherspoon, James McCosh, and L. H. Atwater, has been known as the “Scottish School.”

The representative theologians of Princeton have been Jonathan Edwards, John Witherspoon, Archibald Alexander, and Charles Hodge. These have all been conservative Calvinists of the Old School, of the special type represented by the Westminster Standards. This was true equally of the founders of the seminary, — Ashbel Green, James Richards, and others.

The term “Princeton Theology” originated in New England about 1831 or 1832, and was applied to the general characteristics of that system advanced by the Biblical Repertory and Princeton Review in its controversies with the disciples of Drs. Hopkins, Emmons, Finney, and Taylor, the leaders of various phases of the “New-England School.” Of this “Princeton Theology” the characteristic was close and persistent adherence to the type of Calvinism taught in the Westminster Standards as these are interpreted in the light of the classical literature of the Swiss and Dutch and English Puritan theologians, who wrote after the date of the synod of Dort, especially Francis Turretin of Geneva, and John Owen of England. The phrases “Princeton Party” and “The Princeton Gentlemen” were applied to the party represented by the Biblical Repertory during the controversies which terminated in the secession of the Presb-byterian Church in 1882. This “party” was in perfect doctrinal agreement with the Old-School party in that struggle, but hesitated to follow its leaders in some of their more extreme and debatable methods of reform, such as the “Act and Testimony” of 1883, etc.

IV. LIT. — The sources of information on the subjects embraced in this article are The History of the College of New Jersey, from its Origin in 1746 to Commencement of 1854, by John Maclean, tenent president of the college, Phila., 1877, 2 vols., J. B.
Lippincott & Co.; The History of Princeton and its Institutions, by John Hageman, Phila., 1879, 2 vols., J. B. Lippincott & Co.; Princeton College during the Eighteenth Century, by Rev. Archibad Alexander, D.D., 1872; The Princeton Book,
A Series of Sketches pertaining to the History, etc., of the College and Theological Seminary, illus. with views and portraits, Boston, 1879, 4to, Houghton, Osgood, & Co.; A Brief History of the Theological Seminary, pamphlet, by Dr. Samuel Miller, Princeton, 1888; The General Catalogue of the College and Theological Seminary, by Dr. W.
H. Green, 8vo, 330 pp.; the Lives of Drs. Archibad and Joseph Addison Alexander, of Dr. Samuel Miller, Ashbel Green, and Charles Hodge. The Biblical Repertory and Princeton Review, from 1825 to 1872, Dr. Charles Hodge editor-in-chief, represents the “Princeton school” by discussions on all topics, biblical, theological, and ecclesiastical.

Dr. Samuel Miller contributed between 1830 and 1842 twenty-five articles; Dr. Archibald Alexander, in all, seventy-seven articles; Dr. Joseph Addison Alexander, ninety-three; Dr. James W. Alexander, century; Dr. James H. Atwater, sixty-six; and Dr. Charles Hodge, a hundred and forty-two.

Mr. Hageman, in his History of Princeton, etc., has enumerated seventy authors, citizens of Princeton, principally officers of the college and seminary. These have issued about four hundred and thirty distinct volumes, besides a larger number of printed essays, sermons, orations, not yet collected. Not counting the works of the immortal Edwards, the principal permanent works which

PRIOR and PRIORESS are, as titles of monastic officials, of comparatively late date,—from the time of Pope Celestine V. towards the end of the thirteenth century. With respect to priors, a distinction must be noticed between a prior clausularis and a prior counselialis. The former was simply a subordinate officer of the abbot, appointed by him, and in certain cases acting as his substitute; while the latter was himself the head of a monastery, and exercising the same authority as an abbot.

PRISCILLIANISTS, so called from their founder, Priscillian, were a religious sect which flourished in Spain and Gaul from the fourth to the sixth century, but was declared heretical, and finally put down, by the Catholic Church. Among its peculiar tenets the following were the most conspicuous. There is only one God, and the Trinity is only a triple form of revelation; but from God emanate spirits, which, however, gradually deviate more and more from the divine perfection. The world was created by such a spirit, but by no means by a perfect one; and the condition of the world soon became so much the worse as it fell under the influence of the Devil. The Devil is not a fallen angel, not even a creature of God. He developed spontaneously from chaos and darkness, and is the principle and substance of evil. From him come plagues, diseases, sufferings, etc. The human body is his handiwork. The human soul, on the contrary, emanates from God; and, to save it from the Devil, Christ appeared on earth. But Christ was not a real man, and not actually born by Mary. He only assumed human flesh, without also assuming a human soul; and he was altogether exempted from the human process of growth and development. From these doctrinal tenets the Priscillianists derived a very austere asceticism. They abstained altogether from flesh; they took great care not to put any children into the world, etc. Externally they maintained connection with the church, and professed to be good Catholics, only that they fasted on Sundays and on Christmas Day, and avoided swallowing the elements in the Lord's Supper. But secretly they celebrated divine service in their own manner, allowing women to officiate, and opening the doors both for magic and licentiousness. They also kept their doctrines secret, and for that purpose they considered both lying and perjury admissible. They had a literature. Besides Priscillian, their founder, Latronianus, Tiberianus, and Dictinnius are mentioned among them as authors. But that literature has altogether perished.

The sect was first discovered in Spain in 379. Priscillian, a rich and gifted man, of a distinguished family, devoted himself from early youth to philosophical and theological studies, disdaining all vain and frivolous enjoyments. Like many other gifted men of his time, he fell into the hands of the Devil. But his ambition did not allow him to become a mere adept of another sect. He aspired to form a sect himself. Mixing up various elements of Gnosticism and Manichæism with Christianity, he developed a system of his own, and succeeded in having it adopted, not only by a number of women, but even by two bishops, Justantius and Salvianus. The miserable condition of Catholic Christianity, and the degeneration, spiritual and moral, of the hierarchy, contributed much to his success, not to speak of the general longing after the hidden truth, which the Manichaean propaganda had awakened far and wide in the congregations. Bishop Hyginus of Cordova was the first to take notice of the spreading heresy. But he was a man of Christian feeling and of discrimination: he wished to convert the heretics. Quite otherwise was the case with Bishop Idaicus of Sessa and with Bishop Ithacius of Sossersa: they wanted to suppress the heresy. As the condemnation and excommunication launched against the Priscillianists by the synod of Saragossa (380) proved of no avail, the two bishops appealed to the emperor, Gratianus; and he actually issued an edict threatening the heretics with banishment from the country. Meanwhile Priscillian, who had become Bishop of Avila, repaired to Italy, and exerted himself to win Ambrose of Milan, and Damasus of Rome, for his cause. In that he failed, but by bribery he succeeded in having the imperial edict cancelled. Shortly after, however, Gratianus was assassinated; and a new appeal was made by the Catholic bishops to his successor, Maximus. In spite of the protest of Bishop Martin of Tours, who declared it a crime for the secular power to interfere in matters purely religious, Maximus condemned Priscillian to death, as a heretic; and he was decapitated at Tresves in 385. It was the first time that a Christian was punished with death on account of heresy, and all Christendom felt the shock.

The death of the leader, however, was not the end of the movement. The military force which Maximus sent against the Priscillianists was recalled at the instance of Bishop Martin of Tours; and, in spite of the condemnation of the synod of Toledo (in 400), the sect spread freely. The confusion became still worse when the Arian Visigoths broke into the country. They hated the Catholics, and they were too rude to really understand the heretics. At that period Orosius wrote against the Manichaes, and Augustine, Leo the Great. But every thing proved in vain until King Theodemir abandoned Arianism, and joined the Catholic Church; then the synod of Braga (563) succeeded in employing really effective measures against the heretics, and the sect soon disappeared. See the pertinent writings of Orosius, Augustine, Jerome, Leo the Great, and Sulpicius Severus also S. van Parys, Diss. de Prisc., Utrecht, 1748, and L. v. Kortright: De ker. Prisc., Copenhagen, 1846.

ALBECHT VOGEL.
PROBATION.

PROBABILISM. 1931.

PROBABILISM, in morals, denotes a view, according to which it is not necessary that the will shall be determined upon a probable opinion of truth; it is sufficient to act upon such a sure conviction of truth: this view was first developed by the Greek Sophists, and afterwards by the Jewish Talmudists. In the Christian Church the first attempt at a method of settling the teaching of the Church with respect to the condition of the soul after death was made by the Greek Fathers, after Chrysostom, who composed a certain "opinio probabile," or frase pia (see Gass: Geschichte d. chr. Ethik, i. 234), and in the medieval penitentials, which, with the formula nihil nocet ("it does not hurt"), opened up a wide field to moral indifference. Well prepared for the casuists and the Dominican theologians of the later middle ages, the view was finally brought into system by the Jesuit moralists. Gabriel Vasquez was the first to adopt it, about 1568: with Escobar, who died 1633, it reached its full bloom. He discussed, for instance, the question whether it is sufficient to love God once in one's life (Vasquez), or thrice (Henriquez), or once every three years (Coninch), on the basis of the proposition: "Since the condition of opinio probabilis, that is, the opinion of some doctor gravis et probus, is quoted for each proposition. Personally he adopts the view of Henriquez, but he declares that the confessor is morally bound to give absolute commitment on any of these terms. In 1820 the Sorbonne protested against the doctrine of Probabilis and the Anti-probability school. In 1845 Alexander VII. felt compelled to disavow a number of the propositions of the Probabilists, and in 1679 Innocent XI. expressed himself still more plainly on the subject. Nevertheless, when, in 1831, the general of the Jesuits, Tyron Gonzalez, published his Anti-probabilist Fundamenta theologiae moralis, he raised such a storm in the society, that he barely escaped deposition, and the Jesuit moralists continued to teach their old doctrines under various modifications; as Probabilism pure and simple, which asserts that it is by no means necessary to prefer a more to a less probable opinion; or Zequivocal probabilism, which demands that the more probable opinion shall always be chosen, etc. See Sam. Rachel: Examen probabilistat Jesuitice, Helmsst., 1864; Conta: De probabilitate morali, Jena, 1728; Concina: Storia del probabil. e rigorismo, Lucca, 1748, 2 vols.; Joz. Huber: Der Jesuitenorden, Berlin, 1873, pp. 284 sqq. Zöckler.

PROBATION. Future, the doctrine taught by some modern German divines, that the offer of the gospel will be made to men in the next life who never had a probation in the present life. It must be distinguished from purgatory, where souls are supposed to undergo purification through penal suffering; from the doctrine of the intermediate state, the process of sanctification, incomplete at death, is carried on to perfection; and from Universalism in all its forms. How long the period of post mortem probation lasts is not asserted; though, if it exist at all, there is no reason why it should terminate before the judgment. The most natural mode of conceiving of it is to suppose that the conditions of the sinner as to motive and will, and of the gospel as to the requirements of faith and repentance, are carried over into the intermediate state, covering the period between death and the resurrection. Some hold that all who die unregenerate will have the opportunity in the next life of repenting, and believing in Christ; others (and this is the more common view) limit future probation to the heathen, to infants dying in infancy, and all other persons to whom the gospel had not been preached in this life. In support of one or the other, or both, of these views, it is urged:

1. That it is wrong to make a sharp antithesis between the embodied and the disembodied condition of the soul; that, while death is a crisis, we have no right to regard it as the terminus of all gracious influence and opportunity. In reply to this, however, it should be said that the contrast between the present and the future life is made expressly, or implied, in the New Testament. "It is appointed unto men once to die, but after death the judgment" (Heb. ix. 27).

2. That the Bible condemns no one to whom the gospel has not been brought home, and that in case of infants dying in infancy, and of infants dying in infancy, it is essential to any fair treatment of them, that offers of the gospel be made to them after death. To this it is replied, that the heathen are not condemned because they rejected Christ, but because they sin. As many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law; and the infants dying in infancy are condemned. It is true that the Bible conditions salvation by belief, and that infants cannot believe; but it is far more rational to suppose that the condition of faith applies only to those who were capable of being outwardly called than to suppose that infants dying in infancy are condemned. This, however, it should be said that the contrast between the present and the future life is made expressly, or implied, in the New Testament. "It is appointed unto men once to die, but after death the judgment" (Heb. ix. 27).

3. That Christ went and preached to the spirits in prison (1 Pet. iii. 19). To this argument it is enough to reply that this is a very difficult passage, and that it is not certain whether the spirits were preached to in prison, or whether they were preaching in prison. No passage shows for their disobedience had been in prison ever since; that, supposing that Christ went to Hades with a proclamation to the antediluvians, we are not told what it was — may it or may not have been the gospel; and that although such overtures were made to the antediluvians, and at a particular crisis in the economy of grace, it does not follow that they should be continued ever after.

4. That other passages of Scripture furnish a basis for the belief in future probation. The strongest of these are Matt. xii. 32, and 1 Pet. iv. 6. From the first it is argued, and the high authority of Augustine is quoted in support of the exegesis, that the non-forgiveness of sins against the Holy Ghost in the next world implies the possibility of forgiveness of all other sins: so Lange, Olshausen, and others. But there is no reason to believe that these words meant more than that blasphemy against the Holy Ghost can never be forgiven, as, indeed, is taught in so many words in Mark iii. 29. In regard to the second passage, there is the difficulty referred to above, of knowing whether the text means to teach that the gospel was preached to men while they were in the state of the dead, or whether, having been not follow rejection of the gospel, though that rejection in him. Condemnation, therefore, does not follow probation in the future state. The argument is partly also in wrong conceptions regarding the covenant of grace. For, in reply to those who advocate the theory, it may be urged:—

1. The Apostle's Epistle to the Romans, if the heathen has not had a fair opportunity, this cannot be urged in favor of a future probation for the heathen. But the Bible emphasizes the race-unity of mankind. It teaches the representative responsibility of Adam, and thereby makes plain that the race has its probation in him. Condemnation, therefore, does not follow rejection of the gospel, though that rejection may enhance it. The gospel finds men in a state of condemnation; and, though acceptance of Christ may be necessary to salvation, rejection of him is not the condition of condemnation.

2. There is no adequate explanation of the apostle's Epistle to the Romans, if the heathen can be justly condemned only after they have rejected Christ. Paul's argument is unequivocally to the effect that the light of conscience is sufficient to condemn them.

3. The Scriptures not only distinctly say, "After death, the judgment," but they teach that we are to "stand before the judgment-seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body." The references to the future life contained in the New Testament imply that this life is in antithesis to the life to come, as to working, and receiving reward, as to sowing and reaping, as to running, and reaching the goal. The sins that bar entrance into heaven are sins that presuppose the present conditions of our earthly life. Sodom and Gomorrah are represented as suffering the vengeance of eternal fire. Christ says, "Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and my words in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him also shall the Son of man be ashamed when he cometh in the glory of his Father with all his holy angels." These considerations should be enough to show how perilous it is to neglect salvation in this world in the hope of having opportunities of repentance in the world to come, and how mistakenly the Church would be acting if the hope (for which the Bible gives no warrant) that the heathen are to have a probation after death should lead her to relax her effort to evangelize the world.

Lit. — Schaff: Com. (Lange) on Matt. xii. 32; Die Stunde wider den heil. Geist; Oosterzee: Christian Dogmatics; Dorner: System of Christian Doctrine; Craven: Exxcursum on Hades (Lange's Com. on 1) While it may be; Craven: Christian Dogmatics; Farbar: Eternal Hope. Francis L. Patton

PROCESION. See NKO-PLATONISM.

PROCOPIUS OF CESAREA, b. at Cesarea in Palestina; studied law at Byertus, and accompanied Belisarius as legal advisor on his campaign in Persia in 526; visited Africa, 533-536, and Italy, 556-559; and settled in 542 in Constantinople, where he was made prefect in 562. The date of his death is not known. He wrote a work on the wars of Justinian, another on his public buildings, and a third, which was not published until after his death, and forms a kind of supplement to the first. They have considerable interest to the church historian. The best edition of them is that by Dindorf, Bonn, 1833-38, 3 vols.

PROCOPIUS OF CÄZARA lived in Constanti nople during the reign of Justin I (518-527), and compiled from the works of the Fathers commentaries on the Octateuch (ed. C. Clauser, Zürich, 1555), on Isaiah (ed. J. Curterius, Paris, 1580), and on Kings and Chronicles (ed. I. Meursius, Lyons, 1620), thus opening the long series of catena-writers.

PROCOPIUS (surnamed The Great, to distinguish him from contemporaries of the same name) was a Bohemian priest, who on the death of Zizka, in 1424, succeeded him as leader of the Hussite army. Procopius was sprung from the lower nobility, and had been a follower of Hus. As a priest he never bore arms; but he learned warfare under Zizka, and conducted campaigns with consummate skill. He was more of a statesman than Zizka, and his policy was to terrify Europe into peace with Bohemia. He wished for peace, but an honorable peace. In 1426 he invaded Saxony, and defeated the Germans at Aussig. In 1427 he turned to ignominious flight, at Tachau, a vast host of Crusaders. In 1431 he still more ignominiously routed the forces of Germany at Taus. These victories of Procopius rendered inevitable the assembling of the Council of Basel, which was the only hope of Europe for the settlement of the Bohemian question, which could not be settled by the sword. With the council, Procopius was willing to negotiate for an honorable peace. In January, 1433, Procopius and fourteen other Bohemian leaders came to Basel in confer with the council. The disputation which ensued contains the most complete statement of the Hussite views. Procopius respected Cardinal Cesarini, the president of the council; and the conference was conducted with moderation and good feeling on both sides. When the conference was over, envoy were sent by the council to a diet in Prague to gauge the feeling of Bohemia. Bohemia, anxious to present a united front to the council, strove to reduce the town of Pilsen, which still held by Catholicism. The siege did not succeed, and a mutiny against Procopius arose in the army. The proud spirit of Procopius was broken; and he retired from the management of affairs in September, 1433. Soon after this, the Bohemian Diet accepted the Compacts as a basis of negotiation with the council. When once the idea of peace prevailed in Bohemia, it spread rapidly; and a party in favor of the restoration of Sigismund as king of Bohemia began to form. The barons of Bohemia and Moravia formed a royalist league, and Procopius roused himself to oppose them. In May, 1434, the barons' army met the Taborites, under Procopius, at Lipan. After a desperate fight, Procopius was defeated and killed. With him fell the power of the Taborites, and the moderate party was thenceforth predominant in the management of Bohemian affairs.

Lit.—The authorities for this period are numerous. The chief may be found in Häfliger, Geschichteschreiber der Husitischen Bewegung, Vienna, 1856-60, 3 vols.; Palacky, Urgedichte zu Geschichte des Hussitenkriegs, von 1419 bis 1436, Prague, 1872-73, 2 vols. The conferences with the Council of Basel are given by various writers in Monumenta Conciliorum Generalit Sern. Protop. Et Extraordin. II. The history of the church under the Council of Basel is given by Hofler, Gesch. von Böhmen, vol. iii., Prague, 1855. Mandell Creighton.

PRODICIANS, a sect of Antinomian Gnostics, founded by Prodicus in the second century, claimed, as the sons of the most high God, and a royal race, to be bound by no laws. They rejected the sabbath and all external ceremonies as something fit only for those who stood under the sway of the demigure. As their authorities, they quoted some apocryphal writings of Zoroaster.

PROFESSIO FIDEI TRIDENTINÆ. See Tridentine Profession of Faith.

PROLOCUTOR, chairman of a convocation.

PROVINCIAE. 1838

PROPPAGANDA. The I. Definition. — The missionary operations of the Roman-Catholic Church were conducted, from the thirteenth century on, by the different religious orders. The Jesuits were specially active in missionary enterprises; and Ignatius Loyola started the idea of establishing colleges for the training of missionaries from the lands where missionary operations were to be carried on. On June 21, 1622, Gregory XV., the first pupil of the Jesuits who reached the papal dignity, founded the Congregatio de Propaganda Fide (the Society for the Propagation of the Faith). This society, as well as the training institute in its palace, and the whole missionary system of the Catholic Church, is called the Propaganda. The congregation of the Propaganda includes all the cardinals, and has the entire missionary work of the church under its supervision. When it undertakes a missionary enterprise, it confides the new field to the care of some religious order, and sends out missionaries under the charge of an apostolic (or apostolicus). As the work advances, the Pope, by reason of his authority as universal bishop, substitutes for the prefect an episcopus in partibus (provisional bishop), who is also called apostolic vicar, and finally, if the success warrants it, establishes a bishopric. On account of the heresy of Protestant lands, they are included, with heathen lands, under the head of missionary territory. Pius IX. even went so far as to establish a congregation of the Propaganda for the Greek Church (per gli affari di Rite orientale). Protestants, being in the eyes of the Catholic Church heretics, are to be brought into subjection to its discipline. The bishoprics in Germany, North America, England, and Holland, are missionary bishoprics, and it is in this sense that their bishops have oversight over the heretical Protestants. The Bishop of Paderborn, in 1864, did not hesitate to call himself "the lawful overarch of the Protestants living in his see." The bishops in these lands are in constant communication with the Propaganda at Rome. The doctrine promulgated by Benedict XIV., and reaffirmed by Pius VI. in 1791, is held in the Catholic Church, that the heathen are not to be forced into obedience to the Church, but that Protestants who have received baptism are so to be forced (sunt cogendi). The Church calls to its help the civil power to secure this end, and, if it should ever gain the supremacy in Germany or any other Protestant land, the Propaganda will carry out this policy. See Melzer: D. Propaganda, ihre Provinzen u. ihr Recht mit besonderer Rücksicht auf Deutschland, Göttingen, 1852 sq.; Bullarium Cong. de Propaganda Fide, Rome, 1839 sqq. Melzer.

II. Missionary Operations among the Heathen. Western Africa. — Roman-Catholic missions in Western Africa go back to the middle ages. The Portuguese discoverers who took these regions in the latter half of the fifteenth century planted the Christian Church through the Dominicans and Franciscans who accompanied them. In the kingdom of Congo the favor of the king (who became a convert) and the compulsion of the Inquisition secured for the Christian doctrines a pretty wide diffusion. The chief conversions gave rise to a bishopric in the early part of the sixteenth century, and gloried in a number of churches and convents. The Jesuits entered in 1547, and for a time revived the mission, which had begun to show signs of decay. But the gradual departure of the Portuguese was accompanied with the decline of Christianity; and when, in the eighteenth century, all commerce of Europeans with Congo ceased, the land reverted to its heathen condition. Since the recent expedition of Stanley, the Catholics have again, under the protection of the Portuguese flag, entered the old field. An apostolic prefecture was established in the French possessions of Senegambia in 1765.
The work has been prosecuted with some vigor
since 1848, when the congregation of the Most Holy Heart of Mary, established for the conversion of the negroes, took up the work. In the first two Guineas, with Gaboon for its centre, which he founded in 1849, had 2,000 adherents began to show signs of decay. But the missionaries with Congo ceased, the land reverted to its heathen condition. Since the recent expedition
of Stanley, the Catholics have again, under the protection of the Portuguese flag, entered the old field. An apostolic prefecture was established in
the French possessions of Senegambia in 1765.
The work has been prosecuted with some vigor
since 1848, when the congregation of the Most Holy Heart of Mary, established for the conversion
of the negroes, took up the work. In the first two Guineas, with Gaboon for its centre, which he founded in 1849, had 2,000 adherents
began to show signs of decay. But the missionaries with Congo ceased, the land reverted to its heathen condition. Since the recent expedition
of Stanley, the Catholics have again, under the protection of the Portuguese flag, entered the old field. An apostolic prefecture was established in
the French possessions of Senegambia in 1765.
The work has been prosecuted with some vigor
since 1848, when the congregation of the Most Holy Heart of Mary, established for the conversion
of the negroes, took up the work. In the first two Guineas, with Gaboon for its centre, which he founded in 1849, had 2,000 adherents
began to show signs of decay. But the missionaries with Congo ceased, the land reverted to its heathen condition. Since the recent expedition
of Stanley, the Catholics have again, under the protection of the Portuguese flag, entered the old field. An apostolic prefecture was established in
the French possessions of Senegambia in 1765.
The work has been prosecuted with some vigor
since 1848, when the congregation of the Most Holy Heart of Mary, established for the conversion
of the negroes, took up the work. In the first two Guineas, with Gaboon for its centre, which he founded in 1849, had 2,000 adherents
began to show signs of decay. But the missionaries with Congo ceased, the land reverted to its heathen condition. Since the recent expedition
of Stanley, the Catholics have again, under the protection of the Portuguese flag, entered the old field. An apostolic prefecture was established in
the French possessions of Senegambia in 1765.
The work has been prosecuted with some vigor
since 1848, when the congregation of the Most Holy Heart of Mary, established for the conversion
of the negroes, took up the work. In the first two Guineas, with Gaboon for its centre, which he founded in 1849, had 2,000 adherents
began to show signs of decay. But the missionaries with Congo ceased, the land reverted to its heathen condition. Since the recent expedition
of Stanley, the Catholics have again, under the protection of the Portuguese flag, entered the old field. An apostolic prefecture was established in
the French possessions of Senegambia in 1765.
The work has been prosecuted with some vigor
since 1848, when the congregation of the Most Holy Heart of Mary, established for the conversion
of the negroes, took up the work. In the first two Guineas, with Gaboon for its centre, which he founded in 1849, had 2,000 adherents
began to show signs of decay. But the missionaries with Congo ceased, the land reverted to its heathen condition. Since the recent expedition
of Stanley, the Catholics have again, under the protection of the Portuguese flag, entered the old field. An apostolic prefecture was established in
the French possessions of Senegambia in 1765.
The work has been prosecuted with some vigor
since 1848, when the congregation of the Most Holy Heart of Mary, established for the conversion
of the negroes, took up the work. In the first two Guineas, with Gaboon for its centre, which he founded in 1849, had 2,000 adherents
began to show signs of decay. But the missionaries with Congo ceased, the land reverted to its heathen condition. Since the recent expedition
of Stanley, the Catholics have again, under the protection of the Portuguese flag, entered the old field. An apostolic prefecture was established in
the French possessions of Senegambia in 1765.
The work has been prosecuted with some vigor
since 1848, when the congregation of the Most Holy Heart of Mary, established for the conversion
of the negroes, took up the work. In the first two Guineas, with Gaboon for its centre, which he founded in 1849, had 2,000 adherents
began to show signs of decay. But the missionaries with Congo ceased, the land reverted to its heathen condition. Since the recent expedition
of Stanley, the Catholics have again, under the protection of the Portuguese flag, entered the old field. An apostolic prefecture was established in
the French possessions of Senegambia in 1765.
It is difficult to determine the value of these figures, as all the European Catholics in India, and all the old and nominal Christians, are included in the table. The Catholic schools of India had only 31,436 pupils in 1868, while the Protestant schools had 115,735. The Catholic schools of India had 115,735 pupils in 1868, while the Protestant schools had 115,735.

Farther India.— Malacca was made a bishopric in 1557, after Xavier had labored there for two years. The early missions in Burmah accomplished little. In 1722 it was made an apostolic vicariate. Since 1556 it had been under the control of the Paris Missionary Society. In 1556 it was divided into two vicariates, with 16,000 Catholics. The Siam mission was in a flourishing condition in the last century. After a period of lapsed activity, it was revived in 1840. Siam now includes two vicariates under the control of the Paris Seminary, with 20,000 Catholics. The missions in Cochin-China and Annam were more numerous in the seventeenth century. Two hundred missionaries suffered martyrdom there, but Christianity persisted. Among the heroic Jesuits, Alexander of Rhodes deserves mention. Napoleon, by the permission of the Christian rulers, and in 1614 all of them were expelled from the country, and a relentless persecution instituted against the Christians. In 1580 the Catholics entered Japan once again, and were rejoiced to find the relics of their old congregations. The country is divided between the two apostolic vicariates, Nagaasaki, with 20,000 Catholics in 1881, and Tokio.

Australia.— A missionary station was established in 1846, by the Benedictines, among the aborigines. It is at New Nursia, West Australia. Spanish monks instruct about 300 natives in the art of agriculture and different trades.

New Zealand, etc.— In 1833 Gregory XVI. organized the apostolic vicariate of Eastern Oceania, and three years later that of Western Oceania. Bishop Pompallier arrived in New Zealand in 1838, planted stations where Protestant missions had borne most fruit, and succeeded in winning 5,000 Maoris in the first twelve years. War deprived the church of these converts, and in 1870 the Bishop of Auckland complained that there was no mission among the Maoris. The missions in New Caledonia, begun in 1843, included, in 1875, 3,000 baptized persons. The Loyalty Islands, which had been a fruitful field for the London Missionary Society, were forcibly annexed by France in 1864. Catholic missionaries entered the country, preceded by French colonists. The natives have proved remarkably faithful, and in 1877 there were 9,000 Catholics. The Loyalty Islands were entered in 1844, and 6,700 Catholicks are attached to the islands. How many of these are natives is not stated. The apostolic prefect has his residence on Oualau.

Central Oceania constitutes an apostolic vicariates.
| West Indies | The natives died out, and the negroes were baptized without much preparation. In South America the Jesuits carried on extensive missionary operations in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and trained the Indians in arts of civilized life. With the abolition of the order, the Indians were neglected, and returned to a semi-heathen condition.

| The Hawaiian Islands | The successes are frequently exaggerated, and the failures suppressed; while the achievements on the fields cultivated by Protestant societies are magnified and glorified. Under these circumstances it is not possible to get a fair conception of the success of Catholic missions. It is a fact, however, that their revival in the middle of this century followed the hard and heroic pioneer work of Protestant missionaries. So far as we can judge, the results of Roman-Catholic missions in this period have been, upon the whole, very small, and disproportionate to the amount of labor spent. The number of converts made in this century would be very small if the multitudes converted at an earlier period were not counted.

| Prophecy in the Old Testament | The object and signification of the Old Testament prophecy is seen from Deut. xviii. 9-22. Before his death Moses appointed a successor, in the person of Joshua, for the theocracy, and laid down rules for the monarchy, thus indicating, that, with his death, the revelation of the divine will was not to be final, but that, rather, new organs of revelation were to be expected. The theocratical people was not to be left without a guide, thus being led to take refuge in heathenish divination. And, as the people was able to bear the terrors of the appearance of God, Jehovah intended to communicate his will to the people through men, by raising from among the people, from time to time, men like Moses. These messengers and interpreters of Jehovah bear the ordinary name of nabi, derived from the verb naba, "to bubble forth," which finds its explanation in Exodus iv. 1-17; where God says to Moses, "Aaron shall be thy nabi, i.e., speaker." The prophetic office was not, like that of the priests, a prerogative of the tribe or family, but was to be in connection with the people of the covenant.

| The Historic Origin of Prophecy | The historic origin of prophecy is connected with the foundation of the theocracy (cf. Jer. vii. 25). Moses, in spite of his high position (Num. xii. 6-8), is really the first in the prophetic office (Deut. xxxiv. 10). He is the prophet, not only in the wider sense in which the name nabi was already used by the patriarchs (Gen. xx. 7; Ps. cv. 15), but in the special signification, because he is in possession of that gift of the spirit which makes the prophet (Num. xi. 25). Side by side with Moses, but still in Josua, is mentioned as a prophetess (Exod. x. 20). Josua is nowhere called Nabi. In the period of the Judges the prophetic office appears in Deborah (Judg. iv. 4, 6, 14). The same book also mentions (vi. 8) a prophet; and 1 Sam. ii. 27, a "man of God," a prophet probably, is spoken of, who predicted to Eli the death of his two sons. But under Samuel the prophetic office became a more formal institution, and his successors, as Jeiel, Azariah, Amasai, Amariah, and Anna, may be regarded as the real founder of the Old-Testament prophetic office (cf. Acts iii. 24). Israel, without the ark of the covenant, now experiences that the presence of God is everywhere where he is sought with earnestness, and that the mediatorship between God and the people now rested in the person of the divinely inspired prophets. The many prophets which then existed Samuel brought together, and formed the so-called schools of the prophets, or, rather, prophetical society. That Levites also belonged to this society, we may infer from the fact that not only was Samuel a Levite, but also that sacred music was cultivated in that society, which had its seat at Ramah. We may also assume that sacred literature was cultivated there, as, no doubt, prophetic writing, especially theothric historiography, commenced with Samuel (cf. 1 Chron. xxix. 29). At that time the prophetic office may have been laid for that great historic work which is so often mentioned in the books of Kings, and which undoubtedly was known to the chronicler-writer. That the members of the prophetic society did not lead an ascetic life, we see from the public activity which the prophets now exercised. With the institution of the formal prophetic society, and of the prophetic historiography, the prophetic office now became watchmen of the theocracy: hence they are called tsophim or metappim (Mic. vii. 4; Jer. vi. 17; Ezek. iii. 17, xxxii. 7). The watchmen exercised their functions not only over the people, but also over the monarchy; and the ways of the people and of their leaders were judged in accordance with the divine law. In short, they became the spokesmen of the will of the Lord, and the historic function, and the prophets now bore the title of the watchmen of the theocracy. The relation of the prophetic office to the monarchy is shown in the behavior of Samuel towards Saul (cf. 1 Sam. xv. 11, xvi. 1); and Samuel's word (1 Sam. xv. 22) is, so to say, the programme for the position of the prophetic office to the sacrificial cult. After the election of David in the place of Saul, Samuel retired to Ramah for the remainder of his life. With the arrival of the prophets had no intercourse (1 Sam. xviii. 8). It seems, however, that they were on good terms with David; and Gad the prophet (1 Sam. xxii. 5), who is mentioned beside Nathan, probably belonged to the society at Ramah. The chief musicians appointed by David (1 Chron. xxv. 1, 5; 2 Chron. xxix. 30, xxxv. 15), though called prophets and seers, must not be placed in the same line with Gad and Nathan, although the sacred song emanating from the heart moved by the Divine Spirit may be called prophesying. Under Solomon the prophetic office for a time stood in the background, until towards the end of his reign, when his heart was inclined to apostasy, the warning voice of the prophet, perhaps of Ahijah the Shilonite, was heard (1 Kings xi. 11-14). The great influence which the prophetic office still exercised, and that the people may be seen from what we read of the prophet Shemaiah (1 Kings xii. 21 sq.; 2 Chron. xi. 2). In the following centuries the activity of the prophetic office was mainly in the kingdom of the ten tribes, the history of which was mainly the conflict between the prophets and the apostatized kings. This religious-political conflict, which had already been inaugurated under Jeroboam, was continued under his successors; and Jehu, Elisha, Ezechias, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Oded, and Nahum are mentioned as the men of God who pleaded the cause of Jehovah. Different, however, was the character of the prophetic office in the kingdom of Judah, where the prophets found a strong support in the theocratic kings. Prophetical societies did not exist there; although it cannot be doubted that prominent prophets had their circles, where they met with their adherents (cf. Isa. viii. 16), and where, in the midst of the apostasy of the people, the Divine Word was studied, and transmitted to future generations. We therefore only meet with individual prophets in the history of the kingdom of Judah. Thus under Rehoboam we find Shemaiah (2 Chron. xii. 5 sq.); under Asa, Azariah, the son of Oded (2 Chron. xv. 1), and Hanani (xvi. 7). Under Jehoshaphat we find Jehu, the son of Hanani (xix. 2), and Elizebor (xx. 37). During Jehoshaphat's reign the work of the priests seems to have been of more influence than that of the prophets, as may be seen from 2 Chron. xvii. 7 sq., where, among those who were sent about to teach the people, no prophets are mentioned. That both prophets and priests acted harmoniously, we see from Joel, who, before the days of the prophetic historiography, was mentioned as both prophet and priest (cf. 1 Kings xi. 32; 2 Chron. xxiv. 23). When a plague visited the country, he brought it about that both priests and people held a fast-day. In the latter part of Joash's reign lived Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, the first martyr of the prophets of Judah (2 Chron. xxiv. 19 sq.). Under Joash's successor, Amaziah, two prophets (2 Chron. xxv. 19 sq.) are mentioned. Taken all in all, the work of the prophets in Judah, with the exception of Isaiah, was of less extent and influence than that of the prophets in the kingdom of the ten tribes.

With Joel, or perhaps with Obadiah, i.e., in the first decades of the ninth century B.C., the beginning was already made with the writings of prophetical books. The older prophets also had uttered prophecies, which were written down in the prophetical books of history. The basis of the prophetic eschatology is already contained in the older testimonies of revelation; but, whilst the former prophets had more regard for the present of the kingdom of God, the prophetical word now views the future. Despised and misjudged by the contemporaries, the prophetical word in its historic fulfillment was to legitimate to future generations God's power, justice, and faithfulness, and was intended as a guide to the pious.
this reason, the word of the prophets had to be transmitted faithfully, which could only be done in writing. This writing-down is therefore often referred to by the prophets as effectuated at divine command (Isa. vii. 1; Hab. ii. 2 sq.; Jer. xxxvi. 2), and, by expressly emphasizing the object of the writing, to show to coming generations the truth of the prophecy (Isa. xxx. 8; Jer. xxx. 2 sq.; cf. Isa. xxxvi. 10). In some cases the writing follows the oral utterance in order to confirm the latter, and where sometimes (Isa. viii. 1 sq.; perhaps Isa. xxx. 8 belongs here also) it was sufficient to note down before witnesses the more salient points. In general, however, the literary activity is independent from the oral preaching; and prophets (like Amos, Hosea, Micah) probably did not write down their prophetic utterances till towards the close of their life, thus transmitting to the world in a formulated order a totality of their prophetic office. That some literary productions have been lost, we may infer from the reference often made to older sources, as Isa. ii. 2-4; Mic. iv. 1-4; Isa. xv. sq. But, on the other hand, we perceive herein an important peculiarity of prophetic literature; viz., the connection which exists between the prophetic books, in so far as the younger prophets in a great many instances looked up the utterances of the older prophets, made them their own, enlarged and developed the same. Thus, e.g., Amos i. 2 follows Joel iii. 16; the younger Micah takes up the close of the discourse of the older (1 Kings xxii. 28). Almost throughout all prophets, especially in Zephaniah and Jeremiah, we find allusions and references to former prophetic works; but herein we perceive the unity of the spirit in which the prophets stand, who, in spite of the changes of times, followed up this one unity of the word of God which they proclaimed; thus also proving the lasting validity of the not yet fulfilled prophecies.

As has already been indicated, the work of Isaiah was of the greatest effect in the kingdom of Judah. At the beginning of his ministry, Judah was in the hands of the powerful reigns of Uzziah and Jotham. And although these kings in general preserved the theocratic order, yet the moral and religious condition of the people was less pleasing; since corruption, idolatry, and other vices had taken a hold upon the people, especially upon the higher classes. In connection with this we find a degenerated priesthood (Mic. iii. 11; Isa. xxviii. 7), which, together with a number of false prophets and flattering demagogues, strengthened the people in their sins (Isa. ix. 14 sq., xxviii. 7; Mic. ii. 11, iii. 5). After Isaiah had already announced under Jotham the coming of the great day of Jehovah (Isa. ii.-vi.), his public activity, as far as we can see from his own book (vii.), commences under Ahaz, in that critical moment when the solemn renovation of the covenant itself, which Jeremiah, amidst many sufferings, carried on till the dissolution of the kingdom, he stood alone as prophet in Jerusalem, assisted only by his companion and pupil, Baruch, in the writing-down and proclaiming of his prophecies. But outside of Jerusalem, in the captivity, the priest Ezekiel was his contemporary fellow-laborer, who, in the fifth year of his captivity, was called to the prophetic office. Ezekiel's position among the... exiles is to be compared with that of the prophets among the ten tribes. Without a temple and sacrifice, he is to the people the nucleus for preaching the Divine Word, and giving them prophetic advice (Ezek. viii. 1, xii. 25, xiv. 1, xx. 1, xxiv. 19). Side by side with the prophetic word, which continually had Israel's future mission in view, those laws, especially the Sabbath, were observed, which could be kept even in heathen lands. These observances were, so to say, a fence for the people, scattered among the nations, against heathenish customs. This must be especially held in view in order to understand Ezekiel and his junior contemporary Daniel. It is true, that the former often speaks of usages and customs (cf. iv. 14, xx. 18); but he does not regard the sanctification of the people in such formalities, as may be seen from the manner in which he exercises his prophetical office, and from his prophecies, according to which the restitution of Israel was mainly conditioned through the outpouring of that spirit which creates a new heart (xvi. 19, xxxvi. 29), and which was to follow, by a new outward form of the theocracy, as the effect of the new life. Ezekiel may have nourished, to some degree, that Levitical spirit which was prominent among the Jews in captivity; but its degeneration was not his fault. As for Daniel, in whose book many thought to have found a support for a righteousness through works, it must not be overlooked, that, in all these instances (as in i. 8 sq., iv. 24, vi. 11), Daniel's adherence to the faith of the laws of his fathers is expressed; and that he did not intend to teach the religion of ceremonials may be seen from his penitential prayer (ix. 4 sq.).

The prophetic office in the exile was not only for the Jews in the diaspora; but it had also, as may be seen from Daniel, a special mission for the Gentiles. It was of the greatest importance, that by transplanting the prophetical office upon heathenish soil, especially upon the main seat of heathenish divination, the Gentiles themselves had the light of the Divine Word in their midst, and their magicians and astrologers had an opportunity to bring their arts face to face with the revelation of the living God. The battle which Jehovah had to fight at the redemption of Israel from Egyptian bondage with Egypt's gods was now repeated, but on a larger scale. Heathendom was to learn where a knowledge of divine counsel, ruling the ways of nations and prophecy of future events, was to be found, in order to measure the reality of its gods. To carry on this battle, besides Daniel, that great unknown was especially called, whose prophetic book is contained in Isa. xi.-irvi. A fruit of victory of this battle is the liberation of the people through Cyrus, who permitted the people to rebuild the temple, which included also the rebuilding of Jerusalem in a certain form by Cyrus; who, however, was not religious, and to this he was probably led by Daniel and an acquaintance with the prophetical word referring to him.

As to the activity of Israel's watchmen (cf. Isa. iii. 8, etc.) after the return of the people to the Holy Land, we know nothing. Our knowledge of the post-exile activity of the prophets commences with the time of hard trials, which began with the interruption of the building of the temple. When despondency took hold on the people, and the better ones doubted whether Israel could still hope for forgiveness of sins, and fulfillment of the divine promises, Haggai and Zechariah were called in the second year of Darius Hystaspes (Ez. v. 1, vi. 14), to take up again the testimony of the ancient prophets (Zech. i. 4, v. 12), and to encourage the people. The day of the Lord was to come in the Near East, but what that every thing depends, not on might of men, but on Jehovah's spirit (iv. 1-6; Hag. ii. 5); and as, in spite of all difficulties, the building of the temple will be completed (Zech. iv. 7-9), so also the completion of the salvation is assured. True, the Gentiles enjoy peace, and Judah is bowed down (i. 8-18); but soon the powers of the world will devour each other (Hag. ii. 6; cf. Zech. i. 18-21); and the kingdom of God will triumph, and receive the best of the Gentiles and their treasures (Hag. ii. 7 sq.; Zech. viii. 20-23), while the people themselves shall be sifted anew (Zech. v.). From this time on, till Nehemiah, prophets are no more mentioned; and the first notice which we have only shows how degenerated the prophetic office was by becoming a tool for political intrigue. Nehemiah was selected by Jehovah that he had appointed prophets for the sake of being proclaimed king by them. Nehemiah, on the other hand, accuses Sanballat of having bribed the prophet Shemariah in order to intimidate him. In connection with this, other prophets also, and prophetesses, Noaditha, are mentioned as opponents of Nehemiah (Neh. vi. 14). To Nehemiah's time, probably, belongs the prophet Malachi, who opposes the religious dead works. The tendency which completed itself afterwards in Pharisaism has now taken a deep root in the people. Malachi opposes the religious dead works (i. 6—ii. 9, iii. 7-12). With the announcement of the divine messenger (iii. 1) prophecy ceases, till, four hundred years later, prophecy once more is revived in that same messenger, who, pointing to the sun of salvation which had already appeared, closes one of the old contending messengers (iii. 1-6); but, by declaring, "He must increase; but I must decrease" (John iii. 30). During that long intervening time, it is Israel's calling to preserve in itself the root of the future congregation of salvation, whilst the root itself was to preserve the oracles of God (Rom. iii. 2). To do the latter was the main object of the scribes, who took the place of inspired prophets. As during all this time the people are left without the ark of the covenant and the Urin and Thummim, so also without the prophetic spirit. Not even the Maccabean period can produce a prophet (1 Macc..iv. 49, ix. 27, xiv. 41). As soon, however, as the time of the messianic salvation appears, the power of the prophetic spirit is again felt (Luke ii. 25, 26). It is also remarkable, that as before the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, false prophets were leading the people to destruction, so, likewise, before the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, a number of pseudo-prophets became the leaders of the people (Joseph. : Jewish War, VI. 5. sq.), while the words of the true prophets were not heeded (VI. 6, 8).
PROPHETS IN N. TESTAMENT. 1940

PROPITIATION.

PROPHETS IN N. TESTAMENT. 1940

PROPITIATION.

PROPHETS IN N. TESTAMENT. 1940

PROPITIATION.

From Matt. xxiii. 34 (cf. Luke xi. 49) we learn, that, after the ascension of Christ, prophets were to come who would proclaim, especially to the Jewish people, the truth of the salvation as it is in Christ, and thus bring about the decision either for or against. The testimony of the first Christian church is entirely of a prophetic character. The influence of the Pentecostal spirit is still more marked in the prophesying of the believers who were so suddenly and miraculously filled with his power (Acts ii. 4): their word is followed by signs and wonders (iii. 6, iv. 30, v. 12, 15, 16, ix. 34, 40). The judicial power of their prophecy reveals itself in the history of Ananias and Sapphira (v. 1-11). The Church as such, in her appearance and condition, as well as in her activity, stands like a prophet of God in the midst of the people; and in the consciousness of this her office she abandons every worldly avocation. She has a charge committed to her by the Lord; through her, God will give "repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins" (v. 31); she is the Zion that bringeth good tidings, and which saith unto the cities of Judah, "Behold your God!" (Isa. xi. 9.)

From this church proceed the different prophets, such as Stephen, who experienced what the Lord prophesied (Matt. xxiii. 34). At his death the Pentecostal Church for the first time comes in conflict with the carnal-minded Israel: her testimony is resisted with blood, but she does not cease. Those who were scattered abroad (Acts viii. 4) founded the diaspora, to which St. James addresses his Epistle: they are the prophets (Jas. v. 10) who went about in Judea, Samaria, Galilee, and preached the word of God to the Jews.

In transferring the office of the Church to her members, we thus get the wide range in which the idea of the New-Testament prophecy is to be taken. It corresponds entirely with Deut. xviii. 18 sq.; and thus prophet is such a one, who is called by the spirit of God, here by the spirit of Jesus Christ, to become the organ of communicating the truth in such a manner that his testimony, with convincing power of the truth, proves itself to the hearers as the word of God (2 Cor. ii. 14-17). The prophetical illumination comprises the contents and form of the speech (Matt. x. 16, 20). It does not exclude the subjective activities of the prophets, but includes it (1 Cor. xiv. 22), and lifts it up beyond the natural degree of knowledge and faculty, and renders it serviceable to the higher purposes of the Holy Spirit. The object of prophecy is the edification of the congregation (1 Cor. iv. 4), and this also must be taken in the widest sense.

In the Acts of the Apostles, mention is made of the following, as men of prophetic calling: Agabus (xii. 28), Barnabas, Simeon Niger, Lucus of Cyrene, Manaen, and Saul (xiii. 1), from among whom Barnabas and Saul were separated for the work whereunto the Holy Ghost had called them. Judas and Silas, who were sent with Barnabas and Saul to Antioch (xii. 25), were also called prophets; and prophetical faculties were also given to the four virgin daughters of Philip (xxi. 9).

The charisma of prophecy was not limited to these individuals. It was found in the congregations of the apostolic times everywhere. Wherever Paul speaks of the gifts, offices, faculties, of the Church (Rom. xii. 6, Cor. ii-xiv., Eph. iv. 11; 1 Thess. v. 20), he also mentions the prophets immediately after the apostles (1 Cor. xii. 28; Ephes. iv. 11). He distinguishes between prophets and evangelists, pastors, teachers. As to their activity in the congregations, cf. 1 Cor. xiv. 1, 3, 5, 19, 29-33. Excluded from public speaking, as well as from prophesying, were women.

As to the contents of the prophetic speech, we have no particulars; but, in order to find out the pureness and divine origin of such communications, the Church had the gift of discerning of spirits (1 Cor. xii. 10) which accompanied prophecy (xiv. 29), and for which a canon was laid down (1 John iv. 1-6). Although the apostolic rule of discerning of spirits already shows that the warning words of Jesus (Matt. vii. 15, 22, xxiv. 4 sq. 28 sq.) were already fulfilled at a very early time (Acts xx. 30; Rev. ii. 20), the Apocalypse of St. John was certainly intended to be the key stone of New-Testament prophecy; since, after the death of the apostles, prophecy makes room for the use of the writings of the New Testament, which ever since have become the rule of faith for the believers. To the believer the more sure word: prophecy (2 Pet. i. 19) must be sufficient, which shineth as a light in this dark place, until the day dawn, and the daystar arise. K. BURGESS.

PROPITIATION. A sacrifice offered to God to render him propitious. Such an effectual sacrifice was Jesus Christ: he is therefore our propitiation. For the doctrinal statements, see ATONEMENT.
PROSELYTES OF THE JEWS. At all times there were non-Israelites, who, by conversation to the God of Israel, were incorporated into the people of Israel. They must be distinguished from the so-called strangers, who, either for a time or permanently, resided among Israel, and the number of whom amounted, in the time of David and Solomon, to 153,600 (2 Chron. ii. 17). Many of these strangers became adherents of Jehovah, and by circumcision became members of the household of Israel. Slaves who were circumcised, and partook of the Paschal lamb (Exod. xii. 44), may also be called proselytes. The children of a heathenish slave born in the house were circumcised; but, according to rabbinic interpretation, they were not yet like a free-born. According to Jelamoth (fol. 46, col. i.), the master, in case he intended to retain a heathenish slave bought of a heathen, was to make it known in the act of baptism by putting around him a chain. The baptism did not mean liberty, but servitude: it coupled with permanent slavery. It then mainly depended upon the master, whether and when he was to set him free. If such was the intention of the master, the slave had to be re-baptized before three witnesses. Heathenish slaves who refused to undergo circumcision and baptism had to be sold again to heathen, after twelve months (Jelamoth, fol. 46, col. 2). Residue strangers, who were heathenish Hebrews, excepting Edomites and Egyptians, whose children can only enter into the congregation in their third generation (Deut. xxiii. 8), while an Ammonite or Moabite was forever excluded (Deut. xxiii. 3). A circumcised proselyte could marry a Jewish woman, but a priest could not marry the daughter of a proselyte (Lev. xxvi. 14). A proselyte could hold no public office, nor could he become a member of the Sanhedrin, unless he was the son of a Jewess; but he could not become king, or general, or president of the council, even if his mother were a Jewess (Maimonides : Hilkoth Sanhedrin, 2, 9; Melachim, 1). Yet strangers, though they were not circumcised, who abstained from certain heathenish abominations (Lev. xiv. 10 sqq., xx. 2, xxiv. 18), enjoyed protection and favors in the land, and could even receive appointments at the court (cf. 2 Sam. xi. 6, xv. 18 sqq., xxiv. 10). A class of proselytes were the Nethinim (q.v.). Besides these, Nehemiah mentions such as had "separated themselves from the people of the lands unto the law of God" (Neh. x. 28). In the time of the Seleucids, a Jewish propagandist developed itself as a re-action against the Hellenistic, which was forcibly introduced. John Hyrcanus forced circumcision on the Idumeans about 129 B.C. The Itureans were converted in the same way by Aristobulus. From this time we may date the zeal of the Pharisees for making proselytes, who travelled by "land and sea" to make many converts without converting the heart. Such Jewish proselytes were more fanatical than the Pharisees themselves (Matt. xxiii. 15), and became the fiercest persecutors of the Christians (Justin : Dial. c. Tryph., p. 300, ed. Sylburg). The Roman diaspora was especially zealous in making proselytes. At last such proselytes became contemptible to the Jews themselves. In the Talmud they are spoken of as dangerous to Israel as leprosy, preventing the coming of the Messiah. The proselytes, says the Talmud, were the cause that the Jews made the golden calf, and inaugurated the rebellion. (Num. xvi.). Absalom's behavior was caused by his mother, Maacha, whom David made a proselyte. But there were not wanting those who praised the proselytes. That there were numerous Jewish converts from among the Greeks and Romans, who exercised a Jewish influence, we see from Cicero, Pro Flacco, c. 28; Horace, Sat. i. 9, 89 sq., 4, 142; Juvenal, 14, 96 sq.; Tacitus, Ann., 2, 85, Hist., 5, 9; Seneca, De superst.; Dio Cassius, 37, 17. A catalogue of proselytes mentioned by ancient writers is given by Cæsare in Museum Hanganum, i. 549 sq. The rabbis distinguish proselytes of righteousness and proselytes of the gate. The proselytes of righteousness receive circumcision, and with it (Gal. v. 3) the whole Mosaic ceremonial law: they thereby become "sons of Israel," and "Israelites in every respect," and are called also "complete Israelites." When a proselyte asked for admission, he was first catechised as to his motives. If these were satisfactory, he was first instructed as to the divine protection of the Jewish people, and then circumcised — only when he was a male — in the presence of three teachers. In the case of a convert already circumcised, it was still necessary to draw a few drops of the blood of the covenant. A special prayer accompanied this operation. The proselyte then takes a new name, opening the Hebrew Bible, and accepting the first that came. But the convert was still a "stranger;" and, unless he had been baptized, his children are counted as bastards, i.e., aliens. To complete his admission, baptism was required. When the wound caused by circumcision was healed, he was stripped of all his clothes in the presence of the three witnesses who had acted as his teachers, and who now acted as his sponsors, the "fathers" of the proselyte, and led into the pool or tank. As he stood there, up to his neck in water, they repeated the great commandments of the law. These he promised and vowed to keep; and then, with an accompanying benediction, he was thrown with water. A female proselyte was conducted to the tank by three women, while the three teachers stood outside at the door, reading to her aloud the law. A new name was given to her after baptism. By baptism the proselyte became a new creature. All natural relationships were cancelled. As long as the temple stood, baptism was followed by the offering of a sacrifice consisting of two turtle-doves or pigeons. After the destruction, a vow to offer it as soon as the temple should be rebuilt was substituted. As to the proselytes of the gate, also known as the "sojourners" (Lev. xxv. 47), they were not bound by circumcision and the other special laws of the Mosaic code, but obliged themselves to obey the so-called seven precepts of Noah; viz.: (1) against idolatry, (2) against blaspheming, (3) against bloodshed, (4) against uncleanness, (5) against theft, (6) of obedience, with (7) the prohibition of flesh with the blood thereof. Whoever wished to become a proselyte of the gate had to declare it solemnly before three witnesses. As to the antiquity of the baptism of proselytes, and its relation to the baptism of John, cf. Schneckenburger : Über das Alter der jüdischen
PROSPER OF AQUITANIA. The ardent literary champion of Augustine. Of his personal life very little is known. He was born in Aquitania, probably in the last decade of the fourth century. He died in Rome, but the date of his death is not known. He received the ordinary rhetorical education. As a theologian he became a pupil of Augustine; and, though he never made the personal acquaintance of his master, he clung to him with unwearied perseverance. From 428 to 434 he lived in Southern Gaul, in intimate converse with the monastic settlements of Provence, more especially of Marseilles. There he became acquainted with a set of views very different from those he had adopted from Augustine; and he opened the Semi-Pelagian controversy (429) by his letter to Augustine, giving an account of those views, and asking him to interfere. He himself wrote, before the death of Augustine, his epistle to Rufinus, and his poem, Adversus ingratios. After the death of Augustine, he wrote in his defence, Pro Augustino responsiones, and was generally considered as the leading representative of the Augustinian views. Two Genoese priests addressed a number of questions to him concerning difficult passages in the works of Augustine, and he answered them by his Responsiones ad excerpia Genesis. A work of similar character is his Responsiones ad capitula objectionum Vincentianarum; the author, probably, being Vincentius of Lerius, who was a Semi-Pelagian. But, in spite of his zeal and industry, Prosper did not succeed in converting the Massiliotes to the Augustinian views. In 432 he visited Rome, to induce Pope Celestine I. to interfere; in the next year he published his last instalment in the controversy, De gratia Dei et libero arbitrio; and in 434 he moved to Rome. There he finished his Chronicle, one of his principal works. The first part (to 378) is only an extract from Eusebius, Jerome, and Augustine: the second part (to 455) is original, and written, as the book itself shows, partly in Gaul, and partly in Rome. He also wrote a book of epigrams, and a Liber Sententiarum, or "Collection of Gems," from Augustine. The best edition of his works is that by Le Brun and Mangeant, Paris, 1711.

PROTESTANTEN-VEREIN (Protestant Union), a voluntary organization of rationalistic ministers and professors in Germany. It was formed in 1863, and fairly started June 7 and 8, 1865, at Karlsruhe. Since 1867 it has had yearly meetings. But it has come into such strong opposition to the orthodox and conservative tendencies of the German Church authorities, that it has had to give up its life. See Holtzmann u. Züffel: Lektion für Theologie u. Kirchengesch., Leipzig, 1882, s. v.

PROTESTANTISM. See Reformation.

PROTEVANGELIUM. See Apocrypha.

PROTONOTARIUS APOSTOLICUS. According to later accounts, Bishop Clement of Rome first appointed a notary (notarius regionarius) in each of the seven wards of the city, for the purpose of drawing up an official record of the deeds and sufferings of the martyrs. These notaries belonged to the clergy of the city. They were appointed by the Pope; and, when they proved necessary to increase their number, the seven original notaries were distinguished by the title Protonotarii Apostolici. In course of time they obtained other distinctions and great revenues. They even claimed to take precedence of the bishops, which, however, St. Lawrence, in the year 369, denied them by the breve of June 1, 1450. They formed a college of their own, and their number was by Sixtus V. increased to twelve. In the papal chapel they sit on the second tier; but in the consistories, where four of them must be present, they sit beside the Pope; and their signature is necessary to the validity of any document which concerns the whole Roman-Catholic Church. See Bengen: Die romische Curie, Münster, 1854. H. F. Jacobson.

PROTO-PREBBYTER, or PROTO-POPE, corresponds in the Greco-Russian Church, to the arch-priest of the Church of Rome, denoting an intermediate officer between the bishop and the priests. There is a proto-prebyster or proto-pope at each cathedral; and, so far as he exercises a kind of superintendence over the neighboring parishes, his position resembles that of the dean. He is not bound to remain unmarried.

PROUDFOOT, William, S. T. P., b. in the parish of Manor, Peeblesshire, Scotland, May 22, 1788; d. in London, C. W., Jan. 16, 1851. He was the son of pious, godly parents, and from a child knew the Scriptures. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh, where he was distinguished alike for his rare natural endowments and for the extent and variety of his attainments. After leaving the university, he attended a full course of five sessions at the theological hall of the Secession Church, at that time under the charge of the venerable and venerable Dr. Law-son, many of whose students lived to do him honor, and none more than the gifted and learned Mr. Proudfoot. About the age of twenty-five he was ordained as pastor of the congregation of Perth, in Perthshire, where for nearly twenty years he labored as an earnest and able minister. He took a deep and lively interest in all questions connected with the government and extension of the church. His lofty intellectual powers, his rich mental culture, and vast and varied acquirements, fitted him for a prominent place among his fellow-laborers in any sphere. When, in 1882, the United Secession Church resolved to establish a mission in Canada, Mr. Proudfoot was one of three chosen to go out as pioneers. On his arrival, he went west as far as London, then only a city of the future. The entire region was only being opened up for settlement. For many years he visited different sections of the country; the roads often almost impassable, and accommodations of any kind of the most primitive style. From his mature age, personal dignity, high character, and great force of will, he was recognized as a leader, a patriarch, an apostle, and was cheerfully acknowledged by his brethren to be primus inter pares. He was chosen clerk of the synod, and, except when acting as moderator, filled that office with great judiciousness and tact. He was wise in counsel, as well as efficient in action; and his opinions had great weight in any deliberative assembly. In 1844 he was unanimously chosen...
PROVERBS OF SOLOMON. 1948 PROVERBS OF SOLOMON.

the first professor of theology in that branch of the church; and most ably and satisfactorily did he discharge the duties of that office till his decease. On the occurrence of that sad event, the church felt deeply the sore bereavement; and the synod resolved expressions expressing the high estimate they entertained of his eminent talents, his varied erudition, and manifold services. Mr. Proudfoot was a man of commanding presence, of a noble spirit, full of character. In debate his spirit was candid, his argument cogent, his language incisive, his invective sometimes sarcastic and scathing. As a theologian, he was scholarly and profound; as a scholar, erudite and accurate; as a preacher, instructive and impressive; as a teacher, clear, logical, and inspiring.

It is a matter of painful regret that the treasures which he left in neatly written manuscripts have never been published; but it is not yet too late to hope that his memoir, and some of his discourses and sermons, may enrich the theological literature of the Dominion.

WILLIAM ORMISTON.

PROVERBS OF SOLOMON. 1. The External Plan of the Book of Proverbs, and its own Testimony against Ewald's view. The latter seems similar to the title of the book, which recommends it, after the manner of later Oriental books, on account of its importance, and the general utility of its contents, extending from verse 1 to 6; with verse 7 the book itself begins. The book is described as "the proverbs of Solomon;" and then there is annexed the statement of its object, which, as summarily expressed, is "to teach wisdom.

It is possible that the author of the title has adopted the style of section i. 7-ix. The introductory section (i. 7-ix.) and the larger section (x.-xxii. 16) are followed by a third section (xxv. 1-xxix. 22), which again is followed by a short fourth section (xxx. 23-34), a kind of an appendix to the third, bearing the superscription, "These things also belong to the wise." The proverbs of Solomon begin again at xxx. 1, extending to xxix. This fifth portion of the book has a superscription which is similar to that following the title, "Thesethings" (xxv. 1-22). The Hebrew word translated "collected" denotes "to remove from their place," and means that the men of Hezekiah removed from the place where they found them the following proverbs, and put them together in a separate collection. The whole of this portion is by the Greek translator. The Hezekiah gleanings of Solomonic proverbs are followed by two appendices, the authors of which are given: the first (xxx.) is by "Agur the son of Jakeh;" the second (xxx. 1-9), by a "King Lemuel." In so far the superscriptions are clear. The names of the authors, elsewhere unknown, point to foreign country; and to this corresponds the peculiar complexion of these series of proverbs. As a third appendix to the Hezekiah collection (xxxi. 10 sq.), follows a complete alphabetical proverbial poem in praise of a virtuous woman.

By reviewing the whole argument, we see that the Book of Proverbs divides itself into the following parts: 1. The title of the book (i. 1-6), by which the question is raised, how far the book extends to which it originally belongs; 2. The hortatory discourses (i. 7-ix.), in which it is a question whether the Solomonic proverbs begin with these, or whether they are only the introduction thereto, composed by a different author, perhaps the author of the title; 3. The first great collection of Solomonic proverbs (x.-xxii. 10); 4. The first appendix to this first collection, "the words of the wise" (xxii. 17-xxiv. 22); 5. The second appendix, supplement of the words of some wise men (xxiv. 23 sq.); 6. The second great collection of Solomonic proverbs, which the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah, gathered (xxx. 1-9); 7. The first appendix to this second collection, the words of Agur (xxx. 10 sq.); 8. The second appendix, the words of King Lemuel (xxx. 1-9); 9. Third appendix, the acrostic ode (xxx. 10 sq.). These nine parts may be comprehended under three groups: the introductory hortatory discourses with the general title at their head, and the two great collections of Solomonic proverbs, with their two appendices.
In prosecuting our farther investigations, we shall consider the several parts of the book, first from the point of view of the manifold forms of their proverbs, then of their style, and, thirdly, of their type of doctrine.

II. The Several Parts of the Book of Proverbs with Respect to the Manifold Forms of the Proverbs.

— That the Book of Proverbs is not a collection of popular sayings, we see from the fact that it does not contain proverbs of one line each. It is, indeed, probable that popular proverbs are partly wrought into these proverbs, and many of their forms of expression are moulded after the popular proverbs; but, as they thus lie before us, they are, as a whole, the production of the technical mashal poetry. The simplest form is, according to the fundamental peculiarity of the Hebrew verse, the distich. The relation of the two lines to each other is very manifold. The second line may repeat the thought of the first, only in a somewhat altered form, in order to express this thought as clearly and exhaustively as possible. Such proverbs we call synonymous distichs; as, e.g., xii. 23:

"A soul of blessing is made fat;
And he that watereth others is himself watered."

Or the second line contains the other side of the contrast to the state of the first: the truth spoken in the first is explained in the second by means of the presentation of its contrary. Such proverbs we call antithetic distichs; as, e.g., x. 1:

"A wise son maketh his father glad,
And a foolish son is his mother's grief."

Sometimes it is two different truths that are expressed in the two lines; and the authorization of their union lies only in a certain relationship, and the ground of this union, in the circumstance that two lines are the minimum of the technical proverb — synthetic distichs; e.g., x. 18:

"A cloak of hatred are lying lips;
And he that spreadeth slander is a fool."

Sometimes one line does not suffice to bring out the thought intended, the begun expression of which is only completed in the second. These we call integral (eingedankigte) distichs; as, e.g., x. 31 (cf. 1 Pet. iv. 18):

"The righteous shall be recompensed on the earth:
How much more the ungodly and the sinner!"

But there is also a fifth form, which corresponds most to the original character of the mashal: the proverb explaining its ethical object by a resemblance from the region of the natural and everyday life, the parabolic proper. The form of this parabolic proverb is very manifold, according as the poet himself expressly compares the two subjects, or only places them near each other in order that the hearer or reader may complete the comparison. The proverb is least poetic when the similarity of the two subjects is expressed by a verb; as xxvii. 15 (to which, however, verse 16 belongs):

"A continual dropping in a rainy day,
And a contentious woman, are alike."

The usual form of expression, neither unpoeitic nor properly poetic, is the introduction of the comparison by כז ("as"), and of the similitude in the second clause by כז ("so"), as x. 26:

"As a dog returning to his vomit,
A fool returning to his folly."

This complete verbal state of the relation of similarity may also be abbreviated by the omission of the כז, as xxv. 13, xxvi. 11:

"As vinegar to the teeth, and as smoke to the eyes,
So is the sluggard to them who give him a commission."

We call the parabolic proverbs of these three forms comparisons. The last, the abbreviated form of the comparative proverb, forms the transition to another kind of parabolic proverb, which we call, in contradistinction to the comparative, the emblematic, in which the contrast and its emblem are loosely placed together, without any nearer expression of the similitude. This takes place either by means of the copulative כז, as xxv. 25:

"Cold water to a thirsty soul,
And good news from a far country," or without the כז; in which case the second line is as the subscription under the figure or double figure painted in the first; e.g., xi. 22:

"A gold ring in a swine's snout,
A fair woman, and without understanding."

These ground forms of two lines can, however, expand into forms of several lines. Since the distich is the peculiar and most appropriate form of the technical proverb, so, when two lines are not sufficient for expressing the thought intended, the multiplication to four, six, or eight lines, is most natural. In the tetrastich, the relation of the last two to the first two is as if manifold as is the relation of the second line to the first in the distich. There is, however, no suitable example of four-lined stanzas in antithetic relation: but we meet with synonymous tetrastichs, e.g., xxii. 15 sq., xxiv. 3 sq., 26 sq.; synthetic, xxx. 5 sq.; integral, xxx. 17 sq.; comparative, xxvi. 18 sq.; and emblematical, xxv. 4 sq. Proportionally the most frequently occurring are tetrastichs, the second half of which forms a proof clause commencing with כז or כז. Among the less frequent are the six-lined, presenting (xxiii. 1-3, xxiv. 11 sq.) one and the same thought in manifold aspects, with proofs interspersed. Among all the rest which are found in the collection (xxiii. 12-14, 19-21, 26-28, xxx. 15 sq., xxx. 29-31), the first two lines form a prologue introductory to the substance of the proverbs; as, e.g., xxiii. 12-14:

"Oh, let instruction enter into thine heart,
And apply thine ears to the words of knowledge.
Withhold not correction from the child;
For, if thou beatest him with the rod, he dies not.
Though shalt beat him with the rod,
And deliver his soul from hell."

Similarly formed, but more expanded, is the eight-lined stanza (xxiii. 22-28), the only one which is found from the tenth chapter on. Here the mashal proverb already inclines to the mashal ode; for this octastich may be regarded as a short mashal song, like the alphabetical mashal psalm (Ps. lxxxviii.), which consists of almost pure tetrastichs. We have now seen how the distich form multiplies itself into forms consisting of four, six, and eight lines; but it also unfolds itself into forms of three, five, and seven lines. Tristichs arise when the thought of the first line is repeated (xxvii. 22) in the second, according to the synonymous scheme; or when the thought of the second line is expressed by contrast in the third (xxii. 29, xxviii. 10), according to the antithetic scheme; or when, to the thought expressed in one or two lines (xxv. 8, xxvii. 10), there is added its proof. The parabolic scheme is here represented when the object described is unfolded in two lines, as in the comparison xxxv. 13, or when its nature is portrayed by two figures in two lines, as in the emblematic proverb xxv. 20:

"To take off clothing in cold weather, Vinegar upon nitre, And he that singeth songs to a heavy heart."

In the few instances of pentastichs which are found, the last three lines usually unfold the reason of the thought of the first two (xxvi. 4 sq., xxv. 6 sq., xxxii. 32 sq.): to this, xxiv. 13 forms an exception, where the kōf before the last three lines introduces the expansion of the figure in the first two. As an instance we quote xxv. 6 sq.:

"Seek not to display thyself in the presence of the king, And stand not in the place of the great; For better that it be said unto thee, Come up hither Than that they humble thee in the presence of the prince. While thine eyes have raised themselves."

Of heptastichs there is only one example in the collection; viz., xxxii. 6–8:

"Eat not the bread of the jealous, And lust not after his dainties; For he is like one who calculates with himself: Eat and drink, saith he to thee, And his heart is not with thee. Thy morsel which thou hast eaten must thou vomit up, And thou hast wasted thy pleasant words."

From this heptastich, which one will scarcely take for a brief mashal ode, according to the common technical form of the mashal, we see that two lines can expand itself to the dimensions of seven and eight lines. Beyond these limits the whole proverb ceases to be a mashal in the proper sense, and becomes a mashal ode after the manner of Ps. xxv., xxxiv., and especially xxxvii. To these mashal odes belong, beside the prologue (xxii. 17–21), that of the drunkard (xxiii. 29–35), that of the slothful man (xxiv. 30–34), the exhortation to industry (xxvii. 23–27), the prayer for a moderate portion between poverty and riches (xxx. 7–9), the mirror for princes (xxx. 2–9), and the praise of the virtuous wife (xxxi. 10 sq.). In the whole of the first part (i. 7–ix.), the prevailing form is that of the extended flow of the mashal song; but one in vain seeks for strophes. There is not here so firm a grouping of the lines: the rhetorical form here outweighs the purely poetical. This first part of the Proverbs consists of the following fifteen mashal strains: (1) i. 7–19, (2) 20 sq., (3) ii., (4) iii. 1–18, (5) 19–26, (6) 27 sq., (7) iv. 1–v. 6, (8) 7 sq., (9) vi. 1–5, (10) 6–11, (11) 12–19, (12) 20 sq., (13) vii., (14) viii., (15) ix. In iii. and ix. there are found a few mashal odes of two lines and of four lines, which may be regarded as independent mashals, and may adapt themselves to the schemes employed. The octastich (vi. 18–19) makes the proportionally greatest impression of an independent unwoven mashal.

It is the only proverb in which symbolical numbers are used, which occurs in the collection from i. to xxix.:

"There are six kings which Jahve hateth, And seven are an abhorrence to his soul Haughty eyes...brethren."

Such numerical proverbs, to which the name middah has been given by later Jewish writers, are found in xxx. We may also mention the mashal chain; i.e., the ranging together, in a series, proverbs of a similar character, such as the chain of proverbs regarding the fool (xxvi. 1–12), the sluggard (xxvii. 13–19), the talebearer (xxvi. 20–22), the malicious (xxv. 23–29): but this form belongs more to the techniques of the mashal collection than to that of the mashal poetry.

On examining the separate parts of the book, we find, that, in the introductory pedagogic part (i. 7–ix.), there is exceedingly little of the technical form of the mashal, as well as generally of technical form at all. It consists, not of proper mashals, but of fifteen mashal odes, or rather, perhaps, mashal discourses, didactic poems of the mashal kind. The second part (x.–xxii. 16), containing three hundred and seventy-five proverbs, consists, for the most part, of distichs. An apparent distinction seems to be the tristich xix. 7; but this, too, is a distich with the disfigured remains of a distich that has been lost. The Sep-tuagint has here two distichs which are wanting in our text: the second is that which is found in our text, but only in a mutilated form:

"He that does much harm perfects mischief, And he that uses provoking words shall not escape," probably the false rendering of,

"The friend of every one is rewarded with evil; He who pursues after rumors does not escape."

These distichs are, for the most part, antithetic; although we also find the synonymous (xi. 7, 25, xii. 14, 28, xvi. 8, 19, xxii. 30, xii. 14, 28, xiv. 19, etc.), the integral (xiv. 7, 8, 9, 10, xxix. 13, 10, xxi. 27), the synthetic (x. 18, xi. 29, xiv. 17, xix. 13), and the parabolic, only in a very few instances (x. 26, xxii. 22).

To this long course of distichs, which professes to be the proverbs of Solomon, there follows (xxii. 17–xxiv. 22) a course of "the words of the wise," prefixed by xxii. 17–21, which comprehends all the forms of the mashal, from those of two lines in xxii. 28, xxiii. 9, xxv. 7, 8, 9, 10, to the mashal song, xxiii. 29–35. Between these limits are the tetrastichs, which are the most popular form (xxii. 22 sq., xxiv. 24 sq., xxv. 10 sq., xxvi. 1 sq., 3 sq., 5 sq., 15 sq., 17 sq., 19 sq., 21 sq.), pentastichs (xxiii. 4 sq., xxiv. 13 sq.), and hexastichs (xxiii. 1–3, 12–14, 19–21, 26–28, xxiv. 11 sq.). of tristichs, heptastichs, and octastichs, at least one specimen is found (xxii. 29, xxiii. 6–8, 22–23).

To the first appendix to the Proverbs of Solomon, there follows a second (xxiv. 23 sq.), with the heading, "These things also to the wise," which contains a hexastich (xxiv. 29-32), a distich (26), a tristich (27), a tetrastich (28 sq.), and a mashal ode (30 sq.) on the sluggard; the last in the form of an experience of the poet, like Ps. xxxvii. 35 sq. The moral which he has drawn from the recorded observation is expressed in two verses such as we have already found at vi. 10 sq. These two appendices are, as is evident from their commencement as well as from their conclusion, in closest relation to the introduction (i. 7-ix).

There now follows, in xxv.-xxix., the second great collection of "proverbs of Solomon," "arranged," as the heading says, by the direction of King Hezekiah. It divides itself into two parts; for as xxiv. 30 sq., a mashal hymn, stands at the end of the two appendices, so the mashal hymn xxvii. 28 sq. must be regarded as forming the division between the two halves of this collection. It is very sharply distinguished from the form of other parts. The length of the proverbs is exclusively in the form of distichs: here we have also some tristichs (xxvii. 8, 13, 20, 21, 22, xxviii. 10, 26), tetrastichs (xxvii. 8, 4 sq., 9 sq., 21 sq., xxvii. 18 sq., 24 sq., xxvii. 15 sq.), and pentastichs (xxvii. 6 sq.), besides the mashal hymn already referred to. The kind of arrangement is not essentially different from that in the first collection: it is equally devoid of plan, yet there are here some chains or strings of related proverbs (xxvii. 1-12, 13-16, 20-22). A second essential distinction between the two collections in this, that while, in the first, the antithetic form pervades the prevailing element, here it is the parabolic, and especially the emblematic: in xxv.-xxvii. the proverbs are almost without exception of this character.

The second collection of Solomon's proverbs has also several appendices, the first of which (xxx.), according to the inscription, is by an otherwise unknown author, Agur, son of Jakeh, and presents in a thoughtful way the unspeakableness of God. This is followed by certain peculiar pieces, such as a tetrastich regarding the purity of God's word (xxx. 5 sq.), a prayer for a moderate position between riches and poverty (7-9), a distich against slander (10), a priamel without the conclusion (11-14), the insatiable four, a midstah (15 sq.), a tetrastich regarding the disobedient son (17), the incomprehensible four (18-20), the intolerable four (21-23), the diminutive but prudent four (24-26), the excellent four (29-31), a pentastich recommending prudent silence (32 sq.).

Two other supplements form the conclusion of the whole book, — the counsel of Lemuel's mother to her royal son (xxx. 2-9), and the praise of the virtuous woman, in the form of an alphabetical acrostic (xxx. 10 sq.).

The result of our investigation is, that two different authors must be ascribed to our book: the one who edited the proverbs of Solomon (x. i.-xxii. 16) prefixed i. 7-ix. as an introduction to them, and appended to them the "words of the wise" (xxii. 17-xxiv. 22); the second collector then appended to this book a supplement of the "words of the wise" (xxiv. 28 sq.), and then the Hezekiah collection of Solomon's proverbs (xxv.-xxix.), and perhaps, also, the poem in chap. xxx. We do not, however, maintain that the book has this origin, but only this, that, on the supposition of the non-Solomonic origin of i. 7-ix., it cannot well have any other origin.

III. The Repetitions in the Book of Proverbs.

Before examining more closely the style and the teaching of the book and the conclusions thence drawn, we must observe at the beginning what we meet so often in this book, and which, perhaps, throw light on the way in which the several collections originated. Not only in the different parts of the collection, but also within the limits of one and the same part, we find proverbs, which, wholly or in part, are repeated in the same or in similar words. We begin with "the proverbs of Solomon" (x.-xxii. 10); for this collection is, in relation to xxv.-xxix., certainly the earlier. In this earlier collection we find, (1) whole proverbs repeated in exactly the same words, — xiv. 12=xvi. 25; (2) proverbs slightly changed in their form of expression, — x. 1=xv. 20, xvi. 2=xii. 2, xii. 5=xix. 9, xii. 9=xix. 19; (3) proverbs almost identical in form, but somewhat different in sense, — x. 2=xi. 4, xiii. 14=xvii. 24; (4) proverbs the first lines of which are the same, — x. 15=xvii. 11, (5) proverbs which contain the same lines the same, — x. 6=x. 11, x. 8=x. 10, xv. 33=xviii. 12; (6) proverbs with one line almost the same, — xii. 13=xx. 10, xii. 21=vi. 5, xii. 14=xii. 3, xiv. 31=xvii. 5, xii. 12=xx. 2. Compare also xvi. 28 with xvii. 9. Comparing the second collection (xxv.-xxix.), we find, (1) whole proverbs perfectly identical, — xxv. 24=xix. 9, xxvi. 22=xiv. 8, xxvii. 12=xxii. 5, xxvii. 18=xx. 10; (2) proverbs identical in meaning with somewhat changed expression, — xxvi. 15=xvii. 13, xxvii. 15=xv. 24, xxvii. 6=x. 1, xxvii. 19=xii. 11, xxviii. 18=xvii. 2; (3) proverbs with one line the same and one line different, — xxvii. 21=xvii. 3, xxix. 22=xv. 18. Compare also xxvii. 15 with xiii. 13.

From the numerous repetitions of proverbs, and repetitions of portions of the first collection of the "proverbs of Solomon" in the Hezekiah collection, we conclude that the two collections were by different authors: in other words, that they had not both "the men of Hezekiah" for their authors. As to the time when the first collection originated, it suits best for the time of Jehoshaphat. The older Book of Proverbs, which appeared between Solomon and Hezekiah, contains i.-xxiv. 22 of the "proverbs of Solomon" (x. 1-xxii. 16), which formed the principal part, the very kernel of it, were enclosed on the one side, at their commencement, by the lengthened introduction (i. 7-ix.), in which the collector announces himself as a highly gifted teacher and as the instrument of the spirit of revelation, and on the other side are shut in at their close by the "words of the wise" (xxvii. 17-xxviii. 34). The author, indeed, does not announce (i. 6) such a supplement of the "words of the wise"; but, after these words in the title of the book, he leads us to expect it. The introduction to the supplement (xxvii. 17-21) sounds like an echo of the larger introduction, and corresponds to the smaller compass of the supplement. The work bears, on the whole, the stamp of a unity; for, even in the last part of it, with which it closes, in xxvii. 21 sq., there still sounds the same keynote which the author had struck at the commencement. A later collector, belonging to the time subsequent to Heze-
PROVERBS OF SOLOMON.

The harmony of the superscriptions (xxiv. 22, xxxv. 1) favors at least the supposition that these supplements are the work of other hands. The circumstance that "the words of the wise" (xxii. 17-xxiv. 22) in two of their maxims refer to the older collection of Solomonic proverbs, while, on the contrary, "the words of the wise" (xxiv. 23 sq.) refer to xxiv. 25 to the Hezekiah collection, and in xxiv. 33 sq. to the introduction (i. 7-ix.), strengthens the supposition that, with xxiv. 23, a second half of the book, added by another hand, begins. There is no reason for not attributing the appendix (xxx.-xxxii.) to this second collector: perhaps he seeks to render, by means of it, the conclusion of the extended Book of Proverbs uniform with that of the older book. Like the older collection of "proverbs of Solomon," so, also, now the Hezekiah collection has "proverbs of the wise" on the right and on the left, and the king of proverbial poetry stands in the midst of a worthy retinue. The second collector distinguishes himself from the first by this, that he never professes himself to be a proverb poet. It is possible that the proverbial poem of the unknown woman (xxv. 10 sq.) may be his work; but there is nothing to substantiate this opinion.

IV. The Book of the Proverbs on the Side of its Manifoldness of Style and Form of Instruction.—Beginning our inquiry with the relation in which x.-xii. 16 and xiv.-xix. stand to each other, with the introduction (i. 7-ix.), strengthens the supposition that, with the conclusion of one hand, begins. There is no reason for not attributing the appendix (xxx.-xxxii.) to this second collector: perhaps he seeks to render, by means of it, the conclusion of the extended Book of Proverbs uniform with that of the older book. Like the older collection of "proverbs of Solomon," so, also, now the Hezekiah collection has "proverbs of the wise" on the right and on the left, and the king of proverbial poetry stands in the midst of a worthy retinue. The second collector distinguishes himself from the first by this, that he never professes himself to be a proverb poet. It is possible that the proverbial poem of the unknown woman (xxv. 10 sq.) may be his work; but there is nothing to substantiate this opinion.

The common fundamental character of the book in all its parts is rightly defined when we call it a "book of wisdom." Indeed, among the Church Fathers our book bears this title. We need not hesitate to call the Book of Proverbs a "philosophical" treatise, without, therefore, denying, with Theodore of Mopsuestia, its divine inspiration; although the effect of the Spirit upon the "wise" is different from that upon the "prophet:" we deny it just as little as did Christian Benedict Michaelis, who, passing from the exposition of the Psalms to that of the Proverbs, says, "From David's closet, consecrated to prayer, we now pass into Solomon's school of wisdom, to admire the greatest of philosophers in the son of the greatest of theologians."

What was the character of this chokma (or wisdom)? to what was it directed? To denote its condition and aim in one word, it was universalistic or humanistic. Emanating from the fear or the religion of Jahve (x. 29), but seeking to comprehend the spirit in the letter, the essence in the form of the national life, its effort was directed towards the general truth affecting mankind as such. While prophecy, which is recognized by the Church as essentially necessary to a healthful development of a people (xxix. 18), is of service to the historical process into which divine truth enters to work out its results in Israel, and from thence outward among mankind, the chokma seeks to look into the very essence of this truth through the role of its historical and national manifestation, and then to comprehend those general ideas in which could already be discovered the fitness of the religion of Jahve for becoming the world-religion. From this aim towards the ideal in the historical, towards the everlasting name amid changes, the human (I intentionally use this word) in the Israelitish, the universal religion in the Jahve religion (Jahvelum), and the world-religion in the law, all the peculiarities of the Book of Proverbs are explained, as well as of the long, broad stream of the literature of the chokma, beginning with Solomon, which, when the Palestinian Judaism assumed the rugged, exclusive, proud national character of Pharisaism, developed itself in Alexandrinism.

When James (iii. 17) says that the "wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypoc...
risky," his words most excellently designate the nature and the contents of the discourse of wisdom in the Solomonic proverbs; and one is almost inclined to think that the apostolic brother of the Lord, when he delineates wisdom, had before his eyes the Book of the Proverbs, which raises to purity by the most impressive admonitions. Next to its admonitions to purity, are those especially to peacefulness, to gentle resignation (xix. 29), quietness of mind (xviii. 32), and humility (xi. 2, xv. 33, xvi. 5, 18), to mercy, even toward beasts (xii. 10), to firmness and sincerity of conviction, to the furtherance of one's neighbor by means of wise discourse and kind help.

PROVIDENCE. The doctrine of providence, representing God not only as the sustainer, but also as the ruler, of the world, forms, on the one side, the complement to the doctrine of creation, while on the other it includes the doctrine of predestination as a special subdivision. Belief in providence forms one of the pillars of living religion, and is inseparable from belief in a personal God. Lactantius was quite right when he denounced the denial of providence as atheism (Instit., i. 2), and Clement of Alexandria uses similar language. Even in its lowest form, as Fethism, religion is based on faith in providence; God is represented as the controller of the extreme forms of Epicureanism and Stoicism. Religion itself disappears. As the revelation of the living, personal God, Scripture is, in a special sense of the words, the book of providence, unfolding its nature and working in the relation between human and divine counsels (Prov. xi. 19-31). Belief in extreme forms of Epicureanism and Stoicism, religion itself disappears. As the revelation of the living, personal God, Scripture is, in a special sense of the words, the book of providence, unfolding its nature and working in the relation between human and divine counsels (Prov. xi. 19-31). Belief in providence, as a peculiar intellectual tendency, may be said, in a still higher sense of the words, about the Gospels. The word providentia (wpowis) we owe to the apocalyptic stage of the Old-Testament theology (Wisdom xiv. 3, xvii. 2).

On account of this its central position in the sphere of religion, the doctrine of providence is, like that of God, characterized by a multiplicity which excludes all sudden and striking changes. It has, nevertheless, been treated by all great theologians, from Lactantius to Thomas Aquinas, and again from the Reformation down to our days, sometimes in connection with the doctrine of God and his attributes, sometimes in connection with the doctrine of the creation, the fall and the scheme of salvation, and especially of late, in connection with the doctrine of predestination and evil. But it is evident from its very character as a general article of faith, that it has its place in the Catechism rather than in the symbols. In the Small Catechism of Luther it is treated in the explanation of the faith as the Cartesian proof that God is the creator of all things, and of course, it and has received no more elaborative treatment in the Large Catechism, or in the Liturgy of Melanchthon; but in the Heidelberg Catechism (Qu. 27, 28) it forms one of the most elaborative... points of the whole development, and in the "Confes-soio Heliwetica" it is also defined with great care.
The "Catechismus Romanus" too (p. 1 c. ii. qu. 15-20) treats it at length. In the later Protestant theology, from Chemnitz to Nitzsch, the subject has received its complete systematical development:
though at first the christological principle was not given due prominence; that is, the doctrines of God and of man were kept too abstractly monothestic, without being brought into sufficiently close connection with the doctrine of Christ, which, of course, had its influence on the document of providence, while the dissolution of the idea of providence into the elements of maintenance and government, and the division into providentia generalis, specialis, and specialissima, were very early adopted. See Hase: Hutterus redivivus, Leipzig, 1827.

As a full and living faith in the providence of God depends upon a sound and true conception of his nature, all the various aberrations of the latter idea have given rise to similar aberrations of the former. From infidelity and scepticism springs the materialistic movement (casualism or fate); from superstition and credulity, fatalism, determinism, particularism, and occasional-ism. When the causa secunda in external nature are recognized as the sole ruling power, infidelity will produce materialism or mechanism, according as it emphasizes matter or form; in human life a similar manner of proceeding will produce secularism or casuistry, though, indeed, casuism, when consistently developed, is neither more nor less than a complete denial of all causality. In paganism, superstition gives its idol, the inexorable destiny, either a transcendental form (fatalism) or an immanent form (determinism); while particularism and occasionalism are superstitions forms developed within monothetism. Generally speaking, the relation between providence and the causa secunda of external nature and human life forms one of the principal problems of the whole subject, and admits of a double solution besides the orthodox one, according to which the causa secunda, though acting in strict conformity with the causa prima:— namely, one deistic,— God maintains not the world, but only the laws and powers active in the world; and one pantheisic,— God works all in all, but without passing beyond the limits of natural law. Closely con-ected with this problem, though of much less importance, are those of the relation between providence and chance (casualism dissolving all life into a mass of blind chances), and between providence and small things; the popular consciousness being very apt to doubt the existence of a particular providence. Of the greatest sigificance are the problems of the relation between providence and human freedom, or between providences and human actions; these are more properly treated under the doctrine of predestination.

Lit. — The older literature from Zwingli may be found in Walch: "Biblioth. Theol." pp. 81, 173, 424. Of modern treatments of the subject, see Bormann: "Die Christliche Lehre von der Vorse-hung," Berlin, 1820; and Paulus: "Vorschung, Stuttgart," 1849.

PROVINCIAL (Provincialis Superior). Those monasteries of the same order which were situated in a certain district formed a unity under the head of a custos: and all the custodia of a country formed a still higher unity under the name of a province. At the head of the province stood the provincial.

PROVOST (Propositus) was the name of a monastic official immediately subordinate to the abbot, and co-ordinate to the diaconus, according to the rules of St. Benedict. When Chrodegang organized the cathedral chapters on the monastic model, he retained the office of the propositus, which, however, in some cases, was united with that of the archi-diaconus. The principal duties of the provost were, distribution of the common income, superintendence of discipline, etc.

PRUDENTIUS OF TROYES, a native of Spain, whose true name was Galindo; came early to France, and was in 847 appointed bishop of Troyes. He died April 6, 861, and was reverenced as a saint by his diocese. In the predes-ination controversy he sided with Gottschalk, and wrote an epitite, Ad Hinkmarum et De pred. contra Jo. Scotum. He also continued the "Annales Bertiniani" from 885 to 861.

PRUSSIA. contains, according to the census of 1848, a population of 27,278,111, of which 17-
613,580 belong to the Evangelical State Church, 9,205,136 to the Roman-Catholic Church, 96,655
(14,961 Old Lutherans and Separate Lutherans, 19,072 Mennonites, etc.), to minor Christian denominations, and 368,970 are Jews. The Evangelicals are chiefly settled in the provinces of Brandenburg, Pomerania, Saxony, Hanover, and Schleswick-Holstein; the Roman-Catholics, in the provinces of East Prussia, Silesia, Westphalia, and Rheinish Prussia.

The relation between the State and the Roman-Catholic Church has for the last ten years been the subject of very energetic and comprehensive legislation; but the unflinching resistance of the clergy, steadily inflamed by the Pope and the curia, and to a certain extent, also, supported by the State, made it necessary for the government to carry through its principle; and matters are still left in an unfinished state. By a law of July 8, 1871, the Roman-Catholic division of the Prussian ministry of Cultus, Public Education, and Sanitary Affairs, was abolished. By a law of March 11, 1872, the superintendence of all instruction and education, private or public, was exclusively reserved for the State. By the so-called Falk Laws (which Art. 201), or May Laws of May 11, 12, 13, and 14, 1873, all non-Germans, that is, persons not educated at the German universities or in the German seminaries, were excluded from holding offices in the Roman-Catholic Church in Prussia; the power of the bishop over the lower clergy, and the clergy over the laity, was limited; so that no punishment touching a person's body or property, or for a civil offense, could be administered by an ecclesiastical court: a civil court of ecclesiastical affairs, which enabled the government to deal with refractory bishops, was established; and the clergy was summoned to take an oath of obedience to the laws of the State. Other laws followed, dissolving the monasteries, and expelling the monastic orders (July 4, 1872, and May 31, 1875), and re-organizing the administration of the property of the Church (May 20, 1874, and April 22, 1875); but it became more and more difficult to enforce those laws; and, after the death of Pius IX., negotiations began between the Prussian Government and the Roman curia, which have led to various modifications by the laws of July 14, 1880, and May 31, 1882. The Roman-Catholic Church has theological faculties at the universities of Breslau and Bonn, and at the academy of Münster and the Lyceum Hosianum at Braunsberg. Formerly the Roman-Catholic priests were principally educated in the seminaries maintained at the episcopal residence, but since the issue of the May Laws those institutions are no longer recognized by the State.

The relation between the State and the Evangelical Church was finally fixed by the laws of Sept. 10, 1873, and Jan. 20, 1876. At the head of the whole organization stands the Supreme Ecclesiastical Council (Oberkirchenrath) in Berlin, consisting of twelve regular members, an ecclesiastical vice-president, and a lay president. Under this council, act eight provincial consistories, — Königsberg, Berlin, Stettin, Breslau, Posen, Magdeburg, Münster, and Coblenz, and under them the superintendents of the property, and forty-four hundred and fifteen. In the Evangelical State Church the two types of Protestantism, the Lutheran and the Reformed, are united. Though the precise meaning and correct application of the principle of the "Union" are much disputed, no distinction is made between the two types, either in the theological faculties (Berlin, Breslau, Halle, Königsberg, Greifswald, Bonn, Göttingen, Kiel, and Marburg) or in the seminaries. Luther's translation of the Bible is in common use, and the various collections of hymns have no marked denominational character. The general result of the "Union" seems to be, for the western provinces, a gradual amalgamation of the Reformed type by the Lutheran, and, for the western provinces, a gradual amalgamation of the two types. A peculiar difficulty arises from the circumstance, that, at so many points, the church-members do not speak the German language, but Polish, Wendish, or some other Slavic tongue in the north-eastern part of the kingdom, and Danish, Frisian, or Dutch, in the north-western parts.

PRYNE, William, Puritan; b. at Swanswick, Somersetshire, 1600; d. in London, Oct. 24, 1689. He was graduated at Oxford University, 1620; studied law; acquired great notoriety by his learned but dull work Hiiromantis (1606 pp. in quarto), against plays, masks, dancing, etc. For the alleged seditious writing in it he was tried in the Star Chamber (Feb. 7, 1633), and condemned to the loss of his ears, perpetual imprisonment, and to pay a fine of five thousand pounds. The instigation to this infamous sentence came from Archbishop Laud, whose animosity he had won by writing against Arminianism and the jurisdiction of the bishops. The sentences were later commuted through the prince's intercession; the bishops still condemned him (June 30, 1637) to branding, and imprisonment in remoter prisons, for a seditious and libellous work (News from Ipswich). He was released by the Long Parliament, and with Burton, another victim of Laud's cruelty, received in London (Nov. 28, 1640) with a perfect ovation. Shortly afterwards Pryne was elected at Newport to a seat in Parliament (1641), and by a strange turn of affairs was the solicitor in the trial of Laud (1644), and arranged the whole proceedings. On Monday, Dec. 4, 1648, he advocated in Parliament the cause of Charles. He was expelled in 1650 from the House of Commons for his vehement opposition to Cromwell, but re-admitted 1656. He promoted the Restoration, and was rewarded with the appointment of keeper of the records in the Tower (1660); and his collection of records is considered a model work. His learning was very great.

PSALMANAZAR, George (b. 1679; d. in London, May 3, 1708), the assumed name of a pretended Formosan, who was really a native of the south of France. He came from Flanders to London as an ostensible convert to Christianity. He was kindly received, and had an audience in imposing upon the learned; for he not only composed and invented a description of the Island of Formosa (London, 1704, 2d ed., 1705), but actually a language for the country, into which he translated the Church Catechism, by request of Bishop Compton, whose protégé he was. His fraud was, however, discovered at Oxford, and for the rest of his life he supported himself by writing for book-sellers. As the pretended Formosan, he played the part of a heathen; but from his thirty-second year he was in all his actions a genuine Christian, and won the highest respect of his contemporaries. See his Memoirs, London, 1764.

PSALMODY IN THE EARLY CHRISTIAN CHURCH. As psalm-singing was the practice of the synagogue, there is no doubt that it was an integral part of Christian worship from the beginning. Justin Martyr speaks of the Christians singing "hymns;" but by these he probably meant sacred lyrics in general, including the Psalms. The first Council of Braga (385 A.D.) expressly forbade the use of any human composition in public worship: "Except the psalms and hymns of the Old and New Testaments, nothing of a poetical nature is to be sung in the church" (Caes. ii. 12). Some think the restriction was aimed against the use of such pseudo-canonical compositions as the Psalms of Solomon, written against hymns. Similar orders were given by various councils, which shows how inveterate the habit was. On the rise of monasticism, psalm-singing took on a new phase: it was the occupation of the monks. A curious point of resemblance between the Jewish synagogue and early Christian church is, that in both, the titles of the psalms were recited as integral parts of the compositions. As to the way in which the psalms were used, four methods have been distinguished: (1) The psalm was executed by a single voice, whilst all the rest of the congregation listened; (2) Sometimes it was done by the whole congregation singing together; (3) The congregation was divided into two parts or choirs, which sang alternate verses; (4) One voice sang the first part of a verse, and the rest of the congregation all together sang the close of it. Usually the singers and the congregation stood during the singing. Of course it would frequently happen, in that period of few books, that copies of the Psalter could not be had in sufficient quantity to supply the wants even of the clergy. It was therefore to be expected that the custom of memorizing, at least some of the psalms, would be well-nigh universal. The clergy would naturally show some zeal in the matter; and, as a matter of fact, learning the Psalter was a part of the training of priests, monks, and nuns; and laymen also made it their business. According to Can. 2 of the second Council of Nicea (787 A.D.), no one should be made a bishop until he knew the entire Psalter by heart. Two instances are recorded of Gregory the Great's refusal to promote worthy candidates on this ground. Many psalms were recited at one time. Benedict ruled that his monks should go through the Psalter every week, but called his rule light, "because the Holy Fathers did as much in a day." Indeed, it is related of his pupil Maurus, that he refused to promote worthy candidates on this ground. The artof poetry and the art of music are connected, and the two are frequently combined (Ps. cxxxi.). Hence it is that music was an integral part of the psalms. Music was an essential part of the service of Jesus in the temple, and was a feature of the Jewish life. The Psalter collection is called biblia psalmon (Lukexx. 42; Acts i. 20), or pastrae biblia, or τα λοιπα των βιβλίων of the grandson of Ben-Sira.

2. Name.— At the close of the seventy-second Psalm (ver. 20) we find the subscription, "the prayers of David, the son of Jesse, are ended." The whole of the preceding psalms are here comprised under the name of Tephellith (prayers), which is striking, since, with the exception of Ps. xxvii. (and, farther on, Ps. lixxvi., xcii., cxli.), they are all inscribed otherwise, and because, in part, as, e.g., Ps. i. and ii., they contain no supplicatory address to God, and have, therefore, not the form of prayers. Still, the collective name of Tephellith is suitable to all psalms. The essence of prayer is a direct and undiverted looking towards God and the absorption of the mind in the thought of him. All psalms share in this, even the didactical and homiletic, without any supplicatory address, as Hannah's song of praise (1 Sam. ii. 1). The title inscribed on the Psalter is (Septem) Thehiliim, which for Thhillim and Thilli are also used. This name, as well as Thilloth, occurs in the last of the Hebrew writings, which is strange, since the Psalms, for the most part, are partly hymns in the proper sense: most of them are elegiac and didactic, and one (Ps. cxlv.) is directly inscribed Thehillilah. But even the name Thehillim is admissible; for all psalms partake of the nature of the hymn, and all speak of the magnalia Dei. In the Koran, the Psalter is called zabar; in the Hellenistic Greek, the corresponding word psalmoi is the more common. The Psalm collection is called biblia psalmon (Lukexx. 42; Acts i. 20), or psalterion.

3. Historical Suppositions of the Psalm Composition. — The lyric is the earliest kind of poetry, and Hebrew poetry is therefore essentially lyric; neither the epic nor the dramatic branch of it has branched off from it, and attaches itself to an independent form. The first book of the Thora speaks of the origin of all things, also of the origin of poetry. In the joyous exultation of Adam over the creation of the wife, we yet see the undivided beginning to which poetry and prose go back. Before the fall there was no poetry, because there was no art; and no poetry existed; and there existed no every-day mood. After the fall, we first meet with music and poetry in the house of Lamech. The art of poetry and the art of music are con-it with all honor. He appointed the Levites as singers and musicians at the service, and placed over them the precentors Asaph, Heman, and Ethan-Jeduthun (1 Chron. xxiv.; cf. xv. 17 sq.).

Thus others also were encouraged to consecrate their gifts to the God of Israel. Besides the twenty-three psalms inscribed to David, the collection contains the following, which are named after contemporary singers appointed by David: twelve to Asaph (I., II., III.-Lxxxi.), and twelve by the Levite family of the sons of Korah (xlii.-xl., lxxiv., lxxxv., lxxxvi., lxxxvii., lxix., lix., lii.), and twelve by Ethan (lxxx., lix., lii., liii., lixiv., lixvi.). Both the psalms of the Exilarchs (xlii., li., lii., liii., lixiv., by Heman, and lix., by Ethan) belong to the time of Solomon, whose name, with the exception of Ps. lxxii., is borne only by Ps. cxli. Under Solomon, psalm-poetry began to decline; and only twice, and this for a short period too (under Jehoshaphat and Hezekiah), it rose to any height. With the exception of these two periods of revival, the latter part of the regal period produced scarcely any psalm-writers, but is all the more rich in prophets, who now raised the pipes of their trumpet to roll three strains still wanting in the strophic symmetry which characterizes the later art. It has been thought strange that the very beginnings of Israel's poetry are so perfect; but Israel's history, also that of her literature, comes under a different law from that of a constant development from a lower to a higher grade. In David the sacred lyric attained its highest development. Many things combined to make the time of David the golden age of Israel. He had laid the foundation of this, both by his energetic reforms in general, and by founding the schools of the prophets in particular, in which, under his guidance (1 Sam. xix. 19 sq.), in conjunction with the awakening and fostering of the prophetic gift, song and music were cultivated. In these schools, David's poetical talent was cultivated. He was a man and poet by birth. Even as a Bethlehemite shepherd he played upon the harp, and with his natural gift he combined a heart deeply imbued with religious feeling. But the Psalter contains as few traces of David's Psalms before his anointing as the New Testament does of the writings of the apostles before the Pentecost. It was only from the time when the spirit of Jehovah came upon him at his anointing as Israel's king, and raised him to the dignity of his calling in connection with the covenant of redemption, that he sang psalms which have become an integral part of the canon. They are the fruit, not only of his high gifts and the inspiration of the spirit of God (2 Sam. xxiii. 2), but also of his own experience and of the experience of his people interwoven with his own. David's life, from his anointing onwards, led through affliction to glory. Song, however, as a Hindu proverb says, is the offspring of suffering: the soka springs from the soka. His life was marked by vicissitudes which at one time prompted him to elegiac strains; at another, to praise and thanksgiving. At the same time he was the founder of the kingship of promise, a prophecy of the future Christ; and his life, thus typically moulded, could not express itself otherwise than in typical, and even consciously prophetic language. Raised to the throne, he did not forget the harp, his companion and solace, but rewarded
4. Origin of the Collection. — The Psalter, as we now have it, consists of five books; and in this it is a copy of the Thora, which it also resembles in this particular, — that as, in the Thora, Elohist and Jehovistic sections alternate, so here a group of Elohist psalms (xiii.-lxxvii.) is surrounded on both sides by groups of Jehovistic (i.-xii., lxxxv.-cl.). The five books are as follows: i.-xii., xiii.-lxiii., lxiii.-lxxix., xc.-cvi., cvii.-cl. Each of the first four books closes with a doxology, which is part of the preceding psalm (xlii. 14, lxii. 18 sq., lxxxix. 53, cvi. 48): the place of the fifth doxology is occupied by Ps. cl. as a full-toned finale to the whole. These doxologies very much resemble the language of the liturgical beracha of the second temple. The [796] [798], coupled with 1, is exclusively peculiar to them in Old-Testament writings. Even in the time of the chronicler only a few were extended by a doxology which characterizes ancient historiography, thereby produces David's festal hymn that resounded in Israel after the bringing home of the ark; and he does it in such a way, that, after he has once fallen into the track of Ps. cvi., he also puts into the mouth of David the beracha (benediction) which follows that psalm. From this we see that the Psalter was then already divided into books: the closing doxologies had already become part of the psalms. The chronicler, however, wrote towards the end of the Persian supremacy, although a considerable time yet before the beginning of the Grecian.

Next to this application of the beracha of the fourth book by the chronicler (Ps. lxxii. 20) is a significant mark for determining the history of the origin of the Psalter. The closing words are, without doubt, the subscription to the oldest psalm-pentateuch. The redactor certainly has removed this subscription from its original place close after lxiii. 17, by the interpolation of the beracha (lxxii. 18 sq.), but late in it at the same time untouched. But unfortunately that subscription, which has been so faithfully preserved, furnishes us less help than we could wish. We only gather from it that the present collection was preceded by a primary collection of very much more limited compass, which formed its basis, and that this closed with the Solomonic psalm lxxiii.; for the redactor would certainly not have placed the subscription only at the end of the Psalter, if he had not found it there already. And it leads to the supposition that Solomon himself, prompted, perhaps, by the liturgical requirements of the new temple, compiled this primary collection, and, by the addition of Ps. lxiii., may have caused it to be understood that he was the originator of the collection. But to the redactor whether the primary collection also contained only Davidic songs, properly so called, or whether the subscribed designation, "prayers of David," is only intended a fortiori, the answer is entirely wanting. By adopting the latter, we cannot see why only Ps. 1. of the Psalms of Asaph was inserted in it; for this psalm is really one of the old Asaphic psalms, and might therefore have been an integral part of the primary collection. On the other hand, not all of the Korahitic psalms (xiii.-lxiii.) could have belonged to it; since some of them, and most undoubtably xlvii., xlviii., belong to the time of Jehoshaphat, the most remarkable event of which, as the chronicler narrated, was foretold by an Asaphite, and celebrated by Korahitic singers. For this reason alone, apart from other psalms (as lxvi., lxvii., lxix. 35 sq., lxxi.), it is absolutely impossible that the secondary collection should have consisted of Ps. ii.-lxiii., or rather (since Ps. ii. must be assigned to the time of Isaiah) of Ps. iii.-lxxii.; and, if we leave the later insertions out of consideration, there is no arrangement left for the psalms of David and his contemporaries, which should in any way bear the impress of the Davido-Solomonic mind. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that the groundwork of the collection that forms the basis of the present Psalter must lie within the limits of Ps. iii.-lxiii.; for nowhere else do old Davidic psalms stand so closely together as here. The third book (Ps. lxxiii.-lxxxix.) exhibits a marked difference in this respect. We may therefore suppose that the chief bulk of the oldest hymn-book of Israel is contained in Ps. iii.-lxiii., but that its contents have been dispersed, and newly arranged in later redactions, and more especially in the last of all, preserving, however, the subscription lxxii. 20 with the Psalm of Solomon. The two groups, iii.-lxiii., lxxxix.-lxxxix., at least represent the first two stages of the origin of the Psalter. The primary collection may be Solomonic. The after-portion of the second group was, at the earliest, added in the time of Jehoshaphat, at which time, probably, the Book of the Proverbs of Solomon was also compiled. But, with a greater probability, we assign it to the time of Hezekiah, not merely because some of the psalms among them seem as though they ought to be referred to the overthrow of Assyria under Hezekiah, rather than to the overthrow of the allied neighboring nations under Jehoshaphat, but chiefly because "the men of Hezekiah" made an appendix of historical doxologies (Prov. xxxv. 1), and because Hezekiah is said to have brought the Psalms of David and of Asaph (the bulk of which are contained in the third book of the Psalms) into use again (2 Chron. xxix. 30). In the time of Ezra and Nehemiah the collection was enlarged by songs composed during the exile, and still more after the exile; but a supplement of old songs has also been preserved for this time. The Psalms of Solomon was composed first in order to make the beginning of the new Psalters more conspicuous by this going back into the oldest time; and to the fifty-six Davidic psalms of the first three books there are seventeen more added here in the last two, being the result of the writer throwing himself into David's temper of mind and circumstances. One chief source of such older psalms was the Proverbs, historical works of an amnialistic or even prophetic character, rescued from the age before the exile. It is from such sources that the historical notes prefixed to the Davidic hymns (and also to one in the fifth book, Ps. cxiii.) come.

5. Arrangement of the Collection of Psalms. — This bears the impress of one ordering mind; for (a) its opening is formed by a didactic prophetic couplet of psalms (i., ii.), introductory to the whole Psalter, and therefore, in the earliest times, regarded as one psalm, which opens and closes with וְשָׁאָלָה (ashrey); and its close is formed by four psalms (cxvi.-cxlix.), which begin and end with הַלְּלוּיָהוּ (Hallelujah). We do not include Ps. cl., for this psalm takes the place of the beracha of the fifth book. The opening of the Psalter celebrates the blessedness of those who walk according to the will of God in redemption, which has been revealed in the law and in history. The close of the Psalter calls upon all creatures to praise this God of law and in history. The close of the Psalter in redemption, which has been revealed in the place of the beracha of the fifth book. The completion of this great work. (c) There are in the Psalter seventy-three psalms bearing the inscription "הַלְּלָה" (le-David); viz., thirty-seven in book i., eighteen in book ii., one in book iii., two in book iv., fifteen in book v. The redaction has designed the placing of a closing collection of the Psalms, with an imposing group of Davidic psalms, just as it begins with the bulk of the Davidic psalms. The hallelujahs, commencing with Ps. cxvi. (after the fifteen Davidic psalms), are already preludes of the closing doxology. (c) The twelve Korahitic (xlii., xliii., xliv.-xlv., lxxiv., lxxxv., lxxxvi., lxxxvii., lxxxviii.) and twelve Asaphic (l., lxxii.-lxxviii.) psalms are found exclusively in the second and third books. Korahitic psalms, followed by an Asaphic, open the second book: Asaphic psalms, followed by four Korahic, open the third book. (d) The manner in which Davidic psalms are interspersed clearly sets before us the principle by which the arrangement according to the subject-matter is determined. Thus the פסלים (xlii., xliii., xliv., xlv., lxxii.-lxxv.) stand together among the Elohim psalms. In like manner we have in the last two books the קָדָרֵי (exx.-cxxxiv.), and, divided into groups, those beginning with "עָדָה" (ev.-cexxvii.), and those beginning and ending with תִּקְנֵה (cxvii., cxvi.-cl.).
PSALMS

50

6. Inscriptions of the Psalms. — These are older than the final redaction of the Psalter, and as of three kinds: (a) giving the name of the author, sometimes, especially to Davidic psalms, adding also the historical occasion, thus, vii., liv., xxxiv., lii., liii., xlv., lix., li., lx.; (b) giving the poetico-musical character of the Psalms, xc., cii., cxli., cxlii., li., lix., lx., lxxii., lix., etc.; (c) pointing out the liturgical use of the Psalms better, we would have more to say about—

7. The Poetical and Musical Character of the Psalms. — The early Hebrew poetry has neither rhyme nor metre, both of which (first rhyme, then metre) were first adopted by Jewish poets in the seventh century after Christ. True, attempts at rhyme are not wanting in the poetry and prophecy of the Old Testament, especially in the "tepikka style" (Ps. cxi.-c.; cf. Jer. iii. 21-25), where the earnestness of the prayer naturally causes a heaping up of similar flexional endings; but the assonance, in the transition state towards rhyme proper, had not taken an established form. Yet it is not mere fancy, when Philo, Josephus, Eusebius, Jerome, have detected in the Old Testament songs, especially in the Psalms, something resembling the Greek and Latin metres. Of Hebrew poetry, indeed, had a certain syllable measure, since, apart from the audible Skene and Chateph, both of which represent the principal shortening, all syllables have a full vowel or intermediate, and in ascending become short; and in descending, short. Hence the most manifest rhythms arise, e.g., the anapestic, מַיִם מָיִים מַיִם (ii. 8), or the dactylic, שֹׁכֶן שֹׁכֶן שֹׁכֶן (ii. 5), and thus obtains the appearance of a lively mixture of the Greek and Latin metres. But this is the very beauty of the kind of poetry, that the rhythms always vary according to the thoughts and feelings; as of the evening song (Ps. iv.), towards the end, to the anastrophe measure, קָדָרֵי חַיָּה חַיָּה (in order then quietly to subside in the קָדָרֵי חַיָּה), With this alternation of short and fall, long and short syllables, harmonizing lively passages with the subject, there is a refined, in Hebrew poetry, an expressiveness accent which is hardly to be found anywhere to such an extent.

Under the point of view of rhythm, the so-called "parallelistus membrorum" has also been displaced since the time of Lowth. The relative relation of the parallel members is like the two hands on either side of the principal caesura of the meter and pentameter, and this is particularly manifest in the double long line of the cæsura schema; e.g. (Ps. xlviii. 5, 6). "They be..."
symmetrically correspondent number of stichs (e.g., 6, 0, 6, 0, or 6, 7, 7, 0), or, if their compass by trying whether these pauses have a like or symmetrically correspondent number of stichs (e.g., 6, 6, 6, 6, or 6, 7, 0, 7), or, if their compass is too great for them to be at once regarded as one strophe, whether they cannot be divided into smaller wholes of an equal or symmetrical number of stichs. For the peculiarity of the Hebrew strophe does not consist in a run of definite metres closely united to form one harmonious whole (for instance, like the Sapphic strophe, with which Isa. xvi. 9, 10, with their short closing lines, correspond), but in a closed train of thought which is unrolled after the distichic and tristiclic ground-form of the rhythmical period.

Respecting the use of music and song in divine worship, the Thora contains nothing except the injunction concerning the ritualistic use of silver trumpets to be blown by the priests (Num. x.). David is really the creator of liturgical music; and to his arrangements, as we see from the Chronicles, every thing was afterwards referred, and, in times when it had fallen into disuse, restored. The instrument by means of which the three choir-masters (Heman, Asaph, and Ethan-Jeduthun) directed the choir was the cymbals (2 Sm. v. 25, 26); the harps (2 Sm. v. 22) represented the soprano; and the harp (the instrument of the female) was represented by the citherns, an octave lower (1 Chron. xv. 17–21). In a psalm where Selah (Selah) is appended, the stringed instruments and the instruments generally are to join in in such a way as to give intensity to that which is being sung. To these instruments, besides those mentioned in Ps. cl., 2 Sam. vi. 5, belonged also the temple trumpet (see above). In the second temple it was otherwise. The sounding of the trumpets by the priests, and the Levitical song with its accompanying music, alternated: they were not simultaneous. The congregation did not sing with the choir, but only uttered their Amen.

In the time of the second temple, the singing of the psalms appointed for each day commenced, at a sign given with the cymbal, at the time when the ministering priest offered the drink-offering. The Levites standing upon the platform, who were both players and singers, were at least twelve in number. Of what kind this song and music were, we can hardly now have an idea; and it is nothing but a mere fiction of Anton and L. Haupt to assert that the present accentuation of the psalms represents the fixed song of the temple. We have no tradition as to the value of the notes of the so-called metrical accentuation; and what we know at present is derived from but fragmentary notices contained in older works concerning the intonation of some metrical accents. Since Gerbert (De musica sacra) and Martini (Storia della musica), the view has become very general, that in the eight Gregorian tones, together with the extra tone (tonus peregrinus), used only for Ps. cxiv., we have a remnant of the ancient temple song, and this in itself is by no means impossible in connection with the Jewish nationality of the primitive church, and its gradual severance from the temple and synagogue; but the Jewish tradition, if the eight tones are to be traced back to it, has been developed under Greek influence. The "eight" tones are also mentioned elsewhere (cf. Stein Schneider: Jewish Literature, pp. 154, 337), and recall the eight church-tones, in the same manner as the two modes of using the accents in chanting, which are attested in the ancient service-books, recall the distinction between the festival and the simpler ferial manner in the Gregorian style of church-music.

The history of Psalmody, especially of the practical use of the Psalter, is a glorious history of blessing and victory. No other book of the Old Testament has grown so much from the heart and mouth of Israel into the heart and mouth of the church as this Old-Testament hymn-book. But, with all this praise, neither the real value of this hymn-book of Israel, nor the wonderful effect which it exercised upon the church, is sufficiently acknowledged. To do this we consider—

8. The Soteriological Signification of the Psalter. — When men had corrupted themselves by sin, God did not leave them to that doom of wrath by which they had chosen for themselves, but visited them on the evening of that most decisive of all days, in order that he might make them the disciples of his love. This visitation of Jehovah—Elohim was the first step, in the history of redemption, towards the goal of the incarnation; and the so-called protevangelium was the first laying of the foundation towards this goal of incarnation, or of the kingdom. The words of this salvation, making its way in history and in the consciousness of men, run all through Israel; and the Psalms show us how this seed-corn of words and deeds of divine love has expanded with a vital energy in the believing hearts of Israel. They bear the impress of the period during which the preparation of the way of salvation was centred in Israel, and the hope of redemption was a national hope. At that period the promise of the future Mediator was in its third stage. The hope of overcoming the tendency in mankind to be led astray into evil was attached to the seed of the woman, and the hope of a blessing for all nations, to the seed of Abraham; but at this period, when David became the creator of psalm-poetry for the sanctuary service, the promise had assumed a national character. At that period the hope of the believer was, not the king of Israel, but in fact, to David and his seed. When Solomon ascended the throne, the messianic desires and hopes of Israel were directed towards him, as Ps. lxxxii. shows: they belonged only to the one final Christ of God, but they clung for a time inquiringly, on the ground of 2 Sam. viii., to the son of David. But it was soon found out that neither in Solomon, nor in that son of David referred to in Ps. xlv., the full reality of the messianic idea had yet appeared; and when, in the later time of the kings, the Davidaic line became more and more inconsistent with its theocratic calling, the messianic hope broke entirely with the present, which became merely the dark background from which the image of the Messiah, as purely future, stood forth in relief. The son of David, in whom the prophecy of the later time of the kings centres, and whom also Ps. ii. sets forth before the kings of the earth, that they may render homage to him, is an eschatological character. But why is it, that, in the post-exile hymns, Messiah is no more the object of prophecy and hope? Because, with the Chaldean catastrophe, the messianic hope had suffered a heavy shock, which made it unpopular. This we also find in prophecy; for in Isa. xl.—lxvi., where the Messiah appears as the servant of Jehovah, the image is no more as it was before, i.e., a clear, national image of the king, but it is enriched by many points, as the expiatory sufferings and the two states, whereby it has become more universal, spiritual, and divine. Thus we find it more or less in Zechariah, Malachi, and in Daniel's Apocalypse. And although we find nowhere in the Psalms an echo of this advanced messianic prediction, yet there are not a few psalms, as lxxxv., xci., cii., especially xcvi.—xcviii., which have been written under the influence of Isa. xi.—lxvi. We call these psalms, in distinction from the strictly messianic ones, prophetic, i.e., such as do not speak of the kingdom of Jehovah's Anointed, but of the theocracy as such, which is complete inwardly and outwardly in its own representation of itself, not of the advent of a human king, but of Jehovah himself, with the kingdom of God manifest in its glory. For the announcement of salvation in the Old Testament runs on in two parallel lines: the one has as its termination the Anointed of Jehovah, who rules all nations out of Zion; the other, Jehovah, sitting above the cherubim, to whom all the earth does homage. These two lines do not meet in the Old Testament; it is only the fulfilment that makes it plain that the advent of the Anointed and that of Jehovah is one and the same. And of these two lines the divine preponderates in the Psalter: the hope is directed, after the cessation of the kingdom in Israel, beyond the human mediation, directly towards Jehovah, the author of salvation. The Messiah is not yet recognized as the God-man Jesus is in Jehovah. Jehovah is the Saviour. The Saviour, when he shall appear, is nothing but the visible manifestation of the salvation of Jehovah (Isa. xlix. 6).

As to the relation of the Psalms to sacrifices, it is true we find passages in which the legal sacrifice is acknowledged as an act of worship on the part of the individual and of the congregation (Ps. lxvi. 15, li. 19); but there are many more passages in which it appears as something not at all desired by God (xl. 7 sq., li. 18 sq.); but in this respect the Psalms show the progress of the history of salvation. It is a continuation of the words of Samuel (1 Sam. xv. 22 sq.): we feel already something of the spirit of the New Testament. In place of sacrifices is required contribution of heart, prayer, thanksgiving, yielding one's self to God in the doing of his will, as Prov. xxi. 3, to do right, Hos. vi. 6, kindness, Mic. vi. 6–8, acting justly, love, and humility, Jer. vii. 21–23, obedience. This is what surprises one. The disparaged sacrifice is regarded only as a symbol, not as a type: it is only considered in its ethical character, not in its relation to the history of redemption. Its nature is so much unfolded only so far as it is a gift to God (727p), not so far as the offering is appointed for atonement (7725p); in one word, the mystery of the blood remains undisclosed. And why? Because the bloody sacrifice, as such, in the Old Testament, remains a question, to which only Isa. iii. 13 sq. gives the only distinct answer. The prophetic representation of the passion and sacrifice of Christ is only given in direct prophetic language thus late on: and it is only the evangelist who tells us how and in what respect the spirit which spoke by David has moulded that which he says concerning himself, the type,
PSALMS. 1957

The concept of life as eternal, although it may seem to live forever, and the concept of death and life, defeat and triumph (xlix.15), so that the inference forces itself upon one, that the former is compared with the end of the righteous (lxiii.4); passages in which the end of the ungodly is expressed so broadly, that it is not nowhere definitely expressed, but there are, never the less, passages in which the hope of not falling in the way of salvation, which consist of penitential contrition, pardon, and newness of life. As for the so-called imprecatory psalms, the Christian consciousness, it must be observed that the righteousness here is a mere appearance, since the righteousness to which the psalmists appeal is not a sum of good works which are reckoned up before God as claiming a reward, but a godly direction of the will, and a godly form of life, which has its root in the surrender of one's self to God, and regards itself as the operation and work of justifying, sanctifying, preserving, and ruling grace (lxxiii.25 sq., xxi.5-7, xii.14, and other passages). There is not wanting an acknowledgment of the innate sinfulness of our nature (li.7), of the condemnation of man before God (li.13), of the end of the righteous, as death and, for the most part, unperceived sins, even of the converted (xiii.13), of the forgiveness of sins as a fundamental condition of salvation (xxxii.1 sq.), of the necessity of regeneration (lii.12), in short, of the way of salvation, which consists of penitential contrition, pardon, and newness of life. As for the relation of the Psalms to the last things, the hope of eternal life after death is nowhere definitively expressed, but there are, nevertheless, passages in which the hope of not falling to death is expressed so broadly, that the thought of a final destiny of all men being inseparable, is completely swallowed up by the living one's confidence of living in the strength of God (Ps. lvi.13, and especially xvi.9-11); passages in which the covenant relationship with Jehovah is contrasted with this present life and its possession, in such a manner that the opposite of a life extending beyond the present time is implied (xvii.14 sq., lxxiii.4); passages in which the end of the ungodly is compared with the end of the righteous, as death and life, defeat and triumph (xlix.15), so that the inference forces itself upon one, that the former die, although they seem to live forever, and the latter live forever, though they die; passages in which the Psalms, though only by way of allusion, looks forward to a being borne away to God, like Enoch and Elias (xlix.14, lxxiii.24). Nowhere, however, is there any general creed to be found; but we see how the belief in a future life struggles to be free, at first only as an individual hope, but by the conclusion of the end of the course of the redemptive history, is expressed in the promises which experience has established; and, far from the grave being penetrated by a glimpse of heaven, it has, on the contrary, to the ecstasy of the life derived from God, as it were, altogether vanished; for life in opposition to death only appears as the lengthening of the line of the present ad infinitum. On the other hand, death and life in the mind of the psalmist have become known with, far from taken hold of at the very roots, which are grounded in the principles of divine wrath and divine love), that it is easy for the New-Testament faith, to which they have become clear, even to their background of hell and heaven, to adjust and deepen the meaning of all utterances in the Psalms that belong by way of allusion to the meaning of the Psalmist, when, as in passages like vi.5, Gehenna is substituted for Hades to adapt it to the New-Testament saint; because, since the descent of Jesus Christ into Hades, there is no longer any limbus patrum. The way of all who die in the Lord is not earthwards, but upwards: Hades exists on earth before the Resurrection, and is it contrary to the idea of the poets to think of the future vision of God's face in all its glory, in Ps. xvii.15, and of the resurrection morn, in Ps. xiii.14; for the hopes expressed there, to which the Old-Testament consciousness they referred to this side the grave, are future according to their New-Testament fulfilment, which is the only truly satisfying one of the impenetrable barrier of the Old-Testaments is one. The Old-Testament barrier contains already the germinating New-Testament life, which at a future time shall burst it. The eschatology of the Old Testament leaves a dark background, which, as is designed, is divided by the New-Testament revelation into light and darkness; the New-Testament is one, extending the eschatological dark of the Old Testament, it is the first morning rays of the New-Testament sunrise which is already announcing itself. The Church, as well as the Christian, here cannot refrain from leaving the barrier of the psalmists, and understanding the Psalms according to the mind of the Spirit, whose purpose, in the midst of the development of salvation and of the perception of it, is directed towards its goal and consummation. But the scientific exposition must carefully distinguish between the times of the history of salvation, and the degrees in the perception of that history. How late this object of scientific exposition has been perceived will be seen by reviewing,—

9. The History of the Exposition of the Psalms. We begin (a) with The Apostolic Exposition. The Old Testament is, according to its essence, Christo-centric: therefore the innermost truth of the Old Testament has become known with, the revelation of Jesus Christ, but not at once. His passion, resurrection, ascension, are but three steps of this progressive opening of the Old Testament, especially of the Psalms. Before and after his resurrection he unfolded the meaning of the Psalms from his own life and vicissitudes; he showed how what was written in the law of Moses and the Prophets was fulfilled in him; he revealed to his disciples the meaning of τοῦ συνεντ. τός γραφής (Luke xxiv. 44 sq.). Jesus Christ's exposition of the Psalms is the beginning and goal of Christian psalm-inter pretation. It began, as that of the Church, and first of all as the apostolic, with the Pentecost; and how strongly the disciples were drawn to the Psalms, we see from the fact, that, with the exception of the Book of Isaiah, no other book of the Old Testament has been cited so often as the Book of Psalms. It is quoted about seventy times in the New Testament. (b) The Post-Apostolic, Patriotic Exposition. With the exception of Origen and Jerome, the interpreters of the early Church had no knowledge of the Hebrew, and even these two not sufficient to free themselves from a dependence on the LXX. Of Origen's Commentary and Homilies on the Psalms, we have fragments in the translation of Rufinus. From Jerome, we have an excellent translation of the Psalter (Psalterium juxta Hebraeos, published in the Hebrew-Latin Psalterium, edited by Tischendorf, Baer, Delitzsch, Leipzig, 1874, and by De Lagarde, after his own recension, Leipzig, 1874). This Psalterium is the most important work of the patriotic period. Athanasius wrote on the contents of the Psalms in his epistle πρὸς Μαρκιανόν εἰς τὴν ομορφιαν τῶν ψαλμῶν, translated into Latin by Reuchlin, and from the Latin into German by Jörg Spalatin (1516). About the time of Athanasius, Hilarius Pictaviensis wrote his Tractatus super Psalmos, with an extensive prologue. We still have his exposition of Ps. i., ii., ix., xii., xiv., li., lii., liii.-lxix., xc., cvii.-cvii. (according to the numbering of the Septuagint), which is more useful for the dogmatic theologian than for the exegete. Of somewhat later date are Ambrose's Enarrationes in Ps. i., xxxv.-xl., xlvi., xlvii., xlviii., lx., cviii. (tome ii. of the Benedictine edition). The most comprehensive work of the early Church on the Psalms was that of Chrysostom, of which only the third part is still extant. It is divided into the form of homilies: though it is brilliant, the contents more ethical than dogmatic. The only representative of the school of Antioch is Theodoret; but his work is a mere beginning, and therefore defective throughout. The Western counterpart to Chrysostom's Commentary are Augustine's Enarrationes in Psalmos (in tome iv. of the Benedictine edition), the chief mine of all later exposition in the Western Church. Cassiodorus, in his Expositiones in omnes Psalmos (tome ii. of the Benedictine edition), draws largely from Augustine, though not devoid of independence. What the Greek Church has done for the exposition of the Psalms has been garnered up many times since Photius, in the so-called Catena: one, extending to Ps. i., was published at Venice, 1569; another, more complete, was edited, in 3 vols., by the Jesuit Corderius, Antwerp, 1648. From the Catena of Nicetas Heracleota, Folekxmann published extracts in 1601. But, in spite of all defects which we find in these works, it must be said that the Church has never found such rapturous delight in the Psalms, which it was never weary of singing day and night, never used them with richer results, even to martyrdom, than at that period. Instead of profane popular songs, as one passed through the country one might hear psalms resounding over the fields and woods. And how many martyrs have endured every form of martyrdom with psalms upon their lips! That which the Church in those days failed to furnish in writing towards the exposition of the Psalms, it more than compensated for by preserving the vitality of the Psalms with its blood. (c) The Mediceal Church Exposition did not make any essential advance upon the patriarchic. (d) The Mediceal Synagogue Exposition is working in the recognition of Christ, and consequently in the fundamental condition required for a spiritual understanding of the Psalms. The midrash on the Psalms, entitled שארים ב-Mishna, and the midrashic Catena of Nicetas Heracleota, of which at present only ליקות שקרין (by Simeon Kara ha-Darshan), and not the כרמים יתקוע (by Machir ben abba Mari), is known, are of little use. With the study and cultivation of the grammar, about the year 900 A.D., exposition and exegesis also commenced among the Jews. At the head of this period of Jewish exegesis we find Saadia Gaon (d. 941, 942), author of an Arabic translation of and exposition on the Psalms. The next great expositor who wrote on the whole of the Old Testament (with the exception of Chronicles) and on almost the whole of the Talmud is Rashî (d. 1105). Nicolaus de Lyra (d. 1340), author of Postilla perpetua, made use of the works by Jewish expositors. Lyra and Paul de Santa Maria, Archbishop of Burgos (d. 1435), the author of the Addiciones ad Lyram, were both Jewish Christians. Less dependent upon tradition are Aben-Ezra (d. 1167) and David Kimchi (d. about 1250); the Karaite Depest, from whose Commentary on the Psalms De Jargas published some fragments (1846), was Aben-Ezra's teacher. Compared with other books, the Psalms were less commented upon by the Jews. In later commentaries, as in that of Moses Alshech (Venice, 1601) and Joel Shoeb (Salonichi, 1669), the simplicity and elegance of the older expositors degenerate into a repulsive scholasticism. The simple though mystical commentaries of Obadiah Spring (d. at Bologna, 1550), the teacher of Reuchlin, makes an exception. (e) The Reformation Exposition. With the Reformation the rose-garden of the Psalter began to breathe forth its perfumes as with renewed freshness of a May day; for, converted into imperishable hymns (by Luther, Albinus, Franck, Gerhard, Jonas, Musculus, Ringwaldt, and others), it was transferred into the psalmody of the German Lutheran Church. In the French Reformed Church, Clement Marot translated into verse fifty psalms; two were added by Calvin, and the rest by Beza; while Goudimel, the martyr of St. Bartholomew's night, and teacher of Palestreina, composed the melodies and chorals. The English Church adopted the Psalms as part of its Liturgy: the Congregational followed the example of the Continental sister-churches. And how diligently was the Psalter moulded into Latin verse! But the exegetical functions of psalm-exposition have been more clearly apprehended and more happily discharged than ever before. Luther's interpretation of the Psalms, in spite of its deficiencies, exceeds every thing hitherto produced, and is still a perpetual mine of wealth. M. Butzer's Commentary (1520) is distinguished by sagacity and delicacy of judgment. Calvin's exposition has many excellencies; but his deficiency consists in denying the messianic relation, even in those psalms which the modern rationalistic exegesis must even acknowledge. Calvin's strict historical method of interpretation becomes a caricature in Esrom Rüdinger, the Moravian. (f) The Post-Reformation Exposition is best represented by Martin Geier, more dogmatist, however, than exegete. In the Reformed Church we find Cocceius (d. 1669). Johann Heinrich Michaelis represents, in his Annotations superiores in Hagiographa, the exposition of the Psalms from 1600 to 1750: everything is accumulated here; the glossarial annotations groan beneath the burden of numberless unsifted examples and parallel passages. After 1750 Burk published his Gnomon to the Psalms (1740), and Christian A. Crusius, his Hymnomenata (1764); both follow Bengel's principles. To have freed the psalm-exposition from want of taste is the merit of the Psalter. Hengstenberg consists in having brought it back, out of this want of spirituality, to the believing consciousness of the Church. (g) Modern Exposition is marked by De Wette's Commentary, which was first published in 1811 (ed. by G. Baur, 1856), and forms an epoch in exegesis. The negative criticism of De Wette was supplemented by the positive result (1840) of the work of Schmoller (Lond., ed. 1840-45). This was followed by Lengerke (1847) and J. Olshausen (1853), but with this difference, that, while Lengerke surpasses Hitzig by asserting that not a single psalm can be ascribed with certainty to David, Olshausen finds Maccabean influences in many psalms, belonging to the time of Hengstenberg. Calvin's exposition has a special charm. The merit of having perceived fully the object of the expositor, and having explained the Psalms in the spirit of the Church, and thus in truly spiritual rapport with the spirit of the psalmist, belongs to Olshausen. (h) Modern criticism of the Psalter is the fifth part of the Biblical Commentary by the veteran Ed. Reuss, who treats of the Psalms and Lamentations under the main title of Poëtie Lyrique (2d ed., 1879). He refuses to assign any date to almost all the Psalms (Geschichte der Alten Testaments, 1881, § 157), and doubts that "we have Davidic psalms at all." Stade also (Zeitschrift, 1882, p. 106) declares the Psalter to be the product of post-exile Judaism, and asserts that each and every psalm must be regarded as post-exilic, unless the contrary is proved. The critical stand-point of an Ewald and Hitzig, who, like Herm. Schultz in his O. T. Theol. (2d ed., 1878, pp. 84 sq.), acknowledge a group of real psalms of David, is thus surpassed; and freer scope is now left to the modern reconstruction of the religious history of Israel according to the Darwinian pattern.
PSALMS. 1959

PSALMS, Use of the, in Worship. There are professing Christians, not a few, who believe, that, in the exercise of praising God directly or formally, the inspired Psalter, that is, the canonical Book of Psalms, only, should be used, or at least should be used to the exclusion of all uninspired songs.

At present this position is held by the United Presbyterian Church of North America, the Associate Presbyterian Church of North America, the Associate Reformed Synod of the South (U. S.), the Reformed Presbyterians (commonly called Covenanters) of Scotland, Ireland, and America, the United Original Secession Church of Scotland, and, we believe, the General Synod of the Christian Reformed Church of Holland. In the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, the only authorized manual of praise is the Book of Psalms; although, in many congregations of that church, "paraphrases" of other parts of Scripture, and a few uninspired hymns which have never received the sanction of the Church, are also used. In the Wal- densian Church, so far as the original congregations in the Piedmontese valleys are concerned, the Psalms only are used in praising God, or at least were till very recently; but, in the mission congregations of that church in other parts of Italy, uninspired hymns have been introduced. In all the Presbyterian churches of Scotland, Canada, the United States, and Australia, there is a considerable number of persons who favor the view that only the Psalms should be used in the service of praise.

Among those who advocate the exclusive use of inspired songs in praising God, some (a small minority, it is believed) hold, that, besides the Psalter, other parts of Scripture may warrantably be employed in that exercise. It is, moreover, to be remembered that the advocates of Psalmody do not object absolutely to the use of uninspired hymns as a means of exciting and expressing pious feeling; their objection being to the use of such compositions in the direct and proper worship of God.

Some of the considerations urged in favor of restriction to the Psalms are here subjoined.

1. To worship God otherwise than he has appointed is "will-worship," more or less gross. The law regulative of worship is not that we may use what is either expressly or implicitly forbidden, but that we must be limited to the use of what is either expressly or implicitly appointed by God (Deut. xii. 32; Matt. xv. 9, xxviii. 20).

2. To the Old-Testament Church God gave inspired songs, and prescribed the use of them in worship. Among those who advocate the exclusive use of inspired songs in praising God, some (a small minority, it is believed) hold, that, besides the Psalter, other parts of Scripture may warrantably be employed in that exercise. It is, moreover, to be remembered that the advocates of Psalmody do not object absolutely to the use of uninspired hymns as a means of exciting and expressing pious feeling; their objection being to the use of such compositions in the direct and proper worship of God.

3. There is no evidence that God ever authorized his ancient people to employ in the stated service of song any other hymns than those finally collected into one book, that of Psalms. Among those who advocate the exclusive use of inspired songs in praising God, some (a small minority, it is believed) hold, that, besides the Psalter, other parts of Scripture may warrantably be employed in that exercise. It is, moreover, to be remembered that the advocates of Psalmody do not object absolutely to the use of uninspired hymns as a means of exciting and expressing pious feeling; their objection being to the use of such compositions in the direct and proper worship of God.

4. This book continues to be the only divinely authorized hymn-book of the church. It is more suited to the present dispensation than it was even to the past. It is full of Christ, as the early Christian writers asserted vigorously. From the most devout Christians of the last eighteen centuries the highest eulogies of the Psalms have proceeded. Of the right and obligation to use the Psalms in praise, there has been no repeal. No substitute, no supplement, has been furnished or authorized by God. At the institution of the Supper, Christ and his disciples "hymned." It is general to assume that the occasion were the Psalms, extending from Ps. cxiii. to Ps. cxviii. inclusive. Our Lord thus wedded to the Psalms, and authoritatively transferred the Psalms to the worship of the New-Testament Church.

By apostolic authority the use of the Psalms in praising God is clearly enjoined in Eph. v. 19 and Col. iii. 16. It is urged, indeed, that, in these texts, the use of "hymns" and "spiritual songs" is also enjoined, and therefore that uninspired odes may warrantably be employed in formal praise.

The reply made to this is, that it assumes without proof that the "hymns" and "songs" meant are uninspired compositions; that the argument, if valid, would prove that it is sinful not to use uninspired hymns; that the direction given is not to prepare hymns "hymned" by Christ; that the epithet "spiritual," applied to the songs, marks them as emphatically the product of the Spirit, that is, as inspired, and not merely devotional (1 Cor. ii. 13, xiv. 1); that it is difficult to believe that the apostle placed inspired and uninspired compositions on the same level; that, if psalms differ materially from hymns and songs, these latter must differ from each other, whereas, no distinction is made between them practically by hymn-singers; that the advocates of an uninspired hymnology seem to admit that psalms may fitly be called hymns, for psalms may be found in many popular collections styled Hymnals or Hymn-books; and that in the Septuagint version of the Old Testament, the version used by the Christians of Ephesus and Colosse, the three terms which we use to designate the Psalms, while, moreover, Josephus, a contemporary of Paul, frequently styles the Psalms "hymns," and expressly says that David wrote "Ωδίς εἰς τὸν και τοὺς ἄλλους," that is, "songs and hymns to God" (Ant., 7, 12, 3).

5. If other hymns than those of the Psalter were used in the Apostolic Church, some of them would surely have survived. But not even one has certainly come down from the first two centuries. The earliest Christian hymn extant is believed to be that to the Logos, attributed to Clemens Alexandrinus, who died about 220 A.D.; but there is no evidence that it was ever used in the express worship of God. It needs to be noted that the mere existence of a hymn, or the fact that it was sung devotionally, is no proof that it was used in formal worship. During, at least, the first four centuries, the Psalms were preferred to the other or Hymn-books; and that in the Septuagint version of the Old Testament, the version used by the Christians of Ephesus and Colosse, the three terms which we use to designate the Psalms, while, moreover, Josephus, a contemporary of Paul, frequently styles the Psalms "hymns," and expressly says that David wrote "Ωδίς εἰς τὸν και τοὺς ἄλλους," that is, "songs and hymns to God" (Ant., 7, 12, 3).

6. The fact that God gave to the church a psalm-book, but not a prayer-book, seems to teach that between prayer and praise there is such a difference, that the right to make our own prayers does not warrant the conclusion that we have the right to worship God with hymns uninspired.

7. The aid of the Spirit is promised in reference to prayer, but no such aid in reference to hymn-making, a much more difficult operation.

8. The inspired Psalter is the true Union Hymn-book. Prepared as it was on the occasion were the Psalms, extending from Ps. cxiii. to Ps. cxviii. inclusive. Our Lord thus wedded together the Supper and the Psalms, and authoritatively transferred the Psalms to the worship of the New-Testament Church.

By apostolic authority the use of the Psalms in praising God is clearly enjoined in Eph. v. 19 and Col. iii. 16. It is urged, indeed, that, in these texts, the use of "hymns" and "spiritual songs" is also enjoined, and therefore that uninspired poems may warrantably be employed in formal praise.

Instrumental Music in Worship. Those churches which reject uninspired hymns, though not they only, have hitherto been noted for a repugnance to the use of instrumental music in worship; hence a brief statement of the anti-instrumental line of argument may not unfitly be appended to the sketch given of the arguments against uninspired hymns.

Anti-instrumentalists commonly reason thus:

1. In the matter of worship, our great inquiry should be, "What has God appointed?" Any form of worship not appointed is forbidden.

2. That only which is necessary to the suitable observance of a prescribed form of worship can be regarded as a circumstance needing no explicit appointment. If so, instrumental music is not a circumstance of worship.

3. Though divinely prescribed in the Old Dispensation, instrumental music was not intended to form an element of New Testament worship.

(1) It is in keeping with the sensuousness which distinguished the Old Dispensation from the New.

(2) It pertained to the transient ceremonial system of the Israelites. The temple was the seat, and all the worship was instrumental. Even if practised elsewhere and by others, it could still be deemed ceremonial; for the rites of the ceremonial system were not limited to the precincts of the tabernacle, or the temple.

The Psalms, indeed, which by divine authority are still sung, enjoy the use of instruments, but do they the use of sacrifices? While, besides, no injunction is more than a permission, which is all for which most instrumentalisists contend.

(3) The New Testament is unfavorable to the view that instrumental music is among the appointments of New Testament worship.

At the institution of the Supper, Christ and his disciples "hymned," but used no instruments. If, in the most sacred of our observances, instrumental music may be wisely dispensed with, why not in all?

Sanction of instrumental music in worship is supposed by many to be found in Eph. v. 19 and Col. iii. 16, where occurs the word φιάλη, which, it is alleged, means to sing with the accompaniment of a harp. But this argument would prove that it is as much a duty to play as to sing in worship.

But, even admitting that it retains an instrumental allusion, we may hold, with Meyer and others, that it does so only figuratively; the heart being the seat or the instrument of the action indicated. The New Testament is theapocephalous, or non-canonical, and inspired; (2) the non-canonical, but, on account of their long use, worthy of being read in the churches (α'ναγκασόμενα, εκκλησιαστικά); and (3) the other books of a biblical character in circulation (biblical name in the title, a biblical form, biblical contents, but differing greatly in spirit and truth from the canonical books), called secret, and such that should be kept secret (προσιτοτορία).

Virtually the same books which the ancient church called Apocrypha are embraced under the name Pseudepigrapha by the Protestant Church. Since, after the example of Jerome, the non-canonical books of the Old Testament received the name Apocrypha, it became natural to find a new one for the third class. The name ψευδόμενος γραφή is indeed taken only from a single and outward mark; namely, the spurious character of the author's name which they bear. It is neither sufficiently comprehensive, nor does it distinguish sufficiently this class of writings from the apocrypha; nor is it applicable to all the writings of the third class. For many reasons however, it is probably the best term that could be found.
The pseudoeipigrapha are divided into those of the Old, and those of the New Testament; the former embracing all those that claim to have been written by an Old-Testament personage, whether the contents be of a Jewish or of a Christian character; the latter embracing those pretended to be New-Testament gospels, epistles, etc., of New-Testament characters. The latter class could probably better be called Apocrypha of the New Testament (in the old sense of the word).

In the following will be found a bird's-eye view of the Old-Testament pseudoeipigrapha, both of those that are still preserved, and of those whose name alone we know. We preface a few general remarks on the origin and development of this whole class of literature. The rapid growth and spread of pseudoeipigraphic literature among the Jews and Christians in the last century before, and the early centuries after, Christ, is a peculiar phenomenon, for which other nations (e.g., the Indian) have only distant analogies; which is all the more remarkable, because such writings are in direct contradiction to the duty of strict truthfulness demanded by both Mosaism and Christianity.

The rise after the exile, thus it also increased the reverence for the old history, the old persons and writings, so much, that these ruled and decided the whole spiritual life of the people. The examination, study, and application of the sacred writings, were the fundamental objects of these times. Although, through association with other nations and educational forces (Persians, Greeks, Romans), and through a more systematic and a deeper investigation of the old books, new knowledge and aims were born, and although, in extraordinary and dangerous times, prominent men would feel themselves called upon to speak to the congregation, gospels, revelations, etc., of New-Testament characters. The opposition of the church.

With the rise of Christianity, a new element was introduced into this literature, and contributed to its growth and development. The Essenes were not, as is frequently stated, the medium which transferred this class of writings into the Christian Church. There is no historical evidence for this, not even in Josephus. But Jewish-Christian pseudoeipigrapha flourished most abundantly among the Judaizing sects and the Gnosticism arising from them, especially in Asia Minor and Egypt. In the hands of the sects and heretics they later became instruments for dangerous purposes, which resulted in the antagonizing attitude of the church.

The number of Jewish and Christian pseudoepigrapha was undoubtedly very large. Already in the Apocryphon of Ezra (4 Ez. xiv. 46 Lat.; xiv.
PSEUDEPIGRAPHA.

1963

PSEUDEPIGRAPHA.

1. Lyrical Poetry.—1. The Psalter of Solomon (Greek), published first from an Augsburg manuscript (since lost) in 1626, by a Jesuit, J. L. de la Cerda; later by Fabr. i. 914 sqq., with a collation of a Vienna manuscript of the tenth century; by Hilgenfeld, in Ztschrft. f. wiss. Theol. xi. 134 sqq., and in Mess. Jud., pp. 3 sqq.; by E. Geiger, Der Psalter Salomonis mit Úbers. u. Erklär. (Augsburg, 1871); and by Fritzsche, l. c. pp. 569 sqq. A German translation (revised from Geiger's) is furnished by Hilgenfeld, in his Ztschrft., xiv. 383 sqq., and one by Weilhausen, Die Pharisaer und Sadd. (Grieben, 1874), pp. 138 sqq., together with a good discussion, pp. 112-120, 131-138; [an English translation by B. Pick, in Presbyterian Review, October, 1888]. It is a collection of songs for the congregation, in the manner of the biblical psalms (even with the διάφωμα xii. 31, viii. 10), eighteen in number, bearing the title υψώμα (ψαλιμον, Cod. Aug.) Σαλομώνεως. It is probable that they were not originally issued under Solomon's name for later times. They accordingly originated between the years 63 and 45 B.C. The utterances seem to be the expression of the pious under the catastrophe of 63, and uttered soon after. The most remarkable feature is this, that the psalmists see in the Asmoneans unholy usurpers, who have been justly hurled from the throne (xvii. 7 sq., viii. 12 sq., ii. 3, iv. 1-25, vii. 8 sqq., xii. 1-4, xvii. 6-8, 17-24); and they thus sympathize with the Pharisees. In the place of these godless rulers, the singers pray for the speedy coming of the Anointed One, the Messiah, the Son of David, and the advent of the kingdom of God (i. 36, v. 22, xvii. 1-38, vii. 9, ix. 1 sqq., xviii. 23 sqq., xvii. 6 sqq.). In so far these psalms are an important index to the relation of the parties in those days. They are also full of messianic hopes, faith in the resurrection and eternal retribution (ii. 36, vii. 11 sqq., xiv. 2, 7, iii. 13, xiv. 6, xv. 11). They are sometimes found in manuscripts of the Greek Bible, and sometimes were counted among the antilegomena of the Old Testament. Cf. Hilgenfeld: Mess. Jud., p. xi. sqq. On the five ψαλιμα of Solomon, found in the Gnostic Pista Sophia, cf. Hilgenfeld, p. xiv.

2. A Pseudepigraphon of Δσδδδ is mentioned in the Consil. Apost., vi. 16. Whether this is Ps. citi of the Greek Bible, or a larger, independent work, can now no longer be decided.

II. Prophetic Writings. (a) The So-called Apocalypses, Revelations, (b) Testaments (see below).

(a) This is the name assigned to those books of fictitious prophecy, which, after the spirit of prophecy had departed from Israel, were written, in the manner of the genuine prophetic books, to solve the problems suggested by the fate and sufferings of the people. Such is the historical origin of each one of them. They seek a solution of the intricacies of the present in predictions of the glory of the future. Accordingly they do not imitate the old prophets in their chief peculiarity, namely, to counsel and warn the people on their doings, but later received it on the basis of a heathen ruler has had hitherto been ruling: they have themselves invited the enemy in (Ps. i., ii., iv., viii., xii., xvii., xviii.). The congregation of the faithful must learn the proper lessons from such tribulations (passim). Although the minor particulars of these hymns have not been sufficiently explained, yet these contents in general point to the destruction of the Asmonean monarchy by Pompey in 63 B.C. Not only do the descriptions of ii. 1 sqq., viii. 15-24, xvii. 18-20 (especially viii. 16, xvii. 14), harmonize with his doings, but also the manner of his death, in ii. 30 sqq., as all the best investigators acknowledge (Movres, Delitzsch, Lange, Keim, Hitzig, Noldeke, W. Dietrich, Geiger, etc.). They accordingly originated between the years 63 and 45 B.C. The utterances seem to be the expression of the pious under the catastrophe of 63, and uttered soon after. The most remarkable feature is this, that the psalmists see in the Asmoneans unholy usurpers, who have been justly hurled from the throne (xvii. 7 sq., viii. 12 sq., ii. 3, iv. 1-25, vii. 8 sqq., xii. 1-4, xvii. 6-8, 17-24); and they thus sympathize with the Pharisees. In the place of these godless rulers, the singers pray for the speedy coming of the Anointed One, the Messiah, the Son of David, and the advent of the kingdom of God (i. 36, v. 22, xvii. 1-38, vii. 9, ix. 1 sqq., xviii. 23 sqq., xvii. 6 sqq.). In so far these psalms are an important index to the relation of the parties in those days. They are also full of messianic hopes, faith in the resurrection and eternal retribution (ii. 36, vii. 11 sqq., xiv. 2, 7, iii. 13, xiv. 6, xv. 11). They are sometimes found in manuscripts of the Greek Bible, and sometimes were counted among the antilegomena of the Old Testament. Cf. Hilgenfeld: Mess. Jud., p. xi. sqq. On the five ψαλιμα of Solomon, found in the Gnostic Pista Sophia, cf. Hilgenfeld, p. xiv.

3. The Enoch and Noah Writings, combined in the Book of Enoch. This book, cited in Jude
14 sq., much used by the Christian writers of the first five centuries, and then lost to the Greek Church also, with the exception of the remnant preserved in \textit{Clericus Ephesiensis}, and a few fragments (96, 49-49) discovered by Mai and Gildemeister, was in 1773 found entire in the Bible of Ethiopia by Bruce, who brought three manuscripts to Europe. It has since been published in the Ethiopic by Laurence in 1888, and in much improved form by Dillmann in 1851. Laurence also rendered it into English (1821), and Dillmann into German (1853). The literature on this subject is remarkably rich. \cite{see pp. 41 sqq., Langen, and Schodde, \textit{see pp. 41 sqq.}}

\textit{The Book of Enoch, translated, with Introduction and Notes, Andover, 1882}, besides which the following works in English may be consulted,

\cite{Drummond: \textit{The Jewish Messiah, Lond., 1877, pp. 17 sq.; Bissell: \textit{The Apocalypse of the Old Testament, N.Y., 1880, pp. 605 sq.; Laurence: \textit{Brabbel, xxxvi.-lxxi.,\textasciitilde; the corrected by his latest notes \textit{A. Geiger, J. Ztschrifl., p. 556 sqq.}}} \textit{The book claims that Moses, in his hundred and twentieth year, and the twenty-five hundredth of the creation, handed it, together with the Pentateuch, to Joshua, and in it prophesied the course of Israel's history, to the establishment of the messianic kingdom. The conclusion of the book is wanting. The book clearly speaks of John Hycrurus, Herod in the thirty-fourth year of his reign, the invasion of Varus (c. 7), and was evidently written soon after this last event (4 A.D.). In the parts preserved, no mention is made of a Messiah; though the author is a member of the party of the Zealots, an enemy of the Asmoneans, Herodians, Sadducees, and even of the Pharisees (c. 7). Although originally a Hebrew work, the Latin has been translated from a Greek version.}

\textit{The Fourth Book of Ezra, according to the method of numbering the Ezra books in the Latin Church, originally \textit{Ezegiopergmon}} (\textit{HILGEMEYER: \textit{Mes. Jud., pp. xviii. sqq.}})

\textit{The Latin text, with the exception of very few small fragments, has been lost; but in its room we have a Latin and four Oriental versions. The Latin text in the Vulgate, a very corrupt one, has been much improved by Volkmar (\textit{Handb. der Einleitung in d. Apocryph., vol. i.; Das Buch Ezra, Tubingen, 1863}), by Hilgenfeld and Fritzsche, \textit{I.e.} the large \textit{f. wissen. Thol.}, 1868, 1871), Schiller, \textit{I.c.} pp. 536 sqq.). The book claims that Moses, in his hundred and twentieth year, and the twenty-five hundredth of the creation, handed it, together with the Pentateuch, to Joshua, and in it prophesied the course of Israel's history, to the establishment of the messianic kingdom. The conclusion of the book is wanting. The book clearly speaks of John Hycrurus, Herod in the thirty-fourth year of his reign, the invasion of Varus (c. 7), and was evidently written soon after this last event (4 A.D.). In the parts preserved, no mention is made of a Messiah; though the author is a member of the party of the Zealots, an enemy of the Asmoneans, Herodians, Sadducees, and even of the Pharisees (c. 7). Although originally a Hebrew work, the Latin has been translated from a Greek version.}

\textit{The Fourth Book of Ezra, according to the method of numbering the Ezra books in the Latin Church, originally \textit{Ezegiopergmon}} (\textit{HILGEMEYER: \textit{Mes. Jud., pp. xviii. sqq.}})

\textit{The Latin text, with the exception of very few small fragments, has been lost; but in its room we have a Latin and four Oriental versions. The Latin text in the Vulgate, a very corrupt one, has been much improved by Volkmar (\textit{Handb. der Einleitung in d. Apocryph., vol. i.; Das Buch Ezra, Tubingen, 1863}), by Hilgenfeld and Fritzsche, \textit{I.e.} the large \textit{f. wissen. Thol.}, 1868, 1871), Schiller, \textit{I.c.} pp. 536 sqq.). The book claims that Moses, in his hundred and twentieth year, and the twenty-five hundredth of the creation, handed it, together with the Pentateuch, to Joshua, and in it prophesied the course of Israel's history, to the establishment of the messianic kingdom. The conclusion of the book is wanting. The book clearly speaks of John Hycrurus, Herod in the thirty-fourth year of his reign, the invasion of Varus (c. 7), and was evidently written soon after this last event (4 A.D.). In the parts preserved, no mention is made of a Messiah; though the author is a member of the party of the Zealots, an enemy of the Asmoneans, Herodians, Sadducees, and even of the Pharisees (c. 7). Although originally a Hebrew work, the Latin has been translated from a Greek version.}

\textit{The Fourth Book of Ezra, according to the method of numbering the Ezra books in the Latin Church, originally \textit{Ezegiopergmon}} (\textit{HILGEMEYER: \textit{Mes. Jud., pp. xviii. sqq.}})
Library, was published in an English translation of S. Ockley, by W. Whiston (Primitiva Christianity, London, 1701, t. 4), and in Arabic by Ewald (Abk. d. G. G., 1865), and in Syriac by Ceriani (Monum. Sacr., v. i., pp. 9 sq.), only that the latter substitutes Baruch for Jeremiah. It, too, treats of the captivity, and shows strong Christian influence.

10. A *Hiasa proftetis is mentioned in Psalm Athanasii and in Nicephorus, and a Elise revelatio et visio, in the catalogue of Apocrypha of Cotelter (Patres Apostol., 1. p. 197) and Montfaucon (Bibl. Cuiuin. p. 194).

11. Ascensio et Visio Isaias. The existence of an *Isaiaprotos and *Isaiaphoros (or *Oracola) Isaias was known for a long time. (Cf. Fabr. 3, i. pp. 1086 sqq.). In 1819 Laurence published an Ethiopic text (Ascensio Isaias vatis) with poor Latin and English translations. Dillmann published a splendid text in his Ascensio Isaias, Ethiopice et Latine, cum proleg. et annot. (Lips., 1877) [from which Schodde made an English translation in the October number of the Lutheran Quarterly, Gettysburg, Penn., July, 1878], with the title in both Greek and Ethiopic, as parakalountes *Isaias tou proftetos, only that the latter substitutes Baruch for Jeremiah. It, too, treats of the captivity, and shows strong Christian influence.

12. An Apocalypse, or Prophecy of Zephaniah, in imitation of the Ascensio Isaias, is not only mentioned in the four catalogues of Apocrypha, but a fragment is also quoted by Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. 5, 11, § 78.

13. An Apocryphon of Jeremiah, in Hebrew, used by the Nazarenes, is mentioned by Jerome (Fabr. 4, i. 1102 sqq.) as the source of the quotation in Matt. xxvii. 9; but this is improbable.

Concerning the Apocalypses of (14) Habakkuk, (15) Ezekiel, (16) Daniel, and (17) Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist, we have no further information.

18. An Apocalypse of Moses, distinct from the Book of Jubilees (cf. No. 31) and the Assumptio Mosis, we know only from Syncellus, Photius amphil., and others (Fabr. 3, i. 638), who mention it as the *Scriptura Dei. (Fabr. *2, i. 335).

19. A Lamech Book is mentioned in the Catalogues of Cotelter and Montfaucon; and—

21. A *Dowith tou Protoplaston, according to Fabr. 4, ii. 83, contained the mention that Adam was taken into Paradise when forty days old. It is probably a portion of the Vita Adami (No. 35).

22. *Dowith tou othres Patarrvaron (Testamenta XII., Patriarcharum), mentioned first by Tertullian and Origen. [The original Greek text has often been issued; cf. in the Presbyterian Review, January, 1880.] The book is a Jewish-Christian work, in the garb of addresses made by the twelve sons of Jacob at their death, of a practical and ethical character, in the spirit of the Epistle of James. The work was probably written about the close of the first Christian century.

23. An Apocryphon, tou theou Patarrvaron, is mentioned in the Const. Apost., vi. 16; and (24) an Apocryphal Testament of Jacob, in the Decretum Gelasii (Fabr., i. 437, 799).
25. A προσεκτή 'ιωσήφ is both frequently mentioned, and is also counted among those read (παρ' Ἑρώτιον) by Origen and others. (Cf. Fabr., i. 765, 768.) It seems to have been strongly sub-

26. A Δωτῆς Μωσίας is found in the four catal-

28. The Testament of Adam and Noah are por-

29. In the acts of the Nicene synod (Fabr., i. 845) mention is made of a βιβλίον λόγων ματωνο-

30. Liber Eldad et Medad is mentioned in Pas-

31. The Book of the Jubilees, or the Little Gene-

32. Jannes and Mambres treat of the contest

33. Manasseh's conversion (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11) early gave rise to an Apocryphon of M., used both by Christian writers and by the Targum to Chron. (Fab., i. 116, Egypt sqq.). It receives its name from its chronology, which is divided according to jubilee years. The author is strictly Jewish and narrow. He makes use of Enoch, does not yet know of the destruction of Jerusalem, and is used by the Test. xii. Patr. The book is thus a production of the first century, and probably early in it. The original language was Hebrew or Aramaic.

34. A novel, based on Gen. xii. 45, we have in Ase-

35. Books pretending to give the life and deeds

The most important one is the Vita Adami, translated from the Ethiopic by Dillmann, in Ewald's Jahrbuch, v. 1853, and, with the assistance of the Arabic, by Trumpp, in Akad. der Wiss., Münchon, 1880; and English, by Malan: The Book of Adam and Eve, London, 1882. There is also a Latin Vita Ada et Eva, edited by W. Meyer, Münchon, 1879.

36. A Gnostic writing called Noria, after the wife of Noah, is mentioned by Epiphanius (Har., 26 and 87), and an Ethiopic text, 'βων (Gen. xxviii.), by the same (Fabr., i. 437). On the Jewish Midrashim cf. Zunz: Gottesd. Vort. der Juden, pp. 126 sqq., and Jellinek: Bet-

PSEUDO-ISISORIAN DECRETALS is the common designation of a large collection of spurius letters ascribed to the popes of the first three centuries, which was brought into circulation in the ninth century, generally in connection with other so-called Spanish collection of canons and decretals, though sometimes also alone. It opens with a preface, also spurious, by Isidorus Mercator; and thence it came to pass, that, already in the ninth century, it was considered to be the work of Isidore of Seville. Down to the fifteenth century no doubt, ever arose as to its genu-

A. Dillmann.

PSEUDO-ISISORIAN DECRETALS is the common designation of a large collection of spurious letters ascribed to the popes of the first three centuries, which was brought into circulation in the ninth century, generally in connection with other so-called Spanish collection of canons and decretals, though sometimes also alone. It opens with a preface, also spurious, by Isidorus Mercator; and thence it came to pass, that, already in the ninth century, it was considered to be the work of Isidore of Seville. Down to the fifteenth century no doubt, ever arose as to its genu-

The arrangement of the contents of the complete collection is as follows: first the preface; then a letter from Aurelius to Damasus, and the answer of the latter, both spurious; then Ordo de celebrando concilio, borrowed from the fourth Council of Toledo; a list of councils; two spurious letters from Jerome to Damasus and from Damasus to Jerome, after which the collection proper begins. It consists of three parts: the first part contains the fifty apostolical canons, fifty-nine spurious letters chronologically arranged, and the answer of the latter, both spurious; the Ordo de celebrando concilio, borrowed from the fourth Council of Toledo; a list of councils; two spurious letters from Jerome to Damasus and from Damasus to Jerome, after which the collection proper begins. It consists of three parts: the first part contains the fifty apostolical canons, fifty-nine spurious letters chronologically arranged, and and then gives the papal decretals from Sylvester to Gregory II. (d. 731), of which thirty-five are spurious. It must be noticed, however, that many of these spurious documents were well known to the church long before Pseudo-Isidore incorporated them with his collection; as, for instance, the first two letters from Clement to James, the Donatio Constantini, the Canones Apostolorum, etc. According to recent researches, it would seem, in fact, that they were not made at one time; that a shorter collection, consisting of false decretals down to Damasus, and the correspondence between Aurelius and Damasus, was made first; and that on this basis the larger collection was finally formed. See WASSERSCHELDE: Die pseudo-isidorische Frage, in Zeitschrift für Kirchenrecht, iv. p. 273.

Formerly it was quite generally accepted that the real purpose of the Pseudo-Isidorian fabrication was the extension of the primacy of Rome. See THEINER: De Pseudoisid. canonum collectione, Breslau, 1826. At present a number of scholars hold that it was the general insecurity of society, and more especially the confusion prevalent in all Church matters, that made Isidore seek to make this attempt at forming and establishing a general code of church discipline. See MÖLLER: Schriften, edited by Dällinger, vol. i. p. 283.

A more searching study, however, of the work itself, shows that its true purpose must have been to free the bishops from their dependence, not on the State, but on the metropolitan and the authority of papal decrees and the correspondence between Aurelius and Damasus, while he tried to exclude all secular courts as incompetent in episcopal cases. Alexander (Ep. 1, c. 5-8), Marcellinus (Ep. 2, c. 3), and Felix II. (c. 12) forbid to summon a bishop before any judicium publicum. According to Marcellinus (Ep. 2, c. 10), the chief of the state cannot convok a synod, or sit in judgment on a bishop, without the consent of the Pope. No bishop shall appear before a secular judge, says Hyginus (Ep. 1, c. 4), because it would be below his dignity; and what is still more characteristic, and repeated in almost every letter, even in the ecclesiastical courts no layman shall appear either as accuser or as witness, but in all such cases are exempted from the jurisdiction of the secular courts, all secular cases may be taken to in episcopal court, say Anacletus (Ep. 1, c. 16) and Marcellinus (Ep. 2, c. 3). The second aim of Pseudo-Isidore was to emancipate the episcopate from the authority of the metropolitans and the provincial synods. He accepts the existing hierarchical organization, and he adds even a new link to the chain; but he tries to weaken the power of the metropolitans and the provincial synods, so as to make them completely innocuous, even to a criminal bishop. The purpose was before which a bishop could be cited was the provincial synod, convened and presided over by the metropolitan; but, in order to be competent, the synod must be legitime convened, that is, auctoritate sedis apostolicae. The decisions of a synod convened without the consent of the Pope were null and void. As it was evident, therefore, that even enough to establish a competent court, and still more so to procure a competent accuser; for not only were all laymen and members of the lower clergy excluded, but also a member of the higher clergy, if in any way he seemed to be inimicus, offensus, iratus, suspectus, etc. Furthermore: the accuser should be accompanied by seventy-two witnesses, each of whom should be qualified to be an accuser himself: and, finally, the bishop had the right to break off the proceedings at any stage of their development, and appeal directly to the Pope; that is, it was next to impossible to have a criminal bishop punished, unless the Pope himself consented and interfered.

The principal sources from which Pseudo-Isidore drew his materials were the works of Cassiodorus and Rufinus, the Liber pontificalis and the Vulgate, the writings of the Fathers, and the theological literature generally down to the ninth century, the correspondence of Archbishop Boniface of Mayence, the genuine decrets and canons, the various collections of laws, such as the viarium Alaricianum, the Lex Visigothorum, the Frankish capitulaires, etc. These materials seem to indicate that the collection was made in Gaul, and the indication is strongly corroborated by the circumstance that the language swarms with Gallicisms; the style, with phrases and expressions from the juridical terminology of the Frankish Empire; and the contents, with references to the actual state of the Frankish Church at that time. At all events, those who have fixed the birthplace of the collection at Rome — Febrionius, Theiner, Eichhorn, and others — have not succeeded in adding equally strong reasons for their supposition. The frequent use made of the correspondence of Boniface shows that the sources of Mayence were at the disposal of the compiler; and Mayence was, down to very recent times, generally considered as the place of fabrication. This seems true, however, only so far as regards the older and minor collection; while the later and larger seems to have been made at Rheims. Only of the former are the oldest manuscripts (those of St. Gall and Cologne) of German origin; while of the latter, not only the oldest, but also by far the most numerous, manuscripts are French. In Germany the collection did not come into general use until the eleventh century. With respect to the time of the authorship, the period within which it must have taken place is determined by two facts that Pseudo-Isidore used the canons of the Council of Paris (829), while his own collection was used by the synod of Chiersy (557). Since the researches of the Ballerinis and Blondel (Pseudo-Isidori et Turrianus capitulac, Geneva, 1728), it has also been generally accepted that the collection was made in the fourth or fifth decade of the ninth century. But attempts have been made to arrive at a closer determination of the conflicts arising out of the civil wars between Lewis the Pious and his sons; and it is more probable that the decretals were manufactured in the party of Lothair—more especially by Antgar of Mayence, and Ebbo of Rheims—in order to prevent the metropolitans and the provincial synods of the party of Lewis from inflicting any punishment on the bishops of the defeated party. Antgar was an outspoken adherent of Lothair, and Ebbo was his intimate friend. Now many tracks lead from the falsedecretals to the ecclesiastical period. There is, indeed, a direct connection between the falsedecretals and the ecclesiastical conflicts of that time. Antgar to have this authority restored to his see. The decretals also contain reference to the deposition of Hincmar of Rheims (844). Now, since Ebbo on those occasions made no appeal to the decretals, it is fair to infer that they did not yet exist; but there is a trace of them at the synod of Soissons (857), in the so-called narratio, by the clergy ordained by him.

The history of the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals presents the curious phenomenon, that, instead of achieving the purpose for which they were originally made, they finally came to serve the almost opposite interest. They were intended to protect the bishops against the metropolitans; but they became the means by which the Pope crushed, not only the metropolitans, but also the bishops. The Frankish clergy saw the danger, and made from time to time considerable opposition. The first pope who directly appealed to them was Adrian as the proper authority, without making any reference to them; but shortly after he must have become acquainted with them, probably through Rodthad; for, in the controversy between the latter and Hincmar, he makes copious use of them. Hincmar protested; but, from many of his utterances, it is apparent that he considered them spurious, though he did not hesitate to use them himself when they answered his purpose. See Weizsäcker: Hincmar und Pseudo-isidor, in Zeitschrift f. hist. Theologie, 1858, p. 327. Indeed, it was the demoralization of the bishops, their religious indifferentism, and their political ambition, which was the fatal cause of the Pseudo-Isidorian fraud triumph, and delivered up the church, without power of resistance or self-defence, into the hands of the Pope. From the end of the ninth century numerous extracts were made from the falsedecretals, the most remarkable of which was the so-called Capitula Remediis Curantissis. Nothing, however, contributed more to spread them about, than their incorporation with the great systematical collections of canons made at that time; as, for instance, with the Collectio Anselmo dedicata, the decree of Bur- shard, the two works of Ivo, the collection of An- selm of Lucca, the Collectio trium partium, etc.; and, as those collections were the sources from which Gratian drew his materials, the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals thus became part and parcel of the Corpus juris canonici.

Down to the fifteenth century the genuineness of the decretals was, as above mentioned, never openly assailed. The first who professed some doubts were Nicholas of Cusa (De concordia cathol., iii. 2) and Johannes Turrecarnata (Summa eccles., ii. 101). But, when the work became more easily accessible by the Merlin edition, it proved an easy task for the authors of the Madgeburg Centuries, and the French critics, Dumoulin and Le Conte, to lay bare the fraud. An attempt at defence by the Jesuit (Torres: Adv. Magd. centuratores, Florence, 1572) was completely refuted by Blondel; and later attempts—Bona- ventura Malavasia (Nuntius veritatis, Rome, 1635) and Eduard Dumond (Les fausses décrétales), in Revue des questions historiques, i. and ii.—have failed as signally. WASSERSCHLEBEN.

PTOLEMÆUS, PTOLEMY (Πτολεμής, the "warlike"), the dynastic name of the thirteen Macedonian kings of Egypt who held the throne from the death of Alexander the Great down to B.C. 43. Those who have religious interest, because of their mention in Josephus, the Macca- bees (1 and 2), and prophetically in the Book of Daniel, are (1) Ptolemy I., Soter ("savior"), B.C. 323-285; the founder of the dynasty. He was one of Alexander's generals, and seized Egypt as his portion of Alexander's domain. In 289 he invaded Syria, and availed himself of Jewish custo- mers to occupy Jerusalem on the sabbath, when he knew the Jews would not fight. The Jews and Samaritans taken captive in this campaign he placed in Alexandria, but treated them liber- ally. He is supposed to be alluded to in Dan. xi. 5, "the king of the south."—(2) Ptolemy II., Philadelphus ("brother-loving"), B.C. 285-247; son of the preceding; alluded to in Dan. xi. 8; illustrious as the founder of the Alexandrian lib- rary and museum, the patron of arts and letters, the instigator to the Septuagint (see Bible Ver- sions, p. 279), and the prince under whom the Alexandrian Jews developed into citizens of the world, since Jewish wisdom met in Alexandria Greek philosophy. His reign marks an epoch in Jewish history. (3) Ptolemy III., Euergetes ("well-doer"), B.C. 247-222; alluded to in Dan. xi. 7-9; invaded Syria in 246, to avenge the repu- diation and murder of his sister Berenice (see An- trochus II., p. 85), and had conquered it as far north as Antioch, and was moving eastward towards Babylon, when he was recalled by troubles at home. His policy towards the Jews in Egypt was generous; and when at the height of his victories, he sacrificed in the temple at Jerusalem "after the custom of the law" (Joseph. : C. Ap., ii. 6). He brought back to Memphis the gods taken from Egypt by Cambyses. It was for this he received his epithet, "well-doer."—(4) Ptolemy IV., Philo- pator ("father-loving"), B.C. 222-205; alluded to in Dan. xi. 10-12; defeated Antiochus the Great at Raphia, near Gaza (B.C. 217); sacrificed in the temple, and attempted to enter the sacred precincts, when a shock of paralysis stopped him. He was indolent, effeminate, and licentious, but capable, on occasion, of splendid and vigorous Deeds. — (5) Ptolemy V., Epiphanes ("illustrious"); B.C. 205-181; alluded to in Dan. xi. 13-17; succeeded his father when only five years old. During his minority Antiochus the Great conquered Cæsarea, Phœnicia, and Judea, out of which the Jews who were loyal fled to Egypt. The Romans compelled him to surrender these provinces. Antiochus apparently did this when he married his daughter Cleopatra to Ptolemy (B.C. 183), although they really remained under his authority. He was, however, foiled in his designs by Cleopatra's unexpected advocacy of her husband's interests. Ptolemy was poisoned as he was on the eve of an attempt to recover the provinces from Seleucus, Antiochus' successor. — (6) Ptolemy VI., Philometor ("mother-loving"); B.C. 181-146; alluded to in Dan. xi. 25-30. So long as his mother lived (i.e., until 173), peace was preserved with Syria; but three years later Egypt had been overrun by Antiochus, and Ptolemy taken prisoner. The Romans again interfered, and compelled Antiochus to leave the country (168). Ptolemy then turned his attention to his brother, Euergetes II., whose seditionist attempts he suppressed, and to Syrian intrigues, by which he accomplished the ruin of Alexander Balas (see art.). It was under Ptolemy that the Jewish temple at Leontopolis was built. He marks the transition of the kingdom of Egypt into a Roman province. Cf. art. Ptolemeus, in Smith's Dictionary of Biography and Dictionary of the Bible.

GENEALOGICAL TABLE OF THE PTOLEMIES.

- Ptolemy I., Soter I., B. C. 367 - 282.
- Ptolemy II., Philadelphus = Arsinoe.
- Ptolemy III., Euergetes I.
- Ptolemy IV., Philopator = Arsinoe.
- Ptolemy V., Epiphanes = Cleopatra (d. of Antiochus M.).
- Ptolemy VI., Philometor = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy VII., Euergetes II. = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy VIII., Berenice = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy IX., Alexander Balas = Demetrius II.
- Ptolemy X., Euergetes III. = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XI., Euergetes IV. = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XII., Philometor = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XIII., Alexander Balas = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XIV., Euergetes V. = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XV., Philometor = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XVI., Berenice = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XVII., Euergetes VI. = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XVIII., Alexander Balas = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XIX., Euergetes VII. = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XX., Berenice = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XXI., Euergetes VIII. = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XXII., Alexander Balas = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XXIII., Euergetes IX. = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XXIV., Berenice = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XXV., Euergetes X. = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XXVI., Alexander Balas = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XXVII., Euergetes XI. = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XXVIII., Berenice = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XXIX., Euergetes XII. = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XXX., Alexander Balas = Cleopatra.
- Ptolemy XXXI., Euergetes XIII. = Cleopatra.

PUBLICIAN,

an under collector of the Roman tribute (Matt. xviii. 17). It was an office which no patriotic Jew could hold, because it implied in the most offensive way the recognition of Roman supremacy. Publicians, being thus despised, generally avenged their insults by extortionate demands under color of law. It is remarkable, that, out of this despicable class, our Lord chose one of his apostles (Levi, or Matthew), who became his biographer (Luke v. 27), and one of his chief converts, Zacchæus of Jericho (Luke xix. 2). Our Lord's association with publicans was one of the commonest taunts he received (Luke vii. 34). The system of farming the revenue then practised led directly and naturally to fraud and cruelty, from the chief farmer to the meanest placeman.

PUBLICANI

(a corruption of Pauliciani) was the name given by the French and English crusaders of the middle of the twelfth century to the Cathari of the West, because, like the Paulicians of the East, they were dualists. Several French writers of that time call the Paulicians simply Poplicani.

PUFENDORF, Samuel, b. at Chemnitz in Saxony, 1632; d. at Berlin, 1694; lectured on jurisprudence at Heidelberg and Lund in Sweden, and finally settled at Berlin, as historiographer to the elector of Brandenburg. His principal work is De Jure naturae et gentium (Lund, 1672; also Frankfort, 1684; Amstel, 1695), translated into German, English, and French. Though essentially only an elaboration and systematization of the ideas of Grotius, it forms the foundation of the modern conception of the doctrine of natural and international rights. Previously that doctrine had been based on the Decalogue, and developed in accordance with the idea of the justice of God. Grotius was the first who completely severed it from theology, based it on the instinct of sociability inherent in human nature, and derived it directly from human reason. In the systematic exposition which it received from Pufendorf, it attracted great attention, but also met with great opposition: indeed, Buddeus and Wolff were the first who fully recognized it. Among Pufendorf's other works, his De habita religiosis christianae ad eam citem (Bremen, 1857) has also theological interest as a defence of the collegial system. After his death appeared his Jus facie lit divinum, a demonstration of the impossibility of bringing about a union between the Lutheran and Reformed creed, as long as the latter retains the doctrine of predestination.

PULLICH, a daughter of Arcadius, and older sister of Theodosius II.; was in 414, though only sixteen years old, intrusted by the Senate with the title of Augusta and the guardianship of her weak-minded brother. For ten years she governed the empire with great authority, though in a narrow, monastic spirit: she actually transformed the palace into a monastery. She then married her brother to Eudoxia-Athenaeis, a daughter of an Athenian philosopher; but bitter jealousy soon arose between the two and led in part to the Nestorian controversy. Eudoxia sided with Nestorius, while Pulcheria took the part of Cyril of Alexandria. Pulcheria was banished from the court; and, by the support of Eudoxia, Euytches and Dioscuros triumphed at the synod of Ephesus. Pulcheria, however, returned before her brother's death, and regained her influence. Eudoxia was banished to Jerusalem; and orthodoxy was restored by the Council of Chalcedon, at whose sixth session (Oct. 25, 451) Pulcheria herself was present. After her return she married the general Marcianus, but died shortly after, Sept. 11, 453. She is revered by the Greek Church as a saint. See Act. Sanc., Sept. 3, and Gregorius : Athenaeis, Leipzig, 1881.

PULLEYN, Robert, an English scholastic and Roman cardinal; b. in England towards the close of the eleventh century, but the exact date and place are unknown; d. in Rome between 1147 and 1154. He studied in Paris, where the dialectical treatment of theology just at that time stood in its first bloom (William of Champeaux, Abelard, Gilbert de la Porée). In 1130 he returned to England, was made archdeacon of Rech-
PULPIT. 1970  PUNISHMENT.

easter, and opened a theological school in Oxford, which he soon brought to a very flourishing condition. But in 1135 he again left his native country, probably on account of the internal disturbances which broke out after the death of Henry I. He settled in Paris, and taught theology with great success. Bernard of Clairvaux, regarding him as the champion of his orthodoxy, John of Salisbury and William of St. Thierry were among his pupils. An attempt of his bishop to compel him to return to England, by withholding the revenues of his benefice, brought him to Rome, where he was received with great honor, made a cardinal, and chancellor of the apostolic see. Many of his writings are still unprinted,—a Commentary on the Revelation, a Commentary on the Psalms, a treatise De contentu mundi, etc.; but his principal work, Sententiarum Libri VIII., was edited by Hugo Mathoud of St. Maur, Paris, 1555, and reprinted in Migne, Patrol. Lat., vol. 186. It combines the dialectics of Abelard with the dogmatism of Bernard. It originated under the influence of Abelard's Sic et non, and it became more and more prevailing in cases in which occurring contradictions cannot be determined solely for the purpose of demonstrating and proving the traditional faith of the church; and, in cases in which occurring contradictions cannot be logically solved, all doubt is crushed by the authority of the Bible and the Fathers. See HAU-REAU: Histoire de la philosophie scolastique, Paris, 1872, vol. 1.

PULPIT (from the Latin pulpitum), the foremost point of the Roman stage, where the actors stood while reciting their part, denotes, in the Christian Church, an enclosed desk from which the sermon is delivered. In the oldest times the daemon preached from the ambo, and the bishop from his throne. Later on, however, movable pulpits, of which a specimen has been preserved at Hereford in England, were employed in the large churches, and placed, when used, where most convenient. The stationary pulpit of a still later date was generally placed between two pillars, in front of a screen, or fastened to a pillar, generally in the middle of the nave. Pulpits were also erected in the refectories of monasteries, in cemeteries (as was often the case in France), or even in a public thoroughfare. They were of stone or of wood, hexagonal or octagonal, often very large, and always highly ornamented. Pulpits of the greatest artistic interest, from the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, have been preserved both in England and on the European continent: among the most noticeable are those of Pisa, Milan, Strassburg, Canterbury, etc. In the Protestant churches the pulpit has generally a more conspicuous place than in the Roman-Catholic; and in this modern American meeting-house it seems, so to speak, the centre of the whole building.

PULPIT—ELOQUENCE. See Homiletics.

PUNISHMENT AMONG THE HEBREWS. The penal code, which tended towards a restoration of the order of law which had been disturbed, to uphold the authority of the law, and protect it against future infringements (Deut. xvii. 13, xix. 20), thus destroying the evil from the midst of the land and of the people of Israel, was among Hebrews, as well as among other nations, origin-ally and naturally based on the principle of retaliation. This is clearly expressed on several occasions, as Exod. xxi. 28 sq., Lev. xxiv. 19 sq., Deut. xix. 21. But this principle is restricted in Israel by the law: a legally regulated and mitigated righteous compensation takes its place. The vengeance beloved by God (Deut. xxiii. 25; comp. Rom. xi. 19). Although, consequently, the legal basis, the yet the law of retaliation was more a principle than a strict law; and in fact we find not one instance in the Bible which would prove the literal application of the jus talionis, for which Christ substituted the very opposite, the evangelical rule (Matt. v. 38 sq.).

The most common punishment was that with the stick, which was applied not only to children and slaves (Prov. xxxi. 24, xxxii. 13 sq., xxix. 15), but also to the offender, lying on the ground, in the presence of a judge (Lev. xix. 20; Deut. xxi. 18). In later times stripes were inflicted, whose number was not to exceed forty (Deut. xxv. 3): whence the Jews took care not to exceed thirty-nine (2 Cor. xi. 24; Josephus, Ant., iv. 8, 21). In the synagogue this punishment was inflicted at the appointment of the Sanhedrin (Matt. xii. 22, xxxii. 34; Acts v. 40, xxii. 19) for ecclesiastical offences.

Capital punishments were of two kinds,—stoning, and death by the sword. Stoning was applied for idolatry in any shape, be it actual or virtual (Lev. xx. 2; Deut. xvi. 6, 10, xvii. 2-7), blasphemy (Lev. xxiv. 14, 10, 23; 1 Kings xx. 10 sq.), witchcraft, etc. (Lev. xxvii), sabbath-breaking (Num. xxv. 32-36; Exod. xxxi. 14), taking away of sacred things (Josh. vii. 7, 20; Deut. xxi. 28, 29), adultery (Lev. xx. 10; John viii. 5), and rape (Lev. xxii. 25); even the offending animal was to be stoned (Exod. xxi. 29). Stoning, not unknown among the Egyptians, took place outside of the camp or city (Lev. xxiv. 14; Num. xv. 30), in the presence of the witnesses who had witnessed against him, and who were required to cast the first stone (Deut. xii. 9, xvi. 7; Josh. vii. 7; Acts vii. 58). Death by the sword was applied rather for political and civil crimes as murder and manslaughter (Exod. xxi. 14; Lev. xxiv. 17, 21; Num. xxxv. 16, 18, 21, 31; Deut. xix. 11); also for death caused by a goring ox, in which case a compensation was allowed (Exod. xxi. 28), disobedience to the magistrate (Deut. xvii. 12; Josh. i. 18), and man-mutilation (Exod. xxi. 19; Deut. xxxiv. 7). In all these cases the law speaks of capital punishment, but without exactly stating which: the same is the case with willful sins in general (Num. xv. 30 sq.), and with many cases touching the ritual. The Talmud applies in general the punishment of strangling, but stoning for such crimes as smiting and cursing of parents (Exod. xxi. 15, 17; Lev. xix. 9), incestuous and unnatural connections. Death by the sword is not seldom mentioned in the historical books (2 Sam. i. 15; 1 Kings ii. 25-28; 2 Kings x. 6; 2 Chron. xx. 4; Jer. xxxvi. 23). The execution was performed by persons appointed by the king.
PUNISHMENT.

1971

PUNISHMENT.

1. History. — So widespread has been the belief in a future state of retribution that Warburton founded his great apologetic, The Divine Legation of Moses, on the absence of any appeal in the Mosaic legislation to the sanctions of reward and punishment. The absence of such appeals has been taken by some to imply ignorance, on the part of the Jews, of a future state. This is a great mistake, for the doctrine of future retribution is unmistakably present in the Old Testament. Before Christ and in the time of the Maccabees, belief in eternal punishment was entertained. At the time of our Lord, belief in everlasting punishment was held (perhaps not universally) by the Pharisees, as we know from Josephus. Philo, however, of the same period, is cited as an annihilationist. The Fathers of the first six centuries believed, for the most part, in the eternity of hell-torment. The early Fathers universally held this belief; though Justin Martyr and Irenaeus have been claimed, but on insufficient grounds, as annihilationists. Clement and Origen were restorationists. So were Gregory of Nyssa and Gregory Nazianzen, together with Theodore of Mopsuestia. Augustine defended the generally received doctrine of endless punishment. This Father held, however, that Christ was not at first taught an immortality. The scholastics held that all heretics, infidels, and those who die in mortal sin, go immediately to hell; that those who die in the peace of the church, but imperfectly, experience the purifying pains of purgatory; and, finally, that the souls of all unbaptized infants go to the limbus patrum, which was the abode of the Old-Testament saints.

Protestants and Roman Catholics agree respecting the doctrine of hell. The points of difference between the two systems is concerned, grow out of an attempt to answer the question, What is the condition of the redeemed during the period between death and the resurrection? Some taught that the soul was unconscious; some, the doctrine still held by many, which is known as that of the intermediate state. Roman Catholics believed in purgatory. The Reformers denied the doctrine of purgatory, and affirmed that all men at death go either to heaven or hell. They differed respecting the salvation of infants. The Augsburg Confession makes baptism essential to salvation. This Calvinists denied. They held to the guilt of original sin, to the ill-desert of infants, to the doctrine that the area of the saved is defined by that of sovereign election, and that regeneration is not conditioned by ordinances. Elect infants dying in infancy were saved, whether they were baptized or not. Calvinistic theologians did not say that there were no non-elect infants who died in infancy: indeed, they commonly believed that there were. Whether this common belief shall govern the construction of the Westminster Confession, or whether the cautious words in which the subject of elect infants is expressed shall lead us to believe that the Assembly declined to say dogmatically that there were non-elect infants, is a question that cannot be discussed here. See Infant Salvation.

Those who now subscribe to the Westminster Confession of Faith do not believe that any infants dying in infancy are lost. Some dislike the phraseology employed regarding the subject; while others see in it no necessary implications regarding non-elect infants. The Confession says that the saved are the elect. It tells how the elect are saved. The elect who are capable of being outwardly called are required to repent, and exercise faith. Elect infants dying in infancy, and other elect persons incapable of being outwardly called, are regenerated by the sovereign exercise of the power of the Holy Ghost, who worketh when and where he pleaseth. The antithesis is not between elect and non-elect infants, but between elect persons who can, and who can not, exercise faith. Infants dying in infancy fall into the latter category. That all such infants were elect, the writers of the Confession did not know, whatever they might hope and believe; but neither did they say that some such infants were non-elect.
PUNISHMENT.

It is not strange that a doctrine which puts such a strain upon our sympathies as that of everlasting punishment should meet with opposition. In modern, as in ancient times, therefore, we find representatives men who are inflamed by the rational argument for eternal retribution. Locke taught the doctrine of conditional immortality, which has been favored by Watts, Whately, and Isaac Taylor. Roth first held this view, though restorationism is more in favor with the German theologians who diverge from confessional orthodoxy. Nitzsch and Müller show their strong leanings toward restorationism by affirming the possibility of eternal damnation as the result of persistent obduracy in the future state. Tillotson hoped for an ultimate restoration of all men, and John Foster confidently believed in it. Organized opposition to the doctrine of eternal punishment, at the beginning of this century, consisted, for the most part (in this country), of a denial of all post mortem punishment for sin. This extreme type of Universalism (that of Baillie), however, has few representatives at the present day. It has received to the merciless criticism to which it was subjected. But it is to be feared that belief in restorationism and annihilationism is increasing within orthodox communions. This is evident in the increase of the literature advocating one or the other view, and in the fact that either view is being freely tolerated in some denominations. That subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles does not bind Anglicans to hold the doctrine of eternal punishment was decided by the Privy Council (1863-64), in the case of Fendall vs. Wilson.

A less serious departure from the Protestant position regarding retribution is found in the disposition of some leading divines, like Dörner and Martensen, to hold that the period between death and the resurrection may be a probationary period, that belief in restorationism and annihilationism is increasing within orthodox communions. This is evident in the increase of the literature advocating one or the other view, and in the fact that either view is being freely tolerated in some denominations. That subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles does not bind Anglicans to hold the doctrine of eternal punishment was decided by the Privy Council (1863-64), in the case of Fendall vs. Wilson.

II. CHURCH DOCTRINE. — There is a general agreement among the confessions of Christendom, that after the judgment all men go either to heaven or hell, and that the punishments of hell are endless. Confessional differences concern the condition of the dead during the period between death and the resurrection. Roman Catholics teach that the atonement of Christ only delivers men from eternal punishment, and that temporal punishments, especially the pains of purgatory in the next world, remain to be endured as satisfaction for sin. Protestants reject the doctrine of purgatory, because it is not taught in Scripture. It is true that nothing that defileth can enter heaven; it is also true that men are not perfectly sanctified in this life. But this, though it is the ground of the inference, does not justify the inference, that there must be a period of purgation in the next life. The doctrine of purgatory is rejected also, because it rests upon the false assumption that Christ has not made a complete satisfaction for sin. It contradicts, moreover, the distinct statement of Scripture, that there is now no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus.

Some Protestants teach what is known as the doctrine of the intermediate state. This is a harmless doctrine, however, and consists mainly in the emphasis given to what all Christians believe; namely, that the state of the blessed dead, though one of complete happiness during the period after death, prior to the resurrection, is yet inferior to that upon which they are to enter after the resurrection. The advocates of this view will not say that the righteous go to heaven when they die: they go to paradise. The Westminster divines rejected purgatory, and refused to assign a locality and a name to the intermediate state. The Protestant doctrine is, (1) that there is no probation after death; (2) that no personal satisfaction for sins is demanded, either in this life or the next, from those who believe in Christ; (3) that the punishment of hell is everlasting.

The punishments of hell are set forth in Scripture under the strong imagery of fire and brimstone. It is not necessary to interpret these passages literally, yet care must be taken not to empty them of their terrible meaning. Whatever the nature of hell-torment may be, it is something so terrible that only the strong language of the Scripture can express it. The punishments of hell must not be regarded as merely the natural consequences of wrong-doing; though these are serious enough, and they constitute a strong argument in support of the doctrine of eternal punishment. We see the natural segregations of men in this world according to character, the hardening effect of sin, and the suffering that always associates itself with persistent wrong-doing. It is therefore fair to suppose that the sinner's separation from God and the suffering consequent therefrom will be eternal.

These considerations, together with the view of some, that sin is an infinite evil and demands a punishment of infinite duration, and the view of others, that eternal suffering is the result of eternal sinning, constitute what may be called the rational argument for eternal punishment. The great reason for believing the doctrine, however, is the fact that it is taught with such terrible plainness in Scripture.

III. DEPARTURES FROM CHURCH DOCTRINE. — Those who deny the orthodox doctrine as to the eternity of hell-torment agree in the use of the following general arguments:

(1) Eternal punishment is said to be unjust. To this it is answered, that the justice of God can only mean conformity to the nature of God, and this can best be determined by an exegetical study of what the Scriptures teach. Objections on the score of justice must affirm, (a) that men deserve lenient treatment because of their disadvantages, — which would be an argument against any if against eternal punishment; or (b) that sins do not deserve eternal punishment, — which is assuming that we can measure the turpitude of sin.

(2) Eternal punishment is said to conflict with God's infinite goodness. To which we reply: God may be infinitely benevolent, yet discriminating in the exercise of his benevolence; and the area of benevolence must always be limited by the demands of justice.

(3) Eternal punishment is said to conflict with God's design in governing the world. We deny that the end of God's government is the promotion of happiness; but, if it were, we do not know that in such a world the conditions necessary to the promotion of the greatest happiness do not make the eternal misery of some antecedently possible.

(4) Eternal punishment is said to militate against the end of punishment. But this is based on the belief that eternal punishment is intended to be reformatory; whereas every true philosophy of punishment must recognize the deterrent, and especially the vindicatory element, as well as the reformatory element, in the infliction of penal suffering.

(6) And it is finally said that the eternal dualism of good and evil which the orthodox doctrine implies is contrary to the use of the universal terms of Scripture respecting the putting away of evil, the reconciliation of all things in Christ, the subjugation of every thing in heaven and earth, and under the earth, to him. But again, it is urged in reply, that the general must be defined by the specific; that the specific, while these passages might have the meaning put upon them by those who deny the orthodox doctrine, if they stood alone, they cannot bear it when interpreted in the light of the specific statements regarding the fate of the wicked.

The specific arguments against the orthodox doctrine do not agree according to the different forms which the divergence from the symboical statement of the doctrine has assumed.

1. Universalism Proper. — The old form of Universalism in this country (that of Ballou) taught that there is no punishment in the next life. The general principle contended for was, that this life is not one of probation, but of retribution, and that man receives its full punishment in this world. The proof of this was supposed to rest upon the following grounds: (a) the rational character of this view, (b) the absence of all reference to future punishment in the Mosaic code, and (c) the claim that the passages supposed to teach future punishment do not have this meaning. The general rational character of this view (1) to be immoral in its tendency (this has been admitted by leading Universalists; see Brooks's New Departure); (2) to be inconsistent with the infliction of the death-penalty in the Old Testament; and (3) to be contrary to the unmistakable teaching of three classes of passages: to wit, (a) those which speak of a place of punishment, (b) those which mark an antithesis between the present life and the life to come in respect to punishment, and (c) those which associate punishment with the final judgment.

2. Restorationism. — It is affirmed by some that the punishment of the impenitent is limited, and that eventually all will be saved. In addition to the rational arguments already referred to, reliance is also placed upon certain considerations based upon the treatment of texts of Scripture. These considerations may be grouped under the following heads:—

(1) It is said that there are promises teaching of the universal reign of Christ, (d) the apokatastasis, (e) the casting of death and hades "into the lake of fire."

In no one of these passages, however, is there any warrant for the belief that all men, in the sense of "every man," will be saved, or anything to contradict the plain teaching of Matt. xxv.

(2) It is said that the passages relied upon to prove eternal punishment do not teach it. Thus it is said that the word αἰώνιος ("a pruning") points in the direction of ultimate restoration, and that αἰώνιος means "age-long," if it is not better to regard it as having a non-temporal significance, and as indicative of the quality of the punishment, — οὐκονικία punishment. But whatever these words, when put together, mean under the stress of a theory, the plain meaning which they carry upon their face is that which the church has always put upon them. This is what Meyer, not to mention other exegetes, thinks they teach, and what harmonizes with the strong passage in the Apocalypse (xx. 10), καὶ ἁμαρτωλοίς ἄνεγκς (that of Ballou) taught that there is no punishment in the next life. The objection to the doctrine of a second probation rests upon other grounds. But every doctrine of restorationism which teaches that believers must suffer for sin in the next life, before being admitted to heaven, or that any punishment of finite duration will pay the penalty of sin, is reconcilably opposed to the teaching of Scripture regarding the satisfaction of Christ, the exemption of all believers from the condemnation of the law, and the necessity of an atonement.

3. Annihilationism, or, as some prefer to call it, Conditional Immortality. — It is said by yet another class that eternal life is the lot of the elect only, and that eternal punishment means a punishment consisting of, or at least ending in, extinction of being. Some have held that there is no suffering after death, but this view is too glaringly in conflict with Scripture to find many supporters. More plausible is Constable's position, which was substantially that eternal life is the lot of all creted only, and that the sufferings finally wear out the subject: the fire consumes the sinner, and extinction of being is the result. The arguments in support of it are:— Punishment.

1974

Purcell.

I. Rational. It is said (a) that this view accounts for the statement, “narrow is the gate that leadeth unto life,” and that there is no difficulty in believing that only a few are saved, if the wicked are blotted out; (b) that it harmonizes with the theology of God’s providence generally; (c) that it removes the difficulty presented by the idea of the eternal presence of evil in the universe; (d) that it harmonizes with the idea that God’s glory in the salvation of an elect people is the end of his moral government among men, without necessitating the conception of a suffering and surviving race of reprobates.

Attempts to get rid of this are safer that life and death in Scripture stand respectively for existence and non-existence under conscious conditions. But this is not true. Life is used, and so is death, in many cases where the ideas of conscious and unconscious existence are not involved. It is said that the word “destroy” and its cognates imply the idea of terminating existence. It is also said that Paul hoped for the resurrection of the dead, and that this implies that resurrection was a boon that only a limited number would enjoy. To these arguments it is common to oppose the instinctive impulse to believe in immortality, and the indubitable teaching of the New Testament, that the wicked, sharing the fate of the fallen angels, suffer pain, being tormented, τε ροθο καταστασις των αιωνων.

It must be admitted that the most plausible form of opposition to the orthodox doctrine is that presented by Rothé, above referred to. The strength of the position is, that it does least violence to the plain meaning of Scripture in the attempt to get rid of the doctrine of good and evil. But the plain meaning of Scripture, after all, is the old doctrine of the ecclesiastical symbols. It was our Lord himself who said, “This shall go away into everlasting punishment.” These words cannot be explained away by speculation, or deprived of their obvious meaning.

Besides those who deny the doctrine of the symbols in regard to eternal punishment, there are those who prefer to take an agnostic position in regard to the matter. Some would say, with Julius Müller, that while it may be open to the sinner in the next world, as in this, to turn to God by a free act of will, it is nevertheless true that the tendency of sin is to perpetuate itself, and therefore that eternal punishment is possible. Others hold, that, while the fact of future punishment is taught in Scripture, there is room for reasonable doubt as to the duration of the punishment.

Punshon, William Morley, LL.D., Wesleyan: b. at Doncaster, May 29, 1824; d. in London (Brixton Rise), Thursday, April 14, 1881. He was educated in his native town; at fourteen went into the lumber-business at Hull and Sunderland, with his grandfather; but in 1842 became a local preacher, and (1844) entered the Wesleyan College at Richmond, and the next year was stationed at Marden, Kent, and there, although but twenty years old, he won an immediate recognition. His fame rapidly spread, and he was justly accounted one of the most eloquent men in the denomination. On July 30, 1849, he was ordained at Manchester, and preached on several circuits. On April 11, 1868, he left for America, as representative of Conference at Chisago, and attended the Canadian Conference, of which he was five times elected president. He preached and lectured throughout the Dominion and the United States, always attended by large and enthusiastic crowds. In 1873 he returned to England; the next year he was elected president of the Wesleyan Conference, and in February, 1875, was elected secretary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, and continued in its service till death. He was honored in every way. In 1859, as soon as he was eligible, he was made a member of the “Legal Hundred;” in 1873 he was made LL.D. by Victoria University, Coburg, Canada. His eloquence, his enthusiasm, his wisdom, his administrative ability, which was of a high order, were all given to the cause of Christ. He was extraordinarily successful in raising money for benevolent purposes. He published Select Lectures and Sermons, London, 1860, 4th ed., 1877; Life Thoughts (sermons), 1863; Sabbath Chimes (verses), 1867; new ed., 1880; The Prodigal Son, 1875; Sermons and Discourses, 1881; Sermons, 1883; see William Morley Punshon, Preacher and Orator, London, 1881.

Purcell, Henry, musician; b. at Westminister (London), Eng., 1658; d. in London, Nov. 21, 1695. He was successively organist of Westminster Abbey (1670) and of Chapel Royal (1682). His works include: D'Almain: The Doctrine of a Future Life; Fisher: Discussion; Barrows: Purgatory; Ballou: Lecture Sermons; Whittemore: Hist. of Universalism; Edward Beecher: The Doctrine of Spiritual Retribution; Dean: Final Restoration; Moses: Grace and Truth; Fish: Restitution of All Things; Oxenham: Catholic Dogmatics; Clemence: The Doctrine of Sin; Constable: Everlasting Punishment; Bartlett: Hades and the Atmement; Huntington: Conditional Immortality; Rinck: Zustand nach dem Tode; Guder (art. in Herzog and Plitt, Real-Encycl.): Höllenstrafen. Phisan L. F.ATton.

PUNSHON, William Morley, LL.D., Wesleyan: b. at Doncaster, May 29, 1824; d. in London (Brixton Rise), Thursday, April 14, 1881. He was educated in his native town; at fourteen went into the lumber-business at Hull and Sunderland, with his grandfather; but in 1842 became a local preacher, and (1844) entered the Wesleyan College at Richmond, and the next year was stationed at Marden, Kent, and there, although but twenty years old, he won an immediate recognition. His fame rapidly spread, and he was justly accounted one of the most eloquent men in the denomination. On July 30, 1849, he was ordained at Manchester, and preached on several circuits. On April 11, 1868, he left for America, as representative of Conference at Chisago, and attended the Canadian Conference, of which he was five times elected president. He preached and lectured throughout the Dominion and the United States, always attended by large and enthusiastic crowds. In 1873 he returned to England; the next year he was elected president of the Wesleyan Conference, and in February, 1875, was elected secretary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, and continued in its service till death. He was honored in every way. In 1859, as soon as he was eligible, he was made a member of the “Legal Hundred;” in 1873 he was made LL.D. by Victoria University, Coburg, Canada. His eloquence, his enthusiasm, his wisdom, his administrative ability, which was of a high order, were all given to the cause of Christ. He was extraordinarily successful in raising money for benevolent purposes. He published Select Lectures and Sermons, London, 1860, 4th ed., 1877; Life Thoughts (sermons), 1863; Sabbath Chimes (verses), 1867; new ed., 1880; The Prodigal Son, 1875; Sermons and Discourses, 1881; Sermons, 1883; see William Morley Punshon, Preacher and Orator, London, 1881.

Purcell, Henry, musician; b. at Westminister (London), Eng., 1658; d. in London, Nov. 21, 1695. He was successively organist of Westminster Abbey (1670) and of Chapel Royal (1682). His works include: D'Almain: The Doctrine of a Future Life; Fisher: Discussion; Barrows: Purgatory; Ballou: Lecture Sermons; Whittemore: Hist. of Universalism; Edward Beecher: The Doctrine of Spiritual Retribution; Dean: Final Restoration; Moses: Grace and Truth; Fish: Restitution of All Things; Oxenham: Catholic Dogmatics; Clemence: The Doctrine of Sin; Constable: Everlasting Punishment; Bartlett: Hades and the Atmement; Huntington: Conditional Immortality; Rinck: Zustand nach dem Tode; Guder (art. in Herzog and Plitt, Real-Encycl.): Höllenstrafen. Phisan L. F.ATton.
Purcell, John Baptist, D.D., Roman-Catholic prelate; b. at Mallow, County Cork, Ireland, Feb. 26, 1800; d. at St. Martins, Crown County, O., July 4, 1883. He emigrated to America in 1818; studied theology in America and France; in 1826, at Paris, was ordained priest; returned to America and was a professor, and afterwards president, of Mount St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Md. In 1833 he was consecrated bishop, and in 1850 archbishop, of Cincinnati. When he came to his see, there were only 16 Roman-Catholic churches in all Ohio, and many of these were mere sheds. In 1876 there were 460 churches, 100 chapels, 3 theological seminaries, 3 colleges, 6 hospitals, and 22 orphan-asylums. For many years Archbishop Purcell consented to receive the savings of his parishioners, spent them upon ecclesiastical buildings of various kinds, and in 1876 failed for $4,000,000, whereupon he retired permanently to a monastery. He was the author of Lectures and Pastoral Letters, a series of school-books, a Life of X. D. McLeod (New York, 1866), and held public debates (afterwards published) with Alexander Campbell (1838), Thomas Vickers (1868), and others. In the Vatican Council he spoke and voted against the infallibility dogma, though he accepted it. See Gilmour: Funeral Oration on Archbishop J. B. Purcell, New York, 1883.

Purgatory. The doctrine of purgatory, which the Roman-Catholic Church has fully elaborated, strikes its roots in the early Christian centuries. It is connected with the doctrine of an intermediate state, where the imperfect are made fit for paradise by a system of punitive and refining sufferings. This process of refining was not always ascribed to fire. The later rabbins ascribed paradise to a sea of fire, in which the blemishes of souls were washed away. St. Cyril of Jerusalem says, 'Very great will be the benefit to those souls for which prayer is offered at the moment when the holy and tremendous sacrifice is lying in view' (Lect. Myst., x. 39). St. Basil the Great, in his Prayers for Pentecost, says that 'the Lord vouchsafes to receive from us propitiatory prayers and sacrifices for those that are kept in Hades, and allows us the hope of obtaining for them peace, relief, and freedom.'

The Roman-Catholic doctrine of purgatory is stated in the eighth article of the Profession of the Tridentine Faith (see art. Tridentine), and also in the Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent:

"Whereas the Catholic Church, instructed by the Holy Ghost, has, from the ancient tradition of the Fathers, taught in sacred councils, and very recently in this ecumenical Synod, that there is a purgatory, and that the souls there remaining due, or not perfectly freed from the blemish of sin as to the guilt or eternal pain, which they are permitted by the acceptable sacrifice of the Mass, and the sufferings of the saints, to be received from us propitiatory prayers and sacrifices for those that are kept in Hades, and allows us the hope of obtaining for them peace, relief, and freedom."

Gerson (Serm. 2. De Defunctis), and other great men of the middle ages, held that the fires of purgatory were material. The Greek Church, refusing to go as far as the Latin, laid down the doctrine of purgatorial fire as one of the irreconcilable differences between them at the Council of Florence, 1439. The Cathari, Waldenses, and Wiclif opposed the doctrine. The Reformers raised their voices against the whole theory of purgatory. The Council of Trent, on the other hand, pronounced an anathema against those who reject the dogma. Bellarmin elaborated the doctrine in his extensive work on purgatory (De Purgatorio), proves it from the Old Testament (1 Kings xxxvi. 18; 2 Kings i., iii., etc.), the Apocalypse (2 Macc. xii. 40 sq.; Tob. iv. 19), the New Testament (Matt. xii. 32; 1 Cor. iii. 11 sq., etc.), the Fathers, the councils, and reason, and comes to the conclusion that the fire of purgatory is material (ignem purgatorii esse corporeum). — RUD. HOFMANN.
PURIFICATIONS.

1976

PURIFICATIONS.

before their admittance into heaven, where nothing that is defiled can enter. We also believe that such souls so detained in purgatory, being the living members of Christ Jesus, are relieved by the prayers and suffrages of their fellow-members here on earth. But where this place be, of what nature or quality the pains be, how long souls may be there detained, in what manner the suffrages made on their behalf be applied,—whether by way of satisfaction, intercession, etc.,—are questions superfluous, and impertinent matters. And these are discussed in Kunkel: False Catholics, London, 1846, vol. 3, 3d ed., pp. 140-205, where the appropriate passages from the Fathers, Liturgies, etc., are given as length. See Louvet: Le purgatoire d'après les révélations des saints, Paris, 1890.

PURIFICATIONS. I. 1. What defiles, according to the Old Testament? how, whom, how much, and how long, does it defile?

A. Certain animals, when eaten by men, defile. B. The woman, after childbirth. The defiling element in her is not the giving birth to a child, or the fact that she gave birth, but her condition, which is like the "uncleanliness of her being unwell" (Lev. xii. 2); i.e., the impurity of her monthly illness.

C. Leprosy. It defiles not only the person afflicted with it, and his dress, but also every other person with whom he comes in contact during the time of the disease (Lev. xiii. 40). Everyone who enters a house which the priest has pronounced as leprous becomes unclean for one day (Lev. xiv. 46).

D. Certain secretions of the human body (Lev. xv.). (a) In a man. (b) Gonorrhoea renders unclean not only the patient himself, but every couch, seat, or object on which he lies or sits; and all persons he spits upon, or touches with his body, are unclean till the evening (1-12). (b) Nocturnal emissions of a man render him unclean till the evening, and so all stained garments, and his wife, in case she lies at his side. It is important to know, that, according to the context in verse 18, the nocturnal emission is the primary object of discussion in the section: whereas the fact that he lies by a woman is secondary, just as accidental as the garment or skin which happens to be near the man having a nocturnal emission (11. 1). It must be noticed, that according to the exegesis of the Hebrew word tameh ("unclean"), which, whatever signification we attach to the word, derives from the very beginning an external or aesthetic impurity (Ezek. xiv. 12-14; Deut. xxiii. 3-5; Lev. xxiv. 8); and even if we take the word in its wider sense, as denoting "abomination" or "immodesty" (in the highest sense), we have not yet the character of all impurity; (c) The usage of tameh—which denotes, on the one hand, physico-aesthetic impurity (Ezek. iv. 12-14; Deut. xxiii. 12-14), on the other hand, an ethical impurity (Lev. xiv. 4; Is. vi. 5; Ezek. xxii. 5; Zech. xiii. 2); and even if we take the word in its wider sense, as denoting "abomination" or "immorality" (in the highest sense), we have not yet the character of all impurity; (c) The synonyms of Tameh, but these do not help us in deciding the character of the impurity, which is by us supposed to be in removing the impurities. These also are indecisive.

The result is, that the phenomena enumerated under I. 1 have not been pronounced as impure, not because of physical or aesthetic impurity, but as account of another quality, because to them was attached an abnormality of a higher, non-perceptible nature; that is, because in those "impure" phenomena a disturbance of the normal psychological relation of man to God, of the true religious moral connection with the divine, is supposed. Thus the impurity in question has in the first place an ethical-religious character. But, since an external impurity is the secondary factor of the abnormality which is supposed in the "impure" phenomena, a religious-ethical impurity is attached to them which is not in opposition to Heb. ix. 13 rightly understood.

B. What is the source of perception, that to things mentioned (I. 1) belongs an ethical-aesthetic purity?

(a) The direct source of this perception, which we have no direct indication, and we can only arrive at a result by examining indirectly what the Old Testament understands by an "ethical-aesthetic impurity." The following possibilities have been...
Purifications.

1977

Purifications.

urged. (1) The impurity in question is a common physical one, intended to prevent persons afflicted with it from visiting the temple (Mainseid: More nephthik,iii.47; Hess: Geschichte Mosis, iv. 4, 88 sq.). Others maintained that the purificatory laws were intended to place a barrier between Israel and other nations (Tacitus: Hist., v. 4; Spangenberg, i. cap. 8, 2, 2; Von Colli: Bibl. Theol., 1836, l. p. 288; Hitzig, pp. 98 sq.; Ritschel: Rechtsfertigung, ii. 2, 1882, p. 91). Or (2) It is an especially intensive physical one. Thus, (a) Those who make them sanitary precautions (Michaelis, iv. § 207 sq.; Saalschütz, i. 217, 253; Winer, i. 319); (b) Those who make disgust (Winer, i. 319), or natural aversion (Knobel: Com. on Exodus-Leviticus, 1857, on Lev. xi. 16); or an instinctive horror (cf. Baudissin, p. 101; Ewald, p. 192, combines a and b), the original source of this conception. (3) Religious, ethic, and aesthetic, since "the two factors of the final being, birth and death, procreation and corruption, beginning and end, when contrasted with divine infinitude, are sinful and impure" (Bähr, ii. 462). But to this must be objected, (a) That two objects which serve to develop an idea are not thereby in no way related; on the contrary, they may, in spite of this external or formal relation, be essentially unlike, yes, oppose each other: birth and death, procreation and corruption, because presenting the beginning and end of human existence, are therefore not yet materially related. (b) The empiric matter of fact of the Hebrew purificatory law is also against Bähr's hypothesis, since the Hebrews never looked upon the new-born child as unclean. The arguments hold good also against Kurtz (Opfercultus, p. 867). H. Schultz (pp. 386 sq.), and Oehler (f412), who in the main follow the hypothesis of Bähr. (4) The impurity is a religio-ethico-aesthetic one, because it was regarded as a more distant or nearer effect of death. Thus Sommer, pp. 248 sq.; Keil, § 57; A. Koehler, i. pp. 460, 412, 416; Dressel on Leviticus xi.-xv.; F. W. Sunder, in Zieckler's Handbuch, i. p. 241; Hamburger, i. p. 874.

This view can not only be established by the Old Testament in general, but can also be applied to the single impurities. This direct source of the Old Testament conception of an ethico-aesthetic impurity is also not put aside by a direct source of this conception outside of the Old Testament, because there is probably brought about by Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 10), since he defiled the high places in the cities of Judah in general (8), not by physical defilement (as 2 Kings x. 27), but as, in the case of the altar at Bethel (2 Kings xxiii. 15 sq.), by bones out of the sepulchres. Israel has polluted himself by idolatry (Jer. ii. 28), and his land (ii. 7, vii. 30, 38, xxxiv. 18, Lamentations: polluted with blood (iv. 14 sq.)). In Ezekiel we have parallels to I. 1: food baked with dung that comeeth out of man is unclean (iv. 12 sq.); the menstruating woman with her pollution is mentioned (xxii. 10); the defiled land is compared to her uncleaness (xxxvi. 17); that which dieth of itself, or is torn in pieces, is unclean (iv. 14); Jahve's house is defiled by bones out of the sepulchres (ix. 7, xliii. 7); priests can only defile themselves for five dead persons (xxiv. 25); [the sanctuary and Jerusalem are defiled by the presence of idols (v. 11, xiv. 11, 19, 13 sq., 18, 30 sq., 43, xiii. 8 sq., 15, xiii. 7, 80, 38, xxxvi. 17 sq., xliii. 7); ancient Jerusalem is defiled by blood (xxiv. 9, 11); uncleanness and apostasy together (xxxix. 24); to defile the neighbor's wife by adultery (xviii. 6, 11, 15, xiii. 11); God pronounces Israel unclean because of his sins (xix. 20); but God will cleanse Israel (xxxvi. 25, 29, xxxvii. 28); finally, it is worthy of notice that the soul becomes polluted by uncleanness (iv. 14). Ezekiel lamens also over the priests who hitherto made no difference between the unclean and the clean (xxvi. 26), and puts it down as a special duty of the priests to teach this difference (xlv. 28). "Deuter-Ishak: the circumcised and unclean shall henceforth come no more into Jerusalem (Isa. ii. 1); "touch no unclean thing" (11); the unclean shall not be in the land in the messianic time (xxxviii. 8). Haggai: a dead body defiles according to the dictum of the priests (ii. 13). Since in the non-disputed oldest literary monuments of Israel we have essentially the same laws of uncleanness as contained in Lev. xi.-xv., Num. xix., it can be no question that Israel's views concerning purifications are of a very ancient origin.

When, nevertheless, Israel is said to have taken those ideas from another source, this can only be supposed to be found in the perceptions of those nations with whom Israel at a very early period is said to have come in contact, or, in fact, has been in contact, — Aryans, ancient Babylonians, Egyptians; but (3) A foreign origin of the idea in question could only be supposed on the ground that a nation being in a more distant or nearer relation to Israel could show a purificatory law which agreed in principle and detail with that of the Old Testament. From what we know, this is not the case. When, concerning the outward origin of the Old Testament ideas of purification, it must be supposed that in them, partly, very ancient material has been spiritualized and supplied with a purificatory law which was the ancient origin of the idea in question. The question is still to be answered, why Ezekiel has made the ideas of uncleanness more prominent than the former. When, however, the given notices show, that, in the prophetic writings, references to the idea of uncleanness are more and more increasing, it will be admitted that the same cause (viz., the growing seriousness of God's governing the world since the appearance of Isaiah) which led to a deeper knowledge of sin and a stronger accentuation of expiatory sacrifices, has also brought the ideas of uncleanness, as being connected with sin and death, in the foreground of the thinking of the Israelitish congregation in general, and also especially of that of Ezekiel, whom God had chosen to make the priests to be a prophet. Comp. Koenig: Offenbarungsbegriff, i. pp. 148 sq.; Dillmann: Uber die Herkunft der urgeschichtlichen Sagen der Hebriier (Berichte der Akademie zu Berlin, 1882), p. 3.
PURIFICATIONS.

1978

PURIFICATIONS.

II. 1. What Purifications were enjoined for removing the enumerated impurities?—For A is no purification. For B — For seven or fourteen days respectively (i.e., after the birth of a boy or a girl) the woman is as thoroughly unclean as in the time of her menstruation; and, after washing herself and her clothes, she is clean from her positive impurity, but not from her negative impurity (i.e., her keeping aloof from holy things and from the sanctuary), which can only be removed by presenting a lamb one year old as a burnt offering, and a young pigeon or a turtle-dove as a sin offering (Lev. xii. 6 sq.); but, if she be poor, a pigeon or a turtle-dove suffices for the sin-offering, and the second he-lamb as a holocaust (Lev. xii. 8 sq.).

For C — He who has shown a doubtful symptom of leprosy on his body has only to wash his garments (Lev. xiii. 6, 34); garments affected with leprosy must be burnt (52, 55, 57); garments or stuffs which only showed doubtful signs of leprosy are to be washed (54, 58). At the purification of the leper, one of the two clean live birds is to be killed over a vessel containing spring water: the other is to be dipped in the mixed blood and water, together with cedar-wood, hyssop, and a crimson thread or band. The fluid is then sprinkled upon the convalescent seven times, and the living bird is allowed to fly away over the fields (Lev. xiv. 4-7). The convalescent then washes his garments, shaves off all his hair, bathes in water, as he is to do again on the seventh day (8 sq.). Of the blood of the lamb killed as trespass-offering, the priest sprinkles upon the top of his right ear, upon the thumb of his right hand, and upon the great toe of his right foot; then some of the oil is sprinkled seven times towards the holy place of the sanctuary (10-15). Next the ewe-lamb is presented as a sin-offering, and the second he-lamb as a holocaust accompanied by the usual bloodless oblation of the flour (19 sq.). In case of poverty, for the sin-offering and holocaust two turtle-doves or two young pigeons are accepted (21-32). A leprous house is to be broken down (45), and he who did it is to be broken down (44), and he who did it is to be broken down (44). For D, (a), (c) — When the discharge of semen has ceased, he must wash his garments, and bathe in running water; he presents two turtle-doves or two young pigeons, one for a sin-offering and the other for a holocaust (Lev. xv. 13-15). Persons defiled directly or indirectly by such a person have only to wash their garments, and bathe their bodies (5-11). Earthen vessels touched by the patient must be broken; wooden ones, rinsed with water (19). For D, (a), (b) — No nocturnal accidents render the persons unclean till the evening, when they must bathe, while all stained garments require washing (16-18).

For D, (b), (e) — In case of the menstruating woman, no purification is indicated; but the persons indirectly defiled by her must wash garments and bodies (21 sq.). Since, however, the irregular issue of blood on the part of the woman (D, b, p) is only regarded as temporary, different from the regular issue, having the same causes from sickness (52 sq.), we must take it for granted that the lawgiver intended the same purificatory laws for the menstruating woman as for the one afflicted with an irregular issue of blood (29 sq.). For E, (a) — Whoever carries the carcases of unclean animals must wash his garments (Lev. xi. 21, 25); the objects upon which a carcase accidentally falls, such as utensils of wood, garments, or skins, require cleansing by being left in water till the evening (32); earthen vessels, ovens, and stoves must be broken (33, 35). For E, (b) — Carrying the carcases of a clean animal requires washing of garments (30). For E, (c) — Defilement at a dead person requires a red heifer without spot, and upon which never came yoke, etc. (Num. xix. 1-6). The ashes of the burnt heifer are put into running water (17), which becomes the water of abomination, i.e., the water appointed for the purification of uncleanness: in this sense the word נַעֲדָה (may niddah) is to be taken. With this water, those who have become defiled directly or indirectly for a dead person, as well as the house of the dead and its vessels, are to be sprinkled, by means of hyssop, on the third and seventh day after the defilement; and on the seventh day the person shall purify himself, and wash his clothes (12 sq., 17-19). The latter must also be done by him who touches such carcases, keeps, and uses the ashes (7 sq., 10, 21). The officiating priest, as well as the man who burnt the red heifer, have, besides, to bathe their flesh in water (7 sq.). As for the Nazarite who defiled himself by a sudden death, see Num. vi. 9-12. Of the booty taken from heathenish nations, every thing that may abide the fire is to go through it, and must be purified with the water of separation: all that abideth not the fire is to go through the water; and a person touching such booty must wash his clothes on the seventh day.

2. Upon what perceptions is the purifying power of the objects used, and actions performed, at the purifications, based? (a) The destruction of unclean things, in whatever form or manner, needs no explanation. (b) Going through fire is easily to be understood, since fire is often mentioned in the Old Testament as a purifying means (Ps. xii. 6).

(c) That water should be used for removing the ethico-aesthetic impurity is a matter of course; and it is possible that "living" water, even where it is not expressly stated, is meant. (d) The sin and burnt sacrifices required of the woman after childbirth, the leper, the man having a running issue, and the woman having an issue of blood (Lev. xii. 1-8), have their usual signification. (e) In the purification of the leper, all materials and actions show the great step which the person to be purified took from the awful nearness of death to the gladness of a common life of the community of the Israelites in the land of Canaan. (f) In removing the impurity caused by the touch of a dead person, the red color of the corpse, as symbol of the source of life, being in the blood, must be considered. A yoke had never come upon her: she was the emblem of virgin energy. Cedar-wood, crimson thread, and hyssop, which were also used, represent emblems of incorruptibility, medicine against impurity, and symbol of life.
PURIFICATIONS. 1979

PURITAN.

PURIM (for the meaning of the name, see Esth. ix. 24-26; cf. infra 7). The Book of Esther also gives us our information respecting the origin of this Jewish festival. It encountered opposition on its introduction, according to the Jerusalem Talmud; for eighty-five elders, including thirty prophets, ridiculed the idea (cf. Lightfoot on John x. 21). But by Josephus' time (cf. Ant. XI. 6, 13), it was universally observed. It is observed on the 14th and 15th Adar, i.e., exactly a month before passover, preceded by the "fast of Esther" on the 13th, which was the actual day of the delivery. It was not a temple, but a synagogue celebration, and observed in public by the reading of the entire Book of Esther — called Megillah ("the roll") par excellence — on the appearance of stars on the 13th, which was the actual day of the delivery. It was not a temple, but a synagogue celebration, and observed in public by the reading of the entire Book of Esther — called Megillah ("the roll") par excellence — on the appearance of stars on the 13th, which was the actual day of the delivery. It was not a temple, but a synagogue celebration, and observed in public by the reading of the entire Book of Esther — called Megillah ("the roll") par excellence — on the appearance of stars on the 13th, which was the actual day of the delivery.

In leap-year, Purim is celebrated in the intercalary month (Veadar): but formerly it was twice celebrated, — both in Adar and Veadar. If the 14th of Adar falls on a Sunday, then, since there can be no fasting on sabbath, the "Esther fast" falls on Thursday. Ewald conjectured, that originally Purim could be celebrated on the 13th of any month; but, by connecting it with the delivery from Egyptian bondage, it was put before the passover, as a sort of prelude. OEHLEK.

PURITAN, PURITANISM. The Reformation in England was begun by Henry VIII., and consolidated by Elizabeth. It was an unhappy thing for the interests of religion and the church, that from the first, the movement was in the hands of those who subordinated it to personal caprice and state policy. Most of the principal agents employed to effect it were animated by strong Protestant principle, and desired that it should be... thorough; and though, at first, they were not able to do all they desired, they rejoiced in what they had been permitted to accomplish, and hoped the work would continue to advance. With regard to this advance, they were doomed to disappointment, and in the end submitted to what appeared to them to be "the inevitable."

The first Puritans were men who could not accept the work as complete, nor rest satisfied with it in its imperfection. They wished to make the church as perfect as possible for subserving the ends of true religion, and therefore urged the utter rejection of everything that countenanced Roman error and superstition. They had no objection to the connection of the Church with the State, nor to some regulation of it by the civil authorities. They submitted to those regulations which they approved; but, whether consistently or inconsistently we do not now inquire, they resisted those which seemed inexpedient, or contrary to the interests of Protestant truth.

The spirit of Puritanism had appeared in the reign of Edward VI. Bishop Hooper refused to be consecrated in the papal vestments and to take the papal oath. The latter was altered; but the former could not be dispensed with. For his refusal he was imprisoned, but eventually he was released. He ordered them to be worn only on high occasions, and thereupon he was imprisoned, but eventually he was released. He ordered them to be removed, and proceeded in the path of reformation farther than it had yet been possible to do in England. Here they met with opposition from other exiles who had been invited to join them, who insisted on using the English Liturgy, and on conforming to the rites of the English Church as ordered in the reign of Edward VI. Though the church was forced to remain mixed, unholy ceremonies were removed, and the treatment these brethren met with at Frankfort was only an earnest of what they would experience in England in the ensuing reign.

When Elizabeth ascended the throne, the exiles returned to their native land; but, much to their sorrow, the Puritans found the queen disposed to retrograde rather than to advance. Fond of pomp, she determined on preserving the vestments and some of the symbols of Popery. Her plea was a desire to retain the Roman Catholics in the church; and, further to secure this object, some passages in the service-book which would be offensive to them were removed, and ceremonies which favored their opinions were retained. She did not like the Puritans, she hated them; and her friends, Miles Coverdale and John Fox were treated with neglect. In the first year of her reign the Act of Supremacy and the Act of Uniformity were passed, the latter of which pressed very heavily upon the Puritans, who had scruples respecting the conformity required of them in vestments and forms. They held that the vestments, having been used by the idolatrous priests of Rome, defiled and obscured the priesthood of Christ; they, therefore, increased hypocrisy and pride, that they were contrary to Scripture, and that the enforcement of them was tyranny. Many of the bishops would have been glad to dispense with them; but the queen insisted upon retaining them, and, as Hallam says, "Had her influence been withdrawn, surplices and square caps would have lost their steadiest friend, and several other little accommodations to the prevalent dispositions of Protestants would have taken place."—Constitutional History, chap. iv.

There is no doubt that Elizabeth, feeling the insecurity of her position and the magnitude of the dangers which encompassed her in the beginning of her reign, acted from policy, and endeavored to mark out a via media between Protestantism and Popery. This may partly account for her endeavor to do all they desired, they rejoiced in what they did not like the Puritans, she hated them; and her friends, Miles Coverdale and John Fox were treated with neglect. In the first year of her reign the Act of Supremacy and the Act of Uniformity were passed, the latter of which pressed very heavily upon the Puritans, who had scruples respecting the conformity required of them in vestments and forms. They held that the vestments, having been used by the idolatrous priests of Rome, defiled and obscured the priesthood of Christ; they, therefore, increased hypocrisy and pride, that they were contrary to Scripture, and that the enforcement of them was tyranny. Many of the bishops would have been glad to dispense with them; but the queen insisted upon retaining them, and, as Hallam says, "Had her influence been withdrawn, surplices and square caps would have lost their steadiest friend, and several other little accommodations to the prevalent dispositions of Protestants would have taken place."—Constitutional History, chap. iv.

There is no doubt that Elizabeth, feeling the insecurity of her position and the magnitude of the dangers which encompassed her in the beginning of her reign, acted from policy, and endeavored to mark out a via media between Protestantism and Popery. This may partly account for her endeavor to do all they desired, they rejoiced in what they did not like the Puritans, she hated them; and her friends, Miles Coverdale and John Fox were treated with neglect. In the first year of her reign the Act of Supremacy and the Act of Uniformity were passed, the latter of which pressed very heavily upon the Puritans, who had scruples respecting the conformity required of them in vestments and forms. They held that the vestments, having been used by the idolatrous priests of Rome, defiled and obscured the priesthood of Christ; they, therefore, increased hypocrisy and pride, that they were contrary to Scripture, and that the enforcement of them was tyranny. Many of the bishops would have been glad to dispense with them; but the queen insisted upon retaining them, and, as Hallam says, "Had her influence been withdrawn, surplices and square caps would have lost their steadiest friend, and several other little accommodations to the prevalent dispositions of Protestants would have taken place."—Constitutional History, chap. iv.

There is no doubt that Elizabeth, feeling the insecurity of her position and the magnitude of the dangers which encompassed her in the beginning of her reign, acted from policy, and endeavored to mark out a via media between Protestantism and Popery. This may partly account for her endeavor to do all they desired, they rejoiced in what they did not like the Puritans, she hated them; and her friends, Miles Coverdale and John Fox were treated with neglect. In the first year of her reign the Act of Supremacy and the Act of Uniformity were passed, the latter of which pressed very heavily upon the Puritans, who had scruples respecting the conformity required of them in vestments and forms. They held that the vestments, having been used by the idolatrous priests of Rome, defiled and obscured the priesthood of Christ; they, therefore, increased hypocrisy and pride, that they were contrary to Scripture, and that the enforcement of them was tyranny. Many of the bishops would have been glad to dispense with them; but the queen insisted upon retaining them, and, as Hallam says, "Had her influence been withdrawn, surplices and square caps would have lost their steadiest friend, and several other little accommodations to the prevalent dispositions of Protestants would have taken place."—Constitutional History, chap. iv.

with his oath ex officio, was the means of inflicting extreme suffering on the Puritans.

In order to insure uniformity, "advertisements" were issued by the bishops in 1564, by which it was ordained that "all licenses for preaching, granted out by the archbishops and bishops within the province of Canterbury, bearing date before the first day of March, 1564, be void and of none effect." Thus all preachers were silenced. And, further to complete the work, it was ordained that only "such as shall be thought meet for the office" should receive fresh licenses. Thus only conformable ministers were restored. But, whilst some of the best and most conscientious of the clergy were cast out of their offices, thousands of parishes were destitute, and had no ministers to preach to them the word of life: this, however, in the estimation of the queen and her ecclesiastical advisers, was a less evil than a ministry without the Roman-Catholic vestments.

Archbishop Parker seconded the queen in all her severities; the consequence of which was, that in 1567 some of the laity resolved to meet privately and to worship God, as the Protestants did in Queen Mary's days. About a hundred of them met in Plumbers Hall in London. But they were surprised, some of them apprehended, and imprisoned for more than a year. These rigorous measures tended rather to the increase of Puritanism than to its destruction. The people continued to meet privately; and the clergy began to look beyond the vestments, and to question the constitution of the church itself. Their leader was Thomas Cartwright, who, as Margaret Professor of divinity at Cambridge, unfolded his views of ecclesiastical order, which were in harmony with those of the Presbyterian churches on the Continent and in Scotland. A severe controversy hereupon arose. Cartwright was deprived of his professorship and fellowship, and was forbidden to teach or to preach. He retired to Geneva, where he was chosen professor of divinity, and there embarked on the frontier views of ecclesiastical order, which were in harmony with those of the Presbyterian churches on the Continent and in Scotland.

A severe controversy hereupon arose. Cartwright was deprived of his professorship and fellowship, and was forbidden to teach or to preach. He retired to Geneva, where he was chosen professor of divinity, and there embarked on the frontier views of ecclesiastical order, which were in harmony with those of the Presbyterian churches on the Continent and in Scotland.

Whitgift published his Defence of the Answer to the Admonition; and Cartwright then published his Second Reply. This exile continued eleven years; but he afterwards returned to England. In 1574 Parker told the queen that they were only auxiliaries to Puritanism and Nonconformity, whereupon she gave him private orders to suppress them. When Grindal became Archbishop of Canterbury, he not only inherited the office, but also the task of suppressing the prophesying; but, approving of them, he set himself rather to redress any irregularities, and to guard them against abuse. The queen, on the other hand, disliked them, and determined that they should be suppressed. On Dec. 20, 1576, Grindal wrote a very respectful but very faithful letter to the queen, in which he said, "I am forced with all humility, and yet plainly, to profess that I cannot with safe conscience, and without the offence of the majesty of God, give my assent to the suppressing of the said exercises: much less can I send out any injunction for the utter and universal subversion of the same." For this boldness, Grindal was suspended from his office; and his see was placed under sequestration for six months; and he was confined a prisoner in his own house.

Grindal died in 1583, and was succeeded by Whitgift, who, during the first week of his archiepiscopal rule, issued his famous articles:—

"(1) That all preaching, catechising, and praying in any private house, where any are present besides the family, be utterly extinguished. (2) That none do preach or catechise, except also he will read the whole service, and observe the whole discipline of the Church of England. (3) That all preaching, catechising, and praying in any private house, where any are present besides the family, be utterly extinguished. (4) That none be admitted to preach, or execute any part of the ecclesiastical function, unless he be ordained according to the manner of the Church of England. (5) That none be admitted to preach, or execute any part of the ecclesiastical function, unless he be ordained according to the manner of the Church of England. (6) That the queen hath, and ought to have, the sovereignty and rule over all manner of persons born within her dominions, of what condition soever they be; and that none other power or potentate hath, or ought to have, any power, ecclesiastical or civil, within her realms or dominions. (7) That the Book of Common Prayer and the prayer-book, and the parochial registers, and deans, containeth in it nothing contrary to the word of God, but may be lawfully used; and that he himself will use the same, and none other, in public prayer, and in administration of the sacraments. so that he alloweth the Book of Articles agreed upon in the Convocation holden in London in 1562, and set forth by her Majesty's authority; and he believe all the articles therein contained to be agreeable to the word of God.

Wielding almost absolute power with a despotic severity, we are not surprised to find that he suspended many hundreds of the clergy from their ministry. Petitions and remonstrances were in vain: Whitgift could not yield. And for twenty years this man guided the affairs of the Established Church. Only the records of the High Commission Court can tell the havoc he made, and the misery he inflicted on some of the holiest of the clergy and the people of their charge. A new commission was issued at Whitgift's instigation: its jurisdiction was almost universal, embracing heretical opinions, seditious books, false rumors, slanderous words, abstaining from divine service, etc. A jury might be dispensed with, and an offender might confess if he was wanting, "by all other means and ways they could devise,"—by the rack and ex-officio oath, etc.; and, if the oath was declined, then the court might inflict "fine or imprisonment according to its discretion." (By the ex-officio oath a man was compelled to bear testimony against himself, and to tell what he knew of others.) Whitgift drew up twenty-four articles to guide the commissioners when examining delinquent clergymen. The privy council remonstrated with him; and Lord Burleigh described the articles thus: "I find them so curiously penned, so full of branches and circumstances, that I think the Inquisition of Spain use not so many questions to comprehend and entrap their preys." Whitgift's reply to remonstrances was, that he had undertaken the defence of the rights of the Church of England, to appease the sects of Cartwright's troubles given in more extended histories is a sad illustration of the spirit of Whitgift's rule. Cartwright died Dec. 27, 1603, and Whitgift within three months after.

The Parliament on several occasions manifested a disposition to legislate for the relief of the Puritans. In 1570 they enacted that ministers who had received a Presbyterian ordination might qualify for service in the English Church by declaring before the bishop, and subscribing an oath: "all persons above the age of sixteen, refusing to come to church, or persuading others to deny her Majesty's authority in causes ecclesiastical, or dissuading them from coming to church, or being found present at any conventicle or meeting, under pretence of religion, shall, upon conviction, be committed to prison without bail till they shall conform, and come to church; and that, if they refuse to come, they shall abjure the realm and go into perpetual banishment; and that if they do not depart within the time appointed, or if they ever return without the queen's license, they shall suffer death without benefit of clergy." Under the provisions of this cruel act, Barrow, Greenwood, Penny, and others suffered death, and many of the Brownists left the kingdom. It is not pretended that all the Puritans were always wise, or always moderate in the expression of their sentiments. The oppression to which they were subjected was severe enough to goad them on to the use of strong language, which some of them sometimes employed. But in 1688 a series of tracts was issued from a secret press, by an unknown writer who called himself Martin Marprelate. (Dr. Dexter, in his Congregationalism, has devoted a lecture to the controversy connected with these tracts, to which the reader is referred.) They were bitter and caustic enough, and unquestionably excited the wrath of the bishops, and brought down further afflictions upon the heads of the Puritans; though it is probable that the Puritans properly so called had nothing to do with their production or publication. Somehandled the tracts and regretted their publication. They most likely had their origin among the Brownists, whose opinions and practices were even more obnoxious to the bishops than those of the Puritans themselves. These Brownists may be classed among the Puritans, and by many persons are confounded with them; but they were a distinct species of the order, and, during the latter part of the reign of Elizabeth, suffered the severest afflictions.

Elizabeth died in 1602, and James VI. of Scotland succeeded her. The Puritans hoped that from them they would receive a milder treatment than they had experienced from his predecessor. He had praised the Scottish Kirk, and disparaged the Church of England, saying that "its service was but an evil-said mass in English, wanting nothing but the lifting." But Whitgift had sent agents to Scotland to assure the king of the devotion of the English ecclesiastics to his interests; and he, in return, gave them entirely his patronage. The Puritans presented a petition to him, when on his way to London, signed by about a thousand clergy-men, and therefore called the "Ministerial Petition." In it they set forth in moderate language their desires. And now a fair opportunity presented itself for conciliation. A conference was resolved upon, which assembled at Hampton Court, Jan. 14, 1603-04, professedly to give due consideration to these matters. On the first day the king and the episcopal party alined about the controversy; the court clergy rejected them; and the four Puritans were again called in, and told what had been decided. The king said that he expected of them obedience and humility, and "if this be all your party have to say, I will make them conform, or I will harry them out of the land, or else do worse." And so the opportunity for conciliation was lost, and then severities were resumed.

In 1604 the constitutions and canons of the church were settled in convocation, and, without receiving the assent of Parliament, were issued. On the strength alone of the royal supremacy. They were conceived in a rigorous spirit, and dealt freely in excommunication, which at that time was not a mere brutum fulmen. Bancroft, as Whitgift was now dead; and he was after wards raised to the archbishopric of Canterbury. In his new office he even surpassed Whitgift in his severities. Three hundred Puritan ministers, who had not separated from the Established Church, were silenced, imprisoned, or exiled in 1604. "But, the Puritans felt, the more they multiplied and grew." And now the persecuted pastors and people began to think of emigrating. The Separatists went to Holland, —Smyth to Amsterdam in 1606, and John Robin son with the Scooby church to Leyden in 1608-09. Some of the Puritans also sailed for Virginia, whereupon the archbishop obtained a proclamation forbidding others to depart without the king's license. And so severe was the persecution they endured, that the Parliament in 1610 endeavored to relieve them, but with little success. Bancroft died this year, and was succeeded by Dr. George Abbot; and still persecution continued.

In 1611 the king published his Declaration for the observance of the sabbath began in the latter part of Elizabeth's reign. Dr. Nicholas Bound published his True Doctrine of the Sabbath, commanding for a strict observance of the day; and Whiglit opposed it. The Puritans adopted its provisions, the court clergy rejected them; and now the Book of Sports became the battle-ground of the controversy. All ministers were enjoined to read in their congregations, and those who refused were suspended and imprisoned.

The doctrines of the Reformers and of their successors, Conformists and Puritans alike, had hitherto been Calvinistic. Whitgift was a High Loyalist; the king, who prided himself on his theology, had maintained Calvinism; and the representatives of England at the synod of Dort were of the same opinions. But a change came over the Established clergy, and many began to set forth Arminianism. The Puritans held fast to the old faith, and now in 1620 were forbidden to preach it. And from this time, and through the pravity of Laud, Puritan doctrine, as well as Puritan practice, was obnoxious to those in power.

James died in 1625, and was succeeded by Charles I. Under this monarch "the unjust and inhuman proceedings of the Council Table, the Star Chamber, and the High Commission, are unparalleled." Nonconformists were exceedingly harassed and persecuted in every corner of the land. These severities were instigated by Laud, soon after made bishop of London, and prime minister to the king. Lecturers were put down, and such as preached against Arminianism and the Popish ceremonies were suspended; the Puritans were driven from one diocese to another, and many were obliged to leave the kingdom. In 1633 Laud succeeded to the archbishopric of Canterbury, on the death of Abbot. When the Puritans felt the whole force of his fiery zeal, and during the next seven years multitudes of them, ministers and laymen, were driven to Holland and America. The Book of Sports was republished, with like consequences as at the first publication. Pryme, Burton, and Bystwick suffered their horrible punishments. Ruinous fines and confiscations were imposed, such as the whipping to the Pillory. In 1640 they were practised and enjoined, and the whole church appeared to be going headlong to Rome. In 1649 the Convocation adopted new constitutions and canons, extremely superstitious and tyrannical, which the Long Parliament condemned as being "contrary to the fundamental laws of the realm and to the liberty and property of the subject, and as containing innovations tending to sedition and dangerous consequence." The nation could bear the unmitigated political and ecclesiastical tyranny no longer. Those who had suffered from the king's arbitrary rule joined with those who were groaning under the despotism of the bishops, and with one vast effort overthrew absolute monarchy and Anglican Popery together. A new era began; and the Puritans felt the whole force of his fiery zeal, and during the next seven years multitudes of them, ministers and laymen, were driven to Holland and America. The Book of Sports was republished, with like consequences as at the first publication. Pryme, Burton, and Bastwick suffered their horrible punishments. Ruinous fines and confiscations were imposed, such as the whipping to the Pillory. In 1640 they were practised and enjoined, and the whole church appeared to be going headlong to Rome. In 1649 the Convocation adopted new constitutions and canons, extremely superstitious and tyrannical, which the Long Parliament condemned as being "contrary to the fundamental laws of the realm and to the liberty and property of the subject, and as containing innovations tending to sedition and dangerous consequence." The nation could bear the unmitigated political and ecclesiastical tyranny no longer. Those who had suffered from the king's arbitrary rule joined with those who were groaning under the despotism of the bishops, and with one vast effort overthrew absolute monarchy and Anglican Popery together. A new era began; and the Puritans felt the whole force of his fiery zeal, and during the next seven years multitudes of them, ministers and laymen, were driven to Holland and America. The Book of Sports was republished, with like consequences as at the first publication. Pryme, Burton, and Bastwick suffered their horrible punishments. Ruinous fines and confiscations were imposed, such as the whipping to the Pillory. In 1640 they were practised and enjoined, and the whole church appeared to be going headlong to Rome. In 1649 the Convocation adopted new constitutions and canons, extremely superstitious and tyrannical, which the Long Parliament condemned as being "contrary to the fundamental laws of the realm and to the liberty and property of the subject, and as containing innovations tending to sedition and dangerous consequence." The nation could bear the unmitigated political and ecclesiastical tyranny no longer.
the Bishop of Worcester. In 1390 he was in prison, and while there compiled from Wiclif's writings a Commentary on Revelation. In 1400 he recanted his Lollardy, at St. Paul's Cross, London; was by the Archdeacon of Canterbury admitted to the vicarage of Westthite, Kent, but resigned Oct. 8, 1403, and was again in prison in 1421. He is chiefly remembered for his share in Wiclif's version of the Scriptures, and for his refutation of his same (1392); as also for the Prologue of great length and interest. See Foshall and Madden's edition of Wic-lif's Bible, Oxford, 1850, 4 vols., vol. i.; Mombrebt: The English Versions, chap. iii.; and art.
Wiclif.

PUSEY, Edward Bouverie, D.D., Church of England; b. 1800 ; d. at Ascot Priory, Oxford, Sept. 10, 1882. He was graduated 1822, with high honors in classics, in 1823 elected fellow of Oriel College, Oxford; during 1826 and 1827 he studied languages and theology in Germany, under the direction of Dr. Tholuck in Halle, and his first book was on German rationalism. In 1828 he was appointed Regius-professor of Hebrew, and canon of Christ Church. In 1833 the Tracts for the Times were started. Pusey sympathized with this Anglo-Catholic movement, and wrote the elefteenth tract, entitled Thoughts on the Benefits of the System of Fasting enjoined by our Church, the fourth, Baptism; and the sixty-seventh, Scriptural Views of Holy Baptism. In 1843 he delivered a sermon on Matt. xxvi. 28, entitled The Holy Eu-chist or a Comfort to the Penitent, which caused his suspension by the vice-chancellor from preaching in the University pulpit for three years. In 1845 Newman joined the Roman Church; but Pusey remained, and for the rest of his days was the recognized head of the High-Church party. He resided almost constantly at Oxford. Those who held his views were styled "Puseyites," an epithet he earnestly repudiated, insisting that he and they merely followed the Primitive Church, and it was wrong, therefore, to attach his name to doctrines which had been taught in the church centuries before. He was a voluminous author. Among his works may be mentioned: An Historical Inquiry into the Probable Causes of the Rationalistic Character lately Predominant in the Theology of Germany, London, 1828-30, 2 parts; A Course of Sermons on Solemn Subjects, Oxford, 1845; The Real Presence of the Body and Blood of Christ the Doctrine of the English Church, 1857; The Councils of the Church
(51-381 A.D.), 1857, new ed., 1878; Nine Sermons preached before the University of Oxford 1840-55, 1850, new ed., 1879; God's Prohibition of the Mar-rriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister, 1860 (also 1849);
The Minor Prophets, with a Commentary Explanyatory, Critical, and Historical, and Selections to the Several Books, 1860-77 (the best of his theological works);
Daniel the Prophet, Nine Lectures, 1864, 4th thousand, 1868; The Church of England a Portion of Christ's One Holy Catholic Church - an Eirenicon, 1865; What is of Faith as to Everlasting Punishment? 1880 (against Canon Farrar); Parochial and Cathedral Sermons, 1882. He was one of the originators, with John Keble and Charles Marriott, of the "Library of the Fathers of the Holy Catholic Church" (see Patristics), for which he edited the opening volume, St. Augustine's Confessions, 1840, 4th ed., 1853, and of the "Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology." See B. W. Savil: Dr.
Pusey, an Historic Sketch, with Some Account of the Oxford Movement during the Nineteenth Century, London, 1883 (a sharp criticism, from an evangelical stand-point, of Dr. Pusey's doctrines on the Lord's Supper, Baptism, justification by faith, and confession); J. R. Heathcote: The Character and Life-Work of Dr. Pusey, a Sketch and Study, 1883 (94 pp.); his Life, by Canon H. P. Liddon, in preparation; also arts. Ritualism, Tracta-rianism.

Dr. Pusey was personally a pure, humble, and devout man. His piety was of the ascetic or monastic type, and corresponded to his theology, which was essential Catholic, although opposed to Romanism on the subject of Mariolatry and the authority of the Pope. He was the moral, as J. H. Newman was the intellectual, and Keble the poetical, leader of the Anglo-Catholic movement which has agitated the Church of England and all her branches for the last fifty years, and ex-ereted as much influence as the Wesleyan movement, which sprung from the same university a hundred years before, although in the opposite direction. Methodism strengthened the cause of Protestantism, and revived practical religion among the lower classes of the people. Oxford Tractarianism undermined Protestantism, and developed a Romanizing tendency among the clergy and higher classes. Newman followed the logical consequences of the system, and submitted his powerful intellect, weary of freedom, and anxious for rest, to the infallible authority of the Pope, and drew several hundred of the clergy and nobility after him. Pusey and Keble died in the Church of England, and kept a larger number of their followers from secession. Apparently the Oxford theology is a re-action and a backward movement; but it has excited a vast churchly activity in every direction, and there is now more life and energy in the church than ever before.
The future must decide the providential aim and true value of that revival of Anglo-Catholicism with which the name of Dr. Pusey is so prominently connected.

PYM, John, the great leader of the Parliament party at the commencement of the civil wars;
b. of a Somersetshire family in 1584; d. in London, Dec. 8, 1649. During the latter part of the reign of James I. he vigorously opposed the measures of the court, and, after the accession of Charles I., came further into public notice through the prominent part he took in impeaching the Duke of Buckingham. At the opening of the Long Parliament, by common consent he assumed the leadership of the popular party; and his attack on the Earl of Strafford, once his friend, can never be forgotten. It was, however, a political duel, in which the life of one of the antagonists was to fall; and, if Pym had not conquered him whom he denounced as "the great promoter of tyranny," the "promoter of tyranny" would have crushed him, and arrested the movement of the age. The impeachment of Strafford has been pronounced "a masterstroke of policy," as it deprived the king of his right hand, and opened the door to a successful resistance of encroaching prerogatives.
The biography of Pym includes the history of the Long Parliament down to the end of 1643. He was ever at his post in the House of Commons, swaying the members in the main particulars of his policy. He was not a republican: he preferred a limited monarchy, and was moderate in many of his counsels. He was the Mirabeau of the great English Revolution which led to the execution of Charles; but, if he had lived, perhaps the issue would have been different. But he died in the midst of his days, and was buried, with something like royal pomp, in the Abbey of Westminster.

JOHN STOUGHTON.

PYNCHON, William, b. in Essex, Eng., about 1590; d. at Wraisbury, Buckinghamshire, opposite Magna Charta Island in the Thames, near Windsor, Oct. 22, 1662. He was one of the original patentees of the Massachusetts Bay Company; came to America, 1630; settled at Roxbury, Mass.; founded Springfield on the Connecticut River, 1636, naming it for his English home. In 1650, at London, he published The meritorious price of our redemption, justification, etc., clearing (sic) it of some common errors (4to, pp. xii. 152, 2d ed., 1855). Scarcely were copies of it brought to Boston, in October, 1650, than heresies it contained attracted attention; and the General Court then assembled quickly took action upon such a flagrant violation of the law passed in Massachusetts (1646), which forbade such erroneous teaching, and banished perpetually such teachers. The "heresies" were, (1) That Christ did not suffer for us the torments of hell; (2) That Christ did not bear our sins by God's imputation, and therefore did not bear the curse of the law for them; (3) That Christ hath not redeemed us from the curse of the law by suffering that curse for us. The third heresy had been expressly forbidden. The court directed that Mr. John Norton should answer the book, and that it should be burned by the executioner in the market-place in Boston. In May, 1651, Pynchon appeared before the court with a partial recantation, which, however, was not satisfactory, and he was cited to appear the next session, in October. Not coming, he was, under penalty of a hundred pounds, enjoined to appear before it the following May, but, to the relief of all, went back to England ere the set day came. Mr. John Norton's answer was entitled A discussion of that great point in divinity, the sufferings of Christ; and the questions about his righteousness, active, passive, and the imputation thereof, London, 1653, 8vo, pp. xiv. 270. In 1655, in London, Pynchon published his answer to Norton, A further discussion of that great point in divinity, the sufferings of Christ, and the questions about his righteousness, 4to, pp. lii. 439. Besides these volumes, Pynchon wrote, The Jeces synagogue, 1652, and (1) The time when the first sabbath was ordained; (2) the manner how the first sabbath was ordained, pt. ii., A treatise of holy time, 4to, pp. xvi. 143, xvii. 120. See J. G. PALFREY: Hist. N. E., vol. ii. pp. 395, 396; Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., viii. 2d series; DEXTER: Congregationalism, Appendix, Nos. 1552, 1638, 1642, 1703.

PYX (from τὸ μοῖρα, "a box") denotes, in the terminology of the Roman-Catholic Church, the box or vessel, of various but often very elaborate form, in which the consecrated elements of the Eucharist are preserved. Its use was prescribed by Innocent III. in 1215. See AUGUSTI: Christ. Arch., iii. 922, and SMITH and CHEETHAM, ii. 1706.
QUADRAGESIMA. See Lent.

QUADRATUS. In the second century of our era there were three persons of the name Quadratus. One was the apostle. He presented his work to the Emperor Hadrian in 125, and it seems to have been in existence in the seventh century (Photius: Cod., 162); but it afterwards perished. Eusebius gives a fragment of it (Hist. Eccl., IV. 3), in which Quadratus appeals to the miraculous healings of Christ, and mentions that persons healed by him were still living. — Another Quadratus is mentioned, in the Epistle of Dionysius of Corinth to the Athenians, as the successor of Bishop Paulus, as a man of great merits with respect to the re-organization of his congregation, and as having suffered martyrdom under Marcus Aurelius. An extract from the epistle is found in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., IV. 23). Jerome (De script. eccl. 19, and Ep. ad. Magn.) identifies him in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., IV. 23). Jerome (De script. eccl. 19, and Ep. ad. Magn.) identifies him with the apologist, but without sufficient reason.

— A third Quadratus is mentioned in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., V. 17), as a prophet beside Agabus, Judas, Silas, and others. He, too, has been identified with the apologist. See A. Harnack: Die Ueberlieferung d. christl. Apologeten, Leipzig, 1882, pp. 100 sqq.

QUAKERS. See Friends.

QUARLES, Francis, b. at Stewards, Essex, 1592; d. in London, Sept. 8, 1614; ranks next to Herbert among the sacred poets of the reign of Charles I. He was educated at Cambridge; studied law at Lincoln's Inn; was a servant of the Queen of Judas, Silas, and others. He, too, has been identified with the apologist, but without sufficient reason. See A. Harnack: Die Ueberlieferung d. christl. Apologeten, Leipzig, 1882, pp. 100 sqq.

QUICKSILVER. See Metals.

QUERIES. See Questions.

QUERUSTEDT, Andreas, b. at Quedlinburg, 1617; d. at Wittenberg, 1698. He studied at Helmstedt under Calixtus; went then to Wittenberg, became a pupil of Calovius, and in 1649 appointed professor of theology there. His principal work is his Theologia didactica polemica, which appeared in 1685, and is the last comprehensive, systematic exposition of Lutheran orthodoxy, appearing just as the process of dissolution began to take effect. See H. A. Boardman: A Manual of Modern Church History, 1913, p. 291.

QUEUES. See Tail.

QUEUES. See Tail.

QUEUES. See Tail.

QUEVESNEL, Pasquier (Paschasius), b. in Paris, July 14, 1634; d. in Amsterdam, Dec. 2, 1719. He studied theology at the Sorbonne; entered the Congregation of the Oratory in 1657; was ordained a priest in 1659; and appointed director of the seminary of the Congregation in Paris, 1662. Shortly after, he began the publication of his celebrated work, Réflexions morales sur le Nouveau Testament, and in 1703 appeared his edition of the works of Leo the Great. As the former proved him to be a Jansenist, and the latter a Gallicanist, a conflict with the Jesuits was unavoidable. He left Paris, and settled at Orleans; but, when he refused to sign the famous anti-Jansenist formula in 1685, he was compelled to flee for his life, and went to Brussels. There he continued the publication of his Réflexions, of which the first collected edition appeared in 1687; the second, much augmented, in 1695-99; later edition, Amsterdam, 1736, 8 vols.; [Eng. trans., The New Testament, with moral reflections upon every verse, London, 1719-23, 4 vols. There is another translation of a part of this work under the title, The four gospels, with a commentary and reflections, both spiritual and moral; translated, and the Papish errors expunged, by a Presbyter of the Church of England, Bath, 1790, 2 vols.; [new ed., revised by Rev. H. A. Boardman, D.D., N.Y., 1867, 2 vols.]. In 1703, however, he was arrested, and put into the dungeon of the archiepiscopal palace; but he escaped, and fled to Holland, out of the reach of the Jesuits. Among his other works are, Traduction de l'Église romaine, 1685; La discipline de l'Église, 1688; La vie de M. Arnauld, 1813, etc. His letters were edited by Le Courayer, Paris, 1721-23, 3 vols.

C. PFENDER.

QUETIF, Jacques, b. in Paris, Aug. 6, 1618; d. there March 2, 1698. He entered the Dominikan order; studied at Bordeaux; was ordained a priest in 1642, and in 1652 appointed librarian in the Jacobin convent in Paris. He published Con-

QUETIF, Jacques, b. in Paris, Aug. 6, 1618; d. there March 2, 1698. He entered the Dominikan order; studied at Bordeaux; was ordained a priest in 1642, and in 1652 appointed librarian in the Jacobin convent in Paris. He published Con-
QUIETISM. See Molinos; Guyon.

QUINISEXTUM CONCILIUM, held in Constantinople, 692, is thus called because it forms a kind of supplement to the fifth (quintum) and sixth ecumenical councils of 555 and 680. It is also called the Trullan Council, on account of its being held in the imperial palace called Trullus. See Trullan Councils.

QUIRINIUS (Κυρίνιος), the governor of Syria at the time of Christ's birth (according to Luke ii. 2, "this was the first enrolment made when Quirinius was governor of Syria"). His full name was Publius Sulpicius Quirinius. He is the second of that name mentioned in Roman history. He was made consul 12 B.C., and was probably twice governor of Syria and Cilicia, from 4 to 1 B.C., and from 6 to 11 A.D. Tacitus (Annals, iii. 48) supplies us with most of our knowledge of the man.

"About this time he (Tiberius) asked of the Senate that the death (21 A.D.) of Sulpicius Quirinius might be celebrated with public obsequies. Quirinius was in no way related to the old and patrician family of the Sulpicii, but was born at Lanuvium, a municipal town. In recognition of his military and administrative ability, Augustus made him a consul (with M. Valerius Messalla 742 A.D., 12 B.C.). Soon afterwards he obtained the honor of a triumph for his victories over the Gauls, and other rimes, but who yet succeeded in gaining the people o her side; cf. Annals, iii. 22], and also of his sordid varice in his old age, although very powerful."

He is mentioned also in Dion Cassius (liv. 28), Strabo (xii.), Suetonius (Tiberius, 49), and Josephus xviii. 1, 1 sqq. Putting all these statements together, the relations of Quirinius to Palestine may be thus determined. Quirinius eaded an army in Africa, perhaps as proconsul of that province, in 7 B.C., and was in the East between 2 B.C. and 2 A.D., because Gaius Cesar went thither late in 2 B.C. or early in 1 B.C., and Tiberius returned to Rome 2 A.D. His position as head of an army in Cilicia proves that he must have been a governor of a province, or a legate of the emperor's legate. But Cilicia was probably under the jurisdiction of the legate in Syria. There is a break in our list of governors of Syria from P. Quintilius Varus (B.C. 6-4) to C. Sertius Saturninus (1 A.D.). The Senate may therefore, chronologically speaking, have been governor in 4 B.C., the year of our Lord's birth. If so, he was governor again 6-11 A.D. Much support of the supposition of a double governorship has been derived from the mutilated inscription, first published in 1765, to the effect that some one (name missing) was governor of Syria twice. But, even if Quirinius be assumed to be the one intended, he was not governor until autumn 4 B.C., or after Christ's birth. Luke probably mentions Quirinius in connection with the census, because it was completed by him, and therefore bore his name. The problem in the passage in question is not yet solved; but by the hypothesis of a double governorship its solution is measurably approached. The census, first conducted by Quirinius, was accompanied with a registration of property, for the object was taxation. A census of the Roman Empire has been reasonably inferred from the known fact that Augustus prepared a list of all the resources of his empire, which was read in the Senate after his death. Herod could not resist the execution of the emperor's order, because he was a tributary king; besides, if the census was made by Jewish officers, it would not greatly differ from a similar registration made by Herod, and need not have alarmed the Jews if proper care was taken. Because of Quirinius' experience in such matters, he was sent into Syria 6 A.D., to superintend an assessment; and it was then the rising under Judas of Galilee (Acts v. 37) took place. His vigorous efforts brought it to an end. Cf., besides the commentaries upon Luke ii. 2, the art. "Cyrenius," in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible; by Schürer, in Riem's Hdb. d. obs. Alt.; and especially A. W. Zumpt: Das Geburtsjahr Christi, Leipzig, 1869; and Schaff: Hist. Christ. Ch., vol. i., rev. ed., 1882, pp. 121-125.
RABANUS MAURUS, b. at Mayence about 776; d. there Feb. 4, 836. He was educated in the cloister-school of Fulda, and afterwards in the school of Tours, under the tutelage of Alcuin, who gave him the surname Maurus, after the friend of St. Benedict. Recalled from Tours, he was put to the head of the school in Fulda, which he soon brought to a very flourishing condition, and in 823 he was elected abbot of the monastery. Political circumstances, it would seem, induced him to resign his position as abbot in 842, and to retire to the neighboring Petersberg; but in 847 he was made archbishop of Mayence, and thus once more called to take active part in public life. An excellent teacher, he was also an excellent administrator. Under his government, his monastery and his diocese flourished. His political activity. He wrote Commentaries on the Old Testament, on the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. John, and on the Pauline Epistles; devotional books; two collections of homilies; hymns (De videndo Deo, De modo pereatitiae, etc.); text-books for his school (De clericorum institutione, De computo, De universo, etc.); polemics (De oblat. pereorum) against the synod of Mayence, which permitted Gottschalk to leave his order (Ep. ad Egid. de eucharistia) in the controversy caused by Radbertus Paschasius, etc. There is a collected edition of his works by Colvenierius, Cologne, 1627, reprinted by Migne, vols. 107-112; but it is not complete. See by the monk Rudolf; KUNSTMANN: Hrabanus M., Mayence, 1841; SPINGLER: Rab. M., Ratisbon, 1856. HAUCK.

RABAUT, Paul, b. at Bédarieux, in the department of Hérault. Jan. 9, 1719; d. at Nimes, Sept. 25, 1794; one of the most celebrated preachers of the Church of the Desert. He went in 1710 to study theology in the seminary of Lausanne, and was in 1744, by the General Synod, made pastor of Nimes. The Protestant Church in France, after the fearful calamities which had overtaken her by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the wars of the Camisards, and the horrible edicts of March 8, 1715, and May 14, 1724, was again rallying. Persecutions continued. The decrees of Feb. 1 and 16, 1745, punished participation in the assemblies with the galleys, and imposed heavy fines on the congregations in which a minister was found. In 1792 a price of a thousand livres was set on the head of Rabaut; and as he always escaped, often in a miraculous manner, his wife and children were for some time imprisoned, imprisoned, and governed, and the helpless, ill-tutored by their own passes of peace and quiet occurred. When the Prince of Conti, in 1753, retired from the court to his estates in Provence, Rabaut presented to him a memorial setting forth the demands of the Protestants; namely, the release of those sent to the galleys, restoration of the children sent to the monasteries, legal recognition of their baptism and marriage, etc. When, in 1761, the Governor of Guienne proposed to compel by force the Protestants to have their children baptized, and their marriages consecrated by a Roman-Catholic priest, and Rabaut published his Lettre pastorale, in which he advised his flock to emigrate rather than submit to such tyranny, the government, remembering the financial difficulties caused by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, dropped the matter. Meanwhile the execution of Rochette, of the three brothers Grenier, of Jean Calas, La calamité confondue de Rabaut, and, more than anything else, the denunciations of Voltaire, drew the attention and the sympathy of the public to the condition of the Protestants; and with the accession of Louis XVI. in 1774 a milder practice became prevalent, though the Edict of Toleration was not issued until 1787. The last part of his life Rabaut spent in peace, at Nimes. Two of his sons, St. Etienne (b. at Nimes, in April, 1743; executed in Paris during the reign of terror, Dec. 5, 1793) and Pierre, and (b. at Nimes, Oct. 24, 1744; d. in Paris, March 16, 1820), were also ministers of the Reformed Church. See BORREL: Biographie de Paul Rabaut et de ses trois fils, 1854, and Histoire de l'église reformée de Nimes, 1856; [MACCRACKEN: Lives of the Leaders of our Church Universal, 1879, pp. 486-492]. TH. SCHOTT.

RAB'BAH. See Ammonites.

RABBINISM denotes that form of Judaism which developed after the return from the Babylonian captivity. It falls into two great divisions.

— from the fifth century before Christ to the fifth century after Christ, and from the fifth century after Christ to the present time, each of which comprises several subdivisions; the former, four.

— from Ezra to Simeon the Just (the period of the Sopherim), from Simeon the Just to Hillel I. (the period of the Chachamim), from Hillel I. to Jehudah the Saint (the period of the Tannaim), from Jehudah the Saint to Ashe (the period of the Amoraim); the latter, three.

characteristic of rabbinism. In the schools the Mosaic law was rendered into the popular Chaldaean tongue either by literal translation or by more copious paraphrasing, and to this rendering were added explanations, illustrations, admonitions, etc. But the transition from a purely theoretical teaching of the law to a practical application of it was, of course, easy to make: and soon the teachers formed, in Jerusalem and other great cities, courts, into which all cases of litigtion were brought for adjudication. It is probable that at first the teachers were priests; but, as there was no necessity for combining those two functions, the teaching of the law, and its judicial application, gradually fell into the hands of the laity, and, as one of the principal duties of those teachers was to copy the sacred books, they received the name of Sopherim (scribes).

In the time of Simeon the Just, who lived under Alexander the Great, or a little later, the institution attained its perfection and final establishment. With Simeon the Just, however, begins the second stage in the development of rabbinism. It was quite natural, that, in the interpretation of the law, a tradition should be formed, comprising the opinions of the oldest and wisest interpreters, the Chachamim; and soon this tradition was dated back beyond the Babylonian captivity, even up to Moses. But where there is tradition, there will come schools. Antigonus, a pupil of Simeon the Just, formed the first school, and from that branch off subsequently the school of the Sadducees; for the Sadducees were a school before they became a sect. About the same time a circle of men gathered from among the masses of the people, and pledged themselves to the strictest observance, even of the most minute precepts of the law; and from this circle of men, the Chassidim, afterwards developed the sect of the Pharisees. Of still greater importance than the formation of schools was the transformation of the whole class of law-teachers into a corporation, which also took place in this period, owing to the introduction of the semichah, or ordination by the laying-on of hands. Though the semichah was not legally established until about eighty years before Christ, it, too, was dated back to Moses. Its final form it received from Hillel I.: it could be given only within the boundaries of Palestine, and only with the consent of the president of the sanhedrin, and any one who had received it was eligible to that assembly.

The principal event of the third period was the editing of the Mishnah. It was begun by Hillel as the continuator of the work of Shammai. After Shammai, the Mosaic law had been treated by the rabbis under six hundred and thirty different heads,—two hundred and forty-eight commandments and three hundred and sixty-five prohibitions, two symbolical numbers; the former referring to the parts of the human body, the latter, to the days of the year. Hillel reduced the heads to eighteen, and debahlah to six; namely, on seeds, women, festivals, property, sanctuaries, and clean and unclean. Hillel also established certain rules for the interpretation of the law: for these, his great services, he was by the Talmud styled 'the restorer of the law after Ezra.' When the Jewish state was dissolved, and the priesthood abolished, after the destruction of the temple, rabbinism was indeed the only bond which still held the Jewish nation together. After the destruction of Jerusalem, the sanhedrin moved to Jamnia, and afterwards, in the middle of the second century, to Tiberias, where for several centuries it continued to exercise its double function of a court and a school. Under Judahah a great number of scholars gathered there, and returned, when their studies were finished, to their native places with their written certificates as the teachers and judges of their people. Meanwhile a sharp rivalry sprang up between the school of Tiberias and the Babylonian schools. During the third century, rabbinical academies had been founded at Nahardea near Nisibis, at Sura on the Euphrates, and at Punibeditha on the left bank of the Lower Euphrates; and so richly were those academies decorated, that Sura could support and instruct eight hundred pupils at a time. Gradually the Babylonian academies assumed the same rights and the same authority as the school of Tiberias, and, during the latter part of the fourth century, Rabbi Asher actually stood as the centre of the whole rabbinical world. His greatest service was the final redaction of the Babylonian Talmud,—a work which occupied fully sixty years of his life. Thirty years he spent in collecting the materials; thirty others, in sifting and arranging them. For the first purpose he used his pupils. Not only had great differences developed in the exposition of the Mishnah, especially in the different schools, but variations had crept into the text of the Masser, these were carefully collected; each pupil bringing along from his native place what was found there of interpretation of the text, of recollections from the past, and expectations with respect to the future, of rules, maxims, parables, etc. The material thus collected was then critically sifted and revised by Asher, and arranged into sixty-one treatises. The treatise that had been completed, was accepted and sanctioned by a synod, and further, the rabbinical schools were closed shortly after throughout the Persian realm gave to the Babylonian Talmud the character of being something final and perfect, which it would be sacrilegious to meddle with.

RABBINISM. 1989 RABBINISM.

The second epoch of the history of rabbinism, from the fifth century of our era to the present times, has less interest to Christian theology than the first, and is partially treated under other heads,—Cabala, Midrash, Ahdabemel, Abel-Ezra, Maimonides, etc. In the fifth century the rabbinical schools were closed, not only in Persia, but also in Byzantine and in Gaul, and as yet no schools had been founded in the West. It was the suppression of the Visigoth rule, and the establishment of the Arab dominion in Europe, which first called forth the literary and scientific activity of the Jews in Europe. They studied Arabic with great eagerness, and, having mastered the language, they were not slow in taking possession of the great literary and scientific treasures to which it opened the way. They studied Arabic medicine, natural science, mathematics, and astronomy, and began to translate, not only from Arabic into Hebrew and Latin, but also from Hebrew into Arabic. Meanwhile the Babylonian Talmud was brought to Europe, and its study was taken up with great zeal, and it was translated into Arabic. But while, under the influence of Arabic civilization, there developed a liberal form of rabbinism in Spain, in the schools of Cordova, Granada, and Lucena, a strictly orthodox form was developed in Gaul and Italy. In the schools of Narbonne, Toulouse, Bari, Otranto, and Mayence, philosophy was looked upon as something dangerous, and the study of the Talmud was pursued with an indescribable pedantry. It was the great problem of Maimonides to reconcile these two tendencies; and he succeeded, though it became a rule that no Jewish student was allowed to study philosophy until he had filled his twenty-fifth year.
In the thirteenth century the persecutions of the Inquisition began to tell on the character of rabbinitism. The schools were closed, and only the study of the Cabala flourished. No doubt the roots of the Cabala were as old as rabbinitism itself; but, while the Cabala had hitherto existed as a branch only, it now became the principal stem.
To some it was a Christian garment, beneath which they concealed the genuinely Jewish ideas; to others, it became the bridge which led them into the Mohammedan mosque or into the Christian Church; others, again, used it as a means of magic and fraud. An influence of an opposite character was derived from the invention of the printing-press, which once more brought rabbinitism into living contact with the general public. In the sixteenth century rabbinitism has no independent value.

In the inscriptionsthe titlerab-sak is used particularly in connection with a military officer sent in Venice, 1320; the works of Rabbi Jacob ben Chajin of Tunis, in the edition of the second Bomberg Bible, Venice, 1529; the works of Elias Levita, in Venice, 1538; and schools were opened in Venice, Amsterdam, Brody, Lemberg, Lublin, Cracow, Prague, Furth, and Frankfort. In these schools the two different tendencies, the liberal and the orthodox, could still be observed, and were known under the names of the Portuguese-Italian and the Polish-German. But there was no direct contest between them; and in many places, as, for instance, in Amsterdam, they existed peaceably beside each other, until in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries the opposition disappeared altogether, and gave room for the development of other school-differences. See the art. Israer, and for literature, besides that article, those mentioned above. [PRESSEK.

RABBULA. See Rabulas.

RAB'SARIS. Not a proper name, but the title of an Assyrian mentioned in 2 Kings xviii. 17, Jer. xxxix. 3, 13. The meaning is commonly given as "chief eunuch;" but Schrader questions whether σαραζ, which in Hebrew means "eunuch," has this sense in Assyrian, and thinks, that, if the name was the Hebrew Bible, a translation, it would be in the plural (rab'sarim). See RIEHM's Wörterbuch in loco.

RAB'SHAKEH, the title of an Assyrian officer who was sent by Sennacherib to Hezekiah to demand the surrender of Jerusalem. According to the Hebrew form, the title would mean "chief cup-bearer;" but, as it is a transliteration of the Assyrian titlerab-sak, it means "chief officer."
In the inscriptions the title rab-sak is used particularly in connection with a military officer sent by Tiglath-pileser II. to Tyre. See SCHRADER: Die Ke'dinschriften und das Alte Testament, 2d ed., 1882.

RABULAS, more correctly Rabulla, Bishop of Edessa, the predecessor of Ibas; d. Aug. 8, 435.
He governed his diocese with great authority, and successfully kept down the various heretical sects until the Nestorian controversy began. Some of his letters, some rules for monks, some hymns, and a sermon delivered in Constantinople, are still extant. See J. J. OVERBECK: Ephraemi Syri, Rabulie Edesseni, altiorumque Opera Selecta, Oxford, 1865. His prose works were translated into German by Bickell for the Kempten Bibliothek of close, 1874.

RACCA (Matt. v. 22), a term of contempt frequent among the Jews in Christ's time and since.
It is the Aramaic reka ("empty"), and expresses, therefore, folly, but is not so opprobrious a term as "fool," which brands one as wicked and blasphemous.

RACOVIAN CATECHISM. See Socianism.

RACHEL. See Jacob.

RABBERTUS. Paschasius, Abbot of Corbie in Picardy, and one of the most prominent ecclesiastical writers of the Carolingian age. Of his personal life, only very little is known; and that little is gleaned exclusively from scattered notices in his own works, and from the panegyrics of Engelmodus, bishop of Soissons, printed in Migne, Patr. Lat., vol. 120. The cita found in Mabillon (Act. Sac., IV. 2) dates from the end of the eleventh or the beginning of the twelfth century, and has no independent value. He was born towards the close of the eighth century, in Soissons or near by, and, as his mother died soon after his birth, he was brought up by the Bene dictine nuns of the place. In 814 he entered the monastery of Corbie, and became one of the most intimate pupils of the Abbot Adalhard, a relative of Charlemagne. In due time he advanced to the teachership (among his pupils were the younger Adalhard, Hl-pmann, Od. Warinus, and others); and in 844, after the death of Abbot Isaac, he was himself elected abbot. As such he was present at the synod of Paris (846) and of that of Chiersy (849); but the gradual collapse of discipline which had begun immediately after the death of Adalhard, and his own inability to restore order, led him to resign his position in 851. He lived long enough after that time to write several important works; but, with the exception of this one fact, nothing is known of his life in retirement.

Ten works by him have come down to us;
namely, Expositio in Matthaeum, of which the first four books were written before he became abbot, while the rest, like the Expositio in Panthum XLIV. and Expositio in Epistolas de Dominio, date from after his abdication. De Fide, Spe, el Charitate belongs to the earlier part of his life.
De vita Adalardi was written in 826; De corpore et sanguine Christi, in 831; Epitaphium Arsenii, in 836; De partu virginis, on the contrary, he wrote
as an old man. De passione S. Rufini et Valerii, was written while abbot; and Epistola ad Frudegardum, after his retirement. A complete and critical edition of his collected works does not exist.
The best is that by Sirmond, Paris, 1618, which has been reprinted in Bibl. Patr. Max., vol. xiv., Lyons, and in Migne, Patl. Latin, vol. 120, in a revised and augmented form.

The most important of the writings of Radbertus is his De corpore et sanguine Domini, the first comprehensive treatise produced in the Christian Church on the Lord's Supper, and also the first to call forth a controversy concerning that doctrine. Previously two almost diametrically opposite or at all events contradictory views had run peaceably beside each other; one considering the consecrated elements of the Lord's Supper as mere symbols, or tokens of the body and blood of Christ, while the other saw in the bread and wine a physical transformation of the actual body and blood of Christ, — a transubstantiation. Radbertus gives an account of both these views: and the only thing really new in his book is his attempt to combine them. In the combination or reconciliation, however, the Augustinian or transubstantiation view is really absorbed by the traditional or transubstantiation view; and, to the eyes of the later Roman-Catholic Church, Radbertus stands as the champion of true Catholicism. His book was attacked, however, both by Rattramnus and by Rabanus Maurus. In another of his works (De partu virginis) he also sided with those tendencies of coarse and sensual mysticism which at that time were spreading in the church, anticipating the declaration of the dogma of the immaculate conception by more than ten centuries. See Edhard: Das Dogma vom heil. Abendmahl, i. p. 406; Thomasius: Dogmengeschichte, ii. p. 20; [Estert: Gesch. d. lat. Lit. d. Mittelalters, ii. 280. See also art. transubstantiation]. Steitz.

RAFFLES, Thomas, D.D., LL.D., a distinguished Congregationalist; was b. in London, May 17, 1758, and from 1812 till his death, Aug. 18, 1863, was pastor in Liverpool. He published Life and Ministry of Thomas Spencer, 1813, A Tour on the Continent, 1817, Lectures on Christian Faith and Practice, 1820, and some poems. Eight of his hymns were printed by Dr. Collyer in 1812, though most of them were written in later years. A few of them have been widely used. His memoir, by his son, T. S. Raffles, appeared, 1884.

RAGGED SCHOOLS, the term for those schools in which vagrant children are taught, and thus, in many cases, kept from a criminal career. The earliest such school is said to have been started in Rome, towards the close of the last century, by an illiterate mason, Giovanni Borgia. In 1819 John Pounds, an uneducated cobbler of Ports-

RA'HAB ( Josh., ii., vi. 22-25). Her act has won for her the roll of the heroes of faith (xi.): in James ii. 25 she is quoted as being justified by works. Clement of Rome says she was saved on account of her faith and hospitality, and her use of the scarlet line was prophetic of redemption through the blood of Christ (Ad Cor., i. 12). This latter idea became a favorite view, and was supported by St. Martyr, Origen, and many later writers. — Rahab ( רָהָב, "tumbling") appears as the poetic and symbolic name for Egypt (Ps. lxxxvii. 4, lxxxix. 10; Isa. ii. 9). The reference seems to be to the confusion attendent upon the overthrow of Pha-

RAINERIO SACCHONI, b. at Piacenza; d. in 1590; was for seventeen years one of the most active preachers of the Cathari in Lombardy, but was converted, entered the Dominican order, and became one of the most zealous adversaries of his former co-religionists. The Pope made him inquisitor of Lombardy. In 1250 he wrote a Summa de Catharism et Leonismo, not polemical, but probably intended only for the inquirers in historical and statistical notices of great interest. Copies were made of it in Italy, France, Ger-
RALEIGH, ALEXANDER, D.D., Independent, b. in Kirkcudbright, Scotland, Jan. 3, 1817; d. in London, Monday, April 19, 1880. After a village-school education and a brief business experience in Liverpool (1833-40), he studied theology at Blackburn College, and was ordained pastor of the Independent Chapel at Greenock, Scotland, 1844. Ill health compelled his resignation in 1849; from 1850 to 1855, he was settled at Rotherham, in the south of Yorkshire. A price was set upon his head. In 1705, 1722, and 1724, several attempts were made to kill him; but he was popularly believed to have incited them to attack the Protestant settlers on the coast. A price was set upon his head. In 1705, 1722, and 1724, Norridgewock was attacked by the settlers, with the result, that the first time the chapel was burnt; the second time the rebuilt chapel and Rale's house were pillaged, and his papers carried off, among them a manuscript dictionary of Abnaki, now in Harvard College library, printed in the Memoirs of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, edited by John Pickering (Cambridge, 1839); and, the third time, he and seven Indians who had undertaken to defend him were killed. See his Memoir by Convers Francis, in Sparks's American Biography, 2d series, vol. vii.

RALEIGH, Sir Walter, b. at Hayes Farm, Devonshire, 1552; executed at Westminster, Oct. 29, 1618, on a sentence passed 1603; wrote not only The Discovery of Guiana (1598) and History of the World (1614), but verses enough (though some attributed to him are of uncertain origin) to show that he might have excelled in sacred poetry as in active enterprise. His splendid talents, heroic character, adventurous life, immense services to civilization, and flagrantly unjust condemnation, are abundantly known. At least five biographies of him have appeared; e.g., by Edward Edwards, London, 1888. His Poems were collected by Sir Egerton Brydges, 1814; and his Complete Works, in 8 vols., at Oxford, 1839.

RAMBACH isthe name of several German theologians more or less noticeable. — August Jakob Rambach, b. at Quedlinburg, May 28, 1777; d. in Hamburg, Sept. 9, 1851; studied at Halle, and was appointed pastor in Hamburg in 1802. He distinguished himself as a hymnologist, and published Martin Luthers Verdiensturn den Kirchen- gesang, Hamburg, 1813; and Anthologie christlicher Gesänge, Leipzig, 1817-23, 6 vols. — Johann Jakob Rambach, b. at Halle, Feb. 24, 1693; d. at Giessen, April 19, 1735; studied at Halle; was appointed professor at Giessen in 1781; and exercised a considerable influence as a mediator between Pien-tism and the Wolffian philosophy. He published Institutiones hermeneuticae sacræ, 1794 (6th ed., 1793), Wohltuntenrichter Cathetel, 1724 (10th ed., 1762), Geistliche Gedichte, 1740, etc. See his Biography by Daniel Büttner, Leipzig, 1737; and Theodor Hansen: Die Familie Ramonch, Gotha, 1875. CARL BERTRAEU.

RAMONES. See Exodus.

RAMMOHUN ROY, Rajah, Hindu religious reformer; b. in the district of Burdwan, province of Bengal, 1772; d. at Stapleton Park, near Bristol, Eng., Sept. 27, 1833. He was a Brahman, and strictly educated; but, under the influence of the Koran, he early renounced polytheism.
He translated the Vedanta, or the Resolution of all the Vedas, the theology of the Vedas, from Sanscrit into Bengalee and Hindostanee, prepared also an abridgment of it, and in 1816 published an English translation of it, the Cena Upanishad (1816), and the Isophanishad. In 1820 he published, at Calcutta and London, selections from the New Testament, the Precepts of Jesus, the Guide to Peace and Happiness, in English, Sanscrit, and Bengalee, reprinted in Boston, 1828. By this publication he excited the hatred of the Vedas, and his Institutiones Dialecticae (an exposition of his own logical system), he stirred up such a wrath among the philosophers that he was arraigned before a royal court as an impudent seducer of youth, and condemned to perpetual silence on the subject, under pain of "confiscation and bodily punishment." After the accession of Henry II., however, in 1547, he once more obtained freedom to speak and write through the good offices of the Cardinal of Lorraine; but he was soon again entangled in embroilments of various kinds. He was a man of reforms; and his reformatory zeal went far beyond the field of logic, dialectics, and grammar. After the colloqui of Poissy, 1592, he openly embraced Protestantism; and, though he retained his chair at the Sorbonne as professor of philosophy, he had to flee for his life, whenever the two religious parties took to arms. He finally fell as a victim of the Massacre of St. Bartholomow. The logical system which he proposed to substitute for that of Aristotle has not proved of great benefit to mankind; though it found many illustrious adepts,— Milton, Arminius, Chytraeus, Sturm, and others,—and formed, if not a school, at least a party, the Ramists. But his persistent and passionate opposition to scholasticism took effect not only in Paris, but also in Glasgow, Wit-tenberge, and even in Bologna, and was the precursor of Descartes and Pascal. Of his numerous writings, there is no collected edition. His posthumous work (Commentarii de religione christiana, Francfort, 1576) was often reprinted, and found much favor in the Reformed Church.
His Life was written by J. Thé. Freigiu, Basel, 1574, Theophil. Banosius, Francfort, 1576, and Nicolas de Nascel, Paris, 1590.

RANCE, Armand Louis Le Bouthillier, de, b. in Paris, Jan. 9, 1626; d. at Soligny-la-Trappe,
Oct. 12, 1700. At ten years of age he was a canon of Notre-Dame de Paris, abbot of La Trappe, and prior of several monasteries; at thirteen he published a critical edition of Anacreon;
at eighteen he was one of the most conspicuous figures in the gay and sensuous society of Paris; and at twenty-five he was a judge of the court of the sovereign of Delhi, for the purpose of obtaining from the East-India Company an increase of their annual stipend to him, and successfully performed his mission. While in England he worshipped with the Unitarians. The fiftieth anniversary of his death was celebrated at Bristol, Eng., Sept. 27, 1888. The address was de-ivered by Prof. Max Müller. See Carpenter:
Last Days of Raja Ram Mohun Roy in England, with a Biographical Sketch, London, 1886.

RAMUS, Petrus (Pierre de la Ramée), b. at Cuth, a village in Vermandois, 1515; d. in Paris, Aug. 20, 1572. When he was twelve years old, he came, walking on his bare feet, to Paris to study there; and when he was but a poor, and retired to La Trappe, where he spent his property, and distributed the money among the rest of his life, and established the severest discipline ever heard of. See Trappists. He resigned all his benefits, sold all his property, and distributed the money among the poor, and retired to La Trappe, where he spent the rest of his life, and established the severest discipline ever heard of. See Trappists. He was a prolific writer: Traité de la saintéité et des dercours de la vie monastique, 1683, Exposition de la règle de saint Bénoin, 1680, etc. His Life was written by Léon de Tillemont, 1719, and Chateauriand, 1844.

RANDALL, Benjamin. See Freewill Battists.

RANDOLPH MACON COLLEGE, located at Ashland, near Richmond, Va., is under the control of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South.
It bears the name of two honored American statesmen,—John Randolph of Roanoke, and Nathaniel Macon of North Carolina. It enjoys the distinction of being the oldest Methodist college in the United States, having been begun in Februry, 1830, though it did not commence its actual work of instruction until two years later. It was first located at Boydton, Mecklenburg County, Va., where it remained until 1868, when, on account of the inaccessibility of its location and a change in its patronizing territory, it was removed to its RANTERS. 1994

RATHERIUS.

present location at Ashland. Although it suffered heavily by the late war, losing almost its entire endowment, it has yet prospered since its removal to its present commanding location, having reached a patronage of 250 students. The moral and religious character of its students so distinctly entitles it to be called a Christian institution of learning. It is one of the most widely and favorably known colleges in the South. Among its graduates now living, and filling important positions, are found two bishops (H. X. McTyeire and J. C. Granbery), eight presidents, and twenty-two professors in various institutions of learning; besides many others now filling prominent positions in civil, political, and professional life. The best Southern scholarship has always been found in its faculty. The following distinguished men have served as presidents: Rev. Stephen Olin, D.D. (1832-38), Landon C. Garland, LL.D. (1838-46, now chancellor of Vanderbilt University), Rev. William A. Smith, D.D. (1846-55), Thomas A. Johnson, A.M. (1860-65), Rev. James A. Duncan, D.D. (1865-77), and Rev. W. W. Bennett, D.D., the present incumbent.

W. F. TILLET.

RANTERS, an Antinomian sect of the Commonwealth period, which Fuller, in his Church History, associates with the Familists. Ross, in his Representation (p. 287, ed., 1655), describes them as making an open profession of lewdness, practising a community of women, etc. In An Account of the Turbulines, etc., at their public meetings. Fuller, in his Aveseaeia (p. 287, ed., 1655), describes them as believing themselves incapable of sinning, and fancying themselves in Adam's state, as he was in paradise before the fall, of stripping themselves naked (like the Turbulines, etc.) at their public meetings. The name was also at one time applied to the Primitive Methodists, who separated themselves from the main body of Methodists, and were distinguished by their violent bodily manifestations.

RAPHAEL (the divine healer), in Jewish angelology "one of the seven holy angels who present the prayers of the saints, and who go in and out before the glory of the Holy One" (Tob. xii. 15); also said to be one of the four archangels (Michael, Uriel, Gabriel, and Raphael) who stand round the throne of God. In Tobit he plays the part of guide to Tobias, for whom he works miracles. In ecclesiastical tradition he appears as the herald to the shepherds of the world's "great joy."

RAPHAEL, Morris Jacob, Ph.D., Jewish rabbi; b. at Troyes in Champagne, France, 1040; d. there July 13, 1105. (See De Rossi : Dizionario storico degli autori Ebrei, vol. iv. p. 21) He is often spoken of simply as Yarchi; and how that misunderstanding arose is not known. But he did not belong to that circle of rabbis who assumed the surname of Yarchi from their native place, Lunel in Perpignan ("Iuna, yתא). He spent seven years in travelling through Italy, Greece, Palestine, Egypt, Persia, and Germany, and was well versed in philology, philosophy, medicine, astronomy, law, etc. Besides commentaries on twenty-three treatises of the Talmud, commentaries on the Midrash Rabbah, a book on medicine, etc., he wrote commentaries on all the books of the Old Testament, giving both the literal sense and the allegorical explanations of the older rabbins. These commentaries, written in Hebrew mixed up with Latin, Greek, and Old-French words, and in a condensed, obscure style, attracted, nevertheless, much attention, both among Jews and Christians. The first book printed in Hebrew was his commentary on the Pentateuch, Reggio, 1475. The later editions are quite numerous; and there is a complete Latin translation by Breithaupt,—Prophets, Psalms, and Job (1713), the historical books (1714), the Pentateuch (1740). See J. C. Wolf : Biblioth. Hebraica, 1715-33, 4 vols. quarto; I. M. Jost : Geschichte des Judenthums, 1857; Bloch : Lebensgeschichte des Salomo Jizchaki, 1840.

The name Rashi is the combination of the initial letters, שרא, of the full name and title, רashi, ורא, i.e., Rabbi Shelomoh ben Yitz'haki. De Rossi's Dizionario, referred to above, has been translated into German by Dr. Hamberger, Leipzig, 1839. Rashi's Commentary on the Pentateuch was translated into German by Lucas Prague, 1833-38. Wilhelm Pressel.

RASKOLNIKS. See Russian Sects.

RATHERIUS. b. at Liege about 890; d. at Namur, April 25, 974. He was brought up a monk in the monastery of Lobach (German) or Lobbes (French), in the Hainaut, and became prior of what was still left, from the Carolingian age, of education and scholarship. Through his incidental connections with King Hugo of Provence he became bishop of Verona in 931, but was deposed and imprisoned on account of... two terms of great prominence in modern theology are RATIONALISM and SUPRANATURALISM.

RATIONALISM.

RATIONALISM and SUPRANATURALISM, two terms of great prominence in modern theology, are aptly defined by Fr. V. Reinhard, in his Geschichte der Schrift, 1810. He says,—

"In rationalism, reason is the sole arbiter. What reason cannot comprehend and accept can never form part of the rationalist's conviction. His consciousness is homogeneous, and his intellect consistent throughout. To him, Scripture is like any other book. He accepts it, only when it agrees with his opinions, and then only as an illustration and affirmation, not as an authority. The supranaturalist, on the other hand, is no less in harmony with his fundamental maxim. In matters of religion, Scripture is to him what reason is to the rationalist. Though he, too, employs reason, he employs it only to search and judge those claims to a divine origin which Scripture contains no mystery, and Tindal (d. 1733), that deists called forth a long series of apologetical writings, though without thereby producing any sharp and decisive contrast. Herbert of Cherbury (d. 1648) taught that the innate ideas of reason and the general contents of revelation were identical, but that the latter was, nevertheless, necessary in order to restore the original but almost ruined natural religion. Around this idea of a natural religion, deism gathered its champions, and the prevailing latitudinarianism, emphasizing that what is common to all religions, is naturally accepted unconditionally."

Of the two terms, rationalism is the older. It was first used by Amos Comenius, in his Theologia naturalis, 1691, where it was applied to the theologians of the Socinian school, to naturalists and deists. It is probable, however, that Comenius was not the inventor of the name "rationalists," as the form "rationalists" occurs before his time, and was applied to the Aristotelian humanists of the school of Helmstädt. At its first appearance the opposite of rationalism was not designated as supranaturalism, but simply as protestantism (see Gabler: Nemenes theolog. Journal, Nuremberg, 1801). As the champions, however, of protestantism, that is, of the theology based upon Scripture as the divine revelation, generally designated their adversaries, not as rationalists, but as naturalists, it naturally came to pass that their own views were designated as supranaturalism, and not as suprarationalism, or irrationalism, though the latter designation occurs. When the term "supranaturalism" was brought into use it is not known; but it is found in Gabler.

About the middle of the eighteenth century the two opponents stood fully developed, confronting each other, and as such continued to be. The finishing strokes, both types received from the philosophy of Wolff; but long preparations preceded the consummation, and it is interesting to notice the different characteristics which the incipient movement exhibits under the different national conditions. In England the rapidly increasing deism called forth a long series of apologetical writings, though without thereby producing any sharp and decisive contrast. Hobbes (d. 1679) disgusted people by representing the absolute authority of the king as the sole foundation of positive Christianity, while Locke (d. 1704) charmed them by his demonstration of the reasonableness of Christianity; but both contributed, each in his way, to strengthen the doctrine of that common sense in accordance with which Toland (d. 1722) could proclaim that Christianity contains no mystery, and Tindal (d. 1733), that the Gospels are simply a republication of the religion of nature. But the curious fact is, that this relation between Christianity and natural religion was recognized by the apologists: yes, Butler (d. 1751) even accepted Tindal's proposition concerning the republication of the religion of nature. Indeed, by accommodating themselves to the views of their adversaries, and confusing their defence of the authority of Scripture to a strictly scientific demonstration, the English apologists came to point nearly in the same direction as their antagonists; and the representatives of the type of supranaturalism must be sought for among the dissenters. In the Netherlands two currents may be observed; one issuing from a purely philosophical, and the other from a pietistic, religious principle, but both setting directly and with vigour against orthodox Calvinism. From the first proposition of Descartes (d. 1650), De omnibus dubitandum est ("every thing must be doubted"), even the confession of the Established Church could not hope to vindicate itself as an exception; and his second proposition, "cogito ergo sum," ("I think, therefore I am"), gave to all speculation a merely subjective basis, from which the objectivity of a denominational creed could never be reached, except by a leap, or surreptitiously. Still worse, in his Tractatus theologico-politicus Spinoza openly attacked the authority of Scripture, and demanded the whole question transferred from a religious to a historical court. No wonder, therefore, that towards the close of the eighteenth century, the Netherlands swarmed with atheists, and critical questions rose to the surface even within theological circles, especially since the other current, the RATIONALISM.

Dutch pietism, — rapidly developing from a cautious emphasis on life as against doctrine (Coccoc- jus, d. 1689), into an open tendency of separation from the Established Church (Labadie, d. 1674), ran in an almost parallel direction. Pietism generally takes a much greater interest in life than in science, the result of which is, that it often allows science to shrivel into a mere formal demonstration. On account of this indifferatism to the extension of truth for truth's own sake, pietism may come to consider Scripture simply as a practical means to a practical end, and not keep the sources of all truth ever flowing, and ever renewing and refreshing life; the practical end of pietist life so often shrinks into a narrow brotherhood of the faithful, with no interest for, but perhaps even antipathy against, the church universal. Thus pietism is never well fitted to take up arms in defence of supranaturalism: on the contrary, its further development it generally shows a tendency towards rationalism. But in France, in the middle of the eighteenth century, even this semblance of an opposition to rationalism disappeared, and the whole movement was directed by the encyclopedists. Pascal's influence had died out; and the adversaries of the encyclopedists were either petrified in mere externals, or lost in indifferentism. But the finest fruits, in a religious aspect, which the encyclopedists produced, were the very affected enthusiasm of Rousseau for Christ and the Gospels, and Voltaire's very natural passion for toleration.

What has been said of pietism in the Netherlands is true also of pietism in Germany. Though it was only the eccentricities and excesses of some enthusiasts which actually led into apostasy and free-thinking, even in its noblest form pietism could not help acting on orthodoxy as a dissolver. It was adverse to the scholastic form in which the orthodox system was presented; it was lukewarm to the idea of pure doctrine for purity's own sake; it was well disposed to those who labored for a union between the Lutheran and the Reformed churches; and it was firmly determined to make religion, first and foremost, a practical issue: that is to say, pietism was indifferent where orthodoxy underwent certain changes which actually weakened it. It is true that Georg Calixtus (d. 1658) occupied a somewhat insalubrious position. It is also true that Musaeus (d. 1681), so famous for his attack upon Herbert of Cherbury and Spinoza, was compelled to abjure all systemet. But the Carpzovs and the Calovs, nevertheless, soon ceased to sound the keynote. Distinctions were adopted between "against," and "above" reason (non contra, sed supra rationem), between regenerated and unregenerated reason (ratio renatu and ratio irregetina), between a mechanical and a normal use of reason (usus organicus and usus normatius); and, though these distinctions did not actually shake the authority of Scripture, they certainly moved the centre of gravitation on which that authority rested. The old professors fought valiantly against the approaching danger; but they saw with regret and anxiety how the young students dropped off, and fell into pietism, or disbeliefs of various kinds. Such was the state of German theology when the period of enlighten-} ment (Aufklärung) dawned upon it. It was double-faced,— at once popular and philosophical. The popular light was at first introduced from England, France, and the Netherlands; but it soon found in Friedrich II. of Prussia its social guaranty, in Christian Thomasius (d. 1728) its theological exponent, and in Gellert and a swarm of co-workers its literary propagators, who in a light, genteel, half-satirical manner, swept away all pedantry, scholasticism, and other forms of old-fogym. Wolff was the bringer of the philosophical light. He established a sharp distinction between theologiana naturalis and theologiana revelata. In the former, nothing is admitted but that which can be logically demonstrated and scientifically proved: in the latter any thing is accepted which is taught in Scripture. And the relation between those two dominions is this: all that is valid in theologiana naturalis must be found in theologiana revelata, but not all that is found in theologiana revelata is valid in theologiana naturalis. To one on which true rationalism corresponds that between rationalism and supranaturalism; and the contest between the two latter is, so to speak, symbolized by Wolff's own life. In 1723 he was driven away from Halle with threats of the gibbet; in 1740 he was brought back in a triumphal chariot.

In the group of supranaturalists which formed under the direct influence of the philosophy of Wolff, S. J. Baumgarten (d. 1757) occupies the most prominent place, and by his side J. D. Michaelis (d. 1791). In Germany as in England the relation in which supranaturalism placed itself to the advancing rationalism was apologetical; and it cannot be denied that the Wolffian school, with its elaborate method of demonstration, its many new cosmological and anthropological ideas, and its bright, ethical optimism, furnished the apologists with much excellent material; though, on the other hand, it is evident, that, by its perpetual harping on the principium rationis suficientis, it often drew the whole subject down into a lower sphere by teaching people to content themselves with the probable and the useful, instead of demanding truth and goodness. (See Zorn: Petinoneologie, 1742.) More independent of Wolff are Matteus and the Netherland school of theology, Matthias Pfaff (d. 1760), Ötinger (d. 1782), and others. The Wurttemberg school is thoroughly biblical in its character, and its work was principally exegetical. Pfaff concedes that natural religion is held in high esteem by Scripture; but he adds that it is utterly insufficient to salvation, because it knows nothing of Christ: it has only a usus pædagogicus. Exegesis, he asserts, is the only foundation on which true theology can be built up: and he laments, when seeing how people's hearts have been turned away from Scripture "since theology put on the cloak of philosophy." Ötinger brought into the school a mystico-theosophical element; and he, too, complained of the meagre reasonableness of the Wolffian demonstrations. Entirely without any connection with, but still belonging to, the supranaturalist group stand the two great apologists of the period. — Bonnet (d. 1783) and Haller (d. 1777).

Between supranaturalism and rationalism, Lessing (d. 1781) forms the transition. His fundamental idea, that God educates the human race by revelations, every supranaturalist will accept.
But when he adds that the contents of the divine revelations are essentially identical with the contents of human reason, and would easily be recognized as such but for the peculiarity which has been given to it, for the sake of greater impressiveness, hesitation begins. And when he goes on, and declares that none of the historically given religions is or can be the absolute religion, because its dogmas, though they may contain eternal truth, must be set forth in expressions belonging to a certain time and place, and consequently transitory, he has arrived at the threshold of rationalism. By the decisive distinction he makes between that which is eternal in a religion and that which is historical, he is connected directly with J. S. Semler (d. 1791), the father of modern biblical criticism, and the representative of rationalism in its first stage. In his critical exhibitions of the transient features of the Christian revelation, he creates the sight of the eternal kernel, which he replaced with a somewhat vague idea of a sublime teaching, conducive, if not indispensable, to the social and moral development of mankind. Personally, however, he was not without piety, and in all practical relations he was quite conservative. He attacked Baseiow, the Wöstenbüttel Fragments, and Bahrdt, though, perhaps, not without a feeling that he fought against disagreeable consequences drawn from his own premises; and he held that the State had a right to decide what should be taught in the school and in the pulpit, and what not. It was only in the theoretical questions of theology that he was liberal in the application of the principle of "accommodation," his own invention, according to which any idea set forth in Scripture could be put quietly out of the way as a mere accommodation, from the side of the author or of Christ, to reigning circumstances. There was a long distance between him and the Wöstenbüttel Fragments, whose publication began in 1774, and, again, between the Wöstenbüttel Fragments and Bahrdt (d. 1792). Semler never criticized the character of Jesus and the apostles. It was the Wöstenbüttel Fragments which led the way in that field, representing Christ as simply a reformer of Judaism, as a mere enthusiast, as a visionary, whose schemes of establishing a kingdom of Palestine were miserably wrecked. But Bahrdt followed up the track; and, to the intense disgust of the rationalists themselves, he represented Christ as a coarse naturalist, who, from mere regards of prudence, concealed his real plan, that of destroying all positive religion, and only communicated his wisdom to a select few, whom he formed into a kind of secret society. Its headquarters rationalism had in Berlin; its popular organ, in Nicolai's Allgemeine Deutsche Bibliothek, which began to be published in 1765. As a representative example of its scientific productivity may be mentioned Teller's Worterbuch des N. T., 1772. In Nicolai's periodical, which in its time was considered one of the great instruments of German civilization, everything which in English or French philosophy smacked of passionate research or audacious aspirations was carefully cut off, and that which was served was cautiously toned down to a most insipid palaver. In Teller's Worterbuch all the specifically biblical ideas were transformed into commonplace trivialities of general morals, which naturally led the author to the idea of the perfectibility of Christianity. Generally speaking, the course of rationalism, from its origin to the appearance of Kant, may be described as a movement from Christology to religion in general, then from religion in general to mere morality, and finally, from morality to eudemonism, the doctrine of happiness.

As the philosophy of Wolff had proved decisive for the final development of both supranaturalism and rationalism, it was to be expected that the philosophy of Kant would also exercise its influence. And so it did. When Kant, on the one side, theoretically, completely excluded the supranatural as something to which reason could enter into no relation whatever, and yet, on the other side, practically re-introduced it into reason as a necessary postulate, he seemed simply to open the way for the idea of a divine revelation. And, indeed, there were quite a number of theologians—Stäudlin (d. 1828), K. L. Nitzsch (d. 1831), Ammon (d. 1849), and others—who attempted to infuse new life into supranaturalism by deducing the necessity of faith in the Christian mysteries from Kantian premises. Stäudlin never grew tired of asserting that the true conception of Christianity could be built up only on the basis of a union between rationalism and supranaturalism, whereas the school received the name of rational supranaturalism, or supranatural rationalism. But it soon became apparent that the hybrid had not strength enough to live. The philosophical substructure could not bear the theological building reared upon it. One concession had to be made to rationalism after the other; and the school gradually disappeared, while those who took its place—Hannam, Claudius, Harms, and others—built on another foundation, pursued other aspirations, and soon dropped the whole question of rationalism and supranaturalism.

Still more affinity rationalism showed to the Kantian philosophy; and all the more serious rationalists among the theologians accepted the Kantian deduction of morality as a true liberation from the vulgar eudemonism, in which they felt half suffocated. But rationalism had at this time spent all its power of production. It could do nothing but repeat its old proposition,—that reason is the highest arbiter, even in matters of religion; that Christianity is perfectible, etc.

Thus Röhr, in his Briefe über den Rationalismus, 1813, explains, that "that which the supranaturalists call Christology forms no part of his system, which is simply the exposition of a religion taught by Jesus, but not of a religion of which Jesus is the subject." The fundamental principle of rationalism he finds in the non-exclusion of intermediate causes. "No experience," he claims, "has ever found evidence of a direct, immediate interference of God: nay, the very notion of the supranatural causes a feeling of disgust." The religion of Jesus can become the universal religion, only so far as it is the religion of pure reason; and only those of its propositions can be accepted as universal truth which have been recognized by the collected reason of the human race. Not so very different from this is Weisheider: Institutiones theolog., 1815. But though, in the second decade of the present century, the rationalists were still in possession both of the church and the school, they not only produced nothing new, but they actually began to pine away, from inanition; and the new theological schools which arose beside them (those of Schleiermacher, Feuerbach, etc.), beg another question to the question of rationalism and supranaturalism as were the successors of their supranaturalist adversaries.

LIT. — HAHN: De rationalismo indole, 1827; STAUDLIN: Geschichte des Rationalismus und Supernaturalismus, 1829; THOLUCK: Vorlesungen über die Geschichte des Rationalismus, 1868; HURST: Der deutsche Protestantismus, 1850, 3d ed.; F. DE ROUGEMONT: Les deux cœurs, 1874; [histories of rationalism by LECKY (London, 1865, 2 v.), and HURST (N.Y., 1865); CAIRNS: Unbelief in the 18th Century, Edinb., 1881; and THOLUCK: Art. in Herzog, I. xii. 537-544. ROBERT KUBEL.

RATISBON, The Conference of (April 27-May 25, 1514), and a great literary controversy was occasioned by the publication of the Conference of Worms, 1540, and as the last attempt by Charles V. at solving the religious confusion of Germany without arms. The interlocutors were Gropper, Pflug, and Eck on the one side, Butzer, Pistorius, and Melanchthon on the other. Besides the presidents, Countpalatine Friedrich and Cardinal Granvella, six witnesses were present, among whom was Jacob Sturm. As basis, was used, not the Confessio Augustana, but the so-called Ratibon Book, in twenty-two articles. In spite of Eck's opposition, an agreement was arrived at concerning the article on justification; and the Roman Catholic hierarchy, discipline, sacraments, etc., no agreement was possible; and the only real result of the conference was the general conviction that the doctrinal authority of the church, the hierarchy, discipline, etc., was the principal, and indeed the sole, condition of justification. But with respect to the articles on the doctrinal authority of the church, the hierarchy, discipline, etc., no agreement was possible; and the only real result of the conference was the general conviction that the religious split in Germany was not to be healed by a theological formula.
Giessen, and at the end of one year was complimented with an appointment to an ordinary professorship in the university of Heidelberg. But on some public occasion, before leaving Giessen, he expressed political sentiments which brought upon him displeasure with the government. A friend warned him of danger, and urged him to escape. He had at midnight a final interview of two hours with his father, and then took refuge in America, 1831. He located at Easton, Penn., and, being a total stranger, earned a livelihood for some months by teaching music. But his abilities as a scholar, and his high character, soon becoming known, he was made professor of the German language in Lafayette College.

In June, 1832, he removed to York, Penn., and took charge of the high school, which in 1829 had been established by the German Reformed Church in connection with her theological seminary. In the annual meeting held in October of this year he was elected professor of biblical literature. The high school was removed to Mercersburg in the fall of 1830, and incorporated as Marshall College. Dr. Rauch was chosen president; and in the twofold capacity of president of Marshall College, and professor of biblical literature in the theological seminary, he labored with zeal and enthusiasm for the last five years of his life.

As a scholar, Dr. Rauch excelled in classical literature, in natural history, in moral philosophy, and in mental science. He was at home, also, in the sphere of aesthetics, and had his mind richly stored with the creations of genius as they belong to the fine arts generally. The German philosophy, with all its bewildering abstractions, was for him the subject of familiar knowledge; while it commanded, also, his general confidence and respect. He saw in its different cardinal systems, zeal and enthusiasm for the last live years of his late thought, create a keen thirst for knowledge, regarded as externally, but ever as internally educational system of America what is known but a vital unity. History was not merely a development to another. At Heidelberg he was advancing agreeably to the nature of life. No and kindle enthusiasm in his students. He was treating, or commenting upon the contents of the text-book, it was his uniform habit to turn-lier right or conservative wing of the Hegelian and philosopher, Charles Daub, who represented as Marshall. Dr. Rauch was properly the founder of Marshall College. This was the principal achievement of his short life. He prepared, organized, and trained the first five classes (1837–41); and in doing this he breathed a soul into the institution. The characteristic features of his philosophic genius and organic method he infused so effectually, that his educational work survived his death. The distinguishing spirit inbred by him has lived and flourished in the philosophy and theology of the college and seminary (now located at Lancaster, Penn.), though modified, developed, and matured by his successors, onward to the present time. See Mercersburg Theology.

LIT. — RAUCH. Psychology, or a View of the Human Soul, including Anthropology, New York, 1840 (3d ed., 1844, with Preface by Dr. J. W. Nevin); The Inner Life of the Christian (a series of sermons published after Rauch’s death by E. V. Gerhart); Dr. J. W. Nevin: Eulogy (on occasion of the removal of Rauch’s remains from Mercersburg to Lancaster, 1859), in Mercersburg Review, vol. xi. p. 496. E. V. Gerhart.

RAUHE, Haus. See Wichern.

RAUTENSTRAUCH, Franz Stephan, b. at Flat, Bohemia, 1734; d. at Erlau, Hungary, 1785; entered the Benedictine order, taught philosophy, canon law, and theology, at Graz, and was in 1774 made director of the theological faculty in Vienna. He was a zealous defender of the reforms of Joseph II., and drew up the edict of 1776 concerning the re-organization of the theological study in Austria. Among his writings are, Institutio juris ecclesiastic, Prague, 1786, and Synopsis jur. ecc., Vienna, 1776.

RAVENNA, an important city of Gallia Cispadana, forty-three miles south-east from Bologna, and originally situated on the Adriatic, from which, owing to the deposits from the delta of the Po, it is now distant between five and six miles.

It was founded by the Thessalians, according to Strabo, who describes it as traversed by canals, abundantly in bridges and terraces, and noted for the abundance of its wine.

Late in the history of the Roman Republic it was the chief military station of Cisalpine Gaul, RAVENNA. 2000

RAVENNA.

and a frequent resort of Julius Caesar during his Gallic administration. Augustus made it one of the three principal naval stations of the empire, and the headquarters of the Adriatic fleet. He constructed a new and spacious harbor, about which a town grew up, known later as the suburb Classis; and between this and the city proper arose, in time, another suburb, under the name of Caput Classis.

From this time until far on in the history of the later empire, the city appears as an important military and naval station, and as a place of confinement for state prisoners. About 400 A.D. it became the residence of the Emperor Honorius, who fled thither at the approach of Alaric, and continued to be the seat of government until the fall of the Western Empire, in 476. Gallia Placidia, the sister of Honorius, and mother of Valentinian III., resided there as regent from 425 to 450, and contributed largely to the adornment of the city. Theodoric besieged it in 487; and the murder of Odacer placed in his hand the sceptre, which he wielded for thirty-three years. He was succeeded by a series of elective kings, until 538, when Justinian undertook to bring Italy under the Byzantine Empire, opened its gates to Belisarius. Then followed, for a hundred and eighty-five years, the rule of the exarchs or viceroy s of the Byzantine court, the last of whom, Eutychius, was expelled by the Lombards in 762.

The chief interest of Ravenna is ecclesiastical. According to a questionable tradition, the gospel was preached there as early as 70 A.D., by a disciple of Peter. Apollinaris, who suffered martyrdom for the destruction of a temple of Apollo. Monumentally the city falls into the line of ecclesiastical history with the era of the Theodosian family; and, within less than a hundred and fifty years, Gallia Placidia, Theodoric, and the representatives of the Byzantine Empire, successively enriched it with the Christian monuments which now constitute its principal attraction. In these monuments belong to the transitional period, when the Roman and the Teutonic elements of the modern world were both in being, and when the mingling of the two had not yet formed a third whole different from either. It was the seat of the first settled Teutonic dominion beyond the Alps.

The monuments fall into three classes, marking three periods,— the Theodosian, the Gothic, and the Byzantine.

Of the Theodosian era, the principal relics are the church of San Giovanni Evangelista, erected by Placidia, 425; the church of SS. Nazaro e Celso, better known as the Mausoleum of Galla Placidia (450), where her huge sarcophagus is still preserved with those of at least two Roman emperors; the baptistery of San Giovanni in Fonte (541), one of the most interesting ecclesiastical structures in the world, containing the earliest known mosaics of the fifth century.

The Gothic or Arian era is represented by the building known as Theodoric's Palace, either a fragment of the original structure, or an addition to Theodoric's actual work; the Mausoleum of Theodoric, a cylindrical stone edifice of two stories, with a cupola formed of a single enormous stone; the two Arian churches remaining of the six erected by Theodoric,— San Spirito, noteworthy only for its baptistery, Santa Maria in Cosmedin, with its sixth century mosaics,— and San Martino in Caelo Aureo, afterwards changed to S. Apollinare Nuovo, in honor of the first bishop of Ravenna, whose remains are said to be interred there.

The series of colossal mosaic figures occupying the whole length of the triforium on both sides of the nave may safely challenge the competition of any similar works in the world. The church of S. Apollinare in Classe, in the ancient suburb Classis, was begun eight years after Theodoric's death (526), and consecrated fifteen years later. It now stands almost alone in a desolate marsh. The original mosaics of 671 are interesting as marking the point where the ecclesiastical sentiment begins to rank with the purely Christian.

The figure of Apollinaris in the midst of a flock of sheep is on a level with that of Peter, thus asserting the equality of the Eastern and Western churches.

The great illustration of the Byzantine period is the church of San Vitale, begun in 526, and consecrated 547, to the memory of Vitalis, the patron saint of Ravenna. Here the oblong basilica gives place to the octagon, and the lines of columns are replaced by tiers of arches. The mosaics are of the time of Justinian and Theodora. Among them are portraits of the emperor and empress as patrons of the church.

When Honorius chose Ravenna for his residence, the see of Ravenna was raised to metropolitan dignity, increased in importance under the Ostrogothic rule, and maintained its rank during the exarchate. An assembly of bishops was convened there about 419 by Honorius, to decide the contest for the papal chair between Boniface and Eulalius. They could not agree, and left the decision to the emperor. After the establishment of the exarchs, a long struggle began for the independence of the Roman see. Maurus, who was primate (642-671), refused obedience to the Pope, and was sustained by the Emperor Constantius in the edict of 606, declaring Ravenna independent of Rome. Under Pope Donnus (678) the supremacy of Rome was again acknowledged. The struggle was renewed between Pope Hadrian and Archbishop Leo (770-779), and again, after nearly a century of quiet, between Pope Nicholas I. and Archbishop John, and was finally ended by the complete submission of John at a synod called by Nicholas at Rome in 877.

Ravenna has been the seat of twenty-five synods, few of which are deserving of special mention. Among the decrees of the synod of 877 it was enacted that bishops must be consecrated within three months after their appointment, on penalty of excommunication. At the synod of 897 the Emperor Otho I. yielded to Pope John XIII., the city and territory of Ravenna. The synod of 908 condemned the custom of selling the holy Eucharist and chrism; and that of 1074 pronounced against the excessive freedom and luxury of nuns, and the too frequent use of excommunication, and revoked the permission to monks to preach indulgences.

Ravenna holds the ashes of Dante, who removed thither in 1320. There he completed the cantica of the Divina Commedia, and died on the 14th of September, 1321. The twenty-eighth canto of the Purgatorio, describing the earthly paradise, bears unmistakable traces of his frequent walks in the Pineta, the great pine-forest which now covers part of the ancient harbor, and stretches for forty miles down the coast.

RAYMOND OF SABUNDE, or SABIENDE, a native of Spain; taught medicine and philosophy at Toulouse, and became finally professor regius there in theology. From 1491 to 1496 he wrote his Liber naturee, etc., the only monument he has left of himself, but a work which occupies a most prominent place in the history of natural theology. Augustine was the first who made a distinction between lumen naturae and lumen gratiae; that is, between the truth which may be acquired by natural experience and the truth which is given us only by divine revelation. But after him this distinction was repeated over and over again; and through the whole course of medieval theology it sent out two opposite tendencies,— one laboring to establish an impassable barrier between the two sources of truth, and another which considered it possible to combine them into one single stream. After the overthrow of nominalism in the twelfth century, and more especially after the formation of the grand systems of Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas, the latter tendency, that of reconciliation and combination, became prevalent. It was supported by the ruling realism, and capable of assimilating a considerable amount of Platonic elements. Revelation and redemption continued to be considered as indispensable links in the divine scheme of salvation; but it was at the same time generally held that the idea of God could be reached by natural rationalism, and that nature herself, her own rational elements, should fix the character of unquestionable authority, needing no testimony from reason, and even unwilling to accept any, it came quite naturally to pass that reason and faith, philosophy and theology, were placed over against each other as irreconcilable opponents. (See William Ockham.) It was against this tendency that Raymond wrote his Liber naturae, which may be said to contain the system of natural theology. The book of nature, he says, and the book of the Bible, are both revelations,— the former general and immediate, the latter specific and mediate; and the reciprocal relation between them is this: by the light which the words of the Bible throw over the works of nature the latter not only become more comprehensible, but they prove also the indispensableness of the former. The manner in which this idea is carried out may not be above criticism; but the work exercised, nevertheless, a considerable influence, as may be inferred from the number
RAYMUNDUS LULLUS. 2002

REDEEMER, Orders of the., were founded, (1) in Spain, by Alfonso I., as a reward for bravery against the Moors, which was abolished after their conquest; (2) in Italy, by Vincenzo of Mantua (also called the Order of the Precious Blood of Christ), for the defence of the Catholic faith, which was abolished in the eighteenth century; and (3) in Greece, by King Otto I. on June 1, 1844, as a reward for merit, the king himself being grand master.

REDEMPTION is a fundamental conception of Christianity, and the name Redeemer is applied to Christ as a comprehensive designation of his work. It presupposes a state of bondage and restraint, in which man fails to reach the development for which his powers adapt him, and stands in a false relation to God. This disturbance of our relation to God is called sin. If there were no sin, there would be no redemption. Redemption is, therefore, liberation from sin and its evil consequences. The promise of redemption which God gave after the fall (Gen. iii. 15) was renewed to the children of Israel in various forms, as a deliverance from enemies (Exod. xx. 2) and from the hand of the ungodly (Ps. xxii., xxxiiii. 15), a conception which still prevailed in New-Testament times (Luke i. 71), and from guilt and sin (Ps. li.; Isa. xiii. 24, 25, lxxv. etc.). Jehova is expressly called the Redeemer of Israel (Isa. xii. 14, liv. 5, lx. 10). The promises of the Old Testament were fulfilled in Christ. The redemption from the yoke of the Roman dominion, which the mass of his contemporaries expected, he did not procure. His redemption is an infinitely higher and better one, from sin and all evil, and extends to all mankind (John iii. 16, 17). The New Testament speaks of it under a variety of figures, as the payment of a ransom (lóopov), and a rescue from a lost condition (avr\u03b9\u03c1\u03c9). It is regarded as a deliverance from guilt, whereby the forgiveness of sins is made possible (Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14, etc.), the curse of the law (Gal. iii. 13, iv. 5), and the wrath of God (Rom. v. 9; 1 Thess. i. 10, v. 9). This is the juridical side of redemption. It has also an ethical side, and includes deliverance from the power and dominion of sin. In this sense, Christ has redeemed us from all unrighteousness, as his own possession, purifying us unto good works (Tit. ii. 14; 1 Pet. i. 18 sq.), and has overcome the world, whose temptation leads us into evil (John xvi. 33; 1 John v. 4, etc.), and has broken the power of the prince of this world,—the Devil (John xii. 31; Col. ii. 15). Redemption also has a physical aspect; and, when Christ returns again to raise the quick and the dead, there will be no more pain and death for the believing (Rev. xxi. 4), but eternal life (Rom. v. 10, vii. 22).

The original motive of redemption was the love of God, which wills not the death of the sinner (John iii. 10; 1 Tim. ii. 4). In order to accomplish it, God sent his only-begotten Son, who gave himself as our ransom, even unto death (Matt. xx. 28; John x. 11, 15; 1 Tim. ii. 6), becoming a curse on the cross to deliver us from the curse of the law (2 Cor. v. 21; Gal. iii. 13). What he began in his humiliation on earth, he is consummating in his state of exaltation. Christ is himself redemption (John xiv. 6, xi. 25, 26) offered to all men, on condition of their repent-of imitations it found. The editio princeps of it is without date or place, but belongs probably to the year 1484. The best edition is that by Rych. Paflroed, Deventer, 1488. The latest is by J. F. von Seidel, Sulzbach, 1852; but it lacks the Prologus, which in 1390 was put on the Index, because it declares the Bible to be the only source of revealed truth. See Fr. Holberg: De theologia naturali R. Sabunde, Halle, 1943; D. Matzke: De natiurale theologiae des R. S., Breslau, 1846; M. Hüttner: Die Religion philosophie R. S., Augsburg, 1851; Kleiber: De R. S., Berlin, 1856. SCHAARSCHMIDT.

RAYMUNDUS LULLUS. See Lullus.

READER. See Lector.

REALISM. See Scholastic Theology.

REAL PRESENCE. See Lord's Supper, p. 1348.

RECHABITES, the descendants of Jonadab, the son of Rechab, whose obedience to their father's command not to drink wine, build houses, sow seed, plant vineyards nor have any, but to dwell always in tents, is held up by Jeremiah as a model for Judah (Jer. xxxv.). The promise of redemption (\u03c0\u03b5\u03b5\u03c9\u03c0\u03b3\u03c8\u03c9, and a rescue from a lost condition (\u03c0\u03b5\u03b5\u03c9\u03c0\u03b3\u03c8\u03c9). The promises of the Old Testament were fulfilled in Christ. The redemption from the yoke of the Roman dominion, which the mass of his contemporaries expected, he did not procure. His redemption is an infinitely higher and better one, from sin and all evil, and extends to all mankind (John iii. 16, 17). The New Testament speaks of it under a variety of figures, as the payment of a ransom (lóopov), and a rescue from a lost condition (avr\u03b9\u03c1\u03c9\u03c9). It is regarded as a deliverance from guilt, whereby the forgiveness of sins is made possible (Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14, etc.), the curse of the law (Gal. iii. 13, iv. 5), and the wrath of God (Rom. v. 9; 1 Thess. i. 10, v. 9). This is the juridical side of redemption. It has also an ethical side, and includes deliverance from the power and dominion of sin. In this sense, Christ has redeemed us from all unrighteousness, as his own possession, purifying us unto good works (Tit. ii. 14; 1 Pet. i. 18 sq.), and has overcome the world, whose temptation leads us into evil (John xvi. 33; 1 John v. 4, etc.), and has broken the power of the prince of this world,—the Devil (John xii. 31; Col. ii. 15). Redemption also has a physical aspect; and, when Christ returns again to raise the quick and the dead, there will be no more pain and death for the believing (Rev. xxi. 4), but eternal life (Rom. v. 10, vii. 22).

The original motive of redemption was the love of God, which wills not the death of the sinner (John iii. 10; 1 Tim. ii. 4). In order to accomplish it, God sent his only-begotten Son, who gave himself as our ransom, even unto death (Matt. xx. 28; John x. 11, 15; 1 Tim. ii. 6), becoming a curse on the cross to deliver us from the curse of the law (2 Cor. v. 21; Gal. iii. 13). What he began in his humiliation on earth, he is consummating in his state of exaltation. Christ is himself redemption (John xiv. 6, xi. 25, 26) offered to all men, on condition of their repent-
REDEMPTION.

2003

REDEMPTORISTS.

SCHOEBEKLIN.

REDEMPTORISTS, or CONGREGATION OF OUR MOST BLESSED REDEEMER, was founded by Alfonso da Liguori (Nov. 8, 1732) and grew in spite of opposition. In 1742 Liguori was chosen general-superior, and in 1749 the order was approved by a papal brief. The first house was established at Scala, Italy; a second, in 1735, in the diocese of Cajaza. After the papal approval, the order increased rapidly, especially in the Two Sicilies. The original rules of the Congregation were unusually severe, allowed only sacks of straw for beds, hard bread and soup at table, and imposed long seasons of worship every night, self-flagellation three times a week, and missionary activity among the very poorest classes. Liguori drafted the first constitution in 1742, and took many of his rules from the Jesuits. In addition to the usual vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, a fourth vow was enjoined, by which the member was obligated to refuse all personal honors and benefits outside of the order, and to submit upon the express command of the Pope. In consequence of a breach between the Government of Naples and Pius VI., the order was divided into two factions. The Pope declared the houses that espoused the cause of Naples as no longer a portion of the Congregation, revoked their privileges, and pronounced upon Liguori the forfeiture of his dignity as general-superior, Peter Francis de Paula being substituted in his place. Liguori yielded submission to the Pope, and advised all the houses to do the same. The division was healed three years after his death.

During the last years of Liguori’s life the Congregation began to extend beyond the limits of Italy, especially in Germany and Austria. Clemens Maria Hofbauer (b. at Tassewitz, Austria, Dec. 26, 1751) may be called the second founder of the order. He opened, in connection with one Hibel, a Redemptorist mission in Warsaw, and had great success among the Poles and Germans of the city. In 1782 he was chosen general vicar of his order for the lands where the Polish and German tongues prevailed. The last act of his busy life was the foundation of a Redemptorist college at Vienna, which was achieved about the time of his death, March 15, 1820. Since that time the order has grown to a position of much influence in Austria. It is also strong in Bavaria, and has houses in Holland, Belgium, France, England (Falmouth, etc.), and the United States (New York, Albany, etc., with colleges at Baltimore and Pittsburg).

The Redemptorists have often been identified with the Jesuits on account of their fourfold vows; and in parts of Italy, Austria, and Bavaria, they have taken the place of the Jesuits during the period of the latter’s suppression. On account of the resemblance in certain matters of practice, they have shared the same fate with the Jesuits in Germany, France, and Belgium, and been suppressed or banished by the civil law. In 1782 they were expelled from Germany, and in 1870 from France. See Von Schulte: D. neueren Kath. Ord. u. Kongregationen in Deutschland, Berlin, 1872; Pössl: Clemens M. Hofbauer, Regensburg, 1844; Fehr: Geschichte der Mönchskonvente, II. 219; and art. Liguori. Zöckler.
The Red Sea, an inlet of the Indian Ocean, 1,450 miles long, 230 miles broad, separating Egypt from Arabia; begins at Bab-el-Mandeb, in latitude 12° 42' 20" north, and stretches, in the direction of north-west, to Ras Mohammed, in latitude 27° 44' north, where it separates into two arms— The Gulf of Suez to the west, and the Gulf of 'Akabah to the east. Its name among the ancient Hebrews, Syrians, and Egyptians, was "The Sea of Reeds," and "The Red Sea" among the Greeks and Romans: Herodotus, Agatharchides, Diodorus Siculus, Ptolemy, Pliny, Strabo, Ctesias, Josephus, Pseudo-Arius (in his Periplus), the Greek writers of Scripture (1 Mace. iv. 9; Sol. Wisd. x. 18, xix. 7; Acts vii. 36; Heb. xi. 29), the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and the Byzantine writers, Antoninus, and Cosmas Indicopleustes. The Arabs have only local names. The derivation of the Hebrew name, "Sea of Reeds," is uncertain, as reeds are very rare along those shores: nevertheless, Ehrenberg has shown that the reed, which the Hebrews knew so well from the banks of the Nile, is actually growing at the two points of the Red Sea with which they were acquainted; namely, the Gulf of Suez and the Gulf of 'Akabah. Equally uncertain is the derivation of the Greek-Roman name "Red Sea." Some derive it from the red corals, which are found in great plenty in the waters, and were much used by the Hebrews and Syrians for ornaments (Ezek. xxvii. 16); others, from Edom ("red"). The Hebrews often added to their "Sea of Reeds," "in the land of the Edomites." The Red Sea has its greatest interest for the reader of the Bible on account of its connection with the history of the exodus of the Israelites (which art. see). But it was from the earliest times of importance as the connecting link between the East and the West. The Island Purim, situated in the strait of Bab-el-Mandeb, was the bridge across which the Hamites reached Africa after the destruction of the Tower of Babel, and across which Sesostris led his army to the conquest of the East. 'Akabah was the harbor of Solomon, Joseph, Rezin, the Romans, and the Byzantines. Rameses II. connected the Gulf of Suez with the eastern arm of the Nile by a canal, and the Ptolemies deepened and widened the canal. But very little was known of the Red Sea until quite recently. The western coast was first explored by Nildtser, 1763; the eastern, by Heidel- ford, 1772. The Sinaitic Peninsula and the Gulf of 'Akabah remained unknown till the days of Huyppell, 1819, and Moresky, 1829-33. [See art. in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, and Ebers: Durch Gosen zum Sinai, Leipzig, rev. ed., 1881, passim.]}

RED SEA.

REED.

Andrew, D.D., an eminent philanthropist and divine; was b. in London, Nov. 22, 1750, and d. there Feb. 25, 1862. Nearly all his life was spent in London, and two-thirds of it in one Congregational pastorate. He founded several asylums for orphans, idiots, and incurables. He published No Fiction, 1819; Narrative of the Visit to the American Churches, 1830, 2 vols. (mainly, though not wholly, his work); Narrative of the Revival of Religion in Wycliffe Chapel, Adveancement of Religion the Cause of the Times, 1843; and Sermons, 1861. He compiled a Supplement to Watts, 1817 (enlarged ed., 1825), and The Hymn Book, 1842. These contained about twenty hymns of his own, and as many by his wife Elizabeth: a number of them, especially one or two of Dr. Reed's, have been extensively used. His Memoirs, by his two sons, appeared 1863. F. M. BIRD.

REFORMATION.

The Reformation is the historical name for the religious movement of the sixteenth century, the greatest since the introduction of Christianity. It divided the Western Catholic Church into two opposing sections, and gave rise to the various evangelical or Protestant organizations of Christendom. It has three chief branches,—the Lutheran in Germany; the Zwinglian and Calvinistic, in Switzerland, France, Holland, and Scotland; the Anglican, in England. Each of these branches has had its root of other Protestant denominations, especially in England and the United States, under the fostering care of civil and religious freedom. The entire Protestant population now numbers over a hundred millions of nominal members. Protestantism has taken hold chiefly of the Germanic or Teutonic races, and is strongest in Germany, Switzerland, Scandinavia, Holland, the British Empire, and North America. It has extended its influence to many of the heathen lands. Although divided, and ever tending to new divisions, it is at the present time the most active and progressive part of Christendom.

I. Preparation for the Reformation.

It was not an abrupt revolution, but had its roots in the middle ages. There were many "reformers before the Reformation," and almost every doctrine of Luther and Calvin had its advocates long before them. The whole struggling of medieval Catholicism toward reform and liberty; the long conflict between the German emperors and the popes; the reformatory councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basel; the Waldenses and Albigenses in France and Northern Italy; Wiclif and the Huguenots; the invention of the printing-press; the revival of letters and classical learning under the direction of Agnellus, at Bologna; Arnold of Brescia, and Savonarola, in Italy; the spiritualistic piety and theology of the mystics of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; the theological writings of Wessel, Goch, and Wessel, in Germany and the Netherlands; the rise of the national languages and letters in connection with the feeling of national independence; the invention of the printing-press; the revival of letters and classical learning under the direction of Agricola, in Bohemia; Arnold of Brescia, and Savonarola, in Italy; the spiritualistic piety and theology of the mystics of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; the theological writings of Wessel, Goch, and Wessel, in Germany and the Netherlands.

The rise of the national languages and letters in connection with the feeling of national independence; the invention of the printing-press; the revival of letters and classical learning under the direction of Agnellus, at Bologna; Arnold of Brescia, and Savonarola, in Italy; the spiritualistic piety and theology of the mystics of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; the theological writings of Wessel, Goch, and Wessel, in Germany and the Netherlands.

See the Epistle of Paul to the Galatians (the Magna Charta of evangelical Protestantism).
II. Principles of the Reformation.—It was originally neither a political, nor a philosophical, nor a literary, nor a religious movement; although it asserted a powerful influence in all these directions. It started with the practical question, How can the troubled conscience find pardon and peace, and become sure of personal salvation? It retained from the Catholic system all the objective doctrines of Christianity concerning the Holy Trinity and the divine-human character and work of Christ, in fact, all the articles of faith contained in the Apostles' and other ecumenical creeds of the early church. But it joined issue with the prevailing system of religion in soteriology, or in the doctrines relating to subjective experimental Christianity, especially the justification of the sinner before God, the true character of faith, good works, the rights of conscience, and the rule of faith. It asserted the principle of evangelical freedom, as Peter, the apostle of the Gentiles, in opposition to the system of outward legalistic authority which held the individual conscience and private judgment in bondage. It brought the believer into direct relation and union with Christ as the one and all-sufficient source of salvation, in opposition to traditional ecclesiasticism, and priestly and saintly intercession. The Protestant goes directly to the word of God for instruction, and to the throne of grace in his devotions; while the pious Catholic always consults the teaching of his church, and prefers to offer his prayers through the medium of the Virgin Mary and the saints.

From this general principle of evangelical freedom, and direct individual relationship of the believer to Christ, proceed the three fundamental doctrines of Protestantism,—the absolute supremacy of the word of Christ, the absolute supremacy of the grace of Christ, and the general priesthood of believers. The first is called the formal, or, better, the objective principle; the second, the material, or, better, the subjective principle; the third may be called the social, or ecclesiastical principle. German writers emphasize the first two, but often overlook the third, which is of equal importance.

(1) The objective principle proclaims the canonical Scriptures, especially the New Testament, to be the only infallible source and rule of faith and practice, and asserts the right of private interpretation of the same, in distinction from the Roman-Catholic view, which declares the Bible and tradition to be two co-ordinate sources and rules of faith, and makes, therefore, the decree of popes and councils, the only legitimate and infallible interpreter of the Bible. In its extreme form Chillingworth expressed this principle of the Reformation in the well-known formula, "The Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible, is the religion of Protestants." Genuine Protestantism, however, by no means despises or rejects church authority as such, but only subordinates it to, and measures its value by, the Bible, and believes in a progressive interpretation of the Bible through the expanding and deepening consciousness of Christendom. Hence, besides having its own symbols or standards of public doctrine, it retained all the articles of the ancient Catholic creeds and a large amount of disciplinary and ritual tradition, and rejected only those doctrines and ceremonies for which it found no warrant in the word of God and which it thought contradicted its letter or spirit. The Calvinistic branches of Protestantism went farther in their antagonism to the received traditions than the Lutheran and the Anglican Reformation; but all united in rejecting the authority of the Pope (Melancthon for a while was willing to concede this, but only jure humano, as a limited disciplinary superintendency of the church), the meritoriousness of good works, the indulgences, the worship of the Holy Virgin, of saints and relics, the seven sacraments (with the exception of baptism and the Eucharist), the dogma of transubstantiation and the sacrifice of the mass, purgatory and prayers for the dead, auricular confession, celibacy of the clergy, the monastic system, and the use of the Latin tongue in public worship, for which the vernacular languages were substituted.

(2) The subjective principle of the Reformation is justification by faith alone, or, rather, by free grace through faith operative in good works. It has reference to the personal appropriation of the Christian salvation, and aims to give all glory to Christ, by declaring that the sinner is justified before God (i.e., is acquitted of guilt, and declared righteous) solely on the ground of the all-sufficient merits of Christ as apprehended by a living faith, in opposition to the theory—then prevalent, and substantially sanctioned by the Council of Trent—which makes faith and good works the two co-ordinate sources of justification, laying the chief stress upon works. Protestantism does not, on that account, by any means reject or depreciate good works: it only denies their value as sources or conditions of justification, but insists that on them as the necessary fruits of faith, and evidence of justification.

(3) The social and ecclesiastical principle is the universal priesthood of believers. This implies the right and duty of the Christian laity, not only to read the Bible in the vernacular tongue, but also to take part in the government and all the public affairs of the church. It is opposed to the hierarchical system, which regards and authorizes the church into an exclusive priesthood, and makes ordained priests the necessary and only mediators between God and the people.

Lit.—On the principles of the Reformation, see Dörner: History of Protestant Theology (Eng. trans., Edinb., 1871, 2 vols.); Das Prinzip unserer Kirche, Kiel, 1841; Justification by Faith, Kiel, 1857 (both the last tracts on the formal and material principle of Protestantism are reprinted in Dörner's Gesammelte Schriften, Berlin, 1883, pp. 48-187); Schaff: The Principle of Protestantism (Ger. and Eng.), Chambersb., 1845; Schenkel: Das Prinzip d. Protestantismus, Schaffhausen, 1852, and Die Reformatorien und die Reformation, 1850; Känsler: Über die Principien des Protestantismus, Leip., 1865, and Internal History of German Protestantism (3d ed., 1874, 2 vols.; Eng. trans., Edinb., 1850, superseded by the third German edition). On the characteristic differences between the Lutheran and the Reformed (Calvinistic) churches and creeds, see the treatises of Gübel, Hundeshagen, Schneckenuberg, Schweizer, Julius Muller, etc., quoted in Schaff's Creeds of Christendom, vol. i. 211.

The most learned work against the Reformation is by Dr. Döllinger: Die Reformation, ihre innere Entwicklung und ihre Wirkungen, Regensb., 1846-48, 3 vols. But the distinguished author afterwards protested himself against the Pope and the Vatican Council, and was excommunicated in 1871.

(1) The Reformation in Germany. — The movement in Germany was directed by the genius and energy of Luther, and the learning and moderation of Melanchthon, assisted by the electors of Saxony and other princes, and sustained by the majority of the people, in spite of the opposition of the bishops and the imperial government. It commenced in the university of Wittenberg with a protest against the traffic in indulgences, Oct. 31, 1517 (ever since celebrated in Protestant Germany as the festival of the Reformation), and soon spread all over Germany, which was in various ways prepared for a breach with the Pope. At first it kept within the bosom of the Roman Church. Luther shrank in holy horror from the idea of a separation from the tradition of the Church. Here closesthe first, the heroic, and most eventful, period of the German Reformation.

The Diet of Worms in 1521, where he made his memorable defence, added to the excommunication of the Pope the ban of the emperor. The bold stand of the poor monk, in the face of the combined civil and ecclesiastical powers of the age, is one of the sublimest scenes in history, and may be an epoch in the progress of freedom. The dissatisfaction with the various abuses of Rome, and the desire for the free preaching of the gospel, were so extensive, that the Reformation, both in its negative and positive features, spread, in spite of the Pope's bull and the emperor's ban, and gained a foothold before 1530 in the greater part of Northern Germany, especially in Saxony, Brandenburg, Hesse, Pomerania, Mecklenburg, Lüneburg, Friesland, and in nearly all the free cities, as Hamburg, Lübeck, Bremen, Magdeburg, Frankfort, and Nürnberg; while in Austria, Bavaria, and along the Rhine, it was persecuted and suppressed. Among the principal causes of this rapid progress were the writings of the Reformers, Luther's German version of the Scriptures (his greatest and most useful work, brought out in 8 editions in 8 vols., 1879); L. Haussk: Gesch. des Zeitalters der Reformation, Berlin, 1868 (Eng. trans. N.Y., 1874); George P. Fisher: History of the Reformation, N.Y., 1873 (an excellent work, with a valuable Appendix on the literature of the Reformation, pp. 553-591, which see); Sperber: The Era of the Protestant Revolution, Lond. and N.Y., 1874; T. M. Lindsay: The Reformation, Edinb., 1889; Charles Beard: The Reformation of the Sixteenth Century in its Relation to Modern Thought and Knowledge (the Hibbert Lectures for 1888, published in Lond. and N.Y.).

The Diet of Spire, in 1526, left each state to its own discretion concerning the question of reform, until a general council should settle it for all, and thus sanctioned the principle of territorial independence in matters of religion which prevails in Germany to this day; each sovereignty having its own separate ecclesiastical establishment in close union with the state. But the next Diet of Spire (in 1529) prohibited the further progress of the Reformation. Against this decree of the Roman-Catholic majority, the evangelical princes entered, on the ground of the Word of God, the inalienable rights of conscience, and the decree of the previous Diet of Spire, the celebrated protest, dated April 10, 1529, which gave rise to the name of "Protestants."

The Diet of Augsburg, in 1530, where the Lutherans offered their principal confession of faith, drawn up by Melanchthon, and named after that city, threatened the Protestants with violent measures if they did not return shortly to the old church. Here closes the first, the heroic, and most eventful, period of the German Reformation.

The Diet of Worms in 1521, where he made his memorable defence, added to the excommunication of the Pope the ban of the emperor. The bold stand of the poor monk, in the face of the combined civil and ecclesiastical powers of the age, is one of the sublimest scenes in history, and may be an epoch in the progress of freedom. The dissatisfaction with the various abuses of Rome, and the desire for the free preaching of the gospel, were so extensive, that the Reformation, both in its negative and positive features, spread, in spite of the Pope's bull and the emperor's ban, and gained a foothold before 1530 in the greater part of Northern Germany, especially in Saxony, Brandenburg, Hesse, Pomerania, Mecklenburg, Lüneburg, Friesland, and in nearly all the free cities, as Hamburg, Lübeck, Bremen, Magdeburg, Frankfort, and Nürnberg; while in Austria, Bavaria, and along the Rhine, it was persecuted and suppressed. Among the principal causes of this rapid progress were the writings of the Reformers, Luther's German version of the Scriptures (his greatest and most useful work, brought out in 8 editions in 8 vols., 1879); L. Haussk: Gesch. des Zeitalters der Reformation, Berlin, 1868 (Eng. trans. N.Y., 1874); George P. Fisher: History of the Reformation, N.Y., 1873 (an excellent work, with a valuable Appendix on the literature of the Reformation, pp. 553-591, which see); Sperber: The Era of the Protestant Revolution, Lond. and N.Y., 1874; T. M. Lindsay: The Reformation, Edinb., 1889; Charles Beard: The Reformation of the Sixteenth Century in its Relation to Modern Thought and Knowledge (the Hibbert Lectures for 1888, published in Lond. and N.Y.).

The Diet of Spire, in 1526, left each state to its own discretion concerning the question of reform, until a general council should settle it for all, and thus sanctioned the principle of territorial independence in matters of religion which prevails in Germany to this day; each sovereignty having its own separate ecclesiastical establishment in close union with the state. But the next Diet of Spire (in 1529) prohibited the further progress of the Reformation. Against this decree of the Roman-Catholic majority, the evangelical princes entered, on the ground of the Word of God, the inalienable rights of conscience, and the decree of the previous Diet of Spire, the celebrated protest, dated April 10, 1529, which gave rise to the name of "Protestants."

The Diet of Augsburg, in 1530, where the Lutherans offered their principal confession of faith, drawn up by Melanchthon, and named after that city, threatened the Protestants with violent measures if they did not return shortly to the old church. Here closes the first, the heroic, and most eventful, period of the German Reformation.

The second period embraces the formation of the Protestant League of Schmalkalden, the armed defence of Lutheranism, the various theological conferences of the two parties for an adjustment of the controversy, the death of Luther (1546), the imperial "Interims" or compromises (the Gattinon, Augsburg, and Leipzig "Interims"), and the Smalcaladish war, and ends with the success of the Protestant army, under Maurice of Saxony, and the peace of Augsburg in 1555, which secured to the Lutheran states the free exercise of their religion, but with a restriction on its further progress.

The third period, from 1555 to 1580, is remarkable for the violent internal controversies within the Lutheran Church,—the Osiandrian controversy, concerning justification and sanctification; the adiaphoristic, arising originally from the fruitless compromises with Romanists (called “Intimae”); the synergistic, concerning faith and good works; and the crypto-Calvinistic, or sacramentarian controversy, about the real presence in the Eucharist. These theological dispute led to the full development of the modal system of Lutheranism as laid down in the Book of Concord (first published in 1580), which embraces all the symbolic books of that church: namely, the three ecumenical creeds; the Augsburg Confession and its “Apology,” both by Melanchthon; the two Catechisms of Luther, and the Smalac Articles drawn up by him in 1587; and the “Formula of Concord,” composed by six Lutheran divines in 1577. But, on the other hand, the fanatical intolerance of the strict Lutherans party against the Calvinists and the moderate Lutherans (called, after their leader, Melanchthonians or Philippists) drove a large number of the latter over to the Reformed (Calvinistic) Church, especially in the Palatinate (1586), in Bremen (1591), Nassaun (1582), Anhalt (1519), Hass-casel (1603), and Brandenburg (1614).

The German Reformed communion adopted the Heidelberg Catechism — drawn up by two moderate Calvinistic divines, Zacharias Ursinus and Kaspar Olevianus, in 1583, by order of the elector Frederick Ill., or the Pious — as their confession of faith.

The sixteenth century closes the theological history of the German Reformation; but its political history was not brought to a final termination until after the terrible Thirty Years' War, by the Treaty of Westphalia in 1648, which secured to the Lutherans and the German Reformed churches (but to no others) equal rights with the Roman Catholics within the limits of the German Empire. Those two denominations, either in their separate existence, or united in one organization under the name of the Evangelical Church (as in Prussia, Baden, Wuertemberg, and other states, since 1817), are to this day almost the only forms of Protestantism recognized and supported by the German governments; all others being small, self-supporting “sects,” regarded with little sympathy by the popular mind, and nourished mostly by foreign aid (the Baptists and Methodists of England and America). But within those ecclesiastical establishments, Germany has bred and tolerated, during the present century, almost every imaginable form of theocratic belief and unbelief, from the strictest old-school orthodoxy to the loosest rationalism and scepticism. Theological schools take the place of contending sects. The third tercentennial jubilee of the Reformation (1817) marks a return to the doctrines and principles of the Reformation in matter of government, discipline, and worship, and aimed at a more radical moral and practical reformation of the people. It naturally divides itself into three periods,—the Zwinglian, from 1518 to 1531; the Calvinistic, to the death of Calvin in 1564; and the period of Bullinger and Beza, to the close of the sixteenth century. The first belongs mainly to the German cantons; the second, to the French; the third, to both jointly. Zwingli began his reformatory preaching against various abuses, at Einsiedeln, in 1516, and then, with more energy and effect, at Zürich, in 1518. His object was to “preach Christ from the fountain,” and to “put the gospel into the heart.” At first he had the consent of the Bishop of Constance, who assisted him in putting down the sale of indulgences in Switzerland; and he stood even in high credit with the papal nuncio. But a rupture occurred in 1522, when Zwingli attacked the fasts as a human invention; and many of his hearers ceased to observe them. The magistrate of Zürich arranged a public dis-
REFORMATION. 2008

REFORMATION.

In 1528, to settle the whole controversy. On both occasions, Zwingli, backed by the authorities and the great majority of the people, triumphed over his papal opponents. In 1528 the churches of the city and the neighboring villages were cleared of images and shrines, and a simple, puritanic mode of worship took henceforward the place of the Roman-Catholic mass. The Swiss diet took a hostile attitude to the Reformed movement, similar to that of the German diet, with a respectable minority in its favor. To settle the controversy for the republic, a general theological conference was arranged, and held at Baden, in the Canton Aargau, in May, 1526, with Dr. Eck, the famous antagonist of Luther, as the champion of the Roman, and Zwingli the head of the Reformed cause. Its result was in form adverse, but in fact favorable, to the cause of the Reformation. It was now introduced in the majority of the cantons, at the wish of the magistrates and the people, by Zwingli in Basel, and by Haller in Bern, also, in part, in St. Gall, Schaffhausen, Glarus, Appenzell, Thurgau, and the Grisons; while in the French portion of Switzerland, William Farel and Viret prepared the way for Calvin. But the small cantons around the Lake of Lucerne, Uri, Schwytz, Unterwalden, Lucerne, and Zug, steadfastly opposed every innovation. At last it came to an open war between the Reformed and Catholic cantons. Zwingli's policy was overruled by the apparently more humane, but in fact more cruel and disastrous, policy of Bern, to force the poor mountaineers into measures by starvation. The Catholics, resolved to maintain their rights, attacked and routed the small army of Zurichers in the battle of Cappel, October, 1531. Zwingli, who had accompanied his flock as chaplain and patriot, met a heroic death on the field of battle; and (Ecolampadius of the Reformed, who was to carry forward, to modify, and to rival the great master mind of the Reformed Church, found providentially a new home, in 1536, in the little republic of Geneva, where Farel had previously established the model church for the Reformed communion, and a hospitable asylum for persecuted Protestants of every nation. His theological writings, especially the Institutes and Commentaries, exerted a formative influence on all Reformed churches and confessions of faith; while his legislative genius developed the Presbyterian form of government, which rests on the principle of ministerial equality, and of a popular representation of the congregation by lay elders, aiding the pastors in maintaining discipline, and promoting the spiritual prosperity of the people. Calvin died, after a most active and devoted life, in 1564, and left in Theodore Beza (d. 1625) an able and worthy successor, who, partly with Bullinger, the faithful successor of Zwingli in Zurich, and author of the Second Helvetic Confession (1560), left in the edifice of the Reformation the consolidation of the Swiss Reformation, and the spread of its principles in France, Holland, Germany, England, and Scotland.

(3) The Reformation in France. — While the Reformation in Germany and Switzerland carried with it the majority of the population, it met in France with the united opposition of the court, the hierarchy, and the popular sentiment, and had to work its way through severe trial and persecution. The tradition in that country was favorable to a change, as France had always maintained a certain degree of independence of Rome; and the university of Paris, once the centre of European intelligence and culture, had strongly urged a thorough reformation in capite et membris on the councils of the fifteenth century. The first professed Protestants in France were Lefevre, Wolmar, Farel, Viret, Marot, Olivetan, Calvin, and Beza, all men of distinguished learning and ability; but most of them had to seek safety in exile. It was only after the successful establishment of the Reformation in French Switzerland, that the movement became serious in the neighboring kingdom. Calvin and Beza may be called the fathers of the French Reformed Church. Their pupils returned as missionaries to their native land. The first Protestant congregation was formed at Paris in 1555, and the first synod held, in the same year. In 1561 the theological conference at Poissy took place, where Theodore Beza eloquently but vainly pleaded the cause of the Protestants before the dignitaries of the Roman Church, and where the name "Reformed," as an ecclesiastical designation, originated. In 1571 the general synod at La Rochelle adopted the Gallican Confession, and a system of government and discipline essentially Calvinistic, yet modified by the peculiar circumstances of a Church not in union with the State (as in Geneva), but in antagonism with it. The movement here unavoidably assumed a political character, and led to a series of civil wars, which distracted France till the close of the sixteenth century. The Roman-Catholic party, backed by the majority of the population, was headed by the Dukes of Guise, who derived their descent from Charlemagne, and looked to the throne, then occupied by the house of Valois. The Protestant (or Huguenot) party, numerically weaker, but containing some of the noblest blood and best talent of France, was headed by the Princes of Navarre, the next heirs to the throne, and descendants of Hugh Capet. The queen-regent, Catharine, during the minority of her sons (Francis II. and Charles IX.), although decidedly Roman Catholic in sentiment, tried to keep the rival parties in check, in order to rule over both. But the champions of Rome took possession of Paris, while the Prince of Condé occupied Orleans. Three civil wars followed in rapid succession, when the court and the Duke of Guise resorted to arms. At the same time, the leaders of the Huguenots (Aug. 24, 1572), the leaders of the party having been expressly invited to Paris to attend the marriage of Prince Henry of Navarre with a sister of Charles IX. as a general feast of reconciliation. But the party was only diminished in number, by no means annihilated. Other civil wars followed, widen, and terminated at last in the victory of Prince Henry of Navarre, who after the assassination of Henry III. in 1589, by a Dominican monk, became king of France as Henry IV. This seemed to decide the triumph of Protestantism in France. But the Roman party, still more numerous and powerful, and supported by Spain and the Pope, elected a rival head, and threatened to plunge the country into new bloodshed. Then Henry, from political and patriotic motives, abjured the Protestant faith, in which he had been brought up, and professed the Roman-Catholic religion (1593), saying that "Paris is worth a Mass." At the same time, however, he secured to his former associates, then numbering about seven hundred and sixty congregations throughout the kingdom, a legal existence and the right of the free exercise of religion, by the celebrated Edict of Nantes, in 1598, which closes the stormy period of the French Reformation. But the Reformed Church in France, after flourishing for a time, was overwhelmed with new disasters under the despotism of Richelieu, and finally there was accomplished their secession from the Church of Rome incruelty, and, according to Gro- tius, destroyed the lives of a hundred thousand Dutch Protestants during the six years of his regency (1567-72). The French provinces formed a federal republic,—first under the leadership of William of Orange, and, after his assassination (1584), under his son Maurice, and after a long and heroic struggle accomplished their severance from the Church of Rome and the Spanish crown. The southern provinces remained Roman Catholic, and subject to Spain. The first Dutch-Reformed synod was held at Dort in 1574, and in the year 1618 the university of Leyden was founded. The Reformed Church of Holland adopted as its doctrinal and disciplinary standards the Heidelberg Catechism of 1563, the Belgic Confession of 1561, and the canons of the synod of Dort (1618-19). This important synod seemed to decide the triumph of Protestantism in Holland. But the Arminians, or Remonstrants, differing in five points from the orthodox Calvinists, and holding to the freedom of the will and a conditional predestination, were condemned by the synod of Dort, and subject to Spain, and exerted, through the writings of their distinguished scholars and divines,—Arminius, Hugo Grotius, Episcopius, Limborch, Le Clerc (Clericus),—considerable influence upon Protestant theology in England, France, and Germany during the eighteenth century. The Methodists, under the lead of Wesley adopted the Arminian views. The orthodox church of Holland has been represented in the United States, since 1628, by the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church (now the "Reformed Church in America"), the oldest, save one, of the denominations in the United States. Lit.—See arts. Calvin, Beza, France, Huguenots, St. Bartholomew, etc. The chief sources of the history of the Reformation in France are Beza: Hist. eccles. des églises réform. au royaume de France (to 1568), Antwerp, 1580, 9 vols.; De Serres: De statu ret. et reipubl. in regno Gall., 1570 sqq., 5 parts.; De Thou (Thua- nus): Historiarum sui temporis, etc., 1546-1607 (first ed., 1630 sqq., 5 vols.; Eng. trans. in 16 vols., 17-34 sqq., 5 vols.; Eng. trans. in 16 vols., 17-34 sqq., 5 vols.; Eng. trans. in 16 vols., 17-34 sqq., 5 vols.; Eng. trans. in 16 vols., 17-34 sqq., 5 vols.; Eng. trans. in 16 vols., 17-34 sqq., 5 vols.; Eng. trans. in 16 vols., 17-34 sqq., 5 vols.; Eng. trans. in 16 vols., 17-34 sqq., 5 vols.; Eng. trans. in 16 vols., 17-34 sqq., 5 vols.; Eng. trans. in 16 vols., 17-34 sqq., 5 vols.; Eng. trans. in 16 vols., 17-34 sqq., 5 vols.; Eng. trans. in 16 vols., 17-34 sqq., 5 vols.; Eng. trans. in 16 vols., 17-34 sqq., 5 vols.; Eng. trans. in 16 vols., 17-34 sqq., 5 vols. Lit.—See arts. Holland, Reformed Church of Holland, Dort (Synod of), Calvinism, Arminianism, etc. Chief works: Hugo Grotius: Annales et Hist. de rebus Belgicis, 1559-1609. Amst., 1658; J. de Long: History of the Reformed Church in the Netherlands, Amst., 1741; Brandt: History of the Reformation in the Netherlands, Amst., 1671-76, 4 vols.; Dermont (in Dutch, 1619 sqq., 4 vols.); Schepper (in Dutch, Amst., 1697, 2 vols.); Holzwarth: Abfall der Niederlande, 1805-72, 3 vols. Comp. also, on the political aspect of the struggle, Prescott's Philip II., Motley's Dutch Republic and his History of the United Netherlands. Important documents in the Reformation Church of France by Laval, De Felice, Soldan, Von Polenz, Browning, Coquerel, Ranke, Haag, Weiss, Bersier, etc., and the Bulletin de la Société de l'histoire du Protestantisme français, Paris, 1854-73, 22 vols. Compare also Henri Martin: Histoire de France (1855 sqq., 16 vols.), vols. vii.-x.; and Henry M. Baird: History of the Rise of the Huguenots of France, New York, 1879, 2 vols. (4) The Reformation in the Netherlands was kindled partly by Luther's works, but mostly by Reformed and Calvinistic influences from Switzerland and France. Its first martyrs, Esch and Voes, were burned at Antwerp in 1528, and celebrated by Luther in a famous poem. The despotism of Charles V. and his son Philip II. resorted to the severest measures for crushing the rising spirit of religious and political liberty. The Duke of Alva surpassed the persecuting heathen emperors of Rome in cruelty, and, according to Gro- tius, destroyed the lives of a hundred thousand Dutch Protestants during the six years of his re- gency (1567-72). The seven northern provinces formed a federal republic,—first under the leadership of William of Orange, and, after his assassination (1584), under his son Maurice, and after a long and heroic struggle accomplished their severance from the Church of Rome and the Spanish crown. The southern provinces remained Roman Catholic, and subject to Spain.
The triumph of the Hussites, if they had not been crushed by the Jesuits, would have led to the conversion of the whole Bohemian nation. Protestantism, however, was broken up by internal dissensions between the Bohemian Brethren and the writings of John Hus. The remnants arose the "Unitas Fratrum," or the "Bohemian Brethren." They endeavored to reproduce the simplicity and purity of the apostolic church, and were in fraternal alliance with the Waldenses. Notwithstanding their violent persecution, they perpetuated themselves in Bohemia and Moravia. When the Reformation broke out, they saw several protestant confessions proposed, and many of them embraced the doctrines of the Augsburg Confession, but the majority passed to the Reformed or Calvinistic communion. During the reign of Maximilian II., there was a fair prospect of the conversion of the whole Bohemian nation; but the bloody Thirty-Years' War (which began in Prague, 1618), and the counter-Reformation, especially the efforts of the Jesuits, greatly interfered with the Reformed and Calvinistic communion. During the reign of Maximilian II., there was a fair prospect of the conversion of the whole Bohemian nation; but the bloody Thirty-Years' War (which began in Prague, 1618), and the counter-Reformation of the Jesuits, crushed Protestantism, and turned Bohemia into a wilderness. A Jesuit named Anton Koniasch (1637) boasted that he had burned over sixty thousand Bohemian books, mostly Bibles. The Bohemian Brethren who had fled to Moravia became, under Count Zinzendorf's care, the nucleus of the Moravian Church (1722), which continues to this day. The synod of Erdöd, in 1545, organized the Lutheran, and the synod of Crénguer, in 1557, the Reformed Church. The German settlers mostly adopted the Augsburg Confession; the national Magyars, the Helvetic. Rudolph II. having suppressed religious liberty, Prince Stephen Bocskaj of Transylvania, strengthened by his alliance with the Turks, reconquered by force of arms (1609) full toleration for the Lutherans and Calvinists in Hungary and Transylvania, which had, under his successor Gyorgy Rakoczy I., was confirmed by the treaties of Nikolaus (1622) and Liuiz (1645). In Transylvania, Socinianism also found a refuge, and has maintained itself to this day.

(7) The Reformation in Poland.—Fugitive Bohemian Brethren, or Hussites, and the writings of the German Reformers, started the movement in Poland. King Sigismund Augustus (1518-72) favored it, and corresponded with Calvin. The most distinguished Protestant of that country was Jan Laski, or John a Lasco, a Calvinist, who fled from Poland for his faith, was called back by the Protestant nobility, aided by several friends, translated the Bible, and labored for the union of the Reformed and Lutherans (d. 1560). A compromise between the two parties was effected by the general synod of Sendomir (Consensus Sendomiriensis), in 1579; but subsequently internal dissensions, the increase of Socinianism, and the efforts of the Jesuits, greatly interfered with the prosperity of Protestantism in that country. The German provinces now belonging to Russia—Courland, Livonia, and Esthonia—opened likewise the door to the Reformation, and adopted the Augsburg Confession. The synod of Sendomir was confirmed by the treaties of Nischniopolis and Vilna, and the synod of Bresla in 1567 and 1568 were attended by representatives of the Reformed and Lutherans (d. 1560). A compromise between the two parties was effected by the general synod of Sendomir (Consensus Sendomiriensis), in 1579; but subsequently internal dissensions, the increase of Socinianism, and the efforts of the Jesuits, greatly interfered with the prosperity of Protestantism in that country. The German provinces now belonging to Russia—Courland, Livonia, and Esthonia—opened likewise the door to the Reformation, and adopted the Augsburg Confession.

(8) The Reformation in Scandinavia.—The Reformers of Sweden were two brothers, Oluf and Laurentius Petri (Petersen), disciples of Luther, who after 1519 preached against the existing state of the church. They were aided by Loren Anderson of Stockholm, Gustavus Vasa, who delivered the country from the Danes, and became king in 1523, favored Protestantism from political and mercenary motives: the whole country, including the bishops, followed without much difficulty. He appropriated a large portion of the wealth of the church to meet the expenses of his wars and administration. The synod of Oerebro, in 1529, sanctioned the reform; and the synod of Upsal, in 1523, after a fruitless attempt to reconcile the country to Rome, confirmed and completed it. Sweden adopted the Lutheran creed, to the exclusion of every other, and retained the episcopal form of government in the closest union with the State. It did great service to the cause of Protestantism in Europe, through its gallant king, Gustavus Adolphus, in the Thirty-Years' War; and religious and personal views were thus far united, and the bishops have been almost completely abolished. Denmark became likewise an exclusively Lutheran country, with an episcopal form of State-church government, under Christian III. But the episcopal succession was interrupted; the new bishops received presbyterial ordination, and are therefore merely superintendents, as the bishops in the Evangelical Church of Prussia. A diet at Copenhagen in 1538 destroyed the episcopal power of the Roman clergy, and divided two-thirds of the church's property between the crown and the nobility. The remaining third was devoted to the new ecclesiastical organization. Bugenhagen of Wittenberg was then called to complete the reform (1537). From Denmark, the Reformations passed over to Norway, in 1536. The Archbishop of Trondhjem fled with the treasures of the church to Holland; another bishop resigned; a third was imprisoned; and the lower clergy were left the choice between exile, and submission to the new order of things, which most of them preferred. Iceland, then subject to Danish rule, likewise submitted to the Danish reform.

LIT. — SCHINZER: Biographies of the Three Swedish Reformers, Andersen, O., and L. Petersen (German), Lübeck, 1873; THYSSELius: Ch. Hist. under Gustav I. (Swedish), Stockholm, 1841-45, 2 vols.; FRYKBLAD: Life of Gustav Wasa (Swedish and German), 1831; GEJER: History of Sweden, (German), 1834, Eng. trans. by Turner, 1843; C. M. BUTLER: The Reformation in Sweden, N.Y., 1883. — MÜSTNER: Church History of Denmark and Norway (Danish and German), 1853-59, 3 vols.; HELVIG: Church History of Denmark (Danish), Copenhagen, 1851, 2d ed., 1857. Comp. also, General History of Denmark, by DAHLMANN, BADEN, and DUNHAM.

9 The Reformation in England. — The struggle between the old and the new religion lasted longer in England and Scotland than on the Continent, and continued in successive shocks even down to the end of the seventeenth century; but it left in the end a very strong impression upon the character of the nation, and affected deeply its political and social institutions. In theology, English Protestantism was dependent upon the Continental reform, especially the ideas and principles of Calvin; but it displayed greater political energy, and power of organization. It was from the start a political as well as a religious movement, and it afforded a wider scope to the corrupting influence of selfish ambition and personal passion than the Reformation in Germany and Switzerland; but it passed, also, through severer trials and persecutions. In the English Reformation we distinguish five periods. The first, from 1527 to 1547, witnessed the abolition of the authority of the Roman Papacy under Henry VIII. This was merely a negative and destructive process, which removed the outward obstructions, and prepared the way for the reform. Henry VIII. quarrelled with the Pope on purely personal and selfish grounds, because the Pope refused to dissolve his marriage with Catharine of Aragon, and his marriage to Anne Boleyn. "The defender of the faith," a title given him by the Pope for the defence of the seven sacraments against Luther, remained in doctrine and religious sentiment a Roman Catholic to the end of his life; and at his death the so-called "bloody articles" — which enjoined under the severest penalties the dogma of transubstantiation, auricular confession, private masses, and the celibacy of the priesthood — were yet in full force. The only point of radical difference was the royal supremacy. He simply substituted a domestic for the foreign, and a political for an ecclesiastical Papacy, and punished with equal severity Protestant as well as Roman-Catholic dissenters who dared to doubt his supreme headship of the Church of England. But, while he thus destroyed the power of the Pope and of monasticism in England, a far deeper and more important movement went on among the people, under the influence of the revived traditions of Wyclif and the Lollards, the writings of the Continental Reformers, and chiefly of the English version of the Scriptures, commenced by Tyndale (1525), carried on by Coverdale (1535), Matthew Parker (1539), Cranmer (1540), the Genevan exiles (1560), the Elizabethan Bishops (1569 and 1572), and completed in the Authorized Version of King James (1611).

The second period embraces the reign of Edward VI., from 1547 to 1553, and contains the positive introduction of the Reformation by the co-operation mainly of the Duke of Somerset, protector and regent during the king's minority, and Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, who, by his pliable conduct, and subserviency to the will of Henry, had preserved the idea and hope of a reformation through that reign of terror. Cranmer was assisted in the work by Ridley and Latimer, and by several Reformed divines from the Continent, whom he called to England, especially Martin Bucer of Strassburg, now elected professor at Cambridge, and Peter Martyr of Zurich (originally from Italy), for some time professor at Oxford. The most important works of this period, and in fact of the whole English Reformation, next to the English version of the Bible, are the Forty-two Articles of Religion (subsequently reduced to thirty-nine), or a new and moderately Calvinistic confession of faith, and the Book of Common Prayer, or a new directory of worship in doctrine and religious sentiment a Roman Catholic to the end of his life; and at his death the so-called "bloody articles" — which enjoined under the severest penalties the dogma of transubstantiation, auricular confession, private masses, and the celibacy of the priesthood — were yet in full force. The only point of radical difference was the royal supremacy. He simply substituted a domestic for the foreign, and a political for an ecclesiastical Papacy, and punished with equal severity Protestant as well as Roman-Catholic dissenters who dared to doubt his supreme headship of the Church of England. But, while he thus destroyed the power of the Pope and of monasticism in England, a far deeper and more important movement went on among the people, under the influence of the revived traditions of Wyclif and the Lollards, the writings of the Continental Reformers, and chiefly of the English version of the Scriptures, commenced by Tyndale (1525), carried on by Coverdale (1535), Matthew Parker (1539), Cranmer (1540), the Genevan exiles (1560), the Elizabethan Bishops (1569 and 1572), and completed in the Authorized Version of King James (1611).

The second period embraces the reign of Edward VI., from 1547 to 1553, and contains the positive introduction of the Reformation by the co-operation mainly of the Duke of Somerset, protector and regent during the king's minority, and Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, who, by his pliable conduct, and subserviency to the will of Henry, had preserved the idea and hope of a reformation through that reign of terror. Cranmer was assisted in the work by Ridley and Latimer, and by several Reformed divines from the Continent, whom he called to England, especially Martin Bucer of Strassburg, now elected professor at Cambridge, and Peter Martyr of Zurich (originally from Italy), for some time professor at Oxford. The most important works of this period, and in fact of the whole English Reformation, next to the English version of the Bible, are the Forty-two Articles of Religion (subsequently reduced to thirty-nine), or a new and moderately Calvinistic confession of faith, and the Book of Common Prayer, or a new directory of worship in doctrine and religious sentiment a Roman Catholic to the end of his life; and at his death the so-called "bloody articles" — which enjoined under the severest penalties the dogma of transubstantiation, auricular confession, private masses, and the celibacy of the priesthood — were yet in full force. The only point of radical difference was the royal supremacy. He simply substituted a domestic for the foreign, and a political for an ecclesiastical Papacy, and punished with equal severity Protestant as well as Roman-Catholic dissenters who dared to doubt his supreme headship of the Church of England. But, while he thus destroyed the power of the Pope and of monasticism in England, a far deeper and more important movement went on among the people, under the influence of the revived traditions of Wyclif and the Lollards, the writings of the Continental Reformers, and chiefly of the English version of the Scriptures, commenced by Tyndale (1525), carried on by Coverdale (1535), Matthew Parker (1539), Cranmer (1540), the Genevan exiles (1560), the Elizabethan Bishops (1569 and 1572), and completed in the Authorized Version of King James (1611).
The Reformation did more to consolidate the Reformation in England than Henry, Edward, and Elizabeth. Hundreds were martyred in this short reign, among them the three British Reformers, Ridley, Latimer, and Cranmer, who were burned at Oxford in 1555 and 1556. Many others fled to the Continent, especially to Geneva, Zurich, Basel, and Frankfort, where they were hospitably received, and brought into closer contact with the Reformed churches of Switzerland and Germany. The fourth period is the restoration and permanent establishment of the Anglican Reformation during the long reign of Elizabeth,—1558 to 1603. The Roman-Catholic hierarchy was replaced by a Protestant; and the Articles of Religion, and the Common Prayer-Book of the reign of Edward, were introduced again, after revision. The ecclesiastical supremacy of the crown was likewise renewed, but under a modified form; the Queen refusing the title "supreme head" of the Church of England, and choosing, in its place, the less objectionable title "supreme governor." The Convocation and Parliament readily sanctioned all these changes. But the Anglican Church, as established by Elizabeth, was semi-Catholic in its form of prelatical government and liturgical worship, a sort of via media between Rome and Geneva. It suited the policy of the court, and the taste of the majority of the English people, but was offensive to the severer school of strict Calvinists who had returned from their Continental exile: hence the agitation in the bosom of the Reformed Church of England, and the growing conflict between the Episcopal majorities and the Puritanic minority. Elizabeth's reign was as intolerant against Puritan as against Papal dissenters, and passed the severest penal laws against both. But, while the Roman-Catholic party was almost annihilated in England, the Puritan party grew more powerful under the successors of Elizabeth, and overthrew the dynasty of the Stuarts, and even the Episcopal establishment. But the latter revived from the shock, and was restored, with the restoration of the Stuart dynasty, in 1662; while a limited liberty of public worship was given to the dissenting denominations after the final overthrow of the Stuarts by the Act of Toleration, 1689. Vom, in the reign of William and Mary (1688). These troubles and agitations constitute the fifth period in the history of English Protestantism, which in some respects is the most important and interesting, but lies beyond the age of the Reformation proper.

Lit.—Publications of the Wodrow Society (London, 1842 sqq., 24 vols.) and of the Spottiswoode Society (Edinburgh, 1844 sqq., 16 vols.); Church History of Scotland by John Knox, George Buchanan, John Spottiswoode (1655), Cadwalder (1678), Thomas M'Crie (Life of Knox, 1811; Life of Melville, 1819), Hetherington (1833), von, in the reign of William and Mary (1688). These troubles and agitations constitute the fifth period in the history of English Protestantism, which in some respects is the most important and interesting, but lies beyond the age of the Reformation proper.

Lit.—Works of the English Reformers, published by the Parker Society (1841-54), 54 vols.; State Calendars, Wilkins: Concilia; Cardwell: Documents and Acts; Strype: Memorial of the Church of England; Burnet: History of the Reformation of the Church of England; Collier, Thomas Fuller, Neal, Heylin, Soames, Waddington, Blunt, Perry, Gekie, and others on the Church History of England and the English Reformation. See also arts. on Channer, Latimer, Ridley, Henry VIII., Articles of Religion (Thirty-nine), Presbyterianism, etc.

(10) The Reformation in Scotland.—The first impulse to the Reformation in Scotland proceeded from Germany and Switzerland. Copies of the writings of the Continental Reformers and of Tyndale's English Testament found their way to the Far North. The first preacher and martyr of Protestantism in that country was Patrick Hamilton, a youth of royal blood, and for some time a student at Wittenberg and Marburg, who was condemned to death by Archbishop Beaton, and burned at the stake. The movement gradually increased, in spite of persecution, especially after the rupture of England with the Pope, and was carried to a successful conclusion under the guidance of John Knox, the Luther of Scotland. He was a disciple and admirer of John Calvin, with whom he spent several years. He returned, after the accession of Elizabeth, to his native country, resolved to reform the Scotch Church after the model of the Church of Geneva, which he esteemed as "the best school of Christ since the days of the apostles." After a short civil war the Parliament of 1560 introduced the Reformation, and adopted a Calvinistic confession of faith, drawn up by Knox, Spottiswoode, Row, and three others (superseded afterward by the Westminster standards), and protested under severe penalties, the exercise of the Roman-Catholic worship. In 1561 the first Book of Discipline was issued, and gave the new church a complete Presbyterian organization, culminating in a General Assembly of ministers and elders. The mode of worship was reduced to the greatest simplicity, with a decided predominance of the didactic element. When the unfortunate Mary Stuart,—of French education, tastes, and manners, and in no sympathy with the public opinion of Scotland,—began her reign, in August, 1561, she made an attempt to restore the Roman-Catholic religion, to which she was sincerely attached. But her own imprudences, and the determined resistance of the nation, frustrated her plans; and, after her flight to England (1568), Protestantism was again declared the only religion of Scotland, and received formal legal sanction under the regency of Murray.

Lit.—Publications of the Wodrow Society (London, 1842 sqq., 24 vols.) and of the Spottiswoode Society (Edinburgh, 1844 sqq., 16 vols.); Church History of Scotland by John Knox, George Buchanan, John Spottiswoode (1655), Cadwalder (1678), Thomas M'crieve (Life of Knox, 1811; Life of Melville, 1819), Hetherington (1833), Vom, in the reign of William and Mary (1689), John Lee (1860), Stanley (1872), Rainy (1872, in reply to Stanley), Lohmer (several monographs published from 1857 to 1875), Moffat (1883). See arts. Knox, Melville, Henderson, Presbyterian Churches, etc.

Append.—A few words must be added on the Luther Celebrations of the present year (1889) and their historic significance. They are no less than a revival of the Reformation and a republication of the principles of evangelical Protestantism. They are the best vindication of Luther and his work against old and new calumnies, and misrepresentations of ignorance, prejudice, and malice. They were held not only in Eisleben, Eisenach, Erfurt, Wittenberg, and Worms, made memorable by Luther, but in every large city of Europe and North America, even in Rome. In the commemoration at Berlin the emperor and crown-prince of Germany, and eighty thousand people were present. In London the event was celebrated in three hundred churches at once; and throughout Great Britain and Ireland the same theme resounded from pulpit and platform.

In New York every Protestant minister preached on the blessings of the Reformation; and three public mass meetings were held beside, in Steinway Hall and the Academy of Music, on the 10th, 11th, and 18th of November which will long be remembered (especially the last) for their interest and enthusiasm. Similar celebrations took place in Philadelphia, Boston, Hartford, Princeton, Baltimore, Washington, and the great cities of the West, under the auspices of prominent citizens of all classes and denominations. Many thousands of addresses and sermons on the Reformation were preached in humble villages in Germany, and throughout the world. Many Luther statues were unveiled. All the characteristic merits of the great Reformer were set before the people as never before: he lived his life over again as a man, as a German, as a husband and father, as a Christian, as a theologian, as a Bible translator, as a catechist, as a hymn-writer, as a preacher, as the founder of the Lutheran Church, as the champion of the sacred rights of conscience and especially as the originator of a movement for religious and civil liberty which spread over Europe and across the ocean to the new world. His victorious battle-hymn, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott," resounded throughout Christendom as never before. Truly the genius of the Reformation is still living and marching forward, sending its sons to Holland for that purpose. They applied to the classis of Amsterdam for permission. After years of waiting, authority for holding a subordinate ecclesiastical assembly, called a "Coetus," was obtained from the mother-country; and for a little while the plan worked well. But soon dissension broke out. The ministers and consistory who preferred the old ways withdrew from the coetus, and formed another body called the "Conferentie." A violent and very bitter controversy ensued, which went to great extremes, and hindered all progress for many years.

The secular and religious newspapers during the weeks preceding and following the 10th of November are filled with reports and editorials on Luther and the Reformation. PHILIP SCHAFF.

REFORMED (DUTCH) CHURCH IN AMERICA. I. History. — The first settlers in New Amsterdam brought with them the schoolmaster, and the visitor of the school, but the organization was not made until 1628, when the Rev. Jonas Michaelius collected a congregation of more than fifty communicants, "Walloons and Dutch." This was five years after the trading-post on Manhattan Island had become a permanent agricultural settlement. The emigration from Holland, which then began, continued for half a century; the emigrants, for the most part, following up the valleys along the Hudson and the Mohawk Rivers in New York, and the Passaic, Hackensack, and Raritan in New Jersey. The church at home kept the colony well supplied with ministers; and for many years harmony prevailed, and growth was steady, the English conquest in 1600 in no respect interfering with the natural development of the church. But in the next century, many Luther anecdotes were told by the elder Feilinghuyzen, who began his work in New Jersey in 1719, and was a very earnest and spiritual man, were attended with great success. He and those of like spirit felt that it was necessary that the colonial church should educate and ordain its own ministers, instead of sending its sons to Holland for that purpose. They applied to the classis of Amsterdam for permission. After years of waiting, authority for holding a subordinate ecclesiastical assembly, called a "Coetus," was obtained from the mother-country; and for a little while the plan worked well. But soon dissension broke out. The ministers and consistory who preferred the old ways withdrew from the coetus, and formed another body called the "Conferentie." A violent and very bitter controversy ensued, which went to great extremes, and hindered all progress for many years.

At length, in 1770, through the efforts of Dr. John H. Livingston, a plan of union was adopted, and the churches worked together as a self-governing body. This organization was further perfected in 1793, and finally, in 1812, took the form which it has maintained, with slight alterations, to this day. The territory of the denomination, at first limited to the States of New York and New Jersey and a small portion of Pennsylvania, was gradually extended to the West, where, within the last forty years, there came a large increase, mainly owing to the thousands of Hollanders who sought a new home in this country, and naturally identified themselves with the church planted by their fathers. As these all speak Dutch only, they in some respects, different from those of the Protestants of the English language, the English was the cause of much heart-burning and alienation. It is hoped, however, that the lessons of experience will not be lost. In 1867 the denomination, which had been incorporated as the "Reformed Protestant Dutch Church in America," changed its title to that of the "Reformed Church in America."
judicatories. The church inherited from Holland a tolerably full Liturgy (parts from the pens of Calvin, Bucer, and John a Laseo), which has recently been enlarged, and has had appended to it the Psalter, arranged for responsive reading. The office of the great charge of the aims, but the offices for the sacraments, for ordination, and for church discipline, are of imperative obligation. No psalmody is allowed to be used unless it has been approved by the General Synod. The old custom of reading the Ten Commandments during the morning service on the Lord's Day, and of reciting the Apostles' Creed during the second service, has been revived, and is rapidly becoming general.

5. Institutions. — Rutgers College, founded under the name of Queen's College at New Brunswick, N.J., in 1770, is and ever has been controlled by members of this church. It has a hundred and twenty-nine students, who are taught by fifteen professors, and is growing in means, character, and usefulness. Hope College in Michigan, founded in 1855, is doing a good work for the people among whom it is placed. The Theological Seminary at New Brunswick is the oldest on the continent, having been established in 1784. It has five professors (soon to be increased to five), forty-five students, commodious buildings, and a well-selected library of nearly 40,000 volumes. Foreign missions were begun through the A. B. C. F. M. in 1821, but independently in 1837, and now include stations in Japan, in Amoy, China, and in the Madura district, India. There are eighteen missionaries, thirty-seven churches, 2,843 communicants, and the annual outlay is from $70,000 to $80,000. A Woman's Auxiliary Board has been in operation for several years, and is very flourishing. The Board of Domestic Missions celebrated its jubilee in 1882. It aids in sustaining nearly a hundred churches, and expends about $40,000. A Board of Education aids between eighty and ninety students in the various stages of preparation for the ministry, and expends about $18,000, the larger portion of which comes from the wise endowments made by the benevolent during this century. The Board of Publication has a capital of about $12,000, and issues a valuable monthly paper called The Sower. The Christian Intelligencer, a weekly journal of high character, represents the church, but without official sanction. There is a widows' fund, amounting to over $50,000, and also a disabled ministers' fund of $33,000, the income of which, together with the voluntary offerings of the churches for the latter and similar offerings (aided by the annual payments of subscribers) for the former, is distributed twice a year by the treasurer.

6. Statistics. — At the present time (1883) the body numbers 516 churches, 569 ministers, and more than 80,000 communicants, who are organized into thirty-four Classes, four Particular Synods, and one General Synod. Its chief strength lies in the East; but four classes have been formed among the eighty thousand Hollanders who have settled within a generation in Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa. The congregational purposes, over $870,000.

The German Reformed Church in America (seethat art.). The first agreement was made in 1729. and the first articles of a church order were set forth the same year. The church has now under its care and control Frank	ard Grove, Wis. ; Calvin Institute at Cleveland, O. ; Catawba College at Newton, N. C. ; a collegiatedepartment of the University of Pennsylvania; and Seminary at Tiffin, O. ; Ursinus College and Seminary at Collegeville, Penn. ; Catawba College at Newton, N. C. ; a collegiatedepartment in connection with a theological seminary at How-

United States. In the membership of this church, there is also a number of descendants of Huguenots, whose ancestors came to this country in small colonies, and united with the German Reformed, Dutch Reformed, and Presbyterian churches.

II. Its Origin and Organization in America.

The German immigration to America began as early as 1884, being composed mostly of exiles, who fled to escape persecution in the Palatinate, and seek an asylum in the New World, where they could enjoy religious freedom. This immi-gation continued at intervals into the following century. Colonies were formed along the Delaware, the Lehigh, the Susquehanna, in New York; Maryland, Virginia, and North and South Carolina. The principal settlement was in Pennsylvania. As early as 1730 one of the first German Reformed ministers in this country, Rev. George Michael Weiss, reported to the synod of Holland that there were in America many German, particularly from the Palatinate and the districts of Nassau, Waldeck, Wittgenstein, and Wetterau, holding to the Reformed Confession. The first German Reformed minister settled among them was Philip Boehm, who came to America in 1720, and followed for a time the calling of schoolmaster, and was then appointed minister over a congregation in Whitpain township, in Montgomery County, in the neighborhood of what is now known as Boehm's Church. Other ministers followed. — George Michael Weiss, John Harkcus Goetschey, John Bartholomew Reiger, John Peter Miller, John Bechtel, and in 1746 Michael Schlatter, the missionary father of the German Reformed Church in America (see that art.). The first organization into a cæsar, or synod, was formed Sept. 27, 1747, under the care of the Reformed Classis of Amsterdam, just fifteen days after the first cæsar of the Dutch Reformed Church was organized. In 1747 there were 5 ordained ministers and 46 organized churches. In 1793, at which time the synod was divided into classes, there were 22 ordained ministers, and about 150 churches. Subsequently the Synod of Ohio and adjacent States was organized. Though in friendly relations, there was no organic union between it and the mother-synod. This fact led to a change in the constitution by which the General Synod was organized, which is the highest judicatory in the church, and is composed of delegates elected by the classes, and meets triennially.

Since 1863 these two synods have become six, and the twenty-six classes that then existed have grown into fifty. During the same period of twenty years (till 1883) the number of ministers has advanced from 447 to 817, and the communicant memberships from 98,775 to 183,669.

III. Educational and Benevolent Institutions. — The first organization of a theological seminary was effected at Carlisle, Penn., in 1826, afterwards removed to Mercersburg (1836), and then to Lancaster, Penn.; and the first college was established at Mercersburg in 1836. The church has now under its care and control Franklin and Marshall College. This Classical Semi-mary at Lancaster, Penn., the oldest and most liberally endowed; Heidelberg College and Theological Seminary at Tiffin, O. ; Ursinus College and Seminary at Collegeville, Penn.; Catawba College at Newton, N. C. ; a collegiatedepartment in connection with a theological seminary at Howard Grove, Wis. ; Calvin Institute at Cleveland, O. ; Palatinate College at Meyerstown, Penn.; Mercersburg College at Mercersburg, O., besides a number of select classical schools and female seminaries. The church has fifteen English peri-dicals and six German. It carries forward two orphan's homes, one at Womelsdorf, Berks County, Penn.; and one at Butlertown, Butler County, Penn.; the former having sixty-eight, and the latter forty, orphans under its care.

The Reformed Church maintains a board of foreign missions, which has a mission under its care in Japan; and missionary work is carried on also in India, and among the North-American Indians. It has home missionary boards, which have at present about a hundred missionaries under their care. An important part of the home-mission work refers to the wants of the large immigration from Germany to our shores, a considerable portion of which comes properly under the care of the German Reformed Church.

IV. ITS DOCTRINAL POSITION AND CULTUS.—The Reformed Church in the United States belongs to the large family of Reformed churches in the world which constitutes the greater portion of Evangelical Protestantism. The name "Reformed" came to be applied to all those Reformation churches that were distinguished from the Lutherans by different names—England, Scotland, Ireland, France, Switzerland, Holland, Germany, etc.; and they have a number of confessions; but these are all moulded by one general type, with a recognized consensus of doctrine. But, while the Reformed Church in the United States belongs to this general family, it has a distinguishing type of doctrine, cultus, and life.

It differs from the Lutheran Church, in common with all the Reformed churches, in its doctrine of the Lord's Supper, and holds the Calvinistic doctrine of the spiritual real presence of the body and blood of Christ in the holy Eucharist, for believers only. It differs from the Church of England in holding to the parity of the ministry, and the presbyterian form of government, and in its more simple ritual in conducting public worship. It differs, on the other hand, from the strictly Calvinistic Reformed churches, in allowing freedom for more moderate views on the doctrine of predestination. The Church of England, by a decree in 1559, was not essentially changed into a Reformed church; but it does not teach a double decree,—a reprobation of all as the old Augustinian doctrine of natural depravity, and salvation by free grace alone; but it does not teach a double decree,—a decree of reprobation as well as salvation, and leaves room for some difference of views on this mysterious subject. The Catechism gives a central position in its system of doctrine to the Apostles' Creed, and points with special emphasis to the person of Christ as the source of redemption and salvation. It regards the children of the church, being born of Christian parents, and baptized, as standing in the covenant; and this view governs the faith and practice of the church on the subject of educational religion. It is required of her ministers that they shall faithfully instruct the young in the teachings of the Catechism, as the best means of preparing them for confirmation, and for their admission to the Lord's Supper, and full membership in the church. While it makes due account of experimental religion, it regards faithful instruction in the truths of the Bible as the best means to be used to lead to this end.

In reference to its mode of public worship, the Reformed Church seeks to combine simplicity with decorum. It provides liturgical forms of service; but it has always allowed a certain degree of freedom in regard to the use neither in respect of such forms upon its congregations, nor forbidding their use. On the subject of liturgical worship, as well as in regard to certain doctrinal views, the church passed through considerable agitation and controversy for a number of years, especially during the rise and progress of the "Mercersburg Theology," which for a time threatened its unity and peace; but the different tendencies at length came to an amicable settlement, by the unanimous adoption of the measure submitted by the Peace Commission, at the general synod held at Tiffin, O., in the year 1881. (See Mercersburg Theology.)

The statistics of the church, as summarized for the year 1888, include under the General Synod six distinct synods,—four of which are English, and two German,—fifty classes (presbyteries), 817 ministers, 1,426 congregations, and 163,690 communicant members.

REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH. See Presbyterian Churches, pp. 1911 sqq.

REGALIA (jus regalia, or jus regale). According to the oldest ecclesiastical legislation, certain droits and properties of the church were exempted from the royal claims; and when I was it exempted from them. While government by a bishop or other member of the clergy were to be spent for the interest of the church; and during vacancies the revenues of an episcopal see or other benefice were to be collected and held in the name of the church. The church passed through considerable agitation as well as in regard to certain doctrinal views, for a time threatened its unity and peace; but the different tendencies at length came to an amicable settlement, by the Peace Commission, at the general synod held at Tiffin, O., in the year 1881. (See Mercersburg Theology.)

The statistics of the church, as summarized for the year 1888, include under the General Synod six distinct synods,—four of which are English, and two German,—fifty classes (presbyteries), 817 ministers, 1,426 congregations, and 163,690 communicant members.

REGENERATION.

ideals of royal sovereignty, extended his right of regalia also to those seas, it came to a violent embroilment between him and the man in whose soul that takes place is an inward, not a mere external phenomenon, a real transformation of the inner self, and the man in whose soul this takes place is newborn, born of God (John iii. 3). In the apostolic writings, and more especially in the Epistles of Paul, the ripest developments of this act of new birth, its various phases, and their internal relations, are set forth with matchless lucidity and impressiveness.

Not so in the after-apostolic age. Regeneration as a divine act became gradually connected with baptism in such a way that the whole ethical process, with the subjective appropriation of the divine grace, was swallowed up by a magical conception of the divine activity. When grown-up persons were baptized, the demand of faith, penitence, etc., was, of course, not abandoned; but faith itself was considered a kind of offering from man to God, rather than the organ through which divine grace was to be received, and moral regeneration was no longer to be effected; and infant baptism became more and more general in the church, the mystical view of regeneration also spread. What little the scholastic theology of the middle ages had to say of regeneration, it presented under the head of gratia infusio, the first stage of justification. (See Thomas Aquinas: Summa, Pt. 2, 110.) At first the Catholic Church, while fixing and systematizing the doctrines of the Roman-Catholic Church, had nothing to add to the meager definitions of the schoolmen. It was, indeed, the German mystics, who, during the middle ages, kept alive the idea of regeneration. (See Bühringer: Die deutschen Mystiker, 1853.) By them, while maintaining the necessity of a moral conversion, they always represented the state of man before regeneration, not as a positive degradation and guilt, but simply as a natural deficiency common to all creation.

At this point the Reformation effected a radical modification. Luther placed the idea of regeneration in the closest connection with those of forgiveness of sin, reconciliation with God, and justification; and the only essential modification in the doctrine of justification, which divines like Arndt and Spener wished to remain true to the orthodox doctrine of the Church; but he could not help reproaching the preachers of his time because they spoke too little of the power of faith as a heavenly light destined to bear the soul anew. The controversy between the Pietists and the orthodox was, however, on this point confined to the question whether the intellectual light was or was not conditioned by a preceding moral conversion. By the rationalists not only that question, but the whole subject, was set aside; and with the exception of insinuations in the Kantian philosophy, and some singular allusions in the Hegelian, it was abandoned to neglect, until revived by Schleiermacher, who gave it a solution as deep as ingenuous, and strictly evangelical in its whole bearing. [In popular religious books, "conversion" and "regeneration" are frequently employed synonymously, but they are properly to be distinguished, as in the Bible, where regeneration (ἰσχυρισμός) is the act of God, and conversion (μετανοία) is the act of man, who is exhorted to repent, and turn to God.]

gave it a solution as deep as ingenuous, and strictly evangelical in its whole bearing. [In popular religious books, "conversion" and "regeneration" are frequently employed synonymously, but they are properly to be distinguished, as in the Bible, where regeneration (ἰσχυρισμός) is the act of God, and conversion (μετανοία) is the act of man, who is exhorted to repent, and turn to God.]

REGensburg. See Ratisbon.

Regino, b. at Altrip on the Rhine, near Spire; d. at Treves, in 815; was monk in the monastery of Prüm, and was elected abbot there in 692, but was expelled in 809, and was by Archbishop Ratbod of Treves placed at the head of the monastery of St. Martin. His Chronicle is the first world's history written in Germany. The first book goes from the birth of Christ to the death of Charles Martel; and the second, from that point to 908. From 814 the narrative is based upon personal observation or oral tradition, but by the 12th century a best edition of the work is that in Mon. Germ. i. 536-612. His Libri duo de synodal. causis, etc., edited by W. Schlehen, Leipzig, 1840, is a collection of ecclesiastical laws for judicial use on diocesan inspections. A little treatise on church music, De harmonica institutione, is printed in Coussin-Maker: Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica, Paris, 1867, i. 1-73.

Regiarius is the title of different classes of ecclesiastical officers in Rome who are assigned to certain "regions" or districts of the city. Thus there are regional deacons, subdeacons, notaries, etc. H. F. Jacobson.

Regius, Urbanus. See Rhegius.

Regula Fidei (rule of faith). This term was used by the Fathers of the second half of the second century and of the third century to designate the sum of Christian doctrine as based upon the formula of baptism, and accepted by the orthodox Church. Irenæus, Tertullian, and Origen have preserved the earliest form. Irenæus (Hær., i. 10) says, "The church, although it is scattered to the ends of the earth, has received from the apostles and their disciples the faith in one God, the Almighty Father, Maker of heaven," etc. This phrase is used in the synodical canons of the second century and of the third century, and in the Anti-heretical doctrinal statements of distinguished ecclesiastical leaders. The formula which the presbyters in Smyrna in 230 opposed to Noetus is quite similar to the old Roman formula of baptism, and the Apostles' Creed in Latin seems to have been a translation from the Greek (Paschii, iii. 254-265). The Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed (see art.) of 381 is nothing else than the first ecumenical formula of baptism enlarged. This creed is still used as the formula of baptism in the Eastern Church.

In the Protestant churches the numerous, and, for the most part, bulky confessions are substituted for the rule of faith. The Roman Catholic theologians now pretty generally understand by the expression the utterances of the infallible Church and Pope. See Caspari: Quellen zur Gesch. d. Taufyymbolos u. d. Glaubensregel, 1866-75, 3 vols.; Zeitschrift des Kathedr. (i. 2), ed. 1875; Swainson: The Creeds of the Church, etc., Camb., 1878; Schaff: Creeds of Christendom, N.Y., 1880, vol. i. 14 sqq., vol. ii. 11-40; and the arts. Apostles' Creed, Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed.

Regulars are those who have made their vows in some religious house, such as monks. A regular priest is in some order, while a secular priest lives in the world. Regular benefits were only conferred on regular priests. Regular places are those within the boundary of a convent, as the cloister, dormitory, chapter, and refectory.

Rehoboam (enlarger of the people), son of Solomon by the Ammonitish princess Naamah (1 Kings xiv. 21), and his successor in his forty-first year. He reigned seventeen years, and was succeeded by his son Abijah (Abijam), the child of his favorite wife, Maachah (Michaiah), the granddaughter of Absalom (1 Kings xv. 2). To the new king at Shechem, assembled Israel brought their grievances, and prayed their amelioration. But he answered harshly, foolishly following the counsel of the contemporary advisers; and then Israel revolted, and under Jeroboam set up a rival kingdom. Only Judah and a part of Benjamin remained loyal to Rehoboam. Between the two kingdoms there was naturally constant friction, giving rise at times to bloodshed (1 Kings xiv. 80); but the prophet Shemaiah repressed Re-hoboam's desire to put down the revolt by force. (1 Kings xii. 24; 2 Chron. xi. 4). Rehoboam, apprehending an attack from Egypt, — instigated by Jeroboam, or by the known wealth of Jerusalem, — fortified the south and west boundaries of his country (2 Chron. xi. 5 sqq.). But Shishak (Sesonchis), the first king of the twenty-second dynasty, in his fifth year marched against him, captured the fenced cities, and "took away the treasures of the house of the Lord and of the king's house" (2 Chron. xi. 9). This glorious victory is portrayed upon the walls of a small temple finished by Shishak on the south side of the great Temple of Karnack, near the present Luxor, on the Nile. The remainder of Rehoboam's reign was passed in comparative peace, but "he prepared not his heart to seek the Lord." He had eighteen wives and sixty concubines, who bore him twenty-eight sons, whom he made governors of as many cities (2 Chron. xi. 21, 22). Unfortunately, the chronology of Shishak is uncertain; and therefore Rehoboam's dates are variously given as 975-957 (usual reckoning), 985-968 (Ewald), 977-960 (Thenius). [Besides the art. "Rehabeam," in Winer and Kautzsch, see Eberhard: Hours with the Bible, vol. iv. chap. I.]

REICHEL, Johann Friedrich, a Moravian bishop; b. at Leuba, Altenburg, Germany, May 16, 1751; d. at Berthelsdorf, Saxony, Nov. 17, 1809. He joined the Moravians after he had for four years served as a Lutheran minister, and was for forty years on the executive board of the Unitas Fratrum. In 1775 he was consecrated bishop and made very extensive episcopal visits, going as far east as the Cape of Good Hope and the East Indies, and as far west as the American Colonies. He died for four years (1778-82) in America, and healed many a breach occasioned by the Revolutionary War.

REID, Thomas, D.D., professor of moral philosophy, Glasgow; father of Scotch philosophy; was ordained minister of New Machar, Aberdeen, there being two colleges in the Granite City of the North. Afterwards he was appointed librarian to the college, which office he held till he was twenty-six years of age. A year later he was ordained minister of New Machar, Aberdeen, in which he was presented by King's College, Aberdeen. He married his cousin, Elizabeth Reid, daughter of Dr. George R. Reid, physician, London. While a minister, he devoted a great part of his time to philosophic study. His first effort as an author was a paper submitted to the Royal Society of London, and published in the Transactions, when he was thirty-eight years of age. This was a criticism of some positions in Hutcheson's Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue; Hutcheson being at the time professor of moral philosophy at Glasgow; the position which Reid was afterwards to hold. In 1752 Reid was elected professor of philosophy in King's College, Aberdeen; the duties of the chair, however, requiring the teaching of physical as well as mental philosophy. Twelve years later (1764) he published his Inquiry into the Human Mind; and in the same year he was elected professor of moral philosophy in the university of Glasgow, as immediate successor to Adam Smith, who had succeeded Hutcheson in the chair. The Inquiry was an investigation into the conditions of knowledge, and produced a deep impression as a bold and resolute defence of the certainty of human knowledge against the scepticism which Hume had developed out of the theory of ideas then current. Its title was, An Inquiry into the Human Mind, on the Principles of Common Sense. This formal introduction of the phrase "common sense" by and by afforded the descriptive appellation of the Scotch philosophy, "the philosophy of common sense." The phrase had aptness for the end contemplated, and yet awkwardness, on account of its popular use as an equivalent for "good sense," or sagacity. Its consequent ambiguity led to mistaken applications and misapplication. What more precisely the phrase meant was that any adequate inquiry into the human mind must disclose certain principles or axiomatic truths common to all intelligence, as essential to a sound philosophy as to a healthy intellect. As in the philosophy of Locke, all knowledge had been traced to sensation and reflection, Reid took "sense" in the wide meaning of knowledge; and "common sense" was a knowledge common to all the race. In effect, Reid's title meant, "an inquiry into the human mind, on the principles common to rational beings;" and his motto was a quotation from the Book of Job, "The inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding." Thus he suggested the form of his theory, — the creation of intelligence implies communication of the first principles of knowledge. All language suggesting that some men are higher endued than others with a faculty of common sense, and quite alien to his theory. See Hamilton's Note A, in Reid's Works, 742.

When he had prepared his reply to Hume, he submitted the manuscript in parts to the author of a Treatise of Human Nature, and received from Hume a friendly reply, reserving full judgment until the book appeared. Hume acknowledged having read it "with great pleasure and attention," adding, "It is certainly very rare that a piece so deeply philosophical is wrote with so much spirit, and affords so much entertainment to the reader." In reply to this, Reid said to Hume, "I have learned more from your writings of this kind than from all other put together." (Stewart's Life of Reid: Stewart's Works, x. 256, Reid's Works by Hamilton, pp. 8, 91; Burton's Life of Hume, ii. 158-166.) Of Reid, Hill Burton says, "His was the greatest mind which set itself in opposition to Hume's system in British literature; and he was great because he examined the works of the sceptical philosopher, not in the temper of a wrangler or partisan, but in the honest spirit of an investigator, who is bound either to believe in the arguments he is examining, or to set against them a system which will satisfy his own mind and the minds of other honest thinkers" (Life of Hume, ii. 151). Reid did set himself to develop a system, which he offered to the acceptance of honest thinkers as a refutation of the scepticism of Hume, by refuting the theory of ideas previously in favor among philosophers. But in doing this Reid acknowledged, as Kant also afterwards did in a very similar manner, that he was indebted to Hume for rousing him to the task of criticizing the popular philosophy, and endeavoring to replace it by another which could endure the test of sceptical argumentation.

Reid's Inquiry into the Human Mind is an investigation into the relations of mind to the special senses, dealing in succession with smelling, tasting, hearing, touch, seeing. The work shows that Reid had given considerable attention to the physiology of the senses; though it cannot meet the requirements of present knowledge as to the structure of the terminal organs of the special senses, and their relation to the brain. Considering the period of its publication, it sufficiently refutes the allegation that mental philosophers have shown themselves ignorant and indifferent as to the relations of mental phenomena to physiological facts. His main purpose is to show the ample warrant we have for trusting the information gathered by the senses, and constructing a theory of things by the application of rational principles. In point of form, his method is to confront scepticism with the bulwarks of common sense. Unhappily his favorite phrase, "common sense," is at times used vaguely, and does not always meet the requirements of philosophic procedure. At one time it seems as if "common sense" were opposed to philosophy; at another, as if it were essential to it: but commonly his reasoning is clear and forcible, and ambiguities are easily brought into harmony with the general drift of the argument. Thus, when he says, somewhat angrily, somewhat boldly, and rather unwise in both respects, "If thou hast not power to dispel those clouds and phantoms which thou hast discovered or created... I despise philosophy, and renounce its guidance,—let my soul dwell with common sense" (Inquiry, sect. iii.), he seems to favor the allegation that this theory of common sense is not a philosophy, but is at variance with the deeper spirit of philosophy. But he means no more in this than to express strongly his detestation of "the received philosophy," the philosophy of ideas, which had furnished scepticism with its weapons. And in truth he is no more scornful of the popular philosophy of the time than Kant was of the "dogmatic philosophy." Reid's exaggerated words have been freely condemned by his own followers. Dugald Stewart and Hamilton, who distinguished themselves for their defence of the philosophy of common sense. But Reid's real intention is apparent when he complains, of the received philosophy, that her "hands are tied, and her voice is never heard above the shrill dictation beyond its first limits, and to call to her bar the dictates of common sense." Then he adds, "In reality, common sense holds nothing of philosophy, nor needs her aid. But, on the other hand, philosophy (if I may be permitted to change the metaphor) has no other root but the principles of common sense" (Inquiry, sect. iv.). By this he means that the essential conditions of intelligence are given to all men, so that intellect does not need to wait on philosophy for warrant of her procedure; while, on the contrary, all sound philosophy must start with unreserved acknowledgment of the principles of intelligence, which he would name "common sense." Equally for the weapons of defense against scepticism, and for the foundations of a structure in which a thinker can dwell with satisfaction, he turns to the "principles which do not derive their evidence from any antecedent principles, but may be said to be intuitively discerned" (Intellectual Powers, essay vii. chap. ii.). Such is Reid's theory, often involved in considerable obscurity of statement, at times adopting forms of expression which favor the view that there is a measure of intellectual constraint holding man in subjection; but in the main a clear and strong vindication of the adequacy of intelligence as a guide to certainty. He had not Kant's distinction between reasoning and reason; he did not grasp Kant's problem. How is a knowledge a priori possible to mind? (see art. KANT): but, when treating of judgment as the ruling power in mind, he clearly distinguished those two functions,—to reason, and to determine what is good. "We subdue our reason two offices or two degrees. The first is to judge of things self-evident: the second is to draw conclusions that are not self-evident from those that are. The first of these is the province, and the sole province, of common sense; and therefore it coincides with reason in its whole extent" (Intellectual Powers, essay vi. chap. ii.). Even though it be granted that there is in Reid's... works a want of philosophic exactness and metaphysical range, there is a sagacity, a breath of reflection, and a massiveness of thought, fully accounting for the power of his philosophy in Britain, France, and America. H. CALDERWOOD.

REINHARD, Jakob, b. at Augsburg, 1579; d. at Tübingen, May 5, 1628. He entered the Jesuit order; taught theology and philosophy in their seminaries at Ingolstadt and Dillingen; and was in 1613 appointed court-preacher to the apostate count-palatine, Wolfgang William. He took a very active part in the Romanization of the Palatinate, but the careful study of the Bible which he found occasioned to his philosophy the greatest influence as a preacher. His col-

RELICS. The Latin word reliquiae meant "remains," and was in that sense adopted by the Church, where, however, with the one sole exception of the possession of the corpse of a martyr was held to guarantee the continuous communication between the deceased and the congregation: hence the custom of gathering around the tomb of the martyr for the celebration of the Eucharist. Though the worship of relics originally had to overcome a certain aversion founded on the views of the Old Testament concerning the uncleanness of a corpse, it easily succeeded, as may be seen from the Apostolical Constitutions, lib. vi. At the time of Constantine it was in full bloom; and the Greek Fathers of that and the next periods are unanimous in their recommendations (Eusebius: Praeparatio evangelica, i. 181; Gregory Nyssa: Comment. in Eph. 17; Gregory the Great: De cultu, p. 688; Theodoret: In Psal., 67, 11). In the West it also found zealous defenders (Jerome and Paulinus of Nola). From the latter, as well as from Gregory of Tours, it appears that people in general considered relics to be the indispensable portion of the worship of the Church, and the possession of the corpse of a martyr was held to guaran-

RELATION. Hadrian, b. at Ryp, near Alkmaar, July 17, 1617; d. at Utrecht, Feb. 5, 1715. He studied Oriental languages at Leyden, and ecclesiastical antiquities in Amsterdam, and was in 1699 appointed professor at Utrecht. His principal theological works are, Analecta rubricanis, Utrecht, 1702; De religione Mohammedica, 1706 (in which he tried to give a more accurate and impartial representation of the religion of Mohammed); Antiquitates sacrarum veterum Hebraicarum, in sto. (R. Vogel, Halle, 1799); Palestinae ex monumentibus veteribus illustrata, 1714 (his chief work, often reprinted, in which he displays such comprehensive learning and so much penetration and power of analysis, that it still remains the foundation of all study of ancient Palestine); De spolii templi Hierosolymitani in arcu Titiano, 1716 (new edition by SCHULZE, Utrecht, 1775). ARNOLD.

RELIGION and REVELATION are correlative terms; that is, the relation in which man places himself to God in religion presupposes the relation in which God has placed himself to man in revelation. Without revelation there can be no religion; and revelation, which should not be overlooked, that even those, who, on account of their idea of God, absolutely reject the idea of a direct divine revelation, recognizing nothing but Nature in her material existence and mechanical working, cannot help applying to Nature express sions and conceptions which tend to raise her above the dumb necessity, and constitute her a higher being, capable of moral relations; nor can they for a longer period escape a feeling of thirst after revelations of the secret depths of that being which they then strive to attain by ways more or less mystical and magical.

1. Religion—either from relegere, “to read over,” i.e., to reflect upon what has been written (Cicero), or from religare, “to rebind” (Lactantius)—means the conscious relation between man and God, and the expression of that relation in human conduct. It has thus, though it presupposes certain objective conditions both for its origin and for its farther development, a purely subjective character, forming the innermost centre of the human personality, and the only true basis of spiritual growth. But, in spite of its decidedly subjective character, religion is as much a social as an individual affair. Not to speak of the specifically Christian ideal of the kingdom of heaven to be established here on earth by the Christian congregations, in all spheres of the human life, even on its lowest and most primitive stage, and to represent the psychological process by which the actual formation of a religion takes place. The New Testament gives a few but very important notices on the subject, which fully sustain the above propositions concerning the relation between religion and revelation (Rom. i. 18 sqq.; Acts xiv. 17, xvii. 27; John i. 19).

From a comparison of the various pagan religions it is apparent, that originally all religious life started from an impression of an overwhelming power; which impression could not fail to engender fear, as it was accompanied by a complete ignorance of the true nature and character of the power observed. But fear naturally leads to attempts at reconciling that which is feared; and as the understanding develops, and one light is lighted after the other, the attempts at reconciliation will result in a partial willingness to submit. Finally, when the idea of personal will holding the power awakens upon the consciousness, the willingness to submit will grow into a desire to obey; and religious life has thus reached the highest stage of development which it can attain within the bounds of Paganism. The old dispensation may be referred back to the covenant which God made with Abram: “And when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared to Abram, and said unto him, I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect. And I will make my covenant between me and thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly” (Gen. xvii. 1, 2). Here, too, the emphasis is laid upon the omnipotence of God, before whom it becomes man to walk in fear. But a new element, which in Paganism never reached beyond the dim dream, is here added in the form of direct promise,—the love of God to Abram: “And I will multiply thee exceedingly.” The law with its precepts, and the prophets with their promises, made the outlines of the old dispensation still more precise and definite. At the same time they introduced a new element in religious life,—that of understanding the will of God, that of true human wisdom; which element, however, was never severed from its moral complement; for “the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom: a good understanding have all they that do his commandments” (Ps. cxii. 10). Under the new dispensation, love, God’s love to man, appears as the true centre of religious life, instead of fear, man’s fear of God. Man has become chiefly in seeking the goodness of sin, the sonship of God, eternal life, etc., is offered him, and he has only to take it. But how? By faith. Faith, however, though a sacrifice of one’s self, a submission of one’s own righteousness to the righteousness of God (Rom. x. 3), and consequently a moral act which cannot be accomplished without the aid of God (1 Cor. ii. 5), has a much more strongly pronounced intellectual character than the wisdom of the old dispensation, because that which shall be accepted, that to which man shall surrender himself, is the truth. Christ calls himself the truth (John xiv. 6), and even the possession of eternal life is referred back to the knowledge of the truth (John xvii. 3). Thus the elements of religion, though always the same, change as religion grows from its first germ in Paganism to its full maturity in Christianity.

A scientific treatment, however, of the subject was not attempted until quite recent times. The Reformation made a beginning with its comprehensive and penetrating analysis of faith as the informing centre of all religious life. In the Confessio Augustana and the Apologia, faith, as the confidence that in Christ the grace of God has been offered to us, is represented as an act of the will; and this moral act is again represented as the necessary condition of any true knowledge of God. But the old Protestant, more especially the Lutheran, theologians, very soon left that track. Calovius, Quenstedt, Buddhaeus, J. Gerhard—they all represent the moral act in faith as preceded by a theoretical acceptance of the divinely revealed truth, the moral act being a subjective act purely intellectual; and in this they were followed both by the rationalists and the supersubnaturalists. The treatment of the subject received a much more powerful impulse from the development of German philosophy; though at times it looked as if philosophy were about to dissolve, and finally supersede religion. Kant excluded the idea of God from the competency of theoretical reason; and made it a mere postulate of practical reason: the existence of God is necessary for the realization of the highest good. But thus religion was defined as a mere recognition of God, and a mere knowledge of his moral law within the bounds of reason.
of our duties as divine commandments; that is, it was made a mere appendix to morals, and its innermost kernel, the direct relation between man and God, was set aside as something irrelevant. The opposite extreme was developed by Hegel. He considered all existence an evolution of the spirit. But the true character of spirit is thought; and the thinking of man, of the human spirit, of the subject, is the medium in which God, the divine spirit, the absolute, becomes conscious of itself. This process in its lowest form, in the form of feeling, to be distinguished from the form of imagination (art) and the form of pure thought (philosophy),—Hegel called religion; that is, while Kant had made religion a simple, practical matter, Hegel made it a merely theoretical interest. A re-action against those extremes was started by Jacoby and Schleiermacher. Both agreed in deriving religion from feeling, in making feeling the proper sphere of religion, the place in which it has its roots. But there was, nevertheless, a considerable difference between them. "Faith in God is an instinct in man," said Jacoby: "when spoken to, it will answer." But, in order to reach full clearness in his relation to God, Jacoby held that man must rise above his own nature, because nature with its continuous web of cause and effect conceals God, and again, with the rise of man, a distinction must be drawn; making the relation between man and God much deeper and much more direct, and finding its true expression, not in an instinct, ready to respond whenever it is touched, but in a never-dying feeling of absolute dependence. As representing the stand-point of Kant may be mentioned Wegscheider; Hegel is represented by Daub and Marheinecke; Schleiermacher by Nitzsch, Twesten, and Dorner. An attempt to go beyond Schleiermacher may be observed in Lipsius, Biedermann, and Pfeiderer, members of the so-called critical school.

C. The distinction between faith and Christian theology recognizes, and has always recognized, both that religion in general would be impossible without a direct activity for the purpose from the side of God, and that specially the Christian religion is the result of such an activity. In details, and more especially with reference to the different religions, the views of the character and nature of that activity may vary considerably; but there is general agreement with respect to its principal features,—that it must be a direct communication between the divine will and the human consciousness, that is, have the character of a revelation; and that the revelation must present, for acceptance by man, truths which give a new form to religious life, tend to gather communions or congregations which strive to express this new form. But the question then arises, whether that activity is identically the same at the origin of every religion,—like human nature, like the laws of spiritual development,—or whether the biblical revelation on which the Christian religion rests is the result of a special activity of a peculiar kind, which, in contradistinction from the general activity, may be designated as extraordinary and supernatural. Cf. Aüberlen: Die göttliche Offenbarung, Basel, 1861; Roth: Zur Dogmatik, Gotha, 1862; A. E. Krauss: Die Lehre von der Offenbarung, Gotha, 1868.

The New Testament (for the Old Testament see F. E. König: Der Offenbarungsbegriff des A. T., 1882, 2 vols.) speaks of a revealing activity of God, under the influence of which religious life has developed; but directly it makes no distinction between a general and a special revelation. The two terms it uses to express its ideas, ἀποκάλυψις and ἀποκαλύπτω, it applies promiscuously, both to the general manifestation of God in his creation and to the specific Christian revelation. Indirectly, however, the distinction is present. The revelations reported in Scripture—the signs, miracles, prophecies, and other manifestations to the ear and the eye, culminating in the incarnation—form a continuous series, a logically connected totality, discovering the divine scheme of salvation. And to this revelation in the objective world corresponds a revelation in the subjective world. The final reason why so large a portion of the human race remained outside of the communion with God established by the old dispensation was, according to Paul (Rom. i.), the lack of power to comprehend the plans of God, the loss of the very organ for the divine truth; it being impossible to appropriate this special revelation without an internal reanimation and revival. In the theology of the Reformers, this distinction between a general revelation, which can only prevent man from being overwhelmed in his own sin, and a special revelation, which alone can carry him safely to salvation, is set forth with great sharpness. The old orthodox theologians even made a distinction, with respect to the special revelation, between a revelation immediate, made to the prophets and apostles, and a revelation mediata, made to us through them. Nevertheless, the distinction was soon threatened with complete dissolution, and the attack came from two different points. On the one side, the general depravity of the race, which made a special revelation (objectively as well as subjectively) necessary, was denied; and, on the other side, the idea was supposed to be able to reach by itself the very truths of revelation, which made revelation itself superfluous. See the arts on Socinianism and Rationalism.

A strong re-action against rationalism, and its conception of religion as a merely intellectual recognition of the higher truths, naturally sprang up in the very moment, when, with Jacobi and Schleiermacher, the feeling, and not the intellect, was pointed out as the true source of religion; and a necessary result of that re-action was a complete remodelling of the relation between religion and revelation,—a complete reversal of the relation established by rationalism. The idea of revelation, almost extinguished by rationalism, now came to great honor. Yet it is a question, whether the distinction between the general and a special revelation, which Christian apologetics absolutely must insist upon, is not more radically hurt by the new theory than it ever could be by any of the propositions of rationalism. According to Jacobi, every strong religious emotion is a revelation, and outside of this inner enthusiasm there is no revelation; for God is felt only in secret, and the Word, which by itself reveals nothing, is set only to prove and corroborate the RENSgemeinschaft, 1781; MEINERS: Geschichte aller Religionen, Lemgo, 1788; REINHARDT: Geschichte der religiösen Ideen, Jena, 1789; DUFUSS: Origine de tous les Cultes, Paris, 1796.

As soon as the historical materials were collected, the philosophical treatment began, with Lessing: "Erzierung des Menschengeschlechts," 1780 (according to which all religion depends upon a revealing activity of God, whose purpose is the education of the race); and Herder: Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte, 1784. Before Kant published his Die Religion auf der Grenzen der reinen Vernunft, 1793, two other works appeared. — Tieftrunk: Entwurf einer Kritik der Religion, 1789; and J. G. Fichte: Versuch einer Kritik aller Offenbarung, 1792, which, on the basis of the Kantian philosophy, subjected religion to a severe criticism, reducing religious faith, the ideas of God, of the freedom of the will, and of the immortality of the soul, to mere postulates of practical reason. Leopold von Ranke, constructing religion on the basis, not of reason, but of feeling, F. Köppen published his Philosophie des Christenthums in 1813; and to the same sphere of influence (Kant-Jacobi) belongs Fries: Handbuch der Religionsphilosophie, though it was not published until 1832. Meanwhile the appearance of Schelling and Hegel gave a new and powerful impulse to the movement. To Schelling — who defined God as the absolute, and the absolute as full identity of the subjective and the objective, the ideal and the real, the finite and the infinite — absolute knowledge, or, as he called it, intellectual intuition, was the only medium through which man could become fully conscious of God. Religion he was consequently compelled to reject as a mistaken conception: see his Philosophie und Religion, 1804.

As soon as the historical materials were collected, the philosophical treatment began, with Lessing: "Erzierung des Menschengeschlechts," 1780 (according to which all religion depends upon a revealing activity of God, whose purpose is the education of the race); and Herder: Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte, 1784. Before Kant published his Die Religion auf der Grenzen der reinen Vernunft, 1793, two other works appeared. — Tieftrunk: Entwurf einer Kritik der Religion, 1789; and J. G. Fichte: Versuch einer Kritik aller Offenbarung, 1792, which, on the basis of the Kantian philosophy, subjected religion to a severe criticism, reducing religious faith, the ideas of God, of the freedom of the will, and of the immortality of the soul, to mere postulates of practical reason. Leopold von Ranke, constructing religion on the basis, not of reason, but of feeling, F. Köppen published his Philosophie des Christenthums in 1813; and to the same sphere of influence (Kant-Jacobi) belongs Fries: Handbuch der Religionsphilosophie, though it was not published until 1832. Meanwhile the appearance of Schelling and Hegel gave a new and powerful impulse to the movement. To Schelling — who defined God as the absolute, and the absolute as full identity of the subjective and the objective, the ideal and the real, the finite and the infinite — absolute knowledge, or, as he called it, intellectual intuition, was the only medium through which man could become fully conscious of God. Religion he was consequently compelled to reject as a mistaken conception: see his Philosophie und Religion, 1804.

Researches concerning the final cause of existence and the true nature of consciousness are as old as philosophy itself; and during the middle ages a relation actually sprang up between metaphysics and religion, so far as the first part of the representation of the theological system generally occupied itself with the question, whether man is able to demonstrate the existence of God, and found in the idea of his existence a direct revelation. But the relation remained barren. Philosophy and religion were more and more sharply separated from each other, the former being confined to that which is mathematically demonstrable, the latter to that which is directly revealed; and an application of the results of metaphysical researches to the various forms of religion was impossible, simply because the history of religion was not yet written. J. A. H. Böhrmann: Umbr in locis esse consensus et dissensus religionem profanorum, Jena, 1860; Jurieu: Histoire critique des dogmes et des cultes, Amsterdam, 1704; Köhler: Abriss aller bekannten Religionen, Jena, 1789; Kipping: Philosoph. Geschichte der natürlichen Geschlechtkunst, Brunswick, 1761; Ovriers: Geschichte der Religionen, Leipzig, 1781; Meiners: Geschichte aller Religionen, Lemgo, 1788; Reinhardt: Geschichte der religiösen Ideen, Jena, 1789; Dupuss: Origine de tous les Cultes, Paris, 1796.

As soon as the historical materials were collected, the philosophical treatment began, with Lessing: "Erzierung des Menschengeschlechts," 1780 (according to which all religion depends upon a revealing activity of God, whose purpose is the education of the race); and Herder: Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte, 1784. Before Kant published his Die Religion auf der Grenzen der reinen Vernunft, 1793, two other works appeared. — Tieftrunk: Entwurf einer Kritik der Religion, 1789; and J. G. Fichte: Versuch einer Kritik aller Offenbarung, 1792, which, on the basis of the Kantian philosophy, subjected religion to a severe criticism, reducing religious faith, the ideas of God, of the freedom of the will, and of the immortality of the soul, to mere postulates of practical reason. Leopold von Ranke, constructing religion on the basis, not of reason, but of feeling, F. Köppen published his Philosophie des Christenthums in 1813; and to the same sphere of influence (Kant-Jacobi) belongs Fries: Handbuch der Religionsphilosophie, though it was not published until 1832. Meanwhile the appearance of Schelling and Hegel gave a new and powerful impulse to the movement. To Schelling — who defined God as the absolute, and the absolute as full identity of the subjective and the objective, the ideal and the real, the finite and the infinite — absolute knowledge, or, as he called it, intellectual intuition, was the only medium through which man could become fully conscious of God. Religion he was consequently compelled to reject as a mistaken conception: see his Philosophie und Religion, 1804.

As soon as the historical materials were collected, the philosophical treatment began, with Lessing: "Erzierung des Menschengeschlechts," 1780 (according to which all religion depends upon a revealing activity of God, whose purpose is the education of the race); and Herder: Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte, 1784. Before Kant published his Die Religion auf der Grenzen der reinen Vernunft, 1793, two other works appeared. — Tieftrunk: Entwurf einer Kritik der Religion, 1789; and J. G. Fichte: Versuch einer Kritik aller Offenbarung, 1792, which, on the basis of the Kantian philosophy, subjected religion to a severe criticism, reducing religious faith, the ideas of God, of the freedom of the will, and of the immortality of the soul, to mere postulates of practical reason. Leopold von Ranke, constructing religion on the basis, not of reason, but of feeling, F. Köppen published his Philosophie des Christenthums in 1813; and to the same sphere of influence (Kant-Jacobi) belongs Fries: Handbuch der Religionsphilosophie, though it was not published until 1832. Meanwhile the appearance of Schelling and Hegel gave a new and powerful impulse to the movement. To Schelling — who defined God as the absolute, and the absolute as full identity of the subjective and the objective, the ideal and the real, the finite and the infinite — absolute knowledge, or, as he called it, intellectual intuition, was the only medium through which man could become fully conscious of God. Religion he was consequently compelled to reject as a mistaken conception: see his Philosophie und Religion, 1804.

Against Schelling's and Hegel's ideas of the absolute, though in many respects influenced by their methods, wrote Eschenmayer (Religionsphilosophie, 1818-24, 3 vols.), Franz von Baader (Fermenta cognitionis, 1822, Vorlesungen über Religionsphilosophie, 1827, and Vorlesungen über spekulative Dogmatik, 1829), and Heinrich Steffen (Religionsphilosophie, 1839, 2 vols.). All these writers have a more or less pronounced mystical character. The most interesting of them is Baader. He was a strict Romanist, but held that nature and Scripture reciprocally interpret each other, that a true natural philosophy and a true Christian theology must lead to the same results. Of still more importance among the adversaries of the pantheism of Schelling and Hegel are J. H. Fichte (Spekulative Theologie, 1848), and Ch. G. Weiss (Philosophische Dogmatik, 1855), who both are representatives of pure theism. Very characteristic is the proposition with which

The outlines of the drama were extended; non-scriptural matter was adopted, from the legends and other sources. Among the representations for the scene, for the representation of certain characters, such as the impotent thief. At last the church or the chapel became too small for the drama and the audience. Perhaps, also, incongruities crept in, or people began to think the whole business below the dignity of the clergy. As at events, in 1210 Innocent III. forbade to represent the plays in the churches, and also forbade the clergy to act.

After its removal from the church to the public square, the drama underwent many changes. It assumed a more historical character. Instead of a single episode, it undertook to represent the whole biblical history, from creation to doomsday. A huge stage was reared, consisting of three floors, of which the middle one represented earth, with heaven above, and hell below. Several hundred people might be engaged in the representation, which generally lasted for several days. The greatest change, however, and one by which a new kind of drama, the so-called moralities, was formed, consisted in the abandonment of the biblical text and the adoption of allegorical characters. Even in the oldest religious dramas, allegorical characters, such as Mercy, Justice, the synagogue, etc., occur; and when the drama fell into the hands of the laity, it was quite natural that they, more especially under the influence of the Renaissance, should develop a taste for a drama of a more secular character,—a drama which to a certain extent mirrored their own life, and expressed their own ideas. The moralities were invented in France; and in Paris their representation became the special privilege of the Bazochists, the guild of lawyers and advocates; while at the same time (1409) the Confrérie de la Passion erected the first stationary scene in Paris for the representation of mysteries. In England moralities also found much favor; and many plays of the kind were produced and became popular. In Germany, on the contrary, they hardly occur.

The moralities, as well as the mysteries, were strictly orthodox. They were to be performed in connection with the solemn extermines in France, the English interludes, the German fastnachts spiele. They were from their very origin, while yet mere episodes of the larger plays, humorous and satirical; and, when the Reformations began to put men's ideas and passions in communion, their satire was immediately directed against the Roman-Catholic Church and clergy. Already, in the first half of the thirteenth century, Anselm Fait de Caermon, a soldier keeping watch, etc.; and in the eleventh century the Christmas and the Easter plays were ready, though the period of their full bloom falls in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. In France they were called mistères (formerly derived from mysterium, now generally from ministerium); in England, miracles; in Spain, autos; in Germany, Wunder. They were played in the church and by the clergy, who also wrote them, and they made a deep impression on the audience, as many anecdotes show. Gradually the dialogues were rendered into the vernacular tongue, and the singing became more elaborate and artistic; thus the words of God were composed for three voices,—descent, tenor, and base,—with an allusion to the Holy Trinity.
RELIGIOUS LIBERTY. 2026

RELLY, James, b. at Jefferson, North Wales, 1720; d. in London about 1780. He may be regarded as the founder of the Universalist denomination from his association with John Murray. Both Relly and Murray were, in the early part of their career, disciples and co-workers of Whitefield. Very few particulars in the life of Note. — The value of this table is not in the accuracy and freshness of its figures (for manifestly in the case of the United States a former census has been used, and it is probably so in other cases), but in its presentation of the comparative strength of the various religions. The first column expresses the number of millions and fractions of millions there are in the respective countries; thus in the German Empire there are 42 and 72 hundredth millions.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>COUNTRIES</th>
<th>Population in Millions.</th>
<th>To every Thousand Inhabitants there are</th>
<th>CHRIStians.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Protestant</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Liechtenstein</td>
<td>0.01</td>
<td>1,000</td>
<td>1,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Portugal</td>
<td>4,56</td>
<td>1,000</td>
<td>1,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Spain</td>
<td>16.56</td>
<td>1,000</td>
<td>1,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Italy</td>
<td>27.50</td>
<td>1,000</td>
<td>1,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>France</td>
<td>56.34</td>
<td>1,000</td>
<td>1,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Germany</td>
<td>35.60</td>
<td>1,000</td>
<td>1,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>England</td>
<td>33.50</td>
<td>1,000</td>
<td>1,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Spain</td>
<td>16.56</td>
<td>1,000</td>
<td>1,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Portugal</td>
<td>4,56</td>
<td>1,000</td>
<td>1,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sweden and Norway</td>
<td>2.31</td>
<td>1,000</td>
<td>1,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Asia</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tibet</td>
<td>6.00</td>
<td>1,000</td>
<td>1,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mongolia</td>
<td>2.00</td>
<td>1,000</td>
<td>1,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

| AFRICA                           |                         |                                        |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
|                                 |                         |                                        |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| South Africa                    | 18.79                   |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Equatorial region               | 44.00                   |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Madagascar                      | 2.50                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Upper Guinea                    | 25.00                   |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Western Sudan                    | 21.80                   |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Egyptian Sudan                  | 10.75                   |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| British So. Africa              | 1.51                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| British S. America              | 1.85                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Abyssinia                        | 24.28                   |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Orange Republic                 | 0.80                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Sahara                          | 3.70                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Nubia                           | 1.00                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Islands in the Indian Ocean     | 0.81                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Islands in the Atlantic Ocean   | 0.57                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Algeria                         | 2.45                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Egypt                           | 6.25                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Morocco                         | 6.30                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Tunisia                         | 2.00                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Tripolis                        | 1.15                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |

| AMERICA                         |                         |                                        |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
|                                 |                         |                                        |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Mexico                          | 9.28                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Central America                 | 2.83                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Peru                            | 6.88                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Bolivia                         | 9.96                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Venezuela                      | 6.33                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Argentine Republic              | 2.38                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Paraguay                       | 0.96                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Hayd., Spanish and French West Indies | 3.17                   |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Brazil                          | 11.14                   |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Dutch, Danish, and Swedish West Indies | 3.85                   |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| British North America           | 3.95                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| United States of N. A.          | 38.92                   |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| British West Indies             | 1.07                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Patagonia and Terra del Fuego   | 0.02                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |
| Greenland                       | 0.01                    |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |

| Total grand                      | 1,424.19                |                                       |            |             |               |       |           |           |             |       |

Note: — The value of this table is not in the accuracy and freshness of its figures (for manifestly in the case of the United States a former census has been used, and it is probably so in other cases), but in its presentation of the comparative strength of the various religions. The first column expresses the number of millions and fractions of millions there are in the respective countries; thus in the German Empire there are 42 and 72 hundredth millions.
RELLOY. 2027

RENAISSANCE.

Relly have been preserved. Even Mr. Murray, his ardent admirer and convert, tells us nothing which would afford an insight into his personality. He became a Universalist about 1750, and organized a society a year or so later. His society, after his death, until its dissolution in 1790, was ministered to by laymen. He is best known through his writings, which are somewhat voluminous. Mr. Relly's style of writing is remarkably good, indicating more than ordinary culture. His principal works are as follows: The tryal of spirits, or a treatise upon the nature, offices, and operations of the Spirit of Truth, London, 1766, 2d ed., 1792; Union; or a treatise of the connexion and sympathy between Christ and his Church, 1759, reprinted, Philadelphia, 1843; Antichrist resisted, 1761; The life of Christ, 1782; The Sallaceus detected and refuted, 1784; Christian liberty, 1773; Epistles, or the great salvation contemplated, 1776; Salvation completed ("a discourse on that subject by J. R., written in the year 1765"), 1779; The soul of the sacrifices, or the true Christian baptism delineated, according to reason and spirit [n. d., 1779?]; The Cherubimical mystery, or an essay on the mission of Daniel the prophet, 1780.

The chief of his works—that in which his doctrinal views are most fully elaborated, together with the grounds on which they rest and the objections to the opposite views—is his Union. In it he attempts to show that the mystical relationship between Christ and humanity. Christ's relation to men is like that of the head to the different members of the body. His actions and thoughts, therefore, are ours: his obedience and sufferings are ours. He has brought the whole human race into the divine favor as fully as if each member had obeyed and suffered in his own person, and thus has secured a complete salvation. His theology is of the ethical type, maintaining that there must be perfect harmony between the divine attributes. Of the Almighty he says, "that, as a God infinite in goodness, he doth not, will not, act from one attribute to the dishonor of another." He believed in the literal resurrection of the body. He says,

"What does the term 'resurrection' imply, if not the rising again to life of that which was subjected to death? But the soul is immortal. . . . It is the body only that dies. Therefore the future resurrection of the dead, if there be any, must be that of the body." He confesses, however, that the rising again of mankind in the second Adam from the sin in which they were involved in the first Adam implies a quickening and renewal of the mind through the truth. He teaches the millennial coming of Christ, in which the believers shall rise and reign with him. Afterwards, those who are under condemnation shall rise; and, through the mediacion of the saints, they shall be brought to Christ and commended to a good and generous philanthropy. As to the nature of Christ, the views of Relly do not seem to differ from those which were accounted orthodox in his time. His writings show him to be a man of intellectual vigor, versed in theology, a careful student of the Scriptures, a keen logician, and a good controversialist. He must have been a powerful preacher, inasmuch as Mr. Murray, who abhorred Universalism, and who had been especially appointed to refute the Union, was converted by the first sermon which he heard him preach. ELMER H. CAPEN (President Tuffs College).

REMIGIUS, St., b. probably in 457; d. Jan. 13, 533. He was made bishop of Rheims in 459, and was an intimate friend of Clovis, whom he converted to Christianity. Twice he was made the subject of a fraudulent fiction invented for political purposes by Hincmar of Rheims; first as having anointed Clovis with oil from the sacred ampuia, and next as having received a letter from Pope Hormisdas recognizing him as primas of France. He has left four letters. The Commentary on the Pauline Epistles, ed. by J. B. Villalpandus (1896), and also found in Bib. Max. (Lyons, 1877), is not by him, but by Remigius of Ausio.

REMPHAN (more correctly Raiphan), a god, so called in Acts vii. 43. It occurs in a quotation from the Septuagint of Amos v. 26, where the Hebrew has Chian. The god is generally identified with Saturn.

RENAISSANCE, The, is the term now commonly used to designate the general movement of the human mind against the system of government in Church and State which prevailed in Europe during the middle age. That system was founded upon the principle of absolute authority in both spheres, in accordance with the supposed divine order for the government of the world. The Church maintained this principle in its control of the consciences, opinions, and acts of men in their relations to subjects within its special jurisdiction; while the civil power, claiming the same divine origin, ruled with the same authority in their relations to subjects in the civil state. The theory was, that there could be no lawful resistance to the duly constituted authority either in Church or State, and no conceivable opposition between them, because the divine will was represented by its lawful exercise in either sphere. Against this theory, upon which the medieval system was based, a revolt began in the twelfth century, which, in one form or another, continued to assert itself with aggressive force throughout Western Europe for nearly four hundred years; and that revolt is known by the general name of the "Renaissance." This movement was most active during the transition period between the middle age proper and our modern era (1100-1500), and its influence is clearly seen in some of the most characteristic features of existing civilization. It may be described in general terms as a struggle of individualism to control the forces of European life as against the power of Church and State as organized in the middle age.

The movement, as a general one throughout the countries of Western Europe, is said to have begun with the teachings of Abelard (1079-1142); and its special work was not completed, at least in France, until the close of the sixteenth century. Two eras are to be distinguished in its history: first, that in which the assertion of this claim to individualism — which is, after all, only another name for the right of private judgment — was boldly avowed, and persistently maintained, by scholars and philosophers, as a distinct general principle; and the second, that in which the outgrowth of these opinions, and the changes which they produced in the condition of European society, became conspicuous. The first was seed-time, the second the harvest. The former, by the light of the twelfth century, laid the dark night of nearly a century, in which the "new birth," the Renaissance, seemed to have reached an untimely end. The following is an outline, in their historical order, of some of the principal events in which this spirit of individualism — afterwards known, from the marvellous changes it produced in European life, as the Renaissance, or "new birth" — exhibited itself.

1. Abelard (1079-1142) was the first great scholar in the middle age who openly maintained the principle of individualism in a definite form against that of the authority of the church as recognized and settled in his time. He did not claim, as later scholars did, that the church had actually reached wrong conclusions in any given case; but that it had, by the practice of the ex, that is, their own declaration of her own infallibility in all cases should be binding upon Christians, was a false one. Anselm had formulated the church's position by asserting that we must believe in order that we may be able to understand; Abelard, on the contrary, insisted that we must first understand before we can believe. Abelard, although condemned by the church for this and other errors, had many disciples, who, adopting his theory, did not hesitate to discuss and condemn many things which were done under the claim of church authority. Indeed, so wide-spread and potent was the influence of Abelard's example, that, according to Hallam, the greater part of the literature of the middle age from the twelfth century may be considered as artillery levelled against the very_mount, not merely in settling the belief, but in the nature and extent of the marriage obligation, the encouragement of the troubadours, whose love-songs are the expression of an important phase in the life of the time, all this was a genuine revolt, as much directed against the church's ideal conception of Christian virtue based upon poverty and self-denial, as it was against the recognition of the authority which enforced its discipline. The nobles denied the power of the church, whose restraints had become distasteful to them; and naturally they found justification for their course in opinions regarded as heretical. The example of the nobility was followed by the peasants, who, known in history as the Albigenses, had long been ready to revolt against the church for another and opposite reason: viz., that its doctrines, as well as its authority, did not seem to them to be in accordance with the principles and examples revealed in the New Testament. As is well known, this revolt against the authority of the church was cruelly crushed in the thirteenth century: still it must be regarded as one of the most important movements of the earlier Renaissance against that authority which had been recognized as paramount, not merely in settling the belief, but in regulating the lives and actions, of men. While the Provençal poetry was the outgrowth of an age and race thus characterized by disbelief and gross materialism, according to the time and standard, the Norman ballads and the lays of the minnesingers in Germany, about the same era, seem to have been consistent with devotion to the authority of the church, and with the encouragement of the robust virtues of chivalry.

4. From Provence the spirit of opposition to the church's theory of the universality of its jurisdiction, and to the nature of the ideal of life which it set forth as the highest, passed into Italy. Dante (1310), Petrarch (1348), and Bon-Renaissance.

The first or early Renaissance, then, was characterized by a general restlessness in European society; a strong desire making itself manifest through philosophers and poets, and by habits of self-indulgence, to free life from those restraints in opinions and acts which the Church and the State, by means of their universal authority, recognized for ages, had imposed upon it.

There was a long eclipse of the light shed by the earlier Renaissance, but at somewhat different epochs in the different countries of Europe. In Italy it occurred during the long struggle which resulted in the downfall of the city republics; in France and England, during the hundred years war between those countries; and in Germany, during that reign of force and terror which accompanied the decline of the imperial power. During this eclipse the pretensions of the popes to absolutism became more pronounced than ever.

The new orders of the Dominicans and Franciscans were their most active agents in repressing heresies, and in enforcing on the churchmen the faith and virtues being in their hands, the most slavish theories of passive obedience to civil as well as to ecclesiastical authority were taught there. But nothing could restrain the bursting-forth in due time of the new and greater Renaissance, the force of which, unlike that of the earlier one, has gone on to the present day.

5. In Italy this revival was mainly stimulated by the enthusiasm awakened among scholars by the study of the works of the great writers of antiquity, and especially of Greek authors, whose writings were first brought to the knowledge of scholars in Western Europe during the fifteenth century and by the discovery of the works of Greek art. There had been many learned Greeks, and many manuscripts of Greek authors, in Italy before the taking of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453; but the discovery of the manuscripts in Greek was accompanied by the spirit of the new and greater Renaissance, the force of which, unlike that of the earlier one, has gone on to the present day.

The study of Greek literature, especially of Homer and the Greek historians, was begun in Italy in the latter part of the fourteenth century. The study of Homer had been introduced into Italy by the Dominicans, but it was the Franciscans who first began to study the Greek historians. The Franciscans, who were the first to study the Greek historians, were followed by the Dominicans, who were the first to study the Greek authors of the classical period.

The study of Greek literature, especially of Homer and the Greek historians, was begun in Italy in the latter part of the fourteenth century. The study of Homer had been introduced into Italy by the Dominicans, but it was the Franciscans who first began to study the Greek historians. The Franciscans, who were the first to study the Greek historians, were followed by the Dominicans, who were the first to study the Greek authors of the classical period.

The study of Greek literature, especially of Homer and the Greek historians, was begun in Italy in the latter part of the fourteenth century. The study of Homer had been introduced into Italy by the Dominicans, but it was the Franciscans who first began to study the Greek historians. The Franciscans, who were the first to study the Greek historians, were followed by the Dominicans, who were the first to study the Greek authors of the classical period.
have given them fame unrivalled in the history of art, all their works are stamped with this peculiarity of the time, as distinguishing them from artists of the middle age: (1) They are utterly free from any conventional type, but are pre-eminently the expression of individual and original genius; and (2) Their ideal of form and beauty is in the portrayal of Christian subjects, the natural or Greek type, wholly unlike that consecrated by the piety and usage of the church in the middle age.

It was the passionate love of the literature and art of antiquity, and especially of Greek, which made Christian Italy during the Renaissance essentially pagan in opinion and life. The study of Greek in Germany and in England produced the same effect in disintegrating and crumbling the Catholic faith and authority in those countries, but in a different way. In Italy the tendency was to make life practically Pagan: north of the Alps, to which region the study of Greek soon spread, it became the seed of Protestantism. In the hands of such scholars as Erasmus, Melanchthon, and Erhard Bocock in Germany, and as Colet and Sir Thomas More in England, a knowledge of Greek became a key to the interpretation of the original tongue in which the New Testament was written. It was thus the most powerful instrument of biblical study, and became a formidable instrument in assailing the doctrines, practices, and traditions of the Roman Church, and necessarily the authority of that church upon which so much that was distinctive in its system was based. The recent invention of printing, spreading the result of these investigations far more widely than any other agency could have done, strengthened and made permanent the revolt known in history as the Protestant Reformation. In France the revival of letters did not produce so great, or at least so immediate, a result as was the case in other countries. The French campaigns in Italy, under Charles VIII., and Francis I., made those sovereigns familiar with the brilliant culture which prevailed in that country, and stimulated a desire to introduce it into their own. Greek scholars such as Lascaris, and artists such as Leonardo da Vinci, were invited to France by Francis I. For various reasons the influence of the new learning was not so marked there as elsewhere in the sixteenth century. It is seen, probably, more conspicuously in the new style of architecture which it introduced into France, called “La Renaissance,” than in any thing else.

The general tendency, however, throughout Europe during the whole of the sixteenth century, was shown in a great variety of ways toward the decline of the Church in authority, and the decline in the recognition of the principle of authority, until this tendency reached its logical outcome in the Reformation. This tendency was much strengthened by the results of the discovery of America,—an event which, if the church's theory of the earth's cosmogony had been well founded, would have been simply impossible. The discovery of a new world turned men's thoughts, beliefs, and aspirations into a new channel. It opened to individualism in action a field wider and more attractive than any which had hitherto been presented to it. Love of adventure, enterprise, an ardent thirst for wealth, took the place of the typical virtues of the middle age,—celibacy, poverty, and obedience; and thus the last bond which united the life of the time to that of the mediæval era in Europe was broken.

LUT. — BURCKHARDT: Renaissance in Italy; SYMONDES: Renaissance, 1875-77, 3 vols.; LECKY: Hist. of Rationalism; European Morals; DRAPER: Intellectual Development of Europe; LAURENT: L'histoire de l'humanité; LEA: Studies in Ch. History; REMUSAT: Life of Anselm; GUIZOT: History of Civilization, general, and in France; VILLARI: Machiavelii e Savonarola. C. J. STILLE.

RENA'TA, Duchess of Ferrara, daughter of Louis XII. of France, and Anne of Bretagne; b. at Blois, Oct. 25, 1511; d. at Montargis, June 12, 1575. She received an excellent education,—understood Latin and Greek, had studied philosophy and theology, mathematics and astronomy,—and was in 1528 married to Hercules of Este, who in 1534 succeeded to the ducal throne of Ferrara. From early youth she inclined towards Protestantism. She encouraged Braccio to translate the Bible into Italy, and as Colet and Sir Thomas More in England, she encouraged Braccioli to translate the New Testament into the original tongue in which the New Testament was written. It was thus the most powerful instrument of biblical study, and became a formidable instrument in assailing the doctrines, practices, and traditions of the Roman Church, and necessarily the authority of that church upon which so much that was distinctive in its system was based. The recent invention of printing, spreading the result of these investigations far more widely than any other agency could have done, strengthened and made permanent the revolt known in history as the Protestant Reformation. In France the revival of letters did not produce so great, or at least so immediate, a result as was the case in other countries. The French campaigns in Italy, under Charles VIII. and Francis I., made those sovereigns familiar with the brilliant culture which prevailed in that country, and stimulated a desire to introduce it into their own. Greek scholars such as Lascaris, and artists such as Leonardo da Vinci, were invited to France by Francis I. For various reasons the influence of the new learning was not so marked there as elsewhere in the sixteenth century. It is seen, probably, more conspicuously in the new style of architecture which it introduced into France, called “La Renaissance,” than in any thing else.

The general tendency, however, throughout Europe during the whole of the sixteenth century, was shown in a great variety of ways toward the decline of the Church in authority, and the decline in the recognition of the principle of authority, until this tendency reached its logical outcome in the Reformation. This tendency was much strengthened by the results of the discovery of America,—an event which, if the church's theory of the earth's cosmogony had been well founded, would have been simply impossible. The discovery of a new world turned men's thoughts, beliefs, and aspirations into a new channel. It opened to individualism in action a field wider and more attractive than any which had hitherto been presented to it. Love of adventure, enterprise, an ardent thirst for wealth, took the place of the typical virtues of the middle age,—celibacy, poverty, and obedience; and thus the last bond which united the life of the time to that of the mediæval era in Europe was broken.

Herzog.

REPEN'TANCE (the rendering, in the New Testament, of the Greek περιφέρεια) signifies a change of mind and disposition. This idea can never be wanting where there is a genuine and earnest consciousness of the divine commands and human
The obligation to repent will only be acted upon when pardon and atonement have been offered to alloy the guilt, condemnation, and pain of conscience. In the Old Testament the need of pardon is insisted upon; and pardon is offered for all sins committed without forethought or in haste, provided it is sought by the offering of a sacrifice to the God of mercy. In the realms and prophets a broken and contrite heart is substituted for sacrifices (Ps. li.; Joel ii. 13). The motives for the cultivation of such a state of heart are human guilt and the divine willingness to forgive sin (Isa. xlv. 22). God himself creates the new heart (Ps. li.; Ezek. xxxvi. 25 sqq.), converts (Jer. xxxi. 18), and promises a dispensation in which he will write his law upon the heart (Jer. xxxi. 31 sqq.). The Mediator of the new covenant, and his forerunner, John the Baptist, began their public labors with the call to repentance (Matt. iii. 2, iv. 17; Mark i. 15). Citizenship in the kingdom of heaven depends upon this change of disposition. Jesus announced the code of the repentant sinner in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v.—vii.), and gave a picture of such a one in the parable of the prodigal son (Luke xv.), who, “coming to himself,” returned in humility, and with the confession of his sins, to his father. The thief was saved on the cross (Luke xxiii. 40 sqq.) when he besought the mercy of the crucified Saviour. The apostles called upon the people to “repent and be baptized,” and urged, as the strongest reason for it, the elevation of Christ, the Saviour of the world, to the right hand of God (Acts iii. 19, xi. 18). They used the term εὐλάβεια as synonymous with γνῶσις (Acts iii. 19, ix. 35). The most emphatic statement of the thoroughness of this moral change is made by Paul when he speaks of it as a burial with Christ, which is followed by a change of life (Rom. vi. 2 sqq.; Col. ii 12 sqq.), and in the Gospel of John, where it is spoken of as a new birth from above (John i. 12 sqq., iii. 4). This brings us to the theological meaning of repentance, which is the change of heart which goes before it, and which is called regeneration. From the stand-point of regeneration, the change of heart is an act of God; from the stand-point of repentance, an act of the human will.

In the Roman-Catholic Church, baptism is regarded as simultaneous with regeneration and the washing-away of sins. It imposes, however, certain exercises, obligations, and burdens upon its members, which are subsumed under the head of penance (see art.). The Reformers went back to the original idea of repentance as “a transmutation of the mind and affections” (transmutatio mentis et affectus—Luther); and Luther, in his ninety-five theses, asserted that the entire life should be a penance, penitential act. The decisive element in repentance, or metanoia, is faith. Repentance, therefore, consists of contrition for sin, and faith in Jesus Christ; or, as the Augsburg Confession puts it, of “contrition, or the terrors of a startled conscience for sin, and faith which is conceived by the gospel, or pardon, and believes its sins to be forgiven for Christ’s sake.” Good works are the necessary fruits of true repentance. Calvin did not differ from Luther, although he failed to emphasize the pangs for sin committed as much as he.
the Pope himself undertook to fill his place, because it had become vacant apud sedem apostolicam; and in 1265 Clement IV. formally established the rule concerning the Reservatio ex capite vacationis apud sedem apostolicam. Honorius IV. extended the rule, in 1286, also to cases in which the incumbent resigned his benefice into the hands of the Pope; and Boniface VIII. defined, in 1291, the apud sedem apostolicam as a circuit two days' journey distant from Rome. New kinds of reservations were 1310. XXII. decreed that all benefices which became vacant apud sedem apostolicam— not only by death, but also by deposition, cancelling of election, promotion, transference, etc.— were reserved for the Pope. The annoyances and scandalous transactions which were caused by this practice gave rise to much complaining, and the Council of Trent also effected some reforms; but it was the concordat which the popes were compelled to make with the various states which finally brought order and justice out of confusion.

H. F. JACOBSON.

RESIDENCE (that is, the personal presence at the place of one's office) seems to be a duty more evident in the case of an ecclesiastic than in that of any other official. Nevertheless, at a very early time it was found necessary to forbid absence. See Concil. Nicom. (325), can. 15, 16; Antiach. (341), can. 3; Can. Apost., 15, 16. Similar rules were established also in the Frankish Empire by Boniface. The accumulation of benefices, however, and other still more frivolous reasons, made absence one of the most glaring and widespread misuses of the church in the time of the Reformation. But the Council of Trent succeeded only in introducing partial reforms in the Roman-Catholic Church; while in the Protestant churches the abuse speedily disappeared, and made all legislation superfluous.

H. F. JACOBSON.

RESTORATION. See Apokatastasis.

RESIGNATION, the submission of the soul to the will of God, is a Christian grace distinguishing Christian from heathen ethics. Although the will of God is irresistible, Christian resignation is a voluntary act of submission, and rests upon the assurance that all things must work together for good to them that love God (Rom. viii. 28). The love of God for man, as revealed in the New Testament, awakens a sense of imperturbable trust in his care, the very hairs of our head being all numbered (Matt. x. 30). Resignation is therefore a mixture of voluntary obedience, humility, and trust. Christian is the element of this grace, and exhibited its highest manifestation in Gethsemane. Christian resignation is distinguished from Stoic submission and Mohammedan fatalism by being voluntary, and based upon the confidence that God will make all things to combine for the good of those that love him. CARL BECK.

RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD. 1. Definition. The New Testament does not use the term "resurrection" in a figurative one, taken from the conception of the deposit of the dead body under the ground. It stands in antithesis to the body's lying or resting in the grave. The essential reference of the term, however, is to the revivification of the dead, and the resumption of bodily and spiritual existence by them after a period of interruption. The firm belief in the resurrection and the eternal life is one of the products of Christianity, and rests upon the resurrection of Christ. Outside of Christian circles, death is and always has been the king of terrors. In the Old Testament the hope of the resurrection becomes clearer and clearer as revelation progresses. The prophets declare that the righteous shall participate in the consummation of the kingdom of God. The resurrection of the righteous is distinctly referred to in Isa. xxvi. 19 sqq. Ezekiel could not have used the category of ched xxv and xxvi. without a reference to it; and Daniel (xii. 2,3) distinguishes between the resurrection of the just and the unjust. Although this hope does not seem to us to be referred to in Ps. xvi. 9 sqq., xlviii. 14, lxviii. 20, it certainly is in Ps. xlix. 15, lxxii. 22 sqq. The Book of Job also assumes the continuation of the communion of the righteous with God after death in xix. 25-27. The New Testament everywhere assumes or states the doctrine of the resurrection. Christ calls himself the "resurrection and the life" (John xi. 25). Paul (Rom. viii. 11) conceives of this resurrection as already begun in the soul. He that hath the Son of God hath the eternal life already begun in him (John iii. 36; 1 John v. 12). The resurrection from the dead is regarded as one of the elementary truths of Christianity (Heb. vi. 1); and although Paul gives a sort of an argument for it in 1 Cor. xv., yet it may be said that the doctrine is considered so indisputable as not to be deemed in need of proof by the writers of the New Testament. It takes its root in the nature of God, in his relation to believers as his children.

2. Mote. — In regard to the manner of the resurrection we must confess that we know only in part. All mere human theories are mere guesses. We are shut up to the Bible: God (Rom. iv. 17, etc.) or Christ (John vi. 39) raises from the dead. This act will be consummated at the end of the world, or the second coming of Christ. According to 1 Thess. iv. 16 sqq., and 1 Cor. xv. 28 sqq., the righteous will be raised first, and take part in the judgment with Christ, then will follow the resurrection of the rest. In reference to the relation of the body of the resurrection to the present body, we may say in general that it will be subject to all the laws of the eternal life. We shall participate in the glory of God, and be like Christ. There will be a spiritual body (1 Cor. xv. 44 sqq.). Augustine (Serm. 89) defined it by the attributes, impassibility, lucidity, alertness, etc. The main point is its freedom from the service of sin and all mere sensualism. We can form to ourselves some conception of it from the transfiguration of Christ (Matt. xvii. 1 sqq.) and by the words used by Paul, "We shall be changed" (1 Cor. xv. 51). The difference of the sexes will continue, but there will be no prolongation of the sexual passion. We shall be like the angels (Luke xx. 34). The identity of the resurrection body cannot be denied. Origen and others hold to the survival of the external form and appearance (ro eido); others hold to the survival only of the individuality, the essential nature which forms the body; others hold that already here on earth there is an organ or body of the soul, the ethereal body, which exists between the physical body and the soul. The consummation of this ethereal or spiritual body occurs at the resurrection, and its present relation to its future condition is represented by the relation of the seed to the ripe fruit. But why should not the soul be its own eternal body? The soul itself, as J. H. Fichte says, forms the body; and the body of the resurrection will correspond to the individuality of the soul, and to the present body so far as it is characteristic of the individual.

LIT. — The literature is very large. See the various works on systematic theology; the Biblical Psychologies of Becker and Delitzsch; Lutheran: Lehre von den letzten Dingen, Leipzig, 1851, 2d ed., 1870; Rinck: Vom Zustand nach d. Todt, Basel, 1881, 3d ed., 1878; Flörke: Lehre von d. letzten Dingen, Rostock, 1888; Hamburger: Physica sacra, Stuttgart, 1869; Cremer: Aufstellung der Todten, Barmen, 1870; Schünkel: Geheimnisse d. Glaubens, Heidelb., 1872; Aberger: Hist. of the Doctrine of a Future Life, Phila., 1864; Lotze: Mikrokosmus (iii. 2, Von d. Sitz d. Seele, Allgegenwart d. Seele im Körper), Leipzig, 1874; 3d ed., 1880; Ullrich: Gott u. der Mensch, Leipzig, 1877; Wagenmann: De arte predicandi, 1504 (which points more markedly in the direction of the Reformation), De arte caballistica, 1516, etc.; and how great a fame and confidence he enjoyed is shown by the circumstance, that in 1502 the Suabian Union chose him for their judge.

In 1506 he first made the acquaintance of Pfefferkorn, a converted Jew holding some office in the asylum of St. Ursula at Cologne; but from that moment his life was filled with anxiety and misery. Pfefferkorn had obtained a decree from the emperor, Maximilian I., ordering all Jews living in the empire to give up their books to Pfefferkorn for examination, and permitting Pfefferkorn to confiscate and burn such books as contained polemical utterances against Christianity. Pfefferkorn wished to have Reuchlin for his partner in this enterprise, but Reuchlin excused himself. He was, nevertheless, dragged into it. Through the influence of Mayence he received an imperial order to present a memoir on the question of burning all the books, an attempt setting forth the absurdity of such a measure, was shown to Pfefferkorn; and he printed it in his Handspiegel, 1510, with the most venomous commentaries. Reuchlin answered with his Augenspiegel, 1511; but the theological faculty of Cologne then charged a committee with examining the orthodoxy of the Augenspiegel, and the Dominican inquisitor, Hoogstraaten, took openly on the side of Pfefferkorn. The committee found forty-three condemnable propositions in the Augenspiegel; Hoogstraaten stepped forward as formal accuser, 1518; and for seven years Reuchlin always felt the danger of the stake hovering about him. The court of Spires fully acquitted him, March 29, 1514, and sentenced Hoogstraaten to pay a fine of a hundred and eleven gulden. But Hoogstraaten appealed to the Pope; and Leo X. formed a court, under the presidency of Benignus de Salviani, archbishop of Nazareth. July 2, 1516, the court gave its verdict, which was an unqualified acquittal of Reuchlin; but the Pope dared not confirm the decision in the face of the powerful party of the Dominicans, who actually of Christ and the Spirit to the seven churches;” and it is indubitable that “all this was generally understood in the first two centuries of the apostle John” (Hilgenfeld).

Traces of the use of the book are also found as early as Tertullian, and the Testt. xii. Patt.; John’s pupil, Papias, witnessed to its credibility; Justin (147) declares it an inspired prophecy of the apostle John. No church writer expresses a different opinion (Gaiseric of Rome has been misunderstood) until Dionysius of the third century, who, on purely internal grounds, denies it to the author of the Gospel, although asserting it to be certain that its author was some holy and inspired John, who saw a revelation, and received knowledge and prophecy. Nor did doubt, when it had thus once entered the church, spread rapidly. The third century closes without giving us the name of another doubter; and although Eusebius himself wavers, and tells us that opinion in his day was much divided, and soon afterwards the Syrian Church rejected it, - not without affecting the churches, by his general and archbishop of Upsala in 1856. His principal work is Soenskakyrka ushia (History of the Swedish Church), 1838-63, 5 vols., reaching to exhaustiveresearches, but often admitting too little evidence for the apostolical authorship of the Apocalypse decisive, just on that account deny to him the Gospel, which they assign to some other John. The Tubingen school, on the other hand, rightly judging the evidence for the apostolical authorship of the Apocalypse decisive, just on that account deny to him the Gospel. Several extremists wish to pronounce both books forgeries. The church at large, on the other hand, together with the great majority of critics, defends the common apostolical authorship of both books; although some feel compelled to place them as far apart in date as possible, in order to account for their internal unlikeliness: so, e.g., Hase, Revillé, Weiss (1882), Farrar, Niermeyer. The grounds of modern objection are almost wholly internal, turning on divergences between the Gospel and Apocalypse in doctrinal conception, point of view, style, language. But Gebhardt has shown that no argument against unity of authorship can be drawn from the doctrinal relations of the two books; and every new investigation into the differences of style and language renders it more and more plain that it is consistent with unity of authorship. “The difference in the language can . . . have no decisive weight attached to it” (Reuss).

The integrity and unity of the book are not in dispute. Grothus, Vogel, Schleiermacher, Völter, and (at one time) Bleek stand alone in doubting them. To-day “the assumption of the unity of the Apocalypse forms the uniform basis of all works upon it” (Völter). Its text, because of the comparatively few manu-
The term "the Lord's Day," for Sunday, is unique in the New Testament; the office of "pastor," found elsewhere clearly marked in the New Testament only in the case of James, is here assumed as universal in Asia Minor, and well settled; the public reading (i. 3) of the Christian writings in the churches is spoken of as a usage of long standing, and a matter of course.

On the other hand, it is not long before the ruling opinion among critics, that the book comes from a time previous to the destruction of Jerusalem. The chief arguments which are urged in its support are: (1) The whole tradition of the Domitianic origin of the Apocalypse hangs on Irenaeus; and it is quite conceivable that Irenaeus has fallen into an error, either as to time alone (e.g., Stuart), or as to matter as well, the banishment, and hence the time of it, and hence the date of the Apocalypse, all depending on a misconception of Rev. i. 9 (e.g., Disterdieck). But Rev. i. 9 seems most naturally to imply a banishment. Irenaeus does not depend on any inference from the book, but mentions excellent independent sources of information in the matter. It does not follow, because all the evidence of John in the first three centuries is considered, that it is dependent on Irenaeus. Eusebius, on the contrary, understands Clement to the same effect, and appeals as well to a plurality of sources (H. E., III. 20). (2) There is not even an obscure reference in the book to the destruction of Jerusalem as a past event,— a catastrophe of too great importance in God's dealings with his church to be passed over in silence in a book of this kind. This would probably be a valid argument if the book were thought to be a history or practical treatise written about 70-80; but, if a prophecy written about 95, it is too much to demand that it should contain reference to a catastrophe the lessons of which had been long since learned, and which belonged to a stadium of development as well as date long past. (3) Jerusalem is spoken of in it as still standing, and the temple as still undestroyed (xi. 1, 2, 9 sq., and even i. 1, ii. 9, iii. 9, vi. 12, 16),— a statement which proceeds on a literalistic interpretation confessedly not applicable throughout the book, or in the parallel case of Ezek. xi. sq. (4) The time of writing is exactly fixed by the description of the then reigning emperor in xii. 13 and xvii. 7-12. Until, however, it be agreed who this emperor is,— whether Nero (Berthold, Bruston), or Galba (Reuss, Ewald, Hugendubel, Gebhardt), or Vespasian (Bleeck, De Wette, Disterdieck, Weiss),— this reasoning is not strong; and the interpretation on which it is founded (implying the assumption that the ideal date of any vision can be the actual date of the book itself) is exceedingly unnatural in itself, cannot be made to fit the description, except by extreme pressure of its language, and by the Testament itself expounding the vision. If, not, indeed, the invention of what is known as the "Nero fable." (5) The chief argument with evangelical men, however, is that derived from the literary differences between the Apocalypse and Gospel of John, which are thought by many to be too great to be explained, except on the supposition that a long period of time intervened between the writing of the two books. The difference in dogmatic conception and point of view will hardly, however, after Gebhardt’s investigations, be asserted to be greater than may be explained by the diverse purposes and forms of the two writings; and it is perfectly vain to contend that the differences in style and language are such as are explicable by lapse of time. The Apocalypse of knowledge of, or command over, Greek syntax or vocabulary: the difference lies, rather, in the manner in which a language well in hand is used, in style, properly so called; and the solution of it must turn on psychological, and not chronological, considerations. Every new investigation diminishes the amount and significance of the difference on the one hand, and on the other renders it more and more clear that its explanation is to be sought in the different requirements of the well-marked types of composition and the divergent mental condition of the writer. The evangelist, dealing freely with his material, takes pains to write better Greek than was customary with him;
the seer is overwhelmed with the visions crowding upon him, and finds no other speech fit for them than that of antiquity, and therefore rightly yields himself to a prophetic, ance on the one hand, and on the other renders it more and more clear that its explanation is to be sought in the different requirements of the well-marked types of composition and the divergent mental condition of the writer. The evangelist, dealing freely with his material, takes pains to
write better Greek than was customary with him;
the seer is overwhelmed with the visions crowding
upon him, and finds no other speech fit for
them than that of antiquity, and therefore rightly yields himself to a prophetic,

The plan and structure of the book, the whole of which seems to have been seen by John in one day (i. 10), are exceedingly artistic, and are based on progressive repetitions of sevenfold visions.
It thus advertises to us at once its copious use of numerical symbolism, and the principle underlying its structure. Ewald, Volkmann, Rinck, Weiss, Farrar, have further correctly seen that the whole consists of seven sections, and thus constitutes a sevenfold series of sevens, and symbolizes the perfection and finality of its revelation. Five of these sections are clearly marked: it is more difficult to trace the other two. But, if we follow the indications of the natural division of the matter, we shall find the separating line between them
xix. 11 (so De Wette, Weiss, Godet, Hilgenfeld).
The plan of the whole, then, is as follows: Prologue, i. 1–8; (1) The seven churches, i. 9–iii.
22; (2) The seven seals, iv. 1–viii. 1; (3) The seven trumpet, viii. 2–xi. 19; (4) The seven mystic figures, xii. 1–xiv. 20; (5) The seven bowls, xv. 1–xvi. 21; (6) The sevenfold judgment on the whore, xvii. 1–xix. 10; (7) The sevenfold triumph, xix. xi–xxii. 5; Epilogue, xxii. 6–21.
The sevenfold subdivision of each section is easy to trace in all cases except in (4), (6), and (7), where it is more difficult to find, and is more doubtful.

Within this elaborate plan is developed the action of a prophetic poem unsurpassed in sacred or profane literature in either the grandeur of its poetic imagery, or the superb sweep of its pro-

1 The early date is now accepted by perhaps the majority of scholars. In its favor, besides the arguments mentioned by the author of the article, may be urged the allusion to the temple at Jerusalem (xi. 1 sq.), in language which implies that it yet existed, but would speedily be destroyed; and, further, the dating of the Revelation is best authenticated by the earlier date, while its historical understanding is greatly facilitated. With the great conflagration at Rome, and the Neronian persecution fresh in mind, with the horrors of the besieging Jewish war then going on, and in view of the destruction of Jerusalem as an impending fact, it is easy to see how John received the visions of the conflicts and the final victories of the Christian Church. His book came, therefore, as a comforter to hearts distressed by calamities, as a parallel in history.

CHRONICL

E of the Christian Church, rev. ed., vol. i. 354–357. — Kn.]

...
but must labor to avoid the two opposite errors,— of considering the book an elaborate puzzle, or refusing to find any mystery in it at all. It would be difficult to determine which notion is the more hopelessly wrong,— that which supposes that the original reader rejected the whole meaning in every particular, and which thus refuses to allow here the brooding shadow which hangs over all unfulfilled prophecy, especially if only broadly outlined; or that which supposes, that, in delineating each prophetic picture, the seer chose emblems appropriate, not to his own age or all ages, but specifically to that in which this special prophecy was to be fulfilled, and which thus condemns him to write in enigmas unintelligible to all ages alike,—a concourse of meaningless symbols enclosing one single spot of lucidity for each era. Both the analogy of other Scripture and the experience of all time have disproved both fancies. Notwithstanding the naturalists, no one has ever understood all the details of these visions unto perfection: not without a sense of pedantry, the uninitiated child of God has found them always open to his spiritual sight, and fitted to his spiritual need. (3) TheApocalypse is written in a language of its own, having its own laws, in accordance with which it must be interpreted. There is such a thing as a grammar of apocalyptical symbolism; and what is meant by the various images is no more a matter for the imagination to settle than are points of Greek syntax. This is not the same as calling the book obscure, in any other sense than a writing in a foreign language is obscure to those ignorant of it. "As all language abounds in metaphor and other materials of imagery, imagery itself may form the ground of a descriptive language. The forms of it may become intelligible terms, and the combination of them may be equivalent to a narrative of description" (Davison). The source and explanation of this symbolism are found in the prophets of the Old Testament (especially Daniel, Ezekiel, and Zechariah) and our Lord's eschatological discourses, which, moreover, furnish the book advises us, and numerous details in it pertaining to the end, not in mere repetition of each other, but in ever-increasing clearness of development.

Doubtless it is because of failure to note and apply these and like simple principles, that the actual exegesis of the book has proceeded after such diverse fashions, and reached such entirely contradictory results. No book of the Bible has been so much commented on: the exegesis of no book is in a more unsatisfactory state. It is impossible here to enter on the history of its interpretation: the works of Liicke and Elliott, mentioned below, treat the subject in detail. In general, the schemes of interpretation that have been adopted fall into three roughly drawn classes. (1) The Preterist, which holds that all, or nearly all, the prophecies of the book were fulfilled in the early Christian ages, either in the history of the Jewish race up to A.D. 70, or in that of Pagan Rome up to the fourth or fifth century. With Hengstenberg and Salmeron as forerunners, the Jesuit Alcasar (1614) was the father of this school. To it belong Grotius, Bossuet, Hammond, LeClerc, Wetstein, Eichhorn, Herder, Hartwig, Koppe, Hug, Heinrichs, Ewald, De Wette, Bleek, Reuss, Revillé, Renan, Desprez, S. Davidson, Stuart, Liicke, Dusberg, Maurice, Farrar, etc. (2) The Futurist, which holds that the whole book, or most of it, refers to events yet in the future, to precede, accompany, or follow the second advent. The Jesuit Ribera (1603) was the father of this school. To it belong Lacunza, Tyso, S. R. and C. Maitland, DeBurgh, Todd, Kelly, I. Williams, etc. (3) The Historical, which holds that the book contains a prophetic view of the great conflict between Christ and the Enemy from the first to the second advents. It is as old as the twelfth century, when Berengaud, followed by Auselm and the Abbot Joachim, expounded it. It has received in one form or another, often differing extremely among themselves, the suffrages of most students of the book. It is the system of DeLlire, Wilfif, the Reformers generally, Fox, Brightman, Pareus, Mede, Vitringa, Sir I. Newton, Fleming, Daubuz, Whiston, Bengal, Gaussen, Elliott, Faber, Woodhouse, Wordsworth, Hengstenberg, Ebrard, Von Hofmann, Aubelen, Alford, W. Lee, etc. The last six of these writers will be found nearest the truth.

LIT.—(1) Introduction. The various introductions to the New Testament, e.g., Creedner's, Guericke's, Bleek's, Hilgenfeld's, S. Davidson's; the arts. in the encyclopedias, e.g., Kitto's (by Davidson), Mcclintock and Strong's, Smith's, Herzog's, Lichtenberger's (by A. Sabatier), and Ersch and Gruber's (by Reuss); the prolegomena to the commentaries, e.g., Dusberg, Stuart's, Alford's, Lee's (in the Bible Commentary), and Ebrard's; and the section in the church histories, e.g., Neander's Planning and Training, and Schaff's History of the Apostolic Church (1853, pp. 418-430 and 606-607) and History of the Christian Church (vol. i., 1882, pp. 825-883); also Godký: Studies on the New Testament, Eng. trans., pp. 294-308; Weiss's "Apocalyptische Studien," in Studien und Kritiken, 1869 (cf. his Leben Jesu, 1882, vol. i. pp. 84-101); Renan: L'Antechrist, 1873; Bleek's review of Liicke, in Studien und Kritiken, 1854, 1855; and, above all, Liicke's great work, Versuch einer vollständigen Einleitung a. d. Johanneu, second enlarged ed. 1852. — (2) Commentaries. (a) Preterists:—De Wette: Kurze Erklärung d. O. J., 3d ed. (Möller), 1862; Bleek: Vorlesungen über d. Ap. (Hornbach), 1862; Ewald: Die Johann.
REVIVALS OF RELIGION. This phrase is ordinarily applied to the spiritual condition of a Christian community, more or less limited in extent, in which a special interest is verse generally felt in respect to religious concerns, accompanied with a marked manifestation of divine power and grace in the quickening of believers, the reclaiming of backsliders, and the awakening, conviction, and conversion of the unregenerate.

The Theory of Revivals. — The progress of Christianity in the world has rarely, for any length of time, been uniform. Its growth in the individual mind is in the community, subject to constant change, exposed to influences the most varied and antagonistic. Now it makes rapid advances in its conflict with sinful propensities and developments; then it is subjected to obstructions and reverses that effectually check its onward course, and result in spiritual declensions.

The natural is ever at enmity with the spiritual. "The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary the one to the other." Growth in grace is attainable only by ceaseless vigilance, untiring diligence, unremitting conflict, and a faithful improvement of the opportunities and means of spiritual advancement. Any relaxation in the strife with the flesh leads to spiritual death.

As with the individual believer, so is it with the community. A church, a sisterhood of churches covering a large section of country, by reason of the predominating influence of some worldly interests,—the greed of gain in a season of great commercial prosperity, the strife of party during a highly excited political campaign, the prevalence of a martial spirit in a time of international or civil war, or the lust of pleasure in a time of general worldly gayety and festivity,—may be so diverted from the direct pursuit of holiness, and the prosecution of the work of advancing the kingdom of Christ, as to lose, to a considerable extent, the power, if not the life, of godliness. The spiritual and eternal become subordinate to the worldly and temporal.

The blight of spiritual declension settles down upon them, and attaches itself to them with increasing persistency year by year. Such has been the history of Christian churches everywhere.

The ancient people of God were rebuked with the seven great frequencies, or "Seven Churches," by the Synagogue for their proneness to spiritual declension. "My people are bent to backsliding from me." "Why is this people of Jerusalem alidden back by a perpetual backsliding?" This proneness was continually coming to the surface, in the days of Moses and the judges, under the kings, and both before and after the exile. Judges and rulers, priests and prophets, Deborah and Barak, Samuel and David, Elias and Elisha, Daniel, Ezra and Nehemiah, were raised up to beat back the waves of corruption, to arrest the tide of degeneracy, and to heal the backslidings of the people. The fire was kept burning on the altar only by repeated divine interpositions, resulting successively in a revival of religion.

Similar tendencies have from the beginning been developed in the history of the Christian Church: Ephesus loses her first love, Laodicea becomes lukewarm, Sardis defiles her garments, Philippi and Corinth yield to the blandishments of worldly pleasures. Worldliness and carnality, leanness and spiritual death, succeed, too often, a state of pious fervor, godly zeal, and holy living.

The annual narratives of ecclesiastical communities bear painful testimony to this degenerating tendency.

Such being the testimony of universal experience to the promptness of human nature to decline, on the spirit and power of godliness, how, it is asked, is this tendency to be checked? Obviously the true and only effective and appropriate remedy for a season of spiritual declension is a season of spiritual revival. Such a season, by whatever agencies or instrumentalities brought about, by whatever adjuncts of questionable propriety it may be accompanied, and of greater or less extent, may properly be termed "a revival of religion."

These manifestations, moreover, are to be regarded as the result of a special and peculiar effusion of the Holy Spirit. All spiritual life, all progress in the divine life, whether in the individual or in the community, in the church or in the nation, is the Spirit of God. The whole period of grace, from the Day of Pentecost to the final judgment, is properly termed "the dispensation of the Holy Spirit." Every true convert of the Spirit is begotten of the Spirit, and so becomes a child of God. The Spirit is always in and with the church, carrying forward the work of redemption and the divine renewal of souls that were dead in trespasses and sins.

Not only at Jerusalem, but everywhere in all the region round about the apostles and missionary journeys far away among the Gentiles,—at Samaria, at Cesarea, at the two Antiochs, at Lystra and Derbe, at Philippi and Thessalonica, at Athens and Corinth, at Ephesus and Rome,—such scenes were witnessed. So many and so mighty were those special manifestations of divine power and grace in the gospel, by reason of such effusions of the Holy Spirit, that Tertullian could say at the beginning of the third century, in his appeal to the civil authorities, "We have filled all places of your dominions,—cities, islands, corporations, councils, armies, tribes, the senate, the palace, the court of judicature." "So mightily grew the word of God, and prevailed."

The Great Protestant Revival. — Passing over the intervening centuries, it may well be asked, What was the Protestant Reformation, that beginning in the fourteenth century under Wiclif, and continued under Hus in the fifteenth, at length culminated in the sixteenth under Luther and Calvin, and a host of kindred spirits? It was a special dispensation of the Spirit, whereby the minds of men everywhere in Christian lands were turned towards the utterances of the Divine Word, the errors of the Papacy were discovered and denounced, the truth as it is in Jesus apprehended and embraced by multitudes, and the churches built up in the faith of the gospel. It was a great and general revival of religion, whereby in tens of thousands were born of the Spirit of God. So thorough and wide-spread were those conversions, that the fires of persecution were kindled in vain. In spite of princes and prelates, converts to the pure faith of the gospel were made all over Germany, Switzerland, France, Holland, and Great Britain, and not a few in Spain and Italy. It was the greatest revival of religion that the world had witnessed, and the church enjoyed, since the days of Constantine.

Revivals in Great Britain and Ireland. — From that day, all along the centuries, the annals of the church abound in testimonies to the reality and efficacy of these special effusions of the Spirit. The Church of Scotland was born anew in the great revival under Knox and his brethren. "The whole nation," says Kirkton, "was converted by lump." Near the close of the sixteenth century, under the ministry of such divines as Wishart, Cooper, and Welsh, all Scotland was visited by an extraordinary effusion of the Holy Spirit. So mightily were men affected, that the whole General Assembly, four hundred ministers and elders, while renewing their solemn league and covenant, with sighs and groans and tears, were awayed by the Spirit, as the leaves of the forest by the "rushing mighty wind" of the driving tempest.

Similar scenes were further witnessed in Scotland, beginning in 1636, at Stewarton, extending through the land, and into the north of Ireland, and eventuating in that remarkable display of divine grace in the Kirk of Scotland, where, in June, 1630, under the preaching of Bruce and Livingston, "near five hundred" souls, in one day, were brought under deep conviction of sin, and presently into the light and liberty of the gospel.
So, too, in 1838, on the occasion of signing the co-generated, the whole country was stirred as by the mighty hand of God. "I have seen," says Livingston, "more than a thousand persons, the at once, lifting up their hands, and the tears falling down their eyes," as with one heart they vowed to be the Lord's. Such was the preparation in Scotland, and in England also, for the great reformation, that issued in the Commonwealth under Cromwell, and the prevalence of Puritanism in the Church of England.

The Great Awakening in the Eighteenth Century.

— A period of great degeneracy, profligacy, and profanity. During this period, here and there a conversion in Scotland, and in England also, for the new settlements in the Western and Southern areas were brought under deep conviction of sin, and this in New England, were graciously brought into the churches; the accessions during the past year (1852) averaging not less than two hundred per month.
The evangelical churches in America very generally, and to a considerable extent in Great Britain, and in the British Colonies in America, where, under the preaching of Edwards, and Bellamy, and the Tennents, and others of kindred spirit, the churches everywhere,
in and out of New England, were so graciously and powerfully revived, that the period has ever since been known as "The Great Awakening," so many were the revivals of religion among the Christian people of the Western World.

These visitations of the Spirit were followed by the French War and the war of the American Revolution, resulting in a great decay of piety,
and a wide diffusion of scoffing infidelity and profanity. During this period, here and there a church or neighborhood was favored with a gracious outpouring of the Spirit; but, for the most part, the churches in America were brought into
a most lamentable state of spiritual declension.
At length, in 1792, "commenced," says Dr. Griffin,
"that series of revivals in America which has never been interrupted. I could stand at my door in New Hartford, Litchfield County, Conn.," he adds, "and number fifty or sixty congregations laid down in one field of divine wonders, and as many more in different parts of New England.
In New Hartford, Litchfield County, Conn."

The Great Era of Modern Revivals.— All over
the new settlements in the Western and Southern States of America, particularly in Kentucky and Tennessee, a work of divine grace, resulting from a special outpouring of the Spirit, beginning in 1796, and continuing for a dozen years or more,
the accessions during five years, during which 7,557 converts were received into the churches; the accessions during the past year (1852) averaging not less than two hundred per month.
The evangelical churches in America very generally, and to a considerable extent in Great Britain, and in the British Colonies in America,
where, under the preaching of Edwards, and Bellamy, and the Tennents, and
others of kindred spirit, the churches everywhere,
in and out of New England, were so graciously
and powerfully revived, that the period has ever since been known as "The Great Awakening," so
many were the revivals of religion among the Christian people of the Western World.

These visitations of the Spirit were followed by the French War and the war of the American Revolution, resulting in a great decay of piety,
and a wide diffusion of scoffing infidelity and profanity. During this period, here and there a church or neighborhood was favored with a gracious outpouring of the Spirit; but, for the most part, the churches in America were brought into
a most lamentable state of spiritual declension.
At length, in 1792, "commenced," says Dr. Griffin,
"that series of revivals in America which has never been interrupted. I could stand at my door
in New Hartford, Litchfield County, Conn."

The Great Era of Modern Revivals.— All over
the new settlements in the Western and Southern States of America, particularly in Kentucky and Tennessee, a work of divine grace, resulting from
a special outpouring of the Spirit, beginning in 1796, and continuing for a dozen years or more,
completely remoulded the character of the people,
and led large numbers to forsake their sins and unbelief, and to connect themselves with the church. Again : after the war with Great Britain (1812-15), many of the churches were favored with revivals. Especially was this the case in the years 1827-32, when, under the preaching of Nettleton, Finney, and other evangelists, and by means of protracted meetings of four days' continuance, or longer, revivals were multiplied all
over the land.

Very marked, also, was the wave of spiritual grace, that, beginning in the city of New York
early in 1855, shortly after a season of widespread bankruptcy, spread from city to city, and town to town, all over the United States, until, within a single year, nearly half a million of converts had been received into the churches. It was confined to no denomination, no section, and no one class, in the communities where it prevailed. It was a great and wonderful revival.

During the year 1837 a work of peculiar power
began at a mission station at Hilo, in Hawaii,
under the preaching of Mr. Coan, and continued
for a period of five years, during which 7,557
converts were received into that one church; 1,705
having been admitted the same day, July 1, 1838.
Since the days of the apostles, the world had scarcely witnessed so wonderful a display of divine grace. And now, within the past five years (1878-83), a still more powerful movement of the Spirit in the Telugu Mission, India, has resulted in bringing more than twenty thousand hopeful converts into the churches; the accessions during the past year (1852) averaging not less than two hundred per month.
The evangelical churches in America very generally, and to a considerable extent in Great Britain, and in the British Colonies in America,
where, under the preaching of Edwards, and Bellamy, and the Tennents, and
others of kindred spirit, the churches everywhere,
in and out of New England, were so graciously
and powerfully revived, that the period has ever since been known as "The Great Awakening," so
many were the revivals of religion among the Christian people of the Western World.

These visitations of the Spirit were followed by the French War and the war of the American Revolution, resulting in a great decay of piety,
and a wide diffusion of scoffing infidelity and profanity. During this period, here and there a church or neighborhood was favored with a gracious outpouring of the Spirit; but, for the most part, the churches in America were brought into
a most lamentable state of spiritual declension.
At length, in 1792, "commenced," says Dr. Griffin,
"that series of revivals in America which has never been interrupted. I could stand at my door
in New Hartford, Litchfield County, Conn."

The Great Era of Modern Revivals.— All over
the new settlements in the Western and Southern States of America, particularly in Kentucky and Tennessee, a work of divine grace, resulting from
a special outpouring of the Spirit, beginning in 1796, and continuing for a dozen years or more,
completely remoulded the character of the people,
and led large numbers to forsake their sins and unbelief, and to connect themselves with the church. Again : after the war with Great Britain (1812-15), many of the churches were favored with revivals. Especially was this the case in the years 1827-32, when, under the preaching of Nettleton, Finney, and other evangelists, and by means of protracted meetings of four days' continuance, or longer, revivals were multiplied all
over the land.

Very marked, also, was the wave of spiritual
grace, that, beginning in the city of New York
early in 1855, shortly after a season of widespread bankruptcy, spread from city to city, and town to town, all over the United States, until, within a single year, nearly half a million of converts had been received into the churches. It was confined to no denomination, no section, and no one class,
in the communities where it prevailed. It was a great and wonderful revival.

During the year 1837 a work of peculiar power
began at a mission station at Hilo, in Hawaii,
under the preaching of Mr. Coan, and continued
for a period of five years, during which 7,557
converts were received into that one church; 1,705
having been admitted the same day, July 1, 1838.
Since the days of the apostles, the world had scarcely witnessed so wonderful a display of divine grace. And now, within the past five years (1878-83), a still more powerful movement of the Spirit in the Telugu Mission, India, has resulted
in bringing more than twenty thousand hopeful
converts into the churches; the accessions during the past year (1852) averaging not less than two hundred per month.
The evangelical churches in America very generally, and to a considerable extent in Great Britain, and in the British Colonies in America,
where, under the preaching of Edwards, and Bellamy, and the Tennents, and
others of kindred spirit, the churches everywhere,
in and out of New England, were so graciously
and powerfully revived, that the period has ever since been known as "The Great Awakening," so
many were the revivals of religion among the Christian people of the Western World.

These visitations of the Spirit were followed by the French War and the war of the American Revolution, resulting in a great decay of piety,
and a wide diffusion of scoffing infidelity and profanity. During this period, here and there a church or neighborhood was favored with a gracious outpouring of the Spirit; but, for the most part, the churches in America were brought into
a most lamentable state of spiritual declension.
At length, in 1792, "commenced," says Dr. Griffin,
"that series of revivals in America which has never been interrupted. I could stand at my door
in New Hartford, Litchfield County, Conn."

The Great Era of Modern Revivals.— All over
the new settlements in the Western and Southern States of America, particularly in Kentucky and Tennessee, a work of divine grace, resulting from
a special outpouring of the Spirit, beginning in 1796, and continuing for a dozen years or more,
completely remoulded the character of the people,
and led large numbers to forsake their sins and unbelief, and to connect themselves with the church. Again : after the war with Great Britain (1812-15), many of the churches were favored with revivals. Especially was this the case in the years 1827-32, when, under the preaching of Nettleton, Finney, and other evangelists, and by means of protracted meetings of four days' continuance, or longer, revivals were multiplied all
over the land.

Very marked, also, was the wave of spiritual
grace, that, beginning in the city of New York
early in 1855, shortly after a season of widespread bankruptcy, spread from city to city, and town to town, all over the United States, until, within a

REVOLUTION. REVOLUTION. 2041

REVOLUTION. The French. In Ecclesiastical Respects.—The violent commotion, which, towards the close of the eighteenth century, almost destroyed the whole social and political organization of the French people, was principally and primarily an attack upon medieval feudalism; but so closely was the connection between the feudal State and the Roman Catholic Church, that any attack on the former could not fail to affect also the latter. Moreover, all the writers and teachers who had engaged in undermining the foundations of the social fabric were utterly hostile, not only to the church and her officials, but to religion in general. A supercilious scepticism with respect to the positive doctrines of the church, and a sullen-hearted frivolity, which felt the moral code of Christianity as a galling chain, stirred up a suspicion that the clergy clung to their political privileges, their social organization, their wealth, not from any conviction of having a higher callning, but from mere egotism and arrogance. The idea of the church as an institution based on divine authority was gone, and to employ her wealth in aid of the bankrupt State seemed a simple and natural expedient.

Before the outbreak of the Revolution, it was generally believed in the higher circles of French society, that the clergy, as a privileged class, would make common cause with the nobility;
but this supposition was rudely shaken at the very opening of the contest. While the nobility insisted upon strict class-separation in the debate and voting of the states-general, nearly one-half of the delegates of clergy (a hundred and forty-eight out of three hundred and eighty) joined the third estate on June 22, 1789; and, two days later, a hundred and fifty-one other ecclesiastical delegates, led by Talleyrand, bishop of Autun, followed the example. The clergy began to become popular, the more so as they proved very liberal under the discussion of the financial emergency. The abolition of tithes, Aug. 7, without any difficulty, proved a success; without resistance; and when, on Sept. 26, it was moved that all the gold and silver service of the church
not absolutely necessary to a decent celebration should be used for the alleviation of the people, the Archbishop of Aix and the Jansenist theologian Camus, who tried hard to prove that the plan was in perfect harmony with the New use only so much as was absolutely necessary, while the rest belonged to the poor. Under the hands of Mirabeau and Abbé Gringoire, the motion received a much more radical redaction; and
on Nov. 2 the Assembly decided, with five hundred and eighty-six votes against three hundred and forty-six, that all ecclesiastical estates were in reality the property of the nation, and stood at the disposal of the nation on the condition that the expenses of the public worship and of the support of all church-officials were first defrayed.

Two days later the king confirmed the decree,
and among the people the clergy found no sympathy: on the contrary, scoffing caricatures were showered down upon them in pamphlets, theatrical plays, etc.

The clergy still hoped that the decree would never be practically carried out, but in this they were completely mistaken. Other decrees were issued soon after, which showed that the proceedings of the Assembly were not governed by a mere regard to the financial emergency. On Feb. 11, 1790, all ecclesiastical orders and congregations were dissolved, with the exception only
of those which were devoted to instruction of children and the nursing of the sick. The inmates of the monasteries were allowed to return to civil life by a simple announcement to the nearest secular authority; and according to the character of their monastic vows, the circumstances of their monastery, their age, etc., they received a pension of from seven hundred to twelve hundred francs. The nuns, when they were not disposed to break their vows, were generally allowed to remain in their monasteries;
while, under similar circumstances, the monks were transferred to certain houses set apart for the purpose. It was evident that the Assembly considered the church the main-stay of all old superstition, the corner-stone of the feudal State,
and that her total destruction was the real aim of the whole movement. On April 18, the remavning property of the nation, and stood at

But heavier sacrifices were soon demanded,— —sacrifices which apparently meant ruin. When Necker, in August, presented his desperate report
on the finances, some one proposed to confiscate
the estates of the church, and thus pay the debt
of the State. But at that time the proposition met with no favor. It was again taken up, however, in the fall, and then by one of the dignita-ties of the church, Talleyrand, who moved that
one-third of the annual revenue of the church, estimated at fifty million francs, should be used for covering the deficit of the budget,
arguing that the clergy were not the proprietors,
but only the usufructuaries, of the ecclesiastical estates; that the State had absolute authority over every corporation or society formed within its pale; that, according to the principle of the church, the incumbent of a benefice was only an administrator, and could appropriate for his own affairs. The abolition of tithes, Aug. 7, with out any difficulty, proved a success; without resistance; and when, on Sept. 26, it was moved that
all the gold and silver service of the church
not absolutely necessary to a decent celebration should be used for the alleviation of
the people, the Archbishop of Aix and the Jansenist
theologian Camus, who tried hard to prove that the plan was in perfect harmony with the New
use only so much as was absolutely necessary,
while the rest belonged to the poor. Under the hands of Mirabeau and Abbé Gringoire, the motion received a much more radical redaction; and
on Nov. 2 the Assembly decided, with five hundred and eighty-six votes against three hundred and forty-six, that all ecclesiastical estates were
in reality the property of the nation, and stood at the disposal of the nation on the condition that
the expenses of the public worship and of the support of all church-officials were first defrayed.

Two days later the king confirmed the decree,
and among the people the clergy found no sympathy: on the contrary, scoffing caricatures were showered down upon them in pamphlets, theatrical plays, etc.

The clergy still hoped that the decree would never be practically carried out, but in this they were completely mistaken. Other decrees were issued soon after, which showed that the proceedings of the Assembly were not governed by a mere regard to the financial emergency. On
Feb. 11, 1790, all ecclesiastical orders and congregations were dissolved, with the exception only
of those which were devoted to instruction of children and the nursing of the sick. The inmates of the monasteries were allowed to return
to civil life by a simple announcement to the nearest secular authority; and according to the character of their monastic vows, the circumstances of their monastery, their age, etc., they received a pension of from seven hundred to twelve hundred francs. The nuns, when they were not disposed to break their vows, were generally allowed to remain in their monasteries;
while, under similar circumstances, the monks
were transferred to certain houses set apart for the purpose. It was evident that the Assembly considered the church the main-stay of all old superstition, the corner-stone of the feudal State,
and that her total destruction was the real aim of the whole movement. On April 18, the rema-vanning property of the nation, and stood at

But heavier sacrifices were soon demanded,—
—sacrifices which apparently meant ruin. When Necker, in August, presented his desperate report
on the finances, some one proposed to confiscate
the estates of the church, and thus pay the debt
of the State. But at that time the proposition met with no favor. It was again taken up, however, in the fall, and then by one of the dignita-ties of the church, Talleyrand, who moved that
one-third of the annual revenue of the church,
estimated at fifty million francs, should be
used for covering the deficit of the budget,
arguing that the clergy were not the proprietors,
but only the usufructuaries, of the ecclesiastical estates; that the State had absolute authority over every corporation or society formed within its pale; that, according to the principle of the church, the incumbent of a benefice was only an administrator, and could appropriate for his own

The king had been most painfully touched by the attacks on the church, and he actually felt his conscience hurt in giving his assent to the civil constitution of the clergy. In this emergency he addressed a letter to the Pope, dated July 28, 1790; but the Pope's answer of Aug. 17 was vague and evasive, and on Aug. 24 the king confirmed the decree. Meanwhile the bishops were busy, with organizing a passive resistance. Boisgelin, archbishop of Aix, drew up a protest, _Exposition des principes_, representing the contradiction between the principles of the church and those of the civil constitution; and a hundred and ten bishops signed the instrument, which on Nov. 9 was sent to the Pope through Cardinal Bailly. The National Assembly answered by a law of Nov. 27, which demanded that all ecclesiastics who had not taken the oath should retract within forty days, under penalty of deposition and excommunication, and threatened those who refused with deposition, loss of civil rights, and punishment for disturbance of the public order. Abbé Grégoire was the first to take the oath; Talleyrand and seventy-one other clergymen followed the next day; but the rest of the three hundred ecclesiastics who sat in the National Assembly refused; and out in the country refusal became, in many districts, the rule. In western France, breaches of the peace began to show themselves. By a letter of March 10, 1791, to the archbishop of Aix, and a formal brief of April 13, the Pope now defined the position he proposed to maintain with respect to the civil constitution of the clergy, declared all its precepts and arrangements null and void, and threatened those who refused with deposition, loss of civil rights, and punishment for disturbance of the public order. Abbé Grégoire was the first to take the oath; Talleyrand and seventy-one other clergymen followed the next day; but the rest of the three hundred ecclesiastics who sat in the National Assembly refused; and out in the country refusal became, in many districts, the rule. In western France, breaches of the peace began to show themselves. By a letter of March 10, 1791, to the archbishop of Aix, and a formal brief of April 13, the Pope now defined the position he proposed to maintain with respect to the civil constitution of the clergy, declared all its precepts and arrangements null and void, and threatened those who refused with deposition, loss of civil rights, and punishment for disturbance of the public order. Abbé Grégoire was the first to take the oath; Talleyrand and seventy-one other clergymen followed the next day; but the rest of the three hundred ecclesiastics who sat in the National Assembly refused; and out in the country refusal became, in many districts, the rule. In western France, breaches of the peace began to show themselves. By a letter of March 10, 1791, to the archbishop of Aix, and a formal brief of April 13, the Pope now defined the position he proposed to maintain with respect to the civil constitution of the clergy, declared all its precepts and arrangements null and void, and threatened those who refused with deposition, loss of civil rights, and punishment for disturbance of the public order.
REVOLUTION. 2043

REYNOLDS.

worship of Reason. On Nov. 13 all magistrates were authorized to receive the resignations of the clergy, and all priests were admonished to renounce Christianity; and on Nov. 22 those bishops and priests who willingly abdicated were granted pensions. The church-buildings were used as temples of Reason, as sheep-pens, etc.: not a few were destroyed. It must not be understood, however, that all religion had died out in France: by no means. Everywhere the people, especially the women, continued to visit the churches; and even in the convention, voices were heard denouncing the rude, anti-religious demonstrations. Singularity enough, it was Robespierre who gave the first sign of a coming re-action. On Nov. 21 he hotly attacked Her bert in the club of the Jacobins. "There are people," he said, "who, under the pretence of destroying superstition, try to establish a religion of atheism. But atheism is only for the aristocrats; while the idea of a Supreme Being, who defends innocence, and punishes crime, is for the people." The speech was not without effect, and Robespierre neglected no opportunity to push his plans. Finally, on May 7, 1794, he persuaded the convention to decree that the French people acknowledges the existence of a Supreme Being and the immortality of the soul, and that festivals were to be introduced to re-awaken in men thoughts of the Divinity. The first festival was held on June 8. Robespierre, as president of the convention, appeared with a huge bouquet in his hand, and colored plumes in his hat, and made a politico-moral speech, interspersed with various kinds of childish mummeries. Of course the infidels laughed, and the faithful were scandalized: nevertheless, the festival denotes the turning-point of the movement. The constitution of Aug. 22, 1795, granted religious liberty. Christian worship was tolerated once more; and in many places the congregations received back their church-buildings on the simple condition that they should themselves defray all the expenses to keep them in repair; also a great number of emigrant priests returned to France. About seventeen thousand clergymen are said to have taken the oath, but such as would not—the non-swearers—the emigrants, who now returned—looked down upon them as apostates and infidels, who had suffered themselves to be swayed by the circumstances like reeds by the winds. Napoleon first entered into negotiations with the former party, the constitutional priests; but, when he saw that not one of the non-swearers was present at the great National Council, opened by Bishop Grégoire on June 29, or took the least notice of its proceedings, he immediately changed policy, and opened direct negotiations with the Pope through the enigmatic bishops, negotiations which finally resulted in the Concordat. See Concordat, France, Huguenots, etc.

Reynolds, Edward, D.D., Church-of-England prelate; b. at Southampton, 1599; d. at Norwich, Jan. 16, 1676. He was educated at Merton College, Oxford; became probation-fellow in 1620, on account of "his uncommon skill in the Greek tongue;" was preacher at Lincoln's Inn, London, and rector of Brayton, Northamptonshire; was the "pride and glory of the Presbyterian party," a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, a very eloquent, learned, and popular preacher, though his voice was harsh, and a cautious man, though lacking in firmness. On the ejection, by the Long Parliament (1646), of obnoxious heads of colleges, he succeeded Dr. Fell as vice-chancellor of the university of Oxford, and dean of Christ Church. From 1651 to 1669 he was deprived of his deanship, because he refused, in common with the Presbyterians, to take the "Engagement," and therefore accepted the vicracy of St. Laurence Jewry, London. In 1669 he was restored, conformed at the Restoration, and was in that year (1669) chaplain to the king, warden of Merton College, and made bishop of Norwich, without, however, surrendering his Presbyterian view, that a bishop was only a chief presbyter, and governed with the assistance of his co-presbyters. In the Assembly he was on the committee to draw up the Confession of Faith, and in 1661 he was a member of the Savoy Conference. In the latter capacity his weakness showed itself. He carried, however, his Puritanic principles into practice even while a bishop, and lived simply for his diocese. His Works were first collected and published in 1558; best edition, with Life, by A. Chalmers, London, 1826, 6 vols. R. H. Reynolds, the great Puritan of the 16th century, was appointed preacher at the Church of St. Anne. The state of affairs in the city was very critical. All the most violent elements of the time were seething within its walls, and Rhegius was not exactly a strong man. When the Peasants' War approached the city, he wrote Von Leibeigenchaft oder Knechtschaft (1525) and Schlussrede von weltlicher Gewalt, but he did not satisfy the lower classes, which sympathized with the Romanists. Rhegius wrote the calumny to him and his party. When the great controversy broke out between the Swiss and the German Reformers concerning the Lord's Supper, his Wider den neuen Irrsal Dr. Karlstadt (1524) was found weak, and he was for some time strongly drawn towards the Zwinglian camp; first after 1527 he is again found firmly planted on Lutheran ground. Shortly before, the Anabaptists had entered the city, and formed a considerable party. Rhegius's Warnung wider den neuen Taforden (1527) was not an unsuccessful move; but the disturbances were not quelled until the city council stepped forward, and decided to employ very severe measures, as, for instance, capital punishment. With the opening of the diet of 1530 Rhegius's activity in the city came to a sudden end. Immediately after his entrance, on June 16, the emperor forbade the ministers to preach; and, shortly after, Rhegius entered the service of Duke Ernest of Lüneburg, and settled at Celle.

His labor in Northern Germany for the establishment of the Reformation in Lüneburg, Hanover, etc., was very successful; and to this last period of his life belong also some of his best works: Formula caute loquendi, 1535, in Latin, and 1536 in German, often reprinted, and considered almost as a symbolical book: Dialogus von der trostreichen Predigt (1537), a devotional book very much read during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, etc. In the present century the character of the man has been unfavorably judged by Döllinger, Keim, Keller, and others; and their charges of vanity, lack of strength, etc., are by many means unfounded. He was a humanist, and he fancied himself a poet. Nevertheless, he was one of those humanists who did not shrink back from the Reformation when it became deadly earnestness. His works, nearly complete, were edited by his son, in twelve volumes folio, Nuremberg, 1561-77. [His Formula was edited by H. Steinmetz, Celle, 1880.] See Uhlhorn: Urbanus Rhegius, Elberfeld, 1861.

RHETORIC, Sacred. See Homiletics.

RHODES, an island of the Mediterranean, ten miles off the coast of Asia Minor, with a capital of the same name, became early known as a centre of commerce. The brazen statue at the entrance of the harbor, the so-called Colossus of Rhodes, was one of the seven wonders of the world. Paul visited the city on his return from his third missionary journey (Acts xxvii.1). The island vindicated its independence until the time of Vespasian, but under the Roman rule its prosperity gradually declined. The city, however, flourished much as a possession of the Knights of St. John, the last outpost of the Christians in the East (1899-1522); but, after its surrender to Sollman the Great, it fell rapidly into decay. See Ed. Biliotti et l'Abbe Cottret: L'île de Rhodos, Compiegne, 1882.

RICCI, Lorenzo, b. at Florence, Aug. 2, 1709; d. in Rome, Nov. 24, 1775. He entered the order of the Jesuits in 1718, and became its general in 1758. He was a haughty and imperious man, ill suited for the position. To all propositions of reform, from the Pope and from the Roman-Catholic princes, he answered, "Sint ut sunt, aut non sint." The consequence of which was, that the Pope dissolved the order by the bull Dominus ac redeemptor noster, July 21, 1775. Ricci was confined in the Castle of St. Angelo, and remained there for the rest of his life. His biography was written by Carraccioli in Italian, and by Sainte-Foi in French.

Riccì, Scipione de', b. at Florence, Jan. 9, 1741; d. at the Villa Rignano, Jan. 27, 1810. Educated for the church, and ordained a priest in 1766, he was shortly after appointed auditor to the papal nuncio at Florence, in 1776 vicar-general to the Archbishop of Florence, and in 1778 bishop of Pistoja and Prato. He was a pious man, and sincerely devoted to the reform of the Roman-Catholic Church; and he found warm support in the grand duke Leopold, a brother of Joseph II. But the reforms on which the dioecesan synod of Pistoja (1788) agreed, and which by the grand duke were laid before a general audience of his court on March 17, 1789, were rejected by that assembly; and agents from Rome, together with the monks, brought about uproarious riots in Prato, which had to be put down by military force. In 1790 the grand duke left the country, and succeeded his brother as emperor of Germany; and in 1791 Ricci felt compelled to resign, and retire into private life. In 1794 followed the papal condemnation of the propositions of the synod of Pistoja. See Acta et Decreta Synodi Pistoensis, Pavia, 1788; Acta congregatio nicarchispasionum et episcoporum Hetruria Florentinae, Bamberg, 1790-94; De Potter: Vie de Scipion de Ricci, Brussels, 1825, 3 vols.; Memorie di Scipione de' R., edited by Gelli, Florence, 1863, 2 vols.

Rice, John Holt, D.D., Presbyterian; b. near New London, Bedford County, Va., Nov. 28, 1777; d. in Prince Edward County, Va., Sept. 3, 1811. He studied at Liberty-Hall Academy (later, Washington College); was tutor in Hampden-Sidney College, 1790-99 and 1800-04; in 1800 began the study of theology; was installed pastor at Cub Creek, Charlotte County, Va., in 1804. In May, 1812, he came to the first Presbyterian Church in Richmond, Va.; for up to that time the Presbyterians and Episcopalians had worshipped together. In 1815 he started The Christian Monitor, the first publication of the kind in Richmond, and in 1817, The Virginia Evangelical and Literary Magazine (discontinued in 1829). In 1819 he was moderator of the General Assembly at Philadelphia. In 1823 he was elected president of Princeton College, and professor in the Union Theological Seminary, Virginia. He accepted the latter position, and was installed in 1824. His publications consist chiefly of sermons, but include Memoir of Rev. James Brainerd Taylor (1820), and a work which made a great stir, Historical and Philosophical Considerations on Religion, addressed to James Madison (1832). See Sprague: Annals, iv. 325.

Rice, Nathan Lewis, D.D., Presbyterian; b. in Garrard County, Ky., Dec. 29, 1807; d. in Bracken County, Ky., June 11, 1877. He studied at Centre College, Danville, Ky., but did not graduate; was licensed; went to Princeton for further theological study; and finally was settled at Bardstown, Ky., 1833. Noticing the success of the Roman Catholics in alluring Protestant children to their schools at Bardstown, he established there an academy for each sex, and also a newspaper, the Western Protestant, afterwards merged in the Louisville Presbyterian Herald. From 1841 to 1844 he was stated supply at Paris, Ky. In 1849 he had the famous debate at Lexington, Ky., with Dr. Campbell, founder of the Disciples, on the subject of baptism. He ably held his own, and won great repute. From 1844 to 1853 he was pastor in Cincinnati. During this period he held three other public debates: (1) in 1845, with Rev. J. A. Blanchard, on slavery; (2) in 1845, with Rev. E. Fringee, on universal salvation; (3) in 1851, with Rev. J. B. Purcell (afterwards Roman-Catholic archbishop; see art.), on Romanism. These debates, except the last, were published, and widely circulated. From 1853 to 1858 he was pastor in St. Louis, Mo. While there, edited the St.-Louis Presbyterian. In 1855 he was elected moderator of the General Assembly (Old School) at Nashville, Tenn. For several years he was president of the General Assembly, and from 1858, also theological professor, at Chicago, Ill.; from 1861 to 1867, pastor in New-York City; from 1868 to 1874, president of Westminster College, Mo.; and from 1874 till his death, professor of theology in the theological seminary at Danville, Ky. Dr. Rice was a great debater and an able preacher. In New York he was listened to by crowded assemblies. He was one of the leaders of his denomination. His publications, besides the debates already referred to, include God Sovereign, and Man Free, Philadelphia; Romanism not Christianity, New York, 1847; Baptism, St. Louis, 1855; Immortality, Philadelphia.

RICH, Edmund. See EADMUND, St.
RICHARD OF ST. VICTOR, d. 1173. Very little is known of his personal life. He was a native of Scotland, but became very early an inmate of the Augustinian abbey of St. Victor, in Paris. He was chosen prior in 1192; and after a long contest he finally succeeded in driving away the abbot Ervigis, who scandalized the brethren by his frivolous life. Of Richard's writings quite a number are still extant,—exegetical, moral, theological, and mystical. As his method was the mystical allegory, his exegetical works have now only historical interest. His moral works (De statu interiori hominis, De eruditione interioris hominis, etc.) are also strongly colored by mysticism. His principal mystical works are, De verbo incarnato, in which he praises sin as the felix culpa, because, if there had been no sin, there would have been no incarnation; De trinitate, one of his most original productions; De Emmanuele, against the Jews, etc. The most celebrated of his mystical works is his De gratia contemplationis, in which he gives the psychological theory of contemplation, as an intuition, an immediate vision of the divine, in contradistinction from cogitatio, the common reasoning, and meditatio, the pondering on a single, special subject. The first edition of his works is that of Paris, 1528; the best, that of Rouen, 1650. See J. G. v. Engelhardt: Richard von St. Victor, Erlangen, 1838; Lienzer: Richardin doctrina, Göttingen, 1837—39.

RICHARD, Charles Louis, b. at Blainville-sur-Eau, Lorraine, 1711; executed at Mons, Aug. 16, 1794. He was educated for the military profession, but took holy orders, and was in 1667 consecrated bishop of Luçon, and in 1622 made a cardinal. His career as a statesman he began in 1614, when sent as a deputy of the clergy to the states-general; and from 1622 to his death he governed France as its prime-minister. The great aim of his foreign policy was the humiliation of the house of Austria, the baffling of its aspirations to a world's empire; that of his home policy was the annihilation of the independence of the feudal lords, the establishment of the absolute authority of the crown. He succeeded in both fields. Very characteristic are his relations with the Protestants. Making a sharp distinction between religion and politics, he allied himself with the Protestants in Germany against the emperor; while in France he completely destroyed the political influence of the Huguenots. By the edict of grace (Nîmes, July 14, 1629) the fortifications of the cities of the Huguenots were razed, and their synods were not allowed to meet unless by authority of the government; but in other respects the freedom of worship, and the civil equality of Huguenots and Roman Catholics, were fully respected. See Robson: Life of Cardinal Richelieu, 1854; Schybergson: Le duc de Rohan et la chute du parti protestant en France, Paris, 1880.

RICHARDS, William, American Congregational missionary; b. at Plainfield, Mass., Aug. 22, 1792; d. at Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, Dec. 7, 1847. He was graduated from Williams College, 1819, and from Andover Seminary, 1822, and was ordained Nov. 19, 1825. He gained the Benevolent Society's Commission under commission of the American Board. He was stationed at Lahaina, on the Island of Maui, and was very successful. In 1837 he returned home; went out again the next year; and, being taken into the king's confidence, he was made his counsellor, interpreter, and chaplain, while still continuing missionary labors. In 1842, on the independence of the islands being guaranteed by England, Belgium, France, and the United States of America, he was sent as ambassador to England and several other foreign courts. In 1845 he returned to Honolulu, and was appointed minister of public instruction, which made him a member of the king's privy council. See Sprague: Annals, ii. 688.

RICHELIEU, Armand Jean Duplessis de, b. in Paris, Sept. 5, 1615; d. there Dec. 4, 1642. He was educated for the military profession, but took holy orders, and was in 1667 consecrated bishop of Luçon, and in 1622 made a cardinal. His career as a statesman he began in 1614, when sent as a deputy of the clergy to the states-general; and from 1622 to his death he governed France as its prime-minister. The great aim of his foreign policy was the humiliation of the house of Austria, the baffling of its aspirations to a world's empire; that of his home policy was the annihilation of the independence of the feudal lords, the establishment of the absolute authority of the crown. He succeeded in both fields. Very characteristic are his relations with the Protestants. Making a sharp distinction between religion and politics, he allied himself with the Protestants in Germany against the emperor; while in France he completely destroyed the political influence of the Huguenots. By the edict of grace (Nîmes, July 14, 1629) the fortifications of the cities of the Huguenots were razed, and their synods were not allowed to meet unless by authority of the government; but in other respects the freedom of worship, and the civil equality of Huguenots and Roman Catholics, were fully respected. See Robson: Life of Cardinal Richelieu, 1854; Schybergson: Le duc de Rohan et la chute du parti protestant en France, Paris, 1880.

RICHARDS, William, American Congregational missionary; b. at Plainfield, Mass., Aug. 22, 1792; d. at Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, Dec. 7, 1847. He was graduated from Williams College, 1819, and from Andover Seminary, 1822, and was ordained Nov. 19, 1825. He gained the Benevolent Society's Commission under commission of the American Board. He was stationed at Lahaina, on the Island of Maui, and was very successful. In 1837 he returned home; went out again the next year; and, being taken into the king's confidence, he was made his counsellor, interpreter, and chaplain, while still continuing missionary labors. In 1842, on the independence of the islands being guaranteed by England, Belgium, France, and the United States of America, he was sent as ambassador to England and several other foreign courts. In 1845 he returned to Honolulu, and was appointed minister of public instruction, which made him a member of the king's privy council. See Sprague: Annals, ii. 688.

RICHELIEU, Armand Jean Duplessis de, b. in Paris, Sept. 5, 1615; d. there Dec. 4, 1642. He was educated for the military profession, but took holy orders, and was in 1667 consecrated bishop of Luçon, and in 1622 made a cardinal. His career as a statesman he began in 1614, when sent as a deputy of the clergy to the states-general; and from 1622 to his death he governed France as its prime-minister. The great aim of his foreign policy was the humiliation of the house of Austria, the baffling of its aspirations to a world's empire; that of his home policy was the annihilation of the independence of the feudal lords, the establishment of the absolute authority of the crown. He succeeded in both fields. Very characteristic are his relations with the Protestants. Making a sharp distinction between religion and politics, he allied himself with the Protestants in Germany against the emperor; while in France he completely destroyed the political influence of the Huguenots. By the edict of grace (Nîmes, July 14, 1629) the fortifications of the cities of the Huguenots were razed, and their synods were not allowed to meet unless by authority of the government; but in other respects the freedom of worship, and the civil equality of Huguenots and Roman Catholics, were fully respected. See Robson: Life of Cardinal Richelieu, 1854; Schybergson: Le duc de Rohan et la chute du parti protestant en France, Paris, 1880.

RICHARDS, William, American Congregational missionary; b. at Plainfield, Mass., Aug. 22, 1792; d. at Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, Dec. 7, 1847. He was graduated from Williams College, 1819, and from Andover Seminary, 1822, and was ordained Nov. 19, 1825. He gained the Benevolent Society's Commission under commission of the American Board. He was stationed at Lahaina, on the Island of Maui, and was very successful. In 1837 he returned home; went out again the next year; and, being taken into the king's confidence, he was made his counsellor, interpreter, and chaplain, while still continuing missionary labors. In 1842, on the independence of the islands being guaranteed by England, Belgium, France, and the United States of America, he was sent as ambassador to England and several other foreign courts. In 1845 he returned to Honolulu, and was appointed minister of public instruction, which made him a member of the king's privy council. See Sprague: Annals, ii. 688.

RICHELIEU, Armand Jean Duplessis de, b. in Paris, Sept. 5, 1615; d. there Dec. 4, 1642. He was educated for the military profession, but took holy orders, and was in 1667 consecrated bishop of Luçon, and in 1622 made a cardinal. His career as a statesman he began in 1614, when sent as a deputy of the clergy to the states-general; and from 1622 to his death he governed France as its prime-minister. The great aim of his foreign policy was the humiliation of the house of Austria, the baffling of its aspirations to a world's empire; that of his home policy was the annihilation of the independence of the feudal lords, the establishment of the absolute authority of the crown. He succeeded in both fields. Very characteristic are his relations with the Protestants. Making a sharp distinction between religion and politics, he allied himself with the Protestants in Germany against the emperor; while in France he completely destroyed the political influence of the Huguenots. By the edict of grace (Nîmes, July 14, 1629) the fortifications of the cities of the Huguenots were razed, and their synods were not allowed to meet unless by authority of the government; but in other respects the freedom of worship, and the civil equality of Huguenots and Roman Catholics, were fully respected. See Robson: Life of Cardinal Richelieu, 1854; Schybergson: Le duc de Rohan et la chute du parti protestant en France, Paris, 1880.

RICHARDS, William, American Congregational missionary; b. at Plainfield, Mass., Aug. 22, 1792; d. at Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, Dec. 7, 1847. He was graduated from Williams College, 1819, and from Andover Seminary, 1822, and was ordained Nov. 19, 1825. He gained the Benevolent Society's Commission under commission of the American Board. He was stationed at Lahaina, on the Island of Maui, and was very successful. In 1837 he returned home; went out again the next year; and, being taken into the king's confidence, he was made his counsellor, interpreter, and chaplain, while still continuing missionary labors. In 1842, on the independence of the islands being guaranteed by England, Belgium, France, and the United States of America, he was sent as ambassador to England and several other foreign courts. In 1845 he returned to Honolulu, and was appointed minister of public instruction, which made him a member of the king's privy council. See Sprague: Annals, ii. 688.
RICHTER.

College, Cambridge, 1794, and proceeded M.A., 1797. In the latter year he was ordained, and became a curate on the Isle of Wight. In 1805 he was made rector of Turvey. While a child, by leaping from a wall, he was lamed for life. He edited The Fathers of the English Church, or a Selection from the Writings of the Reformers and Early Protestant Bishops of the Church of England, 1755, 8 vols. (1790-12, 8 vols.), and wrote Domestic Portraiture, or the Successful Application of Religious Principle in the Education of a Family, exemplified in the Memoirs of the Three Deceased Children of the Rev. Lish Richmond (9th ed., 1861). But the work by which he is best known is The Annals of the Poor, 1814, 2 vols.; which contain those immortal tracts, The Dairyman's Daughter, The Negro Servant, and The Young Cottager, previously published separately. Of the first, four million copies, in nineteen languages, had been circulated before 1849. See his Memoirs by Rev. T. S. Grimshaw, London, 1828; 9th ed., 1829; edited by Bishop G. T. Bedell, Philadelphia, 1845, etc.—have exercised a decisive influence on that branch of study.

RICHTER, Christian Friedrich Gottlieb, M.D., German hymnologist; b. at Sorau, Silesia, Oct. 5, 1797; d. at Halle, Oct. 5, 1711. After studying medicine and theology at Halle, he was appointed by Francke superintendent of the academy there, and, later, physician to the famous Halle Orphan-House. He was a Pietist. He wrote thirty-three excellent hymns, of which several have been translated into English. He delivered his highly esteemed lectures upon the Westminster Assembly's Canons of Doctrinal and Dogmatical Chronology, London, 1781-38, 2 vols.; new ed., revised, corrected, and illustrated, with notes by Rev. J. M. Wilson, Edinb., 1844, N.Y., 1855.

RIDLEY, Nicholas, English reformer and martyr; was b. early in the sixteenth century at Wiltmestock, Northumberland; d. at the stake, in Oxford, Oct. 16, 1555. After studying at the grammar-school at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, he entered Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, in 1518, supported by his uncle, Dr. Robert Ridley, fellow of Queen's College; and in 1522 became fellow of Pembroke. In 1527 he took orders, and went to the Sorbonne, Paris, and Louvain, for further studies. Returning to Cambridge in 1529, he became senior proctor in 1538, when he was 21 years of age, and was admired as a preacher. Fox calls his sermons "pitiful sermons." Cranmer made him his domestic chaplain, and vicar of Herne, East Kent. In 1540 he became king's chaplain, and master of Pembroke Hall, and in 1541 prebendary of Canterbury. At this period he was accused, at the instigation of Bishop Gardiner, of preaching against the Six Articles. The case being referred to Gardiner, Ridley was acquitted. In 1545 he was made prebendary of Westminster, in 1547 bishop of Rochester, and in 1550 Bonner's successor in the see of London. Bishop Ridley's name will always be mentioned in the same breath with those of Cranmer and Latimer, and honored for its distinguished connection and high character in the rejection of the errors and superstitions of the papal system. In 1545 he publicly renounced the doctrine of transubstantiation, to which he was led by reading Bertram's Book on the Sacrament. He committed to memory, in the walks of Pembroke Hall, nearly all the Epistles in Greek. He was committed to the Tower, June 10, 1549, from which he was removed with Latimer to the jail of Bocard, Oxford. There he was burned before Ballyiol Hall. The night before his execution he said to some friends, with whom he had supped, "I mean to go to bed, and, by God's will, to sleep as quietly as ever I did in my life." He seems to have been less imperceptible than his fellow-martyr, Latimer, who, on the way to the stake, cheered him up with the famous words, "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley: play the man. We shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as, I trust, shall never be put out." Fox has preserved an interesting account of Ridley, and describes him as "a man beautified with excellent qualities, so godly and religious, and so full of holy simplicity, and now written, doubtless, in the Book of Life," etc. Quarel has a poem on Ridley, in which he says,—

"Rome thundered death; but Ridley's dauntless eye Star'd in Death's face, and scorned Death standing by.

In spite of Rome, for England's faith he stood;
And in the flames he sealed it with his blood."

Ridley, although a learned man, left few writ-
ingsa behind him. They are, A Treatise against Image-Worship; Declaration against Transubstantiation: A Piteous Lamentation of the Miserable Estate of the Church in England in the Time of the Late Revolt from the Gospel, etc., and there have been published by the Religious Tract Society, London, Treatise and Letters of Dr. Nicholas Ridley, and by the Parker Society, The Works of Nicholas Ridley, Cambridge, by 1841. See Fox: Acts and Monuments; Dr. Gloucester Ridley: Life of Bishop Ridley, London, 1763.

Riegert, Georg Conrad, b. at Cannstadt, March 7, 1687; d. at Stuttgart, April 16, 1743. He studied theology at Tübingen, and was appointed professor at the gymnasium of Stuttgart in 1721, and pastor of St. Leonhard in 1733. He was one of the most celebrated preachers of the Pietistic school of his age, and published a considerable number of sermons, which are still much read in Württemberg.—Herzenspostille, Züllichau, 1742; Züllichau, Stuttgart, 1742; Richtiger Weg zum Himmel, Stuttgart, 1744; Hochzeitpredigten, 1749 (latest edition, Stuttgart, 1856), etc.

PALMER.

RIGHTENESS, Original. (For the Righteousness of Faith see JUSTIFICATION.) The elder Protestant theologians designated by the term Justitia originalis, or "original righteousness," the condition of man as made in the image of God, and before the fall. It is found for the first time in the writings of the scholastics, but the treatment of the doctrine was begun by Augustine. In his treatise De peccator. mer. et remiss. (ii. 37), he uses the term prima justitia, "first righteousness." He considers the doctrine from the standpoint of man's creation in the divine image. Irenæus, Theophylact, Justin, and others, speak of this first estate as one of childlike simplicity and innocence. The statement of Athanasius (ed. Paris, ii. 225) stands alone: "Those who mortify the deeds of the body, and have put on the new man, which is created after God, have the man after his image; for such was Adam before his disobedience (ξενω το και εικονα, τοιοντις γωνυ δι αυθεν προ της παρακολου ης). Prominence was given, in the treatment of this subject, to man's spiritual creation as the free gift of the Divine, by which he was to secure moral perfection. With Augustine the image of God is the inalienable "rational soul" (anima rationalis). This includes the will, with a positive inclination to holiness. The first man, however, stood in need of divine help to reach full righteousness (plena justitia). At first he was willing not to sin, and by supernatural grace he was able not to sin (posse non peccare). At the fall the concupiscence of the flesh (concupiscitia carnis) took the place of the good will (bona voluntas), and is itself sin: that is, the opposite of righteousness. After Augustine's death, semi-Pelagianism prevailed in the church; and at the synod of Orange, in 529, it was stated, that, "by the sin of Adam, the free will was so inclined and attenuated (attenutum), that no one was afterwards able to love God as he should, to believe in God, or to be influenced concerning God, except the prevalent grace of the divine mercy acted upon him." The scholastic theologians went farther. They dated the discord between flesh and spirit before the fall. The divine grace subjected the former to the latter in the case of Adam: therefore man's original righteousness was a superadded gift (donum superadditum). The proof was found in the alleged difference between the image (imago) and the image (imago, Gen. i. 26). The essential elements of the divine image were reason and will. Eternal life was a superadded gift.

The Reformers, with their deep sense of the sinfulness of sin, defined the original state of man as one in which righteousness and goodness were essential elements. Bellarmin developed the Roman-Catholic doctrine. As man came forth from the Creator's hands, he consisted of flesh and spirit, and stood related to the animals and the angels. By the latter he had intelligence and will; by the former, passions and appetite (sensus et affectus). A conflict arose, and from the conflict a terrible difficulty in doing well (ingenia bene agendi difficilia). This was the disease of nature (morbus naturae) which inheres in matter: hence God's gift of the free will. It was this perfection of the divine image, and not the image itself, which man lost at the fall.

The question is, whether man began with a state of absolute moral perfection, as the older Protestant theologians, especially the Lutheran theologians, asserted. Against this view, Julius Müller properly brings the objection that it excludes the possibility of the fall. But man's original condition was not one without a positive inclination to goodness. His will had this disposition; but, while it was in harmony with God's will, it might sin, and in the possibility of its sinning consisted its freedom. It was man's duty to preserve his rectitude by his own voluntary choice, thus confirming God's work. The doctrine of man's original righteousness is not necessarily found in Eph. iv. 24, but in Gen. i., ii., Ecl. vii. 29, and especially in the scriptural definitions of sin,—as a defiance of the divine will, and the cause of human corruption, and the analogy presented by the righteousness of faith. See CHEMNITZ: De imagin. Dei in hom., Wittenb., 1750; Cotta: De rectitud. hom. primam, Tub., 1759; WERNSDORF: De relig. imag. hom., Wittenb., 1790; [A. Ritschl: Die christl. Lehre von der Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung dargestellt, Bonn, 1870-74, 3 vols. 2d ed., 1882-83; Eng. trans. of vol. i., A Critical History of the Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation, Edinb., 1872; and the Theologies of Hodge, Van Oosterzee, and Donkerr; and the works on Symbolics sub "Primitive State"]; H. CREMER.

RIMMON (ていき, pomegranate), the name of an Aramaic divine image (consonantal form, Rāman). It occurs as the name of three places (Joash xv. 22; 1 Chron. vi. 77; Judg. xx. 43), and also as a proper name (2 Sam. iv. 2); but it is uncertain whether, in these cases, the name comes from the god, or the pomegranate. The LXX. makes a distinction between them, calling the god Ρηπαρν, and the pomegranate Ρηπηνος, Ρηπως. The former form for the god is indeed, Raman, or Ramman; for he is the Assyrian god Ramman. The best explanation of the word is "the height." The many-seeded pomegranate is the symbol of fruitfulness. The tree was holy, and its fruit appears upon the sculptures in the hands of deities.
man, Zeas Kasion). Astarte planted the pomegranate upon Cyprus: hence the close connection between the name "pomegranate" and the god. See BAUDISSIN: Studien; P. SCHOLZ: Göttendiens.

WOLF BAUDISSIN.

RING, Melchior, was schoolmaster at Hersfeld, when in 1524 he became acquainted with Thomas Müntzer, and soon, also, one of his most ardent discipic. In the same year he went to Sweden as leader of an Anabaptist movement in Stockholm, but returned shortly after to take part in the Peasants' War. After a visit to Switzerland, he began to preach in the vicinity of Hersfeld, attacking the Lutherans with great violence; but in 1531 he was imprisoned by the landgrave of Hesse, and probably never released. His writings have perished.

RINGS were used as ornaments for the nose, the ears, the arms, and the legs, and more especially for the fingers, as far back in the history of the human race as historical researches reach. The Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans, and the barbaric peoples of Teutonic origin which invaded Europe, or, rather, the Roman Empire, at the beginning of our era, wore them. In course of time, however, the ornament received a special signification, and the finger-ring became a token of authority, or a sign of a pledge. A token of authority was that ring which Pharaoh gave to Joseph (Gen. xii. 42), or Hassebrus to Haman (Esth. iii. 10), or Antichus to Philip (1 Macc. vi. 15); and so was the ring which every member of the equestrian order in the Roman Commonwealth wore. After the battle of Cannae, Hannibal sent a bushel of such rings to Carthage. A sign of a pledge was the ring, which, among the Hebrews and the Romans, the bridegroom gave to the bride on the occasion of their betrothal, and which in the tenth century of our era became the Christian marriage-ring. A combination of both these significations is represented by the episcopal ring, which is at once emblematic of the episcopal charge in the church and of the power of his order. It bears a ring, usually cast of gold or silver, "Annulus pontifici," and sometimes annulus palatii. At what time it became a part of the official costume of his office, whence it is sometimes called annulus pontificius, and sometimes annulus palatii. In the ecclesiastical Offices by Isidore of Seville, 595-633, the "Fisherman's Ring," see Annulus Piscatorius, and sometimes Annulus palatii. In the "Frisian's Ring," see ANNULLUS PISCATORIUS. See MARTIGNY: Des Anneaux chez les premiers Chrétiens, Magon, 1858.

RINKART, Martin, German hymnologist; b. at Eilenburg, April 23, 1586; d. there, as archdeacon, Dec. 8, 1649. After studying at Leipzig, and serving as pastor in Eisleben and Eudeborn, he settled in Eilenburg (1617), and there remained till his death: thus his settlement was synchronous with the Thirty-Two War. In the pestilence of 1637, and famine of 1638, he was a savior to his fellow-townsmen; and when the Swedish Lieut.-Col. Dörfling, on Feb. 21, 1639, demanded thirty thousand thalers (ten thousand dollars) as the ransom of the city from destruction, he had led in vain, he assembled the citizens to prayer and service, with the result that the victorious wehe at last accepted two thousand gulden (one thousand dollars) as ransom. But it is as the author of the German Te Deum (Nun danket alle Gott, 1644) that Rinkart is immortal. The hymn is in three stanzas, of which the first two are based upon Sirach, lines 24-25, and the third upon the old Gloria Patri. Miss Winkworth has made a close English translation. See PLATO: M. Rinkart, Leipzig, 1830; MILLER: Singers and Songs of the Church, pp. 56, 57.

RIPLEY, Henry Jones, D.D., Baptist; b. in Boston, Mass., Jan. 28, 1798; d. at Newton Centre, Mass., May 21, 1875. He was graduated at Harvard University, 1818, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1819; was evangelist among the Southern slaves from 1819 to 1826, with the exception of one year. In 1826 he became professor of biblical literature and pastoral duties in the newly founded Newton Theological Institution; from 1882 he taught biblical literature only, until in 1839 he was transferred to the chair of sacred rhetoric and pastoral duties. He resigned in 1860; for five years engaged in literary work and helastic labors among the freedmen of Georgia; in 1865 became librarian of Newton; and from 1872 to 1875 was associate professor of biblical literature. Besides much work in periodicals, he wrote, Memoir of Rev. T. S. Winn, Boston, 1824; Christian Baptism, 1838; Notes on the Four Gospels, 1837-38. 2 vols.; Notes on the Acts of the Apostles, 1844; Sacred Rhetoric, 1849; Notes on Romans, 1857; Exclusiveness of the Baptists, 1857; Church Polity, 1867; Notes on Hebrews, 1868.

RIPON, a town in Yorkshire, Eng. The abbot of Melrose founded a monastery there in 601, which the Danes destroyed in 867. The cathedral was begun in 1801, finished, probably, 1832. The town was made the seat of a bishopric in 386.

RIPPOW, John, D.D., a prominent Baptist minister, and for sixty-three years pastor of a single charge in London; was b. at Tiverton, Devon, April 29, 1751; and d. in London, Dec. 17, 1836. He edited the Baptist Annual Register, 1790-1802, An Arrangement of the Psalms, Hymns, etc., of Dr. Watts, and A Selection of Psalms, Hymns, etc., 1844; Sacred Rhetoric, 1849; Notes on Romans, 1857. Some of the contents of this last are supposed to be wholly or in part his own; but his services to hymnody are much more eminent as a compiler than as a composer. His Selection included many originals by Beddome, S. Stennett, Ryland, Turner, Francis, and others, and brought to public notice many lyrics previously in print, but little known. Frequently reprinted, and consulted by almost every subsequent compiler, its direct and indirect influences have been incalculable. It ranks as one of the half-dozen hymn-books of most historical importance in the English language. F. M. BIRD.

RISLER, Jeremiah, Moravian; b. at Mühlhausen, Upper Alsace, Nov. 9, 1720; d. at Berthelsdorf, Saxony, Aug. 23, 1811. He was graduated at Basel; from 1744 to 1760 a Reformed minister at Lübeck and St. Peters burg, but from 1760 to his death a Moravian; from 1782 a bishop; and from 1786 a member of the Unity's Elders Conference. He was an eloquent preacher, and faithful bishop. He made a French translation of Zinzendorf's Discourses, and of the Hymnal (1780), wrote La sainte doctrine (1789), Leben von A. G. Spangenberg (Barby u. Leipzig, 1794), and Erzählungen aus der Brüdergeschichte, 3 vols.
RITTER. Karl, b. at Quedlinburg, Aug. 7, 1770; d. in Berlin, Sept. 25, 1859; was appointed professor of geography in the university of Lin in 1820, and gave a new and powerful impulse to that branch of study. Those of his works which interest the student of the Bible are Der Jordan und die Beschreibung des Toten Meeres, Berlin, 1850; Ein Blick auf Palästina, Berlin, 1852; The Comparative Geography of Palestine and the Sinatic Peninsula, trans. by Gage, Edinburgh, 1852.

RITUAL means a regulation of external worship, and has aptly been defined as "the external body of words and action by which worship is expressed and exhibited before God and man."

RITUALE ROMANUM. After the Council of Trent, the popes took great care to suppress the various rituals which had developed within the pale of the Roman Church, and to establish uniformity of worship in ritual. In that purpose, Pius V. published the Breviarium Romanum and the Missale Romanum; Clement VIII. the Pontifical and Ceremoniale; and Paul V., the Rituale Romanum, which, by a decree of June 16, 1614, was made obligatory on all the officers of the Church of Rome. See J. CATALANUS: Sacrum Ceremon. sive Ritum Eccles. S. Rom. Ecclesiae Lib. Tres, Rome, 1750, 2 vols. fol. -- H. F. JACOBSON.

RITUALISM. This popular catchword is used to describe the second stage of that movement in the English Church which in its earlier condition had been named Tractarianism. The name first appears, probably, in connection with the riots at St. George's-in-the-East in 1859 (cf. quotation from East London Observer of May, 1859, quoted in Letter to Bishop of London, by Bryan King, 1860).

The revival of interest in Catholic dogmas, effected by the Oxford writers of the Tracts for the Times, was naturally succeeded by a revival of interest in Catholic observances. This practical revival carried the movement into novel circumstances and situations; for the earlier detection and exhibition of that sacerdotal structure of the church which had been secured to it by struggles of the Elizabethan divines, was carried on, of necessity, in the method of mediating the external by the internal. The claim asserted, first, had to make good its doctrinal status: it had to begin by working its way into the mind and the imagination. The Tractarian writers recognized this necessary order: they anxiously held aloof from precipitating those emotions which were making new demands upon out emotions were making new demands upon out.

RITUALISM. This popular catchword is used to describe the second stage of that movement in the English Church which in its earlier condition had been named Tractarianism. The name first appears, probably, in connection with the riots at St. George's-in-the-East in 1859 (cf. quotation from East London Observer of May, 1859, quoted in Letter to Bishop of London, by Bryan King, 1860).

The revival of interest in Catholic dogmas, effected by the Oxford writers of the Tracts for the Times, was naturally succeeded by a revival of interest in Catholic observances. This practical revival carried the movement into novel circumstances and situations; for the earlier detection and exhibition of that sacerdotal structure of the church which had been secured to it by struggles of the Elizabethan divines, was carried on, of necessity, in the method of mediating the external by the internal. The claim asserted, first, had to make good its doctrinal status: it had to begin by working its way into the mind and the imagination. The Tractarian writers recognized this necessary order: they anxiously held aloof from precipitating those emotions which were making new demands upon out.

The force and reality of imagination in the shaping of life's interests were recognized with the glad welcome of a recovered joy. A touch of kindliness repelled the earth with fancies and dreams. This world of art, of poetry, of drama, was no longer a naked factory, housing the mass of a people in a uniformity of worship through inwardness; it became the home of a free and unyielding dogma; nor was it the bare and square hall in which reason and prayer and praise will instinctively resort to ceremonial.

Nor was the pressure towards ritual merely doctrinal. The double movement in the church had its parallel in the secular world. The spiritual and revival of Wren's religious and artistic, the emotional revival of Walter Scott. The set of things was running counter to Puritan bareness. The force and reality of imagination in the shaping of life's interests were recognized with the glad welcome of a recovered joy. A touch of kindliness repelled the earth with fancies and suggestions, and visions and dreams. This world of art, of poetry, of drama, was no longer a naked factory, housing the mass of a people in a uniformity of worship through inwardness; it became the home of a free and unyielding dogma; nor was it the bare and square hall in which reason and prayer and praise will instinctively resort to ceremonial.
proselytism of common life. The churches were responding to a real and wide need when they offered a refuge and a relief to the distressed imagination. Everywhere began the Gothic revival. The restoration of the disgraced and destitute parish churches, which had become practically necessary, was taken up by men full of admiration for the architecture which had first built them. They were passionately set on bringing them back as far as possible into their original condition. The architects thus were, indirectly, and with work on Altar Rails and credence-table. This combination of ecclesiastical and architectural sentiment was greatly furthered by the Cambridge Ecclesiological Society; which did much to foster anti-proselytism and to promote active efforts at restoration. (Beresford Hope's Worship in the Church of England.) This architectural movement, which dated its earliest impulses from J. H. Newman's church, built at Littlemore amid much ferment and anxiety, culminated in the vast achievements of Gilbert Scott and George Street, whose handiwork has been left in restored churches throughout the length and breadth of England. This general restoration of order and fairness into the public services, which ran level with the renewal of church fabrics, roused much popular hostility, which made itself known in riotous disturbances, as at Exeter, etc., chiefly directed against the use of the surplice in the pulpit, following a direction issued by Bishop Blomfield in 1842.

But just as the artistic movement deepened from the external ornamentation of the Waverley novels into the impassioned mysticism of D. G. Rossetti and the pre-Raphaelite brothers, so the architectural revival turned into the impassioned socialism of a more rapacious sacramentalism. This it was which produced the historical crisis; and this crisis became yet more critical by forcing into sharp antagonism the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdictions which were called upon to deal with the renovating ministers. The story of the movement turns round the various legal judgments given to determine the sense of the "Ornaments Rubric;" i.e., the Rubric inserted, in its first form, into the Prayer-Book of Elizabeth, and re-inserted, in a slightly changed form, in the Prayer-Book of the Restoration, prescribing the ornaments of the minister and of the chancellor during all offices. The aim of the Elizabethan divines had been to secure the main work of the Reformation, and yet to protect the Liturgy from "loose and licentious handling" of the more eager of the Marian exiles. They had therefore accepted, with some important alterations, the second of the two Prayer-Books of Edward VI. as the standard of the Reformed services; but, owing to the strong pressure of the queen, they refused to adopt it also as the standard of the ornaments; and for this they went back to an earlier date, the second year of King Edward VI., when much ritual remained which the first Prayer-Book of Edward VI. had accepted, but which the second book had rejected. There is no doubt that this included and intended chasubles and cope, albs and tunics, with other details of altar-furnitures. The question that arose was as to how far this Rubric, when re-enacted in the Act of Uniformity, was intended by the divines of the Restoration to retain its full original sense. In its earlier form it was prescribed "until the queen should take further order." Was that "further order" ever taken? and, if so, does the later condition of the Rubric, in omitting any reference to this "further order," assume that order, or ignore it? If it ignored it, why was it never acted upon? Here started up a new difficulty. The juridical relations between Church and State were the result of a most long and intricate history, which at the Reformation had finally assumed this general form. The old machinery of ecclesiastical courts remained entire,—consisting of the Bishop's Courts of First Instance, in which the bishop's chancellor adjudicated; and the Archbishop's Court of Appeal, in which the dean of arches gave judgment, as the embodiment of the archbishop. But from this, again, there was to be an appeal to the king; and for hearing such appeals a composite court had been erected by Henry VIII., the Court of Delegates, the exact jurisdiction of which had never been clearly defined. This court continued, rarely used, dimly considered, until, without anybody's notice, a great legal reform, carried out by Lord Brougham, was discovered to have transferred, without intending it, all the power of this Court of Delegates to a certain Committee of Privy Council, composed and defined for other general purposes. When suddenly there was need of a final adjudication on the legal points in the ritual questions, it was this Committee of Privy Council which the rival parties found themselves facing. It dealt with the question of baptism, in the case of Mr. Gorham (1850); and Bishop Blomfield of London had in consequence, speaking in the House of Lords, protested against the nature and character of the committee as a court of final appeal in ecclesiastical questions. No change, however, had been effected; and in March, 1857, the question of ritual was brought before it, on appeal, in the case of "Westerton vs. Liddell," in which case the ritualistic practices of St. Barnabas, Pimlico, had been condemned in the Consistory Court of London and in the Court of Arches. Amidst great excitement, the committee pronounced that the Rubric permitted generally the use of those articles which were prescribed under the first Prayer-Book, and therefore sanctioned the use of credence-table, altar-cross, altar-lights, colored altar-cloths, etc. From that moment the Ritualists have acted steadily in the belief that this legal decision was but affirming that which is the plain, historical sense of the words in the Rubric, and have pressed, often with rashness, sometimes with insolence, for the revival of all the ritual which this interpretation justified. In accomplishing this, they have been aided, advised, and sustained by the elaborate organization of the RITUALISM.

English Church Union, numbering now over twenty thousand members, formed for the defence and protection of those, who, in carrying out the Rubric so understood, were menaced by perils and penalties. For however favorable single congregations might be, yet the work of revival had to be carried on, (1) in defiance of the long unbroken usage, which had never attempted any thing beyond that simpler ritual which had been adopted and allowed as the practicable minimum allowed to continue months, and finally to succeed in expelling the rector, Mr. Bryan King, and in wrecking his service; (4) in defiance of the Court of Final Appeal, which, in a series of fluctuating, doubtful, and conflicting judgments, had created a deep distrust in its capacity to decide judicially questions so rife with agitated feelings and popular prejudices. This distrust—strongly roused by the Mackonochie judgment (1868) and the Parsius judgment (1871), in which it was declared that the “further restraint” of the use of vestments, “by reason of the possible legality of the vestments,” declined to declare their illegality, and then had found itself unable to attain any thing like unanimous agreement on the nature of the legal process which it proposed to recommend. The inner history of the commission will be found in the third volume of Bishop's Wilberforce's Life.

No legislation on the main subject followed this divided report. But until now in 1879, and the Pan-Anglican Synod in 1880, had come to resolutions more or less in accord with the commissioners' report, in the sense of recommending a prohibitory discretion to the bishop in any case where a change of vesture was attempted. Such a recommendation seemed naturally to allow and assume the abstract legality of the change. Yet the courts of law had finally decreed vestments illegal, and the majority of bishops were prepared to accept their interpretation; and, as long as they did so, no terms of peace could be found on the basis of the proposal in convocation. For even though the bishops were willing to abstain, in favorable cases, from pressing the legal decisions, they were forced to set the law in motion by the action of a society called the "Church Association," which exerted itself to assert the rights of any parishioners who might be aggrieved by the ritual used in any church. Thus the exercise of discretion was made all but impossible to a bishop, who could only veto proceedings brought against a clergyman by giving a valid reason, and yet was forbidden to offer as a valid reason the possible legality of the vestments.

The Commission on Ritual, therefore, had left the conflict still severe and unappeased. The Commission on Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction is still sitting. It has relieved excited feelings by allowing that the condition of that jurisdiction is open to question. And the last act of Archbishop Tait, on his death-bed, was to suggest a truce to the fierce legal prosecutions which had embittered the long controversy, by bringing about an arrangement which would terminate, to use the language of Martin vs. Mackonochie, round which the contest had turned for eighteen years. Thus the tension has slackened: the possibility of peace seems to have become conceivable. The question has widened from the consideration of ritual to the problem of the permanent adjustment of Church and State. The days of ritual fever and ritual wildness are passing. The chaos which the absence
Robert resisted, "but was forced to submit," the Pope, Gregory V. (998), ordered his hundred paupers entirely, and a thousand par, still to prescribe, however much long usage may manage to reign thirty-four years. But his tially. By the help of his ecclesiastical influence asteries, built seven churches, and supported three mit, and humble himself, before the ban was taken rest on the Continent. While there, he married (1) Lieutgarde, or Bosale, widow of Arnoul, Count of Flanders; and (2) Bertha, of France, and son of Hugh Capet, was b. at Or. 988, and became sole king 996. He married (1) Lieutgarde, or Bosale, widow of Arnoul, Count of Flanders; and (2) Bertha, widow of first Count of Chartres and Blois; and the widow of first Count of Chartres and Blois; and was appointed minister at the College of Orange. Be the debates of the Union, but was, perhaps, more influenced by Arnold and Wordsworth than by the Academies, built seven churches, and supported three mit, and humble himself, before the ban was taken off. In all other particulars Robert is a pattern of conformity, and more a monk than a king. He loved music and poetry, founded four monasteries, built seven churches, and supported three hundred paupers entirely, and a thousand partially. By the help of his ecclesiastical influence he managed to reign thirty-four years. But his true place was in the cloister, and he could ill cope with the affairs of his time. By his third wife, a handsome shrew, he had four sons and two daughters. Robert's natural son, Amauri, was great-grandfather (trisuelo) to Simon de Montfort. The Venit, Sancte Spiritus (Cone, Holy Spirit), which is one of the specialties of Latin hymns, is now known to have been written by Hermannus Contractus.

ROBERTSON, Frederick William, English preacher; b. in London, Feb. 23, 1816; d. at Brighton, Aug. 15, 1853: eldest son of Frederick Robertson, a captain in the royal artillery. His education was begun under the personal superintendence of his father, who instructed him for four years. In 1829 the family removed to Tours, where he studied the classics with an English tutor, and attended a French seminary; but, owing to the Revolution of 1830, his father returned to England, and Frederick was placed at the Edinburgh academy, under Archdeacon Williams. From there he was sent to the university, where he attended various classes, and whence, at the age of eighteen, he returned to his home with great store of miscellaneous knowledge, and many pleasant memories. In 1833 he was articled to a solicitor in Bury St. Edmunds; but, after a year at the desk, his health broke down, and it was resolved that he should enter the army, for which he had always aspired. But, weary with waiting for a commission, he at length determined, on the urgent advice of some wise friends, to study for the ministry; and on May 4, 1837, he was examined and matriculated in Brasenose, Oxford. Five days after, he received the offer of a commission in the Second Dragoons; but the decision was made, and the offer was declined, although all through his life he retained his martial tastes, and his character had the finest qualities of military heroism. He was known at Oxford as "one who carried the banner of the cross without fear, and was not ashamed of Christ." He took a lively interest in the debates of the Unionists, and was influenced by Arnold and Wordsworth than by the studies prescribed in the curriculum. He was ordained by the bishop of Winchester on July 12, 1840, and was for a year curate in that city. He began his ministry with deep earnestness and devout humility, and practised the most rigorous austerities, by which his health was broken down, so that he had as compelled to seek rest on the Continent. While there, he married at Geneva, and almost immediately after returned to Cheltenham, where, in the summer of 1842, he accepted the curacy of Christ Church, and performed its duties for nearly five years. In September, 1846, he went again to the Continent; and there, with Arnold and Wordsworth. It was through that spiritual crisis which he has so vividly described in his lecture to working-men. Hitherto he had been ranked among the Evangelicals of the Episcopal Church; but now, after a terrible struggle, in which his faith at one time could hold by nothing but that "it is always right to do right," he came out at length on the side of the Broad School. He therefore resigned his Cheltenham curacy, and accepted the charge of St. Ebbes, Oxford, on which he entered in the beginning of 1847. Thence he went to Trinity Church, Brighton, where he began his work, Aug. 15, 1847, and where he continued till his death, precisely seven years after. In this place he gathered round him a large and intelligent and admiring hearers, and threw him self warmly into special efforts for the welfare of workingmen, for whom he formed an institute, and to whom he delivered some of his ablest lectures. But though he was popular as a preacher while he lived,—so popular, indeed, as to have become a target of satirists on the Continent, and the party whom that newspaper represented,— yet it was not until he died that his influence was appreciably felt by the great world. After his brief pastorate in Brighton, it was natur ROBERTSON, Edward, D.D., LL.D., an eminent biblical scholar, and pioneer of modern Palestine exploration; b. at Southington, Conn., April 10, 1794; d. in New York City, Tuesday, Jan. 27, 1863. He was graduated first in his class at Hamilton College, Clifton, N.Y., 1816, and after studying law at Hudson, N.Y., in 1817 returned there as tutor in mathematics and Greek, held the position only a year. On Sept. 3, 1818, he married Miss Eliza Kirkland, daughter of the Oneida missionary, who, however, died the next year. From his marriage until 1821 he worked his wife's farm, but also pursued his studies. In the autumn of 1821 he went to Andover to superintend the printing of his edition of part of the 11ad (bks. 3.-ix., xviii., xix.), which appeared in 1822, and while there, under Professor Moses Stuart's influence, began his career as biblical scholar and teacher. From 1823 to 1828 he was instructor in the Hebrew language and literature at Andover Theological Seminary, meanwhile busily occupied with literary labors. He assisted Professor Stuart in the second edition of his Hebrew Grammar (Andover, 1823, 1st ed., 1813), and in his translation of Winer's Grammar of the New Testament Greek (1829), and alone translated Wahl's Clavis philologica Novi Testamenti (1829). In 1826 he went to Europe, and studied at Göttingen, Halle, and Berlin, making the acquaintance, and winning the praises, of Gesenius, Tholuck, and Rodiger in Halle, and Neander and Ritter in Berlin. On Aug. 7, 1828, he married Therese Albertine Luise, youngest daughter of L. A. von Jacob, professor of philosophy and political science at the university of Halle, a highly gifted woman of thorough culture, well known before her marriage by her pseudonym of "Talvi" (see list of her works in Allibone, ii. p. 1838). In 1830 he returned home; and from 1830 to 1833 he was professor-extraordinary of biblical literature, and librarian in Andover Theological Seminary. In January, 1831, he founded the Biblical Repository, subsequently (1831) united with the Bibliotheca Sacra, to which he contributed numerous translations and original articles. In 1831 he was made D.D. by Dartmouth College. In 1832 he issued an improved edition of Taylor's translation of Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible, and in 1833 a smaller Dictionary of the Holy Bible (which has been widely circulated) and a translation of Buttmann's Greek Grammar (extensively used as a text-book). In 1833 ill health, induced by his severe labors, compelled him to resign his professorship, and he removed to Boston. Continuing his studies, however, in 1834 he brought out a revised edition of Newcome's Greek Harmony of the Gospels (far superior to the earlier editions); in 1836, a translation of Gesenius' Hebrew Lexicon (5th edition, the last in which Robinson made any changes, 1854) and the independent Greek and English Lexicon of the New Testament (revised ed., 1850). In 1837 he was called to be professor of biblical literature in the (Presbyterian) Union Theological Seminary, New York City. He accepted, on condition that he be permitted first to spend some years (at his own expense) in studying the geography of the Holy Land on the spot. Permission being given, he sailed July 17, 1837, and in conjunction with Rev. Dr. Eli Smith, an accomplished Arabic scholar, and faithful missionary of the American Board in Syria, thoroughly explored all the important places in Palestine and Syria. In October, 1838, he returned to Berlin; and there for two years he worked upon his Biblical Researches in Palestine, Mount Sinai, and Arabia Petraea. This truly great work, which at once established the author's reputation as a geographer and biblical student of the first rank, appeared simultaneously in London, Boston, and in a German translation carefully revised by Dr. Edward Robinson, through the press in Halle by Professor Rodiger, 1841, 3 vols. In recognition of his eminent services, he received in 1842 the Patron's Gold Medal from the Royal Geographical Society of London, and the degree of D.D. from the university of Halle, while in 1844 Yale College gave him that of LL.D. In 1862 he visited Palestine again, and published the results of this second visit in 1856, in the second edition of his Biblical Researches, and in a supplemental volume.—Later Biblical Researches in Palestine and the Adjacent Regions: the third edition of the whole work appeared in 1867, 3 vols. Dr. Robinson regarded the work as a mere preparation for a complete physical, historical, and topographical geography of the Holy Land. But repeated attacks of illness undermined his constitution, and an intractable disease of the eyes obliged him in 1862 to lay aside the pen. After his death in 1865, the first part, the Physical Geography of the Holy Land, which was all he had prepared, was published in English (London and Boston) and in a German translation by his wife (Berlin).

Meanwhile he had occupied himself with preparing an independent Greek Harmony of the Gospels (1843), which was far superior to any thing of the kind, and in 1846 an English Harmony. He also revised his other works for new editions, wrote numerous articles and essays, and lectured regularly in the seminary.

In May, 1862, he made his fifth and last visit to Europe, saw many old friends, but failed to receive any permanent benefit to his eyesight. In November he returned, and resumed his lectures in the Christian Lyceum. He was forced to cease, and after a brief illness died, Jan. 27, 1863.

Dr. Robinson was a man of athletic form and imposing figure, though somewhat bent in later years; of strong, sound good sense; reserved, though when in congenial company often very entertaining and humorous. He was thorough and indomitable in his investigations, very sceptical of all monastic legends, very reverent to God's revelation. Outwardly cold, his heart was warm, and his sympathies tender. He is the most distinguished biblical theologian whom America has produced,—indeed, one of the most distinguished of the century. Of all his valuable works his Biblical Researches did most to perpetuate his memory. "The first real impulse, because the first successful impulse, towards the scientific examination of the Holy Land is due to the American traveller, Dr. Robinson." Ritter praised his "union of the acutest observation of topographic and local conditions with much preparatory study, particularly the erudite study of the Bible, and of philological and historical criticism" (Die Erdkunde von Asien, viii., div. ii. 73). Dean Stanley said, "Dr. Robinson was the first person who ever saw Palestine with his eyes open to what he ought to see" (Addresses in the United States, p. 26). The original manuscript of Dr. Robinson's Biblical Researches and a part of his library are in possession of the Union Theological Seminary.

For further information, see the memorial addresses of his colleagues, Drs. Hitchcock and Henry B. Smith, in Life, Writings, and Character of Edward Robinson, D.D., New York, 1863; Dean Stanley: Addresses in the United States, 1879, pp. 23–34; and the author's arts. in Herzog, xiii. 13–16, and in McClintock and Strong, ix. 50–53. PHILIP SCHAFF.

ROBINSON, John, M.A. It is not certain where the subject of this sketch was born, probably in or near Gainsborough; but whether in Lincolnshire or Nottinghamshire we have no means of deciding: this we learn, however, that the event happened in 1575 or 1576. At the age of seventeen (in 1592) he was admitted to Corpus Christi (Benet's) College, Cambridge, which was then much inclined to Puritanism, where he remained for seven years. Having taken his degree, he was elected a fellow of his college in 1598–99, and went to Norwich, or some place in its neighborhood, about 1600, where, according to his own account, "the work was . . . committed to him," and where he labored as a preacher about four years. Whilst here, those doubts which eventually ripened into convictions agitated his mind, and his Puritan practices led to his suspension from the ministry by the bishop of the diocese; after which, being denied the right of preaching in some leased building, and having failed to secure the master-ship of the hospital at Norwich (probably that which Harrison had held some years before),—for which failure Bishop Hall afterwards taunted him,—he left Norwich in 1604, resolved on separation. The resolution was a painful one; and with reference to it he said, "Had not the truth been in my heart 'as a burning fire shut up in my bones' (Jer. xx. 9), I had never broken those 'tendrils of flesh and fat' which had been tied, but had suffered the light of God to have been put out in mine own unhateful heart by other men's darkness." He doubted the existence of a company of Separatists, under John Smyth at Gainsborough, to whom he went, taking Cambridge on his way, where he consulted with Paul Baynes, Lawrence Chaderton, and others, as to the course he contemplated; and now he resigned his fellowship. When he arrived at Gainsborough, he was welcomed into the com-company of many who afterwards chose him for their pastor, and who now are known as the "Pilgrim Fathers." This Gainsborough society, for politic reasons, divided, and became two distinct churches. Urged by the persecutions they endured, original body went to Amsterdam in 1606: the remainder consolidated at Scrooby, and ordinarily met at Mr. Brewster's house; but, in consequence of continued persecution, these also resolved to emigrate, and went over to Holland in 1607 and 1608. They first went to Amsterdam, but only temporarily; and then (in February, 1609) Robinson and about a hundred of his friends applied to the burgomasters of Leyden, requesting permission to reside in their town. This permission was granted, and here the exiles remained for eleven years before the first Pilgrims left. In 1611 they purchased a building in the Clock-steeple, which they enlarged, and adapted it to their purposes, and made it their headquarters; and here Robinson resided. In 1615 he became a member of the university of Leyden, where he honorably disputed with Episcopalians on the points of Arminianism, and where he was greatly respected. The church increased under his ministry, but they still were strangers in a foreign land. They felt this, and longed for a dwelling-place where they might feel themselves at home; as, their native land refused them a peaceful habitation, they turned their thoughts to America; there they thought they might find a home, and spread the gospel, and thither they resolved to go. Brewster was appointed to lead the first company: and Robinson remained with the rest, intending to follow with them when the way should be prepared; but this service he did not live to render. In 1620, after an affecting parting, the first Pilgrims started. They purchased a dwelling-place where they might feel themselves at home; and, as their native land refused them a peaceful habitation, they turned their thoughts to America; there they thought they might find a home, and spread the gospel, and thither they resolved to go. Brewster was appointed to lead the first company: and Robinson remained with the rest, intending to follow with them when the way should be prepared; but this service he did not live to render. In 1620, after an affecting parting, the first Pilgrims started. Robinson died in Leyden in 1625, and was buried, March 4, in St. Peter's Church. He married Bridget White, by whom he had several children. His life and works were published in England and most complete account of him and his opinions is contained in Dr. Dexter's The Congregationalism of the Last Three Hundred Years, New York, 1906. ROBINSON, Robert, an able and erratic preacher of various opinions, but mostly connected with the Baptists; was b. at Swaffham in Norfolk, Jan. 8, 1735; d. while on a visit to Dr. Priestley, at Birmingham, June 8, 1790. From 1761 he was pastor of a society at Cambridge. He translated Saurin's Sermons (1775–84, 5 vols.), and published some of his own, besides a History of England, which appeared posthumously 1790, and other works. He wrote two very popular hymns, "Come, thou Fount" (1758), and "Mighty God, while angels bless thee" (1774). F. M. BIRD.

ROBINSON, Stuart, D.D., Presbyterian; b. at Strabane, near Londonderry, Ireland, Nov. 29, 1810; d. at Louisville, Ky., Oct. 5, 1881. He was graduated at Amherst College, Massachusetts, 1836, and studied theology at Union Theological Seminary, New York, and taught school for two years; was pastor at Kanawha Salines, Va., 1841–47; at Frankfort, Ky., till 1852; at Baltimore, Md., till 1856; was professor of ecclesiology in the Presbyterian theological seminary at Danville, Ky., until 1858; and from then until his death was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church at Louisville, Ky. He was one of the most prominent clergymen of the South. He escaped the Southern side during the civil war. Among his published works are, The Church of God an Essential Element of the Gospel (Philadelphia, 1858), and Discourses of Redemption (New York, 1866, Edinburgh, 1869).

ROCH, St., b. at Montpellier in 1295; d. there in 1327. During an epidemic he went from town to town in Northern Italy, nursing the sick, and curing them in a miraculous way. After his return, however, he was imprisoned in his native place, and he died in the dungeon. But in course of time such a number of fabulous tales gathered around his name, that innumerable churches, chapels, and hospitals were dedicated to him. See Act. Sacr., Aug. 16. ZÖCKLER.

ROCHESTER, a city of Kent, Eng., on the right bank of the Medway, twenty-eight miles south-east of London, with population, 1871, 18,352. In 604 there was a priory there and a bishopric. Its cathedral was founded by Gundulf, 1077; consecrated, 1130. Its restoration was begun in 1871. It is principally Norman and Early English in style.

ROCK, Daniel, D.D., Roman Catholic; b. at Liverpool, 1790; d. at Kensington (London), Nov. 28, 1871. He was educated in the English College, Rome; was domestic chaplain to the Earl of Shrewsbury, 1827–40, then pastor at Buckland, near Farrington, and on the re-introduction of the Roman-Catholic hierarchy in 1852 canon of Southwark. He was an eminent antiquarian, and wrote Hierurgia, or The Sacrifice of the Mass expounded (London, 1833, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1851, 1 vol.), Did the Early Church in England acknowledge the Pope's Supremacy? (1841, The Church of Our Fathers, as seen in St. Osmond's Rite for the Cathedral of Salisbury (vol. i., ii., 1849, vol. iii., pts. 1, 2, 1853–54).

RODGERS, John, D.D., Presbyterian; b. in Boston, Aug. 5, 1727; d. in New York, May 7, 1811. He was licensed by the presbytery of Newcastle, October, 1747; on March 10, 1749, was settled in Philadelphia as pastor of St. George's. In 1763 he resigned, and came to New York, where he was pastor until his death, except during the Revolutionary War. In 1789 he was elected moderator of the first General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, held at Philadelphia. He was a staunch patriot during the Revolution, and was several times consulted by Washington. He was a prominent character in church and city life. See Samuel Miller: Memoir of John Rodgers, New York, 1809, new ed., Presbyterian Board, Philadelphia; Sprague: Annals, iii. 154.

RÖDGER, Emil, b. at Sangerhausen, Thuringia, Oc. 13, 1801; d. in Berlin, June 15, 1874.
Roger, Ebenezer Piatt, D.D., Reformed Episcopal bishop; b. Oct. 18, 1806; d. at Weimar, June 15, 1848. He studied theology at Leipzig, and was appointed preacher at the university church there in 1802, pastor of Ostrau in 1804, and court-preacher at Weimar in 1820. He is one of the most prominent representatives of the so-called rationalismus vulgaris, and gave a full exposition of his views in his Briefe über den Rationalismus, Aix-la-Chapelle, 1813. Afterwards he maintained a continuous opposition, both against orthodoxy and against the speculative ideas, in his periodicals, Predigerliteratur (1810-14), Neue und Neueste Predig literatur (1815-19), and Krischke's Predig Bibliothek (1820-48). But his controversy with Hase (Antihasianon), and his attack on Schleiermacher immediately after the death of the latter, made it apparent that he was unable to understand the higher forms of religious life. Among his other works are Palasina (1818, 5th ed., 1845), Luthers Leben und Wirken (1818, 2d ed., 1828), Die gute Sache des Protestantismus (1842), and a great number of sermons. G. Frank.

Rokycana, John, a Bohemian priest, who was the central figure in the ecclesiastical history of Bohemia, 1430-70. He first became prominent in 1427 by denouncing, in a sermon, the policy of Sigismund Korybut, who was attempting to bring about a reconciliation between Bohemia and the Pope. Rokycana's denunciations led to the expulsion of Korybut, and the downfall of the moderate party for a time. Bohemia again resisted the arms of Europe with success; but the success was bought by exhaustion, which led it to listen to the overtures of the Council of Basel. In the conferences held at Basel, Rokycana was the chief controversialist on the Hussite side, and showed a conciliatory spirit. In the negotiations which followed, and which ended in the acceptance of the Compacts by the Bohemians, Rokycana took a chief part. His policy was that Bohemia should retain communion with Rome on the basis of the Compacts, but, by a national organization of its church, should secure its religious liberties. Before the Compacts were signed (1435), the Bohemians secretly elected Rokycana archbishop of Prag, with two suffragans. After the signing of the Compacts, Sigismund was received as king of Bohemia; but he did not recognize Rokycana as archbishop without the consent of the Council of Basel. The Catholic re-action in Bohemia was so strong, that in 1437 Rokycana was driven to flee from Prag, but resumed his office of archbishop when the influence of George Podiebrad became supreme, in 1444. From that time till his death he was closely associated with the policy of Podiebrad. He died in 1471, — two months before his master, King George, — at the age of seventy-four. The character and motives of Rokycana are nicely divisible in his lifetime, and have been so since. Like all men who try a policy of moderation, he encountered the hostility of the extreme parties. His plan of organizing a national church in Bohemia led to his own elevation to the office of archbishop, and the question of his confirmation in his office was the question that stood foremost in the disputes with the Pope. Really Rokycana summed up in his own personal position the aspirations of the more sagacious of the Bohemian statesmen. It is easy to accuse such a man of vanity, obstinacy, and self-seeking. His policy was proved by events to be impossible, and his position was scarcely tenable. He was driven to alternate between cowardice and rashness. He and King George failed, but their success would have been momentous for the future of Europe. They played a difficult game, but they played it against overwhelming odds with prudence and moderation.

LIT. — See under Podiebrad. For the earlier part of Rokycana's career, the materials are to be found in Palacky: Urkundliche Beiträge zur Geschichte des Hussitenkriegs, Prag, 1872-75, 2 vols., and Monumenta Conciliorum Generalium Seculi XVII, vol. 1, Vienna, 1857. M. CREIGHTON.

ROMAINE, William, a noted English divine of the evangelical class; b. at Hartlepool, Durham, Sept. 23, 1714; d. rector of St. Ann's, Blackfriars, London, July 26, 1793. He was ordained in 1736, and as early as 1739 was bold enough to attack Warburton's Divine Legation in a sermon preached before the university of Oxford, where he had received education. He was a man of so redoubtable an antagonist, though he was not wanting in scholarship. A Hutchinsonian in science and learning, he was, nevertheless, chosen professor of astronomy in Gresham College; but an Oxford sermon on The Lord our Righteousness, of an extremely Calvinistic type, excluded him forever afterwards from the university pulpit. However, popularity with the London citizens made up for his ejection in the midland seat of learning; and for many years he gathered crowded congregations at St. Andrew's Wardrobe, as well as St. Ann's, Blackfriars. He stood forth as the main pillar of Evangelization, which, in the last half of the eighteenth century, was reviving in the Church of England after the re-action against Puritanism consequent upon the Restoration a hundred years before. His place, therefore, in the history of the Church of England, is important. He wrote a number of books of minor interests and repute; but three books proceeding from his pen became exceedingly popular in his lifetime, and continued to be read long afterwards; i.e., The Life of Faith (1763), The Walk of Faith (1771), and The Triumph of Faith (1784). They have been repeatedly published in one volume, and are highly commented for their spiritual tone by such men as Edward Bickersteth, Dr. Williams, and Dr. Chalmers. The Hon. and Rev. W. B. Cadogan wrote a life of this excellent man, which was prefixed to an edition of his works, in eight volumes, published in 1796. JOHN STOUTON.

ROMAN-CATHOLIC CHURCH. It is the largest of the three grand divisions of Christendom (Greek, Latin, and Protestant), and in its estimation the only church founded by Christ on earth. Bellarmin, one of her standard divines, defines the church as consisting of all who, (1) profess the true faith, (2) partake of the true sacraments, and (3) are subject to the rule of the Pope of Rome as the head of the church. The first mark excludes all heretics, as well as Jews, Gentiles, and Mohammedans; the second excludes the catechumens and the excommunicated; the third, the schismatics (i.e., the Greeks, or Oriental Christians, who hold substantially the true faith and the seven sacraments, but refuse obedience to the Pope). The Protestants, without distinction, are excluded as being both heretical and schismatical. But all who hold those three points belong to the church militant on earth, without regard to their moral character (etiam reprobis, ecclesiis et impius), though only the good members will be saved. Thus defined, the church, says Bellarmin, is as visible and palpable as the (quondam) republic of Venice or the (quondam) kingdom of France. He denies the distinction between the visible and invisible church altogether. The full name of the Roman communion is the "Holy, Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman Church." She numbers over two hundred millions of souls, or about one-half of the entire Christian population of the globe. She is found in all continents and among all nations, but is strongest in southern countries, and among the Latin and Celtic races in Italy, Spain, France, Austria, Ireland, and South America. She agrees in all essential doctrines and usages with the Greek Church (except the Papacy), but has more vitality and energy; while she is far better suited to the modern races in general culture, intelligence, and freedom. The Roman Church has a rich and most remarkable history, and still exercises a greater power over the masses of the people than any other

---

1 De Conciliis et Ecclesia, lib. III. c. 2: "Profes<sup>sa</sup> f<sup>ur</sup> atium sunt ecclesiae Romanae, coalitusque concilii, et subjecta ad legitimum pastorum Romanae pontificem. . . . Ecclesia est cath<sup>us</sup> hom<sup>il</sup>icae rem viis liberae et patr<sup>it</sup>icae, ut est coalita et Romana et Regnum Galliae aut Republica Venetorum."

2 According to the statistics of Behm and Wagner for 1880, the proportion stood thus: —

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Roman Catholics</th>
<th>215,988,500</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Protestants</td>
<td>120,329,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Greeks</td>
<td>84,007,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

1 De Conciliis et Ecclesia, lib. III. c. 2. Profes<sup>sa</sup> f<sup>ur</sup> atium sunt ecclesiae Romanae, coalitusque concilii, et subjecta ad legitimum pastorum Romanae pontificem. . . . Ecclesia est cath<sup>us</sup> hom<sup>il</sup>icae rem viis liberae et patr<sup>it</sup>icae, ut est coalita et Romana et Regnum Galliae aut Republica Venetorum.
body of Christians. She stretches in unbroken succession back to the palmy days of heathen Rome, and all the governments of Europe, and is likely to live when Macaulay's New-Zealander, "in the midst of a vast solitude, shall take his stand on a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's."

I. Doctrine. — The Roman Catholic system of doctrine is contained in the ecumenical creeds (the Apostles', the Nicene with the Filioque, and the Athanasian), in the dogmatic decisions of the oecumenical councils (twenty in number, from 325 to 1870), the bulls of the popes, and especially in the Tridentine and Vatican standards. The principal authorities are the canons and decrees of the Council of Trent (1563), the Profession of the Tridentine Faith, commonly called the Creed of Pius IV. (1864), the Roman Catechism (1869), the decree of the immaculate conception (1854), and the Vatican decrees on the Catholic faith and the infallibility of the Pope (1870). The best summary of the leading articles of the Roman faith is contained in the Creed of Pope Pius IV., which is binding upon all priests and public teachers, and which must be confessed by all converts. It consists of the Nicene Creed and eleven articles. To these must now be added the two additional Vatican dogmas of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary and the infallibility of the Pope. The Roman Catholic system of doctrine was prepared as to matter by the Fathers (especially Irenaeus, Cyprian, Augustine, Jerome, Leo I., Gregory I.), logically analyzed and defined and defended by the medieval schoolmen (Anselm, Thomas Aquinas, Duns Scotus), vindicated, in opposition to Protestantism, by Bellarmine, Bossuet, and Molyer, and completed, has outlived all the governments of Europe, and is likely to live when Macaulay's New-Zealander, "in the midst of a vast solitude, shall take his stand on a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's."

II. Government and Discipline. — The Roman Church has reared up the grandest governmental fabric known in history. It is an absolute spiritual monarchy, culminating in the Pope, who claims to be the successor of Peter, and the vicar of Christ on earth, and hence the supreme and infallible head of the church. The people are excluded from all participation even in temporal matters: they must obey the priest; the priests must obey the bishop; and the bishops, the Pope, to whom they are bound by the most solemn oath. This system is the growth of ages, and has only reached its maturity in the Vatican Council (1870). The claim of the Bishop of Rome to universal dominion over the Christian Church, and even over the temporal kingdoms professing the Catholic faith, goes back to the days of Leo I. (440-461), and was renewed from time to time by Nicholas I., Gregory VII., Innocent III., and Boniface VIII. But this claim was always resisted by the Greek Church, which claimed equal rights for the Eastern patriarchs, and by the German emperors and other princes, who were jealous of their sovereignty. The conflict between the Pope and the Emperor, between priestcraft and state, runs through the whole middle age, and has been recently revived under a new aspect by the Papal Syllabus of 1864, which re-asserted the most extravagant claims of the medieval Papacy, and provoked the so-called Culturtumpf in Germany and France. But the stream of history cannot be turned backward.

The Pope is aided in the exercise of his functions by a college of cardinals (mostly Italians), consisting of sixty cardinals-bishops, forty-five cardinal-priests, and fourteen cardinal-deacons. Archbishop McCloskey of New York is the first American cardinal, elected in 1875. The Pope was at first chosen by the Roman clergy and people; but since the time of Gregory VII. he is elected by the cardinals, who meet in conclave on the eleventh day of the vacancy, and elect either by quasi-inspiration unanimously, or by compromise, or by scrutiny, two-thirds of the votes being required. The Pope with the cardinals together form the consistory. The various departments of administration are assigned to Congregations, under the presidency of a cardinal; as the Congregation of the Index librorum prohib., the Congregation of Sacred Rites, the Congregation of Indulgences, the Congregation de propaganda fide, etc. The Pope has an nuncio in all the principal Catholic countries. The whole Roman hierarchy consists of over 700 bishops, 169 Latin and 27 Oriental archbishops, 7 Latin and 5 Oriental patriarchs. The greatest public display of the Roman hierarchy was made in the Lateran Council of 1214 under Innocent III., and in the Vatican Council of 1870 under Pius IX.

On the papal government, see the works quoted sub I. FASHION on p. 1737.

III. Worship and Ceremonies. — They are embodied in the Roman Missal, the Roman Breviary, and other liturgical books for public and private devotion. The Roman Church accompanies its members from the cradle to the grave, receiving them into life by baptism, dismissing them into the other world by extreme unction, and consecrating all their important acts by the sacramental mysteries and public display of the Roman hierarchy was made in the Lateran Council of 1214 under Innocent III., and in the Vatican Council of 1870 under Pius IX.

On the papal government, see the works quoted sub I. FASHION on p. 1737.

The Roman Church has reared up the grandest governmental fabric known in history. It is an absolute spiritual monarchy, culminating in the Pope, who claims to be the successor of Peter, and the vicar of Christ on earth, and hence the supreme and infallible head of the church. The people are excluded from all participation even in temporal matters: they must obey the priest; the priests must obey the bishop; and the bishops, the Pope, to whom they are bound by the most solemn oath. This system is the growth of ages, and has only reached its maturity in the Vatican Council (1870). The claim of the Bishop of Rome to universal dominion over the Christian Church, and even over the temporal kingdoms professing the Catholic faith, goes back to the days of Leo I. (440-461), and was renewed from time to time by Nicholas I., Gregory VII., Innocent III., and Boniface VIII. But this claim was always resisted by the Greek Church, which claimed equal rights for the Eastern patriarchs, and by the German emperors and other princes, who were jealous of their sovereignty. The conflict between the Pope and the Emperor, between priestcraft and state, runs through the whole middle age, and has been recently revived under a new aspect by the Papal Syllabus of 1864, which re-asserted the most extravagant claims of the medieval Papacy, and provoked the so-called Culturtumpf in Germany and France. But the stream of history cannot be turned backward.

The Pope is aided in the exercise of his functions by a college of cardinals (mostly Italians), consisting of sixty cardinals-bishops, forty-five cardinal-priests, and fourteen cardinal-deacons. Archbishop McCloskey of New York is the first American cardinal, elected in 1875. The Pope was at first chosen by the Roman clergy and people; but since the time of Gregory VII. he is elected by the cardinals, who meet in conclave on the eleventh day of the vacancy, and elect either by quasi-inspiration unanimously, or by compromise, or by scrutiny, two-thirds of the votes being required. The Pope with the cardinals together form the consistory. The various departments of administration are assigned to Congregations, under the presidency of a cardinal; as the Congregation of the Index librorum prohib., the Congregation of Sacred Rites, the Congregation of Indulgences, the Congregation de propaganda fide, etc. The Pope has a nuncio in all the principal Catholic countries. The whole Roman hierarchy consists of over 700 bishops, 169 Latin and 27 Oriental archbishops, 7 Latin and 5 Oriental patriarchs. The greatest public display of the Roman hierarchy was made in the Lateran Council of 1214 under Innocent III., and in the Vatican Council of 1870 under Pius IX. On the papal government, see the works quoted sub I. FASHION on p. 1737.
language; the Latin being its sacred organ, and the vernacular being only used for sermons, which are subordinate. Its throne is the altar, not the pulpit (which usually stands away off in a corner). It centres in the mass, and this is regarded as a real though unbloody repetition or continuation of the atoning sacrifice of Christ on the cross. At the moment when the officiating priest pronounces the words, "This is my body," the elements of bread and wine are believed to be changed into the very substance of the body and blood of Christ. Catholics deny the charge, and reverently regard the mass as a dramatic commemoration and renewed application of the great mystery of redemption, and the daily food of the devout believer. On the Roman-Catholic worship, see the standard editions of the Missale Romanum, the Breviarium Romanum, and the Pontificale Romanum., also George Lewis: The Breviary and the Ritualism Society, illustrated in the Liturgical Books of Rome (Edinburgh, 1853, 2 vols.); and John, Marquess of Bute: The Roman Breviary translated out of Latin into English (Edinburgh, 1879, 2 vols.).

IV. HISTORY.—The earliest record of a Christian Church in Rome we have in Paul's Epistle to the Romans (A.D. 68). Though not founded by Peter or Paul, and never recognized as the chief see of the sees of the Roman martydom of St. Peter and Paul; and even now, in her old age, she is full of activity everywhere, but especially in Protestant countries, where she is stimulated by opposition, and invigorated by fresh blood. We may distinguish three stages in the development of Roman Catholicism.

(1) The age of ancient Greco-Latin Catholicism from the second to the eighth century, before the final rupture of the Greek and Latin communions. This is the common inheritance of all churches. It is the age of the Fathers, of ecumenical councils, and of Christian emperors. Many of the leading features of Roman Catholicism are already found in the second and third centuries, and have their roots in the Judaizing tendencies combated by St. Paul. The spirit of traditionalism, sacerdotism, prelacy, ceremonialism, asceticism, monasticism, was powerful at work in the East as well as in the West, in the Nicene and post-Nicene ages.

(2) The age of Medieval Latin Catholicism is distinct and separated from the Greek, except from Gregory I., or from the Romanization, which produced most of those doctrines, rituals, and institutions which are to day held in common by the Greek and Roman churches. There are few dogmas and usages of Romanism which cannot be traced in embryo to the Greek and Latin Fathers: hence the close resemblance of the Greek and Roman churches, notwithstanding their ritualistic influence from Protestantism, are already found in the second and third centuries, and have their roots in the Judaizing tendencies combated by St. Paul. The spirit of traditionalism, sacerdotism, prelacy, ceremonialism, asceticism, monasticism, was powerful at work in the East as well as in the West, in the Nicene and post-Nicene ages.

(3) The age of modern Romanism, dating from Gregory I., or from the Romanization, which produced most of those doctrines, rituals, and institutions which are to day held in common by the Greek and Roman churches. There are few dogmas and usages of Romanism which cannot be traced in embryo to the Greek and Latin Fathers: hence the close resemblance of the Greek and Roman churches, notwithstanding their ritualistic influence from Protestantism, are already found in the second and third centuries, and have their roots in the Judaizing tendencies combated by St. Paul. The spirit of traditionalism, sacerdotism, prelacy, ceremonialism, asceticism, monasticism, was powerful at work in the East as well as in the West, in the Nicene and post-Nicene ages.

Wield: England, Hus in Bohemia, Wessel in Germany, Savonarola in Italy, the Waldenses, the Brethren, the Councils of Pisa, Constance, Basle, and the revival of letters, prepared the way for the great movement of the sixteenth century. This is the Papal Reform from Rome, which cradled the Protestant Reformation as the Papal counter-Reformation. Wield: England, Hus in Bohemia, Wessel in Germany, Savonarola in Italy, the Waldenses, the Brethren, the Councils of Pisa, Constance, Basle, and the revival of letters, prepared the way for the great movement of the sixteenth century. This is the Papal Reform from Rome, which cradled the Protestant Reformation as the Papal counter-Reformation. Wield: England, Hus in Bohemia, Wessel in Germany, Savonarola in Italy, the Waldenses, the Brethren, the Councils of Pisa, Constance, Basle, and the revival of letters, prepared the way for the great movement of the sixteenth century. This is the Papal Reform from Rome, which cradled the Protestant Reformation as the Papal counter-Reformation.

(4) The age of modern Romanism, dating from the Reformation, or, rather, from the Council of Trent (1563). This is Roman Catholicism—opposition, not only to the Greek Church, but also to evangelical Protestantism. In some respects it was an advance upon the middle ages. It was the age of the Counter-Reformation, or, rather, the Papal Reform from Rome, which cradled the Protestant Reformation as the Papal counter-Reformation. Wield: England, Hus in Bohemia, Wessel in Germany, Savonarola in Italy, the Waldenses, the Brethren, the Councils of Pisa, Constance, Basle, and the revival of letters, prepared the way for the great movement of the sixteenth century. This is the Papal Reform from Rome, which cradled the Protestant Reformation as the Papal counter-Reformation. Wield: England, Hus in Bohemia, Wessel in Germany, Savonarola in Italy, the Waldenses, the Brethren, the Councils of Pisa, Constance, Basle, and the revival of letters, prepared the way for the great movement of the sixteenth century. This is the Papal Reform from Rome, which cradled the Protestant Reformation as the Papal counter-Reformation. Wield: England, Hus in Bohemia, Wessel in Germany, Savonarola in Italy, the Waldenses, the Brethren, the Councils of Pisa, Constance, Basle, and the revival of letters, prepared the way for the great movement of the sixteenth century. This is the Papal Reform from Rome, which cradled the Protestant Reformation as the Papal counter-Reformation.
schism, with two or three rival popes currying and excommunicating each other, has disgraced the church since the sixteenth century. On the other hand, the Papacy has given formal sanction to those scholastic theories and ecclesiastical traditions against which the Reformers protested. It expressly condemned their doctrines; and, by remaining infallible, it made itself doctrinally irrefutable.

In modern Romanism we must again distinguish two periods, which are divided by the reign of Pope Pius IX.

(a) Tridentine Romanism is directed against the principles of the Protestant Reformation, and fixed the dogmas of the rule of faith (scripture and tradition), original sin, justification by faith and works, the seven sacraments, the sacrifice of the mass, purgatory, invocation of saints, the veneration of relics, and indulgences. The "Old Catholics," who seceded in 1870, and were excommunicated, took their stand first on the Council of Trent, in opposition to the Council of the Vatican, the Ultramontanes, and against papal absolutism; although in fact, and as viewed from the Protestant standpoint, the one is only a legitimate, logical development of the other.

(b) Vatican Romanism is directed against modern infidelity (rationalism), and against liberal Catholicism (Gallicanism) within the Roman Church itself. In 1870, a new infallible authority, two new dogmas and two corresponding heresies,—concerning the Virgin Mary, and the power and infallibility of the Roman pontiff. These questions were left unsettled by the Council of Trent, and a considerable difference of opinion continued to prevail in the Roman communion. Gallicanism flourished in France during the golden age of its literature, and was formulated by Bossuet in the History of the Papacy: it marked the height of Gallicanism, and the downfallof the temporal power of the Pope, declared war against Protestantism, and excited the sympathies of the masses, first as an exile, and then as a prisoner in the Vatican. Yet his reign was longer than that of any Pope, and exceeded the pontificate of twenty-five years. The policy of his successor, Leo XIII., is wiser and more conciliatory.

The history of the Roman Church during the present century shows the remarkable fact, that she has lost on her own ground, especially in Italy and Spain, but gained large accessions on foreign soil, especially in England, by the secession of Cardinal Newman, Cardinal Manning, and several hundred Anglican clergymen and noblemen, since 1845, who sought rest in absolute submission to an infallible authority. On the other hand, this gain has been more than neutralized by the Old-Catholic secession in Germany and Switzerland, under the lead of Drs. Dollinger, Reinkens, and Spalding, and the non-compliant Catholic scholars, whose learning and conscience did not permit them to submit to the Vatican decrees of 1870.

For particulars, see Papacy, Pope, Jesuits, Gallicanism, Ultramontanism, Immaculate Conception, Infallibility, Trent, Tridentine Confession, Vatican Council, etc.

LIT.—The standard works of reference, and the defence of the doctrinal system of Romanism are Belarmino (Disputationes de Controversiis Christianae fidei aduers. seu temporis haeresices, 1690, 3 vols. folio, and often since), Bossuet (Exposition de la doctrine de l'eglise catholique, 1671), Möhler (Symbolik, 8th ed., 1872), Ferrone (Predicaciones teologicas, 36th ed., 1881), Kleer, Dieringer, Friedhof, Wiseman. The chief historical works by Roman Catholics are the Annals of Baroniun, the Church Histories of Rohrbacher, Möhler (edited by Gams), Alzog, Kraus, Hefele (Concilien geschichte, down to the Council of Constance, a very valuable work), Döllinger (before his secession in 1870), Cardinal Hergenrüther (Kirchengeschichte, in 3 vols., 1845-76), and several Spanish works, the able defence of Romanism by Balmès is made known to English readers by a translation, Protestantism and Catholicity compared in their Effects on Civilization, 1851. In recent times the Roman Church has found its most zealous advocates among converts such as Dr. Hurter (the historian of Innocent III.), Cardinal Newman, Cardinal Manning, Dr. Orestes Brownson (1844-76), who carried the weapons of Protestant learning and culture with them. The fullest repository of Roman-Catholic theological learning may be found in Abbé Migne: Nouvelle Encyclopédie Théologique, Paris, 1850 sqq., 52 vols. (a series of dictionaries on all branches of sacred literature), and in Wetzer and Wernsdorff's Lexikon über Encycl. der kathol. Theologie, in 12 vols. (Freiburg, 1847-58), which is now coming out in a revised form, begun by Cardinal Hergenrüther, and continued by Dr. Kaulen, Freiburg-im-B., 1882 sqq. See also Bérin and Kirk: The Faith of Catholics, on Certain Points of Controversy, confirmed by Scripture, and attested by the Fathers, London, 1846, 3 vols. 3d ed. by James Waterworth. Protestant works on and against the Roman-

On the Roman-Catholic Church in the United States, see next art., by a learned member of that church. Philip Schaff.

Each archbishopric, with the dioceses of the suffragan bishops, forms an ecclesiastical province. On the vacancies you see by death, resignation, or removal, the archbishop and bishops of the province select three priests, whose names are sent to Rome; and from this list the Pope generally chooses one, who is appointed to the vacant see. His bulls are then issued, and despatched to the bishop-elect, who is consecrated and installed.

The Clergy, and Mode of Recruiting.—There were in the United States, in 1849, 6,286 priests. For the training of candidates for the priesthood, there were thirty-one seminaries under the direction of the bishops, and also several similar institutions connected with the religious orders, in which members of those bodies pursued their theological course. The most important seminaries are, St. Mary's, Baltimore, founded in 1784, and directed by the Sulpicians; Mount St. Mary's Theological Seminary, Emmitsburg, Md.; St. Joseph's Seminary, Troy, N.Y.; the Seminary of St. Francis of Sales, near Milwaukee; St. Vincent's Theological Seminary, Cape Girardeau, Mo.; and the Seminary of Our Lady of the Angels, Niagara Falls, N.Y., directed by the Lazarists. Of those connected with the regular orders, the most important are the House of Studies at Woodstock, Md., for scholastics of the Society of Jesus; the late Bishop Rector, Md., for the Redemptorists; St. Vincent's Abbey, Westmoreland County, Penn., for the Benedictines; and St. Bonaventure's Seminary, Allegany, N.Y., for the Franciscans. There are also in Europe the American College at Rome, and the American College at Louvain, where candidates for the priesthood are prepared for duty in this country. The Missionary College of All Hallows, Drummond, Ireland, prepares for candidates to serve in other countries, and among them many are accepted by bishops in the United States. Besides these, many priests of different nationalities come with the general emigration, and are incorporated into the body of the clergy.

The Regular Orders. — Besides the secular priests, subject directly to the bishops, and constituting most of the parochial clergy, there are the religious orders. The oldest of these is the Society of Jesus, which began its labors in Maryland in 1833, and down to the Revolution supplied almost exclusively the priests who labored among the Catholics in the then British Colonies. Members of the same order from Canada established Indian missions, and attended the white settlements along the northern frontier and in the valley of the Mississippi. The Jesuit fathers at present conduct colleges at Georgetown (D.C.), Baltimore, New-York City, Fowdham (N.Y.), Jersey City, Westchester (Mass.), Cincinnati, Detroit, St. Louis, Mobile, New Orleans, Las Vegas (N.M.), Omaha (Neb.), Santa Clara (Cal.), and some others, and have churches in many cities and towns. The Dominicans have had convents and churches doing parochial work in Ohio and Kentucky since the beginning of the century, and more recently in California, New York, and New Jersey; the Augustinians, in Pennsylvania, New York, and Massachusetts. Several other, have come in to labor and principally among the Germans,—the Redemptorists (who have parish-churches, and also give missions to German and English speaking congregations), branches of the Franciscan order, Reformed Franciscans, Conventuals, Capuchins, engaged mainly in parochial work. The Passionists are devoted more especially to the giving of missions. The Lazarists, or Priests of the Missions, are engaged chiefly in directing colleges, schools, and in parochial work; the Benedictines, who have several abbeys, with colleges, schools, and churches in all parts of the country.

Churches and their Tenure. — The churches are in some cases held by the bishop or archbishop as trustees; in other States, by a board of trustees. As there is no medical control of the Catholic schools in all the States, in the sense that the term is used in Protestant bodies, the application of the general laws made for the latter threw the choice of trustees into the hands of those who contributed least to the maintenance of the churches, and who seldom joined in the ordinances of the church. This led to vesting the title in the bishop as trustee, but the plan created other difficulties. In many parts the title to the church is now vested in a board consisting of the bishop, the pastor of the church, and two lay-trustees. The churches, colleges, abbeys, and houses of the religious orders, are generally held by them under acts of incorporation.

The churches have been built almost exclusively by voluntary contributions, and are, as a rule, encumbered by mortgage-debts; the congregations being unable to meet the whole cost, and, in fact, none of the churches possessing funded property. Large bequests, devises, and donations to churches or church-work, are as rare among Catholics in the United States as they are common among Protestants. A system grew up in churches, of accepting deposits, and paying interest, as a means of avoiding mortgages; but, as matters were rarely managed with the judgment of business-men, the result has often been financial ruin, as at St. Peter's Church, New York, Cincinnati, and Lawrence, Mass.

Education. — Prior to the Revolution, any distinctively Catholic schools were almost impossible; an academy for boys in Maryland, which was covertly maintained for several years, being almost the only example. Schools in connection with the churches were established as soon as Catholics were free; and, until public schools began to be established by State authority, the schools maintained by the different denominations were almost the only schools accessible to the children of the poorer classes. The Catholics have since been compelled to retain and extend their parochial system, as the State schools, in their general tone, influence, and text-books, are so decidedly Protestant as to make them a powerful means in alienating the young from Catholicity. The number of Catholic parochial schools in the United States is estimated at 2,500, and the number of pupils at nearly half a million. In these, religious instruction is given, with the usual branches taught in schools; and text-books are used free from matter offensive to Catholics. These books, in their educational form and mechanical execution, have been greatly improved within the last twenty years. Parish schools are, to a great extent, taught by members of religious orders and communities which make instruction their special work. Of these the chief are the Brothers of the Holy Cross, Brothers of the Holy Child, Xaverian Brothers, Franciscan Brothers, for boys' schools; Ursulines, Benedictines, Presentation Nuns, Sisters of Charity, School Sisters of Notre Dame, companions of the Priests of the Holy Cross, Sisters of the Holy Cross, Sisters of St. Joseph, Sisters of St. Francis, Sisters of St. Dominic, Sisters of Mercy, Sisters of the Immaculate Heart, for girls. For higher education, there are academies under some of the orders of Brothers; and, for young ladies, under the Ladies of the Sacred Heart, Ursuline Nuns, Sisters of Notre Dame, of the Holy Child, St. Dominic, St. Joseph, etc. The number of these academies was given in 1883 as 579. The colleges and universities for young men numbered 81; that at Georgetown, D.C., being the oldest. None of these institutions are endowed, or possess founded professorships. They are, with a few exceptions, owned and directed by religious orders,—Jesuits, Benedictines, Augustinians, Franciscans, Lazarists, Priests of the Missions, Brothers of the Christian Schools. There is no Catholic college in the United States with a lay faculty, and only a few with a faculty of secular priests. Sunday schools are generally maintained in the cities, and in other places where there is a resident pastor; but, as religious instruction is given in the parochial and other schools during the week, the Sunday-school system does not hold the same importance as among Protestant bodies.

The Catholic Press. — The necessity of diffusing religious intelligence among Catholics, and of meeting charges against the church, led to the establishment of Catholic newspapers. Of these the United-States Catholic Miscellany, founded by Bishop England of Charleston, was one of the first and ablest. There are many published in various parts of the country, in English, German, French, Spanish, and Portuguese; the Freeman's Journal, published in New York, under the editorship of J. A. McMaster, being the most able and influential. There are several monthly publications of a literary and devotional character, such as the Catholic World, the Are Maria, and one review, The American Catholic Quarterly, which fills the place long occupied by Brownton's Quarterly Review. For the diffusion of books among Catholics, attempts were twice made to establish publishing societies; but the Metropolitan Press and the Catholic Publication Society... both failed to maintain themselves, and fell into private hands. The publication of Catholic books is left to individual publishers. The sale of Bibles among Catholics is very large, Protestant houses as well as Catholic being engaged in publishing them.

Charitable Institutions. — The relief of the poor and afflicted calls for the services of a number of religious communities of women, devoted to general or special work. The Sisters of Charity meet almost all wants, directing orphan and foundling asylums, homes for neglected children, reformatories for the vicious, industrial and parochial schools, general hospitals, insane-asylums, homes for the aged, and visiting the sick; the Sisters of Mercy visit the sick and prisons, and have houses for unemployed servant-girls; the Little Sisters of the Poor are devoted to the care of the aged; the Sisters of the Poor of St. Francis, to hospital-work; the Bon Secours Sisters, to the nursing of the sick at their homes. The total number of cases a Proper, containing offices of saints belonging to their bishop, and have, when assigned to some extent a necessary step in withdrawing a priest's faculties, or removing him from a pastoral charge.

The first legislation in the Catholic Church in the United States was the synod of Baltimore, held by Bishop Carroll in 1791; and its regulations, with rules adopted by the bishops in 1810, were the only specific laws till the assembling of the first Provincial Council of Baltimore, convened in 1829, under the sanction of Pope Leo XII., by Archbishop Guiteau, for 1835 and 1836. Almost without exception, these depend on voluntary contributions; none being endowed, and bequests of the wealthy being comparatively rare. Asylums for the treatment of insanity and the care of deaf-mutes have been established by sisterhoods in several places.

Liturgy. — The Liturgy in use in the Catholic Church in the United States is the Roman, the Roman missal, breviary, pontifical and ritual, being exclusively used; and none of those which acquired local tolerance in parts of Europe have ever obtained at any time in any district of this country. The regular orders have also in most cases a Proper, containing offices of saints belonging to their rule, which the Holy See permits in the churches and houses of the order. As the emigration has brought over few if any Catholics belonging to the Oriental rites, Latin alone has been used in the Catholic churches of the United States, except where a United Greek or Syrian priest visiting the country has celebrated mass according to his own rite. The discipline of the Western Patriarchate in regard to communion under one kind, and the celibacy of the clergy, are universal.

The canon law of the church, as modified by special grants or customs in France, was established in the churches under the French rule in New York, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, and Wisconsin, and, as modified in Spain, was established in Florida and Louisiana and the former Mexican territory, with the regulations adopted by synods at Quebec and Santiago de Cuba, and by provincial councils at Santo Domingo and Mexico; but as, in all parts except New Mexico, the old population merged in the expansion of Catholics from the original territory of the republic, the early ecclesiastical law is virtually unknown at present. The United States is regarded as a missionary country, and the affairs of the Catholic Church here are conducted at Rome through the Congregation de Propaganda Fide. No parishes have been canonically instituted, as in Canada and Mexico; and consequently there are, except in a few instances, actually no parish priests properly so called. The priests are ordained sub titulo missionis, and bound to obedience to their bishop, and have, when assigned to quasi parishes, no canonical immobility. The church here tends to the establishment of canon law and the complete system under it, so far as it is possible in this country and at this time. At present, however, the position is so clearly defined as to prevent frequent appeals to Rome, and occasional suits in the State courts. An instruction issued at Rome a few years since led to the establishment of a committee of clergy-men in each diocese, who are to investigate all charges against a priest, and whose report is to some extent a necessary step in withdrawing a priest's faculties, or removing him from a pastoral charge.

The opening and clotting ceremonies in the cathedral were accompanied with the solemn Papal benediction from the cardinal, all the bishops (in the order of seniority), by monsignor Preston and by Father Parley, and then sent to Rome. The decrees related to morals and discipline, especially to marriage, in protest to lax views and practices, and to godless education; but the proceedings leading to them were secret. After the decrees were signed, an address was read, the lives of peace given, and the council dismissed with the solemn Papal blessing, and the following "Acclamations" were sung at the conclusion of the services:

ARCHIDIOCESES. — Sanctissima et Individuum Trinitat; sempiternas lass ag gratuacto acto! CHOR. — Benedicta sit Dei filia, et sponso, et mater; beatam dicent omnes generationes!

ARCH. — Beatissimo Leoni, Papa XIII., fidel docetor infalibilis, multae annis, parernia felicitas!
The oldest Catholic body of population in the United States is the population of New Mexico, of Spanish and Indian origin. The white population is essentially descended from the first settlers, who occupied the country about 1680, and who, though expelled about a century after, soon returned. The original Spanish population of Florida all retired in the last century when the Colonies passed into the hands of England. During the British sway, a number of Minorcans and Greeks were introduced by Mr. Turnbull, whose descendants form the nucleus of the present Catholic population of that State.

The French settlements at Vincennes, Kaskasia, Cahokia, influenced by Rev. Mr. Gibault, were destroyed during the Revolutionary War; and their descendants form part of the Catholic population of the West and South. Detroit was long retained by England; and its French population underwent few changes, and their descendants still form a considerable part of the Catholic population.

The nucleus in the English Colonies was the body of those who came over in 1633 with Leonard Calvert. Many of the settlers were Protestants, but the leading settlers who took up lands in their own name were mainly Catholics, and Calvert at once put up a church for their use; but the leading settlers who came over in 1633 with the body of colonists who came over in 1633 with Calvert and the Jesuits were among the earliest settlers; and clergy came over, who not only attended the Catholics, but won over some Protestants. From 1732 to 1753 seven thousand Catholic Acadians were, for refusing to take the oath of supremacy, seized, and scattered in poverty through the thirteen Colonies. Most of them who survived the hardships of their terrible transportation struggled to Canada or Louisiana, only Maryland retaining any portion. These Catholics had no churches, except in Philadelphia, Lancaster, Conewago, and Goshenhoppen; no churches being permitted in Maryland, where only small chapels, under the residence of the priest, were allowed. In 1755 seven thousand Catholic Acadians were, for refusing to take the oath of supremacy, seized, and scattered in poverty through the thirteen Colonies. Most of them who survived the hardships of their terrible transportation struggled to Canada or Louisiana, only Maryland retaining any permanently.

During the Revolution the Canadians were friendly, and many of them were won over. A number espoused the American cause, and settled in Northern New York. Two Canadian regiments were formed, which fought in the Continental Army to the close of the war, and had a Catholic chaplain commissioned by Congress.

After the Revolution, a new emigration set in, bringing in Catholics, who settled in New York and New England. The Maryland ex-Jesuits were the only clergy, their society having been dissolved by Clement XIV., and the Vicar Apostolic of London having virtually abandoned them on account of their adhesion to the American cause. Priests, not always of the highest character, struggled over with the emigrants; and some chaplains of the French and Spanish naval and military forces remained to do mission-work here.

After the Rev. John Carroll was appointed Prefect Apostolic, some order was established; and from the erection of the see of Baltimore... the growth was steady. Churches were begun in New York and Boston, and then at other cities near the coast, from Boston to Savannah. In consequence of the troubles caused by the outbreak of the Revolution in France, a community of Carmelites came to Maryland; the English Dominicans, expelled from Britain, came a part of their community to Kentucky; the Sulpitiens began a seminary; and a number of learned and zealous French priests came to the United States, who did much to maintain a spirit of religion among the older and more recently arrived Catholics. Conversions to the Catholic religion became more frequent. Gov. Lee of Maryland, Rev. John Thayer of Boston, Rev. Mr. Kewley of New York, the Rev. Mr. Barber and his family, Ironsides, Richards, Holmes, and others, showed the influence of the liberty given to Catholics. This freedom was not absolute. In some States they were still disfranchised. In New York they could not sit in the Legislature. In Massachusetts the highest court in 1800 decided that a Catholic must pay for the support of the Protestant churches, and for marrying a couple out of the limits of the city where he resided, although within the district assigned to him by the bishop.

Kentucky was settled largely by Catholics from Maryland, and had priests laboring there soon after the Revolution. The church there took form under the labors of Rev. Mr. Badin, Nerinckx, and Bishop Flaget, with the English Dominicans. The French priests of Kentucky visited the old French settlements in Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan; the Rev. Gabriel Richard becoming the chief missionary in the last State. In the East the French priests Matignon and Cheverus attended the Catholics of Boston and those scattered throughout New England.

Bishop Carroll had sought a division of his diocese at the very commencement of the century; but it was not till 1810 that bishops were appointed to Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Bardstown, Ky. Increasing emigration soon led to a growth of the Catholic body, or the establishment of churches, colleges, convents, schools, asylums, hospitals, and the like. The earlier Catholic emigration was mainly Irish; but for the last forty years the German-Catholic element has been increasing steadily; so that, especially in the West, the Germans and their immediate descendants form a large part of the Catholic body. They are said to have about one-third of the priests in the United States, and they have a large number of bishops. They maintain several Catholic papers, and have many thoroughly organized societies. In New England and Illinois there are large bodies of Canadian French.

The most eminent members of the Catholic Church in the United States have been Archbishops Carroll and Spalding of Baltimore, Hughes of New York, Cardinal McClennan, Archbishop Henni of Milwaukee, Bishop England of Charleston, Bruté of Vincennes, Archbishop Kenrick of Baltimore, Bishop Flaget of Bardstown and Louisville, Bishop Cheverus of Boston, Prince Galitzin, Rev. Dr. Corcoran, Rev. Felix Varela, Rev. I. T. Hecker, Chief-Justice Taney, Judge Gaston of North Carolina, Commodore Barry, Gen. Rosencranz, Orestes A. Brownson, Robert Walsh, James A. McMaster, Dr. Levi Silliman Ives, the Redemptorist Father Muller.

The first Catholic churches erected in this country, except in Spanish parts, were generally plain and inexpensive; but with the growth of the body, churches and institutions of great solidity and beauty were erected, often beyond the means of the community, and involving loads of debt under which many churches are struggling. Of the churches, the finest is St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York, one of the most striking ecclesiastical buildings in America.

Catholic Population.— There are no accurate data for estimating the Catholic population in the United States. As there is no system of membership in the Catholic Church such as obtains in many Protestant denominations, every one baptized and brought up in the Catholic faith, attending divine worship more or less regularly, and from time to time approaching the sacraments, is regarded as a Catholic, unless he distinctly disavows it by formally connecting himself with some other church. A Catholic Directory is published annually, made up of reports from the different archbishops and bishops, with estimates of population; but these are not always based on a census, or on the number of baptisms, which may be taken as that of live births. The population given for 1888 by this periodical is 6,382,954. The system adopted in the United-States census gives a much smaller population; but the census figures are based on the seating-capacity of the churches, and in the Catholic churches in the cities and large towns this gives a number much below the real one. In these churches there are usually three or four successive masses, each attended by a different congregation; so that a church with a seating-capacity of 1,500 will and often does accommodate 6,000. Thus in Hartford, in April, 1881, an actual count showed 12,431 attending five Catholic churches, and 12,000 attending forty Protestant churches on the same day. Similar enumerations elsewhere gave similar results, showing that a Catholic congregation in a city numbers at least four times the seating-capacity of the church.

The Catholic population is mainly in the Northern and newly settled Western States, and is comparatively small in the States which till recent times retained slavery, excepting Louisiana, where the original population was exclusively Catholic. Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Louisiana have about one-third of the population Catholic, according to Catholic estimates; New York, Wisconsin, and California, one-fourth; Maryland, Minnesota, Colorado, and Dakota, one-sixth; Nebraska, Kansas, and Washington Territory, one-sixth; Pennsylvania, one-seventh; Michigan and Kentucky, one-eighth; Ohio and Nebraska, one-ninth; Maine and New Hampshire, one-tenth; but in Virginia the Catholics are one in forty to the population; in Georgia, one to sixty; in Tennessee, one to fifty; in Alabama and Mississippi, one to eighty; in South Carolina and Arkansas, one to one hundred; and in North Carolina, where there is the smallest proportion of Catholics, one to nine hundred.

Progress of Catholic Church in United States.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Bishops</th>
<th>Priests</th>
<th>Churches</th>
<th>Population</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1784</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>24</td>
<td>45,000</td>
<td>1814</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1814</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>85</td>
<td>1,081</td>
<td>1800</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1825</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>220</td>
<td>1,073</td>
<td>1814</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1840</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>501</td>
<td>404</td>
<td>1825</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1850</td>
<td>27</td>
<td>1,081</td>
<td>1,523,500</td>
<td>1840</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1875</td>
<td>40</td>
<td>2,230</td>
<td>3,500,000</td>
<td>1850</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1880</td>
<td>60</td>
<td>4,578</td>
<td>6,000,000</td>
<td>1875</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1893</td>
<td>72</td>
<td>6,165</td>
<td>6,622,000</td>
<td>1880</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The Catholic body includes many of foreign nationality. The German and Irish Catholics, with their immediate families born here, each constitute probably about one-fourth of the whole; most of the other half being American-born, with a smaller proportion of other nationalities.

Missions. — No missionary society exists among the Catholics of the United States for home or foreign missions; nor is there any tract society fusing religious knowledge among old or young. There is no American Bible Society to reach the negroes of the South. There are Catholic Chippewas in Michigan, Wisconsin, and neighboring States. In recent times the bishops of the northeastern States have made efforts in Savannah, on Skidaway Island, Ga.; and some fathers of St Joseph, and secular priests, have charge of colored churches in several places; but the work has not attained any great development; no organized effort has been made to convert Indians and negroes among the tribes in Indian Territory. No organized effort has been made to reach the negroes of the South. There are many colored Catholics in Maryland and Louisiana; and the Sisters of Providence, a community of colored women, have long been in charge of Catholic schools. The Benedictines have made some efforts in Louisiana, on Skidaway Island, Ga.; and some fathers of St Joseph, and secular priests, have charge of colored churches in several places; but the work has not attained any great development. The Catholic missions to Indians and negroes are under the bishops of the dioceses in which they are situated.

and Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus, Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget, Neu- mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga- liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin, Tiraon; Nehring, the life of Mrs. Seton, foundress of the Sisters of Charity; and a Russian work by Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus, Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget, Neu- mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga- liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin, Tiraon; Nehring, the life of Mrs. Seton, foundress of the Sisters of Charity; and a Russian work by and Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by

Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of

Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate

Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus,

Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget,

Neu-

mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga-

liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin,

Tiraon; Nehring, the life of Mrs. Seton, foundress

of the Sisters of Charity; and a Russian work by

Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by

Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of

Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate

Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus,

Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget,

Neu-

mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga-

liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin,

Tiraon; Nehring, the life of Mrs. Seton, foundress

of the Sisters of Charity; and a Russian work by

Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by

Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of

Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate

Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus,

Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget,

Neu-

mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga-

liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin,

Tiraon; Nehring, the life of Mrs. Seton, foundress

of the Sisters of Charity; and a Russian work by

Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by

Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of

Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate

Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus,

Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget,

Neu-

mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga-

liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin,

Tiraon; Nehring, the life of Mrs. Seton, foundress

of the Sisters of Charity; and a Russian work by

Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by

Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of

Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate

Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus,

Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget,

Neu-

mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga-

liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin,

Tiraon; Nehring, the life of Mrs. Seton, foundress

of the Sisters of Charity; and a Russian work by

Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by

Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of

Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate

Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus,

Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget,

Neu-

mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga-

liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin,

Tiraon; Nehring, the life of Mrs. Seton, foundress

of the Sisters of Charity; and a Russian work by

Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by

Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of

Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate

Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus,

Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget,

Neu-

mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga-

liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin,

Tiraon; Nehring, the life of Mrs. Seton, foundress

of the Sisters of Charity; and a Russian work by

Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by

Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of

Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate

Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus,

Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget,

Neu-

mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga-

liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin,

Tiraon; Nehring, the life of Mrs. Seton, foundress

of the Sisters of Charity; and a Russian work by

Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by

Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of

Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate

Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus,

Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget,

Neu-

mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga-

liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin,

Tiraon; Nehring, the life of Mrs. Seton, foundress

of the Sisters of Charity; and a Russian work by

Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by

Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of

Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate

Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus,

Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget,

Neu-

mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga-

liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin,

Tiraon; Nehring, the life of Mrs. Seton, foundress

of the Sisters of Charity; and a Russian work by

Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by

Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of

Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate

Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus,

Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget,

Neu-

mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga-

liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin,

Tiraon; Nehring, the life of Mrs. Seton, foundress

of the Sisters of Charity; and a Russian work by

Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by

Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of

Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate

Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus,

Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget,

Neu-

mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga-

liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin,

Tiraon; Nehring, the life of Mrs. Seton, foundress

of the Sisters of Charity; and a Russian work by

Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by

Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of

Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate

Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus,

Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget,

Neu-

mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga-

liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin,

Tiraon; Nehring, the life of Mrs. Seton, foundress

of the Sisters of Charity; and a Russian work by

Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by

Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of

Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate

Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus,

Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget,

Neu-

mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga-

liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin,

Tiraon; Nehring, the life of Mrs. Seton, foundress

of the Sisters of Charity; and a Russian work by

Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by

Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of

Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate

Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus,

Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget,

Neu-

mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga-

liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin,

Tiraon; Nehring, the life of Mrs. Seton, foundress

of the Sisters of Charity; and a Russian work by

Mazzuchelli; and a Russian work by

Lapuchin, St. Petersb., 1881; Clark: Lives of

Deceased Bishops, 1872, 2 vols., and separate

Lives of Archbishop Carroll, Cardinal Cheverus,

Archbishops Hughes, Spalding, Bishops Flaget,

Neu-

mann, Quarter, and Timon; Lives of Prince Ga-

liot, Rev. Meges, Venerable, Rev. Messrs. Varin,
the conflict was first to take place is accurately shown in the book of Acts. The Romans did not persecute the early Christians for mere opinion’s sake. On the contrary, we learn, that, when the Jews were exciting popular clamor against St. Paul and his companions in the cities of Greece and Asia Minor, the Roman officials were wholly unwilling to see in the conduct of the apostle an offence against Roman law, while they contemptuously declined to consider any concerns the Jewish religion, as beyond their jurisdiction. It would appear that neither the belief nor the worship of the early Christians, as long as they were so obscure as not to attract public notice, subjected them to the penalties of Roman law. The cruel sufferings which they endured at Rome, under Nero (A. D. 64), seem to have been due to a desire on the part of that tyrant to make the Jews odious by attributing the burning of Rome to one of the parties or sects of that people, as the Christians were then popularly supposed to be. At any rate, it is very certain that the Christians had nothing to do with burning the city; and the persecution of Nero, so called, was a local matter, and not an innovation on the Roman law itself. The letter of Pliny to the Emperor Trajan (A. D. 103), asking his advice as to the treatment of the Christians in Bithynia, shows that both parties seem to be dealing with a new problem, at any rate, with one which had not yet been settled by imperial legislation. Doubtless, Pliny had, by virtue of the imperium confided to him, so far as he, as it were, stayed. The emperors who ruled during the period knew, and cared as little for the old Roman gods as that of subordinated divinities, and with certain forms of sun-worship. Christians, under this new Paganism, was, so to say, outlawed. By the edict of Diocletian, the unity of the State, revoked the edict of persecution as not adapted to secure its ends, and

While the government thus forbore persecuting the Christians for heresy, still the populace in the large cities in the East, where the Christians were numerous, became, for various reasons, intensely imbittered against the new religion. The Christians naturally kept themselves more and more aloof from their fellow-subjects. They regarded the publication of professions upon the altar of the gods or of the emperor, as a test of loyalty, but as an invitation to commit an act, in their eyes, of horrible impiety. They abstained themselves, for conscience’ sake, from the cruel sports of the amphitheatre, especially when great religious festivals in honor of the heathen gods were held there; they refused to be soldiers, yet they courted martyrdom; and finally they preached a doctrine which taught that the world would soon be consumed by fire, and that all who did not worship the Christian God were doomed to eternal punishment. Under these circumstances, the mob in these large towns, enzied by the open neglect of their own religious rites, and attributing every calamity they suffered to the wrath of their offended gods, frequently shouted, “The Christians to the lions!” And the complaisant procurator, willing to do them a pleasure, too often yielded to their demands.

It is observable, that the first Roman legislation bearing directly on the position of the Christians in the empire is found in the edicts of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, by which Christianity was not considered essential to the safety of the State. Their claims to reverence were defended, not by the Pontifex Maximus, but by the emperor. Under this jurisprudence, many Christians were condemned to death, and crucified, and sold into slavery. At any rate, it is very certain that the Christians were then popularly supposed to be Jews odious by attributing the burning of Rome to one of the parties or sects of that people, as undertakings to secure the public welfare and the unity of the State, revoked the edict of persecution as not adapted to secure its ends, and thus gave to the Christians permission for the free and public exercise of their religion. The Edict of Milan (312), issued in the joint names of Constantine and Licinius, has been called the “great charter of the liberties of Christianity;” but it was no more than an edict of unlimited toleration. Still, it withdrew official recognition and protection from Paganism; and under its operation the old Roman religion gradually and slowly died out. Christianity was not recognized as the official religion until the reign of Theodosius, 380. Whether Constantine was a Christian is an historical problem not easy to solve. He purposely delayed baptism until he was in articulo mortis. But, whether Christian or not, vast changes took place during his reign, caused not merely by the unrestricted progress of Christianity, but by the relations which the emperor held towards its organized form, the Church. No one can read the account of the proceedings of the Council of Nicea (325), which formulated the creed which from that period to this has been regarded as the basis of the faith of the universal church, without being convinced that the emperor was regarded as something more than the honorary president of that body, that he considered himself at least as Pontifex Maximus in the new religion, as his predecessors had been in the old; and thus at the very outset was forced upon the infant Church that unholy alliance with the State, which, among other things, has helped to make Christianity so conspicuous an element in all subsequent history. The modern conceptions of the union of Church and State had its origin under Constantine. His successors, Theodosius and Gratian, define or ratify the definition of doctrines, and condemn heretics. Justinian evidently thought himself Pope and emperor combined; and Charlemagne, in his Capitularies, is at once the legislator of the Church and of the State.

The Christian Church received from Constantine another distinguishing mark, which it retained for nearly fifteen hundred years; namely, the principle and the practice of punishing heretics by civil penalties. It is an humiliating confession to make, that heresy—which is defined to be a persistent advocacy of opinions which have been condemned by the church—is an offense which has never been punished as a crime by the civil magistrate under any ecclesiastical system save the Christian. But Constantine, provided by an edict that the Donatist heretics should be so punished in 316, and his example was followed by Theodosius and others; so that before the close of the fourth century no less than seventeen edicts had been promulgated, directing the magistrates to punish Christian dissenters. By those edicts they were deprived of their property, and made liable to the fines and fees of the civil office, and they were liable to be scourged and banished. The first blood judicially shed for religious opinion is said to have been that of certain Manicheans in 385; but it is alleged that their condemnation was extorted from an usurping emperor, and that the infliction of death as a punishment was highly disapproved by such saints as Martin of Tours and Ambrose of Milan.

During the fourth century the pretensions of the Christian hierarchy to power were greatly increased, and the primitive simplicity of the conduct of Christians no longer existed. The church had vast possessions; its clergy formed the larger portion of the educated classes, and held conspicuous positions at the imperial court. Christian beneficence was not only recognized as a duty, but it became the fashion, or, rather, a passion among people of rank and wealth, to lavish gifts on the church: the magnates in the town worked generally harmoniously with the bishop in the administration; the bishop, indeed, becoming the most conspicuous officer in the municipe. In short, society during the fourth century, both in the East and the West, became Christianized. A revolution had begun which not only destroyed the outward forms of Paganism, but which gradually took hold of the spirit of the people. Nowhere can we find a better illustration of the recognized power of the clergy than where Ambrose, archbishop of Milan, has the courage to forbid the Emperor Theodosius (A. D. 390) even to enter the church, much less to receive therein the sacraments, until he had undergone penance for the crime of the massacre at Thessalonica, of which he had been guilty.

To this new condition of society a good deal of the legislation of Constantine and his successors corresponds. Much of that legislation is characterized by its humane spirit, and is in such striking contrast with the old Roman ideas, that we can hardly mistake in tracing in it the direct influence of Christian doctrine and moral example: such, for instance, are the edicts forbidding the exposure of infants, and restraining excessive cruelty towards slaves, as well as those concerning adultery, divorce, unnatural crimes, etc. How much of all this was due to what may be called the “reflex action” of Christianity, and how much to the humane principles of stoicism, it is not easy to say.

As the fourth century witnessed a succession of Christian emperors, and the firm establishment of the dogmatic creed of Christianity in the empire, so the fall of Pagan and imperial Rome, and the building-up of a new and Christian Rome upon its ruins, occurred during the fifth. The siege and capture of Rome by Alaric and his Goths, in 409, opens, therefore, a new era in history. Rome then ceased to be the conqueror of the world in the old sense; but, as soon as she became Christian, she prepared to wield a far greater power over mankind than she had ever yet done.

As the imperial power declined through corruption, weakness, and the assaults of the Barbarians, that of the Church, which availed herself freely of the imperial methods and organization, constantly increased. The power of civil government, especially in the West, fell into her hands naturally and of right, and the rulers, in the general confusion, were incapable of affording protection to those whom they governed. The capture of Rome by Alaric, therefore, was one of the great steps by which the popes, bishops of Rome, rose to power. The Pope at that time was doubtless the most important man in Rome: he alone, had any real power, not merely the attributes of supremacy, but authority very extensive in practice, although undefined. To him the panic-stricken Senate and people turned for help in time of danger:
and he (Leo I.) justified their confidence by striving, first to mitigate the anger of Alaric, and, secondly, to induce the cowardly Honorius, safe amidst the morasses of Ravenna, to send succor to the sorely pressed people of Rome. From that time the real government of that city was in the hands of its bishop. No emperor ever afterwards resided there. Meantime, in the East the union between Christianity and the imperial government became more thoroughly consolidated. The provisions of the Code of Justinian (529-565) are the best illustration how far this process had been carried; this code being a revised edition, so to speak, of the existing imperial law. It begins with a profession of belief in the Nicene Creed and in the authority of the first four General Councils. It acknowledges the supremacy of the Roman Church, commanding all the churches to be united with her. Justinian legislates, therefore, in this code, for Rome as well as for the East. The theory that the emperor is the religious as well as the civil head of the empire is maintained under this legislation. The church officials are as much under his jurisdiction as the civil magistrates. There are no exemptions, whatever, of the clergy from the ordinary operation of the civil law. The hierarchy in the Church, as in the State, is regulated by the provisions of this code; and the bishop is made an imperial officer for certain temporal affairs. There are also minute regulations in this code concerning the discipline of the monasteries. These provisions in regard to the relations of the Roman Government to Christianity in the sixth century form, of course, but a small portion of the great Code of Justinian; but they seem to show very clearly, either that the hierarchical and sacerdotal pretensions of later ages were not then put forward, or that the imperial government wholly ignored them. Religion and civil law, Church and State, appear in the legislation of Justinian to be practically identified under the common supremacy of the emperor; and church law throughout the world is based on Roman ideas and methods, which were all the outgrowth of the old Roman empire, of establishing a new one on a far grander scale, called the "Holy Roman Empire."

The strength of Christianity as organized by the emperors of the East was very much wasted in perpetual controversies in regard to the nature of Christ. The emperors participated actively in these discussions, which were regarded as matters of the highest State concern. They resulted in rending asunder the Christian organization of the East. Facilites, Maronites, etc., were not only heretics in religion in the eyes of the authorities at Constantinople, but they became thoroughiy disfected to the imperial government because it did not maintain what they regarded as the orthodox creed. These religious dissensions were, no doubt, a main cause of the increasing weakness of the Byzantine government in its control of the lands forming the basin of the Mediterran nean, and contributed largely to the ease with which they were overrun and subdued by the followers of Mohammed.

In the West, although the church in Rome may be called a Greek missionary church, the curious and subtle metaphysical discussions concerning the divine nature, so dear to the Greek mind, were avoided, and a more practical spirit prevailed. Rome, as has been said, became a Christian city in 410; and the separate government of an emperor of the West was given up in 476. While, however, the Cæsar at Constantinople thus became again nominally the world-emperor, the real power, in Italy at least, was thenceforth in the hands, first of the Goths, and then of the Lombards and the Pope.

By the close of the fifth century all the provinces of the West were permanently occupied by Barbarian invaders. But the Roman Church, with the Pope at its head, not only survived the wreck of the Roman Empire, but it seems to have snatched from its dying hands the gift of governing mankind, which enabled it to conquer the world anew. From that time the Pope felt it his secure in his supremacy in the church in the West, and free from any likelihood of interference by the emperor at Constantinople, measures were begun by him to revive the old Roman Empire, or rather to establish in its place a new one with the old methods and pretensions, of which the Pope was to be the spiritual director and guide. This scheme was carried out in the midst of the confusion and ruin caused by the invasion of the Barbarians; and they themselves were made the agents, in the midst of their triumph over the old empire, of establishing a new one on a far greater scale, called the "Holy Roman Empire."

This scheme was begun by sending missionaries from the Pope into heathen Germany and to propagate there the Roman-Catholic faith, and by forming a close alliance with the Frankish chiefs who ruled over tribes, who alone, of all the Barbarians, were Catholic as opposed to Arian. The Pope added much to the power of Pepin in the eyes of his tribesmen by crowning and anointing him king; and, in turn, Pepin aided and protected the Catholic missionaries in Germany. The result was, that Frankish conquests and the triumph of orthodoxy went hand in hand in that country. The obligation of the Pope to the king was reciprocal, and it was to their mutual advantage to maintain it. This was seen particularly, on a much larger scale, in the reign of the successor of Pepin, Charlemagne, who had, as king of the Franks, become by his conquests the ruler of a far larger territory than the Roman Empire had ever occupied in Europe. He was called upon by the Pope to drive out the Lombards, who were encroaching upon the territories of the church, and to free the Pope from the jurisdiction of the emperors at Ravenna at Constantinople. Hence he imposed upon the Western Church the observance of decrees abolishing the worship of images in churches which were considered heretical at Rome.

This work, which was begun by his father Pepin, was completed by Charlemagne; and on Christmas Day, A.D. 800, Charlemagne was crowned at Rome, by the Pope, emperor of the new or revived Roman Western Empire, on, as it was called, "Holy Roman Empire." The significance of The supreme dominion in matters ecclesiastical, but a necessarily moved by the same impulse. This scheme collision between the Christian emperor and the certain great but undefined power in civil affairs. It was supposed, that, under this dual system, no agreement on what special powers were reserved by means of which the city of man should become by it to the emperor, and what belonged to the system of Charlemagne, was maintained legally and nominally during the middle age and up to the time of the Reformation. Practically it was a great failure; because it was found impossible for the parties to it to agree upon what special powers were reserved it to the emperor, and what belonged to the Pope. Disputes on this subject were kept alive by the lawyers in the federation of the Rhine, and refusing to recognize any longer the existence of the Holy Roman Empire, Francis II., then emperor, voluntarily gave up the title, and took that of “Emperor of Austria”; and thus the Holy Roman Empire came to an end a thousand and six years after the coronation of Charlemagne, and eighteen hundred and fifty-eight years after Caesar had conquered at Pharsalia.

ROME AND CHRISTIANITY.

ROME.

transaction is, that it was intended by the parties to the division of the government of the world between them. To the new emperor and his successors, kings of the Franks, duly crowned by the Pope, was assigned the universal religious affair, as also the duty of defending the church, and of maintaining the true or Catholic faith throughout the world. To the Pope was given not only a supreme dominion in matters ecclesiastical, but a certain great but undefined power in civil affairs. It was supposed, that, under this dual system, no collision between the Christian emperor and the Christian pontiff was possible, each being necessarily moved by the same impulse. This scheme was a strange mixture of the Roman idea of universal dominion and absolute unity of government with St. Augustine’s theory, that it was the chief purpose of God in creating man that there should be a visible society on earth, called “the church,” by means of which the city of man should become in due time the city of God.

Under this new or revived Roman Empire the relations between the Pope and the kings of the Franks or of Germany—“Roman Emperors,” as they were styled—were maintained during the middle age and up to the time of the Reformation. Practically it was a great failure; because it was found impossible for the parties to it to agree upon what special powers were reserved by it to the emperor, and what belonged to the Pope. Disputes on this subject were kept alive by the lawyers until 1806, when Napoleon, having become Protector of the Confederation of the Rhine, and refusing to recognize any longer the existence of the Holy Roman Empire, Francis II., then emperor, voluntarily gave up the title, and took that of “Empire of Austria”; and thus the Holy Roman Empire came to an end a thousand and six years after the coronation of Charlemagne, and eighteen hundred and fifty-eight years after Caesar had conquered at Pharsalia.

ROME has been more closely interwoven with the history of the civilization of the human race than any other city on the globe. In some single point other cities may excel it. It has no Gothic, and it has no Acropolis; but all the single threads of ancient history were gathered in Rome, and from Rome issued all the single threads of modern history.

More especially Rome may be said to have been the centre of the history of the Christian Church. From the third to the sixteenth century it was, in spite of the schism of the Eastern Church, and in spite of a never fully surpressed opposition in the Western, the pivot on which the history of the Christian Church rested; and from the Reformation down to our times it has still continued to be the head of the largest section of the Christian Church. It owes this its prominent position in the Christian world to the circumstance of its being the residence of the popes. It was the popes who with great courage and tact, and sometimes, also, with great sacrifices, saved the city from utter destruction by the hands of the barbarians; and it was a simple and natural consequence of the course which events took, that in time it became not only the residence, but the possession, of the popes. By degrees, however, as
ROME. 2073

ROOD.

The papal idea of transforming Christianity into a kind of Tibetan Lamaism developed, imperial Rome, with its temples, palaces, theatres, and baths, disappeared, and on its ruins, and from its materials, papal Rome was constructed, with its churches and monasteries. The connection between the city and its rulers became as intimate as that between body and soul; nevertheless, it must not be overlooked, that the city actually sank lowest at the very moment when the Papacy rose highest. When the popes removed to Avignon, Rome was nothing more than a number of short stretches of grass, brushwood, and ruins, in which the robbers lay in ambush for the pilgrims who wandered from church to church, or from monastery to monastery; and it was not so much the return of the popes as the revival of letters which this time saved the city, and once more made it the centre of the world. At the beginning of the sixteenth century, when the popes removed to Avignon, Rome was indeed the true hearth of science and art, of learning and taste; until in the eighteenth century it met with a rival, which finally outshone it, namely Paris. In the middle of the nineteenth century the city again changed character. It became a political centre, and, after some convulsions, the capital of the kingdom of Italy; and by degrees, as royal Rome unfolded itself with its schools, factories, hotels, and commodious citizens' dwellings, papal Rome is pressed into the shadow, and becomes a memory.

On Sept. 16, 1870, the French troops were withdrawn from Civita Vecchia; and on Sept. 20, Rome surrendered to the king of Italy, after a short resistance by the papal mercenaries. A provisional government was established, and a popular vote was decreed on the question of annexation to the kingdom of Italy. As 40,785 votes were in the affirmative, and only 46 in the negative,—an eloquent characterization of the papal government,—a royal decree of Oct. 9 formally annexed the Roman territory, and on July 2, 1871, the king of Italy took up his residence in the city. Meanwhile the Italian Parliament had passed the so-called "law of guaranty" (May 13, 1871), allowing the Pope to live in the Vatican as a sovereign, not subject to the laws of the land, and granting him an annual appanage of 3,225,000 livres. The Pope protested against all these proceedings, excommunicated every one who had taken part in the establishment of the kingdom of Italy, refused to accept the appanage granted, and complained loudly that he was kept a prisoner in the Vatican. But his protest had no effect, and his complaints found no sympathy. The syllabus and the decrees of the Vatican Council proved utterly unable to prevent the floods of modern civilization from pushing their waves against the very walls of the Vatican. A new police-force, a new board of health, a better illumination of the streets, a new press-law, a new school-law, etc., transferred the centre of the city from St. Peter's Square to the Via Veneto, as if it had been touched with a magic wand. Out of a population of between 200,000 and 300,000 inhabitants there were 14,389 pupils in 1873 in the new elementary schools established under the control of the State. In the same year the new Protestant Church of St. Paul-within-the-Walls was dedicated, and the first female seminary was opened. There are now about twelve Protestant congregations and chapels in the city, representing the leading denominations, but mostly supported by English and American friends.

In spite of these changes, and many others of the same tendency, Rome has not as yet lost its character of being a pre-eminently ecclesiastical city. Of its hundred and thirty conventual institutions, some have been suppressed by the Italian Government, and their buildings employed for other purposes. But a large number of the churches are still standing; and they are by no means deserted, or in any way bereft of their splendors. Besides the churches of St. Peter, St. John Lateran, and St. Maria Rotonda (Pantheon), which are separately spoken of in this work, we may mention the Church of St. Paul, situated outside the city, on the road to Ostia, and on the spot, where, according to tradition, St. Peter suffered martyrdom. The original building was one of the oldest and most magnificent churches in Rome, but was burned down on July 17, 1823. The falling roof, which was of wood, completely spoiled the columns and walls, with their costly mosaics and pictures. The new building, however, for whose construction the vicerey of Egypt presented the Pope with several shiploads of the finest alabaster, is in grand and no less magnificent structure. The Church of Sta. Maria Maggiore, situated on the Esquiline Hill, is one of the five patriarchal churches of Rome. It was built by Pope Liberius (359-366), and is probably the oldest Mary-church in Christendom. It is a basilica; and its flat wooden ceiling, excellently carved, and profusely gilded, is supported by forty-two magnificent columns. From the balcony on its front the Pope blesses the multitude on Aug. 15, the feast of the Ascension of Mary. The Church of St. Laurentius, situated outside the gate of the Tiburtine Road, was originally built by Constantine the Great, and consists really of two structures, connected with each other by a chapel over the tomb of the saint. The Church of St. Peter in Montorio, situated in the Trastevere, was built by Ferdinando and Isabella of Spain, on the spot, where, according to tradition, St. Peter suffered martyrdom. The Church of Sta. Maria in Araceli, situated on the Capitoline Hill, was built before the tenth century, and occupies the site of the ancient temple of Juno Moneta. It is, however, not so much the great number of churches in Rome which give the city its specifically ecclesiastical character as the life which is developed in the churches, and which, so to speak, is continued in the streets and in the houses.

RONSODF SECT. See ELLER.

ROOD is the Anglo-Saxon word for "cross," "crucifix."
ROOS, Magnus Friedrich, b. at Sulz-on-the-Neckar, Sept. 6, 1727; d. at Anhausen, March 19, 1803. He studied theology at Tubingen, and was appointed vicar in Stuttgart 1755, diakonus at Göppingen 1757, and at Bebenhausen 1767, and prälat at Anhausen 1754. A pupil of Bengel, and inclining towards Pietism, he exercised a great influence, not only by his writings, but also by his powerful and impressive personality. His principal works are, Einleitung in die biblischen Geschichten, 1774 (last edition, 1876); Christliche Glaubenslehre, a popular representation of the system of Christian doctrines, 1786 (last edition, 1860); Christliches Haushbuch, Kreuzzschule, 1709; (last edition, 1864); Soldatengespräche, Einwände für Seeleführer, etc. H. BECK.

ROSA OF LIMA, the principal saint of Peru; b. at Lima in 1580; d. there in 1617, in consequence of the ascetic practices she performed in imitation of Catharine of Siena. She was canonized in 1671. See Act. Sanct., Aug. 26.

ROSA OF VITERBO, d. in her native city of Viterbo in 1252, about eighteen years old; preached repentance in the streets with the cross in her hand. See Act. Sanct., Sept. 4.

ROSALIA, of Middelburg, the principal saint of Sicily, lived in the twelfth century as a hermit on Mount Quisquina, where her remains were found in a cave in 1224. She died between 1180 and 1180. See Act. Sanct., Sept. 4.

ROSARY, The, consists of a string of larger and smaller beads, and is used by the Roman Catholics when they say their Pater-nosters and Ave-Marias, in order to ascertain the number done. The custom of repeating the Lord's Prayer over and over again a great number of times in succession arose among the first Christian hermits and monks. (See SOZOMEN: Hist. Eccl., vi. 29). But the origin of the rosary is, nevertheless, of a much later date. It was first used by the Dominican monks, though it is not certain that it was introduced by St. Dominic himself. As it is used both by the Mohammedans and the Brahmins, it is generally believed to have been brought to Europe by the crusaders. There are various forms of rosaries: that generally used has fifty-five beads; namely, five decades of Ave-Maria beads, and five Pater-noster beads. The meaning of the name rosarium, properly a "garden of roses," is variously explained by Roman-Catholic writers, but most properly from the phrase rosa mystica, often applied as a predicate to the Virgin.

The Confraternity of the Rosary — Confraternity of Rosario, B. M. V. — was founded at Cologne in 1475, by Jacob Sprenger, grand-inquisitor of Germany, and received from Sixtus IV. absolution for a hundred days, and from Innocent VIII. absolution for three hundred and sixty thousand years. The victory of Lepanto, Oct. 7, 1571, was regarded as having been brought about by the prayers of the Rosary. The rosary is generally ascribed to the prayers of the order, and the first mention of it is made by St. Dominic himself. As it is used to quote both the Dominicans and the Jesuits in favor of his views, the latter sent an exposition of his ideas to the synod, and Roscelin was compelled to recant. Anselm then finished his De fide trinitatis, which is a refutation of Roscelin; and the latter, as he, in spite of his recantation, continued to teach his old views, was deposed. He went to England, and attacked Anselm, now archbishop of Canterbury, for his views of the incarnation. A controversy had just sprung up between the archbishop and the king; but, as they shortly after were reconciled, Roscelin's attack had no effect, and he left England. (See ROSCELIN: Epist., p. 197.) He settled at Tours; and, shortly after, his controversy with Abelard began. Abelard had been his pupil; but, in his book De trinitate (afterwards called Introductio in theologiam), Abelard, evidently with an eye to the decisions of the synod of Soissons, very strongly emphasized the unity in the Trinity. Roscelin denounced him to Gisbert, bishop of Paris, for other heresies, and Abelard answered with a violent attack on Roscelin. (See ABEILARD: Ep. xxi.) But from that time the latter disappears from history. See the several works on the history of philosophy by RITTER, FRANTZ, and HAURÉAU; Histoire littéraire de la France, ix. p. 3; Die Dogmatik des d. mittleren Zeit [1787-1517], Freib.-in-Br., 1882, pp. 18, 152, 245 sqq.

ROZELIN, or RUCELIN, often spoken of in the history of Christian doctrines as a tritheist, and in the history of philosophy as nominalist, but nevertheless very imperfectly known. He seems to have been born in the diocese of Soissons, and to have been educated at Rheims. He was a canon at Compiegne, where his peculiar conception of the Holy Trinity first startled his pupils, and attracted public attention. In harmony with his philosophic nominalism, he could conceive of God as existing only under the form of an individual, and consequently the Trinity became to him three gods. One of his pupils, Johannes, afterwards cardinal-bishop of Fusesoli, addressed himself to Anselm, at that time abbot of Bec; and Anselm answered, promising to write a complete refutation. (See BALUZIUS: Miscell., iv. p. 478, and Ep. Anselm., ii. 33.) A synod was convened at Soissons in 1082; and as Roscelin used to quote both Roscelin and Anselm in favor of his views, the latter sent an exposition of his ideas to the synod, and Roscelin was compelled to recant. Anselm then finished his De fide trinitatis, which is a refutation of Roscelin; and the latter, as he, in spite of his recantation, continued to teach his old views, was deposed. He went to England, and attacked Anselm, now archbishop of Canterbury, for his views of the incarnation. A controversy had just sprung up between the archbishop and the king; but, as they shortly after were reconciled, Roscelin's attack had no effect, and he left England. (See ROSCELIN: Epist., p. 197.) He settled at Tours; and, shortly after, his controversy with Abelard began. Abelard had been his pupil; but, in his book De trinitate (afterwards called Introductio in theologiam), Abelard, evidently with an eye to the decisions of the synod of Soissons, very strongly emphasized the unity in the Trinity. Roscelin denounced him to Gisbert, bishop of Paris, for other heresies, and Abelard answered with a violent attack on Roscelin. (See ABEILARD: Ep. xxi.) But from that time the latter disappears from history. See the several works on the history of philosophy by RITTER, FRANTZ, and HAURÉAU; Histoire littéraire de la France, ix. p. 3; Die Dogmatik des d. mittleren Zeit [1787-1517], Freib.-in-Br., 1882, pp. 18, 152, 245 sqq.

ROSE, Henry John, Church of England; b. at Uckfield, 1801; d. at Bedford, Jan. 31, 1873. He was graduated at St. John's College, Cambridge, 1821; fellow, 1824; Hulsean lecturer, 1839. (The Law of Moses viewed in connection with the History and Character of the Jews"); rector of Houghton Conquest, Bedfordshire, 1866; archbishop of Canterbury, for his views of the incarnation. A controversy had just sprung up between the archbishop and the king; but, as they shortly after were reconciled, Roscelin's attack had no effect, and he left England. (See ROSCELIN: Epist., p. 197.) He settled at Tours; and, shortly after, his controversy with Abelard began. Abelard had been his pupil; but, in his book De trinitate (afterwards called Introductio in theologiam), Abelard, evidently with an eye to the decisions of the synod of Soissons, very strongly emphasized the unity in the Trinity. Roscelin denounced him to Gisbert, bishop of Paris, for other heresies, and Abelard answered with a violent attack on Roscelin. (See ABEILARD: Ep. xxi.) But from that time the latter disappears from history. See the several works on the history of philosophy by RITTER, FRANTZ, and HAURÉAU; Histoire littéraire de la France, ix. p. 3; Die Dogmatik des d. mittleren Zeit [1787-1517], Freib.-in-Br., 1882, pp. 18, 152, 245 sqq. LANDERER (HAUCK).

ROSE, Hugh James, brother of the preceding; b. at Uckfield, 1795; d. at Florence, Italy, Dec. 22, 1838. He was graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, 1817; vicar of Horsham, 1822-39; prebendary of Christ's, 1827-39. He was an advocate in the university of Cambridge, 1829-39;
rector of Hadley, Suffolk, 1830; incumbent of Fairstead, Essex, and of St. Thomas, 1834; and principal of King's College, London, 1836. He was a very learned man, and a High-Churchman of the most pronounced type. It is considered, indeed, the actual founder of the Tractarian movement; see TRACTARIANISM. He edited the Encyclopædia Metropolitana (1836-38), and projected the New Biographical Dictionary (see above). For list of his publications, mostly pamphlets, see Allibone in loco.

ROSENBACH, Johann Georg, a native of Heilbronn, a spar-maker by trade; was seized with religious enthusiasm by reading the writings of Johann Adam Rabe of Erlangen; gave up his trade, and wandered through Germany, from Tubingen to Hamburg, 1703-06, preaching, and holding prayer-meetings, but generally persecuted by the clergy and the police. From Germany he went to Holland, and there the track of him has become lost. He published Glaubens-Bekenntniss, 1703, Wunder-Bekehrung, 1704, Wunder-Führung Gottes, etc. L. HELLER.

ROSENmüLLER, Ernst Friedrich Karl, b. at Hessberg, near Hildburghausen, Dec. 10, 1768; d. at Leipzig, Sept. 17, 1835. He studied Oriental languages and archeology at Königsberg, Giesen, and Leipzig, and was in 1796 made professor at the last-mentioned university. For the study of the Arabic language and literature, his Institutiones ad fund. ling. Arab. (Leip., 1818) and Analecta Arabica (Leip., 1824-27, 3 vols.) were of great importance; and he exercised considerable influence on the development of evangelical theology by furnishing exact information of the state of the East, modern and ancient (Das alte und neue Morgenland, Leip., 1818-20, 6 vols.), and by his linguistic and archeological explanations of the Old Testament, Scholia in V. T. (Leip., 1788-1817, 16 vols., abridged into 5 vols., Leip., 1828-35), Handbuch für bibl. Kritik und Exegese (Göttingen, 1787-1810, 4 vols.), and Handb. d. bibl. Altertumskunde (Leip., 1823-31, 4 vols.). ALBRECHT VOGEL.

ROSICRUCIANS. In 1614 there appeared at Cassel an anonymous pamphlet under the title Fama Fraternitatis des lüdlichen Ordens des Rosenkreuzes. It gave a full report of the foundation of the secret society of the Rosicrucians two hundred years before, and an elaborate account of the life of the founder, Christian Rosenkreutz. He was a German by birth, of a distinguished family, and made as a monk a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Having studied physics and mathematics among the Arabs, and mastered the whole science of magic, he returned to Germany, and founded the order. The members, who were in the possession of all the deepest secrets of science, and absolutely exempted from sickness or suffering, should devote themselves to the curing and nursing of the sick; but they should wear no peculiar dress, and the existence of the society should be kept a secret for a hundred years. The rebuilding of a house, the book goes on, divulged the secret to the world; and people are now invited to enter the society. In 1615 appeared Confession oder Bekändigung der Societät und Bruderschaft R. C., and in 1616 Chymische Hochzeit Christian Rosenkreutz. The sensation which these publications produced was immense; and vehement controversies arose, both among theologians and physicians. Andreas Libavius protested that the whole purpose of the society was to destroy the authority of Galen, and put Theophrastus Paracelsus in his place. Others — as, for instance, the English alchemist, Robert Fludd, and the body-physician of the Emperor Rudolph II., Michael Maier — defended the society with enthusiasm. Various mystic philosophers and theologians, as also the Jesuits, tried to take advantage of the movement; while others saw in it a pernicious attempt against Lutheranism. Singularly enough, it proved absolutely impossible to discover the least trace of the actual existence of the original society. New societies appropriated the name, but the old seemed entirely to have disappeared. People began to consider the whole affair as a mystification; and it has been established with tolerable certainty, that the author of the Fama was Johann Valentin Andreae, the noted Wurtemberg theologian.

LIT. — Missae an die kocherleuchtete Brüderschaft, etc., Leipzig, 1783, giving a survey over the whole literature of the subject from 1614 to 1783; Chr. v. Murr: Ueber den malreiten Ursprung der Rosicrucierer, Sulzbach, 1803; G. E. Guhr: Kritische Bemerkungen über den Verfasser der Fama Fraternitatis, in Nieder's Zeitschrift für histor. Theologie, 1852; [Hardgrave Jennings: The Rosicrucians, their Rites and Mysteries, London, 1870, 2d ed., 1879]. KLOFFEL.

ROSITHA lived in the latter part of the tenth century as nun in Ganderheim, and wrote, the instance of her abess (Gerberga, 958-1001, a daughter of Duke Henry of Bavaria), an epic in praise of Otho I. (Hrotsvitha Carmen de genitio Odomis I. imperatoris), and another on the history of her monastery (De primordiis canonit Ganderheimensi). She became still more famous by her comedies, written after the model of Terence, and for the purpose of weaning people from reading the slippery but charming plays of that writer. Her collected works were edited by K. A. Barack, Nuremberg, 1858. Her two epics have not come down to us complete, but have some value as historical sources. German trans. by Thomas G. Pfund, in Geschichtsschreibern d. Deutsch. Vorzeit, vol. 5.

ROTA. See CURIA.

ROTHE, Richard, b. at Posen, Jan. 28, 1799; d. at Heidelberg, Aug. 20, 1867. He was educated at Breslau, but the outbreak of the affair of Napoleon; but he nevertheless began his theological studies in 1817 at Heidelberg, "the Prussian temper being repugnant to him." In 1819 he went to Berlin, but neither Schleiermacher nor Neander made any great impression on him. By Baron von Kottwitz he was introduced to the Berlin circle of pietists; and that influence continued predominant with him during his stay at Wittenberg (1820-22), where he finished his studies. He was also intimately associated with Tholuck. In 1828 he was appointed chaplain to the Prussian embassy in Rome. There he became intimate with Chevalier de Bunse, and the somewhat narrow bounds of his pietism began to give way to the free development of his own speculative genius. In 1829 he returned to Wittenberg as director of the theological seminary. He lectured chiefly on church history, and his lectures have been published by Weingarten. belonging to the Greek Church, 115,420 to the Church of Rome, 8,803 to the Armenian Church, and 7,790 to the Evangelical Church, also 401,051 Jews, and 25,033 Mohammedans. The Greek ception that historical phenomenon, Jesus Christ.

tion of the somewhat entangled church affairs of Baden, and though he exercised a profound and wide-spread influence, both as professor and as author. Personally he was distinguished by purity, simplicity, and modesty, and by the completeness and perfect harmony of his character: no element, moral, intellectual, or aesthetic, was lacking; and none was unduly developed. His authorship bears the same stamp. No Christian idea, no phase of Christian life, is forgotten in the theological system he elaborated; and none is made a barren question. His two principal works are, Anfänge der christlichen Kirche und ihrer Verfassung (1837), and Theologische Ethik (1845-48, 3 vols., 2d ed., thoroughly revised, 1867-72, in 5 vols.). They supplement one another. The first is based on the idea that the Church is destined to be wholly absorbed by the State as soon as it has reached its merely pedagogical goal,— to make religion penetrate into every fibre of human life; the second, on the idea that religion and morals are absolutely identical, so that no Christian dogma is fully realized until it finds its way out in human action, and no act of man is really moral, unless illuminated from within by the light of the Christian dogma. The development of these ideas is often very bold, and sometimes a little singular; but through the whole wafts the spirit of true Christian humility and love. The following noble confession of his humble belief is worth quoting: "The ground of all my thinking, I can truly say, is the simple faith of Christians, independent of dogma, or any system of theology, which for 1800 years has overcome the world. It is my last certitude to oppose constantly and determinedly every other pretended knowledge which asserts itself against this faith. I know no other firm ground on which I could anchor my whole being, and particularly my speculations except that historical phenomenon, Jesus Christ. He is to me the unimpeachable Holy of Holies of Humanity, the highest Being known to man, and a sun-rising in history whence has come the light by which we see the world" (1st ed. Ethik, pref., p. xvi.). His Ethik is the greatest work of German speculative theology next to Schleiermacher's Der Chrischliche Glaube. Numerous are his Zur Dogmatik, 1863, and his lectures on Dogmatik, imperfectly edited from his manuscripts by Schenkel, Heidelberg, 1870, 2 vols. Roth also published some sermons and minor treatises. His Sermons for the Christian Year appeared in an English translation, Edinburgh, 1849, reprinted at Belfast, 1861-67.) Critics have usually regarded it as beneath contempt; and readers for whom it has no charm of association find it, with rare exceptions (eminently Ps. xxxii.), rough, dry, tasteless, and profitless to the last degree. Yet Rufus Choate said, "An uncommon pith and garland of sentiment, lies in that old version: I prefer it to Watt's." And Sir Walter Scott found it, "though homely, plain, forcible, and intelligible, and very often possessing a rude sort of majesty, which perhaps would be ill exchanged for mere elegance."

ROUSSEAU, Jean Jacques, b. at Geneva, June 28, 1712; d. at Ermenonville, near Paris, June 9, 1778. He was a maker by trade, was a fool; and the son passed his time in idleness, reading romances. But there were powers in him which early showed themselves. When nine years old, the reading of Plutarch filled his soul with enthusiasm. Apprenticed to an engraver on copper, he was ill treated, and found no better consolation than idle day-dreams in the woods. He sought refuge with a Roman-Catholic priest in Confiogn, in the neighborhood of Geneva; and the priest brought him to Madame de Warens.

ROUSSEAU.

at Annecy, a recent convert to Romanism, and a lady of disgusting immorality covered over with a thin film of external respectability. By them he was placed in a monastery in Turin, where he was converted from Calvinism to Romanism, and then let loose. In 1694, he became a valet in one house, where he stole, and then in another, whence he was dismissed for laziness. He returned to Madame de Warens, and was placed in a seminary, where he learned some music, and then for many years he was cast about in a rather adventurous manner, chiefly living as the lover of Madame de Warens. But at the same time he studied mathematics, Latin, music, etc. He read Locke, Leibnitz, Malebranche, Descartes, etc.; and when in his twenty-ninth year, in 1741, he found himself superseded by somebody else in the service of Madame de Warens, and went to Paris, he was not altogether unprepared for a literary career.

In Paris he formed a connection with Thérèse Levasseur, a bar-maid from Orléans, a woman who never could learn the names of the months, who had settled at Ferney, and who hated him cordially. He went back to Paris, and lived for many years. In 1740 he published his first essay, Le progress des sciences et des arts, a-til contribué à corrompre ou à épurer les moeurs, by which he won the prize of the academy of Dijon. Concerning the principles, the fundamental relation between nature and civilization, he was in utter confusion; but the passion with which he threw himself on the side of nature, the vigor of his argumentation, the keenness of his eloquence, made his book irresistible, and his observations, and the inexhaustible wealth of his thought, gave much offence, have some critical value,—and he continued the business even after he had become a famous author. He did so as a speculation, and the speculation succeeded. Everybody wanted to see him, and to have some music copied by him; and high persons did not fail to leave some golden present in his room. He carried to the foundling-hospital. He made his living by copying music,—he also wrote two operas (Les Muses galantes, 1742, and Le devin de village, 1732) which were successfully brought on the stage, and some letters on French music, which by their excellence, have some critical value,—and he continued the business even after he had become a famous author.

As his genius developed, his character broke down. The sensitiveness which formed part of Rousseau's nature grew into a disease, and the vanity and suspicion which necessarily resulted from the unprincipled life he led made it at last impossible for him to converse in a free and noble way with his fellowmen. He was seized by melancholy and misanthropy. He fancied that he was the victim of a widespread conspiracy. He left Geneva in 1756, driven away by Voltaire, who had settled at Ferney, and who hated him cordially. He went back to Paris, and lived for six years in the solitude of Montmartre. But in 1762 the Parliament of Paris condemned Emile as a "godless" book, and an order of arrest was issued against the author. Rousseau fled, he did not know exactly whither. On an invitation from Hume, he went to England; but he soon fancied he had found out that Hume was one of his worst enemies. In 1767 he returned to Paris, not sane any more. He died very suddenly, suspected of having taken poison. But, in spite of the mental disturbances from which he suffered, he wrote in the last years of his life his Confessions, one of his most brilliant achievements. It involuntarily reminds the reader of Augustine's Confessions, though there is one very striking difference. Rousseau is as candid as Augustine in acknowledging his faults, and confessing his shortcomings; he does not spare himself; he goes into the most disgusting details: but his candor does not make the same impression of truth and uprightness that Augustine's does. Somehow his confessions of faults and crimes always end in a kind of self-glorification. To the last years of his life belongs also a treatise on the origin of religion, which was found in 1858. When con-paried with the Profession de Foi du Viceaire Savoyard, in Émile, it shows a decided approach towards Christianity.

ROUSSEL, Gérard (Gerardus Rufus), the confessor of Marguerite of Navarre; was b. at Vaucouleurs, near Amiens, and joined, while studying theology in Paris, that group of young reformers which formed around Lefévre d'Étaples. When the persecution began in 1521, he fled to Meaux, where he found refuge with Bishop Briçonnet. Soon, however, he was driven away from Meaux too; and he then stayed for some time in Strasbourg, in the house of Capitole. In 1526 he was allowed to return to France, and was made confessor to the Queen of Navarre, who in 1530 made him abbot of Clairac, and in 1536 bishop of Oleron. He belonged to the kind of reformers who tried to find a middle course between the church of the Pope and the church of Calvin. He continued to work for the Reformation, but without separat[ing] from the Church of Rome. He used the French language in the mass, he administered the Lord's Supper under both species, and he wrote for his clergy an exposition of the Apostles' Creed, the Decalogue, and the Lord's Prayer, in which it was applied to the titles or headings of chapters in certain law-books.

The exposition was condemned by the Sorbonne as heretic in 1550; but Roussel died before the verdict was formally issued. See, by the Sorbonne as heretic in 1550; but Roussel died before the verdict was formally issued.

ROWLANDS, Daniel, a powerful Welsh preacher; was b. at Pant-y-beudy, near Llanegitho, Wales, about 1713; d. at Llanegitho, Oct. 16, 1790. Of his youth and early manhood nothing is known, except that he studied at the grammar-school of Hereford. Ordained at London, 1733, whither he travelled on foot, he became curate to his brother at Llanegitho, holding that position till his brother's death, 1780. The Bishop of St. Davids refused to induct him into the office of rector, but induced him, by a secret arrangement, by the bishop revoked his licensure on account of his "irregularities." Thus was lost to the Church of England one of the most powerful preachers of the century. Lady Huntingdon, a good judge, spoke of him as having no superior in the pulpit, except Whitefield; and Bishop Ryle calls him "one of the spiritual giants of the last century." He preached to immense audiences in the church and in the fields. Once in his history a revival began with his reading of the Litany of the Church of England. At the words, "By thine agony and bloody sweat, good Lord, deliver us," the congregation began to weep loudly. Eight of Rowland's Sermons were translated into English in 1774. See the Biographies by John Owen (London, 1840) and E. Morgan; and Ryle: Christian Leaders of the Last Century, London, 1869.

ROYAARD, Hermann Jan, b. at Utrecht, Oct. 3, 1794; d. there Jan. 2, 1854. He studied theology in his native city, and was appointed professor in 1823. He devoted himself chiefly to church history and canon law; and his works, Geschiedenis van het Christendom in Nederland (Utrecht, 1849-53, 2 vols.) and Hetelandaardes kerkregt in Nederlands (Utrecht, 1834-37, 2 vols.), exercised considerable influence on the study of those departments.

